Poems 3. 13–18, which display similarities with epigram, are mainly regarded today as works of Sulpicia.<sup>1</sup> The allusiveness of the language and the difficulty of reconstructing the context suggest that these are ‘occasional’ poems. They have the charm of immediacy. Poem 18 is an expression of regret for the fact that its writer left her lover alone the night before without showing her true feelings. The 1st of the Sulpicia poems also bears witness to a praiseworthy honesty. Her happiness in love fills the poetess with pride and joy, and she rejects all concealment. In these quickly thrown off lines, as well as in difficult passages, which still display a struggle with language, we constantly come across striking expressions, as at 13. 9, peccasse iuvat, ‘my offense fills me with joy’. The struggle of Roman pride against convention is also visible: vultus componere famae/taedet; cum digno digna fuisse ferar, ‘I loathe to wear a mask for rumor. Let all hear that we have met, each worthy of the other’ (13. 9–10). Here the direct juxtaposition of the masculine and feminine of the same adjective is telling. A hyperbaton reflects the clash of feelings: ardorem cupiens dissimulare meum, ‘wishing to hide the fire within me’ (18. 6).

The adroitness with which poems 3. 8–12 are set before the epigrams of Sulpicia is remarkable. The last elegy of that group can clearly be regarded as a preparation for the first epigram of Sulpicia. The final words adsit amor (3. 12. 20) may be compared with the introductory words tandem venit amor (3. 13. 1); or the prayer to Venus (3. 11. 13–16) may be compared with its fulfillment (3. 13. 5). Similarly two sets of birthday poems (3. 14 and 15 compared to 3. 11 and 12) correspond to one another, as do the illness poems (3. 17 and 10). The correspondence between 3. 3. and 3. 19 also perhaps shows that the book does not lack coherence, although the antithesis between the concern of the loving girl and the pledge of faithfulness by the lover does not require us to identify the Tibullus of 3. 19<sup>1</sup> with Cerinthus. 'The partner's infidelity' is treated both from the point of view of the woman (3. 16) and of the man (3. 20).

<sup>1</sup> Bibl.: H. HARRAUER 1971, 59–60; E. BRÉGUET, Le roman de Sulpicia. Élégies IV 2–12 du Corpus Tibullianum, Genève 1946; H. MACL. CURRIE, The Poems of Sulpicia, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1751–1764; D. LIEBS, Eine Enkelin des Juristen Servius Sulpicius Rufus, in: Sodalitas. Scritti in onore di A. GUARINO, Napoli 1984–1985, vol. 3, 1455–1457; N. J. LOWE, Sulpicia's Syntax, CQ 38, 1988, 193–205; M. S. SANTIROCCO, Sulpicia Reconsidered, CJ 74, 1979, 229–239. H. TRÄNKLE (s. below ‘editions’) 2; 258–260; 300 dates 3. 13–18 between 25 and 20 B.C.; 3. 8–12 soon after Ovid; cf. S. and V. PROBST, Frauendichtung in Rom. Die Elegien der Sulpicia, AU 25, 6, 1992, 19–36.

It is not impossible, then, that poems 3. 7 to 20 form a cycle. The epigrams of Sulpicia are the nucleus of invention. A sensitive poet (Tibullus?) produced counterparts to them and set them in a larger context. At any rate, the 3rd book of the Corpus Tibullianum bears witness to the lively exchange among talented poets in Messalla's circle. It is testimony to Messalla's tolerance that not only the panegyric but also Sulpicia's somewhat shrewish dig at him (3. 14) were accepted into the collection. The discussion of the first two books already established Tibullus' talent at empathizing with other persons and situations, switching his standpoint, and depicting a world of his own. The 3rd book's richness of characters and the multiplicity of voices and viewpoints, as well as the extraordinary sensitivity shown in the cycle centering on Cerinthus (3. 8–12), match well this ability and make understandable why such collective poetry was linked to Tibullus' name.

Editions: Editio princeps: VINDELINUS DE SPIRA, Valerii Catulli Veronensis, poetae clarissimi, carmina. Albii Tibulli Equitis Romani poetae elegiae. Aurelii Propertii Umbri Mevani Carmina. P. Papinii Statii Surculi Sylvarum liber ad Stellam, Venetiis 1472, fol. 37a–65a. * First single edition: FLORENTIUS DE ARGENTINA, Albii Tibulli carminum libri IV et Ovidi Epist. Sapphus ad Phaonem, probably Venetiis about 1472, fol. 1a–42b. * C. G. HEYNE (TC, ind.), Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1777. * C. LACHMANN, Berlin 1829. * K. F. SMITH (TC), New York 1913, repr. 1964. * J. P. POSTGATE, Oxford 1915. * R. HELM (TTrN), Berlin 3rd ed. 1968. * M. C. J. PUTNAM (C), Norman 1973. * F. W. LENZ (= LEVY) et G. C. (= K.) GALINSKY, Lugduni Batavorum 2nd ed. 1974. * G. LUCK, Stutgardiae 1988. * J. P. POSTGATE, G. P. GOOLD (TTr), London 1988. * G. LEE (TTrN), Leeds 3rd ed. 1990. * Book 1: P. MURGATROYD (C), University of Natal, Pietermaritzburg 1980. * Book 2: P. MURGATROYD (TC), Oxford 1994. * Book 3 (Appendix Tibulliana): H. TRÄNKLE (C), Berlin 1990 (authoritative). ** Ind., concordance: S. GOVAERTS, Le Corpus Tibullianum. Index verborum et relevés statistiques. Essai de méthodologie statistique, La Haye 1966. * E. N. O'NEIL, A Critical Concordance of the Tibullan Corpus, New York 1963. * H. MORGENROTH, D. NAJOCK, A. NOWOSAD, Concordantia in Corpus Tibullianum, Hildesheim 1995. ** Bibl.: H. HARRAUER, A Bibliography to the Corpus Tibullianum, Hildesheim 1971. * G. RADKE, Auswahlbericht zur augusteischen Dichtung (1952–1959), <sup>1</sup> W. EISENHUT, Die Autorschaft der Elegie 3. 19 im Corpus Tibullianum, Hermes 105, 1977, 209–223 (in favor of Tibullan authorship); according to H. TRÄNKLE 3. 19 is a fake; it is improbable that 3. 20 was written before Tibullus' 2nd book (ibid. 2; 323 ff.; 335).

Gymnasium 66, 1959, 319–347. * Id., Augusteische Dichtung (Auswahl), (1957–1963), Gymnasium 71, 1964, 72–108. * R. J. BALL, Recent Work on Tibullus (1970–1974), Eranos 73, 1975, 62–68. * H. DETTMER, The Corpus Tibullianum (1974–1980), ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1962–1975. L. ALFONSI, Albio Tibullo e gli autori del Corpus Tibullianum, Milano 1946. * R. J. BALL, The Politics of Tibullus: Augustus, Messalla, and Macer, GB 10, 1981, 135–142. * R. J. BALL, Tibullus the Elegist. A Critical Survey, Göttingen 1983. * D. F. BRIGHT, Haec mihi fugebam. Tibullus in his World, Leiden 1978. * F. CAIRNS, Tibullus. A Hellenistic Poet at Rome, Cambridge 1979. * J. M. FISHER, The Life and Work of Tibullus, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1924–1961. * H. GEIGER, Interpretationen zur Gestalt Amors bei Tibull, Zürich 1978. * W. GERRESSEN, Tibulls Elegie 2. 5 und Vergils Aeneis, diss. Köln 1970. * A. GOSLING, Tibullus 2. 5 and Augustan Propaganda, EMC 31, 1987, 333–339. * M. HENNIGES, Utopie und Gesellschaftskritik bei Tibull. Studien zum Beziehungsgeflecht seiner dichterischen Motive (Corpus Tibullianum Buch I und II), Frankfurt 1979. * F. KLINGNER, Tibulls Geburtstagsgedicht an Messalla (l. 7), Eranos 49, 1951, 117–136. * U. KNOCHE, Tibulls früheste Liebeslegie? (Tibull 3. 19), in: Navicula Chiloniensis, FS F. JACOBY, Leiden 1956, 173–190. * H. KREFELD, Liebe, Landleben und Krieg bei Tibull, diss. Marburg 1952. * G. LIEBERG, Strukturalistische Analyse von Tibull 1. 5, Arezzo 1988. * D. LITTLE, Politics in Augustan Poetry, s. Augustan Literature. * G. LUCK, Studien zur Textgeschichte Tibulls, in: J. DUMMER and others, eds., Texte und Textkritik. Eine Aufsatzsammlung, Berlin 1987, 331–349. * R. O. A. M. LYNE, The Latin Love Poets, s. Roman Elegy. * S. MARIOTTI, ed., Atti del convegno internazionale di studi in Albio Tibullo (Roma-Palestrina 1984), Roma 1986. * C. MEILLIER, La composition numérique de Tibulle I et II, Eos 73, 1985, 269–276. * H. MERKLIN, Zu Aufbau und Absicht der Messalinus-Elegie Tibulls, in: W. WIMMEL, ed., Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 301–314. * P. MURGATROYD, Possible and probable etymologising in Tibullus II, LCM 18, 1993, 121–122. * F.-H. MUTSCHLER, Die poetische Kunst Tibulls. Struktur und Bedeutung der Bücher 1 und 2 des Corpus Tibullianum, Frankfurt 1985. * C. NEUMEISTER, Tibull. Einführung in sein Werk, Heidelberg 1986. * C. NEUMEISTER, Tibull in der Reihe der vier Elegiker, in: V. F. ROLAND, ed., Ainigma, FS H. RAHN, Heidelberg 1987, 219–240. * C. NEUMEISTER, Tibulls Rom-Elegie (2. 5), in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. Della Corte 3, 1987, 157–172. * L. PEPE, Tibullo minore, Napoli 1948. * M. D. REEVE, L'elegia 2. 6 di Tibullo, in: S. Mariotti, ed., Atti . . ., 61–67. * B. P. POWELL, The Ordering of Tibullus Book I, CPh 69, 1974, 107–112. * B. RIPOSATI, Introduzione allo studio di Tibullo, Milano 2nd ed. 1967. * U. SCHMITZER, Satiren zur Ehre Messallas. Die literarkritische Bedeutung von Tibulls Elegie 2.1, WS 106, 1993, 111–132. * M. SCHUSTER, Tibull-Studien. Beiträge zur Erklärung und Kritik Tibulls und des Corpus Tibullianum, Wien 1930. * Simposio Tibuliano. Conmemoración del Bimilenario de la muerte de Tibulo, Murcia 1985. * STROH, Liebeselegie 110–125. * H. TRÄNKLE, Zu Tibulls erster Elegie, MH 42, 1985, 174–182. * J. VEREMANS, Le thème élégiaque de la vita iners chez Tibulle et Propertius, in: H. ZEHNACKER, G. HENTZ, eds., Hommages à R. SCHILLING, Paris 1983, 423–436. * R. WHITAKER, Myth and Personal Experience in Roman Love Elegy, s. Roman Elegy. * M. WIFSTRAND SCHIEBE, Das ideale Dasein bei Tibull und die Goldzeitkonzeption Vergils, Uppsala-Stockholm 1981. * W. WIMMEL, Der frühe Tibull, München 1968. * W. WIMMEL, Tibull und Delia. Erster Teil: Tibulls Elegie 1. 1, Wiesbaden 1976. * Id., Tibull und Delia. Zweiter Teil: Tibulls Elegie 1. 2, Wiesbaden 1983.

PROPERTIUS

Life and Dates

Sextus Propertius was born around the middle of the 1st century B.C. at Assisi (4. 1. 125). It is believed that his house has been discovered there, among the remains of a Roman structure whose walls are adorned with frescoes and Greek verses.<sup>1</sup> Except for Horace's Sabine villa this would be the only home of a Roman poet we know of. Propertius' father, who belonged to a distinguished family, died prematurely (4. 1. 127–128). Among the most painful experiences of the poet's youthful years was the Perusine War (cf. 1. 21 and 1. 22).<sup>2</sup> In 41 B.C., he lost a portion of his estate to the land distribution of the triumvirs (4. 1. 130). He abandoned thoughts of a public career.

His first collection of poems, the so-called Monobiblos (Mart. 14. 189) celebrated his love for Cynthia. This pseudonym, concealing (according to Apul. apol. 10. 2) Hostia,<sup>3</sup> brought his mistress close to the sphere of Apollo. The book can hardly have appeared later than 28 B.C., since the dedication of the Temple of Palatine Apollo is mentioned only in the 2nd book. The poet quickly became known, and from his 2nd book on was a member of the circle of Maecenas (2. 1; 3. 9). Of the later books, the 2nd appeared shortly after the death of Gallus, and therefore after 26 B.C. (2. 34. 91–92, cf. 2. 30. 37–40). The 3rd came out soon after 23: Marcellus was no longer alive, and the book draws upon Horace's Odes. The 4th book was published only after 16 B.C.

<sup>1</sup> M. GUARDUCCI, La casa di Propertio a Assisi, in: Bimillenario . . . 137–141.

<sup>2</sup> Propertius' use of autobiographical details is illuminated by S. DÖPP, Propertius' Elegie 1. 22. Eine unvollständige Sphragis?, in: FS F. EGERMANN, ed. by W. SUERBAUM, F. MAIER, G. THOME, München 1985, 105–117.

<sup>3</sup> In the 2nd book, conventional and literary elements in Cynthia are more strongly evident: M. WYKE, Written Woman. Propertius' scripta puella, JRS 77, 1987, 47–61. Of course, the topoi of 'utility' and 'realism' in the 1st book are also literary conventions.

Propertius' friends play an important part in his poetry, for example, Tullus, who is addressed in four poems of book 1 (see also 3. 22). Propertius also mentions Bassus, in all probability the writer of iambs, and the epic poet Ponticus. Two further poets are indicated by pseudonyms: the tragic writer Lynceus, who has fallen in love with Cynthia (2. 34), and a Demophoon—perhaps Tuscus—who celebrates a certain Phyllis (Prop. 2. 22; cf. Ovid Pont. 4. 16. 20). Postumus and Galla must also be noted (3. 12). Galla was probably a relation of Propertius. In 1. 5; 10; 13 and 20 a Gallus is found (probably Aelius Gallus) as a close confidant of Propertius. Later, he disappears from view. It was he who succeeded Cornelius Gallus as prefect of Egypt. Propertius speaks of Virgil with respect. He makes no mention of Horace, though in certain passages he may follow him more closely than has been previously supposed (cf. 4. 1 b with Epode 17).

Propertius was dead at the latest by the turn of the millennium. The allusions made to him in lists of poets by Ovid (ars 3. 333; 536; rem. 764) almost certainly presuppose his death, in conformity with ancient practice in these matters (cf. Ovid trist. 2. 465).

Survey of the Work

1: The 1st book presents Cynthia at its beginning (1 and 2), and Propertius at its end (22). The first and last poems are addressed to the book's dedicatee, Tullus, as are elegies 6 and 14. Addresses to Tullus, therefore, frame the first (1–6) and last (14–22) thirds of the book.

The middle third (7–13) consists of two unified groups: two elegies to Ponticus (7 and 9) surround the double poem 8 a and b. Similarly, the elegies directed to Gallus (10 and 13) frame the pair of poems dealing with Cynthia's absence (11 and 12).<sup>1</sup>

The third section of the book forms in several respects a counterpart to the first. In both cases, elegies addressed to Tullus precede and follow (1 and 14). In both cases, an exhortation to the beloved stands in second position (2 and 15). The lament before the closed door (16) forms a counterpart to the visit (3).

<sup>1</sup> On 8 A and 11 as counterparts: E. BURCK, Mutat via longa puellas: Properz 1, 8 A und 1, 11, Gymnasium 95, 1988, 193–206.

In content, there is an antithesis between the indivisibility of the lovers in elegies 4, 6, and 8, and the absence of Cynthia in 11 and 12, and that of Propertius in 17 and 18. Towards the end, the theme of death forms a new climax (19–21). In the 1st book therefore there is a tendency to bring together pairs of related poems and to use a dedication to friends as a frame. The Monobiblos is a Cynthia-book, but also a 'book of friends', even if, in accordance with the poet's own pugnacious nature, the boundaries among friends, rivals and enemies are fluid.<sup>1</sup>

2: The structure of the 2nd and 3rd books, though in both cases symmetrical in principle, is more complex. The 2nd book consists of a sequence of thematically related pairs of poems: elegies 6 and 7 lead up to a protestation of loyalty; elegies 8 and 9 to thoughts of death. There may also be groups of four, bound together by tension: elegies 14 and 15, love's happiness; elegies 16 and 17, love's sufferings. A framework is provided by the first and last elegies,<sup>2</sup> in which Propertius defends his decision for love poetry and against epic. Recently, the old proposal<sup>3</sup> to divide the 2nd book into two halves has been revived. Thematically and structurally the first 12 poems belong together. Poem 13 has programmatic features and marks a division.<sup>4</sup>

3:<sup>5</sup> Some similarities in the structure of the two central books should be emphasized. The programmatic poems on poetry (2. 1; 2. 34; 3. 1) and the farewell poems to Cynthia (3. 24 and 25) serve as flanking pillars. The two last named elegies again confirm the tendency to treat a theme in two successive poems. It is often unclear whether we are dealing with elegies in two parts or pairs of elegies. But along with this, in Hellenistic style, goes the separation of related themes as well as the juxtaposition of disharmonies. For example, the memorials of Paetus (3. 7)<sup>6</sup> and of Marcellus (3. 18) are separated; and the latter stands next to an elegy about the passionate nature of women (3. 19), just as the praise of Augustus (4. 6) follows the

<sup>1</sup> J.-P. BOUCHER, Properce et ses amis, in: Colloquium Propertianum, Assisi 1977, 53–71.

<sup>2</sup> G. WILLE 1980. The close links between elegies 2. 31 and 32 are emphasized by T. K. HUBBARD, Art and Vision in Propertius 2. 31/32, TAPhA 114, 1984, 281–297.

<sup>3</sup> Sexti Aurelii Propertii Carmina emendavit ad codicum meliorum fidem et annotavit C. LACHMANNUS, Leipzig 1816, repr. 1973, pp. xxi–xxii.

<sup>4</sup> J. K. KING, Propertius 2. 1–12; His Callimachean Second libellus, WJA n.s. 6 b, 1980, 61–84. A different view in G. WILLE 1980, 257, who combines 2. 12 and 2. 13 in a single group.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. also C. MEILLIER, La composition numérique du livre III des Élégiés de Properce, REL 63, 1985, 101–117.

<sup>6</sup> On the Paetus elegy cf. T. WALSH, Propertius' Paetus Elegy (3. 7), LCM 12, 5, 1987, 66–69.

instructions given by the lena (4. 5). The finale of the 3rd book is made up of a group of poems surrounded by farewells to Cynthia (3. 21; 24 and 25). The turning away from love poetry is evinced by the insertion of two symbolic pictures: the poet has lost his writing tablets (3. 23), and he advises the recipient of his 1st book, Tullus, to find a wife (3. 22).

4: The 4th book<sup>1</sup> shows an especially clear structure. Roman (1; 2; 4; 6; 9; 10; 11) and erotic (3; 5; 7; 8) themes are treated alternately. In the 1st and last poem, as in the 3rd and 4th, both themes are linked in different ways. Augustus occupies the central place in the book (4. 6). A dissimilar pair of poems is formed by the elegies about Cynthia (7 and 8). One of the 'double-poems', of the type the poet favored, is 4. 1. In conformity with the Janus-like character of the book, Propertius presents himself as a Roman poet of aetia, but also as an incorrigible elegist of love.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Parallels in the 1st book to Tibullus and to Virgil's 10th Eclogue point to Gallus as a possible common model. In the 2nd book, besides Gallus, Propertius also mentions Catullus, Calvus, and Varro Atacinus, who celebrated his mistress Leucadia. Among Greek predecessors, Propertius cites Mimnermus with reference to his erotic themes and elegiac form, though this has more programmatic than practical significance. From his 2nd book on, Propertius refers to the Greek poets Callimachus and Philetas. The scholarly M. Terentius Varro (Reatinus) must be assumed as a source for the Roman legends in the 4th book. Though not expressly mentioned by Propertius, the influence of Greek epigrams is clearly identifiable. A comparison with the Garland of Meleager of Gadara (beginning of 1st century B.C.) furnishes essential insights into Propertius' methods of work, without necessitating that all Roman elegy derived from Greek epigram.<sup>2</sup> From the 3rd book on, Propertius also takes note of Horace's Odes, for example in his 'more modest' adaptation of Exegi monumentum, 'I have finished a monument' (carm. 3. 30). Propertius has erected his 'memorial' not to himself, but to his beloved (3. 2. 17–26).<sup>1</sup> His appropriation of epic is also critical. He uses its mythical resources to exalt the value of his beloved and his love. Thus in the 2nd book Helen and Troy point to Homer and Virgil. In the 3rd book (3. 3), Propertius comes face to face with Ennius, whose epic he summarizes (3. 3. 3–12).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. now G. D'ANNA, Il quarto libro delle Elegie di Propertio, C&S 25, 1986, No. 99, 68-74. Just like Horace's 4th book of Odes, Propertius' 4th book is separated by a gap from its predecessors: H. HAFFTER, Das Gedichtbuch als dichterische Aussage—Überlegungen zu den Elegien des Propertius, in: D. ABLEITINGER, H. GUGEL, eds., FS K. VRETSKA, Heidelberg 1970, 53-67, esp. 54; K.-W. WEEBER, Das 4. Propertius-Buch. Interpretationen zu seiner Eigenart und seiner Stellung im Gesamtwerk, Diss. Bochum 1977.

<sup>2</sup> E. SCHULZ-VANHEYDEN, Propertius und das griechische Epigramm, diss. Münster 1969; G. GIANGRANDE, La componente epigrammatica nella struttura delle elegie di Propertio, in: Bimillenario . . . 223-264. Allusions to Hellenistic poetry in the 1st book: P. FEDELI, Allusive technique in Roman Poetry, MPhL 7, 1986, 17-30; D. SIDER, The Love Poetry of Philodemus, AJPh 108, 1987, 310-324.

In some elegies subjective feeling is less emphasized, for example in 3. 14 (women's sports) and 3. 19 (feminine sensuality). In these cases the thought is developed along rhetorical lines, and in general rhetoric plays a far greater part in Propertius than in Tibullus. A certain inclination to rhetorical studies is expressly announced by the poet (3. 21. 27). It is significant that in the same breath he mentions Menander (ibid. 28), for it is with Menander's characters and situations, as was already noted in the discussion of Tibullus, that elegy possesses a certain kinship. At the same time, he also takes up Roman comedy (4. 5).<sup>2</sup> The problem of 'role' (persona) in elegy is more important than often assumed. The persona of the elegist is not to be identified with his person. Since, by his own admission, Propertius is a man who thinks in visual terms,<sup>3</sup> it is necessary finally to take account also of inspiration received from art.<sup>4</sup>

Literary Technique

More than any other Roman elegist, Propertius is marked by the Hellenistic ideal of the poeta doctus. In comparison with Tibullus, his preference for mythological examples is striking. It is true that Ovid also resorts to myth, but in him the content and function of mythological elements are easier to decipher. Myth in Propertius is meant in the first place to indicate the importance which he attaches to his beloved and to his love.

In this regard, the Trojan legend is an ever-present point of reference. Playfully, the poet emphasizes the contrast of elegy with epic, <sup>1</sup> The echoes of Horace in 3. 2 are discussed by J. F. MILLER, Propertius 3. 2 and Horace, TAPhA 113, 1983, 289–299.

<sup>2</sup> J. C. YARDLEY, Propertius 4. 5, Ovid Amores 1. 6, and Roman Comedy, PCPhS 213, n.s. 33, 1987, 179–186.

<sup>3</sup> 3. 21. 29–30; 2. 15. 11–20; cf. also 3. 14.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. 1. 3. 1–8; cf. also 2. 26a.

but he also lets it be known that in his eyes, private themes have equal and even higher value. In his triumph over Cynthia's reserve (2. 14) his delight is greater than that of the son of Atreus in his victory over Troy.<sup>1</sup> For him Cynthia, after Helen, is the 'second beauty' on earth (2. 3. 32), and it would have been better for Troy to have been destroyed for Cynthia's sake (2. 3. 34). He substitutes the lover's couch for the soldier's camp as the scene of his Iliads (cf. 2. 1. 14; 45; 3. 8. 32). At first it is not so much his poetry as his love-making that enters into rivalry with Homer. But his poetics must be discussed later.

In the case of mythical elements which have parallels in the plastic arts—such as the sleeping Ariadne of l. 3<sup>2</sup>—the poet is less concerned with antiquarian precision than with the magic exercised on the viewer by the sight of perfect beauty. The comparison with Ariadne blends with the following picture of a maenad into a Dionysiac frame. Propertius comes to his beloved 'drunk with much Bacchus'. But unfortunately he is not a Dionysus, and Cynthia welcomes him, not like a loving Ariadne, but as a scolding mistress. The image of Argus (20) heralds disenchantment. The newly arrived lover, who is fearful of Cynthia's reproofs, plays the role of a guard condemned to mere looking, instead of that of the divine spouse. At the same time, Cynthia is elevated to the status of Io-Isis. In verse 42, Propertius mentions Orpheus' lyre, making Cynthia appear as a puella docta. Along with sculpture and music, he introduces the weaver's art. The aesthetic realm is also present in the play with the sleeping girl (21–26). In general, myth here is intended to enhance the status of the beloved, her beauty, and her musical talents, but also to emphasize the interplay between high expectation and disappointment. The first function may be compared with that of a gold background, while the second is dramatic. The mythical parallels arouse expectations in the reader: the fulfillment or non-fulfillment of these expectations offer a measure by which the reader may judge the poem, and help him find an observer's distant vantage-point.

Propertius cleverly transforms the literary clichés found in tradition.

<sup>1</sup> On the significance of mythology in 2. 14 cf. E. BURCK, Mythologisches bei Properz (2. 14), in: Studien zur Mythologie und Vasenmalerei. FS K. SCHAUENBURG, ed. by E. BÖHR, W. MARTINI, Mainz 1986, 213–221.

<sup>2</sup> F. KLINGNER, Catullus Peleus-Epos, SBAW 1956, 6, 32–43; repr. in: KLINGNER, Studien 156–224; F. FELTEN, Neuerlich zur Portlandvase, MDAL(R) 94, 1987, 205–222.

In his 1st book, he heightens the notion of erotic serfdom, which he met in Gallus, the founder of Roman love elegy. The criticism of luxury normal in elegy receives in 1. 2 an original twist by being linked with the question of the beloved's identity. Is she a woman who obscures her natural beauty with cosmetics and all kinds of adornment, or does she dislike such frippery and instead practise the arts bestowed on her by Phoebus, the Muse, Venus, and Minerva? Thus Propertius varies an old topos to some extent as if in a mirror, which he holds up to his mistress. It is left to her—and the reader—which of the two identities is to be taken as real. When in 1. 14 the true riches of love are contrasted with worldly wealth, the originality lies in the boldness with which each single treasure (and the search for it) is brought into relation with Propertius' love.

In the structure of the individual elegies<sup>1</sup> different principles sometimes cross. In 1. 3 a development turning around a central point<sup>2</sup> is matched by a structure proceeding in a straight line. It is evident that such tensions contribute both to the vividness and, at the same time, spatial depth of the presentation. To this is added a pronounced sense of drama. More than Tibullus, Propertius possesses the gift of narrative. But even in non-narrative sections he builds up expectations in order suddenly to disappoint them and to advance the development of the thought in a surprising fashion. The much-deplored jumps and obscurities in his poetry are connected with this peculiarity in his literary technique.

To a certain extent Propertius is inclined to another equally polyphonic method of presentation. Just as in 1. 2 the verdict on Cynthia is left hanging in the air, so in the story of Tarpeia (4. 4) we find an unresolved tension, this time spanning political condemnation of the traitress and deep human sympathy for the loving woman.

Language and Style

Propertius' language is as full of contrasts as are his thought and poetic structures.<sup>3</sup> His vocabulary diverges perceptibly from that of

<sup>1</sup> E. LEFÈVRE, La struttura dell'elegia properziana, in: Bimillenario . . . 143–154.

<sup>2</sup> On symmetries in all the books: P. TORDEUR, Structures symétriques chez Propertius, Latomus 47, 1988, 105–107.

<sup>3</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1960; H. TRÄNKLE, Die Sprache des Propertius und die stilistischen Tendenzen der augusteischen Dichtung, in: Bimillenario . . . 155–173; G. PASCUCCI, Tibullus. Even and precisely in particularly serious poems, Propertius surprises his readers by words drawn from everyday language. Dead Cynthia's head rests on a broken roof-tile (tegula curta) with a sharp edge (4. 7. 26). Naturalistic descriptions in serious contexts are characteristic of Propertius, of a kind not necessarily expected in an Augustan poet. An example is Cynthia's request to the poet to clear from her grave the ivy which is entwining her soft bones with the tendrils of its roots (4. 7. 79–80; cf. 93–94).

Propertius' style makes a more concentrated but less fluent impression than that of Tibullus. Whereas Tibullus' language strives for elegantia, Propertius often seeks the greatest possible 'concreteness', precise expressions, efforts which at times lead him into the sphere of colloquialism. In this he is like Horace, who is often—not wholly correctly—described as his antipodes in love poetry. Another link between the two is found in a tendency towards reflection.

Propertius' language takes its liveliness and drama from the polar tension between opposites which are often directly juxtaposed. Undoubtedly he is one of the most difficult Latin poets, but the longer the reader spends in his company, the more he is brought under his sway. The obscurity of certain passages is not always the mere consequence of our ignorance. It often stems from Propertius' way of writing. An enjoyable example illustrating the other side of this peculiarity is the brief epigrammatic expression: e.g. Cynthia, forma potens; Cynthia, verba levis, 'Cynthia, beauty of power; Cynthia, faithless in words' (2. 5. 28). Unlike Ovid, who arranges such parallel verses with parallel syntax, Propertius lends a rougher charm to the construction with a minor variation:<sup>1</sup> forma is nominative, verba accusative.

Within an elegy Propertius often avoids clarifying the connection of thought by conjunctions, but shows a liking for putting conjunctions at the start of his poems. This is a feature of refined literary technique which draws the reader immediately into the action.<sup>2</sup>

---

Il callimachismo stilistico di Propertio, ibid., 199–222; V. V. SANTANGELO, L'esametro di Propertio. Rapporti con Callimaco, Napoli 1986.

<sup>1</sup> Such parallelisms more of sound than syntax are found in Old Latin, as for example in Sempronius Asellio: ad rem publicam defendundam . . . ad rem perperam faciundam (HRR 1, 1914, 179–180).

<sup>2</sup> J.-P. BOUCHER 1980.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature<sup>1</sup>

Along with Horace, Propertius is the Augustan poet who has thought most about his role as a poet. In his 1st book, poetry is set at the service of love as a way of life. Thus Propertius describes Cynthia's abandonment of a journey to Illyria as a result of his flattering poems (1. 8. 40). Thanks to the Muse, therefore, Cynthia is his. The double elegy 8, showing the usefulness of elegiac poetry by a practical example, is surrounded by two poems addressed to the epic poet Ponticus. Ponticus is writing a Thebaid, whereas Propertius' life and poetry are wholly determined by his love (1. 7). Soon after, the epic poet has himself fallen in love (1. 9). His earlier genre is now of no avail. Propertius points out to him emphatically the superior power of elegy in matters of love (1. 9. 11): 'In love, Mimnermus' verse has more power than that of Homer.' While in 1. 7 the effectiveness of elegy is seen in its power to sway the cruel mistress, in 1. 9 Propertius principally thinks of the fact that his poems are pleasing, and that his girl takes pleasure in listening to them.<sup>2</sup> The conclusion of the same elegy is no longer today taken as a summons to confessional poetry, but rather to liberating utterance.

In the 2nd book Propertius develops further his interpretation of his poetic vocation. Now he compares himself with Orpheus and Linus, the great singers of antiquity (2. 13. 5-8). His fame rests on his ability to enchant someone like Cynthia. A second important feature appears in his rivalry with Homer.<sup>3</sup> Cynthia is revealed as material on which he wishes to confer fame. Just as, thanks to Catullus' verses, Lesbia became more famous than Helen, so did the mistresses of the other elegists, including Propertius' Cynthia, and this is the final note of the 2nd book (2. 34. 87-94). This poem also contains the well-known homage to Virgil, declaring that the Aeneid surpasses the Iliad, along with the passage just mentioned, which raises a similar claim for the elegists (2. 34. 61-65). Thus, the themes of Troy and of Helen are found in passages which are particularly important in content and form.

<sup>1</sup> Basic STROH, Liebeselegie; G. D'ANNA, L'evoluzione della poetica properziana in: Bimillenario . . . 53-74; R. N. MITCHELL 1985.

<sup>2</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie 34.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. 2. 3; 8; 9; D. T. BENEDIKTSON, Propertius' 'Elegiacization' of Homer, Maia 37, 1985, 17-26.

Cynthia as object is the source of inspiration (2. 1). On the other hand, poetry grants her immortality (2. 34). The poet now achieves certain sovereignty over his theme (2. 34. 57–58). At the beginning of the 3rd book, the Homeric and Orphean aspects are presented (3. 1 and 3. 2). Along with this comes the statement of Callimachean principles, already adumbrated in the introductory elegy of the 2nd book in the sense of a courteous refusal to Maecenas' request for an Augustan epic. In the triumphant song at 2. 14, the previous doctrine of total subjection to the will of the girl is withdrawn (11–20). In the 2nd book, poems as presents are valuable to the beloved, and this makes possible the threat of allowing Cynthia to fall victim to oblivion.

The poet's new independence is also shown in his readiness to consider themes of war for his later years (2. 10). That ambition would actually be realized in the 4th book, although in a peculiar mixture of patriotic and erotic poems. The double character of the 4th book is reflected in its introductory elegy. In its first half Propertius elevates himself to the status of Roman Callimachus, while in the second the astrologer Horus reminds him that he is and remains a love elegist. This introductory poem is closely linked with the two elegies standing at the end of the 3rd book. In this assessment of Propertius' vision of his poetry, his withdrawal of his eulogy of Cynthia's beauty must be emphasized (3. 24. 1–8). The poet declares expressly that he is embarrassed to have glorified Cynthia in his verses (3. 24. 4). This means that Cynthia can no longer lay sole claim to being his inspiration, although even in the 4th book the poet is still sought out by Cynthia's shadow. In 3. 24 he bids farewell to poetry as courtship. This inevitably implies that what remains is to write in Callimachean fashion about themes independent of any 'erotic utility'. But in the 4th book, against the Callimachean background, a change is detectible. Previously Callimachus had supplied grounds—for refusing the idea of treating Roman and patriotic themes. Now, in the 4th book, Roman material and principles of Hellenistic art are harmoniously joined in the service of aetiological poetry. Conversely, the second half of the introductory elegy of book 4 makes use of the prologue to Callimachus' Aetia to summon Propertius back to love poetry.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Propertius cites (4. 1. 135) the 13th Iambus of Callimachus (fig. 203, 30–33 PFEIFFER).

The rivalry between two notions of poetry leads to their encounter only in the 2nd and 4th books. In the 1st book, the topoi of utility prevail, while in the 3rd these and Callimachean themes are independent of each other. The different thematic groups of his poetry are not harmoniously interwoven in Propertius as in Tibullus. They appear projected in dramatic sequence. One parallel case, however, may be remembered: in his 2nd book Tibullus takes back the glorification of country life advanced in the first.<sup>1</sup> In conformity with his material and the varying attitudes of the poet to it, different types of poetic principle surface.<sup>2</sup> In the 1st elegy of book 4, which in its two contrasting halves develops two themes and two poetic approaches, form itself acts as a declaration of poetic intent.

Ideas II

The lifestyle of the elegist is diametrically opposed to that of the ancient philosopher. The philosopher seeks to withdraw from his feelings and to subject them to ratio. Conversely, the elegist plunges into his passion and subordinates to it all other expressions of his life. This attitude is developed in Propertius' 1st book with particular rigor. In his Monobiblos, Propertius shows himself a passionate adherent of a commitment to love in the manner of Cornelius Gallus. He lends depth and sharpness to the theme of servile subjection to the will of the mistress (servitium amoris), the unconditional fulfillment of her whims (obsequium). The expressed withdrawal from philosophy follows in the 2nd book (2. 34. 25–54). Lynceus has fallen in love in his old age. What is the profit to him now of all the wisdom that he has acquired from the Socratic writings and all his knowledge of the laws of nature? Roman girls do not ask questions about cosmology, about lunar eclipses, the immortality of the soul and whether it is really Jupiter who hurls lightning bolts. Here it is the mistress' taste which gives supreme guidance to her lover. This means that not only epic and tragedy are of no avail, but also philosophy and natural science. The cutting criticism made of Socratic wisdom has, in the case of Lynceus, the further special point that even his old age

<sup>1</sup> M. WIFSTRAND SCHIEBE, Das ideale Dasein bei Tibull und die Goldzeitkonzeption bei Vergil, Uppsala 1981, 120.

<sup>2</sup> A good comparison with Ovid and Persius: J. F. MILLER, Disclaiming Divine Inspiration, WS n.s. 20, 1986, 151–164.

does not protect him from folly. As a philosopher and tragic poet, therefore, Lynceus is the best evidence for the irresistible power of love in general and of Cynthia in particular (cf. 2. 34. 1–4), for the superiority of elegy to other literary genres and of the lover's view of the world over all other views. Lynceus has been rejected by Cynthia (2. 34. 11), while Propertius, thanks to his talent, is the darling of all the girls (2. 34. 57–58). Yet the poet does not totally reject philosophy and natural science. A farewell elegy to Cynthia is at the same time a homage to reason (Mens Bona 3. 24. 19) and unmasks love, in philosophical retrospect, as an illness and suffering. In another farewell elegy, where Propertius declares his intention of traveling to Athens to liberate himself from his love, he mentions as his first possible employment the study of Platonic or Epicurean philosophy (3. 21. 25–26).<sup>1</sup>

As for the natural sciences, the poet hopes to be able to dedicate himself to them in later years (3. 5. 23–46). The list of such problems bears a certain resemblance to the account at the end of the 2nd book. Along with the explanation of natural phenomena, themes mentioned are god as ruler of the physical universe, eternal punishments, death, and immortality. These are vital questions, considered by Propertius as more important than military successes. In the present poem, therefore, the claim of politics on the poet is clearly rejected.

For ancient man physics and theology were more closely linked than to our modern mind. It may then be more than coincidence that in the 4th book, three elegies are dedicated to individual gods,<sup>2</sup> and that three further elegies are preoccupied with death.<sup>3</sup> Questions of astronomy and astrology are touched on by Horos in 4. 1, and Vertumnus (4. 2) is a god of nature. It may then perhaps be assumed that Propertius' ambition to pursue philosophical and scientific concerns with greater depth in his later years was not entirely casual.

Among divinities Propertius mentions Venus, Amor, Jupiter, Juno, the Muses, Apollo, and Bacchus with special frequency. This conforms to the overwhelming preference for erotic and poetic themes shown by the poet. The frequent mention of Jupiter is explained by the fact that Propertius likes to compare, in challenging language, his own happiness with that of the supreme god.

<sup>1</sup> The Epicurean and Lucretian elements in 1. 14 are examined by F.-H. Mutschler, Ökonomie und Philosophie. Überlegungen zum 14. Gedicht der properzischen Monobiblos, RhM 128, 1985, 161–180.

<sup>2</sup> Vertumnus 4. 2; Hercules 4. 9; Jupiter Feretrius 4. 10; cf. C. Shea, The Vertumnus Elegy and Propertius Book IV, ICS 13, 1, 1988, 63–73.

<sup>3</sup> The lena's grave (4. 5), the apparition of the dead Cynthia (4. 7) and the speech of the dead matron Cornelia in the 'Queen of Elegies' (4. 11).

Within Propertius' system of values, loyalty (fides)<sup>1</sup> plays a prominent part. The Roman and political features of this virtue are emphasized in the elegy addressed to Maecenas (3. 9. 33–34) and particularly in the 4th book. But its private aspects equally rest on the notion of mutual obligation: 'One loyalty and one day will sweep away the two of us' (2. 20. 18). In practice more loyalty is demanded from the lover serving his mistress than from the beloved. But after Cynthia's death this basic quality is attributed to her also (4. 7. 53). In spite, therefore, of the passionate farewell to Cynthia at the end of book 3, there remains, even in the apparently un-Roman realm of eros, a Roman sense of human obligations, extending even beyond death.

A touchstone for the relationship between the private and political spheres is the connection with Rome. In the Monobiblos the name of Rome occurs only twice. Its frequent mention in books 2 and 3 is surprising. This means that the 4th book, in spite of its Roman and aetiological themes, does not hold an exceptional position. Propertius sets a higher value on the Italian countryside than on the city (3. 22). At the same time Rome supplies the framework equally for Propertius' fame and Cynthia's bad repute (2. 5). Rome will also in the future provide a judicious audience equipped to appreciate poems. Because of its greatness Rome at times, even formally, serves as a preparatory element within a climactic series (4. 11). So far as morals are concerned, Propertius' verdict on Rome is somewhat negative. In particular he criticizes luxury and the concern with profit. Attacks on contemporary society are not found in 4. 1, though they certainly occur in 3. 13. In the poet's attitude toward the civil wars his criticism in the 1st book, still rancorous because of his personal experience (1. 21–22), later gradually fades. The background to the poems concerned with Augustus shows its elegiac nature in the poet's refusal to take part in military campaigns, and to do more than play the role of spectator at victory celebrations. Only occasionally does Propertius claim to be an inspired bard of Rome (vates). In several poems, expressions friendly to Augustus are mingled with other statements, in a way that defies harmonization. The verdict is left hanging in the air. The enumeration of many Roman buildings linked with the name of Augustus in 4. 1, as well as the selection of themes in 3. 18, 4. 6,<sup>1</sup> 4. 10, and 4. 11, shows, however, that the poet sought to do justice to the princeps.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. J.-P. BOUCHER 1980, 85–104.

Yet he did this without confounding the pax Augusta with the elegiac ideal of peace and without doing violence to the limits of his genre. He never denied the harsh experiences of his youth.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

The most important manuscript is the codex Neapolitanus, now Guelferbytanus Gudianus 224 (N; ca. A.D. 1200), which was acquired from the legacy of the Danish state councillor Marquard Gude in 1710 by Leibniz for the library at Wolfenbüttel. The remaining manuscripts are more recent, and are divided into two classes. All codices, including the Neapolitanus, are more or less marred by errors of transmission.

With its many transpositions of lines, the edition by Joseph Scaliger (Paris 1577) exercised a powerful though not always salutary influence. C. Lachmann (Lipsiae 1816) undertook a systematic review of the manuscripts and recognized the importance of the Neapolitanus, though unfortunately he preferred to it the more recent Groninganus. Many conjectures made in that edition were withdrawn by Lachmann himself in his second edition of 1829.

Influence

Propertius became famous as soon as his 1st book was published, and from his 2nd book on he was a member of the circle of Maecenas. Among his younger contemporaries, Ovid owes him essential inspirations.<sup>3</sup> Traces of his work are encountered in the 1st century A.D. and even as late as Juvenal; moreover Pompeiian wall inscriptions and carmina epigraphica in general attest to his influence. In his Apophoreta Martial also mentions Propertius' collection of poems, adding the following epigram: Cynthia—facundi carmen iuvenale Properti—/ accepit famam, non minus ipsa dedit 'Cynthia, the youthful song of eloquent Propertius,/ received fame, and herself bestowed it no less' (14. 189). Pasennus Paulus, a contemporary of the Younger Pliny, counted the poet among his ancestors, and imitated his elegies so skilfully that according to Pliny (epist. 6. 15. 1 and 9. 22. 1) they could be taken for Propertian poems. From late antiquity Claudian (about 400 A.D.) may be mentioned as a reader.

<sup>1</sup> On the relation between Propertius and Augustus in 4. 6 cf. R. J. BAKER, Caesaris in nomen (Propertius IV. VI), RhM 126, 1983, 153–174. General remarks in W. NETHERCUT, Propertius and Augustus, diss. Columbia University New York 1963; F. CAIRNS, Propertius on Augustus' Marriage Law (II. 7), GB 8, 1979, 185–204; M. VON ALBRECHT 1982.

<sup>2</sup> J. L. BUTRICA 1984; cf. also idem, Pontanus, Puccius, Pocchus, Petreius, and Propertius, Res Publica Litterarum 3, 1980, 5–9.

<sup>3</sup> P. GRIMAL, Ovide et Properce, Notes au livre III de l'Ars amatoria, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, vol. 3, 189–200.

In the Middle Ages<sup>1</sup> traces of the poet are found particularly in France. Propertius' influence was felt more strongly from the time of Petrarch. In the second half of the 15th century his influence increased, especially among the Italian humanists.<sup>2</sup> In France he was studied by Mathurin Régnier (d. 1613) and by André-M. Chénier (d. 1794). The appearance of the dead beloved in the Sogno of Giacomo Leopardi (d. 1837) is reminiscent of 4. 7. Goethe's<sup>3</sup> admiration for the ancient poet was so great that Schiller called him the 'German Propertius'.<sup>4</sup> Goethe took part in the translation of Propertius made by C. L. von Knebel (d. 1834). A very free translation is contained in Ezra Pound's (d. 1972) Homage to Sextus Propertius, completed in 1917.<sup>5</sup> Pound stimulated the interest taken by W. B. Yeats (d. 1939) in Propertius, and the description of Cynthia's beauty influenced Yeats' poetry.<sup>6</sup>

Propertius centers his love poetry much more exclusively than Tibullus on a single object. Conversely, he enriches the genre by Roman aetiological elegies of Callimachean stamp. Propertius is also different from Tibullus in his fondness for myth. Formally the individual elegies in spite of many a surprising jump create a more thematically

<sup>1</sup> See further G. C. GIARDINA, Echi tardo-antichi e medievali di Properzio, MCR 18, 1983, 241.

<sup>2</sup> D. COPPINI, Properzio nella poesia d'amore degli Umanisti, in: Colloquium Propertianum, 1981, 169–201; G. LIEBERG, De necessitudinibus quae Sannazario cum poetis veteribus, imprimis Propertio, intercedunt, VL 1987, 108, 18–24.

<sup>3</sup> Römische Elegien, Der Besuch (cf. Prop. 1. 3) and Euphrosyne (cf. Prop. 4. 7); H. J. MEISSLER, Goethe und Properz, Bochum 1987.

<sup>4</sup> Schiller, Die Horen, vol. 4, 12, Tübingen 1795, 43–44; Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung, Nationalausgabe, ed. J. PETERSEN, vol. 20, Philosophische Schriften, ed. B. VON WIESE, Weimar 1962, 465; cf. vol. 21, note to vol. 20, 305.

<sup>5</sup> M. BACIGALUPO, ed., E. Pound, Omaggio a Sesto Properzio, Genova 1984; J. P. SULLIVAN, Ezra Pound and Sextus Propertius. A Study in Creative Translation, London 1964.

<sup>6</sup> B. ARKINS, Yeats and Propertius, LCM 10, 1985, 72–73.

uniform effect than we find in Tibullus. Conversely, the structure of the books is perhaps less apparent.

To emphasize the proximity of Propertius' elegy to the epigram and partly also to Catullus, is to give an unsatisfactory description of the special nature of his poetry. His difference from Tibullus rests on a difference of temperament. In Tibullus we have stressed the two-fold aspect of surrender and distance, as well as that poet's ability to empathize with other points of view. Propertius' strength, by contrast, seems to rest in the marked steadfastness and relative coherence of his character. Such persistence in preserving his own view of things may lead to dramatic conflicts with the people around him. Both as poet and as lover Propertius is by nature domineering and possessive. The standpoint of his partner is something which he has quite often to be informed of later, and emphatically. In Propertius there is a persistence which allows him to proceed relentlessly along his own path. He is also seen in frequent confrontation with the world about him and in recurrent struggles for victory and dominance. It is characteristic that even friends appear as rivals, whether in literature or love.

Yet Propertius is also capable of seeing himself in an ironic light, for example when he introduces himself in 1. 3 as drunk, or in 4. 8 allows himself to be caught out by Cynthia in a peccadillo. This is to say nothing of the sublime self-irony of 4. 1. This humor counterbalances the strong note of subjectivity distinguishing Propertius from Tibullus and Ovid.

The realism and even naturalism of some of his images, a difficult language which does not reject even common words, a pleasure in unsolved tensions both of content and form—all these features make Propertius the least 'classical' of the classics of Roman love elegy. His extraordinary combination of powerful emotion with literary reflectiveness and mythological learning stamp him as an Alexandrian among Romans, and as a Roman among Alexandrians. His liking for the ugly and even macabre as the expression of a dialectical unity of love and suffering, a self-tormenting that at times even verges on cruelty, allied with flights of 'black' humor, make him a predecessor of the moderns.

Editions: Venetiis 1472. * C. LACHMANN, Lipsiae 1816. * M. ROTHSTEIN (TC), 2 vols., Berlin 2nd ed. 1920–1924; repr. 1966 (with an epilogue by R. STARK). * H. E. BUTLER, E. A. BARBER (TC), Oxford 1933. * E. A. BARBER, Oxford

2nd ed. 1960. * W. WILLIGE (TTr), München 2nd ed. 1960. * G. LUCK (TTr, together with Tibullus), Zürich 1964. * W. A. CAMPS (TC), 4 vols., Cambridge 1961–1967. * L. RICHARDSON jr. (TC), University of Oklahoma Press 1977. * R. HANSLIK, Leipzig 1979. * P. FEDELI, Stutgardiae 1984, repr. 1994. * G. P. GOOLD (TTr), Cambridge, Mass. 1990. * G. LEE (TN), Oxford 1994. * Book 1: P. J. ENK (TC), 2 vols., Leiden 1946. * R. I. V. HODGE, R. A. BUTTIMORE (TTrC), Cambridge 1977. * P. FEDELI (TC), Firenze 1980. * R. J. BAKER (TTrC), Armidale 1990. * Book 2: P. J. ENK (TC), 2 vols., Leiden 1962. * G. (= I.) C. GIARDINA (TC), Torino 1977. * Book 3: P. FEDELI (TC), Bari 1985. * Book 4: P. FEDELI (TC), Bari 1965. ** Concordance: B. SCHMEISSER, A Concordance to the Elegies of Propertius, Hildesheim 1972. ** Bibl.: H. HARRAUER, A Bibliography to Propertius, Hildesheim 1973. * W. R. NETHERCUT, Recent Scholarship on Propertius, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1813–1857. * P. FEDELI, P. PINOTTI, Bibliografia properziana (1946–1983), Assisi 1985. * V. VIPARELLI, Rassegna di studi properziani (1982–1987), BStudLat 17, 1987, 19–76.

M. VON ALBRECHT, Properz als augusteischer Dichter, WS 95, n.s. 16, 1982, 220–236; repr. in: G. BINDER, ed., Saeculum Augustum 2, Darmstadt 1988, 360–377. * L. ALFONSI, La divinità nel I libro delle elegie di Propertio, in: R. ALTHEIM-STIEHL, M. ROSENBACH, eds., Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte, FS G. RADKE, Münster 1986, 5–14. * A. W. ALLEN, Sunt qui Propertium malint, in: J. P. SULLIVAN, ed., Critical Essays on Roman Literature. Elegy and Lyric, London 1962, 107–148. * C. BECKER, Die späten Elegien des Properz, Hermes 99, 1971, 449–480. * M. BETTINI, Properzio dopo duemila anni (considerazioni probabilmente eretiche), MD 18, 1987, 149–163. * Bimillenario della morte di Propertio. Atti del convegno internazionale di studi properziani (Roma-Assisi 1985), Assisi 1986. * J.-P. BOUCHER, Études sur Properce. Problèmes d'inspiration et d'art, Paris 2nd ed. 1980. * E. BURCK, Liebesbindung und Liebesbefreiung. Die Lebenswahl des Properz in den Elegien 1. 6 und 3. 21, in: APETHΣ MNHMH, Gedenkschrift K. VOURVERIS, Athen 1983, 191–211; also in: E. BURCK, Vom Menschenbild in der römischen Literatur, vol. 2, ed. by E. LEFÈVRE, Heidelberg 1981, 349–372. * J. L. BUTRICA, The Manuscript Tradition of Propertius, Toronto 1984. * F. CAIRNS, Propertius 1, 4 and 1, 5 and the 'Gallus' of the Monobiblos, in: PLS 4, 1983, Liverpool 1984, 61–103. * Colloquium Propertianum, Assisi, 26–28 marzo 1976, Atti, a cura di M. BIGARONI, F. SANTUCCI, Assisi 1977. * Colloquium Propertianum (secundum), Assisi, 9–11 novembre 1979, Atti, a cura di F. SANTUCCI, S. VIVONA, Assisi 1981. * Colloquium Propertianum (tertium), Assisi, 29–31 maggio 1981, Atti, a cura di S. VIVONA, Assisi 1983. * V. ECKERT, Untersuchungen zur Einheit von Properz I, Heidelberg 1985. * P. FEDELI, 'Propertii monobiblos': struttura e motivi, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1858–1922. * D. FLACH, Das literarische Verhältnis von Horaz und Properz, Gießen 1967. * R. GAZICH, Exemplum ed esemplarità in Properzio, Milano 1995. * B. K. GOLD, Propertius 3, 8: A Self-Conscious Narration, QUCC, n.s. 17, 1984, 155–164. * E. GREENE, Elegiac Woman. Fantasy, materia, and male desire in Propertius 1. 3 and 1. 11, AJPh 116, 1995, 303–318. * P. GRIMAL, Properce et l'au-delà, in: H. ZEHNACKER, G. HENTZ, eds., Hommages à R. SCHILLING, Paris 1983, 127–135. * S. J. HEYWORTH, Notes on Propertius Books I and II, CQ 78, n.s. 34, 1984, 394–405. * S. J. HEYWORTH, Notes on Propertius Books III and IV, CQ 80, n.s. 36, 1986, 199–211. * M. HUBBARD, Propertius, New York 1975. * G. O. HUTCHINSON, Propertius and the Unity of the Book, JRS 74, 1984, 99–106. * H. JUHNKE, Das dichterische Selbstverständnis des Horaz und Properz, diss. Kiel 1963. * M. KOMP, Absage an Cynthia. Das Liebesthema beim späten Properz, Frankfurt 1987. * A. LA PENNA, L'integrazione difficile. Un profilo di Properzio, Torino 1977. * E. LEFÈVRE, Propertius ludibundus. Elemente des Humors in seinen Elegien, Heidelberg 1966. * G. MAURACH, Properzische Reihungen, WJA n.s. 10, 1984, 91–119. * R. N. MITCHELL, Propertius on Poetry and Poets: Tradition and the Individual Erotic Talent, Ramus 14, 1985, 46–58. * K. NEUMEISTER, Die Überwindung der elegischen Liebe bei Properz (Buch I–III), Frankfurt 1983. * T. D. PAPANGHELIS, Propertius: A Hellenistic Poet on Love and Death, Cambridge 1987. * G. PETERSMANN, Themenführung und Motiventfaltung in der Monobiblos des Properz, Graz 1980. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Propertiana, Cambridge 1956, repr. 1967. * H.-P. STAHL, Propertius: 'Love' and 'War'. Individual and State under Augustus, Berkeley 1985. * J. P. SULLIVAN, Propertius: A Critical Introduction, London 1976. * H. TRÄNKLE, Die Sprachkunst des Properz und die Tradition der lateinischen Dichtersprache, Wiesbaden 1960. * J. VEREMANS, Le thème élégiaque de la vita iners chez Tibulle et Properce, in: H. ZEHNACKER, G. HENTZ, eds., Hommages à R. SCHILLING, Paris 1983, 423–436. * J. WARDEN, Fallax opus: Poet and Reader in the Elegies of Propertius, Toronto 1980. * U. WENZEL, Properz. Hauptmotive seiner Dichtung. Lebenswahl, Tod, Ruhm und Unsterblichkeit, Kaiser und Rom, diss. Bamberg 1969. * G. WILLE, Zum Aufbau des zweiten Buches des Properz, WJA n.s. 6 (= FS H. ERBSE), 1980, 249–267. * M. WYKE, The Elegiac Woman at Rome, PCPhS 33, 1987, 153–178.

OVID

Life and Dates

P. Ovidius Naso is the first Roman poet of whom an autobiography in verse is preserved (trist. 4. 10). He came from Sulmo, the modern Sulmona, in the territory of the Paeligni, and was the son of provincial (equestrian) nobility. Born in the year of Cicero's death (43 B.C.), and a generation younger than Virgil, he was, at the time of the Battle of Actium, a mere twelve years old. His experience of the pax Augusta therefore was not that of a gift bringing an end to decades of trouble, but of something taken for granted. Along with his brother, his senior by one year, he received lessons at Rome from the admired masters of eloquence of the day, Arellius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and even took up some of the latter's epigrams into his own poetry (Sen. contr. 2. 2. [10] 8). Excerpts from a speech before an imaginary jury (controversia) composed by him as a student (ibid. 9–11) throw light on the origins of his later predilection for epigram and antithesis. He was disinclined to any sort of argumentation, and valued only those controversiae in which psychology and character were on display. Another type of exercise was speeches of advice tendered to an historical or mythical character faced with a critical decision; such suasoriae trained his gift of sympathy and powers of language. The speeches composed by the youthful Ovid were, in Seneca's eyes, poems in prose. Later, the poet would, conversely, confer on literary devices of rhetorical origin the status of poetry.

His brother had felt drawn to a career as orator and lawyer, but, after his early death, Ovid disappointed his ambitious father's hopes. He had already held certain offices, such as that of triumvir (perhaps to do with the supervision of the mint) and decemvir stlitibus iudicandis (cf. fast. 4. 384). But now he abandoned thoughts of a senatorial career, though, like Shakespeare, Goethe and Heine, he may be considered a poet well versed in legal affairs. He did not in fact entirely abandon his concern with Roman law, and was later a member of the court of the centumviri and an individual judge in civil cases (trist. 2. 93–96). Soon however he dedicated himself exclusively to the writing of poetry.

Even when Ovid was young, his father had warned him against such penurious prospects, and the boy made good resolutions. But to no avail! What was intended as useful prose turned of its own accord into verse (trist. 4. 10. 25–26). Yet this was the miracle proving a vocation, not a matter of uncontrolled verbosity. At his first public recital Ovid had shaved his beard only one or two times. The attention of M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus was drawn to this emerging talent. The circle of which he was patron, holding somewhat aloof from Augustus, included also Tibullus and Sulpicia. Tibullus' early death prevented any closer friendship on Ovid's part. All the deeper was the poetic debt, which is by no means confined to a memorial in verse (am. 3. 9). The great Virgil was known to Ovid only by sight. He heard, however, Horace's recitals of the Odes and enjoyed a lively exchange of ideas with Propertius: evidently his manifold relationships both with authors and others were not confined to Messalla's circle. Apart from the older generation, among whom Aemilius Macer, the author of an Ornithogonia, deserves mention, a large group of younger poets made Ovid the center of attention. To his wide circle of friends the poet would eventually establish a memorial in the letters sent from his banishment.

In quick succession there appeared five books of love elegies (Amores), later reduced by the poet to three. Only this second edition survives. His tragedy Medea, highly esteemed by Quintilian (inst. 10. 1. 98) is lost.

Already in Propertius and even more in Ovid, Roman love elegy had begun to move beyond its original scope—in several directions. The presentation of the lover's sufferings from the man's point of view demanded a complementary depiction from the woman's perspective. Ovid described himself as the founder of a new category of literature, the Letters of the Heroïdes. Here mythical women use the form of the letter to lay bare their feelings to their absent lovers. The chronological relationship between the comparable letter of Arethusa in Propertius (4. 3) and Ovid's Heroïdes is obscure. The collection of Heroïdes is supplemented by the Letter of Sappho (15), whose genuineness is disputed. It is followed by three sets of paired letters added by Ovid in later years (about A.D. 4).

A further development of love elegy is observed in the Art of Love (Ars amatoria), composed around the turn of the millennium. From the late objective form of the elegy to the systematic approach typical of didactic poetry is in fact only a small step. The external appearance of the work makes it plausible to assume that, to the first two books, containing advice to young men, a 3rd book addressed to women was added at a later date. Recently, however, a uniform plan for the three books has been suggested, which would even include the Remedies for Love (Remedia amoris), in which Ovid confronts the critics of the Ars amatoria and in some places actually outdoes its risqué sallies.

Even before the Art of Love Ovid had published a didactic poem on cosmetics (Medicamina faciei femineae), from which the preserved preface, taking the shape of a eulogy of civilization, still merits reading.

Some time between 2 and 8 A.D. Ovid was at work on two larger masterpieces, the Metamorphoses—a mythological epic in 15 books on stories of transformation—and the Fasti, a poetic version of the Roman calendar, intended to occupy 12 books.

The Metamorphoses was finished and only lacking final revision, the Fasti only half finished, when Ovid was suddenly banished by an imperial edict to Tomi on the Black Sea. Juridically, the sentence was only that of relegation, which meant that the poet did not lose his civil rights or his property. Of the two causes, the poet mentions only one expressly: the Art of Love. We may well believe that Augustus, the originator of Roman laws of marriage, was anything but captivated by this lubricious little book. But even so, it had already been in circulation for eight years, and it cannot therefore have been the chief ground for the sentence.<sup>1</sup> Of the latter, Ovid merely says that it was familiar enough, and may not be mentioned by him. He hints that he may have witnessed something impermissible, though it is not known whether in connection with the adulterous behavior of the younger Julia, or with the efforts to secure the succession to Augustus for Agrippa Postumus. In favor of the latter possibility, we may recall the general experience that moral objections are usually raised in public life only when they are inspired by political reasons. Even Augustus' successor, Tiberius, refused to recall Ovid. His notorious loyalty to his predecessor's decisions may have been strengthened in this case by personal rancor.

On his way into exile the poet wrote the 1st book of the Tristia, a collection of elegies and elegiac epistles. In the course of time this work grew to fill five books. While in the Tristia the addressees are unnamed, in the succeeding Epistulae ex Ponto this precaution was abandoned. In his banishment Ovid took trouble with the publication of the Metamorphoses and adapted the available portions of the Fasti with the intention of dedicating them to Germanicus, undoubtedly the noblest representative of the imperial house. Unfortunately, once again in matters political the poet had taken the wrong tack. A completion of the second half of the Roman calendar could not be contemplated at Tomi, in the absence of the required libraries. Instead, in imitation of Callimachus, Ovid composed his long and obscure curse poem, the Ibis, whose recipient is never named. The Halieutica, a didactic poem dealing with Black Sea fish, is only partially preserved, and its authenticity is disputed. Ovid's laments, aiming to secure his recall to Rome or a milder form of exile, must not obscure the fact that the poet adapted quite well to his new surroundings. It is not to be doubted that he learned Getic and Sarmatian, and composed a eulogy of Augustus in Getic. This is quite in keeping with the character of a man who enjoyed tampering with taboos. Why should he not therefore protest against the blindness of the ancient Greeks and Romans towards the beauties of the 'barbaric' languages? As the poet grew older in his place of banishment, he received many tokens of recognition. His death occurred in A.D. 17 without his ever having seen Italy again.

---

<sup>1</sup> The view advanced by W. STROH (1979) deserves consideration, that Ovid was wrong to assume that using the love stories of myth as a vehicle for making fun of Augustus' laws on marriage could be done with impunity.

Survey of Works

Amores

1: The 1st book of the Amores develops along two parallel lines (2-7 and 9-14). The 15th poem acts as a conclusion and displays points of contact with 1. 1, 2. 1, and 3. 15. In correspondence are: Amor's military triumph (2) and the lover's military service (9); courtship and the promise of immortality (3); the girl's request for presents and the poet's renewed allusion to his gift to her of immortality (10); the instruction of the beloved (4) and instruction of the serving girl (11); the fulfillment of love (5) and the farewell (12); the lament before the closed door (6) and the aubade before departure in the morning (13); the lover's ruffling of his mistress's hair (7) and the spoiling of her hair by dyes (14). Poems 1, 8 and 15 have programmatic import: 1 and 15 from the poet's point of view and 8 from the standpoint of the lena.

2: There is juxtaposition, at times of similar poems (2 and 3: to the custos; 13 and 14: abortion), and sometimes of contrasts. Thus in 2. 7 Ovid indignantly rejects Corinna's charge that he is in love with her maid, while in the following poem (2. 8) he begs the maid to reward him for his perjury. A contrast is also found between 2. 11, a farewell poem, and 2. 12, a celebration of love's fulfillment. Two poems of address are separated: the lament for the parrot (6) and the verses to his mistress' ring (15). Similar themes appear separately from an opposed perspective: for example, an appeal to the custos for lenient treatment (2) and to the poet's rival with a request for stricter surveillance of the girl (19). In spite of its literary content, elegy 2. 18 does not placed at the end of the book. This makes it obvious that Ovid was concerned with the separation and framing function of the custos poems.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> 2. 1 and 2. 2-3 correspond to 2. 18 and 2. 19. In the outer poems of the book, Symmetry is emphasized by the fact that around the center (2. 10) are grouped twice two pairs of elegies: 7 and 8, 9a and 9b, 11 and 12, 13 and 14. On their part these are framed by the address poems (6 and 15). The poem at the very center (2. 10) appropriately treats of a double love. It is dedicated to Graecinus, who also occupies a central place in the original collection of the Epistulae ex Ponto (books 1-3), where poem 6 is the center of the 2nd book. This means that the structural principles in the 2nd book of the Amores are different from those in the first. Earlier there was parallelism, now we find chiasmus. First alternation was found, but now the juxtaposition of related themes.

3: If the spurious elegy 3. 5 is discarded, the 3rd book consists of fourteen poems. Unlike the elegies of the 1st book, these are organized not in parallel but in counterpoint. In the middle of the book there are two elegies with literary themes: the poet's life (3. 8), the poet's death (3. 9). The neighboring poems 7 and 10 treat disappointment in love. In the first case the reason is to be sought with the lover, in the second with the observance of religious abstinence by his mistress. The next pair of elegies deals with failed attempts: to reach the beloved (3. 6) or to be free of love (3. 11). Elegies 4 and 12 are addressed to the persons with whom Ovid must share Corinna: her 'husband' (4) and the general public (12). In 2 and 13, in both cases the poet is seen accompanying a lady at a public celebration. Appropriately at the beginning of the book the start of an affair at the Circus is described, while towards the end of the book the mention of his wife renders the poet's farewell to love elegy intelligible. Poems 3 and 14 both deal with the theme of 'infidelity and keeping secrets'. It is no coincidence that Ovid bids his audience of women farewell with this appeal for consideration for their lovers. It is the theme of 'keeping secrets' which would later prevail in the Art of Love. In the first half of the book, the lover's path leads him to his mistress. In the second, it leads away from her, a structure reminiscent of Propertius' 1st book. The change of direction is already prepared in 3. 7, where physical proximity cannot disguise distance of feeling. To this, 3. 10, with its theme of close feeling in spite of physical distance, forms a counterpoint. The turn away from the beloved then begins with 3. 11.

Each of the three books follows a different structural principle. In the 1st, there is parallelism, in the 2nd centrality and in the 3rd a mirror-like order, though a central focus is lacking.<sup>1</sup> unusually, the sequence of themes is set in parallel: 'program poem ~ custos theme.' This means that the dazzling pirouette may come at the end. There is a similar device in the 3rd book, where 3. 2 and 3 show the same sequence of themes as 3. 13 and 14 ('visit to a festive celebration' and 'infidelity and keeping secrets'). This subtlety in both cases brings some variation into the concentric structure of the books, without impairing it.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also G. LÖRCHER, Der Aufbau der drei Bücher von Ovids Amores, Amsterdam 1975.

Ars Amatoria

1: The first two books are taken up with directions for men. An introduction is followed—in a humorous adaptation of rhetorical textbook principles—by the doctrine of ‘invention’ (41–262). Girls may be ‘found’ at various rendezvous in Rome, notably in the theater, at the Circus and amphitheatre, at staged sea-fights and triumphal processions, at parties, and even outside Rome.

This is followed by the doctrine of how to win the girl’s sympathy (263–770): have confidence in yourself, make sure the lady’s maid is on your side and choose the right moment. You must also learn the art of giving presents and writing letters. Not too much fuss by men over their appearance! Parties offer good opportunities. You must be a master of persuasion and promises. Methods of successful courtship include kisses and a not unwelcome use of force, as well as pretended reserve and an appearance that arouses pity. Keep a sharp eye on your men friends! Be a master of the art of transformation. Three mythological episodes divide this didactic section (289–326, 525–564, 681–704).

2: After the conquest the aim is to make sure the affair lasts. The fascination exercised by education is stronger than any magic. Show compliance, interpret love as military service, give thoughtful presents—but without bankrupting yourself. Do not be sparing with praise, and stand by the girl when she is unwell, although any bitter medicine should be tendered to her by your rival. Consider the advantages and dangers of separation, and use discretion in any escapades. Instead of harmful stimulants, jealousy may serve as love’s sauce, though the best medicine is obviously love itself. Know yourself, and put your merits into play. The true cavalier controls his jealousy and his tongue. A rhetorical re-interpretation of the beloved’s weaknesses as merits leads to praise of the mature woman. Brief hints about erotic play are followed by a conclusion.

3: Enjoy life, you women, and revel in the blessings of civilization! Pay attention to your hair, dress and toilet—but don’t allow cosmetic jars to be too visible to the visitor. Your lover should only view the finished work of art, though he may be present when your hair is being done. Physical defects may be compensated for. Charm may be learned, just like music, literature, dancing, and social pastimes. Education lasts longer than beauty.

When visiting meeting points, beware of men who are too handsome and of other cheats. Love letters should be diplomatic. You should control your facial expressions, and always display a cheerful demeanor. Treat your lovers in a way suitable to their age and temperament. Do not be too accessible, and enhance the charm of love by encouraging rivalry. Outwit chaperones, and be on your guard against girlfriends. Play the part of the girl in love and do not be too credulous about news of infidelity. Watch your table manners. Know yourselves and, while making love, choose positions likely to show you off to best advantage.

Remedia amoris

This work is not a recantation, and aims to prevent only unhappiness and, in particular, suicide. If the heroines of myth had read it, they would have remained alive. Master passion at the beginning, or after it has passed its peak. Avoid leisure. Take up work as a lawyer, politician, soldier, countryman or huntsman. Keep your distance. Magic is useless. Painstakingly recollect the sufferings which your girlfriend has caused you. Consider her physical defects, and interpret even her advantages as defects. Give her the chance to show her less attractive sides. After a sally against moralizing critics of the Ars, further advice follows: blunt the pangs of passion by physical revulsion or by taking another mistress. Show yourself unsympathetic. Avoid jealousy. Seek forgetfulness, but steer clear of loneliness, and stay away from your mistress. Do not cherish the belief that she loves you and do not enter into any arguments. Never read her letters again. Avoid the places where you were together with her. Stay away from the theater. Do not read any love poems, not even mine. You are cured if you can kiss your rival. Follow a diet and drink no wine.

Heroides

Certain ladies of myth write letters to their absent lovers: 1. Penelope to Ulysses; 2. Phyllis to Demophoon; 3. Briseis to Achilles; 4. Phaedra to Hippolytus; 5. Oenone to Paris; 6. Hypsipyle to Jason; 7. Dido to Aeneas; 8. Hermione to Orestes; 9. Deianira to Hercules; 10. Ariadne to Theseus; 11. Canace to Macareus; 12. Medea to Jason; 13. Laodamia to Protesilaus; 14. Hypermestra to Lynceus.

A place apart is to be assigned to the disputed letter of Sappho<sup>1</sup> (15).

This is followed by paired letters: 16–17. Paris and Helen; 18–19. Leander and Hero; 20–21. Acontius and Cydippe.

Metamorphoses<sup>2</sup>

1: A short proem and the story of creation is followed by the four ages of the world, the flood and the reappearance of living creatures. This first main section (1. 5–451) culminates in Apollo's victory over the Python. Amatory adventures of the gods fill up the second half of the book.

<sup>1</sup> In favor of authenticity, H. DÖRRIE, P. Ovidius Naso. Der Brief der Sappho an Phaon mit literarischem und kritischem Kommentar im Rahmen einer motivgeschichtlichen Studie, München 1975. Against authenticity (convincing): R. J. TARRANT, The Authenticity of the Letter of Sappho to Phaon (Her. XV), HSPh 85, 1981, 133–153; C. E. MURGIA, Imitation and Authenticity in Ovid, met. 1. 477 and Her. 15, *AJP*h 106, 1985, 456–474.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. especially W. LUDWIG 1965; A. CRABBE, Structure and Content in Ovid's Metamorphoses, ANRW 2, 31, 4, 1981, 2274–2327. On the overall structure, see now A. BARTENBACH 1990; forthcoming C. TSITSIOU, Book 8 of the Metamorphoses (C and study), diss. Heidelberg 1997.

2: As in the 1st book, a world disaster forms the opening picture, the universal conflagration caused by Phaethon. This is followed by amatory adventures of the gods. The second half of the 1st book and the whole 2nd book are interpreted as the second main section of the poem.

3: The story of Cadmus, already prepared at the end of the 2nd book, frames a third main section, reaching to 4. 606. Individual episodes are provided by Theban stories: Actaeon, Semele and Pentheus, with the tales of Narcissus and the Etruscan sailors inserted as interludes.

4: The Theban legends continue with the story of the daughters of Minyas (who on their part narrate stories of love) and the tale of Ino and Melicertes. The ring closes with Cadmus and Harmonia. A fourth main section (4. 607–5. 249) takes up the theme of Perseus. He turns Atlas into stone, releases Andromeda, and describes his struggle with the Medusa.

5: The battle in the hall against Perseus' rival Phineus occupies the first part of the book. Then Perseus' patron goddess Minerva visits the Muses, from whom she hears the tales of Pyreneus, the Pierides, Proserpina, Arethusa, and Triptolemus. The fifth main section ('anger of the gods') is usually considered to last from 5. 250–6. 420, but the theme is not limited to this section, and the boundary with what follows remains fluid.

6: At the beginning of the second third of the work (books 6–10) stands the story of Arachne, an artist's tragedy like the death of Orpheus at the beginning of the 11th book. This throws light on the epilogue of the entire work, in which Ovid defies the anger of Jupiter—and of Augustus. The book begins with Minerva and then, after telling the stories of Niobe, the Lycian peasants and Marsyas, passes to Attic myths, with Philomela and Orithyia. A sixth main section ranges so broadly that practically the whole second third stands under Athenian auspices. At the very beginning of book 6 we already hear the tale of the city's foundation.

7: After the story of Medea, linked with Athens by Theseus, Ovid returns with Cephalus to Attic legends.

8: In combination with the 7th book, a chiasmic succession of key figures is presented: Theseus—Minos—Aeacus—Cephalus—Minos—Theseus. With Minos are linked the tales of Scylla and Daedalus, with Theseus the Calydonian hunt and the stories told in company with Achelous.

9: The seventh main section (9. 1–446) is dedicated to Hercules. His struggle with Achelous forms a bridge to the preceding, since the main sections overlap. The encounter with Nessus prepares the way for Hercules' death. In a fascinating reversal of chronology, the hero's apotheosis is followed by the story of his birth, related by his mother. With Iole's sister Dryope, and with Iolaus, even what follows remains in Hercules' ambience. Two tales of unnatural love, that of the ill-starred Byblis and the pious Iphis, form a prelude to the next book. The eighth main section is usually calculated from 9. 447–11. 193.

10: In the portion devoted to Orpheus which now follows (10. 1–11. 84) themes of ‘unnatural love’ and ‘piety’ continue: love for boys (Orpheus, Cyparissus, Ganymede, Hyacinth), prostitution (the Propoetides), love for a statue (Pygmalion), incest (Myrrha and her father). A positive example of piety is provided by Pygmalion, and a contrary example by Hippomenes. Finally, Adonis makes a parallel to Orpheus.

11: It is not by coincidence that the death of Orpheus opens the last third of the work (see above on book 6). The punishment of the Bacchantes and the events around Midas furnish an epilogue to the tale of Orpheus. A ninth main section (11. 194–795) begins with the key word ‘Troy’. It gives an account of the generation before the Trojan War in interlaced order: Troy—Peleus—Ceyx—Peleus—Ceyx—Troy.

12: The tenth main section (12. 1–13. 622) tells the story of the Trojan War. The miracle of Aulis and Achilles’ victory over Cygnus is followed by an episode describing the battle of the Centaurs and Lapiths, before and after which stand Nestor’s tales of Caeneus and Periclymenus. At the end of the book—and at the same time in the middle of the main section—comes Achilles’ death.

13: The contest for the arms of Achilles, Polyxena, Hecuba and a flashback to Memnon are still within the Trojan Cycle. The eleventh main section (13. 623–14. 608<sup>1</sup>) focuses upon Aeneas. Into his voyages the poet introduces the tales of the daughters of Anius and of Orion, as well as the stories of Scylla and Galatea.

14: Circe transforms Scylla, the comrades of Ulysses and also Picus. A similar fate is suffered by the comrades of Diomedes, the Apulian shepherd, the ships of Aeneas, and, of course, by the hero himself, turned into a god by Venus. At 609 the twelfth and last main section of the poem begins, containing the story of Alba Longa and Rome. Amatory interludes are provided by the narratives of Pomona and Vertumnus, Iphis and Anaxarete. The book concludes with the apotheosis of Romulus and Hersilia.

15: The book begins with the myth of Myscelos, founder of Croton. In southern Italy, Numa hears the doctrines of Pythagoras, ‘scientific lore’ recalling the 1st book. Numa’s wife, Egeria, and Hippolytus, whose death leads to immortality, along with the selfless republican Cipus, form a prelude to the finale, which begins with a solemn invocation of the Muses. Apollo’s son Aesculapius is introduced to Rome from abroad, but Caesar is a god in his own city and Augustus, Jupiter on earth, surpasses even Caesar. The poet, however, will live on in the memory of his readers through his work, which not even Jupiter’s anger can assail.

<sup>1</sup> W. LUDWIG, 1965, 68, argues for a different conclusion (14. 440).

Fasti

A poetic treatment of the Roman calendar puts on display a motley variety of astronomical data, aetiological myths and explanations. The six surviving books are each dedicated to a single month (January to June). A continuous stream of narrative, such as is found in the Metamorphoses, is not the aim, but the structure is less mechanical than its underlying principle might lead the reader to expect.<sup>1</sup>

Tristia

1: The 1st book of the Tristia is framed by an address to the book (1) and an epilogue to the reader (11). In the center is found his eulogy of his wife (6), flanked by letters to his best friend (5) and to the future editor of the Metamorphoses (7). To this group of three corresponds another at the beginning of the book: the emotional scene of the departure from Rome (3) is surrounded by two pictures of storms (2 and 4). Poems 8 to 10 are related to the rest of the book in such a way that the prayer for the safety of the ship (10) forms a counterpart to the second poem, which corresponds to it in content and position, while the thematically contrasting elegies 8 and 9 are purposely juxtaposed. Altogether we find in the first third of the book two poems particularly relating to the sea voyage (2 and 4), but in the last third only one (10). In the first third, one elegy is mainly concerned with human relationships (3), while in the last there are two such pieces (8 and 9), of which 8 expressly refers back to 3 (1; 8; 11–26) and twice alludes to Rome (33 and 37–38).

2: The 2nd book of the Tristia is self-contained, consisting of a single apologia directed to Augustus. The first and shorter section (1–206) considers the genuine, though now unknown, reason for the sentence of banishment. It shows a structure centering around a passage dealing with Ovid's crime (97–108), with the essential query: Cur aliquid vidi? (103). Balancing around this are sections emphasizing Ovid's so far unchallenged honor as eques and judge (89–96) and his noble origin (109–114); the general hatred for Ovid after his fall from the emperor's favor (87–88) and his worldwide fame (115–120); the collapse of his house as a metaphor (83–86) and as a reality (121–122); the anger of the princeps in its devastating effect (81–82) and possible pardon after the fading of this mood (123–124); Ovid's fealty to Augustus (51–80) and the fealty of Augustus to Ovid, shown in the mildness of his punishment (125–154); the pardoning of earlier conquered enemies (41–50) and future victories over enemies (155–178); Augustus as a merciful pater patriae and as the image of Jupiter (29–40; 179–182). The introduction, dealing with the harm his poetry has caused and yet the help expected from it by Ovid, who hopes to assuage Augustus' anger (1–28), finds its counterpart in a concluding plea for a milder exile, and an allusion to the dangers at Tomi and Caesar's obligation to protect his fellow citizens (183–206).

<sup>1</sup> On the artistic structure of the Fasti, see J. F. MILLER, Ovid's Elegiac Festivals, Studies in the Fasti, Frankfurt 1991. Cf. also M. KÖTZLE, Zur Darstellung weiblicher Gottheiten in Ovids Fasti, Frankfurt 1991.

The second and larger main section of the book (207–578) follows two parallel lines of development: 1. The Art of Love has not misled anyone (207–360); 2. Ovid is the only one harmed by his poem (361–578). These two subordinate sections may be compared. In each case at the beginning stands a longer connected piece about reading. As the first shows, on closer examination Augustus must surely have noted that Ovid's teaching does not contain anything forbidden, and expressly excludes ladies of rank. In any case, no book is safe against misuse, unless ladies of high society are to be forbidden to read anything at all (207–278). The parallel second subordinate section shows that many authors have both written about love and composed playful manuals without being punished (361–496). To an ironic proposal of making away with the theater, circus, and other places of temptation (279–302) corresponds a reference to the unchallenged existence of public shows with erotic content, especially the mime so highly esteemed by Augustus himself (497–520). The assertion that reading or viewing something forbidden is not of itself a crime (303–312) is matched by a reference to erotic pictures and statues in private houses (521–528). With Ovid's abandonment of the composition of an epic about Augustus and his return to the love poetry more in keeping with his gifts (313–346) may be compared the allusion to erotic elements in the Aeneid, the long uncontested publication of the Art of Love, and the homage paid to Augustus in Ovid's Fasti and Metamorphoses (529–562). Ovid's moral integrity serves in the first subordinate section to prove that he could never have been able to preach adultery (347–350); in the second, that same quality assures him of the sympathy of all Romans (563–578).

This means that the first main section of the book displays chiasmic structure, and the second, parallelism. The second is longer than the first, and the same is true of the two subordinate sections of the second. Both main sections are linked by the central motif of the first: the sight of something forbidden (103). That such behavior does not deserve punishment is established in general terms in sections 303–316 and 521–528, and this principle should also apply to Ovid. The unity of the book is found therefore—in spite of the separation of the two reasons for the banishment—in its implicit refutation of the main accusation.

3: The framework is formed by a speech delivered by the book (1) and a letter to the editor (14). As in the 1st book, the second and penultimate elegies both have in a sense the character of a prayer. Especially effective in the birthday poem (13) is the negation of prayer as a sign of mourning.

In the third and antepenultimate position are found two triptychs (3; 4a; 4b; and 10–12<sup>1</sup>). The heart of the book is an elegy to the young poetess Perilla (7) with important statements on poetry and political power. In the 1st book, letters to friends were concentrated in the second half, but in this book the reverse is the case, while now elegies about the poet's personal relationships are found in the second half of the book. The 1st and 3rd books therefore have a corresponding structure, framing the differently organized 2nd book.

4: The supporting pillars of the 4th book are formed by addresses to the reader (1) and to posterity (10). In sequence, the first half mentions the imperial house (2), the poet's wife (3), the eloquent young Messallinus (4) and a truly helpful friend (5). To these positive aspects, the second half opposes themes of: the destructive effect of time (6); a friend who fails to write (7); the antithesis between the old age once dreamed of and the real thing (8); a threat to an unnamed enemy (9)—a counterpart to the thanks to a friend in 5. Unlike the 1st book, the fourth reserves to its second half the poems presenting Ovid's real circumstances in the shape of meditations. But, unlike books 1 and 3, this book lacks a centerpiece. The contrast between the final poems of the first and third group of four is noteworthy (5 and 9), and in general the careful preservation of distinctions of rank in the sequence of those addressed.

5: The introduction (1), like 4. 10, consists of an address to the reader, and is set outside the balanced arrangement of the rest of the book, which is dedicated to the poet's wife. It is the letters to her which define the structure (2; 5; 11; 14). Between them in each case come an elegy on literary topics (3 and 12) and a letter to a friend (4 and 13). The middle is occupied by a letter to a vindictive enemy<sup>2</sup> (8), framed by letters to sincere friends (7 and 9) and poems about Ovid's situation (6 and 10). To the first poem to his wife Ovid attaches a new appeal to Augustus. He also attempts to gain support for his case from a circle of poet-friends (3).

Epistulae ex Ponto

1–3: The first three books of the Letters from the Pontus are made up of a collection<sup>3</sup> of 30 elegies. A frame is provided in each case by two letters to the editor Brutus (1. 1 and 3. 9), and to the influential Paullus Fabius Maximus (1. 2 and 3. 8), whose wife was on friendly terms with Ovid's wife.

<sup>1</sup> To Brutus (4a), surrounded by two personal poems (3: Ovid's illness; 4b: Ovid's misfortune); cf. 10: winter; 12: spring; in between 11: to an enemy.

<sup>2</sup> Does this preferential position hint that the addressee is to be identified with that of the abusive Ibis (cf. also 4. 9)?

<sup>3</sup> H. H. FROESCH, Ovids Epistulae ex Ponto 1–3 als Gedichtsammlung, diss. Bonn 1968.

The central section consists of epistles 2. 3–8. Letters to Salanus, Germanicus' teacher, and to Graecinus, a friend of Ovid's youth (2. 5 and 6) who was also the recipient of the central poem of the Amores, are flanked by two epistles to Curtius Atticus (2. 4 and 7), to whom Ovid is indebted for knowledgeable criticism of his verses, and to Cotta Maximus (2. 3 and 8). The latter was the younger son of Ovid's patron Messalla. Cotta Maximus is also the addressee of the 5th poem of the whole collection (1. 5) and of the fifth from its end (3. 5), as well as of the penultimate elegy of book 1 (1. 9) and the second poem of book 3 (3. 2), which means that, just like that of Tullus in Propertius 1, Cotta's name serves to articulate the structure. Places of honor are occupied by Germanicus at the beginning of the 2nd book (2. 1), and the poet's wife at the beginning of the third (3. 1). In both cases a mentor is juxtaposed to these important figures: the learned Salanus, whose central position in the collection is determined by his influence on Germanicus, and Rufus, the uncle of Ovid's wife, who concludes book 2 (2. 11) and thus stands at his niece's side (3. 1).

The 2nd book consists of eleven poems, but the 3rd only of nine. The reversal of expected proportions in this way is explained by the poet's intention of giving the 2nd book an uneven number of poems, to enable, as in the Amores, the elegy to Graecinus to stand in central place there. Simultaneously, a carefully pondered order determines the placement of the addressees. The articulating function of Cotta in the whole collection might have attracted criticism from his older brother Messallinus. As a counterweight, Messallinus is given in 2. 2 a highly flattering place, after Germanicus and before Cotta. But even in the 1st book, Graecinus has also an important position, since his name and that of his brother Pomponius Flaccus frame its second half.

As a whole, the collection shows a symmetrical structure, though devoid of any mechanical schema. A stimulus may have been provided by Horace's first three books of Odes.

4: It is possible that book 4 was edited from papers found after Ovid's death, though the sequence of the poems still permits the assumption that the poet himself had something to do with it. Even an editor might have set an elegy about the circle of Roman poets at the end (16), and framed the rest of the collection with two letters to Sextus Pompeius. But who, apart from Ovid, would have put Graecinus yet again at the beginning of the book's second half (4. 9)?

The structure of books of poems serves more than an aesthetic purpose. It reflects a whole pattern of human and social relationships. Just like Propertius' collection of elegies, Ovid's works are not merely books of love or grief, but also books of friendship (and enmity). Social considerations are indeed important, but cannot obscure the steadfastness with which the names of old friends recur at places which the poet has saved for them with a certain obstinacy.

Ibis

The first third of the book (1–206) divides into an introduction (1–64) and a solemn curse (65–206). A characteristic conceit is that the description of Ibis' birth is placed after that of his ritual slaughter<sup>1</sup> (207–247).

The second main section has at its halfway point a remark (411–412) which alludes to 125, the center of the second subdivision of the first main section. As the height of doom, Ovid wishes on his enemy a fate like his own (635–636). The second half of the second main section begins with the wish that the poet's enemy may be stricken with poverty (413–424), a fate Ibis had in store for Ovid. At the corresponding position shortly after the beginning of the second main section (257–270) stands the prayer that Ibis may be struck blind. The prominent position assigned to the motif makes it plausible to suppose that Ibis had observed and reported something which turned out to be fatal for Ovid. The bloody punishment for gossiping (567) may also be compared.

Overall, the work consists of two sections of unequal length (1–206; 207–642). The first is mainly articulated in threes. The second in essence is made up of two series of curses. The beginning, middle, and end here are clearly indicated. The concluding lines pick up motifs from the introduction in reverse order (638, cf. 127–194; 639–640, cf. 89–90; 641–642, cf. 49–52).

Sources, Models, and Genres

The Amores is determined in the first instance by Roman tradition: Gallus, Tibullus, Propertius. Throughout his life Ovid never disclaimed Cornelius Gallus. He paid homage to Tibullus in am. 3. 9; in spite of the great differences between the two poets, the links uniting them are far broader. Even in the 3rd book of the Tristia, a poem about illness and death stands in third place, as does a similar poem in Tibullus' 1st book. With Propertius Ovid enjoyed lively personal interchange, so that it is difficult to establish the chronological relation between Ovid and late poems of Propertius. Influences of the Greek epigram, of comedy and of the plastic arts, everywhere present to the inhabitant of the capital, are also not to be excluded.

In writing the The Art of Love Ovid could find support in individual elegies of Tibullus and the teachings of the comic lena. At a level lower than his own was pornographic literature in the narrower sense, partly circulating under the names of women authors. Into higher spheres than that of Ovid doctrines of Platonic love could act as guides: examples are the Phaedrus and the Symposium. A more appropriate comparison would be with Xenophon, who allows his Socrates to talk with a hetaera about ways of catching men (Mem. 3. 11). Ovid unites here the topics and characters of elegy and comedy with the forms of didactic poetry, but using the elegiac meter.

<sup>1</sup> A positive counter example is the sequence of apotheosis-birth in the case of Hercules in book 9 of the Metamorphoses; forthcoming: H. GROMBEIN, Untersuchungen zu Ovids Ibis, diss. Heidelberg 1996.

Ovid himself declared that the Heroides were a new type of literature created by him (ars 3. 346).<sup>1</sup> There is the crossing of several genres: letter, elegy, dramatic monologue. Tragedy (e.g. Euripides in Ovid's letters of Medea and Phaedra) and epic (Homer, Apollonius, Virgil) exercise strong influence, along with Hellenistic poetry (Callimachus in the correspondence of Acontius and Cydippe). As in the Amores and the Ars amatoria, the rhetorical training of the author is also evident. The Heroides are not suasoriae in verse, but without that training they would not have taken the shape they do.

In their metrical form the Metamorphoses are an epic, though without unity of place, time, person, and action. The presence of Homer, Virgil, and Apollonius Rhodius is apparent, though the work is more reminiscent of Hesiodic and Hellenistic catalog poems. The subject matter is largely drawn from Hellenistic sources: Boios or Boio ('Ορνιθογονία, imitated in Latin by Ovid's older friend Aemilius Macer), Phanocles ('Ερωτες ἢ καλοί), Eratosthenes (Καταστερισμοί), Nicander ('Ετεροιούμενα), Parthenius (Μεταμορφώσεις). The last named lived in Rome and was on intimate terms with the Cornelius Gallus whom Ovid so admired. The song of Silenus in Virgil's 6th Eclogue bears a strong resemblance to the Metamorphoses. This sketch of a cosmological and erotic poem must have impressed Ovid no matter whether in fact Virgil had in mind a poem of Gallus or not. The assumption of a handbook of mythology as a stimulus for the division of topics in several parts of the Metamorphoses—though not for the literary treatment—is also plausible.

The psychological richness of the Metamorphoses stems from Ovid's experience as an elegist and his knowledge of Greco-Roman tragedy. The dispute over the arms of Achilles is set up as a rhetorical controversia. There is also the influence of pastoral and epigram. In his Philemon and Baucis Ovid followed Callimachus' Hecale and elsewhere adopted this poet's technique of conversation with the Muses; however, Ovid's conception of a wide-ranging, continuous poem (perpetuum carmen, met. 1. 4) contradicts the principles of the prologue to the Aetia. The attempt by the Metamorphoses to encompass universal history springs from Hellenistic historical writing. The upshot is an encyclopedic, collective poem sui generis, something perhaps possible in this manner only in Rome and only by Ovid.

<sup>1</sup> Propertius' Arethusa-letter (4. 3) was perhaps written later. It is also cast, unlike Ovid's Heroides, against a Roman background.

The Fasti were written under the auspices of Callimachus and his Roman successor Propertius. Varro supplied material about ancient Rome, as he had done for the corresponding portions of the Metamorphoses. There was also use of historical sources such as Livy. The framework of the whole poem was furnished by the Roman calendar.

Among the exile poems Callimachean influence is particularly strong in the Ibis. The elegiac epistles of personal character must be regarded as a new creation. At the same time, by being written to serve a particular purpose they look back to the very beginnings of elegy (Solon). The description of his uncivilized place of exile often depends on literary topoi. Ovid's aim is not so much to reproduce the reality of his place of exile as to convince his Roman readers that life there for him was intolerable.

Literary Technique

In Ovid the structure of each love elegy is strictly determined by its theme. The Tibullan multiplicity of themes is foreign to him. Ovid often develops his subject along rhetorical lines; examples are the exploitation of themes such as militat omnis amans, 'every lover is a soldier' (1. 9) or odi et amo, 'I hate and I love' (3. 11. 33-52<sup>1</sup>).

In the individual letters of the Heroides rhetoric is made to serve the presentation of character. Accordingly, arguments are deployed, but often without any prospect of practical success. Instead, the reader receives a lively picture of the lady who is writing. From a means of persuasion, rhetoric has become a medium for artistic expression.

In mastering the task of organizing several short poems artistically to produce a well-articulated whole, Ovid took his cue from Horace.

<sup>1</sup> Printed as an independent poem in many editions.

A particularly impressive example is the centrally arranged structure of the Epistulae ex Ponto books 1–3 (see Survey of Works).

In the Ars amatoria Ovid first succeeded in arranging a whole book as a continuous text. To achieve this he used mythological examples and consistently applied metaphors (e.g. chariot riding) as unifying and articulating elements.<sup>1</sup> As early as in this work we find a structural design reaching beyond the single book: the 3rd book of the Art of Love throws new light on the topics of the first two, this time from the woman's point of view. In the Remedia, the means and methods already familiar to the reader—mythological examples and rational mastery of psychology by rhetorical reflection—serve the opposite purpose from that of the Ars amatoria. It is no coincidence that the Ars amatoria and the Remedia together comprise as many books as Virgil's Georgics.

In the Metamorphoses Ovid had to think in even larger units. Some books were linked by the very fact that at the end of one, as in some serial novel, a new narrative thread was already underway (as at 1. 747; 2. 836). Conversely, the main action of one book might be concluded only in its sequel (e.g. 11. 1–84). Ovid artfully connects the individual tales among themselves. Mostly he does not depend on external links, such as that of framing narrative, or the presence or absence of particular characters. Rather he often strives for thematic connections, such as the 'sight of the forbidden' in book 3. Throughout the entire work, genealogy, culture, and history form important links: Thebes in the first third of the work; Athens in the second; Troy and Rome in the third.

A large-scale design is evident in the parallel disposition of the first two books of the Metamorphoses. In each case here the description of a universal catastrophe (flood or conflagration) is followed by the narration of amatory escapades on the part of the gods. The work was conceived in three sets of five books (trist. 1. 1. 117); it is true that it lacks the external and internal coherence of the Aeneid, but there are remarkable analogies between the closing books of the three pentads.<sup>2</sup> It is only in these books that there is reference to the Muses, and only here that unusually long insertions, presented by prophetic characters, lend their stamp to the book: the Muses' song (book 5); that of Orpheus (book 10); and the discourse of Pythagoras (book 15). Finally each of these books has an epilogue (6. 1–138; 11. 1–84; 15. 871–879), relating to the fate of an artist.

<sup>1</sup> M. WEBER 1983.

<sup>2</sup> A. BARTENBACH 1990.

In Ovid's art of character portrayal direct speech plays the most prominent role. Monologues are characteristic;<sup>1</sup> they depend on tragic style and also recall Ovid's Heroides. In fact in his story of Byblis (met. 9. 523–565) Ovid employs directly the epistolary form he had himself invented in the Heroides. Subtle psychological observations are often added as marginal remarks, as when Atalanta declares in the main text that the beauty of Hippomenes leaves her unmoved, while conceding the opposite in parentheses (met. 10. 614). Byblis' confusion is vividly presented. Her initial search for the right word is reflected in her taking up and laying aside of her writing tablets, in her writing and erasing (met. 9. 523–525). At the end indeed she is so inspired by her theme that she even fills the margins (met. 9. 565).

We will come back on some details of the poet's narrative technique in the context of his language and style. Here we may particularly dwell on his skilful positioning of the epic simile:<sup>2</sup> in an early stage of the action, it may refer to the emotion which is its main-spring (e.g. met. 1. 492–496, love). In the middle of the story, it acts as retardation before the decisive moment (e.g. met. 1. 533–539 in the erotic chase). Towards the end of the story it may illustrate a metamorphosis (e.g. met. 2. 825–832). It may also serve to foreshadow events (met. 1. 492–496 stubble field: sterilis amor!) and may contain allusions to the present (met. 1. 200–205).

The author uses other methods to aid the reader's understanding. Often the basic theme (love, divine anger, and so on) is expressly mentioned in the transition or introduction. At important moments a key word may recur (such as: 'love lent her the power to do this'). The ill-starred outcome of an event may be quite early indicated by precise signals: Daedalus gives his son a kiss 'which he will never repeat' (8. 211–212). Adjectives such as 'the unwitting', 'the unhappy', do more than express sympathy. They also guide the reader's expectations. The same may be said of tragic irony, which is more than a mere play with words. It underlines the contrast between the ignorance of the protagonist and the fate in store for him.

<sup>1</sup> R. HEINZE 1919, esp. 110–127.

<sup>2</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT, Die Funktion der Gleichnisse in Ovids Metamorphosen, in: Studien zum antiken Epos, FS F. DIRLMEIER, V. PÖSCHL, Meisenheim 1976, 280–290.

The art of fashioning gradual transitions<sup>1</sup> is highly developed in the Metamorphoses. On the small scale it is shown in the description of metamorphosis in progress; on the large scale in the linking of the stories. The description of metamorphosis<sup>2</sup> puts before the reader's eyes something irrational, contrary to nature and reason, and yet so persuasively that he seems to see it going on before him. Here Ovid seems to overcome the static feature shared by many ancient works of art and to anticipate possibilities which only the film would later be able to realize. Ovid of course does not make his reader a passive spectator, but stimulates him to develop for himself the corresponding images.

Allegorical descriptions of place, reflecting the nature of their denizen, are typical of Ovid. An example is the house of Fama (12. 39–63). Such passages show that rhetorical training is not in contradiction with poetry, but is able to stimulate poetic imagination and develop it systematically.

In the Fasti Ovid is not opposing to the 'epic' narrative of the Metamorphoses an 'elegiac' manner, but rather enriching each of these two genres with elements of the other. The development of his narrative art may be observed from the days of the Amores, and it by no means halts with the Metamorphoses. In the later works there are brilliantly cut jewels such as the story of Chiron (Fasti 5. 379–414).<sup>3</sup> Conciseness and concentration, the art of reducing a story to its quintessence, often found in the Metamorphoses, rises here to a new level.

The literary technique of the poems of exile moves between two poles: the elegiac epistle, already formed by Ovid in the Heroides, and the challenge to apply now to his own life the 'poetry of separation' which previously had been deployed on mythical themes. This was a cruel irony of fate, though it meant a great gain for literature. Techniques which had been practiced by Ovid since his youth, such as the rhetorical art of poetic speech, of ethos and pathos, of vivid and emotion-laden description of places and persons, even of the elegant refinement of one and the same theme with the aid of endless variations, now became a medium of Roman personal poetry. Ovid, who from early days had never been at a loss for words when writing on subjects that had little to do with him, now was obliged in his own case to test and experience the power and impotence of the poet's word. The literary refinement of his later works is often underestimated, since Ovid, as obliged by the epistolary style and the rhetorical appeal to the emotions, harps on the artlessness of these works and the decline in his powers.

<sup>1</sup> Reinh. SCHMIDT, Die Übergangstechnik in den Metamorphosen des Ovid, diss. Breslau 1938.

<sup>2</sup> W. QUIRIN, Die Kunst Ovids in der Darstellung des Verwandlungsaktes, diss. Gießen 1930.

<sup>3</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT, Zur Funktion der Tempora in Ovids elegischer Erzählung (fasti 5. 379–414), in: M. VON ALBRECHT, E. ZINN, eds., Ovid, Darmstadt 1968, 451–467.

Language and Style

Ovid's vocabulary appears to be that of everyday, and superficially his language runs smoothly. But we discover only on closer inspection how much power of invention is behind such 'naturalness'. There are numerous neologisms, for example, nouns in -men, adjectives in -fer and -ger.

The treatment of the hexameter and of the elegiac couplet shows equal virtuosity. The wealth of dactyls may be emphasized, along with the dancing rhythm, whose effect is enhanced by hyperbata, antitheses, and the frequent coincidence of sentence and verse end. Dissyllabic or trisyllabic words are normal at the end of the hexameter, and dissyllables at the end of the pentameter. The rare exceptions are justified by tradition or content, as with the weighty address to the coming generations (posteritas, trist. 4. 10. 2).

In syntax there is a striking preference for parentheses,<sup>1</sup> a device interrupting the normal flow of the sentence, and in this way opening possibilities for 'polyphonic' speech. Subjective remarks may be objectively confirmed: visa dea est movisse suas—et moverat—aras, 'the goddess seemed to move, nay, moved her altar' (met. 9. 782). Conversely, incredible elements of myth may be parenthetically called in question: si credere dignum est (3. 311). Here, with a wink, the author takes the enlightened reader into his confidence. Ovid likes to repeat the same word under ever changing aspects: the subjective cry (fer opem! dixere, 'help! they cried') is closely followed by the objective confirmation (tulitque/muneris auctor opem, 'and he who gave their gift did bring them aid') and the tragically ironic qualification (si miro perdere more/ferre vocatur opem, 'if you call it aid to ruin them by a miracle' (met. 13. 669–671). Such shifts in perspective lend spatial depth to the scene and sharp contours to the characters.

<sup>1</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1964.

Both incidental narrators and the author himself accompany their story, at times with intellectually detached satisfaction, and at other times with strong sympathy, and both attitudes carry with them their preferred stylistic methods. There is a long way to go to the pervasive pathos of Lucan, though Ovid already knows the excited address to his protagonist, comparable to the warning cry of a naive spectator in the theater (3. 432–436). On the other hand he may dampen an excess of feeling by a chilling antithesis. Thus he allows Orpheus, after he has bewailed his wife long enough in the world above, to try his luck with the underworld (10. 11–13). When Phaethon sets fire to the world, the sun god veils his face in mourning, but the fires give light instead, and so even this misfortune has its better side (2. 330–332). Antithesis serves as a vessel for Ovid's typical switch from pathos to irony.

Ovid is one of the most brilliant narrators known to world literature; he employs his linguistic tools with careful calculation. He often begins his description with a bird's eye view. The landscape is surveyed as a whole (present tense), and then the camera concentrates on an individual point. A character may be seen in one of his normal activities (imperfect). Then a particular moment is selected (historic present), the sequence of actions proceeds, until a decisive event occurs (historic perfect). Before that happens, suspense may be increased by retarding devices, such as a simile or a monologue. To enhance an effect of surprise, the decisive turn in the story may appear in a subordinate clause, with use of cum inversum or even nisi. Generally, after the main event, the pace of the narrative accelerates, matching the resolution of suspense in the reader's mind. By purposefully reserving particular artistic means for climactic points, Ovid attains a strong effect of contrasting relief. In this respect his art may be compared with that of Livy.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Ovid is quite precise in his statements about poetry. Its sources of inspiration are different in the case of each genre.

As an elegist Ovid continues the tradition of poetry as courtship (i.e. as a means to win a lady's love). He is wounded and conquered by Amor, and it is Amor who dictates his poems. Here inspiration comes from the gods of love and the lady. If he grants his beloved fame, as is appropriate for an elegist, this may lead to a situation in which others value her equally, and in which he loses her: ingenio prostitit illa meo, 'my genius had made her common' (am. 3. 12. 8). In this way, Ovid presses his topoi home remorselessly to their conclusion.

At the beginning of the last book of the Amores the poet is standing, like Hercules, at the crossroads. Once again he chooses elegy, though promising later to devote himself to tragedy (am. 3. 1). In the final poem (3. 15. 17–18) Dionysus calls him to higher tasks, meaning to his tragedy Medea. The inspiring god is chosen in conformity to the new genre.

The Art of Love springs from practical experience (usus: ars 1. 29). Only Venus is invoked at the beginning (ars 1. 30: cf. 3. 43–58; 769–770). As expected in a didactic poem, she is the goddess appropriate to the subject matter.<sup>1</sup> A didactic writer wants to be believable, and for this reason Ovid at the beginning expressly skips the specifically poetic deities, such as Apollo and the Muses (ars 1. 25–28). At the end our author's knowledge and experience throw even the Delphic oracle into the shade (ars 3. 789–790). Within the books, however, the situation is somewhat different. As soon as the students are to be taught self-knowledge, the Delphic god, as appropriate, makes his appearance (2. 493–510). And in wishing to be read by girls, Ovid appeals to Apollo, Bacchus, and the Muses (ars 3. 347–348)—rightly so, for here he is concerned with literature as literature.

Divinity dwells in poets: this is certainly one reason why girls should be kind to them (ars 3. 547–550). But Ovid affirms his belief in the divinity of poetic talent—and not only his own—even in a more serious context (trist. 4. 10. 41–42).<sup>2</sup>

Inspiration for the Metamorphoses is requested, as in the Ars, from the authorities appropriate to the theme (met. 1. 2), that is, from the gods, who have produced those metamorphoses. The Muses make their appearance later, and it cannot be a coincidence that they do this in the closing books of the three pentads. In the 5th book they appear as participants in the action and narrators. In the 10th book Orpheus, son of a Muse, appropriately calls, at the beginning of his song, upon his divine mother. Finally in the 15th book, before his weighty conclusion, the poet addresses himself solemnly to the Muses.

<sup>1</sup> On the link between experience and Venus cf. also Tib. 1. 8. 3–4.

<sup>2</sup> Est deus in nobis, agitante calescimus illo (fasti 6. 5); cf. Pont. 3. 4. 93–94; at fasti 6. 251–256 the epiphany of the divinity is replaced by an inner revelation.

Ovid was thoroughly convinced of the poet's immortality already in the Amores (1. 15; 3. 15). The epilogue of the Metamorphoses<sup>1</sup> allows that same conclusion to be drawn from the work. The self-confidence of the elegist (cf. Prop. 3. 2) is raised to a cosmic dimension. At the same time the poet is aware that he is protected against human desire to destroy (ferrum) and 'Jupiter's anger'. By this, only the anger of the princes can be meant. Ovid is entitled to the support of a worldwide company of readers.

From here the transition is made without obstacle to the affirmation of ingenium in the poems of exile, especially evident in Ovid's 'testament' to the young poetess Perilla (trist. 3. 7).<sup>2</sup> The imperishable nature of intellectual gifts and values was already preferred to transitory goods in the Art of Love (2. 111–112) and now wins an immediacy of application for the banished poet: en ego, cum caream patria vobisque domoque, / raptaque sint, adimi quae potuere mihi, / ingenio tamen ipse meo comitorque fruorque: / Caesar in hoc potuit iuris habere nihil, 'behold me, deprived of native land, of you and my home, reft of all that could be taken from me; my mind (talent) is nevertheless my comrade and my joy; over this Caesar could have no right' (trist. 3. 7. 45–48). Much though he may have lost, the poet remains in possession of his talent, which is beyond the scope of the ruler's power. Even a violent death, Ovid continues, cannot annihilate the poet, for he lives on in fame among his readers.

With this, in the poems of exile a further aspect gains in significance: poetry as consolation for the poet.<sup>3</sup> In his poetic autobiography (trist. 4. 10. 115–122) the Muse is addressed as guide and companion, consoler and healer. Does this make poetry a way to the inner man? By nature Ovid was expansive and outgoing. In his banishment his exchange of letters with his kinsfolk and his friends was for him an elixir of life. He was sustained by his awareness of his wide audience. Thanks expressed to the well-disposed reader and address to posterity are characteristic features at the birth of poetry written in exile and of poetic autobiography. Just like Livy, Ovid at times conveys to his reader the impression that he is witnessing the author writing, and even looking over his shoulder. But he can also produce a sense of distance. Ovid is the poet of ingenium. Reference to poetic inspiration is found more frequently on his lips than on those of any other ancient poet.

<sup>1</sup> Echoing Hor. carm. 3. 30 and Prop. 3. 2.

<sup>2</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 219–230.

<sup>3</sup> W. STROH 1981, esp. 2644–2647.

Ideas II

In all the literary genres which he practiced, Ovid's scope is wide. The Amores reflect all conceivable situations of love from the subjective angle, and the Ars amatoria and Remedia confer on them didactic system. In the Heroides Ovid created an encyclopedia of the feminine heart, and with the Metamorphoses one of myths of transformation. The Fasti aim to measure the passage of the Roman year, the Tristia and Epistulae ex Ponto exhaust the theme of exile. The Ibis is a curriculum of cursing.

Ovid's claim to universality bears typically Roman features and is reminiscent of the many-sided pioneers of old Latin poetry. The Hellenistic idea of Homer's universal knowledge, and the encyclopedic achievement of Varro made possible now at Rome the appearance of poetae docti such as Virgil and Ovid. It is not only in the first and last books of the Metamorphoses that the poets' mythological picture of the world coexists with the scientific perspective of the philosophers and with the state religion. These three complementary views<sup>1</sup> permeate each other throughout the entire work. Even in the mythical portions, the reader is continually concerned with understanding nature. Man produces his own environment, and from him, through metamorphoses, spring stones, plants, and animals. This is a Darwinism in reverse, recalling Plato (Tim. 91d-92c) and Posidonius.<sup>2</sup> Ovid expressly appeals (met. 15) to Pythagoras, though he colors his alleged doctrines with Platonic and Stoic ideas and enlivens them with observations drawn from ancient science, possibly under the influence of Sotion. Myth passes imperceptibly even into political history. Thebes, Athens, Troy are for Ovid stages on the way towards the universal city of Rome. He was aided in this concept by the outlook of Hellenistic universal history. It is a logical consequence that Augustus appears as a Jupiter on earth. Only an author as late as Augustine would give up myth and imperium as independent approaches to the understanding of the universe, and even then without lasting impact.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Varro's theologia tripertita apud Aug. civ. 6. 5.

<sup>2</sup> H. DÖRRIE, Wandlung und Dauer. Ovid und Poseidonios' Lehre von der Substanz, AU 4, 2, 1959, 95-116.

The typically Roman desire to master whole areas of material is linked in Ovid with a further principle, peculiar to him in a special degree and conferring on his work both boundaries and depth: Eros. Ovid began as a love poet, and still on his epitaph describes himself as tenerorum lusor amorum, 'playful poet of tender love' (trist. 3. 3. 73; cf. 4. 10. 1). Even in the Metamorphoses and Fasti he remains unrepentantly dedicated to Eros. The theme of transformation has itself erotic elements: the polarity of Eros and Thanatos lurks behind the comings and goings of existence. It is true that in the Metamorphoses and Heroides, by contrast with the Art of Love, personal links are more strongly emphasized. From a game, love becomes a destiny. In his poems from exile Ovid raises a memorial to his wife. The wealth of eulogy gains in life and conviction through an admixture of mild reproof, without losing credibility.

Along with love, friendship conditions the poet's life. Investigation of prosopography has been able in our day to lend a new voice to the letters from exile.

A further basic theme, spanning Ovid's entire work, is the separation of the individual from his ambience. The irony of fate decreed that after handling this problem in all its aspects in the Heroides, in his declining years he had to experience its truth in his own person. The line of communication, a necessity for the poet of the capital, was violently broken. This led to thoughts and feelings which seem to anticipate the modern world, and to make Ovid the secular patron saint of all authors who have written in exile.

Ovid's particular situation produced an unexpected melange of thoughts rooted in his time and others pointing to the future. A treatment of myth and religion in Ovid demands therefore subtle distinctions. Certainly myths were taken from their ritual context and radically anthropomorphized, but not divorced wholly from their original significance. Thus the poet enabled the world of ancient myth to be welcomed in other cultures, quite independently of the acceptance of their religious presuppositions. The deities of literature became the expression of a belief in genius and art. Ovid felt himself undisguisedly as dependent upon the emperor, and could therefore in the pagan sense quite correctly describe him as a god. He did not question monarchy, and to this extent accepted its religious bases. But quite certainly he was neither a passionate admirer of Augustus nor a hero of the resistance. His sympathy for Germanicus rings true, but generally one should not look in him for personal political statements of faith where the cosmological context (Metamorphoses) or a rhetorical aim of securing his recall (Tristia) sets the tone for the treatment of imperial themes. Warmer religious tones may be detected in relation to the gods of the mysteries. Ovid's support for the worship of Isis found an echo in the hearts of many of his women readers, though running contrary to Augustus' own purposes. A profound and personal experience of the divine, as imparted by the mystery cults, may be regarded as a parallel to Ovid's poetic understanding of the divine as acting within a creative human mind: est deus in nobis ('there is a god in us').

Transmission<sup>1</sup>

The love poems enjoy the best transmission. Important manuscripts are Parisinus Lat. ('Regius') 7311 (R; 9th–10th century) and Berolinensis Hamiltonianus 471 (Y; 10th–11th century: ars, rem., am.).

For the Amores in addition must be mentioned Parisinus Lat. ('Puteaneus') 8242 (P; 9th–10th century; epist., am.) and Sangallensis 864 (S; 11th century). The recentiores have their own value as witnesses. For the Amores, RP and S comprise a single group.

For the Ars must be further noted: Londiniensis Mus. Brit. Add. 14 086 (A; 11th–12th century), Sangallensis 821 (Sa; 11th century) and Oxoniensis Bodleianus Auct. F. 4. 32 (O; 9th century; contains book 1). In this case, RSa and O belong together.

For the Remedia must also be considered: Etonensis 150. Bl. 6. 5 (E; 11th century), Parisinus Lat. ('Puteaneus') 8460 (K; 12th century). R and EK have a common origin.

epist.: The Puteaneus (P) is preeminent. The entire transmission has been studied by H. Dörrie (see his edition). The Sappho letter is independently transmitted.

met.: The text must be constituted eclectically. Apart from some older fragments, it rests chiefly on eight manuscripts: Marcianus Florentinus 225 (M; end of 11th century; breaks off after 14. 830: good, but often overvalued); Neapolitanus Bibl. Nat. IV F. 3 (N; 11th–12th century; book 15: 14th century., related to M); Vaticanus Urbinas 341 (U; 11th–12th century);

<sup>1</sup> R. J. TARRANT, in: REYNOLDS, Texts 257–286.

Vaticanus Palatinus Lat. 1669 (E; early 12th century; often close to U); Marcianus Florentinus 223 (F; 11th–12th century; stands between MN and EU); Laurentianus 36. 12 (L; 11th–12th century; related to F and replaces F where this is lacunose); Parisinus Lat. 8001 (P; 12th century; often agrees with F; a particularly important witness for book 15); Vaticanus Lat. 5859 (W; A.D. 1275; related to M, especially useful for book 15). The question of double recensions is unsolved.<sup>1</sup> fast.:<sup>2</sup> At least two strands of transmission go back to antiquity. A closely-knit group is formed by: Bruxellensis (Gemblacensis, Zulichemianus) 5369–5373 (G; 11th–12th century); Bodleianus (Mazarinianus) auct. F. 4, 25 (M; 15th century); Fragmentum Ilfeldense (I; 11th–12th century). From this group the most clearly divergent is Vaticanus Reginensis (sive Petavianus) 1709 (A; 10th century). Between A and GMI stand: Vaticanus Lat. (Ursinianus) 3262 (U; 11th century); Monacensis Lat. (Mallersdorffianus) 8122 (D; 12th century).

trist.: Laurentianus, olim Marcianus, 223 (L or M; 11th century) and two further classes.

Pont.: Hamburgensis, scrin. 52 F. (A; 9th century) and a second class.

Ib.: The archetype is reconstructed from eight manuscripts. Preference is given to the Galeanus 213, nunc Collegii Sanctae Trinitatis apud Cantabrigienses 1335 O. 7. 7 (G; early 13th century) and the Turonensis 879 (T; ca. A.D. 1200).

Hal.: Vindobonensis 277 (A; 9th century).

Influence<sup>3</sup>

Criticism lost no time in making itself heard: Ovid did not understand how to stop in good time (Sen. contr. 9. 5. 17), and he might have achieved more if he had mastered his ingenium rather than giving way to it (Quint. inst. 10. 198). In spite of this, already in his own lifetime he was the most read poet. His literary influence on subsequent authors—Seneca, Lucan, Statius, Juvenal, Apuleius, Claudian—is considerable. Even Dante (d. 1321) sets Ovid as a matter of course at the side of the greatest writers: Homer, Horace, Virgil. He was read not simply on aesthetic grounds, but also on scientific, though this was a line of his influence which today is little noted. It reaches from Lucan into the scientific literature of the twelfth and 13th centuries, and even into the Romantic Period. As late as 1970, in his Kosmogonia for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, K. Penderecki used texts taken from Ovid.

<sup>1</sup> S. MENDNER, Der Text der Metamorphosen Ovids, diss. Köln 1939; K. DURSTELER, Die Doppelfassungen in Ovids Metamorphosen, Hamburg 1940; I. MARAHRENS, Angefochtene Verse und Versgruppen in den Metamorphosen, diss. Heidelberg 1971, is not concerned with the problem of double recension.

<sup>2</sup> On the establishment of a text of the Fasti see also H. LE BONNIEC 1989, 33–60.

<sup>3</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom, passim; H. ANTON, Der Raub der Proserpina. Literarische Traditionen eines erotischen Sinnbildes und mythischen Symbols, Heidelberg 1967; M. BELLER, Philemon und Baucis in der europäischen Literatur. Stoffgeschichte und Analyse, Heidelberg 1967; W. BREWER, Ovid's Metamorphoses in European Culture, Boston 1933; M. BUONOCORE, Aetas Ovidiana. La fortuna di Ovidio nei codici della Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Sulmona 1994; A. DINTER, Der Pygmalion-Stoff in der europäischen Literatur. Rezeptionsgeschichte einer Ovid-Fabel, Heidelberg 1979;

The poetry of Ovid's exile would inspire poets who had made similar experiences. This was the case with Ermoldus Nigellus, for example, soon after Charlemagne's death.

It was the love poems which indirectly inspired the development of courtly love in the Middle Ages,<sup>1</sup> and perhaps the so-called 'Aubade' was derived from Amores 1. 13. Towards the end of the 11th century, an aetas Ovidiana began. Hildebert of Lavardin (d. 1133) and Baldricus (Baudri) of Bourgueil (d. 1130) wrote verses in succession to Ovid. 'Comedies' were popular, which both in matter and meter were to some extent dependent on Ovid. It was from Ovid that the rhythmic poetry of the vagantes (wandering poets) took its cue. The so-called archipoeta is an illustration. The strophes of the goliards often culminate in a quotation from Ovid. Popular legends clustered around

---

H. DÖRRIE 1968; I. GALLO, L. NICASTRI, eds., Aetates Ovidianae. Lettori di Ovidio dall'Antichità al Rinascimento, Napoli 1995; I. GLIER, Artes amandi. Untersuchungen zu Geschichte, Überlieferung und Typologie der deutschen Minnereden, München 1971; C. MARTINDALE, Ovid Renewed. Ovidian Influences on Literature and Art from the Middle Ages to the Twentieth Century, Cambridge 1988; G. MAY, D'Ovide à Racine, Paris 1949; M. MOOG-GRÜNEWALD, Metamorphosen der Metamorphosen. Rezeptionsarten der ovidischen Verwandlungsgeschichten in Italien und Frankreich im 16. und 17. Jh., Heidelberg 1979; F. MUNARI, Ovid im Mittelalter, Zürich 1960; Ovide en France dans la Renaissance. Avant-propos de H. LAMARQUE, G. SOUBEILLE, Toulouse 1981; E. K. RAND, Ovid and his Influence, Boston 1925, repr. 1963; F. SCHMITT-V. MÜHLENFELS, Pyramus und Thisbe. Rezeptionstypen eines Ovidischen Stoffes in Literatur, Kunst und Musik, Heidelberg 1972; K. STACKMANN, Ovid im deutschen Mittelalter, Arcadia 1, 1966, 231–254; W. STROH 1969; S. VIARRE, La survie d'Ovide dans la littérature scientifique des XII<sup>e</sup> et XIII<sup>e</sup> siècles, Poitiers 1966; H. WALTER, H.-J. HORN, eds., Die Rezeption der Metamorphosen des Ovid in der Neuzeit: Der antike Mythos in Text und Bild, Berlin 1995; L. P. WILKINSON 1955, 366–444; see also at the end of the section under Bibliography.

<sup>1</sup> Ovid's love poetry influenced e.g. John of Salisbury, William of Saint Thierry, Gottfried of Strasbourg, and Brunetto Latini.

the poet, who was looked upon as a 'magician' and even 'bishop'. In many florilegia, and even in the Speculum Mundi by Vincent of Beauvais (d. 1264), he was the author most often cited. The Roman de la rose (13th century) is larded with reminiscences of Ovid. In the 11th to 13th centuries, he became one of the most important authors read in school. Didactic introductions (accessus) were composed, even to the Ars amatoria, which was sometimes earnestly conned as a textbook, and sometimes roundly criticized. About 1160 the poem was translated by Chrestien de Troyes. The surviving French adaptations begin with Maître Elie. Even the Remedia amoris were taken in all seriousness as a doctor's prescription. Luther was still to test them out as a young monk—though without success. Parted lovers already in the days of Abelard (d. 1142) and Héloïse appeal to the poet who had elevated such partings to the theme of many of his poems.

At times Ovid's zealous readers, on reaching maturer years would demonstrate their commitment to Christianity either by damning the erotic poet in retrospect or by finding hidden in his poems a deeper moral sense. In the early 14th century the anonymous Ovide moralisé saw the light in France. In conjunction with Ovid, Allegoriae and Moralia were composed. Petrarch's friend Pierre Berçuire (Berçoire, Berchorius, d. 1362) incorporated Ovid into the last book of his Reductorium morale. These works are alien to modern taste, but in their day they contributed from the theoretical viewpoint to the justification of poetry and myth, and in school instruction helped to control trends hostile to classical culture.

The still surviving translations into Greek, by Maximus Planudes (end of 13th century) of the Heroides and Metamorphoses also date from the aetas Ovidiana. The oldest translation of the Metamorphoses into a modern language (1210, but reissued as late as 1545) was made by the German Albrecht von Halberstadt. He was followed by Boner (1545) and Spreng (1571), the latter in verse. In 1480, Caxton translated Berçuire's paraphrase into English. Golding's adaptation (1567, reprinted in London 1961) was to be used by Shakespeare as a source. In French—if an unpublished translation of about 1350 into verse is ignored—the Metamorphoses appeared in 1484, and then again from about 1533 (books 1 and 2 by Marot, and soon afterwards the whole epic by Habert). The minor works followed between 1500 and 1509. The Heroides were put into English in 1567 by Turberville, as well as the Tristia in 1572 by Churchyard, and the Amores in 1597 by no lesser a poet than Christopher Marlowe.

From the early Renaissance, not only Boccaccio (d. 1375) but also Petrarch (d. 1374) may be mentioned as Ovid's admirers. Because of the punning laurus—Laura, Petrarch found the story of Daphne especially to his taste. His Trionfo d'Amore was inspired by am. 1. 2. Later he came to condemn the Ars amatoria. Chaucer (d. 1400) notably in his early works is an Ovidian to a superlative degree. George Chapman in his neo-Platonic poem (Ovid's Banquet of Sense, 1595) imagined Ovid watching Julia bathe and play the lute. Du Bellay (d. 1560) regarded himself as the 'French Ovid' and modelled his Regrets on the Tristia. With the advent of humanism, the genre represented by the Heroides received new impetus.<sup>1</sup> Spenser (d. 1599) in his allegorical descriptions of places drew inspiration from Ovid (Faerie Queene 1. 1. 8–9). Maxims of practical wisdom from the poet are often cited by Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592).

The Metamorphoses handed down a rich treasury of myth to the Middle Ages and the modern world, providing fruitful stimulus to literature, art, and music to a degree defying the cataloguer. It was precisely the greatest authors—Shakespeare, Milton,<sup>2</sup> Goethe,<sup>3</sup> Pushkin<sup>4</sup>—who felt spontaneously attracted to Ovid. Denmark's immortal Holberg (d. 1754) regarded his favorite Ovid as a born poet; he praised the natural fluency of his language, the shifts from seriousness to humor, the marriage of sublimity and simplicity as well as Ovid's closeness to music.<sup>5</sup> The Netherlands' most important poet, Vondel (d. 1679), made the Metamorphoses, through his translation, an integral part of the literature of his country, and in his preface he used Ovid's myths to illustrate the nature of poetry. If Ezra Pound (d. 1972) regarded the writings of Confucius and Ovid's Metamorphoses as the only reliable

<sup>1</sup> Apart from H. DÖRRIE, 1968, see also W. SCHUBERT, Quid dolet haec? Zur Sappho-Gestalt in Ovids Heroiden and in Christine Brückners Ungehaltenen Reden ungehaltener Frauen, A&A 31, 1985, 76–96; Konrad Müller kindly drew my attention to the following title not mentioned in DÖRRIE: Joh. Barzaeus (d. 1660), Heroum Helvetiorum epistolae, Friburgi Helvetiorum 1657; an especially famous example of the genre is Pope's early poem Eloisa to Abelard.

<sup>2</sup> On Shakespeare and Milton: L. P. WILKINSON 1955, 410–438.

<sup>3</sup> In opposition to Herder, who measured Ovid by the standard of what was natural and national, Goethe defended Ovid's poetic art and the world of the Metamorphoses ('What a remarkable individual produces is after all also nature,' Dichtung und Wahrheit 2, 10; WA 1, 27, 319–320).

<sup>4</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 207–278; 433–469; 613–616; 627–632; on Vondel ibid. 179–203.

<sup>5</sup> Holberg's brilliant Latin (!) original of his 'Life's letters' (1742–43) in: L. Holbergs Tre Levnetsbreve, ed. A. KRAGELUND, vol. 2, Copenhagen 1965, esp. 438–442.

guides in the area of religion,<sup>1</sup> this may be owing to the Roman poet's freedom from dogma. In fact it was this that made possible the universal acceptance of Greek myth on the purely human level.

In many cases here the influence of Ovid mingles with that of handbooks partly derived from the Metamorphoses, such as Boccaccio's (d. 1375) Genealogiae deorum gentilium libri or Natalis Comes' Mythologiae libri (Patavii 1616).<sup>2</sup> Basic handbooks meant for painters likewise depended on Ovid. Illustrations to the poet were circulated in print and produced a European vulgate of mythology for the artist. Many book illustrators sought inspiration in the Metamorphoses, and in turn they inspired greater artists. Durer's Death of Orpheus, for example, was modelled on an Italian print. They also provided rich material for the decoration of palaces with paintings, tapestries, and sculptures. Myths such as Pygmalion, Daphne, Pyramus and Thisbe, Philemon and Baucis enjoyed their own later life. The presence of Ovidian themes in the work of some of the greatest masters, such as Titian or Rubens, can be no more than mentioned here. Nevertheless, the choice of theme and its interpretation are at times quite characteristic for the artist in question. Elsheimer, for example (d. 1610), painted a hospitable interior with Philemon and Baucis. Pieter Brueghel the Elder (d. 1569) set Daedalus and Icarus over a detailed landscape, while for Rembrandt (d. 1669) the Rape of Proserpina was a victory of darkness. Tiepolo (d. 1770) painted an Apotheosis of Aeneas bathed in light, Corot depicted Byblis in a landscape with trees, Burne-Jones (d. 1898) a vicious Circe.

Ovid's influence reached a high point in eighteenth-century England, where e.g. an illustrated Ovid in English verse appeared in 1717, as a collective enterprise of engravers and poets, the latter including Dryden. The fifteen book illustrations of the work marked the culmination of a tradition of engraving which in the last analysis may be traced back to the Italian Renaissance.

The fascination which Ovid has held for sculptors ever since Bernini's Daphne and Apollo continues unabated. It was especially about the turn of the 19th and 20th centuries that the simultaneous discovery was made of two Ovidian themes: Eros and transformation. Rodin, whose art shakes the bars dividing time and space, revealed himself as spiritually akin to the poet<sup>1</sup> in more than his Ovidian Metamorphosis. Maillol and Picasso provided illustrations for the Ars amatoria. Dali both painted and wrote poetry on the theme of Narcissus. Mention must also be made of Manfred Henninger's Mythen um Orpheus,<sup>2</sup> Hermann Finsterlin's Verwandlungen des Zeus,<sup>3</sup> and of Mac Zimmermann's Daphne und Apoll.<sup>4</sup> Every day sees new pictures inspired by Ovid.

<sup>1</sup> Letter to Harriet Monroe, July 16, 1922; W. STROH 1969, 130.

<sup>2</sup> S. now B. HEGE, Boccaccios Apologie der heidnischen Dichtung in den Genealogie [= -ae] deorum gentilium, diss. Heidelberg 1996.

Ovid, poetarum ingeniosissimus (Seneca nat. 3. 27. 13), paved the way for the modern notion of genius. The exiled poet himself became—especially with the advent of the Romantics<sup>5</sup>—a quasi-mythical figure with whom authors could identify who felt themselves isolated from their societies. It was no coincidence that poets such as Byron and Shelley, Pushkin and Grillparzer felt a particular closeness to him. The same century witnessed Delacroix's (d. 1863) Ovid in Exile on the Black Sea and Ovid among the Barbarians. Right down to our own day Ovid as a person has inspired lyrists like Geoffrey Hill and C. H. Sisson<sup>6</sup> and novelists such as Vintila Horia,<sup>7</sup> Eckart von Naso,<sup>8</sup> Christoph Ransmayr,<sup>9</sup> and Cees Nooteboom.<sup>10</sup> In association with the alienation of men from their ambience, the notion of their transformation into creatures has preoccupied writers of the 20th century. Examples are Kafka's Verwandlung and Le metamorfosi of Lalla Romano (Torino 1967). The authors of the fin de siècle rediscovered Ovid as an artist (D'Annunzio, Swinburne); later Joyce, Bernard Shaw, and T. S. Eliot significantly dwelt on figures like Daedalus, Pygmalion, and Tiresias. Italo Calvino masterly assessed a typical quality of Ovid's art: his 'light hand.'<sup>11</sup>

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 517–568.

<sup>2</sup> Ovid, Metamorphosen. Buch 10: Mythen um Orpheus. Illustriert von M. Henninger, übers. von E. ZINN, mit einer Einleitung von K. KERÉNYI, Heidenheim 1969.

<sup>3</sup> Verwandlungen des Zeus. Erotische Miniaturen, Stuttgart 1970.

<sup>4</sup> Mac Zimmermann, Ölbilder, Zeichnungen, Graphik. Katalog zur Ausstellung im Kulturhaus, Wiesloch 1980; see now also: Helga Ruppert-Tribian, Narcissus und Echo, Passau 1989; Christian Bartholl, Ikarus. Neun Flugdrachen, Hamburg 1989.

<sup>5</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 433–469.

<sup>6</sup> Geoffrey Hill, Ovid in the Third Reich 1968; C. H. Sisson, Metamorphosis 1968.

<sup>7</sup> Dieu est né en exil. Journal d'Ovide à Tomes. Roman. Préface de Daniel-Rops, Paris 1960.

<sup>8</sup> Liebe war sein Schicksal. Roman um Ovid, Hamburg 1958.

<sup>9</sup> Die letzte Welt, Nördlingen 1988. Furthermore we should mention Luca Desiato's novel Sulle rive del Mar Nero, Milano 1992, and Hartmut Lange's play Staschek oder das Leben des Ovid.

<sup>10</sup> Het volgende verhaal (1991).

<sup>11</sup> I. CALVINO, 'Leggerezza', in: Lezioni americane, Milano 1993, 7–35.

The idea of metamorphosis<sup>1</sup> proved fruitful for Goethe's philosophy of nature (Die Metamorphose der Pflanzen; Die Metamorphose der Tiere) and for German poetry down to Rilke. It was a notion linked with the idea of evolution. A partly autobiographical novel with Ovidian undertones by the Dutch poet Louis Couperus was called 'Metamorphose' (1897). Metamorphoses in this way also becomes an appropriate title for musical pieces based on variation and development.<sup>2</sup> Britten thinks expressly of Ovidian figures in his Six Metamorphoses after Ovid for oboe solo (op. 49), London 1952. Ovid's influence on music<sup>3</sup> had begun with the opera Dafne (Florence 1594) by O. Rinuccini, with music by Peri and Caccini. It passed then to Monteverdi and Gluck and eventually to Richard Strauss. Thus in a special manner, it reaches beyond the musical theater, so congenial to the poet, into the sphere of chamber music. When will the Metamorphoses be discovered by the cinema?

This wide-ranging influence, appearing to burst the bounds of the arts, conforms to the quality of Ovid's imagination, uniting musical movement with quasi sculptural palpability.

Editions: Opera omnia: FRANCISCUS PUTEOLANUS, Bononiae 1471. * Io. ANDREAS, bishop of Aleria, Romae 1471-1472. * N. HEINSIUS, Amstelodami 1652; 2nd ed. 1658-1661. * R. EHWALD, F. LEVY (= LENZ), 3 vols., Lipsiae 1888-1924. * A. PALMER, G. M. EDWARDS, G. A. DAVIES, S. G. OWEN, A. E. HOUSMAN, J. P. POSTGATE, in: J. P. POSTGATE, ed., Corpus poetarum Latinorum 1, Londini 1894; separate: Londini 1898. * G. SHOWERMAN, rev. by G. P. GOOLD (TTrN), 6 vols., Cambridge, Mass. 1977-1989. * am., med., ars, rem.: E. J. KENNEY, Oxonii 1961, corr. repr. 1965; 2nd ed. 1994. * am.: P. BRANDT (TC), Lipsiae 1911. * F. LENZ (TTrN), Berlin 1965. * J. C. McKEOWN, vol. 1 (T, prol.) Liverpool 1987; 2 (C on book 1) 1989. * A. RAMÍREZ DE VERGER, F. SOCAS (TTrN), Madrid 1991. * M. VON ALBRECHT (TTrN), Stuttgart (forthcoming). * am. 1: J. BARSBY (TTrC), Oxford

<sup>1</sup> C. HESELHAUS, Metamorphose-Dichtungen und Metamorphosen-Anschauungen, Euphorion 47, 1953, 121-146; E. ZINN, R. M. RILKE und die Antike, A&A 3, 1948, 201-250; s. now: E. ZINN, Viva Vox, Frankfurt 1994, 315-377; id., Ovids Arion. Eine Übertragung des jungen Rilke, ibid. 379-394.

<sup>2</sup> Richard Strauss composed (1945) Metamorphosen for 23 unaccompanied string instruments, and Georg von ALBRECHT Metamorphosen for solo violin (1962).

<sup>3</sup> J. DRAHEIM 211-214; 259-261. DRAHEIM seems to take not much account of operas, but cf. L. P. WILKINSON 1955, 405; F. SCHMITT-VON MÜHLENFELS 1972, and see here the note at the beginning of this section; see also W. SCHUBERT, Musik und Dichtung: R. Strauss/J. Gregor: Daphne, in: M. VON ALBRECHT, W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik und Dichtung, FS V. Pöschl, Frankfurt 1990, 375-403.

1973. * am. 2: J. BOOTH (TTrC), Warminster 1991. * ars: P. BRANDT (TC), Leipzig 1902. * F. W. LENZ (TTrN), Berlin 1969. * N. HOLZBERG (TTr), München 1985. * E. PIANEZZOLA, G. BALDO, L. CRISTANTE (TTrC), Milano 1991. * M. VON ALBRECHT (TTrN), Stuttgart 1992. * A. RAMÍREZ DE VERGER, F. SOCAS (TTrN), Madrid 1995. * ars 1: A. S. HOLLIS (TC), Oxford 1977. * med.: G. ROSATI (TTrC), Venezia 1985. * rem.: A. A. R. HENDERSON, Edinburgh 1979. * P. PINOTTI (TC), Bologna 1988. * epist.: H. SEDLMAYER (TN), Wien 1886. * H. DÖRRIE, Berlin 1971. * G. ROSATI (TTr), Milano 1989. * epist. Sapph.: H. DÖRRIE (C and study), München 1975. * fast.: J. G. FRAZER (TTrC), 5 vols., London 1929. * F. BÖMER (TTrC), 2 vols., Heidelberg 1957–1958. * H. LE BONNIEC (TTrN), 2 vols., Catania 1969, Bologna 1970. * E. H. ALTON, D. E. W. WORMELL, E. COURTNEY, Lipsiae 1978. * R. SCHILLING (TTrC), Paris 1992. * met.: R. MERKEL, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1875. * H. MAGNUS, Berlin 1914. * M. HAUPT, R. EHWALD, O. KORN (TC), 2 vols., 1: Zürich 10th ed. 1966, 2: 5th ed. 1966 (corr., bibl. add. by M. VON ALBRECHT). * G. LAFAYE (TTr), 3 vols., Paris 3rd ed. 1961–1963 (rev., corr.). * F. BÖMER (C), 7 vols., Heidelberg 1969–1986. * W. S. ANDERSON, Leipzig 1977, 5th ed. 1991. * M. VON ALBRECHT (TTrN), Stuttgart 1994. * C. ALVAREZ, R. IGLESIAS (TrN), Madrid 1995. * met. 1: A. G. LEE (TN), Cambridge 1953. * met. 2: J. J. MOORE-BLUNT (C), Uithoorn 1977. * met. 8: A. S. HOLLIS (TC), Oxford 1970. * C. TSITSIOU (C, study), diss. Heidelberg 1997 (forthcoming). * trist., Ib., Pont., Hal.: S. G. OWEN (ed. maior), Oxonii 1889; (minor) Oxonii 1915. * trist.: G. LUCK, (TTrC), 2 vols., Heidelberg 1967–1977. * A. D. MELVILLE (TrN), Oxford 1992. * J. B. HALL, Stuttgart 1995. * trist., Pont.: G. LUCK, W. WILLIGE (TTr), Zürich 1963. * trist. 1. 1–4: S. POSCH (interpr.), Innsbruck 1983. * trist. 2: S. G. OWEN (TN), Oxford 1970. * Pont.: J. A. RICHMOND, Leipzig 1990. * Pont. 2: A. PÉREZ VEGA (TTrC), Sevilla 1989. * L. GALASSO (TC), Firenze 1994. * Ib.: A. LA PENNA, Firenze 1957. * J. ANDRÉ (TTrN), Paris 1963. * Ib. with Schol. Ib.: R. ELLIS (TC, ind.), Oxford 1881. * F. W. LENZ, Torino 1944, repr. 1956. ** Spurious Works: Hal.: J. A. RICHMOND (TC), London 1962. * F. CAPPONI (TC), 2 vols., Leiden 1972. * Nux: R. M. PULBROOK (TN), Maynooth 1985. * Cons. Liv.: H. SCHOONHOVEN (TC), Groningen 1992. ** Concordance: R. J. DEFERRARI, M. I. BARRY, M. R. P. MCGUIRE, A Concordance of Ovid, Washington 1939. ** Bibl.: E. MARTINI, Einleitung zu Ovid, Prag 1933. * E. PARATORE, Bibliografia Ovidiana, Sulmona sine anno (probl.). * W. KRAUS, Forschungsbericht AAHG 11, 1958, 129–146; 16, 1963, 1–14; 18, 1965, 193–208. * M. VON ALBRECHT, AAHG 25, 1972, 55–76; 267–290; 26, 1973, 129–150. * O. PASQUALETTI, A. MANZO, Rassegna critica di bibliografia ovidiana, Aevum 47, 1973, 305–317. * J. BARSBY 1978 (s. below). * A. G. ELLIOTT, Ovid's Metamorphoses. A Bibliography 1968–1978, CW 73, 7, 1979–1980, 385–412. * M. L. COLETTI, Rassegna bibliografico-critica degli studi sulle opere amatorie di Ovidio dal 1958 al 1978,

ANRW 2, 31, 4, 1981, 2385–2435. * J. R. C. MARTYN 1981 (s. below). * H. HOFMANN, Ovids Metamorphosen in der Forschung der letzten 30 Jahre (1950–1979), ibid. 2161–2273. * L. BRAUN 1981 (s. below). * W. STROH 1981 (s. below). * J. RICHMOND 1981 (s. below). * H. LE BONNIEC 1989.

F. AHL, Metaformations. Soundplay and Wordplay in Ovid and Other Classical Poets, Ithaca 1985. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Die Parenthese in Ovids Metamorphosen und ihre dichterische Funktion, Hildesheim 1964, 2nd ed. 1994. * M. VON ALBRECHT, E. ZINN, eds., Ovid, Darmstadt 1968. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Ovid, Stuttgart (forthcoming). * E. F. BAEZA ANGULO, La lengua y el estilo de las Epistulae ex Ponto de Ovidio, Sevilla 1992. * L. BARKAN, The Gods Made Flesh. Metamorphosis and the Pursuit of Paganism, New Haven 1986. * J. BARSBY, Ovid, Oxford 1978. * A. BARTENBACH, Motiv- und Erzählstruktur in Ovids Metamorphosen. Das Verhältnis von Rahmen- und Binnenerzählungen im 5., 10. und 15. Buch von Ovids Metamorphosen, Frankfurt 1990. * J. W. BINNS, ed., Ovid, London 1973. * M. BOILLAT, Les Métamorphoses d'Ovide. Thèmes majeurs et problèmes de composition, Berne 1976. * L. BRAUN, Kompositionskunst in Ovids Fasti, ANRW 2, 31, 4, 1981, 2344–2388. * B. CHWALEK, Die Verwandlung des Exils in die elegische Welt. Studien zu den Tristia und Epistulae ex Ponto Ovids, Frankfurt 1995. * J. T. DAVIS, Fictus adulter. Poet as Actor in the Amores, Amsterdam 1989. * S. D'ELIA, Ovidio, Napoli 1959. * M. DIPPEL, Die Darstellung des trojanischen Krieges in Ovids Metamorphosen, Frankfurt 1990. * S. DÖPP, Virgilischer Einfluß im Werk Ovids, diss. München 1968. * S. DÖPP, Werke Ovids. Eine Einführung, München 1992. * O. S. DUE, Changing Forms. Studies in the Metamorphoses of Ovid, Copenhagen 1974. * H. DÖRRIE, Der heroische Brief. Bestandsaufnahme, Geschichte, Kritik einer humanistisch-barocken Literaturgattung, Berlin 1968. * T. EGGERS, Die Darstellung von Naturgottheiten bei Ovid und früheren Dichtern, Paderborn 1984. * K. H. ELLER, Ovid und der Mythos von der Verwandlung, Frankfurt 1982. * P. ESPOSITO, La narrazione inverosimile. Aspetti dell'epica ovidiana, Napoli 1994. * H. B. EVANS, Publica carmina, Lincoln 1983 (on the poetry of Ovid's exile). * J. FABRE-SERRIS, Mythe et poésie dans les Métamorphoses d'Ovide, Paris 1995. * C. FANTAZZI, Roman Ovid, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, vol. 3, Urbino 1987, 173–187. * H. FRÄNKEL, Ovid, a Poet between Two Worlds, Berkeley 1945. * J.-M. FRÉCAUT, L'esprit et l'humour chez Ovide, Grenoble 1972. * J.-M. FRÉCAUT, D. PORTE, eds., Journées ovidiennes de Parménie. Actes du colloque sur Ovide, Bruxelles 1985. * H. FROESCH, Ovid als Dichter des Exils, Bonn 1976. * G. K. GALINSKY, Ovid's Metamorphoses. An Introduction to the Basic Aspects, Berkeley 1975. * G. K. GALINSKY, Was Ovid a Silver Latin Poet?, ICS 14, 1989, 69–88. * B. M. GAULY, Liebeserfahrungen. Zur Rolle des elegischen Ich in Ovids Amores, Frankfurt 1990. * M. GIEBEL, Ovid, Reinbek 1991. * H.-B. GUTHMÜLLER, Beobachtungen zum Aufbau der Metamorphosen

- Ovids, diss. Marburg 1964. * H. HAEGE, Terminologie und Typologie des Verwandlungsvorgangs in den Metamorphosen Ovids, Göppingen 1976. * R. HEINZE, Ovids elegische Erzählung, Ber. Verh. sächs. Akad. Leipzig, 71, Leipzig 1919, repr. in: R.H., Vom Geist des Römertums, Darmstadt 3rd ed. 1960, 308–403. * G. HERBERT-BROWN, Ovid and the Fasti. An Historical Study, Oxford 1994. * N. HERESCU, ed., Ovidiana. Recherches sur Ovide, Paris 1958. * S. HINDS, The Metamorphosis of Persephone. Ovid and the Self-Conscious Muse, Cambridge 1987. * N. HOLZBERG, Ovids erotische Lehrgedichte und die römische Liebeslegie, WS n.s. 15, 1981, 185–204. * H. JACOBSON, Ovid's Heroides, Princeton 1974. * E. J. KENNEY, The Poetry of Ovid's Exile, PCPhS 181, n.s. 11, 1965, 37–49; repr. in: M. VON ALBRECHT, E. ZINN, eds., Ovid, Darmstadt 1968, 513–535. * U. KETTEMANN, Interpretationen zu Satz und Vers in Ovids erotischem Lehrgedicht, Frankfurt 1979. * M. KEUL, Liebe im Widerstreit. Interpretationen zu Ovids Amores und ihrem literarischen Hintergrund, Frankfurt 1989. * P. E. KNOX, Ovid's Metamorphoses and the Traditions of Augustan Poetry, Cambridge 1986. * C. KORTEN, Ovid, Augustus und der Kult der Vestalinnen. Eine religionspolitische These zur Verbannung Ovids, Frankfurt 1992. * W. KRAUS, Ovidius Naso, RE 18, 2, 1942, 1910–1986; rev. in: M. VON ALBRECHT, E. ZINN, eds., Ovid, Darmstadt 1968, 67–166. * M. LABATE, L'arte di farsi amare, Pisa 1984. * G. LAFAYE, Les Métamorphoses d'Ovide et leurs modèles grecs, Paris 1904, repr. 1971 (introd. by M. VON ALBRECHT). * B. LATTA, Die Stellung der Doppelbriefe (Heroides 16–21) im Gesamtwerk Ovids. Studien zur ovidischen Erzählkunst, diss. Marburg 1963. * H. LE BONNIEC, Etudes ovidiennes. Introduction aux Fastes d'Ovide, Frankfurt 1989. * J. LOEHR, Ovids Mehrfacherklärungen in der Tradition aitiologischen Dichtens, Stuttgart 1996. * W. LUDWIG, Struktur und Einheit der Metamorphosen Ovids, Berlin 1965. * S. MACK, Ovid, New Haven 1988. * J. R. C. MARTYN, Naso—Desultor amoris (am. I–III), ANRW 2, 31, 4, 1981, 2436–2459. * J. MAURER, Untersuchungen zur poetischen Technik und den Vorbildern der Ariadne-Epistel Ovids, Frankfurt 1990. * J. F. MILLER, Ovid's Elegiac Festivals. Studies in the Fasti, Frankfurt 1991. * K. MORGAN, Ovid's Art of Imitation. Propertius in the Amores, Leiden 1977. * M. MYEROWITZ, Ovid's Games of Love, Detroit 1985. * B. R. NAGLE, The Poetics of Exile, Brussels 1980. * B. OTIS, Ovid as an Epic Poet, Cambridge 2nd ed. 1970. * A. V. PODOSSINOV, Ovids Dichtung als Quelle für die Geschichte des Schwarzmeergebietes, Konstanz 1987. * D. PORTE, L'étiologie religieuse dans les Fastes d'Ovide, Paris 1985. * H. RAHN, Ovids elegische Epistel, A&A 7, 1958, 105–120. * J. RICHMOND, Doubtful Works Ascribed to Ovid (zu Hal., Nux., cons. Liv.), ANRW 2, 31, 4, 1981, 2744–2783. * G. ROSATI, Narciso e Pigmalione, Firenze 1983. * U. SCHMITZER, Zeitgeschichte in Ovids Metamorphosen, Stuttgart 1990. * W. SCHUBERT, Die Mythologie in den nicht mythologischen Dichtungen

Ovids, Frankfurt 1992. * W. SCHUBERT, ed., Ovid. Werk und Wirkung, 2 vols., Frankfurt (forthcoming). * A. SHARROCK, Seduction and Repetition in Ovid's Ars Amatoria II, Oxford 1994. * C. P. SEGAL, Landscape in Ovid's Metamorphoses. A Study in the Transformations of a Literary Symbol, Wiesbaden 1969. * H. SKULSKY, Metamorphosis. The Mind in Exile, Cambridge, Mass. 1981. * J. SOLODOW, The World of Ovid's Metamorphoses, Chapel Hill 1988. * M. STEUDEL, Die Literaturparodie in Ovids Ars Amatoria, Hildesheim 1992. * W. STROH, Ovid im Urteil der Nachwelt. Eine Testimoniensammlung, Darmstadt 1969. * STROH, Liebeslegie 141–173. * W. STROH, Ovids Liebeskunst und die Ehegesetze des Augustus, Gymnasium 86, 1979, 323–352. * W. STROH, Rhetorik und Erotik. Eine Studie zu Ovids liebesdidaktischen Gedichten, WJA n.s. 5, 1979, 117–132. * W. STROH, Tröstende Musen. Zur literarhistorischen Stellung und Bedeutung von Ovids Exilgedichten, ANRW 2, 31, 4, 1981, 2638–2684. * R. SYME, History in Ovid, Oxford 1978. * J. C. THIBAUT, The Mystery of Ovid's Exile, Berkeley 1964. * U. TODINI, L'altro Omero. Scienza e storia nelle Metamorfosi di Ovidio, Napoli 1992. * C. TOMLINSON, Poetry and Metamorphosis, Cambridge 1982. * H. TRÄNKLE, Elegisches in Ovids Metamorphosen, Hermes 91, 1963, 459–476. * F. VERDUCCI, Ovid's Toyshop of the Heart, Princeton 1983. * S. VIARRE, L'image et la pensée dans les Métamorphoses d'Ovide, Paris 1964. * S. VIARRE, Ovide. Essai de lecture poétique, Paris 1976. * A. VIDEAU-DELIBES, Les Tristes d'Ovide et l'épigramme romaine, Paris 1991. * M. WEBER, Die mythologische Erzählung in Ovids Liebeskunst. Verankerung, Struktur und Funktion, Frankfurt 1983. * L. P. WILKINSON, Ovid Recalled, Cambridge 1955, repr. 1974. * L. P. WILKINSON, Greek Influence on the Poetry of Ovid, in: L'influence grecque sur la poésie latine, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 2, 1956, 223–265. * E. ZINN, ed., Ovids Ars amatoria und Remedia amoris. Untersuchungen zum Aufbau, Stuttgart 1970. * E. ZINN, Worte zum Gedächtnis Ovids, in: E.Z., Viva Vox, Frankfurt 1994, 257–285.

D. MINOR POETS OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

Domitius Marsus

Domitius Marsus<sup>1</sup> may well have studied under the redoubtable grammaticus Orbilius, whose weighty hand was also felt by Horace (cf. fig.

<sup>1</sup> FPL 110–111 MOREL; 141–143 BÜCHNER; D. FOGAZZA, Domiti Marsi testimonia et fragmenta (TC), Roma 1981; L. ALFONSI, I. CAZZANIGA, F. DELLA CORTE, S. MARIOTTI, Domizio Marso, Maia 16, 1964, 377–388; L. ALFONSI, E. CAMPANILE, S. MARIOTTI, E. PARATORE, Nel dossier di Domizio Marso, Maia 17, 1965, 248–270; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 2, 52–57; A. BARIGAZZI, Su due epigrammi di Domizio

4 Büchner). Like Horace, he belonged to Maecenas' circle (Mart. 8. 55 [56] 24; 7. 29. 7–8). With Octavian's teacher of rhetoric, Apollodorus of Pergamum, he may well have exchanged letters (Quint. inst. 3. 1. 18). His membership in the older generation of Augustan writers is also attested by Ovid, who puts his name first in a catalogue of contemporary poets (Pont. 4. 16. 5). He cannot in any way therefore have been Ovid's junior.

Marsus' chief work was his Epigrams, probably in several books. The title Cicuta (fig. 1) may have denoted a part or the whole collection. On top of this he wrote at least nine books of fabellae (fig. 2), an epic Amazonis (Mart. 4. 29. 7–8), and a prose work De urbanitate (Quint. inst. 6. 3. 102).

The epigrams were, so far as they are known, mainly poems of attack and criticism. The outspokenness with which contemporaries—Orbilius, Q. Caecilius Epirota—were assailed is reminiscent of Catullus, though the existence of the poetasters Mevius and Bavius may of course be disputed. At the same time more tender tones were not perhaps wholly absent. Domitius celebrated a fusca Melaenis, as Virgil's Corydon celebrated the fair Alexis (Mart. 7. 29. 8), though this does not justify any conclusions about a separate collection of elegies.

An epigrammatist can justly claim some authority in the theory of wit. In this respect the treatise De urbanitate may be compared with Cicero's De oratore, and with this it has also thematic links. Marsus offered a definition of urbanitas, divided urbana dicta into seria, iocosa,

---

Marso, Athenaeum n.s. 42, 1964, 261–268; L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560, on Marsus esp. 1480–1487; F. KÜHNERT, Quintilians Erörterung über den Witz (inst. 6. 3), Philologus 106, 1962, on Marsus esp. 305–314; F. W. LENZ, Domitius Marsus oder D M?, Mnemosyne, ser. 4, 15, 1962, 248–255; L. LOMBARDI, A proposito di alcuni recenti studi su Domizio Marso, BStudLat 7, 1977, 343–358; S. MARIOTTI, Intorno a Domizio Marso, Miscellanea A. ROSTAGNI, Torino 1963, 588–614; I. R. McDONALD, The vir bonus and Quintilian 6. 3, SPh 72, 1975, 237–245; M. J. MCGANN, The Date of Tibullus' Death, Latomus 29, 1970, 774–780; W. MOREL, Drei lateinische Epigramme, Gymnasium 66, 1959, 318–319; O. MUSSO, La vendetta di Bavio, A&R n.s. 16, 1971, 130–132; A. PANGALLO, Domizio Marso contro Bavio, Maia 28, 1976, 29–33; E. S. RAMAGE, The De urbanitate of Domitius Marsus, CPh 54, 1959, 250–255; R. REGGIANI, Un epigramma di Domizio Marso in Quintiliano, Prometheus 7, 1981, 43–49; G. RUNCHINA, Letteratura e idologia nell'età augustea, AFMC 3, 1978/79, 15–87; E. DE SAINT-DENIS, Evolution sémantique de urbanus-urbanitas, Latomus 3, 1939, 5–24, esp. 20–22; F. SKUTSCH, Domitius Marsus, RE 5, 1, 1903, 1430–1432; A. TRAGLIA, Poeti latini dell'età giulio-claudia misconosciuti, I: Domizio Marso, C&S 26, 1987, 44–53.

and media, and subdivided seria dicta into honorifica, contumeliosa, and media (Quint. inst. 6. 3. 104–108).<sup>1</sup>

A high opinion of the artistic content of the epigrams is justified by the verses on the deaths of Virgil and Tibullus (fig. 7). Its vocabulary suggests Tibullus' own poetry (1. 3. 57–58), but whereas he reserves Elysium for lovers, Marsus joins two representatives of quite different literary genres: the 'tender' elegy and the 'heroic' epic have alike been left orphans, as the antithesis between molles and forti emphasizes. The circumstance that these lines by Marsus were so often cited may be connected with the feeling that this silence on poetry's part was ominous. A first decade of great expectations and hopes was followed by one of only modest successes—the ransoming of the spoils of Crassus—and in part even miscarriages (Augustus' laws on marriage). The 'golden' age more and more tended to reveal its iron features, and the principate was turning out to be a monarchy.

Martial, who regards himself as a second Marsus (8. 55 [56] 24; cf. 2. 71), sets himself in a line of succession also including Pedo and Catullus (Mart. 5. 5. 6; 7. 99. 7). It was quite natural for him to admire Marsus' epigrams while at the same time rejecting his long epic, which could not stand comparison with the concentrated style of Persius (Mart. 4. 29. 7–8). The adjective levis underlines the point that in this weighty genre Marsus was not at home.

The fact that Pliny names Marsus as a source for the history of art in his book 34 implies that he described works of art, and so belongs to the predecessors of descriptive or 'objective' lyric illustrated also by Martial or Statius.

Quintilian made use of the De urbanitate in the non-Ciceronian portions of his section on the ridiculum.<sup>2</sup> It is possible that Horace had consulted Marsus already in writing the Ars poetica.<sup>3</sup>

Albinovanus Pedo<sup>4</sup>

Albinovanus Pedo, one of Ovid's friends (Pont. 4. 10; cf. 4. 16. 6), composed a mythological epic (Theseis: Ov. Pont. 4. 10. 71) and one

<sup>1</sup> E. S. RAMAGE 1959; F. KÜHNERT 1962, 305–314.

<sup>2</sup> Quint. inst. 6. 3. 25–28; 89–91; 102–112; F. KÜHNERT 1962, 305–314; I. R. McDONALD 1975, 244.

<sup>3</sup> L. DURET 1983.

<sup>4</sup> FPL 115–116 MOREL; 147–148 BÜCHNER; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 2, 69–73;

on contemporary history describing Germanicus' campaign in Germany (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 90; Sen. suas. 1. 15), perhaps inspired by his own wartime experiences as praefectus equitum (cf. Tac. ann. 1. 60. 2). Martial knows him as an epigrammatist.<sup>1</sup> The Younger Seneca calls him fabulator elegantissimus (epist. 122. 15), while the Elder praises his verve (suas. 1. 15). A passage on Germanicus' voyage in the North Sea (A.D. 16),<sup>2</sup> developing variations on the topos of human transgression of mortal limits (cf. Hor. carm. 1. 3), anticipates the description of the first experience of sea travel (Val. Fl. 2. 34–71). The theme of such transgression had, thanks to Caesar, acquired particular relevance in contemporary literature (Vell. 2. 46. 1; Lucan 4. 143–147). The parallel with Alexander (Curtius Rufus) could not be avoided.

In language Virgilian influence is detectible, but the excited narrative style, evinced by the frequent use of iam, points to later developments. Pedo acts as a link between Virgil and Lucan to the extent that, in the description of nature, myth is replaced by fantasy. By the use of surreal estrangement and drama, contemporary history is raised to the mythical level.<sup>3</sup>

Ovid lauds the poet as sidereus Pedo (Pont. 4. 16. 6). The possibility of his influence on later epic writers and on Tacitus<sup>4</sup> cannot be dismissed.

---

H. W. BENARIO, The Text of Albinovanus Pedo, Latomus 32, 1973, 166–169; V. BONGI, Nuova esegesi del frammento di Albinovano Pedone, RIL 82, 1949, 28–48; A. COZZOLINO, Due precedenti lucanei, Vichiana 5, 1976, 54–61; H. DAHLMANN, Cornelius Severus, AAWM 1975, 6, 128–137; D. DETLEFSEN, Zur Kenntnis der Alten von der Nordsee, Hermes 32, 1897, 190–201, esp. 196–201; L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560, esp. 1496–1501; E. PIANEZZOLA, Au-delà des frontières du monde. Un topos rhétorique pour un rétablissement du texte d'Albinovanus Pedo (p. 116 MOREL = 148 BÜCHNER, v. 19), REL 62, 1984, 192–205; E. RODRÍGUEZ-ALMEIDA, Qualche osservazione sulle Esquiliae patrizie e il Lacus Orphei, in: L'urbs. Espace urbain et histoire (1er s. ap. J.-C.). Actes du colloque international organisé par le Centre national de la recherche scientifique et l'École française de Rome (Rome 1985), Rome 1987, 415–428; V. TANDOI, Albinovano Pedone e la retorica Giulio-Claudia delle conquiste, SIFC 36, 1964, 129–168; 39, 1967, 5–66.

<sup>1</sup> 1 praef.; 2. 77. 5; 5. 5. 6; 10. 19. 10; cf. Sidon. carm. 9. 260.

<sup>2</sup> D. DETLEFSEN 1897, 196, takes a different view, putting Drusus' North Sea voyage in 12 B.C.

<sup>3</sup> L. DURET 1983, 1501.

<sup>4</sup> On the poeticus color in Tac. Germ. 34 and ann. 2. 23–24, cf. V. BONGI 1949; H. W. BENARIO 1973, 169.

Cornelius Severus<sup>1</sup>

Cornelius Severus, a late Augustan from a distinguished family, composed historical epics. His carmen regale<sup>2</sup> (Ovid Pont. 4. 16. 9) might be identical with his Res Romanae (Prob. nom. GL 4. 208. 16–17), though quite clearly the Bellum Siculum was an independent work (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 89). Ovid, who had a high opinion of him, addressed an epistle to him (Pont. 4. 2), and expressly as a first letter. This means that 1. 8 must be directed to another Severus.

The surviving passage on Cicero's death has parallels in prose. An example is the tradition in the historians of the consummatio totius vitae on the part of some hero at his death. Seneca (suas. 6. 21) refers to Sallust and Livy (fig. lib. 120) and establishes a link with the laudationes funebres and memorial addresses. About a decade after Severus, Velleius took up the same theme (2. 66. 2–5). With his lost description of Etna, too, the poet was taking a place in a fixed tradition (Sen. epist. 79. 5).

The language and style are reminiscent of Virgil and Ovid. Like Ovid, Severus prefers to set an epithet before a strong caesura, and its accompanying substantive at the end of the line. The presentation is enlivened by questions, apostrophes and antitheses. Possibly, with his words versificator quam poeta melior, 'a better versifier than poet', Quintilian (inst. 10. 1. 89) is hinting that Severus' style was not so much poetic as rhetorical. The verdict of the same Quintilian on Lucan may be compared: magis oratoribus quam poetis imitandus, 'more suitable for imitation by the orator than by the poet' (10. 1. 90). Severus in fact anticipates Lucan's diction by his habit of interrupting his epic narrative with rhetorical reflections which have an almost lyrical energy and power. Yet only a born poet could write a line such as pinea frondosi coma murmurat Appennini, 'the piny hair of the leafy Apennines rustles' (frag. 10 Büchner).

<sup>1</sup> FPL 116–119 MOREL; 148–152 BÜCHNER; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 2, 61–64; E. BOLISANI, Intorno a Cornelio Severo, AAPad 1934–1935, 293–314; A. COZZOLINO, Due precedenti lucanei, Vichiana 5, 1976, 54–61; H. DAHLMANN, Cornelius Severus, AAWM 1975, 6; L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560, esp. 1492–1496; P. GRENADE, Le mythe de Pompée et les Pompéiens sous les Césars, REA 52, 1950, 28–63; H. HOMEYER, Klage um Cicero. Zu dem epischen Fragment des Cornelius Severus, AUS 10, 1961, 327–334; H. HOMEYER, Ciceros Tod im Urteil der Nachwelt, Altertum 17, 1971, 165–174, esp. 169–170; F. SKUTSCH, Cornelius Severus, RE 4, 1, 1900, 1509–1510.

<sup>2</sup> Regale does not necessarily mean that the poem dealt with the period of the Roman kings.

The circumstance that Cicero's death had become a theme of rhetorical declamations does not exclude, as Severus' example proves, an element of personal feeling. It is topics of this kind which allow to be put into words the pain at the powerlessness of the spirit in the face of military dictatorship. The passage<sup>1</sup> we quoted from Quintilian might make some readers believe that Severus lacked talent; the verve of the preserved text, which bears comparison with Lucan, is the best proof to the contrary.

---

<sup>1</sup> A slightly different view in: R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos von Lucan . . ., Heidelberg 1978, 231, n. 60.

III. PROSE

A. HISTORY

HISTORIANS OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

The transition from the historical writing of the Republic to that of the Augustan period is not marked by any hard and fast boundary. The older generation of historians still owed allegiance, by birth and outlook, to the Republic. This explains why Sallust is commonly considered a Republican author, although his activity coincides with the first years when Virgil and Horace were at work. Without calling into question the traditional reckoning, we might note his overlap with early Augustan literature, which is more than a simple fact of chronology. The distance to which it gave rise was a necessary factor in his balanced verdict on both Cato and Caesar, and the far horizons of the Historiae already point ahead to Livy and Trogus. Just like Sallust, Asinius Pollio was also a senator and was still able to speak of the period he described with the expertise of one who had been actively engaged in politics. Since however, unlike Sallust, who was his senior by ten years, he lived to experience the Augustan peace, and since he wrote his history, like Livy, after the battle of Actium, we might be justified in discussing him within the framework of the Augustan period. In Sallust, as in Pollio, a creative tension prevails between their senatorial and Republican backgrounds, and the stormy changes of the time in which they lived. Their attention is fixed on the history of their own century. They do not offer general accounts.

The younger historians Livy and Pompeius Trogus, on the other hand, were not senators. As professional writers, they were removed from practical politics. Meanwhile the state had become more solidly established. A universal empire demanded wide-ranging presentations of its history, and peace offered the leisure necessary to make them. Both authors opened for their generation two complementary paths to a new Roman identity. Livy looked within, to Rome, and transmitted, under the guise of the Italian past, a code of behavior looking to the future: Romanity was transformed into humanity. Trogus directed his readers' eyes abroad. He considered both the world-wide scope of the empire and its place in universal history.

In any faithful account of the period, the name of the historian T. Labienus must not be overlooked. It was the Senate's decree ordering the burning of his works which led him to end his own life (Sen. contr. 10, praef. 4–8).<sup>1</sup>

ASINIUS POLLIO

Life and Dates

C. Asinius Pollio (76 B.C.–A.D. 5) was a senator and politician who decided to join Caesar (in 49), and Mark Antony (in 43). His consulship (40) was celebrated in the 4th eclogue by Virgil. After his triumph over the Parthini (39), Pollio withdrew from public life. In 31 he remained neutral.

More than politics, it was literature which now engaged his attention, and he took the right steps to encourage it. In the Atrium Libertatis he founded Rome's first public library, a move fraught with consequences for the future. Even perhaps more significant was his introduction of public readings (recitationes) of contemporary works. His house, sheltering many artistic treasures<sup>2</sup> (including the 'Farnese Bull'), became a meeting place for poets. Catullus, who was about ten years older, had praised Pollio's wit (Catullus 9. 6). Helvius Cinna dedicated a propemptikon to him, Virgil three eclogues (3, 4, and 8), and Horace the first poem of his 2nd book of Odes. When the Greek historian Timagenes fell out of favor with Augustus, it was Pollio who lent support to the author whom he had found previously unsympathetic.

<sup>1</sup> Labienus: HRR 2, pp. C–CI: Speeches ORF p. 422–424 MALCOVATI 4th ed. 1976; H. PETER, Die geschichtliche Litteratur über die römische Kaiserzeit bis Theodosius I. und ihre Quellen, vol. 1, Leipzig 1897, 295–296; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 2, 96. The historical works of Q. Dellius (an acquaintance of Horace) are also lost, as are those of Julius Marathus, C. Drusus, Julius Saturninus, Aquilius Niger (four of Suetonius' sources), Baebius Macer, L. Arruntius (consul 22 B.C., a pedestrian imitator of Sallust), Clodius Licinus (Res Romanae) etc.; in general, cf. L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560.

<sup>2</sup> Pliny nat. 36. 23–24; 33–34.

Survey of Works

Along with tragedies, love poems, writings on grammar, and speeches, his historiae deserve particular mention. They were composed following Actium (Horace, carm. 2. 1) and in 17 books treated contemporary history from 60 on.<sup>1</sup> The only coherent passage of any length is his evaluation of Cicero (Sen. suas. 6. 24). To these may be added three surviving letters (apud Cic. fam. 10. 31–33).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Pollio wrote mostly from original sources. He had access to Caesar's entourage whose Commentarii he aimed to surpass in fidelity. His diligentia was famous (Quint. inst. 10. 2. 25). He was also aware of the way in which Republican politics worked. In these circumstances the loss of his writings is to be regretted. Occasionally, surviving imitators of Pollio allow us to check Caesar's statements.

Literary Technique

The only fragment of any length (Sen. suas. 6. 24) justifies the statement that Pollio, like many other historians, introduced, on the occasion of the death of particular persons, retrospective evaluations of their lives. In his individual treatment he follows well-defined categories: ingenium, industria, natura, fortuna. Seneca expressly warns us against drawing conclusions from this successful passage about the literary qualities of the whole work. In this place, Pollio, he hints, may have been inspired by his subject—Cicero.

The tendency which may be observed throughout the entire fragment, of suggesting a discreditable interpretation under the guise of objectivity, seems to point ahead to Tacitus.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Surviving allusions refer to the Battle of Pharsalus (Suet. Iul. 30), the Battle of Thapsus and Cato's death (Hor. carm. 2. 1. 24), the Spanish War (Suet. Iul. 55), Cicero's death (Sen. suas. 6. 24), Cassius and Brutus (Tac. ann. 4. 34). Where the account ended is unknown. On the Historiae, see also R. HÄUSSLER, Keine griechische Version der Historien Pollios, RhM 109, 1966, 339–355. It is no longer believed that Pollio was the author of the Bellum Africum.

<sup>2</sup> An example is the use of an 'annihilating' conditional clause to form a surprising conclusion: atque ego ne miserandi quidem exitus eum fuisse iudicaret, nisi ipse tam miseram mortem putasset (Pollio), cf. Tac. hist. 1. 49 on Galba: omnium consensu capax imperii, nisi imperasset.

Furthermore, we know from Suetonius (Iul. 30) that Pollio used the technique of interpreting events not by a personal commentary, but by brief utterances put in the mouth of the characters involved.

An example of a strongly condensed narrative, split up into cola and filled with parentheses, is found in the first half of the letter in Cicero fam. 10. 32, though there is here also concrete detail and color. The cynical toughness is reminiscent on the one side of Gaius Gracchus, on the other of Tacitus.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

Pollio's style in ancient eyes was 'harsh and dry' (Tac. dial. 21. 7), his phrasing 'uneven'. His sentences suddenly left the reader in the lurch by breaking off unexpectedly (Sen. epist. 100. 7). It often sounds as if the author were a generation older than Cicero (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 113). This impression was not caused by artificial archaisms, which Pollio in fact rejected, but by jarring juxtaposition, springing from the desire to find the most appropriate expression. His language is profoundly related to reality. Male hercule eveniat verbis, nisi rem sequuntur, 'to hell with words if they do not follow the subject (spring from reality)' (apud Porph. on Hor. ars 311).

Only in his private declamatory exercises did he occasionally introduce rhetorical flourishes. In his public speeches, he despised them (Sen. contr. 4 praef. 2).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Pollio was an incorruptible and sharp-tongued critic. Horace trusted him, with few others, to give a verdict on his poems (sat. 1. 10. 85). Pollio's utterances on great authors in fact, in spite of their lack of respect, deserve serious examination. Even if they were caricatures, they illumine essential differences in stylistic principles and literary genres.

---

<sup>1</sup> E. WÖLFFLIN, Über die Latinität des Asinius Pollio, ALL 6, 1889, 85-106; J. H. SCHMALZ, Über den Sprachgebrauch des Asinius Pollio, München 2nd ed. 1890.

In Sallust, Pollio found fault with the deliberate archaisms (Suet. gramm. 10) and the inappropriate employment of transgredi and transgressus to describe, not movement on foot, but by ship (Gell. 10. 26. 1). In this case the extremely prosaic transfretare would have been the appropriate word. The difference in stylistic priorities is apparent. Unlike Sallust, Pollio was concerned not with artistic estrangement, but with proprietas verborum.<sup>1</sup> His sober and precise Atticism<sup>2</sup> is distinct from the language of Sallust who rivaled both Cato and Thucydides.

This meant that, from a linguistic standpoint, he was bound to find Caesar's<sup>3</sup> Commentarii satisfying. Instead, here he found fault with the content. The great general, according to him, lacked precision and truthfulness. He was too easily hoodwinked by his authorities, and even where relying on his own memories, reported wrongly (either on purpose or negligently). As an excuse Pollio politely assumed that Caesar might perhaps have planned a second improved edition (Suet. Caesar 56). The criteria applied here—diligentia and veritas—do credit to Pollio as an historian, and indirectly illustrate the difference between genres. A writer of memoirs is not primarily concerned with establishing historical facts but with presenting a picture of himself. Even if a determination to falsify throughout is not assumed, he does not write as a scholar but as an apologist. As an historian, Pollio demands truth, while in the commentarius Caesar may be satisfied with probability.

Pollio's verdict on Cicero is on the moral plane, and so belongs to the following section. Something similar may perhaps be said of the remark on Livy's Patavinity (see Livy, below p. 835, note 1).

Ideas II

In spite of his Republican sympathies (apud Cic. fam. 10. 31. 5), Pollio was in alliance, and even on friendly terms, with Caesar and Antony.

<sup>1</sup> His friend L. Ateius Philologus, also an acquaintance of Sallust, advised Asinius in his historical work ut noto civilique et proprio sermone utatur vitetque maxime obscuritatem Sallustii et audaciam in translationibus (Suet. gramm. 10).

<sup>2</sup> Tristes ac ieiuni Pollionem imitantur (Quint. inst. 10. 2. 17). Here, the Attici seem to be a different group, though perhaps Quintilian is rather opposing three ascetic (pseudo-Attic) types of style to a prolix (pseudo-Ciceronian) manner. Pollio's closeness to the Atticists is shown by his criticism of Cicero (inst. 12. 1. 22).

<sup>3</sup> G. VRIND, Asinii Pollionis iudicium de Caesaris commentariis, Mnemosyne 2, 56, 1928, 207–213.

Whether his often evinced wait-and-see attitude in the Civil War was determined more by love of peace (ibid. 2) or cautious calculation must be left undecided. He took part in the peace of Brundisium as one of Antony's representatives (App. civ. 5. 64). Although he later abandoned Antony, towards Augustus he maintained a certain aloofness. As his life shows, and as he himself allows us to deduce, it was his own freedom which counted perhaps for him as among the highest good.<sup>1</sup> He was wise enough to withdraw from politics in good time, and to alternate regularly between work and leisure (cf. Sen. dial. 9. 17. 7). His remark that Cicero lacked restraint and reserve indirectly serves as an excellent description by the historian of himself.<sup>2</sup> In his handling of language he was an ascetic, in his life he was not free from a certain egotism, but while servile attitudes multiplied around him, he was able to preserve his own independence.

Influence

Traces of Pollio's History are found in Livy, Seneca, Valerius Maximus, Pliny the Elder, Suetonius, Appian, and Plutarch.<sup>3</sup> As a speaker he is often mentioned in company with Messalla.<sup>4</sup>

Editions: carm.: FPL, pp. 99–100 MOREL (= p. 130 BÜCHNER). * gramm.: GRF 1, 493–502. * hist.: HRR 2, 67–70. * orat.: ORF 3, 174–186. ** Bibl.: G. ZECCHINI (s. below), esp. 1293–1295.

J. ANDRÉ, La vie et l'œuvre d'Asinius Pollion, Paris 1949. * BARDON, Lit. lat. inc. 2, 23–24; 80; 94–95. * C. C. COULTER, Pollio's History of the Civil War, CW 46, 1952, 33–36. * P. GROEBE, Asinius 25, RE 2, 2, 1896, 1589–1602. * A. LA PENNA, La storiografia, in: F. MONTANARI, ed., La prosa latina, Roma 1991, 13–93. * J. P. NÉRAUDAU, Asinius Pollion et la poésie, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1732–1750. * A. J. POMEROY, The Appropriate Comment. Death Notices in the Ancient Historians, Frankfurt 1991, 142–145. * SYME, Revolution 2nd ed. 1952, 538 (ind.). * G. ZECCHINI, Asinio Pollione: Dall'attività politica alla riflessione storiografica, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1265–1296. * G. ZECCHINI, Il Carmen de bello Actiaco. Storiografia e lotta politica in età augustea, Stuttgart 1987.

<sup>1</sup> Deinde qui et me et rem publicam (the sequence may be noted) vindicare in libertatem paratus sim (Pollio apud Cic. fam. 10. 31. 5).

<sup>2</sup> Utinam moderatius secundas res et fortius adversas ferre potuisset (apud Sen. suas. 6. 24).

<sup>3</sup> The question of his influence on Dio Cassius is uncertain.

<sup>4</sup> Vell. 2. 36. 2; Colum. 1, praef 30; Tac. dial. 12. 17; Quint. inst. 12. 11. 28.

LIVY

Life and Dates

Livy's native city of Patavium (Padua) was said in legend to be older than Rome (cf. Livy 1. 1. 2-3). It was one of the greatest metropolises of the Roman empire, and thanks to its trade in wool (Strabo 5. 218) one of the richest. In spite of their prosperity the Paduans were well known for their distinguishing puritanism (Pliny epist. 1. 14. 6), and in fact Livy (T. Livius), like his fellow-citizen Paetus Thrasea later (Tac. ann. 16. 21), championed Roman values with particular conviction and warmth. Whether Pollio's remark about Livy's 'Patavinitas'<sup>1</sup> refers to this moral attitude, or, as Quintilian<sup>2</sup> presupposes, to his language, is a matter of dispute. Certainly the historian bore the stamp of his origin. He viewed Roman history, not as an 'insider', but as the denizen of a city which had long been in alliance with Rome, though it had only received the privileges of a municipium after the middle of the 1st century B.C. This 'position on the margins' determined a standpoint which superficially may be compared with that of Polybius. But, unlike Polybius, Livy lacked experience of politics. Never a senator and of provincial background, among Rome's chroniclers, he observed his subject from a certain distance.

There was also a distance of time separating Livy from the Republic. Jerome<sup>3</sup> states that he was born in 59 B.C., though he notes he had the same age as M. Valerius Messalla, whose birth falls in 64. If the story that the two were exact contemporaries has prior authority, Livy too must have been born in 64.<sup>4</sup> But if Jerome argued that Messalla was contemporary with Livy on the basis of a false date, the traditional birthdate of 59 may be retained for Livy. Livy belonged in any case to Augustus' generation, and was younger than Virgil.

<sup>1</sup> Patavinitas: The best explanation in my view is given by LEEMAN, Form 99-109, who emphasizes a certain detachment from Rome. D. G. MORHOF, De Patavinitate Liviana, 1685, says that it is hard to decide whether there is more Patavinity in Livy or asinity in Asinius. Most recently, P. FLOBERT, La Patavinitas de Tite-Live d'après les mœurs littéraires du temps, REL 59, 1981, 193-206 (lack of urbanitas).

<sup>2</sup> Quint. inst. 1. 5. 56; 8. 1. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Chron. 1958.

<sup>4</sup> In favor of 64 B.C.: G. M. HIRST, Collected Classical Papers, Oxford 1938, 12-14; R. SYME 1959, 27-87, esp. 40-42.

When the so-called First Triumvirate (60 B.C.) sealed the fate of the Republic, and Caesar was conquering Gaul (58–51 B.C.), Livy was still a child. He was still not an adult when the crossing of the Rubicon (49 B.C.) and Pompey's death (48 B.C.) took place. The respect which he accords to Caesar's assassins<sup>1</sup> and his enthusiastic support of Pompey (Tac. ann. 4. 34) reflect these experiences. He was approaching adulthood when in 43 B.C. the Paduans, loyal to the senate, refused admission to the envoys of the 'public enemy' Antony (Cic. Phil. 12. 4. 10) and when in the same year Cicero was proscribed and murdered.<sup>2</sup> Without concealing the weaknesses of Cicero's character, Livy admired the orator and stylist, whom he later recommended to his own son as a model for imitation.<sup>3</sup>

The end of the civil wars and the beginning of a secure and peaceful time in Italy—the pax Augusta—permitted Livy, who meanwhile had reached maturity, to form the plan of writing a history of Rome. It cannot be supposed that already during the civil war Livy had left Patavium to face the dangers of life at Rome. There must have been in his hometown eminent grammatici and rhetors with whom he could study. It was only after Augustus' victory that we find him in the capital, and indeed personally known to the princeps who chaffed him good-naturedly as a 'Pompeian' (Tac. ann. 4. 34). Livy gave early encouragement to the later emperor Claudius to take up history (Suet. Claud. 41. 1). Already in his lifetime he was so famous that an admirer travelled to Rome from Cadiz for no other purpose except to see him (Pliny epist. 2. 3. 8). None of this proves that Livy spent the rest of his life in Rome.<sup>4</sup> He died in his native city, according to Jerome (chron. 2034) in A.D. 17.<sup>5</sup>

Livy had experienced the birth of the Roman principate,<sup>6</sup> though he was still haunted by the dream of the Republic's greatness. His life embraced the change of epochs. The figures whom he had revered

<sup>1</sup> His critical remark about Caesar (apud Sen. nat. 5. 18. 4) has recently been referred to Marius (cf. Livy fig. 20 Jal). But Caesar's name is better attested. Also in favor of an allusion to Caesar, H. STRASBURGER, Livius über Caesar, in: E. LEFÈVRE and E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 265–291.

<sup>2</sup> Livy 120 apud Sen. suas. 6. 17 and 22 = frgg. 59–60 Jal.

<sup>3</sup> Quint. inst. 10. 1. 39; cf. 2. 5. 20; on the 'obituary notice' of Cicero A. J. POMEROY 1991, 146–148, cited above (p. 834.).

<sup>4</sup> Livy must have spent much of his life in Patavium: V. LUNDSTRÖM, Kring Livius' liv och verk, Eranos 27, 1929, 1–37.

<sup>5</sup> A.D. 12 (corresponding to a birth date of 64 B.C.) is less probable.

<sup>6</sup> J. DEININGER, Livius und der Prinzipat, Klio 67, 1985, 265–272.

in his youth were men of Republican Rome, with deep roots in the past. Yet, under the eyes of the historian as he grew older, developments were unfolding whose consequences extend into late antiquity and, to some degree, right into the modern world.

Survey of Works

Livy's rhetorical and philosophical writings<sup>1</sup> have not survived. His principal work, Ab urbe condita libri CXLII,<sup>2</sup> treated Roman history from the beginnings to the death of Drusus in 9 B.C. Of the originally 142 volumes, only books 1–10 and 21–45 are preserved. The remainder—more than three-quarters of the work—is known only by summaries (periochae), extracts (epitomae) or fragments.

The 1st book appeared after the princeps had assumed the title of Augustus (27 B.C.), but before he had closed the temple of Janus for the second time in 25 (Livy 1. 19. 3). The work was probably written in continuous sequence. A simple calculation produces an average of three to four books a year, although the actual pace of work may naturally have varied. Certain chronological hints support this general conclusion: 9. 18. 6 must have been produced before the surrender of Crassus' standards in 20 B.C.; and 28. 12. 12 after the Cantabrian War of 19 B.C. According to the periocha of book 121 this book, along with all its successors, appeared only after Augustus' death. This means that Livy, in the last three to four years of his life, published 22 books (unless they appeared posthumously). In any case a speedy pace of work is to be presupposed, and should be taken into account when the author's use of sources is considered.<sup>3</sup>

The preserved portions of the work fall<sup>4</sup> into groups of five books apiece, as the prefaces to books 6, 21, and 31 confirm. On their side these groupings may be united into larger units numbering ten or fifteen books.

1–15: Early history down to the eve of the First Punic War (265 B.C.). Of these, 1–5 go down to the end of the invasion of Rome by the Gauls.

<sup>1</sup> Sen. epist. 100. 9 (dialogues, books on philosophy), Quint. inst. 10. 1. 39 (letter of advice to his son); the existence of the philosophical writings is doubted by U. SCHINDEL, Livius philosophus, in: E. LEFÈVRE, É. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 411–419.

<sup>2</sup> The title is imprecise, since Livy began before Rome's foundation. With the title may be compared Pliny A fine Aufidi Bassi, and Tacitus Ab excessu Divi Augusti.

<sup>3</sup> E. MENSCHING, Zur Entstehung und Beurteilung von Ab urbe condita, Latomus 45, 1986, 572–589.

<sup>4</sup> P. A. STADTER 1972; G. WILLE 1973; A. HUS, La composition des IV<sup>e</sup> et V<sup>e</sup> décades de Tite-Live, RPh 47, 1973, 225–250 (rejects any division); P. JAL, Sur la composition de la 'V<sup>e</sup> décade' de Tite-Live, RPh 49, 1975, 278–285.

16–30: The period of the first two Punic Wars (264–201 B.C.). Books 21–30 deal with the Second Punic War.

31–45: The period of Rome's eastern wars (201–167 B.C.), presented in three groups of five books.

For the lost portions, it has been assumed, for example, that a division into groups of 15<sup>1</sup> was determined by periods in which different personalities dominated: Scipio Minor (books 46–60); Marius (61–75); Sulla (76–90); Pompey (91–105);<sup>2</sup> Caesar (106–120); Octavian's struggle to secure the pax Augusta (121–135). But a division into decades (groups of ten books) has also been championed.<sup>3</sup> In either case the last group of books (136–142 or 141–142) must appear incomplete, leading to the conclusion that Livy planned his work in 150 books and aimed to take his story down to the death of Augustus. Yet it has also been argued<sup>4</sup> that the death of Drusus in 9 B.C. might have been used precisely to form an appropriate climax. And in the rest of the work, too, 'pentadic' divisions must not be too rigidly accepted: an example is Caesar's war in Gaul, which does not occur as late as book 106 but was already mentioned in book 103. Similarly, Octavian was not found for the first time in book 121, but already in book 116. Moreover, books 109–116 are cited independently as Belli civilis libri I–VIII, which contradicts a division into fives in this part of the work. A division after the Battle of Actium and Octavian's triumph (book 133) would also be more intelligible than a break after book 135, and the secular games (book 136) should more appropriately be treated as a conclusion than a new beginning.

Livy's conscious effort to preserve his 'pentads' in the surviving portions is visible from the proem to book 31. The third decade has a particularly convincing structure, juxtaposing a 'defensive' and an 'offensive' pentad. In the fourth decade, books 35 and 36 certainly form a pair, suggesting decadic rather than pentadic structure.<sup>5</sup> Conclusions about what is lost based on what is preserved should be drawn only with circumspection.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Description of Sources. Livy does not draw so much on documents as on secondary sources. He names the latter only intermittently, especially where facts are in dispute. There he mentions his chief source in the first place, and secondly the authority for a diverging

<sup>1</sup> G. WILLE 1973.

<sup>2</sup> R. M. OGILVIE, Titi Livi lib. XCI, PCPhS n.s. 30, 1984, 116–125.

<sup>3</sup> P. A. STADTER 1972; T. J. LUCE 1977, 13–24.

<sup>4</sup> R. SYME 1959, 70; rejected by E. BURCK, Gnomon 35, 1963, 780.

<sup>5</sup> A. C. SCAFURO, Pattern, Theme, and Historicity in Livy, Books 35 and 36, ClAnt 6, 1987, 249–285.

version.<sup>1</sup> This means that we must read between the lines: Ceteri Graeci Latinique auctores (32. 6. 8) means only Polybius and Claudius Quadrigarius, just as Graeci auctores (29. 27. 13) probably means only Polybius and veterrimi and antiquissimi auctores only Fabius Pictor.

As for the sources of the first decade, there is no certainty. Parallel versions are found in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Livy's contemporary. Certainly historians of the 1st century were used: Valerius Antias, the popularis Licinius Macer, and to a smaller extent Aelius Tubero,<sup>2</sup> whose sympathies were with the optimates. From the 6th book on, Claudius Quadrigarius<sup>3</sup> was consulted. Information derived from Calpurnius Piso and Fabius Pictor may be second-hand.

The principal sources for the third decade were on the one hand Coelius Antipater, and on the other Valerius Antias. Information given by the latter was again supplemented by Livy from Claudius Quadrigarius. Since Coelius followed the same sources as Polybius, whom he may even have read, in the third decade it is safe to distinguish no more than two traditions: a Coelian and Polybian as opposed to a Valerian and Claudian tradition. In general the latter is less trustworthy, though there are also contrary instances.<sup>4</sup> Polybius seems at first to exercise only indirect influence.<sup>5</sup> This may be because it was only in the course of his work that Livy came to recognize the significance of this historian. It could also be that in the third decade he purposely gave preference to other sources, including Coelius, in order to secure an artistically coherent picture.

In the fourth and fifth decades, particularly for events in the East, Polybius was used directly. This meant a great enrichment of the

<sup>1</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 20 following A. KLOTZ. On Livy's use of sources, see most recently T. LEIDIG 1993. According to LEIDIG those chapters of book 30 which are close to Polybius were drawn from an annalist, who had combined chapters from Polybius with older annalistic traditions; the same annalist served as a source in other parts of the third decade.

<sup>2</sup> R. M. OGILVIE, Commentary 16-17.

<sup>3</sup> These historians, lacking precise information, worked facts and trends of their own day into their presentation of Rome's early history. This means that Livy may serve indirectly also as a source for the history of the opening of the revolutionary period: D. GUTBERLET, Die erste Dekade des Livius als Quelle zur gracchischen und sullanischen Zeit, Hildesheim 1985.

<sup>4</sup> Livy's description of Hannibal's crossing of the Alps contains un-Polybian features which, when impartially scrutinized, seem equally credible. J. SEIBERT, Der Alpenübergang Hannibals. Ein gelöstes Problem?, Gymnasium 95, 1988, 21-73, esp. 36-42.

<sup>5</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 195.

tradition in Latin. For events at Rome and in the West, once again Quadrigarius and Antias provided material. The latter furnished, in spite of his acknowledged failings, of which Livy was aware, important details for senatorial proceedings and senatorial administration. Even Cato could be adduced, though Cato's speech (34. 2-4) contains thoughts drawn from the post-Catonian period, suggesting Livy's own authorship.<sup>1</sup>

In the case of the lost portions, for the period following 146 B.C., Posidonius must be considered as a source, since it was he who had continued Polybius' work. Other authorities were Sempronius Asellio, Sulla, Sisenna, Caesar, Sallust, and Asinius Pollio. In the sections dealing with contemporary history, Livy could also rely on his own experience and the evidence of eye-witnesses. Our picture of the historian, thanks to the loss of the parts dealing with more recent events, which in ancient historians mostly form the center of interest, is quite one-sided.

Method of using sources. Livy clings closely to tradition.<sup>2</sup> Unlike the annalists, he neither biases his picture towards the palpably modern, nor invents romantic additions. This means that within the bounds imposed on him he aims at truthfulness,<sup>3</sup> though of course modern scholarship may not be expected from him. The demands of Polybius (12. 25e)—critical study of documents, personal inspection of the scenes of action, personal political experience—are not met in the portions preserved. We do not know how he handled the history of his own period.

In particular sections he tends in each case to follow one main source while adducing others by way of verification or supplement.<sup>4</sup> This means that his historical value in essence corresponds to that of the prevailing model. On the whole his selection of sources displays intelligence, but criticism often tends to be belated. Livy remarks his

<sup>1</sup> M. PAPE, Griechische Kunstwerke aus Kriegsbeute und ihre öffentliche Aufstellung in Rom, diss. Hamburg 1975, 83-84.

<sup>2</sup> Even when he himself basically is of another opinion: Livy 8. 18. 2-3; 8. 40. 4-5. On remarkable omissions s. now J. POUCKET, Sur certains silences curieux dans le premier livre de Tite-Live, in: R. ALTHEIM-STIEHL, M. ROSENBAD, eds., Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte. FS G. RADKE, Münster 1984, 212-231.

<sup>3</sup> F. HELLMANN 1939; W. WIEHEMEYER, Proben historischer Kritik aus Livius XXI-XLV, diss. Münster 1938.

<sup>4</sup> H. NISSEN 1863; in principle on Livy's method of work, T. J. LUCE 1977, 144-145.

own mistakes after the event. He then seeks to obscure inconsistencies by omissions or slight retouchings.<sup>1</sup> When he changes his authorities, double versions of the same facts are sometimes found.

A precise comparison of Livy with Polybius is possible. There are mistakes of translation and failures of comprehension, and on top of this may be observed the suppression of facts compromising to the Roman cause, and insufficient attention to 'pragmatic' causality in politics. On the other side Livy's narrative is more dramatic and vivid, avoiding broad theoretical debates.

Least of all does Livy understand the art of war. Many of his battle scenes seem to follow a fixed literary scheme. But even in this area the author's didactic abilities tell in his favor. Thus, at the battle of Cannae, he is able to present the complex maneuvers of the Romans more clearly than Polybius.

Problems of Genre. It is fruitful to compare Livy with the 'tragic history' of historians like Duris or Phylarchus.<sup>2</sup> It makes no difference to what degree these authors are looked upon as 'Peripatetic'. Dramatic technique is undoubtedly older, and Livy manipulates it without exaggeration. Among Latin historians, examples would be Coelius Antipater and the narratives in Cicero's forensic speeches. A theory of history to which Livy seems to have subscribed wholeheartedly is that of Cicero, whose own allegiance is to the Isocratean school.<sup>3</sup> Livy also has contact with Cicero in language, style, and ideas. The artistic models of Livy's historical presentation must be examined in more detail under the rubric of Literary Technique. There is a fascinating contrast with the tradition seen in Thucydides and Sallust, though this does not prevent Livy, notably in his account of the Second Punic War, from entering into rivalry also with Thucydides.<sup>4</sup>

Livy, the 'Roman Herodotus', stands partly in the tradition of Hellenistic historical writing. On the other hand his work marks the culmination of the Roman annalistic style. In the 'mythical' portions the reader at times catches a glimpse of the epic and poetic color of

<sup>1</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 46-54.

<sup>2</sup> E. BURCK 2nd ed. 1964. A distinction between tragic and Isocratean historical narrative is rightly insisted upon by N. ZEGERS, Wesen und Ursprung der tragischen Geschichtsschreibung, diss. Köln 1959.

<sup>3</sup> P. G. WALSH 1961.

<sup>4</sup> On the contrast, cf. T. J. LUCE 1977. For imitation of Thucydides, compare Livy 21. 1 with Thuc. 1. 1. On the speeches of Fabius and Scipio (Livy 28. 40-44) and the speeches on the eve of the Sicilian expedition: B. S. RODGERS, Great Expeditions. Livy on Thucydides, TAPhA 116, 1986, 335-352.

old Roman historical poetry. Roman too is the moralizing standpoint, and the strictly maintained division of material by years.

Literary Technique

To convey a literary picture of whole wars and periods, of the very history of a people, particular narrative means are required, facilitating a comprehensive overview by elements of form. Herodotus could learn from Homer how to arrange events as an intelligible sequence, as a unified whole. Later, Hellenistic historical writing looked to tragedy and the theory of tragedy for the same purpose.

Livy himself speaks of his annales (43. 13. 2). On the large scale, with his use of pentadic structure and of the annalistic principle, he offers to his readers two quite different formal guides. Thus structure becomes a means of interpretation, as can be seen, for instance, in the third decade.<sup>1</sup>

Given the prevalent annalistic method and the succession of different settings, individual books are not always self-contained. Rounded units however are formed, for example, by book 1 (the regal period) and book 5 (capture of Veii by the Romans and of Rome by the Gauls). Livy creates an impression of varietas by relatively frequent changes of theme, switches such as those from foreign to domestic affairs or vice versa. Transitions are made without strain, as when movements of troops or ambassadorial journeys lead from one theater of operations to another. This means that the annalistic procedure need not lead to fragmentation.

At the start of each year, the magistrates take up office, provinces are allocated, legions are assigned, prodigies are enumerated and embassies are recorded. Such features, recurring annually, furnish resting points in the narrative. Then come campaigns, and finally details of political elections. Accounts of religious ceremonies underline the significance of great moments, such as Scipio's prayer before the landing in Africa (29. 27. 1-4) and the vow of Manius Acilius after the declaration of war on Antiochus (36. 2. 3-5).

Themes running like leitmotifs through longer portions help to give unity to the narrative. In book 2,<sup>2</sup> chapters 1-21 develop the motif of libertas, and the conclusion of this same book deals with the threat to libertas posed by internal discordia.<sup>1</sup> The same may be said for moderatio in the 3rd and 4th books, and pietas in the 5th.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This structure is not Polybian. Here, Livy consciously decided in favor of Roman tradition.

<sup>2</sup> E. BURCK 2nd ed. 1964, 51-61; cf. also K. HELDMANN, Livius über Monarchie und Freiheit und der römische Lebensaltervergleich, WJA n.s. 13, 1987, 209-230.

The beginning, middle, and end of books are appropriate places for significant events: speeches, declarations of war, battles, triumphs,<sup>3</sup> meaning that form and content are mutually supportive. Procedures of this type allow a broad perspective on historical events while, on the small scale, the artistic deployment of individual scenes<sup>4</sup> confers on the narrative a telling immediacy.

Larger concatenations of happenings unreceptive to compression into a single episode are broken down into scenes. As 'major sequences', they move towards a particular climax. Between the individual scenes are found contrasting passages. Subtle transitions prevent the story from degenerating into a loose succession of episodes. In this way the conflict between the patricians and plebeians, leading to the establishment of the office of tribune, forms a whole in three acts.<sup>5</sup>

Livy's effort to secure dramatic presentation recalls the so-called 'tragic' style of historical writing.<sup>6</sup> An important aim of this literary method was to upset the reader (ἔκκληξις) and to arouse his sympathy (συμπάθεια). Livy employs such methods in moderation. He does not invent novel situations.

The episodes, which are integral parts of the narrative, have a 'beginning, middle, and an end', and here the central section receives particularly careful attention. What happens before and after is abbreviated, so as to throw into relief what is important. But there is no abbreviation at key points in the story. Once again, here, form is at the service of meaning.

Reversals happen quite unexpectedly (at 31. 18. 6 Livy actually adds repente; cf. Polybius 16. 34. 9). At times one has the impression of seeing the appearance on stage of a deus ex machina (22. 29. 3 repente velut caelo demissa, 'suddenly, as though come down from heaven'). The suddenness of the peripeteia is reflected in the reversal of normal

<sup>1</sup> R. M. OGILVIE, Commentary 233; further details in T. J. LUCE 1977, 26–27.

<sup>2</sup> F. HELLMANN 1939, 46–81. The compositional and conceptual unity of book 8 is noted by E. BURCK, Gnomon 60, 1988, 323–324. On constantia in books 3 and 42, and constantia and prudentia in book 22 see T. J. MOORE 1989, 155–156.

<sup>3</sup> T. J. LUCE 1977, 137.

<sup>4</sup> On individual scenes: H. A. GÄRTNER 1975, 7–28.

<sup>5</sup> 2. 23–24; 27–30.7; 31.7–33.3; E. BURCK 2nd ed. 1964, 61–69.

<sup>6</sup> See above, (p. 841, note 2).

syntax: 'The enemy would have prevailed, unless. . . .' The main fact follows in the subordinate clause.<sup>1</sup>

It is only rarely that the pathetic painting of the story verges on the ugly and horrible (22. 51. 5–9). Brutal naturalism would have been irreconcilable with Augustan principles of style. Instead, Livy does dwell on the psychological effects of the events he describes and graphically portrays the underlying emotions. His sympathy often goes to the defeated, even when they are not Romans.<sup>2</sup> The rhetorical commonplaces available for the description of conquered cities (Quint. inst. 8. 3. 68) are however employed only sparingly, and at times even deliberately omitted.<sup>3</sup>

Even so, Livy compressed the negotiations between Philip and the Roman envoys in 184 B.C. into a single conversation ('concentrated composition'), an artistic procedure also encountered in Greek authors.<sup>4</sup>

Mass scenes are divided among groups and individuals, the aim being to produce a lively picture (alius—alius; partim—partim). Livy also likes to allow groups to observe an event, reflect on it, and then give their verdict, a technique looking ahead to Tacitus. In the light of these different viewpoints, characters to some extent appear 'rounded', what had been 'a grouping of pictures' gains the depth of a 'stage'.

One of the main aims is vividness (ἐνάργεια, evidentia). For this reason, conversations (e.g. 31. 18) and individual achievements are often emphasized, expressly challenging comparison with dramatic art. An individual struggle may be isolated and seen through the eyes of the spectators (e.g. Livy 7. 9. 6–7. 10. 14). The reader imagines that the happenings are visible, even palpable. Here may be listed the 'description of an imaginary picture' as a literary means of presentation.<sup>5</sup>

The subjective aspect of an event, however, is made no less tangible.<sup>6</sup> The reader witnesses the process by which a decision matures

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Livy 29. 6. 17; 23. 30. 11–12; 27. 31. 5.

<sup>2</sup> 21. 14; 24. 39; 28. 19. 9–15; 31. 17.

<sup>3</sup> 21. 57. 4 neque ulla, quae in tali re memorabilis scribentibus videri solet, praetermissa clades est.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. App. Syr. 12 combines two embassies of the Aetolians into one; H. NISSEN 1863, 115.

<sup>5</sup> P. STEINMETZ, Eine Darstellungsform des Livius, Gymnasium 79, 1972, 191–208.

<sup>6</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 102, note 8.

(Livy 33. 7. 8–11). Adverbs of time may increase tension (32. 40. 11 nunc, nunc, postremo). Livy takes seriously the demand made by Sempronius Asellio (fig. 1 P.) and Cicero (de orat. 2. 62–64) that a historian must not only narrate events, but also explain the plans and attitudes from which actions spring. He takes great pains with the psychological reasons for what happens. In this, thematic key words may confer on whole sections a uniform color (gaudium 33. 32–33).<sup>1</sup>

Great stress is laid on clarity (σαφήνεια). Livy follows, partly inspired by demands of Cicero, strict rules for the depiction of battles: chronological sequence; explanation of the topography; presentation of the tactics; psychological background and motives. To this is added a division into time sequences or gradual revelations of the terrain (right wing, left wing, center). Large-scale scenes are cleverly presented from a bird's eye perspective (33. 32. 6–9). At times Livy succeeds, in spite of belonging to the ranks of 'unmilitary' historians, in describing maneuvers in his battles with more clarity than is found in Polybius and without any loss of substance.<sup>2</sup>

Brevity (συντομία), especially when alternating with fullness, is used to emphasize important moments. If Livy's description of Roman reactions to the defeat at Cannae is twice as long as that of the battle itself, what prevails is the picture of Roman courage and determination in a critical moment. Just like Caesar,<sup>3</sup> the historian fails sometimes to offer any preliminary explanation of military plans, describing only their execution. Such 'writing in perspective' produces suspense. Livy abbreviates abstract considerations offered by Polybius, though he too wishes not only to 'edify and startle'<sup>4</sup> but also to impart instruction. The sequence of battles in the Second Punic War, precisely in the inexorable pattern by which literary methods of presentation are repeated, lays bare the mechanisms which led to the Romans' ultimate failure.<sup>5</sup>

Characters are portrayed<sup>6</sup> both directly and indirectly. Just as Thucydides (2. 65) evaluates the great Pericles, so Livy assesses men

<sup>1</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 137–138.

<sup>2</sup> Polyb. 18. 19. 2–5; 20. 2–3; Livy 38. 6. 4–9.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. Gall. 7. 27. 1–2 et quid fieri vellet ostendit (without divulging the plan).

<sup>4</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 93.

<sup>5</sup> M. FUHRMANN, Narrative Techniken im Dienste der Geschichtsschreibung, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 19–29.

<sup>6</sup> W. RICHTER, Charakterzeichnung und Regie bei Livius, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 59–80.

of importance on the occasion of their deaths (Sen. suas. 6. 21), mingling praise and blame (Marcellus 27. 27. 11; Cicero apud Sen. suas. 6. 17). The first appearance of individual leaders may also produce (as at Sallust Catil. 1. 5) short character sketches (Hannibal 21. 4. 3–9; Cato 39. 40. 4–12). The history of this technique has been examined above in connection with Sallust.

A transition to indirect characterization is provided by comparison, such as that between Papirius Cursor and Alexander the Great (9. 16. 19–19. 17). The action often finds two contrasting character types at odds. That between the prudent Fabius Cunctator and the rash Minucius (22. 27–29) recalls Nicias and Cleon in Thucydides (4. 27–28).

This use of stereotypes can extend to collective verdicts on whole peoples: the treacherous Carthaginians, the decadent Greeks, and so on. Among the Romans, following annalistic traditions, the family name marks its individual possessors: Decii are sacrificial; Valerii are friends of the people; Fabii are selfless; Claudii ambitious for power; Quinctii frugal; Furiii reckless. Remarkably, Livy also shares the Roman disdain for the Italian peoples—naturally excluding the Paduans.

In the case of characters like Flamininus, the liberator of Greece, Livy suppresses negative features. Scipio for him is almost the embodiment of Roman virtus, including a perhaps unhistorical continence and clemency. But he refuses credence to the legends surrounding the birth and devotion to Jupiter of the hero, in this last point with more critical sense than some modern historians. Conversely, even non-Romans may receive admiration. Examples are Philip V of Macedon and Hannibal, though in this Livy avoids certain virtues reserved for Romans, such as moderatio, constantia, gravitas, magnitudo animi.<sup>1</sup>

Livy is also interested in the feminine psyche.<sup>2</sup> Along with his catalogue of the virtuous heroines of the old Roman period, implying an unmistakable warning to men to behave like gentlemen, even an ambitious woman like Tanaquil (1. 34–41) merits respect. At times, small weaknesses regarded as typically female raise a smile (6. 34).

Contradictions may arise between direct and indirect character portrayal. Hannibal, who when introduced is a godless and perfidious Carthaginian, in the action shows himself pious and honest. On the other hand Scipio's hocus-pocus is not concealed. Thus the most acute dangers of portrayal in black and white, if not wholly avoided, are at least held in check. Just like Sallust and Tacitus, Livy may have relied on his readers: by accumulating partly contradictory information he would convey to them gradually a living picture of the character in question.

<sup>1</sup> T. J. MOORE 1989, 157–159.

<sup>2</sup> On his ideal of women, T. J. MOORE 1989, 160.

Speeches and dialogues also help to establish indirect characterization. The general task of communicating a picture of the person and the historical situation is interpreted by Polybius in rational terms, and by Livy in emotional terms. The switch of perspective provided by direct speech allows different opinions, including that of an opponent, to find expression. The effect of a speech may be enhanced<sup>1</sup> by mentioning the general silence.<sup>2</sup>

Livy is an exponent of the 'Isocratean' manner, and for him historical writing is a task for orators.<sup>3</sup> Accordingly, in him direct speeches play a larger part than in Polybius. The speeches taken from Livy's History were highly regarded by the Romans and even read separately. At times addresses are introduced at unexpected moments. Yet the compass of speeches in Livy is rather briefer than in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Sallust, and Thucydides.

Because of his rhetorical training, however different the origin and nationality of his speakers, Livy furnishes them with a consistently uniform eloquence.

It is rare for Livy to depart far in books 31–45 from the material assembled by Polybius. But he lends to the addresses, with the aid of Roman exempla and formal polish, more brilliance. However, there are at times elaborations which make the reader suspect literary invention, as when the words of Valerius Corvus (Livy 7. 32. 5–17) recall the famous speech of Marius in Sallust.<sup>4</sup>

Livy sometimes reserves to particular characters the privilege of giving speeches. In books 43 and 44 (so far as preserved), all the more important speeches are delivered by Aemilius Paullus. Livy takes pains to convey a dignified portrait of his speakers' character, and to adapt their words to the situation. In the argument, utility yields place to considerations of honesty.

<sup>1</sup> On the theoretical basis for this, cf. Dionysius 6. 83. 2.

<sup>2</sup> 32. 33. 1, without basis in Polybius.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Cic. leg. 1. 5; de orat. 2. 62; 2. 36.

<sup>4</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH 1974; invention of the speech by Valerius Antias is possible, but less probable.

Livy uses speech and counter-speech to set out political debates and controversies. An example is the dispute between Fabius Cunctator and Scipio Africanus (28. 40–44). Partly perhaps here he is guided by his models. The shaping of paired speeches is illustrated by 33. 39–40.<sup>1</sup> Livy abbreviates the statements of Antiochus in the negotiations at Lysimachia in 196 B.C., and expands those of the Roman, so as to give similar scope to their speeches and coordinate their contents.

Dialogues had been familiar in history since the days of Herodotus (Croesus and Solon 1. 30; Xerxes and Demaratus 7. 101–104) and Thucydides (Melian Dialogue 5. 85–111). In such interchanges, Livy is concerned with the peripeteia. The contrast between the initial self-assurance and the subsequent confusion on Philip's part is sharpened and given physiognomical vividness (39. 34. 3–4; Polyb. 22. 13).

Livy aims to retrace events in all the subjective conditions which made them possible. He not only narrated Roman history, he penetrated it with human feeling. His mastery as a narrator is shown in the alternation of brevity and copiousness, the differentiation of foreground and background, the relation of perspective between these elements, the large-scale pictures and scenes. His narrative art is also in debt to epic.<sup>2</sup>

Generally speaking, rhetoric in Livy is the servant of empathy and vividness (ἐνάργεια), and the link between these two functions. It loses its natural one-sidedness or is reduced to develop it in a dramatic context, thus maturing into a precious instrument of psychological analysis or evocative impact.

Language and Style<sup>3</sup>

Tacitus' style defines itself more and more markedly from work to work, and only at a late period, in the middle of the Annales, reaches a culmination of its distinct characteristics. By contrast, Livy's style shows its most marked peculiarities at the very beginning, and seems then, in the course of time, to take on an unassumingly 'classical' stamp. Gradually perfects in -ere give way to perfects in -erunt.<sup>1</sup> Several hundred archaic or out of the ordinary words (e.g. in -men) are replaced by more common counterparts.<sup>2</sup> Syntax becomes more uniform.<sup>3</sup> An evolution of style can also be traced in linguistic niceties (minutiae), such as the use of copulas.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A different presentation in: Polyb. 18. 50–51; cf. also 37. 53–54 and Polyb. 21. 18–24.

<sup>2</sup> J.-P. CHAUSSERIE-LAPRÉE, L'expression narrative chez les historiens latins, Paris 1969, esp. 655.

<sup>3</sup> A. H. McDONALD 1957; E. MIKKOLA, Die Konzessivität bei Livius, mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der ersten und fünften Dekade, Helsinki 1957; T. VIILJAMAA, Infinitive of Narration in Livy. A Study in Narrative Technique, Turku 1983.

What are the reasons for this development? Is the Livy of the 1st books a beginner groping in uncertainty,<sup>5</sup> or does he consciously champion a 'modern' prose, tending to the poetic and already displaying features of Silver Latin? Does he then gradually abandon this trend, to return to a classicism in the Ciceronian manner? Or does he even at the beginning merely obey Cicero's directions, granting to the historian as exornator a more poetic language, appropriate also to the epideictic orator?<sup>6</sup> Is not the road from a Hellenistic and modern style to a classical one taken by many Roman authors, and quite regular for the literature of that people at particular periods? Or is the explanation to be found merely in the material and the authors who furnished it? Is a legendary color not appropriate to the fabulous events of old, something which could only have a jarring effect applied to the senatorial proceedings of a later period?

The opening books have been described as an epic in prose.<sup>7</sup> They owe their slight poetic color not so much to contemporary poets, such as Virgil and Horace, as to early Roman poetry, particularly to epic, though also to ancient formulas of religion and law, perhaps mediated by annalistic sources. Individual words should not be marked

<sup>1</sup> E. B. LEASE, Livy's Use of -arunt, -erunt, and -ere, AJPh 24, 1903, 408-422.

<sup>2</sup> J. N. ADAMS, The Vocabulary of the Later Decades of Livy, Antichthon 8, 1974, 54-62. For an argument against a general decrease in the number of poetic expressions, cf. J. M. GLEASON, Studies in Livy's Language, diss. Harvard 1969, summarized in: HSPH 74, 1970, 336-337; H. TRÄNKLE 1968. A fixed style for the genre of history at Rome (before Sallust) is something I find difficult to accept.

<sup>3</sup> E. MIKKOLA, Die Konzessivität bei Livius, Helsinki 1957 (with particular attention to the first and fifth decades).

<sup>4</sup> E. SKARD, Sprachstatistisches aus Livius, SO 22, 1942, 107-108; id., Sallust und seine Vorgänger, SO suppl. vol. 15, 1956; on more recent scholarship: H. AILI 1982.

<sup>5</sup> E. WÖLFFLIN, Livianische Kritik und livianischer Sprachgebrauch, Programm Winterthur 1864, Berlin 1864, repr. in: Ausgewählte Schriften, Leipzig 1933, 1-21; S. G. STACEY, Die Entwicklung des livianischen Stiles, ALL 10, 1898, 17-82.

<sup>6</sup> A. H. McDONALD 1957, 168.

<sup>7</sup> Cic. de orat. 2. 53-54, leg. 1. 5; M. RAMBAUD, Cicéron et l'histoire romaine, Paris 1953, 9-24, 121.

here as 'poetic' or 'unpoetic'. Ancient theory knows verba propria, and their opposites, verba translata, novata, inusitata, ficta, but not verba poetica. It is not the individual word which is 'poetic' or 'prosaic' so much as the context in which it appears. No consistent use of archaism is found in Livy of the type discovered in Sallust, but only hints intended to establish an atmosphere of a venerable past, adapted to the legendary tone of the early period, and to the importance of its topics and their status as examples.<sup>1</sup>

A sense of the appropriate (aptum), shown by Livy in his stylistic variation, links him with Cicero. The historian moreover expressly attests that he regards the great orator as worthy of imitation.<sup>2</sup> He is, however, not a devotee of some dead Ciceronianism, but writes as Cicero himself, if we take him at his own word, would have written history. Livy in this uses the language of his own time, following what was felt to be correct idiom in the Augustan time.<sup>3</sup> The importance of isolated 'colloquial' elements<sup>4</sup> should not be overestimated. Their employment may simply reflect the general development of language at that period.

As a stylist, Livy has quite different registers at his disposal. There are baldly annalistic sections: beginnings of years, lists of prodigies in simple paratactic clauses, though with variants in their introductory formulas. Extended narrative is quite different. Just as in the individual period the main ideas are placed in key positions,<sup>5</sup> within the narrative Livy adapts the length of his clauses to conform to the progress of the action.<sup>6</sup> In a brief introduction, the pluperfect is characteristic, indirectly conveying the haste of the narrator to reach the main action. In the center, a more detailed style prevails. The length

<sup>1</sup> The approximation to a clausula rhythm like that of Sallust (H. AILI, The Prose Rhythm of Sallust and Livy, Stockholm 1979) is to be distinguished from this problem. A certain closeness on Livy's part to Sallust is defended by H. TRÄNKLE 1968, esp. 149-152.

<sup>2</sup> It is an evident oversimplification to speak of a language 'whose controlling mechanism is a variant of classical grammar, to which, with the aid of particular and almost by this time conventional elements, the designation 'old' is added': J. UNTERMANN, Die klassischen Autoren und das Altlatein, in: G. BINDER, ed., Saeculum Augustum, vol. 2, Darmstadt 1988, 426-445, here 445.

<sup>3</sup> K. GRIES, Constancy in Livy's Latinity, New York 1949.

<sup>4</sup> Satin, forsan, oppido.

<sup>5</sup> W. JÄKEL, Satzbau und Stilmittel bei Livius. Eine Untersuchung an 21, 1, 1-2, 2, Gymnasium 66, 1959, 302-317; D. K. SMITH, The Styles of Sallust and Livy. Defining Terms, CB 61, 1985, 79-83.

<sup>6</sup> KROLL, Studien 366-369.

of the clauses is greater, though dramatic moments may be indicated by the asyndetic piling up of verbs. The conclusion is again marked by brevity. These characteristic procedures may be illustrated by comparison with Dionysius of Halicarnassus (e.g. Livy 1. 53. 4–54. 9; Dionys. 4. 53–58). Yet in comparing Livy with an author of his own time, the reader may run the risk of claiming for him things belonging to older tradition. Our aim here was to list the linguistic and stylistic means contributing to the unusual and quasi dramatic conciseness and suggestive power of Livy's narrative art. The historian's use of metrical clausulae is not that of Cicero and the orators,<sup>1</sup> and rather resembles that of Sallust.

Livy draws his comparisons from familiar spheres: the sea, illness, the world of animals, fire. Metaphors are often taken from war (arces, munimentum, telum); if some of them are bolder than Cicero's, this may be due to the natural development of Latin: Clandestina concocta sunt consilia, 'secret plans have been devised' (40. 11. 2); libertatis desiderium remordet animos, 'the hearts are pricked with a longing for liberty' (8. 4. 3); discordia ordinum est venenum urbis huius, 'the discord between the classes is the poison of this city' (3. 67. 6).

Change and persistence in Livy's language and style have therefore several causes: the influence of the annalists (and through them of Ennius); the linguistic sense of the Augustan period (of which we would like to know more); principally however, the adaptation to the particular topic. The special importance of artistic motivation in this field justifies a wish for more research into Livy's language and style.

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature

Livy wrote Roman history, not as a participant, but as an observer from a distance. In his first preface his literary activity almost appears like a withdrawal from reality (1 praef. 5). As a reward for his labors (whose full extent he would only apprehend in the course of his work),<sup>2</sup> he hoped to distract himself from the sight of present misfortunes and to secure tranquillity of mind. The latter is for a historian not a merely private concern. His duty requires him to strive for impartiality.

<sup>1</sup> R. ULLMANN, Les clausules dans les discours de Salluste, Tite-Live et Tacite, SO 3, 1925, 65–75; H. ALI, The Prose Rhythm of Sallust and Livy, Stockholm 1979; J. DANGEL, Le mot, support de lecture des clausules cicéroniennes et liviennes, REL 62, 1984, 386–415.

<sup>2</sup> 31. 1. 1–5; cf. 10. 31. 10.

In another admission,<sup>1</sup> perhaps the most fascinating he made (43. 13. 2), Livy excused himself for giving so much heed to warning signs from the gods (prodigies): 'In writing of ancient themes, I find in some inexplicable way that my own mind becomes 'ancient', and a sacred awe has inspired me.' Here it may be seen how the author becomes identified with his work and how in turn it affects him.

This passage however is not to be misunderstood as evidence of some romantic and backward-looking attitude. What he found on his voyage into the past he turns to the advantage of the present (cf. 1 praef. 10: omnis te exempli documenta, 'that you behold the lessons of every kind of experience'). The reader is drawn into events, and Livy thinks of a modern application of his historical insights.

In the first proem the author still shows a slight concern with his own fame. Later he disappears entirely into his work. He wrote (apud Pliny nat. praef. 16) that he had won fame enough (a dig at Sallust).<sup>2</sup> He argued that he could actually have stopped, if his untroubled spirit did not derive sustenance from his literary activity. Livy at that moment gave a positive answer to the question posed in his first proem, whether he would 'accomplish something worthwhile'. Conversely, in the late passage, he avoids specious motivations such as 'industry' or 'industry aiming to honor the Roman people,' of the kind Pliny would have liked to hear. Instead he gives a purely subjective justification of his labor, reminiscent of Epicurus who recommended work (and even political activity) only to the one who felt driven to it by his restless nature (cf. animus inquiet). This is to view work as therapy against fits of depression (apud Plut. mor. 465 C–466 A). Far from robbing the mind of strength, as might be supposed, activity furnishes it with nourishment (pasceretur). This means that the historian, in an subtle understatement, is saying even more than Pliny expects from him.

In section 11 of the first preface, Livy also speaks of amor negotii suscepti. He concedes that perhaps his devotion to his task may make him blind. Once again Livy is more subtle than Pliny. 'Devotion to work' would be a virtue for which the author claims credit. 'Devotion to the task and the object' sounds rather like a somewhat strange passion, almost requiring indulgence.

<sup>1</sup> K. KERÉNYI, Selbstbekenntnisse des Livius, in K.K., Die Geburt der Helena, Zürich 1945, 105–110.

<sup>2</sup> A further polemic against Sallust is discovered by J. Korpanty, Sallust, Livius und ambitio, Philologus 127, 1983, 61–71.

Ideas II

Moralizing Outlook. Livy is not to be understood without taking into account the ethical features of his work. The driving forces which interest him in Roman history are of a moral nature. Accordingly, ethical terms are more strongly emphasized in him than, for example, in Polybius.<sup>1</sup> But it would be premature to narrow the historian's perspectives to those of mere indoctrination. 'Morality' is set in a larger context embracing all human behavior. The historian's concern is with those kinds of behavior contributing to Rome's greatness and decline.

A basic notion in Livy's approach to history is that of exemplum (1 praef. 10). Just as for a young Roman witnessing his ancestors in the funeral procession parading 'to the life' in the garb of their highest office, so for Livy Roman history is a sublime world, removed from that of everyday, into which he plunges with awe. The essence of the exemplum consists in provoking or deterring imitation, and 'exemplary' historical writing need not in any way be prejudiced in favor of window-dressing. As, within the social fabric, the example of the older generation should carry with it the younger, so in Livy's opinion in foreign policy the virtues of a people should have a winning effect on its neighbors (1. 21. 2). Camillus therefore does not merely speak of Roman behavior. He practices it so convincingly that the Falerians voluntarily go over to Rome's side (5. 27). Exemplum may also be effective in relations between the orders. At the very moment when defeat threatens, the nobles offer an example of generosity, and the plebeians imitate their pietas (5. 7), so as not to be outdone by them in magnanimity.

The prerequisites for such behavior are qualities of which Latinists speak perhaps too rarely: consilium, sapientia, freedom from turmoil, above all concordia and pax. It is natural to think rather of Hesiod, of the Sophists with their idea of ὁμόνοια and the Stoic/Cynic doctrine of the world citizen. Varro had treated the theme of peace in his Pius, one of his Logistorici. The Augustan notion of peace<sup>1</sup> actually contradicted the expansive, old Roman idea of virtus. To avoid disappointing the senators, in spite of his policy of peace, Augustus was obliged to pay at least some lip-service to Caesar's scheme of a war with Parthia.

<sup>1</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 140.

Livy adopted Caesar's clementia and an almost Menandrian ideal of humanity. As early as in his version of the Aeneas story, he emphasizes restraint and generosity towards an enemy. The ties of hospitality<sup>2</sup> are observed between enemies. Antenor appears as a hero of peace. Latinus prevents a battle (1. 1-2).

After the Empire reached out to embrace the world, Romans had to learn to see themselves reflected in the mirror of history before all else as human beings, and to equate true Romanity with true humanity. Undoubtedly, this was a positive contribution by Livy to his countrymen's understanding of their own identity. National greatness, on his view, is only to be attained when leading personalities display moral attitudes and wisdom. In his attention to the kinds of behavior which had made Rome great therefore, Livy is only in appearance backward-looking. In reality, he is thinking of qualities from which Rome could derive sustenance in his own time. As a comparison with his predecessors shows,<sup>3</sup> Livy independently set up a system of Roman values for his own day. His concern was to establish a line of spiritual ancestors for behavior necessary here and now. What is humane was garbed by him in a double dignity, that of the old and that of Rome. To put the matter another way: under the auspices of what is humane, Roman history was set on a fresh footing. In this way, it lost its aspect of randomness, and received enduring life as a lasting 'poetic' creation<sup>4</sup>—or as a secular counterpart to Greek myth.

A corollary to Rome's rise was her decline, which in its turn was again traced to moral causes. Although the later books are lost, the proem already makes it clear that in Livy's opinion decline began at

---

<sup>1</sup> W. NESTLE, Der Friedensgedanke in der antiken Welt, Philologus suppl. 31, 1938, fasc. 1; H. FUCHS, Augustinus und der antike Friedensgedanke. Untersuchungen zum 19. Buch der Civitas Dei, Berlin 1926.

<sup>2</sup> L. J. BOLCHAZY 1977.

<sup>3</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prosa 110-126; T. J. MOORE 1989, 149-151.

<sup>4</sup> W. SCHIBEL, Sprachbehandlung und Darstellungsweise in römischer Prosa: Claudius Quadrigarius, Livius, Aulus Gellius, Amsterdam 1971, 90.

first gradually, only to change eventually into a precipitous slide. The possibility of a cure is something of which in his proem the historian is rather uncertain. It is not wholly unlikely that, if we had the work as a whole, we should have a less optimistic impression from it.

What were the religious and philosophical bases for such convictions?

Religion. Some scholars emphasize Livy's 'skeptical rationalism,'<sup>1</sup> while others talk of his 'unflinching faith in the old gods'.<sup>2</sup> Both points of view have some truth in them.

As an historian, Livy could not exclude from his work the religious elements of the Roman past. At times, he could not even extricate himself totally from them. Yet he was fully aware of philosophical reservations about organized religion: His 1st books already show a bias in favor of rationalistic explanation, and this continues, inspired by Polybius, even in the later portions. Thus there are certainly accounts of miraculous events, but the historian distances himself from them with such expressions as dicitur or ferunt. Even in the legend of Romulus,<sup>3</sup> he leaves undecided the decisive points: Mars' paternity, the suckling by the she-wolf, the apotheosis. Yet he adds in this regard that the historical evolution of the Empire confers on the Romans a retroactive right to demand from their subjects a belief in the divine origin of its founder (1 praef. 7).

In his 1st books, Livy notes a development of the Roman city-state that seems almost in accordance with the laws of nature, and in the course of the work creates the impression of a predetermined progress. The campaigns in the East are viewed from the perspective of a universal dominion.<sup>4</sup> He goes so far as to speak of divine guidance (43. 13. 1–2), and seems to postulate a religious justification for Rome's hegemony. But direct divine intervention is only rarely mentioned. Pre-eminence is given to the action and responsibility of men.

Like Polybius<sup>5</sup> and Cicero (Polyb. 6. 56. 6–15; Cic. rep. 2. 26–27), Livy recognizes the value of religion as a basis for social morality.

<sup>1</sup> J. BAYET, ed., vol. 1, p. xxxix; K. THRAEDE, Außerwissenschaftliche Faktoren im Liviusbild der neueren Forschung, in: G. BINDER, ed., Saeculum Augustum, vol. 2, Darmstadt 1988, 394–425.

<sup>2</sup> G. STÜBLER, Die Religiosität des Livius, Stuttgart 1941, 205.

<sup>3</sup> On the legend of Romulus' apotheosis, cf. K. W. WEEBER, Abi, nuntia Romanis . . . Ein Dokument augusteischer Geschichtsauffassung in Livius 1, 16?, RhM 127, 1984, 326–343.

<sup>4</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 131.

<sup>5</sup> H. DÖRRIE, Polybios über pietas, religio und fides (zu Buch 6, Kap. 56). Griechische

He regards King Numa's interviews with the nymph Egeria as a pious fraud (1. 19. 4–5), and Scipio's devotion to Jupiter as a political gambit. But his skepticism perhaps extends only to the cruder expressions<sup>1</sup> of religion (superstitio)—and even to these he pays homage at times—not to religious observance as a whole. From the ideas of religion the cultivated author attempts to winnow a kernel of patriotic truth.

Philosophy. In his philosophical studies (Sen. epist. 100. 9), Livy might also have come in contact with the ideas of the Stoic Posidonius. He himself can hardly have been a strict Stoic, since he lays little stress on the omnipotence of impersonal fate, rather finding the factors that shape history in human qualities.<sup>2</sup> As proof of Livy's Stoic convictions, emphasis has been laid on his presentation of Rome's growth as something predestined and inevitable.<sup>3</sup> In this he makes use of notions such as fatum<sup>4</sup> and fortuna.<sup>5</sup> The man of virtue is seen to succeed, the vicious fails, something which may already be noted in Cicero (nat. deor. 2. 7–8) in connection with the failures of Roman generals as punishment for their neglect of the gods. But this archaic interpretation, bearing more of a religious than philosophical character, certainly needs no philosophical justification. The Stoic doctrine, whereby the virtuous, respecting the claims of men and gods, live in harmony with fatum,<sup>6</sup> is something more subtle. The historian regards history as a period when military and civic virtues were put to the test, and this schooling was to render the Roman people capable of mastering the world. This means that historical responsibility is closely linked with the morality of the individual.<sup>7</sup> The 'moralizing nature'

---

Theorie und römisches Selbstverständnis, in: Mélanges de philosophie, de littérature et d'histoire ancienne offerts à P. BOYANCÉ, Roma 1974, 251–272. On the civilizing and political significance of religion cf. Isocr. Busiris 24–27; Xen. mem. 1. 4; Plut. Numa 8. 3.

<sup>1</sup> On Livy's picture of religious excesses s. W. HEILMANN, Coniuratio impia. Die Unterdrückung der Bakchanalien als ein Beispiel für römische Religionspolitik und Religiosität, AU 28, 2, 1985, 22–41.

<sup>2</sup> J. BAYET, ed., vol. 1, pp. xl–xli.

<sup>3</sup> P. G. WALSH 1961, 51–52. On Livy's interpretation of history see G. B. MILES, The Cycle of Roman History in Livy's First Pentad, AJPh 107, 1986, 1–33.

<sup>4</sup> 1. 42. 2 fati necessitatem; 8. 7. 8; 25. 6. 6. Even the gods are subject to fatum 9. 4. 16.

<sup>5</sup> Fortuna populi Romani, fortuna urbis is something more positive than fickle Hellenistic Tyche.

<sup>6</sup> J. KAJANTO 1957.

<sup>7</sup> Thus Aeneas must be presented right at the outset as free from every blemish:

of Livy's view of history implies therefore that an essential part is reserved to the individual<sup>1</sup> and his decisions. At times of crisis, it is not the mali, but the disengaged boni, who constitute the greatest danger.<sup>2</sup>

Since mores are revealed only in action,<sup>3</sup> there is no completely set system of Roman values. Their content appears with a fresh emphasis every time they are exemplified. The good old days, as Livy implies in his preface, for all their poverty, had a greater wealth of good examples than the superficially so wealthy present. From Florus, Lucan and Petronius we know how Livy explained the Civil Wars. External successes lead to internal crises. This insight is already foreshadowed in the preface. The empire was suffering under its own greatness. Was there to be internal or external wealth? Here Livy took an unambiguous stance. Against the background of the Augustan period, with its exaltation of gold, his verdict gains in recognizable relevance.

Does Livy develop a philosophy of his own, or does he not rather stand in a Roman tradition of historical interpretation? Echoes of Stoic doctrine are found from Cato to Tacitus, and there is undoubtedly a convergence between what is Roman and what is Stoic. Livy was not a philosopher. Stoicism supplied him with isolated features, enabling him to justify his patriotism and to put into words his sentiment about the meaning of life. For him as a Roman, Greek education was not an aim in itself, but a mirror furthering the recognition of personal identity. It is not surprising then that in some of Livy's personal utterances even Epicurean echoes may be detected (s. Ideas I).

The historian's point of view: markedly Roman perspective. Livy's aim was not to write universal history, but Roman history (cf. 1 praef. 1: res populi Romani). He meant to exclude events in which Romans played no part.<sup>4</sup> This viewpoint produces a continual conflict between moral

---

K. ZELZER, Iam primum omnium satis constat. Zum Hintergrund der Erwähnung des Antenor bei Livius 1, 1, WS 100, 1987, 117–124.

<sup>1</sup> U. SCHLAG, Regnum in Senatu. Das Wirken römischer Staatsmänner von 200 bis 191 v. Chr., Stuttgart 1968, presses to extremes the preoccupations with persons which she discovers in the sources.

<sup>2</sup> A. FINKEN, Ein veraltetes politisches Leitbild? Livius 22, 39, 1–40, 3, AU 10, 3, 1967, 72–75, esp. 75.

<sup>3</sup> Virtus in usu sui tota posita est (Cic. rep. 1. 2. 2).

<sup>4</sup> 33. 20. 13; 35. 40. 1; 39. 48. 6; 41. 25. 8.

conviction and patriotism. Thus as a 'well-meaning amateur'<sup>1</sup> Livy supplies the participants with noble motives, to which he is prompted by his 'naiveté in diplomatic affairs'.<sup>2</sup> He attaches particular importance to the fact that the Romans not only continually have the word fides (good faith) on their lips (θρυλοῦντες τὸ τῆς πίστεως ὄνομα: Diodor. 23. 1. 4), but are concerned to follow it in their behavior.<sup>3</sup> He attempts to excuse Roman defeats by circumstances beyond the power of his people to influence.

It is true that Livy in many of his verdicts could have shown more objectivity and justice, even without betraying his national pride.<sup>4</sup> On the other hand, unlike Fabius Pictor, for example, he no longer needed to defend his country against foreigners. This allows him to tell his countrymen throughout some unpalatable home truths, especially when he confronts critically the annalists.<sup>5</sup> He condemns the cruelty and rapacity of the Romans in Greece (43. 4). He does not conceal Flaminius' personal ambition.<sup>6</sup> In his picture of the failures and mistakes of Roman commanders, Livy at times is quite outspoken.<sup>7</sup> Efforts to excuse Roman defeats are rarer in the fifth decade than earlier.<sup>8</sup> Did he perhaps in the later, lost portions of his work emphasize these negative features more strongly with the aim of rendering evident the decline after 146 B.C.? The picture of Roman history which Livy communicates has many dimensions. He did not aim at any systematic distortion.<sup>9</sup>

The portraits of individual figures—Perseus is an instance<sup>10</sup>—are not free from internal contradictions. In the judgment of his charac-

<sup>1</sup> KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 476.

<sup>2</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 161.

<sup>3</sup> M. MERTEN 1965.

<sup>4</sup> J. KROYMANN, Römische Kriegführung im Geschichtswerk des Livius, Gymnasium 56, 1949, 121–134.

<sup>5</sup> M. MERTEN 1965. In his picture of internal Roman disputes, he makes use of a line of argument recalling the well-known 'speeches of barbarians': K. BAYER, Römer kritisieren Römer. Zu Livius 38, 44, 9–50, 3, Anregung 30, 1984, 15–17.

<sup>6</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 144–154.

<sup>7</sup> P. JAL, edition, books 43–44, p. lii; H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 132–135.

<sup>8</sup> P. JAL, ibid., p. liii; H. BRUCKMANN, Die römischen Niederlagen im Geschichtswerk des T. Livius, diss. Münster 1936, 121.

<sup>9</sup> H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 131–132 is more cautious in his judgment than H. NISSEN 1863, 29–31. Livy appears as patriot and propagandist in A. HUS, La version livienne d'un récit polybien, in: Mélanges de philosophie, de littérature et d'histoire ancienne offerts à P. BOYANCÉ, Roma 1974, 419–434.

<sup>10</sup> P. JAL, ibid., p. cii.

ters, Livy 'guides' his readers. At first he likes to draw a positive picture. Criticism often follows after a period of office is concluded (just as a lawsuit was impermissible against magistrates in office). The departing commander boasts of his achievements. His successor takes a skeptical view of the military situation. An example is the verdict of Aemilius Paullus on his predecessors (45. 41. 5). Hannibal, though introduced critically (cf. 21. 4. 9) is presented with increasing admiration and sympathy.<sup>1</sup> Literary means are used here to convey a content. Indirect presentation allows the author to illuminate his object from different viewpoints. Livy avoids direct praise, allowing, for example, the Greeks themselves to express their joy at their liberation by the Romans (33. 33. 5; contrast Polyb. 18. 46. 14). The same may be said of criticism. In a letter to Prusias, Antiochus condemns Roman imperialism (37. 25. 4-7; cf. Polyb. 21. 11. 1-2). A missive from the Scipios offers the countervailing defense of Roman policy (Livy 37. 25. 8-12; cf. Polyb. 21. 11. 3-11). Thus Livy constructs a 'stage' capable of more than theatrical effects. It allows a 'three dimensional' presentation, which, for all its patriotism, is able to create the impression of a certain objectivity.

Sympathy with the Senate. In his picture of the senate, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, for example, has eyes for nothing but the self-interested behavior of the Roman nobility. Livy, by contrast, idealizes the senate, and to a large extent leaves the social, economic, and political background of his story in obscurity. The word plebs continually receives negative attributes,<sup>2</sup> though Livy may also praise the modestia (4. 6. 12) of the common people when it is inspired by concordia. He is prejudiced from the start against 'popular' consuls such as Flaminius, Minucius, and Terentius Varro.<sup>3</sup> In the 3rd, 4th and 5th decades, Livy supplies invaluable material<sup>4</sup> about senatorial proceedings, but he pays insufficient attention to the groupings of different families, conservatives around the Fabii, and liberal-progressives around the

<sup>1</sup> On the development in the picture of Hannibal, cf. W. WILL, Mirabilior adversis quam secundis rebus. Zum Bild Hannibals in der 3. Dekade des Livius, WJA 9, 1983, 157-171.

<sup>2</sup> L. BRUNO, Libertas plebis in Tito Livio, GIF 19, 1966, 107-130, esp. 121 with note 126.

<sup>3</sup> Livy 22. 30 and 45.

<sup>4</sup> It provides evidence for F. MÜNZER, Römische Adelsparteien und Adelsfamilien, Stuttgart 1920.

Aemilii and the Cornelii. This often leads him to overlook the real motives in electoral struggles, although, in succession to Cicero and the Greeks, he attempts to understand events pragmatically by studying consilia—acta—eventus.

Livy's own point of view. As a Paduan, Livy was by tradition a supporter of the Roman senate. As an outsider, however, he had little understanding of the methods by which the power of the Roman senate was controlled to the advantage of the noble families. His closeness to Augustus has at times been exaggerated.<sup>1</sup> The extent to which he either champions or warns against monarchy<sup>2</sup> is disputed. His Camillus<sup>3</sup> displays features anticipating those of Augustus, but this does not justify any far-reaching conclusions. A possible criticism of Augustus in the later books<sup>4</sup> must remain entirely at the level of hypothesis. Conclusions for social history may be drawn from the speech of Valerius Corvus with its quite un-patrician note of the homo novus (7. 32. 10–17)<sup>5</sup> in the style of Marius' speech in Sallust (Jug. 85). Livy was from a municipium, just like Augustus. From the emperor, the knights—including the municipal aristocracy—received enhanced status. The historian was addressing himself to the upper classes of this new society.<sup>6</sup>

Like great epics, important works of history may arise after periods of profound social change, but only so long as a retrospective glance at the past is still to some extent possible. Viewed nostalgically, the Republic underwent a transfiguration. Some motifs of the older period were no longer understood by Livy; his question remained: what was the message of the past for the present?<sup>7</sup> He read the book of history, not as a politician or soldier, but as a human being.

Cultural Development. Using the regal period as his example, the historian elaborates the kinds of behavior leading to Rome's greatness. In this respect ἀρχαιολογία for Livy, as for the Greeks, was no mere retailing of sagas and surmises, but a science.<sup>8</sup> The historian's

<sup>1</sup> G. STÜBLER 1941; the correct view in R. Syme 1959.

<sup>2</sup> H. PETERSEN, Livy and Augustus, TAPhA 92, 1961, 440–452.

<sup>3</sup> J. HELLEGOUARC'H, Le principat de Camille, REL 48, 1970, 112–132.

<sup>4</sup> H.-J. METTE, Livius und Augustus, Gymnasium 68, 1961, 269–285; repr. in: E. BURCK, ed., Wege zu Livius . . ., 156–166.

<sup>5</sup> J. HELLEGOUARC'H 1974, 207–238.

<sup>6</sup> SYME, Revolution 317; 468.

<sup>7</sup> KROLL, Studien 361.

<sup>8</sup> E. J. BICKERMAN, Origines gentium, CPh 47, 1952, 65–81.

interest<sup>1</sup> in men and society deserves attention. The earliest days of Rome, as reconstructed by him, display conceptual unity. Romulus and Numa are two contrasting figures illustrating different interpretations of the 'kingly' office. The third king, the martial Tullus Hostilius, embodies the 'warrior' function; the fourth, Ancus Marcius, the founder of the harbor town of Ostia and friend of the plebs, plays the role of 'economist'.<sup>2</sup> The question whether these myths about early Rome reflect an Old Roman theology (Jupiter-Mars-Quirinus) or sprang from the brain of a Platonizing Greek may be left unanswered, but they had great significance for Livy. They showed from what elements Roman society was constructed. The rape of the Sabine women with its subsequent union (συννοικισμός) of two peoples, the story of Tarpeia, of Horatius Cocles, and the struggle of the three Horatii and Curiatii, are also open to interpretations on which light is shed by comparative mythology. The very successes of 'functional' analysis are a positive proof of the fact that Rome's early 'history' is mythology. In spite of the rediscovery of the historical basis to individual elements of Rome's early history, particularly with the aid of archeology,<sup>3</sup> the historicity of these early rulers cannot be considered. Rather, the story of the kings reveals how in Rome of the historical period, with Greek assistance, the development of a res publica was imagined.

Under Tarquinius Priscus, Rome completed the transition from an archaic to a more modern stage. With Tanaquil, a woman intervened in politics. Tarquin enjoyed a Greek education, he was an orator and owed his success to that art. This allows the recognition that behind the presentation of this first demagogue among the kings lurks a development only apparent later which provided inspiration for pseudo-historical invention. This was a proceeding often to be repeated in the course of Roman history. The same principle guides our historian as he seeks and finds in the Roman past the qualities of which his own time is in need; what we today call 'morality', is quite insufficient to describe adequately Livy's interest in social psychology.

There is also here however a little noticed but genuinely historical approach. Livy does not sketch a static picture of the Roman national character. He shows that it was not only values which developed gradually.<sup>1</sup> The historian is conscious of the difference in outlook between his contemporaries and Romans of old.

<sup>1</sup> DUMÉZIL, Mythe, vol. 1.

<sup>2</sup> The sequence is seen somewhat differently by R. J. PENELLA, War, Peace, and the Ius Fetiale in Livy 1, CPh 82, 1987, 233-237.

<sup>3</sup> E. BURCK, Die Frühgeschichte Roms bei Livius im Lichte der Denkmäler, Gymnasium 75, 1968, 74-110.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

The emended text of the first decade<sup>3</sup> deriving from the circle of Symmachus is preserved in the Codex Mediceus Laurentianus, plut. LXIII, 19 (M; before A.D. 968) with three subscriptions from late Antiquity. This was not a critical edition of the text in the modern sense,<sup>4</sup> but the settlement of a text (perhaps only in a single exemplar) which has set the standard for our transmission. It is considerably superior to the leaves of the Veronese palimpsest XL (V; early 5th century), with fragments from books 3–6, which, although independent of M, go back to a common source. Oxyrhynchus papyrus 1379 is the only preserved fragment of a volumen of Livy (1. 5. 6–1. 6. 1), but is of little importance for textual criticism. The medieval manuscripts for the most part date back to the 9th and 11th centuries, though the Floriacensis (Paris. Lat. 5724) is of the 9th century.

The most important witness for the third decade is the Puteaneus Paris. Lat. 5730 (P; 5th century). Its lacunae are supplemented by completely preserved copies: Vaticanus Regimensis 762 (R; 9th century) and Parisinus Colbertinus (C; ca. 11th century). Two further manuscripts are now lost: the Spirensis<sup>5</sup> and the Turin palimpsest (Taurin. A II 2) from Bobbio, of which eight leaves were known. Of them, one was lost before it could be collated by W. Studemund in 1869, and seven were destroyed by fire in 1904.

The fourth decade reached the Middle Ages in three manuscripts. Of an ancient manuscript from Piacenza (obtained by Otto III), only fragments

<sup>1</sup> This is a principal thesis of T. J. LUCE 1977, 230–297.

<sup>2</sup> R. M. OGILVIE, The Manuscript Tradition of Livy's First Decade, CQ n.s. 7, 1957, 68–81; A. DE LA MARE, Florentine Manuscripts of Livy in the Fifteenth Century, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Livy, London 1971, 177–195; R. SEIDER, Beiträge zur Geschichte der antiken Liviushandschriften, Bibliothek und Wissenschaft 14, 1980, 128–152; M. D. REEVE, The Transmission of Livy 26–40, RFIC I 14, 1986, 129–172 (bibliography); idem, The Third Decade of Livy in Italy. The Family of the Puteaneus, RFIC 115, 1987, 129–164; idem, The Third Decade of Livy in Italy. The Spirensian Tradition, RFIC 115, 1987, 405–440.

<sup>3</sup> The term 'decades' is found for the first time in A.D. 496: Gelasius I Adversus Andromachum contra Lupercalia, epist. C, 12, CSEL 35, 457.

<sup>4</sup> J. E. G. ZETZEL, The Subscriptions in the Manuscripts of Livy and Fronto and the Meaning of emendatio, CPh 75, 1980, 38–59.

<sup>5</sup> On this M. D. REEVE 1987 loc. cit.

are now preserved at Bamberg (F; Bamb. Class. 35 a; 5th century). Luckily, an extremely faithful copy now survives (B; Bambergensis M IV 9, 11th century), containing the fourth decade down to 38. 46. Independent evidence is provided by fragments from the 'Sancta Sanctorum' Capella in the Lateran (R; Vat. Lat. 10 696, 4th–5th century). The third, likewise independent, ancient manuscript was the now-lost archetype of the Codex Moguntinus (Mg), which survives only in printed versions (Mainz 1519 and Basle 1535). In collecting the preserved portions of the first four decades, Petrarch put scholarship in his debt.

For the fifth decade (books 41–45) only a single manuscript is available (V = Vindob. Lat. 15, early 5th century). It was discovered in 1527 by Simon Grynaeus in the monastery at Lorsch. Books 41–45 were published for the first time in 1531 in his edition at Basle. Finally, the Vaticanus Palatinus Lat. 24 preserves a double leaved palimpsest fragment of book 91 of Livy. It also was found at Lorsch.

Influence<sup>1</sup>

In spite of the criticisms made by Asinius Pollio (apud Quint. inst. 8. 1. 3; 1. 5. 56) and the emperor Caligula (Suet. Cal. 34. 4), Livy soon became a general favorite. The Elder Seneca praised his art of character portrayal (suas. 6. 21), while Quintilian<sup>2</sup> ranked him with Herodotus (10. 1. 101–102). His trustworthiness and eloquence were praised by Tacitus (ann. 4. 34. 3; Agr. 10. 3), and he was read by Pliny (epist. 6. 20. 5). In general, he provided material for rhetorical instruction (e.g. Hannibal: Juvenal 10. 147). Valerius Maximus took some of his exempla from him, and Frontinus drew on him for instances of military stratagems (strat. 2. 5. 31; 34). Curtius imitated his literary methods,<sup>3</sup> and Silius Italicus used him as the principal source for his Punica. The compilation of epitomes<sup>4</sup> began perhaps already <sup>1</sup> M. GRANT, The Ancient Historians, London 1970, esp. 217–242 (Livy) and 396–399 (subsequent influence).

<sup>2</sup> F. QUADLBAUER, Livi lactea ubertas—Bemerkungen zu einer quintilianischen Formel und ihrer Nachwirkung, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 347–366.

<sup>3</sup> W. RUTZ, Seditionum procellae—Livianisches in der Darstellung der Meuterei von Opis bei Curtius Rufus, E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., ibid., 399–409.

<sup>4</sup> C. M. BEGBIE, The Epitome of Livy, CQ n.s. 17, 1967, 332–338; P. L. SCHMIDT, Julius Obsequens und das Problem der Livius-Epitome. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der lateinischen Prodigienliteratur, AAWM 1968, 5; L. BESSONE, La tradizione epitomatoria liviana in età imperiale, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1230–1263.

in the first to 2nd centuries.<sup>1</sup> In Hadrian's time, Florus and Granius Licinianus used him as a basis for their own novel historical works. To this tradition later belonged Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, Festus, Orosius, Cassiodorus, and Julius Obsequens.<sup>2</sup> The poet Alfius Avitus (2nd century) turned passages of Livy into verse, for example, the tale of the schoolmaster from Falerii.<sup>3</sup> The surviving summaries of the contents of the various books (periochae) are dated to the 4th century. We also possess an epitome from Oxyrhynchus for books 37–40, 48–55, and 87–88.<sup>4</sup> The pious Eugippius (6th century) depends on Livy for his description of a crossing of the Alps.<sup>5</sup>

The significance of Livy for the Carolingian Renaissance has not yet been clarified.<sup>6</sup> In library catalogues of the 12th century there are frequent references to manuscripts of Livy. The story of Verginia is adapted in the Roman de la rose of Jean de Meung (about 1275). Nicholas Trevet (Oxford) was commissioned by the church to compose a commentary on the historian (about 1318). Dante speaks of Livy as one 'who does not err' (Inf. 28. 7–12, alluding to Livy 23. 12. 1). In essence, it seems that in the Middle Ages it was the first four books that were known. The copy of Livy made by Petrarch when he was only twenty years old (now in the British Museum) includes books 1–10 and 21–39. The poet also wrote a letter to the historian.<sup>7</sup> Livy's heroes appear in his sonnets, and Scipio was the hero of his Latin epic, the Africa. Boccaccio (d. 1375) is said to have translated Livy into Italian, and to have taken part in the purloining of the manuscript at Montecassino and its removal to Florence. Between 1352 and 1359 Pierre Bersuire,<sup>8</sup> a Benedictine monk and

<sup>1</sup> L. ASCHER, An Epitome of Livy in Martial's Day?, CB 45, 1968–69, 53–54.

<sup>2</sup> H. BRANDT, König Numa in der Spätantike. Zur Bedeutung eines frühromischen exemplum in der spätromischen Literatur, MH 45, 1988, 98–110.

<sup>3</sup> P. STEINMETZ, Livius bei Alfius Avitus, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., ibid., 435–447.

<sup>4</sup> A commentary is found in E. KORNE MANN, Die neue Livius-Epitome aus Oxyrhynchus, Klio Beiheft 2, Leipzig 1904, repr. 1963.

<sup>5</sup> W. BERSCHIN, Livius und Eugippius. Ein Vergleich zweier Schilderungen des Alpenübergangs, AU 31, 4, 1988, 37–46, esp. 42.

<sup>6</sup> H. MORDEK, Livius und Einhard. Gedanken über das Verhältnis der Karolinger zur antiken Literatur, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., ibid., 337–346.

<sup>7</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, Petrarca an Livius (fam. 24. 8), in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., ibid., 421–433.

<sup>8</sup> D. MESSNER, Die französischen Liviusübersetzungen, in: K. R. BAUSCH, H. M. GAUGER, eds., Interlinguistica. Sprachvergleich und Übersetzung, FS M. WANDRUSZKA, Tübingen 1971, 700–712; I. ZACHER, Die Livius-Illustration in der Pariser

friend of Petrarch's at Avignon, was commissioned by King Jean le Bon to make a partial translation into French, destined to provide sustenance for two centuries of readers. It was on Bersuire that Spanish (Lopez de Ayala 1407), Catalan, and Scottish translators (Bellenden) drew.

Though Livy was read at first for his collection of examples illustrating military tactics, political shrewdness and virtues, for the humanists of the High Renaissance with their hero worship he became the greatest of Roman historians. Lorenzo Valla (d. 1457) made notes in Petrarch's copy of Livy. In 1469 the Latin text was printed in Rome. This was followed by translations into German (1505) and Italian (1535) as well as a partial translation into English (1544). The Supplementa Liviana by Johannes Freinsheim were influential up to the 19th century; they were often published together with Livy's text.

Livy's story of Sophonisba (30. 12–15) provided the model for one of the earliest and most influential of Renaissance tragedies (G. G. Trissino, Sofonisba 1514/15). Machiavelli (d. 1527) composed his celebrated Discorsi sopra la prima deca di Tito Livio (published posthumously in 1531).<sup>1</sup> Livy was cited there 58 times in all, but a century later a committee of Venetian senators came to the conclusion that 'Livy was less to blame than Tacitus for Machiavelli's undesirable political views.'<sup>2</sup> Erasmus of Rotterdam (d. 1536) did not take Livy into his recommended list of educational readings, perhaps because hero worship was now less fashionable. But in 1548, the historian's native city, Padua, raised a mausoleum to him. Montaigne (d. 1592) was one of Livy's readers. Livy and Ovid were the sources of Shakespeare's The Rape of Lucrece<sup>3</sup> (1594). Corneille (d. 1684) modeled his tragedy Horace on Livy. Livy's impressive scenes, his exemplary characters and his ideas of civic behavior influenced literature and Buchmalerei (1370–1420), diss. Berlin 1971; C. J. WITTLIN, ed., T. Livius, Ab urbe condita 1, 1–9. Ein mittellateinischer Kommentar und sechs romanische Übersetzungen und Kürzungen aus dem Mittelalter, Tübingen 1970.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. MEHMEL, Machiavelli und die Antike, A&A 3, 1948, 152–186; J. H. WHITFIELD, Machiavelli's Use of Livy, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Livy, London 1971, 73–96; G. POMA, Machiavelli e il decemvirato, RSA 15, 1985, 285–289; R. T. RIDLEY, Machiavelli's Edition of Livy, Rinascimento 27, 1987, 327–341.

<sup>2</sup> M. GRANT, op. cit., 397.

<sup>3</sup> See also R. KLESZCZEWSKI, Wandlungen des Lucretia-Bildes im lateinischen Mittelalter und in der italienischen Literatur der Renaissance, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 313–335; W. SCHUBERT, Herodot, Livius und die Gestalt des Collatinus in der Lucretia-Geschichte, RhM 134, 1991, 80–96, esp. 91–92.

the arts from the Renaissance down to the time of the French Revolution.<sup>1</sup>

Livy became the model for historical writing among the new nations of Europe, who found particular inspiration in his picture of citizen spirit. His 1st books (in the translation of Du Rier, edition of 1722) inspired Montesquieu<sup>2</sup> to his pamphlet against the tyranny of princes (1734). Hugo Grotius made use of examples predominantly from Livy in developing his notions of international law.<sup>3</sup> Patriots advised young men to read Livy (and Plutarch). To the orators of the French Revolution, speeches from Livy, selected and translated by Rousseau, served as models.<sup>4</sup>

In the 19th century, B. G. Niebuhr recognized that Livy's 1st books were without historical value.<sup>5</sup> No doubt as a historian Livy does not satisfy the standards set, for example, by Polybius. But he furnishes, even if uncritically, a mass of information about the Roman Republic. In recent decades, archaeology and comparative study of myth even in subject matter have discovered new aspects of his work.

As a writer and narrator, Livy is a towering figure. The Pax Augusta secured a certain distance on the past and made a retrospect possible. Livy both assimilated the past and remodeled it for his own day, emphasizing the human aspects rather than technicalities and military details. It was thanks to the ethos, the mature narrative art, and the subtle handling of language displayed by Livy that Roman history became for Europe a storehouse of typical characters and human destinies whose influence may be compared with that of Greek mythology.

Editions: C. SWEYNHEYM, A. PANNARTZ, Romae 1469. * W. WEISENBORN, M. MÜLLER (TC), 10 vols., Berlin, last revised editions 1880–1924, repr. 1962. * R. S. CONWAY, C. F. WALTERS, S. K. JOHNSON, A. H. McDONALD, 5 vols. (books 1–35), Oxford 1914–1965. * B. O. FOSTER, R. M. GEER, F. G.

<sup>1</sup> R. RIEKS, Zur Wirkung des Livius vom 16. bis zum 18. Jh., in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 367–397; H. MEUSEL, Horatier und Curiatier. Ein Livius-Motiv und seine Rezeption, AU 31, 5, 1988, 66–90.

<sup>2</sup> S. M. MASON, Livy and Montesquieu, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Livy, London 1971, 118–158.

<sup>3</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 58–72.

<sup>4</sup> M. GRANT, op. cit., 397.

<sup>5</sup> K. R. PROWSE, Livy and Macaulay, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Livy, London 1971, 159–176.

MOORE, E. T. SAGE, A. C. SCHLESINGER (TTrN), London 1919–1959, repr. 1963–1971. * J. BAYET, G. BAILLET, R. BLOCH, C. GUITTARD, A. MANUELIAN, J.-M. ENGEL, R. ADAM, C. GOUILLART, A. HUS, P. JAL, F. NICOLET-CROIZAT (TTrN), 34 vols., (21 publ. hitherto), Paris 1947–1992. * J. FEIX, H. J. HILLEN (TTr), 8 vols. hitherto, München 1974–1991. * R. FEGER, M. GIEBEL, L. FLADERER and others (TTr), Stuttgart 1981 ff. ** Books 1–5: R. M. OGILVIE (C), Oxford 1965. * R. M. OGILVIE (T), Oxford 1974. * Book 21: P. G. WALSH (TC, ind.), London 1973. * Books 21–25: T. A. DOREY, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1971–1976. * Books 21–30: H. A. GÄRTNER (TrN), Stuttgart 1968. * Books 26–30: P. G. WALSH, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1982–1986. * Books 31–37: J. BRISCOE (C), 2 vols., Oxford 1973–1981. * Books 31–40: J. BRISCOE, 2 vols., Stutgardiae 1991. * Books 41–45: J. BRISCOE, Stutgardiae 1986. ** Concordance: D. W. PACKARD, A Concordance to Livy, 4 vols., Cambridge, Mass. 1968. ** Bibl.: E. BURCK, preface and bibl. survey, in: Die Erzählungskunst des T. Livius, Berlin 2nd ed. 1964, pp. ix–xxviii. * E. BURCK, bibl., in: id., ed., Wege zu Livius, 540–548. * W. KISSEL, Livius 1933–1978: Eine Gesamtbibliographie, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 899–997. * J. E. PHILLIPS, Current Research in Livy's First Decade 1959–1979, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 998–1057. * H. AILI, Livy's Language. A Critical Survey of Research, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1122–1147.

H. AILI, s. above. * R. BLOCH, Tite-Live et les premiers siècles de Rome, Paris 1965. * L. J. BOLCHAZY, Hospitality in Early Rome. Livy's Concept of its Humanizing Force, Chicago 1977. * J. BRISCOE, Livy and Senatorial Politics, 200–167 B.C.: The Evidence of the Fourth and Fifth Decades, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1075–1121. * H. BRUCKMANN, Die römischen Niederlagen im Geschichtswerk des Titus Livius, diss. Münster 1936. * E. BURCK, Die Erzählungskunst des T. Livius, Berlin 2nd ed. 1964. * E. BURCK, ed., Wege zu Livius, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1977 (with add.). * E. BURCK, Die römische Expansion im Urteil des Livius, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1148–1189. * E. BURCK, Das Geschichtswerk des T. Livius, Heidelberg 1992. * J. DANGEL, La phrase oratoire chez Tite-Live, Paris 1982. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Livy, London 1971. * N. ERB, Kriegsursachen und Kriegsschuld in der ersten Pentade des Livius, diss. Zürich 1963. * W. FLURL, Deditio in fidem. Untersuchungen zu Livius und Polybios, diss. München 1969. * J. FRIES, Der Zweikampf. Historische und literarische Aspekte seiner Darstellung bei T. Livius, Meisenheim 1985. * H. A. GÄRTNER, Beobachtungen zu Bauelementen in der antiken Historiographie, besonders bei Livius und Caesar, Wiesbaden 1975. * H. A. GÄRTNER, *Die Periochae der Bücher 109 bis 112 des Livius im Vergleich mit Caesars *Bellum civile, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 163–173. * K. GAST, Die zensorischen Bauberichte bei Livius und die römischen Bauinschriften, diss. Göttingen 1965. * M. R. GIROD, La géographie de Tite-Live, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1190–1229. * M. GRANT, The Ancient Historians, London 1970, 217–242 and 396–399. * H. HAFFTER, Rom und römische Ideologie bei Livius, Gymnasium 71, 1964, 236–250. * J. HELLEGOUARC'H, Le vocabulaire latin des relations et des partis politiques sous la république, Paris 1963, 2nd ed. (rev.) 1972. * J. HELLEGOUARC'H, Un aspect de la littérature de propagande politique à la fin du 1<sup>er</sup> siècle avant J.-C.: le discours de M. Valerius Corvus (Liv. 7. 32. 10–17), REL 52, 1974, 207–238. * F. HELLMANN, Livius-Interpretationen, Berlin 1939. * A. HEUSS, Zur inneren Zeitform bei Livius, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 175–215. * H. HOCH, Die Darstellung der politischen Sendung Roms bei Livius, diss. Zürich 1951. * W. HOFFMANN, Livius und die römische Geschichtsschreibung, A&A 4, 1954, 170–186. * I. KAJANTO, God and Fate in Livy, Turku 1957. * A. KLOTZ, Livius, RE 13, 1, Stuttgart 1926, 816–852. * A. KLOTZ, Livius und seine Vorgänger, 3 vols., Leipzig 1940–1941. * A. KLOTZ, Dichtung und Wahrheit in der livianischen Erzählung von der Schlacht bei Cannae, Gymnasium 56, 1949, 58–70; 192. * T. KÖVES-ZULAUF, Der Zweikampf des Valerius Corvus und die Alternativen römischen Heldentums, A&A 31, 1985, 66–75. * H. J. KRÄMER, Die Sage von Romulus und Remus in der lateinischen Literatur, in: Synusia, FS W. SCHADEWALDT, Pfullingen 1965, 355–402. * A. D. LEEMAN, Gloria, Rotterdam 1949. * A. D. LEEMAN, Are we Fair to Livy?, Helikon 1, 1961, 28–39; also in: E. BURCK, ed., Wege zu Livius, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1977, 200–214; repr. in: LEEMAN, Form 99–109. * E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius. Werk und Rezeption. FS E. BURCK, München 1983. * T. LEIDIG, Valerius Antias und ein annalistischer Bearbeiter des Polybios als Quellen des Livius, vornehmlich für Buch 30 und 31, Frankfurt 1993. * W. LIEBESCHUETZ, The Religious Position of Livy's History, JRS 57, 1967, 45–55. * K. LINDEMANN, Beobachtungen zur livianischen Periodenkunst, diss. Marburg 1964. * S. LIPOVSKY, A Historiographical Study of Livy, Books 6–10, New York 1981. * T. J. LUCE, Livy. The Composition of his History, Princeton 1977. * M. MAZZA, Storia e ideologia in Livio. Per un'analisi storiografica della praefatio ai libri ab urbe condita, Catania 1966. * A. H. McDONALD, The Style of Livy, JRS 47, 1957, 155–172. * E. MENSCHING, Livius, Cossus und Augustus, MH 24, 1967, 12–32. * M. MERTEN, Fides Romana bei Livius, diss. Frankfurt 1965. * T. J. MOORE, Artistry and Ideology. Livy's Vocabulary of Virtue, Frankfurt 1989. * H. NISSEN, Kritische Untersuchungen über die Quellen der vierten und fünften Dekade des Livius, Berlin 1863. * H. OPPERMAN, Die Einleitung zum Geschichtswerk des Livius, AU 2, 7, 1955, 87–98. * K.-E. PETZOLD, Die Eröffnung des zweiten Römisch-Makedonischen Krieges. Untersuchungen zur spätannalistischen Topik bei Livius, Berlin 1940, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1968. * E. PIANEZZOLA, Traduzione e ideologia. Livio interprete di Polibio, Bologna 1969. * O. RIEMANN, Études sur la langue et la grammaire de Tite-Live, Paris 1879, 2nd ed. 1885. * W. SCHIBEL, Sprachbehandlung und Darstellungsweise in römischer Prosa: Claudius Quadrigarius, Livius, Aulus Gellius, Amsterdam 1971. * G. A.

SEECK, Livius: Schriftsteller oder Historiker? Zum Problem der literarischen Darstellung historischer Vorgänge (Livius, Buch 21), in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 81–95. * P. A. STADTER, The Structure of Livy's History, Historia 21, 1972, 287–307. * P. STEINMETZ, Eine Darstellungsform des Livius, Gymnasium 79, 1972, 191–208. * H. STRASBURGER, Livius über Caesar—Unvollständige Überlegungen, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius . . ., 265–291. * G. STÜBLER, Die Religiosität des Livius, Stuttgart 1941. * R. SYME, Livy and Augustus, HSPH 64, 1959, 27–87. * H. TAINE, Essai sur Tite-Live, Paris 1853. * H. TRÄNKLE, Der Anfang des römischen Freistaats in der Darstellung des Livius, Hermes 93, 1965, 311–337. * H. TRÄNKLE, Beobachtungen und Erwägungen zum Wandel der livianischen Sprache, WS n.s. 2, 1968, 103–152. * H. TRÄNKLE, Cato in der vierten und fünften Dekade des Livius, AAWM 1971. * H. TRÄNKLE, Livius und Polybios, Basel 1977. * A. J. VERMEULEN, Gloria, RLAC 11, 1981, 196–225. * E. VETTER, Zur Darstellung des römischen Gründungsmythos bei Livius (Liv. 1. 1–16), in: Didactica classica Gandensia 19, 1979, 183–219. * P. G. WALSH, Livy. His Historical Aims and Methods, Cambridge 1961. * P. G. WALSH, Livy, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Historians, London 1966, 115–142. * P. G. WALSH, Livy, Oxford 1974. * P. G. WALSH, Livy and the Aims of historia: an Analysis of the Third Decade, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1058–1074. * F. W. WALBANK, The Fourth and Fifth Decades, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Livy, London 1971, 47–72. * G. WILLE, Der Aufbau des livianischen Geschichtswerks, Amsterdam 1973. * K. WITTE, Über die Form der Darstellung in Livius' Geschichtswerk, RhM 65, 1910, 270–305 and 359–419. * E. WÖLFFLIN, Die Dekaden des Livius, Philologus 33, 1874, 139–147.

POMPEIUS TROGUS

Life and Dates

Pompeius Trogus was of Gaulish stock (Vocontii). More than his origin, it must have been his education that contributed to the breadth of his historical horizons. Rhetoric (Iust. praef. 1) was not his only field of study. He was a Roman citizen. One of his ancestors had served Pompey, while his father enjoyed the confidence of Caesar. The latest facts he mentions are the surrender by the Parthians of the standards lost at Carrhae (20 B.C., Iust. 42. 5. 11) and the end of the Spanish War (19 B.C., Iust. 44. 5. 8). Furthermore, he was already acquainted with a large section of Livy's history (Iust. 38. 3. 11). A terminus ante quem of 2 B.C. was earlier assumed, a time which witnessed writings by Hyginus in which Trogus seems to be used.<sup>1</sup> Nowadays, a date under Tiberius is preferred. If Trogus is treated here, this is because he provides an essential supplement to Livy.

Survey of Works

De animalibus (book 10 is cited).

Historiarum Philippicarum libri XLIV

The first six books dealt with the Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Scythians, and Greeks. In books 7–40, the Macedonian monarchy and the kingdoms of the Diadochi were presented, down to the time when they were absorbed by Rome. In book 41, Trogus turned to the history of the Parthians, taking the story down to the restoration of the standards to Augustus in 20. A retrospective glance at the Roman regal period breaks off with Tarquinius Priscus. Gaul and Spain followed, down to Augustus' victory over the Spaniards.

The Macedonian Empire formed the center and the Roman Empire the culmination of Trogus' work. All local developments climaxed in that of Rome. This artistic structure is particularly visible in his prologues.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The chief source of his scientific work was Aristotle's Historia Animalium, though Trogus also made use of other authors (for example, Theophrastus).

The model for his history has been conjectured to be Timagenes of Alexandria, who came to Rome in the time of Pompey. But there must have been several sources (praef. 1. 3 quae historici Graecorum . . . segregatim occupaverunt, 'which the Greek historians . . . treated separately'). And we have to postulate an influence, if partly indirect, of the entire Greek tradition from Herodotus to Posidonius.

Literary Technique

Examples of historiographical technique in Trogus are his prologues and use of digressions with geographical or ethnographical content, in a way reminiscent of Herodotus. Though he shows a preference for elevated rhetorical discourse, he has a surprising dislike for direct speeches,<sup>1</sup> and criticizes their employment in Sallust and Livy (Iust. 38. 3. 11). His narrative is not that of the chronicle. He depicts even moods in an effort to lay bare the inner motivation of the action. His limit on the number of characters involved in action is also a feature reminiscent of Hellenistic historical writing. He displays his art of indirect characterization notably in passages of quite satirical power (e.g. 38. 4).

<sup>1</sup> A. KLOTZ, Studien zu Valerius Maximus und den Exempla, SBAW 1942, 5, 79–80; in favor of A.D. 14–30: O. SEEL, transl., introd. 15–18; and O. SEEL 1982, 1414–1416.

Language and Style

The speech of Mithridates (38. 4) is almost the only example giving an idea of Trogus' language. This is a long oration in oratio obliqua. The expression is terse and spare. Antitheses and clausula rhythms are appropriately employed. Occasionally, the use of images raises the style to greater intensity. The total effect is classical, and there is no trace of Sallustian archaism. The language has a certain resemblance to that of Livy, though the individual clauses are shorter and more sharply phrased.

World of Ideas

Trogus' purpose was to present non-Roman history, and so to provide a supplement to authors like Livy (Iust. praef. 1). Although expressions and speeches hostile to Rome are not lacking (28. 2; 38. 4), Trogus' sentiments are those of a Roman (Iust. 43. 1. 1). Like many Roman historians, he emphasizes the moral forces at work in events. Particular attention is merited by his sequence of world empires, with its center in that of the Macedonians and its culmination in the Roman imperium under Augustus.

Transmission

Trogus is known to us through the excerpts made by M. Junian(i)us Justinus. To this may be added prologues with indications of the theme and secondary evidence found particularly in collections of exempla. There are many manuscripts of Justinus. The main line of transmission, falling into three classes, is to be contrasted with the Codex Casinas sive Laurentianus 66, 21, (11th century). This contains 16–26. 1. 8; 30. 2. 8–44. 4. 3, and it alone supplies the lacuna at 24. 6. 6.

---

<sup>1</sup> Justin twice turns indirect speeches of Trogus back into direct (14. 4. 1; 18. 7. 10).

Influence

The scientific work provided material for Pliny the Elder.

The historical work at first was more used than cited, as by Valerius Maximus, Velleius Paterculus, Curtius, Frontinus, Polyaeus, and the grammarians. The excerpt made by Justinus survives. It was much used by the Historia Augusta, Augustine, Orosius, Cassiodorus, and medieval authors. Trogus' concept of universal history exercised great influence; this is especially true of his theory of the world empires (translatio imperii).

Editions: Iustini historici clarissimi in Trogi Pompeii historias libri XLIII, Venetiis, Nicol. IENSON 1470. * J. BONGARS cum notis, Paris 1581. * F. RUEHL, A. de Gutschmid (edition of Justinus, with the prologues to Trogus), Lipsiae 1907. * O. SEEL, Lipsiae 1935, Stutgardiae 2nd ed. 1972. * O. SEEL (synopsis of sources), Lipsiae 1956. * O. SEEL (TrN), Zürich 1972. * L. SANTI AMANTINI (TTrN), Milano 1981. ** Ind.: (complete, in:) P. J. CANTEL (edition of Justinus), Paris 1677. * O. EICHERT, Vollständiges Wörterbuch zur philippischen Geschichte des Justinus, Hannover 1882, repr. 1967. ** Bibl.: L. BREGIA PULCI DORIA, Recenti studi su Pompeo Trogo, PP 30, 1975, 468–477; s. also G. FORNI 1982.

J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, An Augustan World History. The Historiae Philippicae of Pompeius Trogus, G&R 34, 1987, 56–72. * J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, Pompeius Trogus on Spain, Latomus 47, 1988, 117–130. * J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, La Historia universal de Pompeyo Trogo. Coordinadas espaciales y temporales, Madrid 1992. * M. G. ANGELI BERTINELLI, M. GIACCHERO, Atene e Sparta nella storiografia trogiana (415–400 a.C), Genova 1974. * M. G. ANGELI BERTINELLI, G. FORNI, Pompeo Trogo come fonte di storia, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1298–1362. * L. FERRERO, Struttura e metodo dell'Epitome di Giustino, Torino 1957. * G. FORNI, Valore storico e fonti di Pompeo Trogo, Urbino 1958. * A. KLOTZ, Pompeius 142 (Trogus), RE 21, 2, 1952, 2300–2313. * T. LIEBMAN-FRANKFORT, L'histoire des Parthes dans le livre XLI de Trogue-Pompée. Essai d'identification de ses sources, Latomus 28, 1969, 894–922. * F. F. LÜHR, Nova imperii cupiditate. Zum ersten Kapitel der Weltgeschichte des Pompeius Trogus, GB 9, 1980, 133–154. * J. S. PRENDERGAST, The Philosophy of History of Pompeius Trogus, diss. Illinois 1961. * H. D. RICHTER, Untersuchungen zur hellenistischen Historiographie. Die Vorlagen des Pompeius Trogus für die Darstellung der nachalexandrinischen hellenistischen Geschichte (Iust. 13–40), Frankfurt 1987. * E. SALOMONE, Fonti e valore storico di Pompeo Trogo (Iustin. 38, 8, 2–40), Genova 1973. * L. SANTI AMANTINI, Fonti e valore storico di Pompeo Trogo (Iustin. 35 e 36), Genova 1972. * O. SEEL, Die Praefatio des Pompeius Trogus, Erlangen 1955. * O. SEEL, Eine römische Weltgeschichte. Studien zum Text der Epitome des Iustinus und zur Historik des Pompeius Trogus, Nürnberg 1972. * O. SEEL, Pompeius Trogus und das Problem der Universalgeschichte, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1363–1423. * W. SUERBAUM, Vom antiken zum mittelalterlichen Staatsbegriff. Über Verwendung von res publica, regnum, imperium und status von Cicero bis Iordanis, Münster 3rd ed. 1977. * J. THÉRASSE, Le moralisme de Justin (Trogue-Pompée) contre Alexandre le Grand. Son influence sur l'œuvre de Quinte-Curce, AC 37, 1968, 551–588. * R. URBAN, 'Gallisches Bewußtsein' und 'Romkritik' bei Pompeius Trogus, ANRW 2, 30, 2, 1982, 1424–1443. * R. URBAN, 'Historiae Philippicae' bei Pompeius Trogus. Versuch einer Deutung, Historia 31, 1982, 82–96. * H. VOLKMANN, Antike Romkritik. Topik und historische Wirklichkeit, Gymnasium suppl. 4, Heidelberg 1964, 9–20.

B. ORATORY

ORATORS OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

An unusually lively and fascinating picture of the orators of the Augustan period is conveyed to us by the Elder Seneca who, especially in the introductions to his books, sets before our eyes their individual personalities.

Oratory is an area of literature on which political changes are traced with the accuracy of the seismograph. While poetry experienced a time of classicism or of late classicism, the content of oratory underwent a painful transformation, whereas its style meant a step towards modernism. Certain categories of eloquence lost in significance, while others gained. Speakers such as Cassius Severus, who failed to observe or did not accept the fact that political oratory had lost its purpose, and sought to occupy a position of vigilance in society—the preservation and assertion of traditional values without regard to the person—were obliged to go off into exile, and enjoyed on lonely islands the opportunity to reflect on changing times (Tac.

ann. 1. 72; 4. 21). Severus, the self-styled critic of morals, may have provoked the senators in addition by his modest origins. The princeps was clever enough to play on their social sensitivities. But even the aristocratic Labienus fared no better. Courageous and candid as a speaker to the point of recklessness, he was driven to suicide, after the senate had ordered the burning of his books (s. above, Historians of the Augustan Period).

The older generation of Augustan orators is chiefly represented by C. Asinius Pollio (s. above, Historians of the Augustan Period) and M. Valerius Messalla.<sup>1</sup> These were figures morally independent of Augustus, and they won repute also as patrons of literature.

To the younger generation belong: Messalla's sons, Messallinus and Cotta, and Paullus Fabius Maximus. These were among the addressees of Ovid's poems from exile. The defense of a celebrated poet or intervention to secure his recall would have been in Republican times a challenging task for an orator. Now it was a hopeless undertaking, more likely to do harm than good. Just like the forensic speech, so the political speech naturally continued to exist. But its scope was essentially diminished, in spite of the flattering extension of some of the senate's powers. Now, important questions were mostly decided behind closed doors.

The virtuosi of the declamation were to be distinguished from the orators of the senate and forum. While public oratory was losing real significance, in auditoria and lecture rooms eloquence became a hothouse plant. Here even non-senators could shine as orators, practicing their wit on fantastic themes, whose contacts with reality could be easily excused as coincidence.

Among teachers of oratory, the Asianist Arellius Fuscus and M. Porcius Latro, a friend of Seneca the Elder, deserve particular mention. They were Ovid's teachers, and in his work modern rhetoric exercised a fruitful influence on poetry.<sup>2</sup> The Augustan school declamation was a genre fraught with consequences for the future. Modernistic prose would reach its height in the philosophical writings of the Younger Seneca. The pointed style, the opposite pole from Cicero's extensive periods, and rhetorical invention made their mark even on Imperial poetry. With Ovid and Lucan, they permeated epic; with Seneca, tragedy. Declamation will be described later in connection with the Elder Seneca.

<sup>1</sup> To these may be added, among others, Furnius, Atratinus, Arruntius, Haterius.

<sup>2</sup> Other masters of declamation were: the Roman knight Blandus, Albuclius Silus, Passienus, Cestius Pius, Alfius Flavius.

To an independent group belongs the Laudatio Turiae<sup>1</sup> preserved by an inscription, dated to the last decade of the 1st century B.C. This is a funeral speech uttered by a husband in honor of his deceased wife. The fact that the identification of the persons involved is not quite certain perhaps raises the symbolic value of the piece ('praise of an unknown wife'), but the speech is utterly personal. The old Roman genre of the laudatio funebris had long been transformed into literature: cf. Varro's satura Περὶ ἐγκωμίων and Caesar's speech on Julia. Here literary form and language are simple, unpretentious, and free of artifice. In content, the conventional eulogy of domestic virtues is outshone by quite specific individual traits, which convey the picture of a woman of importance. The speech, reflecting the fate of a married couple in troubled times, touches the reader by its emphasis on the sacrificial character of the two spouses and the modernity of their feelings.

Editions: ORF; Sen. contr. und suas. (bibl. s. under Seneca the Elder). * L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560, esp. 1503–1525. * R. SYME, History in Ovid, Oxford 1978 (Index of Proper Names).

C. PHILOSOPHY

PHILOSOPHICAL WRITERS OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

In the Augustan period philosophy at Rome enjoyed a good reputation and a good audience, but it had no representative of distinction. Virgil and Horace were attracted to Epicureanism, Virgil and Ovid to Pythagoreanism, all of these and particularly Manilius show Stoic influences. Even the architect Vitruvius emphasized the value of philosophy for the study of his discipline (cf. 1. 1. 7). Prominent amateurs included Livy and Augustus, who wrote incidentally on philosophy, though in this area can hardly themselves have hoped for lasting fame.

<sup>1</sup> CIL VI 1527 with appendix 31 670; DESSAU 8393; M. DURRY (Text, Translation, Commentary), Éloge funèbre d'une matrone romaine (Éloge dit de Turia), Paris 1950 (bibl.); W. KIERDORF, Laudatio funebris. Interpretationen und Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung der römischen Leichenrede, Meisenheim 1980, esp. 33–48; P. CUTOLO, Sugli aspetti letterari, poetici e culturali della cosiddetta Laudatio Turiae, AFLN 26, 1983–1984, 33–65.

The shift of emphasis is typical of the times. At the beginning of the Augustan period, a rational approach predominated among readers, with an interest in practical ethics, along with a somewhat more strongly felt bias towards politics. As the bias towards politics diminished during the course of the period, there was an increase of interest in natural science on the one side, and on the other in the search for practical help in life (even extending to dietary questions) and edification with a slight mystical slant.

The audience was select, but the technical literature just average. The lost tomes of a certain 'long-winded Fabius' and a 'bleary-eyed Crispinus' (Hor. sat. 1. 1. 13-14; 120-121), like the 220 volumes of Stertinius (ps.-Acro, Hor. epist. 1. 12. 20)<sup>1</sup> will scarcely draw a tear even from friends of the Stoa. Of more importance were the Sextii, who wrote in Greek. In the train of the early Stoa and of the Cynics, they expounded sober rules for life,<sup>2</sup> attractive to the common sense of Romans of the old stamp (Romani roboris secta: Sen. nat. 7. 32. 2). The assertion that Jupiter could do no more than a good man (Sen. epist. 73. 12) likewise struck an answering chord in the minds of Roman readers attitude toward life. To the taste of a generation already inclined towards mysticism, corresponded perhaps even more the successful Sotion.<sup>3</sup> He preached a vegetarian neo-Pythagoreanism, impressing an aging Ovid and a young Seneca alike. Papirius Fabianus, inspired by the Sextii to turn from rhetoric to philosophy, composed in Latin Civilia, Causae naturales, and De animalibus. He acted as a source for Pliny the Elder, and was the teacher of Seneca the Younger who lavishes praise on him (epist. 100. 9). The best of this modest number<sup>1</sup> win approval for their characters rather than for their literary talent. For philosophers, this is in fact a compliment.

<sup>1</sup> Crispinus seems also to have been a poet, though this does not prove that his philosophical works were written in verse (Porph. Hor. sat. 1. 1. 120); ps.-Acro (s. above) seems to support poetic form in Crispinus and Stertinius, but this may be doubted. A certain Sergius Plautus (the name is not entirely secure) appears to have deterred his readers by capricious terms such as queens and queentia (Quint. inst. 8. 3. 33; cf. 2. 14. 2).

<sup>2</sup> E.g. the daily examination of conscience (Sen. dial. 5. 36. 1), and vegetarianism, though based on rational grounds rather than on the transmigration of souls (Sen. epist. 108. 18).

<sup>3</sup> J. STENZEL, Sotion 3, RE 3 A 1, 1927, 1238-1239.

D. TECHNICAL AND EDUCATIONAL AUTHORS

TECHNICAL WRITERS OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

Among the technical writers<sup>2</sup> of the Augustan period, apart from Vitruvius, who will be treated separately below, two deserve particular mention.

C. Julius Hyginus

C. Julius Hyginus<sup>3</sup> was born in Alexandria or Spain, received his freedom from Augustus, and, after 28 B.C., had charge of the Palatine Library. He was also active as a teacher, but although getting support from a patron, died in poverty. Ovid addressed to him tristia 3. 14. Of his numerous writings, only fragments are known. Works on mythology and landsurvey circulating under his name come from a later period. The treatise on astronomy is regarded as genuine by some scholars.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> L. Crassicius and Cornelius Celsus must also be mentioned (s. Early Imperial Period): cf. further, L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560.

<sup>2</sup> Also deserving mention are: M. Valerius Messalla, Sinius Capito (Epistulae; Libri spectacularum), Scribonius Aphrodisius, L. Crassicius.

<sup>3</sup> GRF 1, 525–537; HR 2, pp. ci–cvii; 72–77; Works: a commentary on Helvius Cinna's Propempticon Pollionis; explanation of passages in Virgil; biographies; Exempla; De familiis Troianis; De origine et situ urbium Italicarum; De proprietatibus deorum; De dis penatibus; De agricultura; De apibus.

<sup>4</sup> From the 2nd century: fab. (T: H. J. ROSE, Lugduni Batavorum 2nd ed. 1963; P. K. MARSHALL, Stuttgart 1993; astr. (T: B. BUNTE, Lipsiae 1875; A. LE BŒUFFLE (TTrC, in favor of genuineness: between 11 and 3 B.C. and addressed to Paullus Fabius Maximus), Paris 1983; G. VIRÉ, Stuttgart 1992; grom. (T): K. LACHMANN, T. MOMMSEN, A. RUDORFF I, Berlin 1848, 108–134; 281–284; C. THULIN, Corpus agrimensorum Romanorum 1, 1, Lipsiae 1913, 71–98; 131–171; bibl. to both gromatici: FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 98–104; cf. also our chapter: Roman Technical Writers, pp. 575; 580.

Verrius Flaccus

M. Verrius Flaccus,<sup>1</sup> a celebrated grammarian and learned freedman, was the tutor of Augustus' grandsons. He died under Tiberius at a ripe age.

Among his writings<sup>2</sup> the best known is perhaps the last: De verborum significatu. This is the standard Latin dictionary with thorough linguistic and antiquarian explanations. Its very compass—though not that alone—marks it as one of the great works of synthesis still possible in the Augustan period. The letter A alone originally occupied at least four books. Later generations lacked such stamina. Verrius is preserved only in a single and a double abridgment by S. Pompeius Festus (perhaps late 2nd century) and Paulus Diaconus (time of Charlemagne).<sup>3</sup>

In principle the headings followed in alphabetical sequence. Within each letter, two sections may be clearly distinguished. In the former and longer, the key words were organized by their first two or three letters. In the second and shorter section, only the initial letters were taken into account, and the words were grouped rather by content or sources. Writers lacking in the 'first' portions are mentioned here. It is assumed that Verrius intended to introduce these additions into the finished 'first parts', but did not carry out this plan.<sup>4</sup> In the case of nine letters, there are also prefatory supplements from newly adduced works.

<sup>1</sup> A. E. EGGER (T), Verrius Flaccus, Fragmenta, Paris 1838; C. O. MÜLLER (T), Festus, Lipsiae 1839; H. FUNAIOLI (T), GRF 1, Lipsiae 1907, 509–523; W. M. LINDSAY (T), Festus, Lipsiae 1913; Charisius, ed. K. BARWICK, Lipsiae 1925; bibl.: L. STRZELECKI, Quaestiones Verrianae, Varsoviae 1932 (important for sources); A. DIHLE, RE 8 A 2, 1958, 1636–1645 (with bibl. and [at cols. 1644–1645] reference to additional fragments); F. BONA, Contributo allo studio della composizione del De verborum significatu di Verrius Flacco, Milano 1964.

<sup>2</sup> The Fasti Praenestini were perhaps composed by him. The Libri rerum memoria dignarum as well as Saturnus and perhaps also Rerum Etruscarum libri were of antiquarian import; grammatical questions were touched upon in the Epistulae. The Libri de orthographia, championing a moderately analogist point of view, were the ultimate source in the 1st century for Pliny, dub. sem. and Quintilian; in the 2nd century for Velius Longus and Caper; in the 3rd century for Iulius Romanus; and in the 4th to 5th centuries for Charisius. Verrius wanted to write the weakened final M (in cases such as laudatum est) as a half letter. His De obscuris Catonis was perhaps at least partly taken up into the De verborum significatu.

<sup>3</sup> Festus is preserved in the damaged Farnesianus XI (Neapolitanus). He influenced Porphyrio (3rd century) and Charisius (4th to 5th century). Glossaries draw on Festus and Paulus.

<sup>4</sup> Other possibilities have also been considered, such as the inept combination of Old Latin authors are cited in a fixed sequence, the same which will guide Nonius. Verrius does not simply depend on Varro, but draws a great deal of material from his personal reading.<sup>1</sup> His significance for our knowledge of the Latin language, literature, and religion is great.

Verrius was more exploited than quoted. He determined the tradition found in the grammarians and lexicographers. Ovid relied on him in his Fasti, as did Pliny the Elder in his Naturalis Historia, and Plutarch depended on him in his Quaestiones Romanae.

Agrippa's Map

A work typically Augustan in its claim to embrace the whole world must be mentioned here for its scientific and practical significance. The small attention paid to it in technical writers throws a telling light on the power of literary traditions. The most important advance in the field of geography<sup>2</sup> took place outside literature. The mapping of the imperium presided over by Agrippa, Augustus' commander, took twenty years of work, and was only completed five years after Agrippa's death. A defective copy is preserved in the shape of the Tabula Peutingeriana. Originally the map reached from England to China. Unfortunately, along with the first section, large parts representing England and Spain were lost. Given the inertia of armchair science, this achievement of the Augustan age in cartography hardly influenced the geographical writers of the Silver Latin period.

---

a source structured alphabetically with another that was ordered systematically, a later abandonment by Verrius of a purely alphabetical sequence, or an attribution of the 'second' portions to later editors.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Ateius Capito, Veranius, Antistius Labeo, Messalla Augur.

<sup>2</sup> W. H. STAHL 1962, 84–88. Edition: K. MILLER, Die Peut. Tafel, Ravensburg 1888, repr. 1961; K. MILLER, Itineraria Romana, Stuttgart 1916, 1929, 2nd ed. (repr. 1963); Bibliography: W. KUBITSCHKE, Karten (Peutinger), RE 10, 2, 1919, 2126–2144; F. GISINGER, Peutingeriana, RE 19, 2, 1938, 1405–1412; SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 2, 331–335; BARDON, Lit. lat. inc. 2, 103–104; R. HANSLIK, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, RE 9A, 1961, 1226–1275; K. G. SALLMANN, Die Geographie des älteren Plinius in ihrem Verhältnis zu Varro, Berlin 1971, esp. 91–95. The vis inertiae of armchair science goes on well into our own age: the fundamental importance of the works of A. V. PODOSSINOV (for example: Les traditions de la géographie antique dans la Cosmographie de l'Anonyme de Ravenne, in: Drevneyshie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR, Moscow 1989, 248–256 [in Russian]) is sometimes unduly neglected. Western scholars should not rely on the deadening principle Rossica non leguntur, which is not worthy of our otherwise so enlightened age.

VITRUVIUS

Life and Dates

Vitruvius<sup>1</sup> received a sound training as an architect (engineer). Under Caesar and later under Augustus he was in charge of the construction of war machines, though he probably should not be identified with the builder of Caesar's bridge across the Rhine.<sup>2</sup> Vitruvius built the basilica in Fano and constructed aqueducts, perhaps in 33 B.C. during Agrippa's aedileship. On the recommendation of Augustus' sister Octavia, he received in old age a pension from the princeps.

After his retirement, he composed his work De architectura (2 praef. 4). The writing had begun even before 33<sup>3</sup> and continued to the twenties.

Survey of the Work

The De architectura, the only work on its theme surviving from antiquity, is dedicated to Augustus. The 1st book treats the education and formation of the architect, aesthetic principles, the division of architecture, and the construction of cities. Book 2 examines building materials. Books 3 and 4 treat the construction of temples, book 5 that of public buildings, books 6 and 7 that of private houses and their interior decoration, book 8 aqueducts, book 9 astronomy and clocks, book 10 machines.

In modern terms, books 1-7 show the architect in action, books 8-10 the engineer.<sup>4</sup> Vitruvius himself (1. 3. 1) divides architectura into aedificatio (books 1-8), gnomonice (book 9) and machinatio (book 10). Aedificatio is concerned with public buildings (defensionis: book 1; religionis: books 3-4; opportunitatis: book 5) and private structures (books 6-7).<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> His praenomen is unknown, his cognomen Pollio is not quite certain.

<sup>2</sup> A mistaken theory in P. THIELSCHER 1961.

<sup>3</sup> Vitruvius still mentions (3. 2. 5) the Porticus Metelli (which after 33 B.C. was replaced by the Porticus Octaviae) and the Temple of Ceres (3. 3. 5) which burned down in 31 B.C. Conversely, he does actually refer to 'Augustus' (5. 1. 7), a passage which must have been composed after January, 27 B.C. The preface to book 10 speaks of the organization of games by praetors and aediles, though from 22 B.C. on only the praetors had this authority. Parallels from Horace (adduced by some scholars) are not literal and do not compel a later date for Vitruvius' work.

<sup>4</sup> P. THIELSCHER 1961, 433.

<sup>5</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1960, 78-85.

This scheme omits book 2, on building materials,<sup>1</sup> and book 8, on aqueducts. These belong to public rather than to private structures.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Vitruvius drew his knowledge from his own experience (e.g. 10. 11. 2; 8. 3. 27), but particularly from the tradition of craftsmanship passed down to him by the teachers he does not name (e.g. 4. 3. 3).

He names Greek technical writers in lists: Pytheus, Aristoxenus, Ctesibius, Diades. His theory of styles and proportions depends on Hermogenes of Alabanda (supposedly 2nd century B.C.). In natural philosophy he was influenced by Lucretius. Posidonius played some part in his theory of hydrology. The didactic poet Aratus and his commentators supplied astronomical information, and Varro did the same for the history of architecture.

Vitruvius seems to be the first to have presented his discipline in a comprehensive way. Among the Greeks there were in all probability only monographs on particular themes, and among the Latins at best short compendia. His work displays features of a technical treatise, though it is also rewarding to view it as a topical essay for the general reader.<sup>2</sup> This explains the differences between the author's prescriptions and the actual architecture of his day.

Literary Technique

The proems are conceived independently from the books they introduce. In them, Vitruvius shows himself, in spite of his protestations to the contrary (1. 1. 18), well acquainted with rhetoric. He goes far beyond the conscious artlessness of the textbook, evident in Varro's De lingua Latina, and approximates the topical essay with literary ambitions. He is able to win his reader's favor by excuses and stories (e.g. 4. 1. 9). His main concern however is with a methodical division of his material (2. 1. 8), brevity and clarity (5 praef. 2).

A category of text typical of his writing is found in his precise descriptions of buildings, machines, and devices.

<sup>1</sup> The division of material in books 1 and 2 is defended by Vitruvius at 2. 1. 8.

<sup>2</sup> K. SALLMANN in: H. KNELL, B. WESENBERG, eds., 1984, 13.

Background knowledge is introduced by way of excursus. Astronomy acts as an introduction to gnomonice. Theatrical acoustics are supported by a discussion of harmony.

Language and Style

Vitruvius' language<sup>1</sup> defies all convenient rubrics. Both popular and archaic elements are found (such as genitives like materies, 2. 9. 13). Yet there is also a quite determined search for style. The employment of synonyms attests a desire for variety. Technical terms peculiar to the genre of the textbook are on occasion given Greek endings. Even poetic words are not wholly absent. At times, the concern with clarity leads to pleonasm in the expression.

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature and Art

An introductory flourish on modesty (1. 1. 18) conceals the precise knowledge of rhetoric always important to Vitruvius both as author and as theoretician of architecture. He is anything but a negligent author and clings to his aim of clarity and systematical order (4 praef. 1). The difficulty of his text is mainly caused by the loss of the drawings which originally accompanied it.

His main purpose was to provide Augustus and all intelligent readers (1. 1. 18) with clear directives for their building enterprises. He wrote therefore as an expert, but not so much from the student's as the theorist's point of view. He explains how buildings should be, not how they in fact were in each individual case. His proems aim to assign a higher value to architecture as a form of art. Both in technique and art Vitruvius applies strict standards, which in his time must have created a conservative impression.<sup>2</sup> He passionately rejects the modern wall painting of the day and criticizes technical innovations. If he bases his criticism more on technical and economic principles than moral, this is in the first place because he hoped to convince sober readers, if by nothing else, by appealing to their sense of economy. His real motive, however, was more subtle. For an architect, 'economical' treatment of material is itself a question of professional ethics, and therefore, in the last analysis, an artistic principle. Vitruvius' stylistic purpose is in harmony with tendencies noticeable in Augustan literature and art. He wanted to form taste and it is not least on this austere attitude that a good part of his influence depends.

<sup>1</sup> A word first attested in Vitruvius is inquinamentum. Habitatio, known from Plautus, recurs. Such words are determined by the theme. Poeticisms include amnis and pelagus. Among colloquial constructions may be numbered: ablative of place at 2. 8. 10; partitive de at 8. 6. 14; maxime with comparative at 2. 3. 2. Cf. L. CALLEBAT 1982; E. WISTRAND, De Vitruvii sermone 'parum ad regulam artis grammaticae explicato', Apophoreta Gotoburgensia 1936, 16-52.

<sup>2</sup> H. KNELL 1985, 161.

Vitruvius' doctrine of proportions, widely influential in the Renaissance, opens bridges to other arts. As a prelude to his discussion of theatrical acoustics, Vitruvius in a passage (5. 4) taken from Aristoxenus (about 300 B.C.) furnishes his readers with basic principles of ancient musicology.<sup>1</sup> This remarkable extract serves a purpose since the bronze vasa, which were used to improve acoustics in the theater, had to be tuned at musical intervals.

Ideas II

The section on the formation of the architect (1. 1) shows Vitruvius as a supporter of Cicero's ideal of all-round education, displaying mastery of both theory and practice. All individual disciplines<sup>2</sup> are organically united by their theory (ratiocinatio; 1. 1. 12). The architect need not exercise each individual discipline, but must be acquainted with their theoretical bases, as well as the points at which they touch upon architecture. At the same time, he must be a philosopher, and in the course of the years, by his study in the different fields, rise step by step to the highest temple, which is that of architecture (1. 1. 11). In succession to Cicero and Varro, the author wishes to further humanitas and the progress of civilization.

His modules in the last analysis are derived by Vitruvius from man, his needs and his form. Basic notions here are ordinatio, dispositio, eurhythmia, symmetria, decor, distributio (1. 2). In terms of mathematics, these principles produce a harmonious proportion in every part of the building, but the rhetorical and ethical side of this teaching is not to be overlooked, since Vitruvius gives particularly large scope to the principle of appropriateness (πρέπον).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> P. THIELSCHER, Die Stellung des Vitruvius in der Geschichte der abendländischen Musik, Altertum 3, 1957, 159-173.

<sup>2</sup> Grammar, music (for the construction of theaters), physics (e.g. for machines), astronomy (for sundials), painting, drawing, sculpture, medicine (hygiene, climatology), mathematics, philosophy, the doctrine of architectural styles, history, mythology, law.

Transmission

The following manuscripts are used by modern scholars: Harleianus Mus. Brit. 2767 (H; 9th century), Guelferbytanus Gudianus 132 epitomatus (E; 10th century), Guelferbytanus Gudianus 69 (G; early 11th century), and Selestatensis 1153<sup>bis</sup>, nunc 17 (S; 10th century), Vaticanus Reginensis 1328 (V; 15th century), Vaticanus Reginensis 2079 (W; 12th–13th centuries).

The common earlier division of the manuscripts into five families is to be replaced with the double stemma proposed by J.-P. Chausserie-Laprée.<sup>2</sup> From the archetype X (8th century) derive two hyparchetypes: the first hyparchetype  $\alpha$  (abbreviated text) is represented by HWVS. In this list, WVS were copied from a lost manuscript  $\gamma$ , whose source was  $\alpha$ . The second hyparchetype  $\beta$  (full text) is represented by EG.

Unfortunately, the figures belonging to the text were already lost in antiquity. The restoration of a purified text of Vitruvius and the production of new illustrations faithful to it was the aim of the Accademia della Virtù in Rome (founded 1542).

Influence<sup>3</sup>

Vitruvius' hopes for posthumous fame (6 praef. 5) were not disappointed. The Elder Pliny and Frontinus drew material from his work. In Dougga, the capitol and the compass card were constructed in accordance with his doctrines.<sup>4</sup> M. Cetus Faventinus (probably 3rd century) made an extract from Vitruvius, which was used by Palladius (5th century). Sidonius Apollinaris (5th century) exalted him into a

<sup>1</sup> Οικονομία has also an artistic and rhetorical side: the intelligent relationship between expenditure and result and the calculated equilibrium of the whole.

<sup>2</sup> Un nouveau stemma vitruvien, REL 47, 1969, 347–377.

<sup>3</sup> H. KOCH, Vom Nachleben des Vitruv, Baden-Baden 1951; s. also G. Germann 2nd ed. 1987.

<sup>4</sup> The forum at Dougga received its definitive form under Commodus (180–192). The compass points were inset in the 3rd century; s. A. GOLFETTO, Dougga, Basel 1961, 36. They agree in principle with Vitruvius' instructions, though whether this was intentional is an open question: s. H. KNELL 1985, 41–43.

quasi-mythical representative of architecture.<sup>1</sup> The Byzantines looked to him for guidance in building Christian basilicas (5. 1. 6–10). In the 6th century his theory of the winds (1. 6) was turned into verse, and again a second time by Theodoric of St. Trond (about 1100).

Vitruvius' work was known to Cassiodorus, Benedict, Isidore of Seville (d. 636), Alcuin (d. 804), Einhart (d. 840), and Tzetzes (d. 1180). In Montecassino, Petrus Diaconus (12th century) made an extract from Vitruvius. More than 70 manuscripts attest his wide circulation in the Middle Ages.<sup>2</sup> His influence was enhanced by the discovery of Harleianus 2767 by Poggio at St. Gall in 1415.

From the Renaissance on, the extent of Vitruvius' influence on the theory and practice of architecture has proved almost immeasurable. The Florentine chronicler, Filippo Villani<sup>3</sup> (d. about 1405), demanded from the artist a general education, appealing to Varro for confirmation. In the De architectura many architects found the ideal style of architecture: in this, the doctrine of proportions played a predominant part. L. B. Alberti<sup>4</sup> (d. 1472), the great theorist of architecture, still depended for his knowledge of Vitruvius on manuscripts, and even modeled the number of his own books on him. Important in Alberti's eyes was Vitruvius' parallel between musical and architectural harmony. He scolds Vitruvius' language however for allegedly being neither Latin nor Greek.

The first printed edition appeared supposedly in 1487. Artists of different schools studied Vitruvius, including Bramante (d. 1514), Leonardo (d. 1519), Michelangelo (d. 1564), and Vignola (d. 1573). Palladio (d. 1580), who, in addition, based his theories on the measurements of ancient buildings, planned his last work, the Teatro olimpico at Vicenza, in accordance with Vitruvius' instructions. Albrecht Dürer (d. 1528) was also numbered among Vitruvius' admirers.

In the case of an author like Vitruvius translations play an important role in transmitting knowledge. The 16th century could already read him in Italian (C. Cesariano, richly illustrated, Milano 1521), in French (J. Martin, in cooperation with the sculptor J. Goujon, Paris 1547; J. Perrault 1673) and German (W.H. Ryf = Gu. H. Rivius,

<sup>1</sup> Tenere . . . cum Orpheo plectrum, cum Aesculapio baculum, cum Archimede radium, cum Euphrate horoscopum, cum Perdice circinum, cum Vitruvio perpendicularum (epist. 4. 3. 5 Mohr).

<sup>2</sup> C. H. KRINSKY, Seventy-Eight Vitruvius Manuscripts, JWI 30, 1967, 36–70.

<sup>3</sup> De origine civitatis Florentiae et eiusdem famosissimis civibus.

<sup>4</sup> De re aedificatoria libri X (1451).

Nürnberg 1548). No less a figure than Palladio furnished illustrations for D. Barbaro's (d. 1570) paraphrase of Vitruvius.

In the time of Louis XIV, Vitruvius' influence in France attained a high point. Colbert (d. 1683) linked in 1671 to the Académie française a Vitruvian academy of architecture.

Vitruvius' star set with Winckelmann (d. 1768), who made all kinds of objections to the 'scribbler'. He accused him of 'a cobbler's style, disorder in the plan of his work, childish simplicity and ill-digested knowledge of harmony.'<sup>1</sup> Civilized Europe seemed to have grown beyond Vitruvius' school. On his visit to Italy, Goethe read Vitruvius 'like a breviary, more out of piety than for instruction.'<sup>2</sup> Today there seems to be a new readiness to listen to the voice of an architect combining taste with humanity.

Editions: Giovanni Sulpicio da Veroli, sine anno (prob. 1487). * (An important collection of editions and translations is found at the Zentralinstitut für Kunstgeschichte München). * F. KROHN, Lipsiae 1912. * F. GRANGER (TTr), 2 vols., London 1931–1934; repr. 1970. * C. FENSTERBUSCH (TTrN), Darmstadt 1964. * Book 1–7: S. FERRI (sel., TTrC, archeol.), Roma 1960. * Book 3: P. GROS (TTrC), Paris 1990. * Book 4: P. GROS (TTrC), Paris 1992. * Book 8: L. CALLEBAT (TTrC), Paris 1973. * Book 9: J. SOUBIRAN (TTrC), Paris 1969. * Book 10: P. FLEURY (TTrC), Paris 1986. ** Concordance: L. CALLEBAT, P. BOUET, P. FLEURY, M. ZUINGHEDAU, Vitruve: De Architectura—Concordance, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1984. * H. NOHL, Index Vitruvianus, Lipsiae 1876. * L. CALLEBAT, ed., Dictionnaire des vocabulaires techniques du De architectura de Vitruve, Hildesheim, forthcoming. ** Bibl.: B. EBHARDT, Vitruvius. Die Zehn Bücher der Architektur des Vitruv und ihre Herausgeber. Mit einem Verzeichnis der vorhandenen Ausgaben und Erläuterungen, Berlin 1918, repr. 1962. * P. GROS, Vitruve: l'architecture et sa théorie, à la lumière des études récentes, ANRW 2, 30, 1, 1982, 659–695 (bibl. 1960–1979: 686–695).

J.-M. ANDRÉ, Le prologue scientifique et la rhétorique: les préfaces de Vitruve, BAGB 1985, 375–384. * J.-M. ANDRÉ, La rhétorique dans les préfaces de Vitruve. Le statut culturel de la science, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, vol. 3, Urbino 1987, 265–289. * C.A. Boëthius, Vitruvius and the Roman Architecture of his Age, in: Dragma M. P. NILSSON dedicatum, Lund 1939, 114–143. * L. CALLEBAT, La prose du De architectura de Vitruve, ANRW 2, 30, 1, 1982, 696–722. * M. FUHRMANN, Das systematische Lehrbuch. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wissenschaften in der Antike, Göttingen 1960, 78–85; 169–173. * E. GABBA, La praefatio di Vitruvio e la Roma augustea, ACD 16, 1980, 49–52. * G. GERMANN, Einführung in die Geschichte der Architekturtheorie, Darmstadt 2nd ed. (corr.) 1987. * D. GOGUEY, La formation de l'architecte: culture et technique, in: Recherches sur les artes à Rome, Paris 1978, 100–115. * P. GROS, Vie et mort de l'art hellénistique selon Vitruve et Pline, REL 56, 1978, 289–313. * A. HORN-ONCKEN, Über das Schickliche. Studien zur Geschichte der Architekturtheorie, Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften Göttingen, phil.-hist. Kl. 3. F., 70, 1967. * H. KNELL, Vitruvs Architekturtheorie. Versuch einer Interpretation, Darmstadt 1985. * H. KNELL, B. WESENBERG, eds., Vitruv-Kolloquium des Deutschen Archäologen-Verbandes (Darmstadt 1982), THD Schriftenreihe Wissenschaft und Technik 22 = Schriften des Deutschen Archäologen-Verbandes 8, 1984. * A. NOVARA, Les raisons d'écrire de Vitruve ou la revanche de l'architecte, BAGB 1983, 284–308. * H. PLOMMER, Vitruvius and Later Roman Building Manuals, Cambridge 1973. * E. ROMANO, La capanna e il tempio. Vitruvio dell'architettura, Palermo 1987. * W. SACKUR, Vitruv und die Poliorketiker, Berlin 1925. * A. SCHRAMM, Die Vorreden in Vitruvs Architectura, PhW 52, 1932, 860–864. * H. K. SCHULTE, Orator. Untersuchungen über das ciceronische Bildungsideal, Frankfurt 1935, 80–91. * L. SONTHEIMER, Vitruvius und seine Zeit. Eine literarhistorische Untersuchung, diss. Tübingen 1908. * P. THIELSCHER, L. Vitruvius Mamurra, RE 9 A, 1, 1961, 427–489. * E. WISTRAND, Vitruvius-studier, Göteborg 1933. * E. WISTRAND, Bemerkungen zu Vitruv und zur antiken Architekturgeschichte, Eranos 40, 1942, 143–176. * E. WISTRAND, Vitruv über den Kapitolinischen Tempel (De arch. 3. 3. 5), Eranos 64, 1966, 128–132.

<sup>1</sup> To Fuessli, June 3, 1767.

<sup>2</sup> Italienische Reise, Venedig, October 12, 1786.

JURISTS OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

The Beginning of Imperial Legislative Activity

The transitions from the Republican period to the Empire appear indeterminate, and great figures like Trebatius Testa belong to both periods. But, where the development towards imperial law and sources of law are concerned, and even in regard to the position of jurists, already under Augustus and his immediate successors the signs of a new age are unmistakable.

Concerning the right of citizenship, Roman politics had now to take into account the increasing expansion of the Empire.<sup>1</sup> Caesar had granted rights of Roman citizenship to northern Italy, and Latin rights to Gallia Narbonensis, Sicily and large areas of Spain. Now under the principate, further cities and regions were incorporated. The Constitutio Antoniniana (A.D. 212) formed the culmination of this process. Roman law became the law of the empire even if, especially in the eastern provinces, the previous native laws exercised influence on Roman law.

<sup>1</sup> E. FERENCZY, Rechtshistorische Bemerkungen zur Ausdehnung des römischen

Augustus<sup>1</sup> followed a fairly consistent legal policy. It embraced laws dealing with marriage and the emancipation of slaves, penal laws concerning the material aspects of crimes and the reform of civil and criminal proceedings. So far as form was concerned, the princeps attempted to stay within Republican bounds. At first, as part of his efforts to promote restoration, he sought to give new life to popular legislative initiatives (Mon. Ancyr. 2. 12), but without lasting success. Practical considerations demanded that laws approved by the people should be replaced by senatorial decrees, and thus senatusconsulta regulated even civil law. In the background of these senatorial decisions, the princeps often hovered as proposer. By their content the laws dealing with lèse majesté and marriage offered, at least potentially, possibilities of terrorizing Rome's upper class.

In legislative activity, direct imperial creation of law (Gaius 1. 5) acquired increasing importance in the course of the following centuries. The lex de imperio embraced even the power to make laws. At the side of traditional sources, such as earlier legislation, the opinions of the iuriconsulti and the praetorial edicts, imperial decisions came now to set their stamp on the way law developed.

Jurists still tended to belong to the ranks of senators. Cascellius and Labeo were frank in the expression of their republican outlook. C. Cassius Longinus accommodated himself to the new times. In any case legal scholars could not constitute any danger to the princeps, since they hardly engaged any longer with public law. Augustus however esteemed and promoted even jurists of equestrian origin,

---

Bürgerrechts und zum ius Italicum unter dem Prinzipat, ANRW 2, 14, 1982, 1017–1058; H. CHANTRAINE, Zur Entstehung der Freilassung mit Bürgerrechtserwerb in Rom, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 59–67.

<sup>1</sup> SCHULZ, Geschichte 117–334; F. WIEACKER, Augustus und die Juristen seiner Zeit, TRG 37, 1969, 331–349; W. LITIEWSKI, Die römische Appellation in Zivilsachen, I. Prinzipat, ANRW 2, 14, 1982, 60–96; P. L. STRACK, Zur tribunicia potestas des Augustus, Klio 32, 1939, 358–381; S. DES BOUVRIE, Augustus' Legislation on Morals—Which Morals and What Aims?, SO 59, 1984, 93–113.

whose families partly received senatorial rank for the first time under Caesar. This was the case with Alfenus Varus and Capito. Ofilius remained a knight, though without any noticeable disadvantage to his influence as a jurist. The brilliant legal scholar Trebatius had also no interest in an official career. This was the start of a development fraught with consequences.

Jurisconsults from the time of Augustus on received the ius respondendi ex auctoritate principis<sup>1</sup> (Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 49). This led to an increasing dependence of juries on the opinions of expert jurists (cf. also Dig. 1. 1. 7 pr.). These opinions at a later period actually acquired the force of law (legis vicem, Gaius 1. 7).

Schools of Law

In republican times, instruction consisted of listening to celebrated jurisconsults and conversation with them. It was only under the Empire that gradually an effort at formal schooling began. Later, the schools of Berytos (3rd century on) and Constantinople (425 on) were celebrated. With Augustus commenced a time of transition in which at Rome, thanks to links between scholars and to the close relations of teacher and student, the development of the 1st century A.D.<sup>2</sup> with its twin legal schools<sup>3</sup> of the Proculiani and Sabiniani seems to be anticipated.<sup>4</sup> In retrospect, it looks as if the beginnings of these two schools can already be detected in two important Augustans.

<sup>1</sup> W. KUNKEL, Das Wesen des ius respondendi, ZRG 66, 1948, 423–457; idem, Herkunft 272–289 (audacious!); 318–345; with greater restraint F. WIEACKER (see previous note); R. A. BAUMANN, The leges iudiciorum publicorum and their Interpretation in the Republic, Principate and Later Empire, ANRW 2, 13, 1980, 103–233. It is disputed whether these jurists were enabled to speak ‘in the emperor’s name’ or ‘with the emperor’s permission.’ The latter is more probable and presupposes that Augustus had generally limited the issuing of opinions (ius respondendi) to these privileged authorities.

<sup>2</sup> D. LIEBS (Die juristische Literatur, in: FUHRMANN, LG 195–196) regards the 1st centuries B.C and A.D. as part of the early classical period. He refutes an interpretation allowing the pre-classical period to stretch to the end of the Republic.

<sup>3</sup> The ancient sources liked to construct schools and relationships between teachers and pupils; J. KODREBSKI, Der Rechtsunterricht am Ausgang der Republik und zu Beginn des Prinzipats, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 177–196; D. LIEBS, Rechtsschulen und Rechtsunterricht im Prinzipat, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 197–286.

<sup>4</sup> In the 1st century, a certain difference may be detected. The Sabiniani or Cassiani set scholarly thought (which in Rome necessarily at times recalls Stoicism) preponderantly in the service of the organization of the entire corpus of laws and the preservation of tradition. They often therefore composed comprehensive accounts.

The most scholarly mind of his time, Antistius Labeo was considered the ancestor of the later Proculiani. He was a convinced republican, invited by Augustus to join the commission concerned with newly constituting the senate, where he intervened successfully on behalf of Augustus' enemy, Lepidus. Labeo followed the cursus honorum as far as the praetorship, but then rejected a consulship which the princeps had offered to him all too late.<sup>1</sup>

Labeo's favorite means of expression was the juridical commentary, and on this type of literature he set a stamp once and for all. He made a brief commentary on the Twelve Tables.<sup>2</sup> His commentaries in sixty (or more) books each, outdoing that of Servius by a factor of at least thirty, on the two praetorian edicts,<sup>3</sup> became later an indispensable work of reference. His Pithana, illuminating legal axioms, had links with Greek tradition. He reviewed the pontificum libri in his De iure pontificio. To these were added his legal opinions (Responsa) and other posthumous casuistic material (Posteriores libri XL); letters with legal content (Libri epistularum, Pompon. dig. 41. 3. 30. 1), perhaps inspired by Tiro's edition of Cicero's letters; and a commentary on the Lex Iulia de maritandis ordinibus (18 B.C.), and possibly also on other marriage laws.<sup>4</sup> His work comprised about 400 volumes.

As a student of the cultivated jurist Trebatius Testa, Labeo also developed his knowledge of philosophy and philology (Gell. 13. 10. 1), not in an antiquarian spirit, but creatively. In paying attention to verbal explanations, definitions and distinctions, this shrewd jurist profited from grammar, etymology and dialectic to in his quest to find the basis of law in individual cases, and in many points independently furthered private law. Stoic influence cannot be proved conclusively. He passed as the renewer of legal science, and enjoyed a high reputation with posterity.

---

The achievement of the Proculiani (in whom, apart from Stoic, also Peripatetic, influence has been supposed) lies in their precise and logical treatment of individual cases, not shrinking even from innovation. Their writings are mostly of a casuistic nature. The distinction fades in the 2nd century.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also A. WACKE, Die potentiores in den Rechtsquellen. Einfluß und Abwehr gesellschaftlicher Übermacht in der Rechtspflege der Römer, ANRW 2, 13, 1980, 562-607.

<sup>2</sup> Gell. 1. 12. 18; 6. 15. 1; 20. 1. 13.

<sup>3</sup> Gell. 13. 10. 3. The richest source of material is found in the Digests.

<sup>4</sup> W. STROH, Ovids Liebeskunst und die Ehegesetze des Augustus, Gymnasium 86, 1979, 323-352; L. F. RADITSA, Augustus' Legislation Concerning Marriage, Procreation, Love Affairs and Adultery, ANRW 2, 13, 1980, 278-339; J. H. JUNG, Das

Labeo's opponent, both in politics and scholarship,<sup>1</sup> was Ateius Capito<sup>2</sup> (consul A.D. 5). In his time he was no less famous (Gell. 10. 20. 2). He was a student of Ofilius (Dig. loc. cit.), branded by Tacitus (ann. 3. 70 and 75), for being one of the first jurists to serve the emperors, as a favorite of Augustus and Tiberius. He is regarded as belonging to the Sabiniani—although they never make mention of him—probably because the later academic dispute among the schools was made to reflect a personal enmity between the two best-known Augustan jurists. His mastery of pontifical and sacral law was better than of private law. The titles are known of his lost works: at least nine books of Coniectanea<sup>3</sup> on civil law (probably each book had an individual title); at least six books De pontificio iure;<sup>4</sup> De iure sacrificiorum (Macr. Sat. 3. 10. 3); and a work on augural law. Capito was read less by jurists than by lexicographers such as Festus (i.e. Verrius Flaccus), and scholars such as Aulus Gellius.

Bibl.: see Roman Jurists, above p. 630; also D. LIEBS, to appear in: HLL 3, 1, §§ 323–325.

---

Eherecht der römischen Soldaten, ANRW 2, 14, 1982, 302–346; Die Rechtsstellung der römischen Soldaten, ibid. 882–1013; R. VILLERS, Le mariage envisagé comme institution d'État dans le droit classique de Rome, ANRW 2, 14, 1982, 285–301.

<sup>1</sup> Tac. ann. 3. 75; Gell. 13. 12. 1; Dig. 1. 2. 2. 47.

<sup>2</sup> Consul suff. A.D. 5, from A.D. 13 curator aquarum; Edition: W. STRZELECKI, C. Atei Capitonis fragmenta, Lipsiae 1967; from an older period BREMER, Iurisprud. antehadr. 2, 1, 261–287; HUSCHKE, Iurisprud. anteiust. 1, 6th ed. (ed. SECKEL-KÜBLER), Lipsiae 1908, 62–72; KRÜGER, Quellen 2, 159; also P. JÖRS, Ateius 8, RE 2, 2, 1896, 1904–1910; KUNKEL, Herkunft 114–115.

<sup>3</sup> Gell. 4. 14. 1; 10. 6. 4; 4. 10. 7; 14. 7. 13; 8. 2 (hence, no more than 3 books).

<sup>4</sup> Gell. 4. 6. 10; Fest. p. 154 M. = 144 L.; Macr. Sat. 7. 13. 11.

A History of Roman Literature (Michael von Albrecht) is the fourth handbook in E.J. Brill's series The Classical Tradition. The series started in 1995 with Nicholas Horsfall's A Companion to the Study of Virgil and forms part of the Supplements to Mnemosyne series.

The aim is in each case to produce a work which is informative and useful to scholars and accessible to students. Each volume will describe the current state of knowledge of the subject, outline recent literature and discussion, indicate the main controversial points, and suggest fruitful lines for future inquiry. The volumes will be 300 to 1000 pages long and written in English. Some will be written by individual experts: others will assemble chapters by the leading figures in the field concerned under the editorship of one or more senior scholars.

Volumes planned in the series include:

Greek Lyric, edited by Douglas Gerber (1997)

Fourth-Century Greece, by John Buckler (1998)

Greek Colonization, edited by Irad Malkin (1998)

Illustration on the dustjacket:

The Capitoline She-wolf. Seventh century B.C., bronze. Rome, Museo Capitolino. (Permission Giraudon.)

---

Editors

J. M. BREMER • L. F. JANSSEN

H. PINKSTER • H. W. PLEKET

C. J. RUIJGH • P. H. SCHRIJVERS

---

Supplements to Mnemosyne has existed as a book series for the past 40 years, providing a forum for the publication of well over 100 scholarly works on all aspects of the ancient world, including inscriptions, papyri, language, the history of material culture and mentality, the history of peoples and institutions, but also latterly the classical tradition, for example, neo-Latin literature and the history of Classical scholarship.

Works published include monographs, critical text editions, commentaries, and collections of essays by various authors on closely defined themes.

147 Garrison, E.P. Groaning Tears. Ethical and Dramatic Aspects of Suicide in Greek Tragedy. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10241 8

148 Olson, S.D. Blood and Iron. Stories and Storytelling in Homer's Odyssey. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10251 5

149 Vinogradov, J.G. and S.D. Kryžickij. Olbia. Eine altgriechische Stadt im Nordwestlichen Schwarzmeerraum. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09677 9

150 Maurer, K. Interpolation in Thucydides. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10300 7

151 Horsfall, N. (ed.). A Companion to the Study of Virgil. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09559 4

152 Knight V. The Renewal of Epic. Responses to Homer in the Argonautica of Apollonius. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10386 4

153 Lusching, C.A.E. The Gorgon's Severed Head. Studies of Alcestis, Electra and Phoenissae. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10382 1

154 Navarro Antolín, F. (ed.). Lygdamus. Corpus Tibullianum 111. 1-6: Lygdami Elegiarum Liber. Edition and Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10210 8

155 Matthews, V.J. Antimachus of Colophon. Text and Commentary. 1996.

ISBN 90 04 10468 2

156 Treister, M.Y. The Role of Metals in Ancient Greek History. 1996.

ISBN 90 04 10473 9

157 Worthington, I. (ed.). Voice into Text. Orality and Literacy in Ancient Greece. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10431 3

158 Wijsman, H.J.W. Valerius Flaccus: Argonautica, Book v. A Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10506 9

159 Schmeling, G. (ed.). The Novel in the Ancient World. 1996. ISBN 90 04 09630 2

160 Sicking, C.M.J. and P. Stork. Two Studies in the Semantics of the Verb in Classical Greek. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10460 7

161 Kovacs, D. Euripidea Altera. 1996.

ISBN 90 04 10624 3

162 Gera, D. Warrior Women. The Anonymous Tractatus De Mulieribus. 1997.

ISBN 90 04 10665 0

163 Morris, I. and B. Powell (eds.). A New Companion to Homer. 1997.

ISBN 90 04 09989 1

164 Orlin, E.M. Temples, Religion and Politics in the Roman Republic. 1997.

ISBN 90 04 10708 8

165 Albrecht, M. von. A History of Roman Literature. From Livius Andronicus to Boethius with Special Regard to Its Influence on World Literature. 2 Vols.

Revised by G. Schmeling and by the Author. Vol. 1: Translated with the Assistance of F. and K. Newman, Vol. 2:

Translated with the Assistance of R.R. Caston and F.R. Schwartz. 1997.

ISBN 90 04 10709 6 (Vol. 1),

ISBN 90 04 10711 8 (Vol. 2),

ISBN 90 04 10712 6 (Set)

ISBN 90-04-10711-8

9 789004 107113

ISSN 0169-8958

Michael von Albrecht

A History of
Roman Literature

From Livius Andronicus to Boethius

VOLUME TWO

E. J. BRILL

Michael von Albrecht's A History of Roman Literature, originally published in German, can rightly be seen as the long awaited counterpart to Albin Lesky's Geschichte der griechischen Literatur. In what will probably be the last survey made by a single scholar the whole of Latin literature from Livius Andronicus up to Boethius comes to the fore. 'Literature' is taken here in its broad, antique sense, and therefore also includes e.g. rhetoric, philosophy and history. Special attention has been given to the influence of Latin literature on subsequent centuries down to our own days. Extensive indices give access to this monument of learning. The introductions in Von Albrecht's texts, together with the large bibliographies make further study both more fruitful and easy.

Michael von Albrecht is Emeritus Professor of Classical Philology at the University of Heidelberg. He studied in Tübingen and Paris and has held several guest professorships in the United States and the Netherlands. He is a specialist in Classical Latin poetry (Ovid, Vergil), in Latin high prose (Cicero), text syntax and style, narrative structure, the influence of the Classical tradition in modern literature and music. He is editor of Studien zur Klassischen Philologie, and International Journal of Musicology. His publications include M. Tullius Cicero, Sprache und Stil (1971), Meister römischer Poesie (1971, English translation 1988), Rom: Spiegel Europas (1988), Ovid: Metamorphosen (1989).

A HISTORY OF
ROMAN LITERATURE
VOLUME TWO

MNEMOSYNE

BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA BATAVA

---

COLLEGERUNT

J. M. BREMER · L. F. JANSSEN · H. PINKSTER

H. W. PLEKET · C. J. RUIJGH · P. H. SCHRIJVERS

BIBLIOTHECAE FASCICULOS EDENDOS CURAVIT

C. J. RUIJGH, KLASSIEK SEMINARIUM, OUDE TURFMARKT 129, AMSTERDAM

SUPPLEMENTUM CENTESIMUM SEXAGESIMUM QUINTUM

MICHAEL VON ALBRECHT

A HISTORY OF ROMAN LITERATURE

VOLUME TWO

A HISTORY OF ROMAN LITERATURE

From Livius Andronicus to Boethius

WITH SPECIAL REGARD TO ITS INFLUENCE ON WORLD LITERATURE

BY

MICHAEL VON ALBRECHT

Revised by Gareth Schmeling and by the author

VOLUME TWO

Translated with the Assistance of Ruth R. Caston and Francis R. Schwartz

E.J. BRILL
LEIDEN · NEW YORK · KÖLN
1997

This English edition was supported by the Stiftung Humanismus Heute des Landes Baden-Württemberg, by the Robert Bosch Company, and by the Inter Nationes (Bonn).

The paper in this book meets the guidelines for permanence and durability of the Committee on Production Guidelines for Book Longevity of the Council on Library Resources.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Albrecht, Michael von.

[Geschichte der römischen Literatur. English]

A history of Roman literature : from Livius Andronicus to Boethius
: with special regard to its influence on world literature / by Michael von Albrecht ; revised by Gareth Schmeling and by the author.

p. cm. — (Mnemosyne, bibliotheca classica Batava.

Supplementum, ISSN 0169-8958 ; 165)

Vol. 1 translated with the assistance of Frances and Kevin Newman ;
v. 2 translated with the assistance of Ruth R. Caston and Francis R.
Schwartz.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 9004107126 (set : alk. paper). — ISBN 9004107096 (v. 1 :

alk. paper). — ISBN 9004107118 (v. 2 : alk. paper)

1. Latin literature—History and criticism. 2. Literature, Modern—Roman influences. 3. Rome—In literature. I. Schmeling, Gareth L. II. Title. III. Series.

PA60Q7.A5513 1996

870.9'001—dc20

96-38926

CIP

Die Deutsche Bibliothek – CIP-Einheitsaufnahme

[Mnemosyne / Supplementum]

Mnemosyne : bibliotheca classica Batava. Supplementum. – Leiden ; New York ; Köln : Brill.

Früher Schriftenreihe

Reihe Supplementum zu: Mnemosyne

165. Albrecht, Michael von: A history of Roman literature.

Vol. 2 – 1996

Albrecht, Michael von:

A history of Roman literature : from Livius Andronicus to Boethius ; with special regard to its influence on world literature / by Michael von Albrecht. Rev. by Gareth Schmeling and by the author. – Leiden ; New York ; Köln : Brill.

(Mnemosyne : Supplementum ; 165)

ISBN 90-04-10712-6

NE: Schmeling, Gareth [Bearb.]

Vol. 2. Transl. with the assistance of Ruth R. Caston and

Francis R. Schwartz. – 1996

ISBN 90-04-10711-8

ISBN 90 04 10712 6 (Set)

ISBN 90 04 10711 8 (Vol. 2)

Original German edition: © Copyright <sup>2</sup>1994 by K.G. Saur, München;
New Providence, London; Paris

This edition: © Copyright 1997 by E.J. Brill, Leiden, The Netherlands

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by E.J. Brill provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910
Danvers MA 01923, USA.

Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

This book was planned as a single unit, and its division into two volumes is due purely to external constraints.

The four sections referring to periods (e.g. 'Survey of the Literature of the Republican Period') which introduce each of the major Chapters II to V present synchronical overviews of the literary activity of that period. There follows a detailed discussion of poetry and, subsequently, prose according to genres and authors. Within each period, works of the same genre are, where possible, treated together. However, authors active in several genres appear only in one place.

The sub-sections on genre (e.g. 'Roman Epic') are intended to facilitate a diachronical overview, and their titles are emphasized by italics. These sub-sections on genre are in each case placed before the earliest important representative of that genre.

A synoptic study is also made possible by the fact that all the sub-sections on the authors exhibit the same subdivisions: Life and Dates; Sources, Models, and Genres; Literary Technique; Language and Style; Ideas; Transmission; Influence. Because of their particular significance, reflections on literature (i.e. literary theory and criticism) are discussed separately ('Ideas I') from the other ideas of the author in question ('Ideas II').

In bibliographical references, short titles without initials of the first name (e.g. LEO, LG) refer to the general list of abbreviations at the end of the whole work. Short titles with initials and dates (e.g. F. LEO 1912) refer to the specialized bibliography at the end of each particular section.

The orthography of places of publication is determined in each case by the book cited, and so 'Romae' appears along with 'Roma' and 'Rome'. The names of Latin authors and works are abbreviated in accordance with the usage of the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae. The few exceptions in the cases of Seneca and Claudian are intended for ease of reference. Journals and other works cited in brief are listed fully in the list of abbreviations. Abbreviations used for editions are: T = text; Tr = translation; C = commentary; N = notes.

CONTENTS
VOL. I

INTRODUCTION: LITERATURE AND LITERARY HISTORY

FIRST CHAPTER: CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF ROMAN LITERATURE

Historical Background .....	5
Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	7
Latin and Greek Literature: Tradition and Renewal .....	12
Individual and Genre .....	14
Dialogue with the Reader and Literary Technique .....	21
Language and Style .....	26
Ideas I: Conquest of an Intellectual World: Poetry, Thought, and Teaching .....	31
Ideas II: Old Roman Mentality versus Modern Ideas .....	33
Before Literature .....	41

SECOND CHAPTER: LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

Historical Background .....	51
Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	55
Latin and Greek Literature .....	58
Genres .....	61
Language and Style .....	67
Ideas I: Reflections On Literature .....	68
Ideas II .....	69

II. POETRY

A. Epic and Drama .....	76
Roman Epic .....	76
Roman Drama .....	90
Livius Andronicus .....	112
Naevius .....	119
Ennius .....	129
Pacuvius .....	146
Accius .....	154
Plautus .....	163
Caecilius .....	206
Terence .....	214
B. Satura .....	241
Roman Satura .....	241
Lucilius .....	250
C. The Didactic Poem .....	267
Roman Didactic Poetry .....	267
Lucretius .....	282
D. Lyric and Epigram .....	321
Roman Lyric .....	321
Roman Epigram .....	331
Catullus .....	334

III. PROSE

A. Historiography and Related Genres .....	360
Roman Historical Writing .....	360
Historians of the Republican Period .....	370
Cato the Elder .....	390
Caesar .....	405
Sallust .....	433
B. Biography .....	464
Biography at Rome .....	464
Nepos .....	476
C. Oratory, Philosophy, Epistolography .....	489
Roman Orators .....	489
Philosophical Writers at Rome .....	499

The Letter in Roman Literature .....	511
Cicero .....	517
D. Technical and Educational Authors .....	564
Roman Technical Writers .....	564
Latin Grammarians .....	583
Rhetorical Writers at Rome .....	586
The Rhetorica Ad Herennium .....	590
Varro .....	593
Roman Jurists .....	616
Juridical Literature of the Republican Period .....	631

THIRD CHAPTER:

LITERATURE OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

I. SURVEY OF LITERATURE OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

Historical Background .....	641
The Emergence of Literature .....	643
Latin and Greek Literature .....	645
Genres .....	646
Language and Style .....	650
Ideas I: Reflections on Literature .....	651
Ideas II .....	653

II. POETRY

A. Epic, Didactic, Bucolic .....	659
Roman Bucolic .....	659
Virgil .....	667
B. Lyric, Iamb, Satire, Epistle .....	711
Horace .....	711
C. Elegy .....	742
Roman Love Elegy .....	742
Tibullus .....	754
Propertius .....	769
Ovid .....	786
D. Minor Poets of the Augustan Period .....	823

III. PROSE

A. History .....	829
Historians of the Augustan Period .....	829
Asinius Pollio .....	830
Livy .....	835
Pompeius Trogus .....	869
B. Oratory .....	873
Orators of the Augustan Period .....	873
C. Philosophy .....	875
Philosophical Writers of the Augustan Period .....	875
D. Technical and Educational Authors .....	877
Technical Writers of the Augustan Period .....	877
Vitruvius .....	880
Jurists of the Augustan Period .....	887

CONTENTS
VOL. II

FOURTH CHAPTER:
THE LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

Historical Background .....	895
Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	897
Latin and Greek Literature .....	902
Genres .....	903
Language and Style .....	905
Ideas I: Reflections On Literature .....	906
Ideas II .....	908

II. POETRY

A. Epic .....	913
Lucan .....	913
Valerius Flaccus .....	932
Statius .....	944
Silius Italicus .....	959
B. Didactic Poetry .....	972
Manilius .....	972
Germanicus .....	985
C. Bucolic .....	990
Calpurnius .....	990
Appendix: The Carmina Einsidlensia .....	995
D. Drama .....	996
Seneca (s. chapter III C, pp. 1158-1204) .....	996
E. Fable .....	996
Latin Aesopic Fables in Verse .....	996
Phaedrus .....	1002

F. Satura .....	1008
Persius .....	1008
Juvenal .....	1019
G. Epigram .....	1038
Martial .....	1038
The Priapea .....	1056

III. PROSE

A. Historiography and Related Genres .....	1061
Velleius Paterculus .....	1061
Valerius Maximus .....	1074
Curtius Rufus .....	1084
Tacitus .....	1096
B. Speeches and Letters .....	1146
Pliny the Younger .....	1146
C. Philosophy (and Drama) .....	1158
Seneca .....	1158
Appendix: The Praetexta Octavia .....	1199
D. Novel .....	1205
The Roman Novel .....	1205
Petronius .....	1211
E. Technical and Educational Authors .....	1239
Technical Authors of Early Empire .....	1239
Seneca the Elder .....	1244
Quintilian .....	1254
Pliny the Elder .....	1265
Juridical Literature of Early Empire .....	1275

FIFTH CHAPTER:

LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

Preliminary Remarks .....	1281
Historical Framework .....	1282

Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	1285
Latin and Greek Literature .....	1294
Genres .....	1296
Language and Style .....	1300
Ideas I: Reflections On Literature .....	1303
Ideas II .....	1305

II. POETRY

The Poetry of Middle and Late Empire .....	1310
The Poetae Novelli .....	1317
Ausonius .....	1320
Avianus .....	1330
Rutilius Namatianus .....	1332
Claudian .....	1337
Juvencus .....	1352
Sedulius .....	1355
Prudentius .....	1357

III. PROSE

A. Historiography and Related Genres .....	1371
Writers of History in Middle and Late Empire .....	1371
Suetonius .....	1391
Florus .....	1411
Ammianus Marcellinus .....	1420
B. Oratory and Epistolography .....	1435
Fronto .....	1435
The Panegyrici Latini .....	1439
Symmachus .....	1443
C. Novel .....	1449
Prose Fiction of Middle and Late Empire .....	1449
Apuleius .....	1449
D. Technical and Educational Authors .....	1468
1. The Authorities of the Schools .....	1468
Technical Writers of Middle and Late Empire ...	1468
Gellius .....	1479
Macrobius .....	1485
Martianus Capella .....	1491
Cassiodorus .....	1495

2. The Founders of Western Law .....	1500
Juridical Literature of Middle and Late Empire .	1500
3. The Latin Fathers of Western Civilization .....	1526
The Origins of Christian Latin Prose .....	1526
Tertullian .....	1528
Minucius Felix .....	1554
Cyprian .....	1568
Appendix: The Life of Cyprian, by Pontius .....	1580
Novatian .....	1581
Arnobius .....	1584
Lactantius .....	1594
Julius Firmicus Maternus .....	1610
Marius Victorinus .....	1616
Hilary of Poitiers .....	1627
Ambrose .....	1631
Jerome .....	1646
Rufinus and Other Translators .....	1662
Augustine .....	1664
Boethius .....	1708

SIXTH CHAPTER:

THE TRANSMISSION OF ROMAN LITERATURE .....	1741
--	------

GENERAL LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS .....	1751
-------------------------------------	------

INDEX .....	1773
-------------	------

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE .....	1829
---------------------------	------

FOURTH CHAPTER:
LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Since the time of Augustus, conquests occurred less frequently. Most of all the emperors recognized that the empire had grown large enough. Outward expansion nevertheless continued somewhat during the period to be discussed here: Britain, parts of Germany, Mauretania, and Thrace, as well as eastern Asia Minor and Lycia were incorporated into the empire. Soon after A.D. 100 the Roman empire achieved its greatest expansion. Trajan subjugated Dacia, Armenia, and Mesopotamia; in the long run, however, the outposts on the Persian Gulf and on the Caspian Sea could not be maintained. Most of the territories won at this time would retain traces of Greek or Roman culture and many would be permanently influenced by the Latin language.

Excellent roadways connected the Capital with even the remotest regions of the empire. Items of luxury were being imported to Italy, including precious stones from India and Chinese silk. Italy sold her wines, oil, and manufactured products such as terra sigillata to consumers primarily in the western provinces. The peninsula was still the hub of commercial shipping in the Mediterranean. Substantial revenues of the treasury permitted a bustling construction industry, which was strengthened, unfortunately, by such devastating fires as that of the year 64.

Beneath the gleaming exterior, however, there were indications of economic decline, especially in Italy: the spread of latifundia at the expense of the small farmer, although abated somewhat by the land allotments of Caesar and Augustus, had not halted. Rural areas in central and southern Italy lost their displaced and impoverished populations to the city—a nuisance that could not be eliminated, not even covered up by means of bread and games. Given the growth of latifundia, an economy of slave-driven plantations based on the Hellenistic model which Cato the Elder had imported, proved unexpectedly to be a failure. Actually, careful maintenance of equipment and personal supervision by the owner were indispensable for a successful agricultural operation.<sup>1</sup> As a consequence, valuable arable land was being used increasingly for grazing. It is true that we know of attempts to instill a greater sense of responsibility in the slaves through various material enticements and the concession of some sort of independence; however, the leasing of small parcels of land to free tenant farmers, which would have been a solution that looked to the future, was merely beginning to develop.

Imperial power could still support itself from Italy and Rome, but that would soon change. The provinces flourished, since the systematic levy of taxes by imperial officials, though still oppressive enough, was less arbitrary and more predictable than the caprice of Republican magistrates, who changed every year, and the unscrupulousness of professional tax gatherers. The soaring economy of the provinces offered competition to Italy in the production of oil and wine. The elite of Gaul and Spain were gradually being received into the senate in order that, among other reasons, their financial power could be brought to Rome. Seneca's remark (apocol. 3) that the Emperor Claudius had died just in time before he could confer the benefits of citizenship on everyone, mirrored humorously the discrepancy between the foresight of that underestimated emperor and the shortsightedness of the Roman elite. For the moment, the expected revitalization of Italy was in full swing. It proved inevitable, however, that the new senators would represent the interests of their respective provinces. During the period under discussion this was true of the western regions of the empire, and later on, of the eastern parts as well.

While the economic independence of the provinces increased, trade among them decreased. Towards the end of the period which we are examining, i.e. under Hadrian, it became evident that, with the loss of its economic primacy, the political and literary splendor of Rome and Italy was beginning to fade. Hadrian's philhellenism merely sealed the fate of a specifically Roman literature, the decline of which was a consequence of the historical development. In the increasingly influential military forces the number of native-born Italians waned. With the expansion of the empire, emperors were more and more frequently being proclaimed in the provinces and—as in the case of

---

<sup>1</sup> Moreover, it became ever more difficult to procure the necessary great number of slaves (ALFÖLDY, Sozialgeschichte 122).

Hadrian—they were compelled even during a relatively peaceful period to safeguard the borders with their presence. In the 1st century these developments were just beginning to be observable. Military campaigns personally conducted by the emperors were still brief and sometimes resembled well planned pleasure trips; Rome—not her frontiers (the limes)—was still the center of the imperial construction industry. Gigantic palaces, the like of Nero's Domus Aurea and the palace of Domitian with its cosmic symbolism<sup>1</sup> proved that the city of the seven hills was still perceived to be the center of the empire. Late antiquity's counterpart to Domitian's palace would not be constructed in Rome, but in Constantinople: the Hagia Sophia.

CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF LITERATURE

The roles of the senate and of Republican magistrates had changed. Persecution of opponents reduced the number of representatives of old families in the senate. Military leaders, particularly of the praetorian guard, won increasing influence at court. While the Republican facade was maintained, there emerged behind it an imperial bureaucracy to which freedmen, not members of the senatorial aristocracy, belonged even as ministers.

In literature no less than in the senate representatives of the Italian gentry were becoming rare, while the number of provincials rose. In addition to the still important Transpadanes, e.g. the Plinii, there appeared a proud line of native Spaniards: the Senecae, Lucan, Columella, Quintilian, and Martial. Soon Spain would produce emperors (Trajan and Hadrian). North Africa and other provinces would follow. It should be noted that this 'provincialization' of Latin literature did not necessarily amount to a loss of a specifically Roman identity, for traditions often survive in purer form in borderlands than at the center, which to a larger extent is exposed to changes; so the arrival of the Spaniards constituted a regeneration of Roman culture, not an infiltration of foreigners.

Some authors could live on their own means: the Senecae and Lucan were financially independent as was Petronius, and Quintilian was paid by the emperor. Other writers—Statius and Martial, for example—enjoyed the support of private patrons.

---

<sup>1</sup> Significantly, it was under Nero and Domitian that the last writers of national Roman epic wrote their works (Lucan and Silius Italicus).

The influence of individual emperors on the development of literature allows scholars to subdivide the period under study.

The age of Tiberius seems at first to have led to a 'stagnation', for this emperor appeared also in politics as a pious heir who continued his stepfather's work. Nevertheless, there were some new trends. First, the negative: the great synthetic works of a Virgil or Livy remained unmatched. In the domain of form, a tendency towards brevity became noticeable: Velleius produced a concise history of Rome; Valerius Maximus collected brief exempla. A short form appeared also in poetry: Phaedrus' books of Fables were an innovation in Roman literature.

The style of prose developed along the lines of Augustan rhetorical prose. Stylistically Velleius was half-way between Livy and Seneca. The same was true of poetry: Albinovanus Pedo held an intermediate position between the transparent style of the Augustans and the obscure mannerisms of Valerius Flaccus.

Political changes led to a shift in subject matter. Since political themes were dangerous, indirect criticism found a new literary medium in the Aesopic fable, which now became a genre of poetry. For the same reason epic alienated itself more and more from the state. There emerged in its place, remarkably, natural science, which had until then been largely ignored by Romans: a universal theme less dangerous than politics. Ovid had heralded this development with his Metamorphoses. In the late Augustan and early Tiberian periods Manilius wrote his Astronomica, and Germanicus composed a similar work. The time was ripe for this subject matter since the vita activa, formerly advocated by Cicero, had lost its attractiveness under the emperors. For ages philosophers had extolled contemplation, observation of the heavens, as the true purpose of man's life; for Ovid, these activities were the mark distinguishing man from animals that look to the ground (met. 1. 84–86). Manilius took such 'contemplation of the sky' literally and devoted himself to astronomy. Interest in astronomy was no novelty in Rome; one recalls Caesar's reform of the calendar and the gigantic sundial of Augustus; under the reign of Tiberius, corresponding to the emperor's taste, such studies acquired an astrological tinge. The predilection for natural science would continue, and traces of it would also be found in prose: Seneca's Naturales quaestiones and the Natural History of Pliny the Elder date from a slightly later period.

Ironically, Roman literature owes a debt of gratitude to Caligula, for, at the beginning of his reign, in the interest of truth he allowed the publication of historical works, which had hitherto been forbidden.<sup>1</sup> He also brought to life outside Rome contests (agones) for poetry as well as Greek oratory. Caligula was himself not a writer, yet he wanted to shine as an orator and did not tolerate any rival in this field. Through his perilous envy he caused Seneca to switch from oratory to philosophy and unintentionally helped him find his true vocation. The judgments which Caligula passed on acknowledged authors were irreverent, even iconoclastic: Virgil? neither talented nor knowledgeable. Livy? wordy and not accurate (Suet. Cal. 34. 2). He also liked to take men at their word and, in doing so, unmask the insincerity of rhetoric; he was not aware, though, that, in a tyranny, the tyrant is the only one who can afford to tell the truth without being punished. While several of his criteria (brevitas, diligentia, doctrina) were close to those of Stoicism and Atticism, his lack of prejudice and his sense of ingenium prepared the way for the era of Nero. Caligula did, however, also notice the defects of modern style (ibid. 53. 3). This madman quite discerningly pointed an accusing finger at the literary life of his day: here blind imitation of classical models and the cult of form at the expense of truth; there the danger of a dissolution of form.

His successor Claudius<sup>2</sup> wrote magis inepte quam ineleganter, 'out of place rather than out of tune' (Suet. Claud. 41), i.e. he used plain vocabulary, avoided an exaggerated stylization and was ready to leave things 'natural', as happened in his day even in the area of art. In order to administer literary life, Claudius, who was the inventor of bureaucracy, created a post for a freedman called a studiis. His attempts to increase the alphabet with more letters were short-lived. The writers of his time were in part the same as those under Nero. Yet, Claudius' 'Attic' ideal of style stood in sharp contrast to the trends which would prevail under his successor.

Whereas the above-named emperors were prosaic to the point of being hostile to poetry, it was with Nero that a poet reached the throne. He needed tutoring, though, for the composition of his prose speeches. The stagnation of literature under his predecessors yielded to a new flourishing.

<sup>1</sup> T. Labienus, Cremutius Cordus, Cassius Severus (Suet. Cal. 16. 1).

<sup>2</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 136-159.

He recited his Troica at the Neronia or at the Quinquennalia in 65. He had already instituted these plays in 60. He also went on stage as a tragic actor, singer, and cithara player. However, the emperor's love of poetry had its dark side. Poets such as Lucan and Curtius Montanus had to suffer under his jealousy. He did not vigorously persecute those who ridiculed him (Suet. Nero 39); still, there were instances where the verdict was exile. After the conspiracy of Piso, the emperor became more cruel. Seneca was compelled to commit suicide. Persius' teacher Verginius Flavus and the Stoic C. Musonius Rufus went into exile. P. Thrasea Paetus, who had written on the life of Cato Uticensis, for that very reason had to forfeit his life.

The epoch of Nero was one of exuberant vitality. The young emperor continued the Apollo cult of Augustus and even exaggerated it: he thought of himself as the Sun King and went on stage himself as the new Apollo. Music was not just his hobby; it was rooted in the Apollonian pretension characteristic of his idea of kingship. A philosophical manual, as it were, of princely behavior, Seneca's work De clementia was an indication of the great expectations which were associated with Nero; it also showed that Seneca tried to place the clemency of the aged Augustus before the young ruler's eyes as something to emulate: if Nero were to practice clemency in his youth, he could surpass Augustus. The cleft between expectation and reality became evident when Lucan exclaimed with hyperbole that the horror of civil wars had been, to use the Christian expression, a felix culpa, since it had paved the way for a Nero. There were high hopes for Nero, and he seemed at first to fulfill what the people expected from a god incarnate or Sun King and what the senate expected from an enlightened monarch who had enjoyed a Stoic education.

The youthfulness of the ruler accorded with the spirit of the age. Young geniuses the like of Lucan or Persius were very much admired. Ingenium was highly valued, hence the strong influence of Ovid. The author of the Περὶ ὕψους, with his emphasis on greatness of mind from which alone emanates all great literature, fit in well with those times. To an extent seldom seen before, a Roman public was ready to admire creative genius and to free itself once more from the burden of tradition for the sake of creativity. Seneca dared to jolt Cicero's pedestal. Writers did not stand as slaves before the past, but confronted it critically: Lucan radically modernized epic, doing away with the antiquated divine machinery. Architecture also made bold advances—the Domus Transitoria and Domus Aurea—and the art of the mural saw a new development: the ‘Fourth Style’. This period of scintillating intellectual life has sometimes been compared to the Baroque period. Yet, Nero’s Rome was more ‘modernist’, less rooted to tradition and less devoted to religion than our seventeenth century. The importance of the emperor as patron of artists should not be underestimated; still, he took no leading role in literary pursuits, for he was merely the unworthy exponent of an exuberant age.

Under the Flavian dynasty, which the frugal Vespasian had founded, there prevailed a more sober spirit. Quintilian, the first professor of rhetoric to be commissioned by the state, represented a moderate classicism, the evidence for which would soon emerge in the composition of literary prose (Pliny the Younger) and poetry (Silius Italicus). Martial and Statius brought hitherto despised genres, such as epigram and what had been occasional poetry, to literary perfection.

The times of Nero and Domitian produced the greatest cultural achievements (distasteful as those rulers may be). Like Nero, Domitian had literary ambitions and even in this respect proved to be a competent manager. An example is the establishment of the literary Ludi Capitolini. Thanks to a new social stratum of industrious senators and to an ambitious and exacting emperor, the city of Rome was felt to be the heart of Roman cultural identity (a role it would regain only much later); that cultural identity arose amidst the tension between bourgeois austerity and imperial grandiosity.

A period of relief under Nerva and Trajan allowed the historian Tacitus and the satirist Juvenal some freedom of expression. In retrospect Domitian’s era appeared to have been a dark age to which, nonetheless, many writers owed their careers and early successes. The Roman empire reached its greatest expansion under Trajan; Roman art experienced a high point and, with Tacitus, Latin historiography achieved its zenith. Yet, Trajan’s time—in contrast to earlier phases in the development of Roman literature—had admittedly found its expression no longer in epic and not even in poetic form. The Panegyricus of Pliny was the prosaic prelude of the much-extolled halcyon century of humanity, which in the field of Latin literature—after Tacitus’ death—has to be rated on the whole among the unproductive periods.

The prime of private patronage in the time of the Flavians is reflected in Statius’ Silvae and in Martial’s Epigrams. The precarious situation of the client showed itself here as it did in the Satires of Juvenal, whereas the positive aspects of private patronage are evident in Pliny's Letters. With the decline of private patronage and the waning interest of the emperors in contemporary Latin writers, Roman literature suffered a crisis.

LATIN AND GREEK LITERATURE

The process of assimilation of Greek forms into Roman literature had been completed under Augustus. Under the empire authors were conscious of the specific political and literary achievement of the Romans and exhibited an increased self confidence vis-à-vis the Greeks.

What did Roman writers think about their task? And what could be called a Roman literary tradition? This had become definitely clear only after the efforts of Cicero, Virgil, Sallust, or Livy. Only after their time could a literary development be based on an indigenous tradition. Thus Ovid considered himself the last of four Roman elegiac poets; Persius and Juvenal wrote their satires under the auspices of Lucilius and Horace; Lucan as an epic poet struggled under the shadow of Virgil and borrowed the weapons for this struggle partly from Ovid. Valerius, Statius, and Silius emulated Virgil. However, this rule does not apply exclusively, for, in addition, Greek literature remained an immediate source of inspiration. By now the Romans drew on two traditions; and it is typical of their cultural development that indigenous authorities had not been their first choice.

The time was ripe for a fusion of traditions in literature. The bilingual nature of Greco-Roman culture found expression, for instance, in 'twin' libraries with a Greek and a Latin wing (since Augustus) and in competitions (agones) for Greek and Latin poets (under Domitian). An awareness of two traditions fostered the rise of new Latin grand epics, which purposely brought to completion a Greco-Roman synthesis, a synthesis called for by the historical moment: the epic poets Valerius Flaccus and Statius on the one hand followed Virgil's example,<sup>1</sup> on the other they presented to their readers the <sup>1</sup> Virgil drew from Homer directly and competed with him; it is true that he knew Naevius' Bellum Poenicum and Ennius' Annales but, for the Augustans, those early Latin works were no authoritative masterpieces; they rather seemed to be more or less respectable attempts. The Aeneid, however, for its imitators, was the binding expression of a Roman tradition which could match the Greek one.

---

Greek myth as a sort of 'Old Testament' of their own culture. In this respect the works of Statius marked the consummation of the bilingual nature of Greco-Roman civilization and gave literary expression to an integrated Greco-Roman cultural identity.

Up to Tacitus and Juvenal inclusively, Latin authors frequently outshone their Greek contemporaries. With Plutarch, a first-rate author, however, there came about a renaissance of Greek literature, and from the time of Hadrian Greek literature took the lead even in the city of Rome.

GENRES

Historical conditions produce changes in the configuration of literary genres.

With the emergence of monarchy political oratory lost its significance. Rhetoric was confined to the lecture hall and relegated to a corner, so to speak, with all the importance of an indoor plant. Instead of political orators people now admired brilliant professors of speech and declaimers. Instead of being viewed as a noble means of influencing the masses, oratory was becoming at best an instrument of education and self-education<sup>1</sup> and at worst a playground for star performers. There appeared an entire corpus of literature on the causes of the decline of oratory (Petronius, Quintilian, and Tacitus). Declamation, originally a school exercise, now permeated other literary genres. Philosophical writers now attempted—in contrast to comparable works of Cicero—to influence the reader directly. 'Manuals for princes' and 'praise of the emperor' became productive types of literary expression. Seneca's De clementia and Pliny's Panegyricus set the standards.

Praise of the emperor assumed specific forms even in poetry; this is true of pastoral, of descriptive lyric and even more of epic. Actually, there appeared, even in the time of Domitian, epic poetry of universal scope, including political themes. Republican ideals and praise of the emperor, indeed, often figured side by side unexpectedly in Neronian and Flavian epic.

---

<sup>1</sup> In addition, we should emphasize the educational achievement of the grammatici. In the 1st century there were towering figures like Remmius Palaemon and Probus. Their scholarly work set the standards for later generations. In the long run, however, even the commentaries on poems—originally a domain of the grammatici—increasingly fell under the sway of rhetoric.

Absolute monarchy contributed indirectly to the rise of Aesopic fable to the range of literature. It was not by accident that this genre became a legitimate form of poetry only then, for it provided an opportunity for indirect political criticism.

Considering that only under Trajan it was possible for a senator to write a classical historical work in Latin, we can measure the difference of quality between Trajan and most of his predecessors. After Livy, this genre had been unproductive; Valerius Maximus dissolved history into mere collections of rhetorical exempla; Velleius limited it to a soldier's mediocrity and faithful allegiance to his emperor, and, if there were better representatives, they were brought to silence through violent measures. Now under Trajan history found a unique proponent in Tacitus. After this zenith historiography would for a long time decay into mere biography. The repression, flourishing and decline of historiography, as well as its specific character at each moment was in keeping with a given historical situation.

After the state had lost its attractiveness as the traditional sphere of action for the Roman individual, it was time to discover new worlds. In the first place there was the physical universe: a serious Roman had had until now no time for natural science and philosophical investigation. The principate removed any feelings of guilt for pursuing such study. Didactic poetry, which had already concerned itself with such inquiry in the late Republican period (Cicero's Aratea and Lucretius' De rerum natura), was no longer ashamed to define contemplation of the heavens as the true goal of man (Manilius and, earlier, Ovid). Germanicus' translation of Aratus and some parts of Pliny's Natural History are other examples of such intellectual interests. Of principal importance was Seneca's preface to the Naturales quaestiones, to which should be added the De otio. Granted, this pursuit was not carried out merely for the sake of pure knowledge, there was a great part of bookish polymathy and of edifying contemplation in it.

A second world to discover was the individual person. In prose such a private type of text as the personal letter was raised by Pliny to a literary genre mirroring an individual and its epoch. There had been a discovery of the personal dimension that went further: Seneca's philosophical pedagogy, which followed psychological and rhetorical principles, produced a new category of philosophical letter. There were similar trends in poetry: Ovid fashioned psychological monologues, Lucan enlivened his epic through emotional and critical comment. Tragedy seemed to lose its public appeal, but lived on as an expression of the dark, ominous, and tense atmosphere of the times and as an indirect critic of tyranny; epic achieved once more political importance in Lucan's Pharsalia; under Domitian Silius' Punica marked a neo-classical final stage of the genre. The last true masters of grand epic, Valerius Flaccus and Statius, did justice to the intellectual atmosphere of the time, which demanded a synthesis of Greek and Roman culture. Corresponding to increasingly private perspectives, there gradually followed more modest genres as successors to grand epic: the realistic novel of Petronius was—as far as we know—in its specific features an innovative genre and typical of the time of Nero. In the same epoch satire brought to light the painful contradiction between reality and appearance (Persius); then, Juvenal made it a sort of mirror of the world, which stigmatized, solemnly, the discrepancy between the purported proud legacy of idealized Roman values, and the wretched conditions under which their heirs actually lived. The greater prominence given to private matters is reflected in the rise of genres that up to that time had been largely ignored: epigram gained universal importance through Martial; with Statius the 'improvised' occasional poem won its literary rank.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE

In early imperial literature there occurred close interaction of the styles of poetry and prose. On the one hand prose diction became more recherché, on the other, rhetoric exerted an influence on poetry. Both prose and poetry reflected the fact that every educated man had attended a school of rhetoric.

Yet, in the period under study literary style was by no means uniform. There were several changes in taste.

Cicero had found a classical mean between Atticism and Asianism. Since the time of Augustus, however, prose adopted an Asian 'pointed' style. Prose became more 'poetic'. From this school, which had been the continuation of Hellenistic oratory, grew Seneca's style, Neronian 'modernism'. The emperor Caligula, a declared enemy of tradition, had been a radical forerunner of that modern trend.

On the other hand with the public appointment of a professor of rhetoric under Vespasian and Domitian, classicism was established:

its moderate representative was Quintilian. Pliny basically agreed with him. Tacitus, in his Dialogus, followed the style of Cicero, in his historical works that of Sallust. In principle such an attitude may be called neo-classical, even though Tacitus in detail shows a definite preference for developing further some 'un-classical' features of Sallust's language and style. Under the Flavians and Trajan 'classicism' was not as unoriginal or unproductive as one would imagine.

In the area of poetry Lucan under Nero perfected the assimilation of rhetoric into epic, a process which had already been heralded by the Metamorphoses of Ovid. Persius on the other hand boldly introduced the extensive domain of colloquial speech to literature. The language of the poets was thus revived from very different sources during that colorful epoch of Nero. Petronius went as far as introducing vulgar colloquial speech into certain passages of dialogue in his novel, while in his narrative he adopted a stricter style. A change of taste to classicism—as expected in the Flavian period—was realized by Silius Italicus in his epic. His contemporary Statius, however, must be considered closer to Ovid as an author, his deliberate emulation of Virgil notwithstanding. Juvenal, eschewing the linguistic extremes of Persius, created a special, markedly rhetorical form of satire, which, in the eyes of later generations, would make him a 'classic' of the genre.

IDEAS I REFLECTIONS ON LITERATURE

Conditions were such that now even senators were more proud of their literary or scholarly than their political accomplishments. Pliny the Elder, who devoted all of his leisure time to the acquisition of knowledge, adhered, however, to an old Roman tradition by professing the intention to benefit his country through his writings. Tacitus, like some of his contemporaries, reflected on the causes of oratory's decline and the possibilities of a poetry or a historiography critical of their times, thus providing us with a key to understanding the literature of the era. Convinced of the power of literature to immortalize, Pliny the Younger, Tacitus' contemporary, consciously perpetuated his own memory: his letters render a comprehensive image of their author, not merely of his political activity.

Virgil's homage to Augustus in the Georgics established the topoi which became convention for poets and writers of prose under Tiberius. The emperor was both addressee and divine source of inspiration: a double function which in literature corresponded to the janus-faced political position of the princeps. This concept continued with new intensity under Nero, who clearly adhered to the Apollo worship of Augustus and even surpassed Augustus by seeking to impersonate Apollo through his poetic creativity. The above-mentioned topos is attested both in the bucolic poetry of Calpurnius and the prooemium of Lucan's Pharsalia, a work which in this respect followed closely the Georgics, not the Aeneid (as would have been suggested by the genre). The prooemium of Lucan's Pharsalia is the literary peak of this development; in a later book the same poet would (in the Homeric setting of Ilium) converse with Caesar on the immortality of his Pharsalia.

A somewhat later generation would be inspired by private patrons to compose works of less bulk. In the epics of Domitian's era, poets—outside the adulatory proemia or excursuses—dared to acknowledge their real sources of inspiration: their brilliant predecessors, just as Lucretius had already done. At the conclusion of his Thebaid, Statius presented the imitation of Virgil as a driving force behind his creativity. Silius Italicus did homage to Homer in his descent into the underworld (Sil. 13. 778–797); in his reference to Sardinia he extolled Ennius (Sil. 12. 390–419); shorter but no less enthusiastic was the glorification of Mantua as the cradle of Virgil (Sil. 8. 593–594).

The awareness that one had to cope with an indigenous tradition became evident in different ways, according to the changing phases of the early imperial period: the first wave was the rise of the modern trend, which was enraptured with its own ingenium to the point of opposing it to literary tradition. Characteristic of this phenomenon were the anti-Ciceronian prose of Seneca and Lucan's anti-Virgilian epic. The Flavian period brought a neo-classical reaction: Quintilian and Pliny followed a Ciceronian line. Archaism would be the next phase. Having grown weary both of classicism and of the modern trends, a generation of epigones looked to Old Latin for a source of rejuvenation.

It was probably not by chance that the self-confidence of writers in the time of Nero harmonized with the heightened spirit of the age, which animated Nero the 'Sun King', even after the end of his first brilliant quinquennium. Nor was it accidental that the period of classicism coincided with a consolidation of the empire under the Flavians. And, finally, it was not mere coincidence that the phase of archaism began with Hadrian, who, parting with a policy of further expansion, ushered in the late summer of empire.

IDEAS II

The hundred years of disorder from the Gracchan era to Augustus provided good reason to seek comfort in religion. The imperial period, during which any citizen experienced his own powerlessness, could only enhance this need. Archaic Roman religion, originating from a small agrarian community, had become alien to the educated and could hardly meet the need for personal edification and salvation. Into this vacuum rushed the mystery cults and the schools of the philosophers.

Mystery cults, persecuted in the Republican period and even under the first emperors, had already become a part of religious practice of the Augustan public, and for that very reason even Ovid's sharp tongue stopped short of Isis and Bacchus. The future belonged to the gods of salvation.

Even philosophy in spite of its scientific past adapted itself to the spirit of the times. The transition from cosmology to anthropology in the days of Socrates and of Greek Enlightenment, it is true, had given some impulse even to the development of science: dialectic acumen was exercised in the Academy, and the school of Aristotle untiringly committed itself to empirical research. However, there was already in the Alexandrian era an increasing tendency to restrict anthropology to ethics, to have physics serve edification and to consider logic, at best, a preparatory course. In Roman times various philosophical systems competed with religion to lead man to happiness and fulfillment in life, and, to some extent, philosophy used the vernacular of the mystery cults in order to offer the educated a rational way to enlightenment. Practice took precedence over theory and differences in dogma became less important. In the first half of the 1st century B.C. Posidonius enriched Stoicism with elements of Platonism and gave it a cosmological and religious coloring. The Romans used Stoic arguments to justify their traditional belief in prodigies. The same is true of their inclination for astrology, as Manilius' relevant work demonstrates, a work which emerged partly under the reign of Tiberius, one of astrology's adherents. Neo-Pythagoreanism, to which Ovid and Virgil had been receptive, did not fail to leave an impression on the young Seneca. In the 1st century this author was an exponent of a practical, psychologically oriented Stoicism with slightly religious overtones, and he was not one to spurn even Epicurean or Platonic thought. Somewhat later Plutarch, following in the footsteps of his teacher Ammonius, would revive a syncretistic Platonism. The Academy switched from Ciceronian skepticism to Apuleius' Middle Platonist concept of demonology.

The emperors in turn did not miss the opportunity to make use of the religious mood and fashion of their times or to experiment with new ideas. Caligula's pharaonic pretensions, Nero's posing as Apollo, Domitian's identification with Jupiter, and many later attempts of this sort were responses to the timeless longing for a change for the better, which, under the given circumstances, the people themselves could not bring about.

The theological or philosophical idealization of the emperor's role would still find a strong echo in epic, eclogue, silvae, and panegyric: Lucan and Calpurnius bore witness to Nero's sun kingship; Seneca's Stoic work De clementia was intended to commit the young monarch to the political wisdom of Augustus; Statius—not by accident—glorified clemency in his poems dedicated to Domitian and in the Thebaid; the Panegyricus of Pliny associated Trajan with the Stoic concept of the ideal ruler.

In almost all of the literature of the period we find protests against individual emperors and against tyranny (not, however, against monarchy per se), in more or less overt form; the most impressive—but unfortunately post festum—are those of Tacitus and Juvenal. We should also mention the Octavia attributed to Seneca, Seneca's Apocolocyntosis, Lucan's epic, the arrest scene in book I of Valerius Flaccus, and the characterization of the tyrants in Seneca's tragedies. Indirect protest was also expressed in Phaedrus' Fables and in Martial's Epigrams.

Under the Flavians and Trajan, Epictetus returned in a sense to the Old Stoa. A parallel development, in the field of style, was the return to classicism in literature. Apart from Seneca's short-lived philosophical regency, philosophy was at best merely tolerated in Rome during the 1st century. The Stoic spirit of senatorial opposition was a sign of inner autonomy; the Stoicism of the last Flavian epic poet, Silius Italicus, was indeed a dangerous stance under Domitian, who persecuted philosophers. This situation would not change until the 2nd century. In an impressive revolution 'from above', comparable only to what happened later under Constantine, the strongest intellectual force—at the time, Stoic philosophy—would be transformed from a cradle of opposition to the mainstay of the regime. The philosophers who had been persecuted under Vespasian and Domitian were permitted to return under Trajan. Dio Chrysostom became the harbinger of a Stoic monarchy, an idea that would remain prevalent through the reign of Marcus Aurelius. Close upon that enlightened age there again followed attempts to legitimize domination religiously.

If trends of thought typical of different eras were expressed less in speculative form than through the medium of poetry and artistic prose, this was due to a feature of the Roman mind which had been, from the very beginning, adverse to dogmatic and ideological constraints. Just as a citizen of ancient China was born a Taoist, lived according to the principles of Confucius and died a Buddhist, so many a Roman, as homo politicus, was a Stoic, an Epicurean in his private life, and in his philosophical leanings perhaps a Platonist or a Neo-Pythagorean. The essence of that attitude, which a witty Englishman unkindly categorized as ‘typically Roman indifference to truth’, could be, to put it in a friendly way, an originally rustic distrust of the purely theoretical and a strong orientation towards the more practical aspects of life.

This mentality produced both short and long-term effects: Latin philosophical texts stand without certain scholastic refinements, upon which the differences among philosophical schools are based. This loss is partly compensated for by some typically Roman elements: there is an emphasis on the application of philosophy to the conduct of life, and there is a convincing literary form making philosophical thought universally understandable. Furthermore, the Romans bequeathed to western Christianity and to European philosophy a serious concept of the unique importance of human existence; it was under their auspices that a philosophy of history could develop; they gave us the concept of ‘person’ and the idea of human creativity; and, finally, it was their example which again and again encouraged European thinkers—from the moralists of the early modern period up to the Existentialists—not to subordinate life to philosophy but, on the contrary, to have philosophy serve life.

This situation had its effects on the general physiognomy of imperial literature: we seldom find empirical methods in the area of natural science—Pliny’s Naturalis historia is erudition rather than science based upon experimentation. In the field of philology there were important achievements both in the considered era and in later periods: Latin texts were being edited and annotated; jurisprudence, a typically Roman discipline, which would evolve later in the subsequent phase of development, was also beginning to take shape in our period.

The following fact pointed ahead to the next epoch of Roman literature: Jewish culture was entering the Roman field of vision more and more. In the first half of the 1st century A.D., Philo applied Greek allegorical interpretation to the Old Testament. Later on, the methods used by Philo would facilitate the assimilation of the Old Testament by non-Jewish Christians. The hellenization of Jews during the Hellenistic period paved the way for the dialogue of Christianity with pagan culture and consequently for its propagation. In the long run, a blending of Greek, Roman, and Christian culture would become possible in late antiquity. During the considered period Jerusalem was destroyed, and Judaism repeatedly forced into a defensive intellectual isolation. The Talmud was the expression of this alienation, whereas Christianity, which had been receptive to classical culture since its inception, would become an increasingly decisive factor and fashioner of the further development of intellectual life.

Bibl.: To be consulted in the first place: ANRW, esp. 2. 32. 1-4 and 2. 33. 1-5.

F. M. AHL, The Rider and the Horse: Politics and Power in Roman Poetry from Horace to Statius, ANRW 32, 1, Berlin 1986, 40-110. * ALFÖLDY, Sozialgeschichte, esp. chapter 5. * J.-M. ANDRÉ, L'otium chez Valère-Maxime et Velleius Paterculus ou la réaction morale au début du principat, REL 43, 1965, 294-315. * BARDON, Lit. lat. inc., esp. vol. 2, chapters 3 and 4. * H. BARDON, Le goût à l'époque des Flaviens, Latomus 21, 1962, 732-748. * H. BARDON, Les empereurs et les lettres latines d'Auguste à Hadrien, Paris 2nd ed. 1968. * G. BOISSIER, L'opposition sous les Césars, Paris 10th ed. 1932. * H. BENTSON, Die Flavii: Vespasian, Titus, Domitian. Geschichte eines römischen Kaiserhauses, München 1979. * BONNER, Declamation. * A. BRIESSMANN, Tacitus und das flavische Geschichtsbild, Wiesbaden 1955. * E. BURCK, Vom römischen Manierismus. Von der Dichtung der frühen römischen Kaiserzeit, Darmstadt 1971. * E. BURCK, Vom Menschenbild in der römischen Literatur. Ausgewählte Schriften, vol. 2, Heidelberg 1981, esp. 429-585. * H. E. BUTLER, Post-Augustan Poetry from Seneca to Juvenal, Oxford 1909. * K. CHRIST, Römische Geschichte und Wissenschaftsgeschichte, vol. 2: Geschichte und Geschichtsschreibung der römischen Kaiserzeit, Darmstadt 1983. * K. CHRIST, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit. Von Augustus bis Konstantin, München 1988, esp. 178–314. * E. CIZEK, L'époque de Néron et ses controverses idéologiques, Leiden 1972. * E. CIZEK, La littérature et les cercles culturels et politiques à l'époque de Trajan, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 3–35. * P. DAMS, Dichtungskritik bei nachaugusteischen Dichtern, diss. Marburg 1970. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Empire and Aftermath, Silver Latin 2, London 1975. * H. ERDLE, Persius. Augusteische Vorlage und neronische Überformung, diss. München 1968. * S. FEIN, Die Beziehung der Kaiser Trajan und Hadrian zu den litterati, Stuttgart 1995. * A. GARZETTI, From Tiberius to the Antonines. A History of the Roman Empire, A.D. 14–192, London 1974. * M. GRIFFIN, Nero: The End of a Dynasty, London 1984. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, La critique littéraire au 1<sup>er</sup> siècle de l'empire, REL 6, 1928, 136–180. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Pline et la vie littéraire de son temps, Paris 1929. * C. HABICHT, Die augusteische Zeit und das 1. Jh. nach Christi Geburt, in: W. DEN BOER, ed., Le culte des souverains dans l'Empire romain, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 19, Vandœuvres-Genève 1973, 41–88. * R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius und seine Theorie, Heidelberg 1978. * A. HARDIE, Statius and the Silvae. Poets, Patrons and Epideixis in the Graeco-Roman World, Liverpool 1983. * K. HELDMANN, Dekadenz und literarischer Fortschritt bei Quintilian und bei Tacitus. Ein Beitrag zum römischen Klassizismus, Poetica 12, 1980, 1–23. * G. O. HUTCHINSON, Latin Literature from Seneca to Juvenal. A Critical Study, Oxford 1993. * H. JUHNKE, Homerisches in römischer Epik flavischer Zeit. Untersuchungen zu Szenen-Nachbildungen und Strukturensprechungen in Statius' Thebais und Achilleis und in Silius' Punica, München 1972. * W. KISSEL, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, vol. 4: Kaiserzeit I, Stuttgart 1985 (bibl.). * R. KLEIN, ed., Prinzipat und Freiheit, Darmstadt 1969 (WdF 135). * B. KÜHNERT, V. Riedel, R. Gordesiani, eds., Prinzipat und Kultur im 1. und 2. Jh., Bonn 1995. * W. D. Lebek, Lucans Pharsalia. Dichtungsstruktur und Zeitbezug, Göttingen 1976. * E. LEFÈVRE, Die Bedeutung des Paradoxen in der römischen Literatur der frühen Kaiserzeit, Poetica 3, 1970, 59–82. * LEO, Biogr., esp. chapters 12–15. * S. MRATSCHEK-HALFMANN, Divites et praepotentes. Reichtum und soziale Stellung in der Literatur der Prinzipatszeit, Stuttgart 1993, esp. 14–40. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 251–343. * J. P. SULLIVAN, Literature and Politics in the Age of Nero, Ithaca 1985. * SYME, Tacitus. * G. THIELE, Die Poesie unter Domitian, Hermes 51, 1916, 233–260. * G. WILLIAMS, Change and Decline. Roman Literature in the Early Empire, Berkeley 1978. * WIRSZUBSKI, Libertas.

II. POETRY

A. EPIC

LUCAN

Life and Dates

M. Annaeus Lucanus was born on November 3rd, 39 A.D. in Corduba; his father was M. Annaeus Mela, a brother of Seneca the philosopher. Lucan was young when he came to Rome; he enjoyed a thorough training as an orator. The Stoic philosopher Cornutus was one of his teachers; Persius, whose poetry he admired (Vita Persii 5), was his friend. Nero summoned him from an academic sojourn in Athens and appointed him to his court. He became quaestor before the age prescribed for the office and held the augural priesthood. He made his debut as a poet in 60 at the festival of the Neronia. After a number of works which have not come down to us<sup>1</sup> he published the first three books of his Pharsalia; then the emperor, who was jealous of his acknowledged talent, forbade him to publish his works and prohibited him from forensic pleading. Lucan took part in the Pisonian conspiracy. After the intrigue was unmasked, he named his accomplices and even denounced his own mother. On April 30, 65, he was forced to have his veins opened. His wife Polla Argentaria maintained the honor of his memory.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Lost works: Iliacon, Catachthonion, Laudes Neronis, Orpheus, De incendio urbis, Adlocutio ad Pollam (or: Ad uxorem), Saturnalia, Silvarum X, Medea (unfinished tragedy), Salticae fabulae XIV (texts for pantomimes), Epigrammata, twin speeches for and against Octavius Sagitta, Epistulae ex Campania, a poetic invective against Nero; as for FPL 130 MOREL cf. M. J. MCGANN, The Authenticity of Lucan, CQ 51, 1957, 126–128.

<sup>2</sup> One of the vitae came down to us in mutilated form; it shows a critical attitude to the poet and is thought to be Suetonian. It is criticized in its turn by another biography, attributed to a certain Vacca, which is preserved at the head of the scholia (Adnotationes super Lucanum). According to M. MARTINA (Le vite antiche

He published the first three books after the first Neronia, therefore not before 61. The entire work could have appeared roughly between 59 and 65. Parallels with Seneca's Naturales quaestiones (written in 62 and 63) in the early books could reflect discussions between uncle and nephew and therefore do not compel us to date the Pharsalia later. Still greater speed of production, which some scholars<sup>1</sup> propose (8 months for 10 books) is unthinkable for an epic writer in ancient Rome.

In the best manuscripts the title of Lucan's main work reads Belli civilis libri X. He himself calls it (9. 985) Pharsalia.<sup>2</sup>

Survey of the Work

1: The announcement of the subject, the dedication to Nero, the list of causes of the war and the characterization of Pompey and Caesar are followed by the crossing of the Rubicon, a catalogue of troops, the panic of Pompey and of Rome's inhabitants and finally a series of prodigies and prophecies.

2: A description of the atmosphere at Rome includes a flashback to the times of Marius and Sulla. Cato comforts Brutus and allows his former wife to return. After a digression on the Apennines and on public opinion in Italy, we hear of Caesar's clemency in his dealings with Domitius near Corfinium. Pompey flees to Brundisium; when Caesar threatens to block the harbor there with floating wood obstacles, Pompey leaves Italy.

3: En route Pompey dreams of his former wife, Julia, Caesar's daughter, who haunts him like an evil spirit. Caesar enters Rome with fierce determination, availing himself of the state treasury in spite of Metellus' protests. Pompey rallies the peoples of the East to his cause. Caesar besieges Massilia and a sea battle ensues.

4: In Spain Petreius prevents a fraternization of the armies. Cut off from water supply, the Pompeians surrender and are released. The Caesarian Vulteius and his troops, faced with a hopeless situation near Salona, slay each other. The myth of Antaeus is included in the account of Curio's defeat in Africa.

---

di Lucano e di Persio, CCC 5, 1984, 155-189) this so-called Vacca Vita is independent of Suetonius. In the codex Bernensis 370 besides the Vacca Vita there is a fragmentary curriculum, which is based on Suetonius.

<sup>1</sup> K. F. C. ROSE, Problems of Chronology in Lucan's Career, TAPhA 97, 1966, 379-396.

<sup>2</sup> In favor of Pharsalia as the title of the work: F. AHL 1976, 326-332; the opposite view in J. P. POSTGATE, edition of book 7, Cambridge 1917, p. xc; A. E. HOUSMAN, edition 296.

5: The 'senate' deliberates in Epirus. Appius unbars the oracular shrine of Apollo at Delphi to consult the oracle but receives an ambiguous response. Caesar quells a mutiny and becomes both consul and dictator in Rome. A daring sea voyage confirms Caesar's luck. Pompey takes leave of Cornelia.

6: The Pompeians, hemmed in by Caesar at Dyrrhachium, try to break out, but Scaeva courageously prevents their attempt. A description of Thessaly follows. The witch Erichtho calls a dead man back to life and has him prophesy.

7: In a dream Pompey sees himself in his former glory; then follows the great battle of Pharsalus. Pompey flees. Caesar remains victorious.

8: Pompey continues his flight; on Lesbos he sees Cornelia again. He is murdered as he arrives in Egypt. An unknown man lays his decapitated body to rest.

9: Pompey's soul takes refuge in Brutus and Cato. Characterization of Cato. In Africa Cornelia meets her sons and Cato; the latter convinces the troops to fight on and leads them through serpent-infested deserts to Leptis. The Perseus myth explains the origin of snakes. On the occasion of Caesar's visit to Troy Lucan compares his Pharsalia to the Iliad. When he arrives in Egypt, Caesar 'mourns' Pompey.

10: Caesar visits Alexander's tomb and then spends some time with Cleopatra. After an excursus on the sources of the Nile we see Caesar threatened by the treacherous Egyptians. Here the work breaks off unfinished.<sup>1</sup>

Sources, Models, and Genres

The earliest poet of Lucan's native town of Corduba, Sextilius Ena, had written an epic on Roman history, as had Cornelius Severus. We do not know if Lucan was inspired by such works. According to the scholiasts, the subject matter was provided by the lost books 109–112 of Livy, whose Pompeian sympathies are known; moreover, one thinks immediately of a collection of exempla. Direct consultation of Caesar's Commentarii is hardly likely. The introductory analysis of the causes of the war is reminiscent of Asinius Pollio or, more generally, of pragmatic historiography, the motives of which found a new and typically Roman expression in Lucan.<sup>1</sup> Does that introduction have its earliest origin in Posidonius? And was it, again, Livy who transmitted these ideas to Lucan? The lost Annals of Cremutius Cordus and the Historia ab initio bellorum civilium of Lucan's grandfather, Seneca the Elder, were also sympathetic to Pompey. In some passages Lucan might have freely adapted letters of Cicero.<sup>2</sup> A great variety of sources have been conjectured for the geographic and ethnographic excursuses; in some parts the 10th book corresponds literally to Seneca's Naturales quaestiones.<sup>3</sup> Lucan showed himself knowledgeable in other fields—even in herpetology and magic—as befits his concept of a universal poetry; but he drew his knowledge more often from intermediate sources such as Licinius Macer (catalogue of snakes)<sup>4</sup> and Ovid than from Posidonius directly.

<sup>1</sup> From the content of 10. 525–529 some have concluded that the work was planned to end with the murder of Caesar; it was even assumed that Lucan also intended to treat Octavian's wars against Brutus, Cassius, and Antony. In any case book 10 is incomplete, and it seems probable that the work originally was intended to have 12 books. Less convincing is B. M. MARTI (1968) who suggests 16 books. With 18 books, the tetradic structure would be destroyed.

Lucan changed the genre of epic. He dispensed with the heretofore obligatory scenes involving the gods; myth was only of marginal significance for him; he stressed instead geography and natural science. He abandoned the reservation characteristic of traditional epic poets: on almost every page our author passionately expresses his personal opinion and comments on the events. What disturbed Roman readers about Lucan's poetry we can deduce from Petronius' epic on the civil war, which was probably conceived as a 'positive' counterpart to Lucan's work. Homer himself and his interpreters, however, were more important in the conception of the Pharsalia than one would expect.<sup>5</sup> Lucan did not really combat Virgil's Aeneid but tried to outshine it; the Georgics, however, were no less important as an example of cosmic poetry dedicated to a ruler. A comparative study of Lucan and another 'universal' poet, the didactic author Lucretius, would be rewarding. For Lucan Ovid's<sup>6</sup> Metamorphoses were an inspir-

<sup>1</sup> R. HÄUSSLER 1978, 2, 85; 87; cf. 104.

<sup>2</sup> E. MALGOVATI, Lucano e Cicerone, Athenaeum 31 (Studi Fraccaro), 1953, 288–297.

<sup>3</sup> H. DIELS, Seneca und Lucan, Abh. Akad. Berlin 1885, 1–54.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. I. CAZZANIGA, L'episodio dei serpi libici in Lucano e la tradizione dei Theriaka Nicandri, Acme 10, 1957, 27–41.

<sup>5</sup> M. LAUSBERG, Lucan und Homer, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1565–1622; C. M. C. GREENE, Stimulus dedit aemula virtus: Lucan and Homer Reconsidered, Phoenix 45, 1991, 230–254.

<sup>6</sup> E. THOMAS, Some Reminiscences of Ovid in Latin Literature, in: Atti del Convegno internazionale ovidiano, Sumona 1958, 1, 145–171; M. VON ALBRECHT, Der Dichter Lucan und die epische Tradition, in: Lucain, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 15, 1968, esp. 293–297.

ing authority not only for mythology but for natural science as well. As rhetorical epic poets preceding Lucan, Cornelius Severus and Albinovanus Pedo deserve to be mentioned. The pointed, almost epigrammatic, style is patterned after Ovid and Seneca, including the latter's tragedies.

Literary Technique

Lucanus magis oratoribus quam poetis imitandus, 'Lucan—more suitable for imitation by the orator than by the poet'? Before repeating Quintilian's easy formula (inst. 10. 1. 90), we should ask what Lucan as a poet owed to his rhetorical training.

Let us begin with the so-called evidentia. Lucan accompanies his discourse with a well-structured series of vivid images: thus, in the 1st book we can glean from the similes the course of the events and their importance: the first simile illustrates the general theme, 'the end of the world' (72–82); the second reveals the elimination of the last treshold of inhibition between the adversaries: with the death of Crassus the isthmus, as it were, between the two seas has disappeared, and they now crash into one another (100–106). Then we see Pompey as a venerable but brittle oak (135–143) and Caesar as the lightning that strikes it (151–157). The constant paralleling of the actual event with a logically constructed sequence of symbolic images melts rhetorical meditation and the tradition of the epic simile into a new poetic creation.

In addition, Lucan—ardens and concitatus, 'fiery and passionate' (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 90)—accompanies the events with emotional comments which often try to provoke the reader's response. Rhetoric, therefore, provides far more than a rational method of analyzing complex psychological processes. Rather, Lucan proves himself to be a great orator; his narrative does not simply remain stagnant in dry recitativo, but rises to an arioso full of inner life. The academic anthesis of poetry and rhetoric turns out to be misleading: what appears outwardly as an application of rhetorical skill in Lucan often turns out to be a means of lyrical expression. An unbroken impetus pervades Lucan's text and, as a 'continuous melody', forges it into a unity. This constitutes an emotional coherence that was formerly not usual in epic. A novel, specifically poetic quality is achieved here by means of rhetoric. Even small details of Lucan's invention—e.g. in the Scaeva episode<sup>1</sup>—show that rhetoric did not enslave Lucan's talent but liberated it.

The 'dissociation of the plot into individual scenes' and the 'repetition of events which have already been portrayed in an altered perspective'<sup>2</sup> contribute to the abrogation of the seeming objectivity characteristic of traditional epic. The poetic 'ego' penetrates the expanses of the universe and of history with his personal response.

Lucan's metamorphosis of epic through rhetoric is a logical and, in a sense, radical development of tendencies which had already been prepared by Virgil. The lyric ethos, which Virgil had contributed to epic, in Lucan assumed a character of pathos and gained a life of its own. As Virgil in his epic had fulfilled many of the intentions of ancient Roman tragedy, Lucan transferred the rhetorical style of Seneca's tragedies to epic.

In Servius' opinion (Aen. 1. 382),<sup>3</sup> Lucan was an historian, not a poet. Servius certainly overstated the antithesis; the two terms are not mutually exclusive in Lucan's case. To be sure, Lucan did learn much from ancient historiographers. The prooemium of the 1st book is skillfully arranged around the praise of Nero, and melts historiographical and poetic techniques. Again and again the reader is tempted to relate the dramatical style of his narrative to the literary principles of Hellenistic historiography.<sup>4</sup> As in a work of history, numerous speeches reveal the motives of the characters and Lucan places much importance on this feature. Once the depths of human psyche have been plumbed, the poet often brings his scene to conclusion with few lines. Not only individuals but also anonymous groups<sup>5</sup>—for example, the soldiers—are allowed to speak; thus Lucan anticipates some of the manners of Tacitus. There is no need to emphasize that many of his speeches are products of his imagination: even Thucydides was not beyond inventing speeches that were appropriate to the

<sup>1</sup> B. M. MARTI, Cassius Scaeva and Lucan's inventio, in: L. WALLACH, ed., The Classical Tradition: Literary and Historical Studies in Honor of H. CAPLAN, Ithaca 1966, 239–257; on the Scaeva episode s. also G. B. CONTE 1988, 43–112.

<sup>2</sup> W. GÖRLER, Caesars Rubikon-Übergang in der Darstellung Lucans, in: Studien zum antiken Epos FS F. DIRLMEIER and V. PÖSCHL, ed. by H. GÖRGEMANN and Ernst A. SCHMIDT, Meisenheim 1976, 291–308; on the 'Technik der isolierten Bilder': F. MEHMEL, Virgil und Apollonius Rhodius, Hamburg 1940, 106–129.

<sup>3</sup> I.e. Suetonius: R. HÄUSSLER 1978, 2, 239–241.

<sup>4</sup> B. M. MARTI, quoted above n. 1.

<sup>5</sup> Andreas W. SCHMITT, Die direkten Reden der Massen in Lucans Pharsalia, Frankfurt 1995.

occasion. In the case of an oration attributed by Lucan to Cicero, the fake is evident: Cicero, who is depicted advocating war, was not present in Dyrrhachium at that time and, furthermore, was an advocate of peace (7. 68–85). As a poet, Lucan mastered the technique of condensation: he possessed the ability to summarize a complex sequence of events in one momentous scene.

As for character portrayal, we will come back to it in the context of Lucan's ideas. Let it be mentioned here, however, that Lucan produced unforgettable character sketches of Roman women,<sup>1</sup> passages which did not fail to leave an impression, for instance, on Dante. In such portraits Livian humanitas is blended with epic tradition. Thanks to Lucan's uncommon ability—acquired perhaps from Homer—to mould details into a convincing unity, the Pharsalia has become one of very few historical epics which can claim to be of timeless value. Lucan's text oscillates between historical inaccuracy and a sometimes surprising attention to detail; far from being an end in itself, historiographical fidelity is subordinate to the poetic vision.

Lucan is not a radical iconoclast of the epic tradition. His above-mentioned rejection of the so-called divine apparatus was an intelligent decision, given his topic; otherwise his 'world war' would have become a 'twilight of the gods'. Catalogues and excursuses are retained to document the richness of a world both horrifying and beautiful, the expanses of the empire and the magnitude of the catastrophe. The catalogues which confer on real objects both universal meaning and poetic splendor, combine a quasi-didactic intent with 'scientific' explanation. For the portrayal of the storm (5. 541–702) he used and revised Seneca's version (Agam. 460–578). Scenes such as Lucan's storm at sea or his Scaeva-episode are to be considered within the epic tradition, but at the same time they make a new conquest of that tradition under the banner of rhetoric. Important thematic elements are placed even at similar points as they are in the Aeneid: thus, the retrospective view of Sulla and his time in the 2nd book is a counterpart to Virgil's destruction of Troy; similarly, the necromancy in book 6 corresponds to that of the 6th book of the Aeneid. At this point history reveals itself as anti-myth<sup>2</sup> or, rather, something greater than myth.

<sup>1</sup> Ovid had been an authoritative predecessor in this respect: R. T. BRUÈRE, Lucan's Cornelia, CPh 46, 1951, 221–236.

<sup>2</sup> E. NARDUCCI, La provvidenza crudele. Lucano e la distruzione dei miti augustei, Pisa 1979.

In certain respects the structure of the Pharsalia as a whole is reminiscent of the Aeneid: in the Pharsalia there are also significant parallels between books 1 and 7, 2 and 8, etc. As in the Aeneid, this bipartite structure competes with another one which is in three tetrads; in fact, books 5 and 9 mark new beginnings. This makes it probable that the work was planned for 12 books, which would extend to the death of Cato. Individual books, though relevant as artistic units, are less self-contained than Virgilian books; 'scenes', 'complexes',<sup>1</sup> and more subtle compositional units<sup>2</sup> command attention. What is important is a perennial, ever progressive internal movement, which replaces the contemplative mood of traditional epic with a novel, indefatigable dynamism and lends unity to variety. Lucan's original literary technique makes him a reformer, not a destroyer of epic.

Language and Style

Lucan is a master of language, style, and meter. Typical are new words coined with super-, denoting an upward impetus or a climax: superevolvo, superenato, superinvolvo, superaddo.<sup>3</sup> The purported mechanical monotony of meter is pure legend, for it is just that unobtrusive art of variation—applied without detriment to strict metric structure—that is characteristic of Lucan.<sup>4</sup> Enjambment<sup>5</sup> is an especially significant device enhancing his 'unending' melos and his passionate discourse (pathos).

Lucan's persistent animation and ardor of style prepared the way for Juvenal's Satires. Extravagant use of direct address is a feature of Lucan's technique of emotional appeal: in his prooemium he addresses, one after the other, the citizens (1. 8), Rome (21–23), the gods (37), the emperor (41–66), Rome once more (84–85), and the triumvirs (87).

Rhetorical acumen triumphs as early as the prooemium (1. 1–7). The poet succeeds again and again in writing memorable lines. Thus, he

<sup>1</sup> W. RUTZ 1950, 50–127 = 1989, 53–119.

<sup>2</sup> W. D. LEBEK 1976.

<sup>3</sup> The two last named are in tmesis: J. FICK, Kritische und sprachliche Untersuchungen zu Lukan, Programm Straubing 1889/90, 47–55; on Lucan's style in the Scaeva-episode, s. G. B. CONTE 1988, 43–112.

<sup>4</sup> G. MÖHLER, Hexameterstudien . . ., Frankfurt 1989; cf. also L. O. SCHER, The Structure of Lucan's Hexameter, diss. Stanford 1972; cf. DA 33, 1972, 2351 A.

<sup>5</sup> A. HOLGADO REDONDO, El encabalgamiento versal y su tipología en la Farsalia de Lucano, CFC 15, 1978, 251–260.

unveils the contradiction between material success and moral substance: victrix causa deis placuit, sed victa Catoni, 'if the victor had the gods on his side, the vanquished had Cato' (1. 128). Of Pompey he remarks: stat magni nominis umbra (1.135); of Caesar: nil actum credens, cum quid superesset agendum, 'he thought nothing done while anything remained to do' (2. 657). The expression furor Teutonicus, 'the wild career of the Teutones' (1. 255–256), which later would be frequently cited, was also coined by Lucan. In his hands a stylistic device such as hypallage,<sup>1</sup> a mutual exchange of elements in an expression, achieves a deeper sense, as (6. 311) nec sancto caruisset vita Catone, 'nor would the land of the living have lost the stainless Cato'. Cato's losing his life is no loss for Cato but for life itself, which has become poorer through his death.

A secret of Lucan's style is the creation of an uninterrupted stream of consciousness—and that is achieved despite the brilliance of the individual sentence. One of the means to maintain fluency of syntax is the use of coordinating particles (nam, quodsi, etc.) and the postponement of the end of sentence beyond the end of the line. It would be wrong to explain Lucan's fluid style, which does not avoid repetition of words, as a 'spontaneous, result of hasty and sketchy composition. Rather, the introduction of 'endless melody' into epic is the result of conscious artistic work, an achievement that cannot be reduced to the catchword 'rhetorization' since it lends a permeating poetic momentum and often an almost lyrical touch to the text.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

On the occasion of Caesar's visit to Troy,<sup>2</sup> Lucan says to his hero: 'Our Pharsalia will live on' (9. 980–986). He proudly competes with Homer: the typological series Caesar—Alexander—Achilles is just as obvious as the contrast to Virgil, who—likewise in the 9th book—promised eternal glory to Nisus and Euryalus (Aen. 9. 446–449). The great and sacred creativity of the poets (sacer et magnus vatium labor) rescues everything from oblivion. In Lucan Caesar found his Homer. However, Lucan has in no way forgotten that his subject is the most unfortunate battle in world history; and he even stresses this insight. Nor is there any contradiction to the first proemium with its tidings of Roman self-destruction and of the enthronement of crime. Lucan's choice of a negative theme and a negative hero impart to the topos of poetry's immortalizing powers a wholly original twist. The poet's solidarity with his anti-hero in the face of eternity is an especially sublime feature.

<sup>1</sup> U. HÜBNER, Hypallage in Lucans Pharsalia, Hermes 100, 1972, 577–600; id., Studien zur Pointentechnik in Lucans Pharsalia, Hermes 103, 1975, 200–211.

<sup>2</sup> O. ZWIERLEIN, Lucans Caesar in Troja, Hermes 114, 1986, 460–478.

Ideas II

To understand Lucan's political attitude, we should make a clear distinction between the image of Nero as the 'new Augustus' (Suet. Nero 10. 1.) and that of Caesar, who, at the outset of the imperial period was largely put into the shade by Augustus and even by Pompey. The early homage to the Sun King, who actually seemed at first under Seneca's tutorship to inspire great expectations and indeed introduced a new cultural epoch, cannot have been meant ironically.<sup>1</sup> The only point open to discussion is whether Lucan's eulogy served as a camouflage or whether—more plausibly—his appraisal of Nero changed along with the sovereign's attitude towards the poet. Lucan expressed his disappointment in the later books,<sup>2</sup> but we should not attribute to him any clearly defined political program. As all distinguished Romans of the time, our poet experienced the antagonism between theoretical republicanism (which was even a part of the programs of Augustus and his successors) and practical acquiescence to autocracy (1. 89–95), a tension which would be somewhat relaxed during the enlightened monarchy of the 'good emperors'. His advocacy of the senate's rights, however, is something quite different from any serious intention to reestablish the republic.

<sup>1</sup> Rightly P. GRIMAL, L'Eloge de Néron au début de la Pharsale est-il ironique?, REL 38, 1960, 296–305; allusions to Horace throw light on parallels between Nero and Augustus: M. PASCHALIS, Two Horatian Reminiscences in the Proem of Lucan, Mnemosyne 35, 1982, 342–346; more comprehensive is I. BORZSÁK, Lucan and Horaz, ACD 14, 1978, 43–49; according to D. EBENER Lucan wanted to disguise his real intentions: Lucans Bürgerkriegsepos als Beispiel poetischer Gestaltung eines historischen Stoffes, Klio 66, 1984, 581–589; for an assessment of the homage to Nero: R. HÄUSSLER 1978, 76–80; 256–257; on the change of Lucan's attitude and his increasing obstinacy ibid. 84, n. 82; 92, n. 81; cf. also A. M. DUMONT, L'éloge de Néron (Lucain, Bellum Civile 1. 33–66), BAGB 1986, 22–40; M. DEWAR, Laying it on with a Trowel. The Proem to Lucan and Related Texts, CQ n.s. 44, 1994, 199–211; irony is defended by G. BELDON, Lucanus anceps, RCCM 14, 1972, 132–145; on Lucan and Calpurnius: K. KRAUTTER, Lucan, Calpurnius und Nero, Philologus 136, 1992, 188–201.

<sup>2</sup> On the increase in anti-monarchic vocabulary in book 7: K. F. C. ROSE, Problems of Chronology in Lucan's Career, TAPhA 97, 1966, 379–396, esp. 388 with n. 26.

Fully aware of Caesar's greatness, Lucan repeatedly identified him with Alexander<sup>1</sup> who, despite his undisputed fame, was often viewed negatively at Rome. Even a Lucan could not pass over Caesar's clementia in silence (2. 511–525; 3. 134–140; 4. 363–381); but to true republicans, a life spared merely out of capricious imperial mercy appeared to be the deepest of humiliations. Furthermore, Lucan considered Caesar's 'mourning' for Pompey (9. 1035–1108) purely self-motivated and contrived. He depicted Caesar as a new Hannibal (1. 303–305), a quasi-oriental despot (cf. 10. 169),<sup>2</sup> a demoniacal tyrant of satanic majesty (e.g. 3. 437). Ira, furor, lonely greatness and belief in Fortuna are characteristic of Lucan's Caesar.<sup>3</sup> As in Seneca, furor becomes a consciously induced madness, which releases latent powers, and monstrous crime becomes a gladly self-imposed duty.<sup>4</sup> Lucan projects Seneca's 'tragedy of nefas' into the larger dimensions of epic and transposes it from private life to world history.

However, the portrait of Caesar, like that of Pompey, is hardly consistent; as situations change, certain individual features disturb the harmony of the portrait, though enlivening it.<sup>5</sup> It is difficult to prove that in the portrayal of Caesar there is a systematic increase in dark colors. The presence, however, of a certain fascination with evil, to which the author, too, succumbs, is undisputed. The poet's warm espousal of Pompey's cause, his constant declarations of sympathy with an aging, somewhat lachrymose man, who finds himself continually on the run, elicit a sense of romantic futility;<sup>6</sup> without a doubt, Pompey is the most 'human' character in the Pharsalia.<sup>7</sup> His ally, Brutus, in the main, is portrayed favorably, and Cato, whose character in the 2nd book was exposed to a serious conflict of conscience, finally exceeds human bounds in his perfection. It is no wonder that Cato has been viewed as the embodiment of the Stoic sage; yet,

<sup>1</sup> All three main characters are occasionally paralleled with Alexander: W. RUTZ, Gnomon 39, 1967, 793.

<sup>2</sup> Manfred Gerhard SCHMIDT 1986, 251.

<sup>3</sup> W. RUTZ 1950, 129–163 = 1989, 122–152.

<sup>4</sup> R. GLAESSAR 1984, 151–152.

<sup>5</sup> W. RUTZ 1950, 163–167 = 1989, 153–156.

<sup>6</sup> All this makes him unsuited for the role of a Stoic proficiens.

<sup>7</sup> B. M. MARTI, The Meaning of the Pharsalia, AJPh 66, 1945, 352–376.

Cato, in his glowing passion for freedom, sacrifice and death resembles more a holy ascetic and martyr than a serene philosopher.

Cato is a good substitute for the gods, whom Lucan banished from his epic.<sup>1</sup> Does he not surpass in virtue the immoral deities of epic tradition or the forces of history (whether it be fata, fortuna, or superi)? Lucan's Cato is the noblest expression of a typically Roman experience, finding the presence of an immaterial god in one's own heart. In his own way Caesar, who is both the exponent and a caricature of the new apotheosis, possesses his own strong numen: in fact, he conquers the old gods of the sacred grove of Massilia on his own authority (3. 399–452). In this respect Lucan's theology and anthropology are strikingly modern.

It is true that the course of events cannot be changed, but the sage, Cato,<sup>2</sup> takes sides, thus changing what had been the 'Pompeian' into the 'Republican' and, therefore, nobler cause. Such readiness to action without any real hope reminds the modern reader of Existentialism. On his march through the desert Cato chooses hardship for its own sake. Scaeva performs superhuman exploits—but to what purpose (quanta dominum virtute parasti, 'how bravely you have fought that a tyrant might rule over you!' 6. 262)?

The fata have no immediate positive goal; hardly can they be reconciled with the Stoic λόγος and εἰμαρμένη, unless the critic has the enviable strength of faith to maintain the validity of the initial prophecy to Nero for the whole work. Fortuna is, in its fickleness, the adversary of man and his virtus, of his staunch resolution never to relinquish his freedom, but, if necessary, to translate it into reality by death.<sup>3</sup>

Lucan's gods, who have decided in favor of Caesar, are close conceptually to Fortuna. Elements of Stoic philosophy, therefore, are traceable, but exaggerations ('love of death') and inconsistencies in their application demonstrate that in poetry they are not an end in themselves but a means to an end.

<sup>1</sup> Traces of gods: F. M. AHL, The Shadows of a Divine Presence in the Pharsalia, Hermes 102, 1974, 566–590.

<sup>2</sup> For Cato as the Stoic sage: J. M. ADATTE, Caton ou l'engagement du sage dans la guerre civile, EL 8, 1965, 232–240; P. PECCHIURA, La figura di Catone Uticense nella letteratura latina, Torino 1965.

<sup>3</sup> For the Pharsalia as a Cato tragedy: G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, Lucan als Dichter des geistigen Widerstandes, Hermes 87, 1959, 344–377.

Lucan stresses repeatedly the interaction between macro- and micro-cosm:<sup>1</sup> this is the core of his invention. The war which shakes the world of the Roman state is seen as a cosmic catastrophe brought about by men. Within this framework, prophesies, prodigies, and cosmic similes serve a meaningful purpose; to be sure, they tangibly portend destiny (this also according to the belief of the Stoics).<sup>2</sup>

Transmission

From a rich textual transmission six manuscripts and two fragments are normally selected: Parisinus Lat. 10314 (Z; 9th century), Montepessulanus, bibl. med. H 113 (M; 9th–10th century), Parisinus Lat. 7502 (P; 10th century), Gemblacensis = Bruxellensis, bibl. Burgund. 5330 (G; 10th–11th century), Leidensis Vossianus Lat. XIX f. 63 (U; 10th century), Leidensis Vossianus Lat. XIX f. 51 (V; 10th century), fragmenta librorum VI et VII in cod. Palatino Vaticano 24 (II; 4th–5th century), fragmenta librorum V et VI in cod. Bobiensi (4th–5th century) extantia, cuius discerpti particulae sunt codd. Vindobonensis 16 et Neapolitanus IV A 8.

HOUSMAN objects to an overestimation of M. If ZP are opposed to GUV, GUV often have the better reading. If opposed to PUV, TG often prove to be correct. P and U can be classified 'average', Z, G, and V are 'eccentric'. Z is relatively the least often interpolated, G the most; nevertheless, G is especially close to the ancient palimpsests. HOUSMAN did not establish a stemma. His views have now to be supplemented by the studies of GOTOFF, EHLERS, HÅKANSON, and LUCK.<sup>3</sup>

Influence<sup>4</sup>

Lucan was confident in the immortality of his work (9. 985–986). It met with the criticism of Petronius (118–125), and Quintilian recommended it to orators rather than to poets for imitation (inst. 10. 1. 90).

<sup>1</sup> L. ECKARDT, Exkurse und Ekphraseis bei Lucan, diss. Heidelberg 1936; M. LAPIDGE, Lucan's Imagery of Cosmic Dissolution, Hermes 107, 1979, 344–370.

<sup>2</sup> Stoic thought in Lucan: P. GRIMAL, Quelques aspects du stoïcisme de Lucain dans la Pharsale, BAB 69, 1983, 401–416; D. B. GEORGE, The Stoic poet Lucan. Lucan's Bellum Civile and Stoic Ethical Theory, diss. Columbus, Ohio 1985; cf. DA 46, 1985, 1616 A.

<sup>3</sup> W. RUTZ, Lustrum 26, 1984, 114–115; id., ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1459–1460.

<sup>4</sup> M. CYTOWSKA, Lucain en Pologne, Eos 60, 1972, 137–148; W. FISCHLI, Studien zum Fortleben der Pharsalia des M. Annaeus Lucanus, Luzern sine anno, originally: Beilage zum Jahresbericht der kantonalen höheren Lehranstalten in Luzern 1943/

Martial attests to high figures in sales (14. 194). Statius admired Lucan (silo. 2. 7; cf. Martial 7. 21–23 and 10. 64), Silius imitated him, and Florus used him.<sup>1</sup>

In late antiquity Christians took pleasure in reading Lucan; the very fact that he had reduced the role of the pagan gods may have favored his acceptance; furthermore, Lucan's characters played an important role as exempla. Prudentius, for example, who learnt much from Lucan for his portrayal of martyrs, inaugurated a line of great lyric poets whom Rome's most modern, melancholy and subjective epic poet would attract. Before the middle of the 6th century Arator extolled the felix culpa of the Fall of Man with Lucan's own words from the eulogy of Nero (Lucan. 1. 37; Arator, act. 1. 62 scelera ipsa nefasque/hac potius mercede placent, mundoque redempto/sors melior de clade venit, 'even such crimes and such guilt are welcome if this is the reward for them and since the world was redeemed a better lot came through the disaster'). The great grammarian Priscianus, who taught in Constantinople, quite often used references from the Pharsalia to support his rules: that in itself is evidence for his readers' familiarity with Lucan's work. Vacca, the commentator on Lucan, is most often placed in the same century, especially since he cites Martianus Capella and Boethius and was probably used by Isidore; he is most likely the source of the Adnotationes super Lucanum.<sup>2</sup>

In the Middle Ages Lucan was read extensively as a classic.<sup>3</sup> Abaelard's Héloïse in her hour of desperation prays with the words of our poet (2. 14–15; hist. calam., epist. 4); when taking her leave to become a nun, she quotes Cornelia's words of farewell from Lucan (8. 94–98; Abael. epist. 1). Just as Cornelia embodies<sup>4</sup> the ethics of 44; V.-J. HERRERO-LLORENTE, Lucano en la literatura hispano-latina, Emerita 27, 1959, 19–52; O. SCHÖNBERGER, Eine Nachwirkung Lucans bei Heinrich von Kleist, GRMS n.s. 12, 1962, 318–321; O. ZWIERLEIN, Cäsar und Kleopatra bei Lucan und in späterer Dichtung, A&A 20, 1974, 54–73.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. e.g. H.-D. LEIDIG, Das Historiengedicht in der englischen Literaturtheorie. Die Rezeption von Lucans Pharsalia von der Renaissance bis zum Ausgang des 18. Jh., Bern 1975, 7 (on Mart. 14. 194) and 12–16 (summary of criticism on Lucan in antiquity).

<sup>2</sup> Edition: J. ENDT, Lipsiae 1909; a new edition by H. SZELEST is in progress.

<sup>3</sup> T. A. CREIZENACH, Die Aeneis, die Vierte Ekloge und die Pharsalia im Mittelalter, Progr. Frankfurt 1864; recently: A. S. BERNARDO, S. LEVIN, eds., The Classics in the Middle Ages, Binghamton 1990, index s.v. Lucan, esp. 165–173 (J. G. HAAHR, William of Malmesbury's Roman Models: Suetonius and Lucan).

<sup>4</sup> P. VON MOOS, Lucan und Abaelard, in: G. CAMBIER, ed., Hommages à A. BOU-TEMY, Bruxelles 1976, 413–443.

pure, unselfish love, so Cato's refusal to quench his thirst (9. 500–510; Abael. epist. 8)<sup>1</sup> demonstrates that leaders have to live for others, not for themselves. The putative republican poet also provides the cardinal lines on the indivisibility of monarchic power (1. 89–93; epist. 8). He was read primarily as an historian (or as a natural philosopher). English authors (Geoffrey of Monmouth and Richard of Cirencester) cited with much gusto Lucan's ironic remark concerning Caesar's flight from the Britons (2. 572).<sup>2</sup> In addition, reminiscences are found in the biography of St. Willibrord by Thiofrid of Echternach (12th century).<sup>3</sup> In Dante's opinion Lucan ranks with Homer, Virgil, Horace, and Ovid as one of the greatest poets (inf. 4. 90). In the Divine Comedy Julia, Marcia, and Cornelia come back (inf. 4. 128; purg. 1. 78–79), as do Curio (inf. 28. 100–102), Nasidius, and Sabellus (inf. 25. 94–95) and even the pauper Amyclas (parad. 11. 67–69), but above all, Cato Uticensis, whose march through the desert Dante admired (inf. 14. 13–15) and whom he elevated to keeper of Purgatory. In the Convivio (4. 28) Cato is assigned a still loftier role: Marcia's return to him connotes the return of the soul to God.

Apart from such spiritualization, but roughly contemporary with it—and in keeping with a general trend—Lucan was used for the historical material he provided: Jehan de Tuim thus composed a paraphrase of the Pharsalia in Old French; at the close of the 13th century Jacot de Forest adapted the work to Alexandrine verse in rhymes à tirade; the Pharsalia was transformed into a courtly novel about knights errant and love. In the 14th century Charles V ('the Wise') commissioned a translation of Lucan in French. In the 15th century Juan de Mena (Laberinto 241–243: Lucan. 6. 670–672; Lab. 164–166: Lucan. 1. 526–528) set Lucan's texts to Spanish verse. Pomponius Laetus (d. 1498) wrote a commentary on books 1–8. 733.<sup>4</sup> Readers developed literary interests: Gradually, Lucan taught Renaissance poets how to transform contemporary history into poetry.<sup>5</sup> Torquato Tasso, in whose epic, as in Lucan's, scholars have found traces of 'mannerism', was inspired in books 13 and 18 of his Gerusalemme liberata by

<sup>1</sup> It is often ignored that the refusal of drink relates to the younger Cato and to Lucan.

<sup>2</sup> HIGGET, Class. Trad. 577, n. 30.

<sup>3</sup> K. ROSSBERG, Ein mittelalterlicher Nachahmer des Lucanus, RhM 38, 1883, 152–154; on quotations from Lucan in medieval biographies and historical works: J. G. HAAHR, op. cit. above, p. 926, note 3, esp. 170.

<sup>4</sup> CONTE, LG 450.

<sup>5</sup> C. SCHLAYER, Spuren Lucans in der spanischen Dichtung, diss. Heidelberg 1927.

the scene in the grove of Massilia (Lucan. 3. 399–452). Martín Lasso de Oropesa published a Castilian prose translation in Lisbon (1541). Spanish epic poets took delight in their classical countryman and kindred spirit.<sup>1</sup> Through a brilliant poetic translation of Lucan, Juan de Jáuregui y Aguilar (d. 1641) provided the Gongorists with a ‘classical’ authority for their baroque concettismo. Two generations earlier (1561) J. C. Scaliger, who adored Virgil, had called Lucan taedii pater<sup>2</sup> and had adduced examples, showing how the poet could have expressed himself more briefly. Montaigne’s approach was totally different: He liked reading our poet but ‘less for his style than for the merits of his character and for the truthfulness of his opinions and judgments’ (Essais 2. 10). In his House of Fame Chaucer placed Lucan on top of an iron column, an honor he shared only with Homer, Virgil, Ovid, and Statius.<sup>3</sup> In the 16th century Samuel Daniel and Michael Drayton wrote epic poems on contemporary civil conflicts in the footsteps of Lucan and Homer. Towards the end of the 16th century Marlowe translated the 1st book into English; complete translations were written by Sir Arthur Gorges (1614) and Thomas May (1627) who was also the author of a Latin supplement extending to Caesar’s death (printed e.g. in Oudendorp’s edition of Lucan); inevitably, Caesar turned out to be his hero. Some features of Milton’s Satan are reminiscent of Lucan’s Caesar; in Paradise Lost, the Pharsalia is viewed from a new angle. Veit Ludwig Von Seckendorff<sup>4</sup> (d. 1692), Chancellor of the University of Halle, a jurist and church historian, invented for his translation of Lucan the rhymeless Alexandrine, a bold innovation in German poetry after Opitz. In the modern period, Lucan’s Pharsalia held a key position in the discussion of historical epic. Voltaire recognized Lucan’s ‘original genius’; according to him, the scene 3. 399–452 shows ‘to what degree the greatness of a real hero is superior to that of an invented one’.<sup>5</sup> Cato’s proud refusal to consult an oracle (9. 544–618) elicited from him the following remark: ‘All that has been said about the gods by classical poets is childish talk compared to this passage from Lucan’.<sup>6</sup> His friend, Fred-

<sup>1</sup> Bibl. in HIGHET, Class. Trad. 602–603.

<sup>2</sup> J. C. SCALIGER, Poetices libri septem, Lyon (1561), repr. Stuttgart 1964, 114; A. R. BACA, A Mordant Judgement. J. C. Scaliger’s Criticism of Lucan, in: Pacific Coast Philology 8, 1973, 5–9.

<sup>3</sup> CONTE, LG 450.

<sup>4</sup> F. GUNDOLF, Seckendorffs Lucan, SHAW 1930–1931, 2.

<sup>5</sup> Essai sur la poésie épique, ch. 4.

<sup>6</sup> Dictionnaire philosophique, s.v. Epopée.

erick the Great, however, called the Pharsalia 'a bombastic gazette'.<sup>1</sup>

Shakespeare's and his contemporaries' dramas on Roman subjects were influenced by the Pharsalia, as were plays on contemporary history.<sup>2</sup> From a later period Chapman's Caesar and Pompey (1631) and J. Addison's (d. 1719) Cato deserve mention. In France, Lucan's influence was still stronger: there were Robert Garnier's tragedy Cornélie (1574), Charles Chaulmer's La mort de Pompée (1638), and Corneille's Pompée (1641); Corneille was attracted to the 'force of Lucan's insights' and the 'majesty of his way of thinking' (Pompée: Au lecteur) and seems to have preferred him even to Virgil. The Pharsalian Fields are the setting of Goethe's<sup>3</sup> Klassische Walpurgisnacht (Faust II, 2nd Act), which is introduced by the witch Erichtho known to us from Lucan.

It is not mere chance that Lucan was discovered again and again by lyrists: The great neo-Latin poet Conrad Celtis<sup>4</sup> paid homage to him, as did Shelley's universal lyrical genius;<sup>5</sup> Hölderlin in his youth translated long passages from book I in powerful hexameters; Baudelaire confessed that the Pharsalia 'ever brilliant, melancholy, heart-rending, Stoic' comforted him from his early years.<sup>6</sup> C. F. Meyer's (d. 1898) lyrical ballad Das Heiligtum was inspired by the same scene that Voltaire had admired (3. 399–452). During the French Revolution, a line of Lucan (4. 579 datos, ne quisquam serviat, enses) was engraved on the sabres of the French National Guard of the First Republic; later, the same line would be used by the German poet Ernst Moritz Arndt (d. 1860). The tragic experience of civil war in our century produced a modern Russian translation of the Pharsalia; its author is Lev Ostroumov, a born lyricist.

Editions: Roma 1469. * F. OUDENDORP (TC, with the Adnotationes super Lucanum), Lugduni Batavorum 1728. * C. F. WEBER (TC, with the scholiasts), 3 vols., Lipsiae 1821–1831. * C. E. HASKINS (TC), London 1887. * C. M. FRANCKEN

<sup>1</sup> T. A. CREIZENACH (cited above n. 50), 36; similarly, Louis XIV had deemed the Pharsalia a dangerous reading for the Dauphin, whereas Hugo Grotius had praised Lucan as poeta φιλελεύθερος (CONTE, LG 451).

<sup>2</sup> W. VON KOPPENFELS, Our Swords into our Proper Entrails. Aspekte der Lucan rezeption im elisabethanischen Bürgerkriegsdrama, A&A 21, 1975, 58–84.

<sup>3</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER, Goethe und Lucan, Gymnasium 65, 1958, 450–452.

<sup>4</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER, Aneignungen antiker Gedanken in deutscher Literatur, Gymnasium 91, 1984, 496–506.

<sup>5</sup> R. ACKERMANN, Lucans Pharsalia in den Dichtungen Shelleys; mit einer Übersicht ihres Einflusses auf die englische Literatur, Zweibrücken 1896; Alfieri, Leopardi (Bruto minore) and Foscolo (I Sepolcri) were influenced by Lucan (CONTE, LG 450), certainly not merely for ideological reasons, but on grounds of his poetic qualities.

<sup>6</sup> Letter to Sainte-Beuve, January 15, 1866 (Correspondance générale 5, 216).

(TC), Lugduni Batavorum 1896–1897. * C. HOSIUS, Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1913. * R. BADALÌ (TTrN), Torino 1988. * A. E. HOUSMAN (editorum in usum), Oxford 2nd ed. 1927. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Stutgardiae 1988. * R. BADALÌ, Roma 1992. * S. H. BRAUND (TrN), Oxford 1992. * W. EHLERS (TTr), München 2nd ed. 1978. * G. LUCK (TTr), Berlin 1985. * J. D. DUFF (TTr), London 1928. * Book 1: R. J. GETTY (TC), Cambridge 2nd ed. 1955. * P. WUILLEUMIER, H. LE BONNIEC (TC), Paris 1962. * Book 2: E. FANTHAM (TC), Cambridge 1992. * Book 3: V. HUNINK (C), Amsterdam 1992. * Book 6, 118–260: G. B. CONTE (TC) 1988 (s. below) 43–112. * Book 7: O. A. W. DILKE (TC), Cambridge 1960. * Book 8: J. P. POSTGATE (TC), Cambridge 1917. * R. MAYER (TTrC), Warminster 1981. * Book 10. 1–171: M. G. SCHMIDT (C) 1986 (s. below). * Ancient Vitae: C. BRAIDOTTI, Bologna 1972. * Scholiaz: Commenta Bernensia, ed. H. USENER, Lipsiae 1869. * Adnotationes super Lucanum, ed. J. ENDT, Lipsiae 1909. * Supplementum adnotationum super Lucanum I (libri I–V), ed. by G. A. CAVAJONI, Milano 1979; II (libri VI–VII) 1984. * Arnulfi Aurelianensis glosule super Lucanum, ed. by B. M. MARTI, Roma 1958. ** Ind., Concordance: G. W. MOONEY, Hermathena 44. 1, Dublin 1927. * R. J. DEFERRARI, M. W. FANNING and A. S. SULLIVAN, Washington 1940. * M. WACHT, Hildesheim 1992. ** Bibl.: W. RUTZ, Lustrum 9, 1964, 243–340; 10, 1965, 246–259; 26, 1984, 105–203; 27, 1985, 149–166. * W. RUTZ, Lucans Pharsalia im Lichte der neuesten Forschung (with bibl. add. 1980–1985 by H. TUTTJE), ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1457–1537. * Andreas W. SCHMITT, in: Rutz 1989.

K. ABEL, Sen. dial. 12. 18. 4 ff. Ein Zeugnis für die Biographie Lucans?, RhM 115, 1972, 325–329. * F. M. AHL, Lucan. An Introduction, Ithaca/London 1976. * F. ARNALDI, Lucano, Vichiana n.s. 3, 1974, 40–49. * F. ARREDONDO, Un episodio de magia negra en Lucano. La Bruja de Tesalia, Helmantica 3, 1952, 347–362. * J. AYMARD, Quelques séries de comparaisons chez Lucain, Montpellier 1951. * J. BÉRANGER, Idéologie impériale et épopée latine, in: Mélanges J. CARCOPINO, Paris 1966, 97–112. * H. BERTHOLD, Virtus temeraria bei Lucan, 5. 682. Ein Beitrag zum Verständnis der politischen Terminologie der Kaiserzeit, WZHalle 19, 1970, G., H 2, 51–58. * H. BERTHOLD, Beobachtungen zu den Epilogen Lucans, Helikon 17, 1977, 218–225. * W. BLISSETT, Caesar and Satan, JHI 18, 1957, 221–232. * C. BRAIDOTTI, La Vita Suetoniana di Lucano nel Reginensis Lat. 1634, in: Letterature Comparete. Problemi e Metodo. Studi in onore di E. PARATORE, Bologna 1981, vol. 2, 713–718. * J. BRISSET, Les idées politiques de Lucain, Paris 1964. * G. BRUGNOLI, Osservazioni sulla Vita Lucani di Vacca, Vichiana n.s. 11, 1982, 35–51. * V. BUCHHEIT, Statius' Geburtstagsgedicht zu Ehren Lucans, Hermes 88, 1960, 231–249. * E. BURCK and W. RUTZ, Die Pharsalia Lucans, in: Das römische Epos, ed. by E. BURCK, Darmstadt 1979, 154–199. * G. B. CONTE, La Guerra Civile di Lucano. Studi e prove di Commento, Urbino 1988. * O. S. DUE, An Essay on Lucan,

C&M 23, 1962, 68–132. * E. FRAENKEL, Lucan als Mittler des antiken Pathos, in: Vorträge der Bibliothek Warburg 4, 1924–25, Leipzig 1927, 229–257, repr. in: W. RUTZ, ed., Lucan, s. below, 15–49. * J. GASSNER, Kataloge im römischen Epos, Vergil—Ovid—Lucan, diss. München 1972. * D. B. GEORGE, The Meaning of the Pharsalia Revisited, in: C. DEROUX, ed., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, Bruxelles 1992, 362–369. * R. GLAESER, Verbrechen und Verblendung. Untersuchungen zum Furor-Begriff bei Lucan mit Berücksichtigung der Tragödien Senecas, Frankfurt 1984. * H. C. GOTOFF, The Transmission of the Text of Lucan in the 9th Century, Cambridge 1971. * G. K. GRESSETH, The Quarrel between Lucan and Nero, CPh 52, 1957, 24–27. * P. GRIMAL, Lucain et Sénèque à propos d'une tempête, in: Mélanges E. GAREAU, Ottawa 1982, 173–178. * F. GUNDOLF, Caesar. Geschichte seines Ruhms, Berlin 1924, esp. 32–36. * L. HÅKANSON, Problems of Textual Criticism and Interpretation in Lucan's De bello civili, PCPhS 25, 1979, 26–51. * R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius und seine Theorie. Studien zum historischen Epos der Antike 2. Geschichtliche Epik nach Vergil, Heidelberg 1978. * M. HELZLE, Indocilis privata loqui. The Characterization of Lucan's Caesar, SO 69, 1994, 121–136. * J. HENDERSON, Lucan: The Word at War, in: The Imperial Muse: To Juvenal through Ovid, ed. by A. J. BOYLE, Bendigo 1988, 122–164. * U. HÜBNER, Episches und Elegisches am Anfang des dritten Buches der Pharsalia, Hermes 112, 1984, 227–239. * W. R. JOHNSON, Momentary Monsters: Lucan and His Heroes, Ithaca 1987. * M. LAPIDGE, Lucan's Imagery of Cosmic Dissolution, Hermes 107, 1979, 344–370. * W. D. LEBEK, Lucans Pharsalia. Dichtungsstruktur und Zeitbezug, Göttingen 1976. * H.-W. LINN, Studien zur aemulatio des Lucan, diss. Hamburg 1971. * A. LOUPIAC, La poétique des éléments dans la Pharsale, BAGB 1991, 3, 247–266. * Lucain. Sept exposés suivis de discussions par B. MARTI, P. GRIMAL, F. L. BASTET, H. LE BONNIEC, O. STEEN DUE, W. RUTZ, M. VON ALBRECHT, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 15, Vandœuvres-Genève 1968. * G. LUCK, Die fehlenden Verse im Lucantext, RhM 112, 1969, 254–284. * B. M. MARTI, Vacca in Lucanum, Speculum 25, 1950, 198–214. * B. M. MARTI, Lucan's Narrative Techniques, Latomus 30, 1975, 74–90. * C. MARTINDALE, Paradox, Hyperbole, and Literary Novelty in Lucan's De bello civili, BICS 23, 1976, 45–54. * J. MASTERS, Poetry and Civil War in Lucan's Bellum civile, Cambridge 1992. * E. MENSCHING, Lukans Schriftenverzeichnis bei Statius, silv. 2, 7, Hermes 97, 1969, 252–255. * Y. MIURA, Lucanea. Bellum civile and Speech of Anonymous People, JCS 28, 1980, 66–76 and 163–164 (summary in English). * Y. MIURA, Zur Funktion der Gleichnisse im I. und VII. Buch von Lucans Pharsalia, GB 10, 1981, 207–232. * G. MÖHLER, Hexameterstudien zu Lukrez, Vergil, Horaz, Ovid, Lukan, Silius Italicus und der Ilias Latina, Frankfurt 1989. * M. P. O. MORFORD, The Poet Lucan. Studies in Rhetorical Epic, Oxford 1967. * E. NARDUCCI, La provvidenza crudele:

Lucano e la distruzione dei miti augustei, Pisa 1979. * E. NARDUCCI, Ideologia e tecnica allusiva nella Pharsalia, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1538–1564. * A. OLLFORS, Studien zum Aufbau des Hexameters Lucans, Göteborg 1967. * A. OLLFORS, Textkritische und interpretatorische Beiträge zu Lucan, ibid. 1967. * H.(=E.) PARATORE, De Lucano et Torquato Tasso, Latinitas 19, 1971, 6–23. * U. PIACENTINI, Osservazioni sulla tecnica epica di Lucano, Berlin 1963. * R. PICHON, Les sources de Lucain, Paris 1912. * G. DE PLINVAL, Une insolence de Lucain, Latomus 15, 1956, 512–520. * W. RUTZ, Studien zur Kompositionskunst und zur epischen Technik Lucans, unpubl. diss. Kiel 1950, new ed., corr. and with a bibl. epilogue by Andreas W. SCHMITT, Frankfurt 1989. * W. RUTZ, ed., Lucan, Darmstadt 1970. * Manfred Gerhard SCHMIDT, Caesar und Cleopatra. Philologischer und historischer Kommentar zu Lucan 10. 1–171, Frankfurt 1986. * Andreas W. SCHMITT, Die direkten Reden der Massen in Lucans Pharsalia, Frankfurt 1995. * O. SCHÖNBERGER, Untersuchungen zur Wiederholungstechnik Lucans, München 2nd ed. 1968. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Lucans Gedicht vom Bürgerkrieg, diss. München 1958. * H. SZELEST, Biografie Lukana, Meander 29, 1974, 78–82. * L. THOMPSON, R. T. BRUÈRE, Lucan's Use of Vergilian Reminiscence, CPh 63, 1968, 1–21. * H. J. TSCHIEDEL, Lucan und die Tränen Caesars, Eichstätter Hochschulreden 46, 1985, 3–26.

VALERIUS FLACCUS

Life and Dates

C. Valerius Flaccus Setinus Balbus<sup>1</sup> was of senatorial rank and a member of the quindecimviri sacris faciundis (l. 5–7).<sup>2</sup> These highly respected priests of Apollo had to consult the Sibylline Books and to survey cults introduced to Rome from abroad. In Valerius' epic, certainly not by chance, religion plays an important part. If Setia, a wine-producing town in Latium, was his home, he is not to be identified with the Patavine Flaccus mentioned by Martial (l. 76; cf. l. 61). He died before Quintilian's Institutio (10. l. 90) was published, i.e. before 96.<sup>3</sup> The Argonautica in all probability never comprised more than eight books;<sup>1</sup> the last book is preserved incompletely.<sup>2</sup> The proem was written after the conquest of Jerusalem (70), still under Vespasian (1. 12–18), parts of books 3 (3. 208–209) and 4 (4. 507–511) after the eruption of Mount Vesuvius (79). Since the work was used by Statius, it was published earlier than the Thebaid.

<sup>1</sup> W.-W. EHLERS, Lustrum 16, 1971–1972, 106–108; id., rev. of J. STRAND 1972, Gymnasium 82, 1975, 487; W.-W. EHLERS 1985.

<sup>2</sup> P. BOYANCÉ, La science d'un quindécimvir au 1<sup>er</sup> siècle après J.-C., REL 42, 1964, 334–346.

<sup>3</sup> Despite his noble ancestry he never became a consul; but this is neither proof of an early death of the author nor of a late date of the work; for a different view

Survey of the Work

1: On the request of Jason, who must win the Golden Fleece for Pelias, Minerva has the Argo built, and Juno looks for heroes to accompany Jason. She is angry that her stepson Hercules, too, wants to join the group. Jason is encouraged by an eagle prodigy and persuades Acastus, the son of Pelias, to go with him. Then he builds altars, preys to Neptune and listens to two prophets. During the celebration of the departure Orpheus sings of Phrixus and Helle. In a dream, the ship's guardian spirit comforts Jason, who, in the morning, takes leave from his parents. After the departure of the ship, Sol complains with Jupiter, who, as an answer, gives a prophecy and sends a bolt of lightning to encourage the Argonauts. After a sea storm, soothed by Neptune, Jason prays and brings a sacrifice. In the meantime, Pelias in his rage compels Jason's parents to die.

2: After a voyage through the night the Argo approaches the island of Lemnos. Here the poet inserts a story within the story: the Amazones had killed their husbands, and Hypsipyle had saved her father. The Argonauts meet with a good reception, and Jason stays with Hypsipyle. Hercules, however, reminds them of their duty to continue their expedition; near Troy, he rescues Hesione. During the travel, the spirit of Helle appears and gives a prophecy. The Argonauts land on King Cyzicus' shore.

3: The Argonauts put to sea; during the night, however, they are driven back to Cyzicus, without recognizing the place. After a gory battle in the dark, in the morning they realize what had happened. They mourn and bury the dead and undergo a ritual purification. At the next stop, young Hylas gets lost; unfaithfully, the Argonauts abandon Hercules, while he is in search for Hylas.

4: An appearance of Hylas comforts Hercules, whose next task is to rescue Prometheus. Orpheus sings for the Argonauts. Pollux wins a boxing

---

s. SYME, Tacitus 1. 69 and id. 1929; R. J. GETTY, The Date of Composition of the Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus, CPh 31, 1936, 53–61. Allusions to historical events later than 79 (R. PREISWERK, Zeitgeschichtliches bei Valerius Flaccus, Philologus 89, 1934, 433–442) are uncertain.

<sup>1</sup> W. SCHETTER 1959; J. ADAMIETZ 1976, 107–113 with a discussion of the contrary view.

<sup>2</sup> A different view in E. COURTNEY, ed. p. v (the work was interrupted by the author's death).

match against the ferocious king Amycus. To explain the name of Bosporus, the poet inserts the Io myth. Having arrived in Phineus' country, the sons of Boreas chase the Harpies, and Phineus predicts the future. The Argo passes through the Symplegades and arrives at the Mariandyni. The book is rounded off by a mention of Amycus.

5: Idmon the prophet and Tiphys the helmsman fall ill and die. In Sinope new companions join our heroes. After the Argo's landing in Colchis, Juno and Pallas meet to consider the situation. Jason, who leads a delegation to King Aetes, meets Medea, who has been stirred up by an oppressive dream. Like Homer's Nausicaa she shows him the right way, which he follows, protected by a cloud. The doors of Aetes' palace are adorned with pictures. Aetes puts up a friendly mien and asks Jason to become his ally in the war against Perses. A dialogue of Mars, Jupiter, and Pallas culminates in a prophecy of Jupiter and in a feast of the gods.

6: Mars comes down to earth to destroy the Argonauts. During the battle (which is interspersed with two invocations of the Muses: 333-34 and 516), Juno asks for Venus' help to make Medea fall in love with Jason. Then, Juno appears to Medea in the guise of her sister Chalciope and joins her to observe Jason's exploits from the height of the wall. The poet intertwines the description of the battle and the Medea scenes.

7: While Medea, who has fallen in love with Jason, is deliberating what to do, furious Aetes gives new and more difficult tasks to Jason. Juno sends Venus, who, in the guise of Circe, leads Medea to Jason by force. Thanks to Medea's magic Jason tames the fiery bulls and conquers the earth-born warriors.

8: Medea puts the dragon to sleep; Jason robs the Golden fleece and flees with Medea. Her brother, Absyrtus, catches up with the Argonauts at the mouth of the Danube. Juno raises a sea storm against the Colchi. Jason considers surrendering Medea.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Valerius' most important models have come down to us: Homer, Pindar (Pyth. 4), Apollonius Rhodius, Virgil (including the Georgics), Ovid, and Lucan. Only Varro Atacinus is lost. It is fascinating to observe how Flaccus 'transposes' Apollonius' subject matter into a Virgilian (and partly a Homeric) framework by adding 'divine' scenes, ritual, dreams and prophecies. Instead, he gives up a good deal of Apollonius' erudition, though not without intimating that he has studied even the scholia to Apollonius.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> WILAMOWITZ, commentary on Euripides, Herakles 1, 167-168.

Literary technique

The Argonautica may be called a triumph of 'epic technique'. This is true both of the work as a whole and of its details. Out of four lengthy books of Apollonius Valerius made eight books without increasing the total number of lines. On the one hand he added speeches, scenes of gods and new episodes, on the other he shortened the wearisome scholarly lore in the description of the route. This leads to a shift in the proportions of the whole: while the narrative loses its uniform flow, individual scenes and images come to the fore.<sup>1</sup> Valerius is eager to present his subject in a lively way. Nevertheless, there is a definite structural design.

As Apollonius had done, Valerius in his introduction invokes Phoebus; and like his Roman predecessors (beginning with Virgil in the Georgics) he addresses the emperor. The structure of the work reveals that Flaccus competes with Virgil: the sequence of themes in the 1st book is reminiscent of the 1st book of the Aeneid: there is a sea storm, a prophecy of Jupiter, a prophetic description of a work of art, and a banquet with a song. Correspondingly, Flaccus signposts the beginning of the second half (in book 5) by means of literary devices: there is an invocation of the Muse combined with a flashback and a prospect of things to come (5. 217; Aen. 7. 37; Apoll. 3. 1). Unlike Apollonius but in accordance with Virgil Valerius in the second half of his work describes a war.

As early as in book 1 the paintings on the Argo (1. 130–148) indicate the theme of the last book: a marriage with a murderous epilogue (similarly, in the 1st book of the Aeneid, the images on the doors of the temple foreshadow events of the second half of the work). In book 1 Jason takes with him the son of the tyrant Pelias, in the last book he abducts Aetes' daughter.<sup>2</sup>

Like Dido who before her death had recapitulated her exploits (Aen. 4. 653–656), Medea in the last book of the Argonautica, after giving farewell to the dragon, catalogues all her sins or, rather, the services she rendered Jason: (8. 106–108). All this shows that Valerius boldly uses Vergilian techniques to give structural hints.

As Ovid had done, he often veils the transitions between books; as in Virgil, the announcement of the second half of the work is slightly postponed: actually, it appears in a later passage (5. 217–224), not at the beginning of the relevant book.

<sup>1</sup> F. MEHMEL 1934.

<sup>2</sup> J. ADAMIETZ 1976, 28.

Within a single book, there occur several shifts of perspective: in book 6 this is true of the fighting warriors' 'masculine', and the onlooking Medea's 'feminine' view of the world. A similar technique is observed in parts of books 5 and 7; the 1st book oscillates between a human and a divine plane of action.

Often Valerius separates elements that by nature are linked together (the reader recalls the beginning of book 7, where the action repeatedly shifts from Jason to Medea), and the author wants us to be aware of this. As he does on the level of style, Valerius shows a preference for hyperbaton even in the large scale structure of his work. Each individual part is not meant to be a self-contained entity; its brevity and its incompleteness arouse in the reader an expectation to which the poet will react and which he will fulfill later on. Whoever knows the impressive psychological development of Medea's love as presented by Apollonius, will be disappointed by the brevity of 7. 1–25; yet, what he misses will follow in lines 103–140 after the Aeetes scene. The reader is constrained to keep in mind simultaneously two processes and two emotional attitudes, a plurality of levels of understanding which might be called 'bi-tonality'.

The juxtaposition of contrasting scenes and moods is often bridged dexterously. Thus, Jason's concern or even his ignorance form a transition to the story of his parents' death and, again, back to Jason (1. 696–699; 2. 1–5).

Valerius stresses important themes by means of literary technique: as a rule, there is an invocation of the Muse before battles which, to Valerius, are always realizations of furor.<sup>1</sup>

Imagery conveys coherence of meaning: apart from the above-mentioned paintings on the Argo, the doors of Aeetes' palace deserve mention (5. 408–414): they show pictures from the history of Colchis, but also Phaethon and other ominous hints not yet understandable to the people of Colchis. Nor does Valerius neglect the links between this motif and the immediate context: the descriptions in 1. 130–148 deal with the Argonaut Peleus, those in 2. 409–417 with Hypsipyle.

Similes are especially frequent and sometimes far-fetched to the point of rather obscuring than illuminating their subject. In Apollonius, Jason and Medea face each other like trees, whereas, in Valerius, they become 'walking trees'.<sup>1</sup> Many similes have a psychological function; Bacchic elements and the Furies play a significant role.<sup>2</sup> The closeness of Virgil's Dido to tragedy (Pentheus, Orestes: Aen. 4. 469–473) was a point of departure for this development. No doubt, furor is an important theme in the Argonautica, as is shown by the Io simile (7. 111), which links Medea's love-sickness to the episode of Io (4. 346–421), a story which holds a crucial position in Flaccus' epic. No less relevant to the unity of the Argonautica are the Hercules similes which help to remind the reader of that favorite hero of Valerius, even after he has left the stage.<sup>3</sup> The poet successfully elevates Roman experiences such as the civil war (6. 402–406) or the eruption of Vesuvius (4. 507–509) to the rank of epic similes. In other cases, such as many a celestial scene, for all his subtle reshaping and outdoing his models, Valerius cannot spare his reader the impression that here a passionate perfectionist sometimes exaggerated his efforts, so that the last turn of the screw produced irritation, not tension.

<sup>1</sup> 5. 217–219; cf. 5. 20 furias; 6. 33–35, ibid. furores; 3. 14–16, cf. 19 Erinyes; 3. 212–219, cf. 214 Tisiphonen, 215 rabie.

His forte is the daring, often surprising image. Hence his effect on modern readers is more 'poetic' than that of Lucan or Silius. Actually, he succeeded in describing the first night voyage with the intensity of a first experience (2. 38–47).

Language and Style

Valerius has neither the fiery eloquence of Lucan nor the quiet dryness of Silius nor the fluency of Statius. His language is uneven, now abundantly rich, now condensed to the point of obscurity:<sup>4</sup> mixta perit virtus, 'in the mêlée valor goes for naught' (6. 200; that is: virī fortes mixti aliis pereunt) or: mediam moriens descendit in hastam, 'and dying sinks down to the middle of the shaft' (6. 244; i.e.: corporis pondere usque ad mediam hastam qua perfossus est delabitur). An exception is a clear and trenchant maxim like: nullus adempti/regis amor, 'there is no love for a

<sup>1</sup> A sensitive explanation: W. SCHUBERT, Von Bäumen und Menschen, Arcadia 19, 1984, 225–243.

<sup>2</sup> Dionysiac elements: 3. 260; 5. 80; 6. 755; 7. 301; 8. 446; Ino: 8. 21; Furies: 2. 192; 227; 7. 112; Typhon: 3. 130; 4. 236; 6. 169.

<sup>3</sup> 7. 623; 8. 125.

<sup>4</sup> P. LANGEN, commentary 1896, 5–9.

slain king' (4. 315–316). Hyperbata are typical; a simple example is: fingit placidis fera pectora dictis, 'he shapes the fierceness of his heart into peaceful words' (5. 533). We are not surprised, therefore, to find zeugma and parenthesis (8. 159–160). Our author is especially fond of participles, since their close connection with the main verb permits simultaneous expression of two different actions and emotions.<sup>1</sup>

In exploring subtle psychological shades, Valerius' terse and nervously wavering style paved the way for Tacitus. In the field of metrics as well, there is more variety than might have been expected.<sup>2</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

From the very beginning of his epic, there is a close link between priesthood and authorship for Valerius Flaccus. As a quindecimvir sacris faciundis he is a priest of Apollo, and in this function he invokes his god to support his poetic efforts. As a writer he promises immortality to pious Hypsipyle, not to Medea (2. 242–246). She, who saved the honor of her country shall live as long as Latium, the Lares of Ilion, and the Palatine will last. Poetry guarantees the immortality of pietas, on which the commonwealth is based, and, vice versa, the institutions of the Roman empire ensure the survival of literature. In retrospect, we understand the invocation of the emperor in the 1st book. Since he has opened the seas by continuing the conquest of Britain, he is the guiding-star of the Argonautica. Just as his victories prove the truth of myth, his government safeguards the life of poetry. Valerius' idea of the poet's mission is rooted in the theologia civilis.

Ideas II

We should take seriously the Roman aspects of the Argonautica. Valerius is deeply impressed by painful experiences such as civil wars and an eruption of Mount Vesuvius. He convincingly depicts a despot's hybris, the numb anxiety of his subjects, the pride of those destined to die, the general relief at the death of a tyrant. His experience of contemporary history enabled Valerius to shape the end of Jason's parents as a drama of resistance.

<sup>1</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT, Die Erzählung von Io bei Ovid und Valerius Flaccus, WJA 3, 1977, 139–148.

<sup>2</sup> H. C. R. VELLA, Enjambment: A Bibliography and a Discussion of Common Passages in Apollonius of Rhodes and Valerius Flaccus, in: FS E. COLEIRO, Amsterdam 1987, 152–165; H. C. R. VELLA, Lack of Metrical Variety in Valerius Flaccus' Hexameters?, Helmantica 34, 1982–1983, 23–42.

Despite all darkness Valerius believes that history does have a goal. Jupiter prophesies (1. 542-560) the decline of Asia and the rise of Greece; in their turn, the guilty Greeks would be succeeded by the Romans (2. 573). Rome should become a better Troy. This promise is given in Troy, in connection with Hercules, to whom Valerius dedicates an additional episode (Hesione: 2. 445-578). Generally, our poet assigns a more important role to this hero than his Greek predecessor<sup>1</sup> had done. Moreover, the figure of Hercules has to be considered in a Roman context: already in the Aeneid this hero embodies the ruler of the Roman state. Jason cannot help being measured against Hercules. Jupiter exhorts his sons—Hercules, Castor, and Pollux—to strive for the stars (1. 563). There is a recompense waiting for the heroes in the Elysian fields (1. 835-851). Gloria is an important cue (Valerius emphasizes it by using apostrophe).

Jason, the leader of the Argonauts, has more authority than he had in Apollonius. To convince his Roman readers of Jason's heroism—virtus—Flaccus introduces the war against Perses. As later in Tacitus, conquests are presented as materia virtutis. Religio is much more prominent than in Apollonius. More often than we would expect, Jason is presented offering sacrifices, praying, and listening to prophecies or revelations; like Aeneas and Pindar's Jason he is under divine guidance, and in this respect he even gives proof of a scrupulous conscience. Hence, the Argonautica is intended to be a 'sacred poem' in the wake of the Aeneid. Jason's fallibility in the field of ethics does not contradict this, it gives the hero a human touch and even facilitates the reader's response. In fact, Jason cannot be perfection incarnate, since he is neither a son of gods nor a Roman.

After the otium of Saturn's era had ended (1. 500), the expedition of the Argonauts opened a new period of history which initially looked more promising than Catullus' dark panorama in his epyllion on Peleus. Human activity is now welcomed by the gods (1. 498-502). The Argonauts and Hercules are the fulfillers of the will of the gods, as the liberation of Hesione, Phineus, and Prometheus shows. More than the Greeks, the Romans regarded the Argo as the first ship; hence, the opening of the seas (l. 246–247)<sup>1</sup> is a leading theme for Valerius in which he is much more interested than in the golden fleece of the old myth.

<sup>1</sup> J. ADAMIETZ, Iason und Hercules in den Epen des Apollonios Rhodios und Valerius Flaccus, A&A 16, 1970, 29-38.

Historical progress, triumph over barbarism, fulfillment of the will of the gods: these themes are matched by a contrary motif: more than Apollonius, Valerius emphasises the limits of human freedom, a man's addiction to passion, the tragic chain of action and suffering. Tragedy, which will dominate the second half of the work, is announced in the first half: in the episode of Cyzicus the Argonauts unwittingly become the executors of a ghastly divine punishment. This story embodies the experience of 'man's powerlessness and divine vengeance'.<sup>2</sup> Venus-Circe violently compels Medea to help Jason; despite all her magic, this mortal woman is only a puppet in the hands of the goddess—a view which almost amounts to a plea for her innocence. The Argonautica has been called 'a perfect example of fata furorum'.<sup>3</sup> In the second half, Jason's character exhibits serious flaws, though his treason of Medea might be varnished over as a sacrifice of private interests on the altar of the community. Valerius does not conceal that Jason proved his virtus in a fraternal strife and in book 6 he actually alludes to the civil wars. The second half of the work increasingly comes under the spell of Lucan's epic and Seneca's tragedies. The repeated admonitory references to Hercules show that Jason, who—unjustly—abandoned him, turns out to represent a tragic Greek deviation from the mainstream of history, which for Valerius leads from Hercules to Troy and, finally, to Rome. This does not impair Jason's achievement, the opening of the seas, a leading theme of Valerius' epic.

Over Olympus Jupiter dominates together with Jason's tutelary goddesses, Juno and Pallas.<sup>4</sup> The party of his enemies has no permanent, only momentary representatives (Sol, Mars, the gods of the sea). Jupiter is much more than a mere instrument of fata, he removes whatever obstacle might hinder the course of events. He often assumes the rewarding role of reestablishing order and reinstating persons into

<sup>1</sup> J. ADAMIETZ 1976, 21, n. 52; cf. Eratosth. Catast. 35.

<sup>2</sup> E. BURCK 1969, esp. 197.

<sup>3</sup> E. LÜTHJE 1972, 375.

<sup>4</sup> Pallas and Juno both assist at the preparation of the expedition, the passage through the Symplegades, and the arrival in Colchis.

their rights.<sup>1</sup> His justice is almost never called in question (5. 627); he is devoid of burlesque features. One might call him the ideal of a god (almost of theologia naturalis) or of a ruler,<sup>2</sup> certainly he is a great educator of mankind.

Valerius takes a 'Roman' approach to his subject matter. What was the message of that hackneyed myth to the Romans of his day? The following categories are telling: active heroism, a striving for glory, a sense of power and terror, an independent spirit courageously facing death; on the other hand, there is religio and an awareness of being part of a universal empire. For an earlier generation Virgil had defined what he felt to be the position of the Roman empire in space and time. Valerius tried to interpret the myth of the Argonauts as a prelude to Roman history, as a piece of an 'Old Testament' foreshadowing Greco-Roman culture. Thus he was led to measure the myth of the Argonauts against the Aeneid. What is important is not 'imitation' as such but the act of referring a mythical subject matter to the Roman empire and creating a new continuity in both space and time. As if in a 'stage on the stage', the Argonauts are viewed as a link in a development leading to Rome. Rather than a mere arsenal of epic technique, the Aeneid in the hands of Valerius became an instrument of integrating Greek myth into a contemporary and Roman view of history.

Transmission<sup>3</sup>

Only one manuscript of the Argonautica reached the Middle Ages; at the beginning of the 9th century it was copied ( $\alpha$ ). This (lost) copy was the ancestor of the (rather complete) Vaticanus Latinus 3277 (V; written in Fulda about 830–850) and the lost Sangallensis (S; 9th–10th century). In 1416 Poggio and his friends discovered this manuscript which now must be reconstructed from copies; it contained l. 1–4, 317 with omissions. The Laurentianus plut. 39, 38 (L; written in 1429 by Nicolaus Niccoli) represents a class independent of  $\alpha$ ; it is the source of all complete later manuscripts. The additional lines found in this tradition are, therefore, genuine.

<sup>1</sup> 2. 356–357; 3. 249–253; 4. 1–37; 385; 391; 414–415.

<sup>2</sup> W. SCHUBERT 1984, 260–261; 295.

<sup>3</sup> G. CAMBIER, Un manuscrit inconnu des Argonautiques de Valérius Flaccus, Latomus 29, 1970, 913–918; F. T. COULSON, New Evidence for the Circulation of the Text of Valerius Flaccus?, CPh 81, 1986, 58–60.

Influence

In classical antiquity Quintilian was the only one to mention Valerius Flaccus. He was used, however, by Statius, Silius, Terentianus Maurus, Claudian, Dracontius, Marius Victor.<sup>1</sup> In the Middle Ages Valerius was quoted in florilegia. Among his readers in the 13th and 14th century were Joseph Iscanus,<sup>2</sup> Lovati, Mussato,<sup>3</sup> and, perhaps, Chaucer.<sup>4</sup> Later on, Pius Bononiensis<sup>5</sup> wrote a Latin supplement modeled on Apollonius. J. C. Scaliger found in Flaccus talent, taste, diligence, and artistic judgment, but he missed subtlety and grace.<sup>6</sup> Burmann used Flaccus to justify the reading of poets by future statesmen.<sup>7</sup> The fact that Valerius met with little favor among his contemporaries inspired the great Wilamowitz to a dry comment: 'justly'.<sup>8</sup>

Editions: Bononiae 1474. * E. C. F. WUNDERLICH (Tr), Erfurt 1805. * P. LANGEN (TC), 2 vols., Berlin 1896–1897, repr. 1964. * J. H. MOZLEY (TTr), Cambridge, Mass. 1934, repr. 1963. * E. COURTNEY, Lipsiae 1970. * W.-W. EHLERS, Stutgardiae 1980. * H. RUPPRECHT (TTr), Mitterfels 1987. * M. KORN (C on 4. 1–343), Hildesheim 1989. * Book 2: H. M. POORTVLIET (C), Amsterdam 1991. * Book 7: H. STADLER (C), Hildesheim 1993. ** Ind.: W. H. SCHULTE, Index verborum Valerianus, diss. Columbia College, Dubuque, Iowa 1931, Scottdale 1935, repr. 1965. * M. WACHT, Lemmatischer Index zu Valerius Flaccus mit statistischen Anhängen zu Sprache und Metrik, Regensburg 1982. * M. KORN, W. A. SLABY, Concordantia in Valerii Flacci Argonautica, Hildesheim 1988. ** Bibl.: W.-W. EHLERS, Valerius Flaccus 1940–1971, Lustrum 16, 1971–1972, 105–142; 306–308. * M. SCAFFAI, Rassegna di studi su Valerio Flacco (1938–1982), ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2359–2447.

J. ADAMIETZ, Zur Komposition der Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus, München 1976. * W. R. BARNES, The Trojan War in Valerius Flaccus' Argonautica, Hermes 109, 1981, 360–370. * M. BILLERBECK, Stoizismus in der römischen Epik neronischer und flavischer Zeit, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986,

<sup>1</sup> C. SCHENKL, Studien zu den Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus, SAWW 68, 1871, 271–382, esp. 303.

<sup>2</sup> W.-W. EHLERS, Lustrum 16, 1971–1972, 140.

<sup>3</sup> G. BILLANOVICH, Veterum vestigia vatum nei carmi dei préumanisti Padovani, IMU 1, 1958, 178–179.

<sup>4</sup> HIGHET, Class. Trad. 101; 593, n. 70; E. F. SHANNON, Chaucer and the Roman Poets, Cambridge, Mass. 1927, esp. 340–355.

<sup>5</sup> Accessible in P. BURMANN's edition of Valerius Flaccus, Leiden 1724, 684–721.

<sup>6</sup> Poetices libri septem, Lyon 1561, 323. Other verdicts of Renaissance and Baroque authors in BURMANN ibid. before p. 1 (fasc. 18, 3–9).

<sup>7</sup> Introductory poem to his edition.

<sup>8</sup> Hellenistische Dichtung 2, 165, 2.

- 3116–3151. * E. BURCK, Die Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus, in: E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979, 208–253. * E. BURCK, Kampf und Tod des Cyzicus bei Valerius Flaccus, REL 47<sup>bis</sup>, 1969, 173–198. * E. BURCK, Die Befreiung der Andromeda bei Ovid und der Hesione bei Valerius Flaccus (Met. 4. 663–764; Argon. 2. 451–578), WS 89, 1976, 221–238. * S. CONTINO, Lingua e stile in Valerio Flacco, Bologna 1973. * W.-W. EHLERS, Untersuchungen zur handschriftlichen Überlieferung der Argonautica des C. Valerius Flaccus, München 1970. * W.-W. EHLERS, Valerius-Probleme, MH 42, 1985, 334–350. * J. G. FITCH, Aspects of Valerius Flaccus' Use of Similes, TAPhA 106, 1976, 113–124. * R. W. GARSON, Valerius Flaccus the Poet, CQ 20, 1970, 181–187. * U. GÄRTNER, Gehalt und Funktion der Gleichnisse bei Valerius Flaccus, Stuttgart 1994. * K. W. D. HULL, The Hero-Concept in Valerius Flaccus' Argonautica, in: C. DEROUX, ed., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, vol. 1, Bruxelles 1979, 379–409. * G. JACHMANN, Properz und Valerius Flaccus, RhM 84, 1935, 228–240. * H. JUHNKE, s. Roman Epic. * A. J. KLEYWEGT, Die Dichtersprache des Valerius Flaccus, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2448–2490. * M. KORN, H. J. TSCHIEDEL, eds., Ratis omnia vincet. Untersuchungen zu den Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus, Hildesheim 1991. * H.-O. KRÖNER, Zu den künstlerischen Absichten des Valerius Flaccus, Hermes 96, 1968, 733–754. * E. LEFÈVRE, Das Prooemium der Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus. Ein Beitrag zur Typik epischer Prooemien der römischen Kaiserzeit, AAWM 1971, 6. * E. LÜTHJE, Gehalt und Aufbau der Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus, diss. Kiel 1972. * F. MEHMEL, Valerius Flaccus, diss. Hamburg 1934. * O. PEDERZANI, Curiositas e classicismo nelle Argonautiche di Valerio Flacco, MD 18, 1987, 101–129. * A. PERUTELLI, Pluralità di modelli e discontinuità narrativa. L'episodio della morte di Esona in Valerio Flacco (l. 747 sgg.), MD 7, 1982, 123–140. * P. SCHENK, Die Zurücklassung des Herakles. Ein Beispiel der epischen Kunst des Valerius Flaccus (Arg. 3. 598–725), AAWM 1986, 1. * W. SCHETTER, Die Buchzahl der Argonautica des Valerius Flaccus, Philologus 103, 1959, 297–308. * W. SCHUBERT, Jupiter in den Epen der Flavierzeit, Frankfurt 1984. * J. STRAND, Notes on Valerius Flaccus' Argonautica, Göteborg 1972. * J. STROUX, Valerius Flaccus und Horaz, Philologus 90, 1935, 305–330. * R. SYME, The Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus, CQ 23, 1929, 129–137. * A. TRAGLIA, Valerio Flacco, Apollonio Rodio e Virgilio. Gli episodi di Hylas e di Giasone e Medea, Vichiana 12, 1983, 304–325. * V. USSANI JR., Studio su Valerio Flacco, Roma 1955. * P. VENINI, Valerio Flacco e l'epiduzione Apolloniana: note stilistiche, RIL 105, 1971, 582–596. * P. VENINI, Sulla struttura delle Argonautiche di Valerio Flacco, ibid. 597–620. * P. VENINI, Su alcuni motivi delle Argonautiche di Valerio Flacco, BStudLat 2, 1972, 10–19. * D. W. T. VESSEY, Lemnos Revisited. Some Aspects of Valerius Flaccus, Argonautica, 2, 77–305, CJ 80, 1985, 326–339. * M. WACHT, Jupiters Weltenplan im Epos des Valerius Flaccus, Stuttgart 1991.

STATIUS

Life and Dates

P. Papinius Statius was born in Naples,<sup>1</sup> supposedly about A.D. 40 or 50. His father (d. about 80) was a Roman knight (silv. 5. 3. 116) from Velia and a teacher of Greek literature. He wrote epic verse on the civil war of 69 in honor of the Flavian dynasty (silv. 5. 3. 203–204). Thanks to his father, Statius was imbued with Greek culture at an early date and was introduced at court.

In his father's lifetime he carried off the prize at the Augustalia; later (probably in 90) he won the contest of Alba with a panegyric on Domitian's victories over Germans and Dacians (silv. 4. 2. 66). He lived in Rome and was happily married with Claudia, the widow of a singer. She accompanied him through the twelve-years' work on the Thebaid (about 80–92); by public readings, Statius earned great renown but no riches (Juv. 7. 82). He was compelled, therefore, to write a libretto for the Agave of the pantomime Paris.<sup>2</sup> However, he was not a 'poor poet'. He frequented largely the same patrons as did Martial (who occasionally makes disparaging remarks on epic poems in 12 books: 9. 50; 14. 1. 11). His Maecenases were the poet Arruntius Stella, Atedius Melior, Lucan's widow Polla Argentaria, and, of course, the emperor, to whom he gives his thanks for having secured a water supply for his Albanum (silv. 3. 1. 61–62). Statius participated unsuccessfully in the Ludi Capitolini (probably in 94).<sup>3</sup> After this (in 95) he retired to Naples for reasons of health (silv. 4, praef.). We do not know if he returned to Rome later. He did not live to see Domitian's death (96).

The 1st book of the Silvae was written after 89, Domitian's victory over the Dacians (1. 1. 27; 1. 2. 180). In the 2nd book, the funeral poem on Glaucias (2. 1) dates from 90 (Mart. 6. 28–29). In book 3 the war against the Sarmatians is over and Domitian has renounced a triumph (in 93; cf. 3. 3. 171). The 1st poem of the 4th book celebrates the emperor's seventeenth consulate (in 95); the Via Domitiana was opened in the same year (4. 3). In all probability, book 5 was published after the poet's death.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Stat. silv. 1. 2. 260; 3. 5. 12; 106 etc.

<sup>2</sup> Before 83, when Paris was executed. Other lost works: Epistola ad Maximum Vibium (cf. silv. 4, praef.). The existence of an opusculum for Plotius Grypus (ibid.) is open to question.

<sup>3</sup> Stat. silv. 3. 5. 31; 4. 2. 67; 5. 3. 225.

The Achilleid was the unfinished work of the poet's last years. He mentions it in the later books of the Silvae.<sup>2</sup>

Survey of Works

Thebaid

1: Polynices wanders through a stormy night and meets Tydeus in Argos at the court of Adrastus. A quarrel is followed by a reconciliation and a banquet.

2: Laius' ghost exhorts Eteocles, who resides in Thebes, to break the agreement with his brother and not surrender the crown to him. In Argos Adrastus marries his daughters to Polynices and Tydeus. The latter comes as a messenger to Eteocles, but is turned away. On the way back he overcomes the murderers that have been sent to kill him.

3: The only survivor returns to Eteocles, breaks the news and commits suicide. While the Thebans are mourning, Jupiter sends Mars to the country of Argos, but Venus tries to stop the god of war. Tydeus returns to Argos. Despite the warnings of the prophet Amphiaraus, the godless Capaneus and Polynices' wife push Adrastus to begin the war.

4: Catalogue of the 'Seven against Thebes'. Conjured up by Tiresias, the dead Laius prophesies the victory of Thebes and a double murder. Bacchus punishes the people of Argos with water shortage, and Hypsipyle leads them to the source of Langia.

5: While Hypsipyle tells the story of her life up to her imprisonment by Lycurgus, the latter's child she had taken charge of is killed by a serpent.

6: In honor of this boy, Archemorus, the Nemean Games take place for the first time.

7: As in the Aeneid, the war begins in the 7th book. At the end of the book the seer Amphiaraus is swallowed up by the earth.

8: In either camp, this event is commented on. Ismene's bridegroom Atys falls. Tydeus is killed as well.

9: During the battle, the enemies get hold of Tydeus' corpse. Hippomedon fights in the river and dies. Young Parthenopaeus is killed.

10: After a 'notturmo' (reminiscent of the 10th book of the Iliad and the <sup>1</sup> In book 5 the funeral poem for Statius' father (5. 3) is the earliest piece; Statius wrote it 3 months after his father's death and later added lines 225-233 without eliminating the contradiction caused by the portrait of himself as a timid beginner (237-238).

<sup>2</sup> 4. 4. 93; 7. 23; 5. 5. 36; cf. 5. 2. 163.

9th of the Aeneid) Creo's son Menoeceus sacrifices his life for Thebes. Capaneus is struck by lightning.

11: Despite the warnings of Iocaste and Antigone, the brothers face the fatal duel. Their mother commits suicide. Creo prohibits the burial of enemies.

12: Having walked all night (cf. book 1), Argia and Antigone encounter each other at Polynices' corpse. The women of Argus ask Theseus for help; he kills Creo in a fight and enforces the burial.

Achilleid

Thetis wants to prevent her son Achilles from participating in the Trojan war; so she abducts him from his tutor, Chiron, disguises him as a girl and hides him among the daughters of King Lycomedes on the island of Scyros. Achilles falls in love with the princess Deidamia; their son is Neoptolemus. Diomedes and Ulixes discover Achilles, and he follows them into the war.

Silvae

These are 32 'occasional poems' in 5 books, written for the most part in hexameters.<sup>1</sup> A dedicatory letter in prose<sup>2</sup> is placed in front of each book. Books 1–4 are addressed to Stella the poet, Atedius Melior, Pollius, and Marcellus. Especially in books 1 and 4 the emperor is much in evidence.<sup>3</sup>

Sources, Models, and Genres

The Thebaid's subject matter is a part of the great tradition of Greek tragedy and epic. Unfortunately too little is known of the Greek epic poet Antimachus, from whom Statius, as far as we can judge, differs in several instances. The cyclic Thebaid and other epic poems are no more than names for us; under Augustus, a Ponticus had written a Thebaid. Hellenistic poetry had been included in the teaching program of Statius' father: for our poet, Callimachus was not a remote author. Again and again Statius interspersed his work with Hellenistic elements, thus creating charming contrasts<sup>4</sup> to the sublime pathos of epic.

Moreover, we have to take into account the influence of mythographers and scholarly books (commentaries on Euripides); since Statius

<sup>1</sup> Exceptions: hendecasyllabi 2. 7; 4. 3; 4. 9; Sapphic strophes 4. 7; Alcaic strophes 4. 5.

<sup>2</sup> In book 5, which in all probability was published posthumously, the letter only refers to the 1st poem.

<sup>3</sup> S. T. NEWMYER 1979.

<sup>4</sup> C. REITZ, Hellenistische Züge in Statius' Thebais, WJA n.s. 11, 1985, 129–134.

had a painter's eye, we should not neglect either the traditions of fine arts. The poet, who had enjoyed a completely bilingual education, had at his disposal all the treasures of the past. Like Virgil, he must have devoted himself to preliminary studies for a long time. Therefore we should reject the theory of a 'single source'. Likewise, the Achilleid draws on mythographic traditions; Euripides' Skyrioi<sup>1</sup> also probably influenced him.

Virgil and Homer are the main models of his epic poems. As in the Aeneid, the war begins in the second half of the work, that is with book 7. The games, however, are found in book 6, not 5, and the Nekyia in book 4, not book 6. A mechanical transposition of structures is out of the question. Direct influence of Homer is traceable in scenes omitted or treated perfunctorily by Virgil, such as the 'battle in the river' (book 9) and even in passages fully handled by Virgil. Unlike Virgil, who had placed his nocturno in book 9, Statius follows Homer in locating it in book 10. The ultimate duel—in contrast to Virgil—does not figure in the last book; instead, the action is allowed to subside quietly: as in the Iliad, the last book becomes a triumph of humanity and clemency.

Ovid makes himself felt as a model everywhere, especially in the Achilleid; Valerius Flaccus is present in the Hypsipyle story; Lucan and Seneca lurk behind many a ghastly and eerie scene of the Thebaid. Yet, far from Lucan's revolutionary aspirations, Statius clings to the traditions of the genre; he even savors the possibilities offered by it—up to the humanization of gods. For Statius this form of epic is a way of putting poetic ideas into reality.

Conversely in the Silvae he was attracted to the task of putting reality into poetry. The source of these 'occasional poems'<sup>2</sup> is real life in Statius' time. We come to know a great deal about houses, monuments, streets, baths, life and death, love and friendship of the people who lived then. Nevertheless the formal patterns for these poetic impromptus bear the stamp of literary traditions: we find rhetorical encomia in poetic eulogies, epideictic oratory in poems of congratulation, epic (and rhetorical) ecphrasis in descriptions, consolatio in funeral poems. There are reminiscences of Catullus in the hendecasyllabi and epicedia for animals; Horatian elements in the rare lyrics, sacred language in votive poems giving thanks for rescue or recovery. Epigram and elegy are omnipresent. Statius enjoys introducing a myth by playfully evoking the style of archaic lyric; then, surprisingly, he chooses Ovid's Metamorphoses for his model; this is the genesis (aition) of Atedius Melior's tree (2. 3). Another aition explains how on the estate of Pollius Felix a temple of Hercules was erected in no time (3. 1). Epithalamia and epicedia have long traditions of their own, in which a poetic and a rhetorical strand may be discerned. Both merge in Statius. Again and again there are new combinations of literary genres: Statius enriches an epithalamium with elegiac elements (1. 2), and there is a propempticon addressed to a lock of hair (3. 4). Epic techniques and characters are transposed into every day life. For Statius generic traditions are a source of inspiration, not a chain. The same is true of rhetoric. Statius coins many new types of poems by elevating small forms to epic grandeur: soterion, propempticon, genethliacon, eucharisticon. It is equally possible to describe the Silvae as independent developments of elements, which before had been parts of other works: the praise of the emperor, hitherto a part of the epic proem, in 4.1 appears as a separate poem, to our knowledge,<sup>1</sup> for the first time. Statius' descriptive poems can be viewed as detached developments of epphrasis. The poem addressed to the god of sleep felicitously isolates a theme which since Homer had been firmly rooted in the epic tradition: 'the lonely vigil.'<sup>2</sup> If elements hitherto incorporated into epic as digressions or integral components gained a life of their own through Statius, this was a corollary from a general preference of that age for poetic 'purple patches' (now raised to 'purple pieces'), and also from Lucan's introduction of quasi-lyrical discourse into epic.

<sup>1</sup> A. KÖRTE, Euripides' Skyrier, Hermes 69, 1934, 8.

<sup>2</sup> Lucan's Silvae are lost; we do not know anything about form or content of this work. Nor is there any other comparable collection.

Literary Technique

Epic 'poems. Statius' epic poems are less fraught with material than are the works of Valerius Flaccus and Silius. Hence, each individual episode can be worked out at ease. Though Statius (like Valerius Flaccus) arranges his text by scenes and pictures and though his narrative perspective successively shifts from one party to another, the flow of his text is never abrupt nor 'chopped', each melody is allowed to fade away quietly. The poet knows how to put the story before the reader's eyes, a talent he shares with Ovid and Claudian. Moreover he is able to convey to the reader his large-scale design by means of parallel and contrast.

<sup>1</sup> Of course, we have to take into account the great number of lost texts. Ovid's praise of Augustus written in the Getic language was, in all probability, a poem on its own.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. D. LEEMAN, The Lonely Vigil. A 'Topos' in Ancient and Modern Literature, in: LEEMAN, Form 213-230.

There are correspondences of meaning between the two halves of the Thebaid: in books 5 and 6 Hypsipyle became guilty of the death of a boy, who had been in her charge—ironically the accident happened while she was telling the story of her own pious behavior. The disaster was atoned for by the Nemean games. The last two books exhibit a similar sequence of guilt and atonement. In retrospect the episode of Hypsipyle turns out to have foreshadowed events to come.

Tydeus is tellingly introduced through a boar's simile (1. 488–490); in book 2 he gives proof of heroism by conquering the murderers; this tour de force can only be outdone by cruelty in the wake of Lucan (book 8); again the parallel between the two halves of the work (books 2 and 8) and the gradation are part of the author's design.

The deaths of heroes are arranged to form a climax: Amphiarus is swallowed by the earth (book 7), Hippomedon is overwhelmed by water (book 9), Menoeceus falls through the air, Capaneus is consumed by heavenly fire (book 10). In between there are events of extreme harshness or tenderness: here the unhuman cruelty of Tydeus (book 8), there the piety of dying Parthenopaeus (end of book 9). There are frequent changes from touching to horrific; Statius strives to give his books impressive finales; on the other hand it is typical of his art that dramatic endings find a tranquil epilogue at the beginning of the following book. Thus the duel of book 11 is succeeded by the more contemplative last book.

The dark apparitions of Oedipus and Laius form a solid framework. Oedipus with his curse is indeed the perfect prologue-speaker for a tragedy of fratricide (1. 46–87); in fact, his curse is the first mover of the entire action. In the second place Laius, urged by Jupiter, induces Eteocles to insist unjustly on his right to the throne (1. 295–302; 2. 1–133, esp. 122). Before the end of the first third of the Thebaid Laius is conjured up from the netherworld to predict the future (4. 604–645). It is with the sword of Laius that Jocaste will kill herself (11. 636). Oedipus, too, will have his come-back and belatedly renounce his hatred and his curse (11. 605–606 pietas, clementia) transferring onto Creon the abomination linked to Laius (11. 701–705); thus he prepares Theseus' final revenge and the end of the disaster. Hence the Thebaid has an inner structure of its own, and mere imitation of models cannot be the real reason for introducing scenes.

Characters are mutually complementary; what is more, each character by itself is multi-faceted and sometimes even subject to change. Adrastus,<sup>1</sup> a kind father-in-law, finds his match in the harsh father, Oedipus, who, however, in the end draws a lesson from his sufferings. The two inimical brothers, Eteocles and Polynices, form a contrast with the two friends, Polynices and Tydeus. Polynices himself is not indifferent to Antigone's supplication. For all her pride Antigone, in order to protect her father against Creon, unexpectedly turns out to be gentle and conciliatory. Thus Statius makes his characters more credible for his readers by lending them humane features. Where this is not the case, as with the tyrant Creon (e.g. 11, 61), a positive character is introduced as a counterpart: Theseus.

Statius is rather extravagant with personnel and costume: in order to induce Eteocles to insist on his kingship, Mercury, on Jove's behest, sends Laius, who in his turn takes the shape of the seer Tiresias. This is reminiscent of the puzzling metamorphoses of gods in Valerius Flaccus. Statius extends his care even to the portrayal of secondary characters: an example is the bringer of bad tidings, who in presence of the tyrant takes his own life (3. 59–60).

Many ingenious similes are drawn from daily life, many from myth. To characterize Deidamia, Statius evokes no fewer than three goddesses: Venus, Diana, and Minerva (Ach. 1. 293–300). But to count self-complacently 16 bull-similes and 13 lion-similes—is to miss the subtlety of Statius' art. He shows his mastery especially in mirroring consistently in his imagery the inimical brothers and the two friends (Polynices—Tydeus).<sup>2</sup>

Along with the gods, to whom we shall come back in the context of Statius' ideas, allegories play an important role. In the tradition of Virgil's Fama (Aen. 4. 173–188) and Ovid's 'House of Sleep' (met. 11. 592–615) we find in Statius significant allegories (Pietas, Clementia, and numerous smaller personifications) and allegorical descriptions of places (House of Mars 7. 40–63). The dispute between Pietas and the Fury Tisiphone (11. 457–496) paved the way for Prudentius' Psychomachia, and the personification of Pietas would successfully replace Venus in Christian authors (Corippus, Iust. 1. 33–65).

<sup>1</sup> He is reminiscent (1. 557) of Virgil's Euander.

<sup>2</sup> H.-A. LUPOLD 1970.

Silvae. The literary technique of the Silvae betrays the influence of rhetorical training and would be unthinkable without it. However, rhetoric cannot explain the quality of the poems. In the introductions to his books Statius justifies his publishing such ephemeral products of his Muse. He seems to be one of the first poets to do this on a large scale. There had always been occasional poems, but rarely had anyone made a point of preserving them. Statius raises certain types of private occasional poems to the rank of literature.

The four books published by the poet exhibit a circular structure: two books concerned with Domitian frame two personal books. This large-scale framework is echoed on a smaller scale in the structure of single poems. The arrangement of poems within the books as well as the structure of individual poems is more harmonious and balanced than one would expect in a so-called 'mannerist'.

Through exercise Statius' art has become second nature; therefore it is often taken for granted and underrated. Whoever tries to believe in Statius' 'speedy production'—at least of some of the Silvae—might resort to comparing him with a Chinese painter, who, after having trained his eye and his hand for years, in a few minutes, apparently without effort, commits to paper a picture which is perfect in every detail. It goes without saying that Statius nevertheless filed and corrected his poems before publication—but it would have been bad taste to mention it. Anyhow, this collection was a sensational novelty on the market. And it remains a challenge.

Language and Style

Statius' language is elegant and sophisticated: a typical example is retexere ('unweave') for the 'unveiling' of the sky.<sup>1</sup> Following a Virgilian tradition, Statius omits the copula and is cautious in his use of archaism; he is by no means a forerunner of the archaists. His linguistic resourcefulness can compete with Ovid's; but he does not share the latter's inclination to quote his own lines.

<sup>1</sup> W. SCHEFFER, Statius, Thebais 5, 296, RhM 122, 1979, 344–347; bibl. on language and style in: H. CANKIĆ 1986, 2686–2689; H.-J. VAN DAM 1986, 2733–2735; cf. also S. VON MOISY 1971; A. HARDIE 1983; D. W. T. VESSEY 1986 I and II.

In both groups of his works his style would not be possible without his mastery of epideictic rhetoric, which, far from oppressing his poetic talent, lent wings to it. In epic his narrative style aims at emotional reponse; he wants those attending his recitals to follow his poetic discourse with empathy. To this end he uses apostrophes and short reflections; moreover, he enlivens inanimate objects through affective epithets (Theb. 9. 94 miseræ . . . carinae). The preference for the historical present as a narrative tense, however, is not Statius' invention; it is one of the stock elements of Latin epic. Statius' maxims are less artificial than Lucan's; they do not stick out from their context but seem to arise spontaneously: quid numina contra/tendere fas homini?, 'what power has man against the gods?' (Theb. 6. 92–93). Clementia mentes habitare et pectora gaudet, 'to dwell in hearts and minds delights Clemency' (12. 494). His versification is dexterous and fluent.<sup>1</sup>

In the Silvae so-called 'un-poetic' words and constructions redolent of prose may bridge the distance between author and reader and make the reader feel as if he were the confidant of the 'improvising' poet. On the other hand, Statius' lyrics benefit from the 'Pindaric way' as well; hence we should not overvalue the differences of style between Statius' lyric and epic production.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The epilogue of the Thebaid pays homage to Virgil with an humility liable to make modern readers believe that Statius' epic is only an imitation of the Aeneid. Conforming to Roman habits, our poet stresses what is 'traditional' in his Thebaid, although it is innovative indeed. More boldly in his 10th book he expressly challenges Virgil's Nisus and Euryalus when immortalizing two friends through his poetry (10. 448). There are more passages showing that Statius is aware of his originality as an epic poet.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> The shortening of final -o in verb forms of the first person deserves mention; on metrics: O. MÜLLER, Quaestiones Statianae, Progr. Berlin 1861; J. A. RICHMOND, Zur Elision anapästischer Wörter bei Vergil und Statius, Glotta 50, 1972, 97–120; for further information s. the bibliographical surveys: H. CANKIK 1986, esp. 2689–2697; H.-J. VAN DAM 1986, 2733–2735.

<sup>2</sup> Stat. silv. 3. 5; 4. 3; 4. 4; 5. 3; 5. 5.

In the Silvae the very title ('miscellaneous material') is an understatement. His prose introductions<sup>1</sup> to the books of the Silvae were no less detrimental to his reputation: was the alleged speed of production (a stock motif in occasional poems) meant as an excuse for possible flaws or should it rather serve as a background throwing into relief the actual perfection of the poems? In any case Statius' aesthetics, no matter if we call it 'mannerist' or simply 'Roman', exhibits a preference for what is huge and brilliant. Last but not least, it is firmly rooted in a solid knowledge of rhetoric and its terminology.

Ideas II

To Roman readers the theme of 'fratricidal war' had been of current interest since Romulus. Lucan had shaped it into an historical epic, and Valerius Flaccus—without being constrained to do so by tradition—had introduced it into his Argonautica as a broad episode. Whoever had lived the 'year of four emperors' knew that the empire's self-destruction was a burning contemporary problem, and under Domitian 'hate between brothers' was even a dangerous theme. The stress laid on clementia<sup>2</sup> and the mention of reges (e.g. 11. 579) remind us of 'handbooks for princes'.

The much-discussed homages to the emperor were a matter of mere formality; more interesting is the idea of kingship as developed in the Thebaid. While Eteocles (3. 82) and Creon (11. 661) are typical tyrants, Oedipus develops from cruelty to clemency (11. 605–606). Adrastus is a gracious king, and Theseus embodies an ideal. Jupiter, being a projection of earthly rulers, shows human weaknesses and is not always consistent in his actions. He wants the war to come, but the prodigies he sends are so terrible that they could have deterred men from making war—if mankind were not as irrational as the lord of gods himself. Despite his preference for war he exhibits no personal cruelty. The blasphemer Capaneus has provoked him to the point where he cannot but throw his thunderbolt at him. Yet he does so without relish: should he really, after so many giants, condescend to smash this pygmy (10. 910)? Gods have to encourage him; thunder, rain and clouds have to anticipate his orders, until he finally decides to act.

<sup>1</sup> Introductory prose letters to books of poetry seem to appear for the first time here and in Martial; later on e.g. in Ausonius and Sidonius.

<sup>2</sup> 11. 606; 12. 175; 481–505.

For Statius this anthropomorphic god of myth—'poetic theology'—is the guarantor of retaliation; it is through him that Oedipus' curse comes true. In this function he advocates war—in accordance with the gods of the underworld, who without needing his orders enact the same curse on their own. Once this goal has been achieved, the cosmic gods have done their duty. Hence it is no chance, but quite logical, that in the last book of the Thebaid Jupiter is less prominent. The new powers are called Pietas and Clementia; they are not parts of myth or nature but dwell within man and have to be practised by man. This is why Theseus, despite the objections raised against this character, is indispensable: it is he who gets these values adopted. Moral acts, which can only be done by human beings, break the chain of fatum. Creon has to be compelled to behave humanely (in hominem 12. 166). The dead, as human beings (repeated 12. 155–156), have a right to be buried. Here we are entitled to speak of 'human rights'. Unlike the Argonautica, which are dominated by divine power and caprice, the Thebaid treats of a disaster caused by a man and of the reinstalment of humanity, again through a man. This explains also why the story of Hypsipyle's pietas is given so much space in the books preceding the center. Her double position between merit and guilt anticipates the problem of the entire work; only against this background can the reader fully understand the meaning of the war. World order is not to be taken for granted but it has to be established by man; it is a task, not a gift.

We mentioned that each hero had to struggle with a different element; this suggests the idea of an analogy between destruction in the human world and in nature. This use of imagery is even more revealing: Tydeus, the 'boar', a grim fighter, is finally unmasked as inhuman; Polynices and Eteocles, often compared with lions or bulls, in the last battle become swine (11. 530–536). No other image could better illustrate their downfall.

Conversely, the 'savior' Tydeus is enhanced by similes drawn from the world of Dionysus (12. 787–788; 791–793). This is not a far-fetched idea in the city of Bacchus who, in fact, is omnipresent throughout the epic. Statius puts his myth into its proper context. In the last book Statius insists on humanity and clemency as crucial values. In the Thebaid Greek and Roman culture are melted into a unity. It is a document of this synthesis.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Pessimistic interpretations of the Thebaid are numerous; s. esp. W. SCHETTER 1960.

In the Silvae as well humanity is a vital theme. These poems celebrate whatever lends grace and dignity to human life and whatever brings some beam of eternity to it: love, friendship, poetry and art. The intellectual world of Statius is adequately reflected in the literary world of the Silvae. As the magnificent Roman villas are an aesthetic expression of their owner's private life and as the emperors' cosmic importance is evinced from their palaces, the poems of Statius reflect a civilization that was elaborate and sophisticated to a degree difficult to imagine in our Machine Age. Like the villas with their gardens and statues, the poems of Statius, too, were a part of life. In the lines written to those who were close to him there is a warm and personal note. Unlike the satirists who are inspired by indignation, Statius' poetry springs from comfort and ease, as does the Younger Pliny's prose. In fact, in the civilization of his day there was an equilibrium of Greek and Roman elements and the city of Rome was a radiant political and cultural center. Soon disintegration would begin. Statius' description of Domitian's palace puts this center before the reader's eyes (4. 2) and verbalizes the silent message of imperial architecture for his contemporaries. Within Roman literature Statius was the founder of both a court poetry and a private occasional poetry laying claim to literary excellence. This achievement was of pioneering importance to the further development of poetry in late antiquity and Renaissance.

Transmission<sup>1</sup>

Thebaid and Achilleid. The Parisinus 8051 Puteaneus (P; 9th century) is the only representative of its class; it contains the Thebaid and the Achilleid. A related group (for the Achilleid) consists of the Etonensis 150 (E; 11th century) and the Monacensis 14 557, olim Ratisbonensis (R; 14th century). All other manuscripts are different from these and form the Omega class. In all probability all the manuscripts ultimately originate in a single archetype.

Silvae. In the Middle Ages the Silvae were little known; Poggio discovered them (together with Silius and Manilius) during the Council of Constance. He had a copy made, from which all younger manuscripts are derived. This fact stresses the importance of the Matritensis 3678 (M; early 15th century). There is an older tradition for sib. 2. 7: Laurentianus plut. 29, 32 (L; 10th century).

<sup>1</sup> On the transmission of Statius s. the praefationes of the editions; critical overviews of recent studies: H. CANKIK 1986, esp. 2682–2686; H.-J. VAN DAM 1986, 2727–2733.

Influence

The poet of the Thebaid was acknowledged in his lifetime already.<sup>1</sup> More and more he became a school author. A commentary from late antiquity (5th to 6th century) is ascribed to Lactantius Placidus,<sup>2</sup> and Fulgentius proposed an allegorical interpretation.<sup>3</sup> Gordian I used the Achilleid together with the Aeneid as a model for his Antoninias.<sup>4</sup> Claudian, a kindred spirit to Statius, was indebted to the Thebaid in matters of language and literary form. The Silvae, which were read by Claudian, Ausonius, and Sidonius Apollinaris, set the standard for personal and occasional poetry in late antiquity.

In the Middle Ages the Silvae found some readers under Charlemagne but they were much less known than Statius' epic poems which by the 10th century were used as textbooks.<sup>5</sup> As a part of the Libri Catoniani,<sup>6</sup> an anthology for class use, the Achilleid was largely read; Konrad of Würzburg (13th century) and the British monk Josephus Iscanus (De bello Troiano, 13th century) made use of it. Dante (who followed a medieval legend) idealized Statius into a secret Christian (purg. 22, 64–66) converted by Virgil's messianic eclogue. He adapted the image of the flame which split in two while consuming the hostile brothers (Theb. 12. 429–430). The Norman Roman de Thèbe (around 1150) treated the same subject as the Thebaid but from a different viewpoint. Chaucer proclaims: 'first follow I Stace'.<sup>7</sup> Did he read the original? This seems plausible for Troilus and Criseyde 5. 1480–81 but in 2. 100–108 Pandarus finds his niece reading the Romaunce of Thebes, where 'the bishop Amphiorax' (!) falls through the ground to hell.

Renaissance epic owed much to Statius: in his Africa Petrarch (d. 1474) followed in his and Virgil's footsteps, thus outshining Silius' still undiscovered Punica. To write his Teseida Boccaccio (d. 1375) studied the Thebaid and the respective scholia; Statius was also known to the author of the Borsias, Tito Strozzi (d. 1505). A poet inimical

<sup>1</sup> Iuv. 7. 83; Stat. Theb. 12. 814; on Statius' influence cf. also G. ARICÒ, Per il Fortleben di Stazio, Vichiana 12, 1983, 36–43.

<sup>2</sup> Ed. R. D. SWEENEY, Leipzig 1994.

<sup>3</sup> Fulgentius, ed. R. HELM, Leipzig 1898, 180.

<sup>4</sup> Script. hist. Aug., Gordiani tres 3. 3.

<sup>5</sup> MANITIUS 1, 634; further information ibid. 633; 731; 971.

<sup>6</sup> M. BOAS, De Librorum Catonianorum historia atque compositione, Mnemosyne 42, 1914, 17–46.

<sup>7</sup> Anelida and Arcite 21.

to tyrants, Alfieri (d. 1803), in his Antigone was inspired by our poet's dramatic talent.<sup>1</sup> The Silvae<sup>2</sup> were authoritative for neo-Latin occasional poetry; and Goethe would recognize their vivid descriptive art.<sup>3</sup> In an epoch not particularly sympathetic to Latin poetry, Wilamowitz passed an independent judgment on Statius: Et inveniendi sollertia et dicendi audacia quidquid post Ovidium Camenae tulerunt facile superat poeta semigraecus, 'both in originality and in boldness of expression, this half-Greek poet easily surpasses whatever the Muses brought forth after Ovid'.<sup>4</sup>

Editions: Theb.: sine loco et anno (about 1470). * Ach.: I. DE COLONIA, Venetiis 1472; A. GALLUS (A. BELFORTE), Ferrara 1472. * Silvae: D. CALDERINI, Venetiis 1472. * Complete editions: A. TRAGLIA, G. ARICÒ (TTrN), Torino 1980. * J. H. MOZLEY (TTr), 2 vols., London 1928. * C. H. MOORE (Tr), Boston 1933. * Theb. and Ach.: H. W. GARROD, Oxford 1906. * Theb.: A. IMHOF (Tr), Leipzig 1885–1889. * K. W. BINDEWALD (Tr), Stuttgart 1868–1875; Berlin 2nd ed. 1907 (books 1–8 only). * A. KLOTZ, Lipsiae 1908, ed. corr. T. C. KLINNERT, Leipzig 1973. * D. E. HILL, Lugduni Batavorum 1983. * A. D. MELVILLE, D. W. T. VESSEY (TrN), Oxford 1992. * R. LESUEUR (TTr), 3 vols., Paris 1990–1994. * Theb. 1: H. HEUVEL (TTrC), Groningen 1932. * F. CAVIGLIA (TTrC), Roma 1973. * Theb. 2: H. M. MULDER (TC), Groningen 1954. * Theb. 3: H. SNIJDER (TC), Amsterdam 1968. * Theb. 6: H. W. FORTGENS (TTrC), Zutphen 1934. * Theb. 7: J. J. L. SMOLENAARS (C), Leiden 1994. * Theb. 9: M. DEWAR (TTrC), Oxford 1991. * Theb. 10: R. D. WILLIAMS (TC), Leiden 1972. * Theb. 11: P. VENINI (TTrC), Firenze 1970. * Ach.: A. KLOTZ, Lipsiae 1902. ** O. A. W. DILKE (TC), Cambridge 1954. * J. MÉHEUST (TTr), Paris 1971. * H. RUPPRECHT (TTrN), Mitterfels 1984. * silv.: F. VOLLMER (TC), Lipsiae 1898. * A. KLOTZ, Lipsiae 1900 (2nd ed. 1911; repr. 1971). * R. SEBICHT (Tr), Ulm 1902. * J. S. PHILLIMORE, Oxford 2nd ed. 1918. * F. FRÈRE, H. J. IZAAC (TTr), Paris 1944; rev. and corr. by C. MOUSSY, vol. 1, 3rd ed. 1992; vol. 2, 2nd ed. 1961. * A. MARASTONI, Lipsiae 1961, 1974. * E. COURTNEY, Oxford 1990. * silv. 2: H.-J. VAN DAM (C), Leiden 1984. * silv. 4: K. M. COLEMAN (TTrC), Oxford 1988. ** Lactantii Placidi in Statii Thebaida commentarii libri XII, ed. R. D. SWEENEY, Stuttgart 1994. ** Concordance: R. J. DEFERRARI and M. C. EAGAN, Brookland, D.C.

<sup>1</sup> HIGHET, Class. Trad. 679.

<sup>2</sup> In his inaugural lecture Politian discussed Statius' Silvae (and Quintilian): CONTE, LG 488.

<sup>3</sup> F. HAND, Statii Hercules Epitrapezios, Jena 2nd ed. 1849, 7.

<sup>4</sup> Kleine Schriften, vol. 2, Berlin 1941, 256 (dating from 1893); cf. furthermore: F. and D. HILLER, eds., Mommsen und Wilamowitz. Briefwechsel 1872–1903, Berlin 1935, 456.

1943. * J. KLECKA, Hildesheim 1983. ** Bibl.: on the Thebaid s. below: F. M. AHL 1986. * On the Achilleid: G. ARICÒ 1986. * H. CANGIK, Statius' Silvae. Ein Bericht über die Forschung seit F. VOLLMER (bibl. with the assistance of H.-J. VAN DAM), ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2681–2726. * H.-J. VAN DAM, Statius' Silvae. Forschungsbericht 1974–1984, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2727–2753.

F. M. AHL, Statius' Thebaid. A Reconsideration, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2803–2912. * G. ARICÒ, Ricerche Staziane, Palermo 1972. * G. ARICÒ, De Statii carminis, quod De bello Germanico inscribitur, fragmento, ALGP 11–13, 1974–1976, 249–254. * G. ARICÒ, Interpretazioni recenti della composizione della Tebaide, ALGP 5–6 n.s., 1968–1969, 216–233. * G. ARICÒ, L'Achilleid di Stazio. Tradizione letteraria e invenzione narrativa, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2925–2964. * D. F. BRIGHT, Elaborate Disarray. The Nature of Statius' Silvae, Meisenheim 1980. * V. BUCHHEIT, Statius' Geburtstagsgedicht zu Ehren Lucans, Hermes 88, 1960, 231–249. * E. BURCK, Statius an seine Gattin Claudia (Silvae 3. 5), WS 99, n.s. 20, 1986, 215–227. * H. CANGIK, Untersuchungen zur lyrischen Kunst des P. Papinius Statius, Hildesheim 1965. * P. CARRARA, Stazio e i primordia di Tebe. Poetica e polemica nel prologo della Tebaide, Prometheus 12, 1986, 146–158. * P. M. CLOGAN, The Medieval Achilleid of Statius, Leiden 1968. * R. CORTI, Due funzioni della similitudine nella Tebaide di Stazio, Maia n.s. 39, 1987, 3–23. * W. J. DOMINIK, Speech and Rhetoric in Statius' Thebaid, Hildesheim 1994. * W. J. DOMINIK, The Mythic Voice of Statius. Power and Politics in the Thebaid, Leiden 1994. * I. FRINGS, Odia fraterna als manieristisches Motiv—Betrachtungen zu Senecas Thyest und Statius' Thebais, Stuttgart 1992. * L. HÅKANSON, Statius' Silvae. Critical and Exegetical Remarks with Some Notes on the Thebaid, Lund 1969. * L. HÅKANSON, Statius' Thebaid. Critical and Exegetical Remarks, Lund 1973. * A. HARDIE, Statius and the Silvae, Trowbridge 1983. * S. J. HARRISON, The Arms of Capaneus: Statius, Thebaid 4. 165–177, CQ n.s. 42, 1992, 247–252. * R. HÄUSSLER, Drei Gedichte an den Schlaf: Statius—Balde—Hölderlin, Arcadia 13, 1978, 113–145. * J. HENDERSON, Statius' Thebaid: Form Premade, PCPhS 37, 1991, 30–80. * R. JAKOBI, Quellenrekurs als textkritischer Schlüssel in den Epen des Statius, Hermes 116, 1988, 227–232. * H. JUHNKE, Homerisches in römischer Epik flavischer Zeit. Untersuchungen zu Szenennachbildungen und Strukturentsprechungen in Statius' Thebais und Achilleis und in Silius' Punica, München 1972. * E. KABSCH, Funktion und Stellung des zwölften Buches der Thebais des P. Papinius Statius, diss. Kiel 1968. * T. C. KLINNERT, Capaneus—Hippomedon. Interpretationen zur Heldendarstellung in der Thebais des P. PAPINIUS Statius, diss. Heidelberg 1970. * B. KYTZLER, Imitatio und aemulatio in der Thebais des Statius, Hermes 97, 1969, 209–232. * B. KYTZLER, Zum Aufbau der stadianischen Thebais. Pius Coroebus, Theb. 1. 557–692, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2913–2924. * L. LEGRAS, Étude sur la Tebaide de Stace, Paris 1905. * R. LESUEUR, Les personnages féminins dans la Thébaidé de Stace, BSTEC 189–190, 1986, 19–32. * G. LORENZ, Vergleichende Interpretationen zu Silius Italicus und Statius, diss. Kiel 1968. * H.-A. LUIPOLD, Die Bruder-Gleichnisse in der Thebais des Statius, diss. Tübingen 1970. * S. VON MOISY, Untersuchungen zur Erzählweise in Statius' Thebais, diss. Bonn 1971. * S. T. NEWMYER, The Silvae of Statius. Structure and Theme, Leiden 1979. * Z. PAVLOVSKIS, The Education of Achilles as Treated in the Literature of Late antiquity, PP 20, 1965, 281–297. * Z. PAVLOVSKIS, From Statius to Ennodius. A Brief History of Prose Prefaces to Poems, RIL 101, 1967, 535–567. * F. RIEGLER, Historische Ereignisse und Personen bei Martial und Statius, diss. Wien 1967. * M. SCHAMBERGER, De P. PAPINIO Statio verborum novatore, diss. Halle 1907. * W. SCHETTER, Untersuchungen zur epischen Kunst des Statius, Wiesbaden 1960. * R. B. STEELE, Interrelation of the Latin Poets under Domitian, CPh 25, 1930, 328–342. * G. VON STOSCH, Untersuchungen zu den Leichenspielen in der Thebais des P. Papinius Statius, diss. Tübingen 1968. * H. SZELEST, Mythologie und ihre Rolle in den Silvae des Statius, Eos 60, 1972, 309–317. * H. SZELEST, Rolle und Bedeutung des P. Papinius Statius als des Verfassers der Silvae in der römischen Dichtung, Eos 60, 1972, 87–101. * H. SZELEST, Die Originalität der sogenannten beschreibenden Silvae des Statius, Eos 56, 1966 (publ. 1969), 186–197. * R. C. TANNER, Epic Tradition and Epigram in Statius, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 3020–3046. * P. VENINI, Studi staziani, Pavia 1971. * D. W. T. VESSEY, Statius and the Thebaid, Cambridge 1973. * D. W. T. VESSEY, Pierius menti calor incidit. Statius' Epic Style, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2965–3019. * D. W. T. VESSEY, Transience Preserved. Style and Theme in Statius' Silvae, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 2754–2802.

SILIUS ITALICUS

Life and Dates

Tiberius Catius Asconius Silius Italicus<sup>1</sup> was of noble origin, perhaps from northern Italy.<sup>2</sup> Born between 23 and 35, he became consul in 68 under Nero and, in all probability, did not shrink from playing the role of an accuser.<sup>1</sup> Soon after this he was a friend of Vitellius;<sup>2</sup> probably in 77 he became a proconsul in Asia.<sup>3</sup> Then he gave up politics and oratory and passed the last years of his life in Campania in his villas, which were filled with works of art. He proved his admiration for authors by buying lots such as a villa of Cicero's and Virgil's tomb (Mart. 11. 48. 2; cf. 11. 49). He admired Virgil with almost religious awe. When not occupied with the work of his old age,<sup>4</sup> the Punica, he talked with his friends about philosophy and literature: the Stoic Cornutus dedicated a book on Virgil to him<sup>5</sup> and no lesser a figure than Epictetus deemed him the most philosophical mind among Romans.<sup>6</sup> Despite his delicate health he enjoyed a long life. When struck with an incurable disease he, as a true Stoic,<sup>7</sup> killed himself through fasting (probably about 101).<sup>8</sup>

<sup>1</sup> His full name is found on an inscription discovered at Aphrodisias in 1934: W. M. CALDER, Silius Italicus in Asia, CR 49, 1935, 216–217.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. J. CAMPBELL, The Birthplace of Silius Italicus, CR 50, 1936, 56–58 (Patavium?); cf. SYME, Tacitus 1, 88, n. 7; for Capuan origin (cf. Sil. 11. 122–126): D. W. T. VESSEY, The Origin of Ti. Catius Asconius Silius Italicus, CB 60, 1984, 9–10.

Survey of the Work

The Punica describe the Second Punic War in 17 books.<sup>9</sup>

1: The war originates from Juno's projects, but also from Hannibal's nature and his being educated to hate the Romans (1–143). The main action begins in Spain: Hannibal attacks the Saguntines, who send messengers to Rome for help. The Romans, in their turn, dispatch an embassy to Hannibal, threatening to declare war, if Hannibal did not stop fighting against Saguntum.

2: Turned away by Hannibal, the Roman messengers go on to Carthage, where Fabius before the discordant Punic senators declares the war (270–390: an oratorical duel between Hanno and Gestar). Though bravely defending themselves and being assisted by Fides personified, the Saguntines are about to succumb. Now they decide to commit suicide. Hannibal, who owes

<sup>1</sup> The chief source on his life is Plin. epist. 3. 7; cf. also the inscriptions DESSAU 6125; 9059.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also Tac. hist. 3. 65.

<sup>3</sup> Inscription: cf. above, 1st note on Silius Italicus.

<sup>4</sup> It is certain that he wrote the Punica in his old age; for the details we have to rely on conjectures, cf. E. WISTRAND 1956 (with earlier bibl.).

<sup>5</sup> Char. gramm. 1. 125. 16–18 KEIL = p. 159. 27–29 BARWICK.

<sup>6</sup> Epict. diss. 3. 8. 7; F. BUECHELER, Coniectanea de Sillio Italico, Iuvenale, Plauto, aliis poetis Latinis, RhM 35, 1880, 391.

<sup>7</sup> For a positive evaluation of suicide cf. Sil. 11. 186–188.

<sup>8</sup> One of his two sons died before him, the other lived to become a consul (Plin. epist. 3. 7).

<sup>9</sup> S. now: L. BRAUN, Der Aufbau der Punica des Silius Italicus, WJA 19, 1993, 173–183 (bibl.).

his victory to Juno's and Tisiphone's help, enters an empty city (391-456: Hannibal's shield).

3: In the center of the 3rd book there is a catalogue of the Carthaginian troops and their allies (222-414); after this display of the quantity of Rome's enemies, Silius immediately shows the seriousness of the Punic threat: Hannibal succeeds in crossing the Pyrenees and the Alps. At Venus' request, Jupiter, in a historical prophecy, reveals his true aims: hac ego Martis/mole viros spectare paro atque expendere bello, 'I mean to test their manhood by this great conflict and to try them in war' (573-574).

4-5: Books 4 and 5 report three devastating defeats, which Rome suffered despite her citizens' readiness to defend themselves. Once the blameless consul Scipio has lost the battles of the Ticinus and the Trebia, his unworthy successor, Flaminius, by his neglegentia deorum, causes the catastrophe of Lake Trasimene.

6-7: After two books treating a chain of dramatic events the 6th book constitutes a retardation in the progress of the action. In an ample retrospective vision of the First Punic War Silius praises the exploits of Atilius Regulus. Then, the appointment of Fabius to the office of dictator (609-640) prepares book 7 which describes Fabius' 'delaying' strategy.

8-10: The Romans' defeat at Cannae fills books 8 to 10. As in the case of the battle of Lake Trasimene, a general is to blame for the disaster: the consul Varro is a new Flaminius. His colleague Paullus is a positive counterpart to him.

11: Book 11 forms a break after Cannae as did book 6 after the débâcle of Lake Trasimene.<sup>1</sup> Hannibal makes his entry into lovely Capua and Venus sends her Cupids to assail the Carthaginians.

12: This book notes a first Roman success: in the battle of Nola Marcellus beats Hannibal. However, far from surrendering, Hannibal turns against the Capital.

13: The positive turn of the fortune of war continues. Without having achieved his purpose, Hannibal abandons Rome. He loses even Capua. On the other hand, in Spain the two Scipios fall. This gives occasion to insert the Nekyia.

14-17: Victorious Roman generals dominate the last 4 books, thus outweighing Hannibal's series of successes which had been described in the first third of the work: while Marcellus conquers Syracuse (book 14), young Scipio is successful in Spain, as are Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator at the river Metaurus (book 15); after a respite (book 16 with funeral games) the Roman victory of Zama and Scipio's triumph form a climax.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. E. BURCK 1979, 262.

Sources, Models, and Genres<sup>1</sup>

Silius' main source for history is Livy; but he also consulted other historians.<sup>2</sup> Although the Punica often adopts Livy's subject matter and even his interpretative remarks, it is something more than a 'Livy put into verse'.<sup>3</sup> For instance, Silius holds a positive view of Scipio's piety, whereas the Augustan historian considered it hardly more than a clever political move.<sup>4</sup>

Silius expressly pays homage to his predecessors Virgil (8. 593–594), Ennius (12. 387–419), and Homer (13. 778–797). Imitation of Homer can be traced everywhere; the following Homeric scenes omitted by Virgil are reflected in Silius: the hero giving farewell to his spouse<sup>5</sup> (3. 61–157; Il. 6. 392–493; cf. also Lucan 5. 722–815), the battle in the river (Sil. 4. 570–703; Il. 21 passim), and the battle of gods (9. 278–10, 325; cf. Il. 20 and 5).<sup>6</sup> In all probability, the parallels between Scipio and Achilles<sup>7</sup> are relevant to the overall structure of the Punica; the same is true of the position of the games which are placed in the penultimate book as they had been in the Iliad.<sup>8</sup>

However, Silius, though directly using the Iliad, usually views it through the prism of the Aeneid. This shows from passages such as the Nekyia<sup>9</sup> which combine Homeric and Virgilian elements.

<sup>1</sup> For a comparison with his predecessors cf. M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 15–89.

<sup>2</sup> For a general overview: J. NICOL 1936 (largely based on A. KLOTZ): s. now H. G. NESSELRATH 1986.

<sup>3</sup> Silius no versificator Livii: P. VENINI, Cronologia e composizione nei Punica di Silio Italico, RIL 106, 1972, 518–531; K. O. MATIER, Prejudice and the Punica: Silius Italicus. A Reassessment, AClass 24, 1981, 141–151; E. BURCK, Die Endphase der Schlacht am Metaurus bei Silius Italicus (Punica 15. 759–16. 22), WS n.s. 16, 1982, 260–273; H. G. NESSELRATH 1986.

<sup>4</sup> On the gods in the Punica: O. SCHÖNBERGER, Zum Weltbild der drei Epiker nach Lucan, Helikon 5, 1965, 123–145, esp. 137–145; W. KISSEL 1975; W. SCHUBERT, Jupiter in den Epen der Flavierzzeit, Frankfurt 1984, esp. 45–70 and passim.

<sup>5</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 146; H. JUHNKE 1972, 221: this scene contributes to the portrait of the 'enemies'; the 'dream' and the 'catalogue' are drawn from the 2nd book of the Iliad (Sil. 3. 163–216; 222–405).

<sup>6</sup> In this case there is Ennius between Silius and Homer, as follows from Aen. 10. 11–15 (M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 152).

<sup>7</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 148; H. JUHNKE 1972, 222.

<sup>8</sup> G. LORENZ 1968, 231.

<sup>9</sup> Homeric parallels to book 13: H. JUHNKE 1972, 400–404; C. REITZ 1982 brings into prominence Silius' own achievement, e.g.: the second sibyl, the ten doors, the judgment of tyrants. On enhancement of horror: M. BILLERBECK, Die Unterweltsbeschreibung in den Punica des Silius Italicus, Hermes 111, 1983, 326–338.

Besides, Hellenistic influences can be traced in poetic medallions painted in more tender hues,<sup>1</sup> often but not always conveyed through the medium of Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics. Contemplative miniatures such as the Falernus episode and some smaller excursions in the bucolic vein have an unobtrusive lyric charm congenial with the poet's peaceful nature and his withdrawal from active life.<sup>2</sup>

Silius could not overlook Ennius, who had treated, in the main, the same subject. However, the material at our disposal does not allow reliable conclusions as to the directness and the extent of Ennius' influence, since, whenever we are in a position to spot reminiscences from Ennius, Silius could have drawn them from the same sources as we do: Cicero and early commentaries on Virgil.<sup>3</sup>

The Aeneid strongly influenced the overall structure of the Punica: examples are the proem and Juno's speech in book 1, and the dialogue between Jupiter and Juno preparing the end of the war in the last book (Sil. 17. 341-384; Aen. 12. 791-842). Silius deliberately transposed the sea storm from the 1st into the last book and onto the enemy: a double inversion! (Aen. 1. 50-156; Sil. 17. 218-289).<sup>4</sup> In the context of the Punica Venus' complaint and Jupiter's prophecy make sense at the moment when Hannibal has reached the heights of the Alps and the threat for Rome has become evident (Sil. 3. 557-629). As in the Aeneid, in the Punica the 2nd book describes the destruction of a city.<sup>5</sup> Saguntum is a new Troy. To emphasize this Silius goes as far as to introduce his retrospective mention of Saguntum's destruction in the first line of book 3 with postquam, as had done Virgil with reference to Troy at the corresponding place (Aen. 3. 1). In many situations Roman heroes turn out to be reflections of Aeneas, and Hannibal is an inimical hero reminiscent of Turnus.<sup>6</sup>

Silius uses integral components of former epic, especially from the Aeneid, to illumine crucial passages of his work, skillfully inserting them as gems, as it were, into his historical mosaic. It is true that Silius

<sup>1</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 154-161.

<sup>2</sup> In Pun. 13. 314-347 the pastoral god Pan makes his appearance in order to prevent the Romans from devastating Capua and then returns to Arcadia. This is a daring amalgam of literary genres (excused by the precedent of Virgil who had introduced the political element into his Eclogues).

<sup>3</sup> On Silius and Ennius: M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 161-164; M. BETTINI 1977; R. HÄUSSLER 1978, 148-161; 176-177.

<sup>4</sup> Neptune arouses the storm as he had done in the Odyssey (5. 282-294).

<sup>5</sup> Cf. D. VESSEY 1974.

<sup>6</sup> On Silius and Virgil: M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 166-184.

does not depict mythical events but (as Ennius had done) individual historical facts; however, through artistic invention—imitations of scenes, similes, quotations—he makes his text transparent while letting the Aeneid appear behind it as an immovable background to the ever changing events of history. The Punica is meant to be, so to speak, a continuation of the Aeneid in the historical dimension.<sup>1</sup> Given such a goal, 'imitation' becomes an essential.

Along with Virgil, Lucan<sup>2</sup> is of importance for Silius. This is true of both his interpretation of moral behavior in terms of Stoic philosophy and of his geographical excursions, which give his epic a universal dimension. Silius himself is knowledgeable in geography,<sup>3</sup> a fact which counterbalances his introverted interest in moral philosophy. Apart from introspection, epic poets need an eye open to the world around them, like Homer, who, for Silius, had been the founder of cosmic poetry (13. 788). Silius tries to do justice to this side of Homer by introducing Hellenistic geographical erudition in the way of Lucan. It follows that the Punica might be called, cum grano salis, a projection of Virgilian categories onto an Ennian subject matter in a spirit akin to Lucan (if less dark and ardent than that poet's genius).

Literary technique

Scholars have surmised that Silius originally planned to extend the Punica (which now has an odd number of books) over three hexads (18 books).<sup>4</sup> In the first hexad Hannibal dominates, in the second, Fabius and Paullus oppose him, in the third, Marcellus and Scipio vanquish him. But there are more approaches to the structure of the poem.<sup>5</sup>

Silius' narrative technique is unlike Virgil's; like Ennius he arranges

<sup>1</sup> The historical perspectives are far-reaching: civil wars (13. 850–867) and Silius' own time (3. 597–629; 14. 684–688).

<sup>2</sup> On Silius and Lucan s. M. v. ALBRECHT 1964, 164–166; cf. 75; J. H. BROUWERS, Zur Lucan-Imitation bei Silius Italicus, in: J. DEN BOEFT, A. H. M. KESSELS, eds., Actus. Studies in Honour of H. L. W. NELSON, Utrecht 1982, 73–87. The chronological relationship to Statius is disputed: G. LORENZ 1968.

<sup>3</sup> This is true even of epic simile: 17. 592–596.

<sup>4</sup> E. BURCK 1984, 5; 1979, 260–268; W. KISSEL 1979, 211–213. Unfortunately, hexadic structure in most of the authors to whom it is ascribed, is subject to certain flaws. On the other hand, the number 17 does have Hellenistic precedents, cf. also Horace's Epodes. In addition, E. ZINN defended the number of 17 books with reference to the years of war (in: M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 171, n. 11).

<sup>5</sup> J. KÜPPERS 1986, 176–192; L. BRAUN 1993 (quoted above, p. 960, n. 9).

single elements in series and presents a plurality of heroes. His Stoic approach is reminiscent of Lucan; at every step the new tastes of the 1st century make themselves felt.<sup>1</sup> Unlike the Aeneid the Punica does not describe a unified action of archetypal significance, but a multitude of historical events. Hence lists and catalogues acquire a structuring function: initially, the action, like a huge wave, is mainly directed towards Rome; Silius emphasizes this direction by placing lists of past and future defeats at crucial points (cf. already the prophetic speech of Juno 1. 42–54).<sup>2</sup> The contrary movement that begins after the middle of the work is to be seen in the speech of Voluptas: she wants to frighten Scipio by mentioning Cannae and other defeats but produces the contrary effect (15. 34–35). And the end of book 15 Nero, by winning the battle of Metaurus, has taken revenge for the humiliations of Cannae, Trebia, and Lake Trasimene (814–818). The reversal of the fortune of war is by now an accomplished fact. In the last book Hannibal's dream is an artistic inversion of the most important battles: now the dead Roman generals and soldiers chase the Carthaginian from Italy (17. 160–169). In his allocution Hannibal once more reminds his soldiers of their previous victories (295–337); finally, Scipio overwhelms all winners of former battles (494–502). This is the consummation of the Roman counter-attack.<sup>3</sup>

This technique of inversion (combined with reminiscences of Virgilian scenes) establishes a close relationship between the beginning and the end of the Punica. Within individual books, too, there are parallels and contrasts between beginnings and endings: in book 1, the first simile emphasizes Hannibal's perfidia (1. 324–326; cf. the dea Dira in Aen. 12. 856–860), whereas the last simile in the same book dwells on Fabius' circumspection (1. 687–689). At the beginning of book 9 the contrasting characters of two Roman generals find expression in a simile (9. 41–43) and in speeches (Varro 9. 25–36; Paullus 9. 44–64). The ending is a mirror-image of this beginning: there are literary portraits of Paullus and Varro enlivened by two further speeches.

<sup>1</sup> Silius, though not a 'mannerist', is a 'classicist', not a classic.

<sup>2</sup> Other enumerations of Hannibal's victories are: 1. 125–133; 546–547; 4. 59–66; 5. 153–164; 6. 106–112; 296–298; 700–716; 7. 147–150; 378; 8. 38; 664–670; 9. 185–191; 11. 134–146; 12. 547–550; 695–697; 13. 716–718.

<sup>3</sup> Hannibal's dream is fulfilled insofar as Scipio had drawn his victorious power from the dead heroes in the underworld (cf. 13. 381–895; 15. 179–213; 16. 586–589). The spear thrown in honor of the dead bursts into leaf.

Generally speaking, structure often helps to illustrate moral issues. This is true of the exempla inserted by Silius as stories within the story: after the disaster of Lake Trasimene Serranus is encouraged by listening to the story of the exploits of his father, Regulus (6. 117–551).<sup>1</sup> After the battle of Cannae Cloelia's narrative puts the unbending and invincible character of the Romans before Hannibal's eyes (10. 449–502). At the beginning of the last book the story of Claudia Quinta conveys a subtle message: the gods confirm Claudia's innocence, thus foreshadowing the end of Roman sufferings.<sup>2</sup> Claudia Quinta symbolizes Rome, which after hard trials finally is justified by the gods.

Silius' narrative technique has a 'static' rather than a dynamic effect; this is owing to a specific blend of a typically Roman delight in factual detail and a no less Roman preference for abstract moral terms. On the whole the Punica differs from the Aeneid not only in following the chronology of history but also in lining up self-contained, 'ready-made' elements, thus announcing in some points the 'technique of isolated pictures' of late antiquity.<sup>3</sup> While Statius lends vivid motion to his images, Silius' similes give a peaceful and unhurried impression, as if they were miniature portraits.<sup>4</sup> Individual scenes have a balanced structure.<sup>5</sup>

Language and Style

His language and style exhibit similar characteristics. Some expressions bordering on tautology reveal the even temper of old age. The consequences are not exclusively negative—sometimes the reader is reminded of the caution and gentleness of authors like Adalbert Stifter. Unlike Lucan Silius does not try to turn each line into a flash of genius by giving it an unexpected twist—an abstinence which must be called courageous in his days. His most poetic passages attract

<sup>1</sup> E. L. BASSETT, Regulus and the Serpent in the Punica, CPh 50, 1955, 1–20; R. HÄUSSLER 1978, 168–175.

<sup>2</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1968.

<sup>3</sup> In general cf. F. MEHMEL, Virgil und Apollonius Rhodius, Hamburg 1940.

<sup>4</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 90–118; the simile placed before the change of fortune is especially telling: Marcellus is like a swan who seems to stand still in complete idleness while, under the surface, swimming against the stream with both feet (14. 189–191).

<sup>5</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1968.

the reader by simplicity, not brilliance. Silius certainly does not distract us from his subject by giving it a glittering surface.

His versification<sup>1</sup> has been blamed unjustly. He deliberately aims at spondaic gravity. In this respect he is closer to Virgil than any other epic poet of his age.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

We are indebted to Silius for a pertinent description of Homer's achievement: he is the divine poet of the universe, of the three-storied cosmos of epic (13. 788). Moreover, Silius pays homage to his Roman predecessors (s. Sources). Indirectly and with due modesty he hints at his own work (13. 793-797): it is concerned with virtus (ibid.) and decus laborum (1. 3), the glory ancient Italy won through hardship. Thus he combines the epic tradition of κλέα ἀνδρῶν ('praises of heroes') with the gloria of virtus in the vein of Roman historians and the Stoic concept of trial and rehabilitation through labor. Silius subordinates literature to a moral idea.

Ideas II

Reading Silius is like reading a mosaic, the meaning of which is not found in the individual stone. To grasp the poet's intentions we have to transcend single scenes and look at their context. It is virtually impossible, therefore, to separate his ideology from his literary technique.<sup>2</sup>

Silius' republican ideas<sup>3</sup> find an artistic expression e.g. in the duel of two brothers at the funeral games (16. 527-556).<sup>4</sup> This scene shows the fatal consequences of a striving for kingship and unmistakably evokes the civil war's heroes from the Nekyia (13. 850-867). Probably, there is also an analogy between Silius' description of the chariot race (16. 312-456) and his view of the course of the war.

<sup>1</sup> A just appraisal in: G. MÖHLER 1989.

<sup>2</sup> For a different view H. JUHNKE 1972, 50 and 225, n. 167.

<sup>3</sup> Silius (like many of his contemporaries) in theory was a republican but in practice accepted monarchy; cf. W. C. McDERMOTT, A. E. ORENTZEL, Silius Italicus and Domitian, AJPh 98, 1977, 24-34.

<sup>4</sup> G. LORENZ 1968, 170-208.

It follows that individual scenes in Silius are not an end in themselves nor naively superficial<sup>1</sup> but are functionally related to the general idea of his work.

Ultimately, even the general structure of the Punica can only be explained by its underlying moral conception. This epic is all about the trial of Roman virtus through labores,<sup>2</sup> giving these Roman ideas the dignified garb of Stoicism. Hercules, as viewed by the Stoics, serves as a model for many of Silius' heroes.<sup>3</sup> Prodicus' famous allegory 'The Choice of Hercules' is transferred on Scipio standing between Virtus and Voluptas (15. 18–130). There is no single hero; as had done Naevius and Ennius, Silius chooses the entire Roman people for his hero. Different aspects of Roman virtus are embodied in Fabius, Paullus, Marcellus, and, especially, Scipio.<sup>4</sup> Hannibal is the 'antagonist' reminiscent of Virgil's Turnus and Lucan's Caesar.<sup>5</sup>

On the Roman side the efficient motifs are virtues like fides and pietas, matched by ira and furor on the Carthaginian side. The same polarity reigns in the world of the gods: Jupiter stands for Rome, reason, order, and peace; Juno for Carthage, passion, and war. The same is true of allegories (which anticipate late antiquity): on the one hand there are Fides and Virtus, on the other, Voluptas.

In the course of the text the outward conflict gradually reveals its inward nature: the war between Rome and Carthage generates conflicts between reason and folly within the Roman camp (Fabius—Minucius; Paullus—Varro) and, finally, an inner conflict in Scipio (book 15). His victory over himself and his awareness of the link between his own and his people's destiny (13. 504) are the prerequisites to his winning the war. Historical decisions are taken by individuals: this insight is both typically Roman and valid beyond the Roman context; it makes Silius a noteworthy interpreter of history, including his own historical situation under the emperors.

<sup>1</sup> H. JUHNKE 1972, 267, cf. 253.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also K.-H. NIEMANN 1975.

<sup>3</sup> Even for Hannibal: E. L. BASSETT, Hercules and the Hero of the Punica, in: L. WALLACH, ed., The Classical Tradition. Literary and Historical Studies in Honor of H. CAPLAN, Ithaca, N.Y. 1966, 258–273.

<sup>4</sup> On Scipio's special importance: E. L. BASSETT ibid.

<sup>5</sup> To a lesser degree also: Hector.

Transmission

The archetype of the Punica was an old St. Gall manuscript; the Florentine humanist Poggio discovered it during the Council of Constance (1416 or 1417); discrepancies in our transmission suggest that this witness (which, unfortunately, has been lost) contained numerous interlinear and marginal readings. The stemma, which starts from the Sangallensis, falls into two classes of different quality; between these, there are cross-references (by codices mixti). The  $\alpha$  class most frequently offers the better readings; its main representative is Laurentianus, Aed. 196 (F; later 15th century), which also contains a vita of Silius.

The text is in need of emendation in numerous instances. Many corrections have been made by humanists (Petrus Odus, Domitius Calderinus, Pomponius Laetus, Bartholomaeus Fontius, Petrus Marsus). Often, however, it was Odus himself who by 'correcting' corrupt passages in the manuscript  $\Gamma$ , paved the way for further corruptions. It is to the merit of J. Delz to have given the text a solid basis.

Influence

In antiquity only Pliny, Martial, and Sidonius mention Silius' name. Although the Middle Ages seem to have had some knowledge of the Punica- as certain parallels between Silius and the Waltharius<sup>1</sup> seem to attest—, Petrarch's (d. 1374) Latin epic Africa is independent of Silius.<sup>2</sup>

After his rediscovery Silius found relatively many readers and imitators, especially in England;<sup>3</sup> later on, Julius Caesar's Scaliger's (d. 1558)<sup>4</sup> and his followers' harsh criticism was detrimental to our poet's reputation. The German poet Ludwig Uhland (d. 1862) wrote a verse translation of 'The Choice of Scipio'.<sup>5</sup> The same scene is the subject of one of Raphael's famous paintings.<sup>6</sup>

Editions: ANDREAS, Bishop of ALERIA (together with Calpurnius and Hesiod, faulty), Romae: C. SWEYNHEIM, A. PANNARTZ 1471. * G. A. RUPERTI (TC),

<sup>1</sup> R. SCHIEFFER, Silius Italicus in St. Gallen. Ein Hinweis zur Lokalisierung des Waltharius, MLatJb 10, 1975, 7–19.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 118–144.

<sup>3</sup> E. L. BASSETT, Silius Italicus in England, CPh 48, 1953, 155–168.

<sup>4</sup> Poetices libri septem, Lyon 1561, 324.

<sup>5</sup> Gedichte, crit. ed. by E. SCHMIDT and J. HARTMANN, vol. 2, Stuttgart 1898, 212–215.

<sup>6</sup> E. PANOFKY, Hercules am Scheidewege und andere antike Bildstoffe in der neueren Kunst, Studien der Bibliothek Warburg, vol. 18, Leipzig 1930.

2 vols., Gottingae 1795–1798 (excellent). * F. H. BOTHE (TrN), 5 vols., Stuttgart 1855–1857. * L. BAUER, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1890–1892. * J. D. DUFF (TTr), 2 vols., London 1934. * P. MINICONI, G. DEVALLET, J. VOLPILHAC-LENTHÉRIC, M. MARTIN (TTr), 4 vols., Paris 1979–1992. * F. SPALTENSTEIN (C), 2 vols., Genève 1986 and 1990. * J. DELZ, Stutgardiae 1987 (authoritative). * H. RUPPRECHT (TTr), 2 vols., Mitterfels 1991. * Book 6: U. FRÖHLICH (C), diss. Heidelberg 1996. ** Ind.: M. WACHT, Lemmatisierter Index zu Silius Italicus, Punica, mit statistischen Anhängen zu Sprache und Metrik, Regensburg 1984. * N. D. YOUNG, Index verborum Silianus, Iowa City 1939, repr. 1964. ** Bibl.: R. HELM, Forschungsbericht über nachaugusteische nichtchristliche Dichter, Lustrum 1, 1957, esp. 255–272. * M. VON ALBRECHT 1964, 215–237; s. also the new editions and F. AHL.

F. AHL, M. A. DAVIS, A. POMEROY, Silius Italicus, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2492–2561. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Silius Italicus. Freiheit und Gebundenheit römischer Epik, Amsterdam 1964. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Claudia Quinta bei Silius Italicus und bei Ovid, AU 11, 1, 1968, 76–95. * M. BETTINI, Ennio in Silio Italico, RFIC 105, 1977, 425–447. * M. BILLERBECK, Stoizismus in der römischen Epik neronischer und flavischer Zeit, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 3116–3151. * S. BORZSÁK, Die Punica des Silius Italicus und die Alexander-Überlieferung, in: G. WIRTH, ed., Romanitas—Christianitas, FS J. STRAUB, Berlin 1982, 164–174. * E. BURCK, Die Punica des Silius Italicus, in: E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979, 254–299. * E. BURCK, Historische und epische Tradition bei Silius Italicus, München 1984. * J. DINGEL, Corythus bei Vergil und Silius Italicus, Philologus 139, 1995, 89–96. * R. HÄUSSLER, Studien zum historischen Epos der Antike, II: Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius und seine Theorie, Heidelberg 1978. * H. JUHNKE, Homerisches in römischer Epik flavischer Zeit. Untersuchungen zu Szenennachbildungen und Strukturentsprechungen in Statius' Thebais und in Silius' Punica, München 1972. * W. KISSEL, Das Geschichtsbild des Silius Italicus, Frankfurt 1979. * A. KLOTZ, Silius Italicus, RE 2, 5, 1927, 79–91. * J. KÜPPERS, Tantarum causas irarum. Untersuchungen zur einleitenden Bücherdyade der Punica des Silius Italicus, Berlin 1986. * G. LAUDIZI, Silio Italico. Il passato tra mito e restaurazione etica, Galatina 1989. * G. LORENZ, Vergleichende Interpretationen zu Silius Italicus und Statius, diss. Kiel 1968. * K. O. MATIER, The Poetic Sources of Silius Italicus with Particular Reference to Book Eleven, AClass 26, 1983, 73–82. * K. O. MATIER, The Similes of Silius Italicus, LCM 11, 1986, 152–155. * P. MCGUSHIN, The Transmission of the Punica of Silius Italicus, Amsterdam 1985. * G. MÖHLER, Hexameterstudien zu Lukrez, Vergil, Horaz, Ovid, Lucan, Silius Italicus und der Ilias Latina, Frankfurt 1989. * V. NERI, Dei, Fato e divinazione nella letteratura Latina del I sec. d. C., ANRW 2, 16, 3, 1986, 1974–2051, esp. 2026–2046. * H. G. NESSELRATH, Zu den Quellen des Silius Italicus, Hermes 114, 1986, 203–230. * J. NICOL, The Historical and Geographical Sources Used by Silius Italicus, Oxford 1936. * K.-H. NIEMANN, Die Darstellung der römischen Niederlagen in den Punica des Silius Italicus, diss. Bonn 1975. * C. REITZ, Die Nekyia in den Punica des Silius Italicus, Frankfurt 1982. * C. SANTINI, La cognizione del passato in Silio Italico, Roma 1983. * C. SANTINI, Silius Italicus and his View of the Past, Amsterdam 1991. * W. THUILE, Furiae in der nachklassischen Epik. Untersuchungen zu Valerius Flaccus' Argonautica, Papinius Statius' Thebais und Silius Italicus' Punica, diss. Innsbruck 1980. * A.-M. TUPET, Le serment d'Hannibal chez Silius Italicus, BAGB 1980, 2, 186-193. * D. VESSEY, Silius Italicus on the Fall of Saguntum, CPh 69, 1974, 28-36. * W. S. WATT, Siliana, MH 45, 1988, 170-181. * E. WISTRAND, Die Chronologie der Punica des Silius Italicus, Göteborg 1956.

B. DIDACTIC POETRY

MANILIUS

Life and Dates

Our younger manuscripts ascribe the didactic poem called Astronomica to a certain M. Manilius (or Manlius). In one case the Matritensis adds the name Boethius. This is explained both by common transmission and similarity of names (Manlius/Manilius). In 983 Gerbert of Aurillac saw VIII volumina Boetii de astrologia in Bobbio (epist. 8); these were evidently three books of Boethius on arithmetics and the five books of Manilius (Gerbert mentions him in epist. 130).

Manilius was perhaps born in the sign of Gemini, which he says to be the sign of poets and astrologers (4. 152–159). The 1st book was certainly written after Varus' defeat (A.D. 9; 1. 898–903). The mentions of Caesar are partly referred to Augustus (undoubtedly 2. 509: Capricorn), partly to Tiberius (4. 764 Rhodes; 773–777 Libra). The latter emperor's specific interest in astrology<sup>1</sup> led to the suggestion that he might have been Manilius' addressee from the beginning, but Tiberius officially never used the title of pater patriae (1. 7 and 1. 925), and the gigantic sundial of Augustus reminds us that he was not indifferent to astrology either. In all probability books 1 and 2 were written under Augustus, and book 4 under Tiberius.<sup>2</sup>

Survey of the Work

I: The 1st book gives a brief survey of the constellations in the northern and the southern hemisphere. There follow the circles of the sky including the zodiacal belt and the Milky Way. In conclusion, Manilius—all too briefly—presents the planets and comets.

---

<sup>1</sup> Tac. ann. 6. 20; Suet. Tib. 69; Cass. Dio 55. 11; F. H. CRAMER, Astrology in Roman Law and Politics, Philadelphia 1954.

<sup>2</sup> A different view is held by E. GEBHARDT, Zur Datierungsfrage des Manilius, RhM 104, 1961, 278–286 (the entire work was written under Tiberius).

2: The 2nd book is on the zodiacal signs and their interaction, depending on their nature, their relative position and their attribution to certain gods and to certain parts of the human body. Each sign, in its turn, falls into twelve parts (dodecatemoria). Then, Manilius turns to the discussion of loca ('houses').

3: Book 3 displays the 12 'lots' (athla, sortes, 'departments of human life'), teaches how to determine the horoscope, and considers the celestial influences governing the phases of man's life ('chronocrators') and the seasons of the year ('tropic signs').

4: Only book 4 lists the influence of the individual zodiacal signs on man. Furthermore each sign is subdivided into three 'decans', which in their turn are assigned to different zodiacal signs. Then Manilius treats the 'insalubrious' grades of the ecliptic (partes damnandae) and the respective individual grades within each zodiacal sign. An astrological description of the world and an inspired assessment of the dignity of man as microcosm allow the reader to relax.

5: The last book is dedicated to the paranatellonta. Manilius discusses constellations outside the zodiacal belt and their impact on man. They are arranged according to their risings. He extends his study even to constellations which do not rise or set in our latitudes. Finally he comes back to astronomy by classifying the stars according to their magnitude or luminosity.

Despite his announcement in 5. 28, Manilius does not treat of the settings of constellations. Nor does he dwell on the planets (in contrast to his initial design).<sup>1</sup> We have to take into consideration that he may not have achieved his work, that there could be lacunas due to our manuscript tradition and even that he may have changed his plans. A passage at the beginning of book 5 is possibly meant to excuse the omission of the planets. Literary criteria, however, (such as parallels between books 1 and 5) warrant consideration of the transmitted text as a self-contained whole.

Sources, Models, and Genres

For a long time Manilius had been the earliest author on astrology known from classical antiquity; today there are older sources at our disposal.<sup>2</sup> Manilius cites Mercury (i.e. Hermetism) as his authority

<sup>1</sup> 2. 750; 965; 3. 156-158; 587; 5. 4-7.

<sup>2</sup> Catalogus codicum astrologorum Graecorum (CCAG) 1-12, Brussels 1898-1953; Nechepsonis et Petosiridis fragmenta magica, ed. E. RIESS, Philologus suppl. 6, 1891-1893, 325-394; W. GUNDEL and H. G. GUNDEL, Astrologumena. Die astrologische Literatur in der Antike und ihre Geschichte, ZWG, suppl. 6, 1966, 27-36; on Asclepiades of Myrlea s. F. BOLL 1950, 12-13.

(cf. 1. 30) for astrology, which he is the first to have put into verse (proems 1 and 2); Manilius' source had been under Egyptian influence; it was written in Greek, and he often shares with us his problems as a translator. Firmicus Maternus (4th century; math. 8. 6–17) would follow Manilius (5. 32–70) but, in addition, use a source much like that of Manilius.<sup>1</sup> Our poet's introduction-pieces, excursuses, and epilogues were often traced back to the Stoic philosopher Posidonius;<sup>2</sup> today's scholars are more cautious in this respect.

Manilius does not seem to have known Nigidius Figulus' Sphaera Graecanica et barbarica, nor was he familiar with the 6th book of Varro's Disciplinae. However, he did use Aratus' (first half of the 3rd century B.C.) Phaenomena both as a source and as a model in books 1 and 5. Since he ignores Cicero's translation of Aratus and has no knowledge of Germanicus', he claims to be an original poet within the tradition of didactic poetry (proem to book 2). These high claims establish a parallel to Lucretius, which is more meaningful than common use of didactic formulas (e.g. nunc age 3. 43);<sup>3</sup> however, Manilius is much less fond of logical argument.

The Astronomica does not belong to the merely 'factual' type of didactic poetry. Virgil's Georgics (1. 24–42) as a universal poem inspired by the 'cosmocrator' is Manilius' prototype (1. 7–10). Hence it follows that 'the emperor as inspiring deity'—frequent as this topos may be under Tiberius<sup>4</sup>—is not a sufficient reason for a late dating of the Astronomica. In the way of Virgil Manilius enriches his work with political and general human issues, thus giving his subject matter a deeper meaning and a larger resonance. Significant echoes of the Georgics are especially found at the beginnings and endings of the books.<sup>5</sup> The title Astronomicon has been coined—like Georgicon—after a Greek plural genitive. As in Virgil—and Aratus—the last book of Manilius contains a mythological narrative panel (5. 538–618). The

<sup>1</sup> A. E. HOUSMAN, ed., M. Manilii Astronomicon liber quintus, Londinii 1930, praef. pp. xliii–xliv.

<sup>2</sup> Here are some passages redolent of Posidonius: cosmogony 1. 118–146; sympathy within the universe 2. 63–86; the human soul being akin to the god of the universe 8. 866–935; the life of primitive men 1. 66–78; permanent change on earth 1. 817–834; astronomical and geographic lore was ascribed to Posidonius as well.

<sup>3</sup> H. RÖSCH 1911; examples of color Lucretianus: 1. 69–74; 149–151; 172; 236; 483–486; 3. 652–656; 4. 892.

<sup>4</sup> Germanicus, praef.; Val. Max. praef.; Vell. 2. 126. 3.

<sup>5</sup> W. HÜBNER 1984, 186–320, e.g. 250; 262.

doctrine of the cosmic soul (1. 247–254) and the panorama of heroes (1. 750–804) conjure up the most sublime moments of the Aeneid (6. 724–892) and of the Somnium Scipionis (Cic. rep. 6. 16).<sup>1</sup> Manilius is convinced indeed of the importance of his subject.

In time and style Manilius is close to Ovid;<sup>2</sup> at the beginning of his 3rd book he alludes to the poem of the Metamorphoses, and in his Andromeda story (5. 540–618) he emulates Ovid (met. 4. 663–739) by creating a contrasting counterpart. It is not by chance that several of his statements on cosmological and anthropological themes recall Ovid (1. 118–214; 4. 866–935; Ov. met. 1. 5–88).<sup>3</sup> It may seem that the most important dimension for Manilius is space, for Ovid, time.<sup>4</sup> Yet Manilius regards the movements of the stars as the ‘clock’ of human life (3. 510–559). Hence we are not entitled to separate space and time in Manilius. It is not surprising then, that his sketches of permanent change in the world (4. 818–865) and of the succession of seasons (3. 618–682) are reminiscent of Ovid (met. 15. 176–478).

Literary Technique

As is to be expected in didactic poetry, the books are introduced by longer and sophisticated proems<sup>5</sup> (only the introduction to book 5 is relatively short). The first of these prefaces includes a dedication to the ‘inspiring’ emperor (s. Sources, Models, and Genres). Furthermore, it contains a recapitulation of the genesis of astrology—an element recalling the ἀρχαιολογία in historical works. Generally speaking, the proems treat general issues, including philosophical ideas and literary criticism (s. Ideas I and II).

According to the usage of didactic poetry, the endings of the books (except for book 2) likewise transcend the technical subject matter. The 1st book ends in a discussion of comets, which in its turn gives occasion to considerations on pestilence, war, the disaster of Varus,

<sup>1</sup> On the philosophical background (Platonism, Pythagoreanism): W. GUNDEL, RE 7, 1, 1910, q.v. Galaxias, esp. 564–565.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. 5. 554 supplicia impsa decent, cf. Ov. met. 4. 230; 7. 733; B. R. VOSS, Die Andromeda-Episode des Manilius, Hermes 100, 1972, 413–434, esp. 425; helpful F. PASCHOU 1982.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. e.g. discordia concors 1. 142; cf. Ov. met. 1. 433 (with the scholarly commentaries).

<sup>4</sup> W. HÜBNER 1984, 228–231.

<sup>5</sup> A. MARCHI, Struttura dei poemî degli Astronomica di Manilio, Anazetesis 6–7, 1983, 8–17.

the civil wars and world peace. Book 3 terminates in an attractive description of the four seasons (excused by the discussion of the zodiacal signs which determine their changes). The finale of book 4—and the culmination of the entire work—is an excursus deriving the dignity of man from his being the universe in a nutshell. Finally, the ending of book 5 compares the magnitudes of the stars with the hierarchic order of human society. Thus, the conclusions of Manilius' books illustrate connections between macrocosm and microcosm.

The beginnings and endings of books, on the one hand, adhere to the literary patterns of didactic poetry (Lucretius, Virgil's Georgics, and Ovid's Metamorphoses as well); on the other hand, they overlap with satire by their moral and philosophical outlook (cf. the proem to book 4). Elements of diatribe had been found already in Lucretius. The relevant passages in Manilius pave the way for Lucan's rhetorical and reflective epic and for Juvenal's satire. It is true that Manilius' Menandrian serenity (cf. 5. 475) is far from the severity of a Juvenal, but his 5th book with its colorful pictures of human life is a world in miniature. As an epic of a small world, this is a hitherto unnoticed link between epic and satire.

The excursuses partly help to convey the poet's message (e.g. the proof of God's existence 1. 474–531), partly they explain his method, partly they serve as breaks for rest. The common denominator for these functions is that they are means to direct the reader's attention. One of these excursuses gives a detailed account of the useful didactic principal of starting with a general survey and gradually progressing to ever subtler distinctions (2. 750–787). Further digressions point out the necessity of never losing sight of the whole (2. 643–692) and of sifting a given question to the bottom, in order to overcome primitive stereotypes and arrive at an independent judgment (4. 363–442).

Other excursuses bridge the gap between the author and his Roman public—e.g. the catalogue of heroes inserted into the discussion of the Milky Way (1. 750–804) and the historical digression within the proem (4. 23–68). The function of 'interval for rest' is predominant in the map of the world which serves as a prelude to Manilius' astrological geography (4. 585–695);<sup>1</sup> the same is true of the famous myth of Perseus and Andromeda (5. 538–618), which combines epic and elegiac elements.<sup>1</sup> In the course of the work such ornamental insertions become more frequent. Manilius' relationship to myth is as double-edged as Plato's to poetry, Lucretius' to the gods and Aratus' to catasterisms.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> On astrological geography cf. F. BOLL, Kleine Schriften 39; 343.

In didactic epic the function of similes is to illuminate the point in discussion. Manilius, who is less fond of argument than Lucretius, is more sparing in his use of similes; instead he accumulates them in certain passages, e.g. when expounding his method (2. 751-787). Here the simile of letters (known to us from Lucretius) does not describe the structure of the world; rather, the process of teaching and learning is illustrated by a reader's gradual assimilation of letters, syllables, words and, finally, sentences. Another simile in point is the construction of a town which can only be begun after the material has been made available.

Venerable images exemplify philosophical ideas and principles of literary criticism: Homer is a stream, from which his successors derive their rivulets (2. 8-11). Unlike all these imitators Manilius has an immediate relationship to the universe, that is: to God. His cosmic journey (1. 13-19; 5. 8-11)<sup>3</sup> leads the inspired poet, who is pleased to play the role of a new Lucretius, through virgin soil, untouched by previous poets (1. 4-5; 113-114; 2. 49-59; 5. 27). For Manilius the birth of his poem is a result of a downward movement (1. 118 caelo descendit carmen ab alto, 'from the heights of heaven my song descends'; for the lofty ring of this line cf. Verg. ecl. 4. 7): the poet leads celestial art down to earth.<sup>4</sup> Digging for gold and endless travels in search for precious pearls (4. 396-407) give an idea of the difficulty of fathoming the depths of divinity: no other term is sublime enough for Manilius to denote his subject.

Descriptions of different professions (4. 122-293) and of numerous typical characters in book 5 show Manilius as a master of character portrayal and a keen observer of life.

<sup>1</sup> B. R. VOSS, quoted above p. 975, n. 2; W. HÜBNER 1984, 193-201; K. M. COLEMAN, Manilius' Monster, Hermes 111, 1983, 226-232 (from the zoological point of view).

<sup>2</sup> W. HÜBNER 1984, 237.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Parmenides 1-21; F. BOLL, Kleine Schriften 143-155; W. BOUSSET, Die Himmelsreise der Seele, Darmstadt 1960 (repr. 1971; first in: ARW 4, 1901, 136-169 and 229-273).

<sup>4</sup> W. HÜBNER 1984, 242-268.

Language and Style

Small peculiarities of language are not sufficient to prove that Manilius was not a Roman; sentence constructions redolent of everyday language are rare and almost immaterial; meter is treated carefully.<sup>1</sup> The poet excuses his use of inevitable Greek technical terms.<sup>2</sup> Because of the so-called poverty of the sermo patrius (cf. Lucr. 1. 832), there are limits to Latinization (flectere). Ultimately our poet gives preference to the 'proper word' (vox propria 3. 40-42).

Manilius confers new meanings on some words: he refers census metaphorically to the mysteries of the universe and their mathematical analysis (1. 12 aetherios per carmina pandere census, 'to display through a poet's song the riches of the sky'). When using corda and pectora to denote persons (a further development of Lucr. 2. 14), the poet activates dormant powers of the Latin language: the identification of man with his mind is in harmony with the development of psychological introspection in imperial Rome. The metaphorical use of census is an intriguing instance of transference of terms from administrative and commercial life to the realm of the mind. A study of the vocabulary of 'harmonious order' (which links astronomy to poetry) would be rewarding.

Formulas asking the reader to pay attention are typical of didactic poetry (3. 36-39), as is the introduction of a new issue with nunc age (3. 43).

Manilius uses rhetorical means to emphasize the essence of what he is saying: this is true for the repetition of key words, e.g. heaven (caelum) can only be known by heaven's gift (caeli munere 2. 115) and knowledge of fate's law is itself a gift of fate (2. 149). In such cases a paradox statement reveals a paradox truth. In fact, Stoics liked using paradoxes as vehicles of their thought (cf. Cicero's Paradoxa Stoicorum); this form of expression could sometimes assume even a religious ring.<sup>3</sup> In making distinctions between apparent synonyms Manilius develops an almost dialectical stringency: thus, from the very outset, between mundus ('universe') and orbis ('our earth' 1. 8-9) or, later on, between fata and fortuna (4. 49). Stoics considered brevitas

<sup>1</sup> On language and style: J. VAN WAGENINGEN, RE 14, 1, 1928 q.v. Manilius, esp. 1129-1130; A. CRAMER, De Manilii qui dicitur elocutione, Strassburg 1882 (still important).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. 2. 694; 909; 4. 818-819; 5. 645-646.

<sup>3</sup> H. LEWY, Sobria ebrietas, Giessen 1929.

a quality of style; accordingly Manilius sketches the vicissitudes of Marius by a brief antithesis: quod, consul totiens, exul; quod de exule consul, 'an exile after being so often consul, and consul after being an exile' (4. 46). Often few words suffice to express a basic idea: penitusque deus, non fronte notandus, 'it is in its interior and not in its outward appearance that the divine is to be apprehended', (4. 309). An even more concise example is: ratio omnia vincit, 'reason triumphs over all' (4. 932). Manilius even plays on the astrological connotations of figures of speech, a fact that can be merely indicated here.<sup>1</sup>

Manilius has a command of the 'pointed' style in the Ovidian vein. His finding 'drown reason in wine-cups' (5. 246) would recur as late as in Pushkin. However, his Stoic severity confers a noble touch on such word play. We should not conceal either that Manilius is not free from prolixity.<sup>2</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In didactic poetry, language and literature basically are servants of the author's message. The loftiness of the universe neither needs nor allows beautiful verbal adornments (4. 440). After all, the proper word is the best (3. 40–42). Anyway, teaching cannot be more than a hint (ostendisse deum nimis est, 'to show the deity is more than enough' 4. 439). Such statements seem to promise a thoroughly bald and arid discourse. Since this is contradicted by the facts, we have to ask if Manilius deserts his principles or if these are only valid for strictly technical passages.

As he says himself, as a didactic poet, he has to serve two masters: carmen and res (1. 22). Carmen creates another difficulty: The overwhelming noise of the music of the spheres prevents him from writing, since under such circumstances you could hardly write prose, not to speak of poetry (1. 22–24). His 'hearing' the music of the spheres implies that he is very close to his object. Such an immediate relationship to the divine universe, combined with an awareness of treading virgin soil (an awareness reminiscent of Callimachus, Lucretius and the satirists) is a distinguishing mark of Manilius. In his own judgment he is different from the representatives of traditional literature, who continue to derive their rivolets from Homer's stream (2. 1-149). Universe alone has the preference over myth, the authority of which he contests, while practically retaining the traditional stories as a code for human relationships. Face to face with the universe, the poet sings—not for the crowd, but in loneliness,<sup>1</sup> filling the stars with amazement and the universe with joy (2. 141-142: sed caelo noscenda canam, mirantibus astris/et gaudente sui mundo per carmina vatis, 'I shall sing it for the skies to hear, while the stars marvel and the firmament rejoices in the song of its bard'). By doing so he fulfills, as a poet, in a specific way, what, in his opinion, is the general destination of man, thus contributing personally to the self-knowledge of God.

<sup>1</sup> W. HÜBNER 1984, 214–227.

<sup>2</sup> KROLL, Studien 198.

Consequently the poetic form is not an otiose ornament, but it echoes Manilius' personal, almost religious relationship to his subject matter. In retrospect the 'disturbing' music of the spheres turns out to reflect ironically two facts: Manilius is overwhelmed by his subject, and this finds expression in the acoustic sphere, the specific dimension of poetry.

Our poet is moving on new territory—programmatically adapting the Ovidian in nova (Manil. 3. 1; Ov. met. 1. 1). Though not an heroic epic, his work is meant to convey maiora; in fact, in book 3, an invocation of the Muse (reminiscent of Apollonius' book 3 and of Aeneid 7) underscores the author's high claims. He wants to enlarge the compass of poetry. Maiores implies things more difficult, defying poetic adornment. High level teaching is matter-of-fact. Truth for advanced students looks technical, its language is straightforward.

Similarly Martial and Juvenal would renounce mythological epic to turn to human life in all its multiplicity and colorfulness. Manilius prepares this change in his last book. Menander as a mirror of life is one of his patron saints (5. 475). The 3rd book, however, still stays within the technical sphere and treats the most difficult part of his doctrine, which, at the same time, is the crucial one. Here the voces propriae are appropriate. Do such passages announce the 'new simplicity' of a Persius, whose language, however, is anything but easy to understand? Or do they herald the De sublimitate and its marriage of sublimity and simplicity?

<sup>1</sup> The poet's loneliness under the stars (cf. Lucr. 1. 142) is intimately linked with Manilius' theme, thus gaining a new meaning. On the loneliness of the poet s. also Manil. 5. 334-338.

However, the announcement of simple speech is followed by lines as brilliant as 3. 54; 57; 63. The passage on the influence of the macrocosm on man is written with special care (3. 43–95). Book 5 will artfully embody the ‘joy of the universe’ in a cheerful garland of human characters. But even in the technical passages and their ‘proper words’ there is more poetry than we might expect. Lines full of precise information often gain an almost mathematical beauty (3. 290–293): nam, per quod creverat astrum/Lanigeri stadia aut horas, tot Libra recedit;/occiduisque Aries spatium tempusque cadendi/quod tenet, in tantum Chelae consurgere perstant, ‘for in as many stades and hours the Ram’s sign had risen, in so many does the Balance set, and the space and period of descension occupied by the Ram in setting are preserved by the Balance at its rising.’ The antagonism between verum and dulce, ornare and docere seems to have been annulled.

Ideas II

Stoic influences are evident in the doctrine of sympathy of the 2nd proem, in the praise of man as the microcosm at the end of book 4, and throughout in the equation of God and ratio. Occasionally, natura may take the same meaning (e.g. 3. 47; cf. Ov. met. 1. 21 deus et melior . . . natura; cf. Spinoza’s deus sive natura). The order in the world serves as a proof of God’s existence. The macrocosm (mundus), too, is deus and now and then appears as an active subject (1. 11), as do the fata which, according to Manilius, govern the world (4. 14). In this respect the whole subject of Manilius’ work, astrology, implies Stoicism. We should not belittle the contrast to Lucretius’ Epicurean doctrine, which says that everything came into being by chance.<sup>1</sup>

Moreover, unlike the Epicureans, Manilius leaves no space for human freedom. No Prometheus can steal heavenly fire against the will of the cosmos (1. 26–37). Everything is a gift. God or the universe cannot be forced; he reveals himself when he deems the time ripe (1. 11–12; 40; 2. 115–136). When propounding these ideas with deep conviction Manilius struggles with the titanic figure of Lucretius and, despite a perceptible difference of power, does not leave his readers unimpressed.

<sup>1</sup> ‘A Stoic poetic answer to Lucretius’: F. BOLL, Studien über Claudius Ptolemäus. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der griechischen Philosophie und Astrologie, Leipzig 1894, 136, 3; ‘a positive Anti-Lucretius’: W. HÜBNER 1984, 236; only Manilius 1. 485–491 is explicit.

An advantage of this approach is an enhancement of divine sublimity and an elevated idea of man: God dwells in him through ratio and knows himself in man. Manilius' anthropological digressions are among the noblest pages of Latin literature (4. 387–407; 866–935); from man's upright posture<sup>1</sup> he derives a demand for intellectual effort, since a thorough exploration of the heavens requires a man's full engagement. (4. 407 impendus homo est, deus esse ut possit in ipso, 'man must expend his very self before God can dwell in him'); thus he anticipates Seneca's (nat. praef.) praise of pure knowledge (Manil. 4. 368 altius est acies animi mittenda sagacis, 'the knowing mind's keen edge must cut more deeply').

It is true that his belief in predestination threatens to undermine all morality. Manilius knows this objection and contradicts it; in my opinion, without success (4. 108–117).

The 'universal' character of Manilius' work is not devoid of political overtones. He deliberately inserts 'Roman' excursuses into the Astronomica, whereas Cicero, in his turn, had introduced astronomy into his De re publica. Manilius gave his poem on the celestial globe to the Roman emperor, a cosmocrator, as a kind of poetic 'imperial orb'.<sup>2</sup>

Manilius' didactic methods can be called 'scientific' to some degree; in fact, he wants to convey τέχνη (ars) to his readers (3. 394),—not isolated facts or devices, but the intellectual mastery of a system. The author sticks to this purpose: first, he gives the basic elements, sketches the coordinates and takes a bird's eye's view of the whole. This serves, as it were, as a 'mental map',<sup>3</sup> in which the facts are entered successively in ever increasing refinement. As a result, the reader never lacks perspective and is constantly aware of the importance of coordinating and relating facts to each other; in fact, it is only the whole that determines the significance of an individual element.

Manilius' competence in astrology is limited, sometimes however superior to that of his editors.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Ov. met. 1. 84–86; A. WLOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, AHAW 1960, 2.

<sup>2</sup> W. HÜBNER 1984, 235.

<sup>3</sup> P. GOULD, Mental Maps, Boston 1986.

<sup>4</sup> ERRORS of Manilius: W. HÜBNER 1984, 147–148 with notes; errors of his editors: HÜBNER 1987.

Transmission

Our tradition is bad. G. P. Goold names 6 codices primarii and 26 codices secundarii. One of the most deplorable mistakes which all the manuscripts have in common is the lacuna after 5. 709. Its extent and possible content are disputed.

Our entire tradition is traced to the (lost) codex Spirensis (probably early 10th century), which Poggio brought to Italy. The following manuscripts are direct copies (and therefore precious despite their late dates): the Matritensis (M 31, Bibl. Nat. 3678, 15th century)<sup>1</sup> and the Londiniensis, which was recently discovered by M. Reeve (N; Bibl. Brit. Add. 22 808, 15th century).

The older manuscripts are derived from the same archetype (through a hyparchetype): Lipsiensis (L.; bibl. Univ. 1465, early 11th century), Gemblacensis (now Bruxellensis, Bibl. Reg. 10 012, 11th century) and Venetus (V; 11th century, burnt probably in 1687). Bentley knew readings of this manuscript through collations made by J. F. Gronovius (d. 1671); these were rediscovered in Leiden by M. Reeve. In this group the lines 4. 10–313 are misplaced (after 3. 399); and two lines (3. 188; 4. 731) and two half lines (5. 12–13) have been omitted.

Influence

Manilius never expected to find a large audience (2. 138). In antiquity he was not mentioned by name. Yet it is supposed that the Astronomica served as a textbook. His principal readers were Germanicus, the Aetna's author, Lucan, and Juvenal. The two last-mentioned owed to him important stimuli for their renewal of the genres of epic and satire. The following sayings became household words: nascentes morimur (4. 16; CE 2, 1489 Bücheler) and fata regunt orbem (4. 14; cf. Iuv. 9. 32).<sup>2</sup>

In the 4th century Firmicus Maternus in his 8th book paraphrased Manilius' teachings on the paranatellonta. Unlike Aratus (i.e. Germanicus) Manilius is hardly known in the Middle Ages.

Poggio discovered our author in 1417. Although Ptolemaeus, Firmicus, and Arabic authors continued to be the main sources of astrology for European readers, the Renaissance was the heyday of Manilius' influence. He was an alternative to Lucretius who had been discovered during the same period but whose philosophy was more 'dangerous'. Manilius immediately found poetic followers in L. Bonincontri and G. Pontano who, in their 'universal' approach to their subject, were his kindred spirits.<sup>1</sup> The great mathematician Regiomontanus was Manilius' first editor, later followed by eminent philologists (Scaliger, Bentley, Housman). Scaliger preferred Manilius to Ovid (Ovidio suavitate par, maiestate superior, 'equal to Ovid in his charm, superior in his majesty'),<sup>2</sup> Wilamowitz praised him as 'a poet, and a true poet'.<sup>3</sup> On September 2, 1784, Goethe wrote the following lines of Manilius (2. 115–116) in the album on Mount Brocken: Quis caelum possit nisi caeli munere nosse, / et reperire deum, nisi qui pars ipse deorum est?, 'who could know heaven save by heaven's gift and discover God save one who shares himself in the divine?'. Poland's greatest poet, Mickiewicz (d. 1855), was also familiar with our author.<sup>4</sup> Half of the inscription on Franklin's bust is from Manilius (1. 104): eripuit caelo fulmen, mox sceptras tyrannis, 'he took away the lightning bolt from heaven, and then the scepters from the tyrants'.

<sup>1</sup> The beginning, which is lacking in the Matritensis, is found in the Urbinates 667 and 668, which were copied from it.

<sup>2</sup> Positive traces also in Nemesianus, Claudian, and Dracontius; those in Arnobius and Martianus Capella are less certain.

Editions: Ioh. REGIOMONTANUS (the famous mathematician and astronomer Johannes MÜLLER from Königsberg) Nürnberg sine anno, probably 1473/74. * editio Bononiensis 1474 (anonymous). * L. BONINCONTRI, Rome 1484. * J. SCALIGER, Parisiis 1579. * R. BENTLEY, London 1739 (published by his nephew). * A. E. HOUSMAN (TC), London 1903–1930 (repr.: 2 vols. 1972); ed. minor 1932. * J. VAN WAGENINGEN, Lipsiae 1915. * J. VAN WAGENINGEN (C), Amsterdam 1921. * G. P. GOOLD (TTr), London 1977, corr. 1992. * G. P. GOOLD, Leipzig 1985. * W. FELS (TTrN), Stuttgart 1990. * Book 1: J. MERKEL (Tr), Aschaffenburg 1844; 2nd ed. 1857. ** Ind.: Complete index of words in the edition by M. FAYUS (DUFAY) in usum Delphini, Paris 1679 and in: N. E. LEMAIRE, Poetae Latini minores. De re astronomica, Paris 1826. * M. WACHT, Hildesheim 1990. ** Bibl.: R. HELM, Nachaugusteische nichtchristliche Dichter. Manilius, Lustrum 1, 1956, 129–158. * W. HÜBNER 1984.

F. BOLL, Sphaera. Neue griechische Texte und Untersuchungen zur

<sup>1</sup> W. HÜBNER, Die Rezeption des astrologischen Lehrgedichts des Manilius in der italienischen Renaissance, in: R. SCHMITZ, F. KRAFFT, eds., Humanismus und Naturwissenschaften, Beiträge zur Humanismusforschung 6, Boppard 1980, 39–67.

<sup>2</sup> J. SCALIGER, 3rd edition of Manilius, Argentorati 1655, proleg. 18.

<sup>3</sup> Letter of July 2, 1894, quoted by V. STEGEMANN in his introduction to F. BOLL 1950, p. xvi.

<sup>4</sup> T. SINKO, Maniliusz i Mickiewicz, Eos 20, 1914, 165–169.

Geschichte der Sternbilder, Leipzig 1903 (repr. 1967). * F. BOLL, Kleine Schriften zur Sternkunde des Altertums, ed. by V. STEGEMANN, Leipzig 1950. * S. COSTANZA, Ci fu un sesto libro degli Astronomica di Manilio?, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, 5 vols., vol. 3, Urbino 1987, 223–263. * P. DAMS, Dichtungskritik bei nachaugusteischen Dichtern, diss. Marburg 1970, 15–37. * B. EFFE, Labor improbus—ein Grundgedanke der Georgica in der Sicht des Manilius, Gymnasium 78, 1971, 393–399. * E. FLORES, Contributi di filologia maniliana, Napoli 1966. * G. P. GOOLD, The Great Lacuna in Manilius, PACA 17, 1983, 64–68. * W. HÜBNER, Die Eigenschaften der Tierkreiszeichen in der Antike. Ihre Darstellung und Verwendung unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des Manilius, ZWG, suppl. 22, Wiesbaden 1982, esp. 453–634. * W. HÜBNER, Manilius als Astrologe und Dichter, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 126–320. * W. HÜBNER, Review of G. P. GOOLD's edition (s. above), Gnomon 59, 1987, 21–32. * W. HÜBNER, Grade und Gradbezirke der Tierkreiszeichen. Der anonyme Traktat De stellis fixis . . . , 2 vols., Stuttgart 1994. * F.-F. LÜHR, Ratio und Fatum. Dichtung und Lehre bei Manilius, diss. Frankfurt 1969. * F. PASCHOU, Deux études sur Manilius, in: G. WIRTH, K.-H. SCHWARTE, J. HEINRICH, eds., Romanitas-Christianitas. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte und Literatur der römischen Kaiserzeit, FS J. Straub, Berlin 1982, 125–153. * A. REEH, Interpretationen zu den Astronomica des Manilius mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der philosophischen Partien, diss. Marburg 1973. * M. D. REEVE, Some Astronomical Manuscripts, CQ 74, n.s. 30, 1980, 508–522, esp. 519–522. * E. ROMANO, Struttura degli Astronomica di Manilio, Accademia di scienze, lettere ed arti di Palermo, classe di scienze morali e filologiche, memorie 2, Palermo 1979. * H. RÖSCH, Manilius und Lucrez, diss. Kiel 1911. * C. SALEMME, Introduzione agli Astronomica di Manilio, Napoli 1983. * B. SOLDATI, La poesia astrologica nel Quattrocento. Ricerche e studi, Firenze 1906. * H. WEMPE, Die literarischen Beziehungen und das chronologische Verhältnis zwischen Germanicus und Manilius, RhM 84, 1935, 89–96. * G. VALLAURI, Gli Astronomica di Manilio e le fonti ermetiche, RFIC 32, 1954, 133–167. * J. VAN WAGENINGEN, Manilius, RE 14, 1928, 1115–1133. * A. M. WILSON, The Prologue to Manilius 1, in: PLLS 5, 1985, publ. 1986, 283–298.

GERMANICUS

Life and Dates

Germanicus Iulius Caesar was born on May 24, 15 B.C. His parents were Nero Claudius Drusus and Antonia. He was a nephew of Tiberius, and Augustus was his great-uncle. It was only after his father's death that he was given the agnomen of Germanicus. On Augustus' request Tiberius adopted him and Germanicus married Agrippina, a granddaughter of Augustus. Germanicus suppressed a riot in Pannonia (A.D. 7 and 8), participated in a campaign in Dalmatia (A.D. 9), and crowned his victories in Germany with a triumph (A.D. 17). He had been consul as early as A.D. 12. After a short stay in Rome he was ordered to go to the Orient; he died on October 10, A.D. 19, in Antioch under mysterious circumstances. His ashes were solemnly buried at Rome.

He was perhaps the most brilliant and popular prince of the Julio-Claudian family. Being an intelligent and educated man, he was equally admired for his military successes and for his oratorical and poetic gifts.<sup>1</sup> Of his poems (Plin. nat. 8. 155) his Latin adaptation of Aratus' Phaenomena has come down to us.<sup>2</sup>

His work was written after 14: Augustus has already been deified (558), and Germanicus uses Manilius. The addressee, therefore, is Tiberius or (if we take the emperor's divinity at face value) the immortalized Augustus, who, however, cannot be called 'father' (pater) by Germanicus. Since Germanicus in an edict sets great store by the fact that only Tiberius, not himself, is worthy of divine honors, it is a probable suggestion that Tiberius is the addressee of the Phaenomena.<sup>3</sup> Although Tiberius declined divine honors for himself, Germanicus had every reason to stress his own loyalty in such a way.

Survey of the Work

What we possess is a complete adaptation of Aratus: the proem is followed by a discussion of the constellations of the northern and southern sky, the circles of the sky, and the synchronisms of risings and settings. In addition we have fragments mostly referring to planets and weather signs; these are perhaps remains of or sketches for another work of Germanicus, not identical with the Phaenomena.

<sup>1</sup> Ov. Pont. 2. 5. 41-56; 4. 8. 65-78; fast. 1. 21-25; Tac. ann. 2. 83. 4.

<sup>2</sup> D. B. GAIN'S (edition, 17-19) plea for Tiberius' authorship is unconvincing; s. B. BALDWIN, The Authorship of the Aratus Ascribed to Germanicus, QUCC 36 n.s. 7, 1981, 163-172.

<sup>3</sup> U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, F. ZUCKER, eds., Zwei Edikte des Germanicus auf einem Papyrus des Berliner Museums, SPAW 1911, 794-821, esp. 796, line 27.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The body of the work (1–725) is a free adaptation of Aratus' Phaenomena (first half of the 3rd century B.C.); unlike his predecessor Cicero (and the epigone Avienus) Germanicus corrects the Greek poet's information with the aid of Hipparchus' (mid-2nd century) commentary on Aratus or of material derived from it. He supplements his model from further books (e.g. on catasterisms), without exceeding its dimensions. Of course he must have known astronomical globes and illustrations to Aratus. The unknown source of the fragments had supposedly been written in prose. Occasionally Manilius' influence is felt.<sup>1</sup> Germanicus diligently updated the Phaenomena both in form and content, thus replacing Cicero's version.

Literary Technique

In terms of literature Germanicus conformed to the high standards of post-Augustan time. He did not adhere slavishly to his model. New additions were some descriptions<sup>2</sup> and astral myths,<sup>3</sup> the invocation of Virgo Astraea (96–98) and the description of the zodiac (351–564). The proem exhibits substantial changes. The body of the poem consists of a larger number of self-contained sections, which are clearly kept separate from their context by means of ring composition and similar devices. On the whole the Latin text is more emotional and less graphic than its Greek model.

Language and Style

Language and meter follow the laws of Augustan poetry; however, direct imitation of Latin classics is relatively rare. This may be due to the nature of Germanicus' subject matter. An important advantage of his style is conciseness. Despite many additions his text is even slightly shorter than the original.

<sup>1</sup> 387; 562 (Manil. 1. 272); 71 (Manil. 5. 253); 184 (Manil. 5. 23).

<sup>2</sup> Ursa Maior 26–27; Cygnus 275–283; Orion 328–332; Argo 344–355; Corona Austrina 391 (first mentioned here).

<sup>3</sup> 70–72; 90–92; 157–173; 184–186; 235–236; 264; 275; 315–320; 363.

Ideas I and II

Germanicus is a teacher with heart and soul; he emphasizes the 'didactic' mode.

In agreement with the Stoics Germanicus regards the constellations as gods.<sup>1</sup> However, this idea is common knowledge in his time. Likewise his description of the Golden Age (103–119) develops the vulgate version—here deviating from Aratus (117–118).<sup>2</sup> Germanicus takes the stars seriously; fides and iustitia reign among them. He suppresses skeptical hints found in Aratus. His myths are rooted in a 'moral' view of the world.

Transmission

The broad transmission falls into two families (O and Z); O, which is divided into two branches, is lacunary, but it contains scholia. Z exhibits more corruptions; yet, it is not always inferior to O. In manuscripts of both classes there are illustrations, derived from illustrated manuscripts of Aratus; the best are found in the Leidensis (9th century).

Influence

Lactantius used Germanicus' work and even knew scholia on Germanicus; these were based on Aratus' commentators (ed. A. Breysig, Berlin 1867, 2nd ed. Lipsiae 1899). Priscian quoted one line and a half, which are not transmitted elsewhere (fig. 6). The Middle Ages learnt astronomy from Germanicus. In more recent times, no lesser a figure than Hugo Grotius (Syntagma Arateorum, Lugduni Batavorum 1600) at an age of 17 deserved especially well of our author.

Editions: UGO RUGERIUS, Bononiae 1474. * A. BREYSIG (T with scholia), Berlin 1867; Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1899. * D. B. GAIN (TTrC), London 1976. * A. LE BŒUFFLE (TTr), Paris 1975. ** Complete ind.: in the edition by A. BREYSIG 2nd ed., 62–92. ** Bibl.: A. TRAGLIA; W. HÜBNER (s. below); D. B. GAIN (s. editions).

L. CICU, La data dei Phaenomena di Germanico, Maia 31, 1979, 139–144.
* E. COURTNEY, Some Passages of the Aratea of Germanicus, CR 83 n.s. 19,

<sup>1</sup> 165; 180; 234; 440–441; 563; 601.

<sup>2</sup> E. NORDEN, Beiträge zur Geschichte der griechischen Philosophie, Leipzig 1892 (= Jahrbücher für classische Philologie, suppl. 19), 427.

1969, 138–141. * A. E. HOUSMAN, The Aratea of Germanicus, CR 14, 1900, 26–39, repr. in: J. DIGGLE, F. R. D. GOODYEAR, eds., The Classical Papers of A. E. HOUSMAN, Cambridge 1972, 2, 495–515. * W. HÜBNER, Die Astrologie der Antike, Berichte zur Wissenschaftsgeschichte 8, 1985, 7–24. * W. KROLL, Randbemerkungen, RhM n.s. 60, 1905, 555–557. * Id., Zu den Fragmenten des Germanicus, WKPh 35, 1918, 306–309. * A. LE BŒUFFLE, Notes critiques aux Aratea de Germanicus, RPh 47, 1973, 61–67. * A. LEGNER, ed., Sternenhimmel in Antike und Mittelalter, Köln 1987. * W. LUDWIG, Anfang und Schluß der Aratea des Germanicus, Philologus 112, 1968, 217–221. * T. MANTERO, Aemulatio ed espressività in alcuni excursus originali di Germanico, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, vol. 3, Urbino 1987, 201–221. * G. MAURACH, Aratos und Germanicus über den Schlangenträger, Gymnasium 84, 1977, 339–348. * Id., Aratus und Germanicus on Altar and Centaur, AClass 20, 1977, 121–139. * Id., Germanicus und sein Arat. Eine vergleichende Auslegung von V. 1–327 der Phaenomena, Heidelberg 1978. * W. MOREL, Germanicus' Aratea, CR 57, 1943, 106–107. * C. SANTINI, Il segno e la tradizione in Germanico scrittore, Roma 1977. * P. STEINMETZ, Germanicus, der römische Arat, Hermes 94, 1966, 450–482. * A. THIERFELDER, Adnotationes in poetas Latinos minores. 2. In Germanicum, RhM n.s. 91, 1942, 209–216. * A. TRAGLIA, Germanico e il suo poema astronomico, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 321–343. * L. VOIT, Arat und Germanicus über Lyra, Engonasin und Kranz, WJA n.s. 10, 1984, 135–144. * Id., Kassiopeia bei Arat und Germanicus, in: W. SUERBAUM, F. MAIER, G. THOME, eds., FS F. EGERMANN, München 1985, 81–88. * Id., Die geteilte Welt. Zu Germanicus und den augusteischen Dichtern, Gymnasium 94, 1987, 498–524.

C. BUCOLIC

CALPURNIUS

Life and Dates

The pastoral poet Calpurnius lived under Nero.<sup>1</sup> We may doubt if his cognomen Siculus refers to his homeland or to the Sicilian Muse of Theocritus, whose declared follower he is. In his poems he hides himself under the mask of Corydon. This figure is excluded from the higher ranks of society and leads a wretched life; in the amphitheater, he has to sit on the highest ranks among the poor (7. 26–27; 79–82); he even runs the risk of being exiled to Spain, until his patron, Meliboeus, who has access to the imperial court, takes pity on him (4. 29–49). From Meliboeus Corydon now hopes to get a little house (4. 152–159). If Meliboeus is to be identified with Piso, Calpurnius could be the author of the Laus Pisonis.

The 1st Eclogue dates from late 54 or early 55. The accession to the throne of young Nero who, from the mother's side, was a descendant of the Julii (1. 45), is praised in this poem as the return of the Golden Age (cf. Sen. apocol. 4. The comet of A.D. 54 announces a new age (1. 77–88). Ideas from Nero's inaugural speech are echoed (1. 69–73; Tac. ann. 13. 4. 2–4; Cass. Dio 61. 3. 1). Our poet identifies the emperor—as Nero himself had done—with Apollo (4. 87; 159; 7. 84). For the seventh eclogue we have a terminus post quem: Corydon assists at the emperor's games in his wooden amphitheater,<sup>2</sup> which was built in 57.

Survey of the Work

1: The herdsmen Corydon and Ornytus discover a prophecy of Faunus, which has been engraved in a beach tree. It says that with the accession of a new emperor a new age will begin. Corydon asks Meliboeus to let these lines get to the emperor's ears.

---

<sup>1</sup> For his date: G. B. TOWNEND, Calpurnius Siculus and the munus Neronis, JRS 70, 1980, 166–174; T. P. WISEMAN, Calpurnius Siculus and the Claudian Civil War, JRS 72, 1982, 57–67; for a different date (under Severus Alexander): E. CHAMPLIN, History and the Date of Calpurnius Siculus, Philologus 130, 1986, 104–112.

<sup>2</sup> Calp. 7; cf. Suet. Nero 12. 1; Tac. ann. 13. 31. 1.; Aur. Vict. epit. 5. 3.

2: The gardener Astacus and the shepherd Idas, both hopelessly in love with Crocale, vie with each other in their songs. Alternately, each of them praises his profession and his love. At the end the umpire, Thyris, declares that both are equally good and urges them to behave peacefully.

3: Iollas, who is searching for a lost cow, meets Lycidas. The latter is distressed because his girl, in a fit of anger, has left him. Iollas advises him to take the first step towards reconciliation and engraves Iollas' song of apology upon a cherry-tree's bark. In the meantime Tityrus, who had been sent out, has found the cow: a good omen.

4: After an introductory dialogue with Meliboeus, there follows an amoebaean song: Corydon and his brother alternately praise the new Golden Age and its 'god'. Meliboeus, who has access to the palace, will recommend both the song and the poet to the emperor.

5: Old Micon teaches Canthus how to raise goats and sheep.

6: Astylus and Lycidas quarrel; Mnasyllus, as an umpire, vainly tries to soothe them.

7: Back from Rome, Corydon describes to Lycotas the games he has watched in the wooden amphitheater; unfortunately he saw the emperor only from afar.

Sources, Models, and Genres

In all probability the description of the wooden amphitheatre is based on personal experience.

As a pastoral poet Calpurnius follows Theocritus and, still more, Virgil, whom he declares to be a god (4. 70). The 1st poem, which contains a prophecy, is reminiscent of Virgil's 4th eclogue. Calpurnius' 4th idyll unites elements from Virgil's 1st, 4th and 5th eclogues: the poet's trial and rescue, an interpretation of the new Golden Age, amoebaean song, and apotheosis. Moreover, in a collection of seven poems, the fourth one forms the center. In the final piece (Calp. 7), the 'return from Rome' harks back to Virgil's 1st eclogue. In addition to such exchanges and overlappings of elements of Virgil's pastoral poetry, Calpurnius also develops features omitted in Virgil's Eclogues, such as the instructions how to raise goats and sheep (Calp. 5), a 'georgic' element (cf. Verg. georg. 3. 295-477), which however is linked to pastoral life. The sixth eclogue transposes the description of a deer from Aeneid 7 back into an idyllic context, where it is appropriate. In the 3rd idyll we find a love letter, again rooted in bucolic song (cf. Theocr. 3; 11; 14; Verg. eccl. 2); finally in the last poem (Calp. 7) there is a description of the amphitheater and its games, seen, however, through a herdsman's eyes. Calpurnius, therefore, enlarges the bucolic genre, without, however, breaking up its limits. At every moment he is aware of the importance of singing herdsmen to the definition of his literary genre.

Literary technique

The book is a cycle of poems. Beginning, middle, and end of the collection are referred to the emperor (numbers 1; 4; and 7): The 2nd and penultimate poems have the character of an agon (2 and 6). The 3rd and 5th poems are didactic (love; cattle-raising). The longest poem occupies the center. The even numbers are dialogues throughout, the odd numbers contain longer monologues.

Calpurnius decorates the frame of each poem with special care. In a few strokes he is able to evoke a tangible situation. Eloquent details (e.g. writing on bark) enhance the credibility of the setting.

His character portrayal is rather subtle: the characters of the 2nd eclogue may be described in terms of ethos, those of the sixth in terms of pathos. The poet does not conceal that the gentle and noble emotions are more congenial to him. Corydon's relative simplicity is winning, if sometimes obscured by a client's calculating mind. We may believe him that he held Virgil in high veneration; his delicacy of feeling and his graceful style bear witness to this. The realism of the last two poems forms a lively contrast to the delicate pastel shades which dominate elsewhere.

Language and Style

Calpurnius' language is carefully chosen, but not excessively affected. Virgil as his model exerts a beneficial influence on him in matters of taste. His use of maxims is sparing (e.g. mobilior ventis, o femina, 'o woman, more inconstant than the wind' 3. 10). Rhetoric is not everywhere as pervasive as in the following hyperbole: te sine . . . mihi lilia nigra videntur, 'without you, lilies seem black to me' (3. 51). To the tradition of pastoral poetry Calpurnius contributed an element of gentleness and sweetness which influenced poetry far into the modern age.

Calpurnius' handling of meter<sup>1</sup> is careful: Calpurnius respects the long quantity of final -o; elision is limited to short vowels and (almost exclusively) to the first foot of the line (there is a total of no more than eleven elisions in 758 hexameters).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Our poet's self-portrayal is less unobtrusive than Virgil's and Horace's. The poor client Calpurnius, who is in need of protection, heralds the 'beggar poet', Martial.

In the 4th poem the apotheosis of Virgil (4. 70) precedes that of the emperor (84–146). Virgil appears as a new Orpheus (4. 64–69). Corydon's intention to play an instrument previously used by Tityrus (4. 58–63) implies high claims. Our poet self-critically remarks: magna petis, Corydon, si Tityrus esse laboras, 'you aim high, Corydon, if you strive to be Tityrus' (4. 64). Moreover, Calpurnius is aware of different stylistic levels within Virgil's eclogues: eclogues on emperors should not have so tender a sound as Virgil's poem to Alexis (ecl. 2); they should rather conform to Virgil's 4th eclogue. Undeniably, Calpurnius has a keen sense of style.

Ideas II

Typical of Calpurnius is a benevolent humanity reminiscent of Menander: in the 2nd eclogue the umpire advises the two singers to consider their competition a mere play and not to use valuable objects as stakes. He declares that both are equally good and urges them to behave peaceably. The 3rd poem recommends chivalrous conduct and Lycidas is ready to express his compunction as a first step towards reconciliation (3. 36–41). In the penultimate eclogue, however, there is no compromise possible and the honorable umpire resigns.

As for the portrayal of the emperor, the 1st eclogue emphasizes his love for peace and clemency (1. 54 and 59; cf. Seneca's De clementia). His play on the name of Augustus (1. 94) reflects the same idea. The central poem (Calp. 4) associates the emperor's name with those of <sup>1</sup> Cf. also J. M. BAÑOS, La puntuación bucólica y el género literario: Calpurnio y las Églogas de Virgilio, Emerita 54, 1986, 338–344.

Apollo and Jupiter (7. 84), the last poem identifies Nero with Mars and Apollo (7. 84). The distance between himself and his 'god', which Corydon had hoped to bridge with the help of Meliboeus, remains unaltered at the end of the collection (7. 79–84). As Virgil had done in the 1st eclogue, Calpurnius intimates here that the new regime is far from having solved all problems. Corydon is as poor as he had been, and persons clothed cheaply have no access to the emperor.

Transmission

All our manuscripts have the same lacunae (after 4. 116 and 152); this means that they originate from a common archetype. The better tradition is found in the first class, represented by the Neapolitanus V A 8 (N; early 15th century) and the Gaddianus Laurentianus plut. 90. 12 inf. (g; early 15th century). The second class (V) consists of deteriores; for 1. 1–4. 12 the Parisinus 80. 49 is valuable (P; 11th or 12th century). It was left to M. HAUPT to separate Nemesianus' eclogues from those of Calpurnius.<sup>1</sup>

Influence

Calpurnius influenced many authors: Nemesianus (last quarter of the 3rd century), Modoinus, bishop of Autun (Carolingian epoch), Marcus Valerius (12th century), Petrarch (14th century), Ronsard (16th century). Calpurnius inspired Sanazaros' (d. 1530) Arcadia and Guarini's (d. 1612) Pastor fido as well as the works of neo-Latin poets.<sup>2</sup> Fontenelle (d. 1757) preferred Calpurnius' 1st eclogue to Virgil's 4th eclogue (Discours sur la nature de l'éplogue). Gessner (d. 1788) imitated Calpurnius' 2nd and the 5th poem in his Lycas und Milon and his Tityrus, Menalcas.

Editions: ANDREAS, Bishop of ALERIA (together with Silius Italicus), Romae apud C. SWEYNHEIM et A. PANNARTZ 1471. * H. SCHENKL, Calpurnii et Nemesiani Bucolica, Leipzig 1885, new edition in: J. P. POSTGATE, Corpus Poetarum Latinorum, vol. 2, London 1905. * C. H. KEENE (TC, together with Nemesianus), London 1887, repr. 1969. * J. W. DUFF and A. M. DUFF, in: Minor Latin Poets, 2 vols., London 1934, rev. 1935, 209–285. * D. KORZENIEWSKI (TTTrN, together with the Carmina Einsidlensia), Hirtenge-dichte aus Neronischer Zeit, Darmstadt 1971. * J. AMAT (TTr), Paris 1991. * eccl. 4: B. SCHRÖDER (C), s. below. ** Ind.: Complete ind. in the edition by Schenkl. ** Bibl.: R. VERDIÈRE, Le genre bucolique à l'époque de Néron: Les Bucolica de T. CALPURNIUS Siculus et les Carmina Einsidlensia. Etat de la question et prospectives, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1845–1924.

<sup>1</sup> M. HAUPT, De carminibus bucolicis Calpurnii et Nemesiani, Berlin 1854 (= Opuscula 1, Leipzig 1875, 358–406).

<sup>2</sup> W. P. MUSTARD, Later Echoes of Calpurnius and Nemesianus, AJPh 37, 1916, 73–83.

G. BINDER, in: B. EFFE, G. BINDER, Die antike Bukolik, München 1989, 112–130. * A. T. FEAR, Laus Neronis. The Seventh Eclogue of Calpurnius Siculus, Prometheus 20, 1994, 269–277. * W. FRIEDRICH, Nachahmung und eigene Gestaltung in der bukolischen Dichtung des T. Calpurnius Siculus, diss. Frankfurt 1976. * D. KORZENIEWSKI (s. editions; with further bibl.). * J. KÜPPERS, Die Faunus-Prophezeiung in der ersten Ekloge des Calpurnius Siculus, Hermes 113, 1985, 340–361. * C. MESSINA, T. Calpurnio Siculo, Padova 1975. * G. SCHEDA, Studien zur bukolischen Dichtung der neronischen Epoche, diss. Bonn 1969. * B. SCHRÖDER, Carmina non quae nemorale resultent. Ein Kommentar zur 4. Ekloge des Calpurnius, Frankfurt 1991 (bibl.). * G. SORACI, Echi virgiliani in Calpurnio Siculo, in: Atti del Convegno di Studi virgiliani, Pescara (1981) 1982, vol. 2, 114–118.

Appendix: The Carmina Einsidlensia

The two anonymous pastoral poems from codex 266 of the monastery of Einsiedeln (10th century) were in all probability written after the burning of Rome (A.D. 64), supposedly by two different authors. The praise of Nero is overdone. No wonder that some scholars thought of parody (wrongly but not unjustly).

Editions: H. HAGEN, Philologus 28, 1869, 338–341 (ed. princeps). * S. LÖSCH, Die Einsiedler Gedichte, diss. Tübingen 1909. * D. KORZENIEWSKI (TTr, bibl.), s. Calpurnius. ** Bibl.: s. Calpurnius.

G. BINDER (s. Calpurnius) 130–143. * W. SCHMID, Panegyrik und Bukolik in der neronischen Epoche. Ein Beitrag zur Erklärung der Carmina Einsidlensia, BJ 153, 1953, 63–96.

D. DRAMA

SENECA

S. chapter III C, pp. 1158–1204

E. FABLE

LATIN AESOPIC FABLES IN VERSE

Fable<sup>1</sup> is an old popular genre. Its vehicle is prose. Entire collections of fables in verse are not known before Phaedrus.<sup>2</sup>

Theon (progymn. 3) defines fable as λόγος ψευδῆς εἰκονίζων ἀλήθειαν. In this broad sense (μῦθος, fabula) it becomes possible to speak even of the fabula of a tragedy.

In a narrower sense a fable is a short narrative of an action conveying some lesson in worldly wisdom. Lessing's definition runs as follows: 'If we reduce a general moral truth to a special case, and embody this case, as if it were real, in a story, in which a spectator may recognize that general truth, this sort of fiction is called a fable.'<sup>3</sup> This is a pertinent description; however, even in his own fables, Lessing runs the risk of overvaluing moral standards. The worldly wisdom of fables is mostly down-to-earth. In early times fables were invented in specific situations (Aristot. rhet. 20; 1393 a 22–1394 b 18; on this crucial passage s. Literary Technique).

---

<sup>1</sup> Fabula means 'tale'. In Greek it is called αἶνος, μῦθος, λόγος; the term ἀπόλογος does not appear before Latin literature.

<sup>2</sup> The Greek poet Babrius wrote his fables after Phaedrus; but Babrius influenced Avianus, who lived in a later epoch.

<sup>3</sup> Abhandlung über die Fabel 1759, § 1, at the end. According to this moral perspective, in Lessing's fable, the fox, by flattering the raven, obtains a poisoned morsel and dies ('I wish you would always get only poison for your flatteries, damned wheedlers!'). Lessing underestimates the sober realism of fable.

Greek Background

Fables are attested in the Orient long before the Greek period; as a popular form they are liable to come up spontaneously again and again; Homer does not use them.

In the first phase of their development as a literary form fables occur sporadically in varying literary contexts. Beginning with Hesiod, who understands the peasant's mind, fables appear in poetry.<sup>1</sup> The legendary slave Aesopus is a figure embodying popular wisdom; the tradition of fable was attached to him. The increasing popularity of fables in Greek literature may be owing to the rising social importance of peasants and citizens in Greece; yet, fable is limited to certain types of text (the Attic orators, for instance, eschew it).

There is a special affinity of fables to genres adopting popular features, such as iambus, comedy, and diatribe, to which Rome added satire. The witty, jeering character of many fables is indicative of influences from Greek iambographers. Occasionally an impact of cynic philosophy is felt.<sup>2</sup> Their graphic vividness makes fables a fruitful means of teaching: The rhetorical progymnasmata (Theon, probably 1st–2nd century A.D.), included exercises such as enlarging a fable, condensing it or moulding it into a dialogue.

A second historical phase gave rise to collections of fables in prose, beginning with the Δισώπεια of Demetrius of Phaleron; his work went lost in the 10th century A.D. Supposedly there had been Latin prose adaptations of this collection. The papyrus Rylands 493 (around A.D. 100–150) contains fables, perhaps from Demetrius' collection; there, promythia define the cases to which the fable applies, while epimythia verbalize the resulting general truth.

The largest surviving collection of Egyptian fables in prose, the Recensio Augustana, might ultimately be traced to the early 2nd century A.D.<sup>3</sup> It contains over 230 fables (codex Monacensis 564).

The third stage of fable's history begins with Phaedrus. Now, for the first time, the book of fables gains the literary form of a collection of poems. At a proper distance there follow a Greek, Babrius, and a Latin versifier, Avian.

<sup>1</sup> Fable in literature: Hes. op. 202–212; Archil. fragg. 48; 81–83; 89–96 DIEHL; Semonides of Amorgos 8; 11; Aeschyl. frg. 231 METTE; Ag. 716; Aristoph. av. 474; vesp., 566; 1401–1402; 1427–1428; 1435–1436; Herodot. 1. 141. 1; Plat. Alc. 1. 123 a; Xen. mem. 2. 7. 13; Callim. (polemic) fragg. 192; 194 PFEIFFER.

<sup>2</sup> Phaedr. 4. 21; 4. 12; perhaps also 3. 3; 4; 7; 15; 17.

<sup>3</sup> For a later date (4th century) s. the note after the next.

Roman Development

Ennius put into verse the fable of the crested lark (sat. 21, p. 207 V.), Lucilius that of the lion's den (980–989 M. = 1074–1083 Kr.), Horace that of the town mouse and the country mouse (sat. 2. 6. 79; cf. also epist. 1. 1. 73; 1. 3. 18); Livy has Menenius Agrippa tell the famous story of the limbs' riot against the stomach (2. 32. 9; cf. Aes. 130). All these are isolated fables, inserted into texts of other literary genres.

Phaedrus' independent collection of versified fables set a new trend.<sup>1</sup>

The existence of lost prosaic rudiments (an Aesopus Latinus) is controversial. It may be taken for certain that Phaedrus and Babrius used older material. The fable collection called 'Augustana' dates from the 4th century at the latest;<sup>2</sup> it may, however, in some cases be a correct reproduction of the model also used by a versificator. It is open to question if Phaedrus and Babrius had the same source or different sources. Sometimes both unanimously differ from the vulgate known to us from elsewhere. This proves that there were more sources than those known to us.

Literary Technique

Fables, while talking of animals, mean men; hence, there are links between fable and allegory. The use of the term 'fox' for a shrewd man, for instance, may be understood as a 'metaphor, maintained throughout the text'—that is, according to classical theory, an allegory. By transposing the action into a foreign and lower milieu, the author renders his message acceptable to the reader and avoids offending him. A rhetorical analysis, as advanced by Aristotle, permits a more profound understanding of the texts:

According to Aristotle,<sup>3</sup> fables combine παράδειγμα and ἐνθύμημα: the narrative (which forms the body of the fable) serves as an 'example', whereas an 'enthymeme' is placed either at the beginning (as a promythion) or, better, at the end (as an epimythion) to unfold the 'lesson' (the fabula docet). In practice the poets show their mastery by relating and connecting these two different elements in various ways: the lesson need not always be verbalized expressly outside the narrative; it may also be contained in a speech of one of the characters.<sup>1</sup> Sometimes the very choice of the protagonist suffices to evoke in the reader's mind remembrances allowing the author to dispense with an epimythion. In Phaedrus, promythia and epimythia are internally linked to the narrative: they offer reference points for the development of the action.

<sup>1</sup> In his classes of rhetoric Quintilian had his students put versified fables into prose (inst. 1. 9. 2).

<sup>2</sup> F. R. ADRADOS, Gnomon 42, 1970, 46–47 with bibl.

<sup>3</sup> Aristot. rhet. 20; 1393 a 22–1394 a 18.

The composition of fables is too manifold to be reduced to mechanical formulas. Brevitas is an important principle, all the more so since, in rhetorical theory, it is a traditional constituent of narratio. Phaedrus, therefore, aims especially at unifying his action and avoiding unnecessary delay. He confines descriptive detail to what is absolutely necessary:<sup>2</sup> everything is subordinated to the exposition of a given moral conflict, thus immediately preparing the epimythion. The individual fables are not lacking in composition; each of them forms a composite unit. Complex form reflects a complex content.<sup>3</sup> Brevity is enhanced by the use of animal names: the very word 'fox' directs the reader's expectations concerning the role of the figure in question. What is more, in a given fable the specific assortment of animal names predetermines the plot and establishes the framework for its reception.

Consistency of characters is typical of classical fable; hence, its preference for animals with their fixed patterns of behavior. Along with animals, of course, there are other possible actors: well defined types of men, plants, or even lifeless objects.

Neighboring types of texts influencing fable are e.g. Aitia (Aristoph. av. 471; Platon Phaed. 60 b), short stories, farces, satires, anecdotes, parodies (cf. the War of Frogs and Mice), mythological tales on animals; typical literary sub-species are the 'flytings' of animals (Phaedr. 4. 24) or plants (Babr. 64).<sup>4</sup>

Language and Style

In fable language and style serve to elaborate moral conflicts (s. Phaedrus). Ellipsis and brevity help accelerate the speed of the narrative.

<sup>1</sup> Phaedr. 1. 26; 4, 18; E. Perry 1940, 401.

<sup>2</sup> Lessing pilloried some of Phaedrus' blunders (in: Abhandlungen über die Fabel. IV), e.g. the grotesque idea of the 'swimming' dog whose image is reflected in the churned-up water, which is anything but mirror-like.

<sup>3</sup> F. R. ADRADOS, Gnomon 42, 1970, 45.

<sup>4</sup> E. LEIBFRIED 1967, 27-33.

Animal names form a linguistic code, which is to be deciphered physiognomically. Phaedrus highlights the construct and privileges his point by evidencing his point by means of abstract nouns such as: corvi deceptus stupor (s. Phaedrus). His treatment of language reveals a tension between the surface structure of the narrative and the deep structure of the moral ideas. Hence the simultaneous presence of 'two tonalities' in Phaedrus' fables.

Another variety of brevity is aphorism. Fable shows a preference for play upon words and the use of proverbs.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

According to Phaedrus (3 prol. 33–37) the genre of fable was invented because the servitus obnoxia dared not speak its mind.<sup>2</sup> In an epoch of general slavery such as the imperial period fable gained a new function. Social conditions had already contributed to the genesis of the early fable attested in Hesiod as well as to the invention of the figure of Aesopus who allegedly was a slave. Nevertheless, society does not explain everything. Phaedrus knows another aspect which does not contradict the above explanation but slightly qualifies it: fable is meant to procure both 'pleasure' and 'instruction'; it raises laughter (risum movet) and gives advice (consilio monet; Phaedr. 1, prol. 2–3).

Ideas II

As a deeply concerned observer of Roman life, Phaedrus put the stamp of his personality on the genre of fable. By transposing human relationships into the exotic realm of animals he defamiliarized our world and revealed its immorality. Phaedrus is a defender of morals; but he is also aware of man's powerlessness in face of the triumph of evil.

In Phaedrus two conflicts cross: one of them is between physical strength and weakness, the other between moral superiority and inferiority. Often, though not always, physical strength is combined with moral failure. The individual fable can be centered on a figure which is morally superior; the negative side can be represented even by two figures.

<sup>1</sup> B. E. PERRY 1959, 25.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Phaedr. 4. 1; 1. 30. 1; 3 epil. 34; 2. 6. 1.

In accordance with the aim of fable, psychology remains rather abstract: the characters of animals do not show individual features but impersonate a determined force in a conflict; such a 'black-and-white' technique hardly admits subtler shades.

Several Roman features conspire in Latin verse fable: a keen eye for human relationships and social life, a sense of power, and a delight in embodying psychological insights both in brief maxims and graphical allegories.

Editions: G. THIELE, Der lateinische Aesop des Romulus und die Prosafassung des Phaedrus, Heidelberg 1910. * H. C. SCHNUR, Fabeln der Antike (TTr), Zürich 2nd ed. 1985 (rev. by E. KELLER). * C. ZANDER, Phaedrus solutus vel Phaedri fabulae novae XXX, Lund 1921. * See also the bibliographies to individual authors, esp. Phaedrus and Avianus. ** Bibl.: W. BRIEGEL-FLORIG, Geschichte der Fabelforschung in Deutschland, diss. Freiburg 1965. * H. LINDNER, Bibliographie zur Gattungspoetik (5). Theorie und Geschichte der Fabel (1900–1974), Zeitschrift für französische Sprache und Literatur 85, 1975, 247–259. * P. HASUBEK, Literatur zur Fabel seit 1945, in: P. HASUBEK, ed., Fabelforschung, Darmstadt 1983, 385–389. * P. CARNES, ed., Fable Scholarship. An Annotated Bibliography, New York 1985.

F. R. (ODRÍGUEZ) ADRADOS, Les collection de fables à l'époque hellénistique et romaine, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, 1983, 137–195. * F. R. ADRADOS, O. REVERDIN, eds., La fable, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, Vandœuvres-Genève (1983) 1984. * F. R. ADRADOS, Historia de la fábula greco-latina, vol. 1, parts 1 and 2: Introducción y de los orígenes a la edad helenística, Madrid 1979; vol. 2, La fábula en época imperial romana y medieval, Madrid sine anno (1985). * H. BADSTÜBER, Die deutsche Fabel von ihren Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, Wien 1924. * R. DITHMAR, Fabeln, Parabeln und Gleichnisse, München 1970. * R. DITHMAR, Die Fabel. Geschichte, Struktur, Didaktik, Paderborn 1971, 4th ed. 1978. * K. DODERER, Fabeln, Formen, Figuren, Lehren, Zürich 1970. * S. EICHNER, Die Prosafabel Lessings in seiner Theorie und Dichtung. Ein Beitrag zur Ästhetik des 18. Jh., Bonn 1974. * W. FREYTAG, Die Fabel als Allegorie. Zur poetologischen Begriffssprache der Fabeltheorie von der Spätantike bis ins 18. Jh., I, MLatJb 20, 1985, 66–102. * W. GEBHARD, Zum Mißverhältnis zwischen der Fabel und ihrer Theorie, DVjs 48, 1974, 122–153. * P. HASUBEK, ed., Die Fabel. Theorie, Geschichte und Rezeption einer Gattung, Berlin 1982. * P. HASUBEK, ed., Fabelforschung, Darmstadt 1983 (= WdF 572). * N. HOLZBERG, Der Äsop-Roman, Tübingen 1992. * K. HOPKINS, Novel Evidence for Roman Slavery, Past and Present 138, 1993, 3–29. * H. R.

JAUSS, Untersuchungen zur mittelalterlichen Tierdichtung, Tübingen 1959. * T. KARADAGLI, Fabel und Ainos. Studien zur griechischen Fabel. Königstein 1981. * F. P. KNAPP, Von der antiken Fabel zum lateinischen Tierrepos des Mittelalters, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, 1983, 253–300. * L. KOEP, Fabel, in: RLAC 7, 1969, 128–154. * F. LASSERRE, La fable en Grèce dans la poésie archaïque, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, 1983, 61–103. * E. LEIBFRIED, Fabel, Stuttgart 1967, 3rd ed. 1976. * E. LEIBFRIED, J. M. WERLE, eds., Texte zur Theorie der Fabel, Stuttgart 1978. * G. E. LESSING, Abhandlungen über die Fabel (1759), in: Gesammelte Werke, vol. 4, Berlin 1955. * E. LEUSCHNER, Persona, Larva, Maske. Ikonologische Studien zum 16. bis frühen 18. Jh., diss. Heidelberg 1996, Frankfurt 1997, esp. 247–260 (with bibl.). * A. MAYER, Studien zum Aesoproman und zu den aesopischen Fabeln im lateinischen Mittelalter, Programm Lohr 1916–1917. * K. MEULI, Herkunft und Wesen der Fabel, Schweizerisches Archiv für Volkskunde 50, 1954, 65–88. * T. NOEL, Theories of the Fable in the Eighteenth Century, New York 1975. * M. NØJGAARD, La fable antique, 2 vols., København 1964–1967. * M. NØJGAARD, La moralisation de la fable: D'Ésope à Romulus, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, 1983, 225–242. * B. E. PERRY, The Origin of the Epimythium, TAPhA 71, 1940, 391–419. * B. E. PERRY, Aesopica I, Urbana 1952. * B. E. PERRY, Fable, StudGen 12, 1959, 17–37. * B. E. PERRY, Demetrius of Phalerum and the Aesopic Fables, TAPhA 93, 1962, 287–346. * M. PUGLIARELLO, Le origini della favolistica classica, Brescia 1973. * RODRÍGUEZ s. ADRADOS. * M. STAEGE, Die Geschichte der deutschen Fabeltheorie, diss. Basel 1929. * D. STERNBERGER, Figuren der Fabel, Berlin 1950. * H. VAN THIEL, Sprichwörter in Fabeln, A&A 17, 1971, 105–118. * J. A. THOMSON, The Art of the Logos, London 1935. * U. USING, Studien zur griechischen Fabel, Lund 1930. * R. VAN DER MEULEN, Luther's 'Betrogen zur Warheit' and the Fables of Erasmus Alberus, Germanic Review 52, 1977, 5–16. * O. WEDDIGEN, Das Wesen und die Theorie der Fabel und ihre Hauptvertreter in Deutschland, Leipzig 1893. * O. WEINREICH, Fabel, Aretalogie, Novelle, Heidelberg 1931.

PHAEDRUS

Life and Dates

Phaedrus was born in Pieria, the country of the Muses—if 3 prol. 17 is to be taken literally; he enjoyed, however, a Latin education (cf. the quotation from Ennius, epil. 34). The heading of his collection of fables shows that he was one of Augustus' or Tiberius' freedmen. He was active as an author under Tiberius and his successors.

The first two books of fables were written under Tiberius; in the 3rd book our poet asks one Eutyches for help (prol. 2), perhaps identical with the charioteer influential under Caligula (around 40). An aging Phaedrus added successively a 4th and a 5th book.

The considerable differences in size among the books suggests that what we read is only an extract. Therefore we can dispense here with a structural analysis of the work.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Aesopic fable<sup>1</sup> is a popular genre; traditionally it is written in prose. Before Phaedrus, individual fables in verse had been incorporated into texts of other genres. However, he was the first to publish an entire collection of versified fables.

His main source was probably a collection of fables written in Latin prose; in late antiquity, the editor of the 'Romulus' collection would use similar material and, in addition, a text of Phaedrus which was more complete than ours.

In his 1st book Phaedrus declares that he totally depends on Aesopus (1 prol. 1), later on he becomes more and more independent. The moral sermons of Cynic philosophers offered further material;<sup>2</sup> even personal observation (5. 7) and invention (4. 11) cannot be excluded. He perspicaciously predicted that readers would ascribe his successful poems to Aesopus and the less attractive ones to himself (4. 21. 3-5). He personally ascribed 'invention' (invenire) to his Greek source, 'perfection' (perficere) to himself (4. 21. 8). In the prologue to his last book he used Aesop's name only as a 'trade-mark' (3 auctoritatis . . . gratia): his new ware would sell better under a venerable name.

Literary Technique

Each book of fables has a personal prologue and an epilogue; and the poet does not hesitate to speak of himself even on other occasions (3. 10; 4. 2; 5. 21; 25).

Phaedrus clearly verbalizes the lesson of each fable at its end (in an epimythion) or at its beginning (in a promythion). These passages were often deemed disturbing, inconvenient or self-contradictory. Yet these are questions of taste. If a fable (e.g. 4. 11) admits several—even contradictory—interpretations this is a feature it has in common with life. The authenticity of some of the explanatory passages has been doubted, justly, as far as the two last lines of 1. 13 are concerned.

<sup>1</sup> S. the relevant chapter, above pp. 996-1002.

<sup>2</sup> 3. 15; 4. 12; 15-16; 20; 5. 8; appendix 2; 5.

In most of his fables Phaedrus adheres to the principle of brevity, which is a part of the genre's basics (cf. 1. 10. 3). However, he is perfectly able to construct longer narratives; the more ample texts usually show him stating his case.

Language and Style

Phaedrus' language shuns rhetoric; on the whole he conforms to the ideal of a simple and clear style which is appropriate to fables. One should neither deny nor overemphasize the presence of vulgar elements. A calculated variatio of synonyms makes his style both colorful and elegant.<sup>1</sup> Phaedrus' use of abstract nouns gives evidence of his mastery, an example is the key role of stupor in the following sentence: tum demum ingemuit corvi deceptus stupor, 'then finally the raven's beguiled stupidity groaned' (1. 13. 12). The same is true of personifications (e.g. Religio 4. 11. 4).

Phaedrus' senarii are reminiscent of old Latin drama, much unlike the trimeters of the Augustans or of Phaedrus' contemporaries. This lends to his fables a somewhat old-fashioned and slightly popular touch. However, he follows his own laws, once he established them, with rigor.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Phaedrus often mentions his own brevitas (2 prol. 12; 3 epil. 8; 4 epil. 7). In 3. 10. 59–60 he averts the reproach of exceeding succinctness. On the other hand, there is evidence for the relativity of brevitas: Phaedrus announces he will speak breviter and then goes on for 60 lines (3. 10. 2).

The public addressed by Phaedrus is educated and demanding in matters of literary taste (illiteratum plausum nec desidero, 'I do not long for the applause of uneducated people' 4 prol. 20, cf. also epil. 12 aures cultas). This fact deserves to be mentioned, since scholars sometimes are inclined to underrate 'school authors' in this respect. Knowing that he enriched Roman literature with a new genre (cf. already 2 epil.; 4 prol.) he promises immortality to himself and to his patrons (4 epil.). He is justly proud of having given the genre of fable a Roman and modern content: usus vetusto genere, sed rebus novis, 'I used an old genre but new subject matter' (4 prol. 13). Parodying a line of Euripides he administers to a nagging critic a proper snub (4. 7). Phaedrus assigns to his book of fables the double function of drawing a laugh and teaching worldly wisdom (1 prol. 3-4).

<sup>1</sup> M. MASSARO 1979.

Ideas II

In his preface our poet is compelled to ward off calumniatores. Hence he must insist on his stories being mere fiction. Actually, however, he does not confine himself to conveying to his readers practical wisdom of early Greek or Stoic and Cynic provenance. Rather, he is aware of the social background of fables: slaves who dared not speak their mind overtly did so indirectly by means of invented stories. Evidently Sejanus had taken personal offense at his remarks; so Phaedrus had to stress that he did not mean individual persons, but vita and mores in general (3 prol. 33-50). Be that as it may, it is significant enough that in an epoch of general servility Aesopic fable was raised to the rank of literature.

Tradition

The basis of our text is the Pithoeanus (P; 9th century), which was used by the first editor P. Pithou (today found in the Pierpont Morgan Library). A similar manuscript, the Remensis (R; 9th-10th century) was burnt in 1774. Fables 1. 11-13 and 17-21 are also contained in the scheda Danielis (Vaticanus Reginensis Latinus 1616; D; 9th-10th century), which derives from another branch of tradition. The Latin of D is (suspiciously) correct, that of PR exhibits some vulgar features. From Perotti's epitome (cf. Influence), which was published in the early 19th century, 30 new fables of Phaedrus could be retrieved (the 'Appendix'). In addition, we have 30 fables in medieval prose paraphrases, the reliability of which is evinced from the fables already known to us.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> C. ZANDER, Phaedrus solutus vel Phaedri fabulae novae XXX, Lund 1921. On the

Influence

Seneca (dial. 11. 8. 3) and Quintilian (inst. 1. 9. 2) did not know Phaedrus or ignored him, perhaps for caste-feeling. Martial, however, mentioned improbus Phaedrus by name (3. 20. 5) and referred to his jokes. About 400, Avianus wrote fables in eligiac distichs and mentioned Phaedrus' five books in his dedication to Theodosius. In late antiquity, a corpus of fables in prose was composed from Phaedrus, a Latin Aesop independent of him, and pieces from Pseudo-Dositheus. Since the text of Phaedrus used by the editor was more complete than ours, we can retrieve from this collection more than 20 additional fables of Phaedrus, unfortunately devoid of their metrical form. This so-called Romulus Corpus furnished the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and modern times with a rich supply of fables, though without Phaedrus' name. In the Middle Ages the Anonymus Neveleti (perhaps Walther, chaplain to King Henry II) translated 'Romulus' into English distichs. Niccolò Perotti (d. 1480) used the original text of Phaedrus; the 1st edition, however, had to wait until 1596 (P. Pithou). Luther wrote his fables in prose, and Lessing severely attacked Phaedrus' poetic fables. Yet, the great masters La Fontaine (d. 1695) and Krylov (d. 1844) brilliantly justified his principle of poetic development.

Editions: P. PITHOU, Autun 1596. * F. RAMORINO (TC) 1884, repr. Torino 1959 with additions by F. DELLA CORTE. * J. P. POSTGATE, Oxford 1919. * A. GUAGLIANONE, Torino 1969. * A. MARSILI, Pisa 1966. * B. E. PERRY (TTr, together with Babrius), London 1965. * O. SCHÖNBERGER (TTrN), Stuttgart 1979. * H. RUPPRECHT (TTrN), Mitterfels 1992. ** Ind.: A. CINQUINI, Index Phaedrianus, Milano 1905, repr. 1964. * O. EICHERT, Vollständiges Wörterbuch zu den Fabeln des Phädrus, Hannover 2nd ed. 1877, repr. 1970. * An Index nominum et omnium verborum is also found in the edition of GUAGLIANONE. ** Bibl.: L. TORTORA, Recenti studi su Fedro (1967–1974), BStudLat 5, 1975, 266–273. * F. R. ADRADOS, O. REVERDIN, eds., La Fable, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, Vandœuvres-Genève 1983 (publ. 1984). * H. MAC L. CURRIE (s. below).

F. R. ADRADOS, Les collections de fables à l'époque hellénistique et romaine, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 30, 1983, 137–195. * G. BARABINO, Osservazioni sul senario giambico di Fedro, in: G. FABIANO, S. SALVANESCHI, eds., Δεσμὸς κοινωνίας, Scritti di Filologia e Filosofia, Genova 1981, 89–

---

Romulus Corpus s. below. On the transmission of Phaedrus s. now A. ÖNNERFORS 1987.

122. * F. BERTINI, Il monaco Ademaro e la sua raccolta di favole fedriane, Genova 1975. * C. CAUSERET, De Phaedri sermone grammaticae observationes, diss. Paris 1886. * C. CHAPARRO GÓMEZ, Aportación a la estética de la fábula greco-latina: análisis y valoración de la brevisitas fedriana, Emerita 54, 1986, 123–150. * J. CHRISTES, Reflexe erlebter Unfreiheit in den Sentenzen des Publilius Syrus und den Fabeln des Phaedrus. Zur Problematik ihrer Verifizierung, Hermes 107, 1979, 199–220. * T. C. CRAVEN, Studies in the Style of Phaedrus, diss. McMaster University (Canada), 1973 (Microfiche copy: National Library of Canada, Ottawa). * G. GALLI, Fedro e Orazio, Paideia 38, 1983, 195–199. * P. GATTI, Le favole del monaco Ademaro e la tradizione manoscritta del Corpus fedriano, Sandalion 2, 1979, 247–256. * P. GRIMAL, Du nouveau sur les fables de Phèdre?, in: Mélanges P. WUILLEUMIER, Paris 1980, 143–158. * J. HENDERSON, The Homing Instinct. A Folklore Theme in Phaedrus, PCPhS 203, 1977, 17–31. * N. HOLZBERG, Die Fabel von Stadtmaus und Landmaus bei Phaedrus und Horaz, WJA 17, 1991, 229–239. * G. LAMBERTI, La poetica del lusus in Fedro, RIL 114, 1980 (1982), 95–115. * M. JAGODA LUZZATTO, Fedro, un poeta tra favola e realtà. Antologia. Con un saggio di L. MONDO, Torino 1976. * H. MAC L. CURRIE, Phaedrus the Fabulist, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 497–513. * M. MASSARO, Variatio e sinonimia in Fedro, in: InvLuc 1, 1979, 89–142. * M. MASSARO, Una caratteristica dello stile di Fedro: La variatio sermonis, in: Quaderni dell'A.I.C.C. di Foggia 1981, 49–61. * G. MORETTI, Lessico giuridico e modello giudiziario nella favola fedriana, Maia n.s. 34, 1982, 227–240. * M. Nøjgaard 1967, s. Latin Aesopic Fables in Verse. * A. ÖNNERFORS, Textkritisches und Sprachliches zu Phaedrus, Hermes 115, 1987, 429–453. * G. PISI, Fedro traduttore di Esopo, Firenze 1977. * G. THIELE, Der Lateinische Äsop des Romulus und die Prosa-Fassungen des Phädrus. Kritischer Text mit Kommentar und einleitenden Untersuchungen, Heidelberg 1910. * Further bibl. s. Latin Aesopic Fables in Verse.

F. SATURA

PERSIUS

Life and Dates

Aulus Persius Flaccus (A.D. 34–62)<sup>1</sup> was born at Volaterrae in Etruria; at the age of six he lost his father, a Roman knight of noble Etruscan descent. His stepfather died prematurely, too, and Persius grew up with his mother, his aunt, and his sister, to all of whom he would hold a lifelong affection. When he was twelve years old, he came to Rome to study with the famous grammaticus Remmius Palaemon and the rhetor Verginius Flavius. At the age of sixteen he became a disciple of the Stoic philosopher Annaeus Cornutus, who deeply influenced his intellectual development. Paetus Thrasea was another friend, who took a fatherly interest in him. Other members of his illustrious circle of friends and readers were the poet Caesius Bassus, who was much older than he, Calpurnius Staturo, the orator Servilius Nonianus, and the scholars Claudius Agathinus and Patronius Aristocrates. With Seneca, the courtier among philosophers, there was no deeper relationship. But Seneca's nephew, the young poet Lucan, sincerely admired Persius. Persius died of a gastric ailment at the early age of 28. Cornutus and Caesius Bassus took care of the publication of the unachieved satires. They suppressed the juvenilia, among which was a praetexta. In all probability the sequence of the satires in the book does not reflect the chronology of their genesis.<sup>2</sup> They are written in hexameters; a short choliambic poem was supposedly intended to serve as an introduction.

Survey of Works

Proem: Persius is not an inspired poet coming from the Hippocrene, but a semipaganus ('half-poet' or 'half-peasant'). What he brings is his personal, 'homemade' production (carmen . . . nostrum). He shuns both 'high' poetry alien to life and insincere clients' poetry.

---

<sup>1</sup> Vita from Valerius Probus' commentary; in the present chapter the author is greatly indebted to W. KISSEL's competent advice.

<sup>2</sup> Misleading: F. BALLOTTO, Cronologia ed evoluzione spirituale nelle satire di Persio, Messina 1964.

1: Persius keeps his distance to effeminate fashionable poetry and declares himself a follower of the great Roman satirists and of Old Comedy.

2: The gods are not corruptible by gifts, they regard the worshiper's heart.

3: Overcome your inner inertia and devote yourself to philosophy! This is the true path to mental health.

4: Would-be politicians, unacquainted with politics and leading a dissolute life, should know themselves.

5: Persius gives thanks to Cornutus, his teacher. Only the sage is free.

6: Use your riches, instead of hoarding them up for your heirs.

Satires 5 and 1 are the longest. The 6th satire is unfinished. Cornutus suppressed some lines at the end for the sake of congruity.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Persius' direct philosophical source is his teacher Cornutus, who imparted to him the knowledge he needed, and, what is more, educated him by setting a good example himself. Rather than a mere preacher of Stoicism (5. 64), Cornutus was a witness to the Stoic doctrine saying that only the sage is free (sat. 5): behind this Socratic teacher (cf. 5. 37) there is the true sage, Socrates, who gave his life for truth's sake (sat. 4). The same Socrates is reflected in Platonic dialogue; in fact, Persius (sat. 4) refers to the Pseudo-Platonic Alcibiades I.

This leads us from his sources to his models. There is a genuine Socratic touch to the principle of dialogue in the Satires. Persius' paradigms are Plato's dialogues and the diatribe in the Stoic and Cynic vein, the impact of which, both in form and content, is even more conspicuous in Persius than it was in Horace. Moreover, Persius was presumably influenced by the Mime. Persius himself refers to Old Athenian Comedy as an authority for his social criticism (1. 123–124), but instead of referring to contemporary politics he strives for statements that are universally valid.

Roman satire, of course, provided a significant literary background for his poetry with Lucilius (Pers. 1. 114–115; vita Pers. 10) as its founder, and Horace as our poet's classical predecessor. Though naming Lucilius as a source of inspiration, Persius does not imitate his attacks on living persons. As a master, Horace is more important for him. In theory Horace had not defined satire as poetry, while in practice he raised it to a special type of poetry, in which words had to meet higher requirements of truthfulness. The same may be said of Persius, who painted his vivid pictures against the fashionable mythological poetry which lacked intrinsic truth. Instead of praising donors of money, our poet praised Cornutus, who gave him food for thought.

In detail there are numerous borrowings from Horace, some of them programmatic (5. 14; cf. Hor. ars 47–48), and most of them skilfully altered. In the 6th satire there is an especial abundance of Horatian reminiscences (Pers. 6. 65 fuge quaerere; cf. Hor. carm. 1. 9. 13; Pers. 6. 76 ne sit praestantior alter, cf. Hor. sat. 1. 1. 40). Yet, Persius' laughter—if laughter there is—bears no resemblance to the relaxed smile of Horace.

Literary Technique

Persius conceives his satires as conversations—or as a 'collage' of bits and ends of a conversation ('condensed scenes'). However, the changes of speakers, for us, often remain open to discussion; moreover, the speakers do not assume the form of palpable characters. Dialogue often abruptly shifts to didactic discourse. Persius aims at producing the effect of casual everyday talk. The disposition of the whole is not supposed to become all too visible. Yet by returning at the end to his initial idea, Persius somehow gets full circle (sat. 1; 2; 3).

At first sight each satire falls into disparate parts; on closer inspection we realize, however, that the details are grouped around central themes (cf. above, Survey of the Work) and guiding metaphors.<sup>1</sup> Rarely does Persius expressly announce his central themes; he expects his readers to synthesize them from the accumulated details. Nor is there any systematic development of thought. Persius confirms his statements only by examples, without deducing them systematically.

Rhetorical devices—such as different types of repetition—help to bring home the lesson. Again and again Persius succeeds in immediately involving his reader: 'Time passes—even now, while I am talking' (5. 153; cf. Hor. carm. 1. 11. 7–8). Furthermore, frequent changes of speakers and scenes and an extremely picturesque style are meant to give an intellectual stimulus to the listener's mind. The same applies to our author's technique of quoting: Persius slightly changes his predecessor's wording, presupposing, however, that his reader remembers the original context (cf. 1. 116 with Hor. sat. 1. 1. 69–70). All this proves that he is addressing an educated public with an alert mind. Persius' literary technique is based on interaction with his readers; however, by not conforming to their expectations, he spurs their intellectual activity to the utmost. It is up to the reader to 'realize' fully each satire as a unity and, if possible, to proceed from words to thought and action.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. death (sat. 3), homosexuality (sat. 4), land and sea (sat. 6).

Language and Style

Persius cherishes the genus tenue: 'Let him, who wants to talk big, go and collect fog on Mount Helicon' (5. 7). Striving for absolute honesty, Persius tries to conform his words to his subject matter. In Lucan's<sup>1</sup> judgment, Persius' works have poetic quality. In this respect, poems can be tested like walls. Just knock at them and you will hear if they sound hollow (cf. sat. 5. 24–25). In Persius words keep their good and full meaning or they regain it. Words unfamiliar to us often come from everyday language (verbae togae 5. 14): our author's vocabulary is difficult only for modern readers, not for his contemporaries.<sup>2</sup> Yet his artificial composition had an unusual ring even to Roman ears. In fact, Persius yokes together his everyday words to form unexpected combinations: verbae togae sequeris, iunctura callidus acri, / ore teres modico, 'you follow the language of common life, with dexterous nicety in your combinations and a moderate rounding of the cheek' (5. 14–15). Such 'stimulating unions' are meant to challenge the reader and make him think.

This is an example of both the vividness and the difficulty of Persius' style: Disce, sed ira cadat naso rugosaque sanna, / dum veteres avias tibi de pulmone revello, 'attend, then, but drop that angry wrinkled snare from your nostrils, while I pull your old grandmothers out of the lungs of you' (5. 91–92). Aiming to confer as much reality as possible on his ideas, Persius shares Horace's preference for bold metonymy. Moreover, being a true poet, he is able to take metaphors literally, thus instilling new life into the Latin language.<sup>3</sup> His 'collage' technique of overlapping images strains the reader's mental flexibility to the utmost. Hypallage and emphatic conciseness add to the power of his style. Persius coined aphorisms: o curas hominum, o quantum est in rebus inane!, 'O the vanity of human cares! O what a huge vacuum man's nature admits!' (1. 1); o curvae in terris animae, o caelestium inanes!, 'O ye souls that cleve to earth and have nothing heavenly in you!' (2. 61); dicite, pontifices: in sancto quid facit aurum?, 'Tell us, reverend pontiffs, what good gold can do in a holy place?' (2. 69). Persius touches indeed the Stoic ideal of brevity: tecum habita, 'live at home = stay with yourself' (4. 52); quis leget haec?, 'who will read this?' (1. 2); vel duo vel nemo, 'one or two, which is as good as none' (1. 3); vive memor leti: fugit hora: hoc, quod loquor, inde est, 'live with death in your mind; the hour is fleeting; this saying of mine is so much taken from it' (5. 153).

<sup>1</sup> Vita Persii 5.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. W. KISSEL, Commentary 1990, introduction.

<sup>3</sup> W. KUGLER 1940.

In conformity with the laws of the genre, Persius' treatment of meter follows the technique of Horace's Satires; as can be seen from the use of synaloephe (so-called 'elision') and the admission of monosyllables at the end of the hexameter. Persius' preference for the caesura penthemimeres is in harmony with a general tendency to 'normalization' in the post-Ovidian use of the hexameter.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The theory underlying Persius' choice of words has been discussed in the previous section. The prologue reveals his poetic theory: the 'truthfulness' of Persius' poetry has to lead a war on two fronts. Two contrary types of lies menace it: on the one hand, a totally unrealistic mythological poetry; on the other, a deeply insincere poetry of clients.

In the prologue the poet with ostentatious modesty rejects the traditional act of drinking at the poetic Hippocrene, the 'mare's source' as he contemptuously calls it. Nevertheless, in the 5th satire the Muse is present. She summons Persius to reveal his innermost thoughts to his teacher, who shall verify their sincerity (5. 25). Our poet demythifies Callimachus' dialogue with Apollo's warning voice (hymn. Apoll. 105–112) into an inner dialogue with his teacher. To express adequately his debt to Cornutus, Persius resorts to the same lofty style, which he scorned in theory. Hence, the guiding principle of his authorship is not theory of style but appropriateness to the argument.

In Persius' view the poet is a teacher of society. But how does this go together with his giving up all claim to influence a large audience? His first concern is to find his own position. Personal honesty takes precedence over compliance with the public. His attitude to language and literature cannot be separated from his moral attitude.

Ideas II

Persius was a son of his age and did not live in an ivory tower but in a circle of educated men and, among them, oppositional senators. When alluding to Midas, whose barber buried the secret of his master's donkey's ears (1. 121), Persius might have had in mind Nero who was praised as a new Midas in the carmina Einsidlensia. Moreover, it is possible that Nero is the true addressee of the sermon directed to Alcibiades (sat. 4). Yet Persius is careful not to tie himself down, and his interpreters should respect this.

For our poet philosophy is almost religion. In this respect he reminds us of Marcus Aurelius or Epictetus. There is an entire satire (sat. 2) on misguided prayers as a consequence of moral decadence of man. The warmth of Persius' personal confessions sometimes seems to touch an Augustinian chord: quod latet arcana non enarrabile fibra, 'the unspeakable feelings which lie deep down among my heart-strings' (5. 29). For his conversion to philosophy, Persius has to thank his teacher, Cornutus, whom he respects more deeply than Alcibiades respected his teacher, Socrates. Persius evokes the great Greek sage as if he were present: 'Believe that Socrates is saying this.'

Persius is a serious believer in and an apostle of Stoicism. Yet he is far from being a narrow-minded doctrinaire. The figure of Socrates conjures up the atmosphere of Plato's dialogues. Persius views his relationship to his teacher in terms of 'astral friendship'—a Stoic approach; moreover, he describes it from his own experience and, finally, as a parallel to Horace's thanks to his father for having personally educated him. Wisdom (sat. 5), self-knowledge (sat. 4), and liberty (sat. 5) are crucial themes. It is surprising to find so much of an old man's wisdom in so young an author, a wisdom sometimes reminiscent of Horace's Epistles rather than of his Satires, but lacking the Venusine's forgiving humor. Anyway, both old and young people need philosophy (5. 64; Hor. epist. 1. 1. 24–25), an idea ultimately traced to Epicurus' Letter to Menoecus. In his unfinished sixth satire Persius discusses the right use of wealth; here, he is closer to Horace's carpe diem and deviates from Stoicism. He is less dogmatic than some of us may have imagined.

Transmission

The tradition of Persius is both broad—there are many manuscripts—and very good; it was the difficulty of the text which protected it against intrusions. A fragment of a palimpsest (folia Bobiensia) deserves to be mentioned for its age: Vaticanus Latinus 5750 (7th century). Textual critics rely on three excellent manuscripts: Montepessulanus Pithoeanus, bibl. med. 125 (P; 9th century, a codex of Juvenal); Montepessulanus (A; bibl. med. 212, 10th century); Vaticanus tabularii basilicae H 36 (B; 10th century). The two latter are copies of one archetype and are traced back to the so-called recensio of Sabinus (of A.D. 402). The choliambic lines have been entered into P by a later hand; in A and B they are found at the end; their subscriptio, however, shows that this position within the manuscript is owed to mere chance. There is no reason, therefore, not to consider the choliambic lines a prologue.

Influence

The work of Persius immediately found much resonance. Authors like Lucan (s. above), Martial (4. 29. 7–8), Quintilian (10. 1. 94) appreciated him. Both in antiquity and in the Middle Ages, teachers constantly exploited his pedagogical potential (cf. e.g. Jerome, adv. Rufin. 1. 16); in general, church fathers show a preference for Persius. He early attracted the attention of editors (Probus under the Flavians, and Sabinus in 402) and of commentators—his ‘obscurity’ (cf. Joh. Lydus, de mag. 1. 41) may have been an additional stimulus. The marginal and interlinear scholia of the older manuscripts, in their best part, originate from antiquity. Moreover, since the 9th century continuous commentaries were written, of which the Commentum Leidense deserves mention. Today the so-called Commentum Cornuti is ascribed to Heiric of Auxerre; in the 10th century Remigius wrote a commentary on Persius, as would do Paolo da Perugia in the 14th century. Dicta of Persius are found in Hrabanus Maurus, Rather of Verona, Genzo of Novara, and John of Salisbury. Individual aphorisms of our author were learnt by heart at school, and he was generally deemed an aureus auctor. Bernard of Clairvaux, trying to draw the attention of humanity on moral values, used Persius 2.69: Dicite, pontifices: in sancto quid facit aurum? (de mor. et off. 2. 7 = PL 182, col.

815 D). John of Auville (last quarter of the 12th century), however, in his Architrenius, depicted Persius—as an imitator of Horace—on the ‘Hill of Presumption’.

Luther, who wanted to banish satirists from school, quoted nevertheless Persius’ dictum on the souls, which are bent down to earth (2. 61).<sup>1</sup> Calvin would cite the lines (2. 69–70) once quoted by Bernard of Clairvaux:<sup>2</sup> another proof for the late medieval roots of Reformation.

Persius was known to Petrarch, Skelton, probably also to Spenser. Politian read him as a philosopher. Sir Thomas Wyatt’s (d. 1542) satires attest to his knowledge of Persius. In Shakespeare’s Hamlet, the words on Ophelia’s death (‘Lay her i’ the earth,/And from her fair and unpolluted flesh/May violets spring’) contain a reminiscence from Persius (1. 38–39), transmitted by the notes to Mantuanus’ elegies. Michel de Montaigne quoted our poet no fewer than 23 times.

Given his difficulty, Persius found few translators in the early modern age: there were two French (Abel Foulon 1544 and Guillaume Durand 1575) and one Italian (Giovanni Antonio Vallone 1576). English (Barten Holyday 1616) and Germans followed much later. No lesser a figure than Martin Opitz, by translating Persius’ Prologue into elegant Alexandrines (1639) opened a new page of this poem’s influence. Johann Samuel Adami (1674) published the first complete translation of Persius into German, followed in 1738 by a mordant critic, Johann Daniel Heyde, a disciple of Gottsched.

J. C. Scaliger<sup>3</sup> warned would-be poets against imitating Persius’ ostentation of abstruse erudition, instead of making themselves understood. He was contradicted by Isaac Casaubonus, who, in a dissertation attached to his epochal edition of Persius (1605), considerably furthered the interpretation of Persius and of satire in general. Persius experienced a real revival in a triad of young poets, John Donne (d. 1631), Joseph Hall (d. 1656), and John Marston (d. 1634). His colorful and vigorous language, however, remained alien to the ‘classics’ of Baroque satire (Boileau,<sup>4</sup> Pope), though they knew and even

<sup>1</sup> Luther, Op. ex. 17, 297; quoted in: O. G. SCHMIDT, Luthers Bekanntschaft mit den antiken Klassikern, Leipzig 1883, 36.

<sup>2</sup> G. F. HERING 1935, 29; 175.

<sup>3</sup> Poetices libri VII, sine loco (Lyon) 1561, repr. 1964, 149.

<sup>4</sup> Perse en ses vers obscurs, mais serrés et pressans, / Affecta d’enfermer moins de mots que de sens (L’art poétique 2. 155–156).

admired him. John Dryden translated and appreciated Persius (1693): according to him, preachers, instead of disputing about dogma, ought to take Persius as a model. Rachel (d. 1669) and Moscherosch (d. 1669) imitated the 2nd satire in German; the latter directed his version against hypocrites and pseudo-Christians. Persius' 3rd satire inspired Giuseppe Parini (d. 1799) to his masterpiece Il giorno. J. G. Herder (d. 1803) sensitively paraphrased the prologue and Satires 1, 3, and 5 in German verse. F. H. Bothe published a humorously Modernized Persius in his Vermischte satirische Schriften (Leipzig 1803). Persius was the favorite author of Immanuel Kant, and Goethe said that 'Persius hid bitterest indignation in sibylline utterances and expressed his despair in somber hexameters'.<sup>1</sup> The historian Friedrich Christoph Schlosser ranked Persius with Tacitus and took his message that the awareness of having led a righteous and faithful life is a greater bliss than all arts and luxuries (Universalhistorische Übersicht der Geschichte der alten Welt, 3, 1, Frankfurt/M. 1830, 419–421). Theodor Mommsen, however, in his Römische Geschichte, 4th ed. 1, 236, renewed the moralizing verdict of the medieval Architrenius, adding a salty dose of hostility to poetry: for him, Persius was 'the very ideal of an arrogant and anemic youth dedicated to poetry'. In his A Rebours (ch. 3) Joris-Karl Huysmans (d. 1907) noted the 'mysterious innuendos' of Persius, which, however, fail to move the reader. In the last years a debate was opened, as to whether Kafka is a modern Persius<sup>2</sup>—perhaps so, because both are equally uncompromising in matters of language and ethics?

Editions: Ulrich HAN (Gallus), Romae 1469 or 1470. * I. CASAUBONUS (TC), Paris 1605. * O. JAHN (T and scholia), Leipzig 1843, repr. 1967. * J. CONINGTON (TTrC), rev. by H. NETTLESHIP, Oxford 3rd ed. 1893, repr. 1967. * F. VILLENEUVE (TC), Paris 1918. * G. G. RAMSAY (TTr, together with Juvenal), London 1918. * O. SEEL (TTr), München 1950, 2nd ed. 1974. * W. V. CLAUSEN, Oxford 1956. * Id., Oxford 1992 (rev.) (together with Juvenal). * D. BO (TN, ind., bibl.), Torino 1969. * N. RUDD (Tr), Harmondsworth 1973. * A. LA PENNA, E. BARELLI, F. BELLANDI (TTrN), Milano 1979. * J. R. JENKINSON (TTrN), Warminster 1980. * R. H. HARVEY (TC), Leiden 1981. * L. GUY, W. BARR (TTrC), Liverpool 1987. * W. KISSEL (TTrC, bibl., fundamental), Heidelberg 1990. ** Ind., lexicon, concordance: L. BERKOWITZ, T. F. BRUNNER, Index verborum quae in saturis Auli Persi Flacci reperiuntur, <sup>1</sup> W.A. 1, 41 1st ed., 361 (37, 216).

<sup>2</sup> O. SEEL, edition 119.

Hildesheim 1967. * D. BO, Persii Lexicon, Hildesheim 1967. * P. BOUET, L. CALLEBAT, P. FLEURY, M. ZUINGHEDAU, Konkordanz zu den Satiren des Persius Flaccus, Hildesheim 1978. ** Bibl.: V. D'AGOSTINO, Nuova bibliografia su Persio (1946-1957), RSC 6, 1958, 63-72. * Id., Gli studi su Persio dal 1957 al 1962. Nota bibliografica, RSC 11, 1963, 54-64. * M. SQUILLANTE SACCONE, La poesia di Persio alla luce degli studi più recenti (1964-1983), ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1781-1812. * W. KISSEL, Commentary.

L. ALFONSI, Una praetexta Veii?, RFIC 95, 1967, 165-168. * W. S. ANDERSON, Part Versus Whole in Persius' Fifth Satire, PhQ 39, 1960, 66-81. * W. S. ANDERSON, Persius and the Rejection of Society, WZRostock 15, 1966, 409-416. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Echoes of Propertius, Mnemosyne 5, 1952, 307-333. * H. BEIKIRCHER, Kommentar zur 6. Satire des A. Persius Flaccus, WS suppl. 1, Wien 1969 (originally, diss. Wien 1966). * F. BELLANDI, Persio e la poetica del semipaganus, Maia 24, 1972, 317-341. * F. BELLANDI, Persio—dai verba togae al solipsismo stilistico. Studi sui Choliambi e la poetica di A. Persio Flacco, Bologna 1988. * B. BISCHOFF, Living with the Satirists, in: R. R. BOLGAR, ed., Classical Influences on European Culture A.D. 500-1500. Proceedings of an International Conference Held at King's College (1969), Cambridge 1971, 83-94. * E. BOLISANI, Persio imitato da Giovenale, AIV 121, 1962-1963, 367-389. * J. BRAMBLE, Persius and the Programmatic Satire, Cambridge 1974. * J. H. BROUWERS, Allitération, anaphore et chiasme chez Perse, Mnemosyne 26, 1973, 249-264. * G. BRUGNOLI, Persio e Properzio, RCCM 11, 1969, 190-202. * A. L. CASTELLI, La tecnica imitativa di Persio vista nelle sue caratteristiche e in riferimento alla II satira, RAIB 60, 1971-1972, 42-60. * T. CIRESOLA, La formazione del linguaggio poetico di Persio, Rovereto 1953. * W. V. CLAUSEN, Sabinus' Ms. of Persius, Hermes 91, 1963, 252-256. * P. COURCELLE, Saint Augustin lecteur des satires de Perse, RSR 27, 1953, 40-46. * M. DADONE, Appunti sulla fortuna di Fedro, II, Fedro e Persio, RSC 2, 1954, 79-86. * V. D'AGOSTINO, De A. Persii Flacci sermone, RIGI 12, 3-4, 1928, 11-32; 13, 1-2, 1929, 105-129; 13, 3-4, 1929, 21-39; 14, 1-2, 1930, 21-40; 14, 3-4, 1930, 75-96. * G. D'ANNA, Persio semipaganus, RCCM 6, 1964, 181-185. * C. DE SIMONE, Il nome di Persio, RFIC 96, 1968, 419-435. * C. S. DESSEN, Iunctura callidus acri. A Study of Persius' Satires, Urbana 1968. * D. DEVENUTO, F. IENGO, R. SCARCIA, eds., Gli auctores di Persio, Roma 1972. * J. P. ELDER, A Medieval Cornutus on Persius, Speculum 22, 1947, 240-248. * H. ERDLÉ, Persius. Augusteische Vorlage und neronische Überformung, diss. München 1968. * G. FARANDA, Caratteristiche dello stile e del linguaggio poetico di Persio, RIL 88, 1955, 512-538. * G. C. FISKE, Lucilius and Persius, TAPhA 40, 1909, 121-150. * G. C. FISKE, Lucilius, the Ars Poetica of Horace and Persius, HSPH 24, 1913, 1-36. * F. GHISALBERTI, Paolo da Perugia commentatore di Persio, RIL 62, 1929, 553-598. * R. GODEL, Réminiscences des poètes profanes dans les lettres de Saint

- Jérôme, MH 21, 1964, 65–70. * S. GRIMES, Structure in the Satires of Persius, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., Neronians and Flavians. Silver Latin I, London 1972, 113–154. * D. HENSS, Die Imitationstechnik des Persius, Philologus 99, 1955, 277–294. * G. F. HERING, Persius. Geschichte seines Nachlebens und seiner Übersetzungen in der deutschen Literatur, Berlin 1935. * I. K. HORVATH, Perse et Néron, StudClas 3, 1961, 337–343. * A. E. HOUSMAN, Notes on Persius, CQ 7, 1913, 12–32 (on sat. 3). * R. JENKINSON, Interpretations of Persius' Satires 3 and 4, Latomus 32, 1973, 521–549. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, Die zweite Satire des Persius, Gymnasium 77, 1970, 199–210. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, Die dritte Satire des Persius, Helikon 11–12, 1971–1972, 289–308. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, Der Satirenprolog des Persius, RhM 121, 1978, 329–349. * W. KUGLER, Des Persius Wille zu sprachlicher Gestaltung in seiner Wirkung auf Ausdruck und Komposition, Würzburg 1940. * A. LA PENNA, Proposta per una vexatissima quaestio in Persio (nota a 6, 38–40), Maia n.s. 31, 1979, 33–35. * A. I. MALEIN, Ermitazhnaja rukopis' rimskikh satirikov, in: Doklady Akademii Nauk, ser. B, 1928, no. 4, 80–85. * S. MARIOTTI, Congetture alla Vita Persi, RFIC 93, 1965, 185–187. * E. V. MARMORALE, Persio, Firenze 2nd ed. 1956, repr. 1963. * N. MARTI, Farbe und Licht in den Satiren des Persius, MH 32, 1975, 99–106. * A. MAZZARINO, Sul titolo di una praetexta di Persio, SIFC 22, 1947, 129–131. * R. G. M. NISBET, Persius, in: J. P. SULLIVAN, ed., Satire, London 1963, 39–71. * E. PARATORE, La poetica di Persio, Roma 1964. * E. PARATORE, De Persio apud Dantem, Latinitas 12, 1964, 193–200. * E. PARATORE, Biografia e poetica di Persio, Firenze 1968 (collection of articles). * E. PARATORE, De Persio Horati interprete, Latinitas 17, 1969, 245–250. * E. PASOLI, Attualità di Persio, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1813–1843. * A. PENNACINI, I procedimenti stilistici nella 1 satira di Persio, AAT 104, 1969–1970, 417–487. * P. PINOTTI, 'Presenze' elegiache nella V satira di Persio, in: Satura. Studi in memoria di E. PASOLI, Bologna 1981, 47–72. * J. G. F. POWELL, Persius' First Satire. A Re-examination, in: T. WOODMAN, J. POWELL, eds., Author and Audience in Latin Literature, Cambridge 1992, 150–172. * K. J. RECKFORD, Studies in Persius, Hermes 90, 1962, 476–504. * N. RUDD, Persiana, CR 20, 1970, 282–288. * N. RUDD, Associations of Ideas in Persius, in: Lines of Enquiry. Studies in Latin Poetry, Cambridge 1976, 54–83. * U. W. SCHOLZ, Rem populi tractas? Zu Persius' 4. Satire, WZRoStock, 15, 1966, 525–531. * U. W. SCHOLZ, Zur Persius-Kommentierung um 1500. Scholia und Kommentare, in: W. R. NORBERT, ed., Wissensorganisierende und wissensvermittelnde Literatur im Mittelalter, Wiesbaden 1987, 143–156. * N. SCIVOLETTO, Poetica e stile di Persio, Roma 1975. * W. S. SMITH, Speakers in the Third Satire of Persius, CJ 64, 1968, 305–308. * D. SKOVIERA, Persius' World of Thought, GLO 5, 1973, 39–47. * M. SQUILLANTE SACCONI, Tecniche dell'ironia e del comico nella satira di Persio, BStudLat 10, 1980, 3–25. * J. P. SULLIVAN, In Defence of Persius, Ramus 1, 1972, 48–62. * J. TER VRUGT-LENTZ, Die Choliamben des Persius, Philologus 111, 1967, 80–85. * F. VILLENEUVE, Essai sur Perse, Paris 1918. * J. H. WASZINK, Das Einleitungsgedicht des Persius, WS 76, 1963, 79–91. * W. T. WEHRLE, The Satiric Voice. Program, Form, and Meaning in Persius and Juvenal, Hildesheim 1992. * C. WITKE, Persius and the Neronian Institution of Literature, Latomus 43, 1984, 802–812.

JUVENAL

Life and Dates

D. Iunius Iuvenalis (Juvenal) is mentioned as a declamator by Martial (Mart. 7. 24; 91). Initially, he led a client's life in Rome (Mart. 12. 18). The 1st satire is dated after 100,<sup>1</sup> the 6th after 115,<sup>2</sup> the 7th soon after Hadrian's accession to the throne, the last satires (cf. 13. 16–17; 15. 27) after 127. He did, after all, own an ager Tiburtinus (11. 65), Lares paterni, and slaves (12. 83–85). Aquinum to him was a town with personal attachments (3. 318–322).<sup>3</sup> He knew Egypt from personal experience (15. 45).

Survey of Works

1: (On Writing Satires): The harrowing recitations of pseudo-poets cry for revenge: Juvenal will write himself (1–21). The unnatural social conditions provoke satire (22–30), as does the decline of morals (30–62) and the shamelessness of its public display (63–80). The subject of satire is everything that people do; never had there been more material for satire than in Juvenal's time (81–146). Satiricists live a dangerous life; therefore only dead persons will be named (147–171).

2: (First Satire on Men): In a gradation Juvenal first pillories cinaedi disguised as preachers of morals (1–65), then he attacks Creticus, who wears transparent clothes (65–83), after him, male worshippers of the goddess Bona Dea (83–116), finally Gracchus, a descendant of a venerable family, who solemnly was married to a man (117–148). What shall the glorious Roman ancestors, what shall the conquered barbarians think of such ‘Roman virtues’ (149–170)?

<sup>1</sup> The sentence against Marius Priscus (A.D. 99–100) is mentioned in 1. 49; of course, the satire need not have been written immediately after this date.

<sup>2</sup> In that year, a comet was observed in Rome, and there was an earthquake in Antioch (6. 407–408).

<sup>3</sup> There is an inscription of a Iuvenalis (CIL 5, 5382 = DESSAU 2926), but it is doubtful if he is identical with the poet. Only one of the numerous vitae is based on material from antiquity; yet, even this information is suspicious, including Juvenal's alleged banishment to Egypt brought about by a histrion.

3: (Satire on Rome): Umbricius is right in leaving Rome. There, many Greek and oriental vices are found and there is no righteousness (1–189). Moreover, in the metropolis, the poor poet is threatened by fires, collapsing houses, pots emptied onto the road, nightly traffic noise (236–238) and even robbers (190–322).

4: (The Big Fish): First Juvenal mocks at the glutton Crispinus, a creature of Domitian (1–33), then at the emperor himself (34–154). According to degrees of criminality, this satire may be subdivided as follows: scelera (1–10); leviora (11–33); nugae (34–149); scelera (150–154).

5: (Sufferings of a Client at Table): The patron has worse food offered to his client, not out of avarice but in order to humiliate his guest.

6: (Satire on Women): Whoever obeys the lex Iulia and wants to marry, does not find a virtuous bride any more (1–59). Roman women love actors and gladiators (60–113); the empress competes with prostitutes (114–135). Whoever gives good testimony about his wife is bribed by wealth and beauty (1346–160). The few respectable women have other faults, such as arrogance or Graecomania (161–199). The good husband loses all freedom (200–230); his mother-in-law gives her daughter bad advice (231–241). Women act as advocates, even as gladiators (242–267); they dissimulate even proven infidelity by unabashed behavior (268–285). Prosperity is the root of moral decline (286–365). Women are in raptures about eunuchs or musicians, meddle with actual politics, vex their poor neighbors, or show off their erudition (366–456). A noble lady only respects her boy friend, not her husband; she pesters her maidservants. She sacrifices anything for priests and soothsayers, but murders children and husband. (457–661).

7: (Intellectuals in Rome): There is no future for poets (1–97), historians (98–104), advocates (105–149), teachers of rhetoric (150–214), or grammarians (215–243).

8: (Of True Nobility): It is absurd to boast of ancestral portraits while leading an immoral life, as does Robellius Blandus, for instance (1–70). Only personal merit does assure nobility: steadiness of character in private life, honesty and clemency in official life (71–145). There follow negative examples (146–268). It is better to be of modest descent but competent and efficient, as had been the fathers of Rome (269–275).

9: (Second Satire on Men): Against the unnatural inclination of men to men. Naevolus is made to condemn himself without noticing it.

10: (What Should We Ask of the Gods?): The wish for earthly goods entails only brings disaster (1–55). This is true of power (56–113), eloquence (114–132), glory in war (133–187), long life (188–288), and beauty (289–345). The gods know best what is good for us; let us pray for sound reasoning and steadiness of character; if we are wise Fortune has no power over us (346–364).

11: (On the Happiness of Simple Life): Having drawn a portrait of a society of luxury, which lives beyond its means, the poet is looking forward to having a frugal meal with Persicus; this is how enjoyments may become precious anew (56–208).

12: (On Legacy Hunters): Juvenal's solemn celebration on the occasion of Catullus' rescue is above the suspicion of legacy hunting, since his friend has natural heirs.

13: (On Bad Conscience): Calvinus loaned 10,000 sesterces to a friend (71), who denies the existence of this debt. Juvenal tries to comfort Calvinus and to dissuade him from taking revenge. Pangs of conscience are the worst punishment.

14: (On Education): Bad behavior of parents encourages imitation by children (1–58). For their children's sake, parents ought to be as disciplined as they are in honor of a guest (59–69). A child will adopt our behavior; examples (70–106). We teach our children to become greedy (107–209). Easy circumstances have disastrous consequences (210–314). Self-control is necessary (315–331).

15: (Cannibalism in Egypt): This satire describes a religious war between two villages. Fanaticism deteriorates into cannibalism (A.D. 127).

16: (Military Satire): This incompletely preserved satire discusses the privileged position of soldiers and the civilians' lack of rights.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Juvenal is a part of the tradition of Roman satire. As is to be expected, he quotes the Old Comedy of the Greeks, Lucilius, and Horace as his authorities. He has knowledge of Persius and Martial, even if he does not mention their names; of the latter he sometimes uses entire groups of epigrams.<sup>1</sup> On the whole, the parallels to Martial are perhaps more important than those to Horace. As for literary sub-species, the 11th satire reflects 'poems of invitation', the 12th, 'poems of thanksgiving (supplicatio)'. Not much time before Juvenal, there had lived a satirist called Turnus, who perhaps was the inventor of 'declamatory' satire.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> J. ADAMIETZ 1972.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Joh. Lydus, De magistratibus 1. 41; M. Coffey 1979, against A. E. HOUSMAN, edition of Juvenal, 2nd ed. 1931, p. xxviii.

The nature of Juvenal's satires compels us to consider a wide range of sources and models. His pathos is reminiscent of sublime genres such as tragedy and epic (we will come back to this). The theme of love evokes elegy; to give an example, Juvenal's description (3. 100–108; Ov. ars 2. 199–214) of the lover's 'compliance' (obsequium) in retrospect sheds some light on Ovid as a 'satirist'.

Above all, there are links to declamation, a type of exercise familiar to Juvenal from his youth. Moreover, he admired Cicero as an orator and as a statesman (e.g. 8. 244; 10. 114), and he respectfully mentioned Quintilian. Cicero's fate was a favorite topic of declamation; the same is true of the Tolstoy theme 'How much land does a man need?', which antiquity exemplified by Alexander the Great (cf. 14. 311); for him the world had been too small, and yet he had to be satisfied with a grave. One can view Juvenal's satires as 'declamatory invectives'.<sup>1</sup>

Being a 'preacher', Juvenal could not pass over Seneca, and even less Lucretius, whose pathos was congenial to him. The thirteenth satire exploits topics from consolatory literature. Juvenal's views sometimes are akin to those of Tacitus.<sup>2</sup>

Literary Technique

Juvenal's attitude as an author is determined by rhetoric. His satires assemble a wide range of striking facts from a more or less consistent point of view, and mostly aim at 'persuasion'.

The overall structure of each satire is a mixture of 'serial' and 'framing' techniques. The texts often exhibit a unity of theme, as had been the case in Persius. Towards the end of a satire, Juvenal may come back to his initial theme (10. 1–55; 346–366; 13. 1–6; 174–248). The speaker of the 3rd satire is Umbricius, who wants to leave Rome; this frame provides for a lively beginning and a convincing conclusion. The long satire on women (no. 6), however, is not sufficiently held together by the address to a friend, who shall be dissuaded from marrying: related subjects are sometimes separated on purpose; 'disorder' as a rhetorical device is meant to give an impression of inspired fullness. The framing of the 12th satire is a success: the offering ceremony on the occasion of a friend's rescue from distress at sea allows of a graceful treatment of legacy-hunting. The 8th satire starts and ends with the antithesis of noble birth and ignoble behavior. The 4th satire, at first glance, consists of two juxtaposed parts; at closer inspection it reveals a frame structure: grievous crimes are treated in the beginning and at the end, minor offenses are discussed in between. Dialogue lends attractivity to the framing of the 9th satire: while conversing with a friend, Naevolus, without being aware of the fact, is supposed to sit in judgment of himself.

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, LG 84.

<sup>2</sup> Juvenal refers to the Historiae in sat. 2. 102–103.

On the other hand, themes may overlap and shift, as the reader may know from Horace (the 2nd satire, for example, unites moral decline, hypocrisy, and homosexuality). Juvenal's handling of form perplexes many readers. It is the crossing of a thematic overall plan on the one hand and, on the other, a striving for vivid antitheses in its detailed execution: actually, in satires 3, 5, and 11 polarities such as 'town and country', 'poor and rich', 'native and foreign' tend to reappear in varying contexts. Juvenal is fond of impressing his readers by powerful contrasts: in 8. 211–268 he juxtaposes Nero and Seneca, Cicero and Catiline, and the series of antitheses is continued. The first part of the same satire starts with the high moral duties of Roman youth; there follow immediately, however, contrary examples: aristocrats as charioteers, actors, and gladiators.

Turning to smaller units we find parts arranged according to the principle of gradation: While the first part of satire 3 discusses ingratitude, mockery and material distress, the second part turns to dangers to life and limb. Common motifs intimately link the so-called 'excursuses' to their context; the term 'excursus', therefore, is inaccurate.

Suggestive visualization serves the orator's aim to give the greatest possible effect to each argument. A big garden is a garden from which a hundred vegetarians could revel opulently (3. 229). Who entrusts his life to a ship is only four to seven inches far from death (12. 58–59).<sup>1</sup> Concrete images enliven, for instance, the original portrait of a learned woman (6. 434–456)—a passage proving, by the way, that at that time, education was no longer a privilege of men, and henpecked husbands were constrained to defend their human right of offending against the rules of grammar (6. 456). Vivid narrative sections break the monotony of satire, such as the story of the great fish (4. 37–154) or a report of distress at sea and final rescue. (12. 17–82).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Anacharsis apud Diog. Laert. 1. 8. 5.

Our author independently handles the technique and repertoire of satire. He replaces ethos by pathos: while Horace recommended moderation, Juvenal severely rebukes immoderation.<sup>1</sup> Traditional elements assume a new life: in Horace, the miser piously admires his chest full of gold (sat. 1. 1. 67), in Juvenal, the wife wastes the money, as if it grew anew in the chest (6. 363). This motif reminiscent of fairy-tales lends new dynamism to a familiar image. Another feature of Juvenal's technique of satire is the imaginary continuation of a common pattern of thought, for instance, the extension of the series of Ages: for his contemporary period, which is worse than the Iron Age, nature does not know any metal, after which it might be called (13. 28–30); thus he illustrates the 'nameless' wickedness of his own time.<sup>2</sup>

Certain devices, like apostrophes at the beginning of satires (Iuv. 14), unobtrusively hint at satire's closeness to epistle. Likewise, some of the above-mentioned elements from neighboring genres and subspecies are subordinated to the basic character of the satires in question and enrich the literary technique of the genre without exceeding its limits.

More conspicuous is the adaption of literary means from loftier genres. To describe appropriately a sea-storm menacing his friend (12. 23) Juvenal exhausts the poetic potential of 'epic tempest'—a significant change of stylistic level. A no less exquisite beaver-simile (12. 34–36; cf. Sil. 15. 485–487) illustrates voluntary abandonment of riches in order to save one's life. The very fact that he compares certain modern women to Medea (6. 634–661) is indicative of a change in poetic technique and literary genre: with Juvenal, satire has become solemn and full of pathos.

Language and Style

On the whole, Juvenal's style is not monotonous, although he is fond of quoting himself.<sup>3</sup> His vocabulary, in accordance with the exigencies of the genre, is not free of colloquialisms, but less coarse than that of Persius. Greek words are not very rare (for instance 9. 37).

<sup>1</sup> Compare the use of similar motifs, such as the ant (Iuv. 6. 361; Hor. sat. 1. 1. 31) or the 'big heap' (Iuv. ibid. 364; Hor. ibid. 51).

<sup>2</sup> 5. 138–139; 3. 199; Aen. 4. 328–329; 2. 312.

<sup>3</sup> 10. 226 (= 1. 25); 14. 315–316 (= 10. 365–366); 16. 41 (= 13. 137); on his use of language s. now D. S. WIESEN, The Verbal Basis of Juvenal's Satiric Vision, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 708–733.

The absence of conspicuous archaisms perhaps impaired his popularity in the 2nd century.

The rich palette of vocabulary and the great variety of stylistic levels displayed by Juvenal arise from his effort to convey, instead of colorless generalities, the diversity of real life. Just read the list of professions mastered by a hungry Greek: grammaticus, rhetor, geometres, pictor, aliptes, / augur, schoenobate, medicus, magus, omnia novit / Graeculus esuriens: in caelum, iusseris, ibit, 'grammarians, teacher of rhetoric, geometrician; painter, trainer, or rope-dancer; augur, doctor, or astrologer—a hungry Greek knows everything; bid him go to heaven and he will go' (3. 76–78).

Choice of concrete and individualized expressions may be wittily linked to a hint at a higher literary genre: a son is called parvulus . . . Aeneas (5. 138–139), a neighbor: Ucalegon (3. 199), at a simple meal, host and guest are named Euander and Hercules (1. 61). A blind man is a Turesias (13. 249), a domestic tyrant turns into Antiphates and Polyphemus (14. 20). Thus, satire presents itself as the epos of everyday life.<sup>1</sup> To mention a person's name instead of its typical quality is to add vigor to style and expression: Qui Curios simulant et Bacchanalia vivunt, 'who pretend to be like Curius, while their life is a Bacchanal' (2. 3).<sup>2</sup> Powerful metonymy turns the afflux of orientals to Rome into a merging of two rivers: in Tiberim defluxit Orontes, 'the Orontes has poured into the Tiber' (3. 62). Adjectives appropriate for living creatures are attributed to lifeless objects, thus creating a universe of magic life: suffice it to compare 'the loud applause of bribed clients' with vocalis sportula (13. 32–33).<sup>3</sup>

Even numbers lose their abstractness: In the sentence 'there are hardly seven good men', the number is expressed as follows: 'hardly as many as Thebe's town gates and the Nile's mouths (13. 27). A golden bulla worn as an amulet around the neck was the characteristic of young boys; hence, a childish old man is called senior bulla dignissime, 'old man most worthy of the bulla' (13. 33). A battery of adynata and prodigia hammers in the idea that it is impossible to find an honorable man (13. 64–70). A speaker grotesquely amplifies a solemn oath by the head of his child by adorning it with culinary technical terms to the point of cannibalism: comedam . . . nati/sinciput, 'may I eat my son's boiled head' (13. 84–84). Fortune's favorites as well as unlucky persons, by means of metaphors, come to ornithological life: tu gallinae filius albae/nos viles pulli nati infelicibus ovis?, 'you were born of a white hen, while we are common chicken, hatched out of unlucky eggs?' (13. 141–142).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The name of Persicus (11. 57) seems to have been chosen ironically; since the satire in question could bear the Horatian title: Persicos, odi, puer apparatus (carm. 1. 38. 1).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Quis tulerit Gracchos de seditione querentes (2. 24).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. irato sistro (13. 93); locupletem podagram (13. 96); esuriens Pisaeae ramus olivae (13. 99); garrula pericula nautae (12. 82).

Again and again, sparkling and concise aphorisms turn up, rich in antitheses and word repetitions: aude aliquid brevibus Gyaris et carcere dignum,/si vis esse aliquid. probitas laudatur et alget, 'if you want to be anybody nowadays, you must dare some crime that merits exile on narrow Gyara or a jail; honesty is praised and left to shiver' (1. 73–74). Word-play may add to the effect: non propter vitam faciunt patrimonia quidam,/sed vitio caeci propter patrimonia vivunt, 'some men are so blinded and depraved that instead of making money for living, they live for making money' (12. 50–51). Sometimes expressive force exclusively rests in bold generalization: nulla fere causa est, in qua non femina litem moverit (6. 242–243). Elsewhere, our eloquent author surprises us by sudden conciseness: omnia Romae/cum pretio, 'in Rome, you can get everything for money' (3. 183–184).

Juvenal's treatment of meter<sup>2</sup> carries on the general tendencies of hexametric poetry of the imperial period.<sup>3</sup> We are not entitled to speak of metrical incorrectness in a case such as 14. 9, where in the word ficedula the long e is shortened.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Like Persius, Juvenal abhors fashionable mythological poetry for its inherent untruthfulness. With tongue in cheek, he defines his authorship as a revenge for the permanent torture of listening to other authors' recitations. But why is satire his choice? Circumstances are such as to provoke satire: difficile est saturam non scribere, 'it is difficult not to write satire' (1. 30). His source of inspiration is indignation: facit indignatio versum, 'indignation prompts my verse' (1. 79). Rhetoric has taught him that emotion generates eloquence. Emotion, therefore, has to replace poetic talent (something satirists traditionally pretend to do without). He is aware of his closeness to declamation and, when speechless with horror, he asks expressly for Quintilian's help: da, Quintiliane, colorem (6. 280).

<sup>1</sup> Black and white birds represent great and small sinners: Dat veniam corvis, vexat censura columbas (2. 63).

<sup>2</sup> E. COURTNEY, Commentary 1980, 49–55.

<sup>3</sup> Final -o can be shortened (3. 232; 11. 11); initial fr- does not cause lengthening by position (14. 5).

Strong emotion as a driving force fills satire with pathos to the point of making it a counterpart to higher genres of literature. According to Juvenal's definition his subject matter is universal (1. 85–86)—in this respect his satire substitutes for the somewhat obsolete genre of epic. His reference to Sophoclean cothurnus (6. 634–636) implies competition with tragedy. Juvenal changed the genre of satire, although, before him, Persius, too, had sometimes struck more solemn notes (e.g. sat. 5). Our author never gave up 'indignation' in principle. The 'Democritean' laugh in his later satires is not an 'alternative program', and the 'wise' Juvenal of the later satires does not disclaim his previous attitudes.

Our satirist clear-sightedly discerned the dangers that would put an end to Roman literature: the decline of sponsorship and the advance of Greek as the more 'fashionable' of the two languages. Unlike the emperor Hadrian, who was the exponent of a philhellenic epoch, Juvenal was a partisan of Latin. It is true that even he intersperses his text with Greek—such as the divine call γῶθι σεαυτόν, 'know thyself' (11. 27), but he detests ladies' pretentious preference for Greek phrases (6. 184–199). Fortunately, Homer figures among his dinner readings (11. 180), but having no expensive oriental slaves he advises his guests: 'order in Latin' (11. 148).

Juvenal pins his hopes for Latin literature on the emperor (7. 1). Despite the foundation of libraries under the 'good emperors' the warning of the last poet of the Silver Age passed unheeded. In the 'happiest century' of Rome living Latin authors mostly were neither happy nor in demand.

Ideas II

Attacks on contemporaries were less common than they had been in Greece. Lately, Domitian had prohibited pamphlets on living persons of rank (Suet. Dom. 8. 3). Juvenal therefore was compelled to choose his examples from the past. His readers nevertheless took the message. Given these social circumstances, we should not accuse Juvenal of being obsessed with the past.

Juvenal's moral categories are those of ancient Rome. He may even refer to a still earlier period: that of primitive man (6. 1-13). Since, with the increase of prosperity (6. 292-300), reality has developed far away from the beginnings, his statements bear the stamp of paradox. His intention is not to illustrate predetermined moral principles but to describe real social and moral facts.

The ethnic change in Rome's population affected religious convictions. Isis, which had not yet been tolerated under Augustus and Tiberius, in Juvenal's time received innumerable votive tablets from grateful believers (12. 28), thus feeding painters. Oaths were sworn by her, including perjury, of course (13. 93); near her temple, prostitution flourished (9. 22; 6. 489); nevertheless, this goddess deeply influenced the life of matrons (6. 522-541). It was the fashion to have a Jewish women predict the future or interpret dreams for a few coins (6. 542-547). People firmly believed in astrology (6. 533-556), as had been the case with Tiberius.

Orientalism dominated in Rome, which had become a Greek city (3. 60-61). Nothing was holy to those chaps (3. 109-112) who were able to turn their hand to anything (natio comoeda est, 'it is a nation of comedians' 3. 100). There were repercussions upon the descendants of Romulus: they walked around in Greek dress and did things un-Roman like, for instance, wrestling. Many a Roman wore his toga for the first time on his own funeral (3. 172).

Juvenal criticizes Roman plutocracy: quantum quisque sua nummorum servat in arca, tantum et habet fidei, 'a man's word is believed in exact proportion to the amount of cash which he keeps in his strong-box' (3. 143-144). Whoever has will be given credit. The patron, when inviting his client, is niggardly and keeps the best things for himself (dives tibi, pauper amicis, 'rich for yourself and poor to your friends' 5. 113), thus trying to show off his power and humiliate his 'friend'. Provided that he gets his truffles, a glutton does not care about the ruin of agriculture which vital for Rome (5. 116-119). Whoever is poor, will never be short of derision (3. 147-163). Unlike these critical texts, the 12th satire abandons the theme of mercator avarus, to concentrate on 'conversion' and readiness to acquire true life by giving up material goods.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Hor. carm. 3. 29 and reports on Crates and Aristippus (Gnom. Vat., ed. L. STERNBACH, Berlin 1963, nos. 39 and 387).

The emperor's court gives unnecessary attention to unimportant things—such as a big fish; the time was ripe for Domitian's fall, after he had destroyed his own popularity (Iuv. 4).

The satire on women reveals a typical aspect of Juvenal's character: he stigmatizes great sins and small, almost amiable weaknesses with the same relentlessness. In principle the solutions he proposes—except for the philosophical ones—all touch on absurdity: marriage is inadvisable for all Romans, because all women are bad (sat. 6); long since, all poor denizens of Rome ought to have moved to the countryside (3. 162–163); Trebius had rather sleep under the Tiber bridges than accept Virro's invitation (5. 8–9).

Since, on the whole, Juvenal's satire seems to become milder in the course of time, it has been surmised that only the earlier—more belligerent—satires were written by him, while the later ones were an imitator's work.<sup>1</sup> It is true that this is going too far, but the basic questions remain: Did our satirist become old and toothless? Did he choose for himself different personae? Did his approach to his subject actually change? No doubt, there is a clash between creative 'indignation' in the earlier (1. 79) and 'the spirit ignorant of anger' in the later satires (10. 359–360). Here, a difference has to be made between his philosophical ideal and his literary program: both statements refer to different levels. Granted: it would be misleading to label the early Juvenal as a social revolutionary (for he thunders down not only the rich, but also homosexuals, women, and pseudoprophets, and his moral standards are those of an arrant conservative). However, at the beginning of his career, his attitude concerning the wealthy is surprisingly accusatory. Likewise, in that epoch, he deemed material prosperity worth striving for. Later on, in the spirit of diatribe, he treated riches as an evil and poverty as a good.<sup>2</sup> Does, therefore, indignation (satires 1, 3, and 5) give way to Democritus' laughter? But in the 10th satire, Democritus does not have the programmatic function which is sometimes ascribed to him. Granted, Juvenal may have become more 'philosophical' (perhaps for having come to own a house himself 11. 65; 12. 83–92), and, in fact, in satires 10 and 13–15 he relies on quotations from philosophers to prop up his argument; moreover, his criticism changed direction: in the former satires, Juvenal had denounced individual social grievances (decay of patronage, sat. 5; misery of the men of letters, sat. 7; sexual corruption of the upper class, sat. 2); in his later satires, he aimed at certain vitia (wrong desires, sat. 10; gluttony, sat. 11; legacy hunting, sat. 12). Yet, this does not indicate a change of principle, and the fire of indignation is still alive, as is shown by satires 13–15. In fact, the 14th satire pillories an individual case, and the late military satire is no less critical of society than had been the relatively early satire on women. Even an aging Juvenal is still far away from Democritus' detached smile.

<sup>1</sup> O. RIBBECK, Der echte und der unechte Juvenal, Berlin 1865.

<sup>2</sup> By night on the road, the rich man is safe in 3. 283–285, whereas in 10. 69 it is the poor man. In 3. 235 the rich man sleeps quietly, while in 10. 19–20 it is he who cannot sleep.

Juvenal's views only partly agree with Stoic philosophy. Man is above Fortune, if the gods answer his prayers for mens sana (cf. Sen. epist. 10. 4) and prudencia. Hence, Fortune does not have divine power.<sup>1</sup> A certain distance with regard to philosophical schools—Cynics, Stoics, and Epicureans—is to be felt (13. 120–123). On the other hand, in a list of sages the Stoic Chrysippus figures before Thales and Socrates (13. 184–185).

Occasionally, Juvenal's words have almost a Christian ring, which helps us understand his popularity in the Middle Ages. His ideas on conscience are reminiscent of Seneca<sup>2</sup> and Epicurus: se/iudice nemo nocens absolvitur, 'no man is acquitted at the bar of his own conscience' (13. 2–3). He rejects revenge, since it is a pleasure for weak and small spirits: minuti/semper et infirmi est animi exiguique voluptas/ultio, 'vengeance is always the delight of a little, weak and petty mind' (13. 189–191). A sin committed mentally is as grievous as one actually perpetrated: nam scelus intra se tacitum qui cogitat ullum/facti crimen habet, 'for he who secretly meditates a crime within his breast has all the guiltiness of the deed' (13. 209–210).

It is true that Juvenal is a moralizing satirist, but he is not an absolute enemy of voluptas. He is the author of the wise maxim voluptates commendat rarior usus, 'it is rarity that gives zest to pleasure' (11. 208). The 11th satire inviting a certain Persicus to a frugal meal shows

<sup>1</sup> 10. 346–366; cf. 13. 20; 14. 315–316; Hor. sat. 2. 7. 83–88.

<sup>2</sup> The older Stoa considered pangs of conscience a weakness (cf. SVF 3. 548 von ARNIM); Epicureans recognized the reality of qualms of conscience (frg. 532 Us.; sent. 34; 35; 37; Lucr. 5. 1151–1160; 3. 1014–1022); their down-to-earth derivation of remorse from fear of being discovered is rejected by Seneca (epist. 27. 2; cf. 87. 25; 97. 15; 105. 7–8); cf. also Cic. fin. 1. 50; Plut. De sera numinis vindicta 10–11; H. CHADWICK, Gewissen, RLAC 10, 1978, 1025–1107.

Juvenal under a human aspect reminiscent of Horace and Epicurus.

The principle of appropriateness (aptum) plays an important role in Juvenal. What is important is to know oneself (11. 27) in order to see what is compatible with one's nature (noscenda est mensura sui, 'let a man take his own measure' 11. 35), an echo from Panaetius.

In his 8th satire,<sup>1</sup> Juvenal develops the following topic: 'it is the spirit which ennobles man'. It had been treated by the sophists, Euripides, Aristotle (rhet. 2. 15. 3), Menander (frag. 533 Kock), Cicero, Sallust, the rhetors, and Seneca (epist. 44. 5).

Compared with earlier authors, Juvenal struck a new note: Horace had been less concerned with material goods and social justice, and Martial had been less consistent in his criticism of society than was Juvenal, who depicted the distress of an entire social stratum. Our satirist tackled with burning problems of a period, often deemed the prelude to the happiest century of mankind. He was perspicacious enough to discern alarming signs of decline: the sinking prestige of literature and intellectuals, the downfall of education caused by a one-sided obsession of parents with prosperity, the rise of religious intolerance and fanaticism, the omnipotence of the military, who had become a new governing caste, and the impotence of the citizen. All this contributed to change Rome and the Romans. At the same time Juvenal drew his readers' attention to inner values, which pointed to the future. Later events, both good and evil, often proved that Juvenal had been a prophet.

Transmission

The manuscript tradition of Juvenal is unsatisfactory. Initially he was not read in classrooms; it was only towards the end of the 4th century that he began to attract a larger public. According to U. Knoche<sup>2</sup> the numerous manuscripts are traced back to an edition made in late antiquity under the influence of Servius. There are two classes: on the one hand there are the Π codices. The most important manuscript, the Pithocanus (P; Montepesulanus, med. 125, end of 9th century, from Lorsch), is often difficult to decipher; slightly later corrections in P, called p, are to be used with mistrust. The family of P comprises the Schidae Arovienses (10th or 11th century), the Florilegium Sangallense (in cod. Sangallensis 870, 9th century) and the significant lemmata (S) of the old scholia (preserved both in the Sangallensis and in P, published in O. JAHN's edition of 1851); these lemmata often diverge from the scholia, coincide with P or are even superior to P. The consensus of the lemmata of scholia, of the Sangallensis, or of the Aroviensis with P permits to retrieve readings of an older manuscript, an ancestor of P.

<sup>1</sup> CURTIUS, Europäische Lit. 188.

<sup>2</sup> Edition, München 1950; recently scholars tried a taxonomic approach to the numerous manuscripts (s. the modern editions quoted below); E. COURTNEY, The Progress of Emendation in the Text of Juvenal since the Renaissance, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 824-847.

On the other hand, there is the—smoothened—vulgate  $\Omega$  or  $\Psi$ , which was formed as early as around 400 (three fragments preserved from antiquity are related to this tradition). An example of the watered-down text of  $\Omega$  is 7. 139, where Priscian's testimony confirms the correctness of P.

P is superior to the other manuscripts since it is free from interpolations. Yet, wherever P is corrupt, we have to rely on manuscripts of the other class. In many instances we must face the possibility of interpolation of lines; the theory of author's variants has been largely abandoned today.

In 1899 two new fragments of the sixth satire were discovered.<sup>1</sup> The scholia of P, to the group of which also belong the scholia of the codex Vallae are more substantial than those of  $\Omega$ . Since Valla, the P scholia are ascribed to a Probus, whereas the  $\Omega$  scholia in some manuscripts are called Cornutus scholia (the name probably came from the Persius vita). The numerous glosses were extracted from the scholia.

Influence

After Lactantius, Servius was the first to quote our author abundantly. Juvenal was much read in the 4th and 5th centuries, as can be seen from imitations, e.g. in Ausonius, Claudian, and mentions in Rutilius Namatianus (1. 603) and Sidonius Apollinaris (9. 269). Ammianus Marcellinus informs us that among Juvenal's admirers there were even uneducated people (28. 4. 14). In the Greek east this Latin author enjoyed especial popularity (Lydus, de magistratibus 1. 41), he even was used as a primer of Latin for beginners and appeared in bilingual glossaries. Traces of Juvenal are found in the Church Fathers, e.g. in Gregory the Great.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. now G. LAUDIZI (quoted among the editions) 1982; the so-called E. O. WINSTEDT fragment, rediscovered in 1899, fits into the sixth satire after line 365; lines 346–348 turn out to be an interpolation.

<sup>2</sup> Simiam leonem vocas; . . . scabiosos saepe catulos pardos vel tigres vocamus: epist. ad Narsem 1. 6; cf. epist. ad Theoctistam 1. 5; Iuv. 8. 30–37; P. COURCELLE, Grégoire le Grand à l'école de Juvénal, SMSR 38, 1967, 170–174.

In the Middle Ages Juvenal as a poeta ethicus is a popular school author; the grammarian Aimericus assigns to him the first rank in his canon of authors (1086). He served as a source to Geoffrey of Monmouth, John of Salisbury, and Vincent of Beauvais. Juvenal was used to learn the rules of prosody, and Gerbert (later: Pope Silvester II; d. 1003) referred to him in his classes of rhetoric. Excerpts from Juvenal considerably enriched moral florilegia.<sup>1</sup> About 1280 Jean de Meung borrowed some misogynous touches for his Roman de la rose from the 6th satire. Poor wretch Codrus from 3. 203–211 figured as the antipodes of Croesus in Bernardus Silvestris (mid-12th century). Dante (d. 1321) had little knowledge of Roman satire; anyhow, it is Juvenal who told Virgil in the Purgatorio, how much Statius admired the Aeneid (Purg. 22. 13–14; cf. Iuv. 7. 82–83).

Petrarch (d. 1374) was familiar with Juvenal. In Chaucer (d. about 1400) there are two second hand references to the 10th satire.<sup>2</sup> Luther<sup>3</sup> (d. 1546), among other quotations, preferably cited the following line which can be applied to the Pope: hoc volo, sic iubeo, sit pro ratione voluntas, 'this is my will and my command: let my will be the voucher for the deed' (6. 223). Montaigne (d. 1592) quoted our author 50 times. Shakespeare (d. 1616) alluded (Hamlet 2. 2. 200–201) to Juvenal's remarks on old age (10. 190–245).

It is true that Juvenal was read in the 16th century, but initially translations were rare: in 1519 Jerónimo de Villegas translated him into Spanish. C. Bruno published some parts of the 6th satire in German; the 10th satire was translated into English by 'W.B.' in 1617.

European verse satire began in Italy with Antonio Vinciguerra (d. 1502). Luigi Alamanni (d. 1556) wrote thirteen satires in the vein of Juvenal; there followed Ariosto (d. 1533) and Lodovico Paterno. In England Thomas Wyatt (d. 1542) combined reminiscences from Roman satirists—among them Juvenal—with elements from Alamanni; Joseph Hall (d. 1656), as a sequel to his 'toothless satires' (in the style of Horace and Persius), wrote 'biting satires' in the spirit of

<sup>1</sup> A 13th century students' song says: magis credunt Iuvenali, quam doctrinae prophetali (Conte, LG 478).

<sup>2</sup> Troilus and Criseide 4. 197–201; Iuv. 10. 2–4; The Tale of the Wife of Bath 1192–1194; Iuv. 10. 22.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. Weimar Edition 30, 2, 483; further references in: Luther-Studienausgabe, ed. by H.-U. DELIUS (and others), vol. 3, Berlin 1983, 483, n. 51; 4, 1986, 417, n. 221 (pointed out to me by H. SCHEIBLE).

Juvenal; as a result, in 1599 the Archbishop of Canterbury prohibited the publication of satires and epigrams. Samuel Johnson (d. 1784) transposed the 3rd satire from Rome to London; his Vanity of Human Affairs is an adaptation of the 10th satire.

The first French author of verse satires, Mathurin Régnier (d. 1613) followed in the steps of Horace and Juvenal and combined—as Jean de Meung had done—satiric and erotic topics. He was succeeded by Furetière, Giles Boileau and, above all, the great Nicolas Boileau-Despréaux (d. 1711), who payed homage to both Horace and Juvenal, to the latter especially in his description of Paris (Boileau 6, Iuv. 3) and the satire on women (Boileau 10, Iuv. 6); unlike his Roman predecessors, Boileau avoided vulgarisms. Dryden (d. 1700), who was a great satirist himself, gave his countrymen an English Juvenal (1693); Samuel Jonson (d. 1784) brilliantly competed with the 3rd and 10th satires (London and The Vanity of Human Wishes).

Joachim Rachel (d. 1669) made a German adaptation of the 14th satire (Die dritte Satyra oder die Känderzucht). The unclassical preacher Abraham a Sancta Clara (d. 1709), in a way totally his own, was deeply rooted in Roman satire. In many European countries satires were written in Latin, a linguistic choice obviously less dangerous for the authors.<sup>1</sup>

Jonathan Swift (d. 1745) eternalized on his tombstone indignation as the worst of his tortures, thus even in death harking back to Juvenal's source of inspiration. Tobias Smollett (d. 1771), as a motto for Count Fathom, used Juvenal's passage on Democritus' laugh (Iuv. 10. 34; 47–48; 51–52) and ascribed to him tears, too (a feature not found in the original but typical of Smollett's ambivalent humor. Giuseppe Parini (d. 1799) was inspired by Juvenal and Persius for his brilliant Il Giorno. Henry Fielding (d. 1754) began his literary career with a translation from Juvenal's satire on women (All the Revenge Taken by an Injured Lover). Almost on the eve of the American Declaration of Independence Burke (d. 1797) warned his English countrymen against despotic behavior by quoting in a Parliament speech Juvenal (8. 124): 'Beggared, they still have weapons' (On Conciliation with the Colonies, 22th of march 1775). Wordsworth (d. 1850), who elsewhere is closer to Horace, planned to imitate Juvenal's 8th satire (on true and false nobility).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Poland (Antonius Łoz Poninski, Sarmatides seu Satirae equitis cuiusdam Poloni, 1741); Switzerland (Petrus Esseiva, 19th century); Croatia (Junius Restius, 19th century); s. J. IJSEWIJN, Companion to Neo-Latin Studies, Amsterdam 1977, 164; 146; 80.

Rousseau (d. 1778) and Schopenhauer (d. 1860) chose for their maxim vitam impendere vero, 'stake life upon the truth' (Iuv. 4. 91). Nietzsche (d. 1900)—a 'black swan' (6. 165) or a 'white raven' (7. 202) among Juvenal's readers—did not read our satirist from a moral but from an aesthetic standpoint and tried to trace 'the poetic element in satire, precisely on the basis of Persius and Juvenal'.<sup>2</sup> A genuine poetic echo of Juvenal (10. 157–158) is found in José-Maria de Heredia's (d. 1905) sonnet Après Cannes. In the 20th century H. C. Schnur wrote a Latin supplement to the 16th satire.<sup>3</sup>

Many familiar quotations originate from Juvenal, e.g. panem et circenses, 'bread and games' (10. 81) and crambe repetita, 'cabbage served up again' (7. 154). Juvenal has provided different groups of persons with maxims, sometimes with slight shifts of meaning: thus gymnastic clubs (mens sana in corpore sano, 'a sound mind in a sound body' 10. 356, although Juvenal emphasizes mens, not corpus), teachers (maxima debetur puero reverentia, 'the greatest reverence is owed to the young' 14. 47), secret service (quis custodiet ipsos/custodes?, 'who will ward the warders?' 6. 347–348) and managers (propter vitam vivendi perdere causas, 'to lose, for the sake of living, all that makes life worth living' 8. 84).

Editions: D. CALDERINUS, Venetiis 1475. * G. A. RUPERTI (TC), 2 vols., Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1819–1820. * C. F. HEINRICH (TC, scholia), 2 vols., Bonnae 1839. * O. JAHN (T, scholia, ind. of words), Berolini 1851. * J. E. B. MAYOR (TC, without sat. 2. 6 and 9), 2 vols., London I: 1872; II: 1878 (several repr.). * W. HERTZBERG and W. S. TEUFFEL (Tr), Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1886. * A. WEIDNER (TC), Leipzig 2nd ed. 1889. * L. FRIEDLÄNDER (TC), Leipzig 1895, repr. 1967. * J. D. DUFF (TTr), Cambridge 1898, repr. 1970 (with introd. by M. COFFEY). * A. E. HOUSMAN (editorum in usum), Cambridge 1905, 2nd ed. 1931. * N. VIANELLO, Torino 1935. * U. KNOCHE, München 1950. * U. KNOCHE (Tr), München 1951. * W. V. CLAUSEN, Oxford 1959. * J. FERGUSON (TC), New York 1979. * E. COURTNEY (C), London 1980. * G. LAUDIZI, Il frammento Winstedt (TTrC), Lecce 1982. * E. COURTNEY (T), Roma 1984. * J. R. C. MARTYN, Amsterdam 1987. * N. RUDD, W. BARR (TrN), Oxford 1992. * S. M. BRAUND (C), Cambridge 1996.

<sup>1</sup> U. V. TUCKERMAN, Wordsworth's Plan for his Imitation of Juvenal, Modern Language Notes 45, 1930, 4, 209–215.

<sup>2</sup> Autobiographisches: Für die Ferien; Werke, ed. K. SCHLECHTA, Darmstadt 1973, 3, 106.

<sup>3</sup> Iuvenalis satirae XVI fragmentum nuperrime repertum (!), in: Silvae, FS E. ZINN, Tübingen 1970, 211–215.

* Scholia: D. WESSNER, Scholia in Iuvenalem vetustiora, Leipzig 1931. ** Ind.: L. KELLING, A. SUSKIN, Chapel Hill 1951, repr. 1977. * M. DUBROCARD, New York 1976. * Cf. also: J. FERGUSON, A Prosopography to the Poems of Juvenal, Brussels 1987. ** Bibl.: M. COFFEY, Lustrum 8, 1963, 161–215. * W. S. ANDERSON, CW 50, 1956, 38–39; 57, 1964, 346–348; 63, 1970, 217–222; 75, 1981–1982, 290–297. * R. CUCCIOLI MELLONI, BStudLat 7, 1977, 61–87. * S. also the articles from ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989 (quoted below).

J. ADAMIETZ, Untersuchungen zu Juvenal, Wiesbaden 1972. * J. ADAMIETZ, Juvenals 12. Satire, in: Hommages à J. COUSIN. Rencontres avec l'antiquité classique, Annales littéraires de l'Université de Besançon 273, Paris 1983, 237–248. * J. ADAMIETZ, Juvenals 13. Gedicht als Satire, Hermes 112, 1984, 469–483. * J. ADAMIETZ, Juvenal, in: Die römische Satire, ed. by J. ADAMIETZ, Darmstadt 1986, 231–307. * W. S. ANDERSON, Studies in Book I of Juvenal, YCIS 15, 1957, 38–90. * W. S. ANDERSON, The Programs of Juvenal's Later Books, CPh 57, 1962, 145–160. * W. S. ANDERSON, Essays on Roman Satire, Princeton 1982. * J. BAUMERT, Identifikation und Distanz. Eine Erprobung satirischer Kategorien bei Juvenal, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 734–769. * F. BELLANDI, Etica diatribica e protesta sociale nelle satire di Giovenale, Bologna 1980. * F. BELLANDI, Sulla struttura della satira 14 di Giovenale, Prometheus 10, 1984, 154–160. * M. L. BRACCIALI MAGNINI, Grecismi dotti nelle satire di Giovenale, A&R n.s. 27, 1982, 11–25. * L. BRAUN, Juvenal und die Überredungskunst, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 770–810. * S. H. BRAUND, Beyond Anger. A Study of Juvenal's Third Book of Satires, Cambridge 1988. * C. J. CLASSEN, Überlegungen zu den Möglichkeiten und Grenzen der Anwendung des Begriffes Ironie (im Anschluß an die dritte Satire Juvenals), in: Kontinuität und Wandel. Lateinische Poesie Von Naevius bis Baudelaire. FS F. MUNARI, Hildesheim 1986, 188–216. * C. J. CLASSEN, Satire—The Elusive Genre, SO 63, 1988, 95–121. * M. COFFEY, Turnus and Juvenal, BICS 26, 1979, 88–94. * R. E. COLTON, Juvenal and Martial, diss. Columbia Univ. 1959. * J. DE DECKER, Iuvenalis declamans. Etude sur la rhétorique déclamatoire dans les satires de Juvénal. Recueil de travaux, Faculté de Lettres, Gand 41, 1913. * C. DEROUX, Domitian, the Kingfish, and the Prodigies. A Reading of Juvenal's Fourth Satire, in: C.D., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History III, Bruxelles 1983, 283–298. * C. FACCHINI TOSI, Struttura e motivi della Satira XI di Giovenale, SIFC 51, 1979, 180–199. * J. FERGUSON, A Prosopography to the Poems of Juvenal, Brussels 1987. * J. GÉRARD, Juvénal et la réalité contemporaine, Paris 1976. * W. HEILMANN, Zur Komposition der vierten Satire und des ersten Satirenbooks Juvenals, RhM 110, 1967, 358–370. * G. HIGHET, Juvenal the Satirist, Oxford 3rd ed. 1960. * H. HÖGG, Interpolationen bei Juvenal?, diss. Freiburg i. Br. 1971. * G. JACHMANN, Studien zu Juvenal, NGG 1943, 187–266. * R. JENKYNs, Three Classical Poets, London 1982, 151–221. * B. F. JENSEN, Crime, Vice,

- and Retribution in Juvenal's Satires, C&M 33, 1981–82, 155–168. * E. J. KENNEY, Juvenal, Satirist or Rhetorician?, Latomus 22, 1963, 704–720. * U. KNOCHE, Handschriftliche Grundlagen des Juvenaltextes, Leipzig 1940. * U. KNOCHE, Die römische Satire, Berlin 1949, Göttingen 4th ed. 1982. * P. DE LABRIOLLE, Les satires de Juvénal. Étude et analyse, Paris 1932. * L. I. LINDO, The Evolution of Juvenal's Later Satires, CPh 69, 1974, 17–27. * R. MARACHE, Juvénal—peintre de la société de son temps, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 592–639. * J. MARTYN, Juvenal's Wit, GB 8, 1979, 219–238. * H. A. MASON, Is Juvenal a Classic?, in: J. P. SULLIVAN, ed., Satire, London 1963, 93–167. * R. MCKIM, Philosophers and Cannibals. Juvenal's Fifteenth Satire, Phoenix 40, 1986, 58–71. * L. MIORI, Interpretazione di Giovenale, Atti della Accad. Roveretana degli Agiati, Classe di scienze umane, di lettere ed arti 233, 1983, ser. 6, 23, 163–181. * B. B. POWELL, What Juvenal Saw: Egyptian Religion and Anthropophagy in Satire 15, RhM 122, 1979, 185–189. * E. S. RAMAGE, Juvenal and the Establishment. Denigration of Predecessor in the Satires, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 640–707. * W. REISSINGER: s. Roman Satira. * A. RICHLIN, Invective against Women in Roman Satire, Arethusa 17, 1984, 67–80. * W. S. SMITH, Heroic Models for the Sordid Present. Juvenal's View of Tragedy, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 811–823. * J. P. STEIN, The Unity and Scope of Juvenal's Fourteenth Satire, CPh 65, 1970, 34–36. * R. STEWART, Domitian and Roman Religion. Juvenal, Satires Two and Four, TAPhA 124, 1994, 309–332. * E. TENGSTRÖM, A Study of Juvenal's Tenth Satire. Some Structural and Interpretative Problems, Göteborg 1980. * G. B. TOWNEND, The Literary Substrata to Juvenal's Satires, JRS 63, 1973, 148–160. * K. H. WATERS, Juvenal and the Reign of Trajan, Antichthon 4, 1970, 62–77. * W. T. WEHRLE, The Satiric Voice. Program, Form and Meaning in Persius and Juvenal, Hildesheim 1992. * E. WICKE, Juvenal und die Satirendichtung des Horaz, diss. Marburg 1967. * D. WIESEN, Juvenal's Moral Character. An Introduction, Latomus 22, 1963, 440–471. * M. M. WINKLER, The Persona in Three Satires of Juvenal, Hildesheim 1983. * M. M. WINKLER, Juvenal's Attitude Toward Ciceronian Poetry and Rhetoric, RhM 131, 1988, 84–97. * C. WITKE, Latin Satire: The Structure of Persuasion, Leiden 1970. * A. J. WOODMAN, Juvenal 1 and Horace, G&R 30, 1983, 81–84.

G. EPIGRAM

MARTIAL

Life and Dates

In his 10th book (which contains poems from the years 95–98), M. Valerius Martialis mentions his 75th birthday which he celebrated on the first of March<sup>1</sup> (10. 24); he was born therefore around A.D. 40. His home was Bilbilis (today Bámbola) in Spain. Having finished his studies with the grammaticus and rhetor, he came to Rome in 64. An activity as a lawyer, to which he had perhaps been encouraged by Quintilian, did not satisfy him (2. 90). He frequented the houses of influential patrons interested in poetry; ultimately he led this tiresome client's life<sup>2</sup> perhaps in search for literary rather than financial support. Being a proud Spaniard he made the best of his role of client, depicting his situation in ironically exaggerated terms and thus creating the cliché of the 'beggar poet'. His 'poverty' should be taken no more seriously than that of his admired predecessor Catullus. Perhaps as early as 84 he owned an estate at Nomentum (8. 61; 9. 18), a few years later (86–87), he had a house in Rome.<sup>3</sup> Of course, he also possessed slaves of his own (1. 88) and secretaries (1. 101; 2. 8). It is doubtful, if we may deduce the existence of a family from the ius trium liberorum<sup>4</sup> conferred on him.<sup>5</sup> In any case, Martial was very proud of being an equus (5. 13); he had, therefore, the considerable fortune required for equestrian rank.<sup>6</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> We do not know for certain the names of his parents: J. MANTKE, Do We Know Martial's Parents?, Eos 57, 1967–1968, 233–244; H. SZELEST 1986, 2564 (on 5. 34).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. R. P. SALLER, Martial on Patronage and Literature, CQ 33, 1983, 246–257; M. GARRIDO-HORY, Le statut de la clientèle chez Martial, DHA 11, 1985, 381–414.

<sup>3</sup> E. LIEBEN, Zur Biographie Martialis, I, Prag 1911, 5.

<sup>4</sup> D. DAUBE, Martial, Father of Three, AJAH 1, 1976, 145–147.

<sup>5</sup> H. C. SCHNUR, Again: 'Was Martial Really Married?', CW 72, 1978, 98–99; J. P. SULLIVAN, Was Martial Really Married? A Reply, CW 72, 1978–1979, 238–239.

<sup>6</sup> On his titular tribunate, which ascertained his becoming a knight: E. LIEBEN,

Some of Martial's sponsors were authors themselves: the Senecas, Silius Italicus. Arruntius Stella, Stertinius Avitus. Among his sponsors, there was also Lucan's widow, Polla Argentaria. Like Statius, whose name he never mentions, he was one of Atedius' Melior's guests (8. 38; 6. 28–29). There were links to M. Antonius Primus, who had sided with Vespasian in the war against Vitellius.<sup>1</sup> Moreover, he paid homage to his Spanish countryman, L. Licinius Sura, a protégé of Trajan (7. 47). Martial's friendship with the notorious informer Aquilius Regulus<sup>2</sup> as well as the compliments he addressed to Domitian's creature Crispinus (cf. 7. 99; Iuv. 4. 1–33) witness to his opportunism. The addressee of books 4 to 8 was Appius Norbanus, a faithful adherent of Domitian (9. 84). We will come back to Martial's relationship to the emperor.

After Domitian's death, an aging Martial longed for returning to his homeland; the change of the political climate may have contributed to his desire for rest. Nerva and Trajan do not seem to have appreciated the compliments officiously poured out on them. In 98 Martial left the city where he had lived for 34 years. Pliny the Younger met his travel expenses (Plin. epist. 3. 1).<sup>3</sup> In Spain there was a county-seat in store for him, a gift from his protectress, Marcella. Nor did his maecenas, Terentius Priscus,<sup>4</sup> abandon him. Initially, his otium made him happy, but soon he began to yearn for the metropolis which had inspired him. Only after a delay of three to four years would the 12th book of epigrams appear. Martial died about A.D. 104.

Survey of Works<sup>5</sup>

We possess 12 books of epigrams and, in addition, the so-called Liber spectaculorum (Epigrammaton liber), the Xenia ('book 13' in the editions) and Aphophoreta ('book 14'). His juvenilia are lost (1. 113).

ibid. 17; O. RIBBECK, Geschichte der römischen Dichtung, vol. 3, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1919, 268.

<sup>1</sup> 9. 99; 10. 23; 32; 73.

<sup>2</sup> 1. 12; 82; 111; 2. 74; 93; 4. 16; 5. 28; 6. 38; 7. 16; 31.

<sup>3</sup> Martial mentions Pliny in 5. 80; 10. 19.

<sup>4</sup> 6. 18; 7. 46; 8. 12; 8. 45; 9. 77; 10. 3; 12 praef.; 12. 4; 12. 14; 12. 62.

<sup>5</sup> On the chronology of the epigrams: M. CITRONI, edition of book 1, 1975, Introduzione, 'Problemi di cronologia'; id., Pubblicazione e dediche dei libri di Marziale, Maia 40, 1988, 3–39.

The Liber spectaculorum was dedicated to the emperor Titus on the occasion of the opening of the Flavian amphitheater in A.D. 80. Probably in December 84 or 85, Martial published Xenia and Apophoreta, on which he might have worked for a longer period of time.<sup>1</sup>

The Epigrammata (books 1–12) were written between 85 and 102. According to his own testimony, he wrote more or less one book a year (9. 84. 9; 10. 70. 1). Books 1 and 2 date roughly from 85/86; book 3, from 87/88; book 4, from 88/89. The 5th book appeared while Domitian was absent from Rome (late in 89); book 6, in the second half of 90. Book 7 and 8 were published in 93; book 9, in 93/94; the 1st edition of book 10, in 94/95; book 11, in 97; the 2nd edition of book 10, in 98; and book 12, in 101 or early in 102.

Most of the poems date from Domitian's era. They reflect the development of his politics, laws, and edicts,<sup>2</sup> his architectural embellishment of Rome,<sup>3</sup> his victories over the Sarmatians,<sup>4</sup> his games<sup>5</sup> and banquets (8. 39; 50). Martial eulogizes the emperor<sup>6</sup> and his poems (5. 5; 8. 82. 3–4); he praises members of Domitian's entourage,<sup>7</sup> among them Rabirius, the architect of the emperor's magnificent palace (7. 56; 8. 36).

Under Nerva and Trajan Martial conformed to the new court etiquette:<sup>8</sup> there is nothing more flattering than the assertion that flattery is no longer in request (10. 72). In 98 he remodeled book 10, but not to the point of giving the dead lion the kick of an ass—at least not in the edition known to us. Another source, however, reports an epigram saying that the third Flavian impaired the positive balance of the other two (Schol. Iuv. 4. 38).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Even in subject matter Martial gives proof of originality.<sup>9</sup> His main source is contemporary Roman life. To give this material literary shape he uses all of the Greek<sup>10</sup> and Roman tradition, which serves him as a sort of language, as a code, as a means to his end.

<sup>1</sup> A. MARTIN, Quand Martial publia-t-il ses Apophoreta?, ACD 16, 1980, 61–64 (December 85); R. A. PITCHER, The Dating of Martial, Books XIII and XIV, Hermes 113, 1985, 330–339 (books 13 and 14 not earlier than book 4).

<sup>2</sup> 5. 8; 41; 75; 6. 2; 4; 22; 45; 7. 61; 9. 6; 8.

<sup>3</sup> 8. 65; 9. 20; 64; 10. 28.

<sup>4</sup> 5. 3; 7. 5; 6; 8. 2; 4; 8; 11; 15; 21.

<sup>5</sup> 1. 6; 14; 48; 51; 5. 65; 8. 26; 80.

<sup>6</sup> W. PÖTSCHER, Numen und Numen Augusti, ANRW 2, 16, 1, 1978, 355–392.

<sup>7</sup> 9. 11–13; 16–17; 36; 8. 68; 4. 8.

<sup>8</sup> 8. 70; 9. 26; 11. 4–5; 7; 10. 6; 7; 34; 72.

<sup>9</sup> K. PRINZ, Martial und die griechischen Epigrammatiker, 1. Teil, Wien 1911, 78.

<sup>10</sup> H. SZELEST 1986, 2591–2598.

Epigram as a literary form is partly rooted in oral and popular practice.<sup>1</sup> Initially epigrams were meant to be used as inscriptions or they were literary imitations of inscriptions; hence, the 'epigrammatic' element in the modern sense of the word was not an indispensable feature of them. If, for us, epigram is a 'rhymed point' (Boileau) or a 'condensed satire' (Opitz), this is owing to Martial, in whose œuvre satiric epigrams prevail (though not exclusively). Many Greek epigrams, therefore, are 'saltless' in our view; it must be remembered, however, that in book 11 alone of the Anthologia Palatina there are 442 mocking epigrams (closely linked to the Sympotica).

In Greek tradition Martial found many further varieties of forms: his epigrams on literary themes comprise polemics, dedications, and poems explaining the character and form of his epigrams or books. Their content is new throughout. Descriptions of works of art or persons equally adhere to traditional Greek forms, but their subject matter is Roman. In his funeral epigrams Greek influence is more conspicuous, although a personal touch is felt e.g. in 6. 18; 7. 96; 10. 61. In votive and dedicatory verse, imitations and sympotic epigrams, traditional forms get new vigor from personal and present-day themes. Martial's eulogies and reflective poems find no close parallels among Greek epigrams.<sup>2</sup>

His birthday poems (4. 1; 10. 24) are closer to the genethliaca of Roman elegy than to Greek epigram; his poems of farewell are part of the tradition of hodoiporicon or propempticon, which is not limited to epigrams. His love poems, of which we should not expect any romantic feelings, are spiced with allusions to Domitian's lex de stupro.<sup>3</sup> In a word: Martial adopts Greek forms to fill them with Roman content.

Generally speaking, texts bearing close resemblances to Greek models are not very numerous.<sup>4</sup> It is true that there exist Greek epigrams on circus games, but Martial's liber spectaculorum describes actual performances of A.D. 80; his poems are full of realism and immediate response. The Xenia and Aphophoreta pretend to be inscriptions recalling the form of Greek votive epigrams. In their content, however, they are independent.

<sup>1</sup> G. PFOHL, Bibliographie der griechischen Versinschriften, Hildesheim 1964.

<sup>2</sup> The eulogies are individual; the reflective epigrams contain e.g. considerations on the fickleness of wealth (5. 42; 8. 44) or the inevitability of death (4. 60). Philosophical themes of diatribe were treated e.g. by Leonidas of Tarentum.

<sup>3</sup> Inventive also 6. 71 or 12. 42.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. 2. 37; 3. 17; 23; 4. 4; 5. 32; 5. 53; 6. 12; 19; 39; 93; 7. 94; 11. 101; 12. 23.

In books 1–12, satirical epigrams play a significant role. Martial mentions Callimachus and a certain Bruttianus (unattested elsewhere) as his Greek models, while passing over in silence his real Greek predecessors in satirical epigram, Lucillius and Nicarchus. In Lucillius, who had lived under Nero, of 130 epigrams, only two had not been satirical. In this regard he paved the way for Martial, who often chose the same targets: hypocrites, rhetors and other fools, advocates and physicians, women and jealous men, gluttons and drunkards, niggards and spendthrifts, the fat and the lean, meager estates and cheap spirits. Everyday life is rich in new motives: for example (3. 60), cheap gifts to clients (in a typically Roman social framework), or the quickly expanding fashion of greeting kisses (11. 98). Aspects unknown to Greek epigram are obtained by inversion: Martial does not only mock gluttons, but also those who eat too poorly (3. 77; 5. 76), along with the evel-smelling the exceedingly perfumed (3. 55; 7. 41). Historical examples help to 'romanize' other well-known themes: in a trifle process an over-zealous advocate cites the battle of Thermopylae in Lucillius (AP 11. 141), while Martial has him quote the battle of Cannae (6. 19). Often, Martial's point is rather different from that of his model (an exception is 12. 23; AP 11. 310).

Lucillius loves what is fanciful and absurd,<sup>1</sup> Martial what is concrete and individual (3. 44; cf. Lucill. AP 11. 133); he strives for credibility and closeness to reality. One of them writes for authors, the other, for readers; Lucilius shows the world in a distorting mirror, Martial in a magnifying glass. His introduction of Roman material extends the size of his epigrams (e.g. 11. 18) Our poet often shows his heroes in a concrete situation; as a result, his epigrams are graphic and individual. More straightforwardly than Lucillius, Martial leads his readers towards the final point, which he throws into bold relief using all the resources of rhetoric.

The two parts of an epigram usually called 'expectation' and 'explication', resemble a report of an individual case and a subsequent comment on it, often involving a personal reaction.<sup>2</sup> Hence, Martial's carefully chiseled epigrams (cf. 10. 2. 1-4) often are more complex and sophisticated and even wittier than those of Lucilius.

<sup>1</sup> Lucill. AP 11. 205 (a banquet 'reversed', dominated by schematism and caricature), Mart. 2. 37 (concrete features, a list of individual elements, permanent motion, a miniature picture). The following sentence is typical of Lucillius (AP 11. 249): 'Had Epicurus seen this small property, he would have said that the world is not made of atoms, but of small properties.'

<sup>2</sup> AP 11. 310 (Mart. 12. 23); 11. 408 (3. 43); 11. 155 (9. 27); N. HOLZBERG 1986, 203; W. BURNIKEL 1980 passim; cf. also M. LAUSBERG 1984.

Of the Roman models named by Martial we know too little about Albinovanus Pedo, Marsus,<sup>1</sup> and Gaetulicus.<sup>2</sup> Martial himself transmits to us a rude epigram of Augustus, whose frankness he uses as carte-blanche for his own obscenities (11. 20). However, the master he adores is Catullus.<sup>3</sup> He wants to pay homage to him, but also to be the Catullus of his own age. There is, however, a fundamental difference: Martial does not attack particular persons but vices (vitia 10. 33. 10).

Parallels with Horace,<sup>4</sup> especially with his Satires and Epodes, mostly are based on similarity of character types (the niggard, the self-made man, the legacy hunter) and of general themes of popular philosophy (the brevity of life, the transitoriness of wealth, the golden mean). Differences in treatment are caused by differences of epoch and genre; nevertheless sometimes there is a blending of lyric atmosphere and realism reminiscent of Horace. The poems for Domitian, of course, occasionally recall Horace's odes to Augustus.

The praise of country life in some longer epigrams has a Tibullan ring. Martial's eulogy of the univira is akin to Propertius' final elegy (Prop. 4. 11; Mart. 10. 63. 7-8). The idea of aurea Roma reminds us of Ovid, although Martial's relationship to the emperor is less tense than is Ovid's. Both poets excel by humor and wit. There are almost no links to Phaedrus,<sup>5</sup> except for the fact that both authors are fond of conciseness and social criticism.<sup>6</sup> Martial quotes Quintilian and Frontinus; his relationship to Pliny is slightly more colorful, though not too close. Moreover, Martial takes issue with imitators and forgers; the latter are especially dangerous, since they could falsely attribute subversive poems to him. There are remarkable correspondences with the epigrams ascribed to Seneca.

<sup>1</sup> Marsus e.g. 8. 55; 7. 99; Marsus' epigram on the death of Virgil and Tibullus conveys a very favorable impression of his art.

<sup>2</sup> Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Gaetulicus (killed under Caligula).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also H. OFFERMANN, Uno tibi sim minor Catullo, QUCC 34, 1980, 107-139; Y. NADEAU, Catullus' Sparrow, Martial, Juvenal, and Ovid, Latomus 43, 1984, 861-868.

<sup>4</sup> H. SZELEST, Altertum 1963.

<sup>5</sup> A. GUARINO, La società col leone, Labeo 18, 1973, 72-77, compares Martial 3. 20 with Phaedrus 1. 5.

<sup>6</sup> Minor authors: L. Arruntius Stella (4. 6; 9. 69; 11. 15; 52); Martial praises his imitation of Catullus in his Dove (1.7). Martial also does homage to Sulpicia (10. 35; 38).

Given Martial's original genius, we are not surprised that he melts different genres or traditions: thus in l. 49 he unites propempticon and the praise of country life (Hor. epod. 2). Martial's lyric vein is especially conspicuous in his longer epigrams, some of which exhibit a personal character (in the modern sense of the word). Martial interspersed his short epigrams with some more lengthy poems (of about 16–50 lines) which treat themes familiar to us from Horace and the elegists. Thus, they border on other genres: satire, elegy, eclogue, occasional poem (silvae). When treating subjects typical of epigram, amplification is achieved by descriptions, enumerations, similes, and series of examples. Long epigrams had been rare in the Anthologia Palatina; Catullus, however, had written some poems of 17–30 lines. The epigrams ascribed to Seneca in the Anthologia Latina are similar in length to Martial's poems (2–66 lines). Martial's independence shows from the sometimes considerable length of his poems as well as from his choice of meter for his longer epigrams; before him, such poems had usually been written in elegiac meter. On the other hand, he avoids rare meters (cf. 2. 86).

Epic and tragic poets—given the serious character of these literary genres—ran the risk of death penalty when uttering political criticism in their works.<sup>1</sup> A minor genre like epigram may have been considered a relatively safe vehicle for touching on topics of the day. Although this should not be generalized—actually, Martial was born to write epigrams—under the emperors, the time was ripe for an acme of epigram: once political life could no longer be discussed freely, private affairs were deemed worthy of poetic treatment. Under the Flavians and Trajan, along with epigram, some other genres had their prime or came to raise higher literary claims: letters (Pliny), occasional poems (Stattius), declamatory satire (Juvenal), biography (Suetonius). What all these genres have in common is a close relationship to reality. In the period from Vespasian to Trajan we can trace an effort to represent real life and individuals in literature, a tendency which may be called typically Roman.

<sup>1</sup> F. M. FRÖHLKE, Petron. Struktur und Wirklichkeit, Frankfurt 1977, 120–122.

Literary Technique

Martial structured each of his books with great care.<sup>1</sup> He was self-critical (cf. 1. 16) and knew that it makes a difference if a single epigram is successful or if a collection of epigrams is able to stand the test as a book.

Some books of the Epigrammata have a prose introduction. We find a similar practice in Statius—a new trend of the Flavian period. Beginnings and endings of books often exhibit correspondences. It is true that, in principle, each poem is independent, but in the course of each book there is an intriguing interaction of groups of poems. Cycles of epigrams can be pursued through entire books.<sup>2</sup> Book 11 is a book on Saturnalia; books 8 and 9 are centered on Domitian; in the last third of book 3 (announced in 3. 68) sexual themes prevail. Related epigrams may be placed together,<sup>3</sup> but they may also be separated by totally different poems.

The individual epigram often consists of two parts. The first part is objective, it may relate an event, state a fact or give a description. The second part is subjective: the poet gives his personal opinion and makes a concluding point. There are, however, good reasons against a schematic generalization: we should not expect to find this bipartite structure in all of Martial's epigrams.

Some essentials of epigram are: objectivity, a single theme, self-contained form, and brevity. The principle of brevitas was in harmony with 'modern style', the exponent of which was Seneca. In this regard, however, Martial was less severe than the Greeks: many of his epigrams have more than 2–4 lines; cf. 1. 77 on the length of epigrams. It is only with Martial that the 'pointed' conclusion, which originally had not been obligatory, became a typical feature of the genre. Even long texts have an 'epigrammatic' conclusion (e.g. 5. 78). Impressive contrasts are typical.

Many epigrams build up erroneous expectations, in order not to fulfill them: 'You were not as old as the Sibyl—she was three months older' (9. 29. 3–4).—'May the earth not be a burden to you—so that the dogs can dig out your bones.' (9. 29. 11–12). Martial's humor is that of an intellectual. Everything is streamlined to lead to the 'point'. The rational organisation of his poems is his special gift.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> M. CITRONI, edition of book 1, Introduzione, Ordinamento degli epigrammi, esp. p. xxxv on the position of no. 61.

<sup>2</sup> 1. 6; 14; 22; 48; 51; 60; 104 (on this, N. HOLZBERG 1986, 209–210); 2. 10; 12; 21; 22; 67; 72; 5. 8; 14; 23; 25; 27; 35; 38; 38 b.

<sup>3</sup> 3. 19 and 20; 1. 111 and 112.

We already mentioned the great number of genres and types of poems found in his work. In Martial's oeuvre, parody and irony, wit and play on words triumph. There is a fruitful interaction between a mannered and a seemingly naive way of expression.<sup>2</sup>

Language and Style<sup>3</sup>

Martial is a convinced partisan of Latin; the Greek chatter of pretentious ladies does not suit him at all (10. 68; cf. also Iuv. 6. 185--199). Latine at times means something like 'in plain English': Martial speaks his mind and is not ashamed of using vulgar words. In his first praefatio he calls this attitude to language lasciva verborum veritas, 'the license of calling a spade a spade': he does not mince his words. Lascivia is part of the genre's tradition. Epigram is especially free in its choice of words. Obscenity is not only tolerated, it is obligatory. In fact, Martial adduces a pretty coarse epigram of Augustus to justify the liberties he allowed himself (11. 20).

Granted: play on language should not be underrated. Martial's 'points' are often based on ambiguity. The poet exploits the fact that some words have both a harmless and an obscene meaning: this is true of Palinurus (3. 78), dare (2. 56; 7. 70), aquam sumere (2. 50). With philological meticulousness he presents the difference of meaning between the two accusatives ficus and ficos (1. 65).

On the whole, however, Martial is closer to reality than Virgil and even Horace.<sup>4</sup> It is the facts and objects that count, and language is bound to illumine them. Thus, in 11. 18 the use of short words illustrates the theme 'smallness': when describing a miniature lot of land, Martial heaps short words and corresponding sounds: rus, mus, sus, nux. If 'mannerism' is defined as a preponderance of form over content, the term cannot be applied to Martial.

<sup>1</sup> J. KRUISE 1941.

<sup>2</sup> W. GÖRLER 1976, 12.

<sup>3</sup> On language and style: E. STEPHANI, De Martiale verborum novatore, Breslau 1889; L. HAVET, La prose métrique de Martial, RPh 27, 1903, 123; O. GERLACH, De Martialis figurae ἀπροσδόκητον quae vocatur usu, diss. Jena 1911; J. KRUISE 1941; K. BARWICK 1959; U. JAEFGEN, Wortspiele bei Martial, diss. Bonn 1967.

<sup>4</sup> W. GÖRLER 1976, 11.

Metaphor is relatively rarer than metonymy;<sup>1</sup> this is a feature uniting Martial and Horace who are both great realists. Comparisons often appear in guise of entire chains. In Martial's objective poetry myth<sup>2</sup> serves as a contrasting foil: Domitian is superior even to Jupiter and Hercules (4. 1; 9. 91; 101; 65), Nigrina is a better wife than Euadne and Alcestis (4. 75), and the country seat Marcella gave him is preferable to the gardens of Alcinous (12. 31). Reality puts myth into the shade. In satiric epigrams myth helps to enhance contrast: on that microscopic property a mouse turns into terrifying monster like the Calydonian boar (11. 18). As a rule, Martial is more sparing of comparisons than his Greek predecessors in epigram and uses them to describe reality.

Short poems become longer by rhetorical amplificatio, which entails an increase in concrete detail. Bombast, however, is stigmatized (vesica 4. 49. 7): rhetoric is not an end in itself. Martial's rhetorical and stylistic achievement is the orientation of the individual epigram towards its concluding point. He is a master of antithesis and maxim, but unlike Lucilius he wanted to conform to reality, especially in his use of language and style.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Martial often addresses his reader;<sup>3</sup> he craves his indulgence for book 10 and dedicates the 11th book to him; it is for his reader that he goes on publishing epigrams. For him, he writes delectantia (5. 16), not seria. He wants to be read,<sup>4</sup> not to sound forth great things (9 praef.). His public is eagerly waiting for the publication of new poems (4. 89; 11. 108); he takes care of the dissemination of his poems (5. 16). Famous poets and orators appreciate him and even the emperor reads him again and again (6. 64). His enthusiasts confer glory on him in his lifetime (1. 1) and immortality in days to come (8. 3).

<sup>1</sup> H. SZELEST 1980, 103.

<sup>2</sup> H. SZELEST, Eos 1974.

<sup>3</sup> 1. 1; 113; 2. 8; 5. 16; 9 praef. epigr.; 9. 49; 10. 2; 11. 108; 11. 16; 12 praef.; 12. 3; 1. 53; lector studiosus 1. 1; lector amicus 5. 16; cf. 10. 2; for his view of his identity as a poet N. HOLZBERG 1988, 85–93 (with bibl.); cf. also R. P. SALLER 1983.

<sup>4</sup> 1 praef.; 1. 2; 6. 61; 9. 84; 11. 3; 7. 88.

Epigrams on his own authorship are especially numerous.<sup>1</sup> Competing with the Augustans' proud awareness of their poetic achievement, he raises unusually high literary claims for his poetic genre—and he gave it uncommon stature indeed. This can be seen in the introductory epigram which like a sphragis in the Ovidian vein (trist. 4. 10) thanks the reader for fame granted in the poet's lifetime. Like Horace, Martial is aware of the importance of 'filing' (10. 2. 1–4); above all, he recognizes the high requirements which an author of an entire book of epigrams has to meet (7. 85). As for satiric epigrams, collecting them into a well-structured book was an innovation.

In terms of the Callimachean recusatio, Martial freely acknowledges that he never will become a Virgil, but only a new Marsus (8. 56 [55]) or Catullus.<sup>2</sup> As the latter had done, he calls his poems 'trifles' (nugae), in the wake of Hellenism. To define oneself as a 'playful poet' is always a good weapon against all too demanding wishes of the powerful, witness the Augustans' use of recusatio. On the other hand, he is deeply convinced that his epigrams are more than mere play, which leads him to the point of dismissing mythical epic and tragedy as things of dalliance (4. 49). Yet he holds historical epic in high esteem. There is more to his admiration for Lucan and Silius than a client's assentation. Like Persius, he opposes Roman realism to Greek fancifulness.

In Martial's view, the worth of his epigrams consists in their close connection with life: quod possit dicere vita, meum est, 'of which life can say: 'It's mine'' (10. 4. 8) and hominem pagina nostra sapit, 'my page smacks of humanity' (10. 4. 10). It is in this framework that obscenity is justified by generic tradition.<sup>3</sup> Martial's work becomes a mirror of Roman life: at tu Romano lepidos sale tinge libellos, / agnoscat mores vita legatque suos, 'but do you dip your witty little books in Roman salt; let life recognize and read of her ways' (8. 3. 19–20). Tame epigrams are perhaps suitable for classrooms (3. 69), but Martial wants to shake up his readers: ecce rubet quidam, pallet, stupet, oscitat, odit. / Hoc volo: nunc nobis carmina nostra placent, 'look, somebody turns red, turns pale, is dazed, yawns, is disgusted. This I want. Now my poems please me' (6. 60 [61] 3–4). The reader is stirred up because he feels involved.

<sup>1</sup> 1. 1; 61; 5. 13; 6. 61; 64; 82; 7. 84; 88; 99; 8. 3; 9 epist.; 84; 97; 10. 2; 9; 103 (Martial as vates); 11. 3.

<sup>2</sup> 4. 14. 13–14.

<sup>3</sup> praef.: sic scribit Catullus, sic Marsus, sic Pedo, sic Gaetulicus, sic quicumque perlegitur; cf. also 1. 35; 3. 68; 69; 86; 5. 2; 8. 1; 11. 15; 16; 20; 12. 43.

Martial seems to have managed to transpose poetry from the sphere of education into that of life.

Nevertheless, we have to qualify his closeness to life in two respects. First, our poet defends himself against the old Roman prejudice of poeta grassator (cf. Cato the Elder apud Gell. 11. 2. 5) and, like Catullus and Ovid, well-behavedly draws a borderline between his dissolute poetry and his respectable way of life (1. 4. 8). Second, Martial—in conformity with political and social life in his day—is free from inhumana invidia and does not want to offend anyone (10. 5; cf. 1 praef.). Hence he does not attack individuals, only typical vices (10. 33 parcere personis, dicere de vitiis, ‘to spare persons, to speak of vices’); he is reticent about representatives of the upper classes and leaves his readers mostly with self-made men, clients, slaves and typical figures, well-known to us from epigram and satire: the intruder, the legacy-hunter, the niggard, the senile lover, etc. The fact that society compelled Martial to concentrate on humanity in general proved in the long run to be an advantage for future readers and, as a consequence, for the dissemination of his work.

Ideas II

We should neither deny that Martial pursued moral aims nor over-emphasize this point. Martial was no hero of resistance. But is it correct to say that he observed Roman life ‘with his eyes only’? Was his poetry really ‘the aimless and disengaged play of an acute mind and a brilliant formal talent’? Was Martial that ‘cynic beggar poet . . . full of limitless love for this undignified, miserable life, which is, after all, so sweet and enjoyable?’<sup>1</sup> The fact, that Martial draws a markedly favorable picture of the traditional Roman matron may be considered evidence for a certain moral commitment.<sup>2</sup> But is this more than a reflex of the expectations of Domitian the moral reformer and of Martial’s rich protectresses? Whoever wished to be read by the Romans of that age had to take seriously the puritanism of the new senators who had come from small province towns. We should not even exclude that Martial’s own moral views were not much more ‘progressive’. Like many other critics of society he preferred to adopt a conservative standpoint.

<sup>1</sup> O. SEEL 1961, 67; 57; 63.

<sup>2</sup> N. HOLZBERG 1986, 201.

It is true that some epigrams are indicative of an aversion to hypocrisy, especially those against sexually aggressive old women and effeminate men, whose behavior infringed the code of roles in Roman society. Yet, the first result of this undeniable contrast is ridicule. Moral criticism may be implied, but in the poems it is felt only indirectly. So it is difficult to distinguish from a mere conflict between the typical pattern of social behavior and the individual's deviation from it.

The poems on the life of clients amount to about 10% of Martial's oeuvre. We may read them as a moral satire on a typical feature of Martial's age studied by him for decades. He gives first hand evidence of the life of clients and self-made men. Martial's vive hodie (1. 15) recalls Epicurus<sup>1</sup> and Horace's carpe diem. Martial has a matter-of-fact view of man's chances to obtain happiness.

This is equally true of his relationship with the emperor. A poem directed against the third Flavian<sup>2</sup> was probably written post festum and is no less disgusting than Martial's eulogies of Domitian. It is anything but a proof of an intention to unmask the emperors' tyranny. In those days nobody seriously questioned the principate any more. In the first years of his literary activity Martial requested and received from Domitian the ius trium liberorum (2. 91 and 2. 92). His wishes for money (5. 19; 6. 10; 7. 60; 8. 24), however, probably went unheeded (although the absence of poetic 'acknowledgments of receipt' is not a proof but an argumentum ex silentio). Nor did he obtain direct water supply from the nearby aqueduct to his villa (9. 18); Statius was more successful (silv. 3. 1. 61-64). Unlike the latter, he was not invited to the emperor's court and did not participate in poetic contests. Scholars concluded that Domitian stood back from Martial more than he did from other poets, and they searched for compromising material with the Argus-eyes of public prosecutors. Here is the meager result: Martial praised certain republican heroes,<sup>3</sup> alluded to events under Claudius and Nero, ridiculed baldheads,<sup>4</sup> and mentioned Domitian's restoration of marriage law together with examples

<sup>1</sup> Epicurean elements in Martial: W. HEILMANN 1984.

<sup>2</sup> Schol. Iuv. 4. 38 Flavia gens, quantum tibi tertius abstulit heres! Paene fuit tanti, non habuisse duos.

<sup>3</sup> Cato the Younger (1. 8; 78), Paetus Thrasea (1. 8); Arulenus Rusticus, who had written a eulogy of Thrasea, was executed in 96.

<sup>4</sup> Mart. 5. 49; 6. 57; 10. 83; 12. 45; Suet. Dom. 18. 2; cf. Iuv. 4. 38; Auson. de XII Caes. 17; after the suppression of Saturninus' rebellion (89) Martial became even more cautious than he had been (H. SZELEST 1974, 113).

proving their impracticability. Whoever is impressed by these peccadilloes may believe that Martial was obliged or at least felt obliged to make up for them by especially gross flattery. A more economic theory would be that he tried to season or make tolerable his evident opportunism by small republican or satiric gestures (if he was aware of them at all). Whether Martial was in favor with Domitian,<sup>1</sup> is another question. In accord with Seneca's De clementia, Martial especially praised the union of majesty and clemency (6. 38)<sup>2</sup> in Domitian's character. In the course of time the emperor's numen gains more and more importance.

Obscenity and servility are the two objections raised most frequently against Martial. The former<sup>3</sup> today has become pointless; the latter, however, must be maintained to a certain degree. Even if we close our eyes to the flatteries inevitably addressed to Domitian, Martial went to far by disparaging his former emperor in front of the new one; and his friendship with an opportunist and informer like Regulus was an act of free will.

Tradition<sup>4</sup>

The tradition of Martial consists of three recensions (A<sup>a</sup>, B<sup>a</sup>, C<sup>a</sup>); where they agree, the text is well ascertained. In the Liber spectaculorum, where B<sup>a</sup> and C<sup>a</sup> are lacking, there is more need of conjectural criticism.

A<sup>a</sup>: This archetype is only attested by florilegia. The Liber spectaculorum has been transmitted only in this family. In Lindsay's view (ed. praef.) the model of the florilegia had been a complete codex. The recension A<sup>a</sup> often replaced obscene words with more decent ones (e.g. l. 90. 6-7). This does not tell in favor of an early date of this recension.

B<sup>a</sup>: The archetype of this class represented the recension made by Torquatus Gennadius in A.D. 401. This manuscript had been written in Italy in Langobardic minuscule and contained books 1-4 with the following

<sup>1</sup> Negative: H. SZELEST 1974, 114; W. HOFMANN (Martial und Domitian, Philologus 127, 1983, 238-246) thinks of a permanent struggle for the emperor's grace.

<sup>2</sup> On the 'leo-lupus-cycle' as an allusion to the emperor's attitude to Martial: N. HOLZBERG 1986, 209-212.

<sup>3</sup> The tradition of the genre justifies obscenity, s. above p. 1048, n. 3.

<sup>4</sup> W. M. LINDSAY, The Ancient Editions of Martial, Oxford 1903; E. LEHMANN, Antike Martialausgaben, diss. Jena 1931; W. SCHMID, Spätantike Textdepravationen in den Epigrammen Martials, in: id., Ausgewählte philologische Schriften, Berlin 1984, 400-444; M. REEVE, Two Notes on the Medieval Tradition of Martial, Prometheus 6, 1980, 193-200; U. CARRATELLO, Un nuovo codice di Valerio Marziale, GIF 33, 1981, 235-246.

transpositions: 1 epist. (1–2 are lacking) 3–14; 48–103. 2; 15–41. 3 (41, 4–47 were missing because a leaf had gone lost); 4. 24. 2–69. 1; 1. 103. 3–4. 24. 1; 4. 69. 2 and so on. The Liber spectaculorum is wanting.

C<sup>a</sup>: The archetype of this class was probably written in the 8th or 9th century in Gaul in Carolingian minuscule: the Liber spectaculorum is absent; the epigrams 10. 56. 7–72 and 87. 20–91. 2 dropped out.

The different wording (and compass) of the three families probably attests three different editions. Some variants might be traced to the author. For instance, the absence of 1. 1–2 in B<sup>a</sup> (despite the presence of the preceding epistle) is evidence of an older edition in which Martial could not yet claim universal fame (1. 1); moreover, at that moment, the pocket edition (1. 2) had not yet been published.

The headings of individual epigrams are genuine only in the Xenia and Apophoreta (cf. 13. 3. 7; 14. 2).

Influence

Martial impressed his slightly younger contemporary, the satirist Juvenal, whose activity as rhetor<sup>1</sup> he mentioned; posterity often read both authors together. Hadrian's adoptive son Aelius Verus called Martial his 'Virgil'. His influence is felt in poets (like Ausonius), grammarians, and Church Fathers. In the Middle Ages<sup>2</sup> he was known, among others, to Hrabanus Maurus (d. 856), Lupus of Ferrières (d. after 862), Heriger of Laubach (d. 1007), Thietmar of Merseburg (d. 1018), Odo of Meung (11th century), Papias (mid-11th century), Marbod of Rennes (d. 1123), Godefrid of Winchester (d. 1107), John of Salisbury (d. 1180), Walter Map (d. 1209), Petrus of Blois (d. about 1204), Herbert of Boseham (12th century), Radulf de Diceto (d. 1202).

The Renaissance heralded a new heyday: Nicolaus Perotti's (d. 1480)<sup>3</sup> Cornucopiae sprang from a commentary to Martial: Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592) quoted our poet 41 times. Of the numerous neo-Latin followers of Martial, a German, Eobanus Hessus (d. 1540; Sylvae 1535; enlarged edition 1539) and an Englishman, John Owen (d. 1622) may be mentioned. Martial inspired epigrammatists in all

<sup>1</sup> Bibl. in H. SZELEST 1986, 2579, n. 22.

<sup>2</sup> W. MAAZ, Lateinische Epigrammatik im hohen Mittelalter. Literarhistorische Untersuchungen zur Martial-Rezeption, Hildesheim 1992; on Martial's influence from antiquity to the end of the Renaissance cf. also P. LAURENS 1989.

<sup>3</sup> P. O. KRISTELLER, Niccolò Perotti ed i suoi contributi alla storia dell'umanesimo, RPL 4, 1981, 7–25; F. DELLA CORTE, Niccolò Perotti e gli epigrammi di Marziale, RPL 9, 1986, 97–107.

European countries and definitely called into being this literary genre in the modern languages;<sup>1</sup> in Germany, where epigrams more and more came to be written in the vernacular in the 17th century, Martial's poem listing things necessary for a blissful life (10. 47) was a favorite model.<sup>2</sup> In 1612 the Reverend Johannes Burmeister published a Christianized Martial<sup>3</sup> in Latin—in his edition, the pagan original and its Christian 'parody' coexist peacefully. The general increase of prudery during that century ended in a disparagement of Martial—and Catullus—as esprits grossiers et rustiques (Pierre Bayle, d. 1706).<sup>4</sup> Nevertheless, it was under the auspices of Martial that, in the 18th century, Lessing wrote his Latin and German epigrams<sup>5</sup> and developed his theory of epigram.<sup>6</sup> Schiller and Goethe used Martial's title for their epigrams (Xenien). Further evidence of Martial's influence in the 18th century is found in a bilingual anthology of Martial published by K. W. Ramler and containing translations by German poets.<sup>7</sup> Goethe's Sprüche in Prosa (third section) contain a maxim from Martial: bonus vir semper tiro (Mart. 12. 51. 2).

Martial's œuvre owes its survival and influence, above all, to its blending of Roman realism and of features typical of man at all times. In his poetry, human life 'comes to know itself' (10. 4). His achievement was the total fusion of the popular and the literary traditions of epigram and a new orientation of the readers' expectations

<sup>1</sup> T. K. WHIPPLE, Martial and the English Epigram from Sir Thomas Wyatt to Ben Jonson, University of California 1925; P. NIXON, Martial and the Modern Epigram, New York 1927; A. A. GIULIAN, Martial and the Epigram in Spain in the 16th and 17th Centuries, Philadelphia 1930; K.-H. MEHNERT, Sal Romanus und Esprit français. Studien zur Martialrezeption im Frankreich des 16. und 17. Jh., diss. Bonn 1970; J. M. HUMEZ, The Manners of Epigram: A Study of the Epigram Volumes of Martial, Harington, and Jonson, diss. Yale 1971; F. RÖMER, Martial in drei Monodistischen des Giorgio Anselmi, WS 101, 1988, 339–350.

<sup>2</sup> R. LEVY, Martial und die deutschen Epigrammatiker des 17. Jh., Heidelberg 1903, 36.

<sup>3</sup> Johannes Burmeister, Martialis Renati Parodiarum Sacrarum pars prima (media, ultima). Quibus apposita Martialis Epigrammata, Goslar 1612.

<sup>4</sup> J. L. GERIG and G. L. VAN ROOSBROECK, Unpublished Letters of Pierre Bayle (Section 10), The Romanic Review 24, 1933, 211.

<sup>5</sup> P. ALBRECHT, Lessings Plagiate, Hamburg and Leipzig 1890.

<sup>6</sup> G. E. LESSING, Zerstreute Anmerkungen über das Epigramm und einige der vornehmsten Epigrammatisten, in: SW (complete works), ed. K. LACHMANN, vol. 11, Stuttgart 3rd ed. 1895, 214–315.

<sup>7</sup> Martial in einem Auszug, lat. und dt., aus den poetischen Übersetzungen verschiedener Verfasser gesammelt von K. W. RAMLER, 5 vols., Leipzig 1787–1791; Supplement ibid. 1793; Appendix Berlin 1794.

concerning the characteristic marks of the genre. It is owing to Martial that, for us, 'epigram' means 'satiric epigram', not 'inscription' any more. He is the classic of epigram.

Editions: Ferrariae 1471. * I. GRUTERUS, Francoforti 1602. * L. FRIEDLÄNDER (TC), 2 vols., Leipzig 1886, repr. 1967. * W. M. LINDSAY, Oxford 1903 (2nd ed. 1929). * W. C. A. KER (TTrN), London 1919. * R. HELM (TTrN), Zürich 1957. * W. HERAEUS, I. BOROVSKIJ, Leipzig 1976 (= 3rd ed. 1982). * G. NORCIO, Torino 1980. * P. HOWELL, London 1980. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Stutgardiae 1990. * Id. (TTrN), London 1993. * D. ESTEFANÍA (Tr), Madrid 1991. * Book I: M. CITRONI (TC), Firenze 1975. * Book II: N. M. KAY (C), London 1985. ** Concordances: E. SIEDSCHLAG, Hildesheim 1979. * D. ESTEFANÍA, up to now 4 fascicles (A-F), Santiago de Compostela 1979-1985. ** Bibl.: J. W. M. HARRISON, Martialis 1901-1970, Lustrum 18, 1975, 300-337. * Bibl. also in G. NORCIO, quoted edition, 63-82, H. SZELEST 1986 and N. HOLZBERG 1988.

O. AUTORE, Marziale e l'epigramma greco, Palermo 1937. * K. BARWICK, Zur Kompositionstechnik und Erklärung Martials, Philologus 87, 1932, 63-79. * K. BARWICK, Zyklen bei Martial und in den kleinen Gedichten des Catull, Philologus 102, 1958, 284-318. * K. BARWICK, Martial und die zeitgenössische Rhetorik, Berlin 1959 (Abhandlungen Leipzig 104, 1). * H. BERENDS, Die Anordnung in Martials Gedichtbüchern I-XII, diss. Jena 1932. * V. BUCHHEIT, Martials Beitrag zum Geburtstag Lucans als Zyklus, Philologus 105, 1961, 90-96. * W. BURNIKEL, Untersuchungen zur Struktur des Witzepigramms bei Lukillios und Martial, Wiesbaden 1980. * A. G. CARRINGTON, Aspects of Martial's Epigrams, Eton 1960. * M. CITRONI, La teoria lessinghiana dell'epigramma e le interpretazioni moderne di Marziale, Maia 21, 1969, 215-243. * C. J. CLASSEN, Martial, Gymnasium 92, 1985, 329-349. * K. M. COLEMAN, The Emperor Domitian and Literature, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1987, 3087-3115. * P. DAMS, Dichtungskritik bei nachaugusteischen Dichtern, diss. Marburg 1970. * G. ERB, Zu Komposition und Aufbau im ersten Buch Martials, Frankfurt 1981. * J. FERGUSON, Catullus and Martial, PACA 6, 1963, 3-15. * W. GÖRLER, Martial über seine ländliche Heimat (epigr. 1. 49), Mitteilungen für Lehrer der Alten Sprachen 7, 1-2, 1976, 6-13. * J. P. HALLETT, Martial's Sulpicia and Propertius' Cynthia, CW 86, 1992, 99-123. * W. HEILMANN, 'Wenn ich frei sein könnte für ein wirkliches Leben...', Epikureisches bei Martial, A&A 30, 1984, 47-61. * R. HELM, Römisches Alltagsleben im 1. und 2. Jh. n. Chr. nach Martial und Juvenal, Zürich 1963. * N. HOLZBERG, Neuansatz zu einer Martial-Interpretation, WJA 12, 1986, 197-215. * N. HOLZBERG, Martial, Heidelberg 1988. * J. KRUISE, L'originalité artistique de Martial. Son style, sa composition, sa technique, C&M 4, 1941, 248-300. * E. M. W. KUPPE, Sachwitz bei Martial, diss. Bonn 1972. * I. LASSA, Marziale poeta della

- contraddizione, RFIC 83, 1955, 225–249. * P. LAURENS, Martial et l'épigramme grecque du 1<sup>er</sup> siècle après J.-C., REL 43, 1965, 315–341. * P. LAURENS, L'abeille dans l'ambre: Célébration de l'épigramme de l'époque alexandrine à la fin de la Renaissance, Paris 1989. * M. LAUSBERG, Das Einzeldistichon, München 1982. * M. LAUSBERG, Martials Spottepigramm auf den winzigen Bauern (11. 14), RhM 127, 1984, 159–165. * J. MANTKE, De Martiale lyrico, Wrocław 1966. * E. MARTINI, La Roma dei Flavii nei versi di Marziale, Atti dell'Accademia Petrarca di Lettere, Arti e Scienze 42, 1981, 56–94. * A. NORDH, Historical Exempla in Martial, Eranos 52, 1954, 224–228. * R. PAUKSTADT, De Martiale Catulli imitatore, diss. Halle 1876. * E. PERTSCH, De Martiale Graecorum poetarum imitatore, Berlin 1911. * K. PRESTON, Martial and Formal Literary Criticism, CPh 15, 1920, 340–352. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Epigramm und Skolion, Gießen 1893. * H. REMUND, Medizinisches aus Martial, mit Ergänzungen aus Juvenal, Zürich 1928. * C. SALEMME, Marziale e la poetica degli oggetti. Struttura dell'epigramma di Marziale, Napoli 1976. * C. SALEMME, Alle origini della poesia di Marziale, Orpheus n.s. 8, 1987, 14–49. * R. P. SALLER, Martial on Patronage and Literature, CQ 33, 1983, 246–257. * E. SCHÄFER, Martials machbares Lebensglück (5. 20 und 10. 47), AU 26, 1983, 74–95. * O. SEEL, Ansatz zu einer Martial-Interpretation, A&A 10, 1961, 53–76; repr. in: G. PFOHL, ed., Das Epigramm. Zur Geschichte einer inschriftlichen und literarischen Gattung, Darmstadt 1969, 153–186. * E. SIEDSCHLAG, Ovidisches bei Martial, RFIC 100, 1972, 156–161. * E. SIEDSCHLAG, Zur Form von Martials Epigrammen, Berlin 1977. * K. SIEMS, Aischrologia. Das Sexuell-Häßliche im antiken Epigramm, diss. Göttingen 1974. * F. SINATRA, Valerius Martialis, Catania 1981. * J. W. SPAETH, Martial and Virgil, TAPhA 61, 1930, 19–28. * A. L. SPISAK, Martial 6. 61. Callimachean Poetics Revalued, TAPhA 124, 1994, 291–308. * J. P. SULLIVAN, Martial: The Unexpected Classic, Cambridge 1991. * B. W. SWANN, Martial's Catullus. The Reception of an Epigrammatic Rival, Hildesheim 1994. * H. SZELEST, Martial und die römische Gesellschaft, Eos 53, 1963, 182–190. * H. SZELEST, Martials satirische Epigramme und Horaz, Altertum 9, 1963, 27–37. * H. SZELEST, Martial und Domitian, Eos 62, 1974, 105–114. * H. SZELEST, Ut faciam breviora mones epigrammata, Corde. Eine Martial-Studie, Philologus 124, 1980, 99–108. * H. SZELEST, Martial, eigentlicher Schöpfer und hervorragendster Vertreter des römischen Epigramms, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2563–2623. * R. G. TANNER, Levels of Intent in Martial, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2624–2677. * E. WAGNER, De Martiale poetarum Augustae aetatis imitatore, diss. Königsberg 1880. * O. WEINREICH, Studien zu Martial, Stuttgart 1928. * P. WHITE, The Presentation and Dedication of the Silvae and Epigrams, JRS 64, 1974, 40–61. * Id., The Friends of Martial, Statius and Pliny, and the Dispersal of Patronage, HSPh 79, 1975, 265–300. * Id., Amicitia and the Profession of Poetry in Early Imperial Rome, JRS 68, 1978, 74–92. * K. WILLENBERG, Die Priapeen Martials, Hermes 101, 1973, 320–351.

THE PRIAPEA

The collection of Priapea is dedicated to Priapus, a god protecting gardens against thieves. The hallmarks of his statues, carved roughly out of wood (10. 4), were a huge privy part painted in red (26. 9; 36. 10–11) and a sickle in the right hand (30. 1). 80 poems have come down to us (81 according to Bücheler who, following Scaliger, divided the last poem). 38 of them are written in hendecasyllables; 34, in distichs, and 8, in choliambis.<sup>1</sup>

Today, the collection is rather convincingly ascribed to a single author and dated after Martial. One difficulty remains: Seneca the Elder quotes a passage from Priap. 3 as Ovidian (contr. 1. 2. 22); we are compelled, therefore, to postulate the existence of a lost work of Ovid as a common source.<sup>2</sup>

Survey of the Work

There is deliberate alternation of meters and themes. As in Martial, there are no more than three meters. Mostly distichs and hendecasyllables take turns. At times, two<sup>3</sup> or three<sup>4</sup> poems in succession are written in the same meter. Neighboring epigrams related in theme can be written in different meter (24–25; 30–31; 51–52).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Priapeum is a sub-species of epigram. In Alexandria, the grammarian Euphronius (3rd century B.C.) wrote Priapea (Strab. 8. 382). Number 24 of our Priapea is an imitation of an epigram of the Greek Anthology. As a rule, however, Greek epigrammatists seriously invoke Pri-

<sup>1</sup> Recent editors added five more poems from other sources: 2 in distichs, 2 in pure iambs, 1 in Priapeans (consisting of a Glyconic and a Pherecratean); the Priapean meter is attested elsewhere in Catullus 17 and in a fragment of Maecenas. Two of these poems (82–83) were ascribed to Tibullus, three (84–86) are found in the Appendix Vergiliana.

<sup>2</sup> Suggested dates: Augustan period (Schanz-Hosius, LG § 319); mid-1st century at the latest (TEUFFEL-KROLL, LG § 254. 5); after Martial (V. BUCHHEIT 1962).

<sup>3</sup> Hendecasyllables: 25–26; 28–29; 34–35; 56–57; 69–70; distichs: 42–43; 67–68; 80–81 (if these two are not a single poem).

<sup>4</sup> Hendecasyllables: 44–46; 75–77; distichs: 20–22; 53–55; 4 poems: 71–74; it would be probably too schematic to subdivide the corpus in 9 × 9 poems; but, at least, the existence of a cycle like 1–9 cannot be mere coincidence.

pus as a tutelary god, especially of fishermen and sailors, whereas in Rome Priapus has lost this religious function. Instead, Latin Priapea are more varied in content and wittier in form. Poems 4 and 63. 17 allude to pornographic sources. Among the Romans, the genre initially had an epigraphical character:<sup>1</sup> the Priapea pretend to be mural graffiti in a small temple of Priapus (cf. 2. 9–10). However, this process may be occasionally reversed: poems from our book were transcribed on stone.<sup>2</sup> The collection considered here was a milestone since it raised the genre to the rank of literature. There are numerous parallels with Catullus, Ovid, and Martial. The author was qualified to compete with these ingenious predecessors.

Literary Technique

Artful variatio allows discovery of ever new facets of a limited subject. When comparing Priapus with other gods our poet now studies their favorite places (70), now their arms (20; cf. 9), now typical features of their bodies (36). Myth serves as a foil (16; 68) and the author takes a 'worm's eye view' of it. There is scabrous play on sounds and words (7; 54), there are charades<sup>3</sup> (67), and pseudo-naive interpretations of Greek words according to what they sound like to Roman ears (68).

Each epigram exhibits a calculated structure; the author brilliantly exploits the tension between 'expectation' and 'explanation'.<sup>4</sup> To give an example, he expressly applies the rhetorical category of 'obscurity' to the first part, which is intentionally mysterious (obscure 3. 1), while attributing to the second part, which is clear and concise the contrary principle of clarity (cf. Latine 3. 9) and simplicity (simplicius multo est ibid.). Such terminological precision adds to the intellectual appeal of the poems.

Language and Style

In accordance with their subject matter, the Priapea use vulgar vocabulary, but their style is sophisticated. This contrast is reminiscent of

<sup>1</sup> CE 193; 862; 1504.

<sup>2</sup> Priap. 14; CE 861.

<sup>3</sup> On epigrams as enigmas V. BUCHHEIT 1962, 82–87.

<sup>4</sup> G. E. LESSING, Zerstreute Anmerkungen über das Epigramm und einige der vornehmsten

the art of Persius the satirist, although the author of the Priapea strives for smooth, not rough composition. Synonyms and paraphrases are numerous and attest to the writer's linguistic inventiveness.<sup>1</sup> Not unlike the best authors, our epigrammatist takes the sound of words seriously. There is brilliant play on homonyms.<sup>2</sup> Subtlest nuances of sound and rhythm<sup>3</sup> are meaningful; meter is handled with unusual care.<sup>4</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The two initial poems introduce the reader to form and subject matter of the Priapea. Roman severity (supercilium) has to stay outside, and the reader will have to face the naked truth (1).<sup>5</sup> A later poem plays on the usual—and useless—warning addressed to chaste ladies (8). The Priapea have allegedly been written in a playful vein and without particular effort (2. 1–3); this assertion is typical of 'lower' genres and must not be taken literally.<sup>6</sup> To assume that the Priapea is a real collection of graffiti composed by different anonymi would amount to annulling the author's literary achievement. With a modesty fitting the genre, our poet keeps aloof from the Muses (2. 4–8), not unlike other authors of deliberately 'artless' poetry.

---

Epigrammatisten 1, 2 (s. above: Roman Epigram); even on single epigrams, Lessing (ibid. IV. Priapeia) is worth reading.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. metaphors such as traicere (11. 3), laxare (31. 3), perforare (76. 3); however, the poet does not avoid obscene vocabulary.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. magnis testibus (15. 7; cf. already Plaut. Curc. 32).

<sup>3</sup> In 11. 3 an accumulation of spondees illustrates size and tension.

<sup>4</sup> In the Phalaecean hendecasyllable a 'diaeretic' ending with two disyllables is generally unpopular; in this regard, the Priapea are especially severe (exceptions amount to no more than 1. 36 %: G. BENDZ, Gnomon 44, 1972, 828). The ending of the pentameter almost always is disyllabic, never trisyllabic (here our author is more rigorous than even Martial). The five-syllable-word supercilium is emphatically placed to embody traditional literary polemics (1. 2; 49. 4). Four-syllable-words are used at the end of the pentameter only if they are proper names or if they form the 'point' of the epigram.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Petron. 132 extr.

<sup>6</sup> The 'artlessness' of Priapus' statue (10. 2–4) is in harmony with this fiction, as is the god's lack of education: libros non lego, poma lego (68. 2).

Ideas II

The compass of themes is larger than it had been in Greek epigrams on Priapus. Still it is relatively limited: the unmistakable bodily attribute of Priapus, the chastisement of thieves, the gifts offered to the god. The play on serious Roman morality (which seems to be abrogated at the entrance of Priapus' temple), the relentless unmasking of hypocrisy, and the liberation from bourgeois constraints of Roman society are some aspects which make a reading of the collection rewarding for a public interested in cultural history and psychology. The rise of this sub-literary genre fits into the framework of the imperial period. The restrictions of liberty in political life and in 'high' literary genres indirectly conferred new dignity on genres like fable, epigram, occasional poetry, and novel.

Transmission

There are about 75 recent manuscripts. On the one hand (A) there is the Laurentianus 33, 31 (14th century), written by Boccaccio. On the other (B), there had been an independent copy (now lost), from which the following manuscripts derive: Guelferbytanus 373 (Helmst. 338), Laurentianus 39, 34, Vossianus Latinus O. 81 (15th century).<sup>1</sup>

Influence

The Priapea were influential in the Middle Ages.<sup>2</sup> In the modern period they found enthusiastic readers, beginning with Boccaccio.<sup>3</sup> Lessing, himself an author of Latin and German epigrams, discussed textual problems in several Priapea.<sup>4</sup> The 3rd and 4th of Goethe's Elegies are Priapean.<sup>5</sup>

Editions: In the edition of Virgil by Io. Andreas DE BUSSI, Romae, printed by C. SWEYNHEIM and A. PANNARTZ before 1469. * F. BÜCHELER, W. HERAEUS in <sup>1</sup> For a subtler view: V. BUCHHEIT, Gnomon 33, 1963, 34–38 (4 groups: around A; around the Wratislaviensis Rehdigeranus 60, 15th century; the large group B; and a mixed class; cf. now W. H. PARKER, edition, praef. 50–53 (based on R. E. CLAIRMONT 1983).

<sup>2</sup> M. COULON, La poésie priapique dans l'antiquité et au moyen âge, Paris 1932.

<sup>3</sup> Traces in France and Italy: HIGHET, Class. Trad. 651.

<sup>4</sup> S. p. 1053, n. 5; especially felicitous is Lessing's punctuation of no. 24.

<sup>5</sup> HIGHET, Class. Trad. 667 (bibl.).

the appendix to their edition of Petronius, Berlin 6th ed. 1922. * F. VOLLMER, Poetae Latini Minores 2, 2, Lipsiae 1923. * A. MAGGI (C), Napoli 1923. * C. PASCAL, Carmina ludicra Romanorum, Torino 1931; new edition by I. CAZZANIGA 1959. * C. FISCHER, B. KYTZLER (TTrN), Salzburg 1969; new edition (sel.) München 1978. * E. MONTERO-CARTELLE (TrN; together with Pompeian inscriptions, the Pervigilium Veneris and other texts), Madrid 1981. * R. E. CLAIRMONT, diss. Chicago 1983. * W. H. PARKER (TTrC), London 1988. ** Concordance: H. MORGENROTH, D. NAJOCK, Hildesheim 1983. ** Bibl.: s. V. BUCHHEIT.

J. N. ADAMS, The Latin Sexual Vocabulary, London 1982. * J. N. ADAMS, A Type of Sexual Euphemism in Latin, Phoenix 35, 1981, 120–128. * V. BUCHHEIT, Feigensymbolik im antiken Epigramm, RhM 103, 1969, 200–229. * V. BUCHHEIT, Studien zum Corpus Priapeorum, München 1962. * V. BUCHHEIT, Priapeum 3 und Ovid, RhM 131, 1988, 157–161. * F. BÜCHELER, Vindiciae libri Priapeorum, RhM 18, 1863, 381–415. * H. DAHLMANN, Priapeum 82: Ein Gedicht Tibulls?, Hermes 116, 1988, 434–445. * V. GRASSMANN, Die erotischen Epoden des Horaz, München 1966. * H. HERTER, De Priapo, Gießen 1932. * E. M. O'CONNOR, Symbolum Salacitatis. A Study of the God Priapus as a Literary Character, Frankfurt 1989. * A. RICHLIN, The Garden of Priapus. Sexuality and Aggression in Roman Humor, New Haven 1983. * J. K. SCHÖNBERGER, Zur Sprache der Priapeen, Glotta 28, 1940, 88–99. * R. VERDIÈRE, Notes sur les Priapea, Latomus 41, 1982, 620–646.

III. PROSE

A. HISTORIOGRAPHY AND RELATED GENRES

VELLEIUS PATERCULUS

Life and Dates

Velleius Paterculus (his praenomen is controversial) originated from the municipal aristocracy, a social class which in those days was gaining in importance. From the mother's side, Decius Magius (Liv. 23. 7-10), a Capuan devoted to Rome, was among his ancestors (Vell. 2. 16. 2). His paternal grandfather, C. Velleius, had been praefectus fabrum under Pompey, his father was praefectus equitum under Augustus and a client of Ti. Claudius Nero, the father of Emperor Tiberius. Our author, who was a faithful vassal of Tiberius, also enjoyed the protection of M. Vinicius (consul A.D. 30), an influential personality, who later married a daughter of Germanicus.

Velleius was born in 20 or 19 B.C.; he served as a military tribune in Thrace and Macedonia (Vell. 2. 101. 3) under P. Silius and P. Vinicius, the father of his future protector. As an eye-witness he was present at the encounter of C. Caesar and King Phraataces of Parthia (2. 101. 2-3). In A.D. 4 Augustus adopted Tiberius (2. 103. 3); after this date Velleius as praefectus equitum (2. 104. 3) accompanied Tiberius to the Rhine. He became quaestor in A.D. 6, without being able to exercise this office, since he had to assist Tiberius during a riot in Pannonia (2. 111. 3). After his return to Rome, he at once had to return, as legatus Augusti, to his prince (2. 111. 4). He passed the winter (A.D. 7/8) in Siscia (2. 113. 3) and stayed in Pannonia until A.D. 9 (2. 114. 5-115. 1). Between 9 and 11 he accompanied Tiberius on his German campaigns and witnessed his triumph in Rome in 12 (2. 121. 3). In 15 he became praetor (2. 124. 4). It is uncertain if he is identical with the P. Velleius mentioned in Tacitus (ann. 3. 39. 1-2). We have no notice of him later than A.D. 30, the date of publication of his work. Did he fall a victim to the persecutions after the downfall of Sejanus? The fact that his patron, M. Vinicius, survived the catastrophe is no proof to the contrary. In any case, we cannot conclude from the passage 2. 127. 3–4 that Velleius should have been an enemy<sup>1</sup> of Sejanus.

We do not know the exact title of Velleius' historical work. He dedicated it to M. Vinicius, the son<sup>2</sup> of his former commander, on the occasion of the consulate of the addressee (A.D. 30); the book was written therefore before January (less probably: July) 30.<sup>3</sup> Many apostrophes<sup>4</sup> and an original computation of years ('before the consulate of Vinicius')<sup>5</sup> establish a close relationship to the recipient. Velleius may have been preparing this work for a long time;<sup>6</sup> we need not suppose, then, that it was written down in haste. The relevant remarks show that Velleius complains of lack of space rather than of time.<sup>7</sup> In literary criticism, τάχος ('rapidity') is a synonym for συντομία ('brevity').<sup>8</sup> Consequently, his history should not be considered a parergon.<sup>9</sup>

Velleius toys with the idea of writing a larger work covering at least the period from the beginning of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey to the days of Velleius. However, Roman authors are not particularly sparing of promises to celebrate the exploits of living rulers.

Velleius' roots and biography left traces in his work: we recognize the theme of homo novus, a soldierly devotion to Tiberius, a closeness to the literary circle of the Vinicii, and also some deformations of character concomitant of an epoch and a government detrimental to free speech and historical writing. As a corollary, it might be worth inquiring if Velleius' striving for brevity reflects a general tendency of Tiberian literature.

<sup>1</sup> For enmity: A. J. WOODMAN, CQ 1975, 302 with n. 5; the text is evidently panegyric: J. HELLEGOUARC'H, L'éloge de Séjan dans l'Histoire Romaine de Velleius Paterculus, Caesarodunum 15<sup>bis</sup>, 1980, 143–155.

<sup>2</sup> Incorrect A. DIHLE, RE s.v. Velleius 640.

<sup>3</sup> In favor of the beginning of 30: A. J. WOODMAN, CQ 1975, 276; for the middle of the same year (or late summer): G. V. SUMNER 1970, 284–288.

<sup>4</sup> 1. 13. 5; 2. 101. 3; 103. 1; 113. 1; 130. 4.

<sup>5</sup> 1. 8. 1 and 4; 2. 7. 5; 49. 1; 65. 2; 103. 3.

<sup>6</sup> A. J. WOODMAN, CQ 1975, 275–282.

<sup>7</sup> 1. 16. 1; 2. 41. 1; 108. 2; 124. 1; 2. 55. 1; 86. 1; 89. 1; 99. 3–4; 103. 4; 119. 1.

<sup>8</sup> A. J. WOODMAN, CQ 1975, 278–282; Lucian, hist. conscr. 56.

<sup>9</sup> Justly A. J. WOODMAN, CQ 1975, 303.

Survey of the Work

Velleius' history consists of two books. The first is mutilated at the beginning and exhibits a considerable lacuna in chapters 8/9. It treats the time from the end of the Trojan War up to 146 B.C. in 18 chapters. The 2nd book is clearly separated from the 1st by exkursuses. It consists of 131 chapters and discusses at increasing length the period from 146 B.C. to Velleius' own time. It ends in a panegyric on Tiberius. The structure of the work has been compared very aptly to that of a pyramid.<sup>1</sup> We will come back to this unusual form which has been chosen on purpose (1. 14. 1 and 1. 16. 1).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Among the possible sources we have to consider in the first place the works of Cornelius Nepos;<sup>2</sup> this is true of both his world chronicle and his biographies. However, Velleius was susceptible to many influences, as shows from his chronology,<sup>3</sup> his selection of material, and his sympathies. To give an example, the date of the foundation of Rome in Velleius (1. 8. 4–6) is the same as in Atticus' Annalis liber, but Atticus—unlike Velleius and Nepos—does not mention Greek literature. Moreover, scholars have thought of Pompeius Trogus;<sup>4</sup> but the parallels are too trivial to be cogent. In the 2nd book, in particular, Velleius follows an author clearly prepossessed in favor of the optimates and Pompey. He probably consulted Augustus' De vita sua as well (Suet. Aug. 85. 1). His information on the battle of Varus possibly stems from Livy,<sup>5</sup> who also furnished significant exempla. Yet, there are divergences in details and differences of emphasis suggest that Velleius relied on biographies as well. This brings us back to Nepos, whose biographies were of easier access than laudationes funebres buried in family archives.

Velleius' opinions in matters of literature partly coincide with those expressed in Cicero's Brutus and Quintilian's Institutio; he must have used a source responsive to rhetorical traditions. If, on the other hand, Velleius is eloquently reticent about authors no lesser than

<sup>1</sup> J. HELLEGOUARC'H 1976, 240.

<sup>2</sup> There are parallels between Velleius and Apollodorus, the source of Nepos.

<sup>3</sup> A survey in: J. HELLEGOUARC'H 1984, 411–412; cf. J. DE WEVER 1969.

<sup>4</sup> In favor of his dependence on Trogus: R. PERNA, Le fonti storiche di Velleio Patercolo, Lucera 1925, 18; against: M. L. PALADINI 1953, 457.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Vell. 2. 117–119 together with Flor. 2. 30 = 4. 12.

Ennius and Plautus, this may be owing to a 'neoteric' bias of his source Nepos<sup>1</sup> (or even of the circle of Vinicius).

Furthermore, there are traces of Sallustian<sup>2</sup> and Ciceronian influence. Velleius frequently follows authors rooted like himself in a municipal ambience. In all probability this is not a deliberate choice but a consequence of the fact that this social class was strongly represented in literature.

His work is generally thought to be a Roman History (this is the title framed by Beatus Rhenanus); actually, it is a compendium of universal history,<sup>3</sup> the record of mankind in a nutshell,<sup>4</sup> at least as far as the 1st book is concerned. Given the novelty of his conception, Velleius is entitled to deem his opusculum something 'out of the ordinary'—quite unlike 'regular books' (iustis voluminibus).<sup>5</sup> In fact, it is easier to find models for details than for his overall design. The 'chronographies' of Eratosthenes of Cyrene (about 257–194 B.C.) had touched upon literary history as well; the latter's follower, Apollodorus of Athens (around 180 B.C.), included the development of many disciplines, even philosophy (for the benefit of pupils, he put his vade-mecum into comic trimeters). L. Scribonius Libo had compiled a (presumably rather jejune) list of magistrates. Varro's De gente populi Romani encompassed non-Roman material as well and was an attempt to reconcile Roman and foreign chronology. However, the same author's Annales were in all likelihood limited to Rome and not concerned with literary history. Finally, Sallust's adviser, Ateius philologus (Suet. gramm. 10) had drawn up a Breviarium rerum omnium Romanarum. We should be happy if we knew more about these works. As a universal historian concerned about brevity<sup>6</sup> and not free of a panegyric bent, Velleius, to our knowledge, is only comparable with later authors like Florus, Sulpicius Severus, Eutropius, and Orosius. For us, he inaugurates a 'new' genre.

<sup>1</sup> L. ALFONSI, Sulla Cronaca di Cornelio Nepote, RIL 76, 2, 1942–1943, 331–340, esp. 337–339.

<sup>2</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH 1974, 81.

<sup>3</sup> Vell. 1. 16. 1; 2. 29. 2; 38. 1; 41. 1; 52. 3; 55. 1; 66. 3; 86. 1; 89. 1; 99. 3; 124. 1.

<sup>4</sup> G. V. SUMNER 1970, 282.

<sup>5</sup> Vell. 2. 48. 5; 114. 4; 119. 1; R. J. STARR 1981, 166.

<sup>6</sup> E. S. RAMAGE 1982.

Literary Technique

The work probably started with a dedication to Vinicius; such dedications, unknown to the great historians, are found in Coelius, Lutatius Catulus, Cornelius Sulla, and Aulus Hirtius, who is a kindred spirit of our author.<sup>1</sup>

On a large scale, Velleius observes the chronological order of events. In a way reminiscent of Livy's annalistic method, he alternately discusses Italian and foreign affairs. Velleius shapes individual narrative units and arranges them in juxtaposition. Two diverging types of narrative<sup>2</sup> alternate: one, strictly organized and dramatic; the other, ornate and knit more loosely. Like Sallust, Velleius avoids lingering on tedious details. His narrative technique was schooled by the influence of biography and anecdote.

As Velleius groups events around individual characters, some features of his work are reminiscent of biography. His portraits of Tiberius (2. 94–99) and Sejanus (2. 127. 3–4), for all their laudatory bias, exhibit a refined technique (antithesis, variation, synchrisis) which assigns to Velleius a place between Sallust and Tacitus. Consummate miniatures portray minor characters such as Cato the Younger, Saturninus, L. Piso, and Curio (who recalls Sallust's Catiline). Female characters—from heroic to demoniac—complete the gallery: Calpurnia, Fulvia, Livia, Servilia, Julia.

The great number of exempla tells of the author's rhetorical training. Many of them are also found in Livy and Valerius Maximus. Moreover, a description of landscape like 1. 16. 2 is reminiscent of the school of rhetoric, the influence of which is not limited to panegyric passages. Generally speaking, Velleius' 'rhetorical' history cannot be reduced to a uniform pattern. (Nor is his account of the same quality throughout). According to Tiberius' teacher, Theodorus of Gadara, rhetoric does not follow mechanical rules: we should keep in mind this theory whenever approaching the multifaceted literature of the Tiberian epoch. Nevertheless, Velleius' history is more carefully wrought than some of us might have expected.

<sup>1</sup> H. PETER, Der Brief in der römischen Literatur, Leipzig 1901, 243; 247–248.

<sup>2</sup> R. J. STARR 1978.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

The 'studied negligence' of Tiberian literature is also felt in Velleius' handling of language.

In some instances, he succeeds in creating a dignified historical style. To give an example, he shares Sallust's preference for raising abstract nouns to the rank of acting subjects: D. Brutum Antonii interemit crudelitas, 'the cruelty of Antony ended the life of D. Brutus' (2. 87. 2). In this way he achieves intensity and brevity. His concise verdict on the relations between Rome and Carthage is worthy of the pen of Sallust: aut bellum . . . aut belli praeparatio aut infida pax, 'either war or preparations for war or a treacherous peace' (1. 12. 7).

Under the sway of rhetoric individual features gain prominence at the cost of the proportions of the whole.<sup>2</sup> The reader remembers the antithesis evoked on the occasion of Pompey's death: Does a man need much soil? Ut cui modo ad victoriam terra defuerat, deesset ad sepulturam, 'that he who but a short time before had found no more lands to conquer now found none for his burial' (2. 53. 3). Similarly, Velleius, owing to his training in declamation, shows a preference for alliteration, parallelism, metaphor and prose rhythm.<sup>3</sup>

Generally speaking, his language and style hold an intermediate position between the classical period of the 1st century B.C. and the Neronian epoch, with Seneca the Younger as its exponent. Hence, the style of Velleius oscillates between well-rounded periods and short-winded commata. Sophistication and negligence<sup>4</sup> coexist gracefully—in harmony with the fashion of the day and the teachings of contemporary rhetoric. In his most accomplished passages Velleius seems to speak directly to his addressee or to his reader. It is a shame indeed that, at the end, the author as a human being disappears behind the mask of a Byzantine panegyrist. But this very fact must be an integral part of any truthful portrait of the epoch and the author.

<sup>1</sup> E. BOLAFFI, De Velleiano sermone et quibusdam dicendi generis quaestionibus selectis, Pisauri 1925; F. PORTALUPI, Osservazioni sullo stile di Velleio Patercolo, CCC 8, 1987, 39–57.

<sup>2</sup> E. BOLAFFI 1960.

<sup>3</sup> E. BOLAFFI, De Velleiano sermone . . ., Pisauri 1925; for his style, cf. also: L. CASTIGLIONI, Alcune osservazioni a Velleio Patercolo, RAL 6, 7, 5–10, 1931, 268–273.

<sup>4</sup> Similarly, Pliny describes the works of a certain C. FANNIUS as inter sermonem historiamque medios (Plin. epist. 5. 5. 3).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature<sup>1</sup>

Velleius is one of the few ancient historians who, within the framework of general history, take cognizance of the development of literature. In digressions devoted to this subject, he discusses Homer and Hesiod (1. 5 and 1. 7), engages in a comparative account of Greek and early Roman literature (1. 16–18), and surveys the history of Roman literature up to Sulla (2. 9), to dwell, finally, on the ‘golden age’ of Caesar and Augustus (2. 36). Since many of his verdicts on authors are akin to those of Cicero and Quintilian,<sup>2</sup> it might be tempting to consider him a ‘moderate Atticist’.<sup>3</sup> As a member of the circle of the Vinicii, however, he is able to acquire a taste for more ‘modern’ tendencies as well, to the point of finding words of praise for Ovid and Rabirius (2. 36. 3). His silence on Ennius and Plautus may spring from the self-confidence of an age convinced to have outshone those luminaries of a remote past.

Though firmly rooted in the classical tradition of ‘canonizing’ certain authors,<sup>4</sup> Velleius is ready to accept innovation as a principle of historical development: in fact, his creed is a renewal of literature per genera. He starts from observing that each single artistic genre achieved perfection within a short period of time<sup>5</sup> (eminentia cuiusque operis artissimis temporum claustris circumdata, ‘the pre-eminent works in each type of art are confined within the narrowest limits of time’ 1. 17. 4). This phenomenon, according to Velleius, is caused by a psychological law:<sup>6</sup> emulation (aemulatio) soon leads to perfection, which is followed by decline.<sup>7</sup> Epigones who despair of equaling their predecessors, search

<sup>1</sup> E. CIZEK 1972, 85–93.

<sup>2</sup> On Accius (1. 17. 1; 2. 9. 3; cf. Ov. am. 1. 15. 19; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 97); on Afranius (1. 17. 1; 2. 9. 3; Cic. Brut. 45. 167; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 100); on Sallust (2. 36. 2 and 3; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 101); on Cicero (1. 17. 3; 2. 36. 2; like Seneca the Elder, Tacitus in the Dialogus, and Quintilian, passim).

<sup>3</sup> As did F. DELLA CORTE 1937; contradicted by E. CIZEK 1972, 88.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. his excursuses on literature: 1. 5; 1. 7. 1; 1. 16–18; 2. 9; 2. 36.

<sup>5</sup> According to Velleius there were not only privileged periods, in which literature and art flourished, but also privileged places like Athens (1. 18).

<sup>6</sup> Velleius does know that he can only find ‘probable’, not ‘true’ causes (1. 17. 5).

<sup>7</sup> Vell. 1. 17. 6: difficilisque in perfecto mora est; Sen. contr. 1 praef. 6–7: lex est ut ad summum perducta rursus ad infimum . . . relabantur; on this: L. A. SUSSMAN, The Elder Seneca’s Discussion of the Decline of Roman Eloquence, CSCA 5, 1972, 195–210, esp. 206–209; Hippocrates, Aphor. 1. 3; Celsus med. 2. 2. 1; for aemulatio cf. honos alii artes (Cic. Tusc. 1. 2. 4); cf. also G. B. VICO’s theory of corsi e ricorsi; L. ALFONSI, La dottrina dell’aemulatio in Velleio Patercolo, Aevum 40, 1966, 375–378.

for another field of action (1. 17. 6–7). By his implicit reserves against mere imitatio and his acceptance of modern literary developments Velleius made available some arguments which prepared the ‘new style’ of the 1st century A.D.

It is true that Velleius did not notice that great authors may be born independently of any particular epoch. This, however, is an aspect which ultimately defies historical research. On the other hand, he convincingly highlights certain conditions—like aemulatio—as factors shaping history.

Ideas II

The intellectual horizon of our author, if not particularly original, helps us to get a glimpse of the mentality of his class and of the situation of Roman historiography in his day. We must recognize, however, that he does not treat Roman history as an isolated subject but as part of universal history. His perspective includes Greece and Carthage, and he even is aware of the dangers imminent from the Parthians and Teutons. History falls into two parts. As in Sallust, the destruction of Carthage is the turning point (2. 1.). This borderline is defined in terms of ethics. The time after that moment comprises several epochs. The main breaks are the beginning of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, the restoration of the state by Octavian, and Tiberius’ accession to the throne. This subdivision does not evince a particularly subtle sense of historically relevant caesuras.<sup>1</sup>

More intriguing is Velleius’ above-mentioned approach to the history of literature and art. Scholars tried to apply its principles to general history as well. This would mean that in the imperial period a realization of Roman life in a new genus occurred, in which Roman virtus and Rome’s fortuna would be re-established.<sup>2</sup> Yet, for Velleius, history is not divided into ‘Republic’ and ‘Empire’<sup>3</sup> but the epochs before and after the destruction of Carthage. There is no mention of a possible downfall in the future (an assumption which would be inevitable in a ‘biological’ conception of history). Therefore we should abstain from searching for profound philosophical ideas in

<sup>1</sup> R. J. STARR 1978.

<sup>2</sup> E. CIZEK 1972, 89–91.

<sup>3</sup> As E. CIZEK 1972, 89 implies.

Velleius. His rhetorical historiography is imbued with the moralism inherent in the genre.

Velleius' view of fortuna enters into the same rhetorical and historical traditions.<sup>1</sup> Man struggles with her: Rumpit, interdum moratur moratur proposita hominum fortuna, 'Fortune sometimes breaks off completely, sometimes merely delays, the execution of men's plans' (2. 110. 1). The struggle of virtus and fortuna is a venerable theme.<sup>2</sup> As in Cicero (Phil 3. 16), Trogus, and others,<sup>3</sup> in Velleius virtus and fortuna must be united; the actions of certain heroes seem to be predestinated.<sup>4</sup> Fortuna, whose activity becomes prominent after the fall of Carthage, favors Caesar, Augustus, and Tiberius.

Velleius has a Roman and an Italic identity (hence his solidarity with Italy's inhabitants and their struggle for the right of citizenship). He is a homo novus and is sympathetic with his equals (esp. 2. 128). He adds, however, some spice to the traditional moralism of Roman historiography by unflinchingly supporting the optimates, a bent rather surprising with a homo novus but perfectly in tune with the conservative mind of a petit bourgeois and with a military's devotion to authority. He rebukes the populares and condemns the policy of the Gracchi (2. 2-3; 6-7), of Cinna (2. 20; 24), of Marius (2. 212-23), and of the first triumvirate (2. 44). He praises Scipio Nasica (2. 3), Cato the Younger (2. 35) and, of course, Cicero (2. 34; 45; 66). His assessment of Pompey is ambivalent (2. 29-30; 33; 40; 48; 53), since in this case there is a conflict between the senator's romantic attachment to the optimates and the soldier's loyalty to Caesar.<sup>5</sup>

Velleius is part of the class of homines novi who gained political influence under Augustus and Tiberius.<sup>6</sup> It is true that it was not a principle of Tiberius to favor self-made men (although Sejanus should be mentioned), but Velleius, the proficient officer of municipal origin, was the typical 'up-and-coming man'. Another proof of his ambition are his efforts to immortalize himself and his family in his work.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>1</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH 1964, 680-683; F. CUPAIUOLO, Caso, fato e fortuna nel pensiero di alcuni storici Latini. Spunti e appunti, BStudLat 14, 1984, 3-38.

<sup>2</sup> For 2. 48. 2 defuisset fortunae destruendi eius locus cf. Cic. Tusc. 1. 35. 86; Sen. cons. Marc. 20. 4.

<sup>3</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH 1964, 681.

<sup>4</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH 1964, 676-677.

<sup>5</sup> He approves of Caesar in 2. 41-43; 47; 52; 56-57, but slightly blames him in 56; 49 is ambivalent.

<sup>6</sup> I. LANA 1952.

<sup>7</sup> 2. 16. 2-3; 69. 5; 76. 1; 101. 2-3; 104. 3; 111. 3-4; 113. 3; 114. 1-2; 115. 1; 121. 3; 124. 4.

Although Velleius promised to be honest (iustus sine mendacio candor, 'fair-minded candor without misrepresentation' 2. 116. 5) he neither kept nor could he have kept his promise. In his panorama of the Roman empire the cruel aspects are missing,<sup>1</sup> a vision prepared by Livy; but Velleius' account is biased to the point of distorting facts:<sup>2</sup> Antony and Lepidus, not Augustus were responsible for the proscriptions (2. 66). The raving soldiery, not Augustus, were guilty of the massacre of Perusia (2. 74). In the battle of Actium, Augustus fought to rescue the world, and this was the most merciful of all victories (2. 85-86). Even in Alexandria (2. 87. 2) and when Julia's lovers were punished (2. 100. 5) our scribbler dares talk of clemency. As early as in Augustus' lifetime Tiberius had been the only pillar of the empire (2. 103). He appears as the perfect monarch. Under his reign the new political system has attained its climax. The murder of Agrippa Postumus (2. 112) and the removal of Germanicus to the east (2. 129) are varnished over with mendacious phraseology. Horace is absent from the survey of literary history, perhaps for having acknowledged Drusus, the more talented brother of Tiberius.<sup>3</sup> It is true that even Tacitus acknowledged the positive achievements of Tiberius during the first years of his reign (Tac. ann. 4. 6) but when Velleius was writing, times had changed. Five years earlier the courageous historian Cremutius Cordus had died. Tiberius had already shown of what he was capable. Velleius, however, persistently maintained that everything was in perfect order. Nevertheless it must be acknowledged that he dedicated his work to Vinicius, not to Sejanus.

In a period hardly allowing of free expression of opinion, Velleius was one of those self-made men who supported the new regime. Nobody had compelled him to choose this career. He became what he had wished to become: perhaps not a propagandist but certainly a historian close to the imperial court and prone to panegyric embellishments.

---

<sup>1</sup> J. HELLEGOUARC'H 1974.

<sup>2</sup> R. SYME 1978.

<sup>3</sup> R. J. GOAR, Horace, Velleius Paterculus, and Tiberius Caesar, Latomus 35, 1976, 43-54; esp. 53-54.

Tradition

The text is based on the lost Murbachensis (M; 8th century), which had been written in Carolingian minuscule.<sup>1</sup> In 1515 Beatus Rhenanus had discovered this manuscript in the Benedictine Abbey at Murbach, Alsatia. The humanist had a copy made, which turned out to be faulty (R); the editio princeps (P) was published under his direction with an appended list of readings of M based on a new collation by J. A. Burer. In addition, we have to take into account the quotations from Velleius in Beatus Rhenanus' edition of the Germania. Finally, there are his marginal notes in the Schlettstadt copy of his edition of Velleius.<sup>2</sup>

Although the Murbachensis was lost, we have another copy (A), written by Bonifaz Amerbach (Univ. bibl. Basel AN II 8). It was on this manuscript that J. C. Orelli based his edition (Leipzig 1835). Whether Amerbach's source was M or R is still disputed. The first eight chapters are lacking in A; for them, the editio princeps is our sole witness.

Influence

Tacitus is reticent on Velleius, although there is evidence that he did use him.<sup>3</sup> In the 4th century, Sulpicius Severus depended on him.<sup>4</sup> As a rule, Velleius was rarely mentioned in classical antiquity and during the Middle Ages.

In his book De argumentis scientiarum, Roger Bacon (13th century) praised Velleius for including literary history into his survey of general history, and declared that a historical account disregarding literature was like a Polyphemus deprived of his eye.<sup>5</sup> The great number of printed editions<sup>6</sup> shows that Velleius' work was not considered an ordinary compendium and that he was taken seriously, especially in the 17th and 18th centuries. For English readers, he was one of the authors who embodied the pure Latin style, and students were compelled to read him.<sup>7</sup> Like many compendia of its kind, Velleius' work

<sup>1</sup> J. C. M. LAURENT, Über die Murbacher Handschrift des Velleius, Serapeum 8, 1847, 188–192.

<sup>2</sup> G. VON DER GÖNNA, Beatus Rhenanus und die Editio princeps des Velleius Paterculus, WJA n.s. 3, 1977, 231–242, esp. 231–238.

<sup>3</sup> For a possible influence in the 1st century: A. J. WOODMAN 1975 with bibl. (in: DOREY), 24, n. 69.

<sup>4</sup> E. KLEBS, Entlehnungen aus Velleius, Philologus 49, 1890, 285–311.

<sup>5</sup> Quoted by E. BOLAFFI 1960, 337.

<sup>6</sup> Between 1520 and 1933 there were 47 editions (according to A. DIHLE 1955, 654).

<sup>7</sup> A. J. WOODMAN (in: DOREY) 1975, 18.

was more read than quoted. It did not fail to inspire historiography of modern times: Hénault, a politician and writer (d. 1770) expressed his love for this modèle inimitable des abrégés. These are his memorable words: Je ne me lasse point de le lire, je l'ai admiré toute ma vie; il réunit tous les genres; il est historien quoique abrégiateur. Il en dit assez pour instruire; sa précision ne vient pas d'impuissance. L'ouvrage de Velleius Paterculus suffit à l'apologie des abrégés chronologiques.<sup>1</sup> It is true that Hénault was not entirely unprejudiced, since he was himself the author of an ingenious and popular Abrégé chronologique de l'histoire de France (1744). Some modern scholars went even further: they approved his portrayal of Tiberius to the point of preferring Velleius to Tacitus.

Both for its form and content, his work is typical of its epoch: as Velleius was an eyewitness of the time of Tiberius, his work is valuable historical evidence. While Tacitus reflects the attitude of the senators in the ruler's last years, Velleius is not to be neglected as a witness for his early years. His perspective is that of an officer; in this regard he resembles Hirtius. His unconditioned dedication to his commander and his more or less dexterous efforts at whitewashing him are reminiscent of the same author.

Generally speaking the decline of both historiography and oratory are symptoms of the political change which took place in the early empire. Although we should expect of Velleius neither the expression of an independent opinion nor a political analysis of history, he may interest us as a typical representative of his class, the educated municipal aristocracy, which increasingly became a pillar of the historical process.

The brevity of the work—in contrast to Livy—is part of the style of the Tiberian epoch (cf. Phaedrus); the same is true of the author's propensity to rhetoric. Typical of the time is a style both loose and affected: it is fashionable to display a disdain for strict rules and a calculated spontaneity. Velleius is neither a philosopher nor an artist, but a leading prose writer of the Tiberian epoch, a transitory phase between Augustan classicism and Neronian baroque.

It is one of his special merits to have incorporated literary history into general history. He combined universal, literary and contemporary history into a unique opusculum, difficult to fit into current patterns.

---

<sup>1</sup> In: P. HAINSELIN, H. WATELET, eds., Velleius Paterculus et Florus (TTrN), Paris 1932, 10.

Editions: BEATUS RHENANUS, Basel: Froben 1520. * R. ELLIS, Oxford 1898, 2nd ed. 1928. * F. PORTALUPI (C), Torino 1967. * J. HELLEGOUARCH (TTrN), 2 vols., Paris 1982. * A. J. WOODMAN (2. 41–93; TC), Cambridge 1983. * A. J. WOODMAN (2. 94–131; TC), Cambridge 1977. * W. S. WATT, Leipzig 1988. * M. GIEBEL (TTr), Stuttgart 1989. ** Concordance: M. ELEFANTE, Hildesheim 1992. * Lexicon: G. A. KOCH, Vollständiges Wörterbuch zum Geschichtswerke des M. VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, Leipzig 1857. ** Bibl.: J. HELLEGOUARCH, Etat présent des travaux sur l'Histoire Romaine de Velleius Paterculus, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 404–436.

E. BOLAFFI, Tre storiografi latini del I secolo d. C.: Velleio Patercolo, Valerio Massimo, Curzio Rufo, GIF 13, 1960, 336–345, esp. 336–340. * E. CIZEK, L'image du renouvellement historique chez Velleius Paterculus, StudClas 14, 1972, 85–93. * F. DELLA CORTE, I giudizi letterari di Velleio Patercolo, RFIC n.s. 15, 1937, 154–159. * J. DELZ, Marginalia critica ad Tiberianam Vellei Paterculi narrationem, in: C. SCHAEUBLIN, ed., FS B. Wyss, Basel 1985, 132–137. * A. DE VIVO, Luxuria e mos maiorum. Indirizzi programmatici della storiografia velleiana, Vichiana 13, 1984, 249–264. * J. DE WEVER, Recherches sur la chronologie de Velleius Paterculus pour la fin du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle avant notre ère (334–302), Latomus 28, 1969, 378–390. * A. DIHLE, Velleius Paterculus, RE 8 A 1, 1955, 637–659. * J. HELLEGOUARCH, Les buts de l'œuvre historique de Velleius Paterculus, Latomus 23, 1964, 669–684. * J. HELLEGOUARCH, L'impérialisme romain d'après l'œuvre de Velleius Paterculus, in: L'idéologie de l'impérialisme romain, Colloque de Dijon (1972), Paris 1974, 69–90. * J. HELLEGOUARCH, Lire et comprendre. Quelques remarques sur le texte de l'Histoire romaine de Velleius Paterculus, REL 54, 1976, 239–256. * J. HELLEGOUARCH, La figure de Tibère chez Tacite et Velleius Paterculus, in: Mélange de littérature et d'épigraphie latines, d'histoire ancienne et d'archéologie. Hommage à la mémoire de P. WULLEUMIER, Paris 1980, 167–183. * J. HELLEGOUARCH, C. JODRY, Les Res gestae d'Auguste et l'Historia Romana de Velleius Paterculus, Latomus 39, 1980, 803–816. * C. KUNTZE, Zur Darstellung des Kaisers Tiberius und seiner Zeit bei Velleius Paterculus, Frankfurt 1985. * I. LANA, Velleio Patercolo o della propaganda, Torino 1952. * D. J. MCGONAGLE, Rhetoric and Biography in Velleius Paterculus, diss. Ohio State Univ. 1970, abstract in: DA 31, 1971, 3528 A. * F. MÜNZER, Zur Komposition des Velleius, in: FS zur 49. Versammlung deutscher Philologen und Schulmänner, Basel 1907, 247–278. * M. L. PALADINI, Studi su Velleio Patercolo, Acme 6, 1953, 447–478. * E. S. RAMAGE, Velleius Paterculus 2. 126. 2–3 and the Panegyric Tradition, Classical Antiquity (University of California) 1, 1982, 266–271. * E. ROSSI, La tecnica ritrattistica in Velleio Patercolo, AFLC n.s. 1, 1976–1977, 97–116. * P. SANTINI, Caratteri del linguaggio critico-letterario di Velleio Patercolo, in: Studia Florentina A. RONCONI oblata, Roma 1970, 383–391.

- * F. A. SCHÖB, Velleius Paterculus und seine literar-historischen Abschnitte, diss. Tübingen 1908. * R. J. STARR, A Literary Introduction to Velleius Paterculus, diss. Princeton 1978, abstract in: DA 39, 1979, 5491 A. * R. J. STARR, Velleius' Literary Techniques in the Organization of his History, TAPhA 110, 1980, 287-301. * R. J. STARR, The Scope and Genre of Velleius' History, CQ n.s. 31, 1981, 162-174. * G. V. SUMNER, The Truth about Velleius Paterculus: Prolegomena, HSPh 74, 1970, 257-297. * R. SYME, Mendacity in Velleius, AJPh 99, 1978, 45-63. * H. J. W. VERHAAK, Velleius Paterculus en de rhetoriek van zijn tijd, diss. Nijmegen 1954. * A. J. WOODMAN, Questions of Date, Genre, and Style in Velleius: Some Literary Answers, CQ n.s. 25, 1975, 272-305. * A. J. WOODMAN, Velleius Paterculus, in: Empire and Aftermath, Silver Latin II, ed. by T. A. DOREY, London and Boston 1975, 1-25. * A. J. WOODMAN, Sallustian Influence on Velleius Paterculus, in: J. BIBAUW, ed., Hommages à M. RENARD, vol. 1, Bruxelles 1969, 785-799.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS

Life and Dates

Valerius Maximus<sup>1</sup> lived under Tiberius, who was the dedicatee of his work. The author was not wealthy (if we may believe him). He went to Asia together with his protector S. Pompeius (2. 6. 8; 4. 7 ext. 2) who perhaps was identical with the consul of 14 (Ov. Pont. 4. 1; 4. 5; 15);<sup>2</sup> he visited Ceos and, possibly, Athens (8. 1 ext. 3; 12 ext. 2).

His work, a collection of exempla, was written between 28 and 32: book 2, after 27 (because of 2. 6. 8); book 4, before 29, because Julia (i.e. Livia) is still alive (6. 1 praef.); the harsh attack on Sejanus (9. 11 ext. 4), reveals that book 9 was written shortly after October 31, 31.

Survey of the Work

The titles of the chapters and the table of contents at the head of the work are not authentic;<sup>3</sup> but Valerius in fact arranged his subject matter according to themes. Within each section Roman and foreign examples are treated separately.

<sup>1</sup> The vita in the editio Veneta 1494 is of late origin and has no historical value.

<sup>2</sup> Against this identification: C. J. CARTER 1975, 31; in favor of it: G. MASLAKOV 1984, 456-457. The passage of Seneca (dial. 9 = tranq. 11. 10) should not be referred to this S. Pompeius but to his son (R. SYME, History in Ovid, Oxford 1978, 162).

<sup>3</sup> W. THORMEYER, De Valerio Maximo et Cicerone quaestiones criticae, diss. Göttingen 1902, 33-35.

The 1st book discusses our duties towards the gods; the 2nd, those towards men in both private and public life; the 3rd, the virtutes helping us to stand our ground; the 4th and 5th, those teaching us to know our place.—From book 6 onward it becomes difficult to give a brief account of the content: 6. 1–8 diverse virtues;<sup>1</sup> 6. 9–7. 6 vicissitudes of life; 7. 7–8. 6 imponderables in law-suits; 8. 7–15 new virtus, education; 9 vitia and curiosities.

This subdivision into ten main sections seems to be in harmony with the ‘ten books’ stated by Paris. 6. 9 would be the turning-point between two types of virtus: one, conveying patterns of behavior (virtus in the narrower sense of the word), and another, comprising practical wisdom (virtus in the larger sense of the word).

The text De praenominiibus found in our manuscripts as ‘book 10’ is not related to Valerius Maximus.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Valerius studied Cicero thoroughly (esp. the De divinatione and the Tusculanae disputationes). Sallust, Pompeius Trogus, Varro, and, perhaps, Livy are likely to have been among his original sources.<sup>2</sup> In fact, his practice of treating both Roman and foreign exempla is reminiscent of Varro’s Imagines and Nepos’ biographies. Today, some scholars are ready to admit that he made direct use of Varro and even of Valerius Antias; however, much information, though naming exquisite sources, is second-hand. To give an example, his knowledge of Coelius Antipater (1. 7. 6) is derived from Cicero (div. 1. 26; 56). This method of working did not fail to produce frequent errors.

Authors like Verrius Flaccus and Hyginus may have acted as intermediaries. It is impossible to reconstruct an older collection of exempla, the like of the Imagines of the forum of Augustus or perhaps Nepos’ Exempla, Atticus’ Imagines or Hyginus’ Exempla<sup>3</sup> and Biographies of Illustrious Men.<sup>4</sup>

Valerius does not presume to be an historian. A detailed comparison with Livy<sup>5</sup> shows that Valerius pursues different aims. In a later

<sup>1</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977, 49.

<sup>2</sup> He did not use Velleius Paterculus: R. HELM 1955, 92–93.

<sup>3</sup> A. KLOTZ 1942.

<sup>4</sup> M. FLECK 1974.

<sup>5</sup> G. MASLAKOV 1984, esp. 461–478.

context we will come back to possible philosophical influences including those of the diatribe. Valerius' work is a product of the school of rhetoric, without being intended for orators exclusively. The writings of Seneca the Elder are a parallel case.

Literary Technique

Valerius Maximus is not satisfied to furnish useful material for orators; he transforms the exemplum into a type of literature,<sup>1</sup> throwing into relief his literary skills and the moral lesson.

Each exemplum consists of an exordium ('introductory'), the narrative proper, and a subsequent reflection. This is how a res gesta is turned into an exemplum.<sup>2</sup>

The exemplum, far from aspiring to historical accuracy,<sup>3</sup> invites the reader to identify himself with a great character by way of admiration or sympathy. An emotional presentation adds to the dramatic effect. Possible alternatives or expectations of onlookers may be used as a contrasting foil, bringing into prominence a surprising event (e.g. 4. 1. 8).<sup>4</sup>

Before Valerius, forensic rhetoric had applied exempla, giving each of them an individual interpretation, appropriate to the given case. After him, under the empire, the use of exempla would become more stereotyped.<sup>5</sup>

Unlike earlier rhetorical repertoria, Valerius' collection was the first destined to be enjoyed, not merely consulted by a fastidious public. Each chapter is meant to be read continuously: the author is concerned with variation (varietas); he arranges his examples to form a climax or an anticlimax (according to degrees of admiratio).<sup>6</sup> His use of Sallustian elements is indicative of his literary claims: witness his prefaces (praef. 1. 2. 8. 7), other personal comments, and even the structure of entire chapters (9. 1).<sup>7</sup> When passing from one story to

<sup>1</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977; for the rhetorical definition of exemplum: Rhet. Her. 4. 44. 62; Cic. inv. 1. 49; bibl. in MASLAKOV 1984, 439, n. 5.

<sup>2</sup> R. GUERRINI 1981, 11-28.

<sup>3</sup> Cic. Brut. 42: concessum est rhetoribus ementiri in historiis, ut aliquid dicere possint argutius; de orat. 2. 241: sive habeas vere, quod narrare possis, quod tamen est mendaciunculis aspergendum, sive fingas.

<sup>4</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977, 72-73.

<sup>5</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977, 200.

<sup>6</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977, 66.

<sup>7</sup> R. GUERRINI 1981, 29-60.

the next, he compares them. His transitional techniques are partly reminiscent of Ovid's Metamorphoses.<sup>1</sup> All these are symptoms of a transformation of manuals into works of literature; in fact, such features do anything but facilitate fast consultation.

Valerius' literary ambitions are not limited to mere delectatio or voluptas; he wants to excite his readers' admiratio. Valerius Maximus is a harbinger of the second sophistic movement.

To be brief, there is a marked contrast between professed modesty ('presenting a collection of material') and literary execution.

Language and Style<sup>2</sup>

Nepotianus<sup>3</sup> objects to our author's prolixity, his indulging in witticisms, and his torrent of words (therefore, he gives an abridged version). For Eduard Norden, Valerius belongs to 'the series of unbearable Latin writers who drive us to despair by their unnatural style'.<sup>4</sup> What Seneca the Elder (contr. 9, praef. 1) said about the 'modern' orator, applies to Valerius: cupit enim se approbare, non causam, 'his aim is to win approval for himself rather than for his cause'; similarly, Nepotianus, praef.: se ostentat sententiis, locis iactat, fundit excessibus, 'he makes a show of aphorisms, he boasts of 'common places', he abounds in digressions'. Part of this tendency are: antitheses, sententiae, personifications, apostrophes, rhetorical questions, exclamations, use of abstract nouns, sometimes far-fetched puns (6. 3. 1a; 8. 7 ext. 11).

In the interpretative passages the vocabulary of Valerius Maximus is more select than in the narrative proper.<sup>5</sup> Valerius, therefore, clearly respects the rhetorical rule saying that a narratio should be simple. Catchwords like Africitas or 'unnaturalness' give no satisfactory explanation of his style, which—in terms of classical theory—is in harmony with the 'epideictic' character of the work.

<sup>1</sup> R. HELM 1955, 95–97.

<sup>2</sup> R. HELM 1955, 98–100 with bibl.

<sup>3</sup> Nepot. 1 praef. (p. 592 KEMPF): igitur de Valerio Maximo mecum sentis opera eius utilia esse, si sint breviter: digna enim cognitione componit, sed colligenda producit, dum se ostentat sententiis, locis iactat, fundit excessibus, et eo fortasse sit paucioribus notus, quod legentium aviditati mora ipsa fastidio est. Recidam itaque...

<sup>4</sup> Kunstprosa 1, 303; cf. Erasmus apud NORDEN ibid. 2, 596–597, n. 3: Valerius Afro potius quam Italo similis.

<sup>5</sup> R. COMBÈS, Gnomon 55, 1983, 317–318.

Valerius had a considerable impact on the development of declamatory style, positively comparable to that of Seneca the Elder.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

For Valerius, the Emperor replaces the Muse of ancient poetry; this recalls an old tradition, attested for us e.g. at the beginning of Virgil's Georgics and, later, in Manilius (1. 7–10), Germanicus (1–16), Lucan (1. 45–66), and Statius (Theb. 1. 22–31). In the case of Valerius Maximus, the topos of 'inspiration' may even be rooted in reality, given his possible sympathies for Tiberius' projected reforms (s. below, Ideas II).

The purpose of his authorship was not only, as generally assumed today, to provide an aid for teachers of oratory but, as he himself said in his praefatio: ut documenta sumere volentibus longae inquisitionis labor absit, 'to spare those who look for historical examples the fatigue of a long research'. In fact, the broad acceptance of his work speaks in favor of this comprehensive intention.

Ideas II

As an historian, Valerius is unreliable, though, in some cases more reliable than one would expect. For instance, the account he gives of Marius is impartial (partly in accordance with Cicero).<sup>2</sup>

It is true that his work serves rhetorical and patriotic aims, but, above all, he is a moralist.<sup>3</sup> When declaring in his introduction that he will collect facta simul ac dicta memoratu digna ('memorable deeds and sayings') he avoids the worn-out term exemplum, but he does use it later on (e.g. 7. 1). In the first place, Valerius wants to describe and interpret the virtues and vices of people. As a 'moralist' (in the French sense of the word) he displays, by means of exempla, a panorama of the world. The duties<sup>4</sup> are arranged according to a traditional scheme (duties towards gods appear before those towards men), a scheme

<sup>1</sup> B. W. SINCLAIR 1980.

<sup>2</sup> T. F. CARNEY, The Picture of Marius in Valerius Maximus, RhM 105, 1962, 289–337.

<sup>3</sup> M. L. PALADINI 1957.

<sup>4</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977, 50.

attested, for instance, in Hierocles of Alexandria. The separation of the doctrine of the duties (books 1–2) from the doctrine of virtues (books 3 and the following) is rooted in late Stoicism.<sup>1</sup> The diatribe, likewise, deserves mention, for it teaches through examples.

In the praefatio Valerius is inspired by Emperor Tiberius, since the latter promotes the virtues to be discussed in the present work. In fact, there are points of contact between the exempla and Tiberius' program of reform. Valerius selects his material with a view to the exigencies of his age.<sup>2</sup> His criticism of luxury (2. 9. 4; 4. 3. 7; 4. 3. 11; laws of Tiberius against luxury A.D. 16),<sup>3</sup> and of usury (4. 8. 3); equally, chapter 6. 1 has contemporary importance (laws on morals).<sup>4</sup> In 4. 1. 10 Valerius reflects the fact that Tiberius renounced expansionism. There is no doubt that he wanted fulfill his didactic purpose by being both 'useful' and 'entertaining' (combining prodesse and delectare).

Under Tiberius, who stuck to traditions, Roman values underwent a phase of rigid formalization. Valerius, for instance, praises the rusticus rigor of Marius (2. 2. 3) that in the house of thrifty Curio and his extravagant son two epochs coexist: eodem tempore et in isdem penetibus duo saecula habitaverunt, frugalissimum alterum, alterum nequissimum, 'at the same time, in the same house two centuries were living, one most modest, one good for nothing' (9. 1. 6).

All the more significant are his attempts at a positive assessment of his own age, which for him is not a period of mere decadence. He certainly appreciates the tranquillity granted to him by his epoch.<sup>5</sup> On the one hand he is convinced of the moral superiority of his nation,<sup>6</sup> on the other, not unlike Cornelius Nepos, he has a high opinion of Greek culture and humanity. He gives pride of place to education. In one instance, in his sapienter dicta aut facta there are even more Greek than Roman examples. Of all Romans, the actor Roscius is chosen as a model of industria (8. 7). Altogether, Valerius stands for values which were modern in his day like humanitas (5. 1) and clementia. He seems to take into account indirectly a change of standards when maintaining that, even with the matrons of early

<sup>1</sup> Ibid. 49.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. 200.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. 78–79.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. 80.

<sup>5</sup> 8. 13 praef.: tranquillitatemque saeculi nostri, qua nulla umquam beator fuit.

<sup>6</sup> 6. 3 ext. 4; 8. 15 ext. 1; 9. 6 ext. 1.

Rome, pudicitia had not been tristis et horrida, 'sullen and rough', but honesto comitatis genere temperata, 'tempered by an honest kind of gentleness' (2. 1. 5). Another proof of a change of moral ideas is the fact that Valerius deems it necessary to justify early Roman severitas (6. 3).

But there is more: He discovers contradictions even within individual characters (duos in uno homine Sullas fuisse, 'two Sullas were existing in one man' 6. 9. 6). In such cases the rhetorical garb of the thought even helps to illuminate the facts.

Our author does not standardize his examples but subjects them to an individual and detailed moral examination.<sup>1</sup> Thus, he draws borderlines between the spheres of different norms: self-confidence versus impertinence (3. 7. 11), greatness and limits of libertas (6. 2), cunning words and deeds between virtue and vice. In chapters 5. 7–5. 9 there may be the idea of moderatio behind the polarity of indulgentia and severitas.<sup>2</sup>

Yet we should not overrate the inner consistency of his work. In some cases, Valerius narrows down the scope of possible interpretations and leaves us with a one-sided verdict.<sup>3</sup> Without limiting himself to moral examples he also describes things he observed in human life, such as similarity of persons (9. 14). He is a moralist in the broad sense of the word, skilled in diagnosis of human affairs.

Under the auspices of varietas Valerius breaks the monotony of Roman examples by foreign ones (1. 6 ext. 1; 2. 10 ext. 1). Narrated in a relaxed mood as they are, the foreign examples allow the reader to take a break (6. 9 ext. 1; 3. 8. ext. 1 sed satiety modo vitanda est, 'best satiety is to be avoided'). The arrangement of the material according to psychological principles shows that Valerius has absorbed the teachings of rhetoric and knows how to conform to his reader's needs. His psychagogia is, as it were, a continuation of poetry in a different medium. As Ovid had created a kaleidoscopic array of myths, Valerius displayed multifaceted refractions of human life in history.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> R. HONSTETTER 1977, 84.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. 98.

<sup>3</sup> G. MASLAKOV 1984, 482.

<sup>4</sup> It is an exorbitant exaggeration to call Valerius' collection of examples the 'most adequate expression of the Roman attitude to history' (H. DREXLER, Die moralische Geschichtsauffassung der Römer, Gymnasium 61, 1954, 168–190, esp. 173).

Transmission

The most important of the numerous manuscripts<sup>1</sup> are the Codex Bernensis 366 (corrected by Lupus of Ferrières) and the Laurentianus Ashburnhamensis 1899. Both manuscripts were written in the 9th century and are derived from the same source. As for indirect transmission, the epitomators help establish the text as well; above all, they fill up the lacuna which disfigures all manuscripts (1. 1 ext. 5–1. 4 ext. 1).

Influence

In antiquity, Valerius was more exploited than quoted. Pliny the Elder named him as a source for books 7 and 33. Moreover, Gellius (12. 7), the author of the spurious '4th book of Fronto', and Lactantius (about 33) were familiar with him. In late antiquity, Julius Paris and Nepotianus produced abridged versions.

In the Middle Ages, the work of Valerius Maximus was extremely wide spread. We have a manuscript personally corrected by Lupus of Ferrières (d. after 862), the Carolingian humanist. His student, Heiric of Auxerre (d. about 876) made excerpts. His pupil Remigius (d. about 908) compiled an index to Valerius. William of Malmesbury (d. about 1142) mentioned him in the preface to his Polyhistor; John of Salisbury (d. 1180), who often quotes Valerius in his Policraticus, a textbook of politics, was in all probability responsible for the redaction of the text current in northern Europe since the late 12th century. William's Gesta Regum and Gesta Pontificum recall both Suetonius and Valerius. The latter is a principal source for Vincent of Beauvais (d. about 1264; Speculum Maius). The earliest commentary on Valerius Maximus was written by Petrarch's friend and adviser, Dionigi da Borgo San Sepolcro,<sup>2</sup> an influential precursor of the Renaissance.

In the Renaissance, manuscripts, commentaries, and extracts spring up even more abundantly. Petrarch (d. 1374) assigned to him the first place among his favorite historians and used him in his De viris illustribus. As early as in the 14th century Valerius was translated into German, French, and Catalan.

<sup>1</sup> A list of manuscripts by D. M. SCHULLIAN 1960. Unfortunately C. J. CARTER'S Cambridge dissertation on the manuscript tradition of Valerius Maximus has not been published.

<sup>2</sup> J. W. LARKIN 1967.

There are early and numerous incunabula; the first were published by Mentelin (Argentorati 1470) and Peter Schoyffer (Moguntiacy 1471). In the 16th century, Valerius was still part of the daily bread for freshmen in Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Among the editors of Valerius Maximus there are names no lesser than Aldus Manutius (Venetiis 1534), Pighius (Antverpiae 1567) and (in a later Pighius-edition) Justus Lipsius (1585 etc.).

Throughout the Renaissance Valerius Maximus is one of the most important sources for the general public's view of antiquity. In the Collegio del Cambio at Perugia, Perugino's (d. 1523) famous frescos were inspired by our author; there we find the same alternation of Roman and foreign persons as in Valerius, and the proportion is the same (2: 1). This masterpiece is not an isolated case.<sup>1</sup>

His popularity lasted until the middle of the 17th century; Montaigne (d. 1592) eagerly read him. Soon, however, he was dethroned by the rediscovered classics: Cicero, Livy, and, especially, the Greeks.

Valerius presents modern historians—uncritically, of course—with an abundance of information otherwise unknown. Therefore we cannot entirely neglect him, for all his well-known shortcomings, as an historical source.

Valerius is neither a man of letters nor a critical historian nor a philosopher. Although being a teacher of rhetoric, he does not want to produce a mere collection of material for orators, but he tries to split up history into momentary visions, which allow to study human nature in all its merits and defects. As a 'moralist' he unfolds a huge panorama of mankind. Along with Romans, he pays heed to foreigners, and even takes note of the virtues of slaves (6. 8), women (6. 7. 3; 6. 1 ext. 1; 5. 1 ext. 2), and children (3. 1. 2; 3. 1 ext. 1). Thus he raised the exemplum to the rank of an independent literary form. His collection, in its treacherous consistency, is reminiscent of Ovid's technique in the Metamorphoses. The 'epidictic' style of Valerius, unclassical and abundant as it is, announces the 2nd century. Modern commentaries and translations are desiderata. Valerius Maximus remains to be discovered.

Editions: MENDELIN, Argentorati 1470. * C. KEMPF (with the epitomae of Paris and of Januarius Nepotianus), Lipsiae 1854, 2nd ed. 1888, repr. 1982. * C. HALM (together with Paris and Nepotianus), Lipsiae 1865. * R. FARANDA

<sup>1</sup> R. GUERRINI 1981, 61–136 (with 30 illustrations).

(TTrN, together with Paris and Nepotianus), Torino 1971; repr. 1976.
 ** Lexicon: E. OTÓN SOBRINO, Léxicon de Valerio Máximo, 4 vols., Madrid 1977–1991. ** Bibl.: cf. the monographs by R. HONSTETTER 1977 and G. MASLAKOV 1984.

W. M. BLOOMER, Valerius Maximus and the Rhetoric of the New Nobility, London 1992. * E. BOLAFFI, Tre storiografi latini del I secolo d. C. (Velleio Patercolo, Valerio Massimo, Curzio Rufo), GIF 13, 1960, 336–345, esp. 341–344. * C. BOSCH, Zwei Hauptquellen des Valerius Maximus. Ein Beitrag zur Erforschung der Literatur der historischen Exempla, diss. Heidelberg 1925; Stuttgart 1929. * C. J. CARTER, Valerius Maximus, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Empire and Aftermath, Silver Latin II, London and Boston 1975, 26–56. * G. COMES, Valerio Massimo, Roma 1950. * M. FLECK, Untersuchungen zu den Exempla des Valerius Maximus, diss. Marburg 1974. * M. GALDI, L'epitome nella letteratura latina, Napoli 1922. * K. GRIES, Valerius—Maximus an Minimus, CJ 52, 1956, 335–340. * R. GUERRINI, Studi su Valerio Massimo (con un capitolo sulla fortuna nell'iconografia umanistica), Pisa 1981. * R. HELM, Valerius Maximus, RE 8 A 1, 1955, 90–116. * R. HONSTETTER, Exemplum zwischen Rhetorik und Literatur. Zur gattungsgeschichtlichen Sonderstellung von Valerius Maximus und Augustinus, diss. Konstanz 1977. * A. KLOTZ, Studien zu Valerius Maximus und den Exempla, SBAW 1942, 5. * A. LA PENNA, Mobilità dei modelli etici e relativismo dei valori: Da Cornelio Nepote a Valerio Massimo e alla Laus Pisonis, in: A. GIARDINA, A. SCHIAVONE, eds., Società romana e produzione schiavistica: modelli etici, diritto e trasformazioni sociali, Roma 1981, 183–206, esp. 193–198. * J. W. LARKIN, A Critical Edition of the First Book of the Commentary of Dionigi da Borgo San Sepolcro on the Facta et Dicta Memorabilia Urbis Romae of Valerius Maximus, diss. Fordham Univ. 1967, DA 28, 1968, 4151 A. * G. MASLAKOV, Valerius Maximus and Roman Historiography. A Study of the Exempla Tradition, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 437–496. * M. L. PALADINI, Rapporti tra Velleio Patercolo e Valerio Massimo, Latomus 16, 1957, 232–251. * Rhétorique et histoire. L'exemplum et le modèle de comportement dans le discours antique et médiéval. Table ronde organisée par l'Ecole française de Rome (1979), Paris 1980. * F. RÖMER, Ein Glanzstück römischer Memorabilienliteratur (Val. Max. 2. 6. 8), WHB 31, 1989, 52–65. * D. M. SCHULLIAN, A Preliminary List of Manuscripts of Valerius Maximus, in: Studies in Honor of B. L. ULLMAN, Saint Louis 1960, 81–95. * B. W. SINCLAIR, Valerius Maximus and the Evolution of Silver Latin, diss. Univ. of Cincinnati 1980, DA 41, 1981, 3096 A. * B. W. SINCLAIR, Declamatory Sententiae in Valerius Maximus, Prometheus 10, 1984, 141–146.

CURTIUS RUFUS

Life and Dates

The dates suggested for Q. Curtius Rufus range from Augustus to Theodosius; the date under Claudius enjoys large acceptance, whereas a date under Vespasian<sup>1</sup> seems to be most probable. The impressive simile likening the emperor to the sun breaking forth from night and fog (10. 9. 1–6) is a rhetorical topos (Menander, rhet. Gr. 3. 378 Sp.), hence not particularly suitable for chronological purposes,<sup>2</sup> but Vespasian's coming from the Orient to Rome strongly suggested the idea of 'sunrise' (Plin. nat. 33. 41; cf. also Suet. Vesp. 5. 7). More specific evidence is the reference to the civil wars in the same passage of Curtius which only applies to the 'year of four emperors'. The same allusion to the struggles of the diadochi is found in a similar context at the beginning of Plutarch's vita of Galba. The image of a body deprived of its head used by Curtius (10. 9) is attested in Tacitus' speech of Galba (hist. 1. 16. 1); the same historian calls the 'year of four emperors' rei publicae prope supremum, 'for our country almost the last one' (hist. 1. 11. 3; cf. Curt. ibid.). Another hint at Vespasian is the mention of a new dynasty (domus). Peace (cf. also 4. 4. 21) was thought to be his special gift to the Romans; legends of Vespasian's coins evoking securitas and felicitas have an affinity to Curtius 10. 9. The wording of Curtius is closely echoed by Orosius (7. 9. 1) in his appraisal of Vespasian's accession to the throne: turbida tyrannorum tempestate discussa tranquilla sub Vespasiano duce serenitas rediit, 'once that furious storm of tyrants had been dissipated, a calm serenity returned under the reign of Vespasian'. This would imply a parallel between Nero's and Alexander's deaths.<sup>1</sup> Possibly, Curtius began his work under Nero and finished it under Vespasian. His classicizing style fits especially well into the Flavian era. The closeness of his language to Pliny and Tacitus points to the same period. On the other hand, there is no certainty concerning his identity with Curtius Rufus, proconsul in Africa (Tac. ann. 11. 20–21; Plin. epist. 7. 27) or with the rhetor Q. Curtius Rufus (Suet. rhet. 33). After all, both the sonority of his diction and his lack of competence in matters of warfare would be perfectly suitable for a rhetor.

<sup>1</sup> For a date under Augustus: D. KORZENIEWSKI 1959; under Claudius: J. MÜTZELL, edition 1841, introduction pp. xlvii–lxxxvii and many followers, especially among authors of literary histories; most recently H. BÖDEFELD 1982; under Nero: R. VERDIÈRE 1966; under Galba: R. D. MILNS 1966; under Vespasian: J. STROUX 1929; LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio 468, n. 77; H. U. INSTINSKY 1962; G. SCHEDA 1969; U. VOGEL-WEIDEMANN 1970 and 1974; H. GRASSL 1974; A. GRILLI 1976; I. BORZSÁK 1978; under Trajan: A. RÜEGG 1906; under Septimius Severus: F. ALTHEIM 1948; under Alexander Severus: E. GRISET 1964; further suggestions are found in: D. KORZENIEWSKI 1959; H. BÖDEFELD 1982.

<sup>2</sup> Therefore, the passage Sen. cons. Polyb. (= dial. 12) 13 is no evidence for a dating under Claudius. The word caliganti (Curt. 10. 9. 4) should not be interpreted as an allusion to Caligula, for the vowel a has a different quantity; moreover, this emperor was usually called Gaius.

Owing to his Roman perspective he adopts a critical attitude towards his hero. In his readers' minds there are still some traces left of ancient Roman prejudice against Greeks and kings. In the 2nd century this would change: suffice it to mention Plutarch and Arrian.

Survey of the Work

Of the ten books of Curtius' Historiae Alexandri Magni regis Macedonum large sections are missing: books 1 and 2, the opening of book 3, the end of book 5, the beginning of book 6, and parts of book 10. Let us now survey books 3 to 10.

3: Alexander cuts the Gordian knot, falls ill after a bath in the Ilissus, is healed, and defeats Darius in the battle of Issus (333 B.C.).

4: Alexander destroys Tyrus and conquers Gaza (332). He founds Alexandria and beats Darius in the battle of Arbela (331).

5: Alexander takes Babylon (331) and Persepolis. Darius is betrayed by his own people (330).

6: Antipater the Macedonian vanquishes King Agis of Sparta near Megalopolis (331). In Parthiene, Alexander indulges in luxury. He friendly receives Artabazus. By means of military expeditions he makes his soldiers forget their dissatisfaction. Parmenius' son Philotas is stoned as a conspirator (330).

7: Having punished or pardoned further conspirators, Alexander traverses the Caucasus and reaches Bactra (330). He crosses the Oxus and the Tanais, defeats the Scythes, and finally punishes Bessus (329) and Arimazes (328).

8: After further victories Alexander marries Roxane; he has the upright philosopher Callisthenes and the conspirator Hermolaus killed (327). He enters India (327) and conquered Porus (326).

9: Exhaustion of the soldiers, an injury of the king, hunger, and pestilence (326–325) cast a shadow over Alexander's victorious advance in India.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also Curt. 5. 7. 4 (Alexander sets fire to Persepolis) and Tac. ann. 15. 38–39 (burning of Rome).

10: Nearchus and Onesicritus explore the shore of the Ocean (325). Alexander executes guiltless Orsines, suppresses a mutiny of his Macedonians and seeks shelter with Persian bodyguards (324). There follow the king's illness and death and the ensuing quarrels about his succession (323).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Arrian, who lived under the Antonines, cannot be Curtius' source (if we have dated him correctly). The numerous points of contact are owing to sources they had in common, among them Aristobulus, a personal friend of Alexander's, and Ptolemy (367/6–283 B.C.) who is mentioned by Curtius (9. 5. 21). This tradition is favorable to Alexander, it is liable to embellish or to suppress compromising material. Curtius, however, is no less concerned with the negative aspects of his character and is disposed to criticize Alexander from a moral point of view, in the vein of Roman historiography and of the schools of rhetoric.

Another group of sources is represented by Diodorus and Justin (who copies Pompeius Trogus). Curtius and Justin show close resemblances. Within this group, correspondences between Curtius and Diodorus are traced to Clitarchus (Curtius mentions him in 9. 8. 15). If Trogus and Curtius happen to be opposed to Diodorus, they follow Timagenes (1st century B.C.). In his last six books Curtius could not rely on Alexander's court historian, Callisthenes (who had been executed as early as 327); therefore, for the last years, Clitarchus is an influential source; generally, the latter was the main authority for the vulgate of the history of Alexander. Yet, Justin's criticism of his hero is moderate; there is no trace of the theme of 'successful foolhardiness'. Compared to these authors, Curtius seems to have cast even more gloom over his portrait of Alexander. It is tempting to reconstruct an anonymous writer inimical to Alexander, who used mere facts to depict a king gradually degenerating into a tyrant; such a reconstruction would enhance the value of Curtius as a historical source. In fact, parallels between Curtius and Plutarch, who did not use Clitarchus but older evidence, show that Curtius, too, possibly drew on earlier material.

The Historiae Alexandri Magni may be labeled as 'tragic historiography' or as an 'historical novel'. To criticize one's predecessors is part of an historian's business: tanta componentium vetusta rerum monimenta vel securitas vel . . . credulitas fuit, 'such was the negligence of those who composed the old records, or their credulity' (9. 5. 1; cf. Thuc. 1. 20). Yet there is also the antipodes of criticism: ego quidem plura transcribo quam credo, 'as for myself, I report more things than I believe' (9. 1. 34; cf. also 10. 10. 12). The latter quotation reveals that Herodotus and Livy are among his models. Curtius agrees with Livy in many other details of fact or judgment as well. His 'Roman interpretation' of Alexander is a match to Valerius Flaccus' 'Roman interpretation' of Jason.

Homer and Herodotus are present, although it is often difficult to decide if Curtius used them directly or through an intermediary like Clitarchus. There are some traces of Virgil in Curtius' vocabulary (s. Language and Style). A study of literary influences, however, has to face the difficulty that elements redolent of Virgil may in fact originate from oriental life or from the literary tradition on Alexander or from the schools of rhetoric.

Seneca (nat. 3 praef. 5) and Lucan (10. 21) consider Alexander a robber in the grand manner (cf. Cic. rep. 3. 24; Curt. 8. 7. 19). Here, the objections raised against Alexander by Hellenistic philosophers merge with the Roman hatred for tyrants. The popularity of the theme of Alexander in the schools of rhetoric is sufficiently documented in the works of Seneca the Elder (contr. 7. 7. 19; suas. 1 and 4). Curtius is part of the tradition of Latin rhetoric. Livy, whom he admired, had couched his criticism of Alexander in a long and highly rhetorical tirade (Liv. 9. 17–19). Cicero had already pointed out the corrupting effect of Fortuna on Alexander's character (Att. 13. 28. 3; Tusc. 3. 21); it is debated whether he was influenced by a Peripatetic interpretation of Alexander. Of course, Cicero the orator is also present, cf. the stress laid on quo usque in 10. 4. 1.<sup>1</sup>

Literary Technique

Curtius Rufus gives his narrative an impressive structure. In each book, at the costs of other events, he throws into relief important episodes, sometimes culminating in highly dramatic scenes. In the arrangement of his material, an artistic order often takes precedence over chronology. A comparative study of Curtius and Diodorus proves that behind his deviations from tradition there were literary considerations. Psychological facts are revealed by means of telling gestures. Above all, Curtius shapes his scenes to produce a pictorial and emotional effect. Landscape becomes involved in the action as an idyllic or heroic setting. He even pays due attention to the exotic element (disregarded by many Romans), for instance, the mystery of huge forests (6. 5. 13–14; 9. 1. 9–10). Episodes like the trial of Philotas or the murder of Clitus hold the reader breathless. Each battle scene is different from all others.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For the parallels with Horace cf. S. ALESSANDRINI, L'imitatio Alexandri Augustea e i rapporti fra Orazio e Curzio Rufo, SCO 18, 1969, 194–210; parallels with Tacitus: s. Influence.

In the manner of tragic historians and Roman epic poets Curtius strongly emphasizes the finales of his books; in terms of action, the events reported there form a climax, whereas, in terms of morals, they form an anticlimax. Book 5 terminates in the death of Darius, book 10 in that of Alexander. At the beginning of book 6, the author characterizes the two halves of his work: quem arma Persarum non fregerant, vitia vicerunt, 'one whom the arms of the Persians had not overcome fell victim to their vices' (6. 2. 1).

An omnipresent element of his Hellenistic heritage is Curtius' delight in violent emotions. The same is true of formal devices: in accordance with the technique of Hellenistic historians, Curtius, after Alexander's death and before his funeral, inserts some paragraphs on dirge and an 'obituary' (10. 5. 26–37).<sup>2</sup> Above all, he ventures a prophetic glance at the quarrels about the succession and the imminent division of the empire.

Such techniques partly derive from epic. The reader should keep in mind his Virgil. Many a sequence of scenes may be divided into acts like a drama. Tragedy and tragic history have left their mark upon the Historiae Alexandri.

At the culminating point Curtius inserts a reference to his own time (10. 9), a personal statement exceptionally rare with our classicizing author.

He independently composes speeches according to the laws of rhetoric; in this respect, too, there is considerable variety. Curtius develops his literary technique under the auspices of Herodotus, Sallust, Livy, and Virgil. In 'twin speeches' (e.g. 5. 5. 10–16; 8. 5. 14–20) there are differences of style, which reflect the characters of the speakers.

<sup>1</sup> Issus 3. 9; Gaugamela 4. 12.

<sup>2</sup> The list of Alexander's qualities recalls in part Sallust's portrayal of Catiline which, however, is placed at the beginning, not at the end of his work. Other 'obituaries' in Curtius: Parmenio 7. 2. 33–34; Callisthenes 8. 8. 21–22; Persepolis 5. 7. 8; Tyrus 4. 4. 19–21. On such passages in Thucydides, Sallust, Livy s. Sen. suas. 6. 21; A. J. POMEROY, The Appropriate Comment. Death Notices in the Ancient Historians, Frankfurt 1991.

Language and Style

Curtius' language and style<sup>1</sup> are of an almost classical purity and elegance. Curtius has been trained on Livy, with whom he shares three quarters of his vocabulary. He follows Virgil in his use of words like arietare, debellare, dedignari, interritus, protendere, canities ('grey hair'), carbassus ('linen garment'). In this way, Curtius, quite unobtrusively, bestows some epic dignity on his narrative. Moreover, he is fond of personifying abstract notions and concrete objects. The words bacchabundus, equitabilis, perarmatus, resudare, subdeficiens are found exclusively in authors later than Claudius and Nero. The expression insociabile regnum (10. 9. 1) appears in Curtius and Tacitus only (ann. 13. 17. 1); both authors use regnum for principatus, and there is a general affinity to Tacitus, Pliny, and Florus. This is one more reason in favor of assigning Curtius to the age of Vespasian rather than of Claudius. On the other hand, the absence of archaisms suggests a date prior to the 2nd century.

Curtius, of course, Latinizes Greek names of gods and Greek political terms. Contrary to Greek usage, he combines imperium and auspicium (6. 3. 2), and uses typically Roman terms like in fidem accipere (3. 10. 7 etc.), opimum belli decus (3. 11. 7 etc.), penates (3. 6. 9), and vota pro salute (3. 7. 3). We already mentioned that entire sequences of events are seen through the eyes of a Roman.

The author's friendly communication with his reader is indicative of his rhetorical education; typical are remarks concluding a digression, like the parenthesis inde enim devertit oratio, 'for it was from there that I made a digression' (10. 6. 1). In the manner of rhetoricians, Curtius likes to insert general statements (maxims): adeo humanis ingenii parata simulatio est, 'so ready is deceit in the human heart' (5. 10. 13); adeo etiam naturae iura bellum in contrarium mutat, 'so completely does war invert even the laws of nature' (9. 4. 7); reccidisse iram in irae ministros nec ullam potentiam scelere quaesitam cuiquam esse diuturnam, 'that his anger had recoiled upon the tools of his anger and that no power gained through crime was lasting' (10. 1. 6); scilicet res secundae valent commutare naturam et raro quisquam erga bona sua satis cautus est, 'so true is it that success is able to change one's nature, and that rarely is anyone cautious enough towards his own good fortune' (10. 1. 40); militarem sine duce turbam corpus esse sine spiritu, 'that a throng of soldiers without a leader is a body without a soul' (10. 6. 8). Rarely does Curtius indulge so much in pointed expressions as in the following examples: vitae quoque finem eundem illi quem gloriae statuit, 'she likewise fixed the same end for his life and for his glory' (10. 5. 36); paenitebatque modo consilii modo paenitentiae ipsius, 'they repented now for their resolution, and now of the very fact of having repented' (10. 7. 12).

<sup>1</sup> I. OBLINGER, Curtiana. Textkritische und grammatikalische Untersuchungen, diss. Würzburg 1910; M. GONZÁLEZ-HABA, Zur Syntax der Unterordnung bei Curtius, diss. München 1959; H. KOSKENNIEMI, Der nominale Numerus in der Sprache und im Stil des Curtius Rufus, Annales Universitatis Turkuensis, ser. B 114, Turku 1969; T. VIJAMAA, Nouns Meaning 'River' in Curtius Rufus. A Semantic Study in Silver Latin, Turku 1969; cf. also W. RUTZ 1965 and 1986.

His prose rhythm is neither reminiscent of Livy nor of any other historian; it is typically rhetorical and akin to Seneca.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Curtius' literary verdict on Choerilus is influenced by Horace (Curt. 8. 5. 7–8; Hor. epist. 2. 1. 232–234; ars 357–358), who had already mixed up Alexander's epic poet Choerilus of Iasus with Choerilus of Samos (5th century). As for his criticism of historians, s. above Sources, Models, and Genres.

Ideas II

Curtius is unreliable as a geographer and a historian; especially his rhetorical descriptions of battles are misleading. On the other hand, it cannot be excluded that he sometimes reflects an older tradition than the vulgate.

Curtius discusses the problem of Alexander's apotheosis (e.g. 8. 5. 8 and 8. 5. 11). His expressions recall Horace (epist. 2. 1. 5–12). Unlike the flatterer Cleo (and unlike Horace) Curtius shares the view of Callisthenes, who denied apotheosis to Alexander during his lifetime. In Curtius, Callisthenes appears as vindex publicae libertatis, 'defender of the public liberty' (8. 5. 20). Curtius here acts as a mouthpiece of the senators' opposition in Rome. However, he does not call in question monarchy. His picture of Alexander is rich in shades and free from either flattery or rancor. He often acknowledges Alexander and rather reproaches his entourage for lack of character. Yet he does not suppress evidence of Alexander's superbia; his anger (ira) has Achillean greatness and may grow into rabies (e.g. 10. 4. 2). Curtius demonstrates how an individual permanently favored by Fortuna is corrupted gradually, without concealing, however, that his early years, too, had their dark sides, and that even later there were rays of hope. Fortuna is not a philosophical idea, in this role she is reminiscent of the Roman tutelary deity of Sulla or Caesar.

Darius is another—and a different—example of Fortuna's impact. In Curtius, his character is consistent. He was precipitated from luck into bad luck, learnt to endure it and preserved his dignity. Curtius dwells on the moving and tragic features of this great opponent of his hero. He exalts Parmenio and Philotas to angelic perfection.

Analysis of underlying motives takes precedence over facts. Curtius is sympathetic even with the rank and file and is intrigued by the psychology of the masses (e.g. 10. 7. 11). There is a moralizing tendency behind Curtius' insisting on the moral superiority of the Persians over the Greeks (e.g. 10. 3. 9).

As for oracles, Curtius is a sceptic. If, nevertheless, just before the king's death, Chaldean superstition and prodigies are right in the end (10. 4) against Anaxarchus the sober philosopher, this is simply part of a dramatic staging technique. The same is true of his saying that fatum carried off first the friend and then the king himself (10. 4). Great scope given to fatum may be considered an element of vulgar Stoicism, but actually all this rather belongs to the domain of literary technique.

Curtius lends Roman features to his heroes, often referring to Livy. His deviations from the usual tradition of Alexander are often caused by his intention to bring home his subject to his readers by evoking Livian reminiscences. Even in his general judgments he often agrees with Livy. Like the latter, he advocates the idea of ius gentium (4. 2. 15; 6. 11. 15).

It is impossible to interpret the figure of Alexander as an allegory of an individual emperor. Yet Curtius sometimes seems to represent Alexander as a prefiguration of Caesar. This retrospective projection of a Roman experience helps to make a Greek tradition comprehensible. Valerius Flaccus adopts a roughly comparable procedure when assimilating Greek myth.

Transmission<sup>1</sup>

A seriously damaged manuscript, which today can be reconstructed only by conjecture, had been written in capitalis rustica roughly in the 5th century. It had been the only one to survive into the Middle Ages. Towards the end of the 8th century it must have been copied in Carolingian minuscule. All our manuscripts ultimately derive from a lost copy of this copy; the intermediate links have disappeared.

There are two classes, slightly differing from each other: on the one hand, there is the especially reliable Parisinus 5716 (P; 9th century), on the other, the following group: Bernensis 451 (B; 9th century), Florentinus Laurentianus 64, 35 (F; 9th century), Leidensis 137 (L; 9th century), Vossianus Q 20 (V; 9th century).<sup>2</sup> Related to the Parisinus are the old fragments (9th/10th century) in Würzburg, Darmstadt, Einsiedeln, and Wien. The Rheinau fragments (9th/10th century) now preserved in Zürich attest that the speeches were studied; they are ultimately traced to the model of P; however, their immediate source was subject to an additional influence of the faulty ancestor of BFLV.

The numerous younger manuscripts (12th–15th centuries) have not yet been investigated thoroughly.

Influence

As an author, Curtius is doubtless superior to other surviving historians of Alexander (like Arrian or Diodorus). Often he is our most detailed source. In Latin literature, he is the first to amalgamate completely biography and history. So he is a predecessor of Tacitus' Agricola. We cannot entirely exclude<sup>3</sup> that he directly influenced Rome's greatest historian. Along with general echos of the vulgate of Alexander there are verbal correspondences. The speech for the defence of M. Terentius after Sejanus' downfall (Tac. ann. 6. 8) is the very image of the speech of Amyntas after the execution of Philotas (Curt. 7. 1. 26–31). Moreover Tacitus' Germanicus follows in the footsteps of Alexander. Calgacus' critical remarks on Rome (Tac. Agr. 30. 4) are suggestive of the words of the Scythian messenger (Curt. 7. 8. 12); the Tacitean expression solitudinem facere (applied to conquests) puts in mind of similar utterances of Alexander (Curt. 8. 8. 10 and 9. 2. 24). Curtius furnished a linguistic model even for the famous sine ira et studio, though in a different context (6. 9. 6); striking parallels are found in 10. 9. Apart from these, there seem to be no convincing traces of an influence of Curtius in antiquity.

<sup>1</sup> Konrad MÜLLER, preface to his edition; K. MÜLLER, Der codex Paris. Lat. 5717 des Curtius Rufus, in: Studi in onore di L. CASTIGLIONI, Firenze 1960, 629–637; A. DE LORENZI, Curzio Rufo. Contributo allo studio del testo e della tradizione manoscritta, Napoli 1965.

<sup>2</sup> The ancestor of this group contained more errors than that of P. The immediate model of BFLV had been corrected and interpolated by a Carolingian scholar.

<sup>3</sup> I. BORZSÁK 1978.

Before the 9th century there is an echo of our author in the Liber monstrorum de diversis generibus. In the Carolingian epoch, Einhart (d. 840) uses expressions identical with those of Curtius. Important manuscripts date from the 9th and 10th centuries. Excerpts testify that Curtius was read in classrooms. At the end of the 10th century Egbert of Liège used Curtius for his versified Fecunda ratis. Denmark's historian, Saxo Grammaticus (11th century), was influenced by Curtius' style. Generally, however, medieval readers preferred Julius Valerius' Latin version of Pseudo-Callisthenes and an apocryphal letter of Alexander to Aristotle describing the miracles of Asia.

In the first half of the 12th century Albéric of Besançon or Briançon wrote a Roman d'Alexandre, of which 150 verses survived in a Curtius manuscript in the Laurentiana; they show no trace of a knowledge of Curtius. Later French Romans d'Alexandre, however, depended on Curtius; this is true even more for the Latin Alexandreis of Walther of Châtillon (d. about 1200).<sup>1</sup> In the Codex Oxoniensis 382 (12th century) the mutilated text of our author was completed in good Latin. John of Salisbury recommended Curtius for reading, along with Suetonius, Tacitus, or Livy (Poligr. 8. 18).

Soon, however, the successful Alexandreis outshone Curtius, who in the 13th century was named more frequently than read. At the same time the Historia de proeliis (which dated from the 10th century) gained in authority. On the other hand, Curtius was read by Jacques Vitry, and his name appeared in catalogues of libraries of that time. In the 14th century Charles V and the Duc de Berry seem to have possessed French translations. Petrarch had Curtius copied (Parisinus 5720, 14th century), added marginal notes and used the text in his own Latin writings.

In the 15th century numerous manuscripts of Curtius were disseminated all over Europe. Lorenzo Valla liked to quote him as a model of good Latin. Students and scholars imitated him. In 1438

<sup>1</sup> S. now G. METER, Walter of Châtillon's Alexandreis Book 10—A Commentary, Frankfurt 1991, passim, esp. 46–65.

Pier Candido Decembrio translated him into Italian; twenty years later the Portuguese Vasquez de Lucènes wrote a French version, which would find a large readership. Spain followed in 1481 (Luis de Fenollet).

Beginning with the editio princeps by Wendelinus of Speyer (1470), many printed editions witnessed to Curtius' great popularity. The number of editions increased from the 15th to the 17th century, to drop slightly in the 18th and reach its zenith in the 19th century. Politicians, officers, scholars, and poets were educated by Curtius. Suffice it to mention Richelieu, Turenne, Ménage, and Jean de la Taille. The Peroniana et Thuana (Cologne 1694, 359) call Curtius le premier de la Latinité. And they add: il est facile, clair et intelligible.

With the rise of historical criticism the glory of Curtius began to wane; recently, however, scholars concede some value to him, even as a historical source. As a writer, he had a hard lot: at first he was despised because he was a school author. Then he ceased to be a school author because he was despised. It is time to break up the circulus vitiosus.

Editions: WENDELINUS SPIRENSIS, about 1470–1471. * J. MÜTZELL (TC), 2 vols., Berolini 1841. * C. G. ZUMPT, Braunschweig 1849. * T. VOGEL, A. WEINHOLD, vol. 1 (books 3–5), Leipzig 4th ed. 1903; vol. 2 (books 6–10), Leipzig 3rd ed. 1906. * E. HEDICKE, Berolini 1867, new ed. Lipsiae 1908. * J. C. ROLFE (TTr), 2 vols., London 1946. * KONRAD MÜLLER (T), H. SCHÖNFELD (Tr), München 1954. * A. GIACONE (TTr), Torino 1977. * Books 3 and 4: J. E. ATKINSON (C), Amsterdam 1980. * Books 5–7: J. E. ATKINSON (C), Amsterdam 1994. ** Ind.: J. THÉRASSE, Q, Curtius Rufus. Index verborum. Relevés lexicaux et grammaticaux, Hildesheim 1976. ** Bibl.: s. the monographs.

F. ALTHEIM, Curtius Rufus, in: F.A., Literatur und Gesellschaft im ausgehenden Altertum 1, Halle 1948, 153–164. * J. E. ATKINSON, The Curtiū Rufi Again, AClass 16, 1973, 129–133. * E. BADIAN, The Eunuch Bagoas. A Study in Method, CQ n.s. 8, 1958, 144–157. * E. BADIAN, The Death of Parmenio, TAPhA 91, 1960, 324–338. * R. BALZER, Der Einfluß Vergils auf Curtius Rufus, diss. München 1971. * H. BARDON, Quinte-Curce, LEC 15, 1947, 3–14. * H. BARDON, Quinte-Curce historien, LEC 15, 1947, 120–137. * H. BARDON, La valeur littéraire de Quinte-Curce, LEC 15, 1947, 193–220. * J. BLÄNSDORF, Herodot bei Curtius Rufus, Hermes 99, 1971, 12–24. * H. BÖDEFELD, Untersuchungen zur Datierung der Alexander-geschichte des Q. Curtius Rufus, diss. Düsseldorf 1982. * I. BORZÁK, Zum Zeitansatz des Curtius Rufus, in: J. HARMATTA, ed., Prolegomena to the

Sources on the History of Pre-Islamic Central Asia, Budapest 1978, 27–38. * A. BRAVO GARCÍA, Sobre las traducciones de Plutarco y de Quinto Curcio Rufo, CFC 12, 1977, 143–185. * L. CASTIGLIONI, Ad Q. Curtii Rufi historiarum libros adnotationes, WS 70, 1957 (= FS Mras), 84–93. * A. M. DEVINE, The Parthi, the Tyranny of Tiberius, and the Date of Q. Curtius Rufus, Phoenix 33, 1979, 142–159. * P. DIADORI, La rappresentazione della massa nell'opera di Q. Curzio Rufo, Maia 33, 1981, 225–231. * S. DOSSON, Etude sur Quinte-Curce, sa vie et son œuvre, Paris 1886 (valuable). * R. EGGE, Untersuchungen zur Primärtradition bei Q. Curtius Rufus. Die alexanderfeindliche Überlieferung, diss. Freiburg 1978. * J. R. FEARS, The Solar Monarchy of Nero and the Imperial Panegyric of Q. Curtius Rufus, Historia 25, 1976, 494–496. * H. GRASSL, Zur Datierung des Curtius Rufus, Philologus 118, 1974, 160–163. * K. GLASER, Curtius und Claudius, WS 60, 1942, 87–92. * A. GRILLI, Il 'saeculum' di Curzio Rufo, PP 31, 1976, 215–223. * E. GRISET, Per l'interpretazione di Curzio Rufo 10. 9. 1–6 e la datazione dell'opera, RSC 12, 1964, 160–164. * N. G. L. HAMMOND, Three Historians of Alexander the Great. The So-called Vulgata Authors. Diodorus, Justin, Curtius, Cambridge 1983. * W. HECKEL, One More Herodotean Reminiscence in Curtius Rufus, Hermes 107, 1979, 122–123. * F. HELMREICH, Die Reden bei Curtius, diss. Erlangen 1924, Paderborn 1927. * N. HOLZBERG, Hellenistisches und Römisches in der Philippos-Episode bei Curtius Rufus (3. 5. 1–6. 20), München 1988. * H. U. INSTINSKY, Zur Kontroverse um die Datierung des Curtius Rufus, Hermes 90, 1962, 379–383. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, Die Zeit des Q. Curtius Rufus, diss. Köln 1959. * W. KROLL, Curtius, in: KROLL, Studien 331–351. * I. LANA, Dell'epoca in cui visse Quinto Curzio Rufo, RFC n.s. 27, 1949, 48–70. * H. LINDGREN, Studia Curtiana, Uppsala 1935. * E. I. McQUEEN, Quintus Curtius Rufus, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Biography, London 1967, 17–43. * R. D. MILNS, The Date of Curtius Rufus and the Historiae Alexandri, Latomus 25, 1966, 490–507. * R. POROD, Der Literat Curtius. Tradition und Neugestaltung: Zur Frage der Eigenständigkeit des Schriftstellers Curtius, Graz 1987. * A. RÜEGG, Beiträge zur Erforschung der Quellenverhältnisse in der Alexandergeschichte des Curtius, diss. Basel 1906. * W. RUTZ, Zur Erzählungskunst des Q. Curtius Rufus. Die Belagerung von Tyrus, Hermes 93, 1965, 370–382. * W. RUTZ, Alexanders Tigris-Übergang bei Curtius Rufus, WJA n.s. 7, 1981, 177–182. * W. RUTZ, Seditionum procellae—Livianisches in der Darstellung der Meuterei von Opis bei Curtius Rufus, in: Livius. Werk und Rezeption. FS E. BURCK, München 1983, 399–409. * W. RUTZ, Das Bild des Dareios bei Curtius Rufus, WJA n.s. 10, 1984, 147–159. * W. RUTZ, Zur Erzählkunst des Q. Curtius Rufus, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2329–2357. * G. SCHEDA, Zur Datierung des Curtius Rufus, Historia 18, 1969, 380–383. * E. SCHWARTZ, Q. Curtius Rufus, RE 4, 2, 1901, 1871–1891. * J. SEIBERT, Alexander der Große, Darmstadt 1972. * R. B. STEELE, Q. Curtius Rufus, AJPh 36, 1915, 402–423. * R. B. STEELE, Curtius and Arrian, AJPh 40, 1919, 37–63; 153–174. * H. STRASBURGER, Ptolemaios und Alexander, Leipzig 1934. * H. STRASBURGER, Alexanders Zug durch die Gedrosische Wüste, Hermes 80, 1952, 456–493 = H.S., Studien zur Alten Geschichte, Hildesheim 1982, 1, 449–486. * J. STROUX, Die Zeit des Curtius, Philologus 84, 1929, 233–251. * G. V. SUMNER, Curtius Rufus and the Historiae Alexandri, AUMLA 15, 1961, 30–39. * W. W. TARN, Alexander the Great, 2 vols., Cambridge 1948. * J. THÉRASSE, Le jugement de Quinte-Curce sur Alexandre: une appréciation morale indépendante, LEC 41, 1973, 23–45. * R. VERDIÈRE, Quinte-Curce, écrivain néronien, WS 79, 1966, 490–509. * F. WEBER, Alexander der Große im Urteil der Griechen und Römer bis in die konstantinische Zeit, diss. Gießen 1907, Borna-Leipzig 1909. * U. VOGEL-WEIDEMANN, Bemerkungen zu den Curtii Rufi der frühen Principatszeit, AClass 13, 1970, 79–88. * U. VOGEL-WEIDEMANN, The Curtii Rufi Again, AClass 17, 1974, 141–142. * M. C. WEHRLI, La place de Trogue-Pompée et de Quinte-Curce dans l' historiographie romaine. Summary, REL 39, 1961, 65. * F. WILHELM, Curtius und der jüngere Seneca, Paderborn 1928.

TACITUS

Life and Dates

Cornelius Tacitus<sup>1</sup> was slightly older than his friend and admirer Pliny the Younger (epist. 7. 20. 4); it is a reasonable guess, therefore, that he was born soon after A.D. 55. He had friends from Italia Transpadana, which some scholars consider his homeland (Patavium?); yet he shows a preference for the regions of the Rhine and the Mosel, and there is more evidence linking him to Gaul. In the generation before him, there had been a Roman knight and governor of Belgica called Cornelius Tacitus (Plin. nat. 7. 76); since this is not a current name, he is likely to have been the historian's father or uncle. Tacitus' father-in-law, the brilliant Julius Agricola, originated from Gaul as well. Tacitus was married, probably, in 77, and pursued his own political career with determination. It began under Vespasian and continued unbroken under Titus and Domitian (hist. 1. 1);<sup>2</sup> the latter's favor did not prevent Tacitus from posthumously expressing his hate. In 88 he became praetor. At the same time, he was quindecimvir sacris faciundis and helped establish the date for the ludi saeculares. Later he would confess to have become guilty—together with his peers—of silently accepting the death of many a senator who, unlike him had been courageous enough to protest against tyranny. After his praetorship Tacitus was absent from Rome for four years—supposedly as a legatus pro praetore in some province; for this reason he could not be present when his father in law died in 93 (Agr. 45. 4–5). Actually, Tacitus—wrongly deemed ‘the least military of all authors’<sup>1</sup>—did have in all probability some military experience from his early years. He became consul suffectus under Nerva (in 97)—obviously on the recommendation of Domitian. Tacitus was a famous orator (Plin. epist. 4. 13. 10; 2. 11. 17). In the same year he held the funeral speech for his predecessor in consulship, Verginius Rufus (Plin. epist. 2. 1. 6), who had conquered Vindex and thrice refused to become emperor. In this speech Tacitus paid homage to Nerva, the ‘senator as emperor’, as well as to the senate, whose dignity seemed to have been restored, and he immortalized a republican hero. Some years later, in his Histories (1. 8; 2. 51; cf. 2. 49), however, he would destroy the favorable portrait he had drawn.

<sup>1</sup> In the codex Mediceus I his praenomen is Publius, whereas Sidonius Apollinaris (epist. 4. 14. 1 and 4. 22. 2) and some more recent manuscripts (less convincingly) call him Gaius.

<sup>2</sup> A monumental funeral inscription from Rome shows that (Ta)citus began his career as a (decem)vir stlitib(us iudicandis) and that he later became (quaesto)r Aug(usti),

Further biographical evidence proves his closeness to the group of senators around Trajan: in 100 the emperor personally presided at a trial in which Tacitus, along with his friend, Pliny, as advocates for the prosecution, successfully sustained the case of the province of Africa against the rapacious proconsul Marius Priscus (Plin. epist. 2. 11). Both authors were generally known as inseparable friends.<sup>2</sup> They were among the heirs of wealthy L. Dasumius of Corduba,<sup>3</sup> whose testament included only followers of Trajan and Hadrian. Finally the emperor’s (probably Titus’ and Domitian’s) ‘right hand’, a position granting the future historian first hand insight into imperial politics (G. ALFÖLDY, Bricht der Schweigsame sein Schweigen? Eine Grabinschrift aus Rom, MDAI(R) 102, 1995, 251–268); according to ALFÖLDY, Tacitus’ career might have looked as follows: born about 57; latus clavus about 74/75; immediately after this, decemvir; military tribune in 76 or 77; Titus recommended him as quaestor Augusti, an office he held only in 81 (under Titus and Domitian) or 82 (under Domitian, who fostered his career later as well); furthermore, the inscription attests that he was tribun(us plebis).

---

<sup>1</sup> Thus, MOMMSEN, RG 5, 165, n. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Typical is the question of an unknown: ‘Are you Pliny or Tacitus?’ (Plin. epist. 9. 23. 2).

<sup>3</sup> CIL 6. 10 229 = DESSAU 8379 a.

Tacitus obtained the high dignity of proconsul in Asia<sup>1</sup> (around 112–113), which the emperor had reserved to deserving vassals.

On the other hand, there is no evidence for an estrangement between Tacitus and the Spanish emperors, although this theory finds many supporters. If the historian did not keep his promise to describe the 'happy present' under Nerva and Trajan (Agr. 3; hist. 1. 1), this does not necessarily prove that Tacitus became increasingly hostile to Trajan and Hadrian. Even if the 'promise' itself should have been more than mere flowery language, it is sufficient to suppose that the historian realized more and more how difficult and unrewarding such a task would have been. For, on the one hand, there is no duller subject matter for an author than happy times and good rulers. On the other hand, a subtle analysis, which could be expected from a keen observer such as Tacitus, would have been problematic: there were some rather obscure circumstances accompanying the succession of Trajan to Nerva and of Hadrian to Trajan; there was, furthermore, the murder of distinguished senators after Hadrian's accession to the throne; there was, finally, the irrevocable downfall of the authority of the senate, which even gave carte blanche to Trajan<sup>2</sup> to celebrate as many triumphs as he would like; faced with all this, even a benevolent Tacitus could not have resisted the temptation to relapse into his usual bitter tone. The real obstacle, however, according to Tacitus, was to be sought elsewhere: with his noble peers. Once his account of a remote past (ann. 4. 32–33) had met with animosities among senators hurt in their feelings in one way or other, this was to be expected all the more for an account of contemporary events (cf. Plin. epist. 5. 8. 12).

Like his father-in-law, Agricola, and many senators close to Trajan, Tacitus had avoided clamorous manifestations of opposition under Domitian. Should he not do so all the more under more humane rulers? Thus he moved on a narrow isthmus between the silent protestation of virtus and an opportunism in republican disguise. Under the given circumstances, for a born politician and, perhaps, a pater familias caring for his family there might have been no other reasonable choice. No doubt the age of Trajan brought some relief (hist. 1. 1. 4). Tacitus probably lived to see the reign of Hadrian.

<sup>1</sup> Inscription from Mylasa, in: Oriens Graecae Inscriptiones selectae, ed. W. DRETTENBERGER, vol. 2, Leipzig 1905, no. 487; R. SYME 1958, 664–665.

<sup>2</sup> Cass. Dio 68. 29. 2; cf. the parallel passage ann. 13. 41. 4.

During his lifetime Tacitus could observe how the idea and the function of the Roman emperor changed: there was a radical difference indeed between Nero the almighty artist and Hadrian the restless manager. The role of Italy changed as well. What had been the center of the civilized world, a symbol of the universe (cf. Nero's Golden House and Domitian's Palace), gradually became a province among others. Ever more rarely did the emperor come to Rome, not as landlord by now but as a visitor. Even in terms of economy Italy was in need of support. In Tacitus' time Rome was still the center of Latin intellectual culture; there could be a lively exchange of ideas with men like Pliny, and Domitian encouraged literature. Yet, despite Trajan's foundation of the Bibliotheca Ulpia, the days of great Roman literature were numbered, and the Silver Age faded away with the death of Tacitus and with Juvenal's unheeded call for help addressed to an emperor less interested in living Latin authors than in those of a distant past and in Greek culture.

Tacitus' historical oeuvre reflects the change of times: first of all, he is a Roman senator (this explains his republican mentality, his insistence on the antagonism between virtus and principate, and his reluctance to acquiesce in a non-expansive policy); second, he represents the type of 'new' senator from the entourage of the Flavians and Trajan (hence, his partial recognition of the superiority of the present age, his practical acceptance of monarchy, and his efforts to develop a new political ethics of conformity). Finally, two profound historical experiences shaped his views: one of them was the Domitian trauma, combined with a sense of collective guilt and the awakening of conscience. The other experience, less known but perhaps even more determining his stature as a historian, was the ordeal of the civil war of 69. The initial pages of his Histories reveal magnificent and radical insights, rather unexpected in a conservative Roman senator. It would not be an exaggerated statement to call his analysis of the year of four emperors a prophecy of late antiquity. It goes without saying that in a Roman author who made so many new discoveries, the contradictions between a 'conventional' and a realistic, innovative approach<sup>1</sup> are not always reconciled. Consequently, in the portrait of Tacitus as sketched by scholars,<sup>2</sup> disharmonies prevail, partly caused by the political and social situation. Both the career and the style of Tacitus bespeak his severe self-discipline and great ambition. The death-dates of his friends are perhaps indicative of a certain isolation in his old age. The theory of a progressive darkening of his views, however, cannot be proved: if in the later portions of the Annals many 'positive' terms disappear, this may be owing to the subject matter (Nero). Moralism and realism (up to verism) are not mutually exclusive: crimes have to be named and stigmatized. The internal conflict between a trenchant condemnation of evil and the incapacity of subtracting oneself from its fascination is not based on 'obsessions' but reveals features Tacitus shared with many Romans—suffice it to mention Persius, Lucan, and Juvenal. His personal discovery of conscience is a precious upshot of the tensions we observed, which were deeply rooted in Roman civilization.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> V. PÖSCHL 1962, 5 = WdF 97, 2nd ed. 1986, 115.

<sup>2</sup> S. esp. J. LUCAS 1974; more cautiously, R. SYME, Tacitus (with prosopographic material).

Dates of Works: the Dialogus de oratoribus can hardly be considered an early work; according to modern scholars, it was written in 102, when the addressee, Fabius Justus, was consul, or still later.<sup>2</sup> Hence, the Agricola has strong claims to be our author's first work; it was published in 98, after Trajan's accession to the throne (Agr. 3; 44). The same year is the terminus post quem for the Germania (Germ. 37). Before the Annals (Ab excessu divi Augusti) Tacitus wrote the Historiae<sup>3</sup> (ann. 11. 11). He worked on the latter up to around 108 or 109.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> As a rule, rash conclusions on the author should not be drawn from his work. The orator of sublimity (σεμνόν), the pessimist portrayed in our manuals, defies our expectations by appearing (in a letter of Pliny) in the circus, talking to a neighbor and ironically dropping his incognito (Plin. epist. 9. 23. 2). Pliny is convinced that his friend is able to laugh at a harmless hunting story (epist. 1. 6). A rewarding aspect of this friendship must have been the very difference of characters; Pliny represented the type of a relaxed, open-minded and tolerant Roman, a type which might have been more frequent than we would expect. But let us not exaggerate: the 'obsessed' Tacitus had enough will to live, not to utter his darkest thoughts too loudly.

<sup>2</sup> In principle there are four criteria for dating the Dialogus: the person of the addressee, the relationship of the work to Quintilian's Institutio and to Pliny's Panegyricus as well as to other contemporaries. For A.D. 102: A. KAPPELMACHER, Zur Abfassungszeit von Tacitus' Dialogus de oratoribus, WS 50, 1932, 121–129, esp. 127. After A.D. 105: K. BARWICK, Der Dialogus de oratoribus des Tacitus. Motive und Zeit seiner Entstehung, SSAL 1954, 31–32; similarly (A.D. 105/6) R. SYME, The Senator as Historian, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 4, 1956, 185–212, esp. 203.

<sup>3</sup> There is no cogent proof that Tacitus used precisely these titles for his works; however, the title Historiae is supported by Tert. apol. 16. 1 together with Pliny epist. 7. 33. 1.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Plin. epist. 6. 16; 20; 7. 20; 7. 33; 8. 7; 9. 14.

The 1st and 2nd books of the Annales<sup>1</sup> were probably published together: on the one hand (ann. 2. 56), Armenia had not yet been incorporated into the empire (A.D. 115/6); on the other hand (ann. 2. 61: Rubrum mare), the Persian Gulf had already been reached (A.D. 116). Allusions to the epoch of Hadrian—if admitted—would allow an even later date. Besides we have to reckon with revisions. The second part of the Annales differs from the first one and was probably written under Hadrian.

On the whole, in his choice of historical subjects, Tacitus continuously moved from contemporary history back to the past: he made his début with a biography of his father-in-law (Agricola) and planned to describe Domitian's reign and his own happy epoch (Agr. 3). Soon, however, he realized that Domitian's time could only be understood in the framework of the Flavian dynasty. Thus he came to write the Historiae, beginning with A.D. 69. At the start of this work he claimed to have postponed his account of contemporary history to his old age (hist. 1. 1). Having finished the Historiae, however, he went further back into the past in search for the roots of his own time in the period of the early principate; in fact, he expected his readers to draw such parallels. Later, he even declared his intention to study the Augustan era (ann. 3. 24). It may be observed that, in the course of his work, more and more 'precedents' from the early empire and the late republic intruded into his mind. Thus it happened that his contemporary history in its 'happier' part remained unwritten.

Survey of Works<sup>2</sup>

Agricola<sup>3</sup> (De vita et moribus Iulii Agricolae)

Agricola's exploits in Britain form the central part of the work (18–38) with the crowning battle-scene (29–37). This panel is framed by the accounts of Agricola's youth (4–9) and his last years (39–46). An excursus on the nature and history of Britain (10–17) is inserted between Agrippa's early years and the main section. The work is opened by a preface and ends in an obituary of Agricola. The opusculum, therefore, exhibits a symmetrical structure.

<sup>1</sup> On the date of the Annales: SYME, Tacitus 473: between 115 (117) and 120 (123); R. HÄUSSLER 1965, 277 with n. 79: between 109 and 120; in this case ann. 2. 61. 2 is referring to A.D. 106; HÄUSSLER does not believe in allusions to Hadrian's era.

<sup>2</sup> F. GIANCOTTI, Strutture delle monografie di Sallustio e di Tacito, Messina-Firenze 1971; G. WILLE 1983.

<sup>3</sup> On the Agricola: A. G. WOODHEAD, Tacitus and Agricola, Phoenix 2, 1947–1948, 45–55; W. LIEBESCHUETZ, The Theme of Liberty in the Agricola of Tacitus, CQ 60, 1966, 126–139; G. M. STRENG, Agricola—Das Vorbild römischer Statthalterschaft nach dem Urteil des Tacitus, diss. Bonn 1970; H. STORCH, Tacitus' Agricola als Maßstab für Geltung und Zerfall des römischen Tugendkanons, AU 29, 4, 1986, 36–49.

Germania (De origine et situ Germanorum)

On Tacitus' own showing (Germ. 27), the Germania falls into a general and a special (ethnographical) part. This type of structure is wide-spread in geographical and ethnographical texts.<sup>1</sup> The first part explains the position of the country, the provenance of its inhabitants, their religion as well as the customs common among all Germanic tribes. When describing individual tribes in the second part, Tacitus pays special heed to the differences. The general structure and the individual transitions from one theme to another are handled with great care.<sup>2</sup>

Dialogus de oratoribus<sup>3</sup>

After the dedication, the author announces his theme (the reasons for the decline of oratory: 1) and introduces the participants of his dialogue, among them Julius Secundus (2) who later will play the role of umpire. Then the dialogue begins (3–4). In the first place, there are two antithetic speeches: M. Aper, a fervent orator, defends his profession (5–10), whereas the pensive poet, Curiatius Maternus, defends his contemplative lifestyle (11–13). Here, the serious Vipstanus Messalla interferes to turn the conversation round to the contrast between ‘old’ and ‘new’ oratory (14–15). Having listened to Aper’s defence of the ‘moderns’ (16–23), Maternus asks Messalla not to defend the ‘ancients’ (since they are not in need of defence) but to elucidate the causes of the downfall of oratory (24). After a brief retort against Aper (25–26), Messalla is urged anew to come to the point (27). He starts with a criticism of modern education and with a praise of the (‘Ciceronian’) ideal of an all-round education (28–32). Having been asked by Maternus to complete this sketch, he then contrasts the traditional practical training of the orator in the forum with the unrealistic school exercises promoted by modern teachers of rhetoric (33–35). There is a lacuna after chapter 35.<sup>1</sup> In conclusion, Maternus, who is the host, expounds the importance of republican institutions to the development of political and forensic speech. Oratory is the daughter of licentia, quam stulti libertatem vocant; it appears that ‘ideal’ political conditions can dispense with oratory (36–41). The dialogue dies away in a resigned tone (42).

<sup>1</sup> K. TRÜDINGER, Studien zur Geschichte der griechisch-römischen Ethnographie, Basel 1918; E. NORDEN, Die germanische Urgeschichte in Tacitus' Germania, Stuttgart 3rd ed. 1923, repr. 1971.

<sup>2</sup> G. BIELEFELD, Der kompositorische Aufbau der Germania des Tacitus, FS M. WEGNER, Münster 1962, 44–54. Further important publications on the Germania: E. WOLFF, Das geschichtliche Verstehen in Tacitus' Germania, Hermes 69, 1934, 121–166, also in: H. OPPERMANN, ed., Römertum (WdF 18), Darmstadt 1970, 299–358 and in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 252–308; H. JAHNKAHN, Die Glaubwürdigkeit des Tacitus in seiner Germania im Spiegel archäologischer Beobachtungen, in: G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 142–151; G. PERL, Die Germania des Tacitus. Historisch-politische Aktualität und ethnographische Tradition, ACD 19, 1983, 79–89; A. A. LUND, Zum Germanenbegriff bei Tacitus, in: H. BECK, ed., Germanenprobleme in heutiger Sicht, Berlin 1986, 53–87; D. FLACH, Tacitus über Herkunft und Verbreitung des Namens Germanen, in: P. KNEISSL and V. LOSEMANN, eds., FS K. CHRIST, Darmstadt 1988, 167–185; H. JANKUHN, D. TIMPE, eds., Beiträge zum Verständnis der Germania des Tacitus, part 1, Göttingen 1989; part 2 (ed. bei G. NEUMANN, H. SEEMANN), Göttingen 1992; D. TIMPE, Gesammelte Studien zur Germania des Tacitus, Stuttgart 1994.

<sup>3</sup> K. VON FRITZ, Aufbau und Absicht des Dialogus de oratoribus, RhM 81, 1932, 275–300, repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 311–337; K. KEYSSNER, Betrachtungen zum Dialogus als Kunstwerk und Bekenntnis, Würzburger Studien 9, 1936, 94–116, repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 338–361; R. GÜNGERICH, Der Dialogus de oratoribus des Tacitus und Quintilians Institutio oratoria, CPh 46, 1951, 159–164, repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, 2nd ed. 1986, 362–373; R. HÄUSSLER, Zum Umfang und Aufbau des Dialogus de oratoribus, Philologus 113, 1969, 24–67; F. R. D. GOODYEAR 1970, 15–16; P. DESIDERI, Lettura storica del Dialogus de oratoribus, in: Xenia, Scritti in onore di P. Treves, Roma 1985, 83–94; P. GRIMAL, Le Dialogue des orateurs témoin de son temps, Arctos suppl. 2, 1985, 33–40; J. DEVREKER, Curatius Maternus, in: F. DECREUS, C. DEROUX, eds., Hommages à J. Veremans, Bruxelles 1986, 101–108; T. D. BARNES, The Signification of Tacitus' Dialogus de oratoribus, HSPH 90, 1986, 225–244; R. HÄUSSLER 1986.

The structure of the Dialogus is rich in surprises; there are gradual shifts of theme like in a real conversation. This tripartite form with its changing perspectives is comparable to the stage-effects of illusionary architecture.<sup>2</sup> It finds its match in the first three books of the Historiae, in which a limited perspective is gradually enlarged. The masterly exposition is clearly superior to the disenchanting finale (even if interpreted ironically). The very structure of the Dialogus shows that, ‘for all its purported Ciceronian gracefulness it is very far away from Cicero’s straightforwardness’.<sup>3</sup>

Historiae and Annales

If Jerome is to be believed, Annales and Historiae amounted to 30 books altogether (in Zach. 3. 14 = PL 25, 1522). In the codex Mediceus II the Historiae follow the Annales and book 1 of the Historiae is counted as ‘book 17’ and so on. If this numbering is original and the total of 30 is correct, the Annales would comprise 16, the Historiae 14 books. In this case, the two last years of Nero must have been dealt with very briefly (if the Annales had not been left unfinished). For this reason, scholars assigned 18 books to the Annales, 12 to the Historiae. We will come back to the problem of an ‘hexadic’ overall structure.

<sup>1</sup> Sex folia according to Decembrius; sex pagellae according to B = Vaticanus 1862.

<sup>2</sup> G. WILLE 1983, 191; 223.

<sup>3</sup> KLINGNER, Geisteswelt, 5th ed., 506.

Historiae

The preserved parts—from book 1 to the middle of book 5—include the years 69–70.

The 1st book deals with the reign of Galba, Otho's victory, the insurrection of Vitellius, and Otho's campaign against him.

The 2nd book draws the reader's attention to the orient, to begin with: Vespasian and Titus make an appearance full of promise. After Vitellius' victory of Bedriacum Otho commits suicide; in the east, Vespasian is proclaimed emperor.

Book 3 contains the struggle between the followers of Vitellius and Vespasian up to the burning of the Capitol and the murder of Vitellius.

In the 4th book there follow the events in Rome and the Batavians' struggle for independence under Civilis; book 5 contains the expedition of Titus against Jerusalem, and Civilis' submission to the Romans.

The theme of books 1–3 is the civil war, whereas books 4–6 describe the return to normal life in Rome as well as the revolutions in the north and the east. The structure of the lost books is a matter of conjecture.

Annales<sup>1</sup>

We have less than two thirds of the Annales: books 1–4, the first pages of book 5, book 6 without its opening, and books 11–16 with lacunas at the beginning and at the end. Tacitus is partly or totally lacking, therefore, as a source for the years 29–31; 37–47; 66–68.

The first six books extend from the death of Augustus to that of Tiberius (the last chapter of book 6 gives some structural hints concerning the first hexad). Book 12 ends with the death of Claudius: this strongly suggests a 'second hexad'.<sup>2</sup> The 'third hexad' would comprise the Nero books (books 13–18?), if Tacitus did treat at such great length the last two years of this emperor (after Thrasea's death in 66, the end of the preserved text). Yet, there is no reason whatever to consider the hexadic pattern a general rule: actually, the best manuscript (s. above) tells in favor of 16 + 14 books. One may always, of course, resort to supposing that Tacitus had not finished his 'third hexad'.

<sup>1</sup> We use this title for the sake of conveniency. C. W. MENDELL, Dramatic Construction of Tacitus' Annals, YCIS 5, 1935, 3–53; B. WALKER 1952; H. Y. McCULLOCH, JR., Narrative Cause in the Annals of Tacitus, Königstein 1984.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. E. WÖLFFLIN, Die hexadische Composition des Tacitus, Hermes 21, 1886, 157–159; SYME, Tacitus 686–687; E. KOESTERMANN, Commentary, on ann. 1. 22; on the problematic aspects of the theory of 'hexads' (and in favor of 14 books of Historiae and 16 books of Annales): C. POGHIRC, Sur la répartition des livres de Tacite entre Annales et Histoires, StudClas 6, 1964, 149–154; cf. also F. R. D. GOODYEAR 1970, 17–18.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Rhetoric. Tacitus was an orator from the very beginning, and he never disclaimed these roots. As a young man he admired M. Aper, who was from Gaul, and Julius Secundus, an orator highly esteemed by Quintilian. As had been customary in republican Rome, he learnt from them by listening to their forensic speeches and to their familiar conversation. Later he would immortalize them in his Dialogus.

Dialogue as a genre harkened back to a Ciceronian tradition (De oratore, De re publica, De natura deorum, and also Brutus). Tacitus knew Cicero's<sup>1</sup> rhetorical writings and imitated them in his Dialogus and, earlier, in his Agricola. In style, the Dialogus differs from the other works of Tacitus. This is not owing to chronology, but to literary genre. Roman authors had a keen sense of the difference between sermo (the tone of familiar conversation)<sup>2</sup> and historia (historical writing).

Tacitus' development from an orator to an historian was an organic process. The lost funeral speech in honor of his predecessor was close to the Agricola both in chronology and literary genre. The speeches inserted into his historical works attest his mastery of rhetorical techniques including even prose rhythm.<sup>3</sup> Many a Ciceronian echo gains an ironical ring in Tacitus: just think of (ann. 1. 13) servile Q. Haterius aping Cicero's majestic quo usque from the first Catilinarian speech. Since his student days Tacitus had been admiring Cicero (and republican orators in general). This attitude, which was contrary to Neronian modernism, became popular in Domitian's time, owing, among other reasons, to Quintilian's influence.

Philosophical? sources, including ethnography. Some philosophers opposed tyranny; hence, in the imperial period, serious philosophical studies were deemed dangerous. Domitian expelled philosophers from Rome (Suet. Dom. 10): moreover, ancient Roman prejudice against philosophy (a prejudice virtually overcome only by men like Cicero and Seneca), was still very much alive. It said: Do not push your study of philosophy too far (Enn. scaen. 95 J.). Tacitus mentions the strong philosophical inclinations of his father-in-law (ultra quam concessum Romano ac senatori: Agr. 4. 3), not forgetting to emphasize that, fortunately, his caring mother healed him betimes of such malady. Tacitus' own philosophical education stays within the limits of his class. However, in his Dialogus, there is a critical approach to Cicero's De re publica.<sup>1</sup> And we have no reason to doubt that Tacitus knew that the Earth is a globe.<sup>2</sup> Influence of Seneca is found in geographical contexts (e.g. in the Germania and in the excursus on Britain in the Agricola); the same author was the source for the antithesis of eloquentia and libertas.<sup>3</sup> Tacitus' psychology may be influenced by physiognomics.<sup>4</sup> (For his ethics and his view of history s. Ideas)

<sup>1</sup> For Cicero's influence on Tacitus: R. KLAIBER, Die Beziehungen des Rednerdiadlogs von Tacitus zu Ciceros rhetorischen Schriften, 2 parts, Progr. Bamberg 1914; 1916; A. MICHEL, Le Dialogue des orateurs de Tacite et la philosophie de Cicéron, Paris 1962; I. BORZSÁK, Le Dialogue de Tacite et le Brutus de Cicéron, BAGB 1985, 3, 289–298.

<sup>2</sup> SYME, Tacitus 125 wrongly paraphrases sermo by 'oratory' (Plin. epist. 5. 5. 3); sermo and formal speech are quite different things.

<sup>3</sup> I. BORZSÁK, 1970 II, 58: ann. 1. 22; 15. 63 (Seneca's last words).

The Germania adheres to the generic traditions of ethnographical literature. This is not to deny that Tacitus clearly refers to Roman perspective and moral values (though this aspect is sometimes over-emphasized). Greek and Roman categories merge in the traditional idealization of primitive tribes.

Agricola: a crossing of genres. An interesting crossing of genres may be observed in the Agricola.<sup>5</sup> It contains elements of biography<sup>6</sup> (Agr. 1-2), quotes Roman biographies and uses expressions like vitam narrare (Agr. 1; 46); the sketch of Agricola's early years is reminiscent of Nepos and Sallust.<sup>7</sup> Moreover there are traces of laudatio funebris<sup>8</sup> and laudatory biography;<sup>9</sup> rhetorical rules for writing a λόγος βασιλικός have

<sup>1</sup> E. KOESTERMANN, Der taciteische Dialogus and Ciceros Schrift De re publica, Hermes 65, 1930, 396-421.

<sup>2</sup> Pointed out correctly by P. STEINMETZ, Tacitus und die Kugelgestalt der Erde, Philologus 111, 1967, 233-241.

<sup>3</sup> Tac. hist. 1. 1; dial. 27; Sen. cons. Marc. 1. 4; Cic. de orat. 1. 30; Brut. 45 (Tac. dial. 40 is different).

<sup>4</sup> J. COUSIN, Rhétorique et psychologie chez Tacite. Un aspect de la δεινωσις, REL 29, 1951, 228-247.

<sup>5</sup> P. STEINMETZ, Die literarische Form des Agricola des Tacitus, in: G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 129-141; R. HÄUSSLER in: K. BÜCHNER (Tr), 3rd ed. 1985, 285-286; A. DIHLE 1988.

<sup>6</sup> Biographies from the epoch of Nero: P. Anteius wrote about Ostorius Scapula, Thræsea Paetus about Cato Uticensis.

<sup>7</sup> On the Agricola and Sallust's description of Catilina's youth: R. GUERRINI, La giovinezza di Agricola. Tecnica allusiva e narrazione storica in Tacito, RAL, ser. 8, 32, 1977, 481-503.

<sup>8</sup> Agr. 2 laudare; the obituary is Ciceronian in character: Agr. 45-46; cf. Cic. de orat. 3. 1-8; Brut. 1-6; cf. also Tacitus' funeral speech in honor of Verginius Rufus, which must have contained historical information as well; an authoritative paradigm was Titinius Capito's Exitus illustrium virorum (Plin. epist. 8. 12. 4-5).

<sup>9</sup> Cf. Isocrates' Evagoras, Xenophon's Agésilauos, Polybius' remarks on his biography of Philopoemen as compared to historical works (10. 21), the laudatory biographies of Caesar written by Cornelius Balbus and C. Oppius; an outstanding example was to be taken into account as well. In a biographical encomium a speaker was allowed to take liberties of which an historian could not dream.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, the Agricola is also reminiscent of historical monographs: there is an excursus on Britain and its people, comparable to that on Africa in Sallust's Bellum Iugurthinum. Both digressions even hold a similar position within the respective works.<sup>2</sup> Moreover, the description of the great battle conforms to the patterns of historiography.<sup>3</sup> The account of Agricola's activities as a governor partly recalls the traditions of Roman annalists. Calgacus' 'anti-Roman' speech evokes Caesar's oration of Critognatus (Gall. 7. 77) and Sallust's letter of Mithridates (hist. 4. 69). Furthermore, the 'twin speeches' of Calgacus and Agricola are indebted to Livy both in general and in detail. Finally, there are echoes of Caesar and Seneca in the excursus on Britain, which, as a whole, belongs to ethnographical literature.<sup>4</sup> On 'bias' in the Agricola s. below. In his first work, which, in a nutshell, foreshadows all aspects of his oeuvre, Tacitus creatively combined elements from many genres.

First-hand historical material was given to Tacitus orally by his father-in-law. A parallel text on Britain is found in Plutarch's De defectu oraculorum, which preserves information from Scribonius Demetrius of Tarsus, who was part of Agricola's staff in York and conducted the governor's educational program.<sup>5</sup>

The Historical Works: Sources. It was not Tacitus' intention to study original sources in detail. Nor does he cite all the books he consulted. He names his sources especially when quoting dissenting opinions, for which he is not ready to take responsibility.<sup>6</sup>

The sources of the Annales are different in character from those used in the Historiae.<sup>7</sup> In the Historiae, which treat contemporary events,

Cicero's Cato; Nicolaus of Damascus wrote a biography of Augustus (FGrHist 90) that was impartial only in theory; K. KUMANIECKI, Ciceros Cato, in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 168–188; cf. esp. Agr. 1 with Cic. orat. 35; Att. 12. 4. 2.

<sup>1</sup> Cicero to Luceius, fam. 5. 12. 3; Polyb. 10. 21, esp. 8; Nep. Pel. 1; Plut. Alex. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also Agr. 37 with Sall. Iug. 101.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also the principle of posteris tradere (Agr. 46 and 1, alluding to Cato's Origines, 2 P. and 118 P.).

<sup>4</sup> For the shape of Britain, Tacitus quotes Fabius Rusticus (Agr. 10).

<sup>5</sup> R. M. OGILVIE, The Date of the De defectu oraculorum, Phoenix 21, 1967, 108–121.

<sup>6</sup> E. MENSCHING, Zu den namentlichen Zitaten in Tacitus' Historien und Annalen, Hermes 95, 1967, 457–469.

<sup>7</sup> Both titles cannot be traced to Tacitus with absolute certainty. The current distinction between annales (events of a distant past, grouped according to years) and historiae (contemporary history) is not exempt from exceptions.

Tacitus can rely to a larger extent on his own experience and that of eye-witnesses (e.g. Plin. epist. 6. 16 and 7. 33). Formerly, scholars believed<sup>1</sup> that the literary portraits of Augustus, Tiberius, and Germanicus were the work of a single great author (who, strangely enough, had remained unknown). This author would have intended, at the beginning of Caligula's reign, to glorify Germanicus, the father of his emperor. This hypothesis of a 'single source' has been abandoned today: first, some inconsistencies in Tacitus show that his portrait of Tiberius (and even that of Germanicus) cannot be 'of a piece'; second, Tacitus himself names several authorities and reflects different verdicts of the upper classes. It is true that he did not consult Velleius, who sympathized with Tiberius (Velleius' humble origin might not have been the only reason for neglecting him) but he did use Augustus' res gestae.

In the preface to his Annales Tacitus maintains that there did not yet exist any adequate historical account of the Julio-Claudian period (ob metum and recentibus odiis).<sup>2</sup> As some parallel texts in other authors show, Tacitus, in the books devoted to Tiberius, manifestly<sup>3</sup> dissociated correlated facts or concealed the causal links between them, in favor of his personal psychological theories. Though Tacitus sometimes rejects malevolent interpretations which usually popped up after an emperor had died, he almost regularly does accept them.<sup>4</sup>

It is true that, in the Historiae, we should not overrate the extent of Tacitus' criticism of pro-Flavian historians,<sup>5</sup> but it may be taken for granted that Tacitus' negative portrayal of Domitian implies such a criticism, at least in part.<sup>6</sup> Tacitus explicitly objects to the efforts of Flavian historians to descry all-too noble motives behind the actions of the Flavians.

After all, Tacitus sometimes refers to the acts of the senate under

<sup>1</sup> E. SCHWARTZ, Cassius Dio, RE 3, 2, 1899, 1716-1717 = Griechische Geschichtsschreiber, Leipzig 1957, 441-443.

<sup>2</sup> E. KOESTERMANN, Commentary, on l. 60; R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius und seine Theorie, Heidelberg 1978, 256-257 (excursus: sine ira et studio).

<sup>3</sup> F. KLINGNER, Tacitus über Augustus und Tiberius, SBAW 1953, 7, repr. in: KLINGNER, Studien 624-658 and in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 513-556.

<sup>4</sup> F. KLINGNER, Tacitus und die Geschichtsschreiber des 1. Jh. n. Chr., MH 15, 1958, 194-206, repr. in: KLINGNER, Geisteswelt, 5th ed., 483-503; D. FLACH 1973.

<sup>5</sup> H. HEUBNER, Gymnasium 68, 1961, 80-82 against A. BRIESSMANN, Tacitus und das flavische Geschichtsbild, Wiesbaden 1955; convincing: D. FLACH 1973.

<sup>6</sup> R. URBAN 1971, 122-123 hesitatingly agrees with A. BRIESSMANN.

Nero<sup>1</sup> (ann. 15. 74) and the official journal of the city of Rome (ann. 3. 3). Moreover he cites memoirs like those of Nero's mother, Agrippina (ann. 4. 53) and of Cn. Domitius Corbulo (ann. 15. 16). For the first part of the Annales scholars think of Servilius Nonianus,<sup>2</sup> of the Epicurean historian Aufidius Bassus (Sen. epist. 30), and of Pliny the Elder, who wrote on wars against the Germans. In the later part of the Annales Tacitus (13. 20) cites the contemporary history of Cluvius Rufus, who was biased in favor of Nero. He further mentions Pliny the Elder (of whom he used in this case a work not identical with the Bella Germanica) and Seneca's friend, Fabius Rusticus. These three authors, however, are not likely to be the sole sources of Annales 13–16.<sup>3</sup>

Nor can any of them be identified with the sources of Dio and Suetonius. For his Historiae, Tacitus used, among others, Pliny (hist. 3. 28) and Vipstanus Messalla (hist. 3. 25. 2). The parallels with Plutarch's biographies of Galba and Otho are often very close and are traced to common sources, since there is more material in Plutarch.

Let us now turn to the way Tacitus assimilated his source material. Nobody can deny that there are traces of different sources and traditions (to give an example, in the first part of the Annales there is no mention of prodigia, because they had been lacking in the sources).<sup>4</sup> Nor can it be doubted that Tacitus' verdicts on his characters are inconsistent; examples are Otho (cf. hist. 1. 13 with ann. 13. 46), Antonius Primus,<sup>5</sup> Cornelius Fuscus (hist. 2. 86), Vespasian, and, of course, Seneca (cf. ann. 13. 42 with 15. 60–64). This may be caused by change of sources. Yet it may also reflect an artistic intention. In fact, Tacitus is especially concerned with the links between the actions of an individual and the political development as a whole: between both, there are interactions which may reverberate on a character by modifying or unmasking it.

<sup>1</sup> On the problem of direct use of the acts of the senate: F. A. MARX, Untersuchungen zur Komposition und zu den Quellen von Tacitus' Annalen, Hermes 60, 1925, 74–93, esp. 82–90.

<sup>2</sup> Tac. ann. 6. 31; 14. 19; dial. 23; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 102; Plin. epist. 1. 13.

<sup>3</sup> Correct: J. TRESCH 1965; cf. also C. QUESTA, Studi sulle fonti degli Annali di Tacito, Roma, 2nd ed., 1963.

<sup>4</sup> R. VON PÖHLMANN, Die Weltanschauung des Tacitus, SBAW 1910; 2nd ed. 1913.

<sup>5</sup> M. TREU, M. Antonius Primus in der taciteischen Darstellung, WJA 3, 1948, 241–262.

Generally speaking, the problem of sources cannot be solved without taking into account literary patterns. These partly depend on genre. In this respect, historians are relevant, again, but as models rather than as sources.

The Historical Works: Genre and Models. As a rule, Tacitus adopts the Roman principle of annalistic arrangement. However, he often protests against it and even violates it (though not without warning his readers). Infractions multiply in the later books of the Annales. For Tacitus, the laws of the historical genre were especially embodied in his great predecessors Sallust and Livy. Beginning with the Agricola, he imitated Sallust, and he frequently referred to Livy whom he envied his great subject: the Roman republic.

The presence of historiographic models and traditions is especially felt in the portrayal of characters. Agricola and Germanicus are modeled on Alexander.<sup>1</sup> The theme of Alexander partly overlaps with the typology of Caesar. The duality of Caesar and Cato from Sallust's Catilina has been interpreted as a background to the character of Agricola whose virtus unites the qualities of both of them.<sup>2</sup> Many literary portraits are reminiscent of Sallust: Sejanus (ann. 4. 1) recalls Catiline (Sall. Catil. 5); Poppaea (ann. 13. 45) is another Sempronia (Sall. Catil. 25).<sup>3</sup>

According to Quintilian (inst. 10. 1. 102–104), the main representatives of an ambitious historiography bordering on poetry were Servilius Nonianus, Aufidius Bassus, and Cremutius Cordus whom Tacitus commemorated in his Annales (4. 34).

Influence of Poets. The so-called hexameter at the beginning of the Annales is not a quotation from Ennius but hardly anything more than a vague reminiscence of the dactylic rhythm of epic poetry. Quintilian (inst. 9. 4. 74) had observed the same in the first line of Livy. No doubt, Tacitus improved on Sallust, Catil. 6 and succeeded in producing the effect of σμενόν he cherished even in his speeches.

<sup>1</sup> I. BORZÁK 1982 (partly debatable); id. 1968, 404; id. 1970 I, cf. 1970 II, 53–54; G. A. LEHMANN, Tacitus und die imitatio Alexandri des Germanicus Caesar, in: G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 23–36; L. W. RUTLAND, The Tacitean Germanicus. Suggestions for a Re-Evaluation, RhM 130, 1987, 153–164; on the typology of Alexander: NORDEN, Kunstprosa I, 337–338; on the ‘hagiography’ of Germanicus: C. QUESTA, Il viaggio di Germanico in Oriente e Tacito, Maia 9, 1957, 291–321. The reader is kept guessing why the use of the Alexander pattern should not have been influenced by Trajan’s cult of Alexander.

<sup>2</sup> M. LAUSBERG, Caesar und Cato im Agricola des Tacitus, Gymnasium 87, 1980, 411–430 (e.g. Tac. Agr. 18. 5; Sall. Catil. 53. 1).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 1, 356–358.

The numerous parallels with the language of Augustan poets need not all be 'quotations'. Many of them may be a result of a general evolution of the literary language. Since Livy Latin prose had assimilated more and more elements which for us, in the main, are attested in poetry. For all this, the influence of poetry is significant: in the Dialogus, along with Cicero, Virgil is the only author to be quoted more than once (the citation on poeticus decor has programmatic importance: 20. 5). It is Virgil, again, who yields the typological background for Germanicus and Arminius who, to a certain degree, are comparable to Aeneas and Turnus.<sup>1</sup> More significant than isolated linguistic echoes are the categories provided by Virgil. Along with the typology of Alexander and the Sallustian parallels, Virgilian allusions help the reader understand how Tacitus interpreted his characters and their situations and how much importance he attributed to them.

Literary Technique

Purposeful composition and dramatic arrangement are among the specific literary qualities of Tacitus.

Overall structure. The first 'hexad' of the Annales is devoted to Tiberius. His character does not 'develop' but it is successively unfolded or revealed, as obstacles gradually fall off. At the end of book 6 Tacitus explains the structure of the first hexad though not entering into details (on hexadic structure cf. above: Survey of Works).

Even more coherent are the books on Nero. Within this unit Agrippina's death and the end of Burrus' and Seneca's<sup>2</sup> beneficial influence are significant caesuras.<sup>3</sup> The Pisonian conspiracy is a self-contained complex.<sup>4</sup> However, the phases are not very distinct. The crucial act of the drama is the struggle for power between mother

<sup>1</sup> W. EDELMAIER 1964, 134-139; the long ailment of Julia ann. 1. 53 is reminiscent of Aen. 6. 442; Tac. Germ. 44 helps to understand the grammar of Aen. 6. 302: Norden, Kunstprosa 1, 331, n. 4.

<sup>2</sup> J. TRESCH 1965.

<sup>3</sup> Compared with the tradition in Dio Cassius, dramatization is somewhat more articulate in Tacitus; actually, the former shows a preference for earlier dates: in Cassius the mother's influence ends in 54 and that of the 'ministers' in 55. Trajan's utterance about the happy quinquennium Neronis (Aur. Vict. Caes. 5. 2) marks the other extreme.

<sup>4</sup> W. SUERBAUM, Zur Behandlung der Pisonischen Verschwörung (Tac. ann. 15. 48-74), in: Handreichungen für den Lateinunterricht in der Kollegstufe, 3rd ser., vol. 1, 1976, 167-229.

and son. In the books on Nero, Tacitus does not separate Nero's personal tragedy from Rome's political tragedy. They form an organic whole.<sup>1</sup>

Structure of Individual Books. As a rule, within each book the subject matter is arranged year by year.<sup>2</sup> At the beginning of each year the consules ordinarii are named. There follow the exploits of emperors and armies, the debates in the senate, other events in Rome, and the deaths of men of distinction. Occasionally, Tacitus complains that he is compelled to separate correlated events, only because they happened in different years (ann. 4. 71; 12. 40). In the first part of the Annales he rarely frees himself from annalistic constraints (e.g. at the end of book 2); he does so more often in the second part, e.g. when condensing the campaigns in Britain (12. 40) or when exploring the Pisonian conspiracy (15. 48; 50). In the Historiae the annalistic principle is less prominent—not only because our information is limited to two years but also because of the frequent shifts of the scenes of action and the great number of parallel events; hence, a free arrangement of material was imperative.<sup>3</sup>

To understand the structure of the Annales, it is not enough to refer to the annalistic scheme or speculate on possible numbers of books. Convincing are structural hints found in the text. Thus, the epilogue to the first 'hexad' (6. 51) indicates several phases of the gradual unmasking of Tiberius' character. This subdivision is in harmony with the structure of the text;<sup>4</sup> in fact, the ends of phases coincide with the ends of books: Germanicus dies at the end of book 2, Drusus at the beginning of book 4, and Seianus between books 5 and 6.

As a rule, important structural markers are found in initial, central or final position within the books. The sequence of critical areas (Rome, Germany, the East) established in hist. 1. 4–11 determines the structure of the first three books.<sup>5</sup>

Passages in central or marginal position emphasize compositional

<sup>1</sup> J. TRESCH 1965, 84; 89.

<sup>2</sup> Annales nostros (4. 32) does not imply a definition of specific literary procedures.

<sup>3</sup> A. BRIESSMANN 1955, 16; nevertheless, Tacitus exploited the dramatic potential offered by the annalistic scheme (cf. the insurrection of the Batavians and also the end of the Judaica before the seizure of Jerusalem).

<sup>4</sup> K. NIPPERDEY, G. ANDRESEN, Commentary, on ann. 6. 51; U. KNOCH, zur Beurteilung des Kaisers Tiberius durch Tacitus, Gymnasium 70, 1963, 211–226.

<sup>5</sup> F. MÜNZER, Die Entstehung der Historien des Tacitus, Klio 1, 1902, 308.

caesuras: the central chapters hist. 1. 50–51 form a transition from Rome to the Rhine border; the opening of book 2 (2. 1) is an introduction to the account of events in the east. In the very middle of book 3 (hist. 3. 36–48) the author comes back to the geographical arrangement used in book 1 (west, north, east, south, west) for a survey of the consequences of the Flavians' victory. Both books 1 and 2 start with a search for ratio (or initia) and causae (hist. 1. 4; 2. 1). Events of symbolic significance serve as 'corner-stones': e.g. the marriage of Claudius and Agrippina (ann. 12. 1–9), her murder of Claudius (64–69), and the deaths of Agrippina (14. 1–11) and Octavia (14. 60–64). The fall of Arminius is the finale of the 2nd book (even contrary to chronology). The 3rd book ends in a painful retrospect to the Republic (the ancestral portraits of Brutus and Cassius are conspicuous by their absence—the saying originates from this passage). The end of book 4 contains a foreboding of Nero's era (the marriage of Domitius and Agrippina), the finale of book 14 forecasts the Pisonian conspiracy.

Mention of gods is another structural marker. The ponderous words on the punishing gods are placed conspicuously at the end of the introduction (hist. 1. 3). The gods come back at culminating points: e.g. before the battle of Bedriacum (2. 38) and after the burning of the Capitol (3. 72. 1).

Tacitus' compositional technique is based on contrasts. He shows a preference for multiple ring composition. He uses the transposition of material as a significant structural means of interpretation. The Historiae are basically a history of the Flavian dynasty followed back to its roots.<sup>1</sup> Correspondingly, even in significant passages of the early books, hints at the members of this family are found: at the center of book 1, chapter 50 is a cardinal point. The reflections expounded here range from the murder of Galba to the future reign of Vespasian. Similarly the chapters on the Flavians, opening the 2nd book (2. 1–7) interrupt the account of the conflict between Otho and Vitellius, thus throwing a quite unexpected light on it.<sup>2</sup> Likewise, in 2. 74–86, the rise of the energetic Flavians is inserted as a critical reminder into the description of the indolence of the victorious Vitellians. In ann. 4. 1. the literary portrait of Sejanus opens the sinister second half of the hexad devoted to Tiberius, and in 4. 74 the first allusion to Sejanus's imminent fall is given at the moment of his greatest triumph. By anticipating later events (or emphasizing events relevant to the future) Tacitus unmasks the futility of what he actually has to report.<sup>1</sup> The killing of Blaesus (hist. 3. 38–39) turns out to be a cruel farce, because the reader does already know that the battle of Cremona is lost. This technique is reminiscent of Sallust, who in his Catilina (41–47) and Iugurtha (63–82) fathoms the tragedy of 'vain effort', but also of Virgil's epic.<sup>2</sup> In some cases, Tacitus' account dwells on the marginal regions of the empire before turning to Rome,<sup>3</sup> whereas Greek historians prefer the reverse order. Tacitus is, therefore, aware of the crucial importance of the frontier districts, a vision not to be taken for granted in a Roman senator of his time.

<sup>1</sup> A parallel case: the rebellion of the legions in Germania superior (1. 12) was the cause of Piso's adoption by Galba. The message of that rebellion is at the same time an intentional foreshadowing of the imminent death of Galba and, as will be seen in retrospect, of Otho, as well.

<sup>2</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1960 with bibl.; cf. also E. SCHÄFER 1977.

Contrasts help to achieve climax. While the cowardly senators betray their fellow conspirators, a prostitute is courageous enough to keep silent persistently (ann. 15. 51), and there is a hardy tribune to tell Nero the plain truth (ann. 15. 67). The annalistic formulas typical of the beginning of the year<sup>4</sup> are turned by Tacitus into a means to illustrate the contrast between a monarchic present and a republican past.<sup>5</sup> In Livy the consuls inaugurate the year, they go to war, come back and organize the elections for the next year. In ann. 1–6, Tacitus observes this order (res internae—externae—internae) for only 8 of 19 years. If, in the year 18, for example, he only reports external events (ann. 2. 53–58) he does so for the sake of literary economy: he does not want to distract our attention from Germanicus. In book 12 at the beginning of each year he mentions a significant fact throwing light on the future.<sup>6</sup> Similarly, the final chapters of the annual accounts are closely linked to overarching themes. In the three books devoted

<sup>1</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1960, 271; Thucydides, however, respects chronology: ibid. 277–278, n. 4; for the tragedy of vain effort ibid.

<sup>2</sup> 'Being surpassed by events' as an epic theme: Virg. Aen. 11. 445–446; Hom. Iliad 18. 310–313; 1. 304–305.

<sup>3</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1960, 267.

<sup>4</sup> J. GINSBURG 1981.

<sup>5</sup> More frequently than Livy, Tacitus, when naming the consuls, uses the abl. abs. (X. Y. consulibus). The consuls do no longer appear as acting subjects of political consequence, they are just instruments of the emperor's will and even a mere means of dating.

<sup>6</sup> E. BORZSÁK 1968, 475; 1970, II, 59; J. GINSBURG 1981, 23; 39.

to Germanicus the beginnings of years have a comparable function. Structure and interpretation, therefore, are inseparably interwoven.

Character portrayal. Two contrasting characters may dominate entire works or large sections of them: in the Agricola there is a tension between the hero and Domitian,<sup>1</sup> as is the case with Germanicus and Tiberius in the early books of the Annales, and with Galba's traditional rigor, who even blames the alleged murderer of his rival (hist. 1. 35) and Otho 'the Neronian' who rejoices at Galba's death (hist. 1. 44). Moreover there are individuals important enough to tower over entire groups of books: the emperors.

Characters may be introduced at the beginning of a section: to give an example, a portrait of Sejanus reminiscent of Catiline significantly opens the second half of the Tiberian hexad (ann. 4. 1). Conversely, the character of Tiberius is portrayed gradually, in course of the action, to be summarized only at the end. To be sure, our author is well aware of certain topoi:<sup>2</sup> in the Agricola, Domitian is a tyrant such as might have come straight out of a book, and Nero's growing apprehensions and pangs of conscience,<sup>3</sup> not to forget the appropriate prodigies, follow the same literary pattern. A constituent of the portrayal of Tiberius (and others) is the gradual disappearance of inhibitions.<sup>4</sup> Nevertheless, individual features are not suppressed: Tiberius detests flattery (ann. 2. 87) and is altogether depicted as a live human being. As far as we can judge, Tacitus, as compared to earlier evidence on Tiberius, makes large use of transpositions: he

<sup>1</sup> R. URBAN 1971.

<sup>2</sup> W.-R. HEINZ 1975, 16.

<sup>3</sup> Eur. Ion 621–631; Cic. Tusc. 5. 57–63; Plat. rep. 562a–580c; Gorg. 524e–525a; Xen. Hier. 5. 1–2; 6. 3–8; E. A. SCHMIDT, Die Angst der Mächtigen in den Annalen des Tacitus, WS 95, 1982, 274–287; W.-R. HEINZ 1975; B. CARDAUNS, Mechanismen der Angst. Das Verhältnis von Macht und Schrecken in der Geschichtsdarstellung des Tacitus, in: Antike Historiographie in literaturwissenschaftlicher Sicht. Materialien zur wissenschaftlichen Weiterbildung 2, Mannheim 1981, 52–71; H. HOFFMANN, Morum tempora diversa. Charakterwandel bei Tacitus, Gymnasium 75, 1968, 220–250; J. R. DUNKLE, The Rhetorical Tyrant in Roman Historiography. Sallust, Livy and Tacitus, CW 65, 1971, 12–20; F. KLINGNER, Tacitus über Augustus und Tiberius, SBAW 1953, 7, München 1954, repr. in: KLINGNER, Studien 624–658; U. KNOCHE, Zur Beurteilung des Kaisers Tiberius bei Tacitus, Gymnasium 70, 1963, 211–226; A. COOK, Scale and Psychological Stereotyping in Tacitus' Annals, Maia n.s. 38, 1986, 235–248; A. J. WOODMAN, Tacitus' Obituary of Tiberius, CQ 39, 1989, 197–205; F. KROHN, Personendarstellungen bei Tacitus, diss. Leipzig 1934; A. J. POMEROY, 1991.

<sup>4</sup> On this element in the portrayal of Nero: R. HÄUSSLER 1965, 268; 64–65; on the scheme of 'gradual unmasking' 317–339; on Tiberius' apprehensions: Dio 61. 7. 5.

dissociates given connections of cause and effect and connects originally unrelated elements<sup>1</sup> to make possible his own psychological interpretation.

Fortunately, Tacitus' character portrayal, in other respects, too, is far from dull monotony. Though fond of clear contrasts, Tacitus, except for the Agricola, in most cases tries to avoid the dangers of schematic black-and-white drawing. Even the brilliant figure of Germanicus during the Germanic campaign shows weaknesses at times: he is irascible (ann. 2. 70), menacing (2. 57) or coolly calculating (1. 44; 49). Germanicus, who is somehow reminiscent of the 'orientalizing' tastes of Marc Antony, is 'only a human being',<sup>2</sup> upon whom Tiberius enforces the mores maiorum; for all this, it would be doubtless an exaggeration to affirm that Tacitus 'only apparently'<sup>3</sup> maintained the traditional view of Germanicus. As for Claudius, he clearly figures as the sport of his ladies and freedmen, but the beneficial achievements of his administration are not concealed either. Like Sallust's Catiline, Otho meets an honorable death; even a Vitellius is not totally devoid of noble features.

Letters and Speeches.<sup>4</sup> Letters and speeches indirectly contribute to character portrayal. To give an example, a letter hedged with provisos to the point of obscurity reflects Tiberius' inscrutable heart (ann. 6. 6).

Character portrayal is one aim of orations (as can be seen e.g. in the Dialogus); another is the interpretation of historical events (s. esp. the speech of Claudius ann. 11. 24 and Galba's oration hist. 1. 15–16). Both intentions may overlap. The traditional allocutions of generals before battles (an early example is Agr. 30–32; 33–34) are often meant to illumine a situation from two contrary points of view.

Indirect speech in Tacitus frequently reflects the intrinsic dialectic potential of an event—this happens as early as after the death of Augustus, who is seen through the eyes of different anonymous groups,

<sup>1</sup> K. P. SEIF, Die Claudius-Bücher in den Annalen des Tacitus, diss. Mainz 1973, 297–298; the disparate elements in the portrayal of Claudius are overemphasized by A. MEHL, Tacitus über Kaiser Claudius. Die Ereignisse am Hof, München 1974.

<sup>2</sup> W. EDELMAIER 1964, e.g. 168–173.

<sup>3</sup> I. BORZSÁK 1970, I, esp. 286.

<sup>4</sup> N. P. MILLER, Dramatic Speech in Tacitus, AJPh 85, 1964, 279–296; B. MAIER, Othos Rede an die Prätorianer. Gedanken zu Tacitus, hist. 1. 37–38, Anregung 31, 1985, 168–173; E. AUBRION 1985, esp. 491–678; J. GINSBURG, Speech and Allusion in Tacitus, Annals 3. 49–51 and 14. 48–49, AJPh 107, 1986, 525–541.

each of which passes a different judgment. Here, the psychology of the masses<sup>1</sup> may come into play. As a literary device such multiple interpretation of events creates a mysterious chiaroscuro.

Dramatic Scenes. Tacitus, the 'Shakespeare' of Roman historians, fascinates his readers by the evocative power of his scenes.<sup>2</sup> The visual and almost theatrical qualities of his account are traced in part to the tradition linked to Alexander.<sup>3</sup> Livy and the rhetorical doctrine of evidentia may have served as intermediaries. The 'tragedy' of the 'year of four emperors' is perfectly staged: onlookers gaze at the corpses of Roman citizens on the battlefield of Bedriacum (hist. 2. 70); there is a spectacular entry into the Capital (2. 89) and a scene of abdication (3. 67–68); the people watch the war as spectators (3. 83); the emperor himself becomes a foedum spectaculum (3. 84); the Romans may feast their eyes on Teutonic tribes exterminating one another (Germ. 33).

Nevertheless it would be one-sided to consider our author's interest in happenings such as mutinies as mainly rhetorical, for he is also eager to observe the dynamics of changes of power and to capture irrational elements, especially as far as the psychology of soldiers is concerned. The latter is, at that moment, a factor of considerable historical and political impact. The points made by Tacitus are important not only in terms of literary art but also as an interpretation of reality.

Large-scale composition is matched by an artful arrangement and interweaving of elements on a smaller scale, as has been shown especially for the thread of thought in the Germania.<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> The formula fuertunt qui crederent is part of this pattern and does not indicate unknown historians: F.-F. LÜHR, zur Darstellung und Bewertung von Massenreaktionen in der lateinischen Literatur, Hermes 107, 1979, 92–114; H. G. SEILER, Die Masse bei Tacitus, diss. Erlangen 1936 (collects the material); W. RIES 1969; Lucan was one of Tacitus' predecessors: Andreas W. SCHMITT, Die direkten Reden der Massen in Lucans Pharsalia, Frankfurt 1995.

<sup>2</sup> H. HOMMEL, Die Bildkunst des Tacitus, Stuttgart 1936; U. RADEMACHER 1975.

<sup>3</sup> I. BORZSÁK 1970, II, 53.

<sup>4</sup> After the excursus on metals (5. 2–3), ferum forms a transition to the following passage which will be on arms and military tactics (a sort of 'heading': NORDEN, Urgeschichte 460–466, esp. 461 'mannerism'), or 17. 2–18. 1 with the transition from 'clothing' to 'matrimony': despite scanty clothing, there is moral discipline; cf. E. KRAGGERUD, Verknüpfung in Tacitus' Germania, SO 47, 1972, 7–35.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

Tacitus uses a select vocabulary. He avoids Greek and replaces quotations with paraphrases in Latin (ann. 3. 65; 6. 6; 15. 71). This is in harmony with both the dignity of historical style and the author's Roman perspective. The same is true for Teutonic words: with the exception of framea 'spear' and glesum 'amber', he eschews them even when discussing problems of barbaric vocabulary (Germ. 43). He describes the structure of Germanic society in Latin terms, even if they are inappropriate. Tacitus himself notices differences of meaning in words like fides, servus, vicus, and others.<sup>2</sup>

Nor does Tacitus make systematic distinctions among Latin synonyms: it is true that gens, natio, populus, civitas are not entirely exchangeable, but they frequently overlap. This lack of precision is typical of the style of Tacitus, as is his avoidance of technical terms;<sup>3</sup> exceptions are found only in the later books of the Annales (11. 11. 1; 16. 22. 1). The historian shuns trite political catchwords<sup>4</sup> and investigates their loss of meaning. 'Liberty' is sometimes a euphemism for 'power' (Cerialis: hist. 4. 73), sometimes for 'anarchy' (dial. 40. 2); 'civilization' (humanitas) is a specious synonym for 'subjugation' (Agr. 21); pietas has lost all meaning to the point of being only good as an ironical title for the matricide Nero. To describe political circumstances, Tacitus borrows terms from the medical sphere or, more generally, from organic life, such as status or habitus.

As a rule, Tacitus avoids current expressions and phrases: e.g. he prefers civium bellum to bellum civile. He goes so far as to invert the regular word order in proper names (even in the Dialogus). A similar tendency can be observed on a larger scale: he shifts the emphasis from the main part of the sentence to an appended ablative absolute (for instance);<sup>5</sup> in fact, such appendixes often contain what is most

<sup>1</sup> A. DRAEGER, Über Syntax und Stil des Tacitus, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1882; LÖFSTEDT, Syntactica 2, 276–290; id. 1948; LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 1, 349–350 on ann. 1. 65. 1–2; W. RICHTER, Tacitus als Stilist. Ein Kapitel philologischer Forschungsgeschichte, in: G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 111–128; VON ALBRECHT, Prose 147–159.

<sup>2</sup> G. PERL, Die gesellschaftliche Terminologie in Tacitus' Germania, SDAW 15 G, 1982 (= Rom und Germanien, FS W. HARTKE), 56–66.

<sup>3</sup> Tacitus, who is a master of lofty style (σημνόν; cf. Plin. epist. 2. 11. 17), prefers the archaic expression praetor to proconsul; he says virgines Vestae instead of virgines Vestales; sedes curulis for sella curulis; sacerdotio XV virali praeditus instead of XV vir sacris faciundis.

<sup>4</sup> C. BECKER, Wertbegriffe im antiken Rom—ihre Geltung und ihr Absinken zum Schlagwort, Münchener Universitätsreden n.s. 44, 1967, 4–5 (about ann. 14. 53–56).

<sup>5</sup> A. KOHL, Der Satz nachtrag bei Tacitus, diss. Würzburg 1960; R. ENGHOFFER, important (e.g. hist. 1. 49 on Galba: maior privato visus, dum privatus fuit, et omnium consensu capax imperii, nisi imperasset, 'he seemed too great to be a subject so long as he was a subject, and all would have agreed that he was equal to the imperial office—if he had never held it). Such addenda often contradict the expectations which had been roused in the reader. Moreover, Tacitean paragraphs frequently end in maxims (as can be seen, for example, in the Agricola and the Germania), but this is a feature he shares with many other authors.

Tacitus takes his audience by surprise<sup>1</sup> thus stimulating them to further reflection. His enigmatic style invites the reader to ponder on his words. When in a writer so keen at variation repetitions are found, they must be meaningful. Not without reason the 'deadly effect' of Tacitus' repetitions has been emphasized.<sup>2</sup> Tacitus separates what belongs together and combines things originally unrelated: mutuo metu aut montibus, 'by mutual misgivings or mountains (Germ. 1. 1).<sup>3</sup> On a small scale, therefore, Tacitus follows the same stylistic principles he had adopted on a larger scale when arranging his material.

The same is true for the sphere of 'textual syntax' (a fascinating no-man's-land between grammar and literature). From sentence to sentence, the train of thought makes great demands upon the reader's mental activity. Often Tacitus links his new sentence to an element which had been silently implied in the previous sentence. The chain of reasoning is often reminiscent of Sallust.<sup>4</sup> A basic idea is split up into an antithesis; then, the second term of the latter is split up in its turn, and this procedure is veiled by slight asymmetry (Tac. hist. prooem., Sall. Catil. 3. 2). From this it might be concluded that the structure of Tacitean texts is the antipodes to the 'linear' style of classical prose.<sup>5</sup>

---

Der Ablativus absolutus bei Tacitus, diss. Würzburg 1961; F. KUNTZ, Die Sprache des Tacitus und die Tradition der lateinischen Historikersprache, Heidelberg 1962; B.-R. VOSS 1963; H. WALTER, Versuch der Rückführung des taciteischen Stils auf eine formelhafte Grundeinheit, in: Antike Historiographie in literaturwissenschaftlicher Sicht. Materialien zur wiss. Weiterbildung 2, Mannheim 1981, 72–97; A. KLINZ, Sprache und Politik bei Cicero und den römischen Historikern, AU 1986, 4, 59–64; N. W. BRUUN, Der Anakoluth bei Tacitus, Maia n.s. 39, 1987, 137–138.

<sup>1</sup> P. STEINMETZ 1968; cf. also W. HARTKE 1959, esp. 193.

<sup>2</sup> SYME, Tacitus 2, 725.

<sup>3</sup> P. WÜLFING, Prägnante Wortverbindungen bei Tacitus. Interpretationen zu Agr. 4–9, in: Dialogos. FS H. PATZER, Wiesbaden 1975, 233–241; B.-R. Voss 1963.

<sup>4</sup> P. STEINMETZ 1968, 262; cf. 258.

<sup>5</sup> F. KLINGNER, Beobachtungen über Sprache und Stil des Tacitus am Anfang des 13. Annalenbuchs, Hermes 83, 1955, 187–200; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 557–574.

However, the structure of Tacitus' periods does aim to reveal the motives of actions.<sup>1</sup> This type of style, in the first place, obeys the rules of psychology. It is by means of his style that Tacitus conveys his evaluation of the facts to the reader and guides his judgments.<sup>2</sup>

Are there differences of style between the works and within each of them? The most colorful display of stylistic hues is found in the Agricola: the 'historical' main section follows Sallust and Livy, even in style; the biographical introduction on Agricola's early years is reminiscent of Nepos;<sup>3</sup> the obituary at the end is Ciceronian.

The concise and sparkling style of the Germania sometimes borders on Seneca's manner. Depending on the subject, sober and quasi poetic passages alternate. Unfortunately we do not possess Latin predecessors (e.g. Seneca's works on Indians and Egyptians);<sup>4</sup> so we are not in a position to define precisely the language and style of the genre of ethnographic writings—if they did have a style of their own at all.

Unlike the other works of Tacitus, the Dialogus adopts a Ciceronian style: this problem can be solved neither by declaring the Dialogus spurious, nor by assigning it an early date and presupposing a development of Tacitus' style from Ciceronian beginnings to an historical style of his own. We had better take into account the severity of generic laws. Cicero had put a stamp on the rhetorical dialogue; historiography followed a discordant tradition.

Even within his dialogue, Tacitus attributes to each speaker a distinct style (as Cicero had done in his De oratore). The passionate 'modernist', Aper, shows a preference for parataxis and shuns participles, infinitives and gerundives; Messalla, who is more considerate, embodies the other extreme.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> W. KLUG, Stil als inhaltliche Verdichtung (on: Tac. ann. 13. 1- 2), Glotta 57, 1979, 267-281.

<sup>2</sup> H. HEUBNER, Sprache, Stil und Sache bei Tacitus, Gymnasium suppl. 4, Heidelberg 1964, esp. 133-134; N. P. MILLER, Style and Content in Tacitus, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., 1969, 99-116.

<sup>3</sup> Modifications in: R. HÄUSSLER, in: K. BÜCHNER (Tr), 3rd ed. 1985, 282, n. 6.

<sup>4</sup> On the history of literary forms: K. TRÜDINGER, Studien zur Geschichte der griechisch-römischen Ethnographie, diss. Basel 1918; NORDEN, Urgeschichte 181-182; 195-196; 457-466; critical: D. FLACH, Die Germania des Tacitus in ihrem literaturgeschichtlichen Zusammenhang, in: H. JANKUHN, D. TIMPE, Beiträge zum Verständnis der Germania des Tacitus, 1, Göttingen 1989, 27-58, esp. 46; 54-55.

<sup>5</sup> H. GUGEL, Untersuchungen zu Stil und Aufbau des Rednerdialogs des Tacitus, Innsbruck 1969; C. KLÄHR, Quaestiones Tacitinae de Dialogi genere dicendi personis accommodato, diss. Leipzig 1927.

In the Historiae the historical style of Tacitus is fully developed. Some Tacitean peculiarities become even more prominent in the first hexad of the Annales; to give way, in the later books, to a less tense diction. On the whole, towards the end, some mannerisms occur less often: in the Historiae, for instance, forem is thrice as frequent as essem; in the earlier books of the Annales, twice as frequent; whereas, in the later books, there is only one instance of forem.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, Tacitus tightens up his style in other respects: a symmetrical correlation like neque—neque becomes even rarer in the later books.<sup>2</sup> An undeniable fact is the decrease in 'benevolent' and 'hopeful' vocabulary within the Annales.<sup>3</sup> Pietas and providentia appear only once each, and have an ironical ring. Felicitas (not unfrequent hitherto) is found only twice in the Annales; integritas and humanitas are completely absent from this work; prudentia and veritas are lacking in its later part.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

For our author's attitude to literature, the Dialogus<sup>4</sup> is a chief document. This work is based on an eminently historical idea: the decline of oratory was caused by a political change; in this respect, the Dialogus is intimately linked to the rest of Tacitus' oeuvre.

Literary problems come up in his other works as well: when recording the deaths of senators he does not fail to mention their achievements as orators; this makes the Annales a source of the history of Roman oratory. But there is more: in an oration incorporated into the Annales, he has the historian Cremutius Cordus raise the problem of freedom of speech.<sup>5</sup> This text is preceded and followed by personal remarks of Tacitus, and may largely reflect his own opinion.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. C. NUTTING, The Use of forem in Tacitus, UCPh 7, 1923, 209–219; further examples in SYME, Tacitus 340–363; E. WÖLFFLIN, Tacitus. I. Schriften über den taciteischen stil und genetische entwicklung desselben, Philologus 25, 1867, 92–134 (repr. in: E.W., ausgewählte Schriften, ed. by G. MEYER, Leipzig 1933, 22–45).

<sup>2</sup> F. R. D. GOODYEAR, ad ann. 1. 1.

<sup>3</sup> SYME, Tacitus 2, appendix 66.

<sup>4</sup> On his terminology: P. SANTINI, Terminologia retorica e critica del Dialogus de oratoribus, Firenze 1968.

<sup>5</sup> W. SUERBAUM, Der Historiker und die Freiheit des Wortes. Die Rede des Cremutius Cordus bei Tacitus, ann. 4. 34–35, in G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 61–99.

<sup>6</sup> SYME, Tacitus 2. 517; it is uncertain, however, if Tacitus here implies a criticism of Hadrian.

Tacitus expressed his view of the historian's task in the introductions to his works and in personal remarks dropped in other instances; in addition, there is indirect evidence from speeches like ann. 4. 34–35.

An historian has to be truthful and impartial (hist. 1. 1; ann. 1. 1). Both principles are part of an old tradition (cf. Sall. Catil. 4. 2–3). The historian, therefore, turns out to be a judge<sup>1</sup> who calls to account the men of the past. Distance of time—as Tacitus himself observes—facilitates objectivity.<sup>2</sup> Granted that it is not always possible to find out the truth (ann. 3. 19), and no human being ever attained absolute impartiality; but this is not sufficient reason to doubt the sincerity of Tacitus' striving for truthfulness and objectivity. In many respects Tacitus was and remained a senator. He may have trusted that his very rank gave him the independence he needed for writing sine ira et studio, 'without anger and without partiality' (much unlike the grateful or disappointed creatures of imperial caprice!). His interpretation of Tiberius' character in terms of dissimulatio proves that a writer may yield the temptation of a great design—certainly at the expense of objectivity but not of personal honesty (would not happen the same thing, in the case of Caesar and Cicero, to no lesser a scholar than Mommsen?). Once, for Tacitus, truth was to be found in the human heart rather than in institutions, he could not but regard his psychological method as the true one.

According to Lucian (hist. conscr. 53) the prooemium of an historical work has to make its readers attentive and ready to learn. Contrary to Lucian's advice, Tacitus moreover tries to win their benevolence, <sup>1</sup> According to Lucian (hist. conscr. 38–41) a historian should not resemble bad judges who pass their verdicts according to friendship or enmity (cf. Cic. Planc. 7 iniquus iudex est qui aut invidet aut favet; further material in: C. WEYMAN, Sine ira et studio, ALLG 15, 1908, 278–279; J. VOGT 1936, 1–20, esp. 5–6; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 49–69, esp. 53–55; G. AVENARIUS, Lukians Schrift zur Geschichtsschreibung, Meisenheim 1956, 49–54; on the beginning of the Annals cf. also: B. WITTE, Tacitus über Augustus, diss. Münster 1963, 3–25; C.-J. CLASSEN, Zum Anfang der Annalen des Tacitus, AU 29, 4, 1986, 4–15; R. URBAN, Tacitus und die Res gestae Divi Augusti, Gymnasium 86, 1979, 59–74.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. already Cic. Marcell. 29: posterity judges et sine amore et sine cupiditate et rursus sine odio et sine invidia; cf. also Plin. epist. 8. 12. 5; a closeness of the historian's objectivity to Epicureanism is surmised by A. DIHLE, Sine ira et studio, RhM 114, 1971, 27–43; against this view: R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius . . ., Heidelberg 1978, 265–266 and W. KIERDORF 1978; the expression has to be explained in the context of Roman legal proceedings: R. SCHOTTLAENDER, Sine ira et studio. Ein Tacituswort im Lichte der römischen Prozeßordnung, Klio 57, 1975, 217–226.

although his remarks on truthfulness and impartiality spring from his subject matter as well. In his relationship to his readers the principle of exemplum is significant: virtus shall not be passed over in silence. The leading role of virtus makes Tacitus a successor of Sallust.<sup>1</sup> The same is true for vitia. Even if their contemporaries are not sympathetic to the praise of virtus, historians traditionally hope to produce an encouraging or deterring effect.<sup>2</sup> This is true of the Annales no less than of the Agricola. The introduction to the latter has a bearing on historical writing as well, since the exploits of clari viri (Agr. 1) are the subject matter of history, not biography alone (Polyb. 10. 21. 3-4).

Tacitus' intention to praise clari viri<sup>3</sup> gains a special ring, if seen against the background of his age: under the emperors, an individual did not have the same chances of achieving greatness as he would have had in the republic;<sup>4</sup> moreover, the historian, having lived the era of Domitian, is haunted by a sense of collective guilt,<sup>5</sup> a sense linking him up with the mentality of late republican historians. What is more, he explicitly names those, for whose death the senate (and himself) shared responsibility (Agr. 45).

As early as in the Agricola (46), Tacitus manifests an awareness of his literary achievement: he knows that his work will endure.<sup>6</sup>

The different shapes his ideas took in the prefaces to his various works have provoked numerous theories concerning the development of Tacitus' thought; however, in each case, the context as well as the aim of his argument are sufficient reason to explain the discrepancies.

<sup>1</sup> And, ultimately, of Cato the Elder; cf. Agr. 1 clarorum virorum facta moresque posteris tradere (and H. HEUBNER ad loc.); 3. 3; Sall. Catil. 3. 2 de magna virtute atque gloria bonorum memorare; Iug. 4 memoria rerum gestarum eam flammam egregiis viris in pectore crescere neque prius sedari, quam virtus eorum famam atque gloriam adaequaverit.

<sup>2</sup> Ne virtutes sileantur utque pravis dictis factisque ex posteritate et infamia metus sit (ann. 3. 65; cf. Diod. 1. 2. 2; 11. 46. 1; 37. 4 probably following Posidonius); R. HÄUSSLER 1965, 163.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also Cic. fam. 5. 12; de orat. 2. 341.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Agr. 17-18; 42.

<sup>5</sup> On sense of guilt as a typical feature of Roman historical writing: V. PÖSCHL, Die römische Auffassung der Geschichte, Gymnasium 63, 1956, 205-206; F. KLINGNER, Die Geschichte Kaiser Othos bei Tacitus, SSAL 92, 1940, 1, 17-18.

<sup>6</sup> 'Both Thucydides and Tacitus, when writing their works, thought of immortality: if we did not know it, we could guess it from their style. One of them believed he would make his thoughts durable by salting them, the other by boiling them down; and both, evidently, have not been mistaken' Nietzsche, Works, ed. R. SCHLECHTA 1, 933.

In the Agricola Tacitus has to justify his writing a biography containing elements of a historical monograph. Hence, clari viri and virtus are thrown into relief. Moreover he has to come to terms with the era of Domitian, which is part of the recent past.

In the introduction to his Historiae, Tacitus faces the objection that he is too close to the events and therefore unable to pass an objective verdict. Therefore, he has to make reference to his career, which protects him against the suspicion of bearing a personal grudge against Domitian. Furthermore he has to draw a line of demarcation between himself and the Flavian historians: there had been neither talent, nor unconditioned search for truth nor knowledge of politics but intrusion of personal motives.

In the Annales the sore point is the fact that their subject matter had been treated more than once by others. As a result, criticism of his predecessors, many of whom had been biased, comes into the forefront.

Thus, Tacitus develops different aspects, according to the specific points he wants to make. Neither in the prooemia nor in his choice of material a change of opinion can be observed; there is no subjective darkening of his view, only an increase of historical insight.<sup>1</sup>

Moreover, there is many an indirect hint as to Tacitus' views of historical writing. At the beginning of the Historiae Tacitus follows Sallust and Thucydides, thus suggesting to his readers to consider him on a par with these authors.<sup>2</sup> By adopting the annalistic pattern the author of the Historiae (which start with Jan. 1st, 69, not with Nero's death) justifies his claims to continue the tradition of the republican annalists.<sup>3</sup> Both overtly and covertly he indicates his aim to renew the great tradition of senatorial historiography (quotations as well as structural adaptations from eminent predecessors illuminate the meaning of events).<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> W. STEIDLE, Tacitusprobleme, MH 22, 1965, 81–114.

<sup>2</sup> F. KLINGNER, über die Einleitung der Historien Sallusts, Hermes 63, 1928, 165–192, esp. 165–166 on Sallust.

<sup>3</sup> It has been supposed that Tacitus, like previous Roman historians, projected problems of his own time into the past; this would explain why his contemporaries were cut to the quick by his historical works. Yet it is difficult to keep such conjectures within limits.

<sup>4</sup> This program is based on the fact that, as a senator, he was both politically competent and relatively independent of the emperors (unlike an obedient soldier such as Velleius). Just as the column of Trajan displays their virtutes, Tacitus (according to A. MICHEL 1966) unfolds their vitia in a continuous narrative. It is true that

Ideas II

In Tacitus' thought there is a deep chasm between his theoretical adherence to the ideology of the Roman republic and the radically different reality of the Principate. Two possible solutions suggest themselves: either an open conflict between the princeps and the representatives of the old virtus or an adjustment of the Roman values to the changed exigencies of the new era. Tacitus is aware of both ways and describes them. He analyzes the decline of the epoch as a sharp-eyed criminologist while discovering at the same time the signs of a new age. Let us first consider the ideas he shares with his period and his peers, then the new approaches by which he outshines them.

Senatorial Perspective and Selection of Material. The perspective of Tacitus' readers—the senators—influenced his selection of material. The topography of Britain or Germany is more interesting for English or German readers than for Roman senators; hence, the perfunctory treatment of this subject in Tacitus. The annoying lack of precision in his accounts of the proceedings of the senate and of provincial administration—details familiar to the author, who is a senator, but passed over by him in silence—is explained by his regard for his public as well (as senators they knew these things by heart). Tacitus was not concerned with the ignorance of future generations. Praetor minima non curat, 'the praetor does not care about unimportant cases': in conformity with this principle and in view of the dignity of the Roman people (ann. 13. 31) he selected his material, and left the rest to the daily news (acta diurna). Similarly, some of his factual errors were conditioned by his perspective as a denizen of the city.<sup>1</sup>

Traditional values. New senators often adopt the views of the aristocracy with special zeal. Tacitus despises Roman knights, citizens of municipia, and freedmen. On the other hand he mentions members of old families even if they are not particularly important politically.

---

Tacitus' access to sources was limited: D. TIMPE, Geschichtsschreibung und Senatsopposition, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 33, 1987, 65–102.

<sup>1</sup> Errors of Tacitus: I. BORZSÁK 1968, 434–435; SYME, Tacitus 378–396 (indulgent) and Appendix 61. Magic practices are described vaguely: A.-M. TUPET, Les pratiques magique à la mort de Germanicus, in: Hommages à la mémoire de P. WUILLEUMIER, Paris 1980, 345–352. The dramatic (imaginary) date of the Dialogus seems to be internally inconsistent (SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 2, 608); in favor of A.D. 76: C. LETTA, La data fittizia del dialogus de oratoribus, in: Xenia. Scritti in onore di P. TREVES, Roma 1985, 103–109; in favor of 75: e.g. R. HÄUSSLER in: K. BÜCHNER, 3rd. ed. 1985, 320–322.

It is true that he is aware of the faults of his peers—down to their servility (ann. 1. 7; 3. 65), but he does neither dissociate himself from them nor doubt their capability of governing the empire.<sup>1</sup>

Not always does he succeed in surmounting the limited perspective of the city of Rome, although he knows that great decisions were taken more and more in other places. When pointing out that in Germany freedmen were unimportant (Germ. 25) he is thinking, above all, of Rome where the opposite happened, since the days of Claudius at least. When affirming that the burning of the Capitol moved the Gauls to the point of making them believe that the last day of Rome had come (hist. 4. 54), he projects on the barbarians the apprehensions of the denizens of the city.

Even his portrait of Tiberius reflects the perspective of a Roman senator. Viewed against the background of the lawsuits carried on against senators during the last years of his reign,<sup>2</sup> the 'republican' gestures of Tiberius' earlier days must appear to Tacitus as mere hypocrisy.

Adopting the mentality of his peers, who acknowledged no limits for virtus and gloria (Agr. 23), our historian fails to understand the peaceful policy of Augustus and Tiberius who wisely renounced imperial expansion (Agr. 13; ann. 1. 11).

As a typical senator, Tacitus, in relations to foreign peoples, advocates relentless discipline, draconian punishment, even terror and genocide (e.g. Agr. 18; ann. 1. 56; 2. 62). Although calling for justice in principle, he deems mild governors indolent and weak.<sup>3</sup> In his belief, other peoples, as a rule, are inferior to the Romans: Parthians are boastful and arrogant, Arabs and Armenians faithless, Jews (and Christians)<sup>4</sup> stubbornly superstitious (ann. 2. 85), Greeks unreliable, <sup>1</sup> Unlike Sallust he does not link malus to nobilis; this is owing to the change of the political system and of the senatorial order. Praise of women (hist. 1. 3; 3. 69), even of a courageous libertine (ann. 15. 57; cf. 51) is a gratifying feature, but it is also meant to put to shame the senators.

<sup>2</sup> W. KIERDORF, Die Einleitung des Piso-Prozesses (Tac. ann. 3. 10), Hermes 97, 1969, 246–251.

<sup>3</sup> For a different view (Tacitus slightly dissociating himself from the harshness of the mos antiquus): E. AUBRION, Tacite et la miseriordia, Latomus 48, 1989, 383–391; on liberalitas and comitas: R. HÄUSSLER 1965, 280–284.

<sup>4</sup> H. FUCHS, Tacitus über die Christen (ann. 15. 44), V Chr 4, 1950, 65–93; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 575–607; H. FUCHS, Tacitus in der Editio Helvetica, MH 20, 1963, 205–229, esp. 221–228, the latter pages repr. under the title 'Nochmals: Tacitus über die Christen', in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 608–621.

conceited and servile. Teutons, though late-risers and drunkards, do have some virtues, but, precisely for this reason, the suicidal wars, in which they constantly indulge among themselves, are a benefit to Rome (Germ. 33).

Tacitus feels that there are times inimical to virtus (Agr. 1) and that the very best are the most threatened (hist. 1. 2; cf. ann. 4. 33). To give an example, Agricola, by his very success roused Domitian's envy (Agr. 39–43; esp. 41), not unlike his excellent father who had incurred Caligula's hatred (Agr. 4). Tacitus adopts the ancient Roman principle of virtus: the lives of an Agricola, Germanicus, or Corbulo are symptomatic of the reduced scope for political activity left to senators under the principate.<sup>1</sup> It is true that Agricola's destiny was individual and partly out of the ordinary,<sup>2</sup> but he made an experience familiar to any senator: he felt defrauded of the summit of a republican senator's career.

The prevalence of a 'Roman' view of things conditions our author's 'moralism' as well (e.g. ann. 3. 65). In his Germania Tacitus draws many parallels—much to the detriment of Roman society—and implies even more of them. In the Agricola, he occasionally hints at the ambiguous effects of civilization and Romanization (Agr. 21) or inserts a mordant aside against Roman avaritia.<sup>3</sup> His picture of uncivilized peoples romantically converges with his idea of the ancient Roman republic, whose traditional moral code he adopts in theory.<sup>4</sup> His sympathy for the conquered shows from his ascribing to them the moral categories of ancient Rome. As a consequence, in the speech of Calgacus<sup>5</sup> virtus is linked to libertas; of course, in a barbarian speaker, libertas is oriented against Rome.

Positive aspects of a 'modern' age. For all this, Tacitus' approach to history cannot be reduced to a narrow-minded ancient Roman perspective; in fact, he is not blind to the merits and advantages of his

<sup>1</sup> I. BORZSÁK 1982.

<sup>2</sup> K. H. SCHWARTE, Traians Regierungsbeginn und der Agricola des Tacitus, BJ 179, 1979, 139–175, esp. 141.

<sup>3</sup> Ego facilius crediderim naturam margaritis deesse quam nobis avaritiam (Agr. 12).

<sup>4</sup> Vera bona, quae in virtutibus sita sunt (Agr. 44).

<sup>5</sup> Agr. 30–32 (cf. also Agr. 11. 4); further: Arminius (ann. 1. 59); Caratacus (ann. 12. 37), Boudicca (ann. 14. 35); W. EDELMAIER 1964; H. FUCHS, Der geistige Widerstand gegen Rom in der antiken Welt, Berlin 1938, esp. 17 and 47; G. WALSER 1951, 154–160; H. VOLKMANN, Antike Romkritik. Topik und historische Wirklichkeit, in: Interpretationen, Gymnasium suppl. 4, 1964, 1–20; W. FAUTH, Die Mißgunst Roms, Anregung 5, 1967, 303–315.

own period. He is a member of the 'new' stratum of senators, which came from the provinces and inspired a senescent Rome with fresh life, and he shares their self-awareness. Unlike some venerable families of the old aristocracy, who seemed to make a point of honor of being ruined financially, the families of the new senators brought back old Roman morality and frugality. In this respect, the modern age was occasionally superior to the good old times.<sup>1</sup>

Even under the principate, Tacitus discovers chances for developing virtus (Agr. 42)—midway between defiant revolt and groveling servility. Thus he paves the way for a new ideology of the principate, in which the subjects show moderatio; the princeps, clementia.<sup>2</sup> 'Moderation' is limited to domestic policy: it implies renunciation of all striving for supreme power in the state. On the other hand, the struggle against foreign enemies, and for Roman supremacy, remains the classical field of Roman virtus. During his British campaign, Agricola may be compared even with Alexander or Caesar.

Tacitus does not try to justify imperialism morally. Whereas Cicero and Virgil had insisted on the moral and cultural superiority of Rome and on a religious sense of mission, our historian is more of a realist: despite all the defects of her officials (avaritia, superbia, libido), Rome guarantees order and prevents a war of all against all (hist. 4. 73–74). Furthermore, he approvingly mentions building operations (Agr. 21). It has to be acknowledged that Tacitus insists on just and basically peaceful government.<sup>3</sup>

Trying to find a heroic side even to conformity (an attempt intrinsically problematic) Tacitus in his Agricola appoints himself as the mouthpiece of an entire ('moderate') group of senators around Trajan.<sup>4</sup> Some passages of the Annales have a similar ring: Tacitus praises a senator who under a tyrant was able to preserve his dignity 'without giving offense' (ann. 4. 20). In the Agricola the heroes of resistance are less prominent, in Tacitus' later works, however, they repeatedly find due recognition.

Philosophy and Religion. In a senator of Domitian's era, we are not surprised to find Roman values, as it were, doubly refracted: they

<sup>1</sup> Tac. ann. 3. 55; cf. also hist. 1. 3; S. DÖPP, Nec omnia apud priores meliora. Autoren des frühen Principats über die eigene Zeit, RhM 132, 1989, 73–101.

<sup>2</sup> W. EDELMAIER 1964.

<sup>3</sup> Agr. 6; 9; 19; cf. 13.

<sup>4</sup> SYME, Tacitus 19–29; E. KOESTERMANN, Commentary on ann. 1–3, Heidelberg 1963, 25–31.

look partly archaic, partly trivialized. In fact, they must appear in such a shape, since Tacitus, when analyzing the motives of real politics inevitably has to start with ideas common among his peers in his epoch. Hence it would be unjust to expect philosophical depth from him. Given this background it is quite natural that the passage on immortality (Agr. 46) and the well-known chapter on fatum (ann. 6. 22; cf. 4. 20) are pathetically nebulous. We should neither call this a critical assessment of philosophical doctrines<sup>1</sup> nor deny our senator all philosophical education.

Tacitus is far from idealizing Stoic philosophy and philosophers.<sup>2</sup> The description of Seneca's courageous death is preceded by other passages, which imply a negative or ambivalent verdict. Helvidius Priscus elicits from Tacitus the comment that thirst for glory is the vice last overcome by wise men (hist. 4. 6). Musonius the Stoic makes a fool of himself by moralizing (hist. 3. 81). Another Stoic proves to be venal (ann. 16. 32).

Signs and wonders play an important role; however, some of them had been part of the source material (such as prodigies), others (like dreams and prophecies) belonged to the requisites of the sublime literary genre. Our historian's approach to ancient Roman religion is prevalently 'juridic' (cf. his remarks on the flamen Dialis, ann. 4. 16); he regards the traditional cult as something archaic, not quite up-to-date. Nevertheless, he does not understand that Tiberius was a 'rationalist', and gives a different explanation of the emperor's actions. Why did Tiberius not want to become a 'god'? Why did he not sue those who had sold statues of Augustus or committed perjury to god Augustus? Why did he refuse to consult the Sibylline books? Instead of discovering the common motive,<sup>3</sup> which is quite evident, Tacitus (not convincingly) tried to apply his general key of dissimulatio. Tiberius' characteristic union of rationalism and astrology smacks of Stoicism; Tacitus (the so-called champion of 'Stoic' opposition in the senate) fails to notice (or ignores) this feature in Tiberius. As for fatum and astrology, his verdicts vary.<sup>1</sup> Fortuna embodies chance, uncalculable and demonic (ann. 16. 1). In ann. 6. 22 the real theme is not freedom of will but astrological fatalism, intellectual choice of life (there would be freedom only at the beginning) or the Epicurean doctrine of chance; however, passages like ann. 4. 20 and Agr. 42, as well as the great death scenes evince that, according to Tacitus, there are ways for man of asserting his liberty and dignity.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> K. NIPPERDEY, Commentary ad loc.

<sup>2</sup> J. P. ARMLEDER, Tacitus and Professional Philosophers, CB 37, 1961, 90-93; id., Tacitus' Attitude to Philosophy, CB 38, 1962, 89-91; K. SCHNEIDER, Tacitus and Sallust, diss. Heidelberg 1964; U. ZUCCARELLI, Le esitazioni di Tacito sono dubbie di storico o incertezze di psicologo?, GIF 18, 1965, 261-274; R. T. SCOTT, Religion and Philosophy in the Histories of Tacitus, Rome 1968.

<sup>3</sup> Suetonius (Tib. 69) is right: Circa deos ac religiones neglegentior, quippe addictus mathematicae.

There is some general affinity between philosophical thought and Tacitus' praise of the Germans (Germ. 9) and the Jews (hist. 5. 5) whose immaterial idea of god excluded idolatry. Other mentions of deities—manifold and contradictory—are often no more than a literary device.<sup>3</sup> Tacitus credits the gods with a preference for the Romans on the one hand, (ann. 4. 27; Germ. 33), and with rancor and vindictiveness on the other.<sup>4</sup> Moreover, in many cases, he insists on the ('Epicurean') indifference of the gods to human affairs. Repeatedly he detaches himself from popular beliefs.<sup>5</sup> To put it briefly, Tacitus' attitude to philosophy and religion is typical of his class.

Crucial Experiences. Let us now turn to some features distinguishing our author from his peers and his contemporaries. It is true that he shared the notorious 'Domitian experience' with others but he transformed it into a creative impulse.<sup>6</sup> As a historian he observed the

<sup>1</sup> Negative: hist. 1. 22; ann. 2. 27; ambivalent or positive: ann. 6. 20; 22; 46; 4. 58; 14. 9; on ann. 6. 22: R. HÄUSSLER 1965, 389–397.

<sup>2</sup> The expression urgentibus imperii fatis (Germ. 33) is multifaceted; its meaning is not entirely negative: authoritative is D. TIMPE, Die Germanen und die fata imperii, in: K. DIETZ (and others), eds., Klassisches Altertum, Spätantike und frühes Christentum (FS A. LIPPOLD), Würzburg 1993, 223–245.

<sup>3</sup> R. VON PÖHLMANN, Die Weltanschauung des Tacitus, SBAW 1910; 2nd ed. 1913 (corr. and augmented); P. FABIA, L'irréligion de Tacite, JS 12, 1914, 250–265; L. DEUBNER, in: C. DE LA SAUSSAYE, A. BERTHOLET, E. LEHMANN, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte 2, Tübingen 4th ed. 1925, 482; E. FRAENKEL 1932, esp. 230; A. GUDEMAN, Review of N. ERIKSSON, Religiositet och irreligiositet hos Tacitus, Lund 1935, in: PhW 57, 1937, 270–275.

<sup>4</sup> Tac. ann. 4. 1; 14. 22; 16. 16 ira; hist. 1. 3 ultio.

<sup>5</sup> Tac. hist. 1. 86; 2. 1; 4. 26; ann. 1. 28; 4. 64; 13. 17.

<sup>6</sup> For his portrayal of Domitian: H. NESSELHAUF, Tacitus und Domitian, Hermes 80, 1952, 222–245, repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 219–251; K. VON FRITZ, Tacitus, Agricola, Domitian and the Problem of the Principate, CPh 52, 1957, 73–97; also in: R. KLEIN, ed., Prinzipat und Freiheit (= WdF 135), Darmstadt 1969, 421–463; K. H. WATERS, The Character of Domitian, Phoenix 18, 1964, 49–77; R. URBAN, Historische Untersuchungen zum Domitianbild des Tacitus, München 1971; S. DÖPP, Tacitus' Darstellungsweise in cap. 39–43 des Agricola, WJA n.s. 11, corrupting effect of power on the rulers as well as its paralyzing effect on the subjects which get used to inertia and finally come to love their condition of incapacity (Agr. 3). Some remains, therefore, of the curse of Domitian's era survived in the following beatissimum saeculum.<sup>1</sup>

After a long silence, the new 'freedom' made Tacitus find his voice, and become the mouthpiece of conscience and of a collective sense of guilt: 'It was our hands that led Helvidius into the dungeon, it was us that Mauricus pierced with his eyes, it was us that Senecio stained with his innocent blood' (Agr. 45). The paradox situation of having 'outlived oneself', of being sui superstes<sup>2</sup> was a personal experience thanks to which Tacitus matured to become the great historian we know.

Less noticed, if no less formative was another experience: 'the year of four emperors', the vicissitudes of which he must have observed as an adolescent. An aging Tacitus would discover in it the presages of a future historical age. We will come back to this point.

Approach to History. In his search for ratio causaeque Tacitus gives proof of analytic and diagnostic skills (in fact, status and habitus are medical terms). In his pathology of politics he does not abstain from rational analysis; as a matter of fact, while studying mechanisms of cause and effect, he took into account imponderable factors as well.<sup>3</sup>

Tacitus is neither a merely rational interpreter of history nor a novelist emphasizing the irrational dimension. In his rational investigation of irrational factors he adopts procedures typical of a

---

1985, 151–167; A. STÄDELE, Tacitus über Agricola und Domitian (Agr. 39–43), Gymnasium 95, 1988, 222–235.

<sup>1</sup> K. H. SCHWARTE, Trajans Regierungsbeginn und der Agricola des Tacitus, BJ 199, 1979, 139–175, esp. 174–175.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Cic. ad Q. fr. 1. 3; Aufidius Bassus apud Sen. epist. 30. 5; O. SEEL, Nostris superstites, in: Almanach des E. Klett Verlages, Stuttgart 1946–1971, 64–83; earlier: F. ZUCKER, Syneidesis—Conscientia. Ein Versuch zur Geschichte des sittlichen Bewußtseins im griechischen und im griechisch-römischen Altertum, Jena 1928, repr. in: F.Z., Semantica, Rhetorica, Ethica, Berlin 1963, 96–117; O. SEEL, Zur Vorgeschichte des Gewissens-Begriffes im altgriechischen Denken, FS F. DORNSEIFF, Leipzig 1953, 291–319; M. CLASS, Gewissensregungen in der griechischen Tragödie, Hildesheim 1964; P. W. SCHÖNLEIN, Zur Entstehung eines Gewissensbegriffes bei Griechen und Römern, RhM 112, 1969, 289–305; on the discovery of conscience s. now: G. IBSCHER, G. DAMSCHEN, eds., Demokrit, Fragmente zur Ethik, Stuttgart 1996.

<sup>3</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1960, esp. 254, n. 1; R. KOSELLECK, Der Zufall als Motivationsrest in der Geschichtsschreibung, in: Die nicht mehr schönen Künste. Poetik und Hermeneutik 3, 1968, 129–141.

criminologist. Though following Thucydides and Polybius in several respects he does not share their scientific optimism.

Tacitus is aware of the change undergone by an individual when becoming part of a collective. Under the influence of monarchy citizens develop patientia ('docility'), not a virtue any more but a type of servitus ('servility'). Virtus and libertas, therefore, are linked to one another (Agr. 11). Furthermore, Tacitus enucleates the psychological mechanisms which posthumously transform losers into martyrs and winners: punitis ingenius gliscit auctoritas, 'genius chastised grows in authority' (ann. 4. 35). Generally, Tacitus discovers in history an 'enigmatic trend towards futility and absurdity'.<sup>1</sup> His attention is less focused on personalities as such than on man as exposed to diverging powers and groups, or on collective reactions. As a historian, he senses the impact of 'atmosphere' on political events. Therefore, he pays due attention to the psychology of the masses, especially of the army.<sup>2</sup> In a crucial passage (as early as hist. 1. 4) he mentions the state of mind of the army as an important element of historical causality—second after the situation in the capital (which for a Roman senator always comes first). Tacitus is perfectly rational in stating that everything danced to the soldiers' tune, but the army, in its turn, was under the sway of irrational moods. In the Annales, likewise, the army is assessed as a factor of power politics. According to Tacitus, Tiberius did not have a 'republican's' scruples about taking command of the army; he spared such noble hesitations for the sessions of the senate (ann. 1. 7). Galba was unsuccessful because he failed to recognize how much he depended on the military (cf. hist. 1. 5 and 1. 7). In fact, he practiced ancient Roman thriftiness and even reprimanded the alleged murderer of his rival Otho, instead of rewarding him (hist. 1. 35). Otho was more 'modern' in this respect: he flattered his soldiers (omnia serviliter pro dominatione, 'he played in every way the slave to secure the master's place', hist. 1, 36). Vitellius gave them money

<sup>1</sup> V. PÖSCHL 1962, esp. 7; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, esp. 120.

<sup>2</sup> I. KAJANTO, Tacitus' Attitude to War and the Soldier, Latomus 29, 1970, 699–718; E. OLSHAUSEN, Tacitus zu Krieg und Frieden, Chiron 17, 1987, 299–312; an interpretation of the mutiny of the soldiers in Pannonia is found in: E. AUERBACH, Mimesis, chapter 2: 'Fortunata, ann. 1. 16 ff.', Bern 1946, 40–46; 6th ed. 1977, 37–43, (cf. n. 1 to p. 1117).

(hist. 1. 52).<sup>1</sup> Tacitus discovered this second arcanum imperii<sup>2</sup> ('secret of power') in earlier history as well: did Augustus not owe his dominion to an army, which he had paid privately (ann. 1. 10) and obligated by gifts (ann. 1. 2; 1. 10)? The events reported in the first three books of the Historiae reveal the dangers inherent in such a system: power shifts from civil to military authorities and, in certain cases, further: from the commanders to the soldiery.

A corollary to this development is the decline of the senate, of the capital city, and of Italy. The rise of Galba had demonstrated that emperors could be made outside Rome (hist. 1. 4), and Vespasian was chosen in the east (hist. 2. 79). Correspondingly Tacitus, as a further historical cause, considers the situation in the provinces (hist. 1. 4). The importance of the provinces, then, has been discovered long before Mommsen (cf. vol. V of his Roman History). In this context, Tacitus draws the important historical parallel to Caesar and Pompey (hist. 2. 6), who each had based their power on the conquest of borderlands. It is not surprising, however, that it is to Rome that he ultimately refers the events at the periphery; a contrary example is Pompeius Trogus.

Yet there are still deeper insights. He knew full well that even ancient Roman values were subject to change as to their practicability, that an all too strict adherence to them might fall short of reality and even turn out to be disastrous. Therefore, on occasion of the adoption of Piso, Galba's speech, for all its moral elevation, beats the air (hist. 1. 15–16). After all, Galba advocated an old-fashioned Roman rigor, to which mankind, in his day, could no longer measure up (antiquus rigor et nimia severitas, cui iam pares non sumus, 'old-fashioned strictness and excessive severity—qualities which we can no longer bear': hist. 1. 18). Times had changed; ancestral customs could not be enforced without concessions.

Social conditions did not fail to influence the system of values: under despots, mentality and moral categories changed, as appears from the beginning of the Agricola. As early as under Sulla, Cicero, at the end of his speech Pro Roscio Amerino had observed, that, under such circumstances, human beings got used to the most outraging atrocities to the point of taking them for granted.

<sup>1</sup> E. KOESTERMANN, Das Charakterbild Galbas bei Tacitus, in: Navicula Chilonensis, FS F. JACOBY, Leiden 1956, 191–206; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 428–446; F. KLINGNER, Die Geschichte Kaiser Othos bei Tacitus, SSAL 92, 1, 1940 = KLINGNER, Studien 605–624.

<sup>2</sup> Caesar is said (Dio Cass. 42. 49. 4) to have called soldiers and money the two pillars of dominion; they are interdependent.

Decline and progress are not the only categories familiar to Tacitus; both lines may intersect; again and again, individual developments come to pass; and this applies even—and eminently so—to the field of morals.<sup>1</sup>

Tacitus' achievement is a phenomenological study of politics—especially under the auspices of autocracy; rather than a mere analysis, it is an artistic creation. Despite the seriousness of his search for truth, he is not primarily concerned with unequivocal logic. As a Roman interested in practical life, he is not able to take a fancy to 'insoluble' problems; now and then, he alludes to them, to lay bare the abysses of the human mind without trying to bridge them. Neither a philosopher nor a preacher, he intends to describe human life with all its contradictions.

According to Tacitus, man is free in as far as he is able to find, in active life, a response to antinomies of human existence, otherwise irreconcilable. Often he admiringly describes death as a door to freedom,<sup>2</sup> but he rejects this way for himself. If he depicts Seneca's last hours against the background of Socrates' death, this certainly implies that Tacitus, too, must have had an idea of Socrates. In a different context, he calls Plato's Socrates to witness for the tyrant's pangs of conscience (ann. 6. 6).

Digression: Development? All efforts to reduce the contradictory statements made by Tacitus on the gods to a pattern of mental development cancel one another.<sup>3</sup> Other theories implying a development of this thought are based on no less shaky foundations. He did not develop from a 'monarchist' to a 'republican';<sup>4</sup> for this antithesis is inherent in a Roman senator's mind from the beginning and is bound to remain irreconciled. A view still widespread says that his outlook

<sup>1</sup> Cf. W. EDELMAIER 1964.

<sup>2</sup> P. SCHUNCK, Römisches Sterben. Studien zu Sterbeszenen in der kaiserzeitlichen Literatur, insbesondere bei Tacitus, diss. Heidelberg 1955.

<sup>3</sup> P. FABIA, L'irréligion de Tacite, JS 12, 1914, 250–265 (from belief to disbelief, then back to belief and disbelief); similarly N. ERIKSSON, Religiositet och irreligiositet hos Tacitus, Lund 1935; R. REITZENSTEIN 1927 (from belief to skepticism).

<sup>4</sup> Thus: R. REITZENSTEIN 1927; id. 1914–1915, 173–276, esp. 235–241, repr. in: Aufsätze zu Tacitus, Darmstadt 1967, 17–120, esp. 79–85; much more convincing, however, F. KLINGNER 1932.

darkened gradually.<sup>1</sup> However, there is darkness enough as early as the Agricola and the Historiae, and it is hardly possible, in the Dialogus, to separate the 'acceptance of monarchy' from the speaker Maternus. Does it tell of illusion or resignation?<sup>2</sup> Differences of atmosphere traceable from work to work in the prologues need not be indicative of growing pessimism,<sup>3</sup> rather there is an increase in historical insight.<sup>4</sup> Moreover, the structure of the texts and their respective 'point' suffice to explain the differences.<sup>5</sup> If comparing Agricola with Paetus Thrasea, Piso, or Arulenus Rusticus, for whom their moderation was of no avail, we may be allowed to surmise that Tacitus became even more reflective and pensive.<sup>6</sup>

The author shuns taking sides directly. Often the reader seems to hear his voice through the speeches of his characters; but who can be certain about it? The problem presents itself in a similar way as it does for Thucydides. Crucial themes are treated in the following speeches: succession to the throne by adoption (Galba's speech: hist. 12. 15–16), cult of emperors (Tiberius' speech: ann. 4. 37–38), administration of provinces: standards of law (Tiberius' speech: ann. 3. 69), luxury and economy (Letter of Tiberius: ann. 3. 52–54).

Especially instructive is the transference of patterns of thought from republican history to the imperial era: once the source of fear has been eliminated, decadence of government is the consequence. For republican historians, especially for Sallust, moral decay began after the Romans had no longer to fear Carthage. Tacitus (in ann. 1–6)<sup>7</sup> applied the same principle to Tiberius' biography (and the change of his government). This interpretation is confirmed by parallels from

<sup>1</sup> K. HOFFMEISTER, Die Weltanschauung des Tacitus, Essen 1831; A. GUDEMAN, edition of the Dialogus, Leipzig 2nd ed. 1914, repr. 1967, 47; F. KLINGNER 1932, esp. 164, repr. in: KLINGNER, Geisteswelt, 5th ed., 1965, esp. 521.

<sup>2</sup> SYME, Tacitus 1, 220; it is seducing, but perhaps too simple to find mere irony in Maternus' speech (A. KÖHNKEN, Das Problem der Ironie bei Tacitus, MH 30, 1973, 32–50).

<sup>3</sup> Thus, KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 521; 513; W. JENS 1956, esp. 346–348 (influenced by R. REITZENSTEIN 1927); W. WIMMEL, Roms Schicksal im Eingang der taciteischen Annalen, A&A 10, 1961, 35–52.

<sup>4</sup> Convincing: W. STEIDLE 1965, esp. 112–113.

<sup>5</sup> A. D. LEEMAN 1973, 169–208; repr. in: Leeman, Form 317–348.

<sup>6</sup> R. HÄUSSLER 1970–1971, 398.

<sup>7</sup> F. KLINGNER, Tacitus über Augustus und Tiberius (1953), in: KLINGNER, Studien 624–658; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 513–556, esp. 547–549; for the tradition: R. HÄUSSLER 1965, 322–324.

Sallust;<sup>1</sup> Tacitus emphasizes the responsibility of the individual, on whose moral decision the destiny of the empire depends—an idea suggesting itself to other authors as well in the period of Domitian (Sil. 13. 504).

For all its importance the character of the emperors is not the sole issue of Tacitus. No less significant are the changes in the minds of their subjects. Political interaction between emperor, army, and senate, between political authority and individual freedom are a basic theme: Vitellius exemplifies a weak character deteriorated by power. In the first three books of his Historiae Tacitus gives two different presentations of the roles of the individual and the masses in the two halves of the empire: in the west, not the personality of an Otho or a Vitellius, but the caprice of the military dominates, here the author is concerned with the moods and views of the masses. In the east, however, the generals—Vespasian and Mucian (the governor of Syria) are the acting subjects.<sup>2</sup> The decadence of emperors, together with the senate's servility and the insolence of the army, converges to produce the typical changes in the human mind, which Tacitus wants to pinpoint. His œuvre is an interpretation of reality, a study in the corrupting effects of power on the individual and entire groups—including the the consequences for universal history, which were inevitable in view of the dimensions of the empire.

As a result, some current opinions about Tacitus need to be modified: first, although Rome remains the center of his interest, he does not limit his perspective to the capital city. Moreover, neither his view of history nor his view of man is inflexible or reactionary. Finally, his special concern with ethics and the characters of the emperors was a need of the moment, since in the imperial period the concentration of power in the hands of a single individual called for high moral standards.

Above all, the views of Tacitus may serve as a serious corrective to modern views of history. Today, in search for laws determining the historical process, many of us emphasize 'biological', economic, or institutional constraints; institutions, above all, enjoy a certain idolatry. On the other hand, Arnold Toynbee (A Study of History) draws our attention to man, who every day has to find new responses to new challenges. This is to revive a perspective of ancient historiography which reminds the individual of his historical responsibility and asserts his liberty to look for new creative solutions.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Sall. Catil. 10 saevire Fortuna ac miscere omnia coepit; Tac. ann. 4. 1 turbare fortuna coepit, saevire ipse; Sall. hist. 1. 12 M. postquam remoto metu Punico . . .; Tac. ann. 6. 51. 3 postquam remoto pudore et metu.

<sup>2</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1960, 257–260 with bibl.

Transmission

Only one copy of each work did come down to the Middle Ages:

ann. 1–6: there is only the Mediceus I = Laurentianus plut. 68, 1 (9th century), ann. 1–16 and hist. 1–5: only Mediceus II = Laurentianus plut. 68, 2 (11th century), written in Montecassino and discovered by Boccaccio around 1370.

Minor writings (Germ., Agr., Dial., and Suet. gramm.): we are compelled to reconstruct the lost Hersfeldensis, mostly from copies. According to recent studies, the fragment found in Iesi<sup>1</sup> in 1902 is much closer to the Hersfeldensis than had been thought.<sup>2</sup>

Details:

1. The manuscripts of ann. 11–16 and hist. 1–5 form three groups (according to where the text breaks off in hist. 5). The Mediceus II, which leads the group with the longest text, is probably the source of all other manuscripts (which, therefore, should be eliminated). Good readings in these late codices are no better than conjectures. The Leidensis (facsimile edition C. W. Mendell, Leiden 1966) is in all probability worthless, although E. Koestermann tried to rescue its authority (ed. Leipzig 1960–1961). R. Hanslik deemed the ‘Genuese group’ (of manuscripts V 58 and B 05) independent—without gaining acceptance (cf. e.g. H. Heubner, Gnomon 51, 1979, 65). Under the guidance of R. Hanslik, the material from the deteriores was explored and utilized in separate editions: ann. 11–12, ed. by H. Weiskopf, Wien 1973; ann. 15–16, ed. by F. Römer, ibid. 1976.

2. The titles Annales and Historiae are uncertain. Tertullian (apol. 16) quotes two passages from book ‘four’ (actually, five) of the Historiae; the text he used must have been written on scrolls. Jerome (in Zach. 3. 14 = PL Migne 25, 1522) consulted an edition in which the Annales preceded the Historiae (the works were arranged according to their subject matter, not their dates of composition): Cornelius . . . Tacitus qui post Augustum usque ad mortem Domitiani vitas Caesarum XXX voluminibus exaravit. In the Mediceus II the 1st book of the Historiae is called liber decimus septimus ab excessu divi Augusti. Therefore, in all probability there were 16 books of Annales and 14 of Historiae.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> R. TILL, Handschriftliche Untersuchungen zu Tacitus’ Agricola und Germania. Mit einer Photokopie des Codex Aesinas, Berlin 1943.

<sup>2</sup> H. MERKLIN, ‘Dialogus’—Probleme in der neueren Forschung. Überlieferungsgeschichte, Echtheitsbeweis und Umfang der Lücke, ANRW 2, 33, 3, 1991, 2255–2283. A 9th century codex written in minuscules contained Dictys, Germania, and Agricola; another minuscule codex contained, among other texts, the Dialogus and the fragment of Suetonius. From these two manuscripts the three Tacitean works were collected into the Hersfeldensis (H) at a moment we cannot date precisely. In the Aesinas the old Bellum Troianum and the old rest of Agricola must have come together anew between 1456 and 1473.

3. It is impossible to establish with absolute security if in the (oldest) codex Hersfeldensis the Dialogus de oratoribus explicitly bore the name of Tacitus.<sup>2</sup> In that manuscript the works were arranged in the following order: Germania, Agricola, Dialogus, Suet. gramm.; hence, the context of the tradition is no compelling evidence for Tacitean authorship of the Dialogus. Beatus Rhenanus doubted the authenticity of this work (in his edition of Tacitus, Basel 1519). Justus Lipsius ascribed the Dialogus to Quintilian but later rejected this idea. J. H. Nast (in his translation of the Dialogus, Halle 1787) surmised that it was written by Pliny the Younger. In favor of Tacitus as the author of the Dialogus we may adduce a citation from dial. 12 in Pliny (epist. 9. 10. 2), if Pliny does not quote a lost letter of Tacitus. The 'un-Tacitean' style of the Dialogus is not an argument against authenticity, for a 'Ciceronian' style was appropriate to the theme of oratory, whereas history followed different standards. Nor is the difference of style, once accepted the authenticity, an argument for a very early date.<sup>3</sup> In all probability, the Dialogus was written after Domitian's death, perhaps only on the occasion of the consulate of Fabius Justus (102),<sup>4</sup> slightly later than Agricola and Germania.<sup>5</sup> The theory supposing a lacuna in chapter 40 has today been abandoned. Beyond any doubt, however, there is a lacuna in chapter 36. Its size is disputed: if there was a 'small' lacuna, it comprised one and a half folios; in this case, there was no speech of Secundus.<sup>6</sup> If there was a 'big' lacuna

<sup>1</sup> R. SYME, however, for the sake of the hexadic principle supposes that there were 18 books of Annales and 12 books of Historiae (in his Tacitus 1, 211, n. 2 and Appendix 35); in consideration of the above-quoted subscriptio he suggests that Tacitus planned 18 but completed only 16 books of Annales.

<sup>2</sup> H. MERKLIN, Probleme des Dialogus de oratoribus. Möglichkeiten und Grenzen ihrer methodischen Lösung, A&A 34, 1988, 170–189, esp. 176 supposes for the Hersfeldensis a subscriptio like that found in the Vindobonensis.

<sup>3</sup> Before 90: G. ROMANIELLO, Il Dialogus de oratoribus nella sua definitiva soluzione della vexata quaestio, Roma 1968.

<sup>4</sup> H. GUGEL, Untersuchungen zu Stil und Aufbau des Rednerdialogs des Tacitus, Innsbruck 1969, 38, n.6; accepted by R. GÜNGERICH, Gnomon 43, 1971, 31.

<sup>5</sup> Roughly between 102 and 107, S. BORZSÁK 1968, 433; in favor of dating the Dialogus after Domitian's death but earlier than Agricola and Germania: C. E. MURCIA, The Date of Tacitus' Dialogus, HSPH 84, 1980, 99–125 (problematic).

<sup>6</sup> K. BARWICK, Der Dialogus de oratoribus des Tacitus. Motive und Zeit seiner Entstehung, Berlin 1954, 33–39; F. PFISTER, Tacitus und die Germanen, in: Studien

(six folios), Secundus did give a speech.<sup>1</sup> Today the 'small' lacuna<sup>2</sup> is communis opinio.

Influence<sup>3</sup>

In classical antiquity Tacitus was quoted rarely; many readers considered his work a series of biographies of emperors (an opinion which after all reflects some part of the truth). Tertullian (apol. 16) discussed his biased verdicts on the Jews and unmasked the man whose name promised taciturnity as mendaciorum loquacissimus, 'a real chatterbox when it comes to lies' (not quite unjustly, in this case). Ptolemy grotesquely misunderstood (ann. 4. 73) the words ad sua tutanda (~ 'for protection'), in which he 'discovered' the name of a (non-existent) place: Σιατου-τάνδα (~ 'Fort Protection'). The eminent geographer was the first of a long series of scholars who vainly searched Tacitus' text for precise information. No grammarian quoted Tacitus, for his style was unsuitable for the classroom. As the story goes, his namesake, Emperor Tacitus (Hist. Aug. Tac. 10. 3) had his writings copied ten times yearly in all libraries; misluck would have it, however, that this emperor reigned no longer than half a year.

Around 400 Tacitus was studied in the circle of the Symmachi. Ammianus when writing his own history started with Nerva, thus continuing Tacitus' work. He was inspired even by his predecessor's style, although we should not overestimate the parallels.<sup>4</sup> Sulpicius zu Tacitus, FS C. Hosius, Stuttgart 1936, 91–92; K. BÜCHNER, Tacitus. Die historischen Versuche (TrN), Stuttgart 3rd ed. 1985, 326–328; in favor of a lacuna of six columns (three pages) and a speech of Secundus: P. STEINMETZ, Secundus im Dialogus de oratoribus des Tacitus, RhM n.s. 131, 1988, 342–357.

---

<sup>1</sup> K. VRETSKA, Das Problem der Lücke und der Secundusrede im Dialogus de oratoribus, Emerita 23, 1955, 182–210; W. RICHTER, Zur Rekonstruktion des Dialogus de oratoribus, NAWG 1961, 2, 387–425.

<sup>2</sup> R. HÄUSSLER 1986, 73–77.

<sup>3</sup> E. CORNELIUS, Quomodo Tacitus . . . in hominum memoria versatus sit usque ad renescentes litteras saec. XIV et XV, Wetzlar 1888; J. VON STACKELBERG, Tacitus in der Romania. Studien zur literarischen Rezeption des Tacitus in Italien und Frankreich, Tübingen 1960; E.-L. ETTER, Tacitus in der Geistesgeschichte des 16. und 17. Jh., Basel 1966; K. C. SCHELHASE, Tacitus in Renaissance Political Thought, Chicago 1976; H. A. GÄRTNER, Massilia et l'Agricola de Tacite, in: La patrie gauloise d'Agrippa au VI<sup>ème</sup> siècle, Actes du Colloque (Lyon 1981), Paris 1983, 89–98; R. CHEVALLIER, R. POIGNAULT, eds., Actes du colloque Présence de Tacite, Tours 1992.

<sup>4</sup> I. BORZSÁK, Von Tacitus zu Ammian, AAntHung 24, 1976, 357–368.

Severus and Cassiodorus were familiar with Tacitus. Sidonius Apollinaris repeatedly mentioned Tacitus, Orosius quoted him; in 4th and 5th century Gaul many writers were familiar with him.<sup>1</sup>

In the Middle Ages Tacitus' influence was modest, as was his transmission. Einhart (d. 840) knew the Germania and the Historiae. Fulda was a center of his authority (as were the neighboring Benedictine monasteries of Corvey and Hersfeld). As early as in the ninth century the Germania and the Annales were read there. The latter work was also used in the vita Heinrici IV (early 12th century). The other strand of tradition (that of the Mediceus II) had an impact on Boccaccio (d. 1375), Leonardo Bruni (d. 1444), and others.

In the Renaissance Tacitus came to be very influential. Humanists discovered him as an observer of human behavior. For example, Vico (d. 1744) wrote in his autobiography: 'Tacitus considers man such as he is, Plato, as he should be' (Tacito contempla l'uomo qual'è, Platone qual dee essere).<sup>2</sup>

In many respects Tacitus the moralist inspired his heirs from Montaigne to Lichtenberg<sup>3</sup> and Nietzsche (d. 1900), who was pleased both with Tacitus' innuendos against Christians and with his sarcastic remark on the vanity of the wise.<sup>4</sup> Voltaire discovered Tacitus the satirist, Boissier the moralist and the artist.<sup>5</sup>

Tacitus' ideas as well as his literary style exerted an incalculable influence on 16th and 17th century historians. This is true not only of the Romania but also of the rest of Europe (H. Grotius, P. C. Hoof).<sup>6</sup> Political literature in Italy and in France was first imbued with Machiavellism, then with Tacitism.<sup>7</sup> Beroaldus (d. 1612), a great initiator in many fields, discovered the political import of Tacitus. After him, many read Tacitus' works as a Machiavellian ars aulica (F. Cavriana, Discorsi sopra Tacito, Fiorenza 1599–1600; F. Guicciardini,

<sup>1</sup> F. HAVERFIELD, Tacitus During the Late Roman Period and the Middle Ages, JRS 6, 1916, 196–201.

<sup>2</sup> G. VICO, Opere, ed. by F. NICCOLINI, Milano 1953, 31–32.

<sup>3</sup> 'Pagan Tacitus, who, with Jewish finesse, probed right down to the bottom of every action, to discover the devil'. Lichtenberg, Schriften und Briefe, ed. by W. PROMIES, vol. 1, Sudelbücher I, München 1973, 386.

<sup>4</sup> Works, ed. by K. SCHLECHTA 2, 192.

<sup>5</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH, Tacite, Voltaire et G. BOISSIER, in: R. CHEVALLIER, R. POIGNAULT, eds. (quoted above p. 1139, n. 3), 141–149.

<sup>6</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 13–37.

<sup>7</sup> P. BURKE, Tacitism, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., 1969, 149–171.

A. Collodi). Tacitism became a pseudomorphosis of Machiavellism, Tiberius replaced the principe.<sup>1</sup>

Tacitus' narrative talent inspired many dramatists; suffice it to mention Corneille's Othon (first performed in 1664), Racine's Britannicus (1669), Alfieri's Ottavia (1780–1782), Mar-Joseph Chénier's Tibère (around 1807). During his exile, Arnault wrote a Germanicus (1817).

Individual quotations have a history of their own,<sup>2</sup> e.g. Tac. Agr. 30. 4 Ubi solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant. Byron (The Bride of Abydos 2. 20. 431) does not refer the quotation to imperialism but to the behavior of man: 'He makes a solitude and calls it peace'.

Editions.<sup>3</sup> ann. 11–16, hist. 1–5, Germ., dial.: Bononiae 1472; Vindelinus DE SPIRA, Venetiis (probably 1473). * Agr.: F. PUTEOLANUS, Mediolani about 1477. * First complete edition: P. BEROALDUS, P. Cornelio Taciti libri quinque noviter inventi atque cum reliquis eius operibus editi, Romae 1515. * The early printed editions are quoted in: M. VALENTI, Saggio di una bibliografia delle edizioni di Tacito nei secoli XV–XVII, Roma 1953. * ann.: H. FURNEAUX (TC), vol. 1, Oxford 2nd ed. 1896, vol. 2, 2nd ed. 1916, repr. 1951. * K. NIPPERDEY, G. ANDRESEN (TC), vol. 1, Berlin 11th ed. 1915, vol. 2, 6th ed. 1908. * E. KOESTERMANN (C), 4 vols., Heidelberg 1963–1968. * A. HORNEFFER (Tr), W. SCHUR (N), Stuttgart 1964. * C. D. FISHER, Oxford 1906. * H. HEUBNER, Stuttgart 1983. * ann. 1–2: N. P. MILLER (TC), London 1959. * F. R. D. GOODYEAR (TC), 2 vols., Cambridge 1971; 1982. * ann. 1–6: S. (= I.) BORZSÁK, Leipzig 1992. * ann. 4: R. H. MARTIN, A. J. WOODMAN (TC), Cambridge 1989. * D. C. A. SHOTTER (TTrC), Warminster 1989. * ann. 11–12: W. WEISKOPF, Wien 1973. * H. W. BENARIO (TC), London 1983. * ann. 11–13: P. WUILLEUMIER, Paris 1976. * ann. 11–16: K. WELLESLEY, Leipzig 1986. * ann. 15: N. P. MILLER (TC), London 1973. * ann. 15–16: F. RÖMER, Wien 1976. * hist.: C. D. FISHER, Oxford 1911. * H. GOELZER (TTrN), Paris 1920, repr. 1959. * W. HERAEUS (TC), 2 vols., Leipzig 5th ed. 1904; 4th ed. 1899. * K. WELLESLEY, Leipzig 1986. * H. HEUBNER (T), Stutgardiae 1978. * H. HEUBNER (C), 5 vols. (vol. 5 together with W. FAUTH), Heidelberg 1963–1982. * K. VRETSKA (TTrN), Stuttgart 1984. * P. WUILLEUMIER, H. LE BONNIEC, J. HELLEGOUARC'H (TTrC), 3 vols., Paris 1987–1992. * hist. 1–2: G. E. F. CHILVER (C), Oxford 1979. * hist. 3: K. WELLESLEY (C), Oxford 1972. * hist. 4–5: G. E. F. CHILVER,

<sup>1</sup> In his Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron, however, Diderot used Tacitus' portrayal of Seneca to find arguments in favor of the collaboration of the philosopher with his ruler (CONTE, LG 544).

<sup>2</sup> A. MEHL, Ubi solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant, Gymnasium 83, 1976, 281–288.

<sup>3</sup> On the problem of the editio princeps: R. HÄUSSLER 1986, 95.

G. B. TOWNEND (C), Oxford 1985. * Germ., Agr., dial.: E. KOESTERMANN, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1970. * Agr., Germ., dial.: R. M. OGILVIE, E. H. WARMINGTON, M. WINTERBOTTOM, M. HUTTON, W. PETERSON (TTr), London 1970. * M. WINTERBOTTOM, R. M. OGILVIE (best T), Oxford 1975. * K. BÜCHNER, R. HÄUSSLER (TrN), Stuttgart 3rd ed. 1985. * Agr., Germ.: A. STÄDELE (TTrN), München 1991. * M. HUTTON, R. M. OGILVIE, E. H. WARMINGTON (TTr), London 1995. * Agr.: R. M. OGILVIE, I. RICHMOND (TC), Oxford 1967. * J. DELZ (best text), Stutgardiae 1983. * H. HEUBNER (C), Göttingen 1984. * R. FEGER (TTrN), Stuttgart 1973. * R. TILL (TTrN), Berlin 5th ed. 1988. * Germ.: J. G. C. ANDERSON (TC), Oxford 1938. * E. FEHRLE (TTrN), rev. by R. HÜNNEKOPF, Heidelberg 5th ed. 1959. * R. MUCH, H. JAHNKUHN, W. LANGE (TC), Heidelberg 3rd ed. 1967. * A. ÖNNERFORS, Stutgardiae 1983. * A. A. LUND (TTrC), Heidelberg 1988. * G. PERL (TTr), Darmstadt 1990. * dial.: W. PETERSON (TC), Oxford 1893. * A. GUDEMAN (TC), Berlin 2nd ed. 1914. * H. FURNEAUX (TC), Oxford 3rd ed. 1939. * A. MICHEL (TC), Paris 1962. * D. Bo (TC), Torino 1974. * H. VOLKMER (TTr), München 3rd ed. 1979. * R. GÜNGERICH, H. HEUBNER (C), Göttingen 1980. * H. HEUBNER, Stutgardiae 1983. ** Lexica: A. GERBER, A. GREEF, Lexicon Taciteum, Leipzig 1903, repr. 1962. * P. FABIA, Onomasticon Taciteum, Paris 1900, repr. 1964. ** Bibl.: H. BENARIO, CW 58, 1964–1965, 39–83; CW 63, 1969–1970, 253–267; CW 71, 1977–1978, 1–32; CW 80, 1986, 73–147. * A. BRIESSMANN, Auswahlbericht zu Tacitus, Gymnasium 68, 1961, 64–80. * R. HANSLIK, AAHG 13, 1960, 65–102; 20, 1967, 1–31; 27, 1974, 129–166. * R. HANSLIK, 1939–1972, Lustrum 16, 1971/72, 143–304; Lustrum 17, 1973–1974, 71–216. * F. R. D. GOODYEAR, Tacitus, Greece and Rome, New Surveys in the Classics 4, Oxford 1970. * F. RÖMER, AAHG 37, 1984, 153–208; 38, 1985, 129–204. * To be consulted in the first place: ANRW 2, 33, 2–5, 1990–1991 (articles, bibliographies, critical overviews).

K. ABEL, Aus dem Geistesleben des frühen Prinzipats (Horaz, Seneca, Tacitus), Marburg 1991. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Die Gedankenwelt des Tacitus zwischen Tradition und Zukunft, AU 31, 5, 1988, 54–64. * E. AUBRION, Rhétorique et histoire chez Tacite, Metz 1985. * H. BENARIO, An Introduction to Tacitus, Athens (Georgia) 1975. * K. BERGEN, Charakterbilder bei Tacitus und Plutarch, diss. Köln 1962. * A. R. BIRLEY, Agricola, the Flavian Dynasty, and Tacitus, in: B. LEVICK, ed., The Ancient Historian and His Material. Essays in Honour of C. E. STEVENS, Westmead 1975, 139–154. * I. BORZSÁK, P. Cornelius Tacitus, RE suppl. 11, Stuttgart 1968, 373–512. * I. BORZSÁK, Zum Verständnis der Darstellungskunst des Tacitus. Die Veränderungen des Germanicus-Bildes, AAntHung 18, 1970, 279–292 (= I. BORZSÁK 1970 I). * I. BORZSÁK, Tacitus-Probleme. Einige Beobachtungen eines Annalenkommentators, ACD 6, 1970, 53–60 (= I. BORZSÁK 1970 II). * I. BORZSÁK, Alexander d. Gr. als Muster taciteischer Heldendarstellung, Gymnasium 89, 1982, 37–56. * A. BRIESSMANN, Tacitus und das flavische Geschichtsbild, Wiesbaden 1955. * C. O. BRINK, History in the Dialogus de oratoribus and Tacitus the Historian. A New Approach to an Old Source, Hermes 121, 1993, 335–349. * K. BÜCHNER, Tacitus und Ausklang, Studien zur römischen Literatur vol. 4, Wiesbaden 1964. * E. BURCK, Die Vorbereitung des Taciteischen Menschen- und Herrscherbildes in der Dichtung der frühen römischen Kaiserzeit, in: G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 37–60. * C. CHAMPION, Dialogus 5. 3–10. 8. A Reconsideration of the Character of Marcus Aper, Phoenix 48, 1994, 152–163. * K. CHRIST, Tacitus und der Principat, Historia 27, 1978, 449–487. * E. CIZEK, Sine ira et studio et l'image de l'homme chez Tacite, StudClas 18, 1979, 103–113. * E. CIZEK, Pour un Tacite nouveau, Latomus 40, 1981, 21–36. * C. J. CLASSEN, Tacitus—Historian between Republic and Principate, Mnemosyne 41, 1988, 93–116. * A. DIHLE, Tacitus' Agricola und das Problem der historischen Biographie, AU 31, 5, 1988, 42–52. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Tacitus. Chapters by T. A. DOREY, C. D. N. COSTA, A. R. BURN, K. WELLESLEY, N. P. MILLER, R. H. MARTIN, P. BURKE, London 1969. * M. DUCOS, La liberté chez Tacite: Droits de l'individu ou conduite individuelle?, BAGB 1977, 194–217. * D. R. DUDLEY, The World of Tacitus, London 1968. * W. EDELMAIER, Tacitus und die Gegner Roms, diss. Heidelberg 1964. * P. FABIA, P. WUILLEUMIER, Tacite. L'homme et l'œuvre, Paris 1949. * D. FLACH, Tacitus in der Tradition der antiken Geschichtsschreibung, Göttingen 1973. * G. B. A. FLETCHER, On the Annals and Agricola of Tacitus, SIFC 3<sup>a</sup> ser. 4, 1986, 68–76. * G. B. A. FLETCHER, On the Histories and Germania of Tacitus, SIFC 3<sup>a</sup> ser. 3, 1, 1985, 92–100. * G. B. A. FLETCHER, On the Histories of Tacitus again, LCM 11, 1986, 98–100. * E. FRAENKEL, Tacitus, NJW 8, 1932, 218–233 = Kleine Beiträge zur Klassischen Philologie, vol. 2, Roma 1964, 309–332. * M. FUHRMANN, Das Vierkaiserjahr bei Tacitus. Über den Aufbau der Historien Buch I–III, Philologus 104, 1960, 250–278. * J. GINSBURG, Tradition and Theme in the Annals of Tacitus, New York 1981. * F. R. D. GOODYEAR, Tacitus, Oxford 1970. * R. HÄUSSLER, Tacitus und das historische Bewußtsein, Heidelberg 1965. * R. HÄUSSLER, Tacitus in unserer Zeit, JUD 1970–1971, 379–400. * R. HÄUSSLER, Aktuelle Probleme der Dialogus-Rezeption. Echtheitserweise und Lückenumfang. Eine Zwischenbilanz, Philologus 130, 1986, 69–95. * H. HAFFTER, Pasquill, Pamphlet und Invektive bei Tacitus, in: G. RADKE, ed., 1971, 100–110. * M. HAMMOND, Res olim dissociabiles: Principatus ac libertas. Liberty under the Early Roman Empire, HSPH 67, 1963, 93–113. * W. HARTKE, Der retrospektive Stil des Tacitus als dialektisches Ausdrucksmittel, Klio 37, 1959, 179–195. * K. HEINZ, Das Bild Kaiser Neros bei Seneca, Tacitus, Sueton und Cassius Dio, diss. Bern 1946: Biel 1948. * W.-R. HEINZ, Die Furcht als politisches Phänomen bei Tacitus, Amsterdam 1975. * J. HELLEGOUARCH, Le vocabulaire latin des relations et des parties politiques sous la république, Paris 1963. * H. HEUBNER, Studien zur Darstellungskunst des Tacitus (Hist. 1, 12–2, 51), Würzburg 1935. * W. JENS, Libertas bei Tacitus, Hermes 84, 1956, 331–352, repr. in: R. KLEIN, ed., Prinzipat und Freiheit, Darmstadt 1969, 391–420. * P. KEGLER,

Ironie und Sarkasmus bei Tacitus, diss. Erlangen 1913. * W. KIERDORF, Die Proömien zu Tacitus' Hauptwerken. Spiegel einer Entwicklung?, Gymnasium 85, 1978, 20–36. * F. KLINGNER, Tacitus, Antike 8, 1932, 151–169, repr. in: KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 504–527. * A. KLINZ, Tacitus' Agricola, in: V. PÖSCHL, A. KLINZ, eds., Zeitkritik bei Tacitus, Heidelberg 1972, 33–76. * A. D. LEEMAN, Structure and Meaning in the Prologues of Tacitus, YCIS 23, 1973, 169–208, repr. in: LEEMAN, Form 317–348. * A. D. LEEMAN, Die Funktion der Dramatisierung bei Tacitus (1974), in: LEEMAN, Form 305–315. * E. LÖFSTEDT, On the Style of Tacitus, JRS 38, 1948, 1–8 = Tacitus, WdF 97, ed. by V. PÖSCHL, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1986, 89–103. * J. LUCAS, Les obsessions de Tacite, Leiden 1974. * T. J. LUCE, Tacitus' Conception of Historical Change. The Problem of Discovering the Historian's Opinions, in: I. S. MOXON, J. D. SMART, A. J. WOODMAN, eds., Past Perspectives. Studies in Greek and Roman Historical Writing, Papers Presented at a Conference in Leeds (1983), Cambridge 1986, 143–157. * R. MARTIN, Tacitus, London 1981, repr. 1994. * H. Y. McCULLOCH, Narrative Cause in the Annals of Tacitus, Königstein 1984. * R. MELLOR, Tacitus, New York 1993. * A. MICHEL, Tacite et le destin de l'Empire, Paris 1966. * A. MICHEL, Le style de Tacite et sa philosophie de l'histoire, Eos 79, 1981, 283–292. * F. P. MOOG, Germanische Erziehung bei Tacitus. Rom vor dem Hintergrund germanischer Geschichte, Bonn 1992. * M. G. MORGAN, Commissura in Tacitus, Histories 1, CQ n.s. 43, 1993, 274–291. * M. G. MORGAN, Tacitus, Histories 1. 58. 2, Hermes 121, 1993, 371–374. * M. G. MORGAN, The Smell of Victory: Vitellius at Bedriacum (Tac. Hist. 2. 70), CPh 87, 1992, 14–29. * M. G. MORGAN, Vespasian's Fears of Assassination (Tacitus, Histories 2. 74–75), Philologus 138, 1994, 118–128. * M. G. MORGAN, A Lugubrious Prospect. Tacitus, Histories 1. 40, CQ n.s. 44, 1994, 236–244. * K. NAWOTKA, Imperial Virtues of Galba in the Histories of Tacitus, Philologus 137, 1993, 258–264. * E. PARATORE, Tacito, Roma 2nd ed. 1962. * H. PETER, Die geschichtliche Litteratur über die römische Kaiserzeit bis Theodosius und ihre Quellen, 2 vols., Leipzig 1897. * J. PIŁOŃ, Helvidius Priscus, Eprius Marcellus, and iudicium senatus: Observations on Tacitus, Histories 4. 7–8, CQ n.s. 42, 1992, 235–246. * P. C. PLASS, Variatio in Tacitus: Form and Thought, in: C. DEROUX, ed., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, Bruxelles 1992, 421–434. * A. J. POMEROY, The Appropriate Comment. Death Notices in the Ancient Historians, Frankfurt 1991. * V. PÖSCHL, Der Historiker Tacitus, WG 22, 1962, 1–10, repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 111–126; cf. also: V.P., Literatur und geschichtliche Wirklichkeit, Kleine Schriften 2, ed. by W.-L. LIEBERMANN, Heidelberg 1983, 154–170. * V. PÖSCHL, Tacitus als Politologe, in: V. PÖSCHL, A. KLINZ, eds., Zeitkritik bei Tacitus, Heidelberg 1972, 5–32; repr. in: V.P., Literatur und geschichtliche Wirklichkeit . . ., 171–200. * V. PÖSCHL, ed., Tacitus, WdF 97, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1986. * C. QUESTA, Studi sulle fonti degli Annali di Tacito, Roma

2nd ed. 1967. * U. RADEMACHER, Die Bildkunst des Tacitus, Hildesheim 1975. * G. RADKE, ed., Politik und literarische Kunst im Werk des Tacitus, Stuttgart 1971. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Bemerkungen zu den kleinen Schriften des Tacitus, NGG 1914–1915, 173–276, repr. in: Aufsätze zu Tacitus, Darmstadt 1967, 17–120. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Tacitus und sein Werk, Neue Wege zur Antike 4, 1926, 3–32. * W. RICHTER, Römische Zeitgeschichte und innere Emigration, Gymnasium 68, 1961, 286–315. * W. RIES, Gerücht, Gerede, öffentliche Meinung. Interpretationen zur Psychologie und Darstellungskunst des Tacitus, diss. Heidelberg 1969. * R. SABLAYROLLES, Style et choix politique dans la Vie d'Agriicola de Tacite, BAGB 1981, 52–63. * E. SCHÄFER, Domitians Antizipation im vierten Historien buch des Tacitus, Hermes 105, 1977, 455–477. * R. SCOTT, Religion and Philosophy in the Histories of Tacitus, Rome 1968. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Tacitea, in: Filologia e forme letterarie, FS F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1988, vol. 4, 61–68. * P. SINCLAIR, Tacitus the Sententious Historian. A Sociology of Rhetoric in Annales 1–6, Univ. Park, Pennsylvania 1995. * W. STEIDLE, Tacitusprobleme, MH 22, 1965, 81–114. * P. STEINMETZ, Die Gedankenführung des Prooemiums zu den Historien des Tacitus, Gymnasium 75, 1968, 251–262. * R. SYME, Tacitus, 2 vols., Oxford 1958. * R. SYME, Tacitus und seine politische Einstellung, Gymnasium 69, 1962, 241–263. * R. SYME, Ten Studies in Tacitus, Oxford 1970. * D. TIMPE, Tacito e la realtà storica, in: Epigrafia e territorio. Politica e società. Temi di antichità romane II, Bari 1987, 215–236. * D. TIMPE, Tacitus' Germania als religionsgeschichtliche Quelle, in: H. BECK (and others), eds., Germanische Religionsgeschichte. Quellen und Quellenprobleme, Berlin 1992, 434–485. * D. TIMPE, Romano-Germanica. Gesammelte Studien zur Germania des Tacitus, Stuttgart 1995. * J. TRESCH, Die Nerobücher in den Annalen des Tacitus, Heidelberg 1965. * R. URBAN, Historische Untersuchungen zum Domitianbild des Tacitus, diss. München 1971. * M. VIELBERG, Pflichten, Werte, Ideale. Eine Untersuchung zu den Wertvorstellungen des Tacitus, Stuttgart 1987. * J. VOGT, Tacitus und die Unparteilichkeit des Historikers, Würzburger Studien zur Altertumswissenschaft 9, 1936, 1–20; repr. in: J.V., Orbis, Freiburg 1960, 110–127 and in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2nd ed. 1986, 49–69. * J. VOGT, Die Geschichtsschreibung des Tacitus, ihr Platz im römischen Geschichtsdenken und ihr Verständnis in der modernen Forschung (= Introduction to: Tacitus, Annalen, translated by A. HORNEFFER with notes by W. SCHUR, Stuttgart 1957), repr. in: J.V., Orbis, Freiburg 1960, 128–148. * B.-R. VOSS, Der pointierte Stil des Tacitus, Münster 1963. * B. WALKER, The Annals of Tacitus. A Study in the Writing of History, Manchester 1952. * G. WALSER, Rom, das Reich und die fremden Völker in der Geschichtsschreibung der frühen Kaiserzeit. Studien zur Glaubwürdigkeit des Tacitus, Baden-Baden 1951. * G. WILLE, Der Aufbau der Werke des Tacitus, Amsterdam 1983. * A. J. WOODMAN, Rhetoric in Classical Historiography, London 1988, 160–196.

B. SPEECHES AND LETTERS

PLINY THE YOUNGER

Life and Dates

C. Plinius Caecilius Secundus<sup>1</sup> was in his 18th year (epist. 6. 20. 5), when Mount Vesuvius erupted; he was born, therefore, in 61 or 62; his hometown was Comum; later, he would give it a library (epist. 1. 8) and an endowment for free-born children (epist. 7. 18). Upon the the death of his father he was educated by Pliny the Elder, his maternal uncle, who adopted him in his testament. Pliny studied at Rome with Quintilian and Nicetes Sacerdos (epist. 2. 14. 9; 6. 6. 3). He early entered the legal profession and came to Syria as a military tribune; there he was a hearer of the philosophers Euphrates and Artemidorus (epist. 1. 10. 1-2; 3. 11. 5). Since he held many offices, his life was anything but contemplative:<sup>2</sup> In A.D. 100 he was consul suffectus, in 111-112 (or 112-113) an imperial legatus in Bithynia. He was proud of being an augur as Cicero had been (4. 8. 4). The latest information we have about him refers to his administrative activity in Bithynia. As an official he also came in touch with Christians; the Emperor Trajan gave him rather humane directions how to treat them.<sup>3</sup> Tacitus was one of Pliny's friends and they seem to have many ideas in common.<sup>4</sup> He was very helpful to his friends;

---

<sup>1</sup> Inscriptions: CIL 5, 5262-5264; suppl. to 5, 745; 5667; 11, 5272; E. MARINONI, Una nuova dedica a Plinio il Giovane, CRDAC 9, 1977-1978, 75-89.

<sup>2</sup> Besides: praefectura aerarii militaris, praefectura aerarii Saturni, cura alvei Tiberis et riparum et cloacarum urbis.

<sup>3</sup> Plin. epist. 10. 96 and 97; R. FREUDENBERGER, Das Verhalten der römischen Behörden gegen die Christen im 2. Jh., dargestellt am Briefe des Plinius an Trajan und den Reskripten Trajans und Hadrians, München 1967; cf. as well: J. E. A. CRAKE, Early Christians and Roman Law, Phoenix 19, 1965, 61-70; P. WINTER, Tacitus and Pliny on Christianity, Klio 52, 1970, 498-502; R. F. CLAVELLE, Problems Contained in Pliny's Letter on the Christians, diss. Urbana 1971, cf. DA 32, 1972, 5758 A; P. V. COVA, Plinio il Giovane e il problema delle persecuzioni, BStudLat 5, 1975, 293-314 (on modern research); U. SCHILLINGER-HAEFELE, Plinius, epist. 96 und 97, Chiron 9, 1979, 383-392; A. WLOSOK, Zur Auseinandersetzung zwischen Christentum und römischem Staat, AU, ser. 13, suppl. 1, Stuttgart 1970.

<sup>4</sup> M. VIELBERG, Bemerkungen zu Plinius d.J. und Tacitus, WJA 14, 1988, 171-183.

this is especially true of Suetonius, an introverted scholar, and of an aging Martial. In other respects his contacts with the circles frequented by Martial and Statius seem to have been scarce.<sup>1</sup>

Of his works we possess the Panegyricus on Trajan (delivered on September 1, 100 and published in the following year in an expanded form) and the Letters; books 1–9 contain letters directed to diverse addressees, who partly belong to Trajan's entourage;<sup>2</sup> book 10, probably published posthumously, contains letters to the Emperor, sometimes with his answers. Minor poems and numerous speeches have been lost as well as a rhetorical biography of Vestricius Cottius.<sup>3</sup> These works are only known to us from Pliny's Letters.

It is difficult to date the Letters.<sup>4</sup> 2. 11 is a report on the condemnation of Marius Priscus (A.D. 100), whereas 3. 4 was written towards the end of 98. Book 4 was not published before 106, books 5–9 not before 109. The later books contain some older letters as well. The letters are not grouped chronologically. It cannot be proved that Pliny published his Letters in 'triads'.<sup>5</sup> Before publication, the letters (and the panegyricus) were revised.

Survey of Works

Epistulae

Instead of surveying the content of all the letters we may mention here some themes and illustrate them with a few examples: dedication (1. 1), congratulations (10. 1), recommendation (1. 24), thanks (4. 8), request for news (1. 11), Pliny's daily routine and his wish for leisure (3. 1), country life and literary studies (1. 9; cf. also 1. 6), recitals (1. 13), style (1. 20), lives and deaths of acquaintances (2. 1 and passim), politics (2. 11–12), Pliny's

<sup>1</sup> P. WHITE, The Friends of Martial, Statius, and Pliny and the Dispersal of Patronage, HSPH 79, 1975, 265–300; Pliny held Martial in high esteem: T. ADAMIK, Pliny and Martial. Epist. 3. 21, AUB 4, 1976, 63–72.

<sup>2</sup> G. G. TISSONI, Sul consilium principis in età Traianea, SDHI 31, 1965, 222–245, appendix.

<sup>3</sup> Pliny is not the author of the De viris illustribus sometimes ascribed to him; cf. W. K. SHERWIN, The Title and Manuscript Tradition of the De viris illustribus, RhM 102, 1969, 284–286 (with bibl.).

<sup>4</sup> Fundamental for the chronology of Pliny: A. N. SHERWIN-WHITE, Commentary 1966, Introduction; R. SYME, The Dating of Pliny's Latest Letters, CQ 35, 1985, 176–185.

<sup>5</sup> G. MERWALD 1964 supposes a publication in groups: books 1–3; 4–5; 6–7; 8–9. According to him, each book would fall into two halves (largely symmetrical); the arrangement of the letters would be partly linear, partly cyclic (triadic).

beneficence (1. 8; 1. 19; 2. 4; 2. 5), praise of others (1. 16; 1. 17), dreams (1. 18), specters (7. 27), travels (4. 1), natural phenomena (4. 30), justice to inferiors (2. 6), jokes (1. 6; 1. 15).

Panegyricus

Pliny restructured and amplified his Gratiarum actio. He praises Trajan's life, military talents and imperial virtues. Trajan is the optimus princeps chosen by divine providence. Against the dark background of the era of Domitian he recalls Trajan's career and exploits up to his entry into Rome (23). Next follow the measures he took as a ruler (24–80), and a glance at his private life (81–89). Finally Pliny expresses his gratitude for his consulship (90–95) and offers prayers to Jupiter.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Letters are particularly connected with real life. Their metamorphosis into a literary genre is a 'late' phenomenon. In this regard Pliny's Letters are a counterpart to Horace's Epistles. A specific attraction of the epistolary genre is the multiple possibilities it offers for a crossing of genres: the gamut from the sublime forms of historiography and oratory down to the treatment of agricultural problems<sup>1</sup> and facetious chatter.

Pliny's memorial addresses may be compared with the genre of laudatio funebris<sup>2</sup> and with the pattern of exitus illustrium virorum.<sup>3</sup> Influence of the historiographical genre has been observed, for instance, in Pliny's famous letter about his uncle's death (epist. 6. 16); there Pliny pretends to furnish Tacitus the historian with material, while actually composing a report of his own, bordering on historiography.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In the passages dealing with economy, parallels with Columella have been observed: R. MARTIN 1981.

<sup>2</sup> An ironical laudatio funebris: epist. 6. 2.

<sup>3</sup> F. A. MARX, Tacitus und die Literatur der exitus illustrium virorum, Philologus 92, 1937, 83–103; A. RONCONI, Exitus illustrium virorum, SIFC 17, 1940, 3–32.

<sup>4</sup> M. BARATTA, La fatale escursione Vesuviana di Plinio, Athenaeum n.s. 9, 1931, 71–108; S. HERRLICH, Die antike Überlieferung über den Vesuvausbruch im Jahre 79, Klio 4, 1904, 209–226; F. LILLGE, Die literarische Form der Briefe Plinius' d.J. über den Ausbruch des Vesuvus, Sokrates 6, 1918, 209–234; 273–297; F. A. SULLIVAN, Pliny epist. 6. 16 and 20 and Modern Vulcanology, CPh 63, 1968, 196–200; L. BESSONE, Sulla morte di Plinio il Vecchio, RSC 17, 1969, 166–179; D. PASQUALETTI, N. (= K.) SALLMANN, R. SCHILLING, De Vesuvii ignium eruptione, de Pompeiorum interitu, de morte Plini, Romae 1980; K. SALLMANN, Quo verius tradere posteris possis (Plin. epist. 6. 16), WJA n.s. 5, 1979, 209–218; H. W. TRAUB 1955; cf. also the

The Panegyricus conforms to the principles of epideictic oratory. Its subject matter is part of the tradition of 'manuals for princes', a tradition represented in Roman literature by Cicero (e.g. De Marcello and Pro Ligario) and Seneca (De clementia). Furthermore there are parallels with Dio's Λόγος βασιλικός<sup>1</sup> (around A.D. 100) and Galba's speech in Tacitus (hist. 1. 15–16).

Among the orators, Cicero as a model takes a place of honor.<sup>2</sup> The impact of epideictic oratory on Pliny's entire oeuvre can hardly be overrated.<sup>3</sup> Among his Stoic authorities we should name Paetus Thrasea (6. 29. 1–3) and Musonius Rufus.<sup>4</sup> The Letters are adorned with quotations from poets; Pliny preferably cites Homer, at times in the Greek original,<sup>5</sup> and Virgiliana are no less frequent.

Literary Technique

The Letters are addressed to real persons and often use a real event as a starting-point.<sup>6</sup> This speaks in favor of the letters being authentic messages. On the other hand, two facts suggest a literary design: Pliny's subtle and elaborate style as well as his focussing each letter on a single theme. However, with an educated author, these two features cannot be excluded even in real letters. The most probable guess is that Pliny made choices from his real correspondence and section on literary technique; Pompeii and the Vesuvian Landscape. Papers of a Symposium by the Archaeological Institute of America Washington Society and the Smithsonian Institution, Washington 1979; R. MARTIN, La mort étrange de Pline l'Ancien ou l'art de la déformation historique chez Pline le Jeune, VL 73, 1979, 13–21; M. D. GRMEK, Les circonstances de la mort de Pline. Commentaire médical d'une lettre destinée aux historiens, Helmantica 37, 1986, 25–43; R. COPONY, Fortes fortuna iuvat. Fiktion und Realität im 1. Vesuvbrief des jüngeren Plinius (6. 16), GB 14, 1987, 215–228.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. TRISOGLIO, Le idee politiche di Plinio il Giovane e di Dione Crisostomo, PPol 5, 1972, 3–43.

<sup>2</sup> H. PFLIPS 1973; A. WEISCHE 1989.

<sup>3</sup> The treatment of the theme of 'adoption' in the Panegyricus exhibits some parallels to related ideas (though non-political) in the declamations (G. CALBOLI 1985, 366); Tacitean parallels, however, suggest themselves more naturally.

<sup>4</sup> H.-P. BÜTLER 1970, 56–57.

<sup>5</sup> E.g. epist. 1. 20. 22; 5. 19. 2.

<sup>6</sup> K. ZELZER, Zur Frage des Charakters der Briefsammlung des jüngeren Plinius, WS 77, 1964, 144–161 (stresses the non-fictional character of the Letters and literary emulation among friends); as for the identity of the persons: R. SYME 1968 and 1985; A. A. BELL, Jr., A Note on Revision and Authenticity in Pliny's Letters, AJPh 110, 1989, 460–466.

published them in a revised form. Yet it is possible that he wrote some pieces only for the publication.

The collection is meant to give the impression of being casual. In reality, however, its arrangement is artistic.<sup>1</sup> Colorful variation is a principle; still, a letter may find a sequel in the next one.<sup>2</sup> We cannot help suspecting that Pliny, like Horace in his Epistles, had some literary program in mind.

Cicero used to publish his speeches after delivery. Pliny went further in two respects: as a rule, he remodeled his speeches more completely than Cicero would have done; moreover, he introduced a new custom: after having been delivered, speeches were recited once more in an amplified version. Hence, the epideictic element is more manifest than in Cicero.

The mention of Domitian in the Panegyricus (90. 5 carnifex; cf. epist. 4. 11. 6–13) and of the ‘informer’ Aquilius Regulus in the Letters (e.g. 1. 5) is a consequence of Pliny’s intention to throw into relief his moral teachings by exposing the opposite. Contrast is a device cherished by Pliny. Yet we should not reduce his method to a mere ‘rhetoric of affirmation’.<sup>3</sup>

Pliny enlivens his brilliant narrative technique by boldly changing perspectives.<sup>4</sup> He makes a subtle use of imagery taken from nature to characterize human reactions.<sup>5</sup> Pliny draws convincing and impressive literary portraits of the persons he meets—apart from some stereotyped caricatures.<sup>6</sup>

Language and Style

‘First of all, he loved abundance, abundance to the point of satiety . . . Second, he loved a diction gracefully dressed up . . . Third, he

<sup>1</sup> G. MERWALD 1964.

<sup>2</sup> E. LEFÈVRE, Plinius-Studien II. Diana und Minerva. Die beiden Jagdbillette an Tacitus (1. 6; 9. 10), Gymnasium 85, 1978, 37–47; cf. also VON ALBRECHT, Prose 160–166.

<sup>3</sup> E. AUBRION, Pline le Jeune et la rhétorique de l’affirmation, Latomus 34, 1975, 90–130.

<sup>4</sup> J. A. MARITZ, The Eruption of Vesuvius. Technicolor and Cinemascope?, Acroterion 19, 3, 1974, 12–15 (on epist. 6. 16).

<sup>5</sup> W. E. FOREHAND, Natural Phenomena as Images in Pliny, epist. 6. 20, CB 47, 1971, 33–39; qualifying (but not cogent) D. S. BARRETT, Pliny, epist. 6. 20 again, CB 48, 1972, 38–40.

<sup>6</sup> A. MANIET, Pline le Jeune et Calpurnia. Etude sémantique et psychologique, AC 35, 1966, 149–185.

took pleasure in sharply pointed maxims.<sup>1</sup> This contradictory diagnosis is explained by differences of genre: language and style of Pliny's letters captivate the reader by their clarity, often accompanied with brevity. As an orator, however, he subscribes to the principle of fulness.

The pointed style of the Letters is sometimes reminiscent of Martial, Pliny's contemporary. Some of his letters might be called 'epigrams in prose'.<sup>2</sup> One of his specialties are final sentences wittily echoing the beginning.<sup>3</sup>

As a stylist Pliny tried to satisfy the partisans of both Attic and Asiatic style.<sup>4</sup> Severa, concise sentences, would be congenial with the former; whereas the latter would appreciate dulcia—clausulae, poetic and grandiloquent expressions.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Pliny's stylistic usage is based on firm convictions in matters of literary criticism. He takes for granted that brevity is an essential of epistolary style. Whenever he departs from this principle he gives good reasons for doing so.

As far as speeches are concerned, Pliny adopts the opposite principle: he makes an explicit plea for lengthiness (epist. 1. 20). The fact that the addressee of this plea is Tacitus need not imply a pin-prick: Pliny is well aware of generic differences, as can be seen from the distinction he draws between oratorical and historical<sup>5</sup> narrative (epist. 5. 8).

Significant are his ideas on authorship: The Letters convey a moral ideal of the orator. Pliny is not given over to pure contemplation, not a mere aesthete or scholasticus. He does not condemn creative moments of leisure, but meditation must be subservient to righteous action.<sup>6</sup> For him the right use of the word is a problem of ethical

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 319–320.

<sup>2</sup> A.-M. GUILLEMIN 1929, 150; M. SCHUSTER 1951, 449–450 (bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> L. WINNICZUK, The Ending-Phrases in Pliny's Letters, Eos 63, 1975, 319–328.

<sup>4</sup> M. DURRY, edition, vol. 4, Paris 1948, 89–90.

<sup>5</sup> J. HEURGON, Pline le Jeune tenté par l'histoire, REL 47<sup>bis</sup>, 1970, 345–354; V. USSANI, Oratio-historia, RCCM 13, 1971, 70–135.

<sup>6</sup> F. TRISOGLIO, L'elemento meditativo nell'epistolario di Plinio il Giovane, in: Saggi in onore di V. D'AGOSTINO, Torino 1971, 413–444.

attitude. Perfecting one's studia and scripta is certainly a path to immortality, but in Pliny's view intellectual progress is inseparable from a moral conduct of life. His ethical interpretation of oratory is evinced from a list<sup>1</sup> of motives why a lawyer should take charge of a case. Significantly he reverses Cato's definition of the orator (as vir bonus dicendi peritus, 'a good man skilled in the art of speaking') by labeling an informant a vir malus dicendi imperitus, 'a bad man unskilled in the art of speaking' (epist. 4. 7. 5). Pliny's Letters give concrete examples illustrating Quintilian's 'Catonian' ideal of the orator as a vir bonus.<sup>2</sup> Being both a man of letters and a man of action, Pliny discovered for himself as an author—and for Roman literature—an harmonious and firm sense of self-identity. In this regard his Letters are far more than an idealized self-portrait.<sup>3</sup>

Ideas II

In his Panegyricus Pliny developed an ideal of the emperor, which would become authoritative throughout late antiquity and even far beyond. The opposition of princeps bonus and princeps malus would dominate the Historia Augusta. Another idea he affirmed programmatically would rarely be put into practice: the princeps voluntarily submits to the law (paneg. 65. 1) and treats the consuls as his 'colleagues' (ibid. 78. 4). The corresponding virtue on the part of the subjects is concordia, inseparably linked to the salus principis.

Stoic values are found, for instance, in the letters on the eruption of Vesuvius: a disposition intrepid and even, a mind (ratio) ready to die.<sup>4</sup> In his report on his uncle's death the dangers imminent from nature create the situation of a moral trial. Yet Pliny is not a philosopher, and nature for him is not only an ethical challenge: there are aesthetic and serious economical components as well.

His attitude to nature and architecture<sup>5</sup> manifests a typically Roman feature: Pliny's villas dominate the landscape around them, just as,

<sup>1</sup> Pliny (epist. 6. 29. 1–3) quotes Thræsea for the first three motives; then he adds those claras and illustres.

<sup>2</sup> G. PICONE 1978, 143–148.

<sup>3</sup> For a different view: J.-A. SHELTON, Pliny's Letter 3. 11. Rhetoric and Autobiography, C&M 38, 1987, 121–139; E. LEFÈVRE 1969; more sympathetic E. BURY, Humanitas als Lebensaufgabe . . . Lektüre der Pliniusbriefe, AU 32, 1, 1989, 42–64.

<sup>4</sup> K. SALLMANN 1979, 214; cf. P. V. COVA, Lo stoico imperfetto. Un'immagine minore dell'uomo nella letteratura latina del principato, Napoli 1978.

<sup>5</sup> E. LEFÈVRE 1977.

much earlier, the ancient Roman dominus had controlled his entire household from his place in the tablinum. Scholars found in Pliny the 'sentimental' approach to nature typical of a denizen of the city, but they also discovered a genuine 'feeling for the countryside'.<sup>1</sup> His ostensible lack of interest in agriculture is belied by the facts. Pliny is a gentleman farmer, not a mere owner of latifundia. He does not own a huge undivided area tilled by slaves but several independent smaller farms worked by free tenants. As an assiduus dominus ('a landowner frequently present on his estate') he personally takes charge of his properties—perhaps more so even than Cato the Elder. In this respect he is a precursor of the landed proprietors of the 4th century. This is only one of the aspects linking an author of Silver Latin to the late Principate; other points of contact had repeatedly attracted our attention (in the domain of literary genres like panegyrics, occasional poems, epigrams, letters, etc.).

On the other hand our author is separated from late antiquity by his worldliness. His claim to immortality is not based on philosophy or religion but—in a way reminiscent of Epicurus—on the memories of his friends—and his readers.<sup>2</sup>

Pliny's letters convey a picture of the world and the society where he lives; neither history nor biography, they are lively reports of precious moments, of course, in a highly stylized form. His constant references to ethical standards should not be libeled as pharisaism. If Pliny, to our taste, makes too much fuss about his beneficent activities and endowments this is owing to his intention to promote, in a period of crisis, an ideal of a citizen who places his talent and his fortune at the service of his friends and of his country: of a 'man of letters', who is orator, politician and a vir bonus, all in one.<sup>3</sup>

Transmission<sup>4</sup>

The manuscripts fall into two corpora: 1. the private letters published by Pliny in 9 books, 2. a collection of 10 books including, as well, his correspondence with Trajan.

<sup>1</sup> R. MARTIN, Recherches sur les agronomes latins et leurs conceptions économiques et sociales, Paris 1971, 344–345 (with bibl.).

<sup>2</sup> C. GNILKA, Trauer und Trost in Plinius' Briefen, SO 49, 1973, 105–125.

<sup>3</sup> G. CALBOLI 1985, 372.

<sup>4</sup> R. A. B. MYNORS, edition 1963, praefatio (bibl.); G. CARLSSON, Zur Textkritik der Pliniusbriefe, Lund 1922.

The main representatives of the first group are the Mediceo-Laurentianus plut. 47. 36 (M; 9th century) containing all 9 books and—for books 1–4—a close relative, the Vaticanus Lat. 3864 (V; 9th century). MV offer a reliable text. Additional evidence for books 1–7 and 9 is the so-called ‘family of eight books’ attested in late manuscripts (γ; 15th century). The abbreviation θ denotes the late witnesses for book 8.

The oldest representative of the second group, which contained all 10 books, is the Codex Sancti Victoris Parisiensis, now in New York, Morgan Library M 462 (Π; beginning 6th century), of which only a small part (2. 20. 13–3. 5. 4) has been preserved. Despite its venerable age this manuscript is not particularly trustworthy. The following manuscripts derive from a copy of Π: Florentinus Laurentianus Ashburnham. 98, olim Beluacensis (B; 9th century, only 1–5. 6. 22 with lacunas),<sup>1</sup> Florentinus Mediceo-Laurentianus, olim S. Marci 284 (F; end of 11th century, containing exactly 100 letters: up to the end of 5. 6; with interpolations). Some manuscripts of French origin (12th–13th century) related to F have no independent value.

The correspondence with Trajan had been attested in a lost Parisinus (probably identical with Π); today we are left with substitutes like the early editions and the copy found in the Bodleiana (L. 4. 3.), which had been owned by Budaeus (G. Budé). This scholar deserved well of Pliny’s text after the architect Joannes Jucundus had discovered the Parisinus (which at that moment had been complete).

The Panegyricus is transmitted in the corpus of the Panegyrici.

Influence

The Panegyricus became the perfect model of its genre; the Letters found many followers in late antiquity; even as far as the structure of the collection is concerned.<sup>2</sup> Apollinaris (epist. 8. 10. 3) would mention Pliny’s speech for Attia Viriola (epist. 6. 33. 1). Pliny was not much read during the Middle Ages.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Originally B was part of the Riccardianus 488, which today only contains the Elder Pliny’s Natural history.

<sup>2</sup> On Pliny’s influence: E. ALLAIN, Pline le Jeune et ses héritiers, 4 vols., Paris 1901–1902; A. CAMERON, The Fate of Pliny’s Letters in the Late Empire, CQ 15, 1965, 289–298; 17, 1967, 421–422 (on Jerome, among others); F. TRISOGLIO, Sant’Ambrogio conobbe Plinio il Giovane?, RSC 20, 1972, 363–410 (‘congeniality’); M. ZELZER, Ambrosius von Mailand und das Erbe der klassischen Tradition, WS 100, 1987, 201–226; F. TRISOGLIO, San Girolamo e Plinio il Giovane, RSC 21, 1973, 343–383; K. SMOLAK, Drei nicht erkannte Klassikerzitate bei Erasmus von Rotterdam, De conscribendis epistolis, WS n.s. 13, 1979, 214–220 (paneg. 19. 1).

<sup>3</sup> The Letters were quoted by Bishop Ratherius of Verona, the Panegyricus by John of Salisbury.

Pliny influenced the letters of the humanists (beginning with Petrarch's) and, through this channel, epistolography in modern languages. Our author's serene humanity attracted Montaigne, the philosopher of human life. Pliny's descriptions of villas and gardens inspired the creativity of Renaissance artists.<sup>1</sup> Thomas Jefferson's (d. 1826) Monticello, a jewel of ingenious architecture and savoir vivre, is a villa in the vein of Pliny and Cicero. Christoph Martin Wieland (d. 1813) translated and explained some of Pliny's letters. In the 19th century Annette von Droste-Hülshoff (d. 1848) and Gustav Freytag (d. 1895)<sup>2</sup> were familiar with Pliny.

Editions: epist. 1-7. 9: L. CARBO, Venetiis: Valdarfer 1471. * paneg.: F. PUTEOLANUS, Mediolani 1482. * epist., paneg. (with vir. ill.): Venetiis 1485. * epist. 10. 41-121: Hieronymus AVANTIUS, Venetiis 1502. * Complete text: Aldus MANUTIUS, Venetiis 1508. * H. KEIL (T), T. MOMMSEN (Index nominum with explanations), Lipsiae 1870. * M. SCHUSTER, recogn. R. HANSLIK, Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1958, repr. 1992. * B. RADICE (TTr), 2 vols., Cambridge, Mass. 1969. * F. TRISOGLIO (TC, Glossaries, Indices), 2 vols., Torino 1973. * epist.: R. A. B. MYNORS, Oxonii 1963. * A. N. SHERWIN-WHITE (hist. C.), Oxford 1966. * H. KASTEN (TTr), München 1968, 2nd ed. 1974 (corr.). * A. LAMBERT (TrN), Zürich 1969. * W. KRENKEL (Tr), Berlin 1984. * H. PHILIPS (TTr), 10 vols., Stuttgart 1987-1996. * Book 6: J. D. DUFF (T), Cambridge 1906. * Book 10: E. G. HARDY (TC), London 1889. * M. GIEBEL (TTr), Stuttgart 1985. * A partial commentary is also found in: H. PFLIPS 1973. * paneg.: M. DURRY (TC), Paris 1938. * W. KÜHN (TTrN), Darmstadt 1985. ** Ind.: X. JACQUES, J. VAN OOTEGHEM, Bruxelles 1965. * T. MOMMSEN, Index nominum cum rerum enarratione, in: H. KEIL's edition (s. above); in addition: R. SYME 1968; 1985; C. J. REAGAN, Laterculum prosopographicum Plinianum, RIL 104, 1970, 414-436. ** Bibl.: J. BEAUJEU, Lustrum 6, 1961, 272-303. * M. DURRY, Travaux récents sur Pline le Jeune, JE 37, 1964-1965, 5-8. * R. HANSLIK, AAHG 17-18, 1964-1965, 1-16. * P. V. COVA, Sette anni di studi su Plinio il Giovane (1966-1973), BStudLat 4, 1974, 274-291. * F. RÖMER, Plinius der Jüngere, AAHG 28, 1975, 153-200; 40, 1987, 153-198. * E. AUBRION, La Correspondance de Pline le Jeune. Problèmes et orientations actuelles de la recherche, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 304-374. * P. Fedeli, Il Panegirico di Plinio nella critica moderna, ibid. 387-514.

R. T. BRUÈRE, Tacitus and Pliny's Panegyricus, CPh 49, 1954, 161-179.

<sup>1</sup> L. BEK, Ut ars natura—ut natura ars. Le ville di Plinio e il concetto del giardino nel Rinascimento, ARID 7, 1974, 109-156.

<sup>2</sup> M. SCHUSTER 1951, 455; E. ARENS, Annette von Droste-Hülshoff und das klassische Altertum, Hum. Gymnasium 28, 1917, 104-115.

- * H.-P. BÜTLER, Die geistige Welt des jüngeren Plinius, Heidelberg 1970. * G. CALBOLI, Pline le Jeune entre pratique judiciaire et éloquence épideictique, BAGB 44, 1985, 357–374. * A. D. E. CAMERON, The Fate of Pliny's Letters in the Late Empire, CQ n.s. 15, 1965, 289–298. * P. V. COVA, La critica letteraria di Plinio il Giovane, Brescia 1966. * A. DELLA CASA, Il dubius sermo di Plinio, Genova 1969. * F. GAMBERINI, Stylistic Theory and Practice in the Younger Pliny, Hildesheim 1983. * H. L. GOKEL, Die Briefe des Jüngeren Plinius. Versuch einer Scheidung und Abgrenzung nach Gattungen, diss. Freiburg 1921 (probl.) * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Pline et la vie littéraire de son temps, Paris 1929. * R. HÄUSSLER, Abermals Plinius' Eberjagden, Philologus 131, 1987, 82–85. * H. U. INSTINSKY, Formalien im Briefwechsel des Plinius mit Kaiser Trajan, AAWM 1969, 12, 387–406. * F. JONES, Naming in Pliny's Letters, SO 66, 1991, 147–170. * D. P. KEHOE, Allocation of Risk and Investment on the Estates of Pliny the Younger, Chiron 18, 1988, 15–42. * D. P. KEHOE, Approaches to Economic Problems in the Letters of Pliny the Younger: The Question of Risk in Agriculture, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 555–590. * D. KIENAST, Nerva und das Kaisertum Trajans, Historia 17, 1968, 51–71. * E. LEFÈVRE, Plinius-Studien I: Römische Baugesinnung . . ., Gymnasium 84, 1977, 519–541. II: Diana und Minerva, ibid. 85, 1978, 37–47; III: Die Villa . . ., ibid. 94, 1987, 247–262; IV: Die Naturauffassung . . ., ibid. 95, 1988, 236–269; V: Vom Römertum zum Ästehtizismus . . ., ibid. 96, 1989, 113–128. * S. MACCORMACK, Latin Prose Panegyrics, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Empire and Aftermath. Silver Latin II, London 1975, 143–205. * R. MARTIN, Pline le Jeune et les problèmes économiques de son temps, REA 69, 1967, 62–97; also in: H. SCHNEIDER, ed., Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, Darmstadt 1981, 196–233. * G. MERWALD, Die Buchkomposition des Jüngeren Plinius (epist. 1–9), diss. Erlangen 1964. * J. MESK, Die Überarbeitung des Plinianischen Panegyricus auf Traian, WS 32, 1910, 239–260. * F. MILLAR, Emperors at Work, JRS 57, 1967, 9–19. * T. MOMMSEN, Zur Lebensgeschichte des Jüngeren Plinius, Hermes 3, 1869, 31–139 = Gesammelte Schriften, Hist. Schr. I, Berlin 1906, 366–468. * M. P. O. MORFORD, Iubes esse liberos: Pliny's Panegyricus and Liberty, AJPh 113, 1992, 575–593. * H. PFLIPS, Ciceronachahmung und Ciceroferne des jüngeren Plinius. Ein Kommentar zu . . . epist. 2. 11; 2. 12; 3. 9; 5. 20; 6. 13; 7. 6, diss. Münster 1973. * J. PLISZCZYŃSKA, De elocutione Pliniana, Lublin 1955. * H. PETER, Der Brief in der römischen Literatur, Leipzig 1901. * G. PICONE, L'eloquenza di Plinio. Teoria e prassi, Palermo 1977. * B. RADICE, A Fresh Approach to Pliny's Letters, G&R 9, 1962, 160–168. * B. RADICE, Pliny and the Panegyricus, G&R 15, 1968, 166–172. * A. M. RIGGSBY, Pliny on Cicero and Oratory. Self-Fashioning in the Public Eye, AJPh 116, 1995, 123–135. * N. RUDD, Stratagems of Vanity. Cicero, Ad familiares 5. 12 and Pliny's Letters, in: T. WOODMAN, J. POWELL, eds., Author and Audience in Latin Literature, Cambridge 1992, 18–32.

* M. SCHUSTER, Plinius, RE 21, 1, 1951, 439–456. * A. N. SHERWIN-WHITE, Trajan's Replies to Pliny, JRS 52, 1962, 114–125. * A. N. SHERWIN-WHITE, Pliny, the Man and his Letters, G&R 15, 1969, 76–90. * P. SOVERINI, Impero e imperatori nell'opera di Plinio il Giovane, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 515–554. * S. E. STOUT, Scribe and Critic at Work in Pliny's Letters, Bloomington 1954. * SYME, Tacitus 75–85. * R. SYME, People in Pliny, JRS 58, 1968, 135–151. * R. SYME, Correspondents of Pliny, Historia 34, 1985, 324–359. * J. W. TELLEGEN, The Roman Law of Succession in the Letters of Pliny the Younger, I, Zutphen 1982. * H. W. TRAUB, Pliny's Treatment of History in Epistolary Form, TAPhA 86, 1955, 213–232. * F. TRISOGLIO, La personalità di Plinio il Giovane nei suoi rapporti con la politica, la società e la letteratura, Memorie dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Torino, Classe di Scienze Morali, Storiche e Filologiche, ser. 4, 25, Torino 1972. * L. VIDMAN, Etude sur la correspondance de Pline le Jeune avec Trajan, Praha 1960, repr. Roma 1972. * A. WEISCHE, Plinius d.J. und Cicero. Untersuchungen zur römischen Epistolographie . . . , ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 375–386.

C. PHILOSOPHY (AND DRAMA)

SENECA

Life and Dates

Lucius Annaeus Seneca—labeled the ‘philosopher’, in contrast to his father, the so-called ‘rhetor’—was born probably towards the end of 1 B.C.<sup>1</sup> He was the second of three sons of Seneca the Elder and his wife Helvia; the youngest son was to become the father of the poet Lucan. The Annaei were an old and wealthy family of Roman knights in Spanish Corduba. As happens frequently in colonies, the language of the founders had preserved its purity there, and the citizens faithfully cherished the traditions of the Republic and the memory of Pompey. Seneca came to Rome when a young boy. He would have unpleasant remembrances of his schooldays with the grammaticus (epist. 58. 5). He became, however, a convert of Sotion, the Neo-Pythagorean philosopher, whom an aging Ovid might have heard as well. So, for a year, he abstained from meat (epist. 108. 17–22). His father, who shared the traditional Romans’ mistrust of philosophy, convinced him of the serious danger of being persecuted as an adherent of foreign cults. As a result, Seneca limited himself to the Stoic discipline, which in a less spectacular form satisfied the ascetic demands of a satiated generation (epist. 110. 19). Attalus, who probably came from Pergamum, a stronghold of Stoicism, taught him the difference between education and mere accumulation of knowledge. Consequently, Seneca gained a surprisingly independent attitude towards tradition, which would be taken badly by some custodians of the old school (Gell. 12. 2). Papirius Fabianus, who hid significant thoughts in unobtrusive words and, against the fashion of the day, convinced his listeners by the content rather than by the form of his speeches, acquainted Seneca with the doctrine of the Sextii: here he learnt to examine his conscience every day; on the other hand, the same teacher encouraged him to engage in natural science (an unusual field of interest for a Roman). The interest in science he manifested so early would become a basic feature of his unusual life.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. PRÉCHAC, La date de naissance de Sénèque, REL 12, 1934, 360–375; K. ABEL, Zu Senecas Geburtsdatum, Hermes 109, 1981, 123–126.

When twenty years old he decided to enter upon a senator's career and, while studying rhetoric with enthusiasm, eagerly read Augustan poetry and tried his hand at writing epigrams. Yet frequent diseases of the respiratory organs almost drove him to suicide (cf. epist. 78. 1). Once more, his regard for his father saved him from taking an inconsiderate step. Upon medical advice he went to Egypt for a change of climate. His mother's sister, the wife of the governor of Egypt, took care of her convalescing nephew, whom, many years before, she had brought from Spain to Rome (dial. 11 [Helv.] 19. 2). The fruit of this stay was a treatise on the country and religion of the Egyptians.<sup>1</sup>

His return to Italy in 31 was the beginning of eleven years of political activity, which pushed philosophy into the background. None the less during this period he wrote the Consolatio ad Marciam, three books of De ira, and scientific works on stones, fish, and earthquakes. He became a quaestor, again on the recommendation of his aunt. Meanwhile he had become a celebrated orator, to the point of rousing the Emperor Caligula's envy by a brilliant plea. He was, however, spared execution, thanks to the intervention of one of Caligula's protégées, who had been quick-witted enough to convince the tyrant that the ailing scholar would soon die anyway (Cass. Dio 59. 19. 7). No wonder then that for some time Seneca lost all interest in pleading (epist. 49. 2). This bitter experience, however, must appear in retrospect as a hint of providence: doomed to silence in the very zenith of his fame, Seneca would henceforth, with even more determination, place his rhetorical skills into the service of philosophy, psychology, and education, thus accomplishing an historical mission within Roman literature.

In 41 Seneca was accused of adultery with Julia Livilla, a sister of Caligula (Cass. Dio 60. 8) and exiled to Corsica, to stay there until 49. The true reason for his banishment was his leading role in the senatorial opposition. His 'Augustan' ideal of principatus was a thorn in the side of Claudius' followers who had a preference for absolutism. Messalina had been the instigator of Seneca's expatriation. During his exile, the philosopher, in his Consolatio ad Helviam, constructed a Stoic appraisal of two heroes of the senatorial opposition, though, actually, Marcellus tended towards Peripatetic philosophy and Brutus towards academic skepticism. The Consolatio ad Polybium, who was one of Claudius' creatures, conjures up the ideal of a mild emperor (resembling 'Apollo-like' Augustus, not 'Herculian' Antony).

---

<sup>1</sup> Serv. Aen. 6. 154; Sen. nat. 4. 2. 7.

This petition produced its effect, for Agrippina, Messalina's successor, needed Seneca for further plans. As a tutor to the young Nero and, after the latter's accession to the throne in 54, as his adviser, the philosopher blessed the empire with a few happy years. In his first speech to the senate, Nero promised to give more importance to the senate, which amounted to a return to the 'dyarchy' advocated by Augustus. Seneca wrote the official funeral speech on Claudius and, at same time, the satirical Apocolocyntosis of Claudius, in which Augustus acted as a prosecutor, and Hercules, the symbol of the opposite party, the Antonii, was ridiculed.<sup>1</sup> In his De clementia, which he dedicated to Nero, Seneca developed an 'Augustan' ideology of the principate. The idea of the optimus princeps from Cicero's De re publica combines with the principle of clementia (cf. Cicero's Speech for Marcellus) into an ideology of monarchy foreshadowing the 'philosopher emperors' of the 2nd century.

In practice Seneca and Burrus, the praefectus praetorio, jointly made the necessary changes in administration, while allowing Nero to live at liberty. Effective activities of the Romans compelled the Parthians to abandon Armenia, and a war was avoided. In Germany and Britain as well, Seneca tried to preserve the balance of power. As for domestic politics, the senate's authority increased, the inhabitants of the provinces were governed ever more justly, and the attachment of the people to the emperor gained a new emotional dimension.

After Nero had murdered his mother (59), Seneca's glory began to wane. The emperor fell under the influence of evil counselors. After Burrus' death, Seneca had no alternative but to retire from political life (A.D. 62; Tac. ann. 14. 52–56). Among the numerous works he wrote after this date, there are the Epistulae morales to Lucilius and the Naturales quaestiones; the introduction to the latter work is a praise of pure knowledge. Finally, the emperor accused the philosopher of having participated in the Pisonian conspiracy and ordered him to commit suicide. Seneca followed Socrates in courageously meeting death with philosophical discourse (Tac. ann. 15. 60–63).<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A different view in S. WOLF 1986.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. I. OPELT, Senecas Tod, in: E. OLSHAUSEN, ed., Der Mensch in Grenzsituationen, Stuttgart 1984, 29–48.

Seneca's life was shaped by painful experiences: his talent brought him into great danger but it also rescued him; paradoxically enough, it was by his bitter disappointments under Caligula, Claudius, and Nero that he was almost irresistibly pushed to find his true vocation: the discovery of the world of the human mind. On the other hand, his interest in natural science is quite unusual for a Roman. He developed it early and never gave it up.

If we try to relate his works and his fields of interest to different periods of his life, three general observations suggest themselves: first, Seneca as a young man preferably studied problems of natural science and returned to them in his old age.

Second, as a middle-aged man, he was an active politician and an orator; he wrote the Consolatio ad Marciam; the enforced end of his career as a lawyer under Caligula allowed him to experiment with a first philosophical work (the De ira) as an advice to the new Emperor Claudius; during the second section of the middle period—his exile, he wrote further consolationes, perhaps De forma mundi and tragedies.

This period of contemplation was followed by the most productive phase of his creativity. It falls into two parts: Seneca's activity as Nero's mentor<sup>1</sup> and Seneca's retirement; during the latter he composed an entire corpus of philosophical writings comparable to those of Cicero.

The dating of individual works<sup>2</sup> will be discussed within the following survey.

Survey of Works

Consolatio ad Marciam<sup>3</sup> (= dial. 6)

Marcia has been mourning her son Metilius for three years; earlier, her father, Cremutius Cordus the historian, had committed suicide (prooemium:

<sup>1</sup> brev., const., tranq., clem., vita beata, benef.

<sup>2</sup> P. GRIMAL 1978, 262–323; vgl. K. ABEL 1967, 155–170; M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 395–411.

<sup>3</sup> This is the earliest work preserved; it was written under Caligula (37–41), who allowed a new publication of the writings of Marcia's father, Cremutius Cordus (1. 3); they had been burnt under Tiberius; for a discussion of the date: M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 397 (bibl.); I. BELLEMORE, The Dating of Seneca's Ad Marciam de consolatione, CQ 42, 1992, 219–234; on the Ad Marciam: C. C. GROLLIOS, Seneca's Ad Marciam. Tradition and Originality, Athens 1956; K. ABEL 1967, 15–47; C. E. MANNING, On Seneca's Ad Marciam, Leiden 1981; J. FILLION-LAHILLE, La production littéraire de Sénèque sous les règnes de Caligula et de Claude, sens philosophique et portée politique: Les Consolationes et le De ira, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1606–1638.

1-3). Examples show that unending grief is unnatural (3-8). All misfortune has to be anticipated in thought (9). All that we call our own is only loaned (10). To know oneself is to recognize one's mortal condition (11). Do you regret the deceased or yourself? Be grateful for the happiness he gave you (examples: 12-16). Nature makes no distinctions (17). To be born means to be mortal (18). Grief can be healed by right meditation (19). Death is nature's best invention. It is a path to freedom. As life is short anyhow, it does not matter how long you live. Who knows if a longer life would have been good for the deceased (20-22)? Given his maturity, he has lived long enough (23-24). In the other world, the wise and free men receive him, among them his father, who is assigned the final word (25-26).

De ira<sup>1</sup>

Book 1 (= dial. 3): Seneca describes the physiognomic symptoms of anger (1-2) and defines its nature and its types (3-4). Anger is not in harmony with the nature of man (5-6), it is of no use and is not compatible with any virtue, not even with that of the warrior—as the Peripatetics fancied (7-12); nor is a judge allowed to be angry (13-16).

Book 2 (= dial. 4): The rise of anger is not only based on a spontaneous impulse (which is beyond our control) but also on our conscious assent (which is in our power); hence, it is a voluntarium vitium (1-4). Anger is to be distinguished from crudelitas and furor (5). The sage shall not be angry at all, not even at evil-doing, for the latter is a general phenomenon (6-10). Anger is not useful; whoever frightens others, must be afraid of others. Emotion can be controlled by training. The superiority of civilized nations over others is owing to clemency, not anger; orators move their audiences not by being angry but by impersonating anger (11-17). Anger can be controlled by preventive measures and cured by therapies such as knowledge of temperaments and their right mixture (18-22), cautious skepticism (23-24), careful analysis of motives (25-28), consideration of extenuating circumstances (29-36).

<sup>1</sup> The terminus ante quem results from the dedication to Seneca's brother Novatus who, from 52 at the latest, would have another name (Gallio) by adoption. Caligula's death is the terminus post quem: the portrait of the 'tyrant' exhibits features of this emperor. The description of the 'good judge' (a precursor of the De clementia) may reflect Seneca's hopes during the first months of Claudius' reign (41); in favor of 'by 52': M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 396 and 398. An older theory saying that book 3 was written much later than the others has been disproved by recent research of language and style; bibl.: M. COCCIA, I problemi del De ira di Seneca alla luce dell'analisi stilistica, Roma 1958; R. HUBER, Senecas Schrift De ira. Untersuchungen zum Aufbau und zu den Quellen, diss. München 1973; G. CUPAIUOLO, Introduzione al De ira di Seneca, Napoli 1975; P. GRIMAL, Rhétorique, politique et philosophie dans le De ira de Sénèque, REL 53, 1975, 57-61; Á. BÄUMER 1982, esp. 72-129; J. FILLION-LAHLLE 1989, quoted in the footnote to the Consolatio ad Marciam.

Book 3 (= dial. 5): Anger has great power (1–4). It should be our aim, first, not to become angry; second, to separate ourselves from anger; third, to soothe others (5. 2). Anger springs from weakness. Avoid the company of persons provoking your anger (5–8); know your weak points and take your time; bear in mind positive and negative examples (9–23). Be lenient (24–28); excuse your adversary; it is nobler to master your anger (29–37). Overcome suspicion, envy, and all too great expectations (38). Make an effort to soothe the angry; the brevity of life urges us to be peaceable (39–43).

Consolatio ad Helviam<sup>1</sup> (= dial. 11; alias 12)

Do not mourn for me. I am fine: change of place, poverty, and infamy are only thought to be evils (4–13). Nor should you mourn for your own sake (14–17): by losing me you have not lost a tutor or intercessor, for you are free from ambition. You are able to control your longing for me, for you have always been courageous. Apply yourself to philosophy; take care of your other children, your grandchildren, and, above all, your sister. The work ends in the praise of this woman.

Consolatio ad Polybium<sup>2</sup> (= dial. 12; alias 11)

(The beginning is lost). Everything is perishable; the very fact, however, that there are no exceptions is a comfort; grief is of no avail. Fortune has endowed you, Polybius, with all kinds of happiness; she could only hurt you by your brother's death (20–22); the latter himself would want you to be moderate in your grief: nobody is pleased with your tears. Comfort your brothers by your own example (23–24), mourning is a plebeian failing. You are in the view of all; your Caesar belongs to the world and you to him.

<sup>1</sup> The numbers of dialogi 11 and 12 vary in the editions; the number given in the Thesaurus is quoted here in the first place. Seneca did not write his consolation until his mother and he himself had overcome the initial distress caused by his exile (1). Meanwhile, he had arranged himself somehow in Corsica. The allusion to the usual ten-months time of mourning (16. 1) is evidence for summer 42 (roughly); bibl.: K. ABEL 1967, 47–69; P. MEINEL, Seneca über seine Verbannung (Trostschrift an die Mutter Helvia), Bonn 1972; J. FILLION-LAHILLE 1989, quoted in the footnote to the Consolatio ad Marciam.

<sup>2</sup> This work was written in exile as well (between the end of 41 and the beginning of 49). Claudius was pater patriae already (16. 4 = 35. 3); hence, January 42 is terminus post quem. The emperor's triumph over Britain (early 44) had not yet happened, but 'Caesar's exploits' were already known, and Claudius had come back to Rome; all this shows that the work dates from the end of 43. An earlier date is not commendable, since Polybius had been holding his office for a long time (6. 2 = 25. 2), and, moreover, Seneca pretends to have forgotten his Latin during his exile (extr.); bibl.: K. ABEL 1967, 70–96; J. E. ATKINSON, Seneca's Consolatio ad Polybium, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 860–884; J. FILLION-LAHILLE 1989, quoted in the footnote to the Consolatio ad Marciam.

Distract yourself by literary activity! Ask yourself, if there is no egotism in your grief (25–27). The deceased is well; who knows if death had not been a blessing for him. Remember past happiness (28–29); be aware of the transitoriness of everything, and focus your attention on the emperor and your studies (30–37).

De brevitae vitae<sup>1</sup> (= dial. 10)

The much-lamented brevity of life is our own fault; we indulge in our passions (1–2) and waste our time (3–4). We are not persistent enough to claim our time for ourselves, as is confirmed by sayings of Augustus and others (5–6). It is no use grumbling, for our unhappiness is caused by our ignorance of the real value of time (6–9). Busybodies always depend on the following day (9–10), they invest their time unprofitably (10–11). We employ our leisure in distractions and pastimes detrimental to our peace of mind (14–15); only the wise, not the busy know real tranquillity and true life (16–17). After your successful career, Paulinus, you should retire from public life and devote yourself to things more sublime.

De tranquillitate animi<sup>2</sup> (= dial. 9)

The addressee, Serenus (Nero's praefectus vigillum), initially describes his state of mind (1). Seneca is able to diagnose the complaint as 'satiety' and recommends tranquillitas, the εὐθυμία of Democritus (2). The remedies he recommends are activity and philosophical leisure in regular alternation (3). Before undertaking an obligation scrutinize yourself, the task, and your fellow-men (4–6). Friendship contributes to your peace of mind, whereas too great riches disturb it (7–9). Limit your desires (10). The sage despises death and is prepared for everything (11). Avoid over-activeness and meet adversities with a serene mind (12–14). Don't be a misanthropic recluse and smile at the common errors of mankind; do not forget to take the breaks necessary for contemplation (15).

<sup>1</sup> This work was written between the middle of 48 and of 55: M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 396; 398; 401–407 (for 55, with bibl.); Caligula was dead (18. 5); hence, 41 is terminus post quem. Since Seneca assumes that Sulla had been the last to enlarge the pomerium (13. 8 = 14. 2), this dialogue was written before Claudius enlarged the pomerium, i.e. before May 24, 49 (P. GRIMAL, La date du De brevitae vitae, REL 25, 1947, 164–177); a third date (62) is no longer considered. The De brevitae is probably older than the De tranquillitate (cf. tranq. 1. 11); bibl.: M. T. GRIFFIN, De brevitae vitae, JRS 52, 1962, 104–113; B. HAMBÜCHEN, Die Datierung von Senecas Schrift Ad Paulinum de brevitae vitae, diss. Köln 1966; J.-M. ANDRÉ, Sénèque, De brevitae vitae, De constantia sapientis, De tranquillitate, De otio, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1724–1778.

<sup>2</sup> This work was certainly written after Caligula's death (cf. 11. 10; 14. 4–6). Seneca's positive assessment of a political activity of the sage (5. 3) is indicative of the period after his exile, some time between 51 and 54, in any case before 63; for a date after the De constantia sapientis: M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 396 and 316–317; bibl.: J.-M. ANDRÉ 1989, quoted in the footnote to the De brevitae vitae.

Apocolocyntosis<sup>1</sup>

This witty (if sometimes over-estimated) lampoon upon the dead Emperor Claudius is a mixture of prose and verse in the manner of Menippean Satire. After his death, Claudius goes to Olympus. There he is first questioned by Hercules; however, at the request of Divine Augustus, who denounced Claudius' crimes, the heavenly senate refuses to accept him. Past his own funeral, Mercury escorts him to the netherworld. The judge of the dead puts him on trial for his murders and condemns him to play at dice with a dice-box full of holes. All of a sudden, however, Caligula claims him as his slave; at the end of our text, Claudius becomes the servant of a freedman at the court of inquiry.

De constantia sapientis<sup>2</sup> (= dial. 2)

The wise man can be offended neither by iniuria nor by contumelia (1–2). He is invulnerable and cannot lose anything. Injustice, fear, or hope do not <sup>1</sup> It was written immediately after the death of Claudius (54); bibl.: O. WEINREICH 1923, s. Editions; R. HENZE, Zu Senecas Apocolocyntosis, Hermes 61, 1926, 49–78; U. KNOCHÉ, Das Bild des Kaisers Augustus in Senecas Apocolocyntosis, WZRoStock 15, 1966, 463–470; K. KRAFT, Der politische Hintergrund von Senecas Apocolocyntosis, Historia 15, 1966, 96–122; G. BINDER, Hercules und Claudius. Eine Szene in Senecas Apocolocyntosis auf dem Hintergrund der Aeneis, RhM 117, 1974, 288–317; id., Catilina und Kaiser Claudius als ewige Büßer in der Unterwelt. Eine typologische Verbindung zwischen Vergils Aeneis und Senecas Apocolocyntosis, ACD 10–11, 1974–1975, 75–93; D. KORZENIEWSKI, Senecas Kunst der dramatischen Komposition in seiner Apocolocyntosis, Mnemosyne 35, 1982, 103–114; O. ZWIERLEIN, Die Rede des Augustus in der Apocolocyntosis, RhM n.s. 125, 1982, 162–175; H. HORSTKOTTE, Die politische Zielsetzung von Senecas Apocolocyntosis, Athenaeum 73, 1985, 337–358; K. BRINGMANN, Senecas Apocolocyntosis und die politische Satire in Rom, A&A 17, 1971, 56–69; id. 1985 (s. bibl.); R. C. TOVAR, Teoría de la sátira. Análisis de Apocolocyntosis de Séneca, Cáceres 1986; S. WOLF, Die Augustusrede in Senecas Apocolocyntosis, Meisenheim 1986; L. F. VAN RYNEFELD, On the Authorship of the Apocolocyntosis, LCM 13, 1988, 83–85 (in favor of authenticity).

---

<sup>2</sup> This treatise, which is under the spell of Stoic paradoxes, is mostly assigned an earlier date than the De tranquillitate; the reason would be a possible development of Seneca, the addressee, from Epicureanism (De constantia sapientis) to Stoicism (De tranquillitate animi). However, the relevant passages (esp. const. 15. 4) are no evidence for Seneca's philosophical views; the latter rather seems to be at the start of his career in the De tranquillitate and to be more experienced in the De constantia. The De constantia was clearly written after the deaths of Caligula (41) and of Valerius Asiaticus (47). According to P. GRIMAL 1978, 292, this work would date from 55; bibl.: P. GRIMAL, La composition dans les dialogues de Sénèque, I: Le De constantia sapientis, REA 51, 1949, 246–261; K. ABEL 1967, 124–147; J.-M. ANDRÉ 1989, quoted in the footnote to the De brevitate vitae.

affect him, and it is useful for him to suffer injustice (3–9). He does not resent abuse or calumny, but laughs at them as he would laugh at the babble of children or fools. All those who do not lead a philosophical life, are crazy. The treatise ends with advice on how to endure offence (10–19).

De clementia<sup>1</sup>

Book 1: After a praise of Nero's clemency (1–2) Seneca displays a plan of his work which goes beyond the text available to us: the 1st book is meant to be an introduction; the 2nd, to unfold the essence of clemency; the 3rd (which is lacking), to show how to educate oneself to clemency (3–4). It befits a ruler to be mild; his cruelty is liable to do more harm than a private person's cruelty. Clemency is a hallmark of greatness (5). Should severity reign in Rome, nobody could dwell in safety (6). A ruler should treat his citizens as he would like to be treated by the gods. Being a public person, he has to come up to more stringent requirements than others (7–8). Augustus practised clemency in his old age, whereas Nero might do so already when a young man (9–11). Cruelty is an attribute of tyrants; and yet it does not guarantee their safety (12–13). A ruler is a father (14–16) and a healer of his subjects (17). We are indulgent even towards slaves, all the more should we behave so towards free men (18). The citizens' love is the best protection for a ruler; he is subject to the state, not the state to him (19). Cruel and frequent punishment is detrimental rather than helpful (20–26).

Book 2: May young Nero's clemency set a precedent (1–2)! The essence of clemency (3) is the very antipode to cruelty (4); moreover, it is different from mercy (misericordia), which, according to the Stoics, is a vice (5–7).

De vita beata<sup>2</sup> (= dial. 7)

False goods allure the crowd; true goods are those of the mind (1–2). The pith and marrow of blissful life are sana mens; everything else flows from it

<sup>1</sup> Written between December 15, 55 and December 14, 56 (M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 407–411); Nero is 18 years old. It looks as if Seneca amplified and revised this work at a later moment. It has come down to us incomplete; bibl.: M. FUHRMANN, Die Alleinherrschaft und das Problem der Gerechtigkeit, Gymnasium 70, 1963, 481–514; T. ADAM, Clementia Principis. Der Einfluß hellenistischer Fürstenspiegel auf den Versuch einer rechtlichen Fundierung des Principats durch Seneca, Stuttgart 1970; K. BÜCHNER, Aufbau und Sinn von Senecas Schrift über die Clementia, Hermes 98, 1970, 203–223; A. BORGO, Questioni ideologiche e lessico politico nel De clementia di Seneca, Vichiana 14, 1985, 179–297; B. MORTUREUX, Les idéaux stoïciens et premières responsabilités politiques: Le De clementia, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1639–1685.

<sup>2</sup> The terminus post quem is determined by the name of the addressee, Gallio, a name attested for Seneca's brother no earlier than 52. Therefore the De vita beata

(3–4). Do not give in to pleasure or pain; true happiness is found in virtue (16), not in pleasure (5–15), of which vulgar Epicureans are dreaming. Some people take offence at Seneca's prosperity (an objection applicable to many other philosophers), whereas he does not presume to be a sage. It is true that philosophers cannot entirely live up to their own teachings but they do so at least in part. Wealth is in safe keeping with the virtuous. The sage is in control of his property, fools are controlled by it. It needs wisdom to make the right gifts to the right people. Socrates is allowed to speak the epilogue (17–27).

De otio<sup>1</sup> (= dial. 8)

This treatise follows the De vita beata; the ending of the latter and the beginning of the former are lost. Only in otium can we turn our attention to the best of men; here, Seneca deliberately picks up an Epicurean theme (28). There are different stages in human life; seclusion befits old age (29). According to Epicurus, the sage should not meddle with politics except when circumstances demand it; according to Zeno, he ought to, except when circumstances forbid it. Seneca declares: if the state cannot be helped any more, the sage should try to give help to a few; and if even this is impossible, to himself (30). The macrocosm is a 'big state' uniting gods and men. This is a state we can serve even within our otium. Nature created us for active and contemplative life (31). Nature wants to be known by us and wants us to know her laws. In his otium the sage intends to benefit generations to come (32).

De providentia<sup>2</sup> (= dial. 1)

Providence exists: god loves the good and chastises them (1). They overcome all evils and earn glory, as did Cato, for instance (2). The so-called was written later than the De ira. In the De vita beata, Seneca is evidently a rich and respected person. This excludes a date before 50 and after 62. The atmosphere of anxiety and disquiet at the end of the dialogue would perhaps be understandable in 58; bibl.: W. STROH, De dispositione libelli, quem De vita beata Seneca scripsit, in: W. SUERBAUM and others, eds., FS F. EGERMANN, München 1985, 141–145; F.-R. CHAUMARTIN, Les désillusions de Sénèque devant l'évolution de la politique néronienne et l'aspiration à la retraite: Le De vita beata et le De beneficiis, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1686–1723; s. now G. KUEN 1994.

---

<sup>1</sup> This treatise is difficult to date. There is a general preference for 62 (or soon after); the theme is in harmony with the period immediately before Seneca's retirement; bibl.: J.-M. ANDRÉ 1989, quoted in the footnote to the De brevitate vitae.

<sup>2</sup> This treatise is dedicated to Lucilius. According to some scholars it dates from Seneca's exile; according to others, from his later years. Terminus post quem is the death of Tiberius (4. 4); terminus ante quem, the Naturales quaestiones (dedicated to Lucilius as well), in which the De providentia is used; bibl.: K. ABEL 1967, 97–124; I. DIONIGI, Il De providentia di Seneca fra lingua e filosofia, ANRW 2, 36, 7, 1994, 5399–5414.

evils are like medicines: they lead to real goods (3). Therefore, good men willingly bear evils and place themselves at the disposal of god and fate (4). Good and bad luck are predetermined from all eternity (5). What happens to the good is not an evil. God exhorts us to be courageous (6).

Naturales quaestiones<sup>1</sup>

The subject matter is arranged according to elements: books 1 and 2 (fire), 3 and 4a (water), 4b and 5 (air), 6 (earth).<sup>2</sup>

Book 1: The important introduction shows that natural philosophy is the peak of human knowledge, superior even to ethics. The 1st book is dedicated to fiery optical phenomena, especially the rainbow.

Book 2: Seneca distinguishes caelestia (astronomy) from sublimia (meteorology) and terrena (geography). This book is on thunderstorms.

Book 3 is devoted to water, including the Great Flood.

Book 4 discusses the flood season of the Nile, and then turns to hail and snow.

Book 5, which has no introduction, proceeds to the winds.

Book 6 is on earthquakes;

Book 7, on comets.

Epistulae morales<sup>3</sup>

The 124 moral letters—perhaps Seneca's most important work—fall into 20 books; moreover, we have quotations from a 22nd book (Gell. 12. 2. 3). The first three books (1–29) are especially coherent. The concluding function

<sup>1</sup> Book 6 is dated by the earthquake at Pompei of February 5, 62; bibl.: K. W. RINGSHAUSEN, Poseidonios, Asklepiodot, Seneca und ihre Anschauungen über Erdbeben und Vulkane, diss. München 1929; G. STAHL, Aufbau, Darstellungsform und philosophischer Gehalt der Naturales quaestiones Senecas, Diss. Kiel 1960; G. STAHL, Die Naturales quaestiones Senecas, Hermes 92, 1964, 425–454; F. P. WAIBLINGER, Senecas Naturales quaestiones. Griechische Wissenschaft und römische Form, München 1977; R. CODOÑER, La physique de Sénèque: Ordonnance et structure des Naturales quaestiones, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1779–1822; on book 6: A. DE VIVO, Le parole della scienza. Sul trattato De terrae motu di Seneca, Salerno 1992.

<sup>2</sup> F. P. WAIBLINGER, s. the preceding footnote; the comets (book 7), however, do not fit into the scheme, unless we suppose an annular composition, which even would make sense within the Stoic system (return to the point of departure: fire).

<sup>3</sup> The letters and the Naturales quaestiones accompanied Seneca throughout his last years; the fictive date of the letters is winter 62 (rather 63) to autumn 64; publication 64–65 (M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 400); bibl.: W. H. ALEXANDER, Notes and Emendations to the Epistulae morales of L. ANNAEUS Seneca, Edmonton 1932; K. ABEL 1967 (with bibl.); G. MAURACH 1970; VON ALBRECHT, Prose 112–124; B. L. HIJMANS, Jr., Inlaboratus et facilis. Aspects of Structure in Some Letters of Seneca, Leiden 1976; K. ABEL, Das Problem der Faktizität der Senecanischen Korrespondenz, Hermes 109, 1981, 472–499; E. LEFÈVRE, Der Mensch und das Schicksal in stoischer Sicht of letter 29 is clearly marked (29. 10). Seneca adorns the letters of this group with sayings of wise men (often of Epicurus). Later he rejects his addressee's wish for further quotations on grounds of the Stoics' aversion for authorities (33. 1). The richness in themes and colors of the moral letters is unequalled. Especially in the later epistles, the author ventures even upon difficult areas like logic and dialectics. The first series of letters impresses the reader by touching upon many fundamental issues: saving of time (1), sedentary life and steadfastness of purpose (2), friendship and accurate use of terms (3), death and true wealth (4), unobtrusive conduct (5), philosophy as metamorphosis, nay transfiguration (6), seclusion (7), true freedom (8), virtue's self-reward (9). There are contrasts of theme between nos. 7 on the one hand and 5 and 10 on the other.

De beneficiis<sup>1</sup>

Book 1: Ingratitude is a wide-spread phenomenon. Benefits ought to be estimated by the giver's intention, not by their material value. Which benefits should we bestow on others?

Book 2: How should benefits be bestowed? Readily, quickly, without hesitation; some of them, publicly, others privately, all without ostentation. Things detrimental or infamous should not be granted. A benefit must be appropriate to the person of the giver and that of the recipient. How should benefits be received? Gratefully, without pride, greediness, or envy.

Book 3: Never should we blame ungrateful people. They punish themselves by their attitude. Masters have to be grateful even to their slaves. Fathers may receive benefits even from their sons.

Book 4: It is for their own sake that benefits and gratitude are worth striving for, not for considerations of utility. Gratitude only refers to the moral quality of gifts, not to their usefulness. In many cases even if we foresee ingratitude, we should nevertheless do benefits.

Book 5: Now Seneca turns to problems of detail: is it a shame to be surpassed in beneficence? Is it possible to render a benefit to oneself? Does Stoic philosophy allow us to call anyone ungrateful? Are all ungrateful? Do

---

(Sen. epist. 51 und 107), AU 26, 3, 1983, 61–73; M. WILSON, Seneca's Epistles to Lucilius. A Revaluation, Ramus 16, 1987, 102–121; G. MAZZOLI, Le Epistulae morales ad Lucilium di Seneca. Valore letterario e filosofico, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1823–1877.

<sup>1</sup> This treatise dedicated to Liberalis is especially close to the hair-splitting of scholastic philosophy; it was written after the deaths of Claudius (1. 15. 6) and Rebilus (A.D. 56: 2. 21. 6): M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 399. In any case it is later than the De vita beata; bibl.: F.-R. CHAUMARTIN, Le De beneficiis de Sénèque. Sa signification philosophique, politique et sociale, Paris 1985; F.-R. CHAUMARTIN 1989, quoted in the footnote to the De vita beata.

benefits oblige even relatives? Is it possible to bestow a benefit on someone against his will? Can a benefit be claimed back?

Book 6: Can benefits be snatched from a person? Are we obliged to those who did good to us against their will or unwittingly or for selfish reasons? Are we allowed to wish someone evil in order to get an occasion to show him our gratitude? We may thank kings and happy people by giving them advice and instruction.

Book 7: Intellectual curiosity must be restrained: all that matters is virtue and wisdom. Is it possible to make a gift to a sage, who is in possession of everything anyway? Is it sufficient to have tried to reciprocate a benefit? Should we return a benefit, if the giver's character has changed from good to worse? Should a benefactor forget what he has done? How to endure ingratitude.

Tragedies<sup>1</sup>

Hercules (furens)<sup>2</sup>

Hercules comes back from the netherworld together with Theseus. He punishes Lycus the tyrant who had tortured Hercules' wife and his father. Juno, however, sends a Fury to drive the hero mad, and he kills wife and children. On awakening he considers suicide; his father persuades him to endure life all the same.

Troades<sup>3</sup>

A herald announces that the dead Achilles demands the immolation of Priam's daughter Polyxena. Despite Agamemnon's reluctance, Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, insists on this human sacrifice. Moreover, seer Calchas claims that, in order to get favorable wind, Hector's son, Astyanax, must be killed. Shrewd Ulysses elicits from Andromache the hiding place of the child. A messenger reports how courageously both victims died. Finally the fleet can be prepared for departure.

---

<sup>1</sup> None of Seneca's works can be dated between the winter of 43/44 and 49. Did Seneca then write his tragedies? The fact that he did not need a big library for doing so speaks in favor of this popular theory. However, many other possible dates have been suggested; a survey in: SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 2, 458 and F. NIETO MESA, Cronología de las tragedias de Séneca, Nova Tellus 3, 1985, 91-109; new observations concerning a relative chronology of the dramas in: J. G. FITSCH, Sense-Pauses and Relative Dating in Seneca, Sophocles, and Shakespeare, AJPh 102, 1981, 289-307.

<sup>2</sup> K. HELDMANN 1974, 1-56; J.-A. SHELTON, Problems of time in Seneca's Hercules furens and Thyestes, CSCA 8, 1975, 257-269; J.-A. SHELTON, Seneca's Hercules furens. Theme, Structure, and Style. Göttingen 1978; C.-E. AUVRAY 1989 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> W. SCHEPPEL, Zum Aufbau von Senecas Troerinnen, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1972, 230-271.

Phoenissae<sup>1</sup>

The play consists of two pairs of scenes: Oedipus wants to retire to Mount Cithaeron to die there. Antigone opposes his suicide.—Having arrived on the mountain, she asks her father to stop the discord between his sons, but he refuses to leave.

The armies of the inimical brothers have deployed. A servant and Antigone ask Jocasta to settle the quarrel. She complies with her daughter's wish and steps between the sides.

Medea<sup>2</sup>

Medea overhears the wedding song for Jason and Creusa. King Creon of Corinth expels Medea from his country; on her request, he grants her, however, a delay of one day. She tries in vain to move Jason, but she becomes aware that he is most vulnerable in his love for his children. She brews a magic concoction and has her children bring a poisoned garment as a gift to her rival, whose cruel death is reported by a messenger. Then she murders her children, one of them in presence of the father.

Phaedra<sup>3</sup>

Phaedra declares her love to chaste Hippolytus, her stepson, is rejected by him and then accuses him falsely to his father, Theseus. The latter by imploring divine power causes his son's death. When he becomes aware of his error, it is too late. Phaedra confesses her guilt and commits suicide.

<sup>1</sup> See editions; furthermore: A. PAUL, Untersuchungen zur Eigenart von Senecas Phoenissen, diss. Erlangen, Bonn 1953; I. OPELT, Zu Senecas Phoenissen (1969), in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 272–285; W.-L. LIEBERMANN 1974, esp. 115–116; 236, n. 18.

<sup>2</sup> A. HEMPELMANN, Senecas Medea als eigenständiges Kunstwerk, diss. Kiel 1960; D. HENRY, B. WALKER, Loss of Identity: Medea superest? A Study of Seneca's Medea, CPh 62, 1967, 169–181; W. KULLMANN, Medeas Entwicklung bei Seneca, in: W. WIMMEL, ed., Forschungen zur römischen Literatur. FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 158–167; W.-L. LIEBERMANN 1974, 155–206; C. BLITZEN, The Senecan and Euripidean Medea. A Comparison, CB 52, 1976, 86–90; J.-A. SHELTON, Seneca's Medea as Mannerist Literature, Poetica 11, 1979, 38–82; Ä. BAÜMER 1982, esp. 130–165; A. ARCELLASCHI, Médée dans le théâtre latin. D'Ennius à Sénèque, Rome 1990.

<sup>3</sup> L. SPITZER, The Récit de Thérémène, in: id., Linguistics and Literary History. Essays in Stylistics, Princeton 1948, 87–134; C. ZINTZEN, Analytisches Hypomnema zu Senecas Phaedra, Meisenheim 1960 (also on the relationship to the lost Ἰππόλυτος καλυπτόμενος of Euripides); P. GRIMAL, L'originalité de Sénèque dans la tragédie de Phèdre, REL 41, 1963, 297–304, repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 321–342; K. HELDMANN, Senecas Phaedra und ihre griechischen Vorbilder, Hermes 96, 1968, 88–117; E. LEFÈVRE, Quid ratio possit? Senecas Phaedra als stoisches Drama, WS 82, n.s. 3, 1969, 131–160, repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 343–375; J. DINGEL, Ἰππόλυτος ξιφουλκός. Zu Senecas Phaedra und dem ersten Hippolytos des Euripides, Hermes 98, 1970, 44–56; A. D. LEEMAN, Seneca's Phaedra as a Stoic Tragedy (1976), in: LEEMAN, Form 269–280; G. PETRONE, La scrittura tragica dell'irrazionale. Note di lettura al teatro di Seneca, Palermo 1984, on the Phaedra: 65–114; A. J. BOYLE, In Nature's Bonds. A Study of Seneca's Phaedra, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1284–1347.

Oedipus<sup>1</sup>

A pestilence rages in Thebes. Creon informs King Oedipus that the oracle of Delphi demands the expulsion of the murderer of King Laius from the city. Oedipus has Tiresias the prophet uncover the culprit. Creon reports that, meanwhile, by necromancy, Laius had appeared and named Oedipus as his murderer. Initially Oedipus suspects a plot and has Creon arrested. But by talking with Jocasta, an old man from Corinth, and the aged Phorbos Oedipus finds out the truth. He blinds himself; Jocasta kills herself with a sword.

Agamemnon<sup>2</sup>

The spirit of Thyestes indicates the coming disaster. Aegisthus persuades Clytaemestra to join him in murdering Agamemnon. A warrior announces the latter's arrival. Cassandra, who appears together with the chorus of Trojan women, prophetically views herself together with Agamemnon in the bark of death (753). In another vision she describes the king's murder while it is happening in the palace. Electra saves her young brother Orestes by entrusting him to a man from Phocis. Clytaemestra condemns Cassandra to death.

Thyestes<sup>3</sup>

Tantalus' ghost appears. The Fury goads him to do more harm to the family of the Pelopidae. Atreus develops his plan: he will murder the children of his brother Thyestes and then have him eat their flesh. The plan is put into action.

<sup>1</sup> J. DINGEL, Der Sohn des Polybos und die Sphinx. Zu den Oidipustragödien des Euripides und des Seneca, MH 27, 1970, 90–96; E. LEFÈVRE, Die politische Bedeutung der römischen Tragödie und Senecas Oedipus, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1242–1262; K. SCHÖPSDAU, Zur dramatischen Struktur von Senecas Oedipus, Hermes 113, 1985, 84–100; G. PADUANO, Sofocle, Seneca e la colpa di Edipo, RFIC 116, 1988, 298–317.

<sup>2</sup> D. HENRY, B. WALKER, Seneca and the Agamemnon: Some Thoughts on Tragic Doom, CPh 58, 1963, 1–10, repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 74–91; J. M. CROISILLE, Le personnage de Clytemneste dans l'Agamemnon de Sénèque, Latomus 23, 1964, 464–472; E. LEFÈVRE, Schicksal und Selbstverschuldung in Senecas Agamemnon, Hermes 94, 1966, 482–496, repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 457–476; W. H. FRIEDRICH, Schuld, Reue und Sühne der Klytämnestra, A&A 12, 1966, 3–28, repr. in: W.H.F., Vorbild und Neugestaltung. Sechs Kapitel zur Geschichte der Tragödie, Göttingen 1967, 57–87; E. LEFÈVRE, Die Schuld des Agamemnon. Das Schicksal des Troja-Siegers in stoischer Sicht, Hermes 101, 1973, 64–91.

<sup>3</sup> A. LESKY, Die griechischen Pelopidendramen und Senecas Thyestes, WS 43, 1922–1923, 172–198; U. KNOCHÉ, Senecas Atreus. Ein Beispiel, Antike 17, 1941, 60–76, repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 477–489; I. LANA, L'Atreo di Accio e la leggenda di Atreo e Tieste nel teatro tragico romano, AAT 93, 1958–1959, 293–383; A. LA PENNA, Atreo e Tieste sulle scene romane (il tiranno e l'atteggiamento verso il tiranno), in: Studi in onore di Q. CATAUDELLA, Catania 1972, 1, 357–371, repr. in: A. LA PENNA, Fra teatro, poesia e politica romana, Torino 1979, 127–141; E. LEFÈVRE, Der Thyestes

Hercules Oetaeus<sup>1</sup>

Hercules sends Lichas to Trachis to report his victory over Eurytus. Hercules' wife, Deianira, tells her nurse that she is jealous of Iole, a prisoner. She soaks a garment with the poisonous blood of Nessus (which she deems a love spell) and has Lichas bring it to her husband. Hyllus, her son, gives an account of Hercules' terrible ordeal and of his killing Lichas in his fury. Deianira resolves to die. The ailing hero appears; his mother Alcmena tries to comfort him. Hyllus brings the message of Deianira's death; he explains that she is not guilty of Hercules' sufferings; his father asks him to marry Iole. A messenger reports Hercules' death on a pyre. An apparition of the now divine hero comforts his mother in her grief.

Lost works

De situ et sacris Aegyptiorum and De situ Indiae (written during Seneca's stay in Alexandria, a stay which probably encouraged his interest in science as well). De motu terrarum<sup>2</sup> (between 31 and 49?). De lapidum natura, De piscium natura (under the influence of Fabianus and the Sextii, written probably shortly before or during his exile). De forma mundi (written perhaps in the later years of his exile). De superstitione (later than the De vita beata, probably before 62). Moralis philosophiae libri, De immatura morte, Exhortationes (a protrepticus, cf. epist. 89): from his last period (64).

Doubtful and spurious works

Some epigrams are ascribed to Seneca;<sup>3</sup> the authenticity of the Hercules Oetaeus is doubted; the praetexta Octavia (see the Appendix to this chapter, p. 1199) and the Correspondence with St. Paul<sup>4</sup> are spurious.

---

des L. Varius Rufus. Zehn Überlegungen zu seiner Rekonstruktion, Mainz 1976 (bibl.); G. PICONE, La fabula e il regno. Studi sul Thyestes di Seneca, Palermo 1984; E. LEFÈVRE, Die philosophische Bedeutung der Seneca-Tragödie am Beispiel des Thyestes, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1263–1283; C. MONTELEONE, Il Thyestes di Seneca. Sentieri ermeneutici, Fasano 1991; I. FRINGS, Odia fraterna als manieristisches Motiv. Betrachtungen zu Senecas Thyest und Statius' Thebais, Stuttgart 1992.

<sup>1</sup> The authenticity of this play is controversial; bibl.: W. H. FRIEDRICH, Sprache und Stil des Hercules Oetaeus, Hermes 82, 1954, 51–84; repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 500–544; M. ROZELAAR, Neue Studien zur Tragödie Hercules Oetaeus, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1348–1419; C.-E. AUVRAY 1989 (with bibl.); C. WALDE, Herculeus labor. Studien zum pseudosenecanischen Hercules Oetaeus, Frankfurt 1992.

<sup>2</sup> A. DE VIVO, Le parole della scienza. Sul trattato De terrae motu di Seneca, Salerno 1992.

<sup>3</sup> See editions; M. COFFEY, Gnomon 37, 1965, 98–100.

<sup>4</sup> Editions: D. ERASMUS, Basileae 1515; C. W. BARLOW (TTr), Epistulae Senecae ad Paulum et Pauli ad Senecam (quae vocantur), American Academy in Rome 1938; L. BOCCIOLINI PALAGI (TC), Il carteggio apocrifo di Seneca e San Paolo, Firenze 1978; bibl.: K. DEISSNER, Paulus und Seneca, Gütersloh 1917; J. N. SEVENSTER, Paul and Seneca, Leiden 1961; K. ABEL, Gnomon 35, 1963, 38–43; fundamental now: J. DIVJAK, HLL 5, 1989, § 571.1 (bibl.).

Sources, Models, and Genres<sup>1</sup>

Unlike the Augustan classics and many other Roman authors Seneca writes both prose and poetry. Ennius, Accius, and Cicero had used verse or prose respectively in separate works; the same would be the case later only with Lactantius (if the Phoenix is genuine) and, for instance, with Sidonius Apollinaris. The mixture of prose and poetry in Menippean satire is something different: examples are found in Varro, Petronius, and Seneca himself in his Apocolocyntosis. A third type is the composition of prose prefaces to collections of poems in the way of Martial, Statius, or Ausonius. As for Seneca, it is true that he often adorns his philosophical writings with poetic quotations, but nevertheless he draws a clear borderline between prose and poetry. His philosophical writings are an element distinguishing him from other Roman tragic poets. Once more, Ennius is the only parallel; however, the latter wrote, in addition, epic poetry and (as most Latin tragedians did) comedies as well. Like Accius, Seneca concentrates on tragedy and has a preference for writing scholarly treatises, although Accius is more of a philologist. Of the Augustan tragic poets, Varius wrote epic poetry as well, and Ovid composed elegies. In contrast to Ennius, who as a versatile pioneer had to break ground in many fields regardless of perfection, Seneca produced disciplined and mature literary works in divergent domains

The genres of prose cultivated by Seneca cover a wide range: the Apocolocyntosis is a Menippean satire, incorporating, in addition, elements of drama;<sup>2</sup> completely discordant in style (though almost contemporary!) is the De clementia, a 'prince's handbook' (stylistic criteria, therefore, are not useful for dating Seneca's works). The rhetorical fluency of the consolationes, again, reflects a different tradition. The diction of the Consolatio ad Helviam is especially eloquent, and matched by an exceptionally clear structure: hence, Justus Lipsius<sup>3</sup> deemed it Seneca's masterpiece. Stylistically, the Consolationes diverge from Seneca's later works—not for being older, but for being suasoriae. As for his philosophical treatises (De constantia; De vita beata) their genre is didactic rather than oratorical. The Letters to Lucilius evince a crossing of two genres: letter and philosophical treatise. Surprisingly, of the twelve books called Dialogi only one is a dialogue proper (De tranquillitate animi). For Seneca dialogus denotes communication with a fictive partner as well (cf. benef. 5. 19. 8). In Quintilian (9. 2. 30–31) it even means soliloquy and philosophical reasoning. When creating his own philosophical literary genre Seneca probably was reminiscent of the tradition of diatribe as well. This type of philosophical sermon traced to Bion of Borysthenes had influenced Horace, among others. Many a letter to Lucilius is redolent of diatribe. However, there are limits to this parallel, as will be shown later.

<sup>1</sup> Comprehensive and detailed A. SETAIOLI 1988.

<sup>2</sup> D. KORZENIEWSKI, Senecas Kunst der dramatischen Komposition in seiner Apocolocyntosis, Mnemosyne 35, 1982, 103–114; s. also J. BLÄNSDORF, Senecas Apocolocyntosis und die Intertextualitätstheorie, Poetica 18, 1986, 1–26.

<sup>3</sup> In his edition of Seneca, Antverpiae, 4th edition 1652, 67.

It is more difficult to name Seneca's real sources than the authors he claims to follow. Even as far as the latter are concerned, there are surprises: though a Stoic, Seneca in the first three books of his Letters to Lucilius prefers to quote Epicurean authors, and he does so with an astounding regularity. This might be a compliment to the addressee's previous philosophical tastes. When finally asked to continue this custom with quotations from Stoics, Seneca refuses; his remarkable excuse is that a mature person should finally venture to make a statement on his own (epist. 33. 7).

It is rewarding, nevertheless, to reconstruct Seneca's cultural background from his writings. The philosophers who influenced him may be grouped, in reverse chronology, according to generations: Philosophers whom he met personally form the innermost circle. We already mentioned Attalus the Stoic who lead him from bookish theory to practical life,<sup>1</sup> but also conveyed to him some ideas of natural philosophy.<sup>2</sup> Another teacher was Papirius Fabianus (about 35 B.C.–35 A.D.), a disciple of the Sextii and, like Seneca, an orator converted to philosophy. His inspiring influence is felt in many domains and genres: it extends from the Consolatio ad Marciam to the De brevitae vitae and from his scientific treatises to his letters (e.g. epist. 100 on political philosophy). Furthermore, we must mention the Pythagorean Sotion who converted Seneca to vegetarianism and in all probability gave important hints for book 3 of the De ira. Among Seneca's admired friends there was, finally, frugal Demetrius the Cynic who, like Socrates, left no writings.

The generation previous to this is represented by the Augustans; besides poets like Virgil and Ovid,<sup>3</sup> Seneca especially highlights the teachers of Augustus: Arius Didymus of Alexandria, a Stoic with an eclectic turn of mind, had been influenced by the Platonist Antiochus of Ascalon as well. He had dedicated a consolation to Livia after the death of Drusus; Seneca quotes him at length in his Consolatio ad Marciam. Another teacher of Augustus, Athenodorus (about 75 B.C.–A.D. 7), had been an admirer of Posidonius; he was probably used in the De tranquillitate animi; Seneca quotes him in epist. 10. 5. Asclepiodotus, who wrote on natural philosophy, depended on Posidonius as well.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Sen. epist. 9; 63; 67; 72; 81; 108; 110.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. the theory concerning the forebodings of lightnings (nat. 2. 48; 50).

<sup>3</sup> Horace's influence is important, though less patent, cf. J. F. BERTHET, Sènèque, lecteur d'Horace d'après ses Lettres à Lucilius, Latomus 38, 1979, 940–954.

A generation earlier is Cicero's contemporary Posidonius, whose teachings are thought to have left numerous traces in Seneca, e.g. in the 2nd book of the De ira, in the Naturales quaestiones (mediated by Asclepiodotus) and in the Letters to Lucilius. Cicero's teacher, Antiochus of Ascalon, influenced the Letters to Lucilius and probably the 1st book of the De ira. Cicero's own impact is documented by quotations, as in the De brevitate vitae and in the Letters to Lucilius, although, in the later parts of this work, Cicero is harshly criticized. Seneca's relationship to Cicero (which is attested in the De clementia as well) deserves to be studied thoroughly. Initially, Cicero served as an exemplum (up to Seneca's exile), to become later a piece of counter-evidence: he remained a prisoner to politics, unable to elevate himself to true freedom.<sup>2</sup> In the Consolatio ad Helviam (8) Brutus and Varro are quoted.

From the circle of the Scipios, which roughly corresponds to the fourth or fifth generation before Seneca, Hecato the Stoic is to be mentioned (160–90 B.C.). His presence is felt in the De beneficiis and in the Letters to Lucilius, whereas his teacher Panaetius perhaps lurks behind the De tranquillitate animi and certainly, on a more general scale, inspired Seneca's humane attitude as a spiritual adviser.

There had been at Rome, therefore, at least five generations of philosophers between Seneca and the classics of the Hellenistic schools. Citations from Epicurus are surprisingly numerous, especially in the first three books of the Epistulae morales, but also in the De constantia sapientis, for example. Moreover, Epicurus serves as a model for the genre of the philosophical letter, although Seneca raises different literary and didactic claims. In the Letters to Lucilius the quotations from

<sup>1</sup> Sen. nat. 2. 26. 6; 6. 17. 3.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. G. GAMBET, Cicero in the Works of Seneca Philosophus, TAPhA 101, 1970, 171–183; C. MORESCHINI, Cicerone filosofo fonte di Seneca?, RCCM 19, 1977, 527–534; P. GRIMAL, Sénèque, juge de Cicéron, MEFR 96, 1984, 655–670.

Zeno<sup>1</sup> and his independent disciple Aristo of Chios are second-hand in all probability. Chrysippus has been supposed, among others, to be an authority for the De ira, as has Cleanthes, for the De providentia. In the De clementia, the theme of kingship is ultimately traced, through Hellenistic intermediaries, to Xenophon and Isocrates. This has led us to the generation of Plato, who is also found among Seneca's authorities. Of the Pre-Socratics, who form the last circle, Seneca quotes Democritus as an example of rejection of wealth<sup>2</sup> (prov. 6. 2). Direct consultation of the text is to be excluded in this case.

In the present overview, the following general lines stand out: first, there is a tradition of practical ethics, leading from Seneca's Stoic teachers through Posidonius and Panaetius back to the early Stoa; a second tradition, combining dialectics with religious overtones is traced through Sotion, Posidonius, and Antiochus to Plato and the Pythagoreans; the third line is scientific; through Papirius Fabianus, it goes back to Posidonius and the school of Aristotle. To the first of these traditions we should add Epicurean influences and the live example of Demetrius the Cynic; the latter reminded Seneca of Socrates, a key figure and an unsurpassed archetype for Roman philosophy of life. To the pedantry of philological polymathy Seneca opposes, in his De brevitate vitae (14), the philosopher's live dialogue with the heritage of the past: he may dispute with Socrates, doubt with Carneades, and enjoy tranquillity of mind with Epicurus; he may conquer human nature with the Stoics; and outgrow it with the Cynics.

To be sure Seneca had turned to Socrates as an example not only when he was about to die but already during his exile, i.e. at an early stage of his career. He especially was aware of the fact that Socrates by his behavior had done away with the traditional stigma on imprisonment (neque enim poterat carcer videri, in quo Socrates erat, 'for no place that held Socrates could possibly seem a prison' (Helv. 13. 4). This illustrates the liberating function of Socrates for Seneca.

The Apocolocyntosis belongs to the supposed genre of the Menippean satire. In the 3rd century B.C. Menippus of Gadara had interspersed his prose with verse. Varro had imported the Menippea to Rome. Lucian's (2nd century A.D.) writings, too, give us an idea both of the fanciful form and of the social criticism typical of this genre.

<sup>1</sup> A. SETAIOLI, Citazioni da Zenone nelle opere morali di Seneca, Prometheus 12, 1986, 72-84.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. SETAIOLI, Citazioni da Democrito ed Eraclito nelle opere morali di Seneca, in: Munus amicitiae. Scritti in memoria di A. RONCONI, 1, Firenze 1986, 299-318.

Among Seneca's tragedies, there is a praetexta, the Octavia. This play, though not written by Seneca, deserves some attention, since it is the only completely preserved specimen of its genre.<sup>1</sup>

The tragedies considerably differ from comparable Greek plays.<sup>2</sup> The following tragedies compete with Euripides: Hercules, Troades, Medea, Phaedra, Phoenissae, Thyestes. The following treat Sophoclean subjects: Oedipus, Hercules Oetaeus, Troades, Thyestes. Seneca rivals Aeschylus in his Agamemnon and Phoenissae. Many divergencies may be owing to lost Hellenistic and Latin plays.<sup>3</sup> For example, 'innovations' found in Seneca's Agamemnon had partly been anticipated by Livius Andronicus in his Aegisthus. For Seneca's Thyestes, we have to take into account Ennius, Accius, and Varius; for his Medea, Ovid. The latter poet put a stamp on Seneca's poetry by his other works as well, especially by his Heroides and Metamorphoses.<sup>4</sup> In his choice of a determined model or of a determined version of a given myth Seneca is guided by his own artistic principles (s. Literary Technique).

Literary Technique

In all of his philosophical writings Seneca is indebted to the literary technique of the so-called diatribe.<sup>5</sup> Frequent use of apostrophe is a typical feature of this form of moral preaching common among Cynics and Stoics. The person addressed may be a real recipient or an imaginary interlocutor. The literary form is enlivened by further elements reminiscent of dialogues like: fictive objections on the part of the listener, proverbs, aphorisms, similes from everyday life, or—

<sup>1</sup> For the Octavia, see the Appendix to this chapter, below p. 1199.

<sup>2</sup> There are diverse opinions concerning the significance of different periods of literary history for Seneca's tragedies; cf. R. J. TARRANT, Seneca's Drama and its Antecedents, HSPh 82, 1978, 213–263; G. ARICÒ, Seneca e la tragedia latina arcaica, Dioniso 52, 1981 (1985), 339–356; J. DINGEL, Senecas Tragödien. Vorbilder und poetische Aspekte, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1052–1099.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. A. DE ROSALIA, Stilemi affini nei tragici arcaici e in Seneca, Quaderni di cultura e di tradizione classica 6–7, Palermo 1988–1989, 55–73.

<sup>4</sup> R. JAKOBI, Der Einfluß Ovids auf den Tragiker Seneca, Berlin 1988.

<sup>5</sup> For the relationship of Seneca's philosophical letters to the genre of diatribe: A. STÜCKELBERGER, Der Brief als Mittel der persönlichen Auseinandersetzung mit der Philosophie, Didactica classica Gandensia 20, 1980, 133–148, esp. 133–136; for a general assessment of Seneca's literary technique in his philosophical treatises: K. ABEL 1967; G. MAURACH 1970; s. also below 'Language and Style' and our general bibliography to Seneca.

especially conducive (epist. 95. 72)—historical examples, preferably from the late Republic and the early Empire. All these elements are found in the Epistulae morales, the consolationes, and the treatises. However, to label Seneca's art as 'diatribe' is not to give a comprehensive account of it.

He adapts a rhetorical method when disguising exhortation as praise, e.g. in the De clementia.<sup>1</sup> What is more, his arrangement of thoughts is generally guided by rhetorical principles. He groups his arguments to form a gradation (gradatio); the same principle applies to synonyms: the most colorful and expressive are placed last. Often Seneca develops an idea in three variations, the last of which is shaped to allow a smooth transition to the next thought. The resulting form may be compared to a chain: what had been a secondary theme in the previous paragraph may become the leading theme of the following or even reappear after a longer break. A similar rhythm can be observed not only within single texts but also from letter to letter within the corpus of the Epistulae morales.

Metaphors, similes, and images are applied in perfect harmony with the content. Since an organic and continuous development of the addressee is a major concern of Seneca in the Epistulae morales, he shows a preference for imagery taken from the domain of natural growth,<sup>2</sup> nutrition, and medicine. The same is true of works on consolation, which have to conform to psychological laws: in the Consolatio ad Helviam Seneca uses medical imagery to explain how he came to write as late as this. Military and medical imagery combine to convey the idea of lightly injured recruits more afraid of the physician than of the sword. To them Seneca opposes the veterans, who, although seriously injured, courageously submit themselves to surgery (cons. Helv. 3).

An example may illustrate the structural function of metaphors: throughout the De brevitate vitae we encounter the imagery of sea and sailing: at the beginning the sea illustrates an existence lacking in steadiness and peace of mind (2); in the middle there is a contrast between a sailor aware of his destination and a person being tossed about aimlessly (8); finally Seneca recommends us to retire from the 'floods' of life into the safe 'harbor' of philosophy (18). There is a consistent development of imagery, and the text is accompanied by a meaningful series of visual impressions. Seneca refines the diatribe, a genre initially prone to strike popular notes, into the sophisticated urbanity of his essays in form of letters. Horace's Epistles would be a poetic parallel. Seneca's 'gliding transitions', too, are reminiscent of Horace's art.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Arist. rhet. 1. 9 = 1367 b 23–24 and Cicero's Speech for Marcellus.

<sup>2</sup> For a philosophical use of such imagery cf. also Zeno in Diog. Laert. 7. 40; Sextus 7. 17; cf. A. BONHÖFFER, Epictet und die Stoa, Stuttgart 1890, 16–18.

Seneca's use of quotations is another element of his literary technique. He teaches his readers how to 'unfold' such sayings mentally—mainly by means of rhetorical amplification—and how to apply them to their own life. Rhetoric, which previously had influenced public life, now becomes a means of inner dialogue of man's conversation with himself. It was a grotesque misunderstanding to place this meditative prose and its sophisticated style on a level with the charlatan products of Hellenistic street philosophers. Seneca himself is aware of the fact that philosophy does not need a 'salesman' (institor) but a priest (antistes: epist. 52. 15).

An artistic large-scale structure may be observed in major works such as the Epistulae morales.<sup>1</sup> In the Naturales quaestiones, for example, there is a contrast between the charming beginning of book 4 (with the description of the Nile) and the shattering ending of book 3 (with the description of the Great Flood), although in a technical work we should not concede too much autonomy to considerations of aesthetic form.<sup>2</sup>

The Apocolocyntosis parodies elements of historiography (like the assertion of impartiality and truthfulness), of epic technique (such as the solemn and circumstantial reference to the time of the day) and poetic quotations (e.g. from Virgil and Homer). Even dirge is not exempted from parody.

As for dramatic technique,<sup>3</sup> Seneca prefers to present action directly instead of indirectly. Medea murders her children on the stage;<sup>4</sup> likewise, the spectator assists the deaths of Hercules' wife and of Oedipus' mother. In the Phaedra the heroine personally declares her love to the hero and directly calumniates him with her husband (avoiding

<sup>1</sup> S. the monographs, esp. G. MAURACH 1970.

<sup>2</sup> Good G. STAHL, Gnomon 52, 1980, 620–626.

<sup>3</sup> For Seneca's dramas: M. LANDEFESTER, Funktion und Tradition bildlicher Rede in den Tragödien Senecas, Poetica 6, 1974, 179–204; B. SEIDENSTICKER 1970; A. L. MOTTO, J. R. CLARK, Senecan Tragedy. Patterns of Irony and Art, CB 48, 1972, 69–76; V. WURNIG 1982; N. T. PRATT 1983; bibl. to individual dramas: s. Survey of Works.

<sup>4</sup> Horace's veto (ars 185) might be a taunt against Ovid's Medea.

the detours of sending her nurse or writing a letter). Before our eyes Theseus recomposes the limbs of his son's dismembered corpse. Apart from the last-mentioned error in taste, this technique has undeniable dramatic advantages. Phaedra's confession of her guilt is certainly a dramatic highlight, and the delay of the murder of Medea's second child helps to maintain suspense until the last moment.

Scenes added by Seneca often enhance horror. In the Medea we observe the magic rites of preparing poison; in the Oedipus, Tiresias enacts a necromancy; in the Hercules furens Theseus gives a rigid account of his journey to the Netherworld. As a rule, ritual elements are more prominent than in Euripides. Prayers are frequent; and Medea's murder of her children is interpreted in Roman terms (offering to the dead; the Furies).

Long monologues contribute to develop the leading emotions: Seneca shows on the stage the genesis of Hercules' madness, whereas Euripides had prepared it indirectly by actions of two superhuman beings.

In his initial scenes Seneca vividly introduces the emotions which will dominate the given play. In the cases of Phaedra and Medea, the spectator is immediately confronted with their passions by way of longer monologues, whereas Euripides had started with reflecting their emotions in their entourage. However, there are other introductions in Seneca which make use of a πρόσωπον προτατικόν to forebode the tragic dimension of the events to come.<sup>1</sup> Another attractive feature of Seneca's literary technique are a secondary character's comments describing the reactions or movements of the protagonist.<sup>2</sup>

We will dwell at greater length on the characters of Seneca's heroes in the context of his 'Ideas' (II), but we should mention one typical feature here: the way they act is based on a high degree of consciousness, which might be called almost 'literary'. Medea cherishes and cultivates her emotion by means of rhetorical techniques. For her the name of Medea is, as it were, a program to which she has to live up (Medea fiam, 'I will become Medea' 171; Medea nunc sum, 'now I am Medea' 910). In order to give an exhaustive presentation of the characters,<sup>3</sup> the—highly passionate—prologues often anticipate later stages of action and behavior.

<sup>1</sup> V. WURNIG 1982, 73, important for the interpretation of the Thyestes.

<sup>2</sup> This technique is found at Rome as early as Plautus.

<sup>3</sup> J.-A. SHELTON, Seneca's Hercules furens. Theme, Structure, and Style, Göttingen 1978.

In the domain of form Seneca is striving for concentration and consistency. He omits characters who can be dispensed with (such as Aegeus in the Medea). At the end of the Phaedra there is no need of a dea ex machina; Phaedra cuts the knot by herself. In the final scene of the Medea suspense is maintained to the last moment: when Jason appears on the stage one of his children is still alive, so that he can try to defend it, whereas in Euripides his role is confined to belated and fruitless reproaches. In this case, what is called 'cruelty' implies a considerable dramatic advantage. And there is a further element contributing to the consistency of the plays: Seneca carefully anchors the content of the chorus songs in their context.<sup>1</sup>

Are Seneca's plays meant to be staged or merely 'recited'?<sup>2</sup> This problem is less fundamental than we might have expected. According to ancient habits the text was recited aloud in both cases. We have no documents attesting performances, but this is an argumentum ex silentio. On the other hand we do know at least that it was customary to play individual scenes from dramas.<sup>3</sup> To accede to the opinion of some well-bred 19th century scholars who deemed Seneca's plays 'unfit for the stage', is either to underrate the possibilities of ancient theaters or to canonize a dated judgment of taste (certainly the equation 'ghastly, hence unstageable' has been belied by 20th century theater).

There are many elements in Seneca's text favoring good stage-effects. Objects play no less prominent a role than words: Hippolytus' sword is at the center of both the love-scene and the death-scene; Phaedra's costume of huntress visibly documents her being enthralled with Hippolytus, the disciple of Diana. Medea is shown practising her magic art on the stage. It is only on the theater, therefore, that the plays bring to bear their full potential. It is not by chance that in Racine's Phèdre the two most effective scenes—Phèdre's declaration of love and her suicide—are taken from Seneca. The Renaissance knew that these plays were made to be staged.

<sup>1</sup> G. ARROYO A., Die Chorlieder in Senecas Tragödien. Eine Untersuchung zu Senecas Philosophie und Chorthemen, diss. Köln 1979.

<sup>2</sup> O. ZWIERLEIN, Die Rezitationsdramen Senecas, Meisenheim 1966; convincingly countered by L. BRAUN, Sind Senecas Tragödien Bühnenstücke oder Rezitationsdramen?, RPL 5, 1, 1982, 43–52; cf. D. F. SUTTON, Seneca on the Stage, Leiden 1986.

<sup>3</sup> A. DIHLE, Seneca und die Aufführungspraxis der römischen Tragödie, A&A 29, 1983, 162–171.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

Seneca's prose makes him the exponent of a 'modern style', which in its turn, at that moment, had attained the venerable age of 100 years: since the Augustan epoch the rhetorical schools of declamation had cultivated a diction rich in short, rhythmical sentences, pointed in both content and form. Seneca is the classic of this anti-classical mode. His mocking remarks on Cicero would earn him harsh censure on the part of classicists like Quintilian and archaists like Gellius. On the other hand, various passages were overlooked, where Seneca showed that he fully appreciated Cicero's stylistic achievement (epist. 100. 7). Artistic prose rhythm is very prominent in Seneca; the main clausulae are reminiscent of Cicero, but colometry is split up into smaller units. Moreover, linguistic research has shown that Seneca's Latin, in the main, is surprisingly pure, even conservative. Colloquialisms are in harmony with the personal tone of his prose works;<sup>2</sup> yet they are mixed with poetic elements.

By its closeness to dialogue Seneca's style is reminiscent of the diatribe; however, Seneca in the main keeps aloof from 'low style'. Changing means of expression—like parataxis, antithesis, and variation (e.g. of synonyms)—combine to serve the same goal.

Seneca's concise style—which fatigues the reader only if enjoyed to excess—is meant to satisfy the Stoic ideal of brevitas. However, the fact that each single sentence is short does not prevent many of his letters or books from being rather long. Moreover, Seneca's style often borders on 'the sublime', an ideal backed by the author of the

<sup>1</sup> R. FISCHER, De usu vocabulorum apud Ciceronem et Senecam Graecae philosophiae interpretes, diss. Freiburg 1914; A. PITTET, Vocabulaire philosophique de Sénèque, I: A—computatio, Paris 1937; A.-M. GUILLEMIN 1957; R. WESTMAN, Das Futurpartizip als Ausdrucksmitel Senecas, Helsinki 1961; N. T. PRATT, Major Systems of Figurative Language in Senecan Melodrama, TAPhA 94, 1963, 199–234; J. D. BISHOP, The Meaning of the Choral Meters in Senecan Tragedy, RhM 111, 1968, 197–219; N. CATONE, Metro e lingua nella Phaedra di Seneca, A&R n.s. 16, 1971, 19–29; VON ALBRECHT, Prose 112–124; W.-L. LIEBERMANN 1974, 85–142 (similes and tropes); A. TRAINA, Lo stile 'drammatico' del filosofo Seneca, Bologna 2nd ed. 1978; A. SETAIOLI, Seneca e lo stile, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 776–858; M. BILLERBECK, Senecas Tragödien. Sprachliche und stilistische Untersuchungen, Leiden 1988; M. HILLEN, Studien zur Dichtersprache Senecas. Abundanz. Explikativer Ablativ. Hypallage, Berlin 1989; M. ARMISEN-MARCHETTI, Sapientiae facies. Etude sur les images de Sénèque, Paris 1989.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. SETAIOLI, Elementi di sermo cotidianus nella lingua di Seneca prosatore, SIFC 52, 1980, 5–47; 53, 1981, 5–49.

Περὶ ὕψους ('On the Sublime') who perhaps lived during the same epoch (cf. epist. 41 on animus magnus). Depth of ideas and apparent simplicity of form conspire to produce the impression of sublimity.

Yet Seneca's prose style is far from being uniform; rather it varies according to genres. The introduction of the Consolatio ad Helviam is written in well-rounded periods, which perceptibly differ from the staccato style adopted in other works. However, even in this work Seneca cannot renounce his love for pointed expressions: twenty days after her grandson's death Helvia had to see her son's exile: hoc adhuc defuerat tibi: lugere vivos, 'this misfortune you had still lacked—to mourn the living' (cons. Helv. 2. 5). In all available books on consolation he could not find a person comforting those who were mourning for him (cons. Helv. 1).

Moreover, there are considerable differences of style even within one and the same work. In the De clementia, book 1 is rhetorical in character, whereas book 2 is more abstract and philosophical. Correspondingly, there is a contrast between common and terminological use of words.<sup>1</sup>

The diction of Seneca's tragedies is based on the poetic language of the Augustans. In his choice of words Seneca, though largely conforming to his models, does not neglect the taste of his contemporaries for a passionate, purposeful and impulsive mode. The rhetorical style of his tragedies is in harmony with his epoch, in which the borderlines between poetry and prose are blurred. As architects and painters of his day revel in atmospheric effects produced by the luster of precious material, authors, too, try to dazzle their readers with brilliance. Like his prose writings, Seneca's tragedies bear witness to his preference for concise and simple sentences and pointed expressions; the latter appear even more impressive against the background of a rich variety of themes and ideas. The specific qualities of the language and the style of Seneca's tragedies can only be understood if we constantly bear in mind those of his prose writings.

Seneca's handling of the iambic trimeter is severe. In his choruses anapaests prevail, but there are other meters as well.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In book 1, miseriordia, venia, ignoscere are synonyms for clementia; in book 2, they are differentiated semantically. Severitas is an antonym to clementia in book 1, in book 2 they are ultimately identical since both of them are virtues.

<sup>2</sup> W. MARX, Funktion und Form der Chorlieder in den Seneca-Tragödien, diss. Heidelberg 1932; R. GIOMINI, De canticis polymetris in Agamemnone et Oedipode Annaeanis, Roma 1959; J. D. BISHOP, The Meaning of the Choral Meters in Senecan

Ideas I Reflections on Literature<sup>1</sup>

It is true that Seneca in the Apocolocyntosis derides Claudius' sympathies for novi poetae, but this does not mean that his ideas on literature were reactionary. On the contrary, he shocked both classicists and archaists by unconventional verdicts.<sup>2</sup> His 'modernism' does not disclaim history: Seneca justly observes the change of linguistic usage and finds rather plausible motives why the classics, given their epoch and their educational background, adopted some archaic expressions: he correctly observed that Ennianisms<sup>3</sup> should turn up in authors who had grown up reading Ennius. The period from Caligula to Nero is of unprecedented inner freedom: Seneca and his contemporaries were ready to adopt a personal standpoint without blindly idolizing the classics; they were proud of their own ingenium.<sup>4</sup>

Seneca's un-dogmatic relationship to tradition is evinced from his use of poetic quotations.<sup>5</sup> A theoretical statement on this subject is found in a letter (epist. 108. 24–38) which opposes the philosopher's approach to that of the philologist. Virgil says that 'time is fleeing' (georg. 3. 284). From this quotation the philosopher derives a motivation to lead a more conscious and a more active life, whereas the philologist observes that Virgil uses the verb 'to flee' (fugere) to express rapid motion. From mere collecting and parroting quotations from

---

Tragedy, RhM 111, 1968, 197–219; N. CATONE, Metro e lingua nella Phaedra di Seneca, A&R n.s. 16, 1971, 19–29; J. G. FITCH, Seneca's Anapaests, Metre, Colometry, Text and Artistry in the Anapaests of Seneca's Tragedies, Atlanta 1987.

<sup>1</sup> F. I. MERCHANT, Seneca the Philosopher and his Theory of Style, AJPh 26, 1905, 44–59; P. DE LACY, Stoic Views of Poetry, AJPh 69, 1948, 241–271; A. STÜCKELBERGER, Senecas 88. Brief. Über Wert und Unwert der freien Künste (TTrC), Heidelberg 1965; A. MICHEL, Rhétorique, tragédie, philosophie: Sénèque et le sublime, GIF 21, 1969, 245–257; I. OPELT, Senecas Konzeption des Tragischen, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1972, 92–128; J. DINGEL 1974; A. STÜCKELBERGER 1980; G. ROSATI, Seneca sulla lettera filosofica. Un genere letterario nel cammino verso la saggezza, Maia 13, 1981, 3–15; K. ABEL 1981.

<sup>2</sup> Quint. inst. 10. 1. 125–131; Gell. 12. 2; W. TRILLITZSCH 1971.

<sup>3</sup> On Cicero's Ennianisms: non fuit hoc Ciceronis vitium, sed temporis; necesse erat haec dici, cum illa legerentur, Virgil uses Ennianisms, ut Ennianus populus adgnosceret in novo carmine aliquid antiquitatis (apud Gell. 12. 2. 8–10); Seneca appreciates Cicero as a writer, but his view of style is different, s. also D. G. GAMBET, Cicero in the Works of Seneca Philosophus, TAPhA 101, 1970, 171–183; P. GRIMAL, Sénèque juge de Cicéron, MEFR 96, 1984, 655–670.

<sup>4</sup> The author Περὶ ὕψους is usually assigned to the same epoch.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. H. KRAUSS, Die Vergilitate in Senecas Briefen an Lucilius, diss. Hamburg 1957.

others we come to express ideas of our own by doing what we are saying (epist. 108. 38).<sup>1</sup>

Seneca does not directly assail rhetoric; rather he exploits its methods systematically for his practice of self-education and psychotherapy.<sup>2</sup> At times he deliberately disrupts the chains of school tradition: to him, the problem of 'sublime' or 'grand' style is not one of mere technique but one of the speaker's intellectual freedom. What is important is the impetus to think in great dimensions and to live up to such thoughts (tranq. 17).

Seneca is an original author in his own right. The mere fact that he makes pedagogical use of literature or of literary elements in his philosophical works does not entitle us to conclude that the poetics underlying his tragedies should be straightforwardly didactic.

Ideas II

Seneca is primarily interested in ethics and—to a lesser degree—in natural philosophy (physics). He is less attracted to logic, although in his later letters, he does turn to this subject, too.<sup>3</sup> It is Seneca's intention to sketch an overall survey of philosophy.

In the first place we have to assess the importance of Stoic philosophy for Seneca, since he reckons himself among its adherents. In this respect the Epistulae morales provide the most comprehensive evidence. They are an introduction to philosophy. His starting point, however, is practical life, not an abstract system. From a literary point of view such liveliness is clearly a great advantage. However, we should not overlook the paradox: on the one hand, Seneca repeatedly asserts that as a mature person, whose days are numbered, he has no time for hair-splitting (e.g. epist. 49). On the other, he does not spare Lucilius the problems of logic and dialectics. Evidently Seneca, for all his adherence to practical life, tries to maintain the scholarly level of philosophy (s. e.g. epist. 95).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. talis hominum oratio qualis vita (epist. 114. 16); further evidence of literary criticism in Seneca: epist. 59. 5; 84. 1-7; 114. 11; tranq. (= dial. 9) 17. 10.

<sup>2</sup> A helpful survey in G. REINHART, E. SCHIROK, Senecas Epistulae morales. Zwei Wege ihrer Vermittlung, Bamberg 1988, passim, esp. 90-94.

<sup>3</sup> Despite his 'un-systematical' approach, his insistence on intellectual honesty and correct use of terms (like 'friendship' epist. 3) touches on a genuinely Stoic principle even in an 'early' passage of his collection of letters.

Though a Stoic in principle, our author does not neglect other schools of philosophy: in the first three books of his Letters, each letter ends in an Epicurean quotation<sup>1</sup>—probably Lucilius, his addressee, was sympathetic to this doctrine and certainly Seneca was attracted to Epicurus' serenity and inner freedom.

Seneca's conciliatory nature made him susceptible to the Peripatetic doctrine of the golden mean; in fact, the courtier's flexibility is congenial with Aristotle's urbane altitude (cf. epist. 5). When a young man, Seneca was strongly influenced by Sotion the Neo-Pythagorean. In the introduction to the Naturales quaestiones<sup>2</sup> Seneca's praise of pure knowledge has an almost Platonic ring. In the later parts of the Letters to Lucilius Roman readers are not spared the subtleties of dialectics. For Seneca philosophy is the true initiation, in agreement with the Pythagoreans and Plato (and Epicurean Lucretius): it is the way from darkness to light; through contemplation of the skies<sup>3</sup> (man's privilege over animals) it gives him the upright attitude alone worthy of man. Far from subordinating all other philosophical domains to practical ethics (as we might have expected a Roman to do)—Seneca attains a more independent standpoint. Scientific knowledge has a higher rank; virtue is not an aim in itself but a means to prepare our mind for knowledge. Science is exalted in religious language. Seneca's high opinion of contemplative life is not limited to his old age (De otio) but expressed as early as in the Consolatio ad Helviam: the animus is contemplator admiratorque mundi (8), a function to which our mind is destined by his weightless nature (11). It is not by chance that these lines were written during his exile. Only gradually and with much difficulty did the Romans come to recognize the importance of pure philosophical knowledge. Cicero, whose De re publica is the most significant parallel to the quoted text of Seneca, was more closely attached to the res publica than was Seneca. Like Cicero, Seneca had twice been excluded from political activity by force, and, like Cicero, he had used his last years to return his thanks to Philosophy, whom he called dux vitae since she had taught him how to live. Here he even superseded the Roman postulate of philosophy's subservience to practical life.

<sup>1</sup> S. now H. FREISE, Die Bedeutung der Epikur-Zitate in den Schriften Senecas, Gymnasium 96, 1989, 532–556.

<sup>2</sup> G. STAHL, Die Naturales quaestiones Senecas. Ein Beitrag zum Spiritualisierungsprozeß der römischen Stoa, Hermes 92, 1964, 425–454.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also epist. 94. 56; dial. 8 (De otio) 32. 3 and 8; Cic. nat. deor. 2. 37; Tusc. 1. 69; fundamental A. WLOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, AHAW 1960, 2.

An aging Seneca reflected on god, a theme prepared at earlier stages of his life. In the De superstitione (frg. 33) he did not limit his criticism of religion to oriental cults<sup>1</sup> but extended it even to 'political theology', thus showing more courage than most ancient philosophers. Augustine, when quoting the De superstitione (civ. 6. 10),<sup>2</sup> would recognize intellectual freedom as a characteristic feature of Seneca. Seneca's awareness of his personal independence was enhanced by his exile. Hence, we are not surprised to find in his works a spiritualized idea of god.<sup>3</sup> Divine power descends into man to enable him to know things divine (epist. 41. 5).

Our author declares his allegiance to Stoic philosophy, which in his view gives more freedom to its adherents than Epicureanism.<sup>4</sup> He repeatedly contradicts Stoic doctrines;<sup>5</sup> many a letter is spiced with Epicurean maxims; but, Seneca visits the enemy's camp as a spy, not as a deserter (epist. 2. 5).

Many philosophical ideas gain a specifically Roman touch: practical philosophy is for Seneca per tot annos meditata ratio adversus imminetia, 'a long trained attitude of reasoning towards impending evils' (Tac. ann. 15. 62). By deeming virtue proved in misfortune superior to virtue in good luck (epist. 66. 49-53), he comes into conflict with Stoic doctrine (and logic: should not virtue be always the same?) but he complies with the warlike spirit of his Romans.

The same is true for his understanding of clementia<sup>6</sup> as an emperor's virtue. To a strict Stoic, the wise man would be a iudex severus who gives everyone his due (suum cuique); clemency would be justified, if at all, as a way of adapting a verdict to recta ratio, which is above positive law. Seneca, however, has in mind Roman practice: the judge exercises clementia by deviating from the maximum punishment, a

<sup>1</sup> Among which the cult of Isis and the Jewish religion. As Poppaea sympathized with the latter, the De superstitione should have been written before 62, when Poppaea became almighty through her marriage with Nero.

<sup>2</sup> Min. Fel. 25. 8; F. X. BURGER, Über das Verhältnis des Minucius Felix zu dem Philosophen Seneca, diss. München 1904, 120-124.

<sup>3</sup> Frg. 123 HAASE; epist. 41. 4-5; 83. 1.

<sup>4</sup> Epist. 33. 4; 113. 23.

<sup>5</sup> E.g. epist. 117. 1.

<sup>6</sup> M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 129-171; M. BELLINCIONI, Potere ed etica in Seneca. Clementia e voluntas amica, Brescia 1984.

juridic aspect not easily reconcilable with Stoic philosophy.<sup>1</sup> The clemency of a ruler who is above the law is clearly different from aequitas which in a given case mitigates the strictness of law.

On the other hand Roman ideas are increasingly Hellenized: the Latin notion of principatus merges in the Hellenistic concept of kingship. Unlike Nero's inaugural address, which conceded to the senate some participation in government, the De clementia boldly uses rex as an alternative to princeps. In contradistinction to the 'tyrant' Claudius, Nero is the Stoic king incarnate. The emperor's morality guarantees public morality. This Greek idea easily fits into the Roman framework of exemplum.

Another important principle is the Stoic sympathy for our fellow-men who like ourselves participate in the logos of the universe (humanitas). Consequently, Seneca demands fair treatment of slaves,<sup>2</sup> he rejects gladiatorial games<sup>3</sup> and the killing of criminals in the arena (epist. 7. 3-6). By advocating such such views, Seneca surpasses the level of most of his contemporaries.

An essential of Seneca's teaching method is due attention paid to individual talents (πρέπον, aptum). Like Panaetius, Seneca is not unaware of man's imperfections. He is ready to admit that ictus animi like blushing, fainting, first impulses of anger, grief, fear of death etc. affect everyone, even the wise; the important thing, however, is to refuse them our assent. Yet it is only in the De vita beata that he ventures upon admitting (with Aristotle's disciples and Panaetius) that the lack of material goods may impair the attainment of blissful life.

Seneca is not blind to the contradiction between Stoic rigor and his own way of life (dial. 7 = vit. beat. 17-27). After the ascetic experiments of his youth—up to vegetarianism—the philosopher in his later life accommodated himself well to wealth and life at court—all too well, someone might say. As a Roman he had no taste for abandoning the 'world' of politics, he rather felt obliged to hold out. Thus, he became a precursor of those modern thinkers who replaced medieval withdrawal from the world with what may be called an ascetic life within the world (examples are the religious reformers or

---

<sup>1</sup> He focused his attention especially on the decline of jurisdiction under Claudius and on the return to legality under Nero: he hoped for a new golden age of justice modeled after Augustus, the Apollo-like princeps; cf. also Calp. 1. 71-73.

<sup>2</sup> M. T. GRIFFIN 1976, 256-285.

<sup>3</sup> Epist. 90. 45; 95. 33.

St. Francis of Sales). Seneca, though being involved in politics, is careful of viewing secular life dispassionately; if need be, he is even ready to save his freedom and his dignity by suicide.

His philosophical writings, which reveal so little about his political activities, can be understood only as a counterpoise to his absorbing everyday routine, as a means to gain some distance and tranquillity of mind, as a method of self-examination and meditation. The scarcity of political content is a corollary to philosophy's role as a contrasting foil, not at all an expression of a lack of interest in politics. The qualities hitherto mentioned allowed a large circle of readers to assimilate Seneca's text, a fact ensuring its lasting influence.

It is not easy to assess the ideas expressed in Seneca's dramas. Are they, thanks to their pessimism, their cruelty and their relish in pain, something totally aloof from his philosophic writings? Or are they, rather, didactic plays? Both answers are too simplistic.

The change of values had changed the characters as well. Seneca relentlessly shows man in a world almost devoid of gods. An example is Hercules: both his greatest achievements and his madness ultimately have the same root: his being a fighter. After such overwhelming victories there is no worthy enemy left—but himself (bella iam secum gerat, 'now with himself let him war' Herc. fur. 85). His external conquests now should be followed by a painfully gained insight: virtus is self-conquest. Seneca makes an effort to spiritualize a moral quality the Romans usually exercised in the material world: their spirit of conquest. This play does not convey any dogmatic 'lesson'; instead, it propounds a subtle observation: during the Roman epoch, man had ever less the sense of being guided by gods; more and more, he felt that he had to rely on his own resources; all possibilities seemed to be open to him. Would he find the right measure within himself? Such deep and harassing questions concerning the world and history are the deeper reason for Seneca's hyperbolic and paradoxical mode of expression, which is more than mere mannerism.

Seneca's Roman ambience is another influential factor.<sup>1</sup> The chorus no longer sides with Medea but with Jason, whose love for his children is enhanced; likewise, Roman pietas refines Theseus' character, who in the Phaedra does not exult at the cruel death of his son.

---

<sup>1</sup> This does not mean, however, that his works should be read as encoded political manifestos; one-sided J. D. BISHOP, Seneca's Daggered Stylus, Königstein 1985.

In the Medea, Creon is free from the pusillanimity of his Euripidean namesake; he is a dignified Roman magistrate. Euripides' Phaedra is a queen, anxious to preserve her own dignity and that of her sons, whereas Seneca's Phaedra<sup>1</sup> is a loving woman; her character is portrayed in harmony with the greater social independence woman had gained at Rome and with the fact that for Seneca conscience was more important than propriety of conduct: hence, in the Roman play, Phaedra is not allowed to die with a lie. Her final confession of her guilt is an advantage for the play as a drama. On the other hand, Medea is much less liable to rouse the spectator's sympathy. There is a higher degree of awareness behind her actions, so that she cannot rely on 'extenuating circumstances'. Many creatures of Seneca sense a perverse 'relish in doing evil'.

Seneca's grim tyrants doubtless reflect his experiences under Caligula and Claudius; since we do not know if Seneca wrote these plays for Nero's private theater<sup>2</sup>—with the Emperor as protagonist—it is open to discussion if he wanted Nero to recognize his own task of being a 'good king' more clearly against this dark background. Be this as it may, Seneca in his tragedies certainly portrayed an 'unredeemed' mankind, which misses or perverts its true task of rational knowledge as a basis for action. A heroine like Medea does make use of her ratio—though in a sense contrary to that of Seneca the philosopher. While he, by means of rhetorically arranged words, tries to educate himself to perform good actions, Medea uses the same rhetorical devices to instigate herself to do evil. In this respects his tragedies may be called a gloomy counterpiece to his philosophical writings. Far from being primitive didactic plays,<sup>3</sup> they are systematic exercises in wrongdoing based on the principles of rhetoric. At the best they are liable to convey indirectly the insight that there is no alternative to right ratio and a practical philosophy governed by it. Mala voluntas and Medea's growing into her negative role reveal frightening potentialities of the human mind. Seneca's tragedies belong to the 'diagnosing' not to the 'healing' type of literature. As many of Seneca's heroes perpetrate their crimes deliberately, we must expect him to infringe on Aristotle's concept of tragedy.<sup>1</sup> The reason is a difference of mentality, not any lack of capacity.

<sup>1</sup> Even if Seneca here draws on Euripides' other (lost) Hippolytus drama, his choice of model remains typical of his taste.

<sup>2</sup> HIGHT, Class. Trad. 598, cf. Tac. ann. 15. 39; yet, an apotretic function is not the same as katharsis (the former presupposes distance, the latter, identification).

<sup>3</sup> Against a 'didactic' interpretation: K. HELDMANN 1974, 177–184.

Seneca's is a drama without gods. Society has forfeited its right to set moral standards: released from the tutorship of religion and politics, man experiences an ecstasy of freedom.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

Dialogi

For the Dialogi scholars had relied on a single manuscript for a long time; today the basis of our text is more diversified. These works of Seneca owe their survival to the Benedictine monks of Montecassino. The actual Mediolanensis Ambrosianus C. 90 inf. (A; 11th century; in Beneventan script), which was written in all probability on the behest of Abbot Desiderius (d. 1087), contains, in addition, old complements and corrections from a codex now lost.

Where A is lacunose or illegible, the  $\beta$  manuscripts (which are derived from A) are useful (especially, the Vaticanus Chigi H. v. 153; the Berol. Lat. 2° 47; the Paris. Lat. 15 086 and 6 379, all four from the 13th century); this applies especially to the Consolatio ad Polybium.

The  $\gamma$  codices are more recent (14th century), much interpolated and corrected. Some of them seem, however, to originate from a lost codex (from Montecassino), which was related to A but independent of it (the oldest representatives are the Vaticanus Lat. 2215 and 2214; 14th century).<sup>3</sup>

De beneficiis and De clementia<sup>4</sup>

As an exception, in this case the original source of our tradition has been preserved: Vaticanus Palatinus 1547 'Nazarianus' (N; ca. A.D. 800). The manuscript was written in Northern Italy and came to Lorsch around 850.

<sup>1</sup> On this problem: K. HELDMANN 1974; W.-L. LIEBERMANN 1974; O. ZWIERLEIN, Die Tragik in den Medea-Dramen, Literaturwiss. Jahrb. der Görres-Gesellschaft, n.s. 19, 1978, 27-63; E. LEFÈVRE, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, esp. 1265-1266; 1249-1253; O. ZWIERLEIN 1984, quoted below: Influence; cf. also B. SEIDENSTICKER 1970; J.-A. SHELTON 1975 (quoted above in the Survey of Works in the footnote to Herc. fur.); A. J. BOYLE 1985 (quoted ibid. in the footnote to Phaedra); W.-L. LIEBERMANN, Gnomon 59, 1987, 110-120; cf. also: I. OPELT, Senecas Konzeption des Tragischen, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1972, 272-285; R. GLAESSER, 1984.

<sup>2</sup> Reynolds, Texts 357-375; H. M. HINE, ibid. 376-378; R. J. TARRANT, ibid. 378-381; s. also the prefaces of the editions.

<sup>3</sup> To give an example, these Vaticani offer better readings than A in 20 instances of the De otio.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. also G. MAZZOLI, Ricerche sulla tradizione medievale del De beneficiis e del De clementia di Seneca. III. Storia della tradizione manoscritta, BollClass. 3, 3, 1982, 165-223.

An early copy, the Vaticanus Regin. Lat. 1529 (R; 9th century) contains notes from the circle of Lupus and Heiric. All later manuscripts (nearly 300) depend on R; they fall into two classes. As we possess the archetype this case is an especially instructive example for a methodical study of the history of a text's corruption.

Epistulae

Letters 1–88 and 89–124 have been handed down as two separate corpora. As Gellius' quotes later letters, a 3rd corpus must have been lost.

For the first corpus (epist. 1–88) there are three classes. The 1st one is represented by the Parisinus Lat. 8 540 (p; end of 9th century; epist. 1–71. 7), a primitive and independent witness of high value. To the 2nd class (a) belong the Florentinus Laurentianus 76. 40 (L; beginning 9th century; epist. 1–65) and the Brixiensis (from Brescia) B. II. 6 (Q; end of 9th-beginning 10th century; epist. 1–120. 12), highly estimated by Beltrami, the oldest manuscript containing both corpora. The 3rd class (γ), old as well, exhibits (in some of its representatives) a further division of the tradition into two subordinate corpora: Letters 1–52 and 53–88; only the latter are found in the Venetus Marcianus Lat. Z 270, 1573 (V; 9th century).

The second corpus (epist. 89–124) has a less broad tradition, which, however, is tripartite as well. The Bambergensis Class. 46 (M. v. 14) is by far the best witness (B; from the scriptorium of Louis I the Pious, d. 840). It forms its own class; the above-mentioned manuscript Q belongs to a second class; a third one consists of the representatives of the p tradition.

Naturales quaestiones

The tradition of the Naturales quaestiones is rich. Unfortunately, it starts as late as some time in the 12th century. The archetype had been mutilated. The end of book 4a and the beginning of book 4b were lacking. We know today that in the archetype books 4b–7 were placed before books 1–4a. Therefore, the difference between manuscripts offering this sequence and manuscripts offering the order adopted in modern editions is of less fundamental importance than earlier scholars had thought.<sup>1</sup>

Apocolocyntosis<sup>2</sup>

The oldest three of over 40 manuscripts are: the codex Sangallensis 569 (S; 9th–10th century, from Germany), codex Valencienn. 411, olim 393

<sup>1</sup> H. M. HINE, The Manuscript Tradition of Seneca's Natural Questions, CQ 30, 1980, 183–217; addenda ibid. 42, 1992, 558–562; on the island of Reichenau this work of Seneca was obviously used in a redaction independent of that known to us.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also P. T. EDEN, The Manuscript Tradition of Seneca's Apocolocyntosis, CQ 29, 1979, 149–161.

(V; end 9th century, from Eastern France, formerly owned by Hucbald, d. 930), codex Musaei Britannici, add. 11 983 (L; beginning of 12th century). V and L are related more closely to each other. Their common source, the readings of which can be inferred from these two manuscripts, and S serve to reconstruct the archetype. The later manuscripts depend either on V or on L, without notable interaction.

Tragedies

The manuscripts of the tragedies<sup>1</sup> fall into two classes. On the one hand, there is the 'Etruscus' Laurentianus plut. 37, 13 (E; 11th–12th century); F. Leo based his edition on this manuscript. The other group (A) has only late representatives (beginning with the second half of the 14th century), but in all probability is traced to a 4th century edition; therefore, the evidence contained in it is independent. In both classes the order of the plays is different. The praetexta Octavia only appears in the late group. Some manuscripts of the A class exhibit corrections taken from representatives of the Etruscus class.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

Tacitus respectfully describes Seneca's death (Tac. ann. 15. 60–64); in other instances of his historical works a certain moralizing reproof

<sup>1</sup> S. now O. ZWIERLEIN, Prolegomena zu einer kritischen Ausgabe der Tragödien Senecas, AAWM 1983, 3; A. P. MACGREGOR, The Manuscripts of Seneca's Tragedies: A Handlist, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1134–1241; fundamental O. ZWIERLEIN, preface to the Oxford edition of 1986 (repr. with corr. 1987).

<sup>2</sup> General works on Seneca's influence: A. BRIDOUX, Le stoïcisme et son influence, Paris 1966; M. SPANNEUT, Permanence du stoïcisme. De Zénon à Malraux, Gembloux 1973; P. GRIMAL, Sénèque, Paris 1981 (not identical with 1978), 110–126; on his influence in antiquity: W. TRILLITZSCH 1971; O. ZWIERLEIN, Senecas Hercules im Lichte kaiserzeitlicher und spätantiker Deutung, AAWM 1984, 6; on Seneca in the Middle Ages: K. D. NOTHDURFT, Studien zum Einfluß Senecas auf die Philosophie und Theologie des 12. und 13. Jh., Leiden 1963; L. D. REYNOLDS 1965; s. also Editions, apocol., Medieval Commentary; M. PALMA, ed., N. TREVET, Commento alle Troades di Seneca, Roma 1977; on Seneca in the Modern Age: C. MOUCHEL, Cicéron et Sénèque dans la rhétorique de la Renaissance, Marburg 1990; F. L. LUCAS, Seneca and Elizabethan Tragedy, Cambridge 1922; T. S. ELIOT, Seneca in Elizabethan Translation (1927), in: T.S.E., Selected Essays, London 2nd ed. 1934, 65–105; T. S. ELIOT, Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca (1927), ibid. 126–140; K. VOSSLER, Die Antike und die Bühnendichtung der Romanen, Vorträge der Bibliothek Warburg 7, 1927/1928, Leipzig 1930, 219–256, repr. in: K.V., Die Romanische Welt, München 1965, 60–92; cf. also E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 18–21; A. ALAEJOS, Séneca, Maimónides y Luis Vives, Contemporanea 4, 1936, 140–145; J. BUSCH, Das Geschlecht der Atriden in Mykene. Eine Stoffgeschichte der dramatischen Bearbeitungen in der Weltliteratur, diss. Göttingen 1951; A. BLOCK, Medea-Dramen der Weltliteratur, is felt.<sup>1</sup> Caligula pertinently characterized his style as 'sand without lime' (Suet. Cal. 35. 2).<sup>2</sup> Quintilian, who adhered to a 'classical' ideal of style, consequently rejected Seneca (Quint. 10. 1. 125–131). Fronto and Gellius the archaists, likewise attacked him. Marcus Aurelius—though both a Roman and a Stoic—never mentioned him. The Christians, however, liked to quote him as an authority. In the 4th century, a correspondence of Seneca and St. Paul was forged, a concoction known to Jerome already. These letters, together with the meeting of Seneca's brother Gallio and St. Paul reported in the Acts of the Apostles (18. 12–17), probably contributed to the survival of Seneca's writings. The Church Fathers still read works of Seneca lost for us.<sup>3</sup>

Seneca's tragedies influenced Lucan and Silius. Their impact on Prudentius and the Christian poets of Southern Gaul was considerable.<sup>4</sup> In Boethius' Consolatio, the lyric poems written in short lines recall Seneca's choruses.

In the Carolingian epoch texts of Seneca reappeared (except for the Dialogi and the tragedies). In the 12th century he was much read in classrooms and, of course, exploited as a source of maxims; the awakening of natural science in France favored the dissemination of the Naturales quaestiones, whereas the influence of the tragedies remained diss. Göttingen 1957; J. JACQUOT, ed., Les tragédies de Sénèque et le théâtre de la Renaissance, Paris 1964; C. WANKE, Seneca Lucan Corneille. Studien zum Manierismus der römischen Kaiserzeit und der französischen Klassik, Heidelberg 1964; A. ROTHE, Quevedo und Seneca, Genève 1965; P. BOSSHARD, *Die Beziehungen zwischen Rousseaus Zweitem Discours und dem 90. Brief von Seneca*, Zürich 1967; W. H. FRIEDRICH, *Racines Phèdre und ihre antiken Vorbilder*, in: J. VON STACKELBERG, ed., Das französische Theater. Vom Barock bis zur Gegenwart, 1, Düsseldorf 1968, 182–200; B. R. REES, English Seneca: A Preamble, G&R ser. 2, 16, 1969, 119–133; Calvin's Commentary on Seneca's De Clementia, with Introduction, Translation, and Notes by L. BATTLES, A. MALAN HUGO, Leiden 1969; K. A. BLÜHER, Seneca in Spanien. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Seneca-Rezeption in Spanien vom 13. bis 17. Jh., Bern 1969; the influence of the De otio began with Diderot: I. DIONIGI, edition 1983.

---

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Tac. ann. 13. 3. 1; 13. 11. 2; indirectly 13. 18. 1.

<sup>2</sup> J. STROUX, Vier Zeugnisse zur römischen Literaturgeschichte der Kaiserzeit, II: Caligulas Urteil über den Stil Senecas, Philologus 86, 1931, 349–355.

<sup>3</sup> In his Formula honestae vitae Martin of Braga (late 6th century) probably followed Seneca's lost De officiis; he also imitated the De ira (CONTE, LG 422).

<sup>4</sup> R. HENTZE, Die Nutzung von Senecas Tragödien im Romanus-Hymnus des Prudentius, WJA n.s. 11, 1985, 135–150; W. TRILLITZSCH, Seneca tragicus—Nachleben und Beurteilung im lateinischen Mittelalter von Spätantike bis Renaissancehumanismus, Philologus 122, 1978, 120–136.

scarce. Dante had little knowledge of Latin drama and regarded tragedy and comedy as narrative genres. Petrarch, however, was familiar with Seneca's dramas. Lovato Lovati was the first to rediscover Seneca's metric art; his pupil, Albertino Mussato, wrote a commentary on his tragedies and was the author of the first drama of modern times written in the classical style, the Ecerinis, in five acts (1315).<sup>1</sup>

Ever since that time Seneca has been the source of a tragic and emotional style for the European theater. This is true for Italy, France, Spain, the Netherlands, and England.<sup>2</sup> Around 1400, Medea, Thyestes, and Troades were translated into Catalan. In the 15th century all the tragedies had been translated into Spanish. Camões (d. 1580) was influenced by Seneca. An Italian version by Dolce appeared in 1560; moreover, numerous versions for the stage were made, culminating in Giambattista Giraldi Cinzio's tragedies (d. 1573). Seneca could be read in French since 1556 (Charles Toutain, Seneca's Agamemnon); in 1629 Benoît Bauduyn made all of the tragedies accessible in his mother tongue. Following Seneca (but with explicit reference to the Greeks) Jodelle composed the first French tragedy, Cleopatra as a prisoner (performed 1552). Among the French classics, Corneille (d. 1684), who had been educated by Jesuits, was a 'Latinist' (d. 1684), whereas Racine (d. 1699), a disciple of the Jansenists, was a 'Hellenist'. It is no wonder, then, that Corneille's Médée originates in Seneca, but even Racine adapted the most impressive scenes of this Phèdre from Seneca.

In Germany Seneca was printed immediately after the editio princeps and met with a lively scholarly and didactic interest on the part of both humanists<sup>3</sup> and reformers.<sup>4</sup> In Poland, Germany, and other European countries Seneca's tragedies inspired Neo-Latin learned and scholastic dramas;<sup>5</sup> this was one of the channels through which <sup>1</sup> A. MACGREGOR, Mussato's Commentary on Seneca's Tragedies. New Fragments, ICS 5, 1980, 149-162; Hubert Müller, Früher Humanismus in Oberitalien. Albertino Mussato: Ecerinis, Frankfurt 1987. On the other hand, the very popular commentary by N. Treveth, an English Dominican (14th century), followed Scholastic traditions.

<sup>2</sup> G. BRADEN, Renaissance Tragedy and the Senecan Tradition. Anger's Privilege, New Haven 1985; M. HELZLE, Seneca and Elizabethan Revenge Tragedies. Aspects of Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy and Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus, A&A 31, 1985, 137-152.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. R. Agricola, Celtis, Luder, Schedel.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. Melanchthon and Calvin: A. GANOCZY, S. SCHELD, Herrschaft, Tugend, Vorsehung. Hermeneutik, Deutung und Veröffentlichung handschriftlicher Annotationen Calvins zu sieben Senecatragödien und der Pharsalia Lucans, Wiesbaden 1982.

<sup>5</sup> Heinsius and Grotius wrote dramas following strict classical standards; Opitz

Seneca's style penetrated into dramas written in Dutch or German (Vondel; Gryphius).

As a rule, English dramatists were less familiar with the Greeks than with Seneca, whose Ten Tragedies had been translated in English between 1559 and 1581. For Shakespeare, Seneca was perhaps the most influential classical author, along with Ovid, Plutarch, and Plautus.<sup>1</sup> Seneca's presence is often felt in the pessimistic atmosphere, in many a gloomy and introspective hero, in a tyrant like Richard III, in the apparitions of spirits, in scenes of witchcraft and madness (cf. Macbeth with Hercules furens), and, finally, in the representation of torture and murder on the stage. In the domain of form, Seneca's influence extends to monologue, stichomythy, sometimes even the entire plot (Richard III) and at every step a delight in hyperbolic expression. Lessing (d. 1781) would defend Seneca the tragedian against the Graecophil Brumoy,<sup>2</sup> and during the French Revolution the dramatist Alfieri, who hated tyranny, would follow Voltaire, Racine, and Seneca. But with the rise of German philhellenism Seneca's glory waned.

The Apocolocyntosis was used in the Octavia ascribed to Seneca and was probably known to Ausonius. Radbertus (9th century) would quote it in his Vita Walae. In the 16th and 17th centuries it would find imitators.<sup>3</sup> J.-J. Rousseau was its most famous translator. Menippean satire in the vein of Lucian and Seneca would have a great future as a literary genre, especially in England.

The Naturales quaestiones were studied in the Middle Ages. Roger Bacon's Opus maius (13th century) deserves mention. In the modern age Goethe appreciated the work (in his Materialien zur Geschichte der Farbenlehre); Humboldt repeatedly cited it in his Kosmos.

---

imitated Seneca's Troades in German Alexandrines; P. STACHEL, Seneca und das deutsche Renaissancedrama, Berlin 1907; A. STENDER-PETERSEN, Tragoediae sacrae: Materialien und Beiträge zur Geschichte der polnisch-lateinischen Jesuitendramatik der Frühzeit, Tartu 1931.

<sup>1</sup> R. S. MIOLA, Shakespeare and Classical Tragedy. The Influence of Seneca, Oxford 1992.

<sup>2</sup> Von den lateinischen Trauerspielen, welche unter dem Namen des Seneca bekannt sind, in: Sämtliche Werke, vol. 6, eds. K. LACHMANN, F. MUNCKER, Stuttgart, 3rd ed. 1890, 167–242 (on this: W. BARNER, Produktive Rezeption. Lessing und die Tragödien Senecas, München 1973).

<sup>3</sup> R. RONCALI, L'Apocolocyntosis nel Cinquecento. Da Erasmo all'elezione di Enrico IV, QS 6, 1980, 2, 365–379; Justus Lipsius followed the Apocolocyntosis in his Somnium: Lusur in nostri aevi criticos (1581).

Roger Bacon maintained that he had rediscovered the Dialogi in 1266 and used them for his Moralis philosophia. Chaucer exploited the Epistulae morales, although his knowledge was perhaps second-hand. The Renaissance authors read Seneca's letters and treatises in the original; Erasmus' edition of 1555 enhanced Seneca's popularity. A French translation had been made in the 14th century. Michael Herr compiled a German compendium (1536). Dietrich von Pleningen translated the Consolatio ad Marciam into German (1519). Arthur Golding made an English version of the De beneficiis (publ. 1578); a complete translation of Seneca's prose works was published by Lodge in 1614. S. Richardson created the genre of the novel in letters under the auspices of Seneca's Epistulae morales and of the theory of letters on which they are based.<sup>1</sup> The lasting influence of the De clementia extended from Cinzio to Corneille's Cinna and Mozart's opera La clemenza di Tito.<sup>2</sup>

For many readers of the modern age Seneca was a guide to independent thought; at the same time he delivered the modern languages from the constraints of putting clauses together into periods. Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592), the inventor of the modern essay, assimilated Seneca's ideas into a component of his identity.<sup>3</sup> It is thanks to Seneca that the lively prose of the great European moralists could develop: Gracian, Francis Bacon, La Rochefoucauld, La Bruyère, Pascal, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche.<sup>4</sup>

In the 20th century Seneca was rediscovered in the context of a new interest in a 'philosophy of life'.<sup>5</sup> There is even a new understanding of the philosopher's religious feeling, 'the surrender of the

<sup>1</sup> Wolfg. G. MÜLLER, Der Brief als Spiegel der Seele. Zur Geschichte eines Topos der Epistolartheorie von der Antike bis zu S. Richardson, A&A 26, 1980, 138–157.

<sup>2</sup> G. SOLIMANO, Per la fortuna del De clementia nel cinquecento. La Cleopatra di G. B. Giraldi Cinzio, Rassegna della letteratura italiana (Firenze) 88, 3, 1984, 399–419; W. SEIDEL, Seneca—Corneille—Mozart, in: M. VON ALBRECHT, W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik in Antike und Neuzeit, Frankfurt 1987, 109–128.

<sup>3</sup> P. VILLEY, Les sources et l'évolution des Essais de Montaigne, Paris 1908; C. H. HAY, Montaigne lecteur et imitateur de Sénèque, Poitiers 1938; M. VON ALBRECHT, Montaigne und Seneca, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, vol. 5, 543–559.

<sup>4</sup> For the 19th century cf. also: F. HAHNE, Raabe und Seneca, in: Mitteilungen für die Gesellschaft der Freunde W. Raabes, Der Raabefreund 34, 2, Wolfenbüttel 1944, 18–33.

<sup>5</sup> An essential assessment of the European importance of Latin philosophers: GROETHUYSEN, Anthropologie.

personal center to the Logos of being',<sup>1</sup> a description not totally adequate to the liberating role of this educator of Europe.

Appendix: The Praetexta Octavia<sup>2</sup>

The praetexta Octavia has been transmitted to us among Seneca's works. It is the only tragedy completely known to us on a Roman subject (praetexta). Seneca appears on the stage; Nero's death is predicted in detail (hence: ex eventu). The author's knowledge of contemporary history speaks in favor of a date soon after Nero's death. The parallels with Tacitus may be owing to common sources and do not compel us to assume that the work was written in the 2nd century. The author is unknown.

Nero wants to repudiate his wife Octavia and to marry Poppaea. The people of Rome bring about an insurrection in support of Octavia. Nero violently quenches the riot and condemns Octavia to death.

Editions: Opera: Matth. MORAVUS, Neapoli 1475. * D. ERASMUS, Basileae 1515, corr. 1529 etc. * M. A. MURETUS, Romae 1585. * I. LIPSIUS, Antverpiae (1605), 4th ed. 1642. * F. HAASE, 3 vols., Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1881–1886. * E. HERMES, C. HOSIUS, A. GERCKE, O. HENSE, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1905–1917. * Loeb Edition (TTr): J. W. BASORE (dial.), R. M. GUMMERE (epist.), T. H. CORCORAN (nat.), F. J. MILLER (trag.), 10 vols., London 1917–1972. * Budé Edition (TTr): dial. (4 vols.), clem., epist., nat., apocol., benef., trag.: R. WALTZ, F. PRÉCHAC, A. BOURGERY, P. OLTRAMARE, Paris 1922–1964. * Phil. writings: M. ROSENBACH (TTr in strange German), 5 vols., Darmstadt 1987–1989. * epist.: A. BELTRAMI, 2 vols., Romae 1931; 2nd ed. 1949. * L. D. REYNOLDS, 2 vols., Oxonii 1965. * W. C. SUMMERS (TC, sel.), London 1910. * C. D. N. COSTA (selection, TTrC), Warminster 1988. * epist. 1–12; 65: G. SCARPAT (TTrC), Brescia 1975. * epist. 88: A. STÜCKELBERGER (C), Heidelberg 1965. * epist. 94–95: M. BELLINCIONI (TTrC), Brescia 1979. * dial.: L. D. REYNOLDS, Oxonii 1977. * dial. 1–5: G. VIANSINO, Milano 1988. * dial. 2 (= const. sap.): G. AMMENDOLA (C), Napoli 1930. * W. KLEI (TC), diss. Utrecht 1950. * P. GRIMAL (C), Paris 1953. * dial. 2; 7; 9; 12: C. D. N. COSTA (T), <sup>1</sup> P. TILLICH, The Courage to Be, New Haven, 5th ed. 1954, 13; G. Grass calls Seneca 'a philosopher who might have to say something to us even today': W. RUTZ, Stoa und Stahlbeton. Bemerkungen zur Seneca-Rezeption in G. Grass' Roman Örtlich betäubt, Gymnasium 89, 1982, 122–134.

<sup>2</sup> S. the editions of Seneca; M. E. CARBONE, The Octavia: Structure, Date, and Authenticity, Phoenix 31, 1977, 48–67; P. KRAGELUND, Prophecy, Populism, and Propaganda in the Octavia, Copenhagen 1982; D. F. SUTTON, The Dramaturgy of the Octavia, Königstein 1983; P. L. SCHMIDT, Die Poetisierung und Mythisierung der Geschichte in der Tragödie Octavia, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1421–1453; L. Y. WHITMAN (s. editions) believes in Seneca's authorship.

Warminster 1994. * dial. 6 (= cons. Marc.): C. FAVEZ (TC), Paris 1928. * dial. 8 (= De otio): I. DIONIGH (TTrC), Brescia 1983. * dial. 9: M. G. CAVALCA SCHIROLI (TC), Bologna 1981. * dial. 10-12: J. D. DUFF (TC), Cambridge 1915. * dial. 10 (= brev. vit.): H. DAHLMANN, München 1949. * P. GRIMAL (TC), Paris 1959. * A. TRAINA (TC), Torino 1970. * dial. 11 (= cons. Helv.): C. FAVEZ (TC), Lausanne 1918. * K. THOMAS (C), Leipzig 1995 (forthcoming). * clem.: P. FAIDER, C. FAVEZ, P. VAN DE WOESTIJNE (TC, study, Index omnium verborum), 2 parts, Bruges 1928-1950. * nat.: Bernardinus de CREMONA, SIMON DE LUERE, in their ed. of the prose works, Venetiis 1490. * D. VOTTERO, Torino 1989. * M. F. A. BROK (TTr), Darmstadt 1995. * H. M. HINE, Stuttgart 1996. * nat. 2: H. M. HINE (TC), New York 1981. * trag.: Andr. BELFORTIS, Ferrariae 1484. * F. LEO, 2 vols., Berlin 1878-1879, repr. 1963. * R. PEIPER, G. RICHTER, Lipsiae 1902. * F. J. MILLER (TTr), 2 vols., London 1916-1917. * H. MORICCA, 3 vols., Torino 2nd ed. 1946-1958. * I. (= G) C. GIARDINA, 2 vols., Bologna 1966. * I. (= G.) VIANSINO, 3 vols., Torino 2nd ed. 1968. * T. THOMANN (TTrN), 2 vols., Zürich 1961-1969. * O. ZWIERLEIN (crit. C), AAWM 1986, 6. * O. ZWIERLEIN (T), Oxonii 1986, repr. (corr.) 1987. * G. VIANSINO (TTrC), vol. 1. 1. 2, Milano 1993. * Agam.: R. GIOMINI (TC), Romae 1956. * R. J. TARRANT (TC), Cambridge 1976. * Med.: C. D. N. COSTA (TC), Oxford 1973, repr. 1989. * Herc. fur.: J. G. FITCH (TC), Ithaca 1987. * Oed.: T. H. SLUITER (T), Groningen 1941. * M. HADAS (Tr), Indianapolis 1955. * B. W. HÄUPTLI (TC), Frauenfeld 1983. * K. TÖCHTERLE (TTrC), Heidelberg 1994. * Phaedr.: J. VAN WAGENINGEN (TN), Groningen 1918. * K. KUNST (TC), 2 vols., Wien 1925. * P. GRIMAL (TC), Paris 1965. * R. GIOMINI (TC), Roma 2nd ed. 1968. * A. J. BOYLE (TTrN), Liverpool 1987. * M. COFFEY, R. MAYER (TC), Cambridge 1990. * Phoen.: T. HIRSCHBERG (C), Berlin 1989. * M. FRANK (C), Leiden 1995. * Thyest.: R. J. TARRANT (TC), Atlanta 1985. * F. GIANCOTTI (TN), 2 vols., Torino 1988 and 1989. * Troad.: E. FANTHAM (TTrC), Princeton 1982. * A. J. BOYLE (TTrC), Leeds 1994. * Inc.auct. Herc. Oet. et Octavia: O. ZWIERLEIN, Oxonii 1986, repr. corr. 1991. * Inc.auct. Octavia: G. BALLAIRA (TC), Torino 1974. * L. Y. WHITMAN (TC), Bern 1978. * apocol.: ed.princeps: C. SYLVANUS GERMANICUS, Romae 1513. * F. BÜCHELER (TC), in: Symbola philologorum Bonnensium in hon. F. RITSCHL, Lipsiae 1864, 31-89, T repr. in: F. BÜCHELER, W. HERAEUS, Petronii saturae . . ., Berolini 6th ed. 1922, 251-263; C repr. in: F. BÜCHELER, Kleine Schriften, vol. 1, Leipzig 1915, 439-507. * O. WEINREICH (TrN, monograph), Berlin 1923. * C. F. RUSSO (TTrC), Firenze (1948) 6th ed. 1985 (with an appendix). * R. WALTZ, Paris 1961. * A. BAUER (TTrN), Stuttgart 1981. * G. BINDER (school ed. with illustr. by H.-H. RÖMER), 2 vols., Frankfurt 1987. * W. H. D. ROUSE (TTr), in: Petronius (TTr), ed. by M. HESELTINE, E. H. WARMINGTON, London 1913, repr. rev. 1969, 431-483. * P. T. EDEN, Cambridge 1984. * R. RONCALI (T, ind. verborum), Leipzig 1990. * Medieval commentary on apocol.: R. E.

CLAIRMONT (TTrC), Chicago 1980. * epigr.: C. PRATO (TC), Roma 1964. ** Concordances, ind.: R. BUSA, A. ZAMPOLLI, Concordantiae Senecanae. Accedunt index inversus, indices frequentiae, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1975. * L. DELATTE, E. EVRART, S. GOVAERTS, J. DENOZ, L. ANNAEUS Seneca. Opera philosophica. Index verborum. Listes de fréquence, relevés grammaticaux, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1981. * W. A. OLDFATHER, A. S. PEASE, H. V. CANTER, Index verborum quae in Senecae fabulis nec non in Octavia praetexta reperiuntur, Urbana 1918 (with bibl.), repr. 1964. * J. DENOZ, Sen. trag. Index verborum. Relevés lexicaux et grammaticaux, Hildesheim 1980. * Separate ind.: on clem.: P. VAN DE WOESTIJNE, in: Faider, s. editions. * On dial. 12; 11; 6; 2; 10; clem.; epist.: L. DELATTE and others, 8 vols., Liège 1962–1973. * Separate concordances: for dial. 6; 2; 10; 1; 7; clem.; dial. 9: P. GRIMAL and others, 7 vols., Paris 1965–1976. * On epigr.: C. J. REAGAN, A Concordance to the Epigrams Attributed to Seneca the Younger, Hildesheim 1972; s. also below DEGL'INNOCENTI PIERINI. ** Bibl.: A. L. MOTTO, J. R. CLARK, Seneca. A Critical Bibliography 1900–1980. Scholarship on his Life, Thought, Prose, and Influence, Amsterdam 1989. * P. CUBEDDU, Natura e morale in Seneca. Il dibattito sulle Naturales quaestiones negli anni 1900–1970, Sandalion I, 1978, 123–152. * K. BRINGMANN, Senecas Apocolocyntosis. Ein Forschungsbericht 1959–1982, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 885–914. * S. also numerous contributions in: ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985; 2, 36, 3, 1989 and 2, 36, 4 (quoted below; cf. also the footnotes to the Survey of Works).

K. ABEL, Bauformen in Senecas Dialogen. Fünf Strukturanalysen: dial. 6, 11, 12, 1 und 2, Heidelberg 1967. * K. ABEL, Das Problem der Faktizität der Seneca-Korrespondenz, Hermes 109, 1981, 472–499. * K. ABEL, Seneca. Leben und Leistung, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 653–775. * K. ABEL, Aus dem Geistesleben des frühen Prinzipats (Horaz—Seneca—Tacitus), Marburg 1991. * K. ANLIKER, Prologe und Akteinteilung in Senecas Tragödien, Bern 1960. * C.-E. AUVRAY, Folie et douleur dans Hercule furieux et Hercule sur l'Oeta. Recherches sur l'expression esthétique de l'ascèse stoïcienne chez Sénèque, Frankfurt 1989. * B. AXELSON, Senecastudien, Lund 1933. * B. AXELSON, Neue Seneca-Studien, Lund 1939. * Ä. BÄUMER, Die Bestie Mensch. Senecas Aggressionstheorie, ihre philosophischen Vorstufen und ihre literarischen Auswirkungen, Frankfurt 1982. * J. D. BISHOP, Seneca's Daggered Stylus. Political Code in the Tragedies, Königstein 1985. * A. J. BOYLE, ed., Seneca Tragicus. Ramus Essays on Senecan Drama, Barwick/Victoria (Australia) 1983. * J. BRANDT, Argumentative Struktur in Senecas Tragödien. Eine Untersuchung anhand der Phädra und des Agamemnon, Hildesheim 1986. * H. CANCEK, Untersuchungen zu Senecas Epistulae morales, Hildesheim 1967. * C. D. N. COSTA, ed., Seneca, London 1974. * T. F. CURLEY, The Nature of Senecan Drama, Roma 1968. * G. DAMSCHEN, Formen des Wissens in Senecas Epistulae morales, diss. Heidelberg 1997 (forthcoming).

- * R. DEGL'INNOCENTI PIERINI, Studi sugli epigrammi attribuiti a Seneca I: il padrone del tempo, Prometheus 21, 1995, 161–186. * J. DINGEL, Seneca und die Dichtung, Heidelberg 1974. * J. DINGEL, Senecas Tragödien: Vorbilder und poetische Aspekte, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1052–1099. * H. H. ECKERT, Weltanschauung und Selbstmord bei Seneca und den Stoikern, in antiker Mystik und im Christentum, diss. Tübingen 1951. * W. H. FRIEDRICH, Untersuchungen zu Senecas dramatischer Technik, Borna-Leipzig 1933. * I. FRINGS, Odia fraterna als manieristisches Motiv—Betrachtungen zu Senecas Thyest und Statius' Thebais, Stuttgart 1992. * M. FUHRMANN, Die Funktion grausiger und ekelhafter Motive in der lateinischen Dichtung, in: H. R. JAUSS, ed., Die nicht mehr schönen Künste. Grenzphänomene des Ästhetischen, München 1968, 23–66; discussion 531–547. * W. D. FURLEY, Seneca's Horrible Bull: Phaedra 1007–1034, CQ n.s. 42, 1992, 562–566. * F. GIANCOTTI, Saggio sulle tragedie di Seneca, Roma 1953. * R. GLAESER, Verbrechen und Verblendung. Untersuchungen zum furor-Begriff bei Lucan mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Tragödien Senecas, Frankfurt 1984. * M. T. GRIFFIN, Seneca. A Philosopher in Politics, Oxford 1976 (fundamental; hist.; bibl.), repr. (paperback) 1992. * P. GRIMAL, Sénèque ou la conscience de l'Empire, Paris 1978. * P. GRIMAL, Sénèque et le Stoïcisme romain, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1962–1992. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Sénèque directeur d'âmes, REL 30, 1952, 202–219; 31, 1953, 215–234; 32, 1954, 250–274. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Sénèque, second fondateur de la prose latine, REL 35, 1957, 265–284. * T. N. HABINEK, An Aristocracy of Virtue: Seneca on the Beginnings of Wisdom, YCIS 29, 1992, 187–203. * E. HACHMANN, Die Führung des Lesers in Senecas Epistulae morales, München 1995. * I. HADOT, Seneca und die griechisch-römische Tradition der Seelenleitung, Berlin 1969. * I. HADOT, Arts libéraux et philosophie dans la pensée antique, Paris 1984. * P. HADOT, Exercices spirituels et philosophie antique, Paris 2nd ed. 1987 (corr. and augm.). * K. HELDMANN, Untersuchungen zu den Tragödien Senecas, Wiesbaden 1974 (esp. on Herc. fur., Thyest., Agam., Med., Phaedr.). * D. and E. HENRY (B. WALKER), The Mask of Power. Seneca's Tragedies and Imperial Rome, Warminster 1985. * C. J. HERINGTON, Senecan Tragedy, Arion 5, 1966, 422–471, repr. in: N. RUDD, ed., Essays on Classical Literature Selected from Arion, Cambridge 1972, 169–219. * R. KASSEL, Untersuchungen zur griechischen und römischen Konsolationsliteratur, München 1958. * U. KNOCHE, Der Philosoph Seneca, Frankfurt 1933. * M. KÖLLE, Totum in exiguo als Lebensform und Kunstprinzip in Senecas philosophischen Schriften, diss. Heidelberg 1975. * G. KUEN, Die Philosophie als dux vitae. Die Verknüpfung von Gehalt, Intention und Darstellungsweise im philosophischen Werk Senecas am Beispiel des Dialogs De vita beata. Einleitung, Wortkommentar und systematische Darstellung, Heidelberg 1994. * A. D. LEEMAN, Seneca and Poseidonios. A Philosophical Commentary on epist. 102. 3–19, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 5, 1952,

- 57–79. * A. D. LEEMAN, Seneca's Plans for a Work Moralis Philosophia and their Influence on his Later Epistles, Mnemosyne 4. ser. 6, 1953, 307–313.
- * A. D. LEEMAN, Das Todeserlebnis im Denken Senecas, Gymnasium 78, 1971, 322–333, repr. in: LEEMAN, Form 257–267. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Senecas Tragödien, Darmstadt 1972 (= WdF 310). * W.-L. LIEBERMANN, Studien zu Senecas Tragödien, Meisenheim 1974. * G. MAURACH, Der Bau von Senecas Epistulae morales, Heidelberg 1970. * G. MAURACH, ed., Seneca als Philosoph, Darmstadt 1975 (= WdF 314). * P. MIGLIORINI, La medicina nella cultura letteraria del periodo neroniano, Frankfurt 1996. * M. MORITZ, Medizinisches bei Seneca und Lucretius, diss. med. Düsseldorf 1935. * A. L. MOTTO, Guide to the Thought of L. Annaeus Seneca in the Extant Prose Works, Amsterdam 1970. * A. L. MOTTO, J. R. CLARK, Senecan Tragedy, Amsterdam 1988. * I. OPELT, Senecas Konzeption des Tragischen, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed. (s. above), 272–285. * N. T. PRATT, Seneca's Drama, Chapel Hill 1983. * RABOW, Seelenführung. * P. RABOW, Paidagogia. Die Grundlegung der abendländischen Erziehungskunst in der Sokratik, Göttingen 1960. * O. REGENBOGEN, Schmerz und Tod in den Tragödien Senecas, Vorträge der Bibliothek Warburg 7, 1927/28, repr. in: O.R., Kleine Schriften, ed. by F. DIRLMEIER, München 1961, 409–462; separate edition: Darmstadt 1963. * L. D. REYNOLDS, The Medieval Tradition of Seneca's Letters, Oxford 1965. * J. M. RIST, Seneca and Stoic Orthodoxy, ANRW 2, 36, 3, 1989, 1993–2012. * T. G. ROSENMEYER, Senecan Drama and Stoic Cosmology, Berkeley 1989. * P. ROZELAAR, Seneca, Amsterdam 1976 (psychol.). * E. G. SCHMIDT, Eine Frühform der Lehre vom Umschlag Quantität-Qualität bei Seneca, F&F 34, 1960, 112–116; repr. in: E. G. SCHMIDT, Erworbenes Erbe, Leipzig 1988, 392–404. * E. G. SCHMIDT, Die Anordnung der Dialoge Senecas, Helikon 1, 1961, 245–263. * E. G. SCHMIDT, Der Begriff des Guten in der hellenistischen Philosophie. Ein Beitrag zur Erklärung der Senecabriefe, Jena 1963. * C. SEGAL, Language and Desire in Seneca's Phaedra, Princeton 1986. * B. SEIDENSTICKER, Die Gesprächsverdichtung in den Tragödien Senecas, Heidelberg 1970. * A. SETAIOLI, Seneca e i Greci. Citazioni e traduzioni nelle opere filosofiche, Bologna 1988 (with bibl.). * A. SETAIOLI, ed., Seneca e la cultura (1989), Perugia 1991 (collection of articles). * V. SØRENSEN, Seneca. The Humanist at the Court of Nero, transl. by W. G. JONES, Chicago 1984. * G. SOLIMANO, La prepotenza dell'occhio. Riflessioni sull'opera di Seneca, Genova 1991. * W. STEIDLE, Bemerkungen zu Senecas Tragödien, Philologus 96, 1944, 250–259; 259–264, repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1972, 490–499; 286–291. * W. STEIDLE, Studien zum antiken Drama—unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des Bühnenspiels, München 1968. * A. STÜCKELBERGER, Seneca. Der Brief als Mittel der persönlichen Auseinandersetzung mit der Philosophie, Didactica classica Gandensia 20, 1980, 133–148. * D. F. SUTTON, Seneca on the Stage, Leiden 1986. * R. G. TANNER, Stoic Philosophy and Roman Tradition in Senecan Tragedy, ANRW 2, 32, 2, 1985, 1100–1133. * R. J. TARRANT, Senecan Drama and Its Antecedents, HSPH 82, 1978, 213–263. * W. TRILLITZSCH, Senecas Beweisführung, DAW Berlin, Sektion Altertumswissenschaften 37, 1962. * W. TRILLITZSCH, Seneca im literarischen Urteil der Antike. Darstellung und Sammlung der Zeugnisse, 2 vols., Amsterdam 1971. * W. S. WATT, Notes on Seneca, Epistulae and Naturales Quaestiones, CQ n.s. 44, 1994, 185–198. * S. WOLF, Die Augustusrede in Senecas Apocolocyntosis, Meisenheim 1986. * V. WURNIG, Gestaltung und Funktion VON GEFÜHLSDARSTELLUNG in den Tragödien Senecas. Interpretationen zu einer Technik der dramatischen Stimmungserzeugung, Frankfurt 1982. * B. ZIMMERMANN, Seneca und die römische Tragödie der Kaisereit, Lexis 14, 1990, 203–214. * O. ZWIERLEIN, Die Rezitationsdramen Senecas—mit einem kritisch-exegetischen Anhang, Meisenheim 1966. * O. ZWIERLEIN, Kritischer Kommentar zu den Tragödien Senecas, AAWM 1986, 6.

D. NOVEL

THE ROMAN NOVEL

General Remarks

According to Macrobius (somn. 2. 8) the novels of Petronius and Apuleius are comparable to Menander's comedies both for their fictional subject matter and their entertaining character (argumenta fictis amatorum casibus referta). Classical antiquity did not develop any theory of the novel proper. The term 'romance' originates in the Middle Ages and denotes (in France) longer verse or prose narratives written in the romance vernacular. The term, 'novel' (Italian: novella) was introduced by Boccaccio to denote short, new, and unheard-of stories. Modern classicists use the terms 'novel' or 'romance' for longer fictional narrative in prose.

It is expedient to make a distinction between novels in the narrower and in the larger sense of the word. The first group are serious love-stories<sup>1</sup>—there are numerous Greek examples—and more ludicrous forms, mainly represented in Latin literature. Both types of novel have certain features in common (s. Literary Technique).

In a larger sense the genre comprehends: travel novels,<sup>2</sup> biographical novels<sup>3</sup>—often with an educative tendency,<sup>4</sup> e.g. as a manual for

---

<sup>1</sup> 1st century B.C.: Chariton; the Novel of Parthenope and Metiochus; the Novel of Chione; 1st century A.D.: the Novel of Calligone; 2nd century: the Novel of Herpyllis; Lollianus; Xenophon of Ephesus; Achilles Tatius; Jamblichus; 3rd century: Longus (pastoral novel); Heliodorus; 5th–6th century: Historia Apollonii regis Tyri. A novel in the narrower sense of the word is 'a longer prose narrative the action of which is dominated by erotic motives and a series of adventures mostly during travels, which can be classified according to certain types' (N. Holzberg 1986, 33); they have a happy ending.

<sup>2</sup> Antonius Diogenes, 1st–2nd century A.D.; Lucian, 2nd century, True Histories (a parody).

<sup>3</sup> The Novel of Aesopus, 1st century A.D., following older sources; Philostratus; 2nd–3rd century: Vita Apollonii Tyanei; Porphyrius, Vita Pythagorae.

<sup>4</sup> 5th–4th century B.C.: Antisthenes, Cyrus; Xenophon, Cyropaedia; 4th–3rd century B.C.: Onesicritus, Education of Alexander; ca. 3rd century B.C.: the epistolary novel of the Seven Sages; 1st century B.C.: epistolary novel of Ps.-Chion; 4th–5th century A.D.: Synesius, Ostris and Typhos.

princes; further there are mythological novels,<sup>1</sup> which are difficult to separate from historical ones,<sup>2</sup> especially, the Novel of Alexander,<sup>3</sup> which combines features of travel novels with such of biographies and of manuals for princes. Finally, novels can become vehicles of illuminist demythification<sup>4</sup> or utopian reverie.<sup>5</sup> On the other hand there is also entertaining literature with a religious tendency. An example is Apuleius, who is a worshipper of Isis; there are Christian examples as well,<sup>6</sup> partly bordering on biographies and travel novels.

In this group of novels the literary patterns are less rigid than in love novels and picaresque novels.

Petronius' Satyrica resembles Menippean satire in the fact that they use both prose and verse. However, the Menippean satire usually adopts a determined philosophical standpoint; hence, in it, the author's satirical intention is more visible than in Petronius' novel.

Finally, novels are able to absorb minor genres such as anecdotes, fables, fairy tales, and short stories.

Greek Background

The Greek erotic novel is related to New Comedy not only by its subject, but also by its similar social background: in the Hellenistic epoch, owing to political changes, readers took an increasing interest in the private sphere. The picaresque novel, which found two important representatives in Rome, seems to have a Greek forerunner in the Novel of Iolaus. We will discuss the sources of the Golden Ass in our chapter on Apuleius. Other traditions relevant to the Latin novel are those of mythological novels, Alexander novels, erotic novels (Historia Apollonii regis Tyri) and of hagiography.

---

<sup>1</sup> 2nd century B.C.: Hegesianax; Dionysius Scytobrachion; 4th century A.D.: Ps.-Dictys; 6th century A.D.: Ps.-Dares.

<sup>2</sup> The Novel of Ninus: 1st century B.C.; the Novel of Sesonchosis: 1st century A.D.

<sup>3</sup> Ps.-Callisthenes, 3rd century A.D.; Latinized by Julius Valerius, 3rd-4th century A.D.

<sup>4</sup> 4th-3rd century B.C.: Euhemerus.

<sup>5</sup> 3rd or 2nd century B.C.: Iambulus.

<sup>6</sup> E.g. 2nd century A.D.: The Acts of Saints Paul and Thecla; 3rd-4th century: the Graeco-Latin Pseudo-Clementines; since the 4th century there are also hagiographic novels; these are akin to biographical and didactic novels.

Roman Development

For us, Petronius' Satyrical and the Metamorphoses of Apuleius are highlights of the classical novel. Sisenna's Milesiae and Varro's Menippeae were important precursors, although Varro had no overall plot. The Latin novel is not only part of the general tradition of the classical novel but also of a specific Latin literary development. Moreover its most significant manifestations reflect the intellectual and social situation of their epochs.

Typically enough, at the moment when Lucan developed epic into a highly emotional genre, and despaired of representing a meaningful universe of nature, history, and politics, a less pretentious narrative genre, the novel, received fresh impetus. It was a document of an oversophisticated society which had to face the decline of the old aristocracy, of instruction and of education on the one hand, and, on the other, the rise of rich freedmen: a double problem which the same society was free and unprejudiced enough to ridicule.

In the 2nd century A.D. the conditions fostering the development of the Latin novel were slightly different but no less typical: after the end of political epic under Domitian, the center of interest began to shift from Rome to the periphery of the empire. Barbarians increasingly disturbed world peace, and Marcus Aurelius, the last 'adopted' emperor, was one of the last rulers to find support in Stoic philosophy, before ratio definitively quit the field to religio. Under these circumstances, many readers felt the contemporary importance of both the form and the content of Apuleius' novel: it described an individual's experience, colorful and difficult to coordinate, within an unpredictable world of perpetual kaleidoscopic change. Attention was no longer focussed on the political community but on the individual. Finally, there was a loose, though not trivial, philosophical and religious framework, the Platonic orientation of which was pointing to the future.

Literary Technique

Several literary techniques merge in the novel: they derive from epic, historiography, short story, fairy tale, declamation, and drama. Sometimes the erotic novel is called δράμα, σύνταγμα δραματικόν, fabula, or mimus. As in comedy, a loving couple is in the center of interest, and the action takes place in a middle class ambience. The closeness to real life often conjured up by ancient theorists of comedy is even less true for the novel than for comedy, for the plots are often fanciful; they accumulate sensational events which, though not entirely inconceivable, would probably not occur in such concentration.

The serious Greek love novel exhibits some typical features which—partly transformed—are equally relevant for the humorous and ironical Latin novel: a loving couple of unswerving faithfulness and purity is separated by adverse circumstances, often owing to the wrath of a deity. Let us list some typical situations: sea storm, shipwreck, captivity, slavery, imminent loss of innocence felicitously averted at the last moment, danger of life, and even apparent death. In the end the lovers are happily reunited.

The narrative technique is modeled on historiography.<sup>1</sup> If the lovers are separated, the author pursues two parallel strands of action. Furthermore, he inserts short stories and excursuses. Narratives in the first person and stories within the story, though more typical of epic than of historiography, appear in later novels, especially Roman ones, for which, as a rule, the Odyssey is an authoritative literary model.

Individual scenes are reminiscent of tragedy and comedy: dialogues replace reports, monologues are a substitute for psychological analysis. Stock scenes of drama are frequent: initial expository dialogue, scenes of deception, of trial, and of recognition.

The technique of humorous novels is similar in many respects. There is the angry deity, the typical adventures of travellers and sailors, the standard scenes of drama.

However, we should not overlook the serious differences which warn us against exclusively deriving the Roman novel from Greek erotic novels. Given the absolute faithfulness of the separated lovers, idealistic love novels practically do not allow sexual scenes, which, on the contrary, are a permanent item in the repertoire of comic novels. Moreover it is open to question whether the relationship of Encolpius and Giton in Petronius was primarily conceived as a parody of romantic love. For sure, parodying a literary genre is not sufficient reason for writing a novel in Latin. Moreover, the links to Greek traditions like the Novel of Iolaus show that the humorous novel could already boast a lineage of its own.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. e.g. K. PLEPELITS in the introduction to his translation of Chariton, Stuttgart 1976, 10–11.

Language and Style

The two preserved great Latin novels differ considerably in language and style. In Petronius there is a plurality of linguistic levels: poetry, the narrator's urbane prose, and the vulgar jargon of the freedmen. In Apuleius an artfully rhymed prose prevails, in harmony with the tastes of the epoch of the 'second sophists'. His prose, if less precise and sober than that of Petronius and markedly artistic and playful, is more consistent. It is true that Apuleius often borders on poetic style, but he never lapses into verse. Occasionally, there is a touch of colloquial language but the naturalism of the dialogues of Petronius' freedmen is eschewed.

Later, a simplification of language can be observed, which sometimes verges on vulgarity. Yet compared to Petronius' sophisticated imitation of vulgar Latin, there is a difference of quality, since vulgarisms now are no longer intended as a caricature.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Petronius presents his work as novae simplicitatis opus, 'a work of fresh simplicity' (132). In the first place this refers to content, but to the principle of 'calling a spade a spade' there is not only a moral side but also a stylistic one. This rule converges with the grandis et pudica oratio, 'the great and modest style' (2) adored by Petronius' depraved rhetor Agamemnon.

Granted, Petronius uses the decadent poet Eumolpus as a mouth-piece to present some samples of poetry; nevertheless, they ought not to be regarded as examples of 'bad literature'. Former generations of scholars were right in considering him an auctor purissimae impuritatis, 'author of the purest impurity'. His Latin is always entirely adequate to his subject matter.

While Petronius has his heroes discuss the decline of oratory and—in the absence of chaste deeds—praise the chastity of words, Apuleius explicitly lays down in program the reader's entertainment and—in a deliberate understatement—sides with the fabula Milesia, that is to say, with literature of light reading. The literary claims of Petronius rest somewhat above the actual level of his style; those of Apuleius, clearly below: He does not reveal at the beginning that the story of the ass will gain deeper meaning in the end.

Ideas II

It is debated whether Petronius' work aims at mere entertainment or should be read as a satire. This antithesis is perhaps inadequate. An analysis of vocabulary as compared to content showed that Petronius criticizes the meaningless multiplication of almost unlimitedly available enjoyments. Without taking a teacher's attitude he indirectly suggests that he does know the advantages of wise restraint—if not in the field of morals, certainly in the domain of good taste. Nevertheless we should not make an Epicurean doctrinary out of him, and even less a Stoic, although he is familiar with the ideas of both schools. At the best he might be called an especially refined satirist who never offends his readers by revealing his intention.

For Apuleius the corresponding problem is posed in different terms: the body of the novel is so full of light entertainment that many readers deem the religious ending an unorganic and unconvincing addition. By way of a patient study of detail, scholars have evinced intimate connections between the main narrative and the ending; furthermore, they discovered convergencies of theme between the work as a whole and its parts, including the episodes. Therefore, an alternative one way or the other would be inadequate here. The 'autobiographical' novel, in addition, is modeled on reports of philosophical or religious conversions and is an important forerunner of Christian autobiography. Nevertheless it is most enjoyable reading. A strict separation of 'serious' and 'light' literature, once again, proves impracticable. What is best in both novels is owing to the personal talent of the authors, not to genre.

Petronius and Apuleius gave a new direction to the genre of novel, each of them in harmony with the tastes of his generation: Petronius did so in terms of social criticism. Apuleius, in terms of philosophy and religion. By doing so both of them indirectly outgrew the rather trivial perspective of the idealistic love novel,<sup>1</sup> partly by disillusion, partly by intensification. Yet, parody on this type of literature should not be considered the main purpose of the Roman authors; it is a by-product of their intentions which primarily sprang from their epochs and personalities.

---

<sup>1</sup> N. HOLZBERG 1986 stressed the 'compensating' function of idealistic novels during the Hellenistic period (e.g. 39). R. MERKELBACH 1962 established an all-too schematic relationship to mystery cults; however, there is no doubt that a personal striving for happiness and salvation—if in a secular sense—was a motive for writing such novels.

Bibl.: S. STEPHENS, J. WINKLER, Ancient Greek Novels. The Fragments, Princeton 1995. * Cf. the collection of articles edited by G. SCHMELING (below) and the monographs by T. HÄGG and N. HOLZBERG; R. JOHNE, in: H. KUCH, ed. (s. below) 198–230; important are the yearly Groningen Symposia on the Novel. S. also our chapters on Petronius and Apuleius.

G. ANDERSON, Ancient Fiction. The Novel in the Graeco-Roman World, London 1984. * F. M. FRÖHLKE, Petron. Struktur und Wirklichkeit. Bausteine zu einer Poetik des antiken Romans, Frankfurt 1977. * H. GÄRTNER, ed., Beiträge zum griechischen Liebesroman, Hildesheim 1984 (collection of articles). * G. GIANGRANDE, On the Origins of the Greek Romance. The Birth of a Literary Form, Eranos 60, 1962, 132–159. * T. HÄGG, The Novel in Antiquity, Oxford 1983. * R. HELM, Der antike Roman, Göttingen 2nd ed. 1956. * H. HOFMANN, ed., Latin Fiction, London 1997. * N. HOLZBERG, The Ancient Novel. An Introduction, London 1995. * K. KERÉNYI, Die griechisch-orientalische Romanliteratur in religionsgeschichtlicher Betrachtung (1927), Darmstadt 3rd ed. 1973. * H. KUCH, Gattungstheoretische Überlegungen zum antiken Roman, Philologus 129, 1985, 3–19. * H. KUCH, ed., Der antike Roman, Berlin 1989. * H. KUCH, Zur Gattungsgeschichte und Gattungstheorie des antiken Romans, Eikasmos 3, 1992, 223–233. * R. MERKELBACH, Roman und Mysterium in der Antike, München 1962. * C. W. MÜLLER, Der griechische Roman, in: E. VOGT, ed., Griechische Literatur (= Neues Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft. 2), Wiesbaden 1981, 377–412. * L. PEPE, Per una storia della narrativa latina, Napoli 2nd ed. 1967 (corr. and augm.). * B. E. PERRY, The Ancient Romances. A Literary-Historical Account of their Origins, Berkeley 1967. * E. ROHDE, Der griechische Roman und seine Vorläufer (1876), Darmstadt 5th ed. 1974. * G. SCHMELING, ed., The Novel in the Ancient World, Leiden 1996. * E. SCHWARTZ, Fünf Vorträge über den griechischen Roman, Berlin (1896) 2nd ed. 1943. * P. G. WALSH, *The Roman Novel. The Satyricon of Petronius and the Metamorphoses of Apuleius*, Cambridge 1970. * F. WEHRLI, Einheit und Vorgeschichte der griechisch-römischen Romanliteratur, MH 22, 1965, 133–154. * O. WEINREICH, Der griechische Liebesroman, Zürich 1962.

PETRONIUS

Life and Dates

The portrait of Petronius as drawn by Tacitus<sup>1</sup> (ann. 16. 18) is in harmony with the atmosphere of the novel: a master of savoir vivre,

<sup>1</sup> Petronius in Tacitus: E. MARMORALE 1948, 53–63 (with bibl.): his identification with the author of the Satyrica became the rule since J. J. Scaliger (1571).

knowing how to enjoy life in a sophisticated way, he was at Nero's court the greatest authority in matters of taste. Nevertheless, he was energetic as a consul and governor. Finally, he was suspected of conspiracy; when compelled to commit suicide, he did not resort to the consolations of philosophy, but joked with his friends, rewarding or punishing his subjects. He did not flatter the mighties of the world, and in the end eased his conscience by a detailed list of transgressions—not his, but those of the emperor. It is true that Tacitus does not mention his writings, but neither does he those of Seneca (ann. 15. 60–63). It fits into the portrait of his character that he smashed a precious dipper made of fluorite, lest Nero should get it (Plin. nat. 37. 20). If Petronius reproached extravagant Nero with 'petty and niggardly spirit' (Plut. mor. 60 e), we may believe the author of the novel capable of such irony. Less reliable are conclusions based on psychology of the subconscious: from passages like 26. 4–5 and 140. 11 it does not follow that the author was a voyeur, all the more so as it has been proved that in the relevant texts there is no question of voyeurism.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless the term 'voyeur' has enjoyed a triumphant progress in Petronian studies; it is referred—not particularly in good taste—to the the spectator's role of the artist.—The first name Titus (against the manuscripts of Tacitus) is supported by parallel evidence; if Arbiter, obviously, was only an epithet,<sup>2</sup> not an official cognomen, efforts to identify him with other known Petronii are not without prospect.<sup>3</sup>

External evidence, of course, has to be examined on the text. Does it date from the 1st, the 2nd, or the 3rd century? To some, the homage to 'Augustus' (60. 7) seems to belong to the Augustan era;<sup>4</sup> others ascribe the novel to the period of Domitian.<sup>5</sup> Even Niebuhr, who (discussing this so-called 'Petronian question') advocated a late date (2nd–3rd century) found followers.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Correct C. GILL, The Sexual Episodes in the Satyricon, CPh 68, 1973, 172–185 (against J. P. SULLIVAN).

<sup>2</sup> A. COLLIGNON 1892, 335.

<sup>3</sup> For Petronius' date: G. BAGNANI 1954; K. F. C. ROSE 1971; M. S. SMITH, Cena (commentary) 1975, 213–214; W. ECK, ZPE 42, 1981, 227–256, esp. 227–230 quotes a new document affixing to the consulate of P. Petronius Niger the date of July 62; as for the social background: J. BODEL 1984.

<sup>4</sup> G. C. GIARDINA, Augusto patri patriae feliciter (Petronio 60. 7), Maia 24, 1972, 67–68.

<sup>5</sup> G. PUZIS 1966 (bibl.).

<sup>6</sup> E. MARMORALE 1948, 315–323; after A.D. 180; id., Storia della letteratura latina, Napoli, 8th ed. 1954, 261 (A.D. 248).

To be sure, considerations of economic<sup>1</sup> history, if nothing else, suggest a date under Claudius: the freedman appears as a parvenu, even as wealth incarnate. Only in the 1st century A.D. is a nouveau riche of such social extraction, as depicted by Petronius, a striking novelty, worthy of literary attention. Similarly, Molière would describe the bourgeois gentilhomme at a moment when this social phenomenon was fresh enough to be attractive; the same is true of Arthur Landsberger's Raffke of 1924. Trimalchio made a fortune by selling Campanian wine; as early as in the second half of the 1st century this would no longer have been possible to such an extent, given the competition of Gaul and Spain in this branch, not to speak of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. As ship-owners, Trimalchio and Lichas are free entrepreneurs; in the 2nd century there were stricter forms of official control in this domain. The economy of latifundia (48. 3; 77. 3) is a favorite theme of contemporary authors;<sup>2</sup> the huge hosts of slaves mentioned in Petronius (53. 2) tell in favor of the 1st century as well, at the end of which they would be replaced, to a large extent, by the more profitable smallholders. Likewise, the master's power over life and death of his slaves (taken for granted in Petronius 53. 3) is indicative of the period before Hadrian (Hist. Aug. Hadr. 18. 7); the right to expose slaves to wild animals in the arena (implied elsewhere: 45. 8) reflects the situation before the lex Petronia de servis which probably dates from 61. Did the author of the novel propose this law? In fact, his attitude to the slave problem<sup>3</sup> is humane.

Moreover, there appear several literary themes typical of the 1st century A.D.: the decline of oratory (1–5), earlier deplored by Seneca the Elder and later by Quintilian and Tacitus; further, the criticism of the misuse of speech in scholastic declamation (closely following the great Augustan orator Cassius Severus: Sen. contr. 3 praef.); and, last but not least, the problem of the 'sublime' style (2. 6; 4. 3), handled by the anonymous Περὶ ὕψους (usually assigned to the 1st century A.D.) in a somewhat different way but with the same moral and esthetic severity. Like Petronius, he does not separate poetry from eloquence; in accordance with the tastes of the Neronian epoch he holds ingenium in high esteem.<sup>1</sup> The numerous parallels with Seneca<sup>2</sup> (though often commonplace) and, above all, the detailed criticism of Lucan (118), which makes sense only if directed against a young contemporary, bear the stamp of that epoch. The same is true for historical and biographical allusions to the eras of Claudius and Nero<sup>3</sup> which, though not always cogent, are too numerous to be a matter of chance; it was misleading, however, to identify the Satyrica as a kind of roman à clé with the list of Nero's transgressions mentioned by Tacitus. No less typical of the epoch is the dominant role of the sexual god Priapus, to whom, in the same century, the Carmina Priapea, paid homage.

<sup>1</sup> H. C. SCHNUR, The Economic background of the Satyricon, Latomus 18, 1959, 790–799; as for the character of the nouveau riche: C. STÖCKER 1969, 62–64; Aristot. rhet. 2. 16; Lucian, hist. conscr. 20; G. SCHMELING, Trimalchio's Menu and Wine List, CPh 65, 1970, 248–251; B. BALDWIN, Trimalchio's Corinthian Plate, CPh 68, 1973, 46–47; doubts concerning economic realism in: R. DUNCAN-JONES, The Economy of the Roman Empire, Cambridge 2nd ed. 1982, 238–248.

<sup>2</sup> Sen. epist. 87. 7; 89. 20; 90. 39; cf. Plin. nat. 18. 4. 19–21; Colum. 1 praef. 12–13; 1. 1. 18–20; 1. 7. 3.

<sup>3</sup> 71. 1; cf. Sen. dial. 7 (= vit. beat.). 24. 3; benef. 3. 18. 2; 3. 22. 3.

Consequently it is a reasonable guess that the action of the novel is roughly laid in the reign of Claudius (perhaps after Tiberius' reforms following the financial crisis of 33) and that the Satyrica was written in the sixties, not earlier than Lucan had published his first three books.<sup>4</sup>

Survey of the Work

The part of the work known to us to some degree includes, as far as we know, parts of books 14–16; hence, what we have is only a small portion of the original text.<sup>5</sup> The fragmentary state of preservation does not allow a complete reconstruction of the plot; but, since the scenes of action change frequently and each episode is relatively self-contained, this loss is perhaps less disturbing than it would be in a differently structured work.<sup>6</sup> For us there is a kaleidoscopic succession of shifting situations.

<sup>1</sup> The then fashionable catchword (cf. NORDEN, Kunstprosa 2, 892) is also found in Petron. 2. 4; 83. 9.

<sup>2</sup> A. COLLIGNON 1892, 291–303; K. F. C. ROSE 1971, 69–74; E. CIZEK, L'époque de Néron et ses controverses idéologiques, Leiden 1972, 408–409; J. P. SULLIVAN 1968, 465–466.

<sup>3</sup> G. BOISSIER, L'opposition sous les Césars, Paris 1875, chapter 5; K. F. C. ROSE 1971, 75–86; P. G. WALSH 1970, 244–247.

<sup>4</sup> K. F. C. ROSE 1971, 60–68; 87–94 (for A.D. 64–65). The effort to deny any reference to Lucan is no more than a theoretical experiment: P. A. GEORGE, Petronius and Lucan De Bello Civili, CQ 68, 1974, 119–133.

<sup>5</sup> M. BROŽEK 1968; H. VAN THIEL 1971, 21–24 (bibl.).

<sup>6</sup> T. SINKO, De famis et libidinis in fabula Petroniana momento, Eos 36, 1935, 385–412; V. CIAFFI, Struttura del Satyricon, Torino 1955; H. VAN THIEL 1971, 26–65 (bibl.).

1-11: In a small Greek town of Campania (Puteoli?)<sup>1</sup> the student Encolpius (the narrator of the novel) and Agamemnon, a teacher of rhetoric, discuss problems of rhetoric and education. Then Encolpius loses his way in search for his companion Ascyltus. He asks a greengrocer: 'Mother, do you know where I live?' 'Of course', she replies and leads him to a brothel. He flees and happens to meet the long-desired Ascyltus, but soon he begins to squabble with him over young Giton.

12-15: On the market the friends exchange stolen property for stolen property.

16-26. 6: In their lodging, nymphomaniac Quartilla<sup>2</sup> surprises them. To punish them for having disturbed previously the mysteries of Priapus she orders them off to extremely fatiguing orgies.

26. 7-78: On the third day they seize the opportunity of attending a banquet given by nouveau-riche Trimalchio, a freedman, together with Agamemnon. The description of this feast occupies a considerable part of the preserved text. It ends in a mock burial of the host.<sup>3</sup>

79-82: Soon, however, jealousy breaks up afresh between Ascyltus and Encolpius. Giton is compelled to make his choice and decides in favor of Ascyltus. Poor abandoned Encolpius shuts himself up in his room for three days.<sup>4</sup> Then, he goes out into the road, armed to the teeth, to murder his rival; actually, however, to be disarmed by a soldier—to his own relief.

83-99: In a gallery of paintings Encolpius meets Eumolpus, a decadent poet who tells him many things: his love-story with a pupil in Pergamon, a highly moral philippic against the decadence of the art of painting, and a poem on the fall of Troy, the recitation of which the listeners bring to a stop by a shower of stones. Encolpius invites the poet to dinner under the condition that he should not recite any verse that day—an ironic reversal of the habit of rewarding rhapsodes and story-tellers with a meal. In the meantime Encolpius discovers his beloved Giton in the baths and carries him away to his accommodation. Yet by the dinner, Eumolpus begins to court Giton and, contrary to the agreement, to speak in verse. Encolpius reminds him of his promise; Giton, however, sides with the poet. For fear of a conflict Giton runs away, followed by Eumolpus who locks the door from outside. Poor Encolpius is about to hang himself, when the both enter anew to act, on their part, a scene of suicide: Giton to this end uses a

<sup>1</sup> A. DAVIAULT, La destination d'Encolpe et la structure du Satiricon. Conjectures, CEA 15, 1983, 29-46; F. SBORDONE, Contributo epigrafico e onomastico alla questione petroniana, in: La regione sotterrata dal Vesuvio—Studi e prospettive, Atti del Convegno internazionale, 11-15 novembre 1979, Napoli 1982, 255-264; cf. also J. BODEL 1984.

<sup>2</sup> A. ARAGOSTA, Petronio: L'episodio di Quartilla (Satyr. 16-26. 6), Bologna 1988.

<sup>3</sup> Seneca (epist. 12. 8) reports a similar story of a certain Pacuvius.

<sup>4</sup> H. VAN THIEL 1971, 37 places 81. 1-2 only after 82. 6 (less convincing psychologically).

(blunt) razor (94). At this moment, the host appears with whom the poet engages in a mêlée, while Encolpius takes his chance and shuts himself up with Giton. In search for the latter, Ascyltus enters the room, without finding the boy who hides under the bed. Eumolpus, Encolpius, and Giton are reconciled and set out for a voyage together.

100–115: Overhearing a conversation, Encolpius understands that he is on the ship of his former enemy, Lichas of Tarentum. Eumolpus disguises him and Giton as convicts; a passenger observes them. Lichas and Tryphaena, his companion, who had been in love with Giton for a long time, dream at the same time that the latter and Encolpius are on board. The informant betrays them, and they are punished. Tryphaena and her servants recognize Giton's voice, whereas Lichas in his turn identifies Encolpius by a physical distinguishing mark. There follows a scene of trial with two highly finished pleas of Eumolpus framing a harsh retort of Lichas. Soon, however, the adversaries come to grips and, as in an epic or in a book of history, a battle scene is followed by a truce and a treaty. Eumolpus embellishes the peace celebrations by reciting two poetic dirges in honor of Giton's hair and telling the story of the widow of Ephesus (111–112). Meanwhile a storm breaks out, which sweeps the captain from board. While Tryphaena hides herself in the life boat, Encolpius and Giton embrace each other waiting for death by drowning. Plundering fishermen become their life-savers; at the last moment Eumolpus is discovered in the cabin writing poetry, and is indignant at being disturbed. The next day Lichas' corpse is washed ashore, and his enemies are pleased indeed (cf. libenter) to bury him—not without an edifying rhetorical meditation of Encolpius.

116–141: The friends are told by a manager of an estate that the nearby city of Croton is populated with legacy-hunters. Thereupon Eumolpus pretends to be a childless rich man while the two others figure as his slaves. While walking to the town the poet discourses upon historical epic (118) and recites 295 lines on the civil war (119–124). The swindlers have an easy life; a distinguished lady called Circe<sup>1</sup> falls in love with Encolpius the 'slave'; and Priapus' wrath plays a mean trick on him (or is it Circe's<sup>2</sup> emasculating magic?). To restore his virility he undergoes rather tiresome cures with several witches; true help, however, like in the Odyssey, comes from Mercury (140. 12). Eumolpus is much happier in love: a noble lady, from motives of self-interest, personally brings her two adolescent children to his home (140). At the end of the preserved text Eumolpus bequeathes his properties to the legacy-hunters under the condition that they eat his corpse.

<sup>1</sup> A reconstruction of this passage: H. VAN THIEL 1971, 51–61.

<sup>2</sup> K. MÜLLER, W. EHLERS, edition 439; W. B. STANFORD, The Ulysses Theme, Oxford 1954; B. PAETZ, Kirke und Odysseus—Überlieferung und Deutung von Homer bis Calderón, Berlin 1970; F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977, 17–36 (bibl.); D. BLICKMANN, The Romance of Encolpius and Circe, A&R n.s. 33, 1988, 7–16.

Further fragments which do not fit into the context known to us were preserved partly owing to grammatical peculiarities, partly for their poetic merits. There are many points that remain unclear: what is Encolpius' relationship to Massilia?<sup>1</sup> Do expressions like 'murderer' or 'gladiator' allude to previous events or are they only terms of abuse?<sup>2</sup> We know too little about Doris, the love of Encolpius' life (126. 18); this very motif does not allow us to reduce the entire novel to the homosexual relationship to Giton. It would be too narrow an interpretation to use the latter as a psychoanalytical explanation of Encolpius' impotence with Circe or to postulate (by way of a reconstruction of literary history) that the homosexual relationship is a parody of bridal love in the Greek novel.

Sources, Models, und Genres

The generic character of the work is open to multiple interpretations.<sup>3</sup> As it is a narrative of (mostly erotic) adventures of everyday people it may justly be called a 'novel', although this term does not have classical roots and the genre, though existing in classical antiquity, was not based on an explicit theory. Still, we have a description of the genre by Macrobius: argumenta fictis casibus amatorum referta, quibus vel multum se Arbiter exercuit vel Apuleium nonnumquam luisse miramur, 'the narratives replete with imaginary doings of lovers in which Petronius Arbiter so freely indulged and with which Apuleius, astonishingly, sometimes amused himself' (somn. 1. 2. 8). For him, Petronius is the typical representative of novel as Menander is of comedy. The subjects of novels as well as of Menandrian comedies are invented by their authors (quite unlike the mythical or historical plots of epic and tragedy). Fictis casibus: within Latin literature, Petronius is the typical representative of 'fiction', today surely the most influential literary genre. If only for this reason he deserves our attention. Petronius' work is comparable to comedy for its erotic subject matter, its fictional plot, and its exclusive use of indirect character portrayal (the latter being a feature distinguishing Petronius from many modern novels). No less instructive is the parallel with Apuleius drawn by Macrobius. Apuleius calls the genre 'Milesian Tales', expressly emphasizing his intention to entertain the reader (though belying it by his religious finale). For Macrobius, likewise, novels have the function tantum conciliandae aurium voluptatis, 'merely to gratify the ear'.

<sup>1</sup> CICHORIUS, Studien 438–442; against: R. WALTZ, Le lieu et la scène dans le Satyricon, RPh 36, 1912, 209–212.

<sup>2</sup> D. D. MULROY, Petronius 81. 3, CPh 65, 1970, 254–256.

<sup>3</sup> G. SCHMELING, The Satyricon. Forms in Search of a Genre, CB 47, 1971, 49–53; multiplicity of genres is not identical with lack of orientation: rightly F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977, 131 against F. I. ZEITLIN 1971, 645.

By Latinizing the Milesiaca of Aristides of Miletus (about 100 B.C.), Cornelius Sisenna (d. 67 B.C.) introduced this genre into Roman literature. This favorite reading of the Roman soldiers who died in the battle of Carrhae consisted of short stories of which some Petronian passages convey a lively impression: examples are stories within the story such as the widow of Ephesus (111–112)<sup>1</sup> and the adolescent of Pergamum (85–87) or episodes easily detachable from their contexts like the matron of Croton (140). This genre, which would be revived by Boccaccio in his Decameron is focussed on concise, witty, and coherent isolated narratives of more or less timeless character; a framing story can be dispensed with; if used at all, it is an external link establishing some coherence.<sup>2</sup> In Petronius, however, the adventures of the leading characters are of primary importance. Moreover, the strictly functional structure of the short stories sets a limit to realistic detail. Accordingly, there is a contrast between the concise and brilliant style of the inserted stories and the colorfulness of the main narrative. As a result, the closeness of the Satyrica to the Milesiae<sup>3</sup> is an undeniable fact and an important partial truth, but does not suffice to explain the work as a whole, all the more as we do not know if Sisenna blended prose and verse and inserted his short stories into a continuous principal plot.

There is no perfect parallel to Petronius' work; however, the recently discovered fragments of a Greek Novel of Iolaus<sup>4</sup> offer significant remains

<sup>1</sup> E. GRISEBACH, Die Wanderung der Novelle Von der treulosen Witwe durch die Weltliteratur, Berlin 1886, 2nd ed. 1889; O. PECERE, Petronio. La novella della matrona di Efeso, Padova 1975; C. W. MÜLLER, Die Witwe von Ephesos. Petrons Novelle und die Milesiaka des Aristides, A&A 26, 1980, 103–121; F. BÖMER, Die Witwe von Ephesus, Petron 111, 1 ff. und die 877. von Tausendundeiner Nacht, Gymnasium 93, 1986, 138–140; L. CICU, La matrona di Efeso di Petronio, SIFC 79, 1986, 249–271.

<sup>2</sup> M. BROŽEK, 1968, 66 postulates a continuous narrative for Sisenna since there are no headings (of the Varronian type) and since Sisenna's work was subdivided into books. But, perhaps, Sisenna's stories were too short and too numerous to be quoted otherwise than by books.

<sup>3</sup> NORDEN, LG 89–90.

<sup>4</sup> P. PARSONS, A Greek Satyricon?, BICS 18, 1971, 53–68; R. MERKELBACH, Aufforderung zur Beichte, ZPE 11, 1973, 81–100.

of a partly obscene text mingling prose and verse. The serious Greek love novels—to be clearly distinguished from the Milesiaca—of course possessed a continuous plot. Petronius shows that he has command of the narrative techniques developed there, as is particularly evinced in stirring or sentimental scenes like the attempted suicide (94) or the lovers' readiness to die together in the sea (114. 8–12). Yet, with our Roman author, sublimity takes a ridiculous turn; a somewhat overstrained earnestness is replaced with humor and 'realism'. Virtuous love proved true by hard trials gives way to rather outspoken licentiousness. Encolpius' attachment to Giton is not immediately comparable to the firm and exclusive erotic and marital relationships of Greek novels; the differences are so considerable that not even a parody is plausible.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, we mentioned that Encolpius was seriously in love with a woman from whom he was separated; here, however, where the closeness to Greek love novels is felt most strongly, our tradition fails us.

Our novelist is no less familiar with more sublime forms of narrative—epic and history—than he is with tragedy (cf. 80. 3). His parodies of battles (108–109; 134–136) find parallels in novels, history, and epic. The greater the discrepancy of level in style or content, the more effective is the parody: Ascyllus when assaulting young Giton says: Si Lucretia es, Tarquinius invenisti, 'if you are a Lucretia, you have found your Tarquin' (9. 5); the Odyssey (97. 4–5; 132) and the Aeneid<sup>2</sup> are omnipresent, though without pedantry.<sup>3</sup> The wrath of Poseidon or of Juno is replaced with the anger of Priapus,<sup>4</sup> although this motif is not to be sought behind each event (no more than in the Odyssey).<sup>5</sup> Just as Ulysses is recognized by his scar, Encolpius is by the shape of a male member (105. 9–10); with the latter he elsewhere engages in a fruitless conversation like Aeneas had done with the dead Dido (132. 11). For all its travesty, this is also an indirect declaration of love to the great authors and certainly evidence of a deeply rooted trust in their indestructibility. Both familiar in form and unfamiliar in content, allusions to sublime literature have a function resembling that of some inserted poems: they enhance the illusion of the dreamy

<sup>1</sup> A different view in R. HEINZE 1899.

<sup>2</sup> 39. 3; 111. 12; 112. 2.

<sup>3</sup> M. H. McDERMOTT, The Satyricon as a Parody of the Odyssey and Greek Romance, LCM 8, 1983, 82–85.

<sup>4</sup> Reservations in B. BALDWIN, Ira Priapi, CPh 68, 1973, 294–296.

<sup>5</sup> KROLL, Studien 224.

actor Encolpius to the point of dispersing it. What is more: the archetypal characters and scenes from epic, tragedy, and history help to raise the narrated events to the level of general validity; given the triviality of the subject matter, this is one of the most important artistic functions. In his Ulysses, Joyce would systematically exploit the method used incidentally by Petronius: conjuring up great models to emphasize the artificial and 'theatrical' character of his narrative and to relate transitory actions to an immovable background.

The literature on symposia<sup>1</sup> furnishes an important structural pattern for the Cena: this is true not only for peripeteiai like the accident in 54 (cf. Hor. sat. 2. 8) or the entry of a late unbidden guest (cf. Plat. symp. 212 D–213 A) but also for the intellectual pretensions of the genre (oportet et inter cenam philologiam nosse, 'one must not forget one's classical culture even at dinner', 39. 3), which reveal Trimalchio's ignorance (cf. his remarks on astrology, mythology, history, literature, his deplorable verse and the vulgar stories within the story). Many of these passages (and others like 128. 7) become even more vivid when read against the background of Plato's Symposium—though we should exclude any intention of mocking Plato. Petronius' Cena is, as it were, an anti-symposium.

There are also parodies of ritual: witness the marriage of children, the 'revelation' of Oenothea (134. 12) with its reminiscences of aretalogies, and Encolpius' prayer to Priapus.<sup>2</sup> We will come back to the literary function of religious formulas in unreligious epochs.

The title Satyricon<sup>3</sup> (scil. libri, hence, the nominative is Satyrica) means

<sup>1</sup> J. MARTIN, Symposion. Die Geschichte einer literarischen Form, Paderborn 1931; J. RÉVAY, Horaz und Petron, CPh 17, 1922, 202–212; L. R. SHERO, The Cena in Roman Satire, CPh 18, 1923, 126–143; A. CAMERON, Petronius and Plato, CQ 63, 1969, 367–370; R. DIMUNDO, Da Socrate a Eumolpo. Degradazione dei personaggi e delle funzioni nella novella del fanciullo di Pergamo, MD 10–11, 1983, 255–265; cf. also G. SOMMARIVA, Eumolpo, un Socrate epicureo nel Satyricon, ASNP 14, 1984, 25–58.

<sup>2</sup> O. WEINREICH, Gebet und Wunder, in: Genethliakon W. SCHMID, Stuttgart 1929, 169–464, esp. 396–397; H. KLEINKNECHT, Die Gebetsparodie in der Antike, Stuttgart 1937, 190; R. MERKELBACH, Roman und Mysterium in der Antike, München 1962, 128, n. 2; 80, n. 2; J.-P. CÈBE, La caricature et la parodie dans le monde romain antique des origines à Juvénal, Paris 1966, 280–282; O. RAITH, Unschuldsbeteuerung und Sündenbekenntnis im Gebet des Enkolp an Priap (Petron 133. 3), StudClas 13, 1971, 109–125.

<sup>3</sup> Of course, a Greek genitive plural. Satiricon (which is the reading of the oldest manuscript B, defended by E. MARMORALE 1948, 30–31) would be a hybrid ('macaronic') form; KROLL (Studien 224, n. 46) refers the title to the 'varied content'.

'picaresque stories'. Apart from the fragments of the Novel of Iolaus, Petronius is, for us, the first representative of a humorous and realistic novel on society and manners. Possible Greek parallels like the 'ass novel' Lucius are much less concerned with the details of daily life than is Petronius. A comparable genre, satire, was created in Rome.

Petronius reveals the limits of so-called 'realism' in antiquity. One borderline was not transcended by the ancients: unlike the figures in Balzac's novels, for instance, characters depicted realistically were not supposed to arouse tragic compassion. Comedy and satire (genres admitting of humor and irony) had accepted everyday life and average persons (or below average) as subjects of literature. There had also been samples of uneducated speech in literary texts: in Aristophanes' Acharnians and Lysistrata the people of Megara and Sparta use their respective dialects, and the women in Theocritus' 15th Idyll speak 'broad' and homely Doric; neither of these authors, however, went as far as Petronius. He himself repeatedly refers to an even lower level of texts: the mime (e.g. 19. 1; 117. 4). Part of the repertoire of this genre is, for example, a genteel lady's love for a slave (e.g. 126. 5-11) with its typical mixture of sex and power; the same is true of allusions to processes of digestion (47. 2; 102. 10; 117. 12). More than elsewhere, however, we should beware of mechanistic theories concerning Petronius' sources: his main stimulus may have been the observation of life, though individual features were taken from love elegy (as in the Circe story) or epigram (109 on bald heads).

At best, the mime supplied categories for a stylized representation of events, and even this only within the margin left by the difference between dramatic and narrative literature. Did Petronius shape material congenial to the mime into the form of a novel? Even this statement has to be qualified. Strictly speaking, the form adopted by Petronius is not quite usual for a novel: it is a mixture of prose and verse. Yet such elements are found in some older Greek novels: in Chariton (1st or 2nd century); Xenophon of Ephesus (probably 2nd century); for the rest, this fact speaks in favor of a date before the second Greek sophistic movement.

Above all, inserted poems are a characteristic of the Menippean Satire, which had been assimilated by Varro (d. 27 B.C.) into Latin literature. He had combined Ennian satura with the dialogues of Menippus the Cynic of Gadara. We do not know if he had already mingled prose and verse, but this form enjoys large popularity in many regions (cf. the Pañcatantra, an Indian collection of fairy-tales). In fact, there are many connections between Varro and Petronius:<sup>1</sup> both use popular expressions, both insert passages written in the manner of certain poets and parody epic and tragic style; as far as content is concerned, this is true of the identification of the vagrant with Ulysses (cf. Varro's Sesculixes, 'One and a half Ulysses'). Menippean Satire is the right place for different genres to meet.

Here Petronius doubtless adheres to a Roman tradition; but he differs from Varro in three respects: first, the Menippeae were no long and continuous novel; second, their typical feature had been the use of unreal and fantastic plots as means of social criticism (examples are a trip to the moon or a man's awakening from a sleep of one hundred years), whereas Petronius strives throughout for a plausible (if adventurous) plot, discarding (unlike the so-called travel fabulists) all miraculous and fanciful elements. Third, Petronius (in contradistinction to Varro) mostly shrinks from overtly passing moral verdicts. Finally, he is not concerned with interesting his public in philosophy and scholarship.

With Roman satire,<sup>2</sup> Petronius, on the one hand, has many themes in common—such as the nouveau riche's banquet (cf. Hor. sat. 2. 8), or legacy-hunting (cf. Hor. sat. 2. 5).<sup>3</sup> On the other hand, he deviates from it: in fact, satire, according to Hegel, needs 'solid principles'.<sup>4</sup> Unlike Roman satirists, Petronius almost never expressly criticizes the facts he describes and avoids philosophical moralizing.

<sup>1</sup> P. G. WALSH 1970, 19–24; R. ASTBURY, the editor of Varro (Saturarum Menippearum fragmenta, Lipsiae 1985), argues strenuously that the Satyricon is not Varroian Menippean satire (Petronius, P. Oxy 3010, and Menippean Satire, CPh 72, 1977, 22–31).

<sup>2</sup> In favor of a satirical intention: E. COCCHIA, La satira e la parodia nel Satyricon di Petronio Arbitro, Napoli 1897, repr. 1982; E. MARMORALE 1948, 27; N. HOLZBERG 1986, 73–86; 134 (bibl.); in favor of mere entertainment: J. P. SULLIVAN 1968; P. G. WALSH 1970; balanced A. COLLIGNON 1892, 14; on the combination of immorality and satire: G. SANDY, Satire in the Satyricon, AJPh 90, 1969, 293–303; cf. also J. P. SULLIVAN, Satire and Realism in Petronius, in: J. P. SULLIVAN, ed., Critical Essays on Roman Literature 2, Satire, London 1963, 73–92.

<sup>3</sup> On this: M. T. RODRÍGUEZ, La presenza di Orazio nella Cena Trimalchionis, AAPel 57, 1981, 267–280; on his models in general: R. BECK, The Satyricon, Satire, Narrator, and Antecedents, MH 39, 1982, 206–214.

<sup>4</sup> Vorlesungen über die Aesthetik, 2. 2. 3. 3 c (= Jubiläumsausgabe, ed. H. GLOCKNER, vol. 13, Stuttgart, 4th ed. 1964, 118).

Literary Technique

Petronius' character portrayal follows the traditions of Roman satire as well as of Greek theory (from the sophists to Plato, Aristotle, Theophrastus and Philodemus).<sup>1</sup> Moreover he is aware of the practice of New Comedy<sup>2</sup> and historiography. Frequently, however, he draws on real life. He prefers indirect to direct portrayal. Instead of giving a long-winded presentation of his characters, he has them in the manner of comedy manifest themselves by their actions or, in the way of historiography, by speeches. Thus, his characters reveal themselves or we see them through the eyes of their partners.

The most complex problem is posed by the figure of the narrator, Encolpius, who is speaking in the first person. His character is an intriguing mixture of naïve adherence to his own illusions and of an intellectual's superiority. It is tempting to ascribe the illusion to Encolpius the participant in the action and the intellectual aloofness mainly to Encolpius the narrator who, thanks to his knowledge of the plot, holds an edge over his former ego.<sup>3</sup> The complexity of Encolpius' personality is enhanced by the fact that he reacts to a great variety of diverse circumstances, in different ways. As the unity of the novel is essentially based on the figure of the narrator,<sup>4</sup> it is an urgent question whether this unity is merely superficial. To put it differently: is the fickle and metamorphic character of Encolpius only a mechanical product of the variety of scenes and actions? Or is it, rather, the intention of Petronius to demonstrate graphically, by means of the greatest possible variety of vicissitudes, how consistent he is in his inconsistency? The real achievement of Petronius is essentially linked to his invention of this unique character—a significant discovery of Richard Heinze<sup>5</sup> which, however, the great scholar himself strangely attenuated by terming Encolpius an 'average scoundrel'. Encolpius is a powerless intellectual, reacting rather than acting, a modern variety

<sup>1</sup> H. D. RANKIN, Some Comments on Petronius' Portrayal of Character, Eranos 69, 1970, 123–147; cf. also O. RAITH 1963, esp. 20–27.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. D. GAGLIARDI, Petronio e Plauto (in margine a sat. 130. 1–6), MD 6, 1981, 189–192.

<sup>3</sup> R. BECK, Some Observations on the Narrative Technique of Petronius, Phoenix 27, 1973, 42–61. On the author's fictitious inspiration: G. SCHMELING, The Authority of the Author. From Muse to Aesthetics, MCSN 3, 1981, 369–377.

<sup>4</sup> G. SCHMELING 1994–1995.

<sup>5</sup> R. HEINZE 1899, 506, n. 1.

of the 'suffering hero' of many a fairy tale,<sup>1</sup> also comparable to Ulysses, though without his unconditioned determination to return home. In principle, he is free from the bourgeois slavery of hunting for wealth and status, though with some bad conscience: quam male est extra legem viventibus: quicquid meruerunt, semper expectant, 'the outlaw has a hard life; he must always expect to get what he deserves' (125. 4). In spite of his lack of moral prejudice he is not a cynical dandy. He is extremely receptive, not having lost a child's capabilities of marveling—and loving; as he is given to indulge in dreams, disappointments are inevitable. Many a poetic interlude and many an allusion to lofty literary genres gives exalted expression to his illusions about himself or others; once his dream ended in a dull awakening, prose comes into its own again.

Although the entire novel is focused on this figure, the others are not reduced to mere stereotypes or caricatures. Trimalchio, for instance, did not spring from a determined chapter of a handbook on characters in the wake of Theophrastus, nor are his features standardized; it is a sophisticated study, combining contradictory qualities into a live unity, which Petronius sets before our eyes not without an artist's complacency. Inscriptions of freedmen, both by their language and their content, prove that this portrait was painted from life.<sup>2</sup> Trimalchio's circle is a clearly defined and solid social network; consequently, Trimalchio deems himself at the center of the world; in fact, he is the central figure of the microcosm of the Cena. That epoch was, indeed, the heyday of people like Trimalchio. Was there really nothing but hate of the milieu of freedmen at the bottom of this gallery of brilliant individual portraits—up to a naturalistic rendering of individual peculiarities of pronunciation?

Nor are the intellectuals depicted according to pattern. Take Eumolpus: an attractive mixture of absent-mindedness and calculation, a poet's ignorance of the world and an artful dodger's knowledge of human nature, enthusiasm and charlatanism, he is both a mad poet and hypocrisy incarnate, a quality he had revealed already in the story of the youth of Pergamum.<sup>3</sup> He unites the functions of 'helper'<sup>1</sup> and 'rival'. In his lack of illusions he is closer to the type of pizaro than Encolpius is.<sup>2</sup> Not inferior is the histrionic talent of pretty-faced Giton, who acts as femme fatale and with a female's cunning outwits his lover Encolpius. There are two sides to the rhetor Agamemnon as well: he teaches to despise the banquets of the rich, while gladly cadging their invitations.

<sup>1</sup> V. PROPP, Morphology of the Folktale, transl. by L. SCOTT, 2nd ed., rev. and ed. with a pref. by L. A. WAGNER, Austin, Texas 1968, 50.

<sup>2</sup> E. DOBROIU, Pour une édition du Satiricon, StudClas 10, 1968, 159–170, especially on 43. 6; CIL 6. 2. pp. 994–995.

<sup>3</sup> R. DIMUNDO, La novella del fanciullo di Pergamo. Strutture narrative e tecnica del racconto, AFLB 25–26, 1982–1983, 133–178; cf. id., La novella dell'Efebo di Pergamo. Struttura del racconto, MCSN 4, 1986, 83–94.

While the two male protagonists, Encolpius and Giton, do not give a particularly manly performance, the women, except for Fortunata and Scintilla, are not wanting in aggressiveness, even in matters of sex. As Trimalchio may be called a symbol of his epoch, so may the emancipated women and servile men of the novel. The reader is reminded of the petticoat government at the court of Claudius. Ironically, in the end, Eumolpus, fool and poet, is the only one able to play the part of a free man.

Descriptions of objects are not an aim in itself. Often behind the 'realism' of Petronius there are lurking literary clichés, such as those of books on symposia and the ancients' habit of showing everyday life prevalently in humorous distortion. Nevertheless our author takes an interest in reality (as Roman landscape painters do not disdain to observe nature);<sup>3</sup> above all, he wants to portray people, and doing so he succeeds in drawing sketches recalling Roman portrait-heads. The fact that he included descriptions of pictures into his narrative (83; 89) does not compel us to date the composition of the novel in the period of the second sophistic movement; evidently, such descriptive passages had existed much earlier.<sup>4</sup> They are referring to determined persons and situations: the discrepancy between claim and reality appears graphically from the 'composition' of Trimalchio's murals: 'Iliad and Odyssey and the gladiatorial game of Laenas' (29. 9). The paintings looked at by Encolpius are thematically related to his unhappy love for Giton, an interpretation given by the narrator himself (83. 4-6). Mythological elements help build up illusions; Petronius' view of their function is not much different from Martial's (10. 4) and Juvenal's (1. 1-14). Religion<sup>5</sup> had paled into magic or literature.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. F. WEHRLI 1965, esp. 138; on Eumolpus F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977, 61-110, esp. 104-106; R. BECK 1979.

<sup>2</sup> F. I. ZEITLIN 1971; G. SCHMELING 1994.

<sup>3</sup> H. HERTER, Bacchus am Vesuv, RhM 100, 1957, 101-114.

<sup>4</sup> On the history of descriptions in literature: P. FRIEDLÄNDER, Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius, Leipzig 1912; on descriptions in Petronius: F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977, 71-85.

<sup>5</sup> M. GRONDONA, La religione e la superstizione nella Cena Trimalchionis, Bruxelles

Elements of folklore—proverbs, sayings, customs, ghost stories—add to the attractiveness of the work.<sup>1</sup>

The technique of stories within the story is as old as that of first-person-narrative. They are found in epic, dialogue, and travel novel: Antonius Diogenes in his Marvels Beyond Thule made use of the framing technique.<sup>2</sup> Interpolated narratives are frequently used to embellish banquets (61–63; 111–112) or to while away long walks (118–124). Petronius establishes relationships between the main action and the story within the story; thus, the inserted narratives serve to characterize the speaker: as early as in his story of the Pergamene adolescent, Eumolpus introduces himself as a hypocrite; at the same time the content is meant to console the love-sick Encolpius. The popular stories on lycanthropy and striges are indicative of the modest intellectual level of the speakers.

Artful composition of longer narrative units can be studied e.g. in the voyage episode: there is unity of scene of action, and the plot is divided into distinct sections. A long, overarching context holds the reader in suspense up to the scene of reconciliation; after this, there is a sequence of separate scenes. Petronius strives for variety even in his narrative technique.<sup>3</sup>

The subtle quality of his narrative art is evinced in some details of the Cena: The entry of the funeral sculptor Habinnas and the broad development of the death motif (71. 3–72. 3; 78. 5) prepare the end of the feast; the continuous theme of the transience of life is broached from the very beginning: telling symbols are the trumpet-player and—almost surprising in antiquity—the clock.

Examples of rhetorical skill are Encolpius' declamation when faced with the body of Lichas and Eumolpus' speeches in the defence of his protégés. Those who deem such rhetoric chilly may consider the lively interest of 'sport fans' with which the Roman public fol-

---

1980; T. PINNA, Magia e religione nella Cena Trimalchionis, Studi di filosofia e di storia della cultura, pubbl. dall'Istituto di filosofia della Fac. di lett. dell'Univ. di Cagliari 1978, 449–500.

<sup>1</sup> H. JACOBSON, A Note on Petronius, sat. 31. 2, CPh 66, 1971, 183–186; M. HADAS, Oriental Elements in Petronius, AJPh 50, 1929, 378–385; J. B. BAUER, Semitisches bei Petron, in: FS R. MUTH, Innsbruck 1983, 17–23; elements of fairy-tale in Petronius: C. STÖCKER 1969, 77–88.

<sup>2</sup> G. N. SANDY, Petronius and the Tradition of the Interpolated Narrative, TAPhA 101, 1970, 463–476 (bibl.); on the fantastic element: S. ROMM, The Edge of the Earth in Ancient Thought: Geography, Exploration, and Fiction, Princeton 1992.

<sup>3</sup> F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977, 37–60.

lowed each detail of argument and phrasing. For his century Petronius used rhetoric rather sparingly and limited it to passages where it was functional.

Language and Style

In his use of language and style Petronius makes subtle distinctions. The highest level is poetic, the lowest vulgar. With their vulgar Latin tinge, the conversations of the half-educated freedmen are an El Dorado for linguists;<sup>1</sup> here, typical features of the Romance languages can be observed in nascent state: examples are the decrease of the neuter gender (vinus and fatus for vinum and fatum) or the decline of the deponent verbs. Yet we should not shut our eyes to the fact that even these passages are shaped artistically. They are not 'tape-recordings' from which the dialect of a definite town or social stratum can be reconstructed but an artful choice and 'collage' of 'vulgar' expressions; Petronius may have heard them when accompanying Nero on his nocturnal incognito trips through Rome (Suet. Nero 26. 2). Incidentally, these passages are not sufficient reason for assigning the Satyrica a late date, since the noted linguistic peculiarities are less chronological than sociological evidence.

A contrasting linguistic level is the cultivated language of the upper classes. The narrator speaks pure Latin and uses the proper words. The unobtrusive elegance (elegantia) of upper class speech dominates the whole work. Petronius' narrative prose combines an objectivity reminiscent of Caesar—and even of medical authors—with an urbane grace. There is no awkwardness in its clarity and its lightness is never vague.

The plurality of linguistic levels is exploited artistically to produce ironical effects: at the transition from poetry to prose there is a clash between illusion and reality; the change from vulgar to urbane speech reveals the contrast between different levels of culture. Whoever misses obtrusive moralizing may discover in Petronius' style a clue to his intellectual honesty and his self-discipline as an author.

---

<sup>1</sup> A. MARBACH, Wortbildung, Wortwahl und Wortbedeutung als Mittel der Charakterzeichnung bei Petron, diss. Gießen 1931; J. FEIX, Wortstellung und Satzbau in Petrons Roman, diss. Breslau 1933, publ. 1934; A. STEFANELLI, Die Volkssprache im Werk des Petron im Hinblick auf die romanischen Sprachen, Wien 1962; VON ALBRECHT, Prose 125–135; H. PETERSMANN 1977 (fundamental); juridic Latin in Petronius: A. COLLIGNON 1892, 354 (with n. 1); B. BOYCE, The Language of the Freedmen in Petronius' Cena Trimalchionis, Leiden 1991.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Therefore, we may take Petronius at his word when he speaks of seriously studying the classics for many years (esp. Homer, Demosthenes, Cicero, Virgil, and Horace), of the grandis et . . . pudica oratio, 'the great and incorrupt style' (2. 6) and of the nova simplicitas,<sup>1</sup> 'fresh simplicity'. The latter principle of not mincing one's words extends to both aesthetics and ethics: sermonis puri non tristis gratia ridet, 'a cheerful grace laughs through pure speech' (132. 15).

Yet it would be premature to label him as a 'classicist'; the Augustan rhetor Cassius Severus (Sen. contr. 3 praef.) who had used almost the same words had been the recognized leader of the 'moderns' (while sincerely admiring Cicero). Petronius appreciates ingenium (2. 4), not industry alone. He need not adhere to the tastes of one party or another; he simply has taste.

Is there a contradiction between his use of vulgar expressions and his theoretical advice to avoid them? The latter (118. 4), however, refers to epic, not novel. The fact that the 'dirge' for Lichas (115. 12-19) is crowded with aphorisms, shows that Petronius, for once, was tempted to try his hand at the fashionable modern style. Appropriateness is the supreme law for him. The parts written in sermo urbanus observe the principles of prose rhythm, whereas the vulgar passages do not.<sup>2</sup> In a polymorphous work each episode requires its own style; as James Joyce writes in a letter, 'each adventure (that is, every hour, every organ, every art being interconnected and inter-related in the structural scheme of the whole) should not only condition but even create its own technique'.<sup>3</sup> This is ever the main incentive for the writer. The unity of the work does not rest on mechanical devices or techniques which may change but on the author's 'handwriting'. His sense of purum and proprium stands its ground

---

<sup>1</sup> Different interpretations of simplicitas in E. MARMORALE 1948, chapter IV; A. M. FERRERO, La simplicitas nell'età giulio-claudia, AAT 114, 1980, 127-154; on Petronius' poetics: F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977 passim; M. COCCIA, Novae simplicitatis opus (Petronio 132. 15. 2), Studi di poesia latina in onore di A. TRAGLIA, Storia e lett., Raccolta di studi e testi 141/142, Roma 1979, 789-799; K. HELDMANN, Antike Theorien über Entwicklung und Verfall der Redekunst, München 1982, 244-246; A. BARBIERI, Poetica Petroniana, sat. 132. 15, Quad. della RCCM 16, Roma 1983, 1-68.

<sup>2</sup> K. MÜLLER, edition, 4th ed., 449-470.

<sup>3</sup> To Carlo Linati, September 21, 1920 (in Italian), in: Letters of James Joyce, ed. by STUART GILBERT, London 1957, p. 147.

in any style. Simplicitas is the opposite of meaningless multiplication, self-deceit, and hypocrisy denounced by Petronius. Like Horace, the great humorist, Petronius is adverse to dogmatic assertions: nihil est hominum inepta persuasione falsius nec ficta severitate ineptius, 'there is nothing more insincere than people's absurd persuasions, or more absurd than their sham morality' (132. 16). Assigning important statements to uncreditable persons does not necessarily imply a disclaimer. Did not Shakespeare's fools pronounce deep truths? And in Petronius there is not a single serious character. He thus had no choice.

No less important is the principle of urbane literary style called understatement. After his poetic interludes the author occasionally casts discredit on himself: stones are thrown on Eumolpus after his recitation. Depreciation of oneself is a Socratic and Cynic component of the genre of Menippean satire. We should not take such remarks at face value (no more than, for example, the pretended 'lack of file' typical of the genre of epistolography). The writer's ironical attitude to himself can be pushed rather far. Petronius, for instance, mocks his own slapdash motivation of the two friends' embarkation by having Eumolpus say (107. 2): 'Any passenger, before setting out on a journey, informs himself about the trustworthiness of the captain.' Were scholars always prepared to capture such undertones? Nevertheless, the Bellum civile is not intended to show how a bad poet would have treated this subject but to evince the exigencies of the genre. It is a sketch that might serve as a working model.

He uses epic as a test-case (118–124), for it is the genre of poetry most fraught with conventions. Lucan's unconventional poem had hurt Petronius' keen sense of style and provoked him to compete with it.<sup>1</sup> The figure of Eumolpus might be suspected to give more clues—serious or ludicrous—to Petronius' poetics.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> F. I. ZEITLIN, Romanus Petronius. A Study of the Troiae Halosis and the Bellum Civile, Latomus 30, 1971, 56–82; P. A. GEORGE, Petronius and Lucan De Bello Civili, CQ 68, 1974, 119–133; E. BURCK, Das Bellum civile Petrons, in: E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979, 200–207; P. GRIMAL, Le Bellum civile de Pétrone dans ses rapports avec la Pharsale, in: J. M. CROISILLE, P. M. FAUCHÈRE, eds., Neronia 1977. Actes du 2<sup>e</sup> colloque de la Société int. des études néroniennes, Clermont-Ferrand 1982, 117–124; J. P. SULLIVAN, Petronius' Bellum civile and Lucan's Pharsalia. A Political Reconsideration, in: Neronia (s. above), 151–155; A. C. HUTCHINSON, Petronius and Lucan, LCM 7, 1982, 46–47; A. LA PENNA 1985.

<sup>2</sup> F. M. FRÖHLKE 1977, 61–110; R. BECK 1979.

Ideas II

Petronius' worldly wisdom may be akin to that of Epicurus, but we should not pin him down to a determined school, for in the face of death he rejected philosophical comfort and his utterances on Epicurus evince no more than the current misunderstanding of hedonism (132. 15).<sup>1</sup>

Although Petronius is, strictly speaking, neither a philosopher nor a satirist, it would be misleading to deny his work an intellectual focus. As a sober observer, he lived in an epoch of exuberance and ecstasy, which in all domains tried to exceed human limits. Nero's Golden House, which filled an entire urban district, was a symbol of that period. The financial rise of freedmen, not always matched by intellectual development, gave occasion to a judicious author to make his observations: even the choicest treats, if absurdly multiplied, would only produce disgust and an emotional vacuum (significantly, at the end of the banquet 78. 5 ibat res ad summam nauseam, 'the thing was becoming perfectly sickening'). The same is true of sex, another crucial theme of the novel; in all variations, Petronius illustrates the dilemma resulting from excessive supply and man's incapacity<sup>2</sup> of enjoying it. The third vital function is the use of language: on the one hand, there is the scholastic routine of rhetoric with its inherent insincerity (1-5),<sup>3</sup> on the other, the artless but no less empty chatter of the freedmen. Extremes meet when the gossip reproaches the rhetor: videris mihi, Agamemnon, dicere: 'quid iste argutat molestus?' quia tu, qui potes loquere, non loquis, 'now, Agamemnon, you look as if you were saying 'what is this bore chattering for?' Only because you have the gift of tongues and do not speak' (46. 1). The uneducated draw the long bow, the educated are silent or declaim—but who does say anything? The same applies to religion: there is a boom on the one hand: you meet gods everywhere, easier than human beings (17. 5), which evidently must be sought with Diogenes' lantern. On the other hand, you can get everything for money: gods as well as geese (137. 5).

<sup>1</sup> Exaggerated: O. RAITH 1963; correct C. J. CASTNER, Prosopography of Roman Epicureans from the 2nd Century B.C. to the 2nd Century A.D., Frankfurt 1988, 104.

<sup>2</sup> For the theme of impotence: Odys. 10. 301; 341; Epigrams of Philodemus in the Anthologia Palatina; Ov. am. 3. 7; Ariosto, Orlando furioso 8. 49-50; B. KYTZLER, in: Neues Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft, 3, Frankfurt 1974, 302.

<sup>3</sup> W. KISSEL, Petrone's Kritik an der Rhetorik (sat. 1-5), RhM 121, 1978, 311-328.

Nobody cares for Jupiter (44. 17). Magic, to which religion has been reduced, is good, at best, for restoring your impaired sexual potency (135. 3; 136. 3; 137. 5).

No doubt, Petronius' work belongs rather to the 'diagnosing' than to the 'healing' type of literature. Nevertheless, in one field at least, Petronius does not abstain from expressing a personal opinion. It is the proper domain of the arbiter elegantiae: good taste in art and literature. Satire, since Lucilius, had not been averse to literary criticism; Petronius (4–5) expressly refers to Lucilius, although tone and meter are rather reminiscent of Persius. His public<sup>1</sup> might have encouraged him to engage in such reflections and to extend them to the pictorial arts. They were a small group of fortunate—nay: endangered—people closely connected with the imperial court and thinking highly of Petronius' judgment in matters of taste. There has been much discussion to what degree he shares the opinions expressed by his characters in this domain. Petronius' own behavior as a writer and the leading ideas mentioned above might pave the way for a correct assessment.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

None of our witnesses contains the entire text known to us (141 chapters according to the numbering introduced by Burmann). The first class (O = short excerpts) contains excerpts from the texts preceding and following the Cena (of the latter, there is only chapter 55). The second group (L = long excerpts) comprises everything except the Cena (of the latter, there are only extracts from chapters 27–37. 5 as well as chapter 55 and seven aphorisms from the Cena). The third class, only represented by the manuscript H (Parisinus Latinus 7989, formerly Traguriensis, 15th century), exhibits the complete text of the Cena. A fourth strand of the tradition, consisting of medieval anthologies or florilegia (φ), preserves maxims, verse, and prose passages like the story of the widow of Ephesus. Despite arbitrary changes of the wording the florilegia are not entirely worthless.

According to K. Müller, the O-class bifurcates: on the one hand, there is the best manuscript B (Bernensis 357, 9th century), some pages of which are found in the Leidensis Vossianus Lat. Q 30; B is identical with the

<sup>1</sup> On this: D. M. LEVIN, To Whom Did the Ancient Novelists Address Themselves?, RSC 25, 1977, 18–29.

<sup>2</sup> K. MÜLLER, edition (T), Stutgardiae 1995; I. C. GIARDINA, R. C. MELLONI, edition, Torino 1995; M. D. REEVE 1983.

Autissiodurensis, from which P. Pithou communicated a certain amount of readings. On the other hand, there are all other manuscripts.

The L-class is a conglomeration of excerpts of different provenance;<sup>1</sup> it was made in the late 13th century,<sup>2</sup> and its witnesses are of even later date: the chief source is called L; moreover, there are a—later—O-text and a florilegium (φ).

The florilegia (φ) have their origin in a common archetype, a big anthology of Latin classics composed in France. According to B. L. Ullman<sup>3</sup> φ dates from the 12th century; for Petronius, however, it was based on a good source that was older.

In passages where we can compare L with H or O, the text of L usually is less reliable; where L is our sole witness, the text, therefore, has no solid basis.

H, Λ, and O are independently traced back to a single incomplete copy, ω, whereas φ and L depend on Λ. In addition, L had used φ and a late representative of the O-class.<sup>4</sup>

The authenticity of the poems and poetic fragments first published by Scaliger and Binetius is no longer doubted.

Influence

Which aspects of Petronius have been influential?<sup>5</sup> What remains to be discovered in Petronius? The metrician Terentianus Maurus (GL 6, 399), whose date is not precisely known, was the first to cite Petronius. His interest in Petronius' verse<sup>6</sup> would find followers in

<sup>1</sup> H. VAN THIEL 1971.

<sup>2</sup> K. MÜLLER, 4th edition (TTrN), Zürich and Darmstadt 1995, 429.

<sup>3</sup> Petronius in the Mediaeval Florilegia, CPh 25, 1930, 11–21.

<sup>4</sup> K. MÜLLER, editions, following M. REEVE; s. now W. RICHARDSON, Reading and Variant in Petronius: Studies in the French Humanists and their Manuscript Sources, Toronto 1993.

<sup>5</sup> In late antiquity Petronius was read by Sidonius Apollinaris, Macrobius, Johannes Lydus, and (surprisingly) even by Jerome. On Petronius' influence: A. COLLIGNON, Pétrone au moyen-âge et dans la littérature française, Paris 1893; id., Pétrone en France, Paris 1903; W. KROLL 1937, 1212–1213; A. RINI, Petronius in Italy from the 13th Century to the Present Time, New York 1937; J. K. SCHÖNBERGER, Petronius bei Cervantes, PhW 62, 1942, 211–213; G. BAGNANI 1954, 83–85 (on Pope); G. PUZIS 1966 (on Russian literature); C. STÖCKER 1969, 86–88 (on T. S. Eliot, H. Kasack, D. G. Rossetti); P. G. WALSH 1970, 224–243 (on the picaresque novel); H. D. RANKIN, Notes on the Comparison of Petronius with Three Moderns, ActAnt 18, 1970, 197–213 (on Proust, Joyce, and Fitzgerald); J. H. STUCKEY, Petronius in Restoration England, Classical News and Views of the Classical Association of Canada 15, 1971, 1–17; R. GUERRINI, Petronio e Céline (ovvero 'La Denigrazione del Reale'), RIL 107, 1973, 380–392; G. L. SCHMELING, D. R. REBMANN, T. S. Eliot and Petronius, CLS 12, 1975, 393–410; D. GAGLIARDI, Petronio e il romanzo moderno, Firenze 1993.

<sup>6</sup> H. STUBBE, Die Verseinlagen im Petron, Leipzig 1933.

the Middle Ages. This perspective allows us to discover an aspect of Petronius not sufficiently discussed hitherto. His poems comprise, apart from epic panels, almost all types of epigrams<sup>1</sup> and neighboring genres. Petronius proves to be a master of chiseled minor forms: from moral sententiae (the author of which, like Montaigne, instead of moralizing, savors each moment to the full while serenely enjoying intellectual superiority) up to a lyric love epigram, which is justly classed with the best love poems of world literature (79. 8). Like Heinrich Heine, Petronius is one of the rare talents, in whom emotion and irony enhance, not destroy each other.

Less adequate were the principles of other excerptors, who were hunting for grammatical or erotic rarities. Their activity, too, left scars in the text (and in the reputation) of Petronius. Both aspects were felicitously combined in Justus Lipsius' memorable bonmot calling Petronius auctor purissimae impuritatis, 'author of the purest impurity'.

In the Middle Ages Petronius is known to John of Salisbury (d. 1180) and to the school of Chartres; however the amount of text available to them was not larger than ours.<sup>2</sup>

Similar social and literary conditions favored the genesis of the Satyrica in Rome and the rebirth of the picaresque novel in Spain; moreover, there are genetic connections between ancient and modern picaresque novel, although the leading role was played by Apuleius, the Apollonius rex Tyri, and the Greek.

In France, Petronius found copyists, humanistic readers, learned editors, fanciful forgers<sup>3</sup> who completed the lacunae and literary imitators like Mathurin Régnier (d. 1613) in his Satires (cf. Petron. 127–128)<sup>4</sup> and R. de Bussy-Rabutin (d. 1693) in his Histoire amoureuse des Gaules (cf. Petronius' plot). John Barclay (d. 1621), a Scotsman brought up in France, chose (as a precaution) the Latin language for his Euphormionis Satyricon (1603–1607).<sup>5</sup> Leibniz the philosopher (d. 1716) described in a letter of February 25, 1702 a high-spirited carnival

<sup>1</sup> On the epigrams found in the Anthologia Latina: SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 2, 4th edition, 515–516.

<sup>2</sup> On 'more Petronius' in England and Ireland: M. COLKER, New Light on the Use of Transmission of Petronius, Manuscripta 36, 1992, 200–209.

<sup>3</sup> F. NODOT, Paris 1691 and 1693; s. W. STOLZ, Petrone's Satyricon und F. Nodot, Wiesbaden 1987; behind the name Lallemandus (Fragmentum Petronii ex bibliotheca Sancti Galli . . ., sine loco 1800, there is a Spaniard: Joseph Marchena.

<sup>4</sup> HIGHET, Class. Trad. 651, n. 25.

<sup>5</sup> English translation: P. TURNER 1954; German by G. WALTZ, Heidelberg 1902.

performance of Trimalchio's banquet at the court of Hannover.<sup>1</sup> Similar shows took place under the regent of Louis XV and at the court of Frederick the Great.

The circle of Petronius' readers seems to be somewhat exclusive; this is partly owing to the fact that the fragments were discovered only gradually and translated even later: only in 1694 did the the Cena Trimalchionis appear in English. Furthermore, for a long time, moral prejudice was an obstacle to an unbiased study of the Satyrice as a work of art. Even a poet like Wilhelm Heinse<sup>2</sup> (d. 1803) publicly disclaimed his own translation of Petronius (1773), and Henry Fielding (d. 1754), an author comparable with Petronius in many respects, speaks of the 'unjustly celebrated Petronius' whose wit could not measure up to Saint Paul's (Covent Garden Journal 3. 3. 1754). The rise of bourgeois culture encouraged prejudice even more. Conservative dramatists felt obliged to present Petronius in their Nero-plays as the embodiment of villainy.

The list of distinguished minds attracted to Petronius is impressive: Leibniz was followed by Voltaire, Lessing, Balzac, Flaubert, T. S. Eliot. Denmark's eminent author Ludvig Holberg (d. 1754) declared: 'Of Latin writers, I deem Petronius Arbiter the greatest master; for it seems that he was perfect in every respect.'<sup>3</sup> Goethe perspicaciously observed Petronius' artistic use of the theme of death in the Cena.<sup>4</sup> In the fragment of a novel, Alexander Pushkin (d. 1837) gave what is perhaps the finest assessment of Petronius: 'His judgments usually were prompt and pertinent. Indifference to everything freed him from bias; as he was honest to himself he had a keen eye. Life was unable to present him with anything new; he had known all enjoyments; his feelings were dormant, deadened by boredom; yet,

<sup>1</sup> R. HERZOG recently discovered the following manuscript of the philosopher: Trimalcion moderne, composé l'an 1702 pour le carnaval d'Hanovre, cf. also: R. HERZOG, Fest, Terror und Tod in Petrons Satyrice, in: W. HAUG, R. WARNING, eds., Das Fest (= Poetik und Hermeneutik, vol. 14), München 1989, 120–150.

<sup>2</sup> S. now W. HÜBNER, Die Petronübersetzung Wilhelm Heinses. Quellenkritisch bearbeiteter Neudruck der Erstausgabe mit kritisch-exegetischem Kommentar, 2 vols., Frankfurt, Bern 1987.

<sup>3</sup> Herrn L. Freyherrn von Holberg (sic) eigene Lebens-Beschreibung in einigen Briefen . . ., Copenhagen 2nd ed. 1754, 325–326; the Latin (!) original in: A. KRAGELUND, ed., L. Holbergs Tre Levnedsbreve, vol. 2, København 1965, 436.

<sup>4</sup> GRUMACH 1, 392–393 = K. von Holtei, in: Gespräche mit Goethe, ed. by F. von BIEDERMANN, Leipzig 2nd ed. 1910, vol. 4, 418; F. von Müller, Unterhaltungen mit Goethe, crit. ed. by E. GRUMACH, Weimar 1956, 182 (February 16, 1830).

his mind had preserved an astounding freshness. He loved the play of ideas as well as the harmony of words. He liked to listen to philosophical reflections and wrote his own verse—no worse than Catullus'.<sup>1</sup> Other Russian poets were experts of Petronius as well: Maikov, Bryussov, and Blok.

Nietzsche (d. 1900)—unwittingly?—took up Fielding's comparison of Petronius and Saint Paul and gave it the opposite meaning; he was the harbinger of a new affinity to Petronius. He felt him to be 'tutto festo—immortally healthy, immortally serene and a fine specimen'. With his keen sense of style he captured the 'intellectual superiority of his swift pace'. For him, Petronius, 'the master of presto', ranged with Machiavel and Aristophanes.<sup>2</sup>

In his novel Quo Vadis (1896), Henryk Sienkiewicz (d. 1916), the Polish Nobel prize winner, made Petronius a leading figure. With the fin de siècle an epoch began which might be called a new aetas Petroniana. However, readers were not always able to disengage themselves completely from an interest in the mere subject matter. While previously immorality had been condemned it now conversely became an object of a certain cult (cf. Céline's satanism). In terms of literary art Petronius influenced one of the precursors of modern literature, J. K. Huysmans (d. 1907), whose A Rebours (1884) influenced Joyce (d. 1941). The latter's Ulysses exhibits structural affinities to the Satyrical. Joyce's friend, Oliver St. John Gogarty, wrote a poem on Petronius.<sup>3</sup> Trimalchio at West Egg was initially meant to be the title of Scott Fitzgerald's (d. 1940) novel The Great Gatsby (publ. 1925). As it had done in the early Modern Age, Petronius' influence extended beyond literature: Hermann Reutter composed an opera Die Witwe von Ephesus (1954). Manfred Henninger illustrated the novel with designs in black crayon (1962 ff.). F. Fellini's<sup>4</sup> film of 1969, an independent work of art, gave the Satyrical an unexpected popularity.<sup>5</sup>

Petronius' quick perspicacity, his artistic integrity, his superior mocking at empty talk, excessive supply of attractions, and ideological self-deception, and the grace of his supreme intellect might be understood today, since many old taboos are gone. Moreover, it might

<sup>1</sup> Works, vol. 6, Moscow 2nd ed. 1957, 610–614.

<sup>2</sup> Works, ed. by K. SCHLECHTA 2, 1210; 3, 527; 2, 594.

<sup>3</sup> The Collected Poems, London 1951, 195.

<sup>4</sup> A. SÜTTERLIN, Petronius Arbiter und F. Fellini, Frankfurt 1996.

<sup>5</sup> Volker Ebersbach's Petronian novel Der Schatten eines Satyrs (Berlin 2nd ed. 1989) also deserves mention.

be high time to read the Satyrice finally as a novel. The modern novel, which G. Lukács called the genre of 'transcendental homelessness' offers many motives for a critical comparison. The influence of Petronius, in some regards the most modern of classical authors, is perhaps still in its early stages.

Editions: FRANCISCUS PUTEOLANUS, Mediolani 1482 (only the, 'short excerpts' O). * Jean DE Tournes (Toinaesius) and Denis Lebey de Batilly, Lugduni (Lyon) 1575 (first edition of the L Text). * Patavii 1664 (first edition of the Cena Trimalchionis). ** P. BURMANN (TC), Amstelædami 1743, repr. 1974. * F. BÜCHELER, Berolini 1862 (ed. mai.), 6th ed. 1922 (with add. by G. HERAEUS). * E. T. SAGE (TN), New York 1929, 2nd ed. 1969. * Konrad MÜLLER and W. EHLERS (T, TrN), München 1965, 4th ed. 1995, epilogue by N. HOLZBERG. * M. HESELTINE, rev. by E. H. WARMINGTON (TTr), London (1913) 1969. * O. SCHÖNBERGER (TTr), Berlin 1992. * Konr. MÜLLER (T), Stuttgartiae 1995. * I. C. GIARDINA, R. CUCCIOLI MELLONI (T), Torino 1995. * G. L. SCHMELING, J. P. SULLIVAN (C), announced. * Cena: L. FRIEDLÄNDER (C), Leipzig 1891, 2nd ed. 1906, repr. 1960. * A. MAIURI (TC), Napoli 1945. * M. S. SMITH, Oxford 1975 (TC). * Verse passages: H. STUBBE (C), Leipzig 1933. * E. COURTNEY (TC), Atlanta 1991. * Bellum civile: F. T. BALDWIN, New York 1911. * G. GUIDO (C), Bologna 1976. ** Lexicon, concordance: J. SEGEBADE and E. LOMMATZSCH, Lexicon Petronianum, Leipzig 1898, repr. 1962. * M. KORN, S. REITZER, Concordantia Petroniana, Hildesheim 1986. ** Bibl.: G. L. SCHMELING, J. H. STUCKEY, A Bibliography of Petronius, Leiden 1977. * M. S. SMITH, A Bibliography of Petronius (1945–1982), ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1624–1665. * N. HOLZBERG, Epilogue to the ed. by K. MÜLLER, W. EHLERS, 4th ed. 1995, s. above. * Important: the Petronian Society Newsletter, publ. regularly by G. L. SCHMELING (The University of Florida, Gainesville).

J. ADAMIETZ, Zum literarischen Charakter von Petrons Satyrice, RhM n.s. 130, 1987, 329–346. * G. BAGNANI, Arbiter of Elegance—A Study of the Life and the Works of C. Petronius, Toronto 1954. * A. BARCHIESI, Tracce di narrativa greca e romanzo latino, in: Semiotica della novella latina, Roma 1986, 219–236. * R. BECK, Eumolpus poeta, Eumolpus fabulator: A Study of Characterization in the Satyricon, Phoenix 33, 1979, 239–253. * R. BECK, The Satyricon: Satire, Narration and Antecedents, MH 39, 1982, 206–214. * J. BODEL, Freedmen in the Satyricon of Petronius, diss. Univ. of Michigan 1984. * M. BROŽEK, De Petronii Satyricon librorum numero ac natura, ACD 4, 1968, 65–67. * A. CAMERON, Myth and Meaning in Petronius: Some Modern Comparisons, Latomus 29, 1970, 397–425. * M. COCCIA, Le interpolazioni in Petronio, Roma 1973. * M. COFFEY, Roman Satire, London 1976, 178–203. * A. COLLIGNON, Etude sur Pétrone. La critique littéraire, l'imitation et la parodie dans le Satiricon, Paris 1892. * E. COURTNEY, Parody and Literary Allusion in Menippean Satire, Philologus 106, 1962, 86–100. * S. DÖPP, 'Leben und Tod' in Petrons Satyricon, in: G. BINDER, B. EFFE, eds., Tod und Jenseits im Altertum, Trier 1991, 144–166. * J. C. DUMONT, Le décor de Trimalcion, MEFR(A) 102, 1990, 959–981. * P. FEDELI, Petronio: Crotone o il mondo alla rovescia, Aufidus 1, 1987, 3–34. * F. M. FRÖHLKE, Petron. Struktur und Wirklichkeit, Frankfurt 1977. * G. GIGANTE, Stile nuovo ed etica anticonvenzionale in Petronio, Vichiana 9, 1980, 61–78. * T. HÄGG, The Novel in Antiquity, Oxford 1983. * R. HEINZE, Petron und der griechische Roman, Hermes 34, 1899, 494–519. * N. HOLZBERG, Der antike Roman, München 1986 (English ed.: London 1995). * N. HORSFALL, The Uses of Literacy and the Cena Trimalchionis, G&R 36, 1989, 74–89; 194–209. * J. HOSNER, Studien zur lateinisch-romanischen Sprachentwicklung am Beispiel der gesprochenen Partien der Cena Trimalchionis, diss. Bochum 1984. * F. M. JONES, The Narrator and the Narrative of the Satyricon, Latomus 46, 1987, 810–819. * F. M. JONES, Realism in Petronius, in: H. HOFMANN, ed., Groningen colloquia on the Novel, vol. 4, Groningen 1991, 105–120. * A. LA PENNA, Il Bellum civile di Petronio e il proemio delle Historiae di Sallustio, RFIC 113, 1985, 170–173. * E. MARMORALE, La questione petroniana, Bari 1948. * R. MARTIN, Le roman de Pétrone et la théorie du roman, Neronia 1977, 125–138. * C. PANAYOTAKIS, Theatrum Arbitri. Theatrical Elements in the Satyricon of Petronius, Leiden 1995. * P. J. PARSONS, A Greek, 'Satyricon?', BICS 18, 1971, 53–68. * L. PEPE, Studi Petroniani, Napoli 1957. * L. PEPE, ed., Semiotica della novella latina. Atti del seminario interdisciplinare 'La novella latina', Roma 1986 (containing several contributions on Petronius). * L. PEPE, 'Petronio', in: L. PEPE, Sermo Miliusius, Perugia 1987 (with bibl.). * B. E. PERRY, The Ancient Romances, Berkeley 1967, 186–210. * H. PETERSMANN, Petrone urbane Prosa, Wien 1977. * H. PETERSMANN, Umwelt, Sprachsituation und Stilchichten in Petrons Satyricon, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1687–1705. * H. PETERSMANN, Petrone Satyricon, in: J. ADAMIETZ, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1986, 383–426. * G. PUZIS, Voprosy rimskogo romana Satiricon, AAntHung 14, 1966, 371–386 (bibl.). * O. RAITH, Petronius—ein Epikureer, Nürnberg 1963. * H. D. RANKIN, Petronius the Artist, Den Haag 1971. * E. RATTI, L'età di Nerone e la storia di Roma nell'opera di Petronio, Bologna 1978. * E. RATTI, Petronio e Nerone. Difficoltà e necessità dell'allusionismo nell'interpretazione del Satyricon, in: Neronia 1977. Actes du 2<sup>e</sup> colloque de la Société int. des études néroniennes, Clermont-Ferrand 1977, publ. 1982, 145–150. * M. D. REEVE, Petronius, in: L. D. REYNOLDS, ed., Texts and Transmission, Oxford 1983, 295–300. * H. ROEMER, Ausdrucks- und Darstellungstendenzen in den urbanen Erzählungspartien von Petrons Satyricon, diss. Göttingen 1961. * K. F. C. ROSE, The Date and Author of the Satyricon, Leiden 1971. * P. A. ROSENMEYER, The Unexpected Guests: Patterns of Xenia in Callimachus' Victoria Berenices and Petronius' Satyricon, CQ 41, 1991, 403–413. * G. L. SCHMELING, The Satyricon: The Sense of an Ending, RhM 134, 1991, 352–377. * G. L. SCHMELING, Quid attinet veritatem per interpretem quaerere? Interpretes and the Satyricon, Ramus 23, 1994, 144–168. * G. SCHMELING, Confessor Gloriosus: a Role of Encolpius in the Satyricon, WJA 20, 1994–1995, 207–224. * G. SCHMELING, The Satyricon of Petronius, in: G. SCHMELING, ed., The Novel in the Ancient World, Leiden 1996 (forthcoming). * P. SOVERINI, Il problema delle teorie retoriche e poetiche di Petronio, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1706–1779. * N. W. SLATER, Reading Petronius, Baltimore 1990 (reader-response). * C. STÖCKER, Humor bei Petron, diss. Erlangen-Nürnberg 1969. * J. P. SULLIVAN, The Satyricon of Petronius. A Literary Study, London 1968. * J. P. SULLIVAN, Petronius' Satyricon and its Neronian Context, ANRW 2, 32, 3, 1985, 1666–1686. * H. van Thiel, Petron—Überlieferung und Rekonstruktion, Leiden 1971. * P. Veyne, Le 'Je' dans le Satyricon, REL 42, 1964, 301–324. * P. G. WALSH, The Roman Novel. The Satyricon of Petronius and the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, Cambridge 1970, repr. 1995. * P. G. WALSH, Petronius and Apuleius, in: B. L. HIJMANS and R. T. VAN DER PAARDT, eds., Aspects of Apuleius' Golden Ass, Groningen 1978, 17–24. * F. WEHRLI, Einheit und Vorgeschichte der griechisch-römischen Romanliteratur, MH 22, 1965, 133–154; repr. in: F.W., Theorie und Humanitas, Zürich 1972, 242–266. * F. I. ZEITLIN, Petronius as Paradox: Anarchy and Artistic Integrity, TAPhA 102, 1971, 631–684.

E. TECHNICAL AND EDUCATIONAL AUTHORS

TECHNICAL AUTHORS OF EARLY EMPIRE

For practical reasons, technical and educational authors are treated together here. General information on this subject is found above pp. 564–582. Seneca the Elder, Quintilian, and Pliny the Elder are discussed in separate chapters.

Medicine

Celsus

A. Cornelius Celsus,<sup>1</sup> probably a member of the aristocracy, had enjoyed a complete and generous education. He wrote his encyclopedia supposedly under Tiberius.

His work embraced agriculture, medicine, warfare, rhetoric, philosophy, and law (Quint. inst. 12. 11. 24). The medical part in 8 books is the only to have been preserved.

The structure of the work follows the division of the medical discipline: dietetics (books 1–4), pharmaceuticals (books 5–6), and surgery (books 7–8). Dietetics in its turn falls into parts, one for the healthy (book 1), the other for the sick (books 2–4). General information (commune) is placed before special information (proprium): consequently, general dietetics (books 1 and 2) are followed by dietetics for single parts of the body (books 3 and 4); similarly, general pharmaceuticals (book 5) range before the application of remedies to individual parts of the body (book 6), and surgery (book 7) precedes orthopedy (book 8). Within single parts referring to the human body the subject matter is arranged a capite ad calcem ‘from head to toe’.

Among his sources are found the Corpus Hippocraticum, Asclepiades of Bithynia, Heraclides of Tarentum, Erasistratus, Philoxenus, Meges of Sidon, and Varro. It looks as if Celsus, when writing his systematic textbook, found no corresponding model of similar scope, but had to resort to Greek monographs.<sup>1</sup> Therefore he must have worked rather independently.

---

<sup>1</sup> Editions and bibl.: cf. Roman Technical Writers, above pp. 577–578; W. G. SPENCER (ITr), 3 vols., London 1935–1938; s. FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 86–98; 173–181.

His literary technique is evinced in prefaces (1 pr. 1-11 to the entire work; 1 pr. 12-75 to the first section: on dietetics) and in inserted transitional phrases and announcements of ensuing themes (e.g. 2. 9; 5 pr. 3) which emphasize the structure of the work (even though it is self-explanatory).<sup>2</sup>

Celsus' use of language and style is precise and civilized; he never lapses into idle talk. Celsus is the classic of technical authors. While not impairing perspicuity, he avoids monotony and doctrinary awkwardness. There is variety of expression and of sentence structure. The lack of ostentatious rhetoric is gratifying.

In the conflict between theorists (rationalists) who searched for the causes of diseases, and empiricists who were satisfied with empirical knowledge of the effects of remedies, he proves to be a moderate theoretician. Though himself no more than a layman interested in medicine, he writes with technical precision. As the first significant medical writer in the Latin-speaking west he has an important function.

The lost parts of his work were very influential as well: the agricultural parts were studied by Columella and Pliny, the rhetorical ones by Quintilian.

Beginning with the editio princeps of 1478 his medical work was frequently published and gained great authority as a textbook. Celsus was regarded as Cicero medicorum. His prooemium is the first history of medicine. Celsus is an early and reliable witness of Hellenistic medicine and, more generally, a source of information on many ailments and the methods of treatment used in antiquity.

Scribonius Largus

Scribonius Largus was active as a physician under Claudius. His collection of recipes is arranged, in its main part, according to the principle a capite ad calcem 'from head to toe'. Scribonius relies on medication rather than on diet and holds experience in high esteem. In his preface the Roman tinge of medical ethics is attractive.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> FUHRMANN, ibid., esp. 180-181.

<sup>2</sup> On difficulties in the first prooemium helpful FUHRMANN ibid. 86-88.

<sup>3</sup> Editions and bibl. (esp. K. DEICHGRÄBER 1950) s. Roman Technical Writers, above pp. 577-578.

*Agriculture*Columella<sup>1</sup>

L. Junius Moderatus Columella from Gades was a contemporary of Seneca. He possessed properties in Italy.

His work on agriculture comprises 12 books: 1 General remarks; 2 agriculture; 3–5 viniculture and cultivation of trees; 6–9 raising of animals; 10 horticulture (in hexameters). As a supplement there follows a prose treatise on horticulture preceded by a description of the duties of the vilicus (11) and of the vilica (12).

In our tradition, after the 2nd book a Liber de arboribus was erroneously inserted; it is the second part of a different—and probably earlier—work of the same author.

Columella names his predecessors: Cato, Varro, and Virgil; in the last two books he also uses Cicero's translation of Xenophon's Oeconomicus. His main source is the encyclopedia of Celsus, but he also relies on his own experience, a fact he duly emphasizes. Language and style are refined throughout; precision dominates in the factual parts, eloquence in the prefaces. Like Cato the Elder, Columella is deeply convinced of the moral value of agriculture. He knows, however, that this belief is not quite up to date any more.

Geography

It is true that Pliny (below pp. 575–576), had access to Agrippa's map and used its information concerning distances, but on the whole he adhered to the old pattern of periplus. In spite of his own experience—e.g. in Germany—he stuck to the perspective of his Hellenistic models. An earlier work was Pomponius Mela's<sup>2</sup> De chorographia, the first Latin book on geography; it was written under Claudius. After a prooemium and a general geographic introduction it contains a periegetic survey often resembling a periplus. The sources used for the west and the north are later than those used for the east. Mela enlivens his work with digressions on mythology, history, ethnography, and natural history and adorns it with jewels from Greek and Roman literature. His style is rhetorical and employs rhythmic clausulae. Mela was possibly read by Pliny the Elder, certainly by Solinus, Einhart, Heiric of Auxerre (Vat. Lat. 4929), and Boccaccio. Petrarca ascertained his diffusion in the Renaissance.

<sup>1</sup> Very good M. FUHRMANN, KIP q.v. (bibl.); s. also our bibl., above pp. 572–573.

<sup>2</sup> Éditions: Mediolani 1471; C. FRICK, Lipsiae 1880, repr. 1935; H. PHILIPP (TrC), 2 vols., Leipzig 1912; G. RANSTRAND (T, Index), Göteborg 1971; P. PARRONI (TC), Roma 1984; A. SILBERMAN (TTnN), Paris 1988 (bibl.); Concordance: C. GUZMÁN, M. E. PÉREZ, Hildesheim 1989.

Philology<sup>1</sup>

Philology received fresh impetus.

Asconius Pedianus

Q. Asconius Pedianus (about 9 B.C.—A.D. 76) presumably originated from Patavium.

Five of his learned commentaries on Cicero's speeches have come down to us (Pis., Scaur., Mil., Cornel., and in toga cand.). The last two are precious instruments for the reconstruction of lost texts of Cicero. For his explanations of facts, Asconius draws on reliable sources (e.g. Acta populi Romani); his writings, therefore, are precious historical evidence. The fact that Asconius wrote his commentaries as a companion to Didymus' commentary on Demosthenes is proof of an increasing self-confidence of Roman literature and literary criticism.<sup>2</sup>

Probus

M. Valerius Probus<sup>3</sup> from Berytus (Beirut) lived in the second half of the 1st century A.D. As a professional soldier he tried in vain to obtain the position of an officer; he definitely turned to literature when a middle-aged wealthy man; he gained a remarkable reputation.

The school he had attended in his home city followed an obsolete syllabus. Therefore he brought to Rome a considerable knowledge of Republican authors who had meanwhile fallen into oblivion in the capital. He thus prepared the ground for the archaists of the 2nd century.

<sup>1</sup> Grammarians of the era of Tiberius: Julius Modestus (a freedman of Hyginus) and Pomponius Marcellus; Caesius Bassus dedicated his De metris to Nero (GL 6. 243 KEIL; GRF 127 MAZZARINO), a treatise deriving all meters from the dactylic hexameter and the iambic trimeter (Varro).

<sup>2</sup> The commentaries on div. Caecil. and Verr. 1 and 2 (up to § 33) are spurious. Lost works: Contra obtrectatores Vergilii; Vita Sallustii; Symposion; Editions and bibl.: s. Roman Technical Writers, above pp. 576–577.

<sup>3</sup> Very good P. L. SCHMIDT, KIP q.v. (bibl.); cf. also our bibl. Roman Technical Writers, above pp. 576–577.

Probus did not publish a great deal. His monographs on problems of detail are mostly lost.<sup>1</sup> His personal copies of republican authors (Terence, Lucretius, Horace, Virgil, probably also Plautus and Sallust) were based on his own collations and contained his interpunctions<sup>2</sup> as well as critical and exegetic notes. However, we should not speak of critical editions in the strict sense of the word.

The attention he paid to anomaly in linguistic usage distinguished him from the classicists of the Flavian epoch and pointed to the future.

It is an ascertained fact that he influenced the Scholia on Virgil and Terence, but it is hardly possible to trace back to him any of the transmitted recensions of classical authors.

Numerous works falsely attributed to him testify to his fame in late antiquity and during the Middle Ages.<sup>3</sup>

Rhetoric

Rutilius Lupus

P. Rutilius Lupus was one of the rhetors<sup>4</sup> of the 1st century A.D. who were used by Quintilian. He Latinized the work on rhetorical figures of Cicero's teacher Gorgias (1st century B.C.). His translations of the examples adduced from Attic orators are elegant; unfortunately, his definitions lack terminological exactitude.

Quintilian will be discussed in his own chapter.

---

<sup>1</sup> Preserved works: De notis iuris (on abbreviations in documents). Lost works: Epistula ad Marcellum (on prosody); De genetivo Graeco; De temporum conexione, his legacy containing observations on early Latin linguistic usage is quoted as De inaequalitate consuetudinis; he is also said to have written a Commentarius on Caesar's secret code.

<sup>2</sup> R. W. MÜLLER, Rhetorische und syntaktische Interpunktion, diss. Tübingen 1964.

<sup>3</sup> Catholica (by Plotius Sacerdos); De nomine; Instituta artium (morphology: Africa, 4th century), commentaries on Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics, on the Vita of Virgil and on Persius (of the latter, the Vita is preserved). Among the works dating from the Middle Ages there is the Appendix Probi.

<sup>4</sup> SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 2, 1935, 741-745.

*Other Disciplines*Frontinus<sup>1</sup>

S. Julius Frontinus was praetor urbanus in A.D. 70 and held his third consulate in 100. His authorship extended to three domains:

His works on the art of war include three books on stratagems (Strategemata) drawn from history and arranged according to their applicability (before, during, after battles, and during sieges). A 4th book described military exploits (Strategica),<sup>2</sup> grouped according to virtues (e.g. disciplina, continentia, iustitia, constantia). These four books are related to works on exempla. His earlier handbook De re militari is lost (Frontin. strat. 1 praef.; Veg. mil. 1. 8; 2. 3).

Furthermore, Frontinus is the oldest preserved Latin writer on the art of surveying. We have extracts of his relevant and perfectly competent treatise, written under Domitian.

Finally, Frontinus as curator aquarum (A.D. 97) wrote the valuable Commentarius de aquis urbis Romae, which was initially designed to serve his own instruction.

Further Surveyors

Under Trajan, the following authors wrote on the art of surveying: Hyginus (to be distinguished from his Augustan namesake), Balbus, and Siculus Flaccus. M. Junius Nipsus is thought to have lived in the 2nd century as well.

Bibl.: s. Roman Technical Authors, above pp. 571–582.

SENECA THE ELDER

Life and Dates

L. Annaeus Seneca the Elder was welcomed into a wealthy and distinguished family of Roman knights (Tac. ann. 14. 53). He was born in Cordoba some time around 55 B.C. and spent his life partly in Rome, partly in Spain, where he owned land. Although he was neither a teacher of rhetoric nor an advocate, he regularly attended public declamations of the rhetors, as a gentleman amateur. His works convey a lively idea of these experiences. His wife Helvia, a cultured lady, was supposedly of Spanish origin as well. They had three sons. The oldest, Novatus, later named Junius Gallio by adoption, was a proconsul in Achaia, where he met Saint Paul (Acts 18. 12) and refused to be his judge. The two younger sons were Seneca the Philosopher and Mela, the father of the poet Lucan. Seneca the Elder wrote his works under Caligula (37–41), since he quotes Cremutius Cordus, the historian, whose works had been forbidden under Tiberius and published only under Caligula.<sup>1</sup> Seneca did not live to see his second son banished by Claudius (Sen. Helv. 2. 4).

<sup>1</sup> Editions and bibl. s. Roman Technical Authors, above pp. 572–575; 581–582 (surveying, architecture, art of war).

<sup>2</sup> The authenticity of book 4 (which had been doubted by many scholars) was proved by G. BENDZ, Die Echtheit des vierten Buches der Frontinischen Strategemata, diss. Lund 1938.

Survey of Works

Seneca's History of the Civil Wars is lost.<sup>2</sup> It was written in all probability under Gaius Caesar, whose reign initially afforded new freedom to historians. It should not be denied that Seneca did publish his work.

His principal work Oratorum et rhetorum sententiae divisiones colores, written by an aging Seneca for his sons, consists of ten books of Controversiae and one of Suasoriae.

At first glance, the work is meant to give an impression of randomness; but Seneca does observe a certain order. The Controversiae treat 74 themes in ten books. To each theme the author first quotes the sententiae, which show how individual rhetors viewed the pros and cons of each case. Then Seneca under the title of divisio explains how the individual rhetors divided a given cause into different quaestiones. The third section (colores) gives evidence of the art of how to shed unexpected light on different cases and eventually throw dust into the listeners' eyes by embellishing the weak issues of the case. This reflects a change of meaning: color initially denoted a 'general stylistic coloring', now it gained a more individual shade.<sup>3</sup>

The seven Suasoriae form a book of their own, which may be divided into two parts (1–5; 6–7). Given their less complex subject matter, we find merely sententiae and divisio, no colores. In classrooms the Suasoriae were treated before the Controversiae; Seneca, however, favored the reverse order for his books, as is evinced from contr. 2. 4. 8., although this passage is no proof that the Suasoriae were written later than the Controversiae.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> He also mentions (suas. 2. 22) the death of Scaurus Mamercus (A.D. 34).

<sup>2</sup> Sen. (phil.) vita patr., ed. Gu. (= W.) Studemund, pp. xxxi–xxxii, in: O. ROSSBACH, De Senecae philosophi recensione et emendatione . . . Praemissae sunt Senecae librorum Quomodo amicitia continenda sit et De vita patris reliquiae, ed. Gu. (= W.) STUEMUND, Breslauer phil. Abh. 2, 3, 1888; on the Historiae: L. A. SUSSMAN 1978, 137–152.

<sup>3</sup> Usually, colores are employed in the argumentatio, but they also appear in the narratio.

Sources, Models, and Genres

If Seneca is to be believed, his memory is his sole source (contr. 1 praef. 2–5). No doubt his capacities in this domain are quite extraordinary; nevertheless, his text reveals that he relied on written sources as well.<sup>2</sup>

Seneca knew published speeches of Cassius Severus, Votienus Montanus, and Scaurus. Declamations by Cestius, Montanus, Scaurus, and Menestratus existed in manuscript form. Junius Otho had written a work on declamations. Gorgias' (1st century B.C.) work on figures of speech might be the source of Seneca's quotations from Greek orators who never had been in Rome. Moreover, there may have been written notes (commentarii) of rhetors (notwithstanding contr. 1 praef. 11) and students; Seneca is liable to have relied on his own notes at least for the speeches of his teacher Marullus. Seneca can scarcely have heard or remembered hearing Calvus, who died no later than 47 B.C.; did he rely on reports of Pollio?

The fact that Seneca is able to compare a written speech with its oral version which he had heard (contr. 9. 5. 15–16) nevertheless presupposes an unflinching memory, for which there are even modern parallels—suffice it to mention the mnemonic power of musicians.<sup>3</sup>

Seneca is well-read in other genres of literature as well. Owing to him we know, for example, precious longer fragments of Albinovanus Pedo and Cornelius Severus, of Asinius Pollio and Livy, and even—from the rich store-house of his memory—a tidbit of prose composed by Ovid when a student.

Scholastic declamation which, on his own showing, came into <sup>1</sup> The idea that the two parts of the Suasoriae (1–5; 6–7) were meant to be appended to books 2 and 4 of the Controversiae (J. FAIRWEATHER 1984), is hypothetical.

<sup>2</sup> L. A. SUSSMAN 1978, 79 in accordance with C. W. LOCKYER.

<sup>3</sup> Examples from antiquity are Latro (Sen. contr. 1 praef. 18–19), Themistocles, Mithridates, Crassus, Hortensius; cf. also F. A. YATES, The Art of Memory, London 1966; A. R. LURIA, The Mind of a Mnemonist. A Little Book about a Vast Memory, London 1969.

fashion during his lifetime had much earlier roots. However, those rudimentary exercises required less fanciful subject-matter and less theatrical action since, initially, they were not intended for public performance. School exercises on definite court-cases were known as early as Demetrius of Phaleron (4th century B.C.). The practice of elaborating a general theme (theseis) as an exercise is traced even further back: to the sophists. In Cicero's early textbook De inventione and in the anonymous Rhetoric to Herennius there are hints concerning declamatory exercises on forensic and political themes; Cicero himself practiced declamation both in Greek and Latin (Suet. gramm. 25. 3). In the Paradoxa Stoicorum<sup>1</sup> he treated general themes (theseis). In 49 he remembered different theseis which were appropriate to his desperate situation and used them to comfort himself (Cic. Att. 9. 4. 1). Perhaps it was Cicero's merit to have introduced a philosophical type of exercises into rhetoric. Seneca (contr. 1. 4. 7) seems to intimate that Cicero treated even special themes of declamatio, but he informs us elsewhere that exercises in his day were different (contr. 1 praef. 12). Once, in Seneca's early years, Blandus had added luster to Latin schools of rhetoric, the former progymnasmata (to which had been added translations from Greek) gave way to suasoriae and controversiae.<sup>2</sup>

The former were thought to be easier; they conveyed some political advice in the form of a λόγος προτροπτικός or ἀποτροπτικός and resembled the thesis. They also could contain descriptions. The controversiae discussed the pros and cons of legal cases, fictitious or taken from real life.

The increasing importance and independence of scholastic declamation were indirectly linked to the political change which no longer allowed significant political speeches. After the judicial reform of Pompeius even pleas for the defence lost relevance in general. Nevertheless even after the battle of Actium there were important lawsuits and even some political debates.

Declamation helped young Romans develop their inventive power, their linguistic potential, and their sense of style. Although the flaws of declamation were well-known, rhetorical education as a whole was never called in question.

<sup>1</sup> M. V. RONNICK, Cicero's Paradoxa Stoicorum, Frankfurt 1991.

<sup>2</sup> The terms declamare, controversia, and suasoria were developed in the second half of the 1st century B.C.

Yet, declamation more and more became a new form of entertainment for an educated society. The stages of development were probably these: teachers declaimed at school for their students (contr. 3 praef. 16; 7 praef. 1); so did orators at home for their friends (4 praef. 2; 10 praef. 3. 4). Some teachers gave their lessons publicly (3 praef. 10), others only occasionally invited listeners (3 praef. 1), e.g. the parents of their students (Pers. 3. 44-47; Quint. inst. 2. 7. 1; 10. 5. 21). Finally, soirées were introduced, where declaimers competed with each other in the presence of colleagues and guests.

Literary Technique

Seneca's prefaces to his books<sup>1</sup> show that he wants to write more than a mere compendium. Each preface is focused on the portrait of an important orator, which is enlivened by anecdotes (the same orator will be given due attention in the body of the book).<sup>2</sup> Moreover, the books are connected by means of transitions. In the Suasoriae Seneca tries to give even more coherence to the book as a unit; in the 1st book of the Controversiae the unifying link is a syncretis contradicting declamation from loftier genres, or certain declaimers from eminent authors.

All prefaces have epistolary form—in such explicitness this is an exception within Roman writings on rhetoric. Seneca applies the patterns of prooemium (reminiscent of historiography) but he gives them a personal touch. The praefationes are linked to each other by elements they have in common: the address to his sons, the reference to imitatio as a goal, and the use of positive and negative examples; the last preface thematically hearkens back to the first one (significant is the mention of Seneca's early years). Thus, Seneca rounds off his work.

To turn to details: Seneca devotes almost half of his space to sententiae, a subject in which his sons are especially interested. Divisio is treated most succinctly; here, the author is pleased to intersperse his text with short comments.

The colores, finally, occupy one third of the work. Numerous citations <sup>1</sup> We do not have the prefaces to contr. 5; 6; 8 and to suas.; contr. 9 praef. is incomplete.

<sup>2</sup> L. A. SUSSMAN 1978, 46-51; Arellius Fuscus, who is prominent in the Suasoriae, was possibly introduced in the lost preface.

and anecdotes make these sections especially attractive to the reader. The colores are absent from the Suasoriae; instead, the divisiones are discussed more fully. Descriptiones are added without a separate heading.

Being a 'descriptive' critic, Seneca also plays a part in the history of biography.

Language and Style

Language and style of the praefationes are correct and unobtrusive, but the impression they give is relaxed and personal (a distinguishing mark of good style: it is as if we could see the author at work. His respect for Cicero (contr. 10 praef. 7) does not prevent him from resorting to 'modern' stylistic means such as poetic vocabulary, pointed expressions, antitheses and at times even the emotional grandiloquence of declamation (contr. 10 praef. 6).<sup>1</sup> As Seneca avoids all that might look violent and forced, the effect of his style is not unfavorable. It was from Seneca that later authors like Ben Jonson learnt the secret of giving their writings a 'personal touch'. His subtle use of vocabulary shows especially in literary criticism, which is our next issue.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The Controversiae and Suasoriae are essentially works of literary criticism. Moreover there is a historical view of oratory: Seneca describes the change that oratory underwent during his lifetime. The passages he selects document the decline, which he is the first to diagnose.

Seneca's own standards are basically Ciceronian. An important principle is imitatio (contr. 1 praef. 6), but, as a literary critic, he is generous and undoctinal. Wherever he meets a talent he is ready to acknowledge it. He tries to eschew schematic labeling. Labienus, for him, is homo mentis quam linguae amarioris, 'a man who had a sharper mind than tongue' (contr. 4 praef. 2). He calls Sparsus hominem inter scholasticos sanum, inter sanos scholasticum meaning that 'among the schoolmen he ranked as sane, though among the sane he ranked as a schoolman' (contr. 1. 7. 15). As a literary critic Seneca is inspired by Cicero's Brutus, but he tries even more to characterize each orator individually. He prefers vivid and graphic epithets: lascivus, inaequaliter, facundus, decenter, culte, mordax, nasutus, praedulcis, vigor orationis. In the case of Pollio and Haterius he applies the method of synkrisis.

---

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 300.

The preface to the 3rd book discusses the gulf between forensic speech and scholastic declamation. The famous orator Cassius Severus deplors the alteration of standards. Far from overestimating declamation, Seneca the Elder in the Suasoriae tries to draw the attention of his sons to more significant literary genres, as is shown from his quotations from epic and historiography (cf. also suas. 6. 16).

Owing to his rare discernment in assessing the individual qualities of authors, Seneca was called the 'Horace of Augustan prose criticism'.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas II

Seneca traces the decline of oratory back to three causes: first, corruption of morals; second, the fact that political and forensic activity is not rewarded by a political influence worth striving for (he is aware therefore, that the political change is the true reason); third, there is a quasi 'biological' mechanism: the development has gone beyond its culminating point. This pattern of thought is akin to the 'allegory of ages' ascribed to a Seneca by Lactantius (inst. 7. 15. 14–16); perhaps he has our author<sup>2</sup> in mind, who was also an historian. The allegory of ages does not presuppose philosophical depth; it perfectly suits a Roman empiricist.

A Roman pater familias of the good old type (Sen. Helv. 17. 3; epist. 108. 22), Seneca seems to be averse to philosophy. He objects, however, less to philosophy as such than to patterns of behavior which might shock society (like vegetarianism). He appreciates the Elder Cato's practical wisdom (contr. 1 praef. 9) and even speaks of Stoic philosophy as tam sanctis fortibusque praeceptis, 'such chaste and rigorous precepts' (contr. 2 praef. 1). His Roman realism, combined with a sense of humor, contributed to his psychological insight and to his subtle portrayal of characters; the almost complete loss of his historical work is to be deplored.

<sup>1</sup> S. F. BONNER 1949, 148.

<sup>2</sup> L. A. SUSSMAN 1978, 141; a different view e.g. in M. GRIFFIN 1972, 1–9 (according to GRIFFIN, the allegory of ages is too philosophical for the rhetor averse to speculation; the context is redolent of a moral exemplum; not cogent). Perhaps the discussion is irrelevant, and Lactantius mixed up Annaeus Seneca with Annaeus (Annius) Florus.

Politically the Annaei in all probability sympathized initially with the Pompeians (cf. Seneca's liking for Labienus, contr. 10 praef. 4–5). Yet, there must have been close connections with the Caesarians through Asinius Pollio, who in 43 lived in Corduba. Moreover Seneca was related by marriage to C. Galerius, the influential governor of Egypt, and was an acquaintance of the noble Vinicii. Although Seneca lived in the hardest period of the Republic and in the happiest of the Principate, his verdict on the Principate is not enthusiastic. He admired Cicero at a moment when this was not particularly opportune. On the one hand he discerned the political reasons for the decay of oratory and criticized the burning of books; on the other his family was quickly promoted under the Emperors. The discrepancy is reminiscent of Tacitus.

Transmission

There are two totally different traditions:

1. The first group attests to an unabridged text of the Controversiae (books 1, 2, 7, 9, and 10, including the prefaces to 7, 9, and 10) and Suasoriae. The most important manuscripts are the Antverpiensis 411 (A; 10th century), the Bruxellensis 9594 (B; 9th century), and the Vaticanus Latinus 3872 (V; 10th century). In the archetype of the three manuscripts the Suasoriae were placed before the Controversiae, according to the curriculum of the schools of rhetoric. V contains many conjectures and interpolations; therefore, we often have to give preference to A and B, which are traced to a common hyparchetype. The younger manuscripts depend on V. The beginning of the Suasoriae and the prefaces to contr. 5, 6, and 8 are completely lost.

2. The other strand of tradition consists of the excerpts (E) from the Controversiae. They had been made early (roughly in the 4th century) for class use. The most important of about 90 manuscripts is the Montepessulanus (Montpellier, Univ., Section de Médecine) 126 (M; 10th century). Where we are in a position to compare both traditions, we realize that the epitomator not only abridged but also modified his text, by trying, for instance, to give its rhythm more fluency.

In the Controversiae we have to rely on the excerpts especially for the parts lacking in ABV: books 3–6 and 8, as well as the prefaces to books 1–4,<sup>1</sup> which fortunately survived unshortened.

There are about 30 manuscripts containing medieval commentaries on the excerpts; they are less relevant to textual criticism than to the history of Seneca's influence.

<sup>1</sup> Here, the prefaces to 7 and 10 are contained as well.

Influence

Seneca the Elder was the first to criticize the fashion of declamation and the decline of oratory; many authors of the Neronian and the Flavian epoch would follow in his footsteps. His Ciceronian standards paved the way for Quintilian. Even Seneca the philosopher, despite his adherence to a 'modern' style, in his literary judgments would side sometimes with his father.

The Controversiae and Suasoriae find followers in the imperial declaimer Calpurnius Flaccus<sup>1</sup> and in the Declamationes ascribed to Quintilian.<sup>2</sup> The fact that the Controversiae were epitomized early, testifies to the schoolmen's lively interest in this text. Seneca for us represents the practice of declamation, the educational role of which remained unchallenged for a long time. Anonymously, such exercises influenced a great variety of fields of ancient literature: not only, as might be expected, the novel, but also Roman law, with which there was some interaction.<sup>3</sup> Church Fathers like Tertullian and Augustine were familiar with declamatio; an author as late as Ennodius (d. 521), before renouncing the world, would write exemplary declamations for his students.

In the 9th century, to which we are indebted for the manuscript basis of our tradition, Walafrid Strabo (d. 849), after a long time, was the first to distinguish the two Senecas from each other.<sup>4</sup>

Seneca was quoted in florilegia, and scholars like Gerbert of Aurillac (d. 1003), Gilbert de la Poirée (d. 1154) and, of course, John of Salisbury (d. 1180) were familiar with his works. Nicolaus de Treveth (end of the 13th century) wrote a commentary on the excerpts.

The fanciful subjects of Controversiae afforded pabulum to novel writers. For example, the story of a girl who in a brothel remains a virgin is found in the Elder Seneca and in the Historia Apollonii regis

<sup>1</sup> Ed. PITHOU (together with Ps.-Quintilian), Paris 1580; P. BURMANN (together with Ps.-Quintilian), Leiden 1720; G. LEHNERT, Lipsiae 1903; L. A. SUSSMAN (TTrC), Leiden 1994.

<sup>2</sup> L. A. SUSSMAN, The Major Declamations Ascribed to Quintilian. A Translation, Frankfurt 1987.

<sup>3</sup> J. STROUX 1949. Suffice it to mention the doctrine of status and polarities like ius—aequitas; verba—voluntas. The 'unreality' of the laws presupposed in the declamationes has been over-emphasized.

<sup>4</sup> In the Modern Age this distinction is usually attributed to Raphael of Volterra (d. 1522) and Justus Lipsius (d. 1606), but already the 1490 edition of Seneca seems to distinguish Lucius (the philosopher) from 'Marcus' (the 'rhetor').

Tyri (which dates from late antiquity). Further traces appear in the medieval collection of short stories called Gesta Romanorum, in Boccaccio's (d. 1375) Decameron and in Leonardo Bruni (d. 1444; Antiocho e Stratonica).

Erasmus (d. 1536) published an interpolated text of our author (in the Froben Seneca, Basel 1529) and energetically advocated the reintroduction of declamatory exercises; even Milton (d. 1674) would have to go through them. The first (French) translation was written by Mathieu de Chaluët (Paris 1604). Madeleine de Scudéry (d. 1701) drew on contr. 1. 6 for her Ibrahim ou l'illustre Bassa. Ben Jonson (d. 1637) in his Discoveries (sec. 64) both wittily and literally transferred Seneca's literary portrait of Haterius (contr. 4 praef. 6–11) to Shakespeare, and that of Cassius Severus (contr. 3 praef. 1–4) to Bacon (sec. 71).<sup>1</sup> What seems to be the most vivid autobiographical passage of the same work (sec. 56) discusses the devastating influence of old age on memory and is equally taken from Seneca (contr. 1 praef. 2–5).

Seneca the Elder is one of our most important sources for schools of rhetoric, declamation, and mnemonics. His work, neglected for a long time, is a precious key to late Augustan prose. Moreover it gives us interesting glimpses into the Princes' political measures against literature. Seneca's personal style, its natural ease—reminiscent of Emperor Claudius, but more refined—and his subtle art of character portrayal strike a new note in Latin literature, unobtrusive but unmistakable.

Editions: The excerpts (liber declamationum Senecae) first published in: L. Annaei Senecae opera, Neapoli, Matth. MORAVUS 1475. * The fuller text (M. Annaei Senecae Declamationum libri X, Suasoriarum et Controversiarum libri VI) in: L. Annaei Senecae opera, Venetiis, Bern. DE CORIS 1490. * A. KIESSLING, Lipsiae 1872, repr. 1967. * H. J. MÜLLER, Wien 1887. * H. BORNECQUE (TTrN), 2 vols., Paris 1902, 2nd ed. 1932 (corr.). * M. WINTERBOTTOM (good TTrN), 2 vols., Cambridge, Mass. 1974. * L. HÅKANSON, Lipsiae 1989. * suas.: W. A. EDWARD (TTrC), Cambridge 1928. ** Ind. in: M. Annaei Senecae rhetoris opera quae extant. Integris N. FABRI, A. SCHOTTI, J. F. GRONOVII . . . commentariis illustrata et praeterea indice accuratissimo aucta. Accedunt J. SCHULTINGII . . . notae et emendationes, vol. 3, Amstelodami 1672. At the end of the volume: rerum et verborum . . . index locupletissimus

<sup>1</sup> B. JONSON, Discoveries, ed. by M. CASTELAIN, Paris 1906; see now B. JONSON, ed. by C. H. HERFORD, P. and E. SIMPSON, vol. 8. The Poems, The Prose Works, Oxford 2nd ed. 1954, lines 647–668; 479–507.

(28 pages in three columns). ** Bibl.: J. E. G. WHITEHORNE, The Elder Seneca. A Review of Past Work, Prudentia 1, 1969, 14–27. * J. FAIRWEATHER 1984, s. below. * L. A. SUSSMAN, The Elder Seneca and Declamation Since 1900. A Bibliography, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 557–577.

H. BARDON, Le vocabulaire de la critique littéraire chez Sénèque le Rhéteur, Paris 1940. * H. BARDON, Mécanisme et stéréotypie dans le style de Sénèque le Rhéteur, AC 12, 1943, 5–24. * S. F. BONNER, Roman Declamation in the Late Republic and Early Empire, Liverpool 1949, repr. 1969. * H. BORNECQUE, Les déclamations et les déclamateurs d'après Sénèque le Père, Lille 1902, repr. 1967. * M. CERATTI, La grammatica di Seneca il retore, Torino 1908. * E. FANTHAM, Imitation and Decline. Rhetorical Theory and Practice in the First Century after Christ, CPh 73, 1978, 102–116. * J. FAIRWEATHER, Seneca the Elder, Cambridge 1981. * J. FAIRWEATHER, The Elder Seneca and Declamation, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 514–556. * M. GRIFFIN, The Elder Seneca and Spain, JRS 62, 1972, 1–19. * R. HÄUSSLER, Neues zum spätrömischen Lebensaltervergleich, in: J. HARMATTA, ed., Actes du VII<sup>e</sup> Congrès de la FIEC, vol. 2, Budapest 1983, 183–191. * T. JANSON, Latin Prose Prefaces, Studies in Literary Conventions, Stockholm 1964. * E. M. JENKINSON, Further Studies in the Curriculum of the Roman Schools of Rhetoric in the Republican Period, SO 31, 1955, 122–130. * W. KROLL, Melete (declamatio), RE 15, 1932, 496–500; Rhetorik, RE suppl. 7, 1913, 1039–1138. * F. LANFRANCHI, Il diritto nei retori romani, Milano 1938. * C. W. LOCKYER, Jr., The Fiction of Memory and the Use of Written Sources: Convention and Practice in Seneca the Elder and Other Authors, diss. Princeton 1971 (DA 32, 3, 1971, 1491 A.). * O. ROSSBACH, L. Annaeus Seneca (Annaeus 16), RE 1, 1894, 2237–2240 and suppl. 1, 1903, 84–85. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Die Anfänge der institutionellen Rhetorik in Rom. Zur Vorgeschichte der augusteischen Rhetorenschulen, in: E. LEFÈVRE (ed.), Monumentum Chiloniense. Studien zur augusteischen Zeit. FS E. BURCK, Amsterdam 1975, 183–216. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, More on Seneca the Elder, Philologus 137, 1993, 38–52. * J. STROUX, Römische Rechtswissenschaft und Rhetorik, Potsdam 1949. * L. A. SUSSMAN, The Elder Seneca, Leiden 1978.

QUINTILIAN

M. Fabius Quintilianus from Calagurris in Spain studied in Rome, where his father was active as a rhetor. Among his teachers were the famous grammarian Remmius Palaemon and the orator Domitius Afer. He returned to his homeland and, in 68, followed Galba, governor of Hispania Tarraconensis, back to Rome. There he would teach for twenty years as the first professor of rhetoric paid by the state. His reputation was so great that he obtained even the consular decorations. In his private life, he was not spared heavy blows: he lost his nineteen-year-old consort and his two sons (6 prooem.). After his retirement from teaching Domitian made him tutor of the grandsons of his sister Domitilla. This position explains the praise he lavished on the tyrant.<sup>1</sup> He died about 96.<sup>2</sup>

We do not have the treatise De causis corruptae eloquentiae (which was not identical with the Tacitean Dialogus, cf. 6 prooem. 3); a speech which he later repented having published is also lost.<sup>3</sup> The Declamationes<sup>4</sup> are spurious. Preserved is his masterpiece, the Institutionis oratoriae libri XII, written during his retirement. He dedicated it to Vitorius Marcellus<sup>5</sup> (1 Prooem. 6); it was destined for his son Geta. The final redaction took somewhat more than two years. His editor Tryphon prompted the author to accelerate the publication (about 94).<sup>6</sup>

Survey of the Work

The 12 books<sup>7</sup> consist altogether of 115 thematic units. The parts are well-proportioned and in accord with each other. The organization of a huge bulk of material is a typically Roman achievement.

The 1st book discusses elementary instruction and the importance of grammar, music and other liberal arts for the orator. The 2nd is an introduction to rhetoric. Books 3–7 treat of inventio and dispositio (how to find and arrange material). Books 8–11 are on elocutio (style), memoria (mnemonics), and actio (delivery). Book 12<sup>8</sup> deals with the orator and the speech.

<sup>1</sup> 4 prooem. 3–5; 10. 1. 91–92; 3. 7. 9.

<sup>2</sup> The letters of Pliny the Younger, who perhaps studied with him (2. 14; 6. 6) are likely to have been written after his death.

<sup>3</sup> Moreover there had been a course of rhetoric, published against the author's will (3. 6. 68; 1 prooem. 7).

<sup>4</sup> Bibl. in L. A. SUSSMAN's translation, Frankfurt 1987; D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, More on Pseudo-Quintilian's Longer Declamations, HSPH 88, 1984, 113–137. The 19 major declamations cannot be genuine for linguistic reasons; Firmicus Maternus would use them in the 4th century. The minor declamations (1st–2nd century) are linguistically unobjectionable and were deemed genuine e.g. by P. AERODIUS and Constantin Ritter.

<sup>5</sup> O. I. SALOMIES, Quintilian and Vitorius Marcellus, Arctos 16, 1982, 153–158.

<sup>6</sup> In favor of a publication not later than 94: B. ZUCHELLI, Sulla data di pubblicazione dell'Institutio oratoria di Quintiliano, in: Filologia e forme letterarie, FS F. DELLA CORTE, 4, Urbino 1987, 47–60; in favor of 97–98: W. C. McDERMOTT and A. E. ORENTZEL, Quintilian and Domitian, Athenaeum 67, 1979, 9–26.

<sup>7</sup> The following books have prefaces: 1; 4; 5; 6; 7; 8; 12.

<sup>8</sup> C. J. CLASSEN, Der Aufbau des 12. Buches der Institutio oratoria Quintilians, MH 22, 1965, 181–190.

Book 10<sup>1</sup> deserves special mention, being a kind of literary history for the incipient orator.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Quintilian thoroughly studied all available books on rhetoric. We can hope to find out his sources by examining the entire tradition. Fortunately, Quintilian's interest is not limited to handbooks; he duly recognizes the important works. Cicero<sup>2</sup> is authoritative not only in matters of style but also for Quintilian's educational ideal. Apart from written books we must take into account the author's own experience (e.g. 6. 2. 25).

Although Quintilian shows less first-hand knowledge of Greek authors than of Latin ones, he gives Greek a place of honor in early education (1. 1. 12), discusses Greek literature at some length (10. 1. 46–84), and even quotes Plato in the original (2. 15. 27–28).

Literary Technique

Quintilian deliberately dissociates his work from ordinary compendia and tries to combine the seriousness of technical literature with the beauty of a book written for the large public. It is true that Quintilian (in contradistinction to Cicero's De oratore) rejects the form of dialogue, but within the limits of scholarly prose he strives for brilliance (3. 1. 3), graphical vividness, and emotional appeal (cf. 6. 2. 32): to convey his ideal of naturalness, he uses the simile of a normally-built body (2. 5. 11). Another simile illustrates several degrees of instruction: birds first distribute the food which they have collected in their bills among their nestlings; then they teach them how to fly, themselves leading the way; finally they leave them to themselves. A slimming treatment illuminates how to give up turgid style (2. 10. 6). There is even an exquisite musical parallel: the orator should master all genres of speeches like a singing-teacher all registers of his voice (2. 8. 15).<sup>3</sup> To explain that the orator, to move others, must be moved himself, Quintilian reminds us that water, fire, and colors impart their own qualities to neighboring objects (6. 2. 28); his personal confession ('I have frequently been so much moved', frequenter motus sum, ibid. 36) fits perfectly into his argument.

<sup>1</sup> B. SCHNEIDER, Die Stellung des 10. Buches im Gesamtplan der Institutio oratoria des Quintilian, WS n.s. 17, 1983, 109–125.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. 1. 6. 18; 5. 13. 52; 10. 1. 112.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also 12, praef. 2–4 (ship); 2. 4. 7 (bronze-casting); 12. 10. 3–9 (art history), cf. further F. AHLHEID, Analoga ontleend aan de atletiek bij Quintilianus, in: Apophoreta, FS A. D. LEEMAN, Amsterdam 1977, 3–10.

Some of his prefaces<sup>1</sup> go beyond the conventional topoi by talking about Quintilian's personal life (books 1, 4, 6, and 12). Quintilian is a master of literary portrayal. Like Seneca the Elder he knows how to give a personal touch to his message. Certain passages are especially lively such as those on the education of children (book 1), the duties of teachers (book 2), and the importance of reading certain authors for the future orator (10. 1).

Language and Style<sup>2</sup>

A clear and objective style is especially adequate to the character of a textbook. Quintilian does not avoid technical terms but uses them correctly. There is no excessive use of metaphors and his word order is, in the main, functional.

Nevertheless, our author knows how to impart some brilliance to his inflexible material;<sup>3</sup> parataxis can be replaced with complex periods, and prose rhythm extends even to purely technical passages. Change of mode serves variatio: Quintilian gives his advice not only by means of hortative subjunctive or gerundive: even the future may act as a mild imperative (e.g. 10. 1. 58; 3. 18). Stylistic ornaments are used, though with discretion.<sup>4</sup> Wherever justified by the content, the objective diction of the textbook yields to a rhetorical style, as in the discussion of emotions (6. 2. 2-7) and in polemic contexts.

Despite his classicism Quintilian conforms to the fashion of his day in using, for instance, adjectives as substantives.<sup>5</sup> An admirer of

<sup>1</sup> The first preface rivals that of Cicero's Orator: T. JANSON, Latin Prose Prefaces. Studies in Literary Conventions, Stockholm 1964, 50-59; the complex introduction to book 8 is held together by the theme of labor: F. AHLHEID 1983.

<sup>2</sup> S. esp. E. ZUNDEL, Lehrstil und rhetorischer Stil in Quintilians Institutio oratoria, Frankfurt 1981.

<sup>3</sup> Admiscere temptavimus aliquid nitoris 3. 1. 3.

<sup>4</sup> Anaphora (e.g. 10. 1. 55; 99; 115), chiasmus (10. 5. 14 alitur—renovatur), zeugma (5. 10. 121).

<sup>5</sup> He is not entirely blind to the qualities of his contemporaries: Sunt enim summa hodie, quibus illustratur forum, ingenia (inst. 10. 1. 122); P. HIRT, Über die Substantivierung des Adjectivums bei Quintilian, Progr. Berlin 1890.

Cicero,<sup>1</sup> though less in letter than in spirit, he does not limit himself to the actual vocabulary<sup>2</sup> of the great orator but emulates his great variety of tones and his sense of appropriateness.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In his use of grammar Quintilian follows the usage of the educated (usus) and mocks the pedantry of the champions of analogy.<sup>3</sup> He draws an illuminating comparison between the stylistic potential of Greek and that of Latin (12. 10. 27–38). In his view ethic and aesthetic discipline are linked to each other (2. 5. 11–12). Beginners should avoid both archaism and modernism,<sup>4</sup> especially the fashionable pointed style (12. 10. 73–76), although, at a more advanced stage, archaic and modern books may be studied (2. 5. 21–23). The severity of Quintilian's literary taste shows from his urging his students to give much care to style, but without falling into an idolatry of form (inst. 8 praef.).<sup>5</sup> Movere and delectare must not become impediments to docere; you should write, therefore, candide atque simpliciter (inst. 12. 11. 8). Quintilian, by his striving for clarity (perspicuitas), set lasting standards for orators and teachers. Yet his so-called classicism is free from narrowness: we should attempt to attain the quality of the Greek models; no style is the only true one, even the optimi auctores were mortals; it is up to us to find an equal poise between ingenium and ars as well as between form and content. Quintilian, therefore, is far from singling out an individual epoch as a universal model. Hence, the so-called literary history found in the tenth book of the Institutio (book 10) is not historical in the most literal sense of the word. Greek and Roman literature are juxtaposed on equal terms. Unlike Greek

<sup>1</sup> Ille se profecisse sciat, cui Cicero valde placebit (inst. 10. 1. 112).

<sup>2</sup> Abundant evidence in W. PETERSON, Commentary on Book 10, Oxford 1891, repr. 1967, xxxix–lxvii.

<sup>3</sup> A. ALBERTE, Cicerón y Quintiliano ante los principios analogistas y anomalistas, Minerva 1, 1987, 117–127.

<sup>4</sup> On his surly verdict on Seneca's 'modern' style: T. GELZER, Quintilians Urteil über Seneca. Eine rhetorische Studie, MH 27, 1970, 212–223; G. BALLAIRA, Il giudizio di Quintiliano sullo stile di Seneca (inst. 10. 1. 129 s.), GB 9, 1980, 173–180; K. HELDMANN 1980; it is typical that Quintilian lavishes especial praise on Terence (10. 1. 99), not on Plautus (against archaism 2. 5. 21).

<sup>5</sup> F. AHLHEID 1983.

theorists who tend to neglect Hellenism, Quintilian gives a comprehensive survey of archaic, classical, and Hellenistic Greek literature without dissecting it into periods. To our Roman's mind, great literature in its entirety is a live presence. Valid achievements are possible at any time and in any genre.

Ideas II

These are some principles of Quintilian's educational concept: his ideal is the perfect orator who should be a good man. Language and speech are his specific medium. Besides language and rhetoric, which take pride of place, other subjects are part of the curriculum (ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία). In Quintilian's as in Cicero's view (cf. the De oratore) a future orator should possess a solid general education (1. 10. 2-4), since it lends him a hidden power and is felt even if the orator does not show it off (ibid. 7; cf. Cic. de orat. 1. 72-73). Music<sup>1</sup> is the first of the artes to be discussed; it teaches how to move becomingly, how to give one's speech a graceful rhythm, and how to read poetic texts correctly. Mathematical disciplines convey some formal training (1. 10. 34 acui ingenia); they help the orator especially to find a good line of argument; the same is true of dialectics, discussed by Quintilian within the framework of philosophy, not that of the artes (12. 2. 10-14). There is as yet no established system of artes liberales in Quintilian.<sup>2</sup>

Quintilian emphasizes the ethical orientation of education; rhetoric has to serve pedagogy. Unlike the sophists, Quintilian pursues a moral aim: by studying rhetoric, the student should develop virtus. We should talk about virtue and teach it. Philosophical books are part of the orator's equipment. Yet, on the whole, compared to rhetoric, philosophy is less important in Quintilian than it had been in Cicero: philosophia simulari potest, eloquentia non potest, 'philosophy may be counterfeited, but eloquence never' (inst. 12. 3. 12).

<sup>1</sup> U. MÜLLER, Zur musikalischen Terminologie der antiken Rhetorik. Ausdrücke für Stimmanlage und Stimmgebrauch bei Quintilian, inst. 11. 3, Archiv für Musikwissenschaft 26, 1969, 29-48; 105-124; M. VON ALBRECHT, Musik und Rhetorik bei Goethe und Quintilian, in: M. VON ALBRECHT, W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik in Antike und Neuzeit, Frankfurt 1987, 31-50; G. WILLE, Quintilian, in: Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. by F. BLUME, Kassel sine anno, s.v. Quintilian, Sp. 1818-1820.

<sup>2</sup> At the age of seven, the student learnt reading, writing, and arithmetic with the ludi magister. At fourteen, he read poets and historians with the grammaticus. Music and geometry were secondary subjects; sport, religion, and politics were not taught. From his fifteenth year onward, he studied with the rhetor (controversiae, suasoriae, and philosophy), and listened to speeches of famous orators and to advice given by great jurists.

Education has to begin early. Especially in its first years a child should be surrounded with good examples both of speech and morals. The greatest responsibility rests with the parents; they have to provide the early education and by their example prevent spoiling and corruption. Early instruction should combine intellectual and emotional development including voluntary movements and play instinct. Greek is learnt before Latin.

School is preferable to private lessons since staying in a group facilitates learning: it is easier to imitate fellow students than the teacher, and the latter is better motivated by a large audience.

A teacher has to meet stringent requirements: he has to be a father and a friend. Above all he has to develop the right attitude towards his students and maintain self-control. When criticising others he should beware of offending them. A teacher should get into the spirit of his function and accordingly transform himself. His demeanor must bear the stamp of sincerity; as emotion is the mother of eloquence he should first of all be moved himself and graphically imagine the ideas he wants to convey to others. An educator is not a dealer.

A student has his own dignity which must not be impaired. Corporal punishment was then in common use; Quintilian rejects it as a personal injury (1. 3. 14–17). More effective is praise; the same is true of love for the teacher, which should be gradually supplanted, however, by love for the subject matter. To make learning a success, there must be mutual pietas and concordia between teacher and student (2. 9). Quintilian agrees with the Theodoreans in deeming precepts not universally valid; according to circumstances they have to be changed and even revoked; what is important is to recognize individual aptitudes and foster them correspondingly (2. 8): the divergent tendencies of talents should be balanced by the teacher to avoid narrowness. Faults should be corrected according to the student's capabilities in order to keep hope alive. Method is conditioned by the structure of the subject matter. Variation in the form of the didactic dialogue is necessary; the same is true for breaks. It is an aim of pedagogy to have the students find out things by themselves and to render the teacher dispensable (2. 5. 13).

Quintilian recommends that the youth learn by heart good texts—not their own products—in order to enrich their vocabulary and style (2. 7. 1–4). Adults should prepare their speeches written, even ‘carved’ into shape (12. 9. 16). A new domain discovered by Quintilian is the tactics of discussion.<sup>1</sup> The doctrine of the orator, his moral attitude, and his duties (book 12) are treated more fully than they are in Cicero.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

Only a few of the numerous manuscripts are old; they complement each other:

1st group (A): Ambrosianus E 153 sup. (A; 9th century),

2nd group (B): Bernensis 351 (Bn; 9th century), the older parts of the Bambergensis (Bg; 10th century); Parisinus Nostradamensis 18 527 (N; 10th century), 3rd group (C): the later manuscripts (15th century), including the more recent parts of the Bambergensis.

The Ambrosianus and the Bernensis have equal claim to authority. Only where they disagree or are lacking (they have lacunas) should we consider the younger manuscripts (C), the evidence of which has to be judged with skepticism. This is true even of the Parisinus Lat. 7 723 (P; 15th century) which had been highly rated by RADERMACHER.

Influence

Quintilian’s beneficial influence is clearly felt in Pliny’s Letters, the Tacitean Dialogus and probably also in the matter-of-fact style of Suetonius. At first the Institutio did not meet with the response it deserved, for Fronto and his followers turned to archaism. Teachers of rhetoric like Fortunatianus and Julius Victor—heavily exploited our author (Julius Victor, therefore, for us, is as good as a manuscript of Quintilian). Hilary, in his De trinitate, extended his imitation of Quintilian even to the number of books. Jerome, Rufinus, and <sup>1</sup> On altercatio 6. 4. 1: Do not stick obstinately to points in which you have been confuted! Divert your opponent, surprise him, let him overshoot the mark! Presence of mind counts more than anything else (12. 5).

<sup>2</sup> M. WINTERBOTTOM, edition, praef.; M. WINTERBOTTOM, Fifteenth Century Manuscripts of Quintilian, CQ n.s. 17, 1967, 339–369; C. E. MURGIA, A Problem in the Transmission of Quintilian’s Institutio oratoria, CPh 75, 1980, 312–320.

Cassiodorus mentioned our author. His educational ideal of universal knowledge (an ideal which is ultimately Ciceronian) might have influenced Martianus Capella and even Augustine.

The manuscripts known in the Middle Ages, especially in France, were mostly in lacunose condition. Lupus of Ferrières<sup>1</sup> (d. after 862) had Quintilian copied, among other authors. In 10th–11th century Germany, a complete copy of Quintilian was available, though even there most readers were satisfied with anthologies; the full text would be rediscovered by Poggio in St. Gall in 1415/1416.<sup>2</sup>

Quintilian influenced literary critics and teachers above all from the 15th to the 17th century. Petrarch (d. 1374) had written a letter to Quintilian; Lorenzo Valla (d. 1457) classed him higher than Cicero,<sup>3</sup> Filelfo (d. 1481) libeled his Latin as ‘Hispanic’.<sup>4</sup> Quintilian’s pertinent verdicts on certain authors would have a history of their own.<sup>5</sup> He shaped the taste and formed the syllabus and set his stamp on the theory of all arts, including music.<sup>6</sup> Erasmus thoroughly studied Quintilian, Luther preferred him to almost all authors, Melanchthon recommended him for studying. For modern Europe Quintilian was a guide to independent thought and speech. The baroque age ushered in what may be called a revival of Quintilian; in his footsteps, for example, J. Matth. Meyfart (d. 1642) wrote the first important book on rhetoric in German (Coburg 1634). Quintilian’s system was taught in classrooms<sup>7</sup> up to the end of the 18th century—partly in abridged editions (e.g. C. Rollin, Paris 1715). J. S. Bach, who as a teacher of Latin was a colleague of J. M. Gesner (d. 1761), an expert

<sup>1</sup> P. LEHMANN, Die Institutio oratoria des Quintilianus im Mittelalter, Philologus 89, 1934, 349–383, esp. 354–359.

<sup>2</sup> O. SEEL 1977, 259–265.

<sup>3</sup> M. WEGNER, Altertumskunde, München 1951, 30; on Quintilian’s influence s. now: C. J. CLASSEN, Quintilian and the Revival of Learning in Italy, HumLov 43, 1994, 77–98.

<sup>4</sup> G. VOIGT, Die Wiederbelebung des classischen Alterthums, Berlin 1893, 1, 3rd ed., 464.

<sup>5</sup> F. QUADLBAUER, Livi lactea ubertas. Bemerkungen zu einer quintilianischen Formel und ihrer Nachwirkung, in: E. LEFÈVRE, E. OLSHAUSEN, eds., Livius. Werk und Rezeption, FS E. BURCK, München 1983, 347–366.

<sup>6</sup> J. KRÄMER, Zur Frühgeschichte der musikalischen Rhetorik: Joachim Burmeister, IJM 2, 1993, 101–112.

<sup>7</sup> Baroque classroom teaching of rhetoric is reflected in a manuscript discovered by the author of the present book. It will be first published by: T. FEIGENBUTZ, A. REICHENSPERGER, Barockrhetorik und Jesuitenpädagogik. Vulcano’s Sagata Pallas (TTc), 2 vols., Tübingen 1996.

on Quintilian, paid an exceptional homage to Quintilian in his Musical Offering.<sup>1</sup> Goethe, when a student, put down 19 excerpts from books 1, 2, and 10 of Quintilian's Institutio (in his Ephemerides 1770–1771).<sup>2</sup> Quintilian's disappearance from the syllabus of Jesuit Colleges contributed to the waning of his influence. Another factor was the contempt for rhetoric which came into vogue with the rise of romanticism.

Mommsen (RG 5, 70) deemed the Institutio 'one of the most eminent works we possess from Roman antiquity'. In the 20th century Luciano Albini (Pope John Paul I) addressed an epistle to Quintilian, wishing that his methods and messages should not sink into oblivion.<sup>3</sup>

Editions: Phil. DE LIGUAMINE (publisher), with a letter of Io. Ant. CAMPANUS, Romae 1470. * Io. ANDREAS (Bishop of Aleria), Romae 1470. * G. L. SPALDING (TC), 4 vols., Lipsiae 1798–1816, vol. 5: suppl. vol. (on textual problems) by C. T. ZUMPTIUS, Lipsiae 1829, vol. 6: s. Lexicon. * C. HALM, Lipsiae 1868–1869. * L. RADERMACHER, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1907, 3rd ed. 1959, rev. V. BUCHHEIT. * H. E. BUTLER (TTr), 4 vols., London 1921–1922. * M. WINTERBOTTOM, 2 vols., Oxford 1970. * J. COUSIN (TTr), 7 vols. (complete), Paris 1975–1980. * H. RAHN (TTr), 2 vols., Darmstadt 1972; 2nd ed. 1988 (rev.). * Book 1: F. H. COLSON (TC), Cambridge 1924. * Book 3: J. ADAMIETZ (TC), München 1966. * Book 6, ch. 3 (De risu): G. MONACO, Palermo 1967. * Book 8: G. A. KENNEDY, diss. Harvard 1954. * Book 10: E. BONNELL (TC), Berlin 6th ed. 1912. * W. PETERSON (TC), Oxford 1891, repr. 1967. * Book 11. 3. 84–124: U. MAIER-EICHHORN (C), s. below. * Book 12: R. G. AUSTIN (TC), Oxford 1948; corr. 2nd ed. 1965. ** Ps.-Quintilian, Declamationes maiores: G. LEHNERT, Lipsiae 1905. * L. HÅKANSON, Stutgardiae 1982. * L. A. SUSSMAN (Tr), Frankfurt 1987. * minores: C. RITTER, Lipsiae 1884. * M. WINTERBOTTOM (TC), Berlin 1984. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY (T, ind.), Stutgardiae 1989. ** Lexicon: E. BONNELL, Lipsiae 1834 (suppl. vol. to G. L. SPALDING's edition). * E. ZUNDEL, Clavis Quintiliana, Quintilians Institutio oratoria aufgeschlüsselt nach rhetorischen Begriffen, Darmstadt 1989. ** Bibl.: J. ADAMIETZ, Quintilians Institutio oratoria, ANRW 32, 4, Berlin 1986, 2226–2271, bibl. 2266–2271. * L. HÅKANSON, Die quintilianischen Deklamationen in der neueren Forschung, ANRW 32, 4, 1986, 2272–2306, bibl. 2301–2306.

<sup>1</sup> U. KIRKENDALE, Bach und Quintilian. Die Institutio oratoria als Modell des Musikalischen Opfers, in: M. v. ALBRECHT, W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik in Antike und Neuzeit, Frankfurt 1987, 85–107.

<sup>2</sup> O. SEEL 1977, 288–313; later, Goethe's judgment on Quintilian would become negative (CONTE, LG 517).

<sup>3</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 317–318, n. 86.

J. ADAMIETZ, s. Bibl. * F. AHLHEID, Quintilian. The Preface to Book VIII and Comparable Passages in the Institutio oratoria, Amsterdam 1983. * B. APPEL, Das Bildungs- und Erziehungsideal Quintilians nach der Institutio oratoria, diss. München 1914. * K. BARWICK, Remmius Palaemon und die römische ars grammatica, Philologus suppl. 15, 2, Leipzig 1922. * E. BOLAFFI, La critica filosofica e letteraria in Quintiliano, Latomus 15, 1956, 532–543. * J. F. D'ALTON, Roman Literary Theory and Criticism, London 1931. * M. L. CLARKE, Quintilian on Education, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Silver Latin II: Empire and Aftermath, London 1975, 98–118. * J. COUSIN, Études sur Quintilien, 2 vols., Paris 1936, repr. (unchanged, with add.) 1967. * J. COUSIN, Recherches sur Quintilien. Manuscrits et éditions, Paris 1975. * M. J. DEWAR, Mollifying Quintilian, Hermes 122, 1994, 122–125. * J. DINGEL, *Scholastica materia. Untersuchungen zu den Declamationes minores und der Institutio oratoria Quintilians*, Berlin 1988. * E. FANTHAM, Quintilian on Performance: Traditional and Personal Elements in Institutio, Phoenix 36, 1982, 243–263. * K. HELDMANN, Antike Theorien über Entwicklung und Verfall der Redekunst, München 1982. * K. HELDMANN, Dekadenz und literarischer Fortschritt bei Quintilian und bei Tacitus, Poetica 12, 1980, 1–23. * J. H. HENDERSON, Quintilian and the Progymnasmatia, A&A 37, 1991, 82–99. * L. HÅKANSON, Textkritische Studien zu den größeren pseudo-quintilianischen Deklamationen, Lund 1974. * G. KENNEDY, Quintilian, New York 1969. * J. KOPPERSCHMIDT, Quintilian De argumentis. Oder: Versuch einer argumentationstheoretischen Rekonstruktion der antiken Rhetorik, in: Rhetorik. Ein internationales Jahrbuch 2, 1981, 59–74. * W. KROLL, Rhetorik, RE suppl. 7, 1940, 1039–1138. * F. KÜHNERT, Quintilians Erörterung über den Witz (inst. 6. 3), Philologus 106, 1962, 29–59; 305–314. * KÜHNERT, Bildung und Redekunst. * U. MAIER-EICHHORN, Die Gestikulation in Quintilians Rhetorik, Frankfurt 1989. * O. SEEL, Quintilian oder die Kunst des Redens und Schweigens, Stuttgart 1977. * F. R. VARWIG, Der rhetorische Naturbegriff bei Quintilian. Studien zu einem Argumentationstopos in der rhetorischen Bildung der Antike, Heidelberg 1976. * M. WINTERBOTTOM, Quintilian and the vir bonus, JRS 54, 1964, 90–97. * M. WINTERBOTTOM, Quintilian and Rhetoric, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Silver Latin II: Empire and Aftermath, London 1975, 79–97. * M. WINTERBOTTOM, Problems in Quintilian, London 1970. * G. WÖHRLE, Actio. Das fünfte officium des antiken Redners, Gymnasium 97, 1990, 31–46, esp. 43–45.

PLINY THE ELDER

Life and Dates

C. Plinius Secundus from Novum Comum<sup>1</sup> was a native of the Transpadana as had been Catullus (nat. praef. 1). From Plin. epist. 3. 5. 7 we may conclude that he was born in A.D. 23–24. He came to Rome at an early age and joined the general and tragedian P. Pomponius Secundus, whose biography he would write later on. Military service in the cavalry brought him to Germany. He practised for some time as an advocate (Plin. epist. 3. 7). During the second half of Nero's reign he seems to have deliberately abstained from public service. Later, Vespasian almost daily entrusted him with official duties (Plin. epist. 3. 5. 9). He served as an imperial governor in Spain and elsewhere (Plin. epist. 3. 5. 17). He must have seen Gaul (nat. 2. 150) and Africa (nat. 7. 36). As a prefect of the Roman fleet he was stationed at Misenum when the eruption of Vesuvius in 79 cost him his life (Plin. epist. 6. 16). During the catastrophe he gave proof of scientific interest, personal courage, and selflessness.

At any spare moment which his official duties left him he restlessly devoted himself to scholarship. He had books read to him and was permanently accompanied by a shorthand writer. His nephew inherited a collection of excerpts on 160 scrolls written on both sides and in the minutest hand (Plin. epist. 3. 5. 17).

Survey of Works

The following works are lost: De iaculatione equestri; De vita Pomponi Secundi; Bellorum Germaniae libri XX<sup>2</sup> (quoted by Tacitus ann. 1. 69. 3); Studiosus (three books on the study of oratory; deemed 'pedantic' by Quintilian, inst. 11. 3. 143); Dubii sermonis libri VIII (s. below Ideas I: Reflections on Literature); A fine Aufidii Bassi libri XXXI (an historical work crammed with facts, inimical to Nero and favoring the Flavians; it was published posthumously by his nephew).

<sup>1</sup> Suet. fig. p. 92 Reifferscheid. His nephew gives us important information on his biography (epist. 3. 5; 5. 8; 6. 16; and 6. 20); R. COPONY, Fortes Fortuna iuvat. Fiktion und Realität im ersten Vesuv-Brief des jüngeren Plinius (6. 16), GB 14, 1987, 215–228.

<sup>2</sup> K. SALLMANN, *Der Traum des Historikers: Zu den Bella Germaniae des Plinius und zur jüdisch-claudischen Geschichtsschreibung*, ANRW 2, 32, 1, 1984, 578–601.

The Natural History in 37 books has come down to us. It is preceded by a dedicatory epistle to Titus, Vespasian's son and co-regent, from the time of his 6th consulate (77 or 78).

Survey of the Natural History (according to books)

1 Dedication to Titus; general table of contents and sources; 2 cosmology; 3–6 geography; 7 anthropology; 8–11 zoology; 12–19 botanics; 20–27 medical botanics; 28–32 medical zoology; 33–37 mineralogy (and its artistic use). Cosmology and geography form a block, as do anthropology and zoology; therefore, the whole is an annular composition formed by four groups of five and two groups of eight books:<sup>1</sup> inanimate matter (2–6 and 33–37); men and animals (7–11 and 28–32); plants (12–19 and 20–27).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Unlike most classical authors, who are reticent or vague about their sources, Pliny in his 1st book gives us lists of authors for each of the following books. In principle authors are adduced in the same order as they appear in the text; exceptions may be owing to later additions made by Pliny.

Pliny names over 400 authors, of which 146 are Roman. As he says in his preface he excerpted 100 selected authors. Supposedly, Pliny first established a stock of basic information from relatively few and mostly Latin authors such as Varro and then gradually enriched it with excerpts from other sources. Simplistic hypotheses concerning Pliny's sources should be treated with mistrust, for Pliny declares: auctorum neminem unum sequar, sed ut quemque verissimum in quaque parte arbitror, 'I shall not follow any single authority, but such as I shall judge most reliable in their several departments' (3. 1).

Possible sources for cosmology (book 2) are Posidonius, Fabianus (also Nigidius Figulus), Nechepso-Petosiris, Epigenes, and Thrasyllus.

Pliny's geography (books 3–6) perhaps adheres to the pattern of the geographical books of Varro's Antiquitates, completing them from Augustus' censor's lists (formulae) and the map of Agrippa, whose conscientiousness is praised by Pliny (3. 17). In his chapters on Germany he could make use of his own experience. Additional information came from Nepos (who is heavily blamed for his credulity: 5. 4), Licinius Mucianus (for Armenia), and Statius Sebosus (especially for Africa). Greek sources are Juba, Isidore of Charax, and some learned treatise on islands and their changes of names.

<sup>1</sup> F. RÖMER 1983.

For anthropology (book 7) Varro is the principal source, enriched, among others, from collections of exempla and Trogus (as a mediator of Aristotelian material) and Juba (who, in this case, is absent from the index).

The books on zoology (8–11) rely on material from Aristotle and Theophrastus found in Trogus; moreover, Juba furnished information on African and oriental animals. Notes from Varro, Mucianus, Fenestella, and others complete the mosaic.

Botanical lore (books 12–19) is drawn from Theophrastus and agricultural authors, especially Varro and Celsus. Parallels with Dioscorides point to Sextius Niger. Some scientific and botanical material not found in Theophrastus is traced to unknown sources.

The botanical part of medicine (books 20–27) mostly comes from Sextius Niger (as is evinced by the permanent closeness to Dioscorides) and from Bassus. Nor does Pliny ignore Theophrastus, Antonius Castor (his teacher of botanics), Celsus, and others. Varro, who furnished much material, is not always named.

The medical use of animal substances (books 28–32), a real treasury of classical superstition—is discussed mainly after Xenocrates, Anaxilaus, and Varro (occasionally after Verrius Flaccus). The sections on salt as a remedy (31. 96–105) are based on a serious Greek source. Pliny's authorities on mineralogy (books 33–37) probably were Xenocrates, Archilaus, Juba, Theophrastus, and Varro. Pasiteles was one of Pliny's sources for art history.

Pliny's work is not a textbook; today it would be called an encyclopedia addressed to the educated general reader.<sup>1</sup> In this regard Varro is Pliny's most important model. This genre is not held in great esteem nowadays, since encyclopedias tend to appear at the ends of periods interested in scholarship; Pliny, however, as a true successor of Varro, has a high opinion of his task, as we shall see later.

Literary Technique

If Pliny is to be believed, his Natural History is not primarily intended to be a work of literature; he wants it to be useful.<sup>2</sup> Yet it is much more than a mere commentarius: the author is fully aware of his readership; in fact his work repeatedly, especially during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, held primary importance, not only as a collection of information but also as a complete description of man's environment written in good Latin.

<sup>1</sup> N. P. HOWE 1985.

<sup>2</sup> G. A. SEECK 1985.

The overall structure is symmetrical (s. Survey of Works). The fact that animals are discussed before plants, while vegetable remedies range before animal ones is not a fault, therefore, but a consequence of the basic concept.

The modern reader may be astonished to find in a Natural History so much space given to man's artistic and scholarly activities. At every step Pliny tries to establish a link between nature and man. This reflects on his literary technique: he tries to enliven his lists of facts by interspersing them with anecdotes, paradoxes, and, above all, moral considerations,<sup>1</sup> which allow the reader not only to understand the described objects but also to relate to them personally. Such passages reveal the author's didactic abilities.

The introductions to the books are elaborated with special care. The preface to the entire work is a letter to Titus. As anyone would have expected, this epistle is crammed with facts and quotations, though anything but stupid or haphazard. It conveys a typical impression of Pliny as an author. With rhetorical skill, he first depreciates his own work, then enhances his addressee who, finally, imparts some of his own dignity to the Naturalis historia.<sup>2</sup>

Even as a writer on natural history, Pliny remains a Roman and a moralist. At the same time he wishes to amaze his readers and indulges in paradox statements. As might be expected from a Latin, he is no less eager to teach than to please. Nevertheless there are many varieties of style in the Naturalis historia ranging from dry enumeration to passionate diatribe.

Language and Style

Pliny's language<sup>3</sup> contains many technical terms, most of them Greek. He apologizes to his readers for using them; as he does for treating certain subject matters which are anything but sublime (quarundam rerum humilitas, 'the down-to-earth character of some of my subjects' 14. 7; aut rusticis vocabulis aut externis, 'terms either rustic or foreign', nat. praef. 13). His striving for conciseness entails, for example, ellipsis (omission of words), employment of the neuter forms of adjectives as nouns, and a free use of participles. Dry lists alternate with ornate passages in a rhetorical vein. Here we find features typical of Silver Latin: antithesis, exclamation, and artificial word order. It is true that Columella's and Celsus' Latin is more classical and more fluent; nevertheless it is Pliny's achievement to have mastered in Latin the entire range of scientific knowledge of his time.

<sup>1</sup> A. LOCHER, The Structure of Pliny the Elder's Natural History, in: R. FRENCH, F. GREENAWAY, eds., 1986, 20-29.

<sup>2</sup> T. KÖVES-ZULAUF, Die Vorrede der plinianischen Naturgeschichte, WS 86, n.s. 7, 1973, 134-184.

<sup>3</sup> J. MILLER, Der Stil des älteren Plinius, Innsbruck 1883; P. V. COVA, R. GAZICH, G. E. MANZONI, G. MELZANI, Studi sulla lingua di Plinio il Vecchio, Milano 1986;

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Pliny pretends to write for the humile vulgus, farmers, artisans, and studiorum otiosi (nat. praef. 6), he does so, however, in the context of a flattering address to Titus. He calls his Naturalis historia books levioris operae, 'works of a lighter nature' (nat. praef. 12), for they neither give free space to ingenium nor allow of rhetorical adornment. Instead, they require rustic and barbaric words. He quotes Lucilius who did not wish to be read by the most learned people (nat. praef. 7). All these are formulas of modesty. Pliny seems to play, as it were, 'a game of hide-and-seek between technical literature and belles-lettres'.<sup>1</sup> Basically, he wants to write a work meeting literary standards: he was the first to venture upon a comprehensive description of nature and man in Latin. We may believe him that he wants to serve the large public and the common weal. The form of his work meets the readers' demands: Pliny has a high opinion of the task of writing Latin prose; being a Roman, he actually prefers prose to poetry.<sup>2</sup>

In his lost eight books Dubii sermonis, Pliny (like Varro) recognized the importance of the live linguistic usage as opposed to analogy. In contradistinction to the classicizing tastes of Remmius Palaemon he does not abstain from quoting early Latin authors. His reflections on euphony are a rare feature.

---

P. V. COVA, La lingua di Plinio il Vecchio. Studi e problemi, BStudLat 16, 1986, 47-54.

<sup>1</sup> G. A. SEECK 1985, 431.

<sup>2</sup> N. P. HOWE 1985.

Ideas II

In an excursus on divinity and providence (2. 14–27) Pliny rejects polytheism and understands God as a process between human beings and almost defines him in terms of function: Deus est mortali iuvare mortalem et haec ad aeternam gloriam via, ‘for mortal to aid mortal—this is God; and this is the road to eternal glory’ (2. 18).<sup>1</sup> This is how Pliny describes the ancient Roman attitude, and this is his motivation of the apotheosis of emperors. Such ideas are immediately juxtaposed to the Epicurean dogma saying that gods do not care about mortal affairs (2. 20), a statement to be revoked later (2. 26), after an excursus on the belief in fate and fortune. Finally, God appears as naturae potentia (2. 27). Correspondingly, ‘nature, mother of all creation’ (parens rerum omnium natura) is addressed and hailed like a godhead (37. 205). She plays the role of providence (15. 7; 9. 20; 22. 16–17); Pliny’s view is anthropocentric: it is for man’s sake that sympathy and antipathy reign in nature (20. 1).

The equation of world, nature, and God is Stoic (2 pr.). Pliny also alludes to the Stoic doctrine of universal conflagration (7. 73). Like the Stoics, he approves of suicide (2. 27; 156; 28. 9). The passages on the smallness of the earth (2. 174) with their reprobation of human vanity may ultimately be traced to Posidonius. Like the Stoics, Pliny does not draw radical conclusions from his theoretical abrogation of polytheism: myth, popular religion, and state religion remain unchallenged.

Other ideas deviate from Stoic optimism: is nature perhaps no more than a stepmother (cf. 7. 1)? The lot of man is deplorable (25. 23), although he is able to improve it by acquiring knowledge of nature. The progress of civilization is harmful because it implies alienation from nature (33. 3; 36. 3). In innumerable instances Pliny proves to be a moralist in the ancient Roman vein, scourging moral decline and glorifying the old times. Such sermons reminiscent of satire depend on Cynic popular philosophy. Sometimes Pliny strikes almost prophetic notes: he does not shrink from condemning war (34. 138), an idea which would not have crossed the mind of a Roman of the good old type. And he regrets the decline of scholarship under the pax Romana (2. 117–118; 14. 1–6).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also nat. praef. 3 (to Titus): nec quicquam in te mutavit fortunae amplitudo, nisi ut prodesse tantundem posses et velles. Pliny declares that the wish to be useful was the motive of his literary activity (praef. 16).

Nevertheless, he labels astronomical research as furor (2. 3; cf. 87). Unlike Seneca, who in the preface of his Naturales quaestiones praises pure knowledge, Pliny is not a philosopher. With many of his contemporaries he shares an excessive respect for book-learning and authorities. Just because they had been transmitted, he feels obliged to transmit even things he does not believe (2. 85; 30. 137). Correspondingly, he confuses the rationalism of mathematical cosmology with the mysticism of astrology. However, we are indebted to him for some remains of the 'heliodynamic' doctrine (supposedly originating from Chaldaea): the sun influences the movement of the planets; the latter interact (which is true even of their colors); they produce winds, whereas comets send lightnings. There are 72 constellations.<sup>1</sup> Contrary to the principles of modern natural science, Pliny does not consider nature on its own but in its relationship to man and practical life.

Transmission

There are roughly 200 manuscripts. They fall into two groups: the best of the so-called vetustiores are the codex Moneus rescriptus (5th century: nat. 11. 6–15. 77 with lacunae), the Leidensis Vossianus fol. n. 4 (9th century: nat. 2. 196–6. 51 with lacunae), and the Bambergensis (9th century: nat. 32–37). Moreover, the text of the vetustiores has survived in fragments from late antiquity (5th–6th century), in medieval excerpts (e.g. in the Parisinus Salmasianus 10 318, about 800) and in the guise of corrections and additions found in manuscripts of the other class.<sup>2</sup>

The so-called recentiores are traced to a single archetype; there, the passage 4. 67–5. 34 had been inserted into 2. 187. The main representative of this group is a rather old manuscript, the parts of which are scattered over three countries: Vaticanus 3861, Parisinus 6796, Leidensis Vossianus fol. n. 61. Many codices derive from the Parisinus 6795 (9th–10th century). The so-called recentiores tradition has turned out to be older than expected but no better.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> 'Plinian' astronomy would see a late revival in central Europe: B. S. EASTWOOD, Plinian Astronomy in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, in: R. FRENCH, F. GREENAWAY, eds., 1986, 197–251.

<sup>2</sup> B. J. CAMPBELL, Two Manuscripts of the Elder Pliny, AJPh 57, 1936, 113–123 (on the Cheltenhamensis).

<sup>3</sup> J. DESANGES, Le manuscrit (CH) et la classe des 'recentiores' de l'Histoire Naturelle de Pline l'Ancien, Latomus 25, 1966, 508–525; J. DESANGES, Note complémentaire sur trois manuscrits 'recentiores' de l'Histoire Naturelle de Pline l'Ancien, ibid. 895–899; H. WALTER, Studien zur Handschriftengeschichte der Naturalis historia des Älteren Plinius. Ein Erfahrungsbericht, in: Forschungsbericht der Universität Mannheim

Influence<sup>1</sup>

Pliny the historian influenced Tacitus; Pliny the teacher of rhetoric, Quintilian. The authority enjoyed by the Natural History can hardly be overrated. Gellius, Apuleius, and Tertullian are our first witnesses. Gargilius Martialis (3rd century) and C. Julius Solinus (Collectanea rerum memorabilium, mid-3rd century) excerpted Pliny; in the 4th century the so-called Medicina Plinii and the versified Liber medicinalis of Q. Serenus relied on him. Martianus Capella and Isidore learnt from Pliny. At the beginning of the 8th century Bede possessed a good manuscript of Pliny; his classical education was based on Pliny and Virgil. Alcuin and Dungal quoted Pliny as a source on astronomy.<sup>2</sup> The Northumbrian Encyclopedia, written in an Anglo-Saxon monastery, was a collection of astronomical information for computists and contained extracts from Pliny. Dicuil (9th century) drew on Pliny for his De mensura orbis terrae. Robert of Cricklade (12th century) made an extract entitled Defloratio<sup>3</sup> for King Henry II. Not surprisingly, Pliny also figures among Chaucer's sources.

During the Renaissance Pliny found wide acceptance: there were 15 incunables (including three Italian translations), followed by no fewer than 43 editions in the 16th century. The rediscovery of classical authors went hand in hand with a creative discovery of the real world. Here Pliny had a double function: he furnished both factual information and good Latin terms. With the Renaissance, therefore, the Natural History became a textbook and gave rise to commentaries. Moreover, Pliny proved to be helpful to archeologists; his evidence, for instance, made possible the identification of the group of Laocoon excavated in January, 1506 (nat. 36. 37).<sup>4</sup> Although the authoritative book on medicinal herbs was written by Dioscorides, not by Pliny, he also influenced the terminology of botanics (and anatomy).

It was with the philhellenists that the modern depreciation of Pliny

---

1978-1982, Mannheim 1983, 227-239; L. D. REYNOLDS, Texts and Transmission, Oxford 1983, 307-316 (convincing); G. BALLAIRA, Plinio il Vecchio, in: Dizionario degli Scrittori Greci e Latini 1988, 1709-1726, esp. 1724.

<sup>1</sup> C. G. NAUERT, C. Plinius Secundus. Fortuna, in: F. E. CRANZ, P. O. KRISTELLER, eds., Catalogus Translationum et Commentariorum. Mediaeval and Renaissance Latin Translations and Commentaries, vol. 4, Washington 1980, 297-422.

<sup>2</sup> CONTE, LG 502; however, Dungal used an intermediate source, s. MANITIUS, LG 1, 373.

<sup>3</sup> The profit for the text of Pliny is slight: L. D. REYNOLDS ibid. 313-314.

<sup>4</sup> B. ANDREAE, Laocoon und die Gründung Roms, Mainz 1988, 33.

began. N. Leoniceni (De Plinii et plurium aliorum in medicina erroribus, 1492) caviled at Pliny's not being a Greek: compared with Theophrastus he had neither philosophical thought nor scientific method (which should proceed from sense perception), and compared with Dioscorides he had no knowledge of medicine.

His theory of astronomy, which had enjoyed great authority in the early Middle Ages, was increasingly challenged during the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Nevertheless it was on Pliny that Melanchthon (d. 1560) based his Wittenberg lectures on natural philosophy—less to spite Aristotle than in recognition of Pliny's vividness and perspicuity. Perhaps also for his anthropocentric belief in providence?

An abridged French version by Pierre de Changy appeared in 1542, an English one by 'I.A.' in 1566. In all probability it was from the latter that Shakespeare's knowledge of natural history derives—the same may be true of the travel stories Othello<sup>1</sup> tells Desdemona. Rabelais (d. 1553), too, drew on Pliny, and Montaigne (d. 1592) quoted some of his moral aphorisms.

Shelley's (d. 1851) atheism began at school, owing to Lucretius and Pliny's abstract of an Epicurean doctrine in his chapter on gods.<sup>2</sup>

Long before the general waning of the glory of Latin authors in the 19th century, scholars had noticed that Pliny's method is diametrically opposite to that of experimental science. Unlike Aristotle in his zoology and Theophrastus in his botanics Pliny did not search for reasons based on natural philosophy, nor did he collect facts in order to draw scientific conclusions from them. For him, man is the focus of natural history. His frame of mind and his way of thinking were typical of many educated Romans of his day. He is an indispensable source for our knowledge of science, society, and art in classical antiquity.

Editions: Ioan. DE SPIRA, Venetiis 1469. * P. BEROALDUS, Parmae 1476. * J. SILLIG, Gotha 1851–1855. * D. DETLEFSEN, Berlin 1866–1882. * L. IANUS, C. MAYHOFF, Leipzig 1875–1906. * H. RACKHAM, W. H. S. JONES, D. E. EICHHOLZ (TTr), London 1938–1963. * J. BEAUJEU, J. DESANGES, J. ANDRÉ, J. FILLIOZAT, R. SCHILLING, A. ERNOUT, H. LE BONNIEC, G. SERBAT, E. DE SAINT-DENIS, H. ZEHNACKER, H. GALLET DE SANTERRE, M. CROISILLE, <sup>1</sup> Cf. esp. Othello 1. 3. 144; Plin. nat. 7. 2. 9–10.

<sup>2</sup> N. I. WHITE, Portrait of Shelley, New York 1945, 22.

R. BLOCH, A. ROUVERET (TTrN), Paris 1950–1985. * R. KÖNIG, G. WINKLER, J. HOPP, K. BAYER (TTrN), Darmstadt 1973—(not yet compl.). * On book 2: D. J. CAMPBELL (C), Aberdeen 1936. ** Ind. (incomplete, but rich) in old editions; e.g. O. SCHNEIDER, In Plini Secundi Naturalis historiae libros indices, Gotha 1857–1858, repr. 1967, 2 vols. in 1. * L. IANUS, s. above, vol. 6, Leipzig 1898, repr. 1970. * H. LEITNER, Zoologische Terminologie beim Älteren Plinius, Hildesheim 1972. * J. ANDRÉ, Lexique de termes de botanique en latin, Paris 1956. * J. ANDRÉ, Les noms de plantes dans la Rome antique, Paris 1985. ** Bibl.: H. LE BONNIEC, Bibliographie de l'Histoire Naturelle de Pline l'Ancien, Paris 1946. * R. HANSLIK, AAHG 8, 1955, 193–218; 17, 1964, 65–80; F. RÖMER, ibid. 31, 1978, 129–206. * G. SERBAT, Pline L'Ancien. Etat présent des études sur sa vie, son œuvre et son influence, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2069–2200.

M. BEAGON, Roman Nature. The Thought of Pliny the Elder, Oxford 1992. * G. BINDER, Auguste d'après les informations de la NH, in: Pline l'Ancien témoin de son temps, Salamanca, Nantes 1987, 461–472; cf. also: Helmantica 38, 1987, 145–156. * L. BODSON, La zoologie romaine d'après la Naturalis historia de Pline, Helmantica 37, 1986, 107–116. * M. A. T. BURNS, Pliny's Ideal Roman (über Agrippa), CJ 59, 1963/64, 253–258. * S. CITRONI MARCHETTI, Plinio il Vecchio e la tradizione del moralismo romano, Pisa 1991. * A. DELLA CASA, Il Dubius sermo di Plinio, Genova 1969. * Y. CRISÉ, L'illustre mort de Pline le naturaliste, REL 58, 1980, 338–343. * V. FERRARO, Il numero delle fonti, dei volumi e dei fatti nella Naturalis Historia di Plinio, ASNP ser. 3, 5, 1975, 519–533. * R. FRENCH, F. GREENAWAY, eds., Science in the Early Roman Empire. Pliny the Elder, his Sources and Influence, London 1986. * P. GRIMAL, Pline et les philosophes, Helmantica 37, 1986, 239–249. * G. GRÜNINGER, Untersuchungen zur Persönlichkeit des älteren Plinius. Die Bedeutung wissenschaftlicher Arbeit in seinem Denken, diss. Freiburg 1976. * J. HAHN, Plinius und die griechischen Ärzte in Rom: Naturkonzeption und Medizinkritik in der Naturalis Historia, AGM 75, 1991, 209–239. * N. P. HOWE, In Defense of the Encyclopedic Mode. On Pliny's Preface to the Natural History, Latomus 44, 1985, 561–576. * W. A. JOHNSON, Pliny the Elder and Standardized Roll Heights in the Manufacture of Papyrus, CPh 88, 1993, 46–50. * Z. KÁDÁR, M. BERÉNYINÉ RÉVÉSZ, Die Anthropologie des Älteren Plinius, ANRW 2, 32, 4, 1986, 2201–2224. * R. KÖNIG, Plinius der Ältere. Leben und Werk eines antiken Naturforschers, Darmstadt 1979. * T. KÖVES-ZULAUF, Reden und Schweigen. Römische Religion bei Plinius Maior, München 1972. * T. KÖVES-ZULAUF, Die Vorrede der plinianischen Naturgeschichte, WS 86, 1973, 134–184. * T. KÖVES-ZULAUF, Plinius d. Ä. und die römische Religion, ANRW 2, 16, 1, 1978, 187–288. * W. KROLL, Die Kosmologie des Plinius, Breslau 1930. * W. KROLL, cf. also ZIEGLER. * A. LOCHER, R. C. A. ROTTLÄNDER, Überlegungen zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Naturalis historia des Älteren Plinius und die Schrifttäfelchen von Vindolanda, in: E. PLÖCKINGER, M. BIETAK, eds., Lebendige Altertumswissenschaft, Festgabe H. VETTERS, Wien 1985, 140–147. * A. MICHEL, L'esthétique de Pline l'Ancien, Helmantica 38, 1987, 55–67. * F. MÜNZER, Beiträge zur Quellenkritik der Naturgeschichte des Plinius, Berlin 1897. * A. ÖNNERFORS, Pliniana. In Plinii Maioris Naturalium Historiam studia grammatica, semantica, critica, Stockholm 1956. * A. ÖNNERFORS, Traumerzählung und Traumtheorie beim älteren Plinius, RhM 119, 1976, 352–365. * G. PASCUCCI, La lettera prefatoria di Plinio alla Naturalis historia, InvLuc 2, 1980, 5–39. * J. PIGEAUD, J. OROZ RETA, eds., Pline l'Ancien témoin de son temps, Salamanca, Nantes 1987. * J. RAMIN, Les connaissances de Pline l'Ancien en matière de métallurgie, Latomus 36, 1977, 144–154. * F. RÖMER, Die plinianische 'Anthropologie' und der Aufbau der Naturalis historia, WS 96, n.s. 17, 1983, 104–108. * N. SALLMANN, De Pomponio Mela et Plinio Maiore in Africa describenda discrepantibus, in: Africa et Roma. Acta omnium gentium ac nationum conventus Latinis litteris linguaeque fovendis (Dakar 1977), Roma 1979, 164–173. * F. F. SCHWARZ, Magna India Pliniana. Zur Berichtsweise der Naturalis historia, WS 107–108, 1994–1995, 439–465. * S. SCONOCCHIA, La structure de la Naturalis historia dans la tradition scientifique et encyclopédique romaine, Helmantica 38, 1987, 307–316. * G. A. SEECK, Plinius und Aristoteles als Naturwissenschaftler, Gymnasium 92, 1985, 419–434. * R. SYME, People in Pliny, JRS 58, 1968, 135–151. * R. SYME, Pliny the Procurator, HSPH 73, 1969, 201–236. * K. ZIEGLER, W. KROLL, H. GUNDEL, W. ALY, R. HANSLIK, Plinius d.Ä., RE 21, 1, 1951, 271–439.

JURIDICAL LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

Schools of Law

The imperial period is the classical age of Roman law. Among the sources of law, the plebiscites die away, while the senatusconsulta gain in importance (during the republican period they had not yet extended to private and penal law; nor had their validity been clearly defined). They were often brought forward by the emperor. Within the limits of the constitution (which nominally was still republican) the emperor had the following additional options: by plebiscite he was entitled (as had been republican magistrates) to enact laws concerning e.g. the rights of citizenship and the constitutions of provinces and cities (leges datae). Being a magistrate he was also authorized to formulate and publish generally valid rules (edicta principis); add to this, instructions for officials (mandata principis) and letters (epistulae) to magistrates, provincial diets and communities, imperial verdicts and, finally, though of slight importance in the 1st century as yet, rescripts to private persons. Only after the end of the epoch considered here were all these new sources of law termed collectively constitutiones principum and distinguished from the laws created by other magistrates.

The main activity of the jurists was, as ever, a public presentation of their expert opinions on legal questions, not written works on legal matters. In some families jurisprudence was a tradition.

From the age of Augustus, the emperor granted certain jurists the ius publice respondendi; this implied some political control.

Indirectly the emperor began to extend his influence to the instruction of jurists. While during the republican period it was up to the student to choose an eminent jurist to follow, in later times the emperor made available to them stationes publice docentium ac respondentium (Gell. 13. 13. 1-4). Yet in the 1st century schools still had a private character.

The leading representatives of the two rivaling schools of jurists in the 1st and 2nd century A.D. are named by Pomponius (1. 2. 2. 47-53): among the Proculians—the eponym is otherwise unknown—there was Cocceius Nerva, a member of the entourage of Tiberius; Nerva was the father of another great jurist and the grandfather of Emperor Nerva. To the same school belonged Celsus pater and filius and Neratius Priscus, who was said to have been considered by Trajan as his successor. The Sabinian or Cassian school (Plin. epist. 7. 24. 8) was represented by Masurius Sabinus from Verona, who became famous as a teacher of law by his work on private law (Iuris civilis libri III), which would give rise to commentaries by Pomponius, Ulpian, and Paul.<sup>1</sup> Though of lowly origin, he could act as a jurisconsult, thanks to imperial protection. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS (consul A.D. 30) was a great-grandson of Caesar's murderer and a descendant of Servius Sulpicius Rufus, governor of Asia (Suet. Cal. 57. 3) and Syria (Tac. ann. 12. 11). The activity of Cassius extended to the era of Vespasian. His Ius civile (Dig. 7. 1. 70; 35. 1. 54; 46. 3. 78) was partly explained by the renowned jurist L. JAVOLENUS<sup>2</sup> Priscus; through him, excerpts came into the Digesta. A contemporary of Javolenus was Titius Aristo.

<sup>1</sup> Quoted in the Digesta as ex Sabino or ad Sabinum.

<sup>2</sup> Under Domitian, Javolenus was governor of Numidia, Germania superior, Syria, and, later (101/2), of Africa. Moreover, he was consul suffectus (A.D. 86; Plin. epist. 6. 15. 3; Dig. 40. 2. 5). Javolenus numbered among the Sabinians as previously Caecilius Sabinus, then, Alburnius Valens, Tuscianus, and Salvius Julianus (s. below).

The antagonism of two schools typical of the pre-classical period can scarcely be reduced to clear differences of philosophical doctrine and its details defy interpretation. Yet it shows the evolution of two complementary aspects of classical juridical literature. In the Sabinian school general overviews prevail (Ius civile); this school adheres to tradition and is ready to accept, if need be, pragmatic solutions; its scholarly achievement rests on the systematic organization of the domains of law. The Proculians, on the other hand, when treating individual cases, proceeded with strict logic and were less embarrassed by tradition; correspondingly, Proculus already preferred the free form of casuistic literature,<sup>1</sup> which heralded the classical style. Compared to the Augustans, who still had cherished the forms of commentary (Labeo) and monograph (Capito), there is an evident shift of generic preferences.

The prime of classical law, which began at the end of the 1st century, will be discussed in the context of middle and late empire.

Bibl. s. Roman Jurists, above p. 630. Fundamental D. LIEBS, forthcoming in: HLL 3, 1.

---

<sup>1</sup> D. LIEBS, Rechtsschulen und Rechtsunterricht im Prinzipat, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 197–286.

FIFTH CHAPTER:
LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

The period from Hadrian to Constantine is characterized in a well-known handbook as 'a period partly of the greatest barrenness'.<sup>1</sup> However, this epoch includes not only respected authors of second rank such as the biographer Suetonius, the antiquarian Gellius, the historian Florus, and the orator Fronto. What is more: we encounter the luminaries of Roman jurisprudence; we discover literary tidbits like the Pervigilium Veneris, the Alcestis Barcinonensis and even a fine example of world class literature, the Metamorphoses of Apuleius. The remark quoted above becomes entirely incomprehensible when we recall the Christian authors of that time: Tertullian, Minucius Felix, Cyprian, Novatianus, and Lactantius. However, that verdict can probably be explained, partly by a general disdain for so-called 'late' epochs, partly by an ineradicable practice: scholars are accustomed to treat Christian and pagan authors not—as would be sensible—together within their epoch, but to separate them from one another artificially; moreover, one must consider the different traditions of the disciplines interested in Christian Latin authors.

For a long time Church Fathers had been read, quite understandably, from systematic rather than from historical points of view. Readers were often satisfied with listing what a given author had contributed to the theological system and which of his statements were 'right' or 'wrong'; less often, however, would one inquire into the historical situation of the author or about his literary methods.

More productive for literary scholarship was the question: 'How does a given author cite the Bible and how does he understand it?' This approach combines theology and philology; reconstructing the old Latin translations of the Bible used by the Church Fathers is a philological task, and producing a history of interpretation requires both philology and theology. The Vetus Latina, a work which grew out of such research, is an invaluable source for the history of interpretation.

---

<sup>1</sup> SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG, vol. 3, p. v.

The history of literature poses no less urgent questions to the Patristic texts. For whom are those authors writing? What previous knowledge and what prejudices must they take into account? They address different groups of readers: Catholics, pagans, heretics or Jews. How does the given audience affect the form and content of the works? What new literary genres emerge, and which old ones come to contain a new sense? How is literature distinctly marked by the 'style' of a given epoch? Are there basic concepts shared by both Christians and pagans, and how are they exploited by the authors? Examples would be the monotheism of the philosophers and certain rhetorical patterns of thought and methods of interpretation. Further—and even more important—how do those writers make reference to things pagan? How is Rome's classical literature reflected in their minds? How is it transformed? Which aspects of the Roman character come into play through the encounter with the Judeo-Christian tradition even more distinctly than in previous periods?

HISTORICAL FRAMEWORK

The last epoch of Latin literature which we shall examine here is divided into two main parts: the time from Hadrian (117) to Diocletian (305) and from Constantine to Justinian (565). This division is in harmony with Church history: before and after the victory of Christianity, respectively. It is also practical in the light of general history: for in the second half of the period under consideration the mass migration of tribes leads to the downfall of the empire in the West, while the empire in the East is consolidated around Byzantium. Thus, one can call the first half of the given period Middle Empire, the second one Late Roman or Early Byzantine Empire.

Between the 2nd and 4th centuries there occurred a crisis, the gravity of which could easily be compared to that of the Roman civil wars: the catastrophe of the 3rd century. While the civil wars admittedly could not paralyze Latin literature, the trial of the 3rd century very nearly brought it to a standstill. Hence, a decisive break in the history of literature results which is noticeable not merely on a superficial level.

The face of the preceding and following epochs, i.e. of the 2nd and 4th centuries respectively, is marked in each case by a turning point in the form of an intellectual revolution from above. At the beginning of the 2nd century, Stoic philosophy, which up to this point had been represented by the opposition, was now being recognized and adopted increasingly by the emperors.<sup>1</sup> At the outset of the 4th century an analogous phenomenon occurred with a Christianity of Neo-Platonic orientation. In both instances the change in intellectual fundamentals had decisive consequences for the development of Latin literature.

The epoch from Hadrian to Constantine is the dusk of an old period and the dawn of a new one. In the area of foreign policy the Emperor Hadrian (117–138) effected the final change from expansion to defence. Architecture, too, was transformed, for here began the era of the great frontier fortifications. A trusteeship for a great cultural legacy was set up: libraries were built; academic institutions were founded. Roman 'archaists' looked longingly and affectionately to the past.

The internal political tensions in the relationship between emperor and senate eased with the practice of appointing imperial successors by adoption. The rulers, who through their wisdom and increasingly philosophical stance took the wind out of the sails of the so-called Stoic senatorial opposition, were now fully accepted as principes even by the aristocracy; the composition of the senate changed drastically, and its members developed new ideals of conformity. At the same time the incentive for senatorial historiography disappeared from Latin literature, and imperial biography entered in its place.

The great literary desert of the 3rd century—between 235 and 284 we know of hardly any pagan Latin literature—was a consequence of the general insecurity under those emperors who had been career soldiers. In 235 Maximinus, a Thracian who had risen through the military ranks to the top, became a Roman emperor. There followed a half century of unrest that saw 26 Roman emperors, only one of whom died of natural causes. While Rome's foreign enemies were gaining confidence—the Saxons, the Franks, the Alemanni, the Marcomanni, the Goths, and the Sassanids beset the realm—, Illyrians and Orientals vied for the throne. The provenance of the emperors reflected the change in the composition of the army. Italic peoples and educated citizens of the provinces were alienated from military service. Since the time of Hadrian troops had been drawn up from rural districts in the provinces; there permanent military camps were established and the profession of arms was handed down from generation to generation. The soldiers, representatives of a hardly cultured rural population from the frontier borderlands, had grown more and more suspicious of the inhabitants of the cities since the time of Septimius Severus and they plundered enemy and Roman settlements indiscriminately; educated officers became rare. The advancement of soldiers to positions in civil service—albeit on a limited scale—lead to a barbarization of the upper classes.

---

<sup>1</sup> In addition, skepticism was promoted by Sextus Empiricus in the second half of the 2nd century, and with Apuleius Platonism came to the fore, a school of thought, which had already been represented by Plutarch in the early 2nd century.

Taxation became more oppressive, and the first to suffer under it were the the tenants and small farmers; tax-evasion through flight, an everyday occurrence at that time, lead to a dearth of workers and to valuable land lying fallow. Countermeasures such as the devaluation of coins and an economy that was government-controlled to the point of binding the peasantry to the soil shook citizens' confidence in the state. Among other consequences of the burden of debt was the development of private landlordship at the cost of both private ownership of small areas of land and of state-owned properties, for the debtors in the agricultural population could do little else but seek 'protection' with a landlord. Further, the very basis of ancient civilization, the polis, was being undermined. The force behind its economic prosperity was waning, for the gratifying ambition of citizens was no longer rewarded and in some cases even punished. Municipal councilmen (decuriones), for example, were held personally liable for unpaid taxes in their districts. Consequently, the most competent kept their incomes low artificially in order not to qualify for the position of councilman. The concept of forcing well-to-do citizens to serve in honorary civil service positions for which their personal fortunes were at stake, stifled the spirit of enterprise: it simply did not pay to exert oneself.<sup>1</sup> The economic consequences were thus inevitable: trade and business abated. Rich and poor, city and country sank into ruin. Particularly hard hit by the economic decline was the western half of the empire, the population of which was decreasing rapidly. Italy, whose economy the Romans could never establish on a firm basis, deteriorated since it now forfeited its privileges which hitherto had provided it with at least a semblance of life; the Romans were paying the penalty for having concerned themselves endlessly with increasing their resources instead of exploiting those available to them.

---

<sup>1</sup> With the downfall of civic spirit in the cities private patronage fell out of favor.

The radical reforms of Diocletian were a logical response to this situation: The center of empire was transferred to the East; government control of the economy prevailed, and Italy was now on equal footing economically with the rest of the empire. In the East Constantine founded the capital named after him and formed a new senate which in 339 was on a par with its Roman counterpart but soon surpassed it. The same emperor increased the number of senators as well as their prestige. Latin literature revived under Diocletian and Constantine.

The last phase to be considered here is marked by the political division of the two halves of empire and the colonization of the Germans in the West. The Visigoths overran Rome (A.D. 410) and settled in Italy and Spain while the Vandals moved through Spain to North Africa, Sardinia, and Corsica. In 455 they plundered Rome. In Gaul an especially rich literary life developed at the close of antiquity. With Boethius and Cassiodorus, who were influential at the court of Theodoric in Italy, our excursion through Roman literature comes to an end.

CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF LITERATURE

Cultural Provinces. Since the 2nd century the importance of Rome as a center of power had diminished; the emperors were forced more often to spend their lives on the ever endangered imperial frontier and they were becoming increasingly dependent on their troops. Serious barbarian incursions into northern Italy were already occurring during the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180); the imperial collection of cameos was sold in order to finance the wars against the Marcomanni. In addition to admonishing his sons to maintain unity, Septimius Severus advised them above all to enrich the soldiers. After the mid-3rd century Germans in the West streamed over the border (limes) and in the East moved towards Athens (A.D. 267); Dacia fell; the Persians, who had been gathering new strength since the twenties, captured Antioch (A.D. 256) and took the emperor Valerian prisoner (probably as early as 259). Under Aurelian (270–275) it was considered necessary to protect Rome by means of a colossal wall.

The ethnic background of the emperors reflected the growing influence of the provinces and the established landowners who lived in provincial cities. After Spain, which had contributed a number of exemplary rulers in the 2nd century, Africa, by now a Romanized province of a long standing and a considerable economic force in its own right, took its turn by producing Septimius Severus (193–211). Beginning<sup>1</sup> with Fronto and Apuleius, Africa, a stronghold of Latinity, had laid claim to a new leading literary role in the 2nd century, a claim to be justified later by a series of great authors from Tertullian to Augustine.

Thus the voices of the provinces were making themselves heard; under Caracalla all free inhabitants of the empire received the right to Roman citizenship (212). This step made obvious the economic weakness of Italy, which for centuries had been accustomed to monopolize everything of value in the world around it and had never learned to stand on its own feet. Old and new intellectual centers gained in importance. In the West the name of Carthage, where Apuleius made a career, was heard again: Apuleius was probably the first great Latin writer who no longer relied on Rome as his literary forum.

While the provinces were on the ascent and starting to develop their own cultural landscapes, the world's capital faded slowly but irrevocably, becoming a museum of its own great past. With time Italy's privileged economic status also dwindled to the point where—as all other territories—it was subdivided into provinces by Diocletian.

Rulers still held Rome in high esteem and continued to embellish her, but she no longer played a decisive role in the momentous events of history.

In the final phase of antiquity each individual province would lead a rather independent literary life.

Italy. The old capital won new distinction through the ascent of her bishops and the patriotism of her senators. It was in Rome that Hieronymus received the epoch-making task of producing the new Latin Bible. With Rome in his thoughts Rutilius Namatianus created his poem De reditu.

---

<sup>1</sup> Supposedly, Suetonius, too, had been an African.

Rome remained in addition an important center for the preservation of the classical legacy. The senatorial aristocracy devoted itself to this responsibility; among other things it provided a competent audience for authors coming from the eastern provinces like Claudian and Ammianus Marcellinus. Symmachus was a leading figure of the conservative senate. It was indicative of a shift in power that he had been defeated in debate by Ambrosius, Bishop of Milan; for not only did Christianity win the upper hand against paganism, but intellectually and economically bustling northern Italy surpassed Central Italy. Milan had already established itself as the seat of the imperial court since the end of the 3rd century.

Literature in Italy grew silent with the 5th century and the invasions of barbarians.<sup>1</sup> At the beginning of the 6th century two stars, Boethius and Cassiodorus shone forth from the court of Theodoric: the former became a pillar of medieval philosophy, the latter of education. The authoritative Priscian, who was active in Byzantium, maintained ties with Ravenna. Deacon at Milan (and later Bishop of Pavia), Ennodius<sup>2</sup> of Arles (d. 521), combined ancient and Christian themes as well as prose and poetry with the virtuosity of a Gallic rhetor. More interesting than his minor poems and letters in the style of Symmachus or Sidonius were his Biography of Bishop Epiphanius of Pavia and his Panegyric of Theodoric.

Africa. Africa above all, a blooming province economically and culturally, gained in intellectual and political importance in the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Towards the end of the 2nd century, it produced the dynasty of the Severi. Here Latin was cultivated as a mother tongue, and—for a long time no less intensively—Greek, as is confirmed by the bilingualism of Apuleius and Tertullian. Africa sent competent advocates to Rome. Many of the most important Latin ecclesiastical writers came from the region: Tertullian, Minucius, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius and Augustine. Secular authors of scarcely less influence were Apuleius and Martianus Capella. Even under the reign of the Vandals poetic talents cropped up, who mocked the new rulers in Latin epigrams.

Spain. Spain developed earlier than Africa. In the 1st century she presented the Eternal City with great authors and, at the outset of the 2nd, exemplary emperors. Then it appeared that Spain rested on her laurels for a time.<sup>1</sup> It was not until around 400 that she regained her universal renown with the Emperor Theodosius and the great Christian poet Prudentius.

---

<sup>1</sup> Eugippius' Vita Severini appeared in Noricum toward the end of the century.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: F. VOGEL, MGH AA 7, Berolini 1885; bibl.: J. FONTAINE, RACHr 5, 1962, 398–421.

In Spain, too, Germanic dominion brought a second blossoming—though not until the Arian Visigoths had converted to Catholicism (586). In Toledo, Saragossa and Seville bishops attempted to stop the decline in education by writing treatises on philosophy, grammar, and history. The most distinguished among them was Isidore of Seville<sup>2</sup> (d. 640), a writer of theological and historical works who proved to be one of the greatest compilers with his informative encyclopedia (Originum sive etymologiarum libri XX). Though derived from secondary sources, it nevertheless contains irreplaceable information concerning the language, literature and culture of the Romans; it thus maintained its importance beyond the Middle Ages.

Gaul. Gaul, which had been Romanized from Lyons, was a stronghold of cultural life in late antiquity. Its intellectual centers were the schools in Marseille, Arles, Nîmes, Toulouse, Narbonne, Vienne, Poitiers, and above all Bordeaux, the home of the versatile but somewhat superficial poet Ausonius. The inhabitants of Gaul were proud of their cultural level and were prepared to meet its costs; in our chapter on oratory we shall refer to a rhetor's magnanimous endowment for the reconstruction of his school (A.D. 298).

<sup>1</sup> E. NORDEN, LG 127, assigns responsibility for intellectual stagnation (indeed a courageous assertion for his time) to the lack of miscegenation in that purely Roman colonial region and to negligible contact with the Greek Orient.

<sup>2</sup> Editions: F. AREVALO, 7 vols., Romae 1797–1803 (= PL 81–84); epist.: G. B. FORD (Tr), Amsterdam 2nd ed. 1970; etym.: W. M. LINDSAY, 2 vols., Oxford 1911, repr. 1985; etym. book 2: P. K. MARSHALL (TC), Paris 1983; etym. book 9: M. REYDELLET (TTrC), Paris 1984; etym. book 12: J. ANDRÉ (TTrC), Paris 1986; Goth.: T. MOMMSEN, MGH AA 11, 2, 267–295; G. DONINI, G. B. FORD (Tr), Leiden 1970; nat.: J. FONTAINE (T, index verborum), Bordeaux 1960; ort. et obit.: C. CHAPARRO GÓMEZ (TTr), Paris 1985; bibl.: ALTANER, 8th ed. 494–497; bibl.: J. FONTAINE, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique. 2 vols., Paris 1959; J. FONTAINE, V Chr 14, 1960, 65–101; Isidoriana, Colección de estudios sobre San Isidoro de Sevilla en el 14 centenario de su nacimiento, Sevilla 1961; H.-J. DIESNER, Isidor von Sevilla und seine Zeit, Berlin 1973; H.-J. DIESNER, Isidor von Sevilla und das westgotische Spanien, Trier 1978 (= Berlin 1977); K. N. MACFARLANE, Isidore of Seville on the Pagan Gods (orig. 8. 11), Philadelphia 1980; M. MARTINA, Isidoro de poëtis (orig. 8. 7), CCC 4, 1983, 299–322; C. CODOÑER, La 'etymologia' en Isidoro de Sevilla, in: Symbolae L. MITXELENA septuagenario oblatae, ed. by J. L. MELENA, Gasteiz 1985, 275–286; U. SCHINDEL, Zur frühen Überlieferungsgeschichte der Etymologiae Isidors von Sevilla, StudMed, ser. 3, 29, 2, 1988, 587–605.

At the beginning of the 4th century Trier, as seat of the imperial court, became a second Rome. In addition to school and court, the landed aristocracy, which also frequently produced bishops, strongly supported literature: hence came a man of the world such as Sidonius (d. around 486) and the poet Alcimus Avitus (d. 518). Christianity in Southern France was Greek in character and for that reason contributed to preserve the knowledge of Greek in this region longer than in Africa. Many authors came from the monastery of Lerinum, which had been founded around 410 by the distinguished aristocrat Honoratus: Hilary of Arles (d. 410), Vincent of Lerinum (d. before 450), Eucherius of Lyons (d. around 450), Salvian (d. around 480), Faustus of Riez (d. around 490).

Caesarius of Arles,<sup>1</sup> who strove for a popular style in his sermons, was a rather isolated voice in aristocratic Gaul.

From Aquitania came Sulpicius Severus,<sup>2</sup> the author of the famous Life of St. Martin. Written in 403, his Chronicle is unique for its factual reliability and clear language (s. below, p. 1383).

Rome lost Gaul in the 5th century. Teutons and Huns saw to it that its destruction was complete; however, in the safety of schools in monasteries and bishoprics and later the schools of the Merovingian court, a cultivated Christian literature blossomed.

The bishop's tiara of Sidonius Apollinaris (d. around 486; s. below, pp. 1313–1314) did not deter him from pursuing literary amusement in the tradition of Ausonius. One may guess that behind these unsubstantial products lay a pedagogic goal, which was to exercise a sense for form and style; indeed, such concepts meant far more to the ancient mind than mere superficial embellishment. Of greater importance was Venantius Fortunatus from Italy (d. around 600 in Poitiers; s. below p. 1315), who was the last master of ancient Latin poetry and an early hymnist of the Church.

<sup>1</sup> Editions: G. MORIN, Maredsous 1937; C. LAMBOT, 2 vols., Turnholti 1953 (= CC 103–104).

<sup>2</sup> Editions: C. HALM, CSEL 1, 1866; bibl.: ALTANER 231; NORDEN, Kunstprosa 2, 583; A. KAPPELMACHER, RE 2, 4, 1, 1931, 863–871; B. M. PEEBLES (Tr, sel. works), Washington 1970; P. HYLÉN, Studien zu Sulpicius Severus, Lund 1940; N. K. CHADWICK, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul, London 1955, 89–121; G. K. VAN ANDEL, Sulpicius Severus and Origenism, V Chr 34, 1980, 278–287; G. AUGELLO, La tradizione manoscritta ed editoriale delle opere martiniane di Sulpicio Severo, Orpheus n.s. 4, 1983, 413–426.

Prose is represented impressively by Salvian of Marseille, whose work De gubernatione Dei (written between 429 and 451) in the best ancient tradition confronted the heirs of the Roman Empire with the moral superiority of the barbarians. Claudianus Mamertus (d. around 474), a rhetor and a friend of Sidonius, wrote as presbyter in Vienne the De statu animae, the most influential philosophical work after Augustine and before Boethius. Against Faustus of Riez he defended the non-spatial nature of the soul, not to be grasped in terms of quantity; his Neo-Platonism influenced the Middle Ages and, later, Descartes. In a letter to the rhetor Sapaudus, Mamertus confronted the problem of the decline in education and called for a return to classical studies. On the other hand, the irresistible development of the language toward Romance is documented by the cookbook of Anthimus (around 520); moreover, one can study the decay of metrics in the verses of King Chilperic (d. 584). In his valuable History of the Franks Bishop Gregory of Tours (d. 593) was still amused by his own 'inability' both to differentiate between masculine and neuter gender in substantives and to use the right cases after prepositions; the author who continued his work, known as Fredegar, stood in this respect already beyond good and evil.

Ireland and England. Ireland and England became the bearers of literature for the future. The consequential mission of Irish and Anglo-Saxon monks lies beyond the scope of our inquiry, as does the Carolingian Renaissance.

Patronage. The vanishing of Roman literature from the time of Hadrian onwards need not be attributed to an exhaustion of creativity. The causes are manifold. In the period under consideration, persons, institutions and social strata which fostered literature—or in some cases discouraged it—were, in the main, emperor, senate, schools, the Church, and jurists.

The death toll, which civil war and the madness of emperors had exacted, did not result in the decline of literature during the 1st century since writers of noble family were able to exist independently, and private patronage survived as well. This we know from the cases of Martial and Statius.

Pliny the Younger was not only an author himself, but he also provided substantial support for poets and writers of prose in his circle. That sort of ambitious Italian senator, who brought with him from his small native town a longing for immortality through good deeds and who at the same time possessed enough good taste not to waste his beneficence on undeserving persons, was a solid element of support for literature. Naturally, the circle of those sponsored changed with the origin of each senator. Latin lost popularity under monarchs well-disposed to Greek culture or among senators who either came from the Greek-speaking Orient or followed the fashion of the time. Fronto supported the historian Appian, a Roman knight who wrote in Greek. Arrian (2nd century) and Cassius Dio (3rd century) were senators who wrote Roman history in their native Greek language.

The process of maintaining the literary tradition continued: emperors built libraries; Hadrian founded the Athenaeum, the first State University, in Rome (Aur. Vict. Caes. 14. 2); proficient grammarians<sup>1</sup> cultivated the language, archaizing authors<sup>2</sup> the venerable old Latin. Just as imperial policy had changed, Latin literature itself assumed a defensive posture and thereby ceased to concern itself with new conquests, but now looked to the preservation and cultivation of early Latin in the hope that it could be rejuvenated by recalling its own youth. There was, however, one topical branch of literature which developed further: with the perfecting of administration there now arrived the heyday of the jurists, the only 'classics' whom the epoch from Hadrian to Alexander Severus produced.<sup>3</sup> Here—literally in the last minute—something typically Roman was brought to perfection. The Latin of jurists has a specific charm of precision and clarity not always to be found in belles lettres. After Roman law had reached its late classical consummation, the violent death of one of its main proponents, Ulpianus (probably already in 223, not in 228),

---

<sup>1</sup> Q. Terentius Scourus (Hadrian's adviser on matters of grammar), Velius Longus (consulted Scourus and was cited by Gellius, therefore also Hadrianic), C. Sulpicius Apollinaris (from Carthage, teacher of Gellius), Aemilius Asper (perhaps at the end of the 2nd century, author of important commentaries on Terence, Sallust and Virgil and later used by later commentators: Donatus, Servius), Helenius Acro (commentator, lived later than Gellius), Porphyrio (school commentary on Horace, 2nd-3rd century, after Apuleius and before Julius Romanus, who, in his turn, was used by Charisius around 362).

<sup>2</sup> Fronto, Gellius, Apuleius.

<sup>3</sup> P. Juventius Celsus filius (consul for the second time in 129), Salvius Julianus (an African under Hadrian), S. Pomponius (under Hadrian), Volusius Maecianus (under Pius), Gaius (under Pius and Marcus Aurelius), Cervidius Scaevola (under Marcus Aurelius), Aemilius Papinianus (probably the most famous jurist under Septimius and Caracalla, executed under the latter), Domitius Ulpianus from Tyre (under Alexander Severus, murdered by the Praetorian Guard), Julius Paulus (under Alexander Severus).

at the hands of his own guards marked the end of a cultural epoch.

The flowering of juridical literature from Hadrian to Alexander Severus demonstrates how decisive an influence patronage from the emperor could have on the existence or non-existence of literature. Juvenal spoke prophetically when he remarked that only the generous intervention of an emperor could still save Roman literature, but, unfortunately, his voice went unheeded.

The senate lost some of its influence in the 3rd century, and the emperors, who were rapidly succeeding one another, had no time for culture. The exorbitant taxation of the inhabitants of cities and the resulting decline of civic spirit were detrimental to private patronage. At that time Latin literature—oriented to the general public and seismographically sensitive to changes in society as it was—seems to have been silenced for almost half a century (235–284).<sup>1</sup> The writings of Cyprian, whose ideas looked to the future and centered around a new community, the Church, were brilliant exceptions. Still brighter was the light of Greek philosophy at that dark moment of the Roman Empire: In Alexandria, Origen (d. at the latest in 253) opened to his students the depths of space and time, and in Rome Plotinus (d. at Minturnae, 270) led them into lofty regions. A Christian and a pagan, in retrospect they appear to be brothers. In a period of upheaval they forged the intellectual weapons for future generations.

Even at this point in time there were rulers who recognized their cultural responsibilities. The Emperor Gallienus afforded philosopher Plotinus the opportunity to work undisturbed, and the Emperor Tacitus was said to have been instrumental in disseminating the works of his namesake. Whatever their reasons, both monarchs demonstrated good taste.

With the new consolidation of empire under Diocletian and Constantine, Latin literature blossomed again—as is to be expected in times of restoration, in a classicizing form, one more proof that literature does not always merely follow immanent laws of development. Latin was nurtured by the emperors despite their decision to establish an Eastern capital. It was not only the language of the military and of jurists, but also an element of governmental and intellectual identity and continuity. Julian the Apostate, who wrote in Greek, was an anomaly in three fields: religion, philosophy, and language.

---

<sup>1</sup> Worthy of mention are Censorinus, De die natali (A.D. 238), an inquiry into the measurement of time, Solinus (perhaps around A.D. 250), the bucolic poet Nemesianus (towards the end of the period under consideration).

Able grammarians and rhetors provided for a good pedagogic tradition, which made possible the transmission of culture from generation to generation. A new educated aristocracy rose gradually; the members of the Roman senate, to whose share there no longer fell any important political power, earned distinction by preserving Latin literature in reliable texts; in this respect there was a blessing in Rome's waning power. Such an orator as Symmachus sprang from the aristocracy, which was a reading public for Ammianus' history.

Christian literature and philosophical translations increased dramatically. The Christian humanism of Jerome and the Platonism of Augustine represented culminating points. Under Theodosius poetry experienced a twofold renaissance: Claudian, who once more evoked classical antiquity in its sculpturesque beauty, and Prudentius, who so transformed the ancient literary genres that they became vehicles for Christian ideas.

School and Church. Apart from the vicissitudinous influences of emperor and state, Latin literature has two institutions to thank for its survival: the needs of school and Church determined the cultivation and preservation of certain literary forms.

Ancient scholastic education had an admirable continuity, which ultimately resisted even Christianity and, as a matter of fact, was taken over by it: the leading representative of learned monasticism in the West, Jerome, had been a student of the grammarian Donatus.

While the Roman literature of the Republic and of Empire was linked to the res publica, senate and equestrian order and grew silent with the disintegration of the old society and its values, a new Latin literature was emerging—that of the Church in Africa. A spiritual community replaced the political: hence came Tertullian's unprecedented exultation of freedom. In the period under consideration the Church at the outset had a revolutionary and in the end a preserving function for literature.

After Constantine literature would be increasingly dominated by the Church. The ascent of the Church and of Latin under the rule of Christian emperors added momentum to the development of Christian Latin literature. Jerome, who made the authoritative Latin translation of the Bible, as a classical scholar, papal secretary, monk, and expert Hebraist, stood at the historical junction of all important intellectual paths (with the exception of philosophy).

After the fall of the Western Empire only the jurists remained to a certain extent independent of the Church; traces of that independence would linger on well into the Middle Ages.

LATIN AND GREEK LITERATURE

Latin literature had predominated for approximately three hundred years; contemporary Greek literature had offered little in comparison with the great authors from Plautus to Tacitus. With Hadrian the picture changed. Now first-rate Latin authors like Apuleius and Tertullian were a rarity; moreover, the age of philosophy did not encourage poetry. On the Greek side there appeared scholars like the great physician Galen of Pergamum (d. 199), the astronomer Ptolemy of Alexandria (under Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius), the epistemological critic Sextus Empiricus (d. around 200), and the knowledgeable guide Pausanias (d. around 180). Moreover, there was an abundance of famous authors; among these were the orator Aelius Aristides (d. around 187), the historians Arrian (consul suffectus in 130; d. after 170) and Appian (knight and procurator under Marcus Aurelius; d. after 165). Last but not least there were two writers who are to be counted among the great authors of world literature: Plutarch (d. after 120) and Lucian (d. after 180). Latin literature lay dormant during the 3rd century; Greek literature produced—to name only two—Origen, an eminent theologian, and Plotinus, a philosopher of the highest merit.

It had become inevitable to recognize the intellectual and economic importance of the Greek-speaking East; hence, in a great organizer like Hadrian, enthusiasm for Greek culture was certainly more than a personal fixation. Had not Caesar already considered moving the capital to the East? Diocletian would choose Nicomedia, Constantine neighboring Byzantium. The influx of Greeks and Orientals into Rome—deplored already by Juvenal—continued in the 2nd century; it reflected the actual economic and cultural shift which Hadrian was politically competent enough to perceive. He reacted accordingly by placing himself at the vanguard of the movement.

World culture had become entirely bilingual, a fact which reverberated on the development of Latin literature: in the East 'Latinization' was limited to the dissemination of Latin officialese, the development of which was promoted by the emperor, to schools of Roman law<sup>1</sup> and to an ambitious, scholarly cultivation of Latin as a somewhat extravagant discipline; in the West—particularly in cosmopolitical Rome—many of the intelligentsia preferred the comfortable pallium to the stiff toga and spoke Greek—above all when following the fashion and discussing philosophical themes. So they spared themselves the trouble of tackling the stylistic idiosyncrasies of Latin. Much to the consternation of his trusted teacher of rhetoric, the African Latinist Fronto, Marcus Aurelius would become more and more a philosopher on the throne who wrote down his most intimate thoughts in Greek.

With the victory of philosophy over rhetoric, Latin, related as it was to public life, had been played to the end. 'Public life' in the old sense was disappearing; the peace of the 2nd century was just as uncondusive to it as was the chaos of the 3rd. Moreover, the new rhetoric of the Greek sophists drove Latin from its own field. A noble amateur could hardly compete any longer with such virtuosos of discourse. The praise of Rome was now being sung in Greek prose. Only in predominantly Latin regions, e.g. in Carthage and its surrounding areas, could the modern rhetorical style find expression in the language of the Romans: hence, Apuleius. He and Tertullian, the two great Latin authors of that time, were—as one would almost expect—bilingual; their subjects were philosophy (in keeping with the times) and religion respectively. To be sure, the age of philosophy all but stifled poetry. The graceful Pervigilium Veneris, the date of which, incidentally, is uncertain, is among the exceptions which prove the rule. Latin seemed condemned to be confined to scholastic, military and juridical affairs.

Under Constantine Latin recovered its strength—the Greek-writing Emperor Julian was an exception. In the period after Constantine there emerged a notable Latin literature cultivated by Western senators, men of the Church and soldiers or poets from the East. With the decline in bilingualism it became necessary to make Greek works accessible to the West, a necessity that led to an enrichment of the philosophical literature in the Latin language.

---

<sup>1</sup> In addition to Rome (the classical authors' forum of intellectual activity) and Carthage, we should mention Alexandria, Caesarea, Antioch, Athens and, above all, Berytos (flourishing especially in the 4th century); Constantinople, too, became such a center after 425.

Jerome, Augustine, Prudentius, Claudian, and Ammianus brought about a new flowering period of Latin literature, which under Theodosius the Great (379–395) and his successors reached its high point. This period was no mere retrospective second blooming, but a genuine rebirth: both Jerome and Augustine would be among the most influential of Latin authors. Jerome brought Latin to the East as well—to Bethlehem. By the end of the 4th century Greeks like Ammianus and Claudian were writing in Latin: a proof of the high regard for the language. The Roman senatorial aristocracy—politically debilitated as it was—applied its energy to the preservation of Latin literature.

The minor renaissance represented in Justinian's time by Boethius<sup>1</sup> and Cassiodorus in Italy and the grammarian Priscian, who was active in Constantinople, was brief but consequential. Together with Justinian, who collected ancient sources of jurisprudence, these authors laid the foundations for medieval education, law and philosophical thought.

GENRES

Literary genres were undergoing a transformation; novel hybrids of various genres were created, the essence of which reflected the altered situation of authors and their respective audiences: imperial court, aristocracy, school, and Church.

Thanks to imperial initiative, Roman law found its definitive form. The imperial court also fostered the composition of the panegyric in prose and later in epic style.

The influence of school and Church changed historiography: brief summaries and overviews were written for young readers; they might also serve as crash courses in Roman history for self-made men. With Augustine's De civitate Dei a Roman sense of linear historical development with the aid of biblical hints successfully shaped a philosophy of history. Later historians were for the most part clerics who thought it enough to offer general overviews or collections of exempla. Exsuperantius made excerpts from Sallust, as did Julius Paris from Valerius Maximus; Cassiodorus took Eusebius for his point of departure. Fulgentius wrote 14 volumes entitled De aetatibus mundi. On the pagan side Symmachus' 7 books, the Historia Romana, are lost. The only genuine historiographer, Ammianus Marcellinus, wrote as a non-senator and former soldier for the Roman senatorial aristocracy.

---

<sup>1</sup> Theodoric did not deserve better of Boethius than Caligula and Nero did of Seneca.

As a result of the political situation and of the requirement to entertain readers, Latin historiography was being supplanted by imperial biography; noteworthy for this genre are Marius Maximus, the Historia Augusta and Aurelius Victor. Christian writers also took advantage of the general public's penchant for biographies, for such themes central to the Christian religion as conversion and martyrdom seemed to call for biographical treatment. Christian biography emerged from humble beginnings—the Acts of the Martyrs—to become more sophisticated. Thus, Pontius described the life of Cyprian, Paulinus of Milan the life of Ambrose and Possidius that of Augustine; Eugippius wrote the biography of Severin and Sulpicius Severus the vita of St. Martin.

We should be happy if we could read imperial autobiographies such as that of Hadrian or that of Septimius Severus. Psychological autobiography was an innovative, visionary hybrid including philosophical and exegetic elements: Augustine's Confessiones, in terms of genre, is a brilliant development of Apuleian rudiments. It was not until this time that the Romans' interest in psychology, in individuals and their personal experience was exposed in a new literary genre, the psychological autobiography.

Novel and biography were closely related genres: in addition to pagan novels ranging from the highly stylized Metamorphoses of Apuleius to the popular Historia Apollonii regis Tyri, the Troy Novels by Dictys and Dares, and the Alexander Novels, there were also Christian novels, which tried to combine entertainment and edification.<sup>1</sup>

The form of the philosophical dialogue had already been Christianized by Minucius Felix: in contrast to Cicero, in whose philosophical works each interlocutor was allowed to stick to his opinion, now, at the end, the pagan was converted to the truth of Christianity.

Didactic treatise and speech for the defense combined in apologetic works which were aimed at non-Christians. This genre found its apex and culmination in Augustine's De civitate Dei; later on, missionary activities concentrated on uneducated pagans, and, unfortunately, words were not the only means used to convince them.

---

<sup>1</sup> Thus, the Acts of Saints Paul and Thecla (within the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles) resembles a 'chaste love story'; in the 4th century Rufinus translated an anonymous novel on the travels of St. Peter from Greek into Latin. Jerome was a master of the hagiographic novel. The essays in G. SCHMELING, ed., The Novel in the Ancient World, Leiden 1996 discuss all these issues and authors.

Another, less ephemeral form of polemical writing had already been amply represented by the earliest significant Latin Christian author, Tertullian: the polemics against Jews and dissenting Christians. Discord among Christians increased after the momentous change brought about by Constantine, and here, too, politics played an important role: the Arians had strong supporters among the Teutons, as had the Monophysites in Syria and Egypt and the Donatists in Africa. 'Anti-heretic' texts were at times outright aggressive and formed a stylistic hybrid of didactic treatise and invective.

The needs of the Church increasingly encouraged biblical interpretations and commentaries.

The Christian sermon was a cross between speech and exegesis; its style could be ornate or downright popular depending on author and audience.

Seneca had coined the form of the Latin moral letter; Jerome borrowed and expanded it. His letters were meant to edify but they also contained memorial addresses and theological instruction so that they often border on didactic treatises. Such epistles were intended for wide circulation.

The traditional 'Plinian' type of epistolography was no less popular. Colored with political and personal expression, it served the purposes of both pagan and Christian writers. Authorship was a contagious disease in that age.

Schools continued to focus attention on ancient grammar (to include the interpretation of authors) and rhetoric. There were distinguished scholars in the 4th century: Jerome's teacher Aelius Donatus, who would later be considered the very impersonation of grammar, and Marius Victorinus, the competent commentator and translator of significant pagan and Christian texts. The increasing gulf between the two halves of the empire made it necessary to produce translations from Greek.

Roman fondness for encyclopedic teaching found expression in literary forms both traditional and novel (e.g. Martianus Capella) which transmitted knowledge from antiquity to the Middle Ages.

Only in the period of late empire did poetry achieve its previous level of sophistication—if we may disregard the good Ausonius. To our knowledge, Latin national epic had grown silent after Silius Italicus. The next witnesses available to us are the panegyrical or invective epics of Claudian and Corippus. Form and content of these works are indicative of their intimate connection with the imperial court. Here rhetorical technique is advanced to the point of verging on Prudentius' use of pure allegory. The mythological type of epic—apart from the Alcestis Barcinonensis (an intriguing sample of rhetorical poetry) and similar exercises by Dracontius—is represented foremost by Claudian's De raptu Proserpinae. This work gracefully combines different traditions of epic and didactic poetry into a cosmological myth. The newly created bible epic was linked to the milieu of the Church but not directly to the liturgy; Sedulius excelled among the representatives of this genre. The poetic achievement of Prudentius is no less personal: he Christianized almost all genres and among them didactic epic. Allegorical from beginning to end, the Psychomachy, for example, is an organic development of tendencies earlier found in Roman poetry and plastic arts; at the same time, it provided a promising model for medieval poetry and art.

The didactic bent innate to the Latin mindset benefited from the fact that Roman intellectual life was more and more confined to the spheres of classrooms and churches. An example is the Carmen de figuris, which—in Hellenistic tradition—versified unpoetic subject matter. More gratifying are the riddles of Symp(h)osius. Didactic elements are also to be found in other literary genres: here the ethnographic digressions in Claudian, Corippus, and Sidonius or the minor scientific poems of Claudian and Sidonius come to mind.

Times were not favorable for pastoral—only Nemesian can be cited; Endecheius wrote a Christian eclogue in asclepiadean verse. Satire was assimilated into other genres: Claudian's invectives, Ammianus' excursuses on Rome and—last but not least—the prose works of Arnobius and Jerome, Church Fathers, who would have made exceptional satirists.

The Anthologia also contains a poetic Letter of Dido to Aeneas (No. 83 Riese = 71 Shackleton Bailey) written in hexameters.

Elegiac meter lost its identification with a clearly defined genre. It became a vehicle for Lactantius' innovative poem De Phoenice, an early document of Christian poetry. In his elegiac travel poem, De reditu suo, Rutilius Namatianus included a praise of Rome. Maximian was a rather mediocre representative of love elegy. In elegiac meter, which does not quite fit his subject matter, Avian Latinized the Fables of Babrius. Later there were even 'comedies' in that meter.

Epigram was popular up to the very latest period and sometimes appeared even in lyric meter.

Drama, which had been reduced to mime and show-business, now had little literary significance; the prejudices of Christians against the theater were quite understandable. Successors to Plautus did not appear until very late in so-called comedies, about which the choice of elegiac meter was not the only astonishing peculiarity.

Lyric poetry received new creative impulses from Christian hymnody. Its rhythm based on word accent opened totally new artistic fields to Latin literature. In addition, Christian lyric poetry continued to use traditional forms. Next to Catullus and Horace, Prudentius was the third great Latin lyric poet.

Wedding songs<sup>1</sup> were highly receptive to relics out of the pagan past.

Experiments with mixed forms such as accentuated hexameters—e.g. those of Commodian (3rd or—more likely—5th century), which conform neither to classical nor to medieval standards, were short-lived.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE

World culture was bilingual: Juvenal complained that Rome had become a Greek city. Emperor Hadrian confirmed this development through his own philhellenism, which also had political motives. Somewhat eclipsed by Greek as a literary language, Latin sought to regain its juvenile strength by resorting either to earlier linguistic stages or to affected rhetoric.

Both philosophy and Christianity gave a new creative impulse to the use of Latin. Slowly but surely, Latin reacted to the great challenge offered by philosophy. From Apuleius, Tertullian, and Marius Victorinus up to Augustine and Boethius, Latin became an instrument of precision for this discipline, too, which in the 2nd century was still considered a Greek domain. The gradual conquest of abstract terms answered a growing need. Laymen would discuss philosophy and dogma in their mother tongue; in late antiquity this became true even of scholars, since knowledge of Greek had become less general.

We should dwell slightly longer on 'Christian Latin', for it enriched the language—if indirectly—from a new, Semitic source. Being rooted in the eastern empire, the Church at first used the Greek κοινή even at Rome, just as in the earliest stages of the development of Latin literature, Greek had priority over Latin. The Latin language was, once again, being fed, as it were, from foreign stocks as early Bible translators and preachers—some after the example of Latin-speaking Jews—began to shape Christian Latin. The problem of biblical translation was a novelty in Latin literature: although translating had been its mainstay from the beginning, most translations were free, artistic imitations. To be sure, accuracy faithful to the letter was familiar to Romans from documents used in daily life but it was not considered necessary for literary texts. Strict adherence to a sacred text created a new situation. Even syntax was partly influenced by the original languages,<sup>1</sup> Hebrew and Greek, albeit seldom without genuine Latin parallels. Viewed as a whole, however, the structure of the language of literature did not change to the same extent as its vocabulary did. Hebraisms, Grecisms, and calques resulted from the principle of literalism. Sanctioned by the authority of the gospel, they made their way into the language of literature and thence into vulgar Latin, though sometimes very late.

---

<sup>1</sup> A Christian exception: Paulinus of Nola. On the other hand, the Statian tradition in Dracontius, Sidonius, Luxurius, and Patricius was present anew.

The following are two examples of Hebraic influence. In pagan usage, confiteri can mean: 'confess one's sins' or 'profess one's faith'. From these meanings there developed as Christian terms confiteri (intransitive), 'confess', and confessio, 'martyr's tomb'. A pure Hebraism, however, is the use of confiteri in the sense of 'praise';<sup>2</sup> this is an artificial usage that has no descendant in Romance languages, but we have to know it in order to realize the full sense of the title of Augustine's work Confessiones. A Hebraism, which has had a lasting etymological influence, is parabola, the translation in the Septuagint and in the Vulgate of the Hebrew māshāl. Its meaning 'parable' or 'saying' can be taken in some instances as a synonym for 'word';<sup>3</sup> thence came French parole, Italian parola, and Spanish palabra.

One could expect that with the arrival of Christianity the hour of vulgar Latin was at hand. Latin-speaking communities first arose mainly in North Africa. There were both social and religious grounds for the linguistic simplicity of earlier Latin texts like the Acta Scillitanorum (c. 180).<sup>4</sup> The unadorned language of the gospels, which stood in

<sup>1</sup> Vivit Dominus, quia . . . ('The Lord liveth that . . .'; e.g. 1st Sam. 28. 10); Spanish 'Vive Dios que . . .'

<sup>2</sup> E.g. Math. 11. 25; Ps. 144. 10; the intermediary was the Greek ἐξομολογεῖσθαι.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. Job 27. 1; 29. 1; Is. 14. 4.

<sup>4</sup> On traces of literary forms in these Acts: H. A. GÄRTNER, Die Acta Scillitanorum in literarischer Interpretation, WS 102, 1989, 149–167.

opposition to the rhetorical culture of paganism, led to a certain renewal, although it, too, was soon neutralized by the inextinguishable rhetorical element.

The Christian sermon gave access to vulgarisms, for it had to have a homespun ring to it if the people were to be reached.<sup>1</sup> A plain and vivid style and high rhetorical skills, however, are not at all mutually exclusive.<sup>2</sup> Therefore, the sermons of the Fathers are not dependable evidence of vulgar Latin. Surely Christian orators were committed to impart the gospel in a straightforward manner, but, from generation to generation, they came to express the very idea of 'evangelical simplicity' in ever more sophisticated periods. No wonder it was their aim to convince the educated<sup>3</sup> as well. As a result, the Christian sermon carried on the tradition of Greco-Roman rhetoric.

Neologisms are numerous; they belong to those elements which are anything but vulgar. They originated from the pullulating theological discussions, which could not be carried on without using abstract terms. The works of Tertullian, the first Christian author of merit to write in Latin, already abounded with abstracts. As all the world discussed dogma, such vocabulary became vital even for the layman. Welcome or not, this was the dawn of a surprisingly 'modern' attitude to language.

Particularly fascinating from the standpoint of cultural history is the Christian development of old pagan vocabulary: orare ('pray') was not a popular but an archaic, ceremonial word, which had fossilized relatively early and mostly occurred in formulaic expressions. Christianity revived it and, significantly, did so in the footsteps of Seneca.<sup>4</sup>

The biblical opposites 'spirit' and 'flesh' (spiritus and caro; e.g. Gal. 5. 17) were prefigured by the same Stoic: Seneca had contrasted caro and animus.<sup>5</sup>

The Christian usage of captivus in the figurative sense ('prisoner of

<sup>1</sup> Aug. in Ps. 36, serm. 3. 6 Melius in barbarismo nostro vos intellegitis, quam in nostra disertitudine vos deserti eritis.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the text cited in the preceding note and e.g. also the anaphorae and parallelisms, Aug. serm. 301. 7. 6 (PL 38, 1383) or serm. 199. 2. 3 (PL 38, 1028). Elements of diatribe had already been discovered in Saint Paul.

<sup>3</sup> The reserves of this audience in Lact. inst. 5. 1. 15.

<sup>4</sup> E. LÖFSTEDT, Peregrinatio Aetheriae, Uppsala 1911, 39-43.

<sup>5</sup> Sen. epist. 65. 22; 74. 16; dial. 6 (= cons. Marc.) 24. 5; cf. W. VON WARTBURG'S review of G. DEVOTO, Storia della lingua di Roma, Bologna 1940, ZRPh 61, 1941, 144-148, especially 146.

his passions'), which developed further in Romance as 'paltry' (Fr. chétif) or 'bad' (Ital. cattivo), was likewise anticipated by Seneca (dial. 5. 4. 4 captus).<sup>1</sup>

In addition to Stoic sources for Christian usage, there are ancient Roman ones as well; this applies especially to the established opposition between one's own people (populus) and foreign peoples (gentes).<sup>2</sup> Since the time of the earliest Latin Fathers this deeply ingrained Roman distinction had been transferred to the antithesis of the Church ('people of God') and the pagans (Hebr. gojîm).

The later designation of the non-Christian as paganus probably came from wide-spread Roman usage, which made a distinction between civilian (paganus) and warrior (here the miles Christi).<sup>3</sup> Here also the unbroken influence of Roman concepts is obvious.

Did a unique new language come into being in this way,<sup>4</sup> or did the authors adapt themselves to their respective environments? The propagation and victory of Christianity undoubtedly brought with them new forms of expression, and the early Christian period is one of the most important phases in the history of Latin. However, the roots of the Christian literary language reach far back to antiquity, just as the irrevocable medieval transformation of art had already begun in antiquity.<sup>5</sup>

Christianity did not suddenly generate a new language or a new art. In order to be understood it had to avail itself of existing forms of expression; this elucidates indirectly Rome's role of intermediary between antiquity and the Middle Ages.

IDEAS I REFLECTIONS ON LITERATURE

In Macrobius we find an understanding of the Aeneid that follows on the tradition of ancient Homeric interpretation. Virgil is compared

<sup>1</sup> E. LÖFSTEDT, Late Latin 73, note 2.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. Cic. de orat. 2. 76.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. Tac. hist. 1. 53; 'civilian' still in Tert. pall. 4. 8; cor. 11. 5; another interpretation: 'boorish, unenlightened' (Oros. prol. 9; Pers. prol. 6; Plin. epist. 7. 25. 5-6).

<sup>4</sup> Thus MOHRMANN (see bibl.); more reserved LÖFSTEDT, Late Latin 68-87.

<sup>5</sup> B. SCHWEITZER, Die spätantiken Grundlagen der mittelalterlichen Kunst, Leipzig 1949, 17; in addition, E. DINKLER, Gnomon 22, 1950, 412-413.

to nature, which brings forth everything;<sup>1</sup> this is typical on the one hand of the ancient school's strict adherence to the validity of poetic texts and its acceptance of their claim to 'truth': they were used as an introduction to the understanding of our world. On the other, his high esteem of human creativity pointed to the future.

Ancient and Christian textual exegeses met one another, and in some respects it may be positively said that ancient education carried off the victory. Above all, the tradition of classical schools held its own with astonishing tenacity. Through education, grammarians and rhetors continually cultivated and imparted a conception of literature which came to be regarded as common knowledge among the educated. In this field Christianity only seldom was radically inimical to culture; most authors were open to the influence of pagan education.

Jerome, to be sure, took pains to prove that the Bible offered paradigms for every literary genre and could therefore replace all books. His words, however, sound more threatening to classical literature than they actually are, for just such reflections of a skillful translator demonstrate a fine feeling for style and a reluctance to renounce all sense of beauty even in matters of sacred reading.

Christians 'used' pagan literary genres and made something new out of them: creative attempts to Christianize certain literary genres led, for example, to the birth of biblical epic and to the systematic transformation of a wide range of genres in the work of Prudentius.

Even more important were the first attempts at hermeneutics: the categories of Greek literary criticism were applied to biblical texts. When reading the Old Testament, Christians followed the principles of ancient Homeric interpretation, which had been further developed and applied to biblical exegesis in Alexandria by Philo the Jew and many Christians up to the time of Origen.

Perhaps of greatest consequence was the 'conversion' of ('productive') rhetoric to ('receptive') hermeneutics under the banner of Christianity. This religion was based on the reading of scriptures; thus it could use the reading and understanding of a text as a metaphor for the understanding of the world and of the human experience; such was Augustine's discovery in his De magistro and De doctrina christiana.

---

<sup>1</sup> LIEBERG, Poeta creator; the experience of human creativity, which was not foreign to Roman poets (cf. Ov. met. 6. 1-145), was not given more attention by philosophers until Neoplatonism.

IDEAS II

An intellectual revolution took place at the beginning of the 2nd century. Whereas Domitian had continued the tradition of banishing philosophers from Rome, under Nerva and Trajan philosophy became presentable at court, a change which was reflected by the exile and recall of Dio of Prusa; what is more, philosophy became a bullwark of imperial power. (One is reminded of Constantine, who, after the failure of persecution under Diocletian, placed himself at the head of a spiritual power that would shape the future). Philosophy was in vogue. From Hadrian on, it became fashionable to sport a philosopher's beard:<sup>1</sup> thus, even the outward appearance of the Romans changed. Rulers enjoyed being addressed as 'philosophers'. Hadrian went so far as to vouchsafe immunity to teachers of wisdom (a measure that would, however, be rescinded under Antoninus Pius). A spiritual revolution from above promised an age of reason, of wisdom and of moderation. As a consequence, the wind was taken out of the sails of the Stoic opposition and senatorial historiography in the Tacitean style. Would Seneca's dream of the ideal Stoic ruler come true? His attempt, however, to express philosophical subjectivity in Latin terms, at first, did not find allegiance.

The philosophical trend of the period opened up new channels for the propagation of Christianity: Christianity introduced itself as a philosophy (Tert. apol. 46). In fact, there were some points of contact with philosophy: there were basic concepts of natural theology (such as monotheism) and of ethics; the idea of conversion; devotion to truth; the acceptance of the role of a moral guardian in society; courage to resist based on freedom of will; defiance of death and readiness to suffer martyrdom (here Christians could approve of philosophers like Socrates). It became possible to bring Christianity home to the educated as the consummation of ancient philosophy; in this process initially Stoicism stood in the foreground, later on it was Neoplatonism.

The dialogue with pagan philosophy also had repercussions on the intellectual approach to the articles of faith. The philosophy of late antiquity and that of early Christianity cannot be treated separately. Theology was availing itself more and more of the methods of philosophy. An early example is the doctrine of the Logos in which—at the latest since Philo—the traditions of Jewish wisdom and Greek philosophy had merged. Through Christianity the concept of Logos became a pivotal point of old and new: the unheard-of statement in the prologue to John that the creative, divine Logos became flesh in Jesus Christ made possible the step from an old philosophy of nature to a new philosophy of history. A philosophy of history in grand style was now possible since a new standpoint had been gained, from which two streams of tradition—that of antiquity and that of the Old Testament—could be surveyed, assimilated and filled with new meaning.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. now P. ZANKER, The Mask of Socrates. The Image of the Intellectual in Antiquity, Berkeley 1995, esp. 198–266.

Latin literature of middle and late Empire absorbed for itself anew the Judeo-Christian tradition. This became a third cultural source along with Greek civilization, from which Republican literature had drawn, and the Roman national classics since the Augustan Age: thus, the literature of middle and late Empire laid the foundations for Europe.

The role of Roman tradition in this process was important; unfortunately it is often overlooked; in fact, even some typically Roman characteristics only now found an adequate literary expression:

Juridical thought reached its perfection at this time.

The same was true of psychology, a field in which particularly the Latin Church Fathers distinguished themselves. Seneca had a key position here; he seemed to anticipate Christian ideas both as a practical spiritual adviser and as a mediator between Stoic and Roman thought. Tertullian had good reason to call Seneca saepe noster (anim. 20. 1). Augustine's concern with psychology and the idea of conversion were congenial with the Romans' penchant for practical psychology. Their interest in individual characters and in personal experience now produced the new literary genre of psychological autobiography (Augustine's Confessiones).

Encouraged by biblical hints and his Roman perception of history as a linear development, Augustine finally succeeded in formulating an explicit philosophy of history (culminating in his didactic work De civitate Dei). Virgil's and Cicero's views of history, which were centered on the Roman empire, in many respects had prepared the way for Christian reflection or offered points of reference for criticism; an inalienable ingredient was the Roman's public spirit, from which the Church drew much for its own identity (e.g. notions such as populus for Christians and gentes for outsiders). Virgil and Cicero were not simply literature for the Christian authors; they embodied an intellectual force—either as opponents or as forerunners—that was to be taken seriously.

A typically Roman taste for encyclopaedic knowledge and didacticism found expression in traditional and new literary forms, through which men such as Martianus Capella passed on the knowledge of antiquity to the Middle Ages.

Roman thought also constituted an antidote against a threatening prevalence of the Greek bent to pure contemplation and against an absorption of Christianity by the intellectual environment of a mythically colored Platonism or a general syncretism. In Tertullian's polemics against the Gnostics we hear the voice of a Roman advocate and activist, who champions passionately the unique importance of life on earth and of historical reality. This convergence of Roman and Jewish practical sense—the precedence of real life over philosophical speculation—contributed substantially to a clear differentiation of the Christians from their Hellenized environment and kept Christianity alive. A marked striving to reach a large audience, strong reservations against what is excessively esoteric, and a passion for juridic definition are all typically Roman heirlooms of the Occidental Church.

We might therefore call the second half of the 4th century and the beginning of the 5th a first renaissance. The more we study this epoch, the more we come to appreciate, in retrospect, the liberating effect and the regenerative strength of classical Roman literature.

M. VON ALBRECHT, La littérature et la langue latines de l'antiquité tardive, LEC 50, 1982, 3–11 (this article implicitly justifies the division into epochs used in the present book). * ALFÖLDI, Sozialgeschichte. * ALTANER, * R. H. AYERS, Language, Logic and Reason in the Church Fathers. A Study of Tertullian, Augustine, and Aquinas, Hildesheim 1979. * BARDENHEWER, LG. * BERSCHIN, Biographie. * BERSCHIN, Medioevo. * J. W. BINNS, ed., Latin Literature of the Fourth Century, London 1974. * C. BLÖNNIGEN, Der griechische Ursprung der jüdisch-hellenistischen Allegorese und ihre Rezeption in der alexandrinischen Patristik, Frankfurt 1992. * G. W. BOWERSOCK, Greek Sophists in the Roman Empire, Oxford 1969. * A. J. BOYLE, ed., The Imperial Muse, Bendigo 1990. * P. BROWN, Aspects of the Christianization of the Roman Aristocracy, JRS 51, 1961, 1–11. * R. BROWNING, in: CHLL 683–773. * F. BUFFIÈRE, Les mythes d'Homère et la pensée grecque, Paris 1956. * H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Lateinische Kirchenväter, Stuttgart 1960.

- * Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'antiquité tardive en Occident, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 23, Vandœuvres-Genève 1977. * P. COURCELLE, Les lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris 2nd ed. 1948. * A. DEMANDT, Die Spätantike. Römische Geschichte von Diocletian bis Justinian, 284–565 n. Chr., München 1989. * S. DÖPP, Die Blütezeit lateinischer Literatur in der Spätantike (350–430 n. Chr.). Charakteristika einer Epoche, Philologus 132, 1988, 19–52. * B. EFFE, Entstehung und Funktion 'personaler' Erzählweisen in der Erzählliteratur der Antike, Poetica 7, 1975, 135–157. * H. EIBL, Augustin und die Patristik, München 1923.
- * S. FEIN, Die Beziehung der Kaiser Trajan und Hadrian zu den litterati, Stuttgart 1995. * J. FONTAINE, Aspects et problèmes de la prose d'art latine au III<sup>e</sup> siècle, Turin 1968. * J. FONTAINE, La letteratura latina cristiana, Bologna 1973 (substantially expanded in comparison with the French original of 1970). * J. FONTAINE, Études sur la poésie latine tardive d'Ausone à Prudence. Recueil de travaux, Paris 1980. * J. FONTAINE, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien. Esquisse d'une histoire de la poésie latine chrétienne du III<sup>e</sup> au VI<sup>e</sup> siècle, Paris 1981. * J. FONTAINE, Comment doit-on appliquer la notion de genre littéraire à la littérature latine chrétienne du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle?, Philologus 132, 1988, 53–73. * H. FUCHS, Der geistige Widerstand gegen Rom in der antiken Welt, Berlin 1938, repr. 1964.
- * H. FUCHS, Augustin und der antike Friedensgedanke. Untersuchungen zum 19. Buch der Civitas Dei, Berlin 1926. * M. FUHRMANN, Die lateinische Literatur der Spätantike. Ein literarhistorischer Beitrag zum Kontinuitätsproblem, A&A 13, 1967, 56–79. * M. FUHRMANN, Rom in der Spätantike, München 1994. * H. A. GÄRTNER, ed., Kaiserzeit II (= Die Römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung 5), Stuttgart 1988 (bibl.). * T. HÄGG, The Novel in Antiquity, Oxford 1983. * HARNACK, LG. * P. J. HEATHER, Goths and Romans 332–489, Oxford 1991. * R. HERZOG, Einführung in die lateinische Literatur der Spätantike (excellent), in: HLL 5, 1–44; cf. also HLL 5 passim (bibl.). * N. HOLZBERG, Der antike Roman, München 1986.
- * A. H. M. JONES, The Late Roman Empire, 3 volumes, Oxford 1964. * R. KASTER, The Guardians of Language, Berkeley 1988. * W. KIRSCH, Die lateinische Versepiik des 4. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1989. * LABRIOLLE, LG. * LÖFSTEDT, Late Latin. * R. MARACHE, La critique littéraire de langue latine et le développement du goût archaisant au II<sup>e</sup> siècle de notre ère, Rennes 1952. * H.-I. MARROU, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris 4th ed. 1958. * J. MARTIN, B. QUINT, eds., Christentum und antike Gesellschaft, Darmstadt 1990 (= WdF 649). * C. MOHRMANN, Die altchristliche Sondersprache in den Sermones des hl. Augustin, Amsterdam 1932, 2nd ed. 1965 (augmented). * C. MOHRMANN, Tertium genus. Les relations judaïsme—antiquité—christianisme, reflétées dans la langue des chrétiens, Turnhout 1971. * C. MOHRMANN, Etudes sur le latin des chrétiens, 4 vols., Roma 1961–1977. * A. MOMIGLIANO, Pagan and Christian Historiography in the Fourth century A.D., in: A. MOMIGLIANO, ed., The Conflict between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth century, Oxford 1963, 79–99. * T. MOMMSEN, Römische Kaisergeschichte. Nach den Vorlesungs-Mitschriften von S. und P. HENSEL 1882/86, ed. by B. and A. DEMANDT, München 1992. * P. MONCEAUX, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, 7 vols., Paris 1901–1923, repr. 1966. * B. NEUSCHÄFER, Origenes als Philologe, Basel 1987. * T. NISSEN, Historisches Epos und Panegyrikus in der Spätantike, Hermes 75, 1940, 298–325. * S. M. OBERHELMAN, Rhetoric and Homiletics in Fourth-century Christian Literature. Prose Rhythm, Oratorical Style, and Preaching in the Works of Ambrose, Jerome and Augustine, Atlanta 1991. * J. PALM, Rom, Römertum und Imperium in der griechischen Literatur der Kaiserzeit, Lund 1959. * F. PASCHOUD, Roma aeterna. Études sur le patriotisme romain dans l'Occident latin à l'époque des grandes invasions, Rome 1967. * B. P. REARDON, The Second Sophistic, in: W. TREADGOLD, ed., Renaissances before the Renaissance, Stanford 1984, 23–41. * M. ROBERTS, The Jeweled Style. Poetry and Poetics in Late Antiquity, Ithaca 1989. * D. A. RUSSELL, ed., Antonine Literature, Oxford 1990. * V. A. SIRAGO, La seconda sofistica come espressione culturale della classe dirigente del II sec., ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 36–78. * P. STEINMETZ, Untersuchungen zur römischen Literatur des 2. Jh. n. Chr., Wiesbaden 1982. * P. STEINMETZ, Lyrische Dichtung im 2. Jh. n. Chr. ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 259–302. * J. A. STRAUB, Vom Herrscherideal in der Spätantike, Stuttgart 1939, repr. 1964. * J. A. STRAUB, Heidnische Geschichtsapologetik in der christlichen Spätantike. Untersuchungen über Zeit und Tendenz der Historia Augusta, Bonn 1963. * B. A. VAN GRONINGEN, General Literary Tendencies in the Second Century A.D., Mnemosyne, ser. 4, 18, 1965, 41–56. * A. WŁOSOK, Rom und die Christen. Zur Auseinandersetzung zwischen Christentum und römischem Staat, Stuttgart 1970 (= AU, ser. 13, suppl. 1).

II. POETRY

THE POETRY OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE<sup>1</sup>

The Final Strains of Ancient Poetry

We have a few poetic lines of Emperor Hadrian, in which he expresses his own restlessness and loneliness in almost modern terms; they give us an idea of the direction that Latin verse could have taken had it not subsided into a non-committal play on forms. The poetae novelli competed with the technical achievements of contemporary Greek poets<sup>2</sup> and echoed the affected style of Laevius. Some representatives of the middle class devoted themselves to hammering out verse inscriptions<sup>3</sup> which stood on the fringe of literature; representatives of the new aristocracy and Christians, too, busied themselves with such activity since the end of the 3rd century. Incidental poetry, which in Statius' Silvae and Martial's Epigrams had reached the highest artistic level and rank of world literature, could no longer maintain that standard. A separate chapter will be devoted to Ausonius, who towered above his contemporaries. Yet, even his poems appear incidental and ephemeral when compared to the masterpieces of Silver Latin.

Minor poetry was represented by<sup>4</sup> P. Optatianus Porfyrius, Pentadius, Ablabius, Flavius Afranius Syagrius, Alcimus, Paulus quaestor, Reposianus, Symp(h)osius, Tiberian, and the anonymous Prayer to Oceanus and Song of the Oar. Worthy of mention on its own merit is the graceful Alcestis,<sup>5</sup> recently discovered in Barcelona. It was composed in hexameters by an unknown author from an unknown period.

---

<sup>1</sup> In general cf. P. STEINMETZ, Lyrische Dichtung im 2. Jh. n. Chr., ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 259–302.

<sup>2</sup> NORDEN, LG 97.

<sup>3</sup> W. SCHETTER, K. SMOLAK, HLL 5, 224–236.

<sup>4</sup> On these authors: K. SMOLAK, HLL 5, 1989, §§ 544–553. On Reposianus also GÄRTNER, LG 1988, 192–199; 569; 582.

<sup>5</sup> Edition: M. MARCOVICH (TC), Leiden 1988; bibl.: GÄRTNER, LG 1988, 170–178; 568; K. SMOLAK, HLL 5, 1989, § 549.

Vespa's Squabble between Baker and Cook<sup>1</sup> appeared at the earliest toward the end of the 3rd century. The contest (agon) between different trades was rooted in the popular tradition of 'flyting' and had been raised to the rank of literature by Theocritus, Virgil, and Catullus (62); moreover, it was influenced by rhetorical syncretis. This type of text had a great literary future.<sup>2</sup>

The precious Pervigilium Veneris<sup>3</sup> (probably early 4th century) fully justifies its high repute. The impressiveness of the versus quadrati is enhanced by a sonorous refrain. The night fête imparts a quasi cultic aura; the distinctively secular piety and the poignant contrast between man and nature stressed at the end of the work touch a sympathetic chord in modern readers, such as Jacob Balde (Philomela), G. A. Bürger, Chateaubriand, Walter Pater, and T. S. Eliot.

The minor poetic forms reached an acme in the work of Ausonius (see the chapter devoted to him). His style found followers in Gaul: C. Apollinaris Sidonius, a talent mastering form but lacking depth, and his contemporary Merobaudes, an admirer of Aëtius. Another writer of short poems was Ennodius (d. 521), who like Sidonius also distinguished himself as a writer of prose. In Africa during the rule of the Vandals there appeared the Christian and 'old Roman' poems of Dracontius (at the end of the 5th century)<sup>4</sup> and several epigrams of the Anthologia Latina, among which those of Luxurius (first third of the 6th century) are particularly well explored.<sup>5</sup>

Around 400, Avianus wrote fables in elegiacs, a meter that did not particularly suit the content—this is indicative of the blurring of the boundaries of genre in late Antiquity. The well-known travel poem

<sup>1</sup> M. SCHUSTER, Vespa, RE 8 A 2, 1958, 1705–1710; K. SMOLAK, HLL 5, 1989, 235–256.

<sup>2</sup> H. WALTHER, Das Streitgedicht in der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, München 1920.

<sup>3</sup> Editions: P. PITHOU, Paris 1577 (with notes by J. SCALIGER; ed. princ.); R. SCHILLING (TTrN), Paris 1944; L. CATLOW (TTrC), Brussels 1980; G. P. GOOLD, F. W. CORNISH, J. P. POSTGATE, J. W. MACKAIL (TTr), London 1918; 2nd ed. 1988; bibl.: basic K. SMOLAK, HLL 5, 1989, § 551; R. SCHILLING, Le refrain dans la poésie latine, in: M. VON ALBRECHT and W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik und Dichtung. FS V. PÖSCHL, Heidelberg 1990, 117–131.

<sup>4</sup> The Laudes Dei do not comprise an epic but a glorification of God's grace in three books. The 1st book concerns Creation; the 2nd, Christ and his acts. The 3rd book, which among other subjects treats the obedience of mankind, is remarkable for its mention of self-sacrificing pagans.

<sup>5</sup> H. HAPP, Luxurius. Text, analyses, commentary, 2 vols., Stutgardiae 1986.

of Rutilius (s. below) is also elegiac in form. Love elegy in the true sense of the word was represented in the 6th century by Maximianus,<sup>1</sup> an author familiar with Augustan elegy and Virgil. He purports to have consulted in his youth the wise Boethius (3. 48). His perspective of an elderly man allowed him a new approach to an effete genre (elegies 1, 2, and 5); of six poems only two reflect younger days (3 and 4): once the beloved has been won over, desire wanes (3). Impotence (3 and 5) is a topic known to us from Ovid and Petronius; in Maximianus, the disappointed girl's address to a limp member of the male anatomy ascends to the lofty regions of philosophy (5). Asceticism lies behind the seeming outspokenness of this author who probably was a Christian. In the Middle Ages Maximianus was read in classrooms as ethicus.

Bucolic poetry was cultivated by Nemesianus (see Roman Bucolic, above, pp. 659–667).

The same author tried his hand at didactic poetry: however, only 325 hexameters of his work on hunting survived. Q. Serenus composed a medical didactic poem, a collection of recipes in hexameters. Rufius Festus Avienus wrote a Descriptio orbis terrae in verse, a work entitled De ora maritima and a translation of Aratus. Terentianus Maurus<sup>2</sup> was an unusual didactic poet (probably 2nd–3rd century); he constructed a three-part didactic poem on metrics in breathtaking verses of varying meter: De litteris (85–278), De syllabis (279–1299) and De metris (1300–2981). The texts were handed down together; the preface (1–84) originally belonged to the De syllabis only. Around 400 there appeared the Carmen de figuris and the Carmen de ponderibus et mensuris, both composed in hexameters.

Epic was given a new panegyric form by Claudian, a true poet; he will be discussed in a separate chapter. In Corippus<sup>3</sup> we have a late blooming of this venerable genre.

<sup>1</sup> Editions: Ae. BAEHRENS, Poetae Latini minores, vol. 5, Lipsiae 1883, 313–348; R. WEBSTER (TC), Princeton 1900; F. SPALTENSTEIN (TC), Rome 1983; bibl.: W. SCHETTER, Studien zur Überlieferung und Kritik, Wiesbaden 1970; C. RATKOWITSCH, Maximianus amat, Wien 1986 (dating into the 9th century); C. RATKOWITSCH, Weitere Argumente zur Datierung und Interpretation Maximians, WS 103, 1990, 207–239; A. FO, Significato . . . della raccolta . . . di Massimiano, Hermes 115, 1987, 348–371.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: J.-W. BECK (TTTrC), Göttingen 1993; concordance: J.-W. BECK, Hildesheim 1993; bibl.: P. L. SCHMIDT, KIP 591; J.-W. BECK, Terentianus Maurus: Gedanken zur Datierung, Hermes 122, 1994, 220–252.

<sup>3</sup> Authoritative E. BURCK, in: E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979, 379–399; 418–419 (bibl.).

The Beginnings of Christian Poetry

Christian Latin poetry was derived from three sources: first, Eastern Church hymns based on popular song; second, the elevated prose of the Latin Psalter, of liturgical prayers, and of dogmatic texts like the Creed; and, finally, Roman literary poetry.

The New Testament (Eph. 5. 19; Col. 3. 16) mentions examples of current Christian lyric poetry: 'psalms, hymns and spiritual songs'. Pliny (epist. 10. 96/97. 7) attests at the beginning of the 2nd century that Christians came together on a certain day before sunrise and in antiphony sang a hymn (carmen dicere) to Christ as a god. A great number of songs must have circulated in Greek and Syrian communities; the music of the Eastern Church spread westward through Hilary and others before him. Introduced by individuals—often into initially reluctant communities—the early Christian Latin hymns were for the most part highly literary and at times downright unpopular; however, the newly discovered abecedarian Psalmus responsorius<sup>1</sup> (in a 4th century papyrus) changed this picture. The work is an early attestation to a 'popular' style of ecclesiastical songs in the otherwise classicizing period of Constantine: actually, the use of classical and non-classical means of expression is not only determined by epoch but also by social stratum. Mixed forms such as 'hexameter without regard to quantity' had no future.<sup>2</sup> In his innovative hymnody, both simple and noble, Ambrose found a balance between the high literary standards of the educated and the piety of the simple folk; his influence would last for more than 1500 years.

In early Christian times Latin poetry was once again influenced by prose, though in a way completely different from early Latin and Augustan poetry. Adopted by the Church as a book of prayers, the psalms assumed prosaic form in Latin;<sup>3</sup> hymns of a dogmatic nature (such as those of Hilary or Victorinus) imitated the formal prose of ecclesiastical texts like the Creed. The preference for parallel constructions, typical of prose artistry, gave assonance and rhyme special prominence. With the decline of classical meter based on quantity, rhythmical cola in parallel arrangement became a new medium of popular lyric poetry.

<sup>1</sup> R. HERZOG, HLL 5, 1989, § 559.

<sup>2</sup> Commodian composes in a meter based on word accent and in a 'vulgar Latin' style (edition: I. MARTIN, Turnholti 1960 = CC 128); period disputed (3rd–5th century). Similar attempts were made by Augustine.

<sup>3</sup> The 'hymns' prescribed in the monastic rules of Caesarius and Benedict are written in prose: the Te Deum laudamus (perhaps from the Greek), the Te decet laus (from the Greek), and the Magna et mirabilia (apocal. 15. 3–4); cf. W. BULST, Hymni Latini antiquissimi LXXXV, Psalmi III, Heidelberg 1956, 7–8.

In the area of form, two different traditions converge surprisingly: the preference for parallelism in Hebrew psalms is echoed spontaneously in Latin, for prose had long cultivated such a style. At the same time the nascent Christian lyric took up structural principles not indigenous to Rome, e.g. the abecedarian arrangement of Psalm 119 (118), the so-called 'Golden ABC'. This form also served pedagogical purposes: questionable as its artistic value may be, the alphabetical order is nevertheless a mnemonic device for driving home the articles of faith; many Christian poems are indeed didactic. Among Gnostics in the Greek Orient the approach had been more or less the same.

Thirdly, Christian poetry drew on the traditional forms of ancient poetry as developed in various genres. Narrative contents inspired biblical epic, whereas didactic themes found their form in dogmatic poems; even bucolic poetry was Christianized. Lactantius' elegiac poem De Phoenice<sup>1</sup> was perhaps the earliest Christian poem written in Latin. Its use of myth as an allegory for the personal hope of resurrection provided the groundwork for a Christian poetics.<sup>2</sup> The process culminated in the deliberate transfiguration of all pagan literary genres by Prudentius, whose work was a last blooming of classical and a first blooming of Christian poetry.

The development took a step backward when Prudentius' less talented successors increasingly came to assimilate, along with classical form, classical subject matter into Christian poetry. Artistic assessment of the products of virtuosi such as Sidonius Apollinaris<sup>3</sup> is a matter of taste: one could laugh them off as French frivolity avant la lettre, praise them as humanitas Ausoniana or condemn them as the vanity of pseudo-Christians; one-sided as they are, perhaps all three verdicts do not miss the mark entirely. Christianity, which emphasized the role of the individual, would have allowed, in principle, a development of great personal poetry comparable to Augustine's autobiographical prose. However, such an achievement could not be expected from authors like Sidonius, given his threefold commitment to aristocratic society, school and Church. Superficially his situation brings back memories of Horace, who gave up poetry for philosophy, as he tells us in masterful verse. In the same way educated authors, having become bishops, 'renounced' the vanities of poetry, but continued writing verse anyway, though not near Horace's level. Poets like Ausonius, at whose command stood the entire treasury of ancient literary forms, might have regarded their works as fragments of a great confession; yet unlike the prose of Augustine, in their artful verse confession is all too often smothered in convention, and there is not much to confess anyway. However feebly and hesitantly, late antiquity nevertheless prepared the way for the personal poetry of modern times. Hints of this change are traceable in Paulinus of Nola,<sup>1</sup> for whom Christ had assumed the role of muse since his conversion. With the rigor of a zealot (but still in classical verse) he sought to explain to his teacher Ausonius why he had shed the tinsel of humanism. The epic Eucharisticus composed around 459 by Paulinus of Pella,<sup>2</sup> is touching as a personal confession but ungainly as poetry.

<sup>1</sup> See our chapter on Lactantius, s. pp. 1595; 1602.

<sup>2</sup> Traditional forms are equally used in the hexametric Laudes Domini (R. HERZOG, HLL 5, § 560), which end in an intercession for Constantine.

<sup>3</sup> Edition: A. LOYEN (TTrN), 3 vols., Paris 1960 and 1970; carm. 22: N. DELHEY (TC), Berlin 1993; concordance: P. G. CHRISTIANSEN, J. E. HOLLAND, Hildesheim 1993.

The talent of Venantius Fortunatus<sup>3</sup> (6th century) rose above his contemporaries; his works reflected the jubilation of the ecclesia triumphans in a style which easily mastered both old and new forms. The elegy De partu virginis conformed to classical standards while the magnificent Christmas and Passion hymns laid the foundation and set high artistic standards for medieval poetry. Polished verse on struggles and miracles immortalized individuals as they actively imitated Christ. The description of the joys of eternal life resembles a baroque ceiling fresco. The rift between pagan form and Christian content had once again been overcome. Although the voice of the individual was heard in conventional occasional poetry, it would ultimately submerge in the choir.

The main theme of Christian poetry is praise of God, for the expression of which the lyric form is only one of several possibilities. Closely connected to the glorification of God was the communication of his message, which could be brought about in two ways: either directly by paraphrasing the Gospels and explaining Church dogmata in epic and didactic poetry, or indirectly by describing the life and martyr's death of Christian converts. Accounts of martyrdom recalled drama and biography; reports of conversion were reminiscent of philosophical texts.

<sup>1</sup> Edition: G. DE (= VON) HARTEL, 2 vols., Vindobonae 1894 (= CSEL 29-30).

<sup>2</sup> Edition: W. BRANDES, Vindobonae 1888 (= CSEL 16, 263-334).

<sup>3</sup> Edition: F. LEO, B. KRUSCH, MGH AA 4, 1 and 2, Berolini 1881-1885; M. REYDELLET (TTr), Paris 1994; Epitaphium Vilitutae (4. 26): P. SANTORELLI (TC), Napoli 1994.

Actual Bible epic began with Juvenius; he Christianized epic and the intent of the epic poet, transformed the text of the Bible into the cultivated Latin of poetry, but did not find for his subject matter an independent arrangement, selection, or form. Owing to his importance as a pioneer, he will be discussed in his own section.

In her cento, Proba<sup>1</sup> (4th century) clothed selected Christian topics in a mosaic of citations from Virgil. Was this symptomatic of a 'classicism' that had been budding since Constantine or was it merely another proof of the degeneration of poetry to pedantry? Confronted with Proba's claim that Virgil was actually singing the praises of Christ, strict theologians and philologists alike bristled with opposition. Jerome, theologian and philologist in one, saw in Proba's cento a degradation of both the Bible and Virgil. It would probably be more accurate historically, however, to speak of a new 'hermeneutic' reading encouraged by the incorporation of Roman culture into a Christian perspective. Proba established a typological relationship between the Roman classic (as a kind of 'Old Testament') and the new truth realized in Christ. Subsequently—like the artists who decorated Constantine's arch—she built a new structure out of the spoils of her predecessor.

After the talented Sedulius, to whom a separate section is devoted (s. below), we have to mention his imitator Arator, an author admired well into the 16th century, whose Acts of the Apostles roused the Romans to enthusiasm in 544 as they were being threatened by the Arian Goths. Trinitarian exegesis revealed the high vocation of the Church of St. Peter.<sup>2</sup> The technique of isolated images and of poetic meditation recalls Sedulius, who also influenced Rusticius Helpidius in his Carmen de Christi Jesu beneficiis. Genesis was rendered in verse by Claudius Marius Victor (Alethia), but above all expertly by Avitus.

Mentioned as bishop of Vienne in 494, Alcimus Ecdicius Avitus is to be associated with the eminently rhetorical culture of late Gaul. His main poetical work, De spiritalis historiae gestis, comprises 5 books:

<sup>1</sup> R. HERZOG, HLL 5, 1989, § 562.

<sup>2</sup> Editions: Arius BARBOSA, Helmanticae 1516; A. P. MCKINLAY, Vindobonae 1951 (= CSEL 72); J. SCHWIND, Arator-Studien, Göttingen 1990.

1 De mundi initio, 2 De originali peccato, 3 De sententia Dei, 4 De diluvio mundi, 5 De transitu maris. Unlike Cyprian's Heptateuch, which had been an adaptation, Avitus' is an independent work of poetry. Far from being overwhelmed by the abundance of his subject matter,—he selected, after the fashion of good epic poets, a few episodes of vital importance. He knew how to portray paradise poetically and to recount events with psychological deftness. He was the first to bring the figure of Lucifer into epic. Milton, who included Avitus in his extensive studies,<sup>1</sup> would shape authoritatively the theme of Paradise Lost. This shows that in ancient Bible epic, too, there was a considerable potential which would be effectively exploited only in much later times.

THE POETAE NOVELLI

Dates

A group of poets active from the epoch of Hadrian up to the late 2nd century was called poetae novelli by Terentianus Maurus (probably end of the 2nd century) and neoterici by his colleague Diomedes (2nd half of the 4th century). Terentianus names three of them: Alfius Avitus (whose works had been published 'long ago'), Annianus, and Septimius Serenus (who was his contemporary). Gellius (about A.D. 170) introduces Annianus as an older contemporary who had heard the grammarian Probus. Other comparable poets are known to us only by name (Marianus), and many of them remain anonymous. One may doubt, however, whether all the poets labeled poetae novelli thought of themselves as forming a homogeneous group.

Survey of Works

Alfius Avitus wrote Libri rerum excellentium in iambic dimeters. He treated anecdotes or short stories, mainly from Livy's Roman history. Of Annianus' Fescennina (ludicrous marriage songs) only the title is known; Ausonius attests to his frankness in sexual matters. Annianus' Falisca, named after his property at Falerii, had a rural and folkloristic touch (Uva, uva sum et uva Falerna

<sup>1</sup> G. KRÜGER, in: SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 4, 2, 1920, 632, n. 3; on Avitus in general, ibid. §§ 1153–1159.

'I'm a grape, a grape, a grape of Falernum', frg. 1 Morel). We have relatively numerous fragments of Serenus' Opuscula ruralia which dealt with country life and, of course, love. Martianus wrote his Lupercalia probably in an anti-quarian vein.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The attitude of the poetae novelli resembles that of Greek Alexandrian poets who avoided hopeless competition with the classics by playfully concentrating on small and rare poetic forms not yet represented by standard works.

The most illustrious Latin forerunners of the poetae novelli were Catullus and his contemporaries; an even earlier important stimulus was the metrical and linguistic versatility of Laevius. Nor should we forget the so-called Appendix Vergiliana, the minor poetry of the Neronian age and the younger Pliny's attempts to revive the poetic atmosphere of late Republican literary circles in his day.

Alfius used Livy as a source. He treated novelistic episodes in lyric meters, giving special attention to dramatic effects. This mixture of genres is strikingly reminiscent of what would be called 'ballads' in a much later period. We should therefore try to find out how different genres melted together in each individual poem rather than speak of a 'poetry without definite genre'. The rise of a minor type of poetry to literary status is nothing new; new is its becoming the typical representative of the poetry of an entire age. When reading Ausonius, we will be able to appreciate fully the importance of this development.

Literary Technique

In the story of the rape of the Sabines Alfius replaces the Livian chorus of the young women with an individual young wife addressing her husband; thus the poet enhances realism and the privacy of the scene. When remodeling the episode of the schoolmaster of Falerii, Alfius prefers direct to indirect speech. The schoolmaster's outspoken cynicism adds to the dramatic effect.

Language and Style

The poetae novelli, who (in accordance with the archaizing tastes of the age) discovered Laevius, did not abstain from metrical experiments: the following line can be read both forward and backward without losing its metric form: versu volo, Liber, tua praedicentur acta/ acta praedicentur tua, Liber, volo versu (p. 189 Morel).

A preference for playful use of difficult meters is matched by a sophisticated approach to language. On the one hand, there are archaisms (litterator for grammatista, Curis for Quiris), on the other hand there are elements of vulgar Latin (vagare for vagari, viridus for viridis). The authors strive for a seemingly plain and simple style; syntactic and metrical borders tend to coincide; there are no long periods.

Ideas I

We know from Gellius that Annianus was interested in problems of language and pronunciation. As we have no direct knowledge of the literary theories backed by the poetae novelli we must confine ourselves to observing the paradoxical phenomenon that this ‘modern’ movement was inaugurated by ‘archaists’: thus it happened that Laevius and Catullus, who in their day had been extremely ‘modern’, were now rediscovered as precious ‘antiques’.

Ideas II

Gellius draws an attractive picture of Annianus’ cheerful life on his estate near Falerii. This poet devoted his time to antiquarian and philological studies. In fact, the poetry of the poetae novelli is not fraught with the great questions of human existence; it rather concentrates on domestic, rural, and erotic life without overtly competing with elegy or pastoral. Quite unlike the generations of Seneca and Lucan these authors avoid emotional exuberance. The upper class of the 2nd century had made the best of their loss of political impact and turned to private pastimes like farming, hunting, love and sometimes even poetry and scholarship.

Transmission

The scanty fragments have been preserved by grammarians who quote them as examples of rare meters.

Influence

Despite a certain lack of depth the influence of the poetae novelli was not negligible. The very fact that they remained fashionable for half a century shows that they were congenial to their epoch. There is an affinity with other poetic products of the 2nd century like those of Florus and Hadrian. Gellius, Terentianus, and Diomedes seem to prove that their texts were copied and read. Ausonius is the best witness of their impact: as they had done, he cultivated minor literary forms, was fond of puns and combined local poetry with erotic and scholarly elements.

Editions: FPL (T), pp. 136–148 MOREL; 342–360 BLÄNSDORF. * J. W. DUFF, A. M. DUFF, Minor Latin Poets, 2 vols., London 1934, rev. 1935, 439–450 (Hadrian only). * E. COURTNEY, The Fragmentary Latin Poets, Oxford 1993, 375–420.

H. BARDON, Les empereurs et les lettres latines d'Auguste à Hadrien, 2nd ed. Paris 1968, 393–424. * A. CAMERON, Poetae Novelli, HSPH 84, 1980, 127–175. * E. CASTORINA, I 'poetae novelli', Biblioteca di cultura (Firenze) 79, 1949, 3–12. * E. CASTORINA, Questioni neoteriche, (ibid.), 1968, 157–160. * M. GALDI, Ideali artistici e letterari della scuola neoterica o novella in Roma, Mouseion 4, 1927, 90–108. * I. MARIOTTI, Animula vagula blandula, in: Studia Florentina A. RONCONI oblata, Roma 1970, 233–249. * P. STEINMETZ, Untersuchungen zur römischen Literatur des 2. Jh. n. Chr., Wiesbaden 1982. * P. STEINMETZ, Livius bei Alfius Avitus, in: Livius, Werk und Rezeption, FS E. BURCK, 1983, 435–447. * P. STEINMETZ, Lyrische Dichtung im 2. Jh. n. Chr., ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 259–302. * J. K. WAGNER, Quaestiones neotericae, diss. Leipzig 1907, 5–10. * E. ZAFFAGNO, Gli opuscula di Sereno, in: Argentea Aetas, in memoriam E. V. MARMORALE, Genova 1973, 273–294.

AUSONIUS

Life and Dates

Born to a physician in Bordeaux around 310, D. Magnus Ausonius was the first French representative of world literature. After studies in his native city and in Toulouse with his uncle Arborius, he taught at famous schools in Bordeaux for three decades, first as grammaticus and later as rhetor.<sup>1</sup> His unforgettable wife Sabina, who bore him three children, died at the age of 28. Emperor Valentinian I appointed him tutor to Gratian in Trier (around 365), promoted him to comes

<sup>1</sup> A. D. BOOTH, The Academic Career of Ausonius, Phoenix 36, 1982, 329–343.

(371) and later to quaestor sacri palatii (375).<sup>1</sup> There with his famous Mosella,<sup>2</sup> a tribute to the landscape of the river Moselle in 483 hexameters, he became the first poet of the German landscape and with his Bissula he became a discoverer of the qualities of the Swabian (Suevian) girl. The blue-eyed blonde was allotted to him as part of the spoils from the military campaign under Valentinian against the Alamanni, but she soon reversed the roles of master and slave. Gratian made him praefectus praetorio trium Galliarum in 378 and consul in 379. The poet urged the ruler to strengthen the position of the senate and to adopt a policy of clemency in deliberate contrast to Valentinian's attitude. After the violent death of Gratian (383), Ausonius returned to his holdings and to the Garonne in order to live for literature and friendship. His last years were overshadowed by his disappointment over the religious fanaticism of his pupil Paulinus, with whose departure from the tranquil milieu of literati Ausonius—who was satisfied with a short morning prayer—could not bring himself to sympathize.

Survey of Works<sup>3</sup>

Poetic Prefaces ('book 1') are directed to the reader, to Syagrius and to the Emperor Theodosius, from whom there is a letter to Ausonius enclosed.<sup>4</sup>

The Ephemeris ('book 2') describes a typical day in the poet's life.

There follow Poems, which concern the important stations of Ausonius' life and are partly of an official character ('book 3').

The Parentalia ('book 4') passes on portraits of his relatives, the Professores Burdigalenses<sup>5</sup> ('book 5') portraits of his colleagues (probably after 385 A.D.).

<sup>1</sup> Hesperius, the son of Ausonius, became proconsul of Africa in 376, and praefectus praetorio of Italy, Illyricum and Africa in 377–380.

<sup>2</sup> The work is dated between 369 and 375 (probably 371).

<sup>3</sup> It is a difficult task to reconstruct the original order of the poems of Ausonius; today we would start from Textual Transmission X. In this chapter we follow the traditional order of the poems (e.g. H. G. E. WHITE, edition); especially important for us are the genres of texts.

<sup>4</sup> Books 5, 7, 13, 14 have poetic prefaces; prose prefaces are found in books 4, 6, 8, 9, and 12 (2 prose prefaces), 16, and 17. Poem 2. 1 is forwarded by its own preface in prose. Discursive interludes are found in the Centio. Prefaces in prose and in verse open books 4 and 9. Books 2, 3, 10, and 11 are without prefaces; on prose prefaces: Z. PAVLOVSKIS, From Statius to Ennodius. A Brief History of Prose Prefaces to Poems, RIL 101, 1967, 535–567.

<sup>5</sup> R. P. H. GREEN, Still Waters Run Deep. A New Study of the Professores of Bordeaux, CQ 35, 1985, 491–506.

The Epitaphs ('book 6') relate mostly to figures of the Trojan War.

The so-called Eclogues ('book 7') include, after a hendecasyllabic preface, some longer didactic pieces in hexameters or distichs and several instructive epigrams as well.

The Martyred Cupid<sup>1</sup> ('book 8'), a hexameter text with an introduction in prose, describes a mural in a triclinium at Trier. Loving women in the underworld and Venus herself cruelly punish the god; in the end, however, everything turns out to be a nightmare.

Bissula ('book 9'), named after the above-mentioned Suevian girl, is a brief cycle of love poems in varying meters,<sup>2</sup> mostly epigrams, with a prose introduction and a poetic introduction.

The Mosella ('book 10') is the most extensive and most important work of Ausonius. The poem probably owes its renown primarily to its subject matter—as in the case of the travel poem of Rutilius Namatianus.

The Ordo urbium nobilium ('book 11'), written in hexameters, treats famous cities in descending order of importance—from Rome, which he 'venerates', to Bordeaux, which he 'loves'.

The Technopaegnon ('book 12') is a collection of hexameter poems in which each verse ends in a monosyllable. Material from literature, grammar, and mythology is ordered according to subject.

The Game of the Seven Sages ('book 13') is composed in iambic senarii. Each wise man introduces himself and quotes his own pithy saying in the original Greek.

The Twelve Caesars ('book 14') are treated in distichic epigrams; the introductory poems that relate to all the emperors are in hexameters.

The poetic epilogues forming the Conclusio to a list compiled by Ausonius of all the consuls make up 'book 15'.

'Book 16' is the Griphus ternarii numeri, and 'book 17' the Cento nuptialis, an unholy montage out of shredded sentences of the chaste Virgil, both meant to be circulated round the table.

The largely poetic Exchange of Letters—prominent among the addressees are Symmachus and Paulinus—fills the comprehensive '18th book', Mixed Epigrams the 'Nineteenth'; consul Ausonius' Speech of Thanksgiving written in prose to Emperor Gratian fills the 'Twentieth', a plainly hymnlike panegyric.

The editions include the Appendix Ausoniana, which contains spurious items.

<sup>1</sup> W. FAUTH, Cupido cruciatur, GB 2, 1974, 39–60.

<sup>2</sup> Choriambic tetrameters (2 choriamb and an aristophaneus), hexameters, elegiac couplets, couplets out of hexameter and hemiepes.

Sources, Models, and Genres

In addition to his favorites, Catullus and Horace, Ausonius mirrors a broad spectrum of Roman poetry:<sup>1</sup> Plautus, Terence, Lucretius, Virgil, Tibullus, Ovid, Lucan, Statius, Juvenal,<sup>2</sup> and Septimius Serenus (to whom he was indebted for the title Opuscula). Among the writers of prose Cicero and the Plinii take first place; he was also familiar with Varro, Suetonius, Florus and perhaps Marius Maximus.<sup>3</sup>

He quotes old Latin authors like Afranius, Ennius, and Lucilius from secondary sources.

The Mosella verges on eulogy but also on poetry such as the Haliëutica; there was also a work on fish written by Apuleius. Poetic descriptions of regions (chorographies such as that of Varro Atacinus) are also at work here; the idealization is reminiscent of Virgil's praise of Italy in the Georgics.

In many cases the epigrams are based on Greek models;<sup>4</sup> strangely enough, Martial is less prominent—much to Ausonius' disadvantage. The Trojan Heroes come from Pseudo-Aristotle. It is evident that a history of the Latin epigram cannot be written without continual consideration of Greek sources.

The shaping of new poetic genres is our next subject.

Literary Technique

In the Commemoratio professorum Burdigalensium<sup>5</sup> there are basically two types of poems represented: Encomia,<sup>6</sup> at the core of which public instruction is evaluated according to systematic criteria, and texts, in the middle parts of which biographical material dominates because there is not much to praise with respect to technical competence.<sup>7</sup>

Many poems conclude with an address to the deceased; motifs of consolation are rather rare. Inspired by personal ties and fondness

<sup>1</sup> W. GÖRLER, Vergilzitate in Ausonius' Mosella, Hermes 97, 1969, 94–114; R. P. H. GREEN, Ausonius' Use of the Classical Latin Poets. Some New Examples and Observations, CQ 27, 1977, 441–452.

<sup>2</sup> R. E. COLTON, Ausonius and Juvenal, CJ 69, 1973, 41–51.

<sup>3</sup> R. P. H. GREEN, Marius Maximus and Ausonius' Caesares, CQ 31, 1981, 226–236.

<sup>4</sup> F. MUNARI, Ausonio e gli epigrammi greci, SIFC 27/28, 1956, 308–314.

<sup>5</sup> On the following, s. esp. H. SZELEST (ZAnt) 1976.

<sup>6</sup> 1–6; 13–15; 20–22; 24.

<sup>7</sup> 7–12; 16–19; 23.

but not delivered with effusive praise, such commemorative poems sketch the most accurate portrait possible of the deceased. They are an invention of Ausonius himself: the commemoratio. This new type of poem combines elements of laudatio, epicedium,<sup>1</sup> elegy, and the grave epigram. In place of the pathos of mourning, personal ethos dominates. A possible model of both form and content is the De grammaticis et rhetoribus of Suetonius,<sup>2</sup> who had portrayed individual grammarians. Roman preference for concrete information, for individual features, and for telling facts, had been evident in the works of Suetonius; in Ausonius this attitude gave rise to poetry and found expression in a new form.

The Ordo urbium nobilium, too, represented a new type of poem. Here formal elements of the Greek epigram combined with Roman descriptiones, which up to this point had been components of longer texts but now became independent; moreover, it was a new idea to publish a cycle of such poems.

On the other hand, the satirical epigrams remained unoriginal in form and content. In this case Ausonius limited himself to repetition of the stereotype; his excessive illustration and explanation of punch lines is pedantic and inexcusable—all the more as he wrote for a public of connoisseurs.

With his showpiece Letter to His Son Ausonius proved himself to be a worthy continuator of rhetorical lyric after Statius' poem To Sleep.

Language and Style<sup>3</sup>

Just as Lucilius had once done, Ausonius mixed Latin and Greek elements to produce a hybrid poetry. This practice, an affront to both languages, seems to be typical of semiliterate epochs. Particularly striking is the slipshod prosody in many Greek words; he is not especially competent in this language. Even in Latin he shortens the a in contra. As he never left Gaul, his Latin is evidence of the Latinity of his time and region.

His epigrams, however, do betray considerable linguistic awareness.

<sup>1</sup> The epicedium is composed of laudatio, comploratio, and consolatio.

<sup>2</sup> H. SZELEST (ZAnt) 1976, esp. 433.

<sup>3</sup> R. E. COLTON, Some Unusual Words Used by Martial and Ausonius, CB 54, 1977, 8–10; V. CRISI, De re metrica et prosodiaca D. Magni Ausonii, I. De hexametris et pentametris, Utini 1938; P. TORDEUR, Etude des élisions dans la Moselle d'Ausone, Latomus 29, 1970, 966–987.

Rufus says reminisco instead of reminiscor—cor (intelligence), therefore, he does not possess (epigr. 8). Epigr. 61 reveals the thoughtless transfer of school terminology to inappropriate objects: the same Rufus wishes a newly married couple children masculini, feminini, and neutri generis. Accordingly, his humor ever retained some odor of the classroom.

His use of adjectives in the Mosella contributes substantially to poetic effect: the contrast of colors—green, red, white (69–70), the transparency of the water (55) and the play of light enchant the reader. The observation of blue and green tones in the landscape also corresponds to the increased interest of late Latin poets in the effect of color,<sup>1</sup> though Ennius, too, had recognized the dynamic impact of color.

In the Commemoratio professorum the address to the deceased is an important element of style.

Lyrical appeal combines with rhetorical repetition in the Letter to His Son. The mournful mood of an abandoned father is brought home to the reader at once through the steady hammering of solus (7–9) and sic (17–19).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Ausonius' rhetorical criteria correspond to his practice: perite, concinne, modulate, dulciter (epist. 23, prosa); his love of literature is closely related to the concept of otium. In old age he intends to read anew the classics with his grandchild: Horace, Virgil, Terence, Sallust (including the Histories, epist. 22, 55–65). As the Protrepticus to his grandson indicates (epist. 22), his approach to literature is marked by pedagogical concerns. However, such conventional remarks hardly reach the core of his intent.

The most important witness to Ausonius' view of his task as an author is the all-embracing character of his collection of poems. To this poet everything seems worth immortalizing: his family, the professors at Bordeaux, and much more. As in the case of Lucilius one is tempted to say that the old gentleman's life lies before us as on a votive tablet. Like some early Latin authors do, Ausonius leaves us with the impression that the personality of the author is more significant than his modest and often incidental verse. The 'encyclopedic' subject matter of the opuscula discloses a typically Roman penchant for a broad overview. In the jumble of seemingly unimportant matters, the reader is conscious of an individual attempting to become a mirror of the world.

---

<sup>1</sup> H. SZELEST 1987 (with further bibl.).

The love poems addressed to the Suevian girl Bissula may be regarded as the first steps to personal poetry—at least on the basis of intention and suggestion. In a special preface Ausonius felt it necessary to apologize for the personal character of these poems. In them something crops up that in Roman literature surfaces again and again but is often suppressed by literary and social constraints. The fact that the expression of personal feelings appears in the work of a poet who is otherwise so conventional and scholastic must be taken as a stirring symptom of the times.<sup>1</sup>

Ausonius himself obviously felt that he had not expressed everything in his poems, for he often supplemented them with prefaces, explanatory insertions and concluding remarks in prose. He was a man of letters living in a time prone to verbalize everything, albeit in long-standing, conventional forms. Not long thereafter the Confessiones of Augustine would cast a new type of personal literature. In the works of Ausonius the professed friend of the surface of things, we have rudiments perhaps more than modest but not to be dismissed altogether.

Ideas II

Ausonius' world of ideas is centered around those closest to him, the landscape of his homeland and his profession as rhetor. Unimportant as they may be individually, these persons and things have a prominent place in his heart. In this respect he is a genuine Roman. Despite all the rhetoric of the Mosella, there are some passages conveying an almost modern feeling for nature. Compared with the idealizing and typifying portrayal of the Mosel, the images of the cities give us a better impression of life in Ausonius' time; it was not commonplace in antiquity to give poetic expression to reality in such a way. Although the professors of Bordeaux are portrayed with fondness, they are not praised excessively. Ausonius' poetic sense of what is individual and tangible places him on the threshold of modern times.

---

<sup>1</sup> It is true that Symmachus acknowledges that the poet of the Mosella remains faithful to truth (epist. 1. 14. 3). However, this should be taken with reservation, cf. e.g. C.-M. TERNES 1970.

On the other hand, his preference for rhetoric and play on words is a thoroughly Roman—and Romance—feature; granted, the personal touch is also there. The playful flourishes of the Gratiarum actio do not conceal the exhortation to clemency: a teacher's legacy bequeathed to the Emperor. Beloved Latin, too, and its classics—Greek was not his forte—belonged to the natural environment of this man of letters. A born pedagogue, he conveys with gusto—if not always with good taste—the comfort afforded by education. Virgil for him is not just some venerable idol but an indestructible piece of his household effects, which—as in the Cento nuptialis—could even be touselled to one's heart's content.

However, he took dalliance with rhetoric and homespun poetry contrary to expectation so seriously that the conversion of his pupil Paulinus to an uncompromising form of Christianity was considered by him an act of treason. The words of the convert (Paulin. carm. 10. 39–40) against rhetors, who imbue the heart with false and vain things and instruct only the tongue (qui corda falsis atque vanis imbuunt/ tantumque linguas instruunt, 'who imbue the minds with false and worthless things and instruct only the tongue'), must have hurt him deeply.

Transmission<sup>1</sup>

The transmission of the text of Ausonius is among the most complicated problems of classical philology; some brief remarks must suffice here.

Ausonius sent his poems in the form of samples<sup>2</sup> before publication to his friends; the actual publication followed with a cover letter, in which an acquaintance was asked—in affect—to 'correct' the enclosed poem. Several poems have come down to us accompanied by two such letters; hence, these poems were published twice.<sup>3</sup>

We know of three threads of tradition that go back to late antiquity:

X: Thread X comes by way of Spain, and its primary representative is the Leidensis Vossianus Lat. F. 111, 9th cent. (= V): this is the most comprehensive collection of Ausonius; however, several epigrams fell victim to abridgement.

<sup>1</sup> S. PRETE, Ricerche sulla storia del testo di Ausonio, Roma 1960; bibl. in S. PRETE, 1978 edition; M. D. REEVE, Some Manuscripts of Ausonius, Prometheus 3, 1977, 112–120; cf. the same, in: REYNOLDS, Texts and Transmission 26–28; a helpful survey of research in: W. L. LIEBERMANN 1989, 270–277.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Symmachus apud Auson. epist. 1.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. the Technopaegnon. In the Fasti the accompanying poem originally dedicated to Hesperius was rededicated to a certain Gregorius.

Y: The second thread of the tradition probably goes back to a Bobiensis; the Paris. Lat. 8500 of the 14th cent. (= P) represents the beginning. Prete considers the Harleianus 2613 (h) the best representative. This tradition also contained the Historica, which today is lost. Y is somewhat shorter than X; there are cuts mainly in the personal parts of the text.

Z: The third and briefest selection omits the autobiographical and historical portions but contains the speech of thanks and the erotic poems. Today one no longer holds variants of Z to be those of the author (variants of a 'first edition' of about A.D. 383); they are thought instead to be an interpolated text dating from late antiquity. The Tilianus (Leidensis Vossianus Lat. Q 107) of the 14th or 15th cent. (= T) has been dethroned as the main representative of Z.

Influence<sup>1</sup>

Ausonius was read by Endelechius, Prudentius, Paulinus of Pella, Sidonius, Ennodius, and Venantius Fortunatus; his influence can be felt in the Epigrammata Bobiensia. In many respects his relaxed small talk set the tone in Gaul of late antiquity.

The renown of the Mosella extended into the Middle Ages, and its traces are detectable in Walahfrid Strabo, Ermenric (both 9th century) and in the Gesta Treverorum (12th century). Our poet's aphorisms were handed down through schools, but the echo is scarce on the whole (not necessarily because of the exchange of letters with Paulinus). In the early Renaissance<sup>2</sup> interest started to increase with Benzo and Petrarch. Boccaccio possessed a complete corpus of Ausonius. Montaigne read the poet 'because he came from Bordeaux'. Erasmus liked to quote him in his Adagiorum Collectanea, J. C. Scaliger in his Poetics; the poets of the Pléiade—Ronsard, DuBellay and Baïf—were familiar with him. The works of C. Celtis and M. Opitz prove that he was well-known also in Germany. Granted, as a writer of epigrams he stands in the shadow of Martial and the Greek Anthology; nevertheless, B. Gracián (d. 1658), a mainstay of the Conceptismo, extolled the brilliance of Ausonius. To Pope (d. 1744) and Richardson (d. 1761) our author was not an unknown. He also attracted Lessing's (d. 1781) attention; Goethe was intrigued by the Tenth Epigram; in 1812, he asked Knebel for a translation and J. W. Döbereiner for information concerning the identity of the poison mentioned in the text<sup>1</sup> (he read Ausonius, therefore, not primarily out of poetic interest). Herder (d. 1803) was astonished at our poet's influence on posterity. Felix Dahn (d. 1912) portrayed him in his Bissula novel.

<sup>1</sup> Late Antiquity: J. L. CHARLET, L'influence d'Ausone sur la poésie de Prudence, Paris 1980; Middle Ages and modern times: R. WEISS, Ausonius in the Fourteenth Century, in: R. R. BOLGAR, ed., Classical Influences on European Culture A.D. 500–1500. Proceedings of an International Conference Held at King's College (1969), Cambridge 1971, 67–72; H. L. FELBER, S. PRETE, D. MAGNUS Ausonius, in: P. O. KRISTELLER, ed., Catalogus translationum et commentariorum, Mediaeval and Renaissance Latin Translations and Commentaries. Annotated Lists and Guides, vol. 4, Washington 1980, 193–222.

<sup>2</sup> HIGHER, Class. Trad. 188; on the following also W.-L. LIEBERMANN 1989, 306–308.

Editions: Bartholomaeus GIRARDINUS, Venetiis 1472. * K. SCHENKL, Berlin 1883 (MGH, AA 5, 2). * R. PEIPER, Leipzig 1886. * H. G. E. WHITE (TTr), 2 vols., London 1919–1921 (and later repr.) * S. PRETE, Leipzig 1978. * R. P. H. GREEN (TC), Oxford 1991 * Mosella: C. HOSIUS (TN), Marburg 3rd ed. 1926, repr. 1967. * C.-M. TERNES (TC), Paris 1972. * W. JOHN (TTrN), W. BINSFELD (revised), W. ABEL (bibl.), Berlin 1980. * B. K. WEIS (TTrC), Darmstadt 1989. * G. P. O'DALY (T), Cambridge (forthcoming). ** Concordance: L. J. BOLCHAZY, J. A. M. SWEENEY, M. G. ANTONETTI, Concordantia in Ausonium. With Indices to Proper Nouns and Greek Forms, Hildesheim 1982; see also Indices in editions. ** Bibl.: C.-M. TERNES, Ausone. Bibliographie objective et subjective, Bulletin des antiquités luxembourgeoises 14, 1983 (1984), 3–126.

F. BENEDETTI, La tecnica del vertere negli Epigrammi di Ausonio, Firenze 1980. * A. DELACHAUX, La latinité d'Ausone. Etude lexicographique et grammaticale, thèse Lausanne, Neuchâtel 1909. * F. DELLA CORTE, L'ordinamento degli Opuscula di Ausonio, RCCM 2, 1960, 21–29. * F. DELLA CORTE, I Fasti di Ausonio, in: Studi di storiografia antica in memoria di L. FERRERO, Torino 1971, 203–208. * F. DELLA CORTE, I Caesares di Ausonio e Mario Massimo, in: Atti del Convegno Gli storiografi latini tramandati in frammenti (Urbino 1974) = StudUrb 49, 1, 1975, 483–491. * F. DELLA CORTE, Bissula, RomBarb 2, 1977, 17–25. * J. FONTAINE, Etudes sur la poésie latine tardive d'Ausone à Prudence, Paris 1980. * W. FAUTH, Cupido cruciatur, GB 2, 1974, 39–60. * H. FUCHS, Textgestaltungen in der Mosella des Ausonius, MH 32, 1975, 173–182. * M. K. HOPKINS, Social Mobility in the Later Roman Empire. The Evidence of Ausonius, CQ 11, 1961, 239–249. * C. HOSIUS, Die literarische Stellung von Ausons Mosellied, Philologus 81, 1926, 192–201. * E. J. KENNEY, The Mosella of Ausonius, G&R 31, 1984, 190–202. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, Aufbau und Struktur der Mosella des Ausonius, RhM

<sup>1</sup> GRUMACH 398–400.

106, 1963, 80–95. * P. DE LABRIOLLE, Ausonius, RLAC 1, 1950, 1020–1023. * W. D. LEBEK, Das Versepithaph Syll. Eln. 2 (ZPE 63, 1986, 83–100) und Ausonius, besonders Epitaphia heroum 35, ZPE 69, 1987, 101–105. * W.-L. LIEBERMANN, D. Magnus Ausonius, in: HLL 5, München 1989, 268–308. * J. MARTIN, Textes chrétiens d'Ausone, BAGB 4, 1972, 503–512. * F. MARX, Ausonius' Lied von der Mosel, RhM 80, 1931, 368–392. * F. MARX, Ausonius, RE 2, 2, 1896, 2562–2580. * E. K. RAND, Ausonius. The First French Poet, PCA 24, 1927, 28–41. * M. D. REEVE, Some Manuscripts of Ausonius, Prometheus 3, 1977, 112–120. * M. ROBERTS, The Mosella of Ausonius. An Interpretation, TAPhA 114, 1984, 343–353. * E. SÁNCHEZ SALOR, Hacia una poética de Ausonio, Habis 7, 1976, 159–186. * E. G. SCHMIDT, Bemerkungen zu den Gedichten des Ausonius, StudClas 3, 1961, 413–420. * H. SIVAN, Ausonius of Bordeaux. Genesis of a Gallic Aristocracy, London 1993. * H. SZELEST, Die Sammlung Ordo urbium nobilium des Ausonius und ihre literarische Tradition, Eos 61, 1973, 109–122. * H. SZELEST, Valete manes inclitorum rhetorum. Ausonius' Commemoratio professorum Burdigalensium, Eos 63, 1975, 75–87. * H. SZELEST, Ausonius und Suetonius, ZAnt 26, 1976, 433–442. * H. SZELEST, Die Spottepigramme des Ausonius, Eos 64, 1976, 33–42. * H. SZELEST, Die Mosella des Ausonius und ihre literarische Tradition, Eos 75, 1987, 95–105. * C.-M. TERNES, Paysage réel et coulisse idyllique dans la Mosella d'Ausone, REL 48, 1970, 376–397. * Id., Etudes ausoniennes, 2 vols., Luxembourg 1980; 1983.

AVIANUS

Avianus (or -ius, not Avienus) probably did not live during the 2nd century but at the beginning of the 5th. He dedicated his fables written in elegiac couplets to a certain Theodosius (perhaps Macrobius). His identity with the aristocrat Avienus in Macrobius' Saturnalia (1. 4) is uncertain.

The authenticity of several of the 42 fables has been doubted (23; 35; 38); also of dubious origin are many promythia and epimythia, which are missing in some manuscripts. Today, however, most consider them authentic. The titles, which have been handed down only in some codices and in varying form, did not come from Avianus.

Thirty-one of the fables bear a striking resemblance to those of the Greek verse fabler Babrius. From the Preface scholars concluded that Avianus had before him a prose paraphrase of Babrius' fables (probably by Titianus, the 'Aesopian trimeters', cf. Auson. epist. 16);<sup>1</sup> others, however, hold the opinion that the poet used Babrius directly. Phaedrus' influence, on the other hand, seems only slight. Five fables are not attested previously (22; 25; 28; 30; 38), four originate from the Collectio Augustana (9; 12; 26; 42), one from Ps.-Dositheus (27) and one from an unknown source (5).

<sup>1</sup> O. CRUSIUS, JKPh 139, 1889, 650.

As an author Avianus is inferior to Phaedrus. The elegiac couplet is not particularly appropriate for his subject. Each distich forms one complete thought; so the development of the narrative in most of the fables is antithetic.

An appraisal of Avianus' language and style hinges on textual criticism which lacks any definitive basis. Doubtless he considered himself an educated author and cared for literary polish; however, his language is interspersed with late Latin elements and his style is contorted.

The assessment of the rich manuscript tradition (160 manuscripts) is in a state of flux.<sup>1</sup>

Avianus, the only known ancient versifier of fables from the 9th up to the 16th century, was a school author in the Middle Ages and was repeatedly paraphrased. Alexander Neckam (d. 1227) composed a Novus Avianus.

Editions: STEINHÖWEL, in: Aesopus, Ulm (JOH. ZAINER) around 1476–1477 (27 fables). * Apologus Aviani civis Romani (complete), Coloniae 1494 (H. QUENTEL). * H. CANNEGIETER (TC), Amstelaedami 1731. * C. LACHMANN, Berolini 1845. * V. RABENLECHNER (Tr), Wien 1883. * R. ELLIS (TC), Oxford 1887. * J. W. DUFF and A. M. DUFF (TTr), in: Minor Latin Poets, London 1934, 2nd ed. 1935. * A. GUAGLIANONE, Torino 1958. * F. GAIDE (TTr), Paris 1980.

O. CRUSIUS, RE 2, 2, 1896, 2373–2378. * E. C. JONES, LAW, s.v. Avianus (with bibl.). * W. R. JONES, Avianus, Flavianus, Theodosius, and Macrobius, in: Classical Studies Presented to B. E. PERRY, Urbana, Illinois 1969, 203–209. * J. KÜPPERS, Die Fabeln Avians. Studien zu Darstellung und Erzählweise spätantiker Fabeldichtung, Bonn 1977. * C. W. MÜLLER, Ennius und Äsop. MH 33, 1976, 193–218.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. J. KÜPPERS, Gnomon 53, 1981, 242–243.

RUTILIUS NAMATIANS

Life and Dates

Rutilius Claudius Namatianus, a noble from Roman Gaul, was prefect of the city of Rome in 414;<sup>1</sup> his father had already held that office. He travelled from Rome to Gaul in late fall of 417<sup>2</sup> to inspect his properties which had been laid waste by the Goths.

His itinerary, written in elegiac couplets, was composed after his arrival in Gaul.

Survey of the Work

The beginning of the 1st book of Rutilius' work is missing; therefore, the title De reditu suo, which was taken from l. 1, is not authentic. The first 68 verses are all that remain of the 2nd book and they are followed by 38 lines of mutilated text.

The statement of the occasion of the journey includes a eulogy of native Romans (l. 1-34); the departure from the Eternal City contains a hymnic prayer to Roma for a safe journey (35-164). There follows his farewell to his friends (165-178), the last of whom leaves Rutilius at Ostia (179-216). The monotony of the sea voyage from the Portus Romae to the Portus Pisanus (217-644) is broken by sightseeing (e.g. sulphur springs l. 249-276; salt works l. 475-490; the monument to his father at Pisa l. 574-590) and visits to his friends (l. 465-474; 541-558).

After an introduction (2. 1-10) and excursuses on the geographical position and shape of Italy (17-40) and on the disastrous activities of Stilicho (41-60), the 2nd book breaks off with the arrival at Luna (61-68). The Fragments A and B recently discovered in a Bobiensis show that the journey continued to Gaul.

Sources, Models, and Genres

To be sure, Rutilius supplemented his own observations with those found in travel handbooks. As a skilled orator, he was well-versed in

<sup>1</sup> I. LANA 1961, 15-16, is of a different opinion.

<sup>2</sup> A different opinion in I. LANA 1961, 60, agreeing with F. VOLLMER 1941, 1251: 21st-22nd September 416. A basis for the dating is the reference to Rome's age (l. 135); on the season, lines 183; 201; 205-206; for an early date (A.D. 415): I. LANA and E. CASTORINA in A. BARTALUCCI (and others) 1975, 16 and 17; for 417 again V. TANDOI, ibid. 18.

Roman history. He knew Roman poetry and, applying his own sophisticated technique of imitation, he made use of his predecessors:<sup>1</sup> Virgil, Ovid, and especially texts of his specific genre, poetic itineraries like Horace's Iter Brundisinum (sat. 1. 5), Ovid's Tristia (e.g. 1. 10), Statius' Propempticon (silv. 3. 2), and the Mosella of Ausonius. He cites Homer directly. His work is an example of a successful attempt at mixing genres: one would have expected hexameters rather than elegiac couplets, but in that period the connection of certain meters with specific genres had loosened.

Literary Technique

Rutilius' work is not merely a documentary journal but a subsequent elaboration embellished with the rhetorical devices of imperial poetry. In the main, the work consists of excursuses, which are appended to the stations of the journey and contain etiologies, descriptions and moral commentary.

Language and Style

Language and style are pure and based on good models. The active use of the past participle is old and vulgar: decessis umbris (1. 313); quisque is substituted for quisquis (1. 276). The versification is cultivated, yet polysyllabic words are not avoided at the end of a verse. Meter contributes to rhetorical epigram: Rome's achievement is mirrored by antitheses (urbem fecisti quod prius orbis erat, 'you made one city of what had been the globe' 1. 66; excedis factis grandia fata tuis, 'by your deeds you exceed your great destiny' 1. 92) and paradoxes (profuit iniustis te dominante capi, 'it turned out prosperous for the unjust to be conquered under your rule' 1. 64).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

After the archaic fashion Rutilius attributed his fame not to his poetic expression but to his political accomplishments that glorified the people;

<sup>1</sup> W. SCHMID 1960, 877-887; A. BARTALUCCI 1965, 30-39; on genre: F. PASCHOU 1979.

Rome was to remember these deeds (1. 155–164).<sup>1</sup> In one of the recently discovered fragments (B 15–19) the author seems to hint that he intends to extol Constantius<sup>2</sup> to the best of his ability: a very old topos.

Ideas II

His praise of Constantius (fig. B) and his attack on Stilicho (2. 41–60) help us revise Claudian's overstatements. Although Rutilius is considered a good historical and geographical source, only a few passages reflect the factual reality of his epoch. We get, however, an authentic impression of the effusive politeness then common among friends and acquaintances.

The author is probably a pagan, although his remarks aimed at monks (1. 439–452; 517–526) and Jews (1. 381–398) are clearly stereotype and are also found in Christian authors.<sup>3</sup> His anti-Teutonic sentiments complete the picture of a somewhat narrow-minded representative of his class. The sight of Populonia's ruins (1. 401–414) evokes a melancholic contemplation of the transitoriness of cities that reflects the mood of that period. A personal touch is added when Rutilius speaks of his father.

His own idea of Rome could be viewed partly as an—unsatisfactory—rebuttal to Augustine's De civitate Dei.<sup>4</sup> Rutilius attaches great importance to the idea of a community under Roman law (1. 1–66). Although his idealized picture of Rome is in keeping with the views of the aristocratic party of the Symmachi and Nicomachi, it had little to do with the hard reality of the early 5th century. On the other hand, his affirmation of Rome's reascent potential is especially moving right after her sacking by Alarich; to be reborn, to emerge strengthened from distress is justly considered a constant of Roman history: ordo renascendi est crescere posse malis, 'your principle of regeneration is to be able to grow through destructions' (1. 140).

<sup>1</sup> 'Rutilius was a witty diplomat interested in literature; he was hardly willing to betray in his verse more of his inmost feelings than he was accustomed to show in his daily life' (F. VOLLMER 1914, 1251).

<sup>2</sup> Consul 414; 417; 420; later Constantius III.

<sup>3</sup> H. SCHENKL, Ein spätrömischer Dichter und sein Glaubensbekenntnis, RhM 66, 1911, 393–416; E. DOBLHOFER considers Rutilius a pagan (with a detailed discussion) in his edition, 1, 1972, 27–33.

<sup>4</sup> COURCELLE, Histoire, 3rd ed. 1964, 104–105, A. CAMERON 1967.

Transmission

A mutilated manuscript found in Bobbio in 1493 was later lost again. Sannazarius (d. 1530) and two other scribes used a lost intermediary source to produce the codex Vindobonensis Lat. 277 (end of 15th or early 16th c.), fol. 84 r.–93 v. This and the Editio princeps of John Bapt. Pius, Bologna, 1520, go back to one same copy; however, the Editio already contains interpolations. The Romanus,<sup>1</sup> 16th century, which originated from another copy, is inferior to the Vindobonensis. Thirty-eight additional lines—unfortunately fragmentary—were found recently on an old piece of parchment (7th or 8th cent.) used to repair a Bobiensis (Taurinensis F IV 25), which survives only in fragments.<sup>2</sup>

Influence

Subsequent generations have paid little attention to Rutilius; among classicists, however, his subject matter has secured for him a great reputation not entirely in proportion with his literary merits.

Editions: Io. Bapt. PIUS, Bononiae 1520. * W. ZUMPT (TN), Berlin 1840. * Itasius Lemniacus = A. VON REUMONT (TrC), Berlin 1872. * J. VESSEREAU (TTr, complete index, assessment), Paris 1904. * C. H. KEENE, G. F. SAVAGE (TC), London 1907. * J. VESSEREAU, F. PRÉCHAC (TTrN), Paris 1933, 2nd ed. 1961. * G. HEIDRICH (T), Progr. Wien 1911, corrected 2nd ed. 1915 (C announced ibid., probably never published). * J. W. and A. M. DUFF, in: Minor Latin Poets (TTrN), London 2nd ed. 1935, 751–829. * P. VAN DE WOESTIJNE (T, word index), Antwerpen 1936. * R. HELM (TC), Heidelberg 1933. * E. MERONE (TC), Napoli 1955. * E. CASTORINA (TTrC), Firenze 1967. * E. DOBLHOFER (TTrC, word index), 2 vols., Heidelberg 1972–1977. * A. MAZZOLAI (TrC), Grosseto 1990–1991. * A. FO (TTrC), Torino 1992. * G. P. O'DALY (T), Cambridge (forthcoming). * 2, 31–60: O. SCHISSEL VON FLESCHENBERG (C), Leipzig 1923. * The new fragments: M. FERRARI, IMU 16, 1973, 5–30. * P. FRASSINETTI (TTr), I nuovi frammenti di Rutilio Namaziano, SRIL 3, 1980, 51–58. ** Indices: Complete in the editions by J. VESSEREAU 1904; P. VAN DE WOESTIJNE; E. DOBLHOFER. ** Bibl.: A. I. VENTURA, Studi recenti su Rutilio Namaziano e note al suo classicismo, A&R 16, 1971, 83–102.

L. ALFONSI, Significato politico e valore poetico nel De reditu suo di Rutilio Namaziano, StudRom 3, 1955, 125–139. * A. BARTALUCCI, E. CASTORINA, <sup>1</sup> C. HOSIUS, Die Textgeschichte des Rutilius, RhM 51, 1896, 197–210.

<sup>2</sup> M. FERRARI 1973; cf. also A. BARTALUCCI (and others) 1975; P. FRASSINETTI 1980, s. his edition.

E. CECCHINI, I. LANA, V. TANDOI, Il nuovo Rutilio Namaziano. Interventi, Maia 27, 1975, 3–26. * A. BARTALUCCI, Note rutiliane, SCO 14, 1965, 30–39. * A. CAMERON, Rutilius Namatianus, St. Augustine, and the Date of the De reditu, JRS 57, 1967, 31–39. * E. CECCHINI, Per il nuovo Rutilio Namaziano, RFIC 102, 1974, 401–404. * J. CIRINO, L'idea di Roma negli scrittori latini e particolarmente in Rutilio Namaziano, Napoli 1933. * F. CORSARO, Studi Rutiliani, Bologna 1981. * COURCELLE, Histoire 53–54; 104–107 etc. * G. D'ANNA, Recenti scoperte di testi di poesia latina, C&S 19, 1980, no. 75, 72–80. * F. DELLA CORTE, Rutilio Namaziano ad Albingaunum, RomBarb 5, 1980, 89–103. * F. DELLA CORTE, La ricostruzione di Albingaunum (414–417 d.C.), RSL 50, 1984, 18–25. * F. DELLA CORTE, Il frammento A' del De reditu di Rutilio Namaziano (1987), in: F.D.C., Opuscula 11, Genova 1988, 209–213. * M. FERRARI, Nuove scoperte di testi classici, A&R 18, 1973, 228–229. * M. FERRARI, Spigolature bobbiesi, IMU 16, 1973, 1–41. * A. FO, Ritorno a Claudio Rutilio Namaziano, MD 22, 1989, 49–70. * D. FRYE, Is Cl. Postumus Dardanus the Lepidus of De reditu suo l. 307?, Hermes 121, 1993, 382–383. * H. FUCHS, Zur Verherrlichung Roms und der Römer in dem Gedicht des Rutilius Namatianus, BZG 42 (= FS Stachelin), 1943, 37–58. * M. FUHRMANN, Die Romidee der Spätantike, HZ 207, 1968, 529–561. * H. A. GÄRTNER, Rome et les Barbares dans la poésie latine au temps d'Augustin. Rutilius Namatianus et Prudence, Ktema 9, 1984, 113–121. * A. GIANNOTTI, La metrica di Rutilio Namaziano, Udine 1940. * U. KNOCH, Ein Sinnbild römischer Selbstauffassung, in: U.K., Vom Selbstverständnis der Römer, Heidelberg 1962, 125–143. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, Reiseerlebnisse des Rutilius Namatianus. Exegetische Beiträge, Gymnasium 86, 1979, 541–556. * N. LAMBOGLIA, Albenga e i nuovi frammenti di Rutilio Namaziano, RIL 31–33, 1976–1978, 32–88. * I. LANA, Rutilio Namaziano, Torino 1961. * I. LANA, Originalità e significato dell'inno a Roma di Rutilio Namaziano. La coscienza religiosa del letterato pagano, Pubbl. del Dip. di archeol., filol. class. e loro tradizioni dell'Università di Genova 106, Genova 1987, 101–123. * F. PASCHOU, Roma aeterna. Etudes sur le patriotisme romain dans l'Occident latin à l'époque des invasions, Rome 1967. * F. PASCHOU, Une relecture poétique de Rutilius Namatianus, MH 35, 1978, 319–328. * F. PASCHOU, A quel genre littéraire le poème de Rutilius Namatianus appartient-il?, REL 57, 1979, 315–322. * M. ROBERTS, The treatment of Narrative in late Antique Literature. Ammianus Marcellinus (16. 10), Rutilius Namatianus and Paulinus of Pella, Philologus 132, 1988, 181–195. * W. SCHMID, 'Roma nascens' in Rutilio Namaziano, in: Studi in onore di L. Castiglioni, 2, Firenze 1960, 877–887. * K. F. STROHEKER, Der senatorische Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948, 193–194. * V. TANDOI, Il nuovo Rutilio Namaziano, Maia 27, 1975, 3–26. * F. VOLLMER, Rutilius, RE 1 A 1, 1914, 1249–1254.

CLAUDIAN

Life and Dates

Like the pioneers of Roman poetry, its last great representative, too, was a man whose mother language was not Latin. At his native city of Alexandria, which never lacked distinguished grammarians (who were often poets at the same time), Claudius Claudianus received a thorough, bilingual<sup>1</sup> education and distinguished himself early by writing a Greek Gigantomachy, Epigrams,<sup>2</sup> and other works. It was not unusual at that time for an Egyptian-born author to leave his homeland in the hope of making contact with influential personalities elsewhere. In Rome he made his appearance before the public for the first time with a Latin poem, the Panegyric on the Consulship of Probinus and Olybrius (January 1st, 395). His talent was therefore discovered by senators;<sup>3</sup> he adopted their mentality as his own. His career at court fell between 395 and 400; he became vir clarissimus, tribunus, and notarius;<sup>4</sup> he even belonged to the privy council of Stilicho, and was awarded (between 400 and 402) poscente senatu his own likeness and place of honor in the Forum of Trajan.<sup>5</sup> Had the senatorial aristocracy understood what he had done for late Rome's self-identity—or was it only Stilicho who had honored him? Claudian's marriage and his honeymoon in Libya occurred during the last phase of his life. He was no longer living after 404; otherwise he would have sung the praises of Stilicho's second consulship (405) and his victory over Radagais (406).

Before the fall of Stilicho (408), a collection of poems dedicated to him was undertaken; the carmina minora likewise were not collected and published by Claudian himself. Attempting to date some of the major works scholars find it difficult to reconcile<sup>6</sup> a historian's <sup>1</sup> On his biography: A. CAMERON 1974, especially 1–29; in Egypt, Latin versification was also taught (ibid. 21).

<sup>2</sup> By virtue of the similarity of their motifs the Greek epigrams A.P. 9. 753 and 754 are genuine; the following are attributed to a later Claudianus: A.P. 1. 19; 9. 139 and, on grounds of meter, 1. 20; on the interpretation of the epigrams: P. LAURENS 1986.

<sup>3</sup> Other patrons were a certain Hadrianus (min. 21–22), Aeternalis (min. 3), and Florentinus (rapt.).

<sup>4</sup> CIL 6, 1710.

<sup>5</sup> Get. praef. 7–14; CIL 6, 1710; DESSAU 2949.

<sup>6</sup> Paneg. Prob. et Olyb. (to January, 395), rapt. 1 (395–397: according to T. BIRT, assumption of successive origin<sup>1</sup> with a philologist's adherence to unity of conception.<sup>2</sup>

Survey of Works<sup>3</sup>

Panegyricus dictus Probino et Olybrio: After the invocation to the sun god, there follows a eulogy of ancestors, especially of the father of both youthful Anicii. The goddess Roma—presented to the reader in graphic detail—recommends the youths to the Emperor Theodosius, mother Proba dresses them in the robes of office, the god of the River Tiber expresses his pride in them, and the poet gives his blessing for the new year.

In Rufinum 1: Claudian's earlier doubts about Providence are put to rest with the death of Rufinus. Enraged by the supremacy of Justice (Iustitia), Allecto convenes a hellish council of the Furies. Megaera then sends her special foster son, Rufinus the monster, to Byzantium. Stilicho is set over against the greedy and cruel Rufinus as a saving ray of light. Ordered by Megaera to leave the earth again, Iustitia prophesies Rufinus' death and a happy age under Honorius.

In Rufinum 2: Rufinus, who keeps the eastern Emperor Arcadius at his beck and call, orders Stilicho—who is avoiding a battle with Alaric—to send the eastern Roman troops back to Constantinople. On their return the troops cut Rufinus down and the Judge of the Dead consigns him to the deepest regions of the underworld.

Panegyricus dictus Honorio Augusto tertium consuli: Claudian conveys the congratulations of the senate to Milan on the occasion of the eleven-year-old Honorius' accession to the consulship (396). From his father, Honorius received the kind of military training that his grandfather had undergone. Honorius could participate in the war against Arbogast only in spirit, but it is he who is to be thanked for the propitious auspices. Dying, Theodosius entrusted both of his sons to the care of Stilicho; they would reign in glory.

Panegyricus dictus Honorio Augusto quartum consuli: Claudian praises Honorius' grandfather, his father, his victories over insurgents, his clemency and liberality. The teachings of Theodosius take up the bulk of the work: Claudian

---

s. his edition; A. CAMERON 1970, 452–466, dates rapt. after Ruf. and assumes that the death of the author prevented its completion), the dates of books 2 and 3 are disputed; III Hon. (for January, 396); in Ruf. (praef. 2, 397; the age of the 1st book is disputed); IV Hon. (for January, 398); epithalam. (beginning of 398); Gild. (398); Manl. Theod. (for January, 399); in Eutrop. (399), cons. Stil. (beginning of 400). Get. (402), VI Hon. (for January, 404). The Laus Serenae (min. 30) and the Latin Gigantomachy (min. 53; dated late by A. CAMERON 1970, 467–473) remained unfinished.

<sup>1</sup> A. CAMERON 1970; H. FUNKE 1985.

<sup>2</sup> S. DÖPP 1980.

<sup>3</sup> On the prefaces, s. Ideas I.

creates a prince's manual. An exhortation to continue his studies follows; examples out of Roman history are to guide him. At the conclusion of the work, Stilicho and Honorius receive their accolades.

Epithalamium dictum Honorio Augusto et Mariae and Fescennina: Amor learns of Honorius' love for Maria. He flies to Cyprus, to his mother Venus, whose abode is described. No less important is the immediately following passage: the description of the sea voyage of Venus to the Ligurian coast. The goddess surprises the bride as she is reading the classics and adorns her. A chorus of soldiers praises the bride's father, Stilicho.<sup>1</sup>

De bello Gildonico: The strong man of the East, Eutropius, has Stilicho declared an enemy of the state (397) and induces the Moor Gildo to cut off the supply of grain to Rome. His brother Mascezel defeats him in the spring of 398 by order of Stilicho. It is not by accident that a 2nd book is missing; it would have been unseemly after the murder of Mascezel, which Stilicho himself witnessed.

Roma complains to Jupiter about the famine, Africa in turn about Gildo's avarice and debauchery; the father of the gods then prophesies the victory of Honorius and Rome's dominion over Africa. In two parallel dreams Arcadius is ordered by his father, Theodosius, to acquiesce to his brother, and Honorius is urged on to battle by his grandfather, the conqueror of Mauretania. After a conversation with Stilicho, who recommends that Mascezel be sent, Honorius delivers a fiery speech to the warriors as they are about to march off.

Panegyricus dictus Mallio Theodoro consuli: After a period of leisure dedicated to the study of philosophy, Theodorus, who had already held high offices in the past, is now requested by Iustitia to serve her. He accepts although he must give up his beloved life in the country. The following portrayal of Mallius' character corrects the distorted image given by carm. min. 21. The hopeful era should be opened by festive games according to the Muse Urania in her speech.

In Eutropium 1: The most influential politician of the Roman East, the eunuch Eutropius, holds the consulship in 399. As a slave he had quite often changed masters. The fact that everybody hated him allows him to do whatever he pleases; Abundantius, who had promoted him at court, becomes his first victim. He is greedy and ambitious. Instead of leaving the war to men, Eutropius declares that he has conquered the Goths and now even demands the office of consul. Thereupon a straight man and a buffoon offer their commentaries. The goddess Roma orders Honorius and Stilicho to get rid of the disgraceful creature.

In Eutropium 2: The development has proceeded: Monuments to Eutropius are set up, and he leads a festive procession of effeminate followers to Ancyra, the city of the mother of the gods. In the face of Eutropius' mollycoddling, <sup>1</sup> On the Fescennina, s. Language and Style.

Mars asks Bellona to incite the Goths to war. Eutropius first adopts and ostrich-like policy of sticking his head in the sand but later, in a satirical scene, summons the dissipated members of his council of war. In addition to the Goths, the Parthians now threaten to take to the field; at last Eutropius is overthrown in August and exiled to Cyprus. Aurora then asks Stilicho to protect the Eastern Empire, too.<sup>1</sup>

De consulatu Stilichonis 1: The Vandal Stilicho becomes consul in 400. We read of his youth and deeds of war, including his mission of peace in the area of the Rhine and the war against Gildo, which is now described without mention of Mascezel.

De consulatu Stilichonis 2: The 2nd book, an important one, treats the personified virtues of Stilicho: clemency above all, fidelity and a sense of justice. At the request of the provinces Roma asks Stilicho to take over the consulship and she presents him with the staff of ivory and a robe, which had been woven by divine hands and pictures events in the lives of his descendants. For the future the Sun brings golden years and favorable stars out of the Cave of Eternity.

De consulatu Stilichonis 3: Stilicho is in Rome, which is extolled, and organizes a hunt as a festive performance. Diana and her nymphs make an expedition abroad to gather wild animals from all over the world for the feast. Her journey from Libya to Rome is reminiscent of Bacchus'. Thus, nature is incorporated into 'universal poetry'; just as time had been in the 2nd book, now limits of space have been transcended.

De bello Getico: Alaric sacked Aquileia in 401. Stilicho returns to Italy from Rhaetia, where he restored order, and during Easter, 402, successfully engages the Visigoths in battle near Pollentia; Alaric must promise to return to Illyricum. The admonitory speech of an old Goth and Alaric's defiant response are noteworthy. At the end Stilicho's success is compared with Marius' victory over the Cimbri.

Panegyricus dictus Honorio Augusto sextum consuli: At Roma's invitation, Honorius comes as emperor and consul to the festive games held in the Eternal City in 404. After another defeat—this time near Verona—Alaric declares in a memorable speech that Italy is lost for him. Prompted by Roma, Honorius honors the achievements of Stilicho.

De raptu Proserpinae 1: Pluto complains before the Council of the Underworld that he has no spouse. On the advice of Lachesis he sends Mercury to Jupiter; the latter decrees that Proserpina should marry Pluto. On Jupiter's orders Venus, accompanied by Diana and Minerva, hurries to Sicily, where she finds Proserpina busy at her loom. For her absent mother she is weaving a gift, a piece of fabric on which the world is depicted.

---

<sup>1</sup> In the body of the 2nd book banishment is considered an insufficient punishment; the introduction—probably written later—to the 2nd book is somewhat milder.

De raptu Proserpinae 2: The next morning the goddesses venture into the open countryside to pick flowers, which grew beautifully and abundantly around Henna. Suddenly the abductor Pluto appears; Minerva and Diana upbraid him to no avail. He consoles his bride and brings her to his realm, where she is received in splendor.

De raptu Proserpinae 3: Before the assembly of the gods Jupiter explains that under his reign—unlike Saturn's—necessity would become the mother of invention for human kind. Responding to Mother Nature's objection that there was a dearth of fertility and civilization, Jupiter provides for the spread of agriculture by having Ceres wander about the earth in search of her daughter. No one was to betray to her the whereabouts of Proserpina. In desperation Ceres kindles two huge torches atop Aetna and starts out on her way. The work is incomplete.

The Minor Poems vary considerably: several of the epigrams we read share common themes and follow one another accordingly (e.g. 33–39). Among the letters the one addressed to Serena (30) is enlightening historically. In the case of a certain Hadrian, who is first insulted in an epigram and then gets an apology, epigram and epistle belong together (min. 20–21). We also find descriptions of places (the spring Aponus 26), of objects (the magnet: min. 29), unusual or legendary animals (the porcupine 9, the phoenix 27, the stingray 49), and persons (thus min. 20 on the elderly man who never left his hometown) and finally poetry for the occasion like the graceful Epithalamium for Palladius and Celerina (25).

Claudian's Latin Gigantomachy, which has come down to us in incomplete form, is not a translation of its likewise fragmentary Greek counterpart. On the Greek Epigrams, see p. 1337, note 2, and p. 1347.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The Carmina maiora fuse epic and panegyric traditions in a new way. The genre is marked by the requirements of the milieu for which Claudian wrote but also discloses the personal characteristics of his talent (s. Literary Technique).

Latin panegyric mostly appeared in prose. As a Greek, Claudian was at home in Greek panegyric verse. Rudiments of the genre are found in Theognis and in choral lyric, after which Horace patterned some of his works; Theocritus' praise of a sovereign is a fully developed model, which made its way into the Latin bucolic poetry of his successors as well as into the poetry of Herodas and Callimachus, whose Lock of Berenice was translated by Catullus. As author of an historical epic who praised his patrons, Ennius had patterned his work in the image of Hellenistic historical epic, thus initiating a tradition in Rome; Claudian continued that tradition.

Literary poetry, which had meanwhile become highly artificial, nevertheless received a subliterary impulse. In the imperial age we know of Greek verse panegyric only from fragments; a preserved Latin specimen is the Panegyricus Messallae. This widespread ephemeral type, to which Statius gave literary stature in the short form (e.g. silv. 2. 5), gained even greater compass through Claudian's introduction of epic elements. Thus, Claudian's Panegyrici enriched Latin poetry with one more genre.

Other Carmina maior have an historic (De bello Getico, De bello Pollentino) or mythological character (De raptu Proserpinae, probably after a 2nd Century Alexandrian source). The panegyric quality is as traceable in the historic epics as it is in the Carmina minora—here the Praise of Serena (min. 30) comes to mind immediately.

The invectives have Greek and Roman roots. Rhetorical theory, poetic and folkloric traditions as well as a comparison of parallel texts shed light on the essence of the genre: In Eutropium could be read in conjunction with the deprecativ speech of Johannes Chrysostomus against Eutropius and the propagandistic work of Synesius for Eutropius' successor Aurelianus (De regno). The personification of Rome had been used in epic tradition (Lucan, Silius Italicus), and the 3rd relatio of Symmachus had contained a speech of Roma.

The poetic tradition is ubiquitous. Reminiscences of Virgil are a recurrent phenomenon; Ovid's allegorical topography,<sup>1</sup> his character studies in the form of speeches and his graphic vividness make him an ancestor of Claudian; Statius had already completed the groundwork for him by elevating poems written for the occasion to the level of literary works. The descriptive carmina minora (e.g. 2; 4; 17; 26) are reminiscent of Statius' 'descriptive poems'. The extent to which Claudian was inspired by plastic and graphic art remains to be researched.<sup>2</sup> The epigrams toy with Greek tradition; a typical feature is Claudian's unfolding one theme in a series of epigrams (min. 7 a, b; 15-16; 33-39; 43-44). Claudian's emulation of his models is free, original, and ingenious.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. the abodes of Fame, Envy, and Sleep.

<sup>2</sup> A beginning: F.-F. SCHWARZ, Nigra maiestas. Bryaxis—Sarapis—Claudian, in: Classica et Provincialia, FS E. DIEZ, Graz 1978, 189-210.

Literary Technique

Claudian's art rests on his ability to single out individual images and to convey them to the reader with a remarkable power of visual suggestion; by doing so, Claudian accomplishes a development which had been ongoing in Roman epic since Virgil, Ovid and the epic poets of the Silver Age.<sup>1</sup> As a result of this process, the mechanisms of the action itself were reduced to their essentials. Self-contained though they are, these images are not entirely isolated from one another. Keywords, which function like leitmotifs, bind them and so contribute to the unity of the work. Thorough interpretation has revealed the inner continuity of Claudian's texts.<sup>2</sup> Wherever myth is treated at length, it displays the emotional and intellectual side of the action. In short form myths serve as exempla or enhance a contrast. Numerous names of women from mythology adorn the praise of Serena (min. 30).

Typical of the individual development are the speeches, which were planned as character studies. In other cases as well, the speakers were selected purposely: if Alaric himself, for example, declares that Italy is lost for him, he is the best authority on his own lack of success (VI cons. Hon. 274–329). Similarly, Father Theodosius is an appropriate mouthpiece for a prince's manual.

Descriptions contribute to the poetic effect, brought to life, among other devices, by narrative movement and the dynamics of color—gold, purple, white, and green (e.g. min. 30. 89–93). Another typical feature is the portrayal of allegorical personae—as in the strife between Megaera and Iustitia (Ruf. 1. 354–387). Allegorical descriptions of places, for example the noteworthy home of Venus, demonstrate that rhetorical training, too, is capable of unleashing poetic ingenuity. The 2nd book of the De consulatu Stilichonis, combines different techniques of allegorical invention in concentrated form.

Another novelty is Claudian's regular use of poetic prefaces—one recalls his contemporary Prudentius who, however, had other applications in mind for them.<sup>3</sup> The eagle simile in III cons. Hon. praef. reveals a poet who is artistically mature and self-assured.

<sup>1</sup> F. MEHMEI, Valerius Flaccus, diss. Hamburg 1934; F. MEHMEI, Virgil und Apollonius Rhodius, Hamburg 1940

<sup>2</sup> Cf. M. BALZERT 1974; on the In Rufinum: S. KOSTER 1980, 298–314.

<sup>3</sup> R. HERZOG, Die allegorische Dichtkunst des Prudentius, München 1966, 127–135 (on the difference between panegyric and religious allegory).

Rhetorical theory—as known to us mainly from Menander of Laodicea (3rd century)<sup>1</sup>—also helped to form Claudian's art; although the structure of the encomiastic poems should not be reduced schematically to academic precepts,<sup>2</sup> for the poet's talent excels in giving new life to traditional modes or in deviating from them.<sup>3</sup> A clever example is his return to the preface's point of departure towards the end of the panegyric on the fourth consulate of Honorius. Composed albeit after the pattern of eulogy, the encomiastic poem as a literary work of art is still an innovation of Claudian in Latin literature.<sup>4</sup>

Language and Style

Claudian's style and metrical art are elegant, and he bears comparison with the best poets of the 1st century A.D. Skilful antitheses arise as if of themselves. On Roman ways we read: virtute decet, non sanguine niti, 'one should rely on virtue, not on blood' (IV cons. Hon. 220). The phoenix is an example of a stylistically rich theme: here is a bird that dies joyfully because it yearns to be born (min. 27. 58); only age itself dies, but the phoenix remains (103). It is 'its own heir' (101), its act of dying a 'fecund death' (25). The hexameter is often cut down to the smallest units (Ruf. 1. 300): eruit: instauras; accendit proelia: vincis.

The most frequently occurring meters are hexameter and elegiac couplet; Claudian prefers the latter for his epigrams, minor works, and prefaces to the longer poems. There are, however, short hexametric pieces, too. The Fescennina are metrically diverse. The first piece is stichic in alcaic hendecasyllables; the second is made up of stimulating five-line strophes; three anacreontics, one choriambic dimeter and a pherecratean. The third number is anapaestic, the fourth asclepiadean.

<sup>1</sup> RhetGr 3, 329–446.

<sup>2</sup> Preface, origins, birth, youth, deeds in war and in peace (according to cardinal virtues), comparison (mostly missing), epilogue.

<sup>3</sup> S. DÖPP 1980.

<sup>4</sup> H. SZELEST 1977.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Claudian knows that he is a born poet; he is unable to express verba communia, particularly when his patron (meus Apollo) inspires him (min. 3). However, we should not think of him as a ready improviser; comments like min. 25. 1 are specific of situation and genre. Claudian documents his attitude toward writing poetry especially in the prefaces.

Even in his youth he was drawn to great themes. We recall the Greek Gigantomachy: at the beginning (1–15) he compares his tackling with so lofty a theme to a voyage on the high seas. He speaks elsewhere, too, of feeling intimidated by the magnitude of his subject and by the high station of his audience (e.g. Manl. Theod. praef.). On the other hand, he imparts to the reader the gradual increase of his own confidence: there is the image of the seaman, who ventures ever further (rapt. 1 praef.), and there is the simile of the young eagles, who, as a rite of passage, have to look squarely into the face of the sun (III cons. Hon. praef.). In the preface to the Bellum Geticum we learn that the poet has found recognition and enjoys a high reputation. As a result, he feels that he is under the additional pressure of great expectations. Claudian confronts his critics, whom he wittily masks as centaurs and fawns (3), in the foreword to the Epithalamium for Honorius and Maria.

In De raptu Proserpinae 2 praef. Florentinus appears as a new Hercules and Claudian as a new Orpheus. Claudian labels the interplay between mythical and historical subjects appropriately as a relationship between dream and reality (VI cons. Hon. praef.). He dreamt that he had composed a Gigantomachy and laid it before the feet of Jupiter; now he is to extol the emperor's consulship. As Ovid had done long before him—and as any Roman would—he saw something greater than myth in the real Princeps (who in fact did embody the highest earthly power). The dream motif had been closely connected with political themes since Cicero's Somnium.

In the preface to the 3rd book, De consulatu Stilichonis, Claudian compares his relationship to Stilicho with that of Ennius to Scipio. The very fact of writing under orders turns out to be a blessing (cons. Stil. 3 praef. 24): the general values the company of the Muses as witnesses (5) and takes good care of the poet, allowing him to see Rome again after the victory and granting him the laurel wreath for the campaign (20). Thus Stilicho is regarded as a commander favored by the Muses like Scipio or Augustus. The historical events (which were undoubtedly of greater consequence than those of the time of Statius, for example) serve as an inspiration for Claudian; they are carmine digna (6), and the artistry of their commemorator is appraised accordingly. Claudian views the situation as an auspicious hour of history and his poetry has made it so.

Ideas II

Claudian obviously idealizes his hero Stilicho and vilifies his opponents. He undoubtedly distorts the truth; it is often difficult to determine just how biased his historical accounts are.<sup>1</sup> The meaning of the term 'propaganda' is not unequivocal: good propaganda makes use of facts (albeit selectively); therefore, a propagandist is not always a liar. Moreover, mere propagandists, as a rule, would not have an impact on posterity comparable to Claudian's. The harmonious structure and the elaborate style of the texts give further evidence that these might be more than just ephemeral pamphlets.<sup>2</sup> Claudian's poetic design goes far beyond mere topicality.

It is also evident that in Claudian the gods of the theologia fabulosa gain a graphic and even sculptural quality seldom achieved in Roman poetry. Should we then conclude that he was a devout pagan? Surely the allegories, which no one takes literally, are depicted just as vividly. Had not myth become literature since Ovid at the latest and was not its use a question of style rather than faith? One poem is evidence that Claudian—at least nominally—must have been a Christian (min. 32);<sup>3</sup> conversely, the prayer to Victoria (Stil. 3. 205–216) is a piece of patriotic rhetoric and no proof of pagan convictions. Given the widespread religious indifference at that time, the question is perhaps not as important for our understanding of the poems as is sometimes assumed. For us Claudian is one of the last representatives of classical Roman literature.

He is proud of Rome's magnificent past.<sup>4</sup> As for the Rome of the present, he insists on its special obligation to protect the civilized

<sup>1</sup> Revealing, knowledgeable, and stimulating: A. CAMERON 1970; for a more moderate view, e.g. C. GNILKA, Gnomon 49, 1977, 26–51.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. S. DÖPP 1980 against A. CAMERON 1970.

<sup>3</sup> On this: J. L. SEBESTA 1980; J. VANDERSPOEL, Claudian, Christ and the Cult of Saints, CQ n.s. 36, 1986, 244–255.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. e.g. the famous praise of Rome cons. Stil. 3. 130–181.

world from its domestic and foreign enemies.<sup>1</sup> Like Ennius,<sup>2</sup> who is also comparable to him in other ways, he mirrors the ideas of his contemporaries in his poems. Naturally he tries to influence his readers as well, and we may believe that he wants the Roman Empire to survive and considers Stilicho the man destined to save it. Claudian thinks of himself as a mouthpiece for Rome and Roman attitudes.

The serious exhortation to the sovereign (IV Hon. 214–352) is based on the ideal of an ethical ruler, which extends far beyond momentary propagandistic considerations.<sup>3</sup> Honorius should not simply appear as the ruler who governs the empire worthily in the spirit of his father; more importantly, the poet holds a mirror up to the emperor and society of his time and offers analogies between the great world of the universe and the little world of man. Claudian succeeds as a poet again in unifying Greek and Roman culture as it is viewed by his public, the educated senatorial aristocracy.

Transmission

We have approximately 300 manuscripts of Claudian. In the oldest ones the works have been transmitted in independent groups: The political poems, excluding the poem on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius, were—perhaps at the request of Stilicho himself—brought together early on as a collection. Together with the minor poems collected in the same manner, this compilation came down to us from the early Middle Ages as the so-called Claudianus maior.<sup>4</sup> Its main representatives are the Bruxellensis 5381 (Gemblacensis, 11th century), the Vaticanus 2809 (12th century), and the Parisinus 18 552 (12th–13th century).

There are further codices for the carmina minora; the most important is the Veronensis 163, from the late 8th century. The Sangallensis 273 (9th century), contains only the Latin Gigantomachy (min. 53). The Greek Gigantomachy is in the Matritensis Graecus 4691 (of A.D. 1465) and in the Laurentianus, conv. soppr. 164 (15th century), while the Greek Epigrams are found in the Heidelberg Palatinus 23 (11th century).

<sup>1</sup> Emphasis is placed elsewhere in the speech in praise of Rome by Aelius Aristides (2nd century): maintenance of law and the rights of citizens.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. cons. Stil. 3 praef.

<sup>3</sup> When studying manuals for princes, Synesius' (d. before 415) De regno and the speeches to the emperor by Themistius (d. around 388) and Libanius (d. around 393) should be taken into account.

<sup>4</sup> The terminology used in scholarship on Claudian is perplexing indeed: Claudianus maior and minor should not be confused with carmina maiora and minora.

The following larger works not related to Stilicho were transmitted independently: the Panegyricus dictus Olybrio et Probino and—again independently—the De raptu Proserpinae; the last work was called the Claudianus minor. We can trace back these two works to the 12th century.

Manuscripts of Claudian increase on the whole in the 12th, 13th, and 15th centuries in accordance with our poet's popularity. As far as we can determine, the separate threads of tradition were first brought together in the 12th–13th centuries. Medieval library catalogues, however, show that there were also other combinations and groupings. All the manuscripts are contaminated. More recent editors have given up trying to produce a stemma.

Influence

Claudian has influenced art and literature in many ways: as a versifier, as a poet of archetypal mythical imagery including allegorical figures and places, as a source for painters and sculptors, as a natural philosopher, as a political philosopher, and as a moralist.

The relationship between Claudian and Prudentius is still open to discussion.<sup>1</sup> The Latin poets in Africa, Gaul and Italy knew Claudian and followed his example. We may compare the Epithalamium (mai. 9–10) to similar poems of both Venantius Fortunatus (carm. 6. 1) and Sidonius Apollinaris (carm. 10–11); the latter poet even attempted to become a second Claudian. Nonnus of Panopolis (5th century), Claudian's countryman, also seems to have taken cognizance of him;<sup>2</sup> in Constantinople Priscian and Johannes Lydus (6th century) were among his readers.

Since the 12th century there has been renewed interest in our poet. In his Architrenius (of 1184) Johannes de Altavilla referred to him explicitly.<sup>3</sup> Claudian's rendering of Venus' residence (10. 49–96) has probably contributed to the common conception of the 'Mount of Venus'.

Alexander Neckam (d. 1217) cited 53 verses out of Claudian's Phoenix in his work De naturis rerum (1. 35); for us this long quotation has the value of a manuscript. Alanus ab Insulis (d. around 1203) wrote his

<sup>1</sup> Cf. A. CAMERON 1970, 469–473 (Claudian has priority in most cases); a different opinion: C. GNILKA, Gnomon 49, 1977, 43–44; on what follows: A. CAMERON 1970, 419–451.

<sup>2</sup> On the Greek Gigantomachy in Nonnus: A. CAMERON 1970, 15–16.

<sup>3</sup> Architrenius I, p. 252 WRIGHT.

Anticlaudianus de Antirufino with constant reference to the In Rufinum)<sup>1</sup> He contrasted the monster Rufinus with his idea of the Celestial Man (the embodiment of man's true essence). Claudian's Council of Hell (Rufin. 1. 25–67) as a motif consequently inspired Alanus (8. 147–316), and, through him, Vida (Christias), Petrus Martyr de Angleria (Pluto furens)<sup>2</sup> and Milton (Paradise Lost).

Chaucer (d. 1400) made use of some of Claudian's works which he perhaps knew from a school selection:<sup>3</sup> the Laus Serenae, the prologue to the VI cons. Hon. and especially the De raptu Proserpinae, a work which had very likely owed its popularity since the 12th century to its allusions to natural philosophy.<sup>4</sup>

Together with Statius and Lucan, Claudian as a favorite of 14th and 15th century readers even rivaled the Augustan poets. This author made his way into the Renaissance without interruption. Petrarch knew him well. Claudian's poems of praise became paradigms for the panegyric literature which had been reviving since the 14th century. Later he would at times threaten to overshadow Virgil and Ovid.

In the De genealogiis deorum gentilium (11. 4) Boccaccio (d. 1375) presents a biography of Venus; here he cites the Epithalamium at length, erroneously identifying it, however, as De laudibus Styliconis. The Epithalamium (min. 10) also influenced Poliziano's (d. 1494) stanzas Per la giostra. In the 18th century the Court of Venus (ibid.) was still evoking numerous English adaptations.<sup>5</sup> Even Coleridge (d. 1834) recommended the imaginative Claudian and left Silius unread.<sup>6</sup>

For the history of art the sea voyage of Venus (Claud. mai. 10. 144–179) gave rise to a tradition of its own, which led to Poussin's (d. 1665) Vénus marine.<sup>7</sup> Along with Ovid and Statius, Claudian affected

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also the allegorical setting Anticlaudianus 1. 107–186; Claud. nupt. Hon. 49; 56–57.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. U. HECHT, Der Pluto furens des Petrus Martyr Anglerius. Dichtung als Dokumentation, Frankfurt 1992; forthcoming: K. WIERSCH, Die Unterweltsversammlung bei Claudian in der antiken und späteren Tradition, diss. Heidelberg 1996.

<sup>3</sup> The House of Fame 1507–1508; The Merchant's Tale, E. 2227–2228; HIGHER, Class. Trad. 592–593.

<sup>4</sup> For a medieval commentary see now A. K. CLARKE, P. M. GILES, eds., The Commentary of Geoffrey of Vitry on Claudian, De raptu Proserpinae. Transcribed . . . with an Introduction and Notes, Leiden 1973.

<sup>5</sup> A. CAMERON 1970, 439.

<sup>6</sup> A. CAMERON 1970, p. vii.

<sup>7</sup> C. DEMPSEY, The Textual Sources of Poussin's Vénus marine, JWI 29, 1966, esp. 441.

considerably that conception of myth and classical antiquity which prevailed well into the 18th century.

The exhortation of Theodosius to Honorius (IV cons. Hon., esp. 299–302) is the passage most frequently quoted in the princes' manuals,<sup>1</sup> from the Policraticus (1159) by John of Salisbury (d. 1180)<sup>2</sup> up to Philip of Leiden's De cura reipublicae (some time after 1355). The tradition continued in the Renaissance—for example, in Thomas Elyot's Boke Named the Governour (1531). Claudian's Rufinus influenced the cliché of the tyrant well into modern times.

Claudian's aphorisms have wandered through florilegia since the 9th century: modern readers still know and love his pithy remarks on the mobile vulgus (IV cons. Hon. 302; hence the English 'mob'), on the freedom to serve a good master (numquam libertas gratior extat/ quam sub rege pio, 'freedom is never more welcome than under a king aware of his responsibilities'; cons. Stil. 3. 114–115) and on the ruthlessness of upstarts: asperius nihil est humili cum surgit in altum, 'there is nothing harsher than a humble man elevated to a high position' (Eutr. 1. 181). Claudian is not missing from Montaigne's (d. 1592) reading list. Montesquieu (d. 1755) inscribed his Considerations on the fall of Rome with a phrase out of Ruf. 1. 22–23: tolluntur in altum, ut lapsu graviore ruant, 'they are raised up high to fall down more heavily'.

Coleridge (d. 1834) called Claudian 'the first of the moderns', discovering in him two contrasting attitudes (one classical and objective, the other modern and subjective). Joris-Karl Huysmans (d. 1907) devoted to him a passage in his A Rebours.<sup>3</sup> In 1966 Hella S. Haasse would use Claudian in her novel Een nieuwer testament. In his drama Die Lobgesänge des Claudian (Stuttgart, Berlin 1914) Hermann Sudermann dubbed our poet appropriately 'the favorite of the gods, from whose feathers even baptismal water did not wash away the gleam of Olympus' (Act 1, Scene 4).

Editions: B. CELSANUS, Vicentiae 1493, etc. * N. HEINSIUS, Lugduni Batavorum 1650; Amstelodami 1665. * T. BIRT (critical, with an extensive introduction and index), Berolini 1892, repr. 1961 (= MGH AA 10). * M. PLATNAUER (TTr), London 1922. * J. B. HALL, Leipzig 1985. * Get.: H. SCHROFF (TC), Berlin 1927. * D. DE VENUTO (TC), Roma 1968. * G. GARUTI, Introd.; TTrC, Bologna 1979. * Gild.: M. OLECHOWSKA (TTrC), Leiden 1978.

<sup>1</sup> A. CAMERON 1970, 431–433 (substantial).

<sup>2</sup> This author is well-read in Claudian.

<sup>3</sup> Conte, LG 661.

* A. CAMERON (C forthcoming). * Eutrop.: A. C. ANDREWS (C), diss. Philadelphia 1931. * P. FARGUES (TC), Paris 1933. * H. SCHWECKENDIEK (TrC), Hildesheim 1992. * Eutrop., Ruf.: J. B. HALL (T), Cambridge (forthcoming). * III Hon.: J. LEHNER (C forthcoming). * IV Hon.: W. BARR (TTrC), Liverpool 1981. * J. LEHNER (C), Königstein 1984. * VI Hon.: K. A. MÜLLER (TC), Berlin 1938. * W. ERNEST (C, cf. below). * Manl. Theod.: W. SIMON (TTrC), Berlin 1975. * nupt. Hon.: U. FRINGS (C), Meisenheim 1975. * Ol. Prob.: W. TAEGERT (TTrC), München 1988. * rapt.: J. B. HALL (TC), Cambridge 1969. * J.-L. CHARLET (TTr), Paris 1991. * C. GRUZELIER (TTrC), Oxford 1993. * rapt. I.: E. POTZ (C), diss. Graz 1985. * Ruf.: H. L. LEVY (new exeget. C with repr. of T and crit. C of 1935), London 1971. * Stil.: U. KEUDEL (C listing parallel passages), Göttingen 1970. * Carm. min. 27 (Phoenix): M.-L. RICCI (TC), Bari 1981. * carm. min. 30 (Laus Serenae): W. E. HEUS (TC), Utrecht 1982. * F. E. CONSOLINO (TTr), Venezia 1986. ** Indices: Word index in the edition by T. BIRT. * M. WACHT, Lemmatisierter Index zu den Carmina maiora Claudians mit statistischen Anhängen zu Sprache und Metrik, Nürnberg 1980 (= Regensburger Microfiche Materialien 9). ** Bibl.: F. CASACELI, Recenti studi Claudianei, BStudLat 2, 1972, 318–326. See also the monographs and commentaries.

M. BALZERT, Die Komposition des Claudianischen Gotenkriegsgedichtes c. 26, Hildesheim 1974. * T. D. BARNES, The Victims of Rufinus, CQ n.s. 34, 1984, 227–230. * A. CAMERON, Claudian. Poetry and Propaganda at the Court of Honorius, Oxford 1970. * A. CAMERON, Claudian, in: J. W. BINNS, ed., Latin Literature of the Fourth Century, London 1974, 134–159. * P. G. CHRISTIANSEN, The Use of Images by Claudius Claudianus, Den Haag 1969. * S. DÖPP, Zeitgeschichte in Dichtungen Claudians, Wiesbaden 1980. * A. H. EATON, The Influence of Ovid on Claudian, diss. Washington 1943. * W. ERNEST, Die Laudes Honorii Claudians: 3 Beispiele poetischer Konsulatspanegyrik im Vergleich, diss. Regensburg 1987. * P. FARGUES, Claudian. Etudes sur sa poésie et son temps. Paris 1933. * W. FAUTH, Concussio Terrae. Das Thema der seismischen Erschütterung und der vulkanischen Eruption in Claudians De raptu Proserpinae, A&A 34, 1988, 63–78. * A. FO, Studi sulla tecnica poetica di Claudiano, Catania 1982. * H. FUNKE, The Universe of Claudian. Its Greek Sources, PLLS 5, 1985, publ. 1986, 357–366. * S. GENNARO, Lucrezio e l'apologetica latina in Claudiano, MSLC 7, 1957, 5–60. * I. GUALANDRI, Aspetti della tecnica compositiva in Claudiano, Milano 1968. * J. B. HALL, Prolegomena to Claudian, London 1986 (= BICS suppl. 45). * U. KEUDEL, Poetische Vorläufer und Vorbilder in Claudians De consulatu Stilichonis, Göttingen 1970. * U. KNOCHE, Ein Sinnbild römischer Selbstauffassung, in: Symbola Coloniensia J. KROLL, Köln 1949, 143–162. * S. KOSTER, Die Invektive in der griechischen und römischen Literatur, Meisenheim 1980. * P. LAURENS, Poétique et histoire. Étude de neuf épigrammes de Claudien, BAGB 1986, 4, 344–347. * J. LEHNER, Poesie und Politik in Claudians Panegyrikus auf das vierte Konsulat des Kaisers Honorius. Ein Kommentar, Königstein 1984. * H. L. LEVY, Themes of Encomium and Invective in Claudian, TAPhA 89, 1958, 336–347. * N. MARTINELLI, Saggio sui carmi greci di Claudiano, Miscellanea Galbiati 2, 1951, 47–76. * R. MOES, Les hellénismes de l'époque théodosienne. Recherches sur le vocabulaire d'origine grecque chez Ammien, Claudien et dans l'Histoire Auguste, Strasbourg 1980. * I. OPELT, Schimpfwörter bei Claudian, Glotta 60, 1982, 130–135. * R. PERRELLI, I proemi claudiane. Tra epica e didattica, Catania 1992. * M. L. RICCI, Il mito della Fenice in Claudiano tra propaganda politica e scienza, Quaderni dell'A.I.C.C. di Foggia 1981, 63–71. * Wolfg. SCHMID, Claudianus, RLAC 3, 1957, 152–167. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Politik und Dichtung in der Panegyrik Claudians, Konstanz 1976. * J. SCHWARTZ, Le papyrus latin d'Alceste et l'œuvre de Claudien, ZPE 52, 1983, 37–39. * J. L. SEBESTA, Claudian's Credo. The De Salvatore, CB 56, 1980, 33–36. * M. SWOBODA, De Ausonii et Claudiani fragmentis hymnico-preicatoriis, Eos 69, 1981, 83–95. * H. SZELEST, Klaudians Laus Serenae, Eos 65, 1977, 257–263. * F. VOLLMER, Claudianus, RE 3, 2, 1899, 2652–2660.

JUVENCUS

Life and Dates

Born to a prominent Spanish family, C. Vettius Aquilinus Juvencus was a presbyter. He wrote his harmony of the gospels (Evangeliorum libri IV) under Constantine probably in 329/330.

Survey of Works

The childhood account (1. 1–306) is a synopsis from Matthew and Luke (cf. Tatianus' Diatessaron); Juvencus then follows Matthew, supplementing him from John.

Sources, Models, and Genres

As a genre, 'Bible epic' originated on the one hand from school exercises in poetic paraphrase and on the other from the educated listeners' desire for a stylistically acceptable version of biblical accounts. Juvencus probably harmonized the gospels independently; he used the Greek original in addition to the Latin text.

Literary Technique

The work is almost a literal rendering, for the poet felt obliged to be faithful to the sacred text. His explicit goal is nevertheless ornatus (4. 408); only the highest literary form, epic, is good enough for the sublime subject. Juvencus' method can be described by the following headings: paraphrase, abridgement, expansion, suppression of historical facts, removal of Judaic themes, and Romanization.

Language and Style

As we might expect from an author consciously adopting a classical style, language and meter are used correctly.

Ideas I Literary Reflection

The prooemium conveys Juvencus' ideas on literature and his task as a poet: there is nothing immortal in this world, not even Rome; nevertheless, the glory of human exploits survives for a long time if it is sung by a Homer or Virgil, and just as lasting is the fame of poets. If cantos based on the lies of men confer on the poet long life after death, then Juvencus will surely reap immortal glory and eternal life if he proclaims divine truth and the acts of Christ which foster life. Hence he needs not dread the end of the world.<sup>1</sup> Christian poetry can be the salvation of its author at the final judgment. Yet Juvencus will not declare it a means of grace; for his spirit, he requests the baptism of the Holy Spirit in the Jordan—in the way that Milton would do later. He therefore puts his literary talent in the service of a higher instance and in the epilogue he is still fully aware that he owes his work to Christ's gratia and pax (4. 806) and His pax. He has thus taken the first step towards a poetics of Christian epic.

The goal of the work under consideration is a 'baptism' (i.e. a Christianization and a spiritualization) of classical epic. The author intended to surpass the achievements and duration of Homer and Virgil (a similar idea in secular form would appear in Camões: Juvencus was the first to write an epic 'free of lies').

---

<sup>1</sup> In a way too straightforward and 'Roman' to our taste, the poet counted on being recompensed by Christ for his work. To be sure, the poet softened his claims based on the merits of his work through forsan, a fact that is sometimes overlooked; on the Invocatio, cf. also F. QUADLBAUER, Zur Invocatio des Juvencus (praef. 25–27), GB 2, 74, 189–212.

Ideas II

The customary homage to the emperor is Christianized: Prince of Peace Constantine is the only monarch who does not want to be considered as God; the grace of Christ will give him everlasting life (4. 809–815). The emperor is the guarantor of secular peace, which is a prerequisite for the naissance of Juvencus' work (4. 809–810); the idea is indirectly reminiscent of the pax Augusta, which made Virgil's creativity possible (the number of books in Juvencus recalls not only the four gospels but also Virgil's Georgics). The union of classicism and Christianity also had a Roman and political ring. In the Constantinian era, the 'Christian Cicero', Lactantius, matched the 'Christian Virgil', Juvencus.

Textual Transmission

Six manuscripts are pre-Carolingian; the majority are from the 9th and 10th centuries (30 manuscripts); a history of the text has not yet been written.

Influence

Juvencus was immediately recognized as one of the prime forces of Christian poetry. Proba and Paulinus of Nola knew him. Jerome granted him an important place in his history of literature. In late antiquity Juvencus was cited often in place of sacred scripture. He was a school author up to the 11th century and again from the Renaissance on, although the less austere Sedulius was more popular.

Editions: Ed. princ. Daventriae 1490. * K. MAROLD, Lipsiae 1886. * J. HUEMER, CSEL 24, Vindobonae 1891. ** In addition, N. HANSSON, Textkritisches zu Juvencus mit vollständigem Index verborum, Lund 1950.

M. FLIEGER, Interpretationen zum Bibeldichter Iuvenius. Gethsemane, Festnahme Jesu und Kaiphasprozeß (4. 478–565), Stuttgart 1993. * R. HERZOG, Die Biblepik der lateinischen Spätantike 1, München 1975. * R. HERZOG, HLL 5, 1989, § 561 (bibl.). * M. J. ROBERTS, The Hexameter Paraphrase in Late Antiquity, Liverpool 1985.

SEDULIUS

Life and Dates

The Carmen Paschale of Sedulius (2nd quarter of the 5th century) is a gratifying specimen of biblical epic. Its author probably hailed from Italy but later went to Greece.

Survey of Works

Since Sedulius' four-part harmony of the gospels was introduced by one book on the Old Testament, the Carmen Paschale consists of five books. There is also a highly rhetorical prose version of the work (Opus Paschale). An Elegy with artistic repetitions of hemistichs parallels events from the Old and New Testaments. The famous hymn to Christ A solis ortus cardine is abecedarian.

Sources, Models, and Genres

As a writer of biblical epic, Sedulius follows Juvenecus but goes much further in imitating Virgil than his predecessor, sometimes borrowing entire lines from the classical author. Fortunately he dispenses with the slavish adherence to his biblical model, an attitude which had been artistically less rewarding.

Literary Technique

A gifted poet, Sedulius arranges his material independently. His talent for getting to the core of his subject brings the event of Easter into the thematic foreground. Miracles of the Old and New Testament point to this central event; they have to be understood typologically. At the beginning of the 2nd book, Christ's incarnation is contrasted with Adam's fall from grace; the female figures Eve and Mary are evaluated through poetic images. Concentration on the acts of Christ offers an artistic advantage in that there is less doctrinal instruction than action; moreover, the author (a fiery orator like Lucan) brings the stories to life through prayers, exhortations and polemics. Intended for meditation, the text could be thought of as an 'iconostasis put into poetry' avant la lettre.

Language and Style

The author's artful diction is more attractive in his poetry than in his tortuous prose.

Ideas I Literary Reflection

Proposing to celebrate the miracles of Christ (carm. pasch. 1. 1), Sedulius (as Juvenecus did before him) sets himself apart from the mendacious poets of the pagans. He has chosen verse form for its appeal to educated readers (epist. 1, p. 5. 1 Huemer); like Lucretius he represents a modest form of poetics that remains behind the power of his work.

Ideas II

The author had to pay the penalty for his talent: his independent treatment of biblical themes brought him difficulties; hence, the re-working in prose.

Transmission

The works of Sedulius were published posthumously in 495. All manuscripts of the Carmen Paschale go back to one archetype. The oldest are the Ambrosianus R 57 (7th century), the Taurinensis E IV 44 (7th century), the Gothanus I 75 (8th century), and the Basileensis O IV 17 (8th century). Manuscripts from the 9th century onward are numerous; many cloister libraries possessed even two copies of this popular work.

Influence

Sedulius has been much read and praised. Arator (Acts of the Apostles, of 544) adopted both his allegorical method and his style. We have already made mention of the talented Avitus (beginning of the 6th century). Around 900 Remigius of Auxerre wrote a commentary on Sedulius; strophes of the Christianissimus poeta enrich the Missal and the Breviary and, through Luther's translation, many Protestant hymn books.

Editions: Io. HUEMER, Vindobonae 1885 (= CSEL 10). * N. SCHEPS (TrC), Delft 1938. * F. CORSARO (TrC), Catania 1948. ** Index verborum et locutionum

(selective) in the edition of Io. HUEMER. ** Concordance: M. WACHT, Hildesheim 1992. ** Bibl.: Altaner § 101.

G. KRÜGER in: SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 4, 2, 1920, §§ 1146–1149. * I. F. CORSARO, Sedulio poeta, Catania 1955. * HERZOG, s. JUVENCUS. * I. OPELT, Die Szenerie bei Sedulius, JbAC 19, 1976, 109–119. * C. RATKOWITSCH, Vergils Seesturm bei Iuvenus und Sedulius, JbAC 29, 1986, 40–58. * C. P. E. SPRINGER, The Gospel Epic in Late Antiquity. The Paschale Carmen of Sedulius, Leiden 1988 (with bibl.).

PRUDENTIUS

Born in Spain in 348, Aurelius Prudentius Clemens studied rhetoric, practised at the bar, was twice governor of a province and lastly numbered among the advisors of Emperor Theodosius. Late in life he decided to dedicate himself solely to Christian poetry. At the age of fifty-seven he prepared a collection of his works for publication. The Dittochaëum is not mentioned in the preface: did the poet consider it not important enough, or did he not until later? Different reasons have been given for the omission of the Psychomachia from the Praefatio (see below, Survey of Works, with footnote). The variants in cat. 10. 9–16 suggest a second edition, a conjecture for which there is no other evidence. The year of the poet's death is unknown.

The edition contains the following works: Praefatio (405), Cathemerinon, Apotheosis, Hamartigenia, Psychomachia, Contra Symmachum (402–404), Peristephanon, and Epilogus. The Peristephanon appeared in many manuscripts behind the Cathemerinon, but in the better tradition after the Contra Symmachum. Position and function of the so-called Epilogus are not entirely certain, nor is the order of the poems within the Peristephanon.<sup>1</sup> All works were written between 392 and 405.

Survey of Works

Enclosed by two sets of two didactic epics, the Psychomachia<sup>2</sup> stands at the center of the collection. The pair Apotheosis and Hamartigenia, which precedes the Psychomachia, is directed against heretics, while the two books Contra

<sup>1</sup> On this, W. LUDWIG 1977, 321–338.

<sup>2</sup> The omission of the Psychomachia in the general Praefatio complicates the interpretation of the collection as a unity but does not exclude it (W. LUDWIG 314 with a discussion 364–365).

Symmachum, which follow it, are against pagans. A prologue and an epilogue lend unity to each group of two. The Psychomachia has its own prologue. The lyric works Cathemerinon and Peristephanon frame the epic middle section of the collection.

Thematic development complements the symmetric tectonics of the work. The Cathemerinon ('Hymns of the Day'), which contains six hymns for certain periods of the day<sup>1</sup> and for seasons respectively, accompanies the Christian in the course of a day and a year. At the end—in the last two hymns—the connection to Christ is emphasized. The epics, which occupy a central position in the work, first turn from practice to theology. The middle piece, the Psychomachia, is flanked by poems that parry errors—heresy and paganism. The Apotheosis contends with Patripassians, Sabellians, Jews, Ebionites, and Manichaeans and subsequently unfolds the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. Prudentius is cautious enough not to attack Arians and Priscillianists directly. The Hamartigenia confronts the dualistic concept of the origin of sin. Marcion is often named, but the actual target is probably Priscillian and perhaps Pelagius as well.

The Psychomachia, the center piece, is in turn practice-oriented: the building of the temple of wisdom is possible only after the victory of virtues. Six struggles follow the invocation of Christ: the allegorical figures Faith, Chastity, Patience, Humility, Hope, Sobriety, Reason and Charity (operatio) overcome their respective opposites, the vices. The seventh struggle takes place upon the return of the victorious host of virtues. Discord (heresy) succumbs to Concord. The virtues build a temple in which wisdom resides.

The fight against paganism is a side-piece to the repulsion of heresies. The two books Contra Symmachum—probably not inspired by any current controversy—picks up the well-known discussion of 398 over the Altar of Victoria. The 1st book is a critique of polytheism; in the 2nd Prudentius refutes the Relatio of Symmachus of that time by expanding the arguments of Ambrose (epist. 17–18). The last book (Peristephanon 'On Crowns'), which shows martyrdom to be the crowning of Christian existence, is composed of 14 poems which combine lyric, epic, and dramatic elements. Prudentius eulogized primarily Spanish and Roman martyrs (the latter on the occasion of his sojourn in Rome in 401–403). Alternation between practice and theory and between contemplation and struggle is a principle securing a meaningful thematic development throughout the collection. The independent work Dittochaeum ('twofold nourishment') is interesting from the point of view of art history. 49 four-line epigrams in hexameters, which describe biblical scenes, were intended as inscriptions to the murals of a basilica in Rome.

<sup>1</sup> The first six hymns are related to the times for prayer recommended by Ambrose (virg. 3. 18); J. BERGMAN 1921, 62.

Sources, Models, and Genres

In his own way the poet of the Psychomachia rivals Virgil and his successors, whose first attempts at allegorical imagery he gives a full and logical development. The result is a Christian literary poetry that serves as an alternative to pagan literature. Despite the presence of antithetical imitations, the anti-Virgilian elements should not be stressed exclusively; rather, the poet's emulation of Virgil should be viewed as a sign of his striving for an important, universally valid statement—much similar to the way in which the pre-Socratics and Lucretius once vied with the great epic poets. He did not presume to 'replace' Virgil; this would have been equivalent to 'replacing' the 'first' creation, nature, by the 'second', the Church. After the omnipresent Virgil, Lucretius deserves special attention<sup>1</sup>—certainly a rather surprising convergence, which, however, is found again and again among early Christian authors since they appreciated the intellectual freedom of this poet. Finally, Roman satire added color to the description of archaic Roman religion.

Horace is a point of reference for lyric poems—the form and content of his lyric poetry were Christianized. In addition, handbooks could have helped Prudentius achieve his variety and 'systematic' repertoire of meter.<sup>2</sup> As 'victory odes' the poems on the martyrs have a vaguely Pindaric quality.

The 1140 iambic trimeters treating the martyrdom of Romanus (perist. 10) constitute a Christian pendant to tragedy. Like Seneca's tragedies and the epic of Lucan, Prudentius' portrayal of martyrdoms in the Peristephanon exploits the Roman preoccupation with gruesomeness. The same applies to the Roman penchant for the splendor of costly materials: descriptions such as that of the baptistry (perist. 12. 31–44) transpose Statius' pictures of villas to the spiritual realm. In the graphic account of the temple, the rhetorical ecphrasis is ennobled by the reference to the Apocalypse.

<sup>1</sup> C. BRAKMAN, Quae ratio intercedat inter Lucretium et Prudentium, Mnemosyne n.s. 48, 1920, 434–448; E. RAPISARDA, Influssi lucreziani in Prudenzio. Un suo poema lucreziano e antiepicureo, V Chr 4, 1950, 46–60. Bibl. on sources and models: on the Bible: N. GRASSO 1972; on ancient models: S. M. HANLEY 1959; C. WITKE 1968; A. MAHONEY, Vergil in the Works of Prudentius, diss. Washington 1934; C. SCHWEN, Vergil bei Prudentius, diss. Leipzig 1937; I. OPELT, Prudentius und Horaz, in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 206–213; F. ALEXANDER, Beziehungen des Prudentius zu Ovid, WS 54, 1936, 166–173; M. L. EWALD, Ovid in the Contra Symmachum of Prudentius, Washington 1942; A. SALVATORE, Echi ovidiani nella poesia di Prudenzio, in: Atti del Convegno internazionale ovidiano (Sulmona 1958), Roma 1959, 257–272; R. HENKE, Die Nutzung von Senecas (Ps.-Senecas) Tragödien im Romanus-Hymnus des Prudentius, WJA n.s. 11, 1985, 135–150; on Ausonius: J.-L. CHARLET 1980; J. M. POINSOTTE, La présence des poèmes antipaiens anonymes dans l'œuvre de Prudence, REAug 28, 1982, 33–58.

<sup>2</sup> W. LUDWIG 1977, 318–321.

Fusion of genres is characteristic of Prudentius; this can be seen on a small scale: bucolic elements appear in a hymn, as do satiric elements in a didactic epic.<sup>1</sup> The same is true on a large scale: deviating from the classical norm, Prudentius combines in one collection of poems works whose genres are quite dissimilar.<sup>2</sup> Among them are contemporary secular genres: epigram (perist. 8), travel poem (perist. 9), carmen tragicum (perist. 10), epistolary elegy (perist. 11), Mimus (perist. 12) and, last but not least, an epic art reminiscent of Claudian. To put it briefly: it is true that Prudentius knows and takes into account the taste of his public, but it would be too simplistic to view his work merely as a reaction to certain contemporary literary trends. His goal is more comprehensive: he wants to Christianize all genres of poetry.

Prudentius read a translation of the Bible that was older than Jerome's; it was not lacking in elegance—if we assume that the poet did not embellish it. Moreover, Tertullian, Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, Ambrose and the Acts of the Martyrs were known to him. The Hamartigenia goes back to Tertullian's Adversus Marcionem. The Contra Symmachum is based on the Relatio of Symmachus, Ambrose's answer to it and, moreover, the criticism of pagan gods in the spirit of apologetic literature. Our poet's relationship to Augustine is disputed.

Prudentius' œuvre is 'encyclopedic' with respect to themes and literary genres. Such extensive schemes as Cicero's philosophical works or the corpus of Seneca's writings come to mind; even the Corpus iuris has been mentioned as a parallel.<sup>3</sup> His attempt to encompass the daily life of the Christian (in the Cathemerinon), Christian doctrine (in the epic poems), and the consummation of Christian existence (Peristephanon) in one cycle recalls—more as a whole than in detail—the tripartite masterpiece of Clement (Protrepticus, Paedagogus, Stromateis). We might also mention Latin poems, which—like Ovid's Metamor- phoses—were meant to be encyclopedic. As a whole, the poetic oeuvre of Prudentius is ‘the first Christian example of Latin universal poetry’.<sup>1</sup> The integration of generically diverging elements into a symmetrically constructed whole is unusual; it is reminiscent of Catullus’ collection, the transmitted structure of which likewise goes back to late antiquity. Works of such dimensions presuppose the existence of the codex as the form of publication.<sup>2</sup> Virgilian scholarship of Prudentius’ time regarded Eclogues, Georgics and Aeneid as a single, great universal poem, which unfolded the different ages of humanity in succession—pastoral life, agriculture, and warfare.<sup>3</sup> While trying to rival the classical poets, Prudentius actually created something unclassical: a deliberately heterogeneous collection of poems.<sup>4</sup> Virgil—the sacral poet of pre-Christian Rome—announced in the Georgics (3. 1–39) that he would build a temple in honor of Augustus, a promise he fulfilled by writing the Aeneid; similarly, Prudentius’ collection of poems, whose central piece culminates in the building of the Temple of Wisdom, has been compared with that period’s sacral edifices<sup>5</sup> to which the poet referred with admiration. On a smaller scale, Perist. 8<sup>6</sup> is a triptych of epigrams.

<sup>1</sup> J. FONTAINE 1975.

<sup>2</sup> W. LUDWIG 1977 with discussion.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. M. FUHRMANN, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 23, 1977, 368–369.

Literary Technique

A hymnlike invocation to Christ opens the Psychomachia. Superficially it is comparable to epic invocations of the Muses; although Christ is not a god of poetry but the deity especially competent for the subject in question. This aspect of his invocatio links Prudentius with the didactic poets, the authors of the De rerum natura, the Georgics, and the Metamorphoses—Ovid’s nam vos mutastis (met. 1. 2) in particular comes to mind. Prudentius himself acknowledges the didactic purpose of his poetry (psych. 18–19 and psych. praef. 50–68).

‘Allegorical invention’, a device characteristic of Roman poetry, comes to perfection with Prudentius. The Psychomachia is European

<sup>1</sup> E. ZINN, Die Dichter des alten Rom und die Anfänge des Weltgedichts, A&A 5, 1956, esp. 25; now in: H. OPPERMANN, ed., Römertum, Darmstadt 1962, 185; and in: ZINN, Viva Vox, 123–148.

<sup>2</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 23, 1977, 372.

<sup>3</sup> Don., vita Verg. 57–59; W. LUDWIG 1977, 356, cf. 306.

<sup>4</sup> A different motivation in: W. LUDWIG 1977, 350–353; 355.

<sup>5</sup> Perist. 12. 31–66; C. GNILKA 1963, 89.

<sup>6</sup> W. SCHETTER, Prudentius, Peristephanon 8, Hermes 110, 1982, 110–117.

literature's first completely allegorical poem of length. In every detail his description of a given allegorical figure reflects its essence as closely as possible. Earlier attempts of epic poets—such as Virgil's Fama, Ovid's allegorical descriptions of persons and places, Fides and Roma in Silius Italicus—are developed logically and innovatively by Prudentius; here Christianity has led to the ultimate artistic breakthrough for a typically Roman trend in literary imagery, to the birth of a 'moral allegorical epic'. In the Cathemerinon poetic allegory appears as an inversion of allegorical interpretations inherited from early Christian theology. The resulting mixture of abstract and visual elements creates difficulties for modern readers who are looking for 'pure images'.<sup>1</sup> Especially in the Psychomachia Prudentius spiritualizes typical features of epic poetry such as battle scenes (e.g. the struggle between virtues and vices) or ecphrasis (e.g. the description of the future Temple of Wisdom).

The images are modeled to suit the themes perfectly. Symbolism of light and dark dominates the book Cathemerinon. In the Psychomachia each vice is made to suffer a death that fits its character. Surprisingly the victory of Fides over pagan Religion (psych. 21–38) bears a remarkable resemblance to Lucretius (1. 78–79). The horrible head of old religion is trampled under foot; the victors feel that they have been raised to heaven. The similarity of images here is not an accident; it reveals a parallel in the context of intellectual history. Just as Lucretius had represented an experience of emancipation, so Prudentius uses the reminiscence to make clear that on a new level Christianity imparts a similar experience.

The concentric structure of the whole is matched by a well-balanced organization of each component; thus, an individual hymn in the Cathemerinon often finds its center of gravity, as it were, in a biblical story—position and function of such narratives recall the 4th book of Horace's Odes.

Language and Style

Poetic form dominates throughout the corpus. The insertions of prose from Symmachus in several manuscripts of the Contra Symmachum were added by an editor in late antiquity.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> E.g. epil. 25–30; good on cath. R. HERZOG 1966, 52–60.

<sup>2</sup> Another opinion: M. P. CUNNINGHAM, edition, praef. (misguided).

Language and style are elaborate, at times highly poetic and artificial. Archaisms such as olli for illi were already obsolete at the time of Virgil; Prudentius builds them into his poetic language. The contrast to the deliberate simplicity of Ambrose's hymns could hardly be greater. For his Christian poetry Prudentius coined many new words, which would become constituent parts of medieval literature.<sup>1</sup>

Prudentius masters all the techniques of classical rhetoric. As a metrician,<sup>2</sup> he shows judgment and versatility. Along with Horatian meters he uses other lyric strophes but never abandons the laws of quantitative metrics. The form of his strophes in cath. 1; 2; 11; 12 resembles that of Ambrose.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

It is misleading to speak of a Christian justification of pagan poetry in Prudentius; he did, however, revive the forms and language of Latin poetry under the banner of Christ, just as Lucretius had once placed his creative efforts in the service of Epicureanism and thereby initiated a rebirth of didactic poetry in grand style. The desire to achieve something useful<sup>3</sup>—or helpful in the eyes of God (praef. 28–46; epil. 21–35)—is consistent with typically Roman didactic goals. Prudentius deems the praise of God (praef. 36) to be the mission of the Christian poet. Moreover, he should strive for a holy life, lead men to God through instruction, and defend Christianity. In short, poetry has to serve divine purposes.<sup>4</sup> Formulaic 'expressions of modesty' reflect the Christian value of humility; in perist. 10. 1–25, esp. 19, two different traditions of 'inspiration'—Christian and classical—are combined in a thematic arrangement that meets the poet's bold artistic demands. In his work Prudentius sublimates both nature and classical tradition into a code; thus his oeuvre can be described as a

<sup>1</sup> M. MANITIUS, Zu Juvenecus und Prudentius, RhM 45, 1890, 485–491, esp. 487; on the language: M. LAVARENNE 1933.

<sup>2</sup> M. MANITIUS (ibid.) 490–491; A. KURFESS 1957, 1065–1066; L. STRZELECKI, De Horatio rei metricae Prudentianae auctore, in: Commentationes Horatianae I, Kraków 1935, 36–49; P. TORDEUR, Essai d'analyse statistique de la métrique de Prudence, RELO 1972, 2, 19–37; J. LUQUE MORENO 1978.

<sup>3</sup> That which serves to prepare for the life to come is useful (Basil, Address to the Youth: On the Use of Greek Literature 2. 9–10).

<sup>4</sup> J. RODRÍGUEZ-HERRERA 1936, 142.

systematic Christian metamorphosis of almost all poetic genres.<sup>1</sup> In each of these forms he seeks and finds that which is 'akin to the truth'<sup>2</sup> and brings it to light. Prudentius also perpetuates the classical reverence for epic by placing the Psychomachia at the center of his collection.

Ideas II

After his tribute to the Creator, Prudentius turns to Creation in the Psychomachia. The spiritual battle proceeds on three levels: the inner conflict of each individual, the struggle of the Church in an historical context and finally the eschatological victory to which the consecration of the sword of Pudicitia (107–108) and the building of the temple allude at the end.

The Peristephanon differs from the Cathemerinon in its treatment of the relationship between biblical and earthly world, for in the latter the contemporaries' participation in Christ's passion and salvation is sacramental while in the former the martyrs of the past experience the passion and salvation first hand.<sup>3</sup>

Prudentius adopts and Christianizes the notion of Roma aeterna; here the Hymn to St. Lawrence and above all the Contra Symmachum (l. 542; Verg. Aen. 1. 279) come to mind. The virtutes of the Romans created the Roman empire so that a Christian world empire under a Christian emperor became possible. In contrast to others Prudentius therefore does not believe in the fall of the (Christianized) occident; but does this make him an 'imperial theologian' in the vein of Eusebius? He rather insists on the fundamental change produced by Christ in the history of Rome.

Transmission

Here we can offer only brief remarks on the rich textual tradition of approximately 320 codices. The oldest surviving manuscript, the Putean(e)us (A; Paris. Lat. 8084, 6th century) is written in capital letters and bears the subscriptio of a certain Vettius Agorius Basilius who also contributed to the transmission of Horace; in late antiquity scholars were quite aware of the fact that both pagan and Christian authors were part of the same heritage. Only slightly more recent is the Ambrosianus D 36, sup. (B), the older portions of which probably originated from Bobbio around 620. The recensio is based on these two oldest manuscripts; since they have many lacunae, others codices must be consulted.

<sup>1</sup> W. LUDWIG 1977.

<sup>2</sup> Basil, ibid. 4. 36–54.

<sup>3</sup> R. HERZOG 1966, 13–92.

The manuscripts fall into two classes.<sup>1</sup> The first—better—group offers the works in the order suggested above pp. 1357–1358. In the second group, the perist. follows cath. 10; whereas cath. 11 and 12 are placed after perist. The relationship of classes to each other needs further clarification. Traces of variants going back to the author himself are surmised in cath. 10. 9–16; 3. 100; psych. 727–729.

We possess illustrated manuscripts of Prudentius, which can be traced back to a lost illustrated Psychomachia edition probably of the 5th century. Illustrators of late antiquity Christianized iconographical stereotypes that were similar to the historical reliefs on the columns of Trajan and Marcus. Thus, in the history of art a transferral occurred that is fully analogous to the allegorical reshaping of battle scenes in Prudentius.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

Prudentius was ignored by Augustine and Jerome. Were they suspicious of his poetry's classical style and his Roman ideology? Or were his poems at the outset simply limited to a small circle, which

---

<sup>1</sup> Curiously enough, these classes are categorized as A and B (although the same letters had been used to denote individual manuscripts). As a result, the oldest parts of manuscript B come to belong to Group A. On the textual transmission: R. STETTNER, Die illustrierten Prudentiushandschriften, Berlin 1895, with a volume containing plates 1905; C. MENGIS, Fragmente einer Freiburger Prudentiushandschrift, Philologus 83, 1928, 89–105; H. WOODRUFF, The Illustrated Manuscripts of Prudentius, Art Studies 7, 1929, 12–49; G. LAZZATI, Osservazioni intorno alla doppia redazione delle opere di Prudenzio, AIV 101, 1941–1942, 217–233; W. SCHMID, Die Darstellung der Menschheitsstufen bei Prudentius und das Problem seiner doppelten Redaktion, V Chr 7, 1953, 171–186; M. P. CUNNINGHAM, A Preliminary Recension of the Older Manuscripts of the Cathemerinon, Apotheosis, and Hamartigenia of Prudentius, SEJG 13, 1962, 5–59; E. PIANEZZOLA, Sulla doppia redazione in Prudenzio cath. 10. 9–16, in: Miscellanea critica, FS B. G. Teubner, Leipzig 1965, 2, 269–286; M. P. CUNNINGHAM, The Problem of Interpolation in the Textual Tradition of Prudentius, TAPhA 99, 1968, 119–141; E. J. BEER, Überlegungen zu Stil und Herkunft des Berner Prudentius-Codex 264, in: Florilegium Sangallense, FS J. DUFT, Sigmaringen 1980, 15–70; C. GNILKA, Theologie und Textgeschichte. Zwei Doppelfassungen bei Prudentius, WS n.s. 19, 1985, 179–203; C. GNILKA, Zwei Binneninterpolamente und ihre Bedeutung für die Geschichte des Prudentiustexts, Hermes 114, 1986, 88–98.

<sup>2</sup> On Prudentius' influence: H. R. JAUSS 1960; A. KATZENELLENBOGEN 1933 and diminished further after 410? In later generations his echo would be as resounding as it had earlier been faint.

Sidonius Apollinaris (epist. 2. 9. 4) likened him to Horace; the textual tradition offers a parallel to that comparison (see the previous section). Gennadius (vir. ill. 13) called him an expert on pagan literature; Alcimus Avitus (carm. 6. 372) praised the prudens ars of Prudentius, a pun which later became popular.

Prudentius was the most extensively read and imitated poet in the Middle Ages. From his hymns, which today are classified 'non-liturgical', entire strophes<sup>1</sup> nevertheless made their way into the Roman Breviary. His hymns and songs on martyrs had already been provided with glosses in Old High German early on. The burial song iam maesta quiesce querella (from cath. 10) survived the Reformation through its appearance in Babst's hymnbook (1545) and is still included in the book of psalms of the Swedish Church.<sup>2</sup>

The influence of the Psychomachia on the art and literature of the Middle Ages is hardly measurable.<sup>3</sup> Yet, Dante, who far surpassed Prudentius as a universal poet, seems to have ignored him as well as other poets of late antiquity.<sup>4</sup>

His glory began to fade in modern times. Erasmus recognized him for his singular versatility as unum inter Christianos fecundum poetam ('a uniquely creative poet among the Christians') and knew better than later critics that his cultural achievement would be able to withstand all changes of time and fashion: virum quovis etiam saeculo inter doctos numerandum, 'a man to be numbered among the cultivated in any century'.<sup>5</sup> With its vivid portrayal of martyrs the Peristephanon found an echo in the baroque period.<sup>6</sup> Richard Bentley called Prudentius

---

1939; R. E. MESSENGER, The Mozarabic Hymnal TAPhA 75, 1944, 103-126, esp. 105; H. SILVESTRE, Aperçu sur les commentaires carolingiens de Prudence, SEJG 9, 1957, 50-74; H. SILVESTRE, Jean Scot Erigène commentateur de Prudence, Scriptorium 10, 1956, 90-92; G. R. WIELAND, The Latin Glosses on Arator and Prudentius in Cambridge University Library, MS Gg. 5. 35, Toronto, Ontario 1983; H. D. MERITT, ed., The Old English Prudentius Glosses at Boulogne-sur-Mer, Stanford 1959; K. L. SCHMIDT, Prudentius und Erasmus über die Christuskrippe mit Ochs und Esel, ThZ 5, 1949, 469-471.

<sup>1</sup> From cath. 1. 2 and 12 and an abridged hymn from perist.

<sup>2</sup> J. BERGMAN 1922, 15.

<sup>3</sup> S. LAVARENNE, edition, vol. 3, 25-45; A. KATZENELLENBOGEN 1933.

<sup>4</sup> HIGHET, Class. Trad. 80.

<sup>5</sup> J. BERGMAN 1922, 14.

<sup>6</sup> ALTANER 8th ed. 407.

the Virgil and Horace of Christians (Christianorum Maro et Flaccus).<sup>1</sup> The influence of Prudentius has even been discovered in Samuel Richardson's Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740).<sup>2</sup>

During the metamorphosis of Roman literature in late antiquity, Prudentius, who continued the tradition of Lactantius and Hilary, brought to perfection the Christianization of aesthetic elements in the realm of poetry. He was the first Christian for whom the writing of poetry became a profession—a vocation. The poetics of both 'praise' and 'transfiguration' foresaw the future of literature in Christian Europe; in our century, both would be important for Rilke.

Editions: Deventer, ca. 1492–1497 (sine loco et anno, perhaps by Alexander HEGIUS). * N. HEINSIUS, Amsterdam 1667. * F. ARÉVALO (TC), 2 vols., Roma 1788–1789, repr. in PL 59 and 60. * In addition: Glossemata de Prudentio: PLS 3, 965–1033. * J. BERGMAN (TC), Uppsala 1897. * J. BERGMAN, CSEL 61, Vindobonae 1926. * M. P. CUNNINGHAM, CC 126, Turnholti 1966. * M. LAVARENNE (TTrN), 4 vols., Paris 1943–1951, vol. 1, 3rd ed. 1972; 2–4, 2nd ed. 1961–1963; vol. 3, 3rd ed. 1992 (rev. and corr. by J. L. CHARLET). * H. J. THOMSON (TTr), 2 vols., London 1949–1953. * M. C. EAGAN (Tr), 2 vols., Washington 1962 and 1965. * apoth.: E. RAPISARDA (TTrN), Catania 1948. * K. SMOLAK (partial C: hymn., praef., apoth. 1–216), diss. Wien 1968. * cath.: M. PELLEGRINO (TTrN), Alba 1954. * F. SCIUTO (TTrN), Catania 1955. * cath. 1–6: M. PELLEGRINO (TC), Torino 1964. * cath. 1, 2, 5, and 6: M. M. VAN ASSENDELFT (TC), Groningen 1976. * c. Symm.: G. STRAMONDO, L. TAORMINA (TTr), Catania 1956. * E. RAPISARDA (1: T), Catania 1954. * ditt.: R. PILLINGER (TTrC), Wien 1980. * ham.: J. STAM (TTrC), diss. Leipzig, Amsterdam, Paris 1940. * R. PALLA (TTrC), Pisa 1981. * psych.: M. LAVARENNE (TTrC), Paris 1933. * U. ENGELMANN (TTr, 24 plates from Ms. 135 of the St. Gall Stiftsbibliothek), Basel, Freiburg 1959 (not philological). * E. RAPISARDA (TTr), Catania 1962. ** Concordance: R. J. DEFERRARI, J. M. CAMPBELL, A Concordance of Prudentius, Cambridge, Mass. 1932, reprinted 1966. ** Bibl.: C. MAGAZZÙ, Rassegna di studi prudentiani (1967–76), BStudLat 7, 1977, 105–134. * M. P. CUNNINGHAM, Literature on Prudentius (–1971), ANRW (forthcoming).

R. ARGENIO, La Psychomachia di Prudenzio, RSC 8, 1960, 267–280. * R. ARGENIO, Il Contra Symmachum di Prudenzio fu uno scritto di attualità?, RSC 16, 1968, 155–163. * T. D. BARNES, The Historical Setting of Prudentius' Contra Symmachum, AJP 97, 1976, 373–386. * J. BERGMAN, Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, der größte christliche Dichter des Altertums, Tartu

<sup>1</sup> Edition of Horace, Cambridge 1711, on Hor. carm. 2. 2. 15.

<sup>2</sup> HIGGET, Class. Trad. 340.

(1921), 1922. * U. BOSCAGLIA, La Passio S. Laurentii di Prudenzio e le sue fonti, Udine 1938. * M. BROŽEK, De Prudentio Pindaro latino, Eos 47, 1954, 107–141; 49, 1957–1958, 123–150. * M. BROŽEK, De Prudentii praefatione carminibus praefixa, in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 31–36. * V. BUCHHEIT, Christliche Romideologie im Laurentius-Hymnus des Prudentius, in: Polychronion, FS F. DÖLGER, Heidelberg 1966, 121–144. * V. BUCHHEIT, Prudentius über Gesittung durch Eroberung und Bekehrung, WJA 11, 1985, 189–223. * V. BUCHHEIT, Heimkehr ins Paradies (Prud. Cath. 8. 41–48; 11. 57–76), Philologus 136, 1992, 256–273. * R. CALCITTI, Subdita Christo servit Roma deo. Osservazioni sulla teologia politica di Prudenzio, Aevum 46, 1972, 402–435. * A. CERRI, Aspetti di polemica antimitologica e di composizione poetica in Prudenzio, Athenaeum 42, 1964, 334–360. * A. CERRI, Archeologia romana nel Contra Symmachum di Prudenzio, Athenaeum 41, 1963, 304–317. * J.-L. CHARLET, L'apport de la poésie latine chrétienne à la mutation de l'épopée antique: Prudence précurseur de l'épopée médiévale, BAGB 1980, 2, 207–217. * J.-L. CHARLET, L'influence d'Ausone sur la poésie de Prudence, Aix-en-Provence, Paris 1980. * J.-L. CHARLET, La création poétique dans le Cathermerinon de Prudence, Paris 1982. * J.-L. CHARLET, La poésie de Prudence dans l'esthétique de son temps, BAGB 1986, 4, 368–386. * S. T. COLLINS, The Apotheosis of Prudentius, SEJG 9, 1957, 44–49. * M. P. CUNNINGHAM, The Nature and Purpose of the Peristephanon of Prudentius, SEJG 14, 1963, 40–45. * S. DÖPP, Prudentius' Contra Symmachum eine Einheit?, V Chr 40, 1986, 66–82. * W. EVENEPOEL, Zakelijke en literaire onderzoekingen betreffende het Liber Cathermerinon van Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, Brussels 1979. * C. FABIAN, Dogma und Dichtung. Untersuchungen zu Prudentius' Apotheosis, Frankfurt 1988. * W. FAUTH, Der Morgenhymnus Aeternae rerum conditor des Ambrosius und Prudentius cath. 1, JbAC 27–28, 1984–1985, 97–115. * J. FONTAINE, Trois variations de Prudence sur le thème du paradis, in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 96–115. * J. FONTAINE, La femme dans la poésie de Prudence, REL 47<sup>bis</sup>, 1970, 55–83. * J. FONTAINE, Le mélange des genres dans la poésie de Prudence, in: Forma futuri, Studi in onore del Cardinale M. PELLEGRINO, Torino 1975, 755–777. * C. GNILKA, Studien zur Psychomachie des Prudentius, Wiesbaden 1963. * C. GNILKA, Interpretation frühchristlicher Literatur. Dargestellt am Beispiel des Prudentius, in: Impulse für die lateinische Lektüre. Von Terenz bis Thomas Morus, ed. by H. KREFELD, Frankfurt 1979, 138–180. * C. GNILKA, Die Natursymbolik in den Tagesliedern des Prudentius, in: Pietas, FS B. KÖTTING, Münster 1980, 411–446 (= JbAC, suppl. vol. 8). * C. GNILKA, Zur Praefatio des Prudentius, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, vol. 4, Urbino 1987, 231–251. * N. GRASSO, Prudenzio e la Bibbia, Orpheus 19, 1972, 79–170. * S. M. HANLEY, Classical Sources of Prudentius, diss. Cornell, Ithaca, N.Y. 1959. * K. R.

HAWORTH, Deified Virtues, Demonic Vices and Descriptive Allegory in Prudentius' Psychomachia, Amsterdam 1980. * R. HENKE, Studien zum Romanushymnus des Prudentius, Frankfurt, Bern 1983. * R. HENKE, Der Romanushymnus des Prudentius und die griechische Prosapassio, JbAC 29, 1986, 59–65. * R. HERZOG, Die allegorische Dichtkunst des Prudentius, München 1966. * R. HERZOG, Rom und Altes Testament: Ein Problem in der Dichtung des Prudentius, in: De Tertullien aux Mozarabes (= Mélanges J. Fontaine), vol. 1, Paris 1992, 551–570. * H. R. JAUSS, Form und Auffassung der Allegorie in der Tradition der Psychomachia des Prudentius, in: Medium Aevum Vivum. FS W. BULST, Heidelberg 1960, 179–206. * M. KAH, 'Die Welt der Römer mit der Seele suchend. . . .' Die Religiosität des Prudentius im Spannungsfeld zwischen pietas Christiana und pietas Romana, Bonn 1990. * A. KATZENELLENBOGEN, Die Psychomachie in der Kunst des Mittelalters, diss. Hamburg 1933. * A. KATZENELLENBOGEN, Allegories of the Virtues and Vices in Medieval Art, London 1939; paperback New York 1964. * F. KUDLIEN, Krankheitsmetaphorik im Laurentius-hymnus des Prudentius, Hermes 90, 1962, 104–115. * A. KURFESS, Prudentius, RE 23, 1 (45), 1957, 1039–1071. * I. LANA, Due capitoli prudenziani. La biografia, la cronologia delle opere, la poetica, Roma 1962. * M. LAVARENNE, Etude sur la langue du poète Prudence, Paris 1933. * G. LO PORTO, Scoperti i resti mortali del poeta Prudenzio Clemente?, RAC 33, 1957, 197–202. * W. LUDWIG, Die christliche Dichtung des Prudentius und die Transformation der klassischen Gattungen, in: Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'antiquité tardive en Occident, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 23, 1977, 303–372. * J. LUQUE MORENO, La versificación de Prudencio, Granada 1978. * M. A. MALAMUD, A Poetics of Transformation. Prudentius and Classical Mythology, Ithaca 1989. * S. G. NUGENT, Allegory and Poetics. The Structure and Imagery of Prudentius' Psychomachia, Frankfurt 1985. * A.-M. PALMER, Prudentius on the Martyrs, Oxford 1989. * E. K. RAND, Prudentius and Christian Humanism, TAPhA 51, 1920, 71–83. * R. G. RANK, The Apotheosis of Prudentius. A Structural Analysis, CF 20, 1966, 18–31. * M. ROBERTS, Poetry and the Cult of the Martyrs. The Liber Peristephanon of Prudentius, Ann Arbor 1993. * J. RODRÍGUEZ HERRERA, Poeta Christianus. Prudentius' Auffassung vom Wesen und von der Aufgabe des christlichen Dichters, diss. München, Speyer 1936. * J. RUYSSCHAERT, Prudence l'Espagnol, poète de deux basiliques romaines de S. Pierre et de S. Paul, RAC 42, 1966 (= Mélanges E. Zosi 1), 267–286. * T. A. SABATTINI, Storia e leggenda nel Peristephanon di Prudenzio, RSC 20, 1972, 32–53; 187–221. * A. SALVATORE, Studi prudenziani, Napoli 1958. * E. M. SANFORD, Were the Hymns of Prudentius Intended to be Sung?, CPh 31, 1936, 71. * M. SMITH, Prudentius' Psychomachia. A Reexamination, Princeton 1976. * F. SOLMSEN, The Powers of Darkness in Prudentius' Contra Symmachum. A Study of his Poetic Imagination, V Chr 19, 1965, 237–257. * F. SOLMSEN, The Conclusion of Theodosius' Oration in Prudentius' Contra Symmachum, Philologus 109, 1965, 310–313. * W. STEIDLE, Die dichterische Konzeption des Prudentius und das Gedicht Contra Symmachum, V Chr 25, 1971, 241–281. * H. J. THOMSON, The Psychomachia of Prudentius, CR 44, 1930, 109–112. * K. THRAEDE, Untersuchungen zum Ursprung und zur Geschichte der christlichen Poesie, JbAC 5, 1962, 125–157. * K. THRAEDE, Die infantia des christlichen Dichters, in: Mullus, FS T. KLAUSER = JbAC suppl. vol. no. 1, Münster 1964, 362–365. * K. THRAEDE, Studien zu Sprache und Stil des Prudentius, Göttingen 1965. * K. THRAEDE, Concordia Romana in der Antwort des Prudentius auf die 3. Relatio des Symmachus, in: Tesseræ, FS J. ENGEMANN = JbAC, suppl. vol. 18, Münster 1991, 380–394. * G. TORTI, Patriæ sua gloria Christus. Aspetti della romanità cristiana di Prudenzio, RIL 104, 1970, 337–368. * C. WITKE, Prudentius and the Tradition of Latin Poetry, TAPhA 99, 1968, 509–525. * C. WITKE, Numen Litterarum. The Old and the New in Latin Poetry from Constantine to Gregory the Great, Leiden, Köln 1971, 102–143.

III. PROSE

A. HISTORIOGRAPHY AND RELATED GENRES

WRITERS OF HISTORY IN MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

After Tacitus there was no more great Latin senatorial historiography. The class that had fostered it had undergone a profound change; a living awareness of the old libertas<sup>1</sup> was now a thing of the past. Since Hadrian an irrevocable predominance of bureaucracy had made itself felt, and the senate lost its last semblance of political importance. With the increasing admission of Greek-speaking senators from the eastern half of the empire which began around the middle of the 2nd century, the old sentiment of Roman national solidarity among members of the senatorial class disappeared. Non-senatorial historiography, too, such as that of Claudius Quadrigarius, Valerius Antias or Titus Livius, succumbed to the change. Historians no longer had the sense of historical changes evinced by Livy<sup>2</sup> and Tacitus. On the one hand, Romans saw themselves as dependent on the person of the emperor—hence increasing interest in imperial biography (Suetonius, Marius Maximus, the Historia Augusta). On the other hand, readers sought edification in historical exempla (Valerius Maximus) and rapid overviews (Florus). Dry compendia had to suffice for schools.

Concurrent Greek historiography was spared a similar crisis. This was due not only to Emperor Hadrian's philhellenism and to the progressive Hellenization and orientalization of the Roman upper classes, but above all to the fact that Greek historiography in Rome was not linked to senatorial hierarchies to the extent that its Roman counterpart had been. It was supported not by senators but by intellectuals. In addition to his surviving Anabasis of Alexander, which is based on reliable sources, Arrian of Nicomedia wrote histories (now lost) of individual provinces (e.g. Bithynica: a history of his homeland) during the 2nd century A.D. At the same time Appian of Alexandria composed a history of Rome from the beginnings to Trajan in 24 books. During the first half of the 3rd century an aging Cassius Dio Cocceianus of Nicaea (consul 223/4 and 229) wrote a history of Rome (from Aeneas to Severus Alexander) in 80 books: This was the first comprehensive Roman history since Livy—written characteristically enough, in Greek.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. WIRSZUBSKI, Libertas, esp. 153–212 (= 124–171).

<sup>2</sup> S. esp. T. J. LUCE, Livy. The Composition of his History, Princeton, N.J., 1977, in particular 230–297.

Likewise in the first half of the 3rd century, Herodian, probably a Syrian, followed the history of Rome from the death of Marcus Aurelius (180) to the accession of Gordian III (238). Somewhat later but still in the same century P. Herennius Dexippus of Athens left behind works on Greece under the diadochoi, a chronicle from pre-historic times to Claudius Gothicus and a history of the wars with the Goths, which extends at least to the year 270. We have Eunapius of Sardis in Lydia to thank for a Chronicle from the beginning of the 5th century. Even the Roman Asinius Quadratus (first third of the 3rd century) chose to write his history of Rome (dating from the founding of the city up to Severus Alexander) in Greek—in the stylized dialect of Herodotus.

Christianity provided fresh incentive for historiography. Here, too, Greek took precedence over Latin at first. In his world history—from creation to A.D. 217/18—Sextus Julius Africanus introduced an innovation in ancient historiography by paralleling the Old Testament and Greek history.

Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine (ca. 260–340), made important contributions. His Χρονικὸὶ κανόνες provide a brief overview of Chaldeans, Assyrians (to include Medes, Lydians and Persians), Hebrews, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, followed by annual tables from the birth of Abraham to A.D. 303. After Eusebius' death the text was corrupted and extended to 323. An Armenian version of the enlarged work and Jerome's Latin translation, with a continuation to 378, have survived. Another work of Eusebius, his Ecclesiastical History (which is not a full-scale history but only treats specific topics: apostolic succession, Christian teachers and authors, Gnostics and heretics, punishment of the Jews, persecutions of Christians, and martyrs) can be read in Greek, Syrian (hence: Armenian), and Latin (translated by Rufinus in 403 and continued to 395). Eusebius strove for 'truth' and eschewed rhetoric. Citing his sources, he proceeded in the manner of an antiquarian and philologist. In this respect he resembles Suetonius.

As for Latin authors, Florus was active under Hadrian; we shall dedicate to him a chapter of his own. At that time Granius Licinianus also probably wrote a brief History of Rome, the fragments of which survive on a palimpsest. The date of the Epitome of Livy is disputed. It is based on an earlier résumé which was more extensive.

In the 3rd or 4th century Julius Obsequens used the epitome for his Collection of Prodigies. M. Junianus Justinus<sup>1</sup> (from an unknown period, perhaps under Alexander Severus) abridged the universal history of Augustan Pompeius Trogus (who made use of good sources now lost), mixed excerpts with summaries and concentrated on what was important for students of rhetoric. He loved aphorisms.

With Emperor Diocletian<sup>2</sup> (284–305) political and economic stabilization set in, which under Constantine made possible a revival of culture and especially of Latin literature. Truly great historiography, however, did not arrive until around the end of the 4th century with Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote in Latin.

Eutropius (about 369) and Festus (after 369) had already composed their Breviaries. The entourage of such emperors as Valentinian and Valens had its origins mainly in the West, in the Danubian provinces. Now the senate was made up of provincials for whom Roman history had to be made palatable in striking and clear-cut form.

Lost to us is a hypothetical work, a History of the Emperors, the common source of Aurelius Victor, Eutropius and Historia Augusta.<sup>3</sup>

Sextus Aurelius Victor<sup>4</sup>

Life and Dates. As Eutropius and Festus would later, Aurelius Victor, too, belonged to a class of high-ranking administrators. An African

<sup>1</sup> Edition: O. SEEL, Lipsiae 1935, 2nd ed. 1956, repr. 1993; O. SEEL (TtN, together with Trogus), Zürich 1972; for further information s. Trogus.

<sup>2</sup> S. WILLIAMS, Diocletian and the Roman Recovery, London 1985.

<sup>3</sup> A. ENMANN, Eine verlorene Geschichte der römischen Kaiser und das Buch De viris illustribus urbis Romae. Quellenstudien, Philologus suppl. vol. 4, 1884; it was probably a brief chronicle for the time from the 2nd up to the end of the 3rd century with valuable information on the regions of the Danube; ENMANN assumes that the work appeared under Diocletian; today it is rather placed after 337, provided its existence is not disputed.

<sup>4</sup> Edition: F. PICHLMAYER, R. GRÜNDEL, Lipsiae 1911, 4th ed. 1970; P. DUFRAIGNE (TTrN), Livre des Césars, Paris 1975; J.-C. RICHARD (TTrN), Les origines du peuple romain, Paris 1983; bibl.: H. BEHRENS, Untersuchungen über das anonyme Buch De viris illustribus, Heidelberg 1923; A. MOMIGLIANO, Some Observations on the Origo gentis Romanae, JRS 48, 1958, 56–73; G. PUCCIONI, La tradizione annalistica romana nell'Origo gentis Romanae, Firenze 1960; W. DEN BOER, Rome à travers trois auteurs

by birth, he became consularis Pannoniae secundae in 361, praefectus urbi in 389 (Amm. 21. 10. 6), and iudex sacrarum cognitionum (Dessau I. 2945) under Theodosius. He published his brief survey of history soon after 360.<sup>1</sup> The Epitome de Caesaribus also draws on the Caesares of Aurelius Victor himself.<sup>2</sup> In the 4th century an unknown editor united three works into one corpus, the subject matter of which extended from primeval Rome to A.D. 360, including the Caesares of S. Aurelius Victor. Dating the trilogy to Julian's reign (361–363) is well grounded, for there is no mention at all of Christianity.<sup>3</sup>

Survey of the Work. A history of the empire composed for the most part of short biographies from Augustus to Constantius II (d. 361), the work is composed of three parts: 1. The Origo gentis Romanae (from Saturn to Romulus), the author of which is unknown; 2. the anonymous writing De viris illustribus urbis Romae: 86 biographies of leading personalities from Proca, the king of Alba Longa, to Mark Antony; several non-Romans are treated as well, among whom Cleopatra; 3. the genuine work of Aurelius Victor, which is limited to the period after Augustus.

His Sources probably are: the so-called History of the Emperors alongside Suetonius; Tacitus (perhaps through florilegia); Marius Maximus, and perhaps also lists of the emperors (like those versified by Ausonius).<sup>4</sup> The De viris illustribus is derived from Hyginus' collection of biographies and as a historical source it is independent of Livy.

Literary Technique. The point of departure is biographic since Aurelius proceeds along a line of emperors and their tenures in office; at the du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 21, 1968, 256; T. D. BARNES, The Lost Kaisergeschichte and the Latin Historical Tradition, Bonner Historia Augusta Colloquium 1968–1969, publ. 1970, 13–27; H. W. BIRD, The Sources of the De Caesaribus, CQ n.s. 31, 1981, 457–463; H. W. BIRD, Sextus Aurelius Victor. A Historiographical Study, Liverpool 1984 (with a good bibl. 165–170); P. SOVERINI, Note ad Aurelio Vittore, MCr 19–20, 1984–1985, 235–240; J. FUGMANN, Königszeit und frühe Republik in der Schrift De viris illustribus urbis Romae. Quellenkritisch-historische Untersuchungen. I: Königszeit, Frankfurt 1990.

---

<sup>1</sup> A. CHASTAGNOL, Emprunts de l'Histoire Auguste aux Caesares d'Aurelius Victor, RPh 41, 1967, 85–97.

<sup>2</sup> J. SCHLUMBERGER, Die Epitome de Caesaribus. Untersuchungen zur heidnischen Geschichtsschreibung des 4. Jh. n. Chr., München 1974, 63–66.

<sup>3</sup> A. MOMIGLIANO, Pagan and Christian Historiography in the Fourth Century A.D., in: id., ed., The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1963, 96–97.

<sup>4</sup> H. W. BIRD, S. Aurelius Victor. A Historiographical Study, Liverpool 1984, 16–23.

same time narrative sections (using historiographical techniques)<sup>1</sup> are mixed with moral aphorisms. Individual episodes are singled out as exempla and the remainder is disregarded.

Language and Style.<sup>2</sup> Aurelius Victor's elocutio is uneven, at times rhetorically turgid, at times anecdotal. Sallustian brevity alternates with long-winded officialese. Historical infinitives and frequentatives are also reminiscent of Sallust. The author of De viris illustribus, however, writes unpretentiously.

Ideas. In keeping with his senatorial viewpoint, Aurelius Victor condemns the supremacy of the military and welcomes the reestablishment of empire under Diocletian, Constantine and his sons. He accuses the senate of having lost political power out of indolence and avarice (37. 7).<sup>3</sup> He values highly a literary education (40. 13). Although he is obviously a pagan,<sup>4</sup> he says nothing against Christianity. Thinking in exempla is characteristic of the author of De viris illustribus.

Transmission.<sup>5</sup> The three writings of the corpus have come down to us in the Bruxellensis 9755-63 (15th century) and in the Oxoniensis Canonicianus 131 (A.D. 1453), which go back to a common source. In addition, the De viribus illustribus urbis Romae has another independent tradition. The Epitome, a parallel work to the Caesares, was handed down to us in two families of manuscripts; the shorter version was spared interpolations.

Influence. The Caesares are used in the Historia Augusta. Jerome consulted Aurelius Victor for his revision of Eusebius. Pushkin (d. 1837) refers to the above-mentioned (spurious) chapter on Cleopatra in his important narrative, Egyptian Nights.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> On interaction of history and biography: A. MOMIGLIANO, Il trapasso fra storiografia antica e storiografia medievale, RSI 81, 1969, 286-303.

<sup>2</sup> On language and style: H. W. BIRD (quoted above, penultimate footnote) 90-99; color Sallustianus: E. WÖLFFLIN, Aurelius Victor, RhM 29, 1874, 282-308, esp. 285-288; R. J. PENELLA, A Sallustian Reminiscence in Aurelius Victor, CPh 78, 1983, 234.

<sup>3</sup> Dum oblectantur otio simulque divitiis pavent, quarum usum affluentiamque aeternitate maius putant, munivere militaribus et paene barbaris viam in se ac posteros dominandi.

<sup>4</sup> J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, Aurelius Victor et la Péninsule Ibérique, Latomus 41, 1982, 362-364.

<sup>5</sup> S. D'ELIA, Studi sulla tradizione manoscritta di Aurelio Vittore: I. la tradizione diretta, Napoli 1965.

<sup>6</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 242 with note.

Eutropius<sup>1</sup>

Life and Dates. Eutropius took part in the Persian campaign of Julian the Apostate (d. 363). As personal assistant (magister memoriae) to the moderately educated emperor Valens (364–378), he was commissioned to produce an abridged version of Roman history. He is most likely that senator Eutropius who held the consulate with Valentinian in 387.

Survey of the Work. The breviary Ab urbe condita, in 10 short books, is dedicated to the emperor. The 1st book reaches from Romulus to Camillus' victory over the Gauls. The 2nd book ends with the First Punic war, the 3rd with the Second. Further milestones are the victory over Jugurtha (book 4), the end of the civil war between Marius and Sulla (book 5), the death of Caesar (book 6), the end of Domitian (book 7), Alexander Severus (book 8), Diocletian (book 9) and Jovian (book 10). Thus the year 364 marks the conclusion. His promise to treat the present (10.18.3) is an empty topos.

Sources. Florus and an excerpt from Livy are used for the Republican period, Suetonius for the first twelve Caesars, and for the remainder the often quoted, unknown History of the Emperors as well as a history of the house of Constantine equally unattainable for us. Eutropius described the time of Julian and Jovian from his own experience. Handbooks might have been consulted for geographical and chronological data; chronology is more reliable in Eutropius than in his contemporaries' works.

Literary Technique. In his account of the Republican period, our author confines himself to wars and battles; individuals become more discernible in his treatment of the imperial period, where he also introduces anecdotes (7. 18). As he approaches his own time, his portrayal of characters becomes more sophisticated. His narrative is continuous and less desultory than Aurelius Victor's.

Language and Style are fluid and clear, somewhat sober, and as far from affectation as from formlessness. For his epoch Eutropius is doubtless a gratifying author.

Ideas. Well disposed to the senate, Eutropius (6. 25) considers Caesar a tyrant (while Aurelius Victor admires him). He sees a break in

---

<sup>1</sup> Edition: C. SANTINI, Leipzig 1979, repr. 1992; bibl.: M. CAPOZZA, Roma fra monarchia e decemvirato nell'interpretazione di Eutropio, Roma 1973 (bibl. there 163–173); G. BONAMENTE, Giuliano l'Apostata e il Breviario di Eutropio, Roma 1986 (extensive bibl. 177–217); dating of the Breviarium 369/70: A. CHASTAGNOL, quoted above, p. 1374, n. 1.

Roman history: The domination of the rough soldier Maximinus (235) ended cooperation between emperor and senate, which Eutropius considers crucial for the welfare of the state. With respect to Christianity Eutropius remains neutral; he does not mention the conversion of Constantine, but does pillory Julian as nimius religionis Christianae insectator (10. 16. 3).

Transmission.<sup>1</sup> The oldest manuscript is the Gothanus I 101 (9th century); the Bertinianus Audomarensis (St. Omer) 697 (11th century), and the Leidensis B.P.L. 141 (10th century) build another group. The text, which Eutropius' Greek translator Paeanius, a contemporary of the author, used, is of particular importance although its reliability is diminished by the fact that he translated freely and did not shrink from making additions (out of Cassius Dio).

Influence. Eutropius was read widely and translated twice into Greek,<sup>2</sup> an honor rarely conferred on a Roman author: not only the elite of Rome, who were supplemented with deserving members of provincial armies, needed tutoring in Roman history, but also Constantinople's senatorial class, the members of which were recruited from the municipal upper classes. Traces of Eutropius are found in Jerome, Orosius, and in the Epitome of Pseudo-Aurelius Victor (if we do not assume use of a common source here). Eutropius' influence was felt strongly in the Middle Ages. Paul the Deacon (ca. 720–799) drew on him and continued his history in six further books up to 553. Around 1000 Landolfus Sagax, following Paul's example, made his own additions.

The editio princeps appeared in 1471. Modern times dethroned Eutropius as a historian, but used him as a school author from time to time.

Festus<sup>3</sup>

Life, Dates. The Breviarium of Festus was, like that of Eutropius, inspired by the emperor Valens (364–378). In the Bambergensis Festus is referred to as a vir clarissimus and magister memoriae. The work was composed after 369. His identification with other personalities of the name Festus remains uncertain.

<sup>1</sup> N. SCIVOLETTO, La tradizione manoscritta di Eutropio, GIF 14, 1961, 129–162.

<sup>2</sup> Around 380 by Paeanius, around 600 by Capito.

<sup>3</sup> Most often (incorrectly) called 'Rufius Festus'. Editions: SIXTUS RUESINGER, Romae 1468; J. W. EADIE (TC), London 1967; M.-P. ARNAUD-LINDET (TTr), Paris 1994; Lexicon: M. L. FELE, Hildesheim 1988; bibl.: B. BALDWIN, Festus the Historian, in: B.B., Studies in Late Roman and Byzantine History, Literature, and Language, Amsterdam 1984, 79–99; R. C. BLOCKLEY, Festus' Source on Julian's Persian Expedition, CPH 68, 1973, 54–55; J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, Festus et la péninsule ibérique, Latomus 39, 1980, 161–164.

Survey of the Work. A survey of the Roman empire's growth up to the present (3–14) is followed by a review of Roman military campaigns in the East up to the time of Jovian (15–29). Irregular and desultory, the structure may in part reflect political bias (see below).

Sources are the Epitome Liviana, Florus, Suetonius as well as the History of the Emperors, which is conjectured by some researchers.

Literary Technique. One can hardly speak of a literary technique, since the work is extremely concise, and the clear, well-defined line of Eutropius is entirely lacking. There is no continuous historical narrative. For all this, the work was purposely divided into two parts in order to set earlier Roman victories over against less successful eastern campaigns. The growth of the Roman empire is depicted from a regional point of view. In the imperial period Festus emphasizes battles along the eastern border from Pompey and Crassus to Jovian.

Language and Style. Nor can Festus' style be compared with that of Eutropius. In his introduction he tells us, fittingly, that the emperor ordered him to be brief—a wish that he would gladly fulfill, since eloquence was not his forte. In practice, however, he attempts—as a diminutive Florus—to compensate for the meagerness of content by expressing himself elegantly.

Ideas. The compendium promoted Valens' eastern military campaigns. The leitmotif—the extraordinary difficulty of conducting any military operations in the East—was to bolster the emperor's reputation in the case of success and to serve as an excuse in the case of defeat. Festus' work is valuable for its list of dioceses and provinces under Emperor Valens and for several details on Aurelian's and Diocletian's wars in the East.

Transmission. The manuscripts fall into two groups. Within the first (which is preferable), the Gothanus 101<sup>1</sup> (9th century) and the Bambergensis E III, 22 (9th century) are superior.

Influence. Ammianus, Jordanes and Isidore read Festus. Jordanes (6th century) is in some instances useful for the settlement of the text.

---

<sup>1</sup> M. PEACHIN, The Purpose of Festus' Breviarium, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 38, 1985, 158–161.

Julius Obsequens<sup>1</sup>

The Liber prodigiorum of Julius Obsequens is a collection of prodigies which relate to the years 190–11 B.C.

Sources. Like Eutropius, Julius Obsequens bases his information on a Chronicon, which in its turn had condensed an epitome of Livy.

Ideas. The author is a pagan who believes in prodigies; he considers expiation necessary and advisable for success. That belief is in keeping with the era of reactionary resistance on the part of pagan religion in the 4th century. Mommsen's assumption that Obsequens was a Christian is rejected today.

Transmission. No manuscripts have been preserved; the Aldina of 1508 is the basis for our text. Sometimes parallel passages from other authors, who use common sources, are helpful.

L. Septimius<sup>2</sup>

(the Latin translator of Dictys)

Life, Dates. L. Septimius was a grammarian who translated the Greek Ephemeris belli Troiani of Dictys into Latin. His dates are normally placed in the 4th century.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Edition: A. MANUTIUS, Venetiis 1508; O. ROSSBACH, Titi Livi Periochae, in his edition of Livy, vol. 4, Lipsiae 1910 (repr. 1973), 149–181; A. C. SCHLESINGER (TTr), edition of Livy, vol. 14, Cambridge, Mass., 2nd ed. 1967, 237–319; lexicon: S. ROCCA, Iulii Obsequentis lexicon, Genova 1978; bibl.: P. G. SCHMIDT, Supplemente lateinischer Prosa in der Neuzeit. Rekonstruktionen zu lateinischen Autoren von der Renaissance bis zur Aufklärung, Göttingen 1964, 11–13; R. FREI-STOLBA, Klimadaten aus der römischen Republik, MH 44, 1987, 101–117; C. SANTINI, Letteratura prodigiale e 'sermo prodigialis' in Giulio Ossequente, Philologus 132, 1988, 210–226.

<sup>2</sup> Editions: U. ZELL, Coloniae 1470–1475; W. EISENHUT (together with the remains of the Greek original) Lipsiae 1958, 2nd ed. 1973; bibl.: A. CAMERON, Poetae Novelli, HSPh 84, 1980, 127–175 (on the Ephemeris); E. CHAMPLIN, Serenus Sammonicus, HSPh 85, 1981, 189–212; W. EISENHUT, Spätantike Troia-Erzählungen—mit einem Ausblick auf die mittelalterliche Troia-Literatur, MLatJb 18, 1983, 1–28; A. CAMERON, The Latin Revival of the Fourth Century, in: W. TREADGOLD, Renaissances before the Renaissance, Stanford 1984, 42–58; S. TIMPANARO, Sulla composizione e la tecnica narrativa dell'Ephemeris di Ditti-Settimio, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, 4, 169–215; A. GRILLO, Tra filologia e narratologia. Dai poemi omerici ad Apollonio Rodio, Ilias Latina, Ditti-Settimio, Darete Frigio, Draconzio, Roma 1988; S. MERKLE, Die Ephemeris belli Troiani des Diktys von Kreta, Frankfurt 1989 (bibl.); on Dictys and Dares cf. also a forthcoming article by S. MERKLE, in: G. SCHMELING, ed., The Novel in the Ancient World, Leiden 1996.

<sup>3</sup> Thus again S. MERKLE 1989; a different view in: A. CAMERON 1980 and E. CHAMPLIN 1981 (3rd century).

Survey of the Work. An introductory epistle to Q. Aradius Rufinus informs us that we are dealing with a translation of a Greek work on the Trojan War written by an eye-witness. The Cretan Dictys is said to have etched his journals in linden wood in Phoenician characters and enclosed them in a pewter casket to be buried with him. Allegedly, during Nero's thirteenth year in office shepherds found the journals, and their master turned them over to the emperor, who subsequently had them translated into Greek. Our Latin translator explains that he rendered the first five books describing the war in the same number of books and summarized the last four recounting the heroes' return in one book.

Sources. The report of the discovery of the original is, of course, fictitious; however, a Greek papyrus proves that a Greek version actually did exist. Septimius' work takes an independent position between its basic genre—historiography—Sallust<sup>1</sup> is among his important models—and different species of ancient novels (on adventures, love stories or Alexander's life).

Literary Technique. The account of the exhumation evokes older legends that had circulated in Rome. At places in the text which we can compare with the Greek model, the translation is free and less dry than the original. Septimius' narrative technique bears characteristics of both historiography and novel; however, in contrast to ancient novel, this work lacks a central hero. Love plays a major role, just as it had in the novel, but here it appears as a destructive force. This perspective is reminiscent of tragedy.

Language and Style. Our writer proves to be a true son of his century with respect to language and style; however, he had been thoroughly schooled in Sallust and Virgil. The language and style of the Latin translation raise higher literary claims than that of the Greek version.

Ideas. Unlike Virgil—and even Homer—the author is biased against Troy. The writer of the original, Dictys (probably of the 2nd century), being a Greek, had adopted a reserved attitude towards the Romans. The Trojan War demonstrated nonetheless the moral decline of the Greeks, whom the barbarians had forced to arm for war.

There is still another conceivable explanation for the author's anti-Trojan sentiment. It would be worth considering whether Dictys was using the Trojan War as a model for a struggle of the ancient cultural world against the Persians, who had grown stronger in the second quarter of the 3rd century. Did the author regard Achilles as a paradigm for the new Alexander (Severus)?

<sup>1</sup> Sallust enjoyed particular interest in the 4th century: S. MERKLE 1989, 276.

Transmission. The best manuscript is the Sangallensis 205 (9th–10th century). A manuscript found in Iesi in 1902 also contains the Latin Dictys (partly 10th and partly 15th century).

Influence. In the Middle Ages the Latin Dictys was widely disseminated as a substitute for Homer.

Virius Nicomachus Flavianus<sup>1</sup>

Under Theodosius Virius Nicomachus Flavianus received the quaestura sacri palatii and dedicated his Annals to the emperor; under the usurper Eugenius he became consul in 394 but later that same year paid the price of betrayal with his death. His son and grandson contributed greatly to the preservation of Livy's text. The historian Nicomachus also translated the Life of Apollonius of Tyana.

The Anonymi Valesiani<sup>2</sup>

There is a brief history of the Roman Empire under Constantine (Excerptum Valesianum I) in a medieval florilegium. The work is clear and precise; the author, who wrote shortly after the death of Constantine (337), is obviously a pagan (the few references to Christianity were taken from Orosius and inserted into the text). The fragment shows clearly how little of the historiography of late antiquity has survived and how cautious we must be in our judgment of the era. The Excerptum Valesianum II, which treats the time of Odoacer and Theoderic, smacks of an anti-Arian Christian (probably of the 6th century).

<sup>1</sup> BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 291–293; J. SCHLUMBERGER, Die verlorenen Annalen des Nicomachus Flavianus. Ein Werk über Geschichte der römischen Republik oder Kaiserzeit, in: J. STRAUB, ed., Bonner Historia-Augusta-Colloquium 1982–1983, Bonn 1985, 305–329.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: J. MOREAU, V. VELKOV, Excerpta Valesiana, Lipsiae, 2nd ed. 1968; bibl.: S. J. B. BARNISH, The Anonymus Valesianus II as a Source for the Last Years of Theoderic, Latomus 42, 1983, 572–596; N. BAGLIVI, Su Anonymus Valesianus 1.3.7, Orpheus 9, 1988, 312–324; further bibl.: HLL 5, 1989, 195–196 (= § 535) and, in progress, HLL 6, § 725.

Ammianus Marcellinus

The most important historiographer of late antiquity, Ammianus Marcellinus, will be treated in a separate chapter.

In the time after Ammianus historiography became a Christian monopoly. The following author set a trend.

Jerome<sup>1</sup>

Jerome, who will be discussed later extensively, translated and revised the 2nd book of the Chronicle of Eusebius.

Jerome supplemented the Chronicle with Roman material from Eutropius, Suetonius' De viris illustribus and lists of Roman magistrates. He added his own account of the years 325–378. The result is a hastily arranged compilation. Hardly any work of Roman literature is so indispensable and at the same time so confusing to literary historians as that of Jerome. To make up for this, our Church Father pays meticulous attention to rhythmical clausulae.

Jerome's second historical work (De viris illustribus) was written in 392; it deals with 135 Christian authors from St. Peter to Jerome.

His main source is Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, but Jerome also includes—much to Augustine's displeasure—Jews and heretics. Of the pagans only Seneca has the honor of being admitted, on the basis of his (imputed) correspondence with St. Paul. This was an important sign of the times: Roman literature experienced a first great renaissance under Christian auspices, and it may be surmised that Jerome would also have included his beloved Cicero among the Christian classics (had chronology not prevented him).

This work exhibits a plain style; there are numerous errors in it, too, but it is still just as pioneering and indispensable as the preceding one.

Tyrannius Rufinus<sup>2</sup>

A friend and later enemy of Jerome, Tyrannius Rufinus of Concordia near Aquileia went to Egypt with Melania in 371, became a student of Didymus and lived as a monk in Jerusalem from ca. 378 onward. During his last years, which he spent in his homeland, he translated works of Origen, Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus into Latin.

<sup>1</sup> Hier. chron. a Abr.: separate edition: I. KNIGHT FOTHERINGHAM, Londinii 1923; P. NAUTIN, La liste des œuvres de Jérôme dans le De viris illustribus, Orpheus n.s. 5, 1984, 319–334; cf. also our chapter on Jerome (below, pp. 1646–1662).

<sup>2</sup> Editions: PL 21; PG 17, 615–632 (defence of his translation of Origen);

Chromatius, Bishop of Aquileia, inspired him to translate Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History. Especially the documents cited by Eusebius fell victim to his cuts. He added two books which embrace the history of the years 324–395. The genre is an innovation in Roman literature.

In addition to Eusebius, Rufinus relies on his own memory and on some Church Fathers of the 4th century. Language and style are plain and devoid of rhetoric. With respect to critical ability, Rufinus is inferior to Eusebius.

Sulpicius Severus<sup>1</sup>

Sulpicius Severus (ca. 363–400), a member of Gaul's educated nobility, studied at Bordeaux and was a friend of Paulinus of Nola. As an ascetic Christian, he emulated Martin of Tours whom he also glorified literarily.

The two books of his Chronicle cover the period from creation to A.D. 400. Here he concentrates essentially on biblical material and on ecclesiastical history. A man of wide reading, Sulpicius placed great value on documents; he drew mainly from Eusebius, but also from pagan historians (e.g. Tacitus). Schooled on Sallust among others, his style is correct but does not achieve Jerome's elegance. Of special value is the information on his own time which he provides us.

---

M. SIMONETTI, Turnholti 1961 (= CC 20; with bibl.); K. ZELZER, Wien 1986 (Basili Regula a Rufino Latine versa = CSEL 86).

<sup>1</sup> Edition: C. HALM, CSEL 1, Vindobonae 1866; B. M. PEEBLES (Tr, sel.), Washington 1970; Mart.: J. FONTAINE (TTrC), 3 vols., Paris 1967–1969; A. A. R. BASTIAENSEN, J. W. SMIT (TC), Verona 1975; J. BERNAYS, Über die Chronik des Sulpicius Severus, Berlin 1861; P. HYLÉN, Studien zu Sulpicius Severus, diss. Lund 1940 (esp. on language and style); S. PRETE, I Chronica di Sulpicio Severo, Roma 1955; G. K. VAN ANDEL, The Christian Concept of History in the Chronicle of Sulpicius Severus, Amsterdam 1976; F. MURRU, La concezione della storia nei Chronica di Sulpicio Severo: alcune linee di studio, Latomus 38, 1979, 961–981; S. COSTANZA, I Chronica di Sulpicio Severo e le Historiae di Trogo-Giustino, in: La storiografia ecclesiastica nella tarda antichità. Atti del convegno tenuto in Erice (1978), Messina 1980, 275–312; F. GHIZZONI, Sulpicio Severo, Roma 1983; C. STANCLIFFE, St. Martin and His Hagiographer, Oxford 1983; R. KLEIN, Die Praefatio der Martinsvita des Sulpicius Severus. Form, Inhalt und überzeitliche Bedeutung, AU 31, 4, 1988, 5–32; on Sulpicius Severus, see also p. 472–473 and p. 1288–1289.

Augustine

Augustine is assigned a key position among those who have contributed to an understanding of Roman history. He is treated in detail below.<sup>1</sup>

Orosius<sup>2</sup>

Life and Dates. Orosius (the first name Paulus is not certain) probably came from Bracara in Portugal but also felt at home in Tarraco (hist. 7: 22. 8). After a thorough education in rhetoric and theology, he left his homeland and traveled to Africa, where he introduced himself to Augustine, who sent him to Jerome in Bethlehem (Aug. epist. 166. 2). There he sided with Augustine in the Pelagian controversy. By 418 at the latest Orosius had completed his historical work, which had been inspired by Augustine (hist. 1 prol. 1–8; 7. 43. 20).

<sup>1</sup> Some of his main ideas on Roman history: 1) Roman history is not merely replete with moral exempla. 2) There occurred just as many great catastrophes in the past as in the present. 3) The fall of Rome is a symptom of the sinful nature of man and has nothing to do with the virtues or vices of the Romans, who are no better or worse than any other peoples. 4) The Roman Empire was not a requisite for salvation but a transient phenomenon; on Augustine, see below pp. 1664–1708.

<sup>2</sup> Editions: apol.: G. SCHEPSS, CSEL 18, Vindobonae 1889; apol.; hist.: C. ZANGE-MEISTER, CSEL 5, Vindobonae 1882 (ed. major), repr. 1966; Lipsiae 1889 (ed. minor); comm.: K.-D. DAUR, CC 49, Turnholti 1985, 133–163; hist.: A. LIPPOLD (TC), A. BARTALUCCI, G. CHIARINI (Tr), 2 vols., Firenze 1976; R. J. DEFERRARI (Tr), Washington 1964; A. LIPPOLD-(TrN), with an introd. by C. ANDRESEN, 2 vols., Zürich 1985–1986; M.-P. ARNAUD-LINDET (TTr), 3 vols., Paris 1990–1991; bibl.: J. SVENNING, Orosiana. Syntaktische, semasiographische und kritische Studien zu Orosius, Uppsala 1922; F. WOTKE, Orosius, RE 18, 1, Stuttgart 1939, 1185–1195; H. HAGENDAHL, Orosius und Iustinus, Göteborg 1941; A. LIPPOLD, Rom und die Barbaren in der Beurteilung des Orosius, diss. Erlangen 1952; H. J. DIESNER, Orosius und Augustinus, AAntHung 11, 1963, 89–102; B. LACROIX, Orose et ses idées, Montréal 1965; T. E. MOMMSEN, Aponius and Orosius on the Significance of the Epiphany, in: E. RICE, ed., Medieval and Renaissance Studies, New York 1966, 299–324; F. PASCHOUD, Roma aeterna, Neuchâtel 1967; E. CORSINI, Introduzione alle Storie di Orosio, Torino 1968; S. KARRER, Der gallische Krieg bei Orosius, Zürich 1969; A. LIPPOLD, Orosius, christlicher Apologet und römischer Bürger, Philologus 113, 1969, 92–105; W. SUERBAUM, Vom antiken zum frühmittelalterlichen Staatsbegriff, Münster, 3rd ed., 1977; T. M. GREEN, Zosimus, Orosius and their Tradition. Comparative Studies in Pagan and Christian Historiography, New York 1974; F. FABRINI, Paolo Orosio—uno storico, Roma 1979; H. W. GOETZ, Die Geschichtstheologie des Orosius, Darmstadt 1980; Y. JANVIER, La géographie d'Orose, Paris 1982; D. KOCH-PETERS, Ansichten des Orosius zur Geschichte seiner Zeit, Frankfurt 1984; A. MARCHETTA, Orosio e Ataulfo nell'ideologia dei rapporti romano-barbarici, Roma 1987; P. A. ONICA, Orosius, diss. Toronto 1987; R. AMPIO, La concezione orosiana della storia, attraverso le metafore del fuoco e del sangue, CCC 9, 1988, 217–236.

Survey of Works

1. Commonitorium de errore Priscillianistarum et Origenistarum. Composed for Augustine.

2. Liber apologeticus contra Pelagianos. In his anti-Pelagian polemics Orosius even went so far as to state that even with God's help a man cannot be without sin (apol. 7. 2) and subsequently had to justify himself to the pope; he took refuge to alleged mistakes in translation and hearing.

3. Of special interest to us are the Historiarum adversum paganos libri VII. They were finished in 417 (7. 43. 19; cf. 7. 41. 2).

The 1st book extends from the creation of the world to the founding of Rome, the 2nd to the sack of the city by the Gauls, the 3rd to around 280 B.C., the 4th treats the wars against Pyrrhus and Carthage. The 5th book covers the period from the destruction of Corinth (146) to the Slave War (73–71 B.C.), the 6th extends to roughly the turn of the era and the 7th to A.D. 417. Orosius presents Greek and Roman history in parallel.

Sources. At the beginning of the 3rd century, Sextus Iulius Africanus was the first writer to produce Chronographies which synchronized Old Testament and profane history. Hippolytus of Rome (d. 235) depended on him as a source. Eusebius' Χρονικοί κανόνες, which were translated and expanded by Jerome, are a standard work that builds upon the chronographic model. Augustine and Orosius used Jerome as a basic source for their works. Orosius, who appears not to have consulted Sulpicius Severus, places the founding of Rome (following Cato) in 752 B.C. He might have used a handbook for his geographical introduction.

The sources which he names, are mostly quoted at second hand, e.g. Palaiphatus and Phanocles.<sup>1</sup> We still possess most of his immediate sources: Florus, Eutropius, Justin and the Periochae to Livy. Orosius is a valuable historical witness for Livy's account of the period from 146 B.C. up to the first civil war and later for several passages in Tacitus' Histories, but especially for the time after 378.

Moreover, Orosius knew Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars; he made excerpts from Caesar's Commentarii (Orosius 6. 7–11) but took them for a work of Suetonius (as did Apollinaris Sidonius epist. 9. 14. 7). Occasionally he used the Histories of Tacitus; however, he was not familiar with Sallust's Histories. Naturally he also availed himself of Rufinus' translation of Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History. In addition to narrative sources, Orosius might have taken advantage of chronological<sup>1</sup> ones as well. He is rather careful in his use of sources.

<sup>1</sup> In one instance, he unmasks himself by referring to Valerius et Antias (hist. 5. 3. 3), as if he had said 'William and Shakespeare'.

Literary Technique. As a rhetor, Orosius intends to prove that the sufferings of mankind in the past were just as great as they are in the present (hist. 1, prol. 13–14). His account of world history serves this purpose. Orosius satisfied the demand for clarity of narratio by a perspicuous arrangement of his material. Within the books, at the conclusions of larger units, he inserts his own reflective commentaries which, as pauses, underscore the overall structure.

Language and Style. For its dry style, his geographical overview of the world (hist. 1. 2. 1–106) differs from the rest of the text. With the exception of the geographical introduction, his diction is refined, rich in aphorisms and antitheses, affected and even difficult. He strives for empathy and intensity (hist. 3: praef. 3 vim rerum, non imaginem, 'the significance of events, not their appearance').

Ideas. In contrast to Augustine, Orosius limits himself to secular history. The prophecies in the Book of Daniel (2. 31–45) provide the basis for a Christian interpretation of world history. They had been interpreted in terms of four empires:<sup>2</sup> the first had usually been identified with the Assyrian and the fourth with the Roman empire (cf. also Aug. civ. 20. 23; 18. 2). For Orosius the two middle empires were the Macedonian and the Carthaginian (hist. 2. 1. 4–6; cf. 7. 2. 1–7). In addition to this division into four empires, there was another one into six or seven periods of life (cf. Aug. civ. 22. 30); Orosius appears to ignore these. He also tries to discard revelation and to start from a philosophical belief in Providence (7. 1. 1), a feature that might reflect the fact that he was writing for the public.

While Augustine is also aware of the weaknesses of Christian empire and declared justice, not success, the main criterion (Aug. civ. 5. 24), Orosius glorifies the present (e.g., hist. 7. 35. 6) and believes that Roman history changed for the better since the rise of Christianity (7. 5. 3–4). He wants to incorporate the Germanic peoples into the Christian civilization of the Roman empire (7. 41. 7–9) and he is on the whole more optimistic than Augustine.<sup>1</sup> He expresses his Roman pride by remarking that God did not simply want to become Man but a civis Romanus as well, and that Octavian and his pax Augusta had been predestined to make ready the way for God's incarnation (hist. 6. 22. 5–8).<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A. LIPPOLD, Die Darstellung des ersten punischen Krieges in den Historiarum adversum paganos libri VII des Orosius, RhM n.s. 97, 1954, 254–286, esp. 261.

<sup>2</sup> On the theory of the four world empires: H.-W. GOETZ, Die Geschichtstheologie des Orosius, Darmstadt 1980, 71–79.

Transmission. The tradition is a rich one; the oldest of almost 200 manuscripts, the Codex Laurentianus pl. 65. 1, is from the 6th century.<sup>3</sup>

Influence. The chorography<sup>4</sup> of Orosius was used by the so-called Aethicus and by Isidore (d. 636). Clearly outlined and readable, the work was widely disseminated in the Middle Ages; Orosius' influence can be observed particularly in the Chronicon of Otto of Freising (d. 1158). In the 9th century King Alfred composed an abridged Anglo-Saxon translation with geographical supplements. Orosius was also translated into Arabic. This widely-read author's belief in a Roman empire, the survival of which would be ensured by Christianity, evoked the medieval idea of a translatio imperii.<sup>5</sup> The first edition appeared in Augsburg in 1471; there followed 24 editions up to the end of the seventeenth century.

The authority of Orosius lost ground as late as in the Age of Enlightenment when the doctrine of four world empires was abandoned once and for all.

The Historia Augusta<sup>6</sup>

Dates. Historia Augusta has been the title of a collection of thirty biographies of emperors from Hadrian to Numerianus (117–285) since

<sup>1</sup> The differences between Orosius and Augustine (and the former's closeness to Eusebius and Jerome) are strongly emphasized by P. A. ONICA, Orosius, diss. Toronto 1987; cf. DA 48, 11, 1988, 2864 A–2865 A.

<sup>2</sup> K. SCHÖNDÖRF, Von der augusteischen zur christlichen Romideologie, Anregung 28, 1982, 305–311.

<sup>3</sup> D. J. A. ROSS, Illuminated Manuscripts of Orosius, Scriptorium 9, 1955, 35–56; A. D. VON BRINCKEN, Studien zur lateinischen Weltchronistik bis in das Zeitalter Ottos von Freising, Düsseldorf 1957; J. M. BATELEY, D. J. A. ROSS, A Check List of Manuscripts of Orosius, Hist. adv. pag. libri VII, Scriptorium 15, 1961, 329–334.

<sup>4</sup> Chorography: description of places and regions (on a larger scale than topography, but on a smaller scale than geography).

<sup>5</sup> D. KOCH-PETERS 1984 (quoted above p. 1384, n. 2), 223.

<sup>6</sup> Editions: B. ACCURSIUS, Mediolani 1475; D. ERASMUS, Basileae 1518; I. CASAUBONUS, Paris 1603; D. MAGIE (TT), 3 vols., London 1922–1932, repr. 1954; E. HOHL, vol. 1,

Isaac Casaubonus, who published it separately in 1603. The emperors of the period 244–253 are missing; perhaps there is another loss of text at the beginning, provided that the work had been conceived as a continuation of Suetonius.

1927 (2nd ed. 1965), vol. 2, 1927, with add. by W. SEYFARTH and C. SAMBERGER, Lipsiae 1965; A. BIRLEY (Tr of parts), Harmondsworth 1976; E. HOHL, E. MERTEN, A. RÖSGER (TrN), with an introduction by J. STRAUB, vol. 1, Zürich 1976, vol. 2, 1985; H. W. BENARIO (Vita Hadriani: C), Chico 1980; P. SOVERINI (TTrN), Torino 1983; A. LIPPOLD (Vita Maximini: C), Bonn 1991; J.-P. CALLU, A. GADEN, O. DESBORDES (Vita Hadriani, Vita Aelii, Vita Antonini: TTr), Paris 1992; R. TURCAN (Vita Opilii Macrini, Vita Diadumeni, Vita Heliogabali: TTr), Paris 1993; lexicon: C. LESSING, Lipsiae 1901–1906; bibl.: A. F. BELLEZZA, La letteratura degli Scriptores Historiae Augustae oggi, AALig 41, 1984 (1986), 253–273 (with an appendix by P. SOVERINI on some linguistic problems of the Historia Augusta 273–275); E. W. MERTEN, Stellenbibliographie zur Hist. Aug., 4 vols., Antiquitas 4, 2, 1–4, Bonn 1985–1987; A. SCHEITHAUER 1987, esp. 13–18; 211–224; cf. the Bonn Colloquia on the Historia Augusta (ed. by J. STRAUB in the series Antiquitas, Bonn, from 1963 onward).

J. A. STRAUB, Heidnische Geschichtsapologetik in der christlichen Spätantike. Untersuchungen über Zeit und Tendenz der Historia Augusta, Bonn 1963; P. WHITE, The Authorship of the Historia Augusta, JRS 57, 1967, 115–133; R. SYME, Ammianus and the Historia Augusta, Oxford 1968; G. KERLER, Die Außenpolitik in der Historia Augusta, Bonn 1970; H. W. BIRD, Suetonian Influence in the Later Lives of the Historia Augusta, Hermes 99, 1971, 12–134; R. SYME, Emperors and Biography. Studies in the Historia Augusta, Oxford 1971; R. SYME, The Historia Augusta. A Call of Clarity, Bonn 1971; F. KOLB, Literarische Beziehungen zwischen Cassius Dio, Herodian und der Historia Augusta, Bonn 1972; R. SYME, The Composition of the Historia Augusta. Recent Theories, JRS 62, 1972, 123–133; B. MOUCHOVÁ, Untersuchungen über die Scriptores Historiae Augustae, Praha 1975 (1978); K.-P. JOHNE, Kaiserbiographie und Senatsaristokratie. Untersuchungen zur Datierung und sozialen Herkunft der Historia Augusta, Berlin 1976; J. BURIAN, Fides historica als methodologischer Grundsatz der Historia Augusta, Klio 59, 1977, 285–298; I. HAHN, Das 'goldene Jahrhundert' des Aurelius Probus, Klio 59, 1977, 223–236; H. SZELEST, Die Historia Augusta und die frühere römische Geschichte, Eos 65, 1977, 139–150; T. D. BARNES, The Sources of the Historia Augusta, Bruxelles 1978; R. SYME, Propaganda in the Historia Augusta, Latomus 37, 1978, 173–192; A. F. BELLEZZA, Prospettive del testo della Historia Augusta, Brescia 1979; I. MARRIOT, The Authorship of the Historia Augusta. Two Computer Studies, JRS 69, 1979, 65–77; B. BALDWIN, Tacitus, the Panegyrici Latini, and the Historia Augusta, Eranos 78, 1980, 175–178; D. DEN HENGST, The Prefaces in the Historia Augusta, diss. Amsterdam 1981; K.-H. STUBENRAUCH, Kompositionsprobleme der Historia Augusta. Einleitungen, der verlorene Anfang, diss. Göttingen 1982; R. SYME, Historia Augusta Papers, Oxford 1983; H. SZELEST, Die Historia Augusta und die frühere antike Literatur, Eos 71, 1983, 35–42; K.-P. JOHNE, Zum Geschichtsbild der Historia Augusta, Klio 66, 1984, 631–640 (bibl.); G. MARASCO, Ricerche sulla Historia Augusta, Prometheus 12, 1986, 159–181; J. BURIAN, Die Darstellung der Markomannenkriege in den Scriptores Historiae Augustae (Vita Marci) und ihre Glaubwürdigkeit, LF 110, 1986, 114–118; T. HONORÉ, Scriptor Historiae Augustae, JRS 77, 1987, 156–176; F. KOLB, Untersuchungen zur Historia Augusta, Bonn 1987; A. SCHEITHAUER, Kaiserbild und literarisches Programm. Untersuchungen zur Tendenz der Historia Augusta, Frankfurt 1987; A. SCHEITHAUER, Die Bautätigkeit

Our tradition names the following alleged authors: Aelius Spartianus, Iulius Capitolinus, Vulcanius Gallicanus, Aelius Lampridius, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus. Diocletian is addressed in seven biographies, Constantine in six; others are directed to private persons. Today the work is normally assumed to be a forgery of a single author from a later time. Some scholars think of the epoch of Julian,<sup>1</sup> others prefer the turn of the 4th to the 5th century,<sup>2</sup> still others the period between 405 and 525. A late time of composition would explain the forgery: under Christian emperors it was no longer possible to circulate pagan propaganda directly and openly but only in the form of literary retrospection (this view is adopted here).

Sources.<sup>3</sup> As far as genre is concerned the author considers himself a successor to Suetonius (Maxim. et Balb. 4. 5; Prob. 2. 7). Scholars established six main sources: the first, which is not known by name, stretches to 217. Marius Maximus provides colorful details on Macrinus and serves as a main source in the Life of Heliogabalus; Herodian is the most important authority for the year 238 (and earlier); his information was supplemented out of the work of Dexippus, which served as a source for the subsequent years up to 270. The 'History of the Emperors' is used for the period after 260 as it had been for the framework of the Life of Alexander; use of Eunapius is attested for the period after 270. These were joined by Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and perhaps Festus and Ammianus as well. Word of autobiographies of Hadrian and of Septimius Severus, as well as of works by Aelius Cordus and Phlegon, has piqued scholars' curiosity. Unfortunately, some cited documents and sources—primarily in the vitae of lesser known emperors—have simply been fabricated so that the reader is left with an irritating conglomeration of valuable information and outright lies.

Literary Technique. In its literary technique, the Historia Augusta follows Suetonius only in principle (cf. above), as the composition of

---

der Kaiser in der Historia Augusta, WJA 14, 1988, 225–240; D. BAHARAL, Portraits of the Emperor L. Septimius Severus, Latomus 48, 1989, 566–580; J. B. LEANING, Didius Julianus and His Biographers, Latomus 48, 1989, 548–565; C. BERTRAND-DAGENBACH, Alexandre Sévère et l'Histoire Auguste, Bruxelles 1990; E. WALLINGER, Die Frauen in der Historia Augusta, Wien 1990; W. J. CHERF, The Thermopylae Garrison of Vita Claudii 16, CPh 88, 1993, 230–236.

<sup>1</sup> N. H. BAYNES, The Historia Augusta. Its Date and Purpose, Oxford 1926.

<sup>2</sup> Thus resolutely ('at the latest') D. FLACH, Einführung in die römische Geschichtsschreibung, Darmstadt 1985, 278.

<sup>3</sup> T. D. BARNES, The Sources of the Historia Augusta, Bruxelles 1978.

the Life of Pius demonstrates. Unlike those of Suetonius, most of these biographies are structured neither chronologically nor systematically (per species). Where information is insufficient, it is helped along by anecdotes, accounts of miracles and novellistic elements. Although the author professes to reject irrelevant and unseemly gossip (cf. Aur. 3. 1; 6. 6; Heliog. 18. 4), there is ample proof to the contrary. His claim to strive for truthfulness and historical accuracy (Trig. tyr. 1. 2; 11. 6–7) is hard to swallow; though elsewhere he is modest enough to appeal honestly to curiositas (Aur. 10. 1). The work aims to entertain as well as instruct.

Language and Style.<sup>1</sup> There are little stylistic differences among the individual ‘authors’; ‘Flavius Vopiscus’ and ‘Trebellius Pollio’ stand out for their strong rhetorical coloring. The question of whether the differences are big enough to refute the ‘unitarian’ theory should be taken up again.

Ideas. The author’s senatorial bias does not admit any conclusions concerning his own social position. An apologetics of pagan history has been observed in the work; the tolerance that prevailed under the good emperors is praised—presumably in order to draw the attention of Christian emperors to their own intolerance.

Transmission.<sup>2</sup> All our tradition goes back to the Vaticanus Palatinus 899 (9th century) in two branches.

Influence. The Historia Augusta continued to find readers well into the Middle Ages.<sup>3</sup>

BARDON, Litt. lat. inc., vol. 2, 270–277; 291–293. * H. W. BIRD, Sextus Aurelius Victor. A Historiographical Study, Liverpool 1984 (also on Eutropius and on the Historia Augusta). * R. BROWNING, CHLL 732–754 (fundamental). * A. CHASTAGNOL, Emprunts de l’Histoire Auguste aux Caesares d’Aurelius Victor, RPh 41, 1967, 85–97. * W. DEN BOER, Rome à travers trois auteurs du quatrième siècle, Mnemosyne 4, 21, 1968, 254–282 (on Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and Festus). * W. DEN BOER, Some Minor Roman Historians, Leiden 1972 (on Florus, Aurelius Victor I and II, Eutropius, and Festus). * D. FLACH, Einführung in die römische Geschichtsschreibung, Darmstadt 1985, 257–311. * W. HARTKE, De saeculi quarti exeuntis historiarum

<sup>1</sup> J. N. ADAMS, The Linguistic Unity of the Historia Augusta, Antichthon 11, 1977, 93–102.

<sup>2</sup> On the settlement of the text H. L. ZERNIAL, Akzentklausel und Textkritik in der Historia Augusta, Bonn 1986.

<sup>3</sup> C. BERTRAND, L’Histoire Auguste et son influence sur quelques auteurs au moyen âge, Liège 1982.

scriptoribus quaestiones, Lipsiae 1932. * F. HEINZBERGER, Heidnische und christliche Reaktionen auf die Krisen des weströmischen Reiches in den Jahren 395–410 n. Chr., diss. Bonn 1976. * M. HOSE, Erneuerung der Vergangenheit. Die Historiker im Imperium Romanum von Florus bis Cassius Dio, Stuttgart 1994. * E. MALCOVATI, I breviari del IV secolo, Ann. Univ. Cagliari 12, 1942. * A. MOMIGLIANO, Pagan and Christian Historiography in the Fourth Century A.D., in: id., ed., The Conflict between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1963, 77–99. * J. SCHLUMBERGER, Die Epitome de Caesaribus. Untersuchungen zur heidnischen Geschichtsschreibung des 4. Jh. n. Chr., München 1974 (also on Eutropius and on the Historia Augusta). * S. WILLIAMS, Diocletian and the Roman Recovery, London 1985.

SUETONIUS

Life and Dates

Born probably in Hippo Regius<sup>1</sup> (North Africa) around 70, C. Suetonius Tranquillus came from an equestrian family. Thus socially and geographically he belonged to two promising groups. He dedicated his work to the Prefect of the City, C. Septicius Clarus (Lydus de magistr. 2. 6), whom the illustrious Pliny had also honored by a dedication. The author of Letters and of the Panegyricus took Suetonius under his wing as a 'pupil',<sup>2</sup> encouraged him to publish a composition (epist. 5. 10) and secured for him under Trajan the ius trium liberorum (epist. 10. 94–95; around 112). Suetonius held the offices a studiis, a bibliothecis, and ab epistulis. In 122<sup>3</sup> he lost this position, for after the death of Plotina Hadrian dismissed many of Trajan's old supporters, to include Septicius Clarus (Hist. Aug. Hadr. 11. 3). Our author seems to have been still active literarily around 130,<sup>4</sup> although the credibility of the evidence for that claim should not be overestimated.<sup>5</sup> Fronto mentions a Tranquillus (ad Ver. 1. 13, p. 117 V.D.H.) and Suetonius Tranquillus (ad am. 1. 13, p. 179 V.D.H.).

<sup>1</sup> Inscription: Année Epigraphique 1953, 27–28 (no. 73); G. B. TOWNEND, The Hippo Inscription and the Career of Suetonius, Historia 10, 1961, 99–109.

<sup>2</sup> Epist. 1. 24. 1; cf. 10. 94. 1; contubernalis (milit. 'messmate') signifies a pupil living under the same roof with his master.

<sup>3</sup> Thus (not 121) SYME, Tacitus 2, 779; further bibl. in U. Lambrecht 1984, 23, n. 75; cf. R. SYME 1980, 113–114 (against the year 128).

<sup>4</sup> Tit. 10. 2; s. also SYME, Tacitus 780.

<sup>5</sup> Now s. B. BALDWIN 1983, 46.

Survey of Works

The surviving De vita XII Caesarum libri VIII embraces the biographies of the twelve Caesars from Julius Caesar to Domitian. On the basis of a dedication to C. Septicius Clarus as Prefect of the City, books 1–2 (and perhaps 1–6, too, up to and including Nero) might have appeared before 122. Books 7 (Galba, Otho, Vitellius) and 8 (the Flavians) could have been added later; however, the opposite view is held as well.<sup>1</sup> It is in any case questionable whether differences in vocabulary and documentation offer sufficient grounds for assigning different dates to the first two and the later Lives.

The De viris illustribus<sup>2</sup> originally included profiles of poets, orators, historiographers, grammarians, and rhetors. The Lives of grammarians and the beginning of the Lives of the rhetors have survived; the vitae of the poets are still partly preserved in the textual tradition of the respective authors (Terence, Horace, Persius); a Suetonian origin of the vitae of Virgil, Tibullus, and Lucan is disputed. The De viris illustribus perhaps appeared before the Lives of the Caesars.<sup>3</sup>

Numerous works (mostly on history or cultural history) have been lost; the Suda has transmitted a whole series of titles<sup>4</sup> to which we should add the following: De regibus, De institutione officiorum, Περὶ ἐπισήμων πορνῶν, De rerum naturis, De animantium naturis, De vitis corporalibus, De rebus variis. Many of these books might have been portions of the collection Prata.<sup>5</sup> The large scope of Suetonius' literary production and the titles of his writings reveal a polymath. It is important to keep that fact in mind in order to understand his idiosyncrasies as an author.

<sup>1</sup> For the earlier composition of the six later Lives of the Caesars: G. W. BOWERSOCK, Suetonius and Trajan, in: Hommages à M. RENARD (Coll. Latomus 101) 1, 119–125; opposed: K. R. BRADLEY, The Composition of Suetonius' Caesares Again, JIES 1, 1973, 257–263.

<sup>2</sup> On the De viris illustribus: B. BALDWIN 1983, 379–466; A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 50–72.

<sup>3</sup> A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983.

<sup>4</sup> Suda 4. 581, 19–27 ADLER, s.v. Τράγκυλλος· Περὶ τῶν παρ' Ἑλλήσι παιδιῶν βιβλίον α', Περὶ τῶν παρὰ Ῥωμαίοις θεωριῶν καὶ ἀγῶνων βιβλία β', Περὶ τοῦ κατὰ Ῥωμαίους ἐνιαυτοῦ α', Περὶ τῶν ἐν τοῖς βιβλίοις σημείων α', Περὶ τῆς Κικέρωνος πολιτείας α', Περὶ ὀνομάτων κυρίων καὶ ἰδέας ἐσθημάτων καὶ ὑποδημάτων καὶ τῶν ἄλλων οἷς τις ἀμφιέννυται, Περὶ δυσφήμων λέξεων ἦτοι βλασφημιῶν καὶ πόθεν ἐκάστη, Περὶ Ῥώμης καὶ τῶν ἐν αὐτῇ νομίμων καὶ ἠθῶν βιβλία β', Συγγενικὸν Καισάρων . . . βιβλία η', Στέμμα Ῥωμαίων ἀνδρῶν ἐπισήμων.

<sup>5</sup> On the lost works: F. DELLA CORTE, 2nd ed. 1967, 233–245; A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 43–49; P. L. SCHMIDT, Suetonius Pratum, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3794–3825.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Suetonius has studied the Fasti, the Acta senatus and the Acta diurna populi Romani. In Cal. 8. 5 he convincingly plays off the Acta against literary sources. He has consulted the Res gestae of Augustus without slavishly relying on it. He brings in numerous letters of Augustus<sup>1</sup> and some writings and speeches of Tiberius (Tib. 28; 29; 32. 2; 67. 1; 67. 3-4). There have been different explanations for the decrease of epistolary documentation in the later Vitae. Surely Suetonius' fondness for Augustus played a role. Other possible reasons include haste and an attempt to move Hadrian to leniency through speedy publication. It has also been suggested that the later Vitae contain no imperial letters because Suetonius no longer (or: not yet) held his position at the palace and hence had no access to the archives.<sup>2</sup> Since, however, literary documentation also slackens in the later Lives of the Caesars and a systematic study of records cannot be proven anyway, we should not draw any hasty conclusions from the text.

Suetonius cites by name Tanusius Geminus (Iul. 9. 2), C. Oppius (Iul. 53), Pliny the Elder, Lentulus Gaetulicus (Cal. 8. 1-3), Q. Elogius (Vit. 1. 2), and Cassius Severus (Tit. 2. 1), the writings of the emperors themselves and Seneca the Elder (Tib. 73). It is certain that he used historians, whose works were widely read in his time, such as Cluvius Rufus, Pliny the Elder, and Fabius Rusticus. Twice he mentions Cremutius Cordus (Aug. 35. 2; Cal. 16. 1). Suetonius probably owes some Greek quotations to a certain Tiberius Claudius Balbillus.<sup>3</sup> In any case we should take seriously the wide readings of our author.

Suetonius' relationship to Tacitus and Plutarch is unclear. Perhaps he had heard segments out of Tacitus' Annals in the circle of Septicius,<sup>4</sup> but common sources could account for similarities. In the Lives of the Caesars, Suetonius differs from Plutarch with striking frequency.<sup>5</sup> Here also the reasons are still open to argument.

For his Viri illustres Suetonius used Varro (but not only De poetis), Nepos, Santra, Hyginus, Fenestella, Asconius Pedianus, and possibly <sup>1</sup> E.g., Aug. 71. 2-4; 86; 87. 1-3; Tib. 21. 2-7; Cal. 8. 4; Claud. 4; B. BALDWIN 1983, 134-139, doubts direct consultation by Suetonius.

<sup>2</sup> G. B. TOWNEND 1967, 87-91; criticized by L. DE CONINCK 1983.

<sup>3</sup> G. B. TOWNEND, The Sources of the Greek in Suetonius, Hermes 88, 1960, 98-120, esp. 115-119.

<sup>4</sup> E. CIZEK 1977, 46, n. 80.

<sup>5</sup> B. BALDWIN 1983; A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 69-71.

the Musae of Opilius (-illus) as well. Moreover, he included letters of Augustus, Maecenas, Messalla Corvinus, Cicero, Ateius Philologus, the writings of the authors under discussion, senatorial and censorial decrees, inscriptions, and personal remembrances. Suetonius' scholarship, therefore, is founded on extensive research; it is regrettable that many of his writings are lost.

There was no distinct genre of biography. Generally it is difficult to make a distinction<sup>1</sup> between encomium and biography; in Suetonius, however, encomiastic elements are less prominent. Of his forerunners' works Nepos' Life of Epaminondas comes closest to the Suetonian pattern. F. Leo<sup>2</sup> tried to distinguish two forms of biography: the 'peripatetic', which proceeded chronologically, was artistically designed and treated public figures, and the 'Alexandrian', which proceeded by categories, was scholarly in nature and dealt with literary personalities. It would have been Suetonius, then, who brought the latter form to bear upon political personalities. However, we do have vitae of poets written in a highly literary style, and, on the other hand, it is hard to deny that before Suetonius there had been political biographies that were not mere eulogies. For example, the Peripatetic and contemporary of Theophrastus, Phaenias of Eresus (around 336 B.C.) wrote biographies of poets, philosophers and even Sicilian tyrants. These lives do not appear to have been panegyrics.<sup>3</sup>

The question of Suetonius' originality as creator of a genre cannot be addressed without considering the parallel problem in Nepos. The amount of lost material and the mediocre talent of the authors in question call for caution.

Be that as it may, the categories by which Suetonius proceeds are entirely in keeping with Roman thought:<sup>4</sup> lineage, family, birth, education, toga virilis, beginning of a political career, campaigns, private life, prodigies, death, and testament. Suetonius worked essentially from

<sup>1</sup> W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963, 129-132; on encomiastic and biographical elements in the oldest Christian biographer Pontius: BERSCHIN, Biogr. 1, 64.

<sup>2</sup> LEO, Biogr. 139-144.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also BATON, Περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἑφέσῳ τυράννων; D. R. STUART, Epochs of Greek and Roman Biography, Berkeley 1928, 132-134; R. LAQUEUR, Phaenias, RE 19, 2, 1938, 1565-1591; W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963, 140-151; reserved: A. MOMIGLIANO, The Development of Greek Biography, Cambridge, Mass. 1971, 78; negative: J. GEIGER (quoted in our chapter on Nepos).

<sup>4</sup> W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963, 108-125; they were prefigured in collections of memorabilia, Roman tituli and elogia, Varro's Imagines, and perhaps biographies of Roman officials; see below, p. 1395, note 3.

facts that were accessible to him. Arrangement follows different principles of biographical and Roman historiographical tradition including chains of good and bad exempla. The result is a typically Roman form of biography.

Literary Technique

Suetonius presents historical material in a non-historical style. The biographer's literary intention is totally distinct from that of Tacitus, for example. The Lives of the Caesars differ from historiography<sup>1</sup> in structure, subject, and style.

Our author was presumably a grammaticus, that is: a teacher of literature obliged to explain the facts mentioned in his texts; that would account for his avid attention to detail.

On closer inspection it appears that Suetonius in the Vitae organized his material carefully.<sup>2</sup>

His arrangement by subject generally resembles Augustus' Res gestae. A Roman tradition of schematic, strictly arranged biographies of public officials may also be surmised.<sup>3</sup> The Suetonian biography reviews in detail first the public then the private life of the emperor so that an overall view emerges. Structure varies with each individual Vita. Even the inevitable sequence—family, father, birth, early years—avoids falling into a repetitive scheme. Rubrics also—descent of the emperors, naming of their spouses, mention of portents—do not conform to a fixed pattern in the various biographies.<sup>4</sup>

In the Vita of Caesar the portrayal of his early years (before his autocracy) is especially lengthy, for it had taken Caesar a long time to achieve supremacy. A 'portrait' of the ruler is placed at the end of many biographies; part of the species is postponed until after the emperor's death.<sup>5</sup> In the case of Vitellius (17), the portrait of his outward appearance is woven into the report of his death.

The composition of the Vita of Titus is peculiar. An overall picture is presented at the beginning; there follow two antithetic portraits:

<sup>1</sup> A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 9–15; 122.

<sup>2</sup> G. LUCK, Über Suetons Divus Titus, RhM 107, 1964, 63–75; H. GUGEL 1970.

<sup>3</sup> On the prehistory of the Liber pontificalis (6th century): BERSCHIN, Biogr. 1, 270–277; 2, 115–138.

<sup>4</sup> B. MOUCHOVÁ 1968.

<sup>5</sup> Ner. 51–56; Cal. 21–22; Otho 12; Dom. 18–22.

that of his life before and that after his accession to the throne. While Suetonius normally discusses vices after virtues, here—corresponding to reality—he places a part with certain negative characteristics before an outright positive part.

In the Vita of Claudius both structure and appraisal are less clear than anywhere else. Such a structure fits—intentionally or not—the fickle character of Claudius (Claud. 15. 1).

Suetonius displays his art of composition in smaller rather than in larger units. At times he groups his material for dramatic effect,<sup>1</sup> for example, the account of Nero's last hours is gripping. He arranges his subject matter to serve its aim: a typically Roman principle of style.

Portents, reference to erotica, and ultima verba also form 'stock elements' in the biographies of the emperors.<sup>2</sup> Mention of ostenta, omina, and prodigia are in tune with the superstitions of the day (cf. Plin. epist. 1. 18), but their position within the text serves literary purposes: it helps to underscore certain chains of motifs such as Caesar's striving for kingship (Iul. 1. 3; 7. 2; 61), or his disregard for established ritual, which led to his death (Iul. 30. 3; 59; 77; 81; 4).

Suetonius is especially adept at citations, which in his texts act as thematic and interpretative markers;<sup>3</sup> examples are: Sulla's saying that in Caesar there are many Mariuses, and Caesar himself referring to his royal and divine origins (Suet. Iul. 1. 3; 6. 1), competing with Alexander (7. 1), and quoting his favorite line from the Phoenissae ('If there must be injustice, let it be for the sake of gaining the crown.' Iul. 30. 5; Eur. Phoen. 524–525; Cic. off. 3. 82). Likewise, in the Vita of Domitian there is a memorable utterance, which forebodes the fate of the emperor: Condicionem principum miserrimam aiebat, quibus de coniuratione comperta non crederetur nisi occisis, 'he used to say that the lot of princes was most unhappy, since when they discovered a conspiracy, no one believed them unless they had been killed'.

Leitmotifs and an artful 'weaving of the plot' have been found in the Vita of Caesar.<sup>4</sup> Similarly, in the Vita of Augustus each individual element has been shown to have a function in the development of

<sup>1</sup> B. MOUCHOVÁ 1968, 15 and 105–106.

<sup>2</sup> H. GUGEL 1977, 23–103.

<sup>3</sup> U. LAMBRECHT 1984, 37–43; W. MÜLLER 1972, 95–108.

<sup>4</sup> H. GUGEL 1970, esp. 22.

the plot.<sup>1</sup> Moreover, there is a principle of gradation at work, under which the facts fall into a specific order;<sup>2</sup> for example, Suetonius arranges bits of erotic information to form a climax.<sup>3</sup> The emperors' ultima verba bring the basic theme of a given biography to conclusion.<sup>4</sup> Scholars speak of a progressive darkening (noircissement progressif),<sup>5</sup> which by imperceptible degrees instills a particular opinion into the reader's mind.

An important problem, which still awaits research, is the relationship of different biographies to each other.<sup>6</sup> The Vita of Galba merges into that of Otho, and their author maintains the chronological sequence of historical events.

In such cases, Suetonius unites biography with a continuous historical narrative.<sup>7</sup> Life story and historiography had been combined as early as Tacitus' Agricola, albeit in a much more sophisticated literary form than in Suetonius. It was not mere chance that in the imperial period biography to a large extent replaced the writing of history. To be sure, Suetonius cannot be considered an historian in the ancient sense of the word, if only for the difference of scope between historiography and biography. Since Suetonius prefers thematic grouping of facts to dramatic and self-contained narrative,<sup>8</sup> his goals are in sharp contrast to those of ancient historiography.

Language and Style

Suetonius' style is not consistent.<sup>9</sup> The merits of several purple passages have been ascribed to his sources; but differences in style are based rather on differences in content (rubrics, or narrative, respectively). While ancient historiography—in addition to political and military subject matter and chronological sequence—also demands rhetorical stylization, Suetonius does not intend to create a work of

<sup>1</sup> R. HANSLIK 1954, 99–144.

<sup>2</sup> B. MOUCHOVÁ 1968, 43–47; 105; A. PENNACINI 1984.

<sup>3</sup> H. GUGEL 1977, 73–95, esp. 76.

<sup>4</sup> H. GUGEL 1977, 95–103.

<sup>5</sup> E. CIZEK, Sur la composition des Vitae Caesarum de Suétone, StudClas 3, 1961, 355–360, esp. 360.

<sup>6</sup> Hints in H. GUGEL 1977, 143; B. MOUCHOVÁ 1968, 65–77.

<sup>7</sup> H. GUGEL 1977, 144.

<sup>8</sup> B. MOUCHOVÁ 1968, 105.

<sup>9</sup> G. D'ANNA 1954, 179–190 compares Nero 9 and 35 (short sentences) with 47–49 (more sophisticated).

literary prose. Stylistically he approaches the technical writers. Suetonius is one of those authors who look for the proper word; he strives, not for rhetorical pomp but for Caesarean elegantia—without Caesar's purism, though. Suetonius' stylistic sympathies are with the classical period (Cicero and Augustus). He does not archaize; he cultivates the plain style of ancient scholars. Pliny calls him a scholasticus (epist. 1. 24. 4); Joannes Laurentius Lydus, a philologus (Lyd. de mag. 1. 34, p. 35 Wü.); the Suda (4. 581. 18 Adler), a grammaticus.<sup>1</sup> The Historia Augusta praises Suetonius for writing 'not so much eloquently as factually' (non tam diserte quam vere);<sup>2</sup> the source may be unreliable but the thought is right. Characteristic of Suetonius are some 'scholarly' features foreign to formal classical historiography, especially his use of technical terminology,<sup>3</sup> Greek vocabulary, and rather extensive literal quotations from documents.

A typical procedure of Suetonius is the divisio, an announcement of points to be discussed. Originating from rhetoric, this method was also employed by encomiasts. Unfortunately, in Suetonius it does not always achieve its goal of clarifying the organization of his text.<sup>4</sup>

Suetonius is no great stylist. He takes pains, however, to write clearly, concisely, and correctly. After a time the reader gets the impression of coolness and lack of color. On the other hand, in some passages, e.g. in his Iulius, the structure of Suetonius' sentences corresponds to the content down to the last detail.<sup>5</sup> His manner of writing is therefore not merely simple, slipshod notation.<sup>6</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Suetonius seldom comments on his literary intentions; if at all, he does so on the structure of individual biographies (e.g. Aug. 9; 61. 1). More information can be drawn from his remarks on style and on sociological aspects of literature.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. DELLA CORTE, 2nd ed. 1967, 29–30 cautions overestimation of these sources; still he proceeds from a notion of grammaticus that is too narrow.

<sup>2</sup> Script. hist. Aug. Prob. 2. 7.

<sup>3</sup> A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 20–21 with bibl.

<sup>4</sup> G. B. TOWNEND 1967, 84–87.

<sup>5</sup> W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963, 125–126; on Suetonius' vocabulary also B. Mouchová 1966, 55–63.

<sup>6</sup> LEO, Biogr. 134, thought this could be said of Alexandrian scholarly biography.

Archaism, which would become fashionable in the 2nd century, was not yet standard for Suetonius. As his praise of Caesar's style (Iul. 56. 2) and that of Augustus (Aug. 86) show,<sup>1</sup> his stylistic ideal is notus civilisque et proprius sermo, 'familiar, unassuming speech using proper words', without obscurity (obscuritas) and bold metaphors (audacia in translationibus: gramm. 10. 7). He can thus be numbered with Quintilian and Pliny among the representatives of classicism under the Flavians and Trajan.<sup>2</sup>

In that respect, therefore, he does not share the literary preferences of Hadrian, who is said to have ranged Cicero, Virgil, and Sallust lower than Cato, Ennius, and Coelius (Script. hist. Aug. Hadr. 16. 6). During the Flavian period Valerius Probus was a forerunner in this direction: early Latin authors, who had been supplanted by classical authors in Roman schools, were still being read in the provinces (e.g. Syria), a fact which did not escape Suetonius' quick eye (Suet. gramm. 24. 2); in keeping with the shift in economic power, however, provincial tastes began to reverberate on those of the capital.

In matters of stylistic detail Suetonius' judgment is more reliable than in matters of literary value: for him Augustus' diction was elegans, temperatum, 'elegant and moderate', and free of the extravagances of fashion; in his opinion Emperor Claudius wrote magis inepte quam ineleganter, 'lacking in tact rather than in style' (Claud. 41. 3);<sup>3</sup> in fact, there could hardly be a more accurate description of that emperor's style.<sup>4</sup> Suetonius offers good reasons for denying the authenticity of certain works ascribed to Horace (elegi vulgares, epistula etiam obscura, quo vitio minime tenebatur, 'the elegies are commonplace and the letter is besides obscure, which was by no means one of his faults': Vita Hor. 5). On the other hand, his approach to the Virgiliana—if he is indeed the author of the Vita—was less critical.<sup>5</sup> The choice of subjects in the De grammaticis et rhetoribus is at times arbitrary and the treatment is strikingly unbalanced: the great scholar Varro is missing, and his important teacher, Aelius Stilo, is all too scantily treated.

<sup>1</sup> F. DELLA CORTE, 2nd ed. 1967, 35–36.

<sup>2</sup> Classicism and strong central administration should not be too closely connected; 'Neronian Baroque' and the 'Antonine Archaism' also emerged under monarchs.

<sup>3</sup> I.e., he takes the trouble to write correct Latin, albeit a Latin not free of scholarly ἀκαρία.

<sup>4</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 136–159.

<sup>5</sup> For Suetonius' authorship H. NAUMANN 1985.

Yet, Suetonius' view of literary patronage is critical and sober (Vita Hor. 2–3). Was this a result of his negative experiences with Hadrian? Suetonius is well aware of the emperor's key-position even in the domain of literature. He tells us that Augustus fostered literature (cf. Aug. 89. 3 ingenia saeculi sui omnibus modis fovit, 'he gave every encouragement to the men of talent of his own age'), and Tiberius took interest in it (Tib. 70). Domitian, however, is portrayed as non-poetic—probably to make striking the contrast to the emperor's own self-image. On the other hand, Suetonius does not approve of Nero's philhellenism. In his disdain for Graeculi, he shows himself to be a typical Roman (e.g. Tib. 11. 1; 56) not bowing to Hadrian's philhellenism.

Ideas II

Suetonius regards mystery religions and schools of philosophy with the coolness of a Roman public official. He accepts that philosophers should be expelled from Rome, and he cannot bring himself to tolerate Christians. Nor does he have a high opinion of Epicureanism (gramm. 8. 1): he deems Pompilius Andronicus, indeed, a genuine Epicurean, too lazy to give instruction. If characteristics of an 'intellectual' are to be sought in Suetonius, first of all, the academic 'probabilism' of Carneades<sup>1</sup> comes to mind, an attitude the author found in his beloved Cicero and Pliny. As a biographer he sought, as it were, the probabile e vita. The antithesis of virtutes and vitia vaguely recalls the method of in utramque partem disserere, typical of Academic skepticism. If Suetonius had any principle at all, it was doubt; thus, under the guise of a subtle behaviorism, he developed a contemporary notion of the principate. Nevertheless we must remain cautious in approaching these questions. Suetonius is in the end too Roman to be identified with any philosophical school.

The feeling that everything is predestined was congenial with imperial mentality;<sup>2</sup> portents were taken seriously; astrology, interpretation of dreams, and physiognomy were considered sciences; so a Tiberius would despise religio but believe in astrology (19; 69; 72. 1–2). Whereas in the historians prodigies enhance the dramatic qualities of a report, in Suetonius they rather show that a disaster could be foreseen. The rise to imperial honor and to its forfeiture are credited to them.<sup>1</sup> Thus, portents interest Suetonius primarily not as aspects of Roman state religion but as foreshadowings of individual fate. However, the destiny of the emperor determined that of the state as a whole.

<sup>1</sup> E. CIZEK, 1977; esp. 178; 192; 196–197.

<sup>2</sup> A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 192–193 with bibl.

Suetonius' political attitude complements the usual senatorial outlook with that of an eques. For him 'good' rulers are those who hold senators and knights in esteem.<sup>2</sup> Showing Otho in a more favorable light than Tacitus does, Suetonius portrays him as a moderate Neronian, who wanted to reconcile all social classes and supported the equites. Tacitus sided with the senate, Suetonius with the knights.

Vespasian fostered both orders (9. 2), and Titus also shared the same sentiment. Our author is relatively well-disposed to Claudius, another patron of the knights; yet the picture he presents is ambivalent owing to the emperor's hostility towards the senate. The biographer emphasizes the knights' remarkable proficiency (Tit. 8. 4); he also treats women, freedmen and the plebs with less contempt than Tacitus (which, it is true, is not saying a great deal).

In Suetonius' lifetime the empire reached its greatest expansion; order and administration were at their heights. The fact that Caesar, not Augustus opens the series of biographies reflects the situation under Trajan, for that emperor was the first in a long time to venture wars of conquest and could thus be compared with Alexander and Caesar. As for criticism of contemporary issues,<sup>3</sup> it appears in Suetonius, if at all, indirectly and in the 'later' vitae: here the death of a predecessor is concealed in order to facilitate the change of sovereigns (Claud. 45; much more cautious Aug. 98. 5; Tib. 22); here an emperor is unpopular who, upon accession to the throne, high-handedly executed distinguished citizens (Tit. 6). Moreover there is criticism of the pullback of imperial borders (Nero 18), of the unbridled power of freedmen—under Claudius, of course—and of the concentration of administrative power in the hands of bureaucrats. All this amounts to an almost complete account of Hadrian's weak points. Is this accidental?

<sup>1</sup> A. WALLACE-HADRILL 1983, 191–192.

<sup>2</sup> Positive: Iul. 41. 2; Aug. 40. 1; Vesp. 9. 2; negative: Tib. 51. 2; Cal. 26. 4; 30. 2; cf., however, Dom. 7. 2; 8. 3.

<sup>3</sup> E. CIZEK 1977, 182 with bibl.; a different view in K. R. BRADLEY 1976.

In general Suetonius avoids black and white portrayals, and his judgment of the principes is rather rich in shades. At first glance his emperors fall into four major categories: his opinions of Augustus, Vespasian, and Titus are almost entirely positive, of Caesar and Otho mainly positive, of Tiberius, Galba, and Domitian negative and of Caligula, Nero and Vitellius entirely negative; his picture of Claudius varies but tends to be unfavorable. Closer examination, however, reveals much refinement: already in Caesar a multifaceted personality can be observed. On the one hand, Caesar had become socially acceptable at court under Trajan—as the founder of Roman monarchy and as a Roman conqueror, and Suetonius acknowledged Caesar's moderatio and clementia (Iul. 75); on the other hand the murder of the all too ambitious dictator was justified by his impotentia and arrogantia (ibid.). Among his honores nimii Suetonius mentions continuus consulatus and perpetua dictatura, distinctions which Augustus considered unnecessary. Ambitio, too, in addition to his 'divine' nature, led to Caesar's autocracy. Suetonius measures him against the idea of principatus.

Granted, it is difficult to speak of a 'concept of principate'<sup>1</sup> in Suetonius. The Lives of the Caesars—if generalizations are admissible at all—seems to plead for a moderate monarchy. Power and principate are ineluctably bound together<sup>2</sup> but both are based on a concordia ordinum and on a pattern of Roman behavior implying abstinentia and moderatio and, above all, respect for the senate and its rights.

Borrowing from 'monarchic' topics (λόγος βασιλικός), Suetonius worked out the rulers' virtues and vices according to the mentality of his age (clementia—crudelitas, liberalitas—avaritia, civilitas—superbia). In a similar fashion Pliny (paneg. 3. 4) set contrasting qualities of a ruler over against each other. Did Suetonius wish to convey to Hadrian a particular image of the principate?<sup>3</sup> Portrayal based on 'virtues' and 'vices' actually anticipates the genre of 'prince's manual'.<sup>4</sup> Obviously we are not dealing with an articulated ideology but with criteria on which the author and his public tacitly agree.

For Suetonius the concept of princeps is embodied, not in the libera res publica but in Augustus essentially,<sup>5</sup> although the word principatus

<sup>1</sup> U. LAMBRECHT 1984, esp. 78–83; 147–155.

<sup>2</sup> Iul. 29. 1 difficilius se principem civitatis a primo ordine in secundum quam ex secundo in novissimum detruidi.

<sup>3</sup> E.g., E. CIZEK 1977.

<sup>4</sup> P. HADOT, 'Fürstenspiegel', RLAC 8, 1972, 555–632, esp. 568–610.

<sup>5</sup> U. LAMBRECHT 1984, 158.

does not occur in the Vita of Augustus. Certainly Augustus was optimi status auctor, 'creator of the best possible government' (Aug. 28. 2), a saluber magis quam ambitiosus princeps, 'a princeps who desired the public welfare rather than popularity' (Aug. 42. 1), who (Aug. 53. 1)—just as Tiberius later (Tib. 27)—would not allow himself to be addressed as dominus.<sup>1</sup> He exercised clementia and civilitas (Aug. 51) and combined prudentia with pietas (Aug. 31);<sup>2</sup> above all he respected the senate and traditional institutions. It is characteristic of Suetonius that any analysis of his views sounds more 'ideological' than his text; the author often lets the context communicate his values.

The 'outward appearance' of a person (often in portraiture at the end of a vita) sums up his character. Suetonius is a physiognomist<sup>3</sup> and probably familiar with the works in this field of his contemporary Polemon of Laodicea. In his literary portraits Suetonius sometimes appears to prefer his own general idea of the emperor in question to the pictorial evidence known to us. The description of Augustus, for example, dwells on features that the reader is supposed to associate with 'kingly' animals such as lions or eagles (Aug. 79); Caligula's handsome features are distorted: for Suetonius he resembles a goat (Cal. 50. 1); Vespaasian, in turn, remains what he was: a fox (Vesp. 16. 3).

Suetonius does not share Tacitus' pessimism. Whereas the latter demonstrates how men are corrupted by power, Suetonius also shows positive examples: Augustus, Otho, Titus. It is the author's primary intention not to simplify the multiformity of life and of the emperors' personalities.

Although Suetonius does not intend primarily to design an historical panorama, he nevertheless correctly organizes his overall topic into historical epochs; he begins with Caesar, not with Augustus, for under the former the Republic came to an end; the author sees the importance of the year 69 for Roman history and recognizes the role of the Flavians in the consolidation of the empire (Vesp. 1. 1). He clearly differentiates between pretext and cause (Iul. 30. 2 and 31. 1). He is right to consider the crossing of the Rubicon the ἀρχή (initium) in Polybius' sense of the word (Iul. 31–33).

<sup>1</sup> As opposed to Domitian (Dom. 13. 1–2).

<sup>2</sup> U. LAMBRECHT 1984, 36–43.

<sup>3</sup> E. C. EVANS, Roman Descriptions of Personal Appearance in History and Biography, HSPH 46, 1935, 43–84, esp. 61–70 and 77–79; J. COUISSIN 1953.

Strangely enough, on the other hand, in the vitae of slain emperors, the circumstances of the murder are described more objectively than in the immediately following vita of a successor who is suspected of the murder (Tiberius/Caligula; Claudius/Nero). Inconsistencies can also be found in the De viris illustribus.<sup>1</sup> Doubtless, Suetonius' works lack a certain depth of thought.

Despite all of his shortcomings, Suetonius stands out for his common sense. In contrast to some modern historians, he understands very well that human beings are able to rise above ideologies and alter institutions.<sup>2</sup>

A fundamental characteristic of Suetonius' creativity is his Roman realism.<sup>3</sup> The author wants the facts to speak for themselves and he dispenses with rhetorical and philosophical finery. To be sure, the intensity of his research weakens in the later vitae. Some of his assessments are incorrect: he wrongly claims that Tiberius neglected to defend imperial borders.<sup>4</sup> Rampant also in this biographer are contradictions,<sup>5</sup> which, however, do not necessarily reflect oversight; after all, his intention is to impart a complex picture of life.

Suetonius is a grammaticus and, as a public official, he is also a careful recorder. He selects material not for its historical but for its biographical significance. His uncritical predilection for anecdotes follows the taste of the times, which tended toward sensationalism, yet he avoids rhetorical display. Since Suetonius' gossip is founded on contemporary sources, many are ready to grant him greater credibility than the Historia Augusta, for example, which fills gaps in knowledge with forgeries. Most importantly, the biographer provides us with insights into affairs at the imperial court.

In Suetonius the life of a ruler becomes a barometer of society. The princeps does not live in isolation but is surrounded by distinguished Romans, who dine with him (often together with their families). Many of the later emperors had frequented the court in their youth: Galba and Titus.

Suetonius' Vitae reflect the Hellenization of Roman society. Augustus surrounded himself with Greek scholars, Tiberius with astrologers

<sup>1</sup> B. BALDWIN 1983, 391.

<sup>2</sup> B. BALDWIN 1983, 339.

<sup>3</sup> W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963.

<sup>4</sup> Tib. 41; D. FLACH 1972, 280–281.

<sup>5</sup> E. CIZEK 1977, 39; D. FLACH 1972 passim.

and grammarians; even his 'register of sins' mirrored his interest in Hellenistic culture. In comparison with the times of Nepos (cf. Nep. praef. 1), music gained ground: Nero was an extreme case but not an exception; Caligula and Britannicus had also undergone training in music.

In the Flavian period philhellenism yielded to a Roman reaction. If the old aristocracy were bearers of Hellenization and moral decline, the new senators from the municipalities and provinces brought with them a more austere outlook to Rome. Nevertheless, Vespasian early on and even more so Domitian promoted rhetoric, poetry, fine art, drama, music, and libraries (Vesp. 18–19. 1; Dom. 4. 4; 20). Thus Suetonius concerns himself not only with the political and private side of the Caesars but also with the cultural side.

Suetonius assesses facts indirectly through the arrangement of his subject matter; a synchronic view prevails over a diachronic one. Characteristics of an individual are ordered in gradation and accordingly affect the reader: as a skillful psychologist the biographer suggests judgments without pronouncing them; hence, the reader is given an illusion of freedom. The author's 'world of ideas' is therefore hidden in and closely woven into the problematic form of his work.

Transmission

Since the extant manuscripts of the Vitae Caesarum share the same errors and omissions (above all, the lacuna at the beginning), they go back to a single archetype: perhaps to that codex which Lupus of Ferrières (d. 862) wanted to have sent to him from Fulda (A.D. 844; epist. 91. 4, ed. P. K. Marshall, Leipzig 1984); still he only received a copy, which subsequently was also lost. The oldest extant manuscript is the Memmianus (M; written around 840 in Tours) = Paris. Lat. 6115 (from the collection of Henri de Mesmes);<sup>1</sup> the connection of this manuscript to the letter of Lupus is disputed. Fulda, where Einhart and, for a time, Lupus attended the famous cloister school, was important for the Carolingian reception of Suetonius.

Others include above all the Gudianus 268 Guelferbytanus (G; 11th century—overestimated by Bekker) and the Vaticanus 1904 (V; 11th–12th century).

The order of chapters in the editions (in its final form) is traced to Erasmus (Basel 1518); the Memmianus has a different division.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. W. BERSCHIN, Medioevo greco-latino, Napoli 1989, 56 and 165.

Suetonius' De grammaticis et rhetoribus was discovered by Henoch d'Ascoli around 1450. It was transmitted along with the minor works of Tacitus (s. our chapter on Tacitus). Our text is based on copies from the Renaissance. On the tradition of the vitae of poets, see the editions of the respective poets.

Influence

Suetonius is among those Roman authors who have most influenced subsequent ages. Scholars of late antiquity (such as Censorinus, Isidore, Johannes Lydus, Servius, and Macrobius) seem to prefer his encyclopedic works to those of Varro.<sup>1</sup> The Biographies of the Caesars set a trend; a truly historical work would not be written again until that of Ammianus Marcellinus. Continuing in the wake of Suetonius were, among others, Marius Maximus, the so-called Aurelius Victor (second half of the 4th century), Eutropius in the Breviarum, and the Historia Augusta, in which he was called emendatissimus et candidissimus scriptor.<sup>2</sup> Possidius divided his Vita of St. Augustine (around 432) per species after the Suetonian example.<sup>3</sup>

From Fulda Suetonius' considerable influence reached Einhart (d. 840; Vita Karoli Magni) and Lupus of Ferrières (d. 862). Asser was inspired by Einhart in the adoption of the Suetonian form for his Vita Alfredi. William of Malmesbury (d. 1142) followed our author in the Gesta Regum IV.<sup>4</sup>

Suetonius' Vitae of authors were incorporated in the textual traditions of pagan grammarians and poets. As a work, they were as authoritative for Jerome as later for Gennadius of Massilia (5th century), Isidore of Seville (d. 636) and Ildefons of Toledo (7th century). Once and for all Suetonius set his stamp on the genre of biography.

<sup>1</sup> CONTE, LG 549.

<sup>2</sup> Script. hist. Aug. Quadr. Tyr. (Firm.) 1. 1.

<sup>3</sup> G. LUCK, Die Form der suetonischen Biographie und die frühen Heiligenviten, in: Mullus. FS T. KLAUSER, Münster 1964, 230–241, esp. 240; BERSCHIN, Biogr. 1. 226–235; J. G. HAAHR, William of Malmesbury's Roman Models: Suetonius and Lucan, in: A. S. BERNARDO, S. LEVIN, The Classics in the Middle Ages, Binghampton, N.Y. 1990, 165–173; on Suetonius in the Middle Ages, s. ibid.: index, s.v. Suetonius.

<sup>4</sup> G. B. TOWNEND 1967, 107 with bibl.; cf. in general: L. TRAUBE, Vorlesungen und Abhandlungen 2, München 1911, 133–134; 3, München 1920, 12; 231–233; 271–273; s. also the edition of the Reliquiae by REIFFERSCHIED, who is still sometimes too optimistic.

His writings—including the encyclopedic ones—informed the most diverse authors, especially those of Christian antiquity and the Middle Ages. A Byzantine epitome of his works on expressions of abuse and on games was discovered on Athos in the 1860s.<sup>1</sup> Dante (d. 1321) developed his gripping vision of Caesar's 'vulture's glare' (occhi grifagni: Inf. 4. 123) from a Suetonian image (Iul. 45 nigris vegetisque oculis).

Our author has been read widely since the Renaissance; aetas Suetoniana and Plutarchiana alternated. For Petrarch (d. 1374), who possessed three codices of Suetonius, he was auctor certissimus, curiosissimus rerum scriptor but served rather as a source than as a model; his Lives of famous Romans<sup>2</sup> were intended to be historical, not biographical in the Suetonian sense. Boccaccio, too, was interested in the subject matter rather than in the style of Suetonius. Shortly before his death (1576), physician and natural scientist Geronimo Cardano wrote an autobiography in Latin. Like Suetonius he proceeded per species but he emphasized expressly his improvements upon his predecessor. Among the famous editors and commentators of Suetonius in modern times are the following: P. Beroaldus (Bononiae 1493; 1506); I. Casaubonus (Genavae 1595; Paris 1610), A. Reifferscheid (Lipsiae 1860).

The name Suetonius signifies the height of Roman biography at the threshold between the age of literature and that of scholarship. He was the first polyhistor among the Greek and Roman scholars of his time.

Compiling empirical observations is something Roman. 'In any case it is his aim to convey the total amount of experience in one field, not an overview or a general idea'.<sup>3</sup> The Vitae offer a wealth of reliable information on Roman society and its conventions, thus compensating, to a degree, for the biographer's well-known weaknesses: he is inaccurate, disregards historical continuity, separates facts that belong together and puts others into the wrong context.

If Suetonius did come from Hippo, he was one of the first Africans among Latin authors. Undoubtedly he was the first to represent the epoch of the Twelve Caesars as a unified and continuous whole<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> New edition by J. TAILLARDAT, Paris 1967.

<sup>2</sup> Edizione Nazionale delle Opere di F. Petrarca, ed. by G. MARTELOTTI, vol. 2, Firenze 1964.

<sup>3</sup> H. KORNHARDT, Exemplum, diss. Göttingen 1936, 87.

<sup>4</sup> H. GUGEL 1977, 144–146.

in the form of successive imperial vitae. The significance of the emperors' personalities had also brought annalistic historiography closer to biography, a trend that was observable already in Tacitus; still it was not Suetonius' intention to blur the border between history and biography. By adhering to the 'principle of characterization through facts'<sup>1</sup> he supported a specifically Roman sense of the unique significance of each single event.<sup>2</sup> Suetonius allowed his readers more freedom of judgment than Tacitus, who gave them more guidance, forcing them to submit to the power of his talent.<sup>3</sup>

Editions: I. A. CAMPANUS, Romae, August 1470. * Io. ANDREAS, Bishop of Aleria, Romae, December 1470. * F. A. WOLF (together with the Animadversiones by Io. A. ERNESTI and the commentary by I. CASAUBONUS), 4 vols., Lipsiae 1802. * D.C.W.(= Gu.) BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS (TC, good ind.), 3 vols., Lipsiae 1816–1818. ** Quae supersunt omnia: C. L. ROTH, Lipsiae 1858. * Vitae Caesarum, De viris ill.: A. STAHR, W. KRENKEL (TrN), Berlin 2nd ed. 1985. * Vit. Caes.: M. IHM, Lipsiae 1907 (ed. maior). * M. IHM, Lipsiae 1908 (ed. minor), repr. 1992. * H. ALLLOUD (TTrN), 3 vols., Paris 1931–1932 (and reprints). * J. C. ROLFE (TTrN), London (1914) 1951. * R. GRAVES (Tr), M. GRANT (introd.), Harmondsworth 1980. * A. LAMBERT (TrN), München 1955, 4th ed. 1983. * M. HEINEMANN (Tr), R. TILL (introd.), Stuttgart 1957, rev. by R. HÄUSSLER 7th ed. 1986. * O. WITTSTOCK (TTr), Berlin 1993. * Iul.: H. E. BUTLER, M. CARY, with add. by G. B. TOWNEND (TC), Bristol 2nd ed. 1982. * Aug.: E. S. SHUCKBURGH (TC), Cambridge 1896. * J. M. CARTER (C), Bristol 1982. * Tib.: J. R. RIETRA (TC), Amsterdam 1928; M. J. DU FOUR (TC), Philadelphia 1941 (both reprinted together in 1979). * K. W. VOGT (C), diss. Würzburg 1975. * Cal.: D. W. HURLEY (C), Atlanta 1993. * D. WARDLE (C), Bruxelles 1994. * Claud.: J. MOTTERSHEAD (TC), Bristol 1986. * Claud., Nero: W. KIERDORF (TC), Paderborn 1992. * Nero: B. H. WARMINGTON (TN), Bristol 1977. * K. R. BRADLEY (C), Bruxelles 1978. * Galba, Otho, Vit., Vesp., Tit., Dom.: G. W. MOONEY (TTrC), Dublin 1930, New York 1979. * Galba, Otho, Vit.: D. SHOTTER (TTrC), Warminster 1993. * Vesp.: A. W. BRAITHWAITE (TC), Oxford 1927. * Tit.: H. MARTINET (C), Königstein 1981. * Dom.: F. GALLI (TrC), Roma 1991. * gramm., rhet.: F. DELLA CORTE (TTrC), Genova 1947, Torino 3rd ed. 1968. * G. BRUGNOLI, Lipsiae 1960, 3rd ed. 1972. * M.-C. VACHER (TTr), Paris 1993. * R. A. KASTER (TTrC), Oxford 1995. * Reliquiae

<sup>1</sup> W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963, 102.

<sup>2</sup> W. STEIDLE, 2nd ed. 1963, 47 and 69 with bibl.

<sup>3</sup> 'There is something solidly authentic about Suetonius' emperors', G. B. TOWNEND 1967, 93.

(without the Vitae Caesarum): A. REIFFERSCHIED (contains also the vita Ter., ed. by F. RITSCHL), Lipsiae 1860. * De poetis: A. ROSTAGNI, Suetonio De poetis e biografi minori, Torino 1944. ** Index: A. A. HOWARD, C. N. JACKSON, Index verborum C. SUETONII Tranquilli stilique eius proprietatum nonnullarum, Cambridge, Mass. 1922, repr. 1963. * Clavis Suetoniana (in the edition by BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, vol. 3, 1816–1818). ** Bibl.: P. GALAND-HALLYN, Bibliographie suétonienne (Les Vies des XII Césars) 1950–1988, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3576–3622; D. T. BENEDIKTSON, A Survey of Suetonius Scholarship, 1938–1987, CW 86, 1993, 377–447.

A. ABRAMENKO, Zeitkritik bei Sueton: Zur Datierung der Vitae Caesarum, Hermes 122, 1994, 80–94. * G. ALFÖLDY, Römisches Staats- und Gesellschaftsdenken bei Sueton, Ancient Society 11–12, 1980–1981, 349–385 = Die römische Gesellschaft, Wiesbaden 1986, 396–433. * B. BALDWIN, Suetonius, Amsterdam 1983. * K. BAYER, Der Stil Suetons, in: Der Suetonische Kern und die späteren Zusätze der Vergilvita, diss. München 1952, 5–74. * A. R. BIRLEY, Suetonius, JRS 74, 1984, 247–251. * K. R. BRADLEY, Imperial Virtues in Suetonius' Caesares, JIES 4, 1976, 245–253. * K. R. BRADLEY, The Rediscovery of Suetonius, CPh 80, 1985, 254–265. * K. R. BRADLEY, The Significance of the Spectacula in Suetonius' Caesares, RSA 11, 1981, 129–137. * K. R. BRADLEY, The Imperial Ideal in Suetonius' Caesares, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3701–3732. * L. BRAUN, Galba und Otho bei Plutarch und Sueton, Hermes 120, 1992, 90–102. * K. BRINGMANN, Zur Tiberiusbiographie Suetons, RhM 114, 1971, 268–285. * C. BRUTSCHER, Analysen zu Suetons Divus Iulius und der Parallelüberlieferung, Bern 1958. * E. CIZEK, Structures et idéologie dans Les vies des douze Césars de Suétone, București and Paris 1977. * J. COUISSIN, Suétone physiognomiste dans les Vies des XII Césars, REL 31, 1953, 234–256. * J. M. CROISILLE, L'art de la composition chez Suétone, d'après les Vies de Claude et de Néron, in: Annali dell'Istituto Italiano per gli studi Storici 2, 1970, 73–87. * L. DALMASSO, La grammatica di C. Suetonio Tranquillo, Torino 1906. * G. D'ANNA, Le idee letterarie di Suetonio, Firenze 1954. * L. DE CONINCK, Suetonius en de Archivalia, Verhandelingen van de Koninklijke Academie voor Wetenschappen, Letteren en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. der Letteren, Jg. 45, 104, Brussels 1983. * F. DELLA CORTE, Suetonio, eques Romanus (Milano 1958) Firenze 2nd ed. 1967. * A. DIHLE, Studien zur griechischen Biographie, Göttingen 1956, 2nd ed. 1970. * A. DIHLE, Die Entstehung der historischen Biographie, SHAW 1986, 3. * S. DÖPP, Zum Aufbau der Tiberius-Vita Suetons, Hermes 100, 1972, 444–460. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Biography, London 1967. * M. DUBUISSON, Purisme et politique. Suétone, Tibère et le grec au Sénat, in: Hommages à J. VEREMANS, Bruxelles 1986, 109–120. * J. EKTOR, L'impassibilité de l'objectivité de Suétone, LEC 48, 1980, 317–326. * D. FLACH, Zum Quellenwert der Kaiserbiographien Suetons, Gymnasium 79, 1972, 273–289. * D. FLACH, Einführung in die römische Geschichtsschreibung, Darmstadt 1985, 174–190.

- * G. FUNAIOLI, Suetonius, RE 2, 7, 1931, 593–641. * G. FUNAIOLI, I Cesari di Suetonio, in: Studi di letteratura antica. Spiriti e forme, figure e problemi delle letterature classiche, Bologna 1947, 2, vol. 2, 147–172. * J. A. GARRATY, The Nature of Biography, London 1958. * J. GASCOU, Suétone historien, Paris 1984. * M. A. GIUA, Una lettura della biografia svetoniana di Tiberio, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3733–3747. * P. GRIMAL, Suétone historien dans la Vie d'Auguste, VL 83, 1981, 2–9. * H. GUGEL, Caesars Tod (Suet. Iul. 81. 4–82. 3). Aspekte zur Darstellungskunst und zum Caesarbild Suetons, Gymnasium 77, 1970, 5–22. * H. GUGEL, Studien zur biographischen Technik Suetons, Wien 1977. * R. HANSLIK, Die Augustusvita Suetons, WS 67, 1954, 99–144. * J. HELLEGOUARC'H, Suétone et le principat d'après la Vie d'Auguste, in: Filologia e forma letterarie, FS F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, vol. 4, 79–94. * R. A. KASTER, Studies on the Text of Suetonius, De grammaticis et rhetoribus, Atlanta 1992. * U. LAMBRECHT, Herrscherbild und Principat-sidee in Suetons Kaiserbiographien. Untersuchungen zur Caesar- und zur Augustus-Vita, diss. Bonn (1982) 1984. * LEO, Biogr. * R. G. LEWIS, Suetonius' Caesares and their Literary Antecedents, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3623–3674. * H. LINDSAY, Suetonius as ab epistulis to Hadrian and the Early History of the Imperial Correspondence, Historia 43, 1994, 454–468. * R. C. LOUNSBURY, The Arts of Suetonius, New York 1987. * R. C. LOUNSBURY, Inter quos et Sporus erat: The Making of Suetonius' Nero, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3748–3779. * W. C. McDERMOTT, Suetonius and Cicero, Gymnasium 87, 1980, 485–495. * B. MOUCHOVÁ, Adoption und Testament in Suetons Kaiserbiographien. Ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnis des Wortschatzes bei Sueton, Graeco-Latina Pragensia 3, 1966, 55–63. * B. MOUCHOVÁ, Studie zu Kaiserbiographien Suetons, Prag 1968. * W. MÜLLER, Sueton und seine Zitierweise im Divus Iulius, SO 47, 1972, 95–108. * J. P. MURPHY, The Anecdote in Suetonius' Flavian 'Lives', ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3780–3793. * H. NAUMANN, 125 Jahre Vita Donatiana des Vergil, in: F. MAIER, W. SUERBAUM, eds., Et scholae et vitae, FS K. BAYER, München 1985, 33–40. * E. PARATORE, Una nuova ricostruzione del De poetis di Suetonio, Roma 1946, Bari 2nd ed. 1950. * A. PENNACINI, Strutture retoriche nelle biografie di Plutarco e di Suetonio, Sigma 17, 1–2, 1984, 103–111. * T. REEKMANS, Verbal Humour in Plutarch and Suetonius' Lives, AncSoc 23, 1992, 189–232. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Suetons Pratum seit Wessner (1917), ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3794–3825. * W. STEIDLE, Sueton und die antike Biographie, München 1951, 2nd ed. 1963. * R. SYME, Biographers of the Caesars, MH 37, 1980, 104–128. * R. SYME, The Travels of Suetonius Tranquillus, Hermes 109, 1981, 105–117. * G. B. TOWNEND, Suetonius and his Influence, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., 79–111. * M. C. VACHER, La vie des professeurs à Rome, ALMA 1981, no. 8, 49–57. * P. VENINI, Sulla tecnica compositiva svetoniana, Pavia 1975. * T. VIJAMAA, Suetonius on Roman Teachers of Grammar, ANRW 2, 33, 5, 1991, 3826–3851. * A. WALLACE-HADRILL, Suetonius. The Scholar and his Caesars, London 2nd ed. 1995. * D. WARDLE, Cluvius Rufus and Suetonius, Hermes 120, 1992, 466–482. * A. E. WARDMAN, Description of Personal Appearance in Plutarch and Suetonius—The Use of Statues as Evidence, CQ 17, 1967, 414–420.

FLORUS<sup>1</sup>

Life and Dates

It is practically impossible to reconstruct Florus' vita because we do not know whether the poet, the rhetor, and the historian called Florus are identical. Should they be one and the same, we have a colorful picture—perhaps too colorful. Nevertheless, among scholars there are numerous 'unitarians'.<sup>2</sup>

The graceful treatise Vergilius orator an poeta, of which there remains only a preface, introduces us to a rhetor with a true-to-life character: a native African, young Florus was humiliated by Domitian during a contest for poets. After that he traveled much; in Spain he worked as a teacher. If we consider the rhetor's poetic ambitions, it is not altogether inconceivable that he was that poet 'Florus', who later engaged in lively intellectual exchanges with Hadrian; several short poems have been handed down to us in the Historia Augusta and also in the Anthologia Latina; hardly anything remains of the letters to Hadrian. The historian's rhetorical and poetic style could point to the same author. The Pervigilium Veneris, however, probably came from another writer.<sup>3</sup>

The Rhetorical Treatise was written under Trajan, the short poems (in hexameters, ionic dimeters and versus quadrati) under Hadrian. Florus' Epitome of Roman History was probably composed towards the end of Hadrian's time.<sup>4</sup> Others place it in the reign of Trajan,<sup>5</sup> primarily because it reveals a 'conquering' spirit, which, however, dominates

<sup>1</sup> The poet is called Annius, the rhetor P. Annius, and the historian L. Annaeus (or Julius) Florus.

<sup>2</sup> Recently J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ 1983, 1 with bibl.

<sup>3</sup> R. SCHILLING, ed., Pervigilium Veneris, Paris 1944, intr. pp. xxii–xxxiii; I. CAZZANIGA, Storia della letteratura latina, Milano 1962, 727–729.

<sup>4</sup> P. JAL, edition, p. clv.

<sup>5</sup> P. ZANGAN 1942, esp. 66–67.

only the first part of the work; there is also a dating—though not a compelling one—to the time of Antoninus Pius.<sup>1</sup>

Survey of the Work

The 1st book of Florus' historical work deals with the time before the First Punic War; book 2 extends to the destruction of Numantia, book 3 to the eve of the Catilinarian conspiracy, and book 4 to Augustus.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Florus draws his material—above all for early Roman history—from Livy (or from an abridged version of him). His errors, which are glaring at times, are based partly on his sources,<sup>2</sup> e.g. he takes Augustus to be dictator perpetuus (as did Eutropius and the author of the De viris illustribus, who probably used the same source). It is curious that he does not place the 'delaying action' of the Cunctator until after Cannae (so does Ampelius, but not Eutropius, Orosius and the Periochae). Nevertheless, Livian influence should not be denied completely.<sup>3</sup> On the contrary Florus in some instances seems to intend a retractatio of Livy.<sup>4</sup> He groups his subject matter differently and is more approving of Augustus than Livy is.

Parallels in content to the De viris illustribus and Ampelius suggest the use of a common source (Hyginus, Exempla; De vita rebusque illustrium virorum). However, Florus also used Caesar (1. 45 = 3. 10) and Sallust (1. 36 = 3. 1; 2. 12 = 4. 1), the latter heavily influencing his conception of history in any case; in addition, he was familiar with the works of Tacitus.<sup>5</sup>

Parallels with Lucan had been traced back earlier to the historical work of the elder Seneca.<sup>6</sup> It is open to debate whether his periodic

<sup>1</sup> L. HAVAS, Zur Geschichtskonzeption des Florus, Klio 66, 1984, 590–598 (Florus' basic concepts agree neither with Trajan's nor with Hadrian's politics).

<sup>2</sup> L. BESSONE 1978, esp. 422–426.

<sup>3</sup> As did P. ZANCAN 1942, 61–62.

<sup>4</sup> P. JAL 1965, 367.

<sup>5</sup> On Sallust: A. NORDH 1952, esp. 127–128; on Tacitus: P. JAL, edition, p. xxx, n. 3.

<sup>6</sup> O. ROSSBACH, De Senecae philosophi librorum recensione et emendatione, Breslauer Philol. Abhandlungen 2, 3, 1888, 162–173, esp. 169–170; on Virgil and Lucan: P. JAL, edition, p. xxix, n. 8; p. xxx, n. 1.

organization of history by ages goes back to Seneca the Elder<sup>1</sup> or the Younger<sup>2</sup> (cf. Lact. inst. 7. 15. 14–16). Although Lactantius does cite only Seneca the Younger, the philosopher himself did not write a historical work. Seneca the Rhetor, therefore, cannot be ruled out as a source.<sup>3</sup> It is even possible, however, that the Church Father merely mistook Annaeus Seneca for Annaeus Florus. Varro could have made use of the ‘analogy of ages’ in his De vita populi Romani before Florus.

As far as genre is concerned, we are not dealing with a simple school text—though the work later served as such. The author’s failure to mention a series of important battles and major commanders and his nebulous chronology, for example, are evidence to the contrary. Florus wrote for a public fond of rhetorical declamation. This panegyrist of the Roman people was less concerned with facts than with emotional comment. On a possible bias of the work, s. Ideas.

The book Vergilius orator an poeta, the main body of which is lost, probably dealt with the relationship between poetry and oratory; it belongs to the same genre as Cicero’s De oratore, the Dialogus of Tacitus and the Octavius of Minucius Felix (cf. also Gell. 18. 1. 2–3).

Literary Technique

Florus’ work is a panegyric to the Roman people rather than a book of history in the strictest sense.

Our author does not want to give a chronicler’s account but to shape individual episodes into artistic miniatures.<sup>4</sup> He does not strictly adhere to chronology and is not striving for completeness. For artistic effect he allows himself to alter historical facts.<sup>5</sup> His narrative is charged with emotion.<sup>6</sup> The Roman people are the ‘hero’ of his work. Generals are no more than instruments; hence, the author is less concerned with their names. In the 2nd book, the populus Romanus no longer plays a major role; in its place Augustus enters the stage in the spotlight.

<sup>1</sup> L. CASTIGLIONI, Lattanzio e le Storie di Seneca Padre, RFIC 56, 1928, 454–475, esp. 474–475.

<sup>2</sup> R. HÄUSSLER 1964, esp. 315–319; today Häussler is for Seneca the Elder.

<sup>3</sup> J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ 1982, 9–10.

<sup>4</sup> A. KLOTZ 1940, 115.

<sup>5</sup> A. KLOTZ 1940, 116.

<sup>6</sup> The reader is invited to compare Flor. 1. 38. 16 = 3. 3. 16 with Appian 6. 12; or even Flor. 2. 22 = 4. 12.

Typical are summaries and intermediate prooemia, which relate a given historical situation to the 'pattern of ages' and thus contribute to the unity of the opusculum.

Language and Style

Florus has a cultivated style; he does not give in to the tendency towards archaism. He strives for brevity throughout and so prefers, e.g., the ablative absolute. The rhythm of clausulae is close to rhetorical, not historical models: the cretic followed by a trochee appears even more often than in Cicero, whereas the ditrochee is less frequent.<sup>1</sup>

Florus knows how to captivate his readers through metaphors: Antonius fax et turbo sequentis saeculi, 'fire and storm of the succeeding age' (2. 14. 2 = 4. 3. 2); emptio frumenti ipsos rei publicae nervos exhauriebat, aerarium, 'the purchase of corn was a drain on the treasury, the very life-blood of the State' (2. 1. 7 = 3. 13. 7). His slightly oversophisticated elegance transforms things familiar into things unusual, sometimes revealing poetic qualities.<sup>2</sup> Stylistically, Florus distances himself from Livy and comes closer to the pointed style of Seneca and the brevity of Tacitus, e.g. igitur breve id gaudium, 'therefore, this joy was short-lived' (2. 30. 30 = 4. 12. 30); or: cum ille—o securitas!—ad tribunal citaret, 'when he (such was his confidence!) was actually summoning them to appear before his tribunal' (2. 30. 34 = 4. 12. 34). He applies antitheses effectively: difficilius est provincias obtinere quam facere; viribus parantur, iure retinentur, 'it is more difficult to retain than to create provinces; they are won by force, they are secured by justice' (2. 30. 29 = 4. 12. 29); or: Germani victi magis quam domiti erant, 'the Germans had been defeated rather than subdued' (2. 30. 30 = 4. 12. 30). Florus' work is a Roman history 'mise en pointes'.<sup>3</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

It was Florus' intention to describe the 'life story' of Rome and to contribute to the glory of his people; he envisioned a fusion of the tasks of the orator, the biographer, and the historian.<sup>1</sup> His perception of his role as an author also explains his specific literary methods.

<sup>1</sup> P. JAL, edition pp. lvii–lxix.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Influence: Leopardi.

<sup>3</sup> R. PICHON, Histoire de la littérature latine, Paris 1898, 701.

Ideas II

Florus' work outlines Roman development in its entirety and so reveals at least the rudiments of a philosophical approach to history. Like Appian, Plutarch and Aristides, Florus extolls the universal role of the Roman Empire. Rome is the culmination of an historical process. One of the author's main goals is to portray magnitudo imperii (1 praef. 1).

Florus' work is structured after the scheme of ages.<sup>2</sup> Contradictions inherent in the work are explained by the fact that in the prooemium on political grounds he states the beginning of a 'second youth' under Trajan. The 'analogy of ages' takes on a more profound meaning through the antithesis fortuna-virtus (1 praef. 2) and the libertas theme. Virtus also includes other values: pietas, fides, modestia, iustitia, and clementia. Greek authors, in addition, refer to the doctrine of the succession of world empires,<sup>3</sup> which is not to be found in Florus.

Imperialism is glorified in the 1st book, peace in the 2nd. Nevertheless, no analytical conclusions can be drawn from these facts,<sup>4</sup> for we are dealing with a polarity that had always been inherent in Roman thought. Virtus fostered Rome's growth, and lack of virtus, its fall. During Rome's decline,<sup>5</sup> fortuna took center stage, leading to degeneration and senectus. Libertas had been closely linked to res publica (and to essentials like annuity, collegiality, leges, and auctoritas). Along with

<sup>1</sup> His perception of himself as a writer cannot be separated from his perception of himself as an historian.

<sup>2</sup> Against attempts to maintain the traditional numbers in the prooemium, R. HÄUSSLER 1964 considers the emendation necessary. Passages on the comparison of ages: Flor. proem. 4-6; Lact. inst. 7. 15. 15-16; Hist. Aug. Car. 2; Amm. 14. 6. 3; H. FUCHS, Der geistige Widerstand gegen Rom in der antiken Welt, Berlin 1938, 88; cf. also J. SCHOLTEMEIJER 1974, esp. 82 and 92-93.

<sup>3</sup> Herodotus 1. 95; 1. 130; Plut. mor. 317 F-318 A; App. praef. 8-12; Ael. Aristid., Praise of Rome 15-27.

<sup>4</sup> A different view: O. HIRSCHFELD, Anlage und Abfassungszeit der Epitome des Florus, SPAW 1899, 542-554 (= Kleine Schriften, Berlin 1913, 867-880).

<sup>5</sup> On fortuna and virtus in Cicero, Sallust, and Seneca: A. NORDH (1952); cf. also Liv. 9. 17-19; different from Plutarch (De fortuna Romanorum 317 B-C), who attributes the success of the Romans to Tyche rather than to Arete, Florus emphasizes the role of virtus above all in the period of expansion.

virtus, libertas went missing. The emperors before Trajan had been guilty of inertia, a feature typical of old age (Cic. off. 1. 123).

Livy furnished the basic material, and Sallust some leading ideas. In contrast to Sallust, however, Florus' stance is aristocratic. For Livy the urbs is of central importance, for Florus it is imperium and the populus Romanus.<sup>1</sup> Thus the Cunctator becomes both 'the shield of empire' (not of Rome, as Posidonius and Plutarch wrote) and an exemplum for (Hadrian's) politics of defence. Calamity emerges from prosperity: Causa tantae calamitatis eadem quae omnium, nimia felicitas, 'the cause of this great calamity was the same which caused all our calamities: namely, excessive good fortune' (2. 13. 8 = 4. 2. 8), a Sallustian theme.

Hannibal misses his chance to take advantage of the Roman defeat at Cannae (1. 22. 20 = 2. 6. 20). Among the reasons cited are Rome's destiny for world domination (fatum urbis imperaturae) or Hannibal's lack of initiative (aut ipsius mens mala) in conjunction with divine wrath against Carthage (et aversi a Carthagine di). In the footsteps of Livy, Florus reckons with Rome's claim to hegemony, which is based on a divine calling.

There are only hints at 'philosophical' elements in the work. Alexander's ἀρμυία becomes pax Romana. Some scholars<sup>2</sup> have found 'Stoic' impartiality in Florus. In fact, he sympathizes with the defeated Carthaginians, condemns the gruesome victory in Numantia and is ready to concede Roman errors in other cases as well. Nevertheless he repeatedly expresses his contempt for the barbarians.<sup>3</sup>

Being a rationalist, he does not attach much importance to prodigies.<sup>4</sup> Florus reflects the mentality of senators and equites; he attests to the average educated Roman's view of history.<sup>5</sup> The eighth poem, if it comes from the same author, is interesting from the standpoint of cultural history; it certainly shows the advanced stages of Hellenization: the usual lip service to Roman values is unmasked as hypocrisy. The author dares to declare himself for Greek culture. This position, too, fits the time of Hadrian.

The historical work is no mere summary of Livy. It is a tabella (praef. 3) of the history of the Roman people. On the one hand, <sup>1</sup> 2. 34. 61 = 4. 12. 61; world peace 2. 34. 64 = 4. 12. 64.

<sup>2</sup> V. ALBA 1953, 62; 71.

<sup>3</sup> 2. 26. 13 = 4. 12. 13; 2. 27. 17 = 4. 12. 17; 2. 29. 20 = 4. 12. 20; 2. 30. 30-31 = 4. 12. 30-31.

<sup>4</sup> V. ALBA 1953, 56-57.

<sup>5</sup> W. DEN BOER 1965, 367.

Florus praises the conquests from Romulus to Augustus, on the other, he points out the risks of a continuing expansion.<sup>1</sup> Thus the work is also a document of Hadrian's epoch.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

The most important manuscript is the Codex B = Bambergensis E III 22 (9th or 10th century), which represents an independent strand of transmission (together with Jordanes' De summa temporum vel origine actibusque gentis Romanorum, which was drawing on Florus).<sup>3</sup> The remaining numerous manuscripts together form a second class; one of its main representatives is the Lorsch Nazarianus N = Palatinus Latinus Heidelbergensis 894 (9th century).

The quality of B (the reliable product of an uneducated scribe) was perhaps somewhat overestimated after its discovery at the beginning of the 19th century (be that as it may, it is the only one that contains 2. 18. 2-6 = 4. 8. 2-6); the other class offers a smoother text, the beauty of which at times happens to be treacherous. Errors common to both classes of manuscripts prove their derivation from a single copy (of late antiquity).<sup>4</sup>

Influence

Numerous authors have been influenced by Florus:<sup>5</sup> Ammianus Marcellinus, Festus (Breviarium rerum gestarum populi R.), Orosius, Jordanes, and Malalas. Probably his work was translated even into Greek and was known in Byzantium. The exempla from Roman history discussed by Christians, were influenced by Florus. Augustine struggled not only against Livy but also against the minor historians, among them Florus.<sup>6</sup>

Throughout the Middle Ages and well into the 18th century,<sup>7</sup> Florus was used as a school author and admired for his brevitas.

Petrarch's (d. 1374) high opinion of Florus' style was shared by Juan Luis Vives (d. 1540): Flori opusculum, quo nihil potest fingi in illo

<sup>1</sup> P. JAL, edition, pp. xli-xliii.

<sup>2</sup> M. D. REEVE, The Transmission of Florus, Építome de Tito Livio and the Periochae, CQ n.s. 38, 1988, 477-491.

<sup>3</sup> Ed. by T. MOMMSEN, MGH: Auctores antiquissimi 5. 1, Berlin 1882, repr. 1961.

<sup>4</sup> P. K. MARSHALL in Reynolds, Texts 164-166.

<sup>5</sup> W. DEN BOER 1965, 369-370.

<sup>6</sup> Flor. 1. 1. 13 apud Aug. civ. 3. 13; Flor. 2. 9. 14-16 = 3. 21. 14-16 apud Aug. civ. 3. 27 fn.; Augustine was thinking of authors like Florus in civ. 3. 19.

<sup>7</sup> W. DEN BOER 1965, 367; J. STRAUB 1977, 137; P. JAL, edition p. xxxvii.

genere vel acutius vel lepidius, 'nothing more sagacious nor more charming can be imagined than Florus' little book'.<sup>1</sup> Justus Lipsius (d. 1606) had a similar estimation of him.<sup>2</sup> Joseph Scaliger (d. 1609) called Florus 'un très bel auteur'.<sup>3</sup> Between 1638 and 1674 six editions appeared in the Netherlands alone. F. N. Cœffeteau (d. 1623) produced a French translation. Florus was studied in Spain as well.<sup>4</sup> Cervantes (d. 1616) used our author as a source for his Numancia, while Racine (d. 1699) consulted him for his Mithridate. Patriotic Polish historians imitated Florus in Latin<sup>5</sup> and indulged in applying his aphorisms to the history of their country.

In his Essai sur le goût Montesquieu (d. 1755) appreciated especially the critique of Hannibal: cum victoria posset uti, frui maluit, 'when he might have exploited his victory, he preferred the enjoyments which it offered' (Flor. epit. 1. 22. 21 = 2. 6. 21). In his Esprit des Lois he commented pertinently on the sentence hic erit Scipio qui in exitium Africae crescit ('this youth was destined to be that Scipio who grew up to be the conqueror of Africa', Flor. epit. 1. 22. 11 = 2. 6. 11): 'Vous croyez voir un enfant qui croît et s'élève comme un géant'.<sup>6</sup>

Ego nolo Caesar esse/ambulare per Britannos, 'I've no mind to be a Caesar,/Strolling round among the Britons'. Goethe knew these lines of Florus as well as Hadrian's reply: Ego nolo Florus esse,/ambulare per tabernas, 'I've no mind to be a Florus,/Strolling round among the drink-shops'. One should read the opening of the 15th Roman Elegy and afterwards Auerbach's Keller (Faust 2095–2096.) again: 'For my part, I deem it a great advantage that I am not an emperor.'<sup>7</sup>

Leopardi (d. 1837) pondered Florus in the Pensieri. He saw in the author a poet, who had mastered rhetoric,<sup>8</sup> and he appreciated the poetic qualities of Florus' style.

Leopold von Ranke (d. 1886) preferred Florus' version of the battle in the Teutoburg Forest to other reports (today Cassius Dio is given

<sup>1</sup> De tradendis disciplinis, cited in V. ALBA 1953, 157.

<sup>2</sup> V. ALBA 1953, 157.

<sup>3</sup> Scaligerana, ed. DES MAIZEAUX, Amsterdam 1740, 2, 377.

<sup>4</sup> V. ALBA 1953, 160–161.

<sup>5</sup> Thus in 1641 Joachim Pastorius published a Florus Polonicus seu Polonicae Historiae epitome nova; on this, I. LEWANDOWSKI, Florus w Polsce, Warszawa 1970.

<sup>6</sup> V. ALBA 1953, 161; cf. also the recognition of Florus' style in the Essai sur le goût, Ed. de la Pléiade 2, p. 1257; Flor. epit. 1. 5. 8 = 1. 11. 8 Idem tunc Faesulae quod Carrhae nuper, . . . Tiberis quod Euphrates.

<sup>7</sup> Hist. Aug. Hadr. 16. 3–4; R. JAKOBI, Eine verkannte Reminiszenz an die Hadrian-Vita in Goethes Faust, Arcadia 24, 1989, 67–68.

<sup>8</sup> V. ALBA 1953, 164–165.

more credit). Well into the most recent times Florus' portrait of Marius has left a profound impression; the same is true of his view of Spartacus. The modern idea of the elephant as 'tank of antiquity' is inspired by Florus. In reality, however, elephants served the defence; the cavalry could hide behind the beasts' backs and prepare for attacks.<sup>1</sup>

In Florus' work history as 'Life of the Roman People' becomes the object of a rhetorical encomium. The analogy of ages can be regarded as a humble attempt at a 'philosophy of history'. The author's lasting influence demonstrates that, despite factual errors, his verve and conciseness, and the vividness of his images were not lost on his readers.

Editions: R. GAGUIN, in: U. GERING, M. GRANTS, and M. FRIBURGER, Paris, Sorbonne sine anno (1471). * E. S. FORSTER (TTr), London 1929; s. also J. W. DUFF, A. M. DUFF (TTr), in: Minor Latin Poets, London 1935, 423–435. * H. (= E.) MALCOVATI, Roma 1938 (2nd ed. 1972). * P. JAL (TTr), 2 vols., Paris 1967. * L. AGNES (TTr), Torino 1969. * J. G. DEANGELI (T and figg.), Torino 1969. * Carm.: C. DI GIOVINE (TC), Bologna 1988. ** Lexicon: M. L. FELE, Lexicon Florianum, Hildesheim 1975 (using the text of Malcovati 2nd ed 1972). ** Bibl.: in the edition of P. JAL, vol. 1, clxiv–clxix.

V. ALBA, La concepción historiográfica de Lucio Anneo Floro, Madrid 1953. * J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, The Ages of Rome, Amsterdam 1982. * J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, Die politische und soziale Ideologie des Geschichtsschreibers Florus, Bonn 1983. * J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, Les conceptions politiques de Florus, LEC 54, 1986, 178–180. * J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, Die Ideologie der Virtus und der Fortuna bei Florus im Lichte der Inschriften und Münzen, BJ 186, 1986, 291–298. * L. BESSONE, Di alcuni 'errori' di Floro, RFIC 106, 1978, 421–431. * L. BESSONE, Floro: un retore storico e poeta, ANRW 2, 34, 1, 1993, 80–117. * F. CUPAIUOLO, Caso, fato e fortuna nel pensiero di alcuni storici latini. Spunti e appunti, BStudLat 14, 1984, 3–38. * W. DEN BOER, Florus und die römische Geschichte, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 18, 1965, 366–387. * I. HAHN, Prooemium und Disposition der Epitome des Florus, Eirene 4, 1965, 21–38. * R. HÄUSSLER, Vom Ursprung und Wandel des Lebensaltervergleichs, Hermes 92, 1964, 313–341. * L. HAVAS, Le corps de l'Empire romain vu par les auteurs latins et grecs. Un chapitre de l'historiographie et de la rhétorique gréco-romaines, in: M. SORDI, ed., Autocoscienza e rappresentazione dei popoli nell'antichità, Milano 1992, 239–259. * M. HOSE, Zur Erneuerung der Vergangenheit. Die Historiker im Imperium Romanum von Florus bis Cassius Dio, Stuttgart 1994.

<sup>1</sup> W. DEN BOER 1965, 384.

* P. JAL, Nature et signification politique de l'œuvre de Florus, REL 43, 1965, 358-383. * A. KLOTZ, Der zweite Punische Krieg bei Florus, RhM 89, 1940, 114-127. * S. LILLIEDAHL, Florusstudien. Beiträge zur Kenntnis des rhetorischen Stils der Silbernen Latinität, Lund, Leipzig 1928. * E. MALCOVATI, Studi su Floro, Athenaeum n.s. 15, 1937, 69-94; 289-307; 16, 1938, 46-64. * A. NORDH, Virtus and Fortuna in Florus, Eranos 50, 1952, 111-128. * E. PARATORE, Leopardi e la letteratura latina post-augustea, in: Leopardi e il mondo antico, Atti del 5 Convegno Internazionale di Studi Leopardiani (1980), Firenze 1982, 211-221. * J. SCHOLTEMEIJER, L. ANNAEUS FLORUS, 'n analyse van strukturele temas; 'n nuwe perspektief, AClass 17, 1974, 81-100. * R. SIEGER, Der Stil des Historikers Florus, WS 51, 1933, 95-108. * P. STEINMETZ, Untersuchungen zur römischen Literatur des 2. Jh. n. Chr., Wiesbaden 1982, 121-164. * J. STRAUB, Imperium-Pax-Libertas, Gymnasium 84, 1977, 136-148. * J. STRAUB, Reichsbewußtsein und Nationalgefühl in den römischen Provinzen. Spanien und das Imperium Romanum in der Sicht des Florus, JRGZ 25, 1978, 173-195. * P. ZANCAN, Floro e Livio, Padova 1942.

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS

Life and Dates

In his day Ammianus Marcellinus was not the only Greek to become a Latin author (cf. Claudius Claudianus). This does not necessarily attest to the intellectual inferiority of the West<sup>1</sup> during that period; we can also interpret this development as an indication that in the 4th century Latin won back the intellectual and literary predominance which it had lost in the 2nd century. Although more and more authors were emerging from the provinces—rhetoric, for example, was being cultivated in Gaul, and law in the East—Rome had not yet abdicated its position as the center of cultural life.

Ammianus' birthplace, Antioch in Syria, was an important hub for commerce (14. 8. 8) and trade. The first community of pagan converts to Christianity also originated here (Acts 11. 26). As an Antiochian, Ammianus did not particularly sympathize with Constantinople; he held Rome—though not the Romans of his time—in higher esteem.

Born not long before 333, Ammianus hailed from a well-to-do family (cf. 19. 8. 6); he regretted that distinguished citizens were compelled to be enrolled in the order of aldermen (25. 4. 21; cf. 21. 12. 23). He entered the imperial corps of bodyguards (protectores domestici) early and from 353 served as a subordinate to the commander of the cavalry in the East, Ursicinus, whom Caesar Gallus recalled from Mesopotamia to Antioch to preside over trials of high treason. After Gallus' execution, Ammianus accompanied his superior Ursicinus further to Milan (354). There the latter escaped prosecution and was assigned by Constantius II (337–361) to depose the usurper Silvanus in Cologne. Afterwards he remained in Gaul in order either to protect Julian or to keep an eye on him.

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 2, 573.

In the summer of 357 Constantius ordered him to Sirmium (Mitrovica) and transferred him to the East; in Amida, Armenia, Ammianus had the opportunity to observe the entire Persian deployment while he was on a bold reconnaissance patrol (18. 6. 20–22). Soon thereafter he was an eyewitness to the siege and fall of Amida (359). He fled via Melitene to Antioch. Ursicinus was discharged in the year 360 (20. 2. 5); Ammianus then took part in Julian's Persian campaign (books 23–25). Between 363 and 380 he lived and wrote in Antioch and from there traveled to Egypt, Greece, and Thrace. He finally settled in Rome, where he gave a series of public readings from his historical work and enjoyed applause from senatorial circles (Libanius, epist. 983). His connection to the Symmachi and the Nicomachi should not be overemphasized. He cannot be assigned to any of the influential groups of his time: he was neither a Christian nor a senator nor a Teuton. His education distinguished him from many soldiers just as his moral restraint distinguished him from many members of urban Roman society. It is a stroke of luck that we may see Julian's era through the eyes of this solitary observer.

For a dating of the Res gestae we have the following clues: remarks in the 14th book (14. 6. 19) suggest that the expulsion of foreigners from Rome (383) had taken place not long before the time of writing. The praise of the Serapeum in Alexandria (22. 16. 12) must have been written before the destruction of this temple (391) unless Ammianus passed over it on purpose or because he was unaware of the event. Libanius (ibid.) attests to the publication of the first part of the work around 391. The consulate of Neoterius (390: 26. 5. 14) and the death of Probus (with certainty after 389: 27. 11. 14) are also mentioned. Ammianus refers to Theodosius as an emperor 'very successful later on'—not the 'present' emperor (29. 6. 15). Therefore, the work was completed after this ruler's death (and certainly before 400).

Survey of Work

The Res gestae consisted of 31 books. Continuing where Tacitus' Histories left off, they treated Roman history from Nerva (96) to the death of Emperor Valens in the battle against the Goths at Adrianople (378). The first thirteen books, which covered the years 96 to 352, are lost. The extant books (14–31) treat only the years 353–378, a period shorter by a factor of ten. Numerous excursuses make the work more entertaining; hence it acquires its 'encyclopaedic' character. The beginnings of books 15 and 26 open important new pages of history.

The entire work is divided into three parts: 1–14 (from 96 to 354), 15–25 (from 354 to 364), 26–31 (from 364–378). A hiatus of three years precedes book 31; there is a smaller piece of text missing in book 24. 7.

Sources, Models, and Genres

We can no longer determine which historical sources Ammianus used for the lost account of earlier times.

The extant books are based on the author's own experience. He quotes documents (16. 12. 70); the correspondence of Constantine and Sapor II must also be based on original letters (even if Ammianus may have changed their style). Dates are often remarkably precise; they must be based on official journals. The historian had also questioned witnesses. A memoir of Julian on his campaigns against the Alemanni and other Germanic tribes was used by Ammianus and Libanius (or. 18). Sources also include panegyrists whom Ammianus mentions in 31. 10. 5.

Unlike the historical accounts the excursuses are based on second-hand information and therefore not reliable. For his geographical lore the historian appears to have used not a handbook but the official Roman (and Ptolemaic) lists of districts and cities. He probably took the historical notes he placed in his excursuses from the chorographically oriented historical work of 'Rufius' Festus; he was also familiar with the Chorographia Pliniana and with individual Greek topographies.

Ammianus names his models only in part: thus Cicero is cited 34 times by name. For various pieces of information, our author was indebted to Gellius, Valerius Maximus, Florus, and Sallust. Ammianus is well read; he is fond of Greek literature, especially poetry, to which he quite often refers.<sup>1</sup> It would however be simplistic to categorize him as a Greek historiographer who happened to write in Latin.

<sup>1</sup> 14. 6. 7 Simonides; 14. 6. 8 vates Ascræus; 14. 6. 21 Homer; 25. 4. 19 Aratus; list of 'Sententiae in form of Quotations' in R. C. BLOCKLEY, Appendix G 195.

It is difficult to define the genre of the work, for it swings from historiography to biography, to memoir, to encyclopedia.

Ammianus knows the works of Livy, Sallust and all those of Tacitus except the Dialogus. The linguistic influence of the Histories, which our historiographer continues, is particularly noticeable in the openings of the books. Although the influence of Tacitus is not so pronounced that the author could be regarded as 'Tacitean',<sup>1</sup> the fact remains that the historical genre and the writings of his predecessor were among his starting-points. Ammianus undoubtedly learned from Tacitus how to portray characters; his work is reminiscent of the Annals in that it concentrates on the emperors. His use of excursuses resembles Sallust's. In contrast to Tacitus and Dio, however, Ammianus is not a senator; in any case the problem of freedom was no longer the order of the day.

It is rewarding, too, to compare<sup>2</sup> our author with his contemporaries—Julian, Libanius, and Themistius—as well as with the Latin panegyrists and with parallel historical accounts—like those of Zosimus (around 500). Ammian's criticism of his age recalls satire and, even more, Lucian.

Still more significant are Ammianus' references to Plato and Cicero, which recur throughout his work. Like Augustine, Ammianus is a reader who treasures Cicero not for his form but for his content.

Literary Technique

His choice of the Latin language was probably inspired by patriotism; moreover, there was no Latin work on Julian's exploits.

After Tacitus, Roman historiography had been reduced to collections of anecdotes and the writing of compendia; within the limits of his epoch and his social position, Ammianus restored the old dignity of the genre.

According to his sources of information, there are shifts in balance and perspective. Circumstances with which the author was familiar personally are allotted more space than they deserve. His work shares this feature with 'memoirs'. His subject matter, too, compels him to modify traditional structural patterns: the great number of different places of action scarcely allowed an annalistic arrangement of events. As Tacitus often did, Ammianus groups his huge material according to content and dramatic requirements.

---

<sup>1</sup> L. E. WILSHIRE is critical: Did Ammianus write a Continuation of Tacitus?, CJ 68, 1972/73, 221–227; H. TRÄNKLE 1962, esp. 25–26; L. R. ROSELLE stresses dependence on Tacitus: Tacitean Elements in Ammianus Marcellinus, Thesis Columbia Univ. 1976.

<sup>2</sup> G. SABBAB 1978, 241–372.

In principle, excursuses are part and parcel of ancient historiography. The Rome excursuses (14. 6; 28. 4) offer social criticism and, again and again, brilliant satire. The large number of geographical digressions are reminiscent of Sallust's Histories. Deviating from the tradition of historians, Ammianus does not avoid digressions of a technical and scientific nature. His excursuses follow his own structural scheme.<sup>1</sup>

His attractive use of the first person plural in his accounts also contradicts historiographic tradition; its roots have been sought in narrative folklore of the Greek-speaking East. In eyewitness accounts, however, this form is quite natural, even inevitable. These reports, in which Ammianus avoids Xenophon's affected use of the third person singular, lend a personal touch to the work.

Ammianus wanted to write a history of empire. Since he felt it impossible to separate such an account from the person of the emperor, he allowed biographical elements to mingle with historical tradition. Still Ammianus dwells less on unessential, private details than biographers do. Literary portraits, which are inserted on occasion of the deaths<sup>2</sup> of emperors, are—just as we would expect from the tradition of biography—organized systematically—e.g., genus, forma, mores. In the case of Julian the author proceeds from virtutes and vitia<sup>3</sup> (a picture of his outward appearance is then appended). References to shortcomings—even those of his beloved Julian (25. 4. 16)—indicate a departure from encomium,<sup>4</sup> to which there is nevertheless a close formal relationship.

Alternation between praise and censure might recall Suetonius, but there is more conciseness of form and a more systematic order, enlivened by a keen sense of psychology and of style.

<sup>1</sup> T. MOMMSEN, Ammians Geographica, Hermes 16, 1881, 635–636 (= Gesammelte Schriften 7, 424).

<sup>2</sup> Thus the obituaries for Constantius, Julian, and Valentinian. Cassius Dio had placed such sections at the beginning; cf. LEO, Biogr. 236–240.

<sup>3</sup> In Valentinian the vitia are placed before the virtues.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Xenophon's Agésilas, Nepos' Atticus.

His historical narrative tries to reconcile chronological with geographical principles. To be sure, Ammianus dates events for the most part by consuls; however, the size of the empire makes it almost impossible to adhere to a strict chronological arrangement and forces the author to proceed from setting to setting, just as Tacitus had already done in some passages.

Reports of battles are carefully structured: preparation, the battle itself, retreat and pursuit, results. Ammianus is not above resorting to rhetorical and even epic<sup>1</sup> techniques in his battle scenes. In this respect he continues the tradition of Roman historiography. The battle at Strasbourg in 357 is one of his great paintings (16. 12). In the course of the narrative anecdotal insertions<sup>2</sup> may crop up.

In keeping with historiographical tradition—and with Neoplatonic concepts<sup>3</sup> as well—Ammianus uses omens, dreams and prophecies as literary devices; prodigia foreboding death especially contribute to dramatic effect.

Speeches are elaborate and, as was usual in antiquity, to a great extent freely invented: thus, Julian's last address (25. 3. 15–20) offers the quintessence of his achievements in synthetic form right before an analytical assessment, which is arranged according to subject. From the 28th book on there are no more speeches. Was Ammianus anxious to conclude his work?

To enhance the importance of his heroes our eloquent author, of course, refers to Greek (25. 3. 8) and Roman exempla (25. 3. 13); still he applies rhetorical devices only where they do not detract from historical accuracy.<sup>4</sup>

Language and Style

Ammianus avails himself of the literary language of historiography created by Sallust and Tacitus. He exhausts the potential of this highly artificial Latin and is lavish with his own innovations. His vocabulary is rich and colorful. Under these circumstances it goes without <sup>1</sup> Thus in his depiction of the siege of Amida.

<sup>2</sup> E.g., 16. 5. 11; 12; 16. 10. 16; 22. 4. 9; 29. 3. 3; 29. 3. 4.

<sup>3</sup> And e.g. with Julian's beliefs.

<sup>4</sup> G. CALBOLI 1976; R. C. BLOCKLEY (1975) offers a list of exempla, Appendix F 191–194.

saying that his use of political terminology<sup>1</sup>—interesting as it may be—is inexact. The old soldier even applies military parlance wittily to civilian matters (14. 6. 17). Syntax and style are patterned on Greek models: characteristic is his unrestrained use of participles (including present and future participles)—a linguistic device which earlier Latin writers had applied only in small doses.

Although it is definitely helpful to translate difficult passages back into Greek, such a noble and refined style nevertheless resists a mechanical reduction to 'foreigners' Latin'. Rather, Ammianus—like other great authors—awakened in the Latin language dormant potentialities, the range of which can be determined more exactly by thoroughgoing studies of early and late Latin. Metaphors are rich and multifarious.<sup>2</sup> The conventional label 'baroque' is hardly appropriate since it diverts attention from the essential matter-of-factness of Ammianus' language. We simply have to recognize that we are dealing with an exceedingly original writer of prose.<sup>3</sup>

Unlike Tacitus—but in keeping with Suetonius' practice—Ammianus weaves Greek quotations into his Latin text: for example, Menander's profound words on the tutelary spirit of man (21. 14. 1), a prophecy (31. 1), a satirical folk verse (25. 4. 17), and even the Greek translation (17. 4. 17–23) of an inscription on an obelisk.

Ammianus' prose rhythm is based exclusively on word accent, not quantity.<sup>4</sup> Reinterpreting the old quantitative clausulae in terms of word accent, our author prefers the following types: cursus planus: /xx/x (clausulas esse); cursus tardus: /xx/xx (clausulas fecimus); cursus velox: /xx xx/x (clausulas feceramus). The clausula/x xx/x (esse videatur) also appears. The step from classical to medieval literary prose has been made.

<sup>1</sup> W. SUERBAUM, 3rd ed. 1977.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. F. W. JENKINS, Theatrical Metaphors in Ammianus Marcellinus, Eranos 85, 1987, 55–63; I. ULMANN, Metaphern in den Res gestae des Ammianus Marcellinus, diss. Berlin 1975; R. C. BLOCKLEY 1975, Appendix B (animal metaphors).

<sup>3</sup> A worthwhile analysis of style: E. AUERBACH, Mimesis, Bern 1946, 56–81 (on Amm. 15. 7).

<sup>4</sup> A. M. HARMON, The Clausula in Ammianus Marcellinus, New Haven, Conn. 1910.

Ideas I Literary Reflection

Veritas (31. 16. 9), as tradition demands it, is an historian's guiding-star. The author perceives that withholding facts, too, is a way of distorting the truth (ibid.). This laudable principle, however, does not prevent him (no more than his predecessors) from error and partiality;<sup>1</sup> still his knowledge of military affairs deserves recognition.<sup>2</sup> His comments on the special qualities of historical writing show that he is consciously following in the footsteps of the great historiographers. He clearly distances himself from pettifoggers who blame him for omitting what the emperor said at supper. To name all bureaucrats or every small outpost would be 'counting atoms'. His goal is discurrere per negotiorum celsitudines, 'to run through the highlights of events' (26. 1. 1; cf. 27. 2. 11).

Restriction to essentials, which had been a principle in Roman historiography since Cato, was something unusual for his time. Dissociating himself in that respect from biography and chronicle, Ammianus wants to write serious history.

He accurately describes his own technique for writing epilogues (30. 7. 1): actus eius discurrere per epilogos breves nec vitiorum praetermisso discrimine vel bonorum, quae potestatis amplitudo monstravit, nudare solita semper animorum interna, 'run through his deeds in a brief epilogue, without omitting to distinguish his faults or his good qualities, brought to light as they were by greatness of power, which is always wont to bare a man's inmost character'. Here he does borrow from biographical techniques, for he is aiming at inner qualities. Still his goal is rather a Tacitean one: the psychology of the princeps is revealed because it determines politics.

Not uninterested<sup>3</sup> in linguistic problems, Ammianus expounds the high standards of style which he sets for himself and for others. Procedere linguas ad maiores moneo stilos, 'I encourage them to train their tongues on more distinguished pens' (31. 16. 9). This advice given to his

---

<sup>1</sup> The ethical contrast between Julian and emperors like Gallus and Constantius is made sharper for the sake of clarity, but Ammianus himself, who also sees Julian's errors, has provided in part the material for correction (positive achievements of Constantius II: 17. 12-13).

<sup>2</sup> N. J. E. AUSTIN 1979.

<sup>3</sup> G. VIANINO 1977.

successors indirectly illustrates his unique position within the historiography of late antiquity.

Ideas II

Ammianus' work owes its special point of view to the unusual attributes of an author, who addresses his readers in all humility as miles quondam et Graecus, 'an ex-soldier and a Greek' (31. 16. 9)—thus neither senator nor Roman. His comment can be taken positively: as a soldier he is often an eyewitness and, moreover, one of the few ancient historians who report competently on matters of strategy and tactics. Granted, he probably knows less about activity on the forward edge of battle than about sieges and intelligence-gathering; he shows how a shortage of soldiers and the undermining of discipline through mutinies made it impossible for the Roman army to solve its logistical problems. His military perspective also explains his interest in geography. Furthermore, as a soldier he enjoys a close relationship to the emperor, to the empire, and to its language, Latin. On the other hand, as a Greek he is sympathetic with Julian's philhellenism, and the first to write on him in Latin; as a Greek he appreciates Julian's high regard for education, trying to pass it on and to maintain a certain intellectual standard. The great importance he attaches to the unity of Greek and Roman culture is manifest, for instance, in his admiration of Cicero.<sup>1</sup>

His attitude to Christian religion is neutral. Tolerant with respect to religious matters, he adopts an abstract monotheism without being a philosopher. His approach to the ancient gods is a rationalist's; genii—the guardian spirits of an individual—have religious importance for him. He also respects the cult of emperors. A son of his times—and a follower of Roman historiographical traditions—he believes in portents (e.g. 23. 1. 7) and miracles (28. 1. 42). Loyalty to Rome<sup>2</sup> and emperor is for him an incontestable principle (which probably contributed to his decision to write in Latin). Miles et Graecus, he holds the language of the army, of administration and of empire in especially high esteem.

<sup>1</sup> C. J. CLASSEN 1972.

<sup>2</sup> His Roman patriotism stands out when one compares his report with parallel texts (e.g., 16. 12 .65; Libanius or. 18. 62).

Freedom of the individual is a central theme for Ammianus. Man has control over his fate; divine justice punishes evil doing. The causes of Rome's decline are moral in nature, rooted as they are in the personal behavior of individuals;<sup>1</sup> hence Ammianus dwells on the ethical contrast between Gallus and Julian. As the virtuousness of the emperor is a cure for what ails the state, Julian gains an exemplary function in our author (not just his personal preference should be considered here); for the same reason he shows the figure of this emperor against an especially rich Greek and Roman background. While Ammianus' insistence on virtutes and vitia has a literary side, it is not merely a literary compensation for his inability to gain an insight into imperial life at court (an insight our author is not at all interested in).

Ammianus' high esteem of education is supported by his use of exempla. Julian's catalogue of virtues recalls Polybius' account of Scipio's upbringing and reflects Ammianus' Roman ideology. In our author's view Julian consciously imitates the gods and follows in the footsteps of earlier good emperors. Yet to regard these features as the causes for that emperor's failure<sup>2</sup> is to misunderstand Ammianus' intention. Without his educational background our author would not have become an historian. Since his study of the ethical behavior of emperors served to determine the causes of political events, a characterization of Ammianus as a 'moralist' is too narrow. As an historian he is conscious of the fact that history is made by persons and that man's identity rests on his intellectual and moral faculties.

Ammianus agrees with Plutarch and Florus, among others, in maintaining that Rome owed its greatness to the combined influence of fortuna and virtus (14. 6. 3). Even his criticism of Roman society may be read as an indirect expression of his faith in imperium. Still he is well aware that the Eternal City—after Florus' conception of history—has meanwhile gone through all of the stages of life from childhood to old age.<sup>3</sup> He gives the simile an appropriate new turn: now the aging metropolis has handed over her administration to her sons, the Caesars (14. 6. 4–5). This means that an anthropocentric scheme has replaced the biological one.

<sup>1</sup> Just as in Tacitus, morality and politics are closely connected: the relationship between Constantius II and Julian resembles that between Domitian and Agricola. A structural problem in the society of the principate is worked out here.

<sup>2</sup> H. DREXLER 1974, 124–136.

<sup>3</sup> Seneca (probably after Varro) in Lact. inst. 7. 15. 14–17a; Flor. epit. praef. 4–8; Symm. rel. 3. 9; R. HÄUSSLER in: Actes du VII<sup>e</sup> congrès de la FIEC, vol. 2, Budapest 1983, 183–191; A. DEMANDT, Der Fall Roms. Die Auflösung des Reiches im Urteil der Nachwelt, München 1984; P. ARCHAMBAULT, The Ages of Man and the Ages of the World. A Study of Two Traditions, REAug 12, 1966, 193–228.

Transmission

From Rome Ammianus' work reached Gaul, where members of the senatorial aristocracy possessed vast holdings. There the books dedicated to Julian met with great interest since Julian had done much for Gaul; this explains why these books have survived. A copy of books 14–31 came to the Hersfeld monastery from Gaul. A copy which was made for the Fulda monastery is our only textual source from that early time (Fuldensis, Vaticanus Latinus 1873, V; 9th century). Gelenius, the editor of the edition published in 1533 by Froben in Basel had used the (later lost) Hersfeld manuscript, which at that time went up to 30. 9. This edition replaces the Hersfeld manuscript for us; what is more, it is the sole witness for passages lacking in the Fuldensis—above all for the complete Greek text of the obelisk inscription. In 1875 six pages of the Hersfeldensis (Fragmenta Marburgensia, M) were discovered; they had served as bindings for files in the village of Friedewald near Hersfeld. All other manuscripts are neither old nor independent.

The restoration of the text is based therefore on the Fuldensis, which is to be complemented by the edition of Gelenius.

Influence

Ammianus' influence is already noticeable in the Historia Augusta<sup>1</sup>—if we accept a late date (around 395 or later) for that concoction.

The literary legacy of Ammianus is interwoven with Emperor Julian's charisma in two ways: first, the historical work owed its preservation to readers who held the acts of Julian in high esteem; later, however, the suggestive image designed by Ammianus inspired, in its turn, the imaginations of European authors.

In late antiquity Christian Prudentius (apoth. 449–454), who would have been obliged to reject the Apostate as a new Judas, used surprisingly laudatory expressions which echoed Ammianus' admiration for the emperor as a commander, legislator and patriot. Our author's account of imperial virtues influenced anew the early modern period;<sup>2</sup> in his Julian drama Jesuit H. DREXEL sought to do justice to the hero. With rare unanimity the deeply religious but astonishingly impartial historian of heretics Gottfried Arnold (d. 1714) and the cool rationalist Voltaire (d. 1778) freed Julian from the stigma of being an apostate. In the 19th century, on the contrary, the romantic shimmer of apostasy seemed to make the hero more attractive: Fouqué dedicated poems (1816) and a novella (1818) to him, Eichen-dorff an epic (1853), Felix Dahn a novel (1893). Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (d. 1898) struggled with the emperor's farewell address (Der sterbende Julian;<sup>1</sup> cf. Amm. 25. 3. 15–20); like Ammianus he kept himself remarkably free from the then current obsession with demonic elements. Discovering in Julian a highly ethical man of the spirit, Meyer was one of the few readers who understood the ethos of Ammianus. Henrik Ibsen's (d. 1906) drama Emperor and Galilean (1873) often follows Ammianus' text word for word, and the historian even becomes a character in the play. Ibsen sought to fuse pagan and Christian images of Julian on the one hand by paralleling the apostate with Cain and Judas and on the other by reviving a philosophical view of history synthesizing antiquity and Christianity to form a 'third' imperium. Inspired by that concept, Merezhkovsky (d. 1941) wrote his novel Julian the Apostate (1895), as part of the trilogy Christ and Antichrist. Gore Vidal's Julian (1962/1964) is proof that interest in the figure of the emperor has not waned in the 20th century.

<sup>1</sup> R. SYME 1968; against this view: A. MOMIGLIANO, Ammiano Marcellino e la Historia Augusta, AAT 103, 1968–1969, 423–436.

<sup>2</sup> H.-G. NESSELRATH, Zur Wiederentdeckung von Julian Apostata in der Renaissance. Lorenzo de' Medici und Ammianus Marcellinus, A&A 38, 1992, 133–144.

Ammianus' influence as a moralist persisted independently of his portrayal of Julian. Our author's psychological perspicacity and his interest in ethics did not fail to impress Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592). Anecdotes of Ammianus continue to spread and crop up unexpectedly.<sup>2</sup>

Ammianus was again writing history after a long period during which others had produced only imperial biographies. In literature he survived as a moralist, as a creator of an ideal ruler, and as a dramatic narrator. The fact that not only pagans and poets, but also devout Christians and even critical historians could not resist the fascination of his portrait of Julian is itself testimony to his creative abilities regardless of the question of accuracy.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. KEMPTER, ed., Leuchtende Saat, Engelberg 1951, 68–69; F. KEMPTER, C. F. Meyers Ringen . . ., Engelberg 1954, 28–29; Meyer's dependence on Ammianus seems to have been hitherto overlooked.

<sup>2</sup> G. JAVOR, Lincoln, Grant, and Whiskey, American Notes and Queries 10, 1971, 42–43 (on Amm. 16. 5. 8).

Editions: Angelus SABINUS, Romae 1474 (incomplete). * First complete editions: Mariangelus ACCURSIUS (Accorso), Augustae Vindelicorum 1533; Sigismundus GELENIUS, Basileae: Froben 1533. * J. C. ROLFE (TTr), 3 vols., London 1935–1939, rev. and repr. 1950–1952. * W. SEYFARTH, L. JACOB-KARAU, I. ULMANN, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1978. * W. SEYFARTH (TTrC), 4 vols., Berlin 1968–1971, and reprints. * O. VEH (Tr), G. WIRTH (N), Zürich 1974. * Budé-edition: 1 (books 14–16) E. GALLETIER (TTr), J. FONTAINE (C), Paris 1968; 2 (books 17–19) G. SABBAB (TTrC), 1970, 2nd ed. 1989; 3 (books 20–22) forthcoming; 4 (books 23–25), 2 vols., J. FONTAINE (TTrC), 1977; 5 (books 26–28) M.-A. MARIÉ 1984; 6 (books 29–31) forthcoming. * A. RESTA BARRILE (TTrN), 4 vols., Bologna 1973–1974. * Books 14–19: P. DE JONGE (C, each book initially 2 vols., later 1 vol.), Groningen 1935 (repr. 1972)–1982. * Books 20–21: J. SZIDAT (C), 2 vols., Wiesbaden 1977; 1981. * J. DEN BOEFT, D. DEN HENGST, H. C. TEITLER (C), 2 vols., Groningen 1987–1991. ** Index: M. CHIABÒ, Index verborum Ammiani Marcellini, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1983. ** Concordance: G. J. D. E. ARCHBOLD, A Concordance to the History of Ammianus Marcellinus, Univ. of Toronto Press 1980, microfiche. ** Bibl.: J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, AAHG 36, 1983, 1–18.

J. M. ALONSO-NÚÑEZ, La visión historiográfica de Ammiano Marcelino, Valladolid 1975. * N. J. E. AUSTIN, In Support of Ammianus' Veracity, Historia 22, 1973, 331–335. * N. J. E. AUSTIN, Ammianus on Warfare. An Investigation into Ammianus' Military Knowledge, Bruxelles 1979. * T. D. BARNES, Ammianus Marcellinus and His World, CPh 88, 1993, 55–70. * J. BÉRANGER, La terminologie impériale. Une application à Ammien Marcellin, in: Mélanges d'histoire ancienne et d'archéologie offerts à P. COLLART, Lausanne 1976, 47–60. * N. BITTER, Kampfschilderungen bei Ammianus Marcellinus, Bonn 1976. * R. C. BLOCKLEY, Ammianus Marcellinus. A Study of his Historiography and Political Thought, Bruxelles 1975. * K. BRINGMANN, Ammianus Marcellinus als spätantiker römischer Historiker, A&A 19, 1973, 44–60. * W. K. BULLA, Untersuchungen zu Ammianus Marcellinus, München 1983. * G. CALBOLI, Ammian und die Geschichtsschreibung seiner Zeit, in: FS R. MUTH, Innsbruck 1983, 33–53 (bibl.). * P. M. CAMUS, Ammien Marcellin, témoin des courants culturels et religieux à la fin du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle, Paris 1967. * R. CAPPELLETTO, Ricuperi ammiane da Biondo Flavio, Roma 1983. * R. CAPPELLETTO, Passi 'nuovi' di Ammiano Marcellino in Biondo Flavio, A&R n.s. 30, 1985, 66–71. * H. CICHOCKA, Die Konzeption des Exkurses im Geschichtswerk des Ammianus Marcellinus, Eos 63, 1975, 329–340. * C. J. CLASSEN, Greek and Roman in Ammianus Marcellinus' History, MusAfr 1, 1972, 39–47. * G. A. CRUMP, Ammianus Marcellinus as a Military Historian, Wiesbaden 1975. * A. DEMANDT, Zeitkritik und Geschichtsbild im Werk Ammians, Bonn 1965. * A. M. DEMICHELI, I processi di lesa maestà in Ammiano Marcellino, Ann. della Fac. giur. di Genova 20, 1984, 95–126. * U.-B. DITTRICH, Die Beziehungen Roms zu den Sarmaten und Quaden im 4. Jh. n. Chr. (nach der Darstellung des Ammianus Marcellinus), Bonn 1984. * H. DREXLER, Ammianstudien, Hildesheim 1974. * T. G. ELLIOTT, Ammianus Marcellinus and Fourth Century History, Sarasota, Florida 1983. * D. FLACH, Von Tacitus zu Ammian, Historia 21, 1972, 333–350. * J. FONTAINE, Ammien Marcellin, historien romantique, BAGB 1969, 417–435. * R. M. FRANKS, Ammianus Marcellinus 21. 16. 7: a Re-examination, Hermes 122, 1994, 253–256. * H. GÄRTNER, Einige Überlegungen zur kaiserzeitlichen Panegyrik und zu Ammians Charakteristik des Kaisers Julian, AAWM 1968. * H. HAGENDAHL, Studia Ammianea, diss. Uppsala 1921. * A. HELTTULA, Post depositum militiae munus. Official Phraseology in Ammianus Marcellinus, Arctos suppl. 2, 1985, 41–56. * E. D. HUNT, Christians and Christianity in Ammianus Marcellinus, CQ 35, 1985, 186–200. * M. KAUTTBENDER, Vielfalt und Funktion der Darstellungselemente in den Res gestae des Ammianus Marcellinus, Heidelberg 1991. * W. LIEBESCHÜTZ, Ammianus, Julian and Divination, in: Roma renascens. FS I. OPELT, Frankfurt 1988, 198–213. * J. F. MATTHEWS, Ammianus and the Eastern Frontier in the Fourth Century. A Participant's View, in: P. FREEMAN, D. KENNEDY, eds., The Defence of the Roman and Byzantine East. Proceedings of a Colloquium . . . (Sheffield 1986), Oxford 1986, 549–564. * J. F. MATTHEWS, The Roman Empire of Ammianus, London 1989. * J. F. MATTHEWS, The Origin of Ammianus, CQ n.s. 44, 1994, 252–269. * A. MOMIGLIANO, The Lonely Historian Ammianus Marcellinus, ASNP 4, 1974, 1393–1407. * V. NERI, Costanzo, Giuliano e l'ideale del civilis princeps nelle Storie di Ammiano Marcellino, Roma 1984. * V. NERI, Ammiano e il cristianesimo. Religione e politica nelle Res gestae di Ammiano Marcellino, Bologna 1985. * K.-G. NEUMANN, Taciteisches im Werk des Ammianus Marcellinus, München 1987. * S. M. OBERHELMAN, The Provenance of the Style of Ammianus Marcellinus, QUCC n.s. 27, 3, 1987, 79–89. * R. P. ROBINSON, The Hersfeldensis and the Fuldensis of Ammianus Marcellinus, Univ. of Missouri Studies 11, 1936, 118–140. * W. RICHTER, Die Darstellung der Hunnen bei Ammianus Marcellinus (31, 2, 1–11), Historia 23, 1974, 343–377. * K. ROSEN, Ammianus Marcellinus, Darmstadt 1982. * G. SABBAGH, La méthode d'Ammien Marcellin. Recherches sur la construction du discours historique dans les Res gestae, Paris 1978. * C. SAMBERGER, Die 'Kaiserbiographie' in den Res gestae des Ammianus Marcellinus. Eine Untersuchung zur Komposition der ammianischen Geschichtsschreibung, Berlin 1968. * R. SEAGER, Ammianus Marcellinus. Seven Studies in his Language and Thought. Columbia, Missouri UP 1986. * W. SEYFARTH, Der codex Fuldensis und der codex E des Ammianus Marcellinus, ADAW 1962, 2. * W. SUERBAUM, Ammianus Marcellinus, in: Vom antiken zum mittelalterlichen Staatsbegriff, Münster 3rd ed. 1977 (augmented), 159–169. * R. SYME, Ammianus and the Historia Augusta, Oxford 1968. * E. A. THOMPSON, The Historical Work of Ammianus Marcellinus, Groningen (1947) 1969. * H. TRÄNKLE, Ammianus Marcellinus als römischer Geschichtsschreiber, A&A 11, 1962, 21–33. * G. VIANSINO, Studi sulle Res gestae di Ammiano Marcellino, Salerno 1977. * J. VOGT, Ammianus Marcellinus als erzählender Geschichtsschreiber der Spätzeit, AAWM 1963, 8. * T. E. J. Wiedemann, Between Men and Beasts. Barbarians in Ammianus Marcellinus, in: J. G. MOXON, J. D. STUART, A. J. Woodman, eds., Past Perspectives in Greek and Roman Historical Writing. Papers Presented at a Conference in Leeds (1983), Cambridge 1986, 189–201. * L. E. WILSHIRE, Did Ammianus Write a Continuation of Tacitus?, CJ 68, 1972–1973, 221–227.

B. ORATORY AND EPISTOLOGRAPHY

FRONTO

Life and Dates

M. Cornelius Fronto from Cirta in Africa earned a brilliant reputation as a lawyer, orator and author. He was admitted to the senate during the reign of Hadrian. Under Antonius Pius he held the consulship in 143 and was appointed tutor to Princes Marcus and Verus, who later remained devoted to him. For reasons of ill health he was unable to assume the office of proconsul for which he was selected. He outlived his wife, five daughters and one grandchild.

Survey of Works

The corpus of Letters consists of various small groups of texts and appendices. His correspondence with Emperors Marcus, Verus, and Antoninus is at the heart of the work; in addition we find several letters to other friends. There is a touching literary self-portrait on the occasion of his grandson's death (235). Elaborate letters treat rhetorical (135 V.D.H.) and historical subjects (De bello Parthico 220 V.D.H.). Parerga include e.g. Principia Historiae (202 V.D.H.) and humorous pieces such as Laudes fumi et pulveris (215 V.D.H.) and Laudes neglegentiae (218 V.D.H.); furthermore there is a rendering of the Arion myth (241 V.D.H.), and a fable on the creation of sleep (231 V.D.H.). Several letters are written in Greek.

Of the lost speeches, the most important was one directed Against the Christians.

Sources, Models, and Genres

At that time teachers and pupils frequented libraries where they could read works of Cato the Elder, but they also used notebooks containing phrases from early Latin authors (34; 253). Greek stories could be retold in Latin (thus Herodotus is the source for the Arion myth).

Literary Technique

Refinement of expression became a way of thinking and a way of life. Conventional concepts such as prooemium and narratio gained intrinsic value and a personal meaning for the inspired and inspiring teacher (how disappointing for him when his pupils later put away childish things like rhetoric!). Diverse styles and literary forms were cultivated eagerly and playfully. Fronto's diction was pictorial, emotional, and vivid. His practice as a writer must be examined in detail against the background of rhetorical theory, which he had thoroughly mastered. His works are a living expression of his teachings.

Language and Style

Fronto's archaism is a parallel phenomenon to Greek Atticism, which is to be observed in the same period;<sup>1</sup> in fact, our author writes like an Atticist when he is writing Greek.

The principle of appropriateness determines the diversity of stylistic levels which Fronto has at his command: in forensic orations the tone is unaffected; in epideictic, pompous; for the writing of history, Sallust served as a model (207–210 V.D.H.).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

'Antipathy towards philosophy' and 'archaism' as catch phrases do more to obfuscate than to clarify the essence of Fronto's pedagogics.

Fronto's Roman sense of cultivated literary form explains his disapproval of Marcus Aurelius' conversion to philosophy.<sup>2</sup> This reveals not only the old antagonism of philosophy and rhetoric but also a tacit remonstrance of the Latin mind with its preference for the beautiful surface of life against the first dawns of an age of abstractions.

Fronto recommends colorem vetusculum appingere, 'to add a patina of age' (150 V.D.H.); he is sorry not to find archaic words in Cicero

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 361–362 with n. 2.

<sup>2</sup> Fronto 141–149; 151–152 V.D.H. Evidence on the old conflict between philosophers and teachers of rhetoric in NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 250, 2; After all, Marcus honestly took trouble to study Cato's speeches.

(57 V.D.H.), and Seneca's modern style is not congenial to his taste (153 V.D.H.). These sides of Fronto are well known and have sometimes been over-emphasized to the point of caricature.

It is less known that Fronto praised his pupil for not having used archaic vocabulary in a political speech. This gives proof of good taste and common sense.

Archaism is not an aim in itself but an upshot of the significant overall principle of delectus verborum.<sup>1</sup> Everything is a question of subtle shades of meaning (e.g. 260–261 V.D.H.). Fronto has an especially high opinion of Cicero's Letters to Atticus for the purity of their language. His ultimate goal is to find in each case the proper word (verba propria 159 V.D.H.). He is, therefore, an earnest defender of a moderate Atticism.

Ideas II

Despite the ludicrous tone of some of his writings he is deadly serious about rhetoric as a path of education, he even deems rhetoric the form of paideia worthy of man (171 V.D.H.). Granted that philosophy is 'divine': so let us leave it to the gods. The uncompromising dedication of his pupil Marcus Aurelius to philosophy is beyond him. The situation recalls Ausonius' correspondence with Paulinus who had become a monk.

There is an encounter of two worlds: averse to doctrinaire pedantry, Fronto tries to grasp reality by means of language in its literary form, not by means of the abstract language of philosophy. In this regard our master of beautiful speech is deeply rooted in classical Roman traditions, whereas Emperor Marcus Aurelius is the harbinger of a new epoch which, with more intransigence, will place truth higher than beauty.

Transmission

What remains of Fronto's writings and letters was discovered by A. MAI in 1815. This was the same palimpsest (6th century) which contained fragments of Cicero's De re publica (see Cicero). Leaves of it are found in Milan and in the Vatican.

<sup>1</sup> 57–58; 88; 104. 8–9; 136. 1–2; 144. 18–19; 146. 18; 150. 10; 151. 25; 159; 228. 3; 42. 18 V.D.H.

Influence

The recognition which Fronto found among his contemporaries and later generations is somewhat surprising. It was largely owing to his pedagogic impetus. He was said to be inferior only to Cicero, nay to equal him as alter, non secundus (paneg. 8 [= V] 14. 2). However, the appearance of Fronto's name in an exemplary verse in Diomedes is not necessarily indicative of personal reading.<sup>1</sup>

The first part of the Octavius of Minucius Felix may contain material from Fronto's book against the Christians, to our knowledge the only Latin text of this kind.

Editions: A. MAI, Mediolani 1815 (ed. princ.), Romae 2nd ed. 1823 (augmented). * B. G. NIEBUHR, Berolini 1816. * S. A. NABER, Lipsiae 1857. * C. R. HAINES (TTrN), 2 vols., London 1919–1920. * M. P. J. VAN DEN HOUT, Lugduni Batavorum 1954. * Id., Lipsiae 1988. * R. B. RUTHERFORD (selection TrN, in: A. S. L. FARQUHARSON's Tr of Marcus Aurelius), Oxford 1989. ** Indices: F. GARRONE, M. MATTEA, F. RUSSO, Index verborum mit statistischen Aufstellungen zu De eloquentia und De orationibus von M. C. Fronto, Hildesheim 1976. * R. FONTANELLA, M. OLIVETTI, M. R. VOTTA, Index verborum mit statistischen Aufstellungen zu De nepote amisso, De feriis Alsien-sibus, Arion, Laudes fumi et pulveris, Laudes negligentiae von M. C. Fronto, Hildesheim 1981.

G. W. BOWERSOCK, Greek Sophists in the Roman Empire, Oxford 1969, 124–126. * D. BROCK, Studies in Fronto and his Age, Cambridge 1911. * E. CHAMPLIN, The Chronology of Fronto, JRS 64, 1974, 136–159. * E. CHAMPLIN, Fronto and Antonine Rome, Cambridge, Mass. 1980. * P. V. COVA, I principia historiae e le idee storiografiche di Frontone, Napoli 1970. * P. V. COVA, Marco Cornelio Frontone, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 873–918. * P. FRASSINETTI, L'orazione di Frontone contro i cristiani, GIF 3, 1949, 238–254. * R. HANSLIK, Die Anordnung der Briefsammlung Frontos, CV 1, 1935, 21–47. * R. MARACHE, La critique littéraire de langue latine et le développement du goût archaisant au II<sup>e</sup> siècle de notre ère, Rennes 1952. * R. MARACHE, Mots nouveaux et mots archaïques chez Fronton et Aulu-Gelle, Paris 1957. * M. MATTEA, Statistical Researches in the Verbum Lexical Field on the Frontonian Rhetorical Works De orationibus and De eloquentia, Revue d'organisation intern. pour l'étude des langues anciennes par ordinateur 1975, 3, 35–48. * T. MOMMSEN, Die Chronologie der Briefe Frontos, Hermes 8, 1874, 199–216, repr. in: Gesammelte Schriften 4, Berlin 1906, 469–486. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 362–367. * PETER, Brief 124–

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, addendum to p. 367.

135. * L. POLVERINI, Sull'epistolario di Frontone come fonte storica, in: Seconda miscellanea greca e romana, Roma 1968, 437–459. * A. RAMÍREZ DE VERGER, Frontón y la segunda sofística, Habis 4, 1973, 115–126. * G. P. SELVATICO, Lo scambio epistolare tra Frontone e M. AURELIO: Esercitazioni retoriche e cultura letteraria, MAT 5, 5, 4, 1981, 225–301. * P. SOVERINI, Aspetti e problemi delle teorie retoriche frontoniane, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 919–1004. * S. TIMPANARO, Il ius osculi e Frontone, Maia n.s. 39, 1987, 201–211. * J. J. WESTERMAN, Archaïsche en archistische Woordkunst, diss. Amsterdam 1939. * J. E. G. WHITEHORNE, Ad amicos 1, 5 and 6 and the Date of Fronto's Death, in: C. DEROUX, ed., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, vol. 1, Bruxelles 1979, 475–482. * J. E. G. ZETZEL, The Subscriptions in the Manuscripts of Livy and Fronto and the Meaning of emendatio, CPh 75, 1980, 3–59.

THE PANEGYRICI LATINI

Dates

The Panegyrici Latini are typical historical evidence for the century from 289 to 389, especially for the years 289–321. If not particularly abounding in truthfulness, these texts at least are genuine documents of their age, although the collection was compiled later (s. below). The authors were high officials or literati who had enjoyed a rhetorical education; in fact, teachers of rhetoric were close to the imperial court and had access to offices like magister memoriae. Even so, as can be seen in Gaul, they often preserved a lasting attachment to their schools, coming back or making donations to them.

Survey of Works

With his famous speech on Trajan, the noble senator Pliny leads off, being by far the earliest author. There follow—in reverse chronology—Pacatus (on Theodosius: 389), Mamertinus (on Julian: 362), and Nazarius (on Constantine: 321).

Next, there is a sequence of eight shorter anonymous panegyrici which are numbered separately; this second collection was probably compiled in late antiquity. The speeches of this group are arranged in reverse chronology as well (A.D. 311–289); as for their provenance, the focus is on Gaul (Autun and Trier).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Along with Pliny the Younger, the classic of the panegyricus, the authors rely on Cicero and also on Fronto. The genre is determined by the λόγος βασιλικός.

Literary Technique

The inventio of the panegyrici is based on the categories provided by classical speeches on kings: origin, education, early exploits, regal virtues—such subdivisions are reminiscent of biography which, however, is more recent as a genre and does name vices along with virtues. Some of these categories may be passed over by way of a praeteritio. Examples drawn from history or myth are an integral part of the literary ornatus.

Today the literary quality of the panegyrici is appreciated rather highly; without these predecessors Claudian could not have written his brilliant poetic panegyrici. Although he left those orators far behind him, the panegyrici are a typical phenomenon of Roman literary history at the intersection of prose and poetry.

Language and Style

The Latin of the panegyrici is refined. Typical are exalting or derogatory circumlocutions like maiestas tua, mediocritas mea (e.g. paneg. 6 [VII] 1. 1): documents of the courtly roots of our modern craze for titles. Under the auspices of emotional rhetoric poetic elements increasingly penetrate into prose; the next step would be the adoption of verse form. The technique of prose rhythm is elaborate.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The intention to offer exemplary speeches tells from the entire collection, especially from the initial position of Pliny's speech on Trajan. It is the declared aim of published panegyrici not only to praise the emperors but also to convey a patriotic attitude to students. Even if this had not been told expressly, nobody would fail to recognize the propagandistic character of these texts.

A speech (9, V) of Eumenius (A.D. 298) documents the rhetor's view of his function and his awareness of having a cultural mission: after years of successful service at the imperial court, he became the headmaster of his former school at Autun. Now he asks to be allowed to donate his salary (which has been doubled) for the reconstruction of his school. At the end of the speech the rebirth of the school is linked to that of the empire. In fact, the importance of the schools of Gaul can be measured by their influence on Latin literature during that epoch. Indirectly the schools benefited from the ambitions of emperors who surrounded themselves with literati.

Ideas II

It is tempting to condemn morally and aesthetically the courtly flattery and the insincere verbosity of many a panegyricus. One should try, however, to do justice to these texts as historical sources and as rhetorical artifacts. A speech may acknowledge and idealize given circumstances, but also, in the way of 'handbooks for princes', hint at the expectations of the people. A thorough study of the ruler's virtues selected in each particular case may be rewarding. Conventional formulas may reflect an emperor's intentions, a religious legitimation of his power, the damnatio of his adversary, the idea of Rome, his vision of the barbarians, the great theme of conservatio rei publicae, and, more generally, the moral attitude promoted by the imperial court. Moreover the speeches again and again allow the reader to get a glimpse of conditions of life in Gaul. Nevertheless it is fully understandable that later generations took little interest in these ephemeral products which are more flattering for the addressees than for their authors.

Tradition

Three independent strands of tradition are traced to one archetype.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> R. A. B. MYNORS, edition 1964, Praefatio.

Influence

In the Middle Ages the Panegyrici were rarely copied. Even after the dawn of the Renaissance they were outshone by Claudian's brilliance.

Editions: Ae. BAEHRENS, Lipsiae 1874. * W. A. BAEHRENS, Lipsiae 1911. * E. GALLETIER (TTrN), 3 vols., Paris 1949–1955. * R. A. B. MYNORS, Oxford 1964. * V. PALADINI, P. FEDELI, Roma 1976. * Cf. also W. J. G. LUBBE, Incerti Panegyricus Constantino Augusto dictus, Lugduni Batavorum 1955. * A. CHAUVOT (TTrC), Procope de Gaza, Priscien de Césarée. Panégyriques de l'empereur Anastase I<sup>er</sup>, Bonn 1986. ** Concordance: T. JANSON, A Concordance to the Latin Panegyrics, Hildesheim 1979. ** Bibl.: P. L. SCHMIDT 1989 (s. below).

U. ASCHE, Roms Weltherrschaftsidee und Außenpolitik in der Spätantike im Spiegel der Panegyrici Latini, diss. Bonn 1983. * W. A. BAEHRENS, Panegyricorum Latinorum editionis novae praefatio maior, diss. Groningen 1910. * G. G. BELLONI, La bellezza divinizzante nei Panegirici e nei ritratti monetali di Costantino, CISA 7, 1981, 213–222. * C. CASTELLO, Il pensiero politico-religioso di Costantino alla luce dei panegirici, in: Accademia romanistica Costantiniana, Perugia 1975, 49–117. * F. DEL CHICCA, La struttura retorica del panegirico latino tardo imperiale in prosa. Teoria e prassi, AFLC 6, 1985 (1987), 79–113. * T. JANSON, Notes on the Text of the Panegyrici Latini, CPh 79, 1984, 15–27. * D. LASSANDRO, La demonizzazione del nemico politico nei Panegyrici Latini, CISA 7, 1981, 237–249. * D. LASSANDRO, Inventario dei manoscritti dei Panegyrici Latini, InvLuc 10, 1988, 107–200. * M. C. L'HUILLIER, La figure de l'empereur et les vertus impériales. Crise et modèle d'identité dans les Panégyriques latins, in: Les grandes figures religieuses. Fonctionnement pratique et symbolique dans l'Antiquité (Besançon 1984), Paris 1986, 529–582. * V. LOI, Struttura e topoi del panegirico classico nei Sermones de sanctis di S. Agostino, Augustinianum 14, 1974, 591–604. * S. MAC CORMACK, Latin Prose Panegyrics. Tradition and Discontinuity in the Later Roman Empire, RE Aug 22, 1976, 29–77. * W. PORTMANN, Geschichte in der spätantiken Panegyrik, Bern 1988. * B. S. RODGERS, The Panegyrici Latini. Emperors, Colleagues, Usurpers and the History of the Western Provinces, diss. Berkeley 1978. * B. S. RODGERS, Divine Insinuation in the Panegyrici Latini, Historia 35, 1986, 69–104. * G. SABBABH, De la rhétorique à la communication politique. Les panégyristes latins, BAGB 1984, 363–388. * P. L. SCHMIDT, HLL 5, 1989, § 528 (fundamental). * R. SEAGER, Some Imperial Virtues in the Latin Prose Panegyrics. The Demands of Propaganda and the Dynamics of Literary Composition, PLLS 4, 1984, 129–165.

SYMMACHUS

Life and Dates

Q. Aurelius Symmachus (ca. 345–402) descended from a distinguished and well-to-do family. After a brilliant rhetorical training in Gaul he held important offices.<sup>1</sup> Being the most eminent orator of his age he became the defender of the Roman senate, many members of which adhered to paganism, against the Christian emperors. In 382 Emperor Gratian banished him from Rome for having protested against the removal of the altar of Victory from the Curia Julia.<sup>2</sup> The sudden death of this sanctimonious and cruel emperor, combined with poor harvests and ensuing famine (383) encouraged the pagan opposition, which was still powerful. In 384, therefore, Symmachus (rel. 3) asked Emperor Valentinian II to reinstall the altar and to renew the privileges of pagan priests. He underrated, however, the firm determination of Bishop Ambrose. Thereupon, Symmachus took the part of the usurper Maximus; after the latter's death (388) he saved his life by writing a panegyricus on Theodosius. In 391 he became consul.

He exchanged ideas with Ausonius who dedicated to him a poem on the number three.

Survey of Works

Speeches: We have remains of eight speeches, among which two on Emperor Valentinian I and one on Gratian when a youth.

Epistulae (nine books).

Relationes: These are missives, which the praefectus urbi sent to the emperor; they may justly be called the 10th book of his letters (cf. Pliny's collection of letters).

Sources,<sup>3</sup> Models, and Genres

Symmachus' knowledge of Greek authors is limited; of Latin authors, he especially relies on those read in classrooms—Terence, Virgil, <sup>1</sup> Pontifex maior, proconsul in Africa, praefectus urbi (384–385), consul (391).

<sup>2</sup> This altar, where the senators offered incense and wine, had been inaugurated by Augustus in 29 B.C., removed by Constantius II, re-established by Julian, and taken away again by Gratianus.

<sup>3</sup> W. KROLL, De Q. Aurelii Symmachi studiis Graecis et Latinis, Breslau 1891.

Sallust, Cicero—and, to a lesser degree, Horace and Lucan. Historical examples are usually drawn from Valerius Maximus, less frequently from Cicero, Livy,<sup>1</sup> and Pliny the Elder. Moreover, he knows Ovid, Silius, Juvenal as well as Tacitus, Fronto, and probably Gellius. The influence of Pliny the Younger is considerable, as is evinced not only from the panegyrici but also from the collection of his letters, down to the number of books (9 + 1).

Literary Technique

In his letters Symmachus adheres to the principle of brevity; neither treatises nor longer narratives are found there. He bestows much care upon style. There is an unobtrusive elegance in his artful variations of the topics of congratulation, consolation, and thanksgiving. His letters are less colorful and personal than those of Cicero or Pliny. The well-being of his daughter and the career of his son are almost the only subjects to elicit some sentiment from the writer. Nevertheless, it is rewarding to muse over the subtle network of personal and political relationships behind the exquisite politeness and careful avoidance of concrete data in Symmachus' correspondence.

The letters are not arranged chronologically but, in the main, according to addressees (especially in books 1-7).

In the Relatio, Symmachus' literary art rises to the heights of sublimity. The great speech of Roma personified asking for tolerance is valid at all times: 'what all revere, that must be the One. We look up to the same stars, we have the heaven in common, the same world holds us. What does it matter, which way each one chooses to find the truth? Too great is the mystery, that a single path should lead to it' (rel. 3. 10).

Language and Style

The vocabulary of the letters is strictly limited; despite the presence of archaic and contemporary elements Symmachus makes an effort to write classical Latin. For all pretended ease and homeliness, his letters are carefully polished.

The style of his speeches is more colorful. Macrobius defines it as

---

<sup>1</sup> The literary interests of the Symmachi gave rise to a revision of Livy as well.

pingue et floridum ('well-nourished and flowery') and ranges it with that of Pliny the Younger (Sat. 5. 1. 7).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Symmachus is aware of the fact that, in letters, words establish communication, even if there is nothing to communicate:<sup>1</sup> we had rather not talk of 'words without content'. His theoretical remarks show that he is open to fashionable rhetoric as well as to archaism. He pertinently teaches his son how to distinguish the familiar tone of letters from the rhetorical array of public speech: on the one hand, there is maturum aliquid et comicum and a certain neglegentia, on the other, aculei orationis and arma facundiae (epist. 7. 9). The stylistic differences between letters and speeches, therefore, are based on a conscious choice.<sup>2</sup>

Ideas II

The intellectual horizon of Symmachus reveals a senator's greatness and limits: his attention is focused on problems of the city and of his class; he overestimates the importance of Rome and its senate to world politics. Senatorial bias explains his mistrust of the new 'aristocracy' of court officials<sup>3</sup> and his courageous resistance to the restoration of censure. We cannot exclude that in his defence of old religion<sup>4</sup> some material interests in priestly offices were involved; however, the financial significance of pagan cults during that period was negligible. Hence in this respect the luster of his reputation is not obscured. Unlike the unified phalanx of the Christians in the senate, the pagan group was far from unanimous, although in those days the defenders of old Roman religion and the adherents of oriental cults could not be clearly distinguished. Symmachus, therefore, for reasons of tactics, had to be satisfied to find some common ground

<sup>1</sup> Epist. 1. 15; 2. 35. 2; 2. 69; 3. 10; 6. 37.

<sup>2</sup> Epist. 3. 11; 3. 44.

<sup>3</sup> However, since Valentinian and Gratian, there was a mixed career, allowing even senators coming from Rome to participate in the administration of the empire.

<sup>4</sup> Symmachus even advocated the punishment of a guilty Vestal according to the mos maiorum.

for the divergent opinions. Not surprisingly, then, he tends to minimize the fact that the problem of the altar of Victory was a question of principle. Since confrontation is not his aim, he dwells less on the conflict between old and new religion.

Along with old Roman traditions—like the ideal of liberty and the belief in the authority of Roman history—Neo-Platonism was a further possible basis of a consensus. The idea of tolerance inherent in Neo-platonism had been played off in favor of Christianity by Constantine. Now, Symmachus, in his turn, vainly conjures up the Neo-Platonic view of a plurality of intellectual paths: Uno itinere non potest perveniri ad tam grande secretum, ‘not by one avenue only can we arrive at so tremendous a secret’ (rel. 3. 10). This does not compel us however to turn Symmachus into a philosopher; in an old Roman vein, he breaks off the theoretical discussion: sed haec otiosorum disputatio est, ‘but this is a matter of discussion for idlers’ (10).

Transmission

Orationes: The remains of the speeches are found in the same Bobiensis rescriptus (6th century) to which we owe Cicero’s De re publica and Fronto as well. The 27 folios relevant for Symmachus are preserved at Milan (Ambrosianus E 147 inf.) and Rome (Vaticanus Lat. 5750).

Epistulae: Only the Parisinus 8623 (9th century) contains the complete titles and the division into books. Among the other manuscripts the Vaticanus Palatinus 1576 (11th century) stands out. Furthermore, there are florilegia.

Relationes: There are three basic witnesses: Tegurinus Monacensis 18 787 (11th century), Mettensis 500 (11th century) and (to replace a lost codex) the edition of S. GELENIUS, Basileae 1549. The 3rd relatio is transmitted in the manuscripts of Ambrose as well.

Influence<sup>1</sup>

The influence of the 3rd relatio was especially furthered by the detailed response of Ambrose, to which Symmachus’ speech was annexed.

The celebrated orator, whose letters were much sought after by his contemporaries, won a certain recognition even with Christian authors; examples are his belated poetic opponent, Prudentius, and Sidonius, who would imitate him in his correspondence.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> G. POLARA, La fortuna di Simmaco dalla tarda antichità al secolo XVII, Vichiana n.s. 1, 1972, 250–263.

Editions: orat.: A. MAI, Mediolani 1815 (the Milanese fragments) and (together with the Vatican fragments) in: Scriptorum nova collectio, Romae 1825 (editiones principes). * B. G. NIEBUHR, Berolini 1816. * O. SEECK, MGH, AA 6, 1, Berolini 1883. * A. PABST (TTrC), Darmstadt 1989. * F. DEL CHICCA (TTrC), Laudatio in Valentinianum Senioreem Augustum prior, Roma 1984. * epist. and rel.: J. SCHOTT, Argentorati 1510. * S. GELENIUS, Basileae 1549. * O. SEECK (s. above). * epist.: J. P. CALLU (TTrC), vol. 1 (books 1 and 2), Paris 1972; vol. 2 (books 3–5), 1982. * Book 4: A. MARCONE (TTrC), Pisa 1987. * Book 5: P. RIVOLTA TIBERGA (TTrC), Pisa 1992. * Book 6: A. MARCONE (TTrC), Pisa 1983. * Book 9: S. RODA (TTrC), Pisa 1981. * rel.: R. H. BARROW (TTrN), Oxford 1973. * D. VERA (TTrC hist., indices; appendix on 10. 1–2), Pisa 1981. * rel. 3: R. KLEIN (TTrC), Der Streit um den Victoriaaltar. Die dritte Relatio des Symmachus und die Briefe 17, 18 und 57 des Mailänder Bischofs Ambrosius, Darmstadt 1972. ** Concordance: V. LOMANTO, Concordantiae in Q. Aurelii Symmachi opera, Hildesheim 1983. A. H. ARMSTRONG, The Way and the Ways. Religious Tolerance and Intolerance in the Fourth Century A.D., V Chr 38, 1984, 1–17. * R. BADALÌ, Premessa ad uno studio sulla natura delle clausole simmachiane, RCCM 8, 1966, 38–52. * M. BERTOLINI, Sull'atteggiamento religioso di Q. Aurelio Simmaco, SCO 36, 1986, 189–208. * G. W. BOWERSOCK, Symmachus and Ausonius, Paris 1986. * F. CANFORA, Simmaco e Ambrogio o di una antica controversia sulla tolleranza e sull'intolleranza, Bari 1970. * A. CHASTAGNOL, Le sénat dans l'œuvre de Symmaque, in: Colloque genevois sur Symmaque, Paris 1986, 73–96. * F. DEL CHICCA, Sull'abundantia sermonis nelle orazioni di Simmaco, BStudLat 8, 1978, 63–75. * S. CHRISTO, Q. Aurelius Symmachus. A Political and Social Biography, diss. New York 1974. * A. DIHLE, Zum Streit um den Altar der Viktoria, in: Romanitas et Christianitas, Studia J. H. WASZINK, Amsterdam 1973, 81–97. * G. HAVERLING, Studies on Symmachus' Language and Style, Göteborg 1988. * T. HÖLSCHER, Victoria Romana, Archäologische Untersuchungen zur Geschichte und Wesensart der römischen Siegesgöttin von den Anfängen bis zum Ende des 3. Jh., Mainz 1967. * R. KLEIN, Symmachus. Eine tragische Gestalt des ausgehenden Heidentums, Darmstadt 1971, 2nd ed. 1986. * R. KLEIN, s. also Editions. * R. KLEIN, Die Romidee bei Symmachus, Claudian und Prudentius, in: F. PASCHOUD, ed., 1986, 119–144. * H. O. KRÖNER, Die politischen Ansichten und Ziele des Q. Aurelius Symmachus, in: Politeia und Res Publica, Gedenkschrift R. STARK, ed. by P. STEINMETZ, Wiesbaden 1969, 337–356.

<sup>1</sup> Prud. c. Symm. 1. 632 o linguam miro verborum fonte fluentem; Sid. Ap. epist. 1. 1 Q. Symmachi rotunditatem.

* J. F. MATTHEWS, Symmachus and the Oriental Cults, JRS 63, 1973, 175-195. * J. F. MATTHEWS, The Letters of Symmachus, in: J. W. BINNS, ed., Latin Literature of the Fourth Century, London 1974, 58-99. * P. MELONI, Il rapporto fra impegno politico e fede religiosa in Simmaco e Ambrogio, Sandalion 1, 1978, 153-169. * F. PASCHOD, Réflexions sur l'idéal religieux de Symmaque, Historia 14, 1965, 215-235. * F. PASCHOD, ed., Colloque genevois sur Symmaque à l'occasion du mille-six-centième anniversaire du conflit de l'autel de la Victoire, Paris 1986. * S. RODA, Simmaco nel gioco politico del suo tempo, SDHI 39, 1973, 53-114. * D. ROMANO, Simmaco, Palermo 1959. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Critical Notes on Symmachus' Private Letters, CPh 78, 1983, 315-323. * K. THRAEDE, Sprachlich-Stilistisches zu Briefen des Symmachus, RhM 111, 1968, 260-289. * J. WYTZES, Der letzte Kampf des Heidentums in Rom, Leiden 1976.

C. NOVEL

PROSE FICTION OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

The reader should refer to our preliminary remarks on the Roman novel (above pp. 1205–1211). There are links to historiography (s. especially the novels on Troy and on Alexander) and to hagiography, especially in the literary form created by Jerome. Apuleius' work influenced even the serious type of autobiography created by Augustine.

APULEIUS

Life and Dates

Apuleius from Madauros in Numidia was proud of his home town, in which he and his father were the most respected citizens (apol. 24); no less did he cherish Carthage as an important cultural center (flor. 20). These mere facts are indicative of new developments; as seminal minds and upholders of civilization, Gauls and Spaniards now find rivals in Africa. Two generations after Pliny and Tacitus a great author had no longer to rely on Rome as a place where to make a name for himself; cultural provinces emerged, more and more independent of Rome.

Having spent some years of apprenticeship at Carthage (flor. 18. 86; 20. 97), he continued his studies in Athens (apol. 27). In Greece he was initiated into various religious mysteries (apol. 55. 8). Extended travels into the Orient swallowed up his father's fortune (apol. 23; met. 11. 27–28). He made a short stay in Rome where he seems to have practised as a lawyer.<sup>1</sup>

He returned to Africa; in 158 he was put on trial in Sabratha: he had married a rich widow in Oea and found himself accused of having won her affections by magic arts. His brilliant Apologia, which has come down to us, secured his acquittal. After this, Apuleius moved from Oea to Carthage. He never held any public office, but he was a priest of the emperor (sacerdos provinciae, Aug. epist. 138. 19) and a priest of Isis. He was a famous itinerant orator. Statues were erected to him in his lifetime; later generations deemed him a magician and miracle-worker. Apuleius was bilingual; yet, we possess only his Latin works.

---

<sup>1</sup> Apul. met. 11. 26; 28; 30; flor. 17. 77.

The De magia was delivered under Emperor Antoninus Pius (apol. 85) and the proconsul Claudius Maximus (perhaps in 158). At that time Apuleius had already composed speeches, ludicra carmina, and scientific works.

The parts of the Florida we can date fall on the sixties under Marcus Aurelius and Verus.

Among other reasons for assigning a late date to the Metamorphoses (between 180 and 190)<sup>1</sup> there is the fact that an important motif in the story of Psyche (6. 2. 6; 6. 4. 5; 6. 7. 4) was inspired by a rescript of Emperors Marcus and Commodus (dig. 11.4. 1-2; A.D. 177).<sup>2</sup>

The philosophic writings are almost devoid of chronological hints; Apuleius wrote them perhaps in his early years.

Survey of Works

Metamorphoses<sup>3</sup>

1: On his way from Corinth to Thessaly, the country of witches, Lucius, full of curiosity, listens to several magic tales.

2: At Hypata he stays at Milo's home. After a drinking bout (where horrific stories were told) he stabs to death three suspicious subjects.

3: After a capital trial the victims turn out to be wine-skins. Lucius observes the metamorphosis of his host's wife into an eagle owl and asks her maid-servant Fotis to change him into a bird as well. She takes the wrong ointment and turns him into an ass. Burglars lead him away as a pack animal.

4: He overhears, among other stories, the tale of Amor and Psyche (4. 28-6. 24) told by the robbers' mother:

<sup>1</sup> P. G. WALSH 1970, Appendix II.

<sup>2</sup> G. W. BOWERSOCK, Zur Geschichte des römischen Thessalien, RhM 108, 1965, 277-289, esp. 282, note 31.

<sup>3</sup> The Golden Ass (Aug. civ. 18. 18. 1) may be a laudatory title coined by readers; Augustine considered it authentic.

5: Psyche is not allowed to see her divine husband (allegedly a monster). Her envious sisters goad her into watching him while asleep and, should he be a monster, killing him. Oil dripping from her lamp wakes him up, and he must leave her.

6: Only after hard trials inflicted on her by Venus, her mother-in-law, is Psyche permitted to return to Amor.—In vain the ass tries to flee together with Charite, a girl kidnapped by the robbers.

7: Tlepolemos, Charite's bridegroom, rescues her and the ass by a stratagem. Soon, however, the ass is compelled to turn a mill. The main narrative is interspersed with pranks.

8: After the dreadful deaths of his benefactors the ass falls prey to various cruel masters; his life becomes slightly better among the depraved priests of Cybele, whose idol he has to carry.

9: The ass escapes several dangers. Episode: A wife betrays her husband with the would-be 'buyer' of a barrel. The ass moves from a miller to a gardener, who loses him to a soldier.

10: Episode: A stepmother's love unrequited by her virtuous stepson. The ass leads a life of idle luxury with two brothers, a cook and a confectioner. The master of the two buys him off and has him learn how to behave at table. A lady even falls in love with him. The ass flees to avoid a public exhibition of sodomy.

11: On the shore of Corinth he wakes up at midnight, prays to Isis, the queen of the heavens, and, finally, is redeemed: from a priest of Isis he receives the roses which save him (cf. p. 1455) and he devotes himself to the service of the goddess.

In the first three books Lucius is repeatedly warned against possible consequences of his curiosity (curiositas); books 4–10 describe his punishment; book 11, his redemption. The tale of Amor and Psyche is the most significant of the numerous inserted episodes.

The Apologia or De magia is a speech for the defence against the charge of magic. After an introduction, Apuleius proves that he has not exercised magical practices (29–65) and that there was no reason for having recourse to magic (from 66 to the end). For us this speech is valuable evidence on Apuleius' life and ancient magic.

Florida is the title of 23 showpieces from the speeches Apuleius had delivered as a sophist. Supposedly, an epitomator compiled these extracts out of four books.

The De Platone et eius dogmate combines Platonic and later doctrines, perhaps in the wake of Albinus or his teacher Gaius. A biographical sketch is followed by a discussion of physics (book 1) and ethics (book 2). For the loss of the section on logic, the dubious Peri hermeniae (Περὶ ἑρμηνείας), which has been transmitted separately, is small comfort. Its content is Aristotelian and Stoic.

The De deo Socratis is moulded as a speech. It treats of good demons, which range between gods and men.<sup>1</sup>

The De mundo is on cosmology and cosmography, including the problem of the governor of the universe. It is a translation, though not a flawless one, of the Pseudo-Aristotelian περὶ κόσμου. Augustine (civ. 4. 2) thinks that Apuleius is the author.<sup>2</sup>

The authenticity of the Peri hermeniae is disputed (s. above on the De Platone). It is a textbook of formal logic, discussing the theory of assertory syllogism.

Lost are poems, among which Latin and Greek hymns on Aesculapius, a novel entitled Hermagoras, historical works, speeches, works on science, fish, trees, agriculture, medicine, astronomy, arithmetic, music, and a translation of Plato's Phaedo. We do not know if Apuleius wrote an encyclopedia,<sup>3</sup> but the encyclopedic character of his œuvre may be taken for granted.

Spurious works

The Asclepius, the translation of a Hermetic revelation, mingles Greek and Egyptian ideas and announces the fall of pagan religion. Augustine read the Asclepius as a work of Apuleius. Lactantius used the Greek original.<sup>4</sup>

Sources, Models, and Genres

The extant examples of long picaresque novels are mostly written in Latin.<sup>5</sup> The Metamorphoses is the oldest voluminous Latin novel to have been preserved completely. The Greek parallel text Lucius or the ass, which has come down to us among Lucian's writings, is much shorter; in all probability, however, it is traced to a lost Greek original of larger dimensions,<sup>6</sup> which was used and reshaped by

<sup>1</sup> On the subject matter: Plutarch, De genio Socratis; Aug. civ. 8. 14–22; for the literary form: Max. Tyr. or. 8–9 HOBEIN.

<sup>2</sup> In favor of authenticity: F. REGEN 1971; hesitating J. REDFORS 1960.

<sup>3</sup> O. JAHN, Über römische Encyclopädien, BSG 1850, phil.-hist. Kl. 2, 263–287, esp. 282.

<sup>4</sup> Other spurious works: De herbarum medicaminibus (virtutibus); De remediis salutaribus; Physiognomonica. Yet, Apuleius is familiar with physiognomy (flor. 3; 15).

<sup>5</sup> The Iolaus fragment opens new perspectives, s. N. HOLZBERG 1986, 75–77; 126; s. now S. STEPHENS, J. WINKLER, Ancient Greek Novels. The Fragments, Princeton 1995 (Iolaus is on pp. 358–374); P. G. WALSH 1970 deems the Greek Lucius the immediate source of Apuleius and draws rather far-reaching conclusions on Roman originality.

<sup>6</sup> 'Lucius of Patrae' (in Photius, cod. 129); H. VAN THIEL (1971, 40–42) thinks that the author belonged to the Second Sophistic movement of the mid-second century A.D. (perhaps Phoenix or Phylax of Hypata); Lucian is favored by B. E. PERRY, followed by N. HOLZBERG, Apuleius und der Verfasser des griechischen Eselsromans, WJA 10, 1984, 161–177.

Apuleius as well,<sup>1</sup> but had no religious ending.

Apuleius adorned this basic stock by adding Milesian tales. The relevant work of Aristides of Miletus<sup>2</sup> (around 100 B.C.) had been Latinized by Cornelius Sisenna; such trivial literature was found in 53 B.C. in the luggage of the soldiers killed in the battle of Carrhae (Plut. Crassus 32). Such books contained funny tales like those known to us from Boccaccio's Decameron and Poggio's Facetiae. The most significant episode, the fairy tale of Amor and Psyche, may originate in folklore.

In antiquity, novels—like comedies—used freely invented plots; they were 'fiction' (πλάσμα), as opposed to the rest of classical literature, which was mostly based on myths. Integral parts of the formal aspect of the genre are a miraculous main plot (e.g. the story of the ass) and short stories of the Milesian type (met. 1. 1) inserted as episodes. As for the organization of a large-scale narrative, novelists could rely on the experiences of epic poets and historians, most notably the Odyssey (met. 9. 13) and Herodotus. The satirical element is rooted in Cynic philosophy, but also in a typically Roman tradition.

At first glance the work presents itself as an entertaining novel with an inorganic and alien religious ending. This impression is belied, however, by a closer study of Apuleius' literary technique. The polarity of magic transformation into an ass and religious salvation suggests that we consider the Metamorphoses an allegorical 'wondrous news' at the service of religious propaganda and an allegorical autobiography; to be sure, this explains only one facet of the work. In any case the Metamorphoses, despite their autobiographical disguise, cannot be explained as a novel of 'personal development', since in the ass no signs of moral progress are perceivable.<sup>3</sup>

Moreover, Apuleius alludes to juridic<sup>4</sup> sources: his age was the heyday of Roman jurisprudence.

He translated Plato's Phaedo; his speech for the defence followed <sup>1</sup> The fact that 'Lucius of Patrae' entitled his work Metamorphoseis, is no proof of his priority, of course. Yet, in the Greek Lucius, there are several obscure points which are only clarified by the Apuleian context. W. DILTHEY (Festrede Univ. Göttingen 1879, 12) held the unconventional view that Apuleius had been the author of the long Greek novel, too.

<sup>2</sup> On the novel: Phot. cod. 166. 111 b; Macr. somn. 1. 2. 8; the four stories of adultery in book 9 were probably taken from Aristides.

<sup>3</sup> Misleading E. PARATORE, La novella in Apuleio, Palermo 1928; W. WITTMANN 1938; H. RIEFSTAHL 1938, esp. 33–36 and 95–125.

<sup>4</sup> On the jocular character of such features: H. MAEHLER 1981.

Plato's Apology up to the title; the Timaeus ultimately lurks behind the cosmological part of the De Platone, although it is immediately rooted in the scholastic tradition of middle Platonism. The same applies to the De deo Socratis.

The De mundo is a free translation of a pseudo-Aristotelian treatise. The model itself is impregnated with an edifying Stoicism redolent of Posidonius. Chapters 13–14 on the winds are an insertion from Gellius (2. 22). Furthermore, the author adorns his translation with quotations from Virgil.

The Peri hermeniae, the authenticity of which is contested, is ultimately based on Aristotle, but also shows familiarity with later Peripatetic and Stoic logic.

Literary Technique

The technique of first-person narrative suggests an illusion of personal experience, thus enhancing 'credibility'. Moreover, the affinity between the author and the narrative ego confers on the novel an 'autobiographical' note which prepares the serious ending. Lucius is described with sympathy; he is not merely an object of derision. His simplicity is not emphasized explicitly (as happens with Psyche, his nobler counterpart) but it is implied.

There are more devices contributing to make Apuleius' narrative believable: the careful self-portrayal of the narrator, the testimony of independent witnesses, and the graphic vividness (ἐνάργεια) maintained throughout the work up to the precision of the geographical and chronological framework. Descriptions both add to evidentia and illustrate the deeper meaning of the story: in contradistinction to Ovid (met. 3. 138–252), Apuleius in one of his descriptions uses the Actaeon myth to emphasize curiositas (met. 2. 4–5), the central theme of his story.<sup>1</sup> Further descriptive insertions are the palace of Amor (met. 5. 1) and the den of thieves (met. 4. 6): the dark place of captivity and the divine abode form a contrast, in harmony with the function of the tale of Amor and Psyche, which is meant to comfort an abducted Charite.

Apuleius interspersed his novel with about twenty short stories. They are related to the main plot. The most substantial of them, the tale of Amor and Psyche, is shaped to reflect Lucius' error,<sup>1</sup> suffering and redemption to the last detail.

<sup>1</sup> A. WLOSOK 1969, 73–74.

A leading theme connecting various scenes of the novel is the failure of man's effort to redeem himself: the ass' endeavors to get hold of the roses of salvation on his own have no less disastrous consequences than Psyche's impatience to see the god (met. 5. 22–23). The contrast between fruitless attempts (like met. 3. 27) and actual deliverance (met. 11. 12–13) is devised with a good writer's forethought.

Roses are a recurrent element of imagery.<sup>2</sup> There are two sides to it: an erotic and a mystic one. Roses are attributes of the feast of love (met. 2. 16. 2) and of Venus herself (met. 6. 11. 2), and roseus refers to feminine charms (met. 2. 8. 13; 2. 17. 5; 4. 31. 2). The third book, which contains the metamorphosis, starts with the mention of Aurora's rosy arms.<sup>3</sup> On the other hand, Lucius is supposed to be delivered by eating roses. Between his abortive bid for seizing the roses by force (3. 27) and the real salvation with the assistance of the priest (11. 12–13) there are cases when the ass voluntarily renounces the roses, in order to save his life (3. 29.16; 4. 2). This motif, subtly interwoven with the main action, is also reflected in the inserted fairy-tale: there is Psyche's rose-coloured blood (5. 23. 6) and there are the roses of the heavenly marriage (6. 24. 7).

In his narrative technique Apuleius rivals historians and epic poets even in detail: the parody of the traditional epic horse simile is indeed delightful (7. 16; cf. esp. Verg. Aen. 11. 492–497). Parody borders on travesty, when the ass acts as a substitute for nobler mythic animals: the bull of Dirce, the ram of Phrixus, the dolphin of Arion, and even Pegasus (6. 27–30).

The Latin novel eschews the sentimental dimension typical of the Greek genre and gives a subtle, slightly ironical twist to traditional themes. This is not the kind of irony meaning the contrary of what is said; it is just a way of calling things into question. Our notion of parody is sometimes too straightforward as well: it is true that Apuleius' novel is, among other things, a dialogue with the literary tradition but it is not limited to parody.

<sup>1</sup> Also curiositas: met. 5. 6. 6; 5. 19. 3; 6. 20. 5; 6. 21. 4.

<sup>2</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 172–173, n. 18.

<sup>3</sup> On the symbolism of such beginnings: HEINZE, V.e.T. 366–370 (Engl. ed. 293–295).

Lucius' relationship with Fotis is a good illustration of a narrative art proceeding step by step and of indirect character portrayal. First, Apuleius summarizes the favorable impression Lucius got of the girl and merely hints at dark forebodings (2. 6). In a second phase physical attraction is verbalized in a more explicit, if indirect way; Fotis playfully warns Lucius (2. 7). Next follows a description of her head and hair, a kiss on her forehead and a further warning on the part of Fotis; finally a hug accompanied with the ominous word perii and an appointment for the evening (2. 8–10).

Such scenes—amusing, thrilling, and even risqué—are standard ingredients of the literature of religious entertainment and propaganda in late antiquity; there are even Christian examples.<sup>1</sup> Apuleius raises this trivial genre to the rank of literature.

In his Apologia and Florida Apuleius shows his mastery of rhetoric. Rhetoric is not even absent from the De deo Socratis which has been justly called a 'piece of rhetoric'.<sup>2</sup> No matter who compiled the selection, the Florida is an important step towards a new literary genre: the essay.

Language and Style

Latin is Apuleius' native tongue; we should not take at face value the narrator's remark that he finds difficulty in handling a foreign language (met. 1.1). A rare delight in and command of words (reminiscent of Plautus) allowed Apuleius to create a highly sophisticated language with an especially rich vocabulary—there are over 250 neologisms. Colloquialisms appear along with archaic and poetic words. Examples of popular usage are manduco (met. 6. 31 'glutton'), or corium crassum (met. 6. 26 'thick skin'). Examurcare is an especially graphic metaphor (met. 4. 14): to obtain good oil, it is important to remove the dregs. A military metaphor is curiously applied to a matron (met. 7. 6 decimo partus stipendio, 'ten terms of childbearing'). Likewise, juridic metaphors preserve their original meaning. When compelled to choose the path on which to escape, the ass and the girl strive, as it were, at law about the right way (viae herciscundae, met. 6. 29). An epithet worth mentioning is morsicantes oculi, 'twinkling eyes' (met. 2. 10). All stylistic devices are subject to definite literary aims on different levels—graceful, serious, or comic. Archaisms, for instance, confer a ‘rustic’ character on Psyche’s encounter with Pan (met. 5. 25).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the Acts of Saints Paul and Thecla.

<sup>2</sup> J. Tatum 1979, 130.

Words gain multiple resonances; irony is omnipresent, though not always as easy to grasp as when robbers are called mitissimi homines (met. 6. 26). Often we have to realize the Platonic meaning of a word; to give an example, permulcere (1. 1) literally refers to entertainment (cf. Macr. somn. 1. 2. 8), but also may be understood as a soothing incantation (ἐπαίδειν) in the sense of Phaedo 77 e.<sup>2</sup> Lucius and Fotis are telling names related to each other; with slight irony they allude to the symbolism of light typical of initiation (whereas Pseudo-Lucian is sensuous enough to call the girl ‘Palaestra’). In the last book, expressions used in mystery cults abound (particularly in met. 11. 23). Traditional notions are reinterpreted in terms of religion: service as true freedom (met. 11. 15), external and inner light and darkness (met. 11. 22 noctis obscurae non obscuris imperiis, ‘one dark night in lucid commands’).

The style of the Metamorphoses is unified, it excels in richness of imagery and sonority.<sup>3</sup> The second Sophistic movement,<sup>4</sup> that strange mixture of rhetoric and philosophy, here creates a particularly colorful, ‘Asiatic’ style: after the classicism of Domitian’s age a new phase of efflorescence. Apuleius is the author ‘most fond of rhymes in antiquity’.<sup>5</sup> Antitheses are not rare; they may convey a religious message: neque vocatus morari nec non iussus festinare deberem, ‘that I must be neither delaying when I was summoned nor hastening unbidden’ (met. 11. 21. 5). Prose rhythm is strongly marked.<sup>6</sup> Many features of Apuleius’ style come together in the self-glorification of Isis (met. 11. 5).<sup>7</sup> Compared to Isis-hymns,<sup>8</sup> the text of Apuleius exhibits a strong influence of the structural principles of prose artistry.

<sup>1</sup> L. CALLEBAT, L’archaïsme dans les Métamorphoses d’Apulée, REL 42, 1964, 346–361; C. RONCAIOLI, L’arcaismo nelle opere filosofiche di Apuleio, GIF 19, 1966, 322–356; on language and style s. also P. NEUENSCHWANDER, Der bildliche Ausdruck des Apuleius von Madaura, diss. Zürich 1913; P. MÉDAN, La latinité d’Apulée dans les Métamorphoses, Paris 1925; M. BERNHARD 1927; L. CALLEBAT, Sermo cotidianus dans les Métamorphoses d’Apulée, Caen 1968; VON ALBRECHT, Prose 167–176; K. KRAUTTER 1971, 115–122; L. CALLEBAT, La prose d’Apulée dans le De magia. Eléments d’interprétation, WS n.s. 18, 1984, 143–167; C. STRUB 1985.

<sup>2</sup> C. SCHLAM 1970.

<sup>3</sup> M. BERNHARD 1927, 255–258.

<sup>4</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 600–605.

<sup>5</sup> K. POLHEIM, Lateinische Reimprosa, Berlin 1925, 206.

<sup>6</sup> M. BERNHARD 1927, 249–255.

<sup>7</sup> J. TATUM 1979, 156–157.

<sup>8</sup> W. PEEK, Der Isishymnus von Andros und verwandte Texte, Berlin 1930; V. F. VANDERLIP, The Four Greek Hymns of Isidorus and the Cult of Isis, Toronto 1972.

Apuleius' style considerably varies from one work to another;<sup>1</sup> the clear diction of the Apologia is sometimes reminiscent of Cicero; the cultivated technical prose of the philosophical writings is often quickened to adopt the spirited pace of rhetoric, though remaining, on the whole, much more matter-of-fact than the style of the novel, let alone the Florida. The divergencies of style complicate the problems of authenticity.

Scholars found some evidence of a development from 'un-classical' clausulae based on word accent in the philosophical writings—provided that they have an early date—to a stricter method in the novel (which was certainly written in his later years).<sup>2</sup> The study of chronological and generic differences is still in the early stages.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

As an author, Apuleius admits to striving for perfection. In the ninth part of the Florida he emphasizes the importance of being careful and conscientious in intellectual creativity, all the more as his, Apuleius', intellectual output is greater than the mechanical output of Hippias. It is a glaring understatement, therefore, that, in the introduction to the Metamorphoses, he puts himself on a level with the trivial Milesian Tales.<sup>3</sup> What he has in mind is the transference of a Greek genre into Latin. It is his aim to cause both astonishment (ἐκπληξίς) and pleasure (laetaberis: met. 1. 1; ἡδονή). Only the last book will definitely reveal that entertainment is not his sole purpose.

Ideas II

Is there some coherence in our author's thought? In the Apologia, he distinguishes two kinds of love, one of them earthly, heavenly the other. The former binds, the latter releases. This idea allows an approach to the Metamorphoses as well.

<sup>1</sup> Löfstedt, Syntactica 303–305.

<sup>2</sup> F. REGEN, GGA 229, 1977, 186–227, esp. 188 with n. 9–10; on 'accentuating' aspects of his prose rhythm: B. AXELSON, Akzentuierender Klauselrhythmus bei Apuleius, De Platone und De mundo, Lund 1952 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> C. S. WRIGHT, 'No Art at All'. A Note on the Prooemium of Apuleius' Metamorphoses, CPh 68, 1973, 217–219.

It is true that Apuleius is not a philosopher in the academic acceptance of the word. His philosophical writings, which are not strictly scientific, document the influx of religion into philosophy. The author is a representative of the second Sophistic, a mixed being, made up of a homo religiosus, an 'African Socrates',<sup>1</sup> and a showman. Since the days of Cicero, Platonism had changed: skepticism declined, faith gained ground. Religion became the fulfilment even of philosophical search.

Apuleius considers himself a philosophus Platonicus (apol. 10; 64. 3; flor. 15. 26). The narrator of his novel claims to be, from the mother's side, a descendant of Plutarch the 'famous philosopher' (met. 1. 2). By his curiositas Lucius is drawn into all-too-earthly things; he tries to penetrate into domains of knowledge hidden from man. In the preserved Greek Lucius or The Ass, curiositas (περιεργία) is a mere means of characterization,<sup>2</sup> whereas Apuleius makes it a leitmotif of the entire novel. Fotis plays the part of a magic mystagogue in a negative sense; the metamorphosis into an ass is the perversion of an initiation. The hero's thirst for knowledge is initially focused on magic, the presumed key to the other world. The story condemns this conviction.<sup>3</sup>

The religion of Isis appears as sobria et purissima religio, 'austere and purest faith'; according to Plutarch (De Is. et Osir. 352 a-c) it is free from superstition (δεισιδαιμονία) and presumptuous inquisitiveness (περιεργία; curiositas). Isis is the seer who illuminates men (met. 11. 15). In the initiation into mysteries—after some period of contemplation—philosophy comes to fruition.<sup>4</sup> For both Plutarch (ibid. 382 cd) and Apuleius (met. 11. 23 nocte media vidi solem candido coruscantem lumine, 'in the middle of the night I saw the sun flashing with bright light') initiation has the character of a flash of illumination reminiscent of Plato's Seventh Letter (344 b); Apuleius describes Plato's experience of God as a sudden blaze of light in the dead of night (Socr. 3). It is uncertain whether Apuleius already tried to come to terms with Christianity.<sup>5</sup>

Hitherto we have said little about a god, who for Apuleius is one of the most important ones: the deus Risus. Apuleius thinks highly of

<sup>1</sup> J. TATUM 1979, 105–134.

<sup>2</sup> Though, in important moments (15; 45; 56).

<sup>3</sup> P. G. WALSH 1970, 180.

<sup>4</sup> A. WLOSOK 1969, 72–73 (curiositas); 81–84 (philosophy).

<sup>5</sup> Cf. met. 9. 14; apol. 56. 3–4; cf. M. SIMON 1974.

humor. His work is liable to belie a prejudice common among northerners saying that philosophy and religion exclude pleasure.

Transmission

Boccaccio laid hands on a codex from Monte Cassino, today Mediceus Laurentianus plut. 68, 2 (F), 11th century which contained, along with Tacitus (ann. 11–16; hist. 1–5) three main works of Apuleius. For us, this manuscript is the archetype of the transmission of met., apol., and flor. As the subscriptions show, it is traced back to a 4th century codex.

Another group is formed by Socr., Ascl., Plat., and mund. The archetype of these works is lost. Precious are the Bruxellensis 10 054/6 (B), 11th century, from Cues and the Nederlandensis Leidensis Vossianus 4° 10 (N), 11th century; in the main, the manuscripts fall into three classes, among which the first has no absolute claim to primacy.<sup>1</sup>

Influence

The bipartite structure of the tradition found its match in the history of influence: the broader tradition of the philosophical writings—including the apocrypha—reflected their importance in the Middle Ages, whereas the preservation of the novel (which is more attractive for modern readers) hung by a thread.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> S. now J. BEAUJEU, ed., Apulée, opusculs philosophiques . . . et fragments, Paris 1973, xxxv–xlv; moreover, G. AUGELLO, Studi apuleiani. Problemi di testo e loci vexati delle Metamorfosi, Palermo 1977; F. REGEN, Der codex Laurentianus, pluteus 51, 9. Ein bisher vernachlässigter Textzeuge der Apuleischen Schrift De deo Socratis, Göttingen 1985; cf. also L. PEPE, Un nuovo codice di Apuleio del sec. XI (Bibl. comun. Assisi n. 706), GIF 4, 1951, 214–225.

<sup>2</sup> Together with the Golden Ass, Tacitus' major works would have been lost; parallel cases of meager tradition are other favorites of the modern age: Lucretius and Catullus; on Apuleius' influence: E. H. HAIGHT, Apuleius and his Influence, New York 1927; P. BRUNEAU, Illustrations antiques . . . de Lucien (and Apuleius), BCH 89, 1965, 349–357; C. DEMPSEY, The Textual Sources of Poussin's Marine Venus in Philadelphia (Apuleius), JWI 29, 1966, 438–442; K. KRAUTER 1971 (on Beroaldus); C. MORESCHINI, sulla fama di Apuleio nella tarda antichità, in: Romanitas et Christianitas. Studia J. H. WASZINK, Amsterdam 1973, 243–248; A. SCOBIE, The Influence of Apuleius' Metamorphoses on Some French Authors 1518–1843, Arcadia 12, 1977, 156–165; V. C. LÓPEZ, Apuleyo y Cervantes. Unidad y pluralidad en el mundo antiguo, Actas del VI congreso español de estudios clásicos (Sevilla 1981), Madrid 1983, vol. 2, 199–204; J. F. D'AMICO, The Progress of Renaissance Latin Prose: The Case of Apuleianism, Renaissance Quarterly 37, 1984, 351–392; L. BOC-CIOLINI PALAGI, Suggestioni apuleiane nella Mandragola di Niccolò Machiavelli, A&R n.s. 31, 1986, 159–170.

In late antiquity and during the Middle Ages Apuleius was taken in earnest as a Platonic philosopher<sup>1</sup> so much so that Macrobius (somn. 1. 1) was astonished that the same man had written a novel. There is no doubt that Apuleius paved the way for the acceptance of Platonism in the western world. Not enough that he wrote readable Latin adaptations; his way of integrating Platonism into a mystery religion could be easily understood and emulated by Christians. In the domain of literature, by combining autobiographical form and religious confession in the Metamorphoses, he became an important model for Augustine's Confessiones.

The demonology of the De deo Socratis irresistibly attracted Christian readers in late antiquity and in the Middle Ages; Augustine seriously maintained that metamorphoses like that of Lucius into an ass could be explained—not physically but psychologically—as a deception practised by demons (civ. 18. 18).<sup>2</sup>

The Peri hermeniae attributed to Apuleius is a link of the chain transmitting formal logic from the school of Aristotle and the Stoics to the Latin-speaking west.

John of Salisbury (d. 1180) began his survey of classical philosophy with Pythagoras and ended it with Apuleius (Policraticus 7). In the 12th century, when scholars tried to understand nature more deeply, Bernardus Silvestris, in many instances, drew philosophical lore from Apuleius.<sup>3</sup>

Boccaccio (d. 1375) knew the literary works of Apuleius and took some risqué short stories over into his Decameron.<sup>4</sup> Thus, at the dawn of the modern age, instead of the philosopher, Apuleius the storyteller came to the fore.

Even his style found followers, though for a short time. Contrary to Ciceronianism or to Quintilian's eclecticism, Beroaldus the Elder (d. 1505) heralded an archaizing—'Apuleian'—fashion.

Boiardo (d. 1494) translated the Metamorphoses into Italian; there followed translations into French (by Guillaume Michel, 1517, publ.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Aug. civ. 4. 2 (on mund. as a work of Apuleius); 8. 14–18 (on Socr.); 8. 23–26 (on Ascl. as a work of Apuleius); 18. 18 (on Met.); s. also our chapters on Church Fathers.

<sup>2</sup> The phantasticum (the sensitive soul, which leaves the body while deeply asleep) appears to others as a phantom.

<sup>3</sup> De mundi universitate; s. B. Stock, Myth and Science in the Twelfth Century, Princeton 1972, 20.

<sup>4</sup> Dec. 7. 2 (met. 9. 5–7); 5. 10 (met. 9. 22–28).

1522), into German (by Johann Sieder, 1538), and into English (by T. Adlington, 1566). Inevitably, Apuleius influenced the picaresque novel: Cervantes' (d. 1616) Don Quixote experienced an Apuleian adventure with wine skins, Grimmelshausen's (d. 1676) Simplicissimus exhibited Psyche's simplicity already in the title, Lesage's (d. 1747) Gil Blas was captured by robbers like Lucius. In his Contes et nouvelles en vers, La Fontaine (d. 1695) put into verse the Apuleian type of funny short story (cf. especially met. 9. 5–7); he gracefully ridiculed some weaknesses of the fair sex in his verse novel in dialogue form (Les amours de Psyché et Cupidon). Shackerley Marmion (d. 1639) put the fairy tale (1637) into English verse. In a tradition of allegorical interpretation of the tale of Psyche, Johann Ludwig Prasch (d. 1690), a Lutheran neo-Latin author from Regensburg, presented Psyche as an image of the soul which, having stood the trials of the world, goes to heaven.<sup>1</sup> Goethe's contemporary, August (von) Rohde (d. 1837) made a translation of the Metamorphoses, which is popular to this day.

Alexander Pushkin (d. 1837) coined the household word: 'I gladly read my Apuleius, /but Cicero I left unread.' In central and northern Europe, many readers discovered in Amor and Psyche their own inner conflict between Christian asceticism and pagan sensuality; there was often interaction between literature and art (Canova, Thorwaldsen). Psyche inspired lyric poets like Heinrich Heine (d. 1856) and Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (d. 1898), dramatists like the Dane Frederik Paludan-Müller (d. 1876), and the epic poet Robert Hamerling (d. 1889). The rescue of a swimmer in Theodor Storm's (d. 1888) short story Psyche is based on met. 5. 25. In England the same fairy tale fascinated illustrious minds: Elizabeth Barrett Browning (d. 1861), William Morris (d. 1896),<sup>2</sup> and Walter Pater (d. 1894).<sup>3</sup> Gustave Flaubert (d. 1880) found in Apuleius the 'odor of incense and of urine, bestiality linked with mysticism'.<sup>4</sup> Honoré de Balzac's (d. 1850) Peau de chagrin is less indebted to Apuleius than the short novels ('The Ass in Love' and Psyche) of Louis Couperus (d. 1923), the Dutch prince of poets, whose sophisticated, highly musical mastery of language has a genuine affinity to Apuleius.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Psyche cretica; German ed. Leipzig 1705.

<sup>2</sup> The Earthly Paradise.

<sup>3</sup> Marius the Epicurean.

<sup>4</sup> CONTE, LG 569.

<sup>5</sup> Karl Mickel's adaptation of Das Halsgericht should be mentioned as well.

Our author's impact extends from the heights of literary artistry to folklore. With the dissemination of books and compulsory education, secondary influences of Apuleius on folklore increased, which drive to despair scholars who want to reconstruct the sources of this fairy-tale.

Editions: Io. Andreas DE BUXIS, Bishop of Aleria, printed by C. SWEYNHEIM and A. PANNARTZ, Roma 1469. * F. OUDENDORP (TC), 3 vols., Lugduni Batavorum 1786–1823. * G. F. HILDEBRAND (TC, ind.), 2 vols., Lipsiae 1842, repr. 1968. * R. HELM, C. MORESCHINI (T), 3 vols. (s. below). * apol., flor.: P. VALLETTE (TTr), Paris 2nd ed. 1960. * R. HELM, rev. by G. C. HANSEN (TTrN), Berlin 1977. * apol.: R. HELM, Lipsiae 1905, 2nd ed. 1912, repr. (with addenda) 1959; 6th ed. 1994. * H. E. BUTLER, A. S. OWEN (TC), Oxford 1914, repr. 1967. * C. MARCHESI (TC), Città di Cast. 1914. * flor.: R. HELM, Lipsiae 1910, repr. (with addenda) 1959, repr. 1993. * met.: P. BEROALDUS (TC), Bononiae 1500. * R. HELM, Lipsiae 1907, 3rd ed. 1931, 7th ed. 1968 (with addenda), repr. 1992. * H. E. BUTLER (TrN), 2 vols., Oxford 1910. * C. GIARRATANO, Torino 1929, rev. by P. FRASSINETTI, Torino 1960, 2nd ed. 1961. * D. S. ROBERTSON (T), P. VALLETTE (Tr), 3 vols., Paris 1940–1945, I 2nd ed. 1956, II 3rd ed. 1958, III 2nd ed. 1956. * R. HELM, W. KRENKEL (TTrN), Berlin 6th ed. 1970. * E. BRANDT, W. EHLERS (TTrN), München 3rd ed. 1980 (rev.), 4th ed. 1989. * J. A. HANSON (TTr), 2 vols., Cambridge, Mass. 1989. * C. FISCHER, B. KYTZLER (TrN), München 1990. * A. RODE, R. HELM, W. HAUPT (TTr), Leipzig 5th ed. 1991. * P. G. WALSH (TrC), Oxford 1994. * met. 1: M. MOLT (C), diss. Groningen 1938. * A. SCOBIE (C), Meisenheim 1975. * met. 2: B. J. DE JONGE, diss. Groningen 1941. * met. 3: R. T. VAN DER PAARDT (TC), Amsterdam 1971. * met. 4–6: L. CALLEBAT (TTr), Paris 7th ed. 1992. * met. 4. 1–27: B. L. HIJMANS, JR., R. T. VAN DER PAARDT, E. R. SMITS, R. E. H. WESTENDORP BOERMA, A. G. WESTERBRINK (TC), Groningen 1977. * met. 4. 28–6. 24: F. NORDEN (TC), Leipzig 1903. * L. C. PURSER (TC), London 1910. * P. GRIMAL (TC), Paris 1963. * E. J. KENNEY (TTrC), Cambridge 1990. * met. 5: J. M. H. FERNHOUT (C), diss. Groningen, Middelburg 1949. * met. 6. 25–32 and met. 7: B. L. HIJMANS, JR., R. T. VAN DER PAARDT, V. SCHMIDT, R. E. H. WESTENDORP BOERMA, A. G. WESTERBRINK (TC), Groningen 1981. * met. 8: B. L. HIJMANS, JR., R. T. VAN DER PAARDT, V. SCHMIDT, C. B. J. SETTELS, B. WESSELING, R. E. H. WESTENDORP BOERMA (TC), Groningen 1985. * met. 11: J.-C. FREDOUILLE (TC), Paris 1975. * J.-G. GRIFFITHS (TTrC), Leiden 1975. * Philosophical writings: C. MORESCHINI, Stutgardiae 1991. * Socr., Plat., mund., fgg.: J. BEAUJEU (TTrC), Paris 1973. * Socr.: G. BARRA, U. PANNUTI (TTrC), AFLN 10, 1962–1963, 81–141. * R. DEL RÉ (TTrN), Roma 1966. * Plat.: P. SINISCALCO (TC), K. ALBERT (Tr), St. Augustin 1981. * herm.: M. BALDASSARRI (TTrC), Como 1986.

* Ps.-Apul. Ascl.: A. D. NOCK, Hermetica 2, 257-401; the Greek model (from chapter 41 onwards) K. PREISENDANZ, Pap. Gr. mag. 3, 591-609. * herb. (5th century): E. HOWALD, H. E. SIGERIST, CML 4, 1927, 13-225. * physiognom.: R. FÖRSTER, Scr. physiogn. Gr. et Lat. 2, 1893, 3-145. * ren. sal.: s. M. HAUPT, Opusc. 3, 466-467. ** Ind.: W. A. OLDFATHER, H. V. CANTER, B. E. PERRY, Index Apuleianus, Middletown, Conn. 1934. * P. FLEURY, M. ZUINGHEDAU, Concordantia in Apuleii Apologiam et Florida, Hildesheim (announced). ** Bibl.: C. C. SCHLAM, The Scholarship on Apuleius since 1938, CW 64, 1971, 285-309. * G. N. SANDY, Recent Scholarship on the Prose Fiction of Classical Antiquity, CW 67, 1974, 321-360. * S. also the annual Groningen Colloquia on the Novel.

A. ABT, Die Apologie des Apuleius von Madaura und die antike Zauberei, Gießen 1908, 75-345. * K. ALPERS, Innere Beziehungen und Kontraste als 'hermeneutische Zeichen' in den Metamorphosen des Apuleius von Madaura, WJA n.s. 6 a, 1980, 197-207. * B. BALDWIN, Apuleius, Tacitus, and Christians, Emerita 52, 1984, 1-3. * M. BANDINI, Il modello della metamorfosi ovidiana nel romanzo di Apuleio, Maia n.s. 38, 1986, 33-39. * J. BEAUJEU, Sérieux et frivolité au II<sup>e</sup> siècle de notre ère: Apulée, BAGB 4, 1, 1975, 83-97. * G. BECHTLE, The Adultery-Tales in the Ninth Book of Apuleius' Metamorphoses, Hermes 123, 1995, 106-116. * M. BERNHARD, Der Stil des Apuleius von Madaura, Stuttgart 1927. * G. BIANCO, La fonte greca delle Metamorfosi di Apuleio, Brescia 1971. * G. BINDER and R. MERKELBACH, eds., Amor und Psyche (collection of articles), Darmstadt 1968 (= WdF 126). * L. CALLEBAT, Formes et modes d'expression dans les œuvres d'Apulée, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 1600-1664. * U. CARRATELLO, Apuleio mori nel 163-164?, GIF 16, 1963, 97-110. * G. COOPER, Sexual and Ethical Reversal in Apuleius. The Metamorphoses as Anti-Epic, in: Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History 2, Bruxelles, Latomus 1980, 436-466. * H. DAHLMANN, Ein Gedicht des Apuleius? (Gell. 19. 11), AAWM 1979, 8, 3-18. * R. DE SMET, Lucius and Photis in Apuleius' Metamorphoses, Latomus 46, 1987, 613-623. * M. DIBELIUS, Die Isisweihe bei Apuleius und verwandte Initiations-Riten, SHAW 1917, 4, 1-54. * F. DORNSEIFF, Lukios' und Apuleius' Metamorphosen, Hermes 73, 1938, 222-233. * K. DOWDEN, Apuleius and the Art of Narration, CQ n.s. 32, 1982, 419-435. * G. C. DRAKE, Candidus. A Unifying Theme in Apuleius' Metamorphoses, CJ 64, 1968, 102-109. * M. J. EDWARDS, The proem to Apuleius' Metamorphoses, Hermes 121, 1993, 375-377. * D. FEHLING, Amor und Psyche. Die Schöpfung des Apuleius und ihre Einwirkung auf das Märchen. Eine Kritik der romantischen Märchentheorie, Wiesbaden 1977. * M. G. FERRARI, Aspetti di letterarietà nei Florida di Apuleio, SIFC 40, 1968, 85-147; 41, 1969, 139-187. * G. FRY, Philosophie et mystique de la destinée. Etude du thème de la Fortune dans les Métamorphoses d'Apulée, QUCC n.s. 18, 3, 1984, 137-170. * G. F. GIANOTTI, 'Romanzo' e ideologia. Studi sulle Metamorfosi di Apuleio, Napoli

1986. * T. HÄGG, The Novel in Antiquity, Oxford 1983. * J. HANI, L'Âne d'or d'Apulée et l'Égypte, RPh 47, 1973, 274–280. * S. J. HARRISON, Apuleius' Metamorphoses, in: G. SCHMELING, ed., The Novel in the Ancient World, Leiden 1996, 491–516. * C. HARRAUER, Lector, intende, laetaberis, WS n.s. 17, 1983, 126–136. * J. R. HEATH, Narration and Nutrition in Apuleius' Metamorphoses, Ramus 11, 1982, 57–77. * R. HEINE, Untersuchungen zur Romanform des Apuleius von Madaura, diss. Göttingen 1962. * S. HELLER, Apuleius, Platonic Dualism, and Eleven, AJPh 104, 1983, 321–339. * R. HELM, Der antike Roman, Göttingen 2nd ed. 1956. * B. L. HIJMANS, JR., and R. T. VAN DER PAARDT, eds., Aspects of Apuleius' Golden Ass. A Collection of Original Papers, Groningen 1978. * B. L. HIJMANS, JR., V. SCHMIDT, eds., Symposium Apuleianum Groninganaum (1980), Groningen 1981. * B. L. HIJMANS, JR., Apuleius, Philosophus Platonicus, ANRW 2, 36, 1, 1987, 395–475. * B. L. HIJMANS, JR., Apuleius orator: Pro se de magia and Florida, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 1708–1784. * F. E. HOEVELS, Märchen und Magie in den Metamorphosen des Apuleius von Madaura, Amsterdam 1979. * N. HOLZBERG, Apuleius und der Verfasser des griechischen Eselsromans, WJA n.s. 10, 1984, 161–177. * N. HOLZBERG, Der antike Roman, München 1986. * R. W. HOOPER, Structural Unity in the Golden Ass, Latomus 44, 1985, 398–401. * P. M. HUBY, Apuleius and Theophrastus' Fifth 'Indemonstrable' Mood, LCM 2, 7, 1977, 147–148. * W. HÜBNER, Autobiographie und Metamorphose, Jahrbuch der Universität Augsburg 1985, 161–170. * P. JAMES, Unity in Diversity. A Study of Apuleius' Metamorphoses with Particular Reference to the Narrator's Art of Transformation and the Metamorphosis Motif in the Tale of Cupid and Psyche, Hildesheim 1987. * C. P. JONES, Apuleius' Metamorphoses and Lollianus' Phoinikika, Phoenix 34, 1980, 243–254. * P. JUNGHANNS, Die Erzähltechnik von Apuleius' Metamorphosen und ihrer Vorlage, Leipzig 1932. * P. KRAFFT, Apuleius' Darstellung der providentia tripartita, MH 36, 1979, 153–163. * G. KRANZ, Amor und Psyche. Metamorphose eines Mythos bei C. S. Lewis, Arcadia 4, 1969, 285–299. * K. KRAUTER, Philologische Methode und humanistische Existenz. Filippo Beroaldo und sein Kommentar zum Goldenen Esel des Apuleius, München 1971. * H. KUCH, ed., Der antike Roman, Berlin 1989, esp. (H. JOHNE) 212–215. * A. LABHARDT, Curiositas. Notes sur l'histoire d'un mot et d'une notion, MH 17, 1960, 206–224. * A. LA PENNA, Una novella di Apuleio e l'Iliupersis virgilians, Maia n.s. 37, 1985, 145–147. * A. LESKY, Apuleius von Madaura und Lukios von Patrai, Hermes 76, 1949, 43–74 (= Ges. Schr., Bern 1966, 549–578). * D. LONDEY, C. JOHANSON, The Logic of Apuleius, Leiden 1987. * A. LUMPE, Die Logik des Pseudo-Apuleius. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Philosophie, Augsburg 1982. * H. MAEHLER, Lucius the Donkey and Roman Law, MPhL 4, 1981, 161–177. * R. MARTIN, De Plutarque à Apulée. Le sens de l'expression Asinus aureus et la signification du roman apuléien, REL 48, 1970, 332–354. * H. J. MASON, The Distinction of Lucius in

- Apuleius's Metamorphoses, Phoenix 37, 1983, 135–143. * H. J. MASON, Physiognomy in Apuleius' Metamorphoses 2. 2, CPh 79, 1984, 307–309. * G. A. MEGAS, Das Märchen von Amor und Psyche in der griechischen Volksüberlieferung, Athen 1971. * R. MERKELBACH, Roman und Mysterium in der Antike, München 1962. * H. J. METTE, Curiositas, in: FS B. SNELL, München 1956, 227–235. * F. MILLAR, The World of the Golden Ass, JRS 71, 1981, 63–75. * C. MORESCHINI, Studi sul De dogmate Platonis di Apuleio, Pisa 1966. * C. MORESCHINI, Apuleio e il platonismo, Firenze 1978. * R. MORTLEY, Apuleius and Platonic Theology, AJPh 93, 1972, 584–590. * K. MRAS, Apuleius' Florida im Rahmen ähnlicher Literatur, AAWW 86, 1949, 205–223. * S. MÜLLER, Das Verhältnis von Apuleius' De mundo zu seiner Vorlage, Leipzig 1939. * R. F. NEWBOLD, Nonverbal Communication in the Satyricon and in Apuleius' Metamorphoses, QUCC n.s. 41, 2, 1992, 127–136. * F. NORDEN, Apulejus von Madaura und das römische Privatrecht, Leipzig 1912. * A. PENNACINI, P. L. DONINI, T. ALIMONTI, A. MONTEDURO ROCCAVINI, Apuleio letterato, filosofo, mago, Bologna 1979. * L. PEPE, ed., Semiotica della novella latina. Atti del seminario interdisciplinare 'La novella latina' Perugia 1985, Roma 1986 (with numerous articles on Apuleius). * B. E. PERRY, An Interpretation of Apuleius' Metamorphoses, TAPhA 57, 1926, 238–260. * B. E. PERRY, The Ancient Romances. A Literary-Historical Account of their Origins, Berkeley 1967. * B. M. PORTOGALLI, Sulle fonti della concezione teologica e demonologica di Apuleio, SCO 12, 1963, 227–241. * J. REDFORS, Echtheitskritische Untersuchung der apuleischen Schriften De Platone und De mundo, Lund 1960. * F. REGEN, Apuleius philosophus Platonicus. Untersuchungen zur Apologia (De magia) und zu De mundo, Berlin 1971. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Das Märchen von Amor und Psyche bei Apuleius, Leipzig, Berlin 1912. * H. RIEFSTAHL, Der Roman des Apuleius, Frankfurt 1938. * E. ROHDE, Der griechische Roman und seine Vorläufer, Darmstadt 4th ed. 1960 (preface by K. KERÉNYI). * G. N. SANDY, Apuleius' Metamorphoses and the Ancient Novel, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 1511–1574. * C. SCHLAM, Platonica in the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, TAPhA 101, 1970, 477–487. * C. SCHLAM, Cupid and Psyche. Apuleius and the Monuments, University Park, Pennsylvania, 1976. * C. SCHLAM, The Metamorphoses of Apuleius. On Making an Ass of Oneself, London 1992. * E. SCHWARTZ, Fünf Vorträge über den griechischen Roman. Mit einer Einführung von A. REHM, Berlin 2nd ed. 1943. * A. SCOBIE, Aspects of the Ancient Romance and its Heritage. Essays on Apuleius, Petronius, and the Greek Romances, Meisenheim 1969. * A. SCOBIE, More Essays on the Ancient Romance and its Heritage, Meisenheim 1973. * A. SCOBIE, Apuleius and Folklore, London 1983. * R. A. SEELINGER, Spatial Control: A Reflection of Lucius' Progress in the Metamorphoses, TAPhA 116, 1986, 361–367. * Semiotica della novella latina. Atti del Seminario interdisciplinare 'La novella latina' (Perugia), Roma 1986. * N. SHUMATE, Crisis and Conversion in Apuleius' Metamorphoses, Ann Arbor

1995. * M. SIMON, Apulée et le christianisme, Mélanges d'histoire des religions offerts à H.-C. Puech, Paris 1974, 299–305. * W. S. SMITH, JR., The Narrative Voice in Apuleius' Metamorphoses, TAPhA 103, 1972, 513–534. * W. S. SMITH, Style and Character in the Golden Ass: 'Suddenly an Opponent Appeared', ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 1575–1599. * S. STABRYLA The Functions of the Tale of Cupid and Psyche in the Structure of the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, Eos 61, 1973, 261–272. * C. STRUB, Die Metamorphosen des Apuleius als Tiergeschichte. Sprache, Sexualität, Essen und Lucius' 'Prozeß der Zivilisation', WJA n.s. 11, 1985, 169–188. * M. W. SULLIVAN, Apuleian Logic. The Nature, Sources, and Influence of Apuleius' Peri Hermeneias, Amsterdam 1967. * R. G. SUMMERS, Roman Justice and Apuleius' Metamorphoses, TAPhA 101, 1970, 511–531. * R. G. SUMMERS, Apuleius juridicus, Historia 21, 1972, 120–126. * R. G. SUMMERS, A Note on the Date of the Golden Ass, AJPh 94, 1973, 375–383. * J. TATUM, Apuleius and the Golden Ass, Ithaca, London 1979. * H. VAN THIEL, Der Eselsroman, 2 vols. (1: Untersuchungen, 2: Synoptische Ausgabe), München 1971 and 1972. * P. VALLETTE, L'Apologie d'Apulée, Paris 1908. * P. G. WALSH, The Roman Novel. The Satyricon of Petronius and the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, London, Cambridge U.P. 1970. * P. G. WALSH, Apuleius and Plutarch, in: Neoplatonism and Early Christian Thought. Essays in Honour of A. H. Armstrong, London 1981, 20–32. * F. WEHRLI, Einheit und Vorgeschichte der griechisch-römischen Romanliteratur, MH 22, 1965, 133–154. * O. WEINREICH, Das Märchen von Amor und Psyche und andere Volksmärchen im Altertum, in: L. FRIEDLÄNDER, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms, vol. 4, Leipzig 9th–10th ed. 1921, 89–132. * J. J. WINKLER, Auctor et actor. A Narratological Reading of Apuleius's The Golden Ass, Berkeley, Los Angeles 1985. * T. N. WINTER, The Publication of Apuleius' Apology, TAPhA 100, 1969, 607–612. * W. WITTMANN, Das Isisbuch des Apuleius. Untersuchungen zur Geistesgeschichte des 2. Jh., Stuttgart 1938. * A. WLOSOK, Zur Einheit der Metamorphosen des Apuleius, Philologus 113, 1969, 68–84. * J. R. G. WRIGHT, Folk-tale and Literary Technique in Cupid and Psyche, CQ 21, 1971, 273–284.

D. TECHNICAL AND EDUCATIONAL AUTHORS

1. THE AUTHORITIES OF THE SCHOOLS

TECHNICAL WRITERS OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

Grammarians and Metricians

Grammarians made an important contribution to the continuity of education through antiquity and Middle Ages. Therefore their efforts deserve to be mentioned in a history of literature. The famous scholars of the 4th–6th centuries who became the pillars of school tradition relied on a series of predecessors, who in their turn were linked to scholars of early empire and late Republic.

L. Caesellius Vindex studied early Latin, probably under Hadrian; extracts from his Antiquae lectiones (a work composed in alphabetical order) are known from Cassiodorus.

Q. Terentius Scaurus was the most famous grammarian of Hadrian's era. Among other works, he wrote commentaries on Horace. Unfortunately only two small treatises De orthographia have come down to us. Scaurus was influenced by Varro. We do not possess his polemics against Caesellius.

Velius Longus' work on orthography has been preserved.

C. Sulpicius Apollinaris of Carthage was one of Gellius' teachers. His learned disquisitions in the form of letters are lost, whereas his Periochae to Terence survived.

Some grammarians not mentioned in Gellius but respectfully quoted by later generations must probably be dated towards the end of the 2nd century:

Aemilius Asper's (probably end of the 2nd century) commentaries on Terence, Sallust, and Virgil are lost. The Artes ascribed to him are spurious. Donatus, Ausonius, and Augustine hold him in high esteem.

One of his contemporaries was Flavius Caper. The opuscles ascribed to him were hardly written by him in the present form. He served as a bridge between Probus and his user Julius Romanus. Still Priscian would appreciate him.

Statilius Maximus, who lived towards the end of the 2nd century, emended the text of Cicero's speeches and noted words occurring only once (Singularia) in Cicero and Cato.

Helenius Acro (probably about 200) was used by Julius Romanus and Porphyrio. We do not have his commentaries on Terence (Ad.; Eun.) and Horace. The extant scholia on Horace by Pseud-Acro supplement Porphyrio from Suetonius and other sources, among which probably the real Acro.

Pomponius Porphyrio (probably early 3rd century) is the author of a scholastic commentary on Horace an abridged version of which is known to us. The commentator is less concerned with realia than with delivery, grammatical construction, and poetic beauty. This work gives us a glimpse of the understanding of literature taught in ancient classrooms.

C. Julius Romanus (ca. 3rd century) is one of Charisius' sources; the lost Ἀφορμαί discussed parts of speech, cases, and orthography. In each case general rules were followed by alphabetic lists of words with references. Charisius, who seems to have been the only one to use him, owes a great deal of erudition to him.

Sacerdos (end of the 3rd century) in his preserved texts treated grammar and meter; he seems to have exerted a formative influence on compendia of grammar and metrics in late antiquity.<sup>1</sup> Juba's work on metrics (not earlier than the end of the 2nd century) perished.

One of Sacerdos' students was Cominian<sup>2</sup> who enriched the pattern of school grammar (the like of an extract from Scaurus) with elements from Remmius Palaemon in order to satisfy both beginners and advanced students. Cominian's work was incorporated into Charisius' who under Cominian's name exerted an influence on the Middle Ages.

Nonius Marcellus

Nonius Marcellus, an African, lived after the 2nd and before the 5th century; he used Apuleius and Gellius and is mentioned by Priscian.

His collection De compendiosa doctrina consists of twenty books<sup>3</sup> or chapters of unequal length. It is evidently unfinished and perhaps was published posthumously. It falls into a long section on language (books 1–12) and a shorter section on realia (books 13–20). Book 16 (on shoes) is lost.

<sup>1</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, HLL 5, § 522, 3.

<sup>2</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, HLL 5, § 523, 1.

<sup>3</sup> 20 books are found elsewhere: in Festus, Gellius, and Isidore.

In the first part book 4 is especially voluminous; it fills alone the central volume of the tripartite Teubner edition. It discusses multiple meanings of words. These are arranged alphabetically (per litteras), as is the case with books 2 and 3.

The second part shows a preference for thematic arrangement: ships (13), clothes (14) and their colors (17), vessels (15), food and beverages (18), weapons (19), terms of kinship (20); this book is the shortest; it fills no more than half a page.

Lemmata are usually defined or explained by synonyms; then follow (except for book 20) references from an exquisite series of early Latin authors<sup>1</sup> (among whom Virgil is admitted for his slightly archaizing language, while Catullus, the ‘modernist’, is omitted). Although Nonius is sometimes negligent, we are indebted to him for precious citations, especially from Lucilius, Varro, and the dramatists. Unfortunately, given the lexicographical character of the work, the fragments are mostly very short. Gellius is one of Nonius’ intermediate sources.

Nonius<sup>2</sup> much blamed indolence is not without its bright side: in the sequence of authors he excerpted there are found surprising regularities. A keen investigation into his rather consistent method<sup>3</sup> even allowed scholars to pinpoint the position of the quoted passages within their original context. In each chapter Nonius first followed special grammatical writings and took from them his lemmata and some references. Then he completed the lemmata from 41 editions of Roman authors, among whom are grammarians.

<sup>1</sup> Plautus, Lucretius, Naevius, Accius, Pomponius, Novius, Lucilius, Ennius, Turpilius, Pacuvius, Cicero, Varro, Sallust, Afranius, Virgil, Terence, Sisenna, and several grammarians.

<sup>2</sup> Fatius ille (R. BENTLEY to Hor. sat. 1. 2. 129); SCHANZ, LG 4, 1, 143, 2 calls book 9 ‘especially instructive as to the stupidity of Nonius’, probably because at the very beginning the genitive plural with -um is described as ‘singular accusative used instead of plural genitive’. But Nonius is not an Indo-Europeanist.

<sup>3</sup> Édition: W. M. LINDSAY, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1903; Bibl.: W. M. LINDSAY, praef. xv–xix; W. M. LINDSAY, De fragmentis scriptorum apud Nonium servatis, RhM 57, 1902, 196–204; W. M. LINDSAY, De citationibus apud Nonium Marcellum, Philologus 64, 1905, 438–464; W. STRZELECKI, Zur Entstehung der Compendiosa doctrina des Nonius, Eos 34, 1932–1933, 113–129; W. STRZELECKI, RE 17, 1936, 882–897; A. COUCKE, Nonius Marcellus en zijn De compendiosa doctrina, diss. Louvain 1936–1937; L. RYCHLEWSKA, Tragica II, Wrocław 1954, 124–141; W. STRZELECKI, Ein Beitrag zur Quellenbenutzung des Nonius, ADAW 13, 1959, 81–90; M. FOLKERTS, KIP 4, 1972, 153–154 (bibl.); P. L. SCHMIDT, forthcoming in HLL 6, § 615.

In accordance with an old Roman tradition, Nonius' work was intended for the instruction of his son. His very choice of authors shows that Nonius is an archaist.

Atilius Fortunatianus

The metrical treatise of Atilius Fortunatianus<sup>1</sup> is a compendium written for an educated young man who wants to become an orator. The author draws on Caesius Bassus as a source.

Marius Victorinus

Given his general importance (extending to philosophy and theology), C. Marius Victorinus will be treated in a separate chapter (pp. 1616–1627).

Aelius Donatus

Aelius Donatus<sup>2</sup> (Rome, mid-4th century) is perhaps the best known Latin grammarian. He has become a praeceptor Europae, last but not least owing to his student Jerome, to whom he successfully transmitted the bacillus of classical education.

The 1st book of the Ars Donati (the so-called Ars minor) is an elementary course on the eight parts of speech (sorts of words) in the form of questions and answers. The next three books (books 2–4: Ars maior) are more detailed: they discuss phonetics, parts of speech (this section overlaps with the Ars minor), deficiencies and beauties of speech.

Correspondences with Diomedes and Charisius are traced to common sources.

The Ars, which became the Latin textbook for late antiquity and the Middle Ages, owes its lasting success above all to its formal perfection.<sup>3</sup> Not a single word in it is contingent. His language is free from fashionable pompousness. His style excels in brevity and is focused on what is essential. Priscian, Cassiodorus, and Isidore are among his greatful users. Commentaries were written by Servius, Cleonius, Pompeius, Julian of Toledo (7th century), and the author of the Commenta Einsidlensia (9th or 10th century).

<sup>1</sup> GL 6, 278–304 KEIL.

<sup>2</sup> Editions: Artes: GL 4, 353; 367–402 KEIL; Comm.: P. WESSNER, Lipsiae 1902–1905; bibl.: P. WESSNER, RE 5, 2, 1905, 1545–1547; K. BARWICK (s. next footnote).

<sup>3</sup> Correctly L. HOLTZ 1981, 95 against K. BARWICK, Remmius Palaemon und die römische ars grammatica, Philologus suppl. vol. 15, 2, Leipzig 1922, 11, who considers Donatus' success a mere coincidence.

Another standard work is Donatus' Commentary on Terence (of which only the Hautimoroumenos is lacking). It has been preserved in two groups of traditions of different quality. It is based on excellent sources (Probus, Asper), it offers useful aids for delivery and performance and compares Terence with his models.

Of his Commentary on Virgil, we possess the dedication, the Life of Virgil, and the introduction to the Eclogues.<sup>1</sup> Material from this commentary seems to survive in the Scholia Danielina.<sup>2</sup> A passage of Jerome purports a witty dictum of the great grammarian: Pereant, qui ante nos nostra dixerunt, 'May they perish who proffered our opinions before us' (Hier. in eccles. 1. 9).

Charisius

Flavius Sosipater Charisius<sup>3</sup> worked in Constantinople, probably in the second half of the 4th century. To teach his son good Latin despite his non-Roman origin, he dedicated to him a work packed with information.

Of five books of his grammar, the 2nd and 3rd one are completely preserved; whereas books 1 and 4 are mutilated. Like Cominian, he completed the traditional scholastic material from additional sources. Charisius included style and meter in his grammar; book 5 (idiomata) contains initial steps towards a comparative syntax of Greek and Latin.

Charisius openly named his sources, which he copied to a large degree: Julius Romanus and, especially, Cominian; both, in their turn had used Palaemon. By his way of using sources, Charisius conveys, as it were, a 'geology' of the traditions of Latin grammarians. In the Middle Ages, he would usually be quoted as 'Cominianus'.

<sup>1</sup> This commentary is not identical with the uninfluential commentary of Ti. Claudius Donatus (end of 4th century); edition of the latter: H. GEORGI, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1905-1906.

<sup>2</sup> A step further: U. SCHINDEL, Die lateinischen Figurenlehren des 5.-7. Jh. und Donats Vergilkommentar (with two editions), Göttingen 1975.

<sup>3</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, HLL 5, § 523, 2.

Diomedes

Diomedes lived after Charisius and also wrote for east Roman readers. His influential Grammar (probably about 370–380) consists of three books: 1. The eight parts of speech (sorts of words), 2. Basic notions, grammar, and style,<sup>1</sup> 3. metrics and poetics. Unlike Charisius, Diomedes strove for consistency, which makes an analysis of his sources difficult.

Diomedes quotes Scaurus, Probus, and Suetonius; he also exploits Charisius and Donatus. In all probability Caper furnished erudite citations for book 1.

The section De poematibus is—after the attempts of Charisius in the appendix to his metrics—the most comprehensive system of genres after Quintilian (inst. book 10). Supposedly his sources were Suetonius and Varro.<sup>2</sup>

Along with the complete work there existed an influential short version (book 1) ascribed to Valerius Probus.

Servius

Servius<sup>3</sup> was a renowned grammarian in Rome; Macrobius introduced him as an interlocutor in his learned dialogue, which was laid before 385.

His Commentary on Virgil is based on a long tradition. It emphasizes grammar and rhetoric to the point of sometimes narrowing down the author's scope. More often, however, than one would expect, Servius deserves our attention even in matters of interpretation. Like Macrobius, Servius is convinced of Virgil's universal expertise and his knowledge of the world. The so-called Scholia Danielis add erudite material from further sources (Donatus, among others).

<sup>1</sup> Prose rhythm (clausulae, treated earlier by Sacerdos) formed a transition to metrics.

<sup>2</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, HLL 5, § 524.

<sup>3</sup> Editions: G. THILO, H. HAGEN, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1881–1887 with a supplement: 3, 2 Appendix Serviana, ed. H. HAGEN, Lipsiae 1902; vol. 2: E. K. RAND and others, Lancaster, Pennsylvania 1946; vol. 3: A. F. STOCKER and others, Oxford 1965; GL 4, 405–565 Keil; index: J. F. MOUNTFORD, J. T. SCHULTZ, Ithaca 1930; J. W. JONES, An Analysis of the Allegorical Interpretations in the Servian Commentaries, diss. Univ. of North Carolina 1959; M. MUEHMELT, Griechische Grammatik in der Vergilerklärung, München 1965; R. B. LLOYD, Republican Authors in Servius and the Scholia Danielis, HSPH 65, 1961, 291–341; C. LAZZARINI, Elementi di una poetica Serviana. Osservazioni sulla costruzione del racconto nel commentario all'Eneide. II., SIFC 82, 1989, 241–260; further information in: HLL 5, 1990, index s.v. Servius and (forthcoming) P. L. SCHMIDT, HLL 6, § 612; A. SETAIOLI, La vicenda dell'anima nel commento di Servio a Virgilio, Frankfurt 1995.

Moreover, Servius wrote commentaries on Donatus' Ars minor and maior.

The authenticity of writings on metrics and of a collection of glosses is disputed.

Fulgentius

Fabius Planciades Fulgentius,<sup>1</sup> whose mother tongue was Libyan, lived later than Macrobius. His identity with Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe (d. 532), a valued theologian, is doubted: one of the reasons is the name of Planciades which is nowhere attested for the bishop, the other is the modest intellectual level of the mythographer.

We possess four works: the Mythologiae and the Expositio Vergilianae continentiae secundum philosophos moralis contain allegorical interpretations of myths; Fulgentius would influence the Mythographi Vaticani; especially his comparison of the Aeneid with human life would have a rich aftermath in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. The Expositio sermonum antiquorum<sup>2</sup> is an explanation of obsolete words. In his De aetatibus mundi et hominis Fulgentius divides universal history into 23 epochs according to 23 letters of the alphabet; in each chapter he carefully avoids the use of the relevant letter.<sup>3</sup> An allegorical exegesis of Statius' Thebaid is spurious.

<sup>1</sup> Editions: R. HELM, Lipsiae 1898; G. GÖTZ, CGIL 1, 73–74; L. G. WHITBREAD (TrN), Columbus 1971. For identity with the bishop: P. LANGLOIS, Les œuvres de Fulgence, le mythographe et le problème des deux Fulgence, JbAC 7, 1964, 94–105; id., RLAC 8, 1972, 632–661; against: R. HÄUSSLER, in: W. KILLY, ed., Mythographie der frühen Neuzeit, Wiesbaden 1984, 1–23, esp. 19–20; J. C. RELIHAN, Fulgentius, Mitologiae 1, 20–21, AJPh 109, 1988, 229–230; on Fulgentius the bishop: G. G. LAPEYRE, S. Fulgence de Ruspe, Paris 1929; E. CAU, Fulgenzio e la cultura scritta in Sardegna agli inizi del VI secolo, Sandalion 2, 1979, 221–229; M. G. BIANCO, Abecedarium Fulgentii episcopi ecclesiae Ruspensis, Orpheus n.s. 1, 1980, 152–171; G. FOLLIET, Fulgence de Ruspe. Témoin privilégié de l'influence d'Augustin en Sardaigne, in: A. MASTINO, ed., L'Africa romana. Atti del VI convegno (Sassari 1988), Sassari 1989, 561–569.

<sup>2</sup> Scholars duly mistrust Fulgentius' 'learned' citations.

<sup>3</sup> The same principle had been applied by Nestor in his Iliad and by Tryphiodorus in his Odyssey.

Priscian

Priscianus<sup>1</sup> from Caesarea in Mauretania taught Latin at Byzantium under Emperor Anastasius (491–518). He was linked to Roman aristocrats, among whom was Aurelius Symmachus. His masterpiece, the Institutiones grammaticae in 18 books, are dedicated to the consul Julianus.

This is the most comprehensive and significant Latin grammar; it includes syntax,<sup>2</sup> a rarity even in modern times. For his Greek readers, Priscian takes initial steps towards a comparative grammar of Latin and Greek. There are numerous precious quotations from Latin literature up to Juvenal. On his own showing, Priscian applies the teachings of Herodian and Apollonius, enriching them with material from Latin technical writers. Caper was a source of valuable information. Priscian is judicious and rather independent.<sup>3</sup> Justly his work has become authoritative.<sup>4</sup>

Rhetors

Aquila Romanus<sup>5</sup> (second half of the 3rd century) wrote an arid compendium on figures of speech. His definitions are drawn from Greek theory (Aquila names Aristotle but uses Alexander Numenius). His examples are mostly from Cicero. Aquila would be used as a source by Martianus Capella.

Arusianus Messius,<sup>6</sup> a member of the aristocracy, towards the end of the 4th century compiled a collection of grammatical constructions from great authors for use in schools of rhetoric. His exquisite examples enrich our knowledge of lost works such as Sallust's Histories.

<sup>1</sup> Edition: GL KEIL, vols. 2–3, 1855–1860; bibl.: R. HELM, RE 22, 2, 1954, 2327–2346; P. L. SCHMIDT, KIP 4, 1972, 1141–1142; id. (forthcoming) in: HLL 7, § 703; for the present cf. HLL 5, 1989, Index q.v. Problems of grammar were also treated by: Agroecius, Cledonius, Pompeius (who was outshone by Consentius from Gaul), further Rufinus, Audax, Phocas, Valerianus, Papirianus, and Theoctistus.

<sup>2</sup> M. BARATIN, La naissance de la syntaxe à Rome, Paris 1989.

<sup>3</sup> Priscian's minor works: De figuris numerorum; De metris fabularum Terentii; Praeexercitantina; Institutio de nomine et pronomine et verbo; Partitiones duodecim versuum Aeneidos principalium; of doubtful authenticity: Liber de accentibus; poetic works: a panegyric on Anastasius and a Latin version of the Periegesis of Dionysius Periegetes.

<sup>4</sup> Grammarians after Priscian: his student Eutyches, Eugraphius (who wrote a commentary on Terence), and the glossographers.

<sup>5</sup> Edition: C. HALM, Rhet. Lat. min., Lipsiae 1863, 22; Aquila's followers were Julius Rufinianus (De figuris sententiarum et elocutionis) and an Anonymus.

<sup>6</sup> Edition: GL 7, 449 KEIL.

Chirius Fortunatianus (probably 4th century) wrote a catechism of rhetoric,<sup>1</sup> which would be used by Cassiodorus. Sulpitius Victor<sup>2</sup> and Julius Victor<sup>3</sup> wrote compendia.

Grillius (who is quoted by Priscian) was the author of a commentary on Cicero's De inventione. Favonius Eulogius (who lived in Africa about 385) explained the Somnium Scipionis with special regard to arithmology and music. Further writers on rhetoric were Julius Severianus and Emporius.

Antiquarian Writings

Gellius, who is especially important, will be treated in a separate chapter (pp. 1479–1485).

Censorinus wrote De die natali (A.D. 238). His erudite work contains valuable material, mostly second-hand.

Music

The so-called Fragmentum Censorini has come down to us together with Censorinus' work. It dates probably from the 2nd century. It gives a brief encyclopedic survey of cosmology, geometry, rhythm, and metrics (it is the oldest preserved document on metrics). Moreover, it gives information on musical history. See also: Augustine, below p. 1691, and Boethius, below p. 4723.

Agriculture and Medicine

Extracts from Q. Gargilius Martialis' work on agriculture (2nd half of the 3d century) have been preserved, among others, in the Medicina Plinii (s. below).

Probably in the 4th century, the vir illustris Palladius<sup>4</sup> Rutilius Taurus Aemilianus wrote a book on husbandry. Unlike Columella the author eschewed rhetorical adornments. The introductory book is on the basic elements of agriculture (air, water, earth, and industry).<sup>5</sup> There follow 12 books containing instructions and recipes for each month.

<sup>1</sup> Edition: C. HALM, Rhet. Lat. min., Lipsiae 1863, 81.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: C. HALM, ibid. 313.

<sup>3</sup> Edition: C. HALM, ibid. 373.

<sup>4</sup> Edition: J. C. SCHMITT, Lipsiae 1898.

<sup>5</sup> Here, industry is an equivalent to the fourth element, fire.

Striving for closeness to reality in space and time<sup>1</sup> our author has sacrificed not only rhetoric but also the theoretical and systematic approach of his predecessors. As in Columella, there is an additional book written in verse. Palladius discussed the grafting of trees in elegiac distichs, a meter not particularly suitable for this subject. He frequently quotes Columella, though his knowledge of this author is perhaps second-hand. His principal source may be Gargilius Martialis and—for rural architecture—M. Cetus Faventinus' extract from Vitruvius. Its practicability granted this work a large readership and dissemination in the Middle Ages.

In the 4th century, Pelagonius<sup>2</sup> wrote on veterinary art; Vegetius would use him as a source.

The Medicina Plinii<sup>3</sup> is a medical extract from Pliny (probably 4th century); we have only fragments of the works of Vindicianus,<sup>4</sup> a physician mentioned by Augustine.

Flavius Vegetius Renatus, vir illustris (roughly between 383 and 450), is the author of Digestorum artis mulomedicinae libri.<sup>5</sup> Among his sources, he esteems Columella and Pelagonius highly; whereas in Chiron and Apsyrus he finds neither spirit nor style (and we cannot blame him for it).

Theodorus Priscianus (possibly an African, about 400) composed Euporista; Marcellus the Gaul, magister officiorum under Theodosius, was the author of De medicamentis; S. Placitus wrote De medicamentis ex animalibus, the physician Cassius Felix (447) De medicina.

Caelius Aurelianus,<sup>6</sup> the most significant Latin medical writer of late antiquity, lived before Cassiodorus, probably in the 5th century. We possess three books De passionibus celeribus vel acutis and five books De passionibus tardis sive chronicis. His source is the eminent Soranus, whom he calls methodicorum princeps. Our Latin author largely translates him, interspersing his text with quotations from Cicero and Virgil. Caelius' work is clearly organized; his descriptions of symptoms and <sup>1</sup> Of course, previous authors had also given due attention to the rhythm of seasons throughout the year (e.g. Virgil's Georgics).

<sup>2</sup> Edition: M. IHM, Lipsiae 1892 (with indices).

<sup>3</sup> Edition: V. ROSE, Lipsiae 1875.

<sup>4</sup> Editions: G. HELMREICH, in his edition of Marcellus, Lipsiae 1889, 21; V. ROSE, edition of Theodorus Priscianus, Lipsiae 1894, 484.

<sup>5</sup> Edition: E. LOMMATZSCH, Lipsiae 1903.

<sup>6</sup> Editions: E. DRABKIN (TTr), Chicago 1950; G. BENDZ, I. PAPE (TTr), 2 vols., Berlin 1990 and 1993; indices in: J. C. AMMAN, edition Amsterdam 1709; bibl.: E. BENDZ, Emendationen zu Caelius Aurelianus, Lund 1954.

diagnoses are precise. He names medicines but is reticent on doses. He criticizes lavishly previous physicians, their methods, and doctrines. Caelius makes an effort to Latinize technical terms; his vocabulary is innovative even beyond medical jargon. In the Middle Ages his work was used in practice.

Some other authors who translated medical works in late antiquity are known to us by name (e.g. Mustio), whereas many are anonymous (the translators of Hippocrates, Galen, Dioscorides, Oribasius).

Surveying and the Art of War

In late antiquity, Agennius Urbicus, Innocentius, and Epaphroditus wrote on surveying.

Vegetius (s. above, Agriculture and Medicine) wrote four books on the art of war.<sup>1</sup> He is no expert and draws his knowledge from Cato the Elder, Celsus, Frontinus, and the military jurist Paternus. His own contribution is limited to arrangement and style. Eutropius (consul 450) revised his work. It was widely diffused in the Middle Ages.

The anonymous De rebus bellicis<sup>2</sup> is another book on warfare from late antiquity. The author, who is unencumbered by military experience but is an expert on prose rhythm, exercises his frighteningly modern imagination to invent atrocious war machines.

Geography

The Collectanea rerum memorabilium of C. Julius Solinus (mid-3rd century) begins with Rome and its early history. A treatise on man is followed by a description of the world (Europe from east to west, then Africa and Asia). His sources are Pliny, Mela, and perhaps Suetonius. Solinus makes an effort to write entertainingly. He was much read in late antiquity and during the Middle Ages.

Cookery

Culinary art is represented by the so-called Apicius (4th–5th century).

Bibl.: S. Roman Technical Writers, above pp. 571–582.

<sup>1</sup> Edition: C. LANG, Lipsiae 1869.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: E. A. THOMPSON (TC), A Roman Reformer and Inventor, Oxford 1952.

GELLIUS

Life and Dates

Aulus Gellius<sup>1</sup> was born around 130 and enjoyed a careful education in grammar and rhetoric. His teachers were Sulpicius Apollinaris, Antonius Julianus, and Titus Castricius. He also was among the listeners of the famous sophist Favorinus of Arelate (Arles). Later he was chosen judge in Rome. From 165 to 167 at least, he stayed in Athens,<sup>2</sup> where he met Calvisius Taurus, the head of the Platonic Academy, and made friends with Herodes Atticus, a great sponsor of art. It was in Athens that he decided to write his work. Fronto<sup>3</sup> was one of his friends; and there were links to Lucian and Apuleius.

His collection Noctes Atticae<sup>4</sup> appeared in 170. It was named after the long winter nights Gellius spent in a rural studio near Athens, where he began to work on it. It offers factual information, instruction, and entertainment and reflects the atmosphere of literary salons of the 2nd century, an epoch, when culture was completely bilingual.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Gellius collected extracts from roughly 275 authors. Cato, Varro, and Cicero are cited most frequently. When reading Cicero our author often found older quotations or was encouraged to look up more ancient sources. Despite the lively setting suggested by Gellius he owed much information to intermediate sources (e.g. 9. 4 from Plin. nat. 7. 9–12). We may believe him nevertheless when he writes that he studied original texts, not only secondary sources. Anyway, we are indebted to him for especially meaningful fragments of Cato, Caecilius Statius, Claudius Quadrigarius, and many others.

He found historical facts in annalists, Varro, Nepos, Hyginus, and Suetonius. Juridic knowledge came from Labeo, Capito, Masurius, and Caelius Sabinus. In natural science his authorities were Aristotle, Pliny, and Plutarch; in language and literature, Varro, Nigidius, Verrius, Probus, Cornutus, Hyginus. As for his own contemporaries he prefers to introduce them as speakers instead of quoting them from books.

<sup>1</sup> In the Middle Ages his name was disfigured into Agellius.

<sup>2</sup> W. AMELING 1984.

<sup>3</sup> M. T. SCETTINO (Questioni di biografia gelliana, GFF 8, 1985, 75–87) observes a certain aloofness from the imperial court and some evidence in favor of Gellius' African origin.

<sup>4</sup> Of 20 books, only book 8 went lost. Gellius planned a continuation (praef. 23–24), but in all probability nothing of it was published.

The Noctes Atticae belongs to a genre then in fashion, the so-called 'miscellaneous' literature. Gellius competed, among others, with the Παντοδαπή ἱστορία of Favorinus of Arelate.<sup>1</sup> As Gellius wrote his work for his children, it is part of the genre of educational books ad filium. Yet it is not a systematical textbook, but a reader both instructive and entertaining. Its open form is partly reminiscent of Cynic and Stoic diatribe.<sup>2</sup> This makes the Noctes Atticae a precursor of modern essays or of works like J. P. Hebel's Schatzkästlein. Above all it is 'literature meant to serve as a literary guide',<sup>3</sup> presupposing the existence of libraries and of a readership thirsting for education.

Literary Technique

The Noctes Atticae is not an encyclopedia<sup>4</sup> but a miscellaneous work, a collection of minor essays. Its motley character is part of the author's program. Nevertheless, his didactic intention is to be taken seriously. Titles of chapters and tables of content—which help the reader to find his way through the work—came into common use through Gellius.<sup>5</sup> The introduction, which takes into account the reader's standpoint, is another typical feature. Gellius briefly presents his interlocutors to his reader. His literary portraits, especially that of his teacher Favorinus, are both artful and attractive. Shifts from direct to indirect speech (and vice versa) add to the briskness of his narrative. Unlike most ancient authors, Gellius makes a point of exact citation and sometimes even looks up old manuscripts in libraries. Given the bilingual character of the culture of his time he quotes many texts in the Greek original.

Gellius is able to shape gracious short narratives<sup>6</sup> and to frame them with a short preface and a final 'lesson'. His literary technique in some respects paves the way for emblematic literature (s. Influence).

In an attractive way Gellius links the teaching process to determined situations and individual persons. He deliberately eschews large doses of pedantry. His artful use of setting makes learning an experience and conveys to us an impression of the life of the literary elite in his day.

<sup>1</sup> The interpretation of parallels with Aelian (2nd half of the 2nd century), Athenaeus (around 200), and Diogenes Laertius (probably early 3rd century) is difficult.

<sup>2</sup> HIRZEL, Dialog 2, 259.

<sup>3</sup> H. BERTHOLD 1980, 48.

<sup>4</sup> If at all, it is an 'encyclopedia of the most independent type': L. MERCKLIN, Die Citiermethode und Quellenbenutzung des A. Gellius in den Noctes Atticae, JKPh, suppl. 3, Leipzig 1857–1860, 633–710, esp. 694.

<sup>5</sup> Cf., for example, already Plin. nat. 1, s. above, p. 1265.

<sup>6</sup> A balanced view of truth and fiction in Gellius: L. A. HOLFORD-STREVENSON 1982.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

Gellius strives for linguistic precision. Archaism helps him find his way in this respect. The bilingual character of the culture of his age is reflected in numerous Greek citations. His apparently simple texts on closer inspection reveal high stylistic and literary claims; the author judiciously ponders sound and meaning of each word and combines all elements of his sentences into an effective artistic whole.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature<sup>2</sup>

Gellius wants to convey to his children a general culture appropriate to their social rank.

There is a pedagogical trend throughout his work. An educated man, in Gellius' opinion, has to know Roman customs, institutions, law, and, above all, the Latin language. The use of language must be based on moral and intellectual honesty. Ultimately, his search for sources of good Latin both explains and limits his 'archaizing' interests.<sup>3</sup> These, in their turn, determine his literary judgment.

Nevertheless, the bilingual character of the culture of his age prevents our author from blindly overestimating things Roman: for all his sympathy for a Caecilius Statius, Gellius frankly recognizes Menander's superiority.

---

<sup>1</sup> R. MARACHE 1957; L. GAMBERALE 1969; W. SCHIBEL 1971, 91-119 (bibl.); cf. G. MASELLI 1979; R. MARACHE, La recherche du rythme dans la préface des Nuits Attiques, in: Varron, grammaire antique et stylistique latine. Recueil offert à J. COLLART, Paris 1978, 397-403; R. MARACHE, La préface d'Aulu-Gelle. Couples et séries de synonymes ou de mots analogues, in: Studi in onore di E. PARATORE. Letterature comparate. Problemi e metodo, vol. 2, Bologna 1981, 785-791; B. LÖFSTEDT, Sprachliche Bemerkungen zu Gellius, MH 46, 1989, 125-127; P. STEINMETZ, Gellius als Übersetzer, in: C. W. MÜLLER (and others), eds., Zum Umgang mit fremden Sprachen in der griechisch-römischen Antike, Stuttgart 1992, 201-211.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. R. MARACHE 1979; P. KUKLICA, Literarisch-ästhetische Bemerkungen des A. Gellius, GLO 13-14, 1981-1982, 19-35 (underrates the philological and rhetorical approach).

<sup>3</sup> Gellius, therefore, rejects extremely far-fetched and outdated words: Vive igitur moribus praeteritis, loquere verbis praesentibus, cf. also L. GAMBERALE, Alcune tendenze dell'arcaismo lessicale. A proposito di Gell. 1. 10 e altro, AION (ling.) 8, 1986, 71-94.

Ideas II

The Noctes Atticae reflects the knowledge and interests of the author's age. It is true that Gellius shares Heraclitus' view that polymathy does not teach reason (praef. 12), and he promises to emphasize what is important; but this does not prevent him from including somewhat remote learning into his books.

Among the themes<sup>1</sup> he discusses are social problems, conflicts of duties, tensions between generations, the polarity of play and reality, further: law, language, literature, and technology. Again and again, Gellius successfully tries a comparative approach to Greek and Roman culture. In this regard Gellius is an heir of Plutarch (the friend of his teacher Favorinus) and a precursor of Macrobius.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

The transmission of books 1–7 is based, on the one hand, on the excellent palimpsest Palatinus Vaticanus 24 (A; 5th–6th century: for parts of books 1–4), unfortunately almost unreadable today; on the other hand, on the Vaticanus 3452 (V; 13th century), the Parisinus 5765 (P; 12th–13 century), and the Leidensis Gronovianus 21, formerly Rottendorffianus (R; 12th century).

The 8th book is missing. The transmission of books 9–20 falls into three classes. The first (F) is represented by the very good Franequeranus Leouardensis, which was recently rediscovered, Prov. Bibl. van Friesland 55 (F; early 9th century).

The second class ( $\gamma$ ) is represented by the Vaticanus Reginensis (Danielinus) 597 (O; 9th century) and the following manuscripts which are independent of O: Leidensis Vossianus ('minor') F. 112 (X; 10th century; beginning with book 10), Vaticanus Reginensis 1646 (Petavianus;  $\Pi$ ; 12th century), Florentinus Bibl. Nat. J. 4. 26, formerly Magliabechianus 329 (N; 15th century).

The third class ( $\delta$ ) is formed by: Parisinus 8664 (Q; 13th century), Leidensis Vossianus ('maior') F. 7 (Z; 14th century) and the Fragmentum Bernense 404 (B; 12th century)<sup>3</sup> with its continuation in the Leidensis B.P.L. 1925.

Editors of Gellius consider F,  $\gamma$ , and  $\delta$  to be of equal quality; in cases of doubt, majority decides.

The later manuscripts, which contain all the books (except for book 8, which is lost), are interpolated. In the first seven books they go together with VPR, in the later books with  $\gamma$ ; only the Gottingensis Cod. Ms. Philol. 161, 15th century, sides with  $\delta$ . However, we owe to these late manuscripts the chapter headings of book 8 and the last preserved paragraphs of book 20. The beginning of the preface and the ending of the last book are lost. A lacuna at the beginning of book 7 can be completed from Lactantius (epit. 24). Early readers such as Macrobius, Nonius, and John of Salisbury<sup>1</sup> sometimes help us restore the original reading.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. S. WHITELEY 1978.

<sup>2</sup> Basic P. K. MARSHALL, edition 1968, praef.; cf. also B. MUNK OLSEN, s. Bibl.

<sup>3</sup> For 1135 instead of 1173: L. A. HOLFORD STREVEENS, A Misdated Ms. of Gellius, CQ 29, 1979, 226–227.

Influence

Lactantius adapted ideas on providence from Gellius, Augustine an entire Stoic chapter on emotions (civ. 9. 4; Gell. 19. 1), praising our author as a vir elegantissimi eloquii et multae ac facundae scientiae. It is from Gellius that the Historia Augusta (Life of Probus) took a Catonian passage on Greek and Roman hero worship. Ammianus Marcellinus (4th century) thoroughly studied Gellius and incorporated not only single expressions but entire chapters and structural elements into his history. Macrobius shaped a work similar to that of Gellius, but arranged his material systematically. In the Middle Ages Gellius was a favorite. John of Salisbury (d. 1180) was familiar with him. In the 15th–17th centuries Gellius was congenial to a readership yearning for both factual information and moral instruction. Politian (d. 1494) expressly followed our author and his miscellaneous genre in his Miscellanea (1489), a pioneer work of philology. Baldassarre Castiglione (d. 1529) opened the third main section of his Cortegiano with the calculation of the size of Hercules' body (as Gellius had done in his introduction: Gell. 1. 1). Hartmann Schedel in his World Chronicle (1493) praised our author. Erasmus (d. 1536) copied a chapter of Gellius (13. 19) in the Epistula nuncupatoria to his Apophthegmata (1531) without naming his source, alas, a wide-spread behavior, complicating research on classical influences. On the other hand, Erasmus, in his Adagiorum Chilias (1. 4. 37), was loud in our author's praises. Nor was Gellius missing on the reading list of Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592), the master of the modern essay. By his way of presenting Ennius' fable of the crested lark, Gellius (2. 29) anticipated the tripartite pattern of emblematic literature: a maxim is followed by a graphic narrative and a concluding moral lesson. In his Novum Organum

---

<sup>1</sup> See, however, J. MARTIN, Uses of Tradition: Gellius, Petronius, and John of Salisbury, Viator 10, 1979, 57–76 (John would use only an anthology).

(1. 84) Francis Bacon (d. 1626) used a maxim attested only in Gellius (12. 11. 7 Veritas Temporis filia) to develop the idea that authorities prevented men from familiarizing themselves immediately with the real world. On the 1st Advent, 1641, in Leipzig a Collegium Gellianum (cf. Gell. 18. 2) was founded which discussed philological problems every Sunday after the church service.<sup>1</sup>

Gellius preserved precious remains of early Latin literature and exquisite information on literature, language, philosophy, history, and law. The reader's delight, however, is sometimes marred by a slight perplexity as to the 'what' and 'how'. With the ingratitude of youth, posterity therefore called Gellius a pecus aurei velleris. Actually his influence was not limited to problems of detail; we owe to him e.g. the term 'classic' (19. 8. 15; cf. 6. 13) and the explanation of words of great promise such as proletarius<sup>2</sup> (16. 10) and humanitas (13. 17). What is 'Gellian in Gellius'<sup>3</sup> is his skill at leading his reader to the crucial passages of the originals, to the point of making him finally forget his guide: Gellius, that man of the second rank (mea mediocritas 14. 2. 25),<sup>4</sup> who, as a good teacher, rendered himself superfluous.

Editions: C. SWEYNHEIM, A. PANNARTZ, Romae 1469. * F. WEISS (Tr), Leipzig 1875–1876, repr. 1975 and 1981. * M. HERTZ, 2 vols., Berolini 1883–1885. * C. HOSIUS, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1903, repr. 1959, 1991–1993. * J. C. ROLFE (TTr), 3 vols., London 1927, rev. 1946–1952, repr. 1961–1967. * P. K. MARSHALL, 2 vols., Oxford 1968, corr. 1990. * H. BERTHOLD (selection, TrN), Leipzig 1987. * H. BERTHOLD (T), Leipzig (forthcoming). * Book 1, praef.: P. FAIDER (TTrC), MB 31, 1927, 189–216. * Book 1: H. M. HORNSBY (C), Dublin 1936. * Books 1–3: F. CAVAZZA (TTrN), Bologna 1985. * Books 1–10: R. MARACHE, Paris 1967–1978. ** Index: J. GRONOVIVS, edition, London 1824, vol. 4 (almost complete) ** Bibl.: R. MARACHE, Fronton et A. Gellius (1938–1964), Lustrum 10, 1965, 213–246. * B. MUNK OLSEN, in: L'étude des auteurs latins aux XI<sup>e</sup> et XII<sup>e</sup> siècles, vol. 1, Paris 1982, chapitre 18, 397–402.

W. AMELING, Aulus Gellius in Athen, Hermes 112, 1984, 484–490. * G. ANDERSON, Aulus Gellius: a Miscellanist and his World, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 1834–1862. * M. L. ASTARITA, Note di cronologia gelliana, Orpheus n.s. 5, 1984, 422–432. * B. BALDWIN, Studies in Aulus Gellius, Lawrence,

<sup>1</sup> H. BERTHOLD 1985, 13.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. J. GARGOLA, A. Gellius and the Property Qualifications of the proletarii and the capite censi, CPh 84, 1989, 231–234.

<sup>3</sup> H. BERTHOLD 1980, 48.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Vell. 2. 104. 3; Val. Max. 1 praef.; Stat. silv. 5 praef.

Kansas 1975. * H. BERTHOLD, Aulus Gellius. Auswahl und Aufgliederung seiner Themen, diss. Leipzig 1959. * H. BERTHOLD, Aulus Gellius. Seine Bedeutung als Vermittler antiker Bildungs- und Kulturtraditionen, WZHalle 29, 3, 1980, 45–50. * H. BERTHOLD, Interpretationsprobleme im Miszellenwerk des Aulus Gellius, WZRostock 34, 1, 1985, 12–16. * L. DI GREGORIO, Gellio e il teatro, Aevum antiquum 1, 1988, 95–147. * E. FANTHAM, The Synchronistic Chapter of Gellius (17. 21) and some Aspects of Roman Chronology and Cultural History between 60 and 50 B.C., LCM 6, 1981, 7–17. * L. GAMBERALE, La traduzione in Gellio, Roma 1969. * L. A. HOLFORD-STREVEN, Fact and Fiction in Aulus Gellius, LCM 7, 1982, 65–68. * L. A. HOLFORD-STREVEN, Aulus Gellius, London 1988. * L. A. HOLFORD-STREVEN, Analecta Gelliana, CQ n.s. 43, 1993, 292–297. * R. MARACHE, La critique littéraire de langue latine et le développement du goût archaïsant au II<sup>e</sup> siècle de notre ère, Rennes 1952. * R. MARACHE, Mots nouveaux et mots archaïques chez Fronton et Aulu-Gelle, Paris 1957. * P. K. MARSHALL, The Date of Birth of A. GELLIUS, CPh 58, 1963, 143–149. * M. McDONNELL, The Speech of Numidicus at Gellius 1. 6, AJPh 108, 1987, 81–94. * G. MASELLI, Lingua e scuola in Gellio grammatico, Lecce 1979. * R. MAZZACANE, Nonio e Gellio. Ipotesi sulla genesi del II libro del De compendiosa doctrina di Nonio, Sandalion 8–9, 1985–1986, 181–202. * W. SCHIBEL, Sprachbehandlung und Darstellungsweise in römischer Prosa. Claudius Quadrigarius, Livius, A. Gellius, Amsterdam 1971. * E. TUERK, Macrobe et les Nuits Attiques, Latomus 24, 1965, 381–406. * A. D. VARDI, Why Attic Nights? or What's in a Name?, CQ n.s. 43, 1993, 298–301. * D. W. T. VESSEY, Aulus Gellius and the Cult of the Past, ANRW 2, 34, 2, 1994, 1863–1917. * S. WHITELEY, Fossicking through A. Gellius' Noctes Atticae, Aclass 21, 1978, 99–114.

MACROBIUS

Life and Dates

Ambrosius Macrobius Theodosius lived at the beginning of the 5th century. His identity with other known Macrobius is controversial; in all probability, he was the praefectus Italiae of 430 (cod. Theod 12. 6. 33). Avianus dedicated his fables to him. In his turn, he inscribed his work on grammar to a Symmachus, supposedly a son of the famous orator.

Survey of Works

Three works are to be named: in the first place, the Saturnalia in seven books, a literary symposium; second, the commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis—it was owing to Macrobius that Cicero's text survived; finally, a grammatical treatise known to us only through extracts: De differentiis et societatibus Graeci Latiniq̄ue verbi. It answered the needs of a civilization not impoverished but enriched by bilingualism.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The Saturnalia exploits a great amount of learned material. Along with antiquarians and commentators on Virgil, Macrobius used especially Gellius and Plutarch, without naming them. Occasionally he corrects Gellius. The problem of sources is complex. We should neither overrate nor underrate Macrobius' learning. For its content the Saturnalia belongs to the genre of miscellaneous literature. An artistic model was, among others, Plato's Banquet; the form of symposium had been used of old as a framework for the display of erudition.<sup>1</sup>—The Commentary on Cicero's Somnium is imbued with Neo-Platonic philosophy. Macrobius' authorities are Porphyry and Plotinus, whom he reckons, together with Plato, among the coryphaei of philosophy.—The De differentiis is reminiscent of Apollonius' Rhematicon, of Gellius, of a work related to Caper, and of glossaries.

Literary Technique

The Saturnalia adheres to the literary technique of philosophical dialogue. The setting recalls Plato: the dialogue is reported by a man who heard about it from a witness who had been present. The dialogue is presented in several subsequent days (from the eve of the Saturnalia to the third day of that feast), each day in a different interlocutor's house. In the central panel on Virgil, as had been the case in Cicero's dialogues, themes are allotted to each participant and then treated in the form of continuous speeches. Moreover, Macrobius masters the technique of prooemium; the dedication to the author's son is a Roman tradition established since Cato and Cicero's De officiis. As Cicero did in his rhetorical writings, Macrobius chooses noble Romans as interlocutors, thus taking away from his theme the smack of the classroom and conferring on it a general human significance. There is the famous Symmachus and, along with him, a representative of the Nicomachi. Servius is the only specialist—he guarantees a dignified presence of detailed scholarly research.

---

<sup>1</sup> This literary tradition was originally based on an existing practice: Plato, Xenophon, further Platonists, Aristotle (he was the first to display a considerable amount of erudition), Herodian, Heraclides, Athenaeus, Plutarch, Lucian (parody), Julian (on the ideal ruler), Methodius (Christian); Macrobius is closer to this tradition and to Gellius than to Roman satirical cena literature; cf. HIRZEL, Dialog and J. MARTIN, Symposium, Paderborn 1931, repr. 1968.

Language and Style

On his own showing Macrobius often leaves unchanged the language and style of his models.<sup>1</sup> Greek quotations are numerous. Macrobius was one of that waning number of educated western Romans who still knew Greek.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

To begin with, Macrobius reflects on his own authorship: when collecting material from different sources he wants to convey knowledge, not show off rhetorical skills (praesens opus non eloquentiae ostentationem sed noscendorum congeriem pollicetur, 'the present work undertakes to be a collection of matters worth knowing, not a display of my command of rhetoric', praef. 4); in doing so, he followed a tradition known to us from technical writing.<sup>2</sup> His teaching was intended not to be reduced to disconnected data, but to present an organic whole (in ordinem instar membrorum cohaerentia, 'like the parts of a coherent whole', ibid. 3). This is true of both form and content of his work.

A further—and more essential—point is our author's understanding of Virgil. In the Saturnalia Virgil figures as an expert in all fields of knowledge;<sup>3</sup> Macrobius likens him even to Mother Nature, thus attributing to him qualities usually reserved for gods. What is important in such statements is on the one hand the author's idea of human creativity, which anticipates modern developments, on the other, his high opinion of the didactic value of literary texts. The word as formed by the poet becomes a key to man's understanding of the world. Macrobius thus develops further a leading idea of Varro's De lingua Latina. While Varro had described the Latin language as an instrument that facilitates the reader's grasp of reality in an encyclopedic form, for Macrobius the study of Virgil became an initiation not only into Greek and Latin literature but into all domains of knowledge. He was not concerned with a ridiculous cult of Virgil but with the foundations of education. Latin was not taught in just any form, but in its noblest shape as created by the great poet. At the same time, it was the Aeneid that opened the way to technical disciplines for the student. Thus encyclopedic education had both a high level and a humane and creative center.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Nec mihi vitio vertas, si res quas ex lectione varia mutuabor ipsis saepe verbis, quibus ab ipsis auctoribus enarratae sunt explicabo (Sat. praef. 4).

<sup>2</sup> S. Roman Technical Writers, above pp. 568–570.

<sup>3</sup> Rhetoric, pontifical law, augural discipline, Greek literature, philosophy, astrology, early Latin poetry.

Ideas II

By writing his commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, Macrobius wanted to introduce his readers to philosophy. His interest, therefore, is philosophical rather than political. In Macrobius' period, Neo-Platonism was the general basis of scientific thought; many of its premises were accepted by both pagans and Christians. Macrobius combines his interpretation of texts with philosophical and encyclopedic teaching, thus using Cicero's classical text as a means to understand reality and as an introduction to philosophical thought.

Macrobius first studies Cicero's relationship to Plato, then discusses the essence of dreams and finally justifies the use of mythological disguise for the discussion of philosophical problems. Cicero's text gives occasion to insert considerations on numbers (ad rep. 6. 12), on the virtue of the soul (ad 13), on astronomy and music, as well as a description of the earth and its zones and a treatise on the year.<sup>2</sup> The final section on the soul's being moved by itself and its immortality gives rise to the development of the doctrine of syllogism. Thus, the commentary uses Cicero's text to develop all three domains of philosophy: physics, ethics, and logic.

---

<sup>1</sup> Virgil's place within the educational program was a parallel to Homer's role for the Greeks. It is more than doubtful if Macrobius intended to compete with Christianity by canonizing Virgil as a sort of holy scripture. In this respect, medieval readers, who eagerly studied Macrobius, were less narrow-minded than our century, which readily categorizes persons and texts according to ideologies and genres instead of listening to what they say.

<sup>2</sup> Crucial themes such as 'year' and 'sun' link Sat. and somn. together.

The soul's independent motion and immortality were central themes congenial to the Roman mind. Cicero, who had given these ideas a political accent, had used them—in a passage translated from Plato—as a keystone at the end of his dialogue. Only towards the end of antiquity would the problem of the human person be elaborated philosophically, again under the auspices of Neo-Platonism. In this respect, in Macrobius there is an encounter of Greek thought and Roman experience as shaped in literature.

Transmission

Sat.: Our manuscripts fall into three groups: the best one, which contains all the Greek citations, is mainly represented by the following codices: Neapolitanus VB 10 (N; early 9th century: containing Sat. 1. 1–7. 5. 2); Bodleianus Auct. T II 27 (D; late 9th century: containing Sat. 1. 1–3. 4. 9, the Commentary on the Somnium, and Cicero's text); Parisinus 6371 (P; 11th century: containing the full text of both Saturnalia and Commentary on the Somnium). N was written by an ignorant but reliable clerk; hence it is valuable. Agreement of ND gives a good text. P is an excellent manuscript; unfortunately, its copyist knew Latin and, therefore, sometimes exchanged synonyms.

The second group, which is regarded as less valuable today comprises the two Bambergenses (B) overvalued by Eyssenhardt (for Sat. 1. 1–3. 19. 5: M.L.V. 5 n. 9, 9th century; for the Commentary on the Somnium: M: IV 15. F n. 4, 11th century)

There is in addition a third group, which is third-class indeed; today the second and the third group are considered sub-groups of one and the same family.

somn.: The unusually rich tradition renders a recensio almost impossible. Along with P, B, and D (see above), editors privilege three further manuscripts: the Parisinus 6370 (S; 9th century), which contains the Commentary on the Somnium without Cicero's original; further, the Parisinus n. a. 16.677 (E; early 9th century), which exhibits the Commentary and some part of Cicero's text; and, finally, the Cottonianus Faustin. C. I Mus. Brit. (C), which comprises the Commentary and the entire Somnium.

Influence

Macrobius would be thoroughly studied and frequently used in the Middle Ages (as would Martianus, Boethius, Chalcidius, and Isidore). As he had copied his sources, he often would be excerpted literally in turn. The Commentary on the Somnium served as a source of classical science, especially of astronomy and arithmology.<sup>1</sup> The Saturnalia was a treasury of erudition,<sup>2</sup> etymologies, even anecdotes and jokes.<sup>3</sup> Macrobius influenced medieval interpreters of Virgil.<sup>4</sup>

Godefrid of Breteuil (12th century) introduced Macrobius<sup>5</sup> in his Fons philosophiae among other towering figures and had him witness the dispute between nominalists and realists. Godefrid may have still felt that Macrobius' Commentary contributed to the survival of Platonic philosophy. With the triumph of Aristotelian thought Macrobius' glory began to wane.

Editions: L. IANUS, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1848–1852 (for the earlier editions). * F. EYSSENHARDT, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1893. * I. WILLIS, 2 vols., Leipzig repr. 2nd ed. 1994 (corr.). * exc. gramm.: P. DE PAOLIS, Urbino 1990. * Sat.: N. MARINONE (TTrN), Torino 1967. * P. V. DAVIES (TrN), New York 1969. * sat. 2: A. B. SHAW (C., hist.), diss. Univ. Pennsylvania 1952. * somn.: W. H. STAHL (TrN), New York 1952. * L. SCARPA (TTrN), Padova 1981. * somn. 1: M. REGALI (TTrC), Pisa 1983. * somn. 2: M. REGALI (TTrC), Pisa 1990. ** Indices (selective) in the editions. ** Bibl.: s. the edition of I. WILLIS 2nd ed. 1970. * B. DE PAOLIS, Macrobio 1934–1984, Lustrum 28–29, 1986–1987, 107–249; and 30, 1988, 7–9.

A. CAMERON, The Date and Identity of Macrobius, JRS 56, 1966, 25–38. * H. DE LEY, Macrobius and Numenius, Bruxelles 1972. * S. DÖPP, Zur Datierung von Macrobius' Saturnalia, Hermes 106, 1978, 619–632. * M. A. ELFERINK, La descente de l'âme d'après Macrobe, Leiden 1968. * J. FLAMANT, La technique du banquet dans les Saturnales de Macrobe, REL 46, 1968 (1969), 303–319. * J. FLAMANT, Macrobe et le Néo-Platonisme latin à la fin du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle, Leiden 1977. * H. GÖRGEMANNS, Die Bedeutung der Traumein-

<sup>1</sup> A few examples: Macrobius' influence partly intersected with that of Chalcidius' interpretation of Plato's Timaeus; Dungal (8th century) literally copied Macrobius' indications on calculating a solar eclipse (MANITIUS, LG 1, 371); Macrobius was thoroughly studied by Byrhtferth (2nd half of the 10th century: MANITIUS, LG 2, 701–702); Hugh of St. Victor (12th century) calculated the perimeter and diameter of the sun following Macrobius (MANITIUS, LG 3, 116); Onulf (11th century) took from Macrobius the classification of dreams into five groups (ibid. 2, 362).

<sup>2</sup> Macrobius' explanation of the names of the months influenced Bede and Helerpic (ibid. 448–449).

<sup>3</sup> MANITIUS, LG 3, 556; 634.

<sup>4</sup> The preface of the commentary on the Aeneid ascribed to Bernardus Silvestris (12th century) does not refer to Sat. but to somn. 1. 9. 8: poetry conveys philosophical truth in hidden form (ibid. 3, 208–209); cf. A. WŁOSOK, Der Held als Ärgernis: Vergils Aeneas, WJA n.s. 8, 1982, 9–21, esp. 13, n. 11.

<sup>5</sup> MANITIUS, LG 3, 778.

kleidung im Somnium Scipionis, WS n.s. 2, 1968, 46–69. * C. GUITTARD, Une tentative de conciliation des valeurs chrétiennes et païennes à travers l'œuvre de Macrobo: syncrétisme et philosophie de l'histoire à la fin du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle, in: Actes du IX<sup>e</sup> congrès de l'Association G. Budé (Rome, 1973), Paris 1975, 1019–1030. * A. LA PENNA, Studi sulla tradizione dei Saturnali di Macrobio, ASNP 22, 1953, 225–252. * N. MARINONE, Il banchetto dei pontefici in Macrobio, Maia 22, 1970, 271–278. * A. PIERI, Lucrezio in Macrobio. Adattamenti al testo virgiliano, Messina 1977. * M. REGALI, La quadripartizione delle virtù nei Commentarii di Macrobio, A&R 25, 1980, 166–172. * M. REGALI, Importanza e limiti dell'aritmologia nei Commentarii in Somnium Scipionis di Macrobio, in: A. GARZYA, ed., Metodologie della ricerca sulla tarda antichità. Atti del primo convegno dell'Associazione di studi tardoantichi, Napoli 1989, 483–491. * A. SANTORO, Esegeti virgiliani antichi (Donato, Macrobio, Servio), Bari 1964. * A. SETAIOLI, L'esegesi omerica nel commento di Macrobio al Somnium Scipionis, SIFC 38, 1966, 154–198. * B. W. SINCLAIR, Vergil's sacrum poema in Macrobius' Saturnalia, Maia n.s. 34, 1982, 261–263. * E. SYSKA, Studien zur Theologie im ersten Buch der Saturnalien des Ambrosius Theodosius Macrobius, Leipzig 1993. * E. TÜRK, Macrobius und die Quellen seiner Saturnalien, diss. Freiburg 1961; cf. also Gnomon 42, 1970, 576, n. 4. * D. VAN BERCHEM, Poètes et grammairiens, MH 9, 1952, 79–87. * T. WHITTAKER, Macrobius or Philosophy, Science, and Letters in the Year 400, Cambridge 1923. * C. ZINTZEN, Römisches und Neuplatonisches bei Macrobius, in: P. STEINMETZ, ed., Politeia und Res publica, Gedenkschrift R. STARK, Wiesbaden 1969, 357–376.

MARTIANUS CAPELLA

Life and Dates

Martianus Capella<sup>1</sup> was born and lived<sup>2</sup> at Carthage (probably in the 5th century).<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The subscriptions of some manuscripts give the complete name Martianus Min(n)e(i)us Felix Capella. In the text the author calls himself Felix (§ 576) and Felix Capella (§§ 806; 999); the latter name is confirmed by Cassiod. inst. 2. 2. 17; 2. 3. 20.

<sup>2</sup> For a discussion of his possible profession: s. W. H. STAHL, R. JOHNSON, E. L. BURGE (s. editions) 1977, 1. 16–19.

<sup>3</sup> For A.D. 284–330: F. EYSENHARDT, Commentationis criticae de Marciano Capella particula, diss. Berlin 1861, 14–15; according to the communis opinio, the work dates from 410–439; for about 470: D. SHANZER, ed. 1986, introduction.

Survey of Work

He dedicated to his son an encyclopedia entitled De nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii. The first two books relate the allegorical story of the marriage of Mercury and the learned Philologia. The latter receives as a wedding gift seven female servants of Mercury: the Liberal Arts.<sup>1</sup> In the following books (3–9) each of them expounds her knowledge before the assembly of gods.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Possible sources are Varro (book 4: dialectics; book 7: arithmetics; book 8: astronomy), Aquila and Fortunatianus (book 5: rhetoric), Pliny and Solinus (book 6: geometry), Aristides Quintilianus (book 9: music). For the allusions to mystery cults in the framing narrative there is no single source; it is a potpourri.<sup>2</sup>

Literary Technique

The author uses the literary form of Menippean satire. Especially in the first two books, according to the tastes of his epoch, he largely elaborates his allegorical narrative. Books 3–9 are each framed by allegorical scenes.<sup>3</sup> The entire work is interspersed with dialogues between Saturia and Martian and scenes related to the marriage of Mercury and Philologia. Unlike his follower Fulgentius, Martianus maintains the narrative setting even throughout the later parts of his work. A tone evoking fairy tales at times is reminiscent of Martianus' famous countryman, Apuleius, whose charm, however, remains unequaled. The technical parts exhibit a perspicuous structure; there are helpful recapitulations and overviews of the themes to be treated.

Language and Style

A sophisticated, sometimes inflated prose is interspersed with verse in numerous meters (often hexameters, distichs and iambic senarii).

---

<sup>1</sup> Grammar, dialectics, rhetoric, geometry (including geography), arithmetic, astrology, and music. Two further subjects treated by Varro (medicine and architecture) were deliberately omitted, since—unlike the septem artes liberales—they treated earthly subjects (9. 891).

<sup>2</sup> Sceptical: L. LENAZ, ed. 1975, introduction; previous theories ibid.

<sup>3</sup> The final scene is missing in book 8, which is mutilated.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Our author consciously and expressly links his self-awareness to satura.<sup>1</sup> Having the Liberal Arts appear not only in all their beauty but also in rich ornament (ornatissima 2. 218) he expresses his high literary claims. Self-ironical remarks—e.g. on his senile loquaciousness—are typical of the genre and ought not to be taken at face value. Martianus' establishment of encyclopedic education on grounds of an apotheosis of Philology deserves mention.

Ideas II

An essential of Martianus' thought is an 'encyclopedic' approach typical of Latin literature (cf. our introductory notes to Roman technical writers, above p. 571; another is the cosmology of his age, forming the basis of the detailed allegorical narrative in the early books. There, under a thin veil of myth, the author intimates what will later appear as science (arithmetic, astronomy, music). A remote parallel may be found in the structure of Ovid's Metamorphoses, where mythology, in the last book, is obliterated by natural philosophy.

Transmission

All the numerous manuscripts are drawn from a single archetype. The most important are found in Bamberg (M.L.V. 16. 8; 10th century), Karlsruhe (73; 10th–11th century), Darmstadt (193; 10th–11th century); these three at the end of book 1 exhibit a subscriptio from A.D. 534. The corrector Felix is known to us also from the tradition of Horace (the 'Mavortius' recensio).

Influence

Apart from the brief survey in the 2nd book of Cassiodorus' Institutiones, Martianus' work is the sole complete account of the septem artes liberales which has come down to us. Similar projects of Augustine and Boethius<sup>2</sup> were carried out only partially. Martianus is our sole Latin source on geometry; as for arithmetic, besides Martianus, there is only Boethius' translation of Nicomachus; the parts on astronomy transmit data missing in all other ancient authors.<sup>1</sup> The De Nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii served as a textbook; medieval students used it to learn the Liberal Arts. Commentaries were written by John Scot (9th century), Dunchad the Irishman (9th century) and Remigius of Auxerre (d. about 908). Notker (d. 1022) translated the first two books into Old High German. Copernicus praised Martianus for having Mercury and Venus move around the sun, in accord with the heliocentric approach of Heraclides Ponticus (4th century B.C.). At an age of sixteen Hugo Grotius (d. 1645) produced an edition of Martianus.

<sup>1</sup> Fabellam tibi, quam Satira comminiscens hiemali pervigilio marcescentes mecum lucernas edocuit, ni prolixitas perculerit, explicabo (1. 2).

<sup>2</sup> We have his works on arithmetic and music.

Editions: F. VITALIS BODIANUS, Vincentiae 1499. * H. GROTIUS, Lugduni Bataavorum 1599. * U. F. KOPP (TC, indices), Francoforti 1836. * A. DICK, Lipsiae 1925, corr. with add. J. PRÉAUX, Stutgardiae 1978. * J. WILLIS, Leipzig 1983. * Book 1: D. SHANZER (C, phil., lit.), Berkeley 1986. * Book 2: L. LENAZ (TTrC), Padova 1975. * W. H. STAHL, R. JOHNSON, E. L. BURGE (Tr), New York 1977. * Book 9: L. CRISTANTE (TTrC), Padova 1987. * C. J. McDONOUGH, The Verse of Martianus Capella (TTrC on the poetry in books 1-5), Toronto 1968. ** Indices: s. the edition of U. F. KOPP (not complete).

S. I. B. BARNISH, Martianus Capella and Rome in the Late Fifth Century, Hermes 114, 1986, 98-111. * A. CAMERON, Martianus and his First Editor, CPh 81, 1986, 320-328. * P. COURCELLE, Late Latin Writers and their Greek Sources, Cambridge, Mass. 1969, 211-219. * H. W. FISCHER, Untersuchung über die Quellen der Rhetorik des Martianus Capella, Breslau 1936. * S. GREBE, Martianus Capella: De nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii. Die Sieben Freien Künste in der Spätantike, Habilitationsschrift Heidelberg 1996, Frankfurt 1997. * W. HÜBNER, Der Titel zum achten Buch des Martianus Capella, in: K. DÖRING, G. WÖHRLE, eds., Vorträge des ersten Symposiums des Bamberger Arbeitskreises 'Antike Naturwissenschaft und ihre Rezeption', Wiesbaden 1990, 65-86. * F. LEMOINE, Martianus Capella, A Literary Re-Evaluation, München 1972. * G. LEONARDI, I codici di Marziano Capella, Milano 1960. * G. MORETTI, Marziano Capella dall'enciclopedia alla scena: le nozze di Mercurio e Filologia nel teatro del'500, in: L. DE FINIS, ed., Scena e spettacolo nell'antichità. Atti del convegno internazionale di studio (Trento 1988), Firenze 1989, 285-303. * J. PRÉAUX, Martianus Capella, orator emeritus, in: Varron, grammaire antique et stylistique latine. Recueil offert à J. COLLART, Paris 1978, 172-179. * W. H. STAHL, Martianus Capella and the Liberal Arts, New York 1971. * J. WILLIS, De Martiano Capella emendando, Leiden 1971.

<sup>1</sup> For each sign of the zodiac he gives the exact risings and settings (8. 844-845).

CASSIODORUS

Life and Dates

Flavius Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator was a descendant of a noble family. Since 507 he had been active as a quaestor at the Ostrogothic court. He became consul ordinarius in 514, magister officiorum in 523; and praefectus praetorio in 533. His project of founding a university in Rome together with Pope Agapetus (536–537) never came to fruition. During the second half of his life he more and more devoted his energy to the monastery of Vivarium, which he had established on his family properties in south Italy under the rule of abbots. He retired there after a stay in Constantinople (probably not before 554) and died in advanced old age (around 583).

Survey of Works

The following works date from the period of his political activity (up to around 540):

Chronica (519), a chronological table from Adam to Eutharic with special regard to the Goths.

12 books of Historia Gothica (lost: 526–533 or 519); we possess, however, Jordanes' extract De origine actibusque Getarum (551).

12 books of Variae, a collection of the edicts written by Cassiodorus, intended to serve as a model of good style (537).

De anima.

Ordo generis Cassiodorum (preserved in fragmentary state: on Symmachus, Boethius, and Cassiodorus).

Speeches (preserved without his name and only in part)

During his stay in the monastery he wrote:

Exegetic works:

Expositiones in Psalmos.

Complexiones in epistolas et acta apostolorum et apocalypsin (this writing was the only one not to have influence on posterity).

Encyclopedic works:

Institutiones, consisting of: De institutione divinarum litterarum (in 33 chapters) and De artibus ac disciplinis liberalium litterarum.

De orthographia: A work of his old age with an introductory survey of his literary oeuvre (GL 7, p. 144).

Historia ecclesiastica tripartita: A collection of passages from Theodoret, Sozomenus and Socrates (a mediocre translation by Epiphanius, inspired by Cassiodorus, but not reckoned among his writings).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Cassiodorus names his sources and often juxtaposes passages excerpted from them in the original wording. In the Chronica he follows Eusebius, Jerome, and Victorius' Easter table; moreover, he relies on Aufidius Bassus and transmits valuable material from Livy. In the Historia Gothica he had, in addition, exploited Gothic genealogical traditions as well as his own experiences. The De anima is based especially on Augustine and Claudianus Mamertus. The Commentary on the Psalms draws on Augustine, among others. Augustine and Cassian also determine the educational aims of the Institutiones. The De orthographia contains excerpts from Cornutus, Velius Longus, Curtius Valerianus, Parprianus, Adamantius, Eutyches, Caesellius Vindex, and Priscian. We already mentioned the sources of the Historia ecclesiastica.

Literary Technique

In official papers the amount of literary embellishments is remarkable. Dates and many names have been deleted—the publication is not primarily intended to serve historical purposes but to provide models of style. However, the arrangement of the documents also reflects the social range of the addressees, a principle known to us from earlier Roman literature.

General considerations, even learned excursions are incorporated into the documents. Similarly, Cassiodorus occasionally breaks the monotony of his Institutiones by inserting an attractive description of his monastery (inst. 29).

Language and Style

In the Variae western Roman officialese and the tradition of literary epistles meet. Phraseology is sophisticated to the point of obscurity, even in edicts. However, Cassiodorus does not strive for uniformity of style. He develops, like many a Latin writer before him, a rich palette of shades.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In the Variae Cassiodorus is concerned with the variety of stylistic means of expression. The writer has to adapt his text to the character of his addressee.

Cassiodorus considers wordly wisdom and knowledge a necessary complement to revelation. In order to assemble a library he collects manuscripts and obliges his monks to copy books, an activity he wittily describes as contra diaboli subreptiones illicitas calamo atramentoque pugnare, 'fight with pen and ink against the illicit inroads of the devil' (inst. 1. 30). He also encourages translators of Greek works. In some passages his Institutiones are reminiscent of a good introduction into a library. First he teaches how to study the Bible and portrays some Christian authors: Hilary, Cyprian, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine.<sup>1</sup> Then, as a second main section of his Institutiones, he treats the artes liberales in seven chapters. The range of his interests is truly encyclopedic; they even include books on nursing and natural history. He recommends gardening to brothers unable to penetrate the depths of science.

He is systematically concerned with the art of interpretation (hermeneutics). For expounding a psalm he prescribes the following pattern: explain the title, sketch the disposition, summarize the content. In due course the exegesis proper has to be centered on the person of the speaker (as the historical focus) and on the person of Christ (as the spiritual focus). The Scriptures have a spiritual, an historical, and a mystical sense. The moral meaning is hinted at only occasionally. The conclusion of the exegesis has to summarize its results. This pattern of textual meditation is clearly influenced by rhetoric: what is more, even in detail Cassiodorus pinpoints rhetorical elements in the Psalms.<sup>2</sup> The Psalms equal eloquence in the full sense of the word. Thus the Commentary on the Psalms is an initiation into both faith and science. The latter unfolds what is implicit in the biblical texts.

<sup>1</sup> Another essay on a subject of literary history was the Ordo generis Cassiodororum.

<sup>2</sup> This practice would have been impossible without Augustine's Christianization of rhetoric; the Liberal Arts are even derived from the Scriptures (Aug. doct. chr. 2. 28. 43; civ. 8. 11); s. further: E. GOFFINET, L'utilisation d'Origène dans le Commentaire des Psaumes de saint Hilaire de Poitiers, Louvain 1965.

Ideas II

At the beginning of his career Cassiodorus adopted the persona of his rulers to develop his ideas. His own individuality initially did not appear; thanks to historical and biographical circumstances, however, in the second half of his life he could develop his own ideas.

Cassiodorus' view of history was conditioned by his position at the Gothic court. In order to justify the Goths' role in world history, he linked them to Getae and Scythians. Special attention had to be paid to the genealogy of the governing Amali. In compensation he later wrote a book on his own genealogy, in which he especially dwelt on his spiritual ancestors. Cassiodorus, the offspring of Roman senators, through a eulogy of Theodoric had gained the questionable honor of serving barbarian rulers as a scribe and of sharing, as a high official, the responsibility for their deeds, both good and evil. It was only indirectly and with intellectual arms that he could combat barbarism. It is in his writings that he gives proof of a tough power of resistance, which he had to disclaim in daily life. By publishing the Variae he furnished models of good Latin in official documents for future officials, and, in parentheses, conveyed some cultural background to them. For Cassiodorus the decline of the Gothic kingdom was a chance of freedom, and he made good use of it. He founded a 'hotbed' (Vivarium) of spiritual and intellectual life. The Romans' traditional delight in encyclopedic learning and teaching was now anchored in Christianity; thus it acquired a new and deeper meaning. Cassiodorus showed much common sense by linking it to an institution.

Influence

Cassiodorus' library and his monastery were short-lived; this did not impair their influence as examples. During the Middle Ages his works were studied carefully. The Variae fully served their purpose as models of style for documents. The Institutiones contributed much to a typical feature of western monasticism: not content with mere contemplation, monks copied and studied classical texts and became mediators of classical and encyclopedic education. Cassiodorus was one of Europe's great educators.

Editions: PL 69 and 70. * CSEL 71. * CC 96 and 97. * anim.: J. W. HALPORN, Turnholti 1973 (in: CC 96). * chron.: T. MOMMSEN, MGH AA 11, 2, 120–161. * gramm. (= De ortographia and De arte grammatica excerpta): GL 7, 143–216 Keil. * hist.: W. JACOB, R. HANSLIK, Vindobonae 1952 (= CSEL 71). * in psalm.: M. ADRIAEN, Turnholti 1958 (= CC 97). * inst.: R. A. B. MYNORS, Oxonii 2nd ed. 1961. * L. W. JONES (TrN), New York (1946) 1969. * or. (fig.): L. TRAUBE, in: MGH AA 12, Berolini 1894, 465–484. * rhet.: C. HALM, Rhet. Lat. min. 495–500. * var.: T. MOMMSEN, MGH AA 12, Berolini 1894, 3–385. * Å. FRIDH, Turnholti 1973 (in: CC 96). ** Indices: s. the editions by MOMMSEN, JACOB, FRIDH. ** Bibl.: s. editions and monographs.

B. CROKE, Cassiodorus and the Getica of Jordanes, CPh 82, 1987, 117–134. * Å. FRIDH, Terminologie et formules dans les Variae de Cassiodore, Göteborg 1956. * Å. FRIDH, Contributions à la critique et à l'interprétation des Variae de Cassiodore, Stockholm 1968. * Å. FRIDH, Cassiodorus' Digression on Music, var. 2. 40, Eranos 86, 1988, 43–51. * J.-Y. GUILLAUMIN, La christianisation du thème de 'l'œil de l'âme' chez Cassiodore (inst. 2. 3. 22), RPh 59, 1985, 247–254. * J. J. O'DONNELL, Cassiodorus, Berkeley 1979. * U. HAHNER, Cassiodors Psalmenkommentar. Sprachliche Untersuchungen, München 1973. * S. KRAUTSCHICK, Cassiodor und die Politik seiner Zeit, Bonn 1983. * S. LEANZA, ed., Atti della settimana di studi su Flavio Magno Aurelio Cassiodoro (Cosenza-Squillace 1983), Soveria 1986. * G. LUDWIG, Cassiodor. Über den Ursprung der abendländischen Schule, Frankfurt 1967. * R. MACPHERSON, Rome in Involution. Cassiodorus' Variae in their Literary and Historical Setting, Poznań 1989. * R. SCHLIEBEN, Christliche Theologie und Philologie in der Spätantike. Die schulwissenschaftlichen Methoden der Psalmenexegese Cassiodors, Berlin 1974. * R. SCHLIEBEN, Cassiodors Psalmenexegese. Eine Analyse ihrer Methoden als Beitrag zur Untersuchung der Geschichte der Bibelauslegung der Kirchenväter und der Verbindung christlicher Theologie mit antiker Schulwissenschaft, Göppingen 1979. * J. SVENNING, Zu Cassiodor und Jordanes, Eranos 67, 1969, 71–80. * G. VIDÉN, The Roman Chancery Tradition. Studies in the Language of Codex Theodosianus and Cassiodorus' Variae, Göteborg 1984. * L. VISCIDO, Sull'uso del termine barbarus nelle Variae di Cassiodoro, Orpheus n.s. 7, 1986, 338–344.

2. THE FOUNDERS OF WESTERN LAW

JURIDIC LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

The Zenith of Classical Roman Law: Jurists in the Service of the State

Since the early classical period jurisprudence had been linked ever more closely to the administration of the empire.<sup>1</sup> Increasingly jurists were active in central and provincial administration; they often moved up into the senate, although not all of them were natives of the city of Rome: L. Neratius Priscus<sup>2</sup> from the small Sabine town Saepinum actually belonged to a family of senators, but Javolenus, who had been only an equestrian officer, became a senator under Vespasian and was quickly promoted.

The practical activity of jurists influenced their scholarship: casuistry predominated; typical were titles like Responsa, Epistulae, Quaestiones, Digesta.

The antagonism of the two schools—described in former chapters<sup>3</sup>—waned around the mid-second century. P. Juventius Celsus (filius),<sup>4</sup> one of Hadrian's advisers, was the head of the 'Proculian' school. What is known of his 39 books of Digesta looks independent and gives proof of keen judgment. Maxims, which would become household words, give witness to his mastery of language.<sup>5</sup>

The leading 'Sabinian', Salvius Julianus,<sup>6</sup> a disciple of Javolenus is

<sup>1</sup> KUNKEL, Herkunft 290–304

<sup>2</sup> R. GREINER, Opera Neratii, diss. Freiburg, Karlsruhe 1973; forthcoming: D. LIEBS, HLL § 336, 3.

<sup>3</sup> S. above pp. 889–891; 1275–1277.

<sup>4</sup> Praetor in 106 or 107, consul for the second time in 129, governor of Thrace around 110, later governor of Asia; F. WIEACKER, Amoenitates Iuventianae. Zur Charakteristik des Juristen Celsus, Iura 13, 1962, 1–21; M. BRETONE, Note minime su Celsus filius, Laeco 9, 1963, 331–345; KUNKEL, Herkunft 146–147; H. HAUSMANINGER, P. Iuventius Celsus. Persönlichkeit und juristische Argumentation, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 382–407.

<sup>5</sup> Examples are: his definition of ius as ars boni et aequi (Dig. 1. 1. 1 pr.) and rules for jurists such as: scire leges non hoc est verba earum tenere, sed vim ac potestatem (Dig. 1. 3. 17); incivile est nisi tota lege perspecta una aliqua particula eius proposita iudicare vel respondere (Dig. 1. 3. 24); impossibile nulla obligatio (Dig. 50. 17. 185).

<sup>6</sup> Of Italian descent; born in Hadrumetum (Africa); among other offices he held, perhaps the most influential of classical jurists. His scholarly masterpiece—Digesta in 90 books—contains coherent disquisitions on legal problems shaped as listeners' questions and teacher's answers.<sup>1</sup> On Hadrian's behalf he made the definitive redaction of the edicts for jurisdiction: his text was confirmed by a senatus consultum and could only be changed by the princeps himself.<sup>2</sup>

Julian (Dig. 40. 5. 20) had the gift of clearly analyzing even the most intricate cases. He was guided by an evaluation of the interests involved, not by rigid categories. His Latin is a model of simplicity and elegance.<sup>3</sup> He definitely closed many debates.<sup>4</sup> Soon after him the controversy between the two schools must have lost its old importance.

A casuistic approach was typical also of Ulpian Marcellus (under Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius) in his huge Digesta and of emperor Marcus' adviser Q. Cervidius Scaevola (about 175 praefectus vigilum); his Quaestiones, Responsa, and the posthumously published Digesta were the fruits of his activity as a consultant in the eastern half of the empire.

Pomponius,<sup>5</sup> who in all probability held no public offices and did not have the ius respondendi, excelled by thorough domination of vast knowledge and its intelligent presentation. His small textbook for beginners was called Enchiridion—perhaps following the precedent of Epictetus the Stoic; we owe to it, among other information, a survey of the early history of Roman law (Dig. 1. 2. 2). Moreover, Pomponius wrote three works on ius civile in the guise of voluminous he was governor of Germania inferior in Cologne and consul in 148; propter insignem doctrinam he earned the double of a quaestor's salary from Hadrian: D. NÖRR, Drei Miscellen zur Lebensgeschichte des Juristen Salvius Iulianus, in: Daube noster, Essays in Legal History for D. DAUBE, Edinburgh 1974, 233–252; E. BUND, Salvius Iulianus, Leben und Werk, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 408–454; D. Liebs, HLL 4, § 414 (forthcoming).

---

<sup>1</sup> T. MOMMSEN, Über Julians Digesten, ZRG 9, 1870, 82–96 (= Gesammelte Schriften 2, 7–20).

<sup>2</sup> A. GUARINO doubted Julian's redaction of the edict (Storia del diritto romano, Napoli, 4th ed. 1969, 460–462).

<sup>3</sup> Latina Iuliani dictio non modo pura est, sed et tersa aliquando, ubique vero castigata, nusquam abrupta aut turgida (HEINECCIUS in: W. KALB, Roms Juristen nach ihrer Sprache dargestellt, Leipzig 1890, 57).

<sup>4</sup> On his method: E. BUND, Untersuchungen zur Methode Iulians, Köln 1965.

<sup>5</sup> He was active during the epoch from Hadrian to Marcus Aurelius; LENEL, Palingenesia 2, 15–160; G. WESENBERG, RE 21, 2, 1952, 2416; M. BREONE, Motivi ideologici dell'Enchiridion di Pomponio, Labeo 11, 1965, 7–35; D. NÖRR, Pomponius oder 'Zum Geschichtsverständnis der römischen Juristen', ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 497–604; D. LIEBS, HLL 4, § 422 (forthcoming).

commentaries on Sabinus, Q. Mucius, and Plautius, a commentary on the edict, three monographs (on fideicommissum, stipulatio, and the senatusconsulta), further epistulae and Lectiones, altogether about 300 books. Pomponius is a knowledgeable and intelligent jurist; his Latin is clear. His thought is not always free from dogmatic rigidity.

Late Classical Period: Jurists from the Provinces

The jurists of the imperial period generally used the purely senatorial career (cursus honorum), which was linked to the city of Rome, to become in due course high officials in the imperial administration. As could be seen in the case of Julian, however, at the zenith of classical Roman law many of the jurists were not descended from the upper class of the city of Rome. In the late classical period this development continued to Rome's disadvantage: during the period of the Severi almost all jurists, as far as they can be localized at all, originated from the provinces. Once jurists owed their power the emperor, not to the senate, equestrian careers became more and more typical of them.<sup>1</sup>

Gaius (about 120–180)<sup>2</sup> also was of provincial origin; for generations to come, he was one of the most authoritative and influential writers on law; his exact birthplace is disputed; his full name and

<sup>1</sup> J. BLEICKEN, In provinciali solo dominium populi Romani est vel Caesaris—Zur Kolonisationspolitik der ausgehenden Republik und frühen Kaiserzeit, Chiron 4, 1974, 359–415; D. LIEBS, Römische Provinzialjurisprudenz, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 288–362; J. BLEICKEN, Verfassungs- und Sozialgeschichte des römischen Kaiserreichs, 2 vols., München (1978), 2nd ed. 1981.

<sup>2</sup> Editions: J. F. L. GÖSCHEN, Berolini 1820 (first edition, based on the palimpsest); P. KRÜGER, W. STUEMUND, Berolini 7th ed. 1923; E. SECKEL, B. KÜBLER, Lipsiae 7th ed. 1935; F. DE ZULUETA (ITrC), 2 vols., Oxford 1946–1953; books 1 and 2: H. L. W. NELSON, M. DAVID (TC), Leiden 1954–1968. On the origin of Gaius: MOMMSEN, Gesammelte Schriften 2, 1905, 26–38; W. KALB, Roms Juristen, nach ihrer Sprache dargestellt, Leipzig 1890, 73–88 (problematic); F. KNIEP, Der Rechtsgelehrte Gaius und die Ediktcommentare, Jena 1910, 1–29; 57–77; H. KROLL, Zur Gaius-Frage, diss. Münster 1917; WIEACKER, Textstufen 186–199; SCHULZ, Geschichte 191–201; KUNKEL, Herkunft 186–213; D. LIEBS, Gaius und Pomponius, in: Gaio nel suo tempo. Atti del simposio romanistico, Napoli 1966, 61–75; id., Römisches Recht 66–68; id., Römische Provinzialjurisprudenz, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 288–362, on Gaius esp. 294–310; G. DIÓSDI, Gaius, der Rechtsgelehrte (with bibl. by R. WITTMANN), ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 605–631; fundamental H. L. W. NELSON 1981, esp. 413–423 (including a critical survey of previous research); D. LIEBS, HLL 4, § 426 (forthcoming).

biography are unknown. From his own experience he reports an event which happened under the rule of Hadrian (Dig. 34. 5. 7, pr.); the Institutiones was written about 161.

Gaius' oeuvre comprised about 100 volumes, among which Ad edictum provinciale libri XXX<sup>1</sup> and a Commentary to the Twelve Tables but no casuistical works. The only work handed down to us is the Institutiones, a textbook for beginners in four volumes.<sup>2</sup> The same subject was treated along similar lines (and only in part more circumstantially) in the Res cottidianae<sup>3</sup> (or Aurea), a work quoted in the Digesta and in Justinian's Institutiones. The authenticity of the Aurea is controversial, as are its relationship to the Institutiones and the extent of possible interpolations.

In the 1st book of the Institutiones Gaius describes the law concerning persons and family, in the second and third book there follows the law concerning objects, inheritance and obligations, the fourth of actions and their forms. This subdivision of civil law influenced even modern codes.

As for its assignment to a literary genre, the Institutiones is a systematic textbook, roughly comparable to Quintilian's Institutio oratoria.<sup>4</sup> The systematic approach to law is open to different explanations as to its roots in grammar or philosophy;<sup>5</sup> it certainly was older than the period of Gaius. Without any doubt the plan of Gaius' work is reminiscent of what is known of a comparable work of Neratius; the latter, however, was not a Sabinian like Gaius, who possibly followed some teacher of his own school.<sup>6</sup> His personal achievement, however,

<sup>1</sup> The two books Ad edictum aedilium curulium were an appendix to the commentary on the edict.

<sup>2</sup> The only manuscript, a palimpsest, was discovered by Niebuhr in 1816 in the chapter library of Verona; moreover, there are two papyrus fragments and, in addition, later paraphrases and explanations.

<sup>3</sup> For interpolations and a complex interaction of texts: M. FUHRMANN, Zur Entstehung des Veroneser Gaius-Textes, ZRG 73, 1956, 341–356; against him: H. L. W. NELSON 1981, 326–328.

<sup>4</sup> On this, FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 104–121 and esp. 183–188; cf. also W. VON KOTZ-DOBŘŽ, Institutiones, RE 9, 2, 1916, 1566–1587; for Stoic influence: A. SCHMEKEL, Die Philosophie der mittleren Stoa, Berlin 1892, 439–465, esp. 456; M. POHLENZ, Die Stoa I, Göttingen 6th ed. 1984, 191–276, esp. 263–264; 2, 4th ed. 1972, esp. 135 (comm. to p. 263).

<sup>5</sup> Sceptical H. L. W. NELSON 1981, 335–336 with notes 2 and 3 (against H.-J. METTE, Ius civile in artem redactum, Göttingen 1954 and F. WIEACKER, Griechische Wurzeln des Institutionensystems, ZRG 70, 1953, esp. 93–113).

<sup>6</sup> For Neratius as his model: D. LIEBS 1976 (Rechtsschulen), esp. 217 and 225– was not limited to teaching; it is also evinced in a strict and consistent adherence to his principles of classification, even in detail.

His style is clear and simple. Colloquialisms are unobtrusive; there are almost no Greek words. Gaius' use of legal terms and of officiales is always correct and never excessive.

Gaius wrote his textbook for future imperial administrators; in fact, the emperors since Hadrian fostered the institution of a career for civilian officials, a prerequisite for which was the study of law. Supposedly Gaius himself was not a jurist authorized by the emperor; his contemporaries and the classical jurists who wrote after him ignored him. However, from the 5th century onward, his influence increased so much the more: the Procedure on Citing Recognized Jurists (of Valentinian III: cod. Theod. 1. 4. 3) of 426 made Gaius an authority among other great jurists.

Great Late Classics

Initially law created by jurists was predominant; it originated from the jurists' practice of responding. Its prime ended with the military monarchy of the Severi. Imperial constitutions (including imperial jurisdiction) represented a new layer of Roman law. They arose and substituted the open responses of independent jurists during the 2nd century A.D. when the emperors laid down the republican mask. Roman law, therefore, developed gradually. The two main sources of law gained equal right in the codifications of late antiquity.

In the late classical period, which roughly coincided with the era of the Severi (193–235), jurists more and more became officials: they held high offices reserved for Roman knights (such as the position of a praefectus praetorio)<sup>1</sup> and served their emperors as advisers. They often came from the eastern half of the empire (νομικοί Ῥωμαῖοι). At the beginning of the 5th century Rome lost its leading role even in the field of law. From the 3rd century, Juridic literature decayed. Increasingly jurists limited themselves to collecting and elaborating existent older material.

---

227; for Sabinus: H. L. W. NELSON 1981, 374–375 with notes 61 and 62; critical D. LIEBS, Gnomon 55, 1983, 122–123.

<sup>1</sup> The 2 praefecti praetorio (since 2 B.C.) were knights and members of the emperor's consilium. The latter delegated to them civil functions, such as jurisdiction. Under Constantine this office became a merely civil and senatorial one.

The earliest and most important late classic, Aemilius Papinianus,<sup>1</sup> a student of Cervidius Scaevola, was born about 150, perhaps in Africa. We do not know his origin, nor can we prove his alleged relationship by marriage to the family of Septimius Severus.<sup>2</sup> A typical Roman knight's career<sup>3</sup> led him to the office of praefectus praetorio (205–211; CIL 6. 228); after the death of Septimius Severus (211) he was discharged. The soldiers in the City did not like him; after Caracalla had usurped power and murdered his brother Geta, the praetorians had Papinian sentenced to death in a show trial. Caracalla did not intervene in his favor (Dio Cass. 78. 1. 1 and 78. 4. 1a and—hagiographically adorned—Hist. Aug. 13. 8; 13. 4; a relatively early critical voice is Aur. Vict. Caes. 20. 30–31).

Papinian published casuistical collections: 37 books of Questiones (in the order of the preceding Digests), 19 books of Responsa; to the latter, Paulus and Ulpian later added critical notes.

Papinian's Responsa were not limited to recording the given questions and answers, but also adduced important arguments supporting the decision; at the least, Papinian quoted parallel cases and examples to the contrary.

Papinian's style is brief and fertile in ideas; hence it is not always easy to grasp.

Our author examines the cases he studies with unusual sensitiveness and finds undogmatic solutions. More often than other jurists he resorts to ethical considerations (e.g. Dig. 28. 7. 15); he proved by his death, that such ideas were more than mere phraseology to him.

Late antiquity revered Papinian as the greatest jurist of all times (Hist. Aug. 10. 21. 8; Iust. 6. 42. 30 acutissimi ingenii vir et merito ante alios excellens, 'a man of sharpest mind and rightfully surpassing the others'). In the 5th and 6th centuries students of law held 'Papinian celebrations' at the beginning of the third year of their studies; during that year, they were called Papinianistae for, in the main, they treated texts of Papinian. Within the chorus of jurists his humane voice was given special importance (cod. Theod. 1. 4. 1. 3). Andreas Gryphius (d. 1664) would immortalize him in his last drama Grossmüthiger Rechts-Gelehrter oder Sterbender Aemilius Paulus Papinianus (Breslau 1659).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> WIEACKER, Textstufen 332–388; KUNKEL, Herkunft 224–229; V. GIUFFRÈ, Papiniano: fra tradizione ed innovazione, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 632–666; D. LIEBS, HLL 4, § 416 (forthcoming).

<sup>2</sup> D. LIEBS, Römische Provinzialjurisprudenz, ANRW 2, 5, 1975, 5, n. 31; D. NÖRR, Ethik von Jurisprudenz in Sachen Schatzfund, BIDR 75, 1972, 29–30, n. 100 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> About 180 he became assessor of the praefecti praetorio, from 194 to 202 he was a leading member and, after this, head of the imperial chancellery a libellis (Dig. 20. 5. 12).

Julius Paulus,<sup>2</sup> descendant of a man who got his citizenship from Caesar or Augustus, was born about 160 and, like Papinian, was a student of Scaevola. After an activity as an advocate he became assessor of the praefectus praetorio Papinian and a counselor of Septimius Severus; Elagabalus made him (about 218–219) praefectus praetorio, but banished him soon. Alexander Severus rehabilitated him and appreciated his advice.

His writings—over 300 volumes—were partly casuistical: 26 books of Quaestiones, 23 books of Responsa, 6 books of Imperiales sententiae in cognitionibus prolatae. But most of his books were commentaries and monographs: the Commentary on the Edict amounted to 78 books, the Commentary on the Edict of the Aediles to only two, the Commentaries on Sabinus to 16 books. In his monographs Paulus treated even subjects hitherto unexplored.<sup>3</sup> The Pauli sententiae receptae were compiled from the writings of jurists and from 3rd-century imperial constitutiones at the beginning of the post-classical period and meant to serve as a handbook for legal practice in the province (of Africa?).

Paulus quoted almost the entire previous literature, especially Labeo, Sabinus, Julianus, Africanus, Pomponius, Marcellus, Scaevola. He also exploited Gaius. His criticism of predecessors is outspoken, often trenchant. He handled classical terminology with rigor.

Domitius Ulpianus,<sup>4</sup> born about 170, called Tyre his origo (Dig. 50. 15. 1 pr.). His fellow citizens erected to him a 12 feet high marble monument (Année épigraphique 1988, no. 1051). He became an assessor to the praetor urbanus and, having held several other offices,<sup>5</sup> was promoted to praefectus praetorio (222; cod. Iust. 4. 65. 4). As a

<sup>1</sup> D. NÖRR, Papinian und Gryphius, ZRG 83, 1966, 308–333.

<sup>2</sup> A. BERGER, RE 10, 1, Iulius 382, 1918, 690–752; C. A. MASCHI, La conclusione della giurisprudenza classica all'età dei Severi. Iulius Paulus, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 667–707; forthcoming D. LIEBS, HLL 4, § 424.

<sup>3</sup> De portionibus quae liberis damnatorum ceduntur, De iure singulari, De iuris et facti ignorantia.

<sup>4</sup> KUNKEL, Herkunft 245–254; T. MAYER-MALY, RE 9 A 1, 1961, 567–569; SCHULZ, Geschichte passim; R. ORESTANO, Novissimo Digesto italiano 19, 1973, 1106 (with bibl.); G. CRIFÒ, Ulpiano. Esperienze e responsabilità del giurista, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 709–789.

<sup>5</sup> Magister a libellis, magister scrinii, praefectus annonae.

counselor to the emperor (Hist. Aug. Alex. Sev. 26. 6; 68. 1) he was the most influential man in the empire. In his choice of political means he was not over-scrupulous; his own praetorians, in their turn, killed him in 223 (Pap. Oxy. 31. 2565; Cass. Dio 80. 2).

Almost all of his works were written under Caracalla (this is also true for his casuistic works: two books of Responsa and several books of Disputationes publicae). Only the liber singularis De excusationibus in all probability dates from his early years. His Commentaries were even more voluminous than those of Paulus: 81 books on the praetor's edict, two on the aedile's, 51 on Sabinus (unfinished, published posthumously). Moreover, our author commented on Augustan laws.<sup>1</sup> From his teaching experience sprang seven books of Regulae and two books of Institutiones with the famous passages on ius, ius naturale, and iustitia (Dig. 1. 1. 1 pr.; 1. 1. 10).

His treatment of forms of extraordinary jurisdiction was authoritative.<sup>2</sup> Especially the ten books De officio proconsulis would be frequently used later on. Thus it happened that with Ulpian jurisprudence definitely ceased to be focused on Rome.

Ulpian's writings were an encyclopaedia of the whole of jurisprudence. He exploited early and classical juridic literature, arranging and examining decisions of cases and making them available for future users. Not free from a certain sense of mission,<sup>3</sup> he combined theory and practice and almost attained his goal to replace the existing literature on law. In fact, over 40% of the Digesta consists of extracts from his works,<sup>4</sup> and there is more of him available to us than of any of his colleagues.

Ulpian's student Herennius Modestinus (praefectus vigilum about 228) wrote Pandectae, Responsa, Regulae, Differentiae and several monographs. Aelius Marcianus wrote (after 217) Institutiones in 16 books and Regulae in five books. Both authors are quoted in the Digesta; the Procedure on

<sup>1</sup> Leges Iulia et Papia, Lex Iulia de adulteris, Lex Aelia Sentia.

<sup>2</sup> On the jurisdiction of special praetors (for causes of tutelage and fideicommissum), of consuls, praefecti urbi, and of governors of provinces; the De omnibus tribunalibus libri X is a supplement, on extraordinary jurisdictional competences of Roman magistrates.

<sup>3</sup> D. NÖRR, Iurisperitus sacerdos, in: Xenion. FS P. J. ZEPPOS, Athens, Freiburg 1973, 1, 555–572; D. NÖRR, Ethik von Jurisprudenz in Sachen Schatzfund, BIDR 75, 1972, 11–40, esp. 38–40; M. FUHRMANN, D. LIEBS, Fälle aus dem römischen Recht. Kommentar, Bamberg 1974, 13–15.

<sup>4</sup> Further evidence: Fragmenta Vaticana, Collatio legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum, Scholia Sinaïtica, papyri, quotations found in other authors.

Citing Recognized Jurists of 426 finally confirmed that Modestinus with his writings belonged to the exclusive circle of the five 'citable' jurists, whose opinions enjoyed especial authority in court.

The Decline of Juridical Literature

The general stagnation of literary productivity around the middle of the 3rd century was felt, too, in the domain of law. In the chaotic decades from the death of Alexander Severus (235) to the rise of Diocletian (from 284–285 onward) there were 69 emperors; nine would have been more than enough. A small minority only were successful enough to govern all of the empire and to hold their own for a longer period. In addition there were difficulties caused by external enemies: emperors had no spare time for jurisdiction or regular legislation: some of them never saw Rome. In those years of emergency, imperial rescripta<sup>1</sup> (i.e. answers to written petitions) assisted by the magister libellorum became rare; they were revived only under Carinus and Diocletian. Moreover, neo-Platonism and mystery religions were part of a general change of mentality: North Africa, hitherto a cradle of lawyers, now turned to the production of theologians.<sup>2</sup>

Imperial Constitutions

The character of the sources of law definitely changed. For centuries, the opinions of experts had determined the development of law, and ius had been identical with 'law created by jurists'. From the beginning of the 3rd century onward, however, along with this ius vetus, the new imperial law increasingly gained in importance. The constitutiones principum<sup>3</sup> (a collective term used since the period of Hadrian) gained in authority, no matter what their actual form was;

<sup>1</sup> D. V. SIMON, Konstantinisches Kaiserrecht, Frankfurt 1977, 5–49.

<sup>2</sup> Tertullian perhaps had initially been a jurist; he was a lawyer for certain. For his being identical with the jurist named Tertullian: D. LIEBS 1976 (Provinzial-jurisprudenz), n. 37 a; and forthcoming HLL 4, § 417. 2; A. BECK, Römisches Recht bei Tertullian und Cyprian, Halle 1930, augm. repr. Aalen 1967, 13–17 (and the new preface); the contrary view here pp. 1534–1535; cf. 1528–1529. Characteristic features of the epoch: D. LIEBS, HLL 5, 1989, 55–56 (with bibl.); F. WIEACKER, Recht und Gesellschaft in der Spätantike, Stuttgart 1964.

<sup>3</sup> LIEBS, Recht 69–73; the Lex de imperio allows the emperor to act on behalf of the people, even as legislator (Gaius inst. 1. 5).

this is true even of mere legal expert opinions answering private petitions (given either in written form—subscriptiones or rescripta—or orally: interlocutiones de plano); from the military monarchy of the Severi onward, the authority of the constitutiones principum outshone that of the responsa of jurists; since the late 3rd century, the latter practically lost all significance. During the imperial period republican traditions waned: after Nerva, popular legislation ended, under Hadrian the creation of law by magistrates ceased. It was now up to the jurists to develop it further. Under the republic experts had been independent; now they gave their opinions by order of the emperor. Understandably, the senatus consulta more and more became identical with the emperor's messages (orationes principis) read to the senate. With Constantine, the emperor's legislative utterances were overtly called leges; it had been up to the imperial quaestor to formulate them; now the latter's position was enhanced formally.

In late antiquity bulletins in the name of the emperor or of high officials are frequent. Moreover, there are collections of laws. Of these it is the legally relevant central passage or parts of it which survive. These texts often meet literary standards; their style is highly ornate, even pompous.

There are three types of general laws<sup>1</sup> (lex, lex generalis, lex edictalis): the most frequent is an imperial 'letter' (epistula) to a high official, the praefectus urbi or the praefectus praetorio, who incorporates this letter as a law into his own edict or furthers it to subordinate governors. Second, the emperor may address the people immediately in the guise of an edict<sup>2</sup> (ad populum, ad universos provinciales etc.). The third and rarest form is a letter to the senate of Rome (oratio ad senatum, senatus-consultum) and, even more rarely, to that of Constantinople. However, the terms constitutio and lex can also be used without claiming general validity or legal authority: for benefices, tax exemptions, imperial donations, and privileges.

Post-Classical Period

Hosts of officials all over the late Roman empire had to be proficient in law. Hence, a universal and perspicuous legislation was badly needed.<sup>1</sup> Historical circumstances allowed nothing but brief scholia to imperial constitutiones and epitomes of late classical works.

<sup>1</sup> References and explanation of the preserved texts in D. LIEBS, HLL 5, 1989, 58–60.

<sup>2</sup> LIEBS, Recht 70.

From the mid-3rd to the second half of the 5th century we know many names of Roman jurists (from Italy, Gaul, Africa, and, above all, the Orient) but almost no juridic literature. Writings are mostly anonymous or usurp the names of great classical authors. Only during the last fifty years have scholars traced the true provenance of post-classical works. The chronological problems posed are even more difficult.

The space of time from the end of the classical period to the end of antiquity falls into four sections: the period lasting from the later part of the 3rd century until Diocletian; the epoch of Christianization (from Constantine to 410), the period of the migration of tribes (410 to ca. 520/530: in the West, the beginning vulgarization of law would extend far into the Middle Ages, in the East it was opposed by the renaissance of classical law in the law schools of the 5th century); and, finally, the epoch of Justinian.

More or less beginning with the later part of the 3rd century (Gregory the Thaumaturge) legal instruction was based on definite works of classical juridic literature; in the East, Gaius' Institutiones were especially studied in the first year; the students of this age group were called dupondii; in the second year they concentrated above all on Ulpian's great Commentary on the Edict; these students were called edictales; in the third year they studied Papinian's Responsa (hence: Papinianistae), in the fourth year, Paul's Responsa, and in the fifth, the constitutiones of emperors using the Codices Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, later the Theodosianus as well and (after Justinian) the Iustianianus (in the East both age groups were called λόται).

Moreover, compendia for practical purposes were written—Iuris epitomae, Regulae, Sententiae, Opiniones. Their length is moderate (about 5–6 books). They were generally ascribed to classical jurists (Paulus, Ulpian, Gaius). One of these is the Regularum liber singularis Ulpiani<sup>2</sup> (also: tituli ex corpore Ulpiani), which are reminiscent of Gaius. They have been preserved in a Vatican manuscript.

<sup>1</sup> D. NÖRR, Zu den geistigen und sozialen Grundlagen der spätantiken Kodifikationsbewegung, ZRG 80, 1963, 109–140; on the factors shaping the development of law in Late Antiquity: J. GAUDEMET, La formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'Église aux IV<sup>e</sup> et V<sup>e</sup> siècles, Paris 1957.

<sup>2</sup> F. SCHULZ, Die Epitome Ulpiani des Codex Vaticanus Reginae 1128. Juristische

The Pauli sententiae, a work for beginners based on late classical jurists, has been transmitted mainly through the Lex Romana Visigothorum. In late antiquity, the Pauli sententiae<sup>1</sup> would become the most successful compendium of Roman law. It is a collection of short juridic sententiae without discussion of problems. The title makes the reader believe that these are acknowledged legal sententiae written by Paul for his son (cf. the Dicta Catonis ad filium suum, which date from the 3rd century as well).

Likewise, the Regularum liber singularis and Regularum libri ascribed to Gaius seem to belong to the post-classical period. During the same period marginal notes (glosses) and summarizing paraphrases intruded into the classical texts, whereas other elements were omitted.<sup>2</sup>

Condensed editions—e.g. of Gaius' Institutiones—, juridic dictionaries, and collections of excerpts from the late classics were in circulation.

On the whole the—mostly anonymous—post-classical epigones convey a regular, normative idea of law, not a complex discussion of individual cases. Legal sententiae are cited briefly; reasons, disquisitions, and discussions are absent.

First Collections of Constitutiones

Around A.D. 300 there appeared collections containing quotations from the classical jurists and especially the emperors' constitutiones. They might be called the first precursors of the Digesta and the Codex Justinianus.

The Codex Gregorianus,<sup>3</sup> which has not come down to us, was published in 291. It was a private collection of imperial constitutiones from

---

Texte für Vorlesungen und Übungen 3, Bonn 1926 (TN); D. LIEBS, Ulpiani Regulae—zwei Pseudepigrapha, in: Romanitas—Christianitas. FS J. STRAUB, Berlin 1982, 282–292; id., in: HLL 5, München 1989, 67 (bibl.).

<sup>1</sup> E. LEVY, Pauli sententiae. A Palingenesia of the Opening Titles as a Specimen of Research in West Roman Vulgar Law, Ithaca, N.Y. 1945; Pauli sententiarum fragmentum Leidense = Studia Gaiana 4, Leiden 1956; H. SCHELLENBERG, Die Interpretationen zu den Paulus-Sentenzen, Göttingen 1965; LIEBS, Recht 88 with n.; id., HLL 5, 1989, 65–67; id., Römische Jurisprudenz in Africa. Mit Studien zu den pseudopaulinischen Sentenzen, Berlin 1993, 28–108; id., Die pseudopaulinischen Sentenzen. Versuch einer neuen Palingenesie, ZRG 112, 1995, 151–171.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. KUNKEL, Rechtsgeschichte 133 with n. 4; a warning against exaggerations is found in: M. KASER, quoted below, p. 1523, n. 3.

<sup>3</sup> An extract survived in the Lex Romana Visigothorum; for the rest, we are left with citations and allusions; cf. D. LIEBS, HLL 5, 1989, 60–62.

Hadrian to Diocletian, compiled by a certain Gregorius who had access to the chancellery a libellis. Four years later appeared the Codex Hermogenianus,<sup>1</sup> a private collection of Diocletian's edicts. Both of them would be republished in augmented form.<sup>2</sup>

Fragments from the Iuris epitomae<sup>3</sup> written by the jurist Hermogenian,<sup>4</sup> who would become praefectus praetorio under Maximian, are found in Justinian's Digesta (a parallel case is the Codices Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, which were incorporated into Justinian's Code):<sup>5</sup> hence, we possess the skeleton of titles and all imperial constitutiones from Hadrian to 312.

Quotations from the late classics (naming their sources), augmented by imperial edicts not only from the last mentioned private codices, were the material of a work published in Rome about 320. It had roughly the scope of the Digesta. It is known to us from the Fragmenta iuris Vaticana.<sup>6</sup> Probably it was meant to replace the classical jurists in law schools, but it was also used in legal practice.

The Collatio legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum,<sup>7</sup> written about 400, has come down to us anonymously in unfinished form. It contains extracts from the five authoritative jurists<sup>8</sup>—Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Gaius, Modestinus—and from the imperial constitutions according to the codices. It was intended to show that Mosaic law and Roman law are in agreement. Some scholars find in it a Christian, others a Jewish tendency.<sup>9</sup>

Vulgar Law

In the 4th century the knowledge of classical works among jurists declined. They were content with the main works of the four most

<sup>1</sup> D. LIEBS, HLL 5, 1989, 62–64.

<sup>2</sup> D. LIEBS, HLL 5, §§ 504–505.

<sup>3</sup> D. LIEBS, Hermogenians Iuris epitomae, AAG 3, 57, 1964.

<sup>4</sup> He lived in the Hellenized orient and probably was a teacher of law in Beirut.

<sup>5</sup> G. ROTONDI, Scritti giuridici 1, Pavia 1922, 110–265 (Studi sulle fonti del Codice Giustiniano).

<sup>6</sup> D. LIEBS, HLL 5, 1989, 64–65; F. RABER, Fragmenta iuris Vaticana, RE suppl. 10, 1965, 231–241.

<sup>7</sup> SCHULZ, Geschichte 394, n. 1.

<sup>8</sup> Cod. Theod. 1. 4. 3; on this, WIEACKER, Textstufen 156; 171; KRÜGER, Quellen 299–300.

<sup>9</sup> The discussion is summarized by D. LIEBS, Die Jurisprudenz im spätantiken Italien, Berlin 1987, 163–165; in favor of the Christian interpretation, as well: P. E. PIELER, in: Akten des 26. Deutschen Rechtshistorikertages, Frankfurt 1987, 694– important late classical jurists and with the Institutiones of Gaius, in the western provinces with Gaius and the early post-classical compendia for practical purposes, especially the Sententiae Pauli and the imperial constitutiones. Legal practice was supported by many professional jurists: on the one hand, there were the assessores of the magistrates, especially of the provincial governors (they were exchanged together with their superiors); on the other hand, in most of the provinces there were jurisconsults (iuris studiosi, iuris periti, νόμοιοι), sometimes of a rather modest intellectual level; their social prestige does not compare with that of the classical jurists (nor did the honoraria they were allowed to receive). From the 5th century we have<sup>1</sup> texts for practical use (documents, records of proceedings, practical aids containing references for certain types of lawsuits, other limited collections of material). Moreover, there were various epitomae and apparatuses of scholia in which the juridic terminology had been updated and often vulgarized.<sup>2</sup> It was in its vulgar form that Roman law took effect on legislation in several Germanic kingdoms.

Revival of Classical Law in the East

In the 4th and 5th centuries both legislation and legal practice in the eastern half of the empire initially were not very different from those in the western half.

---

699; E. J. H. SCHRAGE, in: Mélanges F. WUBBE, ed. by J. A. ANKUM (and others), Fribourg (Switzerland) 1993, 401–417; for a Jewish tendency: G. BARONE-ADESI, L'età della lex Dei, Napoli 1992.

<sup>1</sup> Editions (of legal works transmitted outside Justinian's legislation): P. KRÜGER, T. MOMMSEN, G. STUEDEMUND, Collectio librorum iuris antejustiniani, 3 vols., vol. 1, Berolini 4th ed. 1899; Gaius, Inst.; vol. 2, 1878: Regulae Ulpiani, Pauli sententiae; vol. 3, 1890: all other texts; E. SECKEL, B. KÜBLER, Iurisprudentiae antejustinianae reliquiae, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1908–1927; P. F. GIRARD, F. SENN, Textes du droit romain, 2 vols., Paris 6th ed. 1937; 7th ed. 1967–1977; S. RICCOBONO, J. BAVIERA, C. FERRINI, J. FURLANI, V. ARANGIO-RUIZ, Fontes iuris antejustiniani, 3 vols., Firenze 2nd ed. 1940–1943. On the so-called 'Vulgar Law': E. LEVY, West Roman Vulgar Law. The Law of Property, Philadelphia 1951; Das Weströmische Vulgarrecht. Das Obligationenrecht, Weimar 1956; F. WIEACKER, Vulgarismus und Klassizismus im Recht der Spätantike, SHAW 1955, 3, repr. in: Vom römisches Recht, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1961, 222–241; M. KASER, Vulgarrecht, RE 9 A 2, 1967, 1283–1304; since the late Seventies this somewhat schematic view has been abandoned: W. E. VOB, Recht und Rhetorik in den Kaisergesetzen der Spätantike. Eine Untersuchung zum nachklassischen Kauf- und Übereignungsrecht, Frankfurt 1982; N. KREUTER, Römisches Privatrecht im 5. Jh. n. Chr. Die Interpretatio zum westgotischen Gregorianus und Hermogenianus, Berlin 1993.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the annotations to the Sententiae Pauli and to the post-classical collections of

On the other hand, legal science as taught in the schools of the east turned back to classical law. An authoritative contribution to this development was made, above all, by the law school of Berytos,<sup>1</sup> a colony of Roman citizens dating ultimately from Augustus. It was followed by another law school which was founded in Constantinople, between 414 and 425. We possess only fragments of ante-Justinian juridic literature: the Scholia Sinaitica,<sup>2</sup> which bear the stamp of the school of Berytos, is a fragment of a Greek commentary on Ulpian's Libri ad Sabinum. Of a 5th-century Syrian book on Roman law<sup>3</sup> written in Greek, only Syrian, Armenian, and Arabic adaptations survive. This was a summing up of mainly late Roman imperial constitutiones. Moreover, there were the Sententiae Syriacae,<sup>4</sup> a summing up of, predominantly, the Sententiae Pauli and constitutiones from the Codex Hermogenianus to which some later constitutiones were added. Furthermore, from the works of jurists contemporary or posterior to Justinian, we can deduce the existence of aggregates of scholia on classics, of short summaries (indices), perhaps also of collections of sources and monographs.

Generally eastern Roman works are erudite, remote from contemporary reality, and attached to the authority of the past. It is their merit, however, to have opened the way to a study and understanding of the classics. It was owing to them that classical jurisprudence could permeate Justinian's legislation.

Imperial legislation strongly influenced the development of post-classical law: laws passed through the senate (orationes); edicts, published constitutiones which were incorporated into the Lex Romana Visigothorum = Breviarium Alarici of A.D. 506; H. SCHELLENBERG, Die Interpretationen zu den Paulussentenzen, Göttingen 1965; forthcoming D. LIEBS, HLL § 717.

---

<sup>1</sup> On the law school of Berytos: F. PRINGSHEIM, Beryt und Bologna, FS O. LENEL (Univ. Freiburg), Leipzig 1921, 204–285; B. KÜBLER, Geschichte des Römischen Rechts, Leipzig 1925, 424–433 (his judgments are often in need of revision); P. COLLINET, Histoire de l'école de droit de Beyrouth (Etudes historiques sur le droit de Justinien II), Paris 1925; KUNKEL, Rechtsgeschichte 136–138; LIEBS, Recht 90–91; LAW q.v. Rechtsschulen.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: SECKEL-KÜBLER 2, 2, Lipsiae 1927, 461–484.

<sup>3</sup> Edition: C. G. BRUNS, E. SACHAU, Leipzig 1880, repr. 1961; cf. also E. SACHAU, Syrische Rechtsbücher, 1, Berlin 1907; this would be an exposition of Roman law according to C. A. NALLINO, Sul libro siro-romano e sul presunto diritto siriano, in: Studi in onore di P. BONFANTE, 1, Milano 1930, 201–261; cf. W. SELB, Zur Bedeutung des syrisch-römischen Rechtsbuches, München 1964 (his supposition of Greek and oriental categories is based on both linguistic and legal misinterpretations).

<sup>4</sup> Edition: W. SELB, Sententiae Syriacae (TTTrC), Wien 1990.

directly (leges edictales); laws establishing generally valid rules (leges generales), rescripts concerning individual cases (such rescripta were no longer considered to be law in the fifth and sixth centuries).

Among the laws contained in the collections of constitutiones, Diocletian's rescripta mostly followed the principles of classical law, whereas Constantine's leges generales, especially in family law, introduced fundamental innovations marked by Hellenistic customs and Christian ideas.<sup>1</sup>

Constantine was the first emperor to reprimand expressly juridic literature: he peremptorily brushed aside decisions of great authorities and, instead, affirmed the authenticity of the simple pseudo-Pauline sententiae, which certainly are above all suspicion of over-scrupulousness. Being weary of hair-splitting jurists, he relied on the docility of rhetoricians. As a result, in his constitutiones the terms of law were invaded by imperial propaganda, and his style became long-winded, pompous and hollow, antipodal to the clear and concise diction of classical jurists. Constantine's politics concerning law were inconsistent, and often the sanctions foreseen were disproportionately severe.<sup>2</sup>

Foundations of the Codifications of Late antiquity

It is true that law created by jurists (ius), the content of the writings of classical jurists, formed a part of the law in force (along with imperial legislation: leges), but judges and lawyers were less and less able to find their way through the labyrinth of casuistics. What is more, it was up to the advocate to find out the laws applicable to the given case. Unfortunately, neither the commentaries of late classical jurists summing up ius in its entirety nor the imperial constitutions as collected in the emperor's archives were available all over the empire; in addition, in that late period less intellectual efforts were made to penetrate the complexity of legal matters. To remedy these deficiencies, in the 4th and 5th centuries laws were enacted prescribing which writings of jurists are relevant to the finding of a verdict and how to value the proportion of votes between the cited authorities.

<sup>1</sup> S. the bibliographical appendixes to JÖRS-KUNKEL-WENGER, Römisches Recht 397 to § 31, n. 11; B. BIONDI, Il diritto romano cristiano, 3 parts, Milano 1952-1954; J. GAUDEMET, L'Eglise dans l'Empire romain (IV<sup>e</sup>-V<sup>e</sup> siècles), Paris 1958, esp. 507-513; new ed. with addenda 1989.

<sup>2</sup> D. LIEBS, Unverhohlene Brutalität in den Gesetzen der ersten christlichen Kaiser, in: O. BEHREND (and others), eds., Römisches Recht in der europäischen Tradition. Symposion F. WIEACKER, Ebelsbach 1985, 89-116.

The two older laws were originally concerned with individual cases. The first Constantinian law of September 14 and 28, 321 (cod. Theod. 1. 4. 1; cf. 9. 43. 1) abrogated the critical notes of Paulus and Ulpian to Papinian's Quaestiones and Responsa in favor of the unique authority of Papinian.<sup>1</sup> The second law (of September 27, 327 or 328; cod. Theod. 1. 4. 2), however, recognized Paulus and all writings ascribed to him, including the post-classical Sententiae.

The most comprehensive law on citing juridic authorities, incorporating the two mentioned above, was enacted in 426 by Valentinian III (for the western part of the empire) and taken over by Theodosius II (for the eastern part): it confirmed the validity of all the writings of Papinian, Paulus, Gaius, Ulpian, and Modestinus as well as of the authorities<sup>2</sup> quoted by them. If there is dissent between the cited authorities, majority decides; in case of equality of votes, Papinian's vote turns the balance (cod. Theod. 1. 4. 3).

The Codex Theodosianus

There was no difference of function between the ius vetus and imperial laws, and the legal material was not heterogeneous in principle, but there was no consistent or systematic book of law. Therefore, the eastern Roman emperor Theodosius II (408–450) in 429 projected the need to create a universal code of law. After a first commission had spent six years on collecting only the more recent laws, there appeared (after two more years) a collection of imperial constitutions from Constantine (306–337) to Theodosius: the Codex Theodosianus.<sup>3</sup> It was a continuation of the above-mentioned private collections (Codex Gregorianus and Codex Hermogenianus). This was the beginning of codification in late antiquity. The western emperor Valentinian III (425–455) accepted the Codex Theodosianus. On January 1st, 439 it became law for the entire empire.

<sup>1</sup> D. LIEBS, HLL 5, 1989, 73.

<sup>2</sup> Like Scaevola, Sabinus, Julianus, Marcellus; a balanced interpretation in: P. JÖRS, Citiergezetz, RE 6, 1899, 2608–2612.

<sup>3</sup> Our knowledge of this work is based on (lacunose) manuscript tradition and on quotations by later users (among these the Lex Romana Visigothorum of 506); editions: P. AEGIDIUS, Antverpiae 1517; J. GOTHOFREDUS (TC), 6 vols., Lugduni 1665–1668 (important); T. MOMMSEN, Theodosiani Libri XVI, vol. 1, Berolini 1905, 4th ed. 1970–1971; P. M. MEYER, Leges novellae ad Theodosianum pertinentes, Berolini 2nd ed. 1954, 4th ed. 1971 (= Theodosiani libri XVI, vol. 2); P. KRÜGER (books 1–8 only), 2 vols., Berlin 1923–1926; C. PHARR (Tr), Princeton, N.J. 1952, repr. 1969. Bibl.: T. MOMMSEN, Das theodosische Gesetzbuch, ZRG 21, 1900, 149–190; 385–386; P. JÖRS, Codex Theodosianus, RE 4, 1, 1900, 170–173; WENGER, Quellen 536–541 (with bibl.); SCHULZ, Geschichte 398–400 (with bibl.); J. HARRIES, I. Wood, eds., The Theodosian Code. Studies in the Imperial Law of Late Antiquity, London 1993; D. LIEBS, HLL § 716. 1 (forthcoming).

Unfortunately the arrangement of subjects is not always convincing. Book 1 is on sources of law and higher imperial officials; books 2–5 cover private law; books 6–8 come back to officials, among whom republican officials and senators; they further encompass military law, subordinate officials, and an appendix to private law; book 9 deals with criminal law and criminal procedure; books 10 and 11 treat of financial and fiscal law, appeal, and probative weight of witnesses and documents; book 12 include laws concerning communities; book 13, professional associations; books 14 and 15, provision for old age; the subject of book 16 is canonical law. Within each thematic group ('digest system') the edicts are quoted literally in chronological sequence.

Imperial laws enacted after the Codex Theodosianus were collected both in the east and in the west; in the eastern empire they ultimately entered into the Codex Iustinianus, in the western empire they were appended to the Codex Theodosianus as Novellae Posttheodosianae (containing the constitutiones from A.D.: 438 to 468).

All later collections are based on the Codex Theodosianus. Its practicability, however, was limited, since the initial project of including the interpretations given by the classical jurists had failed. It was left to Justinian (527–565) to attain this goal.

Visigothic Codifications

The incursion of Germanic tribes was the death-blow to the western Roman empire, which went to ruin in 476. In the late 5th century many Germanic warrior kings de iure recognized the supremacy of the eastern Roman emperor, while de facto they ruled independently over a mixed population, a part of which followed Germanic traditions, while another part adhered to Roman law.<sup>1</sup> In this situation, the principle of personality, one of the very roots of Roman law, gained importance.

<sup>1</sup> On this, E. LEVY, s. above, p. 1513, n. 1; s. further E. LEVY, Review of A. D'ORS (s. the following footnote), ZRG 79, 1962, 479–488; forthcoming: D. LIEBS, HLL §§ 716. 2, 5, 6, and 8–11.

Both law created by jurists and imperial law were difficult to handle. There was a need for a clear and practicable collection of Roman law. As a result, even after the end of the Roman empire in the west official codifications were made. Examples are known from the Ostrogothic kingdom (the Edictum Theoderici,<sup>1</sup> named after Theodoric ['the Great', 493–526] and enacted about 500), from the Visigothic kingdom (especially, the Lex Romana Visigothorum of 506), and from Burgundy.

The Edictum Theoderici consists of imperial laws according to the Codices Gregorianus, Hermogenianus, and Theodosianus and of the Sententiae ascribed to Paulus. Often not the original is used but a simplified paraphrase like the interpretatio found in the Lex Romana Visigothorum.<sup>2</sup>

The Codex Euricianus,<sup>3</sup> which survives in fragments, was written around 475 under the Visigothic King Euric. It was intended for Goths, not for the Roman population. This work of Roman jurists was based on vulgarized Roman law, rather than on 'Germanic traditions'. The code of Euric would be the starting point for other codes of Visigothic kings; moreover, it influenced tribal laws of Franks, Burgundians, Alamanni, ancient Bavarians etc., thus conveying Roman law to Germanic peoples.

---

<sup>1</sup> Editions: Text of the Edictum Theoderici in: F. BLUHME, MGH, Leges, vol. 5, Hannoverae 1875–1889, 145–179 and in RICCOBONO 2, 681–710. Since the days of the humanists the Edictum Theoderici had been attributed to the Ostrogothic king Theodoric the Great. This opinion was questioned by P. RASI, AG 145, 1953; 105–162 and G. VISMARA, Cuadernos del Instituto Juridico Español, Roma, 5, 1956, 49–51; A. D'ORS supposed that the edict was written by Magnus under the Visigothic king Theodoric II (Estudios Visigóticos II. El Código de Eurico, Edición, Palingenesia, Indices, Roma 1960, 8; s. also E. LEVY, ZRG 79, 1962, 479–488; G. VISMARA, Edictum Theoderici, in: id., Scritti di storia giuridica 1, Milano 1987, 1–338 (previously publ. in a shorter form in 1967), reviewed by H. NEHLSSEN, ZRG, Germ. Abt. 86, 1969, 246–260 (Ostrogothic, after all: s. B. PARADISI, BIDR 68, 1965, 1–47; G. ASTUTI, Tradizione romanistica e civiltà giuridica europea, 1, Napoli 1984, 41–81 [first 1971]; D. LIEBS, Die Jurisprudenz im spätantiken Italien, Berlin 1987, 191–194; H. WOLFRAM, Die Goten, München 3rd ed. 1990, 199; 288–289; 445; H. SIEMS, Handel und Wucher im Spiegel frühmittelalterlicher Rechtsquellen, Hannover 1992, 277–288; forthcoming: D. LIEBS, HLL § 716. 5).

<sup>2</sup> Edition: G. HAENEL, Lex Romana Visigothorum, Lipsiae 1849 (repr. 1962); KRÜGER-MOMMSEN-STUEDEMUND 3, 247–263 (Appendices legis Romanae Visigothorum duae); forthcoming: D. LIEBS, HLL § 718. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Edition: K. ZEUMER, MGH, Leges 1, 1, 1902; a careful new edition: A. D'ORS (s. the note before the last).

The code of King Alaric II (506), the Lex Romana Visigothorum (Breviarium Alarici) was meant to establish a western identity vis-à-vis eastern Rome and to guarantee domestic peace: its aim was to improve the relationships of Goths with the Roman population and the Church<sup>1</sup> in order to give the Visigothic kingdom a formal independence from eastern Rome and also of the political center in the west. This code contains in sequence: the imperial laws according to the Codex Theodosianus and the post-Theodosian novellae, some constitutiones from the Codices Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, an abridged version of Gaius' Institutiones, extracts from the Sententiae ascribed to Paulus and, at the end, a responsum of Papinian. An interpretatio accompanying the text (except for Gaius) was probably traced to more ancient western Roman teachers of law. It summarizes or paraphrases what is said and also refers to legal sources not included in the code. Along with the Codex Euricianus, the Lex Romana Visigothorum served as a matrix for the code proclaimed by King Recesvind for both Romans and Goths in the 7th century in Visigothic Spain; in south France, the Lex Romana Visigothorum survived the Gothic kingdom for half a millennium and influenced even Burgundy and the Provence. Only in the 13th century would Justinian's legislation supplant it. Probably under King Gundobad (d. 516), almost on the eve of the Frankish invasion (532), in Burgundy a code for the Roman population was issued: the Lex Romana Burgundionum.<sup>2</sup> It exploited the same sources as the Lex Romana Visigothorum but combined them into a unified text, which was probably based on the above-mentioned interpretatio written by western Roman jurists. The Burgundian code is shorter and does not claim general validity as does the Lex Romana Visigothorum.

<sup>1</sup> For the historical background: E. F. BRUCK, Über römisches Recht im Rahmen der Kulturgeschichte, Berlin 1954, 146–163; K. SCHÄFERDIEK, Die Kirche in den Reichen der Westgoten und Suewen, Berlin 1967, 52–55; H. NEHLSSEN, Alarich II. als Gesetzgeber, in: Studien zu den germanischen Volksrechten. Gedächtnisschrift für W. EBEL, Frankfurt 1982, 143–202.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: F. BLUHME, Lex Romana Burgundionum, MGH, Leges 3, Hannoverae 1863; RICCOBONO 2, 711–750 (Lex Romana Burgundionum); L. R. VON SALIS, MGH Legum sectio 1, 2, 1, Hannoverae 1892, 123–163; F. BAUER-GERLAND, Das Erbrecht der Lex Romana Burgundionum, Berlin 1995, esp. 172–196.

Justinian's Legislation<sup>1</sup>

After a rapid career Justinian ascended to the throne of Constantinople. During his reign, which lasted for decades (527–565), he established the unity of the empire. This is true both materially—he regained the territories dominated by Vandals, Ostrogoths, and Visigoths—and spiritually: he made an effort at an inner renewal of the empire. In fact, at the beginning of his reign he planned to consolidate the political and religious unity of his empire by a universal code of law.

Soon after his ascent to the imperial throne, on February 13, 528, he ordered a committee of ten men—high officials, among whom Tribonian, the professor of law Theophilus, and two lawyers at the supreme court—to prepare a new collection of imperial constitutiones as an expression of imperial legislation. On the basis of the Codex Theodosianus, the codices Gregorianus, Hermogenianus, Theodosianus, and the novellae published after them were melted together: in one year, a new, clear code in twelve books was created, free from all that was antiquated.

---

<sup>1</sup> Editions: Institutiones: P. SCHOYFFER DE GERNESHEIM, Moguntiacy 1468; Pandectae: Basileae ca. 1470; V. PUECHER, Romae 1475; H. CLAYN, Perusia 1476; Moguntiacy 1475; Codex 1–9: P. SCHOYFFER, Moguntiacy 1475; Codex 10–12 with Novellae: V. PUECHER (presumably), Romae 1476; first complete edition: J. RUBEUS, 6 vols., Venetiis 1476–1478; T. MOMMSEN, Digesta Iustiniani Augusti, 2 vols., Berolini 1870, repr. 1962/63; P. BONFANTE, C. FADDA, C. FERRINI, S. RICCOBONO, V. SCIALOIA, Digesta Iustiniani Augusti, Mediolani 1931, repr. 1960 (based on MOMMSEN's text); Corpus Iuris Civilis: vol. 1: Inst. ed. by P. KRÜGER, Dig. ed. by T. MOMMSEN, P. KRÜGER, Berolini 16th ed. 1954, repr. 24th ed. 1988; ed. by O. BEHREND, R. KNÜTEL, B. KUPISCH, H. H. SEILER, Heidelberg 1990; vol. 2: Cod. Inst. ed. by P. KRÜGER, 1888, repr. 15th ed. 1970; vol. 3: Novellae, ed. by R. SCHÖLL, W. KROLL, 1895, repr. 11th ed. 1988; C. E. OTTO, B. SCHILLING, C. F. F. SENTENIS (Tr), 7 vols., Leipzig 1830–1833; R. DÜLL (Tr, selection), München 1939, 2nd ed. 1960; E. SCHARR (Tr, selection), Zürich 1960; Inst.: T. MURNER (Tr), Basel 1519; ind.: L. MITTEIS, Index interpolationum quae in Iustiniani digestis inesse dicuntur, ed. by E. LEVY, E. RABEL, 3 parts with suppl. and addenda, Weimar 1929–1935; E. VOLTERRA, Indice delle glosse, delle interpolazioni e delle principali ricostruzioni segnalate dalla critica nelle fonti pregiustiniane occidentali I–III, RSDI 8, 1935, 107–145; 389–405; 9, 1936, 365–380; Vocabularium Iurisprudentiae Romanae (VIR), begründet von O. GRADENWITZ, 5 vols., Berolini 1894–1987; R. VON MAYR, M. SAN NICOLA, Vocabularium codicis Iustiniani, 2 vols., Pragae 1923 and 1925, repr. 1965; E. LEVY, Ergänzungsindex zu ius and leges, Weimar 1930; A. M. BARTOLETTI COLOMBO, Lessico delle Novellae di Giustiniano nella versione dell'Authenticum, 2 vols. (A–M), Roma 1986; A. BERGER, Encyclopaedic Dictionary of Roman Law, TAPhS, n.s. 43, 2, 1953, 335–808; bibl.: G. ROTONDI, Scritti giuridici, vol. 1, Pavia 1922, repr. 1966, 410–432; C. FERRINI, Opere giuridiche II, Milano 1929, 307–419; P. NOAILLES, Les collections de nouvelles de l'Empereur Justinien, 2 vols., Paris 1912–1914; N. VAN DER WAL, Manuale Novellarum Iustiniani, Groningen 1964 (on the content); F. SCHULZ, Einführung in das Studium der Digesten, Tübingen 1916 (problems of the transmission of the Digesta; methods of criticism of interpolations); SCHULZ, Law; C. DIEHL, Justinien et la civilisation byzantine au VI<sup>e</sup> siècle, Paris 1901; B. BIONDI, Giustiniano I, principe e legislatore cattolico, Milano 1936; B. RUBIN, Das Zeitalter Justinians I: Persönlichkeit, Ideenwelt, Ostpolitik, Berlin 1960; G. OSTROGORSKY, Geschichte des byzantinischen Staates, München 3rd ed. 1963.

On April 16, 529 the Codex Iustinianus<sup>1</sup> became law. On January 29, 534, there followed a revised edition, the Codex repetitae praelectionis. Canonical law, which was placed at the head of the work, had become more voluminous. This second version has come down to us.<sup>2</sup>

The twelve books are subdivided each into 40–80 thematic sections; within each book the constitutiones from Hadrian (117–138) to Justinian appear in chronological order with indication of authors, addressees, and, often, dates. Book 1 contains canon law and a discussion of sources of law and public authorities; books 2 to 8, private law and civil action; book 9, criminal law and procedure; books 10 to 12, administrative and fiscal law.

Although revised several times, the codex exhibits mostly original texts, predominantly in Latin (Greek would gain ground only later). Even original differences of style are evinced: before Constantine (306–337) precision prevails, later, pomposity. Justinian's constitutiones are written out in full. The editors repeatedly assure the reader that they omitted unessential details and avoided repetition. Despite this work of revision and condensation, many individual decisions overlap; hence, the Codex Iustinianus is not a consistent codification in the modern sense of the word.

<sup>1</sup> P. JÖRS, Codex Iustinianus, RE 4, 1, 1900, 167–170; P. JÖRS, Digesta, RE 5, 1, 1903, 484–543; KRÜGER, Quellen 365–405; W. VON KOTZ-DOBŹ, Institutiones, RE 9, 2, 1916, 1566–1587; H. KRÜGER, Die Herstellung der Digesten Iustinians und der Gang der Exzerption, Münster 1922; SCHULZ, Prinzipien; W. SCHUBART, Iustinians Corpus Iuris, Antike 11, 1935, 255–273; A. STEINWENTER, Novellae, RE 17, 1, 1936, 1162–1171; F. WIEACKER, Das Corpus Iuris Iustinians, Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenschaft 102, 1942, 444–479; repr. under the title Corpus Iuris, in: F. WIEACKER, Vom römischen Recht, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1961, 242–287; L. WENGER, Die Quellen des römischen Rechts, Wien 1953, 564–734; SCHULZ, Geschichte 384–385; 401–408 (with bibl.); F. EBRARD, Die Entstehung des Corpus Iuris nach den acht Einführungsgesetzen des Kaisers Iustinian, in: Schweizer Beiträge zur Allgemeinen Geschichte 5, 1947, 28–76; H. PETERS, Die oströmischen Digestenkommentare und die Entstehung der Digesten, SSAL 65, 1, 1913; R. DANNENBRING, Arma et leges. Über die justinianische Gesetzgebung im Rahmen ihrer eigenen Zeit, AClass 15, 1972, 113–137; A. M. HONORÉ, Some Constitutions Composed by Justinian, JRS 65, 1975, 107–123; O. BEHREND, R. KNÜTEL (and others), Corpus Iuris Civilis (ITr), vol. 1: Institutionen, Heidelberg 1990; vol. 2, 1 (Dig. books 1–10), 1995; vol. 3: forthcoming 1996 (Dig. books 11–20).

<sup>2</sup> Of the first edition we only have a fragment of the table of contents found on an Egyptian papyrus (Pap. Oxy. 15, 1922, no. 1814).

Theodosius II already had planned to collect the writings of the jurists into an additional comprehensive work of legislation; so the work on the Codex had left no time for this second project. Tribonian who had become magister sacri palatii (Minister of Justice) in the meantime aroused Justinian's interest in this plan. On December 15, 530, the emperor authorized a second commission under Tribonian. It consisted of specialized scholars (full professors—antecessores—of the law schools of Berytus and Constantinople), eleven lawyers at the supreme court, and high officials. Of these, only Tribonian, Constantine, and Theophilus had been members of the Codex commission. Seventeen men, divided into three groups, had to condense 'about 2000' (about 1500, at the most) volumes written by 40 authors (the entire ius vetus since the Twelve Tables) into a work of 50 books at the most. The scope was neither limited to the authoritative ('quotable') jurists nor to authors indirectly recognized by the Procedure on citing Recognized Jurists nor on the jurists authorized by the emperor. Initially, Justinian had reserved for himself the right of deciding controversies between jurists. However, he withdrew after the Nika revolt and in view of the construction of Hagia Sophia (s. Procopius 1. 1. 20–64). The result was that after Tribonian's dismissal from all public offices the commission worked independently. It decided controversies on its own and inserted interpolations into the text. On December 16, 533, after three years' work, the Digesta<sup>1</sup> or Pandectae Iustiniani were published and became privileged, on December 30, as the unique source of juridic experience. Simultaneously a law was proclaimed saying that the original writings of jurists must no longer be used; moreover, private law schools were forbidden.

According to the normal course of juridic studies for which the Digesta were chiefly destined, the subject matter is divided into seven groups (1–4; 5–11; 12–19; 20–27; 28–36; 37–44; 45–50); only some of them bear titles. The excerpts are ordered according to groups of jurists' works: there is a 'Sabinus complex' (mainly Paulus' and Ulpian's

---

<sup>1</sup> V. ARANGIO-RUIZ, Memorie dell'Accademia di scienze morali e politiche, Napoli 1931; Precedenti scolastici del Digesto, in: Conferenze per il XIV centenario delle Pandette, Milano 1931, 287–319; Di alcune fonti postclassiche del Digesto, Atti Nap. 1954 ('31), 10–32.

Libri ad Sabinum), an 'edict complex' (Libri ad edictum), a 'Papinian complex' (after Papinian's Responsa), and an 'appendix complex'<sup>1</sup> exploiting supplementary works.

In citations from classical jurist we have to take into account changes and interpolations,<sup>2</sup> since the editors shortened their text and adapted it to the exigencies of their day. Outdated elements were omitted; other changes were meant to simplify the handling of law; the vividness of juridic experience was preserved.

Initially the authors tried to combine the excerpts into a continuous text using what might be called a 'collage' technique (cf. the form of theological commentaries called catenae). Rather early within the work, however, this tendency decreased, except for sporadic chains of fragments. The Digesta, like the Codex, in each case names its sources.

The Digesta transmits a large part of classical Roman juridic literature. In juridic practice in the east it played a lesser role than the Codex, since the Digesta was topical only to a small extent and largely neglected the numerous elements in Byzantine law which dated from late antiquity. The Digesta essentially comprises private law, dwelling at great length on legacy law which was of special importance for Romans. Procedural, administrative, and criminal law fill the rest of the work; canon law is lacking.

While the Digesta was still in hand, Justinian had a new textbook for beginners written: the Institutiones in four books based, above all, on Gaius' Institutiones (which was still in use) and completed from the same author's lengthier Res cottidianae. In addition, the compilers relied on more recent Institutiones written by Ulpian, Marcian, and Florentinus. Furthermore, the new work contained chains of fragments from the Digesta and later imperial constitutiones, especially those of Justinian.

The responsible authors were Tribonian and the two professors Theophilus and Dorotheus who presented the work on November 11, 533. On grounds of stylistic differences between books 1 and 2 as compared to 3 and 4, the former part is ascribed to Dorotheus, the latter to Theophilus. The thematic titles form a continuous text. Unlike the Codex and the Digesta, there are no subtitles found here.

<sup>1</sup> The so-called 'Bluhmesche Massentheorie': F. BLUHME, Die Ordnung der Fragmente in den Pandektenbüchern, Zeitschrift für geschichtliche Rechtswissenschaft 4, 1820, 257-472; repr. in: Labeo 6, 1960, 50-96; 235-277; 368-404 (still valid); KUNKEL, Rechtsgeschichte 151-153.

<sup>2</sup> On research of interpolations: KUNKEL, ibid. 153-155. M. KASER, Ein Jahrhundert Interpolationenforschung an den römischen Rechtsquellen, in: M.K., Römische Rechtsquellen und angewandte Juristenmethode, Wien 1986, 112-154.

Laws reforming parts of Codex, Digesta, and Institutiones and solving problems which arose during the legislative work were published officially as L decisiones in 531 or 532 to be obliterated in 534 by the revised version of the Codex. During the late thirties a tendency towards modernization led to a success of eastern Roman juridic practice; thus, parts of Codex, Digesta, and Institutiones became obsolete. In consideration of the addressees, laws were now generally written in Greek, some of them in both languages.

Not Justinian but individual authors appended the later laws to the tripartite code as a fourth part bearing the title Novellae Constitutiones,<sup>1</sup> partly in Latin translation, partly in the Greek original.

Justinian tried to preserve his legislation from modifications. The pertinent title Corpus iuris civilis was used in the Middle Ages and renewed by the editor Dionysius Godofredus (1583). The emperor prohibited on penalty of death falsification of his laws by comparing them with their originals, by studying the originals, by using abridged forms, and especially by writing commentaries on the Digesta.<sup>2</sup> Nevertheless, teaching practices in law schools produced as early as in his lifetime several Greek commentaries in the form of lecture scripts: Theophilus explaining the Institutiones, Dorotheus and Stephanus the Digesta, Thalelaeus the Codex.<sup>3</sup>

Justinian made Roman law generally available and transferable in a form close to classical law. At the dawn of the modern age jurisprudence could be based on the achievements of his jurists. By creating a transparent legislation this emperor might have also intended to demonstrate his own power and to present a proud lineage of spiritual ancestors. The legal works inspired by Justinian bridge the

---

<sup>1</sup> R. SCHÖLL, W. KROLL (Greek text, ancient and modern Latin translation), vol. 3, 11th ed. 1988 in the editio stereotypa of the Corpus iuris civilis (MOMMSEN, KRUEGER); P. NOAILLES, Les collections de nouvelles de l'Empereur Justinien, vol. 1, Paris 1912; vol. 2, Bordeaux 1914; on the content: N. VAN DER WAL, Manuale Novellarum Iustiniani, Groningen 1964; A. M. BARTOLETTI COLOMBO, Lessico delle Novellae di Giustiniano nella versione dell'Authenticum, 2 vols. (A-M), Roma 1983-1986.

<sup>2</sup> Constitutio Tanta, introductory law to the Digesta § 21 of December 16, 533.

<sup>3</sup> K. W. E. HEIMBACH, Prolegomena, in: G. E. HEIMBACH (and others), eds., Basiliorum libri LX, vol. 6, Leipzig 1870, 1-215; D. SIMON, Aus dem Kodexunterricht des Thalelaios, ZRG 86, 1969, 334-383 and ZRG 87, 1970, 315-394; RIDA 16, 1969, 283-308; 17, 1970, 273-311.

gaps between antiquity, Middle Ages, and modern times. In this respect they can only be compared with the philosophical writings of his contemporary Boethius.

G. G. ARCHI, L'Epitome Gai. Studio sul tardo diritto romano in occidente. Con una nota di lettura di C. A. CANNATA, Napoli 1991. * FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch, esp. 104–121; 183–188. * M. FUHRMAN, Interpretatio. Notizen zur Wortgeschichte, in: Symptica F. WIEACKER, Göttingen 1970, 80–110. * KASER, Privatrecht. * M. KASER, Das römische Zivilprozeßrecht, München 1966. * KRÜGER, Quellen. * W. KUNKEL, Das Wesen des ius respondendi, ZRG 66, 1948, 423–457. * KUNKEL, Herkunft. * KUNKEL, Rechtsgeschichte. * R. MARCIG, Geschichte der Rechtsphilosophie. Schwerpunkte—Kontrapunkte, Freiburg 1971. * E. LEVY, West Roman Vulgar Law. The Law of Property, Philadelphia 1951. * E. LEVY, Weströmisches Vulgarrecht. Das Obligationenrecht, Weimar 1956. * D. LIEBS, Die juristische Literatur, in: Fuhrmann, LG 195–208. * LIEBS, Recht. * D. LIEBS, Römische Provinzialjurisprudenz, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 288–362. * D. LIEBS, Rechtsschulen und Rechtsunterricht im Prinzipat, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 197–286. * D. LIEBS, Die Jurisprudenz im spätantiken Italien (260–640 n. Chr.), Berlin 1987. * D. LIEBS, Rechtsregeln und Rechtssprichwörter, Darmstadt 5th ed. 1991. * D. LIEBS, Recht und Rechtsliteratur, in: HLL 5, 1989, 55–73. * T. MAYER-MALY, Römisches Privatrecht, Wien 1992. * L. MITTEIS, Reichsrecht und Volksrecht in den östlichen Provinzen des römischen Kaiserreiches, Leipzig 1891. * E. NARDI, Le istituzioni giuridiche romane. Gaio e Giustiniano, Milano 1991. * H. L. W. NELSON, Überlieferung, Aufbau und Stil von Gai Institutiones (unter Mitwirkung von M. David), Leiden 1981. * R. RILINGER, Humiliores—Honestiores. Zu einer sozialen Dichotomie im Strafrecht der römischen Kaiserzeit. München 1988. * E. J. H. SCHRAGE, ed., Das römische Recht im Mittelalter (= WdF 635), Darmstadt 1987. * E. J. H. SCHRAGE, Utrumque Ius. Eine Einführung in das Studium des mittelalterlichen gelehrten Rechts, Berlin 1992. * SCHULZ, Einführung. * Schulz, Prinzipien. * SCHULZ, Geschichte. * WIEACKER, Textstufen. * F. WIEACKER, Recht und Gesellschaft in der Spätantike, Stuttgart 1964. * F. WIEACKER, Privatrechtsgeschichte der Neuzeit unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der deutschen Entwicklung, Göttingen 2nd ed. 1967. * WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte.

3. THE LATIN FATHERS OF WESTERN CIVILIZATION

THE ORIGINS OF CHRISTIAN LATIN PROSE

Early Translations of the Bible<sup>1</sup>

The earliest Latin translations of the Bible can be reconstructed from palimpsests and from quotations in Church Fathers. The result is not a single text but a series of versions. As for authors who knew Greek, we must take into account that they may even have translated some passages ad hoc. We can distinguish several groups of texts: a Carthaginian (mid-3rd century), an African (late 4th century), and an Italian (4th to 5th century). The fascinating task of editing the Vetus Latina undertaken by the scholars working in the Beuron Benedictine Arch-Abbey is all the more difficult as they cannot hope to restore a single unified version.

The history of language and style has greatly benefited from the work of these scholars: compared with the Vulgate—the Latin Bible of the Catholic Church created by Jerome in the 4th century—the older translations exhibit many elements of popular language, like manducare ('to eat'), and use quia or quoniam instead of classical 'accusatives with infinitive', whereas Jerome often prefers classical vocabulary and syntax.

A critical study of early patristic Latin Bible quotations is of great importance not only for the rediscovery of the wording of certain old translations but also for the history of exegesis. By looking up a given passage in the context in which a Church Father quotes it, the reader is enabled to see how that author understood his biblical text and with which other scriptural passages he established connections. Hence the study of the Vetus Latina allows us to trace the genesis of entire 'chains of quotations' and of exegetic traditions.

---

<sup>1</sup> For a reliable modern introduction with texts and bibl.: GÄRTNER, LG 7–43 (esp. for our chapters on Bible translations and on Acts of Martyrs); 567; 575–577 (bibl.); for further information: ALTANER § 26.

Acts of Martyrs

Beginning with Nero the confession 'Christianus sum' entailed the death penalty. Roman governors, however, intervened only when a city explicitly asked for help. Probably, there was no law aimed specifically at Christians before Decius.<sup>1</sup>

The genre called 'Acts of Martyrs' is of an older date than Christianity: the Acta Alexandrinorum records the ordeal of Egyptian patriots under the Roman government. The sufferings of Christian martyrs were first reported in Greek (e.g. the Passio of Polycarp of Smyrna, mid-2nd century). Whereas passiones exhibit typical narrative elements and are sometimes presented in the form of letters, acta resemble simple records, though even they have some literary touches.

The Passio Sanctorum Scillitanorum, the first Christian text written in Latin, adheres to the documentary form of a simple report, thus enhancing the impression of veracity. The author does not try to smooth out the linguistic distinctions between the correct Latin of the educated and the primitive language of the uneducated; the discrepancy is intentional, just as it had been in Petronius. The text is meant to be a piece of instruction for other Christians—the intended audience—and is constructed to serve this aim.<sup>2</sup> The use of 'literary' devices helps to change what had been the martyrs' confession before God into a testimony for their fellow Christians.

The Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis (202–203) might have been revised by Tertullian. Records of visions, incorporated into the text in documentary form, add to the impression of authenticity; and the use of the first person invites the reader to identify himself with what he reads.

The actual 'imitation of Christ' through martyrdom—despite an awareness of the great distance from the divine model—is liable to produce a literary imitation of the gospels. In such cases what had been an attitude adopted in real life is transformed into a literary technique. This can be regarded as an early sign of the later efflorescence of biography in western literature.<sup>3</sup> An individual's life, through his imitation of Christ, acquires a specific and unique value, which is independent of political, social, or cultural barriers. Terms such as 'secularization' or 'spiritualization' are both too narrow to describe this literary process fully. Once accepted by God and sanctified through the imitation of Christ, the individual gains a new dignity. As a result the writing of Acts of Martyrs and biographies is in a sense an historical continuation of the Scriptures, based on actual experience. This new approach provides a solid basis and a new focus for the traditional Roman interest in biographical detail.

<sup>1</sup> A witness against this hypothesis is Tert. apol. 4 ('rhetorical fiction?').

<sup>2</sup> For 'literary' elements s. GÄRTNER ibid.

<sup>3</sup> For late and secularized forms: D. SÖLLE, Realisation. Studien zum Verhältnis von Theologie und Dichtung nach der Aufklärung, Darmstadt 1973 (with rich bibl.).

Correspondingly, autobiography (such as Augustine's Confessiones) and hagiography come to form independent and prolific literary genres in late antiquity. The validity of the general statements made in this chapter is not significantly undercut by the undeniable fact that hagiography is in many cases obscured by rampant romanesque fancifulness (s. also: Biography at Rome, pp. 464–476).

TERTULLIAN

Life and Dates

Q. Septimius Florens Tertullianus was born between 150 and 170 A.D. at Carthage, where he grew up as a pagan (paenit. 1. 1). We ought to believe Jerome's report<sup>1</sup> that his father served as a centurion under the proconsul of Africa. In times such as those, the future rested with captains and their sons. He got a thorough training in rhetoric and even wrote books in Greek which, however, have not come down to us. Although his learning was not limited to the law but also embraced philosophy, his way of thinking always remained that of a lawyer (however, this is not sufficient reason to identify him with the jurist Tertullian quoted in the Digests and in Justinian's Institutiones). He spent some time at Rome (cult. fem. 1.7), perhaps acting as an advocate. We do not know if a rather vague confession of sins (resurr. 59. 3) alludes to that epoch, and we are equally ignorant of where and when he was baptized. He married a Christian woman and, about 195, returned to his home city for good. Despite his beautiful saying that 'we laymen, too, are priests',<sup>2</sup> Jerome (ibid.) calls him a sacerdos; in fact, many of his writings reflect teaching catechism and preaching, and we know from anim. 9. 4 that he did not belong to the plebs. Hence, he must have been at least a 'teacher' (διδάσκαλος). Disgusted with the clergy's tepidity and a rigorist by nature, he turned to Montanism (approximately between 202 and 208), an especially puritanical species of 'pneumatic' Christianity. Finally his restless and impatient temperament (cf. pat. 1. 1) pushed him to found a sect of his own, a trustworthy notice we owe to Augustine, who had no reason to invent it (haer. 86). Tertullian died at a biblical age (Hier. chron. a. 2224. p. 212. 23 H.), probably between 220 and 240.

<sup>1</sup> Vir. ill. 53; cf. 24 and 40; information concerning Tertullian is also to be found in the Praedestinatus (PL 53, 616–617; 5th century).

<sup>2</sup> Castit. 7. 3; monog. 12. 2; P. MATTEI, Habere ius sacerdotis. Sacerdoce et laicat au témoignage de Tertullien . . ., RSR 59, 1985, 200–221; Tertullian as layman: H. STEINER 1989, 7–8.

The dates<sup>1</sup> of his works are in many cases uncertain and subject to dispute. We can easily assign one group of Tertullian's writings to his Montanistic period, since he mentions there the 'new prophecy' of Montanus, Prisc(ill)a or Maximilla, calling the Spirit 'paraclete' (a biblical term) and the Catholics psychici (a term unattested in the Bible); and using nos to denote the Montanists, vos for the Catholics. As for content, the Montanist writings show an increase of rigorism. Since the Scorpiace exhibits none of these usages it is no longer dated to 213 but rather to 203/4.<sup>2</sup>

Moreover, today's scholars tend to assign early dates (about 197 or before) to works dealing with paganism (De spectaculis, De idololatria, also De pallio), even though conclusions drawn from the subject matter are far from cogent. Finally, there is a tendency to date none of Tertullian's writings later than 211; however, the period from 196 to 212 seems to be rather short for such a considerable literary output, not to mention the great number of lost works.

The writings from Tertullian's Catholic period of life deal with paganism (Ad nationes 197; Apologeticum, 197 or later; De testimonio animae, soon after); they give instructions to Christians for a practical life in the secular world (Ad martyras, probably 197, De spectaculis, 196/7 or 202, De idololatria, 196/7 or 212/13, De cultu feminarum, book 2: 196/7, book 1: 205/6) as well as for discipline within the church (De baptismo, De oratione, De paenitentia, De patientia, Ad uxorem I. II, all between 198 and 203); and deal with heretics and Jews (De praescriptione haereticorum, about 203; Adversus Iudaeos, probably 197, in any case before 202).

The writings from his Montanistic period can be classified similarly: paganism and the persecution of Christians are the subjects of the De corona (rather 211 than 208, cf. the attacks launched against the clergy and the announcement of the De fuga), Ad Scapulam (dated 212 by the mention of a solar eclipse in chapter 3), De fuga in persecutione (after 202 or 212/13) and Scorpiace (203/4). Christian life-style and discipline are the subjects of the De pallio (against pagans, 208–211, perhaps already 193), De virginibus velandis, De exhortatione castitatis, De monogamia,<sup>1</sup> De ieiunio adversus psychicos, De pudicitia (all 208–211). The following works are directed against heretics: Adversus Hermogenem (between 202 and 205), Adversus Valentinianos (206/7), Adversus Marcionem I–V (207–211),<sup>2</sup> Adversus Praxean (213), De anima, De carne Christi and De carnis resurrectione (all after 206 or about and after 211).

<sup>1</sup> Not uncontested: T. D. BARNES, 2nd ed. 1985, ch. 5, Chronology (30-56).

<sup>2</sup> T. D. BARNES 1969, 105-132.

The list of lost writings is long: De spe fidelium, De paradiso, Adversus Apelleiacos, De censu (= origin) animae, De fato (we probably get a glimpse of it in the pseudo-Augustinian Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti), De ecstasi (probably written in Greek), De Aaron vestibus, Ad amicum philosophum (perhaps dating still from his pagan period), De carne et anima, De animae submissione, De superstitione saeculi, De spectaculis (Greek version), De baptismo (Greek, differing in content from the homonymous Latin treatise), De virginibus velandis (Greek, older than the Latin version).

Works of doubtful authenticity

De circumcissione and De mundis atque immundis animalibus in Levitico (cf. Hier. epist. 6. 1. 3; 4).

Spurious works: De execrandis gentium dis (4th century?), Adversus omnes haereses (first half of the 3rd century).

Survey of Works

Apologetic writings

Ad nationes and Apologeticum defend Christianity against paganism; the former work, which is very much like a collection of evidence, transmits to us precious source-material on ancient Roman religion; the latter work, addressed to the governors of Roman provinces, is Tertullian's best-known piece and has a tradition of its own.

De testimonio animae: the human soul, being 'Christian by nature' is a witness to the existence of God (see: Ideas).

Ad Scapulam: this memorandum to the proconsul of Africa, a pursuer of Christians, develops the principle of liberty and self-determination in religious matters (nec religionis est cogere religionem 2. 2), stressing the loyalty of the Christians to the State and dwelling on the deaths of the persecutors of the Church, a subject to be developed later by Lactantius.

<sup>1</sup> H. STEINER 1989, 80 dates the De monogamia about 220.

<sup>2</sup> 1. 15 points to 207; 5. 10 refers to resurr.

Pamphlets against Gnostics and Jews

Scorpiace: this work praises the high value of martyrdom in this world and condemns the 'scorpion's sting' of Gnostics who are content to confess their faith only spiritually, not before people. However, the flight from persecution is not yet forbidden (as it will be in the De fuga).

Adversus Iudaeos: God gives his grace not only to Jews but also to pagans. Through Christianity, the law of retribution has been obliterated by the law of love. The prophecies of the Old Testament are fulfilled in Christ; this explains the need for 'spiritual' exegesis of the Old Testament. Chapters 9-14 are excerpts from the 3rd book of Adversus Marcionem or they are a first draft for it.

Ascetic writings on practical life

Ad martyras: a consolation to Christians in prison.<sup>1</sup>

De spectaculis: any attendance of public plays is prohibited given their immoral character and their connection with pagan religion.

De baptismo: this is the only treatise on a sacrament written before the Nicene Council. Together with the two following works it forms a kind of trilogy intended for catechumens. Tertullian had published a Greek book on baptism before.

De oratione: the oldest interpretation of the Lord's Prayer.

De paenitentia: of penitence before baptism and after.

De patientia: praise of a virtue which the author does not have, as he admits himself.

De cultu feminarum (two books): Christian ladies ought not to submit themselves to pagan fashion.

Ad uxorem (two books): Tertullian asks his wife not to remarry after his death or at least to marry a Christian.

In the Montanistic writings which follow, the 'cool and temperate wind of grace' is replaced with the sharp wind of the north:

De exhortatione castitatis and De monogamia reject the remarriage of the widowed.

De virginibus velandis demands the veiling of all young girls.

De corona: honorary garlands for soldiers are incompatible with Christianity, as is military service.

De idololatria: Christians are not allowed to practise professions related to <sup>1</sup> We do not know if Perpetua and Felicitas were part of this group and if Tertullian was the editor of their Passio.

pagan cults (they cannot be artists, teachers, political and military officials).

De fuga in persecutione: running away in times of persecution is against God's will.

De ieiunio: a defence of the Montanists' practice of fasting against the Catholics, who are labelled psychici, i.e. people whose Christianity is limited to the soul and does not comprehend the spirit.

De pudicitia: against an eminent bishop who granted absolution even for sins of the flesh.

De pallio: in this literary masterpiece Tertullian explains why he changed the toga for the philosopher's cloak (pallium). This change of clothes coincides with his becoming Christian or turning Montanist.

Polemical Writings on Dogmatic Subjects

De praescriptione haereticorum: a praescriptio is the appeal of an accused to a law which rejects the accuser a limine with the effect that a lawsuit cannot take place. By virtue of its age, the Church is the legitimate owner of the faith and the Scriptures; the claims of the heretics, being more recent, are invalid a limine.

Adversus Marcionem (5 books): the Creator is not different from the Supreme Being, which is God and good (books 1 and 2). Jesus Christ is the Messiah promised in the Old Testament (book 3). Marcion's 'purified' version of the New Testament (containing parts of Luke's gospel and of Paul's epistles) is a failure. Old and New Testament do not contradict each other (books 4 and 5). We only have the third revised version of this text, which is our main source for Marcion's doctrine.

Adversus Hermogenem: matter is not preexistent; it was created by God.

Adversus Valentinianos: against Valentine's Gnostic school, in the wake of Irenaeus.

De carne Christi: against the docetism of the Gnostics, Tertullian stresses the fact that Christ did have a real human body, which even was ugly (9. 6).

De resurrectione carnis: in opposition to pagans, sadduceans, and heretics, Tertullian believes in the resurrection of the flesh.

Adversus Praxean: the most important ante-Nicene exposition of the doctrine of Trinity (here, in 3. 1, the word trinitas is first attested).

De anima: Tertullian had already treated this subject in his lost De censu animae: in his dispute with Hermogenes the need to refute heretic views compels him to deal with pagan philosophy in this especially important treatise (s. Ideas).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Sources. Thanks to the bilingual character of the civilization of his epoch, Greek ideas were available to Tertullian, especially as pronounced by Greek Christian authors of his century, and formed his main starting point. In the decennia before Tertullian, Gnostics had developed their fanciful, half mythological systems, and less sophisticated souls had written apocryphal and romanesque Acts of Apostles, while about the same time, between 180 and 200, Sextus Empiricus launched a manifesto of skepticism. The atmosphere was full of tension: on the one hand, there was religious feeling bordering on credulity, on the other hand, critical thought based on science. The Church exploited both currents to serve its ends: against the pagans, Christians used arguments developed by pagan authors: Tatian, in the footsteps of Lucian, ridiculed the philosophers; Hippolytus, though admitting that they discovered no more than partial truths, gave pagan philosophers much higher credit than their Gnostic followers; Irenaeus, while critically discussing Gnostic statements, developed profound theological ideas of his own. Hence it was more than a mere whim that Tertullian changed the toga for the philosopher's cloak (De pallio). Actually the Christians considered themselves the true heirs of Greek philosophy.<sup>1</sup>

Tertullian's knowledge of ancient authors is often second hand, although it is possible that he read Plato himself. More important, however, are Stoic sources: Tertullian's ideas concerning a natural knowledge of God have a Stoic background.<sup>2</sup> The materialistic concept attributing corporeal essence to God was propounded not only by Stoics but also by Meliton, bishop of Sardes (d. before 190). Stoic philosophy was also essential to Tertullian's doctrine of the soul and his ethics. The pagan physician Soranus of Ephesus, who was active in Rome about 100, is a main source of the De anima. Tertullian's doctrine of dreams (anim. 46) is influenced by Hermippus of Berytus.

Though elsewhere Greek sources dominate, the 'natural' proof of God's existence (De testimonio animae) comes from Cicero's De natura deorum (1. 16. 43-44; 2. 2. 4-5), a source also exploited by Arnobius and Lactantius. Cicero is completely absent, however, from the De anima. Precious information on ancient Roman religion (as found especially in the 2nd book Ad nationes) is drawn from the second part of Varro's Antiquitates (Rerum divinarum libri XVI). It is impossible to know for certain whether one of Varro's<sup>1</sup> saturae might have been a source of the De pallio. The quotations from Laberius (pall. 1. 3) had probably been handed down to Tertullian by grammarians. In the De corona, the antiquarian lore concerning garlands is owed to the imperial jurist Claudius Saturninus (De coronis), whereas the euhemeristic criticism of myths is derived from Leo of Pella. Moreover, our author is familiar with Lucretius, Virgil, Tacitus, Suetonius, and, last but not least, Seneca, whom he adopts as saepe noster (anim. 20. 1). Moreover, this author is a model for a style rich in terse aphorisms.

<sup>1</sup> W. KRAUSE, Die Stellung der frühchristlichen Autoren zur heidnischen Literatur, Wien 1958, 69; 75; 78.

<sup>2</sup> C. TIBILETTI, Tertulliano e la dottrina dell' anima naturaliter Christiana, AAT 88, 1953-1954, 84-117; for the importance of Stoic sources: H. STEINER 1989, 200.

Despite the existence of Latin Bible translations in his day, Tertullian often prefers to translate directly from the Greek. He likes to quote laws, for example those found in the Deuteronomium. He is also aware of Jewish apocrypha such as Enoch and Esdras IV and of Christian apocrypha, e.g. the Pastor Hermae (a Latin translation of which was available to him). He reacts against the roots of Christian Latin literature, which had been partly influenced by Jewish Christians, and firmly adopts the tradition of the apologetic Greek Christian writers. Thus he uses Justin's Apologies and Dialogue with Tryphon (the latter in Adversus Marcionem 3 and Adversus Iudaeos), as well as Tatian and perhaps Athenagoras. Irenaeus is an important source of the De praescriptione and the Adversus Valentinianos; Tertullian read Irenaeus in the Greek original. In his pamphlet against Hermogenes he probably exploits the homonymous work of Theophilus of Antioch. He also takes notice of Melito of Sardes, who detested the Montanists, and makes fun of his elegans ac declamatorium ingenium, 'elegant and rhetorical talent' (Hier. vir. ill. 24). He shows first hand familiarity with writings of the heretics Marcion, Apelles, and Hermogenes, thus turning out to be an indispensable source for our knowledge of these authors.

Models. In the Apologeticum Tertullian's reversal of a speech for the defence into a challenge to condemn the accused is reminiscent of Plato's Apology. As a piece of literature, the De pallio follows in the footsteps of Dio of Prusa. The treatises are shaped in the mould of Seneca. Tertullian's 'Asiatic' manner of writing finds a Greek precedent in the Easter homily of Melito of Sardes.<sup>1</sup> Apuleius may be mentioned as a model of Latin style.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also A. CORTESI, Varrone e Tertulliano. Punti di continuità, Augustinianum 24, 1984, 349-365.

Genres. With his Apologeticum Tertullian created a new literary genre. In Greek literature apologetic writing and propaganda speeches used to appear separately.<sup>2</sup> By shaping different forms of treatises, Tertullian succeeded in creating a more sophisticated variety of genres in Latin literature. Among the new genres emerging from his pursuit of new aims are writings dealing with the Christian's daily life and discipline (idol.), catechetical treatises, dogmatic pamphlets, and in an embryonic form, even the exegetic genre (orat.).

Literary Technique

Although Tertullian's competence as a jurist is controversial,<sup>3</sup> there is no question that his way of reasoning and arguing is that of an advocate. Instead of discussing the issues factually and positively proving that the heretics' ideas are wrong, Tertullian proceeds like a lawyer. First he asks: who can claim the ownership of the Scriptures and of the true doctrine? For him the only possible answer is: the Church. He uses against the heretics the juridical praescriptio (demurrer): 'Your teachings are of later origin, hence they are false' (adv. Marc. 1. 1. 6).<sup>4</sup> In the De anima (23. 6) Tertullian applies the same method of 'uprooting' his opponent's opinion: he refutes the heretics by refuting their source, Plato.

In the Apologeticum our author combines apology and propaganda, two genres only separately attested in Greek literature. The book is conceived as an imaginary speech to a Roman governor and is meant to reveal to governors the real facts which could not be discussed in a normal lawsuit. Not only does he want to make the Emperor understand that Christians are his most loyal citizens, but he also unmasks

<sup>1</sup> F. KENYON, Chester Beatty Biblical Papyri 8, 1941; M. TESTUZ, Papyrus Bodmer 13, 1960; O. PERLER, SC 1966, 123; O. PERLER, Typologie der Leiden des Herrn in Melitons Peri Pascha, in Kyriakon, FS J. QUASTEN, vol. 1, Münster 1970, 256–265.

<sup>2</sup> For the Apologeticum as a judicial speech: H. STEINER 1989, 48–80.

<sup>3</sup> A favorable opinion in: P. DE LABRIOLLE, Tertullien jurisculte, NRD 30, 1906, 5–27; A. BECK, Römisches Recht bei Tertullian und Cyprian, repr. (augm.), Aalen 1987, 13–17; D. LIEBS, forthcoming, HLL 4, § 417. 2; cf. above pp. 1507–1508; for a critical view: S. SCHLOSSMANN, Tertullian im Lichte der Jurisprudenz, ZKG 27, 1906, 251–275; 407–430; a plea against an identification of the Church Father with the jurist: T. D. BARNES, 2nd ed. 1985, 22–29.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Iren. adv. haer. 3. 4. 3.

the gross absurdity of the pagans' behavior: in fact, he denounces the injustice implied in persecuting people only for their name (apol. 2. 18) and reveals the self-contradiction inherent in Trajan's rescript., which ordered Christians to be punished, not tracked down (apol. 2. 8). Consequently it is not enough to state that Tertullian (as compared with authors such as Justin) transposed the apology from the deliberative into the epideictic genre. In fact, we find the techniques of forensic speech throughout the Apologeticum: the principle of the orator's tactics is to 'throw back' the accusation on the accuser (retorsio criminis). An appropriate means to achieve this aim is a continuous drawing of parallels (comparatio). In broad outline there is a sequence of apology (7-16), epideixis (17-27), and syncretis (28-45).<sup>1</sup> In opposition to common practice the present speech presents a challenging 'change of sign': it is true that it is a plea but—like Plato's Apology of Socrates—it is not intended to obtain acquittal but condemnation: 'the Christians' blood is a seed' (apol. 50. 13). It appears that the way of reasoning also in this book is juridic. But there is more: the permanent exploitation of the symbolism of the tribunal is an artistic success: the divine tribunal—known even to the pagans—will render a verdict opposite to that of the earthly lawcourt.

The advocate's delight in discovering intrinsic contradictions in the statements of others culminates in his quoting Plato against Plato (anim. 24. 10), sardonically throwing back on his opponents the very similes they themselves had used (anim. 15. 6) or pinpointing with a sharp pen the inconsistencies of the pagans' behavior: in the theater everything is permitted that is forbidden elsewhere; sportsmen are of lowly origin but are nonetheless adored by genteel ladies (spect. 21-22). Unfortunately, our author himself shows little concern for logical consistency. In the war he wages against Jews, Gnostics, and philosophers there are manifest differences of argument depending on the public addressed. When combatting Gnostics, he praises the human body (resurr. 7-10) and, in accord with the New Testament, calls it a temple (anim. 53. 5), he exalts the reliability of sense-perception (anim. 17) and deems procreation a status benedictus (anim. 27. 4): early Christians, unlike some Platonists, were not blind to the realities of life. On the other hand, in an ascetic and moralizing context, he labels the body and the world as a prison of the soul—very much in the style of Plato.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER 1957.

<sup>2</sup> Anim. 53. 5; apol. 17. 5; mart. 2. 1.

When talking to Christians he dwells with gusto on the irrational, even absurd character of the objects of religious belief; in fact, though he was not the one who pronounced the notorious credo quia absurdum, he could have said it (s. Language and Style). When addressing pagans, however, he shows a high esteem for the soul's innate intellectual capacities (testimonium animae naturaliter Christianae, 'the witness of the soul, Christian in its very nature': apol. 17. 6)<sup>1</sup> and in this context gives full credit to Cleanthes, Zeno, Socrates, and Plato (apol. 21. 10; 22. 1-2). Conversely, when fighting against Gnostics, he stamps Plato as the spice-monger of all heresies (anim. 23. 5), denounces the firmness of Socrates as mere pose (anim. 1) and disclaims any link between Academy and Church (praescr. 7. 9).<sup>2</sup>

The verdicts passed on the Jews are equally subject to variations, depending on the addressees and the point Tertullian wants to make. In Carthage the Jews formed a strong community ill-disposed towards Christians; nonetheless, for Tertullian, they turn out to be the natural allies of the Christians against polytheism and theater (idol. and spect.). In front of lukewarm Christians he praises the fidelity of Jews to tradition (ieiun. 13. 6). In his apologetic writings (nat. and apol.),<sup>3</sup> however, when compelled to name non-Roman sources of calumny and persecution he does not omit corresponding activities of the Jews. Again, the shifts of perspective are dictated by tactical necessities.

Examples from Roman history and literature are produced to serve as models to Christian martyrs: there is a come-back of Lucretia, Regulus, and even Dido (mart. 3-4). An aging Tertullian confronts even his fellow Christians reproachfully with the greater piety and sacrificial spirit of the worshipers of Isis, Cybele, and Mithras<sup>4</sup> (ieiun. 16. 7-8; coron. 15. 3).

Our author's treatment of Roman gods in the 2nd book Ad nationes is no less biased, and his striving for rhetorical efficiency as well as his skilful arrangement of ideas bear the stamp of an advocate's mind: in the second part of the Antiquitates, which was dedicated to things divine, Varro had distinguished 'physical', 'mythical', and 'national'

<sup>1</sup> A necessary qualification: test. anim. 1. 7.

<sup>2</sup> St. Paul himself had already adopted different lines of argument when addressing pagans on the Areopagus and when preaching to Christians.

<sup>3</sup> Negative also scorp. 10. 10.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. S. Rossi, Minucio, Giustino e Tertulliano nei loro rapporti col culto di Mitra, GIF 16, 1963, 17-29.

deities (theologia tripartita). The first belong to speculative philosophy, the second to the mythical traditions of art and theater, the third are imposed on us by the law of the community. Tertullian, who is a master at plucking an argument to pieces, has no difficulty in showing that speculations are uncertain, myths are untrustworthy and even unworthy and statutes are arbitrary and cannot be obligatory for all. To state his case, he relies in part on arguments advanced by ancient philosophers in a variety of contexts.

Against 'physical theology' he maintains that the elements are but instruments in the hands of God, an argument looking desperately like a petitio principii. Against 'mythical theology' he calls up the old theory of the pagan Euhemerus, declaring that gods had originally been nothing but humans. This argument, though missing the essence of myth, serves the author's momentary purpose. As for 'national gods', Tertullian goes on, they have just local meaning and cannot claim general importance, as can be deduced quite easily from their very definition.

For his classification of the gods as certi, incerti, and selecti, Varro becomes the object of mockery. Tertullian prefers to draw a distinction between specifically Roman gods and gods shared by the Romans with other peoples. He has no difficulty in ridiculing the deified whore Larentia and the 'abstract gods' of early Rome. For Saturn, whose importance is not limited to Rome, euhemerism is called up again: Saturn was just a human being and his apotheosis is not based on reality.

To sum up: the grandeur of Rome is not a consequence of pious adherence to traditional Roman religion since there was little adherence and even less piety, but to the will of God, who for the given historical moment granted them power. This is once again a petitio principii.

As occasion demands, Tertullian describes the pagan gods as idols, humans, and demons (not caring that these explanations are mutually exclusive). For all his technical skill and tactical versatility, it remains undeniable that Tertullian, unlike the philosophers, does not start with the essence of things, but pleads his cause using the formal arguments of jurisprudence and the suggestive means of rhetoric.

However, in some of his best writings he succeeds in giving his specific argument a more general ring. He shares this gift of truly great orators with Cicero. The idea that Christ is the true crown of man confers broader significance and deeper meaning on the De corona.

In the De pallio the change of mind is reflected in the change of garment. In the Apologeticum God's verdict is opposed to human (in)justice: a loss can turn out to be a great benefit, and he who wants to save his life will lose it. Tertullian reflects this re-estimation of all values by a transfiguration of key elements in his imagery. Just as Cicero (rep. 6. 23. 25) had made a distinction between secular glory and real honor, our author brilliantly juxtaposes the human and the divine tribunal, the cloaks of vanity and of wisdom, the perishable garland and the eternal crown.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

If Tertullian did not create Christian Latinity, he certainly initiated a Christian Latin literary language. He introduced a great number of new words, and the Latin language finally gave up its deeply-rooted antagonism towards the abstractness of Greek philosophical terminology. From now on, words such as mathesis and anamnesis were remorselessly Latinized into discentia and reminiscentia (anim. 23. 6), and speakers of Latin no longer had to blush when calling the Platonic components of the soul indignativum and concupiscentivum (anim. 16. 3). For theological and philosophical terms Tertullian found adequate Latin equivalents, which often have a juridic ring. Thus the idea of freedom of will, which was to have a great future, was called libera arbitrii potestas (anim. 21. 6). Strangely enough, among the nomina agentis in -tor and -trix, we even find baptizator and evangelizator instead of the semi-Greek forms in -ista current in later times. In Tertullian, Greek words having a special Christian meaning spread from ecclesiastical to literary Latin: episcopus, baptisma, clerus, ecclesia, elemosyna, evangelium. He still used the Greek ἐξομολόγησις for what would be called confessio later on. To denote the priest he was left with a Latin word (sacerdos), in all probability because Greek Christianity, when it came to the West, still lacked a corresponding term. Divine οἰκονομία—God's plan concerning his activity in history—was often rendered by the rhetorical term dispositio, a metaphor appropriate indeed to denote the schedule of a process in which both creation and salvation are operated by the Word. Tertullian introduced the Roman notion of persona into the doctrine of Trinity (adv. Prax. 12). In accordance with the linguistic usage of African communities, he reserved the Latin sacramentum for Christian and mysterium for pagan contexts. The connection of sacramentum with the Roman oath of allegiance must have looked quite natural to a son of a Roman captain; the prominent theme of militia Christi, which can be traced back to Saint Paul, considerably enriched Tertullian's store of literary metaphors (mart. 3; orat. 29. 3),<sup>1</sup> in which even mater ecclesia (orat. 2. 6)<sup>2</sup> appears.

<sup>1</sup> H. HOPPE, Syntax und Stil des Tertullian, Leipzig 1903; E. LÖRSTEDT, Zur Sprache Tertullians, Lund 1920; H. HOPPE, Beiträge zur Sprache und Kritik Tertullians, Lund 1932; F. SCIUTO, La gradatio in Tertulliano, Studio stilistico, Catania 1966; C. J. CLASSEN, Der Stil Tertullians. Beobachtungen zum Apologeticum, in: Voces (Univ. Caen/Univ. Salamanca) 3, 1992, 93–107.

Tertullian is not afraid of using daring similes: God, like a homeopathic doctor, heals similia similibus: death by death, pains by pains (scorp. 5. 9). The immanence of the undivided soul in a body consisting of different parts, is illustrated by the presence of compressed air in an organ (anim. 14. 4). Elsewhere God is imagined as an organist who uses the human body as an instrument (bapt. 8. 1).<sup>3</sup>

As a stylist<sup>4</sup> Tertullian must be studied in the context of the 'Second Sophistic' movement and authors such as Apuleius. The 'Asianist' fashion of his day shows a preference for short sentences and striking thoughts expressed in a pointed manner, adorned with alliterations, rhymes, and puns. All this makes him 'doubtless the most difficult author in the Latin tongue'.<sup>5</sup> His style is distinguished by a markedly personal trait: its density and allusiveness borders on obscurity, but remains ever forceful and passionate.

Quot paene verba, tot sententiae, 'almost as many aphorisms as words'.<sup>6</sup> His bonmots are sometimes reminiscent of Juvenal. For example, concerning pagan gods Tertullian asserted: the less moral a person was, the more he was held worthy to become a god.<sup>7</sup>

Our orator's vivid imagination was unable to conceive abstract

<sup>1</sup> A. HARNACK, Militia Christi, Tübingen 1905; repr. Darmstadt 1963; more recent bibl. in: A. WLOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, AHAW 1960, 2, 185, n. 12.

<sup>2</sup> Following Gal. 4. 26.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. further Hier. tract. in psalm. I, p. 263. 21–p. 264. 5; B. LÖSCHORN, Die Bedeutungsentwicklung von Lat. organum bis Isidor von Sevilla, MH 28, 1971, 193–226.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. also J. FONTAINE, Aspects et problèmes de la prose d'art latine au III<sup>e</sup> siècle, Torino 1968.

<sup>5</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 606.

<sup>6</sup> Vincent. Ler. 18 (24).

<sup>7</sup> Tert. nat. 2. 13. 21; cf. Iuv. 1. 73–74.

notions such as 'spirit' and 'soul' without some bodily and material component; if this weakened his thought, it certainly strengthened his style. Things invisible are brought to life: idolatry is described as the 'sister of fornication' (scorp. 3. 5). The soul is addressed as if it were Psyche, sprung from the tale of Apuleius, and is summoned to the witness-box (test. anim. 1. 5). Even the philosopher's cloak becomes capable of feeling: 'Rejoice, cloak, and exult; for a better philosophy honors you with its presence, ever since you are worn by a Christian' (pall. 6. 2). Biblical pictures are elaborated and diversified rhetorically. This is an address to a tepid Catholic: 'Your belly is your god (cf. Phil. 3. 19), your lung is your temple, your stomach is your altar, the cook is your priest, the steam of the kitchen is your holy spirit, spices are your gifts and eructation is your prophecy.' Now and then, in these polemical passages the borders of good taste are neglected and the denounced cruelty of pagan gladiator-games celebrates an unexpected comeback. Thus in the finale of the De spectaculis (30. 5) the righteous enjoy the spectacle of the infernal sufferings of the condemned: they listen to sinful tragedians adding their voices to an anguish that—finally—is their own, they watch actors exhibiting all of their nimbleness in the eternal fire, etc. The best parody of Tertullian's style is Tertullian's style. However, the abusus is no proof against the usus: Consternating as these indulgences are, the fact remains that Tertullian, being a Roman and an orator, discovers for the first time the potentialities of a Christian literature and a Christian art. Not enough that he approvingly mentions hymns, thus heralding the birth of Christian poetry and vocal music (spect. 29. 4): he even sketches an allegorical battle of Virtues and Vices, a crucial theme to be worked out later by Prudentius, who Christianized most of the poetic genres. Tertullian's view of Christ's life-work as a grand 'spectacle' (spect. 29–30) will proliferate artistically in the Divine Liturgy of the Eastern Church as well as in Western medieval 'mystery plays'. Finally, his vivid descriptions of hell and doomsday (spect. 30) anticipate the medieval danses macabres ('dances of death') and the new kind of 'universal poetry' to be created by Dante. With an inspiration proper to a born orator Tertullian sketches here a program which medieval artists and poets will fill with life.

Not surprisingly Tertullian assigns words of juridic provenance a place of honor. Thus the antithesis damnare—absolvere is the keystone of the Apologeticum (50. 16): 'Precisely through your condemning us, God absolves us'. The same polarity is enhanced to form a paradox in Scap. 1. 2: 'We are even happier when condemned than when absolved'. Thanks to such stylistic forms, the bold venture of faith finds a perfect reflection in language. Rhetorical training and a way of thinking reminiscent of Paul<sup>1</sup> are blended in a quite personal fervor: 'God's son was crucified: I am not ashamed of this—just because it is shameful. God's son died: perfectly believable, because it is absurd. And he rose from the tomb: that's certain, because it is impossible' (car. 5. 4). Tertullian lives in a permanent tension between his actual experience of the Roman Empire and the eschatological expectation. This situation finds a convincing expression in a style both dark and brilliant. His taste for paradox is more than an orator's pose; it also reflects his historical and psychological position and its intrinsic tensions which pushed him to adopt 'extreme' views and attitudes.

Besides, observation of unobtrusive linguistic and stylistic features sometimes affords criteria for dating his works: scholars observed that in his early writings, asyndeta are especially frequent, and that et is used relatively rarely as a synonym for etiam or after other conjunctions.<sup>2</sup>

To sum up: Tertullian borrows his vocabulary from ancient philosophy, rhetoric, and jurisprudence, but transforms many traditional notions. During his time the Latin language of theology is born; in its turn it will become the mother of the language of modern philosophy. Tertullian's style, mirroring the contradictions and tensions inherent in his mind, combines the influence of biblical models—especially Paul's epistles—with the tradition of the Second Sophists as represented by Apuleius. A liberating influence may have come from Seneca, whose courageous creation of a highly personal style made him a precursor of Tertullian.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Through Christianity Tertullian found the Archimedean point 'where to stand in order to move the Earth'. He knew that on principle he had to rebel against Roman traditions. His statements on the subject have a frighteningly modern ring and convey the feeling of an historical change.<sup>1</sup> This is a new keynote in Latin literature, although we may recall Lucretius or Catullus who in different ways had kept their distance from Roman traditions. Would that revolt engender a cultural revolution? According to Tertullian, a Christian was allowed to read pagan literature, not to teach it.<sup>2</sup> To him philosophers are the patriarchs of heretics (anim. 3. 1); poets and orators are traitors to truth and morality.<sup>3</sup> Tertullian justifies his own use of rhetoric and philosophy by the necessity to confute and convince others: Ita nos rhetoricari quoque provocant haeretici sicut etiam philosophari philosophi, 'so the heretics provoke us to declaim as the philosophers to philosophize' (resurr. 5. 1). His own attitude to literature and art is janus-faced: on the one hand he condemns pagan culture and suggests with archaic severity that converted artists should repair roofs, paint walls and abaci, and do carpenters' work (idol. 3. 2; 4. 1; 8. 2). On the other hand his rhetorical imagination, his suggestive allegories, and his frescos of hell and doomsday pave the way for the nascent culture of the Middle Ages.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. 2 Cor. 6. 9–10; 12. 10; about 40% of Tertullian's quotations from the New Testament are from Paul.

<sup>2</sup> T. D. BARNES 1969.

In his doctrine of the 'testimony of the soul that by nature is Christian' (test. anim. passim; apol. 17. 6) he takes the first step towards a reappraisal of pagan tradition, a reading of ancient poets and philosophers as forerunners of Christianity (test. anim. 1. 1). The examples and classical testimonies alleged by Tertullian at every step give proof of this intention. Hence, the earliest great Christian author in Latin lays the foundations for a first renaissance of Roman civilization under the auspices of Christianity.

When dealing with different traditions his methods of interpretation are inconsistent and subject to momentary needs. When combating pagans, he rejects the allegorical interpretation of myths (popular with the Stoics) and states that it lacks logical precision: Saturn was either a man or he was Time. If he was a man, an allegorical interpretation is pointless (nat. 2. 12. 20). In his own exegetical practice, however, our author is strangely oblivious of his own lessons. In fact, he subjects the Old Testament to 'spiritual interpretation', although it is almost all about historical persons.<sup>1</sup> Again, when talking to Jewish Christians and Gnostics, he insists on the literal meaning of the text (e.g. scorp. 10). Evidently, he admits or rejects the allegorical method depending on his own willingness to accept a given tradition.

<sup>1</sup> Adversus haec igitur nobis negotium est, adversus institutiones maiorum, auctoritates receptorum, leges dominantium, argumentationes prudentium, adversus vetustatem consuetudinem necessitatem, adversus exempla prodigia miracula, quae omnia adulterinam istam divinitatem corroboraverant (nat. 2. 1. 7).

<sup>2</sup> C. M. M. BAYER, Tertullian zur Schulbildung für Christen . . ., RQA 78, 1983, 186–191; R. BRAUN, Tertullien et la philosophie païenne. Essai de mise au point, BAGB 1971, 231–251; H. STEINER 1989.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. anim. 33. 8; G. L. ELLSPERMANN, O.S.B., The Attitude of the Early Christian Latin Writers Toward Pagan Literature and Learning, diss. Washington 1949.

For theology, which was just taking shape in his day, he devised the principle of formulating dogma according to a defensive and conservative method: Christian doctrine develops through the refutation of errors (praescr. 13. 1). This is, of course, also a justification of his own method: all of Tertullian's writings are provoked by concrete cases. As a result his approach to problems is more local and tactical than systematic. In his definitions as well as in his use of texts he often follows the example of jurists.

Ideas II

Generally speaking, Stoic elements are prominent in Tertullian's philosophical<sup>2</sup> thought: the notion of nature, the dichotomy of man into body and soul (the spirit is not assigned an independent role), the materialistic idea of God and soul as corporeal beings, and a general preference for practical and moral philosophy.

Consequently Tertullian defends the unity of God against Marcion, who had supposed a higher God of goodness and a lower God of justice, as well as against Hermogenes, who had made eternal matter a second principle beside God. Tertullian's doctrine of Trinity (in the late Adversus Praxean) combats a total levelling of the differences between the three Persons of the Trinity: unlucky Praxeas by doing so had 'exorcised the Spirit and crucified the Father' (adv. Prax. 1. 5). Although our author occasionally overemphasized the subordination of the Son to the Father, his Christology as a whole was important enough to have a strong impact on later dogma, especially on the Nicene Creed (325) and the statements of the Council of Chalcedon (451). Even in these matters, his thought betrays its Roman origins: when illustrating the unity of God by comparing it to a monarchy—although the Son is co-regent, the principle of monarchy is unimpaired—it is evident that our Roman author prefers to think in terms of power, not substance. Moreover, he considers the deity mostly in an historical dimension (οἰκονομία, dispensatio, dispositio) and in its relationship to man and man's experience. Finally he defines the essence of things mainly by recurring to their origin, for which he uses the keyword status. It appears that even his approach to origins is not philosophical but juridical. The status (or census) of a being depends on its origin. The idea of status, which is typical of Tertullian's way of thinking, can be observed in different fields: in the doctrine of the Trinity as well as in that of the soul (the human soul having its origin in God's breath), in his dismantling of the pagan gods (even the oldest god, Saturn, was just a man), in his rejection of all theatrical plays because of their descent from pagan cult and, last but not least, in the refutation of heretics on grounds of the priority of the Catholic church.

<sup>1</sup> Voluit enim deus et alias nihil sine exemplaribus in sua dispositione molitus paradigmate Platonico plenius humani vel maxime initiū ac finis lineas cotidie agere nobiscum, manum porrigens fidei facilius adiuvandae per imagines et parabolas sicut sermonum ita et rerum (anim. 43. 11).

<sup>2</sup> According to Tertullian, Christianity is the 'better philosophy': H. STEINER 1989, 194–207, esp. 205.

As a Roman, Tertullian laid special stress<sup>1</sup> on the idea that the incarnation of the Logos was an historical fact and that Jesus Christ had not only a divine nature but also a real human one. Thus the linkage between Christ's incarnation and the Christians' salvation becomes evident. Resurrection includes the human body for Tertullian. He does not want to be delivered from matter; salvation has to embrace even matter. In direct opposition to some ancient philosophers and their hostile attitude to the body, Tertullian's asceticism springs from a basically positive view of corporality (a fact often ignored); its ultimate aim is not mortification but transfiguration.

Tertullian's doctrines concerning the Spirit and the Church are in accord with the Gospel:<sup>2</sup> what matters is the presence of God's Spirit in human beings, not the number of bishops (pud. 21. 17). A hundred years earlier, such a statement would not have been scandalous. This was different in Tertullian's day, however, when the institution itself set out to spread all over the world. Because Tertullian's notion of the Holy Spirit was based on eschatology and prophesy, not ecclesiastical hierarchy, his ethical rigorism and his ideas concerning the priesthood of laymen were then liable to provoke a clash with the official church. His exaggerated moral claims and his belief in concrete contemporary manifestations of prophetic spirit—a belief surprising in an intellectual—reflect a desperate and somewhat strained effort to preserve some elements of early Christianity in a rapidly growing and changing Church.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. De carne Christi; De resurrectione carnis.

<sup>2</sup> Matth. 18. 20; castit. 7. 3; fug. 14. 1.

He set the trend in the field of psychology. It is no accident that Latin authors—Tertullian and Augustine—produced the most influential contributions to the understanding of the human soul. Tertullian, in the footsteps of the Stoics, maintained the corporality of the soul, which to him was an indivisible unit. The vegetative, the sensitive and the rational functions were not located in specific ‘parts’ of it. Even the spirit was but a function of the soul (anim. 12. 6). At the same time, in opposition to Plato, Tertullian was convinced of the reliability of sense perception. At this point, Stoic and Epicurean doctrines blended with his Roman realism, and, to confirm this idea, our author called up the Bible and Roman law: our senses are credible witnesses; otherwise the testimony of the apostles would be worthless (anim. 17. 13–14). According to Tertullian the soul is transmitted from the parents to the child at conception (anim. 36. 37). For Epicurus the soul is born and dies together with the body; for Plato it is eternal, having not only no end but also no beginning. In Tertullian’s view the individual soul does have a beginning in time, and yet it is immortal: philosophically, this is clearly the most difficult and inconsistent of the three solutions. Nevertheless it enjoyed a lasting success, perhaps because it was congenial to the Roman mind and its striving for personal immortality, a feeling easily Christianized.

In the realm of the soul, as elsewhere, status is defined by origin. Being ‘God’s breath’, the soul has an auctoritas based on maiestas naturae (test. anim. 5. 1). The Roman and juridic ring of these terms is obvious. Although each single soul is accused of error and subject to it, it is also a witness to truth. Therefore our author regarded it a perfectly conceivable task to prove the truth of Christianity and the wrongness of paganism by interrogating the pagan philosophers and poets themselves (test. anim. 1. 1). His crystal-clear definition of the soul (anim. 22. 2) testifies again to its author’s being an advocate.<sup>1</sup> His ability to render thoughts in precise language made Tertullian a precursor of medieval theology.

Our author spoke of the relationship between God and man in juridical terms. He emphasized notions such as guilt, satisfaction, and compensation, which had already been prepared by the Jewish tradition: a genuine convergency of Roman and Jewish thought.

---

<sup>1</sup> Definimus animam dei flatu natam, immortalem, corporalem, effigiatam, substantia simplicem de suo sapientem, varie procedentem, liberam arbitrii, accidentis obnoxiam, per ingenia mutabilem, rationalem, dominatricem, divinatricem, ex una redundantem.

Similarly, the relation between the Christians and the Roman state was discussed in terms of law. In the Apologeticum Tertullian stressed that the persecution of persons because of their name was unheard of. At the same time he emphasized the loyalty of the Christians, who prayed even for the Emperor (39. 2), thus contributing to the continuity of the Roman Empire. He even belittled the importance of the persecutions of Christians (apol. 5), which had been a harsh reality. On the whole he drew a rather favorable portrait of the emperors. The Apologeticum sketched an all-too idyllic picture of the interrelations of Church and state. Books such as the Scorpiace convey a more pertinent idea of what the persecutions were like. There Tertullian insisted on the superiority of God's law over the laws of men. The government was to be obeyed—but only in the service of justice and morality. Nobody was allowed to love his parents, his wife or the Emperor more than God (scorp. 14). Christian martyrs are the modern incarnation of ancient Roman virtus (nat. 1. 18); today's Romans, alas, persecute in them the virtues they themselves have lost.

At present the Lord of History has given the power to the Romans (nat. 2. 17. 19). It is true that the stress laid on the constructive, even conservative contribution of the Church to the state would have a great (and not always glorious) future; yet it does not make Tertullian an 'imperial theologian'. He rather conceived of history as a gradual education of mankind<sup>1</sup> through different degrees of revelation, each of which is adapted to our own limited capacities. The ideas of the ages of the world as foreshadowed by Paul (Gal. 4. 1–9) are felicitously married to a Ciceronian image of nature (Cic. Cato 51 and 53). Just as a plant develops out of a seed and into a fruit, history started with a 'natural' state of things. Subsequently, law and prophets inaugurated childhood, the gospel initiated youth, and finally, the Holy Spirit, the paraclete, will illuminate old age (virg. vel. 1. 4–7). In Latin literature before Tertullian the pattern of ages had been applied to history by Florus.

Being a lawyer rather than a systematic thinker, Tertullian is not free from contradictions. They occur not only between different works (the increase of ethical rigorism caused by Montanism is a well-known example) but also within single books.<sup>1</sup> Yet inconsistencies should not be over-emphasized. Above all, his plea for the tradition of the Church does not contradict his change to Montanism, since that denomination was distinguished by especially archaic features such as moral rigorism and the stress laid on 'the gifts of the Spirit'. Looking back it appears that Tertullian's failure was due to the fact that he adhered to early Christian church structures at a moment when—on the one hand—the development towards a 'church for masses' could not be stopped any more and—on the other hand—monasticism had not yet been discovered as a serious alternative for ascetic minds.

---

<sup>1</sup> P. ARCHAMBAULT, The Ages of Man and the Ages of the World. A Study of Two Traditions, REAug 12, 1966, 193–228; as for paideia: H. STEINER 1989, 38–45.

Transmission

The transmission of Tertullian's texts is unsatisfactory. 31 works have come down to us; the manuscripts of puđic. and ieiun. are lost, so that we must resort to early printed editions.

An ample manuscript tradition is available only for the Apologeticum. There are considerable discrepancies between the manuscript vulgate<sup>2</sup> and the Fuldensis (F; not extant) which is related to the Fragmentum Rhenaugiense (in the cod. Turicensis XCV, 10th century). Were there two different editions in Tertullian's lifetime? Or do both traditions descend from a single archetype? The latter case is more probable since both traditions have mistakes in common. If this is so, the Fuldensis is often to be preferred, especially since its text is supported by secondary transmission (Euseb. hist. eccl. and Ps.-Cyprian, Quod idola dñi non sint). No less frequently, however, the true reading lies somewhere in the middle between F and the vulgate.

For Tertullian's other works, we know of five corpora:

1. The Corpus Trecense, collected perhaps by Vincent of Lerin in the 5th century. It has been preserved in the codex Trecensis 523, 12th century, in Troyes, from the library of Clairvaux and comprises adv. Iud., car., resurr., bapt., paenit.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. e.g. paenit. 9 with puđic. 13; uxor. 2. 8 with castit. and monog. passim; and, above all, adv. Marc. 4. 1. 9 with 4. 11. 11.

<sup>2</sup> Two of the most important manuscripts containing the vulgate text of Tertullian are the Petropolitanus Lat. I Q v. 40, 9th century, and the Parisinus Lat. 1623, 10th century; cf. also H. SCHRÖRS, Zur Textgeschichte und Erklärung von Tertullians Apologeticum, Leipzig 1914; W. BÜHLER, Gibt es einen gemeinsamen Archetypus der beiden Überlieferungsstränge von Tertullians Apologeticum?, Philologus 109, 1965, 121–133.

2. A Corpus Ottobonianum can be reconstructed from fragments preserved in the Vatican; they exhibit a valuable text (Vaticanus Ottobonianus Latinus 25, 14th century). It is relevant to puhic., paenit., patient., and spect.

3. The Corpus Corbeiense was probably composed by a follower of Novatian in the 5th century. The manuscripts—formerly in Cologne and Corvey—are lost,<sup>1</sup> so we have to refer to early collationes. The Corpus contained one of Novatian's works and Tertullian's resurr., spect., praescr., puhic., ieiun.

4. The sole manuscript representing the Corpus Agobardinum, which can be traced back to the 5th century, is the Parisinus Latinus 1622, 9th century; it was written by order of the archbishop Agobard of Lyons (d. 840). Originally the corpus contained 21 treatises, of which no more than 13 are preserved: nat., praescr., scorp., test. anim., coron., spect., idol., anim., orat., cult. fem., uxor., castit., cam.

5. The Corpus Cluniacense had survived in two Codices Cluniacenses (10th/11th century) which are now lost. We are left with younger manuscripts and old editions. It contains 21 treatises: patient., cam., resurr., adv. Prax., adv. Val., adv. Marc., fug., Scap., coron., mart., paenit., virg. vel., cult. fem., castit., uxor., monog., ball., adv. Iud., (Ps.-Tert. haer.), praescr., adv. Hermog.

Influence

Tertullian is the creator of Christian Latin literature. He put his stamp on its language once and for all. No less rich is his legacy to western Christianity in the field of ideas: on the one hand, we have his golden word concerning the testimonium animae naturaliter Christianae (apol. 17. 6). On the other hand, there is his bold insistence on the paradox, even absurdity of faith, enhanced by the Roman's sense of numen; his feeling that revelation is something 'totally different'; furthermore, the Stoic and Roman dichotomy of soul and body; the degradation of the spirit into a function of the soul; the idea of a soul having a birthdate, but no deathdate—with all its inherent philosophical difficulties; and above all, a preference for a juridical way of thinking, the delight in practical and moral teaching and preaching and—as a result—the predominant role of rhetoric. Last but not least, his insistence on the historical truth and physical reality of Christ's incarnation is in full harmony with Roman traditions at their best.

Tertullian's eminent importance is obvious from the very fact that his works were transmitted at all, although, strictly speaking, he had been a heretic. They were simply indispensable. Actually, his deviations from the doctrine of the Church have less to do with theology in the strictest sense of the word than with practical ethics and ecclesiastical discipline. Cyprian read him daily, called him 'the teacher' (Hier. vir. ill. 53) and recast his ideas into an attractive and ecclesiastically inoffensive shape. Similarities between Minucius Felix and Tertullian are open to interpretation; nowadays, a later date for Minucius is preferred.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. however: G. LIEFTINCK, Un fragment du De spectaculis de Tertullien, V Chr 5, 1951, 193–203.

Lactantius and Eusebius were the first to mention Tertullian by name, and they passed over in silence his heterodoxy. Later authors, while noting it with regret, nevertheless went on reading him. Jerome, no less pugnacious by nature, especially loved to quote him. Fulgentius, a declared enemy of pagan laxity, relied on him in the Mythologiae.<sup>2</sup> Augustine registered him in his catalogue of heretics (haer. 86), and in the Decretum Gelasianum his writings were condemned. Yet for all that, almost no Latin church father could afford to ignore him. The Apologeticum was translated into Greek no later than the early 3rd century. Later exegetes of the Lord's Prayer could not disregard Tertullian (De oratione)—or his faithful copyist Cyprian. Tertullian's influence was not limited to Hippolytus' and Novatian's doctrine of Trinity: some of our heretic's dogmatic definitions recurred in the writings of pope Leo I (Epistola dogmatica ad Flavianum, epist. 28) and even obtained canonical value by the authoritative Creeds of Nicaea (325) and Chalcedon (451).

At the dawn of the modern age Tertullian's eschatological and 'pneumatic' ideas on church and history were revived by Joachim of Floris (d. 1202), who announced the end of the official church of the Son and the beginning of a 'third' age, the kingdom of the Holy Spirit, incarnate in a non-hierarchical community living in poverty and chastity. The related concept of an 'education of mankind' (the title of a well-known book of Lessing) had a history of its own. In later times Tertullian's views concerning the priesthood of laymen met with a more enthusiastic response than did the ascetic requirements he had inseparably linked with them.

Tertullian regarded himself as a 'pneumatic' Christian. Taking the standpoint of the Spirit who discerns spirits—sometimes to the point of separation—he criticized both paganism and a Christianity which was all too ready to compromise with the world. Thus he fulfilled the function of a ‘teacher’ or ‘prophet’, a function more congenial to the Bible than to the Church. This was the keystone of his multifaceted literary activity. For all this, he was an important link between Roman and Christian civilization: if his ascetic intentions made him a reformer of the Church, his literary accomplishments made him the initiator of a first renaissance of Latin literature and civilization under the auspices of Christianity.

<sup>1</sup> For the problem of priority s. our chapter on Minucius Felix, pp. 1554–1555.

<sup>2</sup> L. G. WHITBREAD, Fulgentius and Dangerous Doctrine, Latomus 30, 1971, 1157–1161.

Two memorable, though contradictory, sayings have become equally famous: anima naturaliter Christiana and credo quia absurdum (the latter being a rather free quote). Thanks to the Nicene Creed, some of Tertullian’s brilliant definitions are on everybody’s lips. The impact of his baroque style on preachers of all times can hardly be overrated. When Bossuet,<sup>1</sup> referring to the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, spoke of chair angélique, he followed in Tertullian’s footsteps (resurr. 26. 7). More recently, readers feel attracted anew by his colorful language, as can be seen from Douglass Parker’s<sup>2</sup> poetic translation of a passage on animals in pall. 3. 3).

Editions: apol.: Venetiis, apud Bernardinum Benalium 1483. * First complete edition: Beatus Rhenanus, Basileae 1521. * F. OEHLER, vols. 1–3, 1851–1854 (TN, monograph). * A. REIFFERSCHIED, G. WISSOWA, H. HOPPE, A. KROYMANN, V. BULHART, CSEL 20; 47; 69; 70; 76, Wien 1890–1957. * Editores varii, CC 1 and 2, Turnholti 1954. * K. KELLNER, G. ESSER (Tr), 2 vols., München 1912–1916 (BKV). * adv. Hermog.: J. H. WASZINK (TrC), London 1956. * adv. Iud.: H. TRÄNKLE (T, crit. C), Wiesbaden 1964. * adv. Marc.: C. MORESCHINI, Milano 1971. * E. EVANS (TTr), 2 vols., Oxford 1972. * adv. Marc 1–3: R. BRAUN (TTrN), 3 vols., Paris 1990; 1991; 1994. * adv. Prax.: E. EVANS (TTrC), London 1948. * G. SCARPAT (TTr, ind.), Torino 1985. * adv. Val.: A. MARASTONI (TC), Roma 1971. * J.-C. FREDOUILLE (TTrC, ind.), SC 280–281, Paris 1980–1981. * anim.: J. H. WASZINK (TTrC), Amsterdam, Paris 1933. * anim., test. anim., cens. anim.: J. H. WASZINK (TrN), Zürich 1980. * apol.: J. P. WALTZING (T), Liège 1914, (changed considerably) 1919. * J. P. WALTZING (C), Liège, Paris 1919. * J. P. WALTZING with A. SEVERYNS (TTr), Paris 1929. * C. BECKER (TTr), München 1952, 2nd ed. 1961. * P. FRASSINETTI, Torino 1965. * E. PARATORE (C), E. BUONAIUTI

<sup>1</sup> HIGHER, Class. Trad. 330.

<sup>2</sup> Arion 9, 1970, 1, 48–51.

(Tr), Bari 1972. * A. RESTA BARRILE (TTr), Bologna 1980. * apol. 1: A. SCHNEIDER (TTrC), Neuchâtel 1968. * apol., spect.: T. R. GLOVER (TTr), London 1931. * bapt.: B. LUISELLI (T, crit. C), Torino 1960; 2nd ed. 1968. * E. EVANS (TTrC), London 1964. * car.: E. EVANS (TTrC), London 1956. * J.-P. MAHÉ (TTrC, ind.), 2 vols., SC 216–217, Paris 1975. * castit.: C. MORESCHINI (TC), J.-C. FREDOUILLE (Tr), Paris 1985. * coron.: J. FONTAINE (TC), Paris 1966. * H. QUELLET (index), Hildesheim 1975. * F. RUGGIERO (TTrN), Milano 1992. * cult. fem.: W. KOK (TTrC), diss. Amsterdam 1934. * M. TURCAN (TTrC), Paris 1971. * S. ISETTA (TTrC), Firenze 1986. * fug.: J. J. THIERRY (TTrC), diss. Amsterdam 1941. * idol.: P. G. VAN DER NAT (TTrC), Leiden 1960. * J. H. WASZINK and J. C. M. VAN WINDEN (TTrC), Leiden 1987. * mart.: A. QUACQUARELLI (TTrC), Roma 1963. * monog.: P. MATTEI (TTrC), Paris 1988. * nat. 1: A. SCHNEIDER (TTrC), Roma 1968. * nat. 2: M. HAIDENTHALLER (TTrC), Paderborn 1942. * orat.: F. DIERCKS (TC), diss. Amsterdam, Bussum 1947; with virg. vel., London 1956. * pell.: A. GERLO, Wetteren 1940. * S. COSTANZA (TN), Napoli 1968. * paenit. and pudic.: W. P. LE SAINT (TrN), London 1959. * C. MUNIER (TTrC), SC 316, Paris 1984. * patient.: J.-C. FREDOUILLE (TTrC), Paris 1984. * praescr.: R. F. RÉFOULE (TC), P. DE LABRIOLLE (Tr), Paris 1957. * pudic.: C. MICAELLI, C. MUNIER (TTrC), 2 vols., Paris 1993. * resurr.: E. EVANS (TTrC), London 1960. * Scap.: A. QUACQUARELLI (TC), Roma 1957. * spect.: J. BÜCHNER (C), diss. Würzburg 1935. * E. CASTORINA (TTrC), Firenze 1961. * M. TURCAN (TTrC), Paris 1987. * test. anim.: C. TIBILETTI (TC), Torino 1959. * uxor.: A. STEPHAN, Amsterdam 1954. * virg. vel.: C. STÜCKLIN (TTrC), Bern 1974. * P. A. GRAMAGLIA (TC), Roma 1984. * Index: G. CLAESSON, Index Tertullianus, 3 vols., Paris 1974–1975. * Concordance: (patient.): H. QUELLET, Hildesheim 1988. * (cult. fem.): H. QUELLET, Hildesheim 1993. * Bibl.: cf. the monographs, esp. T. D. BARNES 2nd ed. 1985 and H. STEINER 1989. * From 1975 onward yearly in REAug: R. BRAUN, J.-C. FREDOUILLE, P. PETTMENGIN, Chronica Tertulliana et Cyprianea, e.g.: REAug 39, 1993, 441–464. * R. D. SIDER, Approaches to Tertullian. A Survey of Recent Scholarship, Second century 2, 1982, 228–260.

R. H. AYERS, Language, Logic, and Reason in the Church Fathers. A Study of Tertullian, Augustine, and Aquinas, Hildesheim 1979. * C. AZIZA, Tertullien et le Judaïsme, Paris 1977. * T. D. BARNES, Tertullian. A Historical and Literary Study, Oxford 1971, 2nd ed. 1985 (bibl. with add.). * T. D. BARNES, Tertullian's Scorpiace, JThS 20, 1969, 105–132. * K. BAUS, Der Kranz in Antike und Christentum . . . mit besonderer Berücksichtigung Tertullians, Bonn 1940, repr. 1965. * A. BECK, Römisches Recht bei Tertullian und Cyprian, Halle 1930. * C. BECKER, Tertullians Apologeticum. Werden und Leistung, München 1954. * R. BÉLANGER, Le plaidoyer de Tertullien pour la liberté religieuse, SR 14, 1985, 281–291. * W. BENDER, Die Lehre über den heiligen Geist bei Tertullian, München 1961. * R. BRAUN, Le problème des deux livres du De cultu feminarum de Tertullien—un ouvrage homogène ou deux écrits distincts?, Studia Patristica 7, Berlin 1966, 133–142. * R. BRAUN, Deus Christianorum. Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien, Paris 1962; 2nd ed. 1977 (with add.). * R. BRAUN, Tertullien et la philosophie païenne. Essai de mise au point, BAGB 1971, 231–251. * A. J. BREKELMANS, Martyrerkrans. Eine symbolgeschichtliche Untersuchung im frühchristlichen Schrifttum, Rom 1965. * N. BROX, Anima naturaliter non christiana, ZKTh 91, 1969, 70–75 (bibl.). * G. ECKERT, Orator Christianus. Untersuchungen zur Argumentationskunst in Tertullians Apologeticum, Stuttgart 1993. * P. FRASSINETTI, Gli scritti matrimoniali di Seneca e Tertulliano, RIL 88, ser. 3, 19, 1–2, 1965, 151–188. * J.-C. FREDOUILLE, Tertullien et la conversion de la culture antique, Paris 1972. * J.-C. FREDOUILLE, Argumentation rhétorique dans le De corona de Tertullien, RSR 58, 1984, 77–90. * W. H. C. FRENZ, Tertulliano e gli Ebrei, RSLR 4, 1968, 3–10. * R. FREUDENBERGER, Der Anlaß zu Tertullians Schrift De corona militis, Historia 19, 1970, 579–592. * G. HALLONSTEN, Satisfactio bei Tertullian. Überprüfung einer Forschungstradition, Lund 1984. * G. HALLONSTEN, Meritum bei Tertullian. Überprüfung einer Forschungstradition II, Lund, Malmö 1985. * A. HARNACK, Die Chronologie der altchristlichen Literatur 2, Berlin 1904, 256–305. * A. HARNACK, Tertullian in der Litteratur der alten Kirche, in: SPAW 29, 1895, 2, 545–579. * J. HERRMANN, Tertullians Verfahrensrügen und die frühen Märtyrerakten, JJP 15, 1965, 151–156. * R. KLEIN, Tertullian und das römische Reich, Heidelberg 1968. * H. KOCH, Tertullianus, RE 2, 9, 1934, 822–844. * E. J. KOURI, Tertullian und die römische Antike, Helsinki 1982. * J. LORTZ, Tertullian als Apologet, 2 vols., Münster 1927–1928. * J.-P. MAHÉ, Le traité perdu de Tertullien adversus Apelleiacos et la chronologie de sa triade anti-gnostique, REAug 16, 1970, 3–24. * A. D. MAISTRE, Traditio. Aspects théologiques d'un terme de droit chez Tertullien, RSPH 51, 1967, 617–643. * E. P. MEIJERING, Tertullian contra Marcion. Gotteslehre in der Polemik. Adversus Marcionem 1–2, Leiden 1977. * C. MICARELLI, Ricerche sulla fortuna di Tertulliano, Orpheus n.s. 6, 1985, 118–135. * D. MICHAÉLIDÈS, Foi, écritures et tradition ou les praescriptiones chez Tertullien, Paris 1969. * D. MICHAÉLIDÈS, Sacramentum chez Tertullien, Paris 1970. * J. MOINGT, Théologie trinitaire de Tertullien, 3 vols., Paris 1966. * C. MORESCHINI, Reminiscenze apuleiane nel De anima di Tertulliano?, Maia n.s. 20, 1968, 19–20. * C. MUNIER, Analyse du traité de Tertullien De praescriptione haereticorum, RSR 59, 1985, 12–33. * R. A. NORRIS, God and World in Early Christian Theology: Tertullian, London 1966. * T. P. O'MALLEY, Tertullian and the Bible. Language, Imagery, Exegesis, Nijmegen 1967. * S. OSWIECIMSKI, De scriptorum romanorum vestigiis apud Tertullianum obviis quaestiones selectae, Kraków 1951. * S. OTTO, Natura und dispositio. Untersuchungen zum Naturbegriff und zur Denkform Tertullians, München 1960. * P. PETTMENGIN, Tertullien et la religion romaine, abstract in: REL 45, 1967, 47-49. * L. RADITSA, The Appearance of Women and Contact. Tertullian's De habitu feminarum, Athenaeum 63, 1985, 297-326. * C. RAMBAUX, Tertullien face aux morales des trois premiers siècles, Paris 1979. * T. G. RING, Auctoritas bei Tertullian, Cyprian und Ambrosius, Würzburg 1975. * G. SCHÖLLGEN, Ecclesia sordida? Zur Frage der sozialen Schichtung frühchristlicher Gemeinden am Beispiel Karthagos zur Zeit Tertullians, Münster 1984. * O. SCHÖNBERGER, Über die symmetrische Komposition in Tertullians Apologeticum, Gymnasium 64, 1957, 335-340. * P. SINISCALGO, Ricerche sul De resurrectione di Tertulliano, Roma 1966. * R. D. SIDER, Ancient Rhetoric and the Art of Tertullian, Oxford 1972. * M. SPANNEUT, Tertullien et les premiers moralistes africains, Gembloux 1969. * L. STÄGER, Das Leben im römischen Afrika im Spiegel der Schriften Tertullians, Zürich 1973. * H. STEINER, Das Verhältnis Tertullians zur antiken Paideia, St. Ottilien 1989. * J. STEINMANN, Tertullien, Lyon 1967. * J. STIRNIMANN, Die Praescriptio Tertullians im Lichte des römischen Rechtes und der Theologie, Freiburg 1949. * A. STÖTZEL, Christlicher Glaube und römische Religiosität bei Tertullian, München 1972. * L. J. SWIFT, Forensic Rhetoric in Tertullian's Apologeticum, Latomus 27, 1968, 864-877. * S. W. J. TEUWEN, Sprachlicher Bedeutungswechsel bei Tertullian, Paderborn 1926. * J. E. L. VAN DER GEEST, Le Christ et l'Ancien Testament chez Tertullien. Recherche terminologique, Nijmegen 1972. * I. VECCHIOTTI, La filosofia di Tertulliano. Un colpo di sonda nella storia del cristianesimo primitivo, Urbino 1970. * J.-M. VERMANDER, De quelques répliques à Celse dans l'Apologeticum de Tertullien, REAug 16, 1970, 205-225.

MINUCIUS FELIX

Life and Dates

Marcus Minucius Felix was most likely born in North Africa. Later he was active at Rome as a lawyer. His dialogue Octavius<sup>1</sup> has been transmitted to us together with the writings of Arnobius, who was African: the names which Minucius gives to the interlocutors of his dialogue are attested epigraphically in North Africa,<sup>2</sup> and in the text Caecilius quotes Fronto (who was from Cirta) as his countryman (9. 6; 31. 2). Finally, some critical remarks launched against Rome may be due to African patriotism (25. 1-7).

<sup>1</sup> A treatise De fato vel Contra mathematicos, which had been ascribed to Minucius, was judged spurious by Jerome (vir. ill. 58) for reasons of style: J. G. PRÉAUX, A propos du De fato (?) de Minucius Felix, Latomus 9, 1950, 395-413.

<sup>2</sup> J. BEAUJEU, edition, p. xxvi.

Since our author has knowledge of Fronto's and Gellius' work, he is writing after 160; on the other hand the fact that he quotes Lactantius means that he must have lived before 310. The controversial question as to whether Minucius or Tertullian was older is usually answered in favor of Tertullian:<sup>1</sup> while the rhetorical arrangement of ideas in Minucius is rather loose, Tertullian establishes an order which is more strict and logical. In the Ad nationes, which was written before the Apologeticum, parallels to Minucius are not as close; if Tertullian were the imitator, it would be strange that he followed his source more slavishly in his later work than in the earlier one. Tertullian's information is more precise and fuller; it follows that Minucius abridged it. Actually such a use of Tertullian is fully consonant with Minucius' attitude to other sources such as Cicero and Plato.<sup>2</sup> Hence the Octavius should be dated after the Apologeticum (197).

A treatise falsely ascribed to Cyprian (Quod idola dñi non sint) is practically a word-for-word copy of Min. Fel. 18–23 and Tert. apol. 21–23, but as it was most likely written no earlier than the 4th century, it does not help us establish the date of the Octavius. Parallels in Cyprian's Ad Donatum (no later than 248) tell in favor of a priority of Minucius.<sup>3</sup> It appears that the Octavius should be dated to the first half of the 3rd century.

There is more evidence for the same epoch:<sup>4</sup> the importance of philosophical argument and the number of quotations from Cicero and Vergil are indicative of the spread of Christianity into the upper classes of Roman society. Minucius' interest in Platonism as well as <sup>1</sup> J. BEAUJEU, edition, pp. xlv–lxxix; similarly the majority of scholars following B. AXELSON and C. BECKER. For the priority of Minucius e.g. NORDEN, Kunstprosa 605; S. ROSSI, GIF 12, 1959, 289–304; 15, 1962, 193–224; 16, 1963, 17–29; 293–313. As a matter of fact, Lactantius (inst. 5. 1. 22) and Jerome (epist. 70. 5) mention Minucius before Tertullian. (However, the reasons for this arrangement are not necessarily chronological, and, in fact, the names are arranged reversely in other passages of Jerome). In Minucius there are none of the elements which Tertullian adopted from the Apology of Apollonius (M. Sordi 1964).

<sup>2</sup> C. BECKER 1967.

<sup>3</sup> J. BEAUJEU lxxvii–lxxiv; for a date later than Cyprian now G. L. CARVER 1978 (not cogent).

<sup>4</sup> A terminus post quem is the official recognition of the cult of Isis through the foundation of the Serapeum in Rome under Caracalla (2. 4; 21. 3); even the choice of the time of the year—vintage (2. 3)—might be an innuendo against the Isiac initiation which was frequently celebrated at that season: P. COURCELLE, Les Confessions de saint Augustin dans la tradition littéraire. Antécédents et postérité, Paris 1963, 122.

Stoic philosophy locates him in the period of transition between the 'Stoic' and the 'Platonic' phase of patristic literature.

Survey of the Work

Prelude (1-4): during a walk on the beach at Ostia there arises a discussion on religion between the Christian Octavius Januarius and the pagan Caecilius Natalis. Minucius Felix acts as umpire.

First part (5-13): Caecilius contests the possibility of certain knowledge (especially for Christians, given their lack of education). In particular we cannot know anything of divine providence; hence we must adhere to the traditional cults to which Rome owes her grandeur (5-7). He subsequently presents a critical view of Christianity (8-12) and concludes his speech on a sceptical note (13).

Interlude (14-15): Minucius remarks that truth is of greater importance than eloquence and allows Octavius to speak.

Second part (16-38): as an introduction, Octavius declares that poverty offers a better approach to truth than prosperity (16). Then he discusses three points: first, the proof of the existence of one God and of his providence (17-20. 1); second, a critique of pagan religion (20. 2-27); and third, a refutation of Caecilius' objections against Christianity (28-38. 4). Finally, he declares that the truth of Christian revelation conquered the sceptical doctrine (38. 5-7).

Epilogue: The speech is admired and Caecilius declares himself converted (39-40).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Despite Jerome's praise of our author's wide reading (epist. 70. 5), much of it was clearly gained at second-hand. We can trust in Minucius' ability to read Greek: he quotes Homer and refers to Plato's Phaedo, Republic, Symposium, and Timaeus, partly perhaps from anthologies. In general, Platonic references are more prominent here than in Tertullian: Minucius heralds the 'Platonizing' phase of Christian literature. He combats scepticism, which had recently been defended by Sextus Empiricus, a leading representative of that school.

Among Latin authors, Cicero and Seneca hold a place of honor. Besides his main model, the De natura deorum, Minucius knows many other works of Cicero,<sup>1</sup> even the lost Hortensius, which, like the Octavius, was a protrepticus and used the name of a dead friend as title. When following Cicero, Minucius is always careful to change the wording. The De providentia is his favorite of Seneca's works (e.g. Min. Fel 20. 1; 36-37); it will be used by Cyprian and Lactantius as well. His critical discussion of Roman religion (25. 8) can be traced back to Seneca's De superstitione<sup>1</sup> and probably to Varro (25. 8).

<sup>1</sup> Academica, Laelius, De finibus, De re publica, De legibus (for the technique of telling

Virgil, the only Latin poet to receive divine honors, is quoted like Homer as an authority in religious 'proofs from tradition', a somewhat unusual choice for a Christian of that epoch.

Cicero and the Roman historians are Minucius' sources for historical arguments; like Tertullian (and probably in his footsteps) he tries to conquer the pagans with their own weapons.

There are only indirect allusions to the Bible,<sup>2</sup> and Minucius does not name Christ, probably in deference to his pagan audience.

A speech of Fronto<sup>3</sup> against the Christians may have furnished material for his anti-Christian polemics (cf. 9. 6 and 31. 2), and so, too, the True Discourse of Celsus<sup>4</sup> (A.D. 178) and Christian apologetic texts. Despite the rareness of direct verbal reminiscences (except for Tertullian), there are numerous similarities in content.

There are two genres of apologies which occasionally overlap: one of them resembles a juridic plea—such as Athenagoras' Embassy and Tertullian's Apologeticum;<sup>5</sup> the other is closer to a 'protreptic' speech. Minucius, by choosing the latter form, wants to reach a large public. His models, besides Aristotle's Protrepticus and Cicero's Hortensius, are Tatian's Speech to the Greeks and Clement's Protrepticus.

Dialogue had been used by Aristo of Pella and Justin. Minucius does not adopt the Platonic type of dialogue, although the interlude between the two speeches is reminiscent of the Phaedo (88 B-90 B); instead, Minucius presents a dispute before an umpire just as in Plutarch's Moralia,<sup>6</sup> the Tacitean Dialogus (4. 2-5. 2) and Gellius a story within the story), Tusculanae disputationes, rhetorical treatises, speeches, a letter to Atticus.

---

<sup>1</sup> Sen. fig. 33 HAASE = Aug. civ. 6. 10.

<sup>2</sup> D. S. WIESEN 1971.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. P. FRASSINETTI, L'orazione di Frontone contro i Cristiani, GIF 2, 1949, 238-254.

<sup>4</sup> For a reconstruction of Celsus from the quotations found in Origen: M. BORRET, ed., Origène, Contre Celse, Paris 1967-1969 (SC 132; 136; 147; 150); J. M. VERMANDER 1971.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. also Aristides of Athens.

<sup>6</sup> 615e; 747b; 750a; 1096-1097.

(18. 1). Minucius may have been especially attracted to the idea of usurping for his war against scepticism a literary form clearly preferred by academic sceptics (e.g. Cicero's De natura deorum).

The connections to the genre of consolatio should not be overemphasized.<sup>1</sup>

Literary Technique

The ability to write a dialogue may be considered a touchstone of literary craftsmanship. Minucius Felix is the first Christian Latin author to fulfill this requirement in the eyes of the pagan public. His striving for literary perfection in open rivalry with Plato and Cicero is something new in patristic literature, and in this case it is a Latin author who takes the first step.

The proem, with its respectful commemoration of a dead friend,<sup>2</sup> both the prelude and the epilogue follow the traditions of the philosophical dialogue and have some important points in common with Cicero. As in Plato and Cicero, the dialogue is reported by a narrator speaking in the first person. Like in Gellius (18. 1), the third interlocutor acts as umpire and the place of action is Ostia, a city close to the sea. The same place of farewell and reunion would become the setting of important dialogues up to Augustine.<sup>3</sup>

Meaningful details prepare us for the content of the dialogue.<sup>4</sup> This is especially true for the kiss which Caecilius throws to the statue of Serapis, a gesture revealing the subject—religion—and initiating the dialogue.

Keywords such as religio are used artfully (s. Ideas). The dialogue is given a dramatic climax by Caecilius' conversion, the suddenness of which is carefully prepared for by the repeated mention of his vivid temperament. This is without doubt a literary success.

The two speeches have been composed so as to match each other,<sup>5</sup> although there is no pedantic uniformity.

<sup>1</sup> A. ELTER, Prolegomena zu Minucius Felix, Progr. Bonn 1909.

<sup>2</sup> Cicero makes the beginning of his Brutus a monument to Hortensius; the same is true of Crassus in the introduction to the 3rd book of the De oratore; linguistically, the opening of the Octavius recalls the 1st book of the De oratore.

<sup>3</sup> Justin's story of conversion had been laid at the seashore as well (dial. 3-7).

<sup>4</sup> The technique recalls the use of the 'double sun' in Cicero's De re publica.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. the synoptic diagrams in J. BEAUJEU's edition, pp. viii-xiii.

The Christian's speech is longer, and certain parts find no counterpart in Caecilius' speech, such as the critical review of pagan religion (20. 2–24) and the passages on demons (26. 8–28. 6). Why? Our author is enough of an advocate to deny pagans the opportunity to make a plea for their religion. A companion piece to the demonization of pagan gods would have been the usual retort that Christians were atheists. By just briefly alluding to it, Minucius follows the rhetorical principle of not dwelling on points that might be detrimental to his cause. The author's bias is reflected even in the invention of the two speeches.

Caecilius, being a skeptic in theory, defends traditional paganism in practice. This inconsistency, however, is not a malicious invention intended to make refutation easier. Rather it is a correct portrayal of the mentality of many educated Romans.<sup>1</sup> Thus in Cicero's De natura deorum Cotta, as an academic sceptic, dismantles the Stoic proofs of God's existence, while at the same time defending Roman religion in his role as Roman pontifex. Many pagans considered religion a political necessity; philosophical scepticism provided them with a rational basis for relinquishing without resistance the inscrutable territory of religion to the traditional Roman cult.<sup>2</sup>

Octavius uses the contradictions found in Caecilius' speech as a starting-point, in accordance with good rhetorical traditions.<sup>3</sup> His own reasoning, however, is no less subject to contradictions. If the gods are just mortals, as is stated in chapter 21, this does not quite mesh with their being demons (chapters 26. 8–28. 6): Euhemerism versus Platonism! An advocate is allowed to neglect the exigencies of consistency. Some features, such as the retorsio criminis, the 'throwing back' of the accusation onto the accuser (e.g. 30–31), are reminiscent of forensic apologies. The Octavius is more than a scholastic thesis. Our text conveys a rather favorable idea of our author's literary technique, his striving for conciseness, his sense of form and his good taste (which only rarely fails him).

<sup>1</sup> For a different view (not convincingly): W. SPEYER 1964, 50–51.

<sup>2</sup> For a general account: A. WLOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, AHAW 1960, 2.

<sup>3</sup> Similar lines of argument: orig. c. Cels. 6. 80; also 3. 1–3; 3. 19; 3. 31–33.

Language and Style

For its language and style the Octavius is gratifying to read. Minucius opposes Fronto both in content and style. He avoids archaism and chooses Cicero as his model, an appropriate choice for the genre of philosophical dialogue, and one accepted even by Tacitus in his Dialogus. However, the Ciceronian surface is treacherous: for all its brevity, our text exhibits a great variety of tones and many ἄπαξ λεγόμενα. Minucius style, after all, wears the stamp of its own epoch: at closer inspection we notice late Latin elements, even though they are not numerous.<sup>1</sup> A telling example is the use of reformare<sup>2</sup> in a religious context (1. 1. 5). In Ovid, it had denoted rejuvenation (met. 9. 399); Apuleius had applied it to an ass being changed back into a man, in direct connection with a conversion to the cult of Isis (Apul. met. 11. 16. 6). Correspondingly, in Minucius reformatus and conversus are related notions.

Minucius shows a preference for metaphors and comparisons equally familiar to pagans and Christians: the sun is an image for God (32. 5–8);<sup>3</sup> the simile of the temple is applied to the human heart (32. 1. 3), following the precedent of Stoics and the Bible;<sup>4</sup> the idea of emerging from darkness to the light (1. 4), rooted in the venerable traditions of old mysteries, is associated by Christians with baptism; and finally there is the change from blindness to vision: even Caecilius, despite his name, will not remain caecus (cf. 3. 1).

Seneca also exerted an influence on his style. The increase of certain stylistic features is typical of the Second Sophistic period: in passages close to the diatribe (for example, 37. 8–9), we find brief rhythmical units, adorned with parallelism and rhyme.<sup>5</sup> Fortunately, such stylistic niceties are used with discretion, so that they are unobtrusive and not incompatible with the character (ethos) of the respective speakers.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> K. ABEL 1967; C. MOHRMANN, Les éléments vulgaires du latin des chrétiens, V Chr 2, 1948, 89–101; 163–184; esp. 164–165: camalis, vivificare, resurrectio; essential: J. FONTAINE 1968, 98–100.

<sup>2</sup> W. FAUSCH, commentary 31.

<sup>3</sup> Xenophon, mem. 4. 3. 13–14, used by Clement (protrept. 6. 71; strom. 6. 75) and other Fathers of the Church.

<sup>4</sup> Sen. fig. 123 HAASE; 1 Cor. 3. 16; 6. 19; 2 Cor. 6. 16; cf. also Lucr. 5. 1198–1203 (Epicurean).

<sup>5</sup> E. NORDEN 1897.

<sup>6</sup> J. F. O'CONNOR 1976 observed a contrast between the classicizing style of Caecilius and the style of Octavius which is less carefully organized into periods; for ethopoeia: J. FONTAINE 1968, 119.

The Octavius exhibits a continuous and consistent use of oratorical rhythm.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas I and II

Our author's ideas on literature are based on his ideas on education; in his case it is impossible to maintain our usual separation of fields (I and II). The theme of education is relevant to the dialogue as a whole. Reacting against the arrogance<sup>2</sup> of Caecilius, Minucius wants to show that Christians are no boors. There is Socratic irony in the Christian's turning out to be no less educated than the pagan. What is more, his victory is presented as a logical consequence of a thoroughgoing reflection on the very arguments produced by the pagans. The use of this method is additional support to Octavius' thesis (20. 1) that Christians are the true philosophers<sup>3</sup> (a variation of a famous Platonic dictum).

The theme of 'religion and superstition' is presented early on, at the end of the introduction (1. 5). Both orators are against superstition and for religion; however, both, using the same words, mean different things (13. 5 and 38. 7). This 'homonymy' seems to announce the agreement to be achieved at the end. In the course of the dialogue, both terms change their meanings for the pagan. Thus he is allowed to maintain his initial statement; only in the meantime he has learned the true meaning of 'religion' (vera religio).

The valuation of philosophy is subject to a change as well. Initially, Minucius comes to meet paganism even more than half-way; his attitude is reminiscent of St. Paul's speech on the Areopagus (act. 17. 22–31). Minucius agrees with Tertullian in ascribing to the unsophisticated soul an innate sense of the divine (16. 5); at first he even concedes more latitude to philosophy;<sup>4</sup> only at the end of his dialogue does it appear that his acceptance of philosophy is not unconditional (34. 6; 38. 5). Here, a distinction between different philosophies is imperative. Dogmatic thinkers of monotheistic convictions

<sup>1</sup> Konrad MÜLLER, Rhythmische Bemerkungen zu Minucius Felix, MH 49, 1992, 57–73.

<sup>2</sup> 5. 3–4; 8. 3–4; 14. 1; 16. 5.

<sup>3</sup> In this he followed Justin and Athenagoras.

<sup>4</sup> In 19. 4, for instance, a close relationship between Thales and Gen. 1. 2 is established.

are preferred to sceptics—including Socrates (38. 5). As for the doctrines of a single philosophical school, even here his assent is not universal: our author approves Stoic arguments in favor of divine providence, while rejecting Stoic determinism. His allegiance to Plato is qualified by ferè (19. 15). Minucius perhaps hints at his reservations against philosophy by the very fact that the whole dialogue is limited to the perimeter of Christianity, and that dogmatic questions are curiously absent from discussion. He shares Plato's view that ultimate truths are reluctant to be pronounced publicly. 'We Christians make professions of faith in public only under trial' (ibid.). Thus, Minucius makes a virtue of necessity. This attitude becomes even a kind of literary program. An aristocratic culture respecting the religious private sphere and disinclined to probe too deeply under the surface of things is congenial to his Latin mind.

Another theme intriguing both Christians and pagans is wisdom. The keyword appears in the introduction (1. 4); moreover, in the scene describing the setting the subject of the dialogue is announced (4. 4). Correspondingly, the victory over error is stressed at the beginning (3. 1) and at the end (40. 1). The theme of wisdom is firmly linked to the questions of whether knowledge is possible and if the truth can be attained. The identity of Christianity and truth is the core of the dialogue. In Latin, veritas means 'truth' as well as 'factual reality'. Octavius wishes to convince his partner through facts.

But why is the doctrine concerning Christ omitted? Before rashly suspecting that Minucius had not yet fathomed the depths of Christianity or that he represented some heretical, half-pagan humanism, we should take into account the situation of Christianity in that epoch. Christians and Jews were then the unique representatives of strictly monotheistic religions. In this regard Christianity agreed with most of the philosophical schools, and thus Minucius regarded them as his natural allies. The very genre of the protrepticus reveals the audience envisaged in the Octavius: our author wanted to win over an educated public. Given the 'exoteric' character of such writings, which were meant to attract people, all insider problems had to be discarded. This would explain the author's reticence in matters of theology.

Why does Minucius combat skepticism and not the mystery religions? This choice is in harmony with the intellectual level to which he aspires. Minucius stakes everything on one throw: taking the philosophers as his allies he gives monotheism a rational underpinning and by doing so implicitly refutes the polytheistic religions (including the mystery cults) without being compelled to attack them directly.

He stands up against skepticism not only because it had received a fresh impetus from Sextus Empiricus. Indirectly, its 'critical' reserve in matters of religion had done a great favor to paganism by creating a vacuum in which the old cults could be maintained and even newly justified. In the speech of Caecilius some contradictions inherent in paganism appear, especially the antithesis between philosophical skepticism and traditional superstition. Contrary to the speech of Caecilius—and also to Plato's dialogue—for the Christian Octavius the truth is determined a priori.

From the outset Minucius strives to give the discussion a philosophical character, and as early as 4. 4 has the pagan Caecilius make a suggestion to this effect. The intellectual claims of Minucius are not unlike those of the pagan propagandist Celsus: whereas Celsus advocates an alliance of all people of some intellectual level in paganism, Minucius wants to do the same under the auspices of Christianity, which in his opinion is the true wisdom.

To prove this, our author does not call up divine revelation but the testimonies of poets and philosophers. The list of the latter culminates in Plato, whose doctrine concerning the creator (Tim. 28 C) is assigned a very high rank: eadem fere . . . quae nostra, 'about the same . . . as ours' (19. 15); Plato's words would be perfectly celestial, were they not dimmed sometimes by 'politics'—probably an undue respect for state religion (19. 14). When speaking (19. 2–3; 32. 1–9) of God's indwelling in the world and in man, Minucius illustrates Stoic ideas with quotations from Virgil: Iovis omnia plena, 'everything is full of Jupiter' (ecl. 3. 60; cf. georg. 4. 220–221; Aen. 6. 724–727),<sup>1</sup> not caring that such pantheism does not hold true of the personal and transcendent God of the Christians. Passages such as 17. 2 on the connections between self-knowledge, knowledge of the world and knowledge of God are reminiscent of middle Platonism (Ps. Apul. Ascl. 10).

Minucius knows traditional proofs of God's existence: the 'cosmological' proof<sup>2</sup> (18. 4) starting from the order of the world which (according to Aristotle) presupposes an 'unmoved mover', as well as the 'teleological' proof<sup>3</sup> based on the principle of expediency inherent in Creation (17–18). On ‘natural’ theology he dwells longer than other Church Fathers. A third proof is based on ‘tradition’: Minucius takes poets and philosophers seriously as witnesses of religious truth. His reference to the Homeric<sup>1</sup> ‘father of men and gods’ may be inspired by Cicero, who in a similar context (nat. deor. 1. 2. 4) conveyed the same message by quoting Ennius. The survey of the history of philosophy (19. 14), serving to underpin the idea that monotheism is universally accepted (consensus omnium), originates from a passage of the De natura deorum (1. 25–37); although its speaker, the Epicurean Velleius,<sup>2</sup> pursues a completely different aim. In Minucius, Caecilius repeatedly uses political arguments, and Octavius, in the vein of Christian apologists, tries to prove the political reliability of Christians.

<sup>1</sup> Sen. fig. 123 Haase; epist. 41. 4–5; 83. 1; P. COURCELLE 1964; Lactantius would stress the differences (inst. 7. 3. 1; cf. also Aug. conf. 7. 1. 1–2).

<sup>2</sup> Aristot. On Philosophy; Cleanthes apud Cic. nat. deor. 2. 15; sap. 13; Rom. 1. 20.

<sup>3</sup> Cleanthes apud Cic. nat. deor. 2. 13; s. also 2. 97; Tusc. 1. 68; the 'functional' structure of the human body (18. 1; Cic. nat. deor. 1. 47), of the head (17. 11; Cic. nat. deor. 2. 140–146).

The arguments alleged against paganism follow the traditions of apologetic writers who in their turn had exploited pagan traditions of ‘criticism of Rome’. In opposition to the usual glorification of ancestors, Octavius states that the ancient Romans were far from being wisdom incarnate and that Rome did not owe its grandeur to the piety of the Romans. Actually their victories were not gained with the help of the gods, but against the gods, as is evident from the rite of evocatio (25. 7). In his critical attitude to the Roman state, Minucius is even more intransigent than Tertullian,<sup>3</sup> thus exhibiting a liberty of thought<sup>4</sup> which in pre-Christian times had been attained only by some of the most independent spirits. Our satisfaction is marred, however, by the fact that Octavius accuses the Vestals of immorality, thus debasing himself to the poor mental level of his enemies (25. 10–11).

Minucius’ criticism of pagan religion can be traced back to four traditions: the moralizing criticism of myths as attested from Xenophanes to Plato; the allegorical exegesis of myths as ‘physical’ phenomena (practised from the 6th century B.C. onward and especially popular among Stoics);<sup>5</sup> the rationalistic and historical interpretation of gods as deified great men in the wake of Euhemerus;<sup>6</sup> and finally

<sup>1</sup> 19. 1; Iliad 1. 544 etc.

<sup>2</sup> Examples of divine intervention in Roman history were quoted by the Stoic Balbus (Cic. nat. deor. 2. 5–11): Minucius made his material serve a new purpose.

<sup>3</sup> E. HECK 1984.

<sup>4</sup> Enhanced, perhaps, by a striving for independence found in several north-African authors.

<sup>5</sup> Minucius is our best witness for Chrysippus’ theology and his physical explanation of myths (19. 11).

<sup>6</sup> Minucius alone attests the doctrines of Persaeus of Citium (21. 2).

the insertion of gods into the middle Platonists' hierarchy of demons. Minucius indiscriminately usurps arguments from these areas without paying any special heed to their compatibility.

Transmission

The text is based on the Parisinus Latinus 1661 (P; 9th century). There the Octavius appears as liber VIII (octavus!) of Arnobius. The corrections in P are traced back partly to the 9th century, and partly to a humanist of the 16th century who was already using the editions of Sabaeus (1543) and Gelenius (1546).

The Bruxellensis Latinus 10 847 (B; 11th century) depends on P. More helpful for the restoration of the text is Ps.-Cyprian's Quod idola dii non sint, which is derived from Minucius (18. 8 tactu purior est).

A transposition within the text of chapters 21–24 is no longer considered necessary.

Influence

Lactantius, the 'Christian Cicero', is deeply in debt to our author. Jerome ranks Minucius among the classics of Christian literature<sup>1</sup> and discusses his style. It is highly probable that Arnobius used him.<sup>2</sup> Later authors writing about conversions<sup>3</sup> cannot ignore Minucius: Cyprian (Ad Donatum), Augustine (Confessiones), Ennodius (Eucharisticum de vita sua or Confessiones). His predilection for Cicero's De natura deorum<sup>4</sup> and Hortensius<sup>5</sup> became a model for later writers. Isidore of Seville (nat. 33) was aware of Minucius (5. 9), interestingly enough in a context of natural philosophy. As a matter of fact, Minucius had been intrigued by physics in so far as it supplied a proof of God's existence (17). In more recent times, Renan called the Octavius a 'pearl' of apologetic literature;<sup>6</sup> this does not mean, however, that Minucius

<sup>1</sup> References in J. BEAUJEU, edition, pp. cx–cxii; on Minucius' influence also Y.-M. DUVAL, La lecture de l'Octavius de Minucius Felix à la fin du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle. La fin des protreptiques, REAug 19, 1973, 56–68.

<sup>2</sup> H. LE BONNIEC, ed., Arnobé Contre les Gentils, livre I, Paris 1982, 56.

<sup>3</sup> P. COURCELLE, Les Confessions de saint Augustin dans la tradition littéraire. Antécédents et postérité, Paris 1963, 121–122.

<sup>4</sup> Arnob. nat. 3. 7.

<sup>5</sup> Aug. conf. 3. 4. 7.

<sup>6</sup> E. RENAN, Marc-Aurèle et la fin du monde antique, Paris, 23rd ed., 1925, 389; further references concerning Minucius' influence in: M. PELLEGRINO, commentary 1947, 49–50.

was a 'deist'; he might rather be called an ancient Francis of Sales who made Christianity acceptable to a sophisticated society.

Minucius opened a new period of Latin apologetic literature. Intellectually he was closer to Arnobius and Lactantius than to Tertullian. As a man of the world among the Christian authors, he insisted on the convergencies of philosophical and Christian monotheism; by adopting a non-theological way of preaching he strove to prove that Christianity is the only religion reconcilable with science. In fact, in the 3rd century the success of Christianity among the educated was largely due to its willingness to deal with philosophy and education. The exquisite style of the book was meant to attract the same audience. To his contemporaries Minucius proved that Christians were able to compete with pagans in the field of literature; for us, he is a witness to the regenerative strength of the Ciceronian dialogue.

Editions: Faustus SABAEUS BRIXIANUS, Arnobii Disputationum adversus gentes libri octo, Romae 1543: here the Octavius appears as the 'eighth book' (cf. octavus) of Arnobius (Adversus nationes). * Franciscus BALDUINUS, Heidelberg 1560: first ed. of the Octavius under the name of Minucius Felix. * C. HALM, Wien 1867 (= CSEL 2). * J. P. WALTZING (TTrC), Leipzig 1909. * J. VAN WAGENINGEN (TC), Utrecht 1923. * M. PELLEGRINO (TC), Torino 1947, repr. 1955. * M. PELLEGRINO (T), Torino 1950, 2nd ed. 1963, repr. 1972. * G. QUISPEL (TC), Leiden 1949. * J. BEAUJEU (TTrC), Paris 1974. * G. W. CLARKE (TrC), New York 1974. * B. KYTZLER (TTr), München 1965; Stuttgart 1977. * E. HECK (and others) (Tr), publ. by the author, Tübingen 1981. * B. KYTZLER (T), Leipzig 1982, repr. 1992. * W. FAUSCH, Die Einleitungskapitel zum Octavius des Minucius Felix (C), diss. Zürich 1966. * Lexicon: J. P. WALTZING, Lexicon Minucianum, Liège-Paris 1909. ** Bibl.: in H. VON GEISAU (s. below) and in the monographs.

K. ABEL, Minucius Felix, Octavius. Das Textproblem, RhM 110, 1967, 248–283. * B. ALAND, Christentum, Bildung und römische Oberschicht. Zum Octavius des Minucius Felix, in: Platonismus und Christentum, FS H. DÖRRIE, Münster 1983, 11–30. * M. VON ALBRECHT, M. Minucius Felix as a Christian Humanist, ICS 12, 1987, 157–168. * B. AXELSON, Das Prioritätsproblem Tertullian—Minucius Felix, Lund 1941. * J. BEAUJEU, Remarques sur la datation de l'Octavius. Vacances de la moisson et vacances de la vendage, RPh 41, 1967, 121–134. * C. BECKER, Der Octavius des Minucius Felix. Heidnische Philosophie und frühchristliche Apologetik, SBAW 1967, 2. * R. BERGE, Exegetische Bemerkungen zur Dämonenauffassung des M. MINUCIUS Felix, diss. Freiburg 1928, Kevelaer 1929. * R. BEUTLER, Philosophie und Apologie bei Minucius Felix, diss. Königsberg, Weida 1936. * W. DEN BOER, Clément d'Alexandrie et Minuce Félix, Mnemosyne 11, 1943, 161–

190. * V. BUCHHEIT, Die Wahrheit im Heilsplan Gottes bei Minucius Felix (38. 1), V Chr 39, 1985, 105–109. * F. X. BURGER, Über das Verhältnis des Minucius Felix zu dem Philosophen Seneca, München 1904. * A. J. CAPPELLETTI, Minucio Félix y su filosofía de la religión, RVF 19, 1985, 7–62. * G. L. CARVER, Minucius Felix' Octavius and the Serapis Cult, CB 49, 1972, 25–27. * G. L. CARVER, Tacitus' Dialogus as a Source of Minucius Felix' Octavius, CPh 69, 1974, 100–106. * G. L. CARVER, Minucius Felix and Cyprian. The Question of Priority, TAPhA 108, 1978, 21–34. * Q. CATAUDELLA, Minucio Felice e Clemente Alessandrino, SIFC 17, 1940, 271–281. * G. W. CLARKE, The Literary Setting of the Octavius of Minucius Felix, JRH 3, 1965, 195–211. * G. W. CLARKE, The Historical Setting of the Octavius of Minucius Felix, JRH 4, 1967, 267–286. * P. COURCELLE, Virgile et l'immanence divine chez Minucius Felix, in: Mullus FS T. KLAUSER, Münster 1964, 34–42. * P. FERRARINO, Il problema artistico e cronologico dell'Octavius, in: P. F., Scritti scelti, Firenze 1986, 222–273. * J. FONTAINE, Aspects et problèmes de la prose d'art latine au III<sup>e</sup> siècle. La genèse des styles latins chrétiens, Torino 1968. * P. FRASSINETTI, Finzione e realtà nell'Octavius, Athenaeum 46, 1968, 327–344. * E. GALLICET, Intorno a qualche passo dell'Octavius di Minucio Felice, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, vol. 4, Urbino 1987, 123–133. * H. VON GEISAU, M. Minucius Felix, RE suppl. 11, 1968, 952–1002; 1365–1378. * E. HECK, Minucius Felix und der römische Staat, V Chr 38, 1984, 154–164. * M. HOFFMANN, Der Dialog bei den christlichen Schriftstellern der ersten vier Jahrhunderte, Berlin 1966. * G. LIEBERG, Die römische Religion bei Minucius Felix, RhM 106, 1963, 62–79. * M. MÜHL, Zum Problem der Christologie im Octavius des Minucius Felix, RhM n.s. 111, 1968, 69–78. * E. NORDEN, De Minucii Felicis aetate et genere dicendi. Wiss. Beilage zum Vorlesungsverzeichnis der Universität Greifswald, Ostern 1897. * J. F. O'CONNOR, The Conflict of Rhetoric in the Octavius of Minucius Felix, CF 30, 1976, 165–173. * S. PEZZELLA, Cristianesimo e paganesimo romano. Minucio Felice, Bari 1972. * H. G. RÖTZER, Der Octavius des Minucius Felix. Christliche Apologetik und heidnische Bildungstradition, in: Europäische Lehrdichtung. FS W. NAUMANN, Darmstadt 1981, 33–48. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Zur Typologie und Literarisierung des frühchristlichen lateinischen Dialogs, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 23, 1977, 101–190. * M. SORDI, L'apologia del martire romano Apollonio come fonte dell'Apologeticum di Tertulliano e i rapporti fra Tertulliano e Minucio, RSCI 18, 1964, 169–188. * W. SPEYER, Zu den Vorwürfen der Heiden gegen die Christen, JbAC 6, 1963, 129–135. * W. SPEYER, Octavius, der Dialog des Minucius Felix, Fiktion oder historische Wirklichkeit? JbAC 7, 1964, 45–51. * I. TOMASELLI NICOLOSI, Pagine Lucreziane nell'Octavius di Minucio Felice, MSLC 1, 1947, 67–78. * P. G. VAN DER NAT, Zu den Voraussetzungen der christlichen lateinischen Literatur. Die Zeugnisse von Minucius Felix und Laktanz, Entretiens

(Fondation Hardt) 23, 1976, 191–225. * I. VECCHIOTTI, La filosofia politica di Minucio Felice. Un altro colpo di sonda nella storia del cristianesimo primitivo, Univ. di Urbino 1973. * J.-M. VERMANDER, L'Octavius de Minucius Felix, le règne de Caracalla et le pontificat du pape Calixte, REAug 20, 1974, 225–233. * J.-M. VERMANDER, Celse, source et adversaire de Minucius Felix, REAug 17, 1971, 13–25. * D. S. WIESEN, Virgil, Minucius Felix, and the Bible, Hermes 99, 1971, 70–91. * F. WOTKE, Der Octavius des Minucius Felix als christlicher λόγος προτρεπτικός, CV 1, 1935, 110–128.

CYPRIAN

Life and Dates

Caecilius Cyprianus was born into a rich pagan family, probably at Carthage between 200 and 210. His praenomen Thascius is a Punic nickname. By profession he was a rhetor; he turned Christian only in later years, to become very soon a presbyter. As early as 248 or 249 he was chosen bishop of Carthage on demand of the people and against the will of some clerics. He fled from the Decian persecution of Christians, which had begun shortly after, keeping in touch with his community through a regular exchange of letters. The Church was almost reduced to the point of schism by the conflict concerning the readmission of Christians, who had become guilty of apostasy during the persecution: at Carthage Felicissimus was ready to allow unconditional readmission, whereas at Rome Novatian would totally prohibit it. With great energy Cyprian convinced both parties to adopt a reasonable middle course. By doing so he strengthened the authority of the bishops against the confessores, who, on grounds of their religious merits, had unjustly claimed a status of mediators of divine grace to repentant apostates (lapsi). In the first half of the fifties of the century he devotedly organized sick-nursing during a destructive epidemic. In the eyes of posterity this made him a patron saint against the plague. He presided over three African synods which within two years (255 and 256) rejected the validity of baptism administered by heretics—in accord with the bishops of Asia Minor and against the bishop of Rome, Stephen (254–257). In September 258, during the persecution under Emperor Valerian, Cyprian was decapitated.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Acta proconsularia Cypriani.

Survey of Works

Ad Donatum: this account of Cyprian's conversion, containing also a re-proof of his century, was written soon after Cyprian's baptism. It is a modest precursor of Augustine's Confessiones.

Ad Demetrianum: against pagans the author tries to prove that the Christians are not guilty of the present disaster of the Romans (plague, hunger, and war). Since Cyprian is permanently citing the Bible to prove his case—a method wasted on pagan readers—scholars suppose that the book was written for Christians of little faith (a view demanding in its turn from the reader a considerable amount of faith).

Testimoniorum libri III (249/50) and Ad Fortunatum de exhortatione martyrii (253 or 257) are collections of biblical passages arranged according to subjects; these writings attest the text of a Latin translation of the Bible then in use.

De ecclesiae catholicae unitate: in 251<sup>1</sup> Cyprian simultaneously combats the Novatian schism in Rome and the partisans of Felicissimus at Carthage. The Church is where there is a legitimate bishop: habere iam non potest Deum patrem qui ecclesiam non habet matrem, 'he cannot claim any more that God is his father who does not have the Church as his mother' (6). The bishop of Rome is only primus inter pares.

De lapsis (A.D. 251): Christians guilty of apostasy during the persecution are supposed to do serious penitence before being accepted anew.

Edifying writings and sermons, some of them following Tertullian very closely, are: De habitu virginum (249), De dominica oratione, De bono patientiae (256), De zelo et livore (251/2 or 256/7).

The De mortalitate and the De opere et eleemosynis were written during the plague (252 or later).

The collection of Letters, which is an important historical document, comprises 81 texts, most of them by Cyprian; sixteen were addressed to him or to the clergy of Carthage. An appendix to this corpus are the official report on Cyprian's martyrdom and the Life of St. Cyprian, written by his deacon, Pontius (s. below, pp. 1580–1581).

Writings of other members of the early African Church have come down to us under Cyprian's name; not all of them can be mentioned here.

In the De montibus Sina et Sion a non-biblical dictum of Jesus is preserved: 'Behold me in your hearts just as one of you sees himself reflected in the water or in a mirror' (mont. 13). The Quod idola dii non sint can be considered a witness of Tertullian's text, which had been its model. The De aleatoribus is a popular sermon against playing dice.<sup>2</sup>

The Cena Cypriani, a literary joke, was written in all probability not earlier than about 400: Biblical figures assemble at a banquet; their typical qualities and attributes are exploited in a humorous way.

<sup>1</sup> Soon after the synod: M. BÉVENOT, edition 1972, 245.

<sup>2</sup> Ed. A. MIŁOŃSKI, Erlangen 1889.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Cyprian never names pagan authors but he shows that he is familiar with them. The Bible, which he quotes with a passion, was available to him in a Latin translation current in Africa at that time;<sup>1</sup> it appears from some misunderstandings that he did not deem it necessary to consult the Greek original. As a new genre of literature—both practical and problematic—he introduced biblical Testimonia in the form of a published collection, a tool for ‘typological’ exegesis of the Old Testament and, more generally speaking, a treasury of biblical quotations arranged by subject. The idea is not totally new: collections of biblical passages meant for internal use in teaching and in liturgy circulated in Qumran; Meliton of Sardes (about A.D. 170) had published Eclogae from the Old Testament. It is a matter of dispute<sup>2</sup> whether entire chains of quotations as found in early Christian writings (such as the Letter of Barnabas) are based on collections of Testimonia such as must have existed at least in the form of private notes. Beginning with Cyprian, the genre began to spread.

The corpus of letters was another new feature still unknown to Tertullian. It starts from the genre of the pastoral letter known to Christians from the beginning. The preservation of these letters is due to the towering importance of Cyprian to ecclesiastical discipline. Far from being simple letters, these epistles have a highly official character and a definitely rhetorical style; they often expand into treatises.

For Cyprian, Tertullian is the teacher (Hier. vir. ill. 73); he is his faithful vassal but he smooths out the sharp edges and replaces the disputed and difficult works of his master<sup>3</sup> with theologically inoffensive and easily readable versions. Like the latter, he uses Stoic patterns of thought when praising constancy under torture whereas he takes issue with Novatian's Stoic intransigence with respect to contrite sinners.

<sup>1</sup> In his later writings Cyprian's wording is often close to the European version; cf. in general: J. SCHILDENBERGER, Die altlateinischen Texte des Proverbien-Buches. I. Die alte afrikanische Textgestalt, Beuron 1941, 6–8 and passim; H. J. FREDE, Die Zitate des Neuen Testaments bei den lateinischen Kirchenvätern. Der gegenwärtige Stand ihrer Erforschung und ihre Bedeutung für die griechische Textgeschichte, in: K. ALAND, ed., Die alten Übersetzungen des Neuen Testaments, die Kirchenväterzitate und Lektionare, Berlin 1972, 455–478, esp. 463–464.

<sup>2</sup> J.-P. AUDET 1963.

<sup>3</sup> E.g. De oratione dominica, De habitu virginum, De bono patientiae.

He transfers categories of Roman law and politics into a new context. When Cyprian applies the term of iudicium dei to the election of a bishop, there is no trace of a Bible quotation, nor any other specific reference to Christianity. As a matter of course, Cyprian adopts the official language of Roman bureaucracy.<sup>1</sup>

Literary Technique

To illustrate Cyprian's literary technique, let us have a closer look at his book On the Unity of the Church. From the introduction onward, two antithetical biblical motifs alternate. Cyprian subsequently hints at them and gradually evokes them in the imagination of his listeners. Initially there is a vague inkling of danger; then the idea of slithering and creeping is added to be condensed finally into the picture of a snake, a motif originating in the Old Testament which at the same time prepares the later identification of the enemy with the anti-Christ. This warning against insinuation is itself a masterpiece of insinuation.

Secondly, the theme of the Church is prepared by the image of a house built on a rock (2-4); it culminates in the words of Jesus to Peter: 'Upon this rock I shall build my Church.' Three venerable images illustrate the fact that the unity of the Church is fully present in each individual bishop, since it is based on the same origin: like the beams of the sun, the branches of a tree and brooks issuing from a common source (5). The idea of mater ecclesia (cf. Gal. 4. 26) is unfolded in three steps: we owe to her our birth, our daily bread and the gift of the Spirit. Moreover, she is the bride of Christ, in contrast to the Adulteress of the Apocalypsis (6), and she is his seamless and 'undivided' garment (7). The metaphor of clothing continues: in the manner of Paul, Cyprian talks of 'putting on' Jesus Christ and of unanimity. Speaking thus, our author returns to the beginning (4), where he had talked of corporeal and spiritual unity in accordance with Eph. 4. 4–6. He again takes up the key concept sacramentum unitatis. The unity and uniqueness of the house hinted at in 2, come back in 8. Animals of prey are to be kept apart from sheep and doves. This is a complement to the initial snake image. The symmetrical structure of the imagery is simple and effective, all the more as the author's preference for black and white generates impressive contrasts throughout the book.

---

<sup>1</sup> J. SPEIGL, Cyprian über das iudicium dei bei der Bischofseinsetzung, RQA 69, 1974, 30-45; K. OEHLER, Der consensus omnium als Kriterium der Wahrheit in der antiken Philosophie und der Patristik, A&A 10, 1961, 103-129; expanded in K. OEHLER, Antike Philosophie und byzantinisches Mittelalter, München 1969, 234-271.

Roman ideas are predominant in the De mortalitate:<sup>1</sup> Here the militia Christi (following Eph. 6 10–20 and Tertullian) becomes a leading theme. The motif of test and trial (mort. 12) is equally Roman and Stoic: gubernator in tempestate dinoscitur, in acie miles probatur, 'the quality of a helmsman comes to light in a storm, in the battle-line the soldier is proved'. Suffice it to recall Seneca (epist. 108). The image of the tree (mort. 12) is equally reminiscent of Seneca (prov. 4. 16). The Lucretian verb vexari is superseded by emendari, which has Stoic and Christian overtones (mort. 13). Cyprian reads even the New Testament with Roman eyes: in the Bible translation he used, the divine Dynamis (2 Cor. 12. 9) had been Latinized to virtus; as a Roman, he spontaneously relates virtus to man and adds an explicative nostra. The result is human achievement instead of divine grace. For all his 'expertise', our exegete both theologically and linguistically is led astray by his Roman mind. Yet this error contributes to the unity of the book De mortalitate. Cyprian successfully applies the artifices of pagan rhetoric—especially insinuatō and evidentiā—to Christian themes, always respecting the Roman mentality of his audience.

Language and Style

Cyprian's language and style combine grace and dignity. They reflect the severity and exclusiveness of his thought. By preference he quotes biblical passages containing strongly negative statements, e.g. qui non renuntiat omnibus quae sunt eius, non potest meus discipulus esse, 'any of you who does not give up everything he has cannot be my disciple' (domin. orat. 19; Luc. 14. 33), or: nisi ederitis carnem filii hominis et biberitis sanguinem eius, non habebitis vitam in vobis, 'unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood you will have no life in you' (Ioh. 6. 53; domin. orat. 18). When explaining the fourth petition of the Lord's Prayer, Tertullian had made a positive statement (orat. 6): petendo panem quotidianum perpetuitatem postulamus in Christo et individuitatem a corpore eius, 'asking for daily bread, we pray to remain perpetually in Christ and being inseparable from his body'. Cyprian (domin. orat. 18) gives the same idea a negative and menacing turn: hunc autem panem dari nobis cotidie postulamus, ne qui in Christo sumus et eucharistiam eius cotidie ad cibum salutis accipimus, intercedente aliquo graviore delicto, dum abstenti et non communicantes a caelesti pane prohibemur, a Christi corpore separemur, 'we do pray that this bread may be given to us every day lest we, who are in Christ, and receive the eucharist daily as food of our salvation, should be separated from Christ's body through some serious crime, being thus kept apart and not participating in the holy communion'. It is telling that Cyprian invents 'walls' for paradise (epist. 73. 10. 3) For the sake of emphasis he does not shun overcharacterization: totam semel et solidam firmitatem inseparabiliter obtinebat, 'she inseparably obtained the whole and entire firmness' (unit. eccl. 7). The result is a clear and cogent style revealing the author's didactic gifts as well as his propensity towards 'black—and white drawing'.

<sup>1</sup> G. STRAMONDO, La personalità di Cipriano nel De mortalitate, in: Mélanges N. HERESCU = Societas Academica Dacoromana, Acta philologica 3, Roma 1964, 373–381; cf. further: L. BAYARD, Le latin de saint Cyprien, Paris 1902; H. KOCH, Zum Ablativgebrauch bei Cyprian von Karthago . . ., RhM 78, 1929, 427–432; J. SCHRIJNEN, C. MOHRMANN, Studien zur Syntax der Briefe des hl. Cyprian, 2 Teile, Nijmegen 1936–1937; J. MOLAGER, La prose métrique de Cyprien . . ., REAug 27, 1981, 226–244; L. D. STEPHENS, Syllable Quantity in Late Latin Clausulae, Phoenix 40, 1986, 72–91.

On the other hand his handling of language is graceful. Unlike Tertullian, Cyprian avoids darkness of style but is he equally devoid of the flashes of lightning typical of that author. The symbolism of colors and flowers has a poetic touch (epist. 10, 5): Erat (Ecclesia) ante in operibus fratrum candida, nunc facta est in martyrum cruore purpurea, floribus eius nec lilia nec rosae desunt, 'first the Church was white through the deeds of the brothers, now she has been made purple through the blood of the martyrs, and neither lilies nor roses are lacking among her flowers'. Synonyms and rhymes are typical of his style: Docet non tantum contemnendas sed et periculosas esse divitias, illic esse radicem malorum blandientium, caecitatem mentis humanae occulta deceptione fallentium, 'this teaches that riches are not only despicable but even dangerous, that there is the root of enticing evil that beguiles the blindness of the human mind by clandestine deception' (domin. orat. 20). Parallelism conspires with gradation in the following example: Ferae parcutunt, aves pascunt, homines insidiantur et saeviunt, 'wild beasts spare their likes, birds feed them, men cruelly persecute each other' (ibid. 21). Finally, antithesis is combined with a striking reversal: nam cum dei sint omnia, habenti deum nihil deerit, si deo ipse non desit, 'since everything belongs to God, he who has God will lack nothing; God will not abandon him, if he does not abandon God (ibid. 21).

The description of the dove representing the Holy Spirit (unit. eccl. 9) gives a good idea of Cyprian's all-pervading gracious prose rhythm: each punctuation mark is preceded by a rhythmical clausula, most frequently the cretic (or paeon) followed by a trochee or the double cretic.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Cyprian's thought is not centered on literature. His use of texts is nonetheless deliberate and telling: in the Testimonia he interprets passages of the Old Testament as prophetic announcements of Christ. Our author is not interested in historical exegesis; he rather wants to teach the Church—to which he gives all of his attention—how to read the Old Testament in the light of the New Testament; in the latter, 'pneumatic' and 'typological' exegesis had already been practiced.

Hermeneutics converge with rhetoric: our author collects the parallels, in order to enable each individual reader to 'unfold' them himself by means of rhetorical auxesis. As Cyprian puts it, he is furnishing the 'wool' and the 'purple'. It is up to the reader to produce his own 'heavenly garments' as desired (Fort. 3).

Besides, he even lets us know how he trained his students' and his own memory and how he acquired so quickly an impressive knowledge of the Scriptures and the fame of an exegete. Rhetoric<sup>2</sup> is a paradigm as far as the methods of learning and thematic categories are concerned; some titles hearken back to diatribe, such as adulationem perniciosam esse (3. 115) or De bono martyrii (3. 116).

---

<sup>1</sup> Simplex animal et laetum est, / non felle amarum, non moribus saevum, / non unguium laceratione violentum: / hospitia humana diligere, unius domus consortium nosse, / cum generant simul filios edere, / cum commeanat volatibus invicem cohaerere, / communi conversatione vitam suam degere, / oris osculo concordiam pacis agnoscere, / legem circa omnia unanimitalis implere.

<sup>2</sup> A. QUACQUARELLI, Note retoriche sui Testimonia di Cipriano, VetChr 8, 1971, 181–209.

Ideas II

Cyprian is a devoted teacher and a friend of order and discipline; to the latter he even dedicates a kind of hymn (hab. virg. 1).<sup>1</sup> The Church is for Cyprian, what had been the state for the Roman: a sacred and authoritative institution. Being a bishop he is concerned with ecclesiastical discipline and practical life: penitence, baptism, eucharist, charity. The modern antithesis of a 'papal' or an 'episcopal' idea of the Church has to be kept apart from Cyprian: it is true that he recognizes the bishop of Rome as primus inter pares; but this does not mean that he feels obliged to share his views in all matters.

A juridical outlook—as observed already in Tertullian—dominates religious life. Typically Roman is the stress laid on property: In the Lord's Prayer, 'our bread' for Cyprian has an 'exclusive' meaning: Christ, the bread of life, does not belong to everybody, but only to 'us', the Church (domin. orat. 18). Whereas Tertullian—according to his principle of tracing things back to their roots—had stressed the fact that the bread of life originates in the Word (sermo dei vivi; orat. 6), Cyprian, in harmony with his 'ecclesiological' view of things, insists on what he considers the 'property' of the Church and the exclusiveness of its claims. To Tertullian the daily celestial bread is an occasion to praise the generosity (liberalitas) of God to his sons (filii); Cyprian narrows the idea down to the institution and its orders. Tertullian's leading category is the 'word', Cyprian's the 'sacrament'. Even so, the term sacramentum is still very large. Sacramentum, the Latin word for 'mystery', for Cyprian is strictly connected with Christ's historical achievement and the men who are allowed to partake of it; it is the knowledge of the fullness of divine presence in the material world, the real incarnation of what had been foreshadowed by the figurae of the Old Testament (epist. 64. 4), which he consequently calls sacramentum Christi (testim., praef.); above all, however, it is the mystery (Eph. 3. 32) of the unity (unitatis sacramentum)<sup>2</sup> of the Church (unit. eccl. 7). The emphasis laid on the community is a Latin feature. It appears that Cyprian tends to identify the visible Church with the eschatological kingdom<sup>3</sup> and stresses its role of 'mother'. There are

<sup>1</sup> O. MAUGH, Der lateinische Begriff disciplina. Eine Wortuntersuchung, diss. Basel 1941.

<sup>2</sup> U. WICKERT 1971.

<sup>3</sup> G. KLEIN, Die hermeneutische Struktur des Kirchengedankens bei Cyprian, ZKG 68, 1957, 48–68.

Roman roots to such an attitude: pietas erga rem publicam. Ecclesia as a mother of sons (epist. 74. 6) recalls the figure of Italia in Virgil's Georgics (2. 173–174). The social qualities of Roman patriotism now find a worthy new context. Cyprian seems not to be aware of anything outside the Church, just as Romans had not cared for barbarian countries. He is not interested in God's first creation (nature) but in the second one (the Church); consequently, his biographer Pontius will not mention facts prior to his baptism. At that time a development of more self-assurance and stricter discipline within the Church was an historical demand; the civic spirit of the Romans offered a suitable pattern to follow. The deterioration of imperial authority under the military emperors facilitated the transition, of which Cyprian's writings are indicative: the ancient world was out of joint, and one had even to be grateful for this (mort. 25). Only a few decennia after Tertullian, the empire and the Church had changed.

Cyprian's narrow definition of the Church has to be seen against the background of his epoch: the conflict concerning the readmission of Christians who had become guilty of apostasy during the persecution as well as the discussions on the recognition of heretical baptism. What may, in theory, seem a reduction, in practice lead to an increase in seriousness. In any given situation Cyprian made a case for ecclesiastical discipline, even to the point of contradicting himself: against heretics, he stressed the authority of the Church, against over-generous clerics, he insisted on the limits of this authority: only God could forgive sins (laps. 17).

Transmission

W. von Hartel (edition, 1868–1871) distinguished two classes of manuscripts: on the one hand the Seguerianus (S), now Parisiensis 10 592, Suppl. Lat. 712, 6th–7th century, on the other hand, the recentiores (9th–11th century). Another witness, the Veronensis (V; probably 6th–7th century), now lost, had been used by the scholars of the counter-reformation, who edited Cyprian's writings (Rome, 1563). This allows editors to reconstruct many readings of V as well as the sequence of texts in that manuscript. The text of V probably can be traced back to an edition which appeared in North Africa soon after Cyprian's death.<sup>1</sup> a choice of about 15 and divides them into three classes. He reckons S among the second class; von Hartel had overvalued the independence of S, which is certainly old but not the only valuable manuscript. On the other hand, it is only with qualifications that S can be said to belong to the second class. The text of Cyprian has been frequently subject to interpolation.

Out of more than 200 manuscripts, M. BÉVENOT (1961 and 1970)<sup>2</sup> makes

<sup>1</sup> P. PETITMENGIN, Le codex Veronensis de saint Cyprien, REL 46, 1968, 330–378.

<sup>2</sup> Followed by M. SIMONETTI 1971 and edition 1976.

Influence

Cyprian's active life is more important than his writings—this is a good Roman tradition. In opposition to Tertullian, who discovered the Spirit in prophecy—outside the official Church—, Cyprian discovered it within the institution. His merit concerning the consolidation of the Church gave his writings immediately high authority in the Latin part of the Empire. Despite their relatively moderate originality in matters of theology and literature, they filled a lacuna since Tertullian was a heretic and Augustine was not yet born. It was Cyprian's name that preserved other early documents of African Christianity. Moreover, some parts of the corpus were translated into Greek and Syriac, although without a larger echo; evidently Eastern Christianity was not particularly attracted to Cyprian's subordination of the Holy Spirit under the official Church of the Son. The consecration of this subordination into a dogma by adding filioque to the third article of the creed would later (1054) provoke the great schism between Eastern and Western Church.

Important ideas of Tertullian were handed down to posterity by Cyprian. His collections of Testimonia, a genre unusual in the Occident and of great importance for the history of exegesis were frequently used by later authors like Lactantius. Cyprian also set his stamp upon the style of Latin pastoral letters; moreover, he influenced African hagiography.<sup>1</sup>

Lactantius was familiar with Cyprian (inst. 5. 1. 24; 5. 4. 3); Jerome compared his style to the gentle flow of a clear and pure source and excused the predominance of moral preaching over scriptural exegesis by the situation of the persecution (epist. 58. 10; cf. in Is. lib. 8 praeef.). Augustine, by profession a rhetor like Cyprian, took exception against his first letter to Donatus for the exceeding sweetness of its style (doctr. christ. 4. 14. 31), a fault which, in his opinion, Cyprian gave up later on. He praised the doctor suavissimus as an interpreter, especially for having taken so much gold and silver of pagan knowledge at his exodus from 'Egypt' (ancient Rome) to the benefit of his preaching of the gospel (doctr. christ. 2. 40. 61). Evidently Augustine had a very clear intuition of the intercultural function of early Christian authors. In several sermons (serm. 309–313) he exalted the martyr beatissimus; Prudentius did the same in verse. Bishop Agobard of Lyons (d. 840) wrote a poem on the transfer of his relics.<sup>1</sup> The authority of Cyprian in the Middle Ages is attested by the great number of manuscripts.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. DOLBEAU, A propos du texte de la Passio Marcelli centurionis, AB 90, 1972, 329–335.

Still Erasmus (d. 1536) would write under Cyprian's name a treatise De duplici martyrio ad Fortunatum. Later readers, according to their own inclinations, either admired his episcopalism or his statement salus extra ecclesiam non est, 'there is no salvation outside the Church' (epist. 71. 23). The Huguenot mystic and moralist Théodore Agrippa d'Aubigné (d. 1639) is more sympathetic with literary qualities and is inspired by Cyprian's graceful symbolism of roses and lilies, which recalls Virgil (epist. 10. 5; Aen. 12. 64–69).<sup>2</sup>

The spurious Cena Cypriani, written about 400, was a favorite of the Middle Ages and has recently become known to a wider circle of readers through Umberto Eco's book The Name of the Rose.<sup>3</sup>

Editions: Io. ANDREAS, Romae 1471. * W. VON HARTEL, CSEL 3, 1–3, 1868–1871. * R. WEBER, M. BÉVENOT, M. SIMONETTI, C. MORESCHINI, CC 3, 1, 1972; 3, 2, 1976; 3, 3, 1, 1994; 3, 3, 2 and 3, 3, 3 announced. * J. BAER (Tr), BKV 34, München 1918; 60, München 1928. ** domin. orat.: M. RÉVEILLAUD (TTrN), Paris 1964. * ad Donat.; patient.: J. MOLAGER (TTrN), SC 291, Paris 1982. * elem.: E. V. REBENACK, (TTrC), Washington 1962. * epist.: Chan. BAYARD (TTrN), 2 vols., Paris 2nd ed. 1961–1962. * epist. 1–66: G. W. CLARKE (TrN), 3 vols., New York 1984–1986. * laps. and unit. eccl.: M. BÉVENOT (TTr), Oxford 1971. * mort.: G. STRAMONDO, Studi sul De mortalitate di Cipriano (monograph, TTr, complete index), Catania 1964. * Ps.-Cypr. Adv. Iud.: D. VAN DAMME, Fribourg (Switzerland) 1969. ** Concordance: P. BOUET, P. FLEURY, A. GOULON, M. ZUINGHEDAU, Cyprien, Traités. Concordance. Documentation lexicale et grammaticale, Hildesheim 1986. ** Bibl.: Annually in REAug: R. BRAUN (and others), Chronica Tertulliana et Cyprianea, e.g. REAug 39, 1993, 441–464; cf. also the monographs, esp. J. W. JACOBS 1981.

<sup>1</sup> Texts collected e.g. on the first pages of the edition of Cyprian by I. PAMELIUS, Paris 1616.

<sup>2</sup> S. POQUE, Des roses du printemps à la rose d'automne. La culture patristique d'Agrippa d'Aubigné, REAug 17, 1971, 155–169.

<sup>3</sup> C. MODESTO, Studien zu Cena Cypriani und deren Rezeption, Tübingen 1992.

J.-P. AUDET, L'hypothèse des testimonia, RBi 70, 1963, 381–405. * M. T. BALL, Nature and the Vocabulary of Nature in the Works of Saint Cyprian, Washington 1946. * E. W. BENSON, Cyprian. His Life, his Time, his Work, London 1897. * M. BÉVENOT, The Tradition of Manuscripts: A Study in the Transmission of St. Cyprian's Treatises, Oxford 1961. * M. BÉVENOT, The Preparation of a Critical Edition, Illustrated by the Manuscripts of St. Cyprian, StudPatr 10, 1970, 3–8. * V. BUCHHEIT, Non agnitione sed gratia (Cypr. Don. 2), Hermes 115, 1987, 318–334. * H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Tübingen 1953. * G. W. CLARKE, The Secular Profession of St. Cyprian of Carthage, Latomus 24, 1965, 633–638. * M. A. FAHEY, Cyprian and the Bible. A Study in Third Century Exegesis, Tübingen 1971. * J. FONTAINE, Aspects et problèmes de la prose d'art latine au III<sup>e</sup> siècle, Torino 1968. * H. GÜLZOW, Cyprian und Novatian. Der Briefwechsel zwischen den Gemeinden in Rom und Karthago . . ., Tübingen 1975. * P. HINCHLIFF, Cyprian of Carthage and the Unity of the Christian Church, London 1974. * J. W. JACOBS, Saint Cyprian of Carthage as Minister, Ann Arbor 1981 (bibl.). * H. KIRCHNER, Der Ketzertaufstreit zwischen Karthago und Rom und seine Konsequenzen für die Frage nach den Grenzen der Kirche, ZKG 81, 1970, 290–307. * H. KOCH, Cyprianische Untersuchungen, Bonn 1926. * H. KOCH, Cathedra Petri, Gießen 1930. * G. LOMIENTO, Cipriano per la preparazione al martirio dei Tibaritani (epist. 58 Hartel), Annali della Facoltà di Magistero dell'Università di Bari 3, 1962. * H. MONTGOMERY, Saint Cyprian's Postponed Martyrdom. A Study of Motives, SO 63, 1988, 123–132. * C. MORESCHINI, Contributo allo studio della tradizione manoscritta degli opuscula di Cipriano, SCO 21, 1972, 244–253. * T. G. RING, Auctoritas bei Tertullian, Cyprian and Ambrosius, Würzburg 1975. * H. ROOZENBEEK, Pluvia deficit, causa Christiani sunt, Lampas 22, 1, 1989, 36–48. * M. M. SAGE, Cyprian, Cambridge, Mass. 1975. * C. SAUMAGNE, Saint Cyprien, évêque de Carthage, 'Pape' d'Afrique, Paris 1975. * V. SAXER, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III<sup>e</sup> siècle. Le témoignage de saint Cyprien et de ses contemporains d'Afrique, Città del Vaticano 1969. * M. SIMONETTI, Note sulla tradizione manoscritta di alcuni trattati di Cipriano, StudMed 3. ser. 12, 1971, 865–897. * W. SIMONIS, Ecclesia visibilis et invisibilis. Untersuchungen zur Ekklesiologie und Sakramentenlehre in der afrikanischen Tradition von Cyprian bis Augustinus, Frankfurt 1970. * U. WICKERT, Sacramentum Unitatis. Ein Beitrag zum Verständnis der Kirche bei Cyprian, Berlin 1971. * U. WICKERT, Cyprian, in: M. GRESCHAT, ed., Gestalten der Kirchengeschichte 1, 1, Stuttgart 1984, 158–175. * W. WISCHMEYER, Der Bischof im Prozeß. Cyprian als episcopus, patronus, advocatus und martyr vor dem Prokonsul, in: A. A. R. BASTIAENSEN (and others), eds., FS BARTELINK, Frankfurt 1989, 363–371.

Appendix: The Life of Cyprian, by Pontius

The Life of Cyprian, composed by Pontius a few months after the bishop's death, is perhaps the first Christian biography written in Latin and using a sophisticated literary form.

A vocabulary and imagery, typical of Christian texts—as prepared by the Passio Perpetuae—, is arranged and adorned according to the rules of rhetoric: in the introduction, the patterns of historical and oratorical prefaces are present, as are the clichés of panegyrics and manuals for rulers. There is even the justification of flight by divine order (best known from the Aeneid: vit. Cypr. 7. 14). Basically, hagiography is both history and praise; what had originally been praise of God began to degenerate, however, as early as in this document, into praise of a man—in full harmony with ineradicable Roman habits. The material is, quite traditionally, classified according to virtues.

The author justly emphasizes the close connection between Cyprian and his congregation: the Church supplants the Roman res publica. Pontius stresses Cyprian's imitation of Christ (imitatio Christi). As for great figures of the Old Testament, they are outdone by our saint. There is no information on his worldly activities, and even church-politics is almost suppressed. What counts is teaching, charity, and discipline. Like the Gospel according to Mark, his biography begins with baptism and culminates in the passio. In principle, the narrative follows history, but its sole concern is a man's way with God, the transfiguration of a person by the Spirit. From this point of view, however, real facts and individual features may obtain some independent value of their own, if reflected in the consciousness of the Church. Hence, Roman realism and national feeling find some continuation in a spiritualized form. This is a starting point for many biographies and autobiographies to come.

Of equal interest are the Life of Ambrose by Paulinus of Milan and the Life of Augustine by Possidius.<sup>1</sup> It would go beyond the limits of this book to discuss them fully. Roman adherence to exempla and structures of secular panegyrics are to be found there (s. pp. 464–476 Biography at Rome). For Rufinus s. pp. 1382–1383; 1662–1663; for Sulpicius Severus s. pp. 472–473; 1288–1289; 1383.

<sup>1</sup> Editions: Paulinus: M. PELLEGRINO, Roma 1961; Possidius: M. PELLEGRINO, Roma 1955; Paulinus and Possidius are also found in some editions of Pontius quoted above (BASTIAENSEN etc. and SIMONETTI).

Editions: W. VON HARTEL, CSEL 3, 3, Vindobonae 1871, pp. xc-cxiv.
 * J. BAER (Tr), BKV 34, München 1918. * M. PELLEGRINO (TTrC), Alba 1955. * A. A. R. BASTIAENSEN, L. CANALI, C. CARENA, C. MORESCHINI, Vita di Cipriano, Vita di Ambrogio, Vita di Agostino (TTrC), Milano 1975.
 * M. SIMONETTI (same texts, only Tr), Roma 1977. ** Index: (incompl.) in the edition by W. VON HARTEL, CSEL 3, 3, Vindobonae 1871. ** Bibl.: in: CC 3, 1, Turnholti 1972, xlv-xlvi.

A. D'ALÈS, Le diacre Pontius, RecSR 8, 1918, 319-378. * J. ARONEN, Indebtedness to Passio Perpetuae in Pontius' Vita Cypriani, V Chr 38, 1984, 67-76. * BERSCHIN, Biographie 1, 58-65. * H. DESSAU, Pontius, der Biograph Cyprians, Hermes 51, 1916, 65-72. * A. VON HARNACK, Das Leben Cyprians von Pontius. Die erste christliche Biographie, Leipzig 1913. * G. LOMIENTO, La Bibbia nella compositio della Vita Cypriani di Ponzio, VetChr 5, 1968, 23-60. * M. PELLEGRINO, Reminiscenze agostiniane della Vita et passio Cypriani, in: Augustinus Magister, Congrès international augustinien, 1, Paris 1954, 205-210.

NOVATIAN

Life and Dates

In the mid-3rd century Novatian was a renowned presbyter of the Roman community and its first Latin author. The tragedy of his life was not due to weakness of faith but, on the contrary, to his taking faith too seriously. He was scandalized at the overwhelming clemency of Pope Sylvester (251) against people who had become guilty of apostasy during the Decian persecution. At Rome an initially strong group tending to rigorism elected him bishop. After that, a Roman synod of sixty bishops excommunicated him. He is said to have died a martyr's death, probably under Valerian. There remained communities of the 'pure' (καθαροί, which is the etymological root of the German word for 'heretic', Ketzer) who followed Novatian's authority in East and West as late as the 6th century. Novatian's and Tertullian's fate is typical of the development towards a church for the masses which could no longer afford any archaic intransigence and in case of doubt rather sacrificed inspired individuals than its impact on the masses.

Survey of Works

His principal work, the De trinitate, may have been written about 240; its authenticity, which had been disputed, is now recognized.<sup>1</sup> The subjects are: the Father (ch. 1–8), the Son (9–28), the Holy Spirit (29), and the Unity of God (30–31).

Besides, there are letters to Cyprian and a treatise De cibis Iudaicis; moreover, some works of the Corpus Cyprianeum are ascribed to Novatian (esp. De spectaculis and De bono pudicitiae).

Sources, Models, and Genres

His numerous Latin quotations from the Bible diverge from the translations elsewhere known to us from that epoch. A source for Novatian's theology is Hippolytus, whose rigorism is congenial to our author. Irenaeus, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, and Origen are other writers consulted. There is, however, no Neoplatonic influence. Although Novatian is not a Stoic, there are traces of Stoic philosophy.<sup>2</sup> He feels attracted to syllogisms and considers the world an organic whole, a view which he confirms by quoting Virgil (8. 44 etc.; Aen. 6. 726–730). A detail from Seneca (epist. 122. 6) comes in the warning against drinking in the morning (De cibis Iudaicis 6). The presence of juridical terms and ideas does not prove that Novatian was a jurist.

Literary Technique

The train of thought is consistent: one after another, different errors are rejected. A striking exception is the brevity of the chapter on the Spirit as well as its hymnic form (29. 163–172); this chapter interrupts the chain of thought which is otherwise so stringent. If we exclude the idea of a later addition, we can explain the chapter rhetorically as an excursus (actually called for at this penultimate place in a discourse), which allows the reader to relax. Its emotional style is especially appropriate to the essence of the Holy Spirit. Moreover, the hymnic character of the passage echos the beginning, which might be called a quasi-poetic cosmology or a hymn of creation in the vein of the psalms.<sup>3</sup> The majestic vision also includes the heavenly hosts in hierarchic order, so that our world—after an impressive rhetorical climax—turns out to be the smallest part of creation (1. 8).

<sup>1</sup> Discussion in: H. WEYER, edition 1962, 11–14 (bibl.).

<sup>2</sup> H. WEYER, edition 1962, introd. 10, n. 28 (bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also Septuag. and Vulg. Daniel 3. 51–90.

Language and Style

It is clear from Novatian's mastery of language that Latin was his mother tongue. The term trinitas is nowhere to be found in the text, although it had appeared earlier in Tertullian. More than the latter, Novatian strives for purity of language. His style, dignified throughout and often sublime, is elegant and refined but not affected.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Novatian's reserved attitude shows in the absence of an introduction. Nevertheless the first words of his book reveal his literary intentions. He speaks of regula veritatis, not regula fidei, thus showing that he wants to present himself as defender of true faith against heretics; the text confirms this design.

Ideas II

There is only one God; he is the creator (against many Gnostics). Christ is the son of this creator (against Marcion), he is a real man (against docetism) and real God (against adoptionism). He is a second person along with the Father (against Sabellianism), however there are not two gods but one God. Novatian's theology is pre-Nicene: occasionally he seems to subordinate the Son to the Father, he still ignores Arianism and does not use Neoplatonic ideas.

His appeal to the conscience of the lonely individual in front of God has a modern ring. He holds that a man who lives strictly according to the Gospel is content to be judged by God alone (epist. 30. 1).

Transmission

The De Trinitate has come down to us among Tertullian's writings; his name guaranteed the preservation of the book. Instead of the manuscripts—all of which are missing—we have to rely on early printed editions (s. below).

Influence

Even Cyprian conceded that Novatian had facundia and eloquentia (epist. 55. 24; 60. 3); Jerome recognized the elegance of his Latin and compared him to Tertullian (epist. 10. 3; 36. 1; cf. Ambrosiaster on 1 Cor. 13. 2). The De Trinitate would be used by Gregory of Elvira (Tractatus de libris SS. Scripturarum).

Editions: M. MESNART in his ed. of Tertullian, Lutetiae 1545 (ed. princ.). * S. GHELEN, Basileae 1550. * J. DE PAMÈLE, Antverpiae 1575. * PL 3, Paris 1844. * R. J. DE SIMONE (Tr), Washington 1974. * cib. Iud.: G. LANDGRAF, C. WEYMAN, ALL 11, 1900, 221–249. * epist.: W. VON HARTEL, CSEL 3, 2, Vindobonae 1871. * spect., bon. pud.: W. VON HARTEL, CSEL 3, 3, Vindobonae 1871. * trin.: W. Y. FAUSSET (TN), Cambridge 1909. * H. WEYER (TTrC), Darmstadt 1962. * G. F. DIERCKS, Turnholti 1972 (= CC 4). ** Indices: in: G. F. DIERCKS, ibid. (incompl.). ** Bibl.: G. F. DIERCKS, ibid.

. A. D'ALÈS, Novatien, Paris 1924. * J. BARBEL, Christos Angelos, Bonn 1941. * H. KOCH, La lingua e lo stile di Novaziano, Religio 13, 1937, 278–294. * M. KRIEBEL, Studien zur älteren Entwicklung der abendländischen Trinitätslehre bei Tertullian und Novatian, diss. Marburg 1932. * B. MELIN, Studia in Corpus Cyprianeum, Uppsala 1946. * H. WEYER, Introd. to his edition, Darmstadt 1962, 5–32 (bibl.).

ARNOBIUS

Life and Dates

Arnobius was a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca in Africa proconsularis (Hier. vir. ill. 79) under Diocletian (284–305); Lactantius was one of his students but left Africa before the Adversus nationes was written. It was said that Arnobius, who had been an enemy of Christianity, was converted by a dream<sup>1</sup> and wrote his seven books Adversus nationes in order to dispel his bishop's doubts (Hier. chron. a. Abr. 2340).<sup>2</sup> The floruit given in Jerome's Chronicle is too late (327) and contradicts Jerome's own information in De viris illustribus. The error probably originates from a confusion of Diocletian's (304) and Constantine's Vicennalia (325/6).

<sup>1</sup> On dreams sent by God: Tert. anim. 47. 2 with J. H. WASZINK's commentary on 47. 3; Orig. Cels. 1. 46.

<sup>2</sup> The relevant passage in Jerome is probably an afterthought: A. WLOSOK, HLL 5, 366.

The 1st book was written around 300 (1. 13. 2), book 2 certainly in 297 or not much earlier (2. 71); both books are tightly linked. The 4th book mentions acts of destruction against books and churches (4. 36); consequently it was written after the first edict of persecution of 303.<sup>1</sup>

There is no hint of an end to the persecutions. Galerius' edict of peace (311) is probably a terminus ante quem for the entire work. Since the 7th book is evidently unrevised, Arnobius may have died before putting the finishing touches to it. It appears from the structure that the work was not published in one piece. Our author is not identical with Arnobius the Younger (5th century) who composed a Commentary on the Psalms.

Survey of the Work

The first two books are a defence of Christianity, though each can stand alone as a coherent unit. Within the framework of the whole, the important 2nd book is a double excursus on the act of faith and on the soul. The pentad of books 3–7 marks a new stage of the work. It combats paganism: first, anthropomorphism, including myth (3–4), then mysteries and cults (5–7).

1: Is it only after the rise of 'ungodly' Christianity that the gods are angry and punish the world by abandoning mankind? No: evil had existed before, and the Christian era has its great benefits; what is called an evil is often none. Wrath is incompatible with divine essence. The Christians serve the supreme God and—unlike the pagans—do not provoke his anger. Is it not scandalous to adore a crucified man? No: pagans worship deified humans, whereas Christ is God, as is proved by his miracles and the diffusion of his doctrine.

2: Christ revealed the true religion. Though promises are not strictly demonstrable, it is better to choose hope instead of hopelessness. All practical activities and even philosophical reflection presuppose some kind of faith. Some teachings of philosophers, especially Plato, are akin to Christianity. However, certain 'innovators' who usurp Plato's doctrines are in the wrong. The human soul is by nature neither wise nor immortal. Its origin is unknown to us. In any case the soul was not created by the supreme

---

<sup>1</sup> Bibl. in H. LE BONNIEC, edition 31.

God, but rather by some subordinate demiurge. Since it is essentially 'intermediate', it can perish if it does not know God or survive if it turns to God's grace. The root of evil is equally unknown, and persecution frees the Christian from the fetters of his body.

3: Christians do not participate in pagan cult; the supreme God whom they worship would include all others—if those were gods. Yet the pagans do not know their own gods, since they ascribe to them human qualities in conflict with the essence of divinity.

4: The personifications of abstract notions are absurd, as are the innumerable gods representing special functions, the manifold avatars of one and the same deity, and the scandalous myths which cannot be excused as poetic inventions.

5: The belief in myths is confirmed by the infamous rites of the mysteries. Allegorical interpretation is sophistry.

6: Gods cannot be locked up in temples or statues.

7: (Unfinished): Sacrifices<sup>1</sup> and plays are meaningless. The Christian idea of God is superior to the pagan one.

Sources, Models, and Genres

At first glance Arnobius gives the impression of being learned. Unfortunately, most of his references to sources are vague. Names, if quoted, have often been picked up from handbooks (e.g. 2. 9) or intermediary sources. References to Greek authors are especially frequent in passages containing criticisms of myths. Plato is referred to frequently in the 2nd book;<sup>2</sup> obviously, Arnobius took the Platonic passages mostly from his adversaries.<sup>3</sup> It is difficult to decide if these virī novi were Hermetics, Neo-Pythagoreans, Neoplatonists or Gnostics.<sup>4</sup>

Arnobius almost never quotes the Bible,<sup>5</sup> and in general has a rather vague idea of Christianity. But it must be kept in mind that he was living in pre-Nicene times.

Of Greek Christian authors, an adherent of Marcion should be mentioned as a source for book 2, and Clement's Protrepticus for book 3. Clement provided our author with entire chains of impressive

<sup>1</sup> Varro had already objected to sacrifices (Arnob. nat. 7. 1).

<sup>2</sup> The allusions 1. 5; 1. 8 and 4. 16 refer to the Timaeus; only the last passage is not entirely trivial.

<sup>3</sup> Or a handbook used equally by Tertullian (anim.).

<sup>4</sup> Cornelius Labeo (who is sometimes thought to have served as an intermediary source) is scarcely more than a name for us.

<sup>5</sup> Allusions 1. 6. 2; 2. 6.

names of Greek authors.<sup>1</sup> Arnobius' relationship to Origen's Contra Celsum still needs clarification.

Among the Romans, Cicero, as a precursor of Christianity, takes pride of place (3. 6-7); his De natura deorum serves as an arsenal of arguments against polytheism, especially in books 3 and 4. Arnobius' knowledge of Roman religion originates in Varro—not always through an intermediate source<sup>2</sup> (the notorious Cornelius Labeo?).

Arnobius is familiar with Lucretius and even subject to his philosophical influence. He repeatedly alludes to Virgil, though without naming him. Among the choice authors, whose names he parades, are Lucilius, Pomponius (of whose Marsyas Arnobius is our only witness), Ennius, Calpurnius Piso, Cincius Alimentus, Valerius Antias, Aelius Stilo, Trebatius Testa, and others.

The parallels with Minucius Felix, Cyprian, and especially Tertullian ought to be studied anew; the De anima is not used.

Literary Technique

To Arnobius, a born advocate, attack is the best defence. Thus he throws the accusation of atheism back on the pagans. If they were really concerned with the preservation of religion, they ought not to demolish Christian churches but their own immoral theaters and sacrilegious books (4. 36).<sup>3</sup> He protests, however, against radical defenders of paganism who were said to be willing to destroy Cicero's works (especially the De natura deorum), since these books witnessed to the truth of Christianity (3. 6-7); this passage anticipates some essential ideas of Augustine's Confessiones (3. 4. 7). Generally speaking, our author unmasks the contradictions inherent in paganism (3. 29-44); his own attitude to pagan gods, however, is inconsistent and varies according to the needs of his argumentation.<sup>4</sup>

It is part of Arnobius' rhetorical technique to overwhelm his readers with the very bulk of his erudition. He knows the unnerving power of detailed enumerations (4. 6-12). Sometimes he heaps up strange

<sup>1</sup> E.g. 4. 25; Clem. protr. 2. 36-37; H. LE BONNIEC, edition 38-39.

<sup>2</sup> B. CARDAUNS, Varro und die römische Religion, ANRW 2, 16, 1, 1978, 92; J. H. WASZINK, Varrone nella letteratura cristiana dei primi secoli, in: Atti del Congresso internazionale di Studi varroniani, Rieti 1974, publ. Rieti 1976, 1, 219-220.

<sup>3</sup> 'Whoever—even whisperingly—slanders your potentates is guilty of the crime of majesty; your gods, however, are despised and venal among you' (ibid.).

<sup>4</sup> H. LE BONNIEC, edition 1, 73-74.

technical terms of pagan religion (7. 24), or confronts his readers with grotesque pictures (as if he were an ancient Rabelais): we sacrifice our own victuals to the gods; assuming that the animals worshipped us as gods, the donkeys would offer us hay, the dogs bones, and the swallows flies (7. 17). Arnobius was cut out to be a satirical author. He might be called a Callot or Hogarth engraving in words. He reduces the idea of divine wrath to absurdity by conscientiously listing all the bodily symptoms of anger (1. 17-18).

In his criticism of myth, he is more radical than Lactantius, who was endowed with a better sense of poetry; to make up for this, the mordant irony of Arnobius is much more amusing. Should the animals erect statues of us in their own image, how would we respond to a donkey-shaped Romulus, to a Numa with a dog's snout, to a Porcius Cato in the image of a pig? (3. 16). Arnobius belies pagan anthropomorphism by systematically elaborating its ultimate consequences. With similar consistency he convicts Jupiter by presenting with much gusto catalogues of his all too human escapades.<sup>1</sup>

The author's talent for drama makes his work almost a dialogue; questions and answers alternate in quick succession, as in a cross-examination. He presents us with a Numa bargaining with Jupiter (5. 1), and five different Minervas all rivalling one another (4. 16). Sanctimoniously Arnobius pities his fictitious addressee for having to listen to some spicy stories from the treasury of myths (5. 20 and 28): the best way to highlight them.

On the other hand, Arnobius' temperament induces him to use hymnic language; his invocation of the Creator has an almost lyrical ring (1. 31). His praise of Christ (1. 38) rivals the Lucretian praise of Epicurus.

Language and Style

Arnobius' language is sometimes unclassical, for example in his use of cases, tenses, modes, prepositions, conjunctions, adverbs, and comparatives. Some editors have gone too far in normalizing such anomalies. Nevertheless, his Latin is not 'vulgar'. On the contrary, it is our author's intention to show that even among Christians there are educated writers. Even a deminutive like commodulum is used to enhance the grandiosity of its context (1. 9. 4). Certainly no one should talk any more of 'African Latin'. His vocabulary is unusually rich: there are archaisms, poetic words, many abstract nouns and, above all, entire lists of objects belonging to various areas, especially religion. Arnobius has a preference for precise technical terms. A flood of examples helps to give his ideas a vivid expression. Fullness,<sup>1</sup> one of his most important principles, gives his style a certain verve. At the same time, he respects the metrical clausulae to the point of making prose rhythm a valid criterion of textual criticism.

<sup>1</sup> 4. 22-23; 34; 5. 20-23.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Arnobius does not overrate literary qualities. He justly censures readers who, while admiring Cicero's style, overlook his wisdom (3. 7; cf. Aug. conf. 3. 4. 7). He defends evangelical simplicity while using himself a most eloquent style and harmonious rhythms: theory and practice oppose one another, as in many other ecclesiastical writers. However, there are very good reasons for this: Arnobius wishes to eradicate the prejudice of his readers (explicitly in 1. 58–59), who think that Christians are uneducated and have no knowledge of grammar. An excursus on the irrelevance of grammatical gender deserves re-reading today; it continues a discussion which had begun with the sophists.<sup>2</sup>

Ideas II

Philosophers supply our author with many arguments against polytheism. He even recognizes that some of their teachings pave the way for Christianity. His idea of a 'good' supreme God is reminiscent of Stoicism; but there are more features contrary to Stoicism: his scepticism, his energetic plea for free will (2. 65), and his fierce struggle against popular religion and allegorical interpretation (5. 32–45). While genuinely respecting Plato, he does not shrink from using Plato's arguments against their author (2. 36), and even competes with him by creating a 'Cave Allegory' of his own intended as a refutation of anamnesis (2. 20–23). Unlike other Christian authors, who rely on the 'holy alliance' of Stoicism and dogmatic Platonism, our author, being a non-conformist, borrows his equipment from his enemies: Epicureans and Sceptics.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. 7. 13 neque ut abigant averruncentque . . . adseri et causis caerimonialibus adplicari.

<sup>2</sup> G. E. McCracken, Arnobius adversus genera (I), CJ 42, 1947, 474–476; Varro had treated this problem in the 11th book of his De lingua Latina, of which we have only fragments.

The first (totally unbiblical) dogma of Epicureanism, saying that divine essence is free of emotions (Lucr. 2. 646-651), is not some incidental statement for Arnobius but a leading theme, as it had been in Epicurus and Lucretius. Other topics are: the mortal nature of the soul (2. 30 with explicit reference to Epicurus and in contrast to Plato and many Church Fathers);<sup>1</sup> the wretchedness of man, who is but a natural creature among others (contradicting Stoics and the book of Genesis); the non-existence of the torments of hell and of punishment in the other world (against Plato and the Bible); the irrelevance of religious rites (going far beyond Stoic and ecclesiastical authors); the struggle against popular religion (differing from Stoics and Platonists); purity of character and mind as a requirement (in accord with Stoics and the New Testament but put in Epicurean terms); a stress laid on free will (against the Stoics and St. Paul); the praise of the Savior as a teacher of natural philosophy (totally Epicurean: 1. 38; Lucr. 5. 1-54);<sup>2</sup> all in all, overwhelming documentation. In his day when dogmatic philosophical schools helped to sustain paganism, Epicureanism may have been an obvious choice as a means of intellectual liberation, since that school attacked popular religion more seriously than any other. Had Arnobius been an Epicurean in his youth? He had familiarized his student Lactantius with Lucretius. He admits to having been an idolater before his conversion (1. 39), which would be especially understandable in an Epicurean who wanted to be at peace with the City. The objection that Arnobius, given his passionate nature, could never have been an Epicurean is foolish: how about the no less colorful temperaments of Lucretius and Philodemus? Such a 'method' would even allow proof that no Church Father could have been a Christian, since they all lacked meekness and charity. The reason why Arnobius cannot have been an Epicurean,—at least at the time immediately preceding his conversion, is to be sought in a different area: epistemology.

It is Arnobius' profound scepticism that separates him from Epicureanism, which adhered unflinchingly to the reliability of sense-perception and the possibility of knowledge. Our author's view of man is pessimistic. Far from idealizing this life, he expresses his reservation concerning the Roman government, as befits a skeptical Christian and an African patriot.<sup>1</sup> His option for hope in a hopeless situation seems to anticipate the experiences of Pascal and some Christian existentialists. Hence, Arnobius is liable to attract critical readers. Basically, in his view, Christianity is philosophy, not religion.

<sup>1</sup> Like Justin and Theophilus of Antioch, Arnobius holds that the soul can become immortal only through God's grace (2. 32; 61-62).

<sup>2</sup> The order is that of the φυσικὰ δόξαι of the Hellenistic period.

Is it possible to define his creed more precisely? The idea that the supreme God is incapable of anger is reminiscent of Marcion's teachings. The same is true of a certain enmity for the human body redolent of dualism (2. 77), a tendency towards docetism concerning Christ's incarnation (1. 61 homine simulato), as well as the idea that the soul was not created by the supreme God but perhaps by some subordinate demiurge (2. 36). Behind our author's refusal to speak of the origin of evil there may be lurking again some kind of dualism, such as Marcion's hypothesis of an 'evil demiurge'. Some of these features may, however, be due to African Platonism.<sup>2</sup>

Transmission

The transmission is the same as for Minucius Felix, s. above p. 1565.

Influence

Lactantius, who is considered a pupil of Arnobius,<sup>3</sup> never quotes his teacher. He must have left Africa before Arnobius' conversion; it follows that both writers worked at about the same time, independently of each other.

Jerome attests that Arnobius' work enjoyed a considerable diffusion in the 4th century (vir. ill. 79). Firmicus Maternus and Augustine (civ.) show parallels with Arnobius without mentioning him expressly. The question of dependence is still an open one. The De execrandis gentium diis, wrongly ascribed to Tertullian, is very probably imitating <sup>1</sup> Arnob. nat. 1. 5. 6; 2. 1; 7. 51; cf. however 1. 14. 1.; for a criticism of the current idea of Arnobius' scepticism: A. WLOSOK 1989, 144; yet WLOSOK herself knows best that scepticism and Christianity are by no means mutually exclusive in many epochs.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. WLOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, AHAW 1960, 2, 225.

<sup>3</sup> Hier. vir. ill. 80; epist. 70. 5.

Arnobius.<sup>1</sup> Perhaps Arnobius even contributed to a 'Christianized' revival of the traditional genre of quaestiones.<sup>2</sup> Given the rather heterodox views of our author, it is no wonder that his work was put into the Index as apocryphal.<sup>3</sup>

More recently<sup>4</sup> Arnobius has been exploited as a precious source of information on pagan religions. After the Reformation he served as a storehouse of arguments against Catholic rites. In 1576, the antiquarian Justus Lipsius (d. 1606), the re-discoverer of Stoicism and a precursor of modern thought, called Arnobius the Varro Christianus.<sup>5</sup> The coexistence of pessimism and what might be called the 'wager of faith' would find a parallel in Pascal (d. 1662).<sup>6</sup> In the age of the Enlightenment—from Bayle (d. 1706) and Lamettrie (d. 1751) onward—readers began to feel attracted to Arnobius 'skepticism' and 'materialism'.

Editions: Faustus SABAEUS, Romae 1543. * J. C. ORELLIUS (TC), 3 vols., Leipzig 1816–1817, repr. PL 5. * J. ALLEKER (Tr), Trier 1858. * A. REIFERSCHIED, Vindobonae 1875, repr. 1890 (= CSEL 4). * C. MARCHESI, Torino 1934, 2nd ed. 1953 (corr.). * G. E. McCracken (TrN), 2 vols., Westminster, Mass., 1949. * Adv. nat. 1: H. LE BONNIEC (TTTrC), Paris 1982. * Adv. nat. 1–2: G. GIERLICH (C), diss. Mainz 1985. * Adv. nat. 3, 1–19: J. M. P. B. VAN DER PUTTEN (TC), diss. Leiden 1970. ** Index: L. BERKOWITZ, Index Arnobianus, Hildesheim 1967. ** Bibl.: A. WLOSOK, HLL 5, 365–375.

B. AMATA, Problemi di antropologia Arnobiana, Roma 1984. * H. BLUMENBERG, Das dritte Höhlengleichnis, Filosofia 11, 1960, 705–722; repr. in: Studi e ricerche di storia della filosofia 39, 1961, 3–20. * P. COURCELLE, Les sages de Porphyre et les viri novi d'Arnobé, REL 31, 1953, 257–271. * P. COURCELLE, La polémique anti-chrétienne au début du IV<sup>e</sup> siècle. Qui sont les adversaires païens d'Arnobé?, abstract in: RHR 147, 1955, 122–123. * F. GABARROU, Le latin d'Arnobé, Paris 1921. * E. GAREAU, Le fondement de la vraie religion d'après Arnobé, CEA 11, 1980, 13–23.

<sup>1</sup> E. BICKEL, Ps.-Tertullian De execrandis gentium diis, RhM 76, 1927, 394–417.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. nat. 2. 64 and 65; quaestiones appear among the works of Eusebius and in the so-called Ambrosiaster; E. RAPIARDA 1946, 29–30.

<sup>3</sup> Ps.-Gelasius, PL 59, 163; Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, ed. by E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ, Leipzig 1912.

<sup>4</sup> The note in J. TRITHEMIUS, De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis, Basileae 1494, 53 is worthless.

<sup>5</sup> After his conversion Lipsius was advised by Jesuits to write seven books (following Arnobius) against the protestants: J. L. SAUNDERS, Justus Lipsius. The Philosophy of Renaissance Stoicism, New York 1955, 45.

<sup>6</sup> Bibl. in H. LE BONNIEC, edition 68, n. 1.

- * O. GIGON, Arnobio. Cristianesimo e mondo romano. Mondo classico e cristianesimo, Bibl. internaz. di cultura (Roma) 7, 1982, 87-100. * H. HAGEN-DAHL, La prose métrique d'Arnohe. Contributions à la connaissance de la prose littéraire de l'Empire, Göteborg 1937. * H. HAGEN-DAHL, En Ovidius-reminiscens hos Arnobius, Eranos 35, 1937, 36-40. * K. J. HIDÉN, De casuum syntaxi Arnobii, in: De Arnobii Adversus nationes libris VII commentationes, 3, Helsingfors 1921. * E. KLUSMANN, Arnobius und Lucrez, oder ein Durchgang durch den Epikureismus zum Christenthum, Philologus 26, 1867, 362-366. * P. KRAFFT, Beiträge zur Wirkungsgeschichte des älteren Arnobius, Wiesbaden 1966. * R. LAURENTI, Il platonismo di Arnobio, StudFilos 4, 1981, 3-54. * R. LAURENTI, Spunti di teologia arnobiana, Orpheus n.s. 6, 1985, 270-303. * H. LE BONNIEC, Tradition de la culture classique. Arnobe témoin et juge des cultes païens, BAGB 4, 2, 1974, 201-222. * H. LE BONNIEC, Echos ovidiens dans l'Adversus nationes d'Arnohe, in: R. CHEVALLIER, ed., Colloque présence d'Ovide, Paris 1982, 139-151, repr. in: H. LE BONNIEC, Etudes ovidiennes, Frankfurt 1989, 145-157. * E. LÖFSTEDT, Arnobiana, Lund 1916. * M. MAZZA, Studi arnobiani 1: La dottrina dei viri novi nel secondo libro dell'Adversus Nationes di Arnobio, Helikon 3, 1963, 111-169. * E. F. MICKA, The Problem of Divine Anger in Arnobius and Lactantius, Washington 1943. * F. MORA, Arnobio e i culti di mistero. Analisi storico-religiosa del V libro dell'Adversus nationes, Roma 1994. * I. OPELT, Schimpfwörter bei Arnobius dem Älteren, WS 88, n.s. 9, 1975, 161-173. * I. OPELT, Ciceros Schrift De natura deorum bei den lateinischen Kirchenvätern, A&A 12, 1966, 141-155. * E. RAPISARDA, Clemente fonte di Arnobio, Torino 1939. * E. RAPISARDA, Arnobio, Catania 1946. * F. SCHEIDWEILER, Arnobius und der Marcionitismus, ZNTW 45, 1954, 42-67. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Arnobiana, RFIC 116, 1988, 198-202. * F. G. SIRNA, Arnobio e l'eresia Marcionita di Patrizio, V Chr 18, 1964, 37-50. * L. J. SWIFT, Arnobius and Lactantius. Two Views of the Pagan Poets, TAPhA 96, 1965, 439-448. * E. TULLIUS, Die Quellen des Arnobius im 4., 5., und 6. Buch seiner Schrift Adversus nationes, diss. Berlin 1934. * A.-M. TUPET, Une anecdote éleusinienne chez Ovide et chez Arnobe, in: R. CHEVALLIER, ed., Colloque présence d'Ovide, Paris 1982, 153-163. * A. VICIANO, Retórica, filosofía y gramática en el Adversus nationes de Arnobio de Sica, Frankfurt 1993. * A. WLOSOK, Zur lateinischen Apologetik der constantinischen Zeit (Arnobius, Lactantius, Firmicus Maternus), Gymnasium 96, 1989, 133-148.

LACTANTIUS

Life and Dates

Lucius Caelius<sup>1</sup> Firmianus (qui et) Lactantius<sup>2</sup> was originally active in Africa, which probably was his homeland. Jerome (vir. ill. 80; cf. epist. 70. 5. 2) calls him a student of Arnobius, whose work, however, has almost nothing in common with the Institutiones, except for the number of books.<sup>3</sup> Diocletian called him into his new capital Nicomedia as a teacher of Latin rhetoric; Constantine was probably one of his few students. Only as a middle-aged man did he become a Christian. After the beginning of the persecution under Diocletian in February 303 he retired from service. It was then that he worked on his Divinae institutiones. Towards the end of his life Emperor Constantine called him to Gaul as a tutor of his son Crispus. Among the ceiling frescos of a state hall discovered at Treves (Trier) there is probably a picture of Lactantius as a 'philosopher'

None of his secular works has come down to us, though we know there was a Symposion, a poetic Itinerarium of his travel from Africa to Nicomedia, and a Grammaticus. The wide range of this list shows that Lactantius defies the customary separation between 'pagan' and 'Christian' literature. Moreover, there were letters To Probus (in four volumes), two books To Severus and other two books To Demetrianus treating various subjects (meter, geography, philosophy). We know only that they were written when Lactantius had already become a Christian and that they were rather dull.<sup>4</sup>

Of the writings which are preserved, the De opificio Dei is without doubt older than the Institutiones (inst. 2. 10. 15). The De ira Dei is announced in inst. 2. 17. 5. The Epitome, too, was certainly written after the Institutiones, perhaps even later than the De ira Dei and the De mortibus.

It is more difficult to establish absolute dates, because of the question of different 'redactions'. Roughly speaking, the Institutiones were written between 304 and 311 during the persecution. This is sup-

<sup>1</sup> Not: Caecilius; authoritative for his biography: A. WŁOSOK 1989.

<sup>2</sup> Probably a nickname.

<sup>3</sup> Both Arnobius and Lactantius have dualistic tendencies, though not strictly comparable.

<sup>4</sup> Damasus apud Hier. epist. 35. 2.

ported by the fact that Lactantius rebukes the attacks launched against him by two philosophers, a defence which would have been pointless after the victory of Christianity. If this dating is correct, the dedications to Constantine (preserved in some of the manuscripts) and an allusion to Licinius must be later additions in a second edition. In a third edition, which appeared even later, perhaps under Constantius, the praise of Constantine was erased, as were some passages redolent of dualism which tried to solve the problem of evil almost in the manner of the Manicheans.

The treatise De mortibus persecutorum, today almost unanimously<sup>1</sup> ascribed to Lactantius, was written after the so-called edict of Milan in 313 and before the beginning of the open conflict between Licinius and Constantine 314.<sup>2</sup> The author, who had personally experienced the persecutions in Nicomedia, is called—(almost) like Lactantius—Lucius Caecilius; the dedicatee is the same Donatus as in the De ira Dei. There are passages, the content of which recalls the undisputed writings of Lactantius. In addition, we have a poem called De ave Phoenice, the first attempt of a Christian to write a Latin poem in the classical tradition.

Survey of Works

De opificio Dei: The author is concerned that his former student Demetrianus, for all his wealth, might neglect the treasures of the spirit (1); therefore he wants to teach him that man is a creation of God, both in body and in soul. We were given reason so that we could protect ourselves. Hence we are not underprivileged compared to animals who have natural weapons to defend themselves. We are no more endangered by illness and early death than animals are (2–4). Lactantius shows how divine providence operates in the body (5–13) as well as in the soul of man (14–19). The final chapter (20) announces a larger work, the Institutiones.

Divinae Institutiones: book 1, De falsa religione: monotheism is supported by logical and historical arguments. Sibyls and prophets, poets and philosophers bear witness to it. The pagan gods are nothing other than dead men, as Ennius said in the Euhemerus.

Book 2, De origine erroris: the distinguishing marks of man are his upright stature and his glance directed towards the sky. Why worship statues and stars? Miracles and oracles are the work of demons, the sons of angels and mortal women. To put it briefly: the pagans adore dead men, worship dead images and submit themselves to unclean spirits.

<sup>1</sup> Doubts concerning authenticity: S. ROSSI 1961 and D. DE DECKER 1970.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. I. OPELT 1973; according to J. L. CREED, edition 1984, this work dates from 314–315.

Book 3, De falsa sapientia: philosophy is meaningless; only God has perfect knowledge; man's capacity for knowledge places him between God and animal. Philosophers never agree among themselves. What is the supreme good? It is immaterial and can only be obtained by human beings, not animals, through knowledge and virtue: it is immortality. The foolishness of the wise of this world shows also from certain details of their teachings.

Book 4, De vera sapientia et religione: religion and truth cannot be separated from one another; salvation is knowledge of God. Prophets and Sibyls foretold Christ and redemption. The reservations of pagans against the doctrines of incarnation and crucifixion and the heretics' attacks upon God's uniqueness are unsuccessful.

Book 5, De iustitia: the educated despise Christian texts for their literary shortcomings. Attacks by contemporary authors have to be answered in perfect literary shape. The Golden Age celebrated by the poets had been the epoch of primeval monotheism. Polytheism began with Jupiter who usurped for himself the place of the unique God. Christ re-established monotheism. The firmness of Christians in persecution testifies to the truth of their doctrine. Philosophers do not know the essence of justice. True knowledge of God makes us understand that all human beings are equal; these are the foundations of justice. By deeming justice the greatest folly, Carneades<sup>1</sup> anticipates the pagans' verdict on Christians; in heaven, there will be a just compensation.

Book 6, De vero cultu: true worship of God is purity of mind.<sup>2</sup> We must make a choice between the narrow path and the broad road.<sup>3</sup> There are close classical parallels to these ideas; however, the first demand of Christian virtue (cf. Matth. 22. 37–40) is to know God and worship only him. The next step is the relationship to men: humanitas, which combines iustitia and misericordia. Its works are: redeeming prisoners, attending orphans, widows and the sick, burying the poor and foreigners. Although emotions are not bad by nature, theatrical plays are to be rejected for their voluptuousness.

Book 7, De vita beata: God created the world for man's sake, and man for the sake of the worship of God. His reward is life everlasting. Only man knows of God and virtue. World history takes six 'days'—6000 years; on the

<sup>1</sup> Cic. rep. 3. 21 (transmitted by Lactantius).

<sup>2</sup> Lucr. 5. 1198–1203; Sen. frg. 123 HAASE, apud Lact. inst. 6. 25. 3; cf. also Lact. ira 24. 8.

<sup>3</sup> W. RORDORF, Un chapitre d'éthique judéo-chrétienne. Les deux voies, RecSR 60, 1972, 109–128; A. HARNACK, Die Apostellehre und die jüdischen beiden Wege, Leipzig 1886, 2nd ed. 1896; from the pagan world, Prodicus and the Pythagoreans may be mentioned.

Seventh Day (to come after about two hundred years) the Millennium will begin; it will end with the Last Judgment. An eternal reward is kept for the just, eternal pain for the condemned.

The Epitome of the Institutiones was written at the request of someone called Pentadius. It is a considerably abridged version, but there are small corrections of detail, Greek quotations are Latinized, and occasionally it has been smoothed out to agree with our author's later writings. The idea of Rome's fall (inst. 7. 15. 11–19) has been omitted, perhaps in view of Constantine's success. There are even new quotations from Plato, especially from the Timaeus, more references to Hermes Trismegistus and a fresh supply of dicta from Terence, Virgil, Horace, and Ovid.

De ira Dei: the Epicureans ascribe to divinity neither wrath nor grace, the Stoics goodness but no anger. The former theory practically amounts to atheism, while the latter is intrinsically illogical and, what is worse, eliminates the fear of God. Christian knowledge of God is based on the rejection of idolatry, the belief in one God and his revelation in Jesus Christ. Man is made for religion. His good works earn him God's grace; his misdeeds, God's wrath. Anger is defined as an impulse to ward off sin. Hence we are allowed to be angry, but forbidden to persevere in anger. The Sibyls also attest divine wrath. We should live in such a way as not to deserve it.

De mortibus persecutorum: the dismal deaths of persecutors of Christianity are presented to warn the actual Emperor Licinius and perhaps to edify fellow Christians.

Sources, Models, and Genres

For the De officio, the question of sources is difficult. It is certain that the author used Cicero (wanting to write a complement to the 4th book of the De re publica), Varro (e.g. for etymologies), and medical and Hermetic literature.

The literary genre of the Divinae institutiones is complex, a fusion of an apologetic writing and a didactic textbook. This first complete, if imperfect, introduction to Christian religion adheres to the form of 'systematical textbooks' known to us from jurisprudence and rhetoric. As Cicero is his main linguistic model, Lactantius deserves the honorific title of Cicero Christianus. His immediate addressees are two unnamed adversaries: a philosopher who defends paganism and a judge who persecutes Christians, traces contradictions within the Bible and plays off the miracles of Apollonius of Tyana against Christ. To refute him, Lactantius must use philosophical argument and (unlike Cyprian) avoid Bible quotations. When he does use them, however, (e.g. in book 4) he draws upon Cyprian's Testimonia.

In all probability he consulted anthologies to find the numerous citations from Latin authors; unlike Minucius Felix, he does not shrink even from Greek quotations, especially from the Sibylline oracles.<sup>1</sup> He had been living in a Greek environment for a long time. Plato's thought is much more prominent in Lactantius than it had been in Tertullian. Our author viewed it, however, through the eyes of Clement of Alexandria and of the African Platonists. The latter were influenced by Hermetic ideas, as can be seen from the Asclepius ascribed to Apuleius. Moreover, he knows Theophilus' Ad Autolyicum. The references to Posidonius (ira 4. 7 and 17. 13) are second hand (with Cicero and Seneca as intermediaries). Lactantius is familiar with pagan Latin authors, and we are indebted to him for precious fragments from Ennius' Euhemerus and Cicero's De re publica. His favorite poetic authority is Virgil (quoted 83 times); Lucretius and Ovid compete for the second place. Even the latter (whose Phaenomena<sup>2</sup> he actually read) is called as a witness for Christianity against paganism. In the Phoenix the same three poets take pride of place. Among Christian authors, Minucius Felix is privileged, doubtless for reasons of style. Tertullian cannot be avoided, but his difficult style is subject to criticism. Lactantius does read Cyprian, but with a smile, since that author is able to convince only those who are already convinced.

The De mortibus persecutorum is a speech, for which Tertullian's Ad Scapulam was a precursor. The genre and the subject matter favor a rather passionate style. Stories of θεομάχοι both pagan and Christian are part of its background. The basic tendency is reminiscent of the books of Maccabees. In large sections of the work there is no need to search for written sources since our author is speaking of contemporary events.

Literary technique

Lactantius introduces into Christian Latin literature the literary technique of institutio, which had been developed for juridical and rhetorical teaching. The Institutiones are meant to show that Christianity is a necessity even from a pagan standpoint. This aim determines the choice of literary methods. A typical feature is his principle of treating each problem separately. He dedicates each book of the Institutiones to a single subject, which he discusses thoroughly, so that at the end of a book no doubt seems to remain. This analysis of isolated problems is prone to inconsistencies: our author fights Stoic doctrines with Epicurean arguments and vice versa. There is no ultimate coherence.

<sup>1</sup> In the Epitome he would Latinize the Greek quotations, probably in view of a different public.

<sup>2</sup> H. LE BONNIEC 1986 (1989).

The introductions to the books are important; a chapter on literature will be discussed below (s. Ideas).

Lactantius often illustrates Christian ethics by Roman images: the Christian confessor triumphs over Roman triumphators (mort. pers. 16. 6). The allegiance of man to religion is expressed in military terms (Seneca had given the oath of allegiance a spiritual meaning).<sup>1</sup> Christian theology is confirmed by pagan theology (Sibyls or Virgil). Ancient Rome becomes a parallel to the Old Testament. Non-Christian authorities are called up to prove that the Christian doctrine is a general truth to be recognized by all.

Language and Style

Language and style reveal an unobtrusive Ciceronian elegance, including prose rhythm.<sup>2</sup> After Minucius Felix, Lactantius is the first Christian Latin author whom even a fastidious pagan could read with enjoyment. Jerome, the Christian Ciceronian, praises Lactantius' style: quasi quidam fluvius eloquentiae Tullianae, 'like some stream of Ciceronian eloquence' (epist. 58. 10); he says that the De ira Dei was written docto pariter et eloquenti sermone (in Eph. 2. 4). A telling example of the Christianization of the vocabulary<sup>3</sup> is the change in meaning of humanitas. To Varro it had been education; to Cicero, mainly a moral attitude based on education; to Lactantius it is a disposition rooted in religion: religion generates love of one's fellowman,<sup>4</sup> and fraternity is born from our being children of God (inst. 5. 6).<sup>5</sup> As a result, Lactantius derives religio from religare 'to bind' (inst. 4. 28; against Cic.

<sup>1</sup> Sen. epist. 65. 18; vit. beat. 15. 7; bibl. in A. WLOSOK 1960, 185, n. 12.

<sup>2</sup> On this cf. e.g. E. HECK 1969 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> In general: C. MOHRMANN, Les éléments vulgaires du latin des chrétiens, V Chr 2, 1948, 89–101; 163–184, for Lactantius esp. 165–176.

<sup>4</sup> For the Stoic background of philanthropy: KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 5th ed. 1979, 707–746, esp. n. 48.

<sup>5</sup> R. LACANDIA 1967.

nat. deor. 2. 72, who had insisted on 'accuracy': religere). The idea of 'bond' reinstalls a concept of religion that had been combated by Lucretius (1. 932 religionum animum nodis exsolvere). Lactantius is not too particular about using terms which might have a pagan ring (e.g. Deus summus).

The De mortibus persecutorum is more emotional in style than the treatises. This is due to the subject-matter and the genre; similarly, Cicero had shown more verve in his speeches than in his philosophical works. Actually many a term of abuse is picked up from Cicero.<sup>1</sup> The vocabulary criticizing the emperors is mostly political and more pagan in character than Christian, not unlike the Historia Augusta and the Panegyrici: bad emperors are labelled tyrannus, bestia, animal, populator Italiae (recalling Hannibal). The Ciceronian character of many terms of abuse as well as their identity with those used in the Institutio are an argument in favor of the authenticity of the De mortibus. If Christian logic cannot always convince pagan readers, there are always specifically Christian terms of abuse, some of them quite spicy and pointed: persecutor (first attested here 1. 6) or praecursor diaboli ac praevius (2. 9). The emperor Maximian-Galerius becomes a source of black humor. The Romans deride him as a barbarian: the two bears he has as pets, are his perfect likeness in ferocity and stature (21. 5). However, he also deserves the Christian attribute of 'charitable', because he abolished poverty in his country: by drowning the beggars (23. 8).

Antithesis is prominent in his synoptic view (syncretis) of two 'wicked' emperors, Diocletian and Maximian, apparent praise ('unanimity') enhancing ironically the blame (mort. pers. 8. 1-2): quid frater eius Maximianus, qui est dictus Herculus? Non dissimilis ab eo: nec enim possent in amicitiam tam fidelem cohaerere, nisi esset in utroque mens una, eadem cogitatio, par voluntas, aequa sententia. Hoc solum differebant, quod avaritia maior in altero fuit, sed plus timiditatis, in altero vero minor avaritia, sed plus animi, non ad bene faciendum, sed ad male, 'what of his brother Maximian, who was given the name Herculus? He was not unlike Diocletian; two people could not combine in so loyal a friendship if there were not in them both a single mind, the same line of thought, an equal will, and identical opinions. They differed only in this that Diocletian was greedier but more hesitant, whereas Maximian was less greedy but bolder—though bolder at doing evil, not doing good.'

<sup>1</sup> I. OPELT 1973.

Prose rhythm is thoroughly Ciceronian in all of Lactantius' works. There is a preference for the 'fourth paeon' (i.e. a cretic with two short syllables instead of its second long syllable) in clausulae of the types esse videatur and corde sapientia.<sup>1</sup>

Lactantius' 'classical' tastes are shared by his countryman and contemporary Nemesian.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

As is shown by his critical remarks on Tertullian and Cyprian (inst. 5. 1), Lactantius wants to adapt Christian doctrine as much as possible to the ideas of his readers. He is fully aware that the bald style of the Bible and the imperfections of Christian literature (inst. 5. 1) are obstacles to the acceptance of Christianity by educated pagans. Christian religion needs good 'salesmen'. Like Lucretius (1. 936-950), he is willing to 'touch the rim all round the cup containing bitter medicine with the sweet golden moisture of honey', not the honey of rhetoric but that of celestial wisdom. Consequently he is concerned not only with good style but with a truly Ciceronian union of wisdom and beauty. Lactantius fully acknowledges Cicero's striving for truth (ira 11. 10). Cicero is also called up as a witness for man's being destined to practice justice, including the worship of God (ira 14. 4). Just as Cicero had done with the Roman historians, Lactantius censures the Latin Fathers of the Church: they have not fulfilled their task. Minucius Felix could have become a worthy defender of Christianity, had he truly dedicated himself to this assignment. Tertullian is knowledgeable in all fields but often rough and obscure and difficult to read; as an author he stands in his own way. Cyprian, the most respected of them, is a versatile writer, inventive and attractive; but he addresses insiders only, cannot convince non-Christians, and exposes himself to ridicule. Lactantius evidently favors Minucius Felix, a Ciceronian like himself. His verdict on Cyprian, bitter-sweet despite the abundant praise, is reminiscent of Quintilian's judgment on Seneca. With Lactantius Christian Latin Literature enters into a period of classicism. As so often, classical tastes are contemporary with a consolidation of central power.

---

<sup>1</sup> R. LACANDIA 1967.

Lactantius' reference to poets as witnesses of truth is an important fact which would be rich in consequences. The Christian Middle Ages and the Renaissance will rely on his explicit justification of poetry (inst. 1. 11. 23–25): Non ergo res ipsas gestas finxerunt poetae—quod si facerent, essent vanissimi—sed rebus gestis addiderunt quendam colorem . . . Totum autem, quod referas, fingere, id est ineptum esse et mendacem potius quam poetam. Nesciunt enim qui sit poeticae licentiae modus, quousque progredi fingendo liceat, cum officium poetae in eo sit, ut ea, quae vere gesta sunt, in alias species obliquis figuratationibus cum decore aliquo conversa traducat, 'so the poets did not invent the very basis of their plot—for if they did they would be completely irrelevant—but they added a certain coloring to the real action. However, to invent the whole story you write is to be stupid and mendacious rather than to be a poet. Indeed people do not know the extent of poetic licence, and how far it is permitted to proceed in the domain of invention, for the task of a poet consists in transferring real events into a different aspect and transforming them by means of indirect figurative speech and of a certain ornament'. Myth, secularized through euhemerism, is understood as history encoded in figurative speech; this makes pagan poetry and all its claims to truth acceptable even to Christians as quasi-historical documentation. Quamvis igitur veritatis arcana in parte corruperint, tamen ipsa res eo verior invenitur, quod cum prophetis in parte consentiunt, quod nobis ad probationem satis est, 'for although they partly corrupted the secrets of truth, nevertheless the matter itself is found even more true because they in part agree with the prophets, which is enough for us, as far as this proof is concerned' (inst. 7. 22. 4).

Consequently, Lactantius is the first to give a Christian interpretation to the First Eclogue (inst. 7. 24. 11).<sup>1</sup> He knows: in the Millenium to come, the Golden Age of the poets will really be here.

Lactantius even hints at the possibility of a Christian poetry. Beautiful singing should serve the praise of God (inst. 6. 21. 4–5). Christian poetry seems to be something new, like Epicurean poetry in the days of Lucretius. The poet of the Phoenix took the first steps towards giving aesthetics a Christian justification.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> L. J. SWIFT, Lactantius and the Golden Age, AJPH 79, 2, 1968, 153–155; P. COURCELLE, Les exégèses chrétiennes de la quatrième Eglogue, RET 59, 1957, 294–319; the authenticity of the interpretation of the Fourth Eclogue ascribed to the emperor Constantine is contested.

<sup>2</sup> A. WLOSOK 1990.

Ideas II

In his De opificio Dei Lactantius discusses psychological problems from the standpoint of skepticism. Christian ideas are almost completely left out, perhaps in view of Diocletian's persecution (1. 7; 20. 1). The identification of philosophers with the enemies of truth is in harmony with Tertullian's criticism of Plato, following a tradition inaugurated by St. Paul. Nevertheless, this treatise of Lactantius is definitely philosophical; it is even introduced expressly as a complement to the 4th book of Cicero's De re publica.

For Lactantius, sapientia and knowledge of God are inseparable; the same is true for religio and the worship of God. Immortality is the divine recompense for the labores hominum. In the Institutiones and the De ira Dei the problem of grace is not reflected thoroughly; partly Lactantius lingers over the Roman idea of do, ut des. On the other hand, there is a serious theological achievement: Lactantius combines the Christian idea of God with the Roman idea of the pater familias, who embodies the double function of punishing and rewarding, justice and grace.<sup>1</sup>

Like Justin and Clement of Alexandria, Lactantius came to Christianity through Platonic philosophy. He sees Plato through the eyes of African Platonism, which in the wake of Apuleius exhibits religious and Hermetic features. God is unfathomable to our knowledge; hence, revelation is indispensable (cf. inst. 1. 8. 1). In some passages which were later erased (by him?) Lactantius advocated a dualistic, almost Manichean doctrine of evil. It is true that only the most striking remarks on the topic were rubbed out. His anthropology starts with Gnostic traditions,<sup>2</sup> perhaps to please his readers. As a true Roman, Lactantius lays a special stress on the legal and juridic aspects even in matters of piety and mysteries. Between God and man there is a legal relationship; man offers his obedience and receives salvation as his due reward. No less Roman is the emphasis laid on ethics and active life. The antagonism between body and soul is reminiscent of the dualism of Stoic ethics. The virtus and patientia<sup>3</sup> of Christian martyrs are described in the style of Roman Stoics like Seneca. The idea that punishment is not an evil is again Stoic. The same school of thought lurks behind his passionate attacks on Epicureanism, which reveal a critical reading of Lucretius. It is one of his special contributions to Christian literature to have discussed the nature of man in the humane language of a Cicero or a Seneca. Though Stoic influences appear in the proof of God's existence, in the doctrine of providence, and in the proof of the perishable nature of the world,<sup>1</sup> Lactantius' concept of God is clearly distinct from the Stoic one, since his God is capable of anger. This could be called a spiritualization of the Roman pater familias<sup>2</sup> with his double function of exercising justice and grace against his sons or slaves. Classical philosophy—including Cicero and Seneca—mostly emphasizes God's fatherly goodness and has difficulty in imagining a God who punishes and judges,<sup>3</sup> although this is a familiar idea in mythology. Tertullian (adv. Marc. 2. 13. 5), following the Bible, returns to the traditional notion of father in the full sense of the word. Lactantius relies on Roman experience<sup>4</sup> for explanation. Pater, dominus, filius, and servus are 'juridical persons'. In this case Christianity helped to clarify a typically Roman idea—the concept of pater—in a manner very true to its origins.

<sup>1</sup> A. WŁOSOK 1956.

<sup>2</sup> A. WŁOSOK 1960.

<sup>3</sup> Inst. 5. 13. 10-15; 3. 27. 12-13; mort. pers. 13. 3; P. J. COUVÉE, Vita beata en vita aeterna . . . bij Lactantius, Ambrosius en Augustinus, onder invloed van de romeinse Stoa, diss. Utrecht 1947.

Lactantius' thought is centered on man and the universe: nostrum hoc officium est, sacramentum mundi et hominis exponere, 'this is our task, to explain the mystery of the universe and of man' (7. 3. 14). Man's relationship to God is impaired; without revelation man is unable to have knowledge of him. His upright stature, however, (cf. Lactantius' preferred etymology of ἄνθρωπος: 'looking upward', epit. 20. 9–10) is indicative of man's heavenly destination: according to our author, it is through baptism that man reacquires his natural upright posture and illumination. Through the mystery of baptism the light of wisdom flows into man, giving him intellectual power (inst. 3. 26. 10–11) and opening his mind's eye.<sup>5</sup> Knowledge of God is said to be the basis of the soul's immortality (inst. 7. 9. 10; Cic. leg. 1. 24).

In pre-Nicene times the border regions of the empire were not

<sup>1</sup> H. A. WOLFSON, Patristic Arguments against the Eternity of the World, HThR 59, 1966, 351–367.

<sup>2</sup> A. WŁOSOK 1960, 232–246.

<sup>3</sup> The Alexandrians—Philo, Clement, Origen—understand philosophically the 'wrath of God' as a 'metaphorical' and 'pedagogical' figure of speech.

<sup>4</sup> Eph. 54. 4; inst. 4. 3. 17; ira 24. 5.

<sup>5</sup> Eph. 1. 18; A. WŁOSOK 1960, 128–129, with n. 41.

quite up-to-date in matters of Christology. Because of this, Lactantius does not develop the doctrines concerning the Logos and the Holy Spirit and occasionally even confuses the two. He identifies the Holy Spirit with divine Wisdom (3. 26. 10) and denies his independent entity (ad Demetr. fig. 3 and 4 Brandt), a view labeled as error Iudaicus by Jerome (to whom we owe the fragment). Lactantius does not share Tertullian's traducianism: the soul is not transmitted from the parents to the children but comes directly from God (opif. 19. 4); in contrast to Plato, its relationship to God is not described in terms of kinship, but of creation (cf. Aug. conf. 7. 10. 16).

The De mortibus persecutorum views historical facts from a non-Roman standpoint. This is rather exceptional, since from Constantine onward an 'imperial theology' gains ground, blurring the difference between Christianity and empire. Thanks to this precious book we get a last glimpse of the period of persecution. His statement that a Christian confessor triumphs over triumphant generals shows a critical use of Roman categories of thought (16. 6). The Christianization of Roman ideas is the first step towards a Romanization of the Church. Our author views history as a theodicy: God protects his Church.

Lactantius agrees with Minucius Felix in considering Christianity the true philosophy (cf. opif. 1. 2; 20. 1). Christianity is more than religion: it is the revelation of the sole truth granting salvation. For all this, Lactantius is not a deep philosophical thinker. To give an example, in his doctrine of the evil he juxtaposes conflicting interpretations: is it the 'privation' of goodness, the enemy of goodness, or the logical contrary of goodness? Since his work is intended for outsiders, we should not expect him to discuss the theological problems of his day. His theology exhibits archaic features: binitarianism, adoptionism, chiliasm. On the other hand he tries to enrich Christianity with Roman life experience. By Christianizing what poets and philosophers had said about man he becomes one of the founders of a Christian anthropology.

Transmission

opif.: The manuscript tradition<sup>1</sup> is clearer than for inst. and larger than for the other writings: the Bononiensis 701, 5th century (B) is marred by interpolations despite its early date; the Valentianensis 148 (formerly 141),

<sup>1</sup> E. HECK 1969, esp. 274.

9th century (V), is free of intrusions, but packed with mistakes, the Parisinus Puteani 1662, 9th century (P), has a disfigured text full of lacunae.<sup>1</sup> The text has to be restored eclectically.

inst.: There are two groups of manuscripts: one containing dualistic and panegyric passages (Parisinus 1663, 9th century, and 1664, 12th century) and another in which these are lacking: Bononiensis 701, 5th century and Rescriptus Sangallensis 213, 6th–7th century).

epit.: Taurinensis (olim Bobiensis) I b VI 28, 7th century; for 51–68. 5, Bononiensis 701, 5th century; for 51–61. 6, Parisinus 1662, 9th century.

ira.: Bononiensis 701, 5th century, and Parisinus 1662, 9th century.

mort. pers.: The only manuscript is the Parisinus Lat. 2627, olim Colbertinus, 9th century.

Influence

Constantine's letters concerning the Donatist schism and his laws show Lactantius' influence.<sup>2</sup> The dualistic passages in the De opificio and in the Institutiones as well as the addresses to Constantine were deleted as early as the 4th century.

Jerome (epist. 58. 10) praised our author's Ciceronian language, without, however, concealing that Lactantius is better at combating paganism than at justifying Christianity. Jerome's contemporary Damasus<sup>3</sup> read—if not without a yawn—some of Lactantius' books which are now lost. Our 'Christian Cicero' attracted even Augustine. Apollinaris Sidonius knew of him. Claudian imitated the De Phoenixe. Isidore of Seville transmitted our author's ideas on poetry and truth to the Middle Ages.

Lactantius' works were proscribed as apocryphal in the 6th century since they lack the doctrine of Trinity.

The Phoenix is the first work of antiquity to have been poetically translated into a vernacular language: we possess an Anglo-Saxon Phoenix poem from the epoch of Cynewulf (about 800).

It is not surprising that Lactantius enjoyed high esteem during the Renaissance: he was admired by Petrarch and Aretino, among others.

<sup>1</sup> For a higher evaluation of this ms.: T. STANGL, Lactantiana, RhM 70, 1915, 224–252; 441–471.

<sup>2</sup> H. KRAFT, A. WLOSOK, edition, 4th ed. 1983, p. xvi; cf. also V. C. DE CLERCQ, Ossis of Cordova, Washington 1954, 69–75.

<sup>3</sup> Apud Hier. epist. 35. 2.

Pico della Mirandola called him the 'Christian Cicero'. Still later Milton, who himself had a penchant for dualism, read him. For many Renaissance thinkers, as for Lactantius, anthropology was a central problem, and they shared the Neoplatonic taste for discovering convergences of wisdom and religion. For these authors and Lactantius poetry could make a serious claim to factual truth. Petrarch referred to our author on the occasion of his coronation as a poet.<sup>1</sup> Just as in Lactantius' day, there was a revival of Roman humanism through the works of Cicero, who had filled Hellenistic philosophy with Roman life experience, thus allowing it to outlive the Roman empire. Man as the 'crown of creation' (divini opificii summum), a Christian and Stoic idea, was essential for Lactantius (ira 13. 13). The notorious saying that our world is 'the best of all possible worlds' (Leibniz)<sup>2</sup> and the corresponding 'natural' proof of God's existence are ultimately based on Stoic ideas condensed by Lactantius (ira 10. 41).

The De mortibus persecutorum, which dealt with contemporary history, was discovered late; Baluze edited it in 1679. For a long time its historical value was contested; today it is held in higher esteem. The crossing of two genres—the rhetorical pamphlet and the historical report—seems to be typical of periods of persecution; in our century, Solzhenitsyn would revive this literary form.

It is difficult to do Lactantius justice when reading him from an exclusively theological standpoint. Nor can we dismiss him as a mere belletrist or moralist. His great theme was the nature of man. He was the first to create a comprehensive Christian anthropology in the Latin language. Accordingly, classical Roman literature gained new importance for him as a treasury of examples. Lactantius put into a new Christian context what classical authors had said about man. There were many Roman elements in his thought; as the Cicero of his day he heralded a renaissance. Christianity had now begun to spread over the entire empire, and Lactantius' intended audience was universal. On an individual level his message was meant for the human being as a whole, not only for the 'soul'. As a representative of the educated class, he was aware that reason and intellect were equally entitled to be Christianized. The same was true of the human body, the temple of the Holy Spirit. In the context of baptism and the acceptance of salvation, the upright attitude of man became for Lactantius a symbol of human dignity (cf. inst. 7. 9. 11; 7. 5. 22).

<sup>1</sup> A. BUCK, Italienische Dichtungslehren vom Mittelalter bis zum Ausgang der Renaissance, Tübingen 1952, 73.

<sup>2</sup> Théodicée (1710) I. 8: S'il n'y avait pas le meilleur (optimum) parmi tous les mondes possibles, Dieu n'en aurait produit aucun (against Pierre Bayle).

Editions: C. SWEYNHEIM, A. PANNARTZ, Subiaco 1465 (inst., ira, opif.). * epit. 51–68: VENDELINUS DE SPIRA, Venetiis 1472. * epit. (first full text): M. PFAFF, Paris 1712. * Complete editions: Chr. CELLARIUS, Lipsiae 1698. * J. L. BÜNEMANN (TC), Lipsiae 1739. * S. BRANDT, G. LAUBMANN, CSEL 19, 1890; 27, 1, 1893; 27, 2, 1897; repr. 1965. * mort., ira, opif., epit.: A. HARTL, A. KNAPPITSCH (Tr), BKV 36, Kempten 2nd ed. 1919. * epit.: M. PERRIN (TTrN, ind.) = SC 335, Paris 1987. * E. HECK, A. WLOSOK, Stuttgart 1994. * inst., opif., ira: U. BOELLA, Firenze 1973. * inst.: M. F. McDONALD (Tr), Washington 1964. * inst. 1: P. MONAT (TTrN) = SC 326, Paris 1986. * inst. 2: P. MONAT (TTrN) = SC 337, Paris 1987. * inst. 4: P. MONAT (TTrN) = SC 377, Paris 1992. * inst. 5: P. MONAT (TTrN) = SC 204; 205, Paris 1973. * H. HROSA (TC), München 1963. * ira: H. KRAFT, A. WLOSOK (TTrN), Darmstadt 1957, 4th ed. 1983. * C. INGREMEAU (TTrN) = SC 289, Paris 1982. * mort. pers.: F. CORSARO (TTr), Catania 1970. * J. MOREAU (TTrC), 2 vols., Paris 1954, reprinted 1965. * J. L. CREED (TTrC), Oxford 1984. * J. ROUGÉ (TTr, announced). * opif.: M. PERRIN (TTrN) = SC 213; 214, Paris 1974. * Phoen.: A. ANGLADA ANFRUNS (TTrC), Barcelona 1984. * H. KRAFT (Tr), in: H.K., Die Kirchenväter bis zum Konzil von Nicäa, Bremen 1966, 462–467. * Scripta minora: M. F. McDONALD (Tr), Washington 1965. ** Index: in CSEL (s. above; incompl.); in the separate editions by P. MONAT and M. PERRIN (s. above; incompl.). ** Bibl.: E. HECK, to be publ. in: ANRW 3 (Late Antiquity). * E. HECK 1972, 203–207. * C. INGREMEAU, ed. ira 373–380. * T. P. HALTON, R. D. SIDER, in: A Decade of Patristic Scholarship 1970–1979, I: CW 75, 1982–1983, 65–127; esp. 125–127.

L. ALFONSI, Cultura classica e cristianesimo. L'impostazione del problema nel proemio delle Divinae institutiones di Lattanzio e nell'epist. 16 di Paolino da Nola, P&I 8, 1966, 163–176. * F. AMARELLI, Il De mortibus persecutorum nei suoi rapporti con l'ideologia coeva, SDHI 36, 1970, 207–264. * F. AMARELLI, Vetustas—Innovatio, Napoli 1978. * A. BENDER, Die natürliche Gotteserkenntnis bei Laktanz und seinen apologetischen Vorgängern, Bern 1983. * H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Lateinische Kirchenväter, Stuttgart 1960, 3rd ed. 1973, 57–76. * F. CORSARO, Lactantiana. Sul De mortibus persecutorum, Catania 1970. * G. CRESCENTI, Rilievi al De mortibus persecutorum di Cecilio Firmiano Lattanzio. Studio critico, Messina 1964. * A. S. CHRISTENSEN, Lactantius the Historian. An Analysis of the De mortibus persecutorum, Copenhagen 1980. * J. FONTAINE, Permanencia y mutaciones de los géneros literarios clásicos de Tertuliano a Lactancio, Actos 3 Congreso Español de Estudios Clásicos, Madrid 1968, 2, 126–136. * J. FONTAINE, M. PERRIN, eds., Lactance et son temps, Paris 1978. * O. GIGON, Lactantius und die Philosophie, in:

Kerygma und Logos. Beiträge zu den geistesgeschichtlichen Beziehungen zwischen Antike und Christentum, FS C. ANDRESEN, Göttingen 1979, 196–213. * R. GLEI, Et invidus et inbecillus. Das angebliche Epikurfragment bei Laktanz, De ira dei 13, 20–21, V Chr 42, 1, 1988, 47–58. * E. HECK, MH ΘEOMAXEIN oder: Die Bestrafung des Gottesverächters, Frankfurt 1987. * E. HECK, Bemerkungen zum Text von Laktanz, De officio dei, V Chr 23, 1969, 273–292. * E. HECK, Die dualistischen Zusätze und die Kaiseranreden bei Lactantius, AHAW 1972, 2. * E. HECK, Lactanz und die Klassiker. Zu Theorie und Praxis der Verwendung heidnischer Literatur in christlicher Apologetik bei Lactanz, Philologus 132, 1988, 160–179. * J. HUBAUX, M. LEROY, Le mythe du Phénix dans les littératures grecque et latine, Paris, Liège 1939. * W. KIRSCH, Triebkräfte der historischen Entwicklung bei Laktanz, Klio 66, 1984, 624–630. * W. KIRSCH, Textimmanenz und Texttranszendenz bei Interpretation literarischer Kunstwerke, am Beispiel des Phoenix-Gedichts des Laktanz, WZRostock 34, 1, 1985, 26–28. * I. KÖNIG, Lactanz und das ‘System’ der Tetrarchie, Labeo 32, 1986, 180–193. * R. LACANDIA, Forme sentenziose in Lattanzio, VetChr 4, 1967, 73–83. * H. LE BONNIEC, Une interprétation chrétienne de la mythologie gréco-latine. L’exploitation apologétique d’Ovide par Lactance, in: La mythologie, clef de lecture du monde classique, hommage à R. CHEVALLIER, Tours 1986, 75–87, repr. in: H. LE BONNIEC, Etudes ovidiennes, Frankfurt 1989, 159–172. * V. LOI, Lattanzio nella storia del linguaggio e del pensiero teologico pre-niceno, Zürich 1970 (older publ. by the same author quoted ibid.). * P. MONAT, Lactance et la Bible. Une propédeutique latine à la lecture de la Bible dans l’Occident constantinien, Paris 1982. * C. OCKER, Unius arbitrio mundum regi necesse est. Lactantius’ Concern for the Preservation of Roman Society, V Chr 40, 1986, 348–364. * R. M. OGILVIE, The Library of Lactantius, Oxford 1978. * I. OPELT, Formen der Polemik im Pamphlet De mortibus persecutorum, JbAC 16, 1973, 98–105. * J.-R. PALANQUE, Sur la date du De mortibus persecutorum, Mélanges J. CARCOPINO, Paris 1966, 711–716. * M. PERRIN, Quelques observations sur la conception de la mort et de l’eschatologie de Lactance, BAGB 1987, 1, 12–24. * R. PICHON, Lactance. Étude sur le mouvement philosophique et religieux sous le règne de Constantin, Thèse Paris 1901. * D. PIETRUSIŃSKY, Quid Lactantius de ethnicorum philosophia, litteris, eloquentia iudicaverit . . ., Latinitas 12, 1964, 274–279. * S. ROSSI, Il concetto di Storia e la prassi storiografica di Lattanzio e del De mortibus persecutorum, GIF 14, 1961, 193–213. * J. SPEIGL, Zum Kirchenbegriff des Laktanz, RQA 65, 1970, 15–28. * J. STEVENSON, The Epitome of Lactantius, Divinae Institutiones, StudPatr 7, 1963, publ. 1966, 291–298. * B. STOCK, Cosmology and Rhetoric in the Phoenix of Lactantius, C&M 26, 1965, 246–257. * L. J. SWIFT, Arnobius and Lactantius: Two Views of the Pagan Poets, TAPhA 96, 1965, 439–448. * L. J. SWIFT, Lactantius and the Golden Age, AJPh 89, 1968, 144–156. * H. W. A. VAN ROOIJEN DIJKMAN, De vita beata. Het zevende boek van de Divinae institutiones van Lactantius. Analyse en bronnenonderzoek, diss. Leiden, Assen 1967. * M. WALLA, Der Vogel Phoenix in der antiken Literatur und der Dichtung des Laktanz, diss. Wien 1965, publ. 1969. * F. WEHRLI, L. Caelius Firmianus Lactantius über die Geschichte des wahren Gottesglaubens, in: Studies P. MERLAN, The Hague 1971, 251–263. * A. WŁOSOK, Zur Gottesvorstellung bei Laktanz, in: Hermeneia. FS O. REGENBOGEN, Heidelberg 1956, 129–147. * A. WŁOSOK, Die Rechtsgrundlagen der Christenverfolgungen der ersten zwei Jh., Gymnasium 66, 1959, 14–32. * A. WŁOSOK, Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis. Untersuchungen zu Geschichte und Terminologie der gnostischen Erlösungsvorstellung, AHAW 1960, 2. * A. WŁOSOK, Die Anfänge christlicher Poesie lateinischer Sprache. Laktanzens Gedicht über den Vogel Phoenix, in: P. NEUKAM, ed., Information aus der Vergangenheit. Dialog Schule-Wissenschaft, Klassische Sprachen und Lit., vol. 16, München 1982, 129–167. * A. WŁOSOK, Laktanz, in: Gestalten der Kirchengeschichte, ed. by M. GRESCHAT, Stuttgart 1984, 176–188. * A. WŁOSOK, Lactantius, in: HLL 5, 1989, 375–404. * A. WŁOSOK, Wie der Phoenix singt, in: Musik und Dichtung, FS V. PÖSCHL, Frankfurt 1990, 209–222. * J. WOJTCZAK, De Lactantio Ciceronis aemulo et sectatore, Warszawa 1969.

JULIUS FIRMICUS MATERNUS

Life and Dates

Julius Firmicus Maternus was probably born at Syracuse and was of senatorial rank. He gave up the thorny career of a lawyer (4 pr. 1–2) so as to dedicate himself to literary studies. His astrological work, Matheseos libri VIII, was published between 334 and 337. He dedicated it to Lollianus Mavortius, proconsul of Africa. An apologetical writing—De errore profanarum religionum—followed about a decennium later (ca. 346–349). It is no longer doubted that both works are by the same author.

Survey of Works

Matheseos libri VIII: The 1st book, the introduction, justifies astrology by showing its compatibility with ethics: man is of divine nature and can rise above the influence of the stars (1. 6. 1–2). The following seven books—seven is the number of the planets—treat the technical aspects of astrology in a completeness unequalled in Latin literature.

De errore profanarum religionum: The pamphlet exhorts the emperors Constantius and Constans to extinguish paganism by force, Christianize their subjects compulsorily and confiscate votive offerings (28. 6). The first section denounces the worship of elements and the cult of sun and moon, especially solar theology; the projection of human passions onto the gods; and finally the artificial character of pagan deities. The second section (from 18 onward) attacks watchwords (symbola) and rituals of mystery religions as demoniac 'imitations' of Christian rites. The latter part contains precious information for historians of religion.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The 1st book of the Mathesis is directed against sceptics of the New Academy who, following Carneades, had argued against astrology. Cicero (nat. deor. 1. 2-4) is used in the same context.<sup>1</sup> The idea of man's divine nature recalls Posidonius. The 4th book draws on Manilius and a lost model (exploited also by Manilius). Firmicus manifestly uses two poets, Manilius and Anubio, without naming them. Another poet, Dorotheus (1st century A.D.), is the main source of book 6 and is also exploited elsewhere. In many instances, Firmicus agrees with Manetho, Ptolemy, and Valens. His astrological knowledge is extensive but his understanding lacks profundity.

In the De errore he quotes Homer and Porphyry; again, the influence of Cicero (De natura deorum) and also of Pseudo-Quintilian (s. Influence) can be seen. There are parallels with Clement of Alexandria. For biblical quotations, our author relies on a collection of Testimonia (Cyprian).

Literary technique

In both writings Firmicus Maternus shows off his rhetorical skill. He deploys to excess all the resources of that art. A typical example is the speech of the Sun personified, entreating his devotees to worship not him but the God of the Christians (err. 8. 1-3).

While it is true that there is a general design (s. above), in many particulars our passionate orator's discourse is desultory and disconnected. The constant recurrence of the same literary devices<sup>2</sup> is irksome. Both of these features suggest that the author was writing in a great hurry. Even so, he bestowed more care on the wording than on thinking.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also math. 1. 10. 14 with Cic. rep. 6. 17.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. series of conditions as suggested by the subject-matter.

Language and Style

Linguistically, there is perfect harmony between both works. In both, the verb constituere is a favorite, and both exhibit the same stilted phrase in mortem stringere venam.<sup>1</sup>

The impact of the Bible and of the liturgy<sup>2</sup> on his language and style has been pointed out by scholars who believe that Firmicus was already exposed to Christian influence when writing his Mathesis.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The shyness displayed by Firmicus in the exordium of his astrological work is belied by his later development: in the 5th book he shamelessly presumes to be the first Latin writer on his subject (math. 5 pr. 4). In the De errore he feels a vocation to unmask pagan cults as a piece of devilry and provide for their abolition. He is more capable of self-confidence than of literary self-reflection. He does not seem to have realized that words are able to kill; so he has the dubious honor of being the first Latin writer who made violent repression of dissenters his declared literary aim.

Ideas II

The identity of the astrologer with the apologist was only recognized about the turn of the century.<sup>3</sup> For chronological reasons it is probable that he was converted after having finished his astrological work. However, some passages of the Mathesis have a Christian ring, and it is highly probable that for Firmicus Christianity and astrology were not mutually exclusive. None the less, the earlier work can not be called Christian, it rather professes a neo-Platonist's monotheism. It is true though that the avowedly Christian apology is even more lacking in theological profundity.

<sup>1</sup> Math. 1. 9. 1; err. 18. 2; from Pseudo-Quintilian. decl. 10. 4; F. BOLL 1909, 2375.

<sup>2</sup> Biblical elements: F. BOLL 1909; influence of the liturgy: F. SKUTSCH 1910.

<sup>3</sup> W. KROLL and F. SKUTSCH, In Firmicum Sittelianum emendationum centuriarum duarum primarum, Hermes 29, 1894, 517-529, esp. 519; cf. also F. SKUTSCH 1910.

If both works are by the same author—the dates as well as the language leave no doubt—the more radical Christianity of his later years did not grant him any increase of meekness or wisdom.

On the contrary, the decline could not be steeper, especially if compared to the high moral and philosophical principles laid down in the 1st and towards the end of the 2nd book of the Mathesis. In the earlier work, an eminent adversary, such as Porphyry, is treated respectfully (7. 1. 1), whereas in the later work he is rudely insulted (err. 13. 4–5). Even worse, a public campaign for a deadly solution to the problem of paganism is trumped up with the aid of quotations from the Old Testament (err. 29. 1–2); in the same context our scribbler dares mention God's misericordia.

Both works share not only many stylistic features but also the adulation of the Emperor. The ending of the 1st book of the Mathesis contains a laudatio of Constantine, the De errore, a praise of his successors. Firmicus was not the one who provoked the decrees of persecution, but he reacted to them in order to prove his adherence to the official line. Ammianus attests the case of another astrologer who became even more 'Christian' than his Christian persecutors.<sup>1</sup>

The disgusting pamphlet De errore helps the modern reader understand why not much later, a noble nature like Emperor Julian would try to save civilization by restoring paganism, a desperate measure doomed in advance.

For all this, the book is not worthless. Firmicus is the only Latin apologist to attack overtly the real rivals of Christianity: solar theology and mystery cults. Thus, he gives us a glimpse of the depth of the religious conflict, a dimension elsewhere passed over in silence.

The image sketched out in the Mathesis of the types of men in his day and their lifestyles is of some value for cultural history, although much of it comes from our author's Hellenistic sources. In harmony with the mood of his age astrology becomes in his hands a kind of occult science or religion (2. 30. 2; 4 pr. 3; 5 pr. 4).

---

<sup>1</sup> Amm. 29. 1. 5; 2. 6–7.

Transmission

The transmission of err. rests exclusively on the mutilated Vaticanus Palatinus Lat. 165 (10th century).

The transmission of Math. is not uniform. For the first part (up to 4. 22. 15) the following manuscripts (of varying extent) are relevant: Montepessulanus H 180, 11th century, Parisinus Lat. 7311, 11th century, Vaticanus Reginae 1244, 11th century, Vaticanus Lat. 3425, 13th century, Parisinus Lat. 17 867, 13th century.

For books 5–8 we have more recent manuscripts from the 15th and 16th centuries, which fall into two categories.

The editio princeps (Venetiis 1497) is a witness relevant to textual criticism. The Aldina (Astronomici veteres 1497–99) stems from a lost recent manuscript abounding in mistakes.

Influence

The most detailed astrological work of antiquity was studied in the Middle Ages and enjoyed great popularity during the Renaissance. Pico della Mirandola pointed out serious astrological errors in Firmicus. Parts of the Mathesis were versified by Pontano in his Urania. N. Pruckner wrote a supplement.<sup>1</sup>

The poet G. E. Lessing (d. 1781) did philological work on Firmicus Maternus' Mathesis.<sup>2</sup> In 1559 the Church historian Flacius Illyricus discovered the manuscript of the De errore in Minden; he published the first edition in 1562. C. Bursian was the first to rediscover the codex and ventured a rather imperfect new edition.

Editions: math.: Venetiis 1497; books III–IV already Augsburg 1488. * err.: Flacius Illyricus, Argentinae 1562. * math.: W. KROLL, F. SKUTSCH, K. ZIEGLER, 2 vols., Leipzig 1897 and 1913; repr. 1968 (with addenda). * H. THORSONN (Tr), Königsberg 1927. * P. MONAT (TTrN), 2 vols., Paris 1992 and 1994. * J. R. BRAM (Tr), Park Ridge, N. J. 1975. * math. 1 and 2: J. R. BRAM (TrC), diss. New York Univ. 1972. * err.: K. ZIEGLER, Leipzig 1907. * G. HEUTEN (TTrC), Brüssel 1938. * K. ZIEGLER (TTrN), München 1953. * C. A. FORBES (Tr), New York 1970. * R. TURCAN (TTrC), Paris 1982.

<sup>1</sup> On Firmicus' influence: F. BOLL 1909, 2374; W. HÜBNER 1979; 1982 (quoted above, p. 985) 430–439.

<sup>2</sup> Zur Geschichte und Litteratur. Dritter Beitrag, Braunschweig 1774, XIX. Ergänzungen des Iulius Firmicus = G. E. Lessings sämtliche Schriften, ed. by K. LACHMANN 12, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1897, 271–274.

** Indices: in the editions by W. KROLL etc. (almost complete) and K. ZIEGLER (complete). * C. KELBER, Anfang eines Wörterbuches zu den Libri matheseos des Iulius Firmicus Maternus, Programm Erlangen 1881 (from the beginning to 2. 10). ** Bibl.: s. the monographs.

B. AXELSON, Ein drittes Werk des Firmicus Maternus? Zur Kritik der philologischen Identifizierungsmethode, Lund 1937. * A. BARTALUCCI, Considerazioni sul lessico del De errore profanarum religionum di Firmico Materno, SIFC 39, 1967, 165–185. * F. BOLL, Firmicus, RE half-vol. 12, 1909, 2365–2379. * F. J. DÖLGER, Nilwasser und Taufwasser. Eine religionsgeschichtliche Auseinandersetzung zwischen einem Isisverehrer und einem Christen des vierten Jahrhunderts nach Firmicus Maternus, Antike und Christentum 5, Münster 1936, 153–187. * F. J. DÖLGER, Die Bedeutung des neuentdeckten Mithrasheiligtums von Dura für die Überlieferung der heidnischen Mysteriensprache bei Firmicus Maternus, Antike und Christentum 5, Münster 1936, 286–288. * C. A. FORBES, Firmicus Maternus and the Secular Arm, CJ 55, 1960, 146–150. * F. GRÖHL, De syntaxi Firmiana, diss. Breslau 1918. * P. HENRY, Plotin et l'Occident: Firmicus Maternus, Marius Victorinus, saint Augustin et Macrobe, Louvain 1934. * K. HOHEISEL, Das Urteil über die nichtchristlichen Religionen im Traktat De errore profanarum religionum des Iulius Firmicus Maternus, diss. Bonn 1972. * W. HÜBNER, Perseus, Eridanus und Cola Piscis in Pontanos Urania, HumLov 28, 1979, 139–166; esp. 139–144. * W. HÜBNER 1982, cf. Manilius. * W. HÜBNER, A. WLOSOK, Firmicus Maternus, HLL 5, 1989, 84–93. * I. OPELT, Schimpfwörter in der Apologie De errore profanarum religionum des Firmicus Maternus, Glotta 52, 1964, 114–126. * A. QUACQUARELLI, La parentesi negli apologeti retori latini da Tertulliano a Firmico Materno, Orpheus 4, 1957, 63–75. * F. SKUTSCH, Ein neuer Zeuge der altchristlichen Liturgie, ARW 13, 1910, 291–305. * V. STEGEMANN, Dorotheos von Sidon und Firmicus Maternus, Hermes 78, 1943, 113–131. * L. THORNDIKE, A Roman Astrologer as an historical Source: Julius Firmicus Maternus, CPh 8, 1913, 415–435. * J. VOGT, Toleranz und Intoleranz im constantinischen Zeitalter. Der Weg der lateinischen Apologetik, Saeculum 19, 1968, 344–361. * T. WIKSTRÖM, In Firmicum Maternum studia critica, Upsaliae 1935. * T. WIKSTRÖM, Zum Texte der sog. Apologie des Firmicus Maternus, Eranos 53, 1955, 172–192. * A. WLOSOK, Zur lateinischen Apologetik der constantinischen Zeit (Arnobius, Lactantius, Firmicus Maternus), Gymnasium 96, 1989, 133–148. * K. ZIEGLER, Firmicus Maternus, RLAC 7, 1968, 946–959.

MARIUS VICTORINUS

Life and Dates

C. Marius Victorinus lived roughly between 280 and 363.<sup>1</sup> As our manuscripts call him vir clarissimus, he must have been of senatorial rank. After having completed his studies in his African homeland, he became a famous teacher of rhetoric at Rome, where he also taught philosophy, as was expected of rhetors at that time (cf. Aug. conf. 4. 28). A statue was erected in his honor in the forum of Trajan in 354 (Hier. chron. a Abr. 2370). In his old age—probably before 357—Victorinus professed his Christian faith publicly after a long period of unofficial adherence. For him the conversion of the soul to the intelligible world was inseparable from the mystery of Christ.<sup>2</sup> Like Augustine later, he came to Christianity through philosophy. In 362, a law of Emperor Julian deprived him of his right to teach (Aug. Conf. 8. 3–5). A granddaughter's epitaph has come down to us.<sup>3</sup>

His extensive and momentous œuvre (largely consisting of translations and commentaries) can be classified into works on grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy, and, on the other hand, theological writings both dogmatic and exegetic.

Survey of Work

Grammatical Works

In the 4th book of Victorinus' Ars Grammatica, a book on metrics by Aelius Festus Aponthius has also been transmitted to us.

Two further treatises on grammar and metrics (GL 6, 187 ff.; 206 ff.) are ascribed to Marius Victorinus.—The De ratione metrorum and the De finalibus metrorum are spurious.

Works on Rhetoric

The Commentary on Cicero's youthful work De inventione has come down to us. Its focus is not on philology and antiquarianism but on rhetoric and philosophy. Of special interest are the digressions on syllogism, on definition, and on the notions of time and substance.

<sup>1</sup> A. H. TRAVIS 1943.

<sup>2</sup> The parable of the Prodigal Son reflects the centrifugal and centripetal stages of the itinerary of the soul (adv. Arium 1. 59. 25; 2. 6).

<sup>3</sup> CIL 6, 31 934; A. SILVAGNI, ICUR, n.s. 1, Romae 1922, 3268.

Treatises on Logic

We still have the De definitionibus, which is an independent piece of work. The translation of Porphyry's Isagoge has partly survived in the first version of Boethius' commentary.<sup>1</sup>

Cassiodorus wrote a condensed version of the De syllogismis hypotheticis, while Martianus Capella, Boethius, and Cassiodorus did the same for the Commentary on Cicero's Topica. The detailed originals were lost.

The translation of Aristotle's Categories and the respective commentary have not been transmitted and are not well attested.<sup>2</sup> The same is true of the translation of Aristotle's Περὶ ἑρμηνείας.

Scholars guess that he also wrote a Commentary on Virgil, especially on the description of the underworld.<sup>3</sup>

Further Translations

Marius Victorinus translated libri Platoniorum (Aug. conf. 8. 3),<sup>4</sup> which certainly included Plotinus' On Beauty (enn. 1. 6), probably on The Three Original Hypostases (5. 1), perhaps also On the Soul (from book 4) and enn. 3. 2; 6. 6 and 6. 9.<sup>5</sup> Did this translation contain excerpts from Porphyry's Aphormai?

Theological Works

After his conversion Marius Victorinus wrote Ad Candidum Arianum (= De generatione Verbi), Adversus Arium libri quattuor, De homousio recipiendo, three Hymns on the Trinity and Commentaries to Paul, of which the commentaries on Philippians, Galatians and Ephesians are preserved.

Works of Doubtful Authenticity

Ad Iustinum Manichaeum contra duo principia Manichaeorum, et de vera carne Christi; De verbis scripturae: Factum est vespere et mane dies unus and De physicis (on unbelieving philosophers).

Sources, Models, and Genres

In the introduction to the Ars grammatica the basic ideas are handled to a certain extent in the style of the Stoic Ariston of Chios (about <sup>1</sup> Boeth. in isag. ed. prima, CSEL 48, 1906.

<sup>2</sup> P. HADOT 1971, 111–113.

<sup>3</sup> P. COURCELLE, Les Pères de L'Église devant les Enfers virgiliens, AHMA 30, 1955, 5–74; the pros and cons are pondered by P. HADOT 1971, 215–231.

<sup>4</sup> These are identical with Plotini paucissimi libri (Aug. beat. vit. 1. 4; cf. conf. 7. 13).

<sup>5</sup> The extent of the cultural impact of Plotinus (P. COURCELLE) or Porphyry (W. THEILER, Porphyrius und Augustin, Halle 1933; P. HADOT) on Victorinus is controversial; for the state of the question, s. W. ERDT 1980, 262, 10.

250 B.C.). The section on metrics was written by Aelius Festus Aponthius, the appendix on Horatian meter perhaps by Victorinus. For metrical theory the models were Juba (probably end of the 2nd century) and Varro (116–27 B.C.), followed by Caesius Bassus (in the time of Nero). In trivial things there are similarities with Charisius (mid-4th century), Diomedes (probably second half of the 4th century), Dositheus (probably end of the 4th century); the more ambitious treatment of orthography is partly drawn from Verrius Flaccus, a contemporary of Augustus and Tiberius; and much can be traced back ultimately to Varro.<sup>1</sup> As a rule, Marius Victorinus consulted excellent sources and we are indebted to him for precious information. The tradition of the rhetorical school and the logical training of the Peripatos converge in Marius Victorinus. In addition he may have relied on the Apuleian corpus, as is to be expected from an African.<sup>2</sup>

The theological works were inspired directly by Plotinus<sup>3</sup> (d. about 270), some of whose works Victorinus had translated. Porphyry (d. after 300) and Cicero, too, are among his sources. Victorinus knew little of the Old Testament and had even less taste for typological and allegorical interpretation.<sup>4</sup> He concentrated on Paul's epistles—his commentaries were close to the text—and on the Prologue of the Gospel according to John which he explained in a Platonic vein.<sup>5</sup>

His Hymns were not composed in metrical form but according to the laws of parallelism. Their form is determined by the Psalms and prose artistry, a fact not surprising in a teacher of oratory. They represent a new type of Christian poetry, originating in and leading to meditation.

Literary technique

The Ars grammatica is sometimes lacking in systematical order. The reader feels its closeness to oral teaching and the bald matter-of-fact style of the grammatici.

<sup>1</sup> H. DAHLMANN 1970.

<sup>2</sup> G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, Zu Boethius . . . nebst Beobachtungen zur Geschichte der Dialektik bei den Römern, WS 66, 1953, 131–154.

<sup>3</sup> P. HENRY 1934

<sup>4</sup> He protests, however—in accord with Paul—against the corporalis intellectus of the Old Testament.

<sup>5</sup> P. HADOT 1971, 239–240.

When writing on the Trinity, Victorinus is uncompromising in matters of both content and form. By translating Plotinus he has acquired a good deal of that philosopher's way of thinking and writing. No wonder that Jerome objected to his 'obscurity'. Until then even educated readers of Latin books were unaccustomed to strictly scholarly discourse.

A typical literary device is the exchange of ideas with an addressee,<sup>1</sup> a person probably invented by the author, since that adversary uses the same language and literary technique as Victorinus. This method sheds light on a problem from two sides.

Since the days of the Gnostics Victorinus was the first Christian theologian to describe divine life within the Holy Trinity in terms of human psychology: in the human soul, the (Neoplatonic) triad of Being, Living, and Understanding becomes an image of the Trinity.<sup>2</sup>

In his commentaries, exegesis follows the text with a closeness unusual in his time but does not conceal the author's philosophical education. His method may be called scholarly in this respect, although his Platonizing ideas sometimes seem to develop a life of their own (in the Commentary on Galatians this happens less often than elsewhere, and is generally rarer in Victorinus than in Origen). In accordance with his education, Victorinus uses the philosophical language of his day, probably also hoping thereby to win educated readers over to Christianity.<sup>3</sup> The literary form of his discourse, which artfully changes over from theory to practice and vice versa, sometimes comes near to homily.

Language and Style

For a teacher of rhetoric our author's language and style are strikingly unrhctorical. His use of quod instead of an 'accusative with infinitive' is close to everyday speech. Victorinus is one of the few authors who, like Suetonius, let the facts speak for themselves, and he is even one of the still smaller group who build their text on consistent philosophical reasoning.

---

<sup>1</sup> M. SIMONETTI, Nota sull'ariano Candido, Orpheus 10, 1963, 151-157; P. NAUTIN, Candidus l'arien, in: L'homme devant Dieu. Mélanges offerts au P. H. DE LUBAC, 1, Paris 1964, 309-320.

<sup>2</sup> In this respect, Victorinus is closer to Porphyry; in Plotinus' thought there is no space for a Trinity whose hypostases are on exactly the same level.

<sup>3</sup> W. K. WISCHMEYER 1972.

By translating Plotinus, Victorinus acquired a mastery of Latin philosophical language and style. This was a milestone in the development of the philosophical potential of the Latin language. His translations are so precise that they practically have the value of an ancient manuscript of Plotinus; often they confirm the readings of the medieval tradition of Plotinus against so-called emendations. Marius Victorinus brought the technique of translating secular texts to a new level. With him the Latin language acquired philosophical precision, a quality which it had been lacking for a long time.

His reading of contemporary Greek philosophers encouraged linguistic creativity and a new awareness of dormant faculties of the Latin language. There are many Grecisms—such as the increasing use of the substantive<sup>1</sup> infinitive—, but there is also the extension of meaning of Latin words under Greek influence. An example is the adjective risibilis:<sup>2</sup> used by Victorinus, it dethroned the Apuleian word cachinnabilis and became a standard example in books on logic to denote laughing as a specific quality of man. Victorinus was a man of the word, not of words. He busied himself in discovering resemblances between biblical and Neoplatonic vocabulary.<sup>3</sup> Finally, he was one of the few authors of antiquity who in their own literary practice adhered to evangelical simplicity. This may be the salutary effect of the sober linguistic traditions of the grammatici. It was left to Jerome to create a synthesis of truth and beauty in the style of his translations.

In addition to all this, his non-metrical hymns open a new page in the history of poetry; the parallelism of prose artistry converges with the quasi-musical refrain to produce a powerful effect.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Reflection on his own writing is not Victorinus' first thought. As a grammarian he does not mind juxtaposing two heterogeneous expla-

---

<sup>1</sup> M. D. METZGER, Marius Victorinus and the Substantive Infinitive, Eranos 72, 1974, 65–77.

<sup>2</sup> CSEL 48, 50, 5; 131, 3; G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, Zu Boethius, De Interpr. . . . nebst Beobachtungen zur Geschichte der Dialektik bei den Römern, WS 66, 1953, 131–154, esp. 134.

<sup>3</sup> P. HADOT 1957.

nations of meters: with Juba he derives them from a series of basic rhythms (μέτρα πρωτότυπα and φυσικά) and at the same time, according to Varro and Caesius Bassus, from the hexameter and the iambic trimeter. Yet his philosophical interest comes into play as early as the rhetorical commentaries. Finally, in his discussion with the Arians, he comes to justify expressly his own philosophical efforts and to defend programmatically a 'modern' un-biblical terminology as a means of understanding and assimilating thoroughly what had been transmitted: liceat ergo de lectis non lecta componere, 'so it should be permitted to write in non-traditional terms on traditional matters' (adv. Arium 2. 7).<sup>1</sup> This insight prepared the way for a Christian philosophy in Latin.

Ideas II

In the Adversus Arium Marius Victorinus for the first time presented a perfectly coherent and systematic doctrine of the Trinity. While Victorinus can be understood only through Neoplatonism, the Monarchians used Stoic terms,<sup>2</sup> as shown from the letters from and to 'Candidus'. The Neoplatonic concept of God had gained a more personal character through the idea of will; this allowed it to merge with the Christian notion of God. Though Augustine would be influenced by Victorinus, there are differences:<sup>3</sup> while Victorinus viewed the Son as voluntas Dei, for Augustine the Holy Spirit was voluntas between Father and Son.

Our author was the first to write a Latin commentary on Paul (after 360); soon he would be followed by Ambrosiaster (under Pope Damasus 366–384), Jerome, and Augustine. Compared to Origen, mystical knowledge and allegorical interpretation are less prominent in Victorinus. Our author's commentary on Galatians is especially sober and close to the text. Law, sin, grace, faith (even sola fides), and ethics are thrown into relief. In Rome and Milan, Paul's reserves against imposing the Jewish Law on Christians were re-discovered.

Victorinus was a philologist and a philosopher. On the one hand, his commentaries re-stated for the first time some ideas of Paul which would gain great momentum for and through Augustine. By doing so he opened the third and most important phase of Paul's influence: Irenaeus and Tertullian had used the Apostle against Marcion, Origen against the Gnostics, and now Victorinus used him against the Arians. However, the reading of Paul had an impact on our author which went far beyond the momentary occasion: he gained a fresh insight into the pivotal role of Christ, faith, grace, and liberation.

<sup>1</sup> P. HADOT 1957.

<sup>2</sup> P. HADOT 1951.

<sup>3</sup> Recently D. N. BELL 1985.

On the other hand, the commentaries on Paul were a landmark in the history of the relationship between Neoplatonism and Christianity. For example, he interpreted (ad Phil. 2. 6) forma dei in terms of the Neoplatonic doctrine of the Trinity (esse, vivere, intellegere). Likewise, his exegesis of the first chapter of Ephesians has a Platonic ring: Victorinus is bold enough to discover in the Scriptures the full immortality of the soul (including its pre-existence).<sup>1</sup> Doubtless Neoplatonic philosophy helps him understand his text and convey its message to educated and intellectually independent readers. In Victorinus' view this method is justified by a convergence not only of words but of content: to him, revelation is identical with the very essence of philosophy. His development from a philosopher into a scriptural theologian is continuous and even consistent. Some of his statements sound anti-Manichean (ad Gal. 2. 19; ad Phil. 2. 6–8) and anti-Arian (ad Gal. 1. 1), although the adversaries are not named. However, he wrote specifically anti-Arian works during the Fifties and Sixties.

Paulinism and Platonism are linked in his mind by a totally non-materialistic approach to Christianity and a Roman sense of the importance of the individual. To become pure and perfect, the soul has to know itself and God: even this basic theme of Augustine is prefigured in Victorinus. He develops in Platonic terms what is a typically Western and Latin topic: psychology. By working out the antithesis of eternity—as eternal presence—and the lived moment as an image of eternity, he comes close to Augustine's philosophy of time. However, Victorinus' interpretation of predestination as preexistence of the souls would prove unacceptable to the later Augustine.

---

<sup>1</sup> Later on Victorinus would not repeat such thoughts; he developed from a philosopher into a scriptural theologian.

Transmission

The Bambergensis Patr. 46, 9th century, and the Sangallensis 831, 10th–11th centuries, are the best witnesses for the First Letter of Candidus and Victorinus' Answer, whereas, for the Second Letter of Candidus, Adv. Arium, homous. and hymn., we only have the Berolinensis Phillips 1684, 10th century, and the editio princeps (s. below), which gives valuable evidence for the text.

For the Commentaries on Paul, the Vaticanus Ottobonianus Lat. 3288 A, 15th century, is the most ancient witness, for the Commentary on Ephesians it is the only one. The Parisinus, Nouvelles acquisitions latines et franç. 469, 17th century, together with the Ottobonianus, is traced back to a common source, the lost Herivallensis.

The Ars grammatica is transmitted in the Vaticanus Palatinus 1753, 9th century (to be supplemented with a copy, the Valentianus 395, 9th century) and the Parisinus Lat. 7539, 9th century. Both had a common source in late antiquity.

For the Commentary on Cicero's De inventione the authoritative manuscripts are: Coloniensis 166 (olim Darmstadtensis), 7th century, Monacensis 6400 (olim Frisingensis 200), 10th century, Bambergensis M. IV, 4, 11th century.

The De definitionibus is found in the Monacensis 14 272, 10th–11th centuries, the Monacensis 14 819, 10th–12th centuries, and the Bernensis 300, 11th–12th centuries.<sup>1</sup>

Influence

Marius Victorinus is one of the great unknowns of Latin literature. He developed a precision hitherto unfamiliar to translators of secular texts, and perfected the Latin language into a subtle instrument of philosophical thought. In the sphere of Latin language he laid the foundations of scholarly philosophy, and prepared a linguistic arsenal for the Middle Ages, not only by setting his stamp on grammar and rhetoric. What is more: Augustine would owe to him the knowledge of Neoplatonic writings, and develop under his influence his authoritative doctrines of Trinity, predestination and grace. Victorinus' ideas on the Trinity pave the way for the Middle Ages, his discovery of Paul prepares the Modern Age.

Of course it is not the walls of the church that make a man a

<sup>1</sup> On the Parisinus nouv. acq. 1611, 11th century: G. SCHEPSS, Zu Marius Victorinus De definitionibus, Philologus 56, n.s. 10, 1897, 382–383.

Christian (Aug. conf. 8. 4), but some of Victorinus' brilliant findings on the Trinity entered the liturgy of the Church through Alcuin's hymns.<sup>1</sup>

His works meet with a pretty cool reception in Jerome, who in matters of exegesis deplores his lack of factual knowledge and in dogmatic theology his all too scholarly style (valde obscuros).<sup>2</sup> It is no accident that Jerome gets his definition of obscurity from him.<sup>3</sup> In many respects Victorinus is antipodal to Jerome: introvert, philosophical and, despite his profession, unrheterical.

Victorinus had a lasting impact on rhetoric and logic. His translation of Porphyry's Isagoge was first commented on by Boethius, then replaced with a translation of his own and a second commentary. Victorinus' influence is largely linked to that of Boethius, as can be seen, e.g., in Gerbert of Reims (10th century). Boethius also competed with the Commentary on Cicero's Topica. The highly esteemed Commentary on Cicero's De inventione would be used among others by Cassiodorus, Einhard, Lupus of Ferrières (9th century), John Scot Erigena (9th century: he possessed and corrected a Bambergensis containing theological writings),<sup>4</sup> Abbo of Fleury (10th century), Anselm of Besate (11th century), Bernardus Silvestris (12th century). The German Notker (10th century) testified to his general popularity. Flodoard of Reims (10th century) mentioned him in his Annals (10. 2. 24–25). Papias (11th century) compiled a De divisione diffinitionum ex Marii Victorini libro abbreviata.

With Victorinus Latin philosophy finally came of age. His work would become, as it were, an arsenal for intellectual battles to come. The efflorescence of Roman cultural life and Latin literature about 400 would be unthinkable without the school of the 4th century. A hundred years later, the founders of the Middle Ages would refer to our author again. As Victorinus the theologian had gained far-reaching influence through Augustine, the logician did through Boethius—until he was obscured by the greater brilliance of his successors: a forgotten praeceptor Europae.

<sup>1</sup> P. HADOT, Marius Victorinus et Alcuin, AHMA 29, 1954, 5–19; P. HADOT, Les hymnes de Victorinus et les hymnes Adesto et Miserere d'Alcuin, AHMA 35, 1960, 7–16.

<sup>2</sup> In Gal. praef., vir. ill. 101.

<sup>3</sup> In Ezech. 13.

<sup>4</sup> A. LOCHER, ed., Marii Victorini opera theologica, Lipsiae 1976, pp. viii–ix and xxxiv.

Editions: Adv. Arium, homous., hymn. in: Antidotum contra diversas omnium fere seculorum haereses, ed. Io. SICHARDUS, Basileae 1528. * In Gal., in Phil., in Eph.: A. MAI, in: Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, 3, 2, 1, Roma 1828, 1–146 (= PL 8, 1145–1294). * rhet.: A. ZAROTTUS, Mediolani 1474. * B. DE TORTIS (together with Cic. inv.), Venetiis 1481. * R. STEPHANUS, Paris 1537. * gramm. (chapter 4 only: De orthographia): Io. SICHARDUS, Basileae 1527. * gramm.: J. CAMERARIUS (first complete edition of the ars), Tubingae 1537. * All theological Works (incl. hymn. and phys.): PL 8. * M. T. CLARK (Tr), Theological Treatises on the Trinity, Washington 1981. * All grammatical works: GL 6, pp. 3–215. * rhet.: C. HALM, RhetLatMin, Lipsiae 1863, pp. 158–304; s. also: T. STANGL, Tulliana et Mario-Victoriniana, Programm München 1888. * adv. Arium, homous., hymn.: P. HENRY (T), P. HADOT (TrC), SC 68–69, Paris 1960. * A. LOCHER, Leipzig 1976. * P. HENRY, P. HADOT, Vindobonae 1971 (= CSEL 83, 1). * P. HADOT, U. BRENKE (TrN), Zürich 1967. * In Gal., in Phil., in Eph.: A. LOCHER, Leipzig 1972. * In Eph., in Gal., in Phil.: F. GORI, Vindobonae 1986 (= CSEL 83, 2). * gramm.: I. MARIOTTI (TC), Firenze 1967. * M. DE NONNO (s. Monographs). * Consentii Ars de barbarismis et metaplasmis. Victorini fragmentum De soloecismo et barbarismo: M. NIEDERMANN, Neuchâtel 1937. * isag.: S. BRANDT, CSEL 48, Vindobonae 1906. * Porphyrii Isagoges fragmenta M. VICTORINO interprete, edidit L. MINIO-PALUELLO, adiuv. B. H. DOD, Bruges 1966 (= Aristoteles Latinus 1, 6–7). * defn.: T. STANGL, Tulliana et Mario-Victoriniana, Progr. München 1888, pp. 12–48. * A. PRONAY (TTrC), Frankfurt 1997 (announced).

L. ABRAMOWSKI, Marius Victorinus, Porphyrius und die römischen Gnostiker, ZNTW 74, 1983, 108–128. * L. ADAMO, Boezio e Mario Vittorino traduttori e interpreti dell' Isagoge di Porfirio, RSF 22, 1967, 141–164. * D. N. BELL, Esse, vivere, intelligere, RecTh 52, 1985, 1–43. * E. BENZ, Marius Victorinus und die Entwicklung der abendländischen Willensmetaphysik, Stuttgart 1932. * K. BERGNER, Der Sapientia-Begriff im Kommentar des Marius Victorinus zu Ciceros Jugendwerk De Inventione, Frankfurt 1994. * F. BÖMER, Der lateinische Neuplatonismus und Neupythagoreismus und Claudianus Mamertus in Sprache und Philosophie, Leipzig 1936, esp. 74–96. * M. T. CLARK, The Earliest Philosophy of the Living God. Marius Victorinus, PACPhA 41, 1967, 87–94. * M. T. CLARK, The Neoplatonism of Marius Victorinus, StudPatr 11, 1972, 13–19. * M. T. CLARK, The Psychology of Marius Victorinus, AugStud 5, 1974, 149–166. * M. T. CLARK, The Neoplatonism of Marius Victorinus the Christian, in: H. J. BLUMENTHAL, R. A. MARKUS, eds., Neoplatonism and Early Christian Thought. Essays in Honour of A. H. ARMSTRONG, London 1981, 153–159. * P. COURCELLE, Du nouveau sur la vie et les œuvres de Marius Victorinus, REA 64, 1962, 127–135. * P. COURCELLE, Parietes faciunt christianos? In: Mélanges d'archéologie, d'épigraphie et d'histoire offerts à J. CARCOPINO, Paris 1966, 241–248. * H. DAHLMANN, Zur Ars grammatica des Marius Victorinus, AAWM 1970,

- 2, 33–192. * A. DEMPF, Der Platonismus des Eusebius, Victorinus und Pseudo-Dionysius, SBAW 1962, 3, 1–18. * M. DE NONNO, Tradizione e diffusione di Mario Vittorino grammatico, con edizione degli Excerpta de orthographia, RFIC 116, 1988, 5–59. * W. ERDT, Marius Victorinus Afer, der erste lateinische Pauluskommentator . . . , Frankfurt 1980. * F. GORI, Per il testo dei Commentarii in Apostolum di Mario Vittorino, RFIC 104, 1976, 149–162. * P. HADOT, Typus. Stoïcisme et monarchianisme au IV<sup>e</sup> siècle d'après Candide l'Arien et Marius Victorinus, RecTh 18, 1951, 177–187. * P. HADOT, De lectis non lecta componere. Raisonement théologique et raisonement juridique, StudPatr 1, 1957, 209–220. * P. HADOT, Un vocabulaire raisonné de Marius Victorinus Afer, StudPatr 1, 1957, 194–208. * P. HADOT, L'image de la Trinité dans l'âme chez Victorinus et chez saint Augustin, StudPatr, 6, 1962, 409–442. * P. HADOT, Porphyre et Victorinus, 2 vols., Paris 1968. * P. HADOT, Marius Victorinus. Recherches sur sa vie et ses œuvres, Paris 1971. * P. HENRY, Plotin et l'Occident: Firmicus Maternus, Marius Victorinus, saint Augustin et Macrobe, Louvain 1934. * P. HENRY, The Adversus Arium of Marius Victorinus, the First Systematic Exposition of the Doctrine of the Trinity, JThS n.s. 1, 1950, 42–55. * W. KARIG, Des C. Marius Victorinus Kommentare zu den paulinischen Briefen, diss. theol. Marburg 1924. * A. LABHARDT, Le problème de l'ictus, Euphrosyne 2, 1959, 65–75. * H. DE LEUSSE, Le problème de la préexistence des âmes chez Marius Victorinus Afer, RecSR 29, 1939, 197–239. * A. LOCHER, Formen der Textbehandlung im Kommentar des Marius Victorinus zum Galaterbrief, in: Silvae, FS E. ZINN, Tübingen 1970, 137–143. * B. LOHSE, Beobachtungen zum Paulus-Kommentar des Marius Victorinus und zur Wiederentdeckung des Paulus in der lateinischen Theologie des 4. Jh., in: Kerygma und Logos. Beiträge zu den geistesgeschichtlichen Beziehungen zwischen Antike und Christentum, FS C. ANDRESEN, Göttingen 1979, 351–366. * R. A. MARKUS, Marius Victorinus and Augustine, in: A. H. ARMSTRONG, ed., The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge, 2nd ed. 1970, esp. 331–340. * E. PÖHLMANN, Marius Victorinus zum Odengesang des Horaz, Philologus 109, 1965, 134–140; repr. in: E. PÖHLMANN, Beiträge zur antiken und neueren Musikgeschichte, Frankfurt 1988, 135–143. * M. J. ROBERTS, The First Sighting Theme in the Old Testament Poetry of Late Antiquity, ICS 10, 1, 1985, 133–155. * M. SIMONETTI, All'origine della formula teologica una essenza—tre ipostasi, Augustinianum 14, 1974, 173–175. * A. SOLIGNAC, Réminiscences plotiniennes et porphyriennes dans le début du De ordine de saint Augustin, ArchPhilos 20, 1957, 446–465 (on Victorinus' translations of Plotinus). * A. H. TRAVIS, Marius Victorinus, A Biographical Note, HThR 36, 1943, 83–90. * A. VACCARI, Le citazioni del Vecchio Testamento presso Mario Vittorino, Biblica 42, 1961, 459–464. * P. WESSNER, Marius Victorinus, RE 14, 2, 1930, 1840–1848. * W. K. WISCHMEYER, Bemerkungen zu den Paulusbriefkommentaren des

C. Marius Victorinus, ZNTW 63, 1972, 108–120. * A. ZIEGENAUS, Die trinitarische Ausprägung der göttlichen Seinsfülle nach Marius Victorinus, München 1972.

HILARY OF POITIERS

Life and Dates

Hilary of Poitiers received a solid rhetorical education in the province of Gaul, at that time a stronghold of Roman culture. He found his way to Christianity through philosophy and its 'natural' knowledge of God, as Augustine would do later. After having been elected bishop of Poitiers he wrote his Commentary on Matthew.

As a zealous defender of the Nicene Creed he was charged with heresy by the Arian bishops before a court of inquisition; he was exiled to Phrygia by Emperor Constantius II. Determined not to give in, he acted through writing. At the synods of Seleucia and Constantinople (in 359 and 360) he defended the partisans of the Nicene Creed. He wrote a book (De synodis) for his fellow-believers among the bishops in Gaul and another for the Emperor (Liber ad Constantium). The twelve books De trinitate were meant to undermine the foundations of the Arian belief. He collected documents with which to accuse its leading representatives (Liber adversus Valentem et Ursacium). In 360 he returned to Gaul with a pamphlet against Constantius in his pocket (Liber in Constantium imperatorem), which he published after the emperor's death. In his exegetical works on the Old Testament (Commentaries on Psalms and on Job) and in his Tractatus mysteriorum he exploited ideas of Origen. Hilary introduced the practice of singing Latin hymns and founded a monastery directed by his student Martin. He died in 367 or 368.

Survey of Works

Exegetical Works: In Matthaëum; In psalmos; Tractatus mysteriorum (a Christological interpretation of passages from the Old Testament).

Dogmatic works: De Trinitate; De Synodis (among other subjects, the problem of consubstantiality is discussed).

Polemic works: Collectanea antiariana (only fragments survived); Liber ad Constantium imperatorem (asking to be allowed to expound the—correct—creed during the synod of Constantinople). Liber in Constantium imperatorem (a passionate pamphlet); Contra Arianos vel Auxentium.

Hymns: Ante saecula qui manes; Fefellit saevam verbum factum te caro; Adae carnis gloriosa et caduci corporis.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Eusebius of Emesa is mentioned as a source for De Trinitate. The Commentaries were influenced by Origen in content and method.

Cicero is more than a cultural influence; Hilary owes to him categories of thought: for example, the theme of celestial ornatus (in ps. 134. 11), the polarity of otium and negotium (in ps. 64. 12). Virgil conveyed to him the idea of God's indwelling in everything and of men originating in him;<sup>1</sup> as for cosmology, he must have drawn on Lucretius.<sup>2</sup>

The idea for the hymns probably came from eastern church practice, which Hilary observed during his exile. His congregations in Gaul have difficulty in learning the unfamiliar songs.<sup>3</sup> Christian hymns are attested early. Before Hilary, Gnostics had used hymns for dogmatic teaching.

Literary Technique

The literary technique of the De trinitate is close to the genre of Institutiones: according to Jerome (epist. 70. 5), the structure of the De trinitate followed Quintilian's Institutio oratoria, which likewise consisted of 12 books. In 1. 20–36 there is a summary which is reminiscent of the capita rerum in Pliny and Gellius. The prefaces to single books echo famous works on rhetoric.<sup>4</sup>

The pamphlets are enlivened by narratives: in the Contra Arianos, for example, Hilary reports an arbitrary action of the Arian bishop Auxentius.

The ardent pamphlet against Constantius evokes the apocalyptic

<sup>1</sup> J. DOIGNON 1989, 460 (bibl.).

<sup>2</sup> E. GOFFINET, Lucrèce et les conceptions cosmologiques de saint Hilaire de Poitiers, in: Antidorum W. PEREMANS, Louvain 1968, 61–67.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. W. BULST 1956, 8.

<sup>4</sup> Hil. trin. 6 praef.: Cic. de orat. 1. 1; Hil. trin. 12 praef.: Quint. inst. 10. 7. 23; J. DOIGNON 1989, 466.

atmosphere of the times of the great persecutions: imperial power is the antichrist.

Hilary follows a Horatian principle in collecting poems with different meters into a single book (Liber hymnorum: Hier. vir. ill. 100). The hymns occasionally use the non-Roman form of the Abecedarius (derived from Psalms 119/118); in such (and some other) instances the doctrinary element undercuts the poetic effect.

Language and Style

Hilary's stylistic skills distinguish him among the Latin Church Fathers; he is a champion of pointed style and irony. The impressive final prayer of the De Trinitate is a masterpiece of rhetoric.<sup>1</sup>

The Hymns are linked with the Roman tradition by their very meters; the strophe consisting of two asclepiadean distichs (hymn. 1) is found in Horace; no less familiar are the iambic senarius (2) and the versus quadratus (3). The strophic combination<sup>2</sup> in nos. 2 and 3, however, is unparalleled in Roman poetry: there are distichs of iambic senarii (2) and tristichs of trochaic septenarii (3). The first hymn in particular is not devoid of metrical licences. From the second hymn onward a new style seems to develop.

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature

Like Origen, Hilary is convinced that a 'pneumatic' interpretation of the Old Testament is imperative. In search for a 'deeper understanding' (altius intellegere) he interprets the texts of the Old Covenant as prefigurations of Christ, the Church and the 'spiritual Man'. The prophetic significance of the Psalms is not limited to secular history; they present 'figures' (τύποι) foreshadowing the 'world to come'.<sup>3</sup>

In the Hymns we can trace the beginnings of Christian poetics.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> J. DOIGNON, 'L'esprit souffle où il veut' (Ioh. 3. 8) dans la plus ancienne tradition patristique latine, RSPH 62, 1978, 345-359.

<sup>2</sup> W. BULST 1956, 8.

<sup>3</sup> References in J. DOIGNON 1989, 456-457.

<sup>4</sup> J. FONTAINE, L'apport de la tradition poétique romaine à la formation de l'hymnodie latine chrétienne, REL 52, 1974, 318-355.

Ideas II

Hilary's thought centers on the doctrines concerning the Trinity and Christ. Though a passionate enemy of Arianism in the discussion on 'consubstantiality', he is cautious enough to search for a formula that would be accepted by a majority.

Hilary transposes categories of Roman law into theology; an example is the distinctio personarum in the De Trinitate.<sup>1</sup>

Transmission

The Aretinus (Arezzo, Bibl. com. VI 3, 11th century) is the sole manuscript to transmit De mysteriis and Hymni. These works were printed as late as 1887.

For the rest, we can only indicate here the most important manuscripts containing the De trinitate. Four of them date from about 500: Vaticanus, Arch. S. Pietro D 182 (= B); Paris. Lat. 8907 (= C); Paris. Lat. 2630 (= D); Veronensis, Bibl. capit. XIX (= V). The Codices BCD are 'corpora': B contains trin., in Const., ad Const. I-II, c. Aux.; in C there are trin., c. Aux., syn.; in D: trin., syn. In addition we have some very old fragments. The problems posed by the tradition are not insignificant.<sup>2</sup>

Influence

In Rufinus' view, Hilary is lenis et placidus (hist. 1. 31). Considering the vehement character of his writings, this verdict has an almost ironic ring to it. Augustine and Jerome would later praise his courage as a confessor. From this rank, our author was promoted to doctor (Aug. c. Iul. 2. 8. 28) and, finally, sanctus (Cassiod. inst. 18). Venantius Fortunatus idealized him in his Vita S. Hilarii and De virtutibus S. Hilarii. The De Trinitate would become an authority for many great theologians of the Middle Ages and still later for Luther and Calvin.<sup>3</sup>

Editions: G. CRIBELLUS, Mediolani 1482 (not complete; later editiones principes s. editions of individual works). * PL 9, 1844, and 10, 1844. * ad Const.: A. FEDER, CSEL 65, 1916. * c. Const.: A. ROCHER (TTrN), Paris 1987 (= SC 334). * hymn.: J. F. GAMURRINI, Roma 1887 (s. myst). * A. FEDER, CSEL 65, 1916. * W. BULST (TC), Hymni Latini antiquissimi, Heidelberg

<sup>1</sup> J. DOIGNON 1989, 464.

<sup>2</sup> Bibl. ibid. 462-463.

<sup>3</sup> References ibid. 467-468.

1956. * in Matth.: BADIUS ASCENSIVS, Paris 1510 (editio princeps) * J. DOIGNON (TTTrN), Paris 1978 and 1979 (= SC 254 and 258). * myst.: J. F. GAMURRINI, Roma 1887 (editio princeps). * A. FEDER, CSEL 65, 1916. * A. HAMMAN, PLS 1, 1958. * J. P. BRISSON (TTTrN), Paris 1965 (= SC 19<sup>bis</sup>). * op. hist. fgg.: N. LE FÈVRE, Paris 1598 (editio princeps). * A. FEDER, CSEL 65, 1916. * in psalm.: BADIUS ASCENSIVS, Paris 1510. * A. ZINGERLE, CSEL 22, 1891. * trin.: P. SMULDERS, CC 62–62 A, Turnholti 1979; 1980. * S. MCKENNA (Tr), Washington 1968. ** Indices (incomplete): s. editions, esp. A. FEDER and BRISSON. ** Bibl.: fundamental J. DOIGNON 1989 (s. below).

G. BARDY, Un humaniste chrétien, saint Hilaire de Poitiers, RHE 27, 1941, 5–25. * C. F. A. BORCHARDT, Hilary of Poitiers' Role in the Arian Struggle, Den Haag 1960. * H. C. Brennecke, Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Constantius II, Berlin 1984. * W. BULST, Hymni Latini antiquissimi LXXV, Psalmi III, Heidelberg 1956. * M. F. BUTRELL, The Rhetoric of Saint Hilary of Poitiers, Washington D.C. 1933. * J. DOIGNON, HLL 5, 1989, § 582. * J. FONTAINE, La nascita dell'umanesimo cristiano nella Gallia romana, RSLR 6, 1970, 18–39. * P. GALTIER, Saint Hilaire de Poitiers, le premier docteur de l'Eglise latine, Paris 1960. * E. GOFFINET, L'utilisation d'Origène dans le Commentaire des Psaumes de saint Hilaire de Poitiers, Louvain 1965. * E. R. LABANDE, ed., Hilaire de Poitiers, évêque et docteur (368–1968). Cinq conférences données à Poitiers à l'occasion du XVI<sup>e</sup> centenaire de sa mort, Paris 1968. * E. R. LABANDE, ed., Hilaire et son temps. XVI<sup>e</sup> centenaire de la mort de saint Hilaire. Actes du Colloque de Poitiers (1968), Paris 1969. * G. M. NEWLANDS, Hilary of Poitiers. A Study in Theological Methods, New York 1978. * E. WATSON, The Life and Writings of Saint Hilary of Poitiers, Oxford 1899.

AMBROSE

Life and Dates

The figure of Ambrose belongs to general history, not literary history alone. He was born about 339/40 (or 333/4)<sup>1</sup> in Trier (Treves). Being a son of the praefectus praetorio Galliarum he was of good family, although the 'old Roman' nomen gentile of Aurelius ought not to be overrated. He is the first Latin ecclesiastical author to have Christian parents. After his father's early death Ambrose followed his mother to Rome. There he studied, excelled as an orator and entered on a political career. As a rather young governor (consularis) of Aemilia and Liguria he came to Milan, where—in 374—Arians and Catholics were disputing, unable to find a bishop acceptable for both parties. He hastened to the church to do a governor's duty and enforce good order. Both groups spontaneously elected him bishop, although he had not even been baptized. Initially he hesitated to accept, for he wanted to dedicate his life to philosophy (Paulin. Med., vita Ambr. 7–9). Then Simplicianus, who had studied Platonic philosophy with Marius Victorinus, introduced him to his ecclesiastical obligations. As bishop Ambrose firmly defended the Nicene Creed. He was diplomatic enough, however, to accept all the priests that had followed his (Arian) predecessor so that the clergy of Milan unanimously backed him. To the Emperors Gratian, Valentinian II, and Theodosius the Great he was an independent and often troublesome counselor.

<sup>1</sup> On this, cf. M. ZELZER 1987, 203, n. 4.

Ambrose proved victorious on three fronts: he overcame the Arian schism, he put paganism in its place, and he defended the independence of the Church even against the emperor. Under his influence, the Church Council of Aquileia rejected Arianism. Not only was the deity of Christ at stake, but also the Church's independence from intrusions on the part of the state. Ambrose resisted the demand of the Empress Justina to cede a church in Milan to the Arians; he had the people occupy the building after mobilizing them through new religious songs and the discovery of the bones of martyrs.<sup>1</sup>

In his struggle against ancient Roman religion, Ambrose thwarted the efforts of the conservatives to restore the altar of Victory to the Senate-house and to support pagan cults at public expense. Against this background, Symmachus' Relatio is a moving document reflecting the sunset of paganism. To understand Ambrose's attitude (epist. 17–18),<sup>2</sup> we should realize that the Church at that time had no financial support from the state. We should also keep in mind Ambrose's theology. In his view the traditional gods had not yet receded into mere literature; they were the work of demonic forces which were frighteningly real. Many of the leaders of the conservative senators would perish together with the usurper Eugenius in 394.

The bishop's courage does not waver even before orthodox emper-

---

<sup>1</sup> G. GOTTLIEB, Der Mailänder Kirchenstreit von 385–386. Datierung, Verlauf, Deutung, MH 42, 1985, 37–55; ancient testimonia: G. NAUROY, Le jouet et le miel. Le combat d'Ambroise en 386 contre l'arianisme milanais, RecAug 23, 1988, 3–86.

<sup>2</sup> As for the conflict around the altar of Victory (with texts) R. KLEIN 1972; H. A. POHLSANDER, Victory. The Story of a Statue, Historia 18, 1969, 588–597.

ors: 'The emperor is not above, but within the Church.'<sup>1</sup> Twice Ambrose brought to heel Emperor Theodosius the Great. He forced him to withdraw a decree ordering the Christians of Callinicum on the Euphrates to restore a synagogue they had destroyed in 388. The second case was more impressive: during a riot in Thessalonica, Roman officials were killed and the emperor took his revenge by ordering a massacre among the people assembled in the circus. Ambrose demanded a public act of penance—and the emperor submitted.<sup>2</sup> Ambrose diligently watched over the independence of the Church from the state. When he was about to die, he returned his episcopate to his tutor Simplicianus (in 397).

Survey of Works

Ambrose was a multifaceted writer. His works arose mostly from sermons. His exegetical works largely concern the Old Testament. In later years (after 386) he turned to the Gospel of Luke.

The best known of his moral and ascetic works is the De officiis ministrorum. Our author's interest in asceticism was inspired by his sister, who had become a nun: De virginibus ad Marcellinam sororem; Exhortatio virginitatis; De institutione virginis et S. Mariae virginitate perpetua; De viduis; De virginitate. Historians of law and economy might feel attracted to the De Nabuthe Iezraelita (against greed) and De Tobia (against usury).

The dogmatic writings adhere strictly to the Nicene Creed: De fide; De spiritu sancto; Explanatio symboli ad initiandos (3 versions, cf. p. 1634 n. 3); De incarnationis dominicae sacramento. The De mysteriis is on sacramental life.

Funeral speeches are a continuation of the genre of laudatio funebris. There are two books on the death of the author's brother Satyrus (379) and obituaries for Valentinian II (392) and Theodosius the Great (395).

The Contra Auxentium de basilicis tradendis is a political pamphlet.

91 Letters reflect the bishop's fulfilment of his duties. Nevertheless the first nine books contain very few references to highly political matters. They were published about 394; the tenth book followed after the death of Theodosius (spring 395). Letters indicative of controversies with the emperor were originally suppressed and published later, probably by Paulinus of Milan, the secretary and biographer of Ambrose.<sup>3</sup>

The authenticity of some of the Hymns is controversial.

<sup>1</sup> C. Aux. 36; cf. also epist. 21; 51.

<sup>2</sup> Obit. Theod. 34; cf. epist. 51.

<sup>3</sup> R. KLEIN 1970.

Lost Works

The De philosophia was probably written in his youth.

Spurious works

The important commentary to thirteen epistles of St. Paul, usually called Ambrosiaster, is not a work of Ambrose. This important document, which adheres to the literal meaning of the text, was written under Pope Damasus (4th century).

The spurious Mosaicarum et Romanarum legum collatio would play a role in the juridic life of the medieval Church.

The authenticity of the following books is dubious: De sacramentis,<sup>1</sup> De moribus brahmanorum,<sup>2</sup> and Explanatio symboli ad initiandos.<sup>3</sup>

Sources, Models, and Genres

Ambrose possesses a solid classical education and has no difficulty in reading Greek; in matters of philosophy, he is astoundingly knowledgeable. As appears from longer literal parallels, he must have read Plotinus, Porphyrius, the Pythagorean Sextus<sup>4</sup> and some texts of Plato. The studies of his youth—to which his De philosophia belonged—were not abandoned after his baptism: partly under the guidance of Simplicianus he studied Greek sources in order to lay solid foundations for theological exegesis. Besides Philo and Origen he read Basil's Hexaemeron, an exegesis of Genesis. Like Origen's translator Rufinus he had the gift of eliminating typically Jewish or Greek extravagances from his models and bestowing on them an ecclesiastically inoffensive shape.

Among Latin authors he prefers Cicero and Virgil. His sermons are often inspired by Cicero's speeches;<sup>5</sup> the De officiis is of crucial

<sup>1</sup> Against the authenticity: K. GAMBER, Die Autorschaft von De sacramentis, Regensburg 1967; for Ambrose as the author: J. SCHMITZ, Zum Autor der Schrift De sacramentis, ZKTh 91, 1969, 59–69 and 589; once more against: K. GAMBER, ZKTh 91, 1969, 587–589.

<sup>2</sup> In favor of authenticity: F. F. SCHWARZ, Alexanders Gespräch mit den Brahmanen (Vita brahmanorum Sancti Ambrosii), eingeleitet und erklärt, Litterae Latinae 31, 1975–1976, 1–16.

<sup>3</sup> K. GAMBER, Geht die sogenannte Explanatio symboli ad initiandos tatsächlich auf Ambrosius zurück?, ByzF 2, 1967, 184–203 (= FS F. DÖLGER, 2).

<sup>4</sup> G. MADEC 1974, 316–317.

<sup>5</sup> M. TESTARD 1985.

importance for him (s. Literary Technique); he read the Somnium Scipionis perhaps already with the commentary of Macrobius.<sup>1</sup> In addition he knows Apuleius' De Platone.

Ambrose cultivates the genres of ecclesiastical prose familiar to his contemporaries. Pliny serves as a model for the structural design of his collection of letters, though not its language.<sup>2</sup>

Once and for all he determined the generic form of the hymn which, partly following Syriac church music, was to become a standard type of medieval poetry.

Literary Technique

As a writer Ambrose is a master of a technique which the French call collage. His ability to insert an allegorical interpretation from Origen into a Plotinian context—wisely avoiding everything that might look 'heretical' or pagan—testifies to remarkable skill (s. Ideas). The self-assured use of entire passages from other authors is reminiscent of Roman basilicas in which 'columns and other architectural elements of different genre and provenance are combined to produce a unified and characteristic effect'.<sup>3</sup>

Into his exposition of Genesis Ambrose inserts descriptions of landscapes and pictures of animal life as moral examples, many of them reminiscent of Virgil.<sup>4</sup> Numerous literary references to Terence help illustrate psychology through poetry; for example, Phaedria's state of mind in the Eunuchus (paenit. 2. 96. 47).<sup>5</sup> Small exemplary narratives enliven the ascetic writings.

In the De officiis ministrorum Ambrose contrives to Christianize an entire three-volume work of Cicero's. This is indicative of a literary program which has to be taken seriously. The number of books is the same; the dedication to the son becomes a dedication to the 'sons', i.e. the priests. The vocabulary remains the same, but the meaning turns out to be Christian instead of Stoic. The foundation of justice is fides as it had been to Cicero (Cic. off. 1. 23): the word

<sup>1</sup> For a different view: M. FUHRMANN 1963.

<sup>2</sup> M. ZELZER 1987, 226.

<sup>3</sup> H. EIBL, Augustin und die Patristik, München 1923, 280.

<sup>4</sup> L. ALFONSI, L'ephrasis ambrosiana del 'libro delle api' virgiliano, VetChr 2, 1965, 129-138.

<sup>5</sup> P. COURCELLE, Ambroise de Milan face aux comiques latins, REL 50, 1972, 223-231.

is the same, but now it means 'faith' (Ambr. off. 1. 29. 142) instead of the ancient Roman 'adherence to contracts'.<sup>1</sup> In the preface, however, there is an explicit antithesis: Christian silentium replaces pagan oratio. Instead of Roman, biblical examples are used. In opposition to Cicero, who—like Pelagius later—had relied on man's own moral strength, Ambrose presupposes everywhere the 'preceding grace' (in Luc. 4. 4).

Not surprisingly we find in the funeral speeches the entire apparatus of the laudatio funebris and of the ancient literature of consolation.<sup>2</sup> Yet our author is able to draw subtle distinctions. Gratiam referre replaces the Ciceronian and Stoic secundum naturam vivere (exc. Sat. 1. 45–48). Stoic wisdom—which had been 'knowledge of things divine and human'<sup>3</sup>—cedes its territory to the ability to distinguish divine from human things (exc. Sat. 1. 48), a change of stress typical of our author.

Ambrose's readers should be cautious not to look for mechanical methods of work and arbitrary additions. A study of his obituary on Theodosius has clearly shown that Ambrose has a sense of form worthy of an ancient author.<sup>4</sup>

The same is true for the collection of letters, the structure of which conforms to Pliny's epistulae. As in the model, there are 10 (= 9 + 1) books, the last of which contains the correspondence with the emperor and is dedicated to the author's public activities.<sup>5</sup> The collection of letters, in its turn, forms an architecture composed of originally independent pieces.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. R. SAUER, Studien zur Pflichtenlehre des Ambrosius von Mailand, diss. Würzburg 1981, 113–118.

<sup>2</sup> F. ROZYNSKI, Die Leichenreden des hl. Ambrosius, insbesondere auf ihr Verhältnis zur antiken Rhetorik und zu den antiken Trostschriften untersucht, diss. Breslau 1910; C. FAVEZ, La consolation latine chrétienne, Paris 1937; S. RUIZ, Investigationes historicae et litterariae in Sancti Ambrosii De obitu Valentimiani et De obitu Theodosii imperatorum orationes funebres, diss. München (1969) 1971; for the influence of Cicero's lost Consolatio on Ambrose's De excessu Satyri s. M. ZELZER 1987, 210–213.

<sup>3</sup> Cic. Tusc. 4. 57; off. 1. 153; 2. 5, SVF 2. 35; 36; 1017.

<sup>4</sup> W. STEIDLE, Die Leichenrede des Ambrosius für Kaiser Theodosius und die Helena-Legende, V Chr 32, 1978, 94–112, esp. 112.

<sup>5</sup> For a more detailed analysis (including numerology) J. P. MAZIÈRES, Un principe d'organisation pour le recueil des Lettres d'Ambroise de Milan, in: Y. M. DUVAL, ed., 1974, 199–218 and: Les lettres d'Ambroise de Milan à Irénée, Pallas 26, 1979, 103–114.

Language and Style

Ambrose's style<sup>1</sup> is highly rhetorical, as is the norm among Church Fathers. He pretends to write more simply than Symmachus (epist. 18. 2) but he does not. Augustine, one of his listeners, is deeply impressed by him as a speaker, whereas Jerome, who probably just read him, has no high opinion of his stylistic faculties.<sup>2</sup> Most of all in his dogmatic works he fails to infuse some artistic life into his language. Of course, their quasi-judicial severity of form might have some fascination of its own.

Before judging the style of his rather prolix exegetical writings, the reader should keep in mind that these are in part stenographic scripts<sup>3</sup> of real sermons, in which the delivery and the speaker's personality contributed considerably to the effect. We know, however, that Ambrose often wrote with his own hand (epist. 7. 3). Moreover, the sophisticated art of connecting different sources and the deliberate exploitation of semantic ambiguities of vocabulary tell against mere improvisation; suffice it to recall the author's preference for metaphors equally familiar to Christians and Platonists (s. Ideas). In contrast to the dogmatic works, here we see a 'delightful' style bordering on poetry. This is only one of the surprising overlappings of prose and poetry in that extraordinary man.

As for the letters, it is known that Ambrose sent them, before publication, to a friend versed in literature (Sabinus, bishop of Placentia) for stylistic and theological revision (epist. 48. 1). We also know that the structure of the collection is meant to meet literary standards. A study of linguistic minutiae would even allow us to

---

<sup>1</sup> On Language and Style: M. F. BARRY, The Vocabulary of the Moral-Ascetical Works of St. Ambrose. A Study in Latin Lexicography, diss. Washington 1926; M. A. ADAMS, The Latinity of the Letters of St. Ambrose, diss. Washington 1927; M. T. SPRINGER, Nature Imagery in the Works of St. Ambrose, diss. Washington 1931; M. R. DELANEY, A Study of the Clausulae in the Works of St. Ambrose, diss. Washington 1934; L. T. PHILIPPS, The Subordinate Temporal, Causal, and Adversative Clauses in the Works of St. Ambrose, diss. Washington 1937; J. H. GILLIS, The Coordinating Particles in Saints Hilary, Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine, diss. Washington 1938; B. RİPOSATI, Lingua e stile nelle opere oratorie di Sant'Ambrogio, in: Sant'Ambrogio nel XVI centenario della nascita, Milano 1940, 239-305; G. BARTELINK, Sprachliche und stilistische Bemerkungen in Ambrosius' Schriften, WS 92, n.s. 13, 1979, 175-202.

<sup>2</sup> He declares that he will pass over him in silence (vir. ill. 124), ne in alterutram partem aut adulatio in me reprehendatur aut veritas.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. H. HAGENDAHL, Die Bedeutung der Stenographie für die spätlateinische christliche Literatur, JbAC 14, 1971, 24-38.

distinguish between conciliar letters merely influenced by Ambrose and others which he wrote himself.<sup>1</sup>

The Hymns produce an immediate impression on the reader. They are written in acatalectic iambic diameters. The use of this meter in strophes of four lines is not attested before Ambrose, which is not to say, of course, that he invented them. Each hymn has eight strophes. As the reformer of Christian lyrics—a genre which had begun with Hilary of Poitiers<sup>2</sup>—Ambrose found a language and music which were simple and noble, popular and dignified at the same time, a master-stroke not always achieved by authors of popular religious songs.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In the footsteps of Alexandrians such as Philo and Origen,<sup>3</sup> Ambrose applied the methods of allegorical interpretation to the Old Testament. ‘Typology’ centered on the history of redemption was in his view the higher and truly theological form of exegesis. Even in the Old Testament, Christ was his sole point of reference.<sup>4</sup> This method allowed Ambrose to prevent his listeners from taking moral offense at certain scenes in the Old Testament, thus enabling him to convert Augustine. On the other hand, he also followed Basil, who, in the style of the school of Antioch, had respected the literal sense and even practised textual criticism. As for ‘moral’ exegesis, which holds a place in-between, he despised it on theory but admitted it in practice.

Ideas II

With determination Ambrose made philosophy a handmaiden of religion. He took over from Neoplatonism the philosophical interpre-

---

<sup>1</sup> G. C. MENIS, La lettera XII attribuita a Sant’Ambrogio e la questione marciana aquileiese, RSCI 18, 1964, 243–253 (on nam/enim, igitur/itaque/ergo, licet, ideoque; periodical sentence structure, prose rhythm).

<sup>2</sup> J. FONTAINE, Les origines de l’hymnodie chrétienne latine d’Hilaire de Poitiers à Ambroise de Milan, Revue de l’Institut catholique de Paris 14, 1985, 15–51; W. FAUTH, Der Morgenhymnus Aeterne rerum conditor des Ambrosius und Prudentius cath. 1, JbAC 27/28, 1984–1985, 97–115.

<sup>3</sup> However, Origen did not confine himself to allegorical exegesis; he was especially striving for a precise literal understanding of the text.

<sup>4</sup> Cyprian’s Testimonia pursued similar aims.

tation of the Delphic maxim 'know thyself' and applied it to Christian salvation.<sup>1</sup> While Victorinus had assimilated Neoplatonic philosophy in the context of 'logic', Ambrose read it in terms of 'soteriology'. He adapted philosophical elements to Christian dogma: Plotinus had stressed the soul's preexistence, its kinship with God and its being at home in the intellectual world (cf. enn. 1. 6. 5; 1. 6. 8), whereas Ambrose emphasized the idea of creation (Isaac 8. 79): solem nisi sanus (for Plotinus' 'sun-like') et vigens oculus non aspicit (cf. Aug. solil. 1. 14. 25); illic patria nobis et illic pater, a quo creati sumus (Ambr. ibid. 8. 78; cf. Aug. quant. an. 1. 2), 'only a sound and thriving eye can behold the sun; there is a fatherland for us and there is the Father by whom we were created'. In the De Isaac vel anima, the idea of 'inward man'<sup>2</sup> from Plato's Republic (9. 589 A-B) merged with the corresponding concept from Romans (7. 22). Similarly, Ambrose exploited the metaphor of flight, which is attested both in Plato and the Bible.<sup>3</sup> As in Plotinus (enn. 3. 5. 9. 15), 'wealth' symbolizes the intelligibles.<sup>4</sup> Other elements of Platonism in Ambrose's thought are: the non-material concept of God, the mysticism of illumination, and the explanation of evil as 'privation' of what is good; this momentous idea (evoked in the De Isaac vel anima) will find important resonance in Augustine.<sup>5</sup>

In the Hexameron Ambrose ranks the Scriptures above Nature. Like other Church Fathers, he traces the wisdom of Plato and other philosophers back to the influence of the Bible.<sup>6</sup> Nevertheless, Ambrose shows solid knowledge even of medicine (ultimately based on Galen and Gregory of Nyssa); by shaping the ideal physician into the image of Christ he finds a new definition of medical ethics (Nab. 8. 40; Hel. 20. 75); actually, pagan medicine had served mainly the rich.<sup>7</sup>

His letters and writings are closely linked to real life; the necrologues

<sup>1</sup> H. DÖRRIE 1964 stressed Porphyry's importance as a model. However, P. COURCELLE proved in several studies that Ambrose depends directly on Plotinus.

<sup>2</sup> For a slightly different view: G. MADEC, L'homme intérieur selon saint Ambroise, in: Y. M. DUVAL, ed., Ambroise de Milan. XVI<sup>e</sup> centenaire de son élection épiscopale. Dix études, Paris 1974, 283-308.

<sup>3</sup> R. T. OTTEN 1966.

<sup>4</sup> Isaac 5. 19; cf. Matth. 6. 20; also Aug. epist. 3. 2.

<sup>5</sup> Aug. c. Iul. 1. 9. 44; c. Iul. op. imperf. 4. 109.

<sup>6</sup> Ambr. off. 1. 12. 44; 1. 21. 94; 1. 28. 133-134; 1. 36. 180; 2. 2. 6; P. COURCELLE 1976, 189.

<sup>7</sup> G. MÜLLER, Arzt, Kranker und Krankheit bei Ambrosius von Mailand, Sudhoffs Archiv (AGM) 51, 1967, 193-216.

on his brother Satyrus and on the Emperors Valentinian and Theodosius are important historical sources. The letters to Emperors (book 10) and the commemorative speech on Theodosius were published to convey to the Emperor's sons and to their tutor Stilicho the idea of a harmonious balance of episcopal and imperial power. Clear evidence of this intention is the omission of some letters known to us from other sources and revealing differences of opinion.

In Ambrose ancient Roman moral standards are even more prominent than in earlier Fathers. Concerning warfare, he is one of the first Christians to adhere unequivocally to Roman tradition—an attitude historically inevitable after Constantine. Like Cicero, he acknowledges the ius belli: wars of defence are permissible, not, however, unfair means of gaining the advantage; contracts must be kept, and the conquered spared. While earlier ecclesiastical writers had defended pacifism,<sup>1</sup> Ambrose limits it to the private sphere, where he forbids even self-defence (off. 3. 4. 27). Civil war is ostracized; but against non-Christians and non-Romans ('natural enemies') neither war nor usury is excluded (Tob 15. 51). Ambrose occasionally praises heroism in battles (off. 1. 41. 201) and sometimes seems to comply tacitly with the use of violence against heretics, although he expressly disapproves the execution of the heretic Priscillian (epist. 26. 20 explains the 'background' to his clemency). As world history coincided with church history in his day, Ambrose could be a Roman patriot, though he was anything but a slave to power. In practice he knew how to organize passive resistance: tradere basilicam non possum, sed pugnare non debeo, 'I cannot surrender the basilica, but I am not allowed to fight' (epist. 20. 22).

Like Roman jurists he eschewed detailed casuistic prescriptions. Borrowing from the language of Roman land-surveyors, he created the term of 'cardinal virtues' (exc. Sat. 1. 57)—they set a standard, comparable to the cardo maximus, the main axis, starting from which the longitudinal and transverse axes (cardines and decumani) were counted. For him ethics is the interpretation of divine law; like a jurist he searches for 'precedents'. In his own theory and practice he transfers the moral code of the ancient Roman official to his understanding of ecclesiastical office, a metamorphosis of historical consequence.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Tert. apol. 37. 5; idol. 19. 3; coron. 11. 2; Orig. c. Cels. 2. 30; 3. 8; 8. 73; Lact. inst. 6. 20. 15-16.

Transmission

In view of the great number of his works, we must content ourselves with only a brief sketch of the manuscript tradition.<sup>1</sup> The manuscripts are impressive not only for their quantity (e.g. we have over 100 codices for the In XII psalm.) but also for the venerable age of some of them:

exc. Sat., patr. (Boulogne-sur-Mer 32, 7th century).

hex.: We have fragments of an Aurelianensis; the other manuscripts fall into two classes; the oldest manuscript of the better class is the Cantabrigiensis, Corp. Chr. 193, 8th century.

Iac., Isaac, obit. Valent., parad.: Audomaropolitanus (= St. Omer) 72, 8th–9th century; Paris. Lat. 1913, olim Colbertinus, 9th century, and others.

in Luc.: Bobiensis, 7th century.

Iob.: Paris. Lat. 1732, 8th century.

myst.: Remensis 376, 9th century.

obit. Theod.: Berol. theol. Lat. 2°, 908, 9th century, and others.

off.: Herbipolitanus (Würzburg), Ms. theol. 7, 9th century; Monacensis Lat. 14 641, 8th–9th century.

ymb., sacr.: Sangallensis 188, 7th–8th century, and others.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

Ambrose is largely responsible for transmitting Greek ideas to Western Europe. With his gift of exploiting controversial sources in a dogmatically inoffensive form, he helped to keep alive the ideas of Plotinus and Philo. He deeply impressed Augustine, who very probably heard his sermons on Isaac. His knowledge of Platonism and his allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament facilitated Augustine's conversion. Likewise, Augustine's doctrines of original sin and grace would not have been possible without Ambrose's rediscovery of Paul.

Soon after Ambrose's death, Paulinus of Milan wrote his biography at Augustine's request. Another vita from the Carolingian period has been preserved in the Codex Sangallensis 569 (9th century).<sup>3</sup> In iconography our churchfather's attribute is the whip, since the firm stand he made against the Arians was compared with the expulsion of the merchants from the temple (Ioh. 2. 14–15). The name of Ambrose stood for the consolidation of the Church as a confessional church; because of his care for dogmatic correctness his works could be considered a common basis of both Eastern and Western Christianity. Again, he kept up successfully the spiritual independence and the moral authority of the Church against the state. Paintings from the time of the counter-reformation show the bishop holding the cross in his hand and prohibiting the Emperor from entering the church. A mosaic<sup>1</sup> portrait made soon after his death in his titular church at Milan reflects a more human aspect: his mourning for his brother. In the same cathedral, the golden altar of Wolvinus (made before 859) shows scenes from his life.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For the letters: M. ZELZER, Mittelalterliche 'Editionen' der Korrespondenz des Ambrosius als Schlüssel zur Überlieferung der Briefbücher, WS 96, n.s. 17, 1983, 160–180.

<sup>2</sup> On Ambrose's influence: P. CHERUBELLI, Sant'Ambrogio e la Rinascita. Fonti manoscritte, edizioni a stampa e iconografia del Santo nei secoli XIV, XV e XVI, in: Sant'Ambrogio nel XVI centenario della nascita, Milano 1940, 571–592.

<sup>3</sup> A. PAREDI, ed., Vita e meriti di Sant'Ambrogio. Testo inedito del secolo nono (TTr), illustrato con le miniature del Salterio di Arnolfo, Milano 1964.

Although Isidorus in his De ecclesiasticis officiis did not use Ambrose's De officiis ministrorum, Thomas Aquinas studied it (Summa theologica, pars 2), and one of Ambrose's greatest successors to the See of Milan, Carlo Borromeo (16th century), recommended it for reading.

For all his sober realism, our author exerted a lasting and far-reaching influence in the fields of poetry and music: Ambrose's hymns initiated both the medieval acme of Latin and vernacular lyrics—and the history of European music.<sup>3</sup>

Editions: Basileae 1492 (first complete edition). * J. DU FRISCHE, N. LE NOURRY (Maurine edition), 2 vols., Paris 1686–1690; repr. PL 14–17; cf. PLS 1, 569–620; 672. * K. SCHENKL, M. PETSCHENIG, O. FALLER, M. ZELZER, CSEL 32, 62, 64, 73, 78, 79, 82, Vindobonae 1897–1982. * C. SCHENKL, F. GORI, F. LUCIDI, C. MORESCHINI, G. BANTERLE, R. PALLA, E. BELLINI, M. ADRIAEN, G. COPPA, L. PIZZOLATO, M. ZELZER (TTrN, Indices), Milano 1976–1988. * Selected Works: F. X. SCHULTE (Tr), BKV 10–11, Kempten 1871–1877; J. E. NIEDERHUBER (Tr), BKV 2nd ed. 17, 2nd ed. 21, 2nd ed. 32, Kempten 1914–1917. * Seven exegetical works: M. P. McHUGH (Tr), Washington 1972. * Selected Speeches: T. KÖHLER (Tr), Leipzig 1892. * apol. Dav.: P. HADOT, M. CORDIER (TTrN), SC 239, Paris 1977. * bon. mort.: F. PORTALUPI (TrN), Torino 1961. * W. T. WIESNER (TTrC), diss. Washington 1970. * J. HUHN (TrC), Fulda 1949. * J. HUHN (C), Münster 1923. * epist.: M. M. BEYENKA (Tr), Washington (1954) corr. 1967. * cf. R. KLEIN (s. monographs). * exc.

<sup>1</sup> P. COURCELLE 1973, I (plate); 155–156 (commentary); ibid. (i–xci) rich iconographic material up to the 18th century.

<sup>2</sup> P. COURCELLE 1973, pp. xvii–xxx (plates); 169–179 (commentary).

<sup>3</sup> S. now: T. BAILEY, Ambrosianischer Gesang, in: Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 2nd edition, vol. 1, Kassel 1994, 521–546 (with rich bibl.).

Sat.: P. B. ALBERS (TN), Bonn 1921. * fug. saec.: F. PORTALUPI (TrC), Torino 1959. * hex.: E. PASTERIS (TTrC), Torino 1937. * hymn.: A. S. WALPOLE (TC), Early Latin Hymns, New York 1924, 16–114. * W. BULST, Hymni latini antiquissimi LXXV, psalmi III, Heidelberg 1956, 37–52. * M. SIMONETTI (TTr), Innologgia ambrosiana, Roma 1956. * J. FONTAINE and others (TTrC), Paris 1992. * in Luc.: G. TISSOT (TTrN), 2 vols., SC 45 and 52, Paris 1956–1958, 2nd ed.1, 1971. * in Luc., frg. in Esaiam: M. ADRIAEN, P. A. BALLERINI, CC, Turnholti 1957. * myst. (with sacr. and symb.): B. BOTTE (TTrN), Sc 25, 2nd ed. Paris 1961 (rev. and augmented). * myst. (with sacr.): J. SCHMITZ (TTr), Freiburg 1990. * Nab.: M. R. P. MCGUIRE (TrC), diss. Washington, D.C. 1927. * J. HUHNS (TTr), Freiburg 1950. * L. MOLLE (TTr), Brescia 1952. * NT: R. W. MUNCEY (T, Indices), Cambridge 1959. * obit. Theod.: M. D. MANNIX (TTrC), diss. Washington 1925. * obit. Valent.: T. A. KELLY (TTrC), diss. Washington 1940. * off.: F. BITTNER (Tr, with Cic. off.), Braunsberg 1849. * A. CAVASIN (TTrC), Torino 1938. * M. TESTARD (TTrN), 2 vols., Paris 1: 1984; 2: 1992. * paenit.: R. GRYSON (TTrN), SC 179, Paris 1971. * spir.: G. CONE (TTrC), Münster 1978. * symb.: R. H. CONNOLLY (TTrN), Cambridge 1952. * Tob.: L. M. ZUCKER (TrC), diss. Washington, D.C. 1933. * M. GIACCHERO (TTr), Genova 1965. * virg.: O. FALLER, Bonn 1935. * E. (= I.) Cazzaniga, Torino 1948. * virginit.: M. SALVATI (TN), Torino 1939. * E. (= I.) Cazzaniga, Torino 1954. * Ambrosiast.: H. J. VOGELS, CSEL 81, 1–3, Vindobonae 1966–1969. * Corpus Ambrosiano-liturgicum 1: Das Sacramentarium triplex: Die Handschrift C 43 der Zentralbibliothek Zürich, ed. O. HEIMING, 2nd part: Wortschatz und Ausdrucksformen. Ein Wortverzeichnis . . . von J. FREI, Münster 1983. * Paulinus, Vita Ambr.: M. S. KANIECKA (TN), diss. Washington, D.C. 1928. * M. PELLEGRINO, Roma 1961. * A. A. R. BASTIAENSEN, L. CANALI, C. CARENA, C. MORESCHINI, Vita di Cipriano, Vita di Ambrogio, Vita di Agostino (TTrC), Milano 1975. * M. SIMONETTI (the same texts), Roma 1977. * I. OPELT, E. DASSMANN (Tr with additional material), Düsseldorf 1967. ** Index: L. KRESTAN, Wortindex zu den Schriften des hl. Ambrosius. Nach der Sammlung von O. FALLER bearbeitet, Wien 1979 (= CSEL suppl. 4: materials for a Lexicon Ambrosianum). ** Bibl.: Altaner 9th ed., 378–389. * P. F. BEATRICE (and others), Cento anni di bibliografia ambrosiana, Milano 1981.

L. ALFONSI, L'ecphrasis ambrosiana del 'libro delle api' virgiliano, VetChr 2, 1965, 129–138. * L. ALFONSI, Ambrogio 'Ciceronianus', V Chr 20, 1966, 83–85. * L. BEATO, Teologia della malattia in S. AMBROGIO, Torino 1968. * M. BIERMANN, Die Leichenreden des Ambrosius von Mailand. Rhetorik, Predigt, Politik, Stuttgart 1995. * H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Ambrosius von Mailand als Kirchenpolitiker, Berlin 1929. * C. CORBELLINI, Il problema della militia in sant' Ambrogio, Historia 27, 1978, 630–636. * P. COURCELLE, Plotin et saint Ambroise, RPh 76, 1950, 29–56. * P. COURCELLE, Nouveaux aspects du platonisme chez saint Ambroise, REL 34, 1956, 220–239.

- * P. COURCELLE, De Platon à saint Ambroise par Apulée. Parallèles textuels entre le De excessu fratris et le De Platone, RPh 87, 1961, 15–28. * P. COURCELLE, Ambroise de Milan, 'professeur de philosophie', RHR 181, 1972, 147–155. * P. COURCELLE, Recherches sur saint Ambroise. 'Vies' anciennes, culture, iconographie, Paris 1973. * P. COURCELLE, Des sources antiques à l'iconographie médiévale de saint Ambroise, in: G. LAZZATI, ed., 1, 1976, 171–199 (with bibl.). * E. DASSMANN, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius von Mailand. Quellen und Entfaltung, Münster 1965. * M. D. DIEDERICH, Vergil in the Works of St. Ambrose, diss. Washington 1931. * J. DOIGNON, La tradition latine (Cicéron, Sénèque) et l'épisode des Sirènes entre les mains d'Ambroise de Milan, in: Hommages à J. COUSIN. Rencontres avec l'antiquité classique, Paris 1983, 271–278. * H. DÖRRIE, Das fünffach gestufte Mysterium. Der Aufstieg der Seele bei Porphyrios und Ambrosius, in: Mullus, FS T. KLAUSER, JbAC, suppl. vol. 1, Münster 1964, 79–92. * G. M. DREVES, Aurelius Ambrosius, 'der Vater des Kirchengesanges'. Eine hymnologische Studie, Freiburg 1893, repr. 1968. * Y. M. DUVAL, ed., Ambroise de Milan. XVI<sup>e</sup> centenaire de son élection épiscopale. Dix études, Paris 1974. * J. FONTAINE, Prose et poésie. L'interférence des genres et styles dans la création littéraire d'Ambroise de Milan, in: Ambrosius Episcopus 1, Milano 1976, 124–170. * A. FRANZ, Tageslauf und Heilsgeschichte. Untersuchungen zum literarischen Text und liturgischen Kontext der Tageszeitenhymnen des Ambrosius von Mailand, St. Ottilien 1994. * M. FUHRMANN, Macrobius und Ambrosius, Philologus 107, 1963, 301–308. * T. GRAUMANN, Christus interpretis. Die Einheit von Auslegung und Verkündigung in der Lukaserklärung des Ambrosius von Mailand, Berlin 1994. * R. GRYSON, Le prêtre selon saint Ambroise, diss. Louvain 1968. * P. HADOT, Platon et Plotin dans trois sermons de saint Ambroise, REL 34, 1956, 202–220. * V. HAHN, Das wahre Gesetz. Eine Untersuchung der Auffassung des Ambrosius von Mailand vom Verhältnis der beiden Testamente, Münster 1969. * L. HERRMANN, Ambrosius von Mailand als Trinitätstheologe, ZKG 69, 1958, 197–218. * C. HILL, Classical and Christian Traditions in Some Writings of Saint Ambrose of Milan, diss. Oxford 1979. * O. HILTBRUNNER, Die Schrift De officiis ministrorum des hl. Ambrosius und ihr ciceronisches Vorbild, Gymnasium 71, 1964, 174–189. * F. HOMES-DUDDEN, The Life and Times of St. Ambrose, 2 vols., Oxford 1935. * C. JACOB, 'Arkandisziplin', Allegorese, Mystagogie. Ein neuer Zugang zur Theologie des Ambrosius von Mailand, Frankfurt 1990. * R. JOHANNY, L'eucharistie. Centre de l'histoire du salut chez saint Ambroise de Milan, Paris 1968. * R. KLEIN, Die Kaiserbriefe des Ambrosius. Zur Problematik ihrer Veröffentlichung, Athenaeum, n.s. 48, 1970, 335–371. * R. KLEIN, ed., Der Streit um den Viktoriaaltar. Die dritte Relatio des Symmachus und die Briefe 17, 18 und 57 des Mailänder Bischofs Ambrosius (TTrN), Darmstadt 1972. * R. KLEIN, Die Sklaverei in der Sicht der Bischöfe Ambrosius und Augustinus, Stuttgart 1988. * G. H. KRAMER, Ambrosius

- van Milaan en de geschiedenis, Amsterdam 1983. With a summary in English.
- * G. LAZZATI, Il valore letterario della esegesi ambrosiana, Milano 1960.
- * G. LAZZATI, ed., Ambrosius episcopus. Atti del Congresso internazionale di studi ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della elevazione di sant' Ambrogio alla cattedra episcopale (1974), 2 vols., Milano 1976.
- * H. LEEB, Die Psalmodie bei Ambrosius, Wien 1967.
- * P. D. LÖPFE, Die Tugendlehre des hl. Ambrosius, diss. Fribourg (Switzerland) 1947, Sarnen 1951.
- * E. LUCCHESI, L'usage de Philon dans l'œuvre exégétique de saint Ambroise. Une 'Quellenforschung' relative aux commentaires d'Ambroise sur la Genèse, Leiden 1977.
- * G. MADEC, Saint Ambroise et la philosophie, Paris 1974.
- * B. MAES, La loi naturelle selon Ambroise de Milan, Roma 1967.
- * S. MAZZARINO, Storia sociale del vescovo Ambrogio, Roma 1989.
- * N. B. McLYNN, Ambrose of Milan. Church and Court in a Christian Capital, Berkeley 1994.
- * C. MORESCHINI, Ambrosius von Mailand, in: M. GRESCHAT, ed., Gestalten der Kirchengeschichte, Alte Kirche 2, Stuttgart 1984, 101–123.
- * C. MORINO, Church and State in the Teaching of St. Ambrose, translated by M. J. COSTELLOE, Washington 1969.
- * G. MÜLLER, Arzt, Kranker und Krankheit bei Ambrosius von Mailand, AGM 51, 1967, 193–216.
- * G. NAUROY, La structure du De Isaac vel anima et la cohérence de l'allégorèse d'Ambroise de Milan, REL 63, 1985, 210–236.
- * R. T. OTTEN, Caritas and the Ascent Motif in the Exegetical Works of St. Ambrose, StudPatr 8, 1966, 442–448.
- * J.-R. PALANQUE, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire romain, Paris 1933.
- * A. PAREDI, S. Ambrogio e la sua età, Milano 2nd ed. 1960; Engl. transl. by J. COSTELLOE, Notre Dame, Indiana 1963.
- * L. F. PIZZOLATO, La Explanatio Psalmorum XII. Studio letterario sulla esegesi di sant' Ambrogio, Milano 1965.
- * L. F. PIZZOLATO, La dottrina esegetica di sant' Ambrogio, Milano 1978.
- * M. L. RICCI, Definizione della prudentia in Sant' Ambrogio, a proposito di De excessu fratris 44–48, SIFC 41, 1969, 247–262.
- * M. L. RICCI, Fortuna di una formula ciceroniana presso Sant' Ambrogio. A proposito di iustitia, SIFC 43, 1971, 222–245.
- * P. ROLLERO, La expositio evangelii secundum Lucam di Ambrogio come fonte della esegesi agostiniana, Torino 1958.
- * S. RUIZ, Investigationes historicae et litterariae in Sancti Ambrosii De obitu Valentiniiani et De obitu Theodosii imperatorum orationes funebres, diss. München (1969) 1971.
- * H. SAVON, Quelques remarques sur la chronologie des œuvres de saint Ambroise, StudPatr 10, 1970, 156–160.
- * H. SAVON, Saint Ambroise devant l'exégèse de Philon le Juif, 2 vols., Paris 1977.
- * H. SAVON, Saint Ambroise et saint Jérôme, lecteurs de Philon, ANRW 2, 21, 1, 1984, 731–759.
- * K.-P. SCHNEIDER, Christliches Liebesgebot und weltliche Ordnungen. Historische Untersuchungen zu Ambrosius von Mailand, diss. Köln 1975.
- * W. SEIBEL, Fleisch und Geist beim hl. Ambrosius, diss. München 1958.
- * A. SOLIGNAC, Nouveaux parallèles entre saint Ambroise et Plotin. Le De Iacob et vita beata et le Περὶ εὐδαιμονίας (Enn. 1. 4), ArchPhilos 20, 1956, 148–156.
- * W. STEIDLE, Beobachtungen zu des Ambrosius Schrift De officiis,

V Chr 38, 1984, 18–66. * W. STEIDLE, Beobachtungen zum Gedanken-gang im zweiten Buch von Ambrosius, De officiis, V Chr 39, 1985, 280–298. * W. STEIDLE, Die Leichenrede des Ambrosius für Kaiser Theodosius und die Helena-Legende, V Chr 32, 1978, 94–112. * L. J. SWIFT, St. Ambrose on Violence and War, TAPhA 101, 1970, 533–543. * L. TAORMINA, Sant’Ambrogio e Plotino, MSLC 4, 1953, 41–85. * M. TESTARD, Observations sur le thème de la conscientia dans le De officiis ministrorum de saint Ambroise, REL 51, 1973, 219–261. * M. TESTARD, Observations sur la rhétorique d’une harangue au peuple dans le Sermo contra Auxentium de saint Ambroise, REL 63, 1985, 193–209. * M. ZELZER, Ambrosius von Mailand und das Erbe der klassischen Tradition, WS 100, 1987, 201–226.

JEROME

Life and Dates

Jerome (Eusebius Sofronius Hieronymus) was born about 345/348 at Stridon (Dalmatia)<sup>1</sup> into a wealthy Christian family. When a boy he came to Rome to gain first-hand knowledge of Latin literature from the great grammarian Aelius Donatus; even in his later years he would take delight in quoting his master’s favorite authors, especially Virgil and Terence. He was christened in the same city, though not before having tasted some of life’s worldly pleasures. It was only later during a stay in the imperial city of Trier (Treves) in Gaul that he dedicated himself to ascetic discipline. The repeated dismissals and exiles of Athanasius had publicized the ideals of Egyptian monasticism in the West. From Aquileia, the home of his fellow-student Rufinus (d. 410) who translated Origen, he suddenly left for a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.<sup>2</sup> Disease compelled him to stay in Antioch; then he lived about three years (probably until 377) as a hermit in the desert of Chalcis in East Syria, improving his knowledge of Greek (a language he had begun to study only before his departure for the Orient) and learning Hebrew with a monk of Jewish origin (epist. 125. 12).<sup>1</sup> In Antioch he was among the audience of the exegete Apollinarius of Laodicea.<sup>2</sup> There Bishop Paulinus ordained him priest (between 377 and 379: c. Ioh. 41). During the Council of Constantinople (381) he hung on the words of Gregory of Nazianzus and became enthusiastic about Origen, whose writings he translated in part. In fact, without Origen's work as an editor and exegete, Jerome's œuvre would not have been possible. He also met Gregory of Nyssa.

<sup>1</sup> At the standard age of about 7 years he entered grammar school at Rome in 354 (in Ruf. 1. 30; epist. 128. 4); P. JAY, Sur la date de naissance de saint Jérôme, REL 51, 1973, 262–280 (birthdate between 345 and 347); A. D. BOOTH, The Date of Jerome’s Birth, Phoenix 33, 1979, 346–353 (birthdate towards the end of 347 or early in 348). Earlier dates are less convincing: before September 30, 330: P. HAMBLLENNE, La longévité de Jérôme: Prosper avait-il raison?, Latomus 28, 1966, 1081–1119; for 331: J. N. D. KELLY 1975, 337–339. For the localization of Stridon (= Strigova): I. FODOR, Le lieu d’origine de saint Jérôme. Reconsidération d’une vieille controverse, RHE 81, 1986, 498–500; for divergent views see ibid.

<sup>2</sup> A. D. BOOTH, The Chronology of Jerome’s Early Years, Phoenix 35, 1981, 237–259 dates the departure from 368; for 372: J. H. D. SCOURFIELD, Jerome, Antioch

Together with Paulinus and Epiphanius of Salamis he then went to Rome where he would stay three years (382–385). As secretary of Pope Damasus he was ordered to revise the Latin Bible, which would become his life's work. He won over a group of laymen for his ascetic ideals, among them the noble widows Marcella and Paula. When Paula's daughter Blesilla died—allegedly from excessive fasting—public temper exploded against the genus detestabile monachorum (epist. 39. 6). A few weeks later Damasus died (384) and Jerome received due acknowledgement for his criticism of the Roman clergy (epist. 22): he was ignored as a candidate for papacy and, in his turn, suspected of immorality. Disillusioned, he went first to Antioch, followed by Paula and her other daughter, Eustochium, then to Alexandria, where he attended the lectures of Didymus the Blind, an adherent of Origen. In Bethlehem, where he would stay from 386 until his death, he founded with Paula's generous help three nunneries and a monastery for men. He donated his big library to the monastery school, where he introduced sons of noble families to the Roman classics. Even there his life was not undisturbed: during the Pelagian conflict heretics set his cloisters on fire. Invasions of Huns, Isaurians, and Saracens followed. The Origenist controversy, a posthumous defamation of the greatest Greek ecclesiastical author, caused Jerome to reject loudly the teacher he had previously admired and to persecute with hatred his old friend Rufinus, who had shown more character.

---

and the Desert. A Note on Chronology, JThS n.s. 37, 1986, 117–121, esp. 117.

<sup>1</sup> Before Jerome, Origen and Jerome's teacher Apollinarius had studied Hebrew; the letters epist. 29–30; 32 refer to 384 (Rome).

<sup>2</sup> P. JAY, Jérôme auditeur d'Apollinaire de Laodicée à Antioche, REAug 20, 1974, 36–41 dates the studies with Apollinarius after the stay in the desert.

He also participated in the hateful campaign against John Chrysostom, one of the noblest figures in ecclesiastical history. Jerome died about 420.

Survey of Works

Jerome's principal work is the Latin Bible, which from the 9th century onward would be called the Vulgate. The New Testament, written between 382 and 384, is a revised version of older Latin translations on the basis of the Greek original. The Old Testament is a completely new translation from the original languages: Hebrew, Aramaic,<sup>1</sup> or Greek<sup>2</sup> (391-405). Jerome omitted the following Apocrypha: The Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus (Sirach), Baruch, Esdras 3-4, Maccabees. We have three versions of the Psalms: a very conservative revision of the so-called Psalterium Romanum, a somewhat more radical adaptation following Origen's Hexapla (Psalterium Gallicanum, the Vulgate), and a translation faithful to the original (Psalterium iuxta Hebraeos) which was never used in liturgy. Moreover, there are two versions of Job and the Song of Songs.

Jerome also translated some Exegetical Sermons of Origen, Didymus' On the Holy Ghost and the Monastic Rule of Pachomius of Egypt. His Chronicle is based on Eusebius and Suetonius (and updated until 378). He adapted the commentary on Revelation by Victorinus Pictaviensis.

He wrote commentaries on many biblical books: all Prophets, Psalms, Ecclesiastes, Matthew and four of Paul's Letters. Other works connected with his study of the Bible are: De situ et nominibus locorum Hebraicorum (following the Onomasticon of Eusebius), De nominibus Hebraicis (according to pseudo-Philo). Especially noteworthy are the Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim.

Most of the polemical works defend ascetic discipline: against Jovinian Jerome defends celibacy and fasting (in two books), against Helvidius the eternal virginity of Mary, against Vigilantius the cult of reliques, monastic life, and celibacy. At the same time he tries to cleanse himself from the suspicion of Origenism. In other pamphlets he attacks Origenists (Contra Ioannem Hierosolymitanum and Adversus Rufinum, in three books) and Pelagians (Contra Pelagianus, in three books).

His Sermons are mostly exegetic in accordance with his main interest.

Of the 150 Letters, 26 were written by others (among these ten by Augustine). Further letters of Jerome are found in Augustine's correspondence, even in its recently discovered parts (CSEL 88, 1981 N° * 27).<sup>3</sup> There are exegetic and antiheretical epistles; there are missives encouraging ascetic discipline, personal communications, letters of recommendation and consolation, obituaries and biographies.

<sup>1</sup> Tobias and Judith.

<sup>2</sup> The later parts of Daniel and Esther.

<sup>3</sup> 39; 68; 72; 75; 81; 123; 165; 172; 202.

We owe to his tireless pen the first history of Christian literature: the De viris illustribus. This work, which contains brief portraits of 135 Christian authors, was written in 392 at the request of Jerome's friend Dexter.

The legendary Lives of Saints would meet with a good response through the centuries. Thanks to Jerome, Paul, the hermit of Thebes, became a Latin companion to the Greek monk Anthony; they would be painted together on Grünewald's (d. 1528) Isenheim Altar.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Before Jerome it was unheard of for a Latin author to learn Hebrew systematically. Many of his contemporaries, even Augustine, did not understand why he went back to the original. To revise the old Latin Bible translation, he used Origen's Hexapla. His exegetic works were also based on the original: the Commentary on Ecclesiastes is the first Latin commentary on a book of the Bible which refers to the Hebrew text.

Jerome transmitted many Greek ideas to the West.<sup>1</sup> Most of all he learnt from Origen's works; nevertheless he defamed that giant among churchfathers as a heretic later on. He also used Greek sources for his Chronicle and his De viris illustribus.

He had a special liking for Latin literature, so much so that he felt guilty of 'Ciceronianism' before the Eternal Judge (epist. 22). He was not only familiar with the classics but also with Christian Latin authors. The influence of Tertullian, an author congenial to his temperament, shows in the denouncement of marriage in the Adversus Iovinianum.

For the influence of biographies, novels, and itineraries s. below.

Literary Technique

Jerome is a brilliant writer of letters, an enthralling story-teller—the reader will remember the monk imprisoned by the Bedouins in the Life of Malchus—and a pitiless pamphletist.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also W. C. McDERMOTT, Saint Jerome and Pagan Greek Literature, V Chr 36, 1982, 372–382.

He also masters the sophisticated literary form of dialogue, as appears in his best polemical work, the Adversus Pelagianos. In the Life of Malchus, the story within the story gives the impression of multiple framing, thus enhancing the flavor of legend and fairy-tale. The narrative presented in the first person is reminiscent of Ulysses and the Golden Ass. The theme of chastity and adventurous action are constituents of the ancient novel.

The Romans' interest in biographies was developed further by Jerome, who insisted on typical and symbolic elements. Athanasius' Life of Anthony, Latinized by a friend of Jerome's, Evagrius of Antioch, had become for our author the Magna Charta of spiritual life. On this basis, he contributed to the rise of a Latin hagiography to meet literary standards. His legends of Paul of Thebes, Malchus, and Hilarion created a literary form out of elements from fairy-tales, novels, and aretologies of pagan miracle-workers—such as Philostratus' Life of Apollonius of Tyana;<sup>1</sup> a comparable phenomenon is the Life of Martin by Sulpicius Severus. In a manner both learned and graceful, Jerome reports historical or quasi-historical events in order to propagate the ascetic way of life.

The obituary of Paula (epist. 108) combines two Roman traditions: laudatio funebris and itinerarium. At that time the Peregrinatio Aetheriae or Egeriae had already been published.<sup>2</sup>

Language and Style

Lactantius' claim to be a 'Christian Cicero' was truly fulfilled by Jerome. It is true that he occasionally uses a late Latin word like confortare or an infinitive to denote an intention, but in general his Latin is pure and clear. His linguistic conscience even labels the use of comparare for emere as a barbarism (c. Ruf. 3. 6). Together with Plautus and Cicero Jerome is our most important source of Latin terms of abuse.

Like Cicero's, Jerome's Latin covers a wide range of modes of expression. On the one hand, there is the emotional and rhetorical style of the genus grande, on the other hand, the plain and factual language of teaching. In real life Jerome adheres to the sancta simplicitas; in literature he avoids the verbosa rusticitas.<sup>1</sup> His style, though intended to be plain, is anything but simplistic and is enlivened with an undefinable personal fervor.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. R. REITZENSTEIN, Hellenistische Wundererzählungen, Darmstadt 3rd ed. 1974; A. JOLLES, Einfache Formen, Tübingen 5th ed. 1974, 23–61; H. ROSENFELD, Legende, Stuttgart 3rd ed. 1972; H. KECH 1977; M. FUHRMANN 1977.

<sup>2</sup> Roughly in the same epoch Sulpicius Severus wrote three books of Dialogi with a report on Postumius' pilgrimage to the Egyptian monks, and Rufinus of Aquileia translated the influential Story of the Egyptian Monks.

Jerome was cut out to be a satirist. He denounces hypocrisy by using diminutives: quasi religiosulus et sanctulus (c. Ruf. 3. 7); a devastating antithesis unmasks incompetence: tantam habes Graeci Latiniq[ue] sermonis scientiam, ut et Graeci te Latinum et Latini te Graecum putent, 'you are so skilled in Greek and Latin that the Greeks take you for a Latin speaker and the Latin speakers hold that you are Greek' (c. Ruf. 3. 6). His criticism of clerics deserves closer attention (epist. 22. 4): first there are indignant exclamations: puget dicere, pro nefas! 'There is another scandal of which I blush to speak'. A dry statement follows: triste, sed verum est, 'yet, though sad, it is true'. Then a series of questions, anaphorically introduced by unde: unde in ecclesias agapetarum pestis introiit? Unde sine nuptiis aliud nomen uxorum? Immo unde novum concubinarum genus? Plus inferam: unde meretrices univirae?, 'From what source has this plague of dearly beloved sisters found its way into the Church? Whence come these unwedded wives, these new types of concubines, nay, I will go further, these one-man-harlots?' The two last members of the series are graphically separated from the preceding text. While the sentences become shorter and shorter, the terms denoting the ladies become ever stronger: agapetarum, uxorum, concubinarum, meretrices. The most poignant paradox (meretrices univirae) marks the ultimative climax. A more good-natured kind of humor shows in his address to Paula, whose daughter had become a nun, as 'God's mother-in-law' (epist. 22. 20).<sup>2</sup>

The ending of the prologue to his Commentary on Jonah is a typical example of the way he uses an entire series of antitheses to throw light on a problem, a technique sometimes reminiscent of Paul or Tertullian: illi (sc. Iudaei) habent libros, nos librorum dominum, illi tenent prophetas, nos intellegentiam prophetarum; illos occidit littera, nos vivificat spiritus (2 Cor. 3. 6), apud illos Barabbas latro dimittitur, nobis Christus Dei filius

<sup>1</sup> Nec reprehendo in quolibet Christiano sermonis imperitiam—atque utinam Socraticum illud haberemus; 'scio, quod nescio' et alterius sapientis: 'te ipsum intellege'—venerationi mihi semper fuit non verbosa rusticitas sed sancta simplicitas: qui in sermone imitari se dicit apostolos, prius imitetur in vita (epist. 57. 12. 4).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also N. ADKIN, Some Notes on the Style of Jerome's Twenty-Second Letter, RFIC 112, 1984, 287–291.

solvitur, 'they have the books, we have the Lord of the books, they keep the prophets, we the understanding of the prophets; they are killed by the letter, we are vivified by the spirit; with them, Barabbas the robber is released, for us Christ, God's son, is given'. The same device occurs in his denial of Origen: laudavi interpretem, non dogmatisten, ingenium, non fidem, philosophum, non apostolum, 'I praised the translator, not the dogmatist; his intelligence, not his faith; the philosopher, not the apostle' (epist. 84. 2. 2).

His prose rhythm is indicative of the transition from quantitative metrics to metrics based on word accent.<sup>1</sup> In conspicuous passages Jerome is anxious to use clausulae meeting classical standards; an example is the ending of the Vita Malchi (10): pudicitiam non esse captivam (cretic and trochee) hominem Christo deditum posse mori, non posse superari (first paeon and trochee), 'that chastity is not taken by force, that a man devoted to Christ can die, but not be overcome'.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Jerome considers the translation of the Bible as his work. His achievement was a synthesis of the traditional Roman art of free adaptation of Greek models—he himself points to Cicero and the writers of comedies—and the Christian tradition of literal translation. On the one hand, he was not satisfied with the 'inspired' Septuagint but referred to the Hebrew original, an innovation unheard of in the Latin West; on the other, he was eager to respect the spirit of the Latin language. His translation was meant to evince both the truth and the beauty of the Bible.

He believes in the infallibility of Scripture and its real (not verbal) inspiration. While acknowledging the deeper significance of the original word order and trying to preserve it in his translation (epist. 57. 4), he also knows that a living thought cannot be translated word for word into another language. He quotes Horace (133–134): nec verbum verbo<sup>2</sup> curabis reddere fidus/interpres, 'and you will not seek to render word by word as a slavish translator' and he sneers: quam vos veritatem interpretationis, hanc eruditi κοκοζηλίον nuncupant, 'what you call exactness of translation, the learned men call bad style' (epist. 57. 5. 5-6.).<sup>1</sup> His respect for the laws of his mother-tongue recalls Luther's Missive on Translating. For all his quoting of Cicero and Horace, Jerome was a much more faithful translator than they had been. The Vulgate is a momentous achievement.

<sup>1</sup> In need of revision: P. C. KNOOK, De overgang van metrisch tot rythmisch proza bij Cyprianus en Hieronymus, Purmerend 1932; M. C. HERRON, A Study of the Clausulae of St. Jerome, Washington 1937; innovative: J. H. D. SCOURFIELD, Notes on the Text of Jerome, Letters 1 and 107, CQ n.s. 37, 2, 1987, 487–497.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also Sen. epist. 9. 20.

In the Bible, which (in theory) had to replace pagan literature, he found pertinent examples of different literary genres (cf. epist. 53. 8. 16-19). Within a single genre he discovers individual differences of style: while his favorite Isaiah is eloquent, noble, urbane, Ezekiel is dark (in Is. prol.). He even discerns variation of style within single works, e.g. between prosaic and poetic passages (interpr. Iob prol.).

If the word of the Scriptures had to be taken seriously as a message for Jerome's time, an art of interpretation was indispensable. The very principle of literal adherence to the text called for hermeneutics. As Jerome deemed exegesis a productive activity, he compared it to literary creativity (cf. epist. 53. 7) and wanted it done by specialists. Just as the ancient Romans, starting with Livius Andronicus, had simultaneously become acquainted with Homer and his Greek interpreters and exploited both for new literary creations, now was the time to convey to the Occident both the Bible and its Greek exegetes. Jerome's literary activity was meant to serve the Word: non tam disertudinem ostendet suam quam sensum eius quem exponit edisserat, 'he should not so much show his own eloquence but rather render the meaning of the author he is explaining' (in Ion. prol.). Above all, he is an exegete: optoque, si fieri potest, etsi adversarii saevierint, commentarios potius scripturarum quam Demosthenis et Tullii Philippicas scribere, 'I had rather, if possible, and even if my opponents should rage, write commentaries of the Scriptures than Philippics like Demosthenes and Cicero' (epist. 57. 13).

The ancient classics were his great love. The most difficult part of ascetic discipline for him was to renounce pagan books. The principle of 'use' (χρεία) made the classical literary forms available to Christian writers, notwithstanding their pagan content. Thus it became possible to adapt the noble language of classical literature to

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Hieronymus, Liber de optimo genere interpretandi (epist. 57). Ein Kommentar von G. J. M. BARTELINK, Leiden 1980, 59-60.

Christian ideas and even to use classical and Christian examples indiscriminately.

However, Jerome deemed childish the Christian interpretation of isolated sentences from pagan texts and the poetry of Centones based on this 'method' (epist. 53. 9).

Biblical elements may find pagan parallels: Socrates' wise ignorance matches the thirst for God's justice in the Old Covenant. Both classical antiquity and the Old Testament are outshone by the Gospels: they are the sole source of true knowledge (epist. 53. 9).

Ideas II

Initially—e.g. in his commentaries on Paul's Letters—Jerome felt more attracted to allegorical interpretation, later—e.g. in his commentary on Matthew—he rather stressed the literal sense. His own interpretations suffer from haste and lack of independence; in addition, these same vices make his chronological information a real maze for historians of literature.

Independent thought was dangerous in that period. Jerome at any rate did not submit to this temptation. Whenever thinkers were called to account, he always made it to the 'right' side just in time, ready to follow the latest instructions and throw the first stone on former friends. He expressed his allegiance to the pope (whose secretary he was) more explicitly than any earlier writer. It was more important to him to belong to the group than to care for individual friends or ideas, a state of mind reminiscent of the old Roman unity of politics and religion. Calling him a great scholar would perhaps be giving him too much credit, classifying him as a mere compiler and intermediary, certainly much too little. To do justice to his personality we should keep in mind that he 'remains an exegete even when writing pamphlets'.<sup>1</sup> This has pros and cons; he frequently answers logical objections with indications of sources, quotations, and authorities.

Under these circumstances it is almost impossible to speak of a 'world of ideas' of Jerome. In accordance with inveterate Roman habits he shows an orator's indifference to philosophical truth. The monk's cowl did not prevent this disciple of Donatus from remaining a philologist and humanist with all the good and bad qualities of that tribe. His spiritual importance can be fully assessed only through the mirror of his influence.

---

<sup>1</sup> I. OPELT 1973, 196.

For us, he painted a priceless portrait of his time. His grief for Rome<sup>1</sup> is more moving and more humane than the corresponding remarks of Augustine, who soberly directs our glance from the earthly to the celestial City.<sup>2</sup> It is true that Jerome through his closeness to Damasus and Paula had a deeper emotional relationship to Rome than Augustine.

He uses his pen without any ascetic restraint. The more fervently he attacks the reading of pagan poets, the less he and his addressees renounce that pleasure.<sup>3</sup> He calls his own interest in belles lettres 'adultery with the foreign woman', an activity which served to enlarge the number of his companions in the service of Christ. Moreover, he has full command of the Greco-Roman art of scolding. When combating heretics he proves a master at scholarly polemics. Similarly, pagan philosophers had disparaged Epicureans, only to be paid back in their own coin by authors like Philodemus. Jerome's lively discourse is like a come-back of Horace, Persius, Juvenal, and the poets of Roman comedy.

In the course of his life, his ability for observing the human soul increased, especially under the influence of masters like Seneca and Tacitus: note the interplay of things told and untold in epist. 22.16: Clerici ipsi, quos et magisterio esse oportuerat et timori, osculantur capita patronarum et extenta manu, ut benedicere eos putes velle, si nescias, pretium accipiunt salutandi. Illae interim, quae sacerdotes suo vident indigere praesidio, eriguntur in superbiam, et quia maritorum expertae dominatum viduitatis praeferunt libertatem, castae vocantur et nonnae, et post cenam dubiam apostolos somniant, 'the very clergy, whose teaching and authority ought to inspire respect, kiss these ladies on the forehead and then stretch out their hand—you would think, if you did not know, that they were giving a benediction—to receive the fee for their visit. The women meanwhile, seeing that priests need their help, are lifted up with pride. They know by experience what a husband's rule is like and they prefer their liberty as widows. They call themselves chaste nuns, and after a so-so dinner they dream of apostles'. His sophisticated portrayal of characters—suffice it to recall the obituary of Paula—betrays a keen sense of what is individual. Praise and blame are anything but one-sided (epist. 84).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Epist. 60.16–18; Aen. 2. 368–369; epist. 123. 16; Aen. 6. 625 ff.; ibid. quid saluum est, si Roma perit (freely adapted from Lucan, 5. 274); epist. 127. 12; Aen. 2. 361–365; epist. 126. 2; in Ezech. lib. 1 praef; lib. 3 praef; cf. also K. SUGANO 1983, 54–63.

<sup>2</sup> Serm. 105. 7.

<sup>3</sup> Epist. 21. 13; 22. 29. 6–30. 6; 53.

Jerome's insistence on practical life is a Roman feature. As a spiritual adviser and propagandist he has learned a good deal from Seneca. He makes his rhetorical skills serve his ascetic ideal. The stress laid on asceticism, a feature rather surprising to the modern reader, was a bold innovation in his day, at least in the Western empire. In those times of satiety it must have been experienced as liberation, not enslavement. Like Augustine, Jerome is under the spell of Athanasius and his Life of Anthony. He acknowledges the purifying power of the Word and of scholarly work, thus spiritualizing the practical sense of the Romans. His aim is the transfiguration of all dimensions of life through the Word, the permanent dialogue with the Scriptures, and a continuous exercise in scholarship. In this respect, he has to be considered a great reformer of his age.

He transformed the didactic impulse typical of many Romans, the summum vel discendi studium vel docendi, 'the highest zeal both for learning and teaching' (Cic. rep. 2. 1 on Cato the Elder), by mastering a multitude of literary genres, and by reading with his students Virgil and the great authors of comedy, lyrics and history. He also possessed a Roman sense of history and the penchant for encyclopedic knowledge typical of his nation. After Cicero in the Brutus and Quintilian in the Tenth Book, Jerome was the third important author to try to write in Latin a history of literature, naturally under the auspices of Christianity. Like many other Romans he searched for his spiritual ancestors in the past—he sympathized with Tertullian, who like Jerome could be regarded as a victim of the Roman clergy. With the lack of modesty proper to classical antiquity he said of himself: 'I am a philosopher'—this needs qualification—'a rhetor, a grammarian, and a dialectician, a Hebrew, a Greek and a Latin'. Less euphoric was his subconscious: He dreamed that on doomsday the Lord told him: 'Thou art Ciceronian, not Christian' (epist. 22. 30).<sup>2</sup> He created a synthesis of what was Christian and Roman (as Clement, Origen, and Basil had done for the Greeks), thus contributing to the continuity of European culture. Jerome's Christian humanism was not an easy compromise but rather the first spiritualized metamorphosis of Roman culture.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the tradition of biography since Suetonius.

<sup>2</sup> N. ADKIN, Some Notes on the Dream of Saint Jerome, Philologus 128, 1984, 1, 119–126.

Tradition

Jerome was one of the most widely known authors in the Middle Ages. The transmission of his works is especially rich; here it will suffice to refer to a few of his works.

It is extremely difficult to restore the text of the Vulgate, since the manuscripts are numerous and mostly offer a mixed text (s. the editions quoted below). The codex Amiatinus in Florence (8th century) is a complete manuscript of the entire Bible; the Fuldensis (from the year 645) contains the New Testament; another manuscript of venerable age is the Foroiuliensis (6th–7th century).

Of the De viris illustribus we have numerous later and several early manuscripts: the Vaticanus Reginensis 2077 (6th–7th century), the Parisinus 12161 from Corbie (7th–8th century), the Veronensis XXII (XX) (7th–8th century), the Vercellensis 183 (8th century), the Montepessulanus 406 (8th–9th century). The Greek translation is also worthy of consideration.

For the Chronicle we might cite: Oxoniensis Bodleianus Auct. T. II. 26, olim Claramontanus, postea Meermannianus (O; 5th–6th century); Amandinus B. 229 (A; 7th–8th century); Middlehillensis 1872, now Berolinensis 127 (M; 8th–9th century); Bernensis 219, olim Bongarsianus (B; end of 7th–9th century); Leidensis Freherianus Scalig. 14 (F; early 9th century); Oxoniensis Mertonensis H. 3.15 (9th century); Petavianus Leidensis Vossianus Lat. Q 110 (P; 9th century; in addition, P contains 6 sheets, the fragmenta Petaviana Voss. Lat. Q 110 A (S; 4th century) and is to be completed by two sheets from the Vaticanus Reginensis Lat. 1709 (9th century) and 14 sheets from the Parisinus Lat. 6400 B (6th century); Londinensis Mus. Brit. 16 974 (L; 10th century); Leidensis B.P.L. 30 (c; 12th century); Vaticanus Reginensis 560 (R; 13th–14th century). OML are most important for the constitutio of the text.

In his lifetime Jerome published two collections of his letters; the collection which came down to us was in circulation soon after his death (150 letters, about 124 of which were written by Jerome). Editors select the following 'leading' manuscripts out of an especially rich tradition:<sup>1</sup> Lugdunensis 600 (6th–8th century); Parisinus nouv. acq. Lat. 446 (6th–8th century); Neapolitanus VI. D. 59 (6th–7th century); Spinaliensis 68 (8th century); Monacensis Lat. 6299 (8th–9th century); Turicensis Augiensis 41 (9th century); Parisinus Lat. 1868 (9th century); Coloniensis 35 (8th–9th century);

<sup>1</sup> B. LAMBERT 1969, vol. 1 A and B.

Berolinensis Lat. 17 (9th century); Vaticanus Lat. 355 und 356 (9th–10th century); Vaticanus Lat. 5762 (10th century); Berolinensis Lat. 18 (12th century).

As for the Biographies of Saints, the Vita Pauli is transmitted in the Veronensis XXXVIII (36) from the year 517, which is, however, inferior to Cotton Caligula A XV (8th century), Parisinus Lat. 11 748 (10th century), and Carnotensis 507 (193; 10th century). The best witness of the Vita Hilarionis is the same Parisinus, as is the Neapolitanus Lat. VI. D. (6th–8th century)<sup>1</sup> for the Vita Malchi.

Influence

Along with Ambrose, Augustine, and Gregory the Great, Jerome was acknowledged as one of the four great teachers of the Western Church. He was doubtless the most learned, though not the most sagacious of the four. The Legenda aurea suitably called him ‘The judge of his own and other people’s words’.<sup>2</sup> His creative use of language had an influence unparalleled in world literature.

His knowledge of Hebrew was an exceptional phenomenon in the Latin world, and after him, linguistic competence in the West decayed. His greatest achievement, however, the Latin translation of the Bible, was not immediately recognized. Even Augustine could not appreciate it and regretted the fact that Jerome had not instead followed the Greek Septuagint (Aug. epist. 71. 4; 82. 35). The most faithful of his three versions of the Psalms was never taken into account. For all this, the impact of the language and content of the Vulgate on European culture was deeper than that of any other Latin book; for more than a millennium—from the Carolingian epoch to the second half of the twentieth century—the Vulgate was the canonical text for the Catholic Church.

He earned an equally enduring reputation as a teacher of asceticism and a brilliant narrator of edifying stories. Legend transformed into a saint even him, who had not been ignorant of the world. When talking of his justice and peace of mind, posterity praised what he wanted to become, not what he had been. (In a similar way the phantom of a wise and dispassionate Horace was cherished by some classicists). Artists painted Jerome in his hermitage,<sup>1</sup> a tame lion couched at his feet. Was this a symbol of a temper never wholly mastered? Once and for all Jerome determined the ideal of the Western monk, an ideal combining ascetic discipline<sup>2</sup> and scholarship. The unity of asceticism and scholarship survived the Middle Ages and was represented in modern times by scientists like Mme. Curie.

<sup>1</sup> W. A. OLDFATHER, ed., Studies in the Text Tradition of St. Jerome’s Vitae Patrum, Urbana 1943; B. LAMBERT 1969, 2, 261–263.

<sup>2</sup> Jacobus a Voragine, Legenda Aurea, ed. by T. GRAESSE (3rd ed. 1890) repr. Osnabrück 1965, 653.

At a time when the political and economical order was decaying, the foundation of monasteries was of seminal importance to the survival of intellectual culture. Under Diocletian the intricate system of the Roman economy, which was based on division of labor, was locked into a planned economy and widespread governmental exploitation. When disturbed from outside, this highly vulnerable system necessarily turned into domestic economies with small self-sufficient economic units. Monasteries, which were such units, granted stability and good chances of survival to scholars and books in times of insecurity. Jerome, a great reformer in this respect, bequeathed to the monks of Western Europe the bacillus of humanistic education, thus making possible all the renaissances to come. At the same time he was himself the best example of a creative reading of the Classics. All this made him a praeceptor Europae.

Not surprisingly he was a favorite of Erasmus. Martin Luther, who was his match both as translator and master of invective,<sup>3</sup> hated the man who had initiated the thousand year tradition which he had to bring to an end.<sup>4</sup> Melanchthon, however, gave a serene and mild appraisal of Jerome, knowing well what he owed to him in legendis prophetis et in Ebraicae linguae interpretatione, 'in reading the Prophets and

<sup>1</sup> Illustrations and a catalogue: R. JUNGBLUT, Hieronymus. Darstellung und Verehrung eines Kirchenvaters, diss. Tübingen 1967.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the iconographical pattern 'Jerome in the Desert'.

<sup>3</sup> 'St. Augustine is not so angry. St. Jerome is like all of us: me, Doctor Jonas, Pommer: we are more irascible' (Table Talk 347; W.A. 2, 1, 1912 [repr. 1967], 140). As a translator, he sympathized with Jerome: 'When he was translating the Bible, everyone schooled him. He was the only one to know nothing; and that good man's work was judged by people unworthy of cleaning his shoes' (Sendbrief vom Dolmetschen, WA 30, 2, 1909, 634).

<sup>4</sup> Ergo nullum doctorem scio, quem aequè oderim, cum tamen ardentissime eum amaverim et legerim . . . Si tantum urgeret opera fidei et fructus evangelii; tantum dicit de ieiuniis etc. Staupicius meus aliquando dicebat: Ich wolt gern wissen, wie der man wer selig worden! et antecessor eius Doctor Proles dixit: Ich wolt S. Hieronymum nit gern zum prior haben gehabt (Table Talk 445 = W.A. 2, 1, 194); for the development of this antipathy: H. JUNG-HANNS, Der junge Luther und die Humanisten, Göttingen 1985, passim.

translating from Hebrew'.<sup>1</sup> Though consulting the Greek and Hebrew originals and Erasmus' Latin translation of the New Testament, Luther often remained under the spell of the Vulgate. The same is true of biblical translations in other vernacular tongues. Thus Jerome indirectly influenced the development of modern languages. The following proverb from the preface to his Commentary on Ephesians has become popular: Don't look a gift horse in the mouth.<sup>2</sup>

Editions: C. SWEYNHEIM, A. PANNARTZ, Romae 1468. * D. VALLARSI, 11 vols., Verona 1734–1742; Venetiis 2nd ed. 1766–1772, repr. in PL 22–30. * Cf. PLS 2, 17–328. * Not yet complete: CC 72–79, Turnholt 1959–1982. * Letters, hagiograph. and polem. writings: P. LEIPELT (Tr), BKV 45–46, Kempten 1872–1874. * Hist., homil., and dogm. writings: L. SCHADE (Tr), 3 vols., BKV 15, Kempten 1914, 16 and 18, München 1936–1937. * Dogmatic and Polemical Works (Tr) J. N. HRITZU, Washington 1965. * Editions of individual works: Vulgate: Biblia Sacra iuxta Latinam vulgatam versionem, H. QUENTIN and others, Roma 1926 ff. (not yet complete); N.T.: J. WORDSWORTH, H. J. WHITE, H. F. D. SPARKS, Oxford 1889–1949; J. WORDSWORTH, H. J. WHITE, ed. minor, Oxford 1911; 1920. * adv. Rufin.: P. LARDET (TTr, Index), SC 303, Paris 1983. * P. LARDET (C), Leiden 1993. * epist.: J. HILBERG, CSEL 54–56, 1910–1918. * J. LABOURT (TTr), 8 vols., Paris 1949–1963. * C. C. MIEROW, T. C. LAWLER, (TrN); vol. 1 only (epist. 1–22), Westminster, Md. 1963. * epist. 57: G. J. M. BARTELINK (TC), Leiden 1980. * epist. 60: J. H. D. SCOURFIELD (TTrC), Oxford 1993. * L. SCHADE, rev. by J. B. BAUER (Tr, selection), München 1983. * hom.: M. L. EWALD, 2 vols., Washington 1964–1966. * in Ion.: Y.-M. DUVAL (TTrC), SC 323, Paris 1985. * in Is.: R. GRYSOON, P.-A. DEPROOST (T), Freiburg 1993. * in Matth.: E. BONNARD (TTrC), 2 vols., Paris 1977–1979. * vir. ill.: E. C. RICHARDSON, Lipsiae 1896. * G. HERDING, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1924. * vita Hilar. and epist. 108: A. A. R. BASTIAENSEN, J. W. SMIT, E. CANALI, C. MORESCHINI, C. MOHRMANN (TTrC), Verona 1975. * vita Malchi: C. C. MIEROW (TTr), in: Classical Essays Presented to J. A. Kleist, St. Louis 1946, 31–60. * Three Legends: M. FUHRMANN (TrN), Zürich 1983. ** Indices: Incomplete Indices verborum, sententiarum et rerum memorabilium in vols. 2, 3, and 4 of the Maurine edition, 5 vols., Paris 1693–1706, not yet replaced. * Index of the words studied by the author, in: H. GOELZER, Etude lexicographique et grammaticale de la latinité de saint Jérôme, Paris 1884, 453–468. ** Bibl.: ALTANER 9th ed. 1980, 394–404. * Bibliographia Patristica 28 (1983), ed. by K. SCHÄFERDIEK, Berlin 1987, 113–114 (more volumes to come).

<sup>1</sup> Declamatio (oratio) de vita D. Hieronymi, Corpus Reformatorum, vol. 11, Halle 1843, no. 90 (1546), 734–741, esp. 741 (ref. kindly given to me by H. SCHEIBLE).

<sup>2</sup> In Eph. 1, praef.: noli . . . , ut vulgare proverbium est, equi dentes inspicere donati; Jan GRUTER, who ought to know better, deems it a Germanic proverb (Florilegium ethico-politicum numquam antehac editum . . . Frankfurt 1612, 43); cf. also C. LEHMANN, Florilegium Politicum, Politischer Blumen Garten, 4th ed. 1639, facsimile, ed. by W. MIEDER, Bern 1986, 288, 38.

N. ADKIN, Some Notes on the Content of Jerome's Twenty-Second Letter, GB 15, 1988, 177–186. * N. ADKIN, 'Adultery of the tongue', Jerome, Epist. 22. 29. 6 f., Hermes 121, 1993, 100–108. * N. ADKIN, Terence's Eunuchus and Jerome, RhM 137, 1994, 187–195. * P. ANTIN, Recueil sur saint Jérôme, Bruxelles 1968. * J. B. BAUER, Hieronymus und Ovid, GB 4, 1975, 13–19. * Y. BODIN, Saint Jérôme et l'Eglise, Paris 1966. * H. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, Lateinische Kirchenväter, Stuttgart 1960, repr. 1986, 109–150. * F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme. Sa vie et son œuvre, 2 vols., Louvain 1922. * E. A. CLARK, The Place of Jerome's Commentary on Ephesians in the Origenist Controversy. The Apokatastasis and Ascetic Ideals, V Chr 41, 1987, 154–171. * Y.-M. DUVAL, ed., Jérôme entre l'Occident et l'Orient. XVI<sup>e</sup> centenaire du départ de saint Jérôme de Rome et de son installation à Bethléem. Actes du Colloque de Chantilly (septembre 1986), Paris 1988. * M. FUHRMANN, Die Mönchsgeschichten des Hieronymus. Formexperimente in erzählender Literatur, Entretiens 23 (1976) 1977, 41–89. * G. GRÜTZMACHER, Hieronymus, 3 vols., Leipzig 1901; Berlin 1906 and 1908, repr. 1969. * G. GUTTILLA, Tematica cristiana e pagana nell'evoluzione finale della consolatio di San Girolamo, ALGP 17–18, 1980–1981, 87–152. * W. HAGEMANN, Wort als Begegnung mit Christus. Die christozentrische Schriftauslegung des Kirchenvaters Hieronymus, Trier 1970. * H. HAGENDAHL, Latin Fathers and the Classics. A Study on the Apologists, Jerome and Other Christian Writers, Göteborg 1958, on Jerome: 89–328. * H. HAGENDAHL, Jerome and the Latin Classics, V Chr 28, 1974, 216–227. * H. HAGENDAHL, Von Tertullian zu Cassiodor. Die profane literarische Tradition in dem lateinischen christlichen Schrifttum, Göteborg 1983. * J. N. HRITZU, The Style of the Letters of St. Jerome, diss. Washington 1939. * P. JAY, Jérôme et la pratique de l'exégèse, in: Le monde latin et la Bible, sous la direction de J. FONTAINE et C. PIETRI, Paris 1985, 523–542. * A. KAMESAR, Jerome, Greek Scholarship, and the Hebrew Bible. A Study of the Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesis, Oxford 1993. * H. KECH, Hagiographie als christliche Unterhaltungsliteratur. Studien zum Phänomen des Erbaulichen anhand der Mönchsviten des hl. Hieronymus, Göppingen 1977. * J. N. D. KELLY, Jerome. His Life, his Writings, and Controversies, London 1975. * A. F. J. KLIJN, Jérôme, Isaïe 6 et l'évangile des Nazoréens, V Chr 40, 1986, 245–250. * B. LAMBERT, Bibliotheca Hieronymiana manuscripta. La tradition manuscrite des œuvres de saint Jérôme, vols. 1 A and B, 2, 3 A and B, 4 A and B, Steenbrugge and Den Haag 1969–1972. * B. LÖFSTEDT, Hieronymus' Kommentare zu den Kleinen Propheten, Aclass 25, 1982, 119–126. * I. OPELT, Hieronymus' Streitschriften, Heidelberg 1973. * I. OPELT, Lukrez bei Hieronymus, Hermes 100, 1972, 76–81. * I. OPELT, Hieronymus' Leistung als Literaturhistoriker in der Schrift De viris illustribus, Orpheus, n.s. 1, 1980, 52–75. * S. REBENICH, Hieronymus und sein Kreis. Prosopographische und sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, Stuttgart 1992. * H. SAVON, Saint Ambroise et saint Jérôme, lecteurs de Philon, ANRW 2, 21, 1, 1984, 731–759. * F. W. SCHLATTER, A Mosaic Interpretation of Jerome, in Hiezechielem, V Chr 49, 1994, 64–81. * J. STEINMANN, Hieronymus, Ausleger der Bibel, transl. by A. SCHORN, Köln 1961 (popular). * K. SUGANO, Das Rombild des Hieronymus, Frankfurt 1983. * S. VISINTAINER, La dottrina del peccato in San Girolamo, Roma, Univ. Gregoriana 1962. * D. S. WIESEN, St. Jerome as a Satirist. A Study in Christian Latin Thought and Letters, Ithaca, N.Y. 1964. * M. WISSEMANN, Schimpfworte in der Bibelübersetzung des Hieronymus, Heidelberg 1992.

RUFINUS AND OTHER TRANSLATORS

Translators, a modest and often despised group of authors, deserve to be mentioned here, if only briefly. Their influence was greater than their renown. Translations were especially important both during the early period of Latin literature and during its revival in late antiquity, though in different ways. In the epoch under consideration here they exerted a short term and a long term influence.

For the moment these Latin translations answered the need of western readers for information about the monastic life style which had emerged in the east; moreover, there was increasing interest in Greek philosophy and its Christian metamorphosis, Origen's biblical exegesis. The rise of Latin literature in the second half of the 4th century and in the early 5th century only became possible owing to such translations.

In the long run these translations from the Greek would strongly influence medieval philosophy and science.

In the west Victorinus Pictaviensis (of Pettau; end of the 3rd century) was a harbinger of biblical exegesis in the style of the Greek Fathers. He probably was a Greek. Of the numerous mediators and translators, Marius Victorinus, Hilary,<sup>1</sup> Ambrose, and Jerome are discussed in their own chapters. Here we would like to draw our readers' attention to two names: Rufinus of Aquileia and Calcidius.

---

<sup>1</sup> In his commentaries which resemble free translations, Hilary conveys Origen's ideas to his readers.

Tyrannius (Turranius) Rufinus<sup>1</sup> of Aquileia, Jerome's friend (and later his enemy) translated numerous works of Origen, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, monastic literature and Eusebius' Chronicle. Several important texts have come down to us owing to Rufinus only, who never disclaimed Origen, whereas Jerome (though tacitly copying that great master) publicly condemned him and defamed his friend.

The influential Vita of St. Anthony of Athanasius was twice translated into Latin in the 4th century; the first anonymous version<sup>2</sup> was rough in style, the second one, by Evagrius<sup>3</sup> (2nd half of the 4th century), was more elegant. The Life of Anthony had a strong influence on the mode of life of Christians and, in addition, on the literary genres of biography and autobiography.

C(h)alcidius<sup>4</sup> wrote a rather careful translation of and a commentary on Plato's Timaeus (up to p. 53 c). This work was formerly assigned to the first half of the 4th century; today a date after 400 is preferred; his models are mostly traced to the 2nd century (Adrastus, Numenius). Today scholars suppose that Calcidius was influenced by Neoplatonism (Porphyry), although this had been denied. Our author, who was a Christian, added biblical and Roman exempla. Up to the end of the 12th century, Calcidius would remain the principal source for the knowledge of Plato.

<sup>1</sup> Editions: M. SIMONETTI, Tyrannii Rufini opera, Turnholti 1961 (= CC 20); De principis: H. GÖRGEMANNS, H. KARPP, Darmstadt 1976; hist. mon.: E. SCHULZ-FLÜGEL (with bibl.), Berlin 1990; reg. Bas.: PL 103, 487–554 Migne; A commentary on the Apostles' Creed. Translated and annotated by J. N. D. KELLY, London 1955; further bibl. in W. BERSCHIN, Medioevo greco-latino, Napoli 1989, 61–62 with n.; A. SEELE, Römische Übersetzer. Nöte, Freiheiten, Absichten. Verfahren des literarischen Übersetzens in der griechisch-römischen Antike, Darmstadt 1995; F. X. MURPHY, Rufinus of Aquileia, Washington D.C. 1945; M. WAGNER, Rufinus the Translator, Washington D.C. 1945.

<sup>2</sup> Edition: H. HOPPENBROUWERS, diss. Nijmegen 1960; cf. W. BERSCHIN, ibid. 64–65.

<sup>3</sup> Edition: Patr. Graec. 26, 835–976 MIGNE.

<sup>4</sup> Editions: Aug. IUSTINIANUS, Paris 1520 (editio princeps); J.-H. WASZINK, in: Plato Latinus, vol. 4, 1962; J. DEN BOEFT, Calcidius on Demons (comm. ch. 127–136), Leiden 1977; bibl.: W. BERSCHIN, ibid. 57; 59; 64 with n.; 323; 338; E. MENSCHING, Zur Calcidius-Überlieferung, V Chr 19, 1965, 42–56; J. DEN BOEFT, Calcidius on Fate. His Doctrine and Sources, Leiden 1970; J.-H. WASZINK, Calcidiana, V Chr 29, 1975, 96–119.

AUGUSTINE

Aurelius Augustinus (Augustine) was born at Thagaste in Numidia on November 13, 354.<sup>1</sup> His father Patricius, a landowner and member of the city council, became a Christian only on his death-bed, whereas his mother Monnica had practiced her faith throughout her life. Having studied 'grammar' at Madaura and rhetoric at Carthage, he worked as a grammaticus in Thagaste and (from 376) as a public teacher of rhetoric in Carthage. From a woman whose name he never mentions he had a highly gifted son, Adeodatus, who died as a young man. The dialogue De magistro is a monument to him. At an age of nineteen, Augustine lived a first 'conversion': a reading of Cicero's Hortensius convinced him to embrace a philosophical way of life. At that time he also read some Aristotelian texts in Latin translation. Taking offence at the anthropomorphous features of the God of the Old Testament, our youthful philosopher was estranged from the Church which he had attended as a catechumen. Now he hoped to find a more consistent idea of God with the Manicheans, who rejected the Old Testament. In the long run, however, he could not help noticing the problems inherent in their dualism and their unscientific astronomical and cosmological views. A disenchanting encounter with the famous Manichean bishop Faustus increased his doubts (conf. 5. 6. 10–11). His move to Rome, where the Manicheans had procured him a chair as rhetor, may be called psychologically a 'flight'. His deliberate separation from his mother was accompanied by serious illness; all these symptoms complete the general tableau of a crisis, reflected intellectually in his change to Academic scepticism.<sup>2</sup> Even his teaching activity, which had previously been successful and created friendships with students interested in philosophy, was not devoid of disappointments in Rome. Soon, however, the head of the non-Christian senators, Symmachus, recommended Augustine for a distinguished chair of rhetoric in Milan. There he met with Neoplatonism, both through the sermons of Bishop Ambrose, and through Neoplatonic books, translated by Marius Victorinus and supplied to him by the Consul Mallius Theodorus.

<sup>1</sup> For Augustine's life: P. BROWN 1967; O. PERLER, Les voyages de saint Augustin, Paris 1969; for a larger public: G. WEHR, Aurelius Augustinus. Größe und Tragik des umstrittenen Kirchenvaters, Gütersloh 1979; C. CREMONA, Augustinus. Eine Biographie (transl. M. HAAG), sine loco 1988.

<sup>2</sup> Scepticism as a path toward revelation: A.-J. FESTUGIÈRE, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, 1, Paris 1950, ch. 1.

Thus Augustine gained important insights: God was immaterial, and evil could be explained platonically as 'non-being'.<sup>1</sup> At the same time Ambrose's allegorical interpretations rendered the anthropomorphisms of the Old Testament less scandalous to our author (conf. 5. 14. 24): in a word, scientific arguments, both philosophical and hermeneutic, paved the way for Augustine's acceptance of Christianity. He was converted only after his reason had been convinced. To him the Neoplatonic idea of God was not mere theory; it became a personal experience and a religious conviction (conf. 7. 10. 16). Initially, however, Augustine's progress as a mystic was not matched by moral progress: the woman who loved him and had born his son had to go to a monastery because she was an obstacle to his projected marriage to a genteel virgin. To while away the two years he had to wait for the wedding, he lived together with a third lady (conf. 6. 15. 25). After an insincere speech delivered in honor of the Emperor, an encounter with a drunk beggar made him aware of his pride (conf. 6. 6. 9). From acquaintances he heard of monastic discipline, then a new life style (8. 6. 14–15). After centuries of laissez-faire, in Augustine's day asceticism had gained the fascination of the unknown, the spell of adventure. In the famous garden scene at Milan (conf. 8. 8. 19–12. 30), a child's voice became the voice of God for him. He found and followed the call to abandon the world when opening Paul's Letter to the Romans, a book which, in many regards, would accompany him throughout his life. During a period of reflection, which he spent with his friends and his caring mother on a country-seat at Cassiciacum, he prepared to be baptized, together with his son, by Ambrose. After his mother had died at Ostia, Augustine stayed at Rome for a year, since Africa had temporarily fallen to the enemy and was under Gildo's sway. Then he resumed philosophical and religious community life with his spiritual friends (388). During an unscheduled stay at Hippo Regius he was ordained a priest against his will. He asked for a leave (epist. 24) to prepare for his new duties and to study the Scriptures, which would increasingly affect his style. Soon he became an adjunct to the bishop and finally his successor, probably in 396, and certainly before August 397. Augustine died on August 28th, 430.

---

<sup>1</sup> Augustine's thought would develop in this respect; cf. H. HÄRING, Das Problem des Bösen in der Theologie, Darmstadt 1985, 68–69; H. HÄRING, Die Macht des Bösen. Das Erbe Augustins, Zürich 1979; G. R. EVANS, Augustine on Evil, Cambridge 1982; cf. G. THOME, Vorstellungen vom Bösen in der lateinischen Literatur. Begriffe, Motive, Gestalten, Stuttgart 1993.

In the Retractationes (completed in 427) Augustine mentions 93 of his works, comprising 232 books. To these we must add works written after that time as well as numerous letters and sermons. Chronologically<sup>1</sup> Augustine's œuvre can be divided into three groups:

During the first period, before his becoming a bishop (386–396), he wrote dialogues close to Platonism, and anti-Manichean works, in which the convert settled accounts with his former convictions. As an exegete, the young Augustine worked especially on the Psalms and Paul's Letters.

The second phase (396–411) was determined by the bishop's new tasks: the De doctrina Christiana and the Confessiones, his great autobiography (397–401), were originally meant to be read by priests. Augustine would exploit the psychological insight developed in these books to analyze processes within the deity in his dogmatic masterpiece De Trinitate (399–420). Our author's discussions with the Donatists were reflected in many treatises covering, among others, the problems of the unity of the Church and of the legitimacy of sacraments. During those years Augustine especially studied the Book of Genesis.

During the last period of his creativity (412–430) Augustine developed his doctrines of grace and predestination as a bullwark against the Pelagians. The sack of Rome by the Visigoths (410) provoked the monumental De civitate dei, which refutes ancient Roman religion and, on the other hand, displays a Christian conception of history (412/13–426/27). Our author explained the Gospel according to John in 124 treatises. The Enchiridion on faith, hope and love (421–423) was an epitome of the teachings of Augustine's old age.

Thus each of his writings occupied a specific place within his life. In this respect the 'philosopher of inwardness' remained surprisingly close to the classics and to the real world. In each single case he addressed a specific audience, persons or groups with whom he sympathized or with whom he had to discuss burning problems. It would be impoverishing and limiting should we claim that Augustine wrote only when an opportunity presented itself but it is salutary to keep the genesis of his works in mind before petrifying and falsifying his living word into a rigid system. Augustine remained a Roman. He formulated his ideas to express life experience and a personal understanding of his existence. Such an attitude has its own value, conveying, for instance, to the doctrine of grace (which was shaped in the discussion with the Pelagians) a strong religious impact, despite its theoretical deficiencies.

---

<sup>1</sup> For a general chronology of his life and work: F. GLORIE 1965; P. BROWN 1967, chron. Tab. A, 16; B, 74; C, 184; D, 282–284; E, 378; C. ANDRESEN, ed., Bibliographia Augustiniana, 2nd ed. 1973, 254–263; A. SCHINDLER, Augustin, in: TRE 4, Berlin 1979, 690–692; K. FLASCH, Augustin. Einführung in sein Denken, Stuttgart 1980, 466–471; cf. further: A.-M. LA BONNARDIÈRE, Recherches de chronologie augustiniennne, Paris 1965.

Another tendency which makes just as big an impact on the reader of Augustine's biography, stands in apparent contrast to what was said above: his relentless search for the knowledge of truth, which determines his whole way of life. Unlike the majority of Latin authors, Augustine was a born philosopher. At the end of this chapter we hope to make clear the connection between the two strains mentioned here.

Survey of Works

The following survey is arranged according to genre. After this, a few important works are presented in more detail.

Philosophical Works

De pulchro et apto (380–381, Augustine's first work); Contra Academicos libri tres (a dialogue; Cassiciacum 386–387); De beata vita (386); De ordine (386; on theory of knowledge and Theodicy); Soliloquiorum libri duo (Cassiciacum 386–387); De immortalitate animae (a treatise, Milan 387); De quantitate animae (a dialogue on the corporality of the soul, Rome 387–388); De magistro (a dialogue with Augustine's son on teaching and learning; Thagaste 389–390); De musica (6 books; Thagaste 387–389).

Philosophical and Rhetorical Works

De grammatica (two extracts of dubious authenticity); Principia dialecticae; Principia rhetorices (of dubious authenticity). For the De doctrina christiana s. below pp. 1692–1695.

Autobiographical Works

Confessiones (13 books, written between 396/97 and 400/01: the story of Augustine's life, told to God, s. below pp. 1672–1674). Retractationum libri duo (Augustine reviews his own literary output up to 426/27).

Apologetic Works

De divinatione daemonum (written between 406 and 411; the demons' gift of divination is inferior to that of angels and prophets); De civitate Dei (22 books, written and published<sup>1</sup> gradually between 412/13 and 426; Augustine's principal work on the philosophy of history, s. below pp. 1677–1681); Tractatus adversus Iudaeos (date unknown, perhaps 429/30; an apologetic sermon).

Dogmatic Works

De diversis quaestionibus octoginta tribus (388–395/96); De fide et symbolo (393); Sermo de symbolo ad catechumenos (since 418, of dubious authenticity); De diversis quaestionibus ad Simplicianum libri duo (about 396–397); De agone Christiano (about 396; the adversary in the dispute is the devil); De trinitate libri XV (between 399 and 420; principal dogmatic work, s. below); De fide rerum, quae non videntur (after 399; in the style of a sermon); Quaestiones expositae contra paganos; De fide et operibus (412–413; opera are indispensable); De videndo Deo (413); De origine animae et de sententia Iacobi (415); De adulterinis coniugiis libri duo (419–420; the conjugal union is indissoluble); De fide, spe et caritate = Enchiridium ad Laurentium (421–423); De cura pro mortuis gerenda (421–422); De octo Dulciti quaestionibus (421–422 or rather 424–425).

Polemical Works on Dogma

Against Manicheans:

De libero arbitrio (3 books; begun and mostly written at Rome, published at Hippo in 395; a dialogue between Augustine and Evodius. Virtue and sin depend on the autonomous activity of free will); De vera religione (between 389 and 391; one of the conversations at Cassiciacum; against Manichean dualism); De genesi contra (adversus) Manichaeos (probably 388–389; in a detailed exegesis, Augustine justifies his general attitude to the Old Testament); De moribus ecclesiae catholicae et de moribus Manichaeorum (written at Rome, changed at Hippo about 389; book 1: cardinal virtues in the Church; book 2: heresies and vices of the Manicheans); De utilitate credendi (391; Honoratus, whom Augustine had brought to the Manicheans, shall now be dissuaded from that error; on the difference between faith and knowledge); De duabus animabus (391 or 392; good and evil in man are not due to the activity of a good and an evil soul); Acta seu disputatio contra Fortunatum Manichaeum (a record of a dispute between Augustine and Fortunatus of August 28th and 29th 392 at Hippo); Contra Adimantum Manichaei discipulum (394 or 395; a re-examination of antitheses from the Old and New Testament compiled by Adimantus); Contra epistolam quam vocant fundamenti (396–397; polemics against Mani; we only have the beginning of the discussion of the Fundamental Letter); Contra Faustum Manichaeum (33 books; between 398 and 400; in defence of the Old and the New Testament); Contra Felicem Manichaeum or De actis cum Felice Manichaeo (a record of the dispute of December 7th and 12th, 404); De natura boni contra Manichaeos (probably 405; with reference to the Fundamental Letter and The Treasure of Life); Contra Secundinum Manichaeum (405; Secundinus had tried to reconvert Augustine to Manicheism); Contra adversarium legis et prophetarum (2 books; 420; a defence of the Scriptures against Manichean and Marcionite critics).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Publication: 1–3: before September 413; 4 and 5: A.D. 415; 12: A.D. 417/18; 14: about 420; 15 and 16: after 419; 18: 425.

Against Priscillianists and Origenists:

Ad Orosium contra Priscillianistas et Origenistas (415).

Against Donatists:

Psalmus contra partem Donati (394–395; a popular exposition of the history and essence of Donatism; an abecedarius in 20 strophes of 12 lines each); Contra epistulam Donati (lost; of the same period); Contra epistulam Parmeniani (3 books); De baptismo contra Donatistas (7 books; both works about 405); Contra partem Donati (2 books; lost); Contra quod adtulit Centurius a Donatistis (lost); Contra litteras Petiliani Donatistae (3 books, 400/01–405; containing rich material for a reconstruction of the treatises of that Donatist bishop); between books 2 and 3 of the Contra litteras there is an Epistula ad catholicos de secta Donatistarum (usually called De unitate ecclesiae), the authenticity of which is dubious.

Contra Cresconium grammaticum et Donatistam (4 books, between 405 and 408; Cresconius had reacted to the 1st book Against Petilianus; the 4th book deals with the Maximianist schism);<sup>2</sup> De unico baptismo contra Petilianum ad Constantinum (410 or 411; against a homonymous work of Petilian); Breviculus collationis cum Donatistis (acts of the religious dialogue between Catholics and Donatists at Carthage, published towards the end of 411); Ad Donatistas post conlationem or Contra partem Donati post gesta (412);<sup>3</sup> Sermo ad Caesariensis ecclesiae plebem (a polemic sermon of September 18th, 418); Gesta cum Emerito Donatistarum episcopo (record of a dispute of September 20th, 418); Contra Gaudentium Donatistarum episcopum (2 books; 419–420; Bishop Gaudentius of Thamugada had participated in the religious dialogue of 411); polemic features abound also in many Letters, Sermons, and asides in the Commentaries on John and on Psalms.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Spurious: Commonitorium quomodo sit agendum cum Manichaeis qui convertuntur.

<sup>2</sup> Lost: Probationum et testimoniorum contra Donatistas liber (about 406); Contra Donatistam nescio quem (about 406); Admonitio Donatistarum de Maximianistis (about 406); De Maximianistis contra Donatistas (no earlier than 410).

<sup>3</sup> Lost: Ad Emeritum Donatistarum episcopum post conlationem (probably 416).

<sup>4</sup> Spurious: Sermo de unico baptismo; Sermo de Rusticiano subdiacono; Libellus adversus Fulgentium Donatistam; Liber testimoniorum fidei contra Donatistas.

Against Pelagians

De peccatorum meritis et remissione et de baptismo parvulorum (3 books; book 3 is styled as a letter to Marcellinus; written in 411/12; against Pelagius' views on free will, sin, and grace, still without personal attacks); De spiritu et littera (412; on the relationship between Law and Gospel); De gratia novi testamenti (412; an epistle to Honoratus who had dedicated his books on free will to Augustine); De natura et gratia (413–415; instructions for Timasius and Jacobus whom he had won over to an ascetic way of life; against Pelagius' De natura: the grace of creation is confronted with the grace of salvation); De perfectione iustitiae hominis (before 415; refutation of Caelestius' Definitiones); De gestis Pelagii (417; to Bishop Aurelius of Carthage; concerning the synod of Diospolis); there are also Letters, indicative of the ecclesiastical struggle against Pelagianism, for example: De praesentia Dei (417); De gratia Christi et de peccato originali contra Pelagium et Caelestium (418); De nuptiis et concupiscentia (418–419 or 420–421); De natura et origine animae (De anima et eius origine; 4 books, late in 419; in favor of traducianism); Contra duas epistulas Pelagianorum (4 books, 419–420); Contra Iulianum (6 books, a complement to his work on matrimony); Contra secundam Iuliani responsionem imperfectum opus (6 books, 428–430); De gratia et libero arbitrio (426–427); De correptione et gratia (426–427; like the preceding work directed to the monks of Hadrumetum and their abbot Valentinus: Augustine refutes the reproach that he is denying free will and undermining ecclesiastical discipline); De praedestinatione sanctorum (429); De dono perseverantiae (428–429):

Against Arians:

Contra sermonem Arianorum (418/19); Contra Maximinum haereticum Arianorum episcopum (2 books; 427 or 428; a draft for a projected disputation with the Gothic Bishop Maximinus); Adversus haereses (about 429; a catalogue of all heresies since the rise of Christianity; Augustine made the list but did not live to write down the refutations).

Fundamental Work on Hermeneutics

De doctrina christiana (4 books; the 1st books were probably written about 397; having progressed as far as the middle of book 3, the author interrupted his work for decades to resume and finish it only in 426–427; a fundamental work of methodology, s. below pp. 1691–1695).

Exegetic Works on the Old Testament

De Genesi contra Manichaeos libri duo (388/89; an allegorical interpretation of the beginnings of history); De Genesi ad litteram imperfectus liber (393/94; the exegesis stops at Gen. 1. 26); Adnotationum in Iob liber (after 404); De Genesi ad litteram libri duodecim (404–414; on Gen. 1. 1–3. 24); CLIII Enarrationes in Psalmos

(394–424);<sup>1</sup> Quaestionum in Heptateuchum libri septem (from 419 onward; discussing difficulties of content); Locutionum in Heptateuchum libri septem (from 419 onward; discussing linguistic difficulties).

Exegetic Works on the New Testament

De sermone domini in monte libri duo (393–394; the Sermon on the Mount is the summa of Christian life; the Beatitudes and the petitions of the Lord's Prayer give occasion to arithmological speculation); Expositio quarundam propositionum ex epistula ad Romanos (394–395). Expositio epistolae ad Galatas (394); Epistolae ad Romanos expositio inchoata (394–395 or somewhat later; only on the introduction of that Epistle); Quaestionum evangeliorum libri duo (after 404; on Matth. and Luc.); De consensu evangelistarum libri quattuor (after 404; when objecting to contradictions between the Evangelists, Neoplatonists and Manicheans do not consider that they are four limbs of one body whose head is Christ); In Iohannis epistolam ad Parthos tractatus decem (407; caritas and ecclesia are inseparable); In Iohannis evangelium tractatus CXXIV (406–420);<sup>2</sup> an interpretation of the Gospel according to John against the background of the Pelagian dispute).<sup>3</sup>

Works on Moral and Pastoral Theology

De mendacio (about 395, a dialectic inquiry); Contra mendacium (probably late 419/early 420 to Consentius; lies are unacceptable even if well-intentioned); De continentia (after 418; clearly a sermon; in opposition to 'Manichean folly' Augustine exalts the 'fruitful and praiseworthy' striving for true abstinence even in matrimony); De bono coniugali (after 404; against Jovinian); De sancta virginitate (same period); De bono viduitatis (414; a letter to Juliana); De opere Monachorum (after 404; against intellectual arrogance).

De patientia (about 418; a sermon; cf. Tertullian's and Cyprian's treatises on the same subject); Speculum (probably 427; extracts from the moral code of the Old and New Testament in 51 chapters meant for moral self-examination); De catechizandis rudibus (written after 404 for the Carthaginian diacon Deogratias); Ad inquisitiones Januarii (two books, dating from after 404, transmitted among the letters; dealing with problems of ecclesiastical practice: fasting, the washing of feet, church songs, the calculation of the Easter date etc.); the Contra Hilarum has not come down to us (it was written some years later and was on the singing of psalms during the altar service).

<sup>1</sup> For the date: R. LORENZ, Zwölf Jahre Augustinusforschung (1959–1970), ThRdschau 38, 1974, 327–328.

<sup>2</sup> For the date R. LORENZ ibid. 326–327.

<sup>3</sup> Lost: Expositio epistolae Iacobi ad duodecim tribus (406–412). Spurious: Quaestiones XVII in evangelium secundum Matthaeum; Expositio in Apocalypsim B. Iohannis.

Letters

The collection of his correspondence contains (as counted in the Maurine edition) 270 letters and a fragment, of which 217 (218) were written by Augustine (including seven collective letters); later there were found five letters and a fragment, and most recently a series of further letters (CSEL vol. 88. 2. 6). There are private letters, but also treatises on pastoral and dogmatic theology in the form of letters meant for a large public.

Sermons

Of the sermones in the Maurine edition, 363 were certainly written by Augustine, 32 are of dubious authenticity, some are fragmentary, 317 are spurious. The editors distinguish the following groups according to their subject: sermones de scripturis, de tempore, de sanctis and de diversis.

Poems

Psalmus contra partem Donati (an abecedarius in 20 strophes of 12 lines in trochaic tetrameters); De anima (53 hexameters); Epigrams.

Survey of some main works

Confessiones

The Confessiones is a work without a parallel in earlier or later literature, an autobiography and psychological analysis of a depth unknown before. It is both a personal document and an accomplished work of art, both individual and typical; its rich psychological experience is no less captivating than the author's faculty of viewing himself with an artist's detachment. A combination of rhetoric and spontaneity confers on the present work a janus-faced and enigmatic character. Anyone who wants to regard it as a mere autobiography has to surrender after book 9, at a loss for how to explain the overall structure. Why did the author write a purely introspective 10th book and the long exegetic ending (books 11–13)? A genetic analysis of chronological layers is not pointless, but it is unable to explain how the author came to yoke together these three divergent elements.<sup>1</sup> Which cues are furnished by the text itself?

---

<sup>1</sup> General works on the Confessiones: G. WUNDERLE, Einführung in Augustinus Konfessionen, Augsburg 1930; A. HOLL, Die Welt der Zeichen bei Augustin. Religionsphänomenologische Analyse des 13. Buches der Confessiones, Wien 1963; K. GROTZ, Die Einheit der Confessiones. Warum bringt Augustin in den letzten Büchern seiner Confessiones eine Auslegung der Genesis?, diss. Tübingen 1970; L. F. PIZZOLATO, Le fondazioni dello stile delle Confessioni di Sant'Agostino, Milano 1972; E. P. MEIJERING, Augustin über Schöpfung, Ewigkeit und Zeit. Das 11. Buch der Bekenntnisse, Leiden 1979; H. CHADWICK 1986, 66–74; for the structure of the work: G. N. KNAUER, 1955, 19–20 (with bibl.); H. Kusch, Studien über Augustinus. I. Trinitarisches in den Büchern 2–4 und 10–13 der Confessiones, in FS F. DORNSEIFF, Leipzig 1953,

Confessio has several meanings: confession of sins, confession of faith and, above all, praise of God. Interspersed prayers and frequent quotations of Psalms add a lyric touch to his prose and keep the reader aware of the divine addressee. Unlike modern 'Confessions', Augustine's work centers on the praise of the Creator, a praise including preaching (11. 3): the redeemed sinner wants to sing his psalms to the entire world (9. 4. 8). His coming before the public does not interfere with the idea of confession, nor is it an artificial extension or disruption of it. His book is a confession before men, a justification of his own conversion, and an instructive example to show others the way to God.

This aim determines the austere choice of facts. Augustine only reports what can be understood as a token of divine guidance (11. 2. 2). Sins are not mentioned for their own sake, but as examples: the detailed story of the theft of pears (2. 4. 9–10. 18), in no way the result of a pathological sense of guilt, is a 'neutral' case; as a typical example it helps to make evident the nature of sin: it is not the body but the mind that commits it. Augustine even explains some trespasses as momentary aberrations of efforts which are basically correct.

The report of his own experiences of divine guidance (books 1–9) is followed by an explanation of God's word (books 11–13). In between, the pivotal book 10 is on self-examination.

In another sense the three unequal parts of the work can be related to past, present, and future: the biography up to Augustine's baptism and his mother's death (books 1–9) is succeeded by a description of his actual state of mind (book 10) and an example of his future activity as a preacher of the world (books 11–13; cf. esp. 11. 2. 2). Part Three surpasses Part One by being centered on God's word instead of the words of men. At the same time the author understands Creation (Genesis) as an allegory of the Church: the essence of Nature had been depraved through estrangement from God; in the conversio this depravity is annulled through grace and the original intention of Creation is re-established. Through baptism, in which the autobiography culminates, the individual gains access to the city of God, which is indirectly mirrored in the last books.

Moreover, the initial and final parts of the Confessiones juxtapose two forms of knowledge: one of them is secular and based on experience and ratio; it led Augustine, if on detours, to the vision of the unique God: the second kind of knowledge is religious and is based on the study of the Scriptures (meditabor in lege tua, 11. 2. 2, following Ps. 1. 2). Between these two there is self-knowledge, which, while seminal to the whole of the work, is concentrated in book 10. The Confessiones thus form a unity.<sup>1</sup>

---

124–183; P. COURCELLE, 2nd ed. 1968, 13–29; G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, Das Bauprinzip von Augustins Confessiones, in: FS K. VRETSKA, Heidelberg 1970, 124–147; E. DÖNT, Zur Frage der Einheit von Augustins Konfessionen, Hermes 99, 1971, 350–361; W. STEIDLE, Augustins Konfessionen als Buch, in: K.-H. SCHWARTE, J. HEINRICHS, eds., Romanitas—Christianitas, FS J. STRAUB, Berlin 1982, 436–527; esp. 500–527; W. STEIDLE, Gedanken zur Komposition von Augustins Confessiones, in: P. NEUKAM, ed., Struktur und Gehalt, München 1983, 86–101; W. DESCH, Augustins Confessiones. Beobachtungen zu Motivbestand und Gedankenbewegung, Frankfurt 1988.

This unity is rooted in Augustine's thought, especially in his analysis of time in book 11. The terms used there fully apply to the three parts of the Confessiones: presence of the past (books 1–9), presence of present (book 10: Augustine is inquiring into his present state of mind, since some friends wanted to know about it), presence of the future (books 11–13: an interpretation of Creation as ecclesia, as presence of the world to come).

Is it conceivable that Augustine built his Confessiones on a 'trinitarian' pattern? This question deserves to be studied all the more as Augustine did give a 'trinitarian' interpretation to a central experience of his life: his 'Neoplatonic' vision of God (conf. 7. 10. 16).<sup>2</sup> To understand this better, let us examine his principal dogmatic work:

De trinitate

The author worked on the De trinitate<sup>3</sup> for many years (with a pause after book 12). We find in this work, especially from book 8 onward, psychological patterns of thought, partly related to book 11 of the Confessiones.

As usual, Augustine starts with burning problems of his day, which were especially relevant to his criticism of Arianism: the unity of the Trinity, the equality of the three Persons, especially the Deity of the Son and the Spirit, and the two natures in Christ (book 1).

He explains creation from God's will, the revelations in the Old Testament (books 2 and 3), the role of Christ as mediator of life as opposed to Lucifer, the mediator of death, and the descent and mission of the Holy Ghost (book 4). The Trinity is incorporeal and immutable; if we are talking about it in terms of history, this does not affect its essence (book 5). The problem of the imperfection of our discourse on God prepares indirectly for the mention of natural parallels to the Trinity.

<sup>1</sup> On this, cf. also H. CHADWICK 1986, 68.

<sup>2</sup> He first juxtaposes terms corresponding to the three Persons of the Trinity, only to intertwine them later: qui novit veritatem, novit eam (sc. lucem), et qui novit eam, novit aeternitatem. caritas novit eam. o aeterna veritas et vera caritas et cara aeternitas! tu es Deus meus.

<sup>3</sup> For an analysis of content: D. PINTARIČ, Sprache und Trinität. Semantische Probleme in der Trinitätslehre des hl. Augustinus, Salzburg 1983, 39–82; for the young Augustine's (before 391) trinitarian theology: O. DU ROY, L'intelligence de la foi en la trinité selon saint Augustin, Paris 1966; cf. also F. GENN, Trinität und Amt nach Augustinus, Einsiedeln 1986.

The last chapter of the 6th book, which had been on the unity of God's essence, hints at the fact that the Trinity is reflected in Creation (esse, vivere, intellegere: 6. 10. 11–12). The 7th book illustrates the unity of divine power and wisdom and the relationship between the three hypostases and the one essence. Two or three persons of the Trinity together are no greater than each one of them: this is how the train of thought continues in book 8. Knowledge of God comes from knowledge of truth, the idea of the supreme good and an innate liking for justice, and, above all, love. In love there is a 'footprint' (vestigium) of the Trinity: the lover, the beloved and love (10).

Book 9 shows that in man, who is God's image, there is some trinity (trin. 9. 4. 6): conscience, self-knowledge and self-love. These three are of equal range and of one essence. The inner word is perceived—for love either of a creature or of the creator. In intellectual life conception and birth (of the word) are identical, in material life not at all. (This approach is basic to Augustine's philosophy of nature, too: hence, in his view, creation in one moment and biological evolution are not mutually exclusive).

In the 10th book a further trinity within man appears: memoria, intelligentia, voluntas (10. 11. 18; cf. the rhetorical categories ingenium, doctrina, usus). Likewise, in the bodily existence of man there is a trace of trinity (book 11): the visible body, its image in the observer's eye and the intention of the will which combines both. It is true that these three elements are not of equal range, but within the soul there is a corresponding trinity which is derived from physical observation: imaginatio corporis (in our memory), informatio (as realized in our conscience) and intentio voluntatis which links both together. The mental process of rendering incommensurable elements commensurable by limiting analysis to their mental images is reminiscent of Augustine's discussion of past, present, and future in the 11th book of the Confessiones, s. above pp. 1674.

Book 12 distinguishes between wisdom and science. Science refers to what is human, wisdom to what is divine. Only the human intellect (νοῦς), which considers the eternal, is entitled to be called an 'image' of God. Book 13 illustrates the distinction between wisdom and science using the prologue of the Gospel according to John. A 'human' starting-point is the striving of man for happiness as expounded in Cicero's Hortensius; however, the believer's happiness is superior to that of the philosopher, which is limited, as Terence's statement illustrates: quoniam non potest id fieri quod vis, id velis quod possit (Andr. 305–306). Beatitude is unthinkable without immortality, which is based on Christ's incarnation. Our so-called merits are gifts of God. It is not by force, but by justice that Christ conquers the devil to whom we all are submitted because of Adam's sin. The Word (λόγος) incarnate possesses the treasures of both wisdom and science (Col. 2. 1–3; 1 Cor. 12. 7–8.). Augustine's inquiry into the lower 'traces' of trinity in nature is a kind of intellectual exercise following an inductive method.<sup>1</sup> For Augustine the progression from the visible to the invisible is a general principle. Applied to the domain of faith, it even has an ancient Roman root: fides (fidelity to contracts) presupposes the belief in something invisible in the partner.

Like Lactantius, Augustine equates wisdom and piety (book 14). There is a kind of trinity in faith, consisting of remembrance, contemplation and love, though this is not yet the image of God. And the author takes another step upward: in the voûç, who 'thinks himself' (being both subject and object), there is a trinity. The intellect remembers God, knows, and loves him. The human spirit becomes wise by pondering such thoughts. The renewal of God's image in man is performed not only at the moment of conversion but in daily progress. In eternity the analogy to the Trinity will be completely re-established. Just as in other instances Augustine had felt free to quote Virgil, he now refers to Cicero's Hortensius, to which he owes his first conversion (14. 19. 26). He disclaims only its last skeptical sentence, while subscribing unconditionally to the central idea of sharpening the intellect, the mind's eye, and of the return to the heavens.

Augustine does not come to speak of God's Trinity before the last book (15). His path led him from creation to the Creator. Since we must always search for God, it makes sense to search for traces of the Trinity in creation. Nature testifies to the Creator as do the Scriptures; he combines all superlatives in his own person (15. 4. 6). God is everything that he is, secundum substantiam: aeternus, sapiens, beatus. The Trinity is sapientia, notitia sui, dilectio sui. However, we are not allowed to judge divine Trinity by visible trinities. We see only a reflection of God as in a mirror or in enigmatic parables (1 Cor. 13. 12). Here our teacher of rhetoric discusses allegory, tropes and enigmas (15. 9. 15–16). Our words are but signs of thoughts. The image of the divine word can only be found in the inner word, which is spiritual. Our inner word becomes an audible vox, as God's Word became flesh. To be more precise: it takes a bodily form. God's Word is more than a word silently thought (neque prolativum in sono, neque cogitativum in similitudine soni), it exists 'before' all signs and is generated from the knowledge dwelling in the voûç. Any human action is preceded by some inner word. Against academic skepticism (cf. Contra Academicos) Augustine holds: 'I know that I know'. Likewise, sense perception is reliable. It is true that we know many things only through the testimony of people whom we believe. God's knowledge is of a different kind: he is prescient of everything, and everything is, because he knows it. Our word will never compare to God's Word, even if we become similar to him. The trinities observable in man are different functions of a single ego, whereas in God there are three persons in one essence. It is true that the Father corresponds to our memory, the Son to our intelligence, the Spirit to our will and our love. Each person has one of these characteristics proprie and those of the other two universaliter. In a narrower sense the Holy Spirit is love, in a broader sense it is God as a whole. In this context Augustine states that the Spirit proceeds also from the Son, a doctrine which would later on produce the Great Schism between Eastern and Western Christianity.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Placuit quippe velut gradatim ascendentibus in utraque requirere apud interiorem hominem quandam sui cuiusque generis trinitatem, sicut prius apud exteriorem quaesivimus; ut ad illam trinitatem quae Deus est, pro nostro modulo, si tamen vel hoc possumus, saltem in aenigmate et per speculum contuendam exercitatore in his inferioribus rebus mente veniamus (13. 20. 26).

Can God be known? Augustine emphasizes that the Apostle did not say 'We now see a mirror' but: 'through a mirror' (15. 23. 44–24. 44; 1 Cor. 13. 12). The mirror, our heart, is cleansed by faith (1 Tim. 1. 5) and thus enabled to see God (cf. Matth. 5. 8; Aug. trin. 24. 44; against radical skepticism in matters of epistemology). The idea which we have in our memory corresponds to the Father. The image that we see in front of us, when we direct our attention to it, corresponds to the Son. The Spirit (which is will and love) links both. Will springs from faith (since nobody wills a thing he has no knowledge of) but will is not an image of the thought. This is the difference between the Son's 'being born' and the Spirit's 'proceeding'.

The De trinitate is indicative of an intimate connection between Augustine's two great themes: 'God' and the 'soul'. At the same time it prepares the epistemological pattern for other important philosophical discoveries of Augustine: the philosophy of time (a key to the structure of the Confessiones) and of nature (cf. on book 9).

De civitate Dei

No less important to the history of ideas are the 22 books De civitate Dei.<sup>2</sup> This work was written on the occasion of the sack of Rome by Alaric in 410. Many pagans regarded this catastrophe as a divine punishment, all the more as Emperor Theodosius had recently sealed the Christianization of the empire by the confiscation of pagan temple treasures. Hence it was Augustine's first task to prove that Christianity was not responsible for the fall of Rome. In this respect the work was the continuation and crowning of apologetic literature.

<sup>1</sup> 15. 17. 29; 15. 26. 46; cf. Ioh. 20. 22.

<sup>2</sup> J. C. GUY, Unité et structure de la Cité de Dieu de saint Augustin, Paris 1961; J. O'MEARA, Charter of Christendom: The Significance of the City of God, New York 1961; H. FUCHS, Augustin und der antike Friedensgedanke. Untersuchungen zum 19. Buch der Civitas Dei, Berlin 2nd ed. 1965; V. HAND, Augustin und das klassisch römische Selbstverständnis. Eine Untersuchung über die Begriffe gloria, virtus, iustitia und res publica in De civitate, Hamburg 1970; J. LAUFS, Der Friedensgedanke bei Augustinus. Untersuchungen zum 19. Buch des Werkes De civitate Dei, Wiesbaden 1973; H. CHADWICK 1986, 96–106.

The first part, which is basically 'destructive', proves that the cult of the pagan gods does not contribute anything either to happiness on earth (books 1-5) or to life eternal (books 6-10). He first refutes Roman patriots like Symmachus, then the Platonic philosophers who support paganism. In the first ten books arguments are drawn from roughly three domains: history, state religion, and philosophy. The pessimistic view of history recalls Sallust's Histories, Horace's Seventh Epode and Lucan's prooemium. Romulus, who murdered his brother, reminds Augustine of Cain. Roman history is a chain of unfortunate accidents.

The second domain is state religion: the gods have not helped Rome. Their ritual plays were a school of dissolution; no educated person has ever believed in such gods. It is Varro who supplies the material to reinforce the argument: here Augustine preserves precious elements from the Antiquitates and the De gente populi Romani. Augustine's rejection of Varro's theologia tripartita was a sign of the times. The tolerant pagans had attributed different theologies to different social spheres (philosophy, theater, politics) and to different layers of the personality (rational, sensitive and volitive): there had been a coexistence of philosophical monotheism, poetic myth and practical cult of the state gods. As a Christian, Augustine posed the question: 'If you think that monotheism is the only correct theology, why then do you need the other two?' In this criticism we see the clash of two epochs.

A further source of arguments is the idea of the state as rapaciousness institutionalized and, more generally, Carneades' speech against injustice from the 3rd book of Cicero's De re publica (we owe important fragments from Sallust and Cicero to the Church Fathers' interest in this subject). Augustine is clever enough to throw the pagans' reproach back on them: during the civil wars Romans suffered worse from Romans than they do now from barbarians already civilized by Christianity.

The second part of the work is constructive. It unveils a panorama of world history between two poles: city of God and city of the world, 'Jerusalem' and 'Babylon'. The former is based on the love of God and is social and organic, the latter is founded on self-love, which leads to isolation. In the one we find unity, monotheism and peace, in the other war, polytheism and the idolatry of the self. Inspired by suggestions found in Ambrose (and his sources, e.g. Philo), Augustine develops the (biblical) idea of the city of God in the style of Plotinus and Cicero.<sup>1</sup>

In due course Augustine discusses the celestial beginnings (books 11-14),

---

<sup>1</sup> H. LEISEGANG, Der Ursprung der Lehre Augustins von der Civitas Dei, AKG 16, 1926, 127-158; s. also: R. H. BARROW, Introduction to St. Augustine, The City of God, London 1949, 267-273.

the development on earth (books 15–18), and the end of history (books 19–22).<sup>1</sup>

Even before the beginning of world history, the city of God, which comprised those predestined to everlasting bliss, was accompanied by the city of the world as a consequence of the fall of some spirits from God. The evil inherent in the city of the world is not rooted in matter but in spirit, i.e. self-love.<sup>2</sup>

History falls into six epochs; Augustine compares them with the ages of man (an analogy found in Roman historians). During childhood (I), Abel and Seth embody the city of God, Cain the city of the world. In boyhood (II), there were on the one hand Noah, Sem (the ancestor of the Jews) and Japhet (the forefather of good pagans), on the other hand Cham and Nimrod. The Tower of Babel was the beginning of the confusion of tongues and of war; and the Semites were the only ones to preserve the original language. From a psychological point of view, the connection of boyhood with the problem of language is a masterstroke. In humanity's adolescence (III), Abraham and Isaac are historical foreshadowings of the Church. Moses proclaimed the law of the Old Covenant. On the opposite side there were the Mesopotamian Empire (Ninus) and the beginnings of Greek apotheoses of rulers (Argos, Cecrops). Manhood (IV) entailed for the city of God a progress from prefiguration to explicit prophecy (Samuel, David); for the city of the world it brought the beginning of the second great empire: the foundation of Rome. The association of Romans with manhood in this context is artistically convincing. In the fifth phase—Augustine speaks of senioris aetas (V)—further prophets arose, and the temple was restored, while, on the other hand, Israel was deeply humiliated by the Romans. Old age—which is true only of the 'old' Man (Israel, which had lost its temple)—is simultaneously the period of grace (VI), prepared for among both Jews and pagans by unusually clear prophesies. As Adam had been created on the Sixth Day of Creation, Christ appeared in the Sixth Period of history. His millennium is not limited to the future. Not only does he fulfill the Old Testament but also the presentiments of Plato (whom Augustine imagined to have been inspired by Moses): the unique God and his logos have become historically real and accessible to all in Christ. The requies aeterna will match the Seventh Day of Creation. Augustine's originality stands out against the background of older parallels between history and the Seven Days of Creation (beginning with the book of Enoch) or with the Hours of the workers in the vineyard (Origen). Starting with Ambrose's exegesis of biblical genealogies, he arrives at a systematic division of history into 6 periods. Moses is less prominent than David, the singer of Psalms and of God's praise. It is typical of Augustine's thought that his epochs are represented by persons rather than by events. The omission of chiliasm<sup>1</sup> strikes us as a modern feature. At the end of history the two cities will be separated once and for all and will reach their antithetic goals: salvation or condemnation.

<sup>1</sup> The eschatological ending of the De civitate parallels the mythical finales of Plato's and Cicero's Republic, cf. J. L. TRELOAR, Cicero and Augustine. The Ideal Society, Augustinianum 28, 1988, 565–590.

<sup>2</sup> Self-love is only acceptable if it springs from love of God and is accompanied by love of one's neighbor: K. JASPERS, Augustin, München 1976, 55–56; O. O'DONOVAN, The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine, New Haven 1980.

In historical reality neither of the two cities exists in pure form. The city of God also includes the Jews and pagans of pre-Christian times insofar as they are predestined for salvation. On the other hand, the Church comprises some elements of the city of the world, which in its turn could not exist without some admixtures of divine provenance. These views allow Augustine to accept the 'natural state' (for which Adam and Eve had been destined before original sin) as part of the ordo and even to discover some positive features in the Roman state. Correspondingly, he distinguishes three kinds of law: natural law expressed in terms of conscience and international law; eternal law operating in the Church as grace; temporal law, serving to promote justice in a real state. While Cicero had defined the state in practical terms as a community based on laws common to all and on utility (rep. 1. 25. 39), Augustine emphasizes intangible factors: concord, reason and, above all, love for the common cause: populus est coetus multitudinis rationalis, rerum quas diligit concordi communione sociatus, 'a people is a large gathering of rational beings united in fellowship by their agreement about the objects of their love' (civ. 19. 24).

The grandeur of Rome is a work not of demons but of divine providence. Deeming Rome the second empire, Augustine reacts against Jerome's doctrine of the four empires and follows Ticonius' commentary on Revelation. The ancient Roman virtues, especially love of honor, generosity, and selflessness, can serve as an example to be imitated by Christians in the city of God; the same is true of the ideal of the Roman official. Augustine also recognizes political achievements of the Romans such as Roman citizenship for all and universal peace. Unlike older apologetic writers who yearned for the fall of Rome, Augustine appreciates the fact that Rome secured peace. He does not expect the empire to end, but to be divided into and succeeded by a group of smaller political units.

Far from being an 'imperial theologian', Augustine nevertheless finds words of praise for the authority of Christian emperors and admits that secular jurisdiction was ordained by God—even to the point that the Christianized

<sup>1</sup> Rod. SCHMIDT, Aetates mundi. Die Weltalter als Gliederungsprinzip der Geschichte, ZKG 4, 5, 67, 1955-1956, 288-317; K.-H. SCHWARTZ, Die Vorgeschichte der Augustinischen Weltalterlehre, Bonn 1966.

Roman empire comes close to the 'natural state'.<sup>1</sup> The tensions inherent in this attitude are evident. The possible solutions (state church, church state, strict separation of church and state) were rehearsed theoretically and practically in the course of medieval and recent history, and the representatives of the most divergent conceptions referred to Augustine's authority.

In this work Augustine synthesizes pagan and Christian criticism of Rome, historiographical and apologetic traditions. The latter tradition culminates in his strictly scholarly polemics against paganism. On the other hand Augustine goes rather far to acknowledge Platonism and the achievements of Roman virtues.<sup>2</sup> His penetrating analysis of the history of salvation was to have a great impact on posterity. In so far as 'philosophy of history' is a teleological view of the historical development, the De civitate Dei must be called a work on the philosophy of history. If Augustine, unlike Schelling and Hegel, did not believe in an ascending evolution of God himself, he certainly believed in a gradual revelation to mankind. Doubtless, Augustine took an important step towards modern philosophy of history, since he limited his outlook to a single aeon which, being unique and irrevocable, encouraged a more serious attitude to life.

For the content of De doctrina christiana s. below, pp. 1692–1695.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Sources. As for the material aspects of tradition, Augustine owed his knowledge of Roman religion to Varro, while turning to Livy for historical information. The pessimistic prologue of Sallust's Histories and the discussion of justice in the 3rd book of Cicero's De re publica were a platform for his criticism of Rome. However, his true intellectual adversary was Virgil with his theology of history. Augustine considered Varro, Seneca, and Virgil (s. esp. serm. 105) prisoners of their times and their societies, and he discovered a second meaning in their words. While reading Cicero's Hortensius, Augustine experienced his first conversion; moreover, Cicero was the most important Latin representative of academic scepticism to which Augustine turned in his middle life. Finally, Cicero's rhetorical writings gained seminal importance for the De doctrina christiana. Never, therefore, is Cicero's influence limited to form; it extends to philosophical thought as well.

---

<sup>1</sup> On the whole his theological underpinning of the state is less thorough than, e.g., Luther's doctrine of the two empires (Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount).

<sup>2</sup> E. VON IVANKA, Römische Ideologie in der Civitas Dei, AugMag 3, 1955, 411–417; V. PÖSCHL, Augustinus und die römische Geschichtsauffassung, AugMag 2, 1954, 957–963.

Like earlier Fathers of the Church, Augustine obtained information on philosophical doctrines from doxographies; but he also read works of Neoplatonists (Plotinus and Porphyry) translated by Marius Victorinus. Many Jewish and Christian authors who wrote in Greek were known to him, mostly through translations<sup>1</sup> by Rufinus, Jerome, and Eustathius. Ambrose was an important mediator of Philonian and Plotinian thought. He strongly influenced Augustine: suffice it to mention the (Platonizing) definition of evil as privation of goodness and the method of allegorical interpretation; in the De trinitate, Augustine used Ambrose's De spiritu sancto,<sup>2</sup> and in the Quaestiones evangeliorum and in some Sermones he referred to Ambrose's Commentary on Luke. Finally, there are undeniable Manichean<sup>3</sup> influences in the Confessiones and in the De civitate Dei; the dualism evident in the latter work may be explained psychologically as a pseudomorphosis of Manichean thought.

Models, Genres. Augustine followed many literary traditions. After Plato and Cicero, he contributed to develop the genre of philosophical dialogue: his conversation with his own Ratio in the Soliloquia anticipated Boethius' consultation with Philosophy. Rhetoric, Augustine's secular profession, was more than external ornament to his

---

<sup>1</sup> Philo (Exegesis of the Book of Genesis), Flavius Josephus (Jewish War), Irenaeus (Adversus haereses), Origen (De principiis, 1st and 2nd Homily on Genesis, 5th Homily on Leviticus, Explanations to the Song of Songs, 14th Homily on Luke), Eusebius (Church History; Chronicle), Basilios (Homilies on the Hexaemeron), Gregory of Nazianzus (nine Orationes), Didymus the Blind (De spiritu sancto, Historia monachorum in Aegypto) John Chrysostom (Homilia ad neophytos, in Greek), Ps.-Epiphanius ('Ανακεφαλαίωσις). On Augustine's relationship to Greek patristic literature: P. COURCELLE, Les lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris 1948, 183-194; B. ALTANER, Augustinus und die griechische Patristik. Eine Einführung und Nachlese zu den quellenkritischen Untersuchungen, RBen 62, 1952, 201-215; B. ALTANER, Die Benützung von original griechischen Vätertexten durch Augustinus, ZRGG 1, 1948, 71-79; For Augustine's knowledge of Neoplatonism (and Marius Victorinus) s. also: C. BOYER, Christianisme et Néoplatonisme dans la formation de saint Augustin, Rome 2nd. ed. 1953; M. F. SCIACCA, Saint Augustin et le Néoplatonisme. La possibilité d'une philosophie chrétienne, Louvain 1956; A. H. ARMSTRONG, St. Augustine and Christian Platonism, Villanova 1967; M. T. CLARK, Victorinus and Augustine: Some Differences, AugStud 17, 1986, 147-159.

<sup>2</sup> F. GLORIE 1965.

<sup>3</sup> See now the interpretation of the recently found Mani-text: L. KOENEN, Augustine and Manichaeism in the Light of the Cologne Mani Codex, ICS 3, 1978, 154-195; according to KOENEN, the exegesis of Genesis at the end of the Confessiones in an attempt to work up his Manichean past.

writings. It was transfigured into an inward discipline, into an art of mental planning and memory training without waste of paper; it penetrated his works as a structuring principle and was a technical prerequisite of his breathtaking literary proficiency and his much-admired ability to preach extempore.

Other literary genres cultivated by Augustine had been prepared by Latin Fathers: sermons, exegetical works, pamphlets, and different forms of letters sometimes interfering with the quoted genres. Augustine felt especially attracted to Cyprian, who had been a teacher of rhetoric and a bishop like himself (cf. also serm. 309). The De civitate Dei became the key-stone of Latin apologetic literature; it even went far beyond the traditional genre, by drawing a panorama of world history.

As for the Confessiones, the theme of 'conversion'<sup>1</sup> (ἐπιστροφή, conversio) had already played a role in the edifying philosophy of the pagan diatribe; Augustine adhered to this tradition by evoking Seneca and Persius both in the Confessiones and the Sermons. The meaning of the Greek term is 'focusing one's attention on one's better self', 'retreat from the world of appearances for contemplation', ultimately: 'self-consistency'. In the Septuagint and with the Christians there was a shift of meaning: 'focussing one's attention on the live person, being faithful to God'. In Augustine the term kept the personal touch it had acquired in Graeco-Roman tradition along with its semantic closeness to Plotinus (enm. 6. 5. 7). The idea of autobiography as a search for truth also crowns an existing tradition. Peregrinatio vitae had been a basic pattern of Apuleius' Golden Ass; Augustine took from the latter the theme of curiositas, an intellectual concupiscentia repeatedly seducing Psyche and Lucius to neglect what is really important.

A Christian autobiography could refer to Paul's conversion, which in the Acts of the Apostles was partly reported in the first person (26. 4–18; cf. 22. 6–16; in the third person 9. 1–19). Augustine is closer to the beginning of Cyprian's Ad Donatum (Aug. serm. 311; 312; doctr. christ. 4. 14. 31). Place (horti) and time of action (feriae vindemiales) seem to have been typical (Cyprian had followed Minucius Felix' choice of the time of the year). When describing his locus amoenus, in a manner not austere enough to Augustine's taste, Cyprian had evidently meant to compete with Minucius and Cicero. Finally, our author's calling conversion a gift of God is verbally reminiscent of Cyprian (Aug. conf. 9. 6. 14; Cypr. ad Don. 4).

<sup>1</sup> P. COURCELLE 1963, 111–117; for the theme of conversion cf. also Hilary (De trinitate), the Passio Perpetuae, and Gregory of Nazianzus, further Epict. diss. 2. 20. 22; Orig. c. Cels. 4. 53.

Although Roman literature had known many forms of self-portrayal—suffice it to recall Lucilius, Catullus, Horace, Ovid on the one hand, and Sulla, Caesar and Cicero on the other—it was left to Augustine to enrich it with a new sort of autobiography, a work both crowning the previous Roman development and liable to provoke new secularized literary forms in the future. The genre of autobiography, as newly shaped by Augustine in his Confessiones, was a description of the author's intellectual evolution. In this respect it had some precedents, for instance Ovid's autobiographical elegy (trist. 4. 10), his praise of the Muse and his confession that she is the source of his life. Another example had been Apuleius' Golden Ass, a novel narrated in the first person;<sup>1</sup> it culminated in its hero's conversion to the cult of Isis and in an important speech of the Deity in the last book. Unlike his model, Augustine did not write a novel redolent of magic and fairy tale but told the story of his own life. However, he made a critical selection of facts. He only mentioned what was—positively or negatively—relevant to his way to God—or to God's ways with him. This is true of his intellectual life—hence the large space given to philosophical problems—and of subconscious factors: feelings, forebodings, dreams and reactions to encounters and premonitions, observed with Roman diligence (religio) despite their seemingly fortuitous character. From this point of view many details we would nowadays expect to find in a biography became irrelevant. On the other hand, 'lyrical' or 'exegetic' elements—though surprising the modern reader at first glance—can be understood as integrating parts of the whole. As confessio means not only confession of sin or biographical confessions but also praise and confession of faith, the theological and exegetic chapters are justified. Moreover, after conversion, the 'ecclesiological' orientation of the exegesis of Genesis in the last books places the individual into a new social context. Simultaneously, the human discourse of the biographical narrative gives way to the word of God. The 10th book, which contains a systematic self-examination and a profound analysis of memory, has a pivotal role. It is true that, in the long run, Augustine's psychological analysis, both intense and subtle, would be more influential than his overall design. Without any doubt, however, a new content and the crossing of elements of multiple generic provenance conspired to produce a new literary genre.

<sup>1</sup> On Augustine's Confessiones and Apuleius: W. HÜBNER, Autobiographie und Metamorphose, in: Jahrbuch der Universität Augsburg 1985, publ. 1986, 161–170, esp. 166–167.

Literary technique

Typical of Augustine's literary technique are his personal variants of patterns of classical literature: the opening prayer, for instance, is comparable to pagan invocations of gods or Muses. Its Augustinian character is fully developed as early as the Soliloquia, though the most famous examples are found in the Confessiones. There the initial prayer serves as a double introduction to the subject matter: in fact, while being a hymnic predication, it also propounds the serious intellectual problems disquieting the author.

Augustine's artful use of quotation deserves special attention. In the Confessiones there are innumerable allusions to the Bible, especially to the Psalms<sup>1</sup> and Paul's Letters. The cited words fit surprisingly well into their new context, not serving as superficial adornments, but revealing the quintessence of the author's intended meaning. This unusually high degree of assimilation, comparable only to Virgil's imitation of Homer, originates in Augustine's intimate acquaintance with these texts, an acquaintance constantly renewed in daily meditation. So the step towards explicit exegesis made in book 11 is less abrupt than it might seem. In fact, as early as book 9, large passages read like an exegesis of the 4th Psalm.

The subtlety of Augustine's literary technique creates a polyphony of prayer, narrative and exegesis, of texts exhortatory and meditative, of talking and listening. His methods allow Augustine to develop central ideas in a rhetorical fashion, but also to dismantle false opinions and restlessness methodically by putting rhetoric into the service of silence (e.g. conf. 9. 10. 25 in Neoplatonic tradition).

Augustine's imagery is not a merely linguistic phenomenon, it deeply affects the structure of his text. His metaphors apply a partly biblical vocabulary to the realm of psychology; the inward landscape thus created is described as 'woods', 'cataracts', 'fog'. On the one hand, the clear structure of his metaphors and his thoughtful use of them reflect the lucidity of his mind; on the other, the intensity and vividness of the images testify to a strong and passionate imagination. Rapere graphically reflects the irresistible attraction of men to God; man's relationship to the world of the spirit is symbolized by metaphors of eating and drinking which have a clearly sensuous ring.<sup>1</sup> If such pictures are not completely new, Augustine certainly shows an exceptional ability to integrate and relate them as leitmotifs to the central idea of his Confessiones. In Augustine's imagery conscious and subconscious elements interfere with each other: God is not only called 'Father' in the Bible; in fact, Isaiah compares him to a mother (Is. 66. 13). This religious attitude is congenial to Augustine's yearning for a place of safety for his restless spirit, a yearning not reducible to a mere projection of his attachment to his mother. In search of 'sources' for individual images, scholars sometimes neglect what is obvious: Augustine's vision of world history as a gigantomachy is not primarily rooted in Manicheism,<sup>2</sup> but in Hellenistic and Roman literature. Virgil, who was Augustine's antipode as a philosopher of history, had described the battle of Actium as a battle of gods (Aen. 8. 698-705).

---

<sup>1</sup> G. N. KNAUER 1955.

Augustine's methods of logical reasoning are unique in Roman literature for their depth and subtlety.<sup>3</sup> They are based on his relentless striving for truth.

The problem of rhetorical devices is intimately linked to the problem of the literary methods used to reveal (or conceal) the narrator's ego. This is the time to discuss the historical reliability of the Confessiones.<sup>4</sup> There have been equally peremptory pleas in favor of and against it. An examination of the authentic witnesses outside the autobiography argues against radical skepticism. Given Augustine's main concern (which was not history but a paradigmatic description of a philosopher's way to God as well as, secondarily, a bishop's vade-mecum to his clerics), the reader is surprised to find facts reliably recounted, hidden motives pitilessly unmasked, and grievous faults

<sup>1</sup> Also epist. 1.3 philosophiae uber; verum as animi pabulum. Metaphors taken from eating are also found in Seneca (e.g. epist. 2) and Paul (e.g. 1. Cor. 3. 2).

<sup>2</sup> A. ADAM, Das Fortwirken des Manichäismus bei Augustin, ZKG 69, 1958, 1-25, esp. 19.

<sup>3</sup> In C. F. MEYER's short story 'Plautus in the nunnery', the humanist Poggio fondly calls the Confessiones 'the subtle booklet'; cf. Calvin's judgments on Augustine's argutiae (in: P. COURCELLE 1963, 380-382).

<sup>4</sup> P. COURCELLE 2nd ed. 1968, 29-40 (with bibl.).

reported with a curtness and dryness unexpected in an otherwise so eloquent author.

To assess the degree of literary transformation of his subject matter in the Confessiones and the means employed by the author, we cannot help asking if Augustine's literary account of the relationship between Neoplatonism and Christianity in the context of conversion is believable. Christianity prevails in the Confessiones, Neoplatonism in the writings contemporary to his conversion. Augustine himself is aware of this discrepancy (conf. 9. 7; retract. prol. 3). Doubtless in his old age the biblical and the ecclesiastical components are more prominent than in his middle life, but in Augustine's time Neoplatonism and Christianity were not incompatible as they might seem to us today. In fact, Augustine wants to show that a consistent study of philosophical problems in the light of Neoplatonism can lead to the threshold of Christianity. It is true that this convergency of science and religion falls short of the historical incarnation of the Logos and the scandal of crucifixion, and our author honestly avows this in the Confessiones. Compared to Minucius Felix and Lactantius, Augustine's philosophical reasoning is more penetrating and more revealing. The prevalence of philosophy in his early works need not be a precise reflection of his state of mind at that moment, for at the same time he had begun to study profoundly the Psalms and Paul's Letters. It only shows in what areas the author then felt competent enough to publish treatises.

Language and Style

Augustine's Latin style cannot be understood without considering his special interest in music and rhythm. It shows not only from his rhetorical analysis of passages from Paul in terms of 'periods' and 'commata' (doctr. christ. 4. 7. 11-13), but also in the surprising avowal of our saint that the musical beauty of psalmody<sup>1</sup> sometimes attracted him more than its content (conf. 10. 33. 49-50). In the same passage he emphasizes the positive role of music played in his conversion; the church songs introduced by Ambrose had had personal impact on him at a time when he did not yet care for relics and miracles (conf. 9. 6. 14-7. 16).

---

<sup>1</sup> For the praise of psalmody cf. Jerome in Eph. 3. 5. 19. PL 26. 561-562; Ambr. in psalm. 1, praef. 9. PL 14. 968-969; bibl. s. below 'Ideas I'.

His sermons, mostly written in short, impressive sentences, testify to an extremely sensitive ear for acoustic effects. Ostensibly, Augustine was striving for popularity: melius in barbarismo nostro vos intellegitis, quam in nostra disertitudine vos deserti eritis, 'we had better use vulgar speech and be understood by you than deploy eloquence and leave you alone' (in psalm. 36 serm. 3. 6); but even this programmatical utterance exhibits a highly rhetorical style; it is anything but 'popular Latin'. Repetitions of words and homoeoteleuta are the main adornments of such 'rhymed prose'<sup>1</sup> which anticipates the style of sermons in later centuries. At its best, this style is not a mere rhetorical game but a form appropriate to paradoxical truths.

An unbelievably rich gamut of linguistic and stylistical colors was at Augustine's disposal. Even within single works there are differences of style. The Confessiones are strongly influenced by the style of the Bible—sometimes even by its syntax—, especially in contemplative passages bordering on poetry.<sup>2</sup> The ornate abundance typical of large parts of his work often alternates with a sober and factual style and the severe logic of philosophical discussion. The richness of stylistic resources is reminiscent of Cicero.

Augustine's poetic attempts are problematic but of historical interest. As he admitted himself, African ears in his day were unable to discern long and short vowels. Taking into consideration this fact in his Anti-Donatist psalm, he became a precursor of later non-quantitative poetry.

The style of his Letters reveals other facets of our author. Rarely does Augustine write on his own behalf: e.g. when he asks Bishop Valerius of Hippo for a leave in order to prepare himself (21) or when he talks about his sermons on fasting (29). He mostly reacts as an official of the Church to the problems of his fellow Christians.

The style of his letters is mainly reserved and cool, even when addressing his student Nebridius (epist. 10). Open-mindedness, thirst for knowledge, and truthfulness are the features our author appreciates in his addressees; in such cases his tone becomes even cordial, as appears from the letter to Gaius (19), accompanying a package of Augustine's works. Still more effusive is the style of a letter to Paulinus (31), full of urbane kindness and not sparing with superlatives. If these rhetorical asseverations sound exaggerated to us, none the less we may suspect that there is some human relationship underneath. The opposite of this flowery manner of writing is the barren dryness of the letter to Macrobius (106), who had wanted to re-baptize a subdeacon (409). Here we hear the bishop's authoritative voice. Sentences are as concise as possible (Noli: 'Don't'). Repetition of words—the sole ornament admitted here—enhances intensity to the point of inexorability. A surprise (ἀπροσδόκητον) comes with Augustine's sardonic request that the addressee should rebaptize him, the bishop. No less gruff is Letter 26, which gives a young poet a good scolding worthy of the old Tolstoy: 'You cultivate your style and neglect your soul.' Such antitheses are a suitable vehicle for a 'Stoicizing' rigorism, which Augustine also used against his own musical penchants in the 10th book of the Confessiones; in the De doctrina Christiana his tone would become milder.

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, LG 126; for Augustine as an observer of the spoken language: B. LÖFSTEDT, Augustin als Zeuge der lateinischen Umgangssprache, in: H. RIX, ed., Flexion und Wortbildung. Akten der 5. Fachtagung der Idg. Gesellschaft (Regensburg 1975), Wiesbaden 1975, 192–197; G. J. M. BARTELINK, Augustin und die lateinische Umgangssprache, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 35, 1982, 283–289; s. now G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Strukturen der Mündlichkeit in der römischen Literatur, Tübingen 1990 (ibid. on Augustine: C. GNILKA, K. S. FRANK, S. DÖPP, M. ERLER).

<sup>2</sup> M. VERHEIJEN, Eloquentia pedisequa. Observations sur le style des Confessions de saint Augustin, Nijmegen 1949; J. FONTAINE, Sens et valeur des images dans les Confessions, AugMag 1, 1954, 117–126; still valuable: C. I. BALMUS, Etude sur le style de saint Augustin dans les Confessions et la Cité de Dieu, Paris 1930.

We have examined three levels of Augustine's manner of writing: the contemplative style of philosophical discourse, which is mainly rational; the pleasant tone of urbane dialogue, which appeals to gentle and friendly feelings; and the imperious speech of the official, who has to impose his will on others. The didactic epistles are close to the first group, whereas the polemical mode belongs to the third. All these manners of discourse are indicative of a personality knowing how to protect his privacy and revealing just as much as is appropriate to the given occasion. The intention and ability to teach is obvious everywhere; the author is too reserved to expose himself, a feature surprising in the author of the Confessiones.

It appears that the style of the Confessiones, animated with lyrical emotion, readily taking over quotations from psalms and Ambrosian hymns, is only one of many tones available to Augustine. On the whole, doctrinal austerity is even more prominent. There is also a chronological development in Augustine's use of language. In his old age our author takes exception to pagan words he had used in earlier years: e.g. fortuna, omen, Musae.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, only hesitatingly and gradually did he adopt specifically Christian terms such as salvator and exorcisare.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Chr. MOHRMANN, Comment saint Augustin s'est familiarisé avec le latin des chrétiens, AugMag 1, 1954, 111-116.

The lack of spontaneity in the letters is due to the fact that Augustine was talking to most of his addressees as a teacher or spiritual adviser, a didactic and psycho-therapeutic role in accordance with both his secular profession and his spiritual vocation. Even before he came to know of Christian monasticism, he had cherished the ideal of a community of unanimous friends, couched first in Ciceronian, then in Platonic and Pythagorean terms;<sup>2</sup> Christian humility and asceticism form a creative polarity with the consciousness of being an elect and the lordly manners of a monsignore in the spirit of Ambrose.

The distinguishing qualities of Augustine's way of writing come to the fore if we compare our author to Cicero.<sup>3</sup> It is well known that in the composition of the works of the greatest Latin prose authors, some licences occur which are due to the use of sources, to their delight in digressions and exempla and especially to their living in an atmosphere of a lively exchange of thought with friends. Yet there is a crucial difference: at the moment of writing, Cicero's process of thinking has already got its final shape, so that the form of the work has the poise of a classical sculpture. Augustine, however, has his readers participate in the evolution of his ideas, developing them as if they were a piece of music. In Cicero's practice, meditation precedes the written form, which is not identical with the process of research but a didactic presentation of its results. Augustine's prose, which is, of course, no less planned, is meditation itself, 'research' and 'teaching' in unison. A symptom of this is the frequency of questions in many paragraphs, e.g. in the De genesi ad litteram. Rhetoric, which had been largely 'forensic' in Republican times, had become in late antiquity an art of learning, of inward dialogue, and monologue. This conveys to Augustinian discourse a vivid warmth, immediately involving the reader in the mental process.

<sup>1</sup> G. FINAERT, L'évolution littéraire de saint Augustin, Paris 1939.

<sup>2</sup> P. COURCELLE 1963, 537.

<sup>3</sup> M. TESTARD 1958, vol. 1, 343.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

What were Augustine's ideas on literature? Of a projected encyclopaedia we possess the De musica, an independent achievement typical of his scholarly approach to all arts favored by the Muses; hence it deserves to be mentioned here as a preliminary. Augustine distinguishes the manifestations of musical numbers in sound (numeri sonantes), in the sense of hearing (occursores), in the act of playing (progressores), in memory (recordabiles), and in the judgment of the listener (numerus iudicialis). Our author inquires into the hierarchic order of these phenomena and gives philosophical and theological explanations.<sup>1</sup> As he does in his theory of time—the dimension appropriate to musical arts—Augustine emphasizes the psychological and mental aspects. Audible music does not matter much: thought and will are crucial. Pythagoras and David, acoustic theory, and the practice of psalmody ultimately tend towards the same goal: The 'true music' is the conversio of the soul—including the body—to God through love.

Let us now turn to rhetorical theory in the proper sense of the word. The Principia rhetorices which have come down to us show little independence of thought and are probably spurious; the early work De pulchro et apto is lost. Being a rhetor, Augustine has a sophisticated sense of Latin style; from the outset, the unsophisticated language of the Bible is the main obstacle to his reading it (conf. 3. 5. 9). His youthful enthusiasm for philosophy was certainly provoked not only by the content of Cicero's Hortensius but also by its good style, despite his assertion to the contrary. At first, Augustine attended the sermons of Ambrose for rhetorical interest; subliminally, the polished form may have contributed to render the content acceptable (conf. 5. 13. 23). Yet this was but partly true, for the alluring rhetoric of the Manichean Faustus, which lacked all depth of thought, could not deceive Augustine. Soon he would place rhetoric on new philosophical foundations.

---

<sup>1</sup> Aug. mus. 6, 2–4; H. PFRÖGNER, Musik—Geschichte ihrer Deutung, München 1954, 97–104; A. MICHEL, Sagesse et spiritualité dans la parole et dans la musique: De Cicéron à Saint Augustine, in: Musik und Dichtung, FS V. PÖSCHL, Frankfurt 1990, 133–144; ARBOGAST SCHMITT, Zahl und Schönheit in Augustins De musica, VI, WJA, NF 16, 1990, 221–237; A. KELLER, Aurelius Augustinus und die Musik. Untersuchungen zu De musica im Kontext seines Schrifttums, Würzburg 1993; M. VON ALBRECHT, Zu Augustins Musikverständnis in den Confessiones, in: Philantropia kai Eusebeia, FS A. DIHLE, Göttingen 1993, 1–16; M. VON ALBRECHT, Musik und Befreiung. Augustinus De musica, International Journal of Musicology 3, 1994, 89–114.

The first step towards a scientific theory of signs<sup>1</sup> was taken in the De magistro. The De doctrina Christiana advanced the study of the problem. This work is related to the theory of science in the De ordine where Varronian and Neoplatonic elements were traced. In order to instruct the clergy and probably also to answer some charismatics who presumed to do without methods, Augustine created in the De doctrina Christiana a theory of science which set a scholarly standard for priests and monks of the Western Church, and even went far beyond its original purpose.

The De doctrina Christiana is more than an introduction to the reading of the Bible for clerics: viewed as a work of literature, it surpasses Cicero's De oratore and Orator, unfolding not only hermeneutics and homiletics but an entire theory of signs and of science. The text was first written up to chapter 3. 25. 35 (about 396/97) and finished only in 426/27. The first three books are on inventio: how to find the object of our understanding. The last book is on the modus proferendi: how to convey the message. Our author differentiates between objects (res; book 1) and signs (signa; books 2 and 3). Objects are either destined for mere use (the world) or for fruition, because their fruition ensures salvation (love of God and fellowmen). Who knows how to read correctly? Only those inspired by love for the supreme 'object' which is the Triune God. This shows the correlation of love and knowledge, which implies a return from the 'copy' to the original.<sup>2</sup> The same principle governs Augustine's relationship to the reality of nature: his goal is not knowledge of detail, philological or physical, but a philosophical and theological view of the universe. Consequently, science has a solid ethical component. Contemplatio is superior to actio, as is sapientia to scientia (trin. 12. 15. 25). Intellectual vision is knowledge based on experience: cognoscibilia cognitionem gignunt, non cognitione gignuntur, 'the objects of knowledge produce knowledge; they are not produced by knowledge' (trin. 14. 10. 13). The point is to understand the 'signs'. Similarly, Cicero had drawn conclusions concerning the nature of God (nat. deor. 2. 16) from 'endeictic' signs (i.e. signs pointing to invisible things). For our author the objects of creation are natural signs; ultimately, we are not entitled to oppose nature as a secular domain to the realm of grace. In the Confessiones Augustine interprets God's creation of nature as a prefiguration of the Church, the 'second creation' of grace; this is more than allegory. What is relevant is that God is the only active and the only real: in this our author's Paulinism and Platonism converge.

<sup>1</sup> C. P. MAYER, Die Zeichen in der geistigen Entwicklung und in der Theologie des jungen Augustinus, diss. Würzburg 1969; id., Die Zeichen in der geistigen Entwicklung und in der Theologie Augustins. II.: Die antimanichäische Epoche, Würzburg 1974.

<sup>2</sup> R. LORENZ, Die Wissenschaftslehre Augustins, ZKG 4, 5, 67, 1955-1956, 29-60; 213-251.

When developing an intriguing approach of his own to natural philosophy in the De genesi ad litteram, Augustine does so in terms of organic life, not technology (e.g. germ and growth). In this theory (today forgotten) pictures of love and care dominate, in direct opposition to the technological patterns of our natural science which bears the mark not of Augustine but of nominalism. On the other hand, Augustine is more 'modern' than Aquinas: his approach, which draws a clear distinction between ratio creandi hominis and actio creati (gen. ad litt. 6. 9. 17) even allows for an 'evolutionist' interpretation.<sup>1</sup>

Sciences investigating external facts are subject to the formula bene uti temporalibus, 'make the right use of temporal objects' (trin. 12. 14. 22). History (including natural history), according to rhetorical traditions, serves as a treasury of exempla. The dignity of history is enhanced by the fact that God created its time-table; we have to discern the οἰκονομία (dispensatio) of revelation; πίστις (fides) is the form of knowledge Plato had assigned to this sphere. Faith refers to the word. Augustine writes a doctrine of interpretation (hermeneutics) of revelation.

The 2nd book of the De doctrina Christiana is on signs, the most important of which is the word. To understand signs we need not only proficiency in languages and secular sciences—especially history and dialectics (doctr. Christ. 2. 31. 48–37. 55)—but also the gifts of the Spirit, the essence of which is wisdom. The word alone does not teach us much (mag.); we need Christ as our inward teacher. The truth of the word is confirmed by reality; it is equally true, however, that res per signa discuntur, 'reality is understood by means of signs' (doctr. Christ. 1. 2. 2). The autobiography in the Confessiones is an account of God's signs as observed by a man; this is the best application of Augustine's theory of knowledge which—following a good Roman tradition—starts with the observation of signs. The ending of the 2nd book of the De doctrina Christiana dwells on the difference between sacred Scripture and secular literature. We should not be afraid of the discoveries of philosophers, especially the Platonists, we should rather snatch them away as though from unlawful owners. To confirm this, Augustine appeals to Cyprian, Lactantius, Victorinus, Optatus, Hilary (2. 40. 61), and even Moses, who had been instructed in all wisdom of the Egyptians (Act. 7. 22). The golden rule of studying the Scriptures is: scientia inflat, caritas aedificat, 'knowledge puffs up, but love builds up' (I Cor. 8. 1). The Cross extends to all dimensions of space (Eph. 3. 17–19).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. gen. ad litt. 5. 23. 44–45; 6. 5. 8; 6. 6. 10.

The 3rd book is on the multiple sense of signs, especially of the Holy Scripture. If ambiguity is caused by the wording this is a question of punctuation (3. 2. 2-5) or pronunciation (3. 3. 6-7). Ambiguity can be clarified by consulting the context, the different exegeses, or the original. We must not take literally what has to be understood metaphorically. This is especially true of all biblical passages offending religious or moral feelings.<sup>1</sup>

The Jews were in a position to observe signa rerum spiritualium pro ipsis rebus, 'they adhered to the signs of things spiritual, not to those things themselves' (3. 6. 10). They were enslaved by useful signs, the pagans by useless ones (3. 7. 11). This is why the Church interprets the signs of the Jews while discarding those of the Greeks (polytheism). Augustine deemed the Septuagint inspired; hence at the outset he did not understand why Jerome referred to the Hebrew original. There are even single remarks illuminating the method and theory of interpretation: the same word does not necessarily have always the same meaning. To give an example, in Matth. 16. 11, fermentum has a negative meaning, in Luc. 13. 21 a positive one. In this case our author avoids a danger inherent to our working with parallels picked up from dictionaries: the idolization of a vocable into a hypostasis. On the other hand, Augustine justly emphasizes the importance of parallels (3. 28. 39) and readily admits that a verse can have several meanings (3. 27. 38). Moreover, the exegete has to know tropes, especially allegory, which according to our author is inherent in the nature of language and of God's Word.<sup>2</sup>

The 4th book (de proferendo) contains instruction for the preacher; school rhetoric is ostensibly discarded, actually presupposed.

Rhetoric is needed to defend the truth (4. 2. 3). Rhetorical education is indispensable, at least through reading (4. 3. 4-5). A preacher must know how to structure a speech and adapt its style to the intended aim (4. 4. 6). Of course, it is more important to speak sapienter than eloquenter (4. 5. 7-8). The authors of the Bible combine wisdom and eloquence. The words of the Scriptures are born from the essence of things. Wisdom herself comes immediately forward from her house, and Eloquence follows in her footsteps as her servant (4. 6. 10). This gives a new solid foundation to the ancient Roman rem tene, verba sequentur. With a new seriousness our Christian theoretician of speech stresses the ties between rhetoric and truth as postulated by Plato in the Phaedrus. An unconditional striving for truth is typical of Augustine (e.g. conf. 3. 6. 10; 4. 15. 27). Revelation is imagined as a speech: God speaks by acts (cf. civ. 22. 8 and 22). Augustine transfigures rhetoric into a theory of knowledge. An sit, quid sit, quale sit: rhetorical categories help to understand the essence of things (conf. 10. 10. 17).

<sup>1</sup> 3. 5. 9 cf. the criteria of Origen: ἄλογον, ἀδύνατον (princ. 4. 3. 4).

<sup>2</sup> In this context Augustine takes into account—mostly with approval—the exegetic rules of the Donatist Ticonius. They are mainly tropological.

'Rhetorical' passages from Paul and the prophet Amos (in Jerome's translation!) are examples of the 'unintentional' rhetorical beauty of the Bible. Cyprian and Ambrose parade as examples for the famous three levels of rhetorical style and their proper use. In general, Augustine's theory of literature and communication is a doctrine 'of the beautiful and appropriate', subject to severe criteria of truth. This title of a lost work of Augustine's youth touched a keynote of his philosophy;<sup>1</sup>

With regard to both his profession (as rhetor) and his vocation (as an epistemologist) Augustine is in his element in the De doctrina Christiana. Aristotle had written the first philosophy of rhetoric; it had been a doctrine of the logical and psychological means of persuasion and at the same time a topography or typology of emotions. In his De oratore Cicero had made an attempt which was totally different but no less important. Rhetoric served education and, in harmony with the Roman situation, political practice. Augustine, the third great philosopher of rhetoric, placed rhetoric within the context of a general theory of signs, hermeneutics and epistemology.

It is not enough to refer this shift of interest to the external situation of the bishop as scriptural exegete, significant as this connection may be. A more essential reason is the fact that Christianity was more intransigent about the orator's truthfulness: by linking rhetoric to truth, Augustine met the challenge which had formed the basis of Plato's criticism of rhetoric

Ideas II

At the beginning of the Soliloquia Augustine asks his basic religious and philosophical question: Deum et animam scire cupio, 'I want to know God and the soul' (1. 7). In the impassioned language of the Confessiones it runs: inquietum est cor nostrum, donec requiescat in te, 'our heart is restless until it rests in Thee' (1. 1). In our biographical survey, we followed the different stages which led to a clarification of his idea of God. Now it remains to add the ultimate phase. Philosophically, Augustine's opinions on grace are extremely difficult; ultimately they are rooted in his personal experience of life. The explanation is not to be found in the typically 'Greek' field of theory, but that of practice, which is closer to the Roman mind: he felt as a sinner undeservedly pardoned.

---

<sup>1</sup> Augustine's philosophy of rhetoric is to be found in an embryonic state as early as in his De natura et origine animae, which in this regard is a noteworthy precursor of the De doctrina: M. C. PREUS, Eloquence and Ignorance in Augustine's On the Nature and Origin of the Soul, Atlanta 1985.

Augustine excelled in the field of psychology, a favorite domain of Roman literature. Tertullian had been an especially creative predecessor. Ovid and Seneca had been masters at relentlessly unmasking the soul to the point of discovering man's delight in evil-doing. Like them, Augustine used rhetoric to fathom the abysses of the human heart. His psychology enriched his discussion of philosophical subjects like memory (conf. 10) and time (conf. 11). By transferring psychological categories onto the Trinity he enlivened theology and gave the dogmatic subject an original, specifically 'western' touch. In conformity with his time, Augustine turned his attention to the inner world, as appears from his autobiography which is the culmination of Roman self-portrayal. The same is evinced from his basic question noted above: from late antiquity until the Renaissance, philosophical interest was less focused on nature,<sup>1</sup> a development prepared by Socrates, Hellenistic and Roman philosophers, who had concentrated on anthropology and ethics.<sup>2</sup>

To begin with the psychology of children, our author analyzes problems caused by disproportionate severity (fear of getting a beating from the teacher of Greek) and inadequate clemency (the father's smiling on his son's sexual lapses). The discussion of an act of disobedience to prove one's personal independence (book 2). From the world of the adult we might mention two passages: one discussing the pleasure taken in tragic subjects, and another describing the torture of being unable to make a moral decision.<sup>3</sup> Here Augustine joins the ranks of the great classical psychologists from Euripides to Seneca. His eagle's eye for evil motives recalls Sallust and Tacitus. Not surprisingly, historians of philosophy consider Augustine the discoverer of mala voluntas<sup>4</sup> (although there are important precedents in Roman legal thought).

And there is more. By formulating the first certitude of epistemology (dubito ergo sum) he anticipates Descartes' Cogito, ergo sum. Together

<sup>1</sup> Expressly e.g. Aug. enchr. 5. 16 against Verg. georg. 2. 490 and 479-480.

<sup>2</sup> Sed bonarum et malorum rerum causas nosse debemus: enchr. 5. 16.

<sup>3</sup> Aug. conf. 8. 5. 10-11; on the two voluntates in man cf. Rom. 7. 18-20.

<sup>4</sup> N. W. GILBERT 1963; cf. A. DIHLE, The Theory of Will in Classical Antiquity, Berkeley 1982, 123-144.

with this, he gives an answer to Gassendi's Ambulo, ergo sum.<sup>1</sup> His subjective approach which starts with the individual—prepared for by Protagoras and Socrates—makes Augustine one of the fathers of the Modern Age.

He is the first to give a purely subjective basis to the philosophy of time. In this he was ahead of all other classical philosophers including Aristotle. It is true that the latter knows that time is within the soul (Physics 4. 14), that past and future do not exist and that the Now seems to have almost no existence. Yet his thought is not subjective enough: it is in space that he is searching for what is earlier and later in time (Physics 4. 11), and in his view the motions of planets (which certainly are something outside the subject) determine the measure of time. Augustine, however, is aware that time is measured in our mind by something impressed in our memory. What is present is my attention. Future becomes real in the present, whereas the present perishes in the past: We are passing through God's Now (conf. 1. 4; 11. 13). All momentary worlds coexist in God's eternal present. Augustine's intuition is the only real Now which exists in the soul. We know neither past nor present nor future, but only the presence of the past (in our memory), the presence of the present (in our view), and the presence of the future (in our expectation). This philosophy of time was 'a great advance . . . it contains a better and clearer statement than Kant's of the subjective theory of time.'<sup>2</sup> Augustine's epistemological approach is fruitful in many domains: from the understanding of sense perception to that of the Holy Trinity.

We observed the priority of subjective consciousness in Augustine's philosophy of time, in his De trinitate, and in his theory of knowledge. This same principle may also help to explain his doctrine of grace. If taken as an objective philosophical statement, the doctrine that everything is done only by God and his grace amounts to the idea that God does not want all people to be saved (e.g. enchr. 24. 97–26.

<sup>1</sup> Tu qui vis te nosse, scis esse te?—Scio.—Unde scis?—Nescio.—Simplicem te sentis ane multiplicem?—Nescio.—Moveri te scis?—Nescio.—Cogitare te scis?—Scio (soliloq. 2, 1).

<sup>2</sup> B. RUSSELL, A History of Western Philosophy, New York 1945, 354; on Augustine's theory of time: J. GUITTON, Le temps et l'éternité chez Plotin et saint Augustin, Paris 3rd ed. 1959; O. LECHNER, Idee und Zeit in der Metaphysik Augustins, München 1964; J. F. CALLAHAN, Augustine and the Greek Philosophers, Villanova 1967, 74–95; S. BÖHM, La temporalité dans l'anthropologie augustinienne, Paris 1984; the originality and topicality of Augustine's philosophy of time is justly stressed by N. FISCHER, Sein und Sinn der Zeitlichkeit im philosophischen Denken Augustins, REAug 33, 1987, 205–234.

102). This view contradicts the Scriptures (1 Tīm. 2. 4; enchir. 27. 103) and portrays a God hardly deserving to be called good. Yet these criticisms miss Augustine's point: what matters for him is the believer's personal experience and subjective consciousness of having been saved from death by grace alone.

Subjective consciousness equally determined Augustine's approach to the problem of free will: what is freer than free will that is not enslaved by sin? (cf. corrupt., PL 44, 936). Like the Stoics he was not concerned with external conditions but with the consciousness of being free.

In all important domains of thought Augustine is true to his character. His doctrine of grace is a statement referring to subjective consciousness. By pondering its objective consequences, we transpose it from the sphere of religious existence into the abstractness of philosophical thought (a mistake avoided, alas, not even by Augustine himself). Through such an approach, we certainly cannot do justice to a subject which is rooted in the speaker's mental history.

Transmission<sup>1</sup>

For reasons of space, we will deal here only with three major works—the Confessiones, the De civitate Dei, and the De trinitate.

We have no less than 258 manuscripts for the Confessiones, ranging from

---

<sup>1</sup> M. COMEAU, Sur la transmission des sermons de saint Augustin, REL 10, 1932, 408–422; R. HANSLIK, Zur Aufarbeitung der Augustinus-Überlieferung, WHB 10, 1967, 15–19; M. OBERLEITNER, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung der Werke des hl. Augustinus, vols. 1, 1 and 1, 2 (Italy), Wien 1969; 1970; F. RÖMER, (same title) 2, 1 and 2, 2 (Great Britain and Ireland) 1972; 3 (Poland and Scandinavia) 1973; J. DIVJAK, (same title) 4 (Spain and Portugal) 1974; R. KURZ, (same title) 5, 1 and 5, 2 (West Germany and West Berlin) 1976; 1979; D. WEBER (same title) 6, 1 and 6, 2 (Austria) 1993; cf. also: F. RÖMER, Zur handschriftlichen Überlieferung der Werke des hl. Augustinus, RhM 113, 1970, 228–246; id., Probleme der Augustinus-Überlieferung im Lichte neuerer Forschung, WHB 13, 1971, 25–34; J. DIVJAK, Die neuen Briefe des hl. Augustinus, WHB 19, 1977, 10–25; Les lettres de saint Augustin découvertes par J. DIVJAK, Communications présentées au colloque des 20 et 21 septembre 1982, Paris 1983; R. KURZ, Zur Überlieferung von Sammlungen der Briefe des hl. Augustinus im Mittelalter, CodMan 10, 1984, 121–134; M. M. GORMAN, The Diffusion of the Manuscripts of St. Augustine's De doctrina christiana in the Early Middle Ages, RBen 95, 1985, 11–24; A. G. HAMMAN, La transmission des sermons de saint Augustin. Les authentiques et les apocryphes, Augustinianum 25, 1985, 27–64; M. AVILÉS, Apéndice. Manuscritos del De doctrina christiana existentes en Europa, Augustinus 31, 1986, 379–390.

the 6th to the 15th century: the oldest known codex is the Sessorianus bibliothecae Romanae Victoris Emanuelis 2099, olim ecclesiae s. Crucis 55 (6th–7th century). Over 120 printed editions are known after the editio princeps of Johann Mentelin (Strasbourg, between 1465 and 1470). The edition of the Maurine monks was a landmark (for the Confessiones as well as for other works), for it was not based on the contaminated group of manuscripts as the editio princeps had been; but mainly on Codices E, H, G (cf. below), as well as on a Thuaneus and Benignianus which can no longer be identified. The influential edition of M. Skutella (Leipzig 1934) and the new Corpus Christianorum edition of L. Verheijen (Turnholti 1981) show preference for the following manuscripts:<sup>1</sup>

- Bambergensis 33 (B III 23), 11th century (= B);
  - Parisinus 1913, olim Colbertinus 711, Regius 3762, 9th century (= C);
  - Parisinus 1913 A, olim Colbertinus 3275, Regius 4000/2. 2., 9th century (= D);
  - Parisinus 12 191, olim S. Germani a Pratis 237, ante S. Mauri Fossatensis 70, 10th century (= E);
  - Parisinus 10 862, olim S. Germani a Pratis, ante Echternach., 9th century (= I);
  - Parisinus 12 193, olim S. Germani a Pratis 757, 9th century (= G);
  - Parisinus 12 224, olim S. Germani a Pratis 736, ante S. Petri Corbeiensis, 9th century (= H);
  - Fuldensis A a 9, olim Weingartensis (excerpta), 8th–9th century (= J);
  - Monacensis Clm 14 350, olim monasterii S. Emmerami Ratisbonensis, 10th century (= M);
  - Parisinus 1911, olim Obrechtinus, Regius 4004/2., 9th century (= O);
  - Parisinus 1912, olim Bethunianus, Regius 4004, ante S. Mariae de bello Prato, 9th century (= P);
  - Romanus bibliothecae Victoris Emanuelis 2099, olim Sessorianae ad ecl. s. Crucis 55, 6th–7th century (= S);
  - Vaticanus 5756, olim S. Columbani Bobiensis 17, 9th/10th century (= V);
  - Turonensis 283, 10th/11th century (= Z);—Stutgardiensis ('Stuttgartensis') HB. VII 15, olim monasterii Weingartensis, 10th century (= A in Verheijen).
- Another family of manuscripts is represented by the excerpts of Eugippius (oldest manuscript: Vaticanus 3375, 7th century).

For the tradition of the De civitate Dei one should examine separately two groups: books 1–16 and 17–22. For books 1–16 we possess very old and reliable manuscripts:

<sup>1</sup> A stemma for the transmission of the Confessiones is found in L. VERHEIJEN, edition, p. lviii.

- Lugdunensis 607 (books 1-5), 6th century;
- Corbeiensis, postea Sangermanensis 766, nunc partim Parisiensis (B.N. Lat. 12. 214; books 1-9), partim Petropolitanus Q. v. I, No. 4; book 10, 6th century;
- Veronensis XXVIII (26) (books 9-16), early 5th century; the last named manuscript goes back to the time of Augustine.

For books 17-22 we must rely on later manuscripts, though they are very faithful to the original, e.g. the

- Patavinus 1469, 14th century.

The edition of Dombart-Kalb, CC 47, 14, 1 and 48, 14, 2 (2 vols.), Turnholti 1955 is mainly based on these manuscripts. Since the tradition poses different problems for each book, a stemma for the entire work cannot be made. A tentative stemma for book 1 is to be found in the Teubner edition of Dombart-Kalb, 5th ed. 1981, vol. 1, p. xxxiii. Moreover, divergent readings are, in the main, more relevant to the history of transmission than for the text. Some variae lectiones might even go back to a revision of the text by Augustine himself, as attested in a letter to Firmus discovered only in our century. The same letter contains information on how the author organized this work and on the so-called 'chapter headings' which Augustine wanted to place in front of the entire work as an 'analytical index'.

The De trinitate was torn away from the author in an unfinished form and was published against his will, as he says in a letter to Bishop Aurelius. Only many years later he finished this interrupted work, though with several intermissions, according to the original plan. Soon after the editio princeps by Henricus Ariminensis (Strasbourg ca. 1474) Leonardus Pachel (Milan 1489) published the text in excellent quality not even surpassed by the Maurine edition. Hence, the new edition of Mountain-Glorie, CC 50-50a, Turnholti 1968, could limit itself basically to a clarification of the history of the text. It is mainly based on the following manuscripts:

- Parisinus B.N. Lat. 2088, 11th-12th century (= codex Bigotianus);
- Parisinus B.N. nouv. acq. Lat. 1446, 10th-11th century;
- Parisinus Bibl. de l'Arsenal 303 (419 T. L.), 12th century;
- Vindocinensis Bibl. municipale 37, 11th century;
- Parisinus B.N. nouv. acq. Lat. 1445, 9th century; as well as on testimonia in Florus and Benedictus Anianensis.

Influence

Augustine gave the Latin language a flexibility and precision which made it suitable for any philosophical discussion. Together with Boethius, who would follow in his path, he became one of the fathers of medieval and modern philosophical language.

His creation of new literary forms—psychological autobiography and the grand essay on philosophy of history—was born from a new way of thinking which had great impact on future generations.

Augustine's description of the first certitude of epistemology<sup>1</sup> anticipated Descartes. His discoveries in the field of the philosophy of time were to be recognized by Bertrand Russell (s. above) and Edmund Husserl: 'Our modern age, proud as it is of all its knowledge, was not brilliantly successful in these matters and certainly not much more successful than this great thinker who struggled so earnestly'.<sup>2</sup>

Augustine also laid the foundations of a philosophy of will, combining elements from the Old Testament with Stoic and Roman ideas.<sup>3</sup> While for Epicurus and Lucretius will had been the principle of motion in animals, the Stoic Chrysippus considered it a durable and reasonable desire possessed only by the wise (similarly: Cic. Tusc. 4. 6. 13). Seneca's idea of an animus subject to emotions (dial. 3 = ira 1. 7–8) was reinforced by Augustine, who, in the style of Paul, opposed bona voluntas and mala voluntas. The latter was the intellectual root of sin. Will became independent of knowledge. In retrospect Arthur Schopenhauer would discover surprising parallels between Augustine (civ. 11. 27) and his own idea of 'will to live': 'I have quoted several passages of St. Augustine which most surprisingly agree with my views'.<sup>4</sup>

Along with Dionysius the Areopagite, Augustine became one of the patrons of medieval Platonism. Bonaventura's (d. 1274) Itinerarium mentis in Deum was based on Augustine's seminal idea that man has to retreat within himself in order to find union with God.

Augustine's psychological self-analysis influenced medieval autobiographies,<sup>5</sup> which represented their authors' lives as imitatio Augustini.

<sup>1</sup> Aug. soliloq. 2. 1; lib. arb. 2. 3. 7; trin. 15. 12. 21.

<sup>2</sup> E. Husserl, Vorlesungen zur Phänomenologie des inneren Zeitbewußtseins, ed. by M. Heidegger, Halle (Saale) 1928, 2 (= Jahrbuch für Philosophie und phänomenologische Forschung 9, 1928, 368).

<sup>3</sup> N. W. GILBERT 1963; cf. esp. lib. arb. 3. 1. 3: non enim quicquam tam firme atque intime sentio quam me habere voluntatem eaque me moveri ad aliquid fruendum; quid autem meum dicam, prorsus non inuenio, si voluntas qua volo et nolo non est mea.

<sup>4</sup> Letter to Bähr, January 12, 1860 (= Schopenhauer-Briefe, ed. by L. SCHEMANN, Leipzig 1893, 379); on Aug. civ. 11. 27 cf. Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung 2, ch. 28 (ed. by L. BERNDL, vol. 2, München 1913, 456).

<sup>5</sup> P. COURCELLE 1963 passim (with bibl.); P. LEHMANN, Autobiographies of the Middle Ages, in: Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th ser., vol. 3, London

The writer of what was probably the most important of these works was by Aelred of Rievaulx; in modern times authors like Rousseau, Sainte-Beuve, and Renan were inspired by Augustine's psychology in the Confessiones.<sup>1</sup> A parallel branch of influence pursued pedagogical aims (Vincent of Beauvais, Guibert of Tournai, Vegio, Fénelon). Augustine's Platonism intrigued the great 'humanists' of the Middle Ages: Scotus Erigena,<sup>2</sup> Abelard, John of Salisbury, Petrarch.<sup>3</sup> His view of history—a new beginning in the philosophy of history—would later inspire Hegel and Toynbee. Augustine's radical religious reliance on grace irresistibly attracted deep and uncompromising religious thinkers<sup>4</sup> (Wycliffe, Meister Eckhart, Tauler, Luther, Calvin, the Jansenists, Pascal) and repeatedly stirred up Christianity from optimistic Pelagian dreams. The belief in predestination, if paralysing at first sight, was singularly metamorphosed into a spirit of enterprise, especially in Holland and England, and became a motive for economical and political expansion.<sup>5</sup>

Augustine was the first in the western world to write a monograph on labor: De opere Monachorum. Following Paul and patristic traditions, Augustine stated in this book that any honest work, on principle, has its own dignity and ascetic value. Compared to the general disdain for physical labor in classical antiquity, this was a great step forward, although the contrast ought not to be overemphasized: there are some remains of aristocratic customs: he thought that monks of distinguished family should be exempted from physical toil (op. monach. 21. 25); moreover, the Stoics had already stressed the educative value of work; and finally, from Cato the Elder onward, the Romans, who considered themselves an agricultural nation, had appreciated labor and industria. This book, the content of which is conveyed by the medieval 1953, 41–52; on Mount Ventoux, Petrarch read in the Confessiones and drew an historical line back to Anthony (fam. 4. 1, ed. by V. Rossi, Firenze 1933); a follower of the Retractationes was Hugo of Trimberg (Registrum multorum auctorum, ed. by K. LANGOSCH, Berlin 1942, p. 193, esp. lines 753–756 = 937–940).

---

<sup>1</sup> We might also think of Montaigne.

<sup>2</sup> B. STOCK, Observations on the Use of Augustine by Johannes Scottus Eriugena, HThR 60, 1967, 213–220.

<sup>3</sup> E. LUCIANI, Les Confessiones de saint Augustin dans les lettres de Pétrarque, Paris 1982.

<sup>4</sup> A. ZUMKELLER, Das Ungenügen der menschlichen Werke bei den deutschen Predigern des Spätmittelalters, ZKTh 81, 1959, 265–305.

<sup>5</sup> A. ZUMKELLER, Das Mönchtum des hl. Augustinus, Würzburg, 2nd ed. 1968, with bibl.

formula ora et labora, influenced the idea of work in western monasticism and indirectly prepared the way for our modern high esteem of labor.

On the other hand, the austere, even hardened aspects of an aging Augustine were not devoid of consequences. If his teaching of original sin is difficult to understand, even frightening to our mind, the reason is that modern readers are not immediately aware of its close connection with the doctrine of redemption. It is true that love, freedom and discretion are the main features of his idea of monasticism, which contributed considerably to preserving the monks of the western Church from a fanaticism hostile to culture, and obliged them to practice charity and scholarship. If the ethics he bequeathed to the western churches is mainly ascetic, we should not overlook that Augustine's views were moderate for his day. As for his attitude to heterodox Christians, Augustine, who had at the outset rejected any compulsion in matters of faith (epist. 23. 7; 93. 5. 17), came to adopt the contrary opinion (epist. 93 and 185) after the successful repression of Donatism by the state. It was a long way from here to the Inquisition, and an even longer way to the virtual abolition of the Inquisition by the churches and its reestablishment by non-Christians.

Hence it follows that Augustine in many respects—both positive and negative—is a son of Rome and a father of Europe. Despite his vast influence and the assiduous efforts of scholars, some aspects of Augustine have still escaped general attention. Even his admirers rarely understand with what care he extricated the convergency of Christian religion and of a methodical search for scientific knowledge under the auspices of truth. He is not a one-sided defender of a credo ut intellegam;<sup>1</sup> his biography shows that at the outset he strove for scientific knowledge and that he made good progress: natural reason grasped categorical notions, mathematical truths, esthetic and ethical standards and even the essence of the human self and the existence of God, if through a mirror and in enigmatic form (1 Cor. 13. 12). In view of the undeniable changes of emphasis during his long life, it may be tempting to play off his Platonism against his Paulinism or vice versa. However, this would not do justice to the continuity of his intellectual life; suffice it to mention that the sentence 'God is all our strength' is found as early as the Soliloquia (2. 1. 1). The customary antithesis obscures the fact that Augustine gave his theocentric experience a double expression: the fact that God is the only reality could be appropriately expressed in Platonic terms, whereas the idea that God was the only source of activity required the vocabulary of Paul. Thoughts are more than words (and schools) and God listens only to the language of the mind (catech. rud. 9. 13). While today a conversion is liable to be called a flight or a sacrificium intellectus, Augustine took this step to prove his intellectual honesty; in his day Christianity was not afraid of contacts with philosophical science, but instead gave it new impulses.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. however serm. 118, 11; in euang. Ioh. 29, 6; serm. 43. 7; epist. 120. 1. 3; in allusion in trin. 1. 1. 1; the idea can be traced to Plotinus 5. 3; 5. 8 through Ambrose; R. J. O'CONNELL; The Enneads and St. Augustine's Image of Happiness; V Chr 17, 1963, 129–164.

Other aspects not yet fully appreciated are Augustine's contribution to the theory of labor, his pioneering work in semiotics, and his interpretation of Creation which, unlike that of Aquinas, gives biological evolution a chance. Nor would we have expected to find Augustine quoted as a 'merely sensuous observer' in Goethe's Geschichte der Farbenlehre.<sup>1</sup> It is true that it would be adventurous to call Augustine the 'greatest poet of the old Church';<sup>2</sup> yet it is certainly evident that the quality of Augustine's prose deserves more appreciation. As a product of sophisticated rhetorical and psychological empathy and genuine philosophical reflection, it must be called a highlight of classical Latin prose in form and content.

Editions: Maurine edition: Paris 1679–1700; PL 32–47; CSEL (cited individually). * J. E. ROTELLE, E. HILL (TrN), The Complete Works of Saint Augustine, Brooklyn, N.Y., from 1989 onward (43 vols. planned). ** Anti-Donatist writings: M. PETSCHENIG, CSEL 51–53, 1908–1910. * beat. vit.: R. W. BROWN (TrC), Washington 1944. * J. DOIGNON (TTrN), Paris 1986. * c. acad., beat. vit., ord.: P. KNÖLL, CSEL 63, 1922. * W. M. GREEN, CC 29, Turnholt 1970. * B. R. VOSS, I. SCHWARZ-KIRCHBAUER, W. SCHWARZ, E. MÜHLENBERG (TrN), Zürich 1972. * catech. rud.: J. P. CHRISTOPHER (TrC), Washington 1926. * c. Fel., nat. bon., epistula Secundini, c. Secundin. (accedunt: Evod. fid.; Ps.-Aug. comm.): I. ZYCHA, CSEL 25, 1892. * c. Iul. op. imperf. 1–3: E. KALINKA, M. ZELZER, CSEL 85/1, 1974. * civ.: E. HOFFMANN, CSEL 40, (1: civ. 1–13; 2: civ. 14–22), 1899–1900. * B. DOMBART, A. KALB, Lipsiae 1928–1929, 5th ed. 1981. * B. DOMBART, A. KALB, CC 47, 14, 1 and 48, <sup>1</sup> Goethe, WA 2. 2. 165 (2nd ed.) quoting trin. 11. 2. 4.

<sup>2</sup> NORDEN, LG 122.

14, 2, Turnholti 1955. * G. E. McCracken and others (TTr), 7 vols., London 1957–1972. * W. Thimme (Tr), C. Andresen (N), 2 vols., Zürich 2nd ed. 1978 (rev.). * C. J. Perl (Tr), 2 vols., Paderborn 1979. * conf.: P. Knöll, CSEL 33, 1896. * W. Watts (TTr), 2 vols., London 1912. * M. Skutella, Lipsiae 1934. * M. Thimme (Tr), Zürich 2nd ed. 1950. * L. Verheijen, CC 27, Turnholti 1981. * J. J. O'Donnell (TC), 3 vols., Oxford 1992. * G. Clark (TC), Cambridge 1995. * cons. euang.: F. Wehrich, CSEL 43, 1904. * de serm. dom.: A. Mutzenbecher, CC 35, Turnholti 1967. * doctr. christ.: I. Martin, CC 32, Turnholti 1962. * L. Alici (TrN), Milano 1989. * doctr. christ. 4: T. Sullivan (TTrC), Washington 1930. * G. M. Green, CSEL 80, 6, 6, 1963. * epist.: A. Goldbacher, CSEL 34 (1: epist. 1–30; 2: epist. 31–123), 1895–1898. * id., CSEL 44 (3: epist. 124–184), 1904. * id., CSEL 57 (4: epist. 185–270), 1911. * J. H. Baxter (TTr, sel.), London 1930. * Recently discovered letters: J. Divjak, CSEL 88, 2, 6, 1981. * fid. et symb.: E. P. Meijering (TrC), Amsterdam 1987. * fid. et symb., fid. et op., agon., contin., bon. coniug., virg., bon. viduit., adult. coniug., de mend., c. mend., op. monach., div. daem., cur. mort., pat.: I. Zycha, CSEL 41, 5, 3, 1900. * fid. inuis.: M. F. McDonald (TTrC), Washington 1950. * gen. ad litt., gen. ad litt. imperf., loc. hept.: I. Zycha, CSEL 28, 3, 2, 1894. * haer.: L. G. Mueller (TrC), Washington 1956. * in euang. Ioh.: D. R. Willems, CC 36, Turnholti 1954. * in psalm. 1–50: D. E. Dekkers, I. Fraipont, CC 38, Turnholti 1956. * in Rom., in Gal., epistolae ad Romanos inchoata expositio: J. Divjak, CSEL 84, 1971. * lib. arb.: W. M. Green, CSEL 74, 1956. * id., CC 29, Turnholti 1970, 207–321. * F. de Capitani (TTrC), Milano 1987. * G. Madec and others (C), Palermo 1990. * lib. arb., ver. rel.: W. M. Green (T), W. Thimme (Tr), Zürich 1962. * mag.: G. Weigel, CSEL 77, 1961. * K.-D. Daur, CC 29, Turnholti 1970, 141–203. * E. Schadel (TrC), Würzburg 1975. * mor. eccl., mor. Manich., quant. anim.: J. K. Coyle and others (C), Palermo 1991. * mus.: C. J. Perl (Tr), Paderborn 3rd ed. 1962. * U. Pizzani, G. Milanese (C), Palermo 1990. * nat. bon.: A. A. Moon (TrC), Washington 1955. * pecc. mer., spir. et litt., nat. et grat., de natura et origine animae libri IV, c. Pelag.: C. F. Urba, I. Zycha, CSEL 60, 1913. * perf. iust., gest. Pel., grat. Christ., nupt. et concup.: C. F. Urba, I. Zycha, CSEL 42, 1902. * persev.: M. A. Lesousky (TrN), Washington 1956. * quaest. hept., in Iob: I. Zycha, CSEL 28, 1895. * quaest. hept., loc. hept., de octo quaestionibus ex veteri testamento: I. Fraipont, CC 33, Turnholti 1958. * quant. anim., mag.: K.-H. Lütcke, G. Weigel (TTrN), Zürich 1973. * retract.: P. Knöll, CSEL 36, 1902. * C. J. Perl (Tr), Paderborn 1976. * serm. 335/K, 339, 340, 340/A, 383, 396: H. R. Drobner (Tr), Würzburg 1993. * soliloq., immort.: H. Fuchs, Hansp. Müller (TTr), Zürich 1954. * G. Watson (TC), Warminster 1990. * soliloq., immort., quant. anim.: W. Hörmann, CSEL 89, 1986. * spec.: F. Wehrich, CSEL 12, 1887. * trin.: W. J. Mountain, F. Glorie, CC 50, 16, 1 and CC 50A, 16, 2, Turnholti 1968. * urb. exc.: M. V. O'Reilly (TTrC), Washington 1955.

* util. cred., de duab. anim., c. Fort., c. Adim., c. epist. fund., c. Faust.: I. ZYCHA, CSEL 25, 1891. * util. ieiun.: S. D. RUEFF (TTrC), Washington 1951. * vera relig.: K.-D. DAUR, CC 32, Turnholti 1962, 171–260. ** Reference works: The-saurus Augustinianus, Series A (Formae), vol. 1 (with forms and frequency of occurrence) and microfiche, Turnhout: Brepols 1989. Series B (Lemmata) will concentrate on individual works. * The Augustinus-Lexikon, ed. by Cornelius MAYER (and others), Basel, Stuttgart 1986 ff., includes encyclopedic articles and articles on the history of ideas (without Nachleben). * Concordance: D. LENFANT, Concordantiae Augustinianae, 2 vols., Paris 1656–1665, reprinted 1966 (most comprehensive reference work to date). * R. H. COOPER and others, Concordantia in libros XIII Confessionum S. Aurelii Augustini, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1991. * Indices: CC 27 (conf.: Concordance of forms, in reverse alphabetical order), Turnholti 1983. * CC 32 (doctr. chr.: same content), ibid. 1982. * CC 36 (in euang. Ioh.) Eindhoven 1976. * CC 38 (in psalm. 1–50) Eindhoven 1978. * CSEL 58 (epist.: indices), 1923. * W. HENSELLEK, P. SCHILLING (and others), Vorarbeiten zu einem Augustinus-Lexikon: CSEL suppl. 1 = A 3 (De ordine) 1973; suppl. 2 = A 1 (c. acad.) 1974; suppl. 3 = A 14 (util. cred.) 1977; suppl. 5 = A 13 (ver. rel.) 1980; suppl. 6, 1992; suppl. 7, 1993. ** Bibl.: C. ANDRESEN, Bibliographia Augustiniana, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1973. * R. LORENZ, Augustinliteratur . . ., ThRdschau n.s. 25, 1959, 1–75; 38, 1974, 292–333; 39, 1974/75, 95–138; 253–286; 331–364; 40, 1975, 1–41; 97–149; 227–261. * T. L. MIRB, Augustine Bibliography 1970–1980, Westport, Conn. 1982. * Cf. also below: C. MAYER, K. H. CHELIUS, eds.

C. ANDRESEN, ed., Zum Augustin-Gespräch der Gegenwart, 2 vols., Darmstadt 1962; 1981. * R. H. AYERS, Language, Logic, and Reason in the Church Fathers, Hildesheim 1979. * R. H. BARROW, Introduction to St. Augustine, City of God, London 1950. * W. BEIERWALTES, Regio beatitudinis. Zu Augustins Begriff des glücklichen Lebens, SHAW 1981, 6. * C. S. BROENIMAN, The Resurrection of a Latin Classic: the Confessions of St. Augustine, CW 86, 1993, 209–213. * P. L. R. BROWN, Augustine of Hippo. A Biography, London 1967. * P. L. R. BROWN, Religion and Society in the Age of St. Augustine, London 1972. * H. CHADWICK, Augustine, Oxford 1986. * COURCELLE, Lettres 2nd ed. 1948. * P. COURCELLE, Les Confessions de saint Augustin dans la tradition littéraire. Antécédents et postérité, Paris 1963. * P. COURCELLE, Recherches sur les Confessions de saint Augustin, Paris 2nd ed. 1968 (augmented). * J. and P. COURCELLE, Iconographie de saint Augustin. Les cycles du XVI<sup>e</sup> et du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, Paris 1972. * E. DINKLER, Die Anthropologie Augustins, Stuttgart 1934. * U. DUCHROW, Sprachverständnis und biblisches Hören bei Augustin, Tübingen 1965. * N. FISCHER, Augustins Philosophie der Endlichkeit. Zur systematischen Entfaltung seines Denkens aus der Chorismos-Problematik, Bonn 1987. * T. FUHRER, Der Begriff veri simile bei Cicero und Augustinus, MH 50, 1993, 107–125.

- * N. W. GILBERT, The Concept of Will in Early Latin Philosophy, JHPh 1, 1963, 17–35. * E. GILSON, Introduction à l'étude de saint Augustin, Paris 4th ed. 1969. * F. GLORIE, Augustinus, De Trinitate, SEJG 16, 1965, 203–255. * H. HAGENDAHL, Augustine and the Latin Classics, 2 vols. (with a contribution on Varro by B. CARDAUNS), Göteborg 1967. * H. HAGENDAHL, Von Tertullian zu Cassiodor. Die profane literarische Tradition in dem lateinischen christlichen Schrifttum, Göteborg 1983. * R. P. HARDY, Actualité de la révélation divine. Une étude des Tractatus in Iohannis evangelium de saint Augustin, Paris 1974. * L. HÖLSCHER, The Reality of Mind. Augustine's Philosophical Arguments for the Human Soul as a Spiritual Substance, London 1986. * R. HONSTETTER, Exemplum zwischen Rhetorik und Literatur. Zur gattungsgeschichtlichen Sonderstellung von Valerius Maximus und Augustinus, diss. Konstanz 1981. * C. KIRWAN, Augustine, London 1991. * G. N. KNAUER, Psalmenzitate in den Confessiones des Augustinus, Göttingen 1955. * E. KÖNIG, Augustinus Philosophus. Christlicher Glaube und philosophisches Denken in den Frühschriften Augustins, München 1970. * E. LAMIRANDE, Church, State, and Toleration. An Intriguing Change of Mind in Augustine, Villanova 1975. * K.-H. LÜTCKE, Auctoritas bei Augustin. Mit einer Einleitung zur römischen Vorgeschichte des Begriffs, Stuttgart 1968. * F. G. MAIER, Augustin und das antike Rom, Stuttgart 1955. * A. MANDOUZE, Saint Augustin. L'aventure de la raison et de la grâce, Paris 1968. * R. A. MARKUS, Saeculum. History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine, Cambridge 1970. * H.-I. MARROU, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris 1938; 4th ed. 1958. * C. MAYER, K. H. CHELIUS, eds., Internationales Symposium über den Stand der Augustinus-Forschung (Gießen 1987), Würzburg 1989. * C. MOHRMANN, Etudes sur le latin des chrétiens, 4 vols., Rome 1961–1977. * C. MÜLLER, Geschichtsbewußtsein bei Augustinus. Ontologische, anthropologische und universalgeschichtlich/heilsgeschichtliche Elemente einer augustinischen 'Geschichtstheorie', Würzburg 1993. * R. J. O'CONNELL, St. Augustine's Confessions. The Odyssey of Soul, Cambridge, Mass. 1969. * G. O'DALY, Augustine's Philosophy of Mind, Berkeley 1987. * J. J. O'MEARA, The Young Augustine. The Growth of St. Augustine's Mind up to his Conversion, London 1954. * F. PASCHOU, Roma aeterna. Etudes sur le patriotisme romain dans l'occident latin à l'époque des grandes invasions, Rome 1967. * M. PELLEGRINO, Le Confessioni di Sant'Agostino. Studio introduttivo, Roma 2nd ed. 1972. * P. PRESTEL, Die Rezeption der ciceronischen Rhetorik durch Augustinus in De doctrina christiana, Frankfurt 1992. * P. RANSON, Saint Augustin, Paris 1988. * J. M. RIST, Augustine. Ancient Thought Baptized, Cambridge 1994. * A. RODOMONTI, Il Discorso 105 di S. Agostino e il mito di Roma eterna, Genova 1992. * A. SCHINDLER, Augustin, TRE 4, 1979, 645–698 (bibl.). * E. A. SCHMIDT, Zeit und Geschichte bei Augustin, Heidelberg 1985. * A. SCHÖPF, Augustinus. Einführung in sein Philosophieren, Freiburg 1970. * J. STELZENBERGER, Conscientia bei Augustinus, Paderborn 1959. * J. STRAUB, Augustins Sorge um die regeneratio imperii. Das imperium als civitas terrena, HJ 73, 1954, 36–60. * G. STRAUSS, Schriftgebrauch, Schriftauslegung und Schriftbeweis bei Augustin, Tübingen 1959. * W. SUERBAUM, Vom antiken zum frühmittelalterlichen Staatsbegriff. über Verwendung und Bedeutung von Res publica, Regnum, Imperium und Status von Cicero bis Jordanis, Münster 3rd ed. 1977. * W. SÜSS, Studien zur lateinischen Bibel. I. Augustins Locutiones und das Problem der lateinischen Bibelsprache, Tartu 1932. * E. TESELLE, Augustine's Strategy as an Apologist, Villanova 1974. * M. TESTARD, Saint Augustin et Cicéron, 2 vols., Paris 1958. * P.-P. VERBRAKEN, Études critiques sur les sermons authentiques de saint Augustin, Steenbrugis 1976. * A. WACHTEL, Beiträge zur Geschichtstheologie des Aurelius Augustinus, Bonn 1960. * C. WALTER, Der Ertrag der Auseinandersetzung mit den Manichäern für das hermeneutische Problem bei Augustin, 2 vols., München 1972. * L. WITTMANN, Ascensus. Der Aufstieg zur Transzendenz in der Metaphysik Augustins, München 1980.

BOETHIUS

Life and Dates

Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius was born into a noble and wealthy family about 480. After the premature death of his father (consul in 487) important personalities took care of him, especially Q. Aurelius Memmius Symmachus, whose daughter Rusticana Boethius married. In his youth his scholarly talents caused a sensation and even attracted the attention of King Theodoric. Boethius was ordered to construct a waterclock and a sundial for Gundobad or find specialists able to do this. For King Clovis he had to choose the best citharist. In his political career he was quickly promoted; in 510 he became consul without a colleague. His two sons held the same high office in 522 even before having come of age. On this occasion he gave a laudatory speech on Theodoric (cons. 2, pr. 3). It was not long before he became the leading official of all magistrates of the court and of the state (magister officiorum). The antagonism between Goths and Romans, an Arian king and a Catholic senate, exploded into an open conflict; the patrician Albinus was suspected of treasonable contacts with the Byzantine Emperor Justin. Boethius unhesitatingly hastened to Verona to defend Albinus and the Senate which had also been drawn into the affair. At that point he was accused himself. The King condemned him without hearing him only on the basis of witnesses' testimony. He was placed under temporary detention in Calvenzano and executed in 524.<sup>1</sup> The next victim of Theodoric would be Symmachus (in 525). In this same decade (529), two events symbolize the change from antiquity to the Middle Ages: while Benedict founded Monte Cassino, Emperor Justinian closed the Platonic Academy after nine hundred years of existence.

Boethius, who was a philosopher and a Roman, perceived the need of the moment like a prophet: in order to make philosophy accessible to the Latin Occident, he wanted to translate the complete works of Aristotle and Plato, and—following Porphyry—prove that the teachings of both philosophers were in harmony with each other. In his day he was the only man able to do this. Unfortunately, the crowned barbarian was not imaginative enough to doom the scholar to home arrest with ink and pen instead of death. Thus it happened that our nascent Europe could read very little of Aristotle and almost nothing of Plato except for the Timaeus, which had been translated much earlier.

Fixed points for the dating of his works are the years 510 (Commentary on Categories) and 523–524 (Consolatio). As for the relative chronology of his translations, independent lines of research have led to the following order: Porphyry's Isagoge, Aristotle's Categories, De interpretatione, Analytica priora, posteriora, Topica, Sophistici elenchi.<sup>2</sup> In all probability Boethius used a codex, a form of book popular from the 4th century onward. This manuscript, in which the texts were arranged as they are in the Byzantine tradition of Aristotle,<sup>3</sup> had been a <sup>1</sup> A. CAMERON, Boethius' Father's Name, ZPE 44, 1981, 181–183 (Marius Manlius Boethius); J. MOORHEAD, Boethius and Romans in Ostrogothic Service, Historia 27, 1978, 604–612; C. MORTON, Marius of Avenches, the Excerpta Valesiana, and the Death of Boethius, Traditio 38, 1982, 107–136; U. PIZZANI, Boezio consulente tecnico al servizio dei re barbarici, RomBarb 3, 1978, 189–242; D. ROMANO, Il significato della presenza di Nerone nella Consolatio Boeziana, ALGP 9–10, 1972–1973 (1975), 180–185 (on the typological parallel of Nero and Theodoric in the Consolatio); P. ROUSSEAU, The Death of Boethius: the Charge of Maleficium, Studi Medievali, ser. 3, 20, 1979, 871–889; H. TRÄNKLE, Philologische Bemerkungen zum Boethius-prozeß, in: Romanitas et Christianitas, FS J. H. WASZINK, Amsterdam 1973, 329–339; E. REISS, The Fall of Boethius and the Fiction of the Consolatio Philosophiae, CJ 77, 1981, 37–47 (not convincing); D. SCHANZER, The Death of Boethius and the Consolation of Philosophy, Hermes 112, 1984, 352–366.

<sup>2</sup> S. BRANDT, Entstehungszeit und zeitliche Folge der Werke von Boethius, Philologus 62, 1903, 141–154; 234–275; A. P. MCKINLAY, Stylistic Tests and the Chronology of the Work of Boethius, HSPH 18, 1907, 123–156; L. M. DE RIJK, On the Chronology of Boethius' Works on Logic, Vivarium 2, 1964, 1–49, 125–162.

<sup>3</sup> F. SOLMSEN, Boethius and the History of the Organon, AJPh 65, 1944, 69–74.

'Neoplatonic' school edition with Porphyry's Isagoge as an introduction. The neatness of this picture, which is in accordance with Boethius' methodical style of working, is not significantly impaired by two problems: in the transmission of Boethius, the sequence of works is not so fixed, and the authenticity of the translations of Analytica, Topica, and Sophistici elenchi is not beyond doubt.<sup>1</sup> It remains to hope for a recensio of the manuscripts of Boethius, which is overdue.

Survey of Works

Boethius lived to translate and comment on the Organon; moreover, he translated Porphyry's Isagoge to the Categories of Aristotle and wrote a commentary on Cicero's Topica. Of his commentaries on Porphyry's Isagoge and on the Aristotelian De interpretatione there exist two versions, one of them simpler (probably for students), the other more demanding (for teachers). When writing the commentaries on the Categories and De interpretatione, Boethius may have given literary shape to a preexisting corpus of Scholia.<sup>2</sup> The Scholia to Analytics, preserved in a manuscript, are nowadays ascribed to Boethius on grounds of linguistic criteria.<sup>3</sup> His works on logic follow Marius Victorinus, whose translation of Porphyry's Isagoge was used by Boethius in the first version of his commentary; the second version contains his own literal translation.

Boethius wrote independent works on problems of logic: De categoricis syllogismis, Introductio ad categoricos syllogismos, De hypotheticis syllogismis, De divisione, De topicis differentiis.

We only have the first two parts of a work on the quadrivium (arithmetic, music, geometry, astronomy); of the Geometry we have fragments and a forgery.

The theological writings form an independent group. Of the five treatises transmitted, the penultimate is of dubious authenticity.<sup>4</sup>

Consolatio

The Consolatio, a literary work of art, occupies an exceptional position among Boethius' works. Its structure is based on the principle of gradation. It is

<sup>1</sup> S. however: C. H. HASKINS, Mediaeval Versions of the Posterior Analytics, HSPH 25, 1914, 87-105; H. R. PATCH 1935, 32.

<sup>2</sup> J. BIDEZ, Boèce et Porphyre, RBPPh 2, 1923, 189-201; J. SHIEL, Boethius' Commentaries on Aristotle, MRS 4, 1958, 217-244.

<sup>3</sup> L. MINIO-PALUELLO, A Latin Commentary (? translated by Boethius) on the Prior Analytics and its Greek Sources, JHS 77, 1957, 93-102.

<sup>4</sup> Confidently in favor of authenticity: H. CHADWICK, The Authenticity of Boethius' Fourth Tractate, De fide catholica, JThS 31, 1980, 368-377.

not a methodical description of a rigid system but a quasi-medical dialogue<sup>1</sup> between Lady Philosophy and a man unjustly doomed to death. This is a worthy continuation of the Roman tradition of psychotherapeutic literature, as represented by Seneca in an exemplary way.

1: The prisoner gives a passionate expression to his grief in an elegy when, all of a sudden, Philosophy appears in a quasi-divine epiphany and chases away the Muses. Solitude is typical of such revelations<sup>2</sup> but the scene is also reminiscent of Plato who had banished Homer from his republic. If the Muses disappeared from Boethius' work, however, poetry did not. From now on, verse and rhythm serve philosophical meditation and education. It seems that Boethius is the first Roman to have put Plato's poetic program into practice, though in a personal, not political sense: quodsi Platonis Musa personat verum, / quod quisque discit, immemor recordatur, 'If Plato's Muse tells the truth: to learn things is to remember them unconsciously' (3 carm. 11). In the 1st book Boethius above all unburdens his heart of the grievous experiences he has recently undergone. Philosophy makes the diagnosis: lack of self-knowledge; ignorance of the true goal of man, which is the knowledge of truth. Yet there is hope of healing, for in Boethius there remains unshaken faith in God as the prime cause and ultimate goal of all that happens (1 pr. 6). Then Philosophy prescribes a therapy: the means of attacking grief have to be weak at the outset, then stronger and stronger. The last poem of book 1 culminates in the desire for ataraxia, freedom from all emotions. This finale perfectly fits the psychological situation of the prisoner, as do all further endings.

2: The 2nd book is a detailed meditation on Fortuna, a figure introduced as a speaker in the opening. Given her changeable nature, man cannot claim anything from her. The changes of fortune are difficult to support, all the more so since Boethius had been very lucky before (2 pr. 4). Yet, the very remembrance of benefits received (a standard topic of classical consolation)<sup>3</sup> is liable to compensate grief. This is a good opportunity to look back upon the happier first period of Boethius' life. If later events emerge before earlier ones in his memory, this is fully consonant with the laws of psychology. In book 2 Boethius deliberately puts his memory into action; instead of being inundated with impressions, his mind becomes active.

Boethius' reflections on Fortuna investigate the problem more thoroughly (2 pr. 5-7): in the style of a diatribe our author demonstrates that all happiness based on external goods is doomed to be imperfect. A process of methodical 'dismantling' establishes that riches, honors, and power are questionable, and glory is futile (the reader is reminded of the Somnium Scipionis). The only good thing about false Fortuna is that she can also turn away from man. Then he is left to his own resources: the real goods. Misfortune is often more salutary than success (2 pr. 8); when there is no way of striving for external goods, the mind of the prisoner is compelled to turn to inner values. However, Boethius does not carry this idea as far as Solzhenitsyn who says: 'Be blessed, oh my prison!'

<sup>1</sup> E. RHEIN, Die Dialogstruktur der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, diss. Frankfurt 1963; S. LERER 1985.

<sup>2</sup> J. GRUBER 1969 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> Cf. HOR. epist. 1. 4. 6-11; Sen. Helv. 14-17 and Marc. 5. 23-25; Plut. cons. ad Timox. ux. 8.

3: While the 2nd book tried to revalue current values, book 3 has a positive goal: God as the essence of happiness, the beginning and the end of our search for truth and virtue. Thus, the unmasking of Fortuna in the wake of Stoicism and vulgar Platonism is superseded by an Aristotelian teleology: the striving for happiness. True happiness is independent of the external goods so congenial to the Romans: opes, honores, potentia, gloria, voluptates. Here our author gives up Aristotle's realism and opts for Platonic, even Stoic intransigence. These passages are close to Seneca's and Augustine's De beata vita and Cicero's Hortensius and De finibus, though the details of the use of sources still need clarification. Like a Stoic or a Neoplatonist, Boethius' 'wise man' can justly hope for an apotheosis. Even this passage is not an argument against Boethius' being a Christian, for Greek Church Fathers talk quite unabashedly of the divinization of man.

4: Now that the positive goal is known, the problem of evil becomes urgent. Consequently, the 4th book leads us to the lofty heights of Platonism: evil is the privation of essence, and the happiness of the wicked is only apparent, since due punishment awaits them. For the good, misfortune is a test, an exercise, and a purification. The lot of the individual depends on his personal attitude. This finale has a Roman and Stoic ring;<sup>1</sup> it dwells on the importance of the person and his will as the sole foundation of happiness.

5: Not surprisingly, free will becomes the subject of the last book. As early as book 4, Boethius had distinguished providentia (ascribed to divinity) and fatum (operating in the world). He had prepared us for book 5 by introducing the Platonic antithesis of what is eternal, one, simultaneous (i.e. God) and what is temporal, manifold, and in continuous progression (i.e. the world). He starts with an implicitly anti-Epicurean remark on chance: it does not happen without cause, as Aristotle had proved in Physics 2. 4. Then Boethius turns to the problem of freedom, especially free will. God enjoys full freedom, other beings participate in freedom according to their reason. Man is free if he follows God; vice enslaves him. We will come back to Boethius' remarkable solution of the problem of divine prescience.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For 4, pr. 7 cf. Sen. prov. 2. 1–12.

<sup>2</sup> The Consolatio is considered unfinished by H. TRÄNKLE 1977, 148–156.

Sources, Models, and Genres

From Aelius Stilo and Varro up to Apuleius, Roman scholars had handled problems of logic in terms of Stoicism. Marius Victorinus had added a Peripatetic approach, which Boethius perfected.

The Institutio arithmetica follows a recognized authority: Nicomachus of Gerasa (first half 2nd century); the five books on Music draw on the same author and Ptolemy; the Geometry on Euclid; the lost Astrology in eight books (last seen in 983 at Mantua by Gerbert) probably derived from Ptolemy. The textbooks mentioned here have no independent scholarly claim;<sup>1</sup> they transmit to the Middle Ages the basics of those sciences which operate with numbers. The name quadrivium (later: quadrivium) for these four subjects is first attested in Boethius (arithm. 1. 1). The more scholarly of the Commentaries to the De interpretatione is influenced by Neoplatonism; the works on logic use Aristotle, Theoprastus, and Porphyry, the De topicis differentiis,<sup>2</sup> Themistius (4th century) and Cicero.

In his first theological treatise Boethius expressly refers to Augustine: vobis tamen etiam illud inspiciendum est, an ex beati Augustini scriptis semina rationum aliquos in nos venientia fructus extulerint, 'you must, however, examine whether the seeds sown in my mind by St. Augustine's writings have borne fruit' (trin. praef.). There are parallels of subject matter (as can be seen in the Consolatio); a more important feature both authors have in common is the high philosophical level of their thought, although their attitudes to life and the problems discussed diverge considerably.

Which are the literary traditions followed in the Consolatio? The alternation of prose and poetry is typical of the satura Menippea, which from Varro to Martianus Capella and Fulgentius<sup>3</sup> served as a vehicle for popular treatment of moral problems. Our author's personality and destiny, his artistic sense and severe taste transformed that genre past recognition. The Consolatio is the beginning of a new serious literary genre in which poetry and prose alternate; it lies closer to Dante's Vita Nuova than to Varro. The form of the conversation recalls the tradition of philosophical dialogue. The non-Platonic use of an allegorical figure as leader of the dialogue is reminiscent of Augustine's consultation with his Ratio in the Soliloquia. Philosophy incarnate, visiting the prisoner in his dungeon to comfort him, was already familiar from Seneca.<sup>1</sup> Although her role recalls that of the divine speakers in apocalyptic literature,<sup>2</sup> she is not a divinity proper but the embodiment of human wisdom and knowledge.<sup>3</sup> This definition is sufficient reason for omitting specifically Christian doctrines.

<sup>1</sup> Boethius, however, shortens and expands his text, thus enhancing its transparency and beauty (cf. e.g. the introduction of the Arithmetics).

<sup>2</sup> For the sources of top. diff.: D. Z. NIKITAS, Ciceros rhetorische Schriften als Quellen von Boethius' De Topicis differentiis, in: Praktika des 3. Griechischen Symposions für Lateinische Studien, Thessaloniki 1989, 243-279 (in modern Greek with an abstract in German).

<sup>3</sup> P. COURCELLE 1967, 17, notes 2 and 20.

Despite the title of the work the links to the literature of consolation<sup>4</sup> are not close, though one might recall the consolation Cicero wrote for himself after the death of his daughter; and it is possible that more research on Seneca's Consolationes would further our knowledge. To our imprisoned author the literature of exile (as represented by Ovid and Seneca)<sup>5</sup> was more congenial. The same is true of the depreciation of glory (2 pr. 7) in Cicero's De re publica, a work written while its author was compelled to abstain from politics. The commentator of the Somnium, Macrobius, had been close to the circle of the Symmachi (the ancestors of Boethius' wife).

Like Cicero, Boethius subscribed to Plato's idea that philosophers and rulers should be the same (1 pr. 4). However, in accordance with the religious penchants of late antiquity and his own perilous situation, Boethius opted even more exclusively for the contemplation of things divine. To him, this was the meaning of the solemn ending of the De re publica; similarly, in an earlier work, he had defined the essence of philosophy: 'This love of wisdom is the illumination of a judicious mind by that pure wisdom and, as it were, a process of being newly attracted and called back to it. Thus, striving for wisdom seems equivalent to striving for divinity and for a close union with that pure intelligence. Consequently, this wisdom imparts the merits of its divine essence to any kind of soul by leading it back to its own original strength and purity'.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Sen. epist. 65. 16; cf. 16. 5; 53. 7-8; 103. 4.

<sup>2</sup> F. KLINGNER 1921, 112-118; J. GRUBER 1969.

<sup>3</sup> P. COURCELLE 1967, 18-22.

<sup>4</sup> Scholars specialized in the literature of consolation rarely mention Boethius; for a bibliography s. R. KASSEL, Untersuchungen zur griechischen und römischen Konsollationsliteratur, München 1958.

<sup>5</sup> For cons. 1 pr. 3, cf. Sen. dial. 9 (= tranq. an.) 14; for the theme of Fortuna in Boethius and Seneca s. P. COURCELLE 1967, 105-108; 125-134; for Ovid: H. SCHEIBLE 1972, 12-16.

<sup>6</sup> Boeth. in Porph. dial. 1; PL 64, 11; cf. also V. SCHMIDT-KOHL 1965; critically: H. SCHEIBLE 1972, 217-229.

Thus our author goes to the root of his subject. Consolation is merged in the conversion to God. His work is a προτρεπτικός εἰς θεόν<sup>1</sup> rather than a consolatio; however there is little hope for discovering in it many fragments of Aristotle's Protrepticus or Cicero's Hortensius. Plato's allegory of the cave<sup>2</sup> is constantly present, while book 4 evokes the Gorgias and the Timaeus. Boethius makes a synthesis of Plato, Aristotle and the Stoics under the auspices of Neoplatonism. Even the ideas on Fortuna redolent of Stoicism in book 2 are reminiscent of the Platonizing Protrepticus ascribed to Plutarch (although it might be rewarding to look for Latin parallels from the literature of consolation); Macrobius the Neoplatonist helped to give the passages on Fortuna a Roman touch. Boethius' doctrines of providence, of the 'non-entity' of evil and matter and of the eternity of the world go back to Proclus,<sup>3</sup> very probably through Ammonius,<sup>4</sup> son of Hermias, the Alexandrian Neo-Platonist. Boethius possibly found the doctrine of 'double necessity' in Ammonius' Commentary on the De interpretatione and made use of it to solve the problem of free will: this transfer is an original achievement.

Roman literature is omnipresent in his works: there are poetic quotations and narrative exempla from myth and history. Lady Philosophy is on friendly terms with Aristotle (Aristoteles meus 5 r. 1) as well as Lucan (familiaris noster Lucanus 4 pr. 6); together with Socrates, Roman philosophers parade as examples of active philosophical life and heroic death (3 pr. 5).<sup>5</sup> Seneca is present as a live exemplum and also as a master of Roman psychotherapy. Cicero is a guide for the fusion of political activity and Platonic contemplation of God and for a defence of free will in Aristotelian terms. The Roman thinkers gave Boethius much more than a classical linguistic form for Neoplatonic doctrines.

Literary technique

Boethius gives distinction to the form of the Menippea: there is a new regularity in the alternation of prose and poetry, and the vulgar elements specific to the genre have disappeared. However, he does

<sup>1</sup> E. K. RAND 1904, 1-28, esp. 8.

<sup>2</sup> 1 carm. 2; 1 carm. 6; 3 carm. 1; 3 carm. 12; H. SCHEIBLE 1972, 218.

<sup>3</sup> P. COURCELLE 1967, 164-168; 220-228.

<sup>4</sup> P. COURCELLE 1967, 215-219; 227-229.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Tac. ann. 1. 16; 15. 60.

not completely renounce the satire of mankind's folly (including that of Stoic and Epicurean philosophers), a theme of Lucian's Icaromenippus.

Greek proverbs (e.g. 1. 4) and quotations enliven the text. Since there was no library in his prison and Boethius was left only with his memory, quoting sometimes became a problem. Therefore our search for citations ought not to go too far. In accordance with his situation Boethius often resorts to familiar quotations which do not necessarily stem from original reading. Sometimes he gives a more poignant turn to epigrammatical sentences from Ovid or Horace: quem felicitas amicum fecit, infortunium faciet inimicum, 'whom prosperity made our friend, adversity will make our enemy'.<sup>1</sup>

Often, however, Boethius remembers even the context; this is especially true of maxims and educative paroles.<sup>2</sup> The intention of the sentence felix qui potuit . . ., 'happy is he who can behold . . .' (3 carm. 12) is close to its original Virgilian context (georg. 2. 490); only that the philosophy Boethius has in mind is Neoplatonism, not Epicureanism, and salvation is obtained through introspection, not through natural philosophy. Another allusion to the Georgics helps to express the basic idea of the 2nd book of the Consolatio: if Boethius were aware of what is good in his life, he would be happy (2 pr. 4 o te si tua bona cognoscas felicem, 'o happy man that you are if you know your own wealth'; cf. Verg. georg. 2. 458). A dictum of Lucan reveals the inner triumph of one externally defeated: Victricem quidem causam dis, victam vero Catoni placuisse familiaris noster Lucanus admonuit, 'and our disciple Lucan notes that the cause of conquerors pleased the gods and that of the conquered, Cato' (Lucan. 1. 128; Boeth. cons. 4 pr. 6). As we observed in Augustine, in such cases quotations lead into the core of the author's thought, though in Boethius the citations come from secular texts.

The multiple literary devices used so skilfully by Boethius combine to form a higher unity. Thus in book 1 an elegy conveying despair is the background for the revelation of Philosophy. Then didactic verses indicate the contrast between the philosopher's high-flown theories and his momentary dejection. Next follows a diatribe of <sup>1</sup> 3 pr. 5; cf. Ov. trist. 1. 9. 5-6; (Fortuna) servavit circa te propriam potius in ipsa sui mutabilitate constantiam (2 pr. 1; cf. Ov. trist. 5. 8. 18); atque haec (pecuniae) effundendo magis quam coacervando melius nitent (2 pr. 5; cf. Hor. carm. 2. 2. 1-4); quidquid dicam, aut erit aut non (5 pr. 3; Hor. sat. 2. 5. 59), avaritiae nil satis est (3 pr. 3; Hor. sat. 1. 1. 62).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. R. GLEI 1985, 225-238; quotations from poets help to substantiate philosophical ideas (poetry as elementary philosophy).

Philosophy and a judicial speech of Boethius in defence of himself; the subsequent poem is close to the style of prayer. Philosophy answers this desperate cry for help with a speech that could be called a suasoria, crowned with a catechetical passage in the vein of a Platonic dialogue. The final poem in stichic Adonics (discovered by ancient metricians in Sappho) has a solemn ring,<sup>1</sup> not unlike the anapaestic hymns in the Paedagogus of Clement of Alexandria and Synesius' verse.

The alternation of themes is accompanied by subtle variation of stylistic shades.<sup>2</sup> Each idea is given an adequate literary form; the very change of genres becomes a means of contrast and climax to serve an organic whole and an overall design, both psychological and pedagogical.

The literary polyphony of the Consolatio is subdued by a severe artistic discipline preventing the work from falling apart into disparate elements. An example is the consistent parallelism in the structure of book 2.<sup>3</sup> This inward unity, supported by an all-pervading good taste, may be called 'classical'. Boethius actually became a classic for posterity; of course, his being a classic is not the result, but the basis of his wide reception.

Alternation of prose and poetry<sup>4</sup> is typical of the literary technique of the Consolatio. The poems serve as breaks for rest; replacing the rational discourse by an appeal to imagination, they consolidate the results of the preceding inquiries or prepare what is to follow. In this context, myths gain crucial importance: for example, the men who, though changed by Circe into beasts (4 carm. 3), keep their human consciousness. Much worse is the loss of one's identity caused by abandoning oneself to passion: an exegesis based on Platonic<sup>5</sup> and Stoic<sup>6</sup> traditions. Hercules (4 carm. 7) symbolizes the wise man who accepts his destiny and overcomes it; this is a Stoic interpretation.<sup>7</sup> Orpheus is a witness to the dangers of looking into the Netherworld and to the problematic character of Eros (3 carm. 12). Boethius'

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Mart. Cap. 2. 125, ed. WILLIS, Leipzig 1983, p. 38.

<sup>2</sup> K. REICHENBERGER 1954.

<sup>3</sup> F. KLINGNER 1921, 22-27.

<sup>4</sup> D. BARTONKOVÁ, Prosimetrum. The Combined Style, in Boethius's Work De Consolatione Philosophiae, GLO 5, 1973, 61-69.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Plat. Tim. 91d-92c; Plotinus 1. 6. 39.

<sup>6</sup> Athen. 1. 10e; Hor. epist. 1. 2. 23-26.

<sup>7</sup> Epict. 1. 6; Porph. ad Marc. 7.

Platonizing approach prepares for the medieval interpretation of myths.<sup>1</sup> The very first scene has been designed allegorically: Philosophy has made her own gown (1 pr. 1). We must keep in mind Athena (Iliad 5. 734–735), who dragged angry Achilles backward by his hair to prevent him from attacking Agamemnon. This goddess was interpreted as Phronesis (Scholia A to Iliad 1. 195–196). Plotinus comments on this: ‘If someone were lucky enough to be drawn by Athene by his hair and still able to turn backward, he will see God’ (6. 5. [23]. 7. 11).

Allegorical interpretation as a form of reading determined the reception of classical mythology by philosophers; in his philosophical verse compositions, Boethius adopts this method, thus paving the way for the influence of pagan myth in the Middle Ages. Allegorical interpretation and creation of allegories could be called two ‘hands’ of late-antique Roman tradition: one ready to receive, the other to give.

In a continuous chain of metaphors—which is the technical description of allegory—Boethius shapes the appearance of Lady Philosophy; her medical role (prepared by Seneca, the great psychotherapist among Latin authors); the banishment of the Muses; Fortuna’s figure and speech etc. Our author combines a preference for allegory (prominent already in Plato) with an analogous tendency of Roman literature and sculpture: the art of conveying abstract ideas through artificial images was very popular in poetry from Ennius and Lucretius to Ovid and Claudian. Since allegory is a synthesis of features composed in a way unattested in nature, it compels its public to search for a higher meaning. As an activity of artistic imagination governed by ratio, allegory became a method influential in the Middle Ages, Renaissance and Baroque. It decayed when artistic creativity was no longer considered a process both rational and emotional but was increasingly interpreted in terms of irrationalism. In our day a new understanding of allegory in Roman art and literature is growing.

A literary device typical of Boethius is the correction of common notions by conferring on them a new spiritual meaning: riches, power, dignity (3 pr. 4), homeland and healing (2 pr. 2; 4; 6) now designate inner qualities (2 pr. 6). Such revaluations occur especially at moments when a point of view which had hitherto dominated is superseded. This technique, known from philosophical preaching, is especially congenial to Boethius' Consolatio, which proceeds gradually from step to step. A similar method of invention shows in the dematerialization of the image of 'library': in prison Boethius replaces his missing library with active thinking.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> H. SCHEIBLE 1972, 124–125.

Boethius conveys his ideas through vivid images. Even supernatural beings bear typically Roman features: Fortuna appears as a grand lady with her suite (2 pr. 2), God as a pater familias (4 pr. 1; cf. Prudentius' Epilogue and the passages from Paul he alludes to). At the same time there is a sense of atmosphere reminiscent of Virgil: a description of sunrise and the waning of the stars (2 carm. 3) captures the impressions of a morning in Northern Italy, not merely reproducing what is going on in nature but transforming it into emotion; thus, the author's sensibility creates a lively image capable of becoming a symbol. Yet although it reflects psychology, nature is always seen through our author's eyes in its objective reality. He is not an introspective mystic alien to this world but a poet of Italy.

Boethius is a sophisticated author. He artistically subordinates autobiography to his overall design and evokes the facts in reversed chronological order, a device of considerable psychological interest. He is tactful enough not to report his achievements himself but to have Fortune or Philosophy mention them. The literary theme of Fortune, typical of the literature of consolation, allows him to compare past and present. Finally, Boethius deliberately chooses a behavior opposite to that of his king: Instead of monopolizing accusation, he gives his adversary, Fortune, a chance to defend herself and learns from what she says (book 2). Thus the technique of prosopopeia, known from other consolationes (e.g. Sen. Marc. 4-5) as a means of creating 'distance', gains deeper meaning in Boethius.

Language and Style<sup>2</sup>

The language of Boethius is surprisingly classical for his time; features typical of late antiquity are not prominent, even compared with

<sup>1</sup> 1 pr. 5; cf. Petr. Chrys., serm. 58, 361 B.; Hier. epist. 60. 10; Rufin., Orig. in gen. 2. 6, p. 173 C; Cassiod. inst. div. 5 p. 1116 B; cf. Sen. epist. 2.

<sup>2</sup> A. ENGELBRECHT 1902; K. DIENELT 1951; K. PRINZ, Bemerkungen zur Philosophiae Consolatio des Boethius, WS 53, 1935, 171-175. C. MOHRMANN, Some Remarks on the Language of Boethius' Consolatio Philosophiae, in: J. J. O'MEARA, B. NAUMANN, eds., Latin Script and Letters A.D. 400-900. FS L. BIELER, Leiden 1976, 54-61.

Augustine. An adequate analysis ought to start not with the irregular, but the regular elements.

A prestigious mastery of prose rhythm and a surprisingly great range of poetic meter<sup>1</sup> brought him later the attribute centimeter, along with Terentianus Maurus, the king of metricians. In his handling of prosody, licenses are rare. Variety of rhythm is not an end in itself; it serves to express diverse emotions and moods: to give an example, choliambis reflect the change of Fortune (2 carm. 1). The contrast between the elegiac surrender to grief (at the beginning of book 1) and the exhortation to get rid of emotions (at the ending of the book) is also depicted in the different character of the meters adopted. While the elegiac introduction is written in distichs, the finale is in stichic Adonics, the brevity and regular pulse of which suggest solemn tranquillity: Gaudia pelle, / pelle timorem / spemque fugato, / nec dolor adsit, 'all joy forsaking, no sorrow taking, fear must you fly, and hopes defy' (cons. 1. carm. 7. 25). It may be tempting to interpret Boethius' use of rhythms in terms of ancient musical therapy.

His noble and unobtrusive vocabulary earned him the title of being the last classical writer. On the other hand, colourful touches of naturalism are not totally lacking, e.g. delatravi (1 pr. 5); the same is true of poetic words (carminis mulcedo; summum lassorum solamen animorum, 'the soothing tones of the verse'; 'greatest comforter of weary minds' 3 pr. 1). Most innovative is the abstract and philosophical vocabulary ultimately based on Marius Victorinus and the Church Fathers from Tertullian onward: insufficientia, possibilitas, praesentarie (ἄπαξ λεγόμενον), valentia in an abstract sense, alteritas (Mar. Vict., Aug., Boeth.), pluralitas (Aug., Boeth.). Existing words gain a specifically philosophical meaning, in many cases still present today: Boethius handed down to us notions like principle, universal, speculation, accidental, subject.

In our author Greek words reflect in a special way the dignity and sanctity of philosophy. They are a sort of 'sacred language' of philosophy, as pronounced from a standpoint not human but divine, e.g. 4 pr. 6 (from an unknown source). In Boethius' fictive context this function is especially appropriate, since Greek is actually the mother-tongue of Philosophy. Not surprisingly Lady Philosophy uses the Greek interjection papae (1 pr. 6) to express surprise.

<sup>1</sup> L. PEPE, La metrica di Boezio, GIF 7, 1954, 227-243.

Our author is aware of the acoustic qualities of his words; he deliberately employs etymological figures like tendat intentio (1 pr. 6), oblectamenta delectant (4 pr. 6); the fullness of other expressions borders on tautology: conexione constringit; proficiscatur exordiis (4 pr. 6); occasionally we find wordplay like memoriam maeror hebetavit, 'grief has dulled my memory' (1 pr. 6) or an oxymoron: infortunio dixit esse felicem, 'he said that they are happy by being unfortunate' (3 pr. 7: a quote from Euripides); hae ad beatitudinem viae devia quaedam, 'these ways to happiness are only certain by-paths' (3 pr. 8). Yet, such niceties are not too frequent and do not disturb the dignified and overall sober impression.

An example of a telling congruence of form and content is the narrative of various vicissitudes of fortune crammed into a single sentence. An accumulation of adjectives and participles adds to the impression of density and copiousness: Nesciebas Croesum regem Lydorum Cyro paulo ante formidabilem mox deinde miserandum rogi flammis traditum misso caelitus imbre defensum?, 'Were you ignorant how Croesus, King of the Lydians, not long before a terror to Cyrus, within a while after came to such misery that he should have been burnt had he not been saved by a shower sent from heaven?' (2 pr. 2).

When handling trite themes like Fortuna (a figure known to us e.g. from Seneca's consolationes), our author feels especially challenged to add some luster to his subject by using elaborate rhetorical embellishments, as he does for example in the following passionate protestation against a well-known method of consolation: nam in omni adversitate fortunae infelicissimum est genus infortunii fuisse felicem, 'for in all adversity of fortune, it is the most unhappy kind of misfortune to have been happy' (2 pr. 4).<sup>1</sup> No less polished is the following remark on precious stones: quas quidem mirari homines vehementer admiror, 'which I exceedingly marvel that men admire' (2 pr. 5). Boethius is especially successful at finding extremely succinct expressions of a highly poetic quality, e.g. 2 carm. 4: ridens aetheris iras, 'mock the raging passions of the air': most significantly an image of an individual who stands in defiance of the whole world.

Boethius' style radiates intellectual charm. Unlike most of the Roman writers he develops each of his ideas strictly from the foregoing and takes all objections seriously to eliminate them only after keen examination. His definitions, with their wide, artfully structured hyperbata possess a mathematical beauty of their own: Aeternitas igitur est interminabilis vitae tota simul et perfecta possessio, 'eternity, therefore, is a perfect possession altogether of an endless life' (5 pr. 6); licet igitur definire casum esse inopinatum ex confluentibus causis in his quae ob aliquid geruntur eventum, 'therefore we may define chance thus: that it is an unexpected event of concurring causes in those things which are done to some end and purpose' (5 pr. 1).

<sup>1</sup> Dante has Francesca of Rimini pronounce the same idea inf. 5. 121-123: nessun maggior dolore/che ricordarsi del tempo felice/nella miseria. This is a quotation rather than a mere topos, for Francesca adds: 'And your teacher knows that.'

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature, Theory of Sciences

Like Plato, Boethius used literature exclusively for the purposes of philosophy; after Lucretius he is perhaps the first great Roman author to have followed this course so consistently. In the field of literature Boethius gave definite shape to certain forms preferred by Roman authors, like allegory and prosimetron, and handed them down to medieval writers, who would develop them further. However, he replaced the traditional rhetorical methods of thought with strictly philosophical ones. The literary intentions of our author can be understood only by taking into account his theory of sciences.

Far from constructing a system of lifeless rigidity, he considered the path through the individual arts and sciences as a sort of staircase, which the student ascended step by step while proceeding from insight to insight. This explains the great importance Boethius placed on the writing of textbooks. His Quadrivium was intended to be a meaningful sequence of various disciplines allowing the student of a particular field to develop faculties beyond that particular field. In so doing our philosopher perfected the encyclopedic approach typical of Roman literature and became one of Europe's great teachers. It was his unique and progressive achievement to base education consistently on logic and mathematics.

His ability to keep a distance from the subjects, to give an overview and to encourage transference of methods is matched by opposite strengths: perceptiveness and profundity, a striving for clear distinctions between disciplines and the faculty of isolating and analyzing individual problems with precision. (The theological treatises and cons. 5 are showpieces in this respect).

Boethius' theory of sciences in general, and specifically his division of them into physical sciences, mathematics and theology, would have lasting influence. His impact was furthered by the authority of Aquinas, who would adopt and defend Boethius' classification of sciences in his commentary on the De trinitate. While Augustine had stigmatized physics as curiositas ('inquisitiveness'); in Boethius physics maintained its place in the system of sciences. In this respect Boethius proves to be an Aristotelian, unlike Augustine the theologian and Neoplatonist.

In his theological works Boethius almost never uses quotations from the Bible. The second of these treatises (utrum pater et filius . . .) concludes with the sentence: 'Connect, if possible, faith and reason' (et fidem, si poteris, rationemque coniunge). This principle of a strictly scientific analysis is formulated by Boethius at the beginning of a theological treatise in which he uses mathematics as an analogy (subst. bon. praef.): ut igitur in matheumatica fieri solet ceterisque etiam disciplinis praeposui terminos regulasque quibus cuncta quae sequuntur efficiam, 'I have therefore followed the example of the mathematical and cognate sciences and laid down bounds and rules according to which I shall develop all that follows'. There follow nine premises. Significantly they are purely philosophical; the same is true of Boethius' approach to the problems. A result of this 'mathematical' form of argument is obscuritates brevitatis: brevity and 'obscurity' are typical of technical literature meant for specialists. 'Obscurity' in this case is not a lack of clarity but a manner of writing accessible only to the insider. Boethius was aware of the fact that he used new words and gave new meanings to existent words (trin. praef.). The vocabulary is meant to convey the content but also to conceal it from the uninitiated. This esoteric attitude is reminiscent of Plato (cf. subst. bon. praef.). However, this is not a general theory of communication (or: excommunication) but only a theory of information among specialists. The Consolatio and Boethius' pedagogical oeuvre prove that he also knew how to write for a larger public.

The mathematical orientation of his thought is evident from the fact that Boethius considered the system of the quadrivium as a preparatory school for philosophy.<sup>1</sup> This is also the appropriate context for his theory of music.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Inter omnes priscae auctoritatis viros, qui Pythagora duce puriore mentis ratione vigerunt constare manifestum est, haud quemquam in philosophiae disciplinis ad cumulum perfectionis evadere, nisi cui talis prudentiae nobilitas quodam quasi quadrivio vestigatur (arithm. 1. 1).

<sup>2</sup> C. BOWER, Boethius and Nicomachus: An Essay Concerning the Sources of the

The definition of number, derived from Nicomachus, is rather sober and pragmatic: numerus est unitatum collectio vel quantitatis aceruus ex unitatibus profusus, 'a number is a collection of unities or a big mass of quantity issuing from unities' (arithm. 1. 3). Boethius also knows the distinction between 'number' and 'plurality', which is of great importance to logic: numerus enim duplex est, unus quidem quo numeramus, alter vero qui in rebus numerabilibus constat. Etenim unum res est; unitas, quo unum dicimus . . . ergo in numero quo numeramus repetitio unitatum facit pluralitatem; in rerum vero numero non facit pluralitatem unitatum repetitio, vel si de eodem dicam 'gladius unus, mucro unus, ensis unus'; potest enim unus tot vocabulis gladius agnoscī, 'there are as a fact two kinds of number. There is the number with which we count (abstract) and the number inherent in the things counted (concrete). 'One' is a thing, the thing counted. Unity is that by which oneness is denoted . . . Therefore, a repetition of unities produces plurality when it is a question of abstract, but not when it is a question of concrete things as, for example, if I say of one and the same thing 'one sword, one edge, one blade'. It is easy to see that each of these names denotes a sword' (trin. 3; similarly Boeth. herm sec. Meiser 56. 12). When modern historians of philosophy<sup>1</sup> date the distinction between number and plurality to the year 1884, this is too late. For Theo of Smyrna (2nd century A.D.), Unity (μονάς) and One (ἕν) were distinct as are the number and what is counted.<sup>2</sup>

It follows that Boethius was in an especially good position to apply to other fields the insights and methods he owed to his mathematical studies. To put it in modern terms: he displayed his genius in the transference of methods. This is much more significant than his abundantly praised ability for teaching, which he shared with many less important figures in the history of the human mind.

---

De Institutione Musica, Vivarium 16, 1978, 1–45; D. S. CHAMBERLAIN, Philosophy of Music in the Consolation of Boethius, Speculum 45, 1970, 80–97; G. B. CHAMBERS, Boethius De musica. An Interpretation, StudPatr 3, 1961, 170–175; F. VON LEPPEL, Die antike Musiktheorie im Lichte des Boethius. Eine Studie, Berlin-Charlottenburg sine anno; U. PIZZANI, Studi sulle fonti del De institutione musica di Boezio, SEJG 16, 1965, 5–164; L. SCHRADE, Music in the Philosophy of Boethius, Musical Quarterly 33, 1947, 188–200.

<sup>1</sup> B. RUSSELL, A History of Western Philosophy, London 1946, ch. 31, p. 830.

<sup>2</sup> H. GERICKE, 'Zahlbegriff', in: LAW, col. 3297.

Ideas II

Two philosophical achievements of Boethius deserve special attention: his definition of persona<sup>1</sup> and his discussion of free will. In his study of the notion of persona Thomas Aquinas (Summa theol. 1. 29. 1–3) would start with Boethius: ‘Person is the individual substance of a nature gifted with reason’, naturae rationabilis individua substantia (c. Eut. 3). Thus Boethius raised an old Roman experience to the level of a philosophical definition. The Latin word persona had been connected with the idea of a mask or a role but it also denoted a certain range or dignity. Roman law had initially limited the term of persona to the free, and only later extended it to all human beings. Developing a Neoplatonic tradition, Boethius defined this essentially Latin notion not in terms of formal law, but in terms of content. The definition of the person as substance, not as function, was influenced by Christianity, which ascribed a unique value to every human being on the grounds that it was created and redeemed by God. When viewed against the background of Plato’s Republic, with its enmity to personality, Boethius turns out to have been much more than a mere mediator of Greek philosophy. It is true that he needed the notion of person to describe divinity, but his definition is much more fitting for the human person (Aquinas and modern scholars agree upon this). Similarly, Augustine had used the problem of Trinity to develop a human psychology.

Patristic authors looked back upon Roman culture from an independent point of view and revived it into a first renaissance. With them Latin literature reached a new stage of self-awareness. Augustine and Boethius brought the reception of Greek philosophy to a close and made the Latin language an instrument of scholarly and scientific thought, thus preparing an arsenal for intellectual struggles to come.

Another problem independently researched by Boethius was the relationship between God's prescience and man's free will. The problem of free will<sup>1</sup> had been studied since the sophists; Socrates had believed that nobody did evil voluntarily. At the outset discussion was limited to the sphere of ethics and to free choice; this was true of Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. Plato in the final myth of the Republic had the souls freely choose their future lives before birth; the Neoplatonists sought in this myth an answer to the question of free will. The Stoics felt the weight of the problem since, on the one hand, they believed that the world process was reigned by necessity and strict causality, while on the other, they defined man as a being capable of moral (i.e. free) acts. It followed that he could enact his freedom only by personal assent to fate; the chains of causalities inherent to fate were at the same time an expression of the finality of divine πρόνοια. In addition we have Proclus' treatise on providence, fate, and free will in Latin translation. Ammonius, the teacher of Boethius, was a student of Proclus.

---

<sup>1</sup> M. ELSÄSSER, Das Person-Verständnis des Boethius, diss. Würzburg, Münster 1973; M. LUTZ-BACHMANN, ‘Natur’ und ‘Person’ in den Opuscula Sacra des A. M. S. BOETHIUS, Th&Ph 58, 1983, 48–70; M. H. MARSHALL, Boethius’ Definition of Persona and Medieval Understanding of the Roman Theater, Speculum 25, 1950, 471–482; M. NÉDONCELLE, Les variations de Boèce sur la personne, RSR 29, 1955, 201–238; H. RHEINFELDER, Das Wort persona, Halle 1928; antecedents in G. O’DALY, Plotinus’ Philosophy of the Self, Shannon 1973; G. O’DALY, Augustine’s Philosophy of Mind, Berkeley 1987; E. SONDEREGGER, Boethius und die Tradition, Zeitschrift für philosophische Forschung 48, 1994, 558–571 (bibl.).

Boethius started with the fact<sup>2</sup> that the problem had been treated by Cicero in the context of divination (5 pr. 4). Not only did he refer to the De divinatione, but also to the comprehensive discussion in Augustine's De civitate Dei (5. 9) following Cicero's De natura deorum, De divinatione, and De fato. Moreover, Boethius used the 2nd version of his own commentary on Aristotle's De interpretatione. There he had tried, in the wake of Aristotle and in accordance with Cicero, to leave a wide margin to the 'possible' in order to safeguard freedom. Only in the Consolatio did he find a solution which did justice to God's prescience and was thus acceptable to Christians.

God's eternity is of another kind than that of the world: while the world is in a process of endless progression in time, God is above time and contemplates all that happens as present, no matter if it is past or future for us. Yet this divine prescience does not invalidate the free will of man, for we have to distinguish two kinds of necessities: one simple, the other hypothetical.<sup>3</sup> Suppose we observe simultaneously the rising sun and a man walking through the landscape; both facts are 'necessary' while they are occurring. However, before happening, only the sunrise was 'necessary', whereas the man could as well have abstained from walking. When God sees all the events of the world process simultaneously and presently, they are 'necessary' as facts seen by him. However, like a human observer, he is able to distinguish whether their occurrence is based on necessity or free will. It follows that God's prescience does not abolish free will. Man is responsible for his actions. Hope and prayer are not in vain if we desire the right thing.

<sup>1</sup> E. GEGENSCHATZ, Die Freiheit der Entscheidung in der Consolatio philosophiae des Boethius, MH 15, 1958, 110-129.

<sup>2</sup> H. R. PATCH, Necessity in Boethius and the Neoplatonists, Speculum 10, 1935, 393-404; E. GEGENSCHATZ, Die Gefährdung des Möglichen durch das Vorauswissen Gottes in der Sicht des Boethius, WS 79, 1966, 517-530; P. HUBER 1976.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Boethius, herm. sec. 3, ch. 9, ed. C. MEISER 2, Leipzig 1880, 241; Ammonius de interpr. 122-124 = in Arist. De interpretatione commentarius, ed. A. BUSSE, Berlin 1897, 152-155 (Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca 4, 5).

Two objections against Boethius' philosophy arise: one concerning his philosophical theory of knowledge and another concerning his theology of redemption. To begin with the first: according to Boethius (cf. Aristot. anima 3) animals are endowed with imaginatio, and humans with ratio, whereas God (against Aristotle) has intellectus (5 pr. 5). Each higher form of knowledge includes the lower ones but not vice versa. How then is it possible that man, who possesses no more than ratio, can know and declare anything about God and his intellectus? It was left to Kant to realize the depth of this problem, but even for his own time Boethius showed little awareness of the methodological difficulties in this field; suffice it to compare his statements with the increasing self-restraint of Augustine in matters of metaphysics. Even Lactantius had been conscious of the epistemological problem, and solved it in his own way by deriving man's capacity for knowledge from the benefit of 'upright stature' gained through baptism. It is true that in his theological writings Boethius emphasized the differentia praedicationis (trin. 4), a methodical principle which scholastic theologians would develop further into the cautious clausulae on analogia and eminentia. Even the De trinitate is far from giving a clear solution to the epistemological problem; Boethius was content with an unspecific allusion to grace.<sup>1</sup> It is true that it might be deduced from the ending of the De trinitate that Boethius deemed philosophy a handmaiden of theology; but we should rather say that he considered it his duty to make a contribution to the burning theological problems of his day from the standpoint of his special discipline, logic. In a sense the theological works are clearer than the Consolatio as far as the theory of knowledge is concerned. Unlike the Consolatio, they rely on revelation and the creed of the Church in matters of God and the intelligible world.

---

<sup>1</sup> Nos vero nulla imaginatione diduci sed simplici intellectu erigi et ut quidque intellegi potest ita aggredi etiam intellectu oportet . . . Quod si sententiae fidei fundamentis sponte firmissimae opitulante gratia divina idonea argumentorum adiumenta praestitimus, illuc perfecti operis laetitia remeabit unde venit effectus. Quod si ultra se humanitas nequivit ascendere, quantum inbecillitas subtrahit, vota supplebunt (trin. 6. 24–26; 30–36); cf. cons. 5 pr. 5: quare in illius summae intelligentiae cacumen si possumus erigamur; for intellectual knowledge: Plat. Phdr. 249a 1–5 (through philosophical Eros); cf. Plotin. 3. 4. 36; Boeth. cons. 4 carm. 1. 1–30; 5 pr. 5 extr.

Let us now turn to the second objection: to theological readers, Boethius' reliance on human virtus and sapientia looks somewhat naïve and pagan. His opinion that nobody deliberately does evil for the sake of evil-doing bears the stamp of Greek intellectualism (4 pr. 6). Such a Socratic high esteem of knowledge rests on the supposition that knowledge is not limited to theory but concerns and changes man in his entirety. This may well be true of Boethius, who was a fanatic of logic and regarded ideas as realities; but he ought not to have judged others by himself. Before him, Euripides, Ovid, Seneca, and Augustine had recognized the gap between knowledge and action or, to quote Paul, between 'willing' and 'carrying out'. It reveals the Roman cast of Boethius' mind that even the idea of humility is intertwined with notions of merit: iustae humilitatis pretio inaestimabilem vicem divinae gratiae promeremur, 'by the price of just humility we deserve the inestimable benefit of God's grace' (5 pr. 3). In this regard Augustine proved more penetrating. On the whole, Boethius assimilated Greek philosophy to give lasting expression to his Roman experiences. His readers may feel free to interpret this noble form of natural humanity ultimately in terms of grace.

Why does the Consolatio limit its scope to philosophical disquisitions without discussing Christianity? It would be the simplest solution to consider Boethius a pagan and to declare that his theological writings are spurious. This standpoint was defended in the 19th century until an important finding made it impossible. In a fragment discovered by Alfred Holder,<sup>1</sup> Cassiodorus attests that his friend Boethius had written 'a book on the Trinity, some dogmatic chapters and a book against Nestorius'. This solid contemporary testimony, which is confirmed by criteria of language and content, compels us to look for another answer. The correct solution is based on the observation that no passage in the Consolatio does explicitly contradict Christianity. Many of Boethius' philosophical ideas converge with religion: he emphasizes the personal character of God, the punishments in the other world, love, the renunciation of hate against one's enemies. He draws a clear line between time and eternity without involving God in the cosmic process. The Aristotelian doctrine of the eternity of the world (5 pr. 6) does not contradict Christian faith, even in the view of Aquinas.<sup>1</sup> But unlike Alcuin (De grammatica), we are not compelled to use an interpretatio Christiana. Could it not have been that Boethius simply decided to write a 'human' book? Just as he tries elsewhere to separate disciplines and isolate problems, in the Consolatio he limited his scope to the sphere of human reason. The clear separation of theology and philosophy springs from a born logician's aversion to vagueness. In a deliberate act of intellectual modesty, Boethius limited his research to the realm of natural reason, a choice which enabled him to reach the largest possible audience. This attitude was understood by readers like Conrad of Hirsau and John of Salisbury.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. USENER, Anecdoton Holderi. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte Roms in ostgotischer Zeit, Bonn 1877, repr. 1969.

As a senator at Theodoric's court, Boethius was a worthy representative of the practical and political qualities of the Romans, a feature much less prominent in Augustine. As had been the case with Cicero, our author's attempts to spiritualize the notion of glory by philosophy are unable to veil his grief about the loss of his earthly homeland. His experience of man's virtue (virtus) and of man's dignity was closer to the Roman tradition and less sophisticated than Augustine's. Doubtless the African's religious insight is more profound. Yet the sober mind of Boethius courageously stood the test of death as a true Roman, without renouncing the world. In this, through his life and work, Boethius was a keystone for a basic theme of Roman literature: the magna mors: in fact it was at death's door that the individual was raised to his greatest intellectual and moral height.<sup>3</sup> Boethius reflected with a new philosophical awareness an experience familiar to many Romans. In his program of psychotherapy, ever stronger medicaments should follow the weaker ones. Thus, discussions of moral philosophy are increasingly replaced with strictly philosophical argument; incidentally, this seems to point to a hierarchy of philosophical schools.

<sup>1</sup> De aeternitate mundi contra murmurantes, ed. Parm. 1065 vol. 16, 320 = opusc. 27 in vol. 27, ed. Vivès.

<sup>2</sup> Conrad of Hirsau, Dialogus super auctores, ed. R. B. C. Huygens, in: Coll. Latomus 17, 1955, 46, line 1163; John of Salisbury, Policraticus 7. 15. 672b, ed. Webb, vol. 2, 155, 16.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. 1 pr. 3; a further step is to 2 carm. 7. 15-16.

Boethius' personality inspired even a critical and cool logician like Bertrand Russell to enthusiasm: 'During the two centuries before his time and the ten centuries after it, I cannot think of any European man of learning so free from superstition and fanaticism. Nor are his merits merely negative; his survey is lofty, disinterested, and sublime. He would have been remarkable in any age; in the age in which he lived, he is utterly amazing'.<sup>1</sup>

As for his literary creativity, it is tempting to use similar superlatives. The integrity and the transfigurative force of his mind can be felt in every detail of his work. After Virgil, Boethius succeeded once again in accomplishing in the field of aesthetics what had been a typical feature of classical ethical discipline: he tried not to leave to chance any detail in life or art worthy of orientation towards some higher goal. Originality did not depend on matter, but on the mind's ability to penetrate matter and transform it completely.

However, Boethius is not immovable like a classical Roman's statue. His humanity shows in his relationship to those who are close to him. He is proud of his sons; his loving care for his wife is all the more moving for the delicate shyness of its expression; he sincerely respects his father-in-law Symmachus and courageously defends his colleagues in the senate. In view of such outstanding qualities it is almost a relief to discover some hints of vanity under the philosopher's cloak. Our sage has philosophy tell him that he had been too modest and not praised his merits sufficiently (1 pr. 5). His Italian blood shows in his delight in honors and festive glamor. Involuntarily, through the mask of the philosopher and ancient Roman, at times an almost modern sensibility can be sensed, clinging passionately to each transient moment of our short human life (5 pr. 6).

In another respect Boethius is very far from modern resignation: the ideas he cherishes are real for him, as can be gathered from the affective tone of his poems. The entire universe is penetrated with love (4 carm. 6), an idea which Dante would make the keystone of his Divine Comedy: L'amor che muove il sole e l'altre stelle.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> B. RUSSELL, A History of Western Philosophy, London 1946, 373.

<sup>2</sup> C. J. DE VOGEL, Amor quo caelum regitur: Quel amour et quel Dieu?, in: L. OBERTELLO, ed., 1981, 193-200.

Transmission

For lack of space we limit our discussion to the transmission of the Consolatio Philosophiae. The available collations are not sufficient to establish a recensio<sup>1</sup> or a stemma for the over 400 manuscripts. Corruptions common to all manuscripts hitherto studied prove that they had a common source. The final vulgate is full of faults and lectiones faciliores. The witnesses for the best reading vary considerably; e.g. sometimes only the text used by Maximus Planudes for his Greek translation preserved the correct wording. Therefore, the critic has to compare single readings rather than classes of manuscripts. There is much space left to conjectural criticism. The following manuscripts are thought to be the most important:

- Parisinus B.N. Lat. 7181, antea Puteanus, Regius 5365, 9th century;
- Monacensis 18 765, antea Tegurinus 765, early 9th century;
- Florentinus Laurentianus XIV 15, early 9th century;
- Vaticanus Lat. 3363, 9th century.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

In the Middle Ages and in recent times the Consolatio found its readers independently of social rank and philosophical conviction. Was this owing to the honesty of the author, who faced his destiny in order to overcome it? Or to the poised logic of his argument, combined with powerful imagery? Or, most of all, to his undogmatic, purely humane language which was a special gift of Rome to philosophy?

<sup>1</sup> L. BIELER, CC 94, 1957, p. xii; W. WEINBERGER CSEL 67, 1934, p. xxii; L. BIELER, Vorbemerkungen zu einer Neuausgabe der Consolatio des Boethius, WS 70, 1957, 11–21; A. ENGELBRECHT 1902; K. BÜCHNER, Bemerkungen zum Text der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, Hermes 75, 1940, 279–297; K. DIENELT 1942 and 1951; J. GRUBER 1978, 45–48; F. TRONCARELLI, Boethiana Aetas. Modelli grafici e fortuna manoscritta della Consolatio Philosophiae tra IX e XII secolo, Alessandria 1987.

<sup>2</sup> P. COURCELLE, La survie comparée des Confessions augustiniennes et de la Consolation boécienne, in: R. R. BOLGAR, ed., Classical Influences on European Culture A.D. 500–1500, Cambridge 1971, 131–142; older: H. R. PATCH, The Tradition of Boethius. A Study of his Importance in Medieval Culture, New York 1935; R. ANASTASI, La fortuna di Boezio, MSLC 3, 1951, 93–110; A. AUER, Johannes von Dambach und die Trostbücher vom 11. bis zum 16. Jh., Münster 1928; K. BURDACH, Die humanistischen Wirkungen der Trostschrift des Boethius im Mittelalter und in der Renaissance, DVjs 11, 1933, 530–558; R. A. DWYER, Boethian Fictions. Narratives in the Medieval French Versions of the Consolatio Philosophiae, Cambridge, Mass. 1976; H.-W. HEINZ, Grazia di Meo, il libro di Boezio de chonsolazione (1343), Frankfurt 1984; G. MATHON, La tradition de la Consolation de Boèce, REAug 14, 1968, 133–138; F. P. PICKERING, Augustin oder Boethius? Geschichtsschreibung und epische Dichtung im Mittelalter und in der Neuzeit, Teil 1: Einführender Teil, Berlin 1967; D. Z. NIKITAS, Eine byzantinische Übersetzung von Boethius' De hypotheticis syllogismis, Göttingen 1981; D. Z. NIKITAS, Boethius' De topicis differentiis und die byzantinische Rezeption dieses Werkes (= Corpus Philosophorum Medii Aevi: Philosophi Byzantini, vol. 5), Athens 1990; we know two Byzantine translations by

Rational and emotional elements (sententiarum pondus and canendi iucunditas 3 pr. 1) conspire to produce a strong impact. On the one hand, Boethius inspired medieval poetry (including the metricians who were constantly aware of him); on the other hand he provided scientific thought with the priceless equipment of Aristotle's logic (and, as a corollary, the musical science of antiquity).

Along with the Bible, the Imitatio Christi, and the works of Virgil, the Consolatio remained until recent times one of the most-read books. Less than half a century after the Gutenberg Bible, there existed already 43 printed editions of the Consolatio. Edward Gibbon (d. 1794) would call it 'a golden volume, not unworthy of the leisure of Plato or Tully'.

Among Boethius' imitators, translators, and commentators we find distinguished names: King Alfred translated the book into Anglo-Saxon.<sup>1</sup> There followed English translations by Chaucer<sup>2</sup> and John Lydgate, an old high German version by Notker III Labeo (together with other works of Boethius),<sup>3</sup> and a Greek translation by Maximus Planudes.<sup>4</sup> It is highly probable that Dante's teacher, Brunetto Latini,

---

Maximos Holobolos (with scholia) and Prochoros Kydones (14th century); Holobolos (13th century) was further adapted by Pachymeres (late 13th century); A. THOMAS, M. ROQUES, Traductions françaises de la Consolatio Philosophiae de Boèce, Histoire littéraire de la France 37, 1938, 419-488; A. VAN DE VYVER, Les traductions du De consolatione philosophiae de Boèce en littérature comparée, H&R 6, 1939, 247-273.—For the medieval commentators s. the following notes and the editions.—For the legend: H. R. PATCH, The Beginnings of the Legend of Boethius, Speculum 22, 1947, 443-445.

<sup>1</sup> K. OTTEN, König Alfreds Boethius, Tübingen 1964; F. A. PAYNE, King Alfred and Boethius. An Analysis of the Old English Version of the Consolation of Philosophy, Madison 1968; D. K. BOLTON, The Study of the Consolation of Philosophy in Anglo-Saxon England, AHMA 52, 1977, 33-78.

<sup>2</sup> Westminster 1478, facsimile Norwood 1974; cf. B. JEFFERSON 1917.

<sup>3</sup> Ed. by E. GRAFF, Berlin 1837; Notker, Die deutschen Werke, ed. by E. H. SEHRT, Halle 1933; H. NAUMANN, Notkers Boethius, Untersuchungen über Quellen und Stil, Straßburg 1913; E. LUGINBÜHL, Studien zu Notkers Übersetzungskunst, diss. Zürich 1933 (1970); I. SCHRÖBLER, Notker III. von St. Gallen als Übersetzer und Kommentator von Boethius' De Consolatione Philosophiae, Tübingen 1953.

<sup>4</sup> Boèce, De la Consolation de la philosophie. Traduction grecque de Maxime Planude, publ. pour la première fois dans son entier par E.-A. BÉTANT, Genève 1871, repr. 1962.

made an Italian version. It is not surprising to find medieval French versions; rather exceptional is the Hebrew Boethius found in a Vatican manuscript. At Pavia Boethius later enjoyed a local cult, which would be authorized by Pope Leo XIII in 1883.

In the Middle Ages Boethius was one of the classical authors who most frequently gave rise to commentaries. A commentary on the theological works<sup>1</sup> and a Vita of Boethius bear the name of Johannes Scotus; another commentary on the theological works was written by Gilbertus Porretanus (PL 64). The De trinitate enjoyed an almost canonical authority during the Middle Ages. There were also commentaries on his mathematical writings.<sup>2</sup>

The numerous commentators of the Consolatio<sup>3</sup> gave special heed to the theological and cosmological poem 3 carm. 9, a Boethian text crucial to the Medieval view of the physical world. William Occam the nominalist and father of modern thought, chose Boethius as his point of departure.

No less impressive is the influence of the Consolatio on poetic literature and iconography. Julian of Toledo quoted Boethius. The poems were set to music: in the Psalter of Ludwig the German (cod. Berol. Meerm. 250, 9th century, 1 b) some of the carmina are provided with musical notes (1 carm. 1, 2 carm. 5, and 3 carm. 8). Alanus ab Insulis (Alain de Lille) could not have written his allegory of Natura without knowledge of Boethius; the same is true of Dante's Vita nuova and Divina Commedia. A moving passage in Convivio 2. 13 attests to the great poet's reading of the Consolatio. At the moment when he had lost his love, Dante read Boethius 'in order to turn back to the path

<sup>1</sup> Ed. by E. K. RAND, Quellen und Untersuchungen, vol. 1, part 2, München 1906; E. K. RAND, The Supposed Commentary of John the Scot on the Opuscula sacra of Boethius, RNeosc 36, 1934, 67-77; for the Opuscula sacra cf. also M. CAPPUYNS, Le plus ancien commentaire des Opuscula Sacra et son origine, RecTh 3, 1931, 237-272.

<sup>2</sup> G. R. EVANS, Introduction to Boethius' Arithmetic of the Tenth to the Fourteenth Century, HS 16, 1978, 22-41; G. R. EVANS, A Commentary on Boethius' Arithmetic of the Twelfth or Thirteenth Century, Annals of Science 35, 1978, 131-141; M. FOLKERTS, 'Boethius' Geometrie II, ein mathematisches Lehrbuch des Mittelalters, Wiesbaden 1970.

<sup>3</sup> P. COURCELLE, Étude critique sur les commentaires de la Consolation de Boèce (IX<sup>e</sup>-XV<sup>e</sup> siècle), AHMA 14, 1939, 5-140; J. SILVESTRE, Le commentaire inédit de Jean Scot Erigène au mètre IX du Livre III du De Consolatione Philosophiae, RHE 47, 1952, 44-122; G. MATHON, Le commentaire du Pseudo-Érigène sur la Consolation Philosophiae de Boèce, RecTh 22, 1955, 213-257; D. K. BOLTON, Remigian Commentaries on the Consolation of Philosophy and their Sources, Traditio 33, 1977, 381-394.

trodden by another disconsolate man. And as it happens that someone in search for silver finds gold presented to him for some hidden reason, not without divine interference, thus did I find in my search for comfort not only a remedy for my tears, but the words of authors, science and books; considering them I came to judge that philosophy, who was their mistress, must be something very high. And I imagined her shaped as a noble lady; and I could not view her in any other activity than charity and my sense of truth had such a steady vision of her, that I almost could not turn my eyes from her.' The image of the donna gentile merges with Beatrice. It is to Boethius, again, that Dante owes the idea of reformatio as a way back to the origin.<sup>1</sup> The tribune Cola di Rienzo (d. 1354) had a very personal relationship to Boethius.<sup>2</sup>

Nietzsche called up Roman Boethius and his personified Philosophy (cons. 2 pr. 7) against his continually busy German readers: 'Abundance of time, of serenity of sky and heart, of otium in the most audacious sense of the word: all these are good things which we Germans of today do not have and hence cannot give. After such a graceful answer my Philosophy advises me to be silent and not ask further; all the more that in certain cases, as the proverb says, you can only remain a philosopher if you are silent.'<sup>3</sup>

Editions: Complete works (except for fid. cath.): Joh. Greg. DE GREGORIIS, Venetiis 1491–1492. * cons.: A. COBURGER, Nürnberg 1473. * fid. cath.: ed. by Ren. VALLINUS, Leiden 1656. * Complete text: PL 63–64, Paris (1847) 1882; 1891. * categ.: L. MINIO-PALUELLO, in: Aristoteles Latinus, 1, 1–5, Leiden 1961, 1–41. * anal. pr. (recensiones duae): L. MINIO-PALUELLO, in: Aristoteles Latinus, 3, 1–4, Leiden 1962, 1–139; 143–191. * divis.: L. POZZI (T of the editio princeps Venetiis 1492, Tr), Brescia 1969. * herm.: C. MEISER, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1877–1880. * L. MINIO-PALUELLO, in: Aristoteles Latinus, 2, 1–2, Leiden 1965, 1–38. * in top. Cic.: I. C. ORELLI and I. G. BAITER, Ciceronis Opera 5, 1 Turici 1833, 270–388. * in Porph. comm.: S. BRANDT, G. SCHEPPS, CSEL 48, 1906. * diff. top.: D. Z. NIKITAS (T, monogr.), Athens 1990. * E. STUMP (TrN, essays), Ithaca 1978. * syll. hyp.: L. OBERTELLO (ITr), Brescia 1969. * top. Arist.: L. MINIO-PALUELLO, B. G. DOD, in: Aristoteles

<sup>1</sup> Lo sommo desiderio di ciascuna cosa e prima da la Natura dato è lo ritornare a lo suo Principio (Convivio 4, 12; cf. Boeth. cons. 3 carn. 2 and pr. 3).

<sup>2</sup> Dilectissimum mihi alium illum patricium Boetium Severinum palatinis a canibus accusatum (Correspondence 3, p. 394, lines 280–281).

<sup>3</sup> Menschliches, Allzumenschliches, Vorrede 8, in: F. NIETZSCHE, Werke, ed. by K. SCHLECHTA, 1, München 7th ed. 1973, 444–445.

Latinus, 5, 1–3, Leiden 1969, 1–179. * elench. soph.: B. G. DOD, in: Aristoteles Latinus, 6, 1–3, Leiden 1976, 1–60. * Quadrivium (arithm., mus., ps.-Boeth., geom.): G. FRIEDLEIN, Lipsiae 1867, repr. 1966. * arithm.: M. MASI (TrN), Amsterdam 1983. * mus.: O. PAUL (TrN), Leipzig 1872. * geom. (2 preserved excerpts): M. FOLKERTS 1975. * Ps.-Boethius, geom.: M. FOLKERTS, Wiesbaden 1970. * cons.: A. FORTESCUE, G. D. SMITH (TC), London 1925, repr. 1976. * W. WEINBERGER, CSEL 67, Wien 1934. * K. BÜCHNER, Heidelberg 1947, 3rd ed. 1977 (editio minor). * L. BIELER, Turnholti 1957 (CC 94, with bibl.), 2nd ed. 1984. * V. E. WATTS (Tr), Baltimore 1969. * O. DALLERA (Tr), introd. by C. MOHRMANN, Milano 1977. * J. GRUBER (C), Berlin 1978. * E. GEGENSCHATZ, O. GIGON (TTrN), Zürich 1988. * cons., opusc. sacra: R. PEIPER, Lipsiae 1871. * L. OBERTELLO, Milano 1979. * H. F. STEWART, E. K. RAND (T with Tr by 'I.T.' 1609), London 1918, rev. S. J. TESTER, London 1973. * The poetic parts of cons.: E. RAPISARDA (TTr), Catania 2nd ed. 1960. * H. SCHEIBLE (C) Heidelberg 1972, 7–171. * cons. 1 carm. 5: A. TRAINA (TTrC), Per l'esegesi di una lirica boeziana, Orpheus n.s. 1, 1980, 391–410. * cons. 1. 5–7; 5: R. W. SHARPLES (TTrC), Warminster 1991. * opusc. sacra: E. RAPISARDA (TTr), Catania 2nd ed. 1960. * M. ELSÄSSER (TTrN), Hamburg 1988. * Ps.-Boethius, De disciplina scholarium: O. WEIJERS (TN), Leiden, Köln 1976. ** Medieval commentaries: Thomas Aquinas, In librum Boethii De trinitate expositio: H. LENTZ (TTrN), W.-U. KLÜNKER (introd.), Stuttgart 1988. * R. E. BRENNAN (Tr), St. Louis, London 1946. * A Byzantine translation of Boethius' De hypotheticis syllogismis: D. Z. NIKITAS, Göttingen 1982. * Radulphus Brito, Commentary on Boethius' De differentiis topicis and the Sophism Omnis homo est omnis homo: N. J. GREEN-PEDERSEN, J. PINBORG (T, index), CIMA 1978, no. 26. * The Commentaries on Boethius by Gilbert of Poitiers: N. M. HÄRING, Toronto 1966. * The Commentaries on Boethius by Thierry of Chartres and his School: N. M. HÄRING, Toronto 1971. * Anonymous Latin Commentary to Boethius and French Introd.: S. DURZSA, Budapest 1978. * Notker der Deutsche, Boethius' Bearbeitung der Categoriae des Aristoteles: J. C. KING, Tübingen 1972. ** Concordance: L. COOPER, A Concordance of Boethius. The Five Theological Tractates and the Consolation of Philosophy, Cambridge, Mass. 1928. * M. BERNHARD, Wortkonkordanz zu Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius, De institutione musica, München 1979. * J. HAMESSE, Auctoritates Aristotelis, Senecae, Boethii, Platonis, Apuleii et quorundam aliorum. I: Concordance, II: Index verborum. Listes de fréquences. Tables d'identification, Louvain 1972; 1974. ** Bibl.: Altaner 483–486. * V. CELLUPRICA, Il capitolo 9 del De interpretatione di Aristotele: Rassegna di studi 1930–1973, Milano 1977. * H. CHADWICK, Boethius. The Consolations of Music, Logic, Theology, and Philosophy, Oxford 1981, 261–284. * R. DEL RE, Boezio e il De consolatione philosophiae, Cultura e Scuola (Roma) 1967, no. 24, 34–40 (reviews 50 years of scholarship). * L. OBERTELLO 1974 (with bibl. up to 1970). * Bibl. in L. BIELER's edition of cons., Turnhout 2nd ed. 1984, pp. xviii–xxxvii.

- J. L. ACKRILL, Aristotle's Categories and De interpretatione, Oxford 1963.
- * L. ADAMO, Boezio e Mario Vittorino traduttori e interpreti dell'Isagoge di Porfirio, RSF 22, 1967, 141-164. * L. ALFONSI, Problemi filosofici della Consolatio Boeziana, RFN 35, 1943, 323-328. * L. ALFONSI, Romanità e barbarie nell'Apologia di Boezio, StudRom 1, 1953, 605-616. * L. ALFONSI, Boezio nella tradizione culturale della letteratura latina, Orpheus 2, 1955, 10-16. * L. ALFONSI, Virgilio in Boezio, Sileno 5-6, 1979-1980, 357-371. * M. ASZTALOS, Boethius as a Transmitter of Greek Logic to the Latin West. The Categories, HSPH 95, 1993, 367-407. * M. BALTES, Gott, Welt, Mensch in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius. Die Consolatio Philosophiae als ein Dokument platonischer und neuplatonischer Philosophie, V Chr 34, 1980, 313-340. * R. BEINHAEUER, Untersuchungen zu philosophisch-theologischen Termini in De trinitate des Boethius, Wien 1990. * R. BONNAUD, L'éducation scientifique de Boèce, Speculum 4, 1929, 198-206. * R. BRAGARD, L'harmonie des sphères selon Boèce, Speculum 4, 1929, 206-213. * H. J. BROSCHE, Der Seinsbegriff bei Boethius, Innsbruck 1931. * R. CARTON, Le christianisme et l'augustinisme de Boèce, RPhil n.s. 30, 1, 1930, 573-659. * H. CHADWICK, Boethius. The Consolations of Music, Logic, Theology, and Philosophy, Oxford 1981. * Courcelle, Lettres 257-312. * P. COURCELLE, La Consolation de Philosophie dans la tradition littéraire. Antécédents et postérité de Boèce, Paris 1967. * I. CRAEMER-RUEGENBERG, Die Substanzmetaphysik des Boethius in den opuscula sacra, diss. Köln 1969. * A. CROCCO, Introduzione a Boezio, Napoli 2nd ed. 1975. * R. CROUSE, Semina rationum. St. Augustine and Boethius, Dionysius 4, 1980, 75-85. * T. F. CURLEY III., How to Read the Consolation of Philosophy, Interpretation 14, 1986, 211-263. * T. F. CURLEY, The Consolation of Philosophy as a Work of Literature, AJPh 108, 1987, 343-367. * C. J. DE VOGEL, The Problem of Philosophy and Christian Faith in Boethius' Consolatio, in: Romanitas et Christianitas. FS J. H. WASZINK, Amsterdam 1973, 357-370. * K. DIENELT, Sprachliche Untersuchungen zu Boethius' Consolatio philosophiae, Glotta 29, 1942, 98-128; ibid. 129-138; 31, 1951, 28-69. * K. DÜRR, The Propositional Logic of Boethius, Amsterdam 1951. * A. ENGELBRECHT, Die Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius; Beobachtungen über den Stil des Autors und die Überlieferung seines Werkes, SWAW 144, 1902, 3rd section, 1-60. * N. FOSCA, Le basi della sillogistica ipotetica boeziana, Pescara 1981. * J. C. FRANKS, The Ancient Concept of casus and its Early Medieval Interpretations, Vivarium 22, 1984, 1-34. * M. FUHRMANN, J. GRUBER, eds., Boethius, Darmstadt 1984. * F. GASTALDELLI, Boezio, Roma 1974. * E. GEGENSCHATZ, Zufall, Freiheit und Notwendigkeit. Ein philosophiegeschichtlicher Exkurs im Kommentar des Boethius zur Aristotelischen Schrift De interpretatione, in: P. NEUKAM, ed., Erbe, das nicht veraltet, München 1979, 5-61. * M. GIBSON, ed., Boethius. His Life, Thought, and Influence, Oxford 1981. * R. GLEI, Dichtung und Philosophie in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, WJA n.s. 11, 1985, 225-238. * A. GRILLMEIER, Vorbereitung des Mittelalters. Eine Studie über das Verhältnis von Chalkedonismus und Neu-Chalkedonismus in der lateinischen Theologie von Boethius bis zu Gregor dem Großen, in: A. GRILLMEIER, H. BACHT, eds., Das Konzil von Chalkedon, vol. 2, Würzburg 1953, 791–839. * J. GRUBER, Die Erscheinung der Philosophie in der Consolatio des Boethius, RhM n.s. 112, 1969, 166–186. * A. GUZZO, L'Isagoge di Porfirio e i commenti di Boezio, Torino 1934. * P. HADOT, La distinction de l'être et de l'étant dans le De Hebdomadibus de Boèce, in: P. WILPERT, ed., Miscellanea Mediaevalia, vol. 2, Berlin 1963, 147–153. * P. HADOT, Forma essendi: interprétation philologique et interprétation philosophique d'une formule de Boèce, LEC 38, 1970, 143–156. * P. HUBER, Die Vereinbarkeit von göttlicher Vorsehung und menschlicher Freiheit in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, diss. Zürich 1976. * A. KAPPELMACHER, Der schriftstellerische Plan des Boethius, WS 46, 1927–1928, 215–225. * F. KLINGNER, De Boethii Consolatione Philosophiae, Berlin 1921, repr. 1960. * S. LERER, Boethius and Dialogue. Literary Method in The Consolation of Philosophy, Princeton 1985. * P. B. LUETTRINGHAUS, Gott, Freiheit und Notwendigkeit in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, in: A. ZIMMERMANN, ed., Studien zur mittelalterlichen Geistesgeschichte und ihren Quellen 15, Berlin 1982, 53–101. * M. LUTZ-BACHMANN, Natur und Person in den Opuscula sacra des A. M. S. Boethius, Th&Ph 58, 1983, 48–70. * M. LUTZ-BACHMANN, Das Verhältnis von Philosophie und Theologie in den Opuscula Sacra des A. M. S. Boethius. Eine Studie zur Entwicklung der nach-chalcedonischen Theologie, diss. Münster 1984. * J. MAGEE, Boethius on Signification and Mind, Leiden 1990. * B. MAIOLI, Teoria dell'essere e dell'esistente e classificazione delle scienze in M. S. Boezio, Roma 1978. * M. MASI, ed., Boethius and the Liberal Arts. A Collection of Essays, Bern 1981. * G. MATHON, La tradition de la Consolation de Boèce, REAug 14, 1968, 133–138. * G. MAURACH, Boethiusinterpretationen, A&A 14, 1968, 126–141; repr. in: G. MAURACH, ed., Römische Philosophie, Darmstadt 1976, 385–410. * P. MERLAN, Ammonius Hermiae, Zacharias scholasticus, and Boethius, GRBS 9, 1968, 193–203. * F. DI MIERI, Il De institutione arithmetica di Severino Boezio, Sapienza 37, 1984, 179–202. * G. A. MÜLLER, Die Trostschrift des Boethius. Beitrag zu einer literarhistorischen Quellenuntersuchung, diss. Gießen 1912. * C. MUELLER-GOLDINGEN, Die Stellung der Dichtung in Boethius' Consolatio Philosophiae, RhM 132, 1989, 369–395. * L. OBERTELLO, Boezio, le scienze del quadrivio e la cultura medioevale, AALig 289, 1971, 152–170. * L. OBERTELLO, Severino Boezio, 2 vols., Genova 1974 (part 2 with bibl. up to 1970). * L. OBERTELLO, ed., Atti del Congresso internazionale di Studi Boeziani (Pavia 1980), Roma 1981: contributions (among others) by A. TRAPE (Boethius als Theologe), C. MORTON (Boethius in Pavia), E. DEMOUGEOT (La carrière politique de Boèce), L. M. DE RIJK (Boethius' Seinsmetaphysik), L. OBERTELLO (his world view), U. PIZZANI (Quadrivium), C. J. DE VOGEL (Amor quo caelum regitur). * G. J.

- O'DALY, The Poetry of Boethius, London 1991. * H. R. PATCH, The Tradition of Boethius. A Study of his Importance in Medieval Culture, New York 1935. * H. R. PATCH, Fate in Boethius and the Neoplatonists, Speculum 4, 1929, 62-72. * G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, Zu Boethius, De Interpr. ed. sec. I p. 4. 4 sqq. Meiser nebst Beobachtungen zur Geschichte der Dialektik bei den Römern, WS 66, 1953, 131-154. * A. N. PRIOR, The Logic of Negative Terms in Boethius, Franciscan Studies 13, 1953, 1-6. * E. K. RAND, Boethius, the First of the Scholastics, in: Founders of the Middle Ages, Cambridge, Mass. 1928, repr. 1957, 135-180. * E. K. RAND, La Rome de Boëce et de Dante, RCC 37, 1, 1936, 450-463. * E. RAPISARDA, La crisi spirituale di Boezio, Firenze 1947, Catania 2nd ed. 1953. * K. REICHENBERGER, Untersuchungen zur literarischen Stellung der Consolatio Philosophiae, diss. Bonn 1953, Köln 1954. * E. REISS, Boethius, Boston, Mass. 1982. * G. RIGHI, A. M. S. Boezio, De syllogismo categorico. Studio sul I libro, Milano 1984. * E. SCARRY, The Well-Rounded Sphere: The Metaphysical Structure of the Consolation of Philosophy, in: C. D. ECKHARDT, ed., Essays in the Numerical Criticism of Medieval Literature, Lewisburg 1980, 91-140. * H. SCHEIBLE, Die Gedichte in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, Heidelberg 1972. * G. SCHENK, H. U. WÖHLER, Boethius. Gedanken zu Werk und Wirkungsgeschichte, Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie 28, 1980, 1324-1337. * W. SCHMID, Philosophisches und Medizinisches in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, in: FS B. SNELL, Munich 1956, 113-144; repr. in: G. MAURACH, ed., Römische Philosophie, Darmstadt 1976, 341-384. * W. SCHMID, Boethius and the Claims of Philosophy, StudPatr 2, 1957, 368-375. * V. SCHMIDT-KOHL, Die neuplatonische Seelenlehre in der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, Meisenheim 1965. * G. SCHRIMPF, Die Axiomenschrift des Boethius (De hebdomadibus) als philosophisches Lehrbuch des Mittelalters, Leiden 1966. * V. SCHURR, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius, Paderborn 1935. * F. SCIUTO, Il dualismo della Consolatio di Boezio, Acta Philologica 3, 1964, 361-371. * J. SHIEL, Boethius the Hellenist, HT 14, 1964, 478-486. * E. T. SILK, Boethius' Consolatio Philosophiae as a Sequel to Augustine's Dialogues and Soliloquia, HThR 32, 1939, 19-39. * J. SULOWSKI, The Sources of Boethius' De consolatione philosophiae, Sophia 29, 1961, 67-94. * H. TRÄNKLE, Ist die Philosophiae Consolatio des Boethius zum vorhergesehenen Abschluß gelangt?, V Chr 31, 1977, 148-156. * S. L. VARVIS, The Consolation of Boethius, diss. Claremont, CA. 1986, cf. DA 47, 1986, 628 A. * S. F. WILTSHIRE, Boethius and the Summum Bonum, CJ 67, 1971-1972, 216-220. * C. WOLF, Untersuchungen zum Krankheitsbild in dem ersten Buch der Consolatio Philosophiae des Boethius, RCCM 6, 1964, 213-223.

SIXTH CHAPTER
THE TRANSMISSION OF ROMAN LITERATURE

THE TRANSMISSION OF ROMAN LITERATURE

‘Tradition has the distinctive characteristic that it not only propagates sentiments and opinions, but also sets the tone: Ptolemy, Boethius, Augustine.’

Goethe<sup>1</sup>

Transmission and influence can hardly be separated from each other, especially when transmission depends upon the copying of texts by hand. One only goes to the trouble of transcribing a manuscript if there is a compelling motive to do so. To investigate these motives, however, already takes us into the history of the influence of classical texts.

Ancient books were not the same as ours today. Their different nature affects ancient literature and its transmission. A ‘book’ (liber) originally was a papyrus roll; the word volumen is derived from volvare (‘to roll’). The papyrus strips were inscribed from left to right in columns (paginae). While the new column was revealed with the right hand, the left hand rolled up the part which had already been read. The author and title of the work were often given at the end of the text. From the outside one could recognize the work by the titulus, a protruding piece of parchment which was glued onto the roll. The rolled form undoubtedly made consulting a book difficult, a fact which explains certain peculiarities of ancient literature: the imprecision of citations, the very summary and often incomplete listing of sources, the lack of footnotes. It is therefore clear that the ancients usually cited passages from memory. Moreover, it seems to have been impossible to take notes, since one would need both hands to hold the papyrus roll. This was not a serious obstacle, however, since one had the text read aloud by another person most of the time anyway. The difficulty of reading ancient manuscripts, too, has been exaggerated. In contrast to the statements made by scholars, which cast the later scriptura continua back into the early and classical periods, we find that the (typically Roman) division of words by dots or spaces is almost standard in Latin inscriptions and literary texts. Some texts even show careful rhetorical punctuation (at breathing-places in speech), which shapes the text much more agreeably than our so-called 'logical' punctuation marks. Another aid to reading is the division of texts into paragraphs, which is widespread and early.<sup>1</sup> The decrease in word-division after the 2nd century A.D. may be connected with the increase of Greek influence at that time.

---

<sup>1</sup> Paralipomena zur Farbenlehre, W.A. II 5, 2nd ed., 251.

In addition to the roll, around the 1st century A.D. a cheaper, more enduring and manageable form of the book came onto the scene, one which now made it easier to consult. This was the codex, the predecessors of which were small bound wax tablets. Codices resemble our books, but were made mostly of parchment, since papyrus was difficult to fold. The word 'parchment' comes from Pergamon, whose ruler Eumenes II (ruled 197–159 B.C.) remembered the old writing material and refined it in response to an Egyptian papyrus-embargo (cf. Plin. nat. 13. 70). In the 4th century the codex gained acceptance, and in particular met the needs of the law and the Church.<sup>2</sup>

Since silent reading was an exception in antiquity, texts must be interpreted as an acoustic process. The reader faced the text not only as an observer, but also as a listener: he was led by the ear into a process of communication and was influenced immediately. The book thus had another function than it has today: it was not identical with the text, but only a prop for its realisation in performance. We should not overlook the fact that we act quite similarly with music today: only the initiated few will read the score silently to themselves, and even they will not consider this a satisfactory substitute for a performance.

When we consider the dissemination of books, we must try to free ourselves of modern associations. A text could be reproduced in many copies by dictating it to a group of slaves. So we might almost call Cicero's friend Atticus, who ran an office doing just that, a publisher. Although the readership of these publications was larger than the circle of intimate friends—to whom an author often read his work aloud before publication—it is still narrowly defined compared with our notions of public. This fundamental difference between ancient and modern times does not alter the fact that Horace, Ovid, and Martial attest to a professional book trade which extended as far as the provinces.

---

<sup>1</sup> Rud. Wolfg. MÜLLER, Rhetorische und syntaktische Interpunktion. Untersuchungen zur Pausenbezeichnung im antiken Latein, diss. Tübingen 1964, esp. 35, note 3.

<sup>2</sup> Aug. conf. 6. 3.

Books which one did not possess oneself had to be sought in the private libraries of friends. After the victory of Paullus at Pydna (168 B.C.), the royal library of Perseus arrived in Rome. Lucullus, Cicero, Varro, and Atticus all owned large collections of books. The first public library in Rome was run by Asinius Pollio in the Atrium Libertatis (founded in 39 B.C.); on the Palatine, Augustus founded a double library containing Greek and Latin texts. Significant libraries were built in Rome under Trajan and in Athens under Hadrian. In the time of Constantine there were 28 in the capital alone,<sup>1</sup> but Gaul, too, had considerable book holdings. It seems even that works of remote and early Latin Authors survived longer in the provinces because of the backwardness of their schools.

The manuscript form of the tradition put texts to a difficult test—not so much because of the danger of mutilation—as because the acceptance or non-acceptance of a work actually was tantamount to its survival or extinction. One only copies what one considers important, or at least useful. Without doubt many significant and valuable works fell victim to this ruthless self-cleansing process of the tradition, and the literary historian does well to keep in mind how much has been lost, and how this might affect his judgment, which is based solely on what has been preserved.

Tradition is a living process. Can we approach the ancient texts directly, without studying the process of their transmission? If we ignore this question we cannot even be certain of the wording, nor is there any better way to get at the meaning. Carl Lachmann had taught us to trace the dependence of manuscripts all the way back to their archetype; later, Wilamowitz insisted that only a true textual history can lead us to make a decision about the text. Ultimately ancient literature can only be understood and appreciated if we take into consideration the process of transmission and, as far as possible, the reasons for the acceptance or rejection of a given text (i.e. the history of its influence).

---

<sup>1</sup> The decline sets in during the 4th century: Amm. 14. 6. 18 bibliothecis sepulcrorum ritu in perpetuum clausis. Christians rely on private libraries (Tertullian, Jerome, Augustine), school libraries (Alexandria, Caesarea, Jerusalem, Nisibis), episcopal libraries (for example the one in Rome, fostered by Agapetus and Cassiodorus), and especially monastery libraries (these could come from private libraries, as in the case of Jerome): S. GREBE, Die Bibliothek Agapets im Vergleich mit ausgewählten Bibliotheken der Zeit der alten Kirche und des Frühmittelalters, in: Bibliothek und Wissenschaft 25, 1991, 15–60.

Of course this can only be a distant goal, and unattainable in most cases. In this book we must be satisfied with mere hints for individual authors. It is true that on the whole the requirements of formal education and stylistic training played a (not always beneficial) role in the selection of ancient texts; but for many readers a genuine interest in the content is what counted.

For the transmission of ancient literature there are several crucial periods. We mention first those times which were critical: the survival of certain works was particularly endangered during the transfer of Roman literature from papyrus rolls to parchment codices, a process finished by about the 4th century A.D. Authors who were not considered for transcription are henceforth cut from the transmission.

A second danger period is the so-called 'Dark Ages', between the decline of the western Roman Empire and the rule of Charlemagne. Books which had not found a place behind monastery walls or in episcopal libraries at that point are lost forever.<sup>1</sup> In the Middle Ages the distribution of books to a large number of small libraries diminished the danger of total annihilation of ancient literature.<sup>2</sup>

Apart from the critical periods we should also reckon with losses conditioned by politics, religion and ideology. Authors politically out of favor like the poet Cornelius Gallus or the historian Cremutius Cordus are lost to us. Jovian, the Christian successor of the last pagan emperor, Julian the Apostate, burnt a library founded by Julian in Antioch. The anti-Christian True Speech of Celsus must be reconstructed from church rejoinders. In general the Church at that time was more tolerant of pagan authors than of heterodox Christians, whose works are known to us mostly from the writings of their opponents. The collection of heretical books, which a patriarch of Constantinople started at the end of the 8th century A.D., is the exception which proves the rule. If writers like Tertullian and Origen have come down to us, although their orthodoxy was anything but assured, this is because their overwhelming intellectual significance made them indispensable.

---

<sup>1</sup> The acceptance of texts into monastery libraries did not, however, guarantee their preservation; in fact, in order to save the expensive parchment, many pagan manuscripts were erased and a Christian text was written over the new surface. Only in the late Middle Ages do we find palimpsests, where, in its turn, a pagan text has replaced a Christian one.

<sup>2</sup> In Antiquity we know of the burning of the Alexandrian library under Caesar; some scholars, however, think that the disaster was relatively small (perhaps to spare Caesar's memory); in 475, the library at Constantinople burned down, which a hundred years earlier had been abundantly furnished with new Latin and Greek manuscripts by the Emperor Valens.

We turn now to positive factors which have contributed to the transmission of texts. In the first place we should mention the activities of scholars and philologists. The plays of Plautus have been transmitted to us owing to the fact that they had been the subject of philological research and interest in the Republic (an interest which unfortunately did not include early Latin prose, which is lost). Those plays which have survived are the ones which scholars then considered genuine. We are very much in the debt of scholars for difficult authors like Horace and Persius, and are able to read the full text of Cicero's Scipio's Dream thanks only to the commentator Macrobius.

We can compare, too, the somewhat different case of long citations from authors which we owe to zealous readers, without whose efforts we would otherwise be left with short fragments. Thus, for example, we know Ennius mostly from Cicero, who was especially fond of this poet, and many other early Latin authors from Aulus Gellius, a knowledgeable friend of old texts.

Of fundamental importance is the editorship of senatorial families in late antiquity, especially the Symmachi and Nicomachi, still partly recognizable by subscriptions, which later were copied together with the texts. Our manuscripts from the Middle Ages rest in good part on the pains of these late Roman senators.

The next important step is the establishment of scriptoria in monasteries, which Cassiodorus first introduced in Vivarium, though without lasting success. The Rule of St. Benedict did not expressly prescribe copying, but reading, which of course presupposed the activity of writing, even without the explicit recommendation of Pope Gregory the Great (581).

A decisive impulse for the preservation of ancient literature comes from an administrative measure: for the running of his empire, Charlemagne needed educated priests and administrators. Hence he established schools and writing-rooms (scriptoria) in all the abbeys and episcopal cities. In this he was able to rely on monasteries founded mostly by the Irish and Anglo-Saxons. He selected his advisor Alcuin from York, then the intellectual center of Northern Europe. Through the production of new manuscripts, the treasures of Charlemagne's royal library were distributed in numbers unheard-of to French, German, and Swiss monasteries and cathedrals. With this the most important prerequisite for the continued existence of classical literature was achieved.

In order to understand the facts of transmission, it is also worthwhile to reconstruct the criteria by which the readers of various periods were guided. The standard changed of course according to the class of society which was interested in Roman literature: after the senators of late antiquity come monks and bishops, later secular priests in the episcopal centers, and finally jurists and politicians, the wealthy aristocrats of flourishing cities. In the Renaissance, Roman literature returned to a milieu comparable to its origins. The ways of reception varied according to the development sketched above: the specific interest of the 12th century in natural science inaugurated a gradual secularization, which finds its characteristic expression in the favorite authors of the 12th and 13th centuries: in Ovid they looked for sensuality, in Seneca, for soothing of the conscience.

Admittedly, current fashion and the so-called 'spirit of the age' do not explain everything. The history of transmission itself shows us clearly enough the possibilities of personal initiative, whether on a large scale (as with Charlemagne and Alcuin) or on a small scale. In fact much would have been lost, were it not for certain individuals who again and again passionately defended specific authors and texts, and either produced a copy of the single extant codex which forms the source of our entire tradition; or took the trouble to produce as good a text as possible (or as complete as possible), in which they united what were formerly split branches of the tradition. Some monks of the Middle Ages were already earning the kind of credit which Petrarch, for example, gained for a text of Livy or Cicero. It is amazing how the names of individual scholars turn up repeatedly as those responsible for ensuring the transmission of an endangered or rare author. From the Carolingian period we have the names of Dungal, the Irish scholar, who read our oldest text of Lucretius (the so-called Oblongus Voss. Lat. F. 30); Lupus of Ferrières (d. after 862) with his unusual knowledge of Cicero; Heiric of Auxerre (d. around 876), who (among other achievements) in the 9th century annotated Pomponius Mela; Rather of Verona (d. 974), who knew Plautus and Catullus. In the 12th century William of Malmesbury (d. 1143) was familiar with Plautus, Petronius and the Apocolocyntosis and cited from both parts of Seneca's collection of letters (elsewhere handed down separately). John of Salisbury (d. 1180) read everything by Petronius which is available to us. Richard of Fournival (later chancellor of Amiens) even mentioned Tibullus and Propertius in his Biblionomia, which described an actual library like a garden (about 1250). The pre-Humanists in Padua, whose leader was the judge Lovato Lovati (d. 1309), anticipated supposed discoveries of the Humanists: they read Propertius (before Petrarch), all of Tibullus (before Salutati), Lucretius and Valerius Flaccus (before Poggio), Catullus (50 years before his 'discovery' in Verona) and even Ovid's Ibis. Petrarch (d. 1374) played an important role in the transmission of Livy, Mela, Propertius and Cicero's letters. Boccaccio (d. 1375) read Martial, Ausonius, Ovid's Ibis, the Appendix Vergiliana, and with his own hand wrote our oldest manuscript of the Priapea (Laur. 33. 31). From Monte Cassino he knew Tacitus' Annals and Histories, Apuleius' Golden Ass and Varro's De lingua Latina. Poggio Bracciolini (d. 1459) discovered numerous other treasures in monastery libraries, especially during the Council of Constance.

The transmission of some authors who are very important for us today hang literally by a thread: we would probably have known nothing of Catullus were it not for the interest of a bishop of Verona for the native poet during the Middle Ages; Lucretius and several works of Tacitus were hardly known in the Middle Ages; and the age of courtly love perhaps only became so exclusively an aetas Ovidiana because the other Roman love poets (Catullus, Tibullus and Propertius) were as good as forgotten<sup>1</sup> (in the early Middle Ages even the works of Ovid had been a rarity).

How problematic the demarcation is between deliberate transmission and accidental survival is shown by the following extreme examples. The first half of the fifth decade of Livy is preserved in a late Roman manuscript, which was wakened from its almost thousand-year sleep only in the 16th century in the Lorsch Monastery. There is but a small step to Mai's discovery of the palimpsest of the De re publica at the beginning of the 19th century

Our shaky belief in the higher wisdom of transmission is shaken even more if we examine those authors who have produced a large transmission. In addition to great names like Virgil and Terence, this category also includes handbooks and encyclopedias, which today no longer mean very much to us. Cicero's masterpiece the De oratore and Quintilian's Institutio in many cases come off worse than the school volume De inventione. Augustine's enthusiasm had not helped Cicero's Hortensius to survive, but the survival of a Martianus Capella was never in danger.

<sup>447</sup> Compare also the history of the transmission of Pomponius Mela.

Given this situation, we cannot hope to possess a truly representative choice of Roman literature. What has been preserved is representative mostly of the interest of schools, scholars, and society in late antiquity; and this choice was of course further affected by the particular needs of readers in the Middle Ages. The breadth of transmission is a mirror of the reception of authors at various times; but the fact that a number of the very best authors have come down to us through only one or very few manuscripts shows that the preservation efforts of individual scholars, at times swimming against the current of their day, can also safeguard the life and endurance of a work. Determinants in the history of transmission sometimes occur in the mind of a single reader.

E. AUERBACH, Literatursprache und Publikum in der lateinischen Spätantike und im Mittelalter, Bern 1958. * B. BISCHOFF, Manuscripts and Libraries in the Age of Charlemagne, transl. by M. M. GORMAN, Cambridge 1994. * H. BLANCK, Das Buch in der Antike, München 1992. * K. BÜCHNER, Überlieferungsgeschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Altertums, in: H. HUNGER (and others), Die Textüberlieferung der antiken Literatur und der Bibel, München 1975, 309–422 (reprint of: Geschichte der Textüberlieferung der antiken und mittelalterlichen Literatur, vol. 1, Zürich 1961). * J. DELZ, Wo wurde die lateinische Literatur ins Mittelalter hinüber gerettet?, in: H. L. C. TRISTRAM, ed., Medialität und mittelalterliche insulare Literatur, Tübingen 1992, 41–56 (bibl.). * A. DEROLEZ, Codicologie des manuscrits en écriture humanistique sur parchemin, 2 vols., Turnhout 1984. * FUHRMANN, LG. * P. GANZ, ed., The Role of the Book in Medieval Culture. Proceedings of the Oxford International Symposium 1982, 2 vols., Turnhout 1986. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Le public et la vie littéraire à Rome, Paris 1937. * E. J. KENNEY, The Classical Text. Aspects of Editing in the Age of the Printed Book, Berkeley 1974. * E. J. KENNEY, Books and Readers in the Roman World, in: CHLL 1982, 3–32. * F. G. KENYON, Books and Readers in Ancient Greece and Rome, Oxford 2nd ed. 1951. * LEO, LG. * F. LEO, s. also WILAMOWITZ. * Le livre au Moyen Âge, ed. by: Institut de recherche et d'histoire des textes (sous la direction de J. GLENISSON), Paris 1988. * K. LÖFFLER, P. RUF, Allgemeine Handschriftenkunde, in: Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1952, vol. 1, 1, 106–162. * MANITIUS, LG. * NORDEN, LG. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa. * PASQUALI, Storia. * K. PREISENDANZ, Papyruskunde, in: Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1952, vol. 1, 1, 163–248. * L. D. REYNOLDS, Texts and Transmission. A Survey of the Latin Classics, Oxford 1983. * L. D. REYNOLDS and N. G. WILSON, Scribes and Scholars. A Guide to the Transmission of Greek and Latin Literature, Oxford 1968, 2nd ed. 1974, 3rd ed. 1991. * C. H. ROBERTS and T. C. SKEAT, The Birth of the Codex, Oxford 1983. * SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG. * W. SCHUBART, Das Buch bei den Griechen und Römern, Berlin 1907, repr. Heidelberg 1962. * C. WENDEL, Kleine Schriften zum antiken Buch- und Bibliothekswesen, ed. by W. Krieg, Köln 1974. * H. WIDMANN, Herstellung und Vertrieb des Buches in der griechisch-römischen Welt, Archiv für Geschichte des Buchwesens 1967, no. 55, 35–81. * U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, K. KRUMBACHER, J. WACKERNAGEL, F. LEO, E. NORDEN, F. SKUTSCH, Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache (= Kulturgeschichte der Antike 1, 8), Berlin and Leipzig (1905) 3rd ed. 1912 (corr. and augmented).

PERIODICALS AND STANDARD WORKS

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

The following list contains abbreviations used in the present work for periodicals and general works. The abbreviations for Latin authors and works are those of the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae.

Titles mentioned only once in the footnotes do not appear in the book lists to the relevant author. Titles quoted in the footnotes with the initial(s) of the author's first name(s), surname, and the year of publication refer to the specialized bibliography to the given chapter.

Standard works quoted without the initial(s) of the author's first name(s) are quoted in full in the following list (to give an example, F. LEO 1912 refers to the specialized bibliography to the chapter in question, whereas LEO, LG is explained in the present list of abbreviations).

For editions, the following abbreviations are used: T (text), Tr (translation), N (notes), C (commentary).

Capital letters following quotations from ancient authors indicate the editor, e.g.: Ennius ann. 237 V. (= VAHLEN), trag. 217 J. (= JOCELYN).

AAAd: Antichità altoadriatiche. Udine.

AAASzeged: Acta antiqua et archaeologica. Szeged.

AAEC: Annuario dell'Accademia etrusca di Cortona. Cortona.

AAG: Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen., phil.-hist. Klasse. Göttingen.

AAHG: Anzeiger für die Altertumswissenschaft, herausgegeben von der Österreichischen Humanistischen Gesellschaft. Innsbruck.

AALig: Atti dell'Accademia Ligure di Scienze e Lettere. Genova.

AAntHung: Acta Antiqua Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae. Budapest. (cf. ActAnt).

AAPat: Atti e Memorie dell'Accademia Patavina di Scienze, Lettere ed Arti, Classe di Scienze morali, Lettere ed Arti. Padova.

AAPel: Atti della Accademia Peloritana dei Pericolanti, Classe di Lettere, Filosofia e Belle Arti. Messina.

AAT: Atti della Accademia delle Scienze di Torino, Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filologiche. Torino.

AATC: Atti e Memorie dell'Accademia Toscana La Colombaria. Firenze.

AAWM: Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Mainz, Geistes- und sozialwissenschaftliche Klasse. Wiesbaden.

AAWW: Anzeiger der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, phil.-hist. Klasse. Wien.

AB: Analecta Bollandiana. Bruxelles.

ABAW: Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, phil.-hist. Klasse. München.

- ABG: Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte. Bausteine zu einem historischen Wörterbuch der Philosophie. Bonn.
- AC: L'Antiquité Classique. Louvain.
- ACD: Acta classica Universitatis Scientiarum Debreceniensis. Debrecen.
- AClass: Acta classica. Proceedings of the Classical Association of South Africa. Cape Town.
- Acme: Acme. Annali della Facoltà di Filosofia e Lettere dell'Università statale di Milano. Milano.
- ActAnt: cf. AAntHung.
- ADAW: Abhandlungen der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Klasse für Sprachen, Literatur & Kunst. Berlin.
- add.: with addenda.
- A&A: Antike und Abendland. Beiträge zum Verständnis der Griechen und Römer und ihres Nachlebens. Berlin.
- A&R: Atene e Roma. Rassegna trimestrale dell'Assoc. Italiana di Cultura classica. Firenze.
- Aevum: Aevum. Rassegna di Scienze storiche, linguistiche e filologiche. Milano.
- AFLA: Annales de la Faculté des Lettres et Sciences humaines d'Aix, Sér. class. Gap.
- AFLB: Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia di Bari. Bari.
- AFLC: Annali della Facoltà di Lettere, Filosofia e Magistero della Università di Cagliari. Cagliari.
- AFLM: Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia, Università di Macerata. Roma.
- AFLPer: Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia, Università di Perugia. Perugia.
- AFLN: Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia dell'Università di Napoli. Napoli.
- AFLT: Annali della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia. Trieste.
- AFMC: Annali della Facoltà di Magistero dell'Università di Cagliari. Cagliari.
- AG: Archivio giuridico. Modena.
- AGM: Sudhoffs Archiv für Geschichte der Medizin und Naturwissenschaften. Wiesbaden.
- AGPh: Archiv für Geschichte der Philosophie. Berlin.
- AGWG: Abhandlungen der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen. Berlin.
- AHAW: Abhandlungen der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften, phil.-hist. Klasse. Heidelberg.
- AHMA: Archives d'Histoire doctrinale et littéraire du Moyen Age. Paris.
- AHR: American Historical Review. Washington.
- AIS: Annali dell'Istituto italiano per gli Studi storici. Napoli.
- AION: Aión. Annali del Seminario di studi sul mondo classico dell'Istituto universitario orientale di Napoli, Sezione linguistica. Pisa.
- AIPH: Annuaire de l'Institut de Philologie et d'Histoire Orientales de l'Université Libre de Bruxelles. Bruxelles.
- AIV: Atti dell'Istituto Veneto di Scienze, Lettere ed Arti, Classe di Scienze morali e Lettere. Venezia.
- AJAH: American Journal of Ancient History. Cambridge, Mass.
- AJPh: American Journal of Philology. Baltimore.
- AK: Antike Kunst. Herausgegeben von der Vereinigung der Freunde antiker Kunst in Basel. Olten.
- AKG: Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. Köln.
- Akroterion: Akroterion. Quarterly for the Classics in South Africa. University of Stellenbosch.
- al., et al.: and in further instances.
- AL: Anthologia Latina, ed. A. RIESE, vol. 1, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1894, vol. 2, 1st ed. 1870; ed. D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, vol. 1, 1, Stuttgart 1982.

- VON ALBRECHT, LG: M. VON ALBRECHT, Augusteische Zeit, Stuttgart 1987 (= M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, vol. 3); cf. also GÄRTNER, KISSEL, LEEMAN, PETERSMANN.
- VON ALBRECHT, Poesie: M. VON ALBRECHT, Römische Poesie. Texte und Interpretationen, Heidelberg 1977; Tübingen 2nd ed. 1995.
- VON ALBRECHT, Prose: M. VON ALBRECHT, Masters of Roman Prose. Interpretative Studies. Translated by N. ADKIN, Leeds 1989.
- VON ALBRECHT, Rom: M. VON ALBRECHT, Rom: Spiegel Europas. Texte und Themen, Heidelberg 1988.
- ALFÖLDY, Sozialgeschichte: G. ALFÖLDY, Römische Sozialgeschichte, Wiesbaden 3rd ed. 1984.
- ALGP: Annali del Licco G. Garibaldi di Palermo. Palermo.
- ALL(G): Archiv für lateinische Lexikographie und Grammatik. Leipzig.
- ALMA: Archivum Latinitatis Medii Aevi (Bulletin Du Cange). Leiden.
- ALMARV: Annales Latini Montium Arvernorum. Clermont.
- ALTANER: B. ALTANER, A. STUIBER, Patrologie. Leben, Schriften und Lehre der Kirchenväter, Freiburg, Basel 8th ed. 1978.
- Altertum: Das Altertum, herausgegeben vom Zentralinstitut für Alte Geschichte und Archäologie der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften der DDR. Berlin.
- ALTHEIM: F. Altheim, Geschichte der lateinischen Sprache, von den Anfängen bis zum Beginn der Literatur, Frankfurt 1951.
- Anazetesis: Anazetesis. Quaderni di ricerca. Pistoia.
- AncSoc: Ancient Society. Louvain.
- ANDRÉ, Lexique: J. ANDRÉ, Lexique des termes de botanique en latin, Paris 1956.
- ANDRÉ, Otium: J.-M. ANDRÉ, L'otium dans la vie morale et intellectuelle romaine des origines à l'époque augustéenne, Paris 1966.
- ANDRÉ, Plantes: J. ANDRÉ, Les noms de plantes dans la Rome antique, Paris 1985.
- Année Épigraphique: L'Année Épigraphique. Revue des publications épigraphiques relatives à l'antiquité romaine. Paris.
- Anregung: Anregung. Zeitschrift für Gymnasialpädagogik. München.
- ANRW: Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt. Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung. Berlin.
- AntAfr.: Antiquités africaines. Paris.
- Antichthon: Antichthon. Journal of the Australian Society for Classical Studies. Sydney.
- Antike: Die Antike. Zeitschrift für Kunst und Kultur der Altertumswissenschaft. Berlin.
- Antike und Christentum. Kultur- und religionsgeschichtliche Studien. Münster, Westf.
- AP: Anthologia Palatina, ed. H. Beckby (ITrN), 4 vols., München 2nd ed. 1965–1967.
- Arcadia: Arcadia. Zeitschrift für vergleichende Literaturwissenschaft. Berlin.
- Archiv für Geschichte des Buchwesens (publ. as an appendix to: Börsenblatt für den deutschen Buchhandel). Frankfurt.
- Archiv für Musikwissenschaft. Wiesbaden.
- ArchPhilos: Archives de Philosophie. Recherches et documentation. Paris.
- Arctos: Arctos. Acta philologica Fennica. Helsinki.
- Arethusa: Arethusa. A Journal of the Wellsprings of Western Man. Buffalo, State University of New York.
- ARID: Analecta Romana Instituti Danici. Odense Univ.
- Arion: Arion. A Quarterly Journal of Classical Culture. Boston University.
- ARW: Archiv für Religionswissenschaft. Berlin and Leipzig.
- ASI: Archivio Storico Italiano. Firenze.
- ASNPN: Annali della Scuola Normale Superiore di Pisa, Cl. di Lettere e Filosofia. Pisa.

- AT: Antiquum testamentum (Old Testament).
- Athenaeum: Athenaeum. Studi periodici di Letteratura e Storia dell'Antichità. Pavia. Atti e memorie della Accademia Petrarca di Lettere, Arti e Scienze. Arezzo.
- AU: Der altsprachliche Unterricht. Arbeitshefte zu seiner wissenschaftlichen Begründung und praktischen Gestalt. Stuttgart.
- AUB: Annales Universitatis Budapestensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae, Sectio classica. Budapest.
- AUERBACH, MIMESIS: E. AUERBACH, Mimesis. Dargestellte Wirklichkeit in der abendländischen Literatur, Bern 7th ed. 1982.
- Aufidus: Aufidus. Rivista di scienza e didattica della cultura classica. Foggia.
- augm.: augmented.
- AugMag: Augustinus Magister. Congrès international augustinien, Paris (1954). Communications (Actes), 3 vols., Paris sine anno.
- AugStud: Augustinian Studies. Villanova.
- Augustiniana: Tijdschrift voor de Studie van S. Augustinus en de Augustijnerorde. Héverlé-Louvain.
- Augustinianum: Augustinianum. Roma.
- Augustinus: Augustinus. Revista publicada por los Padres agustinos recoletos. Madrid.
- AULLA (AUMLA): Journal of the Australasian Universities Language and Literature Association. Christchurch, New Zealand.
- AUS: 1. Annales Universitatis Saraviensis (Phil.-Lettres). Saarbrücken. 2. Annuaire de l'Université de Sofia, Faculté des Lettres. Sofia.
- BAB: Bulletin de la Classe des Lettres de l'Académie Royale de Belgique. Bruxelles.
- BAEHRENS: Ae. BAEHRENS, ed., Poetae Latini Minores, 6 vols., Lipsiae 1879-1886.
- BAGB: Bulletin de l'Association G. Budé. Paris.
- BAL: Bulletin des antiquités luxembourgeoises. Luxembourg.
- BARDENHEWER, LG: O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 vols. (vols. 1 and 2: 2nd ed.), Freiburg 1913-1932.
- BARDON, Litt. lat. inc.: H. BARDON, La littérature latine inconnue, 2 vols., Paris 1952 and 1956.
- BCH: Bulletin de Correspondance Hellénique. Paris.
- BCO: Bibliotheca Classica Orientalis. Dokumentation der alttumswissenschaftlichen Literatur der Sowjetunion und der Volksdemokratien. Berlin.
- BEHRENS, Einteilung: I. BEHRENS, Die Lehre von der Einteilung der Dichtkunst. Studien zur Geschichte der poetischen Gattungen, diss. Bonn 1939, Halle 1940.
- Belfagor: Belfagor. Rassegna di varia umanità. Firenze.
- BERSCHIN, Biographie: W. BERSCHIN, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter. I: Von der Passio Perpetuae zu den Dialogi Gregors des Großen, Stuttgart 1986.
- BERSCHIN, Medioevo: W. BERSCHIN, Medioevo greco-latino da Gerolamo a Niccolò Cusano, Napoli 1989 (augmented; the German original had been published at Bern in 1980).
- B&O: Bibbia e Oriente. Rivista trimestrale per la conoscenza della Bibbia. Bornato in Franciacorte (Brescia).
- BIANCHI BANDINELLI, KUNST: R. BIANCHI BANDINELLI, Die römische Kunst. Von den Anfängen bis zum Ende der Antike, München 3rd ed. 1975.
- bibl.: bibliography.
- Bibl. di mat.: Biblioteca di materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici. Pisa.
- BibH&R: Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance. Genève.
- Biblica: Biblica. Commentarii editi cura Pontificii Institutii Bibliici. Roma.
- Bibliographia patristica. Internationale patristische Bibliographie. Berlin.
- Bibliothek. Forschung und Praxis. München.

- BICKEL, LG: E. BICKEL, Lehrbuch der Geschichte der römischen Literatur, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1961.
- BICS: Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies of the University of London. London.
- BIDR: Bullettino dell'Istituto di Diritto romano. Milano.
- BIEH: Boletin del Inst. de Estudios helénicos. Barcelona.
- BIELER, LG: L. BIELER, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, 2 vols. in 1 vol., Berlin 4th ed. 1980.
- BIGNONE, LG: E. BIGNONE, Storia della letteratura latina, 3 vols., Firenze 1945–1950 (vol. 1: 2nd ed. 1946).
- BINDER, Saeculum Augustum: G. BINDER, ed., Saeculum Augustum, 3 vols., Darmstadt vol. 1: 1987; vol. 2: 1988; vol. 3: 1991.
- BJ: Bonner Jahrbücher des Rheinischen Landesmuseums in Bonn und des Vereins von Altertumsfreunden im Rheinlande. Kevelaer.
- BKV: Bibliothek der Kirchenväter. München.
- BO: Bibliotheca Orientalis. Leiden.
- BOLGAR: R. R. BOLGAR, The Classical Heritage and its Beneficiaries, Cambridge 1954.
- BollClass: Bollettino dei classici. Roma, Accademia dei Lincei.
- BONNER, Declamation: S. F. BONNER, Roman Declamation in the Late Republic and Early Empire, Berkeley 1949, repr. 1969.
- K. BORINSKI, Die Antike in Poetik und Kunsttheorie vom Ausgang des klassischen Altertums bis auf Goethe und W. von Humboldt, 2 vols., Leipzig 1914–1924, repr. 1965.
- BQR: Bodleian Quarterly Record. Oxford.
- BREMER, Iurisprud. antehadr.: F. P. BREMER, Iurisprudentiae antehadrianae quae supersunt, 2 sections in 3 vols., Lipsiae 1896–1901.
- BROUGHTON, Magistrates: T. R. S. BROUGHTON, The Magistrates of the Roman Republic, 2 vols., New York 1951; 1952; suppl. 1960.
- BRUNHÖLZL, LG: F. BRUNHÖLZL, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, vol. 1: Von Cassiodor bis zum Ausklang der karolingischen Erneuerung, München 1975.
- BRUNS, Fontes: C. G. BRUNS, T. MOMMSEN, O. GRADENWITZ, eds., Fontes iuris Romani antiqui, Tubingae, 1 and 2, 7th ed. 1909; Additamentum 1 and 2: 1912.
- BSG: Berichte über die Verhandlungen der Königlich Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig, phil.-hist. Klasse. Leipzig.
- BSTEC: Bulletin de la Société toulousaine d'Études classiques. Toulouse.
- BStudLat: Bollettino di Studi latini. Periodico quadrimestrale d'informazione bibliografica. Napoli.
- BÜCHNER: cf. FPL.
- BÜCHNER, LG: K. BÜCHNER, Römische Literaturgeschichte. Ihre Grundzüge in interpretierender Darstellung, Stuttgart 5th ed. 1980.
- BUCK: A. BUCK, Die Rezeption der Antike in den romanischen Literaturen der Renaissance, Berlin 1976.
- Bursian: s. JAW.
- ByzF: Byzantinische Forschungen. Internationale Zeitschrift für Byzantinistik. Amsterdam.
- BZG: Baseler Zeitschrift für Geschichte und Altertumskunde. Basel.
- C (in editions): commentary.
- Caesarodunum: Caesarodunum. Tours.
- CAF: T. KOCK, ed., Comicorum Atticorum fragmenta, vols. 1–3, Lipsiae 1880–1888.

- CAIRNS, Generic Composition: F. CAIRNS, Generic Composition in Greek and Roman Poetry, Edinburgh 1972.
- G. CALBOLI, Nota: G. CALBOLI, Nota di aggiornamento a E. NORDEN, La prosa d'arte antica, in: NORDEN, Kunstprosa, Roma 1986, 971–1185.
- CASSIRER: E. CASSIRER, Philosophie der symbolischen Formen, 3 vols., Berlin 1923–1929; Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1953–1954, repr. 1987–1990.
- CB: The Classical Bulletin. Saint Louis.
- CC (and CCL): Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina, Turnholti.
- CCC: Civiltà classica e cristiana. Genova.
- CE: Carmina Latina epigraphica, ed. F. BÜCHELER, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1895–1897, repr. 1972.
- CEA: Cahiers des Études anciennes. Montréal.
- CÈBE, caricature: J.-P. CÈBE, La caricature et la parodie dans le monde romain antique des origines à Juvénal, Paris 1966.
- C&M: Classica et Mediaevalia. Revue danoise d'Histoire et de Philologie, publ. par la Soc. danoise pour les Études anciennes et médiévales. København.
- C&S: Cultura e Scuola. Roma.
- CF: Classical Folia. Studies in the Christian perpetuation of the Classics. New York.
- CFC: Cuadernos de Filología clásica. Madrid.
- CGF: G. KAIBEL, ed., Comicorum Graecorum fragmenta 1, 1, Berolini 1899 (also containing classical texts concerning the theory of comedy: Tractatus Coislinianus, Diomedes, Evanthius, Donatus).
- Chiron: Mitteilungen der Kommission für Alte Geschichte und Epigraphik des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts. München.
- CHLL: The Cambridge History of Classical Literature, 2. Latin Literature, ed. by E. J. KENNEY and W. V. CLAUSEN, Cambridge 1982.
- CHM: Cahiers d'Histoire mondiale. Neuchâtel.
- Ciceroniana: Ciceroniana. Rivista di Studi Ciceroniani. Roma.
- CICHORIUS, Studien: C. CICHORIUS, Römische Studien. Historisches, Epigraphisches, Literaturgeschichtliches aus vier Jahrhunderten, Leipzig 1922, repr. 1961.
- CIL: Corpus inscriptionum Latinarum. Berolini.
- CIMA: Cahiers de l'Institut du moyen âge grec et latin. Copenhagen.
- CISA: Contributi dell'Istituto di Storia antica dell'Università del Sacro Cuore. Milano.
- CJ: The Classical Journal. Athens, University of Georgia.
- ClAnt: Classical Antiquity. Berkeley.
- CLARKE, Rhetoric: M. L. CLARKE, Rhetoric at Rome. A Historical Survey, London 1953.
- CLS: Comparative Literature Studies. Urbana, Illinois.
- CM: Clio Medica. Acta Acad. internat. historiae medicinae. Amsterdam.
- CML: Classical and Modern Literature. Terre Haute, Indiana.
cod.: Codex.
- CodMan: Codices Manuscripti. Zeitschrift für Handschriftenkunde. Wien.
- CONTE, LG: G. CONTE, Latin Literature. A History, Baltimore 1994.
- Contemporanea: Contemporanea. Supplement to: Mostre e Musei. Torino. corr.: with corrections.
- cos.: Consul.
- COURCELLE, Histoire: P. COURCELLE, Histoire littéraire des grandes invasions germaniques, Paris (1948) 3rd ed. 1964.
- COURCELLE, Lettres: P. COURCELLE, Les lettres grecques en Occident. De Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris 2nd ed. 1948.
- COURTNEY: E. COURTNEY, The Fragmentary Latin Poets, Oxford 1993.
- CPh: Classical Philology. Chicago.

- CQ: Classical Quarterly. Oxford.
 CR: Classical Review. Oxford.
 CRAI: Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. Paris.
 CRDAC: Atti del Centro ricerche e documentazione sull'antichità classica. Milano.
 CRF: Scaenicae Romanorum poesis fragmenta, II. Comitorum Romanorum praeter Plautum et Terentium Fragmenta, ed. O. RIBBECK, Leipzig 2nd ed. 1873; repr. 1962; Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1898.
 Critica: La critica. Rivista di Lettere, Storia e Filosofia. Bari.
 CSCA: California Studies in Classical Antiquity. Berkeley.
 CSEL: Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, Wien.
 CURTIUS, Europäische Lit.: E. R. CURTIUS, Europäische Literatur und lateinisches Mittelalter, Bern 1948, 9th ed. 1978.
 CV: Commentationes Vindobonenses. Wien.
 CW: Classical World (formerly: Classical Weekly). Pittsburgh, Pa.
 DA: Dissertation Abstracts. Internat. Abstracts of Dissertations Available in Microfilm or as Xerographic Reproductions. Ann Arbor, Mich.
 DAW Berlin: Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften, Sektion Altertumswissenschaften. Berlin.
 DEKKERS: E. DEKKERS, Ae. GAAR, Clavis Patrum Latinorum, Steenbrugis 3rd ed. 1995.
 DESSAU: cf. ILS.
 DEVOTO, Storia: G. DEVOTO, Storia della lingua di Roma, Bologna 1940, repr. 1991.
 DHA: Dialogues d'histoire ancienne. Paris.
 Didactica classica Gandensia. Gent.
 DIHLE, Entstehung: A. DIHLE, Die Entstehung der historischen Biographie, SHAW 1986, 3.
 DIHLE, LG: A. DIHLE, Die griechische und lateinische Literatur der Kaiserzeit. Von Augustus bis Justinian, München 1989.
 Dioniso: Dioniso. Rivista trimestrale di studi sul teatro antico. Siracusa.
 diss.: dissertation.
 DLZ: Deutsche Literaturzeitung für Kritik der internat. Wissenschaft. Berlin.
 DRAHEIM: J. DRAHEIM, Vertonungen antiker Texte vom Barock bis zur Gegenwart. Mit einer Bibliographie der Vertonungen (1700–1978), Amsterdam 1981.
 DUFF, LG 1: J. W. DUFF, Literary History of Rome from the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age, London 1909, 3rd ed. 1960.
 DUFF, LG 2: J. W. DUFF, Literary History of Rome in the Silver Age, London 1927, 2nd ed. 1960 (ed. by A. M. DUFF).
 DUMÉZIL, Idées: G. DUMÉZIL, Idées romaines, Paris 1969.
 DUMÉZIL, Mythe: G. DUMÉZIL, Mythe et épique, 3 vols., Paris 2nd ed. 1968–1973.
 DUMÉZIL, Rel.: G. DUMÉZIL, La religion romaine archaïque, Paris 1966.
 Durius: Durius. Boletín castellano de Estudios clásicos. Valladolid.
 DVjs: Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte. Stuttgart.
 ECKSTEIN, Unterr.: F. A. ECKSTEIN, Lateinischer und griechischer Unterricht, Leipzig 1887.
 EClás: Estudios clásicos. Madrid.
 ed.: edidit (edited by; editor).
 eds: editors.
 Eikasmos: Eikasmos. Quaderni Bolognesi di Filologia Classica. Bologna.
 Eirene: Eirene. Studia Graeca et Latina. Praha.
 EISENHUT: W. EISENHUT, Einführung in die antike Rhetorik und ihre Geschichte, Darmstadt 1974.

- EL: Études de Lettres: Bulletin de la Faculté des Lettres de l'Université de Lausanne et de la Société des Études des Lettres. Lausanne.
- Elenchos: Elenchos. Rivista di studi sul pensiero antico. Napoli.
- EMC: Échos du Monde classique. Classical News and Views. Ottawa.
- Emerita: Emerita. Revista de Lingüística y Filología clásica. Madrid.
- Entretiens: Entretiens sur l'antiquité classique. Fondation Hardt, Vandœuvres-Genève.
- Eos: Eos. Commentarii Societatis Philologiae Polonorum. Wrocław.
- EPhK: Egyetemes philologiai közlöny. Budapest.
- Eranos: Eranos. Acta Philologica Suecana. Uppsala.
- Euphorion: Euphorion. Heidelberg.
- Euphrosyne: Euphrosyne. Revista de Filologia clásica. Lisboa. fasc.: fascicle.
- Faventia: Faventia. Publicació del Departament de Filologia classica de la Univ. autònoma de Barcelona.
- FCG: Fragmenta comicorum Graecorum, collegit A. Meineke, 5 vols., Berolini 1839–1857.
- F&F: Forschungen und Fortschritte. Berlin.
- FGrHist: F. JACOBY, Die Fragmente der griechischen Historiker, 3 sections in 15 vols., Berlin 1926—Leiden 1958.
- Filosofia: Filosofia. Rivista trimestrale. Torino.
- FLACH, Einführung: D. FLACH, Einführung in die römische Geschichtsschreibung. Darmstadt 1985.
- FPL: Fragmenta poetarum Latinorum epicorum et lyricorum, ed. W. MOREL, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1927, repr. 1963; rev. K. BÜCHNER, Lipsiae 1982; replaced by J. BLÄNSDORF, Stuttgart 1995, and by COURTNEY, quoted above.
- frag(g)*: fragment(s).
- FRIEDLÄNDER, Sittengeschichte: L. FRIEDLÄNDER, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms in der Zeit von August bis zum Ausgang der Antonine (1861–1871), 4 vols., ed. by G. WISSOWA, Leipzig 10th ed. 1921–1923, repr. 1979.
- FS: Festschrift.
- FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch: M. FUHRMANN, Das systematische Lehrbuch. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wissenschaften in der Antike, Göttingen 1960.
- FUHRMANN, LG: M. FUHRMANN, ed., Römische Literatur, Frankfurt 1974 (= Neues Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft, vol. 3).
- FUHRMANN, Rhetorik: M. FUHRMANN, Die antike Rhetorik, Zürich 1984.
- GÄRTNER, LG: H. A. GÄRTNER, Kaiserzeit II. Von Tertullian bis Boethius, Stuttgart 1988 (= M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, vol. 5).
- GB: Grazer Beiträge. Zeitschrift für die klassische Altertumswissenschaft. Graz.
- Genre: Genre. A Quarterly Devoted to Generic Criticism. Chicago.
- Germanic Review: Germanic Review. New York.
- G&R: Greece and Rome. Oxford.
- GFF: Giornale filologico ferrarese. Ferrara.
- GGA: Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen. Göttingen.
- GIF: Giornale Italiano di Filologia. Rivista trimestrale di Cultura. Roma.
- GL: Grammatici Latini, recensuit H. KEIL, 7 vols. and 1 suppl., Lipsiae 1857–1880.
- GLO: Graecolatina et Orientalia. Bratislava.
- Glotta: Glotta. Zeitschrift für griechische und lateinische Sprache. Göttingen.
- Gnomon: Gnomon. Kritische Zeitschrift für die gesamte klassische Altertumswissenschaft. München.
- Goethe: Goethe. Viermonatsschrift der Goethe-Gesellschaft. Weimar.

- Graeco-Latina Pragensia: Graeco-Latina Pragensia. Acta Universitatis Carolinae Philologica. Praha.
- GRBS: Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies. Durham, N.C.
- GRF: Grammaticae Romanae fragmenta, vol. 1, ed. H. (= G.) FUNAIOLI, Lipsiae 1907 (Pre-Varronian, Varronian, and Augustan epochs); continued by: A. MAZZARINO, Grammaticae Romanae fragmenta aetatis Caesarum, Augustae Taurinorum 1955.
- GRIFFIN, Life: J. GRIFFIN, Latin Poets and Roman Life, London 1985.
- GRIMAL, Siècle: P. GRIMAL, Le siècle des Scipions. Rome et l'hellénisme au temps des guerres puniques, Paris 1953.
- GRMS: Germanisch-romanische Monatsschrift, Heidelberg.
- GROETHUYSEN, Philosophische Anthropologie: B. GROETHUYSEN, Philosophische Anthropologie, in: Handbuch der Philosophie, München sine anno (1931): basic for Latin philosophy.
- GRUMACH: E. GRUMACH, Goethe und die Antike. Eine Sammlung, 2 vols., Berlin 1949.
- Grundriß: Grundriß der Literaturgeschichten nach Gattungen, Darmstadt, e.g.: J. ADAMIETZ, ed., Die römische Satire 1986. E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos 1979. E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, 1978. G. A. SEECK, ed., Das griechische Drama 1979.
- GUILLEMIN, public: A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Le public et la vie littéraire à Rome, Paris 1937.
- Gymnasium: Gymnasium. Zeitschrift für Kultur der Antike und humanistische Bildung. Heidelberg.
- Habis: Habis. Arqueologia. Filología clásica. Sevilla.
- HAFFTER, Dichtersprache: H. HAFFTER, Untersuchungen zur altlateinischen Dichtersprache, Berlin 1934.
- HANDIUS: F. HANDIUS, Tursellinus, seu de particulis Latinis commentarii, 4 vols., Lipsiae 1829–1845, repr. 1969.
- HARNACK, LG: A. HARNACK, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, 3 vols., Leipzig 1893–1904.
- HAW: Handbuch der (klassischen) Altertumswissenschaft, founded by I. VON MÜLLER, augmented by W. OTTO, continued by H. BENGTON, München 1897 ff.
- Hdb.: Handbuch, handbook.
- HEINZE, V.e.T.: R. HEINZE, Virgils epische Technik, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1914; s. now: R. HEINZE, Virgil's Epic Technique. Translated by H. and D. HARVEY, and F. ROBERTSON, with a Preface by A. WLOSOK, London 1993.
- Helikon: Helikon. Rivista di tradizione e cultura classica. Roma.
- Hellenica: Ἑλληνικά. φιλολ., ἱστορ. καὶ λαογρ. Περιοδικὸν τῆς ἐταιρείας Μακεδονικῶν Σπουδῶν. Thessaloniki.
- Helmantica: Helmantica. Revista de Filología clásica y hebrea. Salamanca.
- Hermathena: Hermathena. A Series of Papers by Members of Trinity College. Dublin.
- Hermeneus: Hermeneus. Tijdschrift voor de antieke Cultuur. Culemborg.
- Hermes: Hermes. Zeitschrift für klassische Philologie. Wiesbaden.
- H&R: Humanisme et Renaissance. Paris.
- HIGHET, Class. Trad.: G. HIGHET, The Classical Tradition. Greek and Roman Influences on Western Literature, Oxford 1949, repr. 8th ed. 1978.
- HIRZEL, Dialog: R. HIRZEL, Der Dialog. Ein literarhistorischer Versuch, 2 vols., Leipzig 1895.
- Historia: Historia. Revue d'histoire ancienne, Wiesbaden.
- HJ: Historisches Jahrbuch. München.

- HLL: R. HERZOG, P. L. SCHMIDT, eds., Handbuch der lateinischen Literatur der Antike, hitherto only vol. 5: R. HERZOG, ed., Restauration und Erneuerung. Die lateinische Literatur von 284 bis 374 n. Chr., München 1989.
- HÖLSCHER, Bildsprache: T. HÖLSCHER, Römische Bildsprache als semantisches System, AHAW 1987, 2.
- Homonoia: Homonoia. Yearbook of the chair of Greek philology of the Univ. Budapest.
- HRR: H. PETER, ed., Historicorum Romanorum reliquiae, vol. 1, Leipzig 2nd ed. 1914, vol. 2, 1st ed. 1906, repr. with bibl. by J. KROYMANN, Stuttgart 1967.
- HS: History of Sciences. Chalfont St. Giles.
- HSPH: Harvard Studies in Classical Philology, Cambridge, Mass.
- HT: History Today. London.
- HThR: Harvard Theological Review. Cambridge, Mass.
- Humanistische Bildung. Vorträge und Beiträge. Stuttgart.
- Humanitas: Humanitas. Revista do Inst. de Estudos clássicos. Coimbra.
- HumLov: Humanistica Lovaniensia. Leuven.
- HUSCHKE, cf. SECKEL-KÜBLER.
- HUTCHINSON: G. O. HUTCHINSON, Latin Literature from Seneca to Juvenal. A Critical Study, Oxford 1993.
- Hyperboreus: Hyperboreus. Studia Classica. Petropoli and München.
- HZ: Historische Zeitschrift. München.
- IA: Iranica antiqua. Leiden.
- ibid.: ibidem (in the same work).
- ICS: Illinois Classical Studies. Urbana, Illinois.
- ICUR: Inscriptiones Christianae urbis Romae septimo saeculo antiquiores, post I. B. DE ROSSI edidit A. SILVAGNI, 9 vols., Romae 1922–1985.
- id.: idem (the same author).
- IF: Indogermanische Forschungen. Berlin.
- IJM: International Journal of Musicology. Frankfurt.
- IL: L'Information littéraire. Paris.
- ILS: Inscriptiones Latinae selectae, vols. 1–3, ed. H. DESSAU, Berolini 1892–1916, repr. 1962.
- IMU: Italia Medioevale e Umanistica. Padova.
- Ind.: Index.
- Index: Index. Quaderni camerti di studi romanistici. International Survey of Roman Law. Napoli.
- Ind. lect.: Index lectionum.
- INGARDEN, Kunstwerk: R. INGARDEN, Das literarische Kunstwerk, Tübingen 4th ed. 1972.
- Innsbrucker Beiträge zur Kulturwissenschaft. Innsbruck.
- International Journal of American Linguistics*. Baltimore.
- introd.: introduction.
- InvLuc: Invigilata Lucernis. Rivista dell'Istituto di Latino, Università di Bari.
- Iura: Iura. Rivista internazionale di Diritto romano ed antico. Napoli.
- JACOBY, cf. FG<sup>r</sup>Hist.
- JAKOBSON, Language: R. JAKOBSON, Language in Literature, ed. by K. POMORSKA, S. RUDY, Cambridge 1987.
- JANSON: T. JANSON, Latin Prose Prefaces, Stockholm 1964.
- JAUSS, Erfahrung: H. R. JAUSS, Ästhetische Erfahrung und literarische Hermeneutik. 1.: Versuche im Feld der ästhetischen Erfahrung, München 1977.
- JAUSS, Künste: H. R. JAUSS, ed., Die nicht mehr Schönen Künste. Grenzphänomene des Ästhetischen, München 1968.

- JAW (= Bursian): Jahresbericht über die Fortschritte der Altertumswissenschaft. Leipzig.
- JbAC: Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum. Münster.
- JCS: Journal of Classical Studies. The Journal of the Classical Society of Japan. Kyôto.
- JDAI: Jahrbuch des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts. Berlin.
- JENKYNs: R. JENKYNs, Three Classical Poets. Sappho, Catullus, and Juvenal, London 1982.
- JHAW: Jahrbuch der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften. Heidelberg.
- JHI: Journal of the History of Ideas. Ephrata, Pennsylvania, & Philadelphia.
- JHPh: Journal of the History of Philosophy. Berkeley.
- JIES: Journal of Indo-European Studies. Hattiesburg, Miss.
- JJP: The Journal of Juristic Papyrology. Warsaw, Soc. of Sciences & Letters.
- JKPh: Jahrbücher für Klassische Philologie. Leipzig.
- JÖRS-KUNKEL-WENGER, Römisches Recht: P. JÖRS, W. KUNKEL, L. WENGER, Römisches Recht. 4th edition, completely revised by H. HONSELL, Th. MAYER-MALY, W. SELB, Berlin 1987.
- JRGZ: Jahrbuch des römisch-germanischen Zentralmuseums. Mainz.
- JRH: Journal of Religious History. Sydney.
- JRS: Journal of Roman Studies. London.
- JS: Journal des Savants. Paris.
- JThS: Journal of Theological Studies. Oxford.
- JUD: Jahrbuch der Univ. Düsseldorf.
- Jura: s. Iura.
- JWI: Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institute. London.
- KÄHLER, Rom: H. KÄHLER, Rom und seine Welt, 2 vols., München 1958; 1960.
- KÄHLER, Tempel: H. KÄHLER, Der römische Tempel, Berlin 1970.
- KAPPELMACHER-SCHUSTER, LG: A. KAPPELMACHER, M. SCHUSTER, Die Literatur der Römer bis zur Karolingerzeit, Potsdam 1934.
- KASCHNITZ VON WEINBERG, Kunst: G. KASCHNITZ VON WEINBERG, Römische Kunst, 4 vols., Hamburg 1961–1963.
- KASER, Privatrecht: M. KASER, Das römische Privatrecht, 1, München 2nd ed. 1971; 2, München 1959.
- KASER, Rechtsgeschichte: M. KASER, Römische Rechtsgeschichte, Göttingen 1967.
- KASER, Studienbuch: M. KASER, Römisches Privatrecht (Studienbuch), München 16th ed. 1992.
- KAYSER, Kunstwerk: W. KAYSER, Das sprachliche Kunstwerk. Eine Einführung in die Literaturwissenschaft, Bern 1948, 19th ed. 1983.
- KENNEDY, Rhetoric: G. KENNEDY, The Art of Rhetoric in the Roman World, Princeton 1972.
- KENNEY, CLAUSEN: s. CHLL.
- KISSEL, LG: W. KISSEL, Kaiserzeit I. Von Seneca maior bis Apuleius, Stuttgart 1985 (= M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, vol. 4).
- KLINGNER, Geisteswelt: F. KLINGNER, Römische Geisteswelt. Essays zur lateinischen Literatur, München 5th ed. 1965, repr. Stuttgart 1979 with an epilogue by K. BÜCHNER.
- KLINGNER, Studien: F. KLINGNER, Studien zur griechischen und römischen Literatur, Zürich 1964.
- Klio: Klio. Beiträge zur Alten Geschichte. Berlin.
- KIP: Der Kleine Pauly, ed. by K. ZIEGLER, W. SONTHEIMER, 5 vols., München 1964–1975.
- KlWöHell: Kleines Wörterbuch des Hellenismus, ed. by Hatto H. SCHMITT and E. VOGT, Wiesbaden 1988.

- KNOCHE, Erlebnis: U. KNOCHE, Erlebnis und dichterischer Ausdruck in der lateinischen Poesie, Gymnasium 65, 1958, 146–165; repr. in: Kleine Schriften 146–165.
- KNOCHE, Kleine Schriften: U. KNOCHE, Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften, ed. by W.-W. EHLERS, Meisenheim 1986.
- KNOCHE, Ruhmesgedanke: U. KNOCHE, Der römische Ruhmesgedanke, Philologus 89, 1934, 102–124.
- KRISTELLER, Catalogus Translationum: P. KRISTELLER, F. E. CRANZ, eds., Catalogus Translationum et Commentariorum: Mediaeval and Renaissance Latin Translations and Commentaries. Annotated Lists and Guides, 6 vols., Washington 1960–1986.
- KROLL, Studien: W. KROLL, Studien zum Verständnis der römischen Literatur, Stuttgart 1924, repr. 1964.
- KRÜGER, Quellen: P. KRÜGER, Geschichte der Quellen und Litteratur des römischen Rechts, München 2nd ed. 1912.
- KRÜGER-MOMMSEN-STUEDEMUND: P. KRÜGER, T. MOMMSEN, W. STUEDEMUND, Collectio librorum iuris anteiustiniani, 3 vols., Berolini 1878–1890; vol. 1 4th ed. 1899.
- KÜHNERT, Bildung und Redekunst: F. KÜHNERT, Bildung und Redekunst in der Antike, Kleine Schriften, ed. by V. RIEDEL, Jena 1994.
- KultdGgw: U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, K. KRUMBACHER, J. WACKERNAGEL, Berlin 3rd ed. 1912 (= Die Kultur der Gegenwart 1, 8).
- Labeo: Labeo. Rassegna di Diritto romano. Napoli.
- LABRIOLLE, LG: P. DE LABRIOLLE, Histoire de la littérature latine chrétienne, Paris 3rd ed. 1947 (rev. G. BARDY).
- Lampadion: Lampadion (continued in the form of reports in Lampas).
- Lampas: Lampas. Tijdschrift voor Nederlandse classici. Muiderberg.
- Latinitas: Latinitas. Commentarii linguae Latinae excolendae, Città del Vaticano.
- Latomus: Latomus. Revue d'études latines. Bruxelles.
- LATTE, Religionsgeschichte: K. LATTE, Römische Religionsgeschichte, München 1960.
- LAUSBERG, Hdb.: H. LAUSBERG, Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik, 2 vols., München 1960, Stuttgart 3rd ed. 1990 (with an introduction by A. ARENS).
- LAW: Lexikon der Alten Welt, ed. by C. ANDRESEN, H. ERBSE, O. GIGON, K. SCHEFOLD, K. F. STROHEKER, E. ZINN, Zürich 1965.
- LCM: Liverpool Classical Monthly. Liverpool (later: Leeds).
- W. D. LEBEK, Neue Texte im Bereich der lateinischen Literatur, in: Klassische Antike und Gegenwart = Dialog Schule: Wissenschaft. Klassische Sprachen und Literaturen, ed. by P. NEUKAM, vol. 19, München 1985, 50–67.
- LEC: Les Études Classiques. Namur.
- LEEMAN, Form: A. D. LEEMAN, Form und Sinn. Studien zur römischen Literatur, Frankfurt 1985.
- LEEMAN, Gloria: A. D. LEEMAN, Gloria, diss. Leiden 1949.
- LEEMAN, LG: A. D. LEEMAN, Republikanische Zeit II (Prosa), Stuttgart 1984 (= M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, vol. 2).
- LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio: A. D. LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio. The Stylistic Theories and Practice of the Roman Orators, Historians, and Philosophers, 2 vols., Amsterdam 1963.
- LENEL, Palingenesia: O. LENEL, Palingenesia iuris civilis. Iuris consultorum reliquiae . . ., 2 vols., Lipsiae 1889, repr. with suppl. by E. STIERL, 2 vols., Graz 1960.
- LEO, Biogr.: F. LEO, Die griechisch-römische Biographie nach ihrer literarischen Form, Leipzig 1901, repr. 1965.
- LEO, LG: F. LEO, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, 1: Die archaische Literatur, Berlin 1913.
- LEO, Plaut. Forsch.: F. LEO, Plautinische Forschungen, Berlin 1895.
- LEO: s. also KultdGgw.

- LESKY, LG: A. LESKY, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur, Bern 3rd ed. 1971.
L&G: Latina et Graeca. Zagreb.
- Lettere italiane: Lettere italiane. Rivista trimestrale. Firenze.
- Lexis: Lexis. Studien zur Sprachphilosophie, Sprachgeschichte und Begriffsforschung. Lahr i.B.
- LF: Listy Filologické. Praha.
- LG: Literary History.
- LIEBERG, Poeta creator: G. LIEBERG, Poeta creator. Studien zu einer Figur der antiken Dichtung, Amsterdam 1982.
- LIEBERG, Schöpfungstum: G. LIEBERG, Zu Idee und Figur des dichterischen Schöpfungstums, Bochum 1985.
- LIEBS, Recht: D. LIEBS, Römisches Recht. Ein Studienbuch, Göttingen 1975, 4th ed. 1993 (rev.).
- Lingua: Lingua. Revue internat. de linguistique générale. Amsterdam.
- Lit.wiss. Jb. der Görres-Gesellschaft: Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft. Berlin.
- LMA: Lexikon des Mittelalters (300–1500 n. Chr.), ed. by W. ABEL, R. H. BAUTIER, A. D'AGOSTINO (and others), München from 1977 onward.
- LÖFSTEDT, Late Latin: E. LÖFSTEDT, Late Latin, Oslo 1959.
- LÖFSTEDT, Syntactica: E. LÖFSTEDT, Syntactica, vol. 1, Lund 2nd ed. 1942; vol. 2, 1933.
- LThK: Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. by J. HÖFER, K. RAHNER, 14 vols., Freiburg 2nd ed. 1986.
- Lustrum: Lustrum. Internationale Forschungsberichte aus dem Bereich des klassischen Altertums. Göttingen.
- Maia: Maia. Rivista di letterature classiche. Bologna.
- MAL: Memorie della Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filologiche dell'Accad. dei Lincei. Roma.
- MANITIUS, LG: M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 vols., München 1911–1931.
- MARROU, Education: H.-J. MARROU, Histoire de l'éducation dans l'Antiquité, 2 vols., Paris 6th ed. 1964, repr. 1981.
- MAT: Memorie (Atti) dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Torino. II. Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filologiche. Torino.
- MAWA: Mededelingen der Akademie van Wetenschappen te Amsterdam. Amsterdam.
- MB: Musée Belge. Revue de philologie classique. Liège.
- MC: Il Mondo Classico. Torino.
- MCR: Museum criticum. Quaderni dell'Istituto di Filologia classica dell'Università di Bologna. Bologna.
- MCSN: Materiali e contributi per la storia della narrativa greco-latina. Perugia.
- MD: Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici. Pisa.
- MDAI(R): Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Institutes (Römische Abteilung). Mainz.
- Meander: Meander. Revue de civilisation du monde antique. Warszawa.
- MEFR(A): Mélanges d'Archéologie et d'Histoire de l'École Française de Rome. Paris.
- MGH: Monumenta Germaniae Historica. Hannover from 1826 onward.
- MGH, AA: Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Auctores antiquissimi, Berlin 1877–1919.
- MGM: Militärgeschichtliche Mitteilungen. Freiburg i.B.
- MH: Museum Helveticum. Revue suisse pour l'Étude de l'Antiquité classique. Bâle.
- Minerva: Minerva. Budapest.
- Miscellanea Berolinensia ad incrementum scientiarum ex scriptis Societati Regiae Scientiarum exhibitis edita. Berolini.

- MISCH, Autobiographie: G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie, vol. 1, Frankfurt 3rd ed. 1949–1950.
- Mitteilungen für Lehrer der Alten Sprachen. Stuttgart.
- MLatJb: Mittellateinisches Jahrbuch. Berlin.
- MLR: The Modern Language Review. London.
- Mnemosyne: Mnemosyne. Bibliotheca Classica Batava. Leiden.
- Modern Language Notes. Baltimore.
- MOMMSEN, Gesammelte Schriften: T. MOMMSEN, Gesammelte Schriften, 8 vols., Berlin 1905–1913.
- MOMMSEN, RG: T. MOMMSEN, Römische Geschichte, vols. 1–3, Berlin 6th ed. 1874–1875; vol. 5, 1885; numerous reprints.
- MOMMSEN, Staatsrecht: T. MOMMSEN, Römisches Staatsrecht, 3 vols., Leipzig 1887–1888, repr. 1971.
- MOMMSEN, Strafrecht: T. MOMMSEN, Römisches Strafrecht, Leipzig 1899, repr. 1955.
- Morel: s. FPL.
- MPhL: Museum Philologum Londiniense. Amsterdam.
- MRS: Mediaeval and Renaissance Studies. London.
- MS: Mediaeval Studies. Toronto.
- MSLC: Miscellanea di Studi di letteratura cristiana antica. Catania.
- MusAfr: Museum Africum. West African Journal of Classics and Related Studies. Univ. of Ibadan, Nigeria.
- N (in editions): notes.
- NAFM: Nuovi annali della facoltà di magistero dell'Università di Messina. Roma.
- NAWG: Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, phil.-hist. Klasse. Göttingen.
- NEUBECKER, Musik: A. J. NEUBECKER, Altgriechische Musik. Eine Einführung, Darmstadt 1977.
- Neue Wege zur Antike: Neue Wege zur Antike. Leipzig.
- NGG: Nachrichten von der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen, phil.-hist. Klasse. Göttingen.
- NISBET, Papers: R. G. M. NISBET, Collected Papers on Latin Literature, Oxford 1995.
- NJA: Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum. Leipzig.
- NJAB: Neue Jahrbücher für Antike und deutsche Bildung. Leipzig.
- NJP: Neue Jahrbücher für Pädagogik. Leipzig.
- NJW: Neue Jahrbücher für (deutsche) Wissenschaft (und Jugendbildung). Leipzig.
- NORDEN, Aen. VI: P. Vergilius Maro, Aeneis Buch VI (TTrC), ed. E. NORDEN, (3rd ed. 1927), repr. Darmstadt 1957.
- NORDEN, Agnostos Theos: E. NORDEN, Agnostos Theos. Untersuchungen zur Formengeschichte religiöser Rede, Leipzig 1913.
- NORDEN, Kunstprosa: E. NORDEN, Die antike Kunstprosa vom 6. Jh. v. Chr. bis in die Zeit der Renaissance, 2 vols., Leipzig 1898, 3rd ed. 1915, repr. 1983; cf. also CALBOLI.
- NORDEN, LG: E. NORDEN, Die römische Literatur. Mit Anhang: Die lateinische Literatur im Übergang vom Altertum zum Mittelalter, Leipzig 6th ed. 1961.
- NORDEN, Priesterbücher: E. NORDEN, Aus altrömischen Priesterbüchern, Lund and Leipzig 1939.
- NORDEN, Urgeschichte: E. NORDEN, Die germanische Urgeschichte in Tacitus' Germania, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1923.
- Nova Tellus. México.
- NPh: Neophilologus. Groningen.
- NPhM: Neuphilologische Mitteilungen. Helsinki.

- NRD: Nouvelle Revue historique de droit français et étranger. Paris.
 n.s.: new series, nova series, neue Folge, etc.
- NT: Neues Testament.
- ω: all manuscripts or all except for those mentioned explicitly.
- ORF: Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, ed. H. (= E.) MALCOVATI, 3 vols., Torino 1930, 4th ed. 1976–1979 (with index).
- ORom: Opuscula Romana (Acta Instituti Romani Regni Sueciae). Lund.
- Orpheus: Orpheus. Rivista di umanità classica e cristiana. Catania.
- PACA: Proceedings of the African Classical Association. Salisbury.
- PACPhA: Proceedings of the American Catholic Philosophical Association. Washington.
- Paideia: Paideia. Rivista letteraria di informazione bibliografica. Arona.
- Pallas: Pallas, fasc. 3 des Annales de l'Univ. de Toulouse-Le Mirail. Toulouse.
- Pan: Pan. Studi dell'Ist. di filologia latina dell'Univ. di Palermo.
- PapOxy: The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, ed. by B. P. GRENFELL, A. S. HUNT and others, London from 1898 onward (over 50 vols. hitherto).
- Paragone: Rivista mensile di arte figurativa e letteratura. Firenze.
- PASQUALI, Storia: G. PASQUALI, Storia della tradizione e critica del testo, Firenze (1934) 2nd ed. 1952.
- PCA: Proceedings of the Classical Association. London.
- PCG: R. KASSEL, C. AUSTIN, eds., Poetae comici Graeci, Berolini from 1983 onward.
- PCPhS: Proceedings of the Cambridge Philological Society. Cambridge.
- PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst: H. PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst. Geschichtsschreibung und Plagiat im klassischen Altertum, Leipzig 1911 (repr. 1965).
- PETERSMANN, LG: H. and A. PETERSMANN, Republikanische Zeit I (Poesie) Stuttgart 1991 (= M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, vol. 1).
- P&I: Le Parole e le Idee. Rivista internazionale di varia cultura. Napoli.
- Philologus: Philologus. Zeitschrift für klassische Philologie. Berlin.
- Philosophia naturalis. Archiv für Naturphilosophie und die philosophischen Grenzgebiete der exakten Wissenschaften und Wissenschaftsgeschichte. Meisenheim.
- Phoenix: Phoenix. The Journal of the Classical Association of Canada. Toronto.
- PhQ: Philological Quarterly. Iowa University Press.
- Phronesis: Phronesis. Rutgers University Studies in Classical Humanities. New Brunswick.
- PhW: Philologische Wochenschrift. Leipzig.
- PINKSTER: H. PINKSTER, Lateinische Syntax und Semantik. Aus dem Niederländischen von F. HEBERLEIN and T. LAMBERTZ, Tübingen 1988.
- PL: Patrologiae cursus completus, series Latina, ed. J.-P. MIGNE. Parisii.
- PLATNAUER: M. PLATNAUER, ed., Fifty Years of Classical Scholarship, Oxford 1954, 2nd ed. 1968.
- PLLS: Papers of the Liverpool (later: Leeds) Latin Seminar. Liverpool (later: Leeds).
- PLS: Patrologiae cursus completus, series Latina, Supplementum.
- Poetica: Poetica. Zeitschrift für Sprach- und Literaturwissenschaft. Amsterdam.
- PP: La Parola del Passato. Rivista di Studi antichi. Napoli.
- PPol: Il pensiero politico. Rivista di storia delle idee politiche e sociali. Firenze.
- PRANG, Formgeschichte: H. PRANG, Formgeschichte der Dichtkunst, Stuttgart 1968.
- probl.: problematic.
- prol.: prolegomena.
- Prometheus: Prometheus. Rivista quadrimestrale di studi classici. Firenze.
- Prudentia: Prudentia. A Journal Devoted to the Intellectual History of the Hellenistic and Roman Periods. Auckland.

- PVS: Proceedings of the Virgil Society. London.
- QCTC: Quaderni di cultura e di tradizione classica. Palermo.
- QFC: Quaderni di filologia classica. Università di Trieste.
- QS: Quaderni di storia. Rassegna di antichità redatta nell'Ist. di Storia greca e romana dell'Università di Bari. Bari.
- QUCC: Quaderni Urbinati di cultura classica. Roma.
- QUELLET: H. QUELLET, Bibliographia indicum, lexicorum et concordantiarum auctorum latinorum, Hildesheim 1980.
- RA: Revue Archéologique. Paris.
- RAAN: Rendiconti dell'Accademia di Archeologia, Lettere e Belle Arti di Napoli. Napoli.
- RABOW, Seelenführung: P. RABOW, Seelenführung. Methodik der Exerziten in Antike, München 1954.
- RAC (RivAC): Rivista di Archeologia Cristiana. Città del Vaticano.
- RAIB: Rendiconti dell'Accademia delle Scienze dell'Istituto di Bologna, Classe di Scienze morali. Bologna.
- RAL: Rendiconti della Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filologiche dell'Accad. dei Lincei. Roma.
- Ramus: Ramus. Critical Studies in Greek and Latin Literature. Clayton, Victoria.
- Rassegna della letteratura italiana. Firenze.
- RBen: Revue Bénédictine. Abbaye de Maredsous.
- RBi: Revue Biblique. Paris.
- RBPh(H): Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire. Mechelen.
- RCC: Revue des Cours et des Conférences. Paris.
- RCCM: Rivista di Cultura classica e medioevale. Roma.
- RE: Paulys Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft. Stuttgart.
- REA: Revue des Études Anciennes. Bordeaux.
- REAug: Revue des Études Augustiniennes. Paris.
- REByz: Revue des Études byzantines. Paris.
- rec.: recensuit.
- RecAug: Recherches augustiniennes (suppl. to: REAug).
- recc.: recentiores.
- RecPhL: Recherches de Philologie et de Linguistique. Louvain.
- RecSR: Recherches de Science Religieuse. Paris.
- RecTh: Recherches de Théologie ancienne et médiévale. Gembloux.
- REIFF: A. REIFF, Interpretatio, imitatio, aemulatio. Begriff und Vorstellung literarischer Abhängigkeit bei den Römern, diss. Köln, Würzburg 1959.
- REL: Revue des Etudes Latines. Paris.
- RELO: Revue de l'Organisation internationale pour l'étude des langues anciennes par ordinateur. Liège.
- RenQ: Renaissance Quarterly. New York.
- Rendiconti della Accademia d'Italia. Roma.
- repr.: reprint(ed).
- RET: Revista Española de Teología. Madrid.
- rev.: revised.
- Revue d'histoire littéraire de la France. Paris.
- RFC: Rivista di Filologia Classica. Torino.
- REYNOLDS, Texts: L. D. REYNOLDS, Texts and Transmission. A Survey of the Latin Classics, Oxford 1983.
- RFIC: Rivista di Filologia e d'Istruzione Classica. Torino.
- RFN: Rivista di Filosofia Neo-Scholastica. Milano.

- RHE: Revue d'Histoire Ecclésiastique. Louvain.
- RhetGr: Rhetores Graeci ex recognitione L. SPENGLER, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1853–1856, repr. 1966.
- RhetLatMin: Rhetores Latini minores, ed. C. HALM, Lipsiae 1863.
- Rhetorica: Rhetorica. Berkeley.
- Rhetorik: Rhetorik. Ein internationales Jahrbuch. Tübingen.
- RhM: Rheinisches Museum. Frankfurt.
- RHR: Revue de l'Histoire des Religions. Paris.
- RIBBECK, Tragödie: O. RIBBECK, Die römische Tragödie im Zeitalter der Republik, Leipzig 1875, repr. 1968 (with an introduction by W.-H. FRIEDRICH).
- RIBBECK: s. also CRF and TRF.
- RICCOBONO: S. RICCOBONO, J. BAVIERA, C. FERRINI, J. FURLONI, V. ARANGIO-RUIZ, Fontes iuris Romani antejustiniani, 3 vols., Florentiae 2nd ed. 1940–1943.
- RIGHTER: H. E. RIGHTER, Übersetzen und Übersetzungen in der römischen Literatur, diss. Erlangen 1938.
- RIDA: Revue internationale des Droits de l'Antiquité. Bruxelles.
- RIGI: Rivista Indo-Greco-Italica di filologia, lingua, antichità. Napoli.
- RIL: Rendiconti dell'Istituto Lombardo. Classe di Lettere, Scienze morali e storiche. Milano.
- Rinascimento: Rinascimento. Rivista dell'Istituto nazionale di Studi sul Rinascimento. Firenze.
- RLAC: Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum. Stuttgart.
- RMeta: Review of Metaphysics. Washington.
- RNeosc: Revue Néoscholastique de Philosophie. Louvain.
- ROHDE: E. ROHDE, Der griechische Roman und seine Vorläufer (1876), Leipzig 3rd ed. 1914, repr. 1974.
- ROL: Remains of Old Latin, ed. and translated by E. H. WARMINGTON, 4 vols., London 1936.
- Romanic Review: The Romanic review. A Quarterly Journal. New York.
- Romanische Forschungen. Vierteljahrsschrift für romanische Sprachen und Literaturen. Frankfurt.
- RomBarb: Romanobarbarica. Roma.
- ROTONDI, Leges publicae: G. ROTONDI, Leges publicae populi Romani, Milano 1912; repr. 1966.
- RPh: Revue de Philologie. Paris.
- RPhil: Revue de Philosophie. Paris.
- RPL: Res publica litterarum. Studies in the Classical Tradition. University of Kansas. Lawrence, Kansas.
- RQA: Römische Quartalsschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte. Freiburg.
- RSA: Rivista storica dell'Antichità. Bologna.
- RSC: Rivista di Studi Classici. Torino.
- RSCI: Rivista di Storia della Chiesa in Italia. Roma.
- RSDI: Rivista di Storia del Diritto Italiano. Bologna.
- RSF: Rivista critica di Storia della Filosofia. Firenze.
- RSI: Rivista Storica Italiana. Napoli.
- RSLR: Rivista di Storia e Letteratura religiosa. Firenze.
- RSPH: Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Théologiques, Paris.
- RUSSELL, Criticism: D. A. RUSSELL, Criticism in Antiquity, London 1981.
- RUTKOWSKI, Gattungen: W. V. RUTKOWSKI, Die literarischen Gattungen. Reflexionen über eine modifizierte Fundamentalpoetik, Bern 1968.

- SABBADINI, Storia: R. SABBADINI, Storia e critica di testi latini. Cicerone, Donato, Tacito, Celso, Plauto, Plinio, Quintiliano, Livio e Sallustio, Commedia ignota, Padova 2nd ed. 1971.
- Saeculum: Saeculum. Jahrbuch für Universalgeschichte. Freiburg.
- Salesianum: Salesianum. Theologiae, Iuris canonici, Philosophiae, Paedagogiae. Roma.
- Sandalion: Sandalion. Quaderni di cultura classica, cristiana e medioevale. Sassari.
- Sapienza. Rivista di filosofia e teologia. Napoli.
- SAWW: Sitzungsberichte der österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, phil.-hist. Klasse. Wien.
- SBAW: Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, phil.-hist. Klasse. München.
- SC: Sources Chrétiennes. Paris.
- SC: Suisse Contemporaine. Lausanne.
- SCathol: Studia Catholica. Roermond (Netherlands), Romen.
- SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG: M. VON SCHANZ, C. HOSIUS, G. KRÜGER, Geschichte der römischen Literatur bis zum Gesetzgebungswerk des Kaisers Justinian, 5 vols., München 1914–1935.
- SCHEFOLD, Bildnisse: K. SCHEFOLD, Bildnisse der antiken Dichter, Redner und Denker, Basel 1943.
- SCHEFOLD, Kunst: K. SCHEFOLD, Römische Kunst als religiöses Phänomen, Reinbek bei Hamburg 1964.
- SCHEFOLD, Malerei: K. SCHEFOLD, Pompejanische Malerei. Sinn und Ideengeschichte, Basel 1952.
- SCHMID-STÄHLIN: W. SCHMID, O. STÄHLIN, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur, part 1 in 5 vols., München 1929–1948; part 2 in 2 vols., 1920–1924.
- SCHULZ, Einführung: F(ritz) SCHULZ, Einführung in das Studium der Digesten, Tübingen 1916.
- SCHULZ, Geschichte: F. SCHULZ, Geschichte der römischen Rechtswissenschaft, Weimar 1961, repr. 1975.
- SCHULZ, History: F. SCHULZ, History of Roman Legal Science, Oxford 2nd ed. 1953.
- SCHULZ, Law: F. SCHULZ, Classical Roman Law, Oxford 1951.
- SCHULZ, Prinzipien: F. SCHULZ, Prinzipien des römischen Rechts, München 1934, repr. 1954.
- Schweizer Beiträge zur Allgemeinen Geschichte. Bern.
- SCO: Studi Classici e Orientali. Pisa.
- ScRF: Scaenicorum Romanorum Fragmenta, adiuvantibus O. SEEL et L. VOIT edidit A. KLOTZ, München 1953.
- Scriptorium: Scriptorium. Revue internat. des Études relatives aux manuscrits. Anvers.
- SD: Studi e Documenti di Storia e Diritto. Roma.
- SDAW: Sitzungsberichte der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, Klasse für Philosophie, Geschichte, Staats-, Rechts- und Wirtschaftswissenschaften, Berlin.
- SDHI: Studia et Documenta Historiae et Iuris. Roma.
- SEJG: Sacris Erudiri. Jaarboek voor Godsdienstwetenschappen. Steenbrugge.
- SENGLE: F. SENGLÉ, Die literarische Formenlehre. Vorschläge zu ihrer Revision, Stuttgart 1967.
- ser.: series, Serie.
- Serapaeum: Serapaeum. Zeitschrift für Bibliothekswissenschaft, Handschriftenkunde und ältere Literatur. Leipzig.
- SGLG: Sammlung griechischer und lateinischer Grammatiker. Berlin.
- SHAW: Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften, phil.-hist. Klasse. Heidelberg.

- SicGym: Siculorum Gymnasium. Rassegna semestrale della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia dell'Università di Catania. Catania.
- SIF: Studi internazionali di Filosofia. Torino.
- SIFC: Studi italiani di Filologia Classica. Firenze.
- Sigma: Sigma. Rivista quadrimestrale. Napoli.
- SKUTSCH: F. SKUTSCH, Die lateinische Sprache, in: Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1912 (= Die Kultur der Gegenwart 1, 8), 523-565.
- s.a.: sine anno.
- s.l.: sine loco.
- s.l. et a.: sine loco et anno.
- SMSR: Studi e Materiali di Storia delle Religioni. Roma.
- SO: Symbolae Osloenses. Oslo.
- Sokrates: Sokrates. Berlin.
- SPAW: Sitzungsberichte der Preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Berlin.
- Speculum: Speculum. Journal of Medieval Studies. Cambridge, Mass.
- SPEYER: W. SPEYER, Die literarische Fälschung im heidnischen und christlichen Altertum. Ein Versuch ihrer Deutung, München 1971 (= HAW 1, 2).
- SPh: Studies in Philology. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina.
- SR: Studies in religion. Sciences religieuses. Waterloo, Ont.
- SRIC: Studi e Ricerche dell'Istituto di civiltà classica cristiana medievale. Genova.
- SSAL: Berichte über die Verhandlungen der Sächsischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig, phil.-hist. Klasse.
- SSL: Studi e Saggi linguistici. Pisa.
- STAIGER, Grundbegriffe: E. STAIGER, Grundbegriffe der Poetik, Zürich 2nd ed. 1952.
- STEINTHAL: H. STEINTHAL, Geschichte der Sprachwissenschaft bei den Griechen und Römern mit besonderer Rücksicht auf die Logik, 2 vols., Berlin 2nd ed. 1890-1891.
- STOLZ-DEBRUNNER: F. STOLZ, A. DEBRUNNER, Geschichte der lateinischen Sprache, 4th ed. by W. P. SCHMID, Berlin 1966.
- STROH, Liebeslegie: W. STROH, Die römische Liebeslegie als werbende Dichtung, Amsterdam 1971.
- STROH, Taxis: W. STROH, Taxis und Taktik. Die advokatische Dispositionskunst in Ciceros Gerichtsreden, Stuttgart 1975.
- STROUX: J. STROUX, Römische Rechtswissenschaft und Rhetorik, Potsdam 1949.
- StudClas: Studii Clasice. Bucureşti.
- StudFilol: Studime Filologjike. Tirana.
- StudGen: Studium Generale. Berlin.
- Studia Biblica: Studia Biblica et Ecclesiastica. Essays Chiefly in Biblical and Patristic Criticism by Members of the University of Oxford. Oxford.
- StudMed: Studi medievali. Spoleto.
- StudPatr: Studia Patristica. Papers Presented to the International Conferences on Patristics. Berlin.
- StudRom: Studi Romani. Rivista bimestrale dell'Istituto di Studi Romani. Roma.
- StudUrb: Studi Urbinati di Storia, Filosofia e Letteratura. Urbino.
- SUERBAUM, Unters.: W. SUERBAUM, Untersuchungen zur Selbstdarstellung älterer römischer Dichter. Livius Andronicus, Naevius, Ennius, Hildesheim 1968.
- suppl.: supplement(s), supplevit, Ergänzungsband, Beiheft, etc.
- SVF: Stoicorum veterum fragmenta, collegit I. VON ARNIM, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1903-1905; vol. 4 (index) by M. ADLER 1924.
- SW: Sämtliche Werke (complete edition of works).
- SYME, Revolution: R. SYME, The Roman Revolution, Oxford 1939.

- SYME, Tacitus: R. SYME, Tacitus, 2 vols., Oxford 1958.
- T (in editions): text.
- Tabona: Tabona. Revista de preistoria y de arqueología y filología clásicas. La Laguna.
- TAPhA: Transactions and Proceedings of the American Philological Association. Cleveland, Ohio.
- TAPhS: Transactions of the American Philosophical Society. Philadelphia.
- T&C: Technology and Culture. Chicago.
- TEUFFEL-KROLL, LG: W. S. TEUFFEL, Geschichte der römischen Literatur. New edition by W. KROLL und F. SKUTSCH, vol. 1: Leipzig 6th ed. 1916; vol. 2: 7th ed. 1920; vol. 3, 6th ed. 1913.
- TGF: Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, recensuit A. NAUCK (1888), suppl. adiecit B. SNELL, Hildesheim 1964; s. now: Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, ediderunt B. SNELL, R. KANNICHT, S. RADT, Göttingen, vol. 1: 2nd ed. 1986, vol. 3: 1985, vol. 4: 1977.
- Th&Ph: Theologie und Philosophie. Freiburg.
- THOMSON, Influences: J. A. K. THOMSON, Classical Influences on English Prose, London (1956), New York 2nd ed. 1962.
- Thought and Religion. New York.
- ThRdschau: Theologische Rundschau. Tübingen.
- THROM: H. THROM, Die Thesis—Ein Beitrag zu ihrer Entstehung und Geschichte, Paderborn 1932.
- ThZ: Theologische Zeitschrift. Basel.
- Tr (in editions): translation.
- TR: Le temps de la réflexion, Paris.
- Traditio: Traditio. Studies in Ancient and Medieval History, Thought, and Religion. New York.
- TRAGLIA: A. TRAGLIA (TC, introduction), Poetae Novi, Roma 1962.
- Transactions of the Royal Society. London.
- TRE: Theologische Realenzyklopädie. Berlin.
- TRF: Scaenicae Romanorum poesis fragmenta, vol. 1, Tragicorum Romanorum fragmenta, ed. O. RIBBECK, Leipzig 2nd ed. 1871, repr. Hildesheim 1962; Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1897.
- TRG: Tijdschrift voor Rechtsgeschiedenis. Groningen.
- TTrN (in editions): text, translation, and notes.
- TTrC (in editions): text, translation, and commentary.
- UEBERWEG-PRÄCHTER, Philosophie: F. UEBERWEG, Grundriß der Geschichte der Philosophie, vol. 1, by K. PRÄCHTER, Berlin 12th ed. 1926; repr. Basel 1960. New edition by H. FLASHAR, vols. 3 (1983) and 4 (1994) published, vols. 1 and 2 announced.
- UCPPH: University of California Publications in Classical Philology. Berkeley.
- U.P.: University Press.
- V Chr: Vigiliae Christianae. A Review of Early Christian Life and Language. Amsterdam.
- VDI: Vestnik Drevnej Istorii. Revue d'Histoire ancienne. Moskva. verb.: verbessert.
- Verh. Akad. Wet. Amsterdam, Afd. Letterkunde: Verhandelingen der Nederlandsche Akademie van Wetenschappen, Afdeling Letterkunde. Amsterdam.
- Verhandelingen aan de Koninklijke Vlaamse Academie voor Wetenschappen, Letteren en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. der Letteren. Bruxelles.
- VetChr: Vetera Christianorum. Bari.
- Viator: Viator. Medieval and Renaissance Studies. Berkeley.
- Vichiana: Vichiana. Rassegna di Studi filologici e storici. Napoli.

- Vivarium. A Journal for Mediaeval Philosophy and Intellectual Life of the Middle Ages, Leiden.
- VL: Vita Latina. Avignon.
- VLU: Vestnik Leningradskogo Universiteta.
vol., vols.: volume, volumes.
- VOLKMANN, Rhetorik: R. VOLKMANN, Rhetorik, in: Handbuch der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, vol. 2, 3rd section, München 3rd ed. 1901 (ed. by C. HAMMER).
- VS: H. DIELS, W. KRANZ, eds., Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, 3 vols., Zürich-Berlin (vol. 1: 8th ed. 1956; vol. 2: 6th ed. 1952; vol. 3: 6th ed. 1952), repr. 1990.
- W.A.: Weimar editions (of Goethe's and Luther's works).
- WALZEL, Gehalt: O. WALZEL, Gehalt und Gestalt im Kunstwerk des Dichters, Berlin 1923; 2nd ed. 1929, repr. 1957.
- WdF: Wege der Forschung. Darmstadt.
- WEBSTER, Hellenistic Poetry: T. B. L. WEBSTER, Hellenistic Poetry and Art, London 1964.
- WEISS: R. WEISS, The Renaissance Discovery of Classical Antiquity, New York 1969.
- WENGER, Quellen: L. WENGER, Die Quellen des römischen Rechts, Wien 1953.
- WG: Die Welt als Geschichte. Stuttgart.
- WHB: Wiener humanistische Blätter. Wien.
- WIEACKER, Textstufen: F. WIEACKER, Textstufen klassischer Juristen (= AAG 3, 45), Göttingen 1960.
- WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte: F. WIEACKER, Römische Rechtsgeschichte. Quellenkunde, Rechtsbildung, Jurisprudenz und Rechtsliteratur, 1. Abschnitt: Einleitung, Quellenkunde, Frühzeit und Republik, 1, München 1988; 2 announced.
- WILAMOWITZ, Hellenistische Dichtung: U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Hellenistische Dichtung in der Zeit des Kallimachos, 2 vols., Berlin 1924.
- WILAMOWITZ, cf. also: KultdGgw.
- WILLE, Einführung: G. WILLE, Einführung in das römische Musikleben, Darmstadt 1977.
- WILLE, Musica Romana: G. WILLE, Musica Romana. Die Bedeutung der Musik im Leben der Römer, Amsterdam 1967.
- WILLIAMS, Tradition: G. WILLIAMS, Tradition and Originality in Roman Poetry, Oxford 1968.
- WIMMEL, Kallimachos in Rom: W. WIMMEL, Kallimachos in Rom. Die Nachfolge seines apotheotischen Dichtens in der Augusteerzeit. Wiesbaden 1960.
- WIRSZUBSKI, Libertas: C. WIRSZUBSKI, Libertas as a Political Idea at Rome during the Late Republic and Early Principate, Cambridge 1950.
- Wissenschaft und Weltbild: Wien.
- WJA: Würzburger Jahrbücher für die Altertumswissenschaft. Würzburg.
- WKPh: Wochenschrift für klassische Philologie. Berlin.
- Wortkunst: Wortkunst. Untersuchungen zur Sprach- und Literaturgeschichte. München.
- WS: Wiener Studien. Zeitschrift für klassische Philologie und Patristik. Wien.
Würzburger Studien zur Altertumswissenschaft. Stuttgart.
- WZHalle: Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Univ. Halle-Wittenberg, Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe.
- WZJena: Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Friedrich-Schiller-Universität Jena, Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe.
- WZRostock: Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Rostock, Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe.
- YClS: Yale Classical Studies. New Haven.

- ZANKER: P. ZANKER, Augustus und die Macht der Bilder, München 1987.
- ZAnt: Živa Antika. Antiquité vivante. Skopje.
- ZÄsth: Zeitschrift für Ästhetik und allgemeine Kunstwissenschaft. Stuttgart.
- Zeitschrift für französische Sprache und Literatur*. Stuttgart.
- Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenschaft*. Tübingen.
- Zeitschrift für geschichtliche Rechtswissenschaft*. Berlin.
- ZELLER, Philosophie: E. ZELLER, Die Philosophie der Griechen in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 6 vols., Leipzig 7th ed. 1923, repr. 1963.
- ZETZEL, Textual Criticism: J. E. G. ZETZEL, Latin Textual Criticism in Antiquity, New York 1981.
- ZINN, Viva Vox: E. ZINN, Viva Vox. Römische Klassik und deutsche Dichtung, Frankfurt 1993.
- ZINN, Weltgedicht: E. ZINN, Die Dichter des alten Rom und die Anfänge des Weltgedichts, Antike und Abendland 5, 1956, 7–26; repr. in: Römertum, hg. H. OPPERMANN, Darmstadt 1970, 155–187.
- ZKG: Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte. Stuttgart.
- ZKTh: Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie. Wien.
- ZNTW: Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche. Berlin.
- ZPE: Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik. Bonn.
- ZRG: Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte (Romanistische Abteilung). Köln.
- ZRGG: Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte. Köln.
- ZRPh: Zeitschrift für Romanische Philologie. Tübingen.
- ZWG: Sudhoffs Archiv. Zeitschrift für Wissenschaftsgeschichte. Wiesbaden.

INDEX

Names of authors (including musicians and painters) are contained in this index. Names of modern scholars, characters from literary texts, religion, mythology, and history were omitted. The most important pages are printed in italics.

- Abaelard 815; 926; 1702
 Abbo of Fleury 1624
abecedarius 1355; 1629
 Ablabius 1310
 Abraham a Sancta Clara 734; 1034
 Abril, Pedro Simon de 235
 Academy, s. Plato, Platonism
 Accius 154–163; 54–57; 66; 68; 96;
     106; 117; 143; 146; 149; 152; 224;
     244; 251–252; 258; 264; 271; 501;
     584; 593–594; 600; 1074; 1078
 Acilius 375–376; 634
Acta Alexandrinorum 1572
Acta populi Romani 1242; 1393
Acta senatus 1393
 Adamantius 1496
 Adami, Johann Samuel 1015 adjectives and adverbs, s. language and style
 Adlington, Thomas 1462
admiratio 1076–1077
 adoptive emperors 1283
 Aelianus 512
 Aelius Aristides 474; 1294; 1415
 Aelius Cordus 1389
 Aelius, s. Donatus
 Aelius Festus Aponhous 1616–1618
 Aelius Lamia 649
 Aelius, s. Marcianus
 Aelius Paetus Catus 64; 622; 634
 Aelius Stilo Praeconinus 56–57; 59;
     159; 164; 199; 502; 584; 594; 600;
     1400; 1587; 1713
 Aelius Tubero, L. 503
 Aelius Tubero, Q. 388–389; 64; 635;
     637; 839
 Aelred of Rievaulx 556; 1702
 Aenesidemus 388
 Aemilius Asper 1291; 1468; 1472
 Aemilius Lepidus 494
 Aemilius Macer 271; 788; 801
 Aemilius Papinianus, s. Papinian
 Aemilius Probus 486
 Aemilius Scaurus, Mamercus,
     s. Scaurus
 Aemilius Scaurus, Marcus 383; 473;
     480 aemulatio
     its historical importance 1068
aequum 628
 Aeschines 531; 591
 Aeschylus 11; 31; 90; 93; 122; 147;
     151; 156–157; 160; 1178
 Aesopus 1000; 1003
     Aesopic fable, s. fable aesthetics
     beauty and truth, s. truth beauty and wisdom, s. wisdom
     Christian justification of 747;
     1352–1353; 1356; 1363; 1602
 aesthetic sensitivity (of Romans)
     31–32
 Aëtius 1311
 aetiological myths and poetry 96;
     362; 400; 746; 751; 778; 781; s. also
     802; 948; 999; 1333
 Afranius 97–98; 231; 1323
 Africa as a cultural landscape 52;
     214; 428–429; 433; 877; 1286–1287;
     1391; 1449–1450; 1528; 1554; 1584;
     1594; 1616; 1664
 Africanus, jurist 1506
 Agathon 102; 158
 Agen(n)ius 570; 1428
 Agobard of Lyons 1578 agriculture, s. technical writings and the individual authors
agrimensores, s. technical writers, surveying
 Agrippa, general of Augustus
     879; 1266
 Aimericus 1033
 Alamanni, Luigi 702; 1033
 Alanus ab Insulis (Alain de Lille)
     1348; 1733
 Albéric of Besançon 1093

- Alberti, Leon Battista 885
 Albini, Luciano (Pope John Paul I) 1263
 Albinovanus Pedo 825-826; 80; (825); 898; 917; 1043; 1246
 Albrecht, Georg von 737; 819
 Albrecht von Halberstadt 815
 Alcaeus 227; 322; 324; 437; 499; 718; 726
Alcestis Barcinonensis 1299
 Alcimus Alethius, Latinus 1310
 Alcimus Avitus 1289; 1316; 1366
 Alciphron 1512
 Alcuin 425; 885; 1624; 1745
 Alexander Numenius 1475
 Alexander
     criticism of 1022; 1092
     novels on 1093; 1206; 1297 rhetorical topos 301; 1084-1094; 1110
 Alexis 172; 207
 Alfenus Varus 637; 889
 Alfieri 957; 1141; 1197
 Alfius, s. Avitus
 Alfred, Anglo-Saxon King 1387; 1732
 allegorical interpretation 76; 690; 727; 911; 1474; 1543; 1564; 1586; 1589; 1618; 1638; 1654; 1682; 1718 allegory (and personification) 23; 81; 85-86; 134; 157; 186; 197-198; 311; 604; 662; 760; 805; 950; 1001; 1004; 1077; 1089; 1342; 1346; 1356; 1358; 1361-1362; 1492; 1541; 1543-1544; 1611; 1694; 1714; 1718; 1722; 1733
 Amafinius 283
amare and bene velle 72; 351
ambitio 448
 Ambrose 1631-1646; 226; 232; 305; 498; 555; 1297; 1313; 1360; 1363; 1497; 1658; 1662; 1664-1665; 1678; 1680; 1682; 1687; 1690-1691; 1695
Ambrosiaster 1584; 1621; 1634
amentia ascribed to enemies 421
 Ammianus Marcellinus 1420-1434; 65; 366; 369; 402; 473; 1032; 1139; 1287; 1293; 1296-1297; 1299; 1373; 1378; 1382; 1389; 1406; 1417; 1483; 1613
 Ammonius, teacher of Boethius 1715; 1726
 Ammonius, teacher of Plutarch 909
- Ampelius 486; 1412
 Anacreon 324; 718; 735
 analogy and anomaly in language 418-419; 547; 604-605
 Anaxagoras 288
 Anaxilaus 1267
 Anaximander 276
 Andocides 473
 Andronicus, s. Livius anecdotes 375-376; 385; 469-470; 483; 999; 1206; 1248; 1268
 Annaeus, s. Cornutus
 Annaeus, s. Florus
 Annaeus, s. Lucanus
 Annius, s. Florus animals in fables 999-1000; s. also fable
 Anonymi Valesiani 1381
 Anonymus Neveleti 1006
 apostrophe, s. language and style
 Anselm of Besate 1624
 Anthimus 1230
 anthropology, s. humanitas;
     s. man, idea of anthropomorphism, s. God, idea of anti-Gnostic writings 1531
 Antigonus of Carystus 372; 466
 Antigonus Gonatas 473 anti-heretical writings 1569; 1617; 1627-1628; 1648; 1668-1670 anti-Jewish writings 1531
 Antimachus 743; 946
 Antiochus of Ascalon 503; 518; 592-533; 537-538; 547; 594; 599-600; 609; 1176-1177
 Antipater of Sidon 138-139
 Antiphanes 207
 Antipho 473
 Antistius, s. Labeo antithesis, s. language and style
 Antonius Castor 1267
 Antonius Diogenes 1226
 Antonius, s. Gniphos
 Anubion 1611
 Anwykyll, John 232
 Apelles, heretic 1534
 Apiculus 575; 567; 1478
 apocalypse, apocalyptic writings 1360; 1714
 apocryphal writings, Jewish 1534; 1663
 Apollinarius of Laodicea 1647

- Apollinaris, s. Sidonius
 Apollodorus of Athens 271; 478-479;
   1064
 Apollodorus of Carystus 94; 217
 Apollodorus of Pergamum 824
 Apollonius, grammarian 1475; 1486
 Apollonius, s. Molon
 Apollonius of Rhodes 78-79; 121;
   675-676; 679; 801; 934-936;
   939-940; 942; 980
 apogetic writings 272; 1297;
   1530-1531; 1535-1536; 1557; 1569;
   1585; 1595-1597; 1610-1611; 1668;
   1677-1678; 1683
 apotheosis
   Christian 1712
   of heroes 939
   of a beloved person 340; 349;
     s. also 778 and 807
   of philology 1493
   of poets 665-666; 670; 688-690;
     808-809; 991; 993-994; 1487;
     1557; s. also 85
   of politicians 140; 279; 532; 678;
     751 (criticism); 811; 909; 921;
     993; 995; 1090; 1679; s. also 85
   of the sage 924; 1712
   of the teacher 277-278; 294; 301;
     s. also 688 (Daphnis); s. also 485
 Appendix Sallustiana 459-463
 Appendix Vergiliana 706-710
 Appianus 834; 1291; 1294; 1372;
   1415
 Appius, s. Claudius Caecus
 Apsyrtus 1477
aptum 544; 589; 609; 725; 1189;
   1228; 1257; 1436; 1667; 1692-1695
 Apuleius 1449-1467; 7; 20; 40; 336;
   473; 505; 509; 814; 909; 1205-1207;
   1209-1210; 1217-1218; 1233; 1272;
   1281; 1286-1287; 1294-1295; 1297;
   1300; 1323; 1469; 1479; 1492; 1535;
   1540; 1560; 1603; 1618; 1635;
   1683-1684; 1713; 1742
 Aquila 1492
 Arator 926; 1316; 1356
 Aratus 65; 267; 269-270; 272-273;
   278; 289; 539; 645; 674; 881; 974;
   977; 983; 986-988; 1312
 archaism 83; 137; 149; 189; 209;
   222; 239; s. also 366; 398;
   444-445; 482; 493-495; 544; 650;
   687-688; 726; 951; 1089; 1258;
   1456-1457
 archaists 1243; 1261; 1283;
   1436-1437; 1481
 Archelaus 1267
 Archestratus of Gela 58; 134; 271;
   719
 Archias 524-525; 535
 Archilochus 254; 322; 341; 718; 726;
   742 architecture 573-574; 880-887;
   565-566; 570; 644; 781; 1040; 1360;
   1477; 1635
   amphitheater 1040
   Constantine's arch 1560
   Domitian's palace 897-955; 1040
   Hadrian's defensive architecture 1283
   Hagia Sophia 897
   s. libraries
   material (precious) 1184
   Monticello 1155
   under Nero 1230
   as a profession 882-884
   Roman 1152-1153
   Roman wall 1286
   sacral (Roman and Christian) 1361 symbolism 689; 1358; 1361; 1364; 1560
   s. technical authors theaters 95
   villas 955
 Arellius Fuscus 787; 874
 Areopagita, s. Dionysius (Ps.-) aretology 1220; 1650
 Arianism 1358; 1619; 1622; 1627;
   1632; 1670; 1674-1675
 Ariosto, Ludovico 234-235; 733; 1033
 Aristaenetus 512
 Aristarchus of Samothrake 59; 159;
   269; 583
 Aristarchus of Tegea 133
 Aristides, s. Aelius
 Aristides of Athens 1557
 Aristides of Miletus 386; 1218; 1453
 Aristides Quintilianus 1492
 Aristius Fuscus 449
 Aristobulus 1086
 Ariston of Chios 1177; 1617
 Ariston of Pella 1557
 Aristophanes 94; 107; 194; 254;
   1221; 1235

- Aristotle, Aristotelian doctrines 91-92;
121; 135; 177; 261; 267-269; 306;
439; 466; 500-501; 505; 536-538;
541; 545; 548; 556-558; 587-588;
602; 734; 738; 870; 908; 1031;
1093; 1187; 1189; 1223; 1267; 1273;
1323; 1451-1452; 1454; 1461; 1474;
1479; 1557; 1617; 1664; 1695; 1697;
1709-1710; 1712-1713; 1715; 1723;
1726-1727
- Aristoxenus 466; 881; 883
- arithmetic, s. technical writings
- arithmeticon* 327; 340
- Arius Didymus 1176
- Arnault 1141
- Arndt, Ernst Moritz 929
- Arnobius 1584-1593; 305; 504; 555;
1287; 1299; 1360; 1533; 1554; 1565
- Arnobius the Younger 1585; 1594
- Arnold, Gottfried 1431
- Arnold, Matthew 312
- Arrianus 1085-1086; 1092; 1291;
1294; 1371
- Arruntius Stella 944; 1039
- ars* 576; 724-726; 791-792 and ingenium 1258
s. literary criticism
as a system 521; n. 2 (De iure civili in artem redigendo); 982 as title of works 792 (ars amatoria,
s. oratoria); 1471; 1474
- art, Fine Arts 120; 467; 649; 773;
817-819; 882-883; 1184; 1215;
1225; 1255-1256; 1272-1273; 1299;
1303; 1322; 1348-1349; 1358;
1365-1366; 1594; 1658
s. also: art history; criticism, theory of art
- art, works of, descriptions, s. literary technique
- artes liberales* 596; 1259; 1492-1494;
1497
- Arusianus Messius 1475
- art history, efforts in classical authors 1268
- asceticism 686; 1158; 1647;
1655; 1665; s. also, sexuality worldly 1189
- ascetic writings 1531-1648
- Asclepiades of Bithynia 288; 1239
- Asclepiodotus 1176
- Asclepius* 1598
- Asconius Pedianus 576; 1242; 1393
- Asian oratory, Asianism 61; 382;
387-388; 494; 522; 905; 1151; 1457;
1534
s. Atticism
- Asinius Pollio 830-834; 56; 65; 352;
366; 424; 444; 455; 585; 594; 647;
829; 835; 840; 874; 915; 1246;
1250-1251
- Asinius Quadratus 1372
- Asper, s. Aemilius
- astrology and astronomy 575; 76;
s. also 197; 566; 877; s. also 882;
972-989; 1028; 1129-1130;
1271-1272; 1400; 1488; 1490;
1492-1494; 1610-1615; 1710; 1713 compatibility with morals 1610
s. technical writers; Firmicus;
Germanicus; Manilius
- astrology and friendship 1013;
s. also 730 (Hor. carm. 2. 17)
- Atedius Melior 944
- Ateius Capito 648; 889; 891; 1277;
1479
- Ateius Philologus (= L. Ateius Praetextatus) 437; 585; 1064; 1394
- Atellane*, s. comedy, fabula Atellana
- Athanasius 469; 471-472; 1646;
1650; 1656; 1663
- atheism 306-313; 1273; 1559; 1587
- Athenagoras 1534; 1557; 1561
- Athenodorus 1176
- Atilius Fortunatianus 1471
- atomus* 545
- Atta 98
- Attalus, philosopher 1158; 1175
- Atticism 61; 445; 482-483; 492; 494;
758; 833; 1067; 1151; 1436
- Atticus 56; 283; 362; 477; 479-480;
485; 549; 594-595; 601; 654; 1063;
1743
- d'Aubigné, Théodore Agrippa 1578
- Aufidius Bassus 1109; 1496
- augur* 35
- Augustine 1664-1708; 579-581; 23;
40; 87; 232; 305; 403; 454; 456;
474; 497; 505; 508; 510; 513; 555;
558; 571; 596; 610-611; 694; 697;
811; 872; 1013; 1252; 1290; 1293;
1296-1298; 1300; 1304; 1306;
1314-1315; 1326; 1334; 1336; 1360;
1365; 1384-1387; 1417; 1423; 1452;

- 1461; 1468; 1476-1477; 1483;
1496-1497; 1528-1529; 1550; 1558;
1577-1578; 1591; 1606; 1616;
1621-1626; 1630; 1637; 1648;
1655-1656; 1658; 1712-1714; 1716;
1720; 1723; 1725-1728; 1748
 Augustus 641-658; 7; 97; 333; 473;
 520; 620; 668-669; 677; 781-782;
 795-797; 811-812; 875-876;
 887-889; 1043; 1046; 1063;
1393-1395; 1397-1400; 1413
 Aurelius Cotta 503
 Aurelius Opilius 584
 Aurelius, s. Symmachus
 Aurelius Victor 1373-1375; 486; 864;
1297; 1376; 1389; 1406
 Ausonius 1320-1330; 325-326; 333;
 353; 486; 517; 956; 1032; 1052;
1174; 1197; 1288; 1298; 1310; 1443;
1468; 1747
 author Ad Herennium 590-593;
 580-581; 496; 587-588; 1247
 author On the Sublime 980; 1183-1184; 1186; 1213
 autobiography, s. biography
 Avianus 1330-1331; 997; 1006; 1299;
1311; 1485
 Avienus 575; 272; 987; 1312
 Avitus 864; 1316; 1356; 1366

 Babrius 997-998; 1330-1331
Bacchanalia, s. Dionysus
 Bach, J. S. 592; 702; 1262
 Bacon, Francis 1198; 1484
 Bacon, Roger 556; 1071; 1197-1198
 Baif, Jean Antoine de 354; 1328
 Balbus, surveyor 569; 1244
 Balde, Jacob 354; 734; 1311
 Baldricus (Baudri) of Bourgueil 814
 Balzac 1221; 1234; 1462
 Baptista Mantuanus 701; 1015
 Barclay, John 1233
 Bartholl, Christian 818
 Basilus 1383; 1634; 1656; 1663
 Basso, Sebastian 309
 Bassus, historian, s. Aufidius
 Bassus, medical author 1267
 Bassus, metrician, s. Caesius
 Baudelaire 929
 Baudri, s. Baldricus
 Bauduyn, Benoît 1196
 Bavius 824

 Bayle, Pierre 308; 1053; 1592
 Bede 1272
 Beethoven 702
 beggar's poetry, s. literature, sociological aspects du Bellay, Joachim 307; 698; 735;
 816; 1328
 Belleau, Rémy 762
bellum iustum, s. war
 Benedictus Anianensis 1700
 Benedict of Nursia 1; 885
bene facta 72
bene velle, s. amare
 Benzo 1328
 Berçuire (Berçoire, Berchorius), Pierre
 815; 864
 Bergson, Henri 309
 Bernardus Silvestris 1033; 1461; 1624
 Bernard of Clairvaux 1014
 Bernini 817
 Bertin, Antoine de 762 bias, political in annalists 385-388
   in Caesar 419-420
   in Livy 857-860
   in Sallust 450-452
 Bible
   s. allegorical interpretation biblical epic, s. epic
   s. exegesis; commentary
   s. Jerome
   s. reception; translation
   rhetorical qualities 1695
 biography 464-476; 362; 477-487;
1106-1107; 1205; 1249; 1297; 1314;
1374; 1387; 1411; 1422; 1527-1528;
 1580; 1649-1650; 1663
 and aretology 470
 autobiography 33; 70; 362;
 372-373; 383-384; 426; 467-468;
 473-474; 786; 1297-1298; 1306;
 1449; 1453; 1461; 1528; 1580;
1667; 1672; 1683; 1701-1702
   s. conversion
   delectare and docere 483
   in dialogue form 466; 470-471 of emperors 1283; s. also Historia Augusta; Suetonius
   ethos and pathos 475 and historical monograph 1224
   and historiography 468; 470;
   479-480

- and imagines 480 official records 467; 1395 of saints 469; 471-473; 1289;
 1382; 1527-1528; 1580; 1649;
 1658; 1662-1663
 parody 471
 of philosophers 466; 470; 475
 political 477-488
 short biography 1374
 structured per species 1406
- Bion of Borysthenes 289; 719; 1175
- Blandus, rhetor 1247
- Blok, Alexander 336; 355; 457; 736;
 1235
- Bluhme's theory 1523
- Boccaccio 701; 816-817; 864; 956;
 1059; 1140; 1218; 1242; 1253; 1329;
 1349; 1407; 1453; 1461; 1747
- Boethius 1708-1738; 574-575;
 579-580; 244; 505; 508; 570-571;
 611; 732; 926; 972; 1195; 1285;
 1287; 1290; 1296; 1300; 1312; 1476;
 1489; 1495; 1525; 1617; 1624; 1682
- Boiardo 1461
- Boileau, Gilles 1034
- Boileau, Nicolas 733-734; 1015;
 1034; 1041
- Boio(s) 801
- Bonaventura 1701
- Bonincontri, s. Buonincontri
- books 1741-1742
 burnings of 8; 646-647; 830; 1251
- booksellers 1742-1743
- Borchardt, Rudolf 737
- Bossuet 233
- botanics, s. technical writers
- Bothe, F. H. 1016
- Botticelli 306
- Boyle 308
- Brant, Sebastian 233; 235; 734
- Brecht, Bertolt 311; 426; 737
- breuitas* 385; 398; 419; 445; 491; 515;
 603; 845; 978; 999; 1004; 1012;
 1062; 1066; 1183; 1414; 1444
- Britten, Benjamin 819
- Bryussov, Valery J. 736; 1235
- Broch, Hermann 700
- Browning, Elizabeth Barrett 1462
- Brueghel the Elder, Pieter 817
- Bruni, Leonardo 556
- Bruno, C. 1033
- Bruno, Giordano 306; 456
- Bruttianus 1042
- Brutus, legend 161
- Buchholtz, Andreas 733
- bucolic 659-667; 903; 1299
 Augustan 666-710
 s. also Calpurnius; Einsiedeln poems;
 Endelechius; Nemesianus; poetry;
 Virgil
 the genre augmented by new elements 991-992
 imperial period (middle and late) 1311-1312; 1314; 1322
 Neronian 990-995
 elements in Silius 962-963
- Budé, Guillaume 1154
- buildings,
 s. architecture
 descriptions of, s. literary technique
- Buonincontri, L. de 306; 984
- Bürger, Gottfried August 1311
- Burckhardt, Jacob 425
- Burke, Edmund 1034
- Burmeister, Johannes 1053
- Burne-Jones, Sir Edward Coley 817
- Bussy-Rabutin, Roger de 1233
- Byron 312; 736; 818; 1141
- Caecilius (poet, friend of Catullus)
 341; 347
- Caecilius Epirota 9
- Caecilius, s. Metellus Numidicus
- Caecilius Statius 206-214; 57; 97;
 105; 214; 217-218; 255; 605; 1479;
 1481
- Caelius Apicius, s. Apicius
- Caelius Aurelianus, medical writer
 1477
- Caelius, s. Sabinus
- Caesar, C. Julius 405-433; 27; 29;
 54-60; 64; 67; 71-72; 101; 105;
 151; 160; 222; 231; 282-283;
 362-363; 365-367; 433-434;
 451-452; 468; 473; 519-520; 542;
 546-547; 566; 585; 594; 637; 669;
 758; 829; 831; 833; 840; 845; 875;
 915; 923; 1091; 1107; 1110; 1122;
 1399; 1412; 1684
- Caesar, C. Julius Caesar Strabo 56;
 97; 154; 492; 529; 545
- Caesar, L. Julius (consul 64 B.C.) 585
- Caesarius of Arles 1289
- Caesellius Vindex, L. 1468; 1496

- Caesius Bassus 1008; 1242; 1471; 1618; 1621
- Calcidius 1489; 1662
- Calidius, M. 492
- Caligula, emperor, his verdicts on Latin authors 899
- Callias of Syracuse 397
- Callimachus, Callimachean poetry 66;
 69; 133-134; 138; 253; 255-256;
 260; 263; 270; 278; 332; 337;
 339-340; 346; 718; 725-726;
 743-744; 772; 778; 789; 802; 946;
979; 1012; 1042; 1048; 1341
- Callinus 742
- Callisthenes 479; 1085-1086; 1088
- Cannibalism 1021; 1217
- callida iunctura* 30; 726
- Calpurnius Flaccus 1252
- Calpurnius Piso 378-379; 365-366;
 400; 503; 839; 1587
- Calpurnius Siculus 990-995; 661;
 664-666; 697; 700; 907; 909
- Calvin 307; 1015; 1196; 1630; 1702
- Calvino, Italo 818
- Calvus, s. Licinius
- Camerarius, Joachim 701
- Camões 77; 201; 698; 1196; 1354
- Canova 1462
- Caper, Flavius 1468; 1473; 1486
- Capito, s. Ateius
- captivus* 1302-1303
- Cardano, Geronimo 1407
- Carducci, Giosuè 354; 734; 736; 762
- Cariteo, Benedetto 354
- Carmen Arvale* 42
- Carmen de figuris* 1312
- Carmen de ponderibus et mensuris* 1312
- Carmen Saliare* 43; 584
- Carmina Einsiedlensia*, s. Einsiedeln
- Carneades 60; 256; 499; 531-539;
 537; 1172; 1596; 1611
- Caro, Annibal 698
- Carthage as a cultural center 1286
- Cascellius, A. 647; 888
- Cassianus 1496
- Cassiodorus 1495-1499; 515; 571;
 864; 872; 885; 1140; 1262; 1285;
1287; 1296; 1468; 1472; 1476-1477;
1617; 1624; 1728
- Cassius Dio 369; 383; 433; 1109;
1291; 1372; 1377; 1418; 1423
- Cassius Dionysius 601; 611
- Cassius Felix 1477
- Cassius Hemina 377-378; 366; 402
- Cassius Longinus 623; 888; 1276
- Cassius Severus 873; 1213; 1228;
1246; 1250; 1253; 1393
- Castiglione, Baldassarre 1483
- Castor of Rhodes 601
- casuistic procedure (non juridical) 506
- casuistry, s. law
- Cato maior (Censorius) 390-405; 5;
 11; 19; 38; 42-43; 57-58; 60-61;
 64; 67; 71; 129-130; 142; 155; 196;
 212; 227; 254; 362; 365-369;
 375-378; 381; 384; 436; 439;
 444-445; 447-448; 451-452; 467;
 473; 489-490; 492-494; 498; 530;
 548; 565-566; 568-569; 571; 833;
 840; 857; 895; 1049; 1241; 1250;
1399; 1435; 1469; 1478-1479; 1487;
1656; 1702
- Cato minor (Uticensis) 491
- Catullus 334-359; 9-10; 18; 23; 39;
 55-56; 58; 65-66; 68; 70; 72-73;
 84; 143; 228; 282; 293; 304; 309;
 322; 324-329; 333-334; 369; 426;
 476-477; 487; 585; 604; 641; 643;
 646; 653; 669; 674; 676; 708; 744;
 749; 757; 761; 777; 824-825; 830;
939; 947; 1038; 1043-1044;
1048-1049; 1053; 1057; 1235; 1265;
1300; 1311; 1323; 1341; 1361; 1543;
1684; 1746-1747
- causae efficientes* 549
- Cavriana, F. 1140
- Céline, Louis-Ferdinand 1235
- Celsus, anti-Christian author 1557;
1563; 1744
- Celsus, encyclopedic and medical writer 577-578; 1239-1240;
 565-568; 571; 1241; 1267; 1269;
1478
- Celsus, jurist 628; 1276; 1500
- Celtis, Conrad 354; 929
- Cena Cypriani* 1569
- Censorinus 610; 1406
- centones* 1654
- Cervantes 233; 1418; 1462
- Cervidius, s. Scaevola
- Cetius Faventinus, M. 884; 1477
- Chalcidius, s. Calcidius
- Chaluet, Mathieu de 1253
- Changy, Pierre de 1273

- Chapman, George 235; 929
 character portrayal 181–183;
 220–221; 414; 442–443; 662;
 679–680; 845–848; 858–859; 919;
950–951; 977; 981; 992; 1065;
1110; 1115–1116; 1150; 1190–1191;
1217; 1223–1224; 1248–1250; 1257;
1324; 1456; 1480; 1559; 1656
 indirect 413; 442; 845–847; 871;
1120; 1217
- Charisius 576; 1472; 212; 1469;
1471; 1618
- Chariton 1121
- Chartres, school of 1233
- Charlemagne 1745–1746
- Chateaubriand 354; 762; 1811
- Chaucer 556; 816; 942; 956; 1033;
1198; 1272; 1349; 1732
- Chaulmer, Charles 929
- Chénier, André-Marie 309; 762; 783
- Chénier, Marie-Joseph 1141
- Cheraskov, Michail M. 699
- chiasmus, s. language and style
- Chilperic 1290
- Chirius Fortunatianus 1476
- Chiron 570; 1477
- Choerilus of Iasus 1090
- Choerilus of Samos 1090
- chorography 1323
- Chrestien de Troyes 815
- Christianity
 anti-Christian writings 1438 attitude to the human body
 1545–1546
 Christianization of literary genres
1296–1300; 1313–1317;
1359–1361; 1372
 and classical antiquity 910
 persecution of Christians 1568;
1594; 1603
 and philosophy 1304–1305; 1533;
 1560–1562; 1589–1590; 1605;
 1622; 1703–1704
 ‘pneumatic’ 1529
 and Roman mentality, s. reception, Christianization
 s. Roman values, Christianized
- Chrysippus 1030; 1177; 1701
- Cicero, M. Tullius 517–563;
 580–581; 1; 8–11; 14; 19–22; 29;
 38–39; 47; 56–57; 59–62; 64–67; 69;
 71; 73–74; 83–84; 96–98; 100; 126;
 132; 138; 143; 146; 148; 151–153;
 155–156; 160; 164; 192; 200; 210;
 212; 224; 228; 231; 233; 267;
 270–272; 282–283; 293; 303–304;
 308; 324; 330; 345; 353; 363; 367;
 371; 377; 381–383; 388; 395; 398;
 400; 402; 409–410; 412; 415; 417;
 419; 423–424; 427; 436–440; 452;
 467; 473–474; 477; 480; 482–484;
 487; 490–499; 501; 503; 505; 507;
 510; 513–516; 570; 584–596;
 601–603; 606–607; 609–611;
 625–627; 633; 637–638; 642; 647;
 650–651; 674; 787; 824; 827; 831;
 833; 841; 845; 849–851; 855–856;
 860; 874; 883; 890; 898; 900;
902–907; 909; 916; 918; 919; 960;
963; 974; 982; 987; 1022–1023;
1031; 1063–1064; 1067; 1069; 1075;
1078; 1082; 1087; 1103; 1105; 1111;
1120; 1122; 1128; 1133; 1138; 1146;
1149–1150; 1155; 1160–1161; 1174;
1176; 1183; 1187; 1228; 1241–1243;
1247; 1249; 1251–1252; 1256;
1261–1262; 1297; 1306–1307; 1323;
1345; 1354; 1360; 1382; 1394;
1398–1400; 1413–1414; 1422–1423;
1428; 1436–1438; 1440; 1444; 1446;
1462; 1469; 1475–1476; 1479;
 1486–1489; 1533; 1538; 1547;
1555–1560; 1564–1565; 1606–1607;
 1611; 1616; 1618; 1624; 1628;
 1634–1635; 1640; 1649; 1652–1653;
 1656; 1664; 1675–1676; 1678;
1680–1682; 1684; 1688; 1690–1692;
1695; 1710; 1712–1715; 1726; 1729;
 1742–1743; 1745–1748
- Cicero, Q. Tullius 97; 303–304
- Cincius Alimentus 374–375; 64; 373;
 1587
- Cinzio, Gianbattista Giralaldi 1196
- citation, s. reception, quotation
- civic rights 52; 524–525; 896; 1286;
 s. also Constitutio Antoniniana
- civic virtues, s. res publica
- civil war, s. war
- civilization, the rise of 291–292; 302; 695
- classicism
 historical conditions 648; 905–906; 1292; 1353; 1616
 moderate 1258

- as a protest against both dilettantism and scholarly routine 725-728
as a protest against the general trend of literary history 669 social conditions 1313
- classicus* 1484
- Claudianus, s. Claudius
- Claudianus Mamertus 1290; 1496
- Claudianus Agathinus 1008
- Claudianus Balbillus, Ti. 1393
- Claudianus Caecus, Appius 6; 47; 61;
490; 585; 633
- Claudianus Claudianus 1337-1352;
80-81; 87-88; 144; 325; 697; 814;
942; 949; 956; 1032; 1287; 1293;
1296; 1299; 1312; 1334; 1360; 1420;
1440; 1442; 1606; 1718
- Claudianus Donatus 576-577; 1472 n. 1
- Claudianus, emperor, as an author 399;
1399
- Claudius, s. Marius Victor
- Claudius Ptolemaeus, astronomer and geographer 983; 1086; 1139; 1294;
1611; 1713
- Claudianus Quadrigarius 385; 19; 57;
64; 67; 366; 384; 444; 839; 1479
- Claudianus Saturninus, jurist 1534
- clausulae*, s. prose rhythm
- Cleanthes 1537
- Cledonius 1472
- Clement of Alexandria 1316; 1557;
1586; 1598; 1603; 1611; 1717
- clementia* 24; 36; 80; 392; 424; 854;
923; 950 (personified); 954; 993;
1070; 1079; 1128; 1166; 1188; 1321;
1327; 1338; 1340; 1402; 1415
- clients' poetry, s. literature, social conditions
- Clitarchus 367; 386; 438; 1086-1087
- Clitomachus 251; 256; 532
- Cluvius Rufus 1109; 1393
- Cocceius Nerva 1276
- Codex Euricianus* 1518
- Codex Gregorianus* 1511
- Codex Hermogenianus* 1512
- Codex Justinianus* 1521
- Codex repetitae praelectionis* 1521
- Codex Theodosianus* 1516-1519
- Coeffeteau, F. N. 1418
- Coelius Antipater 381-383; 57; 64;
361; 365-367; 380-381; 402; 440;
839; 1065; 1075; 1399
- Coleridge 742; 1349
- Collatio legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum*
1512
- Collection of poems (as a work of art)
337-339; 662; 669-670; 676-677;
712-714; 754-756; 770-772;
790-791; 796-800; 951; 1374; 1629
- Collodi, A. 1141
- Columella, Junius Moderatus
1241; 572-573; 565; 611; 691; 897;
1240; 1269; 1476-1477
- comedy 90-111; 163-240; 1208;
1300; 1453
- cantica* 173; 184-185; 190-192;
223-224
- s. drama and individual authors
- fabula Atellanana* 99-100; 175-176
- fictional character of the plot
93-94
- different genres in Plautus 170-172
- s. lampoons
- love as a theme 92
- Middle Comedy 102; 172
- the Mime 100
- in the modern age 200-202;
233-236
- New Comedy 92-94; 107;
170-171; 1217-1218
- Old Comedy 92-94; 102; 242;
1009; 1021
- palliata* 97; 104; 108; 184; 211
- phylax* 99
- plot 102-103
- s. also satire
- typical characters 180-181
- togata* 97-98; 123
- trabeata* 98
- as a vehicle of enlightenment 132;
198; 202
- Comenius 486
- commentary
- aesthetic 1469
- s. also allegorical exegesis; exegesis;
hermeneutics; reception; Homer, imitation of; typological
interpretation
- close to the text 1627
- historical (commentarius),
s. historiography
- historical and factual 1242
- juridical, s. law
- philological 77; 127; 231-232; 568;

- 586; 732; 947; 1241–1242; 1469; 1471–1472; 1709
philosophical 1489; 1649;
1709–1710; 1713
rhetorical 1246; 1616; 1624
theological 1298; 1496; 1626; 1629; 1634; 1648; 1682
theological and philosophical 1618–1619
compendium 1064; 1071–1072; 1256; 1372–1384; 1411–1420
s. also technical writings;
historiography
composition, principles of, s. structure
Comes (Conti), Natalis 817
Cominianus 1469; 1472
commentarius
meanings 412
s. historiography
s. commentary
as a collection of material 1267–1268
commentary
allegorical 1474
Commodianus 272; 1300
concordia 453; 853; 1260
'concrete expressions preferred'
23–24; 28–29; 507; 776; 1010–1012;
1023–1025
s. also real objects as symbols
confessio 1301; 1539; 1673
Confucius 816 conjunctions, s. language and style, particles
Conrad of Hirsau 425; 1729
Conrad of Würzburg 956 conscience 649; 1021; 1030; 1099;
1134; 1190; 1583
'consecration'
s. imitatio Christi
s. poets as priests; law, jurists, ideal
s. also secularization
consolatio 287; 289; 522; 607; 809;
947; 1022; 1161–1163; 1174; 1184;
1636; 1711–1712; 1714
constantia 1244
Constitutio Antoniniana 620; 888
contaminatio 97; 104; 123; 174; 211–212; 226
contemplative life and active life 150;
299; 532 (Hortensius); 546–548; 641;
1187; 1664; s. also man, idea of
continentia 1244
controversiae 1248
conversion
theme of 474; 555; 1013; 1029;
1210; 1306; 1315; 1557; 1559; 1565;
1569; 1584; 1616; 1664; 1676;
1681–1684; 1687; 1691 writings on 1569
convivium 547
cooking, s. technical writings
Copernicus 557
Cordus, Euricius 701
Corippus, Flavius Cresconius 80; 951;
1299; 1312
Cornelle 865; 929; 1141; 1196; 1198
Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi
491; 512
Cornelius Balbus 428
Cornelius, s. Celsus
Cornelius Epicadus 468; 480
Cornelius, s. Fronto
Cornelius, s. Gaetulicus
Cornelius Gallus 8; 18; 353; 669;
677; 696; 708; 744–746; 749; 751;
756; 763; 770; 775; 779; 800–801;
1744
Cornelius, s. Labeo
Cornelius, s. Nepos
Cornelius Scipio Nasica 384
Cornelius Severus 827–828; 80; 84;
915; 917; 1246
Cornelius Sisenna 386–387 (historian and writer of fiction: problem of identity); 64; 361–362; 438; 440;
584; 840; 1207; 1218; 1453
Cornelius, s. Sulla
Cornelius, s. Tacitus
Cornificia 333
Cornificius, Q. 492
Cornutus Annaeus 913; 960;
1008–1010; 1012–1013; 1479
Corot, Camille 817
Corpus Caesarianum 427–428
Corpus Tibullianum 763–769
Coruncanus, Ti. 634
Cosconius, Q. 584
Costa, Leonel da 235
Cotta, Giovanni 353
Cotta, son of Messala 874
Couperus, Louis 819; 1462
Courtney, W., author of an Amphitryon
201

- Crassus, L. Licinius 19; 57; 61; 491;
494; 508; 529–530; 588; 591
- Crassus, M. Licinius 503
- Crates of Mallus 59; 154; 159; 502;
583–584
- Craippus of Pergamum 532
- creativity, s. man, idea of
- Creech, Thomas 311
- Crementius Cordus 916; 1070; 1110;
1121; 1245; 1393; 1744
- criticism of art, theory of art 882–883; 1231
s. architecture
s. Fine Arts
- Croce, Benedetto 236
- cultural history 608
- cultural regions 1449
s. reception
s. also the individual regions
- cultures, fusion of
s. reception
- cunctator* 36
- Curio, C. Scribonius 491; 493
- curiositas* 1390; 1459; 1683
- Curtius Montanus 900
- Curtius Nicias 263
- Curtius Rufus 1084–1096; 826; 863;
872
- Curtius Valerianus 1496
- Cybele, Gilles 234
- Cynic philosophy 607; 716; 729;
1177; 1229; 1270; 1453; s. also diatribe
- Cyprian 1568–1581; 8; 1281; 1287;
1292; 1297; 1317; 1360; 1497; 1550;
1555; 1557; 1565; 1584; 1587;
1592–1598; 1601; 1611; 1683–1684;
1693; 1695
- Dahn, Felix 1329; 1431
- Dali 818
- Daniel, biblical book 510
- Daniel, Samuel, epic poet 928
- Dante Alighieri 13; 77; 425; 686;
698–701; 732; 814; 864; 927; 956;
1033; 1366; 1407; 1713; 1730;
1732–1734
- Dares 1206; 1297
- Darwin, Erasmus 312
- Darwinism, 'reversed' 810
- dating, methods of 164–165; 172;
215
- David, s. Psalm
- Decembrio, Pier Candido 1094
declamatio 832; 874; 1021–1022; 1026; 1207; 1213; 1245–1254; 1413
- dedication, s. letter
- dedicatory poem 353; 1041; 1321;
1343
- Delacroix 818
- Demetrius, Cynic 1175; 1177
- Demetrius of Phalerum 243; 473;
997; 1247
- Democritus 288; 292; 307; 1027;
1029–1030; 1034; 1177
- Demonology 1461; 1565
- Demophilus 94; 211
- Demosthenes 61–62; 437; 490; 494;
512; 531; 535; 541; 591; 1228
- demythification 116; 297; 1012; 1206;
s. allegorical exegesis
- Derzhavin, G. R., Russian poet 736
- descriptions, s. literary technique
- Desiato, L. 818
- Desmases 698
- Diades 881
- dialectics 1259; s. also artes liberales
- dialogue 529–534; 537; 541; 719;
1023; 1102–1103; 1105; 1175; 1208;
1226; 1297; 1486; 1554–1555; 1566;
1588; 1650; 1666; 1682; 1714; 1717
- allegorical 134
- Aristotelian 541
- and biographies 470–471
- in didactic poetry 274
- and drama: reference to an interlocutor's words 187–188
- drama: introductory 219; s. also 178
- in the style of Heraclides 541
- and letters 515
- in lyric poetry 327; 346
- in philosophical works 505–506;
541; 1557–1559
- Platonic 1009; 1013; 1560
- s. reader
- and satura 257
- in technical literature 567; 588;
601–602
- diatribe 243; 245; 254; 289; 604;
719; 976; 1009; 1029; 1079; 1175;
1178–1179; 1183; 1268; 1302; 1480;
1574; 1711; 1716–1717
- Dicaearchus 601; 608

- dictatorships, demoralizing citizens 1130–1131; 1133
 s. military
- dictionaries, s. technical writings,
 lexicography
- Dictys 1206 and Dares 1297;
 1379–1381
 s. Septimius, L.
- Dicuil 1272
- didactic poem 267–282; 972–989;
1299; 1312; 1361
 Republican period 281–320
 Augustan period 270–272; 649;
 689
 early imperial period 972–989
 late imperial period 272; 1312 anthropological approach 280 epic form 273–275; 276–277; 677–678
 erotic and elegiac 272
 excursuses 274; 290–291; 677–678 influence on natural philosophy 305–306
 invocation of gods 278–280
 s. philosophy
 poetic technique 273
 transitional formulas 276–277; 291
- Diderot 308
- Didymus, commentator of
 Demosthenes 1242
- Didymus the Blind 1383; 1647; 1682
- Dietric of Pleningen 1198
- Digesta* 1522
- dignitas* 422–423; 448; 641–642
- Dino 479
- Dio, s. Cassius
- Diocles of Peparethus 372
- Diodorus 1086–1087; 1092
- Diodotus 518; 539; 547
- Diogenes Laertius 470
- Diomedes, grammarian 1473; 97;
 212; 241; 269; 585; 1438; 1471
- Dio of Prusa (Chrysostomus) 474;
 526; 910; 1305; 1534
- Dionigi da Borgo San Sepolcro 1081
- Dionysius (Ps.-) Areopagita 1701
- Dionysius of Halicarnassus 374–375;
 379; 383; 388; 610; 839; 847; 851;
 859
- Dionysius Thrax 583–584
- Dionysius Exiguus 472
- Dionysus, cult of 90–92; 126; 147
 (Pentheus); 155 (Bacchae); 296; 301;
 392; 808; 937; 954
- Diophanes 601; 611
- Dioscorides 1267; 1272; 1478
- Diphilus 94; 171–172; 192; 220
- disciplina* 1244; 1525
- 'divine machinery' 78; 81; 86;
 196–197; 254; 760; 780
- dogma
 defensive origins 1544
 polemical writings on 1530–1532;
1668–1670
- dogmatical writings 1582; 1627; 1633;
1668
- Dolce 733
- Domitius Afer 1254
- Domitius Marsus 823–825; 333;
1043; 1048
- Domitius Ulpianus, s. Ulpianus
- Donatists 1666; 1669
- Donatus, Aelius 1471–1472; 576–577;
 127; 212; 217; 231; 1293; 1298;
1468; 1473–1474; 1646; 1654
- Donatus, s. Claudius
- Donne, John 733; 1015
- Doratus 307
- Dorotheus 1523–1524; 1611
- Dositheus 1618
- Douglas, Gawin 698
- Draco 618
- Dracontius 942; 1299; 1311
- drama 10; 51; 65–66; 90–111;
 112–240; 649; 1170–1173;
1178–1182; 1207–1208 character portrayal 181–183
 s. comedy
 conduct of action 101–104;
 148–149; 177–187; 208; 213;
 218–222
 criticism of contemporary events 119; 194–196
 delusion destroyed 194; 228 division into acts 102; 177–178 double plot 220; 229; 232
fabula praetexta 122; 128; 1178; 1199 gods 196–197
 introductory scenes 178–180;
 218–219
 masks and action 184
 monologue 219–220
 off-stage elements 187

- pathos 210–211; 1181
s. peripeteia
 philosophical elements 107–108;
 142; 198–199; 211; 218; 227 plausibility (as a requirement) 228
 plot 149; 165; 183
 plot more important than character portrayal 177; 208–209 professional actors 102
 prologue 178–180; 218–219;
 223–225
 and ‘recitation’ 1182 reversal of traditional roles 194 ritual framework 95
 for schools 233; 425
 technique of 101–104; 135;
 148–149; 157–158; 177–187;
 208–209; 218–222; 1180–1182;
 1207–1208
 technique of, used by historians 365; 382; 385; 413–414;
 443–444; 863–844; 871; 1088;
 1117; 1397; 1424–1425 technique of, s. also literary technique s. tragedy
 tragedy, parody of 176; 189 tragedy (technique of), used in comedy 186–187
tragicomedia 165; 197
s. also individual authors
 Drant, T. 733
 Drayton, Michael 928 dream, s. literary technique
 Drexel, H. 1431
 drinking songs 327
 Droste-Hülshoff, Annette von 1155
 Dryden, John 312; 1016; 1034 dualism 1358; 1603; 1606–1607;
 1664; 1682
 Dumas fils, Alexandre 233
 Dunchad 1494
 Dungal 1746
 Durand, Guillaume 1015
 Dürer 817
 Duris 367; 841

 Eberhard the German 425
 Ebersbach, Volker 1235
 ecclesiastical history, writings on 1372
s. also Eusebius
 Eckart, Master 1702

 eclogues, s. bucolic
 Eco, Umberto 1578
 economy, s. planned economy
 Ecouchard Le Brun, Ponce Denis
 762 ecphrasis, s. literary technique, descriptions
edicta, s. law
Edictum Theoderici 1518 education 484; 1021; 1079; 1189;
 1258–1260; 1375; 1429; 1437;
 1440–1441; 1560
s. artes liberales
 decadence of 1031
 discussion, tactics 1260–1261 early teaching 1254
 formal 1259
 general 548; 884; 1258–1260; 1481
 ideal 548; 1103; 1256 learning texts by heart 1261
 of mankind 941; 1547 physical punishment 711; 1260 reading 1257
 rejected 607
 rhetorical 382; 489–499; 787; 836;
 1694 schools, s. literature, social aspects the student’s dignity 1260 teacher’s duties 1257; 1259–1260 and virtus 1075
 educational writings ad filium 393;
 535; 1480; 1492; 1494; 1511;
s. also institutiones
 Egbert of Liège 1093
ego (elegiac) 748; (lyric) 330
s. also narrative technique,
 first-person narrative
 Egypt, authors coming from 1337
 Eichendorff 1431
 Einhart 864; 885; 1093; 1140; 1242;
 1406; 1624
 Einsiedeln Poems 666; 700; 995
 Einstein, Albert 311
elegantia 419; 758; 1227
 elegy 742–754; 17–18; 66; 341;
 649–651; 754–823; 1022; 1221;
 1299–1300; 1311–1312; 1314; 1360;
 1716 aetiological 772; 778; 783
 Christian 1355; 1359–1360
 as didactic poetry 274–276
 dramatic elements 775

- immortality (as a theme) 758
 s. also poetry and the individual elegists
 s. servitium amoris
 its 'utilitarian' character (as a theme) 746; 749-750
- Elie, Maître 815
- Eliot, T. S. 818; 1234; 1311
- elogia* 43
- Elogius, Q. 1393
- eloquence, s. oratory
- Elsheimer 817
- Elyot, Thomas 1350
- emancipation of the individual,
 s. individual
- emblematic literature 1483
- Eminescu, Mihai 734-736
- emotions 82; 88; 92; 96; 107; 132; 300; 540; 543; 751; 779; 1027; 1179-1181; 1191; 1207 (ictus animi); 1483
- commiseratio* 493
- s. consolatio
- deepened by means of rhetoric 1191
- s. also God, idea of
- enhanced by irony 1233
- pervasive in entire speeches ('vehemens'-style) 539-542
- as a source of eloquence 1027; 1257
- subdued 326
- Empedocles 62; 267-271; 273; 276-277; 281; 288-289; 294-295; 297-298; 313; 437; 507
- emperors
- cult of, s. apotheosis
- letters from 1633
- history of ('Kaisergeschichte') 1373-1376; 1378; 1389
- ideal of, s. ruler, ideal
- praise of, s. ruler, panegyric
- empirical school of medicine 1240
- Emporius 1476
- enallage 137
- encyclopedias, writers of 606; 1239; 1265-1275; 1298; 1422
- encyclopedic education (by reading Virgil) 1487-1488
- encyclopedic tendencies in Latin literature 34; 396; 400; 506; 564; 570-571; 1161; 1186-1307; 1325-1326; 1475-1476; 1493; 1497; 1656; 1691; 1710; 1722
- in Cicero 548
- in Ovid 810
- in Seneca 1161-1162
- Endelechius 661; 664; 700; 1299; 1328
- England, importance for Latin literature 1290
- encomium 464; 479; 481; 947; 1108; 1323-1324; 1394; s. also panegyricus
- Ennius 129-146; 6; 8-11; 14; 16; 39; 51; 55; 57-58; 65; 67-70; 76; 78-79; 81; 84; 87; 88; 94; 96; 102; 106; 115; 117; 127-128; 146-147; 149; 151-153; 155-156; 160; 162; 187; 189; 192; 198; 207; 210; 213-214; 226; 242-243; 253-256; 260; 264; 270-271; 276; 279; 284; 289; 293-295; 297; 341; 363; 374; 390; 398; 401; 417; 429; 439; 501; 507-509; 539; 544; 584-585; 643; 650; 675; 687; 711; 719; 851; 907; 962-964; 968; 998; 1064; 1067; 1110; 1174; 1178; 1185; 1323; 1341; 1345; 1347; 1399; 1564; 1587; 1595; 1598; 1718; 1745
- Ennodius 472; 474; 1252; 1287; 1311; 1328; 1565
- Epaphroditus 1478
- Ephorus 363; 439; 479
- epibaterion* 340
- epic 10; 16; 51; 56; 65; 76-90; 255; 648; 903-905; 1022; 1048; 1207-1208; 1229; 1359-1360; 1453; Republican period 112-146
- Augustan period 667-710; 823-828
- early imperial period 913-921
- middle and late empire 1937-1970
- assembly of gods 221; 673
- biblical 80; 1299; 1313-1317; 1352
- 'bourgeois' elements 88; 947
- 'catalogues' in epic 693; 919;
 s. also 965
- didactic, s. didactic poem
- 'divine machinery' 81; 86; 810-812
- episodes 82; 121; 672
- (esp. books 2 and 3); 794-795
- (esp. books 5 and 10); 961 (book 6); 963; s. also structural principles, story within the story
- 'factual' style and 'fullness' 77

- 'hellish' council 1340; 1349
 historical 80; 86–87; 128; 919; 964;
1048; 1216; s. also Lucan historical conditions of its rise 79 lyric elements (in epic) 917 man's role in epic 87–88
 minor forms (epyllia) 341
 Muse, invocation of 82
 mythological 85–86; 932–959;
1026; 1048; 1342
 panegyric 1312; 1337–1352
 s. also poetry
 rhetorical elements (in epic) 801–803; 827–828
 scenes 918; 935–936; 962
 'typology', use of 79–80 world view, mythical and philosophical 85–88; 690–695;
 810–812
- epicedium* 327; 947–948; 1324
 Epicharmus 45; 58; 134; 501
 Epictetus 474; 506; 960; 1501
 Epicurus, Epicureanism 39; 72;
 92; 141–142; 261; 278; 280–320;
 470; 503–505; 512; 537; 654; 690;
 729–730; 1013; 1030–1031; 1050;
1130; 1153; 1176–1177; 1188; 1230;
1270; 1588; 1590; 1597; 1599; 1701;
1712
- epigram 331–334; 334–359; 744;
 824–825; 905; 821–1060; 1221;
1299; 1322–1325; 1337; 1341;
1344; 1360
 cycles of 337–339; 1045
 dedicatory 332; 1041 influence on elegy 772
 erotic 333–334; 338; 1233
 lyric elements 1043–1044
 mocking 1041; 1054
 obscenity 1046; 1048
 'point', final 1042; 1046 stereotypes 1053
 typical features 331–334; 1057 structure ('expectation' and 'revelation') 332; 842–843; 1057
 'realism' 1047; 1053
 sepulchral 1041; 1324
- Epimenides 270
 Epiphanius 1496
 epistemology 285–286; 532; 1667;
1695–1698; 1701
 epistle, s. letter
- epithalamium* 339; 355; 948;
1300–1339; 1341; 1348–1349
 epithets, s. language and style, adjectives
 epode, s. iamb
equites 250; 477; 520; 620; 643; 711;
 787; 821; 1291; 1401
 Erasistratos 1239
 Erasmus 101; 233; 425; 865; 1198;
1253; 1262; 1328; 1366; 1483; 1578;
1659
 Eratosthenes 59; 133; 269; 743; 1064
 Ermenric 1328
 erotic addiction, s. servitium amoris
 Erseiva, P. 1034
 essay 156; 265; 1198; 1456; 1480; 1483
 Estienne, Charles 234
 ethics, s. philosophy ethnography 413; 441; 870; 916;
1106; 1173; 1422
 Etruscan influence 5; 45; 98; 113 etymology 547; 597; 604–605; 757
eucharisticon 948
 Eucherius of Lyons 1289
 Euclid, the mathematician 1713
 Euclides, socratic philosopher 256
 Eugippius 472; 864; 1297; 1699
 Eugraphus 231
 Euhemerus, Euhemerism 11; 134; 378;
 501; 608; 1538; 1559; 1564; 1595
 Eumenius 1441
 Eunapius 469; 1372; 1389
 Euphorion 743–744
 Euphronius, grammarian 1056
 Euripides 93–94; 96; 102–103; 106;
 122; 132–133; 135; 141; 147–148;
 150–152; 156–158; 160–161;
 171–172; 176; 178; 183–184; 187;
 191; 255; 801; 947; 1005; 1031;
1178; 1696; 1728
 Eusebius of Emesa 1628
 Eusebius of Caesarea 468; 472; 1296;
1372; 1382–1383; 1385–1386; 1187;
 1550; 1648; 1682
 Eustathius 1682
 Eutropius 1376–1377; 864; 1064;
1373; 1378–1380; 1382; 1385; 1389;
 1406; 1412; 1478
 Eutyches 1496
 Evagrius 469; 1650
 Evelyn, J. 311

- evidentia* 844; 1454; 1572
 evil (the), evildoing fascination of 1100; 1191; 1696
   as non-entity 1712
   its origin 1605
   premeditated 1191–1192
   'privation' of goodness 1639
   systematical rhetorical training in 1191
 Evtushenko, s. Yevtushenko excursus 410; 413; 438; 441; 444;
   677–678; 974–977; 1023; 1107;
   1208; 1333; 1424; 1496
 exegesis 699; 1685
   s. allegorical exegesis; euhemerism;
   hermeneutics; commentary;
   reception; typological
   interpretation
   'Christological' 1574
   as a creative activity 1653
   literal 1620; 1634; 1638; 1654
   'pneumatic' 1574; 1629
 exegetical writings 1627; 1633;
   1648–1649; 1666; 1670–1671
exemplum 23–24; 37; 196; 364; 466;
   549; 656; 714; 853; 863; 1065;
   1074–1083; 1179; 1189; 1375;
   1429; 1635
   casuistic interpretation 1076
   as a literary form 1076; 1243–1244 collections 915 exile, authors in, s. literature and society
 Eyb, Albrecht von 201
 Ezechiel, dramatist 93; 157

 Fabianus, s. Papirius
 Fabius Maximus, Paullus 798; 874
 Fabius Pictor 371–374; 64; 122; 361;
   365; 374–375; 381; 839; 858
 Fabius, s. Quintilian
 Fabius Rusticus 1109; 1393
fabula Atellana, s. comedy
fabulae Milesiae 1207; 1209; 1218; 1453 fable 996–1002; 134; 715; 1206; 1299; 1311; 1483
   collections (in verse) 1002–1003
   epimythia and promythia 998–999 multiple meaning 1004 fabulous beasts 1341
 fairy-tales 1207; 1454–1455;
   1462–1463; 1650

 Fannius 379–380; 368; 494
fas 628
 father, s. God, idea of as pater familias 141
   and son, conflict of 141; 151;
   166–167; 227; 1171
fatum, fata 88; 119; 534; 694; 856;
   924–925; 954; 1129–1130; 1726
 Faustus of Riez 1289
 Faventinus, s. Cetiis Faventius
 Favonius Eulogius 1476
 Favorinus 1479; 1482
 Fellini, Federico 1235
 Fénélon 1702
 Fenestella 1267
 Fenollet, Luis de 1094
 Ferrandus 473
fescennina carmina (mocking songs)
   45; 98; 254; 1344
   flytings (contest poems) 1311
 female characters in literature
   116–117; 125; 151; 181–182;
   227–230; 440; 471; 513; 516;
   676; 680–681; 759–760; 774–776;
   777–778; 788; 793–794; 804; 808;
   846; 914; 926–927; 945–946; 950;
   1225; 1655–1656; 1664–1665; s. also women
 festive poems, s. occasional poems
 Festus, historian 1377–1378; 610;
   864; 1373; 1389; 1417; 1422
 Festus, lexicographer 577; 117; 212;
   878; 891
 Fet, Afanassy A. 355
 fiction, fictional plot 23–24; 94; 1205; 1217
fides 24; 36; 72; 80; 350; 781; 858; 968; 1340; 1676; 1693
   bona 629
 Fielding, Henry 235; 1034;
   1234–1235
 Filelfo 1262
 Finsterlin, Hermann 818
 Firmicus Maternus, Julius 1610–1615;
   569; 974; 983; 1591
 Fischart, Johann 702
 Fitzgerald, Scott 1235
flamen 35
 Flaubert 1234; 1462
 Flavius Afranius Syagrius 1310
 Flavius, s. Caper
 Flavius, s. Cassiodorus

- Flavius, Cn. 47; 633
 Flavius, s. Corippus
 Flavius Josephus 1682
 Flavius, s. Vegetius
 Flooard of Reims 1624
 Florentin 1523
 Florus, L. Annaeus and P. Annius
 (perhaps identical) 1411–1420; 510;
 608; 857; 864; 926; 1064; 1089;
1281; 1323; 1371; 1373; 1376; 1378;
 1385; 1422; 1429; 1700
foedus 72; 653
 folklore 43; 324; 363 n. 2; 1226
 s. also comedy, fabula Atellana
 s. also pre-literary texts
 Fontenelle 994
 form, large scale, in literature 78; 84;
 256–257; 275; 290; 676–683
 Fortner, Wolfgang 355
fortuna, Fortune 450; 856; 924;
1068–1069; 1091; 1415; 1429;
1711–1716; 1721
 Fortunatianus 580–581; 1261; 1492
 Foscolo, Ugo 736
 Foulon, Abel 1015
 Fouqué, Friedrich de la Motte 1431
 Fracastoro, Girolamo 306; 702
 Francis of Sales 1190
 Frederick the Great 308–310; 558
 freedom 60; 711; 1207; 1213; 1224
 as poets 112; 207; 214
 as addressees of writings (ad Polybium) 1163–1164
 as scholars 436; 480; 877;
 s. also 363–365; 381–382; 564;
 s. also Tiro
 as characters in literature 715
 (Nasidienus); 1213; 1223–1225; 1227
 as actors 184
 freedom 70–74; 281; 349; 426; 1013
 s. individual, emancipation
 Epicurean 299–301; 1187
 through suicide 1190 intellectual 1359; 1457 contested 981–982
 of the individual 1429 inner 1009; 1564
 s. libertas
 through philosophy 299
 Stoic 1188
 s. will, free
 Freytag, Gustav 1155
 friendship 337; 350–351; 594;
 730–731; 770; 799–800; 1008 between the poet and his Maecenas 140; 711–712
 between men and women, s. women
 s. also astrology
 Frischlin, Nicodemus 425
 Frontinus 573–575; 1244; 383;
 565; 567; 569; 863; 872; 884; 1043;
1478
 Fronto 1435–1439; 385; 394;
 402; 440; 445; 454; 456; 477; 495;
 513; 516; 1081; 1195; 1261; 1281;
1286; 1291; 1295; 1391; 1444; 1446;
 1479; 1554–1555; 1557; 1560
 Fuficius 565
 Fulgentius 1474; 580; 697; 956; 1296;
1492; 1713
 Fundanius 649
 Furetière 1034
 Gaetulicus, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus
 333; 1043; 1393
 Gaius, jurist 621; 623; 625; 629;
 1502–1503; 1510; 1512; 1516; 1519;
1523
 Galenus 1294; 1478; 1639
 Galilei 307
 gardening, s. technical writings
 Gargilius Martialis 1272; 1477
 Garnier, Robert 929
 Gassendi, Pierre 308
 Gaul as a cultural province 1285;
1288–1289; 1439; 1449; 1627; 1631
 Gellius, A. 1479–1485; 146; 152;
 207; 209–210; 213; 376; 379; 385;
 402; 416; 419; 433; 454–455; 486;
 506; 595; 603; 606; 609–611; 891;
1183; 1195; 1272; 1281; 1422; 1444;
1454; 1468–1470; 1483; 1555; 1558;
 1628; 1745
 Gellius, Cn. 383; 388
genethliacon 765–766; 948; 1041 genius, s. ingenium
 Gennadius 1366; 1406
 genres, s. literary genres
 Genzo of Novara 1014
 Geoffrey of Monmouth 927
 geography
 in Ammianus 1425
 s. ethnography
 s. technical writings, geography, maps

- in Sallust 453
 in Seneca 1168; 1173
 in Silius 964
 in Tacitus 1106
 in Virgil 693
 Gerbert 972; 1252; 1624
 Germanicus 985-989; 270; 272; 277;
 279; 653; 697; 898; 904; 974; 983;
1061; 1070; 1078; 1106; 1110-1111
 Gessner, Salomon 701; 994
Gesta Romanorum 1253
 Gibbon, Alfred 1732
 Gilbert de la Poirée 1252; 1733
 Giorgino 733
 Giraudoux 201
gloria 54; 140; 364; 400; 447; 484; 967; 1123-1124; 1126
 spiritualized 439; 652
 Gluck 819
 Gniphio, M. Antonius 584
 Gnostics 1532-1533; 1544; 1586;
1603; 1619; 1628
 God's existence, proofs 288; 557;
976; 981; 1556; 1563; 1565; 1604;
 1607; 1692
 God, idea of
 abstract and dynamic 34; 549
 God the only active one 1693 ancient Roman 34; 36; 86; 211; 654-655
 anger (divine) 671-674; 804; 809; 953; 1133; 1597; 1604
 anthropomorphism 85-86; 811;
954 bodily 1544-1545
deus older than numen 34 distance between god and man 349-350
 as father 1564; 1603-1604; 1719 free of emotions 305; 1588; 1591 functional (rescuer) 301; 811; 1270 grace, doctrine of 1623; 1641;
1666; 1697-1698; 1702 as a 'homoeopathic' physician 1539 immaterial 1639; 1665
 impenetrable 1603
 innate 557; 1537; 1561
 within man 924; 1188
 monotheism 555; 1305; 1544;
1564; 1595-1596; 1613
 natural knowledge of God 1533;
 1537; 1627
 Neoplatonic vision of God 1674
 as an 'organist' 1540
 God's prescience and man's free will 1726
 providence 533-534; 1167-1168; 1270; 1483; 1604; 1712; 1726
 providence doubted (Epicurean)
 160
 God the only real one 1693
 sun simile 1560
 s. theology, Christian unfolded in history 1545
 uniqueness 1544; 1583
 the universe as God 981
 not visual 1130
 gods, fear of, liberation from 260-261; 290
 Godefrid of Breteuil 1490
 Godefrid of Winchester 1052
 Goethe 24; 201; 235-236; 267-268;
 310; 354; 426; 486; 699; 736; 762;
 783; 787; 816; 819; 886; 929; 957;
984; 1016; 1053; 1059; 1197; 1234;
1263; 1329; 1418; 1704; 1741
 Gogarty, Oliver St. John 235
 Golding, Arthur 815; 1198
 Gordian I 956
 Gorges, Sir A. 928
 Gorgias 158; 267; 276; 328
 Gorgias, teacher of Cicero 1243; 1246 gospels, harmony of 1352; 1355
 Gracchus, C. 19; 57; 61; 66-67; 222;
 380; 383; 491; 493-494; 497; 530;
 535; 591; 832
 Gracian, Baltasar 1198; 1329
 grammar, s. technical writings
 Grandichan 733
 Granius Licinianus 864; 1373
 Grass, Günter 1199
gratia 36
 Grattius 272; 279; 666
gravitas 32; 36; 210; 212; 490
 Gray, Thomas 312
 Greek
 for beginners 1256; 1260
 Greek and Latin literatures 5; 9-10;
 12-14; 44; 47; 58-61; 63-66; 91-92;
 113-114; 122; 129-130; 133;
 138-139; 158; 372-373; 386-387;
 396; 484; 645-646; 902-903;
1294-1296; 1481-1482

- alternation of, s. literary history, Roman comparative study 263–264; 1067–1068; 1241; 1258–1259;
 s. also 1260
 comparative study of the two languages 1258
 ‘division of labor’ between Greek and Latin 505–508 fusion of 902–903; 1416
 geographical and cultural links (Southern Italy; Sicily; Rhodes; Pergamum etc.) 58–61; 112–113; 133–135; 500–502
 s. in our chapters the sections ‘Greek Background’ and ‘Sources, Models, and Genres’
 Hellenistic authors studied before early Greek authors 10; 65; 78; 93–94; 133; s. also 645–646
 Hellenization of Roman Ideas 1189
 s. ‘imitation’
 s. literary history, Roman attempts at
 s. literary history, Roman, phases and counterphases
 s. also reception, fusion of cultures
 Romanization of content 1040–1042
 s. translation values, change, and continuity 1079–1080; 1428
 Greek words in Latin texts 258; 514–515; 602; 1024; 1324; 1398; 1426
 Grillius 1476
 Grillparzer 818
 Grimmshausen 1462
grammatici, s. technical writings, surveying
 Gregorius, jurist 1512
 Gregory of Elvira 1584
 Gregory the Great 473; 1032; 1658; 1745
 Gregory of Nazianzus 474; 1647; 1663; 1682
 Gregory of Nyssa 1639; 1647
 Gregory of Tours 473; 1290
 Grotius, Hugo 235; 866; 988; 1140; 1494
 Grünynger, Hans 235
 Gryphius, Andreas 1197; 1506
 Guarini, Giovanni Battista 701; 994
 Guibert of Tournai 1702
 Guicciardini, Francesco 1140
 Gundolf, Friedrich 425
 Haase, Hella S. 1350
 Hacks, P. 201
 Hadoardus 555
 Hadrian 98; 326; 383; 1310; 1389
 Hagedorn, Friedrich von 735 hagiography 471–472; 1528; 1577; 1580; 1649; 1663
 s. also biography
 Hall, Joseph 733; 1015; 1033
 Halley, Edmund 312
 Hamerling, Robert 1462
 Händel, Georg Friedrich 425; 702
 Haterius 1250
 Hawkins, Isaac 312
 Haydn, Joseph 702
 Hebrew language 1647; 1649
 Hebrew and Greek history compared 1372
 Hecato 1176
 hedonism 729
 s. also Aristippus, Epicurus
 Heermann, Johann 734
 Hegel 1222; 1681; 1702
 Heine, Heinrich 787; 1233; 1462
 Heinse, Wilhelm 1234
 Heiric of Auxerre 1014; 1081; 1193; 1242; 1746
 Helenius Acro 1291; 1469
 Hellanicus 372
 Helvetius, Claude Adrien 308
 Helvidius Priscus 1129
 Helvius Cinna 56; 84; 341; 830
 Hénault 1072
 Henninger, Manfred 818; 1235
 Heraclides Ponticus 505; 534; 541; 599
 Heraclitus 276; 288; 1482
 Herbert of Boseham 1052
 Herder 309; 735; 1016; 1329
 Heredia, José-Maria de 1035
 Herennius Dextricus 1372
 Herennius Modestinus 1507 heretics, persecution of 1640
 s. also intolerance
 Heriger of Laubach 1052
 Hermagoras 537; 587; 590
 Hermarchus 288
 hermeneutics 1497; 1652–1653; 1670; 1693

- s. also allegorical exegesis; exegesis
reception; typological
interpretation
- exegesis of the Bible 1304
- interpretation of Homer 1304
- hermeneutics and literary creativity
84; 159
- multiple levels of meaning in the Scriptures 1694
- hermeneutics and rhetoric 589;
1574; 1691-1695
- exegesis of texts as a pattern for understanding the world 1304
- Hermetic writings 973-974; 1452;
1586; 1597-1598; 1603; 1670
- Hermippus of Smyrna 466
- Hermogenes of Alabanda 881
- Hermogen, heretic 1534; 1544
- Hermogenianus 1512
- Herodas 100; 134]
- Herodian, grammarian 1475
- Hesiod 77; 81; 139; 156; 159; 242;
270-271; 273-280; 298; 378; 645;
675-676; 853; 997; 1000; 1067
- Hessus, Eobanus 701; 1052
- hexameter, s. metrics
- Heyde, Johann Daniel 1015
- Hierocles of Alexandria 1079
- Hieronymus of Kardia 372
- Hieronymus, s. also Jerome
- Hilary of Arles 305; 473-474; 1289
- Hilary of Poitiers 1627-1631;
1261-1262; 1313; 1367; 1497; 1638;
1662; 1693
- Hildebert of Lavardin 761; 814
- Hipparchus of Nicaea 60; 987
- Hippocrates 1478
- Hippolytus of Rome 1385; 1533;
1550; 1582
- Hipponax 341
- Hirtius, A. 412; 427; 1065; 1072
- Historia Apollonii regis Tyri* 1205; 1252-1253
- Historia Augusta* 1387-1391
- Herodian, historian 1372; 1389
- Herodotus 65; 77; 363; 373; 647;
841; 848; 863; 870; 1087; 1089;
1372; 1435
- Herr, Michael 1198
- Herrera, Fernando de 734
- Hills, Geoffrey 818
- historians: personal experience 121;
124-125; 361-362; 368-369; 1072;
1107-1108; 1422; 1424; 1428
- historiography 360-370; 903-904;
1208; 1296-1297; 1371; 1422-1423;
1453; 1496
- Republican period 370-463
- Augustan period 829-873
- early empire 1061-1145
- middle and late empire 1371-1434
- aetiological approach 364; 366-367;
380-381; 401; 440
- Annales* and historiae 360-361;
1107-1108
- Annales Maximi* 370-371
- 'annalistic' method 840-843; 1110;
1424
- annalists 371-383; 384-389
- s. anecdotes
- artificial language 1425
- artistic aspects 382
- battles, description of 413-416;
444; 841-845; 1087-1088; 1117;
1425
- bellum iustum*, s. war
- s. biography
- clients as historians 384
- commentarius* 47; 64-65; 362;
365-367; 405-432; 468; 471-474
- as contemporary history 360;
368-369; 451-453; (Tac. hist.)
1104; 1422-1423
- criticism of contemporary society
363-364
- criticism of predecessors 1086;
1124
- on decadence 379-380; 443;
447-450; 458
- diligentia* 831; 833
- documents, use of 435-436;
1107-1109; 1393-1394; 1422
- dramatic technique 365; 413-415;
438; 443-444; 841-844; 1088;
1117
- emotional style 1088
- 'epic' style 1089
- s. excursus
- (not) focused on Rome 6; 368-369;
401; 403; 857-860; 871;
1125-1126; 1136; 1416
- generic style created by authors 365
- s. gloria

- Hellenistic 1088
 the historian as 'judge' 1122
 impartiality 415; 452; 832; as a problem 857-859; 871; 1122; 1181 individual, importance of 451
 Italy, importance of 368; 440
 leitmotifs 842
 memoirs 383-384; 412
 monographs (historical) 120; 361; 381-382; 433-463; 1107-1108 moralizing approach 363; 366-367; 381; 400; 403; 438; 852-854; 855-856; 1127 non-senatorial 64; 364-365; 829
 'obituary notices' 1088 patriotic bias 363; 857-859
 as a political means 364 pre-literary 46
 provinces, importance of 6-7; 401-403; 453; 887-888
 'reflection' as a typical feature 414; 1386
 rhetorical 840; 1065
 s. Rome, criticism of senatorial 64; 364-365; 367; 829-830; 1125-1126 speeches (twin speeches) 436-437; 443; 847-848; 1089; 1107 speeches and letters 394; 413-414; 440-442; 846-848; 1088; 1116; 1425
 'tragic', s. dramatic
 s. truth, truthfulness universal history 361; 869-873; 1373
 s. values, Roman
 'whitewashing' 846; 857-859; 1072 history 608; 611; 694-695; 852-861; 1068-1069; 1131-1132; 1385-1386; 1403; 1474; 1597; 1605; 1656; 1666; 1677-1678; 1686 and the 'ages' of human life 1250; 1413; 1419; 1679 church history 1372; s. also Eusebius; Jerome competition of talents in great epochs 1067
 'creation' of one's ancestry, s. identity
 s. cultural history deformation of 385-386; 858
 s. exemplum
 Greek and Hebrew (parallels) 1372
 Greek and Roman (parallels) 1385 patriotic view of, s. historiography
 s. identity
 s. individual, importance of innovation 861; 1067-1068 interest in man 860-861
 modernized 860
 moralizing approach to, s. historiography pagan apotheotic approach to history 1390
 'pessimism' increasing in Sallust 449-450; in Tacitus 1099-1100; 1134-1135 philosophy of 608; 694-695; 939-941; 1296; 1306-1307; 1386; 1498; 1539; 1547; 1677-1681; 1701-1702 positive aspects of 'modern' times 1079; 1127-1128 progress of civilization 940; negative 1270
 s. Rome, criticism of subdivision into periods 1068
translatio imperii 1387 world empires, sequence of 1386
 Hobbes, Thomas 311
hodoiporikon 1041
 Hofmannsthal 311; 457
 Holbach, Paul Heinrich Dietrich von 308
 Holberg, Ludvig 235; 816; 1234
 Hölderlin 652; 734; 929
 Hölty, Ludwig 354
 Holyday, Barten 1015
 Homer 8; 11; 13; 59; 65; 76-79; 81-88; 114-116; 133; 135-136; 138-140; 159; 230; 255; 268; 273; 276-280; 378; 437; 509; 607; 645; 675-676; 698-699; 727-733; 773-774; 801; 810; 814; 842; 907; 916; 921; 927-928; 934; 947; 962; 964; 967; 977; 1333; 1353-1354; 1380; 1556-1557; 1564; 1641; 1653
 Homer, criticism of, s. reception, Homer, imitation of homilies, s. sermons
 homiletics, s. rhetoric

- homo novus* 38; 61; 70; 390; 394;
467; 517; 634; 1069
- homosexuality, s. sexuality
- Hoofit, Pieter Corneliszoon 202; 1140
- Horace 711–741; 7; 12; 15; 17–19;
21; 24; 56; 61; 66; 83–84; 91–92;
98; 117; 143; 161; 192; 202; 212;
225; 231; 241–248; 255–256;
259–264; 267; 271–274; 277–280;
289; 307; 322–330; 339; 353; 437;
468; 504; 513–516; 585; 643–646;
649; 650–655; 660; 668; 676; 690;
696; 702; 754; 761; 770; 773; 777;
788; 802; 814; 823; 825; 829; 832;
849; 876; 927; 947; 993; 998;
1009–1013; 1015; 1021; 1023; 1031;
1033; 1043–1044; 1047–1048; 1050;
1070; 1090; 1148; 1150; 1175; 1228;
1250; 1300; 1315; 1323; 1325; 1333;
1359; 1363; 1367; 1392; 1399; 1444;
1468–1469; 1597; 1629; 1652; 1655;
1658; 1678; 1684; 1716; 1743; 1745
- Horia, Vintila 818
- Hortensius 57; 61; 333; 477; 492;
494; 518; 523; 530; 542
- Hostius 380
- Hrabanus Maurus 305; 1014; 1052
- Hrotsvit (Roswitha) of Gandersheim 232
- Hucbald 1194
- Hugh of Trimberg 732
- Hugo, Victor 309; 700; 736
- humanitas* 38–39; 57; 73; 88; 198–199;
228; 232–233; 236; 446; 472;
490–491; 730; 954–955; 993; 1079;
1152; 1189; 1484; 1599; 1656
- Humboldt, Alexander von 1197
- Humboldt, Wilhelm von 27–28
- Hume, David 557
- humor 176; 194–195; 209; 221;
229–230; 258; 260; 529; 547; 606;
725; 728; 784; 790–793; 825; 1013;
1042–1043; 1046; 1324; 1456–1457;
1459
- Husserl, Edmund 1701
- Hutchinson, Lucy 311
- Huysmans, Joris Karl 1016; 1235;
1350
- Hyginus, agrimensor 581–582; 1244
- Hyginus, Augustan scholar 877; 575;
580; 470; 480; 486; 870; 1075;
1374; 1393; 1442; 1479
- hymns 278; 327; 1300; 1313–1314;
1358; 1363; 1366; 1541; 1618–1620;
1628–1629; 1633–1635; 1638; 1642
- hyper-urbanism, s. language and style
- Iamblichus 475
- iambus*, literary genre 340; 711–741;
s. meter
- Ibsen 457
- identity
- of authors, adoption of Greek traditions 12–13; 138–139; 724–728
  - early imperial period, fusion of Greek and Roman cultures 940–941; 944; 954–955;
1188–1189; 1294
  - of the empire, expressed in poetry 728–730
  - of the empire, creation of one's own ancestry 33; 694–695; 860–861
  - of the empire, creation of values 37–40; 729; 853–855
  - late imperial period, reception of Jewish and Christian traditions 910–911; 1306; 1646–1662
  - of Latin literature as compared to Greek literature 117
  - of authors, adoption of Roman traditions 725; 800
  - of imperial Rome, adoption of Christianity 40; 1282–1283; 1304
  - identity of imperial Rome, adoption of Stoic philosophy 39; 909–910; 1149; 1152; 1188–1189;
1282–1283; 1305
  - of imperial Rome, religious foundations 39–40
  - of Italy, expressed in Latin literature 6; 12; 51–52; 58–59
- idyll, s. bucolic
- Ildefons of Toledo 1406
- imagery, metaphors, similes
- agricultural 30
  - in Cato 398
  - chariot race 277; 803
  - clothes (metaphors of) 1571; 1574
  - eating and drinking 1685–1686
  - from economic life 31
  - from family life 343
  - human body, parts of (personified) 343–344

- in late antiquity, reception of Platonic and Aristotelian
 philosophy 1621–1622; 1641;
1712; 1722–1723
- in the Republican period, creation of values and attitude to history
 450–453; 531–532; 546–550
- interchange of spheres 684–685
- juridical 31; 1456
- of letters 295; 977
- medical 292; 296; 1131; 1179;
1256; 1711; 1718
- metaphors 23–25; 1066; 1414;
1426; 1685–1686; 1718
- s. metaphors taken literally
- metaphors and metonymy 24;
 723–724
- metonymy 1025
- military 30; 185–186; 683–684;
 851; 1188; 1303; 1358; 1364;
 1426; 1456; 1572; 1599
- musical 1256
- mythological 300; 773–774; 1047
- from nature 115; 158; 292; 295;
 298; 308–309; 344; 683–685;
1179; 1257; 1573; 1579; 1685;
 1693; 1719; 1721
- position within the text 804
- from Roman life 138
- sailing 678; 1179
- 'separate' images 81; 936; 966;
1316; 1343
- s. simile
- symbolism of light 158; 297; 1362;
 1457; 1560
- the temple as metaphor 1560
- from the theater 193
- in Virgil 683–687
- imitatio*, literary 13–16; 78; 84–85;
 132; 138; 207–208; 218; 259–260;
 329; 399; 436; 606; 907; 1249–1250;
1527
- s. contaminatio
- by contrast 130; 674–675; 678
- dignity, sense of 83; 679; 687
- s. Greek and Latin literature
- homage to predecessors 85; 138;
 297; 670 (Verg. ecl. 5); 690; 745;
 800
- as a means of sophisticated self-presentation 78; 135;
 148–149; 437; 535; 538
- obliterated 1067
- s. pathos
- s. plagiarism
- s. reception
- reversal of motifs found in the model 1042
- s. transference of literature
- s. translation
- trivialization 208
- s. typological interpretation
- imitatio*, philosophical and religious
- imitatio Christi* 1527–1528; 1580; 1596
- imitatio Epicuri* 301
- immortality 532; 557; 1129
- of the beloved 354; 758
- denied 285; 1590
- through grace 1586; 1590; 1603
- through knowledge of God 1604
- literary 1151
- in the memory of one's friends 1153
- of poets 355; 727; 808
- of poetry 352; 727
- through poetry 980
- of the soul 308; 532; 557; 1489;
1546; 1622
- of the statesman 532
- imperium proconsulare* 642
- impietas* 290
- improvization and poetry 951
- individual, emancipation of in exile 811; 1159
- s. liberty
- political 53–54; 422–423; 500;
 641–642; 1059
- philosophical or religious 39; 57;
 66; 70–74; 160; 248; 261;
 282–283; 300; 305; 335–336; 349;
 641; 1008–1009; 1013; 1016;
 1185; 1541 (philosopher's coat,
 Christian); 1589–1590; 1604
- individual, identity of 51; 138; 608
- s. biography, autobiography
- Christian, conscience 1583
- Christian, ecclesia 1293; 1575–1576; 1672–1673
- Christian, against 'imperial' theology
1680–1681
- European authors versus Roman literature 117
- philosophical 300–301; 509–510;
904; 1187–1188

- political, homo novus 467; 520 values, private 742-823
 and rhetoric 1186
- individual and history 1136-1137
 literary creativity 6-7; 11-12; 15;
 19-21; 30; 40; 46; 55-56; 68; 77;
 117; 147; 161; 329
 as a subject of poetry, s. personal poetry
- individualism 140; 262; 393; 629;
 669; 690; 751-752; 811; 1542-1543
- ingenium* 652; 699; 750, 778; 780;
 809-810; 818; 831; 1185; 1228;
1258; 1504; 1269
- Innocentius 1478
- innovation as an historical category,
 s. history
- insania* 547
- inscriptions 45; 124; 331-332; 960;
1096
- inspiration, poetic 85; 247; 278-279;
 296; 304; 725; 750-751; 778;
 807-808; 1363
 Christian 1353-1354; 1361-1362
 by deities competent for the subject matter 274; 296; 807-808
 disclaimed 798; 1012
 caused by an emotion 346-347;
 778; 1027; 1034; 1256
 by the emperors 279; 916;
 s. also 921-922; 935; 974;
1079 drawn from fine arts 773 drawn from indignation 1034
 invocation of the Muse 85;
 115-116; 124; 139; 274; 278; 296;
 808; 934-935; 980
 by the mistress 778
 drawn from predecessors, s. imitatio
 by a sponsor 1345
 drawn from rhetoric 787; 803; 806;
 827; 952; 1344
- institutiones*, textbooks 566; 588; 603;
 621; 1239; 1254-1264; 1475; 1495;
 1502-1504; 1506-1507; 1510;
 1518-1521; 1523-1524; 1594-1610;
 1628
- international law, s. law
- interpolations 175; 424
- intolerance 1031; 1390
 militant 1640; 1702
- invitation, poems of 327; 340; 1021;
1041
- invective 459; 524-527; 800; 1339;
1342; 1655; 1659
- Iolaos-Novel 1208; 1218; 1221
- Ireland, literary importance 1290
- Irenaeus 1533-1534; 1582; 1622;
1682
- irony 185; 229; 259; 529; 720; 727;
 805; 1228; 1455-1457; 1600 self-irony 774; 784; 1561; s. also humor
- tragic 804
- Irving, Washington 611
- Isidore of Charax 1266
- Isidore of Seville 305; 353; 456; 571;
 885; 926; 1272; 1288; 1378; 1387;
 1406; 1472; 1489; 1565; 1606; 1642
- Isis, cult of 1028; 1449-1467;
 1558-1559
 s. mystery cults
- Isocrates 363; 367; 442; 473; 512;
 536; 587; 1177
- Italy, cultural unit 43; 51; 59;
 367-368; 1286-1287
 central Italy 163; 433; 517; 769; 786
 s. historiography
 North Italy 334; 476; 667 relationship to provinces 1008
 Rome 6-7; 51-52; 405; s. also the biographies of most authors
- Sicily 58; 134-135
- South Italy 56; 58; 95; 119; 129; 711
- itineraria* 1333; 1594; 1650
- iuriconsulti* 620; 888-889; s. also 63
- ius*, s. law
- iustitia* 86; 421; 626-628; 1126-1128;
1244; 1338-1340; 1507-1508
distributiva (suum cuique) 2
- the foundation of the state 533
 s. law
 s. ruler, ideal
- Jacot de Forest 927
- Jáuregui y Aguilar, Juan de 928
- Javolenus Priscus, L. 1276; 1500
- Jean de Meung 732; 864; 1033-1034
- Jefferson, Thomas 1155
- Jehan de Tuim 927
- Jerome (Hieronymus) 1646-1662;

- 206; 232; 243; 252; 283; 335; 438; 456; 469–472; 480; 486; 513; 517; 555; 592; 835–836; 1014; 1103; 1138; 1195; 1261; 1293–1296; 1298–1299; 1304; 1316; 1354; 1365; 1372; 1375; 1377; 1382; 1384–1385; 1406; 1471–1472; 1496–1497; 1528; 1550; 1556; 1577; 1584; 1591; 1594; 1599; 1605–1606; 1619–1621; 1624; 1630; 1637; 1680–1682; 1695
- Jewish Christians 1533; 1544
- Jews 911; 1334; 1358; 1382; 1537
- s. anti-Jewish writings
  - s. exegesis
  - s. Hebrew and Greek history; Hebrew language
  - Hellenization 911
  - s. Philon
  - s. typological interpretation
- Joachim de Floris 1550
- Johannes, s. John
- Johannes Lydus 1014; 1033; 1348; 1398; 1406
- Johannes Malalas 1417
- Johannes Scotus Erigena 1494; 1624; 1702; 1733
- John, s. Johannes
- John of Auville (Altavilla) 1015; 1348
- John Chrysostom 1342; 1648; 1682
- John Paul I, pope 1263
- John of Salisbury 556; 1014; 1052; 1081; 1093; 1233; 1252; 1350; 1461; 1483; 1702; 1729; 1747
- Johnson, Samuel 1034
- Jonson, Ben 735; 1249; 1253
- Jordanes 1378; 1417
- Josephus Iscanus 942; 956
- Joyce, J. 818; 1220; 1228
- Juan de Mena 927
- Juba 1266–1267; 1621
- Julian the Apostate 512; 1293; 1295; 1421–1424; 1430–1431; 1613
- Julian of Toledo 1472; 1733
- Julianus, s. Salvius
- Julius Africanus, S. 1372; 1385
- Julius, s. Caesar
- Julius Modestus 1242
- Julius, s. Obsequens
- Julius Paris 1081; 1296
- Julius Paulus, commentator of Coelius 383
- Julius Romanus 1291; 1468–1469
- Julius Severianus 1476
- Julius, s. Solinus
- Julius Victor 1261
- Junius Brutus Callaicus, D. 55; 155
- Junius Brutus, M. 362; 492; 504
- Junius Moderatus, L., s. Columella
- Junius Nipsus, M. 1244
- Junius Otho 1246
- juridic method of argument 1534–1535; 1539; 1541; 1545; 1603; 1630; 1640; s. also theology
- jurists, s. law
- justice, s. iustitia
- poetic, s. literary technique, inversion
- Justinian 1; 620; 628; 632; 1296; 1512; 1528
- Justinus, M. Junianus 1373; 474; 871–872; 1086; 1385; 1534; 1561; 1603
- Juvenal 1019–1037; 8; 15; 17; 21; 80; 241–243; 247–248; 271; 275; 280; 289; 290; 298; 732–733; 738; 814; 901–903; 905–906; 909; 976; 980; 1044; 1052; 1099–1100; 1292; 1294; 1300; 1323; 1444; 1541; 1655
- Juvenus 1352–1354; 80; 85; 272; 1316
- Juventius, s. Celsus, jurist
- Kafka 818; 1016
- Kaiser, G. 201
- Kant 309; 1016; 1697; 1727
- kisses
- blown 1558
  - erotic 342
  - greeting 1042
  - of married persons 210
- Kleist 181; 201
- Klopstock 77; 669; 735
- Knebel, C. L. von 310
- knights, s. equites
- Konrad, s. Conrad
- Koreff, Johann Ferdinand 762
- Krylov, Alexey N. 1006
- Ktesibius 881
- Labeo, Antistius 621–622; 648; 889–891; 1277; 1479; 1506; 1732
- Labeo, Cornelius 1587
- Laberius, D. 100–101; 1534
- Labienus, T. 830; 874; 1250–1251
- labor 759

- La Bruyère, Jean de 1198
 La Chapelle, Jean de 762
 Lactantius, Church Father
   1594-1610; 263; 283; 303; 305; 455;
   504; 508; 555; 611; 747; 988; 1081;
   1174; 1195; 1281; 1287; 1299; 1354;
   1360; 1367; 1413; 1452; 1483; 1533;
   1550; 1555; 1557; 1565; 1577; 1588;
   1676; 1687; 1693; 1727
 Lactantius Placidus 956
 Laelius Archelaus, Q. 263
 Laelius, C. (minor) 490; 494; 517
 Laevius 334; 1310
 La Fare 762
 La Fontaine 234; 308; 1006
 La Harpe, François de 762
 Lamettrie, Julien Offray de 1592
 lampoons, s. fescennina carmina
 Landolfus Sagax 1377
 Landsberger, Artur 1213
 Lange, Hartmut 818
 language and style 26-31; s. the relevant paragraphs ('Language and Style') in the individual chapters on authors, genres, and epochs ablative absolute 293; 417; 1115; 1118 abstract nouns 190; 223; 507; 604;
     1000; 1004; 1066; 1077; 1089;
     1257; 1268; 1300; 1302; 1539;
     1720; s. also 'concrete' expressions preferred
   'addenda style' 1119
   adjectives 29; 124; 136; 149; 194;
     258; 293; 416; 951; 1025; 1257;
     1325; 1456
   adverbs 293; 387; of time 845
   adynaton 1026
   alliteration 29; 42; 46; 83; 115;
     123; 134; 136; 328; 378; 445;
     1066
   s. analogy and anomaly in language
   anaphora 1257; 1302
   antithesis 138; 209; 380; 742;
     806; 871; 921; 979; 1026; 1077;
     1249; 1269; 1333; 1344; 1414;
     1651 apostrophe 23; 346 (of oneself); 920; 1024; 1077; 1178; 1325
   s. archaisms
   articles missing 27-28; 507
   asyndeton 603
   bureaucratic language, s. here
     officialese characteristics of Latin 26-32; 135
   chiasmus 116; 342; 1257
   Christian 1300-1303; 1539
   clarity 845
   colloquial language 187-188; 222;
     245-246; 258; 344; 544; 567; 725;
     1011; 1024; 1209; 1227
   combination of words, unusual 1011-1012
   composition, harsh 832
   compound words 29; 136; 149
   conjunctions, s. here sentence
     connection
   copia 29; 56-57; 67; 150; 153; 547;
     1150-1151; 1589
   dative (from dare 'to give') 259
   declination, forms 294; 419 disappearance of endings 1227; 1290
   delectus verborum 1437 diminutives 344; 544; 1588; 1651
   ellipsis 999; 1269
   s. enallage
   endings of cases, s. here declination, forms
   etymological figures 1720-1721
   etymological meaning, revived 1011-1012
   evolution of style 445-446;
     542-543; 848-850; 1121
   exclamation 1077
   final -s 137
   frequentativa 1375
   gender, irrelevance of grammatical gender 1589
   Germanic words in Tacitus 1118
   Greek elements in Latin 978; 1025;
     (avoided) 1118; 1268; 1480; 1598;
     1620; 1720
   homonyms 1058
   hypallage 1012
   hyperbaton 28; 158; 382; 417, 938; 1722 hyperbolic expression 1197
   'hyper-urbanism' 189
   infinitive, historic 446; 1375 infinitive, substantive 1620 interjections 222
   juridical language 1504
   koiné 1300

- levels, linguistic and stylistic, differences 62; 67; 123; 137;
 185-192; 328; 398-399; 542-545;
 603; 650-651; 850-851; 1025;
1118-1121; 1184; 1209; 1227;
1397-1398; 1457-1458;
 1688-1689; 1717
- and logic 27
- macaronic style 1324
- meaning, changes of (erotic, private, spiritual, etc.) 71; 300-301; 350;
 549; 940; 978; 1620; 1718
- meaning, loss of 422; 833
- metaphors, s. imagery
- metonymy 24; 297; 723; 1011;
1047
- s. metrics
- modes, change of 1257
- mother tongue 405; 491
- negations 1572
- neologisms 83; 136; 149-150; 293;
 334; 549; 725; 806; 920; 1302;
 1363; 1457; 1658; 1723
- officialese 189; 365-366; 377; 386;
 416; 624-625; 1496
- orthography 258; 419; 445; 454;
1468-1469; 1495; 1618
- parallel structures (in style)
 115-116; 380; 1066; 1302; 1313
- parataxis, s. here sentence
 connection
- parentheses 417; 806; 938; 1089
- particles, s. here sentence connection
- participles 28; 135; 417; 543; 1183;
1198
- point, pointed style 333; 651; 874;
952; 966; 978-979; 1046-1047;
1120; 1249; 1258
- 'poverty' of the Latin language 68;
 297; 547
- prepositions 27
- pronominal forms in poetry 137
- pronouns 27; 137; 149
- pronunciation 258
- proverbs 999; 1035; 1178
- punctuation 1243
- puns 188; 203; 999
- purism, selectivity; and stylization 29; 67; 83-84; 152;
 225-226; 416; 458
- quotation, s. reception
- ritual 116; 188
- s. rhetoric
- rhyme 1209; 1314; 1457;
 1560-1561; 1688
- Semitic influence 1300-1301
- sentence connection 28; 277; 293;
921; 1119-1120
- sentence structure, s. here pointed style, and verb
- sententiae* 47; 144; 158; 160; 211;
 258; 313; 394; 514; 687; 736;
952; 999; 1012; 1077; 1089-1090;
1118; 1151; 1178; 1350; 1540
- style, sketchy 395; 603
- subordination 28; 276
- synonyms: eliminated 416; variation of 1005; accumulated 29; 398;
 cf. 493-494; 543; differentiated 1003; intended 1058; not distinguished systematically 1118
- syntax, biblical 1688
- tautology 966
- technical terms 293 n. 1; 506;
1118; 1179; 1257; 1268; 1620;
1623; 1700
- tenses: perfect 687; present, historic 124; 382; 417
- terms of abuse 222; 1600; 1650
- 'un-poetic' words 686; 952
- usage, good linguistic 418-419;
1437
- verb, final position 28; initial position 417
- verba propria* 416; 980-981; 1437
- vocabulary 31; 35-36; 149;
 222-223; 246; 294; 382; 386-387;
 398; 445-448; 544-545; 686-687;
 723; 758; 775; 806; 849; 882;
1089; 1179-1180; 1456-1457;
 1689-1690
- vulgarisms 344; 429; 568; 604;
 882; 1046; 1057; 1209;
1227-1228; 1301-1302; 1688
- wealth of forms 27-28
- word architecture 28; 115; 137;
 158; 293; 737
- wordplay 189; 1046; 1077; 1721;
 cf. also puns
- zeugma 938; 1119; 1257
- language, theory of 67-68; 259-260;
 296-298; 375; 418-419; 446-448;
 583-585; 600-601; 604-605; 1295
 analogy, analogists 1258; 1269

- anomaly, anomalists 1243; cf. 1270 change of linguistic usage 1185 comparative linguists 159; 160;
 391; 1258–1259; 1475 criticism of language as social criticism 448–449; 1228–1231
 etymology 1490; 1597
 euphony 1269
 knowledge of the world 607
 linguistic awareness 1324
 linguistics: stylistics 1472–1473
 linguistics: syntax 605; 1472; 1479 new words, creation of 293; 419;
 506–507; 545; 806 parts of speech 1471
 purism 1258
 words and thoughts 259; 262
 La Rochefoucauld 1198
 Laso de Oropesa, Martín 928
 Latin, s. language and style;
 s. also reception, Latinization
 Latini, Brunetto 1732
laudatio funebris 37; 46; 364; 409; 467;
 473; 489; 521; 875; 1106; 1148;
 1633; 1636; 1650
 law, Roman 491–630; 31; 46; 63–64;
 510
 Republican period 631–637
 Augustan period 887–891;
647–648
 early imperial period 275–277
 middle and late imperial period
1500–1525
bona fides, s. fides
boni mores 629
 casuistic approach 621; 624; 1277;
 1501; 1505; 1507; 1512; 1515;
 cf. 1079–1080
 commentaries, juridical 622–623;
 634; 636; 890; 1277; 1501–1503;
 1506–1507; 1514–1515; 1524
constitutiones principum 1275–1277;
 1511–1513
Digesta 621
disputationes 621
edicta 1275; 1509
epistulae 1276
 general surveys 1276
 imperial legislation 887–888; 1504;
 1508–1509; 1514–1515
institutiones 623; 635
 international law 558; 866;
 s. also (here) ius naturale
ius 141; 627–628; 1507
ius civile 623; 628; 635
ius gentium 63; 618, 629
ius naturale 63; 509; 558; 618; 629;
 638; 1507; 1680–1681
ius respondendi 620; 648, 888; 1276
 s. iustitia
responsa of juriconsults 627; 634;
 890; 1504–1506
 jurisprudence 911
 jurists in administration 1500
 jurists becoming officials 1504
 jurists coming from provinces 1502–1503
 language and style of famous jurists 625 law created by jurists 617;
 888–889; 1504; 1508
leges datae 1275
legis actiones 47; 633
 legislation by the people 1275–1277
 s. letter, juridical
lex 1275; 1508–1509
mandata principis 1276
 monographs, juridical 624;
1276–1277
 natural law, s. (here) ius naturale oratio principis (ad senatum) 1509
 pandects 621; 1522
 post-Theodosian novellae 1519
 praetorial edict 637
 private law, special importance 628–629
 professional ideal of jurists 625–627
quaestiones 621; 1505
 and rhetoric 1252–1253
 rooted in natural law 629
 schools of law 888–890;
1276–1277; 1295; 1513–1514
senatus consulta 637; 888; 1275; 1509 sources 275–276; 1509 subjective rights, special significance of 617; 626
summum ius summa iniuria 635–636 systematization attempted 637;
1277
 s. Twelve Tables
 'vulgar law' (so-called) 1510–1511
 Leibniz 1233; 1607
 Lenz, J. M. R. 201

- Leo I, Pope 1550
 León, Luis de 734
 Leon of Pella 1534
 Leopardi, Giacomo 307; 783; 1418
 Leroy, Guillaume 698
 Lesage, Alain René 1462
 Lessing 199; 201; 229; 235; 354; 735;
     996; 1006; 1053; 1059; 1197; 1234;
     1329; 1614
 Lester, R. 202
lex, s. law
 Lexicography, s. technical writings
Lex Romana Burgundionum 1519
Lex Romana Visigothorum 1518-1519
 Libanius 474; 512; 1423
libertas 11-12; 448; 629; 843; 1080;
     1090; 1118; 1121; 1127; 1132; 1134;
     1415-1416; s. also freedom
 Lichtenberg, Georg Christoph 309;
     1140
 Licinius, s. Crassus
 Licinius Macer, C. 387-388; 366;
     368; 839; 916
 Licinius Macer Calvus, C. 56; 333;
     337; 347; 492; 772; 1246
 Licinius Mucianus 1266 legacy-hunting 715; 1021-1022;
     1216-1217
 letter, epistle 511-517; 62; 410; 480;
     544; 904; 1146-1157; 1168-1169;
     1174-1175; 1198; 1298; 1322;
     1324-1325; 1341; 1360; 1435;
     1444-1445; 1496; 1570; 1582; 1633;
     1637; 1648-1649; 1672; 1683;
     1688-1689
 collections of: s. Ambrose,
     Augustine, Cicero, Jerome, Ovid,
     Pliny the Younger, Sidonius,
     Symmachus
 dedication 336-340; 796-798; 950;
     1045; 1266; 1321; 1326; 1380
 exegetical 1648
 juridical 621; 891; 1276
 philosophical 515
 poetic and didactic 717-718;
     724-725
 rhetorical elements 516
 verse epistle, elegiac 793; 795-811
 verse epistle, moral 254-255;
     716-719; 727-730; 733; 736
 Liberal Arts, s. artes liberales libraries 215; 408; 500; 594; 597
     n. 1; 644; 830; 1027; 1099; 1283;
     1290; 1433; 1480; 1498; 1743 replaced by independent thought 1719 love in Catullus 72-73
     in comedy 92
     as destiny 336; 811
     earthly and celestial 1458
     in the elegists 743-752; 759; 764-793; 799-801; 810-811
     in Horace 730
     as lifestyle and program 749-751;
     759; 779-781
     in Lucilius 260-262
     in Lucretius 286
     and marriage 227-228; 791; 798;
     811; 875; 1255; 1320
     and partnership 72-73; 350-351;
     s. sexuality
     sensuous and spiritual 72-73
     and techné 275
     in Terence 228
     in Virgil 693
 literary criticism (theory)
     s. the paragraphs 'Reflections on Literature' in all chapters on authors and genres
     s. Auctor 'On the Sublime'
     Aristotelian, s. drama; s. Aristotle
     Callimachean 138-140; 255-256;
     258-259; 346-349; 725; 777-779;
     807-810
     critical attitude to tradition 899;
     922; 1185-1186
     criticism of style 1399
     Epicurean 727
     and epistemology 1691-1695 generic poetics 597; 1473; biblical poetics 1303; s. Diomedes;
     s. literary genres
     s. identity
     s. inspiration
     mythological poetry, criticized 1026
     Peripatetic, s. historiography,
     dramatic technique
     Platonic 268; 322; 587
     poema, poesis, poetice 605 poetics 90-93; 1363-1364; 1473;
     s. Neoptolemus of Parium poetics, Christian 1353; 1363;
     1367; 1602; 1629

- poetics, didactic orientation 1185;
1363–1364
- poetics of praise 1315; 1367
- poetics of transfiguration 1367
- poetry as vocation 1367; s. poet
- 'prose criticism' 1250
- s. also rhetoric
- school rhetoric, criticized
1209–1210
- Stoic, s. brevitas; s. Stoic philosophy
- s. technical writings, grammar and metrics
- and theory of signs 1691–1695
- Virgil, orator or poet 1411
- writers of comedies, assessment
606; s. also Volcacius
- literary genres
- s. the sections 'Sources, Models, and Genres' in the individual chapters on authors; s. also individual genres
- Republican period (overview)
61–66
- Augustan period (overview)
646–650
- early imperial period (overview)
903–905
- middle and late imperial period
(overview) 1296–1300
- change of 22; 177; 247; 660–661;
805–806; 917–920; 1296–1297
- characteristic features of genres
16–19; 76; 101–102; 244; 742;
747
- Christian 1297–1298
- Christianized 1304; 1081–1082
- conditions of the rise of 7–12;
55–58; 643–645; 897–902;
1285–1294
- crossing of genres 11; 15; 136;
186–187; 242; 254–255; 259;
267; 273; 374; 475; 602; 801–802;
805; 1044; 1106–1107; 1223;
1296–1298; 1333; 1360
- differences (drama versus epic)
83–84; (in Horace) 724
- evolution of certain types of texts into literature 17; 61–62;
100–101; 384; 412; 493; 513; 951;
1040–1052
- generic composition 15; 340;
cf. 757
- generic style and reader's expectations 11; 20–22; 288–289;
493; 498; 515; 535–536; 543;
810
- genre and individual 14–21;
s. also individual
- historical truthfulness 38–39; 68;
86; 119; 271; 454; s. also truth, truthfulness
- meter and genre, connection interrupted 1299–1300
- s. preliterary texts, s. also oral style
- the rise of genres 18–19; 37;
46–47; 62; 196–198; 241–242;
272–273; 743–744; 788; 801
- subdivision of genres 15; 326–327;
340; 718; 946–948; 1040–1044;
1323–1324
- system of 1473; cf. 1259
- literary history
- efforts of classical authors 156;
263–264; 464–465 495–496; 530;
597; 600–601; 610–611; 725;
1067–1068; 1071–1072; 1256;
1258–1259; 1354; 1649; 1656;
and art history 1068
- Roman, 'alternation' of Greek and Roman literatures 12; 67;
1294–1296
- Roman, periods 10–12; 58–59;
644–646; 651
- Roman, phases and counterphases
9–12; 55–57; 256; 646–648
- Roman, problematic aspects 1–2
- s. regenerative force of Roman literature
- writings on 1649; 1656; s. here
efforts of classical authors
- literary technique
- s. character portrayal
- citation, s. reception
- 'collage' 1635
- descriptions 81–82; 343; 881;
935–937; 947–948; 1155;
1224–1226; 1333; 1339–1341;
1360; 1362; 1454; 1478; s. also allegory
- dreams 133; 139; 157; 532; 553;
cf. 541; 1216; 1585
- epilogue 804; 1357; 1427
- s. excursus
- s. imagery

- of individual authors, s. under their names
- in individual genres, s. the chapters on individual genres
- inversion: exchange of roles 221; 680–683; exchange of spheres (of narrative and simile) 684–685; reverse chronology 680–683; 1719
- monologue 1181; 1208; inner 1690
- s. narrative technique
- parody 257; 999; 1208–1210; 1218–1220 s. also comedy and drama
- s. peripeteia
- personification, s. allegory
- praefatio, prooemium*, introduction 69; 219; 273; 290–291; 380; 385; 441; 449; 537; 545; 567–569; 590–591; 963; 975; 1045; 1122; 1248; 1257; 1266; 1268; 1321; 1326; 1343; 1380; 1487; 1558; 1580
- praeteritio* 394
- s. prayer
- prophecy 88; 676; 694; 925; 932; 1199
- repetition 292; 294–295
- s. rhetoric
- sea storm (scene) 672; 678; 919; 1024; 1216
- s. simile
- stream of consciousness 921
- structural importance of ideas 26; 34–35
- s. structural principles
- s. synesis
- transitions (smooth) 720; 1117; 1181
- s. also translation
- transposition (in chronology) 1114
- travesty 257; 1219; 1327
- varietas* 339; 445; 1076; 1080
- visual elements 79; 152; 156–158; s. evidentia
- literature and history
- as a 'blueprint' for the future 5; 22; 52
- as individual achievement 15–21; 31–33; 329–330
- decline, reasons of 1027
- reacting to historical events 5; 19–20; 40; 52–53; 56–57; 59–60; 79; 119–120; 374; 860
- literature and society
- Republican period 51–75
- Augustan period 642–657
- early imperial period 897–902
- middle and late imperial period 1285–1294
- aristocracy in Gaul in late antiquity 1288–1289
- Athenaeum 1291
- authors as beneficent citizens 1153
- the 'beggar poet' 893
- s. burning of books
- Church and literature 10; 1292–1296; 1299
- classicism, conditioned by social status 1313
- clients as historians, s. historiography
- clients as poets 9; 32; 130; 214; 1050; 1345
- collegium scribarum et histrionum* 56; 112; 154
- 'commanded' poetry 1345
- competitions 90
- court epic 1299
- cultural regions,
- s. individual countries
- s. education
- emperors and authors 1345
- s. equites
- exile literature 8; 518; 650; 788–790; 809–810; 1188; 1714
- general conditions of the rise of literature 1–48
- grammatici*, importance for literature 1291; 1395
- Greeks as Latin authors 112–113; 944; 1331; 1420; cf. 944
- Hellenization of Roman society 1404
- imprisonment of authors 119; 196; 1709–1710
- institutions, importance for literature 1293
- language policy, Latin furthered by emperors 1292; Greek furthered by emperors 1291; 1293
- s. libraries
- monasteries 1; 1498; 1646–1647; 1658–1659; 1665

- monasticism and literature 1293 municipal aristocracy 54-55; 1061; 1064 nobility through intellectual achievements 1030-1031 patronage, s. Maecanas
 s. poets, groups of politics and literature 1253 poverty of intellectuals 1020 public 31-32; 39; 196; 226;
     s. also reader
 s. recitatio
 ritual roots of literature 36; 43-45;
     95; 97-99; 106
 school 9-10; 15; 22; 270; 425;
     581-582; 1260; 1288-1290;
     1293-1294; 1296; 1299;
     1468-1500; s. also declamatio;
     technical writings; grammar and metrics; rhetoric senatorial aristocracy 8; 53-56;
     858-871; 1293; 1492; 1616
 slaves as authors 1005
 social origin of authors 54-56; 620;
     645; s. also freedmen; equites; senators as authors; slaves; and, in individual chapters, the paragraphs 'life and dates'
     wandering theater troupes 90
 Livius Andronicus, L. 112-119; 9;
     44-45; 51; 66; 76-79; 86; 95-96;
     118; 122-123; 130-131; 132; 147;
     164; 324; 643; 711; 1178; 1653
 Livy 835-869; 8; 34; 38-39; 43; 64;
     95; 161; 363; 365-367; 374-375;
     379; 383; 385-387; 399; 402-403;
     428; 452; 455; 510; 546; 555; 558;
     643; 646-647; 651-653; 656; 752;
     802; 807; 809; 827-829; 833-834;
     870-871; 876; 898-899; 902; 915;
     962; 998; 1063-1065; 1070; 1072;
     1075; 1087-1089; 1091; 1093-1094;
     1110-1111; 1114; 1117; 1120; 1246;
     1371-1373; 1374-1376; 1381; 1385;
     1412-1417; 1423; 1683; 1746-1747
 logic 502; 508-509; 1167;
     1186-1187; 1451; 1454; 1160; 1488;
     1617-1618; 1624; 1686; 1710; 1753;
     1723-1724; 1728; 1732
 Logos, doctrine of 1306; 1545
     s. also theology
 Lomonosov, Michail V. 736
 Longus 660
 Lovati, Lovato 942; 1747
 Lucan 913-932; 8; 10; 16; 23;
     79-84; 86-88; 295; 697; 807; 814;
     826-827; 874; 897; 900; 902;
     905-907; 909; 944; 947; 953; 962;
     964; 966; 1008; 1014; 1048; 1087;
     1100; 1158; 1195; 1214; 1229; 1245;
     1323; 1342; 1349; 1359; 1392; 1412;
     1678; 1715; 1716
 Lucceius, L. (Q. f.) 545-546
 Lucian 471; 608; 611; 1122; 1177;
     1197; 1479; 1533; 1716
 Lucilius 250-266; 9; 15; 17; 55-57;
     66-68; 143; 152-155; 159; 214;
     241-248; 271; 279; 289; 322; 330;
     369; 507; 584; 602; 609; 660; 714;
     718-719; 725; 733; 902; 998; 1009;
     1021; 1174-1175; 1186-1187; 1231;
     1323-1325; 1470; 1587; 1684
 Lucullus, L. 503; 1743
 Ludwig the German 1733
 Lucillius, epigrammatist 1042-1043;
     1047
 Lucretius 282-320; 9-10; 14; 39; 58;
     62; 65; 68-72; 84; 105; 261; 264;
     267-281; 307-313; 353; 426; 437;
     445; 501; 505; 507-508; 566; 570;
     601; 606; 641; 646; 654; 669; 678;
     686; 718; 733; 757; 881; 904; 907;
     916; 974; 976-977; 979; 981; 984;
     1022; 1187; 1273; 1323; 1356; 1359;
     1362; 1534; 1543; 1572; 1587; 1590;
     1598; 1600; 1602; 1604; 1628; 1701;
     1718; 1746-1747
 Lupus of Ferrières 556; 1052; 1081;
     1193; 1262; 1406; 1624; 1746
 Luscius Lanuvinus 208; 210; 212;
     225-226; 251; 255
 Lutatius Catulus Q. 333; 341; 361;
     383; 491; 1065
 Lutatius Daphnis 361
 Luther 200; 556; 701; 1006; 1015;
     1033; 1262; 1356; 1630; 1653; 1659;
     1702
 Luxurius 1311
 Lycophron 93; 676
 Lydgate, John 1732
 Lygdamus 763-764
 Lycus of Rhegium 397
 lyric 18; 66; 321-331; 334-359;
     711-741; 903; 944-959; 1233;

- 1310-1330; 1357-1370; 1627-1631; 1638
- s. dedicatory poem
  - in drama 324-325
  - s. drinking songs
  - s. also epigram
  - genres of, s. literary genres
  - individual creation 18
  - s. invitation, poems of
  - 'melic' 321
  - minor forms 330
  - 'objective' 1342-1343
  - ode 327; 711-747
  - s. occasional poems
  - s. paraclausithyron
  - s. also poetry
  - s. propempticon
  - reflecting society 329-330
  - rhetorical influence 1325
  - 'slow' beginnings of poems 345
- Lysias 473; 531
- Maccabeans 1598
- Machiavelli 234; 425; 865; 1235
- machines, descriptions of, s. literary technique, descriptions
- Macon 207
- Macrobius 1485-1491; 77; 305; 376; 455; 532; 610; 697; 205; 1218; 1303; 1330; 1406; 1444; 1461; 1473-1474; 1482-1483; 1635; 1689; 1714-1715; 1745
- Macropedius 234
- Maecenas (and patronage) 7; 9; 55; 329; 644; 668; 711; 770; 1039; 1290-1291; 1337; 1400; 1405; 1495
- s. also literature and society
- Maecenas Melissus, C. 98
- magic 261; 670 (ed. 8); 714; 792; 1215-1216; 1225; 1450-1452; 1459
- Mago, Carthaginian 601
- Maikov, A. N. 1235
- mala voluntas* 1696
- Malalas, s. Johannes
- Mallarmé, Stéphane 701
- Mamertinus 1439
- man, idea of 974-975; 1191-1192; 1267; 1478; 1595-1596; 1603; 1607-1608
- anthropocentric view 1270-1273; 1607
  - s. character portrayal
- Christian 1605
- s. conversion, theme of
  - creativity 809-810; 910; 1304; 1487
  - dignity of man 1608
  - divine nature of man 1611
  - s. emancipation of the individual
  - s. identity
  - s. individual
  - limits of knowledge 1727
  - multifaceted 692
  - philosophy at the service of active life 508-510; 939; 1307
  - s. self-knowledge and self-criticism
  - s. subjectivity
  - surpassing boundaries (experience of the Roman revolution 73); voyage as a symbol 826; Caesar at Massilia 924
  - upright stature, contemplation of the firmament, knowledge of God; intellectual pursuits 500; 978-982; 1187; 1601; 1604
  - s. will, free
- Mancini-Nivernais, Duke of 762
- Manetho 1611
- Manichaeans, Manichaeism 1595; 1617; 1622; 1664; 1666; 1668-1669; 1682; 1686
- Manilius, didactic poet 972-985; 277; 279-281; 304; 502; 653; 696; 875; 898; 904; 908; 955; 986; 1078; 1611
- Manilius, Manius, jurist 635
- Mans, Peletier du 733
- mansuetudo* 451
- Mantovano, Publio Filippo 234
- Mantuanus, s. Baptista
- Map (Mapes), Walter 1052
- maps, s. technical writings
- Marbod of Rennes 1052
- Marcellus (Empiricus), medical writer 1477
- Marcellus, jurist, s. Ulpius
- Marcianus 1507; 1523
- Marcion, Marcionites 1358; 1534; 1544; 1583; 1586; 1591
- Marcus Aurelius 39; 474; 499; 503; 506; 516; 1195; 1295; 1436-1437; 1450
- Marcus Valerius (12th century) 994
- Maréchal 309
- Marinus 469

- Marius Maximus 1297; 1323; 1371;
1374; 1389; 1406
- Marius Victor, Claudius 942; 1316
- Marius Victorinus Afer 1616-1627;
44; 375; 507; 1298; 1300; 1313;
1471; 1632; 1639; 1662; 1664; 1682;
1710; 1713; 1720
- Marlowe, Christopher 815; 928
- Marmion, Shackerley 1462
- Marolles, Abbé de 308
- Marot, Clément 701
- marriage, s. women
- Marston, John 1015
- Marsus, s. Domitius
- Martial 1038-1055; 9; 243; 271;
325-326; 332-333; 353; 455; 761;
782; 825-826; 897; 901; 909; 926;
932; 944; 969; 980; 993; 1006; 1014;
1019; 1021; 1031; 1056-1057; 1147;
1151; 1174; 1310; 1329; 1743; 1747
- Martianus Capella 1491-1494;
580-581; 244; 353; 596; 611; 926;
1272; 1287; 1298; 1307; 1475; 1489;
1713
- martyrs and acts of martyrs
1527-1528; 924; 926; 1305;
1358-1360; 1364; 1537; 1603
- Marullus 306; 1246
- Marx, Karl 311
- Masurius Sabinus 623; 1276; 1479
- materialism 307-313; 1544-1545
s. Manichaeans
- mathematics
as a pattern of thought 1365
s. technical writings, arithmetic
- Matus 333
- Maximianus 747; 1299; 1312
- May, Thomas 928
- Medicina Plinii* 1272
- medicine 577-578; 261-262; 288;
395; 565-566; 596; 793; 1239-1240;
1267; 1477-1478
diet 1240
ethics, medical 1240; 1639 history of 1240 medication 1240
prescriptions 395
- Meges of Sidon 1239
- Mela, s. Pomponius
- Melanchthon 233; 425; 1196; 1262;
1273; 1659
- Meleager 332; 340
- Melito of Sardis 1533-1535; 1570
- Memmius, C. 333
- memoirs 383-384; 405-432; 468;
1422
- memory 270; 273; 1246; 1253; 1255;
1314; 1574; 1675; 1683; 1697; 1711
- Menander 11; 22; 65; 92; 94; 98;
103-104; 170-172; 174-175;
177-178; 180-183; 185; 187;
190-191; 194; 197; 200-201;
207-213; 217-218; 222-231; 255;
773; 980; 1031; 1205; 1217; 1426;
1481
- Menander of Laodicea, rhetor 1344
- Menestratus 1246
- Menippea*, s. satire, Menippean
- Menippus of Gadara 242; 254; 600;
602; 605-607; 1177; 1221
- metaphors, taken literally (as a type of joke) 188
- Merezhkovsky, D. S. 1431
- Mesa, Cristobal de 698
- Messala Corvinus, M. Valerius 787;
874; 1120; 1394
- Messalinus 874
- metaphors, s. imagery
- Metellus Numidicus, Q. Caecilius
436; 494; 584
- Metellus Scipio 409
- metempsychosis 138-139; 609
and metamorphosis 810
- metonymy, s. language and style
- metrics 43-45; 76-77; 115; 136-138;
150; 190-192; 223-224; 252-253;
293-294; 328; 345-346; 544; 604;
650; 688; 723-724; 734; 749; 758;
806; 1044; 1058; 1242; 1290; 1312;
1322; 1344; 1363; 1471-1472; 1492;
1594; 1618; 1629; 1638; 1717; 1720;
1732
- accentuated 1300
asclepiad 1299
choliamb 1008; 1056
distich (couplet), elegiac 68; 742;
749; 758; 764; 806
hendecasyllabic 345; 1056
hexameter 67; 78; 83; 115;
136-137; 246; 253; 345-346;
687-688; 724; 806; 1012; 1026
- imitation of classical meter in modern languages 734-735
with n. 1

- s. also prose rhythm
 Saturnian 43; 45; 83; 115; 134
senarius and trimeter 1004
 spondees 294; 688; 967 syllable quantities neglected 44;
 115; 1313; 1688
versus quadratus 1311
- Meivius 824
- Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand 699; 929;
1431; 1462
- Meyfart, J. Matth. 1262
- Michel, Guillaume 1461
- Mickel, Karl 1462
- Mickiewicz, Adam Bernard 984
- Milan 1287
- military dictatorship 53–54; 641–643;
 1031; 1132–1133
- military satire 1021
- militia Christi*, s. imagery, military
- Milton 77; 699; 701; 733; 735; 816;
 928; 1253; 1317; 1349
- Mimnermus 742
- mime, s. comedy
- Minucius Felix 1554–1568; 144; 305;
 402; 456; 505; 507; 555; 1281;
 1287; 1413; 1438; 1550; 1587;
 1591; 1598–1599; 1601; 1605;
 1683; 1687
- 'miscellaneous' writing 1480; 1486
- misericordia* 420; 451; 1166; 1613
- Mithras, cult of, s. mystery cults
- mnemonics, mnemotechny, s. memory
- moderatio* 728; 843; 1128; 1402
- Modestinus 1512; 1516
- Modoin of Autun 700; 994
- Molière 182; 201; 234; 307; 1213
- Molon, Apollonius 60; 518; 522; 542
- monarchy, s. ruler
- monasteries, s. literature and society
 conditions
- monastic rules 1648
- monasticism, s. literature and society, monasteries
- Mondot 733
- monograph, historical, s. historiography
- monotheism, s. God, idea of
- Montaigne 233; 308; 425; 702; 733;
 816; 865; 928; 1033; 1140; 1155;
 1273; 1328; 1350; 1702
- Montanism 1529
- Montanistic writings 1531–1532
- Montemayor, Jorge of 701
- Montesquieu 866; 1350; 1418
- Monteverdi 819
- moon, travel to the 1222
- moral and ascetic writings 1633
- moral and pastoral theology, writings on 1671
- moralists 306; 732–733; 738; 910;
 1078; 1080; 1082; 1198
- moralizing, s. historiography; satire
- mores* 368; 857; s. values, Roman
boni 626; 628
- Morgenstern, Christian 737
- Mörke 354; 762
- Morris, William 1462
- Moscherosch, Johann Michael 1016
- Mozart 1198
- Mucius Scaevola, P. 371; 635
- Mucius Scaevola, Q. (augur) 333;
 517; 627; 635
- Mucius Scaevola, Q. (pontifex)
 63–64; 491; 623; 629; 635; 1519
- Müller, Heiner 737
- Mummus 254
- municipal aristocracy, s. literature and society
- Muretus 307
- Murner, Thomas 698
- Musaeus 270
- Muses, invocation of, s. inspiration
- music 579; 101–102; 112–113; 138;
 152; 177–178; 190–192; 321–327;
 355; 663–664; 702–712; 718; 734;
 819; 883; 979–980; 1255; 1259;
 1262; 1476; 1488; 1492–1493;
1541; 1638; 1642; 1687; 1691;
1708; 1710; 1713; 1720; 1723;
 1732; 1733
- Musonius Rufus, C. 900; 1129; 1149
- Mussato, Albertino 942; 1196
- Mustio 1478
- mysteries
 cults of 39; 349; 608; 654–655;
 812; 908; 1449; 1537; 1560; 1611;
 1613; s. also Dionysus, cult of;
 Isis, cult of language of 300; 1457
- mysterium* 1540
- mythography, s. technical writings
- myths, mythology 23; 26; 31; 34; 43;
 79; 82; 86; 125; 162; 300; 655–656;
 679; 693–694; 748; 772–774;
 810–811; 1225; 1350; 1474; 1718

- accepted as 'metonymies' 297 creation of 127; 159; 655-656; 694-695
 criticism of 152; 297-298; 1533;
1564; 1586; 1588; s. also allegorical exegesis; religion, criticism of; typological
 interpretation
 outshone by reality 805; 1046; 1345 reinterpreted 1717-1718
 secularized 811
- Naevius 119-129; 6; 11; 16; 51; 55;
 67; 78-79; 81; 83; 86; 96; 115; 117;
 131-132; 164; 176; 189; 193; 195;
 211-212; 226; 250; 368; 373; 397;
 584; 675; 688; 968
- Naples 503
- narrative technique 397; 414-415;
 427-428; 443-444; 679; 803-807;
 826; 842-844; 1087-1088;
1111-1117; 1424-1425; 1454-1456;
 1649-1650
 dramatic ('tragic') 413-414; 438;
 443-444
 first person (sing.) 323; 748; 1208; 1223; 1226; 1454; 1558; 1683;
 s. also roles, assumed by the 'lyric ego'
 first person (plur.) 428; 1424
 leitmotifs 1454-1455
 story within the story, s. structural principles
 third person 346; 413
- Naso, Eckart von 818
- nature 294-295; 344; 670-671;
 683-685; 690-693; 695; 793-796;
 810; 916-917; 954; 990-992; 1241;
1327; (personified) 1341; 1497
- naturalism 776
- natural law, s. law
- natural philosophy 262; 282-320;
 653-656; 670-671; 690-695;
 779-781; 810-811; 870-871; 904;
981; 1158; 1160-1161; 1167-1168;
1173; 1175-1176; 1186; 1195; 1349;
1565; 1610-1611; 1675; 1692-1693
- natural science
 s. natural philosophy; physics
 s. also technical writings, agriculture, medicine; theologia tripartita
- Nazarius 1439
- Nechepso-Petosiris 1266
- Neckam, Alexander 1331; 1348
negotium 25; 37; 72; 545
- Nemesianus 272; 661; 664-666; 700;
994; 1299; 1312
- neologisms, s. language and style
- Neoplatonism, s. Plato, Platonism
- Neoptolemus of Parium 279; 719
- Neopythagoreans, s. Pythagoras,
 Pythagoreans
- neoterics 60; 84; 329-330; 347
- Nepos, Cornelius 476-488; 55-56;
 67; 337; 347; 352-353; 362; 468;
 470; 601; 1063; 1075; 1079; 1106;
1120; 1266; 1393-1394; 1405; 1479
- Nepotianus 1077; 1081
- Neratius Priscus, L. 623; 1276; 1500
- Nero 900-901
- New Academic philosophy, skeptical,
 s. Plato, Platonism
- Newton, Isaac 308; 311-312
- Nicander 267; 270; 273; 275;
 278-279; 801
- Nicarchus 1042
- Nicene Creed 1550
- Nicetes Sacerdos 1146
- Nicomachus of Gerasa 1713; 1724
- Nicomachus, s. Virius
- Nietzsche 28; 310; 425; 457; 737;
1035; 1140; 1198; 1235; 1734
- Nigidius Figulus 282; 504; 566; 585;
 654; 974; 1266; 1479
- Nonius Marcellus 576; 1469-1471;
 117; 127; 143; 264; 305; 595; 610;
 1483
- Nonnus of Panopolis 1348
- Notker III, Labeo, 'the German' 1494;
 1624; 1732
- Novatianus 1581-1584; 1281; 1550
- novels 1205-1211; 905; 1211-1238;
1297; 1380; 1390; 1449-1467; 1650;
1683-1684
- autobiographical 1210
- comic 1206
- conditions of their rise 1206-1207
 and epic 1207
- genres of 1205-1206
- historical 1206
- and historiography 1208
- neighboring genres 1208
- 'realism' as a problem 1207-1208

- roman à clé* 1214
 scenes 1208
 Novius 99
numen 34
 numerology 1490
 Nythart, Hans 235

obscuritas 1057; 1723
 Obsequens, Julius 1379; 864; 1373
 Occam, William 1733 occasional poems 709-710; 905; 947;
     951; 1041; 1323-1324
 Octavius Hirsennus 584
 Octavius Lampadio 584
 Odo of Meung 1052
 officialese, s. language and style
 Ofilius 637; 889; 891
omnipotens 136; 144
 Opilius 1394
 Opitz, Martin 735; 1015; 1041
 Oppius 1393
 Optatianus Porfyrius, P. 1310
 Optatus 1693
 oral style 46; 61; 188; 490; 624; 631;
     1041; s. also pre-literary texts
orare 1302; s. also prayer
orator, ideal 495-497; 528-531; 1151; 1259-1260
 oratory 19-20; 33-34; 489-499
     s. also speech
     Republican period 61-62; 390-403;
         408-409; 436; 517-563
     Augustan period 646-647; 873-875
     imperial period 1146-1157;
         1435-1436; 1439-1448
     decline of 1121; 1213-1214;
         1250-1251; 1255
     political influence 489-490;
         497-498; 646-647; 873-874
 Orbilius 585; 823
 Oribasius 1478
 Orff, Carl 355
 Origen, Origenists 501; 1292; 1294;
     1304; 1383; 1582; 1587; 1619; 1621;
     1627-1628; 1634-1635; 1638;
     1646-1649; 1656; 1662-1663; 1669;
     1682; 1745
 Orosius 1384-1387; 575-576; 425;
     433; 864; 872; 1064; 1084; 1140;
     1377; 1381; 1412; 1417 orthography, s. language
     and style
 Osborn of Gloucester 212
 Ostroumov, Lev 929
otium 25; 37-38; 66; 72; 88; 140;
     545; 651; 759; 1167; 1325
 Otto of Freising 556; 1387
 Ovid 786-823; 8-9; 12; 16; 18; 22;
     66; 79-82; 84-85; 88; 97; 107; 143;
     153; 161-162; 260; 263; 267;
     270-280; 293; 295; 302; 304; 328;
     348; 353; 420; 468; 502; 504;
     513-516; 610; 644; 646-647;
     649-655; 669; 696; 724; 731;
     744-751; 755; 757-758; 761; 764;
     773; 782; 784; 824-827; 874-877;
     898; 900; 902; 904; 908-909;
     916-917; 927; 934-935; 947;
     949-950; 952; 975-976; 984; 1012;
     1043; 1048-1049; 1056-1057; 1067;
     1077; 1080; 1082; 1158; 1174-1175;
     1178; 1197; 1246; 1312; 1323; 1333;
     1342-1343; 1345-1346; 1349;
     1360-1362; 1444; 1493; 1560;
     1597-1598; 1684; 1696; 1714; 1716;
     1718; 1728; 1743; 1746-1747
 Owen, John 1052

 Pacatus 1439
 Pachomius of Egypt 1648
 Pacuvius 146-154; 57; 96; 105-106;
     117; 138; 143; 154-155; 159; 164;
     189; 207; 210; 213; 243; 254; 501
 Paetus Thrasca, P. 900; 1008; 1149
 Paecianus 1377
 pacifism 1640
paganus 1303
 painting, s. fine arts
 Palaemon, s. Remmius
 Palaephatus 1385
 Palladio, Andrea 884
 Palladius of Helenopolis 471
 Palladius Rutilius Taurus, P.
     572-573; 568; 1477
 Palliata, s. comedy
 Paludan-Müller, Frederik 1462 pamphlets 459; 522-523 (the so-called Actio Secunda in Verrem); 528;
     1298; 1611; 1627-1628; 1633; 1648;
     1683
 Panaetius 60; 218; 256; 261-262;
     490; 502; 535; 538; 548; 609;
     1176-1177; 1189
 Pañcatantra 1222

- Panegyrici Latini 1439-1442
panegyricus, panegyrici 1147-1150; 1322;
1341-1342; 1349; 1413-1414; 1423; 1580
 s. also epic, panegyric; rulers, panegyrics of Panegyricus Messallae 764-765
pantomimus 724
 Paola da Perugia 1014
 Papias 1052; 1624
 Papinianus 621; 625-626; 1505-1506;
 1512; 1516; 1519
 Papinius, s. Statius
 Papirianus 1496
 Papirius Carbo, C. 494
 Papirius, early jurist 631
 Papirius Fabianus 876; 1158; 1175;
1177; 1266
parabola 1301
 paradox
 as a pattern of thought 978; 1191
 of faith 1542
 Stoic 1166
 in style 1333; 1651
paraclausithyron 756 parallel passages, treacherous 1694 parallel structures, s. language and style; structural principles parenthesis, s. language and style
 Parini, Giuseppe 1016; 1034
 Parker, Douglas 1186
 Parmenides 270; 276-277; 289
 Parny, Evariste-Désiré de Forges de 762 parody, s. literary technique
 Parrhasius, A. J. 762
 Parthenius 634
 Pascal, Blaise 308; 1198; 1591-1592;
1702
 Passenus Paulus 783
Passio Sanctorum Scillitanorum 1527
 pastoral, s. bucolic
 pastoral epistles 1577
 Pater, Walter 1311; 1462
 Paterno, Lodovico 1033
 Paternus 1478
pathos 66; 158; 1181; 1196
 in Cicero 540
 in comedy 211
 s. also emotions and irony in Horace 722 and Ovid 804
 in Juvenal 1022
 in Lucan 918
 revalorization in theory 530
 in Virgil 688 (gravidus)
patientia negative 1132
 Patricius 474
 patriotism, s. historiography, patriotic character patronage, s. Maecenas
 Paul, Acts of -and Thecla 1297
 Paul, apostle 1245; 1382; 1561; 1590;
1603; 1618; 1621-1622; 1641; 1651;
1665-1666; 1683; 1685; 1695; 1702 compared with Petronius 1234-1235
 spurious correspondence with
 Seneca 1173
 Paulinus of Milan 472-473; 1297;
 1580; 1633; 1641
 Paulinus of Nola 517; 661; 1315;
1321-1322; 1328; 1354; 1383; 1437
 Paulinus of Pella 1315; 1328
 Paulus Diaconus 610; 878; 1377
 Paulus, jurist 622; 1276; 1506-1507;
 1510-1512; 1516; 1522
Pauli sententiae 1511; 1513
 Paulus quaestor 1310
 Pausanias 277; 1294
pax 759-760; 781-782; 853;
1353-1354
pax deorum 136
pax Romana 1416
 peace, s. pax
 pedagogy, s. education
 Pelagius, Pelagians 1358; 1636; 1648;
1666-1667; 1670
 Pelagionius 1477
 Penderecki, Krzysztof 817
 Pentadius 1041
perceptio 549
Peregrinatio Egeriae (Aetheriae) 1650
 Pergamum 59; 159; 501-502; 584
 Perilla 798; 809
 Peripatetic philosophy 92; 288; 466;
 475; 536-538; 547; 587-588; 600;
 870; 1159; 1162; 1187; s. also Aristotle and Theophrastus peripeteia 183; 229; 1220
 Perotti, Niccolò 1066; 1052
 Persius 1008-1019; 15; 17; 139; 152;
 241-248; 263; 280; 304; 732; 825;
900; 902; 905-906; 913; 980;

- 1021–1022; 1024–1026; 1033–1035;
 1048; 1057; 1100; 1231; 1243; 1392;
 1655; 1683; 1745
persona 910; 1725
 personal poetry 6; 16; 33; 66; 70;
 248–264; 325; 334–359; 467–468;
 711–741; 1044; 1314–1315; 1326
 personality, principle of 1517–1518
 personification, s. allegory
 Perugino 1082
Pervigilium Veneris 1295; 1311
 Petrarch 144; 200; 233; 353; 425;
 456; 556; 611; 663; 697; 733; 815;
 864; 956; 969; 994; 1015; 1033;
 1081; 1093; 1155; 1242; 1262; 1328;
 1349; 1407; 1417; 1607; 1702;
 1746–1747
 Petronius 1211–1238; 8; 243; 246;
 353; 611; 857; 903–906; 916; 925;
 1174; 1205–1206; 1208; 1312;
 1746–1747
 Petrucci, Giovanni A. 354
 Peter of Blois 1052
 Petrus de Crescentiis 611
 Petrus Diaconus 885
 Petrus Martyr de Angleria 1349
 Phaedrus, author of fables
 1002–1007; 243; 898; 909;
 996–1002; 1043; 1072; 1331
 Phaedrus, Epicurean 537; 548
 Phaenias of Eresus 1394
 Phanocles 743; 801; 1385
 Philemon, author of comedies 94;
 171; 207
 Philetas 743; 772
 Philinus of Acragas 122
 Philip of Leiden 1350
 Philiscus 499
 Philodemus of Gadara 283; 289; 296;
 503; 537; 1223; 1590
 Philo Alexandrinus (Judaeus) 911;
 1304–1306; 1604; 1634; 1638; 1641;
 1648; 1678; 1682
 philology, philologus 140; 583–584; 1242 apothecosis of 1493
   negative view of 1177
   and philosophy 1185–1186
   s. also technical writings, grammar
 Philon of Larissa 537; 547; 550; 609 philosophers
   as enemies of the truth 1603
   expelled from Rome 499; 909–910; 1305 as ‘gods’ 301; s. also apotheosis as ‘patriarchs of heretics’ 1543 supported by the state 1292
 philosophy 499–511; 256–257;
 531–539; 547–550; 598–599;
 875–877; 1105–1106; 1129;
 1158–1204; 1451–1452; 1458–1460;
 1594–1595; 1616–1627; 1638–1639;
 1664–1738
   anthropology 908; 1198;
   s. also man, idea of aptum, s. rhetoric and architecture 883
   authors 267–320; 499–511;
   517–563; 837; 875–877; 972–985;
   1158–1204; 1449–1467;
   1485–1491; 1616–1627;
   1664–1738
   cardinal virtues 1640
   and Christianity 1304; 1616; 1621;
   1627; 1673; 1687
   of civilization 302
   considered as a ‘tool’ 509 convergence of philosophical schools 547–548
   s. conversion
   dialectics 1186
   dialogue as a principle 505–506 failure of 349; 779
   genres of philosophical writings 505–506; s. also didactic poems
   in didactic poems 275–276;
   279–281
   duties, doctrine of 534; 537; 548; 557; 1079
   s. emotions and emperors 504; 909; 1305 enmity to 8; 499; 508; 909–910;
   1250; 1436
   ethics, preference for 509; 1186
   examples, practical 506
   general overview of 547–548; 1161
   of history 510; 608; 665;
   s. also history
   infinity, conceived
   philosophically 302
   as ‘initiation’ 1187
   and the language of mystery cults 908

- and law 141; 510; 627-629; 635
of life 329; 653-654; 876; 1177; 1198 literary use of 198; 499-511; 519; 600
s. logic
non-dogmatic character 505
personified 1711
against philology 1185 philosophical elements in Roman
authors 141; 218; 256-257;
261-263; 438-439; 475; 600-602;
717-718; 809-810; 856-857;
921-925; 960; 981-982;
1013-1014; 1449-1467;
1544-1545; 1616-1627;
1723-1724; s. also the individual authors and schools
as a 'physician' 1717-1718
and politics 548; 1188-1190 popular 1270; s. also diatribe practical 548; 910; 940;
1187-1188; 1250
preference for contemplative life 1187 and religion 1013
and rhetoric 291-294; 489;
529-531; 536-537; 545-546;
580-581; 586-590; 1246-1248;
s. also rhetoric
'Romanization' of 499-511;
875-877; 960; 1188; 1616-1627;
1695-1698; 1724-1725
the Romans' mistrust of 508; 1158
schools of, s. the individual schools
'Stoic' and 'Platonic' periods at Rome 500-501; 1283;
1304-1306
systems, conceivable 599
terms, technical 506; 549
s. also language and style, abstract nouns and ibid. 'poverty' of the Latin language of time 510; 1616; 1674;
1696-1697; 1701
(Clitomachus); 547
in Africa 1591; 1598; 1603
'cave', allegory 1715
and Christianity, convergences 1639 criticism of Plato 1603
medieval 1701;
- 'Middle' Platonism 39; 909; 1207;
1559; 1563-1564
Neoplatonism 1305; 1446; 1486;
1586; 1620; 1638; 1664; 1687;
1692; 1713
skepticism, (neo-) acedemic
549-550; 1611
Plautius, jurist 1502
Plautus 163-206; 108-111; 10; 12;
16; 20-21; 25; 39; 57; 65-68; 94;
97-98; 102-106; 117; 123; 126-128;
132-134; 141; 148; 156; 208-214;
217-223; 226-235; 255; 325; 328;
334; 417; 584; 605; 610; 643; 1064;
1067; 1197; 1294; 1300; 1323; 1745;
1746
Pliny the Elder 1265-1275; 7; 9; 353;
378; 486; 565; 567-570; 584; 610;
834; 852; 872; 876; 884; 897-898;
906; 910; 1081; 1109; 1146; 1242;
1261; 1313; 1323; 1393; 1492; 1628
Pliny the Younger 1146-1157; 9; 19;
353; 478; 495; 497-498; 513-516;
555; 783; 797; 863; 901; 903-907;
909; 955; 1039; 1043-1044; 1085;
1089; 1095-1099; 1138; 1240; 1290;
1323; 1391; 1398-1399; 1439; 1149;
1477-1479; 1635-1636
Plotinus 501; 1292-1294; 1486;
1617-1620; 1634; 1639-1641;
1682-1683; 1718
Plutarch 268; 383-384; 386; 403;
417; 424; 435-436; 456; 464-465;
470-471; 474-475; 479; 485; 610;
834; 879; 903; 909; 1084-1085;
1107-1109; 1197; 1294; 1393;
1415-1416; 1429; 1459; 1479; 1482;
1486; 1557
poet as architectus 193
Augustan idea of 651-654
as 'beggar' 1038
Christian idea of 329
as 'client' 1038
as a confidant 140
as creator 77; 727; 1304; 1487
as critic 159; 264; 724-728 crowning of 1607
as dicti studiosus 140
groups of poets 56; 113; 336;
644-645; 668; 711; 754; 767; 770;
788; 830

- as a harbinger of Christianity 1543
 idea of 144; 922; 1048
 identity and mission 84; 124; 132;
 192-193; 258-259; 295-296; 329;
 346-348; 651-653; 687-690;
 725-727; 758; 776-779; 808-809;
952; 1057; 1326; 1344
 origin 54-55; 644
 as a 'philosopher' 1716
 as a 'physician' 85; 278; 296-297
 as poeta 140; 194
 as poeta grassator 1049
 as priest 85; 688-689; 717; 938
 as prophet 298; 688-689
 as sage 76
 as a teacher of society 76; 717;
1012; s. also didactic poems as a traitor of truth and morals 1543 as a universal expert 76-77; 810;
1304; 1473; 1488
 as vales 649; 652; 665; 689;
 726-727; 750; 758
 as a witness to the truth of Christianity 1562; 1599
 as a witness to truth 1601 poetic language 77; 84; 124; 149;
 189; 222-223; 258; 276-277;
 293-295; 328; 333-334; 344-346;
 663-664; 686-688; 723-724; 749;
 758; 775-776; 806-807; 826 poetic theology, s. theologia tripartita
 poetry
 Republican period 76-359
 Augustan period 659-828
 early imperial period 913-1060
 middle and late imperial period 1310-1370
 allegorical interpretation 1602
 Christian 1313-1317
 in Cicero 539
 as consolation 727; 750; 809
 cosmic 85-86; 299-300; 305; 326;
 670; 684; 693-695; 698-699; 745;
 810-811; 763; 967; 979-980;
1347; 1361-1362; 1541
 genres, s. the individual genres immortalizing power of 727; 921
 and life 261-262; 347; 730; 749-752
 minor forms 1310
 s. literary criticism (theory)
 s. literature and society, clients
 as poets
 s. Maecenas and patronage
 s. metrics
 neglecting quantity 1688
 pastoral 700-702; s. bucolic
poesis and poema 259 poets as creators of gods 77; 727
 as praise of God 1602
 s. prosimetron
 and reality 306; 722; 784; 927;
947; 1044; 1221; 1225; 1324
 reflective 140-142; 162; 225;
 229-230; 263; 355-356; 726-728;
 742; 916-919; 1008-1019;
1189-1192; 1363-1365; s. also the sections 'Reflections on Literature' in the individual chapters
 s. rhetoric
 s. truth and poetry
 utilitarian (e.g. courtship) 742; 749
 Poggio Bracciolini 983; 1262; 1453; 1747 polemics, s. pamphlets
 Polemon of Iliion 397
 Polignac, de, Cardinal 308; 312
 Politian 306; 702; 1015; 1349; 1483 politics
 s. civil rights
 non-expansive 643; 1079
 phenomenology of 1134
 and philosophy 547; 1167; 1176
 'resistance' 1128
 s. Rome
 Poliziano, s. Politian
 Polyaeus 872
 Polybius 7; 37; 60; 367; 368; 374;
 377; 381; 414; 438; 444; 473; 479;
 510; 835; 839-841; 845-847;
 855-856; 1132; 1429
 Polycarp 1527
 polymathy 1482
 Pompeius, African grammarian
 1472
 Pompeius Lenaeus 263; 455
 Pompeius, s. Trogius
 Pompilius Andronicus, M. 585; 1400
 Pomponius, s. Atticus
 Pomponius of Bologna 100; 1587
 Pomponius Marcellus,
 grammarian 1242

- Pomponius Mela 1241–1242; 566;
568–569; 1245; 1354; 1746
- Pomponius, s. Porphyrio
- Pomponius, S., jurist 623; 631;
633; 1276; 1502; 1506
- Pomponius Secundus, P. 1265
- Poninski, A. L. 1034
- Pontanus, Johannes (= Pontano, G.) 306; 984; 1614
- Ponticus 946
- Pontius 1580–1581; 471–472; 1297
- Pope, Alexander 311; 701; 733; 1015; 1329
- populus* 1303
- Porcius Latro 787–874
- Porcius Licinus 156; 333; 341; 584
- Porfyrius, s. Optatianus
- pornography, s. sexuality; women as authors
- Porphyrio, Pomponius, commentator 732; 1292; 1469
- Porphyry, philosopher 469; 1486;
1613; 1617; 1618; 1624; 1634; 1640;
1682; 1709–1710; 1713
- portrait, literary, s. character portrayal
- Posidippus 207
- Posidonius 60; 413; 437; 438; 502;
535; 538; 600; 810; 840; 856; 870;
881; 908; 916; 974; 1177; 1266;
1270; 1416; 1454; 1598; 1611
- Possidius 473; 1297; 1406; 1580
- Postumius Albinus 376; 64; 251; 258
- Pound, Ezra 783; 816
- Poussin, Nicolas 1348
- practical ascetic writings 1531
- praefatio*, s. literary technique
- praescriptio* 1535
- praeteritio*, s. literary technique
- praetexta*, s. drama
- praetor's edict
as a source of law 637
- Prasch Johann Ludwig 1462
- predestination 982; 1702
- prefiguration, s. typological
interpretation
- prayer 42; 279; 284; 296; 299; 349;
395; 398; 765; 808; 1013; 1020;
1220; 1346; 1355; 1629; 1673;
1685; 1717
carmen saeculare 712; 718; 727 hymn of atonement 112
s. hymns
- s. Muse, invocation of
s. orare
- pre-literary texts 41–47; 243; 323;
331–332; 1526–1528
s. oral style
- Priapea* 1056–1060; 755; 1219
- priesthood of laymen 1186; 1225
- 'Prince's Manuals' 1527 (Cicero, Pro
Marcello), 1149; 1152; 1166;
1205–1206; 1339; 1343; 1347; 1350;
1402; 1441; 1580
- princeps*, principate, s. ruler
- Priscian 577; 127; 135; 303; 926;
988; 1032; 1287; 1296; 1348; 1469;
1472–1475; 1496
- Priscillian, Priscillianists 1358; 1669
- Proba 1316; 1354
- probabilitas* 549
- Probus, M. Valerius 1242–1243; 127;
231; 263; 304; 1014; 1399; 1472;
1479
- Proclus 322; 1715; 1726
- Prodicus 968
- proletarius* 1178
- pronouns, s. language and style
- prooemium*, s. literary technique
- propaganda, religious 1453
- propempticon* 756; 948; 1041
- Propertius 768–786; 18; 513; 643;
649–652; 669; 696; 742; 747–753;
755–756; 759–762; 788; 791;
798–800; 802; 1043; 1747
- prophecy, s. literary technique
- prose 55–56; 60–64; 360–638;
646–648; 829–891; 1061–1277;
1371–1738
fictional 1217–1219
genres, s. the individual genres and poetry, boundaries blurred 1184; 1313; 1440
s. proximetron renewed by Seneca 1183–1184
s. also rhetoric; poetry
- prose rhythm 61; 398; 494;
1066; 1090; 1183; 1228; 1257;
1414; 1426; 1458; 1478; 1574;
1589; 1599–1600; 1638; 1652;
1720
- prose writers, identity and mission
394; 400; 446–449; 483–484;
495–496; 508–509; 515; 545–547;
568–570; 591; 604–606; 625–627;

- 851–853; 882–883; 1151–1152;
1185–1186
- prosimetron* 602; 1165; 1206; 1218;
1221; 1227; 1715–1716; 1720;
s. satire, Menippean
- Prosper Aquitanus 333
- Protagoras 1697
- protrepticus* 532; 537; 555; 1325;
1557; 1562; 1586; 1715
- providence, s. God, idea of
- provinces, importance of 1896; 1133;
1284–1290
- Pruckner, N. 1614
- Prudens 1357–1370; 80; 87; 272;
274–275; 280; 298; 305; 324–325;
329; 330; 732; 926; 951; 1195;
1288; 1293; 1296; 1299; 1304;
1328; 1343; 1348; 1430; 1447;
1578; 1719
- Psalms 1313–1314; 1582; 1618; 1648;
1669; 1672; 1691
abecedarian 1313–1314; 1672
in prose 1314
- Ps.-Aurelius Victor, s. Aurelius Victor
- Ps.-Dares, s. Dares
- Ps.-Dictys, s. Dictys
- Ps.-Dionysius Areopagita, s. Dionysius psychagogia 91; 381; 413–414; 1080;
1186; s. also reader
- psychici* 1529
- psychology 78–79; 220–221; 229–230;
284–285; 302; 343; 787; 800–802;
846; 1306; 1532; 1545; 1585; 1590;
1603; 1605; 1619; 1655; 1667;
1675–1676; 1695–1697; 1701
anima naturaliter Christiana 1543 of children 1636
corporeality of the soul 1667 exercises helping to overcome emotions 1162–1164
s. also female characters
s. also immortality individual gifts considered 1189
of the masses 1132; 1136
psychotherapy, program of 168
- Ptolemy I 473
- Ptolemy, astronomer and geographer,
s. Claudius
- Publilius Syrus 101
- publishers 645; 1255; 1742;
s. also Atticus
- purism, s. language and style
- Pushkin 355; 652; 699; 736; 817–818;
979; 1234; 1375; 1462
- Pythagoras, Pythagoreans,
Neopythagoreans 6; 39; 47; 58;
278; 300; 390; 609; 654; 804; 810;
875; 1177; 1187; 1461; 1586; 1691
- Pytheus 881
- quadrivium* 1713; 1723
- quaestiones* 1506; 1592
- qualitas* 549
- Querolus* 200
- Quintilian 1254–1264; 580–582; 15;
19; 152; 208; 267; 304; 416–419;
425; 440; 445; 455; 459; 481; 494;
555; 587; 648; 758; 761; 788; 825;
827; 835; 863; 897; 900; 903;
906–907; 925; 932; 941; 1006; 1014;
1021; 1027; 1038; 1043; 1063; 1067;
1105; 1110; 1138; 1146; 1175; 1183;
1195; 1213; 1240; 1243; 1251; 1399;
1473; 1503; 1601; 1628; 1656
- Raabe, Wilhelm 1198
- Rabelais 1273
- Rabener, Gottlieb Wilhelm 734
- Rabirius, architect 1040
- Rabirius, poet 1067
- Rachel, Joachim 1016; 1034
- Racine 161; 1141; 1182; 1196; 1418
- Radbertus 1197
- Radke, Anna Elissa 355; 737
- Radulf de Diceto 1052
- Ramler, Karl Wilhelm 354; 735; 1053
- Ransmayr, Christoph 818
- Raphael (Raffaello Sanzio) 969
- Rapin, René 702
- Rastell, John 235
- Ratherius of Verona 352; 1014; 1746
- reader, respect for the alphabetical arrangement of subjects in classical texts 878
chapter headings and tables of content in classical texts 1265;
1480; 1629
s. also language and style;
apostrophe; rhetoric conditioning the structure of texts 20–26; 273; 297; 414–415;
515–516; 535; 539–541; 546; 567;
804–806; 809–810; 852; 1010;
1048; 1189

- structuring of subject matter
 according to themes 596; 1486
- reading, light 386; 1210; 1217; 1453
 s. also biography; novel religious 1206; 1456
- real objects as symbols 24; 330; 693;
 723; 1404–1405
 s. also 'concrete' expressions,
 preference for
- 'realism', s. poetry and reality
- reception
 s. allegorical exegesis; Euhemerism;
 exegesis; hermeneutics;
 commentary; imitation, literary;
 typological interpretation
- anti-chronological order ('modern' literature assimilated before the classical one), s. Greek and Latin literature
- avoidance of Greek quotations 1118
- barriers, psychological against receptions 926; 1691
- of biblical tradition 1306
 and centones 1654
- Christianity and pagan culture 1303–1304; 1655
- Christianization of literary forms and Roman ideas 1363;
 1538–1539; 1572; 1575; 1635;
1640
- classics read critically 1185; 1543;
1653–1654; 1656; 1682; 1685
- 'collage' technique 1523
- collections of quotations 1574
 s. commentary
- creative 159; 1198; 1221; 1304;
 1685; 1718; s. also imitation,
 literary
- discrepancy of programmatic assertions and actual imitation:
 Homer 77; famous models
 mentioned instead of those actually used 479; 536–539
- fusion of cultures 7; 10–11; 14; 20; 25; 47; 55–56; 78; 113; 196;
 583–584; 608; 676
- s. Greek and Latin literatures compared and hermeneutics 1316
 s. history
 history of, s. the paragraphs on
- 'Influence' in the individual
 chapters
- s. in all chapters on authors the paragraphs on 'Influence' and those on 'Sources, Models, and Genres'
- hubs of influence, s. Greek and Latin literature
- s. also identity
- Homer imitated, interpreted,
 criticized 77; 115; 135; 1304;
 s. also Homer
- imitation 'by contrast' 915–916;
919; 962–963; 974–975; 1041;
1359
- Latinization 27; 123–124; 127–128;
 227; 257–258; 293–294; 506–508;
 606–607; 881–882
- Latin Literature as a vehicle of culture 1306
- s. literary genres, crossing of
- s. literature and society;
 s. transference of literature and manuscript tradition 1743
- methods of excerpting 264; 1470
- s. myths, criticism of paraphrase, epic 1352
- philosophical versus
 philological 1185
- polyglots 129; 372–373; 376; 1300;
1337; 1420; 1424–1426; 1481;
1528; 1532
- reception, manipulation of 976;
 1119; 1516; s. psychagogia; reader;
 literary technique
 quotation 1010; 1118; 1149;
1180; 1480; 1582; 1598; 1716;
1744; self-citation 952; 1024
 quotations, ancient use of 1042;
1266
- Romanization 17; 32; 93; 95–97;
 113–114; 173; 193; 225–230;
 298–299; 350; 547–550; 607;
 718; 726; 882; 1005; 1352; 1605
- and study of language 1649
- transference of methods 607; 1724
- s. also translation
- travesty 1322
- 'typological' acceptance of Greek
 tradition 941; 1091
- Virgil, interpretation of 1411; 1487
- recitatio* 830; 1026

- recommendation, letters of 514; 1648 reflections on literature, s. the relevant sections in our chapters on authors, genres, and epochs, s. also literary criticism, literary theory
reformare, reformatio 1560; 1734
 Regiomontanus, mathematician 984
 Régnier, Mathurin 307; 733; 783;
 1034; 1233
religio, religion 34–37; 299–301;
 533–534; 549; 679; 691–692;
 811–812; 817; 855–856; 941; 1129;
 1270; 1599
 criticized 141; 160; 260–262; 300;
 349; 533–534; 608; 1188; 1207
 (state religion); 1359–1360;
 1537–1538; 1556; 1585–1586;
 1589; 1591; (rites meaningless);
 1610–1611; 1666; 1677–1678
 change of meaning 1561
 s. mystery cults
 and philosophy 1459
 state religion respected 1271
 and superstitio 300
 s. theologia tripartita
 undogmatic 729; 817
 in Varro 608
 Rembrandt 817
 Remigius of Auxerre 1081; 1356;
 1494
 Remmius Palaemon 127; 583; 1008;
1254; 1269; 1468; 1471
 renaissances of Roman literature
 40; 200; 233; 244; 355; 402;
 1285–1286; 1290; 1293; 1296; 1746
 Renan, Ernest 1565; 1702
 Reposianus 1310
res publica, s. state retrograde chronology and change of roles, s. literary technique, inversion
 Rettenbacher, Simon 354
 Reuchlin 234
 Reutter, Hermann 1235
 Resti, J. 1034
 revenge 692 (positive aspects); 1030
 (negative aspects) rhetoric (and rhetores) 508–581;
 586–593; 23; 29; 61; 82; 589; 903;
952; 1066; 1178; 1227; 1243; 1245;
1263; 1298; 1327; 1476; 1574; 1587;
 1611; 1616; 1692
 s. also allegory; hermeneutics amplificatio 1047
 s. aptum
 s. Atticism
 s. also the individual authors
colores 1245; 1248
controversiae and suasoriae 1245; 1248
 criticized 1230
 s. declamatio
 ‘dismantling’, technique of 291
 and education 587–588
encomium 1344
 epideictic 947; 1077
 exemplary speeches 1440
 gradation 1395–1396
Ad Herennium 590–593
 and hermeneutics 589; 1304;
 1693–1694
 homiletics 1692
insinuatio 1571–1572
 and law 624; 626–627; 635;
 1514–1515
 means of persuasion, rational and emotional 537; 587
 subjected to moral standards 1151
perspicuitas 1258
 and philosophy 529; 545; 547;
 1260; 1695
 and poetry 82; 96; 246; 257; 267;
 275; 294; 773; 801–802; 827;
 917–918; 1011; 1413
 and political culture 558; 586
praeteritio 394
progymnasmata 1247
 and prose 381; 398–399; 415; 439; 495; 516; 536; 847–848; 882
 s. psychagogia
 schools of 491
 and self-education 1185; 1191
 in speeches 495; 536
 spiritualized 1180; 1186; 1685
suasoriae 801; 1249; 1717 sublime style 1213
thesis 1247
 and truth 589; 1693
 utilitarian 400; 497; 539; 587 rhetorical influence on literary genres 802; 906; 917–918; 950; 1022 rhetorical writings 529–531;
 580–581; 586–593; 1243;
1254–1264; 1475; 1476; 1616;
 1667; 1692–1695

- Rhinthon 99; 171
 Rhodes 60; 501
 Richard of Cirencester 927
 Richard of Fournival 1747
 Richardson, Samuel 1198; 1329;
1367
 Richelieu 1094
 riddles 663
   charade 1057
 Rienzo, Cola di 1734
 Rilke 819; 1367
 Rinuccini, O. 879
 Rippe, Guillaume 234
 Robert of Cricklade 1272
 Robortelli 733
 Rode, August (von) 1462
 Rodin 817
 roles assumed by the 'lyric ego' 323 change of, s. literary technique
 Rollin, C. 1262
Roman de Thèbes 956
 Roman literature, s. literature, Roman Roman state, s. state
 Roman values, s. values, Roman Romanization, s. reception
 Rome
   its 'biography' 1414; 1419
   as birthplace of authors 406 citizenship obtained owing to intellectual achievements 112; 130 citizenship, right of 1347
   criticism of 421; 439; 781; 859;
     1092; 1107; 1141; 1234; 1681
   eternal 1364
   fall of 1597; 1678
   goddess Roma 1338-1340
   grandeur, its causes 1538; 1564;
     1678; 1680
   guaranteeing law and order 1128
   historical importance 1679
   in historiography 367-369; 403;
     453; 857-862; 871
   s. history; historiography hymn to Roma 1332
   idea of 1334; 1441
   legal community, security of law 1334; 1347
   literary importance in late antiquity 1287
   loss of political importance 1285 its mission 1128; s. history parallels to Thebes, Athens, Troy in cultural history 685; 803;
       810
   pax Romana 1416
   in poetry 329-330; 660-662; 665;
     671; 675-677; 685; 721-722;
     781-782; 795-796; 810-811;
     960-961; 991-992; 1019-1020;
     1039-1040; 1332
   praise of 1299-1300; 1339-1340; 1346
   protectress of civilization
     1346-1347
   regenerative strength 1334
   satire on 1020; 1424; 1651-1652 speech in praise of 1445 sphere of action for authors,
     s. the paragraphs on 'Life and Dates' in all chapters world dominion 1416
 Romano, Lalla 818
 Romans (native) as authors 405
 Ronsard 307; 354; 652; 701-702;
   735; 762; 994; 1328
 roses 1455
   and lilies 1578
 Rousseau 308; 866; 1035; 1197; 1702
 Rubens 817
 Rucellai, Giovanni 702
 Rufinus of Aquileia, Tyrannius
   1662-1663; 1261; 1372; 1382-1383;
   1386; 1580; 1630; 1634; 1646-1647;
   1650; 1682
 Rufius Festus Avienus, s. Avienus
 'Rufius' Festus, s. Festus, historian ruler, ideal of 39; 140; 338; 498;
   532; 550; 642-643; 652; 655; 661;
   668-670; 697; 711-712; 716-717;
   726-727; 982; 993-994; 1070; 1091;
   1098-1099; 1106-1107; 1152; 1159;
   1160; 1166; 1177; 1188-1189; 1305;
   1321; 1338-1339; 1345; 1347; 1354;
   1402-1403; 1440-1441
 ruler, worship of, s. apotheosis
 ruler, ideal of changes 39-40, 1099
   tyrant 1190; 1350; 1600
 rulers, panegyrics of 70; 80; 259-260;
   465-466; 469; 496-498; 655; 948;
   1152; 1334; 1337-1352; 1439-1442
 Ruppert-Tribian, Helga 818

- Russell, Bertrand 1701; 1730
- Rusticius Helpidius, Christian poet 1316
- Rutilius Claudius Namatianus
1332-1336; 747; 1032; 1286; 1312;
1322
- Rutilius Lupus 1243
- Rutilius, s. Palladius
- Rutilius Rufus, P. 251; 383; 436;
480; 491; 635
- 'Ruzzante', Angelo Beolco 234
- Sabinus, Caelius, jurist 1502; 1506
- Sacerdos, grammarian 1469
- Sachs, Hans 235
- sacramentum* 1540; 1572; 1575
- Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin 1702
- Saint-Pierre, Bernardin de 702
- Salanus 799
- Sallust 433-463; 9-10; 13; 19; 64;
67; 73-74; 363; 365-367; 371; 378;
380; 383; 385-387; 402; 428; 470;
473; 487; 510; 566; 585; 608; 647;
652; 827; 833; 840; 850-852; 871;
902; 906; 1031; 1064-1066; 1068;
1075; 1076; 1089; 1106; 1110;
1114; 1116; 1119; 1123-1124; 1296;
1325; 1375; 1386; 1399; 1412; 1416;
1423-1425; 1468; 1475; 1678; 1681;
1696
- Salutati, C. 556
- salvation without divine help 1455
- Salvianus of Marseille 1290
- Salvius Julianus 1376
- Sannazarius (Sannazaro) 994; 1335
- Santra 480; 584; 1393
- sapientia*, s. wisdom
- Sappho 322-324; 340; 718; 726; 788;
793; 812; 1717
- Sarbiewski, Maciej Kazimierz 734
- satire (satira) 241-250; 15-17; 45; 66;
134; 250-266; 535; 648; 711-741;
905; 976; 999; 1008-1037; 1206;
1210; 1222; 1651
- and comedy 242; 255; 714
- on contemporary events 248;
253-254; 260; 728-729
- and epic 254-255; 1026
- erotic elements 260; 1034
- indignation as a motive 274
- Menippean 254; 595; 600-604;
607; 1165; 1174; 1197; 1206;
1221; 1492; 1713; 1715
- pathos* 1021-1025
- personal character 139; 248;
s. also poetry
- rhetorical elements 1022-1023
and tragedy 255; 1027
- Saturnian, s. metrics
- Satyrus, biographer 466; 470
- Saxo Grammaticus 161; 1093
- Scaevola, s. Mucius
- Scaevola, Q. Cervidius, jurist 1501;
1505-1506
- Scaliger, Julius Caesar 734; 928; 942;
969; 984; 1015; 1328
- Scaurus, grammarian, s. Terentius
- Scaurus, Mamercus Aemilius, orator 1246
- Schedel, Hartmann 1483
- Schelling 1681
- Schiller 160; 669; 735; 783; 1053
- Schlegel, Friedrich 311
- Schlosser, Friedrich Christoph 1016
- Schnur, Harry C. 1035
- Scholia 934; 1014; 1243; 1710
- Scholia Sinaitica* 1514
- schools, s. literature and society
- Schopenhauer 1035; 1198; 1701
- Schröder, Rudolf Alexander 737
- science
- s. natural philosophy; physics
- s. philosophy
- secular and spiritual 1497-1458
- s. technical writings
- science, theory of 1691-1693;
1721-1724
- Scipio Africanus maior 384
- Scipio Africanus minor 490; 508
- Scribonius, s. Curio
- Scribonius Demetrius 1107
- Scribonius Largus 578; 567; 1240
- Scribonius Libo, L. 1064
- Scudéry, Madeleine de 1253
- Seckendorff, Veit Ludwig von 928
- secularization of religion and myth
295-296; 349; 719; 800; 1210; 1220;
1528
- Secundus, Johannes 354
- Sedley, Charles 235
- Sedulius, poet 1355; 80; 272; 1299;
1354
- Sedulius Scotus 556
- self-destruction of the Roman empire 922

- self-irony of authors 467; s. humor self-knowledge (and self-criticism)
 195; 262; 510; 608; 725; 730;
 808-809; 857; 1008; 1013; 1563;
 1622; 1638; 1673-1675; 1710-1711
 of God 980
 semiotics 1704
semipaganus 1008
 Sempronius Asellio 380; 361;
 365-366; 381; 386; 440; 840; 845
 Sempronius Tuditanus 380 senators as jurists 619; 888
 senators as writers 8; 154; 363; 390;
 405-406; 433; 518; 564; 590; 1290 senatorial aristocracy, s. literature and society
senatusconsulta, s. law
 Seneca the Elder 1158-1204;
580-582; 8; 101; 651; 826-827;
 863-864; 873-875; 897; 916; 1024;
 1055-1057; 1076; 1087; 1158; 1213;
1393; 1412
 Seneca the Younger 1158-1204;
 6-10; 16; 19-21; 30; 38-40; 66; 96;
 101; 107; 144; 153; 161; 201; 224;
 231-234; 243; 246-247; 254; 304;
 455; 474; 502; 504-509; 516;
 544-545; 603-604; 611; 647-648;
 651; 732; 738; 787; 814; 826;
 874-876; 897-900; 903-909; 914;
916-918; 922-923; 940; 993; 1006;
 1008; 1022; 1030-1031; 1038;
 1043-1045; 1050; 1066; 1087; 1090;
 1105-1109; 1111; 1120; 1129; 1134;
 1149; 1252; 1271; 1298; 1303;
 1305-1306; 1359; 1382; 1413-1414;
1437; 1533-1534; 1542; 1556; 1560;
 1565; 1582; 1598-1599; 1601; 1656;
 1681-1682; 1696; 1701; 1711;
 1714-1715; 1718; 1721; 1728; 1746
 Sennert, Daniel 305 sentence structure, s. language and style
sententiae, s. language and style
 Septimius Serenus 1323
 Septimius Severus 1389
 Servus Q. 1272; 1312
 sermons 10; 1298; 1302; 1569; 1619;
 1298; 1648-1649; 1672; 1683
 Servilius Nonianus 1008; 1109-1110
servitium amoris 343; 745; 751; 759;
 773-775; 779
 Servius 1473-1474; 77; 375; 696;
 918; 1031-1032; 1472
 Sevirus Nicanor 584
 Sextilius Ena 915
 Sextius Niger 1267
 Sextius, Q. (father and son) 1158;
 1175
 Sextus Empiricus 1294; 1533; 1556;
1563
 Sextus, 'Pythagorean' 1634 sexuality 262; 484
 aggressivity 1225
 s. amare and bene velle
 art of love 260
 s. asceticism
 biological and psychological aspects of 262
 erotic elements in poetry,
 s. language and style, change of meaning exchange of gender in poetic similes 343
hetaerae 72; 744
 homosexuality 337; 746; 759;
 1020; 1023; 1028; 1217
 impotence 791; 1216; 1230; 1312 and knowledge 349-350
 libertines, s. love
 marriage, s. women; love
 obscenity 345; 1043; 1045; 1048;
 1056-1060; 1219
 outspoken 260-262
 Platonic love 801
 pornography 801; 1057
 and power 1221
 promiscuity 350
 prostitution 350-351; 1028; 1215
 renunciation 686
 senility 1312
 s. servitium amoris
 unrestrained or restrained 678
 voyeurism 1212
 women of noble family and their vulgar lovers 1020 (sat. 6); 1375 (Cleopatra)
 vocabulary 1059
 Shadwell, Thomas 235
 Shakespeare 153; 161; 171; 194; 202;
 235; 425; 816; 865; 929; 1015;
1033; 1117; 1197; 1229; 1273
 Shaw, Bernard 425
 Shelley 313; 818; 929; 1273

- shorthand writers 1265
 short story 999; 1207-1208;
1217-1219; 1461-1462; 1650
 Sibylline Oracles 1598 sick-nursing 1497
 Siculus Flaccus 1244
 Sidney, Philip 701
 Sidonius Apollinaris 1314-1315; 80;
513; 761; 884; 950; 969; 1032;
1140; 1154; 1174; 1287; 1290; 1311;
1311; 1328; 1348; 1366; 1385; 1606
 Sieder, Johann 1462
 Sienkiewicz, Henryk 1235 signs, theory of 300-301; 1678-1695;
 s. also real objects as signs
 Silenus, historian 381; 479
 Silius Italicus 959-971; 9; 16; 79-80;
85-86; 143; 386; 403; 697; 863;
901-902; 905-907; 909; 926; 937;
942; 948; 955-956; 1039; 1048;
1195; 1298; 1342; 1349; 1362; 1444
 Silvester II, Pope 1033
 simile 82; 950; 1023; 1455
 in didactic epic 274; 292; 976-977 epic 82-83; 137-139; 682-686;
804-805; 917; 936-937; 950; 966;
1345 exchange of gender in the simile 343
 s. imagery
 Simonides 139
simplicitas 1228
sancta 1651
 Sisenna, s. Cornelius
 Sisson, C. H. 818
 Skelton, John 354; 1015
 skepticism, s. also Plato, Platonism
1160; 1282; 1533; 1556-1557; 1559;
1561-1563; 1589-1591; 1603; 1611;
1664; 1670; 1681
 slaves 53; 60; 68; 97; 150; 181-184;
198; 221; 472; 527; 715; 720; 723;
895; 1082; 1166; 1169; 1189; 1213
 Smollett, Tobias George 1034
 social criticism 119; 195-196; 248;
253; 260; 302; 606-609; 649-650;
728-729; 760; 781; 824; 1005; 1020;
1031; 1049; 1191; 1207; 1210;
1230-1231; 1270; 1424; 1651
 s. historiography
 social links 35; 73-74; 88; s. also values; state, res publica, civic spirit;
 s. also the individual virtues loosened 88; 349-350; 423-424 reinterpretation, s. language and style, change of meaning social origin of authors, s. literature and society
 Socrates 242; 502; 508-509; 533;
801; 908; 1009; 1013; 1030; 1184;
1161; 1175-1177; 1305; 1537; 1561;
1696; 1715; 1726
 Socrates, Church historian 1496
 Solinus, C. Julius 1242; 1272; 1478; 1492
 Solon 275; 618; 743; 802
 Solzhenitsyn 1607; 1212
 sophistic, second 1077; 1457; 1540
 Sophists 1247
 Sophocles 90; 93; 96; 133; 147;
152; 156-157; 160; 217; 1027;
1178
 Sophron 100
 Soranus of Ephesus 1477; 1533
 Sosilus 479
 Sotion, Neopythagorean 810; 876;
1158; 1175; 1187
 soul
 s. immortality
 s. psychology
 Sozomenus 1496
 Spain as a cultural region 52; 391;
429; 435; 876; 897; 1038; 1158;
1245; 1286; 1352; 1357; 1449
 s. also Hyginus, Lucan, Martial,
 Pomponius Mela, Prudentius,
 Quintilian, Seneca
 speaker, change of 1010-1011 speeches
 s. also oratory
 s. rhetoric
commiseratio 493
 direct and indirect speech 413-414 main sections of 539-540
 panegyrics 496-498
 selected from historical works and transmitted 435; 454
 of propaganda 1535
status 539
 structure conditioned by the subject matter 491-492
 as structural markers 441
 Spenser, Edmund 311; 701; 733;
816; 1015

- spiritualization, s. language and style,
change of meaning
- spondee, s. metrics
- Spreng, Johann 698
- Stanyhurst, Richard 698
- state, res publica 33; 39; 53; 72; 77;
86; 189; 330; 458; 496; 527; 626;
642; 669; 861; 1206-1207; s. also
populus
- Christianized 1305; 1575;
1580-1582; 1680
- and Church 1538; 1547;
1568-1581; 1631-1633;
1639-1640; 1677-1681
- in Cicero 520
- civic spirit 866
- as constitutional state and community of law 629
- in epic 87-88; 679-680; 693-694;
965-966; 967-968
- in historians 363-365; 381;
400-401; 421-422; 449-451;
833-834; 836-837; 852-855;
857-860; 1097; 1424; 1429
- ideal state 436; 548
- imperial theology 1605
- imperium proconsulare* 642
- individual and society 550
- loosening of the allegiance to the state 87; 350; 751; 811
- and philosophy 531; 547; 1187
- the poet and the state 328-329
- propaganda and poetry 1346
- as republic 1158
- republican ideas maintained in theory 1124
- social links in early Rome 125;
392-393
- tribunicia potestas* 642
- Statilius Maximus 1469
- Statius, P. Papinius 16; 78-82; 85;
87-88; 304; 325-326; 697; 731;
814; 825; 898; 902; 905-908; 909;
937-938; 942; 966; 1033; 1045;
1050; 1078; 1146; 1174; 1310;
1323; 1342; 1346; 1349; 1360;
1474
- Steele, Richard 235
- Stertinius Avitus 1039
- Stifter, Adalbert 966
- Stilo, s. Aelius
- Stobaeus 93; 192
- Stoic philosophy 37; 57; 63; 92; 141;
159; 491; 502-503; 509-510; 538;
690; 729; 924-925; 968; 981; 1013;
1030; 1079; 1159; 1177; 1186-1189;
1270; 1306; 1451; 1454; 1544; 1562;
1564; 1570; 1572; 1582; 1590; 1597;
1599; 1603-1604; 1607; 1617; 1621;
1636; 1698; 1702; 1712-1714; 1717;
1726
- s. also the individual philosophers
- Storm, Theodor 1462
- story within the story, s. structural principles
- Strabo 76
- Strauss, Richard 819
- Strozzi, Tito 956
- structural principles 78; 252; 338;
400-401; 514; 539-541; 676-679;
720-722; 758; 771-772; 791-800;
802-803; 807; 837-838; 842-843;
920; 935-936; 1010; 1087; 1112;
1255; 1396
- annular composition 1266
- asymmetry 440; 776
- central structure 73; 115; 257; 290;
342-343; 713 (Hor. carm. Books
1-3); 722; 747; 775; 791;
796-800; 1268; 1357
- conditioned by content 492; 566
- incongruity, calculated 719-720
- linear development 257; 775
- and metrics 223
- parallel structure (of main sections)
604; 678-679; 791; 797
- scenes 148; 185; 414; 443; 679;
844; 848; 851; 918-920; 948; 966;
1181-1182
- sentence structure (period) 28; 276;
293; 345
- story within the story 120; 342;
440; 678; 712; 793-798; 1022;
1226; 1556
- syllables 342
- symmetry 185; 191; 342-343; 416;
440; 543; 605
- studies, preparatory for scholarly work 1488
- style, s. rhetoric; language and style
- subjectivity 1698
- in Catullus 344
- of time in Augustine 510;
1697-1698

- Sudermann, Hermann 1350
- Suetonius 1391-1411; 24; 76; 206;
363; 366; 424; 437; 456; 465;
468-470; 472; 482; 486; 597; 611;
834; 1044; 1093; 1109; 1147; 1281;
1324; 1371; 1374-1376; 1378; 1382;
1385; 1388-1390; 1424-1426; 1469;
1473; 1478-1479; 1534; 1619; 1648;
- suicide 960; 1161; 1212; 1270
- Sulla 70; 100; 383; 412; 436; 468;
473; 480; 840; 1065; 1684
- Sulpicia 766-767; 333; 644; 746; 787
- Sulpicius Apollinaris, C. 1291; 1468
- Sulpicius Blitho 479
- Sulpicius Galba, C. 491
- Sulpicius Galba, Servius 392-394
- Sulpicius Gallus, C. 452; 490; 566
- Sulpicius Rufus, Servius 64; 620; 622;
636
- Sulpicius Severus 1383; 469-72;
1064; 1071; 1139; 1289; 1297; 1385;
1580; 1650
- sun dial 972; 1353; 1708
- superbia* 894; 1091; 1127
- superstitio*, s. religio
- surveying, s. technical writings
- Swift, Jonathan 1034
- Swinburne, Algernon C. 313
- Symmachus, Q. Aurelius, orator, contemporary of Ambrose
1443-1448; 455; 497-498; 513;
1287; 1293; 1322; 1342; 1360;
1362; 1632; 1637; 1678
- Symmachus, Q. Aurelius Memmius, great-grandson of the orator and father-in-law of Boethius 1297; 1708
- Symphosius 1299; 1310
- symposion* as a type of literature 1215;
1220; 1225; 1594
and convivium 547
- synesis* 442; 1250; 1311
- Synesius of Cyrene 512; 1342; 1716
- synonyms, s. language and style
- Tacitus 1096-1145; 9; 25; 65; 248;
304; 363-365; 369; 387; 402; 441;
445; 456; 464; 468; 470; 487; 555;
826; 831; 844; 847; 857; 863; 873;
901-904; 906; 909; 918; 939; 1016;
1061; 1065; 1070-1072; 1085; 1088;
1092-1093; 1146; 1148-1149; 1194;
1199; 1212-1213; 1251; 1272; 1294;
1371; 1374; 1383; 1385; 1393; 1401;
1403; 1405; 1408; 1414; 1423-1426;
1445; 1449; 1460; 1534; 1557; 1560;
1655; 1696; 1747
- Taille, Jean de la 1094
- Tanusius Geminus 1393
- Tasso, Torquato 698; 701; 927
- Tatian 1533
- Tauler, Johannes 1702
- taxation, evading of 1284
- technical writings 564-582; 20;
62-64; 1239
- Republican period 590-638
- Augustan period 647; 877-891
- early empire 1239-1277
- middle and late empire 1468-1499
- on aqueducts 1244
- on arboriculture 1241; 1476
- agriculture 572-573; 395;
398-399; 401; 599; 601; 611;
670-671; 675; 677-678; 683-686;
688-689; 693; 1241; 1340;
1476-1477
- s. architecture
- on arithmetic 574; 1491-1494;
1710; 1713
- s. astronomy, astrology
- on botanics 1266
- clarity as a literary principle 567;
570; 1257; abandoned 1492
- on cookery 575; 1478
- dialogue form 588-589
- and encyclopedias 564; 571-572
- on gardening 955; 1241
- on geography 575-576; 566; 598;
879; 1241-1242; 1266;
s. also geography
- on geometry 1713
- on grammar and metrics
1468-1469; 576-577; 583-586;
593-616; 878-879; 1242-1243;
1254-1255; 1298; 1616-1617
- institutiones* 566; 588-589; 621; 1255
- on jurisprudence, s. law
- lexicography 876-877
- maps 879; 1266
- s. medicine
- s. music
- mythography 580; 877
- on natural history 566; 580
- s. philology

- s. philosophy
 s. physiognomy
 the reader's exigencies 568
 s. rhetoric
 style 542
 on surveying 581–582; 565; 569;
 876; 1241; 1244; 1312; 1386;
 1472; 1478; 1594
 textbooks, systematic, s. institutiones on war, the art of 574–575; 1244; 1478
 on zoology 1266
 Tennyson, Alfred 312; 354; 700; 737
 Terence 214–240; 108–111; 10; 12;
 16; 20–22; 25; 29; 57; 65–68; 94;
 97; 104–106; 123–124; 146; 177;
 180; 185; 188; 191; 195; 200–201;
 207–212; 251; 255; 258; 449; 605;
1323; 1325; 1392; 1443; 1469; 1597;
1635; 1646; 1675; 1747
 Terentianus Maurus 44; 272; 942;
1232; 1312; 1720
 Terentianus Scaurus, Q., grammarian 1291; 1165; 1473
 Terentius Varro, s. Varro
 Tertullian, Church Father 1528–1554;
 305; 507; 545; 611; 1137–1138;
1195; 1252; 1272; 1281; 1298;
1300; 1302; 1306–1307; 1360; 1527;
1555–1557; 1561; 1564; 1569–1576;
 1581–83; 1587; 1598; 1601;
1603–1605; 1622; 1649; 1651; 1656;
1696; 1720; 1745
 Tertullian, jurist 1528
testimonia, collections of 1569–1570;
 1574; 1577; 1597; 1611
 textbook, systematic, s. institutiones
 Thales 1030
 Themistius 1423; 1713
 Theocritus 58; 100; 260; 340; 645;
 660; 662; 674; 677; 700; 990–991;
1221; 1311; 1331
 Theodorean 1260
 Theodoret 1495
 Theodoric of St. Trond 885
 Theodorus of Gaza 556
 Theodorus Priscianus 1477
 Theognis 275; 743; 1341
theologia tripartita
 'natural', 'physical' 690; 941;
1304; 1563
 'physical', 'mythical', and
 'political' in Varro 608; 654;
 810; 1538–1539; 1677–1678
 poetic theology ('mythical') 810;
954
 'political' in Valerius Flaccus 937 theology, Christian theology of adoption 1605
 s. Arianism binitarianism 1605
 Christology, logos 1306; 1545;
 s. (here) trinity docetism 1592
 s. dualism ecclesiology 1570; 1574–1576; 1580
filiolus 1577
 s. God, idea of juridical way of thinking 33;
1547–1548; 1574
 subordinationism 1544
 trinity 1316; 1357; 1544; 1577;
 1580–1584; 1616–1619;
 1621–1624; 1627; 1630; 1633;
 1674–1677
 theological writings 1617
 Theon of Alexandria 996–997
 Theon of Smyrna 1724
 Theophanes of Mytilene 438
 Theophilus of Antioch 1534; 1582;
1590; 1598
 Theophilus, teacher of law in Constantinople 1523
 Theophrastus 76; 107; 260; 288;
 466; 500; 506; 537; 587; 870; 1223;
1266–1267; 1272–1273; 1394; 1713
 Theopompus 64; 363; 367; 439; 479;
 546; 647
 Thietmar of Merseburg 1052
 Thiofrid of Echernach 927
 Thomas Aquinas 1642; 1723–1725;
 1729
 Thomson, James 312; 702
 Thorwaldsen 1462
 Thrasylus 1266
 Thucydides 13; 62; 65; 288; 363;
 376; 414; 437; 443; 448; 473; 479;
 833; 841; 845–847; 918; 1124; 1131;
1135
 Tiberius, Emperor 473; 1393
 Tibullus 754–769; 18; 260; 644;
 649–650; 661; 669; 677; 713; 716;
 747–748; 750–752; 773; 775–776;

- 779; 783-784; 787; 800-801; 825;
1043; 1323; 1392; 1747
- Ticonius 1680; 1694
- Tiepolo 817
- Timaeus of Tauromenium 122; 372;
 397; 479
- Timagenes of Alexandria 830; 870;
1086
- time, philosophy of, s. philosophy
- Timotheus, musician 191
- Tiro 480; 539
- Titianus 1330
- Titinius Capito 1107
- Titinius, author of togatae 97
- Titius Aristo 1277
- togata, s. comedy
- Tolstoy 1022; 1689
- Toutain, Charles 1196
- Toynbee, Arnold 1136; 1702
- trabeata*, s. comedy
- tradition, sense of, s. values, Roman
- traffic noise 1020
- tragic, Aristotelian 91
 non Aristotelian 1191
- tragedy 905; 1021; 1048; 1170-1173;
1177-1178; 1180-1182; 1190-1192;
1195-1197; 1208; 1360
catharsis 91; 1191
 choice of subject 96; 106
 chorus 101; 1190; 1195
 'didactic' plays 1191
 s. drama and individual authors importance at Rome 106-107; for Virgil 675
 introductory scene 1181
 gruesome elements 1182
hamartia 91
 language 104; 1183
 metrics 104; 1183; cf. also metrics
 monologue 1184; 1197
 and philosophy 107; 1189
 'point', tragic 151; 158
praetexta 156
 s. psychagogia
 'destined for mere recitation' 1182
 rhetorical elements 102; 1181
 school dramas 1196
 self-conquest 1190
stichomythia 1197
 vehicle for mythology 106 view of man 1190
- Trajan 1536
- Trakl, Georg 758
- transference of literature
 s. exegesis, commentary, typological
 interpretation
 s. transmission
 s. reception
 s. the sections 'Sources, Models,
 and Genres' and 'Greek
 Background' in all chapters
- translation 14-15; 26; 79; 116-117;
1299; 1301; 1616-1617; 1648; 1652;
1662-1663; 1709
- Bible translations 1281; 1316;
1526-1527; 1534; 1570; 1582;
1648-1649; 1658
 free imitation 135; 186; 208-209;
 226; 339; 507-508; 537-539
 from Latin into Greek 1377
 literal 505; 508; 565; 1619; 1623 of philosophical texts 1292; 1709
 s. reception
 s. vertere
- transmission 1741-1749
 s. the paragraphs ("Transmission") in all chapters on authors
 Augustus 409; 669
 Charlemagne 1746
 Church 10
 Cicero 211; 550
 institutions, groups, individuals:
 importance for transmission 1741-1749
 monasteries 1659; 1745
 poor transmission of important authors 302-303; 352; 1137;
1139; 1460; 1747
 Roman senators 862; 1745 scholars 585-586; 1744
 schools 8; 232; 585
- travelers, handbooks for 1332
- travel novels 1206; 1222; 1273
- travel poems 747; 1322; 1332; 1360;
 s. itineraria
- travesty, s. literary technique
- Trebatius Testa 647; 715; 890; 1587
- Trevet(h), Nicholas 1196
- Trier (Trèves) 1289
- trinity, s. theology
- trivial literature 1453
- Trogus, Pompeius 869-873; 1063;
1068; 1074; 1086; 1132; 1266;
1373

- truth and beauty 296; 516; 1353; 1437;
1602; 1652
 and Christianity 1562; 1605; 1703 not communicable publicly 1561 criteria of 1571
 daughter of time 1484
 and historiography 360; 399–400;
 414–415; 419; 447–448; 832; 840;
1069; 1122; 1180; 1372; 1426 knowledge of 531; 1561; 1667 and literature 1215; 1601; 1686
 and poetry (or deception) 76;
 138–139; 247; 254–255; 271;
 277–278; 298; 604; 728; 1009;
1011; 1303; 1346; 1352–1353;
1356; 1363; 1601; 1606; 1710
 and rhetoric 496; 1693
 search for 1683; 1695
- Tubero, s. Aelius
- Turenne, Henri 1094
- Turnus, satirist 1021
- Turpilius 97; 209
- Twelve Tables* 631–633; 6; 46; 63–64;
 584; 618; 624; 631–633
- typological interpretation,
 prefiguration 921; 941; 961–963;
1110–1111 (Alexander-Caesar); 1164;
1220; 1316; 1355; 1380; 1574; 1618;
1629; 1639; 1694
- Tyrannius, s. Rufinus, translator
- Tyrtaeus 743
- Tzetzes 885
- Uhland, Ludwig 969
- Ulpianus, Domitius 622; 628; 1276;
1291; 1506; 1510; 1514; 1516; 1522
- Ulpianus Marcellus, jurist 1501; 1506
- d'Urfé, Honoré 701
- Uz, Johann Peter 735
- Vacca 926
- Valens 1611
- Valerius Aedituus 156; 159; 333; 341
- Valerius Antias 385–386; 64;
 366–367; 384–387; 839; 1075; 1371;
 1385; 1587
- Valerius Cato 263; 585
- Valerius, s. Catullus
- Valerius Flaccus 932–943; 9; 79–80;
 697; 898; 902; 905; 909; 947;
948–950; 953; 1087; 1091; 1747
- Valerius, s. Martial
- Valerius Maximus 1074–1081; 161;
 383; 477; 834; 863; 872; 898; 1065;
1296; 1371; 1422;
- Valerius, s. Probus
- Valgius Rufus 271
- Valerius Soranus 570; 584
- Valéry, P. 700
- Valla, Lorenzo 865; 1093; 1262
- Vallone, Giovanni Antonio 1015
- values, Roman 29–41; 86; 140; 419; 691–692; 846; 1133
 s. also the Latin terms
 ascribed to other peoples 421; 1126
 in Caesar 421–440
 change 69–74; 350; 1079; 1128;
1133
 Christianized 1575; 1640
 petrified 856 sense of tradition 6; 12–14; 19; 33; 40; 207; 225; 646
 shaped by authors 39; 202; 330;
 853–854
 solidarity with the enemy 679
 spiritualized 641
 traditional and new 38–39; 55;
 160; 334
- Varchi, B. 234
- varietas*, s. literary technique
- Varius Rufus, L. 66; 80; 97; 107;
 161; 644; 649; 711; 930; 934
- Varro, M. Terentius (Reatinus), scholar 593–616; 56; 59; 63; 67;
 117; 127; 153; 164; 208; 215; 231;
 246; 256; 258; 271; 352; 362; 378;
 383; 388; 419; 468; 470; 477; 480;
 502; 504; 532; 564–572; 584–585;
 646; 654; 676; 772; 802; 810; 854;
 875; 881; 883; 974; 1064; 1075;
1177; 1267; 1221; 1222; 1239; 1266;
1267; 1534; 1537–1538; 1587; 1597;
1599; 1618; 1678; 1681; 1713; 1743;
1747
- Varro, P. Terentius (Atacinus),
 poet 333; 739; 772; 1049
- Vasquez de Lucènes 867
- vates*, s. poet
- Vatinius, P. 504
- Vega, Garcilaso de la 701; 734
- vegetarianism 1023; 1158; 1175;
1189; 1250; s. also Pythagoreanism

- Vegetius Rhenanus, P. Flavius 574; 569–570; 1479–1498;
 Vegius (-o), Maphaeus 1702
 Vellius Longus 1291; 1468
velle, s. will
 Velleius Paterculus 1061–1074; 353;
 387; 455; 761; 827; 872; 898; 1108
 Venantius Fortunatus 473; 1289;
 1315; 1328; 1348
 Vergerio, Pier Paolo 234
 Verginius Flavus 900; 1008
veritas, s. truth
 Verrius Flaccus 877–879; 264; 304;
 567; 584; 610; 891; 1075; 1267;
 1479; 1618
 versatility of Roman authors 11; 15;
 77; 113; 122; 132; 146–147; 341;
 570–571; 668; 810; 1174–1175
vertere 193
 Vespa 1311
 Vesuvius, eruption of 1938; 1152;
 1265; s. also Pliny the Elder and the Younger
 Vettius Philocomus 263
Vetus Latina 1281–1282
 Vico, Giambattista 1140
 Victorinus, s. Marius
 Victorinus of Pettau 1648; 1662
 Victorius 1496
 Victory, altar of 1443; 1632
 Vida, M. Hieronymus 699; 702
 Vidal, Gore 1431
 Villalobos, Francisco de 201
 Villani, Filippo 885
 Villegas, Jerónimo de 1033
 Villena, Enrique de 698
 Vincent of Beauvais 444; 556; 644;
 815; 857; 1081; 1702
 Vincent of Lerinum 1289
 Vinciguerra, Antonio 1033
 Vipstanus Messalla 1109
 Virgil 667–710; 5–14; 16; 34–35;
 76–88; 127; 135; 142–143; 153;
 155; 157–159; 161–162; 200; 228;
 230; 236; 254–255; 259; 269–275;
 277–283; 290; 295–296; 301–302;
 304; 306; 330; 383; 403; 437; 490;
 502–504; 510; 539; 593; 601;
 610–611; 643–646; 648–656;
 660–666; 711–713; 733; 745; 752;
 754; 757–758; 760; 770; 772; 777;
 787–788; 803; 810; 814; 824–830;
 849; 875; 898–899; 902; 909; 916;
 918–920; 921; 927–928; 934–935;
 940; 947; 950; 952; 956; 960–966;
 974; 976; 991–994; 1033;
 1046–1048; 1052; 1078; 1087–1089;
 1111; 1114; 1128; 1175; 1180; 1185;
 1219; 1228; 1241; 1272; 1303; 1306;
 1311–1312; 1316; 1322–1323; 1325;
 1333; 1343; 1349; 1353; 1359;
 1361–1363; 1367; 1380; 1392; 1399;
 1443; 1454; 1468–1470; 1473; 1477;
 1486–1488; 1534; 1555–1557; 1563;
 1576; 1582; 1587; 1597–1599; 1628;
 1634; 1646; 1656; 1676; 1681;
 1685–1686; 1719; 1730; 1732; 1747
 the Aeneid a 'picture of human life' 1474 compared to nature 1487
     as a new Orpheus 993
 Virius Nicomachus Flavianus 1381
virtus 35; 80; 107; 143; 248; 257;
 261; 369; 393; 438; 447; 450–451;
 484; 548; 846; 967; 1068; 1110;
 1122; 1127–1128; 1190; 1209; 1364;
 1415–1416; 1429; 1572; 1603
via contemplativa, s. contemplative life
 Vitalis of Blois 202
 Vitruvius 880–887; 565–567; 569;
 611; 644; 647; 651; 876–877
 Vitry, Jacques 1093
 Vives, Juan Luis 1417
 vocabulary, s. language and style
 Volcarius Sedigitus 68; 206; 212;
 214; 231; 584
 Voltacilius Pitholaus 480
 Voltaire 308–309; 558; 699; 762;
 929; 1140; 1197; 1234; 1431
 Vondel, Joost Van Den 698; 816;
 1197
 Voss, Johann Heinrich 699; 735
 Votienus Montanus 1246
 Vulgate 1526; 1648; 1659–1660

 Walahfrid Strabo 697; 1252; 1328
 Waltharius 969
 Walther of Châtillon 1093
 Walther of Speyer 425
 Walther von der Vogelweide 323
 Wandalbert of Prüm 697 war 30; 141; 302;
     art of war and land surveying
     420–421; 427

- art of war, s. technical writings
bellum iustum 374; 414; 692 civil war 74; 298; 411–412; 422;
 453; 519–520; 594–595; 641–643;
 711; 769; 830–831; 834; 836;
 913–932; 1131; 683
 defensive politics 1416
 lack of sympathy for politics of peace 1126
 s. also literary technique,
 descriptions machines 880; 1478
 not idealized 140
 officials as authors 427–429; 1061; 1381–1382
 s. pax religious war 1021
 social war 52; 751
 stratagems 986
 Weckherlin, Wilhelm Ludwig
 735
 Wendelinus of Speyer 1094
 Wiclif (Wycliffe) 1702
 Widukind 456
 Wieland, Christoph Martin 309; 425;
 455; 735; 1155
 Wilder, Thornton 233; 355; 426 will, free 302; 1134; 1539; 1562;
 1590; 1698; 1712; 1725–1728
 will, juridical 628–629
velle 193
voluntas 1621
 William of Malmesbury 1081; 1406;
 1746
 Wimpfeling, Jacob 234
 Winckelmann, Johann Joachim 309
 Wipo 456
 wisdom, sapientia 36; 57; 140; 284;
 403; 529; 556; 725; 730; 853; 1013;
 1562; 1601; 1604; 1607; 1692–1693;
 1714 better than violence 140
 and beauty 1601–1602
 culinary ‘gastrosophy’ 716; 719
 Jewish tradition of 1306
 and religion 1603; 1676 and science 1675
 women actresses 100
 and athletics 773
 as authors of pornographic writings 801
 change of the ideal 1079–1080 chivalrous attitude to them 1008 educated 774; 1023; 1215
 emancipated 1225
 as a (sweet) evil 260; 403
 s. female characters friendship between men and
 women 349–350
hetaerae (rapacious or magnanimous) 180–183; 208; 221; 744
 s. libertines
 of noble family (and their vulgar lovers) 1020 and passion 773
 as poets, s. Cornificia, ‘Perilla’, Proba, Sappho, Sulpicia
 as helpful relatives 1008; 1158–1159
 their role at Rome 36 n. 1
domina 746 adultery 100; 181; 228; 789 clothing, free 886; osé 609 expensive 390
 complaints about their lot 117
 as the ‘divine beloved’,
 s. apotheosis
 marriage 349; 609; 1022; 1029 wives viewed negatively 230 positively 796; 811; 913 laws on marriage 649; 789
 as mothers 491; 913; 1664–1665 mother-in-law as a sympathetic figure 220
 satire on marriage 251
 libertines, wives, courtesans 714
 political influence 1159
 satire on 1020; 1022; 1029
 as sponsors of poets 1944;
 1038–1039
 as sponsors of Church Fathers 1647 relatively free status at Rome 1191 title roles in drama 99; 112;
 117; 125; s. also female characters virtues 1082
 word, verbal architecture, compound words, word play, s. language and style
 Wordsworth, William 312; 818
 work, s. labor

- work, songs of 42–43; 323; 1310;
s. also pre-literary texts
- Wyat, Thomas 1015; 1033
- Xenophanes 275; 298; 1240
- Xenophon 38; 362; 399; 413; 414;
417; 438; 465; 473; 479; 502; 801;
1177; 1241
- Xenophon of Ephesos 1205; 1221
- Yeats, William Butler 783
- Yevtushenko 736
- Zapata, Luis 733
- Zenobius 456
- Zeno, Stoic 1177; 1537
- Zosimus 1423
- Zuckmayer, Carl 236

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

8th c. B.C.	Greek colonization of Campania
753 B.C.	Alleged foundation of Rome
About 510	End of Etruscan kingship at Rome. Beginning of the Republic
End of 6th c.	The Capitoline she-wolf. Lapis niger
Mid-5th c.	The Twelve Tables
About 390	Rome taken by the Gauls
312	Appius Claudius Caecus, famous orator. During his censorship the Aqua Appia and Via Appia (from Rome to Capua) were built
272	Tarentum taken by the Romans. Influence of Greek theater

REPUBLICAN PERIOD I

(about 240–81 B.C.)

241	End of the First Punic War which, still in the 3rd c., would become the subject of Naevius' epic, a poet from Capua. Italy and Sicily unified: beginning of a Latin literature
240	First performance of a literary Latin drama in Rome (by Livius Andronicus who, in all probability, came from Tarentum)
218–201	Second Punic War, to be treated in Greek prose by Fabius Pictor and in Latin verse by Ennius from southern Italy
211	Syracuse taken by the Romans. Works of art brought to Rome as trophies
197	Victory of Cynoscephalae (over Philipp V of Macedonia)
196	Greece declared 'free'
191	Gallia Cisalpina made a Roman province

- 186 Scandal of the Bacchanalia: the cult of Bacchus prohibited
- 184 Death of the playwright Plautus
- 169 Death of Ennius, a poetic multi-talent
- 168 Battle of Pydna: victory of L. Aemilius Paullus over Perseus of Macedonia. The royal library of Pella brought to Rome. Greek schools at Rome. The historian Polybius comes to Rome
- 166–160 Terence's comedies performed
- 149 Death of Cato Censorius (orator, historian, and author of a work on agriculture)
- 146 Destruction of Carthage and Corinth
- 133 Numantia taken by the Romans. Attalus III of Pergamon bequeathes his kingdom to the Romans. Pergamene scholarship imbued with Stoicism becomes influential in Rome
- 133–121 Tiberius and Gaius Gracchus
- 121 Gallia Narbonensis becomes a Roman province
- 111–105 Jugurthine War. Numidia becomes a Roman province
- 106 Cicero born
- 100 Caesar born

Conditions

Initially, poets are foreigners or freedman, later on, at best, free natives of Italy.

Prose authors are senators (or their clients).

Poets come from southern or central Italy (Terence is African), orators and historians from central Italy.

Genre

Poetry

Epic: Livius Andronicus: His Oduvia is a part of primitive history of Italy; Naevius: First Punic War; Ennius: Second Punic War.

Drama: Tragedy (Ennius, Pacuvius, Accius), Comedy (rich style: Plautus, Caecilius; severe style: Terence), along with these genres, there are other, partly popular, forms.

Lyric: Expiatory hymn of Livius Andronicus. Epigrams: significant early inscriptions of the Scipios; later (about 100) playful love epigrams.

Prose

Oratory (rich style: Cato; severe style: C. Gracchus; history (Cato and the Annalists). First encounters with philosophy (Crates of Mallus). Beginnings of philology (partly also influenced by Stoicism).

Influences

Graeco-Roman: the term 'translation' is somewhat misleading if applied to early Roman free adaptations. Roman authors earlier adapted contemporary (Hellenistic) Greek literature than classical or archaic works. They viewed Homer through the eyes of Hellenistic historical epic and Hellenistic imitations of Homer, and classical Greek tragedy through the prism of Hellenistic drama and its practice of performance. They assimilated myth simultaneously with the different forms of rational 'demythification', so that literal belief in myth was excluded a priori. The mediating and pioneering roles of early Roman poets, such as Ennius, compelled them to show their talents in many genres.

Junctions and bridges for cultural influences were: the theatrical tradition of Magna Graecia, especially Tarentum (for Latin drama, beginning with Livius Andronicus), southern Italy, and Sicily (Archestratus, Epicharmus, Euhemerus, and Pythagoreanism in Ennius); Pergamon, Pella, Rhodus (Stoic influences which were bound to determine the intellectual evolution of Roman culture); presence of Greek philosophers at Rome; learned slaves and freedmen.

Ideas

Individual identity: an identity based on intellectual achievement is developed by authors of humble origin. Philosophical doctrine (such as the migration of souls in Ennius' Pythagorean dream of Homer) is not believed as a dogma, but exploited as a means of self-portrayal.

Political identity: Naeuius, Ennius, and Cato the Elder define basic values of the Roman Republic. At the same time, however, the thirst for fame of Roman families (gentes) and even individuals was expressed in literature. Even a poet as early as Ennius was not free of hero-worship (Scipio).

Inter-cultural relationships: the Hellenization of Roman life progressed irresistibly, transforming not only its material but also its intellectual aspects. Following Greek philosophers Ennius ranked wisdom above force. Cato made a plea for leniency (clementia) towards the Rhodians, disguising modern common sense as an ancient Roman moral principle. Drama, by referring to philosophical discussions or categories, encouraged its public to reflect. The education of orators was based both on Roman practice and on the teachings of Greek rhetors; the dissemination of rhetoric through Latin rhetors, however, met with serious obstacles for a long time.

REPUBLICAN PERIOD II
(about 81–43 B.C.)

- 92 Latin rhetors disciplined by the censor L. Licinius Crassus
 91–89 The so-called Social War (the Italics' struggle for citizenship)
 88–82 Civil war between Marius (or the Marians) and Sulla
 86 Sallust born
 82–79 Sulla's dictatorship. The sanctuary of Fortuna at Praeneste
 81 Cicero's first speech (Pro Quinctio)
 70 First consulate of Pompey. Process against Verres. Virgil born
 65 Horace born
 63 Cicero's consulate. Catilinarian conspiracy. The later Augustus born
 62 So-called first triumvirate: Pompey, Caesar, Crassus
 58–57 Cicero's exile
 58–51 Gaul conquered by Caesar
 57–56 Catullus and Cinna together with Memmius in Bithynia
 55 Caesar's first arrival in Britain. Pompey's theater in Rome (first theater of stone). Cicero De oratore. Death of Lucretius
 53 Battle of Carrhae: loss of the Roman standards and death of Crassus
 51 Cicero accomplished his De re publica and Caesar his Bellum Gallicum
 48 Battle of Pharsalus: victory of Caesar over Pompey
 46 Suicide of Cato the Younger in Utica
 45 Introduction of the Julian calendar (Sosigenes)
 44 Caesar murdered
 43 'Second' triumvirate: Antonius, Lepidus, and the later Augustus. First consulate of the latter. Death of Cicero. Ovid born

Conditions

The poet Catullus was a member of the municipal aristocracy; Lucretius, too, was independent. Most prose writers were active politicians and senators (an exception is Nepos).

Origin of authors: most of the authors were from central Italy, Catullus from northern Italy.

Genre

Poetry

Culmination of non-political poetry (Lucretius, Catullus).

Prose

Oratory (Cicero); autobiography and commentarius (Sulla, Caesar); biography (Nepos). Comprehensive introductions to philosophy in polished literary prose (Cicero) or verse (Lucretius). First steps towards a systematic approach to law (Scaevola, Cicero). Varro as a universal scholar.

Influences

The influence of classical Attic oratory helped to subdue the Hellenistic exuberance of Asian oratory (Crassus, Hortensius); the Atticists were strict representatives of the new trend, and Cicero a moderate one. Books on rhetoric based on Hellenistic precedents (cf. the Auctor ad Herennium) gained philosophical scope by especially following Aristotle (Cicero). The same Cicero, when assimilating Hellenistic political philosophy, competed with Plato. Cicero and Lucretius shaped the content of Hellenistic philosophy into forms reminiscent of classical (Plato) and archaic Greece (Empedocles). Caesar in his commentarii outdid Xenophon. Callimachean standards of quality (Catullus) applied to small and medium-sized (e.g. epyllion) poetic forms; occasionally there were echoes of archaic Greek lyric (Catullus: Sappho). Varro transferred the methods of Hellenistic linguistics and antiquarian scholarship to the Latin language and Roman culture.

Ideas

Personal identity: the loosening of political links gave more prominence to the individual (autobiography; biography) and encouraged the search for a fulfilled life outside politics (philosophy: Lucretius; love-poetry: Catullus).

Political identity: the crisis of the Roman Republic made it possible to grasp and re-define the basic ideas of Roman politics, morals, and law, partly with the aid of Greek philosophy (Cicero, the jurists). The Annalists and Varro developed an awareness of a Roman historical and linguistic identity.

Inter-cultural relationships: Graeco-Roman series of biographies (Nepos) and the parallel use of Greek and Roman examples in literature (Cicero, prepared by Cato) constitute a 'twofold ancestry' and a Graeco-Roman cultural identity.

Augustan Period (about 43 B.C. A.D. 14)

- 42 Battle of Philippi. Horace sides with Brutus as an officer about
42–35 Virgil's Eclogues
- 41–40 War of Perusia. Among the citizens killed by the future Augustus there is a relative of Propertius
about 39–29 Virgil's Georgics
- 31 Battle of Actium
about
29–19 Virgil's Aeneid
- 28 Inauguration of the temple of Apollo on the Palatine
- 27 Title of Augustus. Agrippa begins the construction of the Pantheon
- 26 Suicide of Cornelius Gallus
- 23 Death of Marcellus. Beginning of the construction of the Marcellus theater. Horace, Odes, Books 1 3
- 20 The Parthians render to the Romans the standards lost by Crassus
Horace, Epistles, Book 1
- 19 (17 at the latest) Deaths of Virgil and Tibullus
- 18 Lex Iulia de maritandis ordinibus
- 17 Secular games. Horace's Carmen saeculare
- 13–9 Ara Pacis
- 8 Death of Horace
- 2 Augustus pater patriae. Forum of Augustus about - Ovid, Ars amatoria
A.D. 8 Ovid, Metamorphoses
A.D. 14 Death of Augustus. Res gestae Divi Augusti

Conditions

Origin of authors: southern Italy (Horace), central Italy (Sallust, Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid), northern Italy (Virgil, Livy)

Circle of Maecenas: close to the Princeps, comprising authors of merit without regard to their origin

Circle of Messalla: more aloof of the Princeps, opened also to young authors, but of family Historians were senators (Sallust, Pollio), later on, professional writers (Livy).

GenrePoetry

Apogee of epic: Virgil's Aeneid. Didactic poetry: Virgil's Georgics; blending of genres in Horace's Ars poetica (Epistula ad Pisones) and Ovid's Ars amatoria.

New genres: Bucolica (Virgil): a well-structured collection of ten poems (cf. Horace, Satires, book 1 and the first book of Tibullus). Horace's book of Iambi and the first three books of Odes were innovative both metrically and as collections.

Horace limited satire to the hexameter and created poetic epistle.

Zenith of elegy (Propertius, Tibullus, Ovid)

Epigram (Marsus)

Prose

Historiography only now gained high literary rank.

Political speech, which had lost importance, was replaced with scholastic declamation: 'pointed style'.

Vitruvius' De architectura.

Influences

Graeco-Roman: Virgil's intellectual development led him from Hellenistic to classical and archaic models: from neoteric miniature poetry to Theocritean idyll, Aratean and Hesiodic didacticism and, finally, Homeric epic. Similarly, Horace, in his Odes, was not content with Hellenistic models but went on to early Greek poets. These authors move against the mainstream of the development of literary history; their early Greek models helped them to become intellectually independent.

Latin historiography, competing with Hellenistic and older models, for the first time, finds a clear-cut identity: Sallust may be called a Roman Thucydidean, Livy a Herodotean. To the archaizing tendencies in prose and poetry there are parallel developments in the fine arts and even in the political climate of the Augustan period.

Within Latin literature: Sallust deliberately adds a Catonian touch to his personal archaizing style. Horace as a satirist has to struggle with Lucilius; however, he is aware of his own superiority to this predecessor. In elegy, there is an even more conspicuous Latin tradition. By now, it has become possible to lead a dialogue with an authoritative indigenous ancestry, which soon will be felt to be of equal rank as the Greek tradition.

Ideas

Personal identity: elegy develops a private way of living a fulfilled life; in his Metamorphoses, Ovid projected the theme of love into the large format of an epic, almost aloof from politics. In his exile, poetic ingenium became a second authority besides the princeps. The pointlessness of political activity allowed a reevaluation of philosophic contemplation (Manilius)

Political identity: a new peace after decades of chaos found an epic repercussion in the Aeneid; the values represented in this work were soon accepted as an expression of Roman identity. Virgil and Horace, who, as vates, felt responsible for their society, in many respects were in advance of their times and held a mirror up to their contemporaries and to Augustus: Virgil insists on pietas to the point of solidarity with the enemy. In Horace's Roman Odes, the Muse imparts lene consilium to the ruler. Livy projects an almost Menandrian sense of humanity (of which his contemporaries are badly in need) onto early Rome, thus transforming the Roman Republic retrospectively into a treasury of civic virtues looking to the future.

Inter-cultural relationships: Virgil shaped a Roman myth and confidently made it a counterpiece to Homer's myth. Many passages in his work indicate that the antithesis between the two cultures has been superseded by reconciliation.

With astounding completeness, Ovid transmitted to us Greek myth and Livy transmitted Roman history as two arsenals of typical characters, situations and patterns of behavior. At the same time, Graeco-Latin 'twin libraries' were built.

EARLY EMPIRE

(A.D. 14–117)

- 14–37 Tiberius. History and poetry use small forms
- 37–41 Caligula
- 41–54 Claudius
- 54–68 Nero. Literature and art are freed from traditional constraints
- 64 Conflagration of Rome. Persecution of Christians. Nero's Golden House
- 65 Pisonian conspiracy. Seneca and Lucan compelled to suicide
- 66 Petronius compelled to suicide
- 68–69 The year of four emperors
- 69–79 Vespasian
- 70 The Romans destroy Jerusalem. In Rome, beginning of the construction of the Flavian Amphitheater

79	Eruption of Mount Vesuvius. Death of Pliny the Elder
79–81	Titus
81–96	Domitian. Arch of Titus. Domitian's palace. Flavian neo-classicism in literature (Quintilian, Pliny)
96	Domitian inaugurates the Ludi Capitolini
96–98	Nerva
97	Frontinus as curator aquarum
98–117	Trajan
100	Pliny's Panegyricus
114	Trajan's arch in Beneventum
117	Trajan's column

Conditions

Authors frequently come from Spain (the Senecas, Lucan, Martial, Quintilian), along with northern Italy (the Plinii).

Private patronage; imperial death sentences; poetic competitions

Some poets are of noble descent (Lucan, Valerius Flaccus, Silius Italicus, Persius), others need maecenases (Calpurnius, Statius, Juvenal; Martial exaggerates his poverty); Phaedrus is a freedman.

Prose writers are senators (the Plinii, Tacitus, Petronius), officers (Velleius), or they are commissioned by the state (Quintilian).

Genre

Poetry

Minor forms and utilitarian texts are raised to the rank of literature (fable, epigram, occasional poem).

Historical epic as an antithesis to the Aeneid (Lucan) or as its continuation in the historical dimension (Silius). Mythological epic: Greek subject matter in post-Virgilian form.

Tragedy: Tyrants and criminals.

Satire: Philosophical seriousness (Persius) and tragic pathos (Juvenal)

Prose

Oratory as a sophisticated school exercise or as praise of the emperor.

History written in Latin attains its peak in Tacitus.

Compendium: Unlike Augustan Livy, Velleius prefers short form.

'Lower' genres raised to the rank of literature: letter (Seneca, Pliny); novel (Petronius).

Influences

Greco-Roman: Greek literature continues to be assimilated, but is viewed through the eyes of Roman tradition. A typical example is epic, which shapes Greek heroic myth into post-Vergilian structures and categories.

Within Latin literature: by now, imitation can be extended on Roman models; thus, epic and satire develop to a high degree of intellectual self-awareness.

Ideas

Personal identity: political pressure entailed psychological discoveries such as 'pleasure taken in evildoing' (in Seneca) and conscience (in Tacitus). Rhetoric is spiritualized into a method of psychological guidance and self-education (Seneca). The individual author takes an independent attitude towards tradition (Seneca).

Political identity: Stoic virtues of resistance prevail. The literary development of Stoic virtues of emperors and of functionaries' virtues for their subjects (moderatio) point to the future.

Inter-cultural relationships: in a literary collection, Valerius Maximus juxtaposes Roman exempla on a par with foreign exempla. There are Graeco-Latin poetic contests. Quintilian recommends Greek for elementary teaching. The 'Romanizing' assimilation of the myths of Thebes and the Argonauts in postvirgilian epic is a keystone in this regard.

MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

(A.D. 117–565)

- |           |  |
|-----------|--|
| 17–138    | Hadrian. Imperial villa in Tivoli. Castel Sant'Angelo in Rome. Olympieion in Athens. Hadrian's wall in Britain. New construction of the Pantheon in Rome. Temple of Venus and Roma in Rome |
| 120       | Death of Plutarch (author of parallel biographies of Greeks and Romans)  |
| 132–135   | Insurrection of the Jews under Bar-Cochba  |
| 138–161   | Antoninus Pius. The limes in Germany  |
| 161–180   | Marcus Aurelius, the emperor as philosopher, writes his Εἰς ἑαυτὸν in Greek. Marcus' column in Rome   |
| about 175 | Pausanias' periegesis   |
| 180–192   | Commodus   |
| 193–211   | Septimius Severus. His arch on the Forum Romanum   |
| 197       | (or later) Tertullian, Apologeticum   |

- 212 Constitutio Antoniniana (Roman citizenship for almost all free citizens of the empire)
- 218–222 Elagabalus
- 222–235 Severus Alexander. Cassius Dio writes Roman history in Greek. Porta Nigra at Trier
- 249–251 Decius. Persecution of Christians. Cyprian's martyrdom
- 253/4 Death of Origen
- 260–268 Gallienus. Edict of tolerance in favor of the Christians. Plotinus' teaching activity in Rome
- 270–275 Aurelian. Fortifications built around Rome
- 284–305 Diocletian. Thermae in Rome. Residences in Trier and Saloniki: Palaces in Split and Piazza Armerina
- 306–337 Constantine. Lactantius, a 'Christian Cicero' with 'classical' tastes
- 312 Constantine's victory over Maxentius at the Milvian bridge
- 313 Edict of tolerance of Milan. Arch of Constantine in Rome
- 324 Foundation of Constantinople
- 325 Council of Nicaea
- 361–363 Julian the Apostate
- 379–395 Theodosius I ('the Great'). Renaissance of Latin literature
- 384 Symmachus' Relatio on the altar of Victoria
- 393 Last celebration of the Olympic Games
- 395–423 Honorius
- 397 Death of Ambrose of Milan
- 408 Death of Stilicho
- 410 Alaric conquers Rome
- 420 Jerome's death
- 430 Augustine's death
- 438 Codex Theodosianus
- 451 Battle of the Catalaunian Fields against the Huns
- 476 End of the Western Roman Empire
- 491 Theodoric proclaimed king
- 524 Death of Boethius
- 527–565 Justinian
- 528–534 Corpus Iuris Civilis
- 529 Justinian closes down the Platonic Academy. Benedict founds his monastic community in Monte Cassino

Conditions

Rise of cultural provinces. The imperial court resides at different places (panegyrici in prose or verse), senatorial aristocracy in Rome (preservation of classical literature, a receptive public for authors like Ammianus). Other centers (like Carthage or Milan) offer similar conditions for authors; the same is true of schools (which employ grammarians and rhetors) and the Church. There are excellent law schools, also in the east.

Authors often are members of the upper classes or, at least, adopt their moral categories.

A great many authors come from Africa (2nd–4th century). There follow Gaul (5th century), Italy (6th century), Spain (4th–8th century). Jerome was born in Dalmatia.

GenrePoetry

Panegyric epic (Claudian), poetic miniature forms (Hadrian, Ausonius, Claudian). Christian poetry: Lactantius uses traditional forms, as do authors of Bible epics and, especially, Prudentius; on the other hand, there are hymns, partly in new forms.

Prose

Middle empire: oratory (Panegyrici Latini; Apuleius; Symmachus); biography (Suetonius); novel (Apuleius); philosophic writings (Apuleius); prime of juridic literature.

Under the auspices of Christianity there appear: Bible translations, acts of martyrs, and, in due course, lives of saints. Apologetic writing predominates during the period before the Nicene Council; after that date, dogmatics and polemics among Christians take pride of place. Relatively new genres were: psychological autobiography (Augustine), works on philosophy of history (Augustine).

Influences

Graeco-Roman: the decay of the knowledge of Greek in the west indirectly fostered the rise of precise translations of technical texts on philosophy and the improvement of philosophical terminology in Latin. Now, finally, the Latin language was ready to assimilate philosophy completely and in a scholarly way (Marius Victorinus, Augustine, Boethius) and even mathematical thought (Boethius), thus anticipating modern times.

Within Latin literature: the assimilation of pagan Latin literature by the Christian authors can be interpreted either as a renaissance or as a spiritu-alized metamorphosis (Cicero's and Ambrose's De officiis; Cicero's De oratore and Augustine's De doctrina Christiana). As a religion based on a book Christianity furthered the introverted metamorphosis of rhetoric into hermeneutics. Reading of written evidence as 'signs' encourages a creative assimilation of domestic Latin tradition on a higher level of understanding.

From the Biblical tradition to Latin: a third strand of tradition was added now: the biblical one. The non-rhetorical character of literal Latin Bible translations was a serious obstacle for ancient readers; it was left to Jerome to find the right balance between the exigencies of both precision and beauty. A further barrier the moral offensiveness of many stories of the Old Testament was surmounted by allegorical interpretation (beginning with Philo the Jew and Christians like Origen and Ambrose), a method originally developed by philosophers and applied by them to Greek myth. Collections of testimonia (as compiled by Cyprian, for instance) served a 'pneumatic' reading of the Old Testament or a reading centered on Christ prepared as early as in the New Testament.

Ideas

Personal identity: the liberation of the individual by a savior god (in Apuleius and the Church Fathers) or by means of (religiously tinged) philosophy (here, 'conversion' is an important motif) is found in both pagans and Christians, partly in the tradition of 'exhortations to contemplative life and scientific knowledge' such as Cicero's Hortensius and Lucretius' 'imitation of Epicurus'. This enabled the individual to take an independent and critical standpoint outside the Roman res publica. Monotheism, which at first glance was in harmony with most of the philosophical schools, allowed Christianity to present itself as a 'philosophy' and to surpass other mystery cults intellectually.

Political identity: emperors again and again adopted the strongest existent intellectual force at the right moment, thus depriving it of its oppositional potential: in the 2nd century this was true of Stoic philosophy, in the 4th, of Christianity. Beside this, other efforts to provide power with a religious foundation pale into insignificance (such as Elagabalus' or Aurelian's religious innovations and Julian's belated Neoplatonic restoration of paganism).

Inter-cultural relationships: in the 2nd and 3rd centuries Latin literature was thrown into the shade. Among the few exceptions there are two bilingual but predominantly Latin authors: Apuleius and Tertullian. Greek was used not by philosophers only (such as the Christian author Origen and the pagan Plotinus) but even by Rome's historian Cassius Dio and Aelius Aristides, author of a eulogy of Rome. Latin literature experienced a renaissance only in the 4th century (partly conditioned by the political situation). Then, even native Greeks wrote in Latin (Claudian and Ammianus).

The Hellenization of Christian and Jewish traditions was first marked by Stoicism (2nd century), later (from the 3rd century onward), by Platonism. A Romanization of the same tradition shows from the application of juridic categories and the spiritualization of Roman values, which were transferred from the res publica to the Church and from pagan to Christian martyrs. Finally the Romans' mistrust of theory and their preference for practical life were congenial with Jewish traditions.

SUPPLEMENTS TO MNEMOSYNE

EDITED BY J. M. BREMER, L. F. JANSSEN, H. PINKSTER
H. W. PLEKET, C. J. RUIJGH AND P. H. SCHRIJVERS

Recent volumes in the series:

130. JONG, I.J.F. DE, & J.P. SULLIVAN (eds.). Modern Critical Theory and Classical Literature. 1994. ISBN 90 04 09571 3
131. YAMAGATA, N. Homeric Morality. 1994. ISBN 90 04 09872 0
132. KOVACS, D. Euripidea. 1994. ISBN 90 04 09926 3
133. SUSSMAN, L.A. The Declamations of Calpurnius Flaccus. Text, Translation, and Commentary. 1994. ISBN 90 04 09983 2
134. SMOLENAARS, J.J.L. Statius: Thebaid VII. A Commentary. 1994. ISBN 90 04 10029 6
135. SMALL, D.B. (ed.). Methods in the Mediterranean. Historical and Archaeological Views on Texts and Archaeology. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09581 0
136. DOMINIK, W.J. The Mythic Voice of Statius. Power and Politics in the Thebaid. 1994. ISBN 90 04 09972 7
137. SLINGS, S.R. Plato's Apology of Socrates. A Literary and Philosophical Study with a Running Commentary. Edited and Completed from the Papers of the Late E. DE STRYCKER, s.j. 1994. ISBN 90 04 10103 9
138. FRANK, M. Seneca's Phoenissae. Introduction and Commentary. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09776 7
139. MALKIN, I. & Z.W. RUBINSOHN (eds.). Leaders and Masses in the Roman World. Studies in Honor of Zvi Yavetz. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09917 4
140. SEGAL, A. Theatres in Roman Palestine and Provincia Arabia. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10145 4
141. CAMPBELL, M. A Commentary on Apollonius Rhodius Argonautica III 1-471. 1994. ISBN 90 04 10158 6
142. DEFOREST, M.M. Apollonius' Argonautica: A Callimachean Epic. 1994. ISBN 90 04 10017 2
143. WATSON, P.A. Ancient Stepmothers. Myth, Misogyny and Reality. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10176 4
144. SULLIVAN, S.D. Psychological and Ethical Ideas. What Early Greeks Say. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10185 3
145. CARGILL, J. Athenian Settlements of the Fourth Century B.C. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09991 3
146. PANAYOTAKIS, C. Theatrum Arbitri. Theatrical Elements in the Satyrica of Petronius. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10229 9
147. GARRISON, E.P. Groaning Tears. Ethical and Dramatic Aspects of Suicide in Greek Tragedy. 1995. 90 04 10241 8
148. OLSON, S.D. Blood and Iron. Stories and Storytelling in Homer's Odyssey. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10251 5
149. VINOGRADOV, J.G. & S.D. KRYŽICKIJ (eds.). Olbia. Eine altgriechische Stadt im Nordwestlichen Schwarzmeerraum. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09677 9
150. MAURER, K. Interpolation in Thucydides. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10300 7

151. HORSFALL, N. (ed.) A Companion to the Study of Virgil. 1995 ISBN 90 04 09559 4
152. KNIGHT, V.H. The Renewal of Epic. Responses to Homer in the Argonautica of Apollonius. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10386 4
153. LUSCHNIG, C.A.E. The Gorgon's Severed Head. Studies of Alcestis, Electra, and Phoenissae. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10382 1
154. NAVARRO ANTOLÍN, F. (ed.). Lygdamus. Corpus Tibullianum III. 1-6: Lygdami elegiarum liber. Translated by J.J. Zoltowski. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10210 8
155. MATTHEWS, V.J. Antimachus of Colophon. Text and Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10468 2
156. TREISTER, M.Y. The Role of Metals in Ancient Greek History. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10473 9
157. WORTHINGTON, I. (ed.). Voice into Text. Orality and Literacy in Ancient Greece. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10431 3
158. WIJSMAN, H.J.W. Valerius Flaccus, Argonautica, Book V. A Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10506 9
159. SCHMELING, G. (ed.). The Novel in the Ancient World. 1996. ISBN 90 04 09630 2
160. SICKING, C.M.J. & P. STORK. Two Studies in the Semantics of the Verb in Classical Greek. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10460 7
161. KOVACS, D. Euripidea Altera. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10624 3
162. GERA, D. Warrior Women. The Anonymous Tractatus De Mulieribus. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10665 0
163. MORRIS, I. & B. POWELL (eds.). A New Companion to Homer. 1997. ISBN 90 04 09989 1
164. ORLIN, E.M. Temples, Religion and Politics in the Roman Republic. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10708 8
165. ALBRECHT, M. VON. A History of Roman Literature. From Livius Andronicus to Boethius with Special Regard to Its Influence on World Literature. 2 Vols. Revised by G. Schmeling and by the Author. Vol. 1: Translated with the Assistance of F. and K. Newman, Vol. 2: Translated with the Assistance of R.R. Caston and F.R. Schwartz. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10709 6 (Vol. 1), ISBN 90 04 10711 8 (Vol. 2), ISBN 90 04 10712 6 (Set)

A History of Roman Literature (Michael von Albrecht) is the fourth handbook in E.J. Brill's series The Classical Tradition. The series started in 1995 with Nicholas Horsfall's A Companion to the Study of Virgil and forms part of the Supplements to Mnemosyne series.

The aim is in each case to produce a work which is informative and useful to scholars and accessible to students. Each volume will describe the current state of knowledge of the subject, outline recent literature and discussion, indicate the main controversial points, and suggest fruitful lines for future inquiry. The volumes will be 300 to 1000 pages long and written in English. Some will be written by individual experts: others will assemble chapters by the leading figures in the field concerned under the editorship of one or more senior scholars.

Volumes planned in the series include:

Greek Lyric, edited by Douglas Gerber (1997)

Fourth-Century Greece, by John Buckler (1998)

Greek Colonization, edited by Irad Malkin (1998)

Illustration on the dustjacket:

The Capitoline She-wolf. Seventh century B.C., bronze. Rome, Museo Capitolino. (Permission Giraudon.)

---

Editors

J. M. BREMER • L. F. JANSSEN

H. PINKSTER • H. W. PLEKET

C. J. RUIJGH • P. H. SCHRIJVERS

---

Supplements to Mnemosyne has existed as a book series for the past 40 years, providing a forum for the publication of well over 100 scholarly works on all aspects of the ancient world, including inscriptions, papyri, language, the history of material culture and mentality, the history of peoples and institutions, but also latterly the classical tradition, for example, neo-Latin literature and the history of Classical scholarship.

Works published include monographs, critical text editions, commentaries, and collections of essays by various authors on closely defined themes.

- 147 Garrison, E.P. Groaning Tears. Ethical and Dramatic Aspects of Suicide in Greek Tragedy. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10241 8
- 148 Olson, S.D. Blood and Iron. Stories and Storytelling in Homer's Odyssey. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10251 5
- 149 Vinogradov, J.G. and S.D. Kryžickij. Olbia. Eine altgriechische Stadt im Nordwestlichen Schwarzmeerraum. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09677 9
- 150 Maurer, K. Interpolation in Thucydides. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10300 7
- 151 Horsfall, N. (ed.). A Companion to the Study of Virgil. 1995. ISBN 90 04 09559 4
- 152 Knight V. The Renewal of Epic. Responses to Homer in the Argonautica of Apollonius. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10386 4
- 153 Lusching, C.A.E. The Gorgon's Severed Head. Studies of Alcestis, Electra and Phoenissae. 1995. ISBN 90 04 10382 1
- 154 Navarro Antolín, F. (ed.). Lygdamus. Corpus Tibullianum 111. 1-6: Lygdami Elegiarum Liber. Edition and Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10210 8

- 155 Matthews, V.J. Antimachus of Colophon. Text and Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10468 2
- 156 Treister, M.Y. The Role of Metals in Ancient Greek History. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10473 9
- 157 Worthington, I. (ed.). Voice into Text. Orality and Literacy in Ancient Greece. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10431 3
- 158 Wijsman, H.J.W. Valerius Flaccus: Argonautica, Book v. A Commentary. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10506 9
- 159 Schmeling, G. (ed.). The Novel in the Ancient World. 1996. ISBN 90 04 09630 2
- 160 Sicking, C.M.J. and P. Stork. Two Studies in the Semantics of the Verb in Classical Greek. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10460 7
- 161 Kovacs, D. Euripidea Altera. 1996. ISBN 90 04 10624 3
- 162 Gera, D. Warrior Women. The Anonymous Tractatus De Mulieribus. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10665 0
- 163 Morris, I. and B. Powell (eds.). A New Companion to Homer. 1997. ISBN 90 04 09989 1
- 164 Orlin, E.M. Temples, Religion and Politics in the Roman Republic. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10708 8
- 165 Albrecht, M. von. A History of Roman Literature. From Livius Andronicus to Boethius with Special Regard to Its Influence on World Literature. 2 Vols. Revised by G. Schmeling and by the Author. Vol. 1: Translated with the Assistance of F. and K. Newman, Vol. 2: Translated with the Assistance of R.R. Caston and F.R. Schwartz. 1997. ISBN 90 04 10709 6 (Vol. 1), ISBN 90 04 10711 8 (Vol. 2), ISBN 90 04 10712 6 (Set)

ISBN 90-04-10711-8

9 789004 107113

ISSN 0169-8958