

Michael von Albrecht

A History of
Roman Literature

From Livius Andronicus to Boethius

VOLUME ONE

E. J. BRILL

MICHAEL VON ALBRECHT

A HISTORY OF
ROMAN LITERATURE

From Livius Andronicus to Boethius

WITH BESSIE BISHOP ON ITS INFLUENCE ON MODERN LITERATURE

VOLUME ONE

Michael von Albrecht's A History of Roman Literature, originally published in German, can rightly be seen as the long awaited counterpart to Albin Lesky's Geschichte der griechischen Literatur. In what will probably be the last survey made by a single scholar the whole of Latin literature from Livius Andronicus up to Boethius comes to the fore. 'Literature' is taken here in its broad, antique sense, and therefore also includes e.g. rhetoric, philosophy and history. Special attention has been given to the influence of Latin literature on subsequent centuries down to our own days. Extensive indices give access to this monument of learning. The introductions in Von Albrecht's texts, together with the large bibliographies make further study both more fruitful and easy.

Michael von Albrecht is Emeritus Professor of Classical Philology at the University of Heidelberg. He studied in Tübingen and Paris and has held several guest professorships in the United States and the Netherlands. He is a specialist in Classical Latin poetry (Ovid, Vergil), in Latin high prose (Cicero), text syntax and style, narrative structure, the influence of the Classical tradition in modern literature and music. He is editor of Studien zur Klassischen Philologie, and International Journal of Musicology. His publications include M. Tullius Cicero, Sprache und Stil (1971), Meister römischer Poesie (1971, English translation 1988), Rom: Spiegel Europas (1988), Ovid: Metamorphosen (1989).

A HISTORY OF
ROMAN LITERATURE
VOLUME ONE

MNEMOSYNE

BIBLIOTHECA CLASSICA BATAVA

---

COLLEGERUNT

J. M. BREMER · L. F. JANSSEN · H. PINKSTER

H. W. PLEKET · C. J. RUIJGH · P. H. SCHRIJVERS

BIBLIOTHECAE FASCICULOS EDENDOS CURAVIT

C. J. RUIJGH, KLASSIEK SEMINARIUM, OUDE TURFMARKT 129, AMSTERDAM

SUPPLEMENTUM CENTESIMUM SEXAGESIMUM QUINTUM

MICHAEL VON ALBRECHT

A HISTORY OF ROMAN LITERATURE

VOLUME ONE

A HISTORY OF ROMAN LITERATURE

From Livius Andronicus to Boethius

WITH SPECIAL REGARD TO ITS INFLUENCE ON WORLD LITERATURE

BY

MICHAEL VON ALBRECHT

Revised by Gareth Schmeling and by the author

VOLUME ONE

Translated with the Assistance of Frances and Kevin Newman

E.J. BRILL
LEIDEN · NEW YORK · KÖLN
1997

This English edition was supported by the Stiftung Humanismus Heute des Landes Baden-Württemberg, by the Robert Bosch Company, and by the Inter Nationes (Bonn).

The paper in this book meets the guidelines for permanence and durability of the Committee on Production Guidelines for Book Longevity of the Council on Library Resources.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Albrecht, Michael von.

[Geschichte der römischen Literatur. English]

A history of Roman literature : from Livius Andronicus to Boethius
: with special regard to its influence on world literature / by Michael von Albrecht ; revised by Gareth Schmeling and by the author.

p. cm. — (Mnemosyne, bibliotheca classica Batava.

Supplementum, ISSN 0169-8958 ; 165)

Vol. 1 translated with the assistance of Frances and Kevin Newman ;
v. 2 translated with the assistance of Ruth R. Caston and Francis R.
Schwartz.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 9004107126 (set : alk. paper). — ISBN 9004107096 (v. 1 :
alk. paper). — ISBN 9004107118 (v. 2 : alk. paper)

1. Latin literature—History and criticism. 2. Literature, Modern—Roman influences. 3. Rome—In literature. I. Schmeling, Gareth L. II. Title. III. Series.

PA60Q7.A5513 1996

870.9'001—dc20

96-38926

CIP

Die Deutsche Bibliothek – CIP-Einheitsaufnahme

[Mnemosyne / Supplementum]

Mnemosyne : bibliotheca classica Batava. Supplementum. – Leiden ; New York ; Köln : Brill.

Früher Schriftenreihe

Reihe Supplementum zu: Mnemosyne

165. Albrecht, Michael von: A history of Roman literature.

Vol. 1 – 1996

Albrecht, Michael von:

A history of Roman literature : from Livius Andronicus to Boethius ; with special regard to its influence on world literature / by Michael von Albrecht. Rev. by Gareth Schmeling and by the author. – Leiden ; New York ; Köln : Brill.

(Mnemosyne : Supplementum ; 165)

ISBN 90-04-10712-6

NE: Schmeling, Gareth [Bearb.]

Vol. 1. Transl. with the assistance of Frances and Kevin Newman. – 1996

ISBN 90-04-10709-6

ISBN 90 04 10712 6 (Set)

ISBN 90 04 10709 6 (Vol. I)

Original German edition: © Copyright 21994 by K.G. Saur, München;
New Providence; London; Paris

This edition: © Copyright 1997 by E.J. Brill, Leiden, The Netherlands

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, translated, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without prior written permission from the publisher.

Authorization to photocopy items for internal or personal use is granted by E.J. Brill provided that the appropriate fees are paid directly to The Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Suite 910
Danvers MA 01923, USA.
Fees are subject to change.

PRINTED IN THE NETHERLANDS

TO MY TEACHERS AND TO MY STUDENTS

PREFACE

While many frontiers are opened and world traffic is becoming easier every day, one might ask if this progress in mobility is matched by a progress in mutual understanding. It might be worthwhile to listen, in this context, to the undogmatic voice of that literature which to a special degree influenced all western and some eastern literatures. Even if the answers given by Roman authors may be 'dated', certainly the questions they raised, their methods of thought and their standards of quality proved and still prove to be a path to independent thought and intellectual freedom for many.

The present book is addressed to students and teachers of classical and modern languages and to all friends of literature. It will fulfill its purpose if the reader feels the desire to open a classic anew or to discover for himself a Latin author he had not known.

The author gratefully dedicates this book to his teachers—Paul Ludwig, Ernst Zinn, and Pierre Courcelle—and to his students. While preparing the present English edition, he constantly kept in mind his students and the unforgettable experiences of mutual teaching and learning he had at the University of Florida and at the University of Texas.

This English edition is a document of friendship. Frances and J. Kevin Newman did the author the great honor of offering their help as translators and sending him a rough draft of an English translation of vol. I. They were, therefore, the first English translators of the present book. Ruth R. Caston and Francis R. Schwartz made rough drafts of other parts and assisted the author at different stages of a long and complex working process. It is a pleasure to thank all translators for their sacrificial work. The author who, of course, is solely responsible for any error in the final version, is also deeply obliged to his friend Gareth Schmeling, who kindly revised it.

The present edition is based on the second, improved and augmented German edition of 1994. Within reasonable limits, the bibliographies have been updated, and English editions and translations of classical authors have been added. Latin quotations in the text have been translated. The chapters on Roman Jurists greatly profited from three substantial letters from Detlef Liebs. Some remarks came from Reinhard Häussler (on Sallust and Tacitus) and from Aldo Setaioli's admirable Italian translation of this book (Torino 1995–1996). Further advice was given by Gregor Damschen, Petra Farian, Sabine Grebe (e.g. on Martianus Capella), Janet Weisselberg, Rüdiger Niehl (e.g. on the Poetae Novelli), Claudia Nissle, Franz M. Scherer, Matthias Schopper, and, last but not least, by the author's wife.

This English edition would not have been possible without the generous support granted by the Stiftung Humanismus Heute of Baden-Württemberg, by Robert Bosch (Stuttgart), and by Inter Nationes (Bonn). The author gives his thanks to these institutions and to the humane persons behind them. Moreover, he wants to express his gratitude to his German publisher K. G. Saur who, with the untiring assistance of Petra Hütter, put his international contacts in the service of the present book. The author is pleased indeed that this book is published in the Netherlands, where, thanks to A. D. Leeman's friendship, he had the privilege of living and teaching some twenty years ago. Albert Hoffstädt of Brill's was a friendly and competent tutor of the publication.

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

This book was planned as a single unit, and its division into two volumes is due purely to external constraints.

The four sections referring to periods (e.g. 'Survey of the Literature of the Republican Period') which introduce each of the major Chapters II to V present synchronical overviews of the literary activity of that period. There follows a detailed discussion of poetry and, subsequently, prose according to genres and authors. Within each period, works of the same genre are, where possible, treated together. However, authors active in several genres appear only in one place.

The sub-sections on genre (e.g. 'Roman Epic') are intended to facilitate a diachronical overview, and their titles are emphasized by italics. These sub-sections on genre are in each case placed before the earliest important representative of that genre.

A synoptic study is also made possible by the fact that all the sub-sections on the authors exhibit the same subdivisions: Life and Dates; Sources, Models, and Genres; Literary Technique; Language and Style; Ideas; Transmission; Influence. Because of their particular significance, reflections on literature (i.e. literary theory and criticism) are discussed separately ('Ideas I') from the other ideas of the author in question ('Ideas II').

In bibliographical references, short titles without initials of the first name (e.g. LEO, LG) refer to the general list of abbreviations at the end of the whole work. Short titles with initials and dates (e.g. F. LEO 1912) refer to the specialized bibliography at the end of each particular section.

The orthography of places of publication is determined in each case by the book cited, and so 'Romae' appears along with 'Roma' and 'Rome'. The names of Latin authors and works are abbreviated in accordance with the usage of the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae. The few exceptions in the cases of Seneca and Claudian are intended for ease of reference. Journals and other works cited in brief are listed fully in the list of abbreviations. Abbreviations used for editions are: T = text; Tr = translation; C = commentary; N = notes.

CONTENTS
VOL. I

INTRODUCTION: LITERATURE AND LITERARY HISTORY

FIRST CHAPTER:

CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF ROMAN LITERATURE

Historical Background .....	5
Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	7
Latin and Greek Literature: Tradition and Renewal .....	12
Individual and Genre .....	14
Dialogue with the Reader and Literary Technique .....	21
Language and Style .....	26
Ideas I: Conquest of an Intellectual World: Poetry, Thought, and Teaching .....	31
Ideas II: Old Roman Mentality versus Modern Ideas .....	33
Before Literature .....	41

SECOND CHAPTER:

LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

Historical Background .....	51
Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	55
Latin and Greek Literature .....	58
Genres .....	61
Language and Style .....	67
Ideas I: Reflections On Literature .....	68
Ideas II .....	69

II. POETRY

A. Epic and Drama .....	76
Roman Epic .....	76
Roman Drama .....	90
Livius Andronicus .....	112
Naevius .....	119
Ennius .....	129
Pacuvius .....	146
Accius .....	154
Plautus .....	163
Caecilius .....	206
Terence .....	214
B. Satira .....	241
Roman Satira .....	241
Lucilius .....	250
C. The Didactic Poem .....	267
Roman Didactic Poetry .....	267
Lucretius .....	282
D. Lyric and Epigram .....	321
Roman Lyric .....	321
Roman Epigram .....	331
Catullus .....	334

III. PROSE

A. Historiography and Related Genres .....	360
Roman Historical Writing .....	360
Historians of the Republican Period .....	370
Cato the Elder .....	390
Caesar .....	405
Sallust .....	433
B. Biography .....	464
Biography at Rome .....	464
Nepos .....	476
C. Oratory, Philosophy, Epistolography .....	489
Roman Orators .....	489
Philosophical Writers at Rome .....	499

The Letter in Roman Literature .....	511
Cicero .....	517
D. Technical and Educational Authors .....	564
Roman Technical Writers .....	564
Latin Grammarians .....	583
Rhetorical Writers at Rome .....	586
The Rhetorica Ad Herennium .....	590
Varro .....	593
Roman Jurists .....	616
Juridical Literature of the Republican Period .....	631

THIRD CHAPTER:

LITERATURE OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

I. SURVEY OF LITERATURE OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

Historical Background .....	641
The Emergence of Literature .....	643
Latin and Greek Literature .....	645
Genres .....	646
Language and Style .....	650
Ideas I: Reflections on Literature .....	651
Ideas II .....	653

II. POETRY

A. Epic, Didactic, Bucolic .....	659
Roman Bucolic .....	659
Virgil .....	667
B. Lyric, Iamb, Satire, Epistle .....	711
Horace .....	711
C. Elegy .....	742
Roman Love Elegy .....	742
Tibullus .....	754
Propertius .....	769
Ovid .....	786
D. Minor Poets of the Augustan Period .....	823

III. PROSE

A. History .....	829
Historians of the Augustan Period .....	829
Asinius Pollio .....	830
Livy .....	835
Pompeius Trogus .....	869
B. Oratory .....	873
Orators of the Augustan Period .....	873
C. Philosophy .....	875
Philosophical Writers of the Augustan Period .....	875
D. Technical and Educational Authors .....	877
Technical Writers of the Augustan Period .....	877
Vitruvius .....	880
Jurists of the Augustan Period .....	887

CONTENTS
VOL. II

FOURTH CHAPTER:
THE LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF EARLY EMPIRE

Historical Background .....	895
Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	897
Latin and Greek Literature .....	902
Genres .....	903
Language and Style .....	905
Ideas I: Reflections On Literature .....	906
Ideas II .....	908

II. POETRY

A. Epic .....	913
Lucan .....	913
Valerius Flaccus .....	932
Statius .....	944
Silius Italicus .....	959
B. Didactic Poetry .....	972
Manilius .....	972
Germanicus .....	985
C. Bucolic .....	990
Calpurnius .....	990
Appendix: The Carmina Einsidlensia .....	995
D. Drama .....	996
Seneca (s. chapter III C, pp. 1158-1204) .....	996
E. Fable .....	996
Latin Aesopic Fables in Verse .....	996
Phaedrus .....	1002

F. Satura .....	1008
Persius .....	1008
Juvenal .....	1019
G. Epigram .....	1038
Martial .....	1038
The Priapea .....	1056

III. PROSE

A. Historiography and Related Genres .....	1061
Velleius Paterculus .....	1061
Valerius Maximus .....	1074
Curtius Rufus .....	1084
Tacitus .....	1096
B. Speeches and Letters .....	1146
Pliny the Younger .....	1146
C. Philosophy (and Drama) .....	1158
Seneca .....	1158
Appendix: The Praetexta Octavia .....	1199
D. Novel .....	1205
The Roman Novel .....	1205
Petronius .....	1211
E. Technical and Educational Authors .....	1239
Technical Authors of Early Empire .....	1239
Seneca the Elder .....	1244
Quintilian .....	1254
Pliny the Elder .....	1265
Juridical Literature of Early Empire .....	1275

FIFTH CHAPTER:

LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF MIDDLE AND LATE EMPIRE

Preliminary Remarks .....	1281
Historical Framework .....	1282

Conditions of the Rise of Literature .....	1285
Latin and Greek Literature .....	1294
Genres .....	1296
Language and Style .....	1300
Ideas I: Reflections On Literature .....	1303
Ideas II .....	1305
II. POETRY
The Poetry of Middle and Late Empire .....	1310
The Poetae Novelli .....	1317
Ausonius .....	1320
Avianus .....	1330
Rutilius Namatianus .....	1332
Claudian .....	1337
Juvencus .....	1352
Sedulius .....	1355
Prudentius .....	1357
III. PROSE
A. Historiography and Related Genres .....	1371
Writers of History in Middle and Late Empire .....	1371
Suetonius .....	1391
Florus .....	1411
Ammianus Marcellinus .....	1420
B. Oratory and Epistolography .....	1435
Fronto .....	1435
The Panegyrici Latini .....	1439
Symmachus .....	1443
C. Novel .....	1449
Prose Fiction of Middle and Late Empire .....	1449
Apuleius .....	1449
D. Technical and Educational Authors .....	1468
1. The Authorities of the Schools .....	1468
Technical Writers of Middle and Late Empire ...	1468
Gellius .....	1479
Macrobius .....	1485
Martianus Capella .....	1491
Cassiodorus .....	1495

2. The Founders of Western Law .....	1500
Juridical Literature of Middle and Late Empire .	1500
3. The Latin Fathers of Western Civilization .....	1526
The Origins of Christian Latin Prose .....	1526
Tertullian .....	1528
Minucius Felix .....	1554
Cyprian .....	1568
Appendix: The Life of Cyprian, by Pontius .....	1580
Novatian .....	1581
Arnobius .....	1584
Lactantius .....	1594
Julius Firmicus Maternus .....	1610
Marius Victorinus .....	1616
Hilary of Poitiers .....	1627
Ambrose .....	1631
Jerome .....	1646
Rufinus and Other Translators .....	1662
Augustine .....	1664
Boethius .....	1708

SIXTH CHAPTER:

THE TRANSMISSION OF ROMAN LITERATURE .....	1741
GENERAL LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS .....	1751
INDEX .....	1773
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE .....	1829

INTRODUCTION

LITERATURE AND LITERARY HISTORY

'Roman literature' for us means the works written in Latin in antiquity. The fall of the Western Empire in Rome occurred officially in A.D. 476. In 529 Justinian closed Plato's Academy, and St. Benedict founded his monastic community on Monte Cassino. Symbolically, the end of one tradition coincided with the beginning of another.

From the start, we should make a distinction between ancient and modern ideas of literature. In addition to poetry and novels, ancient literature included genres which today's readers do not normally associate with literature: oratorical, historical, and philosophical writings, that is to say, formal prose in the broadest sense. But there is more. In principle, we have to take into account even technical works, whether they concern agriculture, law, warfare, or architecture. Again, the boundaries between 'artistic' and 'real' letters were fluid, and it would be mere caprice to exclude from literary history such highly personal communications as Cicero's Letters to Atticus for the sake of a principle. The lines of demarcation between artistic and utilitarian literature were less strictly drawn than they are today. Even when writing utilitarian texts, classical authors strove for beauty of style, and in Roman eyes usefulness was not a drawback even for belles lettres. Indeed, it was this very duality that contributed to the survival of Roman writings. On the one hand, their literary shape made them more accessible to readers (this was the case, for example, with philosophy). On the other, most generations before us read Latin books rather for their content than for mere aesthetic enjoyment.

There are limits to our knowledge of literary history and to an historical approach to literature. Only a small portion of Roman literature has come down to us, and we should never forget how much has been lost. Moreover, in many cases we no longer have the Greek models for surviving Latin works, a fact which makes it difficult to judge the achievement of a given Roman writer. The dating of many authors, even of sets of authors, is questionable, and the biographies of most of them are scarcely known. To reconstruct an historical background, against which literature might be measured, we must often turn to the literature itself. As a result, the danger of circular argument is ever present. There is a chasm between the intellectual horizon of an author's contemporaries and that of later generations. Authors often waste no words on things they themselves take for granted. Furthermore, what they write sometimes reflects the milieu of their models, not their own. Constraints of tradition and genre are overwhelming. Finally, we often derive a false perspective from relatively rich, but extraneous, information. In some of these cases, conventional knowledge<sup>1</sup> seems to obscure rather than illuminate the uniqueness of the individual and his creative achievement. One might even ask if literary history is a suitable path at all to an understanding of an author's greatness. The problems indicated here have influenced the character and structure of this book:

Indeed, a study of a writer's influence is, in its way, an historical approach to a comprehension of his range and stature. It is part of the task of literary history to show what had influence and what might still have influence. Therefore, the impact of Roman literature on world literature is given more emphasis in this book than is customary.

A basic feature of Roman literature is its ability to revitalize itself; hence its place as mother of European literature. This first became evident on a large scale with Christian Latin writings—an exemplary case, not to be overlooked in a history of Roman literature. As the late Imperial period drew its life from the tension between paganism and Christianity, an exclusive consideration of pagan late antiquity would be vulnerable to criticism from the point of view of both history and method.

Of course more space is devoted to 'great' names in classical literature than to others; yet some discoveries about minor writers can be found here. In the final analysis, the attention we pay to less commonly read works may help us more deeply appreciate the greatness of the acknowledged masters.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> 'The greatness of true art . . . lay in finding again, in grasping again and making known to us that reality from which we live at so great a remove, the reality from which we distance ourselves more and more, the more the conventional knowledge by which we replace it gains in mass and opacity.' M. PROUST, A la recherche du temps perdu VII: Le temps retrouvé, Paris 1954, vol. 8, 257.

<sup>2</sup> 'We cannot understand the famous unless we have responded sympathetically to the obscure', Franz Grillparzer, Der arme Spielmann.

FIRST CHAPTER:
CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF ROMAN LITERATURE

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Geographical and political milieu. Bounded on the north by the Alps, and on its other sides by the sea, the Apennine Peninsula forms a geographic unit. The Apennine range for a long time prevented the Romans from extending their territory into the plain of the Po, which, under the name of Gallia Cisalpina, was also home to a different population. Since there are more harbors on the Tyrrhenian side, Italy has a marked orientation toward the west. As a result, for a considerable period the Romans showed no inclination to acquire territory in the eastern Mediterranean. There was racial diversity as well. The Romans and related tribes were first concentrated in the center of Italy and on portions of the mountainous terrain there. Etruscans settled in Tuscany, Gauls in the plain of the Po, and Greeks in the south of the peninsula. Interaction with these peoples, sometimes warlike and sometimes peaceful, is reflected in Roman civilization and literature.

It was the Elder Cato who recognized the role of Italy. In his Origines he took into account not only Rome but also the other cities of Italy, but in doing so he found no followers among later historians. Virgil established a memorial to the Italian countryside and its peoples, with such characters as Turnus and Camilla, and with his catalogue of Italian allies. The contrast between the capital and the rest of the Italian motherland was still felt to be of major importance in the 1st century B.C.

For a long time Rome was governed by Etruscans, a fact which later Romans often found difficult to admit. Much that passes as typically Roman is of Etruscan origin, such as the fasces ('bundle of rods'), a symbol of magisterial office, the gladiatorial games, probably even the very name of Rome. Etruscan cultural influences extended from soothsaying to theater, art, and architecture.

Greek culture was known from the earliest period, and the more the empire expanded, the more deeply Greek influence penetrated Roman civilization. Having acquired an alphabet from Cumae, the Romans subsequently embraced Etruscan and Oscan varieties of drama and even the Greek tragedy and comedy encountered at Tarentum. The Greek authors imitated by the oldest Latin writers were for the most part associated with Magna Graecia, either by their origin or their subject matter. The laws of the Twelve Tables, which were based on Greek city codes, and the 'Pythagorean' (i.e. South Italian) maxims of Appius Claudius provide early and particularly impressive evidence of this relationship.

The city of Rome is situated at a considerable distance from the sea at a bridge where the Via Salaria crosses the Tiber. Its position on an old trading route was economically and militarily advantageous. Accordingly, at the outset expansion occurred here, along the land route. This explains why relations with Carthage, a sea power, were so good for many years, especially since the common rival was Etruria. Conflict erupted after Rome had acquired all Italy's harbors, and consequently had to defend their interests. The peasant people rose to the new challenge and became, almost overnight, a victorious seapower. Expansion of territory also brought cultural and intellectual challenges, which stimulated new responses. The political union of the peninsula called into play the name Italy and Italian myths. Only now did Carthage become an 'ancestral' enemy; only now was an Italian picture of history created. So, too, emerged a genuine Latin literature,<sup>1</sup> one born late, but destined for a long life.

Rome increasingly extended the right of citizenship, attracting the upper classes of the Italian cities, and of course also their talented youth. The Capital became the forum for literary talents from southern and central Italy, and later also for those from Gaul and the rest of the provinces.

Literature may be an echo of great historical events; even so it is not a mere reflection of them, but a projection of new questions and answers. Thus, the epic of Naevius was the result of the First Punic War, that of Ennius looked back to the Second, and so, too, Virgil's Aeneid came at the end of a hundred years of civil wars.

The disintegration of social and political links in the late Republican period indirectly encouraged the rise of great personal poetry. The new political order under Sulla, however, did not inspire a lasting echo in literature, a fact indicative of the gulf separating this dictator from Augustus.

The great change between Republic and Empire is reflected most strikingly in the altered function of oratory. Instead of a means of persuading other men to political decisions, oratory now became at best a medium of psychological analysis and self-education, and at worst a mere display of technical virtuosity.

---

<sup>1</sup> A necessary presupposition for the rise of Latin literature was the spread of the use of Latin which had occurred in the meantime (cf. Language, below, pp. 26-31).

The new peace established by Augustus fostered a unique blossoming of literature: Greek and Roman culture merged, and the worldwide Empire was perceived as a unity. Against this background, a subjective genre like elegy could develop in the hands of the younger generation, who had not consciously experienced the Civil Wars and so enjoyed the blessings of the Principate with more satisfaction than gratitude.

In the exalted intellectual atmosphere typical of Nero's time, writers did not feel oppressed by the burden of a rich tradition and rose to a level of free creativity. With this, literary fields came to be cultivated which so far had been alien to the Romans, as can be seen in Seneca's Naturales Quaestiones and in the Natural History of the Elder Pliny.

Again under Domitian, a Roman and imperial cultural identity found expression in Latin. After this, the Empire became more and more fragmented into cultural provinces. At first the outlying regions still sent their best representatives to Rome, as Spain had done in the Silver period. But later, it made more sense for writers to be active in their own homelands. African writers from Apuleius onward are cases in point.

CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF LITERATURE

Patronage. The attitudes of politicians and patrons may either advance or hinder literature. Republican magistrates put on public celebrations, thereby encouraging the production of comedies and tragedies. Augustus made the right choice with Maecenas, as did Maecenas with Virgil and Horace. Indeed, we may owe the preservation of the Aeneid to the personal intervention of the princeps. Tiberius did not have such a good eye. He surrounded himself with philologists who had to amuse him by discussing rather absurd problems. In his turn, Caligula allowed the publication of historical works banned under his predecessor. The much misunderstood Claudius entrusted the newly created position a studiis (a sort of Ministry of Culture) to his efficient freedman, Polybius. Nero thought of himself as an artist, and encouraged the artistic inclinations of the aristocracy. Vespasian, in spite of his thrifty nature, was the first to regard a public professorship of rhetoric as a good investment. Domitian enlarged the holdings of the Roman libraries, and founded the Capitoline Poetic Contest. Trajan established the Bibliotheca Ulpia. From the time of Hadrian, the work of jurists enjoyed increased support. Even in the intellectual desert of the 3rd century a small ray of light shines: Emperor Tacitus is said to have taken measures to promote the spread of the writings of his namesake.

The record of sins which the Roman state committed against its literature, however, is no less extensive. In the days of the Republic, important orators were proscribed. Philosophers and Latin rhetors were banished from Rome.<sup>1</sup> The murder of Cicero, the enforced death of Cornelius Gallus, and the relegation of Ovid all occurred in the time of Augustus. There were many book burnings, and famous speakers were silenced by banishment to lonely islands. In this respect as in many others Tiberius was anxious to continue the traditions of his predecessor—even to the point of persecuting inconvenient historians. Caligula raised negative selection to a principle. A would-be Plato without Plato's wisdom, he wanted to expel the works of the 'incompetent' Homer, Virgil and Livy from the state libraries and from the bookstalls and, conversely, to execute Seneca because of his talent. Claudius sent the same philosopher into exile. It was finally under Nero that Seneca, like Petronius and Lucan, met his death. In the 2nd century, Juvenal desperately implored the emperor to rescue Roman literature; his cry went unheeded. Hadrian turned to the Greek language. In the time of the Severi the greatest jurists became martyrs. The dire financial straits endured by the soldier-emperors of the 3rd century allowed, with few exceptions, no patronage. The emperors Valerian and Gallienus had on their conscience the Christian author Cyprian. Justinian closed Plato's Academy.

Private generosity on the part of the aristocracy was an important form of patronage during the whole course of Roman history. In Republican times it was indistinguishable from public support: offices were held by aristocrats who, in organizing games, for example, placed even their private means at public disposal. In contrast to foreigners like Livius Andronicus and Ennius, who needed financial help, the satirist Lucilius belonged to the Italian rural aristocracy and was thus economically independent. This was probably also true of the greatest poets of the late Republican period, Catullus and Lucretius.

---

<sup>1</sup> Banishment of two Epicurean philosophers from Rome (173 B.C.; Ath. 12. 547a); general expulsion of philosophers and rhetors (161 B.C.; Suet. gramm. 25. 1; Gell. 15. 11), and of the philosopher's embassy (156–155 B.C.; Plutarch, Cato maior 22); closing of the Latin school of rhetors (92 B.C.; Suet. gramm. 25. 2).

Under Augustus, Maecenas gave preference to poets who had already gained a reputation, regardless of their social origin. Messalla, who was less intimately connected with the princeps, encouraged youthful talents, mostly however from the upper classes.

The leading authors of Silver Latin belonged either to the aristocracy, such as the Senecas, the Elder and Younger Pliny, Tacitus, Valerius Flaccus, Silius Italicus; or, like Martial and Statius, they enjoyed private patronage.

The tendency prevailing from Hadrian's time onward to favor Greek writers was a natural function of the hellenization of the upper class, and had corresponding effects on Latin literature. The learned scholarship of specialists like the jurists and the Latin grammarians was one of the few intellectual pursuits that still attracted respect from society.

In late antiquity, Latin literature owed its revival largely to the senatorial aristocracy, which maintained with lasting success the tradition of learning even in its pagan aspects.

School and Church. Schools also influenced the origin and expansion of literature. However, 'school' is a multifaceted phenomenon. Education at Rome was in the first instance a private affair. Originally instruction in Greek prevailed; the language was imparted by slaves and freedmen employed as house tutors. In principle the grammaticus supervised the reading of the poets for those aged eleven and older, after they had learnt reading and writing from the litterator. Latin instruction right down to the days of Augustus centered on the Odusia of Livius Andronicus. It was only in 25 B.C. that Q. Caecilius Epirota ventured to lecture on 'Virgil and other modern poets'. A few decades later, however, Virgil had driven his predecessors Livius Andronicus and Ennius out of the classroom. In the 4th century A.D. Virgil, Sallust, Terence, and Cicero were school authors.

From the age of about fourteen on, the pupils studied with the rhetor. There had been Latin rhetors since the 1st century B.C. At first their activity encountered official opposition. However, rhetorical instruction soon became the rule, and until the end of antiquity, in spite of the decline of the political speech, it remained the core of education. So it was that on the one hand rhetorical invention and elocution invaded all literary genres: elegy (Ovid), lyric (Statius), tragedy (Seneca), epic (Lucan); on the other hand, the transmission of Roman authors was conditioned by their suitability for rhetorical instruction. This explains, for example, why we possess almost nothing from Sallust's Histories except for the speeches and letters contained in that work.

In addition to schools, the Church came increasingly to control the origin and transmission of literature. Latin translations of the Bible, accounts of the sufferings of persecuted Christians, sermons and exegetical works were directed to the faithful. Other writings refuted heresy. Finally, apologetic writing would present Christianity to the wider world and confront it with the Roman state. Thus, new institutions were able to give rise to literary genres hitherto unknown.

Phases and Phase Displacements. Roman literature was 'made, not born'. The conditions which nurtured it may be understood only in the light of historical circumstances. While Greek literature was able to develop according to its own laws through the sequence of an archaic, classical, and Hellenistic period, Roman literature did not exhibit these 'normal stages'.

To some extent, Rome creatively adapted Hellenistic influences earlier than those of classical and archaic Greece. We can observe this in the works of Plautus, Terence and Catullus. Although classicism was certainly possible from the very beginning, no one wrote a classical epic before Virgil. The historical situation resulted in the peculiar 'double resonance' of Republican literature: it was precisely during the period when Roman society still displayed archaic features that the books it read were overwhelmingly Hellenistic and modern. In those early times contradictory factors were present simultaneously. Thus, Ennius blended elements from a wide range of epochs and intellectual tendencies to make a disparate unity, which was held together only by his person and his desire to act as a teacher and cultural intermediary. Even in Lucretius we are surprised at the jarring contrast between an intellect in tune with Hellenistic philosophy and an archaic, undaunted sense of mission reminiscent of the pre-Socratics. Comedy, among the last fruits of Greek poetry, was the first to ripen in Rome, whereas epic, Greece's oldest genre, was the last. Prose reached its culmination in Cicero before poetry enjoyed its Augustan age.<sup>1</sup> Literary developments seem to occur in reverse order from those in Greece. Condemned to be modern before it could be classical, Roman literature travelled a long road before it discovered its identity. Its fascinating story is not unlike an Odyssey or Aeneid: first the Romans had to lose what belonged to them, so that later they could consciously recover it at a new level.

---

<sup>1</sup> Even in the early period the pioneers of poetry could make use of a developed practice of oratory. The results of these antecedents of poetic style were marked.

The pioneers of Roman literature were cultural intermediaries, and therefore not allowed to specialize in a given genre. Only in the course of time would they learn to make a virtue of their enforced universality. At first what is typologically 'early' and 'late' appeared simultaneously: Homeric myth along with its rationalization in the style of Euhemerus; Aeschylean tragedy along with Menandrian comedy. In Greece, epic, lyric and drama developed respectively within a definite temporal, spatial and social framework. In Rome, by contrast, the literary genres were separated from their original relevance to life with the consequence that a writer could not rely on a generally accepted connection between content and form, but had to establish it himself every time anew. The generic style was no longer determined by the expectations of the reader. It was a shape that was artificial, almost exclusively imposed by models and literary theories. Even the linguistic and stylistic differentiation of the genres became a product of individual artistic judgment.

A Roman poet was different from a Greek rhapsode or tragedian: he had not as a matter of course inherited a generic style drawn from social and craft traditions. The style had to be created. At first, archaism and classicism did not appear directly in literature as discrete and necessary stages of development. They existed along with 'modern' tendencies as in some degree simultaneous forms of style to be learned. Instead of successive stages of a quasi organic development, we find therefore in Rome modernism, classicism and archaism as equally available stylistic attitudes among which an author could choose.

A Roman author was simultaneously a pioneer and a latecomer, contending with twin difficulties. Yet, in spite of its not particularly poetic environment and the discouraging circumstances of its origin, Roman literature maintained its grip on life. It was the result of intellectually disciplined work. We can confirm this statement by comparing Cato the Elder or Cicero with the majority of their contemporaries, or by following the stages in which the Homeric epic was assimilated from Naevius and Ennius to Virgil. In old Roman epic, myth and history, Greek form and Roman matter, modern and archaic had been associated but loosely; it was Virgil's genius that blended all this into an artistic unity, in which every part was related to the whole. With the Aeneid there arose a work of art formed by an individual which was accepted by the community as the expression of its identity, a milestone in world literature. More quietly, but with no less greatness, Horace raised the tender form of the lyric poem to objective meaning without denying the personal dimension.

Literary development never stands still, however, and least of all in the case of supreme masterpieces which, precisely because of their inimitability, challenge the search for new goals. While personalities and styles come and go, there is alternation between expansion and contraction, diastole and systole. Plautus' linguistic creativity and colorfulness is succeeded by the discipline of the purist, Terence. The opposite also occurs: after the classical Virgil comes Ovid, his many facets inspired by Hellenistic models.

In the larger historical perspective, Greek and Latin literature alternated in importance. From approximately the 2nd century B.C. to the beginning of the 2nd century A.D., Latin literature assumed the leadership, corresponding to the prestige of Italy and later also of Spain. In the 2nd and 3rd centuries, in accordance with the increasing economic and political influence of the East, Greek literature again came to the fore. In the 4th century, Latin literature, which had survived especially in Africa, had a wide-ranging renaissance.

LATIN AND GREEK LITERATURE: TRADITION AND RENEWAL

Roman literature is the first 'derived' literature. Its authors consciously took account of the tradition of another people which they recognized as superior. In differentiating itself from its predecessor, Roman literature found its own identity and a specific self-awareness. Thus, it paved the way for later European literatures and became their teacher.

Since the Romantic period, the principle of literary imitation (imitatio) has acquired a bad reputation,<sup>1</sup> though even antiquity had been familiar with the negative concept of plagium (plagiarism). A more equitable evaluation of literary dependence was prepared by a dictum ascribed to Virgil, which said that it was easier to steal Hercules' club than a single verse from Homer (Vita Donati 195). An artistic borrowing and transfer to a new context was not considered a theft but a loan meant to be easily recognized as such by anyone.<sup>1</sup> Arellius Fuscus, an Augustan teacher of rhetoric, not satisfied with mere imitation, emphasized competition with the model (Sen. contr. 9. 1, 24. 13). The showpiece he advanced as an illustration was a passage in which Sallust had surpassed even Thucydides in brevity and therefore defeated the Greek on his own ground. Thus, imitatio allowed an author to emphasize precisely his own contribution by measuring it expressly against the achievement of a predecessor. The more significant the model, the greater the challenge and, in the case of success, the greater the emulator's gain in artistic capability. Therefore, a literature conscious of its history is not necessarily a mere dialogue with the past conducted by epigones. Again and again, even at a distance of centuries, it may become a 'summit meeting', as has been the case with Dante, Virgil, and Homer.

---

<sup>1</sup> 'Plagiarism in France. Here, one wit has his hand in another's pocket, and that creates among them a certain dependence. Given this talent for the kind of thievery by which one man filches his neighbor's thoughts before he has quite finished with

Roman literature is one of apprenticeship. It is not ashamed of having teachers, but often pays them homage, even when distancing itself from them and following its own paths. This frequently misleads present-day interpreters. The modern demand for originality often forces authors to claim novelty for what is in fact old. The reverse convention prevailed among the Romans. In political life, innovations had to be trumpeted as old Roman practice so as to gain acceptance. In the same way, a writer had to refer to a series of ancestors and, if need be, to create them. The principle and practice of imitatio produced an intellectual relationship binding author to author and period to period. This phenomenon merits the attention of the literary historian and helps him understand his subject both as a coherent process and as the conquest of ever new horizons.

Practice changed in the course of history. In the older period only

---

them, wit becomes common property.—In the république des lettres thoughts are for public use.' Heinrich Heine, 'Sketches', in: Sämtliche Schriften in 12 Bänden, ed. by K. BRIEGLEB, Munich 1976, vol. 11, 646.

<sup>1</sup> Non subripiendi causa, sed palam mutuandi, hoc animo ut vellet agnosci (Sen. suas. 3. 7, describing Ovid's relationship to Virgil); s. now: A. SEELE, Römische Übersetzer. Nöte, Freiheiten, Absichten. Verfahren des literarischen Übersetzens in der griechisch-römischen Antike, Darmstadt 1995.

imitation of Greek models was creditable, whereas borrowing from Latin predecessors was labeled as theft. With the formation of genuine Roman traditions, however, a change took place. Virgil, for instance, was also competing with earlier Latin epic poets such as Naevius and Ennius. With Cicero, Latin prose began to count as a classical model; the same may be said of Virgil for Latin poetry.

From the late Augustan period on, dialogue with the native tradition became more prominent. Ovid viewed himself as the fourth in a series of Latin elegists. While the epic poets of the Imperial period were primarily engaged in a dialogue with Virgil, they also drew on Homeric scenes, especially those which Virgil had neglected. The literature of the imperial period was not an exclusive dialogue with Roman writers. As long as the two languages remained in use, the Greek background maintained its importance. This was even more true when knowledge of Greek began to decline: at that very moment literature in translation began to flourish.

The character of the encounter with predecessors also changed. In the early period authors reshaped their models freely, transposing foreign subject matter into a new language (it is hardly possible at this stage to speak of 'translation'). In various genres stricter fidelity to the original gradually prevailed, along with more attentive mastery of form and deeper intellectual penetration. So philosophical literature began with artistic adaptations such as Lucretius' poem and Cicero's dialogues and ended with translations that were strictly scholarly. For both religious and philosophical reasons, late antiquity made increasingly greater demands for accuracy in translations. With the decline of bilingualism it became necessary not merely to imitate the original, but to replace it.<sup>1</sup>

In addition to imitatio of particular texts, there was also the disembodied power of tradition, which was transmitted by the educational system and kept alive in the minds of the authors and in the expectations of their public.

INDIVIDUAL AND GENRE

Quintilian divided his first detailed examination of Roman literature (inst. 10) according to genre, and in modern times many scholars have followed this method.<sup>1</sup> Even apart from the question of the arrangement of the subject matter in works on literary history, the problem of the literary genres requires our particular attention.

---

<sup>1</sup> Jerome attempts to combine accuracy with beauty.

Examining sub-genres,<sup>2</sup> we observe the organic rise and fall of ever new forms. They can be created, for example, by reversal at the beginning, inversion at a particular point, or variation of speaker and addressee. While Horace fostered the fiction of more or less 'pure' genres in his Ars poetica, Roman practice followed different paths. Crossing of genres was one of its distinguishing features.<sup>3</sup> Creative manipulation of the genres also allowed for the introduction of elements from other genres. Playing with different traditions, the poet was able to demonstrate his originality.

Since an author often worked in several literary genres, a presentation divided strictly according to genre would break the live context determined by the author's person and his position in history. Roman literature at the outset had no recognized function in society. It had first of all to discover what its place was and then to fight for it. Hence in Roman literature the individual, with his spirit of enterprise and his achievement, revealed himself in a novel way. Accordingly, one of the greatest of modern scholars went so far as to assert that there was no such thing as Roman satire, but only Lucilius, Horace, Persius and Juvenal.<sup>4</sup> However, even the most original Roman had to take account of the basic preoccupation with tradition found in ancient literature, and to pay attention to his readers and their expectations. The truth lies somewhere between the extremes of an emphasis on the individual, which would border on novelistic fancifulness, and a mechanical insistence on laws of genre. Important here is the interplay of fixed and variable elements.

These variable elements include the general preference for Greek or Latin models and also the degree of dependence on them. Here again, there are further choices: an author may either follow an individual predecessor (running the gamut from free imitation to literal translation) or he may adopt a more abstract generic tradition transmitted by school and scholarship. Finally, among the elements of a given literary genre, there may be differences of emphasis or

<sup>1</sup> For example, BICKEL, LG.

<sup>2</sup> F. CAIRNS, Generic Composition in Greek and Roman Poetry, Edinburgh 1972.

<sup>3</sup> KROLL, Studien 202-224.

<sup>4</sup> U. v. WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Griechische Verskunst, Berlin 1921 = Darmstadt 1962, 42, n. 1.

gradation: so it was that Ennius mastered the epic meter, not yet imitated by Naevius, while Virgil mastered the larger artistic form, in which both predecessors had fallen short.

One of the constant elements is the effort to conform ever more closely to the standards established by predecessors, by the tradition of the genre, and by scholarship. With regard to the imitation of individual models this may mean an increase in technical perfection: we may compare the loose structure of some of Plautus' comedies with the stricter complexity of Terence. On the other hand, perfectionism can also lead to slavish dependence, which results in the decline of literary genres. There are indications that comedy after Terence followed this path.<sup>1</sup>

This 'aging process' with its increasing inflexibility, however, is by no means inevitable. Epic, for example, maintained its creative freshness even after the classic achievement of Virgil. Ovid, Lucan, Valerius, and Statius moved along new and, in part, untrodden paths. It is only with Silius that we find symptoms of a timid pedantry characteristic of the epigone, although he made a virtue of necessity and raised his imitatio of the Aeneid to an artistic principle. The mutual interaction of fixed and variable elements keeps a literary genre alive. The withering of a branch of literature may be avoided by a timely introduction of new models, materials or principles of form. Thus, by means of rhetoric, Ovid and Lucan enlivened epic, and Seneca renewed tragedy.

The standard example of a genre in which variable elements dominate at least at first glance is satire; even if we consider subject matter alone, this genre allowed for an almost limitless variety. On the other hand, there were characteristic constants: although the content of the satura developed towards 'universal' poetry, its author's viewpoint always remained personal. The person of the poet was the focus on which its disparate elements were centered. This was another typically Roman feature of the satiric genre.

---

<sup>1</sup> Comedy in Menander's style was so strictly defined that any fundamental expansion of the canon hardly seemed possible without affecting the foundations of the genre. Accordingly, it was natural to expect that comedy at Rome would increasingly avail itself of the freer scope presented, for example, by the mime. Nevertheless, even in Plautus' day there was no lack of attempts to open a wider storehouse of models, forms and topics for comedy. Why did the artistic writing for the stage not go further in this direction? An unbridgeable chasm had opened between the artistic standards of connoisseurs, who were only satisfied with the most faithful replication of Menander, and the public's demand for entertainment.

Is satire a loose association of discordant elements, held together only nominally by the authority of the author? Or are there definite formal features, which may be recognized as typical of the genre? This would allow us to define its constant elements in less abstract terms. In the case of satire, a literary genre evolves, so to speak, before our very eyes. The successors of Lucilius took up certain features of his satura and so in retrospect raised them to the rank of generic markers. This is true of particular themes, such as the author's posing as a 'poet without poetic claims', i.e. as a 'non-poet'; or his self-portrayal through his relationship to prominent friends or patrons; further themes would be accounts of travels; mockery of the follies of love, of inheritance hunting and so on. But there are also specific literary forms such as dialogues (e.g. consultations with experts); moralizing sermons; or brief narratives. The satirist's high degree of self-awareness and the distance from which he views the world encourage critical reflection, even on literary themes, and the parody of loftier literary genres, such as epic and tragedy. Once traditional structural elements of satire are themselves taken up and modified, it is clear that we may, and indeed must, speak of a genre of satire; this is unmistakably the case with Horace. As development proceeds, the elements increasingly resemble conventional literary patterns. As early as in Horace, self-presentation often becomes self-concealment. This is even more true of Persius. In Juvenal, what had been the most personal form of Roman literature has largely become supra-personal, and for that reason may quite clearly be described as a genre.

While the genre of satire developed within Roman literature, the other genres came from outside and followed different laws of development. Their constant features were already established by tradition. The reader is therefore tempted to set the ('ideal') Greek form over against its more or less imperfect Roman realization. This disastrous way of thinking has often led to superficial verdicts on Roman literature as a whole, which ignored the elementary fact that the encounters between a Roman author and his Greek model did not occur in a vacuum. When adapting for the Roman stage a Greek play which he might have seen in Tarentum, an early Latin author had other priorities than a modern scholar, who is not obliged to think of a theatrical audience. It is precisely the deviations from our expectations, therefore, which demand historical explanation.

The need to take account of historical factors is also clear in the case of love elegy. This was not an exclusively Roman genre, but it did receive its definitive stamp in Rome. The accidents of transmission make judgment difficult in many respects. We have no sufficient notion of Hellenistic elegy. Moreover, the works of the very founder of the genre at Rome, Cornelius Gallus, are lost. What we may reconstruct from the evidence of later poets shows that, for Gallus, love was a service and a destiny. Catullus could love and write without political ambitions in the free atmosphere of the late Republic. But the subjectivity of the love poet in Gallus, as we now see from the newly deciphered obelisk inscription, was bound up with the sort of triumphant political self-assurance which in Rome had been visible ever since the time of the Scipios. This made his clash with the princeps' far-reaching claim to power inevitable. Often the lives of the poets are like a barometer indicating accurately the painful changes in social climate. What Gallus had created from his personal experience—perhaps still in an artistically ill-defined no-man's-land between epigram and elegy—became in his successors a 'genre'. Propertius in his 1st book elevated Gallus' approach to love to an 'attitude'. It is evident that Tibullus, and especially Ovid, are playing with themes and motifs they already consider traditional. For all this, it would be a mistake to call these authors 'disingenuous' without qualification. Their style had become more and more sophisticated and presupposed an ever increasing literary background; their public had become spoiled: it knew the motifs and demanded artistic variation. Ovid played out to its end, like a virtuoso, the game of this genre, which he already perceived as something Roman. To begin with, therefore, elegy moved from the individual to generic conformity, from personal engagement to classicizing parody. Then followed a renewal of the genre, at first through the mingling of genres (amatory didactic, the letters of the Heroides, even the Metamorphoses) and finally through a recovery of the origins of elegy, propaganda for one's own cause. All innovations here were connected with the contemporary use of rhetoric.

What of lyric? Can it be called a genre in the strict sense at Rome? Almost nothing is known of popular Roman lyric, which exercised no perceptible influence on artistic poetry. The sacral lyric of the earlier period may be compared with that of a later time only with reservations. Leaving aside late antiquity, only Catullus, Horace, and Statius merit consideration as lyricists in the true sense. Catullus and Horace, however, could not take up any native tradition. They were compelled to create an individual synthesis. As an artistic genre within Roman literature, the ode was a creation of Horace. Once again, therefore, the scholar is required to take an historical approach.

We can witness to a certain extent the development of historical writing into a genre at Rome. We may believe Cicero when he complains about the lack of any national Roman historical writing of quality. The example of Claudius Quadrigarius shows that for a long time there was no obligatory style for historical writing, since he uses fewer archaisms than later historians do. Hence one may accept—if only in principle—the view that Sallust was the first to fashion the generic style of Roman historical writing, by consciously adopting stylistic elements from Cato the Elder. This, however, is true only in a strictly stylistic perspective. The totality of structural markers produced by the blending of Greek and native traditions had been formed long ago.

Cicero is for us the most important, and in many areas indeed the only, representative of oratory. His exceptional status is due not merely to circumstances of textual transmission. We may reconstruct the earlier history of oratory from Cicero's Brutus, which gives an historical sketch of Roman eloquence, and from surviving fragments.<sup>1</sup> In spite of an established native tradition, in this area, too, with the general adoption of Greek education among the upper classes, Hellenization began relatively early. Traces of it may be found already in Cato the Elder.<sup>2</sup> As a fragment of Crassus shows, in the 1st century, public speeches of serious Romans could be marked by the then fashionable Asian oratory, right down to the rhythm used. 'Naturalness' in Roman eloquence, as in all arts and cultures, is a relatively rare and late phenomenon. It takes a refined artistic sense to bring forth something that looks 'natural'. The greatest orators, Gaius Gracchus and Cicero, may serve here as examples.

Variety in means of expression allied with the harmonious effect of the whole reached their pinnacle in Cicero's prose. As a result, development of prose style after him had to follow other paths. The new tendency found its culmination in Seneca, whose brilliant but somewhat spasmodic concelli may be regarded as the pole opposite from the fluid style of Cicero. With the Flavian classicism of a Quintilian or a Pliny, the pendulum again swung in the opposite direction.

---

<sup>1</sup> ORF, ed. by H. MALCOVATI, Torino 1930, 4th ed. 1976.

<sup>2</sup> A more confident account in LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio, I, 21–24, esp. 22–24.

The persistence of the generic markers of oratory was selfishly guaranteed by the rhetorical school, which set its stamp on practically the whole of Roman literature. As for the variable elements in this genre, they were influenced by historical conditions. The Republic had given oratory a scope which would be lacking under Empire. What especially mattered in a speech was its object, occasion, and audience, and the more skilled the orator, the more he would adapt his discourse to the given situation. Although the individual orator had more latitude here, separate types of oratory were differentiated: public or judicial speeches by their object, speeches to the senate or people by their audience. As the historical context changed, either the functional or the aesthetic dimension received greater emphasis in speeches. The question must also be raised whether speeches destined for immediate consumption may be described as literature in the same sense as, for example, epic, and further, whether they may be understood as a genre in a strictly analogous sense.

We are fully entitled to call Technical writing a genre, especially in regard to the structure of prefaces, and the general chapters concerning the education of the specialist, his moral outlook, and so on; that is to say, things which strictly speaking are not part of his special subject. The presentation of the actual material is dictated in the first place by the topic itself.

Finally, Philosophical writings are essentially represented for us by extensive corpora of individual writers: Cicero, Seneca, Apuleius, the Church Fathers. In each case, these works bear a quite different stamp: that of their author, his historical situation, his cultural background, his audience, his purpose, and his artistic principles.

It is evident, therefore, that the notion of genre may indeed be fruitful for the study of Roman literary history, but often because of the particular circumstances in which that literature developed can only be applied with a certain caution.

This impression changes, however, if we take into account the later influence of Roman literature. The genres coined by the individual representatives of Roman literature developed their own history, and were continually guided by retrospective reference to these models. To a large extent, individual accomplishments acquired canonical status, even for what were later called literary genres. Specific authors became 'classical' for the most part retroactively, when they were claimed for particular generic traditions. In their creation, the essence of the corresponding genre seemed to be embodied, either exclusively, as when Horace stood for Roman lyric and Cicero for political speech, or alternatively: so it was that satire oscillated between Horace and Juvenal, comedy between Plautus and Terence.<sup>1</sup>

At first, for the Romans, there was no definite idea of genre or style. As a still young people, they had been inundated by a foreign culture which had long passed its prime. Genre and style were therefore something they had to strive for continually, in the face of a permanent risk: that of lacking any style whatsoever, a danger hard to avoid, given the historical circumstances. This struggle demanded unfaltering judgment in matters of taste, and an alert, honest and uncompromising artistic sense. All this effort was not exactly fostered by the social circumstances of the Roman Empire; rather, it had to be painstakingly exerted by the individual writer. Yet precisely as a result of these difficulties, Latin literature became a paradigm for other literatures. Only in individuals could the genres find their identity, and only through the activity of individual creative minds did their influence bear fruit.

DIALOGUE WITH THE READER AND LITERARY TECHNIQUE

Roman literature is not only a dialogue with literary predecessors, but also a dialogue with the reader. Hence, the search for genres must be complemented by a markedly historic perspective. The specific character of a literary text is conditioned not only by the person of the author, but also by his audience. The practice of reading aloud<sup>2</sup> affected the form of texts. Through public readings—and even more through theatrical presentations—literature could reach even the uneducated. Of all literary genres, it is Roman drama therefore which perhaps enjoyed the widest dissemination and contributed most to public awareness of Greek culture. It is all the more regrettable then that all that remains of early Latin tragic poetry are fragments.

---

<sup>1</sup> In this the effect of literary theory and rhetoric on the creativity of the authors must neither be neglected nor overestimated. The comparison of texts with relevant theories makes us more aware of the originality of the creative impulse.

<sup>2</sup> Silent reading was naturally known, but hardly more widespread than silent reading of music today; cf. now: G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Strukturen der Mündlichkeit in der römischen Literatur, Tübingen 1990; id., Beiträge zur mündlichen Kultur der Römer, ibid. 1993; E. ZINN, Viva vox.

Literary history must accordingly not only take into account the origin and education of the authors, but also the scope and nature of their audience. In Rome, education was a private affair. From the middle of the 3rd century B.C. Roman children—if only those of the elite—were instructed by Greek teachers. There was often a significant disparity between authors and audiences in the degree of knowledge and appreciation of Greek education. Even in Cicero's time, a speaker who did not wish to lose all his credit was compelled to do his best to conceal his Greek education.

Just as a speaker adapts the style and form of his message to his listeners, so, too, does the author. An Attic poet, for example, wanting to write a 'tragedy', had to conform to his Athenians' expectations as to what a tragedy was. In this respect there is a convergence of 'receptionist' and 'generic' interpretations, since, within their society of origin, generic laws may ultimately be understood as reflections of the public's expectations. At Rome the situation was different at first, since there the literary genres were not native but had to be adapted to novel surroundings. A Roman author, therefore, initially, could not rely on the literary expectations of his listeners. Using a new linguistic medium and writing for a largely inexperienced audience, he had to create something which was a viable compromise between traditional literary norms and new social conditions. Plautine comedy, when compared with Menander's, manifests a loss of intellectual and psychological subtlety, but a gain in theatrical effectiveness. The poet was a man of the theater, and knew how much Greek sophistication his Roman audience would tolerate. To meet the unspoken but fairly clear demands of its new public, the genre of comedy was transformed.

An author may address different circles of listeners simultaneously. Even Terence did not write exclusively for the educated. Granted, not every spectator could appreciate all the fine points of his plays; even so, the poet did not want to do without the applause of the multitude. There are different levels of understanding: the works of Latin literature in particular are for the most part open to both the connoisseur and the interested amateur. Roman philosophical writings are 'exoteric' and in this they differ from the majority of comparable Greek writings, among which the exception—Plato's dialogues—proves the rule. The fact that Plato wrote dialogues was in general better understood by the Romans, with their openness for the reader's demands, than by Plato's own countrymen.

Latin literature has several levels of meaning and is at the same time accessible to various audiences; this is a characteristic feature contributing to its longevity. Insofar as the structure of the text is conditioned by their needs, the addressee or the audience intended by the author may be felt by later readers as their 'representatives'.

As a general rule, Roman texts have addressees; these play an important part even in the way poems are arranged in books. In a given case, an address to a man or a god may appear conventional, but on the whole it may be said: 'All modern attempts to translate this basic reality of dialogue into a relationship of the 'I' to the self or something similar, that is to say, into a process within the subjectivity of a self-sufficient individual, are pointless. They belong to the abysmal history of man's alienation from reality.'<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, we continually find in Rome, from the self-addresses of a Catullus down to Augustine's Soliloquies, noteworthy steps towards an inner dialogue or monologue. The addressee must be distinguished from the contemporary reader, and the latter, in his turn, from posterity, which is first addressed by Ovid. However, we are dealing with concentric circles, and the one addressed in the text may sometimes serve as a point of reference or as a representative for both wider circles of recipients.

Relationship to a reader calls rhetoric into play. Rhetoric compensates through stylistic means for the original poverty of vocabulary, and as an art of persuasion contributes to the text's effectiveness and its appeal to the audience. The influence of rhetoric was not confined to prose. Elegy used rhetorical technique to woo the beloved and, even in a genre so rich in tradition as epic, Lucan broke through his objectivity to express his emotional involvement in events through rhetorical commentaries, which sometimes gain an almost lyrical ring. Once political speech had lost its relevance, rhetoric, which had been a means of influencing others, became more and more an instrument of self-experience and self-education, a topography or typology of emotions. Thus it helped the Latin authors conquer the field of psychology for literature.

The specific character of the Roman public also determined the manner in which literary techniques such as metaphor, example, myth, allegory were to be applied. The modern reader, for whom the essence of literature is fiction and metaphor, runs the risk of underestimating the role of the concrete and factual in Roman literature. Often Roman authors hint at their interpretation of facts merely by the way in which they collect and group them. An exemplary case is Suetonius' Lives of the Emperors. The same mentality is observable even in lyric. An influential scholar wrote: 'Ancient poetry never knew a  $\mu\eta\ \delta\upsilon\nu$  in the strict meaning of that term, that is, an imaginary product of pure phantasy, devoid of any reality. The sense of reality was too strongly developed to tolerate mere fiction.'<sup>1</sup> Did not Goethe find in Horace 'frightful reality without any genuine poetry'?<sup>2</sup> Actually, this is one of the differences between Horatian and modern poetry. Yet Roman literature offers to us anything but a trivial stereotype of reality.

---

<sup>1</sup> M. BUBER, Ich und Du, Heidelberg, 11th ed. 1983, 102-103.

This typically Roman preoccupation with concrete details, which the sensitive reader could perceive as a sort of alphabet, does not render their literature easily accessible. Metonymy is more frequent in Horace than metaphor, which is so fashionable nowadays. Sometimes his search for concrete terms leads him surprisingly far.<sup>3</sup> Much of it is felt today as a breach in imagery. One and the same ode may conjure up the mood of winter and summer, the same person may be called metaphorically a dog and shortly afterwards a bull. However, Roman readers were used to establishing connections even between disparate images, and deciphering them as signs of a single thought.

Many Roman works of art use a single concrete incident from history to illustrate a pattern of behavior considered typically Roman: fides may be signified by a handshake between partners over an agreement; clementia by the pardoning of specific adversaries. Romans were disinclined to speculation. For them, virtues did not exist in themselves, but only in the moment when they were exercised. In an almost 'documentary' way, such instances of realization were presented to a later audience as an exemplum which drew its power chiefly from its historical reality. The recording of such individual examples of right behavior in art and literature continued to hand down exemplary experiences. An interpretation of them as fictitious symbols would reverse the Roman perspective. For the Romans, it was the actual realization that mattered; however, they were not interested in material for its own sake, but in material transformed into a vehicle of meaning. In literature, the mention of historical names had just such an exemplary function. Facts served at the same time as 'letters' in a system of signs. In great authors, the Roman ability to 'read' the facts rose to prophetic levels. Tacitus, for example, described the year of the four emperors in terms that seem to anticipate the process of decay in the 3rd century A.D.

<sup>1</sup> E. NORDEN to A. SCHULTEN, cited by the latter in Tartessos, Hamburg, 2nd ed. 1950, 96, n. 3; noted by H. HOMMEL, in: Wege zu Vergil, Darmstadt 1963, 423.

<sup>2</sup> F. VON BIEDERMANN, Goethes Gespräche, Gesamtausgabe, vol. 1, Leipzig, 2nd ed. 1909, 458.

<sup>3</sup> Instead of 'wine' he says 'Massic'; instead of 'sea' 'Adriatic'; instead of 'perfume' 'Syrian malobathrum'. He uses names of persons in the same way.

The relationship to Greek forms changed as did the conditions of reception. Although literature as such was not autochthonous at Rome, it acquired new functions in its social context. As a school text, or as poetry written for patrons, epic communicated Roman values; as part of the public ludi, tragedy and comedy served for public representation and reflected the generosity of the responsible magistrates; lyric appeared on official occasions as expiatory or celebratory song; epigram flourished both as memorial inscription and as a social pastime; historical writing transmitted the wisdom of aging senators to their younger contemporaries; philosophy offered relaxation and comfort to men of action during their brief moments of leisure. In general, literature, as a meaningful way of passing one's spare time (otium), was a complement to the world of negotium.

Along with foreign forms, foreign contents were borrowed. In comedy, Plautus interspersed his presentation of Hellenistic life with allusions to Rome, while Terence reduced his theme to what is universally human. Since subject matter and costume remained Greek, the Roman spectator stood at a greater distance from the action on the stage. This permitted a participation which was untroubled by any extraneous aims and which could prepare the way for specifically aesthetic experience.

There was a corresponding shift in the meaning and function of myth. To the Romans, who had been brought up among strict conventions, Greek myth must have appeared as an attractive world of freedom. From their own age of iron, they seemed to be looking in on one of gold. Therefore, the assertion that the Romans lacked imagination is only partly true. Thanks to their strong ties to external reality, they did not consider myth to be a part of their daily lives, but a separate world of fantasy and appearance, a new 'poetic' dimension, only accessible to sympathetic feeling. Subjectivity, emotionalism, ethos and pathos lend a peculiar coloring to the stories told in Roman literature and transpose them from the external to the internal sphere. Hence, Roman literature gives a new impression of 'inner life'.

Intellectual activity was also drawn into the play of art. Apart from subjects which, like the Trojan War, claimed historical validity, literal belief in Greek myths was not to be expected at Rome. Given that together with those myths, their philosophical analysis had come to Rome, there was a readiness to read them as a code, which helped to transcend what was visible. Greek poets and artists had already done much to emancipate myth from its national and religious roots. It now served as a convenient medium of literature and art, as a treasury of firmly established characters, situations and patterns of life. Its links to tragedy were especially close, and as theologia fabulosa it was thought to be the proper domain of poets in general and dramatists in particular (Varro apud Aug. civ. 6. 5).

In Pompeian wall painting, considerations of meaning determine the arrangement of pictures on a wall or within an entire room.<sup>1</sup> This may shed light on the patterning of the elements in Roman poetry.

A specifically Roman preference for linking and summarizing concrete details in the service of a single thought culminated in a literary technique which, in the course of Roman literary history, acquired increasing importance. In allegory, the reader's mind was confronted with a picture, whose parts could be taken from reality but were not found there in that combination. This meant that they had to be read as signs for an abstract idea.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE

Therefore, the genius of language is also the genius of a nation's literature.

Herder<sup>2</sup>

When we speak of the dominant influence of Greek literature on Latin, we may easily overlook the fact that the Romans were one of the very few peoples who succeeded in setting a literature in their own language over against that of the Greeks. Soldiers, statesmen, and jurists alike were the standard-bearers of Latin. Military colonies, which at the outset had been linguistic islands, became outposts which fostered the spread of Latin, first throughout Italy, and then the western provinces. Political expansion moved outwards from a center which continued to maintain direct relations with every part. Since it was a principle of Roman politics, if possible, not to enter into treaties with any people as a whole, but with cities individually, dialects could never acquire more than regional significance, even if they were not being suppressed directly. The language of the capital became standard even for authors from other areas. This explains why Roman literature, unlike Greek, knows no variety in dialects.

<sup>1</sup> K. SCHEFOLD, Pompejanische Malerei. Sinn und Ideengeschichte, Basel 1952.

<sup>2</sup> Über die neuere deutsche Literatur, Fragmente, in: Sämtliche Werke, ed. B. SUPHAN, vol. I, Berlin 1877, 146.

Even after the disappearance of the Roman empire, Latin remained for a long time the general cultural language of western Europe, and it was only hesitantly that national languages were accepted. What is the nature of this language, which so successfully maintained itself against civilizations both older and younger? What formal characteristics on its part helped to shape its literature?

'Like hammerblows, each of which hits the nail on the head with full force, comes the sound of odi profanum vulgus et arceo, and a translator sensitive to this must be reduced to despair by the superfluous, incidental sounds of words like 'I' and 'the' and 'it' in his own language.<sup>1</sup> The diversity of cases and verbal forms allows Latin to employ prepositions and personal pronouns sparingly. Moods need not be expressed by periphrasis. The article is missing completely. To use a metaphor, the blocks need no mortar between them. The structure of Latin is 'cyclopean'.<sup>2</sup> Such a language allows a thought to be reduced to its essence. All that is dispensable may be omitted. Latin was, as it were, born for solemn inscriptions and witty epigrams, for the blows and sideswipes of the orator's club, but also for the weighty, mysteriously ambiguous utterance of the poet.

A language with a rich treasury of forms may plausibly be thought of as particularly 'logical', and the crystal-clear Latin of the jurists or even of a Caesar favors this interpretation. However, Wilhelm von Humboldt has taught us to make a sharper distinction between word and concept, and certainly the laws of language are dictated in the first instance by psychology, not logic. Logical thinking depends more on the speaker than on the language he uses. Still it is true that Latin possesses precise endings and, beyond that, at least in its classical form, many particles which govern clauses.<sup>1</sup> Therefore it permits an author, insofar as he is thinking logically, to express with peculiar clarity the interrelationships of his words, and to construct a hierarchy of thoughts by means of syntax. The reflective and systematic study of such a language is a good preparation for learning and science, and since the Renaissance it has shown many Europeans the way to intellectual independence.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. SKUTSCH, Die lateinische Sprache, in: Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache (= Die Kultur der Gegenwart I, 8), Leipzig and Berlin, 3rd ed. 1912, 513-565, esp. 526-528; on the Latin language in general: ANRW 2, 29, 1, 1983; R. COLEMAN, ed., New Studies in Latin linguistics, Amsterdam 1991; J. DANGEL, Histoire de la langue latine, Paris 1995; F. DUPONT, ed., Paroles romaines (articles by several authors), Nancy 1995; G. MAURACH, Lateinische Dichtersprache, Darmstadt 1995.

<sup>2</sup> Loc. cit., 526-527.

Apart from the linguistic means just mentioned, which it shares with Greek, Latin characteristically places its verb at the end of the sentence. This makes the most important part of the sentence the coping stone in the edifice, holding the structure together, and unmistakably marking the unity even of longer sentences.

The artistic advantages of such linguistic material are obvious. It permits in prose the building of wide-ranging periods, and in poetry the employment of bold hyperbata. Friedrich Nietzsche said of the Horatian ode: 'In certain languages, what is here attained may not even be wished for. This mosaic of words, where every unit exercises its influence to right and left and over the whole, as sound, as place, as concept; this minimum in extent and number of signs which produces a maximum in their energy—all this is Roman and, in my judgment, the very mark of a noble mind.'<sup>2</sup>

The Latin language endowed its speakers with a keen sense of form almost from birth. Nevertheless, not all possibilities offered by the richness of forms were exploited in literature from the beginning. The fruitful challenge of Greek led to a gradual discovery of powers previously dormant, as can be seen by the example of the participle.<sup>3</sup>

The deficiencies of Latin were no less significant for literary development. As a language without articles it stubbornly resisted the use of abstract expressions, something not conducive to philosophical thought. In literature, this offers the advantage of close proximity to reality and practice and, from the point of view of an Existentialist, may even appear as a philosophical plus. In daily life, Romans often give preference to concrete expression: 'the capture of the city' may be compared with urbs capta. The scope of abstract expressions was to be developed to perfection only in late antiquity and the Middle Ages.

<sup>1</sup> A precision bordering on pedantry may be observed, for example, in the indication of temporal priority (pluperfect, future perfect).

<sup>2</sup> Was ich den Alten verdanke, in: Werke in drei Bänden, ed. by K. SCHLEGHTA, Darmstadt, 7th ed. 1973, vol. 2, 1027.

<sup>3</sup> E. LAUGHTON, The Participle in Cicero, Oxford 1964.

A further 'disadvantage' was a pronounced aversion to compound words, so favored for example in Greek or Sanskrit. The limited vocabulary, and the resulting ambivalence of Latin words, offered the writer a productive challenge. Authors who treated language selectively and with stylistic restraint (Terence, Caesar) secured clarity by other methods than those who would avoid ambiguity by richness (Cicero).

A structural principle which both enhanced clarity and secured a rhetorical effect was equally widespread in poetry and prose. This was the preference for expressions consisting of two or more members, often emphasized by alliteration. The antiquity of this device is proved by divine names structured in a similar way (e.g. Mater Matuta) and by Indo-European parallels. The amassing of words related in sense may also spring from the lawyer's anxiety to avoid misunderstandings and false interpretations.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, doubling of terms may also have arisen from the fear of any too great definiteness.<sup>2</sup>

Color and richness might be attained by rhetorical treatment.<sup>3</sup> Instead of those Greek adjectives which often emphasized quality and perfection (such as compounds with εὖ- in the Homeric epic) Roman literature sometimes used quantitative attributes like magnus and ingens, and sometimes affective attributes, thus increasing the pathos of the presentation. This is true even of a genre where such a phenomenon is quite unexpected—comedy. The refined and sober elegance of Hellenistic art resisted Romanization for a relatively long time, although it was Hellenistic influence which had made itself felt earliest.

These weaknesses of Latin accordingly tempted many an author

---

<sup>1</sup> One may compare repetitions found in official language ('the day, on which day'), as well as doublings meant to exhaust all possibilities ('whoever under this law is or will be condemned').

<sup>2</sup> Verbal circumspection prevails particularly in reference to the irrational which escapes precise observation or indeed human knowledge in general. Thus a deity whose sex is unknown is carefully indicated with the formula sive deus sive dea.

<sup>3</sup> The often lamented development of rhetoric at Rome is, on this view, not a 'weakness', but an inner necessity.

to make up for the missing precision by the use of emphasis. The best authors, however, felt the poverty of their own language as a challenge to a struggle for supreme stylistic mastery. Horace speaks of the 'cunning juxtaposition' (callida iunctura) which gives to a well-known word the quality of novelty (ars 47-48).

To turn our discussion from form to content, we are told that the Romans were a nation of soldiers. Indeed, many metaphors were drawn from the military sphere,<sup>1</sup> although the extension of meaning they received was often considerable.<sup>2</sup> The original sense, which sometimes had faded in Latin, could be roused to new life in poetry even in literary genres where warlike sounds were least expected: comedy and love elegy. The ingenious slave became a 'great general', the lover became a 'soldier' in the service of Amor.<sup>3</sup>

However, the Romans were far from any biased glorification of war. Their early culture had not been one of mere warriors, but of settlers and farmers. The natural rhythms of the year in any case allowed military expeditions only at certain times. The Roman method of giving names attests to their rustic past<sup>4</sup> and their other vocabulary betrays the same truth.<sup>5</sup> On the other hand, from quite early on there are traces of urbanization.<sup>6</sup> Latin may have arisen as a language of peasants, but it was as the language of the capital city that it was generally adopted.

---

<sup>1</sup> 'The language of the Romans can never deny its origin. It is a military language for commanders, a formal language for administrators, a legal language for usurers, a lapidary language for the stonyhearted people of Rome.' Heinrich Heine, Zur Geschichte der Religion und Philosophie in Deutschland, 2nd book: Von Luther bis Kant, in: H. HEINE, Sämtliche Schriften in 12 Bänden, ed. K. BRIEGLEB, vol. 3, 1831-1837, München 1976, 572-573.

<sup>2</sup> Who today is reminded of the military by words like 'interval', 'premium', 'stipend'?

<sup>3</sup> A. SPIES, Militat omnis amans. Ein Beitrag zur Bildersprache der antiken Erotik, Tübingen 1930.

<sup>4</sup> They are derived from cultivated plants (Fabius, Lentulus, Piso, Cicero) or domestic animals (Porcius, Asinius, Vitellius).

<sup>5</sup> Delirare 'to be crazy' ('to stray from the furrow'); tribulare 'to vex' ('to thresh'); praevaricari 'to be in collusion with an adversary' ('to trace crooked lines with the plow'); emolumentum 'advantage' ('product of the mill'); detrimentum 'harm' ('wear and tear of the plowshare'); rivalis 'rival' ('neighbor along the same stream'); saeculum 'generation' ('sowing season'); manipulus 'company' ('armful of hay'); felix 'happy' ('fruitful'); pecunia 'money' (from pecus 'cattle'); egregius 'outstanding' ('out of the flock'); septentriones 'north' ('the seven threshing oxen').

<sup>6</sup> Thus several important animals bear names which phonetically are not strictly Latin but come from Italian dialects, e.g. bos 'ox', scrofa 'pig', and lupus 'wolf'.

Legal and business life offered writers appropriate metaphors. Juridical language and ways of thinking influenced both oratory and poetry, affecting even the presentation of myth. Unlike Roman magistrates, the gods could not cancel official acts of their colleagues (cf. Ovid, met. 14. 784–785). Economic and banking terminology often enriched the vocabulary, even in philosophical writing. Seneca ‘keeps account’ of the time he has ‘spent’ (epist. 1). On the one hand, the meaning of a word might be extended to areas beyond its original sphere. On the other, poetic fantasy could in an instant renew the original association of ideas, deepen it by artistic presentation, and dwell with satisfaction on the contrast between the old and new contexts.

The vocabulary of ethics and of social psychology was of particular importance in Latin. Since it set an indelible stamp on Roman thought, it will be considered in that context.

IDEAS I

CONQUEST OF AN INTELLECTUAL WORLD POETRY, THOUGHT, AND TEACHING

The conquest of a field originally foreign to its discoverer demands conscious effort on his part. At Rome, therefore, right from the beginning, poetry and reflection could not be divided. In the epitaphs of early Roman poets, proud words commemorate their literary achievement, while the epitaph of the Greek tragedian Aeschylus notes merely that he fought at Marathon. The basic difference here is not so much one between Greek modesty and Roman claims to fame as a difference in social conditions. In classical Greece, literature was something native. It was sustained by citizens. In Rome its first task was to win the right to citizenship.

This fact had two consequences. On the one hand, the old Latin poets, mostly foreigners, could base their self-esteem on their literary accomplishment only. On the other, their activity needed justification and rational defense in the eyes of society. Thus, during the course of Roman literary history, poetry discovered its identity by way of reflection. The Roman public’s contribution to this development should not be underrated. It offered far more than material conditions, the Latin language and its concepts of value. A culture still ‘young’ received from the hands of an older civilization the phenomenon of poetry and assimilated it with the seriousness and intensity of a first encounter.<sup>1</sup>

At Rome, aesthetic experience was not, as in Greece, a self-evident part of existence. It was a realm yet to be conquered, a system of signs whose forms and contents had to be learned. The author's task was to teach, the reader's to learn. The Roman approach to didacticism was somewhat different from that of the Hellenistic world. A certain reluctance to go into technical particulars encouraged on the positive side a search for clarity and general intelligibility, even for artistic presentation. The 'exoteric' character of Roman literature, its respect for the audience, combined with a need to select from Greek sources what could be generally communicated and understood, induced Roman authors to confine themselves to what was essential and of general human interest. This feature made Roman literature more accessible to later generations, and safeguarded it against any premature loss of freshness. This also explains the moral seriousness permeating many works of Roman literature: the individual felt responsible to his family, his society and himself. Even where moralizing was ridiculed, a system of moral values was still presupposed. The comedy of 'howlers' can only be appreciated against the background of a marked awareness of conventions.

The social situation therefore encouraged development in different directions. On the one hand, it demanded that what was to be learned should be reduced to essentials, which would stand the test of Roman gravitas. On the other, it allowed to construct an independent world of aesthetic and intellectual values, thus leading literature towards self-awareness.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> 'In the Romans . . . may be enjoyed the spectacle of a reconquest of practically all spheres of life by poetry. This people of farmers and shopkeepers in its sober earnestness and sturdy thoroughness grasped with tough determination the task of constructing a spiritual world.' W. SCHADEWALDT, Sinn und Werden der vergilischen Dichtung (1931), now in: Wege zu Vergil, ed. by H. OPPERMANN, Darmstadt 1963, 43-78, esp. 45.

<sup>2</sup> Horace's Ars Poetica makes use of Greek theory, but at the same time is itself organized as a poetic work of art.

IDEAS II

OLD ROMAN MENTALITY VERSUS MODERN IDEAS

Before giving a brief sketch of Roman mentality and its manifestation in literature, we have to remind our readers that in this area many simplifications and generalizations are current; on closer inspection we find that they were drawn from particular works of literature. However, each passage must be seen against the background of its own time. Moreover, each author lives in a state of intellectual tension between traditional and new ideas, and in given circumstances he may employ old words to express new ideas or, in his search for a line of ancestors, project contemporary problems into the past.

The social order of the Republic considerably fostered the development of Roman law, one of the most significant achievements of the Roman mind, and one which exercised influence far beyond the area of legal texts. Roman law, as later codified during the Empire, even today forms the basis of civil law in many countries. Since in the course of their history the Romans increasingly developed forms of law intended to regulate intercourse with representatives of other peoples, at a later stage international law and human rights could be organized along Roman lines. Even other areas, such as theology, were influenced by legal thought. The important notion of 'person' was also a discovery of Roman legal thought. A parallel development to this is the rise of autobiography and personal poetry at Rome.

As a republic,<sup>1</sup> Rome was a society in which, at least theoretically, conflicts were resolved more with mental than with material weapons. The state was entrusted to its citizens, not as an anonymous organization, but as the sum of interpersonal relationships deemed valuable and worth protecting. It was a common possession, res publica. These were ideal conditions for the rise of an oral practice of political speech and judicial pleading. From here there would develop literary oratory, the writing of history, technical works of law, and indeed the first blossoming of Roman poetry.

The Roman talent for organizing things on a large scale<sup>2</sup> was active

---

<sup>1</sup> The Roman state was originally closely linked with the ancient Roman religion. Christianity, at least in theory, made it possible to divide the state and religion, even though soon and with rather lasting success the opposite occurred. It was only at a later period that Europe began to take lessons, not from the Empire, but from the Roman Republic.

<sup>2</sup> The concept of maiestas presupposes an order to which men conform: G. DUMÉZIL, in different spheres of life—most strikingly perhaps in politics. In the plastic arts, we find the construction of large architectural complexes and the purposeful grouping of wall paintings, in literature an ‘encyclopedic’ tendency and also the practice of shaping entire books of poetry as organized units.

Religion, morals and politics in ancient Rome belonged together, not in the sense of an alliance between sacred and profane, but as a unity from the very beginning. There was no self-contained priestly caste, and most priestly offices had a close connection with political and social life.<sup>1</sup> Accordingly, myths and legends at Rome, if traceable at all, were concerned with the commonwealth of citizens. Traditional mythical characters and situations were put into the context of Roman society and given a national and historical interpretation. This is evident not only from Livy’s picture of early history but also from Virgil’s mythical invention.

It has often been maintained that the Romans lacked mythical imagination and the sculptor’s eye. For them the gods were powers at work,<sup>2</sup> not mythical figures like the gods of the Greeks. On the basis of similar observations, the word numen—the mighty ‘nod’ as an expression of will—has been regarded as typically Roman. The word itself, however, is relatively recent, and in all probability formed on the model of the famous nod of Zeus.<sup>3</sup> Numen is a later word, while deus belongs to the oldest linguistic stratum. It is true that the Romans possessed a keen sense of power and will but they were unable to imagine these qualities apart from definite persons.

Greeks had sought the divine through contemplation of beauty and meditation of what is perfect. Romans found it chiefly in listening to the words of the gods, in respecting mutual obligations and

---

Maiestas et gravitas, RPh 26, 1952, 7–28; 28, 1954, 19–20; O. HILTBRUNNER, Vir gravis, in: FS A. DEBRUNNER, Bern 1954, 195–206.

<sup>1</sup> Accordingly, the Latin ius receives a social interpretation (‘law’), while Vedic yóś and Avestan yaōč denote ‘integrity’, ‘mystical perfection’. The Vedic śrad-dhā defines the relationship with the deity; the Latin credo overwhelmingly refers to relations between men. The Indic ṛtá denotes the cosmic order, the Latin ritus the method of ritual behavior.

<sup>2</sup> Cic. nat. deor. 2. 61; leg. 2. 28; K. LATTE, Über eine Eigentümlichkeit der italischen Gottesvorstellung, ARW 24, 1926, 244–258 (= Kl. Schriften, München 1968, 76–90); M. P. NILSSON, Wesensverschiedenheiten der römischen und griechischen Religion, MDAI(R) 48, 1933, 245–260.

<sup>3</sup> S. WEINSTOCK, Review of H. J. ROSE, Ancient Roman Religion, London 1949, JRS 39, 1949, 166–167.

above all in leading an active life.<sup>1</sup> The 'reflective' character of Roman literature and art is bound up with this mentality. The Romans regarded themselves as particularly religious (cf. Sallust Catil. 12. 3), and ascribed their successes in foreign policy to their piety.<sup>2</sup> The word religio, often brought into association with religare ('to bind'), according to Cicero (nat. deor. 2. 72) belonged together with neg-legere, di-ligere and denoted an attitude of constant and loving attention (cf. also the Greek ἀλέγω). Rites and divine signs are the objects of such attention. Everything, whether the flight of a bird or an accidentally heard utterance or indeed a stumbling or trembling, may become a sign or a divine hint determining the behavior of an individual. Observation of signs, however, has little or nothing to do with the practices of magic. The augur does not conjure up a mystical fullness of power (Vedic ójas), he simply states its presence. Virgil depicts Aeneas as a hero guided entirely by such expressions of divine will. Attention, the gift of observation and patient listening are typical of the Roman homo religiosus. The hero of the Aeneid is the noblest example of a type of man who, in less exalted guise—as an anxiously superstitious primitive or as a pedantic ritualist—, must have been frequent in Rome.

As a people on the margins of the Indo-European sphere, the Romans preserved a whole series of ancient notions of function, particularly from the area of politics: for example, their terms for king and priest;<sup>3</sup> and even ancient ritual traditions have left clear traces. This is not surprising, given the conservatism of the Romans in such matters. However, it would be one-sided to describe the Roman mentality only as 'conservative'. Much more than, for example, Celtic civilization with its stereotyped patterns of behavior, Roman civilization was open to new experiences. Once he had understood the signs of the time, a Roman was ready for enterprise and bold deeds. Such energy was called virtus.

Unrestrained virtus was checked, however, by attention to the will

---

<sup>1</sup> 'Greek is . . . much more adapted to a natural, cheerful, gifted, aesthetic presentation of happy views of nature. Its habit of speaking in verbs, and especially through infinitives and participles, makes every expression permissible . . . The Latin language, by contrast, is made decisive and imperious by its use of nouns. The notion is presented as complete in the word, fixed in the word, which thereafter receives attention as if it were a real being' (Goethe, WA 2, 3, 201–202).

<sup>2</sup> Cic. nat. deor. 2, 8; Livy 5. 51–54.

<sup>3</sup> Rex (Sansk. rājā; flamen (cf. brahman).

of the gods, deduced from signs. Another important controlling principle was the respect for social values, to which we must now turn our attention. The impact of such values varied considerably according to period, social class and individual.<sup>1</sup>

There are numerous words denoting moral, social or political relationship between persons. To translate them we often need two complementary expressions: gratia is 'grace' and 'gratitude'; fides, 'trustworthiness' and 'trust'. Fides, which is symbolized by a handshake, is the embodiment of keeping one's word. Fides was the personification of an accepted principle of social control: checking the aggressive impulse by giving one's word. Accordingly it was incorporated into the worship of the supreme god of the state and considered one of the most venerable Roman divinities. Such ideas paved the way for the later popularity of personifications and allegorical figures in Roman literature. Pietas, originally connected with the notion of ritual purity, is right behavior towards the living and the dead. Love of country, of parents and children are included in this concept—things which for us do not belong to the specific sphere of religion.<sup>2</sup>

Further principles guarding against unbridled bravery are clementia, 'clemency', and sapientia, 'wisdom'. These qualities, which are basic to Roman civilization, are not mere reflections of Greek philosophy. They also refine the prudence of the ancient Roman peasant. Clever talk arouses mistrust,<sup>3</sup> but all circumspection, even great hesitancy, is highly esteemed. This explains the preference for behaviors which are defensive<sup>4</sup> rather than aggressive. Much of this carries a negative connotation in other cultures. Perhaps no other people has made a virtue out of 'heaviness' (gravitas) and turned a 'lingerer' (cunctator) into a hero.

Festivals in honor of the gods or the dead fostered cultural activity

<sup>1</sup> As might be expected, derivations from pater ('father') are widespread. The meaning is extended: patronus (counterpart to cliens), sermo patrius (cf. 'mother tongue'), patres (senators), patricii. Pater is a title (pater patriae) and denotes eminent persons and gods (e.g. Iuppiter). The patriarchal order of society is also reflected in the term used for property or inheritance, patrimonium. Even so, modern readers are occasionally inclined to underestimate the influence of women at Rome.

<sup>2</sup> Pietas is embodied in Aeneas. He carries his father (the past) and his shield with its pictures of his descendants (the future) on his shoulders, fulfilling his duty to both.

<sup>3</sup> Mentiri, etymologically 'to think', means 'to tell lies'.

<sup>4</sup> Prudentia ('foresight'), cavere ('to be on one's guard'), patientia ('endurance'), labor ('toil').

and were therefore a cradle for literature. Representation and rite transcended simple commemoration. The celebrants were directly involved in the re-enactment of exemplary patterns of behavior. At the funeral procession of noble gentes, characters in costume represented the dead man's ancestors, each in the garb of the highest office he had held. Polybius (6. 53-54) considered this form of remembrance a means of education: the example (exemplum) was intended to work on the younger generation. In the same framework, the laudatio funebris (panegyric of the dead) developed, which prepared the way for Roman historical writing.

Seriousness and mirth are not mutually exclusive. The festival was an occasion on which the Latins could freely indulge their delight in witty sayings<sup>1</sup> and well-turned epigrams, as well as their fondness for music, dance, and theater. In the Republican period such elements, under Greek inspiration, were raised to the level of literature. The public officials of that period in fact showed better taste than those of the Empire, for they encouraged the development of Latin drama. Of course it always had at its side raw and grisly forms of popular amusement.<sup>2</sup>

The significance of the typically Roman concept of otium<sup>3</sup> for culture and literature has long been neglected. The one who appears in public as a serious-minded Stoic need not be a spoilsport at home. In the philosophic dress of Epicureanism and even without, pleasure in Rome found its adherents. Otium was the opposite of business, negotium. In this case, leisure formed the positive concept, and business (negotium) the negative, even linguistically. Romans knew not only

---

<sup>1</sup> An institution such as the triumph well expressed the emotional nature of the Romans, their feeling for expansive gestures. The triumphing general appeared as a manifestation of Jupiter. But at the same time a specially appointed person whispered into his ear jests intended to remind him that he was only a man.

<sup>2</sup> The fact that gladiatorial games originated in the worship of the dead cannot rob this institution of its gruesomeness. All civilizations, especially those founded on powerful repressions, have such dark sides. The theory that watching them neutralizes personal cruelty is a mere palliative. The contests described by the Roman epic poets seem at times to reflect impressions of the gladiatorial combats. It is to his credit that at least Seneca condemned such games. Our generation which, thanks to technology, can murder on a greater and more efficient scale has the right to regard the Romans in this area as bunglers, but no right to assume the moral vantage point.

<sup>3</sup> J.-M. ANDRÉ, L'otium dans la vie morale et intellectuelle romaine des origines à l'époque augustéenne, Paris 1966.

how to fight and die, but also how to live. Many private forms of literature have their roots in otium: epigram, elegy, lyric monody, and the occasional poem.

Before abandoning the theme of Roman mentality, which is as attractive as it is difficult, we must make clear that this is an area less monolithic than often assumed. Much changed in the course of time. Much varied from place to place, for Italy is by no means uniform. Much altered in accordance with the environment of city or country, much was evaluated differently by one and the same person in different circumstances. Much that we regard as universally valid reflects the judgment of individual great writers. Accordingly, our picture of the attitude of the ancient Roman in relation to the state is colored by the outlook of Cato the Elder although he did not embody the typical Roman aristocrat. Cato was a homo novus, and had every reason to put public concerns before private ones and to depreciate personal honor—at least by not mentioning the names of Roman magistrates who, as representatives of their gentes, certainly looked out for their reputations. The suppression of the names in Cato's Origines was exceptional and not typically Roman. Another great author who has drawn for us a lasting picture of the Roman mentality is Cicero. Admittedly he projected back onto the Elder Cato the Greek education of his own time, and it is highly probable that he did the same for the picture he sketched of the Scipionic Circle. Even more dramatic is the alteration of the image of primitive Rome offered by Livy. The Augustan writer transferred to the primitive period his own noble ideal of humanity which was reminiscent of Menander. The contribution of the Attic Orators and Xenophon to the development of Roman concepts and Roman identity remains to be assessed.

Though it is difficult to reconstruct the real circumstances in Rome's early period, the sketches offered by Cato, Cicero, and Livy remain valuable evidence of the way in which at particular periods the best representatives of literature thought of the character of their people. What is more, these concepts became strongly influential later, thus acquiring a certain validity at least after the fact. Of course this in no way bridges the gap between literature and historical reality. Therefore, these sketches are to be studied within and explained from their historical contexts.

Nor should we overlook the clash between traditional and modern values found in the literary witnesses themselves. This tension, mostly unresolved but extremely fruitful, is a constant feature in Roman literature. The richness of new philosophical and religious ideas, which in the course of history the Romans were not reluctant to accept, was more impressive and more productive than the immovable, patriarchal background so readily conjured up by some of their writers.

Already in the earliest Roman authors there was an antagonism between old Roman values and progressive Hellenistic ideas, as, for example, in Plautus, Ennius, and the tragedians. Lucretius took hold of the philosophy of Epicurus with emotional seriousness, while Catullus adopted for himself the erotic and literary life-style of the Hellenistic world. Stoicism, Neo-Pythagoreanism, Middle Platonism, and mystery religions opened to many an author the world of the mind. Epicureanism justified the dignity of private life and happiness.

Conversely, the Stoa offered a philosophical foundation for civic virtues and for the concept of world empire. In the area of political thought, Cicero synthesized the values of the Republican past. He also laid the groundwork for the Augustan ideal of the principate. Offering a new picture of Roman history to his contemporaries and to later generations, Livy emphasized the values of tolerance, clemency and wisdom for which he felt the time was ripe.

The emperors needed a religious basis for their rule. Accordingly, long before Constantine, there arose a series of quite different models which were equally significant whether successful or not. Such were the Apolline sun-kingship of Augustus and Nero, Caligula's effort to impersonate an Egyptian pharaoh, Domitian's presentation of himself as Jupiter Cosmocrator, Seneca's, Hadrian's, and Marcus' idea of a philosopher king, Commodus' posing as Hercules, and the different oriental state cults from Septimius Severus on. In an attempt to breathe new life into state religion, continually fresh efforts were made to secure a link with living philosophical and religious tendencies.

The central position of the Augustan period in Roman history is shown by its balanced relationship to past and future. The same may be said of its literature, which lovingly assumed the old Roman inheritance, but also, by the prudent adoption of new religious trends, laid the groundwork for many developments to come.

Under Nero, Seneca pointed to the future by writing his manual for princes, the De Clementia. It is true that the contemporary addressee of this was unworthy, but it is equally true that many of Seneca's expectations were fulfilled by the emperors of the 2nd century, who boldly adopted the Stoic ideas of the senatorial opposition and on them firmly established their rule. Seneca's philosophical writing was favored by the religious atmosphere of the time. The same may be said later of Apuleius and mutatis mutandis of the Christians. However, in contrast to other mystery religions, Christianity could not mesh with emperor worship. The fact that it was the most energetic emperors who persecuted Christians is a striking proof of this. Constantine brought about a turning point by putting to his own use (as philosopher-emperors had once done) the strongest spiritual force in the Empire and assuming its leadership. This political change altered Christian literature. Apologetics lost significance, while the struggle against heretics became a civic duty. More interesting than Christian loyalty to the government, an attitude which after Constantine survived well into the future, was Augustine's recognition of the importance of the provinces and of their possible autonomy from Rome, a fruitful lesson he drew from the City's downfall. Inspired by the debate with Christianity, a national and Roman senatorial opposition formed once again. It did much to preserve and transmit literature. The rise of a Christian humanism in late antiquity provided a first model for all later renaissances of Latin literature. We may conclude that literature does more than react to contemporary trends; it is also able to place itself at the vanguard of new developments and thus anticipate the future.

To sum up: the circumstances under which Roman literature developed as described here rest partly on external and partly on internal factors. To the first group belong geographical, political, economic, and organizational influences; to the second, changes of taste and artistic purpose in a dialectical alternation of generations and fashions. The important thing for a historian of literature is to observe how these factors work together in a real historical process and in an individual's literary creation.

E. AUERBACH, Literatursprache und Publikum in der lateinischen Spätantike und im Mittelalter, Bern 1958. * G. BINDER, Herrschaftskritik bei römischen Autoren, in: G. BINDER, B. EFFE, eds., Affirmation und Kritik, Trier 1995, 125–164. * H. BLANCK, Das Buch in der Antike, München 1992. * K. BÜCHNER, Überlieferungsgeschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Altertums, in: H. HUNGER (and others), Die Textüberlieferung der antiken Literatur und der Bibel, München 1975, 309–422 (repr. of: Geschichte der Textüberlieferung der antiken und mittelalterlichen Literatur, vol. 1, Zürich 1961). * CAIRNS, Generic Composition. * M. L. CLARKE, Rhetoric at Rome. A Historical Survey, London 1953. * G. B. CONTE, Genre and its Bound- aries, in: The Rhetoric of Imitation. Genre and Poetic Memory in Virgil and Other Latin Poets, Ithaca N.Y. 1986, 97–207 (earlier in Italian: Virgilio. Il genere e i suoi confini, Milano 1984). * J. DANGEL, Histoire de la langue latine, Paris 1995. * G. DEVOTO, Storia della lingua di Roma, Bologna 1940, repr. 1991. * DUMÉZIL, rel. * FUHRMANN, LG. * K. GALINSKY, ed., The Interpretation of Roman Poetry. Empiricism or Hermeneutics, Frankfurt 1991. * GROETHUYSEN, Philosophische Anthropologie. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Le public et la vie littéraire à Rome, Paris 1937. * F. G. KENYON, Books and Readers in Ancient Greece and Rome, Oxford 2nd ed. 1951. * LATTE, Religionsgeschichte. * LAUSBERG, Hdb. * LEO, LG. * F. LEO, s. also WILAMOWITZ. * J. MAROUZEAU, Le latin. Dix causeries, Toulouse 1923. * J. MAROUZEAU, Quelques aspects de la formation du latin littéraire, Paris 1949. * J. MAROUZEAU, Introduction au Latin, Paris 2nd ed. 1954. * NORDEN, LG. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa. * PASQUALI, Storia. * V. PISANI, Storia della lingua latina. Vol. 1, Le origini e la lingua letteraria fino a Virgilio e Orazio, Torino 1962. * K. PREISENDANZ, Papyruskunde, in: Handbuch der Bibliothekswissenschaft, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1952, vol. 1, 1, 163–248. * L. D. REYNOLDS, Texts and Transmission. A Survey of the Latin Classics, Oxford 1983. * L. D. REYNOLDS and N. G. WILSON, Scribes and Scholars. A Guide to the Transmission of Greek and Latin Literature, Oxford 1968, 3rd ed. 1991. * C. H. ROBERTS and T. C. SKEAT, The Birth of the Codex, Oxford 1983. * SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG. * W. SCHUBART, Das Buch bei den Griechen und Römern, Berlin 2nd ed. 1921, repr. Heidelberg 1962. * F. SKUTSCH, Einführung in die Problematik der lateinischen Lautgesetzlichkeit und Wortbildung, Wien 3rd ed. 1910, repr. 1968. * F. SKUTSCH, s. also WILAMOWITZ. * O. SZEMERÉNYI, Principles of Etymological Research in the Indo-European Languages, Innsbrucker Beiträge zur Kulturwissenschaft, Sonderheft 15, 1962, 175–212. * TEUFFEL-KROLL, LG. * O. WEISE, Charakteristik der lateinischen Sprache, Leipzig 4th ed. 1920. * H. WIDMANN, Herstellung und Vertrieb des Buches in der griechisch-römischen Welt, Archiv für Geschichte des Buchwesens 1967, 55, 35–81. * M. WINTERBOTTOM, Literary Criticism, in: CHLL 1982, 33–50. * U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, K. KRUMBACHER, J. WACKERNAGEL, F. LEO, E. NORDEN, F. SKUTSCH, Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache (= KultdGgw 1, 8), Berlin and Leipzig (1905) 3rd ed. 1912 (corr. with add.).

BEFORE LITERATURE

The history of what preceded dramas and epics of Greek type at Rome does not belong to literary history in the narrower sense. Nevertheless, such texts deserve mention since they reveal in part stylistic tendencies comparable to those found later in artistic prose and poetry.

A first obstacle to our search for the earliest antecedents of the literary genres is the difficulty of drawing a clear line between poetry and prose in that early period. Originally, the concept of carmen was not limited to poetry. It denoted a solemn saying uttered orally, whether treaty, oath, prayer or magical spell.<sup>1</sup> This last meaning is still visible in the French charme. In fact many texts which may be classed under the rubric of 'solemn oral style' could be interpreted either as raw poetry still ignorant of quantities or as a prelude to later artistic prose. In any case, certain structural markers—for example the division of a longer line into two related sections of similar though unequal extent—may also be observed in later poetry, and alliteration and bipartite expressions are likewise employed in literary poetry and prose.

The most significant lyric text from the pre-literary period is the Carmen Arvale. This is the hymn of a primitive rite, renewed by Augustus, intended to preserve the state. It is transmitted to us in an inscription dating from A.D. 218.<sup>2</sup> Of course we are dealing here with concepta verba, or established formulas, familiar also in legal language. But remarkably, in this text destined for song, the use of alliteration, otherwise so favored in archaic Latin, does not play a dominant role. Instead rhymes (lue rue) and small variations are characteristic, e.g. Mars is continually addressed by different titles. Although solemn tricola will later be deployed in Cato's speeches, in general the Carmen Arvale should not be classified as prose:<sup>3</sup> we know that it was accompanied by dance, and this presupposes a definite rhythm. In particular, the forced abbreviations, such as sins for sinas, may be ascribed to the requirements of the dance step. On such occasions we are painfully aware of the lack of any musical tradition worth the name.

<sup>1</sup> J. BLÄNSDORF, Ein System oraler Gebrauchspoesie: Die alt- (und spät) lateinischen Zaubersprüche und Gebete, in: H. L. C. TRISTRAM, ed., Metrik und Medienwechsel, Tübingen 1991, 33–51.

<sup>2</sup> CIL I, 2nd ed., 2, No. 2 (pp. 369–370); CE 1; cf. Varro, ling. 5. 85; Gell. 7. 7. 8.

<sup>3</sup> Not so NORDEN, Priesterbücher 94; 109–280; more correctly S. FERRI, Osservazioni archeologico-antiquarie al Carmen in Lemures, in: Studi in onore di U. E. PAOLI, Firenze 1956, 289–292; in general: G. H. HENZEN, Acta fratrum Arvalium quae supersunt, Berlin 1874; C. THULIN, Italische sakrale Poesie und Prosa, Berlin 1906; M. NACINOVICH, Carmen Arvale, Text und Kommentar, 2 vols., Roma 1933–1934; R. STARK, Mars Gradivus und Avernuncus, ARW 35, 1938, 139–149, esp. 142–143; K. LATTE, Augur und Templum in der Varronischen Auguralformel, Philologus 97, 1948, 143–159, esp. 152, 1; A. PASOLI, Acta fratrum Arvalium, Bologna 1950; R. G. TANNER, The Arval Hymn and Early Latin Verse, CQ 55 n.s. 11, 1961, 209–238; B. LUISELLI, Il problema della più antica prosa latina, Cagliari 1969; U. W. SCHOLZ, Studien zum altitalischen und altrömischen Marskult und Marsmythos, Heidelberg 1970; M. T. CAMILLONI, Ipotesi sul Carmen Arvale, in the same author's Su le vestigia degli antichi padri, Ancona 1985, 60–86.

Musical rhythm is also perhaps more important than the words allow us to recognize in the Carmen Saliare. This was the hymn of the college of the priests of Mars, the 'leapers', a hymn containing their triple stamping (tripudium). A further group of texts belonging to the Salian priests is known as axamenta (roughly: 'formulas of invocation'). It is not certain whether they were sung.<sup>1</sup>

The loss of secular folklore is much to be regretted. At least we do know for certain (although this is sometimes forgotten) that a Roman's life in all its stages was accompanied by songs: cradle-songs, work-songs, drinking-songs, dance-songs, love-songs, marches, or laments for the dead. The pithy praise of the dead in epitaphs develops before our eyes into poetic elogia in the style of Greek epigrams. The Scipionic epitaphs are proof of this. But were there also ancient Roman heroic songs? Should we rather believe ancient witnesses and Niebuhr's<sup>2</sup> instinct, or the modern cliché pronouncing the Romans unpoetic? Recent studies<sup>3</sup> have shown convincingly that the delight in festival and song was native also to the ancient inhabitants of Italy. Traces of early Indo-European myths have been detected, especially in Livy.<sup>4</sup> The surprising choice of the Saturnian meter for early Latin artistic epic would be more understandable if this meter had previously served in Rome as a vehicle for narrative. As ballads performed at the banquet<sup>5</sup> (although already in Cato's time they had been forgotten) such songs would be something between epic and lyric. This view is supported by the lyrical character of the saturnian.

Is the saturnian a Greek import or a native, even Indo-European,

<sup>1</sup> At Festus p. 3 LINDSAY the manuscript tradition is componebantur. Canebantur is a conjecture.

<sup>2</sup> A. MOMIGLIANO, Perizonius, Niebuhr and the Character of Early Roman Tradition, JRS 44, 1957, 104-114 (in favor of the existence of such carmina).

<sup>3</sup> G. WILLE, Musica Romana. Die Bedeutung der Musik im Leben der Römer, Amsterdam 1967.

<sup>4</sup> DUMÉZIL, Mythe.

<sup>5</sup> E. M. STEUART, The Earliest Narrative Poetry of Rome, CQ 15, 1921, 31-37; L. ALFONSI, Sui carmi convivali, Aevum 28, 1954, 172-175; skeptically handled by H. DAHLMANN, Zur Überlieferung über die 'altrömischen Tafellieder', AAWM 17, 1950, 1191-1202 (publ. Wiesbaden 1951); pottery inscriptions from Teanum prove that the Oscans used a saturnian form of verse for their popular poetry (P. POCCHETTI, Eine Spur des saturnischen Verses im Oskischen, Glotta 61, 1983, 207-217).

meter? This is a question which we are hardly in a position to answer. The answer would depend on the way in which the search was conducted. If only the verses of artistic poetry evincing Greek influence are allowed to count as saturnians, one may follow Marius Victorinus and Terentianus Maurus<sup>1</sup> in describing the meter as quantitative, although its stichic employment and rhythmic treatment are not Greek. However, the more preliterary texts (along with other material outside literature in the narrow sense of the word) we define as saturnians, the more we are forced to resort to word-accent, the number of syllables or words, or a combination of these principles; that is, unless everything which cannot be interpreted as quantitative is to be regarded as prose. The hypothesis of a development from accentual verse with fairly fixed boundaries between words<sup>2</sup> towards quantitative verse is therefore unavoidable. This is true even though to project two mutually exclusive explanations into a temporal sequence, connected by the convenient notion of evolution, may seem merely to shift our dilemma into the minds of the earliest authors.<sup>3</sup> Nevertheless, as a Greek, Livius Andronicus was naturally inclined to explain to himself the foreign saturnian according to the metrical principles of his people. As so often in the history of Roman literature, the leap forward in development had its source in the initiative of a single individual.

<sup>1</sup> GL 6, 138-140; 6, 399-400.

<sup>2</sup>

legend:

The diagram was made by W. KISSEL.

<sup>3</sup> The history of the problem is traced by M. BARCHIESI, Nevio epico, Padova 1962, 310-323. An account of recent research is found in P. W. HARSH, Early Latin Meter and Prosody, Lustrum 3, 1958, 222-226. G. B. PIGHI, Il verso saturnio, RFIC 35, 1957, 47-60, constructs his theory of the saturnian simply on the regularity of its word count. A. W. DE GROOT, Le vers saturnien littéraire, REL 12, 1934, 284-312, accepts the possibility of subordinate accents. T. COLE, The Saturnian Verse, YCIS 21, 1969, 1-73, argues for an Indo-European origin (esp. 46-73). The Indo-European verse is shown to be isosyllabic by A. MEILLET, Die Ursprünge der griechischen Metrik, in: Rüd. SCHMITT, ed., Indogermanische Dichtersprache, Darmstadt 1968, 40-48. A Greek origin is proposed by G. PASQUALI, Preistoria dalla poesia

Epitaphs are significant.<sup>1</sup> Some of them are in saturnians, others in dactylic or iambic meters.

Before we leave lyric and turn our attention to drama, we must mention the songs of mockery<sup>2</sup> which particularly reflect the natural bent of the Italians, be they improvised songs of merriment at the harvest festival, or more or less ritualized barbs such as the young bridegroom had to endure in the Fescennine Verses. Even the triumphant general at the height of his glory was greeted by caustic derision.

Originally, the Fescennine served to ward off evil spirits, and even stage plays had at first a religious purpose. They were introduced at Rome to atone for a plague in 364 B.C. (Livy 7. 2). Long before Livius Andronicus, therefore, Rome possessed a stage tradition handed down to them by way of Etruria. But the accounts in our authors concerning dramatic saturnae are obscure and contradictory. The ways in which Greek dramas were modified in Rome may probably be traced back to native traditions. This is true of the evolution towards the musical play with 'flute' accompaniment and the fondness for anapaestic rhythms. The lavish use of the trochaic septenarius in Roman comedy is reminiscent of the Sicilian poet Epicharmus (6th–5th century B.C.). This meter, which served as the versus quadratus in soldiers' songs at triumphal processions, had a long Italian pedigree.<sup>3</sup> The popular forms of the Roman theater, notably the Oscan Atellan farce, will be discussed later. The final Hellenization was preceded by influences of Greek culture transmitted in some cases by Etruscans or Oscans.

---

romana, Firenze, 2nd ed. 1981, 91–112. Cf. E. FRAENKEL, The Pedigree of the Saturnian Metre, Eranos 49, 1951, 170–171; G. ERASMI, The Saturnian and Livius Andronicus, Glotta 57, 1979, 125–149; also V. PÖSCHL, Gli studi latini, in: Giorgio Pasquali e la filologia classica del novecento. Atti del Convegno Firenze-Pisa (1985), a cura di F. BORNHANN, Firenze 1988, 1–13; D. FEHLING, Zur historischen Herleitung des Saturniers, in: H. L. C. TRISTRAM, ed., Metrik und Medienwechsel, Tübingen 1991, 23–31; older standard works: F. LEO, Der saturnische Vers, Berlin 1905; W. M. LINDSAY, Early Latin Verse, Oxford 1922; B. LUISELLI, Il verso saturnio, Roma 1967.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the Scipionic inscriptions (on them H. PETERSMANN 1991) and for example the funeral poem on Claudia (CIL I, Berlin 1918, no. 1211; VON ALBRECHT, Rom 101–102 with note 131).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Hor. epist. 2. 1. 145; Verg. georg. 2. 385–386.

<sup>3</sup> F. ALTHEIM, Die neuesten Forschungen zur Vorgeschichte der römischen Metrik, Glotta 19, 1931, 24–48; further E. FRAENKEL, Die Vorgeschichte des versus quadratus, Hermes 62, 1927, 357–370.

The roots of prose are, as already indicated, related to those of poetry, but in part also quite different.

Sacred and legal texts belong to the sphere of a 'solemn oral style'. The special significance of orality, of the actual performance of the established words, is clear from the fact that the validity of a legal act depends on it and not on any written document. These areas gave rise to stylistic tendencies found later in literary prose: combinations of two nouns and other parallel structures as well as an extended use of alliteration.

The Twelve Tables mark a milestone on the way to a somewhat more developed prose style. Just as this work owed some of its content to the codes of the cities of Magna Graecia, so did its language. Along with instances of carelessness like the abrupt change of subject, we find here the first efforts at subordination and the organization of periods. Since this text was learned by heart for generations, its influence should not be underestimated. Just as many an Englishman grew up with the King James Bible, so the Roman grew up with the law of the Twelve Tables<sup>1</sup> and was conditioned by it in his use of language.

As a republic, Roman society fostered the development of every type of public speaking. In this area there is no doubt of the existence of an old native tradition. Greek rhetoric subsequently helped to give an account of what the young Roman had learned in the forum through observation and imitation.

Without doubt law and oratory were the two most important preliminary stages of literary prose at Rome.

The laudatio funebris bridged the gap between oratory, biography, and historiography. The praise of the dead performed an important educational function in Roman society. The generic tradition of the laudatio funebris was ancient, even if the examples preserved are of later date, and ancient historians rightly doubted if such documents of family pride could be trusted as historical evidence. Other rudimentary forms of historical writing raised fewer literary claims. The records of the pontifices contained, for the most part, only dry facts, which were based on the calendar board drawn up by the pontifex maximus. While these priestly annals were published already in the 2nd century B.C., other material remained limited to a very narrow circle of readers; for example, the ritual books of the pontifices<sup>1</sup> and augurs, the official records of the consuls and censors (perhaps a point of departure for later commentarii). The publication of the legal formulae (legis actiones) by Gnaeus Flavius, the secretary of Appius Claudius, responded to a strong public demand. It gratified the desire for legal certainty; however their literary value must have been correspondingly slight.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cic. leg. 2. 59. It was only in Cicero's lifetime that learning the XII Tables by heart became unfashionable.

The first author known to us as an individual, Appius Claudius Caecus,<sup>2</sup> censor 312 B.C. marks the transition to literature in the full sense of the word, both in prose and in poetry. This 'boldest innovator known to Roman history'<sup>3</sup> gained his lasting repute by more than the construction of the road and aqueduct to which he gave his name. He also earned it by his famous speech—still read in Cicero's day—against Pyrrhus' ambassador, Cineas (280 B.C.; Cicero Brutus 61). His maxims in saturnians, adapted from a south Italian Greek ('Pythagorean') collection, were, if taken as genuine, the first harbinger of a still distant literary spring. They revealed even then the Romans' penchant for practical morality, the lapidary style of their language, the historical and geographical conditions defining Greek influence, and the highly personal character of literary achievement in Rome.

To sum up: it is true that at Rome literature in the proper sense arose only under Greek influence. There were, however, important native conditions accounting for its rise and its preference for particular literary genres. Strong pre-literary traditions also set an indelible stamp on later literary development. In particular, the penetration of Greek culture began long before the rise of literature, and maintained a clearly visible connection with Rome's territorial expansion.

This indication of preliminary stages does not diminish the achievement of the true pioneers of Roman literature proper. It simply makes clear what were the starting points of their work, what means of expression they found available and what conditions of reception they were able to exploit.

<sup>1</sup> G. ROHDE, Die Kultsatzungen der römischen Pontifices, Berlin 1936.

<sup>2</sup> P. LEJAY, Appius Claudius Caecus, RPh 44, 1920, 92–141; E. STOESSL, Die Sententiae des Appius Claudius Caecus, RhM 122, 1979, 18–23; I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975, 15–30; M. MARINI, Osservazioni sui frammenti di Appio Claudio, RCCM 27, 1985, 3–11.

<sup>3</sup> MOMMSEN, RG 1, 310.

Most recent introduction with further bibliography: H. AND A. PETERSMANN, Republikanische Zeit I: Poesie, in: Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung, ed. by M. VON ALBRECHT, vol. 1, Stuttgart 1991. * G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Studien zur vorliterarischen Periode im frühen Rom, Tübingen 1989. * G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Strukturen der Mündlichkeit in der römischen Literatur, Tübingen 1990. * G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Beiträge zur mündlichen Kultur der Römer, Tübingen 1993. * D. TIMPE, Mündlichkeit und Schriftlichkeit als Basis der frührömischen Überlieferung, in: J. VON UNGERN-STERNBERG, H. REINAU, eds., Vergangenheit in mündlicher Überlieferung, Stuttgart 1988, 266–286. * See also the sections on genres.

SECOND CHAPTER:
LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

I. SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

In Rome literature was a late phenomenon. Five centuries of struggle passed during which books were hardly even a dream, before the need was felt to set over against the Greek achievement an artistic literature in Latin.

But now from ever more distant regions unforeseen prosperity inundated Rome's noble houses. The old thirst for glory and the new enjoyment of life joined to produce a hunger for culture and literary education which earlier had been partly unthinkable and partly suspect. The heirs of Romulus started to adorn their homes with Greek works of art and Greek books. In order to lend beauty to feast and festival, in order to explain in Latin their exploits and their trophies to a united Italy, to friends and foes, to children and children's children, they set to work house-tutors, chroniclers in verse, playwrights, composers of festival poems. The date of the first production of a Latin drama at Rome (240 B.C.) marks an epoch. Etruria had been vanquished (282 B.C.), the Greek city of Tarentum, famous for its vigorous theatrical life, had been conquered (272 B.C.), the First Punic War had been won (241 B.C.). Italy, unified under Roman leadership after the victory over Pyrrhus, faced as a shared ordeal the clash with Carthage. With the end of the struggle between the orders (287 B.C.), an internal consolidation took place. Rome was now the most powerful center in the western Mediterranean, possessor of a unified territory. This new identity required a name, and so now the whole peninsula took the name of its southern tip: Italy.

It also needed authentication in literature and myth. Festivals were the appropriate venue for public reflection and presentation. At first the topics of the new Latin drama in Greek style were often Trojan, or related in some other way to the history of Italy. Livius Andronicus wrote his Latin epic Oduisia as a piece of Italian pre-history. The epics of Naevius and Ennius incorporated the experiences of the First and Second Punic Wars. In moments of respite after great changes the time was ripe for literature. But that literature was more than a mere echo of events. It was an answer, even a blueprint of the future.

Roman literature developed along with the breath-taking expansion of Rome from dominance in Italy to world empire. In 240 B.C. the Empire embraced Italy (but not the plain of the Po, which came under Roman jurisdiction in 225–222) and Sicily (apart from Syracuse). It soon took in also Corsica and Sardinia (227 B.C.). The Second Punic War brought the Romans Spain (206 B.C.), although it would be a long time before Spain was finally pacified. Hesitatingly, they turned to the east. After the victory over Philip V of Macedonia at Cynoscephalae (197 B.C.), Flamininus proclaimed to an incredulous and amazed Greece that it was free. It was only some time after the defeat of Perseus by Aemilius Paullus at Pydna (168 B.C.) that a harsher wind blew from Rome. Macedonia became a Roman province in 148 B.C., Achaea after 146, and Asia after 133, thanks to the will of Attalus III of Pergamum.

Rome was now a new Hellenistic state, albeit one with its own language. In the provinces, beginning with Sicily which became Roman after the First Punic War, Roman magistrates simply behaved as if they had been the heirs of the Hellenistic tyrants. Becoming more adept and more discriminating with each passing day, the stern and sober patrons developed understanding and taste, and then began to write books, first with hesitation, and later with enthusiasm. Not even the hundred years of civil war could impede the irresistible rise of Roman literature. On the contrary, it lent it intellectual depth.

Around 100 B.C., Rome was mistress of almost the whole Iberian Peninsula, of Provence (from 121 B.C.), Italy, the whole Adriatic coast, Greece, western Asia Minor and the North African coast between Utica and Leptis Magna. Between 100 and 43 B.C. there were added Gaul (58–51 B.C., conquered by Caesar), Pontus, Bithynia (74 B.C. by the will of Nicomedes IV), Cilicia, Syria, Judaea, Cyprus, Crete, Cyrenaica, Numidia (Province of Nova Africa). The Mediterranean had become mare nostrum.

The simultaneous advance of Roman literature from modest beginnings to world status was no less powerful. Yet it took place against a dismal historical background. The circle of the privileged at Rome was and remained narrow. The unity of Italy, which may be traced from the 3rd century, was severely tested. It proved itself not merely a blessing but also a challenge. The Italians who for the most part had fought loyally at Rome's side as early as the Punic Wars had to wait unreasonably long for legal equality. Even the bloody Social

War, with its large-scale fratricide, brought them only partial success.

Native Roman citizens for the most part fared even worse. The new conquests destroyed economic equilibrium at home. The rich became richer<sup>1</sup> and the poor poorer. Considerable wealth had accumulated in the hands of leading families, mostly in the form of large estates, which were managed in plantation style. Accordingly the number of slaves—and of slave rebellions—increased. On the other hand free smallholders were decimated by the wars, severely damaged by Hannibal's devastations, and impoverished by competition with the latifundia worked by cheap slave labor. The roots of Rome's military power were being threatened. Either an agrarian law had to restore the small farmer, or the line of least resistance had to be followed, and a military career opened to include the large numbers now without property.

The senators were divided. Some with ill-concealed greed defended the status quo. Some with ostentatious selflessness supported reforms which, while more publicly effective, offended their colleagues. In settling this quarrel, even though it was conducted between social equals, they were not overscrupulous. For the first time citizens murdered citizens, senators murdered senators, while appealing under pretext of law to national emergency.

After the collapse of the Gracchan reforms, Marius adopted the second-best method, and brought about the overdue reform of the army. He replaced the citizen soldiers with an army that was paid, which meant that although efficiency increased, the sense of civic duty declined. The soldiers felt less obligation to the res publica than to their general. Soon Roman troops would march against Rome.

Admittance to civilization was no protection against the shattering barbarity stamping that century's moral character. The institution of proscription made murder of fellow citizens a routine and profitable political weapon. There was scarcely a family of repute without its dead to mourn.

In foreign politics, after the fall of Carthage Rome showed itself no more peaceful or merciful. Numantia is the proof. Only the grounds for war were often more threadbare than before. The oligarchy saw no reason to depart from its traditions. Were not wars a means of distracting attention from domestic conflicts? And must not every

---

<sup>1</sup> The equites began to define themselves as a second socially elite class from the 2nd century B.C. on.

Roman noble take the opportunity to satisfy his desire for glory and, in the process, to enrich himself according to the requirements of his class, so that on his return to Rome he could drive his rivals from the field? The attitude with which Caesar would begin and conduct his Gallic War was therefore already established. His special contribution was his grand manner, and his mercy towards fellow citizens—and no one else.

Not even a resurrected Carthage could have rallied these Romans. If ever now a real threat came from abroad, it had, unlike previous crises, no longer a unifying effect. In order to repel the danger, the senate was forced to grant extraordinary powers to individual commanders, and there was no way to prevent the selfish misuse of such authority. Even this desperate remedy only succeeded therefore in accelerating the decay of the Republic.

This period of turmoil, in which the ancient link to family and community was loosened, was quite peculiar in its atmosphere. It showed a double aspect. On the one hand, given the frequent change of rulers, there prevailed for most people a depressing uncertainty of existence. On the other, new possibilities for freedom opened up for individuals. Never before had a Roman been able to live to the full as Sulla or Caesar could. Sulla, if need required, was energetic and active, although without commitment to any planned career. Half predator, half aristocrat, a gambler by nature, he marched and conquered, murdered and ruled with relish. Yet he possessed a gift rarely found in politicians, a spirit magnanimous enough to retire of his own free will. In this he surpassed his aptest pupil, Caesar, who, by an irony of fate, reproached him with political illiteracy because of his withdrawal from office.

The failure of the senatorial aristocracy in the face of the Gracchan attempts at reform, like the fatal reform of the army by Marius, initiated a process which led through numerous civil wars to the obliteration of the Republic by the Principate. The replacement of citizen soldiery by professionals had the unintended consequence of finally guaranteeing victory to the one who could secure for himself the best and most expensive army. As the Republic lost respect it was transformed into a military dictatorship. There was a corresponding change in the Roman system of values. The state, no longer taken for granted, now became a problem. The individual discovered his freedom.

CONDITIONS OF THE RISE OF LITERATURE

The changing influence of particular parts of Italy and the spread of Romanization among neighboring areas were reflected in the varied origin of Roman authors, a development which would naturally continue during the Empire. In the beginning, the south, with its heavy debt to Greek influence, had taken the lead. In the 2nd and 1st centuries B.C. authors came increasingly from the center of the peninsula.<sup>1</sup> From the first half of the 1st century B.C. on, with Nepos and Catullus, the north,<sup>2</sup> too, found its voice. Cisalpine Gaul, long felt to be foreign, gave to Rome some of its greatest talents.

The social background of these writers varied. The senator, who often combined the roles of author and patron, wrote his own speeches, composed memoirs or historical works,<sup>3</sup> with special emphasis on his own family's exploits. To praise himself, he could employ epic writers of humble origin, who at first were often Greeks. The dramatists too were mostly from modest circumstances, as, for example Accius, a protégé of D. Junius Brutus, consul in 138 B.C.<sup>4</sup> Lyric poets received commissions for religious hymns.

Respectable Italian citizens who wrote poetry were at first rare, and appeared as individual champions. From the 3rd century Naevius may be mentioned, from the second Lucilius. Intellectual freedom in both cases was fostered by financial independence. The attitude towards poetry changed only gradually as Hellenization advanced. Yet, independently of their origin, authors gained respect and recognition. Ennius is said to have been honored by a statue in the vault of the Scipios. Even for an aristocrat, the writing of poetry became less

---

<sup>1</sup> From south Italy came Livius Andronicus (3rd century), Ennius (3rd–2nd century), Pacuvius (2nd century) and later Horace; from central Italy Naevius (3rd century), Cato (3rd–2nd century), Plautus (3rd–2nd century), Lucilius (2nd century), Cicero (1st century), Caesar (1st century), Varro Reatinus (1st century), Asinius Pollio (1st century); later Sallust, Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid; from Africa Terence (2nd century); later, Apuleius among many others; from north Italy Nepos (1st century), Catullus (1st century); later, Virgil, Livy, and the Elder and Younger Pliny; from Gaul Pompeius Trogus.

<sup>2</sup> S. MRATSCHEK, Literatur und Gesellschaft in der Transpadana, Athenaeum, n.s. 62, 1984, 154–189.

<sup>3</sup> In the Sullan period historical works were also composed by clients of the great families.

<sup>4</sup> Laberius, the writer of mimes (d. 43 B.C.), however, was a Roman knight. Caesar compelled him to appear publicly on the stage. The audience compounded the disgrace by awarding the palm to his rival Publilius Syrus, a freedman.

of a scandal. Some epigrams dating from the turn of the century mark a modest beginning. Soon, however, senators were found not only in the traditional College of Poets but also among the neoterics. Helvius Cinna and Licinius Calvus are examples. In general, in the 1st century B.C., writers of noble origin became more numerous; Varro Reatinus, Cicero, Caesar, and Asinius Pollio wrote poetry.<sup>1</sup> The tragic poet Accius, although his parents were only freedmen, did not rise from his place when the noble Julius Caesar Strabo entered the College of Poets (Val. Max. 3. 7. 11), and society acknowledged that in the empire of the mind ancestors made no difference.

The municipal aristocracy gained a reputation in scholarship with Aelius Stilo, in prose with Nepos, in poetry with Catullus. In Horace's time, poetic dabbling was already a fashionable weakness in the best circles (ars 382). If literary masters made their way to the forefront in spite of their humble origins,<sup>2</sup> among other factors, this may be credited to the social tolerance of men like Maecenas. Many of his peers, such as Cicero's friend and publisher Atticus, put their means at the service of literature.

Parallel and Complementary Phases. The change in Roman society during the last 200 years of the Republic is reflected in literary development.

The period from 240 to 146 B.C. included the Second Punic War, Rome's severest trial. It differs considerably in historical atmosphere, intellectual attitude, and literary production from the following century of civil wars. During the first hundred years, Roman literature was influenced by its encounter with Greek culture in southern Italy, by the unification of Italy and by the confrontation with Carthage. Numerous intellectual stimuli felt at Rome were productively exploited by individuals. Cultural interaction was of course a general phenomenon, but the rise of literature was bound up with particular places and persons. Prose at Rome, at least in principle, could make use of resources already available. Poetry had to create generic styles and forms from virtually nothing. Only gradually, and often with astonishing slowness, did traditions become established. During these early years occurred the flowering of the palliata and of historical epic, and the beginning of prose. Stylistically in this time, colorful expression and fullness prevailed. Towards the end, Terence introduced stylistic restraint, which would set a trend for the future.

<sup>1</sup> Nigidius Figulus seems only to have written prose.

<sup>2</sup> Two qualifications must be made: Virgil and Horace, though not of noble family, were not entirely poor; and Maecenas only encouraged talents which had already proved themselves.

In the period when Flamininus was granting freedom to the Greeks, Cato, in his Oration for the Rhodians, advocated a policy of clemency. Cato's Origines linked the historical identity of Italy to that of Rome. In comedy, we can grasp the beginnings of a Roman sense of humanity. It was already visible in Plautus' Captivi and of course in Terence. Ennius set wisdom higher than brute force. Unhappily, in the following century, in spite of its advancing culture, Rome failed to take to heart these teachings of its oldest literature.

A new century (146–43 B.C.) opened with the destruction of Carthage, Corinth, and Numantia, and ended with the self-annihilation of the Roman Republic. The contrast with the previous period is instructive. The elegant and succinct manner of Gaius Gracchus bears the same relationship to the lavishly colored style of Cato the Elder as do the innovative comedies of Terence (d. probably in 159) to those of Plautus. In his circle, Lucilius, so aware of language, fully merited the title doctus et urbanus. The increasing purism of the 2nd century, which may have been partly due to Stoic influence, soon led to a feeling that the works of Caecilius Statius and Pacuvius in the intervening generation lacked style. As a result, they were more quickly forgotten than the equally luxuriant works of their pioneering predecessors, Plautus and Ennius, which had become classics. The second half of the 2nd century saw a considerable development in oratory couched in a relatively strict style (the Gracchi); the literary enhancement of historical writing (Coelius Antipater); the culmination of Republican tragedy (Accius); and the beginning of scholarship (Aelius Stilo).

Sullan literature took many forms. Orators like Crassus and Hortensius cultivated an Asian style, with its relentless rhythms. The early Cicero still competed with these speakers. Later, he would find a classical mean, although without ever denying his beginnings. The historian Claudius Quadrigarius wrote with crystal clarity, displaying no trace of the fondness for archaism later normal in that genre. Evidently, the formal appearance of a genre was something not yet rigidly defined.

The strictness of the 2nd, and the variety of the early 1st century formed the basis for the subsequent Golden Age. During the waning decades of the Republic prose reached its culmination in Cicero and Caesar. Poetry likewise was represented by two towering figures, Catullus and Lucretius. These two poets are often categorized as 'pre-classical', an epithet that raises problems because it suggests the notion of incompleteness. The value of these authors is diminished if they are considered not as products of their own time, but as preliminary stages on the way to some kind of sequel. They are in fact the witnesses of an intellectual liberation which could only have taken place in that period.

LATIN AND GREEK LITERATURE

Thanks to Alexander, Greek civilization mastered the world. During the Hellenistic period, which may be defined as lasting from the death of Alexander to that of Caesar, Rome conquered the Greek east, and was at the same time penetrated by Greek culture. But, unlike most Mediterranean peoples, the Romans remained loyal to their native language, and responded to Greek literature by creating a literature of their own. In the Hellenistic period, Latin assimilated Greek literary forms, and, in the first instance, those that were contemporary.

The encounter with Greek culture did not take place in a vacuum. It was tied to those particular cities and areas with which Rome came sequentially into closer connection. Greek authors were not read at random; preference was given to those who, through their subjects, their origin or their biography, had ties with Italy. Ennius, for example, turned his attention to Sicilian authors like Epicharmus and Arcestratus of Gela. Even later, the Romans liked to refer to Pythagoras as an 'Italian' philosopher or to Theocritus' 'Sicilian Muses'.

Each of these authors was less concerned with imitation than with the challenge presented by an historical situation. From this point of view, the origin of Roman literature takes its place within a larger process. The Romans owed their triumphant course not to their alleged conservatism, but to their ability to relearn, and to find new answers to new challenges. Earlier, they had not been in the habit of breaking down their legions into maniples. Now they adopted these tactics from the Samnites, and defeated them with their own weapon. In its struggle with the Carthaginians the 'peasant people' built large fleets, and won victories at sea.<sup>1</sup> Roman patriarchs, with Cato the Elder in their van, adapted modern Hellenistic farming methods. New ways of living found expression in Hellenistic planning of houses and villas. Our picture of the rise of Italy as its own center of culture is inseparable from the rise of a self-awareness which expressed itself in open confrontation with Greek literature.

---

<sup>1</sup> Duilius in 260 B.C. at Mylae; Catulus in 241 B.C. at the Aegadian Islands.

When Aemilius Paullus, victor at Pydna (168), had the Royal Macedonian Library brought from Pella to Rome, this marked a turning-point in history. The close relationship of the Romans with the Pergamene kingdom, bequeathed to them by its last ruler, Attalus III (133), had permanent consequences for intellectual life as well.

The head of the Pergamene school of grammarians, the Stoic Crates of Mallus (2nd century), the teacher of Panaetius, came to Rome perhaps about 169 B.C. as ambassador for his country. There he gave lectures, and his interpretation of the poets became standard for many Romans after him. He discovered in Homer extensive geographical knowledge and, in the description of the shield, a scientific picture of the Stoic universe. To prove his point, he had to make considerable use of allegorical interpretation. In grammar, Crates defended the importance of anomaly rather than analogy. He initiated the Stoic direction taken by Roman scholarship and the Romans' approach to language and literature. The linguistic doctrine of the leading grammarian L. Aelius Stilo<sup>1</sup> Praeconinus, who died in the first third of the 1st century B.C., would be Stoic in principle. Through his students, Cicero and Varro, he defined for centuries the subsequent development of the Roman mind.

The close association with Pergamum contributed to the fact that scholarship of the strict Alexandrian variety did not find permanent footing in Rome. The textual critic and analogist Aristarchus (d. about 145 B.C.), and the universal scholar Eratosthenes (d. about 202 B.C.), both Alexandrians, are intellectual antipodes to Crates. Eratosthenes, for example, who calculated the circumference of the earth, held that Homer was not a scientific authority.

Rhodes provided another bridge into the intellectual world of Greece. It was an island republic which, not least because of its significance as a trading power,<sup>2</sup> exerted a powerful influence on Rome. After the adoption of a pro-Egyptian policy by the Ptolemies in the middle of the 2nd century, Rhodes welcomed scholars expelled from Alexandria. It was also the refuge of the great astronomer Hipparchus of Nicaea (d. after 127) and of famous teachers of rhetoric such as Molon, who taught Caesar and Cicero. It was also the favorite home of the philosopher Posidonius of Apamea (d. about 51 B.C.), whose work would become the basis of many Latin philosophical texts. His teacher Panaetius (d. about 109) was actually born in Rhodes. Panaetius was a student of Crates and a member of the Scipionic Circle. It was he who provided the model for Cicero's De officiis. Rhodes, too, therefore, made an essential contribution to the Stoic cast of Roman thought.

<sup>1</sup> Suet. gramm. 2 (on Crates); 3 (on Aelius Stilo); GRF 51-76.

<sup>2</sup> Elements of Rhodian marine law were actually incorporated in Roman law: cf. RE s.v. iactus.

Rome's schooldays under Greek tutelage were not free from tensions. The Romans were willing enough to profit from Greek experiences, but showed no inclination to be distracted from reality by Greek theories. The philosophers who arrived as ambassadors in 155 provoked a clash between old-fashioned respect for the res publica and modern skepticism. The men who came from Athens to Rome were the Peripatetic Critolaus, the Academic Skeptic Carneades, and the Stoic Diogenes. Carneades spoke one day in favor of justice in policy and the next day against it. Cato took steps to secure the early dismissal of these corrupters of public morals. This did not prevent him from secretly learning as much as he could from the Greeks, even in the area of capitalist agronomy. The creation of a Latin literature is, in fact, a fruitful reaction to overweening Greek influence.

Numerous anonymous merchants, freedmen, and slaves furthered the spread of Greek influence in the capital. Many served as tutors and emended or even composed the historical works written in Greek by their Roman masters. But there were also individual personalities of importance. One fruitful intellectual seedbed for future literary growth was the so-called Scipionic Circle. It was not exclusive. Greek and Latin authors swarmed around the notables of the Rome of those days. Here the historically necessary exchange between two cultures was realized in lively dialogue. Polybius and Panaetius communicated to Roman society the education for which its best representatives yearned. Conversely, there arose a new picture of the historical and cultural mission of Rome in the minds of these Greeks.

The last decisive step was taken at the end of the Republic. The circle of the neoterics, which again was not exclusive, united young men of noble birth. Here for the first time Latin literature liberated itself from the claims of traditional society. The conservative Cicero

(who in his day had made his own contribution to the advance of Roman poetry) looked on the group with a suspicion that would be shared later on by Horace.

GENRES

One of the oldest genres is oratory, which is the soul of every republican society. The young Roman acquired this skill by listening to proceedings in the Forum and by attaching himself to one of the great orators of the older generation. From orally transmitted practice there developed typical characteristics of style.

Legend places the first influence of Greek rhetoric as early as Tarquinius Priscus. It gradually increased since the masters of the world wanted to put into practice what they had learned from their Greek tutors. Already in Cato the Elder traces of Greek rhetoric have been discovered.

At a later phase of literature, Gaius Gracchus, whose Latin was particularly elegant and pure, depended so much on Greek technique that he always kept in his retinue a Greek elocutionist, whose task was to give him the right tone with a pitchpipe. In an age without microphones, the success of a speaker was determined by his ability to speak loudly and clearly without damaging his voice, and for this he needed Greek coaches.

In the generation before Cicero, the Asian style came into prominence, for which archaic Latin shows an affinity. Crassus divided his speeches into short rhythmical commata. Hortensius followed him. Cicero himself preserved clausula-rhythms, even though he soon overcame an exaggerated Asianism by wide-ranging imitation of Demosthenes. In comparison with him, the extreme Atticists lost their attraction. In Cicero's oratory a degree of art is attained which allows us to forget art, a 'second nature', which however no longer has much in common with the first. In the school of Greek rhetoric, Latin oratory cast off the last remains of official and legal stiltedness still clinging to it from its early period. In style, Cicero discovered the golden mean between Atticism and Asianism.

The custom of publishing speeches began early in Rome and was said to have been practiced by Appius Claudius. Cicero's publication of his speeches was therefore nothing unusual in his day. For a homo novus the publication of speeches was a method of self-advertisement as lawyer and politician. Another typically Roman motive was to provide the younger generation with educational material, an ambition inspiring Cicero's other works. His ornate philosophical and rhetorical writings were quite different from Greek books of his time. Mommsen jokingly remarked that he had driven from the field Demosthenes with his speeches and Plato with his philosophical dialogues. Only time, he suggested, prevented Cicero from outdoing Thucydides as well.<sup>1</sup> But, more fairly, it needs to be said that in his day Cicero was literally the only author who in prose could dare to challenge Demosthenes and Plato. Such courage to confront the greatest masters of the past also shows that Latin literature had advanced beyond its years of tutelage. So it was that Lucretius measured himself against Empedocles.

Although Cicero's philosophical and rhetorical writings reflect the circumstances of his career, they were not inspired exclusively by political aims of the day. They were a necessary expression of the author's identity as an intellectual and made him a teacher of Rome and Europe. In his speeches, too, it is not the ephemeral which rouses admiration, but the ability of a great man to view a given case in the light of greater, more general issues. The publication of speeches has been called a symptom of decadence,<sup>2</sup> but for two thousand years this decadence has given us food for thought. Without it we would miss the pinnacle of Latin prose, and Mommsen would have missed intelligent contemporary documents. If the Romans had manfully resisted this literary original sin, they would have had no more to say to us than, for example, the Spartans.

Cicero's Letters are an inestimable witness to contemporary events. The degree of literary elaboration in them varies. There are notes jotted down spontaneously to trusted friends, sometimes cheerful, sometimes dismal, along with sober communications to his wife, and, at the opposite end of the scale, studiedly polite greetings to opponents and carefully polished official reports. And yet this author of a thousand nuances has been deliberately downgraded to the status of classical representative of classicism!

We encounter technical writing<sup>3</sup> in two standard representatives, one early and the other late: Cato's work on agriculture, and the simi-

---

<sup>1</sup> RG 3, Berlin 6th ed. 1875, 620.

<sup>2</sup> MOMMSEN, loc. cit., 619.

<sup>3</sup> For bibliography see Roman Technical Writers, below, pp. 564-582.

larly titled work of Varro. In Cato, the carefully organized introduction is visibly distinguished from the actual instruction, which raises no literary claim. Varro, by contrast, writes as a scholar, and in that work strives moreover, by using the dialogue form, for a literary effect throughout.

In the area of law<sup>1</sup> Rome also had a native tradition. The Law of the Twelve Tables (middle of the 5th century B.C.) is known only from fragmentary later quotations. Since it was learned by heart by every Roman, however, its influence was considerable. For many years civil legislation was kept in the background by interpretation and further development of existing law. Legal formulae were long safeguarded on the grounds that they were the property of the priests, who were originally the only ones concerned with interpreting the laws. The publication of the formulas around 300 B.C. marked an essential step forward. An important source of law was provided by the edicts which the praetors published on taking office.

Legal science originally made no literary claims. It consisted of the responsa given by iurisconsulti (Cic. de orat. 1. 200). In their houses could also be found young students.

Roman law early fell under Greek influence.<sup>2</sup> The Twelve Tables followed the codes of Greek cities. Otherwise Greek legal forms were only rarely adopted.<sup>3</sup>

The extension of the imperium also made legal regulations for dealings involving non-Romans necessary (ius gentium). Legal scholarship was further refined under Stoic influence,<sup>4</sup> to which the Scipionic Circle contributed. In the late Republican period, the ius gentium was closely related to ius naturale. Greek influence was at work here, as Cicero's De re publica and De legibus reveal. Nevertheless the ius gentium remained Roman in structure. Under the influence of philosophy, and particularly of the Stoa, the jurists came to develop a delight in definition. An example is offered by the Ὀποι of Q. Mucius Scaevola. Cicero took up the questions of Roman law in his De iure civili in artem redigendo. Since he had no technical proficiency as a jurist, the

<sup>1</sup> For bibliography see Roman Jurists and Juridical Literature of the Republican Period, below, pp. 616–630.

<sup>2</sup> An old borrowing from Greek is poena ("fine").

<sup>3</sup> For example, some part of the Rhodian marine law and the general principle requiring written codification of laws.

<sup>4</sup> J. STROUX, Summum ius, summa iniuria. Ein Kapitel aus der Geschichte der interpretatio iuris, Leipzig/Berlin, no date (about 1926).

influence of philosophy and rhetoric in this work must have been considerable. Though likewise no jurist, Varro composed fifteen books De iure civili.

No complete works by jurists of the Republican period have been preserved. We know of publications of commercial and testamentary formulas, as also of Responsa (Digesta). The practice of giving responses led M. Junius Brutus to cast his work on ius civile into the form of a dialogue. Here an apparently Greek literary form sprang from a practice observed in Roman life. The Twelve Tables were given legal commentaries, which adapted their intent to contemporary needs and were accompanied by the relevant formulas. An example is the Tripertita of Sextus Aelius Paetus Catus. There were also commentaries on the praetorian edict and that of the curule aediles. Quintus Mucius Scaevola composed a system of ius civile in 18 books. It was supplied with a commentary by Servius Sulpicius Rufus, a contemporary of Cicero. The same author created an elegant style of jurisprudence. The transformation of legal language from the lapidary brevity of the Twelve Tables to captious longwindedness may be followed on inscriptions, for example in the Lex Acilia repetundarum (122 B.C.).

Historical writing in origin was the only genre of writing compatible with social distinction. Cato, Cincius Alimentus, Fabius Pictor, even the Graecomaniac Aulus Postumius Albinus, were all senators. There is only a single genuine writer among them: the historian, orator, and jurist Coelius Antipater, but it would be too bold to conclude from his Greek cognomen that he was of humble birth. In the time of Sulla there is some change. Claudius Quadrigarius certainly did not belong to the patrician gens Claudia, and Valerius Antias may have been a client of the patrician Valerii. Even so, the historian Sisenna was a senator, just as later were Cicero's contemporaries Aelius Tubero and Sallust.

We do not possess memoirs like those of Sulla, and so the Commentaries of Caesar are for us a unique phenomenon in Roman literature. They link the Roman commentarius with features of Greek historiography. Cicero would gladly have written history if he could only have found time. Since his historiographical theories were based on Herodotus and Theopompus, the outcome of his efforts would probably have been not unlike the work of Livy. Sallust's historical works offered a stylized picture of the late Republican period. The Jugurthine War dealt with the earlier part of this period, the Catilina with a later phase. The Histories lay in between. Sallust created a fixed style for Roman historical writing, modeling its language on Cato and its literary technique on Thucydides. The Histories show us a different Sallust, one somewhat closer to Herodotus; but impulses towards this development are found earlier, especially in the Bellum Jugurthinum.

The fragments of Asinius Pollio and Trogus prove that Sallust's manner was not the only one possible for a historian. Even in literary technique there are great differences; for example, Trogus rejected the practice of inserting invented speeches, otherwise so common. Livy, too, was not an orthodox follower of Sallust. His diction is visibly different. It was through Tacitus and Ammianus that the Sallustian style became typical of the genre.

Poetry at first adopted predominantly Hellenistic literary forms. Epic was nominally Homeric, but in practice mostly followed Hellenistic historical epic. Ennius perfected archaic Latin epic in the very first stage of Roman literature. In the late Republican period, Catullus created a miniature epic in the Hellenistic style. Cicero translated Aratus, and celebrated the deeds of Marius and his own consulship. Lucretius produced a didactic poem in the grand manner. Technically, these poets imbued epic with refined Alexandrian technique and with elements of rhetoric. Lucretius mastered the large-scale form. Without these pioneering works, the Aeneid could not have been written. The Republican epic developed Hellenistic techniques, but still fell short of complete assimilation of Homer. In content, each of these works exhibits individual features and a personal touch.

It was a logical consequence of the historical situation of Roman literature that a Hellenistic literary form such as New Comedy should take definitive shape in the first period of Latin literature. Some genuinely Italian elements irresistibly invaded certain early Latin comedies: thanks to his linguistic creativity and his musical gift, Plautus produced something essentially different from Menander. Attention to purity of language and strictness of form contributed to the refinement of comedy. Terence reached a classical compromise. After him, literary comedy ran out of energy and clung ever more closely to its models, to be ruined finally by suicidal perfectionism and pedantry. The public demanded cruder fare.

Tragedy enjoyed longer life. It reached its high point in the century of turmoil following 146. This genre, which played an important part in the assimilation of myth at Rome, likewise reflected Hellenistic taste. It had something of the character of grand opera. At the same time, tragedy especially catered to the Roman sense of pathos. Horace would find a talent for tragedy in the Romans (spirat tragicum, 'he has some tragic inspiration', epist. 2. 1. 166), and Cicero would attest to the lasting impression created by tragic performances. Accius, Rome's most finished tragic writer, possessed both the archaic power and the modern sensibility to create something valuable. Thus the loss of his works is particularly regrettable. The genre, without whose influence both the Aeneid and Metamorphoses would be unthinkable, is represented under Augustus by Varius and Ovid, and under Nero by Seneca. That author's delight in macabre and gruesome elements had probably been prepared by the tragedians of the Republican period. Because of gaps in the tradition, the reader might have the impression that tragedy at Rome passed directly from its Hellenistic to its rhetorical stage. But in the light of the fragments of Accius we should revise this judgment. His clear, dignified language forms the poetic pendant to the well-chiselled prose of C. Gracchus.

The native Roman satura came into prominence equally in the second half of the 2nd century with Lucilius. As a medium through which a free man could express himself, satire was in many ways ahead of its time, sometimes heralding Catullus and even Horace. Doctus and urbanus, Lucilius was part of his period; he belonged with purists like C. Gracchus, but also with critics of language like Accius, although with the latter he could not see eye to eye. These are the years in which literary scholarship was also making its appearance in Rome.

Epigram, elegy, and lyric began only in the late Republican period, if we discount sepulchral epigrams, the Hymn to Juno of Andronicus, and the quite different lyric of the Plautine cantica. After shaky beginnings at the turn of the century, personal poetry in Hellenistic miniature forms culminated in Catullus. These genres were particularly linked to the discovery of the world of otium during the last decades of the Republic. In form they bore the mark of the Callimachean school, but in content they breathed the spirit of a new individual freedom. Thus, these genres were unmistakably the children of their time and yet harbingers of things to come. Love elegy, both technically and as a genre, would only reach perfection in the next stage of literature.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE

In what language would that new Roman and Italian self-awareness find expression? The answer to this question was not a foregone conclusion. Authors wishing to be read by the Greek-speaking world wrote in Greek, even if they were Roman senators. Conversely, the magnetism and luster of Rome as center of power, with its uniform administrative and military language, was so strong that not only Rome's Italian kinsfolk but also many Greeks began to write in Latin. In the long run, the Greek colonies in the west were less able to resist assimilation to Latin than the self-contained Greek linguistic sphere of the eastern Mediterranean. As the language of the capital, Latin became the language of literature. Latin, to whose authority surrender now had to be made, was subsequently justified as a 'Greek-Aeolic dialect'.

Language and style acquired in the first instance rich color and fullness. This was equally true of the poems of Naevius, Ennius or Plautus, and of the prose of Cato the Elder, in which heavy, archaic ornament within the sentence contrasts with brusque brevity at the end.

In the 2nd century, selectivity increased. The comedies of Terence provide the first evidence, but in the speeches of C. Gracchus the purism and strictness distinguishing the Roman aristocracy is no less manifest.

Lucilius is actually one of the most colorful Latin authors. Even so, he aims to be doctus and urbanus, and criticism of language is one of his pursuits.

The clear, factual Latin of Claudius Quadrigarius allows us to estimate what we have lost with Sullan prose. Cornelius Nepos and Varro compensate to some extent for the lack. Technical writers and jurists would develop this style further, after Sallust had imposed his archaizing manner on history.

Caesar continued the tradition of purism typical of the capital. Cicero was his equal in purity of language, but outshone him in fullness. He conquered numerous new provinces for the Latin language in both prose and poetry. The lively variety of the levels of language and of generic styles exploited by this master of a thousand colors has not been fully appreciated; instead, the whims of critics have turned him into a mute idol of classicism.

Cicero remained unmatched as a prose writer, but his quite successful efforts to refine the hexameter were soon overshadowed by Catullus. To the epic verse and to particular small-scale lyric forms in Latin Catullus lent a tenderness and sweetness previously unknown. Yet, despite magnificence in concepts, he found difficulty in mastering the elegiac couplet. Technically, much remained to be done by the Augustans in this area.

In his language, too, Catullus was continually defying convention. He struck out in two directions. Along with an extraordinary delicacy of language we find in him coarse, even rude expressions. This unparalleled breadth of linguistic range is evidence of the scope of an author who in Rome turned the small poem into a great artistic form.

Lucretius, who complained of the poverty of Latin, was wholly dedicated to his theme. In his search for the right word he allowed himself to be led into unexplored realms of language which he researched with bold innovative instinct.

IDEAS I REFLECTIONS ON LITERATURE

The earliest Latin poets won for themselves and for poetry the right of residence in Rome. Their identity was inseparable from their work, and their self-confidence rested wholly on their literary achievement; this made them forerunners of both the Augustans and later European authors. Ennius mirrored his own life in the picture he gave of the cultivated friend who chats with the commanding general after work, but he also thought of himself as a reincarnation of Homer. Plautus communicated with his public by breaking the dramatic illusion. On other occasions, he projected his poetic persona into the role of a slave, which he frequently played himself. It was the cunning slave, spinning the plot, who became the 'strategist' or 'architect' of the play. The will of the author determined destiny: 'Plautus wanted it this way.' Only one further step remained to complete the idea of poeta creator. Terence turned his prologue into a vehicle for literary polemics; he thus wrote the first texts of literary criticism in the Latin language. In Lucilius, reflection became more detailed and technical. Accius followed two routes, that of poet and that of scholar. Yet scholarship was on the road to independence. Volcacius Sedigitus and others produced critical catalogs of Roman poets. Appreciation of native literature was added to philology's role as preserver and interpreter.

Catullus and the neoterics took over the Hellenistic poetics of graceful 'play' and of 'trifles'. It is surprising to find in Catullus of all people the division between poetry and life expressed with full force (carm. 16),—although this was intended as a defensive tactic. Malicious contemporaries had defamed the singer of tender love poetry as 'unmanly'. Acts described in blunt language would convince those miserable cronies of Catullus' potency. With this, the poet maintained his sovereign independence. In Lucretius the conviction of freedom found different expression. Old topoi of the mysteries, such as the untrodden path at the side of the highway, the untouched spring, had long lost their original religious significance, and had been adapted by Hellenistic poets to literary creation. One may recall Callimachus' prologue to the Aetia, which influenced Ennius. Lucretius (l. 921–950) restored to such faded ideas their savor of intellectual adventure. This attitude fit well into an epoch of great political adventurers and even outstripped their deeds in daring.

For Lucretius, poetry had a subordinate role. It was the honey with which the doctor makes his bitter medicine acceptable to children. The poet thought of himself, we may deduce, as a physician. As a born poet, he was in fact proof against his own unpoetic theory of poetry. Likewise, he reflected on the poverty of the Latin language, while busy with the task of enriching it.

In many of his introductions, Cicero boasted of having conquered new fields—such as philosophy—for the Latin language. A parallel with the conquests of Roman generals is easily made. He defended his own literary activity, and emphasized the merits of Latin. In his Pro Archia, he established the function of the poet in Roman society.

IDEAS II

For a long time there could be no talk of a 'world of ideas' at Rome. What we understand by 'thinking' would have struck a Roman of the old school as sheer cynicism and an attack on the state. The five early centuries which knew no literature, and the continued expulsion from Rome of philosophers and rhetors until well into more civilized times speak for themselves.

Once literature began, it came to reflect historical development significantly. The 'Italic' phase of the Roman Empire brought about an inner consolidation, leading to the rise of a Latin literature. The creation of ideas, myths, and values was linked to concrete historical, geographical, and administrative conditions. The establishment of a national history went hand in hand with the establishment of cultural awareness, and depended on stimuli from southern Italy. Public and social values were formulated, but along with them literature also shared the task of enlightenment. From the outset, drama, epic, and other genres also encouraged reflection. Centrifugal forces ever present in Roman society, such as the ambition of individual families and increasingly of individual personalities, found expression early in poetry. Evidently, the grandees of Rome took undue satisfaction in the Hellenistic panegyric of rulers, to which they became accustomed at the hands of compliant poets, beginning with the worthy Ennius. The collective moral attitude of old Roman society, particularly emphasized by homines novi, could not long withstand the personality cult of the Greek-speaking East. There was an ancient equivalence at Rome between the triumphant general and Jupiter. Perhaps linked to this, we now find in the Scipios a victorious self-confidence, of which the guiding stars were Alexander and Achilles. We also find a feeling about life which broke the mold of the civic heroism of the old Roman type, and which was bound to appear suspect to conservatively minded contemporaries. What an individual politician might have called the discovery of his personal liberty seemed to his peers a striving for regal dignity dangerous to the state. The late Republican period was uncommonly rich in great personalities. Politically, these individuals strove for power. Yet it was no coincidence that Sulla, the terrifying exponent of personal caprice, also made his appearance as the composer of an autobiography. All this is matched in the literary sphere by the rise of original personalities like Lucretius and Catullus, who were largely liberated from Roman conventions. The affinity of modern readers to these very poets rests not least on the fact that they worked in a challenging atmosphere of social change not possible either earlier or later in ancient Rome. The chaos of the 3rd century A.D. would produce no literature. By contrast, the confusions of the Republican period contributed to the emancipation of the individual and to the birth of personal poetry.

In the late Republican period, old bounds were transgressed. Rome itself was no longer safe from its sons as they came of age. The shrine of Fortuna at Praeneste was a monumental triumph of architecture over landscape. Technical power came to master the material world. Man became conscious of what was feasible and made it a reality. Cato had already acquired modern farming techniques. Without the precise methods of the Roman agrimensores, Caesar's achievements as a general would have been unthinkable.

Attitudes towards life at this time fluctuated between unparalleled autonomy and an uncertainty equally unheard of. On the one hand, proscriptions and civil wars daily confronted the individual with his mortality. On the other, the great conquests in east and west opened to him the vastness of space.

The contrast with the previous period could not have been sharper. Not long ago the city itself had been both cosmos and religious community, thus forming the only world for the Roman, who felt himself part of its hierarchical structure.

Looking back, Cicero recognized what had been lost. In sketching a picture of the past, he was early enough to be able to speak from personal observation, and late enough to enjoy a lofty philosophical stance. In his intellectual attitude, Cicero was the opposite of a Roman of the old stamp. He owed all that he was to his education, which had brought him liberation and lent him grandeur. By meditating on the Roman state and Roman law he steadily fulfilled in his time a unique mission. He conquered for Latin prose the realm of mind and of philosophy. Here, he was no less bold than many a general. However he did not settle to rest in that new world, but worked to become by means of philosophical reasoning what earlier Romans had been by nature. Thus, he continued to return to politics, and was active in the service of the republic to the end. It is worth emphasizing that behind such a voluntary commitment to the commonwealth there was not foolishness and weakness, but strength and a willingness to sacrifice, of a kind not shown by the great men of action of that time.

Lucretius separated the natural universe from the state, and analyzed it with a thoroughness previously unknown at Rome. He was one of the first Romans to consider nature a worthy object of study. Moreover, while Cicero clung to the uniqueness of the Roman state, and tried to anchor it in an equally unique natural world, Lucretius, with Epicurus, denied that our world was the only one in existence (Lucr. 2. 1084–1092). To crown everything, he argued that the gods had nothing to do with its guidance. Ritual, a central element of old Roman religion, became meaningless in this regard. 'Piety' was no longer the performing of rites, but a state of mind (Lucr. 5. 1198–1203). Without his traditional mediators, man stood alone under the starry sky (Lucretius, Lucr. 1. 140–145). Not blind belief, but enlightenment and knowledge of nature brought freedom from fear. The experience of emancipation from old prejudices (religio) was novel, and novel, too, was the joy of illuminating with the torch of reason and nothing else the darkness of a life into whose depths Lucretius, as a man of his time, had looked. In retrospect, men like Marius and Sulla almost deserve thanks for so emphatically demonstrating to their countrymen what a questionable thing the res publica was. But it needed a genius like Lucretius to draw from this truth such bold consequences, and to match his famous contemporaries' foreign conquests with spiritual conquests of infinitely greater dimensions.

Another contemporary, Catullus, discovered love and poetry. They belonged to the sphere of leisure (otium). Catullus, however, scandalized his fellow Romans by making otium, if not theoretically, at least practically, the content of his life. The powerful had done enough to discredit the res publica in the eyes of thoughtful young men. Defiant indifference set the tone of Catullus' verses to Caesar (carm. 93). Catullus here was not the humble provincial who respectfully received a highly placed guest from Rome, which would have been the traditional role gladly played by Catullus' father. The poet was full of self-confidence. He had his own point of view which allowed him to challenge the great ones of the world as a free man.

For Catullus, the worlds of otium and negotium exchanged places. Words which Romans normally employed in the res publica (fides, foedus) were internalized, and transferred to private, inter-personal relationships. Catullus gave them a personal meaning.

Love was presented as a total human experience. Bene velle, expressed in bene facta (76. 1), was opposed to the sensual amare (cf. 72; 75). Instead of asserting that Catullus had discovered spiritual love, we should rather say that for man, who is normally so anxious to possess, he discovered the love of surrender ascribed by tradition to women. In an extraordinary exchange of gender roles, Catullus compares himself with Juno, the spouse of the unfaithful Jupiter (68. 135–140).

Undoubtedly, Catullus was one of the first men in Rome prepared to learn something from the experiences and sufferings of women. In another sense, Lesbia was his teacher. But she was more than a 'mistress of love', playing the part expected from hetaerae. She was for him a divine and demonic being, who led him to an extreme aporia.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cf. poem 76 and VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 80–94.

The feelings with which he confronted her were divided (odi et amo, 85; cf. 72. 8). In his discovery of love as a content of life and even school of life for a man, Catullus broke through the bounds of the traditional Roman way of thinking.

'Going beyond normal bounds' is the theme of poem 63. Through his dedication to the Great Mother, Attis gave up not only his manhood but also his home. At a time when many Romans were breaking out of inherited social structures and seeking new paths, the Attis is to be taken seriously as an historical witness to the atmosphere of that age. Exceeding boundaries and expanding consciousness: these basic experiences of Catullus' generation were brought together here by way of example in a mythological narrative. Attis had to learn that the journey into the unknown had its price: the loss of familiar social relationships. In the end he was left alone, not liberated, but enslaved. Even more gloomy is the conclusion of the miniature epic on Peleus (carmin. 64). By Catullus' time, encounters between gods and men were no longer possible. Transgression found its nemesis, and Catullus knew that. But he had successfully rattled the bars of the human cage and become for Roman and later readers one of the greatest cultural discoverers and liberators.

Like the architect of the great temple of Fortuna at Praeneste, Catullus was also the creator of symmetrical structures on a grand scale. We still admire them in the carmina maiora, such as 64 and 68. That generation forced its way simultaneously both within and without, into the intimate and into the monumental dimension.

In sum, the early Republic celebrated in epic and historical writing the unity of Italy, although these efforts at first enjoyed no continuation. The summons to mercy and humanitas in comedy and in political speeches are other features worthy of mention. So is the praise of wisdom at the expense of brute force in epic.

The late Republic plumbed all the heights and depths of life itself both in a positive and a negative fashion. In Caesar, all is action, fulfillment of the day, put into words imperiously. Cicero conquered for the future the realm of philosophy. He and Sallust were not content to paint a picture of their own times, but succeeded in making a new and creative discovery of 'old' Rome, which thanks to their writings would become authoritative both in the immediate and long term future. The late Republican period marked indeed a high point in the development of Latin prose. The past was still near enough to be understood, and yet far enough away to be grasped and intellectualized in words. In poetry, even where its subject was not expressly drawn from contemporary history, we find what may be called a seismographic graph of the inner quakings of the time. It offers a subtle picture in which if not the events, at least the atmosphere in which they happened is reflected, along with the mentality by which those events were experienced or rejected.

Culturally the restless and 'decadent' time of transition between Republic and military dictatorship was especially fruitful. In protest against the events of the day, new intellectual continents were discovered. Cicero and Sallust internalized the idea of glory, and established the intrinsic value of literary activity. The poets pressed even further. The loosening of the link to society and often the chaotic circumstances of the time themselves set the individual free, and compelled him to look for his rule of life not abroad in the world, but in his own heart. The discoveries of that age were of lasting value, not only because they had been personally endured and mastered by individuals but because they were given expression by true poets in strong and valid language. For poetry, the late Republican period was a moment of freedom between old and new forms of subjection, when a brief suspension, as it were, of the laws of gravity, made possible, for an instant, what was otherwise impossible.

Bibl.: To be consulted in the first place: ANRW, esp. 1, 1-4.

VON ALBRECHT, Masters. * VON ALBRECHT, Poesie. * G. ALFÖLDY, Römische Sozialgeschichte, Wiesbaden 3rd ed. 1984, esp. 27-84. * W. BEARE, The Roman Stage. A Short History of Latin Drama in the Time of the Republic, London 2nd ed. 1955, 3rd ed. 1964. * S. F. BONNER, Roman Declamation in the Late Republic and Early Empire, Berkeley 1949. * K. CHRIST, Römische Geschichte und Wissenschaftsgeschichte, vol. 1: Römische Republik und augusteischer Principat, Darmstadt 1982. * K. CHRIST, Krise und Untergang der römischen Republik, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1984. * M. CRAWFORD, The Roman Republic, Fontana 1978. * G. DUCKWORTH, The Nature of Roman Comedy. A Study in Public Entertainment, Princeton 1952. * H. FRÄNKEL, Griechische Bildung in altrömischen Epen, Hermes 67, 1932, 303-314. * M. GELZER, Der Anfang römischer Geschichtsschreibung, in: M. GELZER, Kleine Schriften, vol. 3, Wiesbaden 1964, 93-103. * M. GELZER, Nochmals über den Anfang der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, ibid. 104-110. * P. GRIMAL, Le siècle des Scipions. Rome et l'hellénisme au temps des guerres puniques, Paris 2nd ed. 1975. * R. HARDER, Die Einbürgerung der Philosophie in Rom, in: R. HARDER, Kleine Schriften, ed. by W. MARG, München 1960, 330-353. * W. V. HARRIS, War and Imperialism in Republic lican Rome (327–70 B.C.), Oxford 1979. * D. KIENAST, Cato der Zensor. Seine Persönlichkeit und seine Zeit, Heidelberg 1954, repr. (with add.) 1979. * KROLL, Studien. * W. KROLL, Die Kultur der Ciceronischen Zeit, 2 vols., Leipzig 1933, repr. 1975. * A. D. LEEMAN, ed., Republikanische Zeit II: Prosa (in: M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung), Stuttgart 1985. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Die römische Komödie: Plautus und Terenz (= WdF 236), Darmstadt 1973. * LEO, LG. * F. LEO, Ausgewählte kleine Schriften, ed. by E. FRAENKEL, vol. 1: Zur römischen Literatur des Zeitalters der Republik, Roma 1960. * C. MEIER, Res publica amissa. Eine Studie zur Verfassung und Geschichte der späten römischen Republik, Wiesbaden 1966. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa. * H. AND A. PETERSMANN, eds., Republikanische Zeit I: Poesie (in: M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung), Stuttgart 1991. * V. PÖSCHL, Römischer Staat und griechisches Staatsdenken bei Cicero. Untersuchungen zu Ciceros Schrift De re publica, Berlin 1936, repr. 1962. * O. RIBBECK, Die römische Tragödie im Zeitalter der Republik, Leipzig 1875, repr. 1968. * M. ROSTOVTZEFF, A History of the Ancient World, vol. 2: Rome, Oxford (1927) 1928 (with corr.), repr. 1933 etc. * K. SCHEIDLE, Modus optimum. Die Bedeutung des 'rechten Maßes' in der römischen Literatur (Republik—frühe Kaiserzeit), untersucht an den Begriffen Modus—Modestia—Moderatio—Temperantia, Frankfurt 1993. * H. SCHNEIDER, Wirtschaft und Politik. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der späten römischen Republik, Erlangen 1974. * H. SCHNEIDER, ed., Zur Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der späten römischen Republik (= WdF 413), Darmstadt 1976. * W. Y. SELLAR, The Roman Poets of the Republic, Oxford 3rd ed. 1905. * H. STRASBURGER, Der Scipionenkreis, Hermes 94, 1966, 60–72. * W. SUERBAUM, Untersuchungen zur Selbstdarstellung älterer römischer Dichter. Livius Andronicus, Naevius, Ennius, Hildesheim 1968. * W. SUERBAUM, Zum Umfang der Bücher in der archaischen lateinischen Dichtung: Naevius, Ennius, Lukrez und Livius Andronicus auf Papyrus-Rollen, ZPE 92, 1992, 153–173. * I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975. * A. TRAGLIA, Poetae novi, Roma 1962. * J. VOGT, Die römische Republik, Freiburg 6th ed. 1973 (rev.). * J. H. WASZINK, Zum Anfangsstadium der römischen Literatur, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 869–927.

II. POETRY

A. EPIC AND DRAMA

ROMAN EPIC

General Remarks

Antiquity distinguished literary genres in two ways. One was purely external, and took as its criterion meter.<sup>1</sup> The second noted the difference of type and significance of content. Perhaps following Theophrastus, Suetonius defined epic as carmine hexametro divinarum rerum et heroicarum humanarumque comprehensio ('a representation of divine, heroic and human affairs in a hexametric poem').<sup>2</sup> Its task was to communicate an all-embracing picture of the world, so that Silius (13. 788) could say of Homer: carmine complexus terram mare sidera manes ('his poetry embraced earth and sea, the sky and the nether world'). Homer was considered a wise man, teacher, and educator. His works were Bible and school primer at the same time. A young Greek grew up with the Iliad and the Odyssey, a Roman with Livius Andronicus (Hor. epist. 2. 1. 69–71), Ennius, and eventually Virgil. In spite of the progress of science, one wanted to believe in the infallibility of Homer's text, an attitude that gave rise quite early to the development of allegory. In the Augustan period, the geographer Strabo (geogr. 1. 2. 3 C 15–16) ascribed to Homer wide geographical and political knowledge. In this, he followed Stoic theories of the utility of literature, and opposed the critical Alexandrians. Indeed, he regarded Homer's poetry as 'elementary philosophy' (πρώτη τις φιλοσοφία 1. 1. 10 C 7).<sup>3</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Everything metrically equivalent was combined under one rubric: e.g. by Dion. Hal. comp. verb. 22. 7 AUJAC-LEBEL = 150 HANOW; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 46–72; 85–100.

<sup>2</sup> Suet. poet. p. 17, ed. by A. REIFFERSCHIED, Lipsiae 1860: περιοχή θείων τε καὶ ἡρωϊκῶν καὶ ἀνθρωπίνων πραγμάτων. For Theophrastean origin of this definition: R. HÄUSSLER 1978, 226, n. 46.

<sup>3</sup> Like Hipparchus (2nd century B.C.) Strabo regards Homer as the founder of Herodotus already attributed (2. 53) authoritative status to the accounts of the origin of the gods in Homer and Hesiod, ascribing thus to great poets the power of creating gods. Reflective poets like Virgil were guided by such expectations on the part of their readers. The world of the Romans was the res publica, and so for them, more perhaps than for the Greeks, major epic gained political and religious importance. Both features of the Aeneid were to be reflected in European poetry. Camões lent eternity to an imperium; Dante, Milton, Klopstock wrote sacred poems.

In late antiquity, Virgil replaced Homer. The commentator Servius (about 400) wrote on the beginning of Aeneid 6: Totus quidem Vergilius scientia plenus est, in qua hic liber possidet principatum ('Virgil is full of science throughout; in this regard, the present book holds the first place'). Macrobius, writing perhaps at the beginning of the 5th century, tried to show that Virgil was an expert in all sciences. He compared the colorful richness of Virgil's poetry with Nature, and the poet with the Creator (sat. 5. 1. 18–5. 2. 2). We stand at the threshold between ancient and modern poetics. The notion of polymathy is ancient; that of human creativity<sup>1</sup> looks ahead to the future.

Compared to these ancient views, some modern efforts to explain the nature of epic<sup>2</sup> seem trivial. They are marked by ideas such as 'delight in realistic detail' and 'epic lengthiness'. They are also unsatisfactory as tools of literary theory. They fail to recognize the brevity and 'dramatic' presentation which distinguish the greatest ancient epic poets, Homer and Virgil. The epic poet, who has to master relatively large amounts of material, must possess in a special degree creative οἰκονομία, the strategic disposition of the material: ut iam nunc dicat iam nunc debentia dici/pleraque differat 'that he shall say at the moment what at the moment should be said, reserving much . . .' (Hor. ars 43–44).

---

geography. Poetry and myth are said to have developed first, and from them history and philosophy; these are the concerns of a minority. Poetry is a mixture of truth and falsehood, according to Zeno and Polybius, but the latter is necessary in order to guide and aid the multitude. According to Stoic doctrine, only the wise man may be a poet (1. 2. 3 C 15). Even for Melanchthon, by his description of the shield of Achilles, Homer founded astronomy and philosophy (Declamationes, ed. K. HARTFELDER, Berlin 1891, 37); cf. now T. GOULD, The Ancient Quarrel Between Poetry and Philosophy, Princeton 1990.

<sup>1</sup> Perhaps not formulated in philosophy before Plotinus, but already anticipated in Roman poetry: cf. G. LIEBERG 1982.

<sup>2</sup> Staiger's Grundbegriffe has been influential.

Greek Background

Thanks to Livius Andronicus' achievement as translator, from its beginning Roman epic confronted the question of cultural assimilation and intellectual apprenticeship (imitatio). This is not a negative concept. Since Andronicus, Roman epic had to define its identity in terms of the rebirth of Homeric epic.<sup>1</sup>

In spite of programmatic claims to be following Homer, for the Romans, Hellenistic epic was the nearest starting point. This is true of the writers of historical epic such as Naevius and Ennius, but partly also even for Virgil, who engages in an intensive dialogue with Apollonius Rhodius (3rd century B.C.).

The struggle with Homer proceeded in roughly three stages: the archaic Latin, the Virgilian, the post-Virgilian. After the pioneering achievements of Livius Andronicus and Naevius, Ennius perfected the external assimilation of Greek epic by naturalizing the hexameter. He called himself a Homer reincarnate. In fact, he fashioned once and for all poetic language and meter, the 'divine apparatus', the similes, making all the colors of Homeric narrative available. Even so, he remained a Hellenistic poet, though of course his medium was Latin. It was still a long way to any serious competition with Homer. Ennius composed a work which on its surface was highly expressive and full of unremitting tension, and was written in a style now artificial, now mysteriously solemn: an epic of great picturesque fascination, but lacking both sculptural depth and large-scale architectonic structure. The missing artistic unity was replaced by one of ideas.

It was left to Virgil to transfer to Rome the overarching framework and epic structure of the Iliad. Neoteric practice and Hellenistic theory helped him in this endeavor. To some degree, Virgil went beyond Homer in dramatically shortening the narrative; in omitting whatever is unnecessary for the continuation or the understanding of events; and in giving individual shape, in the fashion of Apollonius Rhodius, to stock situations such as that of daybreak. Like Apollonius, he drew psychological themes in Euripidean manner into his epic. Unlike his predecessor, however, he did not care for displaying factual knowledge and learning for their own sake. Everything was guided by a grand, leading idea. In his dialogue with his Roman predecessors he was aware of his own superiority.

---

<sup>1</sup> Ennius; on the importance of Homer see also Manil. 2. 8-11.

In Virgil, internal structure had precedence over color. But Ovid and Statius took a different clue from Homer and from Hellenistic delight in small-scale painting. They were also, like Lucan, influenced by rhetoric. Accordingly, they strove to lend to epic a power of visual suggestivity. This tendency marked a new, third stage of encounter with Homer, following that of Ennius and Virgil.

Virgil himself was to become for his successors what Homer and Ennius had been for epic poets until Virgil. Roman models now became authoritative; the Greeks continued to be imitated, especially in passages hitherto overlooked by Latin poets. In the silver age, Lucan was the 'anti-Virgil', Valerius Flaccus was a follower of Apollonius while remaining close to Virgil; Silius was an orthodox Virgilian, Statius a Virgilian who was also a successor to Homer. Valerius and Statius created a final, definitive blend of Greek mythological epic with the Virgilian and Roman tradition.

Roman Development

Pre-literary origins are no longer accessible. The beginning of Roman epic, therefore, is the Odusia of Livius Andronicus, a pioneering work and a document of cultural assimilation. Each of the three greatest Roman epics of the pre-Christian era was inspired by an experience of a great war and the subsequent restoration of order. After the First Punic War, Naevius wrote the Bellum Poenicum. After the Second, Ennius wrote the Annales. After the Civil Wars, Virgil composed the Aeneid.

Each of the epics of the Republican period displayed a multiplicity of heroes and actions. The Aeneid, however, possessed an inner unity. It stood at a climactic point of both general and literary history. Mature poetic technique permitted bold experiment with a large-scale form without loss of inner cohesion. A deliberate reinstatement of myth made possible unity of action without neglect of history. The idealized experience of the early Principate showed the way to a unity of character without sacrifice of Republican ideals. The result was the classic 'sacred poem' (R. A. SCHRÖDER)<sup>1</sup> of a universal empire with Rome at its center.

In a sense, Virgil had 'stopped' the stream of Hellenistic and Roman literary development for a moment. But still in Augustus' lifetime it returned to its ancient course. This is proved by the court epic of Lucius Varius Rufus and by the work of gifted rhetorical poets such as Cornelius Severus and Albinovanus Pedo. Ovid names other contemporaries (Pont. 4. 16). He himself in the Metamorphoses created a universal poem sui generis. It is more Alexandrian than Virgil's epic: rich in color, full of lively pictures, but without classical unity.

<sup>1</sup> In: E. ZINN 1963, 317.

Under Nero and the Flavians, Rome once again, politically and intellectually, played the role of world capital, and epic experienced a rebirth. But the relations between individual and society were no longer in balance. Epic withdrew from the present to the past, from the state into the world of the mind. Formally, epics were influenced by the Aeneid. In content, political disillusionment and Stoic opposition encouraged introspection. In Lucan, the Virgilian view of world history collapsed. Virtus now proved itself by resistance. Unlike Virgil, Silver Latin epic poets were no longer inspired by a positive experience of the present, but by a past becoming ever more distant. Lucan himself had not experienced the Civil War of which he wrote. Silius Italicus looked even further back to the war with Hannibal. Valerius Flaccus and Statius turned their attention to Greek myth, and interpreted it creatively as an 'Old Testament' of the Greco-Roman civilization in which they were living. With Virgil's Aeneid, and Lucan's praise of the young Nero, the possibilities of a political epic relevant to the present had been exhausted for the moment. Now the preference was for problems of moral philosophy (Silius) and of purely human concern (Statius, in the footsteps of Ovid). Even so, their themes were still of importance to the community. Roman values such as fides in Silius, or imperial virtues such as clementia in Statius, prevailed. In the following period, which was tired of 'unrealistic' epics, the serious satire of Juvenal appeared as a substitute.

It was only the late Imperial period which roused epic to new life. Direct reference to contemporary events was typical of the peak of the epic panegyric (Claudian, cf. Sidonius Apollinaris and Corippus). A new feeling for religion gave rise to Biblical epic. It developed from modest beginnings (Iuvenius) to significant achievement (Sedulius). There also appeared the important Christian epics of Prudentius, whose allegorical style explored further typical approaches of Roman poetry.

Literary Technique

The Roman sense of representation aimed less at realism than at dignity. This is especially true of epic, which is both universal and representative of a political or religious identity. An epic poet emphasizes important and meaningful events and omits what is insignificant.

Narrative structure. In narrative, this principle often requires a 'technique of isolated pictures'. More often the chain of events is determined by causality than by temporal continuity.<sup>1</sup> The same is true for the manner in which Virgil reveals fatal connections between events. He graphically reflects relationships of content in quasi musical symmetries.<sup>2</sup> Concentration on essentials may sometimes occur at the expense of visual qualities and pictorial vividness, although this objection does not apply, for example, to Ovid, Statius, and Claudian. Even Virgil and Lucan laid more stress on facts than some critics concede.

Ornatus. 'Epic ornament' acquired new significance in Roman epic. The Roman epic poets, with the exception of Lucan, preserved the divine apparatus of Homeric tradition. It served to bring about dramatic changes in the story and to lend them vividness. Naevius had already staged a conversation between gods, which prepared the prophecy of Jupiter in Virgil. An assembly of the gods, such as that in Aen. 10. 1-117, had been anticipated by Ennius. Gods appeared as protectors or destroyers of individual heroes (Aen. 12. 853-884; 895). Even without a naive belief in their existence, gods of nature could reflect aspects of the physical universe.<sup>3</sup> In general, they formed a hierarchy comparable to that of Roman society, with Jupiter at its head. Anthropomorphism of the gods was taken especially far in Ovid and Statius.

Simultaneously in Rome, the number of allegorical figures increased, a device found occasionally in Homer and more often in Hesiod. They embody particular powers (e.g. Discordia: Enn., ann. 266-267 V. 2nd. ed. = 225-226 Sk.; Allecto: Aen. 7. 324). Their appearance may be described (Fama: Aen. 4. 173-188) or their actual dwelling place (e.g. Ovid, met. 12. 39-63). In accordance with the ethical bent of Roman thought, these personifications were mainly virtues or emotions. This fondness for allegory anticipates medieval literature and art.

<sup>1</sup> F. MEHMEL 1935; 1940.

<sup>2</sup> Aen. 6. 450-476 may be compared with the entire 4th book; M. VON ALBRECHT, Die Kunst der Spiegelung in Vergils Aeneis, Hermes 93, 1965, 54-64.

<sup>3</sup> Heinze, V. e. T. 298-299 (Engl. ed. 238-239) on ratio physica.

Descriptions of works of art<sup>1</sup> in Homer are self-contained and free from any extraneous purpose: for example, the shield of Achilles, Iliad 18. 478–608. In Roman epic, they are ideologically connected with the narrative: for example, the shield of Aeneas, Aeneid 8. 626–728. Just as in Hellenistic miniature epic, parallel or contrast between action and description of the work of art are the aim of a workmanship which ‘transcends’ its immediate object.

In the same way, episodes and vignettes are closely interwoven with their context: for example, in Aeneid 2, the fall of Troy acts as a foil for the rise of Rome. The connection may be causal (e.g. an aition, frequent in Ovid) or final (an historical example, such as the story of Regulus in Silius 6. 101–551). This technique may be compared with the thematic correspondences in Pompeian murals.<sup>2</sup>

Although similes still served to intensify the presentation, they were also being used increasingly to give dignity to the action. Instead of evoking things familiar to everyone from everyday life, poets now resorted to lofty, though often obscure, mythology. The reader, instead of getting closer to the object, is now kept at a distance from it. In order to secure a strong coherence of thought and structure, the elements of ornatus often break free from their immediate context and assume an articulating and interpretative function. These artistic devices point beyond themselves, and give the presentation a transparency in which the basic idea is no longer immanent and immediately present, but transcendental and symbolic.

Even though exclamations and invocations of the Muses play a somewhat larger role than in Greek literature, the Roman representatives of the genre, with the exception of Lucan, seem to maintain the traditional ‘objectivity’ of the epic poet. Yet a decisive change had taken place. Objective presentation gave way to emotional motivation, gesture to abstract formulation, and temporal to causal connection. Feelings were expressed at first in somewhat restrained tones (Naev. fig. 4 M. = 5 Bü.; Enn., ann. 110 V. 2nd ed. = 105 Sk.). Later they became ever more vivid. In Virgil, the experiences of the love poets had left some traces. His language from the Eclogues on was brought to life in a fresh way. A personal tone is felt even in his epic. The poet freely chose and evaluated his material, grouped it according to its own laws, and used abstract nouns to denote explicitly the psychological powers at work in his story. The poet took over and manipulated his object, imbued it with feeling and significance and modeled it anew from within. At the center of the poetic world was no longer Homer's 'sun' but the poet's heart.<sup>1</sup> Both poet and interpreter, he replaced immanence with transcendence. Things were not left to enjoy their own existence. Rather, will reconstructed reality. Not content to contemplate and then reflect the world, the poet energetically subdued it. In the post-Virgilian period, the effort to imbue reality with poetic life led increasingly to pathos and rhetoric in epic. In Lucan it is not narrative, but the passionate excitement of the reader, which seems to be the principal aim.

<sup>1</sup> A history of the description of works of art in the ancient literatures is offered by P. FRIEDLÄNDER 1912; s. also V. PÖSCHL, Die Dichtkunst Virgils, Wien 1950, Berlin, 3rd ed. 1977.

<sup>2</sup> SCHEFOLD, Kunst 36; SCHEFOLD, Malerei passim.

Language and Style

Livius Andronicus already used a more formal language in epic than in other genres, including tragedy. At times, he even outdid his original. He paraphrased proper names, and took delight in bold hyperbata and archaisms. Even after his day, epic preserved its privilege of using archaic ornament. Virgil could employ forms such as olli and aulai, but not Horace. The language of Naevius possessed the restraint, dignity, and plainness of Roman triumphal inscriptions (frg. 39 M. = 37 Bü.), while he arranged mythical elements to convey solemnity (frg. 19; 30 M. = 8; 24 Bü.). In the saturnian, apart from the rhythm, alliteration was an important feature of style. Naevius' art reminded Cicero (Brut. 75) of Myron's. Later, Virgil would reacquire at a fresh level this architectural, dignified fashion of using language.

Ennius irrevocably determined the language and meter of Roman epic. He introduced the hexameter, and once and for all established, as a peculiar Roman feature, the prevalence of the penthemimeral caesura. Richness of expression, such as archaisms and neologisms, a somewhat haphazard and motley colorfulness, rhetorical impetus and studied adornment: all this distinguished the language of this great pioneer. For all his significant mastery of language, however, he was indebted in detail not only to Homer and Hellenistic writers, but also to his Roman predecessors. Later, it was particularly Lucretius and Ovid who had influence as creators of language, whereas Cicero and Virgil contributed to the formation of style.

<sup>1</sup> E. ZINN 1963, 312-322, esp. 319 and 321.

Virgil's language, holding aloof from all extremes, left its mark on Roman epic. His meter was developed by Ovid and Lucan towards elegance and smoothness. The influence of rhetoric on the language of epic from Ennius on was incalculable. It affected Cornelius Severus (Sen. suas. 6. 26), Ovid (Sen. contr. 2. 2. 8), and Lucan, to mention only these, and continued into late antiquity. To account for this, we may recall that Roman epic, especially at the beginning and end of its development, was close to the panegyric; and what is more, the creator of the literary language of classical Latin had been an orator.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Roman epic writers had been poetae docti from the start. A decisive step towards a sharpening of artistic awareness was made, however, by the authors of Roman miniature epic composed in the Hellenistic manner, such as Catullus, Helvius Cinna, and the poets of the miniature epics of the Appendix Vergiliana. They brought into focus the problem of organic unity in works of art (cf. later Horace's Ars Poetica and Letter to Augustus). It took much work on a small scale and attention to detail to find the solution. Lucretius' convincing management of a large-scale, self-contained form was another important achievement conditioning the rise of the Aeneid. Even the successors of Ennius were less and less able to avoid the stricter demands on form imposed by the neoterics.<sup>1</sup>

Ennius' pride as a poet was un-Homeric. It may be explained by his success in winning, both for literature and for himself, a social position which was significant, given Roman circumstances. The change from Ennius to Virgil is inconceivable without the labors of Lucretius, Cicero, and the neoterics. As a philosophical poet, Lucretius in theory assumed the modest attitude of a 'doctor', while in practice displaying Empedoclean solemnity. Cicero, in his De Consulatu suo, made himself the hero of an epic and panegyric presentation. In both cases, the strongly personal engagement is characteristically Roman. Virgil, in his Eclogues, became the mouthpiece of Sibylline prophecy. In the Georgics, he replaced the traditional 'immodesty' of Roman poets with the humility of a priest of the Muses. In the Aeneid, the poet's attitude is basically 'prophetic'; he invokes the Muse particularly when he intends to transcend the human scope of his consciousness and memory. Later, many epic writers felt inspired by their imperial patrons (an idea found not in the Aeneid but in the Georgics). Furthermore, Statius and Silius gratefully paid homage to the great poets of the past, who were their true teachers. Juvenecus indeed, in his Biblical epic, would appeal to the Holy Spirit.

<sup>1</sup> Hostius (Bellum Histricum, after 129 B.C.), A. Furius Antias (cf. Cic. Brut.), M. Furius Bibaculus (Caesar's Gallie War), P. Terentius Varro Atacinus (Bellum Sequanicum); the latter also wrote mythological epic (Argonautae, following Apollonius Rhodius), as did the early Neoteric, Cn. Matius, who wrote an Iliad, and Ninnius Crassus.

Ideas II

Mythical and Philosophical View of the World. Heaven, Earth, and the Netherworld are occupied by gods. This ancient 'three storeyed' model of the world (theologia fabulosa, Varro apud Aug. civ. 6. 5) was for Homer the only one conceivable. For the Romans it was from the start less obligatory, since, along with Greek poetry, they simultaneously took over Greek philosophy and its quite different, scientific view of a geocentric world (theologia naturalis). They also adopted the allegorical explanation of myth, through which the philosophers tried to reconcile both 'theologies'. Thus, in Rome the conditions for the use of mythical elements in epic were different from those in early Greece. No Latin epic poet could dispense with the philosophers' explanations and their demythologizing of the Homeric epic. If he wanted to write an epic, he had to reverse that analytic process, to make a retrogressive effort and retranslate into myth his own experience of the world and his own picture of history. In a time removed from myth, and in a prosaic ambience, this task was difficult, almost insuperable. Only Virgil, the greatest poet of Rome, and one of the greatest of mankind, had the artistic skill to master it.

Each epic poet found another solution to the problems caused by this coexistence of different views of the world (theologia fabulosa, naturalis, civilis, Varro, loc. cit.). With his pagan tolerance and unerring sense of the appropriate, Ovid changed his picture of the world in the Metamorphoses according to the context. He employed theologia naturalis in books 1 and 15; civilis in book 15; fabulosa in the rest of the work.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A side-glance may be directed at didactic epic: Lucretius passionately assailed

Lucan abandoned the so-called divine apparatus, a bold step contradicting the style of the genre (cf. Petronius 118–124); instead, he founded his epic on Stoic teaching. The important role of philosophical instruction even in narrative poetry is a symptom of the ‘universal’ aspirations of Roman epic and its intellectual position in the aftermath of philosophy.

Myth and the Roman idea of the gods. The Roman idea of the gods was originally abstract, just like their concept of the state (res publica) and the morality supporting it (the Roman virtues). An outlook that knew nothing of images was confronted by an adopted (Greek) world of images. Roman awareness of invisible moral powers had to be transformed into an anthropomorphic world of myth. To achieve this, poets like Lucan and Silius had recourse to Stoic and Cynic ethical teaching, along with the means developed by rhetoric for the concrete presentation of abstract thoughts (personification, allegory, prosopoeia). When consciously adopting the mythical picture of the world into Roman epic, the poets had to overcome the above-mentioned difficulties. Virgil answered them by creating a Roman myth.

Myth and History. For Homer, myth was history. Conversely, in Rome, the concern of epic with history in the narrower sense produced a novel tension between historical and mythical reality. In Naevius, the simple narration of fact and the solemn stylization of myth occurred side by side. History was viewed with austere, sober realism, whereas ‘Greek’ mythology was the only way of representing vividly the higher values of life. Naevius himself was the first to exploit this contrast artistically: for him, myth became a golden background and served to enhance the importance of the present. Virgil bridged this gap by interspersing the mythical narrative with prophetic digressions into the historical future. Lucan avoided the difficulty by avoiding myth.

Historical poetry was not a Roman creation, but Latin epic from its very beginnings was more inclined towards history, whether because the Romans originally lacked a myth that transcended history, or because the Romans’ sense of mission was directed towards historical fulfillment.<sup>1</sup> The Odusia of Livius Andronicus supplied a segment of primitive Italian history. Whereas the Iliad had 'integrated' its story into a single exemplary and self-contained narrative, in Naevius and Ennius historical events were detailed in all their multiplicity. Unity was not based on person and action, nor on organic structure, nor on sculptural or architectural qualities. It was found merely in the concepts forming the moral background: in the res publica and in the abstract values represented by the Roman virtues. It took a Virgil to reverse this relationship, and to make the ideas presupposed by the Ennian epic, the values of the Roman state, mythically visible in a single person and a uniform action. Here myth, a world initially alien to the Romans, underwent an intellectual transformation. It gained symbolic power by allegorical refashioning (which on its part presupposed allegorical interpretation). The multiplicity of historical events no longer made a direct appearance in the Aeneid; rather it was projected into the story of Aeneas as a prophecy. Virgil's eye discovered inchoate forms ('archetypes') containing all the potential of a future still in store (1. 254-296; 4. 615-629; 6. 752-892; 8. 626-731). Silius Italicus reversed this Virgilian process of concentration. His Punica again depicted historical multiplicity, but made the events transparent against the ever present Virgilian background. The Aeneid was continually presupposed as an authoritative archetype, and so it guaranteed for Silius' poem intellectual unity in multiplicity. Lucan opposed to the Virgilian myth of birth a mystery of death.

---

the mythical picture of the world and replaced it by the Epicurean. Manilius in his astronomical lore attempted to make a Stoic synthesis.

<sup>1</sup> For a criticism of Virgil’s methods cf. W. H. AUDEN, ‘Secondary Epic’ (Homage to Clio, New York 1960, 26–27); G. SCHMELING, The Satyricon: The Sense of an Ending, RhM 134, 1991, 352–377, esp. n. 22.

The original link between history and the panegyric in the Roman epic led once again in late antiquity to the creation of accomplished poetic works (Claudian). The Augustan idea of the return of the golden age had lasting influence. Both in pagan and Christian form (Prudentius) two aspects of Virgil's legacy lived on in late antiquity: the religious belief in the fulfillment of a messianic expectation, and a linear and teleological sense of time and history lending special meaning to the actual moment. With his interpretation of history, Virgil became an important partner in dialogue for Augustine, the founder of a Christian philosophy of history.

Anthropology. Primarily, Roman epic poets were as little concerned with the physical macrocosm as were Roman philosophers. They were interested in the state as an intermediate cosmos, and in the human soul as microcosm.

Originally in Roman epic, only the vicissitudes of the community deserved description (cf. Naevius, frg. 42-43 M. = 50-51 Bü.). In Homer, the heroic deeds of the individual brought honor to himself and his clan. But in Rome, the achievement of the individual affected, as an exemplum, the Roman people as a whole (Cicero, Arch. 22). Iustitia and religio were the foundations of the state; the auspices were observed (Ennius, ann. 77–96 V.). Virgil transformed the Homeric notion of fate into the mission of a nation. Thanks to this positive<sup>1</sup> interpretation of fate, the Aeneid became an anti-Iliad. Aeneas accepted his fata in hope and trust. In Lucan and also in Statius, on the other hand, it was no longer peace and construction but war and destruction that were now the fates' primary aims.

As the notion of national mission faded, individual destiny gained in significance (Ovid, Statius). Such an upward revaluation of the realm of otium was ultimately rooted in the humanitas of the Scipionic period. Ennius already turned himself into the spokesman of this new world—his world—when he depicted the friendship between the general and his confidant, the scholar (234–251 V. 2nd ed. = 268–285 Sk.). Later, out of Apollonius' rather generalized description of Medea's experience of love, Virgil shaped a grand personal destiny (Dido). Private and purely human concerns, which had been restrained in the Aeneid by national duty, were presented for their own sake in Ovid's Metamorphoses as individual destinies (Cephalus and Procris, Ceyx and Alcyone). Statius' epic may also be cited. This loosening of metaphysical and social links sharpened the eye for what is demonic in man, his pleasure in evil (Ovid, Lucan) and his personal guilt (Ovid). These aspects protected the epic presentation of a merely human destiny against the danger of degenerating into the contingency of a mere adventure story. A new form was discovered to express great truths about man. From this introspective form of epic<sup>2</sup> no further development was possible. Only the fresh emphasis on the link to the state and nature in late antiquity (Claudian) could once again give rise to significant epic.

P. J. AICHER, Homer and Roman Republican Poetry, diss. Chapel Hill 1986. * C. R. BEYE, Ancient Epic Poetry. Homer, Apollonius, Virgil, Ithaca, London 1993. * M. BILLERBECK, Stoizismus in der römischen Epik neronischer und flavischer Zeit, ANRW 2, 32, 5, 1986, 3116–3151. * C. M. BOWRA, From

<sup>1</sup> Virgil's glance however was too penetrating to be satisfied with painting in black and white.

<sup>2</sup> A relatively late example is furnished by the recently discovered Alcestis Barcinonensis, which lends rhetorical and poetic life to a 'universally human' story.

Virgil to Milton, London 1945, repr. 1963. * J. BOYLE, ed., Roman Epic, London 1993. * W. W. BRIGGS, Jr., Virgil and the Hellenistic Epic, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, 948–984. * E. BURCK, Das Menschenbild im römischen Epos (1958), in: Wege zu Vergil, ed. by H. OPPERMAN, Darmstadt 1963, 233–269. * E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979. * C. BURROW, Epic Romance. Homer to Milton, Oxford 1993. * F. CAIRNS, M. HEATH, eds., Roman Poetry and Prose, Greek Rhetoric and Poetry, Leeds 1993. * W. V. CLAUSEN, Virgil's Aeneid and the Tradition of Hellenistic Poetry, Berkeley 1987. * C. CONRAD, Traditional Patterns of Word-Order in Latin Epic from Ennius to Virgil, HSPH 69, 1965, 195–258. * P. DUBOIS, History, Rhetorical Description and the Epic. From Homer to Spenser, Cambridge 1982. * G. E. DUCKWORTH, Foreshadowing and Suspense in the Epics of Homer, Apollonius, and Virgil, diss. Princeton 1933. * D. C. FEENEY, The Gods in Epic. Poets and Critics of the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1991. * P. FRIEDLÄNDER, Johannes Von Gaza und Paulus Silentarius, Leipzig 1912 (fundamental for poetic descriptions of works of art) * K. GALINSKY, ed., The Interpretation of Roman Poetry. Empiricism or Hermeneutics?, Frankfurt 1992. * J. GASSNER, Kataloge im römischen Epos. Vergil—Ovid—Lucan, diss. München 1972. * R. GORDESLANI, Kriterien der Schriftlichkeit und Mündlichkeit im homerischen Epos, Frankfurt 1986. * P. HARDIE, The Epic Successors of Virgil, Cambridge 1992. * R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos der Griechen und Römer bis Vergil, Heidelberg 1976. * R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos von Lucan bis Silius, Heidelberg 1978. * R. HÄUSSLER, Strukturfragen historischer Epik in der Antike, A&A 24, 1978, 125–145. * HEINZE, V.e.T. (see now: R. HEINZE, Virgil's Epic Technique, with a Preface by A. WLOSOK, London 1993). * G. HUBER, Lebensschilderung und Kleinmalerei im hellenistischen Epos. Darstellung des menschlichen Lebens und der Affekte, diss. Basel 1926. * G. L. HUXLEY, Greek Epic Poetry, Cambridge, Mass. 1969. * W. KIRSCH, Strukturwandel im lateinischen Epos des 4.–6. Jh., Philologus 123, 1979, 38–53. * W. KIRSCH, Probleme der Gattungsentwicklung am Beispiel des Epos, Philologus 126, 1982, 265–288. * F. KLINGNER, Catulls Peleus-Epos (1956), repr. in: F.K., Studien zur griechischen und römischen Literatur, Zürich 1964, 156–224. * E. C. KOPFF, Vergil and the Cyclic Epics, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, 919–947. * W. KROLL, Das historische Epos, Sokrates 70, 1916, 1–14. * G. LIEBERG, Poeta creator. Studien zu einer Figur der antiken Dichtung, Amsterdam 1982. * G. LIEBERG, Zu Idee und Figur des dichterischen Schöpfertums, Bochum 1985. * F. MEHMEL 1935, cf. Valerius Flaccus. * F. MEHMEL 1940, cf. Virgil. * J. K. NEWMAN, The Classical Epic Tradition, Madison 1986. * V. PÖSCHL, cf. Virgil. * C. REITZ, Zur Gleichnisteknik des Apollonios von Rhodos, Habilitationsschrift Mannheim 1995. * SCHEFOLD, Kunst. * W. SCHETTER, Das römische Epos, Wiesbaden 1978. * W. SCHUBERT, Jupiter in den Epen der Flavierzeit, Frankfurt 1984. * STAIGER, Grundbegriffe. * W. SUERBAUM, Zum Umfang der Bücher in der archaischen lateinischen Dichtung: Naevius, Ennius, Lukrez und Livius Andronicus auf Papyrus-Rollen, ZPE 92, 1992, 153–173. * K. THRAEDE, Der Hexameter in Rom, Verstheorie und Statistik, München 1978. * P. TOOHEY, Reading Epic, London 1992. * M. WIGODSKY, Vergil and Early Latin Poetry, Wiesbaden 1972. * K. ZIEGLER, Das hellenistische Epos. Ein vergessenes Kapitel griechischer Dichtung, Leipzig 1934; 2nd ed. 1966. * E. ZINN, Die Dichter des alten Rom und die Anfänge des Weltgedichts (1956), repr. in: H. OPPERMANN, ed., Römertum, Darmstadt 1962, 155–187. * E. ZINN, Epilogue to: Vergil, Aeneis, transl. by R. A. SCHRÖDER, Frankfurt and Hamburg 1963, 312–322. * E. ZINN, Viva Vox, Frankfurt 1994.

ROMAN DRAMA

General Remarks

The word drama, derived from the Greek δράω, 'I do, I act' denotes tragedy, comedy and satyr play under the aspect of presentation. It is the term employed in the Greek documents of dramatic performances. For Roman literature, the satyr play is the least important of these forms of Greek drama.

The principal festival in Athens at which dramas were presented was the Greater or City Dionysia (March-April). Originally at these festivals the poet was also actor and producer. The author, the choral singers, and the performers were respectable citizens. With the introduction of the second actor by Aeschylus, and of the third by Sophocles, professionalism began to take over.<sup>1</sup> In Athens, a tetralogy was presented in a single day, consisting of three tragedies and a satyr play. The celebrations had the character of an agon. A panel of judges presented prizes to the authors and in due course also to the actors.

In the Hellenistic period, groups of traveling actors were organized (οἱ περὶ τὸν Διόνυσον τεχνῖται). Through the agency of a manager, they contracted with the cities and traveled from festival to festival. This ended the link with any definite polis, and reflected the declining importance of the chorus. Even so, these craftsmen retained their superior social standing.

<sup>1</sup> In comedy, the number of actors seems not to have been limited to three. Surviving Roman dramas may be presented by between three to five players, including exchanges of roles; cf. on this J. A. BARSBY 1982.

It was a distinctive feature of classical Attic drama to be rooted profoundly in the community and in public worship. According to Aristotle, both tragedy and comedy had grown from improvisation (Poetics 4. 1449a). Organic connections were noted between satyr play and tragedy ('goat song'), but also between tragedy and dithyramb, a form of Dionysiac choral lyric.

Tragedy

Aristotle, who died in 322 B.C., defined tragedy in his Poetics (6. 1449b 24–28) as 'the imitative representation (μίμησις) of a serious and self-contained (complete) action possessing a definite magnitude, in artistic speech whose specific modes (i.e. speech and song and their respective meters) are employed separately in the different parts, presented by persons acting, not narrated, effecting by the excitement of sympathy and fear (pity and terror, ἔλεος καὶ φόβος) the purification (discharge) of feelings of that kind'. Κάθαρσις is understood medically as 'relief joined with pleasure'.

For the Greeks, a 'serious' action normally took place against a heroic and mythical background.<sup>1</sup> This explains the definition given by Theophrastus and quoted in Diomedes (3. 8. 1: FCG 57): Tragoedia est heroicae fortunae in adversis comprehensio ('a tragedy is a representation of a heroic fate in bad circumstances').<sup>2</sup> Aristotle gives action (plot) precedence over character drawing. The act of 'getting it wrong' (ἁμαρτία, ἁμάρτημα) committed by the tragic hero is distinguished both from unlucky accident (ἀτύχημα) and from crime (ἄδικημα; Aristot. rhet. 1. 13. 1374 b 7).

Hellenistic theory canonized a division of tragedy into five acts. It gave great attention to character portrayal and style. Pathos and horror may indeed not have been first introduced into the genre by Seneca, but rather stem from Hellenistic times. Otherwise, Horace's advice not to shed blood on the stage (ars 185–186) would be irrelevant.

The doctrine of the moral usefulness of tragedy taught that its aim was to guard the citizens against their weaknesses and to guide them towards the best possible philosophical life (Schol. Dion. Thr. 17. 16–33 Hil. = FCG 11–12). It is attested from the period when ancient texts had to be defended in a Christian ambience. However, the notion may well go back to the Hellenistic period. At that time, different schools of philosophy were concerned with poetic theory: Peripatetics, Stoics, Epicureans. Horace juxtaposed the aims of usefulness and pleasure (aut prodesse volunt aut delectare poetae, 'poets want either to be useful or to please', ars 333). He was aware therefore of two different positions, one rigorous, the other hedonist, and he tried to link them: omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci, 'he has won every vote who has blended profit and pleasure' (ars 343). The demand for a philosophical education in the poeta doctus smacks of the Stoa: the poet must be aware of duties to his neighbors, his country, humanity; and also of the tasks proper to the individual classes of society and age groups (ars 309–318). Character portrayal therefore takes priority. Horace also accepts the Aristotelian notion of a quasi-rhetorical emotional 'guidance' (ψυχαγωγία) which induces varying feelings in the listener (ars 99–105).<sup>1</sup> To conclude, Epicurus sees in poetry<sup>2</sup> a 'stronghold of human passions',<sup>3</sup> while Philodemus, for his part, interprets it in a purely hedonistic fashion.

<sup>1</sup> There are, however, also historical plays, such as Aeschylus' Persae. Tragedies with wholly invented plots, such as Agathon's Anthos or Antheus, are quite rare.

<sup>2</sup> Theophrastus, loc. cit.: τραγωδία ἐστὶν ἡρωικῆς τύχης περίστασις; cf. Elym. M. 764. 1 (FCG 16); Schol. Dion. Thr. p. 306 Hil.

Comedy

Comedy takes its name from the unrestrained festival procession (κῶμος) in honor of Dionysus from which at Athens the stage play developed, perhaps from more or less obscene and outspoken political banter between choral leaders and chorus (cf. Arist. poet. 1449 a 9–14).

By the literary form called comedy one has always understood a dramatic poem with a happy conclusion, mostly played against a middle-class, civic background.<sup>4</sup> While tragic heroes rise above the common level, comedy presents actions of men who are somewhat worse than average (Arist. poet. 1448 a 16–18; 1449 a 32–33). Love themes are important.<sup>5</sup> In dramatic structure Menander's comedy,

<sup>1</sup> A pre-Platonic, purely rhetorical definition of the nature of tragedy is found in Plato, Phaedr. 268 c–d.

<sup>2</sup> The notion of poetry is governed in antiquity by drama, while in modern times lyric sets the tone.

<sup>3</sup> Ἐπιτείχισμα ἀνθρωπίνων παθῶν, quoted by Sext. Emp. math. 1. 298.

<sup>4</sup> Comoedia est privatae civilisque fortunae sine periculo vitae comprehensio (Dion. gramm. 1. 488. 3–4); in comoedia mediocres fortunae hominum, parvi impetus pericula laetique sunt exitus actionum (Evanth. de com. 4. 2 Cup.).

<sup>5</sup> Lact. epit. 58. 5 de stupris et amoribus; Serv. Aen. 4. 1 sane totus (sc. liber IV) in consiliis et subtilitatibus est; nam paene comicus stilus est: nec mirum, ubi de amore tractatur.

which set the standard at Rome, transferred Aristotle's theory of tragedy to another genre. The action is self-contained and organic: it has a beginning, a middle and end; it consists of necessary or probable happenings, and develops at least in part from the character of the dramatis personae. However, the presentation is cheerful. The language borders on the colloquial and is mediocris et dulcis (Gloss. Plac. 5. 56. 11), without however being vulgar. Its distinguishing mark is elegantia (Quint. inst. 1. 8. 8). A contrived discrepancy between object described and linguistic level may contribute to the comedy (Arist. rhet. 1408a 14).

In contrast to Old Comedy, New Comedy replaces coarse abusiveness with nuances, thus giving respectability its due (Arist. eth. Nic. 1128a 22–25). Comedy, particularly New Comedy, passed for a reflection of life (below, p. 107–108). How far, however, it is removed from realism is shown by a glance at its poetic technique.

Greek Background

Tragedy

Of the three great Greek tragic writers—Aeschylus (d. 456/55 B.C.), Sophocles (d. 406/05) and Euripides (d. 406)—it was the third who had the greatest influence at Rome, in accordance with the Hellenistic taste which regarded Euripides as the 'most tragic' of the tragic poets (Arist. poet. 1453 a 29–30).

There was in addition considerable influence from Hellenistic tragedy which also affected the production, reception, and reshaping of the three classical authors. More than 60 names of later tragic poets are known. They were active in many places, e.g. at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–246 B.C.). Unfortunately, we possess out of all this only Lycophron's Alexandra, written perhaps at the beginning of the 2nd century B.C. (a long prophetic speech put into the mouth of Cassandra); and parts of Ezechiel's play on the theme of the Exodus, Exagoge, an 'historical' play from perhaps the 2nd century B.C., with a double change of scene, known to us through Eusebius (praep. ev. 9. 28; 29 p. 437–446). For the rest, we must depend on fragments, accessible on papyrus,<sup>1</sup> in Stobaeus or in Latin adaptation. About one third of the subject matter of Hellenistic tragedy, compared with that of Attic drama, consists of new material. It was drawn from out-of-the-way myths, and also from history, both older and more recent. This latter provided a point of departure for the Roman praetexta, just as Ennius stands in the line of succession of Alexandrian epic. It was not lack of quality which led to the disappearance of Hellenistic tragedy, but the Atticizing taste of the Imperial period.

<sup>1</sup> On Pap. Oxy. 23, 1956, no. 2382, s. B. SNELL, Gyges und Kroisos als Tragödiendiguren, ZPE 12, 1973, 197–205.

Comedy

For Roman comic poets, Old Comedy, chiefly represented by Aristophanes (active 427–388 B.C.), has no importance. After the intervening period of Middle Comedy<sup>1</sup> came the New Comedy, which provided the model for Plautus and Terence. In contrast with the Old, New Comedy abandoned both fabulous fantasy and criticism of contemporary politicians. Its action takes place among middle-class citizens of the polis, and its action is fictitious, self-contained, and clearly organized. Its structure is influenced by late Euripidean tragedy. Accordingly, the role of the chorus is reduced, while intrigue<sup>2</sup> and recognition play an important part.

The leading poets of the New Comedy were Menander (d. 293/92 B.C.), the centenarian Philemon (d. about 264/63) and Diphilus (4th–3rd century B.C.). The unchallenged master of the genre, Menander, supplied the originals for several plays by Plautus<sup>3</sup> and Terence,<sup>4</sup> and Terence was especially attracted to his subtle character portrayal. Diphilus had created the romantic Rudens and the farcical Casina, and he also lent an animated scene to Terence's Adelphoe. Philemon's strength lay in his comedy of situation, sententious apophthegms and clever conduct of the action. To him may be traced the Mercator, the Trinummus and perhaps also the Mostellaria. The ingenious and refined Apollodorus furnished the models for Terence's Phormio and Hecyra. Demophilus, whose name alone betrays his craving for popularity, was the source of the Asinaria.

<sup>1</sup> Traces of Middle Comedy have been recognized in Plautus' Persa, and also in his Poenulus, Amphitruo, and Menaechmi.

<sup>2</sup> A. DIETERLE 1980.

<sup>3</sup> Bacchides, Cistellaria, Stichus, and perhaps also Aulularia.

<sup>4</sup> Andria, Eunuchus, Hautontimorumenos, Adelphoe.

Roman Development

The beginnings of the Roman theater are obscure. According to Livy,<sup>1</sup> in 364 Etruscan dancers performed for the first time at Rome mimetic dances to 'flute' (tibia, αὐλός)<sup>2</sup> accompaniment in a religious context. There had been an outbreak of plague, and there was a need to placate the gods. The Romans came to know the Greek theater in South Italy, where Tarentum especially was famous as a city of theater. The encounter did not primarily have a literary character. Drama was 'absorbed' like other elements of Greek culture, and experienced in a festive, religious context. As a result, from the days of Livius Andronicus on, Hellenistic stage practices<sup>3</sup> were taken over, and this fact had far-reaching consequences for Roman refashioning of the different dramatic genres.

The ritual framework for theatrical productions in Rome was provided by triumphs, temple dedications, funerals and above all by public festivals. In April the Ludi Megalenses were celebrated in honor of the Mater Magna; in July the Ludi Apollinares, in September the Ludi Romani. In November came the Ludi plebei in honor of the Capitoline Triad, Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. There were therefore many occasions for visiting the theater. The plays were performed on a temporary stage, built on wooden scaffolding. From the beginning, the theater in Rome was linked with festive pageantry and the display, for example, of captured booty. In keeping with the character of such festivals, drama had to compete with crude popular entertainments. It was only in 68 B.C. that a fixed wooden theater was built, followed in 55 by Pompey's stone theater. The theaters were architecturally related to temples, and themselves contained shrines (sacella) on the upper edge of the spectators' galleries (cavea). The link with religion must always be reckoned into the account.

The aediles were responsible for games, as were the praetor urbanus and the decemviri or quindecimviri sacris faciundis. The magistrate bought a play from the author and hired a troupe of actors. This explains why sallies against magistrates, or against the powerful families who would probably continue to fill the magistracies, were from the beginning unlikely.

<sup>1</sup> J. H. WASZINK, Varro, Livy, and Tertullian on the History of Roman Dramatic Art, VChr 2, 1948, 224-242; for Varro as a source of Liv. 7. 2 und Val. Max. 2. 4. 4: P. L. SCHMIDT in: G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Studien zur vorliterarischen Periode im frühen Rom, Tübingen 1989, 77-133, esp. 77-83.

<sup>2</sup> The tibia resembled an oboe rather than a flute.

<sup>3</sup> Older Etruscan influences, as well as elements of the Italian popular theater, must also be borne in mind.

The Romans adopted tragedy, not in its classical form, but in the framework of the Hellenistic stage practice found also in Magna Graecia. This affects the form of Roman tragedy. The theater of the day favored the display piece, rich in parts and trappings. Cicero lamented that in tragic productions 600 mules or 3000 costly vessels were on show (fam. 7. 1. 2). But the aim was not merely to entice the spectator's eye. Music played a greater role in the tragedy of the Hellenistic period than in Euripides. Among the Romans, recitatives and cantica occupied considerable space.<sup>1</sup> Tragedy drew closer to opera.

In tragedy Hellenistic taste preferred themes appealing strongly to the emotions (cf. Hor. ars 95–107; epist. 2. 1. 210–213). In their selection of subjects, the Romans also took into account their connection with Italy. This explains the importance of Trojan myths. Even if the material is shared with classical drama, often an intermediate Hellenistic source should not be excluded. Livius Andronicus and Naevius were not writers of classicizing taste.<sup>2</sup>

The appearance of similar titles in Livius and Naevius shows that the younger poet already wanted to outdo and replace works of his predecessor. He also created the genre of praetextae, providing tragedy with Roman plots.<sup>3</sup>

Ennius favored Euripides. The proportion of classical Greek models appears greater in him than in other Roman tragic playwrights, though it must always be remembered that Euripides, the most 'modern' and 'tragic' of the great triad, was the darling of the Hellenistic period. Atilius, a contemporary of Ennius, not only adapted comedies, but also Sophocles' Electra.

Pacuvius, Ennius' nephew, showed a more pronounced affinity with Sophocles, probably not because of any classicizing inclination, but in order to keep out of his uncle's patch. He also employed many Hellenistic models.

Accius represented the culmination of Republican tragic poetry. In his relationship to his various models, he showed considerable independence. His younger contemporary, Julius Caesar Strabo, used Hellenistic models for his Tecmessa and Teuthras.

<sup>1</sup> Since only comedies are fully preserved, we have to quote the comparative figures for Plautus: there are 45% of spoken lines against 65% in Euripides.

<sup>2</sup> K. ZIEGLER 1937, col. 1986 against LEO, LG 71.

<sup>3</sup> The fragments are found in L. PEDROLI 1954; G. DE DURANTE 1966.

Classicizing tendencies may perhaps be noted in Quintus Cicero, the orator's brother. Distinguished dilettantes also wrote dramas; an example is Augustus' Ajax. The classic tragedies of the Romans were Varius' Thyestes, produced at Octavian's victory games (29 B.C.), and Ovid's Medea.

In the imperial period, tragedies show a republican attitude. In Seneca's dramas, we encounter for the first time plays completely preserved. They attest the rhetorical and pathetic cast of tragedy, and in places its receptivity to the gruesome and cruel. Through Seneca, Rome gave indispensable stimulus to European drama.

Comedy presupposes a mature, open society, a feature not particularly typical of archaic Rome. The Roman ambience therefore altered comedy. Before we consider comedy's Italian roots, the especially important Latin comedy in Greek dress, the palliata, requires our attention. In his comedies, Naevius shone because of his power of language, which pointed the way for the great Plautus. With Plautus and Terence, comedy attained within Roman literature, earlier than any other genre, a degree of excellence which secured its influence on later Europe. Both great comic writers sought, each in his own way, to strike a mean between slavish imitation and barbaric caprice. They cut out dispensable scenes, and added episodes from other plays, a procedure which has, not entirely happily, been called 'contamination'. At the side of these two masters, Caecilius Statius and Turpilius also deserve mention. After Terence, the palliata, ever trying to fulfill an exaggerated demand for fidelity to the original, seems to have lost all of its impetus.

Next to the palliata stands comedy in Roman dress, the togata.<sup>1</sup> Its chief representatives are Titinius and Afranius. Too little is known of

<sup>1</sup> First edition of the writers of togatae by R. and E. STEPHANUS, Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum, Genevae 1564. Titinius and Atta: Titinio e Atta, Fabula togata. I frammenti (TTrC), a cura di T. GUARDI, Milano 1985; CRF, 2nd ed. 1873, 133-159 (Titinius), 160-164 (Atta); 3rd ed. 1898, 157-188 (Titinius), 188-193 (Atta). A. DAVIAULT, Comoedia togata. Fragments, Paris 1981 (controversial). Bibl.: A. PASQUAZI BAGNOLINI, Sulla fabula togata, in: C&S 13, 1974, No. 52, 70-79; 14, 1975, No. 56, 39-47; T. TABACCO, Il problema della togata nella critica moderna, BStudLat 5, 1975, 33-57. Bibl.: BARDON, litt. lat. inc. 1, 39-43; W. BEARE, The Fabula Togata, Hermathena 55, 1940, 35-55; W. BEARE, The Roman Stage, London, 2nd ed. 1955, 118-126; 3rd ed. 1964, 128-136; M. CACCIAGLIA, Ricerche

Atta, a contemporary of the actor Roscius. Titinius, Plautus' contemporary, brought the togata, after its beginnings in Naevius, to fruition. His language has the strength of the pioneer. The greatest poet of the togata was Lucius Afranius, active in the time of the Gracchi. He showed a preference for Terence and Menander, and it was with Menander that, to Horace's amazement, certain critics paired him (cf. Hor. epist. 2. 1. 57). Among other material, there survives a prologue with literary polemics in the style of Terence (com. 25–30). There were also prologues spoken by gods, in the manner of Menander (com. 277; 298–299; 403–404). The togata departs from Terence in displaying a liking for cantica. Pederastic themes, likewise known to the Atellane, are also found. The sly slave, however, is missing. At Rome, the master had to be the cleverest. Afranius was staged even in the days of Cicero and Nero, and under Hadrian he gave rise to a commentary. The trabeata however remained without lasting influence. This was the effort of Gaius Maecenas Melissus under Augustus to breathe life into a comedy using the garb of the knight.

It cannot be denied that comedy, in the strict sense of that term, was, at Rome, a Greek import. Nevertheless, the comic theater, as an element of Roman life, had also Italian roots, particularly in Etruria and Magna Graecia. From Etruria came the pompa circensis, the festival procession introducing the circus games with its 'flute' player and its manducus. Undoubtedly, many words of the Roman theater are Etruscan, although nothing is known of Etruscan dramas. The impromptu play of the fescennini, which used to be performed, for example, at the compitalia, had perhaps nothing to do with the origins of the Roman theater, in spite of Livy 7. 2. This is not to deny, however, a possible influence on Plautus' virtuoso scenes of mutual abuse.<sup>1</sup>

---

sulla fabula togata, RCCM 14, 1972, 207–245; A. DAVIAULT, Togata et Palliata, BAGB 1979, 422–430; T. GUARDÌ, Note sulla lingua di Titinio, Pan 7, 1981, 145–165; H. JUHNKE, Die Togata, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 302–304; Leo, LG 374–384; E. VEREECKE, Titinius, témoin de son époque; in: RecPhL 2, 1968, 63–92; E. VEREECKE, Titinius, Plaute et les origines de la fabula togata, AC 40, 1971, 156–185; A. POCIÑA PÉREZ, Naissance et originalité de la comédie togata, AC 44, 1975, 79–88. Afranius: CRF, 2nd ed. 165–222; CRF, 3rd ed. 193–265; F. MARX, RE 1, 708–710; the prose mime Pap. Hamb. 167 is not by Afranius; J. DINGEL, Bruchstück einer römischen Komödie auf einem Hamburger Papyrus (Afranius?), ZPE 10, 1973, 29–44; B. BADER, Ein Afraniuspapyrus?, ZPE 12, 1973, 270–276; J. DINGEL, Zum Komödienfragment P. Hamb. 167 (Afranius?), ZPE 14, 1974, 168.

<sup>1</sup> On Liv. 7. 2 s. now: W. HOFMANN, Die Anfänge des Dramas in Rom, Altertum 26, 1980, 143–149.

The phlyax,<sup>1</sup> a rustic form of farcical comedy from South Italy, is known to us indirectly through vases of the 4th century. Its themes are burlesques of the divine, travesties of myth, and scenes of everyday life. The chief representative of the phlyax or hilarotragoedia, was Rhinthon of Syracuse, active in Tarentum in the time of Ptolemy I (d. 283/282 B.C.). He was thus later than the vase paintings.

The fabula Atellana,<sup>2</sup> named after the town of Atella near Naples, reached Rome early, perhaps in company with the worship of Minerva. There, in the context of ludi not otherwise known, it was ritually presented using the Oscan dialect, possibly in connection with funeral games. It continued in this way until the end of the 1st century B.C. In the 1st century A.D. it took on new life. It was not acted by professional players, but by citizens wearing masks. Typical characters were Maccus, the fool; Pappus, the old man; Bucco, the glutton; Dossennus, the hunchback, with intellectual pretensions. The pieces were short and mostly improvised, and of a licentious and peasant nature. The Atellane shows connections with the phlyax, particularly because of its obscenity<sup>3</sup> and employment of masks which led to the special importance of gesture. The Atellane should not be called 'realistic'. It early received the role of closing play, like the satyr drama. In the Republican period, its ideology was conservative. Under the emperors, it indulged in open criticism.

The Atellane acquired literary status about 100 B.C. It replaced the palliata and togata, to which it was assimilated even as regards its external form. Almost insoluble complications were regarded as typical of the Atellane (Varro, Men. 198 B.). Plots recall to some extent the palliata: for example, in the use of doubling (Duo Dossenni). Tragic myths were given a comic twist, as in Pomponius' Agamemno Suppositicius and Novius' Phoenissae. It preferred the iambic septenarius. In the Republican period, cantica seem to be missing, although later they came into fashion (Suet. Nero 39). Chief representatives of the literary Atellane were Pomponius of Bologna and Novius. Even Sulla is said to have practiced this genre. The Atellane soon yielded to its rival the mime.

<sup>1</sup> Rhinthon: CGF 183-189; A. OLIVIERI, Frammenti della commedia greca e del mimo nella Sicilia e nella Magna Grecia, 2 vols. esp. vol. 2, 2nd ed., Napoli 1947, 7-24; M. GIGANTE, Rintone e il teatro in Magna Grecia, Napoli 1971; E. WÜST, Phlyakes, RE 20, 1, 1941, 292-306; A. D. TRENDALL, Phlyax Vases, London, 2nd ed. 1967; M. GIGANTE, Teatro greco in Magna Grecia, AHS 1, 1967, 35-87.

<sup>2</sup> CRF, 2nd ed. 223-276; CRF, 3rd ed. 267-335; P. FRASSINETTI, ed., Fabularum Atellanarum fragmenta, Augustae Taurinorum 1955; P. FRASSINETTI, Le Atellane. Atellanae fabulae, Roma 1967; LEO, LG 1, 370-372; R. RIEKS, Mimus und Atellane, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 348-377 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> Including pederastic themes, also found in the togata.

The Mime<sup>1</sup> (Arist. poet. 1447 b 10–11) imitated scenes of daily life, including both the permissible and impermissible (Dion. gramm. 1. 491. 15–16). The store of motifs was larger than in comedy. It could include, for example, adultery committed by a wife. Masks were not usual, and so facial expression gained in importance. In contrast with the serious drama, female roles were performed by actresses. The Doric mime of Sophron spread its influence from Sicily to both Athens and Central Italy. It made a fruitful contribution to higher genres of Greek literature (Plato, Theocritus). The Mimiambi of Herodas were destined for reading by connoisseurs.

At Rome, the sub-literary mime was popular, and at least from 173 became a permanent feature at the Floralia. After the play, as an extra treat, the crowd had the right to observe the charms of the actresses undisguised (Val. Max. 2. 10. 8). In 115 B.C. the whole ars ludicra, including the mime, was banned from Rome by censorial edict (Cassiod. chron. 2, pp. 131–132 M.). Its revival in the 1st century B.C. was all the more marked. Mime actors, both male and female, were despised by Cicero<sup>2</sup> in accordance with traditional Roman standards but from the days of Sulla and Mark Antony they were favored by the powerful. Even Caesar and his heir valued this genre. Augustus looked on his whole life as a mime (Suet. Aug. 99). It was Justinian who first forbade the mime (A.D. 525), and yet he introduced it into his own palace by marrying the mime actress Theodora.

In Cicero's time, it was the mime rather than the Atellane that served to conclude tragic performances (fam. 9. 16. 7). The genre gained literary form thanks to the Roman knight D. Laberius (106– 43 B.C.) and Caesar's protégé Publilius Syrus. In his mimes, Laberius continued in his way the tradition of the palliata, togata, and Atellane. He made use of personal prologues and dialogues in senarii. His choice of words was careful (Fronto 4. 3. 2), although not free from vulgarisms (Gell. 19. 13. 3) and neologisms (Gell. 16. 7). In his polished apophthegms, Laberius did not refrain even from politics: porro, Quirites! libertatem perdimus ('go ahead, Quirites! we are losing our freedom') and: necesse est multos timeat quem multi timent, 'necessarily he whom many fear has to fear many' (125-126).

<sup>1</sup> CRF, 2nd ed. 279–305; CRF, 3rd ed. 339–385; Romani Mimi, ed. M. BONARIA, Romae 1965; H. REICH, Der Mimus, 2 vols., Berlin 1903 (controversial); A. MARZULLO, Il mimo latino nei motivi di attualità, Atti e Memorie Acc. Modena 5. s., 16, 1958, 1–44; D. ROMANO, Cicerone e Laberio, Palermo 1955; M. BIEBER, Die Denkmäler zum Theaterwesen im Altertum, Berlin 1920; M. BIEBER, The History of the Greek and Roman Theatre, Princeton, 2nd. ed. 1961; R. W. REYNOLDS, The Adultery Mime, CQ 40, 1946, 77–84; R. W. REYNOLDS, Verrius Flaccus and the Early Mime at Rome, Hermathena 61, 1943, 56–62; R. RIEKS (s. note before last); H. WIEMKEN, Der griechische Mimus. Dokumente zur Geschichte des antiken Volkstheaters, Bremen 1972. Herodas: ed. I. C. CUNNINGHAM, Leipzig 1987 (with bibl.).

<sup>2</sup> D. F. SUTTON, Cicero on Minor Dramatic Forms, SO 59, 1984, 29–36.

Publilius Syrus arrived in Rome as a slave. After his emancipation, he enjoyed a career as writer of mimes and principal actor in them. He prevailed over Liborius at the Ludi Caesaris in 46 B.C. (Gell. 17. 14; Macr. Sat. 2. 7. 1-11). A mass of apophthegms is known from his works. They are cited e.g. by the two Senecas, and later were assembled in a school textbook (Jerome, epist. ad Laetam 107. 8). Even in modern times, they have been highly esteemed, thanks to Erasmus.

Literary Technique

Tragedy, which perhaps developed from the dithyramb, was originally linked with choric song. The share occupied by recitative and speech grew steadily, while the importance of the chorus declined. The gradual expansion of the spoken parts is in accord with the progress of logos. Tragedy is concerned with processes of recognition.

In Attic tragedy, prologue, dialogue (episodion) and choric song occur in the following order: prologue, parodos or entry song, episodion, stasimon or song sung by the choir standing at rest, episodion, stasimon, episodion, stasimon . . . episodion, exodos or departure song. The number of episodion in the classical period is not precisely fixed.

In the development of the action, the 'tying' and 'untying' (dénouement) of the knot are to be distinguished. The reversal of fortune or peripeteia in tragedy usually means a change from happiness to sorrow, although the reverse may be found.

Typical elements include: the solo prologue or dialogic exposition; a judgment scene; a deceptive speech; recognition; a messenger's speech reporting events which occurred offstage. Arguments are fought out both by contrasting speeches of some length or in a line-for-line interchange of single verses (stichomythia).

In the Hellenistic period, a scheme of five acts, made up of prologue and four episodes, became the rule. Portrayal of character sometimes prevailed over action. The use of rhetoric, already well developed in Euripides and Agathon, became more frequent. Euripides and Agathon also introduced into drama the then modern music with its powerful appeal to the emotions. Afterwards, solo song and lyric antiphony broadened their claims. Pathos was heightened.

The professional actors limited the role of choric song. Since their advent and the greater prevalence of traveling ensembles, the chorus was no longer a sine qua non. The role of the leader of the chorus was expanded, and the chorus itself, if retained, was more involved in acting than singing. In its place, solo arias were multiplied.

Accordingly, the Romans limited choric song in favor of individual musical performance. Nevertheless in all Roman tragedies choruses are taken for granted, although in them the song of the chorus leader takes pride of place. For monodies or solo songs a practice is attested in which the actor used only gestures, while the actual singing was performed separately by a professional singer accompanied by 'flute'.

Ennius handled the chorus differently from the Greek tragedians. In the Eumenides the title alone proves that there must have been a chorus. In the Iphigenia, however, the chorus of women, whose effect was somewhat incongruous in a military camp, was replaced by a chorus of soldiers.

The Medea plays provide an opportunity to compare Ennius and Euripides. The Latin poet transposed lyrical choruses into recitative, replacing, for example, dochmiacs with long verses (like the septenarius), and lyrical with rhetorical effects. However, Medea's farewell to her children, which in Euripides had been a speech, was adapted by Ennius as a lyric monody. Thus the chorus, even under the spell of strong emotion, expressed itself in recitative, whereas the individual actor used song.

The literary technique of Old Comedy was different from that of tragedy. In the days of Middle Comedy, with the disappearance of direct political polemics, typical elements of Old Comedy such as agon and parabasis gradually became less important. (In the latter, the chorus had addressed the spectators either to discuss with them actual politics or to explain the poet's intentions). Traces of the technique of Old Comedy are seldom found in Plautus; he has Middle Comedy to thank for them. In the Greek New Comedy, the chorus generally did not participate in the action. It merely filled up the pauses between the five acts which had now become standard. Choric songs were no longer composed by the comic poets. In Roman comedy, act-division and chorus became even less important.<sup>1</sup>

In spite of its efforts to keep close to real life, New Comedy retained some elements of fantasy defying realism. The often grotesquely stylized masks are evidence of this. Entering to speak the prologue, deities often shattered the illusion. Monologues or asides made the spectator the confidant of the characters. In particular the action, albeit no longer imaginary, still remained rich in somewhat improbable coincidences. Like many tragedies, comedies often ended in a recognition (anagnorismos).

On the whole, however, the playwrights did their best not to go beyond the routine of daily experience. The line of action of New Comedy is to some degree fixed. The young people pursue their love affairs, while the old folk are intent on preserving the family property and social norms. Lacking money, the young try to deceive the old, often with the help of a cunning slave or parasite. This leads their elders to weave a counter intrigue. Ancient theory distinguished comoediae motoriae, statariae, and mixtae,<sup>2</sup> in accordance with the degree of liveliness in the action.

The plot in New Comedy recalls that of late Euripidean tragedy, which had developed into a sort of bourgeois drama. In the Ion, for example, the hero's mistakes result from his ignorance of his own identity. Human beings grope in the darkness, unaware of the power of Tyche. In Menander's Perikeiromene, Ignorance<sup>3</sup> (Ἄγνοια) is an important element of the action and is even personified. Thanks to the prologue, the spectator is better informed than the characters in the play; he is able to recognize their errors and to savor his superior knowledge.

Translating was not the primary concern of Roman comic poets. They were not writing for eternity, but for a particular performance.

<sup>1</sup> Division into five acts was introduced in the Hellenistic period: Comoedia quinque actus habet, hoc est, quinque ducitur in scenam (Ps. Ascon., div. in Caec. p. 119 Orelli-Baiter); cf. also Hor. ars 189–190 (referring generally to drama and to tragedy in particular). Act division in Plautus used to be ascribed to J. B. Pius in his edition of 1500. However, traces of such a division are already found in 15th-century manuscripts. In Terence, division into acts is perhaps due to Varro. But the discussion in Donatus and Evanthius indicates that they had no authentic tradition in this respect available to them: J. A. BARSBY 1982, 78.

<sup>2</sup> Evanth. de com. 4. 4.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. H.-J. METTE, Gefährdung durch Nichtwissen in Tragödie und Komödie, in: U. REINHARDT, K. SALLMANN, eds., Musa iocosa, FS A. THIERFELDER, Hildesheim 1947, 42–61.

The Plautine palliata characteristically avoided Roman costume and exaggerated the elements of unreality. Both features kept the spectator at a distance and added to the comic effect. On the other hand, up to the period after Terence, comic actors at Rome seem to have worn not masks but only wigs (galeri). In this respect, 'realism' at first might have been greater than in the Greek theater.

The literary technique of the poets of the palliata can only be defined with caution. The playwrights placed more emphasis on the individual scene than on the design of the whole, a feature also observed in Roman epic.<sup>1</sup> In order to achieve a momentary effect, they employed less subtle and even popular devices, such as plays on words, riddles wrapped up in tales, and gross expressions. They cut out comparatively colorless scenes from the original and replaced them with lively episodes from other plays. In Plautus musical elements, and in particular solo songs (cantica), were much more prominent than in Menander. Plautus also conferred upon his plays a musically determined symmetry which is all his own. Terence showed a preference for double plots, and accordingly sometimes added new characters. He also liked to prepare the action by means of an introductory dialogue; the information given there could be supplemented gradually in the course of the play. The insertion of scenes from other plays (the so-called contaminatio) has to be judged in the context of these overarching aims.

Language and Style

In principle, the language of tragedy belongs to the high style. However, in Latin there is no strict distinction between the style of tragedy and that of comedy. The ratio of iambs to trochees is similar in both genres.<sup>2</sup> Although in Greek a basic metrical difference exists between the two genres, this is not the case in Latin. Apart from the usual iambics and trochees, both tragedy and comedy at Rome employ stichic anapaests, bacchii, and cretics.

On the other hand, there are differences of style within the plays, between, for example, prologue, messenger's speech and canticum.

<sup>1</sup> E. LEFÈVRE, Versuch einer Typologie des römischen Dramas, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 1-90; cf. F. MEHMEL, Virgil und Apollonius Rhodius, Hamburg 1940.

<sup>2</sup> A telling feature is Accius' preference for spondees (Hor. ars 258-259; H. CANGIĆ 1978, 341); it is connected with the ethos (gravitas) of the spondee.

Republican drama, whether tragedy or comedy, is distinguished by metrical variety. Long verses, such as septenarii, are more frequent than in the Greek originals, although substantial sections in tetrameters have recently come to light in Menander. In Plautus, the language of these long verses is more ornate and solemn than that of the senarii, while the style of the cantica is even more exalted. Characteristically, in the employment of these different levels of pathos, there is no basic difference between tragedy and comedy. Nevertheless, it is clear that tragicus tumor has less scope in comedy, and for this reason is often parodied.

In general, the language of comedy comes close to being colloquial, but there are differences between the authors. Plautus' Latin is more colorful, sometimes more pathetic, sometimes more coarse than that of Terence. Alliteration and rhyme, antithesis and sound play are not at all limited to tragedy. Rhetoric and lyric are not mutually exclusive but work together: Haec omnia vidi inflammari, / Priamo vi vitam evitari, / Iovis aram sanguine turpari, 'all this I saw with flame devoured, Priam's living force by force unlifted, Jupiter's altar with blood befouled' (Enn. trag. 92-94 J.). This archaic Latin style may only partly be subsumed under the notion of 'rhetoric'. A higher principle is 'psychagogia', the quasi musical effort to play on the emotions. From this stately gravitas, still favored by Caecilius in comedy, Terence is the first to turn away to some degree with his trend-setting levis scriptura.

The language of tragedy in its philosophical passages prepares the ground for Lucretius,<sup>1</sup> while the concise diction of Terence's comedy points the way towards the elegant classical Latin of Caesar.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Understandably, reflections on literature are found in tragedy less frequently than in comedy. Even so, in the Antiopa Pacuvius treated the problem of a life dedicated to intellectual pursuits. The problem of authorship as a profession was indeed not directly addressed here, but was tackled at its root. Two totally different brothers, the huntsman Zethus and the singer Amphion, discussed music and ended by confronting the problem of wisdom. In Pacuvius, the representative of the active life won the day, but this does not alter the fact that tragedy became a port of entry not only for myth at Rome but also for Logos. Accius was at the same time tragic poet and essayist, writing about questions of the theater and of language. Unhappily, too little is known of this activity.

---

<sup>1</sup> H. CANGIK 1978, 332-334.

Occasionally, in his prologues, Plautus refers to some of his own poetic decisions, and discusses certain details with his audience. However, he develops no consistent literary polemics. In some plays, the cunning slave is regularly styled as master builder, general, and stage director. Thus, he appears as the mirror-image of the poet. When characters in the play expressly reject the ordinary clichés of comedy, they also serve to emphasize the sovereign will of the author.

Terence's prologues are particularly concerned with the difficulties of comic writing. The Terentian prologue is a new type of text on literary theory, in which the poet speaks for his own cause. In any case, it is evident that Roman comic poets are aware of their artistic aims and methods.

Ideas II

Tragedy played a decisive role in the assimilation and dissemination of myth at Rome. It used the world of heroic myth as a stage on which to give serious shape to human destiny. Productions, as in Greece, took place at public festivals, and superficially a link with public worship was preserved. In introducing his topics, the author had to take account of the meager knowledge of the general public. Authors and actors were obliged to avoid offending the influential families, from whose ranks the aediles were drawn, if they wanted to be hired again the following year. Consequently, no undue freedom of thought was to be expected.

However, we should not imagine censorship as exaggeratedly strict, nor should we seek the preaching of public virtues in every tragedy. Many tragic titles in fact indicate a special predilection for the Trojan cycle, in accordance with Roman national feeling. Even so, the poets were not, in spite of all, afraid to tackle thorny questions. For example, in the Alexander, Ennius touched upon important social themes. In the Chryses, Pacuvius raised questions of religion, and in his Pentheus hinted at the suppression of the Bacchanalia (186–181 B.C.). Ennius took over from Euripides his skeptical and critical remarks on the gods. Reflection and doubt made their way onto the stage.

Furthermore, dramas featuring female protagonists and treating psychological problems enjoyed increasing popularity. The impact of republican tragedy on its public was enhanced by music, which helped it to stimulate thought and bring problems of human society to the stage. Tragedy showed the exposed and vulnerable nature of man, and often the triumph of wrongdoing, and virtuous self-sufficiency as the only escape. By its treatment of ethical, political, and theological themes, tragedy at Rome prepared the ground for the acceptance of philosophy. Later, in Seneca, philosophy and tragedy again parted company, or else complemented each other in a concordia discors.

Next to Varius' Thyestes, Ovid's Medea was the second significant tragedy of the Augustan period. It depicted its heroine as someone possessed. On the basis of the treatment of Medea in other works of Ovid, it may be plausibly supposed that his tragedy smoothed the way for Seneca's plays. There are points of contact between Seneca's tragedies and his philosophical writings. But his plays may not be considered without qualification as philosophical tracts, since they bring before our eyes the sufferings of an unredeemed world. They confront the spectator, not with philosophy, but with painful reality and so lead him to the threshold of self-knowledge and conversion to a life guided by reason. Imperial tragedy may be dissident in its tone. Its political stance is often republican.

Aristophanes' comedy was rooted in the democratic society of Athens. The chorus represented the community of citizens and was itself made up of citizens. This inner link to public life gradually dissolved with the loss of freedom, as can be seen from the progressive degradation of the chorus in Attic drama. Political criticism, which at the outset had been uninhibited, was gradually toned down over the course of Aristophanes' lifetime.

New Comedy was no longer particularly political in its scope, but still had a general social relevance. It treated problems of the kind which arise in a family<sup>1</sup> and a small community. In the Athens of those days, life centered around trade and economy. Men felt exposed to the power of Tyche, the queen of the world. Comedy enjoyed moralizing. Menander passed for a pupil of Theophrastus, and the influence of Peripatetic ethics should neither be dogmatically asserted nor denied. Attic comedy presupposed an open, generous norm of social behavior. Deviations, leading to the isolation of the individual from the community, were brought into balance.

---

<sup>1</sup> M. FUHRMANN, Lizenzen und Tabus des Lachens. Zur sozialen Grammatik der hellenistisch-römischen Komödie, AU 29, 5, 1986, 20-43.

Greek New Comedy played against a background familiar to the spectator. In maintaining its Greek dress, the palliata was therefore more distant from its Roman audience. Consequently, the closeness to life,<sup>1</sup> for which New Comedy is praised, was—quite visibly—called into question in Rome. There, comedy was even less a reflection of contemporary society than it had been in Athens.

The degree of participation felt by the spectator was different as well. The players at Rome were of socially inferior position; and in spite of all the honors which prominent actors received, they labored under the legal stigma of infamia. Externally, comedy was based on public religion, but it was no longer an affair of the whole citizen body. It had become an artistic specialty, not an immediate expression of the audience's identity, but enjoyed simply as a culinary rarity.

To be sure, comedy's chief aim was not to stimulate philosophical thought. But in a society such as that of ancient Rome, drama was one of the few public media in which some degree of reflection was acceptable. The treatment of interpersonal relationships in comedy undoubtedly contributed to the spread of civilization in Roman society.

Editions: TRF * CRF * B. SNELL, ed., Tragicorum Graecorum fragmenta 1, Göttingen 2nd ed. 1986, ed. by R. KANNICHT. * S. RADT, ed., Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, vol. 3 (Aeschylus) 1985; vol. 4 (Sophocles, together with R. KANNICHT) 1977. * F. SCHRAMM, Tragicorum Graecorum hellenisticae quae dicitur aetatis fragmenta (praeter Ezechielem) eorumque de vita atque poesi testimonia collecta et illustrata, diss. Monasterii Westphalorum 1929; publ. 1931. * G. KAIBEL, Comicorum Graecorum fragmenta 1, 1, Berolini 1899 (containing also the source texts of theory of comedy: Tractatus Coislinianus, Diomedes, Evanthius, Donatus). * W. J. W. KOSTER, Scholia in Aristophanem 1, 1a, Groningen 1975. * T. KOCK, Comicorum Atticorum fragmenta, vols. 1–3, Lipsiae 1880–1888. * R. KASSEL, C. AUSTIN, Poetae comici Graeci, Berolini 1983 ff. * Praetextae: L. PEDROLI, Fabularum Prae- textarum quae extant (TC), Genova 1954. * G. DE DURANTE, Le Fabulae praetextae (TTr; Studi), Roma 1966. ** Bibl.: H. J. METTE (Römische Tragödie), Lustrum 9, 1964, 10–34. * The Classical World Bibliography of Roman Drama and Poetry and Ancient Fiction. With a New Introduction by W. DONLAN, New York 1978. * W. KRAUS, Mittlere und Neue Komödie außer Menander, AAHG 28, 1975, 1–18.

<sup>1</sup> Aristophanes Byz. (d. about 180 B.C.) quoted by Syrian. in Hermog. 2, 23, 6 Rabe: ὁ Μένανδρε καὶ βίε, πότερος ἄρ' ὑμῶν πότερον ἀπεμιμήσατο; Cicero quoted by Donat. de com. 5, 1 (the attribution to rep. 4, 13 is uncertain), perhaps from a Peripatetic source (R. PFEIFFER, Geschichte der Klassischen Philologie, München 2nd ed. 1978, 235, n. 132). Aristophanes is implicitly ranking Menander with Homer, whose Odyssey was praised as a 'mirror of human life' (Alcidamas, quoted by Aristotle rhet. 3, 3. 1406 b 13).

W. G. ARNOTT, Menander, Plautus, Terence, Oxford 1975. * K.-H. BAREISS, Comoedia. Die Entwicklung der Komödiendiskussion von Aristoteles bis Ben Jonson, Frankfurt 1982. * J. A. BARSBY, Actors and Act-Divisions: Some Questions of Adaptation in Roman Comedy, Antichthon 16, 1982, 77–87. * R. BEACHAM, The Roman Theatre and its Audience, London 1991. * W. BEARE, The Roman Stage, London 3rd ed. 1964. * J. BLÄNSDORF, Voraussetzungen und Entstehung der römischen Komödie, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 91–134. * H. D. BLUME, Einführung in das antike Theaterwesen, Darmstadt 1984. * L. BRAUN, Polymetrie bei Terenz und Plautus, WS 83, 1970, 66–83. * M. BROŽEK, Einiges über die Schauspielregisseure und die Komödiendichter im alten Rom, StudClas 2, 1960, 145–150. * G. BURCKHARDT, Die Akteinteilung in der neuen griechischen und in der römischen Komödie, diss. Basel 1927. * H. CANCIK, Seneca und die römische Tragödie, in: M. FUHRMANN, ed., Römische Literatur, Frankfurt 1974, 251–260. * H. CANCIK, Die republikanische Tragödie, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 308–347. * J. DANGEL, Les dynasties maudites dans le théâtre latin de la République à l'Empire, Ktèma 12, 1987, 149–157. * A. DE ROSALIA, Aspetti linguistici del 'tradurre' nei tragici latini arcaici, in: Atti del I° seminario di studi sulla tragedia romana (Palermo 1987), Quaderni di cultura e di tradizione classica 4–5, 1987, 7–27. * F. DELLA CORTE, La tipologia del personaggio della palliata, Association G. Budé, Actes du IX<sup>e</sup> Congrès (Rome, 1973), Paris 1975, 1, 354–393. * A. DIETERICH, Pulcinella. Pompejanische Wandbilder und römische Satyrspiele, Leipzig 1897. * A. DIETERLE, Die Strukturelemente der Intrige in der griechisch-römischen Komödie, Amsterdam 1980. * P. DITTRICH, Plautus und Terenz in Pädagogik und Schulwesen der deutschen Humanisten, diss. Leipzig 1915. * H. DOHM, Mageiros. Die Rolle des Kochs in der griechisch-römischen Komödie, München 1964. * T. A. DOREY, D. R. DUDLEY, eds., Roman Drama. Chapters by C. D. N. COSTA, T. L. ZINN, J. A. HANSON, G. LLOYD-EVANS, T. B. L. WEBSTER, A. STEEGMAN, W. R. CHALMERS, London 1965. * G. E. DUCKWORTH, The Nature of Roman Comedy. A Study in Popular Entertainment, with a Foreword and bibl. Appendix by R. HUNTER, London 2nd ed. 1994. * F. DUPONT, L'acteur-roi ou: le théâtre dans la Rome antique, Paris 1985. * K. EDER, Antike Komödie. Aristophanes, Menander, Plautus, Terenz, Hannover 1968. * H. FLASHAR, Antikes Drama auf der Bühne Europas, Gymnasium 100, 1993, 193–207. * P. FLURY, Liebe und Liebessprache bei Menander, Plautus und Terenz, Heidelberg 1968. * K. GAISER, Zur Eigenart der römischen Komödie. Plautus und Terenz gegenüber ihren griechischen Vorbildern, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 1027–1113. * B. GARBE, Die Komposition der aristotelischen Poetik und der Begriff der 'Katharsis', Euphorion 74, 1980, 312–332. * C. GARTON, Personal Aspects of the Roman Theatre, Toronto 1972. * B. GENTILI, Theatrical Performances in the Ancient World. Hellenistic and Early Roman Theatre, Amsterdam 1979. * W. GÖRLER, Über die Illusion in der antiken Komödie, A&A 18, 1973, 41–57. * A. S. GRATWICK, Drama, in: CHLL 77–138. * P. GRIMAL, Le théâtre à Rome, in: Actes du IX<sup>e</sup> congrès 1973, Association G. Budé, Paris 1974, 249–305. * HAFFTER, Dichtersprache. * H. HAFFTER, Die altrömische Komödie (1970), in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Die römische Komödie, 93–109. * P. W. HARSH, Certain Features of Technique Found in Both Greek and Roman Drama, AJPh 58, 1937, 282–293. * M. T. HERRICK, Comic Theory in the Sixteenth Century, Urbana 1950. * M. T. HERRICK, Tragicomedy. Its Origin and Development in Italy, France, and England, Urbana 1955. * W. HOFMANN, Der Bramarbas in der griechisch-römischen Komödie, Eos 59, 1971, 271–280. * W. HOFMANN, Die Volkstümlichkeit in der frühen römischen Komödie, Philologus 125, 1981, 228–235. * M. HORN-MONVAL, Répertoire bibliographique des traductions et adaptations françaises du théâtre étranger du XV<sup>e</sup> siècle à nos jours, 2, 1: Théâtre latin antique, Paris 1959. * G. HORSTMAYER, Die Kupplerin. Studien zur Typologie im dramatischen Schrifttum Europas von den Griechen bis zur Französischen Revolution, diss. Köln 1972. * M. HÜLSEMANN, Theater, Kult und bürgerlicher Widerstand im antiken Rom. Die Entstehung der architektonischen Struktur des römischen Theaters im Rahmen der gesellschaftlichen Auseinandersetzung zur Zeit der Republik, Frankfurt 1987. * R. L. HUNTER, The New Comedy of Greece and Rome, Cambridge 1985. * V. N. JARCHO, Antičnaya drama. Technologiya masterstva, Moskva 1990. * D. KONSTAN, Roman Comedy, Ithaca 1983. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Die römische Komödie. Plautus und Terenz, Darmstadt 1973. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978. * E. LEFÈVRE, Saturnalien und Palliata, Poetica 20, 1988, 32–46. * K. LENNARTZ, Non verba sed vim. Kritisch-exegetische Untersuchungen zu Fragmenten archaischer römischer Tragiker, Stuttgart 1994. * A. LESKY, Die tragische Dichtung der Hellenen, Göttingen 3rd ed. 1972. * S. LILJA, Terms of Abuse in Roman Comedy, Helsinki 1965. * G. LUCK, Über einige Interjektionen der lateinischen Umgangssprache. Kritische Beiträge zu Plautus und Terenz, Heidelberg 1964. * G. MASTROMARCO, The Public of Herondas, Amsterdam 1984. * M. NEUMANN, Die poetische Gerechtigkeit in der Neuen Komödie. Untersuchungen zur Technik des antiken Lustspiels, diss. Mainz 1958. * G. NORWOOD, Plautus and Terence, New York 1932, repr. 1963. * E. PARATORE, Storia del teatro latino, Milano 1957. * E. PÖHLMANN (and others), Studien zur Bühnendichtung und zum Theaterbau der Antike, Frankfurt 1995. * R. RAFFAELLI, Ricerche sui versi lunghi di Plauto e di Terenzio (metriche, stilistiche, codicologiche), Pisa 1982.

*R. REGGIANI, Rileggendo alcuni frammenti tragici di Ennio, Pacuvio e Accio, in: Atti del I° seminario di studi sulla tragedia romana (Palermo 1987), Quaderni di cultura e di tradizione classica 4-5, 1987, 31-88. * U. REINHARDT, Mythologische Beispiele in der Neuen Komödie (Menander, Plautus, Terenz). Teil 1, diss. Mainz 1974. * U. REINHARDT, K. SALLMANN, eds., Musa iocosa. Arbeiten über Humor und Witz, Komik und Komödie der Antike. FS A. THIERFELDER, Hildesheim 1974. * O. RIBBECK, Die römische Tragödie im Zeitalter der Republik, Leipzig 1875, repr. Hildesheim 1968. * H.-W. RISSOM, Vater- und Sohnmotive in der römischen Komödie, diss. Kiel 1971. * W. SALZMANN, Molière und die lateinische Komödie. Ein Stil- und Strukturvergleich, Heidelberg 1969. * F. H. SANDBACH, The Comic Theatre of Greece and Rome, London 1977. * E. SCHILD, Die dramaturgische Rolle des Sklaven bei Plautus und Terenz, diss. Basel 1917. * G. A. SEECK, ed., Das griechische Drama. Darmstadt 1979. * E. SEGAL, Roman Laughter. The Comedy of Plautus, Cambridge, Mass. 1968, 2nd ed. 1987. * G. SERBAT, Théâtre et société au II<sup>e</sup> siècle avant J.-C., Actes du IX<sup>e</sup> congrès de l'association G. BUDÉ (Rome 1973), Paris 1975, vol. 1, 394-403. * P. P. SPRANGER, Historische Untersuchungen zu den Sklavenfiguren des Plautus und Terenz, AAWM 1960, 8, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1984 (rev. and with add.). * S. STABRYŁ, Latin Tragedy in Virgil's Poetry, Wrocław 1970. * W. STEIDLE, Probleme des Bühnenspiels in der Neuen Komödie, GB 3, 1975, 341-386. * M. SWOBODA, De origine atque primordiis aulaeorum in theatro Romano, Eos 51, 1961, 301-316. * M. SWOBODA, Studia scaenica Plautina et Terentiana, Poznań 1966. * M. SWOBODA, De soliloquiorum in antiquo dramate ab Aeschyli temporibus usque ad Terentium adhibitorum munere scaenico, Eos 59, 1971, 57-76. * M. P. SCHMUDE, Reden—Sachstreit—Zänkereien. Untersuchungen zu Form und Funktion verbaler Auseinandersetzungen in den Komödien des Plautus und Terenz, Stuttgart 1988. * G. M. SIFAKIS, Studies in the History of Hellenistic Drama, London 1967. * B.-A. TALADOIRE, Commentaires sur la mimique et l'expression corporelle du comédien romain, Montpellier 1951. * H. VAIREL, Le subjonctif parfait de moindre actualisation dans les comédies de Plaute et de Térence, RPh 54, 1980, 122-138. * E. VOGT, Tragiker Ezechiel, in: Jüdische Schriften aus hellenistisch-römischer Zeit 4, 3, Gütersloh 1983, 115-133. * K.-U. WAHL, Sprecherbezeichnungen mit griechischen Buchstaben in den Handschriften des Plautus und Terenz, diss. Tübingen 1974. * T. B. L. WEBSTER, Studies in Later Greek Comedy, Manchester 1953. * F. WEHRLI, Motivstudien zur griechischen Komödie, Zürich and Leipzig 1936 (also on Roman comedy and on the theory of comedy). * H. WIEMKEN, Der griechische Mimus. Dokumente zur Geschichte des antiken Volkstheaters, Bremen 1972. * J. WRIGHT, *Dancing in Chains: The Stylistic Unity of the *comoedia palliata, Rome 1974. * K. ZIEGLER, Tragödie, RE 6 A 2, 1937, 1899-2075. * B. ZIMMERMANN, ed., Antike Dramentheorien und ihre Rezeption, Stuttgart 1992.

LIVIVS ANDRONICUS

Life and Dates

Roman literature was made, not born; its beginning can be dated precisely. After Rome's victory over Carthage, during the Roman Games in 240 B.C.<sup>1</sup> (16–19 September), Livius produced the first Latin drama<sup>2</sup> at Rome. Our information concerning his life is self-contradictory and unreliable. He probably came to Rome as a prisoner of war from Tarentum in Magna Graecia, a city famous for its theater; and certainly he possessed stage experience as an actor (Fest. 446 L.; Livy 7. 2. 8). During the war the Romans had learnt to appreciate the theater of South Italy. Here was the appropriate figure to present them with their own dramatic literature. He may have been employed as a tutor in the family of the Livii, who gave him his freedom. In his lectures, he treated Greek texts and the Latin texts he had himself composed. During the second consulship of Marcus Livius Salinator (207), he was commissioned by the state to compose for a choir of virgins a processional song intended to avert evil omens (Livy 27. 37. 7 ff.).<sup>3</sup> After that, Rome's fate took a turn for the better; and as a token of thanks to the poet, the collegium of writers and actors was assigned the Temple of Minerva on the <sup>1</sup> Cicero (Brut. 72) accepts this date from Atticus and Varro. Accius, however, had dated Livius' first production to 197. In modern times, an effort has been made to rehabilitate Accius' dating: H. B. MATTINGLY, The Date of Livius Andronicus, CQ 51 n.s. 7, 1957, 159–163; G. MARCONI, La cronologia di Livio Andronico, in: Atti Accad. dei Lincei No. 363, MAL 8. 12. 2, Roma 1966, 125–213; H. B. MATTINGLY, Gnomon 43, 1971, 680–687. This would make some dated plays of Plautus prior; Livius' role as pioneer, taken for granted by Horace and others, would be impossible; the development of Roman literature would have taken place with amazing speed in just a few years, and the stylistic awkwardness of Livius' fragments would not be in any way excused by their great antiquity. It would be quite unintelligible why they were transmitted. It is important to remember that Varro must certainly have studied historical documents. Accius' mistake, moreover, may be explained by his assumption that the Salinator given as the poet's patron was the victor of Sena, who had vowed games and celebrated them in 197 or 191. W. SUERBAUM (1968, 1–12; 297–300) also rejects Accius' chronology.

---

<sup>2</sup> Cassiodorus (chron. p. 128 M. on 239 B.C.) is the first to speak of a tragedy and a comedy.

<sup>3</sup> The attempt to claim his authorship also for the carmen saeculare of 249, made most recently by R. VERDIÈRE (Horace et Livius Andronicus, Latomus 42, 1983, 383–387; cf. also U. CARRATELLO 1979, 23–26), rests on hypotheses and is already treated critically by E. FRAENKEL 1931, 600.

Aventine as a center for assembly and worship. In Rome, therefore, it was not Dionysus but Minerva who became the tutelary deity of actors. As goddess of arts and crafts, she was also the patroness of the very ancient collegium tibicinum and of other musical guilds. This meeting-place well suited the musical character of the old Roman art of the stage.<sup>1</sup>

Thus the founder of Roman literature also succeeded in winning for it public recognition. He must have died soon after. The fact that in 200 B.C. another poet<sup>2</sup> composed the expiatory hymn is not however a compelling proof of this.

Survey of Works

Epic: Odusia.

Tragedies: partly Trojan themes (Equos Troianus, Achilles, Aegisthus, Aiæ mastigophoros), partly with women in leading roles (Andromeda, Antiopa [reported by Nonius 170. 12 M. = 250 L.; disputed by editors], Danae, Hermiona, Ino, as well as Tereus and Achilles).

Prætextæ (?): cf. G. MARCONI, Attilio Regolo tra Andronico ed Orazio, RCCM 9, 1967, 15–47 (free reconstruction).

Comedies: Gladiolus, Ludius, Verpus<sup>3</sup> (Latin titles).

Lyric: Hymn of Atonement (Livy 27. 37. 7).

Sources, Models, and Genres

As was to become the practice of the pioneers of Roman literature, Livius tried his hand at several genres: drama, epic, lyric.

The foundation of a Roman drama that followed the precedent set in Magna Graecia was not a creatio ex nihilo. As early as 364, Etruscan stage artists had been invited to Rome, and the technique and vocabulary of the Roman theater shows Etruscan influence. Livius Andronicus was the first to write Latin plays with a self-contained action, conforming to Greek requirements for the drama. He thereby transplanted Greek structures into a medium where Italian, Etruscan, and Hellenistic stage practices mingled. In his comedies, to which he already had given Latin titles, he followed Hellenistic originals. In tragedy some of his models may have been classical; he viewed them, however, through the prism of the Hellenistic age.

<sup>1</sup> E. J. JORY, Associations of Actors in Rome, Hermes 98, 1970, 224–253.

<sup>2</sup> P. Licinius Tegula.

<sup>3</sup> The title of Verpus was conjectured by O. RIBBECK.

In certain respects, Roman drama began by blurring differences between the Greek genres. In particular, there was no difference between the dialogue meter of tragedy and comedy; and even the rich musical adornment of comedy with solo songs is close to that of Hellenistic tragedy.<sup>1</sup>

For his epic, Livius' model was the Odyssey. This choice was determined partly by considerations of subject matter (the Odyssey was part of primitive Italian history), partly by the tradition of Hellenistic schools, where Homer was the basic author. Livius made this work accessible to the Latin public. His interpretation of the Odyssey also bears a Hellenistic stamp.

Literary Technique

It is impossible to decide whether Livius already had woven together different dramas ('contaminatio'),<sup>2</sup> nor do we know whether his Odusia had the same length as the original.

Language and Style

In harmony with precedents already available,<sup>3</sup> Livius Andronicus established much of the metrical forms of Roman literature. The decisions he made for drama were never challenged in principle during the republican period. He adapted the iambic senarius and the trochaic septenarius to the exigencies of the Latin language: to its richness in long syllables, its marked word accent, the greater autonomy of the individual word and the significance of word boundaries.

The style of the Odusia is perceptibly more solemn and archaizing than in the dramatic fragments.<sup>4</sup> While in Greece these generic differences developed historically, here they needed to be created by a conscious effort.

<sup>1</sup> E. FRAENKEL (Plautinisches im Plautus, Berlin 1922, 321-373, esp. 341 = Elementi plautini in Plauto, Firenze 1960, 307-353, esp. 324-325). This is accepted by J. H. WASZINK 1972, 870; J. BLÄNSDORF 1978, 206.

<sup>2</sup> The theory of contamination is supported by E. BICKEL, Die Skyrier des Euripides und der Achilles des Livius Andronicus, RhM 86, 1937, 1-22.

<sup>3</sup> E. FRAENKEL, Die Vorgeschichte des versus quadratus, Hermes 62, 1927, 357-370; Fraenkel deduces for this meter a preliterary stage already subject to Greek influence.

<sup>4</sup> E. FRAENKEL, 1931, 603-607.

In his choice of metaphors, Livius does not adhere timidly to his models. We see this when he compares the transitory nature of fame with the melting of ice in springtime<sup>1</sup> (Soph. Ajax 1266–1267; Liv. Andr. trag. 16–17 R.), or replaces the Homeric image ‘his knees and heart were loosed’ with the impressive phrase cor frigit prae pavore, ‘his heart froze with fear’ (frag. 16 M. = 30 Bü.). Here he is supplementing Homer from Homer (Od. 5. 297 and 23. 215–216). Livius therefore made an effort to combine fidelity both to Homer and to the Latin language. Elsewhere, he tried to avoid the ‘mistakes’ which learned Homeric criticism had condemned. A new analysis of his way of working in the light of modern theories of translation has shown that he did not indulge in arbitrary alterations, but was constantly guided by his original and by his public’s mental horizon.<sup>2</sup> Hellenistic artistic judgment and Romanization here went hand in hand.

When choosing for his epic a ‘native’ meter, the saturnian,<sup>3</sup> Livius surely again had his readers in mind. Naevius would use the same meter, and it was left to Ennius to replace it with the hexameter. The old dispute over the accentual or quantitative nature of the saturnian may have been wrongly stated. Today it is more commonly believed that the saturnian, perhaps Celtic and Roman in origin,<sup>4</sup> developed into a quantitative meter in accordance with changes in the Latin word accent and the increasing prevalence of Greek influence. This can already be seen in Livius, who, after all, was Greek. At the same time, the Roman tendency towards clear verbal structure<sup>5</sup> was evident. Each saturnian consisted of a ‘rising’ and a ‘falling’ half, as indeed the Latin hexameter did later. Organization by means of alliteration and symmetrical correspondences is stricter in Livius than in his Homeric model: Virum mihi, Camena, insece versutum (‘Tell me, o Muse, of the cunning man’). The first and last words belong together, a point emphasized by alliteration; so do the second and the second to last. The important proper name, Camena, stands in the middle, creating a symmetrically balanced structure.<sup>6</sup> Parallelism

<sup>1</sup> With Ribbeck I read verno. An intermediate Hellenistic source may not of course be excluded. The attribution of the Ajax mastigophorus to Livius Andronicus is doubted by H. D. JOCELYN, The Tragedies of Ennius, Cambridge 1967, 179–181.

<sup>2</sup> G. BROCCIA 1974.

<sup>3</sup> See above, ‘Before Literature’ pp. 43–44; G. ERASMI 1979, 125–149.

<sup>4</sup> A. W. DE GROOT, Le vers saturnien littéraire, REL 12, 1934, 284–312.

<sup>5</sup> T. COLE, The Saturnian Verse, in: Studies in Latin Poetry, YCLS 21, 1969, 1–73.

<sup>6</sup> G. ERASMI 1979, 148.

and chiasmus also define the shape of the verse. Thus, at the very beginning of Roman literature, formal tendencies are prominent which later, and in other meters, will play a decisive part.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Livius Andronicus is a Hellenistic poeta doctus, whose poetic practice bears the stamp of literary reflection. We have already mentioned the linguistic and stylistic differentiation of genres. In calling the Muse Monetas filia ('daughter of Memory', i.e. of Mnemosyne), he has introduced into his translation a post-Homeric notion. Thus he viewed Homer in the light of the Hellenistic tradition of which he himself was a member.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas II

In one of those remarkable coincidences which occur when cultures are fertilized by other more advanced cultures, the dramas of Livius simultaneously transmitted to the Romans ancient myth and the contemporary philosophy which had taken its place. At first, myth was accepted as history. It is no accident, therefore, that in drama Trojan subjects prevailed, recalling the alleged origin of the Romans (Achilles, Aegisthus, Equos Troianus). For epic, the Odyssey was chosen because some episodes took place in Italy and Sicily. The necessity of adapting material to suit a new audience entailed therefore a process of Romanization. Although striving to be faithful to his text in principle, Livius transposed religious elements into Roman sacral language: sancta puer Saturni filia regina (frg. 14 M. = 12 Bü.). The ritual tone is so evident here that some have tried to assign this fragment to the choir of maidens. The names of Greek gods are Latinized. The Muse becomes Camena, the Greek goddess of fate Moira becomes Morta, Mnemosyne is Moneta. Roman religious feeling clashed with the Greek fashion of treating men as gods. So, the 'adviser equal to the gods' is simply in Livius called 'the excellent, distinguished man' (fr. 10 M. = 10 Bü.).

---

<sup>1</sup> H. FRÄNKEL, Griechische Bildung in altrömischen Epen, Hermes 67, 1932, 306; cf. also S. MARIOTTI 1952, 2nd ed. 1986, 20–23. G. BROCCIA (1974, 51–75) rejects the notion that Livius consulted the Homeric scholia.

Livius' poetry had more to do than affirm national greatness. It had the task of illuminating and encouraging reflection. He has numerous plays with women in leading roles (Andromeda, Danaë, Hermiona, Ino). The Achilles, whose protagonist was Deidamia, also belongs to this group, as does the Tereus, which had two strong feminine roles. The Sophoclean model contained a moving lament for the lot of women (Soph. frag. 524 N. 2nd ed.). So even the oldest Roman author has certain 'modern' features. In the Ajax we see some skepticism about the glory of valor (virtus, 16–17 R.). In his comedy Gladiolus a boastful soldier was probably ridiculed, and a fragment from an unknown context speaks a rather unheroic and good Epicurean language: 'I have eaten, drunk, played to my satisfaction' (com. 4–5 R.; cf. Plaut. Men. 1141–1142).

Influence

Even for Horace, who set no store by Livius, his name denoted the beginning of Roman literature (epist. 2. 1. 61–62). He was the creator of artistic translation as a valid literary form. It is not by accident that the achievement of a translator stands at the beginning of the first 'derived' literature. Just as Roman literature discovered its identity through Greek, so would European literature find its own way in the light of the Christian and ancient tradition.

In some respects Livius is the paradigm of an early Roman poet. He was not from the city itself. Indeed he was a foreigner, and owed his rise only to his intellectual achievement. Finally, he gained for literature, in a city which had been alien to such fancies, the right of domicile. Universality is the privilege of pioneers. Unlike most of his Greek colleagues, Livius could not afford to limit his literary activity to a single genre.

His establishment of dramatic meters and his differentiation of the linguistic levels of epic and drama remained definitive. His comedies were the first to be forgotten, since original talents like those of Naevius and Plautus left him behind. His tragedies were somewhat better known even later, although these, too, were overshadowed by those of Ennius, Accius, and Pacuvius. It was his Odusia that held its ground the longest. As a school textbook it was still beaten into the young Horace by the stern Orbilius (epist. 2. 1. 69–71). After the appearance of the Aeneid the Odusia, like all republican epic, gradually fell into oblivion. Fragments are preserved for us in Varro, Festus, Nonius, Virgilian scholiasts and grammarians. Livius prepared the way for greater things. His success was that of the good teacher: to make himself dispensable.

Editions: R. et H. STEPHANUS (ESTIENNE), Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum quorum opera non extant, Genevae 1564. * E. H. WARMINGTON (TTr), ROL 2, 1–43. * Odusia: S. MARIOTTI (in his book, s. below); M. LENCHANTIN DE GUBERNATIS (crit. T), Torino 1937; FPL 7–17 MOREL, 9–18 BÜCHNER, s. also FPL, ed. J. BLÄNSDORF, Stuttgart 1995 and E. COURTNEY (in our list of abbreviations). * Scaen.: O. RIBBECK, TRF 2nd ed., 1–6; TRF 3rd ed., 1–7; CRF 2nd ed., 3; CRF 3rd ed., 3–5. ** Lexicon: A. CAVAZZA, A. RESTA Barrile, Lexicon Livianum et Naevianum, Hildesheim 1981. ** Bibl.: H. J. METTE, Die römische Tragödie und die Neufunde zur griechischen Tragödie (esp. for 1945–1964), Lustrum 9, 1964, 5–211, esp. 13; 41–50. * G. ERASMI 1975 (s. below).

W. BEARE, When Did Livius Andronicus Come to Rome?, CQ 34, 1940, 11–19. * J. BLÄNSDORF, Voraussetzungen und Entstehung der römischen Komödie, in: Das römische Drama, ed. by E. LEFÈVRE, Darmstadt 1978, 91–134, esp. 125–127. * G. BROCCIA, Ricerche su Livio Andronico epico, Padova 1974. * K. BÜCHNER, Livius Andronicus und die erste künstlerische Übersetzung der europäischen Kultur, SO 54, 1979, 37–70. * U. CARRATELLO, Livio Andronico, Roma 1979. * H. DAHLMANN, Studien zu Varro De poetis, AAWM 1962, 10, Mainz 1963, 28–39; 43–57. * G. ERASMI, Studies on the Language of Livius Andronicus, Ann Arbor, Michigan 1975, repr. London 1982 (bibl.). * G. ERASMI, The Saturnian and Livius Andronicus, Glotta 57, 1979, 125–149. * E. FLORES, Sull'interpretazione del fig. 18 M.<sup>2</sup> e le dimensioni dell'Odusia di Andronico, in: Filologia e forme letterarie, Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, 9–19. * E. FLORES, L'Odyssea di Omero e la traduzione di Livio Andronico, Lexis 4, 1989, 65–75. * E. FRAENKEL, Livius 10a, RE suppl. 5, 1931, 598–607. * E. J. JORY, Associations of Actors in Rome, Hermes 98, 1970, 224–253. * U. KNOCHÉ, Über die Aneignung griechischer Poesie im älteren Rom, Gymnasium 65, 1958, 321–341, esp. 325–334. * J. ŁANOWSKI, Histoire des fragments des tragédies de Livius Andronicus, Eos 51, 1961, 65–77. * Leo, LG 55–75. * G. MARCONI, Atilio Regolo tra Andronico ed Orazio, in: RCCM 9, 1967, 15–47. * S. MARIOTTI, Livio Andronico e la traduzione artistica. Saggio critico ed edizione dei frammenti dell'Odyssea, Milano 1952, Urbino 2nd ed. 1986. * R. PERNA, Livio Andronico, Bari 1978. * W. SCHEITTE, Das römische Epos, Wiesbaden 1978, 15–18. * A. SEELE, Römische Übersetzer. Nöte, Freiheiten, Absichten. Verfahren des literarischen Übersetzens in der griechisch-römischen Antike, Darmstadt 1995. * W. SUERBAUM, Untersuchungen zur Selbstdarstellung älterer römischer Dichter. Livius Andronicus, Naevius, Ennius, Hildesheim 1968, 1–12; 297–300. * W. SUERBAUM, Zum Umfang der Bücher in der archaischen lateinischen Dichtung, ZPE 92, 1992, esp. 168–173. * I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975, 31–50. * A. TRAINA, Vortit barbare. Le traduzioni poetiche da Livio Andronico a Cicerone, Roma 1970, 10–28. * J. H. WASZINK, Tradition and Personal Achievement in Early Latin Literature, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 13, 1960, 16–33. * J. H. WASZINK, Zum Anfangsstadium der römischen Literatur, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 869–927.

NAEVIUS

Life and Dates

Gnaeus Naevius came from Campania and fought on the Roman side in the First Punic War. His debut as a dramatist was not long after that of Livius Andronicus (235 or 231<sup>1</sup> B.C.), but with his comic talent he soon outdid his predecessor. His fearless ridicule did not draw a line even at Scipio, who had been caught by his father in a compromising situation and was marched home in some disarray (com. 108–110 R.). A bitter feud with the influential Metelli<sup>2</sup> is alleged to have been provoked by his line ‘It is by fate [without personal merit] that men like Metellus become consuls at Rome’. As the consular fasti show, where for long only a few gentile names predominate, Naevius’ keen glance had recognized a basic flaw of Roman politics. After such an outburst, it is not surprising to find the poet sitting meditatively in jail (cf. Plautus Mil. 210–212). Particular plays which contain placatory utterances do not of course for that reason need to have been composed in prison, in spite of Gellius (3. 3. 15). Naevius died at the end of the 3rd century in Utica. Perhaps things had become too dangerous for him in Rome.

The Bellum Poenicum was a significant epic in its day. Naevius composed it while looking back on his own earlier wartime experience, and it owed its origin to great historical events. The First Punic War brought about the conquest of Sicily and established the unity of Italy. The new identity forged in this way found its artistic expression in Naevius' epic.

<sup>1</sup> In favor of 231: G. D’ANNA, Contributo alla cronologia dei poeti latini arcaici, III. Quando esordi Cn. Nevio?, RIL 88, 1955, 301–310.

<sup>2</sup> Criticism of the biographical tradition is expressed by H. B. MATTINGLY, Naevius and the Metelli, Historia 9, 1960, 414–439 (with bibl.); see also T. FRANK, Naevius and Free Speech, AJPh 48, 1927, 105–110; H. D. JOCELYN, The Poet Cn. Naevius, P. Cornelius Scipio, and Q. Caecilius Metellus, Antichthon 3, 1969, 32–47.

The birth of drama at Rome became possible, once its citizens felt the need for a cultural life of their own in the Greek manner. Greek works of art had reached Rome as part of the spoils from South Italy and Sicily, called forth new desires and interests, and created an atmosphere favorable to the rise of literature. In comedy Naevius, whose talent was also fed from ancient Italian sources, marks a first high point.

Survey of Works

Epic: Bellum Poenicum.

Tragedies: Aesiona (Hesiona), Danaë, Equos Troianus, Hector proficiscens, Iphigenia, Lucurgus, Andromacha (Serv. georg. 1. 266, conjecture).

Praetextae: Clastidium, Lupus-Romulus (perhaps two plays), Veii (not certain).<sup>1</sup>

Comedies: Acontizomenos, Agitatoria, Agrypnuntes, Appella (not certain), Ariolus, Astiologa, Carbonaria, Chlamydaria, Colax, Commotria, Corollaria, Dementes, Demetrius, Dolus, Figulus, Glaucoma, Gymnasticus, Lampadio, Nagido, (Nautae), Nervolaria, Paelex, Personata, Proiectus, Quadrigeniti (Quadrigemini?), Stalagmus, Stigmatias, Tarentilla, Technicus, Testicularia, Tribacelus, Triphallus, Tunicularia.

Other Works: Satura (not certain).

The Structure of the Bellum Poenicum

On the one hand, in the 1st book, an historical event of 263 B.C. is attested (fig. 32 M. = 28 Bü.). On the other, Naevius demonstrably spoke in the 1st and 3rd books of events connected with Aeneas. It would be adventurous to change the traditional book numbers, since such a 'method' undermines the only foundation on which alone we can proceed. If the traditional numbers, however, are to be preserved, it is almost inevitable to assume that Naevius introduced earlier history as an excursus. This is a regular procedure in epic (cf. the narratives of Ulysses) and also in the historical monograph, two types of tradition we are concerned with here. Furthermore, this assumption dispenses with the difficult problem of what happened to the half millennium lying between Romulus and Naevius' own time in a work by a writer allegedly following chronological order.

We do not know how the prehistory was introduced. The point of departure was probably furnished by the description of a work of art. It is likely that Naevius in a first section treated events down to 261 B.C., the year in which Agrigentum was captured by the Romans. This event marked a significant break, in that it allowed for the first time a proper assessment of the conflict and so prompted a retrospective glance. The Giants mentioned by Naevius were to be seen on the temple of Zeus at Agrigentum, together with illustrations from the Trojan War;<sup>1</sup> a mention of these works of art was perfectly suitable to form a transition to prehistory. As early as the 1st book, Aeneas and his father left Troy, accompanied by their womenfolk and comrades (4 and 5 M. = 5 and 6 Bü.). As in the 1st book of the Aeneid, Venus conversed with Jupiter during a storm at sea (13 M. = 14 Bü.) and Aeneas comforted his companions (16 M. = 13 Bü.).

<sup>1</sup> L. ALFONSI, Una praetexta Veii?, RFIC 95, 1967, 165-168.

The 2nd book began with an assembly of the gods. The action probably included the encounter between Aeneas and Dido.<sup>2</sup> It is possible that Dido's curse (Aen. 4. 625) derives from Naevius. The prediction of a future avenger has no direct structural function in the Aeneid, whereas in Naevius it would form a bridge between a mythical episode and the historical framework (Hamilcar). In any case, the mythical past served as a basis for the understanding of the present. In principle, therefore, Naevius behaved in exactly the same way as later Roman historians who projected many a problem of their own time back into earlier periods.

The 3rd book dealt with the foundation of Rome. Romulus made his appearance as Aeneas' grandson (25 M. = 27 Bü.). The last four books were concerned with other events of the First Punic War, each one covering about five years. It was left to the scholar Octavius Lampadio to divide the Bellum Poenicum into seven books (2nd century B.C.). The overall length of approximately 4000 to 5000 verses recalls the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius and fulfills Aristotle's requirement that a modern epic should occupy the scope of a tragic trilogy (poet. 24, 1459 b 20).<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. FRÄNKEL 1935, 59–72, who, however, still proceeds without assuming that there was an inserted episode; W. STRZELECKI 1935, 10; idem, ed. xxii; A. KLOTZ, Zu Naevius' Bellum Poenicum, RhM 87, 1938, 190–192; archaeological literature on the temple is found in H. T. ROWELL, The Original Form of Naevius' Bellum Punicum, AJPh 68, 1947, 21–46, esp. 34, note 33. By contrast W. WIMMEL, Vergil und das Atlantenfragment des Naevius, WS 83, 1970, 84–100, believes that the motifs described in the Fragment may have been found on a gift made by Aeneas to Dido.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. 6 M. = 17 Bü.; 10 M. = 19 Bü.; 23 M. = 20 Bü. In favor of a Dido episode in Naevius, cf. R. GODEL, Virgile, Naevius et les Aborigènes, MH 35, 1978, 273–282. Since Lipsius, Dido has been taken for the questioner in fig. 23 M. = 20 Bü.; so also E. PARATORE, Ancora su Nevio, Bellum Poenicum, fig. 23 MOREL, in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 224–243.

<sup>3</sup> S. MARIOTTI, La struttura del Bellum Punicum di Nevio, in: Studi in onore di G. FUNAIOLI, Roma 1955, 221–238; on the subdivision into books: W. SUERBAUM, ZPE 92, 1992, 153–173.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Just like Livius Andronicus, Naevius does not limit himself to a single genre.

In epic his historical subject alone shows that he stood in the Hellenistic tradition. At the same time he already held a dialogue with his Latin predecessor Livius Andronicus. He transcended myth with the aid of history, replacing Ulysses with Aeneas, and combining in a single poem a Roman 'Odyssey' with a Roman 'Iliad'.<sup>1</sup> He drew his subject matter from his own memory, but certainly also from Roman reports. His relationship to Fabius Pictor<sup>2</sup> is controversial; in addition, Philinos of Acragas, who favored the Carthaginians, may occasionally have provided material.<sup>3</sup> As a source for the legends of the origin of Rome, apart from oral tradition, Timaeus of Tauromenium<sup>4</sup> has also been suggested.

His comedies were highly esteemed. They were in the tradition of New and late Middle Comedy, but derived their comic power from native sources. The subject matter of his few tragedies is based partly on Aeschylus (Hector proficiscens, Lycurgus) and Euripides (Iphigenia). Some of them appear in rivalry with tragedies of Livius Andronicus (Equos Troianus, Danaë).

Naevius was not only the creator of the historical epic, but also of the historical drama at Rome. Corresponding to the official garb of the Roman magistrates, the toga praetexta, this genre was called fabula praetexta or praetextata. His Clastidium dealt with the victory of Marcellus over the Gallic chieftain Viridumarus (222 B.C.). Another play seems to have taken Romulus as its theme.<sup>5</sup>

Occasionally a satyra by Naevius is cited (frg. 62 M. = 61 Bü.), which it is now impossible to reconstruct. The record of this work looks suspicious, since in the quotation the word Saturnium is found, and therefore in satura may be the result of a dittography.<sup>6</sup> However, a satura would fit well with our picture of Naevius (cf. Ideas, below).

<sup>1</sup> W. SCHEFFER, Das römische Epos, Wiesbaden 1978, 18.

<sup>2</sup> F. BÖMER, Naevius und Fabius Pictor, SO 29, 1952, 34–53; F. ALTHEIM, Naevius und die Annalistik, FS J. FRIEDRICH, Heidelberg 1959, 1–34; R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos . . . bis Vergil, Heidelberg 1976, 108, n. 53; 116; 120.

<sup>3</sup> F. JACOBY, FGHist 2 D, Berlin 1930, 598 (commentary on no. 174).

<sup>4</sup> F. NOACK, Die erste Aeneis Vergils, Hermes 27, 1892, 407–445, esp. 437.

<sup>5</sup> V. TANDOI, Donato e la Lupus de Nevio, in: Poesia latina in frammenti, Miscellanea filologica, Genova 1974, 263–273.

<sup>6</sup> The existence of a Satyra is supported by I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römi-

Literary Technique

Naevius' independence in his treatment of his models is proved by Terence's testimony (Andria 15–19) that he contaminated (combined) plays. An important element in his literary technique was his use of Roman color. The titles of comedies were partly Latinized, as already found in Livius Andronicus. In doing this, Naevius liked to employ the suffix -aria, for example, Corollaria (garland comedy), Tunicularia (shirt comedy). The formation of these words resembles that found in the names of laws, such as lex agraria, although in the case of such a living suffix there need have been no conscious reference to Roman legal language.<sup>1</sup> The author speaks, without the slightest hesitation, of favorite Roman pork dishes (com. 65 R.), of Italian funeral mourners (com. 129 R.), and of the niggardly spirit at cities close to Rome like Praeneste and Lanuvium (com. 21–24 R.). This has led to the supposition that he was also the inventor of the comedy set at Rome, the togata. The argument is not compelling, however, since Plautus too, in spite of the Greek dress of his plays, alluded to Roman circumstances.

Another typically Roman feature is the lack of any fundamental metrical differences between the various types of drama.

Language and Style

His tragic and comic verses followed the same rules and displayed the same alliterations and repetitions of related words. The style of comedy known to us from Plautus had already been formed by Naevius.<sup>2</sup> Naevius' rhythms were more complex than in the New Comedy, and here we see a characteristic feature of the Roman stage which recurs in Plautus. The Roman habit of turning tragic recitatives into lyric had probably already begun with Livius.<sup>3</sup>

Naevius' handling of the language of epic and drama varies in the same way as that of Livius. Within the Bellum Poenicum it has become customary to distinguish two further stylistic levels. The mythological and sacral episodes are artistic and full of alliteration and assonance, schen Lyrik, Szeged 1975, 56–58; see now also E. FLINTOFF 1988 (appealing but conjectural).

---

<sup>1</sup> Contrary to E. FRAENKEL 1935, 632.

<sup>2</sup> E. FRAENKEL 1935, esp. 628–631.

<sup>3</sup> E. FRAENKEL 1935, 632–634.

while the historical parts are unpretentiously written in the style of a chronicle. In the first case, we read bicorpores Gigantes magnique Atlantes, 'two-bodied Giants and mighty Atlases' (19 M. = 8 Bü.). In the second, Manius Valerius consul partem exerciti in expeditionem ducit, 'Manius Valerius the consul leads a part of his army on an expedition' (32 M. = 3 Bü.). However, this difference must not be exaggerated. It is precisely the language of the historical parts that recalls the simple dignity of Roman triumphal inscriptions.<sup>1</sup> This means that the notion of an 'elevated chronicle style'<sup>2</sup> requires revision. As in ancient Roman historical pictures and sculptures, reality as such seems so meaningful that adornment is superfluous (giving rise to what has been called the 'Roman factual manner'). Moreover, the artistic diction is not limited to the mythical sections, nor simple diction to the historical.<sup>3</sup> We cannot conclude, then, that a repeated change of style between episode and framing narrative was impossible. The style may have changed more often, and with less abruptness, than previously supposed.

Pioneering features of Roman epic in Naevius are his Latinization of Homeric compound adjectives, his preference for the present tense in narrative and his efforts towards a specific syntax of epic narrative.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

It has been conjectured that Naevius dealt with literary theory in his comic prologues, which would make him in this regard the predecessor of Terence.<sup>4</sup> The fragment of the Bellum Poenicum concerned with the Muses might also suggest that Naevius spoke of his poetic mission.<sup>5</sup> His epitaph, which may be authentic, illustrates his pride in his poetry, particularly his linguistic achievement. In an autobiographical remark in the Bellum Poenicum, Naevius presents himself as a

---

<sup>1</sup> E. FRAENKEL 1935, 639; see on this also FRAENKEL'S Plautinisches im Plautus, Berlin 1922, 236-240; Elementi plautini in Plauto, Firenze 1960, 228-231 and 428-429.

<sup>2</sup> LEO, LG 80.

<sup>3</sup> Excellent remarks by U. HÜBNER, Zu Naevius' Bellum Poenicum, Philologus 116, 1972, 261-276.

<sup>4</sup> SUERBAUM, Unters. 28-29 and 8; I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975, 54-56 argues against the genuineness of Naevius' epitaph.

<sup>5</sup> J. LATACZ, Zum 'Musenfragment' des Naevius, WJA NF 2, 1976, 119-134.

Roman soldier and eyewitness, thus conferring legitimacy on himself as a writer of history.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas II

Naeivius emphasizes the links of the individual both with the community (cf. 42 M. = 50 Bü.) and insists on the importance of public religious ceremonies (24 and 31 M. = 26 and 35 Bü.). For example, he underlines the role of Anchises as a prophet (3 M. = 25 Bü.). In his epic as in his drama, myth forms the background for a Roman sense of mission. It is no coincidence that many of the titles of his plays are taken from the Trojan cycle. In the Bellum Poenicum the Aeneas theme forms the beginning of Roman history, and it is in it that the foundation is laid for the subsequent historical conflicts. This appeal to primitive history did not stem from a mere striving for completeness in the manner of a chronicle, since elsewhere he had enough courage to countenance omissions. In any case, he could not treat the time between Romulus and the beginning of the First Punic War.

Along with such efforts to support morals and official religion with 'Greek' features such as myth and poetry, we also find more modern tones. In his epic Naeivius showed a psychological interest which also extended to his female characters (4 M. = 5 Bü.). Many of his plays have as their titles the names of heroines: Andromacha, Danaë, Hesiona, Iphigenia. In particular, it is difficult to discover old Roman values in his comedies.<sup>2</sup> The play about which we know the most is the Tarentilla. Two young gentlemen squander their property abroad, and notably with 'the lady of Tarentum'. This means that the setting cannot have been in Tarentum, since there the description 'Tarentilla' would have had no particular distinctive value. When the fathers arrive unexpectedly, the talented young lady succeeds in enchanting all four gentlemen. There is a noticeable absence of any victory of morality; a moral lesson must have occurred at the end, directed however, contrary to Roman convention, not at the young men, but at their fathers.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Suerbaum, Unters. 26.

<sup>2</sup> W. HOFMANN 1981, 228-235 notes the Roman element in Naeivius' comedy especially in its preference for moral ideas.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Plaut. Bacch. 1206-1210; Merc. 983-986 and 1015-1016; J. WRIGHT, Naeivius, Tarentilla Frg. 1, RhM 115, 1972, 239-242 (but hic cannot mean 'in Tarentum');

Among the tragedies, the Lycurgus deserves particular attention, since here the opponents of the worship of Dionysus were assailed.<sup>1</sup> The god Liber came with his followers into the land of the Thracians. King Lycurgus ordered that the Bacchantes should be taken prisoner by the use of cunning. In spite of all warnings, the king determined to arrest Bacchus himself, whereupon the god revealed himself in all his glory, freed his worshipers and punished the rebel, bringing about the conversion of the Thracians.<sup>2</sup> It required courage to produce such a play in a city in which even some decades later official measures were taken against the Bacchanalia. Thanks to the use of the old Latin name Liber, the official presentation of a play about Dionysus was rendered possible at Rome. The acknowledgment of Liber, a Latin and plebeian god, was something dear to Naevius' heart: Libera lingua loquemur ludis Liberalibus ('We shall speak with a free tongue at the festival of Liber', com. 112 R.). This is one further proof of the intellectual unity in the work of a man who disliked tyrants of every kind. It also fits the theory that Naevius excelled in the typically Roman genre of satire.<sup>3</sup>

Influence

Naevius' epitaph states that after his death men at Rome had forgotten to speak Latin, and this indicates how highly his contemporaries esteemed his linguistic achievement. Cicero compared Naevius' art with that of the sculptor Myron (Brut. 75). In the Brutus, one of the speakers says that, in listening to this or that Roman lady of the older generation, he thought he was overhearing Plautus or Naevius

---

M. VON ALBRECHT, Zur Tarentilla des Naevius, MH 32, 1975, 230-239; essential discussion in M. BARCHIESI 1978.

<sup>1</sup> A. PASTORINO, Tropaeum Liberi. Saggio sul Lycurgus di Nevio e sui motivi dionisiaci nella tragedia latina arcaica, Arona 1955; H.-J. METTE, Die römische Tragödie und die Neufunde zur griechischen Tragödie (esp. for 1945-1964), Lustrum 9, 1964, esp. 51-54; S. MARIOTTI, Una similitudine omerica nel Lycurgus di Nevio, in: Poesia latina in frammenti. Miscellanea filologica, Genova 1974, 29-34.

<sup>2</sup> The theme recalls the Bacchae of Euripides. It had already been treated by Aeschylus, a tragic poet who may have served as a model also for the Danaë of Livius Andronicus and who in Italy received attention because of his links with Sicily; cf. J. H. WASZINK 1972, 925 and 894-895. An argument in favor of a Hellenistic source is found in G. MORELLI, Il modello greco della Danae di Nevio, in: Poesia latina in frammenti. Miscellanea Filologica, Genova 1974, 85-101.

<sup>3</sup> E. FLINTOFF 1988.

(de orat. 3. 45). This is meant to show the greater linguistic conservatism and purism of women. It also proves that the language of Naevius passed as a model of pure, although somewhat old-fashioned, Latin.

Plautus and Virgil outdid Naevius, and so his works became dispensable and disappeared. There was an edition of the Bellum Poenicum which was not divided into books. Another edition, divided into seven books, goes back to the republican grammarian Lampadio, though whether he made a critical version of the text is unknown. We owe quotations, for example, to the commentary on Virgil ascribed to Probus. The fragments in Macrobius and in Servius Danielis, valuable for their content, had been probably preserved by the famous grammarian Aelius Donatus. Lexicographers such as Nonius and grammarians like Priscian no longer had the whole work available. Their knowledge was limited to individual lines whose interconnection is often mysterious.

Virgil was still familiar with the Republican tragedians. His Aeneid certainly owed some stimuli to the Equos Troianus of Naevius. Above all, Virgil reversed the plan of the Bellum Poenicum. There, history formed the main action, and myth its background. The Aeneid takes place in mythical time, while history appears as prophecy. Virgil owes to Naevius particular scenes and in general the idea of linking a Roman 'Odyssey' with an 'Iliad', and perhaps even the mythological motivation of the primeval enmity of Rome and Carthage.<sup>1</sup> After the oppressive linguistic abundance of Ennius, Virgil rediscovered at a new level a way to approach the elegant dignity of language which had been a distinguishing mark of Naevius.

Our knowledge of Naevius' comedies depends in the last analysis on Varro, on Remmius Palaemon, who was active under Tiberius and Claudius, and on the archaizers of the 2nd century A.D. To the Middle Ages, Naevius seems to have been known only as a writer of comedies. The humanists assembled Naevius' fragments, though for a long time he was obscured by Ennius. The interest of the romantic period in the 'primitive' Naevius, by contrast with the 'Greek' Ennius, gave a fresh impetus to scholarship. Today the effort should be made to measure Naevius by the standards of his own time, and to evaluate his conscious artistry and the aspects of his achievement which prepared the way for the future.

<sup>1</sup> B. G. NIEBUHR, Vorträge über römische Geschichte, ed. by M. ISLER, vol. 1, Berlin 1846, 17; G. LUCK, Naevius and Vergil, ICS 8, 1983, 267-275.

With Naevius, for the first time a poet of strong individual character entered Roman literature. From his own contemporary experience, he founded Roman historical epic and the praetexta. One achievement of Naevius was to put Homeric compound adjectives into Latin, though it would be left to Ennius to master the hexameter. The linguistic creativity of his comedies points ahead to Plautus.

Editions: R. and H. STEPHANUS (ESTIENNE), Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum, quorum opera non extant, Geneva 1564, 214–237. * E. V. MARMORALE, Naevius poeta. Introd. bibliogr., testo dei frammenti e commento, Firenze (1945), 3rd ed. 1953. * E. H. WARMINGTON (TTr), ROL 2, London 5th ed. 1961, 46–155. * Scaen.: TRF 2nd ed., 6–14; TRF 3rd ed., 7–17; CRF 2nd ed., 5–31; CRF 3rd ed., 6–35. * Bellum Poenicum: W. MOREL, FPL, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1927, 17–29. * K. BÜCHNER, FPL, Leipzig 1982, 20–40; s. now J. BLÄNSDORF, FPL, Stuttgart 1995 and E. COURTNEY (s. our list of abbreviations). * S. MARIOTTI, Il Bellum Poenicum e l'arte di Nevio. Saggio con edizione dei frammenti del Bellum Poenicum, Roma 1955. * M. BARCHIESI, Nevio epico. Storia, interpretazione, edizione critica dei frammenti, Padova 1962. * L. (= W.) STRZELECKI, Lipsiae 1964. * Praetextae: L. PEDROLI, Fabularum praetextarum quae extant, Genova 1954, 67–68 (T); 113 (C). * G. DE DURANTE, Le Fabulae praetextae, Roma 1966, 11–18; 48–51. * Separate edition: L. DI SALVO, Naevianae Danaë's fragmenta, in: Studi noniani 2, Genova 1972, 61–66. ** Lexicon: A. CAVAZZA, A. RESTA BARRILE, Lexicon Livianum et Naevianum, Hildesheim 1981. ** Bibl.: H. J. METTE, Die römische Tragödie und die Neufunde zur griechischen Tragödie (esp. for 1945–1964), Lustrum 9, 1964, 13–14; 50–54.

M. VON ALBRECHT, Naevius' Bellum Poenicum, in: E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979, 15–32. * M. BARCHIESI 1962, s. editions. * M. BARCHIESI, La Tarentilla rivisitata. Studi su Nevio comico, Pisa 1978. * V. BUCHHEIT, Vergil über die Sendung Roms. Untersuchungen zum Bellum Poenicum und zur Aeneis, Heidelberg 1963. * K. BÜCHNER, Der Anfang des Bellum Poenicum des Naevius, in: K.B., Humanitas Romana. Studien über Werke und Wesen der Römer, Heidelberg 1957, 13–34. * K. BÜCHNER, Das Naeviusproblem. Mythos und Geschichte, in: K.B., Resultate römischen Lebens in römischen Schriftwerken (= Studien zur römischen Literatur, vol. 6), Wiesbaden 1967, 9–25. * K. BÜCHNER, Römische Geschichte und Geschichte der römischen Literatur, in: K.B., Römische Prosa (= Studien zur römischen Literatur, vol. 9), Wiesbaden 1978, 1–26, on Naevius pp. 1–3 (first in ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 759–780). * H. CANCIK, Die republikanische Tragödie, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 308–347. * E. FLINTOFF, Naevius and Roman Satire, Latomus 47, 1988, 593–603. * E. FRAENKEL, Naevius, RE suppl. 6, 1935, 622–640. * H. FRÄNKEL, Griechische Bildung in altrömischen Epen, 2, Hermes 70, 1935, 59–72.

* R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos der Griechen und Römer bis Vergil, Studien zum historischen Epos der Antike, 1. Teil: Von Homer bis Vergil, Heidelberg 1976, 92–120. * W. HOFMANN, Die Volkstümlichkeit in der frühen römischen Komödie, Philologus 125, 1981, 228–235. * A. MAZZARINO, *Appunti sul Bellum Poenicum di Nevio*, Helikon 5, 1965, 157–158; 6, 1966, 232–236; 639–644. * O. RIBBECK, Die römische Tragödie im Zeitalter der Republik, Leipzig 1875, repr. 1968. * W. RICHTER, Das Epos des Gnaeus Naevius. Probleme der dichterischen Form, NAWG 1, 1960, 3. * W. SCHETTER, Das römische Epos, Wiesbaden 1978, 18. * L. STRZELECKI, *De Naeviano Belli Punici carmine quaestiones selectae*, Kraków 1935. * Suerbaum, Unters. 13–42. * A. TRAINA, De Naevio et Philemone, in: id., Vortit barbatae. Le traduzioni poetiche da Livio Andronico a Cicerone, Roma 1970, 37–40. * G. VILLA, Problemi dell'epos neviano. Passaggio dall'archeologia mitica alla narrazione storica, RAIB 64, 1977–1978, 1, 119–152. * J. H. WASZINK, Zum Anfangsstadium der römischen Literatur, in: ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 869–927.

ENNIUS

Life and Dates

Quintus Ennius was born in Rudiae, in southern Italy, in 239 B.C., one year after the first production of a Latin play at Rome. In him several cultural strands crossed. Ennius declared that he had three hearts, since he could speak three languages, Oscan, Greek, and Latin (Gellius 17. 17. 1). From birth he was destined to become both a mediator among old cultures and also an architect of the new. He descended from a distinguished Messapian family and undoubtedly received a careful training, especially in rhetoric and philosophy. In the theatrical city of Tarentum he became acquainted with Greek drama. He served as a mercenary in a south Italian unit of the Roman army; during his service, on Sardinia, he met Cato the Elder, who in 204 took him to Rome.<sup>1</sup> It was therefore the champion of old Roman ways who personally transmitted to Rome the virus of Greek culture. But it would be wrong to see this remarkable constellation as an irony of fate; rather, it should be considered a reason to revise the stereotype of Cato as a hater of things Greek.

<sup>1</sup> Perhaps wrongly doubted by E. BADIAN, Ennius and his Friends, in: Ennius. Sept exposés . . ., 1972, 156.

At Rome, Ennius, like Livius Andronicus before him, was active as a teacher. He commented on Greek and his own Latin works (Suet. gramm. 1), although treatises on letters and syllables, on meter and the augural discipline, which circulated under his name, were regarded as forgeries already in antiquity.<sup>1</sup> Ennius lived on the Aventine in modest circumstances, with only a servant woman to look after his needs. At the same time, he was on friendly terms with many representatives of the Roman nobility, including enemies of Cato, such as Scipio Nasica and Marcus Fulvius Nobilior. In the capacity of Hellenistic 'court poet', he followed the latter to Aetolia. Fulvius dedicated a temple to Hercules Musarum.<sup>2</sup> His son Quintus Nobilior, from whom Ennius in all probability took his praenomen, obtained for the poet Roman citizenship (Cic. Brut. 79).<sup>3</sup> Ennius celebrated the exploits of Scipio Africanus, probably after the expedition against Antiochus, in his Scipio and later in the Annales. Both his Annales and his historical dramas reflect contemporary history.

From a witty joke in the Saturae it has been concluded that Ennius suffered from gout (sat. 64 V.). However, there is no justification for believing that this illness was the cause of his death (Jerome, chron. 1849).<sup>4</sup> Ennius died in 169, after the production of his tragedy Thyestes. His ashes were taken back to his homeland and a memorial to him was placed in the tomb of the Scipios.<sup>5</sup>

After the First Punic War, Livius Andronicus had fathered Roman literature. A generation later, towards the end of the Second Punic War, Ennius arrived in Rome. Like his predecessor, on the basis of his artistic achievement alone, he won for himself and for poetry a right of residence and citizenship at Rome.

Survey of Works

Epic: Annales.

Tragedies: Achilles (Achilles Aristarchi), Ajax, Alc(u)meo, Alexander, Andromacha

<sup>1</sup> Their authenticity is defended by: F. NAGY, Der Dichter und Grammatiker Ennius, EPhK 61, 1938, 88–99.

<sup>2</sup> Cic. Arch. 27; CIL 6, 1307 = DESSAU 16; Paneg. 4 (= Eumenius, pro restaur. scholis), 7, Baehrens 121, 25–122, 5; cf. Serv. Aen. 1. 8; GROAG, RE 7. 1. 1910, 266. The Ambracia was intended for Fulvius' triumphal games.

<sup>3</sup> A different account in E. BADIEN (cited above), 185.

<sup>4</sup> So rightly A. GRILLI, Ennius podager, RFIC 106, 1978, 34–38.

<sup>5</sup> The year of death is certain; on Ennius' statue: T. DOHRN, Der vatikanische

(Andromacha aechmalotis), Andromeda, Athamas, Cresphontes, Erectheus, Eumenides, Hectoris lytra, Hecuba, Iphigenia, Medea, Medea exul (= Medea?), Melanippa, Nemea, Phoenix, Telamo, Telephus, Thyestes.

Praetextae: Ambracia, Sabinae.

Comedies: Cupiuncula, Pancratiastes.

Miscellaneous: Epicharmus, Epigrammata, Euhemerus (sacra historia), Hedyphagetica, Protrepticus (praecepta), Satura(e), Scipio (epic?), Sota.

Structure and Genesis of the Annales

Ennius' historical epic, which went under the title Annales, was published in successive groups of books, although not necessarily in triads or hexads.<sup>1</sup> Notably, books 16 to 18 were published later than the rest. The sixteenth is quoted much more frequently than the neighboring books,<sup>2</sup> and this suggests that it was the first of a separate edition.

Ennius wrote the Annales in his maturity, and later than the Hedyphagetica, which was composed after 189 B.C.<sup>3</sup> According to his own evidence, in 173–172 B.C. he was working on the 12th book. The last six books were therefore composed in the remaining three to four years of his life. This means that he must have started the 1st book at the latest in about 179 B.C.

Unlike Naevius, Ennius himself divided his work into books, following Hellenistic precedent. As the title indicates, Ennius' account was chronologically arranged. Only the First Punic War was omitted, since it had already been treated by Naevius (Cic. Brut. 76).<sup>4</sup> It is not necessary to believe in a division planned strictly into triads, although the Annales do in fact fall into groups of three books each.

The first triad dealt with early history (1) and the period of the kings (2–3). It thus depicted the creation of the Roman commonwealth. The second group (4–6) treated the early republic, that is, the conquest of Italy down to the confrontation with Carthage.<sup>5</sup> Books 7–9 described this struggle. Just like the 7th, the 10th book opened with an appeal to the Muses and a prooemium. The Macedonian War against Philip V occupied books 10 and 11. Book 12 formed a temporary conclusion. Vahlen (on Ann. 374–377; cf. praef. cxcvii) suspected that a self portrait occurred there by way of

---

Ennius und der poeta laureatus, MDAI (R) 69, 1962, 76–95; K. SCHEFOLD, Griechische Dichterbildnisse, Zürich 1965, Plate 24a.

<sup>1</sup> Hexads are postulated by A. GRILLI 1965, 34–36.

<sup>2</sup> O. SKUTSCH 1968, 20.

<sup>3</sup> O. SKUTSCH 1968, 39.

<sup>4</sup> Cicero's evidence excludes even a cursory treatment, although that is considered by VAHLEN, ed. p. clxxix and Leo, LG 168. On the problem, cf. G. ANNIBALDIS, Ennio e la prima guerra punica, Klio 64, 1982, 407–412.

<sup>5</sup> The precise contents of the 6th book are disputed: O. SKUTSCH 1987, 512–514 and T. J. CORNELL, Ennius, Annals VI. A Reply, CQ n.s. 37, 1987, 514–516.

a 'sphragis'.<sup>1</sup> But this might also have stood at the end of the 15th book. The last but one triad described the war against Antiochus (13-14) and the successful campaign of Fulvius against the Aetolians (15).

The 16th book formed a new beginning and was dedicated to the exploits of Titus Caecilius Teucer and his brother. The last two books are hardly known. A supposed continuation down to the victory of Paullus at Pydna (168 B.C.)<sup>2</sup> is contradicted by the reliably attested date of death (169) found in Cicero, who knew his Ennius well.

Sources, Models, and Genres

While the Greek tragedians each took up only a single literary genre, Ennius embraced many of them in his œuvre; as a pioneer he had to strike out in many new directions. Alongside his epic parody Hedyphagetica ('Delicatessen'), from which a few verses survive about fishes and precious fruits of the sea, there is the Pythagorean Epicharmus. The rationalist Euhemerus was the first example of artistic Latin prose, used even by an author as late as the Church father Lactantius. Among the lesser genres, Ennius found satura more congenial than comedy, of which we know only two examples. The preponderance of tragedies among his dramatic pieces corresponds to both the inclination of his own talent and the situation of the contemporary Roman theater. On the comic stage, the genius of Plautus was triumphant, while tragedy, now that Livius Andronicus and Naevius had fallen silent, had no representative. A glance at the titles of Ennius' tragedies indicates his preference for Euripides,<sup>3</sup> the 'most tragic' of all tragic poets (Arist. poet. 13. 1453a 28-30). This preference was to have important consequences for Roman literature. Reflection and doubt prevailed on the stage, and the language of poetry was adapted to rhetorical argument. The poet looked into the depths of the soul, including the soul of women. Guilt and crime were intended both to arouse a shudder and to awake human sympathy.

Aeschylus was certainly the model for the Eumenides, and in general Ennius' weighty, pathetic style recalls that of Aeschylus.<sup>1</sup> There seems to be no trace of Sophocles: the classical representative of tragedy was the most remote from Ennius.<sup>2</sup> Our poet owed a single play, the Achilles, to an older contemporary of Euripides, Aristarchus of Tegea. It is to this play that Plautus alluded at the start of the Poenulus. Ennius also made use of commentaries on the plays that he imitated.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> W. KRANZ, Sphragis, Ichform und Namensiegel als Eingangs- und Schlußmotiv antiker Dichtung, RhM 104, 1961, 3-46 and 97-124.

<sup>2</sup> So G. D'ANNA, Ancora sull'argomento degli ultimi due libri degli Annales enniani, RFIC 107, 1979, 243-251; R. REBUFFAT, Unus homo nobis cunctando restituit rem, REL 60, 1982, 153-165, argues that Ennius died in 167.

<sup>3</sup> Euripidean are: Alexander, Andromeda, Erectheus, Hecuba, Iphigenia, both Medea plays, Melanippa, Phoenix, Telephus, Thyestes and perhaps also Athamas, Alceio and Cresphontes.

As an epic poet, Ennius claimed to be a reincarnation of Homer, and in the famous story of his dream he made Homer himself tell him of this (cf. Reflections on Literature below). Nevertheless, Ennius remained far more of a Hellenistic poet<sup>4</sup> than he would like to admit. This is shown by his historical subject matter, by the philosophical and scholarly observations with which he interspersed his poem, and the loose, open structure of his epic and its lack of unity of action and hero. His personal intervention at the beginning and end is un-Homeric. Even if his Homeric dream shows perhaps Callimachean features,<sup>5</sup> in general Ennius is part of an un-Callimachean tradition of Hellenistic imitation of Homer.<sup>6</sup>

In search for the sources of his epic we must resort to conjectures. The Annales Pontificum, if Ennius did consult them systematically, could hardly have furnished interesting material for the early period. For the regal period, there was a rich Greek literature,<sup>7</sup> and the traditions of the Roman families may also have given the poet inspiration. He put the foundation of Rome about 1100 B.C., a date corresponding to Eratosthenes' date for the destruction of Troy in 1184 B.C. As Eratosthenes had done, Ennius makes Romulus the grandson of Aeneas. But in Ennius he is a son of Ilia, whereas in Eratosthenes he is the son of Ascanius.<sup>8</sup> The sources of his praetextae (the Sabine

<sup>1</sup> L. GUALANDRI, Problemi di stile enniano, Helikon 5, 1965, 390-410.

<sup>2</sup> G. CERRI, Ennio e l'Antigone di Sofocle, QUCC 29, 1978, 81-82 considers the possibility that there had been an Antigone by Ennius, influenced by Sophocles.

<sup>3</sup> LEO, LG 192; somewhat more cautious: H. D. JOCELYN, ed., 1967, 46.

<sup>4</sup> K. ZIEGLER, 1935, reissued 1966; P. WÜLFING-VON MARTITZ, Ennius als hellenistischer Dichter, in: Ennius. Sept exposés... 1972, 253-289.

<sup>5</sup> H. D. JOCELYN 1972, 1015; however, the argument about Helicon and Parnassus is misleading: s. below.

<sup>6</sup> C. O. BRINK, 1972; see also P. MAGNO, I modelli greci negli Annales di Ennio, Latomus 41, 1982, 477-491.

<sup>7</sup> E. GABBA, Considerazioni sulla tradizione letteraria sulle origini della repubblica, in: Les origines de la république romaine, Entretiens Fondation Hardt 13 (1966) 1967, 133-174.

<sup>8</sup> H. D. JOCELYN 1972, 1013.

Women and probably also Ambracia) are likewise unknown.

In both epic and tragedy, Ennius felt the need to confront his Roman predecessors. The Latin tradition of the saturnian exercised an indirect influence even on the verbal structure of the Ennian hexameter. Continuity prevails, especially in the bipartite structure of the verse, and in particular schemes of alliteration (abba; aabcc, etc.).<sup>1</sup>

The satura<sup>2</sup> must be cited as one of his most characteristic creations. The title may have been taken from lanx satura, the sacrificial offering of a mélange of fruits. This was a poetic miscellany, whose principal feature was variety. Satire in the modern sense is not totally absent (sat. 1; 12–13; 14–19; 59–62; 69–70 V.), but it does not at the outset define the essence of the genre. This work contained a wide array of disparate poems. Besides Hellenistic influences there is also a possible impact of Plautine comedy.<sup>3</sup> The question whether Ennius needed the model of Callimachus' Iamboi to inspire the inclusion of fables in his satura, such as the pretty story of the crested lark<sup>4</sup> (sat. 21–58 V.), must remain open, given that the employment of the versus quadratus in fables is not Greek. With his Contest between Death and Life (sat. 20 V.) Ennius introduced allegorical poetry to Rome, where it was destined to enjoy a long history. The weight of literary reflection in his satura reminds the reader of Callimachus.<sup>5</sup>

In his remaining minor works, no longer today considered sections of his satura, Ennius followed Hellenistic inspiration quite unambiguously, as for example in his Euhemerus, Sota, Hedyphagetica and in his Epigrams. He must have introduced the elegiac couplet to Rome. It is important to note that the authors imitated in these works came from Sicily: Epicharmus from Syracuse, Euhemerus from Messene and Archestratus from Gela. This fact illustrates the intellectual and literary significance of the conquest of Sicily by the Romans in the First Punic War.

<sup>1</sup> A. BARTALUCCI, La sperimentazione enniana dell'esametro e la tecnica del saturnio, SCO 17, 1968, 99–122.

<sup>2</sup> Each individual book may have been called a satura, and the whole collection saturae: C. W. MÜLLER, Ennius und Äsop, MH 33, 1976, 193–218 (with bibl.).

<sup>3</sup> J. H. WASZINK, Problems concerning the Satura of Ennius, in: Ennius. Sept exposés . . . 1972, 99–147.

<sup>4</sup> C. W. MÜLLER, cited above, penultimate note; F. MENNA, La ricerca dell'adiuvante. Sulla favoletta esopica dell' allodola (Enn. sat. 21–58 V. 2nd ed.; Babr. 88; Avian. 21), MD 10, 11, 1983, 105–132.

<sup>5</sup> J. H. WASZINK, cited above, penultimate note, esp. 121–130.

Literary Technique

Ennius was not in a position to create a large epic, artistically self-contained, as demanded by Aristotelian and Hellenistic criticism of Homer. This was an achievement reserved for Virgil. Nevertheless, the structure of the poem shows that he did not behave like a simple chronicler, reciting one detail after another, but on the contrary treated military campaigns as individual poetic units. Of course, we find all the features of Homeric technique: speeches, dream narratives, similes. In his use of the epic simile,<sup>1</sup> Ennius suppressed superfluous elements, and was guided more strictly by the tertium comparationis. His aim was to effect a clearer sentence structure and an energetic, antithetical division. In this he agreed with Hellenistic Homeric criticism<sup>2</sup> and showed himself as a poeta doctus.

The influence of rhetoric was stronger in his drama than in his epic,<sup>3</sup> a fact indicative of Ennius' sense of generic differences. His recasting of Greek tragedy, however, was inspired by more than a need to obey rules of rhetoric. His free adaptation took into account the peculiarities of the model as well as the idiosyncrasies of the Latin language (e.g. participial constructions were little developed in his time) and the mentality of his public.

How Ennius structured his plots, we can trace only occasionally. An analysis of Priscian's manner of quoting has established the sequence of our fragments of Ennius in the introductory scene of the Medea. The result agrees with what had to be expected from Euripides.<sup>4</sup> Ennius followed in part rational and even rationalist principles. In the prologue to the Medea, by contrast to Euripides, he presented the events in chronological sequence. Perhaps he was acquainted with scholia which criticized Euripides for the offense he had committed against chronology.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. VON KAMEKE 1926; W. RÖSER 1939; M. VON ALBRECHT, Ein Pferdegleichnis bei Ennius, Hermes 97, 1969, 333–345; id., Poesie 26–31.

<sup>2</sup> A. CLAUSING, Kritik und Exegese der homerischen Gleichnisse im Altertum, diss. Freiburg i. Br. 1913.

<sup>3</sup> O. SKUTSCH 1968, 181–190.

<sup>4</sup> H. D. JOCELYN, The Quotations of Republican Drama in Priscian's Treatise De metris fabularum Terentii, Antichthon 1, 1967, 60–69.

<sup>5</sup> He emphasizes the factual side of events and sets it off against the religious tone of his model: G. G. BIONDI, Mito o Mitopoiesi?, MD 5, 1980, 125–144, esp. 125–132.

Language and Style

Homer's adjectives normally describe permanent qualities even when (as often happens) they contradict the immediate situation. Ennius, in his use of adjectives, defined momentary observations and moods in terms which often seem to approach expressionism ('blue meadows', ann. 516 V. 2nd ed. = 537 Sk.; 'yellow sea', ann. 384 V. 2nd ed. = 377 Sk.). He also aimed at atmospheric effects, showing the sensibility of an impressionist ('flickering light', ann. 35 V. 2nd ed. = 34 Sk.; 'the foaming nostrils of a horse', ann. 518 V. 2nd ed. = 539 Sk.).

His coinages continue his assimilation of Homeric adjectives, as when he speaks of 'high-thundering' Jupiter (altitonans, ann. 541 V. 2nd ed. = 554 Sk.). Ennius invented a compound adjective like omnipotens (ann. 458 V. 2nd ed. = 447 Sk.), which would become an integral part of the language of later theology and philosophy. He replaced other compounds by constructions such as Tiberine, tuo cum flumine sancto, 'Tiber, with your hallowed stream' (ann. 54 V. 2nd ed. = 26 Sk.).<sup>1</sup> As the first virtuoso of the Latin language, he even indulged in onomatopoeic word play. Thus he described the sound of a trumpet naturalistically with taratantara (ann. 140 V. 2nd ed. = 451 Sk.), and he expanded the alliteration so typical of older Latin to seven words within a single verse, to produce a real tongue twister (ann. 109 V. 2nd ed. = 104 Sk.). At times he violently abbreviated words (do for domus, ann. 576 V. 2nd ed. = 587 Sk.; apocope), or indeed divided them in two (cere- conminuit -brum, 'he smashed the brains', ann. 609 V. 2nd = spuria 5 Sk.: tmesis). Here, to our way of thinking, Ennius transgressed the bounds of the Latin language and of good taste. Our poet, however, could appeal to the Hellenistic practice of employing unusual aspects of Homeric usage to justify novel experiments.<sup>2</sup> Lyrical features might also be recognized in the partly personal perspectives of the Annales which are quite different from the usual impersonal and timeless character of epic, and may be a further aspect of Ennian contaminatio, drawing even epic into the 'crossing of the genres' developing in Hellenistic usage.<sup>3</sup>

Ennius left a lasting mark on the Latin hexameter.<sup>4</sup> Although in

<sup>1</sup> H. B. ROSÉN, Die Grammatik des Unbelegten, Lingua 21, 1968, 359-381.

<sup>2</sup> J. E. G. ZETZEL, Ennian Experiments, AJPh 95, 1974, 137-140.

<sup>3</sup> G. SHEETS, Ennius Lyricus, ICS 8, 1983, 22-32.

<sup>4</sup> J. HELLEGOUARCH, Les structures verbales de l'hexamètre dans les Annales d'Ennius et la création du vers épique latin, Latomus 41, 1982, 743-765.

the Greek hexameter the penthemimeres and the caesura κατὰ τρίτον τροχαῖον are almost equally frequent, in its Latin counterpart already Ennius prefers the former, which occurs in 86.9% of all his hexameters. At the end of the line there is a preference for words of two or three syllables. The later development of the hexameter is simply a matter of refinements such as the increase in dactyls, especially in the first foot; the systematic avoidance of monosyllables and polysyllables at the line end; and the use of final '-s' to make position. The symmetrical positioning of words is not yet so well-established in Ennius as it will be in the Augustans, although even in this respect our poet exerts lasting influence (cf. ann. 570 V. 2nd ed. = 582 Sk. with Ovid, met. 14. 301). The artistic interchange of words belonging together also points to the future: reges per regnum statuasque sepulcraque quaerunt, / aedificant nomen, summa nituntur opum vi, ann. 411–413 V. 2nd ed. = 404–405 Sk.: 'kings aspire by their authority to statues and tombs, they build up their fame, they strive for this with might and main' (double enallage).<sup>1</sup> What the hexameter would later gain in smoothness would often mean a loss of colorfulness and power of expression. Thus Ennius was still able to catch the mood of inner uncertainty in a purely dactylic verse lacking the usual caesuras: corde capessere: semita nulla pedem stabilibat (ann. 43 V. 2nd ed. = 42 Sk.). In accordance with the difference of genre, the hexameters of the Annales are subject to stricter rules than those in the Hedyphagica.<sup>2</sup>

Ennius uses different language in epic and drama. There are more archaisms in the Annales than in the tragedies.<sup>3</sup> Strikingly enough, our poet even avoids the oblique cases of is/ea/id in the epic fragments,<sup>4</sup> or replaces them with forms of great antiquity, a practice alien to the tragedies and the prose Euhemerus. In this latter work, the usual forms of the pronoun were used to connect sentences in a way that would become customary in older Latin narrative prose. In this respect, too, Ennius set the trend. All later epic poets followed his distaste for the oblique forms of is/ea/id, while the prose writers made free use of them. This is only an example—if a particularly telling one—of the stylistic authority of the founders of Roman poetic traditions, and of that partly touching, partly amusing fidelity even

<sup>1</sup> O. SKUTSCH 1975.

<sup>2</sup> O. SKUTSCH 1968, 39. The difference is explained with reference to chronology by Timpanaro, AAHG 5, 1952, 198.

<sup>3</sup> Genitive in -ai, infinitive in -ier, gen. plural in -um rather than -orum.

<sup>4</sup> J. D. MIKALSON, Ennius' Usage of is, ea, id, HSPH 80, 1976, 171–177.

in petty matters which seems to be one of the fundamentals of cultural continuity.

For his tragedies, Ennius adopts a simpler language throughout than he does for his epic, something which is also true for Greek literature. Within tragedy, again, there are differences of style between senarii and long verses, yet even the sung parts are distanced from the loftiness of epic language. Cicero (orat. 36) cites a reader who took pleasure in reading Ennius' plays because they did not depart too far from normal linguistic usage. This marks a difference from the artificial language adopted by his successor Pacuvius.

Ennius largely exploited the rhetorical and musical features of Hellenistic and Roman tragedy: the recasting of dialogue verses (trimeters) into long verses of recitative such as septenarii and octonarii and even into lyrical monodies; the luxuriance of alliteration; the aphoristic play of antitheses (e.g. in the soldiers' chorus of the Iphigenia, trag. 195–202 J.); the heaping up of synonyms; and assonance as in Andromache's lament (trag. 80–94 J.).

Ennius raised features of Roman life to the level of poetic pictures (e.g. ann. 484–486 V. 2nd ed. = 463–465 Sk.; 84–88 V. 2nd ed. = 79–83 Sk.). He did not shrink even from bold metaphors, such as 'the shield of heaven' (trag. 189 J.). With templa caeli (ann. 49 V. 2nd ed. = 48 Sk. and elsewhere) he adopted for poetry a phrase from the language of the augurs. Close observation may be linked to effects of color and sound bordering on expressionism. Indeed, the power of Ennius' linguistic creations<sup>1</sup> opened vast perspectives for Roman literature.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Ennius' respect for Homer was part of a specific Hellenistic tradition which was not, however, Callimachean, even though his dream narrative may in fact contain Callimachean features. His self-identification with Homer finds a parallel which points towards Magna Graecia. Antipater of Sidon (2nd–1st century B.C.) said (AP 775) that Stesichorus was a reincarnation of Homer. Since Stesichorus, a citizen of Sicilian Himera, had already been mentioned along with Homer by

<sup>1</sup> I. GUALANDRI, Le componenti dello stile tragico di Ennio, SCO 14, 1965, 100–119; id., Problemi di stile Enniano, Helikon 5, 1965, 390–410.

Simonides, who died in Acragas in 468/67, it is probable that Antipater and Ennius were influenced by a common model.

The question of where the poet's dream of Homer took place has now been settled in favor of Helicon, about which all of Ennius' early imitators speak. Parnassus, mentioned in connection with Ennius' dream only by Persius and the relevant scholium, was not yet the mountain of poets in the 2nd century B.C.<sup>1</sup> At the start of the Annales, Ennius invoked the Muses and then went<sup>2</sup> to Helicon. There he dreamed of Homer, awoke and perhaps also encountered the Muses.<sup>3</sup> Homer, Hesiod, and later traditions come together in Ennius' literary world.

Ennius supported his identification with Homer by scholarly allusion to the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls; hence, philosophy was but a vehicle for him, not an end in itself. Between these two poetic existences there had been an incarnation as a peacock. The form of a bird, according to Plato (Timaeus 91D), is adequate to the character of the poet, who is free from malice, weightless and concerned with heavenly things, although naively addicted to external appearances.<sup>4</sup> Ennius clearly claimed to produce at Rome something analogous to the work of Homer in Greece.<sup>5</sup>

'Ennius, poet, hail . . .' (sat. 6 V.). Recent studies have rightly shown that this passage from the Satura is not an address by the poet to himself, but part of a symposium.<sup>6</sup> At the same time, the comparison of poetry to drinking is in harmony with the widespread metaphorical identification of Homer with a spring. The special 'candor' deduced from medullitus belongs on the other hand especially to the realm of satura.

The intended universality of Ennius reflects the Hellenistic notion of Homer's fruitful influence on every literary genre. On the relief by Archelaus of Priene (the 'Apotheosis of Homer') there appear the

<sup>1</sup> LATTE, Religionsgeschichte 224, note 3.

<sup>2</sup> Callimachus by contrast dreams of the Muses' mountain.

<sup>3</sup> J. H. WASZINK, Retractatio Enniana, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 15, 1962, 113-132.

<sup>4</sup> The peacock is chosen not only for its beauty, but also because of its connection with Samos, Pythagoras' homeland.

<sup>5</sup> Did Ennius really need to emphasize here that, in speaking to him in Latin hexameters, Homer expressly sanctioned the use of this meter in Roman epic? A. SETAIOLI, *Ennio e gli esametri latini di Omero. Una nuova testimonianza sul proemio degli Annales?*, WS 97, 1984, 137-142.

<sup>6</sup> H. D. JOCELYN, Ennius, sat. 6-7 V., RFIC 105, 1977, 131-151.

personified figures of Myth, History, Poetry, Tragedy, and Comedy. Ennius turned to good effect this Hellenistic image of Homer, and sought to realize it in a new linguistic medium.<sup>1</sup>

In calling himself dicti studiosus (φιλόλογος), thus stressing the union of literary man, scholar and poet in one person, Ennius is already professing an Alexandrianism hallowed by the Muses. Being both a creative intellectual and a reflective poet, he became a symbolic figure for the literature of Rome and Europe.

The poet sketched an unforgettable portrait of a typically Roman symbiosis of power and intellect (ann. 234–251 V. 2nd ed. = 268–285 Sk.), defining his own social role as a modest, tactful, and learned friend, worthy of the confidences of a mighty general at the end of the day.

Ideas II

Ennius' works embody both Roman and Hellenistic values. Roman reflections on the pernicious effects of idleness and the blessings of work are heard in the soldiers' chorus of the Iphigenia:<sup>2</sup> 'He who does not know how to make use of leisure has more work than the man who during work has much to do.' But the same text may also be read as a eulogy, in the Greek manner, of otium.<sup>3</sup>

Ennius follows Hellenistic patterns even when praising Roman heroes and trying to secure eternal fame for them by his poetry.<sup>4</sup> His contribution to the Scipio-legend was perhaps quite considerable,<sup>5</sup> mingled as it was with motifs of apotheosis deriving from an 'un-Roman' cult of personality.

Such developing individualism was not enough for Ennius; he went a step further in expressing his dislike for the 'rough soldier', and preferring in the Greek manner sapientia and purely verbal confrontation (doctis dictis) to the use of force. 'Foolish swine like to use force in their struggles' (ann. 105 V. 2nd ed. = 96 Sk.). This is the

<sup>1</sup> C. O. BRINK, 1972.

<sup>2</sup> K. BÜCHNER, Der Soldatenchor in Ennius' Iphigenia, GB 1, 1973, 51–67.

<sup>3</sup> O. SKUTSCH 1968, 157–165.

<sup>4</sup> O. ZWIERLEIN, Der Ruhm der Dichtung bei Ennius und seinen Nachfolgern, Hermes 110, 1982, 85–102.

<sup>5</sup> U. W. SCHOLZ, Der Scipio des Ennius, Hermes 112, 1984, 183–199, sets this eulogy of the general and soldier in the Roman tradition of the carmen triumphale. He interprets the few surviving lines as trochaic septenarii.

voice not only of Greek wisdom<sup>1</sup> but also of Roman common sense. In Rome's national epic there was no romantic exaltation of war; instead, rational values occupied central place.<sup>2</sup> Ennius also emphasized the noble and chivalrous qualities in an enemy such as Pyrrhus. In spite of all his high esteem for virtus (trag. 254–257 J.), the poet says that law is superior to courage: melius est virtute ius (trag. 155 J.).<sup>3</sup> This notion of law also contains that of fairness (aequum: cf. Cicero, off. 1. 62–65). This is a clear statement of a Roman principle of social behavior.

As for character portrayal, the poet felt less attracted to Medea's magic than to her human drama, although he by no means belittled her defects. The intensity of life, the feeling for the pathos and tragedy of the moment in Ennius are a match for the 'comedy of the moment' in his contemporary Plautus.<sup>4</sup>

In his tragedy Phoenix, probably based on the similarly titled play by Euripides, a conflict develops between father and son (trag. 254–257 J.). In Ennius, as in Euripides, Phoenix is innocent. In the Latin poet Stoic and Roman ethics converge. But while Phoenix has Stoic features, in the Telamo<sup>5</sup> the ethical interaction is more subtle. Here too a conflict arises between father and son, and once again there is false accusation and unjust condemnation. While in the rest of the tradition the son, Teucer, plays the leading role, in Ennius that falls to the father, Telamo. Teucer, half-brother of Ajax, after the return from the Trojan War, is held by his father Telamo to be partially to blame for Ajax' death. The father's character shows deep moral awareness. He accepts in the end the death of his son, since he knows that his children are mortal, and he concedes even to Teucer the right to self-defence. To this extent he is a Roman pater familias. At the same time, however, he gives expression to genuine Euripidean pessimism. He does not believe in the skill of soothsayers. In almost Epicurean style he declares that there are gods, but that they are

<sup>1</sup> H. FUCHS, Zu den Annalen des Ennius, 2. Ennius und der Krieg, MH 12, 1955, 202–205.

<sup>2</sup> E. TIFFOU, La Discorde chez Ennius, REL 45, 1967, 231–251; R. HÄUSSLER, 1976, 151–210.

<sup>3</sup> B. RIPOSATI, A proposito di un frammento dell' Hectoris lytra di Ennio, in: FS L. CASTIGLIONI, Firenze 1960, 2, 789–800.

<sup>4</sup> A. TRAINA, Pathos ed ethos nelle traduzioni tragiche di Ennio, Maia 16, 1964, 112–142 and 276–277.

<sup>5</sup> F. CAVIGLIA, Il Telamo di Ennio, ASNP 39, 1970, 469–488.

unconcerned with us (trag. 270 J.). Otherwise the good would have a good life and the wicked a bad one (265 J.). The brusque attack on soothsayers (266–271 J.) is not expressly directed against institutions such as the colleges of Augurs, haruspices or decemviri<sup>1</sup> sacris faciundis, but against private soothsayers; it was left to Cato to attack even the haruspices. But Ennius presents a philosophical argument, in spite of the fact that at that time, probably in 173 B.C. (Athenaeus 12. 547a), two Epicureans were expelled from Rome. This was followed shortly by the dismissal of the embassy of philosophers and later (139 B.C.) of Chaldaei. Ennius' lines touch the roots of official religion and anticipate the criticism made by Lucretius.

Ennius must not be too quickly turned into a political dissident. It should be remembered that the views of dramatic characters need not necessarily coincide with those of their author, especially in the case of translations, and that plays commissioned by Roman magistrates essentially reflected the views of the Roman establishment.<sup>2</sup> Yet we should not imagine that all the Roman nobility of that period was conservative. There have been many cultures with a tiny upper class and without a self-assured middle class, for example, that of eighteenth-century Russia. Here the nobility is both the ruling and the educated class. It fulfills therefore two basically opposed functions, one conservative and the other progressive. In this sense, we may associate Ennius with the intellectual climate of his Roman environment. In his work antagonistic forces are seen striving for predominance in a young nation's mind. Moreover, Ennius did not merely reflect the opinion of the nobility in a passive way, but actively joined in shaping it. We may admit therefore, if not political bias, but certainly a strong interaction between the atmosphere of his works and that of his surroundings.

Influence

In the late republican period, the Annales became a school textbook. They were studied by scholars and imitated by poets until the Aeneid, itself strongly influenced by Ennius, displaced them. Except for some new fragments on papyrus,<sup>3</sup> Ennius is attested only indirectly. For

<sup>1</sup> Only later they would become quindecimviri.

<sup>2</sup> H. D. JOCELYN, 1972, 996.

<sup>3</sup> K. KLEVE 1991; W. SUERBAUM, ZPE 92, 1992, 165–167.

Lucretius, Ennius furnished more than a linguistic model; numerous thematic links also exist between the two poets.<sup>1</sup> Ovid still knew Ennius.<sup>2</sup> Our author's influence on imperial poets, however, in particular on Silius Italicus, is disputed.<sup>3</sup> While his comedies were no longer performed by the 1st century B.C., his tragedies continued to be shown, although there was a preference for Pacuvius and Accius. The satura seems to have attracted little attention, the Epicharmus and Euhemerus were consulted by philosophical readers.

Following a decline in the 1st century A.D., interest in Ennius revived in the 2nd century among the so-called archaists, and the Emperor Hadrian esteemed Ennius more highly than Virgil. The Annales, the tragedies, the satura, and other minor works were read and copied. At the beginning of the 4th century, the African grammarian Nonius Marcellus still had access to Ennius' Hectoris Lytra and Telephus, though not to other plays or even the Annales. In the 5th and 6th centuries there are only scattered traces of direct reading of the Annales and the Medea. Old Latin authors are quoted, often at second hand, for the light they throw on rare words, non-classical meanings, inflections and constructions, and the evidence they supply of imitations (e.g. in Virgil) or deviations (e.g. by Virgil) from current versions of legend. For this purpose, those readers partially used scholarly secondary sources dating from the time of Claudius or Nero.<sup>4</sup> Ennius' works did not survive the fall of the Roman world.

Critical evaluation of Ennius varies. Lucilius and, later on, Ovid found fault with him, while Cicero, for example, and Hadrian expressed admiration. In spite of their dislike for Ennius, both the neoterics and the elegists were in debt to him. Catullus used him as foil for his own interpretation of myths.<sup>5</sup> And in contrast to his attitude as literary critic, Horace as poet shows the influence of Ennius, especially in those odes which have a Roman content.<sup>6</sup> As a living legacy

<sup>1</sup> O. GIGON, Lukrez und Ennius, in: Lucrece. Huit exposés. Entretiens Fondation Hardt 24, (1977) 1978, 167–191 (discussion continued to p. 196).

<sup>2</sup> H. JACOBSON, Ennian Influence in Heroides 16 and 17, Phoenix 22, 1968, 299–303.

<sup>3</sup> See also H. D. JOCELYN, Valerius Flaccus and Ennius, LCM 13, 1, 1988, 10–11.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. H. D. JOCELYN, Ancient Scholarship and Virgil's Use of Republican Latin Poetry, CQ n.s. 14 (58), 1964, 280–295; n.s. 15 (59), 1965, 126–144.

<sup>5</sup> J. E. G. ZETZEL, Catullus, Ennius and the Poetics of Allusion, ICS 8, 1983, 251–266; cf. also J. F. MILLER, Ennius and the Elegists, ICS 8, 1983, 277–295.

<sup>6</sup> A. TRAGLIA, Ennio nella critica oraziana, in: Filologia e forme letterarie, FS F. DELLA CORTE, vol. 3, Urbino 1987, 89–108.

to Roman literature he established, once and for all, a Latin poetic language, the hexameter, the difference between genres and especially the Roman notion of the poet. This last point was elaborated in connection with Scipio's triumph: Claudian (Stil. 3 = carm. 23) and Petrarch, author of the Latin epic Africa, are important stages in this process. Petrarch links Ennius to the theme of the poet's crowning, and recognizes him as the equal of the triumphant general.<sup>1</sup> This legend graphically illustrates the correct observation that Ennius had fought successfully to establish poetry in Rome and to integrate it into Roman culture.

Maxims drawn from Ennius also enjoyed a long life, as for example his verse originally directed against astrologers: 'No one sees what is before his eyes, but directs his attention to the expanse of heaven' (trag. 187 J.). Seneca employed this quotation against the Emperor Claudius, who wanted to become a god. In Minucius Felix a pagan uses it as an objection against Christians. For their part, the Christians turned the verse against the 'astral physics' of pagan cosmic religion and countered it with the Christian demand for self knowledge.<sup>2</sup> A happy formulation may thus outlast centuries, continually receiving fresh life. The same is true for some individual words of great significance coined by Ennius, such as omnipotens.

Editions: R. and H. ESTIENNE (STEPHANUS), Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum, quorum opera non extant, Genevae 1564. * G. COLONNA, Q. Ennii poetae vetustissimi quae supersunt fragmenta, Neapoli 1590, repr. Amsterdam 1707 (TN, ind.). * J. VAHLEN, Ennianae poesis reliquiae, Lipsiae 1854; 2nd ed. 1903 (quoted ed., except for trag.; with Index sermonis; repr. 1967). * E. H. WARMINGTON (TTrN), ROL 1, 1935, 2nd ed. 1956 (rev.), repr. 1967. * J. HEURGON (TC), vol. 1: ann., vol. 2: trag., Paris 1958. * Annales: P. MERULA (VAN MERLE) (TC), Lugduni Batavorum 1595. * L. VALMAGGI (TC), Torino 1900. * E. M. STEUART (TN), Cambridge 1925. * M. BANDIERA (ann. book 1, TC), Firenze 1978. * O. SKUTSCH (TC, fundamental), Oxford 1985. * trag.: O. RIBBECK, TRF Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1871, repr. 1962, 15–75 (with an index of the sermo tragicus); Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1897, 17–85. * H. D. JOCELYN (trag.: TC, ind.), Cambridge 1967 (quoted ed.). * Praetextae: L. PEDROLI (TC), Fabularum praetextarum quae extant, Genova

<sup>1</sup> W. SUERBAUM, Poeta laureatus et triumphans. Die Dichterkrönung Petrarca's und sein Ennius-Bild, Poetica 5, 1972, 293–328.

<sup>2</sup> P. COURCELLE, Le retentissement profane et chrétien d'un vers d'Ennius, REL 48, 1970, 107–112.

1954, 68–69; 113–114. * G. DE DURANTE, Le Fabulae praetextae, Roma 1966, 19–25; 52–53. * sat. etc.: E. BOLISANI (C), Ennio minore, Padova 1935. * E. COURTNEY, The Fragmentary Latin Poets, Oxford 1993. * Translation of the fragments of the satira in: Lucilius, Satiren, ed. by W. KRENKEL, vol. 1, Berlin and Leiden 1970, 14–16. ** Ind.: see editions. ** Bibl.: S. TIMPANARO, Ennius, AAHG 5, 1952, 195–212. * H. J. METTE, Die römische Tragödie und die Neufunde zur griechischen Tragödie (esp. for 1945–1964), Lustrum 9, 1964, 14–16 and 55–78. * H. D. JOCELYN, The Fragments of Ennius' Scenic Scripts, AC 38, 1969, 181–217. * See also H. D. JOCELYN 1972.

M. VON ALBRECHT, Ennius' Annales, in: Das römische Epos, ed. by E. BURCK, Darmstadt 1979, 33–44. * M. BETTINI, Studi e note su Ennio, Pisa 1979. * C. O. BRINK, Ennius and Hellenistic Worship of Homer, AJPh 93, 1972, 547–567. * R. A. BROOKS, Ennius and the Roman Tragedy (1949), repr. New York 1981. * C. J. CLASSEN, Ennius: Ein Fremder in Rom, Gymnasium 99, 1992, 121–145. * A. CORDIER, Les débuts de l'hexamètre latin. Ennius, Paris 1947. * Ennius. Sept exposés par O. SKUTSCH (and others), Entretiens sur l'antiquité classique 17 (Vandœuvres 1971), Genève 1972. * E. FRAENKEL, Additional Note on the Prose of Ennius, Eranos 49, 1951, 50–56. * A. GRILLI, Studi enniani, Brescia 1965. * R. HÄUSSLER, Das historische Epos der Griechen und Römer bis Vergil = Studien zum historischen Epos der Antike, 1: Von Homer zu Vergil, Heidelberg 1976. * H. D. JOCELYN, The Poems of Quintus Ennius, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 987–1026. * H. VON KAMEKE, Ennius und Homer, diss. Leipzig 1926. * K. KLEVE, Phoenix from the Ashes: Lucretius and Ennius in Herculaneum, in: Ø. ANDERSEN, H. WHITTAKER, eds., The Norwegian Institute of Athens: The First Five Lectures, Athens 1991, 57–64. * E. LAUGHTON, The Prose of Ennius, Eranos 49, 1951, 35–49. * A. LUNELLI, Postille inedite di Vahlen alla seconda edizione di Ennio, RFIC 108, 1980, 55–84; 174–217 (repr. with corr. and ind. 1988). * P. MAGNO, Quinto Ennio, Fasano di Puglia 1979. * S. MARIOTTI, Lezioni su Ennio (1951), repr. Torino 1963. * K. O. MATIER, The Influence of Ennius on Silius Italicus, Akroterion 36, 1991, 153–158. * J. K. NEWMAN, Memini me fieri pavum. Ennius and the Quality of Roman Aesthetic Imagination, ICS 8, 1983, 173–193. * E. NORDEN, Ennius und Vergilius, Leipzig 1915. * L. M. OOSTENBROEK, Eris—Discordia. Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der ennianischen Zwietracht, Pijnacker 1977 (with bibl.). * G. PASQUALI, Ennio e Virgilio, GGA 1915, 593–610, repr. in: G.P., Vecchie e nuove pagine stravaganti di un filologo, Firenze 1952, 285–307. * R. REGGIANI, I proemi degli Annales di Ennio. Programma letterario e polemica, Roma 1979. * W. RÖSER, Ennius, Euripides und Homer, diss. Würzburg 1939. * U. W. SCHOLZ, Die Satira des Quintus Ennius, in: J. ADAMIETZ, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1986, 25–53. * A. SELEM, Note all'Iphigenia di Ennio (Scen. 213–221 V.<sup>2</sup>; 357 a Kl.), Udine 1965. * F. SKUTSCH, Ennius, RE 5, 1905, 2589–2628. * O. SKUTSCH, Studia Enniana, London 1968. * O. SKUTSCH, Doppelte Enallage, Gymnasium 82, 1975, 339. * O. SKUTSCH, Book VI of Ennius' Annals, CQ 81 n.s. 37, 1987, 512–514. * SUERBAUM, Untersuchungen (s. general list of abbreviations) * W. SUERBAUM, Ennius als Dramatiker, in: Orchestra. Drama, Mythos, Bühne. FS. H. FLASHAR, Stuttgart 1994, 346–362. * I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975, esp. 59–66. * S. WIEMER, Ennianischer Einfluß in Vergils Aeneis VII–XII. Beitrag zu einem Vergil-Kommentar, diss. Greifswald 1933. * G. WILLIAMS, Tradition and Originality in Roman Literature, Oxford 1968, 359–363. * K. ZIEGLER, Das hellenistische Epos. Ein vergessenes Kapitel griechischer Dichtung, Leipzig and Berlin 1934; 2nd ed. with an appendix: Ennius als hellenistischer Epiker, Leipzig 1966. * O. ZWIERLEIN, Der Ruhm der Dichtung bei Ennius und seinen Nachfolgern, Hermes 110, 1982, 85–102.

PACUVIUS

Life and Dates

Marcus Pacuvius was born in 220 B.C. at Brundisium and died shortly before 130 at Tarentum. He had an Oscan gentile name and was a nephew of Ennius. A different, universally rejected tradition (Jerome, chron. 1864) relates that Pacuvius was Ennius' grandson and lived later than Terence (cf. also Gellius 17. 21. 49 and Velleius 2. 9. 3). Pacuvius was active from about 200 B.C. at Rome as a painter (Plin. nat. 35. 19) and poet, the first instance of such a double career known in Rome. On the other hand, he limited his literary work to tragedy and the praetexta. We have no certain information about his satires. Paulus, his praetexta, shows that he had some connection with the victor of Pydna. From Cicero (Lael. 24) the conclusion has been drawn that he had links with the Scipionic Circle.<sup>1</sup> In his old age considerations of health forced Pacuvius to withdraw to Tarentum, where his artistic successor Accius, according to a somewhat doubtful tradition, is said to have visited him (Gellius 13. 2). The epitaph which Gellius (1. 24. 4) ascribes to Pacuvius himself<sup>2</sup> shows commendable simplicity and modesty,<sup>1</sup> and may justify the conclusion that by this time the social position of the poet was less precarious and taken more for granted than in the days of the early pioneers. Pacuvius enjoyed recognition both in his own lifetime and in later generations. It is possible that his kinship with Ennius smoothed the beginnings of his career.

<sup>1</sup> A critical view is found in H. STRASBURGER, Der 'Scipionenkreis', Hermes 94, 1966, 60–72.

<sup>2</sup> See however H. DAHLMANN, Studien zu Varro De Poetis, AAWM 1962, 10 (publ. 1963), 65–124.

Survey of Works

Tragedies: Antiopa, Armorum iudicium, Atalanta, Chryses, Dulorestes, Hermiona, Iliona, Medus, Niptra, Orestes,<sup>2</sup> Pentheus, Periboea, Protesilaus (?), Teucer, Thyestes (Fulg. serm. ant. 57 = Helm p. 125, etc.).

Praetexta: Paullus.

Other: Saturae.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Unlike his Roman predecessors, Pacuvius exercised a prudent restraint, both in the scale of his literary activity (only 13 titles are known with certainty), and also in his choice of genres. This specialization brought Roman tragedy in his hands to one of its first high points. He was regarded as a student of Ennius,<sup>3</sup> and the story has this truth about it, that as an author he considered himself a part of a Latin tradition. He took up again themes treated by earlier Roman poets, and entered into competition with Livius Andronicus (Hermiona, Teucer, cf. also the Armorum Iudicium) and Ennius (cf. the subjects of the Armorum Iudicium, Orestes and Teucer). On the other hand, he consciously abandoned trodden paths, on the look-out for new themes. It is true that he continued to emphasize Trojan myths, but in this area he was often concerned with the echo of great events in a later generation (Chryses, Hermiona, Dulorestes, Orestes, Iliona). In the same way Pacuvius presented Medea from the perspective of her son Medus. But he also used myths drawn from other cycles (Antiopa, Pentheus, Atalanta, Periboea). In his choice of models, Pacuvius was no less independent. Unlike Ennius, he did not prefer Euripides, although he did follow him in the Antiopa. He also imitated Aeschylus (Armorum Iudicium), Sophocles (Chryses, Hermiona, Niptra), and even models now quite unknown (Iliona and Medus). The influence of post-Euripidean tragedy must be taken into account. In his broad selection of models, while keeping to his self-imposed generic limits, Pacuvius was striving for universality.

<sup>1</sup> It was not however very original, cf. CIL 1, 2, 1209-1210; CE 848; 53.

<sup>2</sup> G. D'ANNA, Precisazioni pacuviane, RCCM 16, 1974, 311-319.

<sup>3</sup> Pompilius in Varro Men. 356 BUECHELER, p. 42 MOREL.

Literary Technique

The Greek parallels available to us show that Pacuvius adopted a free hand. This attitude is not surprising in an author who, even in his choice of subjects, shows a liking for the unusual. It is probable that he expanded his tragedies with scenes taken from other plays.<sup>1</sup> In the Antiopa the chorus consisted of Attici. At this point Pacuvius diverged from Euripides, and followed a Hellenistic poet.<sup>2</sup> In the Pentheus he outdid Euripides by allowing the mad hero to see the Eumenides.<sup>3</sup> Pacuvius viewed the world with the eyes of a painter<sup>4</sup> and was a master at shaping effective scenes. On Cicero's testimony (Tusc. 1. 106), the apparition of the dead son in Pacuvius' Iliona was especially harrowing.

The plot of the Medus showed particular subtlety of intrigue. Medus, son of Aegeus and Medea, arrived at Colchis in his search for his mother. He was seized and brought before King Perses, who had received an oracle warning him against the descendants of Aeetes. This led Medus to pass himself off as the son of Creon, King of Corinth. But, likewise unrecognized, Medea also arrived in Colchis and offered to end the drought prevailing there by a human sacrifice. Her choice fell upon the stranger, whom she took to be the son of her enemy Creon. But unwittingly she told the truth, in declaring that he was really the son of the Medea so hated at Colchis. (The motif by which a lie unconsciously speaks the truth is reminiscent of Plautus, Poen. 1099). It was only when the two met that they recognized each other, and subsequently slew King Perses.

A cunning scheme thus brought about the very danger that it was meant to prevent. The recognition was mutual. Pacuvius certainly

<sup>1</sup> G. D'ANNA, Fabellae Latinae ad verbum e Graecis expressae, RCCM 7, 1965, 364-383 (contaminatio in the Niptra and Chryses).

<sup>2</sup> G. D'ANNA, Alcune osservazioni sull' Antiopa di Pacuvio, Athenaeum 43, 1965, 81-94.

<sup>3</sup> H. HAFFTER, Zum Pentheus des Pacuvius, WS 79, 1966, 290-293.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. trag. 38-39: 'A dog hit by a stone does not attack the one who threw it, but the stone that hit him.' This is a fable in miniature.

did not invent such a complex plot, but his assimilation of this refined, certainly Hellenistic art, allied with its accompanying paradoxes and ironic undertones, shows us old Roman drama in a rather unexpected light, taking us back to the roots of the Greek comedy of intrigue. On the other hand, given the specific family connections and other important features of the action, such as revenge on a father's brother, a Roman public could not but recall Romulus.<sup>1</sup>

Language and Style

Pacuvius' careful attention to his art extended also to his treatment of language. In his effort to create a 'lofty' tragic style he explored the very boundaries of the Latin language. On the one hand, he took up archaic elements of a type normally avoided by Ennius in his tragedies: pronoun forms such as ques sunt es? (trag. 221 R.); genitives in -um instead of -orum. On the other, Pacuvius adopted Greek words such as camterem and thiasantem, and moreover formed bold adjectives in the Greek manner: repandirostrum, 'with snout bent back', incurvicervicum, 'with curved neck' (trag. 408 R.). He also introduced adjectives in -gena and -genus into literature, and in this was followed by Accius and others. In the same way Accius inherited his liking for the suffix -tudo.<sup>2</sup> The general motley effect produced by the language of the fragments, which look somewhat adventurous at first glance, must be modified by two considerations. The first is that the frequency of deviations from the norm in our fragments is determined by the interests of the grammarians who quote them. The second is that in Pacuvius' day many suffixes were more productive than later, and many inflexions and formations had not yet been normalized. Even so, the language of Pacuvius must have produced a considerably stranger effect than, for example, that of Plautus, whom no one could accuse of writing bad Latin.

It would however be a crude misunderstanding to explain these features by Pacuvius' 'foreign' origin. He was a specialist in tragedy, the author of only a few plays, and in his language, too, conscious choice was at work. As in his selection of models, Pacuvius sought here also to exhaust all possibilities. He set the language of his art on the broadest possible base in order to ensure for it a wide range of tones.

<sup>1</sup> A. DELLA CASA, Il Medus di Pacuvio, in: Poesia latina in frammenti, Miscellanea filologica, Genova 1974, 287-296.

<sup>2</sup> R. LAZZERONI, Per la storia dei composti latini in -cola e -gena, SSL 6, 1966, 116-148.

It is perhaps more than coincidence that the two especially bold formations previously cited come from a play which aimed to outdo two Latin predecessors. In some respects, Pacuvius took to an extreme his uncle's passion for linguistic innovation.

A comparison with Euripides (frag. 839 N.) allows us to recognize clearly the independence of Pacuvius' (trag. 86–93 R.) stylistic choices. The anapaests have been replaced by trochaic septenarii. The heaping up of verbs to evoke the creative power of the aether (omnia animat format alit auget creat 'it quickens, shapes, nourishes, increases, and creates everything') is also a new feature. Asymmetry is another mark of baroque style. The antonym is expressed by only two verbs (sepeliat recipitque, 'buries and takes back again'). On the other hand, even here there are symmetrically constructed antitheses within a single verse.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

We have no direct knowledge of any remark shedding light on Pacuvius' understanding of literature. A scene from one of his plays, however, does contribute to the discussion at Rome of intellectual pursuits as a valid way of life. In the Antiopa the twins Amphion and Zethus represent opposed points of view. Amphion, the musician, favors a contemplative lifestyle, while Zethus as a huntsman favors a practical one. Amphion transforms his plea for music into one for wisdom. He does not win the day, and is compelled to follow Zethus to the hunt. Even so, the scene marks a milestone in Roman confrontation with the problem of a life dedicated to brainwork.

Ideas II

The gentle Amphion would like to give Antiopa the help she is asking for. Zethus, however, denies her refuge on the grounds that she is a runaway slave. Unawares, therefore, the sons surrender their own mother to the cruel queen Dirce. They recognize their descent only at the last moment, rescue their mother and punish Dirce. Apart from its concern with intellectual questions, this play also emphasized the philosophical truth that a runaway slave in reality may be a human being close to us, to whom we are obliged to give respect and help. Similar situations are found in comedy and elegy.<sup>1</sup> The intellectual background of this Euripidean was conditioned by the Greek Enlightenment, but that did not hinder its success at Rome, a fact that speaks highly for the Roman audience.

In the Armorum Iudicium, the brave Ajax and the eloquent Ulysses contended for the arms of Achilles, a contrast similar to that between Amphion and Zethus. In this Aeschylean play, however, Ajax, the man of action, attracted more sympathy. One of the most tragic lines of Roman literature is his remark: 'Should I have rescued him so there might be someone who would destroy me?' (trag. 40 R.). This passage would still be sung at Caesar's funeral to win the people over against his assassins. There were other debates in the Atalanta and the Hermiona, in these cases between rivals. In the Chryses we find speculations about the aether and the earth as creative forces, and about the coming-to-be and perishing of living creatures. These are Euripidean thoughts (frag. 839 N.), here obviously introduced into a Sophoclean play. The intrusion shows that the Roman society for which Pacuvius was writing took an interest even in scientific questions.

The relation between parents and children is treated in several dramas. In the Antiopa, the sons almost bring about their mother's destruction, while in the Medus a mother brings her son into danger. In the Niptra, an oracle had foretold to Ulysses that his son would kill him. Accordingly he stood in fear of Telemachus, until the time when his other son Telegonus gave him a mortal wound. There followed a recognition between father and son and the correct explanation of the oracle. Again, Pentheus was killed by his own mother; Orestes, who gave his name to two plays, was a matricide. Finally in the Teucer the son was called to account by his father, Telamon, for not avenging his brother Ajax. At the center stood the father's passionate words on his loss of son and grandson (Cic. de orat. 2. 193 after having seen the play). The conflict of generations seems to have been a matter of pressing concern to the nephew of the famous Ennius, and it is remarkable that the older generation does not have the advantage in every play. The conflicts are often life-threatening for both sides, but are resolved in the spirit of humanity. The characters experience their inner drama. Cicero informs us that, in Pacuvius,

<sup>1</sup> J. C. YARDLEY, Propertius' Lycinna, TAPhA 104, 1974, 429-434.

Ulysses lamented less and bore his suffering more manfully than in Sophocles (Tusc. 2. 21. 48 f.).

Transmission

Pacuvius' plays continued to be produced into the 1st century B.C. and were mentioned even after that. The authors who quote him are essentially the same as those to whom we owe fragments from Ennius' dramas. The fact that we know even less of Pacuvius than of Ennius is determined by external circumstances. He belonged to a transitional generation and therefore did not possess the privileges of his great predecessors Ennius and Plautus, and his Latin was particularly unsuitable for imitation.

Influence

Cicero called Pacuvius the most significant Roman tragedian (opt. gen. 2) and allowed one of his characters to praise his artistic verses (orat. 36). He believed that Pacuvius' Antiopa could rival that of Euripides (fin. 1. 4). Gellius emphasized in Pacuvius his elegantissima gravitas (1. 24. 4) and admired the charm of the verses with which the nurse addressed Ulysses (2. 26. 13). Following older critics (cf. Hor. epist. 2. 1. 56) Quintilian (10. 1. 97) called Accius more 'powerful', but Pacuvius more 'artful' or 'learned' (doctior). Indeed, the poet showed these qualities both in his choice of unusual models and in the elaborate style of his verse. Thanks to them, he did not become a mere epigone of his famous uncle. Quintilian's juxtaposition of Pacuvius with the 'powerful' Accius forms the basis of the disputed story concerning the meeting of both authors. In his old age Pacuvius is said to have judged the Atreus of the young Accius, which its author had read to him, to be full of sound and grandeur, but rather too harsh and stern (Gell. 13. 2). This judgment both illuminates and obscures our picture of Pacuvius. It illuminates his artistry, which won for him in those early days a classical rank. But the story obscures his striving for sublimity and universality, and his struggle for a colorful poetic language. These aspects are better emphasized in the negative verdicts we hear about him. In contrast to his contemporaries Scipio and Laelius, in Cicero's eyes Pacuvius wrote bad Latin (Brutus 258), and his compound words looked funny to as early a reader as Lucilius. The same satirist rejected mythological tragedy as something too removed from reality. Persius called the Antiopa 'warty' (1. 77). Such utterances are conditioned partly by the later development of Latin literary language, in which, thanks to the influence of schools, creativity often yielded to selective and purist tendencies. Partly they depended on Pacuvius' situation: in the shadow of the pioneering accomplishment of Ennius, he tried artistically and often artificially to widen the linguistic area which his predecessor had mastered. Varro, quoted by Gellius (6. 14. 6), called him accurately enough the master of 'richness' (ubertas).

Pacuvius is a reflective poet, one who for the first time at Rome limited himself to tragedy, and yet within the framework of a single genre strove for universality. In a national literature less concerned with classicism, this completely unclassical classic would have been as little overlooked as Shakespeare is in England. Nevertheless, Accius, Cicero, Virgil, and even Ovid<sup>1</sup> and Seneca,<sup>2</sup> to name only these, still nourished their imagination on the enthralling scenes of Pacuvius' tragedies. The powerful effect of these dramas, of their words but also of their music which a judicious public recognized from the first note, must not be underestimated simply because they have not been transmitted to us.

Editions: R. and H. STEPHANUS, Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum, quorum opera non extant, Genevae 1564. * O. RIBBECK, TRF (T, ind. of sermo tragicus), Leipzig 2nd ed. 1871, repr. 1962, 75-136 (ed. quoted here); 3rd ed. 1897, 86-157. * E. H. WARMINGTON (TTrN), ROL, vol. 2, London 1936, 158-323. * A. KLOTZ, O. SEEL, L. VOIT, ScRF, vol. 1, Oldenburg 1953 (cf. O. SKUTSCH, Gnomon 26, 1954, 465-470). * R. ARGENIO (TTrC), Torino 1959 (with bibl.). * G. D'ANNA (TTrC), Roma 1967 (best ed.). * P. MAGNO (TTr), Milano 1977. * Teucer: P. MAGNO (poetic reconstruction), Milano 1976. * Praetextae: L. PEDROLI, Fabularum praetextarum quae extant, Genova 1954, 69-70 (T); 114-115 (C). * G. DE DURANTE, Le Fabulae praetextae, Roma 1966, 26-29; 54-55. ** Indices: s. above RIBBECK, WARMINGTON. ** Bibl.: H. J. METTE, Die Römische Tragödie und die Neufunde zur Griechischen Tragödie (esp. for 1945-1964), Lustrum 9, 1964, 5-211, esp. 78-107.

<sup>1</sup> G. D'ANNA, La tragedia latina arcaica nelle Metamorfosi, in: Atti del Convegno Internazionale Ovidiano (Sulmona 1958), vol. 2, Roma 1959, 217. The Pacuvian authorship of the story of Acoetes is disputed: P. FRASSINETTI, Pacuviana, in: Antidoron, FS E. PAOLI, Genova 1956, 96-123.

<sup>2</sup> J. LANOWSKI, La tempête des Nostoi dans la tragédie romaine, in: Tragica 1, Wrocław 1952, 131-151; R. GIOMINI, ed., Seneca, Phaedra, Roma 1955, and Seneca, Agamemnon, Roma 1956.

W. BEARE, The Roman Stage, London 3rd ed. 1964, 79–84. * B. BILIŃSKI, Contrastanti ideali di cultura sulla scena di Pacuvio, Wrocław 1962. * E. FLINTOFF, The Satires of Marcus Pacuvius, Latomus 49, 1990, 575–590. * R. HELM, RE 18, 1942, 2159–2174. * A. LA PENNA, Poche note a Pacuvio e Accio (Armorum iudicium, Atreus), in: Poesia latina in frammenti, Miscellanea filologica, Genova 1974, 297–304. * LEO, LG 226–232. * F. LEO, De tragoedia Romana (1910), in: Ausgewählte kleine Schriften, vol. 1, Roma 1960, 191–212, on Pacuvius: 198; 206–210. * I. MARIOTTI, Introduzione a Pacuvio, Urbino 1960. * R. REGGIANI, Rileggendo alcuni frammenti tragici di Ennio, Pacuvio e Accio, in: G. ARICÒ, ed., Atti del I seminario di studi sulla tragedia romana, Quaderni di cultura e di tradizione classica 4–5, Palermo, Fac. di magistero, Ist. di filologia latina 1987, 31–88. * O. RIBBECK, Die römische Tragödie im Zeitalter der Republik, Leipzig 1875, repr. (with an introd. by W.-H. FRIEDRICH) Hildesheim 1968, 216–339. * M. VALSA, Marcus Pacuvius, poète tragique, Paris 1957.

ACCIUS

Life, Dates

L. Accius was born in 170 B.C. at Pisaurum, the son of a freedman (Jerome, chron. 1879). He came to Rome at a time when, thanks to the stimulus imparted by Crates of Mallos, grammatical studies were beginning to flourish. So he received a scholarly education, and combined in one person the roles of poet and scholar. He took little interest in the Forum and its law-courts, because there, as he later explained jokingly, quite differently from the theater, his opponents would not say what he wanted (Quint. inst. 5. 13. 43). In 140, at the age of 30, he entered into dramatic competition with the eighty-year-old Pacuvius (Cic. Brut. 229); and after Pacuvius had withdrawn to Tarentum, it was Accius who dominated the tragic stage. His opinion of his own talents did not fail to match his achievement. Although short of stature, he is said to have erected for himself in the temple of the Camenae a particularly large statue (Pliny nat. 34. 19). Even in daily life, he displayed a sense of the theatrical, refusing to rise in the College of Poets in acknowledgment of the distinguished Julius Caesar Strabo because, as a poet, he felt superior to him (Val. Max. 3. 7. 11). He brought suit against a mime actor who had ridiculed him on the stage, and secured his conviction (rhet. Her. 1. 24 and 2. 19). The evidence of such lack of humor completes the picture he gives of the born tragedian. The satirist Lucilius indeed was involved in critical confrontation with him. Accius was close neither to Ennius' successors nor to the Scipios. His patron was D. Iunius Brutus Callaicus, whose monumental buildings he furnished with inscriptions in saturnians, a meter illustrating the conservatism of official texts; and whose family he honored by dedicating a praetexta to Brutus, the founder of the Republic. He retained his creative powers to advanced age, and lived to meet the young Cicero. Accius must have died about 84 B.C. His long life, which spans the gap between the Elder Cato (d. 149) and the Younger (b. 95), almost filled out the century separating the death of Ennius in 169 and the birth of Virgil in 70. His creative activity therefore, which marked the culmination of Roman tragedy, fell in the period following the destruction of Carthage, Corinth, and Numantia. It coincided with the serious domestic conflicts provoked by the Gracchan efforts at reform, which continued down to the Social War. He also experienced the reign of terror conducted by Marius and Cinna, although not that of Sulla. The powerful and even strained effect, detected by ancient critics in Accius by comparison with Pacuvius, corresponds not only to the personality and different social origin of the poets, but also to the altered aspect of the period.

Survey of Works

Tragedies: Achilles, Aegisthus, Agamemnonidae, Alcestis, Alcimeo, Alphesiboea, Amphitruo, Andromeda, Antenoridae, Antigona, Argonautae(?), Armorum iudicium, Asyanax, Athamas, Atreus, Bacchae, Chrysippus, Clutemestra, Deiphobus, Diomedes, Epigoni, Epinausimache, Erigona, Eriphyla, Eurysaces, Hecuba, Hellenes, Io, Medea (Argonautae), Melanippus, Meleager, Minos, Myrmidones, Neoptolemus, Nyctegresia, Oenomaus, Pelopidae, Persidae, Philocteta, Phinidae, Phoenissae, Prometheus, Stasiastae vel Tropaeum, Telephus, Tereus, Thebais, Troades.

Doubtful: Heraclidae, Theseus, Automatia, Andromacha.

Praetextae: Aeneadae aut Decius, Brutus, (Tullia).

Other works: Didascalica, Pragmatica, Annales, Parerga, Sotadica.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Like Pacuvius, in his dramatic work Accius limited himself essentially to tragedy, although his literary œuvre as a whole was much wider. More than forty titles of plays are known. He differed from Pacuvius in preferring among his Greek models Euripides. With Euripides went Sophocles. Aeschylus was less well represented. The influence of later Greek tragedies must also have been considerable, since Accius was by no means backward-looking in his choice of models. His selection of subjects from myth was also broad. Along with the prevalent Trojan stories he used Theban and also quite different legends, as in his Andromeda, Athamas, Medea, Meleager, Tereus. Rarely are direct Greek originals preserved or attested, but, where comparison is possible, Accius shows great independence, for example, in treating the themes found in Euripides' Bacchae and Phoenissae, Sophocles' Antigone and Aeschylus' Prometheus.<sup>1</sup> He avoids his Latin predecessors. His Medea treats a different theme from that of Ennius, nor is his Telephus also that of Ennius and Euripides. In his Clutemestra it is the wife and not Agamemnon who occupies the central role. In the case of his praetextae on Brutus, the expeller of the Tarquins, and on the sacrificial death of P. Decius Mus the Younger at Sentinum in 295, he may have used annalistic sources, perhaps Ennius.

The title and meter of his Annales lead us to expect an historical epic, but the fragments concern myth and theology. Was Accius' aim to match Ennius' warlike epic with 'a kind of history of culture and religion',<sup>2</sup> just as, in his plays, he cleverly avoided the danger of conflict with his Roman predecessors? Even so, the title of his Sotadica is reminiscent of Ennius' Sota.

Along with this, Accius concerned himself, like his contemporaries Porcius Licinus and Valerius Aedituus, with literary discussion of a type then coming into vogue, which, to some extent, still made use of verse form. The Didascalica filled at least nine books, in which prose and verse in different meters alternated. In form, this work was a predecessor of the Menippean satire, and treated in an elaborate manner aimed at a popular audience (perhaps using dialogue) questions of literary history: epic, drama, poetic genres, chronology, problems of authenticity in Plautus (frg. 17 Morel = frg. 17 Büchner). This is a literary form which may also be regarded as a predecessor of Cicero's Brutus. From his Parerga we possess a fragment concerning plowing. Does this mean that Hesiod was his model? It has been doubted whether the poet was the author of the astrological Praxidicus.<sup>1</sup> His contributions to grammar will be treated later.

<sup>1</sup> F. LEO, De tragoedia Romana, Progr. acad. Göttingen 1910, 3-6 and 18-19; repr. in: Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften, ed. E. FRAENKEL, vol. 1, Roma 1960, 191-194 and 207-209.

<sup>2</sup> RIBBECK, Tragödie 342.

Literary Technique

In the structure of his plays, Accius mainly followed his originals, although he seems in the Antigone to have brought onto the stage a scene that in his model had been merely narrated,<sup>2</sup> and in the Armoreum iudicium he may have combined two plays: the similarly named work of Aeschylus and a tragedy about Ajax which need not necessarily be that of Sophocles.<sup>3</sup> This means that he ventured to accept creative challenges of plot construction. When, in his praetexta Brutus, he offended against the rules of unity, he could explain this as Hellenistic practice in the historical play, as is shown by Ezechiel's drama about Moses.<sup>4</sup>

Accius' literary technique is often less vivid than that of Euripides, although he is capable of catching moods, as, for example, the spell of virgin woodlands (trag. 237 R.). In describing the approach of the mighty Argo through the eyes of a panic-stricken shepherd who had never yet seen a ship (391 R.), he showed a poetic sensitivity to the power of first impressions. In this, as a Roman, he was less concerned with visual detail than with evocative sound. He is one of the most musical poets before Virgil. Yet Tarquin's dream from the Brutus (praet. 17–28 R.) is visually compelling. It is a symbolic prefiguring of the king's fall, which, thanks to its subsequent precise interpretation (praet. 29–38 R.), is revealed as an allegorical invention. This is early evidence for the poetic significance of allegory at Rome.

Language and Style

The beginning of the Phoenissae is instructive for both Accius' language and style: Sol qui micantem candido curru atque equis/flammam citatis fervido

<sup>1</sup> U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Lesefrüchte, Hermes 34, 1899, 601–639, esp. 637–638.

<sup>2</sup> S. SCONOCCHIA, L'Antigona di Accio e l'Antigone di Sofocle, RFIC 100, 1972, 273–282.

<sup>3</sup> G. PUCCIONI suggests Karkinos (Note ai frammenti di Accio, 581–584 KLOTZ, LUCILIO, 18 M. e trag. inc. 61–63 KLOTZ, in: Poesia latina in frammenti, Miscellanea filologica, Genova 1974, 305–313).

<sup>4</sup> B. SNELL, Ezechiel's Moses-Drama, A&A 13, 1967, 150–164, esp. 153.

ardore explicas, / quianam tam adverso augurio et inimico omine / Thebis radiatum lumen ostentas tuum?<sup>2</sup>, 'O Sun, who on your white-hot chariot and rushing horses twinkling flames unfurl in glowing heat, why come with augury ill-boding thus, with omen so unfriendly the beams of light which you display to Thebes?' (fig. 581–584 R.). ὦ τὴν ἐν ἄστροις οὐρανοῦ τέμνων ὀδὸν/καὶ χρυσοκολλήτοισιν ἐμβεβῶς δίφορις/ἥλιε, θοαῖς ἵπποισιν εἰλίσσω φλόγα/ὡς δυστυγῆ Θήβαισιν τῆ τόθ' ἡμέρα/ἀκτῖν' ἐφῆκας.

In comparison with Euripides (Phoen. 1–6), the Roman poet aims at greater intelligibility. He sets the address to the Sun at the beginning, while, in the original, two verses precede its mention; these lines are already said to have been criticized by Sophocles (Schol. Eur. Phoen. 1) as superfluous. However, Accius was less concerned here with the scholarly tradition than with his audience, which he did not wish to confuse by unexplained imagery. He compensates for the Latin deficiency in readily available participles and compound adjectives by an increase in pathos. The expansion fervido ardore<sup>1</sup> is telling. On the other hand he abandons picturesque effect. In Euripides, Helios stands on his chariot with legs apart. The combination of different levels of significance, evident in Euripides' 'ill-starred ray', is split up by the Roman, who, for his part, sharpens his contrasts. He develops the evil augury at length, and makes it the dark background of the streaming light in the following verse. His artistic hyperbata form a refined verbal structure, of the type later developed by the classical writers.

The 'power' for which Accius was famous was found not least in his striking phraseology. Gorgias (VS 82 B 5a D.) had referred to 'vultures, living graves', with which Ennius ann. 138 V. may be compared; Accius echoes this motif in the following passage from the Atrous: 'For the sons the father himself serves as grave' (trag. 226–227 R.). Such 'tragic epigrams' had belonged to the style of the genre since the days of Euripides and Agathon, and here Accius acts as a link between the Hellenistic manner and that of Silver Latin. Accius also shows epigrammatic point in his distinction between animus and anima (trag. 296 R.). This is especially true of the saying coined by him and destined for long life: oderint dum metuant (trag. 203–204 R.).

<sup>1</sup> For example also Nyctegresia fig. II: scindit oras, laterum texta flamma Vulcani vorax; Atrous fig. XVI: ipsus hortatur me frater, ut meos malis miser/manderem natos; Atrous fig. III: maior mihi moles, maius miscendumst malum.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In combining as author both practice and theory, Accius was to some extent the product of his times. Some of his contemporaries had written poetic essays on questions of literature: Lucilius, Valerius Aedituus and others. In the case of Accius, his efforts at theory and also his observations on poetic technique and on literary history stand in the closest relationship to the theater to which he had devoted his life. His deviations from the Greek classics rested on reflection, not chance. In judging his scholarship, we must keep in mind that the old critics described Pacuvius, not him, as 'learned'. Even so, the move towards explicit literary criticism and theoretical challenge, though still in a half-poetic form, was significant enough.

Apart from his concern with theatrical history and questions of dating<sup>1</sup> (treated unreliably), Accius seems to have discussed further aspects of theory. An author aiming at impressive symbolic pictures and their explanations could not altogether overlook the Stoic theory of allegorical interpretation, as practiced in the school of the already mentioned Crates of Mallos. Accius reflected on the meaning and function of myth and symbol, and in part turned the Stoic methods of interpretation into methods of poetic production. An example is Tarquin's dream, in which Accius prepares the way for Virgil's deliberate creation of myth. On the other hand, he is too much a man of the theater to accept uncritically the Stoic ideal of brevitas (didasc. 2. 10 Büchner, from Nonius, p. 243 L.). Theory therefore played a subordinate role, and it had to obey to a natural poetic gift. If Accius' poetic authority is unchallenged, his authority as a scholar is open to question.

As a grammarian, Accius was influenced by the Pergamene School. In regarding Hesiod as older than Homer (frg. 6 Büchner), he was not yet aware of Aristarchus' researches. In textual criticism and interpretation too, which were the achievements of the Alexandrians, he has no lessons to offer. It was left to Aelius Stilo to introduce these methods. Some trochaic septenarii survive from the Pragmatica, a work related to the Didascalica. In one place, the poet made the public responsible for poets' failings (frg. 24 Büchner).

His knowledge of the two languages stimulated Accius to reflect on Latin and compare it with Greek. He even treated questions of orthography. He avoided the foreign letters y and z but represented the sound ng in the Greek fashion by gg. He indicated long vowels partly by imitating Greek orthography (ei for long i), and partly in the manner of the Italian dialects and contemporary inscriptions, by doubling them.

---

<sup>1</sup> See above on Livius Andronicus.

Ideas II

All appearances suggest that Accius paid special attention to the ethos of his characters. In his play, Telephus was actually banished, not just apparently, as had been the case in Euripides and Ennius, and showed magnanimity: 'Fortune could rob me of my royal dignity and riches, but not of my courage (virtue)' (trag. 619–620 R.). In Accius, Ismene, unlike her Sophoclean counterpart, adopts the superior tone of an older sister (Antigone, trag. 135–137 R.). In the Phoenissae, Eteocles is exonerated. He has not concluded an agreement with his brother and therefore does not break his word in refusing to give place to Polynices after a year. Accius thus approaches the interpretation given by Aeschylus, who had laid the guilt at Polynices' door. This explains why the famous passage from Euripides' Phoenissae (524) is missing in Accius, which Schiller paraphrased as follows: 'If there is to be wrongdoing, let it be for the sake of a crown. In every other way a man must be virtuous.' Caesar who loved these lines had to quote them from the Greek original and Cicero, when criticizing such a way of thinking, had to make his own Latin translation. The words were evidently not to be found in Accius. Did the Roman tragic poet, by suppressing our passage, deliberately deny this character to the tyrants who enslaved Rome during his old age?

A courageous effect is also created by the intervention on behalf of a banished character in the Eurysaces (trag. 357–365 R.). Accius displayed the frankness and independence to be expected from a contemporary of the critical Lucilius. It is no surprise then that he allowed Antigone to doubt divine providence in quite modern terms (trag. 142–143 R.). In the same way, the poet seems to have eliminated an archaic feature in the Phoenissae. There is no longer an hereditary, ineluctable curse.<sup>1</sup> The Roman tragic poet placed the free and morally responsible human on center stage.

<sup>1</sup> G. PADUANO, Sul prologo delle Fenicie di Accio (581–584 R.), ASNP ser. 3, 3, 3, 1973, 827–835.

Transmission

Accius' plays were repeatedly performed in the 1st century B.C. It is not useful to speak of the disappearance of Roman tragedy after Accius, but quite relevant to comment on the unfortunate loss of texts. To this, several factors may have contributed: the rejection of older Latin by the modernists of the 1st century A.D.; the classicism of the schools in late antiquity; and the excommunication of the theater by Christians, which was all the more exacerbated by the fact that tragedy, as opposed to comedy, was a mythological performance, and therefore a celebration of pagan religion. A particularly fatal influence, however, must be attributed to the decline in Roman theatrical taste after the end of the Republic. In the provinces the study of older literature persisted longer than in the capital. Marcus Valerius Probus, educated in Beirut, came close to arousing laughter in Nero's Rome (Jerome chron. 2072) by basing his lectures on older Latin texts (Suet. gramm. 24). Yet he trained students who in the 2nd century would bring 'archaism' into fashion. Fragments which are later cited at secondhand are assumed to have been transmitted by Caper (2nd century) and Julius Romanus (3rd century). In 4th century Africa, Nonius Marcellus excerpted many texts of the Republican period. Priscian (6th century), or his not much older source, may still have read four plays of Accius in the original.

Influence

New tragedies of importance first appeared again under Augustus (Varius, Ovid) and in the 1st century A.D. (Seneca). All of them remained within the bounds of subject matter found in Republican tragedy. Accius therefore at first left no successor to match him. Like Euripides, Shakespeare, and Racine he marked a final point. But his influence spread beyond the bounds of his genre, as may be seen, for example, in the dramatic shape taken by Virgil's and Ovid's epics. According to Horace, who certainly was no friend of older Latin literature, the Romans had a natural gift for tragedy (epist. 2. 1. 166). In Accius, perhaps this found its purest expression.

Accius' influence is as significant as it is hard to verify, but is still traceable in one particular instance. Accius' Roman drama Brutus is our oldest evidence for Brutus' feigned foolishness. The poet may well have shaped the story which passed to Livy and Valerius Maximus and then influenced Saxo Grammaticus (History of Hamlet) and Belleforest (Tragic Tales), which were Shakespeare's sources.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> I. GOLLANZ, The Sources of Hamlet, Shakespeare Library ser. 2, vol. 12, 1926,

In spite of his broad education, Accius may no longer be regarded as an instance of the pioneer who tests his skill in many fields. Here, the comparison with Ennius falls short. As a tragedian, Accius was of an uncompromising nature. It is true that he was also a scholar but in his case, as in the earliest Hellenistic authors, reflection stood completely in the service of creativity. He is regarded as the greatest Roman tragedian. Even the scope of his works is impressive. A born poet, he fashioned striking pictures and set them before the eyes of his audience in all their symbolic power. His language successfully deployed flamboyant contrasts, but also verses full of quietly effective euphony and maxims which lent extreme density to his thought. He could conjure up an atmosphere without impairing clarity. In employing myth in all its richness and, in giving it artistic form, he prepared the ground for essential features of Augustan and Imperial poetry. Only against the background of Republican tragedy is it possible to understand Virgil's Roman interpretation of myth in the Aeneid and Ovid's universally human approach to myth in the Metamorphoses.

Editions: H. STEPHANUS, R. STEPHANUS (ESTIENNE), Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum, quorum opera non extant: Ennii, Accii, Lucilii, Laberii, Pacuvii, Afranii, Naevii, Caecilii aliorumque multorum, Genevae 1564. * A complete collection: J. DANGEL (TTrC), Paris 1995; E. H. WARMINGTON (TTr), ROL 2, 1936, 325–595; 598–599, 604–607. * trag.: O. RIBBECK, TRF, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1871, 136–227; praetextae 281–285; O. RIBBECK, TRF, Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1897, 157–263, praetextae 326–331. * praetextae: L. PEDROLI (TC), Fabularum praetextarum quae extant, Genova 1954, 70–74 (T), 115–117 (C). * G. DE DURANTE, Le Fabulae praetextae, Roma 1966, 30–39; 56–65. * Other works: K. BÜCHNER, FPL, Lipsiae 1982, 46–52 (numbers of fragments here identical with W. MOREL, FPL 1927). * gramm.: H. FUNAIOLI, GRF, Lipsiae 1907, vol. 1, 22–32. ** Lexicon: A. DE ROSALIA, Lexicon Accianum, Hildesheim 1982. * M. BINI, Index Morelianus sive verborum omnium poetarum Latinorum qui in Moreliana editione continentur, praefatus est A. TRAINA, Bologna 1980. ** Bibl.: H. J. METTE, Die römische Tragödie und die Neufunde zur griechischen Tragödie, Lustrum 9, 1964, esp. 107–160. * L. DI SALVO, Rassegna di studi acciani (1965–1978), BStudLat 9, 3, 1979, 316–332.

H. CANGIK, Varro (De poetis) über L. Accius, Hermes 96, 1968, 252–253. * H. CANGIK, Die republikanische Tragödie, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 308–347. * R. DEGL'INNOCENTI PIERINI, Studi su

---

esp. 27–33; V. BRØNDAL, Hamlet, principe al Danemarcei. Istorie unei legende, Revista Fundațiilor Regale 10, 1936, 1–15.

Accio, Firenze 1980. * F. DELLA CORTE, La filologia latina dalle origini a Varrone, Torino 1937, Firenze 2nd ed. 1981. * W. FAUTH, Der Traum des Tarquinius, Spuren einer etruskisch-mediterranen Widder-Sonnensymbolik bei Accius (fig. 212 D), Latomus 35, 1976, 469–503. * E. GABBA, Il Brutus di Accio, Dioniso 43, 1969, 377–383. * B. GLADIGOW, Trimmballast bei antiken Schiffen, WS 82, 1969, 37–48. * H. D. JOCELYN, Ancient Scholarship and Virgil's Use of Republican Latin Poetry 2, CQ n.s. 15, 1965, 126–144. * H. D. JOCELYN, The Quotations of Republican Drama in Priscian's Treatise De Metris Fabularum Terentii, esp. App. III: Accius' Medea sive Argonautae, Antichthon 1, 1967, 68–69. * I. LANA, L'Atreo di Accio e la leggenda di Atreo e Tieste nel teatro tragico romano, AAT 93, 1958–1959 (1959), 293–385. * A. LA PENNA, Atreo e Tieste sulle scene romane, in: Studi classici in onore di Q. Cataudella, Catania, Fac. di Lett. e Filos. 1972, 1, 357–371. * LEO, LG 384–405. * I. MARIOTTI, Tragédie romaine et tragédie grecque: Accius et Euripide, MH 22, 1965, 206–216. * S. MARIOTTI, Accio in Malsacano, RFIC 94, 1966, 181–184. * F. MARX, Accius, RE 1, 1893, 142–147. * A. POCIÑA PÉREZ, El tragediógrafo latino Lucio Acio, Granada 1984. * A. RESTA BARRILE, ed., Il Meleager di Accio, Latomus 50, 1991, 227–231. * N. W. SLATER, Two Republican Poets on Drama: Terence and Accius, in: B. ZIMMERMANN, Antike Dramentheorien und ihre Rezeption, Stuttgart 1992, 85–103. * A. TRAINA, Vortit barbare. Le traduzioni poetiche da Livio Andronico a Cicerone, Roma 1970, 181–203.

PLAUTUS

Life, Dates

Titus Plautus was born in Sarsina in Umbria. It is not quite certain whether he bore the gentile name Maccius, also attested at Pompeii. He calls himself Maccus (Asin. 11), something like 'Jack Pudding', after a character from the popular Atellane farce. This may be a joke, or it may be that both here and in the Mercator (prol. 9–10) he was still conscious of his past as an Atellane actor.<sup>1</sup> Since all three names echo the farce, we may be dealing with pseudonyms.<sup>2</sup> He died in 184 B.C. (Cic. Brut. 60) at Rome (Jerome chron. 1817). Since he attained old age (Cic. Cato 50) he may have been born before 250. He is said to have earned money as a worker in the theater, to have lost it in business dealings and then to have taken service with a miller. Allegedly three of his plays were composed in the mill (Varro apud Gell. 3. 3. 14). Whatever the truth of this, there is no doubt about his varied experience of life and his theatrical talent, nor about his Greek education. He must have acquired this for himself, perhaps under the influence of Livius Andronicus or Naevius.

<sup>1</sup> K. H. E. SCHUTTER, Quibus annis comoediae Plautinae primum actae sint quaeritur, diss. Groningen 1952, pp. i–v.

<sup>2</sup> A. S. GRATWICK, Titus Maccius Plautus, CQ 67 n.s. 23, 1973, 78–84.

About 130 plays were ascribed to Plautus. Of these the grammarian Lucius Aelius Stilo regarded 25 as undoubtedly genuine, while his pupil Varro accepted 21 (apud Gell. 3. 3. 3). These are the plays transmitted to us. On the basis of ancient notices preserved in the Codex Ambrosianus (A), about the dates<sup>1</sup> of first production (didascaliae), the Stichus may be dated to 200 B.C. and the Pseudolus to 191.<sup>2</sup> Cicero (Cato 50) attests that not only the Pseudolus, but also the Truculentus, was composed by the poet in his old age. The Miles falls, as v. 211 shows, into the later period of the life of Naevius who was a generation older,<sup>3</sup> and therefore may be dated 206–201 B.C. Perhaps it was a ‘draw’ at the Ludi plebei of 205<sup>4</sup> which had to be staged seven times. The Cistellaria was written before the end of the Second Punic War (Prologue 201–202), the Trinummus (v. 990) at the earliest in 194.<sup>5</sup> The Epidicus is mentioned in the Bacchides (v. 214), and therefore must be older. Parodies reminiscent of the original production of Pacuvius’ Antiopa prove the late date of the Persa, Pseudolus, and Casina. That poet’s career was beginning in Plautus’ last years.<sup>6</sup>

The dating of the Mostellaria teaches an interesting lesson about method. The play speaks (v. 941) of ‘newly elected magistrates’. In those days they entered office on March 15. The only possible occasion therefore for Plautus’ play is at the Ludi Megalenses in April, a festival which included dramatic presentations only since 194 (Livy 34. 54. 3). Accordingly this year is the earliest date for the Mostellaria<sup>7</sup>—

<sup>1</sup> SCHUTTER’S dissertation is basic: s. the note before the last.

<sup>2</sup> Doubts are raised by H. B. MATTINGLY, The Plautine Didascaliae, Athenaeum n.s. 35, 1957, 78–88.

<sup>3</sup> L. SCHAFF, Die Todesjahre des Naevius und des Plautus, RhM 122, 1979, 24–33.

<sup>4</sup> C. BUCK, A Chronology of the Plays of Plautus, Baltimore 1940, 84.

<sup>5</sup> F. RITSCHL, De actae Trinummi tempore, Ind. lect. Bonn 1843, repr. in: Parerga 1, Leipzig 1845, 339–354, esp. 348; for 187 B.C.: T. FRANK, Some Political Allusions in Plautus’ Trinummus, AJPh 53, 1932, 152–156.

<sup>6</sup> A. THIERFELDER, Plautus und die römische Tragödie, Hermes 74, 1939, 155–166.

<sup>7</sup> K. H. E. SCHUTTER, De Mostellariae Plautinae actae tempore, in: Ut pictura poesis, FS P. J. ENK, Leiden 1955, 174–183.

provided that v. 941 is genuine and may be referred to Roman conditions.

Other evidence is less secure. Parallel passages in particular often allow different interpretations.<sup>1</sup> Stylistic criteria have an even smaller degree of certainty, since such differences may be influenced by outward circumstances, by change of models and by the whims of the author. With this proviso the following criteria may be mentioned: the increase in lyrical parts;<sup>2</sup> the spread of intrusive subordinate clauses;<sup>3</sup> the decline in the use of recitative (long verses);<sup>4</sup> the more sophisticated conduct of the plot;<sup>5</sup> the more prominent role assigned to the cunning slave; the cumulative development of thematic references into a coherent imagery; the increase in Roman elements. Even if the chronological reliability of such studies may be doubted, they do have the merit of directing our attention to Plautus' artistic achievement.<sup>6</sup>

Survey of Works

The Amphitruo, as the poet himself explains in his prologue, is a tragicomoedia, dealing with kings and gods. The subject is mythical. Jupiter courts Alcmene, while her husband Amphitruo is kept far from Thebes by his military duties. Since Jupiter appears in the form of Amphitruo, and Mercury as a double of the slave Sosia, after Amphitruo's return a whole series of confusions develops. Plautus exploits all the possibilities of presentation, ranging from amusing comedy to the most poignant tragedy, especially in the lyric roles of Sosia and Alcmene. It is this crossing of generic boundaries which creates the special charm of this favorite play.

The Asinaria is a prank, dominated by situation comedy and ready wit. The young lover Argyrippus cannot find the money which the lena Cleareta

<sup>1</sup> F. W. HALL, Repetitions and Obsessions in Plautus, CQ 20, 1926, 20–26.

<sup>2</sup> W. B. SEDGWICK, The Cantica of Plautus, CR 39–40, 1925–1926, 55–58.

<sup>3</sup> J. SCHNEIDER, De enuntiatii secundariis interpositis quaestiones Plautinae, diss. Leipzig 1937; W. B. SEDGWICK, The Dating of Plautus' Plays, CQ 24, 1930, 102–106; id., Plautine Chronology, AJPh 70, 1949, 376–383; A. DE LORENZI, Cronologia ed evoluzione Plautina, Napoli 1952.

<sup>4</sup> V. PÜTTNER, Zur Chronologie der Plautinischen Komödien, Progr. Ried 1905/06.

<sup>5</sup> J. N. HOUGH, The Development of Plautus' Art, CPh 30, 1935, 43–57.

<sup>6</sup> P. A. JOHNSTON follows a cultural-historical approach (Poenulus 1. 2 and Roman Women, TAPhA 110, 1980, 143–159); she dates the Poenulus to 191 B.C. or later; see however now G. MAURACH's Commentary on the Poenulus 1988, p. 33 (between 195 and 189). On the Curculio and Trinummus N. W. SLATER, The Dates of Plautus' Curculio and Trinummus Reconsidered, AJPh 108, 1987, 264–269.

is demanding for her daughter Philaenium. Slaves finally hand him the money which in fact is owed to his father for an ass he has sold (thus Asinaria). Even so, a rival steals a march on the young lover; and there is a second rival who turns out to be the young man's own father.

The Aulularia, in spite of its basic tone of cheerful burlesque, at times verging almost on the grotesque, is nevertheless a comedy of character. Old Euclio has inherited not only a treasure from his grandfather and father, but also the obsessive fear of losing it. This makes him more of a 'mistrustful' character than a regular miser. It is from this pot of gold that the comedy takes its name. His rich neighbor Megadorus meanwhile is seeking his daughter Phaedria in marriage. Euclio scents danger: does his intended son-in-law know anything about the pot of gold, and does he therefore want to filch the treasure? Eventually he gives permission, but makes extremely parsimonious wedding preparations. To protect his treasure during the celebrations he takes it to the temple of Fides, watched by the slave Strobilus. But he will not even trust Trust personified. He seeks a better hiding place, and once again Strobilus is secretly on his track. Meanwhile, Megadorus' nephew Lyconides has confessed to his uncle that he has already won Phaedria's love. Now Euclio comes on stage, full of despair. His treasure has been stolen! Lyconides thinks that Euclio is talking about his daughter and accuses himself, but of course Euclio is talking about his pot of gold. There is a classic scene of misunderstanding. Finally the thievish slave is unmasked, and the gold is given to the happy couple.

The Bacchides has a double plot of intrigue, telling of two young fellows with their servants, two fathers and two hetaerae (the Bacchides). During the course of the play, fathers and sons become rivals. The brilliant director of the action is the slave Chrysalus with his unmatched cleverness, one of Plautus' most subtly drawn slave characters.

Already the prologue of the Captivi proclaims (57-58) that the typical figures of comedy are not to appear, and there are no women's roles at all. Old Hegio keeps buying prisoners of war in the hope of securing the freedom of his son, who is held captive by the enemy. When rich Philocrates falls into his hands he decides to send off Philocrates' slave to redeem his (Hegio's) son and send him home with a ransom. However master and slave have exchanged clothes. Philocrates is free. But on that very day he returns with Hegio's son Philopolemus. The slave who has stayed behind in Philocrates' place is revealed as Hegio's long-vanished second son, and this scene of recognition marks the culmination. The parasite Ergasilus is an hilarious ingredient in the play. In some respects its composition appears slack, lacking in thoroughness, and exaggerated. Even so, the portrait of human weaknesses and good qualities is prominent, while the farcical element is replaced by subtle irony.

The Casina is a comedy of intrigue, full of complications and grotesque situations. Father and son are in love with the same girl, the slave Casina. The struggle between the two rivals is fought on two 'battlefields': father and son each send a slave who pretends he wishes to marry Casina. It goes without saying that the one chosen will yield to his master the right of the first night. Old Lysidamus' slave Olympio manages to prevail, but the jealous wife succeeds in frustrating the scheme and allows Chalinus, her son's slave, to take Casina's place. Thus what was supposed to be a bridal night actually became a scene of battery. Now Lysidamus comes repentantly back to his wife, and the way is left open for the young people. The scenes and characters of the comedy are, in certain respects, pushed to the point of caricature, and overdrawn.

In spite of its fragmentary transmission, we are still in a position to reconstruct the Cistellaria, the 'box comedy'. It is focused on an unhappy couple: Alcesimarchus is supposed to marry a girl whom he does not love; his beloved Selenium is a hetaera, who will not be given up by the lena, her mother Nelaenis. At the last moment, Selenium prevents Alcesimarchus from committing suicide. At this point, the married couple Demipho and Phanostrata identify the girl as their child who was once exposed. A box of toys serves as the token of recognition. With this, Selenium takes her place in society and may marry Alcesimarchus. The characters in this comedy are treated as types without becoming stereotypical. In spite of all, the effect they create is realistic. In this play, too, character portrayal is more important than the plot.

In the Curculio, the basic situation is the same as in the Cistellaria. An ill-starred pair of lovers at first find their way to happiness barred. The heroine Planesium is of free birth, but has been purchased and confined by a leno. Finally, her legitimate status is proved by a token of recognition, and the marriage can take place. The parasite Curculio ('corn weevil') matches slyness with greed. He saves, though not without selfish motives, Planesium from being sold to a soldier. The latter turns out to be, as Planesium suddenly discovers, her long-lost brother, and so from rival he becomes the witness to her free birth. The Curculio is a charming blend of elements, combining satirical realism with the romantic idyll (for example, the scene at night with its serenade and rendezvous, vv. 147-216). The Janus-faced character of Curculio lends a special piquancy to a comic dialectic which lives on in harlequin and in Shakespeare's fools.

The Epidicus, in spite of its brevity, is a play of complex intrigue. Its hero, the wily slave Epidicus, enjoys free scope as director of the action. He buys off the lyre player Acropolistis for the young Stratippocles, while telling the father Periphanes that she is his long vanished daughter Telestis. However, the young fellow then brings another girl back from campaign. It is she whom Epidicus must now purchase, while disposing of Acropolistis. But this other girl is Telestis. The intrigue is successful, until Telestis' mother appears and recognizes her. The action is brilliantly calculated to produce the greatest possible complexity. The individual characters are drawn with perfect sympathy; there is no caricature. In spite of the intrigue that takes center stage, this is a play of humane ideas in which the comic principle is represented by Epidicus who gave the play its name.

The Menaechmi, like the Amphitruo, rests on the theme of doubles. Twin brothers, both called Menaechmus, have been separated since childhood, and suddenly find themselves unawares in the same town. This produces endless complications and misunderstandings. Finally the cunning slave Messenio brings the two together. This comedy of mistaken identity is distinguished by rapid action and abstention from grotesque features and exaggerations.

In its action, the Mercator is reminiscent of the Casina. Charinus and his father Demipho are both in love with Pasicompsa. Frightened of his wife, Demipho hands the girl over to his neighbor Lysimachus, whose wife Dorippa has left for the countryside. She however returns earlier than expected, and lets fly a broadside of abuse against her husband. Eutychus, their son, has been sent out by Charinus to look for his missing beloved. He now arrives on the scene and explains everything. Demipho surrenders Pasicompsa on condition that Charinus says nothing to his mother. More than other Plautine comedies, this play is focused on subtle character portrayal and on the conflict between father and son.

The Miles gloriosus owes its life to its central character, the vainglorious braggart, although the other figures are also well-drawn. Pyrgopolynices, the soldier, has abducted Philocomasium. Her beloved Pleusicles discovers her whereabouts, thanks to his cunning slave Palaestrio, and moves into the near-by house of a friend. He then knocks a hole in the dividing wall so that the happy couple may meet undisturbed. However, they are discovered by the watchman Sceledrus. Palaestrio attempts to unravel the difficulties by claiming that Philocomasium is her own twin sister, only to create new problems. Palaestrio convinces his master's friend and host (Periplectomenus) to invite two hetaerae to pass themselves off as his wife and her maid in order to allure Pyrgopolynices, who swallows the bait and lets Philocomasium go. But at his rendezvous with his neighbor's 'wife' the entire household assails him with clubs.

The Mostellaria is a comedy of ghosts, full of intrigues and complications whose threads are again controlled by the cunning slave, Tranio. When Theopropides arrives home after a long absence, he almost stumbles into a wild party thrown by his son Philolaches for his girlfriend, his friends and various hetaerae. On the spur of the moment, Tranio invents a ghost which will prevent Theopropides from entering the house. At first the trick wins Theopropides' credence, but then everything collapses. Philolaches' friend, Callidamates, persuades Theopropides to relent. The Mostellaria is one of Plautus' most amusing plays, with a particularly colorful central character.

The Persa is a somewhat crude play of intrigue. It is notable for centering around a love affair among slaves and depicting the courageous, independent demeanor of a virgo.

Intrigue also occupies center stage in the Poenulus. A young lady and her sister are in the grasp of a leno, and must be rescued from their intended destiny as hetaerae. This comes about by a trick. Then it is revealed that both sisters are free-born girls from Carthage. The Carthaginian traveller Hanno is discovered to be a friend of the now-dead adoptive father of the young lover, and at the same time the real father of the two girls. Occasional passages in 'Punic' are intriguing for linguists, while the friend of literature takes delight in the characters drawn with a subtlety and a humanity worthy of Menander.

The Pseudolus is a fresh and lively play of intrigue. Pseudolus, a slave of genius but also something of a braggart, is unique even among Plautus' slaves for his tongue and his impudence. Once again the beloved of the young master (Calidorus) must be filched from a leno and rescued from her fate with a soldier. In spite of its rapid action, this mature play of Plautus is rich in ornament provided by cantica and monologues. The characters act their roles in full awareness. The leno knows that he must be very wicked (360-369), Calidorus that he has to be in love (238-240), the slave Pseudolus that he must be very cunning (905-907). Plautus is said to have been particularly fond of this comedy (Cic. Cato 50).

In the Rudens, the leno Labrax and two girls, Palaestra and Ampelisca, are shipwrecked by a storm on the coast of Africa near Cyrene. The shrine of Venus there coincidentally happens to be the agreed rendezvous of Palaestra and her lover, Plesidippus. The girls take refuge from the leno at the shrine, and use the slave Trachalio to establish contact with Plesidippus. With the aid of a distinguished citizen, Daemones, they are rescued from the leno. Meanwhile, Gripus, the fisherman, has discovered a chest in the shipwreck holding toys from Palaestra's childhood, which leads Daemones to recognize her as his daughter. The lack of action is compensated for by the liveliness of the slaves' repartee and of the chorus of fishermen.

The Stichus, short on intrigue, owes its comedy chiefly to the part of Gelasimus, the parasite. Two brothers, after a long absence brought about by bankruptcy, return to their wives, whose father had long been planning to marry them off again. But he now changes his mind because of the newly-won riches of his sons-in-law. A banquet follows, but the parasite may not take part because in his time, thanks to his greed, he has been partly to blame for the bankruptcy. Accompanying this, there is a celebration by the servants to which the slave Stichus extends invitations. The comedy is cheerful and ironic. Its atmosphere and characters are sympathetically drawn in accordance with the original by Menander.

Trinummus is a family drama with a moralizing background. Lesbonicus lives a life of debauchery until his father returns. The truth that house and property have been squandered must be suppressed. However the innocent deception which he spins along with his friend collapses. He is forgiven on condition that he marries immediately (1185). In this wholly masculine play, subtle irony dominates, and there is less comedy. Character portrayal is close to life; the development of the action particularly clear and self-contained.

The Truculentus is a wild and coarse play of intrigue centering around an avaricious hetaera, Phronesium. Through her low machinations she tries to fleece three lovers simultaneously. The play takes its name from the slave Truculentus, a crude fellow in every sense of the term. He becomes involved in a refreshingly unrefined affair with Astaphium, Phronesium's maid.

The Vidularia, which has come down to us in mutilated form must have been similar to the Rudens. Young Nicodemus is shipwrecked and rescued by an old fisherman. He works for his neighbor Dinia as a day laborer. Another fisherman rescues Nicodemus' chest from the sea, and so the hero is restored to prosperity. By the contents of the chest, Dinia recognizes him as his long-lost son.

Only fragments survive from the following plays: Acharistio, Addictus, Agroecus, Artemo, Astraba, Bacaria, Boeotia, Caecus vel Praedones, Calceolus, Carbonaria, +Cesistio+, Colax, Commorientes, Condaliium, Cornicula, Dyscolus, Faeneratrix, Fretum, Frivolaria, Fugitivi, Hortulus, Lenones gemini, Lipargus, Nervolaria, Phago, Parasitus medicus, Parasitus piger, Plocinus, Saturio, Schematicus, Sitellitergus, Trigemini.

Sources, Models, and Genres

As already indicated, Plautus was likely to choose his models not from the Old Comedy, but from the less mordant New. Other sources, if we discount the Italian theatrical tradition, are less noteworthy.<sup>1</sup> Within the genre, the range is quite broad. It stretches from Menandrian comedy with its subtle character drawing (Aulularia perhaps taken from Menander's Apistos; Stichus from the Adelphoi; Cistellaria from the Synaristosai; Bacchides from the Dis exapaton) to a more typical comedy of mistaken identities (Menaechmi); from the simple prank (Asinaria, based on the Onagos [rather than Onagros] of Demophilos) all the way to the serious drama of moral dilemma (Captivi). The tragicomic Amphitruo is unique; its source has been sought in the hilarotragoedia of Rhinthon of Tarentum.<sup>1</sup> Already among these predecessors there were substantial differences, even if we look no further than the work of a single poet. In Menander, ethos and subtle art of characterization coexist with more agitated scenes. The original of the Stichus, now that the recovery of the Dyskolos seems to confirm the genuineness of its lively conclusion, may be set in the Greek poet's early period. Diphilos wrote such varied works as the romantic Rudens, reminiscent of Euripides, and the somewhat coarser Casina. From Philemon comes a tranquil family play, rich in maxims, such as the Trinummus, and on the other hand the Mercator, in which one highly charged scene follows quickly on the heels of another. The running slave who, completely out of breath, has difficulty in delivering his important news; exaggerated fears of eavesdroppers raising eager expectation; excuses improvised on the spur of the moment; moralizing maxims; excess of pride on the part of the young hero; reconciliation mediated by a friend: these are some common features of Philemon's otherwise so different plays, which were already favorites with his Attic audience. Such are the often crowd-pleasing methods which Plautus takes up, fashions for himself and bequeaths to European comedy. From Menander he takes the immortal scene of mutual misunderstanding, e.g. in the Aulularia the young hero is talking of his beloved, while the old miser is speaking of his pot of gold. In the Mostellaria, whose original is unknown,<sup>2</sup> even three characters in turn give different meanings to their words. The plays Plautus takes from Diphilus on the one hand provide inspiration for romantic plays of a later period (Shakespeare), while on the other they exhibit 'archaic' features such as agon, chorus, the natural scenery of the satyr play. This means that the Rudens may simultaneously be regarded as one of the most 'old-fashioned' and yet most 'modern' plays. Comedies showing many of the merits of Menander's art without his inimitable gift for characterization, are ascribed to his successors: this is the case with the effective, but somewhat overdrawn, Miles<sup>3</sup> and the sharp

<sup>1</sup> Other possible models are suggested by H. LUCAS, Die Scherbenkomödien des Epicharm und Plautus, WS 56, 1938, 111-117; B. VENERONI, Allaccamenti tematici tra la commedia greco-latina e il mimo di Eröda, RIL 107, 1973, 760-772; W. F. HANSEN, An Oral Source for the Menaechmi, CW 70, 1977, 385-390.

<sup>1</sup> F. DUPONT, Signification théâtrale du double dans l'Amphitryon de Plaute, REL 54, 1976, 129-141.

<sup>2</sup> For Philemon: M. KNORR, Das griechische Vorbild der Mostellaria des Plautus, diss. München, Coburg 1934.

<sup>3</sup> See however K. GAISER, Zum Miles gloriosus des Plautus: Eine neuerschlossene

caricatures, satiric detachment and loose structure of the Truculentus.<sup>1</sup>

In different plays, the influence of the Middle Comedy has been assumed.<sup>2</sup> The Persa is an example, although such influence there is not universally accepted.<sup>3</sup> Features of Middle Comedy, of which we know hardly anything, have been sought in the already mentioned plays adapted from Diphilus and in the Poenulus, although the latter as we now know goes back not to Menander but to his uncle Alexis.<sup>4</sup> The Curculio cannot be definitely traced to an original. It is assigned to the early period of New Comedy and even to Menander himself.<sup>5</sup> The quite extraordinary 'parabasis'<sup>6</sup> in it produces an archaic effect. The Amphitruo is also associated by some scholars with the Middle Comedy. In fact, because of its mythological plot, it is an exception to the genre of New Comedy, although precisely because of its burlesque of the gods it is also regarded as the work of an ironic late-comer. Since on the one hand we possess only Euripides, and on the other a few plays of Menander, too much leeway is left for the critic wishing to construct the history of Greek drama from Euripides to Plautus. It is not always possible, in the case of plays of coarser texture, to decide whether they are 'still' primitive<sup>7</sup> or 'already' trite. Conversely, in a period where Euripides is an early author, irony cannot be a criterion for late dating.

The first difficulty for the interpretation of Plautus therefore is our defective knowledge of his models. The only sure ground is furnished by comparison with Menander. The task of separating what is 'Plautine' from what is 'Attic'<sup>8</sup> is easiest in the Bacchides to which we possess,

---

Menander-Komödie und ihre literaturgeschichtliche Stellung (1967), repr. in: Die römische Komödie: Plautus und Terenz, ed. by E. LEFÈVRE, Darmstadt 1973, 205–248.

<sup>1</sup> For a Menandrian origin P. J. ENK, Plautus' Truculentus, in: FS B. L. ULLMAN, Rome 1964, vol. 1, 49–65; more correctly (in the school of Menander): the same author in his edition of the Truculentus, Leiden 1953.

<sup>2</sup> U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, De tribus carminibus Latinis commentatio (1893); repr. in: Kleine Schriften 2, 1941, 260–274.

<sup>3</sup> G. L. MÜLLER, Das Original des plautinischen Persa, diss. Frankfurt 1957 (bibl.).

<sup>4</sup> W. G. ARNOTT, The Author of the Greek Original of the Poenulus, RhM 102, 1959, 252–262; see earlier H. LUCAS, Der Karchedonios des Alexis als Vorbild des plautinischen Poenulus, RhM 88, 1939, 189–190. On Diphilos' place in the tradition: W. T. MACCARY, The Comic Tradition and Comic Structure in Diphilos' Kleroumenoi, Hermes 101, 1973, 194–208.

<sup>5</sup> T. B. L. WEBSTER, Studies in Later Greek Comedy, Manchester 1953, 189–202.

<sup>6</sup> H. JORDAN, Die Parabase im Curculio bei Plautus, Hermes 15, 1880, 116–136.

<sup>7</sup> F. DELLA CORTE, La commedia dell'asinaio, RFIC 79, 1951, 289–306 (influence of Doric comedy).

<sup>8</sup> G. JACHMANN, Plautinisches und Attisches, Berlin 1931.

thanks to a papyrus, a lengthy parallel text in Greek.<sup>1</sup> This new evidence proves that those scholars were right who had attributed to the Roman a good deal of independence in his reworking. Plautus removed two scenes which served more to sketch character than to forward the plot. He allowed the hero to be ironic at his own expense in his monologue, when in the middle of his sentence his decisiveness ebbs away and his thought swings round to its opposite: 'I punish her in every way so that a beggar's staff is all that is left—for my father' (Bacchides 507a–508). We will come back to the particularly striking expression given to the reproach uttered to the friend. The circumstance that a section full of 'Athenian humanitas' is now shown to be an addition by Plautus, and that two scenes have been omitted which no one had previously missed, gives pause for thought.

With this in mind, some of the chief criteria determining the analysis of Plautus may be mentioned. Besides the comparison with original texts there is another criterion: the critic should ask himself, whether certain crucial concepts may be translated back into Greek. The methods of the Latin scholar for establishing what is 'Plautine in Plautus' are of more consequence. Starting with obvious points, such as the mention of Roman topics and affairs, this method of interpretation leads on to the establishment of Plautus' mental processes, for example, that of the conundrum as an interplay of transformation and identification ('my father is a fly: we can't keep anything away from him', Merc. 361). Here may be categorized the use of comparisons to introduce speeches (e.g. Cas. 759–779), personification of inanimate objects, extension of monologues, introduction of features which do not forward the action, elaboration of the role of the slave especially by the use of military terminology, and in particular of course the independent fashioning of the recitative and the sung parts (cantica), meaning that the comedy of dialogue in fact approximates a musical comedy. E. Fraenkel's observations<sup>2</sup> on language and style, especially his studies concerning the role of the slave, point the way to a descriptive structural analysis of imagery, which reveals our poet's creativity, both aural and visual.

<sup>1</sup> Plaut. Bacch. 494–562; Men. Dis exap. 11–112 (ed. SANDBACH). On this E. HANDLEY, Menander and Plautus. A Study in Comparison, University College London, Inaugural Lecture, 1968; C. QUESTA, Alcune strutture sceniche di Plauto e Menandro, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 16, 1970, 183–228; K. GAISER, Die plautinischen Bacchides und Menanders Dis exapaton, Philologus 114, 1970, 51–87; V. PÖSCHL, Die neuen Menanderpapyri und die Originalität des Plautus, SHAW 1973.

<sup>2</sup> E. FRAENKEL, Plautinisches im Plautus, Berlin 1922; Elementi plautini in Plauto, Firenze 1960 (enlarged); an instructive example: E. FANTHAM, The Curculio of Plautus. An Illustration of Plautine Methods of Adaptation, CQ 59, 1965, 84–100.

More dated is the research into the question of so-called contaminatio.<sup>1</sup> It starts from the presupposition that Plautus in many plays interwove two or even three Greek comedies. However, a 'large-scale' contaminatio of this type has not so far been proved conclusively. An example is the Miles. Because it contains two consecutive intrigues, it was traced back to two Greek originals. But it may be objected that the theme, which half resembles a fairy-tale, is found elsewhere in world literature connecting two elements considered heterogeneous; that even elsewhere New Comedy displays two intrigues (cf. titles such as Δις ἐξῆρατῶν); and that finally, if we read the text closely, the second intrigue is implied in the first and is merely an 'expanded stage' of it.<sup>2</sup>

Even so, studies on contaminatio are justified. Their point of departure is the existence of undeniable inconsistencies and contradictions found in Plautus.<sup>3</sup> The cogency of their premise, that in the Greek original all must have proceeded logically, without contradiction or hiatus, was overestimated for a long time. Once however it is conceded that many inconsistencies may be traced back to the original,<sup>4</sup> the prospects for successful analysis become gloomy. Nevertheless even in this area Plautine scholarship has attained secure results, although only where 'small-scale' contaminatio is concerned, such as the insertion by the poet of individual scenes, mostly from one other Greek play.

With every new discovery of Menander papyri, we are forced to rethink. In one respect, our admiration for Plautus' originality rises; in another, it becomes clear that Menander could employ final scenes of uproar, as in the Dyskolos; introduce a slave planning an intrigue, as in the Aspis; and that he even did not shrink back from exchanges

<sup>1</sup> On the word: J. B. HOFMANN, Contaminare, IF 53, 1935, 187-195; W. BEARE, CR 73, 1959, 7-11; on the question of contaminatio M. BARCHIESI, Problematica e poesia in Plauto, Maia 9, 1957, 163-203, esp. 185-186 with bibl.; a broad treatment in Schaaf (see the following note); G. GUASTELLA, La contaminazione e il parassita. Due studi su teatro e cultura romana, Pisa 1988.

<sup>2</sup> L. SCHAAF, Der Miles gloriosus des Plautus und sein griechisches Original. Ein Beitrag zur Kontaminationsfrage, München 1977, 300.

<sup>3</sup> For example, in the Captivi the unexpected appearance of the old slave and the swift return of Philocrates, in the Amphitruo the birth immediately after the 'long night'.

<sup>4</sup> W. H. FRIEDRICH, Euripides und Diphilos, München 1953.

of abuse between domestic wits, again in the Aspis. Furthermore, our knowledge of Plautus has greatly profited from research into fragments of comedy by authors other than Menander.<sup>1</sup>

A further working hypothesis is also found to be of limited application: the notion that Plautus destroyed the symmetry of his models. In the previously mentioned Bacchides, it is true that the removal of two of Menander's scenes produced a small scale change in proportion. But on a large scale, the play's symmetry was actually made more perfect.<sup>2</sup> In the Mostellaria,<sup>3</sup> the musical arrangement of the scenes before the exposition of the plot (1. 4) and before the dénouement (4. 1 and 2), produces clear points of reference, between which the central part of the play is artistically constructed.

The role of music in the general structure of the plays is reflected in the regular alternation of spoken parts (senarii), recitative (long verses), and sung, lyrical scenes.

Our regret that there are still relatively few interpretations of Plautus is tempered by the knowledge that the interpreter here is confronted with unusual difficulties. The question of what is Plautine and what is Attic is already complex. But it is made more so by the problem of double versions and interpolations. In the text as transmitted, often double and even triple versions have been left. In the ancient edition lying behind our tradition, these were indicated by critical signs, which disappeared in the course of time. In our oldest manuscript A, portions of text are missing which are preserved in the medieval tradition P. Sometimes P has maintained the 'scholarly' character of its model better than A. Apart from double versions, interpolations<sup>4</sup> are also intrusive. Many prologues read now as they were delivered when the plays were produced again in the middle of the 2nd century.

In these conditions the interpreter must steer a course between the Scylla of hypercritical fault-finding and the Charybdis of uncritical failure to see any problem. The rewarding course is to accept the challenge.

<sup>1</sup> H. W. PRESCOTT, Criteria of Originality in Plautus, TAPhA 63, 1932, 103-125.

<sup>2</sup> J. R. CLARK, Structure and Symmetry in the Bacchides of Plautus, TAPhA 106, 1976, 85-96; see also W. STEIDLE, Probleme des Bühnenspiels in der Neuen Komödie, GB 3, 1975, 341-386.

<sup>3</sup> I. WEIDE, Der Aufbau der Mostellaria des Plautus, Hermes 89, 1961, 191-207.

<sup>4</sup> A. THERFELDER, De rationibus interpolationum Plautinarum, Leipzig 1929; H. D. JOCELYN, Chrysalis and the Fall of Troy, HSPH 73, 1969, 134-152 (Interpolations in the Bacchides).

As well as elements of comedy, traces of tragic poetry are also found in Plautus. These were probably transmitted in part by Greek comedy or hilarotragedia. However, there are certainly also imitations of Latin tragedies.<sup>1</sup>

Among other representatives of the Latin tradition, we see that Naevius was Plautus' most important predecessor, especially in regard to powerful, vivid language. In trying to pinpoint the origin of the cantica we are left in the dark. Their polymetry may be compared with Euripidean choral songs and Hellenistic lyric such as The Maiden's Lament, though, unlike Euripides, Plautus is hardly writing choral lyric. Plautus' closeness to Roman tragedy is certainly significant; although there choral lyric played a greater role, and meters were less complex. It is a probable assumption that Plautus took up native musical traditions, which must, however, be thought of as sharing a living link with Hellenistic music.

In calling himself Maccus, Plautus identified himself with a character from the Atellane. It is plausible that his original vis comica is rooted in this native type of drama, which was played by free citizens. Quite apart from this, scholars searched for other popular sources, such as fables.<sup>2</sup> At any rate, it is a mistake to regard Plautus merely as a 'translator' of plays of New Comedy. He is rather the creator of specifically Roman comedies with the musical structure of Roman tragedy and stylized humorous additions from rustic farce.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See below: Language and Style (also on the cantica).

<sup>2</sup> P. BRIND'AMOUR, Des ânes et des bœufs dans l'Aululaire. Commentaire des vers 226–235, Maia 28, 1976, 25–27; on the relationship of Plautus to his sources and models: A. BLANCHARD, Essai sur la composition des comédies de Ménandre, Paris 1983, ch. V: Les adaptations de Plaute; on individual plays: W. STEIDLE, Plautus' Amphitruo und sein griechisches Original, RhM 122, 1979, 34–48; P. HARVEY, Historical Allusions and the Date of the Amphitruo, Athenaeum 59, 1981, 480–489 (line 193: 201 B.C.); H. TRÄNKLE, Amphitruo und kein Ende, MH 40, 1983, 217–238 (mingling of comic and tragic elements); E. STAERK, Die Geschichte des Amphitruostoffes vor Plautus, RhM 125, 1982, 275–303 (model allegedly a tragedy); R. L. HUNTER, The Aulularia and its Greek Original, PCPhS 27, 1981, 37–49; L. FINETTE, Le Dis exapaton et les Bacchides. Deux ou trois fourberies, CEA 15, 1983, 47–60; E. LEFÈVRE, Neue und alte Erkenntnisse zur Originalität der römischen Komödie, Plautus und Menander, Freiburger Universitätsblätter 18, fasc. 65, 1979, 13–22 (on the Bacchides); M. WALTENBERGER, Plautus' Casina und die Methode der Analyse, Hermes 109, 1981, 440–447 (influence of the Kleroumenoi of Diphilos); E. LEFÈVRE, Plautus-Studien 4. Die Umformung des Ἀλαζών zu der Doppelkomödie des Miles gloriosus, Hermes 112, 1984, 30–53 (a philosophical piece is turned into a farce by elimination of the theological features); on this K. DÉR, Duplex argumentum, Homonoia 5, 1983, 129–160; E. LEFÈVRE, Diphilos and Plautus. Der Rudens und sein Original, AAWM 1984, 10; W. S. ANDERSON, Plautus' Trinummus. The Absurdity of Officious Morality, Traditio 35, 1979, 333–345; R. HUNTER, Philemon, Plautus and the Trinummus, MH 37, 1980, 216–230.

Literary Technique

In the last analysis, according to Aristotle (poet. 1450a 15–23) plot takes precedence over character portrayal. In what follows, minor modifications must be made, and in general, before passing a judgement on Plautus' art we should not forget that Aristotle's view of drama is only one of several approaches.

The papyri of Menander's comedies exhibit a division into five acts; the plays are four times interrupted by the remark XOPOY. While the Greek plays mark four definite places for musical and choreographic interludes, in Plautus regular and explicit indications of this kind are missing. It is therefore assumed that the plays were acted at one go,<sup>2</sup> perhaps not only in order to prevent the audience from leaving the theater in favor of other attractions (cf. Ter. Hec. prol. 33–36; Hor. epist. 2. 1. 185–186). Traces of the Greek conclusion of an act are seen in the reference to the entry of a drunken crowd of nightly revellers (komos).<sup>3</sup> The division into acts found in our plays goes back to the Renaissance,<sup>4</sup> and therefore has no authority for us. A more illuminating principle in the structure of Plautine comedy is a division into 'exposition', 'tying' of the knot ('complication') of intrigue and 'release' (unraveling, 'dénouement'). Such terms spring from the very nature of the plot. The avoidance of musical entr'actes has more than an external explanation. It is connected with the profound transformation of comedy into a musical performance. Music was no longer an adventitious extra irrelevant to the text. In sung scenes, it became a fixed element of the action on the stage. A structural analysis of the Mostellaria has shown that Plautus used such scenes to mark the introduction of the main action and the point before the dénouement. This means that the previously mentioned division of

<sup>1</sup> G. A. SHEETS, Plautus and Early Roman Comedy, ICS 8, 1983, 195–209.

<sup>2</sup> A different theory in G. MAURACH, Preface to his edition of the Poenulus; see now J. A. BARSBY, Actors and Act Divisions. Some Questions of Adaptation in Roman Comedy, Antichthon 16, 1982, 77–87.

<sup>3</sup> Bacch. 107. At Pseud. 573 it is announced that the tibicen will fill the interlude with his playing.

<sup>4</sup> C. QUESTA, Plauto diviso in atti prima di G. B. Pio (Codd. Vatt. Latt. 3304 e 2711), RCCM 4, 1962, 209–230.

the play into three parts was clearly accentuated by musical means. The recitatives and dialogues grouped between sung scenes reveal a significant order. This proves that Plautus did not abandon the five acts of his model without replacement, but that he substituted a musical and poetic structure arising from the very fabric of the plot.

Along with the formative principle indicated here, there are others for which the analysis is more difficult. For example, the Stichus may be divided into three stages: expectation, arrival and celebration of reunion. The plot comes to an early end in the second of these divisions, and the third makes a boisterous finale. The Truculentus is a loose sequence of scenes of a satiric rather than dramatic nature, and for this reason cannot be entirely derived from dramatic rules.

The parts of the Plautine comedy may now be noted in detail. The exposition is not necessarily moulded into scenes of dialogue such as are known from Terence. Plautus prefers to make use of the traditional form of the prologue, also familiar from Euripides and Menander. Its speaker may be a character from the play, but the characters' necessarily limited knowledge of events is often insufficient to give a satisfactory outline of the coming action to the spectator. This difficulty may be overcome in various ways. The simplest, if not the most elegant, solution is to give the character more knowledge in the prologue than it has in the actual play (Mil. 147-153). In order to avoid this contradiction, in addition to the human speaker, a second, divine character may be introduced (Cist.). He fills in the gaps of knowledge left by the previous speaker. It is also possible, following an old tragic and comic tradition, to have the entire prologue spoken by a god (Aul.) or an allegorical figure (Trin.), closely related to the action. As a last and artistically least attractive option there remains finally the anonymous, omniscient prologue speaker. Plautus most often employs prologues, and where they are missing they may have been subsequently lost. We may not however exclude the possibility that in individual cases the poet did without a prologue and tried a technique of 'suspense-filled' presentation, a method which would become more frequent in Terence.

The surviving prologues were partly revised and expanded in the course of later productions about the middle of the 2nd century. As a rule, the prologue informs us on the scene of the action, and on the Greek and Latin title; moreover, it often contains the name of the Greek playwright and of Plautus. The announcement of the title is a detail not known from Menander. We may surmise, therefore, that the Roman audience did often not know previously what exactly was the title of the piece. The prologue furthermore presents the principal character and narrates the previous part of the story so far as it is relevant to understanding the plot. Occasionally it even goes further, as in the Mercator, where the description of the father's rise to wealth is somewhat long-winded (61–72). For the continuation and conclusion of the action, the prologue is usually satisfied with hints, allowing the spectator to recognize or guess the play's happy end. Allusions to future details of the plot or confusion of identity are generally only given when the action is complex. This is the case in the mistaken identities of the Amphitruo (140–147) and in the Miles gloriosus (147–153). To help his audience, Plautus distinguished his Jupiter from his human double even by an external mark of recognition. After this additional effort to avoid any possible confusion, the poet can later afford the joke of having Jupiter maintain that he is Amphitruo, of course with the important addition that we are dealing with an Amphitruo who can turn himself into Jupiter. In this instance the audience has in some sense too much information, and this permits a new sort of play with the artistic instrument of 'prologue' or 'intermediate prologue'. In general, the prologue has the task of taking the spectator up to a vantage point and giving him a bird's eye view of the play. One element of the pleasure taken by the spectator in the comedy lies in the awareness that he can see through the mistakes of the characters. This requires above all a knowledge of the real identities of the characters concerned. We can now see why gods are particularly appropriate in delivering prologues. Their vantage point from the very outset is that of superior knowledge. It cannot however be maintained that this prologue technique destroys all dramatic suspense. The poet is merely telling the spectator what might assure him the requisite superiority. After the 'what' is more or less established, the spectator can take undisturbed satisfaction in noting the 'how'. But when it comes to the details, there is still quite a lot concealed from him. He can still go wrong, and then, when he discovers his mistake, laugh in relief.

Excessive information was already mentioned. But there is also the reverse. In the Stichus, we learn facts essential to our understanding only after the lapse of several hundred verses. This makes the assumption especially probable that there must have been a prologue. In other plays, the expectations of the public are sometimes sent off in a wrong direction. In ancient comedy too, there is not merely the error of the characters, but also that of the audience; and the poets play with it. In comedies of mistaken identity, we observe a particular regularity in the sequence of scenes, for example, in the change-off between Amphitruo I and Amphitruo II or Menaechmus I and II. This rational structure makes a fascinating contrast with the irrational confusions, and moreover, by its inner logic, helps the spectator understand the plot.<sup>1</sup>

The prologue may stand first, but it may also follow an introductory scene which explains in dialogue the nature of the principal characters. This form of introduction is found, for example, in the Miles gloriosus and in the Cistellaria. It is livelier and more exciting than the traditional introductory prologue, since it immediately leads in medias res. But even this was already known before Plautus (in Menander's Aspis, for instance).

One or more expository scenes may be found near the prologue. Occasionally, the prologue positively refuses to give an exposition: 'Don't expect me to say anything to you about the content of the play. The old people who are just about to come on stage will let you know what is happening' (Trin. 16-17). The description of the principal characters is also part of the exposition, whether direct or indirect. A typically Plautine touch in the prologue is the jesting and familiar quasi-dialogue with the audience, including witty address to unnamed individuals (Men. 51-55).<sup>2</sup>

An introductory scene in dialogue requires a second speaker who sometimes in the later course of the play has either a small or no role. Such figures are called πρόσωπα προτατικά. This technique is occasionally used by Plautus; it will be favored and expressly emphasized (cf. Trin. 16-17) by Terence. Five plays have no prologue, and nine a prologue which explains nothing of the plot. The prologue of the Bacchides is lost, as may also be the case elsewhere.<sup>3</sup> In comedies of deception like the Curculio and the Epidicus, the prologue may have been intentionally omitted in order to increase dramatic suspense, and this would be an anticipation of Terence's method.

<sup>1</sup> A. GOLDBACHER, Über die symmetrische Verteilung des Stoffes in den Menaechmen, FS J. VAHLEN, Berlin 1900, 203-218.

<sup>2</sup> R. CRAHAY and M. DELCOURT, Les ruptures d'illusion dans les comédies antiques, AIPhO 12 (= Mélanges H. GRÉGOIRE 4), 1952, 83-92.

<sup>3</sup> F. LEO, 2nd ed. 1912, 188-247, thinks that originally all of Plautus' plays had prologues, some of which were lost; but it is possible that Plautus employed different techniques on different occasions (G. B. DUCKWORTH 1952, 211-218).

Characterization may go no further than types. Such types, formed at the latest in the course of the Middle Comedy, are the young lover, the stern father,<sup>1</sup> the bickering matron,<sup>2</sup> the boastful soldier,<sup>3</sup> the greedy hetaera, the unscrupulous leno, the lena,<sup>4</sup> the cunning slave,<sup>5</sup> the parasite, the moneylender, the cook,<sup>6</sup> the doctor.

A more sophisticated method is the presentation of two opposite characters: the cunning and the stupid slave, the authoritarian, and the liberal old gentleman. A significant sidelight is thrown on cultural history by the absence of the adulteress among comic characters. This was an offence which could not be taken lightly. In the Amphitruo, as still in Kleist, Alcmene accordingly appears as anything but a comic character.

Subtle deviation from traditional types is particularly frequent in Menander's masterly character portrayal. In contrast to the cliché-ridden stereotype, he presents the high-minded hetaera and the morally superior foreign slave who gives his Greek master a lesson in humanity. This is Menander's gentle protest against conventions and established opinions. Even more delicate are the shades which distinguish, for example, pairs of sisters from each other, as in the Cistellaria<sup>7</sup> and the Stichus.<sup>8</sup> In the latter comedy, one sister is ready for compro-

<sup>1</sup> H.-W. RISSOM, Vater- und Sohnmotive in der römischen Komödie, diss. Kiel 1971; J. M. CODY, The senex amator in Plautus Casina, Hermes 104, 1976, 453-476.

<sup>2</sup> Different nuances are emphasized by E. SCHUHMANN, Der Typ der uxor dotata in den Komödien des Plautus, Philologus 121, 1977, 45-65.

<sup>3</sup> Probably rarer than previously assumed: G. WARTENBERG, Der miles gloriosus in der griechisch-hellenistischen Komödie, in: Die gesellschaftliche Bedeutung des antiken Dramas für seine und für unsere Zeit. Protokoll der Karl-Marx-Städter Fachtagung (1969), ed. by W. HOFMANN and H. KUCH, Berlin 1973, 197-205; W. HOFMANN and G. WARTENBERG, Der Bramarbas in der antiken Komödie, Abh. d. Akad. d. Wiss. der DDR 1973, 2, Berlin 1973.

<sup>4</sup> G. HORSTMAYER, Die Kupplerin. Studien zur Typologie im dramatischen Schrifttum Europas, Diss. Köln 1972.

<sup>5</sup> E. FRAENKEL, Elementi plautini in Plauto (German original 1922), Firenze 1960, 223-241; G. FREYBURGER, La morale et la fides chez l'esclave de la comédie, REL 55, 1977, 113-127.

<sup>6</sup> H. DOHM, Mageiros. Die Rolle des Kochs in der griechisch-römischen Komödie, München 1964.

<sup>7</sup> W. LUDWIG, Die plautinische Cistellaria und das Verhältnis von Gott und Handlung bei Menander, in: Ménandre, Entretiens Fondation Hardt 16, 1970, 43-110.

<sup>8</sup> W. G. ARNOTT, Targets, Techniques, and Tradition in Plautus' Stichus, BICS 19, 1972, 54-79; W. G. ARNOTT, Quibus rationibus usus imitetur Plautus Menandrum in fabula Stichus nominata, in: Acta omnium gentium ac nationum conventus Latinis litteris linguaeque fovendis (Malta 1973), Malta 1976, 306-311.

mise, while the other is firm. In this, the sequence of speakers, by contrast with the tradition of tragedy (Antigone—Ismene), is interestingly reversed. Surprisingly, the character introduced in second place later shows herself to be dominant, although she is the younger. The crossing of genres and their typical characters is visible in the tragic-comedy of the Amphitruo. Mercury now acts as a 'slave', now as a 'parasite'. The poet's joke consists in allowing two kinds of convention to blend.<sup>1</sup>

The character of Euclio in the Aulularia<sup>2</sup> shows a different kind of complexity. Superficially, he is a miser, although not, like Molière's Harpagon, a greedy usurer, but rather a curmudgeon unwilling to part with his money (μικρολόγος). On closer inspection, however, we find that this reluctance to spend is not ordinary miserliness, but a complicated phenomenon connected with Euclio's life and circumstances. He may have inherited this disposition, but that is not surprising in view of his family's poverty. By his sudden find of a treasure in his house, poor honest Euclio is completely bereft of his wits. He is afraid of his neighbors' envy, a fear easily understandable in a small town (polis). To keep his discovery secret and avoid gossip he overdoes even further his previous parsimony. His behavior then externally looks like that of a miser, but in reality is a disguise for a mistrust which is socially conditioned and unhealthily exaggerated. It is extremely probable that the model for the Aulularia bore the title Ἄπιστος (The Mistrustful Man). This finely drawn character, rich in nuances, conveys not merely the picture of an individual but that of his interaction with society. In Plautus this is still clearly recognizable, in spite of crude exaggeration, as in the scene with the slave at 2. 4. Indeed, by removing scenes in which the principal hero was missing, Plautus has emphasized the quality of the Aulularia as a comedy of character, and allowed its Menandrian element to be revealed even more clearly. Molière's Harpagon, by contrast, is an embodiment of avarice raised to the level of the grotesque. The decisive point comes at the dénouement. Harpagon must be blackmailed by the young couple, while in Plautus the suitor generously gives the treasure back to Euclio who then, for his part, voluntarily relinquishes it to his daughter as her dowry; he is even delighted to do so, since now, finally, he will be able to sleep peacefully.

<sup>1</sup> D. GUILBERT, Mercure-Sosie dans l'Amphitruon de Plaute. Un rôle de parasite de comédie, LEC 31, 1963, 52-63.

<sup>2</sup> G. LAFAYE, Le dénouement de l'Aululaire, RCC 4, 1896, 552-559 (basic); P. J. ENK, De Euclionis Plautini moribus, Mnemosyne ser. 3, 2, 1935, 281-290; W. HOFMANN, Zur Charaktergestaltung in der Aulularia des Plautus, Klio 59, 1977, 349-358.

Character is also an important element in the plot. It is precisely Euclio's basic mistrust which forms the premise for the theft of his treasure and ultimately for the resolution of the conflict. Because of this mistrust, he carries his treasure abroad, thus making the theft possible. Character and plot are therefore interwoven more closely than appears at first glance.

Other examples of the comedy of character are found in Menander's Dyskolos and Aspis, the latter with a genuine miser. It treats the following problem: an individual is isolated from the community by a particular trait of his character, which may be reinforced by outside influences; finally, this leads him into a situation causing him to recognize that in the long term he cannot do without other men, although this may not bring about any radical change of heart.

The comedy of character may contain elements of the comedy of intrigue. Characters who contrive a plot are already found in classical tragedy and Old Comedy. In Plautus the cunning slave, whose model was recently discovered in Menander's Aspis, is surprisingly prominent. Plays that contain two intrigues, such as the Miles gloriosus need not necessarily, however, be mixed together ('contaminated') from two Greek comedies of intrigue. The title of the original of the Bacchides, 'The Man Who Deceived Twice' (Δις ἐξάπατῶν), shows that Menander himself wrote plays of this type.

On the negative side, the conclusion of the intrigue is usually the outwitting of some hostile figure such as the father, the soldier, the leno. On the positive side, it unites the happy couple. The role of helper is often given to the cunning slave. The reversal (peripeteia) may be linked, as in tragedy, with a recognition (anagnorismos). Most often a young girl regarded as a hetaera, or threatened by that fate, is revealed as the daughter of an Athenian citizen so that her lover can marry her. The dramatic technique therefore is related to a type also known from tragedy, especially in its late Euripidean form. In their turn the poets make play with the devices typical of their genre:<sup>1</sup> in the Pseudolus, the deception is expressly announced to the man who is to be deceived.

<sup>1</sup> A. THIERFELDER, Die Motive der griechischen Komödie im Bewußtsein ihrer Dichter, Hermes 71, 1936, 320-337; W. GÖRLER, Über die Illusion in der antiken Komödie, A&A 18, 1973, 4-57.

A distinctive literary procedure in Plautine comedy is the employment of polymetric cantica. In the last analysis, although not exclusively, they have their roots in the 'modern' musical style introduced to drama by Euripides and his followers. The meter and the music are subordinated to the words, which retain their dominance in spite of the musicality pervading the play. In addition, Plautus is taking up here a native theatrical tradition already well developed.

The set<sup>1</sup> in Plautus' plays is generally uniform. On the spectator's left is the exit towards the harbor and the country; on the right to the town and the forum. The doors in the background may serve as entrances to private residences.

The entries and exits of the actors are normally announced in the text. Where this is not the case, scholars suppose that Plautus deviated from his originals. The number of actors is usually five. It is assumed that in case of need the same part could be played alternately by different actors. There was a certain order of precedence here. Star roles, such as that of the cunning slave, were expanded by Plautus to please the leader of the company, who in the Roman theater liked to take a prominent part. In the palliata, by contrast with the New Comedy and the Atellane, it seems that at first masks were not worn.

The first Roman comic actors were not respectable citizens, but slaves or freedmen. The first stage artists (dancers) were from Etruria. These professional players initially performed without masks, whereas, by contrast, masks were worn by the presenters of the Atellane, who came from good families. The difference therefore was social rather than merely technical. The wearing of masks was a privilege reserved for the successors of the singers of Fescennine verses. Their purpose was to assure the anonymity of the citizen who ex officio here often had to indulge in crude jesting. Conversely, a professional actor had no civic rights. The public was entitled to see his face.<sup>2</sup>

The actor Roscius is said to have introduced masks in order to conceal his squint (Suet. de poet. 11. 2-5 Reiff.; cf. Cic. de orat. 3. 221). In comedy, the acting must have been especially lively. According to their degree of animation, a distinction was made between fabulae statariae (e.g. Terence's Hecyra), motoriae (e.g. Phormio) and a mixed form (Evanth. 4. 4). Gestures were often stereotyped; for example, that of reflection (Mil. 201–207). Plautus' text gives us relatively detailed information on the movements and gestures of the actors, although stage directions are more or less unknown.<sup>1</sup> The comparison with Menander (in the Bacchides) shows that the words of Plautus often tend to convey what the actor would think, not what the character would say. The playful nature of the play thus receives greater emphasis. Menander prefers to give necessary information to the spectator indirectly, by incidental and apparently 'natural' remarks. Plautus instructs him more directly, often breaking the stage illusion. He takes account of the distance separating the Roman audience from the Greek play, and elevates it to an extra means of artistic presentation. To a certain extent, this produces a stronger impression of stylization, particularly reinforced by the musical form and the more ornate style of the sections in long verses and of the lyrical cantica.

---

<sup>1</sup> V. J. ROSIVACH, Plautine Stage Settings (Asin., Aul., Men., Trin.), TAPhA 101, 1970, 445-461; M. JOHNSTON, Exits and Entrances in Roman Comedy, Geneva, N.Y. 1933.

<sup>2</sup> P. GHIRON-BISTAGNE, Les demi-masques, RA 1970, 253-282.

In one instance we may compare Plautus' manner of conducting an action with that of Menander. A young fellow suspects his friend of treachery. In Menander he confronts him with this charge right at the beginning of the scene. Plautus, however, at first creates the impression that the traitor is a third party who is intimate with his friend. Only after the latter has distanced himself from the traitor does he learn that thereby he has condemned himself. It must be admitted that there is more suspense in Plautus' scene and that it has also gained a new dimension of irony. Whereas in Menander the irony consisted of the suspicion unjustly cast by one friend on the other, in Plautus there is double irony. The baseless suspicion is presented in such a way that the suspected party is quite unaware that he is the false friend. All this both increases theatrical effect and adds intellectual interest (Bacch. 3. 6). In other cases, Plautus uses stage effects, such as entries and exits, to produce parallels and contrasts between neighboring or distant scenes, thus emphasizing the structure and symmetries of the whole.<sup>2</sup>

The unity of Plautine comedy lies, in fact, in its verbal and musical structure, the organized succession of senarii, long verses and cantica. It is also found in the employment of imagery as a structural element. In this area, which has not yet been explored sufficiently, mere hints must serve. Complicated images, sustained and extended metaphors approximating allegory, are often found in the cantica, which were shaped by Plautus himself. A striking example is the parallel drawn between the intrigues of the slave and the capture of Troy (Bacch. 925–978), an allegory which is worked out in pedantic fashion even to the point of absurdity. It is not an isolated phenomenon in the play, but is organically connected with Plautus' poetic discourse which in general lifts the action of the cunning slave to the level of military strategy, or, as in the Pseudolus, makes him a 'stage director' in a world of art.<sup>1</sup> Quite apart from the parody of elevated poetry, the Roman element here, with its reference to military language and triumphal inscriptions, is unmistakable. The predominance of the slave's role therefore is not an extraneous addition, but contributes to the unity of the play and even influences its linguistic structure. The parallel drawn between human life and a house in the lyric verses of the Mostellaria is closely linked to the play's theme. The confrontation between the worlds of father and son is reflected in the scandal affecting the family house, said to be haunted by a ghost, and the feigned purchase of the house next door, which is built in the most up-to-date Greek style.<sup>2</sup> The concern here is less with particular psychological interpretation than with the inner unity of the system of images. Even more telling is the part played by Pseudolus who, in the course of that play, grows into a director and writer, and with that into the poet's own representative within the drama. Imaginative means thus turn the comedy into a mirror of poetic thought.

<sup>1</sup> Occasionally directions are found such as 'soft'.

<sup>2</sup> W. STEIDLE 1975.

Key words, recurring in significant places, are thematically important. Sometimes they have a specifically Roman character, for example, mores in the Trinummus, fides in the Aulularia, exemplum in the Mostellaria.

The technique of tragedy makes itself felt in Plautus in more than one way. It may be used in parody<sup>3</sup> with allusion to Latin tragedies recently produced; it may have a Roman earnestness in effecting rhetorical and lyrical elevation of style. Examples are Rud. 204–219; the entire role of Alcmene in the Amphitruo; long passages in the Captivi and the Trinummus; and in general the cantica. As a rule, Roman comedy is related to the 'play of bourgeois life' towards which late Euripides leans. Many features link New Comedy with the latest development of tragedy:<sup>1</sup> exposure of children, recognition, rivalry between father and son. Thus the basic situation and the pretended journey in the Mercator form a comic parallel to the rivalry depicted by Euripides between Amyntor and Phoenix (cf. Iliad 9. 432-480). In Plautus' day, Ennius adapted Euripides' Phoenix<sup>2</sup> (cf. also Menander's Samia). Even the Captivi, which is insufficiently described as a 'drama of sentiment', is related to Menander and to tragedy.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> J. WRIGHT, The Transformation of Pseudolus, TAPhA, 105, 1975, 403–416.

<sup>2</sup> E. W. LEACH, De exemplo meo ipse aedificato: an Organizing Idea in the Mostellaria, Hermes 97, 1969, 318–332.

<sup>3</sup> W. B. SEDGWICK, Parody in Plautus, CQ 21, 1927, 88–89; A. THIERFELDER, Plautus und römische Tragödie, Hermes 74, 1939, 155–166.

Plautus makes more emphatic use of action occurring behind the scenes and therefore left to the spectator's imagination. In the Bacchides, the return of the money to the father takes place off stage, and in the same way at the end of the Casina he cuts out the scene of recognition and the wedding. This play in any case is conceived as a model of off-stage action. Casina does not appear nor does her bridegroom. It is a play without the traditional happy couple. Even the slave who triggers the recognition and who elsewhere often arrives unceremoniously, as in the Captivi, is absent. Here Plautus successfully carried off a particularly elegant play which, through a minimum of means attained a maximum of effectiveness. The so-called composer of slap-dash comedies revealed himself in this instance as a master of indirect presentation.

Language and Style

The widespread identification of Plautine language with colloquial speech raises many questions. Colloquial speech is not a uniform phenomenon. It is differentiated both chronologically and socially. Again, modern scholarship has established that Plautus' language itself displays considerable variation of style. The dialogue written in senarii is relatively close to the everyday language of the educated, although even here we are presented with an artistically shaped diction. The portions written in long verses show to a larger extent elements of style and forms of language springing from the solemn oral style of old Italian tradition.<sup>1</sup> The most exalted language is found in the lyrical portions.

<sup>1</sup> A. SALVATORE, La struttura ritmico-musicale del Rudens e l'Ione di Euripide. Contributo allo studio dei cantica plautini, RAAN 26, 1951, 56-97; F. MARX, in his edition of the Rudens, pp. 274-278.

<sup>2</sup> B. WARNEKE, Zum Mercator des Plautus, WS 56, 1938, 117-119.

<sup>3</sup> W. KRAUS, Die Captivi im neuen Lichte Menanders, in: FS R. HANSLIK, Wien 1977 (= WS suppl. 8), 159-170.

It is in Plautus' language and style that the characteristic marks of his creativity are revealed. Features like the following reflect the fascinating process of vortere, that is, the transformation of 'modern' Greek ideas into a still archaic linguistic medium. Word repetitions help to organize complex chains of reasoning; in the same way larger textual units consisting of several sentences are interspersed with lively phrases from colloquial language which serve as structural markers: e.g. dicam tibi; eloquar; scies; quid ais? The principal point of view is anticipated, and the narrative returns to its point of departure.<sup>2</sup> Plautus rounds off and isolates individual utterances. The progress of thought is clearly indicated. Elliptical allusions to words of the interlocutor are less common than in Terence. The poet prefers to allow the answer to start again at the beginning, and presents it as an integral thought matching its predecessor.

A typical example of Plautine wit is found in the echoed curse (Capt. 868): 'Jupiter and the gods—may they destroy you.' The ready answer begins with the word te ('you'), an offence, softened by the surprising innocuousness of what follows. A second form is the already mentioned jocular use of the riddle (e.g. Cist. 727–735 and similarly 16–19). The word disciplina at first sounds puzzling and produces the question: quid ita, amabo? Then follows the explanation of what was meant by disciplina: raro nimium dabat.

The imitation of the Fescennine repartee in scenes of contention is also typical (e.g. Persa 223, par pari respondere 'tit for tat'). Intervening questions by the second speaker, and phrases such as quid vis? or ego dicam tibi, serve as structural markers.<sup>3</sup> A basic feature of Plautus' comedy is the literal interpretation of metaphors (Amph. 325–326). Sound and word play are of course also found in Greek literature,<sup>4</sup> but in Plautus, corresponding to his Italian temperament, they are

<sup>1</sup> H. HAFFTER, Untersuchungen zur altlateinischen Dichtersprache, Berlin 1934, esp. 132–143; H. HAPP, Die lateinische Umgangssprache und die Kunstsprache des Plautus, Glotta 45, 1967, 60–104.

<sup>2</sup> J. BLÄNSDORF, Archaische Gedankengänge in den Komödien des Plautus, Wiesbaden 1967.

<sup>3</sup> G. THAMM, Beobachtungen zur Form des plautinischen Dialogs, Hermes 100, 1972, 558–567.

<sup>4</sup> A. KATSOURIS, Word-Play in Greek Drama, Hellenika (Thessalonike) 28, 1975, 409–414.

particularly common. The poet often imitates official language, but also lofty poetry,<sup>1</sup> and particularly the tragedies known to his audience: examples are Ennius' Achilles<sup>2</sup> or Pacuvius' Teucer. Tragic parodies in early Plautine plays furnish us with a notion of elevated poetic language in the days before Ennius.

Naevius' handling of language offered an important model to Plautus. Both developed further features of the Italian delight in witty repartee (cf. Hor. sat. 1. 5. 51–69). There is a preference for strongly expressive verbs. Linguistic archaisms are somewhat rare in Plautus: for example, the vowel weakening in dispessis manibus (Mil. 360) and the syncope surpta (Rud. 1105). Mavellem<sup>3</sup> (Mil. 171) is perhaps a vulgarism, ausculata (Mil. 390) for osculata is certainly an hyper-urbanism. It is an open question how far the removal of hiatus by the introduction of archaic final consonants, such as -d in the ablative and imperative, should proceed. The solemn air of archaisms may produce a comic effect, as with the weighty dissyllabic genitives in magnai rei publicai gratia (Mil. 103). In a paratragic context we find duellum (Amph. 189). On the other hand, the employment of a preposition to replace the dative case, as in later Romance, may be taken from popular usage (e.g. Mil. 117: ad erum nuntiem). Yet expressions such as nullos habeo scriptos (Mil. 48) are not direct predecessors of the Romance perfect.

Greek words were by no means a mere affectation of high society. They were not rare in everyday life and often their effect is more humorous than academic.<sup>4</sup> Foreign tags need not necessarily spring from the original. They may derive from Plautus' knowledge of the colloquial usage of slaves, whether exemplified in phrases (Stich. 707) or jests (Pseud. 653–654).

The verba Punica in the Poenulus<sup>5</sup> are carefully prepared and rendered intelligible by the situation. The introduction of exotic languages or dialects is reminiscent of the Old Comedy, although a

<sup>1</sup> H. HAFFTER, Sublimis bei Plautus und Terenz. Altlateinischer Komödien- und Tragödiendienst in Verwandtschaft und Abhängigkeit (1935), repr. in: Römische Komödie, Darmstadt 1973, 110–121.

<sup>2</sup> H. D. JOCELYN, Imperator histricus, YClS 21, 1969, 95–123.

<sup>3</sup> P. B. CORBETT, 'Vis comica' in Plautus and Terence. An Inquiry into the Figurative Use by them of Certain Verbs, Eranos 62, 1964, 52–69.

<sup>4</sup> G. P. SHIPP, Greek in Plautus, WS 66, 1953, 105–112.

<sup>5</sup> P. A. JOHNSTON, Poenulus 1, 2 and Roman Women, TAPhA 110, 1980, 143–159 (dates the play to 191 B.C. or later); A. VAN DEN BRANDEN, Le texte punique dans le Poenulus de Plaute, B&O 26, 1984, 159–180.

Doric-speaking doctor does make an appearance in Menander's Aspis. With a teacher's skill, Plautus imparts to his audience the feeling that it understands Punic. We deduce easily from emphasis and gestures what in fact we already know from the prologue.<sup>1</sup> Plautus is always aware of the need to communicate and attains his aim even when using an unintelligible language.

Compound abstracts again need not necessarily be based on Greek models. Nouns in this style, e.g. multiloquium, parumloquium, pauciloquium (Merc. 31–36), were coined by Plautus himself.<sup>2</sup>

Plautus introduced telling Greek names on his own. In the Bacchides, he replaced the neutral Menandrean name 'Syrus' with Chrysalus ('Gold-hunter'), and obviously was sure that his audience would understand its meaning. Many of his spectators after all had served as soldiers for a number of years in the Greek East. A list of peculiarities of word formation and usage would be too long, and in particular would create the false impression that Plautus' language is a collection of exceptions. Nothing would be more misleading. His language is lively, but kept in check by a natural grace.

As far as meter<sup>3</sup> and music are concerned, the comedies consist, according to the manuscripts, of dialogue (diverbia, DV, written in iambic senarii), and sung portions (cantica, C). The latter are subdivided into recitatives written in long verses, such as iambic and trochaic septenarii, and fully lyrical scenes resembling arias. Their purposes are different. If a letter is being read on stage, the meter switches from recitative in long verses into merely spoken senarii (Bacch. 997; Pseud. 998). If the accompanying music falls silent, the actor is speaking. Thus in the Stichus (762), while the 'flute' player takes a drink, the meter changes to spoken verse (senarius). Occasionally long verses too are indicated by DV (e.g. Cas. 798) at the point where the 'flute' player is being asked to begin.<sup>4</sup>

The sung parts hark back to a native tradition of 'musical play', while the spoken parts are, a specifically 'Greek' element. The importance of native traditions is perhaps confirmed by the fact that the bacchii and cretics, which are a favorite in Plautus, and which are

<sup>1</sup> A. S. GRATWICK, Hanno's Punic Speech in the Poenulus of Plautus, Hermes 99, 1971, 25–45.

<sup>2</sup> Greek comedy is differently oriented: Stobaeus 36. 18 = Philemon fig. 97 K.; A. TRAINA, Note plautine, Athenaeum 40, 1962, 345–349.

<sup>3</sup> H. DREXLER, 'Lizenzen' am Versanfang bei Plautus, München 1965.

<sup>4</sup> A. KLOTZ, Zur Verskunst des altrömischen Dramas, WJA 2, 1947, 301–357.

especially well-adapted to Latin, are not widespread in Greek, so far as our fragmentary knowledge of Hellenistic lyric permits conclusions to be drawn.

Music undoubtedly played a greater part in Plautus than in Menander. Even so, it is now known that 'flute' music was also found in Menander at the tumultuous finale, and that Plautus could appeal to Menander's authority for his expansion of the parts written in long verses; for example, Menander's Samia contains many trochaic tetrameters. The meter changes at important points in the plot: instances are found in recognition scenes, such as Cist. 747; Curc. 635; cf. Men. 1063. Large-scale compositions in polymetric cantica and correspondences between distant lyrical passages within a play are characteristic of Plautus. Music therefore does not appear as some sort of 'entr'acte' but is an essential component of the drama. It forms the lyrical beginning and end. The canticum marks the start of the real action or of the dénouement.<sup>1</sup> Terence did not imitate this type of overarching composition.<sup>2</sup> The cantica, written in anapaests, bacchii, cretics, perhaps also in dochmiacs or in a variety of meters, are monodies or small-scale ensembles. An exception is formed by the chorus of fishermen at Rudens 290–305. Occasionally the song is accompanied by dancing.

An organizing principle of the Plautine cantica is the agreement of meter and meaning, verse and sentence.<sup>3</sup> In the structure of his cantica, the poet shows great artistic ingenuity and originality. There is no strict responsion<sup>4</sup> (although even here the Latin poet's deep-rooted delight in symmetry is evident).<sup>5</sup> The structure follows the musical reforms of Timotheus, also accepted by Euripides. The meter yields to the text and its emotion,<sup>6</sup> as it does in the so-called Carmen

<sup>1</sup> F. LEO, Die plautinischen Cantica und die hellenistische Lyrik, Berlin 1897.

<sup>2</sup> L. BRAUN, Polymetric bei Terenz und Plautus, WS 83, 1970, 66–83.

<sup>3</sup> F. LEO 1897 (s. note above).

<sup>4</sup> Mistaken: F. CRUSIUS, Die Responsion in den plautinischen Cantica, Philologus suppl. 21, 1, Leipzig 1929.

<sup>5</sup> W. LUDWIG, Ein plautinisches Canticum: Curc. 96–157, Philologus 111, 1967, 186–197; C. QUESTA, Due cantica delle Bacchides e altre analisi metriche, Roma 1967; L. BRAUN, Die Cantica des Plautus, Göttingen 1970 (with bibl.); L. BRAUN, Polymetrie bei Terenz und Plautus, WS 83, 1970, 66–83.

<sup>6</sup> H. ROPPENECKER, Vom Bau der plautinischen Cantica, Philologus 84, 1929, 301–319; 430–463; 85, 1930, 65–84; A. S. GRATWICK and S. J. LIGHTLEY, Light and Heavy Syllables as Dramatic Colouring in Plautus and Others, CQ 76, n.s. 32, 1982, 124–133.

Grenfellianum, an instance of Hellenistic lyricism.<sup>1</sup> Historical links however are missing, although the complex meter of a fragment of Diphilos in Stobaeus is important.<sup>2</sup> In other respects, too, Diphilos often bridges the gap between tragedy and comedy.

Within the cantica, Plautus himself sets clear metrical boundaries.<sup>3</sup> Just like Ennius in the hexameter and Horace in his lyric verse, Plautus reveals here the typical Roman desire to fix the caesura and to control and regulate metrical license in arsis, thesis, and prosody.<sup>4</sup>

In the treatment of the different meters, the so-called licenses are greater or smaller according to the type of verse used. Bacchii and cretics, which are especially well adapted to the Latin language, are constructed with the greatest strictness. Anapaests are relatively free, but in sung verses the music may have provided more smoothness than the bare text now permits us to recognize. The treatment of the quantities is based on natural linguistic phenomena, partly connected with Latin word accent. In the case of synalophe, iambic shortening, and caesuras, it must also be borne in mind that in fluent speech groups of words were treated as units.

Final -s was attenuated even in Cicero's time (Cic. orat. 161), but already in Plautus it may make position. In the stage poets, lengthening of a syllable by the combination of mute and liquid is impossible. Iambic shortening also affects syllables which stand before or after the accented syllable. The shortened syllable must occur after a short syllable, since otherwise there is no iambus. It is difficult to draw strict lines in the use of synizesis and hiatus. The latter is found particularly at major pauses required by sense, such as change of speaker; after interjections; and in phrases such as quae ego, di ament.

In spite of these differences from classical meter, many principles of the treatment of language in Roman poetry evidently remain constant, along with the indivisible unity of style and meter.

In the long run, the polymetric cantica remained without successor. This subtle verbal music, with its lively effects, was a culmination; unique in its fashion, it formed a high point in the history of the musical drama.

<sup>1</sup> M. GIGANTE, Il papiro di Grenfell e i cantica plautini, PP 2, 1947, 300-308.

<sup>2</sup> W. M. LINDSAY, Plautus Stichus 1 sqq., CR 32, 1918, 106-110, esp. 109 (with a reference to F. MARX).

<sup>3</sup> G. MAURACH, Untersuchungen zum Aufbau plautinischer Lieder, Göttingen 1964.

<sup>4</sup> H. ROPPENECER (cited above).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Apart from examples like the remarks on tragicomedy at Amphitruo 50–63, Plautus made few theoretical pronouncements on literary problems. Occasionally he uses comedy and the theater as metaphors. The most impressive instance is provided by the figure of Pseudolus who, as the director of a complex play of intrigue, becomes a twin of the poet. The most important verb linking the poet and his creativity is velle. In his prologues, Plautus is categorical about his choices of scene and title or in favor of or against the presence of particular characters: Plautus voluit, Plautus noluit. Here he speaks of himself almost as if he were some natural power or deity: ‘The young fellow will not come back to the city today in this comedy; Plautus did not want it. He has broken the bridge that lay in his path’ (Cas. 65–66). How could a poet who on his own admission, behaved so high-handedly with his characters (and models) ever have been regarded as a literal translator? His Majesty the Poet at the very most will take advice only from another sovereign majesty, the Public: ‘He wants the play to be called (literally, ‘to be’) Asinaria, with your permission’ (Asin. 12).

Another basic verb of Plautus’ poetic is vertere (vortere).<sup>1</sup> It describes the metamorphosis of a Greek to a Latin play. But we must not think of literal translation. Vortere is linked with the adverb barbare. The task therefore is adaptation to a non-Greek environment. Barbarus is also the proud and humble adjective conferred by Plautus on his fellow poet Naevius. It presupposes an awareness of distance, both from Greek and from one’s own world. The poet composes as one apart. He is not a vates but a poeta or, as Plautus likes to call his meddling and manipulative slaves, architectus. The poet is therefore distinguished, not only by his own sovereign will, but also by a constructive intellect. Inspiration is secondary, perhaps because in Plautus it is taken for granted. Plautus considers himself an author working rationally.

<sup>1</sup> E. LEFÈVRE, Maccus vortit barbare. Vom tragischen Amphitruon zum tragikomischen Amphitruo, AAWM 5, 1982; D. BAIN, Plautus vortit barbare. Plautus, Bacch. 526–561 and Menander, Dis exapaton 102–112, in: Creative Imitation and Latin Literature, ed. by D. WEST and T. WOODMAN, Cambridge 1979, 17–34; elements of literary criticism in the Amphitruo: G. RAMBELLI, Studi plautini, L’Amphitruo, RIL 100, 1966, 101–134.

Conversely, he makes fun of himself as Maccus. This character from popular farce is a modest image for the artist as society's jester not without the melancholy distinguishing great humorists, some of which makes itself felt in figures like the parasite of the Stichus.

Ideas II

A complex relationship unites reality and interpretation. Out of regard for a Roman audience, Greek material is shot through with elements originally foreign to it. In its new social context, even literal translation may in given circumstances sound different. In the Captivi, the panhellenic idea is transformed into citizenship of the world. Menander's comedy is relatively self-contained and consistent in tone. Both linguistically and artistically it strives for uniformity, a feature often enhancing the illusion of truthfulness to life. By contrast, in Plautus the very Greekness of the scene and of the dress produces a persistent awareness of distance.

The creation of a 'topsy-turvy world', as for example in the often misunderstood Asinaria, harks back to the very roots of comedy. The father obeys his son; the master commands his slave to deceive him; the slave enjoys divine dignity (Salus, 713); the son abases himself before him; the mother forces her daughter to behave immorally; the matron lords it over her husband. It is precisely an audience which thinks in 'realistic' terms which can do full justice to the absurdity found in this comedy.

Illusion, so far from being maintained, is actually broken. The conventional character of the play is emphasized. The world is not uniform or self-contained. Rather it is pluralist, open on all sides, filled with surprises. Music enhances even more the degree of stylization and the contrast with the stage of illusion. In union with the word, a magic effect on the spectator is produced, completely unintended by Menander. This irrational element, belonging to the particular gifts of his genius, unites Plautus with those great poets of the comic stage in whom lyrical and magical features are also encountered in different ways: Aristophanes and Shakespeare.

Plautus' model is the less outspoken New Comedy in Menander's style, and we must not therefore expect from him direct intervention in contemporary events in the manner of Aristophanes. In any case, he had before his eyes among other things the living example of Naeivus, who was forced to atone for his attacks on the mighty while reduced to living on bread and water. Thanks to the Greek dress from which the palliata takes its name and their Greek locales, Plautus' plays, viewed superficially, are even further removed from reality than those of Menander, which do after all take place in the spectators' homeland. Slaves smarter than their masters could be found only in degenerate Greece, and at first it was only natural that immorality found in a foreign country should rouse the heartiest laughter. However, under the pallium, the toga may sometimes be glimpsed, as when Alcmene asks Amphitruo whether an auspicium prevents him from rejoining his army (Amph. 690), or when, in particular circumstances, such as the abolition of the lex Oppia about 195, there is repeated criticism of the luxurious fashions of ladies in high society.<sup>1</sup> In the distorting mirror of a foreign world arousing permissible laughter, features of the Roman society could also be quite properly distinguished. Comic laughter thus became the harbinger of self-knowledge and self-criticism. It has long been assumed that in the Epidicus Plautus suppressed a marriage between half-brother and sister found in the original out of consideration for his Roman audience.<sup>2</sup> However that may be, Plautus, by contrast with Terence, quite frequently takes note of Roman circumstances. Such violations of the dramatic illusion must not be understood as a lapse, but as a deliberate choice. They comprise more than allusions to Roman topography (Curc. 467–485), legal regulations<sup>3</sup> and social customs in general. Plautus had the courage to confront thorny issues of the day, sometimes in sympathy with the authorities. Thus, probably shortly before the legal measures against the Bacchanalia<sup>4</sup> or against usurers,<sup>5</sup> he assailed misbehavior of this kind. But he also opposed authority. In the Miles, an

<sup>1</sup> For example, F. DE RUYT, Le thème fondamental de l'Aululaire de Plaute, LEC 29, 1961, 375–382.

<sup>2</sup> C. W. KEYES, Half-Sister Marriage in New Comedy and the Epidicus, TAPhA 71, 1940, 217–229.

<sup>3</sup> E. SCHUHMAN, Ehescheidungen in den Komödien des Plautus, ZRG 93, 1976, 19–32; E. COSTA, Il diritto privato romano nelle commedie di Plauto, Torino 1890; R. DÜLL, Zur Frage des Gottesurteils im vorgeschichtlichen römischen Zivilstreit, ZRG 58, 1938, 17–35; O. FREDERSHAUSEN, De iure Plautino et Terentiano, Göttingen 1906; id., Weitere Studien über das Recht bei Plautus und Terenz, Hermes 47, 1912, 199–249.

<sup>4</sup> E. SCHUHMAN, Hinweise auf Kulthandlungen im Zusammenhang mit plautinischen Frauengestalten, Klio 59, 1977, 137–147.

<sup>5</sup> Most. 625–626; 657–658; cf. Livy 35. 41. 9 (192 B.C.).

allusion to a great writer held in prison (see above) was anything but a compliment to the guardians of social order. In the Trinummus, the importance of legality is emphasized to the detriment of a hypocritical appeal to a so-called mos maiorum. This may be seen as support for Cato's criticism of the diversion of spoils to private use and for his struggle against the party of the Scipios.<sup>1</sup> Bribery (Trin. 1033) and the excessive granting of triumphs are assailed (Bacch. 1072–1075). At the production of the Captivi, set in Aetolia, the audience was bound to recall the 43 noble Aetolians then imprisoned at Rome.<sup>2</sup> More important than such details, which in the nature of things are often open to dispute, is the general principle. We can scarcely measure how many burning issues of the day were treated in these plays. In them, the dignity of patres familias, whose power was almost unlimited at Rome, was dragged through the mud; friend and enemy, master and slave turned out to be brothers; the hated and treacherous Carthaginian appeared on the stage as a man of honor; and the boasting of generals became, on the lips of slaves, empty talk. The magistrates who organized these games for the people may have seen in comedy a method of influencing the masses. But it was a two-edged weapon which could also turn against those who employed it.

In general, we should not imagine that Plautus' audience was all crude and uneducated. These were the same people who also attended tragic performances. They could understand tragic parody, and Plautus could presuppose in them a certain degree of wit and sophistication.<sup>3</sup>

Plautus employed the religious ideas of his models while combining them with those of Rome. The typical Roman notion of the pax deorum makes its appearance.<sup>4</sup> Exemplum plays a leading role,<sup>5</sup> and Roman and Greek ways of living encounter each other in fruitful exchange. In the Stichus, Plautus depicted the Roman ideal of the univira.

As a rule, in the New Comedy gods appear only to speak the

<sup>1</sup> T. FRANK, Some Political Allusions in Plautus' Trinummus, AJPh 53, 1932, 152–156; on the history of the period, see also G. K. GALINSKY, Scipionic Themes in Plautus' Amphitruo, TAPhA 97, 1966, 203–235.

<sup>2</sup> Livy 37. 3. 8; dating after the conclusion of peace in 189: K. WELLESLEY, The Production Date of Plautus' Captivi, AJPh 76, 1955, 298–305; P. GRIMAL, Le modèle et la date des Captivi de Plaute, in: Hommages à M. RENARD, Bruxelles 1969, vol. 1, 394–414.

<sup>3</sup> J.-P. CÈBE, Le niveau culturel du public plautinien, REL 38, 1960, 101–106.

<sup>4</sup> G. PASQUALI, Leggendo 5, SIFC n.s. 7, 1929, 314–316.

<sup>5</sup> E. W. LEACH, De exemplo meo ipse aedificato, Hermes 97, 1969, 318–332.

prologue. An exception is the Amphitruo in which Jupiter and Mercury actually take part. Plautus calls the play, though not only for this reason, a tragicomedy. Jupiter's role in the dénouement recalls tragic endings in which a god resolves the dilemma and prophesies the future. The gods acting as prologue speakers play this part in the first instance because of their superior knowledge. Being aware of family connections still concealed from the actors, they can prepare the spectators for the recognition which is to come at the finale.

But the gods may also influence the course of the action. In the Aulularia,<sup>1</sup> the Lar familiaris allows the old father to find a treasure so as to assist his pious daughter with her dowry. He also causes Megaronides to seek the girl's hand, thus indirectly leading the man who is her real choice to take a similar step. Moreover, the deities whose altar rests on the stage are often related to the action. So with Fides, to whom Euclio only grudgingly entrusts his treasure. This mistrustful character does not even trust Trust personified. The name of the goddess is entwined with the chief character. In other cases, it is related to the setting. The Rudens begins with a storm at sea. The star Arcturus, whose early rise in the middle of September marks the beginning of the stormy season, is therefore more than a weather god. He also guides the fate of men, for it is he who has brought about the storm which in the end reunites the divided members of the family and rescues the shipwrecked girls from the power of the leno. A philosophical thought is involved. Perjurers and villains cannot placate the gods by sacrifice (Rud. 22–25). In the same play, the awe-inspiring priestess embodies pietas and divine justice, a basic concept of the play.

In general, the prologue deities are closer to allegory than to myth and religion. It may be Arcturus in the prologue who has conjured up the storm, but in the play itself only Neptune is named (84; 358; 372–373). Similarly, in Philemon (fig. 91 K.), Aër presents himself as an all-seeing Zeus. The speaker of the prologue in Menander's Aspis is indeed Tyche herself, changeable Fortune in contrast to stable Fatum.

Menander assigns to Tyche, as to the gods who appear in his other prologues, an inobtrusive leading role.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Basic treatment by W. LUDWIG, Aulularia-Probleme, Philologus 105, 1961, 44–71; 247–262.

<sup>2</sup> W. LUDWIG, Die plautinische Cistellaria und das Verhältnis von Gott und Handlung bei Menander, in: Ménandre, Entretiens Fondation Hardt 16, 1970, 43–110. Tyche, who is an Oceanid in Hesiod, even in Herodotus does not denote blind chance but

Behind the employment of allegorical figures in the prologue, philosophical sources may occasionally be detected, as at the beginning of the Rudens.<sup>1</sup> According to Plato's Epinomis (981e–985b), the stars are visible and seeing gods. They know our thoughts, they love the good and hate the bad. They tell everything to each others and to the higher gods, since they occupy a middle place between them and us. In fact, in the play, the storm aroused by the star leads to the punishment of the bad and the reward for the good. In his prologue, Plautus did not remove this philosophical passage, but carefully developed it. Along with the Pythagorean elements in Ennius, he gave us one of the earliest philosophical texts in the Latin language. This is all the more significant because it was only several decades after Plautus' death that professional philosophy came to Rome. In its introduction there, the acquisition of the Macedonian court library<sup>2</sup> by Aemilius Paullus after the Battle of Pydna in 168 B.C., and the embassy of philosophers in 155, marked decisive moments.

In this context, a play of ideas like the Captivi is of particular significance. Its original springs from a time when the Greeks were taking belated account of their national unity. It proves in the course of the action that differences between friend and foe, master and slave,<sup>3</sup> are arbitrary and incidental. Tyndarus is taken away from his father by a slave, and sold into enemy hands as a slave. Later, with his new master, he is made prisoner by his own countrymen. There, he changes clothes with his master, and so aids in his escape home. When the new owner hears of the treachery, he punishes Tyndarus most severely. But, as the end of the play reveals, Tyndarus is his long-lost son. A single character here experiences, on behalf of all, the full gamut of roles conditioned by inner and external events. The play, influenced by the thinking of the Greek Enlightenment,<sup>4</sup> the reversal of fortune in connection with divine envy. This gives her a religious dimension. Sophocles also knows the Wheel of Tyche. Her role in drama is expressed by Euripides (Ion 1512–1515).

---

<sup>1</sup> E. FRAENKEL, The Stars in the Prologue of the Rudens, CQ 36, 1942, 10–14.

<sup>2</sup> F. DELLA CORTE, Stoiker und Epikureer in Plautus' Komödien, in: FS A. THIERFELDER, Hildesheim 1974, 80–94.

<sup>3</sup> P. SPRANGER, Historische Untersuchungen zu den Sklavenfiguren des Plautus und Terenz, Stuttgart, 2nd ed. 1984; E. COLEIRO, Lo schiavo in Plauto, Vichiana 12, 1983, 113–120 (argues implausibly that sympathy for slaves and their positive depiction is Plautine rather than Greek); J. DINGEL, Herren und Sklaven bei Plautus, Gymnasium 88, 1981, 489–504.

<sup>4</sup> The equality of all people: Antiphon VS 87 B 44 B; Alcidas Schol. Arist. rhet.

had originally as its principal aim the reconciliation of Greek with Greek. In its transfer to Rome and detachment from its original national milieu, it gains even more in general human significance. It was not for nothing that a champion of tolerance such as Lessing declared the Captivi the 'most wonderful play ever staged'.<sup>1</sup> While the Captivi inclines towards Stoic thought, for the Persa traces of Cynic influence,<sup>2</sup> and even a portrait drawn from life of Diogenes himself,<sup>3</sup> have been claimed. Before philosophy found its way to Rome, it was drama that became the vehicle of enlightenment and of moral progress.

Transmission

Plautus experienced his first renaissance after Terence's death.<sup>4</sup> Many of his plays were re-staged (cf. Casina, prologue 5–14). This led to the intrusion of interpolations and double recensions into the text. Soon the grammatici assumed care of the text, as early, for example, as Aelius Stilo. Cicero and the eminent scholar Varro valued Plautus highly. Our tradition, in fact, consists of the plays which Varro accepted as undoubtedly genuine. After a temporary decline in reputation (Hor. epist. 2. 1. 170–176; ars 270–274), brought about by the unrelenting demand for literary perfection on the part of the Augustan poets, he again attracted scholarly interest from Probus and the Archaists. A scholarly edition may have been produced, to become the source of our tradition. A palimpsest dating from late antiquity (A) was discovered in the Ambrosian Library by A. MAI in 1815, and deciphered at the cost of his own eyesight by W. STUEMUND. It gives a selection of the double recensions occasioned by repeated productions. The medieval tradition (P—Palatine recension) has preserved the variants with greater completeness, though without the critical textual marks.<sup>5</sup> It may depend on a

---

1373 B 18; Hippias apud Plat. Prot. 337 CD; cf. Philemon, frag. 95 K.; R. MÜLLER, in: Der Mensch als Maß der Dinge, Berlin 1976, 254–257.

<sup>1</sup> Beiträge zur Hist. und Aufnahme des Theaters (Works, vol. 3, ed. K. S. GUTHKE, München 1972, 389).

<sup>2</sup> F. LEO, Diogenes bei Plautus (1906), in: Ausgewählte kleine Schriften 1, 1960, 185–190; but this interpretation is connected with the now doubtful early dating of the Greek original.

<sup>3</sup> U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Göttinger Index lectionum 1893/4, 16 (= Kleine Schriften 2, 1941), disputed by G. L. MÜLLER, Das Original des plautinischen Persa, diss. Frankfurt 1957.

<sup>4</sup> H. B. MATTINGLY, The First Period of Plautine Revival, Latomus 19, 1960, 230–252; important remarks on transmission: B. BADER 1970; on interpolations: H. D. JOCELYN, Imperator histicus, YClS 21, 1969, 95–123.

<sup>5</sup> A discussion of the critical marks in: W. BRACHMANN, De Bacchidum Plautinae retractatione scaenica capita quinque, diss. Leipzig 1880, 59–188.

manuscript of the 4th century. The manuscripts present the plays, with minor variations, in alphabetical order. The three plays the titles of which begin with A circulated in antiquity as a separate volume. Nonius cites them with especial frequency. Nothing is preserved of them in Codex A.

Of the Vidularia, which stood in last place, only parts now remain. Regrettable major lacunae are found in the Aulularia (end), Bacchides (beginning), Cistellaria. Several prologues are missing. From lost plays, about 200 lines or parts of lines are cited. Some of the transmitted argumenta are acrostics and date from before Donatus. Following Alexandrian precept, in the palimpsest A the verses are written colometrically and distinguished from one another by indentation corresponding to their length. Since no intact original text survives, even lines lacking in A may be genuine.

Influence

Comedy makes its influence felt on other genres: on the togata, for example, which confers on Roman subject-matter a form owed to Menander and Terence, and even on elegy<sup>1</sup> and the art of love.<sup>2</sup> In the history of such influence,<sup>3</sup> Plautus is only partly overshadowed by Terence,<sup>4</sup> whose language was more easily understood by later generations. But Plautus was esteemed even by Cicero as a source of clear and elegant Latin.<sup>5</sup>

During the Middle Ages Plautus was not very popular, although Aimeric (11th century) recommended him for class use. Hrotsvit (Roswitha) of Gandersheim (10th century) was influenced by his language in her own plays.

Plautus was a particular favorite of the Renaissance. Petrarch knew at least four of his plays. Apart from Virgil, Plautus was the only secular author taken by Luther in 1508 to his Augustinian Priory at Erfurt. New productions, translations, and adaptations, both in Latin

<sup>1</sup> J. C. YARDLEY, Comic Influences in Propertius, Phoenix 26, 1972, 134-139; F. LEO, 2nd ed. 1912, 143-145.

<sup>2</sup> F. LEO, 2nd ed. 1912, 146-157.

<sup>3</sup> K. VON REINHARDSTOETTNER, Plautus. Spätere Bearbeitungen plautinischer Lustspiele. Ein Beitrag zur vergleichenden Literaturgeschichte, Leipzig 1886; the influence of Plautus on the late antique Querolus is disputed: W. SÜSS, Über das Drama Querolus sive Aulularia, RhM 91, 1942, 59-122 (bibl.); W. SALZMANN, Molière und die lateinische Komödie. Ein Stil- und Strukturvergleich, Heidelberg 1969. R. S. MIOLA, Shakespeare and Classical Comedy, Oxford 1994.

<sup>4</sup> S. PRETE, Plautus und Terenz in den Schriften des F. PETRARCA, Gymnasium 57, 1950, 219-224.

<sup>5</sup> De orat. 3. 45; off. 1. 104; see already Aelius Stilo apud Quint. inst. 10. 1. 99.

and the vernacular, began as early as the second half of the 15th century. Albrecht von Eyb (d. 1475) began the long series of German adaptations with his Menaechmi and Bacchides, printed for the first time in 1511. In 1486 there began at the court of Ferrara the soon innumerable Italian versions. In 1515, a Spanish Amphitryon by Francisco de Villalobos appeared, to be followed in 1562/63 by an English counterpart composed by W. Courtney.

Menander was lost, and it was Latin comedy that became the model for Europe.<sup>1</sup> Plautus,<sup>2</sup> Terence and Seneca taught the way to the artistic construction of plays and the careful conduct of the plot.<sup>3</sup> A classic example, although relatively late, is Der Schatz by Lessing (d. 1781). It is an admirable condensation of the Trinummus from five acts into one. Early in Germany, in addition to the professional stage, the school play was important. From a later period, Goethe's contemporary J. M. R. Lenz (d. 1792) may be mentioned.

To world literature, Plautus left a rich legacy of scenes and motifs. As early as the 12th century, the Amphitruo found a successor in elegy,<sup>4</sup> and in general perhaps this play has had the widest influence. Molière (d. 1673) sharpened the theme of adultery, although not by sacrificing courtly levity. The great Portuguese author Luis de Camões (d. 1580) gave less prominence to Hercules' birth, and emphasized the misunderstandings caused by the two Amphitryons. Kleist (d. 1811) treated the love of the creator for his creature with philosophical seriousness. Giraudoux (d. 1944) developed a remarkable philosophy of human resistance to divine caprice.

In the course of history the action of the Aulularia was transferred from a Greek polis to other places and social structures: the Dutchman

<sup>1</sup> More details in the section on Terence below; E. LEFÈVRE, Römische und europäische Komödie, in: Die römische Komödie. Plautus und Terenz, ed. by E. LEFÈVRE, Darmstadt 1973, 1–17.

<sup>2</sup> Erasmus and Melanchthon recommended Plautus for class use, without lasting success. Pomponius Laetus staged Plautine comedies at Rome; an Italian performance took place in Ferrara as early as 1486; such events encouraged both Neolatin (e.g. E. S. Piccolomini, Conrad Celtis) and vernacular playwrights (Machiavelli, Ariosto, Calderón, Corneille, and others).

<sup>3</sup> This applied e.g. to the works of Goldoni (d. 1793) and to opera libretti like those of Da Ponte (d. 1838).

<sup>4</sup> In the Geta of Vitalis of Blois, who also composed an Aulularia; H. JACOBI, Amphitruo in Frankreich und Deutschland, diss. Zürich 1952; for the influence of the Amphitruo on contemporary German literature: G. PETERSMANN, Deus sum: commutavero. Von Plautus' Amphitruo zu P. HACKS' Amphitryon, AU 36, 2, 1994, 25–33; cf. also Georg KAISER's Zweimal Amphitryon.

Hoof (d. 1647) set the scene of his Warenar in Amsterdam. Molière's Avare exaggerates the complex character drawn by Plautus into a grotesque and almost demonic portrait of greed incarnate. Shakespeare (d. 1616) in his Comedy of Errors followed the opposite path. The straight comedy of mistaken identity (Menaechmi) is heightened by individual character drawing and so removed from traditional patterns.<sup>1</sup> The novelistic framework and the motif of metamorphosis (partly influenced by the Amphitruo) produce a fantastic fairy-tale atmosphere somewhat reminiscent of the Rudens. Shakespeare was to give back to comedy, in his own way, the lyrical element lent to it by Plautus through his association of it with music.

Plautus has not yet been sufficiently discovered by the cinema. Richard Lester's film A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum (1965) is a promising beginning.<sup>2</sup>

Plautus had much to say to his time, and to later generations. Horace assigns him the simple intention of filling his theater's cash-box, although that is in itself not a blameworthy attitude for a man of the theater. His plays, however, have much deeper significance. They were, precisely because they enjoyed so wide an audience, an inestimable means of enlightenment and progress, affirmation and criticism of traditional values. They were concerned with communicating rules for behavior both between individual men and entire peoples, and with far-reaching challenges to thought that prepared the way even for philosophy. They offered criticism of purblind over-emphasis on the military and on the power of money. They helped to put into words private themes such as love or work. All this must have had a liberating and fascinating effect on the Roman audience. These aspects are emphasized here not because they are to be thought of as the most important, but because in so elemental a comic genius as Plautus they are easily overlooked.

Above all, Plautus created immortal theater. His language was both original and yet artistically formed, combining the charm of life with the magic of music. Without ever falling into obscurity, Plautus is continually aware of his spectator, sometimes carefully explaining and preparing, sometimes purposely leading him astray so that the surprise will be all the greater.

<sup>1</sup> L. SALINGAR, Shakespeare and the Traditions of Comedy, Cambridge 1974, 59-67; 76-88; 129-157.

<sup>2</sup> To give another example, Louis de Funès adapted the theme of Plautus' Aulularia.

His extraordinary control of language finally prevents his drama from dissolving into a simple concern with action. It stands and falls by word and gesture. Later, Roman literature would make much further progress in brevity, subtlety, and strictness of form. The freshness, richness, and clarity of Plautus in their way found no successor.

The farcical playwright and 'old stager' in Plautus, allegedly destroying the symmetry of his models by violent interventions, is well known. Less well known is the Plautus who is restrained and refined, who truncates what is melodramatic and sentimental or confines it to off-stage, and Plautus, the creator of new, personal, dramatic and musical symmetries and structures. Least well-known of all are Plautus the intellectual and Plautus the great lyric poet of early Latin literature.

Editions: G. MERULA, Venetiis 1472. * F. LEO, 2 vols., Berlin 1895–1896, repr. Berlin 1958. * W. M. LINDSAY, 2 vols., Oxford 1904, with add. 1910. * P. NIXON (TTrN), 5 vols., London 1917–1938, repr. 1965–1988. * A. ERNOUT (TTrN), 7 vols., Paris 1932–1940. * W. BINDER, rev. by W. LUDWIG (Tr), 2 vols., Darmstadt 1969, repr. 1982. * A. THIERFELDER (TTrN), (separate eds.: Mil., Curc., Capt.), Stuttgart 1962–1965. * Amph.: W. B. SEDGWICK (TN), Manchester 1960, 2nd ed. 1967. * Asin.: F. BERTINI (TC), 2 vols., Genova 1968. * Aul.: C. QUESTA (C), Torino 1978. * G. AUGELLO (TC), Torino 1979. * Bacch.: L. CANALI (Tr), C. QUESTA (T, introd.), Firenze 1965; 2nd ed. with add. 1975 (with Menander's Dis exapat.). * J. BARSBY (TTrC), Warminster 1986. * Capt.: W. M. LINDSAY (TN), Oxford 2nd ed. 1921, repr. 1950. * J. BRIX, M. NIEMEYER, O. KÖHLER (TC), Leipzig 7th ed. 1930. * Cas.: W. T. MACCARY, M. M. WILLCOCK (TC), Cambridge 1976. * Cist.: L. E. BENOIST, Lyon 1863. * Curc.: J. COLLART (TC), Paris 1962. * G. MONACO (TTr), Palermo 1969. * Epid.: G. E. DUCKWORTH (TC), Princeton 1940. * Men.: P. T. JONES (TC), Oxford 1918, repr. 1968. * J. BRIX, M. NIEMEYER, F. CONRAD (TC), Leipzig 6th ed. 1929. * N. MOSELEY, M. HAMMOND (TC), London 9th ed. 1975. * Merc.: P. J. ENK (TC), 2 vols., Leiden 1932, 2nd ed. 1966. * Mil.: J. BRIX, M. NIEMEYER, O. KÖHLER, Leipzig 4th ed. 1916, repr. 1964. * M. HAMMOND, A. M. MACK, W. MOSKALEW (TN), Cambridge, Mass. 2nd ed. 1970. * P. RAU (TTr), Stuttgart 1984. * Most.: N. TERZAGHI (TC), Torino 1929. * J. COLLART (TC), Paris 1970. * Persa.: E. WOYTEK (TC), Wien 1982. * Poen.: G. MAURACH (TC), Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1988. * Pseud.: A. O. F. LORENZ, Berlin 1876, repr. 1981. * Rud.: F. MARX (TC), Leipzig 1928, repr. 1959. * A. THIERFELDER, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1962. * Stich.: H. PETERSMANN (TC), Heidelberg 1973. * Trin.: J. BRIX, M. NIEMEYER (TC), Leipzig 5th ed. 1907. * J. TAMBORNINI (TC), 2 vols., Paderborn 1954–1955. * Truc.: P. J. ENK (TC), 2 vols., Leiden 1953, repr. 1979. * K. H. KRUSE (TC), diss. Heidelberg

1974. * Vidularia: R. CALDERAN (TC), Palermo 1982. * Frg.: F. WINTER, diss. Bonn 1885; s. above Leo, Lindsay, Ernout. ** Lexica: G. LODGE, Lexicon Plautinum, 2 vols., Leipzig 1904–1933. * A. MANIET, Plaute. Lexiques inverses, listes grammaticales, relevés divers, Hildesheim 1969. * A. MANIET, Plaute, Asinaria. Index verborum, lexiques inverses, relevés lexicaux et grammaticaux, Hildesheim 1992. ** Bibl.: J. A. HANSON, Scholarship on Plautus since 1950. CW 59, 1965–1966, 103–107; 126–129; 141–148; repr. in: The Classical World Bibliography of Drama and Poetry and Ancient Fiction, with a new introd. by W. DONLAN, New York 1978, 1–16. * G. GASPARRO, La questione plautina nella critica anglo-sassone contemporanea, RCCM 15, 1973, 87–133. * J. D. HUGHES, A Bibliography of Scholarship on Plautus, Amsterdam 1975. * W. G. ARNOTT, Menander, Plautus, Terence, Oxford 1975. * D. FOGAZZA, Plauto 1935–1975, Lustrum 19, 1976 (1978), 79–295. * E. SEGAL, Scholarship on Plautus 1965–1976, CW 74, 7, 1981 (Special Survey Issue), 353–483. * S. below LEFÈVRE 1973 and GAISER 1972.

K. ABEL, Die Plautusprologe, diss. Frankfurt 1955. * W. S. ANDERSON, Barbarian Play: Plautus' Roman Comedy, Toronto 1993. * A. ARCELLASCHI, Plaute dans Plaute, VL 77, 1980, 22–27. * B. BADER, Szenentitel und Szeneneinteilung bei Plautus, diss. Tübingen 1970 (important for the textual transmission; in addition: C. QUESTA, Maia n.s. 26, 1974, 301–319). * D. BAIN, Plautus vortit barbare: Plautus Bacchides 526–61 and Menander Dis Exapaton 102–12, in: D. WEST, A. J. WOODMAN, eds., Creative Imitation in Latin Literature, Cambridge 1979, 17–34. * M. BARCHIESI, Plauto e il 'metateatro' antico, in: I moderni alla ricerca di Enea, Roma 1980. * W. BEARE, The Roman Stage. A Short History of Latin Drama in the Time of the Republic, London 3rd ed. 1964. * M. BETTINI, Verso un'antropologia dell'intreccio: Le strutture semplici della trama nelle commedie di Plauto, in: Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici 7, 1981, 39–101. * M. BIBER, The History of the Greek and Roman Theater, Princeton 2nd ed. 1961 (archaeol.). * J. BLÄNSDORF, Archaische Gedankengänge in den Komödien des Plautus, Wiesbaden 1967. * H.-D. BLUME, Einführung in das antike Theaterwesen, Darmstadt 1978. * L. BRAUN, Die Cantica des Plautus, Göttingen 1970. * W. R. CHALMERS, Plautus and his Audience, in: Roman Drama, ed. by T. A. DOREY and D. R. DUDLEY, London 1965, 21–50. * K. H. CHELIUS, Die Codices Minores des Plautus. Forschungen zur Geschichte und Kritik, Baden-Baden 1989. * L. DE FINIS, ed., Teatro e pubblico nell'antichità. Atti del convegno nazionale, Trento 25/27 Aprile 1986, Trento 1987. * F. DELLA CORTE, Da Sarsina a Roma, Firenze 1967. * H. DREXLER, 'Lizenzen' am Versanfang bei Plautus, München 1965. * G. E. DUCKWORTH, The Nature of Roman Comedy. A Study in Popular Entertainment, Princeton 1952. * E. FANTHAM, Comparative Studies in Republican Latin Imagery, Toronto 1972. * P. FLURY, Liebe und Liebessprache bei Menander, Plautus und Terenz, Heidelberg 1968. * E. FRAENKEL, Plautinisches im Plautus, Berlin

1922; with add.: Elementi plautini in Plauto, Firenze 1960. * O. FREDERSHAUSEN, De iure Plautino et Terentiano, diss. Göttingen 1906. * W. H. FRIEDRICH, Euripides und Diphilos. Zur Dramaturgie der Spätformen, München 1953. * M. FUHRMANN, Lizenzen und Tabus des Lachens, in: Das Komische, ed. by W. PREISENDANZ and R. WARNING, Poetik und Hermeneutik 7, München 1976, 65–101. * K. GAISER, Zur Eigenart der römischen Komödie. Plautus und Terenz gegenüber ihren griechischen Vorbildern, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 1027–1113. * K. GAISER, Die plautinischen Bacchides und Menanders Dis exapaton, Philologus 114, 1979, 51–87. * B. GENTILI, Lo spettacolo nel mondo antico. Teatro ellenistico e teatro romano arcaico, Roma 1977. * P. GRIMAL, ed., Le théâtre à Rome. Travaux de la Commission de latin, in: Association G. BUDÉ, Actes du IX<sup>e</sup> Congrès (Rome 1973), Paris 1975, 247–499. * H. HAPP, Die lateinische Umgangssprache und die Kunstsprache des Plautus, Glotta 45, 1967, 60–104. * H. HAFFTER, Untersuchungen zur altlateinischen Dichtersprache, Berlin 1934. * E. W. HANDLEY, Menander and Plautus. A Study in Comparison, London 1968. * P. B. HARVEY, Historical Topicality in Plautus, CW 79, 1986, 297–304. * W. HOFMANN, G. WARTENBERG, Der Bramarbas in der antiken Komödie, bes. bei Plautus und Terenz, Akad. Wiss. DDR 1973, 2. * R. L. HUNTER, The New Comedy of Greece and Rome, Cambridge 1985. * G. JACHMANN, Plautinisches und Attisches, Berlin 1931. * H. D. JOCELYN, Imperator histricus, YCIS 21, 1969, 95–123 (on interpolations). * D. KONSTAN, Roman Comedy, Ithaca 1983. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Die römische Komödie. Plautus und Terenz, Darmstadt 1973. * E. LEFÈVRE, Die römische Komödie, in: M. FUHRMANN, ed., Römische Literatur, Neues Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft 3, Frankfurt 1974, 33–62. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978. * E. LEFÈVRE, L'originalité dell' ultimo Plauto, Sic Gymn 33, 1980, 893–907. * E. LEFÈVRE, E. STÄRK, G. VOGT, Plautus barbarus. Sechs Kapitel zur Originalität des Plautus, Tübingen 1991. * M. LENTANO, Parce ac duriter. Catone, Plauto e una formula felice, Maia n.s. 45, 1993, 11–16. * F. LEO, Plautinische Forschungen. Zur Kritik und Geschichte der Komödie, Berlin (1893), 2nd ed. 1912. * W. M. LINDSAY, The Ancient Editions of Plautus, Oxford 1904. * W. M. LINDSAY, Syntax of Plautus, Oxford 1907. * H. MARTI, Untersuchungen zur dramatischen Technik bei Plautus und Terenz, diss. Zürich, Winterthur 1959. * F. MIDDELMANN, Griechische Welt und Sprache in Plautus' Komödien, diss. Münster, Bochum 1938. * U. E. PAOLI, Comici latini e diritto attico, Milano 1962. * L. PERELLI, Società Romana e problematica sociale nel teatro plautino, StudRom 26, 1978, 307–327. * G. PETRONE, Teatro antico e inganno. Finzioni plautine, Palermo 1983. * Plauto e il teatro. Atti del V congresso internazionale di studi sul dramma antico = Dioniso 46, 1975. * V. PÖSCHL, Die neuen Menanderpapyri und die Originalität des Plautus, SHAW 1973, 4. * C. QUESTA, Introduzione alla metrica di Plauto, Bologna 1967. * C. QUESTA, Maschere e funzioni

nelle commedie di Plauto, in: Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici 8, 1982, 9–64. * C. QUESTA, Numeri innumeri. Ricerche sui cantica e la tradizione manoscritta di Plauto, Roma 1984. * R. RAFFAELLI, Ricerche sui versi lunghi di Plauto e di Terenzio, Pisa 1982. * U. REINHARDT, Mythologische Beispiele in der Neuen Komödie (Menander, Plautus, Terenz), diss. Mainz 1972. * F. H. SANDBACH, The Comic Theatre of Greece and Rome, London 1977, 118–134. * L. SCHAAF, Der Miles gloriosus des Plautus und sein griechisches Original. Ein Beitrag zur Kontaminationsfrage, München 1977. * H. P. SCHÖNBECK, Beiträge zur Interpretation der plautinischen Bacchides, Düsseldorf 1981. * K. H. E. SCHUTTER, Quibus annis comoediae Plautinae primum actae sint quaeritur, diss. Groningen, Leiden 1952. * E. SEGAL, Roman Laughter. The Comedy of Plautus, Cambridge, Mass. 1970. * G. A. SHEETS, Plautus and Early Roman Comedy, ICS 8, 1983, 195–209. * N. W. SLATER, The Theatre of the Mind. Metatheatre in Plautus, diss. Princeton 1981. * N. W. SLATER, Plautus in Performance. The Theatre of the Mind, Princeton 1985. * E. STÄRK, Die Menaechmi des Plautus und kein griechisches Original, Tübingen 1989. * W. STEIDLE, Probleme des Bühnenspiels in der Neuen Komödie, GB 3, 1975, 341–386. * G. TANNER, The Origins of Plautine Comedy, in: Vindex humanitatis. Essays in Honour of J. H. Bishop, Armidale (New South Wales) 1980, 58–83. * G. THAMM, Zur Cistellaria des Plautus, diss. Freiburg i. Br. 1971. * W. THEILER, Zum Gefüge einiger plautinischer Komödien, Hermes 73, 1938, 269–296. * A. THIERFELDER, De rationibus interpolationum Plautinarum, Leipzig 1929. * A. TRAINA, Forma e suono, Roma 1977. * T. B. L. WEBSTER, Studies in Later Greek Comedy, Manchester 1953 (with a good account of the problems of many Latin plays). * F. WEHRLI, Motivstudien zur griechischen Komödie, Zürich 1936. * I. WEIDE, Der Aufbau der Mostellaria des Plautus, Hermes 89, 1961, 191–207. * J. WRIGHT, Dancing in Chains. The Stylistic Unity of the Comoedia Palliata, Rome 1974. * N. ZAGAGI, Tradition and Originality in Plautus. Studies of the Amatory Motifs in Plautine Comedy, Göttingen 1980. * O. Zwierlein, Zur Kritik und Exegese des Plautus, 1: Poenulus und Curculio (1990), 2: Miles gloriosus (1991), 3: Pseudolus (1991), 4: Bacchides (1992), Stuttgart 1990–1992.

CAECILIUS

Life, Dates

Caecilius Statius, who in the opinion of Volcacius Sedigitus (1. 5 M. = 1. 5 Bü.) was Rome's greatest writer of comedy, came to Rome from Cisalpine Gaul, as would many famous authors. Jerome, who may be drawing on Suetonius (chron. a. Abr. 1839 = 179 B.C.), makes him an Insubrian, originating perhaps from Milan. Gellius (4. 20. 12 and 13) regards him as a former slave. None of this lacks probability, and the name of Statius in itself, though it occurs frequently among the Samnites, does not justify us in making the poet, like his friend Ennius, into a native of south Italy.<sup>1</sup> More important than nationality is perhaps the fact that, since he was born about 220 B.C., he and Pacuvius were contemporaries. This is a circumstance often forgotten, because Caecilius died a year after Ennius at the beginning of the sixties, while Pacuvius lived much longer.

Caecilius' comedies at first met with rejection until, particularly after Plautus' death in 184, the intervention of the producer Ambivius Turpio won over the public, exactly as happened later in the case of Terence. The touching encounter with young Terence, whose talent Caecilius recognized, may be a legend; if at all, it must have happened as early as some years before the original production of the Andria (166 B.C.).

Survey of Works

Aeth(eri)u, Andria (M = imitated from Menander), Androgynos (M), Asotus, Chalcia (M), Chrysiou, Dardanus (M), Davos, Demandati, Ephesio (M?), Epicleros (M), Epistathmos, Epistula, Ἐξ οὐτοῦ ἔστως, Exul, Fallacia, Gamos, Harpazomene, Hymnis (M), Hypobolimaeus sive Subditivos (M; cf. also Chaerestratus, Rastraria and Hypobolimaeus Aeschinus), Imbrii (M), Karine (M), Meretrix, Nauclerus (M), Nothus Nicasio, Obolostates sive Faenerator, Pausimachus, Philumena, Plocium (M), Polumenoe (M), Portitor, Progamos (M), Pugil, Symbolum, Synaristosae (M), Synephebi (M), Syracusii, Titthe (M), Triumphus, Venator.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Caecilius' chief model was Menander, as the list just given shows. Along with him, he follows Antiphanes and Alexis from the Middle Comedy and, from the New, Philemon (Exul, Harpazomene, Nothus Nicasio), Macon (Epistula), and Posidippus (Epistathmos). Caecilius' preference for Menander prefigures a new tendency in Roman comedy. The time of Terence, dimidiatus Menander, is not far away. In the structure of his comedies, Caecilius borrows more closely from his models than Plautus had done. In minor matters, he often deviates considerably from his original, and by no means aims at a literal translation.

<sup>1</sup> An unconvincing argument in D. O. ROBSON, The Nationality of the Poet Caecilius Statius, AJPh 59, 1938, 301-308.

In a comic poet it is natural to look for a debt to popular traditions. This is especially true of a poet like Caecilius Statius, who is far removed from Terence's strictness. In the Synephebi, an old farmer planting trees says in answer to a question that he is doing it for the coming generation (Cicero Cato 7. 24). Whether Caecilius found this remark in Menander or not, it is our oldest evidence of a motif widespread in folklore.

Literary Technique

In praising Caecilius' arrangement of his plots, Varro<sup>1</sup> is noting a quality owed to Menander. Caecilius followed his examples relatively closely, without inserting scenes from other plays (so-called contaminatio). By contrast with Plautus, he avoided, so far as may be seen, personal address to the audience. Even allusions to Roman customs are scarce. He belonged to the same generation as Luscius, who was accused by Terence of slavish dependence on his models. Caecilius' plays carry mainly Greek titles. Formations in -aria and diminutives tend to disappear. Terence and Turpilius would make no further use of Latin titles at all.

As his 'coarse' adaptations show, even in his Menandrian plays, Caecilius is less concerned with subtle psychology and the ethos of his characters than with powerful stage effect. But dialogue does not go out of control as in Plautus. In accordance with Aristotle's injunction, the plot (argumentum) takes precedence over dialogue and even over character drawing, ethos. This is an advantage in comparison with the looser composition of Plautus, but at the same time a disadvantage in the light of the more subtle character drawing of Terence.

Nevertheless, even in Caecilius, more nuanced characters and situations are to be found. In the Synephebi, a young hero laments in all seriousness that his father is too easygoing (com. 196–206 Guardì = 199–209 R.). In another passage we hear of a hetaera who refuses to accept money (com. 211–212 G. = 213–214 R.). In both cases we are confronted with a 'Menandrian' reversal of conventional ideas.

<sup>1</sup> In argumentis Caecilius poscit palmam, in ethesin Terentius, in sermonibus Plautus (Men. 399 BUECHELER).

We are already perhaps on the way towards the interest in character shown by Terence, although Caecilius seems to be more concerned with surprising the spectator than with individual character portraits.

Language and Style

It is fortunate that we are able to compare Caecilius' best known play (com. 136–184 G. = 142–189 R.), the 'Necklace' (Plocium), with Menander. Gellius (2. 23. 9–11), to whom we owe this possibility, bewails the loss of ease and grace, and speaks of an exchange like that between Glaucus and Diomedes in Homer. Quintilian is of the opinion that, in Latin, Attic charm is unattainable (inst. 10. 1. 100).

An old married gentleman is complaining about his rich and ugly wife, who has forced him to dismiss a pretty serving girl (com. 136–153 G. = 142–157 R.). In Menander, we find tranquil, graceful trimeters, while Caecilius offers a large, polymetric canticum. Typical of early Latin are accumulations of synonyms and homoeoteleuta: Ita plorando, orando, instando atque obiurgando me obtudit ('so she wore me down with her weeping, wheedling, intruding and abusing'). The style emphasizes the perseverance with which Krobyle has 'worked on' her husband until she has had her way. This seems to forebode the creation of a caricature out of Menander's elegant analysis of a type. But, contrary to expectation, the elements of caricature in the original are abandoned: the lady's yard-long nose and her grotesque portrayal as an 'ass among apes'. The Greek poet highlights visual effect and exact numbers: 16 talents of dowry. The Roman, conversely, prefers emotive sound effects and epigrammatical antithesis: instead of 'nose' he introduces the single ironic term forma, which one may imagine accompanied by a gesture. At the same time, Caecilius concentrates totally on speech and action: for example, on the process of 'softening up', and especially on the speech, quoted verbatim, of the conquering harridan who has won the argument: 'Which of you young women has done as much as I have in my old age?' The antithesis here is noteworthy. Military metaphors contribute to the novel effect: Qui quasi ad hostes captus liber servio salva urbe atque arce ('I am free but still a slave to the will of enemies, though yet my town and stronghold are safe'). Another witty point is found in the sentence: quae nisi dotem omnia quae nolis, habet ('she who has everything you wouldn't want her to have except a dowry'). The series of oxymora is typically Latin: liber servio; vivo mortuus (dum eius mortem inhio)

'free, I'm a slave, while I gape for her death, I'm a living corpse'. So the epigrams follow in quick succession until the poet gives a last turn to the screw, gaining a strained, indeed even coarse, effect.

The same old gentleman converses with an elderly neighbor (com. 154–158 G. = 158–162 R.) about the haughtiness of the rich wife, the 'mistress'. Menander calls her the 'most tedious of the tedious'. Caecilius replaces this general description with a narrated scene of somewhat vulgar effect. The husband returns home drunk, and his wife, who has not eaten, gives him a malodorous kiss: ut devomas volt quod foris potaveris ('she wants you to belch up what you have been drinking out of doors'). While the graceful Greek phrase is left hanging in the air, Caecilius attains drama, concreteness and antithetical point, using exaggeratedly crude methods referred by Gellius (2. 23. 11) to the mime. A similar effect of surprise is found in the third fragment (159 G. = 163 R.): 'My wife began to please me mightily—after she had died.'

In the view of ancient critics,<sup>1</sup> Caecilius' verses were weighty (graves). This may be seen in his critical comments on contemporary society. This is the quality which Luscius Lanuvinus missed in Terence, whose 'light style' (levis scriptura) he criticized.<sup>2</sup> Gellius went somewhat further and claimed that Caecilius patched together words full of tragic bombast (2. 23. 21 trunca quaedam ex Menandro dicentes et consarcinantes verba tragici tumoris). The closeness to tragedy is well observed, and may often be detected as early as in Plautus. There is a link with the typically tragic style of Caecilius' contemporary Pacuvius. Cicero names him and Caecilius in the same breath.

Caecilius' Latin is criticized (Cic. Brut. 74). It seems to exaggerate certain features of Plautus, just as Pacuvius writes in a 'more Ennian' way than Ennius. Terence's criticism of Luscius Lanuvinus, saying that he corrupts the language of his Greek original (Ter. Eun. 7), is similar. Caecilius is a mannered, unclassical stylist. However, his sharply pointed epigrams rise beyond his time and belong to the most polished Latin apophthegms. In this respect, indeed, Caecilius is a predecessor of Terence, who otherwise is so totally different from him.

<sup>1</sup> On gravitas: older critics apud Hor. epist. 2. 1. 59; πάθος Varro apud Charis. GL 1. 241. 28–29.

<sup>2</sup> Ter. Phorm. prol. 5 (= CRF RIBBECK, 3rd ed. Luscius Lanuvinus frag. ex incertis fabulis II).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In his work, Caecilius is guided by his artistic understanding and by theoretical considerations. So much is shown by the indirect evidence. He seems to have established definite rules for the palliata: closer attention to the conduct of plot in the original; avoidance of contamination; the demand that a play should be 'new', while Plautus had reworked themes of Naevius. Even in the theoretical foundation of his activity, he pioneered the development which led to Terence. It is unfortunate that, because of the paucity of material, we cannot go beyond these general conclusions.

Ideas II

Memorable epigrams contain thoughts derived from Hellenistic philosophy: 'Live as best you can, since you cannot live as you would like' (com. 173 G. = 177 R. vivas ut possis, quando non quis ut velis). 'Only want; you will accomplish' (com. 286 G. = 290 R. fac velis: perficies). 'One man is a god to another, if he knows his duty' (com. 283 G. = 264 R. homo homini deus est, si suum officium sciat). This last remark may be meant as a rejoinder to Plautus' lupus est homo homini, 'man is a wolf to a man' (Asin. 495, from Demophilus). The Menandrian epigram is traced partly to Stoic and partly to Aristotelian tradition (cf. Guardì ad loc.). The ancient functional concept of god as 'protector of life' lies behind it. This 'humanitarian' notion of god corresponds well to the Roman feeling for the active life.

The 'tragic' pathos which Caecilius was able to arouse could occasionally be socially motivated (165–168 G. = 169–172 R.): Menedemus' slave Parmeno has discovered that his master's daughter, violated by a stranger, has borne a child and bewails the lot of the poor man who lacks the money he would need to conceal his misfortune. Caecilius abbreviates the sentimental features of his Menandrian original and brings into play an antithesis: 'That man is particularly unlucky whose own poverty means that he has to bring up children in poverty. The man bereft of wealth and riches is immediately exposed (to everything), while a rich man's clique easily conceals his bad repute.' Caecilius' manner here is harsher and more accusatory than Menander's. In the last line Roman ideas are in play (factio).

Transmission

Cicero, who was particularly engrossed by questions of the generation gap in comedy, especially valued Caecilius' Synephebi. He preserves 15 fragments from this play, and thus helps to correct the somewhat coarse impression given by the Plocium of Caecilius' character portrayal. Our most important other witnesses are Nonius (106 fragments), Verrius Flaccus, as transmitted by Festus and Paulus (26 fragments), Gellius (11 fragments). The remainder are varyingly owed to Priscian, Charisius, Diomedes, Donatus, Servius, Isidore and others. In addition, there are the lexicon of Osborn of Gloucester (middle of the 12th century, A. Mai, Thesaurus novus Latinitatis, Roma 1836) and a Glossarium Terentianum, published by C. Barth in 1624.

Influence

Caecilius is already mentioned in the second prologue to Terence's Hecyra, where Ambivius Turpio refers to him as an acknowledged poet who, like Terence, had to overcome difficulties at the beginning of his career. Terence enters into a detailed discussion with Luscius Lanuvinus, probably a disciple or sympathizer of Caecilius. He cannot accept all Caecilius' artistic decisions. He returns to the practice of contaminatio, although he manages it with greater care. An ever closer adherence to models ultimately meant the end of the genre. Volcacius Sedigitus, who lived in the period between Cato and Cicero, bestowed on Caecilius the first place among all the comic poets. Plautus came second, Naevius third, Terence in sixth place (apud Gell. 15. 24). Here the chief criteria were obviously power of language and comedy of situation. If Caecilius received precedence even over Plautus, this may be due to his adroit handling of plot. This explains his temporary success. He seemed to link Plautus' merits (color, powerful language) with Menander's excellence in plot construction.

Horace quoted a prevailing opinion saying that Caecilius possesses gravitas (epist. 2. 1. 59). He mentioned him along with Plautus among the creators of words (ars 45-55). There is some truth in both statements. Above all, they reveal why Caecilius' comedies fell into oblivion. After his death, the language of Latin literature and its stylistic ideals took a different turn. Urbane elegance, purity and refinement replaced richness, power and color, notably in comedy, where, in any case, gravitas was a somewhat questionable feature. What had been individually colored turned out to be 'dated' and became ever more difficult to understand; what had been coarse became 'shocking'.

Caecilius resembles Pacuvius in so far as his language was for Latin a cul-de-sac, leading no further. Caecilius continued Plautine comedy by retaining and even strengthening its crudities and by raising its motley language to 'tragic bombast'. That is a characteristic of his generation. His approach to Plautus is like that of Pacuvius to Ennius. These authors brought the development of Latin theatrical language to a point too far from educated colloquial discourse. Terence's decision in favor of simple, clear Latin was more than the reaction of an aristocratic purism. It was the return of comedy to the linguistic register best suited to it.

Caecilius' achievements have not yet been fully appreciated. A thematic analysis of his comic plots and subjects, and a comparison of his language with that of Pacuvius, would clarify his position in the history of Roman drama. The prominence of Caecilius in Roman comedy is all the more difficult for us to grasp, because according to the ancient evidence it lay in his conduct of plots, and this is a quality which can hardly be deduced from brief fragments such as those we possess.

Caecilius combines skillful plot and epigrammatic thought with a somewhat crude drawing of character and a motley language. The two positive qualities named first here are decisive in performance. His two faults were more obvious to the reflective reader than to the spectator, who perhaps at first sight felt them to be an attraction. Gellius relates that the Plocium pleased his circle of friends on first reading, but lost its charm when studied more closely and compared with Menander. However, quiet reading is a poor substitute for the living play.

Editions: R. and H. STEPHANUS, Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum, quorum opera non extant, Genevae 1564. * CRF 2nd ed., 35–81, CRF 3rd ed., 40–94. * E. H. WARMINGTON (TTr), ROL 1, London 1935, 467–561. * T. GUARDÌ (TTrN, ind.), Palermo 1974. ** Ind.: GUARDÌ (s. editions). ** Bibl.: GUARDÌ (s. editions).

R. ARGENIO, Il Plocium di Cecilio Stazio, MC 7, 1937, 359–368. * W. BEARE, The Roman Stage, London 3rd ed. 1964, 86–90. * M. BETTINI, Un 'fidanzato' Ceciliano, RFIC 101, 1973, 318–328. * A. H. GROTON, Planting Trees for Antipho in Caecilius Staius' Synephebi, Dioniso 60, 1, 1990, 58–63. * A. M. NEGRI, Il Plocium di Menandro e di Cecilio, Dioniso 60, 1, 1990, 54–57. * J. NEGRO, Studio su Cecilio Stazio, Firenze 1919. * H. OPPERMAN, Zur Entwicklung der fabula palliata, Hermes 74, 1939, 113–129. * H. OPPERMAN, Caecilius und die Entwicklung der römischen Komödie, F&F 15, 1939, 196– 197. * C. QUESTA, Tentativo di interpretazione metrica di Cecilio Stazio (142–157 R.<sup>3</sup>), in: Poesia latina in frammenti. Miscellanea filologica, Genova 1974, 117–132. * R. ROCCA, Caecilius Statius mimicus?, Maia 29–30, 1977–1978, 107–111. * A. TRAINA, Sul vertere di Cecilio Stazio (1958), in: A. TRAINA, Vortiti barbare. Le traduzioni poetiche da Livio Andronico a Cicerone, Roma 1970, 41–53. * J. WRIGHT, Dancing in Chains: The Stylistic Unity of the Comoedia Palliata, Rome 1974, 87–126.

TERENCE

Life and Dates

P. Terentius Afer, who was perhaps of Libyan origin, was born in Carthage in 195/4 or 185/4 B.C.,<sup>1</sup> at a time when his predecessors in comedy, Plautus, Ennius, and Caecilius were still alive. At Rome, where he became the slave of a senator, Terentius Lucanus, he received a first-class education and his freedom. He enjoyed the friendship of respected Romans, perhaps Scipio Aemilianus and Laelius, to whom rumor wrongly ascribed the authorship of his comedies (Haut. 22–24; Ad. 15–21). His plays were presented by Ambivius Turpio, whose first favorite author, Caecilius, had died in 168 B.C. It is probable that Terence, like Lucilius, remained aloof from the writers' guild, and the low esteem in which his work was held by Volcacius Sedigitus may be owed to the influence of this college.<sup>2</sup>

He died on a literary pilgrimage made to Greece and Asia Minor.<sup>3</sup> The story that he translated 108 plays there is perhaps wishful thinking on the part of scholars, as is the touching tale asserting that the young poet read his Andria at the behest of the aediles to the aged Caecilius—two years after Caecilius' death! Terence's alleged bequest of a property to his daughter, enabling her to marry a knight, is a charming story, but legend also hints at the Scipios' ingratitude . . . Terence is the only early Latin poet whose vita came down to us. But this merely offers further proof of the limits to our knowledge of ancient authors.

<sup>1</sup> The date 185 B.C. is supported by the Suetonian life transmitted by Donatus (p. 7. 8–8. 6 WESSNER; p. 38. 80–40. 96 ROSTAGNI), drawn from the chapter De poetis in De viris illustribus. The earlier date can be derived from Fenestella (vita p. 3. 4–7 and 3. 10–13), cf. G. D'ANNA, Sulla vita suetoniana di Terenzio, RIL 89–90, 1956, 31–46; on the poet's biography M. BROŽEK, De Vita Terentii Suetoniana, Eos 50, 1959–1960, 109–126.

<sup>2</sup> W. KRENKEL, Zur literarischen Kritik bei Lucilius, in: D. KORZENIEWSKI, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1970, 161–266, esp. 230–231.

<sup>3</sup> According to Suetonius 5, he died in 159 B.C.; according to Jerome chron. 1859, in 158.

His six comedies are dated between 166 and 160 B.C. by the didascaliae, the vita and the prologues. The didascaliae name the author and the title, the ceremony and the presiding magistrate, the principal actor, the composer of the music and its type, the Greek original and the consuls in the year of presentation. This information was put together by an ancient editor. Subtle efforts to reconstruct other hypothetical dates<sup>1</sup> are not universally accepted. The prudent course in the meantime is to accept the dates which were perhaps originally established by Varro who had more material at his disposal. With our present information we cannot go further.

The Andria was produced in April 166 B.C. at the Ludi Megalenses. Twice it happened that performances of the Hecyra were interrupted, at the Ludi Megalenses in 165 and at the funeral games for L. Aemilius Paullus in 160, until in the same year, probably at the Ludi Romani in September, the play finally met with success. The prologue comes from the second (1-8) and the third (33-42) stage presentation. In 163 the Hautontimorumenos was produced for the first time, followed by the first performance of the Eunuchus in 161, in both cases at the Ludi Megalenses. The Phormio was put on in the same year, probably at the Ludi Romani. The Adelphoe was staged in 160, at Aemilius Paullus' funeral games.

This means that Terence's literary activity began soon after Paullus' victory at Pydna over Rome's last great opponent, Perseus of Macedon. The king's library was brought to Rome and gave an indispensable impulse to literature. Terence's activity breaks off in the year of Paullus' death. It was at his funeral games, conducted by Scipio Aemilianus, that two of the plays were produced.

<sup>1</sup> H. B. MATTINGLY, The Terentian Didascaliae, Athenaeum 37, 1959, 148-173; H. B. MATTINGLY, The Chronology of Terence, RCCM 5, 1963, 12-61; previously (with a different conclusion) L. GESTRI, Studi terenziani I: La cronologia, SIFC n.s. 13, 1936, 61-105; cf. also L. GESTRI, Terentiana, SIFC n.s. 20, 1943, 3-58. The transmitted sequence is convincingly defended by D. KLOSE, Die Didaskalien und Prologe des Terenz, diss. Freiburg i. Br. 1966, esp. 5-15; 161-162.

Survey of Works

Andria: Pamphilus is in love with Glycerium, who is expecting his baby. His father Simo, however, has betrothed him to another girl, Chremes' daughter, and is pressing for an early marriage. On the advice of the slave Davus, Pamphilus at first raises no objections. When Chremes happens to see the baby, he breaks the marriage off. Now, however, it is revealed that he is also Glycerium's father, and so there is no further obstacle to Pamphilus' happiness. Chremes' other daughter is married to Charinus, who is in love with her. This is a comedy of recognition with a conflict between father and son, deception and self-deception.

Hautontimorumenos: Old Menedemus torments himself by hard work, out of remorse that he has driven his son Clinia to take a soldier's career because of his love for Antiphila. But Clinia has secretly returned and is staying with his friend Clitipho, who is in love with Bacchis, a hetaera. To deceive Clitipho's father Chremes, Bacchis passes herself off as Clinia's mistress, with Antiphila as her servant. The cunning slave Syrus cheats old Chremes of a nice sum of money for Bacchis. Finally it is revealed that Antiphila is Clitipho's sister. She marries Clinia. Clitipho, in his turn, is able to find an appropriate match. This is a comedy of character with a conflict between the generations and, at the same time, a play of intrigue with recognition.

Eunuchus: Thraso, a soldier, has presented a female slave to the hetaera Thais. But the slave is Thais' sister and an Athenian citizen. Phaedria, Thais' second lover, instructs his slave Parmeno to bring her a eunuch as a present from his master. Phaedria's brother, who has fallen in love with Thais' sister, disguises himself as a eunuch and violates her. She is revealed as an Athenian citizen and becomes his wife. Phaedria strikes a deal with Thraso over Thais. An effective comedy of intrigue and recognition.

Phormio: While their fathers, Chremes and Demipho, are away, Antipho, Demipho's son, marries a girl from Lemnos. Phaedria, Chremes' son, falls in love with a citharist. When Demipho returns home, the parasite Phormio promises, in return for a sum of money, to marry the girl from Lemnos himself. However, he uses the money to buy the freedom of the citharist. Now it is revealed that the Lemnian girl is Chremes' daughter, and so Antipho may keep her. This is the classic example of a complex comedy of intrigue carried through with great clarity.

Hecyra: Pamphilus holds aloof from his young wife Philumena, since he is in love with the hetaera Bacchis. While he is abroad, Philumena returns to her parents, ostensibly because of her mother-in-law's malice, but really because she wants to give birth to a child conceived with an unknown stranger before her marriage. Pamphilus at first refuses to take her back into his house until Bacchis rescues the situation. A ring she received from Pamphilus is recognized by Philumena's mother. The unknown stranger was Pamphilus himself. This ambitious 'anti-comedy'<sup>1</sup> is intellectually rather demanding. It shows unusually subtle character portrayal, the avoidance of traditional stereotypes and an action aimed more at concealment than revelation. It is Terence's most tranquil and yet most stimulating play.

Adelphoe: Ctesipho receives a strict upbringing from his father Demea, while Aeschinus is treated liberally by his uncle Micio. Aeschinus has seduced Sostrata's daughter, Pamphila, while Ctesipho is in love with a citharist. To please his brother, Aeschinus violently rescues the citharist from the leno. This furnishes Sostrata with the proof of the disloyalty of her future son-in-law, while Demea notes the unhappy fruits of his brother's liberal educational methods. Now, however, he learns that his own son Ctesipho is really the citharist's lover. He changes tack completely and becomes generous with everyone—at Micio's expense. Aeschinus may marry Pamphila, Ctesipho may keep his harpist and Micio is to marry old Sostrata. At the end, the sons accept even the strict father. This is a play of problems and revelation without intrigue or recognition.

Sources, Models, and Genres

Analysis of sources is an important key to understanding Terence's originality but, unfortunately, we do not possess his direct models, and, for the most part, must rely on the poet's own prologues and the commentary of Donatus. For the Andria, Hautontimorumenos, Eunuchus and Adelphoe, Menander's plays of the same name are both sources and chief models. For the Hecyra, the model was supplied by Apollodorus of Carystos (beginning of 3rd century B.C.). His Epidikazomenos was the model for the Phormio.<sup>2</sup> Apollodorus' Hecyra was in the line of Menander's Epitrepontes and even outshone its model in seriousness. The chief attraction of the Epidikazomenos was its compositional excellence. In his selection of models, therefore, Terence abandoned Plautus' versatility, and moved closer to Caecilius, who had earlier shown a preference for Menander.

The introduction of additional scenes from other plays will be discussed below (s. Literary Technique). Certain structural similarities with tragedy, as with Sophocles' Oedipus, are prominent, for example, in the Andria. The slave seems to make a witty allusion to this: Davos sum, non Oedipus (Andr. 194). However, tragic structures had long been a standing resource of New Comedy.

<sup>1</sup> Don. Ter. Hec. praef. 9: res novae.

<sup>2</sup> E. LEFÈVRE, Der Phormio des Terenz und der Epidikazomenos des Apollodor von Karystos, München 1978; K. MRAS, Apollodoros von Karystos als Neuerer, AAWW 85, 1948, 184–203.

Menander transmitted to the poet certain reminiscences of Greek philosophy, such as the doctrine of the golden mean<sup>1</sup> between two extremes, or reflections on state and education in the Adelphoe, or Epicurean ideas in the Andria (959–960), which recur in distorted form in the Eunuchus (232–263). After the victory of Pydna, with its consequences for Roman intellectual life, practical philosophy in the Stoic fashion was sufficiently well known to a certain section of the Roman public to raise a smile. This is shown by the slave Geta's remark, made in mockery of his master, that he had already 'pre-meditated' all the trouble lying ahead of him (Phorm. 239–251).<sup>2</sup> Even before Panaetius, whom he could not have encountered in Rome, Terence always showed a resolute attention to decorum, a principle which he may have been taught to appreciate, not only by upper class Roman society, but also by his rhetorical training.

The special stamp set by Terence on the comic genre will emerge more clearly from a discussion of his literary technique. In his critical encounter with his Latin predecessors, Terence avoided well-worn paths. From Greek models, he took over scenes omitted by Plautus. We will study this in the context of his reflections on literature.

Literary Technique

The most striking difference in literary technique between Terence and Plautus is found in the treatment of the prologue. Terence turns this part of the comedy into a vehicle for literary polemics and even propaganda on behalf of his method of working,<sup>3</sup> a feature possibly anticipated by Caecilius. The prologue thus assumes a function comparable with that of the parabasis in Aristophanes. Within his plays, however, Terence, unlike Plautus, avoids direct contact with his audience<sup>4</sup> and the resulting break in dramatic illusion.

<sup>1</sup> Cicero (Tusc. 3. 29–34) joins the Stoics in assailing the Epicureans, appealing, among others, to Anaxagoras A 33 D.-Kr. = Eurip. fig. 964 NAUCK and to the passage of Terence in question; RABOW, Seelenführung 160–179; 306–307. It is unfortunate that Panaetius, Scipio's 'teacher', cannot be considered a source for Terence.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. K. GAISER'S epilogue to O. RIETH, Die Kunst Menanders in den Adelphen des Terenz, Hildesheim 1964, 133–160.

<sup>3</sup> D. KLOSE 1966, 131.

<sup>4</sup> Very few exceptions: Andr. 217; Hec. 361.

The introduction to the plot (exposition) in Terence is always made in a scene on stage. He thus completes a development already begun in Hellenistic comedy.<sup>1</sup> The circumstances are often explained to a character unaware of their nature, someone who in the further course of the action plays no part (πρόσωπον προτατικόν). The introductory scene of the Adelphoe is a masterpiece. It dispenses with any such extra character by entrusting the exposition to two of the chief characters. The avoidance of any prologue in the older manner sets limits to the spectator's knowledge of prior events. The dramatic action comes closer to him and demands an intellectual effort on his part. Yet Terence's careful expositions indicate that the arousal of suspense was not his first concern.<sup>2</sup> Though the use of such an introductory scene may bring undeniable dramatic advantage, some disadvantages are no less evident. The Hecyra's double failure may have been owing to the fact that the author left the spectator too much in the dark.<sup>3</sup> In detail, the disappearance of the old prologue often compels the poet to give the necessary information by successively inserting elements of the exposition into the action: at the cost of internal probability, characters divulge circumstances which, strictly speaking, they ought not to know.<sup>4</sup> An advantage is gained by turning a monologue<sup>5</sup> into a lively dialogue with the introduction of an extra character, such as Antipho's<sup>6</sup> in Eunuchus 539–614. Conversely, in the Hecyra a slow-paced final scene of recognition is replaced with rapid narrative.

Cantica of the Plautine type are rarely found in Terence: twice in the Andria (481–485; 625–638), once in the last play, the Adelphoe (610–616). Basically senarii and long verses prevail (s. under Language and Style). Sound effects and emotional excitement are muted. The musical comedy is transformed into a theater of speech. The

<sup>1</sup> Ad. 22–24 may be compared with Plaut. Trin. 17–18. In Plautus, it is by no means a universal rule that the prologue must relate to the content of the play. If Caecilius employed his prologues for literary criticism, he may have explained the plot in a dialogue on the stage.

<sup>2</sup> E. LEFÈVRE 1969, 108.

<sup>3</sup> E. LEFÈVRE ibid. On this question now F. H. SANDBACH, How Terence's Hecyra Failed, CQ n.s. 32, 1982, 134–135 (examines the precise circumstances in which the performance was interrupted).

<sup>4</sup> Don. Ter. Ad. 151; E. LEFÈVRE 1969 passim, esp. 13–18.

<sup>5</sup> There are numerous monologues in the Hecyra, not always to good theatrical effect.

<sup>6</sup> E. FRAENKEL, Zur römischen Komödie (2). Antipho im Eunuchus des Terenz, MH 25, 1968, 235–242.

plays proceed, so far as may be seen, without lyrical interludes, and this means that the division into acts finally loses significance.

Terence makes clever use of the so-called contaminatio<sup>1</sup> to enliven his plays. The excellent expository dialogue which marks his adaptation of Menander's Andria is freely modeled on the same poet's Perinthia. In the Eunuchus, which in other respects depends on its namesake by Menander, the attractive roles of the soldier and parasite are borrowed from Menander's Kolax. The Adelphoe, adapted from Menander, is expanded with a lively scene from Diphilos' Synapothneskontes (2. 1; cf. prol. 6-14 and Plautus, Pseud. 1. 3). But this also illustrates the disadvantages of the procedure. The insertion disrupts chronology, since it must be imagined as occurring before the introductory scene with its exposition. Moreover, the 'five act' structure of the original is destroyed.

The double plot<sup>2</sup> had not been invented by Terence, but it is one of his specialties. His audience may have wanted more action, and he was attracted to the challenge of complex structural problems. Thus in the Andria, he introduced two additional characters, Charinus and Birria (Don. Ter. Andr. 301). They are however quite colorless, without close connection to the fabric of the remaining plot. The quartet in scene 2. 5, where a conversation between Simo and Pamphilus is doubly overheard, comes off successfully. In four of the late comedies, the two strands of the plot are closely interwoven, as in the Eunuchus and Phormio. In the Hautontimorumenos and Adelphoe the double plot is the center of interest. Only the complex Hecyra is in this respect 'simple'.

Terence's monologues are shorter, but more numerous, than in Plautus, and form an integral part of the plot. They may be subject to eavesdropping, or, if they are soliloquies, provide psychological atmosphere for the scene directly to follow. Following his Greek teachers, Terence takes pains with subtle character portrayal. In the Hecyra, the 'deceived' young husband, who might be quite justified in expressing indignation, is surprisingly sensitive, calm and collected. The 'malicious mother-in-law' proves to be unusually attentive and kind, the hetaera, by displaying nobility of spirit,<sup>1</sup> saves the happiness of a young family. Since the parents at first are unappreciative of their son and heir, it is the overjoyed grandfathers who find a nurse and with determination assume the role of mothering.<sup>2</sup> It is not right then to argue that the element of comedy is lacking in this play. It is found inter alia in the constant frustration of traditional expectations for the different roles. Stage conventions<sup>3</sup> are also parodied, and recognition, normally a method of dénouement, leads in two plays to further complications (Haut. and Phorm.). Terence, in bringing Roman comedy to perfection, has an inner predilection for models displaying intellectual or psychological subtlety, and chooses them with care.

<sup>1</sup> The modern notion of 'contamination' has arisen from a misunderstanding of passages such as Andr. 16; cf. W. BEARE, Contaminatio, CR 9, 1959, 7-11; on the question, s. above (p. 173-175).

<sup>2</sup> W. GÖRLER, Doppelhandlung, Intrige und Anagnorismos bei Terenz, Poetica 5, 1972, 164-182.

In general, Terence's slaves play a smaller part in the plot than in Plautus. This does not of course mean that the playwright had an anti-democratic attitude. In the early plays the treatment of the slaves is unconventional. In the Phormio and the Adelphoe Terence shows that in well-constructed plays even conventional methods and a traditional interpretation of the slave's role may produce good artistic results.<sup>4</sup>

Above all, the poet likes to bring opposed characters into confrontation. This feature is linked with his habit of introducing his characters in pairs. His remark quam uterque est similis sui!, 'how like himself, each of them' (Phorm. 501) has a charm all its own. Action and animation take precedence over character stereotypes. Accordingly, Menedemus need not appear throughout as a self-tormentor. Chremes, who begins as 'shrewd', may be proved a fool, and Demea in the Adelphoe may suddenly fall from one extreme into the other. A particularly good example of a 'non-static' character is provided by Pamphilus in the Hecyra. He matures from love for the hetaera Bacchis to affection for his young wife. In the Hautontimorumenos and Adelphoe the poet is fascinated by the exchange of roles of the two old gentlemen, the

<sup>1</sup> Terence's Bacchis is not actually pursuing a personal aim like Habrotonon in the Epitrepontes; different nuances are found in the portrayal of hetaerae by H. LLOYD-JONES, Terentian Technique in the Adelphi and the Eunuchus, CQ 23, 1973, 279-284; M. M. HENRY, Menander's Courtesans and the Greek Comic Tradition, Frankfurt 1985, 115.

<sup>2</sup> More comic (and more risqué) the potent eunuch and the cowardly general in the Eunuchus.

<sup>3</sup> Birth offstage (Andr. 474-476), conversation with people in the house (490-494), blurring out of secrets on the stage (Phorm. 818; Hec. 866-868).

<sup>4</sup> W. E. FOREHAND, Syrus' Role in Terence's Adelphoe, CJ 69, 1973, 52-65.

collapse of the apparent superiority of the 'wise' senex. The poet relishes these reversals.

The reflective side of Terence's art will engage our attention later (Ideas). It is perhaps no coincidence that his playful vein, less often mentioned, increased after the failure of the serious Hecyra. In his last play, the Adelphoe, we find actually 'Plautine' elements, such as an added scene of brawling, a canticum, a domineering slave and an almost farcical conclusion.<sup>1</sup> The abrupt end of the poet's career prevents us from knowing whether the 'serious master of classical comedy', fully aware of his expertise, would have broken free and made fun of all our efforts at categorization.

Language and Style

Plautus is a creator of language, whereas Terence, like Caesar later, is among those authors concerned with linguistic purity and stylistic refinement. His language and style are more select. Reflecting the poet's social milieu, they are more 'aristocratic' than in Plautus. The exuberance of linguistic invention is brought under control. A mild archaism like tetuli for tuli is found in the oldest play, the Andria, but not in the late Adelphoe. His simple, choice diction explains Terence's success as a school author. He has a severe taste, and a strict discipline of language. Avoiding Plautus' popular features and starting from the colloquial usage of high Roman society, Terence competed with Menander to create a counterpart to the graceful tone of Attic dialogue. Speech and response interlock and are carefully related to each other.<sup>2</sup> This produces a literary language surpassing all previous Latin in clarity, terseness, and flexibility and preparing the way for the elegant style of Gracchus or Caesar.

Plautus overflows with terms of abuse,<sup>3</sup> for which he prefers concrete expressions. Terence avoids names of beasts apart from belua, asinus and canis. He also avoids sexual terms of abuse and replaces crude wit by irony. His poetry is often urbane enough to use aposiopesis, leaving the abusive term to our imagination. His use of inter-jections, often without parallels in Menander,<sup>1</sup> is suggestive and nuanced. Terence's thrust towards stylistic unity is shown by the fact that in Menander's Perinthia cruder tones are heard<sup>2</sup> than Terence's Andria leads us to expect. There is frequent use in Terence of abstracts in -io which may echo Hellenistic tendencies and to some extent only recur in late Latin.<sup>3</sup> He extends the metaphorical meaning of many adjectives to describe mental states.<sup>4</sup> His 'modern' awareness is also shown by his unflinching habit of indicating a change of subject in the sentence.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> To attribute these and other 'imperfections' without qualification to Roman adapters is a questionable proceeding: P. W. HARSH, Certain Features of Technique found in Both Greek and Roman Drama, AJPh 58, 1937, 282-293.

<sup>2</sup> HAFFTER, Dichtersprache 126-127.

<sup>3</sup> S. LILJA, Terms of Abuse in Roman Comedy, Helsinki 1965.

Terence's style is undoubtedly less rhetorical (and less poetic) than that of Plautus, yet more rhetorical than that of Menander. It is rewarding to read his prologues as 'speeches for the defense'.<sup>6</sup> His expository narratives show another style. A third register is employed in dialogue,<sup>7</sup> and even here there are subtle distinctions made according to class and character.<sup>8</sup>

Sententiae,<sup>9</sup> which establish a contact with the spectator by an appeal to common experience, act as some kind of substitute for Plautus' laughter. They may help to denote character, for example, that of Micio in the Adelphoe, and to emphasize important moments, though, even so, Terence uses maxims more sparingly than does Menander.

Terence reduced the number of meters and did not use symmetrically constructed cantica in a variety of meters. He preferred iambic senarii and trochaic septenarii, though iambic septenarii and trochaic

<sup>1</sup> G. LUCK, Elemente der Umgangssprache bei Menander und Terenz, RhM 108, 1965, 269-277.

<sup>2</sup> A. KÖRTE, Zur Perinthia des Menander, Hermes 44, 1909, 309-313.

<sup>3</sup> G. GIANGRANDE, Terenzio e la conquista dell'astratto in latino. Un elemento di stile, Latomus 14, 1955, 525-535.

<sup>4</sup> Alenus, amarus, durus, facilis, familiaris, humanus, liberalis, tardus. Haffter, Dichtersprache 126-127.

<sup>5</sup> N. P. LETOVA, Observations on the Syntactical Structure of the Sentence in Terence's Comedies (Russ.), Uchenye Zapiski Leningradskogo Universiteta 299, 1, 1961, philol. ser. 59, 123-142; summary in German in BCO 9, 1964, 26-27.

<sup>6</sup> G. FOCARDI, Linguaggio forense nei prologhi terenziani, SIFC n.s. 44, 1972, 55-88; G. FOCARDI, Lo stile oratorio nei prologhi terenziani, SIFC n.s. 50, 1978, 70-89; H. GELHAUS seems to go too far (Die Prologe des Terenz. Eine Erklärung nach den Lehren von der inventio und dispositio, Heidelberg 1972).

<sup>7</sup> S. M. GOLDBERG, 1986, 170-202.

<sup>8</sup> Don. Ter. Eun. 454; Phorm. 212; 348; V. REICH, Sprachliche Charakteristik bei Terenz. Studie zum Kommentar des Donat, WS 51, 1933, 72-94; H. HAFFTER 1953.

<sup>9</sup> C. GEORGESCU, L'analyse du locus sententiosus dans la comédie de caractère (avec référence spéciale à la comédie Adelphoe), StudClas 10, 1968, 93-113.

octonarii are also found. The iambic octonarius is not only relatively, but absolutely, more frequent than in Plautus (500 to 300). Occasionally, we find bacchii, dactyls, choriambus. In the earliest play, the Andria, there is relatively great variety of meter, and later restriction in this respect therefore must be the result of conscious choice. However, the change of meter<sup>1</sup> within scenes, mostly at decisive moments in the action, has no parallel in Menander; in fact, within the dialogue changes of meter are much more frequent than in Plautus. This means that, in spite of the smaller number of meters, a certain variety is attained, although it could not be argued that senarii are used only for facts, and septenarii only for feelings.<sup>2</sup> Scattered short verses are likewise used to gain particular effects.<sup>3</sup>

The structure of the verse is more finished. Just like Accius, and later Cicero and Seneca, Terence avoided filling the last two feet of the senarius with one long word.<sup>4</sup> The iambic octonarius also developed along the lines of that of tragedy.<sup>5</sup> In rapid dialogue, Terence may often divide his short verses (senarii) into four parts. Unlike his contemporaries, who, in the manner of early Latin, preferred the coincidence of sentence and line, Terence, in Menander's footsteps, broke up cola by frequent enjambement.<sup>6</sup> This throws over the poetic form, as it were, a veil of 'naturalness', and this in itself indicates the originality of his achievement.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Since the exposition is to be made during the action (Ad. 22–24), the prologues to his comedies are left free for other purposes. Terence turns them into a vehicle for literary reflection. Such critical discussions are appropriate to a literature that was 'made, not born', a truth that was illustrated at Rome also by Accius. Terence's prologues reflect both a new degree of maturity in the writer's aware-

<sup>1</sup> L. BRAUN, Polymetrie bei Terenz und Plautus, WS 83, 1970, 66–83.

<sup>2</sup> In the Andria and the Adelphoe parts important for the progress of the action are written in senarii.

<sup>3</sup> G. MAURACH, Kurzvers und System bei Terenz, Hermes 89, 1961, 373–378.

<sup>4</sup> J. SOUBIRAN, Recherches sur la clause du sénaire (trimètre) latin. Les mots longs finaux, REL 42, 1964, 429–469.

<sup>5</sup> R. RAFFAELLI, Ricerche sui versi lunghi di Plauto e di Terenzio (metriche, stilistiche, codicologiche), Pisa 1982.

<sup>6</sup> L. BRAUN 1970 (quoted above).

ness of his art,<sup>1</sup> and the presence of an audience which is no longer wholly unsophisticated. Homogeneity and consistency are not of course to be expected. The spectators who were distracted by a rope-dancer or a gladiatorial show were not perhaps the same as those to whom Terence directed his treatment of literary problems.

The standards of the educated public may be recognized by Terence's defense against the reproach of a lack of originality (Haut., Phorm., Hec.). It was regarded as meritorious to bring onto the Roman stage Greek plays so far untranslated or certain scenes ignored by predecessors. On the other hand, it was impermissible to use Latin models or Greek models already translated (which was more or less the same thing).

As a rule, ancient authors preferred to disguise their originality. In his prologue to the Andria, Terence emphasizes his dependence on Menander's Perinthia. He is silent about his quite independent substitution of a freedman for the wife in the first scene. He has made bigger changes therefore than he admits. His deceptive modesty extends even further. In a society so class-conscious, the reproach was close at hand, that his noble friends were the genuine composers of, or collaborators on, his plays, and that it was their genius on which he was relying (Haut. 24). For all its absurdity, Terence does not directly reject this suggestion and even considers it a compliment (Ad. 15-21).

Above all, these prologues reveal our author's conscious artistry. In them, Terence established his own poetic awareness. As later in Horace's Epistles, a 'modern' author stands his ground against an 'old school' (Andr. 7). There was already then a Roman literary tradition demanding from contemporary authors a statement of position.

Terence's simple, spare style was a novelty in Latin literature, and it is understandable that he needed to defend it against the criticism that it lacked vigor and strength (Phorm. 1-8). For his part, he assailed the heaviness, the tragic bombast, and the unfaithfulness to reality of the 'old poet' who attacked him, Luscius of Lanuvium (floruit about 179 B.C.).

In his selection and interpretation of subject matter, as well, Terence kept abreast of Hellenistic culture. He believed that he could present to his audience tranquil and serious plays without turning the stage into a pulpit. He made fun of other comic authors with their cheap effects, such as caricatured figures and scenes of turmoil: to give an example, the inevitable introduction of the running slave was meant to court the favor of the public, but in fact only rendered the actors breathless. He offered a theater of speech, which is what he means by pura oratio (Haut. 46). Livelier moments were not, however, so rare in him as we might suppose on the basis of such declarations.

<sup>1</sup> On the Greek background M. POHLENZ, Der Prolog des Terenz, SIFC n.s. 27-28, 1956, 434-443; rudiments in Plautus: G. RAMBELLI, Studi plautini. L'Amphitruo, RIL 100, 1966, 101-134.

In the Hecyra (866–869), Terence expressed his revolutionary poetic purpose outside the prologue. As Pamphilus and Bacchis explain, contrary to normal comedy, the plot of this anti-comedy is bound not to reveal but to conceal.

A question may be raised concerning Terence's attitude to the combination of several models, the so-called contaminatio. At first, he seems to plead for the past. Against mere pedantry (obscura diligentia) demanding no tampering with Greek plays (Andr. 16; Haut. 17), and an accurate translation without admixture, the poet defends the 'negligence' (neglegentia) of Naevius, Plautus or Ennius (Andr. 18–21). Terence's theory therefore permits that same relatively free relationship to his models which modern scholarship often discovers in his practice. His aim is not to translate well (bene vertere) but to write well (bene scribere, Eun. 7).<sup>1</sup> May his adversary Luscius really then be called 'more progressive'? Luscius was undoubtedly a man of reflection. But Terence, who was no less reflective in his own way, reproached him with a barren adherence to an extreme: faciuntne intellegendo, ut nil intellegant?, 'Does not this use of their intellect show that they understand nothing?' (Andr. 17). Whereas the narrow doctrinaire could only dig the grave of the palliata, Terence was Menander's continuer, not his translator. He found between caprice and dependence a 'classical' mean.

Ideas II

The transference of Greek comedies to a Roman context involved certain changes. What was typically Greek, but foreign to the Roman spectator, was omitted. According to preference, one may see in this a 'halving' of Menander (cf. Caesar, fig. 2 FPL Morel = fig. 1 Büchner), or a conscious smoothing of what is too Greek into something universally human.<sup>1</sup> The typically Roman relation of a freedman to his patron is examined in detail in the independently written prologue of the Andria, reflecting the poet's own experience.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> On the Phormio as a well-constructed comedy of intrigue, see S. M. GOLDBERG, 1986, 61–90.

The fact, however, that the players wore Greek costume produced a certain distance, even if Plautus' laughter at the crazy Greeks was no longer emphasized. Romanization is shown in Terence less by superficial details than by a divergent evaluation of particular characters. Thus in the Adelphoe Terence, to please his Roman audience, seems to have enhanced the importance of the strict and somewhat pessimistic father, Demea; although it is true that Demea has to learn no longer to set work and profit above human relations, and at the end leaves his sons free to decide whether to take his advice. The Hautontimorumenos even depicts the torments of conscience felt by a too-strict father, a scandalous challenge to the people of Brutus. Terence by no means lacks understanding for the easygoing Micio, whose educational principles may be inspired by Peripatetic thought. The result is all the more interesting for being multifaceted. It is a compromise between Greek influence and Roman self-awareness.

Terence did not aim at mere entertainment. It is no coincidence that, of the four Menandrian plays which he adapted, three dealt with moral problems. The choice of models tells us something about the author, independently of any question of his originality. His interest in the generation gap was typical for his period, which was a time of transition. Although he somehow excused the stern father at the end of the Adelphoe he did something striking in Roman circumstances by bringing the question of strict education onto the stage at all. It would, however, be going too far to identify Demea with Cato<sup>3</sup> and Micio with Scipio or Aemilius Paullus, although, in the time between the expulsion of the Epicureans Alcaeus and Philistus (173 B.C.), and the embassy of philosophers (155 B.C.), the question of modern education was in fact a burning issue. In 161 B.C., one year before the first production of the Adelphoe, Greek rhetors at Rome were subject to regulation.

His sincere efforts to go beyond the traditional double moral standard, even if they still remained within the framework of convention, were courageous. The gentleness of the young husband in the Hecyra, when confronted with his 'guilty' wife, contrasts markedly with Cato's assertion that an adulteress caught in the act might be killed without fear of reprisal (Gell. 10. 23). Terence's manifest understanding of women and his subtle analysis of love, including the affection between married partners which is rarely treated in literature, prepared the way both in spirit and language for Catullus, Virgil, and the elegists. He was a friend of the Scipios, with their openness to what was new, and his interpretation of the Hellenistic spirit was more refined than that of Plautus. At the same time, he had larger aims than the introduction of Greek values at Rome. He invited his audience to personal reflection. Humanitas seems to have been a word coined by Cicero and, in conformity with the particular process of maturation experienced by Cicero, its bias was aimed at gaining intellectual education. The varied use of homo and humanus in Terence allows us to suppose that, in the ambience of the Scipios, a Roman consciousness of humanity was in process of formation, although such labels should be handled with care.

<sup>1</sup> E. FRAENKEL, Zum Prolog des terenzischen Eunuchus, Sokrates 6, 1918, 302-317, esp. 309.

<sup>2</sup> F. JACOBY, Ein Selbstzeugnis des Terenz, Hermes 44, 1909, 362-369.

<sup>3</sup> So already Melanchthon, cf. E. MARÓTI, Terentiana, AAntHung 8, 1960, 321-334. Did Cato when censor, like Demea, arrange marriages?

Terence preserves a certain ethical dignity. For example, he does not bring onto the stage any type of the senex amans, and his boastful soldier in the Eunuchus is less grotesque than Plautus' Miles gloriosus. However, it must not be overlooked that the noble characters, for example, in the Hecyra, are neither Terence's invention nor exhaust the complete range of his figures. He does not shrink from cruel derision, often consciously deviating from his model. As important as humanitas is, it is not a sufficient means of explaining Terence's plays. Satire, skepticism, and a certain pessimism are equally Roman traits found in him.

Terence breaks the dramatic illusion less often than Plautus. But more than Plautus—sometimes indeed more than Menander<sup>1</sup>—he tries to do justice to Theophrastus' principle of closeness to life,<sup>2</sup> his demand for probability. Yet, in a conventional genre like comedy, this cannot be wholly successful, and Terence is clever enough to recognize this incongruity and make play with it. More than Plautus, he pays attention to the decorum of high society and often observes his characters with humane sympathy and sensitivity, sometimes, as also happens in Menander and Lessing, at the expense of comic effects. He is fond of presenting two antithetical characters, and uses the method of 'exchange of roles', by which the 'clever one' is shown to be the fool and vice versa. In this way, he establishes the necessary intellectual distance between the spectator and the action. His ruthless denigration of the smart aleck is compensated for by his rehabilitation of characters who, without experiencing conversion, do at some point recognize their own mistakes (Menedemus in the Hautontimorumenos, Demea in the Adelphoe, Simo in the Andria). This reversal is not always a surprise and the characters therefore, sometimes, if not always, allow for a consistent interpretation. Right from the beginning of the Hautontimorumenos, Chremes shows himself a hypocrite.

<sup>1</sup> H. HAFFTER 1953.

<sup>2</sup> A. PLEBE, La nascita del comico nella vita e nell'arte degli antichi Greci, Bari 1956, 249; cf. also Aristophanes of Byzantium apud Syrian. in Hermog. 2. 23. 6 Rabe and Cic. rep. 4. 13 (assignment to rep. uncertain); Rosc. Am. 16. 47.

Terence is concerned, not simply with entertainment, but with insight and action. Menander's hero must recognize his fate, that of Terence must create it.<sup>1</sup> Gods and coincidence play a smaller part than in Menander. Plautus' laughter at fools gives way to irony at the expense of the so-called wise. Terence often stands the social pyramid on its head. Far from limiting himself to a realistic analysis of conflicts drawn from life, he even turns to situations in contrast with convention. In principle, the 'truth' of his comedy may be close to life, but it is quite distant from one-dimensional realism. At times it is ruthless and even cruel.

His double plots produce more than mere doubling. In the Andria, the second lover Charinus speaks less of his love than of Pamphilus' supposed perfidy, thus helping to illumine this latter character from another point of view. In spite of Terence's additions, his plays thus maintain their unity of theme.<sup>2</sup>

In the course of time, the Roman public had acquired a store of experiences. Intellectually accepted by higher social circles, comedy had now finally matured. Terence's world is less fantastic than that of Plautus, and in it laughter is replaced by irony. This does not mean however that even Terence may not seek lively comic effects, as for example in the Adelphoe, soon after the beginning and, in other plays, particularly towards the end. These interventions, intended to work upon the audience, are often gained at the cost of character drawing which, in spite of subtle individual touches, at times sinks back into the stereotype. In the Phormio Chremes resembles the senex delirans, Nausistrata the uxor saeva, helpful Phormio the parasitus edax. It was precisely in its conclusions that even Greek comedy—even Menander—in no way despised a somewhat more turbulent style; and practically every fresh papyrus find gives reason to revise old ideas of the ‘perfection’ of New Comedy. In spite of this, it is beyond doubt that quite often, by comparison with Menander, Terence enhanced the comic effect, sometimes by the introduction of scenes of turmoil or again by the use of caricature.

<sup>1</sup> L. PERELLI, Il teatro rivoluzionario di Terenzio, Firenze 1973, repr. 1976.

<sup>2</sup> S. M. GOLDBERG 1986, 123-148.

The Roman poet often puts before us not so much the action as its significance. Already in the Andria he adds Charinus who, rather than influencing events, observes them and ‘comments on’ them.<sup>1</sup> Psychological interest is part of the inheritance of the Roman poets, called as they were to reflection from the very beginning. Here, Virgil may be compared with Homer, or Lucan with all earlier epic writers. Terence’s work is a milestone on the road taken by Roman literature in coming to terms with its own nature. The poet who enhances the element of mystery in the plot of the Hecyra unmasks, though without fuss, the conventions of comedy exactly as he does the prejudices of Roman society.

Transmission<sup>2</sup>

The transmission shows two lines. One is that of the Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae (A, Vaticanus Latinus 3226, 4th–5th century).<sup>3</sup> The other is that of the so-called Recensio Calliopiana,<sup>4</sup> attested from the 9th century, but equally traceable to antiquity. It reached the Middle Ages in two branches (Gamma and Delta). Gamma also includes some illustrated manuscripts,<sup>5</sup> in which the location of the pictures is determined by the division into scenes. Of course, there are interpolations and contaminations. In general therefore we may distinguish three ancient editions, in each one of which the plays

<sup>1</sup> K. BÜCHNER 1974, 454; 468.

<sup>2</sup> Facsimile editions: A: S. PRETE, Città del Vaticano 1970; C: G. JACHMANN, Lipsiae 1929; F: E. BETHE, Lugduni Batavorum 1903.

<sup>3</sup> Today the codex begins with Andr. 889 and ends with Ad. 914.

<sup>4</sup> The name Calliopiis is found in subscriptions. In comparison with A, a greater tendency towards uniformity is visible in the text.

<sup>5</sup> C, Vaticanus Latinus 3868, 9th century; P, Parisinus Latinus 7899, 9th century; F, Ambrosianus H 75 inf., 10th century (this may also be regarded as one of the mixed class).

appear in a different sequence.<sup>1</sup> Ancient quotations and some fragments found on palimpsests and papyri offer indirect testimony to the good quality of the traditio. The history of the text before A.D. 400 and the judgment of what remains are controversial in detail.

Influence

In Terence's lifetime, the Hecyra was twice dogged by ill-luck. The Eunuchus, by contrast, enjoyed great success, obtaining for the poet an unusually high fee (Suet. vit. Ter. pp. 42–43, 111–124 Rostagni). Later productions of Terence's plays are attested, for example, in Horace (epist. 2. 1. 60–61). In his list of Roman writers of comedy, Volcacius Sedigitus, at the end of the 2nd century B.C., set Terence only in sixth place (fig. 1. 10 Morel and Büchner). Afranius however regarded him as incomparable (apud Suet. vit. Ter. pp. 29, 11–13 Rostagni). Lines ascribed to Caesar (fig. 2 Morel = fig. 1 Büchner) concede to Terence linguistic purity but not force, and for this reason address him as a 'Menander halved' (dimidiate Menander). The mockery is all the keener because Terence took pride in making one play out of two by Menander.

Cicero appreciated his choice language, his grace and charm (Suet. loc. cit.; cf. Att. 7. 3. 10 elegantiam sermonis), and quoted all the plays except the Hecyra. Varro praised him as a master of character portrayal (in ethesin: Men. 399 B.). Horace (epist. 2. 1. 59) attests that critics acknowledged Terence's unusual skill (ars), but does not wholly share this point of view.

Unlike Plautus, Terence has always been a school author. Significantly, Quintilian (inst. 10. 1. 90) recommended his writings as in hoc genere elegantissima, although he was convinced of the superiority of Greek comedy. Accordingly, the transmitted text was polished but also smoothed out. Grammarians turned their attention to him. The annotated copy belonging to Marcus Valerius Probus (second half of 1st century A.D.) influenced the scholia, although it is hardly possible to speak of an edition. In the Imperial period there were commentaries;<sup>2</sup> we possess the one written by Aelius Donatus (middle of 4th century), without the part on the Hautontimorumenos. We also have the rhetorical commentary of Eugraphius (5th or 6th century).

<sup>1</sup> A: Andr., Eun., Haut., Phorm., Hec., Ad.; Gamma: Andr., Eun., Haut., Ad., Hec., Phorm.; Delta: Andr., Ad., Eun., Phorm., Haut., Hec.

<sup>2</sup> The commentaries of Aemilius Asper, Helenius Acro, Arruntius Celsus, and Terence remained a school author even for the Church Fathers such as Jerome, Ambrose,<sup>1</sup> and Augustine,<sup>2</sup> and for the Middle Ages, although the risk was appreciated that the pupil, instead of learning language from scandalous deeds, might learn scandalous deeds from language (Aug. conf. 1. 16. 26).

In the 10th century, the learned nun Roswitha (Hrotsvit) of Gandersheim<sup>3</sup> composed six comedies in prose as a Christian substitute for Terence's 'immoral' plays. In the monastic schools, his influence began to wane when the monks of Cluny tried to separate monastic and secular culture.

In modern times, Terence has had decisive significance in three areas. As a school author, he was a model for correct colloquial language both in Latin and in the vernacular, and for civic virtues. As an ethical teacher, he influenced the moralists, satirists, and novelists, and so helped to shape western humanitas. As a dramatist, along with Plautus and Seneca, he helped to nurture the European theater,<sup>4</sup> which owes to him the refined technique of the double plot.

1. School requirements meant that from the Renaissance on<sup>5</sup> Terence became known to an ever-wider public in manuscripts and in printed editions. He was indispensable as a source of correct colloquial Latin. John Anwykyll's English-Latin phrasebook, Vulgaria, which appeared in six editions from 1483 onward, contained inter alia about 530 phrases from Terence.<sup>6</sup> In Wittenberg, Friedrich the

---

Evanthius are lost; general remarks in H. MARTI, Zeugnisse zur Nachwirkung des Dichters Terenz im Altertum, in: Musa iocosa. FS A. THIERFELDER, Hildesheim 1974, 158-178.

<sup>1</sup> P. COURCELLE, Ambroise de Milan face aux comiques latins, REL 50, 1972, 223-231.

<sup>2</sup> H. HAGENDAHL, Augustine and the Latin Classics, Göteborg 1967, 1, 254-264.

<sup>3</sup> K. DE LUCA, Hrotsvit's Imitation of Terence, CF 28, 1974, 89-102; C. E. NEWLANDS, Hrotswitha's Debt to Terence, TAPhA 116, 1986, 369-391.

<sup>4</sup> B. STEMBLER, Terence in Europe to the Rise of Vernacular Drama, diss. Cornell University, Ithaca, N.Y. 1939; K. VON REINHARDSTOETTNER, Plautus und Terenz und ihr Einfluß auf die späteren Litteraturen, in: Plautus. Spätere Bearbeitungen plautinischer Lustspiele, Part 1, Leipzig 1886, 12-111; H. W. LAWTON, La survivance des personnages térentiens, BAGB 1964, 85-94; B. R. KES, Die Rezeption der Komödien des Plautus und Terenz im 19. Jh., Amsterdam 1988; R. S. MIOLA, Shakespeare and Classical Comedy, Oxford 1994.

<sup>5</sup> France: H. W. LAWTON, Térence en France au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. Editions et traductions, Thèse Paris 1926; Poland: B. NADOLSKI, Recepcja Terencjusza w szkołach gdańskich w okresie renesansu, Eos 50, 2, 1959-1960, 163-171; Hungary: E. MARÓTI, Terenz in Ungarn, Altertum 8, 1962, 243-251.

<sup>6</sup> A. H. BRODIE, Anwykyll's Vulgaria. A Pre-Erasman Textbook, NPhM 75, 1974,

Wise (d. 1525) established a professorship exclusively dedicated to Terence's works. Melanchthon (d. 1560) declared in the preface to his pioneering edition of Terence (1516) that this poet offered the most excellent examples of civic behavior. The high opinion held by the praeceptor Germaniae of Terence's pedagogical value exercised definitive influence on Protestant school timetables. In 1532, Erasmus (d. 1536) published his edition, which opened the way to a more profound understanding of meter. The preface recommended the poet to youthful readers.<sup>1</sup>

2. As a moral teacher and psychologist, Terence became an indispensable component of modern humanitas. He influenced satirists such as Sebastian Brant (d. 1521), preachers such as Bossuet (d. 1704), and moralists such as Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592). The last counted the 'urbane Terence' among his favorites, called him liquidus puroque simillimus amni and 'admirable à représenter au vif les mouvements de l'âme et la condition de nos mœurs'.<sup>2</sup>

Novelists felt the attraction of his depiction of human character. Cervantes (d. 1616) wrote a short novel modeled on the Hecyra. La Dame aux Camélias by Alexandre Dumas fils (d. 1895) is a successor of that same serious and sentimental comedy. Dumas knew Terence as a fellow-dramatist and, like him, contrasted human understanding with social prejudices. Following the Andria Thornton Wilder idealized another courtesan (The Woman of Andros, 1930).

3. Above all, however, in company with Seneca and Plautus, Terence presided at the rebirth of drama in the modern period. He offered lessons in dramatic technique and polished style. In the 16th century the writers on poetics recommended him with great success as a model in shaping a double plot.

Petrarch (d. 1374) came to Terence through Cicero's Tusculan Disputations (3. 30; 3. 65; 4. 76). He grew to like him (Petr. fam. 3. 18. 4), he read him, and in his youth tried his hand at a comedy.<sup>3</sup> Among the predecessors of commedia umanistica may also be counted the Paulus<sup>4</sup>

---

416-427; A. H. BRODIE, Terens in English. Towards the Solution of a Literary Puzzle, C&M 27, 1966 (1969), 397-416.

<sup>1</sup> Terence receives high praise elsewhere too from ERASMUS: M. CYTOWSKA, De l'épisode polonais aux comédies de Térence, in: Colloque érasmien de Liège, Paris 1982, 135-145, esp. 143.

<sup>2</sup> HIGHET, Class Trad. 650; 655.

<sup>3</sup> The Philologia is lost.

<sup>4</sup> Ed. by K. MÜLLNER, WS 22, 1900, 232-257.

of Pier Paolo Vergerio (d. 1444). Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini (Pope Pius II, d. 1464) composed a comedy under the title Chrysis, frequently referred to Terence in his works, and encouraged the making of copies.

In Germany, modern Latin comedy in the ancient manner began with Jacob Wimpheling's Stylpho (1480) and Reuchlin's Scenica progymnasmata (Henno).<sup>1</sup> Georg Macropedius (d. 1558), a Dutch neo-Latinist and student of Reuchlin, wrote twelve comedies. The influence of Terence on the Latin school drama of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation is incalculably great.

Terence also influenced works written in modern languages. Italian translations with free intermezzi preceded the rise of original Italian comedies. Renaissance comedy is almost exclusively in the tradition of the Roman classical authors. The creators of the commedia erudita of the cinquecento were Publio Filippo Mantovano (Formicone about 1500) and Ariosto (d. 1533). Ariosto's Cassaria (1508) drew both on Plautine plays and on the Hautontimorumenos, while in his I Suppositi (1509) he echoed the Eunuchus. B. Varchi (d. 1565) and Angelo Beolco (called 'il Ruzzante'; d. 1542)<sup>2</sup> were also acquainted with Terence. Machiavelli (d. 1527) not only composed comedies<sup>3</sup> but personally transcribed the Eunuchus and translated the Andria.

Terence was translated into French relatively early, about 1466 by Guillaume Rippe and about the same time by Gilles Cybile. Around 1500, there followed the verse translation by Octovien de Saint-Gelas, and in 1542 there appeared the translation of the Andria by Charles Estienne. The first effort of La Fontaine (d. 1695) was to translate the Eunuchus into French verse (L'Eunuque, 1654).

In L'école des maris (1661), Molière (d. 1673) followed the Adelphoe, and the Phormio in Les fourberies de Scapin (1671). His mingling of Terence's classicism with popular elements is however not a flaw, as Boileau mistakenly supposed,<sup>4</sup> but a token of his greatness. In the 19th century, many dramatists looked upon the Phormio as a classical model.

<sup>1</sup> First performed in 1497; first edition 1498.

<sup>2</sup> Vaccaria adapted from Plautus' Asinaria and Terence's Adelphoe; D. NARDO, La Vaccaria di Ruzzante fra Plauto e Terenzio, Lettere italiane (Firenze) 24, 1972, 3-29.

<sup>3</sup> Clizia and Mandragola (originally Commedia di Callimaco e Lucrezia); on the Andria: G. ULYSSE, Machiavel traducteur et imitateur de l'Andrienne de Térence, AFLA 45, 1968, 411-420.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. HIGHET, Class. Trad. 318.

About 1520, John Rastell printed an English translation from the Tudor period. From such translations, which sometimes include the original text, lessons were drawn for the behavior and language of a gentleman. Shakespeare (d. 1616) used in The Taming of the Shrew an English adaptation<sup>1</sup> of Ariosto's Suppositi, but also quoted (l. 1. 166) a tag from the Eunuchus (74–75) in Latin.

Terence found creative imitators in George Chapman (d. 1634),<sup>2</sup> Charles Sedley (d. 1701),<sup>3</sup> Thomas Shadwell (d. 1692),<sup>4</sup> Richard Steele (d. 1729)<sup>5</sup> and Henry Fielding (d. 1754).<sup>6</sup>

The founder of Danish literature, Ludvig Holberg (d. 1754), was well acquainted with Terence.

The whole of Terence was translated into Spanish by Pedro Simon de Abril (1577) and into Portuguese by Leonel da Costa (17th century).<sup>7</sup>

Hans Nythart, burgermeister of Ulm, translated the Eunuchus into German as early as 1486.<sup>8</sup> A century later, Hans Sachs would take up this version again. In 1499 at Strassburg, the first complete German translation in prose, perhaps by the Alsatian humanists, Brant and Locher, was brought out by Hans Grünynger. Before 1600 there were already 34 translations into German of Terence's plays. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (d. 1781), the master of German comedy, owed his sound knowledge of Plautus and Terence to his Protestant education at St. Afra in Meissen. His emphasis on ethos and his lofty notion of the comic are more Terentian than Terence.

In his youth, Goethe read Terence in the original 'with great ease'.<sup>9</sup> He was vexed by Grotius' 'arrogant' remark that he read Terence differently from schoolboys. Later, in Weimar, Goethe put on German productions of the Adelphoe and Andria. In his old age, he admitted that Grotius had been right: 'Kept reading Terence. His extremely

<sup>1</sup> George GASCOIGNE, The Supposes (1566), the first English prose-comedy; cf. also HIGHER, Class. Trad. 625–626.

<sup>2</sup> All Fools (presented 1599) adapted from the Hautontimorumenos, with borrowings from the Adelphoe.

<sup>3</sup> Bellamira (1687) adapted from the Eunuchus.

<sup>4</sup> The Squire of Alsatia (1688) adapted from the Adelphoe.

<sup>5</sup> The Conscious Lovers (1722) adapted from the Andria.

<sup>6</sup> The Fathers, or the Good-Natured Man (appeared posthumously 1778) adapted from the Adelphoe.

<sup>7</sup> A. A. NASCIMENTO, O onomástico de Terêncio na tradução de Leonel da Costa, Euphrosyne n.s. 7, 1975–1976, 103–123.

<sup>8</sup> Facsimile edition and commentary by P. AMELUNG, 2 vols., Dietikon-Zürich 1970 and 1972.

<sup>9</sup> Dichtung und Wahrheit, W.A. 1. 27. 39–40; GRUMACH 330.

sensitive theatrical elegance, . . . highly admired, including his abbreviated dialogue . . . generally the highest restraint, delicacy and clarity in the treatment. Aliter pueri, aliter Grotius.<sup>1</sup>

Even in the 20th century, Terence gave lessons to an important dramatist. As a young man in Kiel, Carl Zuckmayer created a scandal with his audacious adaptation of the Eunuchus.<sup>2</sup>

Numerous sayings of Terence have become famous: hinc illae lacrimae, 'that's the source of these tears!' (Andr. 126); nullum est iam dictum, quod non sit dictum prius, 'nothing is said that has not been said before' (Eun. prol. 41); homo sum, humani nil a me alienum puto, 'I am a man, I hold that what affects another man affects me' (Haut. 77). The last mentioned remark is often cited as a proof of humane feeling, although in the play it rather testifies to a meddling and somewhat patronizing curiosity (περιεργία).<sup>3</sup>

The absence of complete Greek originals prevents a conclusive verdict on Terence's artistic qualities, and therefore at first it seems exaggerated when Benedetto Croce describes Terence as the 'Virgil of Roman comedy'.<sup>4</sup> Three reasons, however, justify this evaluation: Terence's achievement in language and style, pointing ahead to the future; the fact that, more than perhaps any other Republican poet, he remained for the Romans the classical perfecter of his genre; and, not least, the influence on European literature of his dramatic technique.

Editions: Argentorati 1470. * R. BENTLEY (TN), Cambridge 1726. * K. DZIATZKO, Lipsiae 1884. * A. FLECKEISEN, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1898, * S. G. ASHMORE (TN), New York 2nd ed. 1910. * J. SERGEAUNT (TTr), London 1912. * R. KAUER, W. M. LINDSAY, Oxonii 1926 (suppl. apparat. O. SKUTSCH 1958). * J. MAROUZEAU (TTrN), 3 vols., Paris 1942-1949. * S. PRETE, Heidelberg 1954. * V. VON MARNITZ (Tr), Stuttgart 1960. * J. J. C. DONNER (Tr), new ed. W. LUDWIG, München 1966 (= Darmstadt 1969). * F. O. COPLEY (Tr), Indianapolis 1967. * Ad.: A. SPENGLER (TN), Berlin 2nd ed. 1905; P. FABIA (TC), Paris 1890; K. DZIATZKO, R. KAUER (TN), Leipzig 2nd ed. 1921, repr. 1964; O. BIANCO (TTrN), Roma 1966; R. H. MARTIN,

<sup>1</sup> 'Kids read one way, Grotius another way' Tagebücher. 9 Oct. 1830; W. A. 3. 12. 315; GRUMACH 333; cf. also Zahme Xenien 4.

<sup>2</sup> C. ZUCKMAYER, Als wär's ein Stück von mir. Erinnerungen, Hamburg 1966, 411-414.

<sup>3</sup> H. J. METTE, Die περιεργία bei Menander, Gymnasium 69, 1962, 398-406.

<sup>4</sup> Intorno alle commedie di Terenzio, in: La critica 34, 1936, 422-423 = B. CROCE, Poesia antica e moderna, Bari 1941, 2nd ed. 1943, 29-30.

- Cambridge 1976; A. S. GRATWICK (TrC), Warminster 1987. * Andr.: A. SPENGLER (TN), Berlin 2nd ed. 1888; U. MORICCA (TC), Firenze 1921; R. KAUER (TC), Bielefeld 1930; G. P. SHIPP (TN), London 2nd ed. 1960, repr. 1970. * Eun.: P. FABIA (TC), Paris 1895. * Haut.: F. G. BALLENTINE (TN), Boston 1910; G. MAZZONI (TC), Torino 1926; K. I. LIETZMANN (C), Münster 1974; A. J. BROTHERS (TTrC), Warminster 1988. * Hec.: P. THOMAS (TC), Paris 1887; F. T. CARNEY (TC), Pretoria 1963; S. IRELAND (TTrC), Warminster 1990. * Phorm.: K. DZIATZKO, E. HAULER (TN), Leipzig 4th ed. 1913, repr. 1967; R. H. MARTIN, London 1959. ** Ancient Commentaries: Aeli Donati Commentum Terenti, accedunt Eugraphi Commentum et Scholia Bembina, ed. P. WESSNER, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1902; 1905; 1908. * Scholia Bembina, ed. J. F. MOUNTFORD, Liverpool, London 1934. * Scholia Terentiana, ed. F. SCHLEE, Lipsiae 1893 (contains Scholia except for the Scholia Bembina). * Glosses: Corpus Glossariorum Latinorum, ed. by G. GOETZ, vol. 5, Lipsiae 1894, 529–539. * Vita: Suetonio De poetis e biografii minori. Restituzione e commento di A. ROSTAGNI, Torino 1944, 26–46. ** Lexicon: P. MCGLYNN, Lexicon Terentianum, 2 vols., Londinii, Glasgae 1963–1967. * E. B. JENKINS, Index verborum Terentianus, Chapel Hill 1932. ** Bibl.: G. CUPAIUOLO, Bibliografia Terenziana (1470–1983), Napoli 1984. * K. GAISER, ANRW 1972 (s. Drama). * S. M. GOLDBERG, Scholarship on Terence and the Fragments of Roman Comedy, CW 75, 1981, 77–115. * H. MARTI, Terenz (1909–1959), Lustrum 6, 1961, 114–238; 8, 1963, 5–101; 244–247, with ind. 248–264. * D. NARDO 1969, s. Hafter. * M. R. POSANI, Orientamenti della moderna critica terenziana, A&R 7, 1962, 129–143. * S. PRETE, Terence, CW 54, 1961, 112–122; repr. in: The Classical World Bibliography of Roman Drama and Poetry and Ancient Fiction. With a New Introduction by W. DONLAN, New York, London 1978, 17–28.
- J. T. ALLARDICE, Syntax of Terence, London 1929. * W. G. ARNOTT, Menander, Plautus, Terence (s. Drama). * W. G. ARNOTT, Phormio parasitus. A Study in Dramatic Methods of Characterization, G&R 17, 1970, 32–57. * W. G. ARNOTT, Terence's Prologues, PLLS 5, 1985 (publ. 1986), 1–7. * M. BARCHIESI, Un tema classico e medievale. Gnatone e Taide, Padova 1953. * J. BEAUJEU, Le problème de l'originalité de TERENCE, IL 11, 1959, 9–19. * O. BIANCO, Terenzio. Problemi ed aspetti dell'originalità, Roma 1962. * J. BLÄNSDORF, Die Komödienintrige als Spiel im Spiel, A&A 28, 1982, 131–154. * J. BLÄNSDORF (s. also Drama). * L. BRAUN (s. Drama). * M. BROŽEK, Einiges über die Schauspieldirektoren und die Komödiendichter im alten Rom, StudClas 2, 1960, 145–150. * M. BROŽEK, De fabularum Terentianarum ordinibus variis, Eos 51, 1961, 79–84. * H. W. BRUDER, Bedeutung und Funktion des Verswechsels bei Terenz, diss. Zürich 1970. * K. BÜCHNER, Das Theater des Terenz, Heidelberg 1974. * L. CECCARELLI, La norma di Meyer nei versi giambici e trocaici di Plauto e Terenzio, Roma 1988. * L. CECCARELLI, Primi sondaggi sulla tradizione manoscritta di Teren- zio, Roma 1992. * L. CIGU, L'originalità del teatro di Terenzio alla luce della nuova estetica e della politica del circolo scipionico, Sandalion 1, 1978, 73–121. * R. J. CLARK, A Lost Scene-Heading in the Bembine Restored. Terentian Scene-Headings and the Textual Critic, SO 60, 1985, 59–78. * J. D. CRAIG, Ancient Editions of Terence, Oxford 1929. * B. DENZLER, Der Monolog bei Terenz, diss. Zürich 1968. * P. DITTRICH (s. Drama). * H. DREXLER, Die Komposition von Terenz' Adelphen und Plautus' Rudens, Philologus suppl. 26, 2, 1934. * D. C. EARL, Terence and Roman Politics, Historia 11, 1962, 469–485. * E. FANTHAM, Terence, Diphilus, and Menander. A Re-examination of Terence, Adelphoe, Act II, Philologus 112, 1968, 196–216. * E. FANTHAM, Hautontimorumenos and Adelphoe: A Study of Fatherhood in Terence and Menander, Latomus 30, 1971, 970–998. * P. FEHL, Die interpolierte Rezension des Terenztextes, Berlin 1938. * P. FLURY (s. Drama). * W. E. FOREHAND, Terence, Boston, Mass. 1985. * E. FRAENKEL, Zur römischen Komödie, 2. Antipho im Eunuchus des Terenz, MH 25, 1968, 235–242. * E. FRAENKEL, Esercitazioni sull' Eunuco, Belfagor 25, 1970, 673–689. * T. FRANK, Terence's Contribution to Plot-Construction, AJPh 49, 1928, 309–322. * K. GAISER (s. Drama and Rieth). * D. GILULA, Exit Motivations and Actual Exits in Terence, AJPh 100, 1979, 519–530. * D. GILULA, The Concept of the bona meretrix. A Study of Terence's Courtesans, RFIC 108, 1980, 142–165. * H.-J. GLÜCKLICH, Aussparung und Antithese. Studien zur terenzischen Komödie, diss. Heidelberg 1966. * S. M. GOLDBERG, Understanding Terence, Princeton 1986. * J. N. GRANT, The Ending of Terence's Adelphoe and the Menandrian Original, AJPh 96, 1975, 42–60. * J. N. GRANT, Studies in the Textual Tradition of Terence, Toronto 1986. * P. GRIMAL, L'ennemi de Térence, Luscius de Lanuvium, CRAI 1970, 281–288. * P. GRIMAL, Térence et Aristote à propos de L'Héautontimorouménos, BAGB 1979, 175–187. * H. HAFFTER, Terenz und seine künstlerische Eigenart, MH 10, 1953, 1–20; 73–102; separate ed. Darmstadt 1967; Ital. translation by D. NARDO, Roma 1969 (with bibl. pp. 111–147). * H. HAFFTER, Neuere Arbeiten zum Problem der humanitas, Philologus 100, 1956, 287–304. * G. JACHMANN, Die Geschichte des Terenztextes im Altertum, Basel 1924. * G. JACHMANN, P. TERENTIUS Afer, RE 5 A, 1, 1934, 598–650. * H. D. JOCELYN, The Quotations of Republican Drama in Priscian's Treatise De metris fabularum Terenti, Antichthon 1, 1967, 60–69. * H. D. JOCELYN, Homo sum: humani nil a me alienum puto (Ter. Heaut. 77), Antichthon 7, 1973, 14–46. * L. W. JONES, C. R. MOREY, The Miniatures of the Manuscripts of Terence Prior to the Thirteenth Century, 2 vols., Princeton, N.J. 1931. * H. JUHNKE, Terenz, in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Das römische Drama, Darmstadt 1978, 223–307. * B. R. KES, Die Rezeption der Komödien des Plautus und Terenz im 19. Jh. Theorie, Bearbeitung, Bühne, Amsterdam 1988. * D. KLOSE, Die Didaskalien und Prologe des Terenz, diss. Freiburg i. Br. 1966. * U. KNOCHE, Über einige Szenen des Eunuchus, NGG 1936, 145–

184; 1938, 31–87. * D. KONSTAN, Love in Terence's Eunuch. The Origins of Erotic Subjectivity, AJPh 107, 1986, 369–393. * W. E. J. KUIPER, Grieksche origineelen en latijnsche navolgingen. Zes Komedies van Menander bij Terentius en Plautus (Eun., Haut., Andr., Ad., Synaristosai, Dis exapaton), Verh. Akad. Wet. Amsterdam, Afd. Letterkunde, n.s. 38, 2, Amsterdam 1936 (with a summary in English). * W. E. J. KUIPER, Two Comedies by Apollodorus of Carystus. Terence's Hecyra and Phormio, Lugduni Batavorum 1938. * I. LANA, Terenzio e il movimento filellenico a Roma, RFIC n.s. 25, 1947, 44–80; 155–175. * I. LANA, I rapporti interpersonali nel teatro di Terenzio, in: Teatro e pubblico nell'antichità. Atti del convegno nazionale Trento 1986; Trento 1987, 145–169. * E. LEFÈVRE, Die Expositionstechnik in den Komödien des Terenz, Darmstadt 1969. * E. LEFÈVRE, Das Wissen der Bühnenpersonen bei Menander und Terenz am Beispiel der Andria, MH 28, 1971, 21–48. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Die römische Komödie. Plautus und Terenz, Darmstadt 1973. * E. LEFÈVRE, Terenz' und Menanders Hautontimoromenos, München 1994. * G. LIEBERG, De Terenti Adelphis capitula tria, Latinitas 35, 1987, 22–28. * J. C. B. LOWE, Terentian Originality in the Phormio and Hecyra, Hermes 111, 1983, 431–452. * W. LUDWIG, Von Terenz zu Menander, Philologus 103, 1959, 1–38; repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1973, 354–408. * W. LUDWIG, The Originality of Terence and his Greek Models, GRBS 9, 1968, 169–182; repr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1973, 424–442. * R. MALTBY, The Distribution of Greek Loan-Words in Terence, CQ n.s. 35, 1985, 110–123. * H. MARTI, Untersuchungen zur dramatischen Technik bei Plautus und Terenz, diss. Zürich 1959. * G. MAURACH, Fragmente einer bisher unbekanntenen Terenzhandschrift, RhM 115, 1972, 242–249. * A. MAZZARINO, Da Menandro a Terenzio. Sulla composizione dell' Andria, Messina 1966. * D. G. MOORE, The Young Men in Terence, PACA 3, 1960, 20–26. * G. NORWOOD, The Art of Terence, Oxford 1923. * H. OPPERMAN, Zur Andria des Terenz, Hermes 69, 1934, 262–285, repr. in: Lefèvre, ed., 1973, 312–344. * L. PERELLI, Il teatro rivoluzionario di Terenzio, Firenze 1973 (repr. 1976). * M. POHLENZ, Der Prolog des Terenz, SIFC n.s. 27–28, 1956, 434–443. * M. R. POSANI, La figura di Luscio Lanuvino e la sua polemica con Terenzio, Rendiconti della Accademia d'Italia 7, 4, 1943 (1944), 151–162. * V. PÖSCHL, Das Problem der Adelphen des Terenz, SHAW 1975, 4. * S. PRETE, Scene Division in the Manuscript Tradition of Terence, Traditio 13, 1957, 415–421. * S. PRETE, Il codice di Terenzio, Vat. Lat. 3226. Saggio critico e riproduzione del manoscritto, Città del Vaticano 1970. * R. RAFFAELLI, s. Drama. * E. K. RAND, Early Mediaeval Commentaries on Terence, CPh 4, 1909, 359–389. * U. REINHARDT, s. Drama. * E. REITZENSTEIN, Terenz als Dichter, Leipzig 1940. * R. RIBUOLI, La collazione poliziana del codice Bembino di Terenzio con le postille inedite del Poliziano e note su Pietro Bembo, Roma 1981. * R. RIBUOLI, Per la storia del codice Bembino di Terenzio, RFIC 109, 1981, 163–177. * O. RIETH, Die Kunst Menanders

in den Adelphen des Terenz. (ed. with an epilogue by K. GAISER), Hildesheim 1964; extr. in: E. LEFÈVRE, ed., 1973, 409–423. * Y. F. RIOU, Le Commentum Brunsonianum des comédies de Térence dans le Clm 29 004 c, in: Hommages à A. BOUTEMY, Bruxelles 1976, 315–323. * W. D. RISSOM (s. Drama). * A. RONCONI, Sulla fortuna di Plauto e di Terenzio nel mondo romano, Maia 22, 1970, 19–37. * A. ROSSI, Un inedito del Petrarca: il Terenzio, Paragone 15, 2, 1964, 3–23. * W. SCHADEWALDT, Bemerkungen zur Hecyra des Terenz, Hermes 66, 1931, 1–29 = W.S., Hellas und Hesperien, Zürich 1960, 472–494; = 2nd ed. 1970, 1, 722–744; repr. in: Lefèvre, ed., 1973, 279–311. * Schefold, Bildnisse 171, 5; 173, 35. * P. SCHMITTER, Die hellenistische Erziehung im Spiegel der véα κωμῳδία und der fabula palliata, diss. Bonn 1972 (on Ad.). * G. SERBAT, Les comédies de Térence sont-elles un ‘miroir de la vie?’, IL 24, 1972, 213–219. * M. SIMON, Contaminatio und furtum bei Terenz. Verhältnis zu Vorbildern und Vorgängern, Helikon 1, 1961, 487–492. * M. SIMON, Zur Bedeutung des terenzischen Prologtyps für die Entwicklung des Dramas, WZ Jena 20, 5, 1971, 169–177. * J. SOUBIRAN, Recherches sur la clause du sénaire (trimètre) latin. Les mots longs finaux, REL 42, 1964, 429–469. * P. P. SPRANGER (s. Drama). * W. STEIDLE, Menander bei Terenz, RhM n.s. 116, 1973, 303–347; 117, 1974, 247–276. * W. STEIDLE, Probleme des Bühnenspiels (s. Drama). * J. STRAUS, Terenz und Menander. Beitrag zu einer Stilvergleichung, diss. Zürich 1955. * A. E. H. SWAEN, Terentian Influence, Neophilologus 29, 1944, 72–87. * B. A. TALADOIRE, Térence: Un théâtre de la jeunesse, Paris 1972. * N. TERZHAGHI, Prolegomeni a Terenzio, Roma 1965. * M. TESTARD, Cicéron lecteur de Térence, Caesarodunum 1969, 4, 157–169. * M. TESTARD, Cicéron, bourreau de soi-même?, LEC 42, 1974, 149–162. * A. TRAINA, Terenzio ‘traduttore’, Belfagor 23, 1968, 431–438, repr. in: A.T., Vortit barbare, Roma 1970, 167–179. * H. TRÄNKLE, Micio und Demea in den terenzischen Adelphen, MH 29, 1972, 241–255. * I. TRENCSENYI-WALDAPFEL, Griechische Vorbilder und römische Wirklichkeit bei Terenz, Acta Antiqua Philippopolitana, Serdicac (Sofia) 1963, 229–246. * K.-U. WAHL (s. Drama). * J. E. G. ZETZEL, On the History of Latin Scholia, HSPH 1975, 335–354. * O. ZWIERLEIN, Der Terenzkommentar des Donat im Codex Chigianus H VII 240, Berlin 1970.

B. SATURA

ROMAN SATURA

General Remarks

Satura, a specifically Roman genre,<sup>1</sup> was originally a literary hybrid, an ‘allsorts’.<sup>2</sup> Expressions such as lanx satura (‘offering of a mixed plate of fruits’) or legem per saturam ferre (‘to bring in a compound law’, i.e. a law containing another law) may be compared. In everyday life, satura meant a kind of stuffing or pudding.<sup>3</sup> (Culinary metaphors also lie behind the word farce). Its basic quality was therefore varietas, a content quite ill-defined.

Early saturae may embrace almost any theme. Originally, satura did not necessarily imply satirical in the modern sense (‘a poem in which wickedness or folly is censured’, Samuel Johnson, d. 1784). In Lucilius social criticism is clearly visible, but by no means omnipresent. Diomedes (4th century A.D.) gives the following description of the genre: Satyræ<sup>4</sup> dicitur carmen apud Romanos nunc quidem maledicum et ad carpenda hominum vitia archaearum comoediae caractere compositum, quale scripserunt Lucilius et Horatius et Persius. ‘Satyræ’ is the name of a Roman type of poem which, at least by now, is foul-mouthed and apt to carp at the vices of men in the way of the Old Comedy; examples are the works of Lucilius, Horace, and Persius (gramm. 1. 485. 30–32 Keil).

It is difficult to give a more precise definition of the genre. Every author after all lives in different circumstances and has a strongly individual way of writing saturae. Lucilius criticized living and even well-known personalities, Horace only insignificant contemporaries, Persius tended more towards general philosophizing, Juvenal attacked only the dead. Lucilius handled the genre with a sharp scalpel, Horace with a gentle smile, Persius with a preacher’s power, Juvenal with

---

<sup>1</sup> Satura quidem tota nostra est (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 93).

<sup>2</sup> Et olim carmen quod ex variis poematibus constabat satyra vocabatur, quale scripserunt Pacuvius et Ennius (Diom. gramm. 1. 485. 32–34 Keil).

<sup>3</sup> Festus p. 314 M. = p. 416 LINDSAY.

<sup>4</sup> A false orthography on the basis of an incorrect Grecizing etymology.

Hercules' club. This led Wilamowitz to declare that there was no Roman satire, only Lucilius, Horace, Persius, Juvenal.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless we will try to describe some basic features of form (Literary Technique) and content (Ideas II).

A literary type quite distinct from satura is the Menippean satire, which is traced back to Menippus of Gadara (first half of 3rd century B.C.). This is a mixture of prose and verse, in which the Cynic diatribe is enlivened by background drawn from the mime. The more-or-less fantastic narrative may serve as a guise for criticism of the contemporary world.

Greek Background

The satura is a native product (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 93; Hor. sat. 1. 10. 66), although more in general than in detail. The romantic assumption of pre-literary (Etruscan?) dialogue forms as a precursor must be considered with reserve. If the satura claims closeness to the language of everyday, that is an effect of literary art and proves nothing about the origin of the genre. Its title may be compared with Hellenistic counterparts such as Σύμμικτα or Ἄτακτα, but no poetic collections so disparate in content and form are known from Greek.

Satirical elements may be found in different genres of Greek literature, particularly in the iambos, but not in the form familiar to us from Roman literature. An ancient hypothesis derived Roman satura from Old Comedy. Criticism of the modern world and personal attack on named opponents were common to both genres; another parallel is, for example, the contest between Death and Life in Ennius, which recalls the agon of Old Comedy.<sup>2</sup> Lucilius at first made use of meters of comedy, the trochaic septenarius and the iambic senarius, before he decided in favor of the hexameter. Last but not least, both types of poetry employ elements of colloquial language. However, these analogies do not allow us to derive so complex a genre as satura is in its entirety from Old Comedy. An example of the blending of smaller genres with satura is provided by Ennius' fable of the lark. After Hesiod, and the efforts of Socrates, this is the first Aesopian fable in verse known to us. About a hundred years before Ennius, Demetrius of Phalerum had produced a collection of fables which was perhaps in prose (Diog. Laert. 5. 80).

<sup>1</sup> U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Griechische Verskunst, Berlin, 2nd ed. 1921 (repr. Darmstadt 1962), 42, note 1.

<sup>2</sup> It also recalls the Atellane.

Roman Development

It is uncertain whether a pre-literary dramatic or dialogic satura ever existed (Livy 7. 2. 4-13). This may be an invention of ancient literary historians.<sup>1</sup> Of Ennius' saturae we know that they treated a multiplicity of themes in varying meters. Ennius may have introduced the title following Hellenistic precedent ('miscellany'). He used even fable and allegory which later played a part in satura. Pacuvius likewise is said to have written saturae.<sup>2</sup>

Lucilius was regarded as the founder of the genre, although the term satura is nowhere attested in him. At first he used different meters, but not within the same book. Later, the hexameter prevailed, and this set the trend for all subsequent satirists. Lucilius called his composition 'improvisations' (schedia) or 'playful chats' (ludus ac sermones). They contained political and personal criticism of respected contemporaries so frank as to find no parallel in later Rome.

Horace's satire was influenced by the diatribe. Ridicule was now confined to insignificant contemporaries and typical faults. There was a special artistry of form (see Literary Technique). After Horace, the hexameter became standard, and moralizing predominated.

In Persius, language and style were a mixture of crudeness and extreme refinement. In content, satire approached the moral tone of the sermon.

Juvenal's satire shows more rhetorical and emotional treatment than any other. In him, the satiric genre rose to the stylistic level of tragedy and epic.

Individual satirical elements are also found in authors of other genres, for example, in the fable (Phaedrus), in the epigram (Martial), in the novel (Petronius), and in other prose (for example, in the Church Fathers, especially Jerome).

The satura also influenced the Menippea, as may be seen from the imitation of Lucilius by Seneca in the Apocolocyntosis. His mixture of prose and meter is also found in Petronius' novel (who probably followed some tradition of Greek novel; cf. P. Oxy. 3010), but the mixture of prose and verse is not necessarily linked with a satirical intent. One may compare Accius' Didascalica, Martianus Capella, and Boethius.

<sup>1</sup> E. PASOLI, Satura drammatica e satira letteraria, Vichiana 1, 1964, 2, 1-41; an affirmative view is recently held by P. L. SCHMIDT, in: G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Studien zur vorliterarischen Periode im frühen Rom, Tübingen 1989, 77-133 (partly hypothetical).

<sup>2</sup> Diom. gramm. 1. 485 KEIL; Porph. Hor. sat. 1. 10. 46.

Not the form, but the spirit of Roman satire underwent a rebirth in Jerome, in whom a great satirist was lost. He was himself aware of this: 'You accuse me of being a satiricus scriptor in prose (Hier. epist. 40. 2). Here in Latin the satirical content is clearly distinguished from the form of satira: this furnished the premise for the modern idea of satire as an attitude not confined to a particular genre of poetry.

Literary Technique

Humor,<sup>1</sup> wit and parody, along with the dialogic style and the use of everyday words, produced an innate kinship with comedy.<sup>2</sup> But satire is by no means limited to techniques of comedy.

Lucilius wrote dialogically. His poems create an extraordinarily fresh effect, they are rich in ideas, but seem to lack polish, at least in retrospective comparison with Horace.

In Horace, satire developed an extremely high degree of literary sophistication. We may distinguish between more narrative and more reflective satirae. Anecdotal tales and journey poems have a narrative character. Artistically, in his Iter Brundisinum (sat. 1. 5), Horace looked back to Lucilius' Iter Siculum, an author who, if combated, in general remained an important point of reference for Horace.<sup>3</sup> A subtle art of narrative was deployed, which was woven into the texture of the satira.

The reflective satira may take up themes such as ambitio or avaritia, in partial dependence on the tradition of the diatribe.<sup>4</sup> The unforced, <sup>1</sup> Hor. sat. 1. 10. 14–15 ridiculum acri/fortius et melius magnas plerumque secat res; wit: sat. 1. 4. 7–8; 103–106.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the (perhaps Varronian) theory in Hor. sat. 1. 4; Johannes Lydus (6th century) mag. 1. 41 alleges that Rhinthon (beginning 3rd century B.C.) was the first to write comedy in hexameters, and that Lucilius depends on him. Unfortunately, Lydus was not ignorant of Latin, his evidence, therefore, is not necessarily independent of Roman sources.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. G. C. FISKE, Lucilius and Horace. A Study in the Classical Theory of Imitation, Madison 1920.

<sup>4</sup> The word diatribe (strictly 'spending time' in a larger group) describes a popular philosophical sermon, between a dialogue and an essay; on the diatribe easy conversational tone is characteristic (see Language). The progress of thought is not pedantically indicated, but thesis and counterthesis may be recognized, while comparisons and examples help to establish conclusions drawn from analogy. Objections and wrong deductions occur at precise points. Smaller forms are organically entwined: anecdote, apophthegm, fable. In Horace's satires written as diatribes, mature techniques may be observed: priamel (a series of examples) that takes a surprising turn, disguised entrances, gliding transitions, half-ironic resumptions. From the 1st to the 2nd book, and later to the Epistles, an increasing inclination toward philosophical themes is matched by a parallel development of literary technique.

Post-Horatian satire confronted a tradition which had become overwhelming. Whole series of procedures and themes were taken over and varied. Stylistic rivalry was inevitable, but aemulatio with Horace does not explain everything. Persius created a personal language (see below) and developed the philosophical sermon independently. Juvenal imported emotion into satire, and in him rhetoric is particularly noticeable.

As a relatively open form, satire may adapt to changing periods and personalities. This ensures its vitality, although rendering difficult the task of describing it as a genre.

Language and Style

The language of satira employs a broad palette. Its content, so close to daily life, favors its use of words and constructions drawn from colloquial language. In this respect, satira is like comedy. In their acceptance of coarse expressions, the authors vary greatly. In Lucilius, an unaffected ease prevails, even if tempered by oldfashioned wit. His register reaches from gutter slang to epic and tragic parody. He also uses a macaronic mixture of Latin and Greek which he had heard in everyday talk, something which in Horace's eyes was quite unacceptable.

In his vocabulary, Horace from the outset is more selective and, in the course of his development, he becomes ever more restrained. In all genres, even if always within the limits of good taste, he sets his so-called 'unpoetic' words at the service of a powerful poetic effect.

---

A. OLTRAMARE 1926; K. BERGER, Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament, ANRW 2, 25, 2, 1984, 1031-1432, esp. 1124-1132.

Persius takes particular delight in incorporating everyday expressions into his artistic satires. Juvenal's diction is emotionally charged, even solemn.

The language of Menippean satire is related to that of satura because of its similar subject matter. It uses homely metaphors, proverbs, idioms. In the narrative portions, however, a careful prose style is found. Varro's Menippeans are no less rich in popular turns of phrase than his work on the Latin language. But their style is much more careful. Seneca and Petronius would develop further this urbane method of writing.

The style of satura is characterized by parataxis and apparent lack of art (parenthesis, correctio). Addresses and quotations produce animation. Rhetoric has its place, and for this reason, too, satire is a typically Roman genre. Behind this poetic form of literature, with its rhetorical background, stands the philosophical sermon, the diatribe. Rhetoric in Horace is still restrained by self-deprecating irony. In Juvenal, its presence is unmistakable. Even in this unpretentious genre, a lofty style gains the upper hand; actually, in Imperial Rome, nothing else was to be expected.

In early Lucilius, trochaic septenarii and iambic senarii still occur. As the poet develops, the hexameter begins to prevail and this sets the standard for later. Differences of style may be observed in cases where, as in Horace, the strictly constructed lyric hexameter may be compared with the somewhat freer use of the same meter in satire. However, neither in Horace nor in his successors should a contrived negligence be confused with formlessness.<sup>1</sup> Horace and Persius are great poets who compose each verse with care. Even Lucilius in his own time, the only standard against which it is fair to judge him, was doctus et urbanus. It would be foolish however to ignore the progress owed to Horace's file.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Lucilius wanted an audience that was neither unlearned nor too learned. He discussed in detail linguistic and even orthographical questions. Though he was an enemy of those enamored of things

---

<sup>1</sup> Horace, even in his Satires, handled elisions more strictly than Virgil did in the Aeneid.

Greek, he liked to indulge in Greek quotations and phrases.

Horace's reaction to Lucilius leads from initial detachment to a degree of recognition. This is shown by the evolution of his statements about the writing of satire and his predecessor, traceable from sat. 1. 4 through 1. 10 to 2. 1. Horace wanted his own satiric writing in the best case to be regarded as reflection, and in the worst as pastime.<sup>1</sup> Yet he could not conceal that for him such writing was an inner compulsion,<sup>2</sup> not to be resisted in spite of his best efforts.

Basically, for Horace and his readers, satura was related to colloquial language. To abandon the metrical framework was to be left with everyday speech (sat. 1. 4. 54–56). Just like comedy, with which he linked it, satura was for him different from genuine poetry.<sup>3</sup>

Horace excluded himself from the tally of poets (sat. 1. 4. 39–40). Naturally, if we consider his artistic mastery of the satiric form, this is a gross understatement. His own supposition that his verses are bona carmina (sat. 2. 1. 83) proves that his reluctance to assume the name of poet was not meant seriously. The inner relationship of satis (a theme of the Saturae), recte (Epistles), and aptum (Ars poetica), of the ethical and the aesthetic, turns Horace into a poet of moderation and mean.

Here, laughter must find a place as a human characteristic. Horace wanted to 'tell the truth with a laugh' (sat. 1. 1. 24). He developed his poetics in his letters and in the ars.

Satire's serious claim to truth was advanced in Persius' prologue and in Juvenal's first satire. It is the programmatic opposite of mythological poetry, which was then felt to be essentially untrue.

Persius, too, was aware of satire's position between everyday speech and poetry (prologue). Just like Horace (epist. 2. 2. 51–52), he explained that poverty and hunger are poetry's tutors. In this respect, too, satura takes pride in its down-to-earth Roman nature.

Juvenal drew inspiration from his indignation. The idea that emotion produces eloquence was a rhetorical principle, which he may have known from his training in the schools of declamation. By infusing satire with the large breath of indignation, he raised the genre stylistically to a higher level (cf. Juv. 6. 634–637). Like his predecessors,

<sup>1</sup> Ubi quid datur otii, / inludo chartis (sat. 1. 4. 138–139).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. epist. 2. 1. 111–113.

<sup>3</sup> Musa pedestris (sat. 2. 6. 17); sermone . . . repente per humum (epist. 2. 1. 250–251; cf. 2. 2. 60).

Juvenal set satire in opposition to deceptive mythological poetry. He defined his saturae from the point of view of their subject matter as a genre with a universal claim. Juvenal's emotionally laden satire rivaled Lucan's epic (which was equally animated by emotional commentaries made by its author) and Seneca's tragedy. Both these genres in Juvenal's day had come to an end, and were replaced, in their claims to come to serious terms with the world, by satire.

Juvenal displayed a keen eye for the place of literature in contemporary society. He recognized the crisis of Latin literature in his time. Rescue he expected to come from the emperor.

Ideas II

Lucilius was particularly energetic in his attacks on the living. Hate made him eloquent. Yet his urbanity must not be underestimated. He was an aristocrat, who had no need to prove his excellence by anxious conformity, as so many later authors found necessary.

The personal note, even going so far as apparent indiscretion, belongs to the genre. Satura is by intention a mirror of life or, more precisely, of the author's way of life. It is not then an unfiltered self-presentation, but to some extent an idealized picture. This is clear in Lucilius' well-known passage about virtus, in Horace's doctrine of satis and recte, and in Persius' idealization of his philosophy teacher Cornutus. In spite of this limitation, it must be accepted that in Roman satire there begins what may be called Roman personal poetry.

The mentality of the individual author and of his period lends a different stamp to successive works. Lucilius wrote with the carefree confidence of the free citizen of a republic. Horace lived in a time of transition. In spite of the emergence of new social links, he succeeded in maintaining his personal freedom. Though he had a thorough knowledge of Epicurean and Stoic philosophy, for him anything doctrinaire went against the grain. Persius was by no means a blindly doctrinaire poet, but in him the cultural atmosphere is visibly different. He is not free from the intention to convert, and his preaching is less restrained than that of Horace. A philosophical religious sense, which included loyalty to his teacher, became in Persius an important element of satire. Juvenal preached with fiery emotion, but still dared attack only the dead. Here, he resembled his contemporary Tacitus.

Bibl.: W. S. ANDERSON (1962–1968), CW 63, 1969–1970, 181–194; 199; 217–222 = W. DONLAN, ed., The Classical World Bibliography of Roman Drama . . ., New York 1978, 261–280. * G. MAGGIULLI, Maia n.s. 23, 1971, 81–85. * W.-W. EHLERS (for 1956–1980) in: U. KNOCHE, Die römische Satire, Göttingen 4th ed. 1982, 123–137.

K. M. ABBOTT, Satira and Satiricus in Late Latin, ICS 4, 1979, 192–199. * J. ADAMIETZ, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1986. * J. BAUMERT, Identifikation und Distanz. Eine Erprobung satirischer Kategorien bei Juvenal, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 734–769. * S. H. BRAUND, ed., Satire and Society in Ancient Rome, Exeter 1989. * J. BRUMMACK, Zu Begriff und Theorie der Satire, DVjs 45, 1971, special issue 275–377. * J. P. CÈBE, La caricature et la parodie dans le monde romain antique des origines à Juvénal, Paris 1966. * V. CIAN, La satira, 2 vols. (1: Dal Medio Evo al Pontano; 2: Dall'Ariosto al Chiabrera), Milano sine anno (ca. 1945). * C. J. CLASSEN, Satire—The Elusive Genre, SO 63, 1988, 95–121. * M. COFFEY, Roman Satire, London 1976. * J. W. DUFF, Roman Satire. Its Outlook on Social Life, Berkeley 1936 (with Phaedrus, Petron, and Martial); repr. 1964. * R. C. ELLIOTT, The Power of Satire: Magic, Ritual, Art, Princeton 1960. * P. GREEN, Roman Satire and Roman Society, in: P.G., Essays in Antiquity, London 1960, 147–184. * L. FEINBERG, Satire: The Inadequacy of Recent Definitions, Genre 1, 1968, 31–47. * R. HEINZE, De Horatio Bionis imitatore, diss. Bonn 1889. * R. HELM, Lucian und Menipp, Leipzig 1906; repr. 1967. * G. HESS, Deutsch-lateinische Narrenzunft. Studien zum Verhältnis von Volkssprache und Latinität in der satirischen Literatur des 16. Jh., München 1971. * G. HIGHER, The Anatomy of Satire, Princeton 1962. * G. HIGHER, Masks and Faces in Roman Satire, Hermes 102, 1974, 321–337. * J. IRMSCHER, Römische Satire und byzantinische Satire, WZRoStock 15, 1966, 441–446. * J. F. KINDSTRAND, Bion of Borysthenes, Uppsala 1976. * U. KNOCHE, Die römische Satire, Berlin 1949, Göttingen 3rd ed. 1971 (rev.), 4th ed. 1982. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1970. * W. KRENKEL, Römische Satire und römische Gesellschaft, WZRoStock 15, 1966, 471–477. * R. A. LAFLEUR, Horace and ὀνομαστὶ κωμωδεῖν. The Law of Satire, ANRW 2, 31, 3, 1981, 1790–1826. * U. LIMENTANI, La satira nel seicento, Milano 1961. * C. W. MENDELL, Die Satire als Popularphilosophie (first 1920), in: D. KORZENIEWSKI, ed., 137–160. * R. MARACHE, Juvénal—peintre de la société de son temps, ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 592–639. * R. A. MÜLLER, Komik und Satire, diss. Zürich 1973. * A. OLTRAMARE, Les origines de la diatribe romaine, Lausanne 1926. * W. REISSINGER, Formen der Polemik in der römischen Satire. Lucilius—Horaz—Persius—Juvenal, diss. Erlangen 1975. * J. C. RELIHAN, Ancient Mennipean Satire, Baltimore 1993. * Römische Satire, in: WZRoStock 15, 1966, 403–549. * O. TRTNIK-ROSSETTINI, Les influences anciennes et italiennes sur la satire en France au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, Florence 1958. * E. G. SCHMIDT, Diatribe und Satire, WZRoStock 15, 1966, 507–515. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Invektive—Gesellschaftskritik—Diatriben? Typologische und gattungsgeschichtliche Vorüberlegungen zum sozialen Engagement der römischen Satire, Lampas 12, 1979, 259–281. * J. SCHNEIDER, Zum Nachleben der römischen Satiriker in den mittellateinischen satirischen Dichtungen des deutschen Bereichs in der Zeit der Salier und Staufer, WZRo 15, 1966, 517–524. * G. A. SEECK, Die römische Satire und der Begriff des Satirischen, A&A 37, 1991, 1–21. * J. P. SULLIVAN, ed., Critical Essays on Roman Literature: Satire, London 1963. * H. SZELEST, Die römische Satire und der Philhellenismus, WZRo 15, 1966, 541–546. * N. TERZAGHI, Per la storia della satira, Messina 2nd ed. 1944. * C. A. VAN ROOY, Studies in Classical Satire and Related Literary Theory, Leiden 1963; repr. 1966. * O. WEINREICH, Römische Satiren, Zürich (1949) 2nd ed. 1962. * A. J. WHEELER, English Verse Satire from Donne to Dryden. Imitation of Classical Models, Heidelberg 1992. * W. WIMMEL, Zur Form der horazischen Diatribensatire, Frankfurt 1962. * C. WITKE, Latin Satire. The Structure of Persuasion, Leiden 1970.

LUCILIUS

Life and Dates

C. Lucilius was the great-uncle of Pompey the Great<sup>1</sup> and therefore the first Latin poet of social distinction.<sup>2</sup> He was not a freedman but a free man, like his countryman and spiritual kinsman Naevius, but one who enjoyed wealth and influence. Poetry, which at Rome had only very gradually risen in public esteem, was able with Lucilius to celebrate its elevation to knighthood. More importantly, at the same time, the poet's strongly marked individuality characterized the beginning of Roman personal poetry.

By birth Lucilius was a Roman knight from Suessa Aurunca on the border between Campania and Latium. He probably came quite early into contact with Scipio, whose estate at Lavernium was not far from Suessa. His warm friendship with Scipio<sup>3</sup> was reinforced by shared experience of war at the siege of Numantia (Vell. 2. 9. 4), but it had also a more material side, for, as unusual as it was, it was now the rich poet who lent aid to the politician and general. Scipio's friends<sup>1</sup> were also those of Lucilius: C. Laelius, Junius Congus, Rutilius Rufus, Manius Manilius, Q. Fabius Maximus. After Scipio's death, these were joined by C. Sempronius Tuditanus. Their common enemies were even more numerous; they included Scipio's chief opponent, P. Mucius Scaevola, the Pontifex Maximus. Along with him stood Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus<sup>2</sup> who, as censor, sought to force all Romans into marriage and procreation of children. This led Lucilius to write his 'satire on marriage'. Among his enemies was L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus,<sup>3</sup> princeps senatus, who was mercilessly ridiculed by Lucilius in his 1st book. Political<sup>4</sup> motives have been detected even in Lucilius' literary feud with Accius. Here, the tension between Terence and Luscius must have continued, fed by the antagonism between the Scipios and the collegium poetarum.<sup>5</sup> But Lucilius was more than a partisan. He certainly praised Scipio, but he also found sympathetic words for Tiberius Gracchus, although Gracchus was an opponent of the Scipios (691 and 694–695 M. = 738–740 K.). Conversely, he even attacked a philhellene like A. Postumius Albinus, who was not one of Scipio's enemies, and even castigated Scipio's affected pronunciation (964 M. = 972 K.). Where he found meritorious achievement, he was not sparing with recognition, without indulging social prejudices. In book 22, he created a memorial to his own servants. In general, Lucilius shows what for a Roman poet was an unusual degree of independence.

<sup>1</sup> Porph. Hor. sat. 2. 1. 75; A. B. WEST, Lucilian Genealogy, AJPh 49, 1928, 240–252.

<sup>2</sup> The proof that Lucilius was a Roman citizen was given by C. CICHORIUS 1908, 14–22.

<sup>3</sup> Schol. Hor. sat. 2. 1. 72.

It speaks volumes for the reputation and philosophical training of Lucilius that the head of the Platonic Academy, Clitomachus, dedicated a treatise to him (Cic. ac. 2. 102). In answering the question when their acquaintance began, the enquirer thinks first of the famous

<sup>1</sup> For criticism of the term 'Scipionic Circle' cf. H. STRASBURGER, Der Scipionenkreis, Hermes 94, 1966, 60–72; A. E. ASTIN, Scipio Aemilianus, Oxford 1967 (Appendix VI: The 'Scipionic Circle' and the Influence of Panaetius); a balanced view in: K. ABEL, Die kulturelle Mission des Panaitios, A&A 17, 1971, 122–127; earlier: R. REITZENSTEIN, Scipio Aemilianus und die stoische Rhetorik, Strassburg 1901; I. HEINEMANN, Humanitas, RE suppl. 5, 1931, 282–310; R. M. BROWN, A Study of the Scipionic Circle, Scottsdale 1934; M. POHLENZ, Antikes Führertum. Cicero De officiis und das Lebensideal des Panaitios, Leipzig 1934; L. LABOWSKY, Die Ethik des Panaitios, Leipzig 1934.

<sup>2</sup> Books 26–30; see F. MARX on 676 and 678–679.

<sup>3</sup> An opponent of Scipio was also Tiberius Claudius Asellus, 394 M. = 412 K.

<sup>4</sup> This interpretation of N. TERZAGHI is criticized by E. BOLISANI, Di una pretesa polemica contro Accio in Lucilio, RFIC 17, 1939, 225–237.

<sup>5</sup> W. KRENKEL 1957–1958 (1970) passim; on Accius: C. CICHORIUS 1908, 205–206; J. CHRISTES 1971, 132.

philosophers' embassy of 155 B.C. However it is not certain that Lucilius was alive at that time, or whether Clitomachus, whose leadership of the Academy dates from 127/126 to 110 B.C., took part in this embassy. There remains the supposition of a sojourn by Lucilius in Athens, strengthened by the poet's apparent firsthand acquaintance with circumstances there.

At the end of his life, Lucilius withdrew to Naples. There he died in 103/102 B.C. as senex, and received a public funeral reflecting his repute in his lifetime. His date of birth is contested. According to Jerome (chron. 1915), he died at the age of 46. This would imply that he took part in the Numantian campaign at the age of 14, and that he was 40 years younger than his friend Scipio. For this reason, the convincing suggestion<sup>1</sup> has been made that the consuls of 148 and 180 B.C., distinguished only by the initials of their praenomina, have been confused. Nevertheless, Jerome's dating has been defended.<sup>2</sup> The assignment to 167<sup>3</sup> is nowadays little regarded, but does fit with his participation in the campaign at the age of 33, and his confrontation with Accius.<sup>4</sup>

In any case, Lucilius began to write only after the capture of Numantia,<sup>5</sup> about the same time as Accius. His work falls into three periods; the earliest, consisting of books 26–30, was published after 129, perhaps about 123 B.C.

In the 2nd collection (books 1–21), the 1st book was written after the death of L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, therefore 125/124 B.C. The second followed the action for repetundae brought by T. Albucius against Q. Mucius Scaevola the augur, and therefore may be dated to 119/118 B.C. Book 5 was written about 118 B.C., book 11 about 115/114 B.C., and book 20 about 107/106 B.C.

A third section, consisting of books 22–25, must have been added to a posthumous edition.

In its choice of meters, the collection moves from the trochaic

<sup>1</sup> M. HAUPT in Lucian Müller, Zu Lucilius und Tacitus (dial. 11), JKPh 107, 1873, 365.

<sup>2</sup> J. CHRISTES 1971, 12–17.

<sup>3</sup> C. CICHORIUS 1908, 7–14.

<sup>4</sup> F. DELLA CORTE's dating to 198 B.C. is less convincing; F. DELLA CORTE, I. MARIOTTI, W. KRENKEL, L'età di Lucilio, Maia 20, 1968, 254–270. Senex (Hor. sat. 2. 1. 30–34) is a flexible term.

<sup>5</sup> Lucilius 620–621 M. = 689–690 K. In line 963 M. = 971 K. Scipio is addressed as a live person.

septenarius (which also played a part in Ennius' satires) and the iambic senarius (possibly connected with Ennius and with Callimachus' Iamboi) to the hexameter. It is this which prevails in the second collection (books 1–21). It was at the beginning of his 2nd collection that Lucilius seems to have found the appropriate form. The 1st books of this group also show uniformity of content. Conversely, the earlier and later parts are more markedly differentiated and somewhat heterogeneous. If Lucilius did attain a classical<sup>1</sup> ideal of unity, it was obviously only a transitional phase.

The books are organized in metrical cycles, partly in reversed chronological order: 1–21 use hexameters, 22 shows a medley of meters, 23–25 employ hexameters, 26–29 are a medley, and the final book 30 returns to hexameters. This produces a 'Callimachean ring-composition'.<sup>2</sup>

Survey of Works

A detailed analysis of the contents of the thirty books cannot be given here for several reasons. First, the transmission varies greatly. For example, nothing remains of books 21 and 24, whereas relatively large amounts survive of books 26 through 30. Second, Lucilius' fragments unhappily consist mostly of one or very few lines, which means that the restoration of the context is left to the imagination of editors more often than they would like to admit. (The self-restraint of F. CHARPIN in this regard is praiseworthy). Finally, the themes are so varied that a mere paraphrase could only produce confusion (see Ideas).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Roman satire in its Lucilian form arose at a time which was felt by the Romans themselves to be one of crisis. Dominance of the western Mediterranean led to the amassing of wealth in the hands of a small number. This brought about plans for political reform and public criticism. Lucilius therefore was doing more than repeating Stoic commonplaces. His attack on luxury hit at an historical fact; if not at the economic roots of the trouble, at least its moral causes. In the political struggle, individual characters began to make a sharper impression. The same may be said of literature. In both realms, a pugnacious spirit made itself felt.

<sup>1</sup> J. HEURGON 1959, 57.

<sup>2</sup> M. PUELMA 1949, 322–323.

The vehicle for the new experience just described was satura, a loose form on which Lucilius impressed the stamp of his own personality. His satura was distinguished from that of his predecessor Ennius, whose nephew Pacuvius had followed his uncle's example, by its aggressive nature. It was in Lucilius for the first time that the satirical element came to the fore, though without prevailing totally. In the surviving fragments of the poet, the word satura is never found in any literary sense;<sup>1</sup> he speaks of poemata, versus, ludus<sup>2</sup> ac sermones (1039 M. = 982–983 K.), schedium (improvisation 1279 M. = 1296 K.). Saturarum libri seems to have been the title chosen by the grammarians. This means that the much discussed term of satura has perhaps no great claim to antiquity.

Many varied impulses combine in Lucilius' work. Among native elements may be mentioned the Italian love of repartee, which also found expression in the so-called Fescennine verses. Since the days of Cato, Rome had known political pamphlets. For satire in the form of letters we have pre-literary examples from everyday. Spurius Mummius, the brother of the plunderer of Corinth, is alleged to have written witty letters in verse from the camp (Cic. Att. 13. 6. 4). An epistolary form was employed by Lucilius in his 3rd, 5th and 9th books. He thus became the ancestor at Rome of the poetic missive. The literary epistle as an open letter to the public was also a novelty.

In looking for Greek predecessors, scholars have long observed the proximity of the satura to the Stoic and Cynic diatribe, a popular sermon on morals. Lucilius' dependence on Menippean satire<sup>3</sup> is however a matter of controversy, since the Menippean was first introduced at Rome by Varro. The extensive parallels between the assembly of the gods in Lucilius' 1st book and Seneca's Apocolocyntosis could then only be explained in Lucilius as a parody of Ennius. The first scene of Virgil's Aeneid book 10 may also be compared.

Lucilius was well read in every literary genre. He knew aggressive poets, such as Archilochus and Aristophanes, but he also knew

<sup>1</sup> Once in a legal sense: 48 M. = 34 K.

<sup>2</sup> H. WAGENVOORT, Ludus poeticus, in: H.W., Studies in Roman Literature, Culture and Religion, Leiden 1956, 30–42.

<sup>3</sup> Favored by F. LEO, Varro und die Satire, Hermes 24, 1889, 84; treated skeptically by M. MOSCA, I presunti modelli del Concilium deorum di Lucilio, PP 15, 1960, 373–384.

Euripides and Menander, as well as Menander's Roman successors, Plautus, Caecilius, and Terence. The proximity to comedy later emphasized by Horace (sat. 1. 4. 1-8) is to be found more in perspective than in detail. Lucilius is linked to Old Comedy by his pleasure in personal attack, and with the New by his vivid presentation of human weaknesses and foibles, which philosophically may be understood as deviations from the golden mean.<sup>1</sup>

His relationship to epic is complex. While Lucilius himself refused to write any such work, he certainly paid homage to Homer and Ennius, if by nothing else than by his increasing preference for the epic meter and his numerous epic parodies, as in his assembly of the gods.<sup>2</sup> He even translated a passage of Homer (1254 M. = 1272 K.). He rejected, therefore, the heroic poem, not in principle, but only as alien to the bent of his personal talent.<sup>3</sup> In fact, our satirist proves to have a sense of the niceties of the epic style when he scolds Ennius for often falling short of the dignity of his topic (cf. Hor. sat. 1. 10. 54). This means that line 4 M. = 6 K., on the basis of its resemblances to Virgil Aeneid 9. 227, is certainly Ennian, and Jupiter's exclamation over human cares and the worthlessness of earthly things is reminiscent of Zeus' speech in the 1st book of the Odyssey (Lucilius 9 M.,<sup>4</sup> cf. 2 K.; Odyss. 1. 32).

In his confrontation with tragedy, Lucilius rejects topics removed from reality,<sup>5</sup> reminding the reader of Terence's criticism of Luscius Lanuvinus. He also parodies bombastic language.<sup>6</sup> The question of Lucilius' relationship to Callimachus, and in particular to the Iamboi, is difficult. M. Puelma (1949) sees Lucilius and Horace as the heirs

<sup>1</sup> M. PUELMA 1949, esp. 53-66.

<sup>2</sup> We find an element of humor in assemblies of the gods as early as Homer: W. NESTLE, Anfänge einer Götterburleske bei Homer (1905), now in: W.N., Griechische Studien. Untersuchungen zur Religion, Dichtung und Philosophie der Griechen, Stuttgart 1948, 1-31; R. MUTH, Die Götterburleske in der griechischen Literatur, Darmstadt 1992; Epic parody in the Iter Siculum: E. A. SCHMIDT, Lucilius kritisiert Ennius und andere Dichter. Zu Lucil. frag. 148 MARX, MH 34, 1977, 122-129, esp. 124.

<sup>3</sup> J. CHRISTES 1971, 76-78 and 117; Lucil. 621-622 M. = 689 K.; 679 K.

<sup>4</sup> The fragment is not found in W. KRENKEL (frag. 2) and is replaced by the neighboring verse in Persius.

<sup>5</sup> E.g. winged serpents 587 M. = 604 K. borrowed from Pacuvius trag. 397 R.; criticism of the Cresphontes of Euripides: 1169 M. = 1189 K. (implausibility).

<sup>6</sup> E.g. 653 M. = 616 K. after Pacuv. trag. 112 R.; Lucil. 597-598 M. = 605-606 K. after Pacuv. trag. 20a R.; Lucil. 599-600 M. = 620-621 K. after Acc. trag. 617; cf. also W. BARR, Lucilius and Accius, RhM 108, 1965, 101-103.

of the latter, while Ennius and Varro are the representatives of the satirical diatribe. The principal objection raised has been that Lucilius is not concerned with theoretical principles, but with a poetry that is subjectively true, adapted to his theme and his poetic gift. Even so, it is noteworthy that to formulate these thoughts Lucilius picked up the Μοῦσα πεζή of Callimachus which became the mirror of the artist's personal world. Lucilius consciously adopted a strict ideal of form and created a simple and elegant style. This is why he was perceived by Varro as the exponent of gracilitas. The objection that in Horace's view Lucilius' satires were like a 'muddy river' is not compelling. The Augustan poet later revised his verdict, which was based on a particular context, and recognized that in his own period Lucilius could claim to have more culture and erudition (doctus), urbanity of manners (urbanus), and stylistic skill than all his predecessors (sat. 1. 10. 64-71). Here we find that shifting of phases which renders the judgment of early Roman poetry so difficult. The critic who starts from Horace observes Lucilius' archaism, and evaluates it, according to his personal taste, as a shortcoming or, conversely, as a particular merit, while the perspective of Lucilius himself was exactly the reverse. He was attracted by the progress in the refinement of language and form which was his aim. Since others outshone him in this regard, we must make a fresh attempt to open our eyes to his achievement. In his effort, only Callimachus could serve as a guide.

One important influence has not yet been mentioned, that of philosophy. Satura is not a philosophical genre, but it is constantly preoccupied with the question of the conduct of life and, for this reason, assimilates a multitude of inspirations from philosophy. Being a friend of Clitomachus, Lucilius was acquainted with Plato's writings. He mentioned Carneades (31 M. = 51 K.), and quoted the Socratic Euclides (518 M. = 519 K.). In particular, he took up thoughts of the Middle Stoa as represented in Scipio's circle by Panaetius. In Lucilius' theory of character and ethics, Peripatetic elements have been observed. It would be something remarkable if a poet noted for so much reading and adaptation had not been a reflective artist.

Literary Technique

Some of the poet's books were self-contained, consisting of individual large-scale satires. Others were made up of several pieces. Lucilius seems to have preferred the larger form at the beginning of his second phase (i.e. in the 1st books of the edition of his works). In the 1st book, as in the 26th (at the beginning of his earliest collection), there may have been an 'introductory satire'. The brevity of the fragments preserved makes it almost impossible to evaluate the artistic structure of larger sections, whether of narrative or argument. Doubtless, his range of forms was wide: proverb, fable, anecdote, reminiscence, lecture, letter, dialogue. Among his literary procedures may be mentioned parody and travesty. Lucilius also employed the methods of the diatribe: address, rhetorical question, objection, apparent dialogue.<sup>1</sup>

We possess a fragment in which Lucilius' art may be observed over the span of several verses: his description of the nature of virtus (1326–1338 M. = 1342–1354 K.). The beginning and end of this extract are emphasized by a larger sentence or context which in each case extends over two lines (1342–1343; 1353–1354 K.). The use of a tricolon lends a particular force to the final section (1352; 1353–1354 K.). Before the antepenultimate verse, and after the third verse, there are two pairs of lines related to each other by verbal reminiscences and antithetical content (1345–1346: utile quid sit, honestum, / quid inutile, turpe, inhonestum, 'what is useful . . . , what is shameful, useless, dishonorable'; 1350–1351: inimicum hominum morumque malorum / defensorem hominum morumque bonorum, 'an enemy of bad men and manners, a defender of good men and manners'). The idea that wealth must be properly valued is placed in the center of our text (1348). This nucleus is surrounded by two complementary expressions: restraint in acquisition (1347), and right giving (1349). Anaphora provides this symmetrical structure with the dynamic it had lacked. The tricolon at the end gives the necessary weight to the conclusion. This self-contained passage, then, shows a coexistence of symmetry and linear progression which may be recognized as characteristic of Latin Neoteric and Augustan poetry and, at the same time, of the Hellenistic manner. Lucilius' literary technique therefore confirms his indebtedness to Callimachean artistry. It also proves his mastery of rhetorical methods and of their blending into poetry.

Finally, the fragment also attempts to render philosophical thoughts in pure Latin. The poet at will can avoid Greek words. The Grecisms which he employs elsewhere either act as quotations or as a realistic reflection of colloquial language. They thus serve quite specific purposes.

---

<sup>1</sup> J. CHRISTES 1971, 51–52.

Language and Style

We already mentioned that Lucilius ridiculed the philhellene A. Postumius Albinus. He criticized Greek words not demanded by the occasion (15–16 M. = 16–17 K.). Lucilius' striving for Latinitas is shown by his attack on the provincialisms used by a certain Vettius (1322 M. = 1338 K.). For him, good Latin is the language of the capital city. Lucilius experienced language 'largely as a social phenomenon'.<sup>1</sup> This explains his rejection of orthographical reforms proposed by Accius who wanted to write scena to correspond to the Greek original. Since the pronunciation of -ae as -e was widespread in the countryside, Lucilius reproached this aristocrat of the stage with introducing country speech to Rome: Cecilius pretor ne rusticus fiat, 'let's not make Caecilius yokel pretor' (1130 M. = 1146 K.). Even if Accius were not directly meant, the jesting alteration of the title praetor urbanus into praetor rusticus would remain an unmistakable allusion to urbanity as the norm. In this regard, many an unusual word formation in Lucilius may be seen as a caricature of the stilted language of tragedy (e.g. a truly monstrous adjective monstrificabilis, 608 M. = 623 K.). While Lucilius sought uniform criteria both for language and life, he rejected the leveling proposed by the Analogists, unlike the Scipios (963–964 M. = 971–972 K.; cf. Cic. orat. 159). He also assailed the use of rhetorical figures of the Asian type, even though sometimes Scipio himself was not averse to them.<sup>2</sup>

In his search for a simple, clear style,<sup>3</sup> as in his preference for the mot juste, Lucilius stood with Terence and the purist tendencies of the following century. His preference for the language of the capital, even in the face of exaggerations by Analogists, links him with Varro. But he outdid these authors in his creative linguistic gift. His feeling for style was everywhere alert to what was appropriate, and showed itself also in pithy apophthegms, such as vis est vita, 'force is life' (1340

<sup>1</sup> M. PUELMA 1949, 28.

<sup>2</sup> On this LEO, LG 303–304. Lucilius 84–85 M. = 74–75 K.

<sup>3</sup> Especially technical terms: Fronto p. 62 N. = 57,4 V.D.H.

M. = 1356 K.) or non omnia possumus omnes (218 M. = 224 K., imitated by Virgil, eccl. 8. 63).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Lucilius was not so much a theoretician as a critic of style, a thoughtful, pugnacious poet, taking sides in disputes of the day. His feud with Accius was only the tip of an iceberg, and may generally be compared with features of modern literary life: text—review—response, and so on.<sup>1</sup> The definition of the simple style of the satura, by contrast with epic and tragedy, was already mentioned. In dialogue, Lucilius speaks loosely, his partner in exalted tones (book 26). However, this is a studied negligence guided by the principle of a simple, subtle way of writing. Lucilius has in fact been called ‘the first to demonstrate a nose for style’ (Plin. nat. praef. 7). ‘Nose’ here is a metaphor for taste and wit. In his day Lucilius was what in the 18th century was called a ‘connoisseur’. He was not concerned with particular persons, but with clear ideas and with general questions. This is why he distinguishes between poesis and poema (338–347 M. = 376–385 K.). But he did not disdain questions of orthography and gave them an almost philosophical interpretation. In the dative or ‘giving’ case, the word is ‘given’ one more letter.<sup>2</sup> This was the moment when literary criticism at Rome first saw the light of day, and Lucilius championed the requirements of simplicity and adaptation of words to facts. These were ideas touching on Stoic theories.

An important feature of his demeanor as a critic was the rejection of any claim to superiority. Lucilius spoke of himself ‘not as if he were superior to the one he was criticizing’ (Hor. sat. 1. 10. 55). In this self-belittling, the student of the Academy showed an element of Socratic irony. As a rule, the presence of irony in Lucilius should not be disputed by reference to his high opinion of his poetry. Of course his self-awareness was beyond all doubt (1008 M. = 1064 K.; 1084 M. = 1065 K.), but may not the same be said of ironical Horace? Moreover, an enrichment of ‘lower’ literary genres with elements of high poetry, particularly in praise of rulers (as was found in the memorial to Scipio in Lucilius' book 30), is consistent with the practice of the crossing of the genres found in Callimachus and Theocritus. Whether beyond this there is evidence for a link to Callimachus, especially in the iambic portions, should be considered.<sup>1</sup> This genre binds simple style with an aggressive stance, with variety of themes and parody. It embraces therefore a whole collection of Lucilian features in one. It is improbable that so many shared similarities depend on pure coincidence. In so educated a writer as Lucilius, it is easier to assume that he chose his model deliberately.

<sup>1</sup> W. KRENKEL 1957/58 = 1970, passim, esp. 245 with note.

<sup>2</sup> The idea that words reflect facts is Stoic: NORDEN, Aen. VI, pp. 413–414; W. KRENKEL 1957/1958 = 1970, 249.

Ideas II

Lucilius' satires range widely in theme. With emphatic frankness, he speaks of his own life, as well as that of his friends and enemies. Erotic themes<sup>2</sup> occupy much space. There are ladies of the demi-monde, and boys. The patterns of amorous behavior he describes anticipate many features of later erotic didacticism, as found in Horace, Tibullus, and Ovid. Lucilius speaks of marriage from the point of view of a confirmed bachelor. Woman is a 'sweet evil' (dulce malum).<sup>3</sup> What made his satura for the first time satiric, by contrast with that of Ennius, was his criticism of society. Lucilius dispensed praise and blame freely on the leading men of the Republic, and did not spare even the people (1259–1260 M. = 1275 K.). Contemporary challenges often formed a starting point, to which were repeatedly added themes drawn from ethics, physics, dialectic, and the philosophy of language.

At the outset, Lucilius distinguished his work from extreme positions taken by philosophers. He had no concern with 'investigating the hour of birth of heaven and earth' (1 M. = 1 K.), but rather with presenting real life. In order to understand life, the so-called sage (cf. 515–516 M. = 500–501 K.) could not be of much use to him. He could, however, find great use for the types of eccentric behavior pictured by Theophrastus in his Characters,<sup>4</sup> with the aim of defining the mean by using two antithetical extremes. Examples are

<sup>1</sup> R. SCODEL, Horace, Lucilius, and Callimachean Polemic, HSPH 91, 1987, 199–215.

<sup>2</sup> Collyra (book 16), Phryne (book 7), Hymnis (book 28 or 29); Sexual techniques (303–306 M. = 302–305 K.).

<sup>3</sup> D. KORZENIEWSKI, Dulce malum. Ein unbeachtetes Sprichwort und das Lucilius-Fragment 1097 M., Gymnasium 83, 1976, 289–294.

<sup>4</sup> M. PUELMA 1949, 54–60.

avarice and extravagance in Horace's first Satire, or in Lucilius' 26th book. Lucilius did not try to find the virtuous life, like Horace, in withdrawal, but, after the fashion of the disciples of Plato and Aristotle, in the midst of practical life. In dialogue, he liked to juxtapose contrary characters, such as the Stoic Scaevola, who rejected all bombast, and the Epicurean Albucius, an affected Graecomaniac (book 2). Here the truth certainly lies in the mean between the extremes although, in a confrontation of the satirist with the tragic poet, it lies on the side of the former and his simple style (books 26 and 30).

The notion of the mean is also evident in the previously mentioned virtus fragment, even in its form. Virtue pertains not only to moderation in gain but also to right giving. This shows as well some influence of Panaetius (Cic. off. 1. 58; Diog. Laert. 7. 124). Since virtus includes the right attitude to country and parents, it borders on pietas although, surprisingly in this context, no mention is made of the dead and of the gods. Fulfillment of duty in Lucilius is directed, with Roman sobriety, towards life in this world. It is to Greek philosophy, however, that Lucilius owes his liberation from fear of the gods. 'The people trembles before scarecrows and witches, introduced by the likes of Faunus and Numa Pompilius. It puts its faith in them. Just as small children believe that all bronze statues live and are men, so these people regard the inventions of dreams as true, and think that bronze statues have heart and understanding . . .' (484-488 M. = 490-494 K.). Here it seems that we have an anticipation, not merely of a thought of Lucretius, but also of the accompanying simile (Lucretius 2. 55-58). In this passage, Lucilius puts up particular resistance to the assumption that images of the gods have life, but it is remarkable even so that his assault goes beyond mythical theology (480-483 M. = 482-485 K.) to the State religion introduced by Numa Pompilius, an act of boldness which Epicurus and Lucretius do not permit themselves.

Like Lucretius, Lucilius is one of the few poets taking an interest in natural science. Questions of health and illness and of the relationship of body and soul are also treated in his work. The influence of Epicurean, Stoic, and Aristotelian values is differently assessed.<sup>1</sup> To judge by the evidence of Lucretius' commentators, we may perhaps conclude that Lucilius, too, drew on the scientific and medical knowledge commonly available in his day. His discussion of medicine includes biological and psychological aspects of sexuality (e.g. book 8), and is of a piece with his philosophy of life, his search for man's behavior in his social context. In this respect Lucilius is the first of the great Roman diagnosticians, psychologists, and students of the physiognomy of civilization. Like the essayists of later times, he shows an unflinching attention to facts, a complete lack of system, and an inimitable amalgam of generosity with a carefree spirit.

---

<sup>1</sup> Epicurean elements: W. KRENKEL (edition) on 660-661 and on 658; Stoic elements: J. CHRISTES 1971, 62 and 71.

Lucilius had a strong sense of the uniqueness of personality (671–672 M. = 656–657 K.) and, in spite of his assumption of the mask of the Cynic clown, we may recognize in him the beginning of Roman personal poetry. The poet tried to define his attitude to life by asking what suited his individuality and what did not. It is with this in mind that he assimilated the legacy of the past, and this was the star that guided his behavior and poetry. Lucilius rejected with indignation the suggestion that he might surrender his personal freedom in order to make money (671–672 M. = 656–657 K.). In literature, his decision against epic and in favor of satire was a result of the same evaluation of his abilities. Equally, Panaetius, who brought Stoic philosophy closer to real life, understood self-knowledge not so much in abstract ('recognize that you are not a god but only a man') as individually ('recognize where your talent lies, what is within your grasp'). This means that the poet was not concerned with offering a photograph of his own life. When Horace said that in Lucilius' work his 'whole life' lies open before us (omnis vita Hor. sat. 2. 1. 32–34), we must think less of biography than of a way of life, and the comparison with diaries or votive tablets transcends the bare facts to include the struggle with life's problems. Lucilius' relation to philosophy is characteristic for many Romans. Roman philosophy may not be separated from practical life. But even if the satira does not indulge in theory, it is still concerned with reflection.

Influence

Before publication, Lucilius' works circulated among his close friends, where they were most truly at home. The poet jestingly explained that he wished to be read neither by the most highly educated nor by those completely uneducated, but by Junius Congus and Decimus Laelius. This was obviously not because he seriously regarded them as not very educated, but because they were his friends (592–596

M. = 591–594 K.).<sup>1</sup> Conversely, Lucilius knew ‘that now, out of many, only my poems are on everybody’s lips’ (1013 M. = 1084 K.). This means that a large discrepancy opened between the circle of readers which he professed to seek and that which in fact he reached. (His large circulation as such does not refute the poet’s allegiance to Callimachus any more than it does in the case of Ovid.) Among the poet’s numerous friends were also numbered the grammarians, Q. Laelius Archelaus and Vettius Philocomus. In all probability, it was they who later edited the satires (Suet. gramm. 2. 4; cf. Lucil. 1322 M. = 1338 K.). In the next generation, we find the famous Valerius Cato as Lucilius’ defender (ps.-Horace sat. 1. 10. 1–8). He was a pupil of Philocomus, and along with Pompeius Lenaeus, a pupil of Archelaus, and with Curtius Nicias, he belonged to the circle of Pompey the Great, who was Lucilius’ great-nephew. It was here that a revised edition of the poet’s works was made, and that collections of glossae perhaps began. In the early imperial period, editions are also known accompanied by critical signs, which may have been owed to Probus of Berytos. There were also commentaries (cf. Gell. 24. 4).

Horace felt a profound need to come to terms with Lucilius. Satires 1. 4, 1. 10, and 2. 1 trace the path from criticism conditioned by his own literary position towards a calmer evaluation. In particular, the 1st satire of the 2nd book is linked with Lucilius’ programmatic poem in book 26.<sup>2</sup> The next great satirist, Persius, is said to have been drawn to poetry by reading Lucilius’ 10th book (vit. Pers. appendix). It was Lucilius who taught the poets of Roman satire how to present themselves, and he gave them their range of topoi.<sup>3</sup> Even apart from this, in the 1st century A.D., there were still readers whose favorite poet was Lucilius (cf. Quint. inst. 10. 1. 93). Some of them indeed preferred Lucilius to Horace (cf. Tac. dial. 23). In the transmission, florilegia must also be taken into account. It was such a collection that Lactantius may have used in giving us the self-contained fragment on virtue. The list of authors who cite Lucilius at first-hand is long.<sup>4</sup> The last who may have read Lucilius in the

<sup>1</sup> He also mentions as readers inhabitants of Tarentum, Consentia, and Sicily (594 M. = 596 K.). His family may have possessed estates there.

<sup>2</sup> J. CHRISTES 1971, 72–99.

<sup>3</sup> E. J. KENNEY, The First Satire of Juvenal, PCPhS 188, n.s. 8, 1962, 29–40.

<sup>4</sup> Cicero, Varro, Pollio, Horace, Virgil, Persius, Petronius, Seneca, Pliny, Martial, Quintilian, Juvenal, the Archaizers. Aulus Gellius names the first 21 books, but it is not known whether he had read them personally. The Horatian commentator

original is Nonius Marcellus. By analyzing his method of selecting quotations, it has been hoped that the sequence of citations within the books could be determined. Unfortunately, he cites books 26 to 30 backwards, which makes it impossible to know whether within each of these books, too, the order of quotations is reversed. However, in this area there are skeptical voices as well.<sup>1</sup> Most other citations by the grammarians, traceable partly to Verrius Flaccus, are made at second-hand.<sup>2</sup>

The preservation of his work in extremely small fragments which usually lack a context makes Lucilius difficult of access. The disappearance of one who was perhaps the most original and 'most Roman' of Roman poets is a particularly regrettable loss. Without wishing to underestimate Ennius' achievement, we must recognize in Lucilius the real founder of Roman satura, indeed of European satire in general. It was he who for the first time gave it its satirical impress. At the same time, he was the founder of Roman personal poetry, a character with a strongly individual stamp, stimulating and animating even later poets, without intimidating them by excess of dignified authority. Furthermore, we find in Lucilius the beginnings of an analysis and diagnosis of Roman life from a point of view which is quasi medical and scientific, and which seems to anticipate positions taken by Lucretius. Finally, Lucilius embodies in one person both poet and critic. The quarrel between him and Accius indicates a new stage in self-awareness for Roman literature. This was the time when the parallel treatment of Greek and Roman literature began. There is no reason to underestimate the Greek training and sensibility of Lucilius and to trivialize Horace's criticism of the poet. Horace is speaking on his own behalf in an argument of his day, and the criticism was exchanged among authors in agreement over their goals. Great progress has been made in the reconstruction of Lucilius' outlook as it was determined by his Hellenistic education, of his cultural surroundings in Rome and of his Roman concern with realism. The poet taken as a whole is the assembly of these disparate elements united in a strong and original individuality. The dominance of the person over theories and traditions used as means of expression is a Porphyrio may likewise only have known books 1-21. Information about Lucilius' life took the following route: Varro, Nepos, Atticus, Velleius, Suetonius, Jerome.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. CHARPIN (edition) 58-62.

<sup>2</sup> On new fragments: R. REICHE, Zwei unbekannte Fragmente des Lucilius?, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 28, 1975, 281-292.

feature, characteristic of Roman writers, which meets us in Lucilius in a pure form. His attention to language and artistic shape, his achievement as a philosopher of life, psychologist and student of civilization, and as the ancestor of later moralists and essayists, are matters still awaiting evaluation.

Editions: R. and H. STEPHANUS, Fragmenta poetarum veterum Latinorum quorum opera non extant, Genevae 1564. * Lucilius only: F. DOUSA (TN), Lugduni Batavorum 1597. * Lucian MUELLER (TC, index verborum), Lipsiae 1872. * C. LACHMANN, completed by M. HAUPT, ed. by J. VAHLEN, Berlin 1876. * F. MARX (TC), 2 vols., Lipsiae 1904–1905, repr. 1963. * N. TERZAGHI, Firenze 1934; 3rd ed. 1966 in collaboration with I. MARIOTTI. * E. H. WARMINGTON (TTrN), ROL 3, 2–423, London 1938, repr. 1957. * W. KRENKEL (TTrN), 2 vols., Leiden 1970. * F. CHARPIN (TTrN), vol. 1 (books 1–8), Paris 1978. ** Index: L. BERKOWITZ, T. E. BRUNNER, Index Lucilianus, Hildesheim 1968 (based on N. TERZAGHI's edition). ** Bibl.: J. CHRISTES, Lucilius. Ein Bericht über die Forschung seit F. MARX (1904/5), ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 1182–1239.

D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Stray Lights on Lucilius, CJ 77, 1981, 117–118. * F. CHARPIN, Nonius Marcellus et le classement des fragments de Lucilius, RPh 52, 1978, 284–307. * J. CHRISTES, Der frühe Lucilius. Rekonstruktion und Interpretation des XXVI. Buches sowie von Teilen des XXX. Buches, Heidelberg 1971. * C. CICHORIUS, Untersuchungen zu Lucilius, Berlin 1908. * C. J. CLASSEN, Die Kritik des Horaz an Lucilius in den Satiren I 4 und I 5, Hermes 109, 1981, 339–360. * G. D'ANNA, Alcune precisazioni sulla recusatio, QCTC 1, 1983, 33–43. * F. DELLA CORTE, Numa e le streghe, Maia 26, 1974, 3–20. * J. W. DUFF, Roman Satire. Its Outlook on Social Life, Berkeley 1936, repr. 1964. * R. K. EHRMANN, Lucilius and the Cross-Currents of Literary Thought in the Time of Scipio Aemilianus, diss. Illinois 1982. * G. C. FISKE, Lucilius and Horace. A Study in the Classical Art of Imitation, Madison 1920. * W. GÖRLER, Zum virtus-Fragment des Lucilius (1326–1338 M.) und zur Geschichte der stoischen Güterlehre, Hermes 112, 1984, 445–468. * J. G. GRIFFITH, The Ending of Juvenal's First Satire and Lucilius, Book XXX, Hermes 98, 1970, 56–72. * K. HELDMANN, Zur Ehesatire des Lucilius, Hermes 107, 1979, 339–344. * J. HEURGON, Lucilius, Paris 1959. * A. KAPPELMACHER, Lucilius, RE 13, 1927, 1617–1637. * U. KNOCHÉ, Die römische Satire, Berlin 1949, Göttingen 2nd ed. 1957, 3rd rev. ed. 1971, 20–34. * D. KORZENIEWSKI, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1970. * S. KOSTER, Neues virtus-Denken bei Lucilius, in: Begegnungen mit Neuem und Altem, ed. by P. NEUKAM, München 1981, 5–26. * W. KRENKEL, Zur literarischen Kritik bei Lucilius, WZRoostock 7, 2, 1957/58, 249–282; repr. in: D. KORZENIEWSKI, ed., 1970, 161–266. * W. KRENKEL, Zur literarischen Kritik in den römischen Satiren, in: Philologische Vorträge, ed. by J. IRMSCHER and W. STEFFEN, Wrocław 1959, 197–208. * D. MANKIN, Lucilius and Archilochus: Fragment 698 (Marx), AJPh 108, 1987, 405–408. * I. MARIOTTI, Studi luciliani, Firenze 1960. * I. MARIOTTI, F. DELLA CORTE, W. KRENKEL, L'età di Lucilio, Maia 20, 1968, 254–270. * J. R. C. MARTYN, Imagery in Lucilius, WZRostock 15, 1966, 493–505. * J. R. C. MARTYN, Satis saturae?, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 25, 1972, 157–167. * J. MICHELFEIT, Zum Aufbau des ersten Buches des Lucilius, Hermes 93, 1965, 113–128. * F.-H. MUTSCHLER, Individualismus und Gemeinsinn bei Lucilius und Horaz, A&A 31, 1985, 46–65. * J. J. O'HARA, Somnia ficta in Lucretius and Lucilius, CQ n.s. 37, 1987, 517–519. * M. PUELMA PIWONKA, Lucilius und Kallimachos. Zur Geschichte einer Gattung der hellenistisch-römischen Poesie, Frankfurt 1949. * W. J. RASCHKE, Arma pro amico. Lucilian Satire at the Crisis of the Roman Republic, Hermes 115, 1987, 299–318. * A. RONCONI, Lucilio critico letterario, Maia 15, 1963, 515–525. * N. RUDD, The Poet's Defence. A Study of Horace serm. 1, 4, CQ 49, 1955, 142–148; 149–156. * U. W. SCHOLZ, Der frühe Lucilius und Horaz, Hermes 114, 1986, 335–365. * W. SCHREIBER, De Lucili syntaxi, Breslau 1917. * J. SVARLIEN, Lucilianus Character, AJPh 115, 1994, 253–267. * N. TERZAGHI, Lucilio, Torino 1934, repr. 1979. * J. TER VRUGT-LENTZ, Lucili ritu, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 19, 1966, 349–358 (on book 26). * J. H. WASZINK, Zur ersten Satire des Lucilius, WS 70, 1957, 322–328; repr. in: D. KORZENIEWSKI, ed., 1970, 267–274.

C. THE DIDACTIC POEM

ROMAN DIDACTIC POETRY

General Remarks

To begin with, three general points might be made. Didactic poetry is based on facts in a particular way; thus in Aratus, Quintilian<sup>1</sup> recognized the conflict between intractable material and the poet's task; while Cicero turned this antithesis into a compliment in noting that Nicander treated a rustic theme in urbane fashion.<sup>2</sup> The difficulty of 'weaving a work out of knowledge and imagination, of uniting two opposed elements in one living body' is rightly explained by Goethe as stemming from the essence of the genre, which means that psychological speculations about inner tensions in the author (such as the 'anti-Lucretius in Lucretius') become superfluous. In Goethe's eyes, 'good humor'<sup>3</sup> is the surest way to reconcile knowledge and imaginative power. This remark, which originally was made about English didactic poets, is valid also for Horace or Ovid, although less so for Lucretius.

Since didactic poetry sets out to convince others by means of words, it is a 'creature half-way between poetry and rhetoric'.<sup>4</sup> The Ancients intimated this connection by making Gorgias, the founder of rhetoric, a student of the didactic poet Empedocles. In didactic poetry the word is at the service of the subject matter and is subordinate to an overriding aim of persuasion. Prooemia and digressions,<sup>5</sup> forms of argument and methods of proof, may be interpreted rhetorically. For the early Greeks, this is true in hindsight, but all Roman authors of didactic poems have progressed through the school of rhetoric.

---

<sup>1</sup> Arati materia motu caret, ut in qua nulla varietas, nullus adfectus, nulla persona, nulla cuiusquam sit oratio; sufficit tamen operi, cui se parem credidit (inst. 10. 1. 55).

<sup>2</sup> Poetica quadam facultate, non rustica, scripsisse praeclare (de orat. 1. 69).

<sup>3</sup> Goethe, Über das Lehrgedicht, W.A. 1. 41. 2, 1903, 227.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., 225.

<sup>5</sup> Excursus, ut laus hominum locorumque, ut descriptio regionum, expositio quarundam rerum gestarum, vel etiam fabulosarum (Quint. inst. 4. 3. 12); the description of plague was regarded as an even too popular topic for digressions (Dion. Hal. rhet. 10. 17).

Didactic poetry strives for a large public. Readers of good didactic poems were undoubtedly more numerous than those who endured the toil of studying esoteric philosophical texts. Even Goethe<sup>1</sup> demanded that the best authors should not disdain to write didactic poems. Unhappily, to the majority of his countrymen, the author who handles scientific topics in intelligible or even attractive form seems rather an object of suspicion.

The aesthetic evaluation and generic categorization of didactic poetry accordingly presents difficulties. Antiquity had three ways of solving them:

1. Denial of poetic status. According to Aristotle (poet. 1. 1447 b 18), Empedocles, for all that he wrote in hexameters like Homer,<sup>2</sup> was a natural philosopher rather than a poet. In this definition the determining factor is the (didactic) purpose, not the (poetic) means.<sup>3</sup>

Unlike Plato, who took poetry's didactic claims seriously, Aristotle believed that poetry should produce pleasure, and that each type of poetry produced its specific type of pleasure (for example, tragedy produced fear and sympathy, poet. 14). Goethe took up a more moderate position: 'All poetry should teach, but imperceptibly.'<sup>4</sup> The dismissal of didactic poetry from poetry was encouraged in modern times by an exaggerated notion of the autonomy of poetry.<sup>5</sup> But adherence to facts or to a particular purpose cannot be criteria proving absence of literary merit.

Plutarch used the concepts of μῦθος and ψεῦδος to define poetry, and separated didactic poetry from this, on the grounds that it only borrows poetic form (De audiendis poetis 16 CD). What is poetic in the didactic poem is subservient. The scholia to Hesiod describe the metrical form as a 'sweetener' (ἡδυσμα), which charms the mind,

<sup>1</sup> Goethe, ibid., 226.

<sup>2</sup> The thought recurs in Lactantius (inst. 2. 12. 4), where the question is still raised: Empedocles, quem nescias utrumne inter poetas an inter philosophos numeres. Further material in VS 31 A 24–25. Later, the too convenient antithesis of poetae and versificatores prevailed (Scaliger, poet. 1, 2, cf. Aristotle's word ἐποποιός): Lessing, for example (along with his co-author Moses Mendelssohn), says 'Lucretius and those like him are versifiers rather than poets' (Pope ein Metaphysiker: Vorbericht: Vorläufige Untersuchung, Werke 24, 100 Petersen). But Lessing rejects the title 'poet' even for himself (cf. also the 103rd and 51st literary letter).

<sup>3</sup> In the dialogue Περὶ ποιητῶν (fig. 70 ROSE, 3rd ed. = p. 67 ROSS), Aristotle however recognizes that Empedocles' style is markedly Homeric.

<sup>4</sup> Goethe, loc. cit., 225.

<sup>5</sup> Cf., for example, KAYSER (s. abbreviations).

keeps it prisoner and so serves a didactic purpose (σκοπός).<sup>1</sup> This means that they think of it as an incidental item justified by its pedagogical purpose. Even the Epicurean Lucretius, though being a born poet, modestly expressed it the same way.

2. Assignment to Epic. According to an old and widespread interpretation,<sup>2</sup> most didactic poems, in accordance with their meter, are simply ἔπη.

A consideration of content must also be made. Under the influence of Stoic theories of utility, even learned readers regarded Homer as a serious source for scientific and geographical facts.<sup>3</sup> For an audience looking for scientific instruction even in narrative epic, the difference of genre between epic and didactic poem became blurred. Conversely, for Eratosthenes, in poetry the didactic aim (διδασκαλία) is displaced by a purely emotional influence (ψυχαγωγία). Even Aristarchus (3rd–2nd century B.C.) was not inclined to exaggerate Homer's knowledge, but at Rome the Alexandrians had less influence than the Stoics of Pergamum.

3. Even so, there are efforts towards a special view of didactic poetry as a genre in its own right. The Tractatus Coislinianus<sup>4</sup> somewhat violently assumes that besides mimetic poetry (in the Aristotelian tradition) there is a non-mimetic poetry, to which 'educative' (παιδευτική) poetry belongs. It is divided<sup>5</sup> in turn into an 'instructive' (ὠφρητική) and 'contemplative' (θεωρητική) category.

Diomedes,<sup>6</sup> following Plato's Republic (3. 392 C–394 C), distinguishes dramatic, expository and mixed poetry. Within the genus enarrativum there is a subcategory of 'didactic poetry' (διδασκαλική), whose representatives are Empedocles, Aratus, Lucretius, and Virgil. This division is only attested at a late date, but perhaps already of Hellenistic origin.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Schol. vet. in Hesiodi Opera et dies, ed. Pertusi, pp. 1–2; cf. p. 4; similarly, Hor. sat. 1. 1. 25–26, but this does not mean that Lucretius l. 936–942 must be derived from the diatribe; cf. already Plato leg. 660 A; on Hesiod: W. STROH, Hesiods lügende Muse, in: Studien zum antiken Epos, FS F. DIRLMEIER and V. PÖSCHL, eds. H. GÖRGMANN and E. A. SCHMIDT, Meisenheim 1976, 85–112.

<sup>2</sup> Already Aristotle challenges it in the Poetics. Dionysius of Halicarnassus however and Quintilian still unite everything that is metrically alike (see above p. 76, note 7).

<sup>3</sup> So Hipparchus (2nd century B.C.) and Strabo (1st century B.C.).

<sup>4</sup> CGF 50–53 KAIBEL.

<sup>5</sup> According to T. BERGK's rearrangement.

<sup>6</sup> GL 1. 482. 14–17 and 483. 1–3 KEIL.

<sup>7</sup> E. PÖHLMANN 1973, 829–831; a different and more reserved view in B. EFFE 1977, 21.

Greek Background

The founder of didactic poetry was Hesiod (8th–7th century). The Theogony influenced Orphic cosmogonies in which the ‘last things’ were revealed. Thus they became the models for Empedocles’ Katharmoi. In the Orphic Katabaseis, narrative took precedence, but they contained matters of doctrine as well. The poems ascribed to Epimenides and Musaeus also dealt with theogony and myth, traditions which the 6th book of the Aeneid would eventually pick up. A late echo of Greek religious poetry is found in the Chaldean oracles put in the mouth of Hecate. Gnomonic poetry and catalogues, which later exercised a distant influence, for example, on Ovid’s Metamorphoses, are left out of this account.

The decision of the great Eleatic philosophers, Parmenides and Empedocles, to proclaim their philosophical teachings in verse became definitive for Lucretius.

In Hellenistic times, the relationship of the poet to his subject matter was different. Any topic could now be presented in verse form, for school purposes to aid the memory of students or to advertise the author’s learning. Often the writer no longer had expert knowledge of his topic, but borrowed it from others and contributed only decoration. This is true even of the most significant and influential work of the Hellenistic period in the didactic manner, the astronomical poem of Aratus (first half 3rd century B.C.), later adapted into Latin by Cicero and Germanicus. The Aetia of Callimachus may be mentioned, although they were didactic only in appearance. Nicander (perhaps 2nd century B.C.) treated somewhat remote and arid topics, turning inter alia medical prescriptions into verse. Similarly, at Rome Ovid would later write a poem about women’s cosmetics.

Roman Development

A native inclination towards teaching and learning is already shown in one of the earliest works of Latin literature, the Elder Cato’s prose treatise on agriculture. To the oldest stratum of the written record at Rome there also belong traditional sayings ascribed to worthy persons. In many literary genres at Rome, we find a didactic tinge. Examples are the sections on the migration of souls in the epics of Ennius, Virgil, and Ovid. However, Ennius’ Euhemerus, a rationalist’s interpretation of gods, was composed in prose. In considering the didactic poem in the narrower sense, it may be noted that its development at first reverses the course it took in Greece. It proceeds from 'modern' to 'classical' or 'archaic' models. Its first beginnings follow the playful route of the Hellenistic manner. It is only later that this poetry discovers a perfect harmony between form and content, thus corresponding to the general line of development followed by Roman literature. Since it is a literature of 'apprenticeship', it is only by fruitful assimilation of a foreign culture that it gradually realizes its own identity.

At the start we find, for example, the treatment of delicatessen (Hedyphagetica) by Ennius, in succession to Arcestratus of Gela, or of grammatical themes by Accius and Lucilius. Accius, like Apollodorus in his Xpoviká (2nd century B.C.), employed the trimeter. Whereas in the Greek didactic poem, academic and scholarly topics, such as medicine and astronomy, prevailed, Latin authors quite early turned the didactic poem into an informed companion for high society. Cicero's Aratea, which is less difficult reading than its Greek model, belongs here, as do P. Varro's Chorographia; the poems on ornithology and pharmacology by Aemilius Macer; or that on herbs by Valgius Rufus. Lucretius wrote for Memmius, a member of high society. The 'student' turns into the patron.

The Romans valued in literary genres their relation to real life. Just as Martial<sup>1</sup> chose the epigram or Juvenal the satire, Lucretius chose the didactic poem. He spoke as an expert, treating didactic poems as poetry related to truth and close to reality. In this regard, his situation resembled that of Hesiod or Empedocles. But more than this. Through his choice of topic—De rerum natura—and of form, Lucretius gave to his didactic poem a universal significance. Just as Roman epic, after its Hellenistic beginnings, only grew towards Homeric greatness in Virgil, so the didactic poem in Lucretius attained Empedoclean status.

The Augustan period produced three totally different but equally important didactic poems: Virgil's Georgics, Horace's Ars poetica and Ovid's Ars amatoria. They opened three worlds which with the end of the Republic gained in meaning for the Romans: nature, poetry, love.

---

<sup>1</sup> In comparison with his Greek predecessors, Martial in the epigram obscures the element of fantasy, and refers readers who, instead of real life and self-knowledge, are looking only for abstract mythology to the Aitia of Callimachus (10. 4).

Virgil assumed a place more in the tradition of Aratus than in that of Lucretius, although he did compete with the large-scale form created by the latter. The Georgics exercised considerable influence on all following didactic poetry, actually extending as far as narrative epic. Even in modern times, Virgil's Georgics were considered the culmination of poetry: 'the best Poem of the best Poet' (Dryden).<sup>1</sup> Horace expressed, in the apparently loose form of the sermo, or of a letter, profound thoughts on poetry without ever falling into the pedantic tone of a schoolmaster. Ovid, with considerable irony, turned the topics of love elegy into an elegiac didactic poem concerned with eros.

In the imperial period, Horace's poetic and Ovid's didactic poem of love enjoyed no direct successor, the former because of the difficulty of its topic, and the latter because of its riskiness. However, as might have been expected, earth and sky continued to attract the interest of the emperors as it did didactic poets. The Astronomica of Manilius, composed under Augustus and Tiberius, projected a Stoic picture of man and the world, corresponding to the atmosphere of their time. Germanicus corrected his Greek model, Aratus' Phaenomena, in factual matters, which had long been needed for a textbook enjoying such a broad audience. At the same time he modernized its style by comparison with his Roman predecessor Cicero. For the poet of the Aetna, an emphasis on relation to fact is characteristic; the same is true for Grattius, who taught the art of hunting.

Didactic poetry in late antiquity was fostered by its links with two basic institutions: church and school. Biblical epic (Juvencus, Sedulius) occupied a middle place between epic and didactic poetry. Christian doctrine was taught by Commodianus' Carmen apologeticum and Instructionum libri (3rd or 5th century) as well as by some works<sup>2</sup> of Prudentius (d. after 405). With his Psychomachy the latter produced a new type of work in this radical style: a completely allegorical poem with a didactic, moral content.

The virtuoso didactic poetry for school purposes continued to flourish. Terentianus Maurus wrote On Meters. Among other didactic poets of late antiquity, Nemesianus and Avienus may be mentioned.

<sup>1</sup> L. P. WILKINSON, The Georgics of Virgil. A Critical Survey, Cambridge 1969, 1; cf. 4; 299; 305-307.

<sup>2</sup> Apotheosis, Hamartigenia, Psychomachia, Contra Symmachum.

Literary Technique

Didactic appears in various literary genres. There are easy transitions to proverbial poetry, fable, satire, epistle, panegyric, invective, epigram, and other genres. Here, where we are concerned with Roman literature, the discussion concentrates on longer didactic poems, usually written in hexameters, although occasionally also in iambs or elegiacs.

Didactic poetry may grow from quite varied roots: from epic, elegy, satire, and epistle. Its poetic form may be determined by the need of its audience for an aid to memorization, or by the desire of an author to demonstrate his skill. But it may also arise from inner compulsion.

Nevertheless, the genre of 'didactic poetry' rests on a solid tradition: Aratus is linked with Hesiod, Nicander with Hesiod and Aratus, Empedocles with Homer and Hesiod, Lucretius with Empedocles, Virgil with Hesiod, Aratus, Nicander and Lucretius. This fosters the awareness of belonging to a particular 'group'. But, as may be seen for example in the case of Horace and Ovid, there is the continuous possibility of new developments.

Greek didactic literature witnessed an increasing superficiality. At first in Rome, the opposite development may be observed. It is by the method of poetic treatment that Lucretius and the Augustan poets raised their specific topics to universal validity. Their didactic poems gained an artistic form of their own. These authors developed their subject with the aid of suggestive metaphors, presenting facts or theories in a new light and setting them within a contemporary frame of reference.

Poetic technique in the didactic poem took its lessons chiefly, although not exclusively, from epic. It was from epic that most often, although not always, the hexameter was adopted. To myth, which had been reduced to the status of a 'deception', was opposed the truth of science, and into the place of numerous characters came the character of the teacher and, although not always pressed to its logical conclusion, that of the student.

In Latin didactic poems the detailed prooemia opening each book deserve prime consideration. Both in form and content they may correspond to similarly arranged conclusions at the end of particular books. A definitive influence on the form of these prooemia was exercised by such disparate models as the hymn at one extreme and, at the other, prose prefaces to technical works.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Archimedes (d. 212 B.C.) makes a thoroughgoing use of personal prefaces. In

In them the theme is announced and at least one deity addressed which is especially appropriate to the topic in hand. This creates a difference from the epic address to the Muses, although that too may also occur in didactic poems. In addition we find here the dedication to the addressee who, in contrast to early Greece, is usually at Rome superior in rank to the writer. Virgil's Georgics and subsequent poetry also allow the ruler to appear as the source of divine inspiration.

During the course of the work, a kind of dialogue may be sought with the particular addressee<sup>1</sup> or with the general reader by means of apostrophe, encouragement or admonition.

A certain systematic order is required in the presentation of the material. The division of presentation and argument may be marked by different degrees of emphasis. In Lucretius it is more than clear, while in Horace it is concealed by the art of the sermo.

In detail, the poets present natural phenomena in epic language and lend them nobility and significance with the aid of metaphors and similes taken from human life.

A hymnic introduction, the shifting of address between the dedicatee and the general reader, inserted narratives: these are features already found in Hesiod and recurring in Roman didactic poems. Later, the excursus plays an important part. It may be a narrative episode, such as the story of Orpheus in Virgil's Georgics, a description, such as that of the plague in Lucretius and Virgil, or a rhetorical meditation, such as Lucretius' diatribe against the fear of death and Virgil's Laudes Italiae. Such longer sections often mark the conclusions of books. Lucretius sets a trend by his establishment of mutual links between his prooemia (where there is much detail and employment of opening topoi even shared with prose) and his conclusions; by his use of narrative and exhortatory digressions; and by the formation of a uniform whole out of several books.

An attempt has been made to distinguish between different types<sup>2</sup> of didactic poem. In the type most closely tied to content, as in Lucretius, the form is subservient. In the opposite type, a topic, sometimes abstruse, is forced into a brilliantly treated form, which is the the De sphaera et cylindro, every book has an introductory dedicatory epistle. From Cato's De agricultura on, every Roman technical work is equipped with a prooemium.

---

<sup>1</sup> His role is emphasized by Serv. georg. praef. p. 129 Thilo; a dedication to the princeps or to anyone else is missing in the Ars amatoria.

<sup>2</sup> B. EFFE 1977.

main interest, as in Nicander. In the middle is the 'transparent' type in which the topic certainly has its own significance but points beyond itself, as, for example, Virgil's Georgics use their topic to teach 'civilization'. This effort at grouping is interesting, but open to objection since it presupposes unanimity in the judgment of the form, content and intention of each individual work. In particular instances, however, the relationship of these elements, even within the given poem, is often different, thus affording a special charm. For example, Lucretius' and Ovid's didactic poems are simultaneously concerned with their content, display virtuosity of form, and teach civilized behavior, meaning that they belong to all three types. More might be said along these lines.

For the most part the Romans did not imitate the brevity of Hesiod's poems. In shaping a didactic epic from several books Lucretius was the first poet of this kind to master a large-scale form which paved the way for Virgil's Georgics, and even for the Aeneid. The didactic poem on the large scale structured in several books is a Roman creation.

In Lucretius' case, his imitation of the pre-Socratics was not a parade of classicizing or archaizing taste, but a consequence of the fact that he was profoundly impressed with the greatness and significance of his topic. Parallel phenomena in a later period are Juvenal's impassioned satires and the Christian poetry of Prudentius. The transformation of the literary elements of love elegy into didactic by Ovid attracts attention. From the beginning, the elegy had contained didactic features. Solon, Theognis, and Xenophanes illustrate the point. In Ovid's development, the didactic poem corresponded to a growing need for 'universal' presentation. The entire theme of love, traversed as it were empirically by Ovid in the Amores, was now to be treated comprehensively in a Techne. Comedy, satire and parody<sup>1</sup> each play their part. The ars amatoria is influenced by the ars oratoria and its doctrine of decorum (πρέπον) reminiscent of Panaetius. Stories interspersed in Ovid's Ars and Remedia already pointed ahead to his longer narrative works.

Prudentius strongly emphasized elements which are characteristic of Roman literature: personification of ethical qualities; the use of the visible to express the invisible; enigmatic narrative expecting decodification; poetry intended to lead to recognition, that is to teach, and therefore involving the linking of an 'exoteric' story enjoyable for its own sake with a background to be understood 'esoterically'.

---

<sup>1</sup> The element of parody in Ovid must not be overestimated. On the term, E. PÖHLMANN ΠΑΡΩΔΙΑ, Glotta 50, 1972, 144-156.

In their didactic poetry the Romans 'defeated the Greeks on their own most cherished ground, partly by their greater seriousness and partly by their freshness and their poetic talent.'<sup>1</sup>

Language and Style

Homer's poetic and artistic language offered to early Greece a means of expression laying claim to general validity. Since Anaximander had written in prose as early as 547/546 B.C., the Eleatic philosophers felt no external compulsion to employ verse. For Parmenides and Empedocles epic form was much more than a convenient vehicle. Their choice was not determined merely by the fact that the language of poetry was more developed than that of prose. Heraclitus' 'obscurity' also reflected the stage reached by prose in his time. Poetry and philosophy were closely linked, since at that date even philosophical thought was often filled with metaphorical ideas<sup>2</sup> of a strongly visual and imaginative character. Even so it was a novel conception to proclaim purely philosophical doctrines in verse. The Eleatics thus raised the claim to drive the cosmology of Homer and Hesiod from the field, or to outdo Orphic mysteries with those of philosophy.

Typical of Empedocles are numerous repetitions and a wealth of devices which were later to be called 'rhetorical'. Both would be adopted by Lucretius. Greece's greatest philosophical epic poet, Empedocles, was not for nothing made by legend into the teacher of Gorgias the rhetorician and stood on the threshold of the age of prose.

In didactic poetry the hexameter largely prevails. Occasionally, Greek didactic poetry also makes use of the iambic trimeter which permits a less ceremonious language.

Lucretius employed the epic language created by Ennius and boldly developed it further. In his lofty style he follows Ennius. To Lucretius we owe the most impressive reflection of the proemium to the Annales. His philosophical content favored the formation of long periods and the use of coordinating and subordinating particles. Lucretius' formulas of transition were to be definitive for the future.

<sup>1</sup> W. KROLL, RE 24, 1925, 1857.

<sup>2</sup> This visual background is even felt in words such as 'theory' and 'idea'.

The later didactic poets followed the standards he had set, although for the most part they did not imitate the long sentences which he had preferred. Virgil replaced these ample periods with shorter, independent cola. Transitions were made by association. Virgil lent to language a subtlety previously unknown in Latin, allied with a quality of melody and harmony.

In Horace the style of the sermo, the concealment of structure and the mixture of seriousness and humor (σπουδογέλοιον) set the tone.

Ovid's Art of Love, along with the Remedia, forms a cycle of four books which may be compared with the Georgics. It is, however, written in elegiacs, appropriate to its erotic theme.

Ovid, Manilius, and Germanicus adapted the technical achievements of the epic language of their day to their didactic poems.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature<sup>1</sup>

In Hesiod the Muses summon the poet and bestow on him knowledge, for they can proclaim fine appearance (lies) but also truth. The poet however is not simply a mouthpiece. He comes forward with his own individuality; actually, in the Works and Days he speaks in the first person and gives his name.<sup>2</sup>

For the pre-Socratics the epic form was not simply a sort of 'honey' intended to sweeten the bitter cup of truth. Rather, for the readers of those days, a valid statement about the nature of the world was hardly conceivable except in rivalry with and challenge to Homer and the founder of didactic poetry, Hesiod.

Parmenides undertakes a spiritual chariot journey, where his doctrine is imparted to him by the god, which means that here the poet also plays the part of student. The initiation of the poet and his indoctrination are one and the same. Accordingly, by an important variation from the statement of Hesiod's Muses, he is able to make valid assertions not only in the realm of truth but also in that of appearance. Empedocles entreats the Muse for her help (VS 31 B 3, 5; 31 B 131), but presents his thoughts to his addressee Pausanias with great self-confidence and on his own responsibility. The superhuman figure of Pythagoras may be added. He was praised as an eminent teacher, and offered a model for Lucretius' 'divinization' of his master Epicurus. The praises of the wise man (VS 31 B 132) were to be taken up by Virgil (georg. 2. 490).

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 44-62.

<sup>2</sup> W. KRANZ, Sphragis. Ichform und Namensiegel als Eingangs- und Schlußmotiv antiker Dichtung, RhM 104, 1961, 3-46; 97-124, now in: W.K., Studien 27-78.

Aratus began, like Hesiod in the Works and Days, with a hymn to Zeus. The Muse was invoked only at the end of the prooemium, and in the course of the work remained without significance. No one was named as addressee, but there were editions<sup>1</sup> with dedication to the ruler, as became customary later at Rome.

The prologue to Callimachus' Aetia enunciated the principle of 'fine-spun' poetry, which exercised influence on many later poets. The 'dialogue with the Muses' which he employed was an important artistic device recurring in Ovid and others.

Nicander was aware that he was a fellow countryman of and successor to Homer, but he abandoned the Muses. His prooemia, written in personal tones, are directed to named friends. It is from him that, in many cases, Roman didactic poets from Virgil on adopted the concluding personal 'sphragis'.

Unlike the practice in the narrative epic, in Roman didactic poems it was not primarily poetic deities such as the Muses or Apollo that were invoked, but gods who were patrons of the topic in hand. In his Georgics Virgil turned to the protectors of agriculture: in the Art of Love Ovid invoked Venus,<sup>2</sup> and in the Metamorphoses the heavenly authors of change, which means that in this respect the Metamorphoses are close to didactic poetry. Even Lucretius, in spite of his Epicureanism, invoked Venus, who governed the cosmos. At the same time, however, he also honored his true inspirer, his quasi-divine teacher, Epicurus. By contrast Horace, given the closeness of his Letter to the Pisones to the sermo, kept his feet firmly on the ground, actually ridiculing at the end of the Ars Poetica (false) claims to inspiration.

The didactic poets' views of their function vary in accordance with the political change from Republic to Empire. Lucretius, like Callimachus, felt that he was breaking new ground in poetry. He hesitated between a concept of inspiration which converted rudiments of Bacchic imagery to the purposes of secular fame, and a picture of the poet as physician. Somewhat in the fashion of the diatribe, he declared that poetic adornment was just a means to make palatable to the reader his dose of the bitter medicine of philosophical instruction.<sup>1</sup> At the same time Lucretius in retrospect created a stylized picture of the Hellenistic poet Ennius, the disciple of Homer, as the father of didactic poetry at Rome.

<sup>1</sup> Achilles, Commentarii fragmentum, pp. 80–81 MAASS.

<sup>2</sup> In the course of the work, however, the Muses and the language of inspiration gain in importance. In the Remedia, Apollo is god both of healing and of poetry. The Fasti, a composite poem in succession to the Aetia of Callimachus (on which J. F. MILLER, Ovid's Elegiac Festivals. Studies in the Fasti, Frankfurt 1991, esp. 8–13: The Poetics of the Fasti) and the Halieutica, whose genuineness is disputed, can only be mentioned in passing here. Ovid sees his ingenium as a counter-instance to Augustus (trist. 3. 7).

Virgil's creativity was not based on the confidence of freedom, but on the power of humility; he felt himself to be a priest of the Muses. Not a teacher of wisdom, but Augustus was his source of inspiration; in this respect, Virgil reversed the intellectual emancipation which had animated his predecessor. The invocation of the ruler in the imperial period was to spread from didactic poetry to narrative epic.

An appeal to the 'competent' gods,<sup>2</sup> the promotion of the addressee to an inspiring divinity, was already found in Virgil. He invoked the Muses,<sup>3</sup> and he saw himself as their priest, in contexts which rise beyond the narrow limit of the Georgics. The Nicandrian sphragis (Verg. georg. 4. 563-566) also belongs to tradition, as does his rejection of mythical topics already exhausted (3. 3-4).

Horace's Ars Poetica has its own, quite different background. Its subject links it to Neoptolemus of Parium, its place in the history of its genre to the literary discussions in Lucilius. Within Horace's oeuvre, it grows from the same soil as the Satires and Epistles, in which literary themes became increasingly more important. On this path, the Ars Poetica marked a particular stage, although not perhaps the last.

In Manilius the princeps was the source of inspiration, although the Muses also played their part. His reflections on subject matter and form reveal a Lucretian awareness. In Germanicus, too, the ruler acts as inspirer.

The poet of the Aetna was inspired by reality (res oculique docent; res

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 44-62.

<sup>2</sup> In this way, Grattius, who wrote the Cynegetica, would appeal to Diana as goddess of the hunt, and Ovid to Venus as goddess of love. Neither of them however needed a Maecenas. For editions of the Cynegetica, see P. I. ENK (TC), Hildesheim 1976 (with index); R. VERDIÈRE (TTC), 2 vols., Wetteren 1963 (with index); C. FORMICOLA (TTC), Bologna 1988. Concordance: C. FORMICOLA, Bologna 1988.

<sup>3</sup> Hesiod's Muses could proclaim truth and/or falsehood. Horace finds perfection in the mixture of the sweet with the useful.

ipsae credere cogunt./Quin etiam tactus moneat..., 'Facts and your eyes instruct you; facts unaided compel belief. Nay, they would instruct you by touch'; 191-192). Here he showed himself the successor of Ovid, but he also followed Lucretius and Manilius. The rejection of poetic fantasy recalls satirists such as Persius and Juvenal.

Prudentius formulated an idea of the Christian poet.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas II

The world of ideas in didactic poetry is not exhausted by its particular subject matter. Beyond differences caused by topic, this poetry raises shared questions of cultural history and cultural philosophy.

In the Theogony, the element of reflection was more strongly emphasized than in Homer. Hesiod attempted to use thought to grasp the world of the gods as a system of genealogies. His epic narrative was linked with science.

The intellectual set-up of the Georgics may be compared with that of the De rerum natura. The objective teaching of a particular topic enlarges its compass to take in the presentation of the world and of man in general. In this, Virgil forgets as little as Lucretius the material side. His didactic poem deals primarily, not with the fate of man and of the Roman people, but with that of nature under man's hand.

Such disparate works as Lucretius' De rerum natura, Virgil's Georgics, and even Ovid's Ars amatoria display connecting themes: the behavior of man in various natural and cultural contexts, his exposed nature or again his ability to master his fate by reflection and planning.

Should we conform to nature or conquer it? The answers given to such questions differ according to the object of the work and the attitude of the author, but in general didactic poetry shows an anthropological approach predominantly determined by reason. The modern theme of 'man and technology' is already rehearsed against different backgrounds.

Horace and Ovid in their specialized didactic poems employed a largely secular language, although it may be that in their demand for self-knowledge, expressed in varied ways, a piece of secularized religion may be detected.

A dedication to the princeps or to any other single person is missing in the Ars amatoria.

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 266-276.

It was Lucretius who showed the greatest strictness in excluding the traditional theological dimension. He denied the divinity of the universe, and in courageously modern tones he ascribed to his teacher Epicurus the role of intellectual liberator which secured for the latter in popular parlance the divine rank of a redeemer. For Lucretius, Epicurus had a function similar to that of Pythagoras for Empedocles. Trying to liberate thinking men through philosophy, Lucretius became the most radical of all Roman didactic poets. The emancipation from static institutions in this case went unusually far for ancient notions. Only the late Republican period and, in another way, pre-Constantinian Christianity, granted the individual so broad an area of freedom.

In the wide-ranging didactic works of Virgil and Manilius, the philosophical basis was differently compounded in each case from Stoic and Platonic or neo-Pythagorean elements. This corresponded to the efforts at restoration propagated by the early Imperial period; in any case, religious elements were once again quite clearly in evidence. The natural universe and the political ruler of the world were divine. In the late Imperial period, the intriguing influence of Lucretius' theology of liberation on Christian authors fell precisely into the time before the Church became an organ of state. The Christian renewal of didactic poetry was, however, no longer marked by the spirit of Lucretius. Late antiquity and the Middle Ages built further on the self-contained political and natural universe described by Virgil.

In its highest expressions, didactic poetry preserved its task of offering instruction about a particular topic, but beyond this gave in poetic form a picture of the world and of man as a whole.

L. L. ALBERTSEN, Das Lehrgedicht. Eine Geschichte der antikisierenden Sachepik in der neueren deutschen Literatur, Aarhus 1967. * V. BUCHHEIT, Der Anspruch des Dichters in Vergils Georgika. Dichtertum und Heilsweg, Darmstadt 1972. * D. L. DURLING, Georgic Tradition in English Poetry, Washington (1935) 1964. * B. EFFE, Dichtung und Lehre. Untersuchungen zur Typologie des antiken Lehrgedichts, München 1977. * B. FABIAN, Die didaktische Dichtung in der englischen Literaturtheorie des 18. Jh., in: FS W. FISCHER, Heidelberg 1959, 65–92. * B. FABIAN, Das Lehrgedicht als Problem der Poetik, in: Die nicht mehr schönen Künste, ed. by H. R. JAUSS, München 1968, 67–89. * G. GORDON, Virgil in English Poetry, London 1931, repr. 1970 and 1974. * H. KLEPL, Lukrez und Vergil in ihren Lehrgedichten. Vergleichende Interpretationen, diss. Leipzig 1940, repr. 1964. * W. KROLL, Lehrgedicht, RE 12, 2 (24) 1925, 1842–1857. * KROLL, Studien

185–201. * E. PÖHLMANN, Charakteristika des römischen Lehrgedichts, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 813–901. * RUTTKOWSKI: s. List of Abbr. * SENGLÉ: s. List of Abbr. * C. SIEGRIST, Das Lehrgedicht der Aufklärung, Stuttgart 1974. * B. SPIECKER, James Thomsons Seasons und das römische Lehrgedicht. Vergleichende Interpretationen, Nürnberg 1975.

LUCRETIIUS

Life and Dates

T. Lucretius Carus was born at the beginning of the 1st century B.C. and died in the middle of the fifties.<sup>1</sup> The dedication of his work to Memmius, who may well be the propraetor of Bithynia mentioned by Catullus, need not point to a relationship of client and patron or to the poet's lowly origin. Lucretius assumes the tone of a Roman speaking to Romans. He was still young when he experienced the civil war between Marius and Sulla, along with its proscriptions (cf. 3. 70–71). He was in his thirties when Pompey was campaigning in the east and the Catilinarian conspiracy was suppressed by Cicero. Towards the end of his life, Caesar was winning successes in Gaul. This serious climate of contemporary events helped to stamp Lucretius' work. It begins with a prayer for peace and ends with a description of the plague written in the gloomy language of Thucydides.

The links which had bound Roman society of old were now loosening, and all paths were open to the individual, if he had the desire. The hour appeared to be at hand for a doctrine whose liberating message could only now, if at all, be understood at Rome. Lucretius became a convert to philosophy. With the same free choice, Catullus embraced love, Caesar absolute power, and Nigidius mysticism. Each of these extraordinarily unconventional Romans discovered and fashioned for himself his own world. The choice by Lucretius was not the worst, and in his decision he was not unique. Businessmen like Atticus, who financed the great men of politics and literature alike; bookworms like Philodemus wavering between venomous prose and flirtatious epigrams; penpushers like Amafinius who produced bad Latin with good intentions; snobs like Memmius who sought from the Epicureans not edification but ground for an edifice (Cic. fam. 13. 1); bonvivants like Caesar's stepfather Piso Frugi, frugal in name only; and even active politicians such as L. Manlius Torquatus and, not least, Caesar himself and his assassin Cassius: each of these men during those troubled times in his own way inclined towards Epicureanism, although none of them with the heartfelt commitment of Lucretius.

<sup>1</sup> According to Jerome (chron. 1923 p. 49 and 2 p. xxiv HELM), Lucretius was born in 96 B.C. (so MS A) or 94 B.C., and died at the age of 44. Donatus' Life of Virgil asserts (p. 8) that this happened when Virgil assumed the toga virilis 'during the second consulship of Pompey and Crassus' (55 B.C.) and, in fact, 'at the age of 17' (53 B.C.). This points with great probability to dates for Lucretius' life of 96–53 B.C. (P. GRIMAL, Le poème de Lucrèce dans son temps, in: Lucrèce. Huit exposés . . . 233–270). Others prefer 98–55 B.C. However, Cicero's letter (ad Q. fr. 2. 10 [9] 4) of 54 B.C. does not prove that Lucretius was already dead. Quite conjectural remarks about Lucretius' homeland are found in L. A. HOLLAND, Lucretius and the Transpadanes, Princeton 1979. The so-called Borgia Vita was composed in the Renaissance.

Though it is not clear whether Lucretius was still alive when Memmius threw in his lot with Caesar, the poet must not be viewed in isolation. He was a part of the circle of Epicureans who would soon gather around the dictator. Piso's 'father confessor' Philodemus would place himself at the dictator's service and write a treatise On the Good King in Homer. Aeneadam genetrix in Lucretius' prooemium, which certainly belongs to the latest portions of his work, strikes a prophetic note to be echoed later by Virgil.

Like a sensitive instrument, the poet reacted to the intellectual and moral situation of his time. A keen observer, he was by no means detached from life. In the theater, he liked to mingle with the audience,<sup>1</sup> and he was appreciative of music. Jerome's anecdote (chron. 1923) that Lucretius was driven mad by a love potion, that he wrote his poem in lucid moments, and that he eventually committed suicide, must be classed with a thousand other edifying tales about philosophers. The recipe is simple: take a polemical metaphor in Lactantius (opif. 6. 1) literally (delirat Lucretius); then mix it tastelessly with the *noctes serena*e of Lucretius 1. 142 and the description of eros in the 4th book.

In 54 B.C. the work was already in Cicero's hands (ad Q. fr. 2. 10 [9] 4), who for this reason, at least since Jerome,<sup>2</sup> has been assigned the role of reviser or even editor. The double statement of subject matter ('table of contents') in the 1st book<sup>3</sup> and the reference back to the 2nd book in the 4th (4. 45–53), which may have been allowed to stand by an oversight, seems to speak in favor of another sequence of books in the original concept<sup>1</sup> in which 4 would have followed 2. But Lucretius was not obliged to produce precise tables of contents to his work. Many scholars believe that books 1, 2, and 5, containing addresses to Memmius, are older than 6, 4, and 3.<sup>2</sup> However this does not take us very far, since the author must have revised his work several times. There is no doubt that the work as a whole is unfinished: for example, Lucretius never keeps his promise to discuss the gods in detail (5. 155)<sup>3</sup> (s. also Transmission).

<sup>1</sup> L. R. TAYLOR, Lucretius and the Roman Theatre, in: FS G. NORWOOD, Toronto 1952, 147-155.

<sup>2</sup> In his supplement to the chron. of Eusebius, ed. Helm 1913, 149.

<sup>3</sup> 1. 54-57 correspond to books 5, 2 and 1; 1. 127-135 to books 6, 5, 3 and 4.

Survey of Work

I: After an invocation to Venus, Lucretius announces his theme: atoms; coming to be and passing away. Epicurus is the great conqueror of fear of the gods (religio). As further themes, without precisely anticipating their later sequence, Lucretius mentions the nature of the soul (whose immortality was accepted for example by Ennius), along with meteorology and the doctrine of sense perceptions. He emphasizes further the difficulty of handling scientific questions in Latin (1–148).

Nothing can arise from nothing, and nothing can disappear into nothing (149–264). There must be invisible atoms and empty space: a third principle is excluded. Time itself has no independent significance (265–482). The atoms are solid, eternal, and indivisible. The original matter is neither fire (as wrongly believed by Heraclitus), nor any other individual element. Nor is it Empedocles' four elements. The homoiomeria of Anaxagoras is also to be rejected (483–920).

In a new proemium, the poet presents himself as a 'physician' (921–950). Space and matter are infinite, and the atoms do not move towards a center (951–1117).

2: Wisdom and freedom from fear are attained by the knowledge of nature

<sup>1</sup> Or for a planned re-ordering? In that case, the transmitted sequence of books must have been the original: L. GOMPF 1960.

<sup>2</sup> An account of research on this question in A. MÜHL, Die Frage der Entstehung von Lukrezens Lehrgedicht, Helikon 8, 1968, 477–484. G. B. TOWNEND, The Original Plan of Lucretius' De rerum natura, CQ 73, n.s. 29, 1979, 101–111, assumes that books 3 and 4 were intended to conclude the work and only at a late stage shifted to its center (1. 127–135); 3. 1 would be linked with the end of 6. This means that he must regard 5. 55–63 as the result of a later revision.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Gerh. MÜLLER, Die fehlende Theologie im Lukreztext, in: Monumentum Chiloniense. FS E. BURCK, Amsterdam 1975, 277–295, esp. 277–278.

(1–61). Atoms are in continual motion either individually or in groups, although their speed is different (62–164). The world was not made by the gods, for it has too many defects (165–183). Atoms fall downwards because of their gravity.<sup>1</sup> Collision which leads to conflict and union is brought about by a small swerve (clinamen) from their vertical course. They are in constant movement, which is not however observable because of their small size (184–332).

As far as the atoms' shape is concerned, the number of forms is limited, but there are infinitely many examples of each type of form (333–568). There is a constant coming into being and disappearance (569–580). No object consists only of atoms of a single kind. The earth, called in myth the mother of the gods, contains many kinds of atoms. Every species of animal draws from its food the nourishment it requires. Not everything may join with everything (581–729). Atoms have no color or smell, and so on. Sentient beings are made up of atoms without sentience (730–1022).

After a linking proem comes the revelation that our world is not unique. No gods are at work in nature, and the earth is in its old age (1023–1174).

3: It was Epicurus who opened Lucretius' eyes to the secrets of nature (1–30). The topic is the essence of the soul and the conquest of the fear of death (31–93).

The animus<sup>2</sup> is a part of man, and not a mere 'harmony' between the parts. Its seat is the human breast. The subservient anima is linked with it and dwells in the whole body (94–160). Both are material. The animus, which is so mobile, is made up of particularly small atoms, a homogeneous mixture of air, wind, warmth, and a fourth nameless substance, the anima animae. The varying proportions of different constituent parts give rise to different temperaments. Body and soul are closely linked. Lucretius rejects the notion that only the soul and not the body is endowed with perception and that, as Democritus believes, the atoms of body and soul are available in equal numbers. The animus is superior to the anima (231–416).

The soul is mortal, for its fine atoms quickly dissolve in the universe. It arises, grows and decays along with the body; and, liable to suffering and divisible as it is, it cannot function without the body. If the soul were immortal, it would have to have five senses. Since amputated limbs at first continue to live, the soul is divisible. We have no memory of previous existences. The soul does not come from outside into the body, but is closely joined to it. Metempsychosis presupposes change, but this contradicts the notion of immortality. The idea that immortal souls at conception stand waiting at the door is laughable (417–829).

<sup>1</sup> Against Aristotle, for whom air and fire move upwards. That in an infinite space there is no upwards and downwards is not recognized.

<sup>2</sup> The capability of thinking and feeling.

Since the soul is mortal, death does not concern us. It is simply the end of perception. The assumption of an afterlife only creates illusions. Nature herself admonishes us to abandon life like satisfied guests. The so-called punishments in the next world are actually pictures of life in the present world. Even the greatest had to die. Restlessness does not bring happiness. What is the point of clinging to life? Death is inescapable (830-1094).

4: The poem here (1-25) was perhaps introduced by the first ancient editor from 1. 926-950. Lucretius now turns to sense perception. Images are emitted from the surface of bodies, and consist of the finest atoms (26-126). There are even pictures which of themselves form in the air (127-142). These pictures can pierce porous materials such as glass, but not thick materials, and they are thrown back by mirrors. They move very quickly (143-215). Without them, sight would be impossible. Lucretius explains why we can estimate the distance of an object from us, and why we see, not the images, but the objects themselves; why the mirror image seems to be behind the mirror; why it is reversed; how mirages come about; why square towers appear round in the distance; and why our shadow follows us (216-378).

In the case of so-called optical illusions, it is not the senses, but the mind interpreting them that goes astray. Whoever believes that we can know nothing, can himself on his own admission know nothing, and so is not entitled to present theories of knowledge. The perceptions of our senses are trustworthy (379-521).

After discussing hearing, taste, smell, and instinctive aversions (522-721), Lucretius examines both mental images and dreams (722-821), and rejects teleological anthropology (822-857). Next come experiences affecting body and soul, such as hunger (858-876), movement as an act of will (877-906), sleep, dream once more and, closely linked with this, sexual love (907-1287).

5: Lucretius hails his master Epicurus as a god and announces the topics of the book (1-90).

The world is transitory, not divine. The gods cannot dwell anywhere in it and did not make it, since it is full of defects, and affords conditions of life unfavorable for man (91-234). Even the elements are subject to change. Our historical memory is short, and new inventions and discoveries continue to be made such as hydraulic organs, Epicurean philosophy and its proclamation in Latin verse. A further proof of the transitoriness of everything is the fact that because of catastrophes knowledge of older periods has been lost to us. Only atoms and the void are eternal. The struggle of the elements may end, for example, in a universal conflagration such as that caused by Phaethon, or in a Flood (235-415).

The world arose in a tempest from a mixture of the most varied atoms. They flew apart and like found like. The elements are organized according to their weight (416-508). Neglecting the serious science of his own time, Lucretius gave a 'multi-causal' explanation of astronomy with the aid of Epicurus and his sources. The sun is hardly bigger than it appears to us, and perhaps is born anew at every dawn. The moon possibly has its own light. Its phases may also be determined by the interposition of another heavenly body, and so on (509–771).

The discussion turns to the origin of plants, birds, and beasts. The last were formed by primal conception in the maternal womb of a still fertile earth. Many creatures were not capable of life, and only the strong, cunning or quick survived. There were never composite creatures such as centaurs (772–924).

After the time of primal men, a civilized life began with houses, clothing, hearth fire, and family (925–1027). Language was not created by an individual, but arose gradually in accordance with the principle of utility (1028–1090). Once man had learned to control fire, wise kings founded cities. After the discovery of gold, riches came to replace strength and beauty. Following the fall of kings, law and legal institutions began to develop (1091–1160).

Men receive knowledge of the gods by visions of their exalted forms. By contrast with true piety, which is accompanied by inner tranquility, ignorance produces erroneous fear of the gods, as for example in the face of lightning and other threats to our existence (1161–1240).

Metallurgy, riding, war chariots, even those equipped with scythes, were invented, and elephants and other beasts were employed in battle (1241–1349). At the end came weaving, agriculture, music, astronomy, literature, and the plastic arts. But greed and the frenzy of war darken the picture of progress (1350–1457).

6: Athens is the home of agriculture, of laws and of the great teacher Epicurus (1–41). The topic of the book is meteorology, and the poet begs the Muse Calliope for her help (43–95).

There follow explanations of thunder and lightning (96–422), waterspouts (423–450), clouds, rain, snow, hail (451–534), earthquakes (535–607), the circulation of water (608–638), and volcanic activity (639–702). After an incidental remark about multi-causal explanation (703–711), Lucretius discusses the flooding of the Nile, Avernus and certain remarkable springs (712–905), as well as the magnet (906–1089). In conclusion, Lucretius discusses sicknesses, notably the Athenian plague (1090–1286).

Sources, Models, and Genres

With religious fervor (e.g. 5. 1–54) Lucretius declares his allegiance to Epicurus. It is natural that there should be numerous points of contact with the writings of the master and with his model, Democritus.<sup>1</sup> It is furthermore likely that Lucretius knew lost works of more recent Epicureans, and it may be to these that he owes his scientific knowledge, which often goes beyond that of Epicurus. He may perhaps also draw partly upon works from other philosophical schools, or from scientific handbooks. Whenever some of his interpretations are in contradiction with Epicurus' basic doctrines, the last alternative offers the most plausible explanation.

We should also consider medical sources. Lucretius shared with Empedocles his interest in medicine and, more generally, in physical explanation of nature, and Empedocles had been the subject of 22 books written by the Epicurean Hermarchus. Lucretius found a precise medical description of the Athenian plague in Thucydides. There are striking agreements in his poem with the doctor Asclepiades<sup>2</sup> of Bithynia who visited Rome shortly before 91 B.C., and whom therefore Lucretius may have met. It is to him that Lucretius owed his corpuscular explanation of illnesses (4. 664–671), his corpuscular doctrine of nutrition (6. 946–947; 1. 859–866) and many another telling detail.<sup>3</sup> There are also medical parallels to the experiment with woollen cloths (1. 305–310) and to the proof of the materiality of air (1. 271–279). Ultimately, such information goes back in part to older sources, for example, to Democritus.

Lucretius is critical of Heraclitus, but also of Empedocles, Anaxagoras and the revered Democritus. It is plausible to suppose that doxographers acted as intermediaries here, just as Epicurus had drawn on Theophrastus. The poet challenges Stoic theories (e.g. 3. 359–369) and, even when he uses Heraclitus' name it is perhaps at them that he is aiming. He criticizes Plato's mistrust of sense perception (4. 379–468) and rejects the cosmological proof for the existence of God propounded by the followers of Aristotle (2. 1024–1043). It is true that he rejected teleological patterns of thought as developed by the Peripatos and of the Stoa, but even so, through his metaphors and the ideas he drew from ancient natural science, features of vitalism and hylozoism crept in.

As a didactic poem, the De rerum natura is part of a venerable generic tradition, going back to Hesiod (8th/7th century) and the pre-Socratics. His choice of verse form was not a foregone conclusion, given the ambivalent attitude of Epicureanism to belles lettres, although in the eyes of Roman readers naturally a grand topic demanded an appropriate form. Hellenistic didactic poetry, often dedicated to insignificant themes such as cosmetics and snake poisons, could in this respect be of no use to the poet. Even so, Callimachean poetics left its traces in him, and his introductory hymn to Venus is comparable to the Hymn to Zeus opening Aratus' Phaenomena. By contrast with Aratus, however, Lucretius was an expert in his field. Convinced as he was of the importance of Epicurean physics for humanity, he had no choice but to follow the grand style of the pre-Socratics. It was in the 'epic' meter that Parmenides (5th century B.C.) and Empedocles (d. about 423 B.C.) offered their picture of the world. Lucretius' title De rerum natura is a Latin form of the Greek Περὶ φύσεως. Empedocles, the poetic master of physics was, in spite of the differences of doctrine, much more for Lucretius than a mere literary model. Assured of the importance of his message for his readers, Lucretius chose a 'high' style, sometimes giving it a religious tone by evoking, for example, the Homeric hymn to Aphrodite (l. 1-61). Thus he came to create a philosophical didactic poem on the level of those of the pre-Socratics. It was appropriate that in Latin, Ennius, the founder of hexameter poetry at Rome, should be his admired predecessor.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. 2. 1–3 Epicurus apud Cic. fin. 1. 62; Democritus VS 68 B 191.

<sup>2</sup> A. STÜCKELBERGER 1984, esp. 149–156.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. 2. 760–771; 4. 680–681; 6. 794–796; 6. 1114–1115.

An unusual feature is the mixture of the 'high' style with that of the popular philosophical sermon, the diatribe. This sub-literary genre, which can be traced to Bion of Borysthenes (d. about 255 B.C.), favors colorful expressions and imaginary dialogue. Superficially it could be described as a moral, admonitory thesis<sup>1</sup> or as a declamation with dialogical overtones. Sections written in the style of diatribe, for example, at the beginning of the 2nd and at the end of the 3rd and 4th books, are reminiscent of Lucilius and Philodemus, and prepare the way for Horace and Juvenal. The end of the 3rd book is a diatribe rather than a consolatio.<sup>2</sup>

The fact that each book has its own proem possibly reflects a Hellenistic mannerism which had been adopted by Roman technical writers from the very start.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. THROM, Die Thesis. Ein Beitrag zu ihrer Entstehung und Geschichte, Paderborn 1932; s. also BONNER, Declamation; a survey of research on the diatribe and related questions is found in: K. BERGER, Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament, ANRW 2, 25, 2, 1984, 1031-1432, esp. 1124-1132.

<sup>2</sup> B. P. WALLACH 1976.

<sup>3</sup> E. PÖHLMANN, Charakteristika (s. The Didactic Poem) 888.

It may be mentioned incidentally that Lucretius was also acquainted with tragedy, comedy, and epigram.

Literary Technique

A comparison with Epicurus shows that Lucretius was original in lending to his work clear structure, striking argumentation and a uniform style. His literary achievement is considerable. There are three pairs of books. The first and last pair deal with the world around us and basically take a stand against fear of the gods.<sup>1</sup> The central books are concerned with human psychology. But this 'central' structure is overlaid by one that amounts to a progression effecting a carefully calculated climax from proem to proem: Epicurus appears successively as man and liberator (book 1), as a father figure in the Roman sense (book 3), as a god (book 5), and finally as the culmination of history and the noblest flower of Athens (book 6). As far as we know, a hexameter poem of such dimensions had never before been conceived in Rome in such calculated and convincing terms. This achievement would become a point of departure for Virgil.

Each book is carefully composed as a whole. The arrangement of the material and of the arguments, like the choice of images, is Lucretius' own work. In the 5th book, which sets out to combine the results of science with Epicurean philosophy, a particularly difficult literary task was successfully accomplished.

Each book has its own proem, with the exception of the 4th, which draws its proem from the 1st book. The proems are solemn. Sometimes, as in the hymn to Venus (1. 1-61) or in the eulogy of Epicurus (5. 1-54) the tone is religious. The reader must be prepared to listen to a sublime discourse that will change his life. After the proems in the narrower sense there follows the propositio, sometimes developed by digressions. Thus in the 1st book the introductory prayer to Venus gives over to the dedication to Memmius (50-53; 136-145). The similarly divided announcement of the themes of the entire work fits into this framework (54-61; 127-135). In the center is the defense against the reproach of impietas (80-101), flanked by the praise of Epicurus (62-79) and the warning against the dicta vatium with the praise of Ennius (102-126). The whole displays an artistic ring-composition.

---

<sup>1</sup> The final theme of the 2nd book signposts that of book 5.

Throughout the whole work certain leitmotifs, such as the creative power of nature, the emancipation from religio through scientific study of nature, along with problems of method, are introduced step by step. Especially in transitional paragraphs and intermediate proems, Lucretius continually develops his thoughts concerning the significance of conclusions leading from the visible to the invisible, the task of poetry in philosophical teaching, the finding of adequate Latin for philosophical terms, and the progressive absorption of the subject matter by the reader. In the 1st and 2nd books the finales are set apart by intermediate proems (1. 921–950; 2. 1023–1047).

Usually the proems are followed by transitional passages, announcing the theme of the book. They are fixed components of the total structure and connect the proem closely with its book. But the proems also are interconnected, and composed one in the light of another. These observations leave little hope for any analysis aiming to detect layers of composition.

Just as the proems serve to prepare the reader for the book to come and guide him through the work, the excursuses in their turn are both points of rest and occasions for deeper reflection. Examples are those dealing with the Mother of the gods and the punishments in the underworld, and the detailed description of the plague in the last book.

Passages in the style of the diatribe break up the monotony of scientific presentation. The second proem is an example, as are the long concluding passages of the 3rd and 4th books. The combination of the style of diatribe with epic dignity turns Lucretius into a harbinger of the 'tragic' satire of Juvenal. In such sections, there is rich use of rhetorical devices. To combat the fear of death, nature is personified (3. 931); or, to destroy erotic passion, there is rhetorical division (μερισμός, cf. 4. 1072–1191) and distraction (avocatio, cf. 4. 1063–1064; 1072). Long parts of the 5th book have a vividness seldom found even in science fiction (evidentia).

Proems and conclusions are interrelated, often by contrast, as for example in books 2, 3 and 6, and even in book 5.<sup>1</sup> There are also links between different books. The story of civilization in the 5th book culminates in the praise of Athens at the start of the 6th, and the theme of the end of the 1st book acts as a preliminary to the

<sup>1</sup> H. KLEPL, Lukrez und Virgil in ihren Lehrgedichten. Vergleichende Interpretationen, diss. Leipzig 1940, 127–128.

2nd. The effort to analyze each book 'rhetorically' by using the scheme prooemium, narratio or argumentatio, peroratio, does not add anything to what has been already observed, and, above all, a separation of narratio and argumentatio would be artificial.

In the principal portions of his work, Lucretius uses an attractively clear structure. As a teacher, he guides his readers carefully. Signposts indicate divisions. Nunc age is often used to introduce a new section, while subsections begin with terms such as praeterea. He shows a masterly control of the art of disputation. His technique of analogy may be emphasized, especially his conclusions leading from the large to the small scale and from the visible to the invisible.<sup>1</sup> But his 'apagogic proof' must also be mentioned, showing that if the opposite is assumed absurd consequences follow. Since in such cases the criterion is not contradiction of an accepted premise but empirical impossibility, Lucretius may show a certain humor. An example would be the laughing atoms (2. 976-990).

Each thesis is illumined from different sides, for example by positive and negative formulation, by illustration, by resumption, refutation of the opposite, contrary example, summary as a return to the beginning. As means of discovery and proof, Lucretius employs numerous similes. They are derived partly from philosophical traditions, as, for example, the dust particles dancing in the sunshine owed to Democritus (2. 109-141), and partly from medical sources (s. Sources). Yet he is able to lend them the life and charm springing from observation. The power of visual suggestion is more strongly developed in him than in many other Roman poets. Occasionally, he allows proofs to make their effect by sheer quantity, as when he adduces some 30 arguments for the mortality of the soul (3. 417-829). In accordance with rhetorical principles, he likes to set the most impressive proof at the end.

Acoustic suggestion is accomplished by a consciously employed technique of repetition. Like Empedocles, Lucretius uses this method to drive home what is important. Since such repetition continually happens on the small scale, we should perhaps take into account the possibility of deliberate repetitions even in the case of larger sections. However, the resumption of the whole of the intermediate proem of the 1st book at the start of the 4th book can hardly be justified in this way.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. P. H. SCHRIJVERS 1978.

Language and Style

Language and style are primarily at the service of the subject matter. As a linguistic innovator<sup>1</sup> and as a master in creative semantic close copies of Greek terms out of Latin components (calques), shown in such examples as rerum natura and primordia rerum, Lucretius may be compared only with Ovid or Cicero.

His chief aim in style, in agreement with Epicurean principles, is clarity (cf. Ideas I). He takes this demand very seriously. Content and linguistic form in him are indivisible. For example, tmesis (1. 452 seque gregari) is a linguistic illustration of the idea that division is impossible. Rhythm and sound closely mirror the message. Play on words has a deeper sense, as when fire (ignis) seems to be concealed in logs (lignis).

In Lucretius' language and style, a modern Hellenistic awareness of art unites with the tradition of Ancient Latin to form a new and indissoluble whole. An example of a syntactic novelty, gaining ground simultaneously in both Lucretius and Catullus, is the 'Greek accusative'. Conversely, Lucretius looks archaic to us since he sparingly uses the patterns of verbal architecture abounding later in the lines of Cicero and the Augustans. As in Ennius, though contrary to classical usage, more than one adjective may be used with a noun.<sup>2</sup> The long periods stretching over several verses also have the 'old-fashioned' air of earlier Latin.<sup>3</sup> This feature must be connected with his 'prosaic' and argumentative content. To this corresponds a wealth of connecting particles only rarely found in poetry. The tension between the passion and vivacity of the language and the lavish

---

<sup>1</sup> Abstracts formed with -men and -tus, noun formations with -cola and -gena, adverbs with -tim and -per, adjectives with -fer and -ger; J. PERRON, Observations sur les dérivés en -men. Mots en -men et mots en -tus chez Lucrèce, REL 33, 1955, 333–343; on language and style: W. S. MAGUINNESS, The Language of Lucretius, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., 1965, 69–93; L. WALD, Considérations sur la distribution des formes archaïques chez Lucrèce, Helicon 8, 1968, 161–173; J. VONLAUFEN, Studien über Form und Gebrauch des lateinischen Relativsatzes unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Lukrez, Freiburg (Switzerland) 1974; G. CARLOZZO, L'uso dell'ablativo assoluto in Lucrezio, Pan 4, 1976, 21–49; C. SALEMME, Strutture foniche nel De rerum natura di Lucrezio, QUCC n.s. 5, 1980, 91–106; G. CARLOZZO, L'aggettivo esornativo in Lucrezio, Pan 8, 1987, 31–53; G. CARLOZZO, Il participio in Lucrezio, Palermo 1990.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. 2. 1–8; 3. 405, 413; 5. 13; 24–25.

<sup>3</sup> The thesis of an increase of enjambement between books 1, 2, 5 on the one side and 4, 3, 6 on the other (K. BÜCHNER 1936) has not remained unchallenged, e.g. L. GOMPF 1960.

employment of logical connections, with their element of restraint, produces an effect of 'restrained energy' which opens for Latin a new dimension of sublimity.

The numerous and carefully placed spondees<sup>1</sup> make an essential contribution to this effect. They are a decorative feature of τὸ σεμνόν. Lucretius' preference for the pure dactyl<sup>2</sup> in the first foot was to set a trend. His care in the handling of the fourth foot prepares the way for Virgil's art. In the use of archaisms, metrical convenience plays a part, as for example in the interchange between sorsum, seorsum, and sorsus within four lines (4. 491–494), although it may have struck ancient readers as a particular 'Hellenistic' refinement. As a poeta doctus, Lucretius still ventures, as did Ennius, literally to 'split up' words, a license which Augustan taste would find unacceptable.<sup>3</sup> Occasionally, although not too often, he uses the old mannerism of allowing final -s not to make position, or he uses the ponderous feminine genitive singular in -ai, the elegant genitive plural in -um (instead of -orum) and the dactylic infinitive in -ier. Even so, the 'regular' forms are incomparably more frequent. Words of four to five syllables at the end of the line are not strictly avoided.

Although Lucretius' style as a whole is not archaic, again and again we find archaizing effects which serve to emphasize the importance of his teachings by lofty diction in the tradition of Ennius or Empedocles. A work περὶ φύσεως has the character of a revelation. Particularly in his proems, Lucretius employs elements of the language of prayer and of the mysteries. In this context we may mention that, in hymnic sections, out of pious deference he avoids using the name of his 'god', Epicurus; he names him only when dealing with the mortal nature of his teacher (3. 1042).

For Lucretius poetry and rhetoric were not mutually exclusive. It was quite natural for a didactic text to contain numerous rhetorical elements; this had been true ever since Empedocles who, for this very reason, was regarded a teacher of the rhetor Gorgias. Lucretius, to whom everything commonplace is alien, can even ennoble the diatribe, just as conversely he animates scientific language with imaginative life. Cross-connections between physics and ethics arise because of the uniform vocabulary he applies in both these disciplines. The poet's store of metaphors is particularly telling, as when, for example, he employs images of weaving to describe the atomic structure of the world, or of rivers to denote the movement of atoms. Images from the organic world, human society,<sup>1</sup> and war are drawn into the world of atoms. The breath of poetry lends to macrocosm, nature, and Mother Earth a greater life than Epicurean doctrine allows (e.g. 5. 483–488; cf. 5. 827), a language occasionally reminiscent of Posidonius. This helps the reader to get rid of his fear of the physical universe. Metaphors and similes are artistically interwoven. Here, too, Lucretius displays a mastery of persuasion and conviction.

<sup>1</sup> J. PAULSON, Lucrezstudien 1. Die äußere Form des lucretianischen Hexameters, Göteborg 1897.

<sup>2</sup> C. DUBOIS, La métrique de Lucrèce comparée à celle de ses prédécesseurs Ennius et Lucilius, Strasbourg 1933; W. ORT, Metrische Analysen zu Lukrez, De rerum natura Buch 1, Tübingen 1974.

<sup>3</sup> Inter quaecumque pretantur (4. 832).

The poet's art of repetition, learned from Empedocles, also aims at psychological effect. It is found throughout the work, both on the large scale (s. Literary Technique) and on the small. Examples are the 'musical' echos using word repetition (e.g. 3. 11–13). The poet uses as leitmotifs, for example, his picture of children in the dark,<sup>2</sup> his simile of letters,<sup>3</sup> and the polarity of decay and growth.<sup>4</sup>

It is tempting to draw a distinction between the more sober style of scientific exposition and the emotional character of other sections, as for example the conclusion of book 3. But there are overlaps. The 'everlasting charm' (1. 28) cannot be imparted to individual sections but rather permeates the whole like a dye (1. 934). Even in the argumentative portions, the voice is that of a poet, on whose lips nothing resounds more loftily than the language of facts.

As a stylist, Lucretius combines Ennius' gift of evoking motions and gestures through rhythm with the sharp eye of Ovid, and the grand sweep of Virgil or Lucan. The collaboration of sight, sound, and gesture produces in the dance of sounds a plastic movement of language which both promotes the message and yet possesses its own inimitable nobility.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. concilium, leges, foedera.

<sup>2</sup> 2. 55–61; 3. 87–93; 6. 35–41.

<sup>3</sup> 1. 817–829; 908–914 (interpolation?); 2. 760–762; 1007–1018; 2. 688–699 (interpolation?).

<sup>4</sup> 1. 670–671; 792–793; 2. 753–754; 3. 519–520.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Lucretius' understanding of poetry is different from the playful hedonism displayed in the verses of the Epicurean Philodemus. He adapts the ancient language of inspiration, partly in Callimachean terms.<sup>1</sup> He moves along untrodden paths.

Religious motifs are used for secular purposes. Lucretius is inspired by laudis spes magna (1. 923), and therefore not by Dionysus. Even so, at the beginning (1. 1) he appeals to Venus as the goddess appropriate to his theme, as is proper for a didactic poet drawing inspiration from his topic. Yet the thought of the persuasive charms of this goddess is also influential (1. 28; 39–40). Only in the last book does he turn to the Muse Calliope, already invoked by Empedocles,<sup>2</sup> who is to show him the road to fame (6. 92–95).

His declarations on language and literature are couched in sober terms. Language in the beginning developed naturally, always according to the standard of utility. In his eyes, poetry has no value of its own. Its only purpose is to sweeten the message to be communicated to his readers. Here he employs the metaphor of the healing cup of bitter medicine with honey around its edge (1. 936–941).<sup>3</sup> This means that Lucretius, in harmony with an old tradition, thinks of himself as a physician rather than, like Virgil later, as some sort of priest. As the most important quality of his poetry, he emphasizes, in agreement with Epicurus' stylistic demands,<sup>4</sup> clarity (lucida . . . carmina, 1. 933–934). Poetry seems to merge into rhetoric.

In his capacity of good teacher, his aim is to make difficult scientific topics transparent. In this respect his purpose however is to influence a much larger audience than that of Epicurus, although he adapted his text to his Roman audience less thoroughly than Cicero did in his philosophical writings. His employment of myth, metaphors, and

<sup>1</sup> E. J. KENNEY, Doctus Lucretius, Mnemosyne 23, 1970, 366–392; the antithesis between swan and crane 4. 180–182; 909–911 is Hellenistic; the meadow of the Muses is from Choerilus 1. 1–2 KINKEL.

<sup>2</sup> B 131. 3; cf. 3. 3–5 DIELS-KRANZ.

<sup>3</sup> The closest analogy is in Schol. vet. in Hesiodi Opera et dies, p. 1 and 4 Pertusi; cf. Hor. sat. 1. 1. 25–26; Jerome, epist. 128. 1 (not necessarily from Horace. Why not from life?). Somewhat differently applied in Strabo, geogr. 1. 2. 3 (C 15–16), to poetry as philosophy for beginners (Stoic).

<sup>4</sup> Clarity and application of the mot juste (Diog. Laert. 10. 13). Lucretius criticizes Heraclitus for the opposite quality (obscuram linguam 1. 639).

similes is also meant to render his teaching intelligible to his public. Through the visible, Lucretius wants to guide his readers towards the invisible (e.g. 4. 110–122). The reader is to recognize one thing after and from another (alid ex alio 1. 1115). He is to be made aware of the implications of his use of words and myths. Names of gods may be used, if at all, metonymically, as Lucretius himself says when explaining his Stoicizing allegory of the Magna Mater (2. 655–659; 680). The displacement of the punishments of the next world into this sounds like a ‘secular exegesis’, but is perhaps intended as a rationalizing derivation and dissolution of those myths (3. 978–1023).

Along with Epicurus, he holds in awe two great poets in particular. One is a Greek, Empedocles, and the other a Roman, Ennius. He has a profound admiration for both of them, although he does not share their philosophical views. It was with their aid that he formed his sublime style, in their school that he became a poet, and even more is he conscious of being linked with them in the task of bringing enlightenment.

More personal tones, which may indicate self-reflection, are perceptible in his allusions to his sleepless nights,<sup>1</sup> during which he works on his poem. The loneliness<sup>2</sup> of the individual creative artist is an experience of the late Republican period, which finds its voice here. The author may also be observed in the act of writing when he, as it were, looks over his own shoulder, when, as an illustration of his theory of dreams, he tells us that in dreams he sees himself working on his poem (4. 969–970), or giving as an example of modern discoveries the presentation of Epicurus’ philosophy in Latin (5. 336–337).

In all this, Lucretius is compelled to wrestle with his native language, which he criticizes for ‘poverty’<sup>3</sup> (egestas 1. 139; 3. 260) and which in fact he enriches (s. Language and Style). His awareness of language is attested by his illustration of atomic theory from the varied combinations of the letters expressing sounds. He may have entertained the notion of not only communicating the content of his doctrine theoretically, but giving to it concrete and acoustic form.

<sup>1</sup> Writing at night is naturally a topos, but nevertheless often true. Lucretius breathes personal life into the theme.

<sup>2</sup> As a writer, Lucretius is alone, although this proves nothing whatsoever about his everyday existence.

<sup>3</sup> Here, he had to deal with a prejudice on the part of Memmius, who entertained small regard for Latin literature (Cic. Brut. 247).

His poetic achievement therefore is not limited to some superficial trappings or embellishment, as may at first be suggested by his simile of the cup smeared with honey. In so great a poet, his practice is better than his theory: were the case reversed, he would not be a poet. Epicurus certainly wanted close attention to the vis lying at the basis of words (Cic. fin. 2. 6; cf. Epicurus' Letter to Herodotus 37). He demanded therefore an agreement between word, thought, and object. Poetry, however, had no appeal for him.<sup>1</sup> This is what challenged Lucretius.

He certainly followed literally Epicurus' advice 'to behold as it were, with one's own eyes the idea behind each word' (Letter to Herodotus 38).<sup>2</sup> Epicurus called his philosophy 'prophecy'. For Lucretius, this claim quite naturally joined the Empedoclean interpretation of natural philosophy as prophecy.<sup>3</sup> To the role of the prophet also belongs criticism of false beliefs. This feature, too, links Lucretius to the early Greeks. At his consecration as poet, Hesiod had learned from the Muses and their prophetic (Theog. 31–32) inspiration that they could not only proclaim many credible lies, but, when they wanted, also truth (Theog. 27–28). Just like Empedocles (and also Xenophanes), Lucretius tried, in an audience still expecting mythology, to produce something quite novel, a poetry of truth and reality. His aloofness from myth confronted Lucretius with fundamental problems of poetics similar to those encountered later, in each case in a different context, by Juvenal and in a quite special way by Prudentius.

Lucretius' imagery, teeming with organic life, often stands in marked contrast with the sobriety of Epicurus' view of the world. His poetic nature led him to overcome the Epicurean hostility to culture. This is why in the long run he was the only one to guarantee the survival and influence of Epicureanism. Even more, his poetic images survived the disappearance of Epicureanism.

<sup>1</sup> Epicurus teaches that the wise man will not devote himself to the writing of poetry (Diog. Laert. 10. 121 b; cf. also Cic. fin. 1. 71–72). That he was not wholly disinclined to rhetoric is shown by his carefully polished (exoteric) letter to Menoeceus.

<sup>2</sup> On language as a mirror of reality, cf. Orig. c. Cels. 1. 24, p. 18 HOESCH; Procl. in Plat. Cratyl. 17, p. 8 BOISS. Philodemus thought otherwise.

<sup>3</sup> D. CLAY, The Sources of Lucretius' Inspiration, in: J. BOLLACK and A. LAKS, eds., Études sur l'épicurisme antique, Lille 1976, 203–227.

Ideas II

Lucretius suffered because of the troubled times in which he lived. Given the poet's theoretical disbelief that the gods intervene in human destiny, his prayer to Venus for peace is a human feature which especially moves the reader. Venus is the patron deity of the Romans, and especially of Memmius. At the same time, she represents the eternal power of nature, bringing all that is into being, and is addressed as hominum divomque voluptas and implored to give peace, which means that she represents the highest value of the Epicureans, pleasure at rest.<sup>1</sup> Memmius is challenged to abandon cares with the help of contemplation.<sup>2</sup>

In philosophy Lucretius hoped to find the tranquillity which contemporary history could not offer. At a period of changing regimes, the Roman poet turned away from everyday events and discovered in contemplation the physical universe, along with the world of the isolated human soul. Even if physics was the 'elementary course'<sup>3</sup> for Epicureans and so tempted Lucretius to concentrate on it alone, it is still astonishing in the case of a Roman to find what small compass in the De rerum natura is occupied by his countrymen's favorite philosophical topic, ethics.

Lucretius found Epicurus' doctrine attractive because of the close relation it established between man and universe, microcosm and macrocosm. Inner peace was to grow from the proper observation of the external world. He observes reality with a clear eye, more sharply than certain other Roman poets. Even in self-awareness, he dispenses with palliatives or illusions. The soul is mortal, the world beyond and its punishments have no existence.

Unlike the late Greek Epicurus, who with an imperturbable smile adapted to the inevitable, Lucretius and his nation belonged to a 'less mature' stage of cultural development; so he loudly proclaimed

---

<sup>1</sup> This does not exclude an allusion to the Philia of Empedocles and the Aphrodite of Parmenides.

<sup>2</sup> Prayer for the Epicurean is the tranquil contemplation of the gods in their perfection (as a way towards a life worthy of the gods). To this extent, verses 1. 44–49 which outdo Odyssey 6. 42–49 are not out of place here, even if they are not quite satisfactorily integrated with the text. K. GAISER's suggestion deserves consideration, that the verses should be introduced after verse 79: Das vierte Prooemium des Lukrez und die 'lukrezische Frage', in: Eranion, FS H. HOMMEL, Tübingen 1961, 19–41.

<sup>3</sup> K. KLEVE 1979, 81–85.

his doctrines. Should he have believed that they would become in this way more comforting than they sounded at first? With the same vehemence he unmasked love. Rarely in pre-Christian times has so much passion thundered against passion.<sup>1</sup> In the emotion of these passages, nature and art blend into one.

One of the poet's chief aims was to overcome the paralyzing fear of the gods, superstition. Unlike most ancient critics of religion, including Epicurus, he did not stop even at the official religion of the state, although he largely avoids taking any too clear stand about specifically Roman cults. For him, Epicurus was the great liberator who dared to look firmly in the eye of the threatening specter of religio (in other authors, superstitio). He paid homage to him as earlier Empedocles had to his teacher Pythagoras. Lucretius found memorable words for the dwelling place of the gods, free from all mortal cares (2. 646–651). His theory of perception explains how the notion of god reaches men from the gods themselves (e.g. 6. 76–77). But this notion is so lofty that he prefers to keep it away from all that belongs to earth. Pietas even so retains its significance, but it consists not in the restless practice of external sacrifices and rites, but in the ability to contemplate all things with a calm mind (5. 1198–1203). Even though therefore we can make no contribution to the happiness of the gods, just as directly they can contribute nothing to ours, a tranquil contemplation of all things, particularly of divine perfection, has a beneficial effect on our soul.<sup>2</sup> It would then be incorrect to maintain that Epicurus' theology is a crypto-atheism.<sup>3</sup>

Nevertheless, our poet evokes mythical characters in powerful images: Iphigenia (1. 80–101), Phaethon (5. 396–405), the sufferers in the world beyond (3. 978–1023), Hercules (5. 22–42), and the Great Mother (2. 600–660). Thus Lucretius sets the power of religion and myth at the service of his persuasive purpose, to some extent retaining it as a sort of 'stage'. But he warns us not to take this figurative language literally. The listener must take lessons in reading, and be able to distinguish token and reality. The 'anti-Lucretius in Lucretius',<sup>4</sup> however, is a phrase to be handled with

<sup>1</sup> Cicero (Tusc. 4. 74–75) is perceptibly cooler, and naturally so is Ovid in the Remedia. Lucretius deviates here from Epicurus and Philodemus more in tone than in content.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also Cic. nat. deor. 1. 56 pie sanctaque colimus naturam excellentem atque praestantem.

<sup>3</sup> This reproach against the Epicureans is old: Cic. nat. deor. 1. 43; Plut. Adv. Col. 31.

<sup>4</sup> M. PATIN, Études sur la poésie latine, vol. 1, Paris 1868, 117–137.

care. Even though the poet may imbue myths with a life of their own, for the thinker they are, at best, flints from which the mind's spark may be struck.

Lucretius himself calls Epicurus a god (5. 8); it must be remembered that the term 'god' often denotes not a substance but a function: 'god' in antiquity often is a giver of life, savior, liberator; and here: conqueror of fear of the gods and author of blissful life. Strictly speaking, this notion of god is un-Epicurean, but it is in this sense of godhead that Epicurus gave greater gifts to mankind than Ceres, Bacchus, and Hercules, the latter the favorite hero of the Stoics. Lucretius' veneration for Epicurus as a redeemer, in whose footsteps he follows, has religious features.<sup>1</sup> It must be said again that Lucretius assails, not religious feeling, but mistaken notions about the gods and the resulting fears. In the Epicurean sense, he can venerate his master as the mediator of a right idea of the divine (5. 52-54). In praising Epicurus, Lucretius lends an intellectual dimension even to Roman military language and its notions of bravery and conquest. The union of the language of the mysteries with the praises of Alexander and with the Roman concept of the triumph<sup>2</sup> prepares the ground for Christian late antiquity. In his praise of Augustus, Virgil was once again to move back from the purely intellectual to the political domain.

Lucretius' marked interest in science was something new and peculiar in his period and society. Even though for him, as a Roman, psychological problems such as the fear of death repeatedly occupied the center of attention, this does not alter his pioneering importance, given Roman conditions, in the realm of physical science, something which the Romans' distaste for speculation and their fear of a conflict with the state religion often led them to avoid.

Epicurus' philosophy in many respects undermined the picture of the world offered by ancient physics. Following the principle of 'multi-causal' explanation, Lucretius, like Epicurus before him, was snobbish enough to combat even established results of the science of his time. The alternatives he proposed were in part quite naive: for example, the sun is perhaps created afresh every day; or: because I cannot imagine what the Antipodes are like, they cannot exist. But other features are imposing, even grandiose, although not completely carried to their logical conclusion even by Epicurus. In Epicurus' philosophy Lucretius found the notion of the infinite; and so became the first poet of infinity at Rome. But we should not be surprised that even so he adheres to views that are only valid if space is finite; nor should we turn him into a mystic troubled by anxiety.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Struggle by the hero with the monster, liberation, ascent, revelation, imitation: W. FAUTH 1973.

<sup>2</sup> V. ВУСННЕИТ, Epikurs Triumph des Geistes (Lucr. 1. 62-79), Hermes 99, 1971, 303-323.

As a philosopher of culture, following his models, Lucretius divides the development of mankind into two phases. In the first, man was taught by external need; in the second, by his own reflection. In both of them, Lucretius observes social and technical change. He steadfastly avoids idealizing the world and our place in it, or explaining it by final causes. While political structures continually adapt to technical evolution, moral maturity lags behind, as is shown in the later cultural stage (book 5). In particular, Lucretius refuses to accept the custom of blood sacrifices. The series of accusatory sacrificial scenes extends from Iphigenia (1. 80–101) to the lowing of the heifer for her slaughtered calf (2. 352–366). The 'mutinous' Ovid was to give more lively assent to this criticism of sacrifice and war than the 'gentle' Virgil, who accepted such social necessities with veneration and grief.

In spite of all his gloomy realism, Lucretius is not a 'pessimist'. Like Epicurus, Lucretius took for granted the freedom of the human will. In fact, to illustrate the possibility that falling atoms swerve from the vertical (2. 251–293), he uses the example of man's freedom to move in accordance with personal decision. This notion of an 'unmotivated' or 'voluntary' deviation was long dismissed as unscientific, but today it has found support. In the atomic realm certain behaviors cannot be explained causally but only statistically predicted. Lucretius rejects a hard and fast determinism, for one of his basic principles is intellectual freedom.

Transmission

The transmission of Lucretius comes down to us on a very thin paper bridge. The peculiarities of the errors show that a now lost manuscript in capitals of the 4th/5th century was recopied<sup>2</sup> in minuscules around 800. Our whole tradition is based on a lost copy<sup>1</sup> of this copy. In its turn, the tradition is twofold. One branch is represented by the preserved Leidensis 30 Vossianus Oblongus (9th century) along with the Itali<sup>2</sup> which, in the last analysis, depend on it. On the other side is the Leidensis 94 Vossianus Quadratus (9th century), supplemented from the same source by the schedae Gottorpienses and Vindobonenses (9th century).<sup>3</sup> The Oblongus and Quadratus originated in France. The Oblongus is more carefully written than the Quadratus and more trustworthy.

<sup>1</sup> E. DE SAINT DENIS is right, Lucrèce, poète de l'infini, IL 15, 1963, 17–24.

<sup>2</sup> This recopying gives rise to confusions in our transmission of I, T, and L; F, P, and T; O and Q; C and G; AL and N.

Certain passages may be corrected with the aid of the secondary tradition: 1. 70 effringere (Priscian); 1. 84 Triviai (Priscian); 1. 207 possint (Lactantius).

The work is unfinished. Efforts have been made to explain contradictions by the analysis of different layers of composition or by the assumption of interpolations. Many textual difficulties go back to the author's own manuscript. In 21 places Lachmann assumes the existence of 'free-floating' verses, written by Lucretius for his basic text, but not yet incorporated. Perhaps an ancient edition contained critical marks later lost. Among the numerous problems may be mentioned the proem to the 4th book which repeats word for word a long passage from the 1st book and perhaps was introduced here by an ancient editor.

Influence

In February 54 the De rerum natura was in the hands of Cicero and his brother.<sup>4</sup> The editor (could it have been the great orator

<sup>1</sup> This explains the confusion in our tradition of a/u, n/u, o/e, s/f, p/r/n/s, n/ri.

<sup>2</sup> After a re-examination of the manuscripts, Konr. MÜLLER convincingly supports DIELS against BAILEY, MARTIN, LACHMANN, who wanted to trace the hyparchetype of the Itali (discovered by Poggio in 1418, perhaps at Murbach, but now lost) directly back to the archetype. The Itali display the same gaps as the Oblongus, and even repeat its corrections. As to the exact position of the Itali within the stemma, L. D. REYNOLDS is reserved: Texts and Transmission, Oxford 1983, 218–222; on transmission and text: F. BRUNHÖLZL, Zur Überlieferung des Lukrez, Hermes 90, 1962, 97–107; V. BROWN, The 'Insular Intermediary' in the Tradition of Lucretius, HSPH 72, 1968, 301–308; Conr. MÜLLER, De codicum Lucretii Italicorum origine, MH 30, 1973, 166–178; W. RICHTER, Textstudien zu Lukrez, München 1974; G. F. CINI, La posizione degli 'Italici' nello stemma lucreziano, AATC 41, 1976, 115–169; E. FLORES, Ecdotica e tradizione manoscritta lucreziana (da PASQUALI a BÜCHNER e MÜLLER), Vichiana n.s. 7, 1978, 21–37; E. FLORES, Le scoperte di Poggio e il testo di Lucrezio, Napoli 1980.

<sup>3</sup> A part of the schedae Vindobonenses comes from the same codex as the Gottorpienses.

<sup>4</sup> Cic. ad Q. fr. 2. 9 (10). 3–4. Generally on Lucretius' influence: G. D. HADZSITS 1935; LEEMAN, Form 139–159; V. E. ALFIERI, Lucrezio tra l'antico e il moderno, A&R 29, 1984, 113–128; L. ALFONSI, L'avventura di Lucrezio nel mondo antico . . .

himself?)<sup>1</sup> did his work with restraint, and did not make substantial alterations in the text. The antithetical link of lumina ingeni with ars, hinted at in Cicero's Delphic verdict, also preoccupied later generations: Statius, in his appraisal of Lucretius, yoked artistry and inspiration pointedly together: et docti furor arduus Lucreti, 'and the towering frenzy of learned Lucretius' (silv. 2. 7. 78). Along with Catullus, Lucretius was regarded as a leading poet of his time (Nep. Att. 12. 4).

Lucretius established new standards for the didactic poem. In the Georgics, Virgil set against his a different interpretation of the poet's role. Ovid paid homage to him (am. 1. 15. 23-24), and entered into rivalry with him in the speech given by Pythagoras (met. 15. 75-478). Even the Stoicizing astronomer Manilius could not ignore Lucretius. Differences of philosophical outlook evidently did not impair admiration and imitation.

Seneca shared Lucretius' interest in natural science, and often quotes him. Even the satirist Persius drew inspiration from him.

From Verrius Flaccus on, scholarship took an interest in Lucretius, and the great grammarian Probus was credited with a recension of the text, which need not, however, have been an edition in the genuine sense of that word. The technically competent paragraph headings, with their references to Epicurean doctrine, were added perhaps in the 2nd century.

Quintilian doubted the utility of Lucretius in rhetorical instruction because of the poet's difficult style (inst. 10. 187), and therefore did not belong to those readers who caused Tacitus to smile for their habit of preferring Lucretius to Virgil (Tac. dial. 23). The marked interest of the Archaizers, who perhaps even made him a school author, would still persist in Nonius, Macrobius, and Christian authors.

---

e oltre, in: Lucrèce. Huit exposés . . . 271-321; Wolfg. SCHMID, Lukrez und der Wandel seines Bildes, A&A 2, 1946, 193-219. Individual studies: L. RAMORINO MARTINI, Influssi lucreziani nelle Bucoliche di Virgilio, CCC 7, 1986, 297-331; C. DI GIOVINE, Osservazioni intorno al giudizio di Quintiliano su Lucrezio, RFIC 107, 1979, 279-289; T. AGOZZINO, Una preghiera gnostica pagana e lo stile lucreziano nel IV secolo, in: Dignam Dis, FS G. VALLLOT, Venezia 1972, 169-210; E. GOFFINET, Lucrèce et les conceptions cosmologiques de saint Hilaire de Poitiers, FS Peremans, Louvain 1968, 61-67; I. OPELT, Lukrez bei Hieronymus, Hermes 100, 1972, 76-81; K. SMOLAK, Unentdeckte Lukrezspuren, WS 86, n.s. 7, 1973, 216-239.

<sup>1</sup> Jerome chron. 1923 Cicero emendavit; see however D. F. SUTTON, Lucreti poemata Once Again, RSC 19, 1971, 289-298. On Lucretius in Cicero: J. PRÉAUX, Le jugement de Cicéron sur Lucrèce et sur Salluste, RBPh 42, 1964, 57-73; G. C. PUCCI, Echi lucreziani in Cicerone, SIFC 38, 1966, 70-132; J.-M. ANDRÉ, Cicéron et Lucrèce. Loi du silence et allusions polémiques, in: Mélanges de philosophie, de littérature et d'histoire ancienne offerts à P. BOYANCÉ, Rome 1974, 21-38; T. MASLOWSKI, The Chronology of Cicero's Anti-Epicureanism, Eos 62, 1974, 55-78; T. MASLOWSKI, Cicero, Philodemus, Lucretius, Eos 66, 2, 1978, 215-226.

Tertullian (d. after 220) found in Lucretius (1. 304) confirmation for his (Stoic) belief in the materiality of the soul (anim. 5. 6). Minucius Felix (3rd century) introduced into his apologetic treatise, in surprising allegiance to Lucretius, a physical dimension. Arnobius (around 300), whose Christian piety was quite independent, praised Christ in the style of Lucretius' hymn to Epicurus (1. 38; Lucretius 5. 1-54). He also adopted numerous Epicurean doctrines: God's freedom from emotion, the mortality of the soul, the nonexistence of punishments in hell, the pointlessness of rites. For him, Christ became the teacher of a pure disposition and of scientific contemplation of the world. Arnobius is a proof of how an intellectual in a period of break-up, on the very eve of Constantine's establishment, experienced Christianity as a spiritual liberation from the yoke of Roman religio and accordingly felt the parallels with Lucretius much more strongly than the differences. His pupil Lactantius (d. after 317) was certainly more circumspect, but in his writings employed an extraordinary number of Lucretian arguments against other philosophical schools. He adorned the final chapter of his Institutiones with lines from Lucretius (6. 24-28) which are applied to Christ,<sup>1</sup> and in his poem, the Phoenix, he conjured up (15-20) Lucretius' memorable picture of the dwelling place of the gods (Lucr. 3. 18-24). Lucretius therefore acted as godfather at the birth of Christian artistic poetry, which was as bold a novelty as had been in its day Epicurean poetry. He was the great victor over prejudices, even those of one's own school. Linguistically, Lucretius exercised even stronger influence on the great Christian poet of late antiquity, Prudentius (d. after 405). Verses surviving under the name of Hilary of Arles (d. 449) adapt to God the basic form of Lucretius' eulogy of Epicurus.<sup>2</sup>

Traces of Lucretius are understandably found at places where Christianity touches on natural philosophy: in the exposition of the story of creation in Ambrose and Augustine and in writings on the purposeful nature of the human organism (Lactantius and Ambrose). Isidore of Seville (d. 636) still cites Lucretius in a scientific context at first hand.

<sup>1</sup> To preserve a distance from Epicurus he remarks on viam monstravit: nec monstravit tantum, sed etiam praecessit.

<sup>2</sup> S. Hilarii in Genesim ad Leonem papam.

In the Middle Ages, there is little clear evidence of our poet's influence. He is not entirely unknown,<sup>1</sup> but rarely cited. Even so, a search for hidden allusions may promise success.<sup>2</sup> On the other side, Lucretius does not suffer any censure for being an Epicurean,<sup>3</sup> since Epicureanism did not present to Christianity any serious threat.

Lucretius' influence in modern times has been particularly fruitful, since it follows different paths. His content has affected natural philosophy: not only cosmogony, cosmology and atomic theory, but also methods of proof. Even doctrines of the origins of civilization owe something to him. Beyond this, in philosophy he became a 'patron saint' of materialists (rightly) and atheists (not entirely rightly), or again, more frequently, the target of pious efforts at refutation. Other influences have nothing to do with his philosophy, and depend on his moral and literary qualities. His insights into the human soul have swayed the thinking of moralists and satirists. As an observer of detail and poet of suggestive visual power, he has influenced poets and painters. As a master of the didactic poem, he set his stamp, along with Virgil, on this literary genre in the modern period.

In Italy,<sup>4</sup> it was Poggio Bracciolini who made Lucretius known. In 1417, he sent a transcript from Germany to N. Niccoli. At first, interest in Lucretius was expressed in scientific or allegorical poems: the didactic poem Urania sive de stellis of Pontanus (d. 1503); the Hymni naturales<sup>5</sup> of Marullus (d. 1500); the picture of spring given by Politian (d. 1494) in his Rusticus (1483) adapted from Lucretius 5. 737-740, which provided the model for the Primavera<sup>6</sup> of Botticelli (d. 1510). About 1460, Lorenzo di Buonincontri composed his Rerum naturalium et divinarum sive de rebus coelestibus libri. G. Fracastoro (d. 1553) explained the effect of the magnet according to Aristotle and Lucretius 6. 906-1089.<sup>7</sup> Giordano Bruno (d. 1600), although basically a math-

<sup>1</sup> The Venerable Bede (8th century) seems to have known him, Hrabanus Maurus (9th century) explained both physics (in his 22 volumes 'De rerum naturis') and the Bible with Lucretius.

<sup>2</sup> M. GORDON, to whom I owe this reference, is preparing a publication on this topic.

<sup>3</sup> Rightly A. TRAINA, Lucrezio e la 'congiura del silenzio', in: Dignam Dis. FS G. VALLOT, Venezia 1972, 159-168.

<sup>4</sup> On Petrarch: G. GASPAROTTO, Ancora Lucrezio nel Bucolicum carmen (XII Conflatio) del Petrarca, in: Dignam Dis. FS G. VALLOT, Venezia 1972, 211-228.

<sup>5</sup> C. F. GOFFIS, Il sincretismo lucreziano-platonico negli Hymni naturales del Marullo, Belfagor 24, 1969, 386-417; A. KREUTZ, Poetische Epikurrezeption in der Renaissance: Studien zu Marullus, Pontano und Palingenius, diss. Bielefeld 1993.

<sup>6</sup> A. WARBURG, Sandro Botticellis Geburt der Venus und Frühling, Straßburg 1892.

<sup>7</sup> De sympathia et antipathia rerum, esp. ch. 5.

ematical and Pythagorean thinker, took up individual physical doctrines of Lucretius, and disseminated his thoughts partly, like Lucretius, in didactic verses (De minimo; De immenso). In his work written in Italian De l'infinito (1584), he used Lucretius 1. 951–1113 against Aristotle. In De triplici minimo (1591), he looks back to, among other material, Lucretius 4. 110–122—an enthralling passage, destined to be taken up in turn by Sennert and Pascal. Bruno's intellectual courage was rewarded by Christians of different denominations (showing rare unanimity) with persecution, imprisonment and the stake. Vanini, one of Bruno's Italian disciples, an adherent of pantheistic materialism and an Epicurean, was burned in 1619 in Toulouse. Galileo (d. 1642) knew the atomic theory and defended Democritus against Aristotle, spending the last eight years of his life under house arrest. Calvin (d. 1564), anxious not to fall short of Rome in his pious zeal, described Lucretius shortly and succinctly as canis.

In Italy, Lucretius' influence was furthered by the frequently reprinted translation (1717) owed to Marchetti. Leopardi (d. 1837) understood Lucretius' materialism, did not believe in the intervention of the gods in our life, and was an even profounder pessimist than the Roman poet.

A milestone in the spread of Lucretian influence in France<sup>1</sup> was formed by the edition and commentary (1563) of D. Lambinus.<sup>2</sup> It inspired its addressees, Ronsard, Muretus, Turnebus, and Doratus. The hymn to Venus had been translated even earlier by Du Bellay (d. 1560). The prologue to the 2nd book was read as the expression of a new wisdom of Erasmian stamp. Along with Horace, Lucretius was Montaigne's<sup>3</sup> (d. 1592) favorite poet, being quoted by him 149 times, as one might expect from his Epicurean leanings. In this, the (psychological) 3rd book plays a special part. The 7th satire of Mathurin Régnier (d. 1613) is partly based on Lucretius (4. 1133–1134).

Molière (d. 1673), who enjoyed an excellent classical education, paraphrased in his Misanthrope (711–730) a Lucretian tirade about lovers' blindness (4. 1153–1169). He is said to have attempted a translation of Lucretius which, however, has not been preserved. Probably he used the translation by the Abbé de Marolles which was corrected by Pierre Gassendi (d. 1655). With his renewal of Epicurean philosophy, Gassendi may be taken as a representative of many French materialists of the 17th and 18th centuries. His opposition to Lucretius, in clinging stubbornly to the immortality of the soul, is typical for many readers of Lucretius in the modern period. Gassendi's Syntagma of Epicurus' philosophy, based on Lucretius, influenced Newton and Boyle, thus allowing the poet to act as godfather to modern physics and chemistry. Newton declares: Epicuri et Lucretii philosophia est vera et antiqua, perperam ab illis ad Atheismum detorta.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> G. R. HOCKE, Lukrez in Frankreich, diss. Köln 1936; P. HENDRICK, Lucretius in the Apologie de Raymond Sebond, Bibl H&R 37, 1975, 457–466.

<sup>2</sup> Lambinus called Lucretius elegantissimus et purissimus, gravissimus atque ornatissimus of all Latin poets (cf. G. CONTE, LG 172).

<sup>3</sup> B. MÄCHLER, Montaignes Essais und das philosophische System von Epikur und Lukrez, Zürich 1985.

Cardinal de Polignac (d. 1741) raised objections to materialism. His Anti-Lucretius, sive de Deo et natura appeared posthumously in nine books (Paris 1747).<sup>2</sup> This work exercised influence also in England and was in essence directed against Pierre Bayle (d. 1706), who, in his Dictionnaire historique et critique, which prepared the way for the critical Encyclopedists of the 18th century, had inter alia taken Epicurus under his wing. Helvetius (d. 1771) and Holbach (d. 1789), both philosophers of the Enlightenment, had close links with Lucretius, although at times without naming their source.<sup>3</sup>

Blaise Pascal (d. 1662) employed in his Pensées (no. 72) the Lucretian image of a 'tiny creature' (Lucr. 4. 110–122) for the un-Lucretian purpose of showing the limitless progression towards the infinitely small.<sup>4</sup>

La Fontaine (d. 1695), the famous author of fables, called himself a 'disciple de Lucrèce'. Just like the wise Montaigne, he was an Epicurean in a sublime sense. Lucretius' history of civilization influenced the doctrine developed by Rousseau (d. 1778) of the contrat social. Voltaire (d. 1778) turned Lucretius' patron Memmius, in fictitious letters to Cicero, into the champion of deism, refuting mechanistic physics. Of Lucretius, for whose 3rd book he shared the preference of Montaigne and Frederick the Great, he remarked: 'S'il n'était pas un physicien aussi ridicule que les autres il serait un homme divin.' Diderot (d. 1784) showed in his materialist pamphlet Le rêve de d'Alembert, first printed as late as 1830, a good acquaintance with

<sup>1</sup> D. T. WHITESIDE, ed., The Mathematical Papers of Isaac Newton, vol. 1, Cambridge 1967, 388.

<sup>2</sup> E. J. AMENT, The Anti-Lucretius of Cardinal Polignac, TAPhA 101, 1970, 29–49.

<sup>3</sup> Generally on the 18th century: A. FUSIL, Lucrèce et les littérateurs, poètes et artistes du XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, Revue d'histoire littéraire de la France 37, 1930, 161–176.

<sup>4</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom, 135–144.

Lucretius. He called the hymn to Venus 'le plus grand tableau de poesie que je connaisse'.

André Chénier (d. 1794) intended to present the doctrines of the Encyclopedists in a Lucretian didactic poem Hermès. The principal work of the French revolutionary poet Maréchal (d. 1803) is entitled Lucrèce français. Victor Hugo (d. 1885) was familiar with Lucretius as with many Latin authors. In the France of 1866, Lucretius became a school textbook. The Parnassian poet Sully Prudhomme (d. 1907) composed an adaptation of Lucretius' 1st book and in this way developed a poetic language of extraordinary precision. No less an author than Henri Bergson (d. 1941) edited a frequently reprinted selection from Lucretius (1884). The novice work of this philosopher dealt with the philosophy of poetry and bore the subtitle 'The Genius of Lucretius' (1884).

In central Europe,<sup>1</sup> the Bohemian humanists were interested in Lucretius. The German physician and chemist Daniel Sennert (d. 1637) renewed the atomic theory and referred several times to Lucretius. Sebastian Basso<sup>2</sup> compared, like the Roman poet (2. 114–131), atoms to motes in the sunshine.<sup>3</sup>

The physicist and moralist Lichtenberg (d. 1799) discovered in Lucretius a kindred spirit. In succession to Voltaire, Frederick the Great (d. 1786) confessed: 'Quand je suis affligé je lis le troisième livre de Lucrèce; c'est un palliatif pour les maladies de l'âme.'<sup>4</sup>

Winckelmann (d. 1768) in his preference for 'the ancient majesty of Catullus and Lucretius',<sup>5</sup> was also a precursor of nineteenth-century taste. Kant (d. 1804) developed in succession to Lucretius his well-known scientific cosmogony.<sup>6</sup> Herder<sup>7</sup> (d. 1803) and Wieland (d. 1813)<sup>8</sup> showed familiarity with the poet.

<sup>1</sup> J. HEIJNIC, Zu den epikureisch-lukrezischen Nachklängen bei den böhmischen Humanisten, LF 90, 1967, 50–58; Wolfg. SCHMID, De Lucretio in litteris Germanicis obvio, in: Antidosis. FS W. KRAUS, Wien 1972, 327–335.

<sup>2</sup> Philosophiae naturalis adversus Aristotelem libri XII (1621), p. 14.

<sup>3</sup> Johannes Chrysostomus Magnenus, strongly influenced by Lucretius, employs the same image as well as the comparison with letters and the tiny creature (Democritus reviviscens, Pavia 1646; Leiden 1658, esp. 268–269 and 206–207).

<sup>4</sup> Gesammelte Ausgabe der Werke Friedrichs II. von Hohenzollern, Berlin 1848, vol. 15, 32.

<sup>5</sup> C. JUSTI, Winckelmann und seine Zeitgenossen, 1, 2nd ed., Leipzig 1898, 151.

<sup>6</sup> Preface to Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels.

<sup>7</sup> H. B. NISBET, Herder und Lukrez, in: G. SAUDER, ed., J. G. HERDER (1744–1803), Hamburg 1987, 77–87.

<sup>8</sup> H. BÖHM, Die Traditionswahl der Antike und ihre Funktion im Werk des jungen Wieland, Altertum 17, 1971, 237–244.

Goethe<sup>1</sup> took great interest in the progress of K. L. von Knebel's classical translation of Lucretius (1821), and made a serious reading of the poet at a level deeper than any previously unattained. Not only did he find the proper place for Lucretius in the development of Roman literature,<sup>2</sup> but he also recognized his specifically poetic qualities: 'a lofty, vigorous and sensuous ability to perceive, making him capable of powerful presentation', and 'a lively force of imagination . . ., enabling him to follow what he has seen into the inscrutable depths of nature, even beyond the senses, into the most secret recesses.'<sup>3</sup> Goethe valued Lucretius' use of the principle of analogy, and with perfect plausibility called him a 'poetic orator'. The staggering proclamation of mortality (3. 1045) reminded Goethe of Frederick the Great, who in the Battle of Collin called out to his grenadiers: 'You dogs, do you want to live forever?'<sup>4</sup> The De rerum natura appeared to the poet as 'a prologue to the history of the Christian church . . . in the highest degree remarkable.'<sup>5</sup> Had not Lucretius, just like the Christians later, who indeed partly used his own arguments, thoroughly disposed of the pagan fear of the gods, including the state religion? Does he not preach with the passion of a neophyte? And does he not embody, as Goethe noted with a keen eye, the type of man later described as a 'heretic'?<sup>6</sup> The archheretic Nietzsche (d. 1900) saw Lucretius' function as 'prologue' to Church history in an even more radical light: 'Lucretius should be read in order to understand what Epicurus assailed, not paganism but 'Christianity', that is, the destruction of souls by the notion of guilt, of punishment, and immortality.'<sup>7</sup>

<sup>1</sup> F. SCHMIDT, Lukrez bei Goethe, Goethe 24, 1962, 158-174; H. B. NISBET, Lucretius in 18th-Century Germany. With a Commentary on Goethe's Metamorphose der Tiere, MLR 81, 1986, 97-115.

<sup>2</sup> 'It may well be said that Lucretius appeared in the period—and helped to form it—when Roman poetry had reached its high style. The old, sturdy, bearish roughness had been softened. Broader perspectives on the world, deeper practical insight into significant characters, observed in action around and beside themselves, had brought the Romans' culture to that remarkable point at which strength and seriousness could be wedded with grace, and strong and powerful utterances with charm' (1822) W.A. 1, 41, 1st ed., 361.

<sup>3</sup> To Knebel Feb. 14, 1821.

<sup>4</sup> F. VON MÜLLER, Feb. 20, 1821 (cf. the note after the next).

<sup>5</sup> W.A. 1, 41, 1st ed., 361 (37, 216).

<sup>6</sup> F. VON MÜLLER, Feb. 20, 1821, Gespräche, ed. F. VON BIEDERMANN 2, 499; Gedenkausgabe, ed. E. BEUTLER, Zürich 1950, 121-122; GRUMACH 343.

<sup>7</sup> Der Antichrist 58, Werke, ed. by SCHLECHTA 2, 1229-1230.

Friedrich Schlegel (d. 1829) said of Lucretius: 'In inspiration and sublimity he is the first among the Romans. As singer and presenter of nature he is the first among all surviving poets of antiquity.'<sup>1</sup> But he laments that 'so great a soul' chose 'the system most worthy of rejection'. Karl Marx (d. 1883) in his dissertation made use of Lucretius as a most important source. Bertolt Brecht (d. 1956) attempted to turn the Communist Manifesto into a didactic poem along Lucretian lines.<sup>2</sup>

Hofmannsthal (d. 1929) translated passages from the De rerum natura.<sup>3</sup> Mommsen (d. 1903), in an otherwise accurate estimate,<sup>4</sup> surprises the reader by the remark that the poet 'had chosen the wrong subject' (595). Albert Einstein (d. 1955) wrote a rather crushing preface to the translation of Lucretius by Hermann Diels (Berlin 1923-1924).

In England<sup>5</sup> the Renaissance poet Edmund Spenser (d. 1599) imitated, in his allegorical work The Faerie Queene (4. 10. 44-45), the beginning of the De rerum natura. Its influence is also seen on the Allegory of Nature in the 7th book and in the Prothalamion.

The first English translation of Lucretius (about 1640) was made by the Puritan Lucy Hutchinson.<sup>6</sup> Immediately afterwards (1656) came the translation by J. EVELYN (d. 1706), accompanied by a commentary drawn from the writings of modern adherents of the atomic theory. Both these were in heroic couplets. In 1682 appeared the excellent translation by Thomas Creech.

Hobbes (d. 1679) undertook to refute Lucretius' proofs for the existence of a vacuum. Naturally Boyle (d. 1691), an atomist and pious Christian, was acquainted with the poet. Newton (d. 1727) declared that although the philosophy of Epicurus and Lucretius was old it was true, and that it had been wrongly twisted towards atheism.<sup>7</sup> He possessed a text of Lucretius, and tried in his correspondence with

<sup>1</sup> F. SCHLEGEL, Geschichte der alten und neueren Literatur (1815), crit. ed., vol. 6, ed. H. EICHNER, München 1961, 74.

<sup>2</sup> W. RÖSLER, Vom Scheitern eines literarischen Experiments. Brechts Manifest und das Lehrgedicht des Lukrez, Gymnasium 82, 1975, 1-25.

<sup>3</sup> R. HIRSCH, ed., Hofmannsthal. Übertragungen aus Lukrez' De rerum natura (1887/1888), in: K. K. POLHEIM, ed., Literatur aus Österreich—Österreichische Literatur. Ein Bonner Symposium, Bonn 1981, 239-241.

<sup>4</sup> RG 3, 7th ed., 1882, 594-598.

<sup>5</sup> Apart from HIGGET, Class. Trad., see also B. A. CATTO, Lucretius, Shakespeare, and Dickens, CW 80, 1987, 423-427.

<sup>6</sup> The 1st book was published in: I. WARBURG, Lucy Hutchinson. Das Bild einer Puritanerin, diss. Hamburg 1937.

<sup>7</sup> A. W. TURNBULL, ed., The Correspondence of Isaac Newton, Cambridge 1961, vol. 3, 335.

Richard Bentley (Dec. 10, 1692) to refute Lucretius' view (2. 167–181) that the world arose from mechanical causes without divine intervention. In succession to Lucretius' hymns to Epicurus, the astronomer Edmond Halley (d. 1742),<sup>1</sup> to whose unselfish friendship the origin and publication of Newton's Principia is owed, composed a Latin encomium on Newton. An English pendant to this comes from the poet of the Seasons, James Thomson (d. 1748).<sup>2</sup> In his Essay on Man, Pope (d. 1744) took account of Lucretius,<sup>3</sup> while Dryden (d. 1700) translated selected passages.

As didactic poets, both Lucretius and his opponent Polignac found successors in England.<sup>4</sup> Thomas Gray (d. 1771) began the 2nd book of his unfinished poem De principis cogitandi with an invocation of Locke, the enlightener of human reason. In his two books De animi immortalitate (1754), Isaac Hawkins praised his teachers, Bacon and Newton, in Lucretian tones. Erasmus Darwin (d. 1802), the grandfather of the biologist, composed The Temple of Nature or The Origin of Society.

The great lyric poet of nature Shelley (d. 1822) is said to have become an atheist in his schooldays through his reading of Lucretius. The epigraph of Queen Mab is derived from Lucretius, whom he regarded as the best of Roman poets. Coleridge (d. 1834) appreciated the intimate union of poetry with science in Lucretius. Even Byron<sup>5</sup> (d. 1824) and Wordsworth (d. 1850) were acquainted with the poet (To Landor, April 20, 1822). Lucretius 'denied divinely the divine': this sonorous line of Elizabeth Barrett Browning (d. 1861)<sup>6</sup> reflects a widespread misunderstanding (s. however Lucretius 6. 68–79). The Lucretius of Tennyson (d. 1892) is a fantasy combining physics with eroticism. Matthew Arnold (d. 1888) adapted Virgil's com-

<sup>1</sup> B. FABIAN, Edmond Halleys Encomium auf Isaac Newton. Zur Wirkungsgeschichte von Lukrez, in: Renatae litterae, FS A. BUCK, Frankfurt 1973, 273–290; cf. also B. FABIAN, Lukrez in England im 17. und 18. Jh. Einige Notizen, in: R. TOELLNER, ed., Aufklärung und Humanismus, Heidelberg 1980, 107–129.

<sup>2</sup> Sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton (1727).

<sup>3</sup> K. ORTEN, Die Darstellung der Kulturentstehung in den Dichtungen von Lukrez, Ovid und im Essay on Man von Alexander Pope, in: Antike Tradition und Neuere Philologien, Symposium zu Ehren des 75. Geburtstags von R. SÜHNEL, Heidelberg 1984, 35–56.

<sup>4</sup> T. J. B. SPENCER, Lucretius and the Scientific Poem in English, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., Lucretius . . ., 131–164.

<sup>5</sup> Don Juan 1. 43; Childe Harold 4. 51.

<sup>6</sup> Vision of Poets. Gottfried Hermann (d. 1848) called Lucretius 'Godless but divine'.

pliment to Lucretius in his own homage to Goethe (Memorial Verses, April 1850). Swinburne (d. 1909) immortalized Giordano Bruno along with Lucretius and Shelley in his atheists' heaven (For the Feast of Giordano Bruno, Philosopher and Martyr).

The founder of modern science in Russia Michael Lomonosov (d. 1765) translated a passage of Lucretius (5. 1241–1257) and trenchantly described the character of the poet as 'audacious'.<sup>1</sup> The only country in the world to celebrate the second millennium of the poet's death in 1946 was the Soviet Union.<sup>2</sup>

Of the many quotable phrases in Lucretius may be mentioned: De nihilo nihil (adapted from 2. 87 et al.); Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum, 'so potent was superstition in persuading to evil deeds' (1. 101): it is not always remembered that Lucretius is not attacking religion here but superstition and human sacrifice. Lucretius would be even less happy if smug and self-satisfied delight in others' misfortunes were to conceal itself behind the sublime beginning of his 2nd book: Suave, mari magno turbantibus aequora ventis / e terra magnum alterius spectare laborem, 'Pleasant it is, when on the great sea the winds trouble the water, to gaze from the shore upon another's great tribulation' (2. 1–2). His bitter-sweet image of love is magnificent: medio de fonte leporum / surgit amari aliquid, 'from the very fountain of enchantment rises a drop of bitterness' (4. 1133–1134).

It is only in the 20th century that Lucretius' doctrine of the indivisibility and impenetrability of the atoms was refuted. The interpretation of reality given by wave mechanics also makes untenable the notion of an absolutely empty space. It was known far earlier that Lucretius was not an atheist. Nonetheless, his keen observation, his cogent argumentation, and his power of language have lost nothing of their freshness. More than ever, it seems high time to rediscover the poet in Lucretius. It was he who opened to Roman poetry and to the Latin language spiritual heights previously inaccessible. It was he who set standards for all those who later wanted to compose poetry about the universe which were quite independent of differences of outlook. What Empedocles had been for him, he became for posterity.

<sup>1</sup> Z. A. POKROVSKAYA, Antičnyj filosofskij èpos, Moskva 1979, 93.

<sup>2</sup> There appeared an edition and translation by T. (= F.) PETROVSKIJ, complemented by a second volume containing essays by different authors (including I. TOLSTOJ), commentary, and the fragments of Epicurus and Empedocles, Leningrad 1947.

Editions: T. FER(R)ANDUS, Brescia 1473. * D. LAMBINUS (TC), Paris 1563. * G. WAKEFIELD (C), London 1796–1797. * C. LACHMANN (TC), Berlin 1850, 4th ed. 1882. * H. A. J. MUNRO (TC), 2 vols., Cambridge 1864; (TTrC), 3 vols., Cambridge 4th ed. 1886, repr. 1928. * W. A. MERRILL, New York 1907, 2nd ed. 1917. * C. GIUSSANI (TC), 4 vols., 1896–1898, 2nd ed. by E. STAMPINI, Torino 1921. * H. DIELS (TTr), 2 vols., Berlin 1923–1924. * A. ERNOUT, L. ROBIN (C), 3 vols., Paris 1925–1928. * A. ERNOUT, L. ROBIN (TTrC), 10th ed. 1959. * C. BAILEY (TTrC), 3 vols., Oxford 1947, several reprints. * J. MARTIN, Leipzig 1st ed. 1934, 5th ed. 1963. * W. E. LEONHARD, S. B. SMITH (C), Madison 1942. * C. L. VON KNEBEL (Tr), new ed. by O. GÜTHLING, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1947. * K. BÜCHNER (TTr), Zürich 1956. * K. BÜCHNER (T), Wiesbaden 1966. * Conr. MÜLLER (T), Zürich 1975 (excellent). * J. MARTIN (TTrN), Berlin 1972. * W. H. D. ROUSE, rev. (TTrN, ind.) by M. F. SMITH, Cambridge Mass. 1975. * F. GIANCOTTI (TTrC), Milano 1994. * Book 1: C. PASCAL (TC), Roma 1904. * Book 3: R. HEINZE (TC), Leipzig 1897; E. J. KENNEY (TC), London 1971. * Book 4: J. GODWIN (TC), Warminster 1986. * Book 4, ending: R. BRAUN (C), Leiden 1987. * Book 5: C. D. N. COSTA (TC), Oxford 1984. * Book 6: J. GODWIN (TC), Warminster 1992. ** Index: J. PAULSON, Göteborg 1911, repr. 1926. * L. ROBERTS, A Concordance of Lucretius, Berkeley 1968. * M. WACHT, Concordantia in Lucretium, Hildesheim 1991. ** Bibl.: C. A. GORDON, A Bibliography of Lucretius, London 1962 (editions and translations only). * D. E. W. WORMELL, Lucretius, in: Fifty Years (and Twelve) of Classical Scholarship, Oxford 1968, 379–386 (ibid. 345–357 an older overview of Lucretian research by C. BAILEY). * A. DALZELL, A Bibliography of Work on Lucretius, 1945–1972, CW 66, 1972–1973, 389–427; A Bibliography of Work on Lucretius, 1945–1972, CW 67, 1973–1974, 65–112; repr. in: The Classical World Bibliography of Philosophy, Religion, and Rhetoric, with a New Introduction by W. DONLAN, New York 1978, 39–226. * E. J. KENNEY, Lucretius, Oxford 1977. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, Lucretius (Bibliographie), Lampadion 7, 1966–1968, 5–32. * L. PERELLI, (Lukrezstudien 1968–1977), BStudLat 8, 1978, 277–308. * C. REITZ, Lukrez in der Forschung der letzten 30 Jahre, AU 35, 3, 1992, 68–80.

E. ACKERMANN, Lukrez und der Mythos, Wiesbaden 1979. * A. AMORY, Obscura de re lucida carmina. Science and Poetry in De rerum natura, YCIS 21, 1969, 145–168. * E. ASMIS, Lucretius' Venus and Stoic Zeus, Hermes 110, 1982, 458–470. * E. ASMIS, Rhetoric and Reason in Lucretius, AJPh 104, 1983, 36–66. * I. AVOTINS, On some Epicurean and Lucretian Arguments for the Infinity of the Universe, CQ n.s. 33, 1983, 421–427. * N. V. BARAN, M. G. CHISLEAG, Éléments chromatiques chez Lucrèce, REL 46, 1968 (1969), 145–169. * A. BARIGAZZI, L'epicureismo fino a Lucrezio, in: Storia della filosofia, dir. da M. DAL PRA, vol. 4: La filosofia ellenistica e la patristica cristiana dal III secolo a.C. al V secolo d.C., Milano 1975, 167–178.

- * A. BARIGAZZI, Il vestibolo infernale di Virgilio e Lucrezio, Prometheus 8, 1982, 213–223. * G. BARRA, Questioni lucreziane, RAAN n.s. 37, Napoli 1962, 63–96. * G. BARRA, Filodemo di Gadara e le lettere latine, Vichiana n.s. 2, 1973, 247–260. * G. BARRA, La traduzione di alcuni termini filosofici in Lucrezio, Vichiana 3, 1974, 24–39. * J. BAYET, Etudes lucrétiennes: 1. Lucrèce devant la pensée grecque (1954); 2. L'originalité de Lucrèce dans l'épicurisme (1948); 3. Lucrèce et le monde organique (1948), in: J. BAYET, Mélanges de littérature latine, Rome 1967, 11–26; 27–63; 63–84. * G. BERNS, Time and Nature in Lucretius' De rerum natura, Hermes 104, 1976, 477–492. * J. BOLLACK, A. LAKS, eds., Etudes sur l'Épicurisme antique, Lille 1976, part B: Lucrèce, with articles by M. BOLLACK, D. CLAY, P. H. SCHRIJVERS. * M. BOLLACK, La raison de Lucrèce. Constitution d'une poétique philosophique avec un essai d'interprétation de la critique lucrétienne, Paris 1978. * G. BONELLI, I motivi profondi della poesia lucreziana, Bruxelles 1984. * P. BOYANCÉ, Lucrèce e l'épicurisme, Paris 1963. * P. BOYANCÉ, Lucrèce, sa vie, son œuvre, avec un exposé de sa philosophie, Paris 1964. * D. F. BRIGHT, The Plague and the Structure of De rerum natura, Latomus 30, 1971, 607–632. * V. BUCHHEIT, Lukrez über den Ursprung von Musik und Dichtung, RhM 127, 1984, 141–158. * V. BUCHHEIT, Frühling in den Eklogen. Vergil und Lukrez, RhM 129, 1986, 123–141. * K. BÜCHNER, Beobachtungen über Vers und Gedankengang bei Lukrez, Berlin 1936. * K. BÜCHNER, Studien zur römischen Literatur, vol. 1: Lukrez und Vorklassik, Wiesbaden 1964. * K. BÜCHNER, Die Kulturgeschichte des Lukrez, in: Latinität und Alte Kirche. FS R. HANSLIK, Wien 1977, 39–55. * G. CABISIUS, Lucretius' Statement of Poetic Intent, in: C. DEROUX, ed., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, 1, Bruxelles 1979, 239–248. * L. CANFORA, I proemi del De rerum natura, RFIC 110, 1982, 63–77. * E. CASTORINA, Sull'età dell'oro in Lucrezio e Virgilio, Studi di storiografia antica in memoria di L. FERRERO, Torino 1971, 88–114. * I. CAZZANIGA, Lezioni su Lucrezio, Milano 1966. * S. CERASUOLO, L'Averno di Lucrezio. Semasiologia, empirismo e etica, SIFC 79, 1986, 233–248. * C. J. CLASSEN, Poetry and Rhetoric in Lucretius, TAPhA 99, 1968, 77–118. * C. J. CLASSEN, ed., Probleme der Lukrezforschung, Hildesheim 1986. * D. CLAY, Lucretius and Epicurus, Ithaca 1983. * G.-B. CONTE, Il 'trionfo della morte' e la galleria dei grandi trapassati in Lucrezio 3, 1024–1053, SIFC 37, 1965, 114–132. * G.-B. CONTE, Hypsos e diatriba nello stile di Lucrezio (2. 1–61), Maia 18, 1966, 338–368. * G.-B. CONTE, Generi e lettori. Lucrezio, l'elegia d'amore, l'enciclopedia di Plinio, Milano 1991 (English: Baltimore 1994). * M. CONTI, Spunti politici nell'opera di Lucrezio, RCCM 24, 1982, 27–46. * C. CRACA, Il proemio dell'inno ad Epicuro nel V libro di Lucrezio, Orpheus n.s. 5, 1984, 182–187. * A. S. COX, Lucretius and his Message. A Study in the Prologues of the De rerum natura, G&R 18, 1971, 1–16. * A. DALZELL, Lucretius' Exposition of the Doctrine of Images, Hermathena 118, 1974, 22–32. * P. H. DELACY,

Lucretius and Plato, in: ΣΥΖΗΤΗΣΙΣ. Studi sull'epicureismo greco e romano offerti a M. GIGANTE, Napoli 1983, 291-307. * R. DEUTSCH, The Pattern of Sound in Lucretius, Bryn Mawr 1939, repr. New York sine anno. * H. DILLER, Die Prooemien des Lucrez und die Entstehung des Lucrezischen Gedichts, SIFC 25, 1951, 5-30. * I. DIONIGI, Due interpretazioni unilaterali di Lucrezio, StudUrb 47, 1973, 327-363. * I. DIONIGI, Lucr. 5, 1198-1203 e P. OXY. 215 col. I 7-24. L'epicureismo e la venerazione degli dèi, SIFC 48, 1976, 118-139. * I. DIONIGI, Lucrezio. Le parole e le cose, Bologna 1988. * J. M. DUBAN, Venus, Epicurus and Naturae species ratioque, AJPh 103, 1982, 165-177. * D. R. DUDLEY (ed.), Lucretius. Chapters by D. R. DUDLEY, B. FARRINGTON, O. E. LOWENSTEIN, W. S. MAGUINNESS, T. J. B. SPENCER, G. B. TOWNEND, D. E. W. WORMELL, London 1965. * D. R. DUDLEY, The Satiric Element in Lucretius, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., 1965, 115-130. * A. ERNOUT, Lucrèce, Bruxelles 1947. * B. FARRINGTON, Form and Purpose in the De rerum natura, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., 1965, 19-34. * W. FAUTH, Divus Epicurus. Zur Problemgeschichte philosophischer Religiosität bei Lukrez, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 205-225. * J. FERGUSON, Epicurean Language-Theory and Lucretian Practice, LCM 12, 1987, 100-105. * L. FERRERO, Poetica nuova in Lucrezio, Firenze 1949. * W. FITZGERALD, Lucretius' Cure for Love in the De rerum natura, CW 78, 1984, 73-86. * E. FLORES, La composizione dell'inno a Venere di Lucrezio e gli Inni omerici ad Afrodite, Vichiana n.s. 8, 1979, 237-251. * D. FOWLER, Lucretius on the clinamen and 'Free Will' (2. 251-93), in: ΣΥΖΗΤΗΣΙΣ. Studi sull'epicureismo greco e romano offerti a M. GIGANTE, Napoli 1983, 329-352. * P. FRIEDLÄNDER, Studien zur antiken Literatur und Kunst, Berlin 1969, 328-336; 337-353. * D. J. FURLEY, Lucretius and the Stoics, BICS 13, 1966, 13-33. * D. J. FURLEY, Lucretius the Epicurean. On the History of Man, in: Lucrèce. Huit exposés . . . 1-37. * B. GABRIEL, Bild und Lehre. Studien zum Lehrgedicht des Lukrez, diss. Frankfurt 1970. * M. GALE, Myth and Poetry in Lucretius, Cambridge 1994. * A. GALLOWAY, Lucretius' Materialist Poetics. Epicurus and the 'Flawed' Consolatio of Book 3, Ramus 15, 1986, 52-73. * F. GIANCOTTI, Il preludio di Lucrezio, Messina 1959. * F. GIANCOTTI, L'ottimismo relativo nel De rerum natura di Lucrezio, Torino 1960. * F. GIANCOTTI, Origini e fasi della religione nella 'storia dell'umanità' di Lucrezio, Elenchos 2, 1981, 45-78; 317-354. * O. GIGON, Lukrez und Ennius, in: Lucrèce. Huit exposés . . . 167-196. * N. W. GILBERT, The Concept of Will in Early Latin Philosophy, JHPh 1, 1963, 17-35. * L. GOMPF, Die Frage der Entstehung von Lukrezens Lehrgedicht, diss. Köln 1960. * G. P. GOOLD, A Lost Manuscript of Lucretius, A Class 1, 1958, 21-30. * C. GRACA, Da Epicuro a Lucrezio. Il maestro e il poeta nei proemi del De rerum natura, Amsterdam (announced). * P. GRIMAL, Lucrèce e l'hymne à Vénus. Essai d'interprétation, REL 35, 1957, 184-195. * P. GRIMAL, Elementa, primordia, principia dans le poème de Lucrèce, in: Mélanges de philosophie, de littérature et d'histoire ancienne offerts à P. BOYANCÉ, Rome 1974, 357–366. * G. D. HADZSITS, Lucretius and his Influence, New York 1935. * F. E. HOEVELS, Lukrez—ein kritischer oder dogmatischer Denker? Zur Interpretation von De rerum natura 1. 1052–1082 und 1. 735–758, Hermes 103, 1975, 333–349. * F. JACOBY, Das Prooemium des Lucretius, Hermes 56, 1921, 1–65. * J. JOPE, Lucretius, Cybele, and Religion, Phoenix 39, 1985, 250–262. * E. J. KENNEY, The Historical Imagination of Lucretius, G&R 19, 1972, 12–24. * E. J. KENNEY, Lucretius, Oxford 1977. * J. K. KING, Lucretius the Neoteric, in: Hypatia. Essays in Classics, Comparative Literature, and Philosophy. FS H. E. BARNES, Boulder 1985, 27–43. * K. KLEVE, Wie kann man an das Nicht-Existierende denken? Ein Problem der epikureischen Psychologie, SO 37, 1961, 45–57. * K. KLEVE, The Philosophical Polemics in Lucretius. A Study in the History of Epicurean Criticism, in: Lucrèce. Huit exposés . . . 39–75. * K. KLEVE, Lucrèce, l'épicurisme et l'amour, in: Association G. BUDÉ, Actes du VIII<sup>e</sup> congrès (Paris, 1968), Paris 1969, 376–383. * K. KLEVE, What Kind of Work Did Lucretius Write?, SO 54, 1979, 81–85. * K. KLEVE, Id facit exiguum clinamen, SO 55, 1980, 27–31. * K. KLEVE, Lucretius in Herculaneum, Cronache Ercolanesi 19, 1989, 5–27. * KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 5th ed. 1965, 191–217. * KLINGNER, Studien 126–155. * E. D. KOLLMANN, Lucretius' Criticism of the Early Greek Philosophers, StudClas 13, 1971, 79–93. * D. KONSTAN, Some Aspects of Epicurean Psychology, Leiden 1973. * W. KRANZ, Lukrez und Empedokles, Philologus 96, 1944, 68–107. * W. KULLMANN, Zu den historischen Voraussetzungen der Beweismethoden des Lukrez, RhM 123, 1980, 97–125. * A. M. LATHIÈRE, Lucrèce traducteur d'Epicure. Animus, anima dans les livres 3 et 4 du De rerum natura, Phoenix 26, 1972, 123–133. * LEEMAN, Form 139–159. * A. LEEN, The Rhetorical Value of the Similes in Lucretius, in: Classical Texts and their Traditions. FS C. R. TRAHMAN, Chico, Calif. 1984, 107–123. * C. LENZ, Die wiederholten Verse bei Lukrez, diss. Leipzig 1937. * O. E. LOWENSTEIN, The Pre-Socratics, Lucretius, and Modern Science, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., 1965, 1–17. * Lucrèce. Huit exposés suivis de discussions par D. J. FURLEY, K. KLEVE, P. H. SCHRIVERS, WOLFG. SCHMID, O. GIGON, GERH. MÜLLER, P. GRIMAL, L. ALFONSI, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 24, 1978. * W. LÜCK, Die Quellenfrage im 5. und 6. Buch des Lukrez, diss. Breslau 1932. * H. LUDWIG, Materialismus und Metaphysik. Studien zur epikureischen Philosophie bei T. Lucretius Carus, Köln 1976. * H. LUDWIG, Naturgesetz bei Lukrez, Philosophia naturalis 16, 1977, 459–479. * T. MANTERO, L'ansietà di Lucrezio e il problema dell'inculturazione dell'umanità nel De rerum natura, Genova 1976. * B. MANUWALD, Der Aufbau der lukrezischen Kulturentstehungslehre (De rerum natura 5. 925–1457), AAWM 1980, 3. * J. MASSON, Lucretius. Epicurean and Poet, 2 vols., London 1907–1909. * R. MINADEO, The Lyre of Science. Form and Meaning in Lucretius' De rerum natura, Detroit 1969. * J. D. MINYARD, Mode and Value in the De rerum natura. A Study in

Lucretius' Metrical Language, Wiesbaden 1978. * J. D. MINYARD, Lucretius and the Late Republic. An Essay in Roman Intellectual History, Leiden 1985. * F. MORGANTE, Il progresso umano in Lucrezio e Seneca, RCCM 16, 1974, 3-40. * A. MÜHL, Die Frage der Entstehung von Lukrezens Lehrgedicht, Helikon 8, 1968, 477-484. * Gerh. MÜLLER, Die Darstellung der Kinetik bei Lukrez, Berlin 1959. * Gerh. MÜLLER, Die Finalia der sechs Bücher des Lucrez, in: Lucrece. Huit exposés . . . 197-231. * R. MÜLLER, Die epikureische Gesellschaftstheorie, Berlin 1972. * J. J. O'HARA, Somnia ficta in Lucretius and Lucilius, CQ n.s. 37, 1987, 517-519. * E. PARATORE, La problematica sull'epicureismo a Roma, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 116-204. * L. PERELLI, Lucrezio poeta dell'angoscia, Firenze 1969. * J.-M. PIGEAUD, La physiologie de Lucrece, REL 58, 1980, 176-200. * U. PIZZANI, Il problema del testo e della composizione del De rerum natura di Lucrezio, Roma 1959. * G. PUCCIONI, Epicuro e Lucrezio, A&R n.s. 26, 1981, 48-49. * E. K. RAND, La composition rhétorique du troisième livre de Lucrece, RPh sér. 3, 8 (= 60), 1934, 243-266. * O. REGENBOGEN, Lukrez. Seine Gestalt in seinem Gedicht. Interpretationen, Leipzig 1932, repr. in: O. REGENBOGEN, Kleine Schriften, ed. by F. DIRLMEIER, München 1961, 296-386. * W. RÖSLER, Lukrez und die Vorsokratiker. Doxographische Probleme im 1. Buch von De rerum natura, Hermes 101, 1973, 48-64. * M. ROZELAAR, Lukrez. Versuch einer Deutung, diss. Amsterdam 1941. * G. RUNCHINA, Studi su Lucrezio, Cagliari 1983. * K. SALLMANN, Studien zum philosophischen Naturbegriff der Römer mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des Lukrez, ABG 7, 1962, 140-284; 311-325. * K. SALLMANN, Nunc huc rationis detulit ordo. Noch einmal zum Aufbau der Kulturlehre des Lukrez, in: Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte. FS G. RADKE, Münster 1986, 245-256. * W. G. SALTZER, Parmenides, Leukippos und die Grundlegung der epikureischen Physik und Ethik bei Lukrez, diss. Frankfurt 1964. * S. SAMBORSKY, Das physikalische Weltbild der Antike, Zürich and Stuttgart 1965. * G. SASSO, Il progresso e la morte. Saggi su Lucrezio, Bologna 1979. * T. J. SAUNDERS, Free Will and the Atomic Swerve in Lucretius, SO 59, 1984, 37-59. * A. SCHIESARO, Simulacrum et imago. Gli argomenti analogici nel De rerum natura, Pisa 1990. * Wolfg. SCHMID, Lucretius ethicus, in: Lucrece. Huit exposés . . . 123-165. * Wolfg. SCHMID, Lukrez. Probleme der Lukrezdeutung. Beiträge zur Lukrezforschung von Vahlen bis zur Gegenwart, Hildesheim 1968. * Jürgen SCHMIDT, Lukrez, der Kepos und die Stoiker. Untersuchungen zur Schule Epikurs und zu den Quellen von De rerum natura (diss. Marburg 1975), Frankfurt 1990. * A. SCHOELE, Zeitaltersage und Entwicklungstheorien. Die Vorstellungen vom Werden von Hesiod bis Lukrez, diss. Berlin 1960. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, Horror ac divina voluptas. Etudes sur la poétique et la poésie de Lucrece, Amsterdam 1970. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, La pensée de Lucrece sur l'origine de la vie (De rerum natura 5, 780-820), Mnemosyne 27, 1974, 245-261. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, La pensée de Lucrece

sur l'origine du langage, Mnemosyne 27, 1974, 337–364. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, Le regard sur l'invisible. Etude sur l'emploi de l'analogie dans l'œuvre de Lucrèce, in: Lucrèce. Huit exposés . . . 77–121. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, Die Traumtheorie des Lukrez, Mnemosyne 33, 1980, 128–151. * P. H. SCHRIJVERS, Sur quelques aspects de la critique des mythes chez Lucrèce, in: ΣΥΖΗΤΗΣΙΣ. Studi sull'epicureismo greco e romano offerti a M. GIGANTE, Napoli 1983, 353–371. * C. SEGAL, War, Death and Savagery in Lucretius. The Beasts of Battle in 5, 1308–49, Ramus 15, 1986, 1–34. * C. SEGAL, Lucretius on Death and Anxiety. Poetry and Philosophy in De rerum natura, Princeton 1990. * E. E. SIKES, Lucretius, Poet and Philosopher, Cambridge 1936. * M. F. SMITH, Lucretius and Diogenes of Oenoanda, Prometheus 12, 1986, 193–207. * M. F. SMITH, Notes on Lucretius, CQ 43, 1993, 336–339. * J. McINTOSH SNYDER, Puns and Poetry in Lucretius' De rerum natura, Amsterdam 1980. * F. SOLMSEN, A Peculiar Omission in Lucretius' Account of Human Civilization, Philologus 114, 1970, 256–261. * G. SOMMARIVA, Il proemio del De rerum natura di Lucrezio e l'inno a Demetrio Poliorkete, SIFC 54, 1982, 166–185. * L. A. SPRINGER, The Role of religio, solvo and ratio in Lucretius, CW 71, 1977, 55–61. * T. STORK, Nil igitur mors est ad nos. Der Schlußteil des dritten Lukrezbuches und sein Verhältnis zur Konsolationsliteratur, Bonn 1970. * A. STÜCKELBERGER, Vestigia Democritea. Die Rezeption der Lehre von den Atomen in der antiken Naturwissenschaft und Medizin, Basel 1984, esp. 149–156. * D. C. SWANSON, A Formal Analysis of Lucretius' Vocabulary, Minneapolis 1962. * M. SWOBODA, De Lucretii hymno Veneris sacro, Eos 68, 1980, 95–102. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Die Rede der Natur. Popularphilosophisches in den Schlußpartien des 3. Buches des Lukrez, AU 26, 3, 1983, 19–35. * W. J. TATUM, The Presocratics in Book One of Lucretius' De rerum natura, TAPhA 114, 1984, 177–189. * D. TAYLOR, Declinatio, Amsterdam 1974. * M. TESTARD, Les idées religieuses de Lucrèce, BAGB 3, 1976, 249–272. * E. M. THURY, Lucretius' Poem as a simulacrum of the De rerum natura, AJPh 108, 1987, 270–294. * G. B. TOWNEND, Imagery in Lucretius, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., 1965, 95–114. * B. P. WALLACH, Lucretius and the Diatribe against the Fear of Death (De rerum natura 3. 830–1094), Leiden 1976. * A. WASSERSTEIN, Epicurean Science, Hermes 106, 1978, 484–494. * J. H. WASZINK, Lucretius and Poetry, Mededelingen der Koninklijke Nederlandse Akademie van Wetenschappen, Afd. Letterkunde n.s. 17, 1954, 243–257. * J. H. WASZINK, La création des animaux dans Lucrèce, RBPh 42, 1964, 48–56. * J. H. WASZINK, Zum Exkurs des Lukrez über Glaube und Aberglaube (5. 1194–1240), WS 79, 1966, 308–313. * K. WELLESLEY, Reflections upon the Third Book of Lucretius, ACD 10–11, 1974–1975, 31–40. * D. WEST, The Imagery and Poetry of Lucretius, Edinburgh 1969. * D. WEST, Virgilian Multiple-Correspondence Similes and their Antecedents, 7: The Virgilian Simile and Lucretius, Philologus 114, 1970, 272–275. * D. WEST, Lucretius' Methods of Arguments (3. 417–614), CQ n.s. 25, 1975, 94-116. * A. D. WINSPEAR, Lucretius and Scientific Thought, Montreal 1963. * B. WIŚNIEWSKI, Sur les origines de la théorie de la culture et du langage de Lucrèce, Concilium Eirene XVI, I, Prag 1983, 177-182. * D. E. W. WORMELL, The Personal World of Lucretius, in: D. R. DUDLEY, ed., 1965, 35-67. * K. ZIEGLER, Der Tod des Lucretius, Hermes 71, 1936, 419-440. * J. J. M. ZONNEVELD, Angore metuque. Woordstudie over de angst in De rerum natura van Lucretius (with a summary in French), diss. Nijmegen 1959.

D. LYRIC AND EPIGRAM

ROMAN LYRIC

General Remarks

The modern notion of lyric became established about 1700 in Italy, and from there was transferred to Germany.<sup>1</sup> 'Epic presents an event developing from the past; drama, an action extending to the future; lyric, a feeling enclosed in the present.'<sup>2</sup> For today's sensibility therefore, lyric addresses a much smaller public than epic and drama. However, this distinction, based on content, is not precisely suited to ancient lyric, and has in fact done more harm than good to the understanding of the Roman lyric poets.

Conversely, ancient definitions of lyric mainly start from the formal aspect, particularly from meter.<sup>3</sup> Whereas epic and dramatic dialogue consist of spoken verse, lyric is composed of verses that are sung. At least in theory, and in antiquity also in practice, the musical element plays in it a greater role than in other poetic genres. Under the rubric of sung poetry or 'melic', ancient theory includes both sung monody<sup>4</sup> and choral lyric without distinction. Μέλος means both limb and song, musical phrase, melody; μέλη are lyric verses as distinguished from those of drama and epic. Elegy and iambus by contrast at an early stage already were only recited, and therefore do not count as lyric in the strict sense.

In Latin, melos and melicus were rare technical words. Carmen lyricum is the fixed antithesis to epic, which was treated by the grammaticus in his lessons. Originally, lyric meant something sung to lyre accompaniment. The word λυρικός belongs to musical theory. In literary theory, it appears at first in connection with the canon of the nine lyric poets, and so emphasizes the classical rank of the authors in

---

<sup>1</sup> I. BEHRENS 1940.

<sup>2</sup> Jean Paul, Vorschule der Ästhetik, edition and commentary by N. MILLER, München 1963, 272 (§ 75).

<sup>3</sup> P. STEINMETZ, Gattungen und Epochen der griechischen Literatur in der Sicht Quintilians, Hermes 92, 1964, 454-466.

<sup>4</sup> Either continuous (stichic) or in strophes of two to four lines.

question. The lyre is the instrument of domestic music and of musical instruction. The term 'lyric' is explained by the fact that the poet-composers of this genre were treated by the teacher of 'music' (i.e. the 'lyre') and not by the grammaticus.<sup>1</sup> Monodic lyric was linked with the lyre. For public performances, the cithara, 'invented by Apollo', was the principal instrument. Dramatic choruses were accompanied by 'flute' (αὐλός) music.

Along with this, there were efforts to categorize literary genres according to methods of representation. Plato (d. 349/348 B.C.) distinguished narrative, dramatic and mixed form, though without mentioning lyric (rep. 3. 394 b-c). Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) left out the mixed form (poet. 3. 1448 a 19-24). Proclus (5th century A.D.) linked both schemes by subsuming the mixed form under the narrative. Melic appeared in theoreticians of the Aristotelian school, along with epic, elegy and iambus, as a subdivision of the genus enarrativum or mixtum.

Further divisions of lyric took into account its subjects (gods, men, both); the movement involved (towards the altar, in dance around the altar, at rest); its strophic structure (monostrophic, triadic).

Lyric, a combination of word, rhythm, meter, and melos, had several pre-literary roots which gave it a primitive force. It named things and made them available, harking back to magic and ritual. The musical rhythm provided a link with work-song and festive dance. The stimulating or calming effect on the minds of the listeners, exemplified by Orpheus, pointed to a basic connection between lyric and rhetoric, a relationship significant in antiquity.

Greek Background

Lyric is one of the tenderest blossoms of literature. In Ionia, with its openness to experience of the world, it was not long before personal tones were heard. In the European part of Greece, the links with the community persisted longer. The greatest poetess, Sappho (about 600 B.C.), influenced Catullus (carm. 51). Alcaeus (about 600 B.C.) and Pindar (who died some time after 446) influenced Horace. He, like Lucilius, also owed something to Archilochus, who in the 7th century B.C. had written both iambs and lyrics.

<sup>1</sup> H. GÖRGEMANN 1990 with reference to Plat. leg. 809 c-d.

Some expectations felt by the modern reader of lyric require qualification in the case of early Greece.<sup>1</sup> Originality and freely created imagery may not always be found. Early Greek lyric is part of a tradition of linguistic craftsmanship, and consciously takes note of previous models. It employs an inherited store of images. Metaphors serve as abbreviations, myths as illustrations of typical destinies and situations. These features help to make the lyric texts understandable for the society for which they were sung.

Likewise, the concept of absolute poetry may not be applicable. Early Greek lyric has for the most part a precise social context, a purpose in society<sup>2</sup> or in the service of the gods. It is meant for a festival. It is a poetry predominantly concerned with an occasion, a particular application. It is closely linked with music and dance and, in the absence of these elements, it is hard for us to judge it. It may be imagined what would happen if we now had only the texts of the masterpieces of European vocal music.

Is there a reluctance to reflection? But early Greek lyric wishes to communicate insight. The maxim or gnome is part of it. Just like the elegists, the lyric poet too presents himself as a wise man. Even enjoyment of life is recommended because it is the more reasonable course.

Mere atmosphere and reluctance to exert an influence on others are also inapplicable criteria. The early Greek lyrist aims at effect. This explains his frequent apostrophes and his closeness to speech. If misfortune is mentioned, it is mainly in the search for deliverance.

Is it personal poetry? The 'I' which exercises judgment in choric songs is meant to be representative of the society, enabling singer and listener to recognize themselves in the song. A parallel is provided by Medieval and Baroque lyric, reaching all the way to the 'I' in 17th and 18th century hymnbook poetry. The employment of the first person in poems the speaker of which is evidently not identical with the poet is also relevant: for example, Walther von der Vogelweide's Under der linden is spoken by a girl. It is true that in early Greek monodic lyric the individual begins to express himself, a fact not to be underestimated. But the expression of subjective feeling is not the chief purpose. The objective circumstances of life, nature, and society help to determine the consciousness of the poet. Alcaeus reflected a male society, Anacreon the world of the symposium, Sappho her company of girls. It is she who is relatively closest to the modern notion of lyric; yet, precisely in this respect Horace did not follow her.

<sup>1</sup> Basic study by R. PFEIFFER 1929 and (less commendable) F. KLINGNER 1930.

<sup>2</sup> 'The highest form of lyric is decidedly historical. The effort to separate the mythical/historical elements from Pindar's odes would amount to totally cutting off their inner life. Modern lyric is always more inclined toward the elegiac' (Goethe, Adelchi. Tragedia, Milano 1822. A review, 1827, WA 42, 1, 1904, 173).

Before early Greek lyric made its impact, it was Hellenistic poetry that was influential at Rome. In it the attention of the artist was concentrated on the world of emotions and passions. The particular situation became less important. Mood appeared as an aesthetic value in its own right, and playful effects were sought for their own sake. In Euripides, poetry came to despair of its previous role as guide. In the Hellenistic period it gained its aesthetic values from widely different objects and may even affirm what is foolish and irresponsible.<sup>1</sup> These 'human' features bring it closer to the modern reader.

Roman Development

Doubtless there were Roman work-songs and popular songs, and there are even references to popular choric songs. Although these pre-literary songs had no influence on literature, they show that right from the beginning the Romans did not lack lyrical talent and musical feeling. Ancient religious hymns are known to us. Livius Andronicus wrote a ritual song for a maidens' choir. A rich store of lyric poetry, not yet evaluated as such, is found in the Plautine cantica. In general, Roman drama, because of the dominant role of music, must have contained an abundance of lyrical elements.

Nevertheless, many Romans may well have agreed with Cicero (apud Sen. epist. 49. 5) in his remark that he could not find time to read lyric even if he had two lives.

Personal poetry appeared in older Latin literature in the first instance not as lyrical song but as iamb or satura. Catullus drew the traditions of iamb, epigram and other Hellenistic genres into a unique amalgam that is all his own. United only by the poet's individuality, his book stands like an isolated boulder on ancient literary landscape. In Horace, Roman lyric made its first appearance as a genuinely independent genre (carmina), sponsored by both Hellenistic and early Greek lyric. Horace lent to the genres of iamb, ode and satire previously mingled in Roman personal poetry, a shape that was in each case organic and independent. The compromise between aesthetic demands of the Greek type and a Roman individuality bursting generic limits is his quite personal achievement.

---

<sup>1</sup> F. KLINGNER 1930, 71-72.

Antiquity distinguished epigram and occasional poem from lyric. Even so, Statius, Martial, Ausonius, Claudian, along with the poets of the Latin Anthology and of the Pervigilium Veneris (2nd to 4th century A.D.) have to our way of thinking many points of contact with this genre. For lyric in the strict sense, there was at Rome no genuine generic tradition.<sup>1</sup> There were only individual achievements. The first high point after Plautus' cantica was found in Catullus, although his poems for ancient readers were mostly to be categorized as epigrams. The second was Horace, the third the Christian lyricist Prudentius. All three were at Rome lonely eminences and, at best, indirect products of their ambience, insofar as they did not do what society expected of them, but something completely novel and, in the eyes of their contemporaries, absurd.<sup>2</sup>

Each of them comes, even culturally, from a different background. Their mutual artistic debt may certainly be listed (see below), but that is not the decisive point. However, it should be noted that the critical dialogue with predecessors far removed in time, like that of Prudentius with Horace, has more significance than any link with empty forms transmitted by the schools. Some aspects of Horatian lyric may be touched on here. This offers the possibility of a comparison with archaic Greek lyric (see above).

Imitation and Originality: Horace takes Hellenistic literature as his point of departure, but also looks back to early Greek poetry. His choice of literary models has deeper significance. Roman lyric poets use archaic Greek in order to discover their own identity.

Pure poetry, verbal music: Horace delights in the multiplicity of Greek meters which he introduces to Rome, partly following Hellenistic tradition. Horace's imagination is not static, but contains an element of dance.

---

<sup>1</sup> This does not exclude the possibility that Horace may be taking passages of Catullus into account and refining them: J. FERGUSON, Catullus and Horace, AJPh 77, 1956, 1-18.

<sup>2</sup> In this respect there is a closeness to elegy, treated separately later.

Reason and didacticism: Horace often tries to subtract himself from the immediate impact of emotions. In contrast with the elegists, for example, he preserves his freedom by soft-peddalling his feelings. While Catullus presents the state of surrender, Horace shows an emotion that is controlled.

Address: addresses are not simply communications, but also expressions of will, and as such they intend to provoke future actions. The poet aims to convince, and so draws close to the orator. Horace attempts, even if perhaps on many occasions only as a feint, to create something analogous to the complex relations with life found in early Greek poetry.

The world without and within (macrocosm and microcosm): Horace's lyric is at the same time personal and more than personal. The 'lyrical ego' is made the mirror of social and in part even ritual relationships. Horace from his own will creates a world, in which individual, state and nature find a common center in the lyrical ego. From the subjectivity of his Roman and Hellenistic approach, Horace as an intellectual discoverer guides lyric towards an objective view of reality.

Ancient theorists would have categorized only a small portion of Statius' occasional poems as 'lyric'. The same is the case with Martial and Ausonius. If we set aside the Pervigilium Veneris and the tiny stanzas of Hadrian, it is not until late antiquity that significant Latin lyric is found again. Prudentius gives new life to classical forms, while Ambrose develops some which are novel, and which point to the future.

Literary Technique

Right into the 19th century, lyric was meant to be sung. The musical performance of Horace's carmen saeculare is actually attested. The musical presentation of the odes before a small audience is not wholly undisputed, but still very probable.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> G. WILLE, Singen und Sagen in der Dichtung des Horaz, in: Eranion, FS H. HOMMEL, Tübingen 1961, 169–184; N. A. BONAVIA-HUNT, Horace the Minstrel, Kineton 1969; M. VON ALBRECHT, Musik und Dichtung bei Horaz, in: Bimillenario della morte di Q. Orazio Flacco, Atti I: Atti del convegno di Venosa (1992), Venosa 1993, 75–100. The counter-argument is found in E. PÖHLMANN, Marius Victorinus zum Odengesang bei Horaz, in: E.P., Beiträge zur antiken und neueren Musikgeschichte, Frankfurt 1988, 135–143.

Lyric contains different types of poems,<sup>1</sup> for example, hymns to the gods. Of these, there are numerous instances, and even parodies, in Catullus and Horace. Typical of the hymnic 'predicative' style is the use of relative pronouns and anaphora.

Eulogies and celebrations of victory or triumph are related to this, as are marriage songs (epithalamia), dirges (epikedeia), and poems of consolation. Other types of poetry are: the propempticon, wishing bon voyage to a departing friend, of which Horace carm. 1. 3 offers an example that transcends the stereotype; the contrasting anti-propempticon, wishing 'a bad trip' to an enemy (Horace epod. 10), forms a transition to abusive poems. Other types are: poems of invitation (Catullus 13; Horace carm. 1. 20); sympotic or drinking poems; versified problems of arithmetic, parodied in Catullus' kiss poems; different types of love poem; poems of friendship; poems reflecting on life and its problems; poems of the seasons, and so on. Poets give an individual turn to traditional contents and forms, thus lending each poem a charm of its own.

The ode (literally 'song') is distinguished by its link with Aeolian lyric, whether by opening motto, as frequently in Horace, or at least by the choice of meter.

In ancient lyric, the employment of rhetorical procedures is by no means excluded. Examples would be the use of the priamel or listing of examples; and summarizing devices.<sup>2</sup>

Horace's odes characteristically make use of an addressee. This involves an element of dialogue, and some intention to influence a partner, at least as a basic attitude, even if to some degree it may have become conventional. Roman lyric is often close to the language of oratory, aiming to overwhelm and convince. This feature of communication found in Horace's lyric distinguishes it from the 'solitary' lyric of later times. In Catullus, a remarkable additional feature appears in the numerous self-addresses, preparing the way for the 'internal monologue'.

---

<sup>1</sup> KAYSER (335-344) distinguishes three lyrical types: call (address), song (speech) and gnome (naming). In accordance with the types of speaking, he differentiates between: resolve, admonition, praise, celebration, lament, accusation, dirge for the dead, request, prayer, encouragement, prophecy, confession.

<sup>2</sup> CURTIUS, Europäische Lit. 293-294.

Language and Style

The structure of early Latin verse is disputed. Possibly it involved a combination of techniques, partly syllabic and partly determined by the number of words. There soon followed the adoption of Greek quantitative meter. For a long time, it maintained its supremacy until, in late antiquity, the feel for quantities disappeared. Now accentual meters made their appearance, showing considerable poetic qualities. Even so, quantitative poetry continued to be fostered by authors conscious of tradition.

Influenced by lofty formulas of law and prayer, Roman poetry had a particular affinity for alliteration. Rhymes were produced, for example in the pentameter, by the deliberate hyperbaton separating words belonging together. But rhyme did not have the dominant significance which it has enjoyed in the poetry of the Middle Ages and of modern times. Originally it had belonged to formal prose as developed by Gorgias. It was from here that it came into poetry, as may be seen in poets influenced by rhetoric. From Medieval Christian hymns, rhymes spread further to literatures in the vernacular.

In Plautus and in Republican tragedy the lyrical sections show greater linguistic and stylistic elevation than dialogue. The lyric of Catullus and Horace is often closer to the spoken language than, for example, elegy or epic, although their refined simplicity must not be confused with a lack of artistry. Horace's strophes and their verbal mosaic are among the most complex and polished poetry ever written.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Catullus calls his poems nugae. Following the neoteric fashion, he interprets his poetry as play. In this respect there is a similarity to Ovid, whose playful attitude in the Hellenistic manner has never been doubted. Since the days of French poésie absolue this side of Catullus has been better understood. The exclusive interpretation of Catullus as a poet of 'personal experience' is contradicted by a coarse rejoinder in which he expressly disclaimed such a reading: 'the pure poet must be chaste—in his own person. His verses by no means have to be chaste' (carm. 16. 5–6). Of course here Catullus is on the defensive (as Ovid was later, trist. 2. 353–354), and it may be doubted whether the poet's words should be taken as declaration of principle. Even so, it is remarkable that this utterance puts him openly at odds with the love elegists whose ancestor he is frequently taken to be.

Horace credits his reputation as a poet to his inclusion by Maecenas in the canon of lyric poets (carm. 1. 1. 35). On the one hand, he is proud of his technical achievement, for it is he who introduced to Italy 'Aeolic song' (carm. 3. 30. 13-14). On the other, the poet of the carmen saeculare considers himself a vates (cf. carm. 4. 6. 44), assigning to himself not only artistic skill (ars) but also inspiration (carm. 4. 6. 29).

Horace perceives himself, not only as a poet of supreme art, but also as the poet of his people. It is predominantly in this last capacity that he looks back to early Greek models. But in his lyric poetry he also avoids on the whole straining his powers. He carefully distinguishes the ode from higher types of poetry, on which he ventured only rarely and indirectly (e.g. carm. 4. 2).

Prudentius establishes a Christian idea of the poet, although not in the sense of some dubious consecration of his poetry. He presents his poetry as an offering, and is aware that he is tolerated as a simple vessel in the house of God. He finds his happiness in the presentation of offerings, the fulfilling of a service in the divine economy, in the proclamation and praise of Christ (iuvabit personasse Christum, 'it will be my happiness to have sung with my lips of Christ', epil. 34).<sup>1</sup>

Ideas II

The Neoterics joined strong personal feeling with dedication to formal perfection. Catullus was one of those Roman 'angry young men',<sup>2</sup> questioning established values and substituting for them his own private universe. This led him to transform the significance of Roman values. His finest lyrical creations combine a mature artistic form with unusual freshness, bridging the gap of the millennia.

Horace gives more emphasis than Catullus to the philosophy of life. It is this which links his satires and epistles. The deeper reason for this link is to be found in the poet's own individuality, which uses a Socratic and ironic 'modesty' as a method of expanding its consciousness,<sup>1</sup> a feature stemming from Roman personal poetry as written by Lucilius. In choosing the small-scale lyrical form in the Hellenistic manner, the poet diminishes his own ego. Yet he finds the courage, in his time and society, freely to construct his own lyrical world by drawing on the poetry of early Greece. In this world, individual, society and nature find a common center in the lyrical persona. This is an exceptional artistic achievement. Horace's lyric is not a direct consequence of social circumstances, and not even a response to them. It is his personal creation. By this act of Horace, Cicero's negative verdict on lyric is robbed of its validity. Horace showed that the lyrist had a message even for the statesman without, at the same time, surrendering himself. It is no coincidence that time and again in Europe, at the birth of great lyric poetry, it is Horace who has acted as godfather.

<sup>1</sup> A comparison between Horace and Prudentius is found in VON ALBRECHT Poesie 262-276.

<sup>2</sup> A. D. LEEMAN, Catull 'angry young man', now in: LEEMAN, Form 111-121.

Lyric, as realized in Horace's poetry, comprises far more than the mind of an individual. It extends to the people around him, friends of both sexes; society and state, culminating in Augustus; the literary background—contemporaries such as Virgil and, of no less importance, those Greek and Roman predecessors with whom in his works the poet engages in dialogue. Along with this cultural background, that of nature must also be remembered: the life of the elements, the stars, and the gods. In Horace's lyric, with its numerous names and concrete terms, worlds are reflected. Yet this reflection is quite personal. In the light of such an artistic achievement, the question of subjectivity and objectivity, personal and more than personal, mediacy and immediacy, loses importance. If it must be raised, the paradoxical solution is that Horace's individuality as a lyric poet consists in not being satisfied with individual lyricism.

Horace, even as poet of the res publica and of the world, rests securely upon himself. By contrast, the Christian lyrist Prudentius draws his value from God and Christ, that is, from a center that stands outside himself.<sup>2</sup>

W. ALBERT, Das mimetische Gedicht in der Antike. Geschichte und Typologie von den Anfängen bis in die augusteische Zeit, Frankfurt 1988. * I. BEHRENS, Die Lehre von der Einteilung der Dichtkunst, vornehmlich vom 16. bis 18. Jh. Studien zur Geschichte der poetischen Gattungen, Halle 1940. * G. BENN, <sup>1</sup> ZINN, Weltgedicht.

<sup>2</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 276.

Probleme der Lyrik, in: Gesammelte Werke, ed. by D. WELLERSHOFF, vol. 4, Wiesbaden 1968, 1058–1096. * K. BÜCHNER, Vom Wesen römischer Lyrik, AU ser. 1, 1951, no. 2, 3–17. * K. BÜCHNER, Die römische Lyrik. Texte, Übersetzungen, Interpretationen, Geschichte, Stuttgart 1976. * H. DOMIN, Wozu Lyrik heute? Dichtung und Leser in der gesteuerten Gesellschaft, München 1968. * H. FÄRBER, Die Lyrik in der Kunsttheorie der Antike, München 1936. * H. FRIEDRICH, Die Struktur der modernen Lyrik. Von Baudelaire bis zur Gegenwart, Hamburg 1956, with add. 1967. * H. GÖR-GEMANNS, Zum Ursprung des Begriffs 'Lyrik', in: Musik und Dichtung. Neue Forschungsbeiträge, V. PÖSCHL zum 80. Geburtstag, Frankfurt 1990, 51–61. * N. A. GREENBERG, The Use of Poëma and Poësis, HSPH 65, 1961, 263–289. * P. GRIMAL, Le lyrisme à Rome, Paris 1978. * M. HAMBURGER, Die Dialektik der modernen Lyrik. Von Baudelaire bis zur Konkreten Poesie, München 1972. * R. HEINZE, Die horazische Ode, NJA 51, 1923, 153–168; repr. in: R.H., Vom Geist des Römertums, Darmstadt 3rd ed. 1960, 172–189. * F. KLINGNER, Horazische und moderne Lyrik, Antike 6, 1930, 65–84 (probl.). * M. KOMMERELL, Gedanken über Gedichte, Frankfurt 2nd ed. 1956. * P. A. MILLER, Lyric Texts and Lyric Consciousness. The Birth of a Genre from Archaic Greece to Augustan Rome, London 1994. * G. PASQUALI, Orazio lirico, Firenze 1920. * R. PFEIFFER, Gottheit und Individuum in der frühgriechischen Lyrik, Philologus 84, 1929, 137–152. * V. PÖSCHL, Horazische Lyrik, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1991. * F. SOLMSEN, Die Dichteridee des Horaz und ihre Probleme, ZÄsth 26, 1932, 149–163. * STAIGER, Grundbegriffe. * P. STEINMETZ, Lyrische Dichtung im 2. Jh. n. Chr., ANRW 2, 33, 1, 1989, 259–302. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Die Lyrik des Horaz, 2 vols., Darmstadt 1972–1973. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Catull. Eine Interpretation, 3 vols., Darmstadt 1984–1990. * I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975. * E. VOEGE, Mittelbarkeit und Unmittelbarkeit in der Lyrik. Untersuchungen zu lyrischen Gedichten des Altertums und der Neuzeit im Hinblick auf die herrschende deutsche Lyrik-Theorie, Wortkunst n.s., no. 8, München 1932, repr. 1973. * L. P. WILKINSON, Horace and his Lyric Poetry, Cambridge 3rd ed. 1968. * L. P. WILKINSON, Ancient Literature and Modern Literary Criticism, PCA 69, 1972, 13–26. * ZINN, Weltgedicht. * E. ZINN, Erlebnis und Dichtung bei Horaz, in: Wege zu Horaz, Darmstadt 1972, 369–388. * E. ZINN, Viva Vox, Frankfurt 1994.

ROMAN EPIGRAM

General Remarks

Epigram means 'inscription'. Our modern sense of 'epigrammatic', meaning something with a sharp edge of ridicule, did not originally belong to the epigram's essence, although brevity and precision were expected from the start.

Different types of inscriptions may be distinguished by their content: public and private, serious and light-hearted, dedicatory inscriptions, funerary inscriptions and so on.

Epigrams may be written either in prose or verse. Among the numerous meters possible (hexameter, hendecasyllable, iamb, scazon, to which in Rome may be added the venerable saturnian), the elegiac couplet occupies the place of honor. By its peculiar structure, it encourages the use of double clauses and antithetical style, and stimulates a delight in pointed formulation.

The genre, as brought to perfection by Martial, often presents its content in two successive stages. The first conceals the point to be made, while the second gives it surprising revelation. It is customary to speak of 'expectation' and 'resolution'.

Greek Background

Greek epigram arose partly from the usage of dedicatory and funeral inscriptions, and partly from the custom of improvising sympotic or erotic epigrams in the company of friends.

For the Romans, Hellenistic collections (among others) such as the epigrams of Callimachus and the Garland of Meleager were important. Greek epigram exercised strong influence even on Roman love elegy.

Roman Development

At Rome the use of the epigram as inscription had a long tradition. In their language, the remarkable inscriptions of the Scipio family bear testimony to a developed sense of form, while their content is the fulfillment of individual destiny within a traditional social framework. Here may also be listed funerary inscriptions of women, such as the familiar verse epitaph of a certain Claudia.<sup>1</sup>

With the increasing Hellenization in the way of life of the Roman upper class, other values made their appearance. Around the turn of the second to 1st centuries at Rome we find epigrammatic poetry in the Hellenistic style.

<sup>1</sup> Here (CIL I, 2nd ed. Berolini 1918, No. 1211) senarii are employed. Elsewhere in the older period saturnians are found, later hexameters and elegiac couplets.

Representatives of the Roman aristocracy were active as poets of personal epigram: Valerius Aedituus, Porcius Licinus, Quintus Lutatius Catulus.

They were later followed by Varro Atacinus, Licinius Calvus, and Catullus. Like those of Laevius, Catullus' poems stand between epigram and lyric. As we are told, erotic poems were also written by Q. Hortensius, C. Memmius, and Q. Scaevola.

Epigrammatists of the Augustan period were Domitius Marsus, Sulpicia, Cornificia, Gaetulicus, and Augustus himself.

The master of the epigram, Martial, was active under Domitian. He signifies a high point never again attained.

From the late period may be mentioned not only Ausonius and many minor poets such as Prosper of Aquitaine, but also the poets of the Anthologia Latina and the numerous Carmina epigraphica.

Literary Technique

Already among the early authors at Rome a tendency is revealed towards pointed expression (cf. Val. Aedituus pp. 42-43 Morel = 54-55 Bü.; Lutatius Catulus ibid. 43 = 55-56 Bü.) and a playful intensification of the meaning in the concluding line.

Language and Style

The intertwining of words reveals a degree of extreme artificiality even in the older Latin epigrammatists. An example is provided (if the text is rightly restored) by Val. Aed. 3-4. We find the play subitus subidus, and again: sic tacitus subidus dum pudeo pereo ('thus longing and silent, I refrain and die'). The final point in the next epigram is presented less directly: at contra hunc ignem Veneris nisi si Venus ipsa/ nulla est, quae possit vis alia opprimere ('Venus herself alone can quell her fire, no other force there is that has such power').

Polysyllabic words are still, as this example shows, by no means avoided at the end of the pentameter. Final -s does not yet always make position; Lutatius Catulus writes, for example: da, Venu', consilium. Technical refinement still had some way to go, but a noteworthy beginning had been made.

In no time the screw of sense appears to be tightened too much. Matius describes kissing with the help of a neologism and a word order reflecting the sense: columbulatim labra conserens labris, 'joining lips to lips like turtle-doves' (p. 50 Morel = 64 Bü.).

Laevius was a particularly bold linguistic innovator. If Plautus' language danced, his tried to fly. His rococo Erotopaegnia go extraordinarily far in their verbal creativity, thus condemned by their author to remain a dead end in Latin literature. In Maecenas, the unclassical patron of classical poets, and in Hadrian's time, the precious manner of Laevius again became fashionable. Latin perhaps needed this eccentric experimenter to remove a little of its earthy gravity.

Ideas

The easy products of the Greek Μούσα παιδική sound strange on the lips of serious Romans, couched in the awkward and cumbersome Latin of their day. We are still concerned with the light amusement of serious men in the social circle. New values were here playfully explored, but in Catullus' generation and among the elegists, they would find a large future.<sup>1</sup>

* L. ALFONSI, Poetae novi. Storia di un movimento poetico, Milano 1945. * K. BÜCHNER, Die römische Lyrik. Texte, Übersetzungen, Interpretationen, Geschichte, Stuttgart 1976, esp. 13–15. * P. GRIMAL, Le lyrisme à Rome, Paris 1978, 75–89. * N. HOLZBERG, Epigramm, s. Martial. * P. LAURENS, L'abeille dans l'ambre: Célébration de l'épigramme de l'époque alexandrine à la fin de la Renaissance, Paris 1989. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Epigramm und Skolion, Gießen 1893. * I. TAR, Über die Anfänge der römischen Lyrik, Szeged 1975. * A. TRAGLIA, Poetae novi, Roma 1962. * G. WILLIAMS, Tradition and Originality in Roman Poetry, Oxford 1968; s. also the bibliographies to Catullus and Martial.

CATULLUS

Life and Dates

C. Valerius Catullus from Verona is one of the first in that brilliant series of poets and writers originating from Transpadane Gaul. His father, who it may be supposed was the descendant of Roman setters,<sup>1</sup> was socially distinguished enough to entertain even Caesar (Suet. Iul. 73). The poet was the owner of estates at Tibur (Catullus 44) and on Sirmio, the peninsula on the southern shore of Lake Garda (31). Complaints about his penurious state (e.g. 13. 7–8) are not therefore to be interpreted as evidence of grinding poverty. According to Jerome,<sup>2</sup> Catullus was born in 87 B.C. and died in 58 B.C. 'in his thirtieth year'. However, since in 57/56 B.C. he accompanied the propraetor Memmius for a year to Bithynia,<sup>3</sup> and mentions events of the year 55 B.C., such as Pompey's second consulship (Catullus 113), Caesar's crossing of the Rhine and first expedition to Britain (Catullus 11 and 29), the 'thirty years' must either be taken as a round number (87–54 B.C.) or, more convincingly, the year of birth must be set later (84–54 B.C.). The confusion of 87 and 84 B.C. may be explained by a similarity in the names of the consuls in those years. It is not advisable to fix Catullus' death, in the light of poem 52, only after the consulship of Vatinius (47 B.C.), given that already in 56 B.C. Vatinius was boasting of a future consulship (Cic. Vatin. 6).

<sup>1</sup> Catullus' ille mi par esse deo videtur may be compared with Lutatius Catulus 2. 4 (p. 43 MOREL).

Born shortly before Sulla's victory and dictatorship, Catullus died a few years before Caesar completed his conquest of Gaul. He was not alive to witness Caesar's break with Pompey and rise to supreme power. Belonging to a period between two dictatorships, he took his stand in a space characterized by unresolved tensions, equally distant from two centers of gravity. Politically, there was a condition of 'suspension of gravity'. It fostered all the anxieties attendant on such a state, but also all the chances of a new experience of freedom.

In his adult years, Catullus witnessed the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, framed by Pompey's victories in the East and Caesar's rise to power in the West. Caesar for Catullus (29) was only one of the triumvirs, cinaedus Romulus, boon companion of the disreputable Mamurra. The subsequent apology and reconciliation (Suet. Iul. 73) made perhaps little difference to the inner distance between the greatest military and the greatest non-military personality of those years.

The gloomy air of the times finds expression in the pessimistic tones at the end of his epyllion (64). The atmosphere of the Attis poem (63) is fraught with tension. In its restless rhythms, the distinguished lyric poet Alexander Blok<sup>1</sup> thought he could detect the nervously beating pulse of a period shaken by revolutions. The theme of self-alienation, of which the poem treats, reflects the gravity of the loss of old links to one's patria, and the fear of obtaining, not the hoped-for freedom, so much as a new and worse dependence.

<sup>1</sup> H. RUBENBAUER, JAW 212, 1927, 169.

<sup>2</sup> Chron. a. Abr. 1930 and 1959.

<sup>3</sup> Catullus 10; 28; 31; 46.

This was the historical background against which painful personal experiences may be seen affecting Catullus' poetry: his brother's death,<sup>2</sup> and his love for the woman called Lesbia who, if we are to believe Apuleius (apol. 10), was really Clodia. She is traditionally identified with the second of the three sisters of Cicero's arch-enemy, P. Clodius Pulcher, the wife of Q. Caecilius Metellus Celer (consul 60 B.C.). This rests on the general (but only general) similarity with the picture given of this woman by Cicero's Pro Caelio; and, above all, on a Catullan epigram (79)<sup>3</sup> which in fact would lose much of its point if it did not refer to Clodia's overly loved little brother.<sup>4</sup> But the youngest of these three sisters may also be the woman in question.<sup>5</sup> The fact that Lesbia's husband (or constant companion) is in Catullus' eyes (Catullus 83) an idiot must not however be taken as sufficient proof that he was Metellus.<sup>6</sup> If Clodia is made a freed woman of the family,<sup>7</sup> the point of car. 79 must be surrendered, and all references to Lesbia's pride in her birth ignored. In principle, in the identification of the persons concerned, more prudence than confidence should be exercised.

Any attempt to arrange the poems addressed to Lesbia in chronological order raises many problems. We should avoid reconstructing a 'love novel'. Is poem 51 the first declaration of love or an expression of jealousy?<sup>8</sup> In the first case, it has been seen as the beginning of their relationship; whereas the adherents of the second interpreta-

<sup>1</sup> Essay Katiline (1918); VON ALBRECHT, Rom 48-57.

<sup>2</sup> Catullus 65; 68; 101. His brother must have died before 57 B.C., since Catullus visited his grave on his voyage to Asia.

<sup>3</sup> M. B. SKINNER, Pretty Lesbius, TAPhA 112, 1982, 197-208; C. DEROUX, L'identité de Lesbie, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 390-416.

<sup>4</sup> Another view in W. KROLL on Catullus 79 (not convincing).

<sup>5</sup> So M. ROTHSTEIN 1923, 1; 1926, 472.

<sup>6</sup> A different opinion in M. SCHUSTER 1948, 2358-2359.

<sup>7</sup> W. STROH, Taxis und Taktik. Die advokatische Dispositions-kunst in Ciceros Gerichtsreden, including: Nachträge zum angeblichen Liebesverhältnis von Caelius und Clodia, Stuttgart 1975, 296-298.

<sup>8</sup> So, for example, H. P. SYNDIKUS, vol. 1, 1984, 254-262.

tion would date the poem later; but these are fragile arguments indeed. The dating of poem 68, to the time before the death of Metellus in 59 B.C., rests on the following unproved suppositions: that the unnamed beloved is Lesbia (in itself possible<sup>1</sup>); that she is the second sister among the Clodias; that the 'husband' is Metellus and not possibly a second husband or some other lover.

Around the central figures of the dead brother and the beloved are grouped close friends, young poets among whom Licinius Calvus in particular deserves mention. This circle, filled with tones sometimes crude, sometimes tender, and sometimes surprisingly erotic, is Catullus' milieu.

His addressees are also of importance: the recipient of the dedicatory poem (1), Catullus' famous countryman Cornelius Nepos; the addressee of the first epithalamium (61), Manlius, a Roman noble; finally the great orator Hortensius Orталus (Hortalus), to whom the first epistle in elegiacs is directed (65).

The politicians follow at an appropriate distance: Cicero (49), Caesar<sup>2</sup> and his repulsive favorite Mamurra,<sup>3</sup> and finally the large number of those who are otherwise abused or assailed.

Survey of Work

The collection of poems is normally divided in three: the short poems in non-elegiac meters (1-60); the longer poems (61-68); the epigrams (69-116).

The arrangement in general is therefore determined by scope and meter. A transition from the first to the second part is established by the fact that of poems 61-64 the uneven are ('still') lyric, while the even are ('already') in hexameters. Conversely, the last four longer poems (65-68), which are in elegiacs, already belong metrically to the epigrams which follow them.

Since the epigrams already contain a somewhat lengthy elegy (76), it is tempting to regard all the poems written in elegiac couplets (65-116) as a single group. In this case, the work may be divided into two 'halves' (1-64; 65-116), of which the second begins and ends (65 and 116) with an allusion to Callimachus.<sup>4</sup>

In considering scope, however, we are not concerned with 'halves'. Rather, the collection may be divided into three approximately equal sections

<sup>1</sup> Against the identification with Lesbia: M. ROTHSTEIN 1923, 8-9 (somewhat hypercritical).

<sup>2</sup> Catullus 11; 29; 54; 57; 93.

<sup>3</sup> Catullus 29; 41; 43; 57; 94; 105; 114; 115.

<sup>4</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1973, 233.

(1–60, 863 lines; 61–64, 802 lines; 65–116, 644 lines).<sup>1</sup> Is it coincidence that these divisions each correspond to the length of a classical 'book'? It is not known whether the arrangement of the collection is completely owed to Catullus (s. below: Transmission). For this reason, far-reaching interpretations of the order of the poems should be treated with caution.<sup>2</sup>

The arrangement of the poems within the book does not substantially affect the interpretation of the individual poem. Poems formally or thematically related would be compared regardless of their position. However, the original arrangement may have been preserved in many instances, especially in the case of certain groups within the polymetra.

Thematically related poems often stand together. Examples are the epithalamia (61 and 62); the epigrams relating to Gellius (88–91) and the twin poems 97 and 98. Two Lesbia epigrams are juxtaposed (86–87), and if 85 relates to the same woman there would be three. Something similar may be said of 75 and 76. Aufilena is the butt of 110 and 111. Caesar and his henchman 'Mentula' (Mamura) are the object of 93–94. Mentula himself receives his double dose in 114–115. The name Fabullus links poems 12 and 13, Aurelius 16 and 17, Furius 23 and 24, Vatinius 52 and 53. The poet-friends, Cinna and Calvus, are addressed in consecutive epigrams (95 and 96). Calvus and Lesbia follow each other in 50 and 51.

Conversely, in the footsteps of Callimachus' iamb. 2 and 4,<sup>3</sup> poems belonging together appear more often at some calculated distance. The framework of the epigrams concerning Gellius (88–91) is formed by poems about Lesbia (85–87; 92). At the beginning of the collection, poems 2, 3, 5, 7, (8) and 11 are dedicated to Lesbia. The kiss poems 5 and 7 are particularly closely linked. Ameana is made fun of in 41 and 43, while epigrams 70 and 72 relate to Lesbia. Veranius unites 9 and 12, Aurelius 16–17 and 21. He and Furius are linked in 11 and 16, while in 21 and 23 they are treated separately. Furius occurs in 22, 23 and 26, Camerius in 55 and 58a. Formal correspondences are found, for example, between 34 and 36 (hymn and hymnic parody) and 37 and 39 (both sczons).

The poems dedicated to Lesbia have been singled out as a 'cycle', just like the verses alluding to Aurelius and Furius or Veranius and Fabullus. Catullan scholars employ the word 'cycle' here in a loose sense. It is not a question of self-contained groups of poems, but rather of more or less scattered poems on related themes, between which quite different poems are inserted.<sup>1</sup> A cycle of 'apostrophes to things'<sup>2</sup> is formed by poems 31; 35-37; 42; 44. In the center (35-36) are 'addresses to paper and books'. The supporting pillars (31 and 34) refer to places dear to the poet.

<sup>1</sup> J. FERGUSON, The Arrangement of Catullus' Poems, LCM 11, 1, 1986, 2–6; W. V. CLAUSEN, CHLL 193–197.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. H. DETTMER, Design in the Catullan Corpus. A Preliminary Study, CW 81, 1987–1988, 371–381; M. B. SKINNER, Aesthetic Patterning in Catullus. Textual Structures, Systems of Imagery and Book Arrangements. Introduction, CW 81, 1987–1988, 337–340.

<sup>3</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1973, 239.

Neighboring poems may form a contrast, as for example 35, addressed to Catullus' poet friend Caecilius, and 36 which threatens in jest to burn the annals of Volusius. The marriage themes of poems 61-64 are interrupted by the contrasting poem on Attis (63).

The most important organizational principles are variation and contrast. A stricter regularity, such as that found in later books of poems, cannot be established. There is perhaps no answer to the question of the authenticity of the arrangement, although it is clear that Catullus from the outset intended certain poems to be related to each other.

Sources, Models, Genres

In Roman literature as transmitted to us, lyric is underrepresented, which may in part be owing to the attitude of the Roman audience.<sup>3</sup> Catullus, who along with Horace is the single great pagan author of Latin lyric, is quite different from his Augustan successor. The description of 'lyric' as 'poetry written in meters suitable for singing' applies to Horace's odes. To ancient readers, Catullus' short poems were mostly epigrams. The meters particularly favored by Catullus, such as stichic hendecasyllables, are completely missing in Horace, as are epigram and elegy. In him, the musical element, the early Greek models, the 'higher' lyric forms are more visible than in Catullus. Among the meters of utility verse, close to everyday, both poets share the iambus, although in quite different application.

Catullus is strongly linked to the Hellenistic tradition. In his Lock of Berenice (66), an elegiac aetion, he shows himself the free adaptor of a Callimachean original. His epithalamium (62) seems to depend on Greek inspiration only in its basic features.<sup>4</sup> The admixture of Roman elements is even more clearly recognizable in the thematically related 61. In his Attis poem (63), his Peleus epic (64) and his very personal Allius elegy (68), the poet employs principles of organization

<sup>1</sup> A different view in L. TROMARAS, Die Aurelius- und Furius-Gedichte Catulls als Zyklen, Eranos 85, 1987, 41-48.

<sup>2</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1973, 221-224.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Cicero apud Sen. epist. 49. 5; somewhat less hostile Quint. inst. 10. 1. 96.

<sup>4</sup> On this difficult question H. TRÄNKLE, Catullprobleme, MH 38, 1981, 246-258 (with bibl.).

drawn from Hellenistic literature (see below: Literary Technique). But he fills his theme with personal feeling and Roman pathos, especially in his sympathetic picture of Ariadne (64. 52–201) and Attis' second speech (63. 50–73), in which nostalgia finds expression.

In nugae and epigrams, Hellenistic influences are also palpable. The dedication to Cornelius Nepos stands in the tradition recognizable in the dedicatory poem of Meleager's Garland. The poem of homage to Helvius Cinna (95), taking a sideswipe at Volusius, combines Callimachus' greeting to Aratus (Call. epigr. 27) with his subsequent outburst against Antimachus (Call. epigr. 28). The epigram on Lesbia's false promise (carm. 70) also is reminiscent of Callimachus (epigr. 25).

With what subtlety Catullus combines and gives fresh life to traditional motifs is shown for example in his kiss poems,<sup>1</sup> which incidentally parody the Hellenistic model of the ἀριθμητικόν ('problem of calculation').<sup>2</sup> Just as the second monologue of Attis (63. 50–73) reverses the established lines of the ἐπιβατήριον,<sup>3</sup> the sly missive to Fabullus (13) reverses the commonplace theme of invitation. The address to Lesbia's 'sparrow' (is it a jackdaw?), which parodies a prayer, is inspired by epigrams like those of Meleager at A. P. 7. 195 and 196. Poem 60<sup>4</sup> separates and objectifies a topical motif recurring, for example, in Theocritus 3. 15–17. For the collection as a whole, however, Meleager's Garland did not form a precedent. Following the fashion of the older Roman poets, Catullus deployed the most varied genres and meters.

Drawing inspiration from early Greek lyric, Catullus is able to burst the bounds set by Hellenistic style. Sappho was the model for poem 51, and if Catullus gives his beloved the name of Lesbia, this too pays homage to Sappho. The elevation of the beloved to goddess<sup>5</sup> in poem 68 gave back some archaic seriousness to what had become a Hellenistic flourish. This is a phenomenon which in Rome may be observed in different areas, and springs from the clash of a 'young' people with an advanced civilization.

<sup>1</sup> C. SEGAL, More Alexandrianism in Catullus 7?, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 27, 1974, 139–143.

<sup>2</sup> F. CAIRNS, Catullus's Basia Poems (5, 7, 48), Mnemosyne, ser. 4, 26, 1973, 15–22; cf. however Anacreontea 14 West.

<sup>3</sup> F. CAIRNS, Generic Composition in Greek and Roman Poetry, Edinburgh 1972 62–63.

<sup>4</sup> If the poem is complete.

<sup>5</sup> G. LIEBERG 1962.

Conversely, the poet's adaptation of the iambic and of the poems of abuse remains locked in the small-scale Hellenistic form, in spite of occasional echoes of Hipponax or Archilochus. Poem 8 recalls Menander (Samia 325–356), a parallel emphasizing the close connection between comedy and love poetry.<sup>1</sup>

Moreover, Catullus is deeply rooted in native Roman traditions. He parodies Ennius, and, more generally, there is something typically Roman about his moralizing, his filling foreign elements with personal feeling and, above all, his multiplicity of themes and tones. His epigrams remind the reader of the minor poets of the turn of the century: Valerius Aedituus, Porcius Licinus, Q. Lutatius Catulus.<sup>2</sup> His epic verse recalls Ennius, although Catullus' hexameter bears only a distant relationship to that of the Roman founder of the genre. Ennius strives for gravitas and color, while Catullus' aim, for example in his epyllion poem 64, is for suppleness and ease. The strict standards applied in this genre are revealed by the nine years spent by Catullus' contemporary Helvius Cinna in carefully refining his own miniature epic, the Smyrna (cf. Catullus 95). It may be significant for poem 63 that Caecilius, who came from Novum Comum in Catullus' part of Italy, was working on a poem dedicated to the Mater Magna (carm. 35).

In Catullus we find Roman elegy<sup>3</sup> somehow in process of creation. It is not surprising then that the brilliance distinguishing the art of his polymetra, and even his hexameters, has not yet come to full flower in his elegiac couplets, which are more firmly fixed in Roman tradition.

Does this mean that in Catullus we are dealing with styles varying from genre to genre? Certainly the poet shows different aspects: that of lyricist, epigrammatist, elegist, epic poet and writer of aggressive iambs. Yet in all these genres, he reveals his lively dramatic talent. In the same way his lyric genius is not confined within the limits of genre. He shows a superior and independent attitude to both Greek practice and theory. Catullus' poems would be inconceivable without <sup>1</sup> G. P. GOOLD, ed., 237–238; see now R. F. THOMAS, Menander and Catullus 8, RhM 127, 1984, 308–316.

<sup>2</sup> Apud Gell. 19. 9. 10; Cic. nat. deor. 1. 79.

<sup>3</sup> P. GRIMAL, Catulle et les origines de l'élegie romaine, MEFRA 99, 1987, 243–256; illuminating remarks by Stroh, Liebeselegie 199–202; 223–225; idem, Die Ursprünge der römischen Liebeselegie. Ein altes Problem im Licht eines neuen Fundes, Poetica 15, 1983, 205–246.

Greek inspiration, but owe their strength and freshness to the poet's Roman ingenium.

Literary Technique

In his longer poems (esp. 64; 68; 76), Catullus displays a masterly handling of the Hellenistic art of symmetrical organization of material.<sup>1</sup> In carm. 68 there are two (independent) main sections (1-40; 41-160), at the center of each of which stands his brother's death (19-26 ~ 91-100). The chiasitic sequence of themes in the second part (41-160) is particularly striking. Around the central motif of his brother's death (91-100) lie in concentric circles Troy (87-90 ~ 101-104), Laodamia (73-86 ~ 105-130), Lesbia (67-72 ~ 131-134), Catullus (51-66 ~ 135-148), Allius (41-50 ~ 149-160).

If we ignore its prologue (1-30) and epilogue (384-408), the miniature epic (64) also consists of two main sections: the festival of men (31-277) and that of the gods (278-383). Each of these sections contains an insertion contrasting with its surroundings: the description of the tapestry on the marriage bed (50-264) and the song of the Parcae (323-381). We shall discuss later how content and form correspond in this poem.

Although Catullus in this case enlivens his form by variation in the length of the individual sections, his elegy at 76 displays a strictly symmetrical structure of theme.<sup>2</sup> This structure, however, is overlaid by another, based on rhetoric and psychology, which in a broadly developing climax passes from quiet reflection to passionate prayer.

The use of artistic structure is not limited to the longer poems. In the small poems repetition is particularly noticeable: examples are the hammering rhythm of the hundreds and thousands in the kiss poem 5 and the striking return to the opening line in poem 57. Such resumptions also permit a survey of more complex structures. The spring poem (46) is a square made up of eleven times eleven syllables. The marked use of anaphoric iam (1-2; 7-8) divides the poem into two, though not precisely equal, sections (1-6; 7-11). This parallelism is completed by chiasitic echoes in vocabulary.<sup>3</sup> Poem 45 falls into three parts. The first two strophes of the same length (1–9; 10–18) describe in speech and response the love felt by the young man or maiden. The parallelism is emphasized by the same refrain, the sneezing of Amor. The third strophe summarizes the mutual love of the two in parallel sentences. This explains why the number of lines, which has so far been uneven (9 lines each in strophes 1 and 2), is now shortened to an even number (8 verses). As in poem 46, here too the slight abbreviation of the final part conveys an increase in energy.

<sup>1</sup> E. CASTLE, Das Formgesetz der Elegie, ZÄsth 37, 1943, 42-54; on ring-composition in early Greek poetry: A. SALVATORE, Studi Catulliani, Napoli 1965, 18.

<sup>2</sup> S., for example, VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 87-89.

<sup>3</sup> refert 1, reportant 11; silescit 3, vigescent 8; linquantur 4, valete 9; volemus 6, vagari 7.

Verbal repetition may unite separate poems. The first line of the 2nd poem (passer, deliciae meae puellae) recurs soon after the beginning of the 3rd (3. 3–4), and the final turn develops the motif further (3. 16–18).

Catullus' images combine Roman and Greek tradition with personal, 'modern' feeling. For example, to describe his love for Lesbia, Catullus chooses typical pictures drawn from the world of the Roman family: he loves Lesbia 'not as the vulgar love their girlfriends', but 'as a father loves his sons and his sons-in-law' (72. 3–4). Laodamia's passionate love, anticipating the arrival of Catullus' beloved, is like the love of an old man for his late-born grandson (68. 119–124). This picture of higher love (diligere, bene velle) stands in contrast with that of sensuous love (amare), which in traditional fashion is interpreted as 'illness'.<sup>1</sup>

Both are combined in poem 68, where the grandfather simile, so surprising to modern taste, is directly followed by the image of the affectionate doves, giving the opposite emphasis (68. 125–128).

In some similes the exchange of sexes gives a bold impression of modernity. This is the case with Laodamia and also where Catullus compares himself with Juno (68. 138–140). Just as the goddess endures the infidelity of her husband, so Catullus resolves humbly to bear the amorous escapades of his mistress. The exchange of the sexes in this simile is a radical symbol for subjection to the will of the beloved, the servitium amoris.

Catullus' wealth of metaphorical expressions may also be observed in the personification of parts of the body in the tradition of popular language. Just as today in listening to beautiful music one may be 'all ears', so Fabullus in sniffing an exquisite perfume will be 'all nose' (13. 13-14). Mentula indeed not only takes his name from the physical organ of his continual sins, he is in fact identified with it (94; 115).

<sup>1</sup> Cf. M. B. SKINNER, Disease Imagery in Catullus 76, 17–26, CPh 82, 1987, 230–233.

In a poet of inner experience, it is not to be expected at first sight that nature would take on a life of her own. Instead, in Catullus, nature may become a medium of human feeling. In this way, for example, the mood of Attis' regretful monologue is anticipated in the backdrop.<sup>1</sup> The glaring sky, the hard ground, the wild sea (63. 40) are visible in the harsh sunlight. As he awakes, Attis looks at the boundless waters (maria vasta, 48). This sobering picture of the world about him in the light of morning stands in contrast with the mystic enticements of the dark forest in the mountain landscape of the previous evening. There, the chorus hastened towards 'green Ida' (30),<sup>2</sup> while Attis led his troop through 'gloomy woods' (32). The forest appeared as a mysterious place of religious experience and initiation. Conversely, joy in a return home to Sirmio (poem 31) culminates in a challenge to the lake to smile. Catullus gives to landscape an inner life.

In poem 46 the mood of spring is not painted in detail, but immediately translated into impulses of will and energetic movement. In this regard, Catullus is very Roman.

Language and Style

As in literary technique, so also in language and style Catullus unites quite different sources and levels. His language is drawn from the freshness of colloquial Latin: one need only think of his numerous diminutives. From his native dialect for example, he introduces to literature the word basium. Colloquial language, however, brings with it many obscenities, as the numerous references to Pompeian inscriptions in the commentaries prove.

On the other hand, Greek words and proper names serve as choice ornaments (for example in poem 64).<sup>3</sup> The struggle between rudeness and overrefinement, which is never wholly resolved, gives a special charm to Catullus' verses. He is a 'naughty favorite of the Graces'.

<sup>1</sup> O. WEINREICH, Catullus Attisgedicht, in: Mélanges F. Cumont, AIPHO 4, Bruxelles 1936, 463-500; repr. in: R. HEINE, ed., Catull, 325-359, esp. 340-351.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Homer Iliad 21. 449; Theocr. 17. 9.

<sup>3</sup> M. GEYMONAT, Onomastica decorativa nel carme 64 di Catullo, in: Materiali e discussioni per l'analisi dei testi classici 7, Pisa 1982, 173-175.

In his epyllion, a special finish is detectable. Never before had an author drawn from the musical register of the Latin language hexameters which flowed so easily, gently, and gracefully. Here, and in his galliambics, the artistic word-positioning of the Augustan period is already anticipated: for example 63. 50 patria, o mei creatrix, patria, o mea genetrix ('o my country that gavest me life! O my country that barest me!').<sup>1</sup> In other poems, the poet had employed the file more sparingly. In general, his elegiac couplets are hewn from tougher wood than his epic hexameters and galliambics. The polymetra stand in the middle, at one moment appearing to be most delicately finished, and again to be tossed off with graceful negligence. Often they create both impressions at the same time.

Catullus has at his disposal a multiplicity of tones and semitones. It is this stylistic richness which allows us to make some estimate of his greatness. In his longer poems, a tension-filled harmony is felt between Greek euphony and Roman emotionality. 'Dragging'<sup>2</sup> beginnings have been noticed in several poems: conditional and relative clauses, generally longer periods, in contrast with the effort of the classical poets, to secure perspicuity. This feature is partly a residue of the style of the age. It is enough to remember Lucretius. As far as beginnings are concerned, Cicero himself appeared to later critics as lentus in principiis, 'tedious in his introductions' (Tac. dial. 22). Catullus deliberately employs such introductions. Particularly in his longer poems, they are artistically justified (carm. 65; 68, 76).

In any case, we cannot agree with Kroll's overall verdict that Catullus' verse is 'heavy'. This criticism may to some extent apply to the elegiacs, if they are compared with those of the Augustans, a comparison historically inappropriate. It is not true of the hendecasyllables, galliambics and epic hexameters, whose hallmark is rather an unbelievable absence of stiffness and heaviness, almost unparalleled in Latin texts. This soaring lightness is a feature which, though it may not describe Catullus as a whole, does belong to the peculiar, inimitable charm of his poetic talent.

On the other hand there are his elegies and their weighty manner. In fact, in the epigrams, where dialectically developed thoughts find cogent expression, the soft flow of the hexameters of the epyllion would hardly be in place. Between these two poles, a poet deploys his art. His greatness may be deduced just as much from the spontaneity of his individual flashes as from the contrast between his painful experience of life and the natural lightness of his genius.

<sup>1</sup> P. FEDELI, *Struttura e stile dei monologhi di Attis nel car. 63 di Catullo*, RFIC 106, 1978, 39-52.

<sup>2</sup> G. LUCK, Über einige Typen des Gedichtanfangs bei Catull, Euphrosyne n.s. 1, 1967, 169-172.

Of his stylistic procedures, apart from the repetition already mentioned, apostrophe is the most important. In practically every one of the minor poems, someone or something is addressed, whether a divinity (4; 34; 76), a woman loved (32) or hated, a friend or enemy, a place (17; 37; 44), a book (35; 36), verses (42).

It is rare for only the third person to appear in the poem (e.g. 57; 59), though this occurs more frequently in the epigrams. The address is almost never simple convention (e.g. 27 to the cupbearer).

Particularly telling in Catullus are his addresses to himself.<sup>1</sup> They certainly have no philosophical significance, but may be viewed as a kind of distancing from the personal ego and, as a dramatic element (cf. Eur. Medea 401), they indicate the beginnings of a dramatic dialogue in the poet's own mind.<sup>2</sup>

Catullus in this vein not infrequently speaks of himself in the third person,<sup>3</sup> sometimes not without keen irony at his own expense.

A related artistic device is the 'rhetorical question'. It occurs both in the longer and shorter poems, and is particularly characteristic of the liveliness of his style.<sup>4</sup> In emotional expressiveness, it is outdone only by the equally frequent indignant question.<sup>5</sup>

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In an unmistakable echo of the literary theory owed to Callimachus, ludere is the term used for poetic creation (carm. 50. 2). The poems are called nugae ('trifles': carm. 1. 4). The declaration of the first poem, which initially alludes only to the book's exterior, may be taken as the expression of a poetic program. The libellus is to be lepidus (1. 1) and novus (1. 1). The first word may be referred to the Callimachean

<sup>1</sup> Catullus 8; 46; 51; 52; 76; 79.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 298, note 41.

<sup>3</sup> Catullus 6; 7; 11; 13; 44; 49; 56; 58; 72; 79; 82; cf. 68. 27 and 135.

<sup>4</sup> J. GRANAROLO 1982, 168-173.

<sup>5</sup> J. GRANAROLO 1982, 173-180.

ideal of art, the second to the description of the poetic circle around Catullus as poetae novi (neoterics). For Catullus' interpretation of poetry, his address to Licinius Calvus (carm. 50) is also significant. His life as a poet can be imagined only in the circle of his friends and in his encounter with Lesbia.

Theoretical utterances in large number are not to be expected from him, although we may compare the separation of poetry and life enunciated by carm. 16. But his employment of adjectives in criticizing works of literature contains many implications: e.g. on the negative side, the verdict on the Annales of Volusius as pleni rurs et inficetiarum, 'bundle of rusticity and clumsiness' (36. 19). Conversely, we find the positive notions iocose, lepide (36. 10), lepos (50. 7), and non illepidum neque invenustum, 'not out of taste nor inelegant' (36. 17). The poet Caecilius, highly esteemed by Catullus, receives the epithet tener (35. 1).

Catullus admired moreover in his countryman Nepos the qualities of doctus et laboriosus. These are epithets which in his introductory poem he does not claim for himself. Of course in his carmina maiora he does show himself a poeta doctus, and by later authors he is called docte Catulle. But he did not theorize on this question.

On the basis of his theoretical remarks, we are not allowed to turn Catullus into a predecessor of the elegists. It is he who uses theory to open a deep gulf between private life and poetry (carm. 16). In carm. 16 Catullus is speaking not only of obscene verses, but even of his kiss poems! His aim is to defend himself not so much against the reproach of shamelessness as against that of lack of manhood.

This does not mean that in fact his link with Lesbia and his engagement with the circle of his poet-friends failed to secure a far-reaching unity of poetry and life. His relationship with Lesbia seems therefore to anticipate essential features of the elegiac view of love, but precisely as a way of life, and not as a poetic theory. In any case, confinement of the poet to his work, and identification of life with work springs from a mistaken perspective, although one extraordinarily tempting for the modern reader. The latter has nothing but the poet's work, and supposes that in it he possesses the 'entire' Catullus.

The shifting bounds between poetry and life are visible in the remarks about poetry's 'erotic' effect (carm. 16; 35; 50).<sup>1</sup> This Greek

<sup>1</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie 213-214 with notes 77-79.

idea, established at Rome by comedy and epigram (cf. later, for example, Ovid's erotic didactic and therapeutic verse), affects the terminology of the polymetra: bellus, delicatus, dicax, dulcis, elegans, facetiae, iocus, lepos, ludus, molliculus, otiosus, parum pudicus, sal, tener, venustus. A vocabulary laying emphasis, not so much on beauty and spirit, as on grace and charm, presupposes an 'erotic' approach to aesthetics within the framework of a refined society and company. Accordingly, in Lesbia the picture of the 'poetic' hetaera is lent a spiritual dimension.<sup>1</sup> A poetics describing poetry by its effects on the reader has appropriate consequences also in the sphere of poetic production. The lepos of a particular person may provoke poetry,<sup>2</sup> just as from carm. 50 echoes of a Platonic and erotic μαῦρία have been picked up. But all of this reflects not so much an interpretation of poetry<sup>3</sup> in the strict sense as one of life. The quoted adjectives refer to a true and refined way of life; this is quite clear in the little noticed carm. 12, which in this context occupies a key place. Grace is not exclusively, and not even primarily, something literary. From life, it must flow also into writing, something which in the case of Suffenus (carm. 22) it clearly does not do. There are then many theoretical utterances by Catullus about poetry to be found in the polymetra, although by no means all. The exceptions are significant. Poem 105 presents, as has recently been recognized, poetic creativity as a problem of potency, and with that ironically transfers the 'frankness' of the polymetra into the realm of artistry. Even more important is the address to Calvus (96). This epigram connects two themes treated separately in the polymetra (cf. carm. 35, praise of a good author; and 36, criticism of a bad).<sup>4</sup> The dialectical and constructive character of the epigrams, already observed in their treatment of love themes, is also visible in the area of poetic speculation. They signify for this theme too a new level of reflection and abstraction, insofar as they not only develop antitheses but bring them into close mutual relationship.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie 214, note 78.

<sup>2</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1985, 130–131.

<sup>3</sup> W. KISSEL, Mein Freund, ich liebe dich (Catull carm. 50), WJA 6b, 1980, 45–59.

<sup>4</sup> V. BUCHHEIT, Catulls Dichterkritik in c. 36, Hermes 87, 1959, 309–327; adapted in: WdF 308, 36–61; Catulls Literarkritik und Kallimachos, GB 4, 1975, 21–50; Catull c. 50 als Programm und Bekenntnis, RhM 119, 1976, 162–180; Sal et lepos versicolorum (Catull c. 16), Hermes 104, 1976, 331–347; Dichtertum und Lebensform in Catull c. 35/36; in: FS H.-W. KLEIN, Göttingen 1976, 47–64; E. A. FREDRICKS-MEYER, Catullus to Caecilius on Good Poetry (c. 35), AJPh 106, 1985, 213–221; E. A. SCHMIDT 1985, 127–131.

<sup>5</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT, loc. cit.

Ideas II

Catullus was not a philosopher, and even the most subtle interpretation cannot make one out of him. His categories of thought, however, show occasional poetic echoes of philosophical traditions, as when in poem 76 he seeks in retrospect to describe his behavior to his beloved as pium, and from that to draw an inner contentment—but all in vain! The philosophical effort to construct a consolation for himself collapses, and all that is left is a cry for help to the gods inspired by distress (76. 17–26). And again, it must not be thought that Catullus found solace in the traditions of Platonism or religion. Even the interpretation of love as an illness<sup>1</sup> (76. 20) is far too much of a commonplace in antiquity to allow any conclusions about particular philosophical interests.

In his poem on Attis (63), which universalizes the moral situation of the day, Catullus shows awareness of religious fanaticism. In his madness, Attis takes an irrevocable step. By putting himself outside his previous world and rebelling against it for the sake of an idea, he wrenches himself away from all the living connections in which he stood before. In a period of great revolutions such as that of Catullus, such experiences of 'alienation' begin to be made by human beings in the most different spheres. Intoxication and enthusiasm drive them towards radical destruction. Once the natural bonds are broken, however, disillusion enters in; yet that must be mastered, unless the previous sacrifices are to have been in vain. The individual enjoys the royal experience of liberation from traditional blood relationships; but the dangers of a new and worse slavery now present themselves. Similarly, the decline of the Republic and the rise of new dictatorships must have filled many Romans with grief and sorrow.

An analogous picture is given by the epyllion (64). In the story of Ariadne, separation and suffering are more emphasized than the epiphany of the divine savior and rescuer Bacchus. Instead of dwelling on the parallel marriages between goddess and hero, god and heroine, Catullus throws into relief painful contrasts. The second part of the poem is separated from the first. After viewing the marriage tapestry, the human visitors leave the festival, and the Olympians are left to themselves. The marriage between the goddess and the mortal remains therefore an exception. The gulf between men and gods is by no means bridged. Only the immortals hear the revelation of the Parcae concerning the future. The lament in the epilogue over the impossibility of linking gods and men in the present is already anticipated by the entire structure of the poem. It is a 'modern', 'secular' reflection showing an oppressive sobriety in its appreciation of the human condition.

---

<sup>1</sup> On disease metaphors J. SVENNUNG, Catulls Bildersprache. Vergleichende Stilstudien, Uppsala 1945, 122–127, cf. 90.

To elucidate the transformation of values observed in Catullus we must look for lofty comparisons. If a Roman of the old stamp discovered his identity in the res publica, if Plato the Greek found his with the aid of Socrates, Catullus defined himself in his encounter with Lesbia, a being whose demonic nature is reflected in the breadth of the descriptions applied to her, reaching from goddess to cheap prostitute. The quasi-religious, even magical character of erotic addiction would be well understood by poets of the 19th century like Eminescu or Baudelaire. Nowadays, it is necessary to clear our minds of second-hand clichés (such as femme fatale or vamp) which prevent us from seeing the essential novelty in Catullus' erotic experience.

His departure from the old rules enables him to give new applications to traditional notions such as pietas and fides. In their new context, they receive an unconventional and often surprising value. The picture of love given in the epigrams is quite strongly imbued with Roman values reinterpreted in the light of subjective experience: marriage (70), parental love (72), pietas (73; 76), officium (75), foedus, fides (76; 87; 109). Amicitia (109) is a notable addition to this list. Even in Rome, it by no means possessed only a 'political' meaning.<sup>1</sup>

Conversely, in the polymetra (1-60), notions such as fides and foedus are not employed. Finally, in the longer poems (61-68), marriage is in the foreground. Epigram 70 is bracketed by the key word nubere with the longer poems.

The view that in the polymetra (1-60) a sensuous approach to love prevails, while in the epigrams (69-116) we see its moral sides, is not a rule, but it does describe a tendency. Certainly in carm. 109 duration is emphasized,<sup>2</sup> while in carm. 7 the moment of fulfilment. In the polymetra Lesbia's universal promiscuity endangers love (carm. 11; 37; 58). In the epigrams it is her individual unfaithfulness with particular friends.<sup>3</sup> Even so, the verses addressed to Gellius and very many other epigrams,<sup>1</sup> by no means fall short of the polymetra in outspokenness. A better argument would be that in some epigrams the polarity of sensual and spiritual love (amare—bene velle) is developed (72; 75; 76). Catullus' addiction to Lesbia in this way is even more emphatically brought to the reader's attention. Thus certain epigrams in their way encapsulate in pointed fashion the sum of the aspects developed in the polymetra and in the carmina maiora.

<sup>1</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1985, 124-125. Approaches towards the deepening of the notion of love in comedy: Plaut. Truc. 434-442; Ter. Andr. 261-273.

<sup>2</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1985, 125.

<sup>3</sup> Catullus 73; 77; 79; 82; 91.

Catullus' picture of the world would be incomplete without his circle of friends which to some degree took the place of the Republic, as Lesbia did that of family. Catullus is a poet of friendship. The lively exchange of thoughts and feelings in this circle is a permanent part of our picture of Catullus' life and poetry.

Transmission

Originally Catullus' poems circulated on tablets or papyrus among his friends. It is not known whether the collection we have was put together by the poet himself.<sup>2</sup> The following points tell in favor of an editor: the acceptance of works at quite different stages of perfection; lack of coherence; great variety. The introductory poem easily fits 1–60, but only with difficulty the entire collection. Not all Catullus' poems were included, as certain quotations prove. Priapean poems transmitted by other routes were intruded into the collection by modern editors as poems 18–20, and in their turn again rejected. Some poems are fragmentary (2a; 14a). The length of 100 Teubner pages is unusual for an ancient book of poems. Certainly the Bellum Poenicum of Naevius is said originally not to have been divided into books (although who can guarantee that in fact it occupied only a single scroll?). But in Catullus' day, it had long been divided into seven volumina. It is true that Meleager's Garland, whose dedicatory poem is alluded to by Catullus at the beginning, must have been quite extensive. But both these works were by no means so heterogeneous as his. And it must be frankly admitted that such a large book at that period was not exactly commonplace. A further point is that the work, as already shown, of itself permits division into three sections, each of the length of a 'classical' book. In this shape it may in fact have been a model for the Odes of Horace (I–III)<sup>3</sup> and Ovid's Amores (I–III). However, these are collections whose inner unity obeys strict laws.

The present condition of the text would then be the consequence of the transfer from papyrus scrolls to a codex, a well-known process which came to an end some time in the 4th century.

<sup>1</sup> Catullus 69; 71; 74; 78–80; 88–91; 94; 97–98; 108; 110–112; 114.

<sup>2</sup> For Catullus as responsible for the edition of his own poems: E. A. SCHMIDT 1979, 216–231.

<sup>3</sup> J. FERGUSON, LCM 11, 1, 1986, 2.

In view of the original method of dissemination, it is not surprising that even corrupt copies were in circulation (Gellius 6 (7). 20. 6). The text remained vulnerable, since Catullus was not read in schools.

Only one copy reached the Middle Ages. In the 10th century, it was accessible to Bishop Rather of Verona (cf. PL 136. 752). Once again in Catullus' native city at the beginning of the 14th century, a codex from France made an appearance (V, perhaps a descendant of Rather's copy). It was quoted, copied and then finally lost. Of the manuscripts preserved, the best, as E. Baehrens recognized in his pioneering edition (1876), are the Oxoniensis (O, Bodleianus Canonicianus Class. Lat. 30), from 1375, and the approximately contemporary Sangermanensis 1165 (G, Parisinus 14137). They were written in Northern Italy.

Among the remaining complete manuscripts must be mentioned the Romanus (R, Vaticanus Ottobonianus Lat. 1829, late 14th century or early 15th century). It goes back to the same lost archetype as G, and contains corrections by Coluccio Salutati (d. 1406).

Car. 62 is independently transmitted in the Codex Thuaneus (T, Parisinus 8071, late 9th century). It goes back to the same source as the remaining manuscripts,<sup>1</sup> containing, like all other manuscripts, a lacuna after verse 32. It offers however verse 14, which is missing everywhere else, and more generally a better text in certain passages.

A few decades ago the discovery of Callimachus' Βερενίκης πλόκαμος made possible the correction of an old corruption at Catullus 66. 78 (vilia for milia).

An appropriate picture of the state of transmission is gained by recalling that even in 'conservative' editions of Catullus more than 800 corrections made by scholars are found, predominantly stemming from Italian humanists of the 15th century and German scholars of the 19th.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

Catullus was not mistaken in believing in the immortality of his poetry (car. 1. 10; 68. 43–50). His influence began early. It is not surprising that Cornelius Nepos, his countryman and addressee of the dedicatory poem, praised him (Nep. Att. 12. 4). Varro (ling. 7. 50) already seems to allude to the epithalamium (62). Asinius Pollio wrote about the poet (Charis. GL 1. 97. 10). The Augustan classical authors owed to the neoterics their strict aesthetic standards. Virgil's story of Dido is in debt to Catullus' story of Ariadne (cf. also Aen. 6. 460 and Catullus 66. 39). The Appendix Vergiliana would be unthinkable without Catullus. Cicero, however, whose enthusiasm was reserved for poetry of the early Republic, had little sympathy for the fashionable poets of his time, of whose spondeiazontes he made fun (Att. 7. 2. 1). Just like the great orator, Horace in turn indirectly attests Catullus' great popularity, although he conceals that before him Catullus had written iambs and sapphics (carm. 3. 30. 13; epist. 1. 19. 23–24). In his day, perhaps the neoteric style had degenerated into mere mannerism (cf. sat. 1. 10. 19). Ovid knew especially the carmina maiora (62; 64; 68). But he also shows knowledge of carm. 3 (cf. am. 2. 6), and honors the short-lived poet with the address docte Catulle (am. 3. 9. 61–62). Yet, in his eyes, the founder of Roman elegy was not Catullus but Cornelius Gallus (trist. 4. 10. 53). Velleius Paterculus praised Catullus and Lucretius (2. 36. 2). Petronius, Martial and the Priapea are deeply indebted to the poet. The Elder Pliny, in his Preface, presumes an acquaintance with Catullus on the part of the Emperor Vespasian, not particularly known for his cultural interests. Pliny the Younger composed, among other things, hendecasyllables (epist. 7. 4. 8–9). His aim was to reawaken to new life in his own time the brilliant culture of society in the Ciceronian period. The poetae novelli of the 2nd century would use Catullus as a source of inspiration.

<sup>1</sup> A different view in F. DELLA CORTE, Due studi Catulliani, Genova 1951, 1: L'Altro Catullo, 5–102.

<sup>2</sup> S. especially: J. H. GAISSER 1993.

In late antiquity, Ausonius dedicated to his son Drepanius a little book, as once Catullus had to Nepos, although indeed he calls it inlepidum, rudem libellum. He behaves in the same way in a later book towards Symmachus (pp. 91 and 150 Prete). For Martianus Capella (3. 229, p. 85 D.), Catullus quidam is a mere name. Isidore of Seville cites only two passages of Catullus, ascribing one of them to Calvus.

Petrarch read Catullus, but the poet had greater influence on the neo-Latin authors Panormita, Pontano, Marullus, and Giovanni Cotta (d. 1509).<sup>1</sup> Pietro Bembo's (d. 1547) epyllion Sarca<sup>2</sup> is a brilliant new avatar of Catullus' carm. 64: there is a marriage (of the river Sarca and the nymph Garda), there are descriptions of carpets, and there is a prophecy: Manto announces the birth of the Mantuan, Virgil, and gives a survey of his followers down to the Renaissance. The warrior Achilles is replaced by a hero of the spirit, and poetry is shown to be nature's offspring. As for literature in Italian, Catullus influenced the lyricist Benedetto Cariteo (Gareth, born about 1450 in Barcelona) and the contemporary writer of sonnets Giovanni Antonio Petrucci. This line continues right down to the beautiful Sirmione poem of the great Giosuè Carducci (d. 1907).

<sup>1</sup> A much later Latin example is Pascoli's (d. 1912) Catullocabos.

<sup>2</sup> Petrus Bembus, Sarca. Integra princeps editio (TTrN), ed. O. SCHÖNBERGER, Würzburg 1994.

In France, to which Catullus may well owe his preservation, a rich tradition began with Ronsard (d. 1585) and de Baïf (d. 1589). The kiss-poem (carm. 5) alone was imitated at least thirty times before 1803. Chateaubriand (d. 1848) valued Catullus' and Lesbia's immortality more highly than that of politicians (Les Alpes et l'Italie, lines 33–36): 'Vos noms aux bords rians que l'Adige décore/Du temps seront vaincus/Que Catulle et Lesbie enchanteront encore/Les flots du Bénacus.'

In central Europe excellent neo-Latin authors<sup>1</sup> paid homage to Catullus: Conrad Celtis (d. 1508), Johannes Secundus (d. 1536; Basia), Jacob Balde (d. 1668), Simon Rettenbacher (d. 1706). In the vernacular, he was followed not only by many Anacreontic writers but also by Ludwig Hölty (d. 1776) and Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (d. 1781; Die Küsse; An eine kleine Schöne). In particular, the graceful poetic translations of Karl Wilhelm Ramler (d. 1798)<sup>2</sup> and Eduard Mörike (d. 1875) may be mentioned.<sup>3</sup> Among the numerous imitators of the dedicatory epigram, we find even Goethe ('Wem geb' ich dies Büchlein?'). Elsewhere too he shows knowledge of Catullus.

In England traces of Catullus are found in John Skelton (d. 1529; Book of Philip Sparrow), and an impressive series of great poets<sup>4</sup> down to Ezra Pound. Pope's The Rape of the Lock (cf. carm. 66) deserves special mention, since it does justice to one of the carmina maiora which were too often neglected.<sup>5</sup> Byron (d. 1824) translated carm. 3 and 51 and imitated carm. 48 (but replaced homosexual with heterosexual love). Tennyson (d. 1892), in his masterpiece Frater ave atque vale, added

<sup>1</sup> W. LUDWIG, The Origin and the Development of the Catullan Style in Neo-Latin Poetry, in: P. GODMAN, O. MURRAY, eds., Latin Poetry and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1990, 183–198.

<sup>2</sup> I am using the bilingual edition of Catullus, Wien 1803.

<sup>3</sup> Classische Blumenlese 1, Stuttgart 1840, 162–163 (carm. 84; 85). Mörike actually included his translation of carm. 45 among his own original poems.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. G. P. GOOLD, edition, London 1983, 11–12; J. FERGUSON 1988, 44–47 (with bibl.).

<sup>5</sup> Later, the same poem of Catullus was translated by Ugo Foscolo (d. 1827).

homage to Sirmio. It was Tennyson who coined the golden phrase: 'Catullus, whose dead songster never dies.'

The memorial to the sparrow was also a particular favorite in Russia.<sup>1</sup> It was the first to be completely translated (in 1792 by A. I. Bucharsky), and still in the 20th century found an imitator in V. YA. Bryusov (d. 1924). In other respects, there are some surprises. The history of Catullan influence began untypically with the partial translation of carm. 12 by V. K. Tredyakovsky (d. 1769). Alexander Pushkin (d. 1837) translated the equally epigrammatic carm. 27. By his adaptation, the poet A. A. Fet (d. 1892) made all Catullus part of the heritage of Russian literature.

In the 20th century, it is almost possible to speak of a worldwide Catullan renaissance.<sup>2</sup> It is sufficient to mention Thornton Wilder's Ides of March (1948), as well as Carl Orff's Catulli Carmina (1943) and Trionfo di Afrodite (1953). Although in the Augustan period the poet's longer pieces were also read, in modern times individual smaller poems have been preferred. Among the exceptions may be counted the composers<sup>3</sup> Wolfgang Fortner, Ildebrando Pizzetti and Carl Orff, who took up the marriage songs (61–62) and the lyricist Alexander Blok (d. 1921), who valued the Attis (above pp. 335–336). As for the crude and obscene poems, they have been mostly neglected, though perhaps today they could once again find an audience.

There have been relatively few attempts to understand Catullus' oeuvre as a whole; and in fact it is much harder to grasp than certain partial aspects which seem juxtaposed without connection. Catullus the unconditional lover, the alleged pioneer of elegy, Catullus the child of nature, Catullus the Alexandrian artist, the member of the free poetic circle of the neoterics—these are known. And yet the whole is more than the sum of the parts. An author who continues to shape reflectively, even in seeming to improvise spontaneously, and who conversely can lend to the most refined products of his artistry a deeply human content, bursts the limits assigned by academic pigeon-holing and makes fun of our careful analyses. The bridge between realms which seem so different is to be sought in a unique personality, which could develop in rare freedom in the chaotic time between the dictatorships of Sulla and Caesar. It is found also in the extraordinary talent of this short-lived poet, even if all the dateable poems fall into his 'later period'. Perhaps the poet's universality has not yet been sufficiently evaluated. Within a few years, an œuvre flowered which opened new ways to Roman literature in the most varied directions. A mystery remains: the poet's light hand, in spite of the burden of learning, its playful mastery of technique never over-estimating that technique or falling victim to a deadening infatuation with perfection.

<sup>1</sup> Catulli Veronensis liber, translated and edited by S. V. SHERVINSKY and M. L. GASPAROV, Moskva 1986, 106–141; 278–285.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. E. A. SCHMIDT 1985, 16–28; see furthermore: A. E. RADKE, Katulla. Catull-Übersetzungen ins Weibliche und Deutsche, Marburg 1992; cf. also B. SEIDENSTICKER, 'Shakehands, Catull'. Catull-Rezeption in der deutschsprachigen Lyrik der Gegenwart, AU 36, 2, 1994, 34–49.

<sup>3</sup> On the musical influence of Catullus: DRAHEIM 177–182; Ariadne auf Naxos by Richard Strauss and Hofmannsthal treats a subject matter found in carm. 64.

Editions: VINDELINUS DE SPIRA, Catulli, Tibulli et Propertii carmina cum Statii Sylvis, Venetiis 1472. * Ae. BAEHRENS (TC), 2 vols., Leipzig 1885. * R. ELLIS (TC), Oxford 2nd ed. 1889. * W. KROLL (TC), Leipzig 1923; Stuttgart 5th ed. 1968 (with bibl. by J. KROYMANN). * R. A. B. MYNORS, Oxford 1958; 3rd ed. 1967. * C. J. FORDYCE (TC), Oxford 1961. * K. QUINN (TC), London 1970; Glasgow 2nd ed. 1973. * O. WEINREICH (TTr), Zürich 1969; repr. München 1974. * D. F. S. THOMSON (Tr), Chapel Hill 1978. * G. P. GOOLD (TTrN), London 1983 (a very original text). * W. EISENHUT, Leipzig 1983. * D. H. GARRISON (C), Norman, Okla. 1989. * H. P. SYNDIKUS (C; s. bibl. below). * G. LEE (TTrN), Oxford 1990. * M. v. ALBRECHT (TTr), Stuttgart 1995. ** Ind., concordance: M. N. WETMORE, Index verborum Catullianus, New Haven 1912 (repr. 1961). * V. P. MCCARREN, A Critical Concordance to Catullus, Leiden 1977. ** Bibl.: J. KROYMANN in Kroll's commentary (s. above), 5th ed. 1968, 301–318. * D. F. S. THOMSON, Recent Scholarship on Catullus (1960–1969), CW 65, 1971, 116–126. * H. HARRAUER, A Bibliography to Catullus, Hildesheim 1979. * J. GRANAROLO, Catulle 1948–1973, Lustrum 17, 1976, 26–70; Catulle 1960–1985, Lustrum 28–29, 1986–1987, 65–106. * J. P. HOLOKA, C. Valerius Catullus. A Systematic Bibliography, New York 1985. * J. FERGUSON, Catullus, Oxford 1988. * P. FEDELI (s. below).

B. ARKINS, Sexuality in Catullus, Hildesheim 1982. * K. BARWICK, Zyklen bei Martial und in den kleinen Gedichten des Catull, Philologus 102, 1958, 284–318. * J. BAYET, Catulle, la Grèce et Rome, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 2, Vandœuvres-Genève 1956, 3–39. * J. C. BRAMBLE, Structure and Ambiguity in Catullus 64, PCPhS 16, 1970, 22–41. * F. CUPAIUOLO, Studi sull'esametro di Catullo, Napoli 1965. * E. S. DUCKETT, Catullus in English Poetry, Northampton, Mass. 1925. * J. B. EMPEROR, The Catullian Influence in English Lyric Poetry. Circa 1600–1650, Columbia, Missouri 1928. * J. EVRARD-GILLIS, La récurrence lexicale dans l'œuvre de Catulle. Etude stylistique, Paris 1976. * P. FEDELI, Catullus' Carmen 61, Amsterdam 1983. * P. FEDELI, Introduzione a Catullo, Bari 1990. * J. FERGUSON, Catullus, Lawrence, Kansas 1985. * J. FERGUSON, Catullus, Oxford 1988. * E. FRAENKEL, Catulls Trostgedicht für Calvus (c. 96), WS 69, 1956, 278–288, repr. in: E.F., Kleine Beiträge zur Klassischen Philologie, vol. 2, Roma 1964, 103–113. * J. H. GAISSER, Catullus and His Renaissance Readers, Oxford 1993. * G. P. GOOLD, Catullus, London 1983. * J. GRANAROLO, L'œuvre de Catulle. Aspects religieux, éthiques et stylistiques, Paris 1967. * J. GRANAROLO, D'Ennius à Catulle, Paris 1971. * J. GRANAROLO, Catulle, ce vivant, Paris 1982. * K. P. HARRINGTON, Catullus and his Influence, Boston 1923. * E. A. HAVELOCK, The Lyric Genius of Catullus, Oxford 1939 (repr. New York 1967). * R. HEINE, ed., Catull, Darmstadt 1975. * W. HERING, Catull, c. 64, Rekonstruktion und Aussage, WZRostock 27, 1978, 547–561. * H. HEUSCH, Das Archaische in der Sprache Catulls, Bonn 1954. * O. HEZEL, Catull und das griechische Epigramm, Stuttgart 1932. * A. E. HOUSMAN, Catullus 64, 324, CQ 9, 1915, 229–230. * M. JANAN, When the Lamp is Shattered. Desire and Narrative in Catullus, Carbondale/Edwardsville 1994. * R. JENKYNs, Three Classical Poets. Sappho, Catullus, and Juvenal, London 1982. * F. KLINGNER, Catull, in: Klingner, Geisteswelt, 5th ed. 1965 (repr. 1979), 218–238. * F. KLINGNER, Catulls Peleus-Epos, SBAW 1956, 6; repr. in: KLINGNER, Studien, 156–224. * U. KNOCHÉ, Eine römische Wurzel lateinischer Persönlichkeitsdichtung, NJAB 3, 1940, 238–252; repr. in: Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften 27–41. * U. KNOCHÉ, Erlebnis und dichterischer Ausdruck in der lateinischen Poesie, Gymnasium 65, 1958, 146–158; repr. in: Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften 42–54, and in: R. HEINE, ed., 133–149. * D. KONSTAN, Catullus' Indictment of Rome: The Meaning of Catullus 64, Amsterdam 1977. * S. KOSTER, Catulls Auserwählte, in: S.K., Ille Ego Qui. Dichter zwischen Wort und Macht, Erlangen 1988, 9–31. * G. LAFAYE, Catulle et ses modèles, Paris 1894, repr. Ann Arbor 1978. * A. D. LEEMAN, Catullus, Angry Young Man, Hermeneus 35, 1964, 101–114, s. now: LEEMAN, Form 111–121. * A. D. LEEMAN, Catulls Carmen 76, Acta Colloquii Didactici Classici Sexti 15–16, 1975–1976, 41–57, s. now: LEEMAN, Form 123–137. * G. LIEBERG, Puella Divina. Die Gestalt der göttlichen Geliebten bei Catull im Zusammenhang der antiken Dichtung, Amsterdam 1962. * R. J. M. LINDSAY, The Chronology of Catullus' Life, CPh 43, 1948, 42–44. * E. LINK, Poetologisches bei Catull. Die Welt virtuoser Poesie und die Leidenschaft des Artisten—ein Programm, diss. Heidelberg 1977, Erlangen 1982. * J. W. LOOMIS, Studies in Catullan Verse. An Analysis of Word Types and Patterns in the Polymetra, Leiden 1972. * R. O. A. M. LYNE, The Latin Love Poets. From Catullus to Horace, Oxford 1980. * P. MAAS, The Dichtung, Berlin 1924 (repr. 1962), 2, 227–310. * T. P. WISEMAN, Catullan Questions, Leicester 1969. * T. P. WISEMAN, Catullus and His World: A Reappraisal, Cambridge 1985. * C. WITKE, Enarratio Catulliana. Carmina 50; 30; 65; 68, Leiden 1968. * E. ZAFFAGNO, Espressionismo latino tardo-repubblicano, Genova 1987.

Chronology of the Poems of Catullus, CQ 36, 1942, 79–82. * N. MARINONE, Berenice da Callimaco a Catullo, Roma 1984. * R. MARTIN, Réflexions sur Catulle, BAGB 1985, 1, 43–62. * J. A. S. McPEEK, Catullus in Strange and Distant Britain, Cambridge, Mass. 1939. * F. MICHLER, Catulls Peleus-Epos. Metrische und stilistische Untersuchungen, diss. Graz 1981, published 1982. * R. A. B. MYNORS, Catullus, carmina. Codex Oxoniensis Bibliothecae Bodleianae Canonicianus class. Lat. 30, Lugduni Batavorum 1966. * B.-M. NÄSSTRÖM, The Abhorrence of Love. Studies in Rituals and Mystic Aspects in Catullus' Poem of Attis, Uppsala, Stockholm 1989. * C. L. NEUDLING, A Prosopography to Catullus, Oxford 1955. * J. K. NEWMAN, Roman Catullus and the Modification of the Alexandrian Sensibility, Hildesheim 1990. * W. OTT, Metrische Analysen zu Catull, carmen 64, Tübingen 1973. * H. PATZER, Zum Sprachstil des neoterischen Hexameters, MH 12, 1955, 77–95 (repr. in: R. HEINE, ed., Catull, 447–474). * K. QUINN, The Catullan Revolution, Melbourne 1959 (revised: Oxford 1969). * K. QUINN, Catullus. An Interpretation, London 1972. * K. QUINN, ed., Approaches to Catullus, Cambridge 1972. * A. RAMMINGER, Motivgeschichtliche Studien zu Catulls Basiagedichten, diss. Tübingen, Würzburg 1937. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Das foedus in der römischen Erotik (1912), repr. in: R. HEINE, ed., Catull, 153–180. * R. RIEKS, Prosopographie und Lyrikinterpretation. Die Gedichte Catulls auf M. Caelius Rufus, Poetica 18, 1986, 249–273. * A. RONCONI, Studi Catulliani, Bari 1953. * D. O. ROSS jr., Style and Tradition in Catullus, Cambridge, Mass. 1969. * M. ROTHSTEIN, Catull und Lesbia, Philologus 78, 1923, 1–34. * M. ROTHSTEIN, Catull und Caelius Rufus, Philologus 81, 1926, 472–473. * J. SARKISSIAN, Catullus 68. An Interpretation, Leiden 1983. * E. SCHÄFER, Das Verhältnis von Erlebnis und Kunstgestalt bei Catull, Wiesbaden 1966. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Catulls Anordnung seiner Gedichte, Philologus 117, 1973, 215–242. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Das Problem des Catullbuches, Philologus 123, 1979, 216–231. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Catull, Heidelberg 1985. * I. SCHNELLE, Untersuchungen zu Catulls dichterischer Form, Leipzig 1933. * M. SCHUSTER, Valerius Catullus, RE 2, 7 (14), 1948, 2353–2410. * M. B. SKINNER, Catullus' Passer. The Arrangement of the Book of Polymetric Poems, New York 1981. * F. STOESSL, C. Valerius Catullus. Mensch, Leben, Dichtung, Meisenheim am Glan 1977. * F. STOESSL, Die biographische Methode in der Catull-Forschung, GB 10, 1981 (1983), 105–134. * H. STRECKER, Die volkstümlichen Elemente in den kleineren Gedichten des Catull, diss. Jena 1950. * W. STROH, Lesbia und Juventius. Ein erotisches Liederbuch im Corpus Catullianum, in: P. NEUKAM, ed., Die Antike als Begleiterin, München 1990, 134–158. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Catull. Eine Interpretation, 3 vols., Darmstadt 1984–1990. * O. WEINREICH, Die Distichen des Catull, Tübingen 1926, repr. 1964. * A. L. WHEELER, Catullus and the Traditions of Ancient Poetry, Berkeley 1934. * U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Catulls hellenistische Gedichte, in: U. v. W.-M., Hellenistische

III. PROSE

A. HISTORIOGRAPHY AND RELATED GENRES

ROMAN HISTORICAL WRITING

General Remarks

Etymology itself shows that historical writing is concerned with the empirical search for facts (ἱστορίη). This distinguishes its subject matter from the argumentum forming the subject of drama, which is not interested in what is but what could be. Nor is history like storytelling (fabulae), which is neither true nor probable.<sup>1</sup> Historians are under a particular obligation to tell the truth; impartiality is another requirement—ever felt and never wholly fulfilled.

In Roman literature these demands are subject to noteworthy limitations. As a rule, Roman historical writing is patriotic and therefore not free from partisanship. It is moralizing and therefore not wholly concerned with the facts. For long stretches it follows 'fabulous' traditions, which means that it falls short of the requirement of truthfulness. Moreover, its manner of presentation is influenced by drama in many ways, often replacing historical truth with literary probability.

According to subject matter ancient authors distinguished between annals (ab urbe condita), contemporary history (historiae),<sup>2</sup> and the historical monograph, although the annalistic method of narration by years is not restricted to annals in the narrow sense. The interest in aetia (origins) damages credibility by leading in some cases to free invention.

---

<sup>1</sup> Isid. etym. 1. 44. 5 Nam historiae sunt res verae quae factae sunt; argumenta sunt quae etsi facta non sunt, fieri tamen possunt (cf. Arist. poet. 1451 b 3-4); fabulae vero sunt quae nec factae sunt nec fieri possunt, quia contra naturam sunt.

<sup>2</sup> Isid. etym. 1. 44. 4 Inter historiam autem et annales hoc interest, quod historia est eorum temporum quae vidimus, annales vero sunt eorum annorum quos aetas nostra non novit; cf. Serv. Aen. 1. 373. Earlier Verrius Flaccus (GRF fig. 4 Funaioli) had made a similar point. The opposite view in Auct. Her. 1. 13; Cic. inv. 1. 27.

Likewise, the approach of authors to their subject varies according to the genre they adopt. We may begin with annales in the strict sense, that is, the record of facts in chronological sequence. Fabius Pictor is thought to be the father of this genre, although this is to overlook his narrative vein. A typical feature of this sort of texts is the ἀρχαιολογία, the 'account of beginnings' (a flashback on earlier events). The actual narrative proceeds from year to year and thus runs the risk of losing sight of larger connections. The division between res externae and internae is another characteristic of the genre.

The res gestae represent a second type of historical work, containing a brief account of origins and a more detailed investigation of current events. The founder of this genre is Sempronius Asellio. This is a variant standing midway between annales and historiae. Asellio strives for a presentation of 'cause and effect' in the vein of Polybius and his so-called 'pragmatic' (i.e. 'political') approach to history.

A third type dispenses with any account of origins. The author concentrates entirely on the history of his own time (historiae). A typical representative of this manner would be Sisenna. In antiquity some authors<sup>1</sup> tried to define historiae as a type of work focused on contemporary history, based on the author's personal experience (ἱστορίη), whereas others defined it as a 'pragmatic' study of history, explaining the political mechanisms of 'cause and effect'. This theoretical distinction had little practical value.

Res gestae and historiae adhere in principle, though without complete rigor, to the annalistic method of presentation. They inquire into the reasons and purposes of historical events. Annales, res gestae, and historiae present history in a continuous narrative, rather than in selection like the historical monograph.

Historical monographs raise a special claim to literary status. They employ a method of narrative which aims particularly at emotional effect and draws some inspiration from Aristotle's theory of tragedy, although this application of his theory blatantly contradicts Aristotle's own intentions and his clear distinction between history and poetry. The founder of the historical monograph at Rome was Coelius Antipater. All these categories, however, cover only a small part of the actual scope of Hellenistic and Roman historical writing.

Authors of universal histories organize their material on geographical lines. One of them is Lutatius Daphnis, a freedman of Lutatius Catulus, who wrote Communes historiae. Later Varro and Pompeius Trogus composed similar works.

<sup>1</sup> Gell. 5. 18; Serv. Aen. 1. 373; Isid. orig. 1. 41. 1; 44. 3-4.

The epitome, suitable for school use, made its appearance in the 1st century B.C. After Junius Brutus, this style was adopted by Nepos and Atticus. In the epitome, the selection of material is made on subjective grounds. This is a type of literature which gained in importance during the imperial period.

The commentarius had its Roman roots in the official reports made by magistrates, but may also be explained by Greek models. An ordered collection of material intended for literary elaboration was called ὑπόμνημα. Xenophon acted as literary model both for commentarii (in the case of Caesar), and for autobiography (in the case of Lutatius Catulus).

Biography and autobiography are related genres, which must, however, be distinguished from historical writing in the strict sense. In form they represent quite disparate types; hence, they will be treated separately here. Their Roman predecessors are to be found in funeral speeches, elogia, letters of self-justification (apologiae) and magistrates' reports, although from the very beginning they are crossed with Greek traditions, such as those of the encomium, the advice to rulers ('mirror of princes'), and biographies both plain and literary. A particular type of biographical literature is formed by exitus-accounts, whose effect is felt by Roman historical writing. Later, biography would overlay historical writing at Rome, since the overwhelming power of the emperors encouraged a biographical approach to history.

Greek Background

In Roman historical writing, from the very beginning, native traditions were linked with those of Greece. It is characteristic that in the area of prose, just as in that of poetry, Hellenistic influences enjoyed chronological priority over those of the Greek classical period. From Cato to Sisenna, Hellenistic models predominate, in all their multiplicity, spanning the gamut from foundation stories (κτίσεις) to 'tragic' history.<sup>1</sup>

It was only late that the great classical Greek models were discovered, and that Roman writers found the courage to challenge them on the basis of the Hellenistic and Roman traditions already established. Sallust became a Roman Thucydides, Livy a Roman Herodotus.<sup>1</sup> Even the preceding generation had contented itself with more modest paradigms: Caesar with Xenophon, and Cicero with the Isocrateans Ephorus and Theopompus. Xenophon and Isocrates were two authors whose influence went far beyond the field of historiography; their cultural importance for Rome has not yet been sufficiently evaluated.

---

<sup>1</sup> The writers of historical epic may be compared with Hellenistic epic poets. As a prose writer raising literary claims by using 'epic' elements, perhaps only Coelius may be mentioned.

Roman Development<sup>2</sup>

Some typically Roman features set a lasting stamp on historical writing: its patriotic character, its educative function (historia magistra vitae), its moralizing attitude, its preoccupation with the free will of the individual and its overwhelming concentration on Rome.

Long before history was written, there had been an awareness of history in Rome. The annales composed by the pontifices made a precise record of dry facts of greater or less importance; this was to become a permanent feature of Roman historical writing, whether as a simple element of style, like in certain passages of Tacitus, or as a consciously practiced attitude, like in Suetonius. Roman historical writing was strongly fostered by the thirst for glory of Roman generals and their clans. It was within this framework that Ennius wrote his epic. In its turn, Ennius' poem would in part affect historical writing, even though sometimes its influence has been exaggerated. In art, historical persons and contemporary battles were represented as early as about 300 B.C., that is to say, a century before the beginning of historical writing. Such painting served propaganda purposes: it glorified the families of generals celebrating triumphs.

---

<sup>1</sup> Livy, who fulfilled Cicero's program for the writing of history, stands in the succession both of Herodotus and of the Isocrateans. His relation to Herodotus is complex. The story of Tarquin the Proud and the poppy heads is a manifest echo of Herodotus (5. 92). Livy did not invent this story in Herodotus' wake, but he saw it in his 'Roman' model and felt reminded of Herodotus—with more justification than he could realize. The origin of the tale in folklore is defended by T. Köves-Zulauf, Die Eroberung von Gabii und die literarische Moral der römischen Annalistik, WJA NF 13, 1987, 121–147. Folklore is often submerged literature, and the Greek-educated fabricators of Italian myth had read Herodotus. The infiltration of a traitor (cf. Herod. 3. 154) need not necessarily be literary invention, but the whole elaboration of the theme is literary to a highly suspicious degree. The simplest hypothesis is that the invention of the story in the 'Roman' sources of Livy was already in debt to literary reminiscences.

<sup>2</sup> G. PERL 1984.

Republican historiography had clan roots. The very fact that so many works began ab urbe condita proves that particular gentes were concerned with deriving legitimacy from earliest legend. This search for aetia could produce free inventions. The deeds performed by the members of noble families had long been honored in triumphal processions. The tabulae pictae<sup>1</sup> shown on parade were calculated to enhance the respect enjoyed by the triumphator and his family also in the elections to come, and this is a parallel to family prejudice in Roman historical writing. Masks and inscriptions helped to keep alive memory of the dead as an exemplum; an early example of the latter are the Scipio epitaphs. Funeral speeches (laudationes funebres) were preserved by family pride, so that later they could serve as an (often unreliable) historical source.<sup>2</sup> Similarly, other notable speeches were not immediately forgotten, as for example that made by Appius Claudius Caecus in rejecting Pyrrhus' overtures for peace.

With the increase in education, historiography in the strict sense became a new instrument of political activity. At first history was written in Greek, but then also in the vernacular. Historical writing in Greek could serve the aims of foreign policy only during the Roman conflicts with Macedonia and the Seleucids; after that, it lost its function.

Historical writing in Latin was a means of domestic policy within Roman society. Most often it was regarded as a vehicle which allowed senior statesmen to pass on their experiences to the younger generation. Accordingly, its authors were mainly senators.<sup>3</sup> It is only at the time of Sulla that clients of the great families also made their debut as authors; yet in both cases, the vantage-point remained senatorial, since what mattered was less the writer's origin than that of his patron. As for contemporary history, however, it need not necessarily depend on the traditions of the great houses. The series of such works began at Rome with Sempronius Asellio. In the late Republican period, non-senators also took up the writing of history. For them the influence of Fabius, Cato, and Piso was no longer definitive.

<sup>1</sup> G. ZINSERLING 1959–1960.

<sup>2</sup> W. KIERDORF, Laudatio funebris. Interpretationen und Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung der römischen Leichenrede, Meisenheim 1980.

<sup>3</sup> Coelius Antipater is a possible exception (see the chapter devoted to him); according to Nepos vir. ill. fig. 16 P. = Suet. gramm. 27, L. Voltacilius Pitholaus (his name is uncertain) was the first freedman to write history. He opened a Latin school of rhetoric in 81 B.C.; T. P. WISEMAN, The Credibility of the Roman Annalists, LCM 8, 1983, 20–22.

Literary Technique

Literary technique varies in accordance with the widely divergent aims of the individual authors. Apart from those who in the early period wrote in Greek, literary ambitions were most marked in Coelius Antipater.

Early Latin historical writing followed no uniform generic laws. Rather, it embraced a multiplicity of different forms, which may be found in varying combinations. The following forms rest on Roman tradition: the simple presentation of facts in succession to the annals of the pontifices, and the commentarius in succession to Roman official journals and the reports of military commanders. The commentarius could display a varying level of claim to literary status, and might approach historical writing in the line of Xenophon.

Convincing creations in the field of literary genre arose only from Caesar's competition with Xenophon, Sallust's with Thucydides and Cato, and Livy's with Herodotus and Isocrates. All these were individual achievements.

The surviving works (e.g. of Livy and Tacitus) create the impression that the year-by-year method of presentation must have become the general rule. For this reason, the deviations from this principle in favor of keeping particular topics together are especially instructive.

From the days of Cato this annalistic pattern had been subject to criticism. It was Asellio who made the demand that causal connections should be sought.

The writing of monographs is different from the composition of annals in admitting a certain unity through a single hero and a unified action. In the Hellenistic style, a monograph may be written in the fashion of a drama, with events grouped around a single or a few heroes. Asellio and Sisenna adopted to some degree such a dramatic technique. A parallel to 'tragic history' was the history pictures accompanying the triumphal processions of Pompey and Caesar and depicting the deaths of particular enemies (App. Mithr. 117 § 575, civ. 2. 101, § 420). But all this does not exclude a basic pattern determined by the succession of years.

Language and Style

The language and style<sup>1</sup> of early Latin historical writing are less uniform than generic considerations would lead one to expect. For a long time there must in fact have been no generally observed historical style. Occasionally, turns of phrase make their appearance which apparently belong to lower linguistic registers.<sup>2</sup> On the other hand, the style of Roman epic, which often reflects historical events, influenced Roman historians. From time to time elements of poetry are found in Cato and Coelius, though not as recurring generic markers. An author such as Claudius Quadrigarius writes an unobtrusive, elegant Latin, which strikes the reader nowadays as more modern than that of Sallust. In this respect he belongs with the simplicity of Piso and Asellio.

In Hemina and Antias a heavy official manner prevails, perhaps influenced by Polybius. Antipater, Macer, and Sisenna adopt the fashionable Asian rhetoric of their day.

In his commentariū Caesar decided in favor of a simple elegantia and Xenophontic grace. The 'Herodotean' Livy employed archaisms less noticeably than Sallust and paid increasing homage to an Isocratean and Ciceronian stylistic ideal. The closer he comes to the present, the less remarkable his linguistic archaisms.

Sallust was the first to turn dependence on Cato into a rule, and it was thanks to him that Cato's style came to exercise its powerful influence. The style Sallust consciously created was that of a Roman Thucydides. Yet in his Historiae, too often ignored, even Sallust employed fewer archaisms than in his monographs.

Pollio and Trogus, classical authors frequently left out of account, have again their own interpretation of the historical manner, different from that of Sallust or Livy.

It was only with Tacitus and Ammianus that the 'Sallustian' style of historical writing became generically established.

In the imperial period rhetoric made more impression on historical writing, in so far as the authors wanted to serve instruction and general education. On the other hand with his Lives of the Emperors, which in part rival with history, Suetonius turned the relatively simple style of the grammaticus into something capable in its way of presentation at court.

<sup>1</sup> W. D. LEBEK 1970 is basic; cf. Leeman, Orationis ratio, esp. 86-88.

<sup>2</sup> W. D. LEBEK 1970, 289.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Cato had already objected to taking meaningless facts into his history, and Sempronius Asellio likewise was concerned with the investigation of political causes, doubtless in the footsteps of Polybius and his 'pragmatic' history. He was aware, for example, of the connection between foreign and domestic policy. Like Isocrates, he believed in the moral value of history, which for him was a guide to right action. Its chief aim in his eyes was docere, though movere was by no means excluded.

Antipater, Antias, and Sisenna emphasized the aspects which rhetoric knows as delectare and movere. Following the Greeks Duris and Clitarchus, they were not afraid of exaggerations. Several passages of Cicero evince his theoretical interest in historical writing. He acknowledged the noble simplicity of Caesar's commentarii; however, his personal ideal of historical writing tended more towards the 'Isocratean' manner practised by men like Theopompus.<sup>1</sup> Sallust's and Livy's remarks on the historian's calling—to be considered in the discussion of the individual authors—are important. They reveal how the interest of the senator in gloria shifts from political to literary achievements (Sallust), and how eventually the writer's task can come to fill a whole life (Livy).

Ideas II

In the funeral processions of old Rome the family's ancestors appeared, each in the garb of the highest magistracy he had held. This attests a serious and deep-rooted awareness of the unrepeatable historical moment which, precisely in its uniqueness, was intended to act as a model.

Roman values were realized in specific actions, and historical moments acquired eternal significance as manifestations of such values. History paintings and Roman historical reliefs kept such moments alive; a perspective which might help to understand the particular approach of Roman writers to history.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. leg. 1. 6-7; fam. 5. 12; de orat. 2. 61-64; Brut. 262; M. RAMBAUD 1953.

There was an inner conflict between the old Roman mentality and that of the late Hellenistic Greek historians, who either pursued antiquarian interests or tried to establish rational laws of politics. It is this tension which gives life to Roman historical writing.

The topics which hold most interest for the early Roman historians are mainly primitive history and contemporary history. Their investigation of origins is neither scholarly nor impartial. Senatorial historians are often concerned to lend luster to the beginnings of their own distinguished house. On the other hand, a homo novus like Cato is more attentive to the origins of Roman greatness and of Roman mores as a whole, and the establishment of Rome's position in universal history. He gives more general recognition to the importance of the Italian cities, and assigns them an appropriate place in his examination of the roots of the imperium. This is different from many later historians, whose attention is overwhelmingly concentrated on the capital.

As early as Cato, foreign history served to provide contrasting examples: by comparing a nameless Roman tribune with Leonidas, he self-confidently sets the native character over against the Greek.

In its approach Roman historical writing is apologetic and patriotic. Therefore, Polybius was usually correct in suppressing annalistic assertions which looked suspicious to him.<sup>1</sup>

Contemporary history was another focus of interest. Both early and contemporary history coexisted independently in Cato's prose, as they did in Naevius' poetry. The presentation of contemporary history is meant to communicate the author's life experience to the younger generation, and also to forward the continuity of Roman mores. Political partisanship is quite clearly also at work, whether that of the optimates or, as in the case of Fannius and Macer, of the populares.

The treatment of earlier periods, in so far as they are tackled at all, is for this reason not free from contemporary bias. In accordance with their own point of view, the annalists interweave with their presentation of Rome's early period facts and trends drawn from their own day. (For this reason, it is, for example, possible to adduce Livy's picture of the early history of Rome also as an indirect source for the history of the start of the revolutionary period).<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Sometimes his caution seems excessive to scholars who are ready to give a certain measure of credence to the so-called 'Roman' tradition—e.g. Fabius Pictor and Cincius Alimentus (in Livy, Appian, Cassius Dio/Zonaras, and Silius Italicus): B. L. TWYMAN, Polybius and the Annalists on the Outbreak and Early Years of the Second Punic War, Athenaeum n.s. 65, 1987, 67–80.

Already in the death masks of old Rome, a sense of reality and even of the individual finds expression. At about the same time as Roman poetry becomes personal (Lucilius, Catullus, the elegists), there appear in prose the beginnings of biography and autobiography. The metamorphosis of virtus from a collective to a personal meaning may be observed in characters such as Sulla and Caesar.

The historical vision of the annalists is centered on Rome, with the single and never sufficiently praised exception of Cato. Annalistic history even later failed to develop a form appropriate for telling the story of the empire. Tacitus, Cassius Dio, and Ammianus Marcellinus still labored under the burden of this tradition, even if Tacitus had recognized the signs of a new epoch and sought to do it justice.

I. BRUNS, Die Persönlichkeit in der Geschichtsschreibung der Alten, Berlin 1898. * J.-P. CHAUSSERIE-LAPRÉE, L'expression narrative chez les historiens latins. Histoire d'un style, Paris 1969. * E. CIZEK, Les genres de l'historiographie latine, Faventia 7, 2, 1985, 15–33. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Historians, London 1966. * G. DUMÉZIL, Mythe et épopée. L'idéologie des trois fonctions dans les épopées des peuples indo-européens, vol. 1, Paris 1968. * C. W. FOMARA, The Nature of History in Ancient Greece and Rome, Berkeley 1983. * M. GRANT, The Ancient Historians, London 1970. * Histoire et historiens dans l'Antiquité, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 4, Vandœuvres 1956. * M. HOSE, Erneuerung der Vergangenheit. Die Historiker im Imperium Romanum von Florus bis Cassius Dio, Stuttgart 1994. * E. HOWALD, Vom Geist antiker Geschichtsschreibung, München 1944. * LEEMAN, Form. * LEEMAN, Orationis ratio. * R. MEISTER, Motive und Formen der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, Altertum 10, 1964, 13–26. * G. PERL, Geschichtsschreibung in der Zeit der römischen Republik und in der Kaiserzeit, Klio 66, 1984, 562–573. * PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst. * A. J. POMEROY, The Appropriate Comment. Death Notices in the Ancient Historians, Frankfurt 1991. * M. RAMBAUD, Cicéron et l'histoire romaine, Paris 1953. * U. W. SCHOLZ, Annales und Historia(e), Hermes 122, 1994, 64–79. * Y. TIISALA, Die griechischen Lehnwörter bei den römischen Historikern bis zum Ende der augusteischen Zeit, Jyväskylä 1974. * A. J. WOODMAN, Rhetoric in Classical Historiography, London 1988. * N. ZEGERS, Wesen und Ursprung der tragischen Geschichtsschreibung, diss. Köln 1959. * G. ZINSERLING, Studien zu den Historiendarstellungen der römischen Republik, WZJena 9, 1959–1960, 403–448 (on historical paintings).

<sup>1</sup> D. GUTBERLET, Die erste Dekade des Livius als Quelle zur gracchischen und sullanischen Zeit, Hildesheim 1985.

HISTORIANS OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD

The Annales Maximi<sup>1</sup>

The development of literary historical writing at Rome was preceded by the first historical records embodied in the yearly chronicles of the pontifices maximi, the so-called tabulae pontificum maximorum or tabulae annales.<sup>2</sup> On whitened tablets the priests made annual entries. They began with the names of the consuls or other magistrates of the year and noted significant events under the corresponding dates on the calendar. Cato assailed the irrelevance of what was recorded.<sup>3</sup> By contrast, later authors presuppose quite detailed entries. This contradiction may be explained by the development of these priestly chronicles. Originally, emphasis was placed on the sacred significance of an occurrence, and this is why natural phenomena took pride of place along with other incidents which required sacrifices and vows. But, increasingly, attention came to be paid to history in the narrower sense. This meant that the annales became an indispensable source for historians, though surprisingly enough the Annales Maximi were less often adduced than might have been expected.<sup>4</sup>

The keeping of pontifical records goes back into the mists of time. The first such tablets fell victim to the flames at Rome's conquest by the Gauls in the 4th century B.C. They were partially reconstructed from memory, but the entries remained incomplete, and it was with the departure of the Gauls that Livy (6. 1. 3) was able to mark a new stage in the transmission of Roman history.

At the end of the 2nd century B.C. (between 130 and 115) the

<sup>1</sup> C. CICHORIUS, RE 1. 2. 1894, 2248–2255; D. Flach 1985, 56–61; B. W. FRIER, Libri Annales Pontificum Maximorum. The Origins of the Annalistic Tradition, Rome 1979; U. W. SCHOLZ, Die Anfänge der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, in: P. NEUKAM, ed., Vorschläge und Anregungen, München 1980, 75–92; R. DREWS 1988.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. Cic. de orat. 2. 51–52; Serv. Aen. 1. 373.

<sup>3</sup> Non lubet scribere, quod in tabula apud pontificem maximum est, quotiens annona cara, quotiens lunae aut solis lumine caligo aut quid obstiterit (frg. 77 PETER).

<sup>4</sup> E. RAWSON, Prodigy Lists and the Use of the Annales Maximi, CQ 65 n.s. 21, 1971, 158–169.

pontifex maximus P. Mucius Scaevola published all the tablets in book form. It was only then that the name in common use today, Annales Maximi, came to prevail, although Servius (wrongly?) interprets it by reference to the pontifex maximus. P. Scaevola must have supplemented the entries with further information, since the publication, on Servius' testimony, encompassed 80 volumes. The great number given for these books has largely contributed to doubts about the existence of such an edition, or else its transfer to the Augustan period.

The assumption of a publication in books during the Republican period is, however, made necessary by the fact that already Sallust and Cicero no longer seem to refer to the original tablets. With Scaevola the tradition of pontifical annales ceased, and they were replaced by literary historical writings. Such writings conscientiously adopted the kind of record found in the old chronicles, since for a Roman patriot such dry data had a strange emotional appeal. It was they that invested a narrative with authority and credibility, even if the events in question were not particularly well attested.

The chronicles of the pontifices, which may hardly have supplied more than a framework of dates, were supplemented by further native traditions. In the public archives ancient documents reposed, although anything going back to the time before the Gallic invasion naturally lay under suspicion of forgery. In noble houses funeral speeches and private records of holding offices by magistrates were preserved, although family pride is a questionable witness. There were in addition orally transmitted tales and interpretations of names. Rites such as the pompa funebris, in which the ancestors of the dead man, represented by living actors, took part in their official garb, and the custom of the public funeral oration evince an overwhelmingly political and moralizing attitude towards history. The exempla maiorum were regarded with reverential awe. The high point of life was given eternal significance, whether it was the attainment of the most important office in the state or the realization of human greatness in death.

Q. Fabius Pictor<sup>1</sup>

The first literary personality among the Roman historians is Q. Fabius Pictor, a senator from a distinguished family, whose cognomen was inherited from an ancestor responsible for decorating the temple of Salus in about 300 B.C. with what were probably historical paintings. He is an author whose experience directly influenced his work. He had fought as an officer against the Gauls (225 B.C.; fig. 23 P.). In all probability he had personally taken part in the Battle of Lake Trasimene (fig. 26); after the defeat at Cannae he conscientiously discharged a mission to the Delphic oracle (Livy 23. 11. 1–6; 22. 7. 4). His Roman history went down at least as far as 217 B.C.

<sup>1</sup> HRR 1. 5-39; FGtHist 809; F. MÜNZER, Q. Fabius Pictor, RE 6. 2, 1909, 1836-1841; M. GELZER 1934 and 1954; P. BUNG, Q. Fabius Pictor, der erste römische

Along with native traditions, Fabius also followed those of Greece. Hellanicus had related the story of Aeneas, while the legend of the foundation of Rome could be read in Hieronymus of Cardia (4th century B.C.), Antigonus and Timaeus of Sicily (4th–3rd century B.C.).<sup>1</sup> In his account of Romulus, Fabius showed far-reaching agreement with Diocles of Peparethus (Plut. Rom. 3), who perhaps enjoyed priority.<sup>2</sup>

Like Timaeus, Fabius displayed a liking for antiquarian detail, religious ceremonies, customs and usages, as well as for anecdotes drawn from his own experience. Like him, he counts in Olympiads and takes pleasure in precise, although unattested, dates.

None of the scanty fragments gives us the original text verbatim. They are derived partly from the Annals written in Greek, partly from a Latin work, which may have been a translation from the Greek. Whether this Latin redaction goes back to Fabius himself is a matter of dispute. The early history and that of his own time was handled more fully by the author than that of the intervening centuries. The De iure pontificio was perhaps not his work.

In the effort to describe his historical work, the antithesis between the style of ‘annals’ and ‘pragmatic’ historical writing must not be

---

Annalist. Untersuchungen über Aufbau, Stil und Inhalt seines Geschichtswerks an Hand von Polybios I–II, diss. Köln 1950; K. HANELL, Zur Problematik der älteren römischen Geschichtsschreibung, in: Histoire et historiens dans L’Antiquité, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 4, 1956, 147–170; D. TIMPE, Fabius Pictor und die Anfänge der römischen Historiographie, ANRW 1. 2, 1972, 928–969; G. P. VERBRUGGHE, Fabius Pictor’s ‘Romulus and Remus’, Historia 30, 1981, 236–238; J. POUCKET, L’amplification narrative dans l’évolution de la geste de Romulus, ACD 17–18, 1981–1982, 175–187; M. SORDI, Il Campidoglio e l’invasione gallica del 386 a. C., CISA 10, 1984, 82–91.

<sup>1</sup> W. SCHUR, Griechische Traditionen von der Gründung Roms, Klio 17, 1921, 137.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. D. TIMPE, Fabius Pictor (see above, p. 371, note 1) 941–942; s. also D. FLACH 1985, 61–63; for the opposite view: E. SCHWARTZ, RE 5. 1, 1903, 797–798; JACOBY, FGrHist III C, No. 809 F 4.

exaggerated.<sup>1</sup> The disparate material did not allow either of these two principles to be applied rigorously. It is also unrewarding to play off in Fabius what is Roman against what is Greek. The composition of a book is in itself something Greek, and moreover Fabius made use of the Greek language, not simply because literary Latin was not yet fully developed. His intention was rather to take his place in the ranks of Hellenistic local historians<sup>2</sup> and to counter authors friendly to Carthage. In spite of all, he remained a Roman, for it was as a Roman that he wrote.

His choice of medium determined his audience. Fabius was particularly read by the Greek-speaking world, to which he conveyed the political aims of the Roman nobility.<sup>3</sup> In his homeland the influence of his book was limited to the narrow circle of those who had received a Greek education.

His decision in favor of so noble a medium in its turn influenced the author and his method of composition. In Greek, oldfashioned dryness and baldness were long outgrown, and the narrative art of our 'Roman Herodotus' indulged in Alexandrian flourishes:<sup>4</sup> in a prophetic dream Aeneas beheld his future accomplishments (fig. 3 P.). Female characters such as Tarpeia played dramatic parts. Even tracing significant political changes to trivial personal causes belongs to the practice of Hellenistic historians.

And yet the foreign elements supplied only the means. As in Greece, so in Rome, artistic historical writing arose at a time of crisis. Just as Herodotus wrote under the impact of the Persian Wars, so Fabius, Cincius Alimentus, and the epic poet Naevius<sup>5</sup> wrote under that of

<sup>1</sup> F. BÖMER, Naevius und Fabius Pictor, SO 29, 1952, 34–53.

<sup>2</sup> Such as the Babylonian Berossos, the Egyptian Manetho, the Carthaginian sympathizers Silenus, Chaereas and Sosylus. Fabius may be guided by local Greek chronicles (Horoï): G. PERL, Der Anfang der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, F&F 38, 1964, 185–189; 213–218, esp. 217.

<sup>3</sup> See M. GELZER 1934, 49.

<sup>4</sup> T. MOMMSEN, Römische Forschungen, vol. 2, Berlin 1879, 10.

<sup>5</sup> 4 The priority of Naevius over Fabius is defended for example by: F. BÖMER (cited above, p. 122, note 2); PETER lxxxii ff.; F. MÜNZER, col. 1839; Jacoby, FG<sup>r</sup>Hist 2 D 598 = comm. on no. 174; E. KORNEMANN, Römische Geschichte 1, Stuttgart 1938, 284–286; KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 73–74; J. PERRET, Les origines de la légende troyenne de Rome, Paris 1942, 471–472; H. T. ROWELL, The Original Form of Naevius Bellum Punicum, AJPh 68, 1947, 40; W. STRZELECKI, Naevius and Roman Annalists, RFIC 91, 1963, 440–458 (priority but without utilization by Fabius). The priority of Fabius is championed by: LEO, LG 83–84; Ed. FRAENKEL, RE suppl. 6, 1935, 639; M. GELZER 1934, 46–55, esp. 54–55.

Rome's struggle with Carthage. Greek historiographical method became for Fabius an instrument for creating a meaningful picture of Rome's history. In his 'paradigmatic' procedures<sup>1</sup> Greek literary methods are blended with the Roman fascination with exempla, the combination destined to remain typical of Roman historical writing.

Merely as a source for Rome's early history, Fabius won canonical status. Polybius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Livy would appeal to him. Ennius would compose his epic, favoring the Scipios, perhaps as a counterblast to his glorification of the Fabii.<sup>2</sup> But the significance of Fabius is more than that of his material. Possibly to refute the abuse heaped on Rome by Philinus of Acragas (second half of 3rd century B.C.), he formulated the basic premises of the Romans' projection of themselves: moral superiority, the requirements of self-defense, 'just wars' fought to protect their allies. With his tendentious treatment of the grounds for war (218 B.C.), Polybius would later enter into critical debate. Fabius is neither a Polybius before his time nor a naive chronicler of the old Roman type. He was a pioneer, whose work, precisely because its initial influence was so strong, entered the tradition and so, in the course of time, became dispensable.

Cincius Alimentus<sup>3</sup>

Along with Q. Fabius Pictor, the annalist L. Cincius Alimentus is the oldest Roman historian. As a politician, general, and statesman, he belonged to the senatorial class, enjoying, in the Second Punic War, his own independent command. He relates that he was taken prisoner by Hannibal and had learned from the Carthaginian general the precise number of his losses after his crossing of the Rhône (Livy 21. 38. 2-3).

His historical work, written in Greek, covered events from the beginnings (founding of Rome in 729/8; frg. 4 = Dion. Hal. 1. 74) down to his own time.

His narrative was not arid. It was relieved by legends and edifying tales, showing in this points of contact with Fabius. A markedly dramatic scene is found in frag. 6 P. (Dion. Hal. 12. 4). The belief that the story of the early period was briefly told has no foundation in fact.

<sup>1</sup> F. MÜNZER, col. 1840.

<sup>2</sup> H. PETER 1911, 278.

<sup>3</sup> HRR 1. 40-43; FGtHist 810; A. KLOTZ, Zu den Quellen der Archaiologia des Dionysios von Halikarnassos, RhM n.s. 87, 1938, 32-50, esp. 36 and 41; G. P. VERBRUGGHE, L. Cincius Alimentus. His Place in Roman Historiography, Philologus 126, 1982, 316-323.

Cincius was a plebeian, and seems to have been concerned with correcting the patrician Fabius. He put Rome's foundation in 729 B.C. Antiquarian interest led him to inquire into the origin of the alphabet, and this Phoenician invention was said to have been brought to Rome by the Greek Evander (frag. 1 P.). Etymology too attracted his attention. Since Evander had established the worship of Faunus, at first temples had been called faunae,<sup>1</sup> and only later fana. From here came the name fanatici for prophets (frag. 2 P. = Serv. georg. 1. 10).

Cincius is mentioned several times by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, mostly along with Fabius, whose opposition to Silenus he shared. Single allusions are found in Livy, Marius Victorinus, and Servius. Cincius' historical work became contributory to a current of tradition. His contribution can no longer be reconstructed from the few derivative sources we have.

Certain writings with antiquarian and juridical content come from a younger namesake, perhaps of the Augustan period.

Gaius Acilius<sup>2</sup>

Gaius Acilius was a senator of plebeian descent. It was he who introduced the philosophers' embassy of 155 to the senate, and who at that session acted as interpreter. His work, written in Greek, was translated into Latin by a certain Claudius. The identification of the latter with Claudius Quadrigarius is, in view of the large number of Claudii, mere caprice.

The work extended from pre-history down to the writer's own time. The latest preserved item refers to the year 184 B.C. Acilius takes for granted that Rome was a Greek colony. He gave an historical interpretation even to matters of religious practice, which shows that in this regard Cato was not the first. His anecdote about Scipio's conversation with the conquered Hannibal illustrates not only a

<sup>1</sup> W. CONZE, H. REINHART, Fanatismus, in: Geschichtliche Grundbegriffe. Historisches Lexikon zur politisch-sozialen Sprache in Deutschland, vol. 2, Stuttgart 1975, 303-327.

<sup>2</sup> HRR 1. 49-52; FG+Hist 813; A. KLOTZ, Der Annalist Q. Claudius Quadrigarius, RhM 91, 1942, 268-285, esp. 270-272; F. ALTHEIM, Untersuchungen zur römischen Geschichte 1, Frankfurt 1961, 182-185.

'Hellenistic' feature, but also the Roman's feel for the striking word (frg. 5 P.). It was the anecdotal form that enabled the Roman both to promote ethical norms and to assail their violation (frg. 3 P.).

A. Postumius Albinus<sup>1</sup>

A. Postumius Albinus was a rather important political figure of his day. He took part in an embassy to King Perseus and, after the victory at Pydna, he personally was charged with supervising the royal prisoner. In 155 B.C., it was he who as praetor urbanus received the famous philosophers' embassy. The next year, he was a member of a delegation mediating peace between Attalus II and Prusias II. As consul (151 B.C.), along with his colleague, he was thrown into prison by the tribunes because of his excessive strictness. After the destruction of Corinth (146 B.C.) he played an important part on the senatorial commission which organized Achaëa as a province, and was honored by the Greeks with memorials at the most important sites (Cic. Att. 13. 30. 3; 32. 3).

His historical work, beginning with Rome's early history, is cited only by A. Gellius and Macrobius. Polybius also mentions a poem by Albinus (40. 6. 4), which may be identifiable with the composition attested elsewhere dealing with Aeneas' arrival in Italy. In the manner of Thucydides, Albinus wrote pragmatic history. He used the Greek language with which he had been familiar from his earliest years, and Cato makes fun of him because, in the introduction to his work, he apologized for his imperfect Greek (Polyb. 40. 6. 5; Plut. Cato 12). Cato disliked him in particular, not only because of his predilection for things Greek, but also because he was an aristocrat. Polybius was hostile to the 'gossip and braggart' (e.g. 40. 6. 1). After all, it was he who had persuaded the senate not to release the Achaean hostages (Polyb. 33. 1. 3-8), thus extending by five years Polybius' own exile.

Postumius was held in high regard by his Roman and Greek contemporaries. A Latin edition of his work was also known. His slight influence need not be put down to any deficiencies of his work. Rather, Albinus had the misfortune to be disliked personally by the historians who came to determine the tradition, Polybius and Cato. Cicero's positive verdict (ac. 2. 45. 137; Brut. 21. 81) is all the more weighty because it comes from the first unprejudiced witness. Albinus offers an instructive example of the disappearance of literature caused by a biased tradition, and thus deserves mention in a literary history.

<sup>1</sup> HRR 1, 2nd ed., 53; FGtHist 812; F. MÜNZER, Postumius (31), RE 22, 1, 1953, 902-908.

M. Porcius Cato

Cato, the real founder of historical writing in Latin, is discussed in a separate section.

L. Cassius Hemina

L. Cassius Hemina<sup>1</sup> lived at the time of the quarti ludi saeculares (146 B.C.; fig. 39 P.). He was therefore a contemporary of Cato.

His Annales<sup>2</sup> treated in their 1st book Latin pre-history, with the wanderings of Aeneas<sup>3</sup> forming an excursus rich in material. The 2nd book extended from Romulus to the end of the war with Pyrrhus (280 B.C.). The two following books embraced the First and Second Punic Wars. The 4th was published before the outbreak of the Third Punic War, as its title (Bellum Punicum posterior [sic!]; fig. 31) suggests. The scope<sup>4</sup> of the entire work is unknown. Events of 181 B.C. (the find of Numa's books; fig. 37) and 146 B.C. (fig. 39) are mentioned.

In style,<sup>5</sup> parataxis (fig. 37) and brevitas prevail, though there are also complex sentences, echoing the officialese of the 2nd century (fig. 13). The narrative makes effective use of the historic present (frigg. 9 and 23). What is important to the content may be placed

---

<sup>1</sup> HRR 1, clxv-clxxxiii; 98-111 (with older bibl.); PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst, 287-288; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 1, 73-77; LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 1, 72-73; 2, 401-402; KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 76; E. RAWSON 1976, 690-702; W. SUERBAUM, Die Suche nach der antiqua mater in der vorvergilischen Annalistik. Die Irrfahrten des Aeneas bei Cassius Hemina, in: R. ALTHEIM-STIEHL, M. ROSENBAACH, ed., Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte. FS G. RADKE, Münster 1986, 269-297; U. W. SCHOLZ, Zu L. Cassius Hemina, Hermes 117, 1989, 167-181; G. FORSYTHE, Some Notes on the History of Cassius Hemina, Phoenix 44, 1990, 326-344.

<sup>2</sup> Not Historiae. Diomedes, who is our witness for fig. 11, is wrong.

<sup>3</sup> Hemina mentions Sicily as a stopping place, but not Carthage.

<sup>4</sup> E. RAWSON 1976, 690, accepts a total of five books. U. W. SCHOLZ 1989 (cited above, two notes before the last), 172, argues for seven, but the seven books of Cato, Naevius, Piso, and Coelius prove nothing about Hemina.

<sup>5</sup> LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 1, 72-73; 2, 401-402.

emphatically at the beginning (quo irent nesciebant, 'where to go they didn't know'; fig. 9). Alliterations reflect the taste of the day (fig. 40).

Greek education is traceable everywhere. A philosophical commonplace, recurring in Sallust (Iug. 2. 3), appears in fig. 24: quae nata sunt, ea omnia denasci aiunt, 'they say, everything that is born perishes'. The author concerns himself with the dating of Hesiod and Homer (fig. 8), and the gods of Samothrace (fig. 6). A question on the origin of religious usage determines his striking interpretation of the prodigy of the sow (fig. 11). In the educated Roman, a sensitivity to the facts of religious history coexisted with a rationalist attitude. Both are combined in pseudo-historical explanations when Janus, Saturn, and Faunus are explained in Euhemerus' manner as kings raised to god-head (figg. 1 and 4).

Whether Hemina, whose origins were plebeian, was close to Cato is a matter of surmise.<sup>1</sup> He soon fell into oblivion. Pliny the Elder quotes him several times, whereas grammarians and antiquarians who cite him seem to draw mainly from Varro.<sup>2</sup> Nothing however justifies us in ranking this oldest of the Latin Annalists and useful witness to religious history merely as a 'dimidiatus Cato or even less.'<sup>3</sup>

L. Calpurnius Piso

A figure somewhat reminiscent of Cato the Elder is Lucius Calpurnius Piso Censorius Frugi.<sup>4</sup> He was consul in 133 B.C. and a member of an ambitious plebeian family, an opponent of the Gracchi. As tribune he introduced the first lex repetundarum. He discharged his duties as censor with severity. It was not for nothing that he bore his agnomen. The high value he set on moderation is shown by a story he tells concerning Romulus (fig. 8). At a party Romulus is said to have taken only a little to drink because he had duties to perform the

<sup>1</sup> E. RAWSON 1976, 400 (referring to Cic. Phil. 2. 26).

<sup>2</sup> PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst 287-288.

<sup>3</sup> KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 76.

<sup>4</sup> HRR 1, 120-138; F. BÖMER 1953-54, 206-207; KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 77-78; K. LATTE, Der Historiker L. Calpurnius Frugi, SDAW, Kl. f. Sprachen, Lit. und Kunst 1960, 7 (= Kleine Schriften 1968, 837-847); E. RAWSON 1976, 702-713; A. MASTROCINQUE, La cacciata di Tarquinio il Superbo. Tradizione romana e letteratura greca I, Athenaeum 61, 1983, 457-480; G. E. FORSYTHE, The Historian L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, diss. Philadelphia 1984, cf. DA 46, 1985, 235 A; M. BONARIA, L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, fig. 18 PETER, Latomus 44, 1985, 879 (assigns to book 1).

next day. Someone said to him: 'If all would follow your example wine would be cheaper.' Romulus replied: 'No, dearer, if every man drank as much as he wanted. I at least have drunk just as much as I wanted.'

From his historical work, which he may have composed in old age, 45 fragments have survived. His history made no claims to style and extended from the legend of Aeneas to at least 146 B.C. The author criticizes the present (fig. 40 P., adulescentes peni deditos esse, 'that the young men are addicted to their penis') and his narrative assumes a moralizing tone. He has precise dates to give for the beginning of moral decline: for luxuria 187 B.C. (fig. 34 P.), for pudicitia subversa 154 B.C. (fig. 38 P.).<sup>1</sup> Numerous fragments show his interest in etymology and topography.<sup>2</sup> He was used by Varro, Livy, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Pliny. In Gellius two extracts are preserved whose simple charm appealed to archaizing taste.

C. Fannius<sup>3</sup>

A certain Fannius was the son-in-law of Laelius and close to the Scipionic Circle. Thanks to the influence of Gaius Gracchus, he became consul in 122 B.C., but delivered his famous speech De sociis et nomine Latino against Gracchus' proposal to grant citizenship to the Latins, and Latin rights to the rest of the allies. However, the identification of this Fannius with the historian is a matter of dispute.<sup>4</sup> Possibly the historian was the son of the consul in 122 B.C. His Annales may only have embraced contemporary history. Fannius belonged to a plebeian family which had attained the ranks of the nobility only in 161 B.C., and his work may have shown sympathy with the populares. His inclusion of both his own and others' speeches (cf. Cic. Brut. 81) in his work may be owing to his intention to illustrate motivation in the manner of Polybius. Generally speaking,

<sup>1</sup> K. BRINGMANN 1977, 33.

<sup>2</sup> Etymologies: fr. 2; 6; 7; 43; 44 P.; topographical information: fr. 4; 6; 16 P.

<sup>3</sup> HRR 1, 139-141; F. BÖMER 1953-54, 207-208; BROUGHTON, Magistrates 1, 519; KLINGNER, Geisteswelt 78-79; F. MÜNZER, Die Fanniusfrage, Hermes 55, 1920, 427-442.—A discussion of oratorical fragments by J. C. FERRARY, A propos de 2 fragments attribués à C. Fannius consul 122 (ORF, fr. 6 et 7), in: Democratia et aristocratia, Paris 1983, 51-58.

<sup>4</sup> For their identification: LEO, LG 333, note 1; F. CÁSSOLA, I Fanni in età repubblicana, Vichiana 12, 1983, 84-112.

Fannius is an author with some education. He compares Scipio's attitude with the irony (fig. 7) of Socrates (Cic. ac. 2. 15).

Sallust (hist. fig. 1. 4 M.) valued Fannius for his love of truth, and probably adopted his dating of the Roman decline in morals.<sup>1</sup> Brutus published an epitome (Cic. Att. 12. 5. 3).

C. Sempronius Tuditanus<sup>2</sup>

Among the Annalists are also numbered C. Gracchus (Ad Marcum Pomponium liber) and Gaius Sempronius Tuditanus, who was consul in 129. He composed Libri magistratuum and possibly an historical work. At his request, Hostius celebrated his military exploits in the Bellum Histricum.

Sempronius Asellio<sup>3</sup>

Sempronius Asellio, who lived approximately from 160–90 B.C., served as military tribune in 134/133 B.C. at the siege of Numantia. He may well then have been close to the Scipionic Circle. His historical work (Res gestae or Historiāe), in at least 14 books, was restricted to his own lifetime (about 146–91).

His literary style is marked by a striving for parallelism and antithesis, although this impression chiefly rests on the particularly careful composition of his proem. Asellio is still far from reaching the artistic level of Coelius Antipater (Cic. leg. 1. 6), though this does not justify us in describing his style as 'bad'.

Asellio heralded a new trend in historical writing at Rome. His preface was directed against the purely superficial collection of facts (id fabulas pueris est narrare, non historias scribere, 'that would mean to tell fairy tales to kids instead of writing history') and demanded an analysis of causal connexions also taking into account the mechanisms of domestic policy (frg. 1): nobis non modo satis esse video, quod factum esset, id pronuntiare, sed etiam, quo consilio quaque ratione gesta essent, demonstrare ('I see that it is not enough for us to tell what happened but also to show according to which plan and reason things happened'). This suggests that, under the influence of Polybius, he constructed an antithesis between the style of the annales and pragmatic historiography. There is also moralizing in the manner of Isocrates: true history aims to instruct and to summon its readers to right behavior on behalf of the res publica (frg. 2): nam neque alacriores . . . ad rem publicam defendendam neque segniores ad rem perperam faciendam annales libri commovere quosquam possunt ('for bald annals can neither encourage anyone to defend the state nor deter him from bad deeds').<sup>1</sup> However, the real creator of the historical monograph at Rome was Coelius Antipater.

<sup>1</sup> K. BRINGMANN 1977, 41.

<sup>2</sup> HRR 1, 143–147; A. E. ASTIN, Scipio Aemilianus, Oxford 1967, 239–240; J. UNGERN-STERNBERG VON PÜRCEL, Untersuchungen zum spätrepublikanischen Notstandsrecht, München 1970, 46.

<sup>3</sup> HRR 1, 179–184; 392 (bibl.); R. TILL, Sempronius Asellio, WJA 4, 1949–50, 330–334; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 1, 1952, 113–115; M. GELZER 1954, 342–348; W. RICHTER, Römische Zeitgeschichte und innere Emigration, Gymnasium 68, 1961, 286–315; M. MAZZA, Sulla tematica della storiografia di epoca sillana: il fig. 1–2 P. di Sempronio Asellione, SicGymn 18, 1965, 144–163; M. GELZER 1934 and 1954.

Contrary to his historical ambitions, Asellio was apparently read only by Cicero, by grammarians and scholars interested in Roman antiquities.

Coelius Antipater<sup>2</sup>

L. Coelius Antipater was the founder of the historical monograph at Rome. Nothing certain may be said about his origins. His cognomen Antipater does not prove that either Coelius or his father was a freedman, something that would be a novelty in Roman historiography. He wrote an account of the Second Punic War in seven books. The model for such treatment in monograph form was to be found in Hellenistic historiography, and this restriction to a smaller time period made deeper research into sources possible. They included Fabius Pictor, Cato, Silenus and perhaps also Polybius.<sup>3</sup> Coelius was concerned with objectivity (frg. 29) and anxious to use reliable sources (frg. 2).

In literary terms the historical monograph allowed the author to group his subject matter around a central theme and one protagonist, thus turning history into drama. In accordance with the individualistic trend of the period, Scipio took center stage, rivaling the Alexander of the Hellenistic historians and the Hannibal of Silenus.

<sup>1</sup> The identity of the Annales libri criticized is in dispute: C. SCHÄUBLIN, Sempronius Asellio frg. 2, WJA n.s. 9, 1983, 147–155 (un-literary chronicles) and D. Flach 1985, 83–84 (historians with a penchant for antiquarian detail).

<sup>2</sup> HRR 1, 158–177, not completely replaced by: W. HERRMANN, Die Historien des Coelius Antipater. Fragmente und Kommentar, Meisenheim 1979; LEO, LG 336–341; A. KLOTZ 1940–41; W. HOFFMANN, Livius und der zweite Punische Krieg, Berlin 1942; J. VOGT, Orbis, Freiburg 1960, 132; P. G. WALSH 1961, 110–137, esp. 124–132; E. CARAWAN, The Tragic History of Marcellus and Livy's Characterization, CJ 80, 1985, 131–141.

<sup>3</sup> Cic. div. 1. 49; Livy 27. 27. 13; Gell. 10. 24. 7.

Coelius was the first Roman historiographer to give priority to artistic aims (Cic. de orat. 2. 54–55; leg. 1. 6), and may be considered the first real writer among the Roman historians. Historical writing for him was a rhetorical task, seeking the kind of effect on the reader recommended by Isocrates. In his descriptions he made use of dramatic means (speeches, cf. fig. 47 P., dreams, etc.), not even abstaining from rhetorical exaggerations (fig. 39): Coelius ut abstinet numero, ita ad immensum multitudinis speciem auget: volucres ad terram delapsas clamore militum ait, atque tantam multitudinem conscendisse naves, ut nemo mortalium aut in Italia aut in Sicilia relinqui videretur, ‘as Coelius refrains from giving numbers he yet increases the impression of the crowd to the infinite: he says that the soldiers’ shouting made the birds fall to the earth, and that such a crowd boarded the ships that not a single person seemed to be left neither in Italy nor in Sicily’.

His style is ‘Asiatic’, displaying short, rhythmical cola, whose often bold word order is excused by the author in his preface (fig. 1 P.). In his effort to secure artistic periods, Coelius ventures to use hyperbata. Rare words act as ornaments (congenueclat, fig. 44 P.). In his narrative, as in epic, the historic present prevails. Along with the clausulae of formal prose are also found the verse endings of poetry (fig. 24 B.P.). In combination, they may point to would-be epic ambitions,<sup>1</sup> although this does not imply that this was the invariable style in vogue among historians of that time.

It is also unusual to find the author expressly discussing stylistic problems in an historical work (fig. 1 P.). Coelius was conscious of his legal and rhetorical training. It was no coincidence that the great orator L. Licinius Crassus was his pupil (Cic. Brut. 26. 102). It is consistent with his profound degree of artistic awareness that, upon the publication of his work after 121 B.C. (fig. 50), he may have dedicated it, not to Laelius, but to the prominent scholar L. Aelius Stilo (fig. 1. 24 B.) who was to teach Cicero and Varro.<sup>2</sup>

Coelius Antipater’s work resonated widely. In his De divinatione,

<sup>1</sup> Q. Ennius eumque studiose aemulatus L. Coelius (Fronto p. 56 V.D.H.); a somewhat different view in: LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 76.

<sup>2</sup> Stilo elucidated the Salian Hymn and worked on the comedies of Plautus.

Cicero referred to several dreams used by Coelius to adorn his narrative. Marcus Brutus and Varro made excerpts from him, and Livy used him in the third decade of his history. He was also a source for Plutarch, Virgil, Valerius Maximus, Pliny, Frontinus, and perhaps for Cassius Dio. At the time of the archaists (2nd century A.D.), he again came into fashion. Gellius quoted him, and the Emperor Hadrian esteemed him more highly than Sallust (Hist. Aug. Hadr. 16. 6). A certain Iulius Paulus wrote a linguistic commentary on his work.

Cn. Gellius<sup>1</sup>

Gnaeus Gellius was known as the author of Annales (2nd century B.C.). This work gave a leisurely treatment of Rome's beginnings. Book 33 had taken the story only as far as 216 B.C., meaning that the traditional number of 97 books is not entirely improbable (frg. 29 P.). The antiquarian learning of the author extended, for example, to the discoverers of the alphabet, of medicine, of weights and measures and to the founders of cities. The ample treatment afforded to details of the Roman past perhaps set a trend for the late annalists.<sup>2</sup> The account which was taken as far as the author's own time, was still used by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, although later replaced by Varro.

Memoirs<sup>3</sup>

The historians who now follow, belonging to the time of the Gracchi and to the Sullan period, bring us to the generation before Cicero. Here we encounter a rich literature of memoirs. Apart from C. Gracchus and Sulla himself, M. Aemilius Scaurus, P. Rutilius Rufus, and Q. Lutatius Catulus must be mentioned. The last two were also the authors of historical works. Only the reminiscences of C. Gracchus and Sulla are to some extent available to us through Plutarch. The rise of this kind of personal literary portrait met with fewer obstacles at Rome than in Greece, though Greece knew memoirs by King Pyrrhus and Aratus of Sicyon. Greek morals tended to be concerned with typical virtues and weaknesses, while in Rome the mask memorialized forever an ancestor with all his wrinkles and warts. Yet it was this ancestor who was seen at the funeral celebration wearing the garb of his highest office. Among the premises giving rise to literary self-portraiture must be counted the right enjoyed by distinguished families to a personal statue.<sup>1</sup> Thus it was that M. Claudius Marcellus dedicated, following his third consulate (152 B.C.), his own statue, beside those of his grandfather and father, in the temple of Honos and Virtus. Q. Fabius Maximus acted similarly later (57 B.C.) in the figurative decoration of his arch.

<sup>1</sup> HRR 1, 148–157; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 1, 77–80; W. D. LEBEK 1970, 215–217; PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst, 292–293; E. RAWSON 1976, 713–717.

<sup>2</sup> P. WISEMAN, Clio's Cosmetics, Leicester 1979, 20–23.

<sup>3</sup> G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie 1: Das Altertum (1907), Frankfurt 1949–1950, 3rd ed.

A half-literary stage on the way to autobiography is formed by the apologias composed in form of letters, for example by the Scipios, who in their case wrote in Greek. Scipio Africanus Maior wrote to King Philip, and P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica on his campaign against Perseus.<sup>2</sup> In his historical work Cato the Elder did not shrink from quoting his own speeches verbatim. Memoirs bear characteristic testimony to Roman self-assurance, and, in many respects, Sulla may be regarded as a prefiguration of Caesar. We will come back to this kind of literary reminiscence in the context of Caesar's Commentarii.

Later Works in the Annales Style

The annalists<sup>3</sup> of the Sullan period ('the later annalists') form Livy's principal source. All these writers deliberately resume the old tradition of continuous historical narrative to convey a picture of history centering on Rome. Their literary ambitions show from their use of highly organized narrative units.

For the first time now authors are found among historians who do not belong to the senatorial class, but write as clients on behalf of individual senators. Claudius Quadrigarius and Valerius Antias probably came from the Italian provincial aristocracy or from the equites.

<sup>1</sup> Homines novi have no right to their own statue.

<sup>2</sup> SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 1, 204.

<sup>3</sup> D. TIMPE 1979, 97-119.

Q. Claudius Quadrigarius

Q. Claudius Quadrigarius must be mentioned first.<sup>1</sup> His Annales embraced at least 23 books. It is not known whether he wrote ab urbe condita or, as is more probable, began his narrative with the Gallic invasion. From the Second Punic War on, the presentation was more detailed, reaching as far as the Sullan period. Quadrigarius' standpoint is that of the optimates. He praised Sulla (fig. 84) and criticized Marius (frgg. 76; 81; 83 P.). Quadrigarius relaxed the strict annalistic pattern by introducing letters, speeches, and anecdotes. At important breaks, his lengthy work was divided by new proems, as for example at the start of book 18.

Quadrigarius' style creates a refreshing impression of brevity and precision. In comparison with Livy, the absence of adornment is remarkable; in comparison with Sallust, his abstention from archaizing color.

From 187 B.C., his history formed Livy's chief source. Fronto and Gellius esteemed the artless grace of his style. Identifications with the translator of Acilius and the chronographer whose fragments are found at HRR 1.178 are arbitrary.

Valerius Antias<sup>2</sup>

The Annales of Valerius Antias in 75 books extended from the beginnings at least to the year 91 B.C., and perhaps as far as Sulla's death. Since he wrote ab urbe condita, he was obliged to fill in the gaps between legend and the commencement of the historical tradition. He neglected no opportunity to enhance the fame of his own gens, and attributed to Valerii offices which demonstrably were held by others. The wars with the Sabines, for which he is the sole authority, were intended to allow his house to rival the fame of the Fabii. Livy remarks that Valerius Antias was notorious for exaggerating the numbers of fallen enemies (fig. 29; cf. 44).

<sup>1</sup> HRR 1, 205-237; S. BASTIAN, Lexicon in Q. Claudium Quadrigarium, Hildesheim 1983; M. ZIMMERER, Der Annalist Q. Claudius Quadrigarius, diss. München 1937; A. KLOTZ, Der Annalist Q. Claudius Quadrigarius, RhM n.s. 91, 1942, 268-285; P. G. WALSH 1961, 110-137, esp. 119-121; VON ALBRECHT, Prose 86-101; W. SCHIBEL, Sprachbehandlung und Darstellungsweise in römischer Prosa. Claudius Quadrigarius, Livius, Aulus Gellius, Amsterdam 1971.

<sup>2</sup> HRR 1, 238-275; R. ADAM, Valerius Antias et la fin de Scipion l'Africain, REL 58, 1980, 90-99; U. BREDEHORN 1968, 91-100; A. KLOTZ 1940/41; R. A. LAROCHE, Valerius Antias as Livy's Source for the Number of Military Standards Captured in Battle in Books I-X, C&M 35, 1984, 93-104; T. LEIDIG, Valerius Antias und ein annalistischer Bearbeiter des Polybios als Quellen des Livius, vornehmlich für Buch 30 und 31, Frankfurt 1993; P. G. WALSH 1961, esp. 121-122.

The narrative of every year followed a fixed pattern, although sometimes he also drew together the events of several years. Like the Hellenistic historians, Valerius was concerned to impress his readers. Flights of fancy were balanced by rationalistic explanations and occasional official reports, which need not necessarily always have been invented.<sup>1</sup> The language of officialdom which he uses, though to some degree rebarbative and artificial, keeps its distance both from vulgar elements and from exaggerated rhetorical ornament.<sup>2</sup>

Valerius Antias is Livy's second chief source, used occasionally already in the first decade, and continuously from the Battle of Cannae up to book 38. Silius Italicus and Plutarch (in his Lives of Marcellus and Flamininus) may also belong to his credulous audience.

Cornelius Sisenna

Cornelius Sisenna<sup>3</sup> was praetor in 78 B.C. In 70 he acted for the defense at the trial of Verres. He died in 67 on Crete as Pompey's legate. His Historiae, a work of his old age in at least 12 books,<sup>4</sup> continued the contemporary history of Sempronius Asellio. The Social War and the struggles between Marius and Sulla were treated at length.

Sisenna was probably also the translator of the Milesian Tales of Aristides.<sup>5</sup> His historical model was Clitarchus, who had composed an Alexander romance (Cic. leg. 1. 7). This explains his pronounced liking for the devices of Hellenistic historical writing, such as dramatic

<sup>1</sup> The confidence of U. BREDEHORN is matched by the skepticism of J. VON UNGERN-STERNBERG. M. GELZER, Kleine Schriften 3, 1964, 257, suggests the gradual formation of a network of mutually dependent senatorial decisions to create an air of false precision.

<sup>2</sup> LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 82.

<sup>3</sup> HRR 1, 276-297; G. BARABINO (TC), I frammenti delle Historiae, in: F. BERTINI, G. BARABINO, eds., Studi Noniani I, Genova 1967, 67-239; E. BADIAN, Waiting for Sulla, JRS 52, 1962, 47-61; idem, Where was Sisenna?, Athenaeum n.s. 42, 1964, 422-431; E. CANDILORO, Sulle Historiae di L. Cornelius Sisenna, SCO 12, 1963, 212-226; W. D. LEBEK 1970, 58-59; 267-285; P. FRASSINETTI, Sisenna e la guerra sociale, Athenaeum 50, 1972, 78-113; G. CALBOLI, Su alcuni frammenti di Cornelio Sisenna, StudUrb 49, 1, 1975, 151-221; E. RAWSON 1979; S. CONDORELLI, Sul fig. 44 P. di Sisenna, NAFM 1, 1983, 109-137.

<sup>4</sup> Nonius (p. 750. 10 Lindsay) cites a 23rd book.

<sup>5</sup> A different view in E. RAWSON 1979, 331-333 (arguing that Ovid, trist. 2. 443-

narrative, dreams, digressions, and speeches. He was concerned with the careful arrangement of his material (fig. 127 P.) and was by no means a mere annalist. His style as a historian combined fashionable Asian refinement with archaizing features. Sometimes he appeared as a purist, and then as a coiner of neologisms. In general, he displayed an abundance of pre-classical richness. His adverbs in -im were famous (Gell. 12. 15). His composition of commentaries on Plautus matched his literary taste. This somewhat hybrid but fruitful soil formed a fertile seedbed for Sallust's artistic language.

Sisenna had Epicurean inclinations and rationalized, for example, the death of Aeneas (fig. 3 P.). If conclusions may be drawn from the title Historiae, Sisenna's aim was to trace motives in the manner of Sempronius Asellio. In that case, he must have been the first to combine with some degree of success the pragmatic and the tragic manner of historical writing.<sup>1</sup>

Sallust, whose Historiae continued the work of Sisenna, admired him as a historian, though rejecting his bias in favor of the optimates (Jug. 95. 2). He also exercised influence on Livy. Velleius (2. 9. 5) and Tacitus (dial. 23. 2) made mention of him, while the archaizers appealed to his authority. Nonius still possessed a copy containing books 3 and 4. In Sisenna, we are presented with a preclassical master of language. His original and colorful prose is an irreplaceable loss for Latin literature.

C. Licinius Macer

The series of Republican historians preserved in fragments finishes with C. Licinius Macer<sup>2</sup> and Q. Aelius Tubero. These also count among Livy's important models. The former was the father of the Neoteric and Atticizing C. Licinius Macer Calvus, and was acquainted with Sisenna. Coming from a distinguished plebeian family, he was tribunus plebis in 73 B.C. and struggled against the Sullan constitution 444 mentions the translator of the Milesiae among much younger authors. But is Ovid here concerned with chronology?).

---

<sup>1</sup> E. RAWSON 1979, 345.

<sup>2</sup> HRR 1, 298-307; F. MÜNZER, RE 13, 1, 1926, 419-435; A. KLOTZ 1940-1941, 208-210; 222-272; BARDON, Litt. lat. inc. 1, 258-260; BROUGHTON, Magistrates 2, 138; 146; 443; 580; R. M. OGILVIE, Livy, Licinius Macer and the Libri lintei, JRS 48, 1958, 40-46; P. G. WALSH 1961, 110-137, esp. 122-123; R. M. OGILVIE, Commentary on Livy 1-5, Oxford 1965, 7-12.

for the restoration of tribunician power (Sall. hist. 3. 48). In 68 B.C. he was praetor. Two years later he was tried for embezzlement and committed suicide.

His Annales began with the foundation of Rome and comprised at least 16 books. He made use of the Libri lintei, a list of Roman magistrates written on linen,<sup>1</sup> in an effort to reach more reliable information about the magistrates of the 5th and 4th centuries. He favored the gens Licinia and displayed a bias in favor of the populares. Cicero criticized the prolixity of his narrative and his insufficient attention to Greek sources (leg. 1. 7). An interest in scholarly detail links this historian with Cn. Gellius (whom he quotes). His diction showed Asian influence. Tubero, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and, in his first decade, Livy made use of his work.

Aelius Tubero

Aelius Tubero<sup>2</sup> treated all Roman history in at least 14 books. His models were Valerius Antias and Licinius Macer. He was a source for Livy and Dionysius of Halicarnassus. This author is probably not Quintus Aelius Tubero, the well-known jurist and unsuccessful prosecutor of Ligarius, but Quintus' father, Lucius Aelius Tubero, one of Cicero's friends.<sup>3</sup> He had philosophical interests. Varro dedicated to him a logistoricus (Tubero de origine humana), and Aenesidemus his Πυρρώνειοι λόγοι.

A. ALFÖLDI, Das frühe Rom und die Latiner, Darmstadt 1977. * E. BADIAN, The Early Historians, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Historians, London 1966, 1–38. * F. BÖMER, Thematik und Krise der römischen Geschichtsschreibung im 2. Jh. v. Chr., Historia 2, 1953/54, 189–209. * U. BREDEHORN, Senatsakten in der republikanischen Annalistik. Untersuchungen zur Berichterstattung über den römischen Senat bei den annalistischen Vorgängern des Livius unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der römischen Ostpolitik zwischen 205 und 171 v. Chr., diss. Marburg 1968 (crit. J. v. UNGERN-STERNBERG, Gnomon 43, 1971, 369–374). * K. BRINGMANN, Weltherrschaft und innere Krise Roms

<sup>1</sup> B. W. FRIER, Licinius Macer and the consules suffecti of 444 B.C., TAPhA 105, 1975, 79–97.

<sup>2</sup> HRR 1, 308–312; A. KLOTZ 1940/41, 208–210; 220–272; P. G. WALSH 1961, 110–137, esp. 123; M. GELZER, Kleine Schriften, vol. 3, 1964, 278–279; A. M. BIRASCHI, Q. ELIO Tubero in Strabone 5. 3. 3, Athenaeum 59, 1981, 195–199.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. M. BRETONE, Quale Tubero?, Jura 27, 1976, 72–74; for Quintus Aelius Tubero as a historian s. H. PETER 1911, 327.

im Spiegel der Geschichtsschreibung des 2. und 1. Jh. v. Chr., A&A 23, 1977, 28–49. * R. DREWS, Pontiffs, Prodigies, and the Disappearance of the Annales Maximi, CPh 83, 1988, 289–299. * D. FLACH, Einführung in die römische Geschichtsschreibung, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1992. * M. GELZER, Der Anfang römischer Geschichtsschreibung, Hermes 69, 1934, 46–55 (= M.G., Kleine Schriften, vol. 3, 1964, 93–103); also in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., Römische Geschichtsschreibung, Darmstadt 1969, 130–153. * M. GELZER, Nochmals über den Anfang der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, Hermes 82, 1954, 342–348 (= Kleine Schriften, vol. 3, Wiesbaden 1964, 104–110). * M. GELZER, Römische Politik bei Fabius Pictor, Kleine Schriften, vol. 3, 1964, 51–92. * F. KLINGNER, Römische Geschichtsschreibung, in: Klingner, Geisteswelt 66–89. * A. KLOTZ, Livius und seine Vorgänger, Leipzig 1940/41 (on this: LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 67–88; 400–407; M. GELZER, in: Kleine Schriften, vol. 3, 1964, 278–279). * U. KNOCH, Roms älteste Geschichtsschreiber, NJAB 2, 1939, 193–207; repr. in: U.K., Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften, ed. by W.-W. EHLERS, Meisenheim 1986, 1–15; also in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., Römische Geschichtsschreibung, Darmstadt 1969, 222–240. * T. KÖVESZULAUF, Die Eroberung von Gabii und die literarische Moral der römischen Annalistik, WJA n.s. 13, 1987, 121–147. * W. D. LEBEK, Verba prisca. Die Anfänge des Archaisierens in der lateinischen Beredsamkeit und Geschichtsschreibung, Göttingen 1970. * T. LEIDIG, Valerius Antias und ein annalistischer Bearbeiter des Polybios als Quellen des Livius, vornehmlich für Buch 30 und 31, Frankfurt 1993. * G. PERL, s. Roman Historical Writing. * PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst 273–338. * K.-E. PETZOLD, Die Eröffnung des Zweiten Römisch-Makedonischen Krieges. Untersuchungen zur spätannalistischen Topik bei Livius, Berlin 1940, repr. 1968. * E. RAWSON, The First Latin Annalists, Latomus 35, 1976, 689–717. * E. RAWSON, L. Cornelius Sisenna and the Early First Century B.C., CQ 73, n.s. 29, 1979, 327–346. * D. TIMPE, Erwägungen zur jüngeren Annalistik, A&A 25, 1979, 97–119. * H. TRÄNKLE, Livius und Polybios, s. Livy. * B. L. TWYMAN, Polybius and the Annalists on the Outbreak and Early Years of the Second Punic War, Athenaeum n.s. 65, 1987, 67–80. * P. G. WALSH, Livy. His Historical Aims and Methods, Cambridge 1961. * T. P. WISEMAN, The Credibility of the Roman Annalists, LCM 8, 1983, 20–22. * N. ZEGERS, Wesen und Ursprung der tragischen Geschichtsschreibung, diss. Köln 1959.

CATO THE ELDER

Life, Dates

M. Porcius Cato is the first Roman of whose life we can form anything like a clear picture. He was born in 234 B.C. in Tusculum, where he grew up on his father's estate in Sabine territory, later remembering with pride the hard work which he was obliged to perform there (or. frg. 128 Malcovati). Not far from his house lay the spot where once Manius Curius Dentatus, the very embodiment of old Roman frugality, had spent his final years. At 17, Cato served for the first time in the war against Hannibal. Astonishingly early (214 B.C.), he was military tribune in Sicily under M. Claudius Marcellus, and distinguished himself in 207 in the Battle of the Metaurus. His alleged encounter with Pythagorean doctrines in South Italy (Cic. Cato 39) is open to chronological objections, although neo-Pythagorean influences may certainly be detected in his work.<sup>1</sup> His political sympathies with Fabius Cunctator are beyond doubt,<sup>2</sup> even if the details of his contacts with him are not wholly clear. The stalwart farmer and legal adviser of Sabine citizens was encouraged by his well-connected neighbor, L. Valerius Flaccus, one of Fabius' supporters, to take up a political career, a new departure for Cato's family. On the recommendation of that same patron, in 204 B.C., as quaestor, he followed Scipio, then proconsul, to Sicily and Africa, and there created for him his first difficulties, although initially without success. On his return journey, he brought the poet Q. Ennius with him from Sardinia to Rome, and from him he may have taken lessons in Greek. The next stages in his career led him to the plebeian aedileship (199 B.C.) and the praetorship (198 B.C.). In this capacity, he was in Sardinia, where he intervened against Roman usurers, and lived an ostentatiously simple life. At the age of 39 (195 B.C.), in company with his noble friend Valerius Flaccus, he became consul. The story that he delivered a fiery speech against the abolition of the lex Oppia, which limited ladies' luxurious fashions, is so good an invention that one would wish it were true. It certainly fits with Cato's general attitude towards women.<sup>1</sup> However, he could not hold in check the inevitable.

---

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, LG 26.

<sup>2</sup> E. A. ASTIN, Scipio Aemilianus and Cato Censorius, Latomus 15, 1956, 159-180.

Spain was his consular province. Later he boasted of having conquered more cities than he spent days there (Plut. Cato 10. 3), although his mass executions and enslavement of entire communities must not be ignored. He enriched the public treasury with the profits of the Spanish iron and silver mines. Subsequently, the senate gave approval to all his measures and granted him a triumph. Whereas Cato himself carried personal frugality even to extremes—not without a certain self-advertisement—he showed some generosity in rewarding his soldiers. Slaves however who had been convicted of having enriched themselves preferred to avoid his wrath by suicide. In 193 B.C., he dedicated to Victoria Virgo on the Palatine the shrine he had vowed while still in Spain.

His last campaign was the war against Antiochus III (191 B.C.). As military tribune, he accompanied the consul Manius Acilius Glabrio to Greece, where he was supposed to employ his oratorical gifts to counteract propaganda hostile to Rome. Of his speech in Athens he later related that, to the amazement of the Athenians, his Greek translator needed many more words than he did himself (Plut. Cato 12. 5–7), and that, in general, 'Greeks' words came from their lips, Romans' from the heart.' At the Battle of Thermopylae he boasted of having brought about the decisive turn by surrounding the enemy, whereupon the consul declared that neither he nor the whole Roman people could sufficiently thank Cato for his services (Plut. Cato 14. 2). In all probability his action demonstrated the practical application of his reading of the historians. It is possible to recognize here what Cato meant in advising his son to peruse the writings of the Greeks but not to study them too thoroughly. Two years later, he was at odds with the victorious Glabrio.

In 190 B.C., Cato accused Q. Minucius Thermus of executing ten free men in his province of Liguria without following official procedures. Soon afterwards (189 B.C.), he was the envoy who brought senatorial instructions to M. Fulvius Nobilior when he was consul in Epirus; after his return, he criticized Fulvius' behavior in his province, without however being able to prevent his triumph. It may well be Cato's doing that even the great Scipio Africanus Maior and his brother Lucius were convicted of embezzling public property. The intervention of the senate against the Bacchanalia (186 B.C.) formed the background to his speech De coniuratione, of which unfortunately only a single word has been preserved. It has been assumed to be the model of Fronto's speech against the Christians, answered by Minucius Felix. This is certainly an ingenious although somewhat complicated explanation of the parallels between the Christian apologist and Livy's account of the Bacchanalia.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. R. P. BOND, Anti-Feminism in Juvenal and Cato, in: Stud. Lat. lit. I, Coll. Latomus 214, 1979/80, 418–447.

Cato reached the pinnacle of his career in 184 B.C. Along with L. Valerius Flaccus he became censor, defeating seven other candidates from the most distinguished families, who included P. Scipio Nasica, in the eyes of contemporaries the noblest man of his time. Cato was so strict in carrying out the severe measures he had announced that for all time he became the very personification of a Censor. He defended his reprimands on each occasion in speeches of which we still have partial knowledge. He expelled L. Quinctius Flamininus, the consul of 192 B.C., from the senate, on the grounds that in his province of Gaul, to please a boy, he had with his own hand killed a noble Boian deserter (or. fig. 87, 1st ed. Malc. = 69, 4th ed. Malc.). Had he forgotten that in his own day he had executed, not one, but 600 deserters? Another senator was excluded on the grounds that he had kissed his wife with his daughter looking on. Others were censured for neglect of agriculture. The taxes on slaves in luxurious employments, on clothes, ornaments, and carriages were raised tenfold. This was a regulation leveled especially against Roman ladies. In spite of vigorous attacks by the senate, Cato pushed through the building of a new basilica next to the curia.

He made strict use of construction overseers to limit the exploitation of public land and water by private individuals. It is not surprising in view of all this that the enraged nobles pursued Cato to the end of his life with lawsuits. Yet, of the 44 suits he faced, none led to his conviction. After the victory of L. Aemilius Paullus over Perseus, Cato urged that Macedonia should be given its freedom, asserting that Roman troops could not protect it. About the same time, in a relatively well-preserved speech, he argued against a declaration of war on Rhodes. His plea for clemency and his use of the reproach of superbia against the Romans may be read as early evidence of a humane policy,<sup>1</sup> but also as the utterance of someone who knew how to turn every occasion to advantage. His savage humor least spares his own countrymen. How little Cato was afraid of contradictions, so long as arguments were tactically useful at the moment, is shown by the single fact that the later champion of Carthage's destruction here took the opposite position.

<sup>1</sup> H. HAFETER, Politisches Denken im alten Rom, SIFC n.s. 17, 1940, 97-121.

Cato was on friendly terms with L. Aemilius Paullus.<sup>1</sup> Marcus, his son, married Paullus' daughter, and accordingly became the brother-in-law of the Younger Scipio. His enmity with the Scipios was limited therefore to the older generation. It was after all Cato's patron Valerius Flaccus who had been a supporter of Fabius Cunctator, Africanus' real opponent. Strong personality though he was himself, behind the Hellenistic and Roman humanitas of the Scipios, Cato sensed the dangers of individualism.

On the occasion of the famous philosophers' embassy in 155 B.C., he reproved the magistrates for allowing such dangerous individuals to stay so long in Rome, and proposed that they should be sent back to Greece at the earliest opportunity. In fact, Carneades was undermining the very basis of Cato's ethical position; he disputed the existence of natural law, and the applicability of the concept of ideal justice in real life, with reference, among other reasons, to Roman mastery of the world.

In his last years, Cato repeatedly urged the necessity for a war à l'outrance against Carthage. In 150 B.C., he carried the day against Scipio Nasica,<sup>2</sup> whose aim had been to preserve Carthage as the 'whetstone' of Roman virtus. Did Cato doubt the might of his own people, which it had been his constant goal to spare? Or was his hostility inspired rather by fear of Carthaginian economic power?

Shortly before his death, he supported the proposal by one of the tribunes to bring to trial Servius Sulpicius Galba, who, while in his province, had sold into slavery a large number of Lusitanians. Galba successfully appealed to popular sympathy. In indignation, Cato preserved this action and his own speech in his Origines. Soon afterwards, death took the stylus from his hand.

The son of Cato's first marriage was Marcus, to whom he addressed several educational treatises. Through his second son, presented to him in advanced old age by the young wife he had later married, the Censor became the great-grandfather of his namesake, the champion of the Republican cause.

<sup>1</sup> E. A. ASTIN, Scipio Aemilianus and Cato Censorius, Latomus 15, 1956, 159-180.

<sup>2</sup> M. GELZER, Nasicas Widerspruch gegen die Zerstörung Karthagos, in: Kleine Schriften, vol. 2, Wiesbaden 1963, 39-72.

Survey of Works

Cato was perhaps the first Roman to draw up his Speeches.<sup>1</sup> Initially he did so in order to re-use them at need as models of content or form. In view of the numerous lawsuits in which he was involved, this made great sense. He published at least those found in the Origines. The emphasis allotted in these speeches to self-portraiture encourages the modern reader to form an unflattering opinion of Cato's boundless vanity, but it may be explained at least partly by the political and social situation of the homo novus. Whereas an aristocrat with a name like Fabius or Claudius, on the mere basis of his name, appeared to have a claim on the highest offices in the state, and also enjoyed the necessary family connections to attain his goal, Cato, as homo novus, had no other title of nobility except his achievement, and it was on this, if he wanted to prevail, that he had to insist continually. In any case, Cato shows more than mere unabashed selfpraise. He also displays quite humorous forms of indirect self-characterization. In his speech De sumptu suo (or. 41, 1st ed. Malc. = 44, 4th ed. Malc.), he defended himself against the accusation that he had exploited the public and spared his own property. He sketches in lively terms how in preparing his present speech he had brought forward a copy of one made earlier and at first read all references to his own blameless behavior, but then deleted them, since they ran contrary to the current fashion.<sup>2</sup> As our informant Fronto remarks correctly, this is perhaps the most compelling example of a praeteritio.

His Educational treatises addressed to his son Marcus also stand in close relationship to his life. As a father, he was unwilling to entrust his son's education to Greek slaves. In his own hand he wrote a Roman history in large letters, which of course was not the Origines and not even an extract from them, since at this time they were as yet unwritten.

His Art of Healing and Art of Oratory on closer acquaintance would perhaps produce the same impression as his De agricultura: a preface emphatically

<sup>1</sup> Cicero collected 150 of them and we still know of about 80; H. MALCOVATI, Introduction to ORF; B. JANZER, Historische Untersuchungen zu den Redenfragmenten des M. Porcius Cato, diss. Würzburg 1936; N. SCIVOLETTO, L'Oratio contra Galbam e le Origines di Catone, GIF 14, 1961, 63-68.

<sup>2</sup> 'I have never made presents of my own or our allies' money in order to win supporters.' 'Stop! I cried at this point. Not that! Not that by any means! They don't want to hear it.' Then he read: 'I have never sent governors to the cities of your allies to rob them of their property and take their children.' 'Cancel that too. They don't want to hear it,' and so on.

insisting on old Roman values is followed by an introduction to modern Hellenistic technique. This puts in its place his warning about Greek doctors, who allegedly were bound by their oath to destroy all non-Greeks (Ad Marcum filium, fig. 1 = Plin. nat. 29. 7. 14–15).

In all probability his Carmen de moribus was, in spite of its title, written in prose. Its strength lay in its lapidary maxims.

His Work on the military, if it had been completely faithful to old Roman ways, could not have been held in esteem down to late antiquity. In its day it must have been extremely modern, something still demonstrable in the case of the De agricultura.

The De agricultura by and large depends on the Greek model of textbook: the estate and its parts (1–22); the farmer's year (23–54). The third part however (55–162) breaks free from this scheme. There follow in somewhat disorganized fashion: practical suggestions; culinary and medical recipes; prayers; hints at old customs.

From a literary point of view, the text is not uniform. Basically, two efforts have been made to solve the difficult problem of its structure. One suggests that the work was put together at a late date, although this leaves unresolved the question why the editor, contrary to the normal attitude of editors, failed to introduce a greater degree of coherence. A second suggestion is that we are concerned with Cato's own journal, growing in the course of the years, and left by the author in the state in which we have it.<sup>1</sup>

The introduction<sup>2</sup> discusses the moral value of farming, including that for the future soldier, and the advantages of the farmer (estate owner) compared with the banker and merchant. In spite of this, however, the sense of profit sets the basic tone, sometimes in the shape of old Roman thrift ('do not buy what you can use, but what you need'), on other occasions in the introduction and recommendation of modern, Hellenistic slave economics, in which old slaves, like old machines, must be disposed of in good time. In this respect, Cato is one of the fathers of Roman 'capitalism'.<sup>3</sup>

Every Roman had teaching in his bones. Cato moreover was a teacher by nature, for it is to him that Cicero (rep. 2. 1) ascribes summum vel discendi studium vel docendi ('highest zeal for either learning or teaching'). In the personal instruction of the son by his father, more is in evidence than that old-fashioned paternalism presented by Terence in the character of Demea in the Adelphoe. The Roman pater familias was convinced that he alone knew best how to handle everything. Cato's effort not to delegate the education of his children in the fashion of decadent aristocrats attests a sound instinct, and not necessarily anything plebeian. Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, was to behave in exactly the same way.

<sup>1</sup> The authenticity and organic unity of the work are defended by O. SCHÖNBERGER, ed., M. Porci Catonis scripta quae manserunt omnia. M. Porcius Cato, Vom Landbau. Fragmente. Alle erhaltenen Schriften, München 1980, 425–465. Traces of several editors are detected by W. RICHTER 1978.

<sup>2</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 1–8.

<sup>3</sup> F. M. HEICHELHEIM, Wirtschaftsgeschichte des Altertums 1, Leiden 1938, 502–503; D. KIENAST 1954, repr. 1979, passim.

Cato lived at a time when the individual could still hope to attain universality. In the field of literature and knowledge at Rome, he was in the happy position of a pioneer. His writings show that he took pleasure even in advanced age in increasing his store of knowledge. This is proved not only by his encyclopedic activity as author, but also by the learned details of his Origines.

Cato wrote this historical chef d'oeuvre<sup>1</sup> in his old age. Individual touches, such as the suppression of magistrates' names and the inclusion of his own speeches, prove that this product of his retirement was a continuation of politics by other means. History serves for instruction, not least about the achievements of the author. It puts moral examples before the reader's eyes, as with the military tribune deserving to be called a Roman Leonidas. In any case, the name Leonidas, on the lips of the one who had triumphed at Thermopylae, Cato, had a quite particular ring.

The 1st book treated Rome's development to the end of the regal period. The 2nd and 3rd dealt with the early history of the other Italian cities and peoples. The title Origines corresponds to the Greek κτίσεις, 'Foundation Narratives'. Certain elements of the generic form are Greek: local history, remarkable features of particular areas, etymologies (Quirinus from κύριος). Even in content, Cato stands in the Hellenistic tradition. Many Italian peoples are traced back to Greek ancestors.

The title is appropriate only to the first three books. The remaining four deal with contemporary history, and begin with a new proem. The 4th book narrates the First Punic War. Those that follow take the story down to 149 B.C. Nothing is reported of a treatment of the early Republican period, and to set it at the start of the 4th book means to overload that volume, in which even the beginning of the Second Punic War had to find a place.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The authorship of books in itself is already something 'Greek'. Without doubt, Cato read more Greek books than most of his Roman contemporaries, and the content, title, structure, and constituent elements of the Origines are unimaginable without Greek models.<sup>1</sup> Callias of Syracuse, Lycus of Regium, and Polemon of Ilion are for us hardly more than names. Yet Timaeus of Tauromenium may have supplied Cato with more than simple information about the foundings of Italian cities. His moralizing standpoint may have attracted his Roman reader, for Timaeus had criticized the decadence of the Sybarites, Crotoniates, Etruscans, and Agrigentines, praising by contrast strict moral standards. The dating of the foundation of Rome in Cato, however, does not agree with Timaeus but with Eratosthenes. Ever since antiquity Cato's readers praised his diligence. His information, partly based on documents and inscriptions, is from time to time confirmed by excavations.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> PETER, Wahrheit und Kunst, 282–287; F. BÖMER, Thematik und Krise der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, Historia 2, 1953–54, 189–209, esp. 193–198.

In his instructional treatises, Cato adopts the basic forms of the Greek textbook. In assessing his work, one must always take into account the practical application of Greek technique. Cato is a genius at learning, especially in areas promising efficiency. In agronomy he takes over and recommends the most modern Hellenistic methods, and it may be supposed that he behaved similarly in other areas. If he owes something to Greek theory, he owes even more to Greek practice.

Literary Technique

The author of the Origines was not writing historical poetry like Naevius, but prose. However, he was not concerned with mere chronological records, at least not in the contemporary portions. There were prefaces. The narrative proceeded capitulatim, i.e. 'according to the main points'<sup>3</sup> (κεφαλαιωδῶς), and in it were interpolated digressions dealing with cultural developments.

The longer fragments allow us to glimpse a narrative technique combining with some success both the story of events and personal commentary.<sup>4</sup> The literary achievement however, because of the fragmentary nature of what survives, is mainly recognizable through the prism of style. This must be our next consideration.

<sup>1</sup> L. MORETTI, Le Origines di Catone, Timeo ed Eratostene, RFIC 30, 1952, 289–302.

<sup>2</sup> P. TOZZI, Catone frg. 39 Peter e Polibio 2. 15, RIL 107, 1973, 499–501.

<sup>3</sup> For this interpretation of the word, s. LEO (LG 294–295) and BÖMER (see above, p. 396, n. 1) 194.

<sup>4</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 21–32.

Language and Style

Language and Style<sup>1</sup> in this author deserve particular attention. The search for a refined stylistic theory is out of place here, as is recognized by Cicero (leg. 1. 6; de orat. 2. 51–53). Even so, the vocabulary and style are skilfully varied to match individual motive and aim.

The different levels of style are distributed throughout each work, not capriciously, but according to the topic in hand. In language and style the preface to the De agricultura differs from the remaining text. In the introduction to the Origines we find striking archaisms, such as the plural ques. Elements of the solemn Latin oral tradition appear in prominent places: archaic repetitions, the accumulation of synonyms, along with formulas of sacral, legal, and official language. Such features of hieratic language are to be distinguished from those of everyday conversation.

Cato's dicta often have a popular character, especially owed to their colorful metaphors. The exaggerated tone in accounts of foreign lands strikes a rustic note: for example, in Spain a whole mountain is made of salt, and what is removed grows back; the wind blows the strongest man over; the sows are so fat as to be unable to stand, and need to be loaded onto wagons.

Cato employs Greek words where necessary; this is true, for example, of technical terms from horticulture and cookery, but his aim is far from wanting to show off his Greek education. Allusions to Greek literature (Xenophon and Demosthenes) are rare. Poetic vocabulary is drawn from Ennius.

In Cato, Latin prose style was still in the process of creation. But there is more than brevitas, and often the luxuriant rhetorical richness found in him is ignored. A typical feature of Cato's style is the sequence of sentences showing a length which contradicts the normal expectations of the listener. The author likes to follow a long colon with a short, thus creating the impression of intensity through abruptness. Cato's prose is not unrhythmical. Already it displays the rhythms found in Cicero.<sup>2</sup> Quite differently from unrhythmical prose, it prefers rhythms making effective conclusions, and admitting repetition.<sup>1</sup> This shows that the Latin language was predisposed to particular rhythms later destined to become standard, and that Cato, whether consciously or unconsciously, had once more hit the nail on the head.

---

<sup>1</sup> LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio, 68–70; VON ALBRECHT, Prose, 1–32; R. TILL, La lingua di Catone. Traduzione e note supplementari di C. DE MEo, Roma 1968; S. BOSCHERINI, Grecismi nel libro di Catone De agr., A&R 4, 1959, 145–156.

<sup>2</sup> E. FRAENKEL, Leseproben aus Reden Ciceros und Catos, Roma 1968.

The less literary character of the De agricultura may be proved by detailed statistical analysis. Shorter words are found, along with clausula endings unusual in Sallust and Livy. In all Cato's works, the length of sentences is more or less constant, but words are shorter in the De agricultura. Sentence endings in Cato's literary fragments show similarities with those of Sallust's Catilina.<sup>2</sup> Such external criteria are in the last analysis tokens of both differences and similarities in style.

Cato is able to play on many instruments. The assertion that he is a master of the whole gamut of rhetoric is true in the sense in which the same could be said of Homer. The categories of Greek rhetoric themselves warn us not to overestimate the significance of external influences: doctrina there is only a single component, along with ingenium and usus.<sup>3</sup> As a speaker and expert in human feeling, Cato possessed an original gift. By means of oral training he came to take his place in a fixed Roman tradition of oratory. In these circumstances the Greek theory with which he undoubtedly came into contact could only have the role of anamnesis in bringing to the speaker's attention what he already knew suo Marte. He was never enslaved by purely formal considerations.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Xenophon's remark,<sup>4</sup> that the leisure of men of importance must be just as accountable as their time at work, establishes at the very beginning of the Origines a bridge between literature and life, and offers a justification for a Roman's literary activity. For Cato, who was

<sup>1</sup> A. PRIMMER, Der Prosarhythmus in Catos Reden, in: FS K. VRETSKA, Heidelberg 1970, 174–180. A surmise on the beginning of the Origines is offered by L. CARDINALI, Le Origines di Catone iniziavano con un esametro?, SCO 37, 1987, 205–215.

<sup>2</sup> F. V. S. WAITE, A Computer-Assisted Study of the Style of Cato the Elder with Reference to Sallust and Livy (Résumé of a diss.), HSPh 74, 1970, 438–439.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. also A. TRAGLIA 1985, 344–359.

<sup>4</sup> K. MÜNSCHER, Xenophon in der griechisch-römischen Literatur, Philologus suppl. 13, fasc. 2, Leipzig 1920, esp. 70–74.

both pater familias and Roman senator, writing mainly served two purposes: the communication of knowledge and the teaching of morals.

Cato took up certain encyclopedic tendencies known to the Hellenistic world and set them at the service of life. His literary and didactic aim, expressed in his works, was to found an independent Roman culture, able to rival that of the Greeks. Its founder was someone who owed his power, not to birth, but to his knowledge, a great student and, for that very reason, one able to teach others. In this respect, his true successor was to be Cicero.

In the Origines Cato's purpose, like that of Calpurnius Piso later, was to impart moral instruction to his reader. It was not his intention to establish a new theory of historiography. Even so, he set his mark on Roman historical writing. It would always remain 'moralizing'. The aims Cato did have in mind were practical. His ethical purpose is not merely visible in his story of the tribune (his glorification of an anonymous hero). It is also at work in the very latest section, where Cato takes up the story of his last lawsuit to draw a contrast between two opposed sets of behavior. Galba gained his verdict of acquittal by a massive appeal to the sympathy of the people, while for his part Cato energetically objects to such touching scenes in court. The Censor lost to an improper ploy.

Rem tene, verba sequentur ('stick to the matter, the words will follow'). Language appropriate to the occasion and strong personal commitment lent to Cato's writing, in spite of its unevenness, a uniform stamp. The beginning of Latin prose already marked out the course of its future development. Even Cato's interpretation of the orator as vir bonus dicendi peritus ('a good man skilled in speech') would, at least in theory, become canonical.

Ideas II

In replacing previous Roman histories composed in Greek with a work written in Latin, Cato did more than tamper with externals. Rome had a new sense of self-importance. No longer was it content to adapt its language to its ambience. No longer was the aim of writing to convince foreigners. Cato met a demand of the occasion. But not every occasion finds a man big enough to rise to it.

In the title Origines, the most significant feature is the plural. Just as Cato refrained from putting an individual city—even if it be Rome—at the center, so he also rejected every kind of individualism.

He suppressed the names of public officials. Other historians had been compelled to do this, when in early Roman history, the assignment of consuls to different theatres of war was unknown. But, in Cato's version of contemporary history, it was not so much a lack of information that was at work as his purpose of honoring, instead of particular clans, his people as a whole. It was his belief that, while Greek constitutions may have been the product of individual authors, that of Rome was the work of a community. But this interpretation did not prevent him from allowing the Origines, in its later books, to appear more and more as a picture of himself. In this novel definition of a self-confidence based on achievement alone, there is a great affinity between the Censor and his poetic contemporary, Ennius. Yet the Origines are more than a volume of memoirs or the spiritual armory of a man grown old. They are, as the introduction hints, his account of himself to contemporaries and posterity. They are a highly original work and in the last analysis defy all attempts at categorization.

The proem to the 4th book distances itself from the perspective of annales, although this does not justify us in turning Cato into a 'pragmatic' historian in the manner of Polybius. Certainly Cato never bored his readers with information about price increases, or eclipses of the sun and moon. But he also looked beyond boundaries. The 4th book of the Origines contained inter alia an account of the origin of Carthage and a sketch of the city's mixed constitution already sympathetically described by Aristotle.<sup>1</sup> In the later books he assigned some space to the geography of Spain. Neither a narrow Roman jingo nor a blinkered imperialist, Cato sought to extend his interest in aetiology to the whole Mediterranean world.

Transmission

The transmission of the De agricultura rests on the Marcianus Florentinus (F), also once containing works of Varro, Columella, and Gargilius Martialis. The codex itself is lost, but its readings were collected by Politian and entered in 1482 in a copy of the editio princeps of 1472 by G. Merula, whose present location is in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. We must also mention Parisinus 6884 A (A; 12th–13th century), of Laurentianus 30, 10 (m; 14th century) and of a manuscript in the British Museum, Add. 19. 355 (15th century). The editio princeps was soon followed by several reprintings. In 1884 the series of scholarly editions began with that of H. Keil. Of all Cato's other works only fragments survive.

<sup>1</sup> P. GRIMAL goes so far as to see in the Origines a 'véritable traité de politique, voire de politique comparée.' Cf. Les éléments philosophiques dans l'idée de monarchie à Rome à la fin de la République, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 32, 1985, 233–282, esp. 235–237.

Influence

Cato's literary achievement earned a reputation even among his contemporaries, and soon after his death his writing found its first successors in the historians Cassius Hemina and Coelius Antipater. Whether Terence too made use of Cato in his prologues is a matter of dispute.<sup>1</sup>

Sallust's imitation of Cato extended to the very details of linguistic expression, thus forging a moral and aesthetic manner later taken up by Tacitus and Ammianus Marcellinus.<sup>2</sup>

Cato's De re militari enjoyed considerable authority among experts even in late antiquity. Even the Renaissance textbooks providing Goethe with information<sup>3</sup> before his journey to Italy drew material from the De agricultura.

It is difficult to form any notion of the influence of the speeches. The written transmission is too fragmentary, and especially in Republican Rome, study of written speeches was less important than practical apprenticeship with great live orators. Even so, it is astonishing that still in the 1st century B.C. Atticus was able to read no fewer than 150 speeches of the Elder Cato. Atticus' work as a collector and Cicero's energetic intervention<sup>4</sup> in favor of a literary Cato-renaissance are the basis of all that later writers know about our author. Among these, so far as the speeches are concerned, Livy and Aulus Gellius deserve particular mention.

Minucius Felix used a speech by Fronto, Against the Christians, which may depend on Cato's speech about the Bacchanalia. If this is right, Fronto's imitation of Cato is less superficial than generally assumed.

<sup>1</sup> See S. M. GOLDBERG, Terence, Cato and the Rhetorical Prologue, CPh 78, 1983, 198-211.

<sup>2</sup> Exaggerated imitation of Cato also, however, stirred criticism: cf. G. CALBOLI, I modelli dell'arcaismo. M. Porcio Catone, Aion 8, 1986, 37-69.

<sup>3</sup> Preparations for the second visit to Italy (1795/96), WA 1, 34, 2, 1904, 167-168.

<sup>4</sup> His own speeches show many features in common with Cato: P. CUGUSTI, Catone oratore e Cicerone oratore, Maia 38, 1986, 207-216.

The rhetor of the Antonines saw himself, like Cato, as a defender of Old Rome against a foreign mystery religion.

In the Origines Cato sought the roots of Roman history not only in the capital city, but in the entire imperium (at that time, Italy); this effort had less influence than it deserved. Glorious exceptions are Virgil's praises of Italy in the Georgics and the second half of the Aeneid, which brings before us the whole peninsula. Silius Italicus too, in the steps of Livy, who knew his Cato well,<sup>1</sup> allows all the cities and peoples of Italy to take their place in his work as completely as in a catalogue.<sup>2</sup> Historians however concentrated their focus mainly on Rome. When Theodor Mommsen wrote a history of the imperial period from the point of view of the provinces, even within modern scholarship this constituted a revolutionary novelty. But basically it was nothing more than a logical continuation of Cato's insight.

Even more significant than the influence of the work is that of the personality. The redhead from Tusculum, with his blue or green eyes, became the personification of the Roman. His alleged bons mots were swapped, anecdotes mushroomed about him. The Younger Cato set his ancestor's moral teaching on a Stoic foundation, without taking account of his shrewd grasp of reality. Cicero turned the greyhaired censor into an ideal picture of Roman and Hellenistic wisdom. Plutarch perhaps overemphasized Cato's dislike for the Greeks, but gave a picture of the business sense and pugnaciousness of the man which is free from embellishments. It is certainly authentic that the author of the De agricultura, when it came to sparing a crumb for old slaves and domestic animals, sacrificed humanity to economics.

The paragon of old Roman morality bequeathed a morsel of moral blindness not only to modern times but also to the Middle Ages. In one of his Sermones Augustine wrote: 'Consider, brethren, what the great Cato says about women: if the world lacked women, our life would not be so ungodly.'<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The description of Cato's character (39. 40) is important, along with the presentation of Cato as the ideal general (34. 18. 3-5; s. also 42. 34. 6-7). This is echoed by Fronto princ. hist. p. 207 NABER; p. 197 V.D.H.; and by Claudian IV cons. Hon. 320-352: H. TRÄNKLE, Cato in der vierten und fünften Dekade des Livius, AAWM 1971, 4, 1-29.

<sup>2</sup> On Florus cf. G. BRIZZI, Imitari coepit Annibalem (Flor. 1. 22. 55). Apporti catoniani alla concezione storiografica di Floro?, Latomus 43, 1984, 424-431.

<sup>3</sup> Denique, fratres mei, attendite, quod dixit magnus ille Cato de feminis, si absque femina esset mundus, conversatio nostra absque diis non esset (Aug. serm. 194. 6 = Cato, dicta mem. fg. 82 JORDAN).

Cato's works are only a by-product of his personality; even so, they gave Roman literature one of its most powerful impulses. Cato was the creator of Latin prose. In him, writing did not primarily spring from an aesthetic drive, but served rather the task of mastering particular situations and factual problems presented by life. Cato's principle, rem tene, verba sequentur, was delivered to Roman prose right at its beginning. Factual and technical writing was not a marginal interest of Latin prose, but its origin. A book in Latin had as its first aim to be useful.

Thanks to his writings, Cato was the first Roman whose career may be grasped in a certain detail and color. What he wrote was the expression of his personality, and in this respect too he set a trend in Roman literature. It is the work of individuals, of pioneers; and so long as its creativity survives, that is what it will remain in essence. In its beginnings dwelled the universality which precedes all specialization. Cato bequeathed to Roman literature three features: its concern with facts and life; its transformation of Greek culture and technique; and literary work as a personal achievement.

Editions: agr.: G. MERULA, Venetiis: N. IENSON 1472. * frgg.: H. JORDAN, Lipsiae 1860. * Scripta quae manserunt omnia: O. SCHÖNBERGER (TTrN), München 1980. * agr.: H. KEIL, Leipzig 1882–1902. * G. GOETZ, Leipzig 1922. * W. D. HOOPER (TTrN), London 1934, repr. 1967. * A. MAZZARINO, Lipsiae 1962, 2nd ed. 1982. * P. THIELSCHER (TTrC), Berlin 1963. * R. GOUJARD (TTrC), Paris 1975. * or. frgg.: H. MALCOVATI, ORF 1st ed., 1, 17–218; ORF 4th ed. 1, 12–97. * M. T. SBLENDORIO CUGUSI (TC), Torino 1982. * or. pro Rhodiensibus: G. CALBOLI (TTrC), Bologna 1978. * orig.: H. PETER, HRR 2nd ed. 1, cxxvii–clxiv; 55–97. * M. CHASSIGNET (TTrC), Paris 1986. * orig., book 1: W. A. SCHRÖDER (TC), Meisenheim 1971. ** Bibl.: U. ZUCCARELLI, Rassegna bibliografica di studi e pubblicazioni su Catone (1940–1950), Paideia 7, 1952, 213–217. * K. D. WHITE, Roman Agricultural Writers I. Varro and His Predecessors, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 439–497, esp. 440–458 and 494–495. * A.-M. TUPET, Rites magiques dans l'Antiquité romaine, ANRW 2, 16, 3, 1986, 2591–2675. ** Concordance: W. W. BRIGGS, Concordantia in Catonis librum De agri cultura, Hildesheim 1983.

S. AGACHE, Caton le Censeur. Les fortunes d'une légende, Caesarodunum 15<sup>bis</sup>, 1980, 71–107. * A. E. ASTIN, Cato the Censor, Oxford 1978. * S. BOSCHERINI, Lingua e scienza greca nel De agri cultura di Catone, Roma 1970. * V. BROWN, Cato Censor, in: F. E. CRANZ, P. O. KRISTELLER, eds., Catalogus translationum et commentariorum. Medieval and Renaissance Latin Translations and Commentaries. Annotated Lists and Guides, vol. 4, Washington 1980, 223–247. * M. CHASSIGNET, Caton et l'impérialisme romain

au II<sup>e</sup> siècle av. J.-C. d'après les Origines, Latomus 46, 1987, 285–300. * F. DELLA CORTE, Catone Censore. La vita e la fortuna, Firenze 2nd ed. 1969. * H. DOHR, Die italischen Gutshöfe nach den Schriften Catos und Varros, diss. Köln 1965. * M. GELZER, R. HELM, Porcius 9, RE 22, 1, 1953, 108–165. * H. HAFFTER, Cato der Ältere in Politik und Kultur seiner Zeit. Interpretationen zum Catobild der Antike und dem unserer Gegenwart, in: H.H., Römische Politik und römische Politiker, Heidelberg 1967, 158–192. * J. HÖRLE, Catos Hausbücher. Analyse seiner Schrift De agricultura nebst Wiederherstellung seines Kelterhauses und Gutshofes, Paderborn 1929. * D. KIENAST, Cato der Zensor. Seine Persönlichkeit und seine Zeit, Darmstadt 1954 (repr. 1979 with bibl. addenda). * W. KIERDORF, Catos Origines und die Anfänge der römischen Geschichtsschreibung, Chiron 10, 1980, 205–224. * F. KLINGNER, Cato Censorius und die Krisis Roms (1934), repr. in: KLINGNER, Geisteswelt, 5th ed. 1965, 34–65. * M. LAURIA, Cato De agricultura, SDHI 44, 1978, 9–44. * E. V. MARMORALE, Cato Maior, Bari 2nd ed. 1949. * A. MAZZARINO, Introduzione al De agri cultura di Catone, Roma 1952. * B. MUNK OLSEN, M. Porcius Cato, in: L'étude des auteurs classiques latins aux XI<sup>e</sup> et XII<sup>e</sup> siècles, Paris 1982, vol. 1, 57–59. * W. RICHTER, Gegenständliches Denken, archaisches Ordnen. Untersuchungen zur Anlage von Cato De agri cultura, Heidelberg 1978. * W. SUERBAUM, Cato Censorius und der Codex. Oder: Kladde und Kommentar, in: F. MAIER, ed., Anstöße zum altsprachlichen Unterricht (= FS H. SCHÖBER), München 1993, 18–29. * W. SUERBAUM, Sex and Crime im alten Rom: Von der humanistischen Zensur zu Cato dem Censor. Das Verbrechen des L. Flamininus als Spektakel und Exempel bei Cato, Valerius Antias, Livius, Cicero, Seneca pater, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch und Petrarca, WJA n.s. 19, 1993, 85–109. * A. TRAGLIA, Osservazioni su Catone prosatore, in: Hommages à H. Bardon, Bruxelles 1985, 344–359.

CAESAR

Life and Dates

C. Julius Caesar was born in 100 B.C. in the month which would be called July after him. Among the important authors writing in Latin he was the only native of Rome. Along with Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, Caesar's mother Aurelia was the model of a woman who personally guided and supervised the education of her child down to the last detail, instead of leaving it, according to the common practice of the day, to servants. To a special degree, urban Latin was therefore for Caesar his mother-tongue, and not merely sermo patrius. It was a treasure of the mind, added to by his conversations with his cultivated uncle Caesar Strabo and by the instruction he received at the hands of Antonius Gniphō. It was indeed his mother who appears to have been the only mortal capable of making Caesar yield. Younger women, such as his wife Pompeia, could not easily compete with her, although, among his numerous conquests, there were strongly marked personalities: examples are Cleopatra or Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus, or even Mucia Tertia, the wife of Pompey who, in 62 B.C., parted company with her because of her relationship with Caesar. Even many years later, this formidable lady would try to mediate between her son Sextus Pompeius and Octavian.

It was his mother who fostered Caesar's ambition. As the nephew of Marius and the son-in-law of Cinna, Caesar was connected with the populares and destined by them already at the age of 16 to be flamen Dialis. Sulla's demand, that he should divorce Cinna's daughter Cornelia was of no avail: at first Caesar withdrew from public life, to be finally pardoned by the dictator. In 81 to 79 B.C., he was in Asia as an officer, and on a diplomatic mission he came to the court of King Nicomedes in Bithynia, where his intimate relation with the king gave rise to gossip. After Sulla's death, he brought prosecutions at Rome against two former governors for extortion. His study of rhetoric on Rhodes under the famous Molon, who also taught Cicero, was interrupted by his successful campaign of vengeance against the pirates from whose grip he had earlier been ransomed. With the same independence Caesar—a general born—decided to defend towns in the province of Asia against Mithridates (74 B.C.).

Caesar became pontifex (73 B.C.) and quaestor (ca. 69/68 B.C.). As curule aedile (65 B.C.), he presided over magnificent games. Eventually he attained the dignity of pontifex maximus (63 B.C.) and the praetorship (62 B.C.). During these years, he broke openly with the optimates. From 70 B.C. on, he took part in popular actions against the senate and gave refuge to some of the proscribed. In the years 65–63 B.C., it was perhaps he who, along with Crassus, encouraged behind the scenes the political unrest of those days. He supported Catiline and Antonius, Cicero's rivals for the consulship, as the instruments of his plans. Between 67 and 62 B.C. he several times intervened in favor of Pompey. Finally, on December 5, 63 B.C., it was he who proposed to punish the five Catilinarians in custody, not with death, but with lifelong imprisonment, although it was Cato's alternative proposal that carried the day. In Hispania Ulterior, where he had earlier been stationed as quaestor, he distinguished himself (61–60 B.C.) as propraetor, lining his pockets in Roman fashion with a view to financing his career. He soon made an alliance with Pompey, whom he reconciled to Crassus (60 B.C.). This so-called<sup>1</sup> First Triumvirate put through measures beyond the scope of a single individual: two agrarian laws, a lex repetundarum and, in particular, the confirmation, to please Pompey, of his arrangements in the East and, to please Caesar, a command in Gaul enabling him to build up a position of personal pre-eminence. He substituted for the previous Roman policy of peaceful penetration of Gaul a war which he both began on his own initiative (cf. Gall. 1. 35. 4) and expanded, though ostensibly he was acting in defense of the friends of the Roman people. Many of the measures described were ratified violently and illegally against the resistance of the majority of the senate, especially of M. Porcius Cato and Caesar's colleague in the consulship (59 B.C.), M. Calpurnius Bibulus. Already as consul, Caesar took no pains to preserve Republican forms. In April 59 B.C., Pompey married Caesar's daughter Julia. Caesar's imperium was extended following the conference at Lucca (56 B.C.), and with Cicero's support (55 B.C.). During the years 58–51 B.C., Caesar succeeded in conquering the whole of Gaul as far as the Rhine. Even before he took up his duties in Gaul, senatorial opposition to Caesar had gathered force. He had avoided the demand to appear before a court by flight, and also assured himself of the support of the tribunes and of Clodius. After the death of Crassus (53 B.C.) and the election of Pompey to be consul sine collega (52 B.C.), the balance of power at Rome shifted. From 51, efforts were made to secure Caesar's recall. Thanks to Curio's veto in return for Caesar's generous settlement of his debts, during 51 and 50, no final decision could be taken. In January 49 B.C., at long last a state of emergency was declared and Pompey received extraordinary powers. Instead of dismissing his troops as ordered, Caesar invaded Italy by crossing the Rubicon. This act meant civil war. Pompey fled to the Balkan Peninsula. Caesar began by defeating the Pompeians in Spain. Now it was he who was named dictator, and who was elected to the consulship of 48 B.C. After a war of maneuvers at Dyrrhachium, Caesar prevailed at Pharsalus

---

<sup>1</sup> Tresviri reipublicae constituendae are not found before 43 B.C.

(August 48), and pursued Pompey to Egypt where, however, upon arrival, he found him already murdered. The honors conferred upon Caesar after this success broke with the old Roman constitution. The quarrel over the succession to the throne of Egypt was decided by Caesar in Cleopatra's favor, which led the followers of her brother Ptolemy to besiege him during the winter of 48–47 B.C. at Alexandria. An irreparable loss that stemmed from this trivial war between brother and sister was the burning of the Alexandrian library. It was not until spring that Caesar carried the day and installed Cleopatra as queen. Soon afterwards she presented him with a son. Caesar lost no time in defeating Pharnaces of Pontus at Zela in Asia Minor (veni, vidi, vici), and in autumn 47 B.C. he returned to Rome. In December of the very same year, he landed in Africa, and defeated the optimates in the spring of 46 B.C. at Thapsus, leading his opponent of many years, Cato, champion of the Republic, to commit suicide at Utica. Next winter Caesar was in Spain, campaigning against the sons of Pompey. His victory at Munda (45 B.C.) marked the end of the civil war, and from now on he enjoyed sole power. From 45 B.C., imperator became his praenomen; and in 44 he was appointed dictator for life. Decrees securing his apotheosis were put in hand. His planned expedition against the Parthians was an effort to avoid domestic political difficulties, but was not destined for fulfillment. After his intention to secure the royal power became obvious, a group of Roman republicans, some of whom were his intimate friends, saw it as their duty to murder the tyrant (March 15, 44 B.C.).

Although Caesar was granted only relatively few years for the internal organization of the Empire, he had made a start with important plans: the reform of the calendar<sup>1</sup> by the epoch-making change from the lunar to the solar year (Sosigenes); the extension of the citizenship to the Transpadanes and other groups; social measures such as the alleviation of debt; and the settlement of the veterans in Italy and of proletarii in the provinces. He also planned a codification of Roman law.

An estimate of Caesar as a writer touches only part of his achievement, and a part not regarded by him as an aim in itself. As a man of action, Caesar also understood the power of the word. In a general, words are as good as deeds and it is a mark of Caesar's knowledge of the art of leadership that at the right moment he could find the right word.

---

<sup>1</sup> G. RADKE, Die Schaltung des römischen Kalenders und Caesars Reform, in: Archaisches Latein, Darmstadt 1981, 152–161.

Survey of Works

Caesar was recognized as a great orator,<sup>1</sup> although by no means did he keep written records of all his addresses, while, on the other hand, spurious speeches were in circulation quite early under his name. At the age of 23, he prosecuted Cn. Cornelius Dolabella for malfeasance in public office. The funeral oration for his Aunt Julia (68 B.C.), the widow of Marius, attests to his consciousness of his own royal and divine descent (Suet. Iul. 6), as does his courageous intervention to uphold Marius' memory. In the same year Caesar honored his wife Cornelia with a funeral oration, something not customary in the case of young women (Plut. Caes. 5).

For Caesar, speech was only a means to an end, not however used without rhetorical competence. Quite early he had been encouraged by his witty uncle Julius Caesar Strabo and by the famous grammaticus M. Antonius Gniphio in thoughtful handling of language. Gniphio indeed was twice the intermediary in the rise of classical Latin, for another of his students was Cicero. Had Caesar not studied with Gniphio, the speedy composition of a technical treatise such as the De analogia,<sup>2</sup> during a crossing of the Alps<sup>3</sup> (55 or 54 B.C.), would have been unimaginable. On his way from Rome to Spain (46 B.C.), he composed a travel poem (Iter) and when encamped before Munda a pamphlet attacking Cato. This Anticato<sup>4</sup> (the title is attested by App. civ. 2. 99) comprised at least two books, commonly called for the sake of brevity Anticatones (cf. Cic. Att. 13. 50. 1; Mart. Cap. 5. 468), was a response to Cicero's eulogy of Cato and made use of a pamphlet by Metellus Scipio. Even if Caesar had employed only 'subtle irony'<sup>5</sup>—something by no means certain—here in fact he let the mask fall, revealing all his dislike for the embodiment of old Roman morals and Republican attitudes. The loss of the document is a stroke of luck for the memory, not of Cato, but of Caesar.<sup>6</sup>

Augustus took pains to see that works not published by Caesar himself were not disseminated. Accordingly, his youthful poems, such as his Praise

<sup>1</sup> Cic. Brut. 252; 261; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 114.

<sup>2</sup> H. DAHLMANN 1935; a different view in G. L. HENDRICKSON, The De analogia of Julius Caesar. Its Occasion, Nature, and Date, with Additional Fragments, CPh 1, 1906, 97–120.

<sup>3</sup> Suet. Iul. 56. 5; Fronto 224 V.D.H.

<sup>4</sup> The title is given in the plural by Suet. Iul. 56. 5; Juv. 6. 338.

<sup>5</sup> H. J. TSCHIEDEL, Caesar und der berauschte Cato, WJA n.s. 3, 1977, 105–113.

<sup>6</sup> A comprehensive discussion of the Anticato in H. J. TSCHIEDEL, Caesars Anticato. Eine Untersuchung der Testimonien und Fragmente, Darmstadt 1981.

of Hercules, a tragedy under the title Oedipus, his travelogue (Iter), and a collection of apophthegms which he had inspired are now unknown. His astronomical work, edited in conjunction with Sosigenes and others, is also now lost.<sup>1</sup>

Of his Letters, of which an edition was published, some are preserved as appendixes or insertions in Cicero's correspondence with Atticus.<sup>2</sup> His talent for succinct expression, so remarkable in his Commentaries, is also displayed in his epistolary style (e.g. 9. 13a). A knowledge of men is revealed in his courteous overtures to Cicero (9. 6a). Yet his assured and determined language, beneath a veil of friendship, cannot conceal menacing undertones (10. 8b). In a letter, the declaration of miseriordia (Caesar avoids the term clementia) becomes a political manifesto (9. 7c).

The Commentarii on the Gallic War, according to the now prevailing interpretation, were not composed from year to year,<sup>3</sup> although there is some evidence that Caesar sent reports (litterae) to the Senate in a format resembling that of a book. Rather, they were recorded quickly at one go in the winter of 52–51 B.C. (facile atque celeriter, Hirt. Gall. 8, praef. 6). Of course he must have used his own reports and, for events at which he was not present, notes made by his legates. Between his official reports and publication, a work of editing<sup>4</sup> must be assumed, partly with political, and partly with literary, aims. It was only after his great successes of 52 B.C. that Caesar could assume that an historical presentation might serve his purposes.<sup>5</sup> Accordingly, he often emphasizes that his behavior was wholly guided by prudence in the interests of the Roman people and corresponded to the traditions of Roman policy (e.g. as early as 1. 10. 2).

The division of material and the mutual relationship of the books, reveal the existence of an overall plan, which cannot have come into existence by mere accretion and successive compilation. Caesar tried to give his books roughly the same dimensions, which meant, for example, that the comparative excursus on the Gauls and Germans was displaced to book 6. The 1st and 7th books, which both show masterly design, are the corner pillars and receive preferential position. The style develops gradually and almost unremarkably, showing that no particularly long interruptions in the progress

<sup>1</sup> V. VALCÁRCEL, La pérdida de la obra poética de César. Un caso de censura?, in: Symbolae L. MITXELENA septuagenario oblatae, vol. 1, Vitoria 1985, 317–324; L. ALFONSI, Nota sull'Oedipus di Cesare, Aevum 57, 1983, 70–71.

<sup>2</sup> 9. 6a; 7c; 13a; 14 (in § 1); 16; 10. 8b.

<sup>3</sup> However, year by year composition of the Bellum Gallicum is assumed by K. BARWICK 1951, 124–127.

<sup>4</sup> A reconstruction of this work in E. MENSCHING 1988, 39–41.

<sup>5</sup> Relations between the Bellum Gallicum and contemporary discussion of the war are recognized by E. MENSCHING, Zu den Auseinandersetzungen um den Gallischen Krieg und der Considius-Episode (Gall. 1. 21–22), Hermes 112, 1984, 53–65.

of the work are to be supposed.<sup>1</sup> Caesar also gave a literary reality to his military and political scheme by assimilating his individual campaigns into a larger whole, the Gallic War.

Bellum Gallicum<sup>2</sup>

After a short description of Gaul, the 1st book contains the events of 58 B.C., that is, the campaigns against the Helvetii (2–29) and against Ariovistus (30–54). The 2nd book describes the campaign against the Belgae (57 B.C.). In book 3 is found the reduction of the coastal tribes, centering around the war against the Veneti (56 B.C.). The 4th book (55 B.C.) relates the treacherous annihilation of the Usipeti and Tencteri (1–15), the first crossing of the Rhine (16–19), the first expedition to Britain (20–36), and the punitive march against the rebellious Morini and Menapii (37–38). Book 5, dealing with the events of 54 B.C., narrates a second visit to Britain (1–23), the severe defeat suffered by Sabinus and Cotta at the hands of Ambiorix (24–37), the threat to Quintus Cicero and his subsequent rescue by Caesar (38–52), concluding with the suppression of unrest among the Senones and Treviri. Book 6 (53 B.C.) describes Caesar's subjection of the Nervii, the Senones, the Carnuti, and the Menapii, and that by Labienus of the Treviri (1–8). The account of the second crossing of the Rhine (9–28) is adorned with cultural and historical digressions concerning Gaul (11–20), Germany (21–24), and the Hercynian forest (25–28). The 2nd half of the book is filled with the merciless campaign against the Eburones. The 7th book (52 B.C.) recounts the dramatic struggle of the Gauls for freedom, led by the Arvernian Vercingetorix, up to the capitulation of Alesia.

The last book, containing the events of 51 and 50 B.C., was put together by one of Caesar's legates, Hirtius, who introduces himself in a preliminary epistle. It describes the final pacification of Gaul, giving particular emphasis to the hard-won conquest of Uxellodunum and the brave resistance put up by Commius, chief of the Atrebatas. The final chapters (49–55) form a transition to the Civil War.

Bellum Civile

The Bellum Civile was probably put on record in 47 B.C., during the interlude between the Alexandrian War and departure for Spain. It breaks off at the beginning of the Alexandrian campaign and is thought to have been left unfinished by the author.

The surviving text begins with the senatorial debates at the start of 49 B.C. and the measures taken against Caesar (1–6). Caesar's conquest of Italy (7–23) is followed by the siege of Pompey at Brundisium, leading to his departure for Dyrrhachium (24–29). In the same way, Cotta abandons Sardinia, and Cato Sicily (30–31). After a brief stop in Rome, Caesar turns his attention to Spain. On his march he leaves Trebonius and D. Brutus behind at Massilia to conduct the siege of the town. In Spain he defeats Afranius and Petreius, Pompey's legates (37–38). The celebrated naval battle at Massilia occupies chapters 56–58.

<sup>1</sup> D. RASMUSSEN 1963.

<sup>2</sup> E. MENSCHING 1988, 20–23.

The 2nd book recounts further events of 49 B.C., indicating an abandonment of the principle of dedicating one book to each year. The siege of Massilia proceeds (1–16). Varro travels to Spain (17–20). In his own absence, Caesar is named dictator (21). Finally, Massilia, too, is forced to lay down its arms (22). Curio's campaign in Africa is unsuccessful and leads to his death (23–44). This episode forms the dramatic climax of the work.

The 3rd book treats the events of 48 B.C. Its chief stages are Brundisium, Dyrrhachium, Pharsalus, and Pompey's death. It expressly forms a transition to the Alexandrian War, although Caesar himself did not complete the story.

On the Corpus Caesarianum, s. below.

Sources, Models, and Genres

From the contemporary point of view, memoirs are sources rather than works of history. The probable title Commentarii<sup>1</sup> rerum gestarum seems to point in the same direction: it suggests either private notes made by Roman officials (to be distinguished from proconsular reports to the Senate, for which the name is litterae), or hypomnemata, that is, organized collections of materials meant to be worked up into literary shape (Lucian hist. conscr. 48–50). Such memoirs existed, for example, written both by Sulla (Plut. Luc. 1. 4) and Cicero (commentarii consulatus: Att. 1. 19. 10; 2. 1).

But what Caesar wrote can only superficially be described as commentarii. In fact, they are already completed works. This was to raise the commentarius to the level of literature, something already recognized by Cicero (Brut. 262) and Hirtius (Gall. 8, praef. 3–7). This circumstance implied a change in style.<sup>2</sup> Cicero, on his own admission, had employed in his commentarius the 'perfume shop of Isocrates, the make-up kit of his disciples and the colors of Aristotle' (Att. 2. 1. 1).

In general, the commentarius was not something purely Roman, even in Caesar's hands. There had been comparable hypomnemata<sup>3</sup> of rulers and generals and campaign narratives emanating from the circle of Alexander the Great. This is a genre which likewise employed ethnographical excursus.

<sup>1</sup> F. BÖMER 1953; M. GELZER 1963.

<sup>2</sup> On the evolution in Caesar's style: E. MENSCHING 1988, passim.

<sup>3</sup> On the hypomnema: U. VON WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, Die Kultur der Gegen-

Nor should we forget the historical writings of Xenophon, whose influence penetrated far more deeply throughout Roman literature than is often assumed. As in Xenophon, the proem is missing (Lucian hist. conscr. 23). The author presents himself in the third person,<sup>1</sup> using a style whose ideal is refined simplicity.<sup>2</sup> Caesar also introduces other elements of literary historical writing into his commentarii: for example, in his use of the excursus<sup>3</sup> on the topography of Gaul and Germany and its peculiarities, he follows Greek ethnographers, notably Posidonius.<sup>4</sup> Caesar's independence in his adopting literary procedures (use of third person, narrative stance, and so on) demands precise evaluation.<sup>5</sup>

Literary Technique

The title commentarii is a literary understatement. The movement of the genre towards historia is observed principally in literary technique. For example, the use of extensive digressions (Britain, Gall. 5. 12–14; Gaul and Germany 6. 11–28) is undoubtedly a device of historiography. The interpretation of underlying causes by means of speeches is an additional tenet of ancient historical writing. A touchstone is furnished by the relation between indirect and direct speech. The latter, whose dramatic effect is more marked, is introduced when the aim is to arouse the reader's sympathetic response (e.g. Gall. 5. 30). The 7th book, designed by Caesar as the dramatic culmination of the Bellum Gallicum, is particularly rich in such speeches (Gall. 7. 20; 38; 50; 77); yet the practice of indirect speech, normal in the wart, 1, 8, 1912, 158–161; A. SCHUMRICK, Observationes ad rem librariam pertinentes, diss. Marburg 1909, 69–93; G. AVENARIUS, Lukians Schrift zur Geschichtsschreibung, Meisenheim 1956, 85–104.

---

<sup>1</sup> M. Aemilius Scaurus and P. Rutilius Rufus had, unlike Caesar, employed the first person.

<sup>2</sup> Caesar's commentarii, like Xenophon's, comprised seven books.

<sup>3</sup> Against H. FUCHS (Gnomon 8, 1932, 241–258) H. OPPERMANN 1933 defends the authenticity of the different excursus; s. also F. BECKMANN 1930.

<sup>4</sup> E. NORDEN, Die germanische Urgeschichte in Tacitus' Germania, Darmstadt 1971, 5th ed. 1971, 84–104; even the topographical parts have their Greek models; cf. D. PANHUIS, Word Order, Genre, Adstratum. The Place of the Verb in Caesar's Topographical excursus, Glotta 49, 1981, 295–308.

<sup>5</sup> A detailed account in E. MENSCHING 1988 passim.

commentarius, is not abandoned either (Gall. 7. 29; 32; 34 al.).

In the Bellum civile an address by the 'tragic hero' Curio is reported directly (2. 31 and 32). Utterances of Pompey (3. 18) and Labienus (3. 19) betray the fanaticism of the opposing side and might be compared with the speech by Critognatus (Gall. 7. 77). In quoting the heroic words of his gravely wounded standard bearer, Caesar honors the spirit of his troops at the very moment of their flight (3. 64). Before the Battle of Pharsalus pithy remarks of Caesar are heard (3. 85), although his declarations are usually reported only indirectly. Pompey (86) and Labienus (87) deliver lengthy speeches evincing deluded minds. One of Caesar's common soldiers expresses the attitude of his fellows and attests the seriousness of the situation (91). In his declarations (94) Pompey shows himself to the end insincere and dissembling. This list in itself is evidence of considerable psychological pressure exerted on the reader.

The gradual emergence of direct speeches in both works shows that this cannot be a question of a purely chronological development in Caesar's way of writing. His purpose, rather, is the artistic control of his material (οἰκονομία) with the aim of working on the reader's emotions (ψυχαγωγία).

Further devices for bringing events closer to the reader and matching narrative time with narrated time are found in the 'narrative unit', giving the stage to a specific person, and in 'reflection', that is, the depiction of the commander's private thoughts.<sup>1</sup> The extraordinarily large space afforded by Caesar to his own meditations corresponds to more than the role of the συλλογισμοί found in Polybius, or (to some extent) in Thucydides and Xenophon. It is connected with his 'level of intent', that of showing Caesar without reservation as a most prudent leader of his men. Individual scenes, such as civ. 3. 64 or 91, illustrate the bravery and deep commitment of the troops. In the very 1st book of the Gallic War Caesar is at some pains to present his military action as a bellum iustum. In the introductory chapters of the Bellum civile narrative and tendentious argument are interwined almost inseparably.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. A. GÄRTNER 1975 is basic. Individual literary procedures are discussed, with the aid of statistics, by F.-H. MUTSCHLER 1975.

<sup>2</sup> C. J. CLASSEN, Philologische Bemerkungen zu den einleitenden Kapiteln von Caesars Bellum civile. Darstellungstechnik und Absicht, in: Omaggio a P. Treves, Padova 1983, 111-120.

The bias of the narrative achieved by using emotional adjectives and borrowing procedures from literary historiography allows Caesar to portray his opponents as arrogant, short-sighted and obsessed. In this way Caesar's own behavior is indirectly justified.

The methods of so-called Peripatetic historical writing are particularly evoked when Fortune, not Caesar, is in control. Such is the case when there are failures, for example, at Dyrrhachium and in the story of Curio. Conversely, Caesar emphasizes consilium especially on the eve of successes, to avoid any impression that they are the result of coincidence. An example of the dramatic shaping of a peripeteia<sup>1</sup> is found at Gall. 2. 19–27. The situation of the Romans, in all its hopelessness, is depicted in detail. Against this gloomy background, the commander personally makes his entry (25) like an epic hero. The author in fact has already prepared the attentive reader for this reversal of fortune. Narrative art here shares something with the propagandist. Caesar certainly did not make up his personal intervention, but throughout he is well aware of the effect this scene will have on his readers.

Caesar follows literary historiography in using devices of ornament as an aid to interpretation, although interpretation for him (unlike the historians) is largely directed to the political self-advertisement of the author as actor. This does not necessarily imply a distortion of the facts in every case, but it does mean a conscious deployment of literary means to serve a particular end, which cannot be reconciled with the historian's claim to impartiality. There is a basic difference between the historian who aims to write sine ira et studio, and who only falls short of his aim because of the limitations of human nature; and, on the other hand, a narrative written from the outset to be a self-portrait of a particular individual. In this latter case, a 'rhetorical' analysis of artistic procedures is more appropriate than one based purely on aesthetic appeal. This does not exclude, of course, the occurrence of powerful artistic effects, nor does it necessarily imply that what is told is untrue. In Caesar's case, however, it is rewarding to inquire into the motives behind the selection, arrangement and artistic manipulation of his material.

Caesar had studied rhetoric (for example, under the famous Molon who was also Cicero's teacher), and he knew the most effective methods of rearranging facts so as to set them in a new light: dis-junction (i.e., the separation of facts from their context and their rearrangement to suit special purposes); narrative as (preliminary) justification; insinuation by use of vague expressions; emotional coloring by careful choice of adjectives; varying sentence beginnings to give a new slant; dramatization; distraction from the main point by paying leisurely attention to incidentals. In this context we might also recall that the detailed digression<sup>1</sup> in the 6th book contributes to conceal the lack of success experienced in the German expedition.

---

<sup>1</sup> W. GÖRLER 1977.

Language and Style

A characteristic mark of Caesar's handling of language is his purism. The negative implications of this attitude have been greatly exaggerated. What the Latin language loses by it in fullness is recovered in stylistic vigor. The advice given in the De analogia, to steer clear of an unusual word like a reef (apud Gell. 1. 10. 4; GRF vol. 1, 146) defines the selection of vocabulary (verborum delectus; Cic. Brut. 253). Thus, if several synonyms are available, Caesar limits his choice to one of them, rejecting fluvius and amnis, for example, in favor of flumen. He avoids therefore mere variation for its own sake, and in every case seeks the mot juste (verbum proprium).<sup>2</sup> Such a way of speaking or writing was called κριολογία; elegantia Caesaris (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 114) means simplicity as a principle of style.

From this 'golden mean', Caesar deviates only rarely. Occasionally, his style approximates that of officialdom, for example in redundancies such as diem, quo die; propterea quod; postridie eius diei; permittere, ut liceat. In his funeral oration for Julia, we find in a solemn context a dactylic rhythm, regibus ortum, as a clausula.<sup>3</sup> More often, Caesar seeks to please us with the parallelism of symmetrically arranged clauses.

His treatment of language is functional. This is shown in his variation of sentence lengths. In Gall. 7. 27, a complex period is assigned to reflection, while a short clause matches the speed of the action.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Bibliography on the excursus is found in H. GESCHE 1976, 259–263; W. M. ZEITLER, Zum Germanenbegriff Caesars. Der Germanenexkurs im sechsten Buch von Caesars Bellum Gallicum, in: H. BECK, ed., Germanenprobleme in heutiger Sicht, Berlin 1986, 41–52; N. HOLZBERG suggests that Caesar wishes to prove his adversaries' invincibility: Die ethnographischen Exkurse in Caesars Bellum Gallicum als erzählstrategisches Mittel, Anregung 33, 1987, 85–98.

<sup>2</sup> On Caesar's vocabulary cf. E. MENSCHING 1988, 79–85.

<sup>3</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 54–58.

<sup>4</sup> VON ALBRECHT, ibid., 59–67.

The ablative absolute is more frequent in Caesar than it is in Cicero, for it allows to incorporate incidental circumstances in a sentence with the greatest possible brevity. Cicero, whose task as an orator often requires the ample development of an argument, may at times have felt the ablative absolute to be dry and abstract, and for that reason have made less frequent use of it.

Caesar may put the verb at the beginning to serve dramatic ends, all the more since he usually is strict in observing the final position normal in Latin. Here, too, belong his historic infinitives and historic presents. His use of hyperbaton also deserves attention.<sup>1</sup> Although Caesar's style in general is more concerned with docere and adheres to the principle of economy, in particular cases effects illustrating movere are especially powerful. To give an example, some of his accounts of battles echo Ennius' epic. (Ennius' battles are lost, but some notion of them might be recovered from parodies in Plautus, such as that in the Amphitruo).

The rationalism of Caesar's choice of style may be contrasted with the emotional and rhetorical manner found in Cicero. Caesar avoids the personification of abstracts, parenthesis, anacoloutha, since he takes pride (Plut. Caes. 3) in his 'soldierly manner of speech' (λόγος στρατιωτικοῦ ἀνδρός).

Stylistic variations in Caesar admit different explanations. Those who suppose that the Bellum Gallicum was written at one sitting see in these differences principally artistic purposes at work. Others believe that a development of style may be traced chronologically, and it is certainly undeniable that the external marks of the commentarius are most visible in the 1st book, and least in the 7th, where they are increasingly replaced by procedures drawn from historiography. Certain linguistic inadvertencies in the Bellum civile may be attributed to the great haste in which the work was composed.<sup>2</sup>

The language and style of the commentarii have an attractive brevity and charm. Cicero recognizes (Brut. 262): nihil est enim in historia pura et illustri brevitate dulcius ('for in history, there is nothing more pleasing than brevity clear and correct'), although his own ideal of historical writing is different. The word dulce here alludes to the ἡδύ in Xenophon's style. What Quintilian says of Cicero, that to take pleasure in this author is a measure of one's own progress (inst. 10. 1. 112) is adapted by E. Norden to Caesar: 'The satisfaction taken in one of Caesar's periods, planned as they are with logical rigor, and constructed with lapidary power, affords something like a measure of one's own feeling for Roman strength, energy, and greatness.'<sup>1</sup> Montaigne noted on the front page of his edition of Caesar: 'Le plus disert, le plus net et le plus sincère historien qui fût jamais.'<sup>2</sup> Without subscribing to the French author's moral judgment we must still agree with his praise of Caesar's style. 'Caesar's genius for winning battles easily is also recognizable in his style' (Herder, following Quint. inst. 10. 1. 114).<sup>3</sup> Since Caesar was a great strategist, it is only to be expected that his choice of words also served propaganda ends.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> H. C. GOTOFF, Towards a Practical Criticism of Caesar's Prose Style ICS 9, 1984, 1-18.

<sup>2</sup> The two last mentioned features are emphasized in K. BARWICK 1951.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature and Language

It is not possible to speak of a theory of historical writing developed by Caesar. Although he raised the commentarius to the level of literature, his primary goal was certainly not to attain fame as a writer.

His pamphlet On Analogy<sup>5</sup> put forward linguistic precision as the basis of oratory. Following his teacher M. Antonius Gniphio, Caesar

<sup>1</sup> NORDEN, LG 48.

<sup>2</sup> B. CHEVALLIER, Montaigne lecteur et juge de César, in: Présence de César, 91–107, esp. 101.

<sup>3</sup> Vom Einfluß der Regierung auf die Wissenschaften und der Wissenschaften auf die Regierung 3, 25 (Works, ed. Suphan 9, 333). On Language and style: O. WEISE, Charakteristik der lateinischen Sprache, Leipzig and Berlin 4th ed. 1909; repr. 1920, 143–165, comparison with Cicero; E. WYSS, Stilistische Untersuchungen zur Darstellung von Ereignissen in Caesars Bellum Gallicum, diss. Bern 1930; M. DEINHART, Die Temporalätze bei Caesar, diss. München 1936; J. J. SCHLICHER, The Development of Caesar's Narrative Style CPh 31, 1936, 212–224; W. S. VOGEL, Zur Stellung von esse bei Caesar und Sallust, diss. Tübingen, Würzburg 1938; A. MARSILI, De praesentis historici usu apud Caesarem, Lucca 1941; J. MAROUZEAU, Traité de stylistique latine, Paris 2nd ed. 1946, esp. 236; 264; 282; 328–329; K. DEICHGRÄBER, Elegantia Caesaris. Zu Caesars Reden und Commentarii, Gymnasium 57, 1950, 112–123, repr. in: D. RASMUSSEN, ed., Caesar, WdF 43, Darmstadt 1967, 208–223; K. BARWICK 1951; J. A. M. VAN DER LINDEN, Een speciaal gebruik van de ablativus absolutus bij Caesar, diss. Amsterdam 1955, 's Gravenhage 1955; E. MENSCHING 1980, 75–87 (with bibl.).

<sup>4</sup> E. ODELMAN, Aspects du vocabulaire de César, Eranos 83, 1985, 147–154; Friedrich MAIER, Herrschaft durch Sprache. Caesars Erzähltechnik im Dienste der politischen Rechtfertigung, Anregung 33, 1987, 146–154.

<sup>5</sup> H. DAHLMANN 1935; H. DREXLER, Parerga Caesariana, Hermes 70, 1935, 203–234.

championed the principle of analogy, the obedience to strict rules, against anomaly, linguistic usage with all its attendant irregularities. So it is that he uses frustro instead of frustror, and in the fourth declension forms the dative even in the masculine in -u instead of -ui. It may well have been he who standardized (Quint. inst. 1. 7. 21) the orthography of the superlative in -imus instead of -umus. The De analogia, dedicated to Cicero, was meant to lay the foundation for the more advanced rhetorical doctrines developed by Cicero himself in the De oratore. This explains why Caesar's theory of analogy is focussed exclusively on the topic of eloquence. For this reason, in his work, Caesar takes only a moderately analogist position. The orator was expected to pay some attention to actual linguistic usage, even if only for the sake of his audience (cf. Varro ling. 9. 1. 5). Since Caesar is concerned with good usage (pura et incorrupta consuetudo, 'pure and uncorrupted usage', cf. Cic. Brut. 261), analogia and usus are not real opposites. For himself Caesar lays claim to facilis et cotidianus sermo ('straight everyday talk'), for Cicero, copia. Possibly<sup>1</sup> the well-known second fragment from the De analogia (apud Gell. 1. 10. 4) is directed against the analogists' unnatural linguistic experiments (cf. Cic. Brut. 259–261 referring to Sisenna). The principles followed by Caesar himself are Latinitas, pura et inlustris brevitatis, elegantia.

Ideas II

The ideas expressed by Caesar are governed by his bias. The selective use of facts constricts the reader's perspective to create a false sense of assurance. Since discourse is largely confined to the military dimension, Caesar always shows himself from his strongest side.<sup>2</sup> He is a great simplifier. The probability of his commentarii is internal, offering therefore no guarantee of truth. As with a good lawyer, the plea will be constructed from facts which are individually true, but whose arrangement follows a predetermined line.

Even moral values are not absolutes for him. They are degraded to mere instruments serving his strategy of success. This is something which raises questions in any case about the use of the Commentarii as a beginner's text.<sup>3</sup> An adult may see through the superior tactical play and enjoy it.<sup>1</sup> Earlier generations of teachers operated here with double standards. Ovid's strategy of success in love was rejected as cold and cynical, notwithstanding the author's evidently humorous intention. In Caesar's case, the same readers were less sensitized, although Caesar was speaking in earnest.

<sup>1</sup> H. DREXLER, ibid.

<sup>2</sup> E. MENSCHING 1988, 178.

<sup>3</sup> Excellent remarks on Caesar as material for reading by senior classes are made

The few surviving Nervii were carefully spared (diligentissime conservavit, 'he was most careful to preserve them', Gall. 2. 28). But this beautiful statement is preceded by a purpose clause: ut in miseros ac supplices usus misericordia videretur ('to show himself merciful towards their pitiful supplianc'). The videretur here, even if it means not so much 'to appear' as 'to be seen', has a chilling effect on the reader. Even in sympathy there is still calculation. Caesar in fact never loses sight of the effect on his public. Sympathy here is viewed, not as an ethical value, but as a political tactic. The 'hard sell' goes to troubling lengths. And this videretur is not interpolated by some 'malicious Tacitus', but written in full awareness by the actor himself. There is no concern for human beings, even where one could afford to treat them humanely, since they are no longer dangerous. All that matters is Caesar's own image. This passage is not isolated. In a similar way, Caesar (civ. 3. 1. 5) leaves a decision to the people to ensure that he himself appears in a more advantageous light (videri twice). Caesar regards everything, even values, even persons, only as a means to an end.<sup>2</sup>

This impression is strengthened by an examination of the way individual leaders are presented in the Bellum Gallicum.<sup>3</sup> Caesar is

---

by E. RÖMISCH, Lektüremodelle, in: Beiträge zur Lehrerfortbildung, Klassische Philologie, Wien 1973, 103–120, esp. 106–107.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. F. LEO, Die römische Literatur und die Schullektüre, Das humanistische Gymnasium 21, 1910, 166–176, esp. 175: 'So far as Caesar is concerned I must agree with those who want to keep him out of school. It is true that he has the simplicity of a man of action whose words are deeds; and the Roman army in ancient Gaul, confronted by Ariovistus and Vercingetorix is certainly a theme to stir the imagination. But Caesar's method of conducting war and the tendentiousness of his narrative must offend young minds. His book is only to be understood correctly from the point of view of high politics. It is and remains something bizarre that the great Caesar pueros elementa docet.' S. now H. CANCIK, Rationalität und Militär—Caesars Kriege gegen Mensch und Natur, in: H.-J. GLÜCKLICH, ed., Lateinische Literatur, heute wirkend, vol. 2, Göttingen 1987, 7–29.

<sup>2</sup> It must be recognized that Caesar's honesty in such passages is actually terrifying.

<sup>3</sup> E. MENSCHING, Caesars Interesse an Galliern und Germanen (a discussion of: E. KOUTROUBAS, Die Darstellung der Gegner in Caesars Bellum Gallicum, diss. Heidelberg 1972), GGA 227, 1975, 9–22; C. M. TERNES, Les Barbares dans les Commentaires sur la Guerre des Gaules de Jules César, BAL 10, 1980, 53–70.

basically determined to take almost nothing except military considerations into account,<sup>1</sup> suppressing, for example, the political motives behind his British expedition, explained by his rivalry with Pompey. Within the military sphere, he is interested only in the following facts: his own superior generalship; the dedication and bravery of his men; the justice of the wars he fights; the branding of his opponents as mad, blind and fanatical. The antithesis between rational and irrational behavior is a basic feature of Caesar's military history.<sup>2</sup>

If Caesar chides a 'realistic' politician like Dumnorix for amentia, it is not so much an objective verdict on this Gaul as a description of his inability to make a correct estimate of Caesar's own reactions (Gall. 5. 7. 2). Even a central character like Vercingetorix interests Caesar only from one point of view, as a champion of Gallic freedom. An important feature, Vercingetorix's earlier pro-Roman activity, is completely obscured. Similarly, the real motives of the Gauls' bitter struggle are never given a hearing. Caesar is content with the motive—honorable for both sides—of a 'struggle for freedom', not without adding that the champions of this ideal were untrue to their own high claim. Here in fact we encounter a motif which occurs also in Caesar's criticism of Cato.<sup>3</sup>

The real underlying causes of Gallic resistance—the resentment at Caesar's violent regime, the breakdown of old structures in Gaul and the failure to replace them with a convincing new order—disappear behind the 'universally human' struggle for freedom and of course the hatred of a man like Critognatus (7. 77) for the Romans 'in general'.

Caesar does not seem to have had a particularly high opinion of the Gauls. The best of them are distinguished in his eyes by 'un-Gallic' qualities: Diviciacus by egregia fides, iustitia, temperantia (1. 19. 2), Ambiorix by consilium (5. 34. 1), Vercingetorix by summa diligentia (7. 4. 9).<sup>4</sup>

There is an ambivalence in the portrayal of Caesar's junior officers. Sometimes he appears to give them credit for their achievements, and actually to relieve them of blame; and sometimes the opposite

<sup>1</sup> On the occasional mention of other areas of his activities in the Bellum Gallicum: E. MENSCHING 1988, 3–20.

<sup>2</sup> H. CANCIK, Disziplin und Rationalität. Zur Analyse militärischer Intelligenz am Beispiel von Caesars Gallischem Krieg, Saeculum 37, 1986, 166–181.

<sup>3</sup> Plin. epist. 3. 12. 2–3 = fig. 6 KLOTZ p. 189; H. J. TSCHIEDEL, Caesar und der berauschte Cato, WJA n.s. 3, 1977, 105–113.

<sup>4</sup> E. MENSCHING 1975, 21, note 16.

may be observed. The heartfelt empathy in Curio's heroic fate is surely also meant to act as a lightning rod for the reader's own feelings, intended to draw any too strong sympathy away from Pompey, whose fall is to be described in the next book.

Caesar's false picture of the attitude taken by Pompey and his followers, including the men of Massilia, was already hinted at. They are stylized and transformed into 'fanatics', just like the rebellious Gauls. Even there Caesar did not handle his chiaroscuro impartially. The Haedui were systematically denigrated, while on the other hand Vercingetorix was glorified.

Caesar himself, for example, emphasizes his care for the Haedui and his disappointment at their ingratitude. In the same way in the Civil War, he highlights at every turn his own readiness for negotiation and his love of peace. In both cases the purpose is to enable him at the right moment to declare that now even his inexhaustible patience has reached its limits, and arms must do the talking. To use rhetorical terms: by laying stress on his ethos, he builds up his thesis of the guilt shared by Pompey and the optimates for the Civil War.

Caesar's system of values demands some further attention. Our general declares solemnly that his behavior is determined by the traditions of Roman policy (e.g. Gall. 1. 10. 2). Yet in spite of this asseveration, the old Roman values have no longer any binding force for him. His contemporaries were unanimous in their belief that his invasion of Italy was irreconcilable with the old Roman concept of pietas erga patriam. What then were the values which Caesar himself displayed on his banner?

In the Civil War Caesar defended his personal dignitas and the respect owed to the tribunes who had intervened on his behalf. It is a matter of the status won by each individual for himself by his own achievements. In Caesar's eyes it was not (as Mommsen argued) the legal question, but the question of honor and the claim of status (dignitas) that was decisive. In the Bellum civile, the bias of the argument rests, not on juridical, but on ethical considerations. It is Hirtius who poorly supplements this by some threadbare legal arguments (Gall. 8. 52-55). Caesar actually tries to create the impression that it was the Senate which had dishonored the old Roman way of doing things. He had forgotten the basic premise of old Roman dignitas, that status cannot be absolute, but only found within a fixed and ordered framework. At this point, Republican devotion to the state switches into a modern-looking 'philosophy of claims'. A country failing to reward merit appropriately no longer deserves on its part to exercise a moral imperative. This is an anticipation by Caesar of ideas destined to play an essential role in the modern emancipation of the individual.

A note of sincerity is heard only when Caesar speaks of his men. Here, he is unsparing of praise, but once again with a purpose in mind. According to a saying attributed to him which, if not true, was certainly ben trovato, status (dignitas) has two premises: money and soldiers (Dio Cassius, 42. 49. 4). Wealth leads to soldiers, and vice versa. Caesar's terrifying greatness is found in the rigor with which he pursued his personal goals and subordinated everything to them, including morals and the claims of humanity. In Cicero's judgment, Caesar had perhaps lived long enough for his own nature and for fame, but quite surely too little for his country (Cic. Marcell. 23–25). He was the child of a new age and had outgrown old ties.

It was to his clementia that Caesar owed both his success and his downfall. Roman tradition relates clementia to pardon (ignoscere),<sup>1</sup> and includes the abstention from a punishment which could in itself be justifiably inflicted. The Romans attributed this behavior to their ancestors in their dealings with their conquered enemies.<sup>2</sup> In Caesar it is praised, perhaps rightly, as a natural trait. But it also served a purpose, as Caesar's letter to Balbus and Oppius shows: haec nova sit ratio vincendi, ut misericordia et liberalitate nos muniamus ('let this be a new way of conquering, to strengthen our position by kindness and generosity').<sup>3</sup> The notion that goodwill is the ruler's best bodyguard is one of the topoi of the theory of monarchy.<sup>4</sup> Caesar himself avoids the word clementia, perhaps because it presupposes a subordinate posture on the part of its recipient. He speaks instead of misericordia, lenitas, liberalitas. It is a virtue which he particularly exercises towards fellow citizens, in accordance with the old Roman rule of parcere civibus (Plut. Mar. 43). In the Civil War, in view of the prospective need for collaboration, it was practically a necessity. After the experiences under Sulla, more severity was expected, even from Pompey, if he had prevailed. Caesar's biggest miscalculation lay in not seeing that petty

<sup>1</sup> Plaut. Mil. 1252; Trin. 827; Cic. ad Brut. 1. 15. 10; Sen. clem. 2. 3. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Cato apud Gell. 6. 3. 32–33; Q. METELLUS Celer to Cic. fam. 5. 1; cf. Sall. Catil. 9. 3–5 aequitas; Livy 45. 8. 5.

<sup>3</sup> Letter of March 13, 49, Cic. Att. 9. 7c.

<sup>4</sup> Diog. Laert. 1. 97 on Periander of Corinth; Xen. Cyr. 7. 5. 84; Isocr. 10. 37; Plut. Caes. 57.

minds could tolerate least of all a great debt to someone else. In the Gallic War, by contrast, practically nothing of clementia can be detected. For example, at Gall. 8. 44. 1, he ordered the hands of all men capable of bearing arms to be severed, since in this instance he ran no risk, in the light of his well-known clemency, of being accused of cruelty: this is the explanation offered, with his soldierly shrewdness, by Hirtius. In general, in dealing with non-Romans, Caesar applied other standards, and their machiavellian motivations even vexed his fellow citizens. Cicero himself described Caesar's maltreatment of free peoples in devastating language,<sup>1</sup> and Cato proposed surrendering him to the Germans he had betrayed (Plut. Caes. 22).

Transmission

Two classes of manuscripts might be traced back to late antiquity. The 1st (Alpha) contains only the Bellum Gallicum, while the second (Beta) has the entire Corpus Caesarianum. Alpha derives from an old edition which compared different versions. The relative merits of Alpha or Beta, however, are a matter of dispute. Milestones in Caesarian criticism were marked by the editions of Meusel and Klotz.<sup>2</sup>

The question of interpolations has especially touched the introduction of the 1st book<sup>3</sup> and the digressions in the Bellum Gallicum. Nowadays it is usually resolved in favor of the latter's genuineness. Only Caesar's authorship of the zoological excursus (6. 25–28) must perhaps be denied.

Influence<sup>4</sup>

Caesar's fame is more or less independent of his writings. In antiquity he did not find many readers.<sup>5</sup> Asinius Pollio, a careful historian, doubted his credibility and accuracy (Suet. Iul. 56). As early as

<sup>1</sup> Cic. off. 2. 27–28; s. also Curio the Elder apud Cic. Brut. 218.

<sup>2</sup> Bibliography on the manuscripts in V. BROWN, Latin Manuscripts of Caesar's Gallic War, in: Palaeographica diplomatia et archivistica. Studi in onore di G. BATTELLI, Roma 1979, vol. 1, 105–157; further bibl. s. below (note 2).

<sup>3</sup> W. HERING, Die Interpolation im Prooemium des Bellum Gallicum, Philologus 100, 1956, 67–99.

<sup>4</sup> A number of individual treatments in: R. CHEVALLIER, ed., 1985.

<sup>5</sup> Traces are found in Livy, Nicolaus of Damascus, Plutarch, Tacitus, Appianus, Cassius Dio, and Ammianus Marcellinus.

the Augustans, Caesar was overshadowed by his adopted son. Whether Lucan made use of the Bellum civile is disputed. Quintilian admired Caesar as an orator, but made no mention of the commentarii. The Church Fathers were aware of Caesar's clementia,<sup>1</sup> but hardly of his writings. Orosius, though he read the Bellum Gallicum, took it for a work of Suetonius.

The Middle Ages witnessed the production of a relatively large number of copies, though Caesar is missing among the authors<sup>2</sup> recommended by Alcuin (9th century), Walther of Speyer (10th century), Konrad of Hirsau (12th century) and Eberhardus Germanus (13th century). Writers who quote Caesar in the Middle Ages are mostly of French or German origin, and seem to be acquainted only with the Bellum Gallicum. Maximus Planudes translated the Bellum Gallicum into Greek about 1300. On the threshold of the modern period Caesar was admired by Dante and Petrarch. Soon he was read by authors as different as Machiavelli and Montaigne.<sup>3</sup> Shakespeare (Julius Caesar) and Handel (Giulio Cesare) are among his fans. In Melanchthon's planned curricula for Protestant public schools, however, Caesar does not appear. But his cause was favored by Erasmus and the Jesuits, and, though at first as a model of simple, classical Latin, he later rode in triumph through the classrooms<sup>4</sup> of Christian Europe as early as the 16th century. Among the earliest school plays might be reckoned Helvetiogermani and Iulius redivivus by Nicodemus Frischlin (1547–1590). Caesar's fame passed far beyond the ranks of military writers,<sup>5</sup> who deservedly esteemed and quoted him. There is a somewhat strange unanimity in his praise among an Enlightenment thinker such as Wieland, a democrat like Mommsen, monarchs like Napoleon I and III, and aristocrats such as Nietzsche and Gundolf.<sup>6</sup> For a time Jacob Burckhardt regarded him as 'the greatest of mortals.'<sup>7</sup> Even George Bernard Shaw did not deny him

<sup>1</sup> Lact. inst. 6. 18. 34–35; 3. 18. 11–12; Aug. epist. 104. 16; Oros. 6. 17.

<sup>2</sup> W. RICHTER 1977, 18–21 (bibl.); on France and Germany: V. BROWN, The Textual Transmission of Caesar's Civil War, Leiden 1972, 14, note 2.

<sup>3</sup> Andrea Brenzio (15th century) wrote a speech of Caesar to his soldiers.

<sup>4</sup> F. A. ECKSTEIN, Lateinischer und griechischer Unterricht, Leipzig 1887, 217–225.

<sup>5</sup> M. JÄHNS, Cäsars Commentarien und ihre literarische und kriegswissenschaftliche Folgewirkung, Militär-Wochenblatt, suppl. 7, Berlin 1883, 343–386.

<sup>6</sup> V. PÖSCHL, Gundolfs Caesar, Euphorion 75, 1981, 204–216.

<sup>7</sup> H. STRASBURGER, Jacob Burckhardts Urteil über Caesar, in: D. BREMER, A. PATZER, eds., Wissenschaft und Existenz, WJA n.s., suppl. 1, 1985, 47–58.

his meed of praise.<sup>1</sup> Brecht's Geschäfte des Herrn Julius Caesar are a caricature which might supply a corrective if they were more historically precise.<sup>2</sup> Thornton Wilder's The Ides of March (1948) draws the picture of an intelligent and humane ruler in a world gone awry. Conversely, Walter Jens (Die Verschwörung, 1974) emphasized the cool calculation of the imperator in all its rigor, even to the staging of his own death. 'We have become too humane not to find repugnant Caesar's triumphs.' When will this remark of Goethe to Eckermann<sup>3</sup> find its fulfillment?

The Commentarii are a literary testimony of high order, offered about himself by one of the greatest men of action in the history of the world, and, as such, something unique. Among literary memoirs they mark a new stage. Their significance for the history of autobiography<sup>4</sup> can hardly yet be measured. To grasp Caesar's greatness as master of tactics and strategy, attentive interpretation and rich experience of life are required. The paradox implied in the fact that the greatest of the Romans owed his greatness, not to the Roman Republic, and least of all to virtues of the old Roman school, is not something to be understood by novices.

As a great individual, who lived his life to the full without regard for others, Caesar was celebrated in the 19th and even in the 20th centuries. At the point of collapse between the downfall of Republican ties and the New Order of the Empire he realized for himself—and only for himself—a limitless freedom of the kind hardly even dreamed of earlier and later. In this respect he belongs with heroes of the spirit like Catullus and Lucretius, to the characteristic features of a period with which nowadays a spiritual kinship is often felt.

Even so, one hesitates to mention him in the same breath as these two great poets. The tastelessly extravagant gladiatorial games over which he presided as a way of securing popularity, the unprecedented number of war dead, and the failure to develop a permanent political structure are scarcely typical tokens of a champion of civilization. Rather, they unmask in the genius and general a gambler on a large

<sup>1</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT, Bernard Shaw and the Classics, CML 8, 1987, 33–46; 8, 1988, 105–114.

<sup>2</sup> W. D. LEBEK, Brechts Caesar-Roman: Kritisches zu einem Idol, in: B. Brecht—Aspekte seines Werkes, Spuren seiner Wirkung, München 1983, 167–199.

<sup>3</sup> To Eckermann on Nov. 24, 1824; Gespräche 3, 142; Gedenkausgabe, vol. 24, Zürich 1948, 124.

<sup>4</sup> G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie, 1, 1, Bern 3rd ed. 1948, 248–252.

scale, large even in the blatant fashion with which he subordinated patriotism, humanity and morals to his drive towards power.

Caesar's concept of topography was based on scientific study, as was his knowledge of military resources and their accompanying technology. Their ruthless application to predetermined ends no doubt belongs to the successful achievements on his part from which modern civilization often seems to seek guidance. Whether that has furthered its own happiness is another question.

Literary history must take into account the fact that Caesar was also a strategist of genius when it came to words and to psychological warfare.<sup>1</sup> It is this which has led to today's discovery of him as propagandist and historical writer. The comparative study of Caesar's and Cicero's language is still in its infancy. The language and style of the Corpus Caesarianum promise wider conclusions about the relation of literary and colloquial language. Caesar's influence on the modern technical literature of military tactics—which is to say, on his own most basic area of expertise—has not yet been sufficiently investigated. A history of the objections raised against Caesar is also still awaited.

The Corpus Caesarianum

The Eighth Book of the Bellum Gallicum

Caesar carried his own account down to his victory over Vercingetorix. The gap between 51 B.C. and the start of the Civil War (49 B.C.) was filled by his legate Hirtius. The 8th book then, taking in two years (8. 48. 10), is distinguished at the outset from its predecessors by its scope. Furthermore, it contains a proem,<sup>2</sup> used by the author to introduce himself and to develop his interpretation of the genre of commentarius. His book, free from any excursions, descriptions and even speeches, conforms with this interpretation far more than Caesar's work does.<sup>3</sup> Symmetrically placed episodes are formed by the War against the Bellovaci (6–23) and the successful siege of Uxellodunum (32–44). The climax of the main action is a duel (47–48. 9). The language shows only minor differences from that of Caesar.<sup>4</sup> The accounts of Caesar's cruelty are, though certainly without <sup>1</sup> Recently the Italian equites have attracted attention as an audience addressed by Caesar: E. MENSCHING 1988, 31–35.

<sup>2</sup> Hirtius' authorship of this so-called Letter to Balbus is partly disputed: L. CANFORA, Cesare continuato, Belfagor 25, 1970, 419–429. Hirtius' authorship is defended by W. RICHTER 1977, 193–196.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. H. A. GÄRTNER 1975, 118–122.

<sup>4</sup> M. F. BUFFA, Struttura e stile di B. G. VIII, SRIC 7, 1986, 19–49.

malicious intent, clumsily motivated. Hirtius must therefore not be described as Caesar's head of public relations. A chapter isolated from the others (49) explains Caesar's principles of provincial administration.

Bellum Alexandrinum, Africanum and Hispaniense may have been written by participants in the fighting at the instigation of Hirtius or L. Cornelius Balbus.<sup>1</sup>

Bellum Alexandrinum

The so-called Bellum Alexandrinum comprises the events from September 48 to August 47 B.C. Without strictly adhering to chronology, the book guides the reader from theater to theater of war: Egypt, Armenia, Illyria, Spain; Syria, Armenia, Asia Minor. The struggle in Alexandria, conducted by Caesar himself, is allocated broad compass and is the subject of a gripping narrative. The author reveals extraordinary knowledge of detail, of the kind available only to an eyewitness (s. also 3. 1 and 19. 6, where the 1st person plural is found). Since Hirtius was not in Alexandria, his authorship must be dismissed.<sup>2</sup>

The vivid and even passionate narrative (spectaculo, 15. 8) recalls neither Caesar nor Hirtius, and sometimes seems to look ahead to Sallust and Livy. The literary claim is visible in the rhetorical tinge of the style and the fondness for terms of popular philosophy (magnitudo animi 32. 3; Caesar's good fortune 43. 1). Moreover, the author is not reluctant to take time here and there to indulge in reflections (7. 2; 23. 1).

Bellum Africanum

The unknown author of the Bellum Africanum was a soldier taking part personally in the campaign (end of 47 to the middle of April 46 B.C.), probably as an officer. His account exhibits a chronological arrangement with no introduction or use of excursus. The language is neither archaic nor vulgar.<sup>3</sup> Expression is simple and clear. Whereas Caesar likes to emphasize temporal sequence, the author of the Bellum Africanum is fond of idioms such as interim underlining simultaneity, and creating the impression of a close interlocking of events. The point of view often shifts from one side in a conflict to the other. In the center of a reliable account of operations stands a lively scene illustrating the point that representatives of the Pompeians prefer to obey a barbarian king rather than a Roman legate (57). The author is not a man of letters like Caesar, but neither is he without education. He may lack understanding of Caesar's plans, but he is his commander's faithful supporter. In the opposing ranks he finds significance only in Cato (88. 5).

<sup>1</sup> The works vary for example in their assessment of Caesar's good fortune: P. R. MURPHEY, Caesar's Continuations and Caesar's felicitas, CW 79, 1986, 307-317.

<sup>2</sup> Hirtius' authorship of the Bellum Alexandrinum is defended by O. SEEL, Hirtius, Klio suppl. 35, n.s. 22, Leipzig 1935. The continuers of the Caesarian Bella are discussed by W. RICHTER 1977, 191-223.

<sup>3</sup> In the Bellum Africanum, however, grandis is more frequent than magnus; more details and bibliography in W. RICHTER 1977, 211, 65.

Bellum Hispaniense<sup>1</sup>

The author of the Bellum Hispaniense, which deals with events from December 46 to August 45 B.C., was likewise a personal participant (cf. 29. 6 existimabamus). He has a better grasp of the details of the art of war than of the progress of the campaign in general or even of political ramifications. As an historical witness, he is particularly trustworthy, precisely because of his inability to distinguish the essential from the inessential. He makes no secret of his prejudice against the young Cn. Pompeius (1. 4; 18; 20–22 and elsewhere). With equal straightforwardness he emphasizes Caesar's merits at every turn. If the figures given for the dead at Munda (1000 vs. over 30,000 on the other side) sound exaggerated (31. 9–10), the responsibility for them must be laid at the door of Caesar's staff rather than at that of the author.

Language and style are remarkable in two ways. On the one hand, the author is close to the language of popular speech (e.g. he uses bene in the sense of 'very'). On the other, he breaks the conventions of the style used in the commentarius by his ostentatious quotations from Ennius. He gains a charming effect by his poetic adornment of a minor retreat (nostris cessere parumper 23. 3; cf. also 31. 7 and 5. 6, where there is certainly a poetic and probably Ennian reminiscence).<sup>2</sup> His account of an individual engagement, introduced by a mythical comparison, follows the route of the Roman annales-style (25. 3–8). His two speeches (17 and 42) show traces of rhetorical education.<sup>3</sup> His fulsome style is proof partly of a touching effort at 'educated' expression (nocturno tempore for noctu; hoc praeterito tempore for deinde), and partly of sheer thoughtlessness (cogebatur necessario; ex celeri festinatione; and even: non esse commissurum, ut ad subsidium mittendum se committeret). The sly, wry humor of the author has hardly been noted, although it is this that might shed light on his use of quotations and key words. The Bellum Hispaniense therefore is a still unplumbed source of the first order for the psychology of language. Unfortunately, the reader's pleasure is spoiled by the work's poor transmission.

Editions: Romae 1469. * Gall.: H. J. EDWARDS (TTtN), London 1917, repr. 1986. * A. KLOTZ, Lipsiae 4th ed. 1952. * O. SEEL, Lipsiae 1961. * W. HERING, Leipzig 2nd ed. 1992. * F. KRANER, W. DITTENBERGER, <sup>1</sup> Evaluations are given by L. CASTIGLIONI, Decisa forficibus, RIL 84, 1951, 30–54; G. PASCUCCI, Paralipomeni della esegesi e della critica al Bellum Hispaniense, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 596–630, repr. in G.P., Scritti scelti, Firenze 1983, 2, 771–811.

<sup>2</sup> E. WÖLFFLIN, Ennius und das Bellum Hispaniense, ALL 8, 1893, 596–597.

<sup>3</sup> W. RICHTER 1977, 220–223.

- H. MEUSEL (TC), Berlin 17th ed. 1913, with epil. and bibl. suppl. by H. OPPERMANN 18th ed. 1960. * M. DEISSMANN (Tr), Stuttgart 1980. * O. SCHÖNBERGER (TTrN), München 1990. * civ.: A. G. PESKETT (TTrN), London 1914. * A. KLOTZ, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1950, with add. by W. TRILLITZSCH 1964, repr. 1992. * J. M. CARTER (TTrC), Warminster 1991. * F. KRANER, F. HOFMANN, H. MEUSEL (TC), Berlin 11th ed. 1906, with epil. and bibl. suppl. by H. OPPERMANN 12th ed. 1959. * O. SCHÖNBERGER (TTrN), München 2nd ed. 1990. * Bell. Alex., Bell. Afr., Bell. Hisp.: A. G. WAY (TTrN), London 1955, repr. 1978. * Bell. Alex., Bell. Afr., Bell. Hisp., figg.: A. KLOTZ, Lipsiae 1927. * A. G. WAY (TTrN), London 1955. * Bell. Alex., Bell. Afr., Bell. Hisp., civ.: H. SIMON (Tr), with an introd. by Chr. MEIER, pref. by H. STRASBURGER, Bremen 1964. * Bell. Alex.: R. SCHNEIDER (TC), Berlin 1888. * R. GIOMINI (TC), Roma 1956. * Bell. Afr.: R. SCHNEIDER (TC), Berlin 1905. * Bell. Hisp.: A. KLOTZ (C), Leipzig 1927. * G. PASCUCCI (TC), Firenze 1965. * * Indices, lexicon: C. M. BIRCH, Concordantia et Index Caesaris, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1988. * H. MEUSEL, Lexicon Caesianum, Berlin 1887–1893, repr. 1958. * * Bibl.: H. OPPERMANN, Probleme und heutiger Stand der Caesarforschung, in: D. RASMUSSEN, ed., Caesar, Darmstadt 1967, 485–522. * J. KROYMANN, Caesar und das Corpus Caesianum in der neueren Forschung: (for 1945–1970), ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 457–487. * H. GESCHE, Bibl., in: H.G., Caesar, Darmstadt 1976, 207–325.
- F. E. ADCOCK, Caesar as Man of Letters, Cambridge 1956. * A. ALFÖLDI, Studien über Caesars Monarchie, Årsberättelse Lund 1, 1953, 1–82. * A. ALFÖLDI, Das wahre Gesicht Cäsars, AK 2, 1959, 27–31. * A. BACHOFEN, Cäsars und Lucans Bellum Civile. Ein Inhaltsvergleich, diss. Zürich 1972. * K. BARWICK, Caesars Commentarii und das Corpus Caesianum, Philologus suppl. 31, 2, Leipzig 1938. * K. BARWICK, Caesars Bellum civile. Tendenz, Abfassungszeit und Stil, SSAL 99, 1, Berlin 1951. * F. BECKMANN, Geographie und Ethnographie in Caesars Bellum Gallicum, Dortmund 1930. * R. G. BÖHM, Vigiliae Hibericae. Emendationen zum Text des Bellum Hispaniense, vol. 1, Freiburg 1988. * R. G. BÖHM, Vigiliae Iulianae. Emendationen zu Caesars Bellum Gallicum, Book 1. 1 to 3. 6, vol. 1, Freiburg 1991. * F. BÖMER, Der Commentarius. Zur Vorgeschichte und literarischen Form der Schriften Caesars, Hermes 81, 1953, 210–250. * H. BRUHNS, Caesar und die römische Oberschicht in den Jahren 49–44 v. Chr., Göttingen 1978. * J.-P. CHAUSERIE-LAPRÉE, L'expression narrative chez les historiens latins, Histoire d'un style, Paris 1969. * R. CHEVALLIER, ed., Présence de César. Actes du Colloque des 9–11 décembre 1983. Hommage à M. RAMBAUD. Caesarodunum XX<sup>bis</sup>, Paris 1985. * J. H. COLLINS, Caesar as a Political Propagandist, ANRW 1, 1, 1972, 922–966. * J. D. CRAIG, The General Reflection in Caesar's Commentaries, CR 45, 1931, 107–110. * F. CUPAIUOLO, Caso, fato e fortuna nel pensiero di alcuni storici latini. Spunti e appunti, BStudLat 14, 1984, 3–38. * M. CYTOWSKA, Jules César dans la tradition littéraire. Quelques réflexions, Eos 72, 1984, 343–350. * W. DAHLHEIM, Julius Caesar. Die Ehre des Krieges und der Untergang der römischen Republik, München 1987. * H. DAHLMANN, Clementia Caesaris, NJW 10, 1934, 17–26; repr. in: D. RASMUSSEN, ed., 32–47. * H. DAHLMANN, Caesars Schrift über die Analogie, RhM n.s. 84, 1935, 258–275. * L. W. DALY, Aulus Hirtius and the Corpus Caesarianum, CW 44, 1950–1951, 113–117. * H. FRÄNKEL, Über philologische Interpretation am Beispiel von Caesars Gallischem Krieg, NJW 9, 1933, 26–41; repr. in: H.F., Wege und Formen frühgriechischen Denkens, München 1955, 3rd ed. 1968, 294–312 and D. RASMUSSEN, ed., 165–188. * H. A. GÄRTNER, Beobachtungen zu Bauelementen in der antiken Historiographie, besonders bei Livius und Caesar, Wiesbaden 1975. * M. GELZER, Caesar. Der Politiker und Staatsmann, Wiesbaden 1921, 6th ed. 1960. * M. GELZER, Caesar als Historiker, in: M.G., Kleine Schriften 2, Wiesbaden 1963, 307–335. * H. GESCHE, Die Vergottung Caesars, Kallmünz 1968. * H. GESCHE, Caesar, Darmstadt 1976. * H.-J. GLÜCKLICH, Rhetorik und Führungsqualität—Feldherrnreden Caesars und Curios, AU 18, 3, 1975, 33–64. * H.-J. GLÜCKLICH, ed., Caesar als Erzählstrategie (= AU 33, 5, 1990; especially on the bellum iustum). * W. GÖRLER, Die Veränderung des Erzählerstandpunktes in Caesars Bellum Gallicum, Poetica 8, 1976, 95–119. * W. GÖRLER, Ein Darstellungsprinzip Caesars. Zur Technik der Peripetie und ihrer Vorbereitung im Bellum Gallicum, Hermes 105, 1977, 307–331. * F. GUNDOLF, Caesar. Geschichte seines Ruhmes, Berlin 1924, repr. 1968. * F. GUNDOLF, Caesar im 19. Jahrhundert, Berlin 1926, repr. 1968 (als Anhang zu Gundolf, Caesar, 275–360). * S. GUTENBRUNNER, Ariovist und Caesar, RhM 96, 1953, 97–100. * H. HAFFTER, E. RÖMISCH, Caesars Commentarii de Bello Gallico. Interpretationen—Didaktische Überlegungen, Heidelberg 1971. * J. HARMAND, Une composante scientifique du Corpus Caesarianum: le portrait de la Gaule dans le De Bello Gallico I–VII, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 523–595. * K. HERBIG, Neue Studien zur Ikonographie des C. IULIUS Caesar, KJ 4, 1959, 7–14; repr. in: D. RASMUSSEN, ed., 69–88. * W. HERING, Zur Tendenz des Bellum Gallicum, AClass 3, 1967, 55–62. * J. KLASS, Cicero und Caesar. Ein Beitrag zur Aufhellung ihrer gegenseitigen Beziehungen, Berlin 1939. * F. KLINGNER, C. Iulius Caesar, in: Klingner, Geisteswelt 5th ed. 1965, 90–109. * A. KLOTZ, Caesarstudien, Leipzig 1910. * A. KLOTZ, De Plutarchi vitae Caesarianae fontibus, Mnemosyne 3. ser. 6, 1938, 313–319. * U. KNOCHE, Caesars Commentarii, ihr Gegenstand und ihre Absicht, Gymnasium 58, 1951, 139–160. * A. LA PENNA, Tendenze ed arte del Bellum Civile di Cesare, Maia 5, 1952, 191–233. * J. LEEKER, Die Darstellung Cäsars in den romanischen Literaturen des Mittelalters, Frankfurt 1986. * O. LEGGEWIE, Clementia Caesaris, Gymnasium 65, 1958, 17–36. * E. LEHMANN, Dreimal Caesar. Versuch über den modernen historischen Roman, Poetica 9, 1977, 352–369. * U. MAIER, Caesars Feldzüge in Gallien (58–51 v. Chr.) in ihrem Zusammenhang mit der stadtrömischen Politik, Bonn 1978. * Chr. MEIER, Caesar, Berlin 1982. * E. MENSCHING, Caesar und die Germanen im 20. Jahrhundert. Bemerkungen zum Nachleben des Bellum Gallicum in deutschsprachigen Texten, Göttingen 1980. * E. MENSCHING, Caesars Bellum Gallicum. Eine Einführung, Frankfurt 1988. * Ed. MEYER, Caesars Monarchie und das Principat des Pompeius, Stuttgart 1918, 3rd ed. 1922, repr. 1963. * F.-H. MUTSCHLER, Erzählstil und Propaganda in Caesars Kommentarien, Heidelberg 1975. * Napoléon I., Darstellung der Kriege Caesars, Turennes, Friedrichs des Großen, ed. by H. E. FRIEDRICH, Berlin 1938. * H. OPPERMANN, Caesar—der Schriftsteller und sein Werk, Leipzig 1933. * H. OPPERMANN, Zu den geographischen Exkursen in Caesars Bellum Gallicum, Hermes 68, 1933, 182–195. * H. OPPERMANN, Drei Briefe Caesars, HG 44, 1933, 129–142. * H. OPPERMANN, Probleme und heutiger Stand der Caesarforschung, in: D. RASMUSSEN, ed., 485–522. * G. PASCUCCI, I mezzi espressivi stilistici di Cesare nel processo di deformazione storica dei Commentari, SCO 6, 1957, 134–174. * G. PASCUCCI, Interpretazione linguistica e stilistica del Cesare autentico, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 488–522; repr. in: G.P., Scritti scelti, Firenze 1983, 653–687. * V. POULSEN, Les portraits romains I: République et dynastie julienne, Copenhagen 1962. * L. RADITSA, Julius Caesar and his Writings, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 417–456. * M. RAMBAUD, L'art de la déformation historique dans les commentaires de César, Paris 1952, 2nd ed. 1966. * D. RASMUSSEN, Caesars Commentarii. Stil und Stilwandel am Beispiel der direkten Rede, Göttingen 1963. * D. RASMUSSEN, ed., Caesar, Darmstadt 1967. * W. RICHTER, Caesar als Darsteller seiner Taten. Eine Einführung, Heidelberg 1977. * K. SCHEFOLD, Caesars Epoche als goldene Zeit der Kunst, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 945–969. * E. SCHWABE, Das Fortleben von Caesars Schriften in der deutschen Litteratur und Schule seit der Humanistenzeit, NJP 5, 1902, 307–326. * O. SEEL, Caesar-Studien, Stuttgart 1967. * C. E. STEVENS, The Bellum Gallicum as a Work of Propaganda, Latomus 11, 1952, 3–18; 165–179. * K. STIEWE, Wahrheit und Rhetorik in Caesars Bellum Gallicum, WJA n.s. 2, 1976, 149–163. * H. STRASBURGER, Cäsar im Urteil der Zeitgenossen, HZ 175, 1953, 225–264 (modified and augmented separate ed.: Darmstadt 1968). * H. STRASBURGER, Ciceros philosophisches Spätwerk als Aufruf gegen die Herrschaft Caesars, Hildesheim 1990. * L. R. TAYLOR, The Rise of Julius Caesar, G&R ser. 2, 4, 1957, 10–18. * M. TREU, Zur clementia Caesaris, MH 5, 1948, 197–217. * H. J. TSCHIEDEL, Zu Caesars literarischer Aktualität, in: P. NEUKAM, ed., Widerspiegelungen der Antike. Dialog Schule-Wissenschaft. Klassische Sprache und Literatur 14, München 1981, 78–103. * G. WALSER, Caesar und die Germanen, Studien zur politischen Tendenz römischer Feldzugsberichte, 1, Wiesbaden 1956. * S. WEINSTOCK, Divus Julius, Oxford 1971. * L. WICKERT, Zu Caesars Reichspolitik, Klio 30, 1937, 232–253, repr. in: R. KLEIN, ed., Das Staatsdenken der Römer, WdF 46, Darmstadt 1966, 555–580. * M. F. WILLIAMS, Caesar's Bibracte Narrative and the Aims of Caesarian Style, ICS 10, 1985, 215–226. * Z. YAVETZ, Julius Caesar and his Public Image, Ithaca 1983.

SALLUST

Life, Dates

The life of the first great historian among the Romans, filled with political hopes and disappointments, was overshadowed at its beginning by Sulla's dictatorship, and at the end by the Triumvirate. Between lay Pompey's successes in the East, the Catilinarian conspiracy, Caesar's victories in Gaul, his accession to supreme power and his death. Sallust experienced simultaneously the mighty expansion of the empire and the internal collapse of the Republic.

C. Sallustius Crispus was born in 86 B.C.<sup>1</sup> at Amiternum in Sabine territory. Originally he did not belong to the senatorial class, but to the provincial nobility. After having been a jolly young fellow (Gell. 17. 18), at some unknown time he became quaestor, and in 52 B.C. tribune. His loose living—and Caesarian sympathies?—led in 50 B.C. to his expulsion from the Senate (Dio Cass. 40. 63. 4). However, Caesar took steps to clear his name, and in the following year appointed him commander of a legion. Sallust experienced defeat (Oros. hist. 6. 15. 8). As praetor elect, he failed to pacify mutinous soldiers of Caesar in Campania,<sup>2</sup> though in the following year, he successfully took part in the African campaign (Bell. Afr. 8. 3; 34. 1; 3). He was appointed governor of the province of Africa Nova,<sup>3</sup> returning from there to Rome in 45 or at the beginning of 44 B.C., where it was only thanks to Caesar's support that he avoided being charged with lining his own pockets.<sup>4</sup> He was now able to buy the splendid 'Gardens of Sallust' on the Quirinal and one of Caesar's country-seats at Tibur. Perhaps following Caesar's death, he withdrew from politics and devoted himself to writing.<sup>5</sup> He died in 35 or 34 B.C.<sup>6</sup>

The Bellum Catilinae was his first work (Catil. 4), and is dated (because of 53. 6–54. 4) after Caesar's death, perhaps to about 42 B.C.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A statement of the problems in G. FUNAIOLI, RE 1 A. 2, 1920, col. 1914, s. v. Sallustius.

<sup>2</sup> App. civ. 2. 92. 387; Dio Cass. 42. 52. 1–2.

<sup>3</sup> Bell. Afr. 97. 1; App. civ. 2. 100. 415; Dio Cass. 43. 9. 2.

<sup>4</sup> Dio Cass. 43. 9. 2–3.

<sup>5</sup> A withdrawal from politics even before Caesar's assassination is proposed by J. MALITZ, Ambitio mala. Studien zur politischen Biographie des Sallust, Bonn 1975.

<sup>6</sup> In support of the year 34 B.C.: G. PERL, Sallusts Todesjahr, Klio 48, 1967, 97–105.

<sup>7</sup> A survey of recent scholarship in P. MCGUSHIN, ed., C. Sallustius Crispus, Bellum Catilinae. A Commentary, Leiden 1977, 6–7.

The Bellum Iugurthinum was written in the period of the Triumvirate (about 40 B.C.). Work on the Histories occupied Sallust's last years. In 38 B.C., the Caesarian P. Ventidius Bassus is said to have asked him for a speech on his Parthian victory.<sup>1</sup> Other speeches of Sallust were still read by Seneca the Elder (contr. 3, praef. 8), but only 'out of respect for the historical works.' (For a discussion of the Invectives and the Letters to Caesar, s. Appendix Sallustiana, below.)

Survey of Works

Bellum Catilinae

In the introduction Sallust explains his reasons for taking up writing (1-4. 2). He specifies his theme (4. 3-5), introduces Catiline and raises the question of the causes and motive of the conspiracy (5. 1-8). This leads to an excursus describing Rome's greatness and gradual moral decline (5. 9-13. 5). It is against this background that he explains the behavior of the conspirators, and of Catiline (14-16). The narrative of the first meeting of the conspirators (17-22) contains an excursus about the so-called First Conspiracy (18. 1-19. 6). A speech by Catiline forms the center of this scene (20).

This is followed by the events leading up to Catiline's departure and outlawing (23-36. 3). After an excursus describing the gloomy condition of the Republic (36. 4-39. 5), we are told of the discovery of the conspiracy at Rome (39. 6-47. 4) and its suppression (48. 1-55. 6).

The climax is reached with the debate in the Senate and subsequent execution of the conspirators (50-55). Sallust lingers in particular over the speeches of Caesar (51) and Cato (52) and his comparison between these two protagonists (53. 2-54. 6). The conclusion of the work, describing Catiline's end (56-61), is distinguished by a speech from the hero (58).

Bellum Iugurthinum

The monograph dealing with the Jugurthine War (111-105 B.C.) exhibits a similar structure. A proem, serving yet again to justify more emphatically the author's efforts as a historian (1-4), is followed by the announcement of the theme (5. 1-3) and a retrospective glance at earlier events, up to the division of Numidia between Adherbal and Jugurtha (5. 4-16).

Chapters 17-19 cap this with an excursus about Africa. The following main section (20. 1-28. 3) traces events from the division of Numidia to the outbreak of war. The next section describes the campaigns of Bestia and Albinus up to the shameful humiliation of the Romans and the rogatio Manilia (28. 4-40).

An excursus (41-42) about party activities at Rome—the narrative of the disturbed conditions there provides an appropriate setting for the main story—may be compared with the excursus likewise preceding the peripeteia in the Catilina (36. 4–39. 5). It is climaxed by the campaigns of Metellus (43–83) and Marius (84–114).

<sup>1</sup> Fronto, p. 122 V.D.H.; cf. Gell. 15. 4.

Historiae

Sallust conceived the Historiae as a continuation of Sisenna's historical work, from Sulla's death (78 B.C.) down to the year 67 B.C. The work was interrupted by its author's death. All that survive are four speeches and two letters, supplemented by about 500 fragments. The outline of the narrative may be reconstructed from later writers, such as Plutarch.<sup>1</sup>

In the 1st book a weighty prologue (1–18) was followed by a retrospective glance at the previous fifty years (19–53), what may be termed an archaiologia in the Thucydidean manner. The main narrative opened with a speech of the consul for the year 78 B.C., Lepidus, directed against Sulla and seeking the restoration of freedom (55). Perhaps motivated by Sulla's death, a character sketch of the tyrant (58–61) followed next, then Lepidus' rebellion (62–83), along with the speech of Marcius Philippus in the Senate (77), and finally the war against Sertorius (84–126).

Events from 76 to the beginning of 74 B.C. occupied the 2nd book: Lepidus' downfall on Sardinia (with an excursus on this island, 1–11) and the supreme command granted to Pompey in Spain (1–22). The scenes of activity were Rome, Spain, and Macedonia (23–41). In the following year (75 B.C.) came C. Cotta's address to the people (47), the continuation of the war against Sertorius (53–70), the events leading up to the Mithradatic War (71–79), the Dardanian (80) and Isaurian Wars (81–87)—with a geographical excursus (82–87)—and the events in Spain (88–98), along with Pompey's letter (98).

The 3rd book related Antonius' struggle with the pirates, his attack on Crete (1–16), accompanied by a description of Crete (10–15), the first stages of the Mithradatic War (17–42), further events of 74 and 73 B.C. (43–51) with the speech of the tribune Macer (48), the Mithradatic War (52–60), the celebrated excursus on the Black Sea (61–80), the end of the war with Sertorius (81–89), and the war with Spartacus (90–106).

Book 4 contained the events of 72–70 B.C. in Asia (1–19), the end of the Servile War (20–41) with a description of South Italy and Sicily (23–29), events at Rome (42–55) and finally the Armenian War (56–80) with the famous letter of Mithridates (69).

<sup>1</sup> H. PETER, Die Quellen Plutarchs in den Biographien der Römer, Halle 1865. Reconstructions are found in: B. MAURENBRECHER, ed.; D. FLACH, Die Vorrede zu Sallusts Historien in neuer Rekonstruktion, Philologus 117, 1973, 76–86; G. PETRONE, Per una ricostruzione del proemio delle Historiae di Sallustio, Pan 4, 1976, 59–67.

The 5th book (autumn 68–end of 67 B.C.) gave an account of the conclusion of the war conducted by Lucullus (1–16) and of the campaign against the pirates (17–27).

Sources, Models, and Genres

Sallust left the task of assembling materials for his narrative to his learned freedmen. Research into facts was less congenial to him than literary craftsmanship and interpretation in moral or political terms. He lets fall no word about his sources for the Catilina. Some contemporaries he knew personally, this was the case with Crassus (cf. Catil. 48. 9), P. Sulla and Caesar. By way of documents there were senatorial records (Cic. Sull. 42) and letters.<sup>1</sup> The main mass of source material was formed by Cicero's speeches and his other self-projections whether in prose or verse.<sup>2</sup> Although the figure of the consul does not occupy center stage for Sallust, he nevertheless adopts Cicero's view of Catiline,<sup>3</sup> and Cicero may have been used also for the Histories. The speech delivered by Cato in the Senate was available (Plut. Cato 23). There were also writings of Brutus and Cicero on Cato, as well as a pamphlet by Caesar.

The material for the Jugurthine War and the Histories was found in Roman historians, but also in the Greek philosopher and historian Posidonius (ca. 135–51 B.C.). Memoirs were known written by Rutilius Rufus and Sulla, who had both taken part in the war. The datings given in chapter 101. 1 and elsewhere (cf. also 91. 1) are unusually precise for Sallust and suggest accounts by eye-witnesses. At a passage like 108. 3, Sallust may have preferred Sulla's reminiscences to other sources, and his occasional criticism of Marius points in the same direction (93. 2; 94. 7).

Although at that time original speeches by Metellus and others could still be consulted, all the speeches given in the Iugurtha are of Sallust's own invention. It even seems that he did not consult official documents. Given the generally archaizing manner of the author, the archaisms in the rogatio Manilia (40. 1) are no guarantee of the authenticity of its wording.

<sup>1</sup> Catil. 35; 44. 5; s. Cic. Catil. 3. 12. However, Sallust (e.g. in c. 33) is only paraphrasing the sense.

<sup>2</sup> The extent to which Sallust is taking aim at Cicero's De consiliis suis must remain unresolved, given that Cicero's work has not been preserved.

<sup>3</sup> A comparison of the narratives of Sallust and Cicero is offered most recently by V. PELLEGRINI, Cicerone e Sallustio di fronte alla congiura di Catilina, in: Atti del Convegno di studi virgiliani 1981, Pescara 1982, vol. 2, 251–277.

The survey of history, with which his friend L. Ateius Philologus is said to have furnished him (Suet. gramm. 10), could not have been of much use to Sallust in the composition of his monographs. For his excursus about Africa, he appeals, though without taking responsibility for their content, to writings in Punic (Jug. 17. 7) of which he had commissioned translations. Furthermore, the ending of catabathmon (19. 3) indicates the use of a Greek model (Posidonius?).<sup>1</sup>

In Greece, Thucydides had created the genre of historical monograph, to which the Catilina and Iugurtha belong; Sallust was not content with mere imitation of Hellenistic predecessors. Aware of the historical greatness of Rome, he matched himself with the best of the Greeks. The focus of his attention shifted from work to work.<sup>2</sup> In all three of his writings we find, corresponding to the generic expectation raised by the example of Thucydides, a prologue and an archaiologia, along with a major speech to set the tone. In the two monographs, we encounter a political excursus. In the Catilina there is a debate: two opposing speeches are followed by a verdict on leading characters. Since it is concerned with an external war, the Iugurtha offered further possibilities of linkage with the Thucydidean tradition, such as battle scenes or the treatment of the interaction of domestic and foreign policy. In writing the Histories Sallust distanced himself further from Thucydides, although still inspired by historical and philosophical ideas drawn from his Greek model, as well as by his criticisms of language.<sup>3</sup>

The grand manner Sallust chose implied on his part a claim to be the Roman Thucydides. The greatness and decline of Rome challenged comparison with Athens in the Peloponnesian War. In spite of their great differences of aim and perspective, both historians were united above all in their quest for an understanding of man's nature and of the causes of internal discord in political life. In similar fashion, Cicero looked to Demosthenes, Lucretius to Empedocles, Virgil to Homer, and Horace to Alcaeus. This was not a classicizing admission

---

<sup>1</sup> A combination of several sources is supposed by E. NORDEN, Die germanische Urgeschichte in Tacitus' Germania, Berlin 3rd ed. 1923, 5th ed. (repr.) Darmstadt 1971, 145, note 2.

<sup>2</sup> T. F. SCANLON, The Influence of Thucydides on Sallust, Heidelberg 1980.

<sup>3</sup> Hist. 1. 7; Thuc. 3. 82. 2; hist. 1. 11; Thuc. 3. 82. 3 and 5; hist. 1. 12; Thuc. 3. 82. 4. Cf. also hist. 4. 69, derived from Thuc. 1. 32. 1.

of incompetence, but quite the reverse—a feeling that important things demanded an appropriate style.

The writer's shift from work to work implies a widening also in the circle of his models. Sallust shows continual development into a universal historian. His affinity with Herodotus becomes more marked. In this respect his mixture of anecdote and aphorism in the story of Micipsa and his sons (Jug. 9–11) is typical. The last words of Cyrus in Xenophon (Cyr. 8. 7; esp. 13–15) may have acted as inspiration for the king's speech. Traces of Greek training are found even in the remarks in which Marius denies that he has any knowledge of Greek (Jug. 85. 12).

It is self-evident that Hellenistic historiographical technique could not have bypassed Sallust altogether. A Hellenistic theory of the historical monograph is found in Cicero's letter to Lucceius (ad fam. 5. 12). Dramatic shape and emotional appeal<sup>1</sup> ('fear and pity') take precedence here over imparting of information. Sallust was a born dramatist and arranged peripeteiai, though without too much rhetorical baggage.

In the Histories Sallust presents a picture of Pompey free of the claim, made on his behalf by Theophanes of Mytilene, that he was a second Alexander. Sallust's remarks at hist. 3. 88 may be contrasted with this. 'The affectation practiced by the emotive Hellenistic historians . . . is in any case just as removed from Sallust's style as the 'puerility' displayed by Sisenna in his imitation of Clitarchus (Cic. leg. 1. 7) or the strict objectivity of Hieronymus and Polybius.'<sup>2</sup>

In comparison with Polybius, Sallust assigns a striking prominence to ethical considerations. He is not concerned with the mechanical alternation of constitutions, and not even with the mixed constitution, but with the realization of virtus by individuals and of justice in general.

There are resemblances to Posidonius: the geographical digressions in the Iugurtha and in the Histories; the doctrine of the rise of civilization along with the idealization of the life of primitive man (Catil. 2. 1; 9. 1); there is a Hellenistic ring to the notion that the mind is self-sufficient (Jug. 2. 3); the doctrine of the healthy effect of external threats on the Romans (Diod. 34. 33); and finally, the ethical interpretation of history as a whole (Diod. 37. 2). Sallust could not of course accept Posidonius' sympathies with the optimates.

<sup>1</sup> A. D. LEEMAN, Formen sallustianischer Geschichtsschreibung, Gymnasium 74, 1967, 108–115; repr. in: LEEMAN, Form 69–76.

<sup>2</sup> NORDEN, LG 6th ed. 1961, 45.

Rhetorical influences are noted in Sallust's preference for direct characterizations, moral reflections, aphorisms, and extended comparisons like that between Caesar and Cato (Catil. 53). The Greek model for rhetorical and moralizing history was Theopompus.<sup>1</sup> Sallust might also have known Ephorus and Timaeus. An effort to trace the matching speeches of Caesar and Cato back to Ephorus<sup>2</sup> has been prematurely rejected by critics.

Sallust was not a philosopher, although to serve his purposes he made use of philosophical topoi. Among other sources for the self-portrayal of the writer in the proems, Plato's Seventh Letter claims pride of place (e.g. Iug. 3. 2; Plat. epist. 7. 331 C). Already in the Catilina (1. 1), the Republic (586 A) and Phaedo (80 A) were linked, a combination perhaps mediated by the rhetorical schools, although it is possible that Sallust consulted Plato's own text. The philosophical thoughts of the proems cannot, however, be traced back to Plato in their entirety, and not even to Aristotle's Protrepticus, a work still exhibiting Platonic influence. Stoic elements point towards Posidonius as an intermediate source, even for Platonic doctrines. The opening of the Catilina itself refers to themes of contemporary philosophy, which could have been transmitted to Sallust by, among others, Cicero.<sup>3</sup> The chief thrust of the proems, which is to justify the search for fame and thereby also the activity of the historian, may not, however, be described as philosophical. In the use of isolated philosophical points to describe his own view of himself as an author, Sallust resembles, for example, Ennius, whose behavior with Pythagorean doctrines is similar. Sallust's interpretation of history is discussed below.

Cato the Elder was Sallust's most important Roman model. The latter formed the style of his own historical writing by taking up that of the founder of the genre, who previously had not determined Roman historiography to this extent (s. 'Language and Style'). Above all, Sallust's moralizing criticism of Rome is inspired by that of the grand old man, for the benefit (commodum, Iug. 4. 4) of the res publica.

<sup>1</sup> F. JACOBY apud Norden, ibid. 46.

<sup>2</sup> W. THEILER, Ein griechischer Historiker bei Sallust, in: Navicula Chiloniensis. FS F. JACOBY, Leiden 1956, 144-155.

<sup>3</sup> V. PÖSCHL, Zum Anfang von Sallusts Catilina, in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 254-261.

Sallust's high literary claims as an author of an historical monograph had only one predecessor at Rome, Coelius Antipater. Just like Sempronius Asellio and Cicero (de orat. 2. 63), Sallust raised questions of causes and inner motives. Like the great orator, he emphasized the role of personalities in history and believed that parts of the 2nd century belong to the good periods of Roman history.<sup>1</sup> Finally, in using Cornelius Sisenna, Sallust was obliged in retrospect to correct the Sullan bias of his presentation.

Literary Technique

In Fronto's judgment Sallust wrote strucite (p. 134 V.D.H.). A careful literary workmanship is also acknowledged in him by Quintilian (inst. 10. 3. 7-8). Here it is the overall framework that we should consider first.

A characteristic structural principle is symmetry. The opening and concluding sections of the Bellum Catilinae contain speeches by Catiline (20 and 58). The real narrative begins with a character sketch of him (5. 1-8) and ends with his heroic death (60-61). In the penultimate section, two opposing speeches, of about the same length, delivered by protagonists in the action (51-52), are set in contrast.

A second guiding principle of arrangement is the use of the technique of framing. Closely linked in sense with what precedes and follows, an excursus on the greatness of Rome and the decline of its morals (5. 9-13. 5) is inserted into the description of Catiline's character and that of his fellow-conspirators. Similarly, the retrospective glance at the so-called First Conspiracy (18. 1-19. 6) forms an inset in the narrative of the first meeting. Likewise, the character sketch of Sempronia (25) is an insertion in its context. The long excursus on the gloomy state of the Republic (36. 4-39) creates a break between the start of the conspiracy and its uncovering.

In spite of its larger dimensions, the structure<sup>2</sup> of the Bellum Iugurthinum is easier to grasp than that of the Catilina. There is a remarkable parallelism, for example, in the sequence of the two main final sections: the activity of Metellus, at first on his own, and later with Marius in mind; and then the deeds of Marius, which in their final stage are lent support by Sulla.

<sup>1</sup> M. RAMBAUD, Cicéron et l'histoire romaine, Paris 1953, 121-134.

<sup>2</sup> K. BÜCHNER 1953; A. D. LEEMAN 1957; A. LA PENNA 1968; F. GIANCOTTI, Struttura del Bellum Iugurthinum di Sallustio, Torino 1971.

Structure is accentuated by speeches. Memmius' words (Jug. 31) occur soon after the opening of the main action, while those of Marius (Jug. 85) are placed shortly after the beginning of the final section. The content of both speeches also has an important function, for it is they which give expression to basic thoughts about the conduct of politics.

The sequence of 'proem, historical retrospect, important speech,' is already found in the Catilina, and recurs in the Histories. It was to be imitated later in his Histories by Tacitus.

In the Histories Sallust avoids a precise correspondence of books and years in favor of other structural principles. In the 1st book rebels like Lepidus and Sertorius clearly take center stage. In the later portions Pompey and Lucullus assume a leading role. The letters introduced mark formal divisions: that of Pompey indicates the winter of 75-74, that of Mithridates the turn of the year 69-68 (hist. 2. 98; 4. 69). The conclusion of the 2nd book is highlighted by Pompey's letter and the anticipation of Lucullus' consulship in the next year. Geographical digressions underline by their frequency and variety the 'ecumenical' character of the Histories, and it may be assumed that in this work also they acted as divisional markers. As for political digressions, in the Histories, nothing is known which would be comparable to Catil. 36. 4-39. 5, and Jug. 41-42. This means that all the greater emphasis was thrown on the interplay of speeches on the one hand, and of geographical digressions on the other. In the geographical digressions, Sallust displays a panorama of the larger world; in the speeches, the inner world of politics and morals. Together, they establish the dimensions of the historical action and its interpretation. These otherwise so contrasting sorts of passage occur with striking frequency. They both offer places for the reader of the story to pause and supply a first vantage-point from which the whole may be assimilated and understood.

Particular features of Sallust's narrative technique are: proems, character sketches, speeches, letters, digressions, dramatic arrangement, and peripeteiai.

The subtlety of the structure found in the proems cannot be wholly illumined by reference either to 'archaic' ring-composition or to the rhetoric of the schools. The controlling principle is that of 'self-unfolding antithesis'.<sup>1</sup> In the Catilina, it is Plato's Seventh Letter which furnishes the literary framework within which personal political disappointments may be retraced. In the proems of both monographs, the author's chief aim is to supply a justification for his own literary activity (s. 'Reflections on Literature'); the general philosophical discussion which in each case precedes serves the same purpose. The literary technique corresponds to that of the epideictic prologue, for example, to the proem of Isocrates' Panegyricus, with its defence of the δόξα of eloquence as opposed to that of the more popularly esteemed athletics.

Let us now turn to character portrayal. It is true that the Roman people should be regarded as the real hero of the Bellum Iugurthinum (cf. bellum, quod populus Romanus cum Iugurtha rege Numidarum gessit, 'the war which the people of Rome waged with Jugurtha, king of the Numidians; Iug. 5. 1). But, in Sallust's interpretation of history (paucorum civium egregiam virtutem cuncta patravisse, 'that it had all been accomplished by the eminent merit of a few citizens'; Catil. 53. 4), the Roman people is represented by individual heroes: Metellus (43–83, from 63–83 jointly with Marius), Marius (83–114) and Sulla (95–114 jointly with Marius). Sulla makes his first appearance in chapter 95, where this new departure is emphasized by direct description of character. At a corresponding place (63. 3–6) Marius is introduced with a short biography.<sup>2</sup> These sketches of Sulla and Marius have been compared with the scholastic pattern of encomium,<sup>3</sup> but we had rather call them 'paradoxical portraits', in which good and bad features are boldly juxtaposed.<sup>4</sup> The Catilina (5) opens with a direct description of its hero's character. He is raised beyond individual detail to a type. Features of the criminal and the obsessed (Catil. 15. 4–5) mark him out as the desperado of the post-Sullan period, as a figure symptomatic of a sick society. Similarly, the character sketch of Sempronia (Catil. 25), which is hardly of a piece with the work as a whole, may be intended to illustrate the change in Roman society.

The literary technique of σύγκρισις is related to this. In his com-

<sup>1</sup> Sallust's style is not 'archaic,' but archaizing. The best treatment of the structure of the proems is found in LEEMAN, Form 77–97.

<sup>2</sup> G. WILLE, Der Mariusekkurs Kap. 63 im Aufbau von Sallusts Bellum Iugurthinum, in: FS K. VRETSKA, Heidelberg 1970, 304–331.

<sup>3</sup> K. VRETSKA, Bemerkungen zum Bau der Charakteristik bei Sallust, SO 31, 1955, 105–118.

<sup>4</sup> A. LA PENNA, Il ritratto paradossale da Silla a Petronio, RFIC 104, 1976, 270–293.

parison of Caesar and Cato (Catil. 53–54), the author evidently resorts to rhetorical methods of presentation (53, the technique of the proem; 54, antitheses). Here individual description is related to a basic understanding of virtutes and vitia. However, by contrast with encomia and invectives, Sallust does not indulge in painting in black and white. Even Catiline or Sempronia have good qualities, though one-sidedly developed ones, while Caesar's and Cato's virtues are complementary and thus only in conjunction produce a unified whole. This shows that rhetorical devices are not adopted uncritically, but used in the service of the author's own creative intentions.

To indirect characterization<sup>1</sup> speeches and letters make an essential contribution. Sallust's habit of introducing more or less freely invented speeches was criticized by Pompeius Trogus (fig. 152 Seel = Iust. 38. 3. 11), but a fixed convention of ancient historiography was at work (cf. Thuc. 1. 22). The interpretation of the speeches is hampered in principle by the fact that they aim not only at characterizing the speaker but also at analyzing the historical situation, often passing far beyond the historical moment. In essence, in his oratorical duel between Caesar and Cato, Sallust is no longer thinking exclusively of the situation in 63 B.C., but of the achievement of Caesar's and Cato's entire lives as it appears in retrospect. Micipsa's admonition about concord (Jug. 10) deals with a theme moving Sallust less in reference to Numidia than in regard to Rome. The consul Lepidus can, in the view of scholars, not have spoken as Sallust makes him (hist. 1. 55 M.) at the beginning of 78 B.C. The point is that the speech introduces him as a protagonist and advances a basic theme of the work, the collapse of the Republic.<sup>2</sup>

In the center of both monographs, we find a political excursus. In the Histories, however, there is only the use of the geographical excursus. A clearer distinction is therefore made between the functions of speech and excursus (s. above: Sources).

The narrative itself has a 'dramatic' character. Sallust simplifies the course of events, organizing it as a series of individual scenes. In the manner of Hellenistic historiographical technique, he gives a certain emphasis to the role of chance (Jug. 71. 1–4), or to that of tears and shifts of mood (Jug. 70. 1 ; 5; 71. 2; 5; 72. 2). Catiline recalls (Catil. 15. 4–5) tragic figures such as Orestes hunted by the Furies.<sup>1</sup> At the end he dies like a hero (Catil. 60–61).<sup>2</sup> The action in both monographs clusters around a peripeteia, the sudden reversal of fortune. The excursus in the Catilina (36. 4–39. 5) is introduced at a lull in the dramatic development, directly before the embassy of the Allobroges and the discovery of the conspiracy. The excursus on the parties in the Bellum Jugurthinum (41–42) is likewise found before the change of fortune. With Metellus, the events of the war take a turn for the better. The archaiologia in the Catilina (6–13) is made up of two opposed stages—the ‘good old days’ and the ‘decadent present’—between which the destruction of Carthage (Catil. 10. 1) denotes the turning point.

<sup>1</sup> On what follows cf. LEEMAN, Form 69–76.

<sup>2</sup> An exemplary interpretation on this theme is offered by A. KLINZ, Die große Rede des Marius (Jug. 85) und ihre Bedeutung für das Geschichtsbild des Sallust, AU 11, 5, 1968, 76–90.

Yet Sallust uses the methods of emotional historical writing more sparingly than, for example, Phylarchus, the butt of Polybius’ criticisms.<sup>3</sup> Sallust’s aim to write more than a ‘sentimental drama’ about Jugurtha is proved, for example, by the emergence of Marius and Sulla toward the end. The Jugurthine War is viewed as a part of Roman history and of universal history, as will be shown later. Literary means do not exist independently. They are subordinate to the historian’s purposes.

Language and Style

Sallust is the real creator at Rome of historical style. He consciously looks back to the Elder Cato,<sup>4</sup> and it is thanks to him that Cato’s language first becomes paradigmatic. The fragments of Claudius Quadrigarius, although they are much older, sound more ‘normal’, more ‘classical’ than the archaizing diction of Sallust.<sup>5</sup> His stylistic purpose at first encountered misunderstanding. Asinius Pollio accused him of having employed a philologist to excerpt knotty phrases from Cato.<sup>6</sup>

In fact, Sallust’s vocabulary is enriched by numerous borrowings

<sup>1</sup> Cic. S. Rosc. 67; Pls. 46; Verg. Aen. 4. 469–473.

<sup>2</sup> P. MAZZOCCHINI, Note a Sallustio, Catil. 60–61, AFLM 15, 1982, 637–644.

<sup>3</sup> Polyb. 2. 56; K. VRETSKA, Studien zu Sallusts Bellum Jugurthinum, SAWW 299, 4, 1955.

<sup>4</sup> In the introduction to the Historiae, he calls him Romani generis disertissimus.

<sup>5</sup> Archaisms (e.g. with -tim and -bundus) are occasionally found in Sisenna who, however, has a somewhat careless style.

<sup>6</sup> Nimia priscorum verborum affectatione (Suet. gramm. 10).

from Cato. An archaic effect is also created by his fondness for alliteration. Other elements display 'epic' coloring.<sup>1</sup> Where archaic orthography is concerned, not too much reliance should be placed on modern editions, since at times they are too zealous in their restoration of old forms. It must be admitted that copyists are inclined to 'modernize' spelling; but the reverse danger also threatens. At the time of the archaist Fronto, and certainly at the start of the present century, a naive delight in new discovery led scholars to read archaic Latin even where it was not transmitted. A true-to-life picture of Sallust's Latin as it has been transmitted to us is not to be obtained from the available editions of the monographs, but rather from Maurenbrecher's edition of the Histories.

Sallust's syntax and style are visibly different from those of Cato. Sentence structure is not as loose as in archaic Latin, but extremely tight.<sup>2</sup> In his view of style, Sallust may be called an 'Atticist', though he is perhaps the only author who succeeded in uniting this artistic principle with great linguistic richness and exceptional color.

A basic feature of his method of writing is varietas. Yet a surprising degree of concinnity is perceptible when the reader returns from Tacitus to Sallust. Asyndeton and parataxis bear witness to Sallust's brevitas,<sup>3</sup> what Quintilian calls his velocitas (inst. 10. 1. 102), a quality allowing him to say much in few words. It is in this 'conciseness' that Quintilian recognizes a difference from the style of oratory, which above all should be clear and explicit (inst. 4. 2. 45; 1. 1. 32).

To this main aim of brief presentation other principles, such as archaism or innovation (and Sallust is an innovator indeed) are subordinate. In his creative union of old and new, Sallust recalls Lucretius.<sup>4</sup> We should not believe that he wanted to challenge the optimates<sup>5</sup> by using the vulgar Latin of democrats, for it is not easy to encounter a more aristocratic stylist than Sallust.

Stylistic development cannot be so clearly described in Sallust's

<sup>1</sup> E. SKARD, Sallust und seine Vorgänger, Oslo 1956; S. KOSTER, Poetisches bei Sallust, in: S. KOSTER, Tessera. Sechs Beiträge zur Poesie und poetischen Theorie der Antike, Erlangen 1983, 55–68, with the bold attempt to discover in numerous passages a hexametric or iambic coloring (ibid.).

<sup>2</sup> On Sallust and Cato s. now G. CALBOLI, I modelli dell'arcaismo. M. Porcio Catone, AION (ling.) 8, 1986, 37–69.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. A. KLINZ, Brevitas Sallustiana, Anregung 28, 1982, 181–187.

<sup>4</sup> A collection of stylistic procedures is found in W. KROLL, Die Sprache des Sallust, Glotta 15, 1927, 280–305.

<sup>5</sup> Partly misleading: W. RICHTER, Der Manierismus des Sallust, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 755–780, esp. 756.

case<sup>1</sup> as in that of Tacitus. Nevertheless, between the Catilina and the Iugurtha may be noted a deliberate crescendo. Typical features of style deployed in the first essay increase in frequency. This is true, for example, even of the historic infinitive, which appears more often in the second work, and thus loses some of its effect.<sup>2</sup>

Sallust's strives for a diction both impressive and expressive. This is the reason why from the very beginning he avoids political or half-political clichés such as gravitas, honestas, humanitas, lenitas, verecundia, consensus, and even claritas.<sup>3</sup> After the Catilina certain terms disappear: crudelitas (although saevitia remains), cupiditas (cupido and lubido survive), desidia (ignavia, inertia, socordia remain), eloquentia (although facundia survives). His fondness for the choice and forceful word evidently increases.

Compared with the Catilina, the Iugurtha shows more extensive use of: formido, metuo, metus, anxius, vecordia, aerumnae, cupido, ignavia, socordia, opulentus. Among the words describing fear, Sallust discovers terror for the first time in the Iugurtha, and pavor in the Histories. Conversely, the adjective formidulosus, in vogue in the Catilina, is later dropped.

Linguistic differences are hardly detectible between the historian's narrative and the interspersed speeches, although the speeches are couched in somewhat more leisurely style. Similarly, the characters are not distinguished by language. Sallust's Caesar uses, not Caesarian, but Sallustian Latin. Marius proves his 'deficient rhetorical education' in a masterfully shaped speech. The speeches may indeed to an extraordinary degree be adapted to the speakers' ethos, but this is not a matter of linguistic usage in the strict sense.

Sallust did not find writing easy: et sane manifestus est etiam ex opere ipso labor, 'and certainly his works give evidence of the labor which he expended on them' (Quint., inst. 10. 3. 8). His language is not the Latin of everyday, and his liking for facio, for agito and similar frequentatives cannot in itself justify such a verdict. We are dealing with the selective language of an artist.

<sup>1</sup> R. SYME 1964, 240–273.

<sup>2</sup> B. HESSEN 1984.

<sup>3</sup> Claritudo appears first in the Iugurtha.

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature and Language

Sallust was inspired to write by the Elder Cato,<sup>1</sup> who believed that Roman heroes lacked in fame because they had not found such eloquent eulogists of their glory as the Greeks (Catil. 8). The author's aim however is not merely to confer glory, but also to seek it for himself. In the proems to his Catilina and Iugurtha, Sallust bases his literary identity as a historian on the notion of virtus ('moral energy').<sup>2</sup> In old Roman thought, virtus and gloria<sup>3</sup> were closely connected. 'Intellectual activities' in Republican Rome were limited to politics. Sallust transferred this notion to the literary sphere, since the present, overshadowed by the Triumvirs Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus, could not offer any satisfactory possibilities for the display of civic virtus (Iug. 3). Sallust's personal desire for glory found fulfillment in a new form, writing.

This outlook, emphasizing authorship as a cultural achievement, was supplemented by a corresponding emphasis on the effect of writing on the mind of the hearer. The memoria rerum gestarum (Iug. 4. 1) produces a fiery enthusiasm for virtus and gloria. In this regard historical writing may be compared with the portraits of Roman ancestors (Iug. 4. 5-6). This means that Sallust, in his own opinion, was certainly a pioneer in the aesthetics of literary achievement. But in his view of the effect of his writing, he remained profoundly indebted to the traditional categories of conventional thought found among his readers.

There was one point however where Sallust made no concessions. He was well aware that readers would believe only what seemed possible or attainable to their own limited capabilities (Catil. 3. 2). But he ignored this limitation and pursued what he recognized as correct, without regard to the effect of the moment.<sup>4</sup>

He also strove to avoid partisanship, although he never discussed the difficulty of discovering the facts. This means that his work is not exempt from errors owed to ignorance or superficiality.

On the other hand, he was particularly concerned with matching

---

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 21-32.

<sup>2</sup> Similarly, in the prologue to the Panegyricus, Isocrates establishes the priority of eloquence over athletics.

<sup>3</sup> On gloria: U. KNOCHÉ 1934; V. PÖSCHL 1940; A. D. LEEMAN 1949.

<sup>4</sup> W. SUERBAUM 1974.

the importance of his topics with the corresponding level of language and style: facta dictis exaequanda, 'the style and diction must be equal to the deeds recorded' (Catil. 3. 2).<sup>1</sup> He recognized his duty to use language filled with dignity and significance, and measured his presentation by its object.<sup>2</sup> In his avoidance of political clichés, in his recognition that words have often lost their real meaning, the author and the moralist meet. In Cato's speech (Catil. 52. 11) we are told, in reference to Caesar's words on leniency: 'long ago we have lost the real names of things' (vera vocabula rerum; cf. Thuc. 3. 82. 4).<sup>3</sup>

To give away the property of others is called 'generosity', destructive temerity becomes 'bravery'. The devaluation of language is a symptom of political decadence (Catil. 52. 11). All the honors reserved for virtus are now claimed by ambitio (52. 22). This thought is developed further in the Histories (1. 12). 'Senate' and 'people' are honorable pretexts for lust for personal power (cf. hist. 3. 48. 11). Even the terms 'good' and 'bad' have changed their meaning. The criterion for 'goodness' is no longer service to the state but wealth, unjustified power and defense of the existing state of affairs. His warning against using fine words as a consolation for dictatorial power is remarkable: no one should call 'tranquillity' (otium) what in reality is slavery (seruitium, hist. 3. 48. 13). Sallust even assails the misuse of dignitas and libertas to cover caprice and selfishness (Iug. 41. 5). It is difficult here not to think of Caesar. To the fact that words have lost their full sense corresponds the reality of the degradation of public offices. It is at this point that Sallust's concerns with language and literature make contact with his moral criteria. It is this analogy which is behind his purpose in equating literary achievement with service to the state (cf. Iug. 4. 3-4). In the Catilina Sallust still grants priority to political activity, but in the Iugurtha he delivers an annihilating verdict on contemporary politics (Jug. 3 and 4). In the proem to the Iugurtha, greater emphasis is placed on the independence of the spirit, although spirit, in Roman fashion, remains linked with virtus.

<sup>1</sup> A. D. LEEMAN, Sallusts Prologe und seine Auffassung von der Historiographie, in: R. KLEIN, ed., Das Staatsdenken der Römer, Darmstadt 1966, 472-499, refers (p. 480 note 15) to the source in Diodorus' Prologue 1. 2. 7 συμφωνούντων ἐν αὐτῇ τῶν λόγων τοῖς ἔργοις (Ephoros) which ultimately goes back to Isocrates, Paneg. 4. 13 (χαλεπὸν ἐστὶν ἴσους τοὺς λόγους τῷ μεγέθει τῶν ἔργων ἐξευρεῖν) (s. now LEEMAN, Form 77-97). Yet LEEMAN rightly emphasizes that Sallust's meaning is different from that of Isocrates: cf. also H. HOMMEL, Die Bildkunst des Tacitus, Würzburger Studien 9, 1936, 116-148.

<sup>2</sup> W. BLOCH 1971, 72; on this W. SUERBAUM 1974.

<sup>3</sup> A comparison with the more ontological arguments of Thucydides is given by K. BÜCHNER, Vera vocabula rerum amisimus, in: Hommages à R. SCHILLING (ed. H. ZEHACKER and G. HENTZ), Paris 1983, 253-261.

In his proems Sallust pursued what for his Roman readers were quite novel thoughts. The employment of such proems to justify his literary activity is reminiscent of Terence.<sup>1</sup>

Ideas II

Sallust's relationship to philosophy in general has been touched upon in the discussion of his sources. Here, particular attention may be paid to his understanding of history. As a pragmatic historian, he aims to explain in events quo consilio, quaque ratione gesta essent.<sup>2</sup> For Sallust, history is conditioned not merely by rational laws but also by psychological and moral factors. This explains his descriptions of character, his speeches, his political digressions and his gnomic generalizations.<sup>3</sup> We will now discuss in sequence the so-called 'gradual darkening' of his view of history; the role of personality and virtus; the question of bias; the link between his work and its period; and the mutual relationship between internal and external political events.

Did Sallust's picture of history 'darken'? To answer this question we must look not only to the proems, since their prime task is to explain Sallust's approach to his own writing. More important—beginning with the archaiologia in the Catilina—are the digressions in which general developments at Rome are criticized. In the Catilina an original phase is presupposed, a time at which morality was taken for granted (Catil. 2. 1; 9. 1). The 'key year' for the beginning of moral decline at Rome was the destruction of Carthage (Catil. 10). It was under Sulla that the steepest collapse occurred (Catil. 11. 4–11. 8).<sup>4</sup> In the Iugurtha (41) the destruction of Carthage likewise marks the turning point, but earlier it was only the fear of enemies that produced good political conduct. In the Histories, however, there is actually a basic discord vitio humani ingenii (frig. 1. 7 M.). Roman morals

<sup>1</sup> To this extent Quintilian (inst. 3. 8. 9) is right: nihil ad historiam pertinentibus principiis: cf. A. D. LEEMAN, cited above, antepenultimate footnote.

<sup>2</sup> Sempronius Asellio, c. 125 B.C., apud Gell. 5. 18. 8.

<sup>3</sup> Williams, Tradition 619–633.

<sup>4</sup> The hotly discussed question of the chronological order governing the intrusion of avaritia and ambitio into public life (Catil. 10. 1 and 11. 3) is best examined by K. VRETSKA (Comm., vol. 1, p. 213).

were good only at the beginning of the Republic and between the Second and Third Punic Wars, and even then only out of fear of powerful enemies. Injustice and disharmony existed in Rome from the very beginning. This means that now the picture of the early days is diametrically opposed to that of the Catilina (hist. 1. 18), since originally it was merely the right of the stronger that prevailed. Sallust increasingly distances himself from the Roman belief in man's natural goodness. In his view it is man's task in history to overcome human nature by moral action.

Sallust assigns the decisive place in history to personality and to its intellectual and moral achievement. The animus is the guide of our life (Iug. 1. 3). Its deeds (ingeni facinora) are immortal (Iug. 2. 2). The historian's closeness to Plato here should be neither overemphasized nor wholly ignored. The thesis of the preeminence of the animus is central, although Sallust is no philosopher. But we must take his word for it that, though he is a layman in philosophy, he is in earnest about the application of this principle. Yet he subordinates it to an unphilosophical end, fame. Animus proceeds along the path of virtus towards gloria (Iug. 1. 3). What matters is virtus, not 'all-powerful' chance, which is called mistress of all things,<sup>1</sup> and yet incapable of either bestowing or taking away virtus.<sup>2</sup> Hence, for example, the achievement of Marius is seriously impaired by the fact that on certain occasions he owed his victories to chance (e.g. Iug. 94. 7 sic forte conrecta Mari temeritas gloriam ex culpa invenit, 'thus Marius' rashness was made good by fortune and gained glory through an error of judgment'). It is in this light that we should see the mutual relationship between fortuna and virtus. As soon as virtus wanes, fortuna begins her mad reign. Their relationship therefore is complementary (e.g. Catil. 10. 1). In the central passages of the work, fortuna is the counterpart to virtus, though at times this notion is used in a less loaded fashion (e.g. Catil. 2. 4-6).<sup>3</sup> At the side of fortuna there are also other opposing forces. Sallust's own time is basically disinclined to virtus, something that could provide occasion for a tragic interpretation of the period. Certainly Sallust takes into account the mechanism of war and internal politics, but for him the free decision of the individual is paramount. His ethical perspective prevents him from overestimating superficial success. State offices, for example, are in his eyes not impressive as such. Rather, they receive their value from the virtus of their holder (Jug. 4. 8).<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Sed profecto fortuna in omni re dominatur: ea res cunctas ex lubricitate magis quam ex vero celebrat obscuratque (Catil. 8. 1).

<sup>2</sup> D. C. EARL 1966, 111: 'Sallust's political thought . . . centres on a concept of virtus as the functioning of ingenium to achieve egregia facinora, and thus to win gloria, through bonae artes.'

<sup>3</sup> On fortuna: G. SCHWEICHER, Schicksal und Glück in den Werken Sallusts, diss. Köln 1963; E. TIFFOU, Essai de la pensée morale de Salluste à la lumière de ses prologues, Paris 1974, esp. pp. 49-50; 380-383; idem, Salluste et la fortuna, Phoenix 31, 1977, 349-360; H. A. GÄRTNER, Erzählformen bei Sallust, Historia 35, 1986, 449-473; C. NEUMEISTER 1986 (see bibl.).

Is Sallust pursuing a particular political program? On the one hand, he selects the Jugurthine War 'because then the first opposition was raised to the pride of the nobility' (Jug. 5. 1). But on the other, he emphasises his lack of partisanship (Catil. 4. 2), and does not suppress even weaknesses shown by the populares and homines novi (e.g. Jug. 4. 7; 92-94; 63. 6; 64. 5). They too were concerned only with personal advantage.

Is he prejudiced in favor of Caesar? Undoubtedly he attempts to rescue his benefactor from the suspicion of complicity in the so-called 'first Catilinarian conspiracy'. Caesar's and Cato's speeches are full of surprises. Caesar appears as the representative of legality. He champions philosophical ('Epicurean') ideas and, in the fashion of Cato the Elder, even appeals to the ancestors, arguing generally in the style of the latter's Speech for the Rhodians. Sallust's portrait of Caesar is drawn wholly in retrospect. It contains features which were only later visible in full.

The Younger Cato might have been assailed as doctrinaire. On the contrary, in Sallust he is a practical, energetic statesman. His ideas are precisely those which Sallust himself supports in his proems and digressions; and it is Cato who in Sallust is given the final word. Even in the well-known comparison ('synkrisis'), it is he who appears almost in a more favorable light than Caesar.<sup>2</sup> Sallust indeed goes so far as to allow Catiline to appeal to his dignitas (Catil. 35. 3; 4), just as Caesar was to do when invading Italy. Cato criticizes the Caesarian variety of mansuetudo et misericordia (Catil. 52. 11 and 27). Could Caesar and Cato together have rescued the Republic? Sallust supplies no answer, content to present their qualities as complementary.<sup>1</sup> The same is true of the heroes of the Jugurthine War.

<sup>1</sup> We had met this important thought earlier in the context of Sallust's 'Thucydidean' criticism of language.

<sup>2</sup> So in particular C. BECKER 1973, esp. 731-742 with bibl.; a different view in K. BÜCHNER, Zur Synkrisis Cato-Caesar in Sallusts Catilina, GB 5, 1976, 37-57, who regards the virtutes of the two speakers as unique in either case.

Sallust's heroes may at times be categorized as variants of Platonic types of constitution and individual.<sup>2</sup> Catiline and Sulla may be seen as tyrannical, Cato as aristocratic, Scaurus as oligarchic, Metellus as timocratic, Marius as democratic. But this proves little about Sallust's dependence on Plato, although a great deal about his ability to draw subtle distinctions between different characters. This makes a good argument against the theory that he is following a particular political program.

His references to Cicero are by no means enthusiastic, although optimus consul need not be meant ironically. A repetition of the well-known speeches against Catiline, already published at that time, would have been pointless, and also would have offended against the conventions of historical writing. Sallust is able to hold in check his antipathy for Cicero and generally aims to avoid partisanship, even if not always with perfect success.<sup>3</sup>

In considering the historian's relationship to his time, we must note that, unlike Livy, Sallust did not dedicate himself to history as an escape from the present. He wrote under the triumvirs, to whom his praise of Cato and his discreet recognition of Cicero could not have been welcome. Moreover, in allowing Caesar to express opposition to proscriptions, anger and bloodshed (Catil. 51. 32–36), he was actually playing Caesar against the Caesarians: potest alio tempore, alio consule, quoi item exercitus in manu sit, falsum aliquid pro vero credi, 'it is possible that at another time, when someone else is consul and is likewise in command of an army, some falsehood may be believed to be true' (51. 36). Sallust was not satisfied with projecting into his picture of Catiline Sulla's negative features. He employed the person of Cato the Younger, along with the language of the Elder, to expose the weaknesses of oligarchy, a problem that in his day was once again relevant.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Tacitus unites in his Agricola, with the aid of allusions to Sallust, features of both men: M. LAUSBERG, Caesar und Cato im Agricola des Tacitus, Gymnasium 87, 1980, 411–430.

<sup>2</sup> B. D. MACQUEEN 1981.

<sup>3</sup> A theory of his tendentiousness is found in E. LEFÈVRE, *Argumentation und Struktur der moralischen Geschichtsschreibung der Römer am Beispiel von Sallusts *Bellum Jugurthinum, Gymnasium 86, 1979, 249–277.

<sup>4</sup> On the question of echoes of Sallust's own time in his work, s. G. PERL, Sallust und die Krise der römischen Republik, Philologus 113, 1969, 201–216.

War and party strife, the struggle against external enemies and internal debates are closely linked. In the Catilina the enemy comes from within the ranks of society. In the Iugurtha, the enemy himself assails the venality of the city (Iug. 35. 10). The motif of 'corruption' serves to link external and internal political events.

In the Iugurtha the great speeches and the excursus on the parties reveal the problems of internal politics. Similarly in the Histories, after a retrospective introduction, the speech put by the historian in the mouth of the consul Lepidus (1. 55) establishes a weighty emphasis on internal politics at the very beginning.

At the start of the Bellum Iugurthinum, Sallust explains that he is narrating this war both because of its military significance and because it witnessed the first opposition to the pride of the nobility, a struggle which led finally to the Civil War and the devastation of Italy. In fact, the question of one's attitude towards Jugurtha became in those years a touchstone even for domestic Roman relationships. The fact that events domi bellique were related in this way lends to the work its inner unity. Sallust spares neither the self-interested factio of the optimates nor the people stirred up by the tribunes, guided more by hatred of the mighty than by concern for public welfare (40. 3), and inclined to unrestrained arrogance just like the nobility. The responsibility for the collapse of political order lies at the doors of both parties.

A positive counter-theme is supplied by concordia. It stands as a norm everywhere in the background of the narrative of the collapse. Micipsa gives clear expression to the thought in the speech he makes to his sons: concordia parvae res crescunt, discordia maxumae dilabuntur, 'harmony makes small states great, while discord undermines the mightiest empires' (Iug. 10. 6).

Sallust's concentration towards the end of the Iugurtha on Marius and Sulla, rather than on the Numidian king, allows us to recognize that we are not concerned with an individual tragedy. The author's view extends to the whole picture.

Sallust does more than present the moral universe. Increasingly, he gives consideration to the external theater offered by the cosmos. In the Histories there are numerous geographical digressions, illustrating the mutual interaction between the external expansion of the empire and the inner tensions of Roman society. This double theme is already felt in the Iugurtha, and even more in the Histories. Only if both aspects are taken with equal seriousness is there the hope of understanding Sallust's purpose in all its significance.

Transmission

The numerous medieval manuscripts of the monographs (Catilina and Iugurtha) may be divided into two classes: the complete, although stereotyped, integri,<sup>1</sup> and the somewhat more valuable mutili,<sup>2</sup> which show a lacuna from Iug. 103. 2 to 112. 3. According to A. W. Ahlberg<sup>3</sup> both may be traced to an identical archetype which existed in antiquity, although this conclusion is not unchallenged. The edition by A. Kurfess relies exclusively on the work of R. Zimmermann,<sup>4</sup> who evaluated the ancient secondary tradition (esp. Fronto, Gellius and Augustine) and the integri recentiores. In succession after him, most recently C. Santini and S. Schierling have tried to prove the value of these two types of transmission.<sup>5</sup>

The pseudo-Sallustian Invective is transmitted in two classes, whose oldest representatives are the Gudianus Guelferbytanus 335 (10th century) and Harleianus 2716 (9th century).

Four speeches and two letters from the Histories are preserved in Vaticanus Latinus 3864 (9th–10th century), along with the speeches and letters from the monographs and the (disputed) Letters to Caesar. Some larger fragments of the Histories are found in the remains of an old manuscript (4th–5th century): Fragmentum Berolinense, Vaticanum, Fragmenta Aurelianensia. We also possess two small papyrus fragments from the 2nd to 3rd centuries<sup>6</sup> and about 500 quotations in ancient authors.

The orthography of Sallust's text appears to have been partly 'normalized' during late antiquity, but during the time of the archaists the reverse may also have happened. For this reason no old-fashioned forms should be 'restored'.

<sup>1</sup> Leidensis Vossianus Latinus 73 (1; 11th century), Parisinus Latinus 6086 (n; 11th century), Monacensis Latinus 14477 (m; 11th century); cf. now F. CARPANELLI, Ricerche filologiche su un codice sallustiano (Vat. Lat. 3327) non ancora esplorato, Prometheus 10, 1984, 147–153.

<sup>2</sup> Parisinus Latinus 16024 (P; 9th–10th century); Parisinus Latinus 16025 (A; 9th century) and 6085 (C; 10th–11th century), Palatinus Latinus 887 (K; 10th–11th century), and Palatinus Latinus 889 (N; 11th century), Berolinensis Latinus 205 (H; 11th century); with lacuna supplied later: Vaticanus Latinus 3325 (R; 12th century) and Parisinus Latinus 10195 (D; 11th century); Parisinus Latinus 5748 (O; 11th century).

<sup>3</sup> Prolegomena in Sallustium, Göteborg 1911.

<sup>4</sup> Der Sallusttext im Altertum, München 1929.

<sup>5</sup> C. SANTINI, Un codice sallustiano a Perugia GIF 32, 1980, 55–64; S. SCHIERLING, New Evidence for Diomedes in Two Passages of Sallust, Hermes 113, 1985, 255–256.—On the secondary transmission via Augustine s. now: M. CAGNETTA, Il Sallustio di Agostino, QS 11, 1985, no. 22, 151–160.

<sup>6</sup> C. H. ROBERTS, ed., Catalogue of the Greek and Latin Papyri in the John Rylands Library, Manchester, vol. 3, 1938: Theological and Literary Texts (nos. 457–551), esp. 473; cf. A. KURFESS, edition, pp. 179–181.

Influence

The censorious tone of Sallust's writings challenged comparison with the author's way of life. This already began with critical utterances on the part of Pompeius Lenaeus, a freedman of Pompey the Great, and the so-called invective against Sallust. Naturally, optimate prejudice played its part here. Lactantius, the 'Christian Cicero', quote Sallust's remark about the dominant role of the mind and the subservience of the body (Catil. 1. 2) while commenting: 'True enough, if he had lived in the way he spoke' (inst. 2. 12. 12, p. 157, 16 Brandt). The pagans of late antiquity show no more leniency in their judgments, for example Symmachus, epist. 5. 68 (66). 2. Macrobius is annihilating (sat. 3. 13. 9): 'Sallust, the stern critic and censor of others' extravagance.' Even in the 18th century, the force of this criticism was still felt, although now Sallust also found defenders, who included C. M. Wieland: 'We know very little about his life. Let us therefore leave the question open and be content with what he has left us.'<sup>1</sup>

In the sphere of literature in the broadest sense Sallust has provided stimulus at every period.<sup>2</sup> Yet, even as a stylist, at first he encountered misunderstanding. Livy distanced himself from the use of archaisms (apud Sen. contr. 9. 1. 14). Asinius Pollio (apud Suet. gramm. 10; Gell. 10. 26. 1) criticized his imitation of Cato, as did the epigrammatist cited in Quintilian (inst. 8. 3. 29). The historian Pompeius Trogus censured the introduction of speeches into historical work (apud Iust. 38. 3. 11), although this remark is equally applicable to Livy and practically the whole of ancient historical writing.

From the time of Velleius Paterculus (2. 36. 2), who imitated him,<sup>3</sup> and Quintilian (inst. 10. 1. 101), Sallust has rightly been recognized as aemulus Thucydidis. Scholars like Valerius Probus and Aemilius Asper studied his language. Quintilian also recommended him as reading for advanced students (inst. 2. 5. 19). Martial called him the first

<sup>1</sup> C. M. Wieland, Briefe und Satiren des Horaz aus dem Lateinischen übersetzt und mit Einleitungen und erläuternden Anmerkungen versehen, ed. M. FUHRMANN, in: C. M. Wieland, Werke in 12 Bänden, vol. 9, Frankfurt 1986, 642; Wielands Gesammelte Schriften, Akademie-Ausgabe 2, 4, ed. P. STACHEL, Berlin 1913, 433.

<sup>2</sup> On the question of reception: A. LA PENNA, Il Bellum Civile di Petronio e il proemio delle Historiae di Sallustio, RFIC 113, 1985, 170-173; E. RAWSON, Sallust on the Eighties?, CQ 81, n.s. 37, 1987, 163-180 (on Lucan).

<sup>3</sup> A. J. WOODMAN, Sallustian Influence on Velleius Paterculus, in: J. BIBAUW, ed., Hommages à M. Renard, Bruxelles 1969, vol. 1, 785-799.

Roman historian (14. 191) and Suetonius, in the De viris illustribus, treated him first among the Roman historians.<sup>1</sup> Sallust found successors at first in the otherwise little known historian L. Arruntius (Sen. epist. 114. 17–19), and then in Tacitus, who called Sallust rerum Romanarum florentissimus auctor, ‘the most brilliant historian of Rome’ (ann. 3. 30. 1). The archaists set a high value on him. Fronto imitated him in his Eulogy of Verus. Gellius (9. 14. 26) also praised his fides in the Iugurtha, and attests (18. 4. 1) the frequency of interpreters of Sallust to be seen in the streets of the day.

Silius Italicus exploited Sallust’s geographical digressions; Vibius Maximus (about 100) combined Sallust and Livy into a world chronicle. Plutarch used Sallust’s Histories in his Lives of Sertorius and Lucullus. Zenobius translated Sallust into Greek; he also figured among the sources of Ammianus. Grammarians liked to quote him.

In rhetorical schools he was read as an orator. Influences from these schools led the Church Fathers towards study of his content. Sallust’s interpretation of history preoccupied Minucius Felix.<sup>2</sup> His presentation of the causes of Roman decline was noted by Augustine, to whom we owe essential fragments of the proem to the Histories.<sup>3</sup> Like Jerome, Augustine praised not merely Sallust’s rhetorical qualities,<sup>4</sup> but also his devotion to truth,<sup>5</sup> which formed the basis of the historian’s authority in the Middle Ages (Isid. orig. 13. 21. 10).

In the Middle Ages, Sallust was frequently read in school. His stylistic influence may be detected already in the 9th century. In the 10th, Widukind sought guidance from him, as well as from Tacitus and Livy. Wipo followed Sallust’s example in inserting speeches into his history. Bruno (De Bello Saxonico) presented Henry IV, in the vein of Sallust’s portrait of Catiline, as a vicious man, who however was militiae laboribusque indefatigabilis, ‘untiring in hardship and warfare’. Petrarch, following Augustine, viewed Sallust as nobilitate (= ae) veritatis historicus, ‘a historian, highly renowned for his truthfulness’ (Rerum memorandarum libri 1. 17).

<sup>1</sup> G. FUNAIOLI RE 1 A 2, 1920, col. 1949.

<sup>2</sup> K. BÜCHNER, Drei Beobachtungen zu Minucius Felix, Hermes 82, 1954, 231–245.

<sup>3</sup> Aug. civ. 2. 18; 3. 17; 3. 21; 5. 12.

<sup>4</sup> Jerome epist. 132. 6 CSEL 56, p. 230; Aug. epist. 167. 2. 6 CSEL 44, p. 593.

<sup>5</sup> Nobilitatae veritatis historicus Aug. civ. 1. 5 (a critical interpretation of the passage of Augustine is found in E. GALLICET, Sallustius, nobilitate veritatis historicus, CCC 6, 1985, 309–330); auctor certissimus: Jerome De situ et nominibus locorum Hebraeorum, in P. DE LAGARDE, Onomastica sacra, Göttingen 1887, no. 117, 12.

In the early modern period, ancient authors were viewed as teachers of the conduct of life, and therefore also of politics. Sallust did more than serve as a model for new historical works.<sup>1</sup> When read 'against the grain', the Catilina became in the Renaissance a textbook of revolution.<sup>2</sup> Inspired by the revolution of 1848, Henrik Ibsen gave to the character of Catiline a new dramatic interpretation, while shortly after the revolution of 1917 the lyric poet Alexander Blok wrote an important essay on Catiline.<sup>3</sup>

The theory that Sallust was a political partisan seems never to have been formulated in antiquity. In modern times it was represented by Paulus Benius Eugubinus,<sup>4</sup> and then, for example, by Theodor Mommsen and Eduard Schwartz.

Finally, this master of style and form inspired great authors in the last years of the 19th century. Friedrich Nietzsche declared: 'My feeling for style, for the epigram as style, was awakened almost in a moment by contact with Sallust . . . concise, severe, with as much substance as possible within it, a cold rejection of 'fine words' and also of 'fine feeling'—in that I recognized myself.'<sup>5</sup> Hugo von Hofmannsthal said: 'And from Sallust there flowed into me in those happy, animated days, as through channels never choked, the recognition of form, of that deep, true inner form, which can only be apprehended on the far side of the fence of rhetorical artistry: a form of which it may no longer be said that it gives order to content, since it penetrates content, absorbs it, producing poetry and truth together, a tension of eternal forces, something as glorious as music and algebra.'<sup>6</sup>

Sallust's achievement is both unique and epoch-making. In the

---

<sup>1</sup> B. ORICELLARIUS, De bello Italico commentarius ex authentici manuscripti apographo nunc primum in lucem editus, London 1724; A. POLIZIANO, Commentarium Pactianae coniurationis, printed at Basel in 1553. Marginal notes by Politian are found in an edition of Sallust from 1477 (Vicenza): A. J. HUNT, Three New Incunables with Marginalia by Politian, Rinascimento 24, 1984, 251–259; Leonardo Bruni's political thought and literary style were reminiscent of Sallust as well.

<sup>2</sup> J. BURCKHARDT, Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien, repr. of original edition, ed. by K. HOFFMANN, Stuttgart 1985, 43.

<sup>3</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 38–57.

<sup>4</sup> De historia libri quattuor, Venetiis 1611; In Sallustii Catilinarium commentarii . . . His additur Iugurthinum Bellum, Venetiis 1622.

<sup>5</sup> Was ich den Allen verdanke, Werke, ed. by K. SCHLECHTA, Darmstadt 1973, vol. 2, 1027.

<sup>6</sup> H. von Hofmannsthal, Gesammelte Werke in Einzelausgaben, Prosa II, ed. H. STEINER, Frankfurt and Wien 1951, Ein Brief (from P. Lord Chandos to Francis Bacon), pp. 7–22, esp. p. 9.

Catilina he created a new literary style. As a work of history, the book reveals weaknesses. The significance of Catiline's character is exaggerated, and the historian accepts without question Cicero's picture of the revolutionary. Yet Sallust's analysis of political relations, in spite of its moralizing tone, is not wholly mistaken. The dominance of wealth, the resulting rapacity and unscrupulousness of impoverished aristocrats, the substitution for lawful political debate of amicitia and factio, the perversion of honorable strife for public office, honors and fame into a conspiracy against the public weal: all this is a devastating diagnosis of the shape of events following Sulla, with burning relevance to the contemporary, and to the return of civil war, proscription and despotism.<sup>1</sup>

Sallust's later works deployed this picture on a larger scale. The Jugurthine War appears to anticipate the confrontation between Marius and Sulla and the latter's dictatorship (bellum and vastitas Italiae). The background—militiae et domi—is filled with life and adapted to give a picture of the interaction of events. Already the Jugurthine War acted as the measure of the progress of a sickness, of the collapse of political style within the res publica. Sallust emphasizes the theme of corruption, since it shows the mutual dependence of external and internal events. Finally, the Histories develop the same problem on a world-wide scale.

The division within the res publica is also evinced by the failure of individual virtus to benefit the whole except to an imperfect degree. As early as the Catilina, in the figures of Caesar and Cato, complementary aspects of virtus diverge and are left in isolation. This is made even clearer in the Jugurtha, where the state as a whole decays, although personalities such as the 'timocratic' Metellus and the 'democratic' Marius, considered in themselves, perform remarkable individual achievements. But there is no Micipsa to advise unity, and even if there had been, he would have found no audience.

In recent years almost more painstaking attention has been given to the disputed subordinate works (the Invective and the Letters to Caesar) than to those certainly genuine. There is no first class edition of the monographs, and the Histories, Sallust's most mature work, continue to be neglected. A stronger emphasis on Sallust's later work would give to our picture of the first great Roman historian the universality and breadth appropriate to his importance.

<sup>1</sup> R. SYME 1964, 138.

Appendix Sallustiana

The Invective against Cicero is twice cited by Quintilian as a work of Sallust (inst. 4. 1. 68; 9. 3. 89). The fictitious date is autumn 54 B.C., but at that time Sallust, as a fledgling quaestor, was hardly in a position to make such an assault on a famous consular, and there are also evident anachronisms.<sup>1</sup> The little work is not without merit, and may be considered a rhetorical prosopopoeia from the Augustan period.<sup>2</sup>

The Letters to Caesar

These two letters are preserved anonymously<sup>3</sup> from antiquity in Vaticanus Latinus 3864 (V; 9th–10th century). They are not arranged in accordance with their fictitious dates, since the first letter implies the year 48 (or 46?) B.C. and certainly falls after the Battle of Pharsalus and the murder of Pompey, while the second letter claims to be older (around 50 B.C.). Even so, the 2nd letter seems to imitate the 1st and to expand upon it. This shows that the two letters come from different authors and that at least one of them must be spurious.

The pronounced Sallustian language is no proof of authenticity—quite the reverse. It is more adapted to historical than to epistolary style, and in any case this language was only fashioned by the historian several years later specifically for his historical writing.<sup>4</sup> The imitation is indeed ‘obtrusively’ Sallustian. In fact, collocations like pravae artes and malae libidines are exaggerated and un-Sallustian. Non peius videtur (1. 8. 8) is a jarring Graecism. Principally, however, many elements which appear for the first time in late Sallust are already completely present in these allegedly early works. The Epistulae are a patchwork of Sallustian phrases.

<sup>1</sup> G. JACHMANN, Die Invektive gegen Cicero, Miscellanea Berolinensia 2, 1, 1950, 235–275; R. G. M. NISBET, The Invectiva in Ciceronem and Epistula secunda of Pseudo-Sallust, JRS 48, 1958, 30–32; recent work on the Appendix Sallustiana is discussed by C. NEUMEISTER 1986, esp. 51–55.

<sup>2</sup> R. SYME 1964, 314–318; similarly now L. CANFORA, Altri riferimenti ai poemi ciceroniani nell’Invectiva in Ciceronem, Ciceroniana 5, 1984, 101–109.

<sup>3</sup> The ascription to Sallust is a hypothesis of the late Middle Ages. Doubts about genuineness were expressed from J. Lipsius on. Comprehensive arguments in favor of Sallustian origin are offered by W. STEIDLE 1958, 95–104; K. BÜCHNER 1982, 2nd ed., epilogue 470–472.

<sup>4</sup> Linguistic criteria intended to illumine the question of originality (stylometry) have been developed in different studies by E. SKARD. A comprehensive criticism of them in K. THRAEDE 1978.

In the manner of the proem to the Catilina (3. 3), at the beginning of the second letter allusion is made to the early stages of Sallust's political career as if they were already past history. But in 50 B.C. this would be absurd. In 2. 9. 4, M. Favonius appears to be considered among the nobiles, to whom he did not in fact belong. Caesar, in a way quite inappropriate at that date, is addressed as imperator (2. 6. 6; 12. 1). Neither the flattering picture given of Sulla, nor the negative one of Cato fits the period. The second letter, contradicting its own fictional date, presupposes Caesar's absolute power, that is, his war and victory. That he alone could organize the state is something unthinkable for that time, and there must be an anachronism. The demand for secret voting in the senate sounds odd in the Republican period, and the request for that body's enlargement is out of place in 50 B.C.<sup>1</sup> The self-presentation of the author as a man unconcerned with arma and equi is odd in the Republican period and the gloomy threat of madness (2. 12. 6) adds to the confusion. But there are greater things in store. The author of the 2nd letter (2. 9. 2) copies the Invective (3) and makes it even more 'Sallustian'.

The 1st letter is less absurd. But it too presupposes Caesar's absolute power and speaks of him as imperator. It is just as full of artificial turns, and is composed in the style which Sallust was to create only later for his historical works.

Editions: VINDELINUS DE SPIRA, Venetiis (fol.) 1470 and Parisiis (4°) 1470. * J. C. ROLFE (TTrN), London 1921. * A. KURFESS, Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1957, repr. 1992. * W. EISENHUT, J. LINDAUER (TTr), Darmstadt 1985. * A. LAMBERT (Tr), Zürich 1978. * L. D. REYNOLDS (T), Oxford 1991. * Catil.: K. VRETSKA (C), Heidelberg 1976. * P. MCGUSHIN (C), Leiden 1977. * J. T. RAMSEY (TC), Atlanta 1984. * Cf. also: H. DREXLER, Die catilinarische Verschwörung.

<sup>1</sup> On the problems, now s. C. VIRLOUVET, Le sénat dans la seconde Lettre de Salluste à César, in: C. NICOLET, ed., Des ordres à Rome, Paris 1984, 101–141. On the general question of 'appropriateness to the period' cf. the account of recent scholarship in C. NEUMEISTER 1986, esp. 53–54. An attempt to identify the writer of the letters with a member of the Symmachus circle is made by L. CANFORA, Crispus Sallustius autore delle Suasorie ad Caesarem senem?, Index 9, 1980, 25–32. Scholarship in recent decades can register great progress in the study of the Epistulae. The reasons leading the present author to continue to doubt their authenticity, in agreement with R. SYME and others, have been stated here, but he remains open to argument; s. now: W. SCHMID, Frühschriften Sallusts im Horizont des Gesamtwerks, Neustadt 1993.

Ein Quellenheft, Darmstadt 1976. * Iug.: E. KÖSTERMANN (C), Heidelberg 1971. * L. WATKISS (C), London 1971. * G. M. PAUL (C), Liverpool 1984. * J. R. HAWTHORN (TN), Chicago 1984. * hist.: B. MAURENBRECHER (TC), 2 vols., Leipzig 1891; 1893 (repr. 1967). * V. PALADINI, Orationes et epistulae de Historiarum libris excerptae (TTr), Bologna 2nd ed. 1968. * O. LEGGEWIE (TTr), Stuttgart 1975. * P. MCGUSHIN (TrC), 2 vols., Oxford 1992; 1994. * Appendix Sallustiana: A. KURFESS, vol. 1 (rep.), Lipsiae 6th ed. 1962; vol. 2 (in Tull.) 4th ed. 1962. ** Indices, lexica: A. W. BENNETT, Index verborum Sallustianus, Hildesheim 1970. * O. EICHERT, Vollständiges Wörterbuch zu den Geschichtswerken des C. Sallustius Crispus (Catilina, Jugurtha und Reden und Briefe aus den Historien), Hannover 4th ed. 1890; repr. 1973. * J. RAPSCH, D. NAJOCK, Concordantia Sallustiana, Hildesheim 1991. * E. SKARD, Index verborum, quae exhibent Sallustii Epistulae ad Caesarem, Oslo 1930. ** Bibl.: A. D. LEEMAN, A Systematical Bibliography of Sallust (1879–1964), Leiden 1965. * C. BECKER, Sallust, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 720–754. * K. BÜCHNER, Sallust, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1982 (epilogue to the 2nd ed.: 465–489). * L. DI SALVO, Studi sulle Historiae di Sallustio (1969–1982), BStudLat 13, 1983, 40–58. * C. NEUMEISTER, Neue Tendenzen und Ergebnisse der Sallustforschung (1961–1981), Gymnasium 93, 1986, 51–68 (including the discussion of authenticity).

W. AVENARIUS, Sallust und der rhetorische Schulunterricht, RIL 89–90, 1956, 343–352. * W. AVENARIUS, Die griechischen Vorbilder des Sallust, SO 33, 1957, 48–86. * C. BECKER, Sallust, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 720–754. * H. BLOCH, The Structure of Sallust's Historiae. The Evidence of the Fleury Manuscript, in: Didascaliae. FS A. M. ALBAREDA, New York 1961, 59–76. * W. BLOCH, Bedeutungszusammenhänge und Bedeutungsverschiebungen als inhaltliche Stilmittel bei Sallust, Bern 1971. * E. BOLAFFI, Sallustio e la sua fortuna nei secoli, Roma 1949. * K. BÜCHNER, Der Aufbau von Sallusts Bellum Jugurthinum, Wiesbaden 1953. * K. BÜCHNER, Sallust, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1982. * L. CANFORA, Il programma di Sallustio, Belfagor 27, 1972, 137–148. * J.-P. CHAUSSERIE-LAPRÉE, L'expression narrative chez les historiens latins, Paris 1969. * A. DIHLE, Zu den Epistulae ad Caesarem, MH 11, 1954, 126–130. * D. C. EARL, The Political Thought of Sallust, Cambridge 1961, repr. 1966. * B. EDMAR, Studien zu den Epistulae ad Caesarem senem, Lund 1931. * F. EGERMANN, Die Prooemien zu den Werken des Sallust, SAWW 214, 3, Wien 1932. * D. FLACH, Die Vorrede zu Sallusts Historien in neuer Rekonstruktion, Philologus 117, 1973, 76–86. * G. B. A. FLETCHER, On Sallust's Bellum Catilinae, Latomus 40, 1981, 580–588. * F. GIANCOTTI, Strutture delle monografie di Sallustio e di Tacito, Messina 1971. * K. HELDMANN, Sallust über die römische Weltherrschaft, Stuttgart 1993. * J. HELLEGOUARC'H, Le vocabulaire latin des relations et des partis politiques sous la république, Paris 1963, 2nd ed. 1972. * B. HESSEN, Der historische Infinitiv im Wandel der Darstellungstechnik Sallusts, Frankfurt 1984. * E. HÖHNE, Die Geschichte des Sallusttextes im Altertum, diss. München 1927. * F. KLINGNER, Über die Einleitung der Historien Sallusts, Hermes 63, 1928, 165–192; repr. in: KLINGNER, Studien 571–593 and in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., Sallust (s. below), 1–30. * U. KNOCH, Der römische Ruhmesgedanke, Philologus 89, 1934, 102–124 = Vom Selbstverständnis der Römer, Heidelberg 1962, 13–30. * A. LA PENNA, Per la ricostruzione delle Historiae di Sallustio, SIFC n.s. 35, 1963, 5–68. * A. LA PENNA, Sallustio e la ‘rivoluzione’ romana, Milano 1968. * B. LATTA, Der Wandel in Sallusts Geschichtsauffassung vom Bellum Catilinae zum Bellum Jugurthinum, Maia 40, 1988, 271–288. * B. LATTA, Die Ausgestaltung der Geschichtskonzeption Sallusts. Vom Bellum Jugurthinum zu den Historien, Maia 41, 1989, 41–57. * K. Latte, Sallust, Leipzig 1935; repr. in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., Sallust 401–460. * W. D. LEBEK, Verba prisca. Die Anfänge des Archaisieren in der lateinischen Beredsamkeit und Geschichtsschreibung, Göttingen 1970. * G. LEDWORUSKI, Historiographische Widersprüche in der Monographie Sallusts zur Catilinarischen Verschwörung, diss. Berlin 1992, Frankfurt 1994. * A. D. LEEMAN, Gloria, diss. Leiden 1949 (with a detailed summary in English). * A. D. LEEMAN, Sallusts Prologe und seine Auffassung von der Historiographie, Mnemosyne 7, 1954, 323–339; 8, 1955, 38–48; repr. in: LEEMAN, Form 77–109; also in: R. KLEIN, ed., Das Staatsdenken der Römer, Darmstadt 1966, 472–499. * A. D. LEEMAN, Le genre et le style historique à Rome—Théories et pratique, REL 33, 1955, 183–208. * A. D. LEEMAN, Aufbau und Absicht von Sallusts Bellum Jugurthinum, Amsterdam 1957. * A. D. LEEMAN, Formen sallustischer Geschichtsschreibung, Gymnasium 74, 1967, 108–115; repr. in: LEEMAN, Form 69–76. * B. D. MACQUEEN, Plato’s Republic in the Monographs of Sallust, Chicago 1981. * J. MALITZ, Ambitio mala, Studien zur politischen Biographie des Sallust, Bonn 1975. * W. NIPPEL, Aufruhr und ‘Polizei’ in der römischen Republik, Stuttgart 1988. * R. G. M. NISBET, The Invektiva in Ciceronem and Epistula Secunda of Pseudo-Sallust, JRS 48, 1958, 30–32. * U. PAANANEN, Sallust’s Politico-Social Terminology. Its Use and Biographical Significance, Helsinki 1972. * E. PASOLI, Problemi delle Epistulae ad Caesarem sallustiane, Bologna 1970. * P. PERROCHAT, Les modèles grecs de Salluste, Paris 1949. * V. PÖSCHL, Grundwerte römischer Staatsgesinnung in den Geschichtswerken des Sallust, Berlin 1940. * V. PÖSCHL, ed., Sallust, WdF 94, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1981. * T. F. SCANLON, The Influence of Thucydides on Sallust, Heidelberg 1980. * T. F. SCANLON, Spes frustrata. A Reading of Sallust, Heidelberg 1987. * F. SCHINDLER, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des Sallustbildes, Breslau 1939. * W. SCHUR, Sallust als Historiker, Stuttgart 1934. * O. SEEL, Sallusts Briefe und die pseudo-sallustische Invektive, Nürnberg 1966. * E. SKARD, Sallust und seine Vorgänger, Oslo 1956. * E. SKARD, Zur sprachlichen Entwicklung des Sallust, SO 39, 1964, 13–37. * W. STEIDLE, Sallusts historische Monographien. Themenwahl und Geschichtsbild, Wiesbaden 1958. * W. SUERBAUM, Sallust über die Schwierigkeiten, Geschichte zu schreiben (Catil. 3, 2), in: Gegenwart der Antike, ed. W. HÖRMANN, München 1974, 83–103. * R. SYME, Sallust, Berkeley 1964. * K. THRAEDE, E. SKARDS sprachstatistische Behandlung der Epistulae ad Caesarem senem, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 31, 1978, 179–195. * E. TIFFOU, Essai sur la pensée morale de Salluste à la lumière de ses prologues, Paris 1974. * K. VRETSKA, Studien zu Sallusts Bellum Jugurthinum, SAWW 229, 4, 1955. * E. WISTRAND, Sallust on Juridical Murders in Rome, Stockholm 1968. * R. ZIMMERMANN, Der Sallusttext im Altertum, München 1929.

B. BIOGRAPHY

BIOGRAPHY AT ROME

General Remarks

Biography means 'description of life'.<sup>1</sup> We are not concerned then with a uniform and clearly defined genre showing conformity to particular rules, and this makes it difficult to give biography a definition. It may enjoy literary shape, as in the case of the Agricola of Tacitus and the Bioi of Plutarch. But it may also limit itself to the setting out of material in order. Thus, in Greek scholarship, biographies of poets are published for academic purposes in connection with editions of their works, and biographies of philosophers in doxographic texts, although there are also biographies of poets written in literary style. At Rome, the factual, sober type of biography had predecessors in inscriptions, official records and similar material, while rhetorical biography might recall funeral speeches. Both forms may blend in different degrees.

There are contacts with, and differences from, neighboring genres. Let us first dwell on some points of contact. Both encomia and biographies group achievements according to patterns of behavior (virtues) or types of trial. Both literary portraits and biographies may be incomplete and deploy only certain characteristic individual features. A common type concentrates on an important phase in its subject's life, some central experience such as the recognition of a vocation (e.g. a conversion), or a most critical period (e.g. the end of a life). In the case of important politicians, biography cannot ignore their historical accomplishments.

Differences are found in so far as encomia emphasize political, moral or intellectual achievements, while biographies are concerned with a person's life and therefore may also make mention of negative aspects ('vices'). An author of a literary portrait may find it enough to indicate particular qualities or certain telling incidents, while a biographer should take into account the general lines of a person's life. Historical writing throws the spotlight on public action, while biography stresses personal traits.

---

<sup>1</sup> For a definition cf. BERSCHIN, Biographie 1, 14-21. Autobiography is even more difficult to define satisfactorily.

The three neighboring types of literature mentioned presuppose careful stylistic finish, while this is not necessarily the case in biography (s. 'Literary Technique' below).

Greek Background

Not all societies display an interest in individual personality, and for this reason biography is not developed among all peoples. In Greece, it is a late phenomenon, and its roots were, first, political. For example, an existing or intended interest in personality is connected at times with the rise or spread of monarchical or tyrannical forms of government. Thus, idealizing royal biographies make their appearance. They might be simple eulogy of the ruler, and from the 4th century on, the encomium assumed a fixed shape. But they may be meant to serve, as 'manuals for princes', a pedagogical purpose, the education of the ideal monarch. In both cases, they incorporate concerns which are not purely biographical.<sup>1</sup>

Later, many biographies of Plutarch and Suetonius center around the personalities of rulers, although no longer in a purely encomiastic sense.

A second inspiration for biographical interest is found in philosophy. As intellectual teachers, provoking imitation, great thinkers may be deemed worthy of biographical presentation. The uniqueness of personality was made evident to the Greeks with particular clarity in the case of Socrates. Yet Plato did not write a biography of his master. In his freely conceived Apology, and in his even more freely shaped dialogues, he developed his teacher's suggestions about method with a degree of independence making it almost impossible to distinguish what is Platonic and what is Socratic. Xenophon in his Reminiscences of Socrates took a different, though no less unhistorical, attitude. He was less concerned with scholarly insight than with ethical practice, and in any case his first intention was not to describe his teacher's life. From a literary and technical point of view, this sort of speech and dialogue verges upon drama. Character is presented by way of example in the light of behavior in particular circumstances. This means that there is less concern with the person than with its way of thinking and behaving.

---

<sup>1</sup> Isocrates, Evagoras; Xenophon, Agésilas, Cyropaedia and the obituary of Cyrus (anab. 1. 9).

Later biographies of philosophers, joined in the school tradition with description of their doctrines, show the exemplary life of a man of wisdom. It was they which inspired the lives of the saints developed in late antiquity.

A third motive for interest in biography is scholarly and literary. Biographies of literary personalities (authors) are found as early as the 4th century B.C. In the Hellenistic period it became normal to prefix to the works of the classical writers the author's biography, to show among other things the connection between life and work.

So much may be said about some roots of biography in Greek intellectual life. Later, the genre received encouragement from the factual inquiries furthered by the Peripatetics. A means to secure internal structure was supplied by philosophical ethics, in particular by the character analysis practiced by Aristotle and Theophrastus, and the contrast between virtues and vices. Yet what remains is not sufficient to allow the reconstruction of a specifically Peripatetic form of biography.

Along with this, literary rules began to develop for the writing of biography. They were partly derived from the encomium (s. Literary Technique).

Among the classical models of Greek biography were to be found Aristoxenus (4th century B.C.), Antigonus of Carystus (3rd century B.C.), Hermippus of Smyrna (3rd century B.C.) and Satyrus (2nd half of 3rd century B.C.). Of these, Aristoxenus' Bioi of Archytas, Socrates and Plato were not, as the fragments prove, free from niggling criticism. Antigonus wrote lives of philosophers in a lively and vivid style. Hermippus relied upon material drawn from the Alexandrian library, but unfortunately also on unreliable sources for his influential accounts of legislators, philosophers and authors. Satyrus described the lives of kings, politicians, orators, philosophers and poets; his Life of Euripides (Pap. Oxy. 1176) displays artistic style in avoiding hiatus, and is cast as a dialogue, a form otherwise known only from hagiography. In his biographical interpretations of literary texts, especially of comedies, Satyrus is inclined, for modern notions, to go far too far.

Roman Development

Interest in individual personality received a strong impulse at Rome from Hellenistic influence. Yet it had never been entirely absent and was felt more intensely there than in Greece. Our picture of early Roman society may be rather one-sidedly marked by those selfless civic virtues which Cato, in challenging the aristocracy, felt obliged to emphasize.

In any case, both biography and autobiography at Rome had strong native roots. Family pride was an old and powerful motive. Biographical information was offered by tituli, inscriptions beneath the statues of important men. The laudatio funebris—the eulogy of the dead at the funeral—is related to the encomium and contains essential elements of biography. Such speeches were collected in family archives. Their conventional style turned the dead man into an exemplum.

Moreover, in Rome there must have been biographies of magistrates concerned with the precise record of facts. A later branch of this type, which may be characteristic of the nature of Latin biography, is seen in the Liber pontificalis. Its roots reach from the 6th century back to the 2nd century A.D. 'Is it presumptuous to argue from this biography of Roman magistrates, persisting over centuries, to the existence of older, lost works of a similar type?'<sup>1</sup> There is an evident analogy between the presentation of individuals in such books and the Romans' self-presentation on inscriptions and monuments.

A further presupposition for Roman biography—the self-assertion of the homo novus—was a reaction to the overwhelming power of the gentes. Already the Elder Cato collected his speeches, at first for practical and documentary purposes, but also so as to introduce them into his historical work and with that to confer upon himself immortality. Another important self-made man, Cicero, glorified his own consulship in prose and verse.

However, this biased self-idealization was from the very beginning subject at Rome to certain limitations, which may be especially appreciated in the Roman plastic arts and in poetry. The naturalistic death masks and the realistic portraits of the Republican period proclaim a sense of the individual which passed beyond any parallel Greek impulses. The typically Roman penchant for ironic and down-to-earth self-portrayal in poetry, as found in Lucilius, points in the same direction. This satirical personal poetry culminates in Horace, who, however, did not yet produce a connected autobiography, and as a person conceals more about himself than he reveals.

---

<sup>1</sup> Letter of W. BERSCHIN: cf. BERSCHIN, Biographie 1, 270–277; 2, 115–138.

Ovid wrote the first poetic autobiography.<sup>1</sup> Unlike the self-portraits of the satirists, it is meant to be an apologia, inspired by the particular situation of the banished poet. In this respect, the tradition he follows is Ciceronian rather than Horatian.

The rise of autobiography in prose in the true sense is linked with political developments. The great individuals who controlled politics in the late Republic took center stage in a novel way, not simply as actors, but also as literary advertisers of themselves. In the wake of others, Sulla too, whose career signposted the future of Roman history, composed an autobiography now unfortunately lost, certainly aiming to justify his political actions. The 'democrat' Caesar rivaled his optimate precursor, not only as an all-powerful dictator, but also as the author of Commentarii in which the intended picture of himself is doubly concealed behind the many characters of the surface narrative and the 'sober' effort to give an account of his conduct.

Sulla's freedman, Cornelius Epicadus, completed the biography of his patron and is therefore the first Roman biographer known to us by name.

However, thanks to Hellenistic influence, biographies without political relevance kept on finding more lively imitation in Rome. Varro wrote the first Latin collection De viris illustribus. But it is Nepos who in a certain sense may be regarded as the creator of Roman literary biography. Such biographies, bereft of any immediate apologetic purpose, reflect individual systems of values, and may be regarded as documents revealing the blending of Greek and Roman culture. This is the series continued by Hyginus.

Tacitus enriched the biography of his father-in-law Agricola with elements typical of historiography. Conversely, he centered his historical works around the personalities of the emperors.

From Suetonius on, imperial biography is in rivalry with traditional historical writing, which it overshadows for a long time within Latin literature (Marius Maximus, Historia Augusta, Aurelius Victor).

Eusebius wrote a panegyric Vita Constantini.

---

<sup>1</sup> It is developed from the sphragis, the brief presentation of himself by a poet at the end of his work.

Late antiquity witnessed individual lives of philosophers: Porphyrius composed a Life of Plotinus, Marinus a Life of Proclus. The Βίοι σοφιστῶν were collected by Philostratus and continued by Eunapius.

With his De viris illustribus Jerome continued the tradition of Suetonius, and produced the first Christian history of literature.

Christian Lives of the Saints represent another type, exemplified in Evagrius' translation of the Life of Antony by Athanasius, Jerome's Vita S. P., Vita S. Hilarionis, Vita Malchi<sup>1</sup> and Sulpicius Severus' Vita S. Martini.

Literary Technique

In the presentation of the subject, different principles are in play, an arrangement by chronology counterpointing one by theme. Biography moves between two poles (without coinciding with either of them): on the one hand, there is the 'on the spot' portrait, drawn as a whole and consciously neglecting certain details. On the other, there is the continuous narrative, concerned with historical completeness. Unlike the historian, the biographer, even when he is engaged in narrative, is less concerned with historical events as such than with their evidential value for the life in question. This explains why at times he may resort to historically trivial but psychologically revealing anecdotes. Favorite dishes, hobbies, other peculiarities may reflect essential features of character. He chooses his material according to its significance in this sense. Thus it may happen that particular phases of the life, such as youth and final days, may be especially emphasized, while others are passed over.

A systematical presentation based on theme, adapted to chronology in different ways or actually ignoring it, may be arranged according to virtues or even vices.<sup>2</sup> Philosophical ideas may play some part in this (s. Ideas II), but there may also be close contact with the rhetorical encomium. In both cases, the ἦθη of the hero are to be presented through his πράξεις with moral and pedagogical intent, although the decisive difference is that biography may also find space for negative behavior.

<sup>1</sup> The Life of Malchus is not the Life of a Saint, although it serves the purpose of Christian edification.

<sup>2</sup> A division by areas of relationship—family, public life, the gods—is also possible.

In practical terms, biographies may be factual sketches in a scholarly vein, or be developed according to literary principles.<sup>1</sup> The latter type is found in Plutarch (d. after 120); the former, with certain limitations, in Suetonius. Suetonius sees his task as that of orderly presentation of the material, while largely eschewing literary ornament. In the tradition of scholarship, even documents are cited. Simultaneously he establishes the biography composed in the scholarly manner as a form of historical writing.

In the Lives of philosophers, the sequence of life/doctrines is typical. Diogenes Laertius (perhaps towards the end of the 3rd century A.D.) regularly appends to the Life a brief summary (συναγωγή) of the doctrines. A characteristic feature of these Lives is the use of anecdotes illustrating the nature of the thinker under discussion. In the case of Epicurus, Diogenes is able to rely (book 10) on authentic testimonies.

Biographies were collected and organized according to categories: legislators, tyrants, poets and so on. Such collections were then themselves collected under the title 'Of Famous Men' (Περὶ ἐνδόξων ἀνδρῶν). Evidence of this is found in Varro, Nepos, Hyginus, Suetonius. From the time of the late Republic on, Greeks and Romans were also brought into parallel (Varro, Nepos, later Plutarch). Lives of philosophers were organized according to schools and their heads (cf. Diogenes Laertius).

In the Hellenistic period the growing role of great personalities and of their decisions had led to an increasing influence of biographies (of Alexander) on historical writing. This is true of Sallust, and much more so of the Annals and Histories of Tacitus, something quite understandable given that the emperor's decisions affected the whole world. Conversely, in Tacitus' Agricola, biography is enriched with historical features. In addition to the usual speeches and battle descriptions, literary use is also made of themes drawn from the life of Alexander. With Suetonius, as may be especially seen in the Lives illustrating the year of the four emperors, biography is in open rivalry with history, not in form, but in content and purpose.

A peculiar type is biography cast in the form of dialogue. The Life of Euripides by Satyrus is an example (second half of 3rd century B.C.), <sup>1</sup> According to Cicero's Letter to Lucceius (Jam. 5. 12, esp. § 6), a historical monograph resembles a stage play. Events are grouped around the person of the hero. At this point, the historian may write as an encomiast, although biography and encomium are otherwise strictly separate from history.

---

and there are also examples from Christian late antiquity (Palladius, Sulpicius Severus).

The adoption of elements from Hellenistic miraculous tales and novels fostered the development of a literature combining edification with entertainment. This gave rise to the hagiographic legend (Athanasius, Jerome).

Viewed as a whole, the Lives of the philosophers<sup>1</sup> have more to do with the type than the individual. The aim is to show moral progress towards perfection through the different stages noted in ethical theory. Some Lives of philosophers have the character of aretalogies. A case in point is Philostratus' Life of Apollonius. Lucian's work Concerning Alexander of Abonuteichus is a parody of this genre. The categories of the biographies of philosophers were easily adapted to Christian hagiography.

Inside Christian biography,<sup>2</sup> the following groups may be distinguished: Acts and Passions of Martyrs, Lives of Monks, Lives of Bishops, biographical series of the 6th century.

Acts of Martyrs

The point of departure for Christian hagiography is the court record of the Acta, exemplified in the account of the trial of the Scillitan martyrs about 180 at Carthage. In the Passio SS. Perpetuae et Felicitatis (202 or 203), the simple narrative of an editor is supplemented by Perpetua's own descriptions and the words of a fellow prisoner. This combination of narrative and autobiography is called 'commentarius form.'<sup>3</sup> Cyprian's martyrdom has come down to us in the shape of acta. It may be ranked with Pontius' Vita Cypriani, the oldest Life of a saint in Latin. It is a Latin sermo in the form of a rhetorical panegyric, something already evident from the verbose proem. It may be interpreted as an encomium.<sup>4</sup>

An expanded version of the acta-type is illustrated by the narrative passio (e.g. Passio SS. IV Coronatorum). Here we find the literary technique of a 'background style'. The reader is asked to experience the

<sup>1</sup> A. DIHLE 1986, 74.

<sup>2</sup> W. BERSCHIN 1986 is basic.

<sup>3</sup> H. A. GÄRTNER also points to elements of literary recasting: Die Acta Scillitanorum in literarischer Interpretation, WS 102, 1989, 149–167.

<sup>4</sup> For a comparison with Menander Rhetor and the not much later Panegyrici cf. BERSCHIN, Biographie 1, 64.

more recent event against the background of the trial before Pilate, evoked by typological quotations.

Dramatic features are encountered in the Passions of Sebastian, Laurence and Agnes. The Passiones apostolorum have links with ancient novels. The new heroic figures of these texts are drawn from humble circumstances: women, soldiers, slaves.

Lives of Monks

The Life of Antony by Athanasius (about 357), a work of some originality, is a definitive model for Latin hagiography of the 4th century. Two Latin translations are available: an older, anonymous version, and a more recent by Evagrius (about 370). They reflect the change of style from early Christian simplicity to the humanism of Jerome's time. Athanasius' work influenced Jerome (Vitae Pauli, Hilarionis, Malchi), Sulpicius Severus (Life of Martin) and Paulinus (Life of Ambrose).

The Life of Malchus is expressly described by Jerome as a vita, and associated with the two other biographies. It proves that a Latin vita in no way needs to comprise the life of its subject as a whole. A central event is enough. Here, the vita almost becomes a short story. In Jerome, biography and epistolary form may blend. His letter on the death of Paula is a precursor of later lives of female saints.

A new rhetorical flowering of the Lives of monks occurred in the time of Theodoric (Eugippius, Ennodius, Dionysius Exiguus).

Lives of Writers

The significance of the Suetonian type of biography for Christian Latin biography is from time to time energetically disputed.<sup>1</sup> But Jerome's De viris illustribus remains firmly attached to the Suetonian tradition. Biography, history and scholarly method are already combined in Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History. A long section, embracing the 5th and beginning of the 6th book, is centered on the personality of Origen.

Lives of Bishops

Towards the end of the 4th century, biographers begin to pay greater attention to bishops, though from an earlier period the Vita Cypriani by Pontius may be mentioned. Sulpicius Severus, in his Vita Martini, created the new model of an episcopal biography, drawing on his knowledge of monastic Lives. He was followed by Paulinus of Milan (Vita Ambrosii), Possidius (Vita Augustini), and Ferrandus (Vita Fulgentii). Hilary in his Vita Honorati produced an elegant laudatio funebris with prose rhythms in classical style. In accordance with the changing taste of the age, the anonymous Vita Hilarii is rhetorically overloaded, although less conservative in its rhythms. Five authors lent luster to the Vita Caesarii.

<sup>1</sup> G. LUCK, Die Form der suetonischen Biographie und die frühen Heiligenviten in: Mullus. FS T. KLAUSER, JbAC, suppl. vol. 1, Münster 1964, 230-241.

Biographical Series of the 6th Century

Venantius was the author of a series of Lives of bishops, most of whom were not personally known to him. He introduced a new method of organizing his material, dividing the Vita S. Hilarii from the Liber de virtutibus.

Biographical material is also found in Gregory the Great, especially in the Dialogi, whose style also distinguishes them from the rest of his work.<sup>1</sup> Gregory of Tours also belongs in this context.

Autobiographies

The literary techniques of autobiography are especially complex: there had been hypomnemata (commentarii) in the Greek world since the days of Ptolemy I, Antigonus Gonatas and Demetrius of Phalerum. At Rome, memoirs had been known since the time of the Gracchi, for example, by Aemilius Scaurus, Sulla, Cicero, Augustus, and Tiberius. The style of autobiography might be modelled on Xenophon (Cic. Brut. 132). Augustus' unusual account of his career may be set in the tradition of inscriptions by rulers. Caesar elevated the commentarius to the level of history, likewise under Xenophon's patronage. In historical works may be found autobiographical remarks by their authors, so far as they were participants in the action (Thucydides, Xenophon, Polybius, Cato, Ammianus Marcellinus) and also in their proems, in partial evocation of Plato's Seventh Letter (Sallust).

The autobiographical material may be presented in the form of a judicial speech, as by Antiphon, Andocides, Lysias, Isocrates (esp. Περὶ ἀντιδόσεως), Cicero, Apuleius. This leads to occasional imitation of Plato's Apology.

<sup>1</sup> His pessimism is related to the desolate state of Italy. The somewhat more hopeful mood in the new kingdom of the Franks is reflected in the works of Gregory of Tours.

In his account of his consulship, Cicero chose the forms of epic and of the prose commentarius. The description of his education and career (Brut. 304–324) is quite unusual.

A special type of autobiographical text, the philosophical or religious testimony to a conversion,<sup>1</sup> is prepared in some passages of Cicero's Letters and Seneca's Epistles. Characteristic authors here are: Dion of Prusa, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, Aelius Aristides, and Libanius. It is on this basis that the important autobiographical literature written by Christians is developed by Gregory of Nazianzus, Justin, Hilary, Augustine, Ennodius, and Patrick.

Language and Style

The language and style of biography may vary, depending on whether the 'Plutarchian' or 'Suetonian' model is in play. The latter type corresponds to the sober style of the scholar, the ancient grammaticus. A typical feature of this category is the literal quotation of sources, even in Greek. The former type shows a stronger rhetorical coloring, though even in Suetonius literary adornment is not completely absent.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The formal elements noted above, reminiscent of the encomium (for example, efforts towards systematic division and so on) may be mentioned here, if the author expressly confirms that they are constitutive features of his text. They are not, however, sufficient to determine a whole genre.

In general, the ancients did not establish strict generic rules for biography. Biographies written at Rome may be fruitfully contrasted here with the moral theories which (if scholars may be trusted) underlie the biographies of Plutarch.

It is in fact in Plutarch that some efforts towards a theory of biography may be found. His prefaces show that, in the eyes of contemporaries, biography was distinguished from history.

---

<sup>1</sup> P. COURCELLE 1957; H. GÖRGEMANN, Der Bekehrungsbrief Marc Aurels, RhM 134, 1991, 96–109.

In Plutarch, the aim of edification is particularly important in determining the genre. The intellectual origins of biography lie in the moral theory of the Peripatetics, and presuppose a systematic ethics and rule of life. This has been taken to explain why biography in Greek literature did not become a common medium of historiography.<sup>1</sup> However, we should not forget that, from the days of Alexander on, even in the Greek world, biography and history converged, if only from the point of view of material.

It is a big step from here to Roman political biography. The latter has its antecedents in the quite different political conditions of Rome.

To narrow down ancient biography exclusively to private life is to ignore Xenophon, whose role at Rome in particular is significant. Such a view in any case only partially fits the vita as it is offered to us by Roman literature.

Ideas II

Biographies of philosophers aim to present a particular way of life. This is especially clear in Iamblichus, who did not write 'on the life of Pythagoras' but expressly 'on the Pythagorean way of life' (Περὶ τοῦ Πυθαγορείου βίου).

The lists of virtues which underlie these lives in individual cases depend on the author's philosophical point of view.

The importance of the Peripatetics for the rise of biography in Greece shows especially from the following results of their anthropological studies: the contrast between ethos and pathos, the classification of particular types of lives and characters, or the interplay of natural bent and acquired virtue. In general, in ancient biography, intellectualism dominates, linked with a moralizing point of view. The value of an individual is determined by free moral decisions, while the milieu is not felt as a determining factor.

Attention to the individual does not mean the same as attention to the private person. The Romans therefore found no reason for not mingling biography and history. Lives of the Emperors are increasingly dominated by 'princely virtues' and 'typical features of the tyrant'.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A. DIHLE 1986, 18–19.

<sup>2</sup> A. SCHEITHAUER, Kaiserbild und literarisches Programm. Untersuchungen zur Tendenz der Historia Augusta, Frankfurt 1987 (with older bibl.).

W. BERSCHIN, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter, Bd. 1: Von der Passio Perpetuae zu den Dialogi Gregors des Großen, Stuttgart 1986. * W. BERSCHIN, ed., Biographie zwischen Renaissance und Barock (articles by 12 authors), Heidelberg 1993. * R. BLUM, Die Literaturverzeichnung in Antike und Mittelalter. Versuch einer Geschichte der Biobibliographie von den Anfängen bis zum Beginn der Neuzeit, Frankfurt 1983. * A. BUCK, ed., Biographie und Autobiographie in der Renaissance, Wiesbaden 1983. * P. COURCELLE, Antécédents autobiographiques des Confessions de saint Augustin, RPh 31, 1957, 23–51. * A. DIHLE, Studien zur griechischen Biographie, AAG 3, 37, 1956. * A. DIHLE, Die Entstehung der historischen Biographie, SHAW 1986, 3, 1–90. * B. R. FREDERICKS, Tristia 4, 10: Poet's Autobiography and Poetic Autobiography, TAPhA 106, 1976, 139–154. * M. FUHRMANN, Biographie, KIP 1, 1964, 902–904. * J. GEIGER, Cornelius Nepos and Ancient Political Biography, Stuttgart 1985. * B. GENTILI, G. CERRI, Storia e biografia nel pensiero antico, Bari 1983, Engl. transl. Amsterdam 1988. * H. GERSTINGER, Biographie, RLAC 2, 386–391. * K.-P. JOHNE, Kaiserbiographie und Senatsaristokratie. Untersuchungen zur Datierung und sozialen Herkunft der Historia Augusta, Berlin 1976. * T. KRISCHER, Die Stellung der Biographie in der griechischen Literatur, Hermes 110, 1982, 51–64. * A. LAMEDICA, Il P. Oxy. 1800 e le forme della biografia greca, SIFC 3, 3, 1985, 55–75. * P. LEJEUNE, L'autobiographie en France, Paris 1971. * Leo, Biogr. * F. LEO, Satyros' Βίος Εὐρηπίδου, NGG 1912, 273–290. * G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie, Bd. 1, 1–2, Frankfurt 3rd ed. 1949–1950. * A. MOMIGLIANO, The Development of Greek Biography. Four Lectures, Cambridge, Mass. 1971. * G. NIGGL, ed., Die Autobiographie. Zu Form und Geschichte einer literarischen Gattung, Darmstadt 1989. * W. STEIDLE, Sueton und die antike Biographie, s. Suetonius. * D. R. STUART, Epochs of Greek and Roman Biography, Berkeley 1928, repr. 1967. * R.-R. WUTHENOW, Das erinnerte Ich. Europäische Autobiographie und Selbstdarstellung im 18. Jh., München 1974.

NEPOS

Life and Dates

Cornelius Nepos (his praenomen is unknown) was probably born about 100 B.C. Certainly, by 63 B.C. he was no longer a young man (Plin. nat. 9. 137). His native city was perhaps Ticinum, and certainly he was a Transpadane<sup>1</sup> like Catullus, who addresses him in his dedicatory poem and who is himself mentioned in complimentary terms by Nepos (Att. 12. 4). He never held senatorial office, dedicating himself entirely to his family (cf. Cic. Att. 16. 14. 4) and literature (Plin. epist. 5. 3. 6). Just like Varro or Atticus, he was a cultivated man of letters, of equestrian rank. Like Marcus and Quintus Cicero, Hortensius and perhaps Varro he was among Atticus' friends. In 65 B.C. he was a member of the audience listening to Cicero's speech in defense of Cornelius.<sup>1</sup> The great orator at times speaks about him in somewhat cool terms (Att. 16. 5. 5), yet there was a correspondence available between him and Nepos. As biographer, Nepos described Cicero's life, and was also perhaps active as an editor (of Cicero? of Catullus?). Fronto mentions him (epist. 15 V.D.H.) in the same breath as Lampadio, Staberius, and Atticus. He outlived his friend Atticus<sup>2</sup> and reached the end of his long life only under Augustus.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Pliny nat. 3. 127; Pliny epist. 4. 28. 1.

Survey of Works

1. The three books of Chronica, written before 54 B.C., were Nepos' oldest work in prose (Catullus 1. 3-7). They gave a chronological synopsis of the principal events in Greek and Roman history, including literary history.

2. The Exempla appeared after 44 B.C. in at least five books (fig. 12 Peter = fig. 21 Marshall). They represented a new genre at Rome, a collection of anecdotes organized by theme. Probably, like the later work of Valerius Maximus, they were in each case categorized under Roman and Greek examples.

3. Nepos published separately detailed Lives of Cato and Cicero.

4. His principal work, De viris illustribus, treated in at least 16 books foreign and Roman kings, generals, orators (cf. the Cornelia fragment), historians, poets and grammarians. Two further groups are unnamed. We possess the book<sup>4</sup> concerning foreign generals, which was once followed by a now-lost book on Roman commanders (Hann. 13. 4). There also survive parts of the account of Roman historians (Cato, Atticus; his remark on Cicero's importance for the writing of history comes from the introduction). The 1st edition of the Life of Atticus, which was one of the lives of historians, followed

<sup>1</sup> Jerome c. Ioh. 12 (419) = PL 23, 381 MIGNE.

<sup>2</sup> Died 32 B.C. (Nep. Att. 19. 1).

<sup>3</sup> Therefore perhaps after 27 B.C. (Pliny nat. 9. 137; 10. 60).

<sup>4</sup> On the question of authenticity, see below under Influence.

between 35 and 32 B.C. Nepos himself (Att. 19. 1) refers to a 2nd edition,<sup>1</sup> which must have come between 32 and 27 B.C. The Lives of Datames, Hamilcar and Hannibal, like the chapter on reges in the Lives of Generals, may have been additions to the 2nd edition, and the effort to deny the existence of a 2nd edition<sup>2</sup> is not convincing.<sup>3</sup> It is in the Life of Hannibal (13. 1) that Atticus is spoken of as now dead.

The surviving book De excellentibus ducibus exterarum gentium contains twenty biographies of Greek generals.<sup>4</sup> This is followed by a survey of the kings who in fact had already been treated in an earlier section of the work. By way of appendix are found treatments of Hamilcar and Hannibal. It seems that the work does not aim at artistic structure, and a quite casual transition may be noted, which perhaps comes from remarks added to the second edition: De quibus quoniam satis dictum putamus, non incommodum videtur non praeterire Hamilcarem et Hannibalem, 'as we think that enough has been said about this subject it seems appropriate to mention Hamilcar and Hannibal' (reg. 3. 5). Yet the organization of these Lives may have been better planned than is often assumed.<sup>5</sup>

The Lives of Cato and Atticus are naturally taken from the book dealing with Latin historians. The structure of the individual biographies is examined below under Literary Technique.

5. Nepos also wrote minor poems (Pliny epist. 5. 3. 6), and perhaps also a work on geography. He was hardly, however, the author of a treatise on the increase of luxury in all walks of life. The references made to this topic may have been found in his other works.

Sources, Models, Genres

A model for the Chronica was provided by the chronicle of Apollodorus of Athens (2nd century B.C.), though this was composed in comic

<sup>1</sup> Bibliography on the argument over the 2nd edition is found in O. SCHÖNBERGER 1970, 154, note 5.

<sup>2</sup> H. RAHN, Die Atticus-Biographie und die Frage der zweiten Auflage der Biographiensammlung des Cornelius Nepos, Hermes 85, 1957, 205–206.

<sup>3</sup> R. STARK, Zur Atticus-Vita des Cornelius Nepos, RhM 107, 1964, 175–176.

<sup>4</sup> Miltiades, Themistocles, Aristides, Pausanias, Cimon, Lysander, Alcibiades, Thrasylbulus, Conon, Dion, Iphicrates, Chabrias, Timotheus, Datames, Epaminondas, Pelopidas, Agesilaus, Eumenes, Phocion, Timoleon; in favor of the authorship of Hyginus, cf. P. L. SCHMIDT, Das Corpus Aurelianum und S. Aurelius Victor, RE Suppl. 15, 1978, 1583–1676, esp. 1641–1647; Nepos' authorship is supported by J. GEIGER, Cornelius Nepos and the Authorship of the Books on Foreign Generals, LCM 7, 1982, 134–136.

<sup>5</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER 1970, 155.

trimeters. Apollodorus, too, took account of literary history. Like Apollodorus, Nepos set the foundation of Rome in 751/50 B.C.

In the Exempla (five books), Nepos probably followed the Greek paradoxographers.<sup>1</sup>

Recently, it has again been assumed that historical works, of a kind easily accessible at that time, were sources for his biographies. Nepos cites by name Thucydides,<sup>2</sup> Xenophon (Ages. 1. 1), Theopompus and Timaeus (Alc. 11. 1), and Dinon (Con. 5. 4). On Hannibal (13. 1. 3) he cites Silenus and Sosilus. Elsewhere, he alludes to Atticus, Polybius, and Sulpicius Blitho. Supposedly he also used Ephorus and Callisthenes. The earlier widespread assumption of intermediate sources, such as a Greek work Περὶ ἐνδόξων ἀνδρῶν,<sup>3</sup> is now viewed skeptically,<sup>4</sup> since the titles which are known do not contain any lives of politicians. Yet there were encomia of politicians independent of such collections, and Nepos shows himself influenced by the technique of the encomium.

In any case the claim that among the Greeks before Polybius there were no lives of politicians rests partly on an argumentum ex silentio, and partly on a very narrow definition of biography, excluding on a priori grounds all that is available to us.<sup>5</sup> Nepos himself refers (Epam. 4. 6) to complures scriptores.<sup>6</sup> In the Hellenistic period the purposes of political biography had in many cases been taken over by historical writing.<sup>7</sup>

Nepos in part follows the Peripatetic biographical tradition, which was to be carried to perfection by Plutarch. In the Life of Datames, Dinon may actually have been used. In the case of Atticus, Nepos wrote from personal knowledge, as he must have done in his lost Life

<sup>1</sup> L. TRAUBE, Untersuchungen zur Überlieferungsgeschichte römischer Schriftsteller, SBAW 1891, 397 = L.T., Vorlesungen und Abhandlungen 3, ed. S. BRANDT, München 1920, 9; W. SPOERRI, LAW s.v. Buntschriftstellerei.

<sup>2</sup> Them. 1. 4; 9. 1; 10. 4; Paus. 2. 2; Alc. 11. 1.

<sup>3</sup> For the ancient works on ἐνδοξοὶ ἄνδρες cf. W. STEIDLE 1951, 141-142; SCHANZ-HOSIUS 1, 358.

<sup>4</sup> J. GEIGER 1985, 56-58. It must be remembered, however, that ancient authors are notorious for suppressing their intermediate sources and citing instead famous authorities.

<sup>5</sup> See now, however, J. GEIGER 1985. Antigonos of Carystos also wrote on legislators (were they perhaps not politicians?), a point left unmentioned by J. GEIGER 1985, 54.

<sup>6</sup> J. GEIGER 1985, 34-35 assumes that these predecessors were historians, not biographers, even though Nepos means biographies.

<sup>7</sup> J. GEIGER 1985, passim.

of Cicero. Nepos knew that letters were important documents for the historian, remarking of Cicero's Letters: quae qui legat, non multum desideret historiam contextam eorum temporum, 'their reader would little need a continuous history of the period' (Nep. Att. 16). Letters had been used already by Hellenistic biographers.

Independently of the question whether Nepos was the creator of political biography, biography at Rome played a special role. It was particularly congenial to the Romans, as can be seen for example from their use of imagines. According to Jerome,<sup>1</sup> the first biographers at Rome were Varro, Santra, Hyginus, and Nepos. Varro's imagines also proclaim an interest in biography. They had a short text added, and were not limited to politicians. Nepos' book on foreign generals was dedicated to Atticus, who a short time before had composed epigrams for portraits of Roman statesmen (Nep. Att. 18. 5-6). It was perhaps Atticus who encouraged Nepos to include politicians in his biographies.

There were also in Rome numerous autobiographies, a relatively rare genre in Greek, which had flourished since the days of Gaius Gracchus:<sup>2</sup> Rutilius Rufus and Aemilius Scaurus had written memoirs. Many freedmen were active as biographers. Cornelius Epicadus completed and published Sulla's reminiscences. L. Voltacilius Pitholaus narrated the deeds of Pompeius Strabo and Pompey the Great,<sup>3</sup> although probably in an historical context. Tiro was the freedman and biographer of Cicero.

Within Roman literature, with his Chronica, Exempla and collection of Vitae, Nepos was a pioneer. In taking the lives of politicians into his collection, he acted, so far as may be seen, without precedent. It must moreover be regarded as a novelty that in his collection there appeared the biography of someone still living (Atticus).

Literary Technique

Nepos was obliged to distinguish his method from that of the historians (Pel. 1): quod vereor, si res explicare incipiam, ne non vitam eius enarrare, sed historiam videar scribere, 'for I am afraid that, if I should start to explain the whole matter, I might seem not to tell the story of his life, but to write history'. The form of Nepos' biographies is not generically fixed, but wavers between different possibilities.<sup>1</sup> According to a convenient and in the meantime outdated distinction, 'Alexandrian biography' presented, along with a sketch of the external events of the life, a picture of character filled with anecdotes. This type is used especially in the lives of poets. On the other hand, 'Peripatetic' biography of the type practiced by Plutarch preferred an artistic structure.<sup>2</sup> In Nepos both types were blended. Even literary and political biography could not at Rome be sharply distinguished.<sup>3</sup> Biographies in the narrower sense known to us appear in Greek always in series. There, individuals figure as representatives of a species (e.g. poet). Series of political biographies seem not to be attested before Nepos.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Apud G. FUNAIOLI, GRF, Leipzig 1907, 384.

<sup>2</sup> E. BADIEN, The Early Historians in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Historians, London 1966, 1-38.

<sup>3</sup> Nepos, fig. 57 MARSHALL = Suet. rhet. 27.

The literary form of Nepos' biographies is varied. There is the simple chronological presentation, although with the inclusion of statesmen by Nepos a moral aim and an approximation to the narrative technique of history also make their appearance. The Lives of Cimon, Conon, Iphicrates, Chabrias, and Timotheus are brief, but even they are not purely 'Alexandrian'. In spite of their short compass, interest in virtutes and vitia may still be detected.

Conversely, he also uses forms close to the encomium. This is seen in his biography of Epaminondas, whose character aroused more admiration than his career. For Agesilaus and Atticus, too, Nepos employed the methods of the eulogy. The theory of the epideictic encomium allowed for two arrangements: according to ἀρεταί or by chronology (Quint. inst. 3. 7. 15). The biographers employ both forms without distinction.<sup>5</sup>

A contrast to the encomium is offered by the antithetical and ambivalent characterization of Alcibiades (1. 2–4). In this, in spite of the enthusiastic finale (11. 6), praise and blame mingle. This has been regarded as a 'Peripatetic' feature.<sup>6</sup> The Life of Dion is a crescendo

<sup>1</sup> LEO, Biogr. 207; 211.

<sup>2</sup> Well-founded criticism of this distinction in S. WEST, Satyrus: Peripatetic or Alexandrian?, GRBS 15, 1974, 279–286.

<sup>3</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, 142 and elsewhere, against LEO. A division is once again defended by J. GEIGER 1985, passim.

<sup>4</sup> J. GEIGER 1985, passim.

<sup>5</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, 131.

<sup>6</sup> E. M. JENKINSON 1973, 710.

followed by a diminuendo. The first contains elements of ἔπαινος, the latter those of ψόγος.<sup>1</sup>

Nepos dwells largely on the qualities of the commander; this pre-occupation by no means springs only from literature or from the pressure of the genre. It is ordained by Roman life.<sup>2</sup> In Nepos specific features of Latin biography crystallize. In the Iphicrates, between the picture of disciplina militaris and that of his hero's death, Nepos introduced remarks about external appearance and character; later on, Suetonius would adopt the same technique.<sup>3</sup> The typically Roman division according to vita publica and privata<sup>4</sup> is also important. Nepos cleverly offsets chapters concerning the private life with others concerning the public persona, thus oscillating between an 'eidological' and a 'chronological' perspective.<sup>5</sup> From the sequence of events may be deduced the inner development of the hero.<sup>6</sup> The author delivers his own verdict in preliminaries or postscripts. 'The collection of these verdicts would perhaps produce 'basic notions' of a Roman view of history'.<sup>7</sup> Even so, the judgment is often concealed in the arrangement of the material.

Language and Style

Nepos' Latin is classical, although not so pure as has been claimed. Colloquial usage shows its influence on a writer to whom excessive scruple is somewhat alien. There is much old-fashioned language, rather surprising in a contemporary of Caesar and Cicero.

Diction is in the Attic manner, limited to the genus tenue. It is only occasionally that modest rhetorical flourishes are found, e.g. actorem auctoremque (Att. 3. 2). In general, the style is relaxed, corresponding to the unpolitical life and mature age of the author. Though uneven, it is not unpleasing, and often indeed quite graceful. An example is the use of double and triple cola and the subtle rhythm of a passage of praise, such as that found in Epham. 3.

<sup>1</sup> N. HOLZBERG 1989, 188–189.

<sup>2</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, 112.

<sup>3</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, 145.

<sup>4</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, passim, e.g. 148.

<sup>5</sup> E. M. JENKINSON 1967, 1–15.

<sup>6</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER 1970, 157.

<sup>7</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER 1970, 158.

Nepos knows how to tell a good anecdote. He is able to make the point in the right place, to avoid distracting detail and to emphasize the essentials. His narrative art may be compared with that of Cicero. The unassuming charm of his presentations is revealed only on careful reading, for which there are as yet relatively few aids available.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Leve et non satis dignum ('light and not dignified enough'). This is how Nepos supposes (praef.) that his genus scripturae will be judged. He means by this phrase biography as a literary genre.<sup>1</sup> Was it less respected perhaps because it was practiced by freedmen, or was the author simply defending his Atticizing style? The problem is, as he tells us himself, rather one of content, since it is precisely the 'insignificant' details which in a biography speak most loudly. Summi viri in his remarks here does not mean 'politicians,'<sup>2</sup> but virii illustres (ἐνδοξοί).

Nepos is conscious of his literary goal. Treatment of historical facts in a moralizing author follows different principles from those of a critical historian. The opening remarks of the Life of Pelopidas illustrate the point: 'Pelopidas of Thebes is better known to historians than to the general public. I myself am in doubt how to present his achievements. I am afraid that, as soon as I begin to present his deeds, I could create the impression, not of relating his life, but of writing history. Yet, if I touch upon them only superficially, I must be wary that readers to whom Greek literature is unknown may be insufficiently alerted to the significance of this man. I must therefore seek to avoid both dangers and bring remedy to my readers' satiety, and, what is more, to their lack of information.'<sup>3</sup>

Here, the author is concerned with delectare and docere. Basically, Nepos does not perceive himself as a historian, though in the present case he finds himself compelled to give appropriate attention to history. It is not a question of the difference between a narrative which shows scholarly fullness and one that is selective and artistic,<sup>1</sup> but rather of avoiding a drift into historical writing. The test is always the significance of the hero (quantus ille fuerit, 'what an important man this was'; Hann. 5. 4). The purpose is exprimere imaginem consuetudinis atque vitae, 'to give an impression of his manners and career' (Epam. 1. 3). Nepos therefore remains faithful to his biographical aim. What is historical here has only the function of illustration. The author's interest in tituli and family trees is again something typically Roman (Nep. Att. 18. 4): quibus libris nihil potest esse dulcius iis, qui aliquam cupiditatem habent notitiae clarorum virorum ('nothing can be more delightful than these books to those who have some desire for knowledge about famous men').

<sup>1</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, 141.

<sup>2</sup> A different view in J. GEIGER 1985, 38.

<sup>3</sup> On the distinction between biography and history (Nep. Pel. 1) s. Polyb. 10. 21, esp. § 8; Plut. Alex. 1. 2-3; Nic. 1. 5; Galba 2. 5; W. STEIDLE 1951, 11.

Ideas II

The categories of praise and blame are not philosophical but rhetorical. Nepos' distancing of himself in his Letter to Cicero (frg. 39 Marshall) from the principle philosophia magistra vitae might seem to justify the conclusion that he rejected Greek education. But the introduction to his book about generals corrects this misapprehension. Indeed, the author shows a rare openness to Greek culture: 'There will be people who, lacking Greek education, will accept nothing that does not suit their own way' (praef. 2). Nepos is not therefore the arch-conservative Roman of the old school, as he presents himself in his correspondence with Cicero. Even in the Chronica, which form a kind of apologoi, the part given to Greek was large. However, Nepos is not a theoretician. He relishes what is practical, and this means that the conclusions he draws from events are shrewd rather than lofty (Thras. 2. 3; Epam. 3. 2). Even so, he dares to put a Greek general as a model before the eyes of Romans (Ages. 4. 2). He is not a sensation-monger; in his biographies only a subordinate role is played by sex (e.g. Alc. 2. 3). In this respect Nepos, like Cicero, is still under the influence of old Roman ways of thought.

Looked at from the historical point of view, his treatment of the Greeks is much less reliable than that of the Romans. Nepos knew the Roman aristocracy, and had first-hand acquaintance with much of his material. His political attitude was that of a Republican (s. Dion 9. 5: quam invisā sit singularis potentia, 'how the power of a single person is detested'). In his day this warning against the rule of an individual was becoming only too relevant. But, as a Roman knight, he preserved the freedom from partisanship of one who stood aloof from politics. In the Life of Hannibal nothing can be detected of any Roman phobia against the foreigner. In accordance with the Roman feeling for virtus and Nepos' own didactic intent, the presentation of virtues and vices plays a large part (Paus. 1. 1; Epam. 10. 4; Timoth. 1). Yet Nepos succeeds in depicting living human beings.

<sup>1</sup> W. STEIDLE 1951, 109 is correct against Leo.

Transmission

We possess more than seventy manuscripts, and know of fifteen which have disappeared. The fundamental codex Petri Danielis or Gifanianus (perhaps from the 12th century) is unfortunately now lost. Excerpts made by P. DANIEL are accessible in old editions (Francoforti 1608; and Pauli Manutii in Attici vitam scholia, ed. Venetiis 1548; Amstelodami 1684). Chiefly, however, there are copies: in the first place the Leidensis B.P.L. 2011 (L; 15th century); in this manuscript, which was used by H. BOEILER in his edition (Strassburg 1640) and rediscovered by P. K. MARSHALL, the Life of Cato and the Cornelia fragments are missing. The second copy, the Parcensis (P; 15th century), comes from the Premonstratensian monastery of Park near Leuven and was destroyed by fire in Leuven in 1914. We possess collations by L. ROERSCH.<sup>1</sup> Principally however, there are manuscript marginal notes by C.(=K.) L. ROTH in a copy of his edition printed in 1841 which is in the possession of the Academic Library at Basle (bequest of K. L. ROTH, no. 3). This copy is faulty, but along with L offers a good foundation.

The oldest manuscript, the Guelferbytanus Gudianus Lat. 166 (A; end of 12th century) derives through an intermediary from the Codex Danielis and in general is good, although in places worse than LP (Them. 1. 3; Alc. 3. 2; Ages. 8. 1). A is only once right against LP at Hann. 4. 3.

In the Vita Catonis L is missing, as is P in the Vita Attici. The Cornelia fragments are given by neither L nor P.

All remaining manuscripts date from the 15th century and are dependent on A.

Influence

Nepos' Chronica were overshadowed by the work of Atticus which actually began with the foundation of Rome. Yet Nepos had direct influence on Gellius (17. 21. 3) and indirect on Solinus. Pliny the Elder used a table of dates depending on Nepos, and his possible influence on Plutarch and the Scholia Bobiensia to Cicero deserves note. Nepos was also the common source of Ampelius and the so-called Aurelius Victor (De viris illustribus).<sup>1</sup> He was Suetonius' most important predecessor, though unfortunately he is not named there often enough. Hyginus, Suetonius and Jerome (vir. ill. praef.) imitated his biographies. Ausonius sent, though with critical reservations, the Chronica of Nepos to a certain Probus.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> N. HOLZBERG 1989.

The 1st editions of the Vitae appeared under the name of Aemilius Probus. In the manuscripts we are told that the Vitae of Cato and Atticus, along with the Cornelia letter, were excerpted from Cornelius Nepos. However, the Lives of Generals bears at beginning and end the name of Aemilius Probus, while an epigram before the scriptio contains a dedication by Probus to the Emperor Theodosius II (408–450). It was not until O. GIFANIUS (ed. of Lucretius, Antverpiae 1566) and D. LAMBINUS (ed. Parisiis 1569) that the Lives of Generals were also ascribed to Nepos, with sound reasons from the point of view of both content and language.<sup>3</sup>

In modern times, Nepos has frequently served as a school author, recommended especially by, among others, Comenius.<sup>4</sup> The first translation into a modern language did not appear until 1550 (Remigio Fiorentino). Goethe remembered from his schooldays 'Cornelius Nepos who looks so stiff to young people.'<sup>5</sup> Mantua raised the claim to have been his birthplace, and there a memorial was erected in 1868. More than anything else, the stern verdict of German scholarship<sup>6</sup> has largely excluded him from the curriculum. It is only nowadays that Nepos, and in particular his worthwhile Life of Atticus, are beginning to be rediscovered.

<sup>1</sup> G. WISSOWA 1900, col. 1416.

<sup>2</sup> Auson. epist. 12, p. 238 PEIPER = 16, p. 174 SCHENKL; 10, p. 247 PRETE.

<sup>3</sup> On the issue of Probus cf. L. TRAUBE, Untersuchungen zur Überlieferungsgeschichte römischer Schriftsteller, SBAW 1891, 409–425 = L.T., Vorlesungen und Abhandlungen, vol. 3, ed. S. BRANDT, München 1920, 20–30.

<sup>4</sup> O. SCHÖNBERGER 1970, 153, referring to F. A. ECKSTEIN, Lateinischer und griechischer Unterricht, ed. H. HEYDEN, Leipzig 1887, 212.

<sup>5</sup> Dichtung und Wahrheit 1, 1; W.A. 1, 26, 48 (22, 36).

<sup>6</sup> NORDEN is severe, LG 42–43. SCHANZ-HOSIUS, LG 1, 4th ed., 358–359, and TEUFFEL-KROLL, LG 2, 6th ed., 455–456, are somewhat more lenient.

In some respects Nepos was a pioneer. The Chronica were the first work of history in Latin not limited to Roman history. Catullus praised Nepos' courage (ausus es, 1. 5). He is an author free from the blindness of the chauvinism native to many Romans (cf. Hann. 1. 1–2 and the prologue to De excellentibus ducibus). He brought great figures of Greek history within the purview of readers who knew no Greek (cf. vir. ill. praef 2: expertes litterarum Graecarum; Pel. 1: rudibus Graecarum litterarum).

Nepos was not absolutely the first, but he is the first surviving, Roman biographer. Moreover, he was the first known to have composed series of biographies of statesmen. This is in itself an important fact, quite apart from whether it was or was not an innovation on Nepos' part to take politicians into the ranks of ἑνδοξοί. His Chronica and Exempla were also lasting achievements of Roman literature. Scholars miss in Nepos a larger historical perspective, a sense of order and arrangement and the ability to distinguish what is essential from what is inessential; his 'dull moralizing' has also been found objectionable.<sup>1</sup> All this is to ignore the biographer's purpose of making the essence of the character visible in unpretentious details.

No doubt, Nepos was the first to recognize the historical value of Cicero's Letters to Atticus,<sup>2</sup> and his Life of Atticus—the first known Roman biography of a contemporary—draws its knowledge from first hand, and is an important document of the period. It gives us a picture of representatives of the equestrian order without political ambition, an important supplement to characters like Cicero, Sallust, and Tacitus and to a notion of Roman ways influenced by them.

Nepos is among the still unappreciated authors. Scholars and teachers should pay more attention to him. His style is more relaxed and accessible than that of Sallust or Tacitus, and suited, with its simple clarity, for reading by beginners. Even in content his unprejudiced tones, of a kind not often heard in Rome, deserve in our time to find a new audience.

Editions: Vitae: Aemilii Probi (sic) de vita excellentium liber, (without the Lives of Cato and Atticus), Venetiis, N. IENSON 1471. * Atticus: Marci Tullii Ciceronis ad Atticum, Brutum et Q. fratrem cum ipsius Attici vita . . ., Venetiis, N. IENSON 1470. * Vitae: D. LAMBINUS, Parisiis 1569. * Vitae cum frg.: E. O.

<sup>1</sup> G. WISSOWA 1900, col. 1416.

<sup>2</sup> Att. 16. 3–4.

WINSTEDT (T), Oxford 1904. * K. NIPPERDEY (TC), ed. by K. WITTE, Berlin 11th ed. 1913, 13th ed. 1967. * H. FÄRBER (TTr), München 1952. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN (TTr), Paris 2nd ed. 1961. * P. K. MARSHALL, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1991. * N. HORSFALL (TrC), Nepos. A Selection Including the Lives of Cato and Atticus, Oxford 1989. ** Lexica: G. A. KOCH, Vollständiges Wörterbuch zu den Lebensbeschreibungen des Cornelius Nepos, corr. and augm. by K. E. GEORGES, Hannover 6th ed. (2nd repr.) 1888. * O. EICHERT, Breslau 12th ed. 1891. * H. HAACKE, O. STANGE, Leipzig 16th ed. 1912. ** Bibl.: E. M. JENKINSON, Cornelius Nepos, Bibl. 1939–1972, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 718–719.

J. R. BRADLEY, The Sources of Cornelius Nepos. Selected Lives, diss. Harvard 1967, cf. HSPh 73, 1969, 308–309. * K. BÜCHNER, Humanitas. Die Atticusvita des Cornelius Nepos, Gymnasium 56, 1949, 100–121. * A. DIHLE, Die Entstehung der historischen Biographie, Heidelberg 1987 (= SHAW 1986, 3). * A. C. DIONISOTTI, Nepos and the Generals, JRS 78, 1988, 35–49. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Historians, London 1966. * T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Biography, London 1967. * U. FLEISCHER, Zu Cornelius Nepos, in: FS B. SNELL, München 1956, 197–208. * J. GEIGER, Cornelius Nepos and the Authorship of the Book on Foreign Generals, LCM 7, 1982, 134–136 (in favor of authenticity). * J. GEIGER, Cornelius Nepos and Ancient Political Biography, Stuttgart 1985. * J. GEIGER, Cicero und Nepos, Latomus 44, 1985, 261–270. * H.-J. GLÜCKLICH, S. REITZER, Die Hannibalbiographie des Nepos im Unterricht, Göttingen 1985. * N. HOLZBERG, Literarische Tradition und politische Aussage in den Feldherrnviden des Cornelius Nepos, Anregung 35, 1989, 14–27 and WJA 15, 1989, 159–173. * E. M. JENKINSON, Nepos—an Introduction to Latin Biography, in: T. A. DOREY, ed., Latin Biography, London 1967, 1–15. * E. M. JENKINSON, Genus scripturae leve. Cornelius Nepos and the Early History of Biography in Rome, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 703–719. * LEO, Biogr. * B. LUPUS, Der Sprachgebrauch des Cornelius Nepos, Berlin 1876. * T. G. McCARTY, Cornelius Nepos. Studies in his Technique of Biography, diss. Univ. of Michigan 1970. * T. G. McCARTY, The Content of Cornelius Nepos' De viris illustribus, CW 67, 1974, 383–391 (partly identical with the preceding title). * F. MILLAR, Cornelius Nepos' Atticus and the Roman Revolution, G&R 35, 1988, 40–55. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Das Corpus Aurelianum und S. Aurelius Victor, RE suppl. 15, 1978, 1583–1676, esp. 1641–1647 (on Hyginus as author of Nepos' Lives of generals). * O. SCHÖNBERGER, Cornelius Nepos von einem herrschenden Vorurteil befreit, Hermes 96, 1968, 508–509. * O. SCHÖNBERGER, Cornelius Nepos. Ein mittelmäßiger Schriftsteller, Altertum 16, 1970, 153–163. * W. STEIDLE, Sueton und die antike Biographie, München 1951. * L. VOIT, Zur Dion-Vita, Historia 3, 1954, 171–192. * A. WALLACE-HADRILL, Suetonius. The Scholar and his Caesars, London 1983. * G. WISSOWA, Cornelius Nepos, RE 4, 1, 1900, 1408–1417.

C. ORATORY, PHILOSOPHY, EPISTOLOGRAPHY

ROMAN ORATORS<sup>1</sup>

General Remarks

In republics, living speech sets a humane model of political and legal debate long before it assumes literary form. The cultivation of public speech is a criterion of the civilization of a particular people, while insensitivity to the status and importance of speech is a symptom of dawning barbarism.

Political, epideictic and forensic speech were already prefigured in the earliest Roman period. Political speech is exemplified in the expression of an opinion in the senate (dicere sententiam in senatu), the address to the assembly (contio) or to the army (allocutio), or the remarks of the Censor justifying his reproofs. Epideictic speech is found in the laudatio funebris. Judicial speech is especially significant. The patronus<sup>2</sup> is obliged to defend his clients in court without recompense.

Greek Background

Though Rome had its own independent tradition of oral speech, Greek rhetorical theory and the practice of Greek orators quite early provided an important example. There is no doubt that Roman civilization as a whole was penetrated from the very beginning by Greek elements, even if the date when Greek influences made themselves felt may, in matters of detail, be differently fixed. As early as in the Elder Cato traces of Greek rhetorical theory have been surmised.<sup>3</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> A survey of orators of the Republican period is contained in the section on 'Roman Development' below.

<sup>2</sup> Patronus is the intercessor, orator is the mediator (ambassador). Orare denotes oral intervention before the tribunal. It is telling that the old Roman orare lives on in the language of the Church ('to make intercession, bidding prayer,' 'to pray').

<sup>3</sup> LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 1, 21-24; a skeptical view in VON ALBRECHT, Prose 1-32. At any rate, Terence already presupposes a knowledge of rhetoric in his audience: G. CALBOLI 1982, 50-71.

In this the influence of Hellenistic oratory preceded that of Attic. This is a phenomenon finding parallels in other literary genres, and connected with the peculiar nature of the development of Roman civilization. It was left to Cicero to become a serious rival of the classic Demosthenes, just as it was Virgil who first rivalled Homer.<sup>1</sup>

Roman Development

We already touched upon the pre-literary roots of speech at Rome. Great orators were held in high regard (Cic. off. 2. 66). Important speeches were published quite early on, an example being that of Appius Claudius Caecus against the peace overtures of Pyrrhus (280 B.C.). Laudationes funebres were also published. The Elder Cato made a collection of his speeches and incorporated them in part into his History. Cato's admirer, Cicero, could still read many of them although in his day they were already little known and difficult to find. Cato's claims to both persuasiveness of content and beauty of form are so evident that influence of Greek theory has been supposed. After all, if Greek rhetors had not been influential, they would not have been expelled from Rome in 161. A younger contemporary of Cato, C. Sulpicius Gallus, was steeped in Greek culture. Knowledge of rhetoric and even of astronomy contributed to his brilliant repute.

Roman humanitas in the circle of the Younger Scipio Africanus (consul 147 and 134; censor 142) was shaped not only by philosophy (Panaetius), but also by rhetorical and grammatical theory. For all his gravitas, Scipio himself constructed artistic periods. He was an adherent of the analogical school<sup>2</sup> and of a purism which pointed ahead to the future. His wise and gentle friend Laelius passed in his lifetime as the better speaker, even though he was more under the sway of an older fashion.<sup>3</sup> The fiery Servius Sulpicius Galba enjoyed the reputation of a powerful speaker, but since he shrank from the labor of the file, his thoughts, once reduced to writing, lost all their effect (Cic. Brut. 98).

More than anywhere else, it was on the lips of the tribunes of the people that speech made powerful political impact.<sup>1</sup> The formidable mother of the Gracchi (Cic. Brut. 2. 11), contrary to all aristocratic usage, had personally taken charge of her sons' education and training. They owed her an unspoiled familiarity with their native tongue and a complete surefootedness in finding simple and precise expression, which enabled them to survive without damage their studies of Asian oratory.<sup>2</sup> Their good taste was not impaired while their technique was improved. Gaius was constantly supervised by a Greek trainer to help his vocal cords withstand the strain of the Forum.

<sup>1</sup> And Sallust and Livy who rivalled Thucydides and Herodotus.

<sup>2</sup> Examples: Gell. 6. 11. 9; Macr. Sat. 3. 14. 7; Lucil. 963 M. = 972 K. (pertisum); Fest. 334 L. (rederguisse).

<sup>3</sup> Cic. Brut. 82-84; 94.

The most celebrated speaker of the late 2nd century, C. Scribonius Curio (praetor probably 121) fascinated his still somewhat naive audience by digressions of general content ('on love,' 'on torture,' 'on the power of rumor') which a few decades later were no longer taken very seriously (Cic. Brut. 124). They did, however, mark an important stage on the way that led towards the greatest of Roman orators—though he would treat matters of universal import no longer separately, but in close connection with the particular instance. Cicero himself studied the arousal of sympathy using, among other examples, a per-oratio of C. Sulpicius Galba (Cic. Brut. 98), the son of the gifted Servius.

Notable among speakers of the generation before Cicero were the spell-binding Antonius and also Crassus, remarkable for his rhetorical and legal training.<sup>3</sup> The two of them share the dialogue in the De oratore. As censor in 92 B.C., Crassus issued an edict against the rhetores Latini, probably in an effort to serve the interests of his social class. The process by which mere rhetorical craftsmanship gave way to a philosophically based humanitas, both including the mores maiorum and yet setting them on a new footing, culminated in Cicero.

Stoic influence was seen in Q. Lutatius Catulus (consul 102), famous for his elegant pronunciation; in Q. Mucius Scaevola (consul 95) and in Rutilius Rufus (consul 105), who had been a pupil of Panaetius (Cic. Brut. 114). In oratorical practice Stoic brevitas is something of a drawback. Among the orators influenced by Stoicism, Cicero allows importance practically only to the Younger Cato who, in spite of his

---

<sup>1</sup> The greatest Roman orator, Cicero, was forced in his lifetime to experience the downfall of the political power of the word and the victory of brute force.

<sup>2</sup> Among other things, C. GRACCHUS was a pupil of the famous Diophanes of Mytilene (Cic. Brut. 104).

<sup>3</sup> Cicero ascribes a higher degree of education to Crassus than he is likely to have possessed. Yet his knowledge of the law is attested by other good sources, and the fragments display a detailed knowledge of rhetoric.

philosophical views, had at least studied rhetoric with experts in the art (Brut. 118–119). Julius Caesar Strabo appears in Cicero (de orat. 2. 216–290) as an adept in securing humorous effects.

From Cicero's own day we must mention Hortensius, although on his own ground, that of Asian<sup>1</sup> oratory, Cicero proved more than a match for him.

Among the strict Atticists, representing a different ideal from that of Cicero, may be numbered Q. Cornificius, C. Licinius Macer Calvus, M. Calidius, and Cicero's friend, M. Junius Brutus. The most important among them, Calvus, seems to have complemented the marked simplicity of his style with an extremely passionate delivery.<sup>2</sup>

The importance of oratory in any practical and political sense was understandably limited in the imperial period. Instead, within the framework of the institutions which had now become prominent, different forms of oratory blossomed. As a eulogy of the emperor, the panegyric acquired fresh significance. In the rhetorical schools, declamation was practised. In the Christian Church, the art of the preacher guided oratory to new horizons.

Literary Technique

The Roman speech, even in Cicero, its master, knew no stereotype. Its structure was determined by the situation and by the aim of persuasion.<sup>3</sup> Even so, it is fruitful to compare Cicero's rhetorical practice with his theory (s. Cicero, below).

It was not always considered indispensable to make a detailed, written preliminary version of speeches. Such elaboration mainly occurred after delivery. Yet the first steps toward literary form may be detected fairly early at Rome. Striking passages, such as beginnings and ends, or those with particularly awkward content, such as the narrative of the action in question, were written up ahead of time by speakers for their own reassurance.

Individual parts of the speech had different purposes, and so were cast in different styles. The proem was rich in ornament, and this may already be studied in the Elder Cato. The art of narratio, by contrast, which fascinated precisely by simplicity, could be observed in C. Gracchus. The excursus of a general character is attested in Curio (end of 2nd century B.C.). Graceful digressions, providing a respite for the audience, are said by Cicero (Brut. 82) to have been introduced by Servius Sulpicius Galba (consul 144). It was he who also successfully appealed, by a type of pathetic commiseratio (unheard of in Rome), to the sympathy of the people (Cic. Brut. 90), even drawing on the extra-literary means of producing in court his client's infant children. Generally, it must be assumed that the play of question and answer, as in the interrogation of witnesses, was changed into continuous speech in the subsequent written version. The metamorphosis of a delivered speech into a piece of literature implied that, even in style, nothing was any longer left to chance, and much that in delivery could be left unsaid because it was well known, or was self-evident from the situation or expressed by the tone of voice, was explicitly verbalized. Extreme examples are the never delivered, but carefully elaborated speeches of the Actio secunda against Verres, with their polished and dramatic narratives.

<sup>1</sup> Cicero (Brut. 325) calls the style of Hortensius 'Asian.' Previously (de orat. 3. 43) the word only denoted what originated in Asia Minor: cf. KENNEDY 97.

<sup>2</sup> Sen. contr. 7. 4. 8; cf. Quint. inst. 10. 1. 115.

<sup>3</sup> STROH, Taxis.

Cicero's particular achievement was to compose speeches showing internal coherence, in which there is a pervasive emotional tone from beginning to end. The ability to illumine a problem of general interest by a particular example was also his. In this way he elevated his hearers to loftier and more emancipated levels of appreciation.<sup>1</sup>

Language and Style

In principle the orator's language must be that of his listeners, if he is not to make himself ridiculous and lose all power to convince his audience. More than any other verbal medium, speech must steer clear of linguistic extravagance, and this gives rise to the special difficulty of rhetorical prose. The orator must speak like everyone, but better than everyone.

Even so, differences of style are visible. Cato the Elder,<sup>2</sup> in spite of his reputation for brevity, creates a surprising impression in his speeches by the heavy, archaic adornment of his triple expressions. The fullness of older Latin gives it a natural affinity with Asianism, a tendency which, in different periods of Roman literary history, is a constantly recurring temptation. Cato in fact arouses the impression of pithiness more as a consequence of his habit of defying the laws of psychology by using shorter cola in the second part of a sentence than in the first.

<sup>1</sup> A certain amount of preliminary work, even if at a humble level, was accomplished here by Curio with his general digressions (s. Roman Development).

<sup>2</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 9–20.

The strict taste of the Younger Scipio set a new trend. His Latin was regarded by Cicero as more modern than that of Laelius, whom he criticized for his fondness for old-fashioned words (Brut. 83).

The fragments of the speeches of the greatest Latin orator before Cicero, C. Gracchus, are crystal clear and matter-of-fact. The reputation of his speeches for powerful effect rested on a combination of simple language with impassioned delivery.<sup>1</sup> His admired model, M. Aemilius Lepidus, is said to have been the first to introduce at Rome artistically structured periods and elegant style (Cic. Brut. 95-96).

Crassus, the Roman orator most admired by Cicero, followed the Asian manner in his choppy clauses. Cicero's rival Hortensius also favored this ideal of style. In his speech defending the actor Roscius, Cicero defeated him on his own ground.

Latin oratory was quick to adopt—and never abandoned—the rhythmical clausulae developed by the Asians. Examples are found in C. Fannius (consul 122), Q. Caecilius Metellus Numidicus (consul 109), C. Papirius Carbo (tribune 90 or 89) and, of course, in the famous Crassus.<sup>2</sup> Cicero managed to free himself from the staccato Asian colometry, but never called into question prose rhythm as such. Later, its use continued to be a mark of formal Latin prose.

Even in his own day, Cicero was criticized by extreme Atticists, who stamped his diction as Asian and redundant. For his part, Cicero felt himself to be Demosthenes' true successor. He was a master of all the registers of the Latin language, making use of them to match the subject matter, the occasion and the participants. Without ever allowing form to dominate content with doctrinaire pedantry, or content to destroy form, Cicero created for Latin prose a classical synthesis which rose above all schools.

Under Augustus the schools of rhetoric took up the pointed style, thus distancing themselves from Cicero's classical, artistic periods. With that, in prose, the imperial fashion had already begun.

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Prose 33-53.

<sup>2</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 172-175.

The mannerism prevalent under Nero gave way under the Flavians, with Quintilian and Pliny, to the dominance of a new classicism.

In the days of the Antonines, an archaizing reaction followed, led by Fronto, though it must also be admitted that it was inspired by an honorable search for the mot juste.

Later centuries witnessed several renaissances, including that under Theodosius. The latter, influenced by Gallic eloquence, paid renewed attention to Cicero and Pliny, though avoiding any exaggerated purism.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Do speeches belong to literature? Once they have been published, they certainly do. Yet the act of publishing speeches despite their marginal political relevance, is condemned by T. Mommsen as 'unnatural decadence'.<sup>1</sup> This is surely too severe. If Cicero had not put out his speeches, the world's literature would have lost a brilliant contribution, and Mommsen himself would have lost intelligent written evidence of the period. But one point is correct. Even if speeches are literary, their authors are compelled to emphasize their unliterary character. This put literary theory in the first instance here at a disadvantage. Reflection on authorship is not forbidden, but it is advantageous to conceal it. In the presence of the audience which he seeks to convince, an orator may only exceptionally, and with the greatest caution, permit himself to speak of the art of oratory, since by emphasizing his skill, he may gamble away his credibility. The more prudent course is for him to warn his listeners against the dazzling rhetoric of his opponent, while emphasizing his personal sincerity. Thus the marked emphasis on the speaker's ignorance of the names of famous Greek sculptors in the Verrines has an ingratiating effect. While these speeches were intentionally directed to a large audience, Cicero's Pro Archia was delivered before a gathering of highly educated listeners. Here, he was allowed in his introduction to express his wish to deploy all his rhetorical skills—so far of course as they 'existed at all'—on his client's behalf, and in doing this he betrayed his knowledge of rhetorical categories. The mention of the art of rhetoric is excused in this case by the emphasis on the orator's own readiness to be of assistance. A further justification is found in the predominantly epideictic character of that speech. Even so, the reader is left with a certain sense of unease.

---

<sup>1</sup> 'Unnatur und Verfall', RG 3, 619. The publication of non-political speeches was helpful at least to those still young enough to be students.

In oratorical texts the speaker's self-portrayal is determined by circumstances and therefore one-sided and incomplete. It requires supplementation. Speeches cannot be adequately understood without the background of writings on theory. But there is a general aspect, even more relevant to the critic than the rhetoric of the schools, as presented, for example, by the Auctor ad Herennium or by Cicero in his youthful De inventione:

The speaker's view of himself is particularly closely linked with the values of the society he is addressing. This explains why the political and intellectual changes from period to period are reflected with especial clarity in the speakers' varying interpretations of their task. For the Republican period we possess in Cicero's Brutus an authentic account containing many great names of politics. It offers the evidence for Cicero's ideas on the all-encompassing role of the orator in Republican society, as stated in the De oratore, a work going far beyond the point of view of the rhetorical school. Cicero's ideal of education is inspired by the high political vocation of the orator to be the ruler of the state. In the Roman orator knowledge of the topic, the chief source of eloquence, must cover politics, law, and— even more importantly—the principles of ethics that lie behind law and govern the life of the community. Only his allegiance to the res publica accounts for Cicero's loyalty to his mission and his struggle to defend a position already lost. To read the speeches in this light is to discover, in place of the accepted interpretation of vanity and political blindness, the profound understanding of his role by the orator who, at a moment when history was in the balance, lent his voice to the Republic. The res publica spoke through Cicero, and with him fell silent.

Under the principate the orator could no longer identify his function in this way, and we easily understand the laments over the decline in eloquence in the 1st century A.D., continuing until Tacitus' Dialogus. At a different historical conjunction, with the end of despotism, and the advent of an effective and enlightened monarch like Trajan, Pliny could define the social mission of the orator in changed times in a new and positive way. There is need to condemn the bad princeps, to praise the good and to pray for him (paneg. 94), since of course the well-being of the imperium depends on that of its good ruler. The place of the values of Republican Rome is now in fact taken by the ruler's virtues. To the lot of his subjects correspondingly fall the qualities typical of citizens and magistrates, such as moderation. Now it is the speaker's office, at the best, to hold a mirror up to the prince and to present to him indirectly the expectations of the citizen body. At the worst, since not every emperor is a Trajan, and not every panegyrist a Pliny, the gloomy historical reality is disguised behind an idealized, courtly façade. The panegyrist is not however allowed to develop an independent personality, since the epideictic genre now prevailing aims rather to affirm than to alter. In lending his voice to spiritual and moral forces lying at the foundation of the state and presenting their claim on the living, he has made no change in principle except to become, instead of a hero and prophet, a vassal and a priest. Only when the allegiance to Old Rome rests on free choice, as is the case with Symmachus in his Relatio, does the ethos even of an imperial orator acquire a personal tone.

A particular problem for any orator, acknowledged at least since Plato's criticism of rhetoric in the Gorgias, is his relationship to truth. That was a challenge never abandoned, but the combative orator of the Republic had to make concessions here just as much as the subservient speaker of the Empire, though on different grounds. One was concerned with championing his point of view, the other with not endangering his own life. The uncompromising dedication of the speaker to what is good and true is found in Augustine (doctr. chr. 4. 6-5. 8). But here the political community is replaced by one that is religious, and the never clearly defined code of secular society by a dogmatic truth.

Ideas II

The orator's world of ideas must be largely accommodated to that of his listeners. Extreme instances are the differing verdicts on the Gracchi and on Marius expressed in speeches addressed to the senate or to the people, and the more frequent appeal to the gods in speeches delivered before the latter. The concealment of one's own expertise from an uncultivated public is part of this.<sup>1</sup> In his speeches, Cicero even avoids the word philosophia.

---

<sup>1</sup> H. JUCKER, Vom Verhältnis der Römer zur bildenden Kunst der Griechen, Frankfurt 1950.

Conversely, there are happily many instances in which speakers successfully challenge their listeners' ways of thought. In his speech On Behalf of the Rhodians, Cato bravely assailed Roman superbia and delight in war. The young Cicero skillfully and courageously attacked Sulla's favorite Chrysogonus and lashed out at the brutalization of his epoch in which it had become acceptable that citizens were murdered every day (Pro S. Roscio Amerino). Cicero's De Marcello is not a courtier's eulogy of a ruler's clemency, but the honorable effort of a Republican to bind Caesar to service of the res publica.<sup>1</sup> The impression that Cicero often charged through open doors<sup>2</sup> rests on an optical illusion. His success in presenting even complex problems unambiguously was so great that even serious scholars have taken the cases in which he was involved as simpler than they were.

In the Imperial period the political and forensic speech lost significance and influence, although this by no means implies that these genres disappeared. Beyond this, the eulogy as panegyric discovered a broad theme in the depiction of imperial virtues, for which Pliny's speech on Trajan provided the model. Late antiquity moreover furnishes examples of political speech and pamphlet which once again deserve attention. Of these, perhaps the best known concerns the quarrel over the Altar of Victory between Symmachus and Ambrose. Finally, the sermon turned the speech into a vessel of Christian exhortation.

An orator is under the pressure to conform. The intellectual challenge of speeches rests in the last instance not least on the reflection they offer of the speaker's way of thinking, and of that of his audience, though it may be hard to recognize their differences. This makes interpretation especially difficult. A mass of often trivial commonplaces must be scrutinized for the subtle nuances which show the speaker to be in advance of his listener or listeners, and where he seeks to offer guidance. Great prudence and sensitivity are needed to establish in each individual case where the fascinating 'phase difference' between the author's thought and that of his audience begins. The interpretation of the world of ideas of Latin oratory is to a particular degree a task to be shared by philologists, jurists, and ancient historians.

---

<sup>1</sup> S. ROCHLITZ, Das Bild Caesars in Ciceros Orationes Caesarianae, diss. Heidelberg 1991, Frankfurt 1993.

<sup>2</sup> MOMMSEN, RG 3, 619.

ORF, ed. by H. MALGOVATI. * VON ALBRECHT, Prose 9–20; 33–53. * G. CALBOLI, La retorica preciceroniana e la politica a Roma, in: Éloquence et rhétorique chez Cicéron. Sept exposés . . ., Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 28 (1981), publ. 1982, 41–99 (with a discussion 100–108). * M. FUHRMANN, Die antike Rhetorik. Eine Einführung, München 3rd ed. 1990. * KENNEDY passim. * KÜHNERT, Bildung und Redekunst. * LEEMAN, Orationis ratio 45–49; 56–57. * LEEMAN, Form, esp. 9–26; 27–38; 39–47; 49–68. * LEO, LG 21–46. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 169–175.

PHILOSOPHICAL WRITERS AT ROME

General Remarks

It was only late that philosophers gained access to Rome, and their compulsory departures from the city often occurred with surprising haste. In 173 B.C. the Epicureans Alcaeus and Philiscus were sent packing; in 161 B.C., teachers of wisdom and rhetoric were denied leave to remain; in 155, the celebrated philosophers' embassy was dumbfounded to be sent back home. These events may be excused by the earliness of the period. But what may be said of the fact that even towards the end of the 1st century A.D., at a time of complete blending between Greek and Roman culture, something similar occurred? The path of philosophy leading to Rome and even, in the case of Marcus Aurelius, to the imperial throne, seems to have been especially long.

The brusqueness of the original rejection shows that the attractions of philosophy for the younger generation had been correctly assessed. As early as 155 B.C., the Academic Carneades had delivered two complementary speeches, arguing for and against justice in public policy, thus offering to a large number of young men a fascinating example of unprejudiced thinking by an individual, and of the power to influence the thoughts of others. Romans of the old stamp are likely to have thought that the very basis of their constitution was being undermined.

Even at that time, two opposed elements in the Roman character were brought into conflict: their strongly marked sense of patriotic duty, and their no less developed feeling for the person and his rights. On the one hand, there was an effort to bring to conscious fulfillment and acceptance the emancipation of the individual, something inevitable ever since Rome's encounter with Hellenistic culture. But, on the other hand, as individual freedom increased, the opposite problem became more acute. The evolution of the imperium to include the whole world made the question of the moral foundations of such a state and its position in the history of the world ever more pressing. To answer both challenges the Romans sought counsel from Greek philosophy, wherever it could be found, without showing too much concern for differences between schools and loyalties to systems.

In spite of the well-known Roman preference for practical morals, their interest in philosophy—contrary to a widely held view—was not limited to ethics and politics. Even in Republican times, dialectics and logic aided the assimilation of ideas and their interaction in law and speech, which were the lifeblood of Roman society. When, thanks to revolution and the advent of the principate, a political vocation lost its attractions for the individual, attention was centered upon the inner being and the discovery of psychology. But an effort was also made to use the methods of physics to comprehend nature and to do justice to man's call to the contemplation of heaven and to pure cognition.

Admittedly, philosophical literature at Rome in all areas went no further than 'applied philosophy'. Yet in this area, the didactic poem, the dialogue, the essay and the letter attained considerable literary distinction. Their specifically philosophical fruits were only later given technical expression. But this has its own significance. Experiences which in Roman literature found utterance in pre-philosophical form were crystallized towards the end of antiquity into a philosophy of the person, of time, and of history.

Greek Background

Even where philosophy is concerned, we find, in a way characteristic of Roman writers, that the starting point in the first instance was contemporary literature. The pre-Socratics were mainly viewed through Hellenistic spectacles.<sup>1</sup> Even the masters of Greek philosophy, such as Plato, Aristotle; and Theophrastus, were known initially through their schools and the sciences on which those schools had set their mark.<sup>2</sup> Usually, reception followed its path towards full assimilation over substantial historical bridges<sup>1</sup> (s. Roman Development). Yet at all periods, a genuinely Socratic impulse may be traced at Rome, using its energies to attain mastery of life.

---

<sup>1</sup> Lucretius' recourse to Empedocles shows surprising independence, though its primary motive was not philosophical but literary.

<sup>2</sup> Cicero's rivalry with Plato in the De re publica displays in this perspective his

In the late Republican period Cicero's Academic Skepticism and Lucretius' Epicureanism gave rise to great literature. The same may be said of Stoicism<sup>2</sup> in the first two centuries A.D., of Middle Platonism in the 2nd century; and of Neo-Platonism from the middle of the 3rd century. Finally, these were joined by Aristotle's logic.

The advantage of time enjoyed by Greek over Latin literature was later once again apparent in the realm of Platonism. What may be thought of as its greatest representatives, the pagan Plotinus and the Christian Origen, were active in the 3rd century, whereas the serious reception of their works in Latin literature had to wait until the 4th century to gain momentum worth the name. Then indeed it produced astonishingly original works whose Roman features set their mark on the philosophy of Europe.

Roman Development

At Rome the harbingers of philosophy were poets, who drew their inspiration from the culture of south Italy and Sicily, whether represented by dramatists or philosophers. Accordingly, Ennius had a 'Pythagorean' dream, and he Latinized authors as varied as Epicharmus of Syracuse and Euhemerus of Messene (Messina). The voice of the latter, reminiscent of the Enlightenment, is occasionally echoed also by Pacuvius and Accius. Generally speaking, Latin tragedy in the Euripidean and Hellenistic mold, was both an introduction to myth and a pro-seminar on general philosophy. Roman comedy too had philosophical undertones.

---

total daring. It was in general the claim by Antiochus of Ascalon to restore the Old Academy which first made possible this fruitful revival.

<sup>1</sup> The influence of Pythagoras, Epicharmus and Euhemerus was mediated by Magna Graecia; that of the Socratics, and of Xenophon in particular, by the acquisition of the library of Pella. Political connections with Pergamum and Rhodes fostered close contacts with Stoic influences, which made themselves felt in many areas (ethics, logic, theory of language, rhetoric, hermeneutics, philosophy of law, natural science). At times, especially in the 1st century B.C. because of Nigidius Figulus, and at the beginning of the 1st century A.D. because of Sotion, neo-Pythagoreanism found a new voice. This tendency, for its south Italian roots, passed as 'native,' although its admixture of Platonic and Stoic elements was old.

<sup>2</sup> Tertullian (c. A.D. 200) still displays a strongly Stoic cast of thought.

With the victory over Macedonia in 168, rich library holdings were brought to Rome. Characteristically, it was a modest follower of Socrates like Xenophon whose home-made practical wisdom gained immediate popularity, and his importance for Roman intellectual life must be accorded great significance. Philosophy as dialogue, aiming to stimulate personal reflection in the service of active life, was a concept the Romans learned from Socrates; and in this respect they were in fact closer to Socrates than many Greek system builders.

It was the Scipionic Circle which gave to Greek thought at Rome a secure haven. There it was grasped in all its educative and humanizing effect. Political relations with Pergamum and Rhodes led to an encounter with Stoicism, and this school especially found acceptance in a form that was modified and accommodated to high Roman society. Panaetius, the principal representative of the Middle Stoa, was an intimate of the Scipios, and his pupil, Posidonius of Rhodes, enjoyed close ties with Rome. But Rhodian influence was joined by that of Pergamum. The Stoic Crates of Mallos made disciples at Rome.<sup>1</sup> Roman mentality and Stoic philosophy met above all in strict moral standards and the readiness to sacrifice for the res publica. The abstract paradoxes in which thinkers of that ilk found satisfaction were less congenial to the Romans. The Stoa exercised influence in many areas of knowledge: on astrology and belief in fate (Manilius); on the philosophy of nature (Virgil, Ovid, Seneca); on philology and interpretation (Aelius Stilo, Varro, and all who followed); on logic, dialectics and the philosophy of law (Servius Sulpicius Rufus, Cicero).

Mediated by figures like the Younger Cato, Stoic attitude also became an embodiment of Republican feeling, from which members of the senate even in the 1st century A.D. could draw both consolation for their loss of political power and lessons in preserving their dignity and personal independence. It took a century of senatorial Stoic opposition before the emperors abandoned their objection to this kind of philosophy and began, in a sort of 'revolution ordered by authority', to find increasing support for their rule in this school of thought, which meanwhile had become the most influential intellectual current. Marcus Aurelius, whose Meditations were written in Greek, marked a culminating point.

---

<sup>1</sup> Adherents of the Stoa in Rome were: Laelius the Younger, Q. Aelius Tubero, C. Fannius, Sp. Mummius, C. Blossius, P. Rutilius Rufus, Valerius Soranus, L. Aelius Stilo, Q. Mucius Scaevola (the pontifex and the augur), L. Lucilius Balbus, Sextus Pompeius, Cato the Younger, Servius Sulpicius Rufus. As a writer Stertinius must be mentioned, who is alleged to have written 220 books in Latin on Stoic philosophy.

Academic Skepticism, represented by Philon of Larissa, along with the Old Academy, which had been restored by Antiochus of Ascalon, found sympathetic hearers at Rome. An interest in Academic philosophy was shown by C. Aurelius Cotta (consul 75), L. Lucullus, L. Tubero and in particular by Cicero. Peripatetic leanings were displayed by M. Piso (consul 61) and M. Licinius Crassus (consul 70).

Epicureanism<sup>1</sup> gained more supporters at Rome than might have been expected in the case of a philosophical school holding somewhat aloof from public life. It may have met a human yearning for tranquillity and peace, particularly during the civil wars. In Caesar's circle there were several Epicureans,<sup>2</sup> though even republicans and friends of Cicero belonged to the same school.<sup>3</sup> One of its centers was found on the Bay of Naples. Cicero's enemy, L. Calpurnius Piso Caesoninus (consul 50 B.C.) was probably the owner of the Villa of the Papyri at Herculaneum. His protégé Philodemus, the last great head of the school, may have adapted certain teachings to Roman conditions, making political activity no longer an exception. Yet no change was needed, since most Romans had a remarkable ability to discharge their public offices conscientiously without bringing into

---

<sup>1</sup> Epicureans in the strict sense were: T. Albucius (late 2nd century B.C.); C. Amafinius and Rabirius (2nd to 1st century B.C.). Composers of works in Latin prose on Epicurean philosophy were criticized by Cicero for their lack of logic. There were four books De rerum natura et de summo bono by Catus Insuber (d. 45 B.C.). Didactic epics De rerum natura were composed before the middle of the 1st century B.C. by the great Lucretius and a certain Egnatius (c. 55 B.C., three books). Among the early adherents of Epicureanism at Rome may be counted C. Velleius (beginning of 1st century B.C.), introduced as a speaker by Cicero in nat. deor. 1. A proof of the clannishness of the Stoic school among grammatici is offered by the fate of the Epicurean M. Pompilius Andronicus (2nd to 1st century B.C.), a freedman from Syria. Because of his philosophical views he could not find a foothold in Rome. He migrated to Capua and there wrote numerous works, for example Annalium Enni elenchorum sedecim.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. C. Cassius Longinus, the later conspirator against Caesar (consul design. 41 B.C.), C. Vibius Pansa (consul 43 B.C.) and the important jurist C. Trebatius Testa (c. 84 B.C.–A.D. 4), also an acquaintance of Cicero and Horace.

<sup>3</sup> They included Cicero's closest friend, the Roman knight T. Pomponius Atticus (d. 32 B.C.) and his older acquaintance L. Saufeius. Further, L. Papirius Paetus and M. Fadius (Fabius) Gallus, composer of a panegyric on Cato the Younger, L. Manlius Torquatus (praetor 49 B.C., died 46 fighting on Pompey's side) and Stailius, an officer with Cato at Utica and a friend of Brutus.

play their private views. From the Bay of Naples Epicurean influence spread to Virgil, Horace, and their friends.<sup>1</sup>

The great poets just mentioned indicate the gulf separating the private from the official sphere. In the former, Epicurean beliefs prevailed, in the latter, those of Stoicism. Similarly, in dialectic, theology and natural philosophy, Varro was a Stoic, but in ethics an Academic, while M. Brutus was a Stoic in ethics, but otherwise an Academic. The so-called Cynic diatribe influenced Horace, and even before him the 'Roman Cynic', Varro. In each of these cases, philosophy is not a matter of commitment to dogma, but a tool of self-knowledge. Nigidius Figulus and P. Vatinius were sympathetic to Pythagoreanism, of which traces are also found in Varro, Virgil, Ovid, and Seneca. This is indicative of the religious turn taken by philosophy which would be characteristic of the imperial period as a whole.

It is true that, under the empire, Epicureanism continued to flourish.<sup>2</sup> In general however, a Stoic trend in the 1st to 2nd centuries was followed by one sympathetic to Plato. Beside and along with Middle and Neo-Platonism, mystery religions (at their head a Christianity seeking to present itself as the 'true philosophy') became means used by the individual to secure his own internal independence until the emperors diverted the course even of this stream to their own purposes. A peripheral feature deserving attention is the genuine link with Epicurean emancipation from superstition found in Christian authors such as Arnobius and Lactantius. In the struggle against pagan, Stoic, and Platonic religio, Epicureanism and Christianity were allies.

It was only in late antiquity that philosophical literature in Latin attained a purely scholarly character (s. the following sections).

Literary Technique

In the specialized literature of philosophy, Greek for long enjoyed a monopoly, and this meant that at first philosophical writings in Latin were for the most part destined for a wider public. Their aim was to serve general education, the dissemination of ideas, the practice of meditation rather than to meet the needs of the scholar.

---

<sup>1</sup> Quintilius Varus Cremonensis (d. 24/23 B.C.), the author of treatises On Flattery and On Greed, as well as the two editors of the Aeneid, L. Varius Rufus (author of the poem De morte) and Plotius Tucca, see M. ERLER, Orthodoxie und Anpassung. Philodem, ein Panaitios des Kepos?, MH 49, 1992, 171–200.

<sup>2</sup> From the 1st century A.D., may be mentioned as Epicureans the historian Aufidius Bassus and two patrons of the poet Statius, P. Manilius Vopiscus and Pollius Felix.

A distinction may be drawn between the didactic poem (s. above), the didactic monograph concentrating on one theme and using literary means to reach a wider audience (e.g. Cic. off.), the philosophical dialogue (several times in Cicero), the 'one-sided' dialogue, intended for self-instruction or as edifying reading (Seneca's writings), the closely related philosophical letter (Seneca), the précis intended for beginners and amateurs (Apuleius) and the hybrid form destined for general reading and raising literary claims by a combination of poetry and prose (Boethius).

After the period around the beginning of the 1st century, individual representatives of different schools of thought had made some efforts at philosophical writing—with little literary success. It was Cicero and Lucretius who ventured in their different ways to come before the public with general presentations in Latin. Lucretius set out the doctrine of Epicurus in a poetic form preserving systematic order. Cicero composed in prose a series of philosophical treatises which, being organized by theme, permitted a survey of the main trends of Hellenistic philosophy. Unlike Lucretius, Cicero did not seek to convert his readers to a particular theory, but presented different points of view.<sup>1</sup> This undogmatic attitude found expression in the dialogic form,<sup>2</sup> although there was a difference from the Platonic dialogue. Instead of working out each single step logically through a small scale dialogue, the participants were each granted an opportunity to present their views in a connected speech, following the method of the Aristotelian dialogue. The discussion was set in the present, meaning that the author himself, in Aristotelian style, could appear as a partner in the discussion. It could also be set in the past in the manner of Heraclides Ponticus (4th century B.C.). Personal proems (also Aristotelian) and careful descriptions of scenery (in the spirit of Plato) were prefixed. Literary dialogues of the Christian period are the Octavius of Minucius Felix and the works of Augustine written while at Cassiciacum.

---

In the 2nd century, Pompeia Plotina (Ulpia Marciana), the wife of Trajan and adoptive mother of Hadrian, secured privileges for the Epicureans at Athens.

<sup>1</sup> He left of course no doubt about his lack of sympathy with Epicurean views. In principle he accepted the tenets of Academic Skepticism, although partially also inclining toward positions held by the Stoics.

<sup>2</sup> Before Cicero, a dialogue in Latin had been written by M. Junius Brutus (2nd century B.C.) in his De iure civili.

Seneca inherited the dialogical method, but developed it in two directions. One led toward the philosophical letter, the other towards his Dialogi, which display only some elements of dialogic form in a way characteristic of the diatribe. Of the dialogue, the author gives expression only to the words of the principal interlocutor, aiming to provoke a response in the reader's own mind.

A general token of Roman philosophical writings is their wealth of practical examples. A procedure attentive in this way to individual cases is also characteristic of Roman writing on law. Much light is shed on the Roman way of thought when Gellius (1. 3. 21), in his debate with Theophrastus, faults him for handling a problem in a purely theoretical way, without giving examples.

Taken as a whole, literary forms show the following line of succession: relatively early there are artistically finished syntheses aimed at the general public (1st century B.C.); then, moralizing essays rise to prominence, discussing particular cases in edifying fashion (1st century A.D.); finally, after a considerable lapse of time, comes technical literature in the shape of literal translations, commentaries and treatises dealing with special problems.

This unusual sequence is in accord with the particular 'division of labor' between Latin and Greek, which must form the next subject of discussion.

Language and Style

Greek remained for a remarkable length of time the technical language of philosophy. Even the manual or journal intended for personal meditation (Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius) was composed in Greek. Seneca's effort to provide for the cure of souls in Latin seems at first not to have been wholly accepted. Philosophical teachers naturally made use of their Greek native tongue, and their zealous pupil began eventually to think in Greek even if he was a Roman emperor. A technical philosophical language in Latin had to be developed only when the knowledge of Greek began to fade even among the educated. This meant that for a long time Latin was overwhelmingly employed for more popular writings.

Yet it was precisely literature aimed at non-specialists that encountered unfavorable linguistic conditions. As a language without articles and with a pronounced disinclination for neologisms, especially of an abstract kind, Latin put up strong barriers to any treatment of philosophical problems. After the pioneering achievements of Ennius and Lucilius, it was above all Lucretius and Cicero who made essential contributions to rendering Latin a fit vehicle for philosophical expression.

These great authors—and indirectly also the stubbornly down-to-earth nature of Latin—must be thanked for the fact that Roman philosophy came to be clothed in a human language, and not in some abstract technical jargon. It was the Latin authors who presented philosophy, not as something remote, but as wearing a tangible and attractive literary garb. This was an achievement which had perhaps not been attained with such perfection since the days of Empedocles and Plato, at least so far as the preserved texts reveal. By his colorful vocabulary and his choice of imagery, Lucretius incorporated the whole of nature and the entire history of civilization into a comprehensive philosophical poem. The moral, historical, and legal experience of the Roman people found entry into Cicero's world of discourse, in the guise of categories and binding exempla. The linguistic creativity of the systems developed by these two great authors opened to Roman philosophy the world of experience both in its spatial and its temporal dimension. The very method in which language was handled by them shows that they were not concerned with finding refuge in a realm of ideas distanced from reality, but rather with something typically Roman: the intellectual penetration and alteration of reality, accomplished in their case by means of language.

Seneca remained faithful to this humane style, while lending it an even more remarkable fervor through the urgency and energy of his short cola, which turn him into a 'second creator of Latin prose'. His language, inspired as it was by rhetoric, accompanied man on his inner pilgrimage, towards himself.

From the 2nd century A.D., a shift in language made itself apparent. Tertullian, who boldly exchanged the lawyer's toga for the cloak of the Christian philosopher, simultaneously abandoned the natural reluctance of Latin to use abstract nouns, with lasting effect that continues into the modern languages. Minucius Felix and Lactantius made yet another attempt to rescue Cicero's literary culture for altered times.

With the translations and commentaries of Marius Victorinus, the language of philosophy at Rome finally attained maturity. Now it was capable of satisfying technical claims, and could become the vessel of the subtle psychology of Augustine and the strict logic of Boethius. Yet the Latin feeling for form was enough to ensure that even these serious philosophers composed their masterpieces in a style friendly to their readers. The way in which the genres vary in each case to match their audience will be explained in detail in the discussion of Christian literature.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Philosophy does not need many words; do not surrender to it with every fiber of your being.<sup>1</sup> This Ennian maxim long remained in force in Rome. Lucretius viewed himself as a doctor. The poetic ornament of his work was like the honey smeared by a physician on the edge of the cup to persuade a sick child to drink the bitter draught. This comparison is not particularly flattering to the maturity of the poet's audience.

Cicero's dedication to philosophy, as he remarks in correction of Ennius, was expressed non paucis. His more general aim in presentation inevitably needed many words. He knew that he owed his own successes to his philosophical training, although by no means only to moral philosophy. Being especially aware of his formal education in dialectic, he was critical of philosophical writers lacking logical training; by this attention to rational order he exercised fruitful influence even on jurisprudence. His Latin writings fulfilled in his eyes an educative mission, and were moreover intended to replace the works of his honorable, but stylistically unfinished predecessors (Tusc. 1. 6). His readers therefore could use his philosophical works even to learn how to express difficult ideas in good Latin (off. 1. 2-3). Cicero's notion of himself as a philosophic writer is convincingly reflected in his picture of Socrates. Behind the masters depicted in his great dialogues—Scipio in the De re publica, Crassus in the De oratore—there is Socrates, the wise preceptor of life and the master of dying, although the dialectician and debater is not forgotten either.

---

<sup>1</sup> Enn. scæn. 376 V. = 95 J.; Cic. de orat. 2. 156 (characteristic of Antonius); rep. 1. 30 (adduced in the early period by Aelius Sextus to support the pedagogical value of philosophy). On the other side, Cicero's own view is found in Tusc. 1. 1 sed non paucis, ut ille (Neoptolemus in Ennius); compare for the thought Plat. Gorg. 484 c; 487 a (Callicles).

Seneca's aim is to lead his readers, especially those of the Epistulae morales, to a satisfying philosophical life. His tone is that of the preacher and missionary. Once again the figure of Socrates becomes a touchstone. Seneca in fact arranged his own death as an imitation of that of Socrates. The relationship to this central figure of philosophy is no less crucial even in later philosophical authors. For Apuleius, who is half-mystic and half-showman, the important feature of Socrates is his clear-sighted knowledge of men. Many Christians were arrogant enough to see in pagan philosophy, and even in Socrates, mere worldly pride. Others occasionally conceded the role of harbinger to morally eminent pagans. Hence it appears that a philosophical writer's attitude towards Socrates may be called a touchstone. In fact, the emphasis laid on particular aspects of Socrates reveals much of the speaker's own self-awareness.

Ideas II

For a Roman, philosophy was not necessarily a doctrine demanding total allegiance. Rather, he took from it categories enabling him to understand and interpret his own life and ambience. An extreme instance is provided by Ennius. In viewing himself as a reborn Homer, he was not primarily concerned with expressing a dogmatic belief in the Pythagorean transmigration of souls; he rather employed the formula presented by philosophy to express his own feeling about his nature and his awareness of himself. Greek material was taken over, not for its intrinsic value, but as an instrument. Even the bounds governing the reception of Stoicism were defined in the same way. Stoic ethics were employed to describe and express a personal attitude to one's patria. This Stoic terminology could be unceremoniously abandoned, if private attitudes to existence found better expression in Epicureanism. The relation to philosophy was one of convenience. Its notions had relevance only in so far as they assisted a Roman to grasp and describe the experiences he found important.

The objects of philosophical reflection in Rome were in one way more narrowly defined, but in another way more broadly developed than those of traditional philosophy. They were more narrowly defined when ethics was given priority over physics and logic, although this fact at times has been overemphasized. After all, Roman literature reveals profound traces of ancient physics, and whole works of some significance were dedicated to nature. Dialectic and logic found their living application in the systematic study of law and other areas of knowledge.

The bounds of Roman interest in philosophy were more broadly developed than had previously been the case. At least it raised new problems, if without always solving them. A philosophy of law was not a Roman innovation, but it was the Romans who, with their imperium and their creation of Roman law, laid the foundation for this too. The struggle to work out the intellectual foundations of a universal political and legal order directed their attention towards the overarching natural law postulated by the Stoics, which transcends positive law. The rise of Alexander's empire and of the Roman imperium gave contemporary importance to questions about the philosophy of history of the kind already occasionally posed by Plato. Here, Stoic thinkers and the Hellenistic author of the biblical Book of Daniel must also be mentioned. After Polybius, Cicero, Virgil, Sallust, Livy, Trogus and Florus, Roman readers could not avoid the problem of a philosophical interpretation of history. Rome's greatest original thinker, Augustine, would provide a partial solution to them in succession to the Greek Fathers. However, his philosophy of history presupposed the Roman res publica, its rise and its collapse. At this point, experience of the Roman imperium enters a larger intellectual context.

Psychological problems—including that of the unconscious, of the creativity of the individual, and of his intrinsic value—found expression in Roman literature even before philosophy in the strict sense. The person, for long a basic category of Roman law, increasingly attracted in late antiquity theological and philosophical attention. The individual discovered himself as a person and evaluated his own thinking as the prime certainty in the theory of knowledge. Personal self-awareness created a linear (and no longer cyclical) perception of time. It was this that guided Augustine to his extraordinarily modern insight into time's subjectivity.

Bibl.: ANRW 1, 3 and esp. 1, 4 (on philosophy, science, and arts); 2, 36 (6 volumes). * A. A. LONG, D. N. SEDLEY, eds., The Hellenistic Philosophers (TTrC), 2 vols., Cambridge 1987–1989.

ANDRÉ, Otium.* J. BRUNTSCHWIG, M. NUSSBAUM, eds, Passions and Perceptions. Studies in Hellenistic Philosophy of Mind, Cambridge 1993. * J. BRUNTSCHWIG, Papers in Hellenistic Philosophy, Cambridge 1994. * H. CANKIK, Untersuchungen zu Senecas Epistulae morales, Hildesheim 1967. * C. CASTNER, Prosopography of Roman Epicureans from the 2nd Century B.C. to the 2nd Century A.D., Frankfurt 1988. * M. ERREN, Einführung in die römische Kunstprosa, Darmstadt 1983. * M. GIGANTE, L'epicureismo a Roma da Alcio e Filisco a Fedro, Ricerche Filodemee, Napoli 1969, 13–21. * M. GIGANTE, Philosophia medicans in Filodemo, in: Cronache Ercolanesi, vol. 5, 1975, 53–61. * W. GÖRLER, Untersuchungen zu Ciceros Philosophie, Heidelberg 1974. * A. GRILLI, Stoicismo, epicureismo e letteratura, Brescia 1992. * GROETHUYSEN, Philosophische Anthropologie (für die lateinische Philosophie grundlegend). * I. HADOT, Arts libéraux et philosophie dans la pensée antique, Paris 1984. * P. HADOT, Exercices spirituels et philosophie antique, Paris 2nd ed. 1987 (augmented). * P. HADOT, Qu'est-ce que la philosophie antique?, Paris 1995. * HIRZEL, Dialog. * P. MAC KENDRICK, with the collaboration of K. L. SINGH, The Philosophical Books of Cicero, London 1989. * G. MAURACH, Geschichte der römischen Philosophie. Eine Einführung, Darmstadt 1989. * G. MAURACH, ed., Römische Philosophie (= WdF 193), Darmstadt 1976. * E. PARATORE, La problematica sull'epicureismo a Roma, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 116–204. * RABOW, Seelenführung. * P. RABOW, Paidagogia. Die Grundlegung der abendländischen Erziehungskunst in der Sokratik, Göttingen 1960. * E. RAWSON, Intellectual Life in the Late Roman Republic, Baltimore 1985. * ÜBERWEG-PRÄCHTER, Philosophie (completely new edition by H. FLASHAR, W. GÖRLER and others). * ZELLER, Philosophie.

THE LETTER IN ROMAN LITERATURE

General Remarks

Letters were originally written on the inside of wooden tablets coated with wax. Later they were committed to papyrus, which was rolled up, tied and sealed. Private messengers or acquaintances undertook their delivery.

The proper interpretation of literary epistles requires a knowledge of the basic form of a Roman letter. Contrary to modern practice, the sender is named before the receiver, and the greeting stands at the beginning rather than at the end: C. Iulius Caesar M. Tullio Cicero n(i) salutem p(l)urimam d(icit). If a vocative is used, this belongs not in the first,<sup>1</sup> but in second place. Perhaps the best known example is the opening of the Acts of the Apostles: 'The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus . . .' The classical compendium of a Roman letter is: S.V.B.E.E.V. (= si vales, bene est, ego valeo). At the end of the letter stands vale or a similar wish.

<sup>1</sup> A neo-Latinist who begins with Domini dominaeque! (for 'Ladies and Gentlemen') is gatecrashing clamorously through an open door.

Literary letters make play with these elements and also with the ancient theory of the letter (on which s. 'Ideas I', below).

With increasing interest in the personal element, the letter gained in importance. Its unassuming form could be adapted to the most diverse contents. Particular periods elevated it to literary status and employed it for the most varied purposes. Although epistolary literature in its turn became highly stylized, and thus largely sacrificed the air of spontaneity (which had been its most attracting quality), it remained an important vehicle for personal poetry and personal prose at Rome.

Greek Background

What survives by way of letters from Hellenistic literature must be considered to a great extent consciously stylized or even forged. As long ago as 1699, Bentley showed the spurious nature of the letters of Phalaris (Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris). Authenticity is disputed in the case of letters said to be by Isocrates, Demosthenes and Plato, although Plato's Seventh Letter is usually accepted as genuine. The Letters of Epicurus are certainly genuine, but they are mainly treatises in epistolary form.

From a later period, we possess letters by Julian the Apostate, Libanius, Synesius and Church Fathers. To the 'belletristic' type of epistolography belong: Alciphron (Letters of Fishermen, Letters of Countryfolk, Letters of Parasites, Letters of Hetaerae), Aelian (Letters of Countryfolk), Aristaenetus (Love-letters), Philostratus (Love-letters).

Roman Development

From the time before Cicero, a letter is known from the mother of the Gracchi, Cornelia, containing a moving warning to Gaius not to seek the tribunate.<sup>1</sup> Unfortunately, its genuineness is not wholly certain.

The preservation of Cicero's correspondence is a particular piece of good fortune. Of the 864 items in the four collections, 90 are addressed to Cicero, and these letters from contemporaries may serve as a yardstick enabling us to measure more precisely Cicero's art. The variety of types of Cicero's own letters ranges from quickly thrown off personal notes all the way to official documents, whose words were meditated down to the last detail.

<sup>1</sup> Translation in LEO, LG 479; cf. p. 305 with note 4.

Among the Augustans the subsequent literary development of the epistle took poetic form. Horace shaped the moralizing letter as a genre in hexameters, continuing on a higher plane his satires. In parallel with Propertius' Arethusa epistle, Ovid created the elegiac form of the Heroides, a collection of letters revealing an encyclopedia of the feminine heart. His letters from exile discovered nostalgia for Rome as a theme, although they also pursued a practical end.

In Seneca the prose letter attained new heights and literary dignity. It became the vehicle of meditation and effort at self-improvement. It is no coincidence that the early imperial period marked a time when 'lower' genres such as letter, epigram and fable attained a high literary level and full maturity.

At the same time, the dedicatory epistle in prose enjoyed a victorious career in the most varied genres, from technical writing to collections of poetry.

The literary treatment of the epistolary genre in Pliny took a different form. His collection of letters is a mirror of his own self, and of the society in which he lived. Not least, he supplies evidence of their author's civic sense, which he presents as a model with a certain candor.

Fronto's correspondence gives publicity to his literary and rhetorical aims, which he rates higher than any philosophy.

Late antique collections of letters followed Pliny, if only for their number of books and their arrangement. They are—to think for example of Symmachus—often more the reflection of a society than of a personality. In writers like Sidonius, the empty compliments too often cloy. Jerome was a born letter writer. What he has to say is of the most diverse kind, ranging from the obituary to the treatise. He draws a vivid picture of his addressees or of those whose lives or sufferings he has shared. Augustine's letters, by contrast, show him as bishop from a far less personal side than his Confessions. Such documents from bishops serve, in succession to the epistles of the New Testament, primarily didactic and instructional purposes.

Literary Technique

The distinction between 'spontaneous' and 'literary' letters must not be regarded as absolute.

Documents intended for the senate might have the character of short speeches. Even in terse private letters, when they are written by educated authors, almost unconsciously a carefully calculated structure takes over. An example is Pliny epist. 1. 11: Opening statement: 'It is some time since you have sent me any letters.' Objection: 'You reply: 'I have nothing to write'.' Argument: 'In that case, just write to me that you have nothing to write, or simply what the ancients used to put: 'If you are well, that is good; I am well.' That is enough for me; after all, that is what matters most.' Peroration: 'Do you think I am joking? My request is serious. Let me know without fail how you are, since this uncertainty is extremely upsetting. Goodbye.' Many letters of Pliny are so brief and polished that they might be described as 'epigrams in prose.'<sup>1</sup> Considerations of content give names to different subordinate genres: Letters of Congratulation, Letters of Consolation, Letters of Recommendation. These last were regarded as a special group, as is shown by their collection in Cicero fam. 13.

Epistolary form may also be used as a disguise. Thus there are letters seeking publicity, didactic letters and entire treatises in letter form, letters of dedication, invented letters and letters using a pseudonym. Horace's poetic epistles may be set between satire, didactic and private letter, without falling easily into any one scheme.

Epistolary novels, love-letters and mime-letters developed into literary genres, based on rhetorical ethopoeia. The genre of Heroides established by Ovid is a parallel development to this in poetic form.

Language and Style

The variation from colloquial to highly rhetorical speech is found at its broadest in Cicero's letters. According to the addressee and the topic, his style alters in the most subtle shades. As criteria for public or private character may be noted: the employment of clausulae; the addition or omission of titles and date; the use of ellipses and hints intelligible only for a single reader, the addressee. The most private letters are full of colloquialisms, proverbs, random Greek snatches or quotations, riddles or allegories. There are playful momentary formations such as the crossing between Latin and Greek seen in facteon. Official documents display a title and date. The most polite correspondence is that between enemies (such as Antony and Cicero).

<sup>1</sup> A.-M. GUILLEMIN 1929, 150.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Ancient notions find specific basic features<sup>1</sup> in all letters. Brevitas<sup>2</sup> occupies a quite special place, but its corollary of confinement to a single theme is followed perhaps only by Pliny. For the same reason, a letter had to avoid rhetorical flourish, although not charm (elegantia sine ostentatione: Iul. Vict. 446. 15 Halm).

A letter is a picture of the writer's soul (Demetr. 227; Sidon. Ap. 7. 18. 2). Letters are conversations between those absent, one end of a dialogue. This explains their nature as communication, their closeness to the educated (but not vulgar) language of everyday (Cic. fam. 9. 21. 1). A periodic style is to be shunned; the asyndeton is the adornment of a letter (Philostr. vit. soph. 2. 24. 1). The letter must be adapted to its recipient, a feature raised by Cassiodorus in his Variae to a principle. This means that for the most part philosophical subtleties are out of place. Ovid draws the consequences of this for the composition of love letters (ars 1. 467–468).

Cicero distinguishes various types of letters, notably publicae and privatae (Cic. Flacc. 37). Elsewhere he adopts a division into simple, factual missives and letters dwelling on feelings. The latter fall into the genus familiare et iocosum and the genus severum et grave (cf. Cic. fam. 2. 4. 1–2; 4. 13. 1; 6. 10. 4).

A type of letter related to the genus iocosum is one containing no information but simply intended to share. It must not be lightly dismissed, for it is here that writers and recipients exchange the most precious gift they have, time (s. 'Literary Technique' below).

---

<sup>1</sup> An ancient theory of letters is found in Artemon of Cassandrea (apud Dem. eloc. 223–235); Cic. fam. 2. 4. 1; 4. 13. 1; 6. 10; 9. 21. 1 al.; Quint. inst. 9. 4. 19–20; Sen. epist. 75; most thoroughgoing treatment in Iul. Vict. (extr.); s. also Apollon. Tyan. epist. 19; Theon, prog. 115. 2 Sp. (under prosopopoeia); Philostr. vit. soph. 2. 33. 3; Greg. Naz. epist. 51; Isid. epist. 5. 133; Phot. Ad Amphiloichium (pp. 14–15 Hercher); Procl. Περὶ ἐπιστολιμαίου χαρακτήρος.

<sup>2</sup> Examples in J. ΣΥΚΥΤΡΙΣ 1931, 193.

Ideas II

Cicero's private correspondence does not offer a philosophically idealized picture of its author, but rather allows the reader to share directly the writer's joy and sorrow. This is something most unusual and for this reason the expressions of weakness and discouragement revealed therein must not be used to condemn the writer. Who knows whether even Caesar himself did not at times lose heart?

Horace introduces his readers, mostly young men from Tiberius' entourage, respectfully and politely, yet beyond possibility of misunderstanding, to moral insights into recte vivere. In these refined works of art, whose literary merit has not yet been wholly appreciated, the philosophical message may not be separated from its perfect literary form. Truth and beauty form a classical unity.

Conversely, in their letters, Ovid's heroines make no effort towards inner balance. They neither wish to teach nor to learn. Rather these elegiac epistles are a mirror of the feminine soul, even and particularly of its errors. His letters from exile, which bear many resemblances to the Heroides, illumine the theme of separation from the man's perspective. There is also the purpose of influencing the recipients to intercede for the author's recall, leading to the discovery of the immortal theme of nostalgia for Rome.

Seneca's aim is not to affirm his reader's tranquillity, but to disturb him. He must discover the way to a life lived consciously and intensely. If rhetoric in Ovid's Heroides was meant to plumb the psychological depths, now it becomes a means of instruction and self-education, aiming to set in motion the will.

A principal theme of Pliny's correspondence is formed by the virtues, though they are not those of the philosopher, but of the citizen and magistrate. In this respect, the letters are a necessary counterpart to the Panegyricus, which praises the virtues of the ruler. Incidentally, a picture of the society of the day and of the writer emerges, yet one more emphatically stylized than in Cicero. Pliny's collection was organized by its author as a work of art.

Not all the letters of late antiquity are of personal human interest. They are dominated by the values of aristocratic society, of the school or of the Church, and even from here the historian may extract valuable lessons. But occasionally in them may be felt the heartbeat of the times. Fronto, teacher of rhetoric by conviction, cannot accept that his disciple Marcus Aurelius is lost to philosophy. Another historical gulf is reflected in the poetic correspondence between the worldly Ausonius and his student turned monk, Paulinus. Beauty of form is increasingly felt to be insincere. In contrast to the often vacuous letters of the aristocracy of late antiquity and some of their Christian imitators (especially in Gaul), in the leading doctors of the Church a strongly practical aim prevails. But we also find personal tones, especially in Jerome, who puts before us the great virtues and the small vices of his spiritual brothers and sisters with the power of a born satirist.

K. ERMERT, Briefsorten. Untersuchungen zur Theorie und Empirie der Textklassifikation, Tübingen 1979. * H. GÖRGEMANNS, Der Bekehrungsbrief Marc Aurels, RhM 134, 1991, 96–109. * A.-M. GUILLEMIN, Pline et la vie littéraire de son temps, Paris 1929, esp. 133–153. * W. JÄGER, Briefanalysen. Zum Zusammenhang von Realitätserfahrung und Sprache in Briefen Ciceros, Frankfurt 1986 (bibl.). * H. KOSKENNIEMI, Cicero über die Briefarten, in: Arctos. FS E. LINKOMIES, Helsinki 1954, 97–102. * H. KOSKENNIEMI, Studien zur Idee und Phraseologie der griechischen Briefe bis 400 n. Chr., Helsinki 1956. * H. PETER, Der Brief in der römischen Literatur, Abhandlungen der Königlich sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, phil.-hist. 20, Leipzig 1903. * G. REINCKE, Nachrichtenwesen, RE 16, 2, 1935, 1496–1541. * W. RIEPL, Das Nachrichtenwesen des Altertums, Leipzig 1913. * H. RÜDIGER, Introduction to: Briefe des Altertums, Zürich 2nd ed. 1965. * G. STEINHAUSEN, Geschichte des deutschen Briefes, 2 vols., Berlin 3rd ed. 1903. * J. SYKUTRIS, Epistolographie, RE, suppl. 5, 1931, 198–220. * K. THRAEDE, Grundzüge griechisch-römischer Brieffopik, München 1978. * K. THRAEDE, Zwischen Gebrauchstext und Poesie. Zur Spannweite der antiken Gattung Brief, in: Acta colloquii didactici classici octavi. Didactica Gandensia 20, 1980, 179–218.

CICERO

Life and Dates

M. Tullius Cicero was born in 106 B.C. in Arpinum. His youthful years witnessed the rise to power of his countryman C. Marius, whom he later memorialized in a poem. Like Marius, Cicero was a homo novus. Unlike him, he owed his success to nothing except his training and talents. At Rome he studied Greek rhetoric and listened in the forum to important Roman orators. He was one of the audience around the son-in law of C. Laelius, Q. Mucius Scaevola the augur, noted for his knowledge of legal matters. Scaevola's vivid memories of the Scipionic Circle did not fail to make their impression on the young Cicero, as the guise he later gave to his dialogue De re publica shows. It was Philon of Larissa who inspired the young man's enthusiasm for philosophy. He was a skeptical Academic, who had lived in Rome since 88 B.C., and it was he who taught Cicero among other things how to tackle a dispute from two opposed points of view (in utramque partem disputare). This was an exercise whose value for rhetorical inventio is manifest. After Philon's death (about 85 B.C.), Cicero became a pupil of the Stoic Diodotus, and, when his teacher became old, gave him a permanent refuge in his own house.

It took long years of study until the orator appeared before the public, and it may not be coincidence that this was after Sulla had restored the aristocratic constitution. It was in particular the speech in defense of S. Roscius Amerinus, containing a courageous attack on a protégé of Sulla, which helped the ambitious orator to secure his reputation. These were the days which also produced the rhetorical textbook De inventione, though later, in his more mature years, the author came to distance himself from its publication.

His activity as an advocate undermined Cicero's delicate health, and was interrupted by a period of study that took him to Greece and Asia Minor (79–77 B.C.). He spent six months in Athens with Antiochus of Ascalon, then head of the Academy. In his somewhat dogmatic version of Platonism, Antiochus approximated the Stoics. Among the teachers of rhetoric with whom Cicero came into contact on his voyage, the most significant was Apollonius Molon, whose school was on Rhodes. It was Molon who freed him from youthful tendency to exuberance, and taught him a more restrained technique of delivery, something that would be of great help in his career as an orator.

By 76 B.C., Cicero was quaestor in Lilybaeum in Sicily. His dedicated zeal in the discharge of his duties was, however, as he later learned to his disappointment, quite unremarked in distant Rome. From now on, he concentrated his activities on the capital. During the consulship of Pompey and Crassus (in 70 B.C.), he collected crushing evidence for his prosecution of C. Verres, who had been propraetor in Sicily, forcing him to go into voluntary exile. Appointed praetor in 66, Cicero showed himself, in his famous speech supporting the lex Manilia, where he described the qualities of the ideal general, a partisan of Pompey. His consulship (63 B.C.), conducted with vigilance and energy, was both the culmination and the turning point of his career.

In the years that followed, he was obliged to defend himself for his execution of the Catilinarian conspirators, and finally (58–57 B.C.) to go into exile. After his return, his most significant writings were produced (De oratore, 55 B.C.; De re publica, 54–51), along with masterly speeches (In Pisonem, Pro Milone). This period, often exaggeratedly regarded as one of otium on Cicero's part, was concluded by his proconsulship in Cilicia (51–50 B.C.) and the civil war that followed. These were indeed barren years, in the course of which several thankless tasks were thrust upon one who always remained a civilian at heart.

After Caesar had accepted his former adversary into his good graces (47 B.C.), Cicero intervened with Caesar to defend former supporters of Pompey in speeches of refined elegance, steering a skillful course between 'monarchist' eulogy and Republican frankness. Rhetorical treatises (Brutus, Orator) attested his effort to come to terms with Atticism. The death of his daughter Tullia in February of 45 was a shattering experience. His grief provoked a fresh creative impulse. He began by writing a consolation for himself, which was followed in quick succession by a series of theoretical works in which practically all areas of philosophy were conquered for Roman literature.

After Caesar's death Cicero, as a partisan of the Republic, dedicated himself relentlessly to the struggle against Antony. With their harsh language and their vivid eye for detail, the Philippics opened a new phase in Cicero's literary development. Proscribed by Antony and Octavian, the greatest of Rome's orators was cruelly assassinated in 43 B.C. His head and hands were exposed to public view in the Forum. It was the same year that saw the death of both consuls, an event which may be regarded as symbolic of the end of the Republic. The future belonged to the force which in Cicero's youth had taken its first steps, and whose growth during his lifetime, though a convinced supporter of civil power, he had been forced to observe: the professional army. It was this innovation by Marius which made the political development of the 1st century B.C. possible, one that led from the financing of private armies to military dictatorship.

Cicero has been reproached with 'posing in succession as a democrat, as an aristocrat, and as the tool of monarchs'.<sup>1</sup> In fact, in his early Pro Roscio Amerino he had opposed Sulla's favorite Chrysogonus, though later he convinced the people to reject a popular agrarian law. In the Pro lege Manilia, he celebrated the military leadership of Pompey, and in the Pro Ligario the leniency of Caesar. But it must also be observed that Cicero, the son of Roman knights, always championed the interests of his order and was obliged to do this, as political circumstances changed, in different ways, unless he wished totally to surrender his political influence. He was correct in recognizing the importance of the knights, among whom Augustus too would find support. There were certainly many dissonances in Cicero's career. For example, he was forced to defend his arch-enemy Gabinius, although one notes with satisfaction that the speech lacked brilliance. But this is to be blamed less on the individual than on the complex political circumstances of the late Republican period. A homo novus, without an aristocratic gens behind him and lacking the financial means of someone like Crassus, could not be too selective in the choice of his clients. His activity as lawyer was the only means enabling him to develop a net of relationships intended to secure his political advancement. Along with his allegiance to the knights, his loyalty to the Republican constitution remained steadfast. Both as a young man and later, he sided with the senate against Caesar, and in his old age again with the senate against Antony. When Caesar was dictator, Cicero defended the supporters of Pompey, confessing himself, with a mixture of pride and modesty, a fellow-Pompeian. Right to the end, he sought to win first Caesar and then his heir for the Republic, which he treasured above all else.

---

<sup>1</sup> MOMMSEN, RG 3, 619.

Cicero's speeches, treatises and letters are inestimable documents, even if only as testimonies of their time. But they accomplished more than this. They enlarged the intellectual horizon of the Roman world in different directions. Cicero was the founder at Rome of a literature with claims to artistry that dealt with the philosophy of politics, of ethics, of law and of oratory. His picture of the Roman Republic is admittedly idealized, but supported by personal political experience and knowledge of affairs. He was granted the gift of putting much into words before it fell victim to final destruction. Yet he was not a backward-looking dreamer. He gave his Romans many a fresh insight into things they had no notion of before, a rich seed of ideas for future generations.

Survey of Works 1: Periods of Literary Activity

The effort to divide Cicero's literary activity into periods is easiest in the case of his rhetorical treatises. The De inventione (81/80 B.C.) belongs to the early period (I), the De oratore (55 B.C.) belongs to the middle period (II), while the Brutus and Orator (both 46 B.C.) fall into the final period (III).<sup>1</sup> The philosophical treatises, too, although beginning later, may be fitted into this chronological framework. The De re publica, along with the De legibus, which was perhaps revised later, must be assigned to the second period, while the rest of the philosophical works<sup>2</sup> are to be given to the third. Letters<sup>3</sup> of Cicero have been preserved only from 68 on. The bulk of these derives therefore from the second and third periods.

In the case of the speeches,<sup>4</sup> a division into ten periods is appropriate. The first period is divided from the second by Cicero's journey to the East (79–77 B.C.). A third group begins with the Verrines (70 B.C.). His praetorship

<sup>1</sup> De optimo genere oratorum is dated after 52 (perhaps in 46 B.C.); to 46 the Paradoxa Stoicorum. The dating of the Partitiones oratoriae is uncertain (46–45?).

<sup>2</sup> De finibus bonorum et malorum and Academica, Tusculanarum disputationum libri (45 B.C.), De natura deorum, De senectute and Timaeanus (45–44 B.C.), De divinatione, De fato, De amicitia, De officiis, Topica (44).

Inter alia, the following are lost or preserved only in very fragmentary form: Hortensius (45), Consolatio (45), De gloria (44), De virtutibus (44), De auguriis (perhaps after div.), De iure civili in artem redigendo (date unknown), translations of Xenophon's Oeconomicus (a youthful work) and Plato's Protagoras. On the dating of the philosophical writings: K. BRINGMANN, Untersuchungen zum späten Cicero, Göttingen 1971; K. A. NEUHAUSEN, Laelius. Einleitung und Kommentar, Heidelberg 1981, 20–24.

<sup>3</sup> Att. (68–44 B.C.); ad Brut. (43); epist. (62–43); ad Q. fr. (60–54).

<sup>4</sup> Survey of speeches according to ten periods

- I: Preceding the visit to Greece: Quinct. (81); S. Rosc. (80).
- II: After the return to Rome: Q. Rosc. (perhaps 76), Tull. (72–71).
- III: The Verrines: div. in Caec.; Verr. (70); Font. (69), Caecin. (69 or 68).
- IV: Cicero praetor (66): Manil.; Cluent.
- V: Cicero consul (63): leg. agr.; Rab. perd.; Catil.; Mur.
- VI: Before his exile: Sull. (62); Arch. (62); Flacc. (59).
- VII: After his exile: p. red. in sen. (57); p. red. ad Quir. (57, perhaps only a pamphlet); dom. (57); har. resp. (56); Sest. (56); Vatin. (56, perhaps revised in 54); Cael. (56); prov. cons. (56); Balb. (56).
- VIII: Mature period: Pis. (55); Planc. (54); Scaur. (54); Rab. Post. (54–53); Mil. (52).
- IX: Caesarian speeches: Marcell. (46); Lig. (46); Deiot. (45).
- X: Phil. (44–43).

Lost speeches: there are fragments of a further 17 speeches, and about 30 are known by their titles. The most important are: Pro Cornelio de maiestate (65), Oratio in toga candida (an attack from the year 64 on his rivals for the consulship, Antonius and Catiline), In Clodium et Curionem (61), De aere alieno Milonis (an interrogatio, 53). Cicero also wrote laudationes on Cato Uticensis (46) and the latter's daughter Porcia, the wife of M. Brutus.

and consulship mark the fourth and fifth periods. The sixth and seventh periods are grouped around his exile (58–57 B.C.). The eighth corresponds to his maturity (55–52 B.C.), the Caesarian speeches make a ninth division, and the Philippics are the tenth and concluding group.

Survey of Works 2: Speeches

Pro P. Quinctio (81 B.C.)

In a private lawsuit Cicero appeared for P. Quinctius against S. Naevius, who was defended by the famous advocate Q. Hortensius. Parts of the speech are lost.

Pro S. Roscio Amerino (80 B.C.)

In his first criminal case Cicero defended young Roscius from Ameria, who was accused of patricide. Chrysogonus, one of Sulla's favorites, was responsible, along with others, for placing Roscius' father's name on the proscription lists, and for securing after his murder Roscius' property, which had meanwhile been expropriated, for an extremely low price. Since Chrysogonus was particularly anxious to secure Roscius' conviction, none of the better known advocates dared to defend him. Cicero courageously undertook the challenging task, and with great dexterity secured an acquittal.

Pro Q. Roscio comoedo (probably 76 B.C.)

The speech in defense of the actor Roscius has only been partially preserved. Although Cicero had learned from Molon of Rhodes to economize his powers, the Asian style is especially notable in this speech, perhaps delivered shortly afterwards. This may have been intended to defeat the famous orator Hortensius with his own weapons.

Pro Tullio (72 or 71 B.C.)

The speech for Tullius also is only preserved in fragments. Two neighboring property owners are engaged in a boundary dispute. Cicero prosecutes Fabius, whose retainers had killed two of Tullius' slaves.

In Verrem (70 B.C.)

The above speeches for the defense were still close to the Asian manner, but with the speeches against Verres, Cicero succeeded in establishing his own style (third period). As governor of Sicily in the years 73–71 B.C., C. Verres had unscrupulously used extortion against its inhabitants. Cicero secured by his In Q. Caecilium divinatio the right to appear as Verres' accuser, and with a brief but packed speech, delivered on 5 August 70 B.C. (actio prima), and accompanied by witnesses and documents, he secured in the space of nine days Verres' voluntary departure for exile. Later, he published the massive evidence intended for the actio secunda in five books, organized by topic and with rhetorical embellishment: De praetura urbana, De iurisdictione Siciliensi, De re frumentaria, De signis, De suppliciis. They contain real gems of narrative art in Latin.

Pro M. Fonteio (69 B.C.)

This speech in defense of Fonteius has survived only in fragments. It forms a counterpart to the speeches against Verres. Unfortunately in this case Cicero is defending a magistrate whose administration of his province differed little in essentials from that of Verres.

Pro A. Caecina (probably 69 or 68 B.C.)

This fully preserved speech is concerned with the claim to a piece of property, and is a source for our knowledge of late Republican law on this topic. Cicero himself adduces this speech as an example of the simple style (orat. 102). It was perhaps his last oration in a civil case. From now on his concerns were centered on weightier questions.

De lege Manilia (De imperio Cn. Pompei: 66 B.C.)

The fourth period of Cicero's oratory begins with the first political speech delivered by him as praetor. The tribune C. Manilius had proposed to grant Pompey supreme powers in the war against Mithridates and Tigranes, along with the administration of the provinces of Bithynia and Cilicia, and the authority to conclude peace and alliances on his own initiative. Q. Hortensius and Q. Catulus raised objections to this concentration of power in the hands of an individual. In defense Cicero points to the necessity and difficulty of the war against Mithridates which, according to him, Pompey was peculiarly equipped to conduct. The largely epideictic speech is an important 'mirror for generals,' in places almost a 'mirror for princes.'

Pro A. Cluentio Habito (66 B.C.)

Cluentius was accused of poisoning his stepfather Oppianicus. On top of this, he was said eight years before to have prosecuted his stepfather for wishing to poison him. At that time, Oppianicus was found guilty and had to go into exile. Cluentius is now charged with bribing the jurors. In this speech, Cicero makes play with his superior tactical skill. Later, he is said to have remarked that he succeeded in throwing dust in the eyes of the jury (Quint. inst. 2. 17. 21).

De lege agraria (63 B.C.)

The fifth period is marked by Cicero's speeches as consul. Of his four speeches De lege agraria, the second and third are preserved completely, and the first in part. Cicero attacks the proposal by the tribune of 64, P. Servilius Rullus, made under Caesar's inspiration, to appoint an almost almighty commission of ten to sell state lands and with the proceeds buy lots to found colonies in Italy.

Pro Rabirio perduellionis reo (63 B.C.)

One of Caesar's henchmen, the tribune T. Labienus, accused the senator Rabirius of murdering the tribune L. Appuleius Saturninus during a revolt in 100 B.C. Cicero's speech frustrated Caesar's purpose of securing Rabirius' conviction and so deterring senators from intervening against revolutionary movements.

In Catilinam (delivered 63 B.C., revised for publication in 60)

The four speeches against Catiline fall into two pairs. Cicero delivered the first two speeches in November, one before the senate and the other before the people. The first speech was only partially successful. Catiline left Rome, but without his followers. This led Cicero in his last two speeches to assail Catiline's partisans and demand their punishment. The third speech was delivered on December 3 before the people and the fourth on December 5 to the senate. In the speeches to the people, Cicero gives an account of events. In those to the senate there is more argument, for here he had to influence decisions. It was in fact Cato who, on the fifth of December, succeeded in carrying a measure to execute the Catilinarians.

Pro Murena (63 B.C.)

L. Murena was accused by his unsuccessful rival for the consulship of 62 B.C. of using improper means to influence the outcome of the elections. The witty and spirited speech, full of quips at the expense of Stoics and lawyers, led to an acquittal.

Pro Sulla (62 B.C.)

The sixth period in Cicero's oratorical development, that preceding his exile, began in 62 B.C. Sulla was accused of taking part in the Catilinarian conspiracy. Cicero took up his defense, a fact that from the very outset weighed in the defendant's favor. A lack of evidence pointing to innocence was compensated for by a comparison with real revolutionaries. An acquittal followed.

Pro Archia (62 B.C.)

The Roman citizenship of the poet Archias of Antioch was challenged under provisions of the lex Papia (65 B.C.), since Archias' name did not appear on the census lists. The defense counsel could not appeal to laws or documents and so spoke in general terms, and in a way that lends interest even now to his remarks, of the important part played by education and poetry in Roman society. This large perspective meant that the little problem of the poet's Roman citizenship practically disappeared: if he had not already been a citizen, he should be made a citizen as a reward for his services.

Pro L. Valerio Flacco (59 B.C.)

Flaccus was accused of extortion in his province of Asia. Since the details of the indictment could not be disputed, Cicero attempted to throw suspicion on or ridicule the witnesses. His success here was also owed to expansion and generalization. He argued that Flaccus' merits as a whole were decisive for the assessment of his personal character, and moreover that his condemnation would offend all boni.

Oratio cum senatui gratias egit (57 B.C.)

and

Oratio cum populo gratias egit (57 B.C.)

The seventh period embraces the speeches after his return from exile. In two separate but related speeches Cicero thanked the senate and people for his recall, reviled his opponents, the consuls Gabinius and Piso, and justified his own conduct. The second of these speeches was perhaps not delivered but simply published in pamphlet form.

De domo sua ad pontifices (57 B.C.)

During Cicero's exile, Clodius had demolished his house and built on the site a temple of Libertas. The college of pontifices was called upon to decide on the propriety of the dedication. Cicero secured the return of his property. In Mommsen's view, this was the most detailed and important speech of Cicero dealing with public law. Even Cicero himself regarded it as one of his best, and wanted young students to read it (Att. 4. 2. 2).

De haruspicum responsis (56 B.C.)

The haruspices had interpreted a subterranean peal of thunder as a token of the desecration of sacred ground, and Clodius referred this to Cicero's construction of a house on the site of the temple of Libertas. The orator succeeded in showing that the words of the priests referred to Clodius himself.

Pro Sestio (56 B.C.)

In 57, Sestius had been a leading supporter of Cicero's recall. In revenge, Clodius used the lex Plautia to raise an accusation de vi against Sestius. Cicero spoke, as was his practice on many occasions, as the last in a series of defenders, and secured an acquittal. His defense of Sestius also served the purpose of self-justification and the declaration of his own political program.

In P. Vatinius (56–54 B.C.)

This speech from the trial of Sestius was improvised and only later elaborated. Cicero interrogated a witness for the prosecution, P. Vatinius, and assailed him with insults.

Pro M. Caelio (56 B.C.)

M. Caelius Rufus was accused de vi. After Caelius himself and Crassus had dealt with the specific accusation, Cicero turned to the witness Q. Fufius Calenus and the question of Caelius' complicity in the murder of the philosopher Dion, the leader of the embassy from Alexandria. Cicero attempted to clear Caelius of the charge and to discredit the witness of the accusation, Clodia.

De provinciis consularibus (56 B.C.)

As a result of decrees of the senate and the people, Cicero was obliged to intervene on the side of the triumvirs and support the extension of Caesar's command in Gaul. At the same time he had the opportunity to propose the recall of his enemies Gabinius and Piso by stigmatizing the faults in their administration of their provinces. This speech led to a rapprochement between Cicero and Caesar.

Pro L. Cornelio Balbo (56 B.C.)

Pompey had granted to one of Caesar's followers, Balbus of Gades, the right of Roman citizenship. After his receipt of this privilege, an effort was made, by accusing him of usurping his citizenship, to strike at him and simultaneously at his patrons Pompey and Caesar. Cicero delivered the concluding speech for the defense. This offered him the possibility of a rapprochement with Caesar, a change of course that was officially justified by their common interest in concordia.

In L. Calpurnium Pisonem (55 B.C.)

The year 55 opened the culminating period of Cicero's creativity. As a result of Cicero's intervention (prov. cons.), Piso was obliged to leave his province sooner than he had planned, and accordingly assailed Cicero in the senate. Since his accusations were to some degree unanswerable, Cicero employed the methods of personal invective, producing a model of this genre. He indulged in marked self-praise to draw a contrast between himself and Piso, particularly charging him with his allegiance to the Epicurean school.<sup>1</sup> The hostile tirade did no harm to the eminent statesman, who in 50 B.C. was chosen censor.

<sup>1</sup> C. J. CASTNER, Prosopography of Roman Epicureans, Frankfurt 1988, 16–23.

Pro Cn. Plancio (54 B.C.)

Plancius had supported Cicero during his banishment, but was now accused by his rival for the aedileship, Juventius Laterensis, of using illicit means to influence the result of the election. His past achievements and his services to Cicero spoke in his favor. The speech provides an illustration of the topoi of a case dealing with ambitus.

Pro M. Aemilio Scauro (54 B.C.)

Cicero defended Scaurus on a charge of extortion committed during his time as propraetor in Sardinia. The speech is preserved only in fragments.

Pro C. Rabirio Postumo (54–53 B.C.)

Rabirius was accused of taking part in Gabinius<sup>1</sup> extortions in Alexandria. Cicero declared the proceedings to be irregular and the witnesses untrustworthy, while extolling the friendship between Caesar and the accused. This resulted in a perhaps unmerited acquittal.

Pro T. Annio Milone (52 B.C.)

While travelling to Lanuvium, Milo fell in with his and Cicero's mortal enemy Clodius, who met his death in a hand-to-hand scuffle. Pompey, as sole consul, presided over Milo's trial. Henchmen of Clodius shouted down Cicero's speech for the defense. Milo went into exile at Massilia. Cicero replaced his unsuccessful speech with a masterpiece. He organized his defense in stages: the agents were Milo's slaves (status coniecturalis); it was not a murder, but self-defense (status finitionis); Milo would really, as the murderer of a tyrant, deserve divine honors (status qualitatis).

Pro Marcello, better: De Marcello (46 B.C.)

The speeches delivered in Caesar's presence comprise the penultimate or ninth phase of Cicero's oratorical development. M. Claudius Marcellus, one of Caesar's adversaries, was living in exile in Mytilene. His brother, C. Marcellus, begged Caesar in the senate for mercy, and this was granted. In a speech of gratitude rather than of appeal, Cicero broke his silence of some years and eulogized, not so much Caesar's clemency, as the wisdom with which he was putting Republic above himself.<sup>2</sup> It is for it, rather than for himself, that he must now live. This glimmer of hope was followed by the gloom of night: the beneficiary was murdered on his way back to Rome.

<sup>1</sup> Cicero was now compelled actually to defend his enemy Gabinius.

<sup>2</sup> S. ROCHLITZ, Das Bild Caesars in Ciceros Orationes Caesarianae, Frankfurt 1993.

Pro Ligario (46 B.C.)

Ligarius, a Pompeian, who had also been pardoned by Caesar, was living in exile. His family, along with Cicero himself, begged Caesar to permit his return. However, his hope for clemency vanished in the face of an accusation raised against Ligarius by Q. Aelius Tubero. Cicero's aim was less to clear the accused than to ensure Caesar's allegiance to his policy of reconciliation and to the Republic.

Pro rege Deiotaro (45 B.C.)

During the civil war Deiotarus, king of the Galatians, who had a distinguished record of service to Rome, had sided with Pompey. His grandson Castor accused him in 45 of attempting to murder Caesar. Cicero exposed the improbability of the accusation both on external and internal grounds. The emphasis lies on the appeal to Caesar's clemency. The result of the case is unknown.

In M. Antonium orationum Philippicarum libri XIV (44–43 B.C.)

The Philippics, so-called after the speeches delivered by the Greek orator Demosthenes, form the tenth and last phase of Ciceronian eloquence.

1: On 2 September 44 B.C., Cicero justifies his prolonged withdrawal from the political arena and attacks Antony in his absence.

2: The second speech is a polemical pamphlet. Cicero claims to be giving a direct answer in the senate to the abuse levelled at him by Antony during his absence on September 19.

3: On December 20, Cicero proposes that the senate should congratulate D. Brutus and Octavian for their resistance to Antony.

4: Cicero explains to the people current decisions, and goes on to emphasize, as in his third speech, the need to declare Antony a public enemy.

5: On 1 January 43, Cicero again intervenes decisively against the offering of concessions. Antony's opponents should be honored and Antony himself treated as a public enemy.

6: On January 4, Cicero announces to the people the decree honoring Antony's opponents. Before Antony is declared an enemy, the senate has decided to send envoys in search of mediation.

7: The senate should declare war against Antony.

8: Only a public emergency (tumultus) rather than a war (bellum) has been proclaimed. This is too little. New proposals are submitted.

9: Servius Sulpicius, who died while travelling as envoy to Antony, should receive a public funeral and an honorary statue.

10: The senate should retroactively confirm the measures taken by M. Brutus on his own initiative in Macedonia and Greece.

11: Dolabella has executed one of Caesar's assassins, C. Trebonius, proconsul of Asia. Cicero unsuccessfully pleads that C. Cassius should be commissioned to punish Dolabella.

12: In view of the dangers of the journey, Cicero successfully recommends the reversal of a decision to send an embassy to Antony.

13: In answer to the advice given by M. Lepidus and Munatius Plancus in favor of peace, Cicero defends his policy of war. The reading of a letter sent by Antony to Hirtius and Octavian should prove that a peace with Antony is impossible.

14: On April 21, Cicero proposes at the thanksgiving for the victory at Forum Gallorum that Antony should be declared a public enemy, and the title of imperator conferred on the victors.

Survey of Works 3: Rhetorical Writings

De inventione (81–80 B.C.)

This youthful work, toward which the author later took a somewhat aloof stance, is concerned with the first part of rhetorical technique, the finding of material.<sup>1</sup> The 1st book deals with the doctrine of status, and with the individual parts of the speech. The 2nd book, while preserving the doctrine of status, gives more precise treatment to proof and refutation. The work is distinguished by its marked practicality. Prosecutors and defenders are clearly informed how to proceed. Even so, the philosophical element characteristic of Cicero is already evident. Only in alliance with wisdom can eloquence produce a good result (1. 1).

De oratore (55 B.C.)

The masterly dialogue De oratore, dedicated by Cicero to his brother Quintus, is set in 91 B.C. Its chief interlocutors are Antonius and Crassus. In the 1st book Crassus considers the requirements necessary for the career of orator: natural talent, practice and broad education (113–200), especially in Roman law (166–200). His exposition concludes with a picture of the ideal orator (201–203). By contrast with Crassus, Antonius demands from the speaker (209–262) merely rhetorical skills.

The introduction to the 2nd book insists on the union of eloquence and wisdom. As in the 1st book (30–34), here too (33–38) the dialogue opens with a eulogy of the perfect orator. Subsequently Antonius offers a detailed exposition of inventio, dispositio, and memoria, which is interrupted by C. Julius Caesar Strabo's disquisition on wit (217–290). There is also a lively excursus on the writing of history (51–65). In general, on this second day, Antonius is more receptive to the idea of general education.

The 3rd book begins with a moving eulogy of the dead Crassus. It is he who, in what follows, takes up the question of style (elocutio) and delivery (actio). An important excursus demands from the orator philosophical and moral qualities. After a separation of centuries, rhetoric and philosophy should once again permeate and supplement each other.

<sup>1</sup> Inventio est excogitatio rerum verarum aut veri similium, quae causam probabilem reddant (1. 9).

Partitiones oratoriae (after 54 B.C.)

The Partitiones oratoriae, written perhaps soon after 54, were intended as guidance for Cicero's son and nephew. They discuss the orator's activity, speech and its divisions, along with the doctrine of the theme (quaestio). The didactic dialogue, taking the form of a catechism, conducted on this occasion between father and son, is characteristic of ancient methods of instruction. Surprisingly, it is the student, rather than the teacher, who puts the questions. In all probability, however, once the text was learned by heart, the roles were reversed.

After the defeat at Pharsalus (48 B.C.) and his pardon by Caesar, Cicero was condemned to political silence. During this period, he composed his rhetorical writings the Brutus and the Orator, along with the Paradoxa Stoicorum. These works were dedicated to Caesar's later assassin, M. Junius Brutus.

Brutus (46 B.C.)

The dialogue Brutus, written at the start of 46, contains a history of Roman eloquence from its beginnings down to Cicero's own time. After the preface and a survey of the development of Greek oratory (25–52), the work treats five periods: the oldest Roman orators (52–60); the Elder Cato and his contemporaries (61–96); the time of the Gracchi (96–126); the generation of Crassus and Antonius (127–228); and finally Cicero, Hortensius, and their contemporaries (228–329). The work concludes with a brief epilogue. Cicero sees, not without justification, the culmination of Roman eloquence as occurring with himself (119–120), and defends himself against the extreme Atticists. This is an extraordinary essay in literary history. The character sketches and conduct of the dialogue are brilliant.

Orator (46 B.C.)

This work, written in the summer of 46, argues in its proem (1–32) that the perfect orator must be distinguished by philosophical education and be a master of the three styles, the genus tenue, genus medium and genus grande (20–32). The first main section (44–148) particularly develops the doctrine of style (elocutio). The remaining parts of rhetoric are cursorily dealt with (inventio 44–49; dispositio 50; pronuntiatio 54–60). The orator's task consists of probare, delectare, and flectere. This triple division finds its counterpart in the three types of style previously mentioned. In the second main section (149–236), Cicero discusses, with the aid of numerous examples, the doctrine of prose rhythm. To handle a theme so highly technical in a literary and polished form is a remarkable achievement. In this treatise Cicero is principally concerned with the re-evaluation of pathos, where his own particular mastery was evident. This was his way of refuting the attacks of the Atticists on his oratorical style.

De optimo genere oratorum (perhaps 46 B.C.)

This short treatise was also directed against the neo-Atticists. It was not Lysias but Demosthenes who in Cicero's eyes was the real model of style. The work served as an introduction to his translation of the De corona of Demosthenes and the corresponding speech of Aeschines.

Paradoxa Stoicorum ad M. Brutum (46 B.C.)

This work offers the proof that even propositions running contrary to the common view (paradoxa) may be rendered intelligible with the aid of rhetoric: for example, 'moral good is the only good'; 'virtue is sufficient for happiness'.

Ad C. Trebatium Topica (44 B.C.)

This treatise, allegedly written on the sea voyage from Velia to Rhegium (44 B.C.), discusses the 'places' (τόποι) where to find proofs.

Survey of Works 4: Philosophical Writings

De re publica

This dialogue on political philosophy was written after the De oratore in 54 to 51 B.C. The scene is set during the feriae Latinae, shortly before the death of the Younger Scipio (129 B.C.), who is the leading character.

Two books are assigned to the discussions of each day, and to each pair of books Cicero prefixes a proem delivered by himself. The formal division of the work into three corresponds to the division of its contents.

The 1st book discusses the meaning and origin of the state (38–41) and subsequently presents the three simple constitutions, monarchy, aristocracy and democracy, along with their degenerate forms (42–71). The mixed constitution is preferred to all other types on the basis of its aequabilitas and firmitudo.

The 2nd book traces the rise of the mixed constitution during the course of Roman history. The intellectual analysis of the nature and aim of the state in the 1st book is now given concrete illustration by reference to the history of Rome.

Books 3 to 5 are unfortunately preserved in a particularly bad state. The 3rd book examines justice as the basis of the state. There is an important consideration of the views of Carneades and of problems raised by natural law. The 4th book, using individual branches of legislation as examples, shows how justice may assume specific forms.

Books 5 and 6 are concerned with the ideal statesman. The work concludes with the famous Somnium Scipionis, in which a cosmic vision proclaims the statesman's reward in the next world.

De legibus

Along with the De re publica, the De legibus had been occupying Cicero's attention since about 52 B.C. Three books are preserved. At the end of the 3rd, Cicero announces a 4th book. Macrobius (Sat. 6. 4. 8) quotes a 5th book.

Cicero sets this dialogue in the immediate present (summer 52 B.C.). This allows him to refer to current problems. The work takes as its subject the best laws, which, just like the best constitution in the De re publica, are illustrated by Roman example.

The 1st book treats natural law; the 2nd religious law; the 3rd administrative law. The continuation may have been concerned with courts (3. 47) and education (3. 29–30).

Hortensius

Known only from fragments, the Hortensius was an exhortation (protrepticus) to the study of philosophy, and opened a whole series of philosophical writings produced from 45 onward, whose aim was to make the whole of Greek philosophy accessible to a Roman audience.

Academica

Only the 2nd book (Lucullus) survives of the Academica (priora) composed in 45. This is concerned with the certainty of knowledge. Supposedly following the Sosos of Antiochus, Lucullus defends the possibility of knowledge. Cicero disputes it, probably in the steps of Clitomachus or Carneades. A later edition of the work in four books dedicated to Varro (Academica posteriora) is preserved only in parts, principally from the 1st book, in which Varro gives a survey of the philosophical schools down to Carneades.

Timaeus

The surviving remnants of a translation of Plato's Timaeus, composed after June 45 B.C., were perhaps intended as portions of a dialogue on natural philosophy. In 51 Cicero, the Pythagorean Nigidius Figulus, and the Peripatetic Cratippus arrive in Ephesus. The text<sup>1</sup> supplies much evidence of the Roman art of translation and acts as proof of Cicero's intention to present the whole of philosophy.

<sup>1</sup> From the closeness of this work to Plato's Timaeus it does not automatically follow that the rest of Cicero's philosophical writings were mera apographa, only at the most that Cicero felt himself particularly unsure in the field of natural philosophy. In the case of themes nearer to his own interests (politics, rhetoric), his use of sources

De finibus bonorum et malorum

This work was possibly written between May 15 and June 30 in 45 B.C.<sup>1</sup> It takes the shape of three Aristotelian pseudo-dialogues. Different doctrines concerning the highest good are presented in order and refuted. The first discussion (books 1–2) takes place in Cicero's villa at Cumae (1. 14). In the 1st book, L. Manlius Torquatus defends the Epicurean view, and this is countered by Cicero in the 2nd. Books 3 and 4 comprise the second dialogue, set in the year 52 on the Tusculan estate of the young Lucullus (3. 7). M. Cato presents Stoic doctrine in the 3rd book, to be answered by Cicero in the 4th from the Academic standpoint. Cicero emphasizes the agreement of the Stoa with the old Academy and the Peripatos, probably following Antiochus. The third discussion (book 5) takes place during Cicero's student days in Athens (79 B.C.). M. Pupius Piso defends the Academic and Peripatetic doctrine of the highest good, again depending on Antiochus. Subsequently Cicero, who here leans toward Stoic severity, himself speaks briefly.

Tusculanae disputationes

The next work, the Tusculan Disputations, was completed in autumn of 45, and belongs with the De finibus. Both treatises, each of five books, are dedicated to Brutus. In both, Cicero is the chief speaker, and both discuss questions of ethics. As is common in the Aristotelian dialogue, Cicero begins each book of the Tusculan Disputations with a preface. The subsequent conversations are organized in Carneades' manner as scholae (1. 7). The teacher had his listeners advance a thesis which he then discussed in an uninterrupted lecture. The following themes are discussed in individual books: contempt for death (1); the endurance of pain (2); the alleviation of sickness (3); other emotions (4); the self-sufficiency of virtue (5).

De natura deorum

This dialogue was probably finished before 15 March 44, and takes as its theme the nature of the gods. Discussing the pro and con of each question without reaching any clear resolution, Cicero follows the method derived from Socrates and continued through the Middle Academy right down to his own day.

In the 1st book C. Velleius develops the Epicurean theory of the gods (18–56), which subsequently is refuted by the Academic C. Aurelius Cotta in works given literary polish is quite free (De re publica, De oratore). Quotations are expressly indicated.

---

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Att. 13. 19. 4.

(57 ff.). In the 2nd book Q. Lucius Balbus depicts the theology of the Stoa, which for its part is subjected to sharp criticism by Cotta in the 3rd book.

De divinatione

This was in essence completed by Cicero while Caesar was still alive, and published shortly after Caesar's death with certain additions and a second preface (2. 1-7). As in the De natura deorum, here too the disputants argue for and against. In the 1st book Quintus puts forward the Stoic doctrine seeking to give a philosophical basis to the art of soothsaying. In the 2nd book Cicero counters his brother's pleas. His own stance, contrasting with the somewhat incoherent and impassioned impression given by Quintus' speech, is clearly differentiated.

De fato

Completed between May and June 44, this treatise, like the De divinatione, is a supplement to the De natura deorum. Cicero raises the question whether human action is predetermined, and man therefore cannot be held answerable, or whether he decides his course of behavior freely and therefore is answerable for it. He comes down on the side of freedom of the will.

Cato Maior (De senectute)

While Caesar was still dictator, and probably shortly before the Ides of March,<sup>1</sup> Cicero composed his De senectute. The dialogue, in which the speakers are men of an earlier generation, is therefore in the style of Heraclides Ponticus. The action is set in 150 B.C., a time of successes in foreign policy and long before the horror of the civil wars. In conversation with Scipio and Laelius, the Elder Cato refutes four objections made to old age. Political activity is not forbidden to those who are mature, and indeed is peculiarly appropriate to them (15-26). Physical weakness is no defect, since old age uses intellectual talents to compensate (27-38). The disappearance of sensual appetite frees us for philosophy (39-66). There is no need to fear death, since either there is no afterlife or else happiness is in store for those who have done what is right (66-84).

Laelius (De amicitia)

The De amicitia was written after Caesar's death. Similarly dedicated to Atticus and taking the form of a dialogue in Heraclides' manner, it is a companion-piece to the Cato Maior, set in the year 129 and dealing with the nature, duties and limits of friendship.

<sup>1</sup> Cic. div. 2. 3; Att. 14. 21. 2-3.

De officiis

After the two books De gloria, unfortunately not preserved, Cicero composed between October and December 44 B.C. a philosophical testament for his son, De officiis. Here the dialogue form is given up in favor of direct exhortation. The 1st book presents the honestum, the 2nd the utile, both in the train of Panaetius. In the 3rd book Cicero discusses independently—or in succession to Posidonius—the apparent conflict between honestum and utile.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The chief genres into which Cicero's work falls are speeches, rhetorical and philosophical writings, letters and poems.

Within the first group, political and judicial speeches may be distinguished, although the latter also contain political allusions. If the lost eulogies on Cato and Porcia are ignored, purely epideictic speeches are lacking, although the De lege Manilia, the De Marcello, and the defense of Archias contain epideictic features (ideal commander, ideal prince, praise of culture). Here too may be counted the satire on jurists and Stoics in the Pro Murena. On closer inspection, however, it may be seen that even the apparently epideictic pieces serve to deploy an argument.

The political speeches were delivered some before the people and others before the senate;<sup>1</sup> but the attitude and style are in both cases different. Before his colleagues in the senate, Cicero employs more relaxed language. Controversial political figures like the Gracchi are judged differently according to the audience, and an appeal to the immortal gods cannot of course in the senate have the same force as in an address to the people.

The judicial speeches select different stylistic levels to match their subjects.<sup>2</sup>

An orator possessing particular importance for Cicero both as person and as author is Demosthenes. The 2nd Philippic is modelled on the De corona, and the entire collection of Philippics competes, as their very title indicates, with the greatest of Greek orators, whose example was already definitive for the speeches made by Cicero as consul.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> D. MACK, Senatsreden und Volksreden bei Cicero, Würzburg 1937.

<sup>2</sup> The defense of Rabirius against an accusation of high treason is mainly conducted in the genus grande (the aim is movere). The speech on Marcellus, with its eulogy of Caesar's clemency, moves on the graceful level of the middle style (the aim is delectare). Dry civil suits, concerned with subtle juridical differences (e.g. Pro Caecina) require a simple garb (the aim is docere).

The letters are extremely varied. They range from quite informal, private notes (especially to his friend Atticus) to rhetorically polished, official missives, sometimes approximating to the speech or treatise.

The rhetorical and philosophical writings take their place in a long tradition. In the background lurk the great masters, Plato and Aristotle; they are taken up in the light of the philosophical schools which followed them. Yet even direct references to them are possible. Here, only hints can be given.

The De oratore, like Plato's Phaedo, is overshadowed by the approaching death of its chief interlocutor. The conversation takes place beneath a sheltering plane tree (1. 28), a backdrop recalling in detail Plato's Phaedrus.<sup>2</sup> The Timaeus, so far as may be seen, depends closely on the dialogue of the same name. The adornment of the solemn conclusion of the De re publica with a passage translated from the Phaedrus is only one instance out of many. Boldly, Cicero writes both his De re publica<sup>3</sup> and De legibus as a counterpart to Plato's Republic and Laws. But formal dependence, telling though it may be, does not exclude contradiction in content. The place of the ideal state is taken by Rome, and an active life contains more wisdom than any theory. Even in the De legibus domestic conditions are in the speaker's mind, as is proved by his borrowings from the style of old Roman laws.

The notion of a philosophical rhetoric in the De oratore is inconceivable without Plato's Phaedrus and without Isocrates who is mentioned there as a young man with a head for philosophy. It is to Isocrates that Cicero owes his ideal of rhetorical education. He clearly separates himself from Plato's Gorgias, where philosophy and rhetoric are divided.

Cicero was greatly indebted to his Academic teachers Philon and Antiochus. From the first, he derived his enthusiasm for philosophy, the principle of suspension of judgment (inv. 2. 9–10), and, above all, the method of disputatio in utramque partem. To the latter, he owed a good part of his knowledge of the history of philosophy and the incentive to look for shared ideas among Stoic, Peripatetic, and Academic doctrines.

In the De natura deorum, Cicero employs in the 1st book, along with the Epicurean Philodemus (1–56) probably also Philon (from 57 onward), who communicated to him the objections of Carneades. In the 3rd book too, much was borrowed from Philon. An Academic source—probably Carneades—is the basis of the 2nd book of the De divinatione. Carneades also provided material for the De fato, probably transmitted to Cicero by Antiochus. In the De finibus, for book 5 and perhaps also for books 2 and 4, Cicero made use of a work by Antiochus, who in turn was presenting the doctrine of his predecessors, starting with Aristotle and Theophrastus.

<sup>1</sup> W. STROH, Ciceros demosthenische Redezyklen, MH 40, 1983, 35–50.

<sup>2</sup> See W. BURKERT, Cicero als Platoniker und Skeptiker, Gymnasium 72, 1965, 178.

<sup>3</sup> In the De re publica, Cicero also takes account, among others, of Polybius, Panaetius, and Dicaearchus.

It was Aristotle who, in his Protrepticus, provided the model for Cicero's Hortensius, and in general the orator was better acquainted with the great philosopher's now lost exoteric writings than with his surviving esoteric treatises. This means that Cicero is almost more in debt to Aristotle as a literary figure than as a philosopher. It was from Aristotle as a writer that he learned to begin with a personal preface, and to divide the dialogue for long stretches into lengthy speeches by individual participants, as, for example, in the De oratore. In the De finibus, Cicero followed the Aristotelian fashion of assigning the chief role to himself. In the Hortensius, known only in fragments, and in an early version of the De re publica, he personally took part in the discussion.<sup>1</sup>

In the De inventione Cicero declared that he had drawn the best from numerous works, naming among others Aristotle and Hermagoras. His relation to the Auctor ad Herennium is obscure, and it may be a case of parallel versions based on lectures which had been heard by both. The intellectual approach of the De oratore was decisively influenced by the school of Aristotle, not only in its theory of humor, but also for example in its fundamental doctrine of rational and emotional means of persuasion. Theophrastus and Aristotle served as sources for the Orator. Aristotelian doctrine was transmitted to many works by intermediate Hellenistic sources. Cicero is convinced that in his Topica he is presenting the Topica of Aristotle, though in fact the connections with Aristotle's Rhetoric are closer and the basic framework is Stoic.

Epicurean material was drawn from Philodemus and perhaps from Cicero's teacher Phaedrus. Unfortunately, the orator reflects the doctrines of this school in a careless and imprecise fashion.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Dialogues, set in the historical past, such as the final version of the De republica, the De amicitia, and the De senectute, follow a tradition traceable in Heraclides Ponticus.

<sup>2</sup> Cicero is perhaps following neo-Epicurean sources (as in De finibus 1). In nat. deor. 1 his concern is with Philodemus (De pietate).

Stoic sources are more numerous. In the De amicitia, Cicero was probably following Panaetius' treatise Περὶ κοθήκοντος, in which doctrines of Aristotle and Theophrastus were also utilized. In the first two books of the De officiis, he made use of the same work by Panaetius, while in the 3rd book, an independent addition, he may have drawn on Posidonius.<sup>1</sup> In the 2nd book of the Tusculan Disputations he employed a letter of Panaetius to Q. Tubero. For the Tusculans in general, other Stoic sources may also be considered, though the whole question is quite uncertain. A Stoic handbook is also taken to have been the model for the 2nd book of the De natura deorum. The Stoic doctrines in the 3rd book of the De finibus may be derived from works of this school, perhaps through the mediation of Antiochus.

The philosophy of law found in the De legibus and in portions of the De re publica displays Stoic influences. In the 1st book of the De divinatione Cicero principally uses Posidonius. The Topica do not merely mention the Stoa. They employ Stoic logic, and the whole division of the topoi rests on Stoic categories.

Since Hellenistic philosophy is largely known to us at second hand, it is not easy to identify Cicero's sources, and to assess the degree of his independence. He himself on one occasion describes his works as 'mere transcripts' (mera apographa), to which he allegedly supplies only the words, of which he possesses an abundance (Att. 12. 52. 2). That the urbane irony of the Roman at his own expense is not to be taken entirely literally is shown by those passages whose models are preserved. For example, in the De re publica Cicero is quite independent vis-à-vis Plato. In the Academica (1. 6) he clearly emphasizes his own contribution. There is no mere translation, but his own judgment, his own arrangement of the material, and brilliant diction.<sup>2</sup> Conversely, not all the writings are polished with the same care, and particularly in the late period a more mechanical use of sources cannot be excluded. Before all else the reader must draw subtle distinctions, depending in each case on the intention of the work and of the individual passage. Where Cicero visibly organizes his words with artistic skill and at the same time speaks with a certain expertise, as in the areas of politics and rhetoric and at times in that of ethics, he modifies his originals. Examples are found in the De re publica, the De oratore, the De legibus and probably also the De senectute, the De amicitia and parts of the Tusculan Disputations. He follows his predecessors more closely in reporting their teachings (from the Academica to the De fato), although errors and simplifications are not absent. In his criticism of their views Cicero at times sets the arguments of the different schools in counterpoint. Here too he can intervene to order and correct, but his presentation and refutation are not always clearly harmonized.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. A. R. ДУСК, Notes on Composition, Text, and Sources of Cicero's De officiis, Hermes 112, 1984, 215–227; for Posidonius: 223–227; cf. Att. 16. 11. 4.

<sup>2</sup> Quod si nos non interpretum fungimur munere, sed tuemur ea, quae dicta sunt ab iis, quos probamus, eisque nostrum iudicium et nostrum scribendi ordinem adiungimus, quid habent, cur Graeca anteponant iis, quae et splendide dicta neque sint conversa de Graecis? (acad. 1. 6).

Apart from books and collections of material in Greek, which Cicero often commissioned (Att. 16. 11. 4; 16. 14. 4), oral sources must also be weighed. Much was no doubt discussed with learned friends before it was written down. The Stoic Diodotus was a resident of his house, and his secretary Tiro was a man of education.

Cicero's poetry belongs to the genre of didactic and of the panegyric epic. For the Aratea, a didactic poem on astronomy, the model was supplied by the Hellenistic didactic poet Aratus. The epic panegyrics stand between Ennius and Virgil. It is easy to make fun of the fact that Cicero's poetic achievement was far inferior to that of his prose writings. Nevertheless for some time he was Rome's greatest living poet, and his artistry prepared the way for Augustan classicism.

Literary Technique

In the assessment of the later elaboration, both in content and form, of the speeches, several layers are to be distinguished. The primary layer is that of the orator's general 'strategic' plan, determined by the individual circumstances of each case. The selection of facts and the sequence of their presentation principally depend on their relevance to the point Cicero wants to make. This may be illustrated by putting oneself in the position of a lawyer for the defense using the ancient doctrine of status. His first task is to decide whether he can deny the guilty act. If that is not possible, he will advance another legal definition, such as 'excusable homicide' rather than 'murder'. If that is impossible, he will stress its particular moral quality, as for example the murder of a tyrant.<sup>1</sup> In extreme necessity, he will argue for the incompetence of the court. In each case, the general strategy adopted by the speaker will determine the choice, evaluation, and organization of the individual elements, and the structure of the entire speech. This decisive first phase of planning can only be mentioned here rather than presented in detail.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> For example in the Pro Milone, though without surrendering other status.

At a less abstract level, which may be called literary in a narrower sense, the formal rules of the rhetorical tradition, as they apply to the individual parts of a speech, interact with the principle of the emotional arrangement of the whole, developed by Cicero as an uninterrupted process of persuasion.

The speeches may now be analyzed according to their parts. The introduction attempts to secure the sympathy of the listener, using as its point of departure the character of the accused, of the accusers, of the judge, of the circumstances of the case, and not seldom even of the defender, Cicero, who may for example throw onto the scales his own authority as a consular. In this way the exordium both offers an introduction to the matter in hand and, in the fashion of an overture in music, displays strong thematic links with the rest of the speech.

The arrangement of the material in the narratio and the argumentatio is determined by the particular circumstances. While the narrative in speeches really delivered must aim for simple credibility, in undelivered speeches, especially in the Actio secunda against Verres, Cicero displays a consummate art of literary narrative, using a rich store of artistic resources.

In the argumentatio, most often combined with the narratio, Cicero deploys a particularly adroit lawyer-like scheme: he often sets the strongest arguments at the beginning and end, with the somewhat weaker in the middle, just as a general positions the bravest soldiers in the vanguard and rear, so that the rest are forced to take part in the combat. He may also argue in great detail where he feels himself on secure ground, and hasten quickly past awkward points which could tell against his client.

The conclusion of the speech often rises to a tone of adjuration laden with pathos, aiming to stir in the juror anger or sympathy.

Such differences in the literary technique of the individual parts of the speech offer only a first approach. Cicero's particular art lies in lending to his speech as a whole an affective coloring and in this way supporting his reasoned arguments by emotion and suggestion. A second psychological feature of Cicero's speeches is their humor which, for example, distinguishes them from those of Demosthenes. Finally, Cicero is especially apt at emphasizing the deeper meaning of each case for the Roman audience as a whole. To this end, he employs among others the artistic method of 'digression', which nevertheless on closer view proves to be relevant to the argument. It is not by chance that in the Pro Archia Cicero talks of education and society, in the De lege Manilia of the ideal commander, and in the Caesarian orations of the prudence and clemency of the statesman. The ability of the orator to universalize the individual case and set it in a general framework is a principal reason for the attention still given by later generations to Cicero's speeches.

---

<sup>1</sup> W. STROH, Taxis und Taktik. Die advokatische Dispositionskunst in Ciceros Gerichtsreden, Stuttgart 1975.

The term 'literary technique' has only limited application to the body of Cicero's letters. A distinction must be drawn between those that were purely private and those that were destined for the public. The latter are closer to the speech. The former follow the rules of epistolography: brevity, set forms at beginning and end, simple conversational tone, humor and use of quotations. For the detail s. 'Language and Style' below.

The literary technique of the philosophical and rhetorical writings is in part determined by the tradition of the dialogue. As in Plato, there are descriptions of scenery, though they also bear Roman features. The revelation of the next world in the Somnium Scipionis pays indirect homage to the greatest author among the philosophers, and indeed the entire structure of the De re publica recalls, though loosely, that found in Plato. The De oratore, De re publica, and the De legibus are given the dress of Aristotelian dialogues, marked by long uninterrupted speeches and personal prefaces to the individual books. The displacement of dialogues to a somewhat distant past is perhaps influenced by Heraclides Ponticus.

It was not normal practice to publish a technical work, for example a treatise on rhetoric, in artistically polished shape. Cicero was innovative in arranging the De oratore as a literary masterpiece. In the Orator he went so far as to treat technical questions of prose rhythm in literary form. Only a handful of later philosophical authors matched Cicero's mastery as an author and his accessibility. His rhetorical writings remained in general the only ones that could command a readership.

The literary technique of the poems is partly conditioned by their author's rhetorical training, as when, in the poem on his consulate, the Muse Urania appears as the speaker in solemn personification.

Language and Style<sup>1</sup>

First, the style of Cicero's speeches may be considered in its chronological development. The difference of style between the speeches of the first and those of the second phase (s. Survey of Works) should, on the basis of Cicero's own admission about his transformation at the hands of Molon, be greater than it really is. Yet, in both these first stages of the development of his oratory, different tendencies run counter. No less important than Molon's influence was Cicero's rivalry with the great orator Hortensius. In the Pro Q. Roscio comoedo Cicero struck down his rival with his own weapons, and this explains why this speech is more 'Asian' than anything else by Cicero, even though it was produced after he had undergone Molon's discipline. Therefore, it is only the third period, that of the Verrines, which shows clearly what Cicero meant by his victorious struggle with his youthful redundancy. In the fourth period, the largely epideictic De lege Manilia shows a particularly studied periodic structure and subtle prose rhythms. The fifth phase embraces the rich palette of the consular speeches, considered by Cicero himself as a self-contained corpus. Here his mastery is revealed in the linguistic and topical differentiation between speeches addressed to the senate and those addressed to the people.

A high point is formed in the second half of the fifties by the eighth group, containing the speeches In Pisonem and Pro Milone. The individual speech here is carried throughout by the orator's emotionality, in the so-called vehemens manner. Stylistically it possesses an inner unity. Even apparent negligence and awkwardness serve a rhetorical purpose. Thus the narratio in the Pro Milone produces a more credible effect precisely by its relative clumsiness and circumstantiality.

The 9th group consists of the speeches delivered before Caesar. Bearing in mind his extremely narrow circle of listeners, Cicero avoids here resorting to any strong rhetorical effects. The (for him) unusually spare instrumentation, to some degree like that of chamber music, makes these appeals for clemency into prize specimens of Ciceronian eloquence. The place of the rich fullness of the eighth period is now taken by wisdom and serenity. In the last division, the Philippics, quite different features of old age are revealed: austerity and rigor, inner freedom.

<sup>1</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1973.

The characteristics of these individual phases are not exclusively related to a chronological development of Cicero's style in the course of his career. Literary creativity especially shows in the fact that an author goes back to former stages of his development or anticipates later stages. Consideration of the given audience and the peculiarity of the particular case are further factors determining the details of diction. Nevertheless, a development may be observed. It leads towards ever greater harmony between form and content, to the removal of purely conventional flourishes and of pedantic symmetry, towards ever more subtle irony and ever more refined employment even of apparently well-known elements.

Within each individual speech there are also characteristic differences of style. The proem prefers a pleasing, even flow of language, a pondered periodic structure and elegantly inobtrusive choice of words. Intrusive pathos is often here just as much avoided as humorous effects. The speaker lingers in the realm of the 'middle style', intended to delight the listener. Conversely, the narrative and argumentation tend towards the 'simple style'. Sentences are short, plain coordination prevails, vocabulary may approximate to that of everyday, wit and irony are in order. Here, simplicity is the servant of credibility. The emotional peroratio on the other hand displays features of the 'high style': affective language filled with images, lively and sometimes even abrupt syntax, personifications, religious terms and formulas.

Depending on the content and meaning of the speech, a particular level of style tends to predominate. Where a sober problem of law of slight scope is in question, the 'low style' prevails (Pro Caecina). In a matter giving occasion for graceful epideictic composition, the 'middle style' comes into play (De lege Manilia). If the topic is the res publica or even indeed high treason, the 'lofty style' is appropriate (Pro Rabirio perduellionis reo). Cicero himself advances these examples (orat. 102). Basically, it is a matter of atmosphere and appropriateness, factors undeniably influencing both choice of words and structure of sentences.

Speeches to the senate and people are distinguished by their intended audience. The latter are more purely Latin, since the language of educated senators was more permeated by Graecisms.

Understandably, the invectives draw more heavily on everyday language than the remaining speeches.

The letters are characterized by the frequency of colloquial elements, to which belong, for example, diminutives and ellipses. The relatively large number of Greek words and quotations in the letters corresponds to the nature of colloquial style, just as a certain sort of English conversation may be larded with French terms. The colloquialism of the letter is associated with its peculiar nature as 'conversation with an absentee'. The frequency of the quotations is conditioned by the principle of the ridiculum, which is typical of many letters. Prose rhythm is more evident in official letters than in private ones, although here too it is not entirely missing. Even in his everyday expressions, Cicero cannot wholly disown the writer in himself.

The vocabulary of the theoretical writings is different from that of the speeches. On the one hand, in the parts cast as dialogue, elements of educated colloquial language are more common. On the other, the technical sections are richer in specialized terms. In both directions however, Cicero preserves a balance so as to be understood by his readers.

Even within each work there are stylistic differences. In the De oratore the two chief speakers, Antonius and Crassus, are distinguished by their intellectual and linguistic individuality. Within the De re publica a slightly old-fashioned patina tints the historical presentation of book 2 and the 'revelation' of book 6. Even more evident is the archaic turn of phrase in the artificial legalisms of the De legibus. Descriptions of landscapes may contain poetic words. This means that the range of colors in the philosophical and rhetorical writings is wider than in the speeches.

The vocabulary of the poems is closer to the Ennian tradition than that of the prose writings. The latter draw on older registers only rarely, although it is true that later readers took offense at some old-fashioned compounds in Cicero, as did Seneca<sup>1</sup> in objecting to suaviloquens and breviloquentia.

In general, Cicero's language and style obey the laws of aptum. He is master of a gamut of different registers which he can set in play according to topic and audience. Classical Latin is not a monolith but a medium, with many hues and many aspects. The great orator set a lasting stamp on Latin prose.<sup>1</sup> Although the next generation was to tread other stylistic paths, no subsequent Latin author could avoid coming to terms with Cicero. His enrichment of philosophical vocabulary was utterly influential. Cicero bestowed on Latin, and so on modern idiom, many important terms including atomus<sup>2</sup> and what was originally a Latinizing of this word individuum. The prudent restraint he displayed in the use of abstract notions was still shared by Seneca. It was only with Tertullian that this sort of inflation began. It continues down into the languages of our time.

---

<sup>1</sup> Apud Gell. 12. 2. 7.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Theoretical statements about literature are particularly found in Cicero's rhetorical writings. So far as his own work is concerned, the proems of his philosophical works are especially relevant, for in them, to some extent, he is pleading his own cause. Thus, at the beginning of the De re publica he explains the principles justifying his literary activities, and reflects on the relationship between otium and negotium. Elsewhere he expresses his thoughts on the problems of philosophical literature in Latin, and its didactic aims.

The composition of historical works is examined by Cicero in his theoretical writings, and also in his letter to Lucceius. His treatises on rhetoric are not content with mere description. They are a guide to the production of specific kinds of composition, aimed at securing a quite precisely defined effect. The concern with practical application is most visible in the De inventione, a work which, for long stretches, reads like a guide to the discovery of effective arguments. The De oratore raises with greater emphasis, in Aristotle's train, the question of the underlying philosophical and psychological causes of rhetorical effect. In particular, we may mention its thorough treatment of humor, put by Cicero in the mouth of an expert in this area, Julius Caesar Strabo. But the matter of the inner unity, in Plato's sense, of the speech is also surveyed. The composition is seen as an organic whole. Cicero is well aware that a speech must possess unity of feeling, and that between introduction and main part there must be close thematic links, a requirement which unfortunately he himself sometimes ignores.

---

<sup>1</sup> His poetic art, too, prepares the way for that of the Augustans.

<sup>2</sup> Lucretius avoids the word.

The Orator considers language and style with especial attention to prose rhythm. Contrary to the views of the Atticists, in Cicero's opinion the perfect orator cannot be satisfied with a single stylistic level, that of the genus tenue. Rather, in accordance with the varying topic and circumstances, he must draw on loftier or more appealing registers.

The closeness of the theories expressed in the De oratore and the Orator to Cicero's own practice may be shown in detail.<sup>1</sup> But even the early treatise De inventione, though rejected by its own author, retains its importance for his way of writing. Perhaps he later distanced himself from it only because it was rather too frank in its revelations of the tricks of rhetorical invention?

Artful arrangement in the speeches is in each case so closely adapted to the nature of the occasion that, although theory may provide very useful assistance, it cannot supply total explanations. To put the matter briefly, Cicero's practice is inconceivable without theory, but it is better than his theory.

In the prefaces to his writings, Cicero offers a basis for his literary activity. The De re publica shows the orator caught in the tension between politics and leisure.<sup>2</sup> The later philosophical writings are justified by the didactic purpose they aim to serve. At the same time, Cicero consciously strives to enrich the language and literature of his native land.

He gives particularly thorough consideration to the theory of a literary genre which he could no longer practice himself, history. He praises the simplicity of Caesar's Commentaries, and grasps their high literary quality, concealed behind their modest title. Yet there are grounds for supposing that his own ideal of historical writing lay rather in the tradition of the 'Herodotean' Theopompus, which means that it was perhaps later realized by Livy. In the guide which he sent to Luceius for the composition of a history of his own consulship, the request he makes not to attach too great importance to truth sounds somewhat unhappy to modern ears. The ancient reader would have recognized here the principles of the 'tragic' method of historiography.

<sup>1</sup> S. L. LAURAND, 4th ed. 1936-1938; M. VON ALBRECHT 1973.

<sup>2</sup> G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, Politik und Muße. Zum Prooemium und Einleitungsgespräch von Ciceros De re publica, München 1969.

Approaches to a theory of epistolography are also found in Cicero, though how far his individual remarks are to be taken as part of a developed theory may well be disputed.

In his attitude to the Latin language, both in theory and practice, Cicero is guided by good usage. He is therefore a purist, but by no means so committed a champion of analogy as Caesar. It was Caesar who rightly described Cicero as the 'master of richness' (princeps copiae).

Cicero knew the deficiencies of the Latin language, but attempted to remedy them by the astonishing richness of his linguistic resources.<sup>1</sup> That even so he did not take the step towards unrestricted formation of abstracts is a positive consequence of his attention both to language and to ease of reading. With love, and not without humor, he praises Latin for being able to express even intellectual truths more clearly than Greek. Thus, according to him, the very word insania shows that wisdom and health belong together (Tusc. 3. 10). The Romans of old experienced the con-vivium as a community of life, while the Greeks obviously knew the symposium only as a community of drink (epist. 9. 24. 3).

Ideas II

From the moment of his first encounter with Philon of Larissa at Rome, Cicero felt himself to be a Platonic philosopher. The skepticism of the New Academy under Philon remained decisive for him, although later he made the acquaintance of the more dogmatic views of Antiochus of Ascalon, who claimed he could restore the Old Academy. Perhaps under the influence of this teacher, he replaced, in the political writings of his middle period, doubt in principle by doubt as method. Confronted with the Roman state and its laws, even the voice of the New Academy and its universal skepticism must fall silent (leg. 1. 39). Stoic influences, especially congenial to the Romans' nature, came from his domestic philosopher Diodotus; in fact, they did not contradict the views of Antiochus, to whom Cicero owed his firm conviction that the Old Academy, the Peripatos and the Stoa were in close sympathy. Philon's advice, to give a hearing even to the Epicureans, was followed by Cicero reluctantly and with corresponding lack of success. In this area, his teacher at Athens was

<sup>1</sup> Cic. nat. deor. 1. 8 Quo in genere tantum profecisse videmur, ut a Graecis ne verborum quidem copia vinceremur.

Phaedrus. In his late works, he again emphasized his closeness to the 'New' Academy, which meanwhile had come to seem old-fashioned. In general, there is less of a coherent line of philosophical development in Cicero than an attitude, which as occasion arises seeks for appropriate arguments and ideas where they are to be found. If this attitude is forced to declare a bias, it is most advantageously represented as that of the skeptic.

And yet Cicero's interest in philosophy is not simply a pose. He was aware that he owed everything to his education. For him philosophy was not merely a refuge in the years of his enforced idleness (55-51 B.C.) nor simply a consolation after the death of his daughter Tullia (45 B.C.), but in general the very basis of his achievement. When therefore he raised in the De oratore the demand that the orator should possess a thorough philosophical training, this was not mere affectation, but something that corresponded to his own experience.

In one passage Cicero ascribes to the Elder Cato great enthusiasm both for learning and for teaching (rep. 2. 1. 1). This typically Roman impulse was also powerfully felt by the orator. He may be taken at his word when he says that, in composing his philosophical writings, he was also pursuing didactic aims. In fact, he wanted to create for the younger generation at Rome an encyclopedia of philosophy written in Latin, and this demanding aim was nearly attained by him.

His philosophical writings were not simply a vehicle for Greek thought. They reveal that they were composed by a Roman. This is why his De re publica emphasizes the original unity of philosophy and political action, and the preeminence of experience over ratio. Accordingly, Cicero assigns to legislators a higher place than to Epicurean philosophers and their withdrawal from active life. Virtus is affirmed in practice and may not be divorced from it. As a Roman realist Cicero did not search for the ideal state in a Platonic realm of Ideas and Utopias, but found it realized in the Roman constitution. If in this respect his outlook is more Aristotelian than Platonic, this accords with the Roman attitude to life.

In the sphere of ethics also Cicero avoids extreme theoretical positions. His De officiis characteristically does not look back to the strict doctrines of the Old Stoa, but to the ethical teaching of Panaetius, whose merit was to adapt them to life's realities. Not content with clothing Greek thoughts in Latin dress, he draws the ethical and political experiences of Romans into the discussion. What is more: in a theoretical treatise such as the De natura deorum, he clearly defines the abstract and dynamic idea of god developed by the Romans, different from the anthropomorphism of the Greeks. In general, the illustration of philosophical theses and ethical modes of behavior by examples taken from Roman history forms far more than mere external trappings. It gives expression to the Roman tendency to think in exempla and the conviction that only action constitutes reality.

Given these premises, it is not surprising that Cicero's negative criticism is particularly directed against the Epicureans, whose indifference in matters political seemed to him dangerous. Their exaltation of pleasure as the highest good was a product of the Greek enjoyment of life, just as was their doctrine of corporeal gods exempt from concern with specific goals. Of course a Roman, whose notion of god was abstract, whose civilization was founded on prohibitions and directed towards purposeful action, was bound to find all this repulsive. Though others, including for example his best friend Atticus, by no means found Roman nature and Epicureanism incompatible, during his whole life Cicero could never overcome his prejudices against this doctrine.

In other respects, Greek philosophy did allow Cicero to rise beyond the traditional ideas of his people, as for example in the deeper significance given to the notion of glory as 'true honor' (verum decus) in the 6th book of the De re publica.

On the whole, the degree of absorption of the elements of Greek culture differs according to genre. In his speeches, Cicero avoids the word philosophia, and occasionally the Younger Cato is mocked as an out-of-touch doctrinaire. In the speeches philosophical notions are played down. In his treatises they are conveyed partly by the use of Greek words and partly by Latin calques. Thus Cicero enriched the Latin language with numerous intellectual terms which have become permanently established.<sup>1</sup> His particular achievement was the introduction of philosophy into Roman life and Latin literature. He is one of the few philosophical authors in the literature of the world who has succeeded in writing readable books.

A uniform philosophical outlook is not to be expected from Cicero. He was after all a man of practical affairs, and even on theoretical grounds in an Academic skeptic a coherent system would be out of place. Rather Cicero set, often with the aid of dialogue, different opinions in counterpoint, without final commitment to either party.

---

<sup>1</sup> Qualitas, perceptio, probabilitas, evidentia, causae efficientes.

He achieved with this something in the manner of Philon, who had required his students to illumine a problem from two opposing sides. What seems more important than any monolithic philosophy is a philosophical inquiry conducted in conversation among equal partners representing different opinions. Thus Cicero followed a method traceable in the last analysis to Plato. Athens however was a democracy, while Rome continued to be an aristocracy. If therefore the conversational tone was more attentive and polite than in Plato, this certainly had a social reason. But there was also a deeper reason of content: often in Cicero the question had to be left unresolved, who was the teacher and who the student, who was right and who was wrong. Reticence about his own judgment belongs, in the case of a skeptic, to the essence of his philosophical method.<sup>1</sup> At times skepticism also serves as a method of bringing up topics hardly susceptible of proof, such as the immortality of the soul or the activity of the gods, without forcing a specific belief upon the reader. In keeping his own opinion to himself, Cicero left to his listeners the freedom of conscience necessary for philosophical inquiry. Seneca's missionary style, aiming to influence the reader's will, is quite different.

The skeptical and dialogical character of Cicero's philosophy fits well with his consistent political stand in favor of a republican constitution. He is anything but a dogmatic tyrant. His criticisms of Caesar are simply part of this logic.<sup>2</sup> The dictator only finds acknowledgment insofar as he gives room to hope that he will yield to the claims of the senate and the Republic (for example in the De Marcello). He is particularly recognized for a quality that puts him on a par with the senators and Cicero himself: as an orator (Brut. 252). So it was that Cicero, even within the world of his ideas, taken as a whole, remained astonishingly true to himself.

Transmission

Speeches

Cicero subsequently edited his consular speeches as a collection (though without Mur.). He himself interpreted the Philippics as a distinct group. His freedman Tiro collected the Verrines in a single edition. In antiquity, the Caesarian speeches and perhaps also the Catilinarians (Invectivae) formed self-contained groups. The tradition we have knows of a collection of speeches dating from the years 57–56. Tiro also produced a collected edition of the speeches. Only hints of the transmission may be given here.

<sup>1</sup> Already formulated with astonishing clarity and decisiveness in inv. 2. 4–10, esp. 10: ut ne cui rei temere atque arroganter assenserimus. Verum hoc quidem nos et in hoc tempore et in omni vita studiose, quoad facultas feret, consequemur.

<sup>2</sup> Brut. 2; 4; 7; 16; 157; 251; 266; 328–332; s. now H. STRASBURGER 1990.

Quinct.: Palimpsestus Taurinensis (P; ca. 5th century); Parisinus 14 749, olim S. Victoris 91 (V or  $\Sigma$ ; 15th century; cf. on S. Rosc. and Mur.).

S. Rosc.: Parisinus 14 749, 15th century (as a witness for the vetus Cluniacensis discovered by Poggio); also palimpsests (Vaticanus and Bononiensis).

Q. Rosc.: inter alia Laurentianus 48, 26, 15th century (as a later witness for a manuscript discovered by Poggio).

Tull.: Fragmenta Taurinensia; Palimpsestus Mediolanensis 4th–5th century (ed. princeps: A. Mai, Mediolani 1817).

Verr.: all Verrines are found in Parisinus 7776 (p; 11th century); individual fragments in the Palimpsestus Vaticanus Reginensis 2077 (V; 3rd–4th century).

div. in Caec., Verr. I and Verr. II. 1: Parisinus 7823 (D; 15th century, as replacement for the partially preserved Parisinus 7775 (S; 12th–13th century); for II. 1 and 2 there are also papyrus fragments.

Verr. II. 2 and 3: Cluniacensis 498, nunc Holkhamicus 387 (C; 9th century) with the more complete transcript Lagomarsinianus 42 (O; 15th century).

Verr. II. 4 and 5: Parisinus 7774 A (R; 9th century).

Font.: Codex Tabularii Basilicae Vaticanae H. 25 (8th–9th century); Palimpsestus Vaticanus Palatinus 24 (4th–5th century).

Caecin.: Monacensis 18 787, olim Tegurinus (T; 11th–12th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century).

Manil.: Pap. Oxyrh. 8, 1911, 1097 (§§ 60–65); Palimpsestus Taurinensis (lost) §§ 40–43; Harleianus 2682 (H; 11th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century); Tegurinus (T; 11th–12th century) along with the complete Hildesheimensis (t; 15th century).

Cluent.: Cluniacensis and Laurentianus LI, 10 (M; 11th century).

leg. agr.: Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century).

Rab. perd.: Vaticanus Lat. 11 458 (V; a. 1417).

Catil.: Cluniacensis 498, nunc Holkhamicus; Ambrosianus C. 29 inf. (A; 10th–11th century); Vossianus Lat. O. 2 (V; 10th–11th century); Laurentianus XLV, 2 (a; 12th–13th century).

Mur.: authoritative Parisinus 14 749, olim St. Victoris 91 (V or  $\Sigma$ ; 15th century); inferior: Laurentianus plut. XLVIII, 10 (A; written by Ioannes Arretinus in 1415).

Sull.: Monacensis 18 787, olim Tegurinus (T; 11th–12th century); Vaticanus Palatinus 1525 (V; a. 1467; contains only 1–43); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century; contains only 81–93).

Arch.: Bruxellensis 5352, olim Gemblacensis (G; 12th century); Berolinensis

252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century); Vaticanus Palatinus 1525 (V; a. 1467); EV belong together.

Flacc.: Codex tabularii Basilicae Vaticanae H. 25 (V; 8th–9th century).

p. red. in sen., p. red. ad Quir., dom., har. resp.: Best manuscript: Parisinus Lat. 7794 (P; mid-ninth century); also Bruxellensis 5345, olim Gemblacensis (G; 12th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century); Harleianus 4927 (H; late 12th century).

Sest. and Vatin.: Parisinus 7794 (P; 9th century).

Cael.: Pap. Oxyrh. 10, 1251 (parts of §§ 26–55, already showing a mixture of readings); otherwise as for p. red. in sen.

prov. and Balb.: Parisinus; Bruxellensis; Erfurtensis (see p. red. in sen.).

Pis.: Palimpsestus Taurinensis (P; ca. 5th century); Codex tabularii Basilicae Vaticanae H. 25 (V; 8th–9th century).

Planc.: Monacensis 18 787, olim Tegurinus (T; 11th–12th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (12th–13th century); § 27 is found in a Berlin papyrus.

Saur.: Palimpsestus Ambrosianus (ed. A. Mai 1814) and Palimpsestus Taurinensis, mutually supplementary.

Rab. Post.: only recent manuscripts, going back to a codex brought to Italy from Cologne by Poggio.

Mil.: Harleianus 2682 (H; 11th century); Monacensis 18 787, olim Tegurinus (T; 11th–12th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century).

Marcell., Lig., Deiot.: 3 families:

Alpha: Ambrosianus (A; 10th–11th century); Harleianus 2682 (H; 11th century); Vossianus Lat. O., 2 (V; 10th–11th century).

Beta: Bruxellensis 5345 (B; 11th century); Dorvillianus 77 (D; 10th–11th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (E; 12th–13th century), Harleianus 2716 (L; 11th century).

Gamma: the remaining manuscripts; for Marcell. and Lig. esp. Mediceus L. XLV (m; 11th century); for Deiot. esp. Gudianus 335 (g; 10th–11th century).

Phil.: authoritative Vaticanus (tabularii Basilicae Vaticanae) H. 25 (V; 8th–9th century). The remaining manuscripts are grouped together as decurtati (D): Bernensis 104 (b; 13th–14th century); Monacensis 18 787, olim Tegurinus (T; 11th–12th century); Vossianus Lat. O., 2 (n; 10th–11th century); Vaticanus Lat. 3228 (s; 10th century); familia Colotiana (c): Parisinus Lat. 5802 (13th century); Parisinus Lat. 6602 (13th century); Berolinensis Phill. 1794, olim 201 (12th century).

Rhetorical Writings

inv.: rich tradition. Unfortunately, the better manuscripts are lacunose (1. 62–76; 2. 170–174); Herbiopolitanus Mp. m. f. 3 (9th century); Sangallensis 820 (10th century); Parisinus 7774 A (9th century with important corrections); Vossianus 70 (9th century).

de orat., Brut., or.: common tradition subdivided into two families:

1. Codices mutili (trustworthy): Abrincensis 238 (A; 9th century); Erlangensis 848 (E; 10th century); Harleianus 2736 (H; 9th century).

2. Laudensis, discovered in 1421/22<sup>1</sup> by Bishop G. Landriani of Lodi (text heavily corrected); lost in 1428. Reconstruction is made from the codices integri, derived from the Laudensis. The most important are Palatinus 1469 (P; a. 1423); Ottobonianus 2057 (O; a. 1422); Florentinus I 1, I 4 (F; a. 1423).

part. or.: Parisinus 7231 (10th–11th century); Parisinus 7696 (11th–12th century).

parad.: Vossianus 84 and 86; Vindobonensis 189 (s. under Philosophical Writings).

opt. gen.: Sangallensis 818 (11th century).

top.: Leidensis Vossianus 84 and 86 (s. under Philosophical Writings); Einsidlensis 324 (10th century); Sangallenses 830 (10th century) and 854 (10th–11th century); Ottobonianus 1406 (10th century).

Philosophical Writings

There must have been a collection containing the following works: nat. deor., div., Tim., fat., top., parad., ac. 2, leg. From it are derived the important manuscripts: Leidensis Vossianus 84 (A; 9th–10th century) and 86 (B; 9th–11th century), Laurentianus S. Marci 257 (10th century), Vindobonensis 189 (10th century).

rep.: Vaticanus Lat. 5757 Palimpsestus, discovered by A. Mai, ed. princ. 1822 (P; 4th–5th century: large parts of books 1 and 2, individual pages of 3, a little of 4 and 5).—The Somnium Scipionis from book 6 has its own independent, very broad transmission, hardly susceptible of summary. It has survived together with the commentary of Macrobius, although the commentator used another text. His lemmata therefore require attention in the restoration of the text.—For rep., there is also an important secondary tradition,<sup>2</sup> chiefly in grammarians and Church Fathers.

leg.:<sup>3</sup> Vossianus 84 (A; 9th–10th century); Vossianus 86 (B; 9th–11th century); Heinsianus 118 (H; 11th century).

ac. 1: Parisinus 6331 (12th century).

ac. 2: Vossianus 84 and 86; Vindobonensis 189 (s. above).

fn.: Palatinus 1513 (A; 11th century); Palatinus 1525 (B; 15th century); Erlangensis 847, olim 38 (E; 15th century).

<sup>1</sup> J. STROUX, Handschriftliche Studien zu Cicero De oratore. Die Rekonstruktion der Handschrift von Lodi, Leipzig 1921, 8, note 2.

<sup>2</sup> E. HECK, Die Bezeugung von Ciceros Schrift De re publica, Hildesheim 1966.

<sup>3</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT, Die Überlieferung von Ciceros Schrift De legibus in Mittelalter und Renaissance, München 1974.

Tusc.: Gudianus 294 (9th–10th century); Parisinus 6332 (9th century); Bruxellensis 5351 (11th–12th century).

nat. deor.: Vossianus 84 and 86; Vindobonensis 189 (s. above).

div., fat., Tim.: Vossianus 84 and 86; Vindobonensis 189 (s. above).

Cato (De sen.): 2 groups: 1. Parisinus 6332 (P; 9th century); Leidensis Vossianus O. 79 (V; 9th–10th century); Laurentianus 50, 45 (M; 10th–11th century); Harleianus 2682 (H; 11th century).

2. Bruxellensis 9591 (B; 9th century); Leidensis Vossianus F. 12 (L; 9th–10th century); Parisinus n. a. Lat. 454 (A; 9th century); Vaticanus Reg. Lat. 1587 (D; 9th century).

fat.: Vossianus 84 and 86; Vindobonensis 189 (s. above).

Lael. (De amic.): Codex Didotianus deperditus (9th–10th century); Monacensis 15 514 (9th–10th century); Gudianus 335 (10th century); Laurentianus 50, 45 (10th–11th century).

off.: three manuscript families (X, Y, Z):

X: Harleianus 2716 (L; 9th–10th century); Bernensis 104 (e; 12th–13th century); Palatinus 1531 (p; 13th century).

Y: Abrincatensis, Bibl. mun. 225 (α; 12th century); Vaticanus Borgia 326 (φ; 12th century).

Z: most important codex: Bambergensis M. V. 1 (B; 9th–10th century).

Letters

epist.: for books 1–8, the Mediceus 49. 9 (M; 9th–10th century) is the only authority. Of this a copy exists, Mediceus 49. 7 (P; a. 1392). Much less reliance may be placed on a family of manuscripts independent of M, represented by Harleianus 2773 (G; 12th century), Parisinus 17 812 (R; 12th century).

For books 9–16, apart from M, the following manuscripts must be consulted. They go back to a common witness (X) diverging from M: Harleianus 2682 (H; 11th century); Berolinensis 252, olim Erfurtensis (F; 12th–13th century); Palatinus 598 (D; 15th century); Parisinus 14 761 (V; 14th–15th century).

ad Q. fr.; Att.; ad Brut. (book 1): two families of manuscripts:

1. Sigma: Ambrosianus E 14 inf. (E; 14th century); Parisinus Nouveau fonds 16 248 (G; 14th–15th century); Landianus 8 (H; 14th–15th century); Laurentianus ex Conv. Suppr. 49 (N; 14th–15th century); Palatinus Vaticanus Lat. 1510 (V; 15th century); Ravennas Lat. 469 (Q; 15th century); Taurinensis Lat. 495 (O; 15th century); Parisinus Lat. 8538 (R; a. 1419); Parisinus Lat. 8536 (P; 15th century).

2. Delta: mainly represented by Mediceus 49. 18 (M; a. 1393).

ad Brut. (book 2): For 2. 1–5: Lectiones margini editionis Cratandrinae (C; a. 1528) adscriptae.

Influence

Cicero's influence on Augustan literature has not yet been satisfactorily investigated. It is true that prose then followed other and different paths, influenced by rhetors who fostered a pointed style anticipating the imperial period. But Livy, consciously rather than unconsciously, fulfilled Cicero's ideals of Roman historical writing, and in Augustan poetry Cicero may have left many traces still undetected. Seneca the Elder (contr. praef. 6) put him on a level with the Greek orators; Velleius Paterculus (2. 66. 5) thought his glory would never wane; on the other hand, a certain Larcus Licinius (Gell. 17. 1. 1) or Largius Licinus found it necessary to censure him in his Ciceromastix. Seneca the Younger held aloof from him, although linguistically he was not so distant as might at first be assumed. Quintilian, the first professor of rhetoric to draw a state salary, declared that the satisfaction found in Cicero was the student's measure of his own personal progress.<sup>1</sup> Even the prose of the Younger Pliny and Tacitus' Dialogus would be inconceivable without Cicero. Church Fathers like Minucius Felix and Lactantius adhered closely to Cicero's philosophical writings, both in language and content. The Christian apologists owed to the De natura deorum numerous arguments against pagan religion and in defense of monotheism.<sup>2</sup> In the days of Arnobius one group of pagans demanded the suppression of Cicero's works on theology on the grounds that they were a danger to the old religion and lent support to Christian doctrine (Arnob. nat. 3. 7).

Cicero's influence was neither exclusively nor even predominantly based on his style. Rather, considerations of content continually challenged readers to come to terms with him.<sup>3</sup> Ambrose Christianized the De officiis, and Augustine owed to the Hortensius his first conversion to philosophy (conf. 3. 4). A reference to Cicero's often unrecognized wisdom was found before Augustine in Arnobius (nat. 3. 7). Jerome was so permeated with Cicero that he dreamed of hearing at the Last Judgment the rebuke 'You are a Ciceronian, not a Christian' (epist. 22. 30).

In the 9th century the West Frank Hadoardus undertook to make an extensive collection of excerpts, showing that the corpus of the philosophical works was available to him. His evidence is older than that of the manuscripts preserved, although not more trustworthy, since he often intervened in the texts to remove their datedness or to produce a new connection of thought. Sedulius Scotus excerpted the De inventione, and passages from the Pro Fonteio, Pro Flacco, and In Pisonem which in part are not otherwise known. It is to the fondness for making such excerpts on the part of early medieval authors that we owe therefore certain portions of Cicero's speeches which we would not otherwise possess. In the Carolingian period Cicero again became the model of polished style (Lupus of Ferrières). Knowledge of Cicero increased in the 11th century, and reached its peak in the 12th century with John of Salisbury and Otto von Freising. In the 13th century the same is true of Vincent of Beauvais and Roger Bacon. Aelred of Rievaulx (12th century) gave a spiritual dimension to Cicero's reflections on friendship in his De spirituali amicitia.<sup>1</sup> As a rule, among the rhetorical writings, readers preferred compendia appropriate for school use. But along with them, philosophical works were also read, notably the Tusculan Disputations, though the speeches and letters also found an audience.

<sup>1</sup> Quint. inst. 10. 1. 112 ille se profecisse sciat, cui Cicero valde placebit.

<sup>2</sup> I. OPELT, Ciceros Schrift De natura deorum bei den lateinischen Kirchenvätern, A&A 12, 1966, 141-155, esp. 141.

<sup>3</sup> T. ZIELINSKI, 4th ed. 1929, 315.

In the Renaissance there was greater interest in Cicero as a person, as may already be observed in Petrarch, even in his critical remarks. Unease was felt at the difference between Cicero's wise philosophical teachings and his actual life revealed by the letters. His philosophical skepticism also aroused interest in the Renaissance.<sup>2</sup> Chaucer based his Parliament of Fowls on the Somnium Scipionis. Neo-Latin artistic prose, soon followed by that in the vernacular, found a model in his style. Cicero's urbanitas became a model of political behavior in the Renaissance cities (Coluccio Salutati and Leonardo Bruni). His overwhelming importance as a school author—the Latin school being the spiritual armory of civic culture in the modern period—again rested more on his content than on his formal qualities. Luther<sup>3</sup> set him much higher than Aristotle<sup>4</sup> principally for his belief in divine

<sup>1</sup> Text and translation by R. HAACKE, Trier 1978; in the 15th century Theodore of Gaza translated the Cato and Laelius into Greek.

<sup>2</sup> C. B. SCHMITT, *Cicero Scepticus: A Study of the Influence of the Academica in the Renaissance*, The Hague 1972.

<sup>3</sup> Osw. Gottlob SCHMIDT, Luthers Bekanntschaft mit den alten Classikern, Leipzig 1883, 13; cf. also W. KIRSCH, Der deutsche Protestantismus und Cicero (Luther, Melanchthon, Sturm), Ciceroniana n.s. 6, Roma 1988, 131–149.

<sup>4</sup> Tischreden 155 (numbering of the Weimar edition = W.A.): Ego sic iudico plus providence<sup>1</sup> and in the immortality of the soul. He particularly admired his union of theory and practice and his accessible manner of presentation. He exclaimed: 'The man who wants to learn right philosophy must read Cicero.'<sup>2</sup> He even remarked: 'If I were not a Christian . . ., I would read books of philosophy such as Cicero's De officiis.'<sup>3</sup> The latter he called 'a precious book,' declaring that, if he were young, he would dedicate himself to the study of Cicero.<sup>4</sup> He even hoped that Cicero would be in paradise.<sup>5</sup>

Therefore, Cicero was by no means a mere model of style. Important ideas of the modern period were found confirmed in him. It was in Cicero that Copernicus maintained he had discovered the first hint of heliocentric theories (acad. 2. 123).<sup>6</sup>

In the England of the 17th and 18th centuries, the Deists relied largely on two proofs of the existence of God for which they in part expressly appealed to Cicero. One was the idea of God as something innate, found uniformly in all peoples (nat. deor. 1. 43–44; Tusc. 1. 30). The other was the order of the universe as a proof of God's existence (cosmological and teleological proof, nat. deor. 2. 15).<sup>7</sup> Cicero was also the inspirer of the development of an autonomous ethic of duties, independent of any ontological notion of goodness and even of the theory of knowledge. Hume accordingly asserts: 'Upon the whole, I desire to take my catalogue of virtues from Cicero's Offices . . . I had, indeed, the former book in my Eye in all my Reasonings'.<sup>8</sup>

---

philosophiae in uno libro apud Ciceronem esse quam apud Aristotelem in omnibus operibus; 5012: Cicero est multo doctior Aristotele et perspicue sua docet. Ibid. 3608 d: Cicero longe superat Aristotelem, nam in Tusculanis quaestionibus et Natura deorum praeclarissima scribit de anima et illius immortalitate. Ethica Aristotelis aliquid sunt, tamen Officia Ciceronis excellunt ipsa.

<sup>1</sup> Tischreden 5440: Nam hoc est optimum argumentum . . . quod ex generatione specierum probat esse Deum . . . ergo necesse est esse aliquid quod ita gubernet omnia. Nos egregie possumus cognoscere Deum esse ex illo certo et perpetuo motu coelestium siderum. Aber uns ist es nichts, quia vilescit quotidianum.

<sup>2</sup> T. ZIELINSKI, 4th ed., 1929, 205.

<sup>3</sup> W.A., vol. 40, 3, 1912–1913, 1930; cf. also H. SCHEIBLE, ed., Melanchthons Briefwechsel, 4, 1983, 349–350, no. 4205.

<sup>4</sup> Tischreden 5012: Si ego adulescens essem, dicarem me Ciceroni, sed firmato tamen iudicio in sacris litteris.

<sup>5</sup> Tischreden 5972; cf. 3925: Deinde fecit mentionem Ciceronis, optimi, sapientissimi et diligentissimi viri, quanta ille passus sit et fecerit: Ich hoff, inquit, unser Hergott wirdt im und seins gleichen auch genedig sein.

<sup>6</sup> H. BLUMENBERG, Die kopernikanische Wende, Frankfurt 1965, 47–50.

<sup>7</sup> T. ZIELINSKI, 4th ed., 1929, 210–232.

<sup>8</sup> To Francis Hutcheson, September 17, 1739, in: The Letters of David Hume, ed. by J. Y. T. GREIG, Oxford 1932, vol. 1, p. 34.

Voltaire's ideas as an Enlightenment thinker are derived not merely from English sources, but also from Cicero, for whom all his life he entertained a genuinely enthusiastic regard.

His disciple, Frederick the Great, considered the De officiis 'the best work in the realm of ethical philosophy ever written or ever likely to be written.' On campaign, he took with him the De natura deorum, the De finibus and especially the Tusculan Disputations, which struck harmonious echoes in his personality. In a royal decree, the king demanded that the 'good authors' should be translated into German, in particular 'all works and writings of Cicero, all of them being very good.'<sup>1</sup>

The French Revolution brought about the rediscovery of Cicero as an orator, since under a Republican constitution public oratory is an essential means of political debate. The legal reforms of 1790 replaced the inquisitorial system with the French jury, which goes back at certain points to the Roman practice attested in Cicero: decision by majority verdict; determination of the legal question and acceptance of the theory of the independent evaluation of evidence. Even in the formation of ideas of natural and international law, Cicero, along with Livy, acted as intermediary.

Finally, at the beginning of the 19th century, Angelo Mai's rediscovery of the De re publica restored to us a masterpiece, which may draw under its spell even readers more appreciative of questions of republican constitutionality than of rhetoric.

After bitter experiences of tyranny, the 20th century has rediscovered speech as a human and dignified means of debate. The philosophical foundations of rhetoric are being freshly evaluated under different aspects: logic, psychology, ethics. Within this process, which is still going on, Cicero's European significance, set as he is between Aristotle and Augustine, is being seen for what it is. The anti-rhetorical attitude of those who regarded the flesh and blood of speech as sinful, and the contempt for Cicero to which that gave rise, may now be seen in retrospect as barbarism.<sup>2</sup>

Editions: Editions of individual works beginning with off., parad.: FUST and SCHOEFFER, Mogunt. 1465. * Complete edition: A. MINUTIANUS, 4 vols., Mediolani 1498-1499. * I. C. ORELLI, I. G. BAITER, C. HALM, 4 vols. (T), Turici 2nd ed. 1845-1861, and 4 suppl. vols. containing indices 1833-1838. *

<sup>1</sup> T. ZIELINSKI, 4th ed, 1929, 248.

<sup>2</sup> T. W. ADORNO, Negative Dialektik, Suhrkamp 1966, repr. 1975.

Speeches: A. C. CLARK (vol. 1, 2, 4, 6), G. PETERSON (vol. 3, 5), 6 vols., Oxford 1901–1911. * H. DE LA VILLE DE MIRMONT, J. MARTHA, H. BORNECQUE, A. BOULANGER, P. BOYANCÉ, F. GAFFIOT, P. WUILLEUMIER, A.-M. TUPET, J. COUSIN, P. GRIMAL, M. LOB, 20 vols., Paris 1921–1976. * J. H. FREESE, R. GARDINER, H. G. HODGE, H. M. HUBBELL, W. C. A. KER, C. MACDONALD, L. E. LORD, N. H. WALTS (TTrN), London 1923–1958, repr. 1963–1976. * M. FUHRMANN (TrN), 7 vols., Zürich 1970–1982. Editions of individual speeches: agr.: E. J. JONKERS (TC), Leiden 1963. * agr., Rab. perd.: V. MAREK, Lipsiae 1983. * Arch.: H. C. GOTOFF (TC), Urbana 1979. * dom.: R. G. M. NISBET (TC), Oxford 1939. * Cael., Vat.: T. MASLOWSKI, Stuttgart 1995. * Cael.: R. G. AUSTIN (TC), Oxford 3rd ed. 1988. * Cluent.: S. RIZZO, Milano 1990. * har. resp.: J. O. LENAGHAN (TC), Den Haag 1969. * Manil.: E. J. JONKERS (TC), Leiden 1979. * Marcell.: A. GUAGLIANONE (TC), Napoli 1972. * Mil.: A. C. CLARK (TC), Amsterdam 1967. * M. GIEBEL (TTr, with the comm. of Asconius), Stuttgart 1972. * Mur.: H. KASTEN, Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1972. * Phil.: D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY (TTr), Chapel Hill 1986. * P. FEDELI, Leipzig 1982. * Phil. 2: W. K. LACEY (TTrN), Warminster 1986. * Pis.: R. G. M. NISBET (TC), Oxford 1961. * Planc., Rab. Post.: E. OLECHOWSKA, Lipsiae 1981. * Rab. Post.: C. KLODT, Stutgardiae 1992. * p. red. in sen., p. red. ad Quir., dom., har. resp.: T. MASLOWSKI, Lipsiae 1981. * Quinct.: T. E. KINSEY (TC), Sidney 1971. * M. D. REEVE, Stutgardiae 1991. * Scaur.: E. OLECHOWSKA, Lipsiae 1984. * Sest.: T. MASLOWSKI, Leipzig 1986. * R. REGGIANI, Milano 1990. * Sull., Arch.: P. REIS, H. KASTEN, Lipsiae 3rd ed. 1966, repr. 1993. * Vat.: L. L. POCOCK (TC), London 1926. * Verr. II. I: T. N. MITCHELL (TC), Warmington 1980. * Lost Speeches: F. SCHOELL, in: vol. 8 of the complete edition, Leipzig 1918. * S. W. CRAWFORD, M. Tullius Cicero. The Lost and Unpublished Orations, Göttingen 1984.

Letters: R. Y. TYRRELL, L. C. PURSER (TC, Index), 7 vols., Dublin 1885–1901. * W. S. WATT (vol. 1: epist.; vol. 3: ad Q. fr., Brut., fig.), D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY (vol. 2: Att.), Oxford, vol. 1: 1982; 2, 1: 1965; 2, 2: 1961; 3: 1958. * L.-A. CONSTANS, J. BAYET, J. BEAUJEU (TTrN), 10 vols., Paris 1950–1991. * C. M. WIELAND (TrN), rev. by E. KRAH, H. W. SEIFFERT, B. KRAFT, in: Wielands Gesammelte Schriften 2, 10, Berlin 1975. * Att.: D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, 2 vols., Stutgardiae 1987. * H. KASTEN (TTr), München 4th ed. 1990. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY (TTrC), 7 vols. (Indices in vol. 7), Cambridge 1965–1970. * ad Q. fr.: A. SALVATORE, Roma 1989. * ad Q. fr. and ad Brut.: D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Cambridge 1980. * ad Q. fr., ad Brut., fig. epist.: D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Stutgardiae 1988. * ad Q. fr., ad Brut. (et al.): M. CARY, M. HENDERSON, W. G. WILLIAMS (TTrN), London 1954, repr. 1972. * ad Brut.: M. GIEBEL (TTr), Stuttgart 1982. * epist. (ad fam.): D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Stutgardiae 1988. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY (TC), 2 vols., Cambridge 1977. * H. KASTEN (TTrN), München 4th ed. 1989. * W. G. WILLIAMS (TTrN), 3 vols., London 1926–1929, repr. 1965–1972.

Philosophical and Rhetorical Writings: H. CAPLAN, W. A. FALCONER, G. L. HENDRICKSON, H. M. HUBBELL, C. W. KEYES, J. E. KING, W. MILLER, H. RACKHAM, E. W. SUTTON (TTrN), London 1913–1954; repr. 1960–1983. * ac.: O. PLASBERG, Lipsiae 1922. * J. S. REID (TC), London 1885, repr. 1966. * ac., Hortens.: L. STRAUME-ZIMMERMANN, O. GIGON, F. BROEMSER (TTrC), Zürich 1990. * ac. 1: M. RUCH (TC), Paris 1970. * Brut.: A. E. DOUGLAS (TC), Oxford 1966. * E. MALCOVATI, Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1970. * B. KYTZLER (TTr), München 1970. * E. MALCOVATI (TTrN), Milano 1981. * Cato: K. SIMBECK, Lipsiae 1917. * M. FALTNER (TTr), München 2nd ed. 1980. * J. G. F. POWELL (TC), Cambridge 1988. * De orat., Brut., orat.: G. NORCIO (TTr), Torino 1970. * De orat.: K. KUMANIECKI, Lipsiae 1969, repr. 1995. * A. D. LEEMAN, H. PINKSTER (C), vol. 1 (book 1. 1–165), Heidelberg 1981; A. D. LEEMAN, H. PINKSTER, H. L. W. NELSON, vol. 2 (book 1. 166–265; book 2. 1–98), 1985; A. D. LEEMAN, H. PINKSTER, E. RABBIE, vol. 3 (book 2. 99–290), 1989; A. D. LEEMAN, H. PINKSTER, J. WISSE, vol. 4 (book 3. 1–95), 1996. * H. MERKLIN (TTrN), Stuttgart 1976. * div., fat., Tim.: R. GIOMINI, Lipsiae 1975. * div.: A. S. PEASE (TC), 2 vols., Urbana 1920–1923, repr. 1963. * C. SCHÄUBLIN (TTr), München 1991. * fat.: O. PLASBERG, W. AX, Lipsiae 1938. * R. W. SHARPLES (TC), Warminster 1991. * fin.: T. SCHICHTE, Lipsiae 1915. * O. GIGON, L. STRAUME-ZIMMERMANN (TTrN), München 1988. * fin. 3, parad.: M. R. WRIGHT (TTrC), Warminster 1991. * Fragmenta: C. F. W. MUELLER, in: vol. 3 of the complete edition, Leipzig 1898. * I. GARBARINO, sine loco (Firenze) 1984. * De gloria: O. PLASBERG, Lipsiae 1917. * Hortensius: A. GRILLI (TC), Milano 1962. * inv.: E. STROEBEL, Lipsiae 1915, repr. 1965. * Lael.: K. SIMBECK, Lipsiae 1917. * K. A. NEUHAUSEN (C), Heidelberg 1985. * J. G. F. POWELL (TTrC), Warminster 1990. * leg.: K. ZIEGLER, Heidelberg 1950. * leg. 1: L. P. KENTER (C), Amsterdam 1972. * nat. deor.: M. VAN DEN BRUWAENE (TTrN), 4 vols., Bruxelles 1970–1986. * W. GERLACH, K. BAYER (TTrN), München 1978, 3rd ed. 1993. * off.: K. ATZERT, Lipsiae 4th ed. 1963 (together with De virtutibus). * H. GUNERMANN (TTrC), Stuttgart 1976. * M. T. GRIFFIN, E. M. ATKINS, Cambridge 1991. * M. WINTERBOTTOM (T), Oxford 1994. * orat.: R. WESTMAN, Lipsiae 1980. * J. E. SANDYS (TN), Hildesheim 1973. * B. KYTZLER (TTr), München 3rd ed. 1988. * parad., ac., Tim., nat. deor.: O. PLASBERG, Lipsiae 1908. * J. MOLAGER (TTr), Paris 1971. * rep.: K. ZIEGLER, Lipsiae 7th ed. 1969, repr. 1992. * K. BÜCHNER (C), Heidelberg 1984. * K. BÜCHNER (TTr), München 5th ed. 1993. * rep. and leg.: K. ZIEGLER (TTr), Berlin 1974. * Tusc.: M. POHLENZ, Lipsiae 1918. * A. E. DOUGLAS (TTrN), Warminster 1985. * A. GRILLI (TTrC), Brescia 1987. * O. GIGON (TTrN), München 5th ed. 1984. * De virtutibus: post O. PLASBERG et W. AX tertium rec. K. ATZERT, Lipsiae 1963 (together with off.). * Carmina: W. W. EWBank, London 1933; repr. 1978.

Lexica, Indices: H. MERGUET, Lexikon zu den Reden des Cicero mit Angabe

sämtlicher Stellen, vol. 1–4, Jena 1877–1884. * W. A. OLDFATHER, H. V. CANTER, K. M. ABBOTT, Index Verborum Ciceronis Epistularum, Urbana 1938. * J. W. FUCHS, Index Verborum in Ciceronis De inventione libros II, Hagae Comitum 1937. * K. M. ABBOTT, W. A. OLDFATHER, H. V. CANTER, Index Verborum in Ciceronis Rhetorica, Urbana 1964. * H. MERGUET, Lexikon zu den philosophischen Schriften Cicero's mit Angabe sämtlicher Stellen, vol. 1–3, Jena 1887–1894. * H. MERGUET, Handlexikon zu Cicero, Leipzig 1905–1906, repr. 1962. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Onomasticon to Cicero's Speeches, Stuttgart 1988. ** Bibl.: P. L. SCHMIDT, Cicero De re publica. Die Forschung der letzten fünf Dezennien, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 262–333. * W. SUERBAUM, Studienbibliographie zu Ciceros De re publica, Gymnasium 85, 1978, 59–88. * S. also M. VON ALBRECHT 1973; K. BÜCHNER 1971.

M. VON ALBRECHT, M. Tullius Cicero, Sprache und Stil, RE suppl. 13, 1973, 1237–1347. * M. BEARD, Cicero and Divination: The Formation of a Latin Discourse, JRS 76, 1986, 33–46. * E. BECKER, Technik und Szenerie des ciceronischen Dialogs, diss. Münster 1938. * G. BRETZIGHEIMER, Zur Paränese und Didaxe in Ciceros Somnium Scipionis, WS 98, n.s. 19, 1985, 125–150. * K. BÜCHNER, Cicero. Bestand und Wandel seiner geistigen Welt, Heidelberg 1964. * K. BÜCHNER, ed., Das neue Cicerobild, Darmstadt 1971. * K. BÜCHNER, Somnium Scipionis. Quellen, Gestalt, Sinn, Wiesbaden 1976. * H. Cambeis, Das monarchische Element und die Funktion der Magistrate in Ciceros Verfassungsentwurf, Gymnasium 91, 1984, 237–260. * J. CHRISTES, Beobachtungen zur Verfassungsdiskussion in Ciceros Werk De re publica, Historia 32, 1983, 461–483. * C. J. CLASSEN, Recht—Rhetorik—Politik. Untersuchungen zu Ciceros rhetorischer Strategie, Darmstadt 1985. * C. J. CLASSEN, Ciceros orator perfectus: ein vir bonus dicendi peritus?, in: S. PRETE, ed., Commemoratio. Studi di filologia in ricordo di R. RIBUOLI, Sassoferato 1986, 43–55. * C. J. CLASSEN, Die Peripatetiker in Ciceros Tuskulanen, in: Rutgers University Studies in Classical Humanities 4, 1989, 186–200. * W. CLAUSEN, Cicero and the New Poetry, HSPH 90, 1986, 159–170. * M. ERLER, Cicero und 'unorthodoxer' Epikureismus, Anregung 38, 1992, 307–322. * J.-L. FERRARY, L'archéologie du De re publica (2. 2. 4–37. 63). Cicéron entre Polybe et Platon, JRS 74, 1984, 87–98. * H. FRANK, Ratio bei Cicero, Frankfurt 1992. * M. FUHRMANN, Cicero und die römische Republik. Eine Biographie, München 3rd ed. 1991. * M. GELZER, W. KROLL, R. PHILIPPSON, K. BÜCHNER, M. TULLIUS Cicero, RE 7 A 1, 1939, 827–1274; cf. also M. VON ALBRECHT. * M. GELZER, Cicero, ein biographischer Versuch, Wiesbaden 1969. * O. GIGON, Cicero und die griechische Philosophie, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 226–261. * W. GÖRLER, Untersuchungen zu Ciceros Philosophie, Heidelberg 1974. * H. C. GOTOFF, Cicero's Elegant Style. An Analysis of the Pro Archia, Urbana 1979. * J. GRUBER, Cicero und das hellenistische Herrscherideal. Überlegungen zur Rede De imperio Cn. Pompei, WS 101, 1988, 243–258. * C. HABICHT, Cicero als Politiker, München 1990.

- * G. HAMZA, Ciceros Verhältnis zu seinen Quellen mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Darstellung der Staatslehre in De re publica, Klio 67, 1985, 492–497. * W. HEILMANN, Ethische Reflexion und römische Lebenswirklichkeit in Ciceros Schrift De officiis. Ein literatursoziologischer Versuch, Wiesbaden 1982. * R. KLEIN, ed., Das Staatsdenken der Römer, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1973. * U. KNOCHÉ, Cicero, ein Mittler griechischer Geisteskultur, Hermes 87, 1959, 57–74. * B. KYTZLER, ed., Ciceros literarische Leistung, Darmstadt 1973. * L. LAURAND, Études sur le style des discours de Cicéron, vol. 1–3, Paris 4th ed. 1936–1938, repr. 1965. * J. LEBRETON, Études sur la langue et la grammaire de Cicéron, Paris 1901, repr. 1979. * A. D. LEEMAN, L'historiographie dans le De oratore de Cicéron, BAGB 1985, 3, 280–288. * LEEMAN, Form 27–68. * P. MACKENDRICK (with the collaboration of K. L. SINGH), The Philosophical Books of Cicero, London 1989. * J. MANČAL, Untersuchungen zum Begriff der Philosophie bei M. Tullius Cicero, München 1982. * A. MICHEL, Rhétorique et philosophie chez Cicéron. Essai sur les fondements philosophiques de l'art de persuader, Paris 1960. * A. MICHEL, R. VERDIÈRE, ed., Ciceroniana. Hommages à K. KUMANIECKI, Leiden 1975. * T. N. MITCHELL, Cicero, the Senior Statesman, New Haven 1991. * C. MÜLLER-GOLDINGEN, Cicero als Übersetzer Platons, in: C. W. MÜLLER, ed., (and others), Zum Umgang mit fremden Sprachen in der griechisch-römischen Antike, Stuttgart 1992, 173–187. * C. NEUMEISTER, Grundsätze der forensischen Rhetorik, gezeigt an Gerichtsreden Ciceros, München 1964. * L. PERELLI, Il pensiero politico di Cicerone. Tra filosofia greca e ideologia aristocratica romana, Firenze 1990. * V. PÖSCHL, Römischer Staat und griechisches Staatsdenken bei Cicero. Untersuchungen zu Ciceros Schrift De re publica, Berlin 1936, repr. 1962. * R. PONCELET, Cicéron traducteur de Platon. L'expression de la pensée complexe en latin classique, Paris 1957. * C. RATHOFER, Ciceros Brutus als literarisches Paradigma eines Auctoritas-Verhältnisses, Frankfurt 1986. * M. V. RONNICK, Cicero's Paradoxa Stoicorum. A Commentary, an Interpretation, and a Study of Its Influence, Frankfurt 1991. * M. RUCH, Le préambule dans les œuvres philosophiques de Cicéron. Essai sur la genèse et l'art du dialogue, Paris 1958. * D. SCHLICHTING, Cicero und die griechische Gesellschaft seiner Zeit, diss. Berlin 1975. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Die ursprüngliche Gliederung von Ciceros Dialog De natura deorum, Philologus 122, 1978, 59–67. * M. SCHOFIELD, Cicero for and against Divination, JRS 76, 1986, 47–65. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Cicero, London 1971. * J. SPRUTE, Rechts- und Staatsphilosophie bei Cicero, Phronesis 28, 1983, 150–176. * P. STEINMETZ, Beobachtungen zu Ciceros philosophischem Standpunkt, in: W. W. FORTENBAUGH, P. STEINMETZ, eds., Cicero's Knowledge of the Peripatos, New Brunswick 1989, 1–22. * H. STRASBURGER, Ciceros philosophisches Spätwerk als Aufruf gegen die Herrschaft Caesars, Hildesheim 1990. * W. STROH, Taxis und Taktik. Die advokatische Dispositionskunst in Ciceros Gerichtsreden, Stuttgart 1975. * W. STROH, Die Nachahmung des Demosthenes in Ciceros Philippiken, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 28, 1981 (publ. 1982), 1–31. * W. STROH, Ciceros demosthenische Redezyklen, MH 40, 1983, 35–50. * W. SÜSS, Die dramatische Kunst in den philosophischen Dialogen Ciceros, Hermes 80, 1952, 419–436. * C. W. WOOTEN, Cicero's Philippics and Their Demosthenic Model. The Rhetoric of Crisis, Chapel Hill 1983. * T. ZIELINSKI, Cicero im Wandel der Jahrhunderte, Leipzig 4th ed. 1929, repr. 1967.

D. TECHNICAL AND EDUCATIONAL WORKS

ROMAN TECHNICAL WRITERS

General Remarks

Technical writing is an important area of Roman literature, exemplifying the Romans' liking for facts and their desire for the mastery offered by a comprehensive perspective.

The content of these works varies considerably (s. Roman Development below). Even from the point of view of form, quite different types of literature can be detected. A later discussion will take up again the differences between the technical and factual handbook, determined by the readership viewed by the author (s. Literary Technique below).

Educated Roman readers were less attracted to profound investigations of detail than to readable general presentations. It is this aim of pleasing the public which justifies the mention of such works in a literary history.

A relatively new type making its appearance in Roman literature is the encyclopedia, the wide-ranging treatment of several disciplines within a single large work. But the systematic and yet assimilable general survey of a technical field also receives fresh importance.

The representatives of the special disciplines are partly of lower social rank; for example, the authors of works on surveying are of varying distinction. Writers on law originally belonged, as the nature of their discipline dictated, to the aristocracy, a circumstance changing only slightly in the course of time (s. Roman jurists and the related chapters in the different periods below). Encyclopedias in general are written by members of the upper class.

Greek Background

Scientific research in the strict sense was and remained largely a Greek domain. In Rome purely theoretical sciences yielded pride of place to those that were applied. The form and content of technical writing in Latin bore the fundamental imprint of Hellenistic science, even though with considerable changes of emphasis. The Latin technical writings were in many areas derivative, although there were exceptions. The most important of these is formed by jurisprudence, a Roman creation which will be discussed separately. Moreover, the Romans' own experience made itself felt in technological disciplines: agriculture (Cato, Varro, Columella among others); surveying (the gromatici); architecture (Vitruvius), mineralogy and metallurgy (Pliny); the building of aqueducts (Frontinus).

In many areas Latin texts are the most important sources for our knowledge of the post-Alexandrian period. Just as Cicero mediates Hellenistic philosophy, so Hellenistic medicine in essence is known thanks to a fairly well-informed Roman layman, Celsus. Vitruvius' De architectura, the only comprehensive work on this theme to survive from antiquity, is attractive precisely because of the complete technical competence of its author.

Rhetoric and grammar, in spite of their close link with Greek forms of thought, founded their own traditions (above all, beginning with Varro), thanks to the thorough-going application of their categories to Latin. What Rome's greatest orator, Cicero, says in his rhetorical writings is inspired by his detailed knowledge of a field that he had made totally his own.

Roman Development

The sequence in which the different sciences were adopted at Rome is characteristic. Pride of place is taken by disciplines directly applicable to daily life. The oldest and most independent of these at Rome is jurisprudence, to which separate sections are dedicated here.

Soon after came agriculture. The senate commissioned a translation of the relevant work of the Carthaginian Mago. From the Republican period we possess the books of Cato and Varro, and from the 1st century A.D. that of Columella.

The art of surveying was particularly important for the establishment of camps, of military colonies and in general for the allocation of land. This specialty was first independently handled by Varro, and later received its own technical studies.

Architecture, a basic skill for Roman civilization, was discussed in the Republican period by Fuficius and Varro, and in the time of Augustus received authoritative treatment at the hands of Vitruvius. From the early Imperial period Frontinus' work on aqueducts has survived. Under the general rubric of architecture also came clocks and engines of war.

In many other disciplines for a considerable period of time quaint approximations had to suffice.

In geography Varro gave in his Antiquitates a fairly precise description of the Mediterranean world and in particular of Italy. Within their historical writings, Cato, Caesar, and Sallust found room for geographical digressions, although they set no store by personal exploration. Travel accounts without scientific claims were composed (perhaps in Cicero's time) by Statius Sebosus. The first geographical work in Latin was written by Pomponius Mela (1st century A.D.).

In Cato medicine was restricted to home remedies and charms. Greek medical science was given Latin dress in the Imperial period by the encyclopedia of Celsus (1st century A.D.) and by later writers.

Natural science was found in the Republican period in Nigidius Figulus, though mingled with superstition. Among didactic poets Lucretius and Cicero deserve special mention. Interest in this area had to wait for its development until the imperial period.

Mathematics and astronomy were treated by Varro, who depended on Greek sources. Before him there had been only amateurs at Rome such as Sulpicius Gallus (consul 166 B.C.).

Optics and arithmetic<sup>1</sup> were long absent from Latin literature.

Music was touched upon allusively by Vitruvius. It was only in late antiquity that this situation changed.

Literary Technique

The difference between technical works and works of fact is determined by the intended audience. Works of fact take pains to establish an appealing literary form.

The systematic textbook is directed to experts or to students of the discipline concerned (Institutiones). With the exception of Cato, technical authors aim at easily intelligible structure. Precise naming of sources is the norm.

The division of material is systematic. A model for other disciplines might have been provided by the didactic framework of rhetoric.<sup>1</sup> The material was divided into genres, and these into species, sub-species and so on. The arrangement presented at the beginning was strictly maintained. This is the procedure particularly visible in Varro, Vitruvius, and Celsus.

---

<sup>1</sup> Geometry was treated briefly by Balbus (F. BLUME, K. LACHMANN, T. MOMMSEN, A. RUDORFF, eds., Die Schriften der römischen Feldmesser, Berlin 1848, 91-108).

In areas not admitting systematic division, the material is divided according to topic (Apicius, Frontinus).

For individual disciplines, special arrangements were developed. Medicine proceeded a capite ad calcem ('from top to toe'), as in Celsus, Scribonius Largus and the corresponding sections of Pliny. In geography, the arrangement was that of the περίπλους, the 'circumnavigation'. The last principle was natural for a seafaring people like the Greeks. The Romans had adopted it in spite of the fact that their network of roads would have promoted a clearer understanding of the important hinterland.<sup>2</sup> In geographical works the Romans took over the practice of giving an introductory description of the earth in physical and mathematical terms, even though they limited themselves here to what was most essential.

Though Varro organized his introduction to the Latin language by reference to content, the Augustan Verrius Flaccus preferred an alphabetical grouping of words.

In their prefaces authors liked to emphasize the importance and difficulty of their theme, to establish their method of presentation and sketch its structure. Such prefaces often make more pretense at style than the actual work.

The literary redaction of the works varies in scope according to the intended readership. Varro arranged the Res rusticae as a dialogue. Columella has a fluent, even loquacious style, and in one portion actually uses verse (s. Language and Style; Reflections on Literature).

Apart from the Institutiones must be mentioned the scholarly monograph, the commentary on earlier works of literature and the glossary.

The encyclopedia is directed towards a wider circle (s. Ideas).

Language and Style

In technical writing language and style play a subservient role, subordinate to the didactic purpose. The chief requirement is clarity.

<sup>1</sup> FUHRMANN, LG 184; FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch passim.

<sup>2</sup> Mela bypasses inland areas so important for the Romans as the interior of Germany, the provinces of the Alps and Danube, as well as Dacia. His scheme of Even so, there are important differences. Celsus writes with exemplary brevity, vividness and lucidity, with mathematical precision and elegance. Columella is adroit and fluent, even redundant. Varro's style varies from work to work. In the De re rustica he writes carefully, though not so in the De lingua Latina, where he follows the traditional practice of the grammarians. Pliny, who is deliberately thrifty with his time and words, already in his Preface, though it is written with particular art, trips over the oppressive fullness of his own erudition. The Elder Cato, in his Prologue, writes with great attention to style, but allows himself to dlapse in what follows. In this regard he later found a number of imitators, who thus become a source for our knowledge of colloquial and vulgar Latin.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Reflections on writing find particular expression in the introductions to the different works. The literary considerations offered by the authors depend on the nature of their intended readership.

A writer aiming at an audience of non-experts must consciously strive for readability and excuse himself for stylistic defects occasioned by his material. The difficulty of the topic (in this case geography) allows, in Mela's view (1st century A.D.), no room for eloquence: impeditum opus et facundiae minime capax ('a complicated work, not capable of eloquence at all'). This is principally the fault of the need to mention numerous proper names.

An author directing his work only to fellow experts need not worry about rhetoric. A late writer such as Palladius (5th century) expresses most clearly the essential nature of such technical prose: 'The first requirement of wisdom is to form a proper notion of the person to receive instruction. In training a farmer, an author has no need to rival rhetoricians by his arts and eloquence, though this has been done by many. In their polished addresses to countryfolk, they have succeeded in failing to have their teaching understood even by the most polished.'<sup>1</sup>

---

'circumnavigation' allows him instead to linger on unknown ocean coasts which, in accordance with tradition, he peoples with all kinds of fantastic creatures.

<sup>1</sup> Pars est prima prudentiae, ipsam, cui praecepturus es, aestimare personam. Neque enim formator agricolae debet artibus et eloquentia rhetores aemulari, quod a plerisque factum est. Qui dum diserte loquuntur rusticis, adsecuti sunt, ut eorum doctrina nec a disertissimis possit intellegi.

This disdain for rhetoric must not be taken too literally;<sup>1</sup> most authors pretend to write for less educated people rather than for too fastidious ones. Varro presents himself in a somewhat simple light, although not without scholarly prolixity. His intention is to give advice to a certain Fundania who has purchased an estate. He names his sources and explains the structure of his work: yet as early as his preface his learned flummery seems to point beyond his indicated purpose.

Pliny tries to convince the emperor that he is writing for simple folk.<sup>2</sup> But his added qualification shows that he cannot maintain this fiction. He is also thinking of those who read in their leisure time. This means that he has to resort to excuses of the type known from Mela. He sums up the stylistic goal of the encyclopedic writer as follows: res ardua vetustis novitatem dare, novis auctoritatem, obsoletis nitorem, obscuris lucem, fastiditis gratiam, dubiis fidem, omnibus vero naturam, et naturae suae omnia, 'it is a difficult task to give novelty to what is old, brilliance to the commonplace, light to the obscure, attraction to the stale, credibility to the doubtful, but nature to all things and every thing to its nature' (praef. 15).

Frontinus is disarmingly honest. Entrusted by the Emperor Nerva with the administration of the aqueducts, he wrote his book in order to acquire a knowledge of the topic (aq. 1-2).

Most authors praise the eminence of their chosen field. Cato, in the preface to his De agricultura, spends more time on the moral value of farming than on his own particular purposes. Columella's long-winded preface laments that, in a time aware of many kinds of techniques and schools, there are no teachers and students, for all its importance, of agriculture. Firmicus sees in mathesis (astrology) without qualification the knowledge that makes man free.

Vegetius (end of 4th century) is generous enough to admit that his specialty, veterinary medicine, is subordinate to human medicine. Balbus, who perhaps was active under Trajan, emphasizes at first the modesty of the surveyor's art, but then, using an example drawn from experience, proves its true value: scarcely had the Romans set foot in enemy territory when they needed surveying, to build ramparts and bridges, to calculate the width of rivers and the height of hills. After his return from war, the author studied more profoundly the theoretical bases of his science in order to answer questions with chapter and verse.

<sup>1</sup> Careful stylists like Quintilian declare in their introductions that they have paid no attention to finished presentation. Solinus proclaims his contempt for rhetoric in a highly rhetorical form: velut fermentum cognitionis magis ei (sc. libro) inesse quam bratteas eloquentiae (praef. 2). Pliny and Gellius do not look down on the art of rhetoric, but do emphasize their own lack of talent. Christian authors unite both almost self-contradictory attitudes in the service of evangelical simplicity (Cypr. ad Donat. 2) which is praised in stately cadences.

<sup>2</sup> Humili vulgo scripta sunt, agricolaram, opificum turbae, denique studiorum otiosis (nat. praef. 6).

Some authors set their discipline in a larger context. Cicero demands a wide-ranging general education from the orator, and Vitruvius from the architect. This may give the impression that important disciplines such as philosophy are reduced to ancillaries for others, such as rhetoric. But the experts in general are wise enough not to require detailed knowledge of extraneous fields, but only mastery of the basics. Late antiquity establishes a hierarchy of the sciences. For Boethius, in the preface to his De institutione arithmetica, the remaining sciences of the Quadrivium are subordinate to arithmetic, and arithmetic in its turn to philosophy.

At the very latest with Lucretius and Cicero, Latin authors raised the claim to express difficult things (obscura) with greater clarity than their predecessors.

The Commentum de agrorum qualitate, ascribed to a certain Agennius (perhaps 5th century), aims at clear expression (plano sermone et lucido), more intelligible than the narrowly scientific ancients (ea quae a veteribus obscuro sermone conscripta sunt apertius et intellegibilius exponere, 'to explain more openly and clearly what the old authors wrote down in an obscure style').

In style, Vegetius seeks a prudent mean between eloquent authors such as Columella and literary nonentities such as Chiron. His aim is to combine fullness with brevity (plene ac breviter).

Vegetius also emphasizes a further essential requirement of technical writing, the necessity of a lucid organization of the material. Out of concern for hasty readers, who will not peruse the entire volume but only look up a particular entry, Pliny adds a detailed listing of contents, mentioning that his predecessor Valerius Soranus (about 100 B.C.) had done the same (nat. praef. 33).

The primacy of utility over beauty is a standard assertion of many technical writers, Qui difficultatibus victis utilitatem iuvandi praetulerunt gratiae placendi, 'who have preferred the useful service of overcoming difficulties to the popularity of giving pleasure' (Plin. nat. praef. 16). Fortunately, even so, beauty is not entirely overlooked.

Ideas II

The purpose of many technical writers is certainly to assist the Roman people by their work. The supreme witness for this is Varro (s. pp. 593–616). But the following consideration seems more important still.

In Greece the individual expert is content to treat only one particular specialty or only closely related areas. The phenomenon by which an individual author writes an encyclopedia, that is, a series of introductions to several areas, is unknown. The notion of ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία<sup>1</sup> is Greek, but the development of the encyclopedia as a genre was left to Rome.

The Romans adopted Greek culture as something complete in itself, and this inspired their need for writings of this type. Earlier, in the discussion of the pioneers of Roman literature, we had alluded to the many-sidedness of those first authors. Latin encyclopedias grew from similar soil. Cato's lost didactic works as a whole had an encyclopedic character, treating of agriculture, medicine, rhetoric and perhaps even military science.

Very little is known of Varro's Disciplinarum libri. It is supposed that they were a kind of encyclopedia including medicine and architecture. But, even apart from the precise content<sup>2</sup> of this treatise, Varro's œuvre as a whole is encyclopedic. He was the greatest of Roman polymaths.

In the early imperial period Celsus wrote an encyclopedia of which only the section on medicine is preserved.

Late antiquity, thanks to the efforts of philosophers like Augustine and Boethius, and teachers such as Cassiodorus and Isidore, preserved ancient scholarship for the Middle Ages.

General Works

J.-M. ANDRÉ, La rhétorique dans les préfaces de Vitruve. Le statut culturel de la science, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE,

<sup>1</sup> The preserved agricultural textbooks of Cato and Varro are not identical with the agricultural sections of their lost encyclopedias.

<sup>2</sup> In the Middle Ages, the canon of the Seven Liberal Arts consists of: grammar, rhetoric, dialectic (= trivium), arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy (= quadrivium). Its age is disputed; critical remarks in I. HADOT 1984; older bibliography in FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 162, note 3; s. now S. GREBE, Martianus Capella. De nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii. Die sieben freien Künste in der Spätantike, Habilitationsschrift Heidelberg 1996, Frankfurt 1997.

vol. 3, Urbino 1987, 265–289. * H. DAHLMANN, Varros Schrift De poematis und die hellenistisch-römische Poetik, AAWM 1953, 3. * B. DEINLEIN, Das römische Sachbuch, diss. Erlangen 1975. * M. ERREN, Einführung in die römische Kunstprosa, Darmstadt 1983, esp. 30–42 ('Kommentarien in Realienordnung'). * H. FUCHS, Enkyklios Paideia, RLAC 5, 1962, 365–398. * M. FUHRMANN, Das systematische Lehrbuch. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wissenschaften in der Antike, Göttingen 1960. * FUHRMANN, LG 181–194. * I. HADOT, Arts libéraux et philosophie dans la pensée antique, Paris 1984. * T. JANSON, Latin Prose Prefaces. Studies in Literary Conventions, Stockholm 1964. * F. KÜHNERT, Allgemeinbildung und Fachbildung in der Antike, Berlin 1961. * G. MORETTI, Marziano Capella e il sistema delle arti liberali dal Tardo Antico al Medioevo, in: Antropologia Medievale, Genova 1984, 94–117. * E. NORDEN, Die Composition und Litteraturgattung der Horazischen Epistula ad Pisones, Hermes 40, 1905, 481–528. * NORDEN, LG. * C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., Prefazioni, prologhi, proemi di opere tecnico-scientifiche latine, vol. 1, Roma 1990 (bibl.). * W. H. STAHL, Roman Science. Origins, Development, and Influence, Madison 1962. * H. USENER, Ein altes Lehrgebäude der Philologie, Kleine Schriften 2, Leipzig 1913, 265–314.

Agriculture

Editions: J. G. SCHNEIDER (TC), Scriptores rei rusticae, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1794–1795. * F. SPERANZA, Scriptorum Romanorum de re rustica reliquiae, Messina 1971, repr. 1974. * Cato, Varro, Virgil (s. the chapters on these authors); furthermore: Palladius: R. MARTIN (TTrC), Paris 1976.

N. BROCKMEYER, Arbeitsorganisation und ökonomisches Denken in der Gutswirtschaft des römischen Reiches, diss. Bochum 1968. * R. CLAUSING, The Roman Colonate. The Theories of its Origin, New York 1925, repr. 1965. * F. DE MARTINO, Wirtschaftsgeschichte des alten Rom, München 1985. * P. W. DE NEEVE, Colonus. Private Farm-Tenancy in Roman Italy during the Republic and the Early Principate, Amsterdam 1984. * H. DOHR, Die italischen Gutshöfe nach den Schriften Catos und Varros, diss. Köln 1965. * D. FLACH, Römische Agrargeschichte, München 1990 (bibl.); esp.: Cato 184–193; Varro 193–197; Columella 198–204; Palladius 204–215. * H. GUMMERUS, Der römische Gutsbetrieb nach den Schriften des Cato, Varro und Columella, Klio Beiheft 5, 1906. * F. T. HINRICHS, s. Surveying. * W. KALTENSTADLER, Arbeitsorganisation und Führungssystem bei den römischen Agrarschriftstellern (Cato, Varro, Columella), Stuttgart 1978. * J. KOLENDO, L'agricoltura nell'Italia romana, Roma 1980. * R. MARTIN, Recherches sur les agronomes latins et leurs conceptions économiques et sociales, Paris 1971 (bibl.). * M. OEHME, Die römische Villenwirtschaft. Untersuchungen zu den Agrarschriften Catos und Columellas und ihrer Darstellung bei Niebuhr und Mommsen, Bonn 1988. * P. REMARK, Der Weinbau im Römerreiche, München 1927. * H. SCHNEIDER, ed., Zur Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der späten Republik, Darmstadt 1976 (= WdF 413). * H. SCHNEIDER, ed., Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, Darmstadt 1981 (= WdF 552). * M. E. SERGEENKO, Sur l'économie rurale de l'Italie antique, VDI 3, 1953, 65–76. * J. M. C. TOYNBEE, Animals in Roman Life and Art, London 1973. * K. D. WHITE, Roman Farming, London 1970. * K. D. WHITE, Roman Agricultural Writers I. Varro and his Predecessors, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 439–497. * K. D. WHITE, Farm Equipment of the Roman World, Cambridge 1975. * C. R. WHITTAKER, ed., Pastoral Economies in Classical Antiquity, Cambridge 1988.

Columella: V. LUNDSTRÖM, Å. JOSEPHSON, S. HEDBERG, Uppsala 1897–1968. * H. B. ASH, E. S. FORSTER, E. H. HEFFNER, 3 vols., London 1941–1955; 2nd ed. 1968. * K. AHRENS (TrC), Berlin 1972; 2nd ed. 1976. * W. RICHTER (Tr), 3 vols., München 1981–1983. * Book 10: E. DE SAINT-DENIS (TTrC), Paris 1969. * Book 12: J. ANDRÉ (TTrC), Paris 1988. * arb.: R. GOUJARD (TTrC), Paris 1986. ** Index: G. G. BETTS, W. D. ASHWORTH, Index to the Uppsala Edition of Columella, Uppsala 1971. ** Bibl.: E. CHRISTMANN, forthcoming in: HLL.

B. BALDWIN, Columella's Sources and How he Used them, Latomus 22, 1963, 785–791. * P.-P. CORSETTI, L'apport de la tradition indirecte à l'établissement du texte de Columelle, Res rustica, livre VI, Etudes de lettres (Univ. de Lausanne) 1986, 33–44. * P. CARROL, Columella the Reformer, Latomus 35, 1976, 783–790. * E. CHRISTMANN, Columella, forthcoming in: HLL. * A. COSSARINI, Aspetti di Virgilio in Columella, Prometheus 3, 1977, 225–240. * N. DAHLLÖF, Tempora och modi hos Columella, diss. Göteborg 1931. * R. GOUJARD, encore à propos de l'authenticité du De arboribus, Latomus 45, 1986, 612–618 (bibl.). * S. HEDBERG, Contamination and Interpolation. A Study of the 15th Century Columella Manuscripts, Uppsala 1968. * Å. JOSEPHSON, Die Columella-Handschriften, Uppsala 1955. * E. MARÓTI, Zu Columellas Weiterleben im Frühmittelalter, AAntHung 27, 1979, 437–447. * G. NYSTRÖM, Variatio sermonis hos Columella, diss. Göteborg 1926. * R. POMOELL, Filologiska anteckningar till Columellas språk och stil, Åbo 1946. * W. RICHTER, Studien zur Textgestaltung und Interpretation von Columella VI und VII, Hermes 80, 1952, 200–222. * W. RICHTER, Beobachtungen zur SA-Überlieferung Columellas, WS n.s. 9, 1975, 135–151. * W. RICHTER, Palladius und sein Columella-Text im Buch über Tiermedizin, WS n.s. 12, 1978, 249–271. * R. SUAUDEAU, La doctrine économique de Columelle, Paris 1957. * H. WEINOLD, Die dichterischen Quellen des L. Iunius Moderatus Columella, diss. München 1959.

Architecture

s. Vitruvius.

Frontin: strat. s. Art of War. * aq.: P. GRIMAL (TTrN), Paris 1944.

- * C. KUNDEREWICZ, Leipzig 1973. * M. HAINZMANN (Tr), Zürich 1979.
 * T. GONZÁLEZ ROLÁN (TTr), Madrid 1985.

T. ASHBY, The Roman Campagna in Classical Times, London 2nd ed. 1970 (rev. J. B. WARD-PERKINS). * G. CORSETTI, Aquedotti di Roma dai tempi classici al giorno d'oggi, Roma 1937. * K. GREWE, Planung und Trassierung römischer Wasserleitungen, Wiesbaden 1985. * M. HAINZMANN, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte und Verwaltung der stadtrömischen Wasserleitungen, diss. Graz, Wien 1975. * F. HERNÁNDEZ-GONZÁLEZ, Frontino y el léxico de las aguas, Tabona n.s. 4, 1983, 253–265. * C. HERSCHEL, Frontinus and the Water Supply of Rome, London 1913. * G. PANIMOLLE, Gli acquedotti di Roma antica, Roma 1968. * T. PARTON, Trinkwasserversorgung im antiken Rom. Ökologische, administrative und juristische Aspekte, Anregung 31, 1985, 371–383. * R. H. RODGERS, Copia aquarum: Frontinus' Measurements and the Perspective of Capacity, TAPhA 116, 1986, 353–360. * E. B. VAN DEMAN, The Building of Roman Aqueducts, Washington 1934.

Arithmetic

Boeth. arith.: G. FRIEDLEIN (together with mus.), Lipsiae 1867. * M. MASI (TTrC, study), Boethian Number Theory, Amsterdam 1983.

J. CALDWELL, The De institutione arithmetica and the De institutione musica, in: M. GIBSON, ed., Boethius. His Life, Thought, and Influence, Oxford 1981, 135–154. * O. DILKE, Mathematics and Measurement, London 1987. * F. DI MIERI, Il De institutione arithmetica di Severino Boezio, Sapienza 37, 1984, 179–202. * G. FLAMMINI, Il prooemium del De institutione arithmetica di Boezio, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., 1990, 149–160. * M. MASI, ed., Boethius and the Liberal Arts. A Collection of Essays, Berne 1981. * Cf. also Astronomy, Music, Surveying.

Art of War (s. also: Surveying)

Frontinus: Editions: strat. and aq.: C. E. BENNETT, M. B. McELWAIN (TTrN), Cambridge, Mass. 1925, 5th ed. 1980. * strat.: G. GUNDERMANN, Lipsiae 1888; G. BENDZ (TTr), Berlin 3rd ed. 1987; R. IRELAND, Leipzig 1990. ** Index: J. C. RODRÍGUEZ, Frontini Index, Hildesheim 1985. * On strat.: G. BENDZ, Lund 1939.

Vegetius mil.: Editions: C. LANG, Lipsiae 1869, 2nd ed. 1885, repr. 1967. * F. WILLE (TTrC), Aarau 1986. * L. F. STELTEN, New York 1990.

G. BENDZ, Die Echtheitsfrage des 4. Buches der frontinischen Strategemata, diss. Lund 1938. * B. CAMPBELL, Teach Yourself How to Be a General, JRS 77, 1987, 13–29. * G. PERL, Frontin und der Limes (zu strat. 1, 3, 10 und 2, 11, 7), Klio 63, 1981, 563–583. * C. ROSSET, Frontin, auteur des Stratagemes a-t-il lu le Bellum Gallicum?, REL 32, 1954, 275–284. * E. SANDER, Die Hauptquellen der Bücher I – III der Epitoma rei militaris des Vegetius, Philologus 87, 1932, 369–375. * E. L. WHEELER, Modern Legality of Frontinus' Stratagems, MGM 43, 1988, 7–29.

Astronomy

Editions: Avien. Arat.: J. SOUBIRAN (TTrC), Paris 1981. * Cic. Arat.: J. SOUBIRAN (TTrN), Paris 1972. * Firm. math.: W. KROLL, F. SKUTSCH, Stutgardiae 1968. * Germ. astr.: A. LE BŒUFFLE (TTrN), Paris 1975. * Hyg. astr.: B. BUNTE, Lipsiae 1875. * A. LE BŒUFFLE (TTrN), Paris 1983. * G. VIRÉ, Stuttgart and Leipzig 1992. * Vitr. 9: J. SOUBIRAN (TTrN), Paris 1969. * Plin. nat. 2: J. BEAUJEU (TTrN), Paris 1950. * Manilius: s. our chapter on him. * Plin. nat. 18: H. LE BONNIEC, A. LE BŒUFFLE (TTrN), Paris 1972.

A. LE BŒUFFLE, Le vocabulaire latin de l'Astronomie, thèse Paris 1973. * A. LE BŒUFFLE, Les noms latins d'astres et des constellations, Paris 1977. * M. A. CERVELLERA, D. LIUZZI, eds., L'astronomia a Roma nell'età augustea, Galatina (Lecce) 1989. * A. LEGNER, ed., Aratea. Sternenhimmel in Antike und Mittelalter, Köln 1987. * D. PINGREE, Boethius' Geometry and Astronomy, in: M. GIBSON, ed., Boethius. His Life, Thought, and Influence, Oxford 1981, 155–161. * J. SOUBIRAN, Les Aratea d'Aviénus. Critique des textes et histoire des sciences, in: L'astronomie dans l'antiquité classique. Actes du colloque tenu à l'Université de Toulouse—Le Mirail (1977), Paris 1979, 225–243. * J. SOUBIRAN, L'astronomie à Rome, ibid. 167–183. * C. SANTINI, La praefatio al De astronomia di Iginò, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., 1990, 3–15 (bibl.). * G. VIRÉ, Informatique et classement des manuscrits. Essai méthodologique sur les Astronomica d'Hygin, Bruxelles 1986.

Cookery

Apicius: Editions: Guilermus SIGNERRE, Mediolani 1498. * C. GIARRATANO, F. VOLLMER, Lipsiae 1922. * A. MARSILI (TTrN), Pisa 1957. * B. FLOWER, E. ROSENBAUM (TTr), London 1958. * J. ANDRÉ (TTrC), Paris 1965. * M. E. MILHAM, Leipzig 1969. * E. ALFÖLDI-ROSENBAUM (TrN, practical), Zürich 5th ed. 1978. * R. MAIER (TTrN), Stuttgart 1991 (including extracts by Vinidarius). ** Concordance: I. STRIEGAN-KEUNTJE, Concordantia et Index in Apicium, Hildesheim 1992.

F. VOLLMER, Studien zum römischen Kochbuche von Apicius, SBAW 1920, 6. * E. BRANDT, Untersuchungen zum römischen Kochbuche, Philologus suppl. 19, 3, 1927. * J. ANDRÉ, L'alimentation et la cuisine à Rome, Paris 1961. * M. E. MILHAM, Leipzig 1969; cf. E. ALFÖLDI-ROSENBAUM, Gnomon 45, 1973, 363–367.

Geography

Editions: A. RIESE, Geographi Latini minores, Lipsiae 1878. * S. also our discussion of Mela * Cf. also the editions of Orosius: K. ZANGEMEISTER, CSEL 5, Vindobonae 1882. * K. ZANGEMEISTER, Lipsiae 1889. * Anonymus de situ orbis (about A.D. 870): R. QUADRI, Patavii 1974.

Y. JANVIER, La géographie d'Orose, Paris 1982 (with maps). * A. PODOSSINOV, Kartografičeskij princip v strukture geografičeskich opisaniij drevnosti, in: Metodika izučeniija drevnejšich istočnikov narodov SSSR, Moskva 1978, 22–45. * A. PODOSSINOV, Iz istorii antičnych geografičeskich predstavlenij, VDI 1979, 147–166. * J. O. THOMSON, A History of Ancient Geography, Cambridge 1948.

Grammar

Editions: Grammatici latini, ed. by H. KEIL, 7 vols., Lipsiae 1857–1880; suppl. H. HAGEN, Lipsiae 1870. * Grammaticae Romanae fragmenta, ed. H. FUNAIOLI, vol. 1, Lipsiae 1907. * Forthcoming: SGLG (= Sammlung griechischer und lateinischer Grammatiker, Berlin: De Gruyter). * Separate Editions: Asconius Pedianus: A. KIESSLING, R. SCHOELL, Berolini 1875. * A. C. CLARK, Oxford 1907. * B. A. MARSHALL (C, hist.), Columbia, Missouri U.P. 1985. * S. SQUIRES (TTr), Bristol 1990. * Ps.-Asconius: C. GIARRATANO, Romae 1920, repr. 1967. * Charisius: C. (= K.) BARWICK, Lipsiae 1925, repr. rev. by F. KÜHNERT 1964. * Aelius Donatus: ars.: L. HOLTZ, Paris 1981 (s. below). * Don. Ter.: P. WESSNER, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1902–1908. * Claudius Donatus, Aen.: H. GEORGII, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1905–1906. * Nonius: W. M. LINDSAY, 3 vols., Lipsiae 1903. * Phoc. Vita Verg.: G. BRUGNOLI (TTrC), Pisa 1984. * Prisc. perihēg.: P. VAN DE WOESTIJNE, Brugge 1953. * Prob. app. gramm.: W. A. BAEHRENS (C), Groningen 1922, repr. 1967. * Prob. Verg.: H. KEIL, Halae 1848. Index: V. LOMANTO, N. MARINONE, Index grammaticus. An Index to Latin Grammar Texts, Hildesheim 1990.

M. BARATIN, F. DESBORDES, L'analyse linguistique dans l'antiquité classique, Paris 1981. * M. BARATIN, La naissance de la syntaxe à Rome, Paris 1989. * K. BARWICK, Remmius Palaemon und die römische ars grammatica, Leipzig 1922, repr. 1967. * K. BARWICK, Probleme der stoischen Sprachlehre und Rhetorik, Abhandlungen der Sächsischen Akad. der Wiss. Leipzig, phil.-hist. Kl. 1957, 49, 3. * W. BELARDI, L'ordinamento dei casi nella grammatica tradizionale greca e latina, in: Studi Linguistici in onore di T. Bolelli, Pisa 1974. * G. CALBOLI, Problemi di grammatica latina, ANRW 2, 29, 1, 1983, 3–177; 2, 29, 2, 1215–1221. * H. DAHLMANN, s. Varro. * F. DELLA CORTE, s. Varro. * Fuhrmann, Lehrbuch 29–34; 145–146. * L. HOLTZ, Donat et la tradition de l'enseignement grammatical. Étude sur l'Ars Donati et sa diffusion (IV<sup>e</sup>–IX<sup>e</sup> siècle) et édition critique, Paris 1981. * H. J. METTE, Paratesis. Untersuchungen zur Sprachtheorie des Krates von Pergamon, Halle 1952. * A. D. SCAGLIONE, Ars Grammatica. A Bibliographic Survey, Two Essays on the Grammar of the Latin and Italian Subjunctive, and a Note on the Ablative Absolute, The Hague 1970. * H. STEINTHAL, Geschichte der Sprachwissenschaft bei den Griechen und Römern, mit besonderer

Rücksicht auf die Logik, Berlin 2nd ed. 1890, repr. 1961. * ZETZEL, Textual Criticism.

Aelius Donatus: L. HOLTZ (s. ed.). * H. D. JOCELYN, Vergilius' Cacozelus (Donatus, Vita Verg. 44), PLLS 2, 1979, 67–142. * C. E. MURGIA, Aldhelm and Donatus's Commentary on Vergil, Philologus 131, 1987, 289–299. * M. D. REEVE, The Textual Tradition of Donatus's Commentary on Terence, Hermes 106, 1978, 608–618. * U. SCHINDEL, Die lateinischen Figurenlehren des 5.–7. Jh. und Donats Vergilkommentar (mit zwei Editionen), Göttingen 1975. * O. ZWIERLEIN, Der Terenz-Kommentar des Donat im Codex Chigianus H VII 240, Berlin 1970.

Claudius Donatus: M. SQUILLANTE SACCONE, Le Interpretationes Vergilianae di Ti. Claudio Donato, Napoli 1985.

Festus: G. MORELLI, Un nuovo frammento di Festo in Diomede, RFIC 112, 1984, 5–32. * G. MORELLI, Ancora su Festo epitomatore di Verrio Flacco in Diomede, Maia n.s. 40, 1988, 159–172.

Valerius Probus: A. DELLA CASA, La 'grammatica' di Valerio Probo, in: Argentea Aetas. In memoriam E. MARMORALE, Genova 1973, 139–160.

Priscianus: G. BALLAIRA, Per il catalogo dei codici di Prisciano, Torino 1982. * M. GLÜCK, Priscians Partitiones und ihre Stellung in der spätantiken Schule. Mit einer Beilage: Commentarii in Prisciani Partitiones medio aevo compositi, Hildesheim 1967. * H. D. JOCELYN, The Quotations of Republican Drama in Priscian's Treatise De metris fabularum Terentii, Antichthon 1, 1967, 60–69.

Medicine

Editions: Corpus medicorum Latinorum, ed. consilio et auctoritate Instituti Puschmanniani Lipsiensis, vol. 1, F. MARX (Celsus), Berolini 1915; vol. 2, F. VOLLMER (Serenus), 1916; vol. 3, A. ÖNNERFORS (Ps.-Plin), 1964; vol. 4, E. HOWALD, H. E. SIGERIST (Ps.-Apul. and others), 1926; vol. 5, M. NIEDERMANN (Marcellus) 1916; 2nd ed. 1968 (TTr: M. NIEDERMANN, J. KOLLESCH, D. NICKEL); vol. 6, 1, G. BENDZ, I. PAPE (TTr: Caecilius), 1990; vol. 8, E. LIECHTENHAN, 1928. * Separate Editions: Celsus: F. MARX, ibid. (T, ind.). * E. SCHELLER, rev. W. FRIBOES (TrN), Celsus, Braunschweig 2nd ed. 1906, repr. 1967. * W. G. SPENCER (TTrN), 3 vols., London 1935–1938. * Books 1–4: F. SERRA, 3 vols., Pisa 1976–1977. * Book 1, praef.: O. DREYER (Tr), Stuttgart 1972. * P. MUDRY (TTrC), La préface du De medicina de Celse, Genève 1982. * Book 8: S. CONTINO (TTrC), Bologna 1988. * Index: W. F. RICHARDSON, Auckland 1982. * Marcellus: G. HELMREICH, Lipsiae 1889. * Scribonius Largus: G. HELMREICH, Lipsiae 1887. * S. SCONOCCHIA, Leipzig 1983. * Ed. of the praef.: in: K. DEICHGRÄBER, Professio medici. Zum Vorwort des Scribonius Largus, AAWM 1950. * Index: S. SCONOCCHIA, Hildesheim 1988. * Veget. mulom.: E. LOMMATZSCH, Lipsiae 1903. ** Bibl.: G. SABBAH and others, Bibliographie des textes médicaux latins. Antiquité et haut moyen âge, Saint-Étienne 1987.

G. BAADER, Die Antikerezeption in der Entwicklung der medizinischen Wissenschaft während der Renaissance, in: R. SCHMITZ, G. KEIL, eds., Humanismus und Medizin, Weinheim 1984, 51–66. * K. BARWICK, Zu den Schriften des Cornelius Celsus und des alten Cato, WJA 3, 1948, 117–132. * U. CAPITANI, Note critiche al testo del De medicina di Celso, SIFC 42, 1970, 5–93. * U. CAPITANI, Il recupero di un passo di Celso in un codice del De medicina conservato a Toledo, Maia 26, 1974, 161–212. * U. CAPITANI, Contributi del Toletanus 97–12 alla costituzione del testo di Celso, Prometheus 2, 1976, 239–258. * A. CORSINI, La praefatio di Sereno Sammonico al Liber medicinalis, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., 1990, 355–366. * A. CORSINI, Il prologo del De medicina di Cassio Felice, ibid. 399–405. * H. FLASHAR, ed., Antike Medizin, Darmstadt 1971 (= WdF 221). * FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 86–98; 173–181. * W. KRENKEL, Celsus, Altertum 4, 1958, 111–122. * J. A. MARTÍNEZ CONESA, Fenomenología del sueño en Celso, Durius 2, 1974, 67–78. * I. MAZZINI, Medici (scrittori), in: Dizionario degli scrittori greci e latini, vol. 2, Milano 1988, 1326–1333. * P. MIGLIORINI, La medicina nella cultura letteraria del periodo neroniano, Frankfurt 1996. * P. MUDRY, Sur l'étiologie des maladies attribuée à Hippocrate par Celse, De medicina, préf. 15, Hippocratica. Actes du colloque hippocratique de Paris (1978), ed. by M. D. GRMEK, Paris 1980, 409–416. * D. OLLERO GRANADOS, Dos nuevos capítulos de A. Cornelio Celso, Emerita 41, 1973, 99–108. * E. D. PHILIPPS, Greek Medicine, London 1973. * F. RÖMER, Sulla prefazione di Scribonio Largo, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., (s. our general bibliography to Roman Technical Authors), 339–354. * G. SABBAGH, ed., Médecins et médecine dans l'antiquité. Saint-Étienne 1982 (collection of articles). * J. SCARBOROUGH, Roman Medicine, Ithaca 1969. * M. SCHANZ, Über die Schriften des Cornelius Celsus, RhM 36, 1881, 362–379. * M. P. SEGOLONI, Il prologus della Medicina Plinii, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., 1990, 361–366. * M. P. SEGOLONI, L'epistola dedicatoria e l'appendice in versi del De medicamentis liber di Marcello, ibid. 367–379. * F. STOK, Concetto e trattamento dell'insania in A. Cornelio Celso, in: Studi di Filol. e Letter. a cura della Fac. di Lingue e Letter. stran. dell'Univ. degli Studi di Pisa 4, 1980, 9–42. * E. STOK, Celso in Seneca?, Orpheus n.s. 6, 1985, 417–421. * E. ZAFFAGNO, L'epistola prefatoria dell' Ars veterinaria di Pelagonio, ibid. 219–232. * E. ZAFFAGNO, La praefatio al Liber de veterinaria medicina di Palladio Rutilio Tauro Emiliano, ibid. 233–239. * E. ZAFFAGNO, Tre prologhi della Mulomedicina Chironis, ibid. 241–255. * E. ZAFFAGNO, I prologhi della Mulomedicina di Publio Vegezio Renato, ibid. 257–291. * L. ZURLI, Le praefationes nei Libri VIII de medicina di A. Cornelio Celso, ibid. 295–337. * L. ZURLI, Cinque epistulae de tuenda valetudine, ibid. 381–397. * L. ZURLI, Le praefationes ai Passionum libri di Celio Aureliano, ibid. 407–424.

Music

Editions: K. JAN, Musici scriptores Graeci, Lipsiae 1895, repr. 1962. * Fragmentum Censorini: together with Censorinus, ed. O. JAHN, 1845; F. HULTSCH, Leipzig 1867; on music and metrics: GL 6, 607 KEIL. * Augustinus, mus.: PL 32, Parisii 1877, 1081–1194. * C. J. PERL (Tr), Paderborn 3rd ed. 1962. * Boethius, mus.: G. FRIEDLEIN (with arithm.), Lipsiae 1867. * O. PAUL (TrN), Leipzig 1872, repr. 1973. * C. M. BOWER (TrC), diss. George Peabody College 1967 (DA 28, 1968, 2279 A). * Concordance: M. BERNHARD, Wortkonkordanz zu Boeth. mus., München 1979. ** Bibl.: International Journal of Musicology, Frankfurt 1992 ff.

M. VON ALBRECHT, W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik in Antike und Neuzeit, Frankfurt 1987 (bibl.). * M. VON ALBRECHT, W. SCHUBERT, eds., Musik und Dichtung, FS V. PÖSCHL, Frankfurt 1990 (bibl.). * M. VON ALBRECHT, Musik und Befreiung. Augustinus De musica, IJM 3, 1994, 89–114. * F. BEHN, Musikleben im Altertum, Stuttgart 1954. * C. M. BOWER, Boethius and Nicomachus. An Essay Concerning the Sources of De institutione musica, Vivarium 16, 1978, 1–45. * C. M. BOWER, The Role of Boethius' De institutione musica in the Speculative Tradition of Western Musical Thought, in: M. MASI, ed., Boethius and the Liberal Arts. A Collection of Essays, Berne 1981, 157–174. * J. CALDWELL, The De institutione arithmetica and the De institutione musica, in: M. GIBSON, ed., Boethius. His Life, Thought, and Influence, Oxford 1981, 135–154. * G. FLAMMINI, I capitoli introduttivi del De musica di Sant' Agostino, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., 1990, 163–191 (bibl.). * G. FLAMMINI, Il prooemium del De institutione musica di Boezio, ibid. 193–215 (bibl.). * T. GEORGIADES, Musik und Rhythmus bei den Griechen, Hamburg 1958. * S. GREBE, Die Musiktheorie des Martianus Capella. Eine Betrachtung der in 9, 921–935 benutzten Quellen, IJM 2, 1993, 23–60. * A. KELLER, Aurelius Augustinus und die Musik, Würzburg 1993. * F. VON LEPEL, Die antike Musiktheorie im Lichte des Boethius, Berlin 1958. * E. A. LIPPMAN, Musical Thought in Ancient Greece, New York 1964. * H.-I. MARROU, Μουσικὸς Ἀνὴρ, Roma 1964. * NEUBECKER, Musik. * U. PIZZANI, Studi sulle fonti del De institutione musica di Boezio, SEJG 16, 1965, 5–164. * U. PIZZANI, The Influence of the De institutione musica of Boethius up to Gerbert d'Aurillac, in: M. MASI, ed., Boethius and the Liberal Arts. A Collection of Essays, Berne 1981, 97–156. * E. PÖHLMANN, Beiträge zur antiken und neueren Musikgeschichte, Frankfurt 1988. * H. POTIRON, Boèce. Théoricien de la musique grecque, Paris 1961. * A. RIETHMÜLLER, F. ZAMINER, die Musik des Altertums, in: C. DAHLHAUS, ed., Neues Handbuch der Musikwissenschaft, vol. 1, Laaber 1989. * L. SCHRADER, Die Stellung der Musik in der Philosophie des Boethius, AGPh 41, 1932, 360–400. * M. WEGNER, Das Musikleben der Griechen, Münster 1949. * L. P. WILKINSON, Philodemus on Ethos in Music, CQ 32, 1938, 174–181. * WILLE, Musica Romana. * WILLE, Einführung.

Mythography

Mythographi Latini, ed. T. MUNCKER, Amstelaedami 1681. * Hyg. fab.: P. K. MARSHALL, Stuttgart 1993. * M. SCHMIDT, Ienae 1872. * E. BIEBER, Hygini fabularum supplementum, Marpurgi 1904. * H. I. ROSE (TC), Lugduni Batavorum 1933, repr. 1963. * Fulg.: R. HELM, Lipsiae 1898. * Myth. Vat. I et II: P. KULCSÁR, Turnholti 1987 (= CC 91 C).

P. LANGLOIS, Les œuvres de Fulgence le mythographe et le problème des deux Fulgence, JbAC 7, 1964, 94–105. * H. LIEBESCHÜTZ, Fulgentius metaphorialis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der antiken Mythologie im Mittelalter, Leipzig 1926. * W. LUPPE, Euripides-Hypotheseis in den Hygin-Fabeln 'Antiope' und 'Ino', Philologus 128, 1984, 41–59.

Natural History

(s. Pliny the Elder, Seneca).

Physiognomy

Edition: R. FOERSTER (T, Indices), Scriptores physiognomonici Graeci et Latini, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1893. * Separate Edition: J. ANDRÉ, Anonyme latin: Traité de physiognomie (TTrC), Paris 1981.

E. C. EVANS, Descriptions of Personal Appearance in Roman History and Biography, HSPH 46, 1935, 43–84. * E. C. EVANS, The Study of Physiognomy in the 2nd Century A.D., TAPhA 72, 1941, 96–108.

Rhetoric

Editions: C. HALM, Rhetores Latini minores, Lipsiae 1863. * Cf. also: The Rhetoric addressed to Herennius; Cicero; Seneca the Elder; Quintilian; Augustinus (doctr. chr.), Martianus Capella. * Boeth. top. diff.: E. STUMP (TTrN), Ithaca 1978. * Calp. decl.: G. LEHNERT, Lipsiae 1903. L. HÅKANSON, Stutgardiae 1978 (with ind. verborum). * Fortun. rhet.: L. CALBOLI Montefusco (TTrC), Bologna 1979 (with bibl.). * Iul. Vict. rhet.: R. GIOMINI, M. S. CELENTANO, Leipzig 1980 (with bibl., ind.). ** Lexicon: I. C. T. ERNESTI, Lexicon technologiae Latinorum rhetoricae, Lipsiae 1797, repr. 1962. * Indices in: Lausberg, Handbuch, vol. 2. * K. M. ABBOTT, W. A. OLDFATHER, H. V. CANTER, Index verborum in Ciceronis Rhetorica necnon incerti auctoris libros ad Herennium, Urbana 1964. * G. UEDING, ed., Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, Tübingen 1992 ff.

K. Barwick, Augustins Schrift De rhetorica und Hermagoras von Temnos, Philologus 105, 1961, 97–110. K. BARWICK, Zur Erklärung und Geschichte der Staseislehre des Hermagoras von Temnos, Philologus 108, 1964, 80–101. * K. BARWICK, Zur Rekonstruktion der Rhetorik des Hermagoras von Temnos, Philologus 109, 1965, 186–218. * G. BILLANOVICH, Il Petrarca e i retori latini minori, IMU 19, 1962, 103–164. * G. CALBOLI, L'oratore M. Antonio e la Rhetorica ad Herennium, GIF 24, 1972, 120–177. * L. CALBOLI

Montefusco, La dottrina degli 'status' nella retorica greca e romana, Bologna 1984. * L. CALBOLI Montefusco, Exordium, narratio, epilogus. Studi sulla teoria retorica greca e romana delle parti del discorso, Bologna 1988. * M. S. CELENTANO, Il centro scrittoria di Corbie e L' Ars rhetorica di Giulio Vittore, QUCC 38, n.s. 9, 1981, 133–138. * CLARKE, Rhetoric. * P. R. DÍAZ DÍAZ, La doctrina métrica de los retores romanos, Granada 1986. * W. EISENHUT, Einführung in die antike Rhetorik und ihre Geschichte, Darmstadt 1974. * A. GANTZ, De Aquilae Romani et Iulii Rufiniani exemplis, diss. Königsberg, Berlin 1909. * FUHRMANN, Rhetorik. * FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 41–69; 159–162. * R. GIOMINI, I Principia rhetorices di Agostino e il nuovo Bodmer 146 dei Rhetores Latini minores, in: Filologia e forme letterarie. Studi offerti a F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, vol. 4, 281–297. * K. HELDMANN, Antike Theorien über Entwicklung und Verfall der Redekunst, München 1982. * J. JAMISON, J. DYCK, Rhetoric, Topik, Argumentation. Bibliographie zur Redelehre und Rhetorikforschung im deutschsprachigen Raum (1945–1979/80), Stuttgart 1983. * KENNEDY, Rhetoric. * KÜHNERT, Bildung und Redekunst. * Lausberg, Hdb. * M. C. LEFF, The Topics of Argumentative Invention in Latin Rhetorical Theory from Cicero to Boethius, Rhetorica 1, 1, Berkeley 1983, 23–44. * J. MARTIN, Antike Rhetorik. Technik und Methode, München 1974; cf. H. WANKEL, Gnomon 48, 1976, 641–645. * M. H. MCCALL, Ancient Rhetorical Theories of Simile and Comparison, Cambridge, Mass. 1969. * A. MICHEL, Rhétorique, philosophie et esthétique générale. De Cicéron à Eupalinos, REL 51, 1973, 302–326. * L. MONTEFUSCO, Il nome di 'Chirio' Consulto Fortunaziano, Hermes 107, 1979, 78–91 (cf. also Calboli Montefusco). * J. J. MURPHY, Rhetoric in the Middle Ages. A History of Rhetorical Theory from Saint Augustine to the Renaissance, Berkeley 1974. * G. F. PASINI, In Iulii Victoris Artem rhetoricam animadversiones alterae, Hermes 110, 1982, 471–477. * M. PATILLON, La théorie du discours chez Hermogène le Rhéteur. Essai sur la structure de la rhétorique ancienne, Paris 1988. * P. PRESTEL, Die Rezeption der ciceronischen Rhetorik durch Augustinus in De doctrina Christiana, Frankfurt 1992. * A. REUTER, Untersuchungen zu den römischen Technographen Fortunatian, Julius Victor, Capella und Sulpitius Victor, Hermes 28, 1893, 73–134. * Russell, Criticism. * A. SCAGLIONE, The Classical Theory of Composition from its Origins to the Present. A Historical Survey, Chapel Hill 1972. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Die Anfänge der institutionellen Rhetorik in Rom. Zur Vorgeschichte der augusteischen Rhetorenschulen, in: Monumentum Chiloniense, FS E. BURCK, Amsterdam 1975, 183–216. * VOLKMANN, Rhetorik.

Surveying

Editions: F. BLUME, K. LACHMANN, T. MOMMSEN, A. RUDORFF, Die Schriften der römischen Feldmesser (TC, indices), 2 vols., Berlin 1848–1852; repr. 1967. * C. THULIN, Corpus agrimensorum Romanorum 1, 1: Opuscula

agrimensorum veterum, Lipsiae 1913 (no further volumes). * Single editions: (Ps.-)Hyg. mun. castr. (= De metatione castrorum): G. GEMOLL (T; Index), Lipsiae 1879. * A. VON DOMASZEWSKI (TC), Leipzig 1887. * A. GRILLONE, Leipzig 1977. * M. LENOIR (TTrC), Paris 1979. * Frontin., grom.: P. RESINA SOLA, Granada Univ. 1984; s. also Art of War and Geography.

E. BRILEY, The Dating and Character of the Tract De munitionibus castrorum, in: Romanitas-Christianitas. FS J. STRAUB, Berlin 1982, 277–281. * C. J. CLASSEN, On the Training of the Agrimensores in Republican Rome and Related Problems, ICS 19, 1994, 161–170. * O. A. W. DILKE, The Roman Land Surveyors. An Introduction to the Agrimensores, Newton Abbot 1971. * O. A. W. DILKE, Archaeological and Epigraphic Evidence of Roman Land Surveys, ANRW 2, 1, 1974, 564–592. * O. A. W. DILKE, The Roman Contribution to Cartography, CISA 14, 1988, 194–201. * W. ECK, Die Gestalt Frontins in ihrer politischen und sozialen Umwelt, in: S. Iulius Frontinus, curator aquarum. Wasserversorgung im antiken Rom, München 2nd ed. 1983, 45–77. * D. FLACH, Römische Feldvermessung, in: D. F., Römische Agrargeschichte, München 1990, 1–28 (bibl.). * M. FOLKERTS, Zur Überlieferung der Agrimensoren: Schryvers bisher verschollener ‘Codex Nausianus’, RhM 112, 1969, 53–70. * FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch 98–104. * A. GRILLONE, Note critiche al testo del De metatione castrorum dello pseudo-Igino, RFIC 49, 1977, 255–266. * A. GRILLONE, Sul De metatione castrorum dello Ps.-Igino. Il linguaggio di un geometra del III secolo, Philologus 126, 1982, 247–264. * A. GRILLONE, Elementi di matematica e di linguaggio tecnico nel De metatione castrorum dello Ps.-Igino e nei Gromatici veteres, in: Les sciences dans les textes antiques. Colloquium didacticum classicum decimum Basiliense, Bâle 1984, 21–43. * A. GRILLONE, Problemi tecnici e datazione del De metatione castrorum dello Ps.-Igino, Latomus 46, 1987, 399–412. * U. HEIMBERG, Römische Flur und Flurvermessung, in: H. JANKUHN, ed., Untersuchungen zur eisenzeitlichen und frühmittelalterlichen Flur in Mitteleuropa und ihrer Nutzung, 1, AAWG 3, 115, Göttingen 1979, 141–195. * F. T. HINRICHS, Die Geschichte der gromatischen Institutionen. Untersuchungen zu Landverteilung, Landvermessung, Bodenverwaltung und Bodenrecht im römischen Reich, Wiesbaden 1974. * Å. JOSEPHSON, Casae litterarum. Studien zum Corpus agrimensorum Romanorum, diss. Uppsala 1950. * P. PARRONI, Sul testo del De metatione castrorum dello Ps.-Igino, AFLPer 14, 1976–1977, 457–471. * C. SANTINI, Le praefationes dei gromatici, in: C. SANTINI, N. SCIVOLETTO, eds., 1990, 133–148 (bibl.). * C. THULIN, Der Frontinuskommentar. Ein Lehrbuch der Gromatik aus dem 5.–6. Jh., RhM 68, 1913, 110–127. * L. TONEATTO, Tradition manuscrite et éditions modernes du Corpus agrimensorum Romanorum, in: M. CLAVEL-LÉVÊQUE, ed., Cadastres et espace rural. Approches et réalités antiques, Paris 1983, 41–42. * L. TONEATTO, Stato degli studi sulla tradizione manoscritta degli opuscoli latini d’agrimensura dal V al XIII secolo, GFF 11, 1988, 19–33.

LATIN GRAMMARIANS

General Remarks

The social standing of the grammaticus is determined by the role of schools. From the middle of the 2nd century B.C. on, private instruction in grammar at Rome spread rapidly.

Young Romans took lessons at home or with the litterator (γραμματιστής) in reading and writing.<sup>1</sup> They then proceeded to the grammaticus (γραμματικός) not only to learn Greek and Latin grammar but also to explain poetic texts. This exegesis was often of a factual, 'antiquarian' nature,<sup>2</sup> and so the term grammaticus means a philologist or 'classical scholar' strongly centered on 'realia.' The highest stage involved studies with the rhetor, an introduction to prose composition and the framing and delivering of one's own speeches.

Greek Background

Dionysius Thrax (2nd century B.C.), a pupil of Aristarchus, was the author of a grammar influential down to the 18th century and, thanks to Remmius Palaemon (1st century A.D.), well known at Rome. Dionysius worked on Rhodes, an island with close ties to Rome. His clearly articulated work combined Alexandrian empiricism with the results of Stoic philosophy of language, though he also had reservations about Stoic ideas.<sup>3</sup> Syntax and style were not treated. In this respect, too, Dionysius has—unfortunately—found many successors.

Roman Development

The earliest Roman poets were intimately acquainted with grammar and philology, although the real impulse towards philological study as such at Rome is said (Suet. gramm. 2) to have been given by Crates

<sup>1</sup> Among elementary teachers were also found the librarius (writing master), calculator (teacher of arithmetic) and notarius (shorthand teacher). The paedagogus was not a teacher but a slave entrusted with taking the child to school.

<sup>2</sup> History, geography, physics, and astronomy were included here. There was much dictation and learning by heart. Correct pronunciation and good delivery were also taught.

<sup>3</sup> Προσηγορία was not for him a separate part of speech, but belonged to the ὄνομα.

of Mallos,<sup>1</sup> during his stay in the capital in the period following Ennius' death. The type of wide-ranging intellectual horizon encountered for example in Accius, confirms the strength of Pergamene influence. In other respects too, it was this method which often enjoyed pride of place at Rome over the technical severity of Alexandrian scholarship, which concentrated on details.

Grammatici were urgently needed at Rome as teachers; moreover their activity had a beneficial influence on the preservation of native Latin literature. About 100 B.C., it was a grammaticus who edited the epics of Naevius and Ennius.

The most important grammarian of the older period was L. Aelius Stilo<sup>2</sup> Praeconinus. A knight by birth from Lanuvium (about 154–90 B.C.), he gave instruction to friends in Latin literature and rhetoric. About 100 B.C. he accompanied Q. Metellus Numidicus into exile on Rhodes. There he may have encountered Dionysius Thrax. Stilo commented on the oldest linguistic monuments of Rome (Carmen Saliare, Laws of the Twelve Tables) and gave attention to Plautus.<sup>3</sup> As might be expected, he was influenced by the Stoa. It was he who transferred the methods of Greek linguistics to Latin. In his view, the study of language was not to be separated from its relation to objects. In him, a universal view prevailed, resting on the study of cultural history. Both essential approaches were transmitted by Stilo to his influential student Varro, but Cicero too was affected by his teaching. Thanks to Varro, Aelius also influenced Verrius Flaccus and Pliny the Elder.

Among authors of the Republican period concerned with grammatical problems we may cite Accius, Lucilius, Porcius Licinus, and the notably learned Q. Valerius Soranus, who also wrote in verse. Volcacius Sedigitus produced an eccentric canon of comic poets. Further names deserving mention are: Octavius Lampadio, Sisenna, Sevius Nicanor, Aurelius Opilius, M. Antonius Gniphio (Caesar's and Cicero's teacher), Q. Cosconius, Santra, Octavius Hersennus.

---

<sup>1</sup> Independent of the actual influence exercised by Crates, the derivation from him of Roman grammar is a telling indication of how Roman grammarians viewed their activity.

<sup>2</sup> His cognomen was the result of his activity as a speech writer. On Stilo, cf. Cic. Brut. 205–207; edition: GRF 51–76 FUNAIOLI; bibl.: GOETZ, RE 1, 1893, 532–533; NORDEN, LG 27–28; LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio 1, 72; 74.

<sup>3</sup> Stilo's canon of 25 genuine Plautine comedies (Gell. 3. 3. 12) was reduced by Varro to the number of plays transmitted to us.

From Cicero's time may be noted, apart from Varro, the Pythagorean Nigidius Figulus,<sup>1</sup> Catullus' friend Valerius Cato, as well as Ateius Philologus, the adviser of Sallust and Pollio. Caesar himself wrote De analogia, while Appius Claudius (consul 54) and L. Caesar treated augury. Horace's famous teacher Orbilius published the Elenchi to Ennius' Annales by M. Pompilius Andronicus, and himself wrote On the trials of teachers, complaining over negligent or ambitious parents. In the classroom he was not slow to use the rod.

Literary Technique

The grammatical texts preserved depend on each other and display little originality. They may be divided by type into: systematic textbooks; handbooks; lexica; treatments of individual problems; and commentaries.

Language and Style

The grammarians' way of writing is distinguished by sobriety and clarity. They are not afraid of introducing original quotations, even in Greek.

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature and Language

The grammarians transmit linguistic and literary theories of the Greeks. For example, Diomedes transmits a theory of the literary genres.

The systematization of grammar is taken only to a certain limit. In this area, as in the field of law, it was only in the Late Middle Ages and in most recent times that more rigorous advances were made.

Yet some independence is shown in the application of Greek categories to the Latin language. This is an area where Varro in particular (s. below) rendered meritorious service. The Latin examples adduced by the grammarians are particularly precious for us.

---

<sup>1</sup> Collections of the fragments are found in: A. S. SWOBODA, Praga 1889, repr. 1964; D. LUZZI (TTrC), Lecce 1983; bibl.: L. LEGRAND, P. Nigidius Figulus. Philosophe néopythagoricien orphique, Paris 1931 (also contains the fragments in Latin and French).

Ideas II

The genuine achievement of the grammarians lies not so much in the abstract formulation of thoughts as in their dedication to their task. They rarely speak of Roman virtues, and yet their contribution to the survival of the Roman res publica litterarum was essential. Their merit is to have guaranteed the unfailing consistency and continuity of classical education. It was they who preserved for centuries a high standard of linguistic training. Furthermore, they linked scholarly reading of the poets with an introduction to the disciplines necessary to understand the facts mentioned in text, such as geography, history, physics, astronomy, and philosophy. They deserve credit for the description which their writings gave of the Latin language, as for their preservation and explication of poetic texts, even of those which in their day did not yet enjoy the aura of antiquity and which, without their editorial intervention, would perhaps not have been transmitted to us. To their dedication we owe moreover our knowledge of fragments of lost Old Latin texts. In the later period, rhetorical treatment penetrated even commentaries, but the concern with facts demanded by the grammarians continued to enjoy strong influence.

Editions: GL, ed. by H. KEIL, s. General list of Abbreviations. * GRF, ed. by H. FUNAIOLI (s. ibid.). * S. bibl. above pp. 576–577.

I. HADOT, s. above p. 572. * LEEMAN, Orationis ratio. * H.-I. MARROU, Education. * NORDEN, Kunstprosa. * P. L. SCHMIDT, in: HLL under the individual grammarians (hitherto, only vol. 5 is available).

RHETORICAL WRITERS AT ROME

General Remarks

In civilized societies rhetoric is an indispensable science. Ancient cultures, especially that of Rome, cannot be understood without knowledge of technical rhetorical literature. Rome's greatest writer of prose, Cicero, was an orator, and he has written important works on rhetoric. Though the theory of speech was adopted from Greece, it was set in the service of Roman practice. In this area too, a distinction is to be made between (technical) textbooks and books of factual information (meant for the general reader).

The type of practical manual is represented by two parallel early works: the anonymous Rhetorica ad Herennium, and Cicero's youthful De inventione.

By contrast, Cicero's masterpiece De oratore is a book of factual information in literary form.

However, literary form and practical concern (use as textbook) are not mutually exclusive. Even the De inventione indulges in philosophical digressions and essays, intended to give deeper arguments for individual points. Quintilian's Institutio oratoria is certainly a textbook, but structured throughout to be as readable as possible.

Greek Background

As a technical discipline, rhetoric was rooted in the Greek Enlightenment. In his dialogue Gorgias, Plato sought to come to terms with a leading representative of Sophistic rhetoric. But, great philosopher as he was, he could not be content with mere criticism. In his Phaedrus, he raised the demand for a rhetoric based on philosophy, and recognized in Isocrates a talent for philosophy.

Plato's challenge was answered by Aristotle in his Ῥητορικὴ τέχνη. He drew a distinction between rational and emotional means of persuasion (πίστεις). The former are partly inductive (the example is a short form of induction). Partly, they are deductive (the enthymeme is an abbreviated syllogism). Emotional means of persuasion may be divided into ethos and pathos. The former rests in the gentle feelings emanating in the guise of sympathy from the speaker. The latter consists of the strong emotions, of anger or concern according to circumstance, which must be aroused in the listener. This means that a by-product of Aristotle's rhetoric is a typology or topography of emotions. For Cicero, and through him for Rome, it is not only Aristotle and his pupil Theophrastus, along with the less philosophically ambitious representatives of the rhetoric of the schools such as Hermagoras who are important, but also Isocrates himself.

Roman Development

Originally the young Roman learned the art of speaking by practice, listening to famous orators in the Forum. The activity of Greek rhetors at Rome at first met with opposition, but soon won tacit acceptance on a private basis. The resistance of the aristocracy to public schools of Latin rhetors was more substantial. The important and well-educated orator Crassus was still engaged in an effort to close them. Unless Cicero is interpolating a notion of his own, Crassus' motives here were perhaps not so much governed by political or linguistic considerations as by the thought that, without secure footing in a broad education, these schools limited themselves to the quick communication of recipes for success.

Literary Technique

The mark of a 'systematic textbook' is the presentation of material in logical order. Here, from the Republican period may be mentioned the anonymous Rhetorica ad Herennium and Cicero's early work, De inventione. The mutual relationship of these two works is disputed. It is possible that both of them depend on a common source. Perhaps they represent parallel lecture notes, a type of written text with more significance for the whole of ancient technical literature than we might have expected, since instructors often passed their teachings down by using dictation.

But even in this sort of writing, a literary element is not wholly missing. Especially in its attractive proems, the De inventione develops philosophical reflections, and even the simpler Ad Herennium chooses and presents its Roman examples with care.

Another type is the factual book aimed at a wider public. Personal proems, a thoughtful setting of the scene and a dialogue in which different points of view are presented in a sequence of continuous speeches are characteristic. This is the type of 'Aristotelian' dialogue illustrated by Cicero's masterpiece De oratore, a quite extraordinary literary achievement in the area of rhetoric. For this work and Cicero's other rhetorical writings, s. above on Cicero.

Language and Style

'Systematic textbooks' are more concerned with clarity than ornament. Good examples—although they by no means lack finish—are provided by the Ad Herennium and Cicero's early De inventione.

The range of stylistic colors in Cicero's later rhetorical writings is more varied, especially in the De oratore.

In the literary background of the dialogues, hints of poetic vocabulary are found in the descriptions of landscape. In urbane dialogue there are echoes of the colloquial language of high society (s. Cicero above).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In masterly fashion reflections on language and style are brought into contact with the orator's real world. A basic principle is that of propriety (aptum). The demand for knowledge of facts and affairs, allied with an appreciation of what is fitting, transforms in Rome's greatest rhetorical writers the colorless academicism of the school-room. Unconcerned with superficial recipes, it draws upon the very nature of the subject matter to give responsive shape to the different literary types.

Ideas II

Rhetoric was a seminal terrain in generating the educated Roman's appreciation of his own identity in his dealings with his native language and his fellow men. Cicero planted the art of eloquence in the character of the Republican statesman and his wisdom. The demand for thorough knowledge of men, affairs and laws, even for a philosophical approach, may sound somewhat idealized, but it was meant seriously. The 1st century A.D. was rightly convinced that rhetoric, now largely limited to fine speaking, had to a great extent lost its secure place in the national life, and it is true that in the imperial period the cultivation of form came to prevail over content. Late antiquity would transform rhetoric into an art of interpretation (hermeneutics). With much greater stringency than Cicero, it would re-establish the demand for a relationship to truth, originally made by Plato, in seeking a connection with revelation. The price that had to be paid for this was dogmatic inflexibility.

Editions: S. Auctor ad Herennium, Cicero, Quintilian, Augustinus. * Rhet-LatMin. (s. General list of abbreviations).

LEEMAN, Orationis ratio. * KENNEDY, Rhetoric. * P. O. KRISTELLER, Studien zur Geschichte der Rhetorik und zum Begriff des Menschen in der Renaissance, Göttingen 1981. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Die Anfänge der institutionellen Rhetorik in Rom. Zur Vorgeschichte der augusteischen Rhetorenschulen, in: Monumentum Chiloniense. Studien zur augusteischen Zeit, Kieler FS E. BURCK, ed. by E. LEFÈVRE, Amsterdam 1975, 183–216. * Further bibl. s. above pp. 580–581.

THE RHETORICA AD HERENNIUM

Date

Perhaps the oldest rhetorical treatise in Latin comes from an unknown author<sup>1</sup> and was written some time between 86 and 82 B.C. The author was not a professional rhetor, but a Roman of distinction.

Survey of Work

After an introduction (1. 1) and a survey of basic notions (1. 2–4), there follow inventio (1. 4–3. 15), dispositio (3. 16–18), actio (3. 19–27), memoria (3. 28–40), and elocutio (4. 1–69).

The most detailed discussion is reserved for inventio and elocutio. The former is divided into judicial speech (1. 4–2. 50), political speech (3. 1–9), and ceremonial speech (3. 10–15). Each type of speech is presented according to its parts (exordium, divisio, narratio, argumentatio, peroratio). In the argumentatio of the judicial speech, the doctrine of status is developed, and with it is linked the doctrine of proof.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The author distances himself from Greek predecessors, though his far-reaching dependence on them is clear. The Hellenistic authority for rhetoric is Hermagoras. The Ad Herennium and Cicero's youthful work the De inventione probably go back to a common source, perhaps already written in Latin. Was this a lecture by the same teacher? The Latin examples are principally drawn from C. Gracchus and L. Crassus, who are ranked with Demosthenes and Aeschines.

<sup>1</sup> That Cicero was not the author was first recognized by Raphael Regius, Utrum ars rhetorica ad Herennium Ciceroni falso inscribatur, Venetiis 1491. He already suggested Cornificius as the author, but this was refuted by F. MARX (PhW 1890, 1008). The assignment to Cornutus (1st century A.D.) made by L. HERRMANN, L. Annaeus Cornutus et sa rhétorique à Herennius Senecio, Latomus 39, 1980, 144–160, is not to be taken seriously. The dating by A. E. DOUGLAS 1960 (to 50 B.C.) is less absurd, though not as convincing as his observations on prose rhythm, and he too seems to overestimate the author's stylistic skill. G. ACHARD 1985 again defends the traditional dating. W. STROH (in a forthcoming publication) defends a post-Ciceronian date.

Literary Technique

All four books have prefaces and epilogues. The Ad Herennium is the first example using prefaces of the type destined to become authoritative in Cicero's Orator.

A merit of the work lies in its numerous examples. As might be expected, they are partly drawn from myth and literature. Latin poetry is also cited, and apart from imaginary cases there are also those drawn from Roman experience. In general the Ad Herennium offers a positive picture of the state of Latin rhetoric before Cicero.

Language and Style

The author's diction is precise and at times even ponderous. The Ciceronian polish is still missing.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In free dependence on the topoi of the proem, the author explains that he is assuming the task of writing, not for gain or in search of fame, but 'out of affection for his friend Herennius'<sup>1</sup> (1. 1. 1). Evidently a Roman of rank must still excuse himself for taking up the pen.

His aim is to present his material more clearly and coherently than was the case with his Greek predecessors (1. 1. 1). This aim is served also by the proems to books 2-4, which expressly illustrate the structure, which in any case is refreshingly obvious.

---

<sup>1</sup> A plea from friends as a reason for writing is found as early as Archimedes (JANSON, Prefaces 32). But the author gives to this theme a personal turn: family duties day by day and philosophical interests in his leisure time.

Ideas II

The author's preoccupation with philosophy (1. 1. 1) may have exercised a beneficial influence on the lucidity of his presentation. His treatise reveals that he has thoroughly mastered his material, and scholars actually credit him with changes in the system.<sup>1</sup> However, he is unsympathetic in principle to the subtleties of Greek rhetorical theory (1. 1. 1), and does not even aim, as the young Cicero would in the De inventione, to give a philosophical basis to his discipline. The writer is a man of practical affairs. His attention is focused more on the judicial speech, while that of Cicero is directed towards political oratory.

Transmission

F. MARX sketched the following picture. The transmission became divided into a lacunose (mutilus) and a complete (integer) hyparchetype. In the mutili (9th–10th century) the beginning is missing as far as 1. 6. 9. The manuscripts preserved go back to the mutilus, but more recent (12th century) manuscripts are found which have been supplemented by a tradition stemming from the integer.<sup>2</sup> Today attention is also given to a group of manuscripts neglected by MARX (10th–11th century). The conclusion is that the additional amount of text in the more recent manuscripts goes back partly to a subsidiary transmission, and partly to medieval emendations.<sup>3</sup>

Influence

From Jerome on, the Ad Herennium evidently found readers. At that time it was ascribed to Cicero. From the Carolingian period to the Renaissance, along with Cicero's De inventione, it was studied as an authoritative textbook. The clarity of its teaching was valued still later. Traces of it are thought to have been found even in J. S. BACH,<sup>4</sup> who was acquainted with rhetoric, not simply through the texts of his cantatas, but also by his practical experience as a teacher of Latin.

<sup>1</sup> M. FUHRMANN 1984, 49, concerning the theory of style (4. 17–18). On the other hand, the author's teacher had already rearranged the status doctrine (1. 18).

<sup>2</sup> S. the prefaces of the different editions.

<sup>3</sup> A. HAFNER 1989.

<sup>4</sup> Z. P. AMBROSE, 'Weinen, Klagen, Sorgen, Zagen' und die antike Redekunst, Bach-Jahrbuch, Berlin 1980, 35–41.

Editions: Venetiis 1470 (together with Cic. inv.). * F. MARX (ed. maior: T, very good indices), Lipsiae 2nd ed. 1894, repr. 1966. * F. MARX (ed. minor), Lipsiae 1923, corr. with add. by W. TRILLITZSCH 1964, repr. 1993. * K. KUCHTNER (Tr), München 1911. * H. CAPLAN (TTrN), London 1954, repr. 1968. * G. CALBOLI (TC), Bologna 1969. * G. ACHARD (TTrN), Paris 1989. * T. NÜSSLEIN (TTrN), München 1994. ** Indices: F. MARX, ed. maior 1894. * K. M. ABBOTT, W. A. OLDFATHER, H. V. CANTER, Index in Ciceronis Rhetorica necnon incerti auctoris libros ad Herennium, Urbana 1964.

G. ACHARD, L'auteur de la Rhétorique à Herennius?, REL 63, 1985, 56–68. * J. ADAMIETZ, Ciceros De inventione und die Rhetorik ad Herennium, diss. Marburg 1960. * G. CALBOLI, Introduction, in: edition 1969. * CLARKE, Rhetoric. * D. DEN HENGST, Memoria thesaurus eloquentiae. De auctor ad Herennium, Cicero en Quintilianus over mnemotechniek, Lampas 19, 1986, 239–248. * A. E. DOUGLAS, Clausulae in the Rhetorica ad Herennium as Evidence of its Date, CQ n.s. 10, 1960, 65–78. * FUHRMANN, Lehrbuch. * M. FUHRMANN, Die antike Rhetorik. Eine Einführung, München 184, 42–51. * A. HAFNER, Untersuchungen zur Überlieferungsgeschichte der Rhetorik ad Herennium, Frankfurt 1989. * G. HERBOLZHEIMER, Ciceros Rhetorici libri und die Lehrschrift des Auctor ad Herennium, Philologus 81, 1926, 391–426. * T. JANSON, Latin Prose Prefaces, Stockholm 1964, 27–32; 45–49. * LEEMAN, Orationis Ratio 25–42. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Die Anfänge der institutionellen Rhetorik in Rom, in: Monumentum Chiloniense. Kieler FS E. BURCK, ed. by E. LEFÈVRE, Amsterdam 1975, 183–216. * K. ZELZER, Zur Überlieferung der Rhetorik Ad Herennium, WS n.s. 16, 1982, 183–211.

VARRO

Life and Dates

M. Terentius Varro, Rome's greatest scholar, was born in 116 B.C.;<sup>1</sup> classicists call him Reatinus from his estates at Sabine Reate. His lifetime covers a great expanse of Roman history. He was ten years older than Cicero, and yet survived to see the beginning of Augustus' principate. Even in literature his life formed a bridge between periods. The man who in his youth dedicated a book to Accius witnessed the appearance of Virgil's Georgics and Propertius' Monobiblos.

A strict Roman education set its stamp on his life. At the same time, distinguished teachers stimulated his intellectual development in a great variety of disciplines. The first great Latin grammarian and antiquarian, L. Aelius Stilo (d. about 70 B.C.), introduced him to the learned Stoic tradition. Through the teaching of Antiochus of Ascalon, whose students were later to include Cicero, he encountered in Athens (about 84–82) a Platonism looking back to the Old Academy and in some points approximating to the Stoa; moreover, Varro was influenced by Cynic and Pythagorean philosophy. Even on campaign, but particularly during a voluntary period of leisure on his estates some time between 59 and 50, and in his tranquil old age, Varro dedicated himself to study.

<sup>1</sup> Augustine (civ. 4. 1) maintains that he was born in Rome.

Yet for him as a Roman politics took precedence. About 86 B.C. he became quaestor, about 70 tribune, perhaps in 68 praetor, and in 59, along with Pompey, a member of the Commission of Twenty charged with executing Caesar's agrarian law. From 78/77 B.C. his career was fostered by his friendship with and duties as legate for Pompey, his junior by ten years. As a senior officer, he served Pompey in 77–71 B.C. in Spain. In 67 he enjoyed brilliant success in the war against the pirates. In 49 he was again in Spain, although this time playing something less than a heroic role (Caes. civ. 2. 17–20). Caesar pardoned him after his victory. Rightly recognizing his intellectual importance, he gave him the task of obtaining and organizing all accessible Greek and Latin literature for a planned, large-scale, public library (47/46 B.C.: Suet. Iul. 44. 2). Varro found his private passion raised to national scope. Now being a Roman and da scholar were no longer opposites. Compared to this great vision, the actual failure of Caesar's plan was almost an incidental. The impulse had been given.

The petty successor of the great man behaved differently. In 43 Antony proscribed the wealthy scholar. His villa at Casinum was destroyed, along with his private library, but a friend, Q. Fufius Calenus, succeeded in saving Varro's life. A few years later (38 B.C.), he was honored by having his imago placed in Rome's first public library, that of C. Asinius Pollio, the only living writer to receive this distinction (Plin. nat. 7. 115). Thanks to his friend Atticus, he presumably enjoyed the favor of the later Augustus. He died full of years in 27 B.C.

To Varro's earliest writings belong his two books of De antiquitate litterarum. They were dedicated during his lifetime to Accius, who died about 86 B.C.

In his Menippean satires modern scholars draw a distinction between an older and a later segment. The former occupied from the end of the eighties (Κοσμοτρόνη) until soon after 67 (Ἦνος λύρας). Our authority, Nonius, draws his citations from three collections. One contained satires mostly with double titles; the other two had simple headings. Gellius knows only satires from the first group, and only this had the title Saturae Menippeae. In it, emphasis was laid on proverbs, sayings, philosophical—mostly cynic—elements, and, in the second half of the title, advice and instruction. This first group is now thought to be the later of the two.<sup>1</sup>

The reasons favoring an early dating of the Menippeans<sup>2</sup> all refer to the other segment, which is dominated by criticism of the contemporary world. This division of the Menippeans by date is in itself convincing, but open to the single objection that satires without contemporary allusion, by definition can hardly offer indications of time. This absence is therefore no proof of date, and the danger of circular argument is patent.

In 77, Varro addressed to Pompey his Ephemeris navalis ad Pompeium. The Εἰσαγωγικός, containing advice to Pompey for his coming consulship, was written in 71.

The pamphlet Τρικάρανος (59 B.C.) took as its theme the triumvirate. It was followed by almost a decade of withdrawal, during which Varro devoted his attention to his estates and to his studies. Among the works known to us, the Legationum libri may tentatively be dated to this period. The Antiquitates rerum humanarum were written (from perhaps 55 B.C. on) before the Antiquitates rerum divinarum, completed in autumn 47. In all probability the De Pompeio was an in memoriam following Pompey's death in 48 B.C.

After the Civil War Varro composed several important treatises, evidently spurred by Caesar's commission. The De lingua Latina was written between 47 and 45 B.C. and published during Cicero's lifetime, to whom it is largely dedicated. After 45 B.C. appeared his philosophical writings, attesting his allegiance to the Old Academy (De philosophia and De forma philosophiae).

The De vita populi Romani was dedicated to Atticus, and therefore must have been written before his death in 32 B.C. Pompey's departure from Italy in 49 and Caesar's Spanish War were mentioned. The connection of theme with the De gente populi Romani, in which the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa (43 B.C.) was referred to, suggests that both works were written about the same time.

<sup>1</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT 1979.

<sup>2</sup> CICHORIUS, Studien 207–226, esp. 207–214.

The logistorici were certainly published after 54/53, but in all probability as late as 40. In 39 appeared the Hebdomades, in which Varro declared that to date he had written 490 books.

In 37, at the age of 80, he composed his Rerum rusticarum libri, and supposedly in 34–33 the Disciplinae (if the reference at Plin. nat. 29. 65 is correct). Later still appeared an autobiography.<sup>1</sup>

Survey of Works

Preserved are the De re rustica and considerable portions of the De lingua Latina. Important writings are lost. We know of the following works:<sup>2</sup>

1. Encyclopedic Writings

Disciplinae: an encyclopedia of the artes liberales. In all likelihood Varro treated successively: grammar (book 1), dialectic (2), rhetoric (3), geometry (4), arithmetic (5), astronomy (6), music (7), medicine (8) and architecture (9). Varro was perhaps the first to establish the number and sequence of the liberal arts, though failing to convince posterity that there were nine of them. His concern was more than the accumulation of dead knowledge; rather his aim was to lead the student from the visible to the invisible. This meant that he went beyond the purely practical direction of Roman instruction and acted as mediator of Greek education. Nothing however may be said with certainty of the influence of the Disciplinae on late antiquity. Later, from Varro's nine liberal arts seven<sup>3</sup> emerged, certainly under neo-Platonic influence. Augustine and Martianus Capella, for instance, omitted medicine and architecture.

2. Grammatical Writings

De lingua Latina in 25 books, of which books 5–10 are preserved in lacunose state. The work is entirely or, for the most part, dedicated to Cicero. After a general introduction (book 1), Varro discussed the arguments against etymology as a science (book 2) and in favor of it (book 3), and finally the forma etymologiae (book 4). The preserved books 5–7 analyze the vocabulary of Latin etymologically by topics, for which the principles of division are often Stoic. Books 8–10, also preserved, display the same structure as 2–4: against analogy, against anomaly and finally De similitudinum forma. The further lost books perhaps treated, following the same principle, accident (11–13) and syntax (14–25). Other works of Varro on the Latin language are also known.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> De vita sua libri III ad Libonem.

<sup>2</sup> We possess a broad and yet incomplete index of the works: F. RITSCHL, Die Schriftstellerei des M. Terentius Varro und die des Origenes, nach dem ungedruckten Katalog des Hieronymus, RhM 6, 1848, 481–560 (= Opusc. 3, 419–505). Scholars calculate there were about 74 works in some 620 books.

<sup>3</sup> I. HADOT, Arts libéraux et philosophie dans la pensée antique, Paris 1984, esp. 57–58; 156–190 with justified criticism of previous efforts at reconstruction.

3. Writings on Literary History

Of the writings on literary history,<sup>2</sup> perhaps the most important was De comoediis Plautinis (Gell. 3. 3. 2–9). It was Varro who defined the twenty-one genuine comedies originally included in our manuscript tradition. He also names plays not recognized by everyone as Plautine, but accepted by him as genuine.

The twin works De poematis and De poetis complemented each other like Plato's Politeia and Politikos. The De poematis was a dialogue in three books concerning the genres of Roman poetry, arranged according to meter and subject matter. In his De poetis Varro may have transferred the model of scholarly Alexandrian biography to Roman literature. This work was the principal source for Suetonius' De poetis.

The Hebdomades vel De imaginibus consisted of fifteen books, with 700 pictures of Greeks and Romans famous in cultural and political life. This was the first illustrated Roman book known to us. Each picture was accompanied by an epigram and a brief biography.

<sup>1</sup> Epitome de lingua Latina, 9 books, probably consisting of an introductory book followed by 8 books, of which each condensed three of the larger work. De antiquitate litterarum, at least two books addressed to Accius. De origine linguae Latinae, three books addressed to Pompey (cf. ling. 5). Περὶ χαρακτήρων, at least three books concerning the genera dicendi. Quaestiones Plautinae, five books with explanations of rare words in Plautus. De similitudine verborum, three books on regularity (analogy) in the structure of forms and words (cf. ling. 9). De utilitate sermonis, at least four books on anomaly (cf. ling. 8). De sermone Latino, at least five books addressed to Marcellus concerning pure Latinity (modeled on the Alexandrian criteria for Ἑλληνισμός: natura, ratio, consuetudo, auctoritas) as well as dealing with orthography and meter.

<sup>2</sup> Further works by Varro on literary history: De bibliothecis, three books (cf. Pliny nat. 13. 68–70; Gell. 7. 17). De lectionibus, three books. De proprietate scriptorum (cf. perhaps Gell. 6. 14. 6). De compositione saturarum. To the history of the Roman theater may be referred: De scaenicis originibus. De actionibus scaenicis, three books. De personis, three books. Quaestionum Plautinarum libri V, treating difficult words in Plautus and therefore really belonging to the writings on grammar. De descriptionibus, three books (on ecphrasis). Epistolicae quaestiones and Epistulae. There was an Epitome in four books of the Hebdomades.

4. Scholarly Writings on Historical Themes and Geographical Treatises<sup>1</sup>

The influential Antiquitates rerum humanarum et divinarum was made up of 25 + 16 books. This standard work was not a sequential history of civilization but a handbook ordered by key words. A single book introducing res humanae was followed by four groups of six books: de hominibus (books 2–7), de locis (8–13), de temporibus (14–19), de rebus (20–25). The res divinae also, dedicated to Caesar as Pontifex Maximus, were preceded by an introduction (26), followed by five sets of three books. Using a similar structure, Varro discussed men, places, periods, actions. Thus priests came in 27–29, places of worship in 30–32, festivals in 33–35, rites in 36–38, gods in 39–41. In his Antiquitates, Varro's view was confined to matters Roman.

De gente populi Romani<sup>2</sup> was made up of four books dealing with the origin of the Roman people. They began far back in the mythical past (cf. Aug. civ. 18), and offered the rudiments of history leading to the De vita populi Romani.

The De vita populi Romani in four books was addressed to Atticus. The 1st book took the story down to the expulsion of the kings. The 2nd supposedly went as far as the beginning of the First Punic War. The 3rd reached 133 B.C., and the 4th at least the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. Varro's concern was with the development of Roman civilization, criticism of his own times and edification.

5. Rhetorical Works<sup>3</sup> and6. Writings on Law<sup>4</sup> are less significant.

7. Philosophical Writings

Liber de philosophia: (Aug. civ. 19. 1–3). In theory, 288 different philosophical schools are possible, depending upon the relation established between virtue and the following four ends: pleasure, tranquillity, both together, or natural goods (such as health or mental gifts). In the case of each of these ends, <sup>1</sup> Historical concerns were also developed in Aetia, Tribuum liber, Rerum urbanarum libri III, Annalium libri III, De Pompeio, Εἰσαγωγικός ad Pompeium. Of autobiographical interest were Legationum libri and De sua vita. Apart from the last named, geographical information was also contained in De ora maritima, De litoralibus. Meteorology was discussed in the Liber de aestuariis and the Ephemeris navalis ad Pompeium. A gromatic treatise De mensuris is also cited.

<sup>2</sup> De familiis Troianis formed a supplement to the De gente.

<sup>3</sup> Books mentioned are Orationum libri XII, Suasionum libri III (recommendations for legislative proposals), and a rhetorical treatise in at least three books.

<sup>4</sup> De iure civili, 15 books; Libri de gradibus, on degrees of kinship.

there are three possibilities: it may be sought for the sake of virtue; or virtue may be sought for the sake of the given aim; or both may be sought for their own sakes. This gives rise to twelve possible doctrines. But this number may be doubled, since you may seek the values in question only for yourself or also for the sake of others. From these 24 doctrines 48 arise, depending on whether you give allegiance to the doctrine in question because you regard it as true or, after the fashion of the Academic Skeptics, only as probable. But these 48 may also be doubled, since these doctrines may in each case be defended in the way of the Cynics or in the way of the other philosophers. The total may be tripled, since each school permits an active or a contemplative way of life or a mixture of both. This produces 288 possible credos.

However, this number may in its turn be reduced, for only the first twelve doctrines relate directly to the highest good. From the four ends mentioned at the outset, pleasure, tranquillity and the combination of the two must be eliminated, since they are contained in the natural goods. Three lines of thought therefore remain. Natural goods are sought for the sake of virtue or virtue for the sake of natural goods, or both for their own sake. Varro decided in favor of the doctrine of the Old Academy, that is, of his teacher Antiochus. Since man consists of body and soul, natural goods and virtue must both be sought for their own sake. Yet virtue remains the highest good, and it defines the right use of the other goods. Virtue is enough for the vita beata. If other goods are added, a vita beatior is attained. If no good of either body or soul is lacking, then we reach vita beatissima. The vita beata wishes what is good for friends and therefore is influential on fellow men in home, community or the world. The way of life should be made up of both action and contemplation. The nature of virtue should not be doubted. For this reason, Academic Skepticism is to be rejected.<sup>1</sup>

In nine books De principiis numerorum Varro discussed the Pythagorean theory of numbers, a topic he found especially fascinating.

The Logistorici in 76 books confront the reader with riddles. The headings were made up of double titles, in the style of Catus de liberis educandis. The characters named in the titles were Varro's contemporaries, and in each case had a personal relationship to the topic in question (e.g. Sisenna de historia). These were presentations in the manner of popular philosophy, either in lecture form or following the model of the dialogues of Heraclides Ponticus.

8. The three books De re rustica have come down to us. The first treats agriculture, the second cattle, the third (according to Varro a novelty) the raising of small livestock such as birds, bees and fish.

<sup>1</sup> No details are known of another treatise, De forma philosophiae.

9. Poems

Varro's principal literary work, his Saturae Menippeae in 150 books, served the purpose of edification with the means of entertainment.<sup>1</sup>

Sources, Models, and Genres

Varro was a compiler on the grand scale, a scholar with a passion for books. It was perhaps his ambition to exploit for his purposes all the literature available in his day. He reflected Hellenistic scholarship, but employed its methods partly on new topics. His works display a marked concern with systematization. He also studied documents, for example, in writing his De poetis and his works on the history of the theater.

An encyclopedic interest, characteristic of many Romans, finds in Varro its most perfect expression. Its Greek ancestry may be traced as far back as the Sophists.<sup>2</sup> For the Disciplinae perhaps Posidonius also was an intermediary.

Varro took over from all schools of philosophy whatever seemed worthwhile. The Menippeae represented a popular genre widespread also in the East, which may have first been given literary form by the Cynic Menippus of Gadara (first half of 3rd century B.C.). In them he exploited, among other sources, Cynic teachings. In his writings on literary history, he followed Peripatetic scholarship. Certain types of category favored by him have Stoic roots. The religious tinge of his philosophy is neo-Pythagorean and Posidonian.

In the De lingua Latina, Varro drew much from his teacher, the Stoic grammarian L. Aelius Stilo. Our author applied to Latin a Stoic theory of language, mixed with elements of Alexandrian scholarship and Peripatetic literary history. Another important predecessor was Accius.

Varro had attended the lectures of the Platonist Antiochus of Ascalon, in all likelihood between 84 and 82 B.C., but it was only in his late works, especially in the De philosophia, that Platonism made itself expressly visible. Academic philosophy, although of Philo's bent, may have influenced the structure of the De lingua Latina. Varro transferred the Academic method of disputare in utramque partem to grammar. He first argues against the validity of etymology and then in its favor; first for anomaly and then for analogy. In each case there follows in a 3rd book, just as in Cicero, whose training was also Academic, his own opinion lying somewhere in between.

<sup>1</sup> Lost works include six books of pseudotragediae, ten books of poemata, four books of saturae (perhaps to be distinguished from the Menippeae) and perhaps a work De rerum natura.

<sup>2</sup> Ps.-Plat. Hipp. mai. 285 D; Cic. de orat. 3. 127.

In the De re rustica Varro relies on Greek authors, and principally on a Greek translation of the treatise of the Carthaginian Mago, possibly in an edition by Cassius, abbreviated by a certain Diophanes. Latin sources were Cato and Tremelius Scrofa, whom he joined in making fun of the works in this field by the Sasernae. Apart from written sources, account must be taken of oral tradition and, even if to a smaller extent, of personal experience.

For the De gente populi Romani, the chief source was Castor of Rhodes who, in his six books of Χρονικά, tabulated accounts of eastern, Greek and Roman history down to 61–60 B.C. Varro shared his early starting point with Castor, and distinguished himself in this respect from his Roman predecessors Nepos and Atticus.

Dicaearchus' Βίος 'Ελλάδος, to judge by its title, may have provided a model for the De vita populi Romani.

Literary Technique

In the De re rustica Varro's aim is didactic. His work is based on a carefully thought out system of divisions,<sup>1</sup> from which the development departs only in minor details. More than Cato, he relies on books for his information. At the same time, he has literary purposes in view. He succeeds, thanks to the form of dialogue, in giving lively presentation to his topic, sometimes bordering on the comic manner, though without impairing his overall design.

Every book of the De re rustica has its proem, a technique also known from Cicero's dialogues and from Lucretius. Just as Virgil was soon to do, Varro appeals to the gods who are patrons of the farmer's world (rust. 1. 1). At this point, the literary procedure of the technical treatise coincides with that of the didactic poem. Varro actually goes one step further in adapting the names of the participants in the dialogue to the theme which they discuss.

<sup>1</sup> So, too, in the De lingua Latina, where in the Stoic fashion the division follows locus, corpus, actio and tempus.

The doctrine he imparts is presented in Platonic fashion as the report of a conversation, something without parallel in the literature of agriculture. But, departing from the Platonic manner, the author himself takes part in the conversation. In succession to the technique of the philosophical dialogue practiced by Aristotle and Dicaearchus, emphasis is given to continuous discourses. However, the literary trappings are more varied than in Cicero and there are more characters. The participants interrupt the speaker more often with their questions or challenges, thus signalling the transition to a fresh point. By contrast, polemics between the interlocutors are absent. In the De re rustica, Varro does not apply the disputatio in utramque partem.<sup>1</sup> His criticisms are reserved for earlier writers on agriculture.<sup>2</sup>

A basic feature of the Menippea is the mixture of prose and poetry,<sup>3</sup> an advantage compared with Lucilius, whose verses at times have a prosaic effect. Another characteristic mark is the fantastic form assumed by the various titles. Double titles, sometimes in both languages, sometimes only in Greek, are frequent. Above all, we find a vivid presentation of the subject, supported by an abundant use of quotations, proverbs and Greek words (cf. Language and Style below).

The literary framework of the pieces is highly imaginative. In the Marcipor, based on Menippus' Icaromenippos, a flight through the air ends in an abrupt fall (frg. 272 B.). In the Eumenides, human activities are viewed from a high vantage point (cf. Lucr. 2. 1-13). Other forms are the περίδειπνον (in the Ταφή Μενίππου) and the Symposium (in the Agatho, the Papiriapapae, the Quinquatrus).

A difference from drama lies in the fact that, for all its liveliness, the action is not the center, but simply a pretext for satire or admonition.

Unlike the case in Lucilius, Varro's polemics are not personal, but general in scope.

The 'later' Menippeae prepare the way for the prose dialogues of the Logistorici. They use a double title, of which one half unambiguously denotes a thesis taken from popular philosophy (e.g. Tithonus περὶ γήρωος), which may be compared with Catus de liberis educandis.

<sup>1</sup> A different line is followed in the De lingua Latina, which however is not organized as a dialogue.

<sup>2</sup> S. esp. 1. 2.

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Lucian, Bis accus. 33; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 95; Probus on Verg. ecl. 6. 31.

Satire seems to be approximating to prose, treatises,<sup>1</sup> and the reader is reminded of Cicero's Cato maior/de senectute.

Seneca's Apocolocyntosis and Gellius' report of a Menippean satire give us some idea of the structure of individual pieces. Philosophical and rhetorical structures may be observed in the only example from the Menippeans, which offers us a longer context: homo, locus, tempus, res (335 B.). This scheme, influenced by the Stoa, was also employed by Varro in the De lingua Latina and Antiquitates.

The introduction to the Hebdomades is rather well known from Gellius 3. 10. Again, its structure is determined by philosophical considerations, leading from the macrocosm through the microcosm—the human being—to artefacts and the rhythm of his personal life and literary output. Similarly, in the De lingua Latina (9. 23–30), first the Universe and then the human being help to illustrate the power of analogy.

Language and Style

The style of the De lingua Latina is simple. It might almost be called negligent, which in a work on the Latin language dedicated to Cicero is somewhat surprising.<sup>2</sup> The reason for this is that Varro adheres to the generic tradition of the textbook, and therefore we should avoid here any comparison with the great orator. Nevertheless, in the De lingua Latina the large role assigned to definitions enhances the anti-theoretical character of his style. The aim of clarity is also secured by rhetorical questions and images. It is particularly in the proems, the digressions and the comparisons that Varro's style makes a more polished impression than in the main body of his work.

The De re rustica and the Menippeans show stylistic finish. In the prefaces, for example, rhythmical clausulae are found. Examples in rust. 1. 1 are esse properandum; -ciscar e vita. But the abrupt conclusion at the end of the period is reminiscent of Cato: 1. 1 si est homo bulla, eo magis senex. A basic feature of the work is its Roman brevitas. As in Cato, in the didactic sections of the De re rustica, short sentences are juxtaposed without connection, in the style of jottings. At times, in the manner of spoken language, we find anacoloutha. Yet art is not absent. Periods may be sought in vain, but Varro is still speaking in the old Latin fashion, and in allegiance to the Hegesiae genus (cf. Cic. Att. 12. 6. 1):<sup>1</sup> he uses corresponding cola and antitheses formed in strict parallel which encourage a style rich in maxims. In this stylistic tendency, Old Latin and Asianism converge.

<sup>1</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT 1979.

<sup>2</sup> NORDEN, Kunstprosa 1, 195.

In the Menippeans, Varro aims for pregnant expressions. Here, too, he avoids the period, combining stylistic trends of Old Latin with Asianism. There is much use of Greek and Latin proverbs. Plays on words accord with the manner of the Cynic preacher. The description of a corrupt Roman official deserves attention: sociis es hostis, hostibus socius; bellum ita geris, ut bella (= pulchra) omnia domum auferas, 'you are an enemy to your allies, an ally to your enemies, you wage the war to carry off homewards all beautiful things' (frag. 64 B.).

Here, Latin interspersed with Greek tags reflects the colloquial language of the period.

The language and style of the Menippeans are different from classical linguistic usage. Archaic and vulgar elements may be traced, although they do not justify the establishment of a stylistic law. The abstinence from any classicizing delectus verborum is characteristic. In the Menippeans, the rich use of images is part of the diatribe manner: 'a bowl set before a hungry man is a match for the fishponds of Naples' (frag. 160 B.). The Menippeans benefit from the traditions of satura and comedy. In his other works, too, Varro likes to make use of metaphors and proverbial turns of phrase.

Abstracts are personified: Infamia (frag. 123 B.), cana Veritas, Atticae philosophiae alumna (frag. 141 B.). We shall find the same technique in Varro's characterization of his own satires (cf. Ideas I).

Compared with Seneca's Apocolocyntosis, Varro's Menippeans are distinguished by their great metrical variety. In his use of hendecasyllables and galliambics, for example, Varro is a predecessor of Catullus.

Ideas I

Reflections on Literature and Language

Varro's basic concern in all his works is Rome and he wants to be of benefit to the Romans. In the De lingua Latina he explores the meaning of old words not only to understand, but to apply them. In writing on analogy he is concerned not merely with theory, but with guidance for linguistic usage. For him the linguistic theories of the Stoic and Alexandrian schools are simply a means to an end. In his etymological studies he independently combines Stoic, Pythagorean and Alexandrian approaches, but also takes into account what is native, for instance, the 'Sabine' contribution. Being a grammaticus rather than a philosopher, he studies etymology in the context of the cultural history of his people. Thus it becomes an indispensable tool of his research into the Roman past. For this reason he pays homage to etymology not only in the De lingua Latina, but also in the De re rustica. Of all the ancient authors known to us, Varro both develops the clearest method of etymology and assigns it a specific function within his research. In defining the origin of Latin, Varro in the first instance joined others in accepting its 'Aeolic' origin. Later he came to emphasize the uniqueness of Latin and its gradual enrichment through borrowings from neighboring languages. Varro is also the creator of a Latin syntax.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Hegesias from Magnesia in Lydia (mid-3rd century B.C.), chief representative of the older Asian style.

Varro certainly did not invent the dispute between the 'Analogists', who appealed to grammatical rules admitting no exceptions, and the 'Anomalists' who appealed to actual usage. But in this quarrel he tried to reconcile the conflicting ideas: he distinguished declinatio naturalis (analogy) from declinatio voluntaria (anomaly), and included them both on a list intended to assure the Latinitas of a particular expression.<sup>2</sup> In this synopsis, a neo-'Pythagorean' concern with symmetry and harmony is traceable. By his approach, Varro is providing the basis for research into the Latin language, attempting to do justice to its object from both a synchronous and diachronic point of view.

In his Menippean satire Parmeno or Concerning Imitation, Varro defines poema, poesis and poetice (frg. 398 B.). He lavishes a nuanced praise on the poets of Latin comedy: on Caecilius for plot, on Terence for character portrayal, on Plautus for dialogue (frg. 399 B.). In remarking that his model Menippus was cultivated enough to satisfy even the most educated by his delivery (frg. 517 B.), he gives an insight into his own ambitions.

<sup>1</sup> M. BARATIN, La naissance de la syntaxe à Rome, Paris 1989.

<sup>2</sup> Depravata consuetudo may be improved by recta consuetudo, the result of the beneficial effect of analogy. Linguistic innovations inspired by analogy are therefore admissible. They signify at the same time the recovery of old and uncorrupted treasures of language: W. Ax, Aristophanes von Byzanz als Analogist. Zu frg. 3. 7. 4 SLATER (= Varro, ling. 9. 12), Glotta 68, 1990, 4–18.

In the Menippeans the allegiance to Menippus is programmatic, as already the title shows. Varro romanizes the content. He certainly 'follows after' Menippus, but without 'translating' him, as Cicero (acad. 1. 8) makes him tellingly remark: Menippum imitati, non interpretati. Gellius (2. 18. 7) would later even use the word aemulari.

The Cicero passage justifies the humorous garb, the mixture of jest and seriousness (σπουδογέλοιον) in a way reminiscent of Lucretius' image of the cup smeared with honey.<sup>1</sup> In this case the remarks put by Cicero in Varro's mouth reflect Varro's own views.

Varro calls his books his children (fig. 542-543 B.). Envy (φιλοφθονία) bore them to him, and the Menippean sect was their wetnurse. As guardians, the author appoints 'you Romans, who want to foster Rome's might and Latium's honor' (cf. Ennius ann. 466). This text is an example both of Varro's wry humor and of his view of his work as a gift to his people.

Ideas II

Varro possessed to an extraordinary degree that typical Roman zeal for learning and teaching ascribed by Cicero to the Elder Cato. His didactic and encyclopedic approach is significant and fruitful. In the Disciplinae, he established a canon of the liberal arts and gave it authoritative formulation. His Antiquitates embraced the totality of Roman cultural life. The encyclopedic principle may also be detected in the De lingua Latina. The treatment of Latin words and their origin is divided by factual topics and conceived as a kind of key to knowledge of the world around us. In sequence, heaven, earth, and what heaven and earth contain are 'put into words'. It does not matter whether (from a modern scholarly angle) the etymologies are 'right' or 'wrong'. The work is unique in the Latin language as a visual aid based on an appeal to facts. We are informed at first hand how an educated Roman experienced the words of his mother tongue, and through them, his world.

As a scholar Varro shows a practical and national bent. As developed by him, both features are un-Greek. His subject matter is Roman, and it took a creative mind to manage the transfer of method. Varro is unlike the majority of technical writers who often report knowledge at second hand. He applied Greek methods of research to Roman matter, and in doing so was relatively 'original'.

---

<sup>1</sup> Quae . . . quadam hilaritate conspersimus, multa admixta ex intima philosophia, multa dicta dialectice, quae quo facilius minus docti intellegent, iucunditate quadam ad legendum invitati (Cic. acad. 1. 8)

While the Greeks concentrate mainly on Homer, Varro takes as his model the community of early Romans. He aims to have an effect. The good in the old is to be reclaimed for the present. Though elsewhere, too, he upbraids his contemporaries, he discovered in the Menippean satire an instrument he could use at Rome for social criticism. In the good old days of their unshaven (frg. 186 B.) fathers who smelled of onions and garlic, but who were optime animati (frg. 63 B.), young girls were not allowed to hear any vocabula veneria (frg. 11 B.). After a thirty-year absence abroad on military service, Varro comes back home as an 'Ulysses and a half' (Sesulixes), and finds himself a total stranger. In the Sexagesis, an ancient Rip van Winkle has the same experience.

A group of Menippean satires taken to be 'later'<sup>1</sup> goes beyond the typical themes of satire such as greed or ambition, reaching, for example, towards the topoi of the consolatio (Tithonus on old age) and the description of philosophical opinions (Περίπλους; Περί φιλοσοφίας. Λογομαχία; Περί αἰρέσεων). Cicero considered such works predecessors of his own philosophical writings (acad. 1. 9).

Varro the Roman felt himself attracted in many ways to the citizen of the world, Menippus. He was the cynicus Romanus. In particular, he was fascinated by Menippus' criticism of the present and of the false opinions of men, his preaching of the simple life (Περί ἐδεσμάτων) and the scorn for dogmatic philosophical schools. This leads him to describe the dispute between Stoics and Epicureans over the highest good as a fight over words (Λογομαχία, frg. 243 B.). The basis of his criticism however is not the same as that of Menippus. The latter rejected higher education in general, the Roman only what was useless for life. For him, the nature of man is more important than external nature: one satura is called Γνώθι σεαυτόν ('know thyself!'). Virtue does not fall into the lap of man without practice and mental exertion. Even a horse is first entrusted to a magister for its training, and a flute player must practice long at home before he can appear in public (frgg. 559 and 561 B.). While Menippus puts emphasis on the negative, Varro aims to educate and improve his peers in order to assist Rome towards a rebirth.

<sup>1</sup> P. L. SCHMIDT 1979.

Romanization is especially clear in the treatment of religion. Menippus and Lucian despise belief in the gods. Varro is pious in the Roman sense. The bonus civis must honor law and gods (fig. 265 B., cf. 537 B.). He critically views religious import like a festival of Attis (fig. 149 ff. B.) and the well-paid miraculous healings of Serapis (figg. 152 and 128 B.). At the same time Varro accepts the rationalist doctrine, perhaps derived from the Stoa, that, among the three types of 'theology', only the philosophical one has a scholarly claim to truth. Myth and official religion remain valid in their spheres, but are at best only partially true. He explains the Roman gods in the fashion of Euhemerus as divinized men (De gente populi Romani). To indecorous myths he refuses assent.

As in theology, so also in the philosophy of history, Varro filled a Greek pattern of thought with Roman substance. He put the Romans in the context of the general history of civilization, following their race back into the very dawn of history, a typical Roman act of creating one's own past.

The division of history into primeval (before the Ogygian Flood), mythical and historical time is Hellenistic in inspiration. Historical time begins with the first Olympiad.<sup>1</sup>

To the good old days Varro looks back with a romantic sigh. As in his later scholarly works, in the Menippean satires too he pursues a didactic aim. In the Sexagesis (fig. 491 B.), after a sleep of fifty years, a man comes back to Rome to find there everything changed. In the De vita populi Romani, Rome itself is said to be aging (fig. 2. 66 Riposati). Perhaps the De vita populi Romani influenced the comparison of history with the ages of human life found in the history of Florus. There is a certain intellectual kinship with Sallust, although in Varro's view the year that sealed the decline of morals at Rome appears to have been not 146 but 133 B.C. This reflection on decline contrasts with a proud presentation of civilisation's progress in the proems of the De re rustica with their allusion to Dicaearchus.

In his criticisms of contemporaries, Varro does not mince his words. Nowadays people sleep on ivory couches (fig. 434 B.), but most men are swine and the forum has become a pigsty (fig. 435 B.). The coarse image is intended perhaps to work by opposites in arousing the sense of humanitas. In the moral sphere, he expresses, differently from Lucilius, a positive opinion on marriage (fig. 167 B.; 482 B.). Of course he is scandalized by the daring hunting dresses in which Roman ladies have recently taken to appearing (fig. 301 B.).

---

<sup>1</sup> De gente populi Romani, fig. 3 P. apud Censorin. 21. 1; provenance from De gente not certain.

Varro perhaps knew from Panaetius the principle of propriety (aptum), but rhetoric and the conventions of Roman society play their part in it. This is shown quite charmingly in the Menippean satire reported by Gellius (frgg. 333–341 B.): No one knows what the late evening will bring. The topics include suitable themes for conversation, appropriate reading and the proper number of guests: from three (the number of the Graces) to nine (the number of the Muses). The paraphrases suggest a Greek background. The Stoic paradox that all men without understanding—everybody, that is, apart from the wise man—are mad is discussed by Varro in his Eumenides (frgg. 117–165 B.). Varro was inclined towards Pythagoreanism, and was buried in accordance with Pythagorean rites. But it also led him to make jokes. Thus he remarked on the transmigration of souls: ‘What? Are you uncertain whether you are long-tailed monkeys or adders?’ (fig. 127 B.). In his De philosophia, Varro accepts the ethics and values of the Old Academy of Antiochus. This school combined a dogmatic strictness almost reminiscent of the Stoa with a realistic tolerance of worldly goods. Both these features appealed to our Roman author. The skepticism of Philon or Cicero was alien to him. It must nevertheless be self-evident in the case of a polymath that the wealth of material was not always matched by critical mastery. But Varro may not perhaps be denied a certain systematic attention and a didactic effort to select what was essential for Roman readers.

Transmission

The entire transmission of the preserved sections of the De lingua Latina rests on the Laurentianus LI 10, 11th century (F). The remaining manuscripts are derived from it and are needed at the place where in F meanwhile a quaternion has fallen out (5. 118–6. 61). For this portion of text the Munich copy of the editio princeps also has the value of a manuscript, since it contains old collations of F. Yet, from the outset, F is inaccurate. Lacunae and displacements already go back in many cases to the lost model of this manuscript.

A section on coins (5. 168 extr.-5. 174) is transcribed by Priscian and additionally preserved there. The most important manuscript is Parisinus 7496, 9th century, s. GL 3. 410-411.

The De re rustica has been transmitted along with Cato (s. above). The transmission rests on the lost Marcianus. In the Paris copy of the editio princeps of the Scriptores rei rusticae, Venetiis 1472, readings of the Marcianus have been entered by Politian. Victorius (Lyon 1541) also consulted the Marcianus, and his edition is therefore valuable. The oldest manuscript is the Parisinus 6842 A, 12th-13th century, which, in the view of Heurgon (s. under editions), possesses independent value. The Laurentianus 51, 4, 14th-15th century, also deserves mention.

Of the 150 books Saturarum Menippearum, about 90 titles and 600 fragments are preserved, mainly by the lexicographer Nonius.

Nonius is also our principal source for the De vita populi Romani. For the Antiquitates we have important witnesses: apart from Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Virgil, Verrius, Pliny, Suetonius, Gellius, Festus, Macrobius, Nonius, Censorinus, grammarians and commentators, there are the Church Fathers, especially Augustine (for example, books 4, 6, and 7 of the De civitate Dei).

From the Disciplinae it seems that parts of the book De geometria, preserved in the writings of the surveyors, found their way to the Middle Ages.<sup>1</sup>

Influence

Varro gave decisive form to the picture of Roman literary history. One may adduce his biographies in the De poetis, regarded as authoritative by Suetonius, and the canon of the 21 comedies of Plautus. He acted as a source for later grammarians.

Varro was also for Rome the creator of a method of etymology. He had presented his material on the Latin language and Roman affairs by headings, but the Augustan writer Verrius Flaccus later gave it alphabetical order. In turn, in the 2nd century it was abbreviated by Festus and again in the Carolingian period by Paulus Diaconus.

Cicero created a memorial to Varro in the Academica posteriora (1. 8-9). Through his research into the mores maiorum, Varro became a pioneer of the Augustan restoration. It was from him that Virgil and Ovid drew their knowledge of early Roman history. Greeks like Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Plutarch relied on him.

---

<sup>1</sup> C. THULIN, Die Handschriften des Corpus Agrimensorum Romanorum, Abh. Ak. Wiss. Berlin 1911, phil.-hist. Kl., Anhang, Abh. 2, 16, 41.

As a scholar and antiquarian, Varro found no learned successor to match him. He was regarded as the beginning and end of Roman studies in this field, doctissimus Romanorum. At the most he was faulted for lacking stylistic excellence.<sup>1</sup>

Just as pagans like Suetonius and Gellius built on his work,<sup>2</sup> so did Christians, such as Tertullian, Lactantius, and Augustine.<sup>3</sup> For them Varro served both as authority for Roman religion and as a target for criticism.

The Disciplinae were perhaps Varro's most influential work. Their significance for technical writing was incalculable. Vitruvius' handbook De architectura also shows Varronian influence.

The De re rustica had less influence than the antiquarian works. The fact of its preservation lures the reader onto a false trail. Virgil in the Georgics relies partly on Varro. Columella and other writers on agriculture, in spite of many agreements with Varro, go back to Cassius or Diophanes. In the Middle Ages, Petrus de Crescentiis (about 1305) was the most zealous user of the De re rustica.

Seneca and Petronius employ the Menippean form. The composer of the Menippeae is called by Tertullian the Romanus cynicus (apol. 14. 9), the Romani stili Diogenes (nat. 1. 10. 43). Martianus Capella and Boethius transmitted to the Middle Ages this literary form, influential for the lessons it taught. In the literature of the modern period, the Menippean satire, especially in English-speaking countries, plays an important part, although Lucian has better claims than Varro to be counted among the ancestors of the modern genre. The theme of the Sexagesis—a sleep of several decades—is still found in Washington Irving's (d. 1859) Rip van Winkle.

By his many-sided activity Varro made an essential contribution to the Romans' identity, including their picture of history. In spite of the loss of his most important works, his significance may still be recognized. Petrarch (d. 1374) describes Varro, at the side of Cicero and Virgil, as the terzo gran lume romano (Triumphus Fame 3. 38), certainly an exaggeration, but a healthy corrective to the wall of silence surrounding an author who is more used than cited.

<sup>1</sup> Dion. Hal. ant. 2. 21; Sen. Helv. 8. 3; Quint. inst. 10. 1. 95; 12. 11. 24; Apul. apol. 42; Gell. 4. 16. 1; Aug. civ. 6. 2; Terent. Maur., GL 6, 409.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. Verrius Flaccus, Pliny the Elder, Macrobius, Censorinus, Servius.

<sup>3</sup> Isidore of Seville transmitted Varronian material to the Middle Ages.

Editions: rust.: Scriptores rei rusticae, Venetiis 1472. * ling.: Pomponius Laetus, sine loco et anno (Romae 1471/1472). * ling., de gramm. librorum frgg., rust.: A. TRAGLIA (TTrN, ind.), Torino 1974. * F. SEMI (complete edition, not crit.), Padova 1966. * All fragments: A. POPMA, Lugduni Batavorum 1601 (repr. in the Bipontina of 1788). * rust.: J. M. GESNER, Scriptores rei rusticae veteres Latini, vol. 1, Biponti 1787 with ind. in vol. 4. * post H. KEIL (Lipsiae 1884; 1889) ed. G. GOETZ, Lipsiae 1912, 2nd ed. 1929. * W. D. HOOPER, H. B. ASH (together with Cato; TTr), London 1934, 2nd ed. 1935, repr. 1967. * M. E. SERGEENKO (TTrC), Moskva 1963. * B. TILLY (TC, sel.), London 1973. * rust. 1: J. HEURGON (TTrC), Paris 1978. * rust. 2: C. GUIRAUD (TTrC), Paris 1985. * ling. and frgg. gramm.: G. GOETZ, F. SCHOELL, Leipzig 1910. * ling.: K. O. MÜLLER (TN), Lipsiae 1833. * R. G. KENT (TTrN), 2 vols., Cambridge, Mass. 1938, repr. 1979. * ling. 5: J. COLLART (TTrN), Paris 1954. * ling. 6: E. RIGANTI (TTrC), Bologna 1978. * P. FLOBERT (TTrC), Paris 1985. * ling. 8: H. DAHLMANN (TTrC), Berlin 1940, repr. 1966. * ling. 10: A. TRAGLIA (TTrC), Bari 1956. * Men.: F. BÜCHELER in his edition of Petronius, Berlin 2nd ed. 1871, 6th ed. 1922 (rev. G. HERAEUS). * F. DELLA CORTE (TC), Genova 1953 (rare). * R. ASTBURY, Leipzig 1985. * J.-P. CÈBE (TTrC), Roma, fasc. 1: 1972, 2: 1974, 3: 1975, 4: 1977, 5: 1980, 6: 1983, 7: 1985, 8: 1987, 9: 1990. * O. WEINREICH (Tr., sel.), ed., Römische Satiren, Zürich 1949, 2nd ed. 1962. * W. KRENKEL (Tr., sel.), Römische Satiren, Berlin 1970. * ant. div.: B. CARDAUNS (TC), 2 vols., Mainz 1976. * ant. div. 1-2: A. G. CONDEMI, Bologna 1964. * Logistoricus: Curio de cultu deorum: B. CARDAUNS (TC), diss. Köln, Würzburg 1960. * vita p. Rom.: B. RIPOSATI (TC; study), Milano 1939, repr. (corr.) 1972. * gramm. frgg.: H. (= G.) FUNAIOLI, Grammaticae Romanae fragmenta, Lipsiae 1907. Cf. also ling. ** Concordance, ind.: W. W. BRIGGS, Jr., T. R. WHITE, C. G. SHIRLEY, Jr., Concordantia in Varronis libros De re rustica, Hildesheim 1983. * E. ZAFFAGNO, Index verborum quae in saturarum Menippearum fragmentis inveniuntur, in: Studi Noniani, Genova 1972, 2, 139-229. ** Bibl.: B. CARDAUNS, Stand und Aufgaben der Varroforschung (with a bibl. for 1935-1980), AAWM 1982, 4. * J. COLLART, Varron grammairien et l'enseignement grammatical dans l'antiquité romaine 1934-1963, Lustrum 9, 1964, 213-241; 335-336. * G. GALIMBERTO BIFFINI, Rassegna di studi varroniani dal 1974 al 1980, Rieti 1981.

L. ALFONSI, Le Menippee di Varrone, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 26-59. * R. ASTBURY, Select Menippean Satires of Varro, diss. Liverpool 1964. * R. ASTBURY, Varro and Pompey, CQ n.s. 17, 1967, 403-407. * G. BARRA, La figura e l'opera di Terenzio Varrone Reatino nel De civitate Dei di Agostino, Napoli 1969; cf. also RAAN 44, 1969, 3-10. * K. BARWICK, Widmung und Entstehungsgeschichte von Varros De ling., Philologus 101, 1957, 298-304. * G. BOISSIER, Étude sur la vie et les ouvrages de M. Terentius Varron, Paris 1861. * S. F. BONNER, Anecdoton Parisinum, Hermes 88,

- 1960, 354–360. * E. W. BOWER, Some Technical Terms in Roman Education, Hermes 89, 1961, 462–477. * P. BOYANGÉ, Sur la théologie de Varron, REA 57, 1955, 57–84 (= Études sur la religion romaine, Roma 1972, 253–282). * S. H. BRAUND, ed., Satire and Society in Ancient Rome, Exeter 1989. * G. BROCCIA, Logistoricus. Per la storia del termine, Città di Castello Tiferno 1971. * H. CANGIK, Varro (De poetis) über Accius, Hermes 96, 1968, 252–253. * F. CAVAZZA, Studio su Varrone etimologo e grammatico. La lingua latina come modello di struttura linguistica, Firenze 1981. * J.-P. CÈBE, Notes sur les Ménippées de Varron. A propos de quatre fragments d'Anthropopolis et du fig. 73 Buecheler de Caprinum proelium, REL 51, 1973, 100–122. * A. CENDERELLI, Varroniana. Istituti e terminologia giuridica nelle opere di M. Terenzio Varrone, Milano 1973. * E. CHRISTMANN, Varros Definition von seges, arvum und novalis, Hermes 117, 1989, 326–342. * J. COLLART, Varron, grammairien latin, Thèse Paris 1952. * Atti del Congresso Internazionale di Studi Varroniani (Rieti 1974), 2 vols., Rieti 1976. * P. CUGUSI, Le epistole di Varrone, RCCM 9, 1967, 78–85. * H. DAHLMANN, Varro und die hellenistische Sprachtheorie, Berlin 1932, 2nd ed. 1964. * H. DAHLMANN, Varro, RE suppl. 6, 1935, 1172–1277. * H. DAHLMANN, Varro De sua vita ad Libonem, Philologus 97, 1948, 365–368. * H. DAHLMANN, Bemerkungen zu den Resten der Briefe Varros, MH 7, 1950, 200–220. * H. DAHLMANN, Varros Schrift De poematis und die hellenistisch-römische Poetik, AAWM 1953, 3, 89–158. * H. DAHLMANN, Catus oder Cato? Noch einmal der Titel von Varros Logistoricus, in: Navicula Chiloniensis. FS F. JACOBY, Leiden 1956, 114–122. * H. DAHLMANN and R. HEISTERHAGEN, Varronische Studien 1: Zu den Logistorici, AAWM 1957, 4, 127–174. * H. DAHLMANN and W. SPEYER, Varronische Studien 2, AAWM 1959, 11, 715–767. * H. DAHLMANN, Bemerkungen zu Varros Menippea Tithonus, περὶ γήρως, in: Studien zur Textgeschichte und Textkritik, FS G. JACHMANN, Köln 1959, 37–45. * H. DAHLMANN, Studien zu Varro De poetis, AAWM 1962, 10, 557–676. * H. DAHLMANN, Zu Varros Literaturforschung, besonders in De poetis, in: Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 9 (Varron), 1962, 1–31. * H. DAHLMANN, Kleine Schriften, Hildesheim 1970. * H. DAHLMANN, Varroniana, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 3–25. * H. DAHLMANN, Zu Varros antiquarisch-historischen Werken, besonders den Antiquitates rerum humanarum et divinarum, in: Dialogos, FS H. PATZER, Wiesbaden 1975, 129–138. * R. J. DAM, De analogia. Observationes in Varronem grammaticamque Romanorum, diss. Utrecht 1930. * F. DELLA CORTE, La filologia latina dalle origini a Varrone, Torino 1937, 2nd ed. 1981. * F. DELLA CORTE, Varrone, il terzo gran lume romano, Genova 1954, 2nd ed. (augm.) 1970. * F. DELLA CORTE, L'idea della preistoria in Varrone, Atti del Congresso Internazionale di Studi Varroniani, Rieti (1974) 1976, 1, 111–136. * L. DESCHAMPS, Étude sur la langue de Varron dans les Satires Ménippées, 2 vols., Paris 1976. * L. DESCHAMPS, Varron, les lymphes et les nymphes, in: Hommages à

- R. SCHILLING, Paris 1983, 67–83. * L. DESCHAMPS, Victrix Venus. Varron et la cosmologie empédocléenne, in: Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte. FS G. RADKE, Münster 1986, 51–72. * L. DESCHAMPS, Échos varroniens dans Virgile, ou De la poésie de l'étymologie, FS J. VEREMANS, Bruxelles 1986, 86–100. * L. DESCHAMPS, Le paysage sabin dans l'œuvre de Varron, Humanitas 37–38, 1985–1986, 123–137. * L. DESCHAMPS, Maia Volcani éclairée par un passage des Antiquitates rerum humanarum de M. Terentius Varro Reatinus, in: Laurea corona. Studies in Honor of E. COLEIRO, Amsterdam 1987, 30–36. * H. DOHR, Die italischen Gutshöfe nach den Schriften Catos und Varros, diss. Köln 1965. * H. DÖRRIE, Zu Varros Konzeption der theologia tripartita in den Antiquitates rerum divinarum, in: Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte. FS G. RADKE, Münster 1986, 76–82. * J. C. DUMONT, Les operarii de Varron (Res rusticae l. 17. 2–3), RPh 60, 1986, 81–88. * H. ERKELL, Varroniana. Topographisches und Religionsgeschichtliches zu Varro, De lingua Latina, in: ORom 13, 1981, 35–39. * H. ERKELL, Varroniana II. Studi topografici in Varro, De lingua Latina 5, 45–50, ORom 15, 1985, 55–65. * D. FEHLING, Varro und die grammatische Lehre von der Analogie und der Flexion, Glotta 35, 1956, 214–270; 36, 1957, 48–100. * M. FUHRMANN, Das systematische Lehrbuch, Göttingen 1960, 69–78. * H. GELLER, Varros Menippea Parmeno, diss. Köln 1966. * L. GERSCHEL, Varron logicien, 1: Étude sur une séquence du De lingua Latina, Latomus 17, 1958, 65–72. * G. GOETZ, Varro De re rust. in indirekter Überlieferung, FS W. JUDEICH, Weimar 1929, 45–67. * P. GRIMAL, J. PRÉAUX, R. SCHILLING, Varron, grammaire antique et stylistique latine. FS J. COLLART, Paris 1978. * P. GRIMAL, Encyclopédies antiques, CHM 9, 3, 1965–66, 459–482. * H. HAGENDAHL, Augustine and the Latin Classics, with a Contribution on Varro by B. CARDAUNS, Göteborg 1967. * A. HAURY, Ce brave Varron . . ., FS J. CARCOPINO, Paris 1966, 507–513. * R. HEISTERHAGEN, Die literarische Form der Rerum rusticarum libri Varros, diss. Marburg 1952. * N. HORSFALL, Varro and Caesar. Three Chronological Problems, BICS 19, 1972, 120–128. * W. HÜBNER, Varros instrumentum vocale im Kontext der antiken Fachwissenschaften, AAWM 1984, 8. * R. G. KENT, A Roman Talks About Latin, CW 1936, 30, 35–39. * W. A. KRENKEL, Varroniana I, II. (Men. 519 B.; 531 B.), WZRo 20, 1971, 429–441. * K. F. KUMANECKI, De Varronis libro isagogico ad Pompeium eiusque dispositione, ACD 10–11, 1974–1975, 41–44. * K. LATTE, Augur und templum in der Varronischen Auguralformel, Philologus 97, 1948, 143–159. * E. LAUGHTON, Observations on the Style of Varro, CQ n.s. 10, 1960, 1–28. * Y. LEHMANN, Varron et la médecine, in: Médecins et médecine dans l'antiquité. Articles réunis et édités par G. SABBAH. Avec, en complément, les Actes des Journées d'étude sur la médecine antique d'époque romaine, Université de Saint-Étienne 1982, 67–72. * Y. LEHMANN, La 'tripartition divine' de Varron, in: Hommages à R. Schilling, Paris 1983, 147–157. * Y. LEHMANN, La dette de Varron à

l'égard de son maître Lucius Aelius Stilo, MEFRA 97, 1, 1985, 515-525. * P. LENKETT, Varros Menippea Gerontodidaskalos, diss. Köln 1966. * G. LENOIR, A propos de Varron, critique littéraire. La notion de proprietas, REL 49, 1971, 155-161. * M. LEROY, Théories linguistiques dans l'antiquité, LEC 41, 1973, 385-401. * R. MARTIN, Recherches sur les agronomes latins et leurs conceptions économiques et sociales, Paris 1971. * A. MARZULLO, Le satire Menippeae di M. Terenzio Varrone. La commedia arcaica e i sermones, Modena 1958. * E. MISDARIIS, Sulla datazione e alcuni nuovi frammenti delle Antiquitates rerum divinarum, AFLT 1, 1964-65, 255-269. * B. MOSCA, Satira filosofica e politica nelle Menippeae di Varrone, ASNP 6, 1937, 41-77. * Rob. MÜLLER, Varros Logistoricus über Kindererziehung. Leipzig 1938. * D. MUSTI, Varrone nell'insieme delle tradizioni su Roma quadrata, in: Atti del convegno Gli storiografi latini tramandati in frammenti (Urbino 1974), publ. Urbino 1975, 297-318. * C. NICOLET, Varron et la politique de C. Gracchus, Historia 28, 1979, 276-300. * E. NORDEN, In Varronis Saturas Menippeas observationes selectae, diss. Leipzig 1891 (= JKPh, suppl. vol. 18, 1892, 265-352). * E. NORDEN, Varro's Imagines, ed. by B. KYTZLER, Berlin 1990. * G. PASCUCCI, Le componenti linguistiche del latino secondo la dottrina varroniana, in: Studi su Varrone, sulla retorica, storiografia e poesia latina. FS B. RIPOSATI, Rieti 1979, 339-363. * J. PÉPIN, La théologie tripartite de Varron. Essai de reconstitution et recherche des sources, REAug 2, 1956, 265-294. * W. PFAFFEL, Quartus gradus etymologiae. Untersuchungen zur Etymologie Varros in De lingua Latina, Königstein 1981. * U. PIZZANI, Il filone enciclopedico nella patristica, Augustinianum 14, 1974, 667-696. * A. POCIÑA PÉREZ, Varrón y el teatro latino, Durus 3, 1975, 291-321. * J. G. PRÉAUX, un fragment retrouvé du De rerum natura de Varron, Résumé in RBPh 41, 1963, 622-623. * G. PUCCIONI, Il problema delle fonti storiche di S. Girolamo, ASNP 25, 1956, 191-212. * C. QUESTA, L'antichissima edizione dei Cantica di Plauto, RFIC 102, 1974, 58-79. * J. RAMMINGER, Varronisches Material in den Scholien zu Lukan, Pharsalia 2, 356; 359; 371, Maia n.s. 37, 1985, 255-259. * G. RANUCCI, Il libro 20 delle Res humanae di Varrone, in: Studi Noniani 2, Genova 1972, 107-137. * J. C. RICHARD, Varron, L'Origo gentis Romanae et les Aborigènes, RPh 57, 1983, 29-37. * J. S. RICHARDSON, The Triumph of Metellus Scipio and the Dramatic Date of Varro r.r. 3, CQ n.s. 33, 1983, 456-463. * B. RIPOSATI, La fortuna dei frammenti 'storici' di Varrone Reatino, Atti del convegno Gli storiografi latini tramandati in frammenti (Urbino 1974), publ. Urbino 1975, 319-329. * F. RITSCHL, Opuscula philologica 3, Leipzig 1877. * I. RÖTTER, Varros Menippea περὶ ἐδεσμάτων, diss. Köln 1969. * E. DE SAINT-DENIS, Syntaxe du latin parlé dans les Res rusticae de Varron, RPh 21, 1947, 141-162. * K. SALLMANN, M. Terentius Varro und die Anfänge der Mikrobiologie, Gymnasium 83, 1976, 214-228. * A. SALVATORE, Scienza e poesia in Roma. Varrone e Virgilio, Napoli 1978. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Invektive, Gesellschaft-

skritik, Diatribe? Typologische und gattungsgeschichtliche Vorüberlegungen zum sozialen Engagement der römischen Satire, Lampas 12, 1979, 259–281. * P. L. SCHMIDT, Postquam ludus in artem paulatim verterat. Varro und die Frühgeschichte des römischen Theaters, in: G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Studien zur vorliterarischen Periode im frühen Rom, Tübingen 1989, 77–133. * R. SCHROETER, Studien zur varronischen Etymologie, AAWM 1959, 12, 769–887. * R. SCHROETER, Die varronische Etymologie, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 9 (Varron), 1963, 79–116. * D. SHANZER, The Late Antique Tradition of Varro's Onos Lyras, RhM 129, 1986, 272–285. * E. SIEBENBORN, Die Lehre von der Sprachrichtigkeit und ihre Kriterien. Studien zur antiken normativen Grammatik, Amsterdam 1976. * D. L. SIGSBEE, The Paradoxa Stoicorum in Varro's Menippeans, CPh 71, 1976, 244–248. * M. SIMON, Das Verhältnis spätlateinischer Enzyklopädien der artes liberales zu Varros Disciplinarum libri novem, diss. Jena 1963. * M. SIMON, Zur Überlieferungsgeschichte von Varros Disciplinarum libri IX, Philologus 108, 1964, 142–144. * M. SIMON, Zur Abhängigkeit spätrömischer Enzyklopädien von Varros Disciplinarum libri, Philologus 110, 1966, 88–101. * J. E. SKYDSGAARD, Varro the Scholar. Studies in the First Book of Varro's De re rustica, København 1968. * D. J. TAYLOR, Declinatio. A Study of the Linguistic Theory of Marcus Terentius Varro, Amsterdam 1974. * D. J. TAYLOR, Varro's Mathematical Models of Inflection, TAPh 107, 1977, 313–323. * L. R. TAYLOR, Varro's De gente populi Romani, CPh 29, 1934, 221–229. * Varron. Six exposés et discussions, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 9, Vandœuvres 1963. * Varron, grammaire antique et stylistique latine. Recueil offert à J. COLLART, Paris 1978. * E. VETTER, Zum Text von Varros Schrift über die lateinische Sprache, RhM 101, 1958, 257–285; 289–323. * J. H. WASZINK, Varro, Livy and Tertullian on the History of Roman Dramatic Art, VChr 2, 1948, 224–242. * K. D. WHITE, Roman Agricultural Writers 1: Varro and his Predecessors, ANRW 1, 4, 1973, 439–497. * K. D. WHITE, Roman Farming, London 1970. * E. WOYTEK, Sprachliche Studien zur Satura Menippea Varros, Wien 1970. * E. WOYTEK, Stilistische Untersuchungen zur Satura Menippea Varros, Eranos 70, 1972, 23–58. * B. ZUCHELLI, Varro logistoricus. Studio letterario e prosopografico, Parma 1981. * H. J. ZUMSANDE, Varros Menippea Papii Papae περί ἑγκωμίων, diss. Köln 1970.

ROMAN JURISTS

General Remarks

Juristic literature is one of the Romans' most original, influential, and long-lasting creations. To begin, let us mention some of its general characteristics.

It is only to a small extent that statutes (leges) and senatorial decrees were sources of law. The decisive contribution to the creation of law was made by legal scholars,<sup>1</sup> in company with the magistrates<sup>2</sup> and emperors whom they advised. A special weight attaches to imperial acts of creation of law and jurisdiction. Law was something that grew. It developed in different layers, yet, within a social framework tacitly taken for granted, a consciousness of continuity was preserved.

Juristic literature in the strict sense, whose types are to be individually discussed later, is the work of experts. Initially, their efforts were concentrated on the decision of individual cases and the commentaries they produced on relevant texts, guided by practical need. In the course of development, textbooks and collections<sup>3</sup> increasingly prepared the way for a systematization of the laws, even though this had only limited scope. Yet it was this which was to be essential for the reception of Roman law by posterity.

The focus of interest was frequently provided by the concerns of the individual person—an intellectual discovery of the Romans—and the protection of private property. Questions of public law were still given thorough treatment in the 2nd century B.C., but after the Civil War and the establishment of the monarchy they took second place, only to emerge in the later period in particular areas. The fact that it was largely limited to private law, which threatened less political danger, allowed the survival of jurisprudence under the Empire.

Finally, Roman law, as demanded by the complex business relationships of the Romans, early passed beyond the circle of Roman

---

<sup>1</sup> In all sections on juristic literature, the author would like to thank Detlef Liebs and Christina Martinet for valuable advice. Law created by jurists is already in the Republican period regarded by Cicero (top. 28) as part of ius civile. On the problems WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 496–497 with note 25.

<sup>2</sup> The law established by the praetors was progressive insofar as its adaptation to practical need gradually superannuated the old concerns with form and ritual. Inter alia, material ethical considerations contributed to the refinement of old Roman notions such as bona fides and fraus, perhaps not without the creative influence of Hellenistic παιδεία.

<sup>3</sup> In the shape which it received subsequently through the great collections of late antiquity, Roman law became the basis of law in modern Europe; F. WIEACKER, Privatrechtsgeschichte der Neuzeit unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der deutschen Entwicklung, Göttingen, 2nd ed. 1967; G. WESENBERG, Neuere deutsche Privatrechtsgeschichte im Rahmen der europäischen Rechtsentwicklung, Wien, 4th ed. (rev.) 1985.

citizens<sup>1</sup> (ius gentium). This forced it to outgrow purely national limitations in its attitude, and at least in its approach to take account of humanity in general, even to the extent of including natural law.<sup>2</sup> This development could not fail to have an effect in turn on strictly Roman law, and this facilitated both a definition of the Romans' own point of view and later its transference to other cultures.

The high point of Roman jurisprudence in the 2nd century A.D. coincided with the rule of enlightened Roman emperors concerned with a humane legal order. The activity of the classical and late classical jurists made the practice of those rulers the norm. The fact that many declarations of Roman law were in content marked by the progressive spirit of that period explains the constant rediscovery of the liberating power of Roman law by later generations.

Greek Background

The juristic literature of the Romans draws to a far less extent than other Roman intellectual developments on Greek sources. The very approach is different. In Greece, it was the law of the polis that was cherished. In Rome, the legal system centered around the person.<sup>3</sup>

Admittedly, the notion of the codification of law is Greek in origin. The period of dawning literacy and the establishment of the secular states witnessed at Athens the legislation of Dracon (about 624 B.C.) and Solon (594/593 B.C.), and on Crete the city code of Gortyn (mid-5th century B.C.). Likewise about 450 B.C. at Rome were published the Twelve Tables. After a period when law was still being formulated, the plebeians succeeded in securing the appointment of a Commission of Ten, entrusted with writing down and publishing the law. It thus became binding upon the community, which now had the means of testing whether it had been observed. At the drawing up of the Twelve Tables, ambassadors are alleged to have been sent to Athens.<sup>4</sup> At the very least the influence of Magna Graecia may be supposed.

<sup>1</sup> From 242 B.C. to A.D. 212 Rome had praetores inter (cives et) peregrinos.

<sup>2</sup> In such reflections, certain approaches characteristic of the Roman legal mind were at the same time made explicit under Greek influence (s. Ideas II).

<sup>3</sup> On the implicit relation to the polis found in Roman law, s. Ideas II.

<sup>4</sup> Liv 3. 31. 8; 3. 32. 6; Dionys. 10. 52; G. CIULEI, Die XII Tafeln und die römische Gesandtschaft nach Griechenland, ZRG 64, 1944, 350-354; J. DELZ, Der griechische Einfluß auf die Zwölf Tafelgesetzgebung, MH 23, 1966, 69-83; WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 300-304.

It is more important for the development and universal significance of Roman law that, when it first came to grips in a scholarly way with its material, particularly in the late Republican period, this was part of a process that certainly showed the influence of Greek thought, but was also surprisingly independent. The material was organized along lines comparable with the system of rhetoric,<sup>1</sup> which meant that it could be scrutinized and learned. An appeal to general standards like bona fides and aequius melius made it possible for Roman law to find general acceptance. This may be traced back to the influence of Hellenistic scientific method and intellectual concepts marked by Stoicism making possible the use of clear generic terms. But these are only general categories. For the specific achievement of the Romans in jurisprudence there is no direct Greek model.

Roman Development

Originating from the activity of the pontifices, and preserved by them, law gradually freed itself from its sacral<sup>2</sup> beginnings. A first general legislation was completed with the Twelve Tables (s. below, Juristic Literature of the Republican Period). From the Republican period, about 700 further laws are known. An essential contribution aiding their adaptation to changing circumstances was made by the edicts of magistrates in the exercise of their legal authority. Principally however, the further development of Roman law was owed to the responsa

---

<sup>1</sup> J. STROUX (Römische Rechtswissenschaft und Rhetorik, Potsdam 1949) argues with some degree of probability that the legal principles expressed in the Digests do not derive from the late period, but were developed in classical times under the influence of Roman rhetorical theory and educational practice. Already in the 2nd century B.C., jurists made tentative steps towards a 'systematic' approach to individual phenomena (there were discussions as to how many genera furti and genera tutelatum existed). Later there was a lost treatise of Cicero De iure civili in artem redigendo (Cic. de orat. 1. 87; Gell. 1. 22. 7; G. LA PIRA, La genesi del sistema nella giurisprudenza romana. L'arte sistematrice, BIDR 42, 1934, 336-355; H. J. METTE, Ius civile in artem redactum, Göttingen 1954). But even if the scientia of the iuris periti was available relatively early (Pomp. dig. 1. 2. 2. 35), the classical period of law, that of the normative formulations, lies along with the Digesta of Juventius Celsus and Salvius Julianus as well as the Institutiones of Gaius in the 2nd century A.D. Rhetorical categories (WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 662-675) exercised an influence inter alia on the quaestio facti, and the rhetorical topica affected the development of ideas and rules (ibid. 51). Grammatical and linguistic theory principally modified the interpretation of texts (ibid. 653-660).

<sup>2</sup> R. DÜLL, Rechtsprobleme im Bereich des römischen Sakralrechts, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 283-294.

given by great jurists, who at first belonged to the senatorial class.

A new period of jurisprudence began about the turn of the 1st century B.C., when a higher level of intellectual understanding was reached. Conversely, with the transition to the principate, no initial breach occurred in development. The great Servius Sulpicius Rufus was still a senator.

But already in the 1st century B.C. the number of knights among the uiris consulti had been increasing. Often, they were members of prominent families from Italian provincial towns. In Augustus' time and later, the emperors succeeded in forging ever closer links with the jurists. At first, it was jurists of the senatorial class who received from the princeps the ius respondendi. The competence of the senate as court of law and of senatorial decrees was broadened. But, as a consequence of the scope given by Claudius to the freedmen of his household, the imperial consilium gained in importance (98–180 A.D.), and was increasingly staffed by imperial officials from the equites, among whom jurists played an important part. Accordingly, from the 2nd century A.D. on, more and more legal scholars followed, rather than that of senators,<sup>1</sup> the career of knights,<sup>2</sup> who stood closer to the emperor than to the senate. The crisis of the Empire in the 3rd century entailed also a decline in juridic literature. The spread of Roman citizenship, culminating in 212 with the Constitutio Antoniniana, ensured the development of Roman law into the law of the Empire. It continued to show the strong influence of the enlightened humanism of the emperors of the 2nd century.

Late antiquity witnessed the culmination of the Dominate under Diocletian and Constantine, and introduced a new phase. Imperial legislation monopolized law; beginning with Constantine, jurists could write only under classical pseudonyms or in the name of the emperor. Jurists were commissioned by the emperors to draw up the great collections of texts which later served as the basis for European law. The classicism of Justinian's codification denoted both a conclusion and a new beginning.

---

<sup>1</sup> A senatorial career was still followed by Juventius Celsus (consul iterum A.D. 129) and Salvius Julianus (consul A.D. 148), the latter perhaps the greatest of jurists.

<sup>2</sup> Examples are Volusius Maecianus (praefectus Aegypti ca. A.D. 161), Cervidius Scaevola (praefectus vigilum A.D. 175), Papinianus (d. A.D. 212), Julius Paulus and Ulpian (time of the Severi), Modestinus (praefectus vigilum about 228: D. LIEBS, ZRG 100, 501).

Literary Technique<sup>1</sup>

Often only an indirect picture may be formed of the shape of juristic writings. None of the principal works has survived in its entirety, and we possess only the Institutiones of Gaius, a textbook for beginners. All other information—if exceptions s. p. 1507, n. 4 are discounted—must be derived from quotations in the Digests or Pandects assembled from older sources under Justinian. The following types may be distinguished:

Casuistic writings, particularly characteristic of the Romans, include the collections of responsa, attested with certainty from Neratius on. Originally, a responsum contained only the statement of the facts and the (unexplained) decision. Later, in Papinianus, a justification is given, even though only in brief form.

Letters (introduced by Labeo or, at the latest, Proculus) and works with titles, emphasizing the variety of their content,<sup>2</sup> are especially loose forms. They range from simple responsa to letters setting forth theory.

Quaestiones<sup>3</sup> or Disputationes<sup>4</sup> deal more closely with concrete cases and individual questions of law than would be possible within the framework of a responsum.

Collections of decisions (sententiae, decreta) rather unexpectedly play only a subordinate role, unless they are concerned with imperial rulings.<sup>5</sup>

Digesta draw together the achievements of a particular author or school within a single work. Writings of this kind had existed since the late Republican period.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The category 'Literary Technique' is here appropriately filled by the description of the most important types of treatment. An excellent discussion by D. LIEBS in: FUHRMANN, LG 195–208. On the different genres of juristic texts, cf. WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 53–54 with note 73.

<sup>2</sup> Coniectanea (Alfenus Varus), Membranae (Neratius), Variae lectiones (Pomponius), Pithana (Labeo), Bene dicta (Cascellius).

<sup>3</sup> Modelled on ζήτηματα, appearing from the 2nd century on, composed by Celsus, Africanus, Cervidius Scaevola, Papinianus, Tertullianus, and Paulus.

<sup>4</sup> By Tryphoninus and Ulpian (time of the Severi).

<sup>5</sup> Aristo, Decreta Frontiana [MOMMSEN: Frontiniana] (under Trajan); Paulus, Libri VI imperialium sententiarum in cognitionibus prolatarum.

<sup>6</sup> Aufidius Namusa, from the school of Servius Sulpicius (consul 51 B.C.), published 140 books of Digests, and Alfenus Varus (consul suff. 39 B.C.) 40 books. What is preserved from the latter creates a particularly lively and original impression. In the 2nd century A.D., Pomponius put out Digesta ab Aristone, Celsus published

A further type is made up of commentaries, showing the influence of literary models. The Hellenistic world knew of commentaries on poets, orators, philosophical and medical writers. Their form was modelled either on the detailed, continuous hypomnema, or on the scholia introduced at individual points, originally brief but later mushrooming out of control.

To the first group belong commentaries on laws and edicts. Interpretations were added to the law of the Twelve Tables, thereby ensuring its further development. Aelius Sextus made a beginning, and on the Twelve Tables Labeo wrote at least two books. The Commentaries on the Edict of Servius Sulpicius Rufus consisted of two volumes, the two written by Labeo of at least sixty volumes each. It was this great jurist who set his mark on the form of the commentary.

A similar growth is seen in the interpretations of the praetorian edict,<sup>1</sup> and even in those of the edicts of provincial governors.<sup>2</sup> Such commentaries began by quoting the passage to be explained: 'The praetor says . . .' Then an explanation was added: 'This means . . .' A question arising from the context could then be formulated and answered with the phrase 'I think that . . .' Some commentators indulged in long digressions (Paulus), while others adhered more closely to the basic text (Ulpian).

Conversely, Commentaries on the Writings of the Jurists<sup>3</sup> mirrored in the first instance the brevity of scholia. Often they were notae of critical import. Such works were treated in theoretical instruction, since, for the Romans, law depended not least on the authority of recognized jurists. Practical need in the schools gave rise to the commented epitome.<sup>4</sup>

---

39 books and the famous Julianus 90 (about A.D. 150). Along with the discussion of individual cases in such works could be mingled theoretical and explanatory material.

<sup>1</sup> In the 2nd century such juristic works became even more lengthy. S. Pedius wrote at least 25 books (about 50) and Pomponius at least 83 (about 150). In the late classical period, Paulus wrote 78 books and Ulpian 81 (these were taken up into the Digests).

<sup>2</sup> Gaius (30 books), Callistratus (under Septimius Severus: 6 books), Furius Anthianus (later 3rd century: at least five books).

<sup>3</sup> 1st century B.C.: Servius Sulpicius, Reprehensa Scaevolae capita or Notata Mucii; 1st century A.D.: Proculus (on Labeo's Posteriora); the late classical writers Marcellus, Cervidius Scaevola, Ulpian, and Paulus respond to classical works such as Julian's Digesta and Papinianus' Responsa.

<sup>4</sup> Labeonis posteriorum a Iavoleno epitomatorum libri X, Labeonis pūthanōn a Paulo epitomatorum libri VIII. Javolenus, Neratius, and Pomponius published Ex Plautio libri V or VII, Julianus Ex Minicio libri VI.

From the time of Pomponius and the late classical period of jurisprudence, even commentaries on the writings of the jurists became more detailed.<sup>1</sup> The basic text, unlike the case with the non-legal commentary, was no longer the center of attention. It simply provided an occasion for explaining a matter of private law in the light of the needs of the day, or for developing a personal line of argument.

Textbooks presuppose a less specialized approach, and, instead, a sense of independent, systematic ordering of the material and a minimum of literary shaping. They first arose after the intellectual horizon of the Romans began to be widened by contact with Greek culture.<sup>2</sup> A first highpoint was marked by the Iuris civilis libri XVIII of Q. Mucius Scaevola Pontifex (consul 95 B.C.). This noble and educated jurist, an embodiment of the best side of the Roman spirit, benefited from Stoic theory of knowledge for his legal definitions;<sup>3</sup> his steps towards a system of law were a lasting contribution.

Classical authority was gained by the Ius civile of Masurius Sabinus, written in the reign of Tiberius and comprising only three books. The title Ius civile was last used by C. Cassius Longinus (consul 30 A.D.) and later gave way to that of Regulae (from Neratius on, who was active under Trajan). Each of the authors known to us orders his matter differently and there is great independence. The only work preserved, that by Gaius, written in Berytos about 160, is an introduction for beginners (Institutionum libri IV), but in its overall structure it must have followed the Regularum libri XV of Neratius. The systematization of details has been carried astonishingly far; so far as may be judged, this seems to be owed to Gaius.<sup>4</sup> The textbooks of rhetoric may in this area have served as model.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Ius civile of Masurius Sabinus was the object of commentaries by late classical writers in an increasing number of books. Ulpian planned 68 books; 51 came down to us unfinished (Libri ad Sabinum).

<sup>2</sup> M. Porcius Cato Licinianus (died around 152 B.C.), the son of the censor, composed Commentarii iuris civilis. M. Junius Brutus (mid-2nd century B.C.) wrote Libri III de iure civili in the form of a dialogue.

<sup>3</sup> He also wrote a Liber singularis Orwn. His principal work was the object of several commentaries down to the 2nd century A.D.

<sup>4</sup> A corrected and expanded version in seven books (Res cottidianae sive aurea) was less well received.

<sup>5</sup> Institutiones were also composed by Callistratus (around A.D. 200) and Florentinus (later 3rd century), both perhaps also in Berytos. Previously at Rome Pomponius (mid-2nd century A.D.) had published in more modest compass Enchiridii libri II.

Monographs discuss special cases related to some limited field but surprisingly often refrain from carefully considering all relevant aspects of a particular question. At first whole areas were treated, such as sacred law, especially that of the pontifices and augurs, and more rarely individual points of private law.<sup>1</sup> In the Imperial period sacred and public law was at the beginning less prominent. From the 2nd century on, the scope of these treatises was widened, at first still within the framework of private law, but then with the addition of public criminal law and the law of administration, tax and the military. We find collections and analyses of previous practice, particularly of Imperial rulings. In spite of occasional refinement in juristic insight, the literary significance of such works is slight.

Language and Style

The language of the jurists<sup>2</sup> is clear, long preserving a refreshing freedom from fashionable trends. It is not an esoteric jargon that is on display ('legal Latin'), but the simple Latin normal in other types of technical literature. Such Latin is often impersonal and does not avoid trite phrases. Colloquial elements,<sup>3</sup> the result of a certain carelessness or, as in the case of responsa, to be regarded as the traces of a venerable oral style, keep within reasonable bounds.

Juristic literature is distinguished from other technical prose by its particular terminology and the frequency of fixed turns such as idem iuris est . . ., idem placet de . . . Certain archaisms may be understood as fitting ornament, or perhaps better as a quasi-natural expression of the dignity of the subject.

The language of the laws was for long marked by that of the Twelve Tables, which were committed to memory. For this reason, it shows a partial use of archaisms, which were not an artistic manner-

---

Later, Paulus and Ulpian each produced two books and Marcianus sixteen books of Institutiones. The Pandectae of Ulpian and Modestinus were also textbooks.

<sup>1</sup> Manius Manilius and Ofilius (handbooks on the drawing up of contracts and wills), Servius Sulpicius (dowry).

<sup>2</sup> H. L. W. NELSON, Überlieferung, Aufbau und Stil von Gai Institutiones, Leiden 1981, 395-423, esp. 423.

<sup>3</sup> Anacoloutha, redundancies and similar features. On the difference between the original orality and the post-classical revision: D. LIEBS, Römische Rechtsgutachten und Responsorum libri, in: G. VOGT-SPIRA, ed., Strukturen der Mündlichkeit in der römischen Literatur, Tübingen 1990, 83-94.

ism but a spontaneous tribute to the power of tradition. In his De legibus, Cicero himself used archaizing color to lend authority to the legal texts he had composed; this literary technique reflected the moral authority of legal language.

Certain archaisms spring from the official language of proceedings before the senate and courts, dependent as it was on tradition. A degree of stiffness and prolixity marks turns such as diem, quo die, with the unnecessary repetition of the antecedent in the relative clause enhancing the impression of precision. Exhaustive doublings, often with a solemn atque, are meant to prevent misinterpretations, but occasionally create an impression of redundancy.

Individual features yield only to closer examination. Sometimes especially shrewd jurists seem also to be distinguished by their thoughtful treatment of language, though no rule may be derived from this practice. Celsus writes in a condensed and lucid form, with much use of aphorisms; Julian is simple and elegant. Gaius is pleasing and clear; Papinianus packed with thought, willful and baffling.<sup>1</sup> Yet in the Holmesian analysis of stylistic footprints, moderation must be observed. For example, the search for Graecisms in Gaius has not led to any convincing conclusions, so that his language in this respect allows no deductions about his origin.<sup>2</sup> Nor is closeness to Cicero a criterion. It guarantees neither the Italian nor (if it is taken as slavish lack of independence) the non-Italian origin of the author. Only in the late period would Rhetoric<sup>3</sup> exert an undue influence on the jurists' style—to the detriment of exactness.

Ideas I

The opinion which the Roman jurists had of themselves oscillated between two extremes, great modesty and presumption.

<sup>1</sup> Gaius, governed by pedagogic considerations, avoids variation in the form of synonyms (L. HUCHTHAUSEN, ed., Römisches Recht, Berlin 1989, 3rd ed., p. xxvi); on the idioms used by Papinianus: WIEACKER, Textstufen 337–339; on the style of Ulpian, ibid. 267–270; WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 168–169; T. HONORÉ, Ulpian, Oxford 1982, 47–85; 204–248; D. LIEBS, Gnomon 56, 1984, 444–445; 449.

<sup>2</sup> H. L. W. NELSON ibid. 416–417; reserves in D. LIEBS, Gnomon 55, 1983, 124.

<sup>3</sup> WIEACKER, Textstufen 429–431 (dialogic question, occupatio, anaphora, deinosis, reflecting the style of Constantine's chancellery). Quite different from this negative influence is the more positive effect of the systematic division found in rhetorical textbooks.

In the light of the large part played by the jurists and their decisions in the evolution of Roman law, it is surprising that, in the first instance, they seem to consider themselves rather as interpreters than as creators of law. Cicero already in the Republican period explicitly counts the auctoritas iurisconsultorum as part of ius civile (top. 28; cf. Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 5), and in the classical period uncontested decisions of the jurists (veterum consensus) had long enjoyed binding force. Legend has it that even the great Salvius Julianus, with exemplary modesty, saw his life's work down to his last breath as only that of a learner (Dig. 40. 5. 20).

On the other hand the Roman jurists of the later period, although they were merely specialists, felt themselves as true priests and philosophers (Dig. 1. 1. 1).<sup>1</sup> Such arrogance had an advantage: it kept them from ever taking the last step towards limitation within their specialized field, and the resort to legal positivism. Even Papinianus, who is far from raising priestly claims, believed that behavior contradicting pietas and boni mores was simply impossible for 'us' (obviously all those subject to law, including, of course, the jurists: Dig. 28. 7. 15). He proved this by his death.<sup>2</sup> The deeper basis for such a view of their activity on the part of jurists lay in a double claim made by the Roman legal system. Since for pagans the res publica had a sacral character, the jurists, far removed though their secularized science was from its pontifical beginnings, could describe themselves metaphorically as 'priests' of Iustitia, thought of as a goddess. Iustitia is both the supreme and most comprehensive virtue. Insofar as the jurists in the Roman empire, which as a universal state enjoyed cosmic importance, were concerned with realizing justice, they were therefore—in Plato's sense—'philosophers'.

This self-confidence on the part of the epigones may be traced quite far back to its original impulse. Cicero demanded from the statesman a mastery of Roman law (de orat. 1. 166–202), and in his De re publica set legislators higher than philosophers on the grounds that what philosophers conveyed laboriously to a few was imposed by legislators on whole peoples. The supreme ruler received correspondingly higher rank. As early as here, there is an explicit reference to ius publicum (rep. 1. 2). Going beyond this, in his De oratore Cicero allows the great jurist Scaevola to present arguments which in the late Republican period (and later) were prevalent among jurists. The founders and saviors of states were not mere orators, but men of wisdom no matter if they possessed a ready tongue or not. For example, Scaevola declares that in his own family knowledge of the law was now a long tradition. He proudly adds: sine ulla eloquentiae laude (Cic. de orat. 1. 35–44; esp. 39). Indeed the authority of a legal scholar of the Republic carried great weight when heredity and expertise were combined.

---

<sup>1</sup> The three duties of the old Roman jurists—agere, cavere, respondere—are in fact closely linked with the leges (Wieacker, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 497); cf. also D. NÖRR, Iurisperitus sacerdos, in: Xenion, FS P. J. ZEPOS, Athens, Freiburg 1973, 1, 555–572. The fact that Ulpian, who raises the priestly claim, was personally no angel is another matter; M. J. SCHERMAIER, Ulpian als 'wahrer Philosoph', in: Ars boni et aequi. FS W. WALDSTEIN, Stuttgart 1993, 303–322; W. WALDSTEIN, Zum Problem der vera philosophia bei Ulpian, in: Collatio iuris Romani. Etudes dédiées à H. ANKUM, Amsterdam 1995, 607–617.

<sup>2</sup> An impressive defense of the equality of all those subject to law and against misuse of power, influence, and tricks is found in: Paulus dig. 39. 6. 3; 47. 2. 92; Ulp. dig. 47. 10. 13. 7; 48. 5. 14. 5.

In this way the jurists' conviction of their own importance, soon reinforced by their close ties to the emperor and the irrelevance of the political speech, was anticipated already in the late Republican period.

Ideas II

Juridical thought at Rome was concerned at its outset with the judgment of the particular case. The development of definitions and the systematization of Roman law could not have taken the form they did without an encounter with Greek thought. But they show far greater independence than is to be observed in other areas of Roman intellectual life.

The process of putting law into a system begins relatively late. At the time when the majority of the literary works studied in this book were written, Roman law was not the fixed system into which it has been turned since the late Middle Ages, but a piece of life. Every Roman's daily round was filled with experiences of law and, in their turn, these were connected with the mores maiorum. Consequently, knowledge of legal ideas is indispensable even for the understanding of formal literature.

Roman law rests in the first instance on a number of indigenous notions lying between law and morals.<sup>1</sup> They were rooted in living practice and may only be understood from that aspect. Boni mores, the mores maiorum, were an important touchstone in the ius civile. What contradicts these lies under a ban.<sup>1</sup> Conversely, Romans were well aware that not everything was moral that was permissible.<sup>2</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> On some of these cf. the introductory section above on 'Mentality.' In general, SCHULZ, Prinzipien.

Originally the basic notions ius and fas did not describe an opposition between two different norms, human and divine law. Both related to the admissibility of a specific piece of behavior ('seisin'). Fas denotes the general availability of the basic presuppositions. Ius is, in a given case, the full scope of action within the area of what is permissible.<sup>3</sup> Even the boundaries between iustum and aequum are shifting; there is no antithesis, since the latter refers to legal behavior in a given context, originally in the sense of iustitia commutativa.

Later, according to Celsus (apud Ulp. dig. 1. 1. 1 pr.), ius is ars boni et aequi, the good and proper ordering of human relations. Subsequently, much was interpreted in the light of Greek thought. Thus Ulpian (dig. 1. 1. 1 pr.) derives ius from iustitia, although the latter word came to play a role rather late and only as an equivalent of δικαιοσύνη. Aequitas is equated with ἐπιείκεια. Paulus (dig. 1. 1. 11; cf. Ulpian, dig. 1. 1. 1. 3) defines principles of action found everywhere (even in animals) as natural law<sup>4</sup> (cum id, quod semper aequum ac bonum est, ius dicitur, ut est ius naturale, 'while right [or: law] is called what is always just and good, like the natural right [law]'). Gaius appeals to the natural reason common to all peoples (dig. 1. 1. 9), while Justinian appeals (inst. 1. 2. 11) to divine providentia.

Unlike Greek law, which is always related to the polis, Roman law rests on private law.<sup>5</sup> This derivation from the person corresponds to the fact that, in a special way, the Romans discovered human will.

<sup>1</sup> For example, settlement of succession, Dig. 45. 1. 61.

<sup>2</sup> Paulus dig. 50. 17. 144 pr. non omne, quod licet, honestum est. S. also Mod. dig. 50. 17. 197.

<sup>3</sup> Ius and fas converge (Isid. orig. 5. 2. 2; Serv. georg. 1. 269; cf. Rhet. Her. 2. 12. 20); O. BEHREND, Ius und ius civile. Untersuchungen zur Herkunft des ius-Begriffs im römischen Zivilrecht, Symptica. FS F. WIEACKER, 1970, 11–58; also G. DUMÉZIL, La religion romaine archaïque, Paris 1966, 138–139.

<sup>4</sup> L. WENGER, Naturrecht und römisches Recht, Wissenschaft und Weltbild 1, 1948, 148–150; H. KRIMM, Das Naturrecht und seine Bedeutung für die römische Rechtsordnung, AU 8, 1, 1965, 61–75; on natural law even before Celsus cf. Cicero (rep. and leg.); W. WALDSTEIN, Naturrecht bei den klassischen römischen Juristen, in: Das Naturrechtsdenken heute und morgen. Gedächtnisschrift für R. MARCIC, Berlin 1983, 239–253.

<sup>5</sup> On what follows, R. MARCIC, Geschichte der Rechtsphilosophie. Schwerpunkte—Kontrapunkte, Freiburg 1971, 211–221.

This is the source of power (auctoritas, imperium, maiestas) and of freedom (libertas),<sup>1</sup> and particularly the material source of law (lex). The significance of will is evident in subjective private law (wills, property, contracts, patria potestas). All this does not of course mean that Roman law had exclusively selfish aims and so was a kind of stage on the road to capitalism.

The Roman jurists in fact, in spite of the high value they set on the uniqueness of the individual as a subject, did not become voluntarists, nominalists or positivists in law and morals. They acknowledged neither a merely formal definition of law, nor the notion that law could have any content whatsoever, provided it was produced correctly. Although Roman jurists are happily disinclined to lofty language, they accept in the last analysis no positive law not dependent on a 'pre-positive' law. Natural law and the ius gentium make their appearance at the beginning of the Institutio of Gaius as at that of the Digests. Positive law must be controlled by the standard of boni mores.<sup>2</sup> Q. Mucius Scaevola justifies the bonae fidei<sup>3</sup> iudicia, developed from the Roman system of values, in the light of the human societas vitae (Cic. off. 3. 70). This belief in a system of law worthy of safeguard and serving to unite the community is more than a mere expression of the dependence of jurists on the emperor. In principle, even the ruler is subject to the law,<sup>4</sup> and this in spite of the force of law enjoyed by his edicts. The Empire in concept was a state governed by law. Its inhabitants could easily compare it with the Stoic consociatio humana.<sup>5</sup> So it was that in Roman law reason took

<sup>1</sup> Libertas was originally the freedom of one person from the dominance of another, libertas publica the active enjoyment of participation by the citizen in the sovereignty of the populus. It also implies the protection of the citizen against illegal treatment on the part of officials (WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 379 with bibliography).

<sup>2</sup> The πάτριος νόμος resembles customary law. On the limited applicability of this concept, WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 499–502.

<sup>3</sup> Bona fides was at first the basis for legal dealings with non-Romans (the ius gentium from the outset was a ius aequum). Within the framework of property transactions, principles of the ius gentium influenced the ius civile; WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 442–443; 449; 453–454.

<sup>4</sup> Digna vox maiestate regnantis, legibus alligatum se principem profiteri: adeo de auctoritate iuris nostra pendet auctoritas. Et revera maius imperio est submittere legibus principatum (edict of Theodosius and Valentinian of June 11, 429, cod. Iust. 1. 14. 4). This is an important corrective to princeps legibus solutus and quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem (Ulp. dig. 1. 3. 31; Inst. 1. 2. 6; Ulp. dig. 1. 4. 1).

<sup>5</sup> Rutilius Rufus and Q. Mucius Scaevola Pontifex had links to the Stoic Posidonius. Cicero was influenced by all three (cf. e.g. off. 3. 69, though the language here is admittedly Platonic).

precedence over will, and, in case of doubt, the principle of utility, at least in theory, had to give way to that of legality.<sup>1</sup>

R.A. BAUMAN, Lawyers in Roman Republican Politics, München 1983. * Id., Lawyers in Roman Transitional Politics, München 1985. * Id., Lawyers and Politics in the Early Roman Empire, München 1989. * M. BRETONE, Geschichte des römischen Rechts. Von den Anfängen bis zu Justinian, München 1992. * J. A. CROOK, Law and Life of Rome, London 1976. * G. DULCKEIT, F. SCHWARZ, W. WALDSTEIN, Römische Rechtsgeschichte. Ein Studienbuch, München 7th ed. 1981. * H. HAUSMANINGER, W. SELB, Römisches Privatrecht, Wien 5th ed. 1989. * J. HERRMANN, Beiträge zur Rechtsgeschichte, ed. by G. SCHIEMANN, München 1990. * H. VON IHERING, Geist des römischen Rechts auf den verschiedenen Stufen seiner Entwicklung, vol. 1, Basel 9th ed. 1953, vol. 2–3, 8th ed. 1954. * H. F. JOLOWICZ, B. NICHOLAS, Historical Introduction to Roman Legal and Constitutional History, Cambridge 3rd ed. 1972. * JÖRS-KUNKEL-WENGER, Römisches Recht. * M. KASER, Das altrömische Ius, Göttingen 1949. * KASER, Privatrecht. * KASER, Rechtsgeschichte. * KASER, Studienbuch. * KRÜGER, Quellen. * B. KÜBLER, Geschichte des römischen Rechts, Leipzig 1929. * KUNKEL, Herkunft. * KUNKEL, Rechtsgeschichte. * LIEBS, Recht. * A. D. E. LEWIS, D. J. IBBETSON, eds., The Roman Law Tradition, Cambridge 1994. * U. VON LÜBTOW, Recht und Rechtswissenschaft im Rom der Frühzeit, in: FS G. RADKE, Münster 1984, 164–185. * MOMMSEN, Staatsrecht. * MOMMSEN, Strafrecht. * G. NOCERA, Iurisprudentia: per una storia del pensiero giuridico romano, Roma 1973. * NORDEN, Priesterbücher. * A. SCHIAVONE, Nascita della giurisprudenza. Cultura aristocratica e pensiero giuridico nella Roma tardo-repubblicana, Bari 1976, 2nd ed. 1977. * Id., Giuristi e nobili nella Roma repubblicana, Roma 1987. * SCHULZ, Prinzipien. * SCHULZ, Geschichte. * SCHULZ, History. * SCHULZ, Law. * STROH, Taxis. * A. SÖLLNER, Einführung in die römische Rechtsgeschichte, München 4th ed. 1989. * J. STROUX, Summum ius summa iniuria. Ein Kapitel aus der interpretatio iuris, offprint from: FS P. SPEISER-SARASIN, Leipzig 1926; repr. in: J. STROUX, Römische Rechtswissenschaft und Rhetorik, Potsdam 1949, 9–66. * O. TELLEGEN-COUPERUS, A Short History of Roman Law, London 1993. * WENGER, Quellen. * U. WESEL, Rhetorische Statuslehre und Gesetzesauslegung der römischen Juristen, Köln 1967. * WIEACKER, Textstufen. * WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte. * F. WIEACKER, Vom römischen Recht. Zehn Versuche, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1961.

<sup>1</sup> In seeking in the De Marcello to compel Caesar to accept the framework of the laws defining the res publica, Cicero was clearly defending a quite basic legal maxim, even from the point of view of later Roman law.

JURIDICAL LITERATURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PERIOD<sup>1</sup>

Beginnings

In early times, knowledge of the law rested in the hands of definite groups of priests.<sup>2</sup> It was they who prescribed the terms and conditions on which successful legal dealings with the gods depended, and it was the pontifices who took charge of the calendar (dies fasti). The practice of Roman law is dominated by oral tradition and symbolic action. This appears from the relevant vocabulary.<sup>3</sup> Words whose derivations suggest written form (e.g. praescriptio) are late. By contrast, Attic law depends upon written indictment, documentary evidence, and recorded statements by witnesses. At Rome, the priests<sup>4</sup> protected law as sacrosanct knowledge by refusing in the first instance to commit it to writing. Because of its pontifical beginnings, even after its early secularization, Roman law was still characterized by a pronounced formalism and ritualism. Oral presentation remained important. A reluctance to separate word and thing meant that even an unintentional mistake over the 'form that worked' rendered the legal act invalid.

According to the account by Pomponius, the laws of the regal period (leges regiae) were collected in the book of the pontifex maximus Papirius (at the time of Tarquin the Proud), in the Ius civile Papirianum, which however in all probability contained rules not for civil but for sacral procedures (cf. Serv. Aen. 12. 836). The ascription to Papirius is doubtful.

<sup>1</sup> On the early period: Gaius (primo libro ad legem XII tabularum—Dig. 1. 2. 1) and in detail Pomponius (libro singulari enchiridii—Dig. 1. 2. 2. 1–3, structured in accordance with the principle of the διαδοχαί). In addition Cic. Brut.; de orat.; epist.; U. VON LÜBROW, Recht und Rechtswissenschaft im Rom der Frühzeit, in: Beiträge zur altitalischen Geistesgeschichte, FS G. RADKE, Münster 1984, 164–185; J. KÖHN, Selbststrache und Gerichtsverfahren. Überlegungen zum römischen Frührecht, Altertum 33, 1987, 185–189.

<sup>2</sup> The pontifices (private law), the augures (public law), and the fetiales (international law).

<sup>3</sup> From dicere: iudex, iudicium, condicio, condictio, interdictum, edictum (where it is not the praetor but the scriba who has the task of writing). Expressions of a transaction are: pactum, conventio, contractus.

<sup>4</sup> On the Pontifices Latte, Religionsgeschichte 195–200; 400–401; G. J. SZEMLER, RE suppl. 15, 1978, 331–396 s.v. Pontifex; E. PÓLAY, Das Jurisprudenzmonopol des Pontifikalkollegiums in Rom und seine Abschaffung, ACD 19, 1983, 49–56; WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 217–218; 310–340; 523–524.

First Laws: The Twelve Tables

After the banishment of the kings (508 B.C.), the struggles between the orders led to an increase in power for the plebeians. The bases of law had to be rethought.<sup>1</sup> The Greek model was not followed. It was not a single mediator who intervened between people and government, but instead appeal was made to a College of Ten (decemviri legibus scribundis). Their work, the first and last comprehensive Roman constitutional legislation before Justinian, was not a codification in the strict sense. It was accepted under oath by the assembled people, and in 449 B.C. made public in the forum on Twelve Tables.<sup>2</sup> After the destruction by the Gauls (387 B.C.; Livy 6. 1. 10), the text was restored, though it did not come down to us directly. Its content, structure, and even wording may however be reinstated in great part because of the rich secondary evidence and the work of commentators. The law regulated the following areas: civil actions (Tables 1–3); family, guardianship, and inheritance (Tables 4 and 5); property and neighbors' rights (Tables 6 and 7); criminal law (Tables 8 and 9); ius sacrorum (Table 10); rights of the orders of patricians and plebeians (Tables 11 and 12). In the formulation, old Roman legal language, recalling the leges regiae, was mingled with Graecizing elements. The same may be said of the content. The coincidences with Greek city codes are too striking to rest on chance. Now the step had been taken towards a new understanding of ius. It was no longer a ritual assurance of existence through the re-establishment of the pax deum, but a determination of human responsibility in the res publica. The Twelve Tables were for all later Romans fons omnis publici privatique iuris, 'the fountain-head of all public and private law' (Livy 3. 34. 6-7; Cic. de orat. 1. 195). Their content, which down to Cicero's day was learned by heart by schoolboys (Cic. leg. 2. 59), remained the basis of further legal evolution. The jurists considered the interpretatio legum their task.

<sup>1</sup> On this Livy 3. 31. 7–8; 32. 6–7; 34. 1–6; Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 4; Diod. 12. 23–26; Dion. Hal. 10. 1–60.

<sup>2</sup> Oak or stone may have been the medium (WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 294 with note 47); editions: Romae 1522 (in Alexandri de Alexandro dies Geniales); R. SCHÖLL, Lipsiae 1866 (basic); G. BRUNS, T. MOMMSEN, O. GRADENWITZ, Fontes iuris Romani antiqui 1, Tubingae 7th ed. 1909; S. RICCOBONO (TN, bibl.), Fontes iuris Romani antejustiniani 1, Florentiae 2nd ed. 1941; R. DÜLL (TTrN), München 4th ed. (rev.) 1971. Bibl.: H. E. DIRKSEN, Übersicht der bisherigen Versuche zur Kritik und Herstellung des Textes der Zwölf Tafel Fragmente, Leipzig 1824; M. KASER, Das altrömische ius. Studien zur Rechtsvorstellung und Rechtsgeschichte der Römer, Göttingen 1949; G. CORNIL, Ancien droit romain. Le problème des origines, Bruxelles 1930; A. BERGER, Tabulae duodecim, RE 4 A2, 1932, 1900–1949; H. LÉVY-BRUHL, Nouvelles études sur le très ancien droit romain, Paris 1947; F. WIEACKER, Die XII Tafeln in ihrem Jahrhundert, in: Les origines de la république romaine = Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 13, Vandœuvres-Genève 1967, 291–356; G. CRIFÒ, La legge delle XII tavole. Osservazioni e problemi, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 115–133; for a criticism of Schöll's restoration: WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1, 290, note 22 (bibl.).

Early Juridical Writings

Appius Claudius Caecus,<sup>1</sup> the most important Roman of his day (about 300 B.C.), struck a further blow against the legal obscurantism of the priestly colleges. At his instigation, his scribe Cn.Flavius, son of a freedman, yet destined to reach the curule aedileship, published in 304 a list of days when courts could sit (dies comitiales or dies fasti). This means that he published the calendar which had been controlled by the priests. He went on to present in a kind of reference book the forms to be used by plaintiffs (legis actiones), the so-called Ius Flavianum.<sup>2</sup> Now those seeking legal redress were no longer compelled to resort to the pontifices for advice. Appius Claudius himself, with his book De usurpationibus (Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 36), is said to have composed the first treatise on a point of law.

Yet this meant no interruption in the course of development. The priests continued to act as legal counselors, and the secular jurists at first originated in the group of the pontifices.

The Beginning of Responsa

The higher colleges of priests were first opened to plebeians by the Lex Ogulnia (300 B.C.), and it was this that made knowledge of the laws accessible to a somewhat wider audience. Under plebeian pontifices, legal advice was no longer given anonymously in the name of the entire college, since its membership was no longer uniform. Individual jurists made their appearance, such as Tiberius Coruncanius, the first plebeian pontifex maximus (about 254–253 B.C.), a homo novus from the country nobility. He gave public information about the law and also legal instruction, though he could not rely upon any systematically developed body of legal lore.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Appius Claudius Caecus (censor 312, consul 307 and 296 B.C.) was the builder of the first Roman road (via Appia) and the first major Roman aqueduct (aqua Appia), the first named composer of Latin verses, a collection of maxims in Saturnians (e.g. suae quisque fortunae faber est), showing Pythagorean influence (Cic. Tusc. 4. 4). It was he who delivered the famous speech opposing peace with Pyrrhus (280 B.C.): fig. 12 MALC. 1st ed. = fig. 10 MALC. 4th ed. Cf. Enn. ann. 202 V. = 199-200 SKUTSCH; and Val. Max. 7. 2. 1.

<sup>2</sup> Livy 9. 46. 5; Cic. Mur. 25; de orat. 1. 186; Att. 6. 1. 8; Plin. nat. 33. 17; Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 6.

Apparently certain responsa of Coruncanius were somehow known in written form; but only in the Christian era were real collections of responsa published. This was not done by the authors themselves but posthumously by their adherents and students. The titles of such collections varied: examples are Alfeni (a student of Servius) digestorum libri (containing systematically arranged responsa, exclusively or almost exclusively by Servius) or: Labeonis posteriores libri cum notis Proculi. The equestrian jurists of the 1st and 2nd centuries, however, published their own responsorum libri. They followed the example of Neratius (around A.D. 120), the only senatorial jurist to publish such a work. Already in the days of Pomponius, nothing was available of Coruncanius.

First Commentaries

In the time that followed, the legal system parted company with the pontifices. At first it was a matter not so much of creating law, as of explaining laws long in existence. This task was assumed by experts. Explanations of words in the Twelve Tables were written by L. Acilius, a contemporary of Cato the Elder.<sup>2</sup> S. Aelius Paetus (consul 198 B.C.),<sup>3</sup> who was known by the epithet Catus ('the sly one'), composed a standard work. His Tripertita (about 200 B.C.), also called the Ius Aelianum, was known as the 'cradle of law' (Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 38). First of all, it contained the text of the Twelve Tables; second, the exposition of the law (interpretatio), third, the formulas used to begin a suit (legis actiones). This first juristic commentary had predecessors only in other technical areas of Hellenistic scholarship, such as commentaries on Homer, Plato, Aristotle and Hippocrates. Subsequently it was continually refined as a form of juristic literature.

<sup>1</sup> Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 38; Cic. leg. 2. 52.

<sup>2</sup> Cic. De amic. 6; leg. 2. 59; Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 38.

<sup>3</sup> His abilities were praised by Ennius (ann. 331 V. = 329 SKUTSCH) and Cicero (de sen. 27; de orat. 1. 212; 1. 193).

Ius Civile

The establishment of legal rules was the next step. Jurisprudence proceeding by precept began to evolve. Numerous jurists from this time are already known by name.<sup>1</sup>

Particularly notable among them were P. Mucius Scaevola (consul 133 B.C., pontifex maximus 130–115), regarded as one of the fundatores iuris civilis ‘founders of civil law’ (Pomponius, dig. 1. 2. 2. 39; furthermore Cic. leg. 2. 47; de orat. 1. 240), and especially his son Q. Mucius Scaevola (pontifex maximus 115 B.C., consul 95).<sup>2</sup> His uncle, the augur (consul 117), was a favorite legal counselor and author of responsa,<sup>3</sup> and it was he who provided the link with the Scipionic Circle and so with Stoic philosophy. The transference of philosophical categories (and later also those of rhetoric) into jurisprudence is an independent achievement of the Roman jurists.

After modest efforts on the part of his predecessors, the highly educated Q. Mucius Scaevola Pontifex organized ius civile by genera and species in 18 books (Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 41). This work remained basic until the late classical period. Its intellectual outlook was essentially oriented by practical needs. It was not therefore in any way a strictly theoretical application of system.<sup>4</sup> A theory of law and of its concepts was something never created by the Romans.<sup>5</sup> Apart from the Scaevolae, other authors treating in more or less fixed order the entire subject matter of law were M. Junius Brutus, Manius Manilius, Q. Aelius Tubero, and P. Rutilius Rufus.

In the interpretation of law and its application to the individual case, two tendencies continually recur. In a given legal case one side is likely to appeal to the letter and the other to the spirit of the law. The underlying problem is revealed by the aphorism summum ius summa

<sup>1</sup> Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 39, who is not always reliable for the early period; F. WIEACKER, Die römischen Juristen in der politischen Gesellschaft des zweiten vorchristlichen Jahrhunderts, in: Sein und Werden im Recht, Festgabe U. von LÜBTOW, Berlin 1970, 183–214; D. NÖRR, Pomponius oder Zum Geschichtsverständnis der römischen Juristen, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 497–604.

<sup>2</sup> Cic. de orat. 1. 180; Brut. 145.

<sup>3</sup> Cic. Brut. 306; cf. De amic. 1; leg. 1. 13.

<sup>4</sup> As governor of Asia, Scaevola distinguished himself by developing positive law.

<sup>5</sup> On the ‘dialectic’ treatment of legal topics M. KASER, Zur Methode römischer Rechtsfindung, NAWG 1962, 47–78, expresses skeptical views.

iniuria,<sup>1</sup> as in the case of Manius Curius.<sup>2</sup> There the jurist Scaevola appealed to the verbatim text of a will, while the orator Crassus successfully emphasized the intention of the testator. The treatment of such problems encouraged the application of categories and methods drawn from Greek philosophy and rhetoric.

Servius Sulpicius Rufus<sup>3</sup> (consul 51), a personal friend of Cicero, after receiving a philosophical and rhetorical training, was active at first in the lawcourts (Cic. Brut. 151–152). This does not necessarily imply any profound acquaintance with law, but after he had gained that as an old man from Q. Mucius Scaevola, he devoted himself to legal studies and acquired numerous disciples. His activity is said to have outdone that of Scaevola, for he did not limit himself to particular legal cases. To his wide-ranging work belonged the Reprehensa Scaevolae capita, that is refutations of certain chapters in Scaevola's Libri XVI iuris civilis (Gell. 4. 1. 20). This was the first critical commentary on a jurist's work. Sulpicius Rufus also composed a commentary on the Twelve Tables (dig. 50. 16. 237; Fest. p. 322 M. = 430 L.), and for the first time on the praetorian edict<sup>4</sup> (Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 44). Here he would find numerous successors.

<sup>1</sup> J. STROUX, Summum ius summa iniuria. Ein Kapitel aus der Geschichte der interpretatio iuris, offprint from (unpublished) FS P. SPEISER-SARASIN, Leipzig 1926; repr. in J. STROUX, Römische Rechtswissenschaft und Rhetorik, Potsdam 1949, 7–66; H. KORNHARDT, Summum ius, Hermes 81, 1953, 77–85; a somewhat different treatment by K. BÜCHNER, Summum ius summa iniuria, in: K.B., Humanitas Romana, Heidelberg 1957, 80–105; 335–340 (attacks extreme tendencies in the pursuit of the subjective law of seisin, on the grounds that a polarity between aequitas and the general law would have been alien to the Romans).

<sup>2</sup> H. J. WIELING, Testamentsauslegung im römischen Recht, München 1972, esp. 8–15; 64–66. Cicero, in the Pro Caecina defends the intention of the legislator against its imperfect formulation; bibl. on the causa Curiana in WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 581; 588–589; on Cicero's Pro Caecina: B. W. FRIER, The Rise of the Roman Jurists. Studies in Cicero's Pro Caecina, Princeton 1985 and the review by F. HORAK, ZRG 105, 1988, 833–850.

<sup>3</sup> J. H. MICHEL, Le droit romain dans le Pro Murena et l'œuvre de Servius Sulpicius Rufus, in: Ciceroniana, FS K. KUMANIECKI, Leiden 1975, 181–195.

<sup>4</sup> F. VON WOESS, Die prätorischen Stipulationen und der römische Rechtsschutz, ZRG 53, 1933, 372–408, esp. 379–380, 391–392; F. WIEACKER, Der Praetor, Antike 20, 1944, 40–77; s. also: Vom römischen Recht, Stuttgart 2nd ed. 1961, 83–127; A. WATSON, The Development of the Praetor's Edict, JRS 60, 1970, 105–119.

The Praetorian Edict

The yearly edict, edictum perpetuum,<sup>1</sup> evolved into a sort of legal code, embracing regulations by the Roman superior magistrates. From 242 B.C. on, the praetor urbanus and the praetor peregrinus had the ius edicendi, the former in suits between citizens and the latter in suits involving non-citizens.<sup>2</sup> Since the passing of the Lex Cornelia (67 B.C.: Ascon. Corn. p. 58 Orelli), observance of the edict by the praetor was obligatory, while the two curule aediles were charged with supervision of the markets. The edict became an important means fostering the development of the law by linking tradition (the regulations of old laws) and progress (their adaptation to new circumstances). Creation of law by magistrates from now on gained ever increasing scope.<sup>3</sup>

Decrees of the Senate

A third source of law, in addition to the old laws and edicts, in the Republican period is formed by the decrees of the senate. Their significance often exceeded the individual case, even though their authority was not firmly anchored in any constitution.

Caesar's Plan for a Legal Code

Better known legal experts at the end of the Republic were also A. Ofilius, with whose aid Caesar planned to draw together the ius civile into a single code; P. Alfenus Varus of Cremona (consul suffectus 39 B.C.); C. Trebatius Testa from Velia in Lucania,<sup>4</sup> to whom Cicero dedicated his Topica in 44; and Q. Aelius Tubero, who in 46 accused Cicero's client Ligarius of high treason.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Cic. leg. 1. 17; Verr. 2. 1. 109; A. GUARINO, La formazione dell'editto perpetuo, ANRW 2, 13, 1980, 60-102.

<sup>2</sup> D. LIEBS, Römische Provinzialjurisprudenz, ANRW 2, 15, 1976, 288-362.

<sup>3</sup> W. KUNKEL, Magistratische Gewalt und Senatsherrschaft, ANRW 1, 2, 1972, 3-22.

<sup>4</sup> Cic. fam. 7. 20; 7. 8. 2; 17. 3; Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 45; Iav. dig. 24. 1. 64; Dig. 33. 2. 31.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Quint. inst. 5. 13. 20; 31; 10. 1. 23; 11. 1. 78; 80; Pompon. dig. 1. 2. 2. 46. His works are adduced in the Pandects (BREMER, Iurisprud. antehadr. 1, 358-367). Hardly any of the jurists mentioned here succeeded in rising from the ranks of the equites into the senate, even though under Augustus they enjoyed great respect.

Conclusion

Juridical literature of the Republican period is now unfortunately only a field of ruins. Along with the masterpieces of specialists such as Scaevola or Servius Sulpicius Rufus, it would be enlightening to read also the lost writing of a non-jurist, Cicero's effort to systematize Roman law. This would form an authentic commentary on many works of the great orator and his contemporaries. Even so, his surviving books De legibus shed light on the history of the understanding of law, for part of their aim is to develop the bases of Roman legality in natural law, and at least they show on what conscious or unconscious presuppositions the legal thinking of a famous politician and writer of that period rested.

In considering the specifically juridical writings of the period, one finds that their value lies not only in areas where law affected the community, which later yielded ground, in view of the political situation, to the less 'dangerous' domain of private law. Rather it may still be recognized that particularly in the 1st century B.C. great jurists strove for intellectual insight into their profession. We owe this recognition not least to the informed accounts and hints given by Cicero, who demanded a jurisprudence worthy of its name, and who was particularly receptive to achievements by juristic authors in system and logic.<sup>1</sup> Their work has, in spite of the misfortunes of transmission, not vanished without trace. Much of it lives on in the thought of the classical jurists of the 2nd century A.D. and through them into the modern world. A real breach between the Republican and Augustan periods in this area is less apparent than in others.

Bibl.: s. above: Roman Jurists, p. 630, esp. WIEACKER, Rechtsgeschichte 1.

---

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Cic. Brut. 152 (ars: system and logic).

THIRD CHAPTER
LITERATURE OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

I. SURVEY OF LITERATURE OF THE AUGUSTAN PERIOD

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

After a century of civil war the Augustan age ushered in a period of peace. Only by appreciating the depth of those earlier sufferings can we understand the mood of the times.

The Roman conquest of the known world led to an unparalleled concentration of wealth and power in the hands of individuals. After the fall of Rome's most dangerous enemy, Carthage, internal rivalries could no longer be held in check by scruples of conscience. Oligarchy dug its own grave. Rather than lend support to the ruined smallholders, as the Gracchi had wanted, its members transformed the citizen militia into an army of mercenaries. From now on soldiers felt less loyalty to the res publica than they did to their commander. Whenever power changed hands, the senatorial ranks were thinned by proscriptions. Creatures of whatever despot ruled the day came to prominence, only to be removed from power in their turn. The aristocratic system of government established in the ancient city state broke apart. Magistrates and popular assembly could no longer collaborate under the guidance of the senate, for the senate had lost its cohesion and, instead of being an assembly of kings, now threatened to become a divided chorus of vassals.

Those who had escaped proscription had to fear that their estates would be handed over to veterans. Amid the general uncertainty of existence, men began to look for values within themselves. Lucretius retreated into the realm of philosophical contemplation. Catullus sought fulfillment in love. The loosening of tribal ties led to profound intellectual experiences, to the emancipation of the individual, to the discovery of new worlds of ethics and aesthetics, and to a personal re-interpretation of concepts of value which had originally been linked with society as a whole.

It was Caesar who most decidedly translated into reality these new tendencies. He was a man of action, like Scipio, Sulla or Marius, and more dangerous than all of them. Dignitas, which had originally been the earned rank of the individual within an organized hierarchy, was now granted absolute autonomy. In defense of his dignitas Caesar marched even against Rome. He was ready to rule the city of his fathers either with the senate or without it. 'We have utterly lost our Republic' (rem publicam funditus amisimus: Cic. Q. fr. 1. 2. 15). Cicero sensed the break in history, and tried to renew the spirit of the Republic by philosophical reflection, even undertaking to bind the dictator to its service. When it became clear that it was not Caesar who served the state, but the state that served Caesar, the honorable defenders of the old system thought they could prevent the spiritual revolution by destroying the person. But the Republic which they had 'saved' could not survive. Rome showed itself worthy neither of Caesar nor of his assassins. To assume the inheritance of the greatness which had been sacrificed on the altar of the commonwealth, there was no community left, just common people. The death of the Republic was sealed by the death of Cicero. Between the stolid voluptuary Antony and the cool calculator Octavian, no room was left for the intellectual. It was not a republican dagger, but a bureaucratic stroke of the pen, which laid him low. There were two murders, which in spite of their closeness in time, signal two different stages of history: one archaic, the other terrifyingly modern.

The youth, old beyond his years, who was heir to Caesar's property and name, but not to his delight in playing with fire, knew his Romans well. He knew that their hearts were ready for slavery, but not their ears. They would tolerate monarchy, but not the royal title and the purple garb. Accordingly, the revolution disguised itself as a restoration, the revolutionary as a reformer. Religion, the family, history, the offices of the Republic were guarded like national monuments. Representatives of the old houses, even sons of former adversaries, were promoted to the dignity of consul. The prudent ruler did not claim the title of dictator, which Caesar had made detestable, only that of first man in the state (princeps),—not by virtue of any office (potestas) but only on the basis of personal auctoritas. However, some of his letters and monuments speak a different language, that of monarchy and dynasty; and above all else he did not resign his claim to two crucial rights: the proconsular imperium, giving him the powers of supreme commander, and the tribunician power, conferring the right of veto—in the name of the people. But it was this still indeterminate position of the princeps in the constitution, allied of course to the final attainment of domestic peace, that at first gave a strong impulse to creative initiative and intellectual life.

Augustus had learned from his adoptive father that, along with soldiers, money was the second arcanum imperii. The richest man in Rome was well aware that it was necessary to secure the allegiance of the wealthy in order to produce stable social relationships. Where would the golden age of Augustus have been, without the gold of the knights?<sup>1</sup> Nobodies could become troop commanders. If a knight was not newly rich, but belonged to the ancient nobility, that was now remarkable and had to be stressed expressly. An example is Ovid, who however abandoned the senatorial career that had been open to him. With the promotion of former knights, a class entered the senate which previously had taken little interest in politics. It felt under an obligation to the man to whom it owed its new position. Such a senate could hardly display qualities of leadership, and leadership was not even expected. Although the senate gained certain new privileges, its traditional domain of foreign policy was lost. Important decisions were made by the princeps closeted with few advisers behind doors shut fast.

Yet Augustus gave the gift of peace to an exhausted world, and with that attained the chief end of all politics. In the first years of his sole rule, the general political climate was overwhelmingly marked by gratitude and happiness.

THE EMERGENCE OF LITERATURE

In one typically Roman respect—that practically no Roman author was a Roman—the Augustan period changed nothing. Virgil and Livy came (like Catullus) from Gallia Cisalpina, Horace (like Livius Andronicus and Ennius) from South Italy, Propertius (like Plautus) from Umbria. Tibullus was a Latin. Virgil and Horace were from relatively humble backgrounds, while the elegists belonged to the rural nobility. Rome continued to be the magnet which drew to itself from its ambience everything of value and distinction.

The princeps and many representatives of the nobility knew well their duties to their rank and to their native city in this regard.

---

<sup>1</sup> Qualified knights could now (in addition to the duties as jurors and officers previously open to them) rise, e.g. as procuratores Augusti to eminence in economic and financial administration. The significance of the individual orders now received fresh definition in accordance with their relation to the princeps (Alföldy, Sozialgeschichte 91; cf. also 106–109).

Augustus 'found Rome of brick and left it of marble' (Suet. Aug. 28. 5). His program of building was supervised by eminent experts, one of whom, Vitruvius, has left the only great work on architecture to survive from antiquity. The princeps made its composition possible by generous support. Among the ruler's foundations were also important libraries.

To speak of circles of poets is not to imply that these were closed associations. Maecenas, whose name will forever be linked with patronage of the arts, preferred to invite poets to join him who had already proved themselves. It was his 2nd work that Virgil dedicated to him (the Georgics), and Propertius his 2nd book. Maecenas encouraged the poets of his circle to write epics about Augustus. To ward off such suggestions, the Augustans employed the topoi of polite refusal (recusatio). As Callimacheans, they considered themselves unqualified to master a large-scale form. If homage to the mighty is interspersed in other literary genres, the recusatio may serve as a pretext to bring up the theme at all (Hor. odes 1. 6, on Agrippa). Maecenas was tolerant in allowing the poets he had befriended to remain true to their natures. Only Varius fulfilled his desire for an epic about Augustus, and he fell victim to oblivion. Virgil transcended Maecenas' wishes. His appreciation of the difficulty of the task led him to find a solution surpassing expectation. In spite of his successful police actions, Maecenas was not a minister of propaganda, and not indeed an arbiter elegantiarum. His own playful poetic products could not provide any rules for Augustan poetry but at the best could serve as dreadful warnings. While Augustus only let slip his stern Roman mask on his deathbed or, if the story is false, never, Maecenas, the Etruscan aristocrat, never bothered to conceal that he was a player from the first. His everlasting merit is to have afforded great poets the modest freedom which they needed.

By contrast, the group of poets around M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus shared a particular class-consciousness. It was here that Tibullus, Sulpicia, and Ovid were welcome. Against this background we can estimate the lack of social prejudice displayed by Maecenas. However, unlike Maecenas, Messalla patronized the talents of the young and unknown. His circle stood at a greater distance from the emperor. Ovid, married to the daughter of a distinguished senator, and consciously resigning a senatorial career, had no reason to think of himself as one of Caesar's 'clients'. Another group of authors deserving mention is formed by the friends whom Ovid memorializes in one of his poetic letters (Pont. 4. 16).

Poems were recited at private gatherings of knowledgeable friends. Such stimulating exchange of thoughts at the highest level was an inestimable advantage enjoyed by authors living in Rome, lending the unmistakable stamp of the metropolis even to the works of those who had come to the city from outside. There were also public recitals before larger audiences, and even pantomime presentations drawn from poetic texts, though the authors distanced themselves in part from these. Publishers took responsibility for circulating books by Roman authors both at Rome and throughout the Empire.

LATIN AND GREEK LITERATURE

In 28 B.C., Augustus opened in the temple of Apollo on the Palatine both a Greek and Latin library. This was a token of the equality attained by Latin, but also of the complete mutual permeation of Roman and Greek culture, at first, until and including the time of Trajan, with Latin in the forefront.

The Romans' encounter with Greek literature now entered a new stage. Under the Republic the very transference of a literary genre to Rome had been a creative act. In many areas, the Augustans now brought this evolution to an end. Epic, for example, which had long been practiced, now finally found organic unity of form. Eclogue, lyric and epistle in verse were the last to appear, and at once reached the summit. Genres which had evolved in Rome itself, such as satire and love elegy, were brought to perfection as well.

The great Augustans were weary of imitating Hellenistic literature. They looked back from the height of their own period and challenged great masters, ever more distant in time. Virgil at first followed Theocritus, then Aratus and Hesiod, and finally Homer. Horace turned to early Greek models. In the plastic arts too classical and archaizing tendencies are often observed during the Augustan period, mirroring the mood of the time, but also in correspondence with the 'official' character of particular works.<sup>1</sup> Horace, in whose life different spheres simultaneously intersected, followed, in accordance with his topic and inspiration, partly the 'regular' Hellenistic line in literature, but partly also took up the lyric poets of the early period. More than other Augustan poets, Ovid followed Hellenistic tradition. 'Classical' features may be detected, if at all, in his first masterpiece, the Amores. But after that, Alexandrianism becomes ever more visible. This is why Ovid opens the Imperial period, while Virgil and Horace, swimming against the contemporary stream, realized achievements hardly expected and even hardly conceivable in their day.

---

<sup>1</sup> SCHEFOLD (Kunst 79) remarks that in spite of its originality and depth, the Ara Pacis pretends to be a renewal of a primeval form.

In other respects too, Ovid was already a child of the new age. He consciously adhered to a Latin literary tradition, an attitude that would become more frequent under the emperors. This does not exclude of course the reception of some further stimulus from the Greeks, but by comparison with the Republican period the emphasis perceptibly changed.

An awareness of looking back to a Roman tradition is manifest in Varro's Roman Antiquities. Livy shaped the Roman past in powerful scenes and pictures. But all this could be written only once Roman authors had realized that the Republic was now at an end. The 'restoration' of the Republic and of old Roman religion under Augustus presupposed that both had died. In reality this 'restoration' was a new creation borrowing old forms.

Similarly Ovid transmitted Greek myth to posterity as a treasury of pictures; it had become manipulable because it belonged to a world already distant from the reader. With Augustus began the time in which our own age has its roots. Augustan literature acted as a prism, collecting the rays of the past to illumine the future.

GENRES

The heyday of prose under Caesar was followed by the Augustan acme of poetry. But there are significant exceptions to this rule. The blossoming of prose also witnessed Catullus and Lucretius, and that of poetry Livy. The metamorphoses of literature do not occur independently of historical shifts and changes. Certain genres disappear and others are transformed.

Social circumstances had altered, and the speech, losing its political function, retreated to the lecture room and auditorium. This development was sealed by the banishment of orators and the burning of books, achievements of the Augustan period fraught with consequences. The change of aim and public furthered the rise of an unclassical style of prose, while simultaneously poetry had its classical period. Speech was estranged from its own nature. No longer did it bring about decisions in real situations, but rather sought to impress an audience of connoisseurs, which fostered the pointed style. Correspondingly rhetoric became in one way a preparation for literary technique, influencing all types of literature, even the poetic. This may be seen at the latest in Ovid's Heroides, a new genre of literature in which characteristically prose and poetry cross paths. In another way rhetoric made an 'inner pilgrimage' to become the art by which an individual could influence and instruct himself through words. The line of development leading to Seneca the Younger began in the time of Augustus.

With the dawn of the Augustan period, historical writing had gained a new vantage point, and accordingly could seek a comprehensive view of the past. Its principal representative was Livy, patronized by Augustus although recognized by him as a Pompeian. It was no coincidence that historiography now severed its link with the senatorial milieu to which in the older generation Sallust and Asinius Pollio had belonged, and became the domain of a professional writer. In spite of the closeness of his early prose to poetry, Livy increasingly kept his distance from the extremes of the 'modern' style. As a classical author of history, he sought to follow closely Herodotus, Theopompus, and Cicero, and swam against the stream of modernistic prose and late Augustan poetry written in the Hellenistic manner. Universality, a teleological view of history, and a carefully thought out narrative art proceeding by dramatic scenes were features of the period. Pompeius Trogus, too, worked on an ecumenical scale.

Among technical works Vitruvius' invaluable treatise on architecture takes pride of place. Its origin is indivisibly linked with the experiences gathered by the author in the service of Augustus' great program of architecture, and recorded with the emperor's financial support. It is to Augustus' merit that we possess an authoritative work on architecture from antiquity at all.

Augustus likewise took pains to secure the cooperation of the jurists. In the administration of the Empire, a great future was in store for them. Just like Caesar, he used C. Trebatius Testa as his adviser. To A. Cascellius, who had declared gifts resulting from proscriptions to be invalid, he nevertheless offered a consulship, though without finding acceptance (Val. Max. 6. 2. 13; Dig. 1. 2. 2. 45). Even the great M. Antistius Labeo<sup>1</sup> persisted in opposition, quite unlike his rival Ateius Capito. Augustus limited the official ius respondendi to a narrow circle of highly qualified senatorial jurists (Dig. 1. 2. 2. 49). This meant that he brought the creation of law, not previously subject to official regulation, under his own control, at least in principle. The achievement of the classical jurists was the expert mastery of the individual case. They wrote for the most part case evaluations and commentaries. From the time of the late Republic on, Roman law experienced an admixture of Greek methodology, though systematic reflection was less in demand. Under the influence of Greek dialectics, early classical jurists still showed a certain predilection for definitions. Since jurists largely stood aloof from rhetorical considerations on aequitas, their Latin exhibits a refreshingly clear factuality and brevity, a quality destined to resist all the literary fashions of the following centuries.

Satire was tamed in another way, or rather, tamed itself. Horace was less concerned with social criticism than with finding the golden mean. The Satires center on what is satis, self-limitation and sufficiency. The Epistles, somewhat less down-to-earth, are concerned with recte, the right way of living. These poems have still to be appreciated at their full value. Their author discovered the domain to be later explored by Seneca in his Moral Epistles. Horace's Ars poetica was an epistle, but in this very genre ethics and aesthetics converged. (s. also Ideas I).

Conditions of space and time favored the birth of an epic of world rank. The Augustan order bore a share of Virgil's poetic invention. Unlike the epics of the archaic and silver periods, the Aeneid has only one principal hero, who, like the young Augustus, is primus inter pares. This was an advantage in securing the Aeneid's unity. Only the experience of the first years of the principate could have mediated this notion. In other respects too, the twenties, with their gratitude for the final attainment of peace and their still living hope in Rome's renewal, found an unrepeatable expression in the Aeneid.

---

<sup>1</sup> Labeo was deeply read in philosophy and rhetoric. He wrote both on the Twelve Tables and on the law of the pontifices. For later generations, his definitions acted as signposts, and in them he also displayed knowledge of the scholarly etymologies of his day. His commentaries on the edicts of the urban and peregrine praetors are often cited.

This work was 'classical', in harmony with the style of imperial art, but also with the mood of the times. At long last under Augustus Rome had found its measure. The dreams of expansion cherished by the age of Caesar were now only spoken of as possibilities. Measure and mean were in poetry, too, the great achievements of the age. It was to these ideas that Horace looked both in theory and practice.

The dramas of the Augustan period are lost, although they by no means lacked importance. Varius' Thyestes was produced at Augustus' victory celebration. Ovid's Medea would be praised even by Quintilian. In Horace's circle Aelius Lamia wrote praetextae, while Fundanius and probably also Aristius Fuscus took up comedy. Augustus himself composed an Ajax, though in a mood of self-criticism he allowed his hero to 'fall on a sponge'.

Didactic poetry no longer occupied, as it had even in Caesar's day, a place outside society. It identified itself either with Augustus' program of reform, as in the case of Virgil's Georgics, or with the social counterculture of love, exemplified in Ovid's Ars amatoria. Unlike Virgil and Horace, the elegists<sup>1</sup> enjoyed no profound connection with the Augustan state. Elegy flourished in the soil of the political indifference induced by Augustus. Tibullus rarely explored political themes, although he felt himself to be a vates. In him, as in Propertius, 'peace' is elegiac rather than Augustan. After harsh sufferings in his youth, which included the loss of a relative in Octavian's bloodbath at Perusia, Propertius gradually showed more openness to the regime, although he remained a pacifist and an opponent of the Julian laws on marriage. It was only with his 4th book that he became the poet of Roman aetia.

The youngest of the elegists, Ovid, had no experience of the civil wars, and accordingly felt no particular gratitude for the gift of the Augustan peace. Yet he did think himself particularly blessed to be a child of his time, though this was not for political or economic reasons, but rather because of the cultivated society of the capital which was his element. Heedless of the princeps' feelings, he pilloried the elevation of Caesar to godhead as an instance of human lack of moderation. He was proud that once, in the vicinity of his hometown, had lain the center of resistance to Rome during the Social War. He accepted the claim that now there was an age of gold—only insofar as in his time gold could buy anything. It was an irony of fate that the poet most deeply linked with the capital was expelled from it by a sentence of exile. Sedulous adulation of the princeps in the later works could not shorten the generous period he had been allocated for reflection. Augustus remained true to himself. At the beginning of his career he had shown no mercy to the greatest living writer of prose, and at the end he would do the same for the greatest still living poet. In forcing two men of the spirit whose nature was not that of heroes into martyrdom, he turned Cicero into the patron saint of Republicans, and Ovid into the prototype of the poet isolated from society. And yet the princeps remained a favorite of fortune. Even his mortal sins against literature somehow turned out for the best.

---

<sup>1</sup> The genre of epigram was well represented by Domitius Marsus, though unfortunately tradition failed to preserve his works.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE

Poetry attained classical perfection later than prose. Virgil realized an ideal of language combining simplicity with dignity. The small sympathy he was accorded at first for this is shown by Agrippa's remark that he had invented a new type of 'mixed metaphor' (κακόζηλον), made up of everyday words. Even in lofty epic, Virgil rather shunned the archaisms favored by Ennius. He was content with minor hints of archaizing color. Occasionally he employs a genitive in -ai, or confers on the demonstrative an old-fashioned sound (ollī), but taken as a whole his Latin is strikingly far from the motley manner of his predecessor. His tranquil and full-sounding language possesses an organic unity, and so does his style. His sentences display a clear and structured sequence, often spilling over the end of the verse, equally removed from Ennius' jolts as from Ovid's dancing.

Horace's language is more colorful. The vocabulary of the Satires is somewhat cruder than that of the Odes, but there are many links; and certain odes are rich in strongly expressive words, wrongly regarded as 'unpoetic'. Metrically there is a marked difference between the comparative looseness of the satirical hexameters and the strictness of those in lyric vein. The rhythm of Horace's verse shows unsurpassed variety and subtlety.

The language and style of the elegists display individual differences. Tibullus is a purist, using limited vocabulary and strict meter to produce sounds of angelic refinement and beauty of a kind previously unknown in Latin. The passionate, taut, and concentrated style of Propertius is filled with contrasts, colorful and less uniform. With Ovid, what was once the language of Roman farmers attained the lightness and the élan of witty antithesis suited to a metropolis.

In the Augustan elegists, the elegiac couplet, which had not quite matched the refinement of the hexameter in the late Republican period, reached perfection. This shift of phases in the perfection of the two meters explains why the Amores deserve the title 'classical' more than the Metamorphoses.

Prose of the Augustan period is not at all monolithic. In his early books, matching the variety of his themes, Livy writes in a somewhat poetic manner. Later, he approaches a Ciceronian ideal of style. The path he traveled therefore, like that of Virgil, was from a Hellenistic style to a classical style. Augustus himself was, in language, a classicist. Vitruvius' voice was that of a technical expert concerned more with things than with words. However, all those mentioned here as prose writers were no longer quite up to date in their period. The future belonged to the declaimers quoted by the Elder Seneca and their pointed style which, with Ovid, was to conquer poetry and, with the Younger Seneca, philosophical prose.

IDEAS I REFLECTIONS ON LITERATURE

Perhaps the most fascinating contribution of the Augustan period to the history of literature and ideas was the act of creating and developing an independent idea of the poet. The leisure to reflect encouraged by the newly gained peace, the transitory equilibrium between private and public worlds and the still fluid boundaries of power in the early Augustan period made it possible for poets to determine independently their intellectual vantage-point in the new society. Virgil thought of himself as a priest of the Muses. With mingled pride and humility he set at the end of the Georgics his Neapolitan otium against the victories of the conquerer. In the 4th Eclogue and in the Aeneid Virgil gave free rein to his claim to be a poet prophet. Since he lived in a time when historical expectations were fulfilled, he could view past, present and future together. By contrast, in Republican epic the present was dominant, and in that of the Empire, the past.

Horace, who was also a priest of the Muses, dared as the poet of the carmen saeculare to claim moral authority for himself, and even maintain that he was useful to Rome. The poet had an important role in society. His freedom from ties to political or economic activity left him open to the divine, and to his vocation to guide the younger generation towards proper respect. His lyric was more than personal, without denying the person. Tensions between Stoic love of country and Epicurean withdrawal, between the finely nuanced homages to Augustus in the first three books of Odes and the greater directness in the fourth, do not alter the fact that the recovery of the sacred claim of lyric was made possible by the Augustan period. The idea of the poet matured in this age, but was not bound to it. Horace was aware that the memorial raised by his work would outlast pyramids and pharaohs.

At the same time with his Ars poetica and Letter to Augustus he utters some sober words of warning. He praises technique, conscientious work, self-criticism. For unteachable fools, who think of themselves as geniuses, he has nothing but ridicule. He assails the customary canonization of the old at the expense of the contemporary, and has bitter words for the Romans who yesterday were honorable philistines but today dabble without scruple in every area of literature, amateurs exempted from criticism by their wealth.

Tibullus sees himself as a vates. Propertius and Ovid are proud of their ingenium. The 'playful' Ovid insists on renewing, with surprising seriousness, the old notion of inspiration. As a result of his banishment from his beloved city of Rome, he anticipates willy-nilly the modern experience of the writer's isolation. The talent (ingenium) on which he is thrown back forms, in combination with his world-wide public, a counterpart to the central power. In this regard the princeps cannot touch him. Ovid's sincerest belief is in poetry. The equilibrium between the two realms sought by Horace and Virgil is shattered. For all coming generations the Augustans experienced, suffered and pondered poetry and the poet's fate in the entire gamut of its variations. This is why later great lyric, whether that of Ronsard, Pushkin or Hölderlin, can seek guidance from Horace, and the poetry of exile even down to our own days from Ovid.

Livy was an author and no more than an author. At the level of prose, he offered a modest though instructive parallel to Augustan poetry. While Sallust as a senator had transferred the old Roman notion of glory to literature and there lent it spiritual depth, in Livy's prefaces the reader is looking over the shoulder of a professional writer, composing history though himself not a politician and simply offering to his time 'examples' for contemplation. The reader experiences with him the growth of his gigantic work, and assists at the moments when in Livy's eyes the unmastered material rather than diminishing, seemed to keep expanding beyond control. We hear the author's early admission that his spirit becomes itself 'ancient', as it sinks more deeply into ancient times, and his late declaration that the untiring writer, now that his desire for fame has long been satisfied, is carried forward only by his unquiet spirit.

IDEAS II

Individual, state, and the natural world form for the Romans three concentric circles, each following its own laws. In Virgil's Aeneid, the second of these rings, the very heart of the traditional Roman outlook on the world, shines for one more time with almost unreal beauty. But an indirect consequence of the principate was the increasing indifference to politics on the part of many men of education, especially of the generation which had not experienced the civil wars. The traditional world of the Romans, the res publica, was losing its attractiveness. This meant more than a loss for poetry. It also offered an opportunity. At least since the days of Catullus and Lucretius great individual writers had begun to explore the secrets of their own inner world and of the external world of nature. There was a fruitful exchange between these spheres: as expected, the vocabulary of political life was extended to new realms. A word like foedus ('alliance') was transferred in one direction to the bond of love, and in another to the union of atoms. New systems of relationships received emphasis. In the elegists this meant the personal sphere, in the epic writers nature. Virgil in writing the Georgics, Ovid, Germanicus, Manilius each reflected nature in different philosophical shades. The definition of man as a being who looks up to the sky was taken seriously once more. In the Metamorphoses natural philosophy was joined with erotic and psychological interest. In many ways, this late Augustan epic opened the Imperial period.

New questions produced new answers. Philosophical and religious views now came to exercise fascination. Retreating from the hurly burly of political life, already in the late Republican period many had sought refuge in the safe haven of Epicurean philosophy: for example, Lucretius and Cicero's restless friend Atticus. Even Augustans were touched by the philosophy of pleasure. As a young man, Virgil spent time on the Gulf of Naples with the Epicurean Siro, and traces of that doctrine are still found in the Aeneid. Horace describes himself as 'a pig from Epicurus' sty' (epist. 1. 4. 16). Neo-Pythagoreanism had been at home in Rome since the days of Nigidius Figulus, and it now left its mark on the apocalyptic portions of the Aeneid and Metamorphoses. It was congenial with the late republican yearning for redemption and the resigned mood of the late Augustan period. Principally however, in spite of official counter-measures, mystery religions gradually began to prevail at Rome, at first particularly among women. To please his female readers, Ovid treats the divinities of mystery, such as Isis, with more respect than the Olympian gods. From Augustus on, politics as the highest vocation of life would belong for most Romans to the past. The future was reserved for philosophy and religion. But the answers given there were motley and contradictory.

Human intellect, feeling or will could approach philosophy and religion in different ways. The distinction made by the Roman scholar Varro (apud Aug. civ. 6. 5), perhaps in succession to the Stoics, is helpful here. He had divided 'theology', a discipline still at that time including physics, into three categories. When indulging in theoretical speculation, an educated Roman followed theologia rationalis or naturalis, with its physical and scientific picture of the world usually favoring an abstract monotheism. In practical affairs the same Roman was guided by theologia civilis, which was taken for granted as the basis of public order. This was partly made up of ancient rituals, and partly aimed at exalting the ruler of the day. Finally, in his poetic world of ideas, our Roman continued to enjoy theologia fabulosa, myth and its anthropomorphic polytheism, even though he knew that the old three-storeyed picture of the world, for all its psychological plausibility, was scientifically out of date. Varro omitted a fourth power, although religiously it was perhaps the most significant, that of the mystery religions. Such coexistence of several 'theologies', although in principle only one could claim truth, might lead the sober observer to skeptical relativism, but in poets it could produce bold bridges between the realms, and a new creation of myths. To understand the mentality of the time, its many layers must be borne in mind.

The 'restoration' of the old Roman religion of state by Augustus bore at first romantic features. The yearning for peace in late republican times fostered a religious mood, and the man who had fulfilled it aroused messianic hopes. This brings the reader to an aspect of Augustan literature which today is distasteful and even repellent: the beginnings of emperor worship. The excellence of many relevant texts forbids us to see in them only courtly flattery. Certainly in the first Augustans gratitude for the new gift of peace was genuine. Following Hellenistic panegyric, Augustus was cautiously compared with Apollo, Mercury, and Jupiter. His role as redeemer was reflected in demigods like Romulus, Hercules, and Bacchus. On occasion in their poetry, Virgil and Horace seem to be ahead of the actual evolution of the worship of Augustus at Rome. More than for us moderns, for the men of antiquity a deity was experienced in action; hence, in the notion of god, the idea of function prevailed over the idea of substance. A mortal bestower or preserver of life may therefore, for those he has saved, become a god. In the first and last books of the Metamorphoses, Augustus, the political master of the world, is a figure analogous to Jupiter, the ruler of the world of nature. This does not involve any personal attitude towards Augustus the man. The ruler was the guarantor of public order. It is from this point of view that the later contribution made by Ovid during his banishment to the topoi of emperor worship becomes intelligible. A pagan god need not be good. It is enough that men 'completely depend' on him. The Christian opposition of church and state—not to mention a modern and secular notion of the state—was far from the Augustans' thoughts.

The coldness of official religion could not satisfy mind and heart. In providing a philosophical basis for citizenship of the world, for behavior directed to the community and to the service of the state, as the Augustans wished to celebrate them, it was the Stoa principally that supplied arguments. This is attested by the Aeneid and by certain odes of Horace.

Without artistic shaping, ideas are robbed of effect. The astonishing thing is that in the Augustan period myth gained new poetic life, and indeed from two sides. Myth, the peculiar realm of poetry, had at least since Hellenistic times become a purely literary medium and largely lost its religious background. Virgil's achievement deserves therefore all the more admiration, for it was he who in the Aeneid produced a new myth which would feed the imagination of almost two thousand years. The myth created by Virgil was an enrichment of theologia fabulosa from the realm of theologia civilis, also aided by the power of individual feeling of great tenderness and profundity. A further stage in the regeneration of myth occurred in the late Augustan period. It sounds paradoxical to say that the Metamorphoses, written by a worldly denizen of the capital, mediated Greek myth to the West. But this work's universal accessibility is a result of the fact that here myth was given fresh life, not by any ritual or political connections, but by the erotic and artistic inspiration of an individual.

A counterpart in prose to this was Livy's creation of a storehouse of pictures of Roman history. In the hand of this talented writer the personages of ancient Rome were turned into clearly stamped exempla of civic and political behavior. They were fruitful for European culture right down to the advent of international law in modern times.

Bibl.: To be consulted in the first place: the relevant volumes of ANRW (e.g. 2, 30, 1-3; 2, 31, 1-4) as well as G. BINDER, ed. (s. below).

VON ALBRECHT, Prose. * VON ALBRECHT, Poesie. * VON ALBRECHT, Rom. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Der Mensch in der Krise. Aspekte augusteischer Dichtung, Freiburg 1981. * M. VON ALBRECHT, ed., Augusteische Zeit (in: Die römische Literatur in Text und Darstellung), Stuttgart 1987. * J.-M. ANDRÉ, Mécène. Essai de biographie spirituelle, Paris 1967. * H. ANTONY, Humor in der augusteischen Dichtung. Lachen und Lächeln bei Horaz, Propertius, Tibull und Vergil, Hildesheim 1976. * J. BAYET, A. ROSTAGNI, V. PÖSCHL, F. KLINGNER, P. BOYANCÉ, L. P. WILKINSON, L'influence grecque sur la poésie latine de Catulle à Ovide, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt), vol. 2, Vandœuvres-Genève 1953. * G. BINDER, Aeneas und Augustus. Interpretationen zum 8. Buch der Aeneis, Meisenheim 1971. * G. BINDER, ed., Saeculum Augustum, 3 vols., Darmstadt 1987-1991 (= WdF 266; 512; 632). * K. BÜCHNER, Die römische Lyrik, Stuttgart 1976. * E. BURCK, Die Rolle des Dichters und der Gesellschaft in der augusteischen Dichtung, in: E. BURCK, Vom Menschenbild in der römischen Literatur, vol. 2, Heidelberg 1981, 307-334. * K. CHRIST, Römische Geschichte und Wissenschaftsgeschichte, vol. 1: Römische Republik und augusteischer Principat, Darmstadt 1982. * K. CHRIST, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit. Von Augustus bis zu Konstantin, München 1988, esp. 47-177. * A. DALZELL, Maecenas and the Poets, Phoenix 10, 1956, 151-162. * H. J. DIESNER, Augustus und sein Tatenbericht. Die Res gestae Divi Augusti in der Vorstellungswelt ihrer und unserer Zeit, Klio 67, 1985, 35-42. * E. DOBLHOFER, Horaz und Augustus, ANRW 2, 31, 3, 1981, 1922-1986. * C. HABICHT, Die augusteische Zeit und das erste Jh. nach Christi Geburt, in: W. DEN BOER, ed., Le culte des souverains dans l'Empire romain, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 19, Vandœuvres-Genève 1973, 41-88.

- * L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1447–1560. * K. GALINSKY, Augustan Culture. An Interpretive Introduction, Princeton 1996. * R. HEINZE, Die augusteische Kultur, ed. by A. KÖRTE, Leipzig 1930. * A. H. M. JONES, Augustus, London 1970. * D. KIENAST, Augustus. Prinzeps und Monarch, Darmstadt 1982. * KLINGNER, Geisteswelt. * KLINGNER, Studien. * F. KLINGNER, Virgil, Zürich 1967. * KROLL, Studien. * W. KUNKEL, Über das Wesen des augusteischen Prinzipats, Gymnasium 68, 1961, 353–370. * E. LEFÈVRE, Die unaugusteischen Züge der augusteischen Literatur, in: G. BINDER, ed., Saeculum Augustum 2, 173–196. * E. LEFÈVRE, ed., Monumentum Chiloniense. Studien zur augusteischen Zeit. FS E. BURCK, Amsterdam 1975. * D. LITTLE, Politics in Augustan Poetry, ANRW 2, 30, 1, 1982, 254–370. * H. MAUCH, O laborum dulce lenimen. Funktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur römischen Dichtung zwischen Republik und Prinzipat am Beispiel der ersten Odensammlung des Horaz, Frankfurt 1986. * H. D. MEYER, Die Außenpolitik des Augustus und die Augusteische Dichtung, Köln 1961. * J. K. NEWMAN, Augustus and the New Poetry, Bruxelles 1967. * J. K. NEWMAN, The Concept of vates in Augustan Poetry, Bruxelles 1967. * V. PÖSCHL, Horaz und die Politik, SHAW 1956, 4; 2nd ed. 1963. * V. PÖSCHL, Die Hirtendichtung Virgils, Heidelberg 1964. * V. PÖSCHL, Horazische Lyrik, Heidelberg 1970. * V. PÖSCHL, Die Dichtkunst Virgils, (1950; Engl. translation Ann Arbor 1962) Berlin 3rd ed. (rev.) 1977. * V. PÖSCHL, Vergil und Augustus, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, 709–727. * K. QUINN, The Poet and his Audience in the Augustan Age, ANRW 2, 30, 1, 1982, 75–180. * K. A. RAAFLAUB, M. TOHER, eds., Between Republic and Empire. Interpretations of Augustus and his Principate, Berkeley 1990. * D. O. ROSS, Backgrounds to Augustan Poetry. Gallus, Elegy, and Rome, Cambridge 1975. * E. SCHÄFER, Die Wende zur augusteischen Literatur. Vergils Georgica and Octavian, Gymnasium 90, 1983, 77–101. * W. SCHMITTHENNER, ed., Augustus, Darmstadt 1969; 2nd ed. 1985 (= WdF 128). * W. Y. SELLAR, The Roman Poets of the Augustan Age. Horace and the Elegiac Poets, Oxford 1891, repr. 1924. * E. SIMON, Augustus. Kunst und Leben in Rom um die Zeitenwende, München 1986. * E. SIMON, Ara Pacis Augustae, Tübingen 1967. * H.-P. STAHL, Propertius: Love and War. Individual and State under Augustus, Berkeley 1985. * I. STAHLMANN, Imperator Caesar Augustus, Darmstadt 1988. * Syme, Revolution. * A. THILL, Alter ab illo. Recherches sur l'imitation dans la poésie personnelle à l'époque augustéenne, Paris 1979. * K. VIERNEISEL and P. ZANKER, Die Bildnisse des Augustus. Herrscherbild und Politik im kaiserlichen Rom, München 1978. * A. WLOSOK, Die römische Klassik: zur 'Klassizität' der augusteischen Poesie, in: W. VOSSKAMP, ed., Klassik im Vergleich. Normativität und Historizität europäischer Klassiken, Stuttgart 1990, 331–347; 433–435. * P. ZANKER, Forum Augustum, Tübingen sine anno (1969). * P. ZANKER, Forum Romanum. Die Neugestaltung durch Augustus, Tübingen 1972. * P. ZANKER, Augustus und die Macht der Bilder, München 1987. * E. ZINN, Die Dichter des alten Rom und die Anfänge des Weltgedichts, in: H. OPPERMANN, ed., Römertum, Darmstadt 3rd ed. 1970, 155–187. * E. ZINN, Viva vox, Frankfurt 1994.

II. POETRY

A. EPIC, DIDACTIC, BUCOLIC

ROMAN BUCOLIC

General Remarks

Bucolic or pastoral is one of the most fascinating and mysterious branches of poetry, even one of the most contradictory. It emphasizes its own simplicity, and yet can seek to encompass the most exalted subjects. In the last analysis, it has popular roots, and yet it has always been a particularly artistic genre. It seems occasionally to withdraw from reality, and yet it is its constant concern to come to terms with reality.

To bucolic belong specific types of situation and poem, and these are found for the most part prefigured in the Sicilian poet Theocritus of the 3rd century B.C. (s. Greek Background). The basic theme of 'singing shepherds' displays different facets. There may be poetry about poetry. The shepherds may be inspired by love. Sometimes, the panorama of shepherd life may take in that of the countryside in general. It may focus on the historical situation in the narrower sense (evictions) and even view history as a whole. In disguised form the poets may speak of themselves, though perhaps less of their lives than of their creations.

With Virgil tender pastel tones and a mysterious ambivalence become typical of the genre. The poet elicits from his apparently simple range of themes an unending wealth of nuances. To read the many facets of bucolic as mere biographical allegory, or to reduce it in other ways to some fixed literary denominator, is to be satisfied with partial aspects and to miss the enjoyment of a unique polyphony. Sicily, Italy, with their landscape, inhabitants and creatures are indeed present, but there is also the air of larger history breathing through the work. All this finds resonance in a language whose musicality was previously unimaginable in Latin. In the center is found the poet's soul and its feelings, now gentle, now passionate; and from them a new poetic universe arises, not to replace that of reality but to illumine it. A minor genre assumes greatness.

Greek Background

Typical elements of later pastoral poetry are already found in Theocritus: shepherds in conversation (id. 4); in poetic rivalry (Βουκολιασται: id. 5, 6, 8, and 9); poetry about poetry (Θαλύσια: id. 7; the queen of eclogues); exaltation of nature and the song honoring the death of the shepherd Daphnis (Θύρσις ἢ ᾠδή: id. 1); the sorceresses (Φαρμακεύτριαι: id. 2); the lover's ditty or Παρακλαυσίθυρον (id. 3; cf. 11). Furthermore, there is already found the later increasingly important theme of eulogy of the ruler (cf. esp. id. 17: an encomium in verse). In Virgil the topoi of the Golden Age will be added.

In the light of masterpieces like the seventh Idyll and the quite close thematic links between Virgil and Theocritus, the reader has no hesitation in describing Theocritus as the founder of Bucolic. Yet qualifications are necessary. Just as satire, in spite of Lucilius, only became a genre with Horace, so did pastoral with Virgil. Moreover, each of the Roman bucolic poets emphasized different aspects, with the result that, even after Virgil, the uniformity of the genre is only partially fixed.

Theocritus' picture of his shepherds is humorous, distanced by a light irony. The 'sentimental' outlook of the city dweller, a perspective which the modern reader associates with the notion of idyll, comes into view more strongly only after Theocritus, as, for example, in Moschus, Bion, and the spurious later pieces in the corpus Theocriteum.

From the imperial period, a pastoral romance by Longus (Daphnis and Chloe) has been preserved, whose influence has hardly been less than that of the major bucolic poets.

Roman Development

In the early Augustan period pastoral fits a mood of the times, a manner which may be observed also in the arts.<sup>1</sup> In literature pastoral features are found even outside pastoral poetry, especially, for example, in Tibullus' elegies. Pastoral unites with 'georgic' elements, such as reminiscence of Rome's earliest days, the restoration of the Italian peasantry and old Roman devotion. It is now that it acquires its kinship with the idea of the Golden Age.

<sup>1</sup> E. SIMON, Augustus. Kunst und Leben in Rom um die Zeitenwende, München 1986, 206-210.

Virgil set a new stamp on the genre by reducing its crudely realistic elements. Irony loses its cutting edge, and tender poetic feeling smooths the sharp angles. A subtle art of indirect presentation prevails. Considered solely as a collection, the ten Eclogues form a self-contained work of art, and yet the range of themes is broadened, so that even the hardships of the day find entry to the pastoral. In a serious and critical way Virgil takes note of the suffering brought by politics upon men in his time. The motif of 'imperial eulogy' is not developed without counterpoint. The gratitude of Tityrus to his 'god' is balanced by the lament of Meliboeus who has lost his home. In the fourth Eclogue, messianic hopes are heard, and the poem consciously bursts the old framework of the genre. Along with the historical changes taking place, both the power and powerlessness of poetry in times of distress form a persistent theme. It is as if Virgil observed all the principal motifs of bucolic poetry in the light of the sublime seventh Idyll and through the prism of his own experience of the present.

In Nero's time imperial eulogy becomes less complex. Calpurnius and the Einsiedeln Eclogues bestow on pastoral a changed orientation. At the same time georgic and didactic elements<sup>1</sup> are resumed with greater emphasis.

In the 3rd century Nemesianus gives fresh life to the genre in a non-political sense and, among other things, makes it the vessel of his personal struggle for redemption, in parallel to the adoption of elements of imperial apotheosis into the private sphere, as they may be observed in contemporary pastoral scenes found on sarcophagi.<sup>2</sup>

With the advent of Christianity the idea of the shepherd acquired new significance. Endeleichius wrote an eclogue which preserved the pastoral background while giving a superficial Christian color to the content. It is the cross that protects the herd from sickness. Conversely, Paulinus of Nola treated a Christian topic, the birthday of St. Felix of Nola, in his Natalicia with many bucolic and georgic touches.

<sup>1</sup> E.g. Calp. 5; the shepherd's tasks.

<sup>2</sup> G. BINDER in: B. EFFE, G. BINDER 1989, 150-153 following N. HIMMELMANN 1980.

Literary Technique

The typical literary technique of pastoral is the amoebaic song of shepherds. Different types of poem were already listed above (s. under General Remarks).

There is a marked interest in character. In Virgil's 1st Eclogue Tityrus and Meliboeus incorporate opposed temperaments. Their contrasting nature serves at the same time to give expression to opposed views of the world. In the same way, Galatea and Amaryllis represent two antithetical female characters.

A typical procedure in discourse is the listing of examples, or priamel (e.g. Verg. eccl. 7. 65–68). Similes are mostly taken from country life (e.g. eccl. 1. 22–25), thus preserving the aptum.

From at least Virgil's time on, the collection of poems in itself became a work of art (s. Virgil, Literary Technique). Poems related in form (such as the amoebaic song of shepherds) appear in the first and second halves of the book under opposing auspices (eccl. 3 and 7) and with different emphasis. Addressees play a structural role. The character of Gallus (eccl. 6 and 10) frames the second half of the book. The same may be said of motifs. Two 'Roman' eclogues (1 and 4) surround two particularly 'Theocritean' examples (2 and 3, mirrored by 7 and 8). The sequence 4–5 and 9–10 displays in each case a transition from contemporary history to the discussion of poetry.<sup>1</sup>

A recurrent question in the study of the Eclogues is that of numerical proportion. The possibility that Virgil may have had proportion in mind cannot be excluded on a priori grounds. In the 1st Eclogue, the iuuenis occupies a central position, not simply from the point of view of content, but also from that of form. The best course however is to be content with such obvious facts, and not to press everything into some numerical pattern.

In other respects, too, the most difficult part of interpretation is to maintain a sense of proportion. Different answers are given, for example, to the question of how far the Eclogues are to be read as allegories. There is no doubt that Virgil sometimes uses his shepherds as masks. It is tempting to some degree to identify Tityrus with Virgil himself (Serv. eccl. 1. 1), and something similar may be said of Menalcas (eccl. 5. 86–87; eccl. 9). But is not Meliboeus, too (eccl. 1), a part of him? These manifold refractions already forbid the assumption of consistently coherent allegory. Servius (ibid.) himself advises a prudent reserve: et hoc loco Tityri sub persona debemus Vergilium accipere; non tamen ubique, sed tantum ubi exigit ratio, 'and in this instance we have to understand Virgil in the guise of Tityrus; not everywhere, however, but only where the thought demands it'. One should indeed be careful of reversing the artistic achievement of the poet, which lies after all in the transcendence of the merely biographical. Could Virgil guess that it would not only be his famous riddle (ecl. 3. 104–105) that would bring so many curious scholars to the point of despair? We are confronted with a consciously polyvalent type of art, and there is no pedantry. Yet in the later history of the genre, allegory plays a significant part. Petrarch himself offers a commentary on his own bucolic poems.

<sup>1</sup> Freely adapted from C. BECKER, Virgils Eklogenbuch, Hermes 83, 1955, 314–349 and R. KETTEMANN 1977, 74.

Language and Style

In Theocritus the Doric dialect serves as a subtle means of character portrayal and differentiation. This nuanced art was already reduced by his Greek successors to a relatively neutral compromise.

Latin knew no equally privileged literary dialects, and this feature of Theocritus' poetry could hardly find imitation. Virgil dares at times to echo popular idiom, as with cuium pecus (instead of cuius). But the Romans of the capital, so priggish in matters of language, would not allow even their greatest poet to get away with this. They made fun: Dic mihi, Damoeta: 'cuium pecus' anne Latinum?, 'Tell me, Damoetas, is cuium pecus Latin?' (Vita Donati 181 Hardie). In these circumstances, it is not surprising that vulgarisms occur in Virgil only as trace elements.

Virgil writes an apparently simple and everyday language, whose artistic nature is observed only on second glance. When Agrippa jibed that Virgil had discovered a new type of κακόζηλον ('mixed metaphor'), consisting of everyday words (Vita Don. 185 Hardie), his malice was matched by his sharp eye.

At times, the style rises to solemn elevation, as in the 4th Eclogue. In the line ending magnum Iovis incrementum, 'Jove's great augmenting seed' (ecl. 4. 49), the rare fifth-foot spondee is consciously introduced as a token of gravitas.

A characteristic of pastoral poetry is the musical flow of the language. The refrain attracts attention,<sup>1</sup> but other forms of repetition are particularly marked, such as resumptions of the type ite meae quondam felix pecus, ite, capellae, 'onward, my little goats, once happy flock, onward' (Virg. ecl. 1. 74).

<sup>1</sup> R. SCHILLING, Le refrain dans la poésie latine, in: Musik und Dichtung, FS V. Pöschl, Heidelberg 1990, 117–131.

The language of Calpurnius is influenced by the purity and simplicity of Virgil's style. Only occasionally does he venture pointed sallies in conformity with the baroque taste of the time ('Without you, lilies seem to me black' Calp. 3. 51). Nemesianus shows himself as an author of eloquence. He gives to the genre, without destroying its character, a lightly rhetorical impetus. Endelevchius (about A.D. 400) uses the second Asclepiad for pastoral, a proof of the mingling of the genres in late antiquity. He is not even afraid to bring into his poetry words of prosaic origin such as purificatio.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

In principle, Virgil sets the literary level of pastoral 'low', matching the stunted bushes of the pastoral landscape (cf. Verg. ecl. 4. 2 humilesque myricae). Servius remarks (ecl. p. 1. 16 Thilo): humilis character. Yet this means no loss of quality.<sup>1</sup> If greater elevation is attempted, this is an exception (ecl. 4. 1, cf. also Calp. 4. 10–11). In order to preserve their humble personae, Calpurnius makes his shepherds read a political promise from the tree bark on which a god has carved it (deus ipse canit: Calp. 1. 29).

The problem of the influence of poetry in a time of distress is also considered (Virg. ecl. 9). Its capacity to change external circumstances is not rated highly, though not actually disputed. Its effectiveness in real life as love charm (ecl. 8) in courtship (Calp. 3) or at least as consolation is unambiguous.<sup>2</sup>

Pastoral poetry takes as its theme singing shepherds, and to that extent is also poetry about poetry.<sup>3</sup> The omnipresence of Theocritus' programmatic Idyll 7 in Virgil's Eclogues speaks volumes. In the 5th Eclogue, Daphnis is a poet who has become immortal, but the poem is also an explanation of the cultural relevance of feasts. Feasts keep alive cultural creativity, although—or because?—they are celebrated in honor of the dead. In this sense, the succession from poet to poet (eccl. 2. 36–38) gains deeper significance. Virgil's apotheosis of Daphnis is renewed in the divinization of Virgil himself by his successor Calpurnius<sup>1</sup> (4. 70), and that of Meliboeus by Nemesianus (1 passim). To Virgil are ascribed the gifts of Orpheus (Calp. 4. 65–67; cf. the hope expressed at Virg. ecl. 4. 55–57). But the songs of Calpurnius' shepherds have a similar effect on animals and landscape, even when their themes are unpolitical (2. 10–20). The poet of the Eclogues humbles himself, yet on closer inspection is revealed as a divine vates, as a prophet.

<sup>1</sup> Si canimus silvas, silvae sint consule dignae (ecl. 4. 3).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the refrain at Nem. 4. 19 etc. levant et carmina curas; Endelevch. AL 893. 12 prodest sermo doloribus.

<sup>3</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1972 and 1987.

Ideas II

Even in eclogues the link with reality and time takes precedence over purely literary imitation. Moreover, Virgil already links bucolic and 'georgic' elements.<sup>2</sup> The reality of farming finds didactic expression in Calpurnius, and Calpurnius also undertakes the description of games.

The negative aspects of a political present oppressive to the individual make their way into Virgil's pastoral poetry, and rescue it from the temptation to provide merely a convenient escape from reality. What is more, Virgil gives to his Eclogues a messianic emphasis. The notion of the Golden Age, introduced by him into eclogue, was resumed as early as Nero's time.<sup>3</sup> Eclogue was made by Virgil a vehicle of reflections on the philosophy of history. Yet the world of shepherds, and bucolic poetry as a genre, lie further from utopia than we might have assumed.<sup>4</sup>

The theme of the ruler's godhead is only delicately sounded in Virgil's Eclogues, and developed in more detail in Calpurnius. By implication, however, these poets are still able to maintain their intellectual independence. Along with the emperor, Calpurnius also

<sup>1</sup> In Calpurnius, the dignity of the poet's art is preserved. Virgil, not merely the emperor, is elevated to divine status. A different line is taken in Einsiedeln Eclogue 1. 43–49: Homer conducts Nero's coronation as poet, and Virgil personally destroys his own works.

<sup>2</sup> R. KETTEMANN 1977.

<sup>3</sup> In addition to Calpurnius, cf. Carm. Einsidl. 2. Caution in applying the motif of the Golden Age is recommended by E. A. SCHMIDT 1987, 14–16. On Virgil's 4th Eclogue and its relation to pastoral cf. R. KETTEMANN 1977, 71–76 (with bibl.).

<sup>4</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1987.

divinizes Virgil, while Nemesianus replaces the apotheosis of the emperor by that of the rustic singer Meliboeus.<sup>1</sup> This remarkable act of privatization is accompanied in the course of time by a consecration. Nemesianus' 3rd Eclogue, varying the framework of Virgil's 6th Eclogue, is an impressive hymn to Bacchus, and this Dionysiac element in bucolic poetry is something new. A certain Pomponius, in close dependence on Virgil's 1st Eclogue, makes Tityrus instruct Meliboeus in the Christian faith.<sup>2</sup> With the loss of its polyphony, eclogue poetry loses a characteristic quality of its poetic charm.

Concordance: M. KORN, W. SLABY, Concordantia in carmina bucolica. Lemmatisierte Computerkonkordanz zur römischen Bukolik (Vergil, Calpurnius Siculus, Carmina Einsidlensia, Nemesian) und zu den Cynegetica des Grattius und Nemesian, Hildesheim 1992.

W. ARLAND, Nachtheokritische Bukolik bis an die Schwelle der lateinischen Bukolik, diss. Leipzig 1937. * L. CASTAGNA, I bucolici latini minori. Una ricerca di critica testuale, Firenze 1976. * CURTIUS, Europäische Lit. 191–209 ('Die Ideallandschaft'). * B. EFFE, ed., Theokrit und die griechische Bukolik (= WdF 580), Darmstadt 1986 (collection of articles, bibl.). * B. EFFE, G. BINDER, Die antike Bukolik. Eine Einführung, München 1989 (there EFFE's earlier works and further bibl.). * K. GARBER, ed., Europäische Bukolik und Georgik, Darmstadt 1976 (collection of articles, bibl.). * D. M. HALPERIN, Before Pastoral: Theocritus and the Ancient Tradition of Bucolic Poetry, New Haven 1983. * N. HIMMELMANN, Über Hirten-Genre in der antiken Kunst, Opladen 1980. * R. KETTEMANN, Bukolik und Georgik. Studien zur Affinität bei Vergil und später, Heidelberg 1977. * K. KUBUSCH, Aurea Saecula: Mythos und Geschichte, Frankfurt 1986. * B. LUISELLI, Studi sulla poesia bucolica latina, AFLC 28, 1960, 1–102. * M. C. MITTELSTADT, Longus: Daphnis and Chloe and the Pastoral Tradition, C&M 27, 1966, 162–177. * E. PANOFKY, Et in Arcadia ego: Poussin und die Elegische Tradition (s. K. GARBER, ed., 271–305). * Wolfg. SCHMID, Tityrus christianus (s. K. GARBER, ed., 44–121). * Wolfg. SCHMID, Bukolik, in: RLAC 2, 1954, 786–800. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Poetische Reflexion. Vergils Bukolik, München 1972. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Bukolische Leidenschaft oder über antike Hirtenpoesie, Frankfurt 1987. * H. C. SCHNUR, R. KÖSSLING, eds., Die Hirtenflöte. Bukolische Dichtungen von Vergil bis Geßner (a good selection, TrN), Leipzig 1978. * G. SCHÖNBECK, Der locus amoenus von Homer bis Horaz, diss. Heidelberg 1962. * C. SEGAL, Poetry and Myth in Ancient Pastoral. Essays on Theocritus and Virgil, Princeton 1981. * J. VAN SICKLE, Theocritus and the Development of the Conception of Bucolic Genre, Ramus 5, 1976, 18–44. * J. VAN SICKLE, The Design of Vergil's Bucolics, Roma 1978. * B. SNELL, Arkadien. Die Entdeckung einer geistigen Landschaft (repr. in: K. GARBER, ed., 14–43). * G. WOJACZEK, Untersuchungen zur griechischen Bukolik, diss. Köln, Meisenheim 1969.

<sup>1</sup> It is probable that the honest countryman and singer Meliboeus is intended to represent some private individual (G. BINDER in: B. EFFE, G. BINDER 1989, 150–153).

<sup>2</sup> Poetae Christiani Minores, pars I, ediderunt. C. SCHENKL et al., Vindobonae 1888 (= CSEL 16, 1), 609–615; cf. AL 719a.

VIRGIL

Life and Dates

P. Vergilius Maro was born on the Ides of October, 70 B.C., at Andes near Mantua in northern Italy. Attempts to explain the uniqueness of his genius by reference to Celtic or Etruscan antecedents are hardly helpful, but certainly his love for the landscape of Italy springs from a childhood spent close to nature and not from a city dweller's 'sentimental' yearning for his roots. It is precisely in the greatest creative personalities that culture and nature often form a unity.

The accounts of his life deserve more doubt than credence. His father, who perhaps was originally a potter by profession, is said to have been a free day-laborer, and from modest beginnings to have worked his way up to become landowner and bee-keeper. Whether Virgil was affected directly or only indirectly by the distribution of land made by Octavian to his veterans, his first great work, the ten pastoral poems (Eclogues), gives a lively picture of the troubles of that time (between 42 and 39, or as is now assumed,<sup>1</sup> 35 B.C.). Italian farmers were driven from hearth and home to make room for veterans. The resentment this caused is heard in the shepherd Meliboeus' words from the first eclogue (eccl. 1. 70–72).

In the poet's life, friendship played an important role. He refers by name to the poet Cornelius Gallus with sympathy and admiration (eccl. 6 and 10), as to Varus (eccl. 9), to the writer and literary patron Asinius Pollio (eccl. 4) and, not least, to the 'god' of the first

<sup>1</sup> G. W. BOWERSOCK, A Date in the Eighth Eclogue, HSPH 75, 1971, 73–80; W. V. CLAUSEN, On the Date of the First Eclogue, HSPH 76, 1972, 201–205; E. A. SCHMIDT, Zur Chronologie der Eklogen Vergils, SHAW 1974, 6, 9; cf. ibid. 8, note 4. A contrary view in W. STROH, Die Ursprünge der römischen Liebeslegie, Poetica 15, 1983, 205–246, esp. 214, note 30 (convincing).

Eclogue, who in all probability is to be identified with Caesar's heir, the later Augustus.

Virgil's next work, the Georgics, was a didactic poem on agriculture, written in the years leading up to 29. It shows him as a member of the circle around Maecenas. In this poem the apotheosis of the one later to become Augustus also plays an important part. If the story is true that Virgil cancelled a eulogy of Cornelius Gallus in the Georgics after the latter's fall from grace, this would be the only blemish on the picture we have of the poet's character.<sup>1</sup>

Maecenas is mentioned for the first time in Virgil's second major work, the Georgics. Once again, as patron, he remained true to his principle of only furthering talents which had already proved themselves. Nevertheless Maecenas exercised an essential influence on the poet's creativity.<sup>2</sup> Along with Varius, Virgil is perhaps the poet who most faithfully adopted as his own the intentions of Maecenas and Augustus.

It is superfluous to ponder whether heroic poetry suited Virgil's talent as well as pastoral did. Certainly Horace was correct in emphasizing (sat. 1. 10. 44-45) the 'delicate wit' (molle atque facetum) in Virgil's talent. But the poet also possessed a strong dramatic feeling, a tragic outlook on life which, already visible in passages of the earlier works, only found full deployment in the Aeneid. The question is wrongly put. His powers grew in meeting his new challenge, or better, previously hidden sides of his nature were revealed. That Virgil as a person created an impression of quiet self-absorption, of being somewhat shy and awkward, and anything but a brilliant speaker, may perhaps be believed on the evidence of the ancient biographers. Horace (sat. 1. 5) recounts Virgil's precarious health during a trip to Brundisium. If, as assumed by modern scholars, the Virgil addressed in the Odes (1. 3 and 1. 24) is the poet, they give evidence of melancholy, deep gloom, and serious preoccupation with death, features recurring in many passages of the Aeneid.

<sup>1</sup> J. HERMES, C. Cornelius Gallus und Vergil. Das Problem der Umarbeitung des vierten Georgica-Buches, diss. Münster 1980 (attacks the credibility of the story); H. D. JOCELYN, Servius and the 'Second Edition' of the Georgics, Atti del Convegno mondiale scientifico di studi su Virgilio 1, Milano 1984, 431-448; H. JACOBSON, Aristaetus, Orpheus, and the Laudes Galli, AJPh 105, 1984, 271-300; on T. BERRES, Die Entstehung der Aeneis, Wiesbaden 1982 (georg. 4 changed after Aen. 1-6) s. W. SUERBAUM, Gnomon 60, 1988, 401-409.

<sup>2</sup> Virgil jokes: 'your not entirely gentle orders' (georg. 3. 41).

It was this work on which Rome's greatest poet was engaged in his last decade of life, perhaps in the awareness that he had accepted a challenge beyond his powers (Macr. sat. 1. 24. 11). A final revision was to take place on a visit to Greece in the company of Augustus, but during the journey he fell ill, interrupted his travel and died on his way home in Brundisium (19 B.C.).

The Aeneid is a basic text not only of Roman but also of European civilization. Its preservation is owed to Augustus, who set aside the poet's wishes, expressed in his will, not to publish anything of his previously unpublished. The editors, Varius and Tucca, went about their task with the devotion of true friends, even refraining from completing verses left incomplete.

Virgil's life began during Pompey's first consulship (70 B.C.) and ended shortly before Augustus' legislation on marriage. It embraced the period when in Roman politics individualism showed its greatest development. Pompey made the east and Caesar the west serve his ends, until the Republic broke in two. Virgil, who was 26 years old when Caesar was murdered, experienced to the full the Civil Wars. This explains his gratitude to Augustus, the ultimate bringer of peace and the fulfiller of the highest aim of politics. The kindness of fate allowed the poet to die before the new system of rule became definitely established and unmasked itself as monarchy.

The historical evolution of this period is matched in Virgil's creativity by his journey from private to more than personal issues. From the perspective of literary history, his youthful years coincided with the maturity of Catullus and Lucretius, bold and independent spirits. In the next generation, individualism became a fashion and with that, paradoxically, a collective phenomenon. While the elegiac poets Gallus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid represented the normal development of Roman literature under Hellenistic influence, the 'classic' Virgil, though not disavowing his Alexandrian beginnings, swam against the tide of his age. It may be guessed what independence and determination were needed to fulfill this mission.

Survey of Works

Eclogues

1: A conversation between two shepherds illumines the problem of land confiscation from two perspectives, reflected in two characters. The lively, 'elegiac' Meliboeus must leave his farm, while the reflective Tityrus is allowed to remain. The first half of the eclogue is concerned with the past, the second with the future. Precisely in the middle (41–42) the 'god' is mentioned to whom Tityrus owes his good fortune.

2: Corydon gives utterance to his hopeless passion for Alexis in a 'sentimental' and poetic discourse. In the center of the poem (37–38), we learn that it was to Corydon that the dying Damoetas left his shepherd's pipe. This hint of artistic inheritance is particularly suggestive in a collection setting Theocritus' Idylls in a new context, and lending them totally new shape.

3: Menalcas and Damoetas banter with each other. They appeal to an arbiter who begins to speak in the middle of the eclogue (55), and contend with graceful or enigmatic pairs of verses so well that no victor can be declared.

4: A more exalted theme is announced. With the birth of a child under Pollio's consulship (40 B.C.), a new golden age is to begin. The fourth Eclogue is one of the noblest and profoundest poems of world literature.

5: Mopsus and Menalcas celebrate in competition the dead singer Daphnis. The eclogue falls into two halves. At the end, both singers compliment each other in turn. This poem sheds light on the deeper meaning of festivals and on the relation between the living and the dead.

6: The introduction is an indirect homage to Varus, followed by the framing story: two lads capture sleeping Silenus, who ransoms himself with a song. This mysterious poem about the origins of the world, cosmology, and love contains the consecration of Cornelius Gallus as a poet.

7: Meliboeus tells about a competition between singers in which Thyrsus was vanquished by Corydon. The conflict revealed in this eclogue is perceptibly sharper than the contests in 3 and 5.

8: After a dedication to Pollio come two songs of equal length, whose content is complementary. Damon sings of an unrequited love (cf. Theocr. 3). In Alphisiboeus' song, the beloved uses magic (cf. Theocr. 2) to call her Daphnis home.

9: The farm-bailiff Moeris and the shepherd Lycidas discuss the question whether the songs of the poet Menalcas have the power to change reality or not. It is a poem critical of the times, dealing with problems of poetics, depending as a whole on Theocritus 7, but also citing other poems, including eclogues of Virgil himself.

10: A homage to the love poet Cornelius Gallus and at the same time a lofty celebration of love and poetry.

Georgics

1: An address to Maecenas is followed by the announcement of the theme: 1: agriculture; 2: arboriculture; 3: animal husbandry; 4: bee-keeping. There is a solemn invocation of the gods of the countryside and of the emperor (1–42). Three main sections then consider work in the fields (43–203); the course of the year (204–350); and weather portents (351–463). The finale of the book, connected in thought with this last section, treats the ill-omened portents at Caesar's death (463–514).

2: The book dedicated to the cultivation of trees, especially the vine and olive, opens with an invocation to Bacchus (1–8), and immediately proceeds to its theme. An address to Maecenas is introduced a little later (39–46). The first portion of the book (9–108) discusses the many forms of tree propagation; the second the different types of soil (109–258) and of planting (259–345); and the third the care and protection of growth (346–457). The conclusion is a eulogy of country life (458–542). These divisions are emphasized by the use of the excursus: the second section appropriately begins with a eulogy of Italy (109–176) and ends with the praise of spring (322–345).

3: In the proem, which constitutes the very heart of the Georgics, the poet pays homage to his birthplace, to the emperor, and to Maecenas (1–38). The first part of the book (49–283) then deals with cattle and horses, the selection and care of breeding animals (49–156), the raising of young (157–208) and, to conclude the first section, the irresistible nature of the sexual urge (209–283). The second half, after an intermediate proem (284–294), explains the care of sheep and goats in winter (295–321) and summer (322–338). A contrasting picture of Libyan shepherding and Scythian cattleherding (339–383) is followed by a mention of animal products (384–403) and dangers threatening the herd (404–473), especially cattle plague, the description of which forms the finale (474–566).

4: Bees, both subtle and sublime in one, furnish the topic of the 4th book, which is also dedicated to Maecenas (1–7). The location and construction of the bee-hive are discussed (8–50), followed by swarming and struggle, selection and settlement (51–115). After a respite provided by the description of a garden (116–148), Virgil stresses the moral uniqueness of bees, thus offering a positive counterpart to the destructive sexuality of the previous book. He assigns to the bees a share in the divine logos (149–227). The harvesting of honey, pests, and sicknesses round out the picture (228–280). The death and rebirth of the bee colony afford an excuse for the story of Aristaeus and its tale of Orpheus, which forms the grandiose finale (281–558). Some personal remarks, also once again mentioning the emperor, conclude the work (559–566).

Aeneid

1: The proem sweeps from Troy to Rome and Carthage. A storm at sea, raised by Juno, drives Aeneas' ships to the Carthaginian shore. Venus is encouraged by a prophecy from Jupiter about her son, and, masquerading as a huntress, informs Aeneas about the land and its people. Then, under the protection of a cloud, Aeneas and his comrade Achates come to Carthage.

Queen Dido bids the Trojans welcome, and at a banquet Amor, in the guise of the boy Ascanius, wins her heart for Aeneas.

2: At Dido's request Aeneas tells the story of Troy's destruction. In the 10th year of the war the Greeks concealed their bravest champions in a wooden horse and pretended to sail away to Tenedos. Sinon's treacherous tale and the example of Laocoon caused the Trojans to level their walls and pull the horse into the city. But, under cover of night, the enemy returns unexpectedly, and in a dream the dead Hector commands Aeneas to abandon his doomed city. The hero, however, prefers death to flight, and the Trojans do fight successfully, until the Greek arms which they have assumed as a trick spell their undoing. Citizens slaughter fellow citizens. After the death of King Priam, Aeneas is encouraged by a revelation from Venus and a sign from Jupiter to set out with his family and followers. The ghost of his wife Creusa prophesies to him the future.

3: Aeneas narrates his wanderings. He is compelled to leave Thrace by the portent of Polydorus. Delphic Apollo bids him seek his ancient home, which Anchises wrongly takes to be Crete. Aeneas is expelled from there by a plague among the Trojans, and in a dream the Penates direct him towards Italy. He is swept by a storm to the Strophades Islands, and at Actium celebrates games in honor of Apollo. In Epirus, he receives a revelation from Helenus. On the west coast of Sicily, he takes on board an old comrade of Ulysses. At Drepanum, Anchises dies. On his voyage to Italy, Aeneas is driven by a storm to Carthage.

4: Dido opens her heart to her sister Anna, and is advised to seek a union with Aeneas. To further the marriage, Juno assures herself of Venus' cooperation, and during a hunting expedition a storm causes the two lovers to seek refuge in a cave. But their happiness is shortlived. The jealous king of the Gaetuli, Iarbas, prays to Jupiter and he, through Mercury, bids Aeneas, the 'ladies' man', to make ready for departure. Dido learns of these preparations, and overwhelms her lover with reproaches. On Mercury's advice, the Trojans flee by night. The abandoned queen commits suicide.

5: On his way to Italy Aeneas is welcomed by Acestes in Sicily, and celebrates festive games to honour the anniversary of Anchises' death. In the ship race, Cloanthus is victorious, in the footrace, Euryalus, thanks to a trick by his friend Nisus. In the boxing match, old Entellus wins, in archery Eurytion, though Acestes, whose arrow catches fire in flight, is awarded the first prize as a token of respect. Ascanius, with the young boys of his own age, puts on a display of horsemanship. But a group of Trojan women goaded on by Juno sets the fleet on fire, until Jupiter sends a shower to quench the flames. In a dream, Anchises bids his son leave behind the women and the old men in the newly founded city of Acesta.

6: In the cave of the Cumaean Sibyl Aeneas puts his questions to the oracle of Apollo. He buries his dead comrade Misenus at the cape named after him. Doves show Aeneas the way to the golden bough, which enables him, after the proper sacrifices, to descend to the underworld by the entrance at Avernus, with the Sibyl as his guide. His first encounter is with his unburied helmsman Palinurus, then in the center of the book with Dido, and finally with the Trojan Deiphobus. The Sibyl explains to him the fate of sinners in Tartarus. In the abode of the Blessed, Musaeus leads him to Anchises, who shows him the heroes of the future, from the kings of Alba to Augustus and the prematurely dead Marcellus. With this encouragement, Aeneas leaves the world of shadows by the ivory gate.

7: After the burial of his nurse Caieta, Aeneas journeys past Circe's dwelling to the mouth of the Tiber and lands at the Laurens ager. Ascanius is witness to 'the portent of the tables', and Aeneas recognizes that he is in the promised land. An embassy is sent to ask King Latinus for ground on which to settle, and, moved by the prophecies made by seers, Latinus offers Aeneas the hand of his daughter Lavinia in marriage. Meanwhile, on Juno's orders, the Fury Allecto provokes Latinus' wife, Amata, and Lavinia's intended bridegroom, Turnus, to resistance. When Ascanius wounds a tame deer, hand to hand fighting breaks out and two respected inhabitants of the country are killed. Since Latinus refuses to undertake a war of revenge, Juno herself forces open the gates of war. Turnus finds many allies, including Mezentius and Camilla.

8: Turnus sends Venulus to Diomedes to seek his support in the fight. On the advice of the river god Tiberinus, Aeneas travels upstream to visit King Evander at the future site of Rome. There he takes part in a festival honoring Hercules. Evander's son Pallas brings a company to join the Trojans. Then Aeneas seeks help from Mezentius' enemies, the Etruscans at Agylla. In answer to Venus' prayer, Vulcan forges weapons for her son. On the shield, the destiny of Rome is depicted.

9: During Aeneas' absence Turnus is encouraged by Juno's emissary, Iris, and assails the Trojans, but, at the entreaty of the Great Mother of Ida, his attempt to burn their fleet is frustrated by Jupiter, who changes the ships into nymphs. During the night, Nisus and Euryalus offer to inform Aeneas about the threat facing the Trojans, and in the enemy camp they wreak bloody havoc. But the glitter of a helmet he has plundered betrays Euryalus, and both friends fall. The next day, Turnus presses home his attack into the Trojan camp. After a brave fight, he retreats to the river.

10: At an assembly of the gods Venus and Juno debate angrily. Jupiter leaves the decision to fate. The Rutulians continue their siege. Meanwhile, Aeneas returns from Etruria with a strong fleet, and on the way is met by the nymphs (his former ships) who inform him of the danger to his comrades. At his appearance the Rutulians abandon the siege. In the fight that follows, Pallas is killed by Turnus and Aeneas honors the fallen youth by the slaughter of many enemies. Turnus is now withdrawn from the fray by Juno, and the chief burden of battle falls to Mezentius until he is wounded by Aeneas. After his son Lausus has given his life for him, Mezentius again joins the fray and in turn is killed by Aeneas.

11: Aeneas dedicates Mezentius' arms to Mars, and sends back the body of Pallas to Evander with an honor guard. Both sides bury their dead. Venulus now brings a refusal from Diomedes. While a wordy dispute is taking place in Latinus' council of war, Aeneas attacks the city. Turnus entrusts the cavalry to Messapus and Camilla, while he accompanies the infantry to an ambush. It is only when news arrives of Camilla's death that he comes to help his men. The onset of night brings an end to the slaughter.

12: Turnus resolves to face Aeneas in single combat, and Aeneas accepts his challenge. A solemnly concluded truce is broken, at Juno's prompting, by Turnus' sister Juturna. A false portent misleads the seer Tolumnius into hurling his spear, and an arrow wounds Aeneas in spite of his efforts to separate the contestants. Turnus now begins a victorious course over his enemies until Aeneas, healed by Venus, returns to the field. Juturna attempts to rescue Turnus by assuming the guise of his charioteer. Only when Aeneas sets fire to the city, and Amata in despair takes her own life, does Turnus confront his adversary, though without success. Aeneas is on the point of sparing the life of his wounded foe when he finds him wearing Pallas' baldric and fulfills his duty of vengeance.

Sources, Models, and Genres

This was a period when Roman history was leading from individualism towards the recognition of an order going far beyond the individual, and the course of Virgil's intellectual evolution may be understood as a path from a multiplicity of small-scale poems to the composition of larger units. His encounter with genres, sources, and models reflects this development most clearly.

The most 'modern' poetry is found at the outset. The young poet began with short pieces modeled on Catullus and the neoterics (Catalepton). For the Eclogues—his first work of importance—he chose a somewhat earlier model: Theocritus, a Hellenistic poet.

It was Virgil's destiny to enlarge his vision and to choose ever older and greater masters as his teachers. The next stage, that of didactic poetry, meant in the first place a turn towards the Hellenistic poet Aratus, with whom Cicero had competed earlier.<sup>1</sup> Yet the theme was no longer the sky and its stars, but the earth. With this, even if more in theory than in practice, a more ancient and profound layer of Greek poetry was revived, Hesiod's Works and Days, though the source from which the poet drew his material was not so much Hesiod as later technical literature.

<sup>1</sup> The beginning of the 3rd book of the Georgics (1-48) appears in a new light thanks to the Callimachus papyrus from Lille: P. J. PARSONS, Callimachus: Victoria Berenices, ZPE 29, 1977, 1-50, esp. 11-13; E. LIVREA, A. CARLINI, C. CORBATO,

With his advance to the Aeneid, signified, for example, already in the proem to the 3rd book of the Georgics, the scope of his models was once again considerably broadened. Virgil now took up the most exalted example of all, that of Homer. He gave fresh life to Homer's entire work by reflecting his twice 24 books in twelve. In them, the sequence of Iliad and Odyssey is reversed. Essentially, the first half of the Aeneid corresponds to the Odyssey, the second to the Iliad.<sup>1</sup>

Along with Homer, the Hellenistic epic poet Apollonius must be mentioned, without whose story of Medea Virgil would never have been able to describe as he did the awaking of love in Dido's heart but in the Aeneid this love, contrasted with Dido's political mission as queen, enters a larger context. Here, as elsewhere in the Aeneid, a group of models is important, now only surviving in fragments: Roman tragic poetry, which had been highly influential in establishing myth at Rome. Of course Virgil also had direct access to the Greek tragedians.

The influence of lost old Roman epic may scarcely be measured. Naevius must certainly have mediated the conversation between Jupiter and Venus in the 1st book. He may also have been influential on the 4th book and even on the technique of inset. In all likelihood Naevius himself had introduced prehistory by way of episode, while conversely Virgil incorporated the future in the form of prophecies (cf. the prophecy of Jupiter Aen. 1. 257–296, Dido's curse Aen. 4. 622–629, the vision of heroes Aen. 6. 756–886, the description of the shield Aen. 8. 626–728). Finally, Ennius, Virgil's real predecessor in heroic poetry, provided a storehouse of countless images and turns of phrase. The Annales were replaced by the Aeneid in the fullest sense. The language and spirit of the Aeneid satisfied the demands of modernity. It was Virgil who first gave reality to an artistically finished large-scale form in Roman epic. Yet even here Virgil did not entirely deny the literary impressions of his youth. Dido also bears features of the abandoned Ariadne from Catullus' Peleus and Thetis and the Catullan image of the mown flower is elevated, on the death of a youthful hero, to an epic simile. We already assessed the impact of Apollonius Rhodius. Finally the 'prophetic' concept of the Aeneid was likewise inspired by a Hellenistic poet, Lycophron.<sup>1</sup> Thus Virgil gave heroic epic a unity of form and at the same time enriched its content by the many facets of modern aesthetic feeling.

---

F. BORNHANN, Il nuovo Callimaco di Lille, Maia 32, 1980, 225–253, esp. 226–230; R. F. THOMAS, Callimachus, the Victoria Berenices, and Roman Poetry, CQ 77, n.s. 33, 1983, 92–113, esp. 92–101.

<sup>1</sup> There is of course overlapping, as with the Funeral Games in the 5th book and Aeneas' voyage in the 8th; cf. also M. LAUSBERG, Iliadisches im ersten Buch der Aeneis, Gymnasium 90, 1983, 203–239. In general, for Virgil the Odyssey is perhaps even more important than the Iliad.

Material was provided in the first place by Varro, the great scholar and contemporary of Caesar, whose long life stretched down to the period of Octavian. Parallel texts reveal that Virgil reshaped tradition independently, or else made use of other sources than those known to us. Comparative study of myth<sup>2</sup> discovers in the Aeneid 'Indo-European' structures, and comparative literature points to parallels with the Indian Mahâbhârata,<sup>3</sup> and this at least shows how deeply Virgil, in competition with Homer's and Hesiod's 'creation of the Greek gods' (cf. Herodotus 2. 53), penetrated the essence of myth.<sup>4</sup>

In his choice of models, therefore, a backward movement in time is combined with an enlargement of previous scope. Hellenistic and Roman elements previously favored were not so much rejected as subsumed into a higher synthesis. In this increasing distance from contemporary fashion, and the attainment of a more than personal vantage point, the older poets and their authoritative standing played a liberating and unifying role.

Literary Technique

No complete account of Virgil's literary technique is possible here. Only selected features may be mentioned, traceable in different works.

Already in his Eclogues Virgil established principles for the structure of whole books as an artistic unit. Horace's 1st book of the Satires and Tibullus' 1st book would equally consist of ten carefully arranged

<sup>1</sup> The Book of Daniel, with its historical prophecy, is also Hellenistic.

<sup>2</sup> G. DUMÉZIL, Mythe et épopée, Paris, 2nd ed. 1968.

<sup>3</sup> G. E. DUCKWORTH, Turnus and Duryodhana, TAPhA 92, 1961, 81-127.

<sup>4</sup> Basic on the myth of Aeneas: G. K. GALINSKY 1969.

poems. Eclogues 3, 5, and 7 are musical competitions, and the 8th shows a related structure. In the 5th Eclogue the harmony between the contestants is greatest, while the rivalry is less marked in the 3rd poem than in the 7th. The second half of the collection gains coherence through its allusions to Cornelius Gallus, who appears in Eclogues 6 and 10. Although the individual eclogues may stand as independent units, the book has also a high degree of inner cohesion, even if scholars, in their search for mathematical symmetries, may at times have gone too far. But, given the deeply musical character of ancient poetry in general, and of the Eclogues in particular, such interpretations are not in principle to be regarded as misleading.

In comparison with his predecessor, Theocritus, Virgil's adaptation of pastoral poetry to a Roman milieu marks a further loss of immediacy, though also an increase in organic unity. The poet adapts the varied elements of Theocritean poetry to a new universe, and makes them serve new ends. Politically, this may be said of the central role played by the later Augustus, partly borrowed from Theocritus' eclogues honoring Ptolemy. Poetically, this is true of the remarks about poetry, modelled on those of the seventh Idyll, whose influence is felt in many of Virgil's eclogues. Artistically, it may be said of the shaping of Virgil's book of Eclogues as an organic unity of ten poems, linked by correspondences in form and content. At the same time Virgil tones down 'naturalistic' or mimic features found in the Theocritean idyll. The multiple elements found in the model are incorporated into a unified structure with a new meaning. In passing through the school of Hellenistic poetry right to its end, Virgil grew beyond it, and himself became a classic of an originally unclassical genre.

The task of arranging a continuous text as a self-contained book was solved by Virgil for the first time in the 1st book of the Georgics. Between the proem and the finale, there are three main sections. The structure is marked by the use of excursus (such as the description of the storm at the end of the second section, 311–350) and similes. The final simile echoes the simile at the end of the first part (512–514; cf. 201–203). In the 2nd book of the Georgics, the digressions (praise of Italy and praise of spring) pinpoint the beginning and end of the second section. Yet Virgil's style is fluent, and these are not hard and fast divisions. There are bridges between sections, giving to the text a uniform and cohesive quality. The use of divisions into three or even into five parts is also found in the books of the Aeneid. The 4th book there has even been compared with a tragedy in five acts.<sup>1</sup>

There may also, however, be a strict division into two halves, as in the 3rd book of the Georgics. This structure is underlined by an intermediate proem and by corresponding conclusions (first half: irresistible nature of the sexual urge; second half: cattle plague).

It was an even more difficult task to establish an overarching structure unifying several books. But Virgil, like Lucretius before him, solved it brilliantly. In the Georgics, the gloomy conclusions of the 1st and 3rd books are set in contrast with the brilliant beginnings of the 2nd and 4th. The excursuses in books 3 and 4 are in correspondence, both for their position and their themes (unrestrained and restrained sexuality). A unifying link in the Georgics is also the name Caesar (i.e. Octavian): at the beginning and end, homage is paid to the ruler, and in the middle of the work, in the proem to the 3rd book, Virgil promises to erect a temple to him (in medio mihi Caesar erit, 'in the midst I will have Caesar' 3. 16).

The structure of the Aeneid required Virgil to think in even larger units. Three groups of four books may be recognized. The first four are united, if by nothing else, by the setting of 1 and 4 at Carthage. In their turn, the two Carthaginian books frame the narrative of Troy's destruction and Aeneas' wanderings. Books 5–8 prepare the hero for his struggle. In 9–12, the actual events of war are described. But it is even more fascinating to view the Aeneid as a work of two halves. The 7th book is a new beginning. A second proem contrasts what is to follow with what has preceded as a maius opus (Aen. 7. 45). The second half relates to the first as a Roman Iliad to a Roman Odyssey, even though the antithesis is not strictly maintained.<sup>2</sup>

The unleashing of war in the 7th book was already prefigured in the unleashing of the storm in the 1st. If the 2nd book describes the destruction of Troy, the 8th prepares the way for the birth of a new Troy, Rome. The final verses correspond. Earlier Aeneas took his father onto his shoulders, and now he takes up 'the fate of his grandsons'. Such observations on the conscious counterpoint of the two halves of the poem may be multiplied almost at will.

<sup>1</sup> A. WLOSOK, Vergils Didotragödie, in: H. GÖRGEMANN and E. A. SCHMIDT, eds., Studien zum antiken Epos, Meisenheim 1976, 175–201.

<sup>2</sup> So rightly G. N. KNAUER 1964; on the importance of the Odyssey for the whole of the Aeneid s. also above p. 675, note 1.

This is to indicate the level on which the unity of the Aeneid is to be sought. The poet's first concern was with internal coherence. He left unreconciled some contradictions at more superficial levels.<sup>1</sup> The poet would perhaps have partly removed them in the course of a final revision: at least it was not his wish to publish the Aeneid in its present state.

The narrative proceeds in scenes which, in contrast to the linear narrative style of Apollonius Rhodius, clearly emerge from their context as units.<sup>2</sup> The author gives these scenes a literary shape, conveying to the reader above all else their inner significance. A trenchant remark has described the Aeneid as displaying a 'unity of feeling.'<sup>3</sup> Like a musician, the poet unfolds his work from within an embracing, overall mood, drawing out themes and motifs, assigning them their special place and particular purpose within the economy of the whole. Unlike the Hellenistic poets, Virgil leaves out much everyday detail in his representation of myth, and plays down realism. Individual comic features are no longer elaborated, receiving at best a brief hint.

Character portrayal is, in the case of Aeneas, often subordinated to the plot. At the beginning of some books, Aeneas seems to have lost a part of the knowledge he has acquired previously. This may be intentional, a way of presenting a man liable to mistakes, who needs divine guidance, and who in his constant obedience to the gods is shown as homo religiosus.

Aeneas is a new type of hero, not fitting into any traditional scheme. On the one hand, he bears features of the old-fashioned epic champion. As warrior, he is necessarily exposed to the feeling of anger. Moreover, Roman qualities distinguish him, such as pietas towards his father and descendants and a sense of responsibility towards his comrades. Finally he also possesses 'modern' qualities: when Lausus falls, he shows sympathy and even solidarity with his adversary. This sensitivity continually displayed by Aeneas is hard to reconcile with his unyielding obduracy towards Dido and Turnus. It may be that here we encounter the barriers separating pagan Roman and Christian feeling. The absolute novelty of his hero allowed Virgil to draw in him a picture that, if difficult to understand, is also astonishingly modern. It may not be legitimate to speak of the Aeneid as a novel of development, but Aeneas is a man who is ever maturing<sup>1</sup> and who has to learn, a type of character unexpected in an ancient author. Humanity for him is less a gift than a goal. The best feature in Aeneas is his perpetual openness, and this is why the reader of the Aeneid is continually discovering new facets in its hero.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> W. KROLL, Studien über die Komposition der Aeneis, JKPh suppl. 27, 1902, 135–169 (Virgil is 'incapable of thinking further than the particular portion of his poetry with which he is preoccupied at the moment' 137; 'allows himself to be dragged along in the wake of his authorities' 138; 'very often forgets to narrate important matters' 146). G. FUNKE goes even further in: Sunt lacrimae rerum, Komposition und Ideologie in Vergils Aeneis, Klio 67, 1985, 224–233. The answer was already given in 1902 by Heinze in: Virgils epische Technik (s. now: R. HEINZE, Virgil's Epic Technique. With a Preface by A. Wlosok, London 1993), passim.

<sup>2</sup> The basic study is by F. MEHMEL 1940.

<sup>3</sup> V. PÖSCHL 1950 (3rd ed. 1977) passim.

Aeneas' opponents, Dido and Turnus, are drawn with more decisive strokes. They are lively and engaging personalities to whose fate the reader cannot remain indifferent. The poet here had more rewarding artistic possibilities than in the case of Aeneas. By contrast with comparable women characters in the Odyssey or the Argonautica, Dido is a queen and tragic protagonist in the heroic mold. A gloomy hero under the spell of death, Turnus is a notable and typically Virgilian creation.

Even subordinate figures, such as father Anchises and Aeneas' comrade Achates, have their own features. By contrast with Dido, Lavinia lurks only in the background. But the shadow of Creusa, still loyal and caring in death, for all its sketchiness, is one of the most tender pictures of women in world literature. Angry Juno, as well, and gracious Venus, here presented for the most part as a mother, and even a grandmother, are, in their portraiture of women, fascinating character studies.

The style of the speeches proves that Virgil was an expert in rhetoric, though he controls the autonomous tendencies of this art and does not allow it to prevail over his poetry.

Let us now look at certain artistic devices, used by Virgil with particular expressiveness.

Chronological retrogression and exchange of roles. An unusual device is the reversal of normal temporal succession. In the 1st Eclogue the speech of Meliboeus (11-17) shows a reverse arrangement of facts, as does the story of Tityrus (27-35). This may be explained by psychology. It is the present which first comes into the speaker's consciousness, while the past in each case is brought in by way of explanation. This might be a reflection of ordinary language. But there is also a structural purpose. The first half of the eclogue leads us to the past, so that the divine youth aiding Tityrus to gain his good fortune is mentioned exactly in the center of the poem. In the second half, it is the future that will dominate. Thus chronological retrogression fulfills an artistic function in the structure of this eclogue.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This does not mean that he is a Stoic προκόπτων.

<sup>2</sup> In Virgil in general, and in Aeneas in particular, there are definitely found a great many voices (not only two).

In the 6th book of the Aeneid there is a reversal of sequence in the arrangement of scenes. They refer back to earlier books. At first, the conversation with Palinurus harks back to the 5th book, then the meeting with Dido alludes to the 4th and finally the dialogue with Deiphobus to the 2nd. But there is more. Within the Dido scene (6. 450-476), which stands exactly in the middle of the 6th book, the events of the 4th are evoked in reverse order.<sup>2</sup> First comes Dido's deadly wound, then the departure of Aeneas, and after that the divine command. Consequently at the end of the scene Dido returns to her former husband Sychaeus. There is certainly a psychological justification to this arrangement of the facts: the meeting gives at first a reason to recall the most recent event, and then by way of explanation the narrative goes further and further back into the past. But the strictness with which Virgil adopts a counter chronology within this scene and also in the grouping of the three conversations already mentioned, is unique within his work. What is his artistic purpose? To come to terms with the past is the object of the first half of the 6th book. Only then is Aeneas free to turn his attention to the future, and this is what happens in the vision of the heroes. The structure of the 6th book, in which retrospect is followed by prospect, recalls the structure of the 1st Eclogue.

But, by contrast with the eclogue, progress is revealed in a double aspect in the Aeneid. The reverse chronology within one scene is supplemented on the large scale by the reverse chronological arrangements of three scenes. In the interval, Virgil had learned mastery of larger forms.

The second novelty by comparison with the eclogue is the linking of reverse chronology with a further type of inversion. The roles of

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 132-163.

<sup>2</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT, Die Kunst der Spiegelung in Vergils Aeneis, Hermes 93, 1965, 54-64.

Aeneas and Dido are now, by contrast with the 4th book, exchanged. Now he is the suppliant and she the unapproachable. Numerous verbal correspondences underline that Aeneas must now suffer what he earlier did to Dido. This reversal of the active and passive roles confers upon the encounter in the lower world precisely the character of 'retaliation'.<sup>1</sup>

The combination of both types of reversal<sup>2</sup> in the Aeneid undoubtedly shows an increase in range, strength and depth by comparison with the 1st Eclogue.

Has this technique also a unifying function? Certainly it produces the closest conceivable dependence between the 6th and the preceding books.

An exchange of roles is also found at the end of the second great conflict in the Aeneid. Turnus, Aeneas' opponent, has slain the youthful Pallas (book 10) and taken his baldric. In the final scene of the Aeneid, it is the sight of the baldric which advises Aeneas to exact his vengeance, also expected by Pallas' father Evander. He does this with the words, 'Pallas sacrifices you.' Here too, the exchange of roles is meant to confront the agent objectively with his action. The artistic principle of reversal of functions is therefore a unifying element, linking both main conflicts of the Aeneid.

These refined techniques attest a high artistic awareness, schooled by Hellenistic teachers. But their application is controlled. The chief aim is not to display brilliance and virtuosity, but to render visible deeper connections between action and suffering, guilt and atonement. In this subordination of technique to poetic content, a classical element may be detected, but principally it acts as a unifying feature amidst the multiplicity of artistic means. It is true that Virgil picks up again in the Aeneid a technique employed in the Eclogues, but he develops it further and connects it with other procedures, making it a vehicle of meaning within a specifically epic context. Thus the Aeneid shows a striving for both greater variety and deeper consistency. Perhaps it is no coincidence that in the Georgics no such reversals have so far been discovered.<sup>1</sup> The didactic poem is the most objective of Virgil's works, standing between two poems showing greater emphasis on symbol.

---

<sup>1</sup> In his masterpiece Eugeniy Onegin, Pushkin establishes the same relation between the principal scenes. Onegin spurns Tatyana. At a later meeting, she rejects his love. The great poet felt the archetypical model furnished by Virgil's shaping of this material.

<sup>2</sup> The reversal of the time-line could be presented in a graph along a (horizontal) x-axis, and would be described in music as a retrograde movement. The interchange of active and passive would be shown on the (vertical) y-axis: in music mirroring or inversion of the melodic steps.

Images and Comparisons. A second aspect of Virgil's literary technique deserving study is his use of images and comparisons. Numerous images of nature found in the Georgics are developed in the Aeneid into similes.<sup>2</sup> A motif represented in all three main works is that of bees.

In the 1st Eclogue (ecl. 1. 53–55) the humming of the bees serves to indicate mood. Along with other sounds, such as the cooing of doves, it forms part of the happy world of Tityrus, as Meliboeus' vivid imagination paints it. The bees are not the chief theme of the presentation, and not even the grammatical subject of the sentence. The 'unaltered' hedge is more important, for it is the token that Tityrus' farm has remained intact, a central motif of the 1st Eclogue.

In the Georgics, bees are the chief theme of the 4th book.<sup>3</sup> Virgil describes in detail the features a particular locale must have to allow bees to settle there, and how they may be attracted to it (4. 8–66).<sup>4</sup>

But Virgil would not be Virgil had he not developed the motif beyond itself. Already at the beginning of the book, epic language and military metaphors confer on the material a special dignity. 'High-spirited generals and in order the morals and likings of a whole people and their battles will be my song' (4. 4–5). In the description of the battle (67–87), a contest among creatures is described in language adapted to human relationships (so far as warfare may be described as 'human relationships'). We hear, among other things, of trumpets, lances, and enemies. Epic similes accompany the contest. The bees fall to the ground like hail and acorns (80–81). Comparisons also illuminate the bees' use of pebbles as ballast, as if they were ships (195), and their industrious collaboration (170–175).<sup>5</sup> Virgil

<sup>1</sup> In the 4th book, Aristaeus' misfortune is interpreted as a punishment for his persecution of Eurydice, but the scenes are not reversed.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. georg. 3. 215–223 and Aen. 12. 715–722; georg. 3. 232–234; Aen. 12. 103–106; georg. 3. 435–439; Aen. 2. 471–475.

<sup>3</sup> They form—after crops, trees and livestock—the highest realm of nature below man.

<sup>4</sup> The description of the flight (58–60) is, in spite of its poetic beauty (esp. nare per aestatem), meant objectively throughout.

<sup>5</sup> To think of the Cyclopes in georg. book 4 is however quite far-fetched. Virgil therefore may already at that time have worked on the 8th book of the Aeneid.

enjoys the contrast between the tiny object and the imposing means of description; as a Hellenistic artist, he takes a bird's eye view of a Lilliputian world.

But in several ways he allows the reader to see through his descriptions. The political and military metaphors (e.g. 201 Quirites) and the patriotic tones (212–218) focus on the Roman state and its morality, while, at a yet higher level of meaning, Virgil relates his motifs to the larger world and the totality of life. He speaks of the close connection of bees with the divine spirit (219–227). Early in the book we find an indication of the theme of 'immortality'. In spite of the short life of the individual, the race lives on (208–209). In the inset story of Orpheus, the conquest of death is unsuccessful, while in the framing narrative the miracle of the resurrection of the bees is accomplished, a significant contrast of themes.

In the Georgics the bees are therefore in the fullest sense a symbol, both objectively real and yet filled with moral and cosmic significance.

Just as the bees in Virgil's didactic poem form the crown of the world of creatures, their 'civic life' makes them peculiarly equipped to act as a bridge to the presentation of human destinies in the Aeneid.

In the 1st book of the Aeneid a bee simile describes the industrious Carthaginians building their new city (1. 430–436). Characteristically here, Virgil did not take up Homer's bee comparison (Iliad 2. 87–90), but that of the Georgics (4. 158–164), abbreviating for his epic a long section of his book on bees, and turning it into an image of human activity. This time, the levels of the main narrative and of the simile change place. In the Aeneid human activity is illustrated by a comparison with bees, while conversely, in the Georgics, the bustle of the bees is likened to work in a smithy (4. 170–175), and metaphors in general there are taken from human life. By this reversal of the two levels of fact and image in contrast to the earlier work, Virgil's self-imitation is justified, even necessary, for it is the verbal reminiscences that bring home the reversal in the relationship.

The technique of interchange between level of fact and level of image deserves further consideration. It underlines not only the connection between the Georgics and the Aeneid, but throws light also on the Aeneid's own structure. In the Aeneid the same correlation is found between the 1st and 7th books, introducing the two halves of the work. The calming of the storm in the 1st book is illustrated by a picture drawn from political life (1. 148–153). The god of the sea, who calms the waves, is like a respected statesman allaying a riot among his fellow citizens. In the 7th book, by contrast, the main action takes place in the realm of politics and morals, and now it is nature that serves to provide a comparison (7. 586–590). In the midst of the general cry for war, King Latinus remains unmoved, like a cliff in the tempestuous sea. The relationship last adduced (chief action political and moral, similes drawn from nature and everyday) is the rule in epic. In retrospect the storm described in the 1st book appears as an overture to the warfare of the later, artfully projected into nature. At the same time for the reader who comes from the Georgics the path is smoothed. At first it seems that yet another event of nature is the theme. It is a constantly observable feature that Virgil counted on readers who apprehended his whole work as a unity.

In the 5th book of the Aeneid a bee simile (Aen. 6. 707–709) describes the souls in the grove of Lethe. Their buzzing recalls the Eclogues, but it is no longer a mere means of establishing a mood. By being applied to souls, the bee metaphor regains its old symbolic value. Moreover, the position of the simile within the book deserves attention. It was preceded, in the first half, by two autumnal pictures (309–312, the falling leaves and the departure of the migratory birds)<sup>1</sup> which describe the throng of the dead. Now there follows, towards the end of the book, the picture of summer which prepares the way for the prospect of Romans yet to come. The sequence autumn-summer is unexpected and is intended to provoke reflection.<sup>2</sup> Thus in the bee metaphor the symbolic meaning, so often found in the Aeneid, is combined with the painting of a mood known from the Eclogues.<sup>3</sup>

In the 7th book the motif is used as a prodigy (Aen. 7. 64–70). The bees symbolize the citizens coming from outside. The link with Troy and Rome, as is recognized in retrospect, was already given in the 6th book, where the simile prepares for the vision of heroes, and indirectly also in the 1st book, where contemplation of the industrious Carthaginians causes Aeneas to think of his own future founding of a city.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. also georg. 4. 473–474, birds in winter, not in autumn.

<sup>2</sup> If Virgil had simply aimed at plausibility, the succession of winter and spring would have satisfied his purpose, but his concern was to underline the contrast between the funereal mood of the first half of the book and the expectation of the future in the second.

<sup>3</sup> In detail the mention of summer recalls the Georgics: Aen. 6. 707; georg. 4. 59. Instead of the purple flowers (georg. 4. 54) are now found flowers of many hues and (white) lilies (Aen. 6. 708), perhaps in reference to the realm of the dead: cf. Aen. 6. 883.

In summary it may be said that in the Georgics the application of the motif is most markedly objective, though without losing moral, political or metaphysical symbolism. Uniform elements of this picture and in part uniform linguistic and stylistic means—a notable example are the quotations from the Georgics in the Aeneid—are applied in different literary genres according to different premises, and on each occasion set in multiple contexts of meaning. In the Aeneid and the Eclogues, the aim of defining a mood is particularly evident; in the Georgics and Aeneid, it is the symbolic reference. The double aspect of simile and prodigy (a real object used as a symbol) reflects the multiplicity of their applications in the Aeneid. At the same time in the epic poem the different aspects form a unity, since here the system of relationships is most clearly marked.

It may be noted that Dante (Paradiso 31) would later Christianize the bee simile. For him, it symbolizes the angels who fly unceasingly between God and the saints, depicted as white roses. Virgil's remarks about the particular closeness of the bees to the spirit of the universe and their abstention from sexual love may have encouraged Dante to elevate the motif one stage higher than was the case in the Aeneid. The simile reflects no longer a human but a suprahuman community.<sup>1</sup> Dante saw therefore the stages in which Virgil had developed the motif and elaborated a logical extension of the tradition.

These few examples may suffice as proofs of the unity and multiplicity of Virgil's poetic technique. Virgil lived with the pictures he observed and they accompanied him from work to work, gradually transforming themselves and receiving new shades of meaning. But precisely the method by which Virgil recapitulates his own earlier compositions shows the organic growth and inner unity of his creativity.

Language and Style

The transformation effected by Virgil is most evident by comparison with Lucretius. The earlier poet totally subordinated language, meter, <sup>1</sup> By giving motives in each case for the flight of the angels from the saints to God and back, Dante has lent greater energy to the notion.—On the Christian and form to content, and in this way produced a poetry which was in the highest sense 'functional'. In the place of its sublime austerity, Virgil now set a harmonious balance of form.

In comparison with Ennius' motley language, Virgil's elegant reserve is striking. The poet weighs every word, and often decides in favor of the simplest. Agrippa was, in a sense, right therefore in observing that Virgil had discovered a new type of 'mixed metaphor' (κακόζηλον), made up of everyday words. It was in his evaluation of this phenomenon, however, that he was wrong. In adopting Ennian archaisms Virgil acted with prudence. Any false note was to him an abomination. In essence his language is that of his contemporaries. Only a delicate hue is provided on occasions by an old-fashioned admixture, lending the language an antiquarian dignity, though without inflexibility and stiffness, such as a genitive like aulai or the fuller sound of olli instead of illi. The alleged remark by Virgil aurum se legere de stercore Enni ('that he was collecting the gold from Ennius' dung'), if untrue at least ben trovato, excellently describes the choice purity of Virgil's diction.

The simple nobility of Virgil's language may be recognized by the quality of those winged words cited from him. In their weighty and meditative character they are clearly distinguished from the epigrammatically sharpened apophthegms of later times:<sup>1</sup> tantaene animis caelestibus irae?, 'such anger in heavenly minds?' (Aen. 1. 11); tantae molis erat Romanam condere gentem, 'so vast was the effort to found the race of Rome' (Aen. 1. 33); sunt lacrimae rerum et mentem mortalia tangunt, 'there are tears for misfortune and mortal sorrow touches the heart' (Aen. 1. 462); fuimus Troes, 'we Trojans are not anymore' (Aen. 2. 325); quid non mortalia pectora cogis/auri sacra fames?, 'to what deeds do you not drive the hearts of men, o cursed hunger of gold!' (Aen. 3. 56–57). The words and even their grammatical forms preserve their full weight. The simple perfect fuimus is particularly eloquent: 'we are no significance of bees cf. also the liturgy of Holy Saturday, The Saint Andrew Daily Missal, Bruges, Belgium, 1958, p. 479. Ambrose, De virginitate, must also be recalled.

---

<sup>1</sup> The comparison with the 'improved' Aeneid of Arituneus Mizuno, Kioto 1988 is instructive: tantumne furunt (bombastic) sibi (superfluous) caelitis (obscure) irae; molis et error erat Romanosque edere tantae (reversed order; double conjunction); sunt lacrimae rerum, mortalia (wrong case) Tartarus (exaggerated) adflēt (probably from adflere). It is not the number of dactyls that matters in Virgil but the harmonious sequence of different types of hexameters, as is shown by G. MÖHLER, Hexameterstudien, Frankfurt 1989; on Virgil's Style: R. O. A. M. LYNE 1989.

more.' This ability to restore its full value to the individual word is matched by a masterly deployment of spondees, which according to ancient metrical theory possessed the character of gravitas. Thus Virgil took advantage of Latin's richness in spondees. He coaxes the long syllables into sound, and draws from them a melodic verse of melancholy beauty. It is, like the 'simple' language which at times recalls that of Naevius, something typically Roman. Here may be categorized also certain difficult elisions (e.g. Aen. 1. 462), which were avoided by later poets. Virgil's powerful effect on his Roman audience was owed precisely to the fact that his language, equidistant from archaic as from new fangled artifice, attained the highest aim of ancient art, a new naturalness.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Much of the Eclogues is poetry about poetry.<sup>1</sup> The singing contest between shepherds, a characteristic of bucolic poetry, plays a large part in Virgil, as does the relation of shepherds to their teachers and models. If in Virgil's Daphnis eclogue (5) the dead shepherd and singer was honored by new songs, this gives a living meaning to the nature of 'tradition'. In this way the dead, who provide the occasion for the festival, come to hold the role of founders and maintainers of a culture.

In the 6th Eclogue a more than human being—Silenus—sings a poem describing the origins of the world in terms of eros. Here, the idea of the poet-prophet is already signaled. The 9th Eclogue raises the problem whether songs have the power to change reality or not, particularly in regard to the confiscations of land.

Both these themes are continued in the Georgics. The concluding story of Orpheus deals among other things with the power and powerlessness of song, or rather with the power of song and the powerlessness of the singer. The effect of Orpheus' song is potent, but Orpheus the man fails. The conquest of death is not his triumph, but that of Aristaeus, who, however, in his lust for Eurydice, had unintentionally brought about her death. It is for Aristaeus, after he has offered sacrifice of atonement for Orpheus, that the miracle of the resurrection of the bees takes place. Comforting though the picture of new life at the end of the Georgics may be, it is matched by the gloom of the portrait of Orpheus, who twice loses his beloved, grieves without hope and finally meets with a violent end.

---

<sup>1</sup> E. A. SCHMIDT 1972.

The poetic claim raised by Virgil outdoes that of Lucretius. His ambition is no longer to be a physician, offering sick children bitter medicine in a cup smeared with honey, but to be a priest of the Muses.<sup>1</sup> The renewal of the claim of vates goes back to the archaic period, and not only Hesiod but Pindar in particular must be recalled.<sup>2</sup>

This second aspect of poetry in the Georgics, the high and even Pindaric claim of the priest of the Muses, could also be symbolized in the figure of Orpheus. The positive formulation of the role of the poet, who here approximates the farmer (georg. 2. 475–502; cf. 3. 1–2), is deliberately separated from the section on Orpheus. Again, in another passage (georg. 3. 1–48), we find the promise to build a temple to Caesar. Finally, the epilogue, with a mixture of pride and humility, sets the general and the poet in parallel.

The way followed by the reflective poet led from the small-scale art of the late Hellenistic style through the reflections on poetry in the Eclogues to the priesthood of the Muses found in the didactic poetry, with its dark counterpoint of the mourning Orpheus which perhaps points ahead to Virgil's later years. It is in the Aeneid that the problem of death is central. The didactic poem was followed by the heroic epic, and the step to the next highest genre was revealed in the very first word of the Aeneid. Yet a transition from didactic poetry to epic was for ancient readers not a change of genre in the full sense. It is true that the heroic poem gives little scope for any subjective utterances of the poet, and the writer of epic in general hardly speaks for himself. Yet Virgil more than once employs the first person, and he even announces the transition from the Odyssean to the Iliadic half of his work as a fresh change to a higher stylistic level (Aen. 7. 44–45). In the Aeneid poetry is no longer a central theme, and only plays a role in the exaltation of Musaeus in the underworld. There, poets and seers are mentioned along with priests, inseparably from them (6. 660–668). Musaeus is a figure akin to

<sup>1</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 44–62.

<sup>2</sup> V. BUCHHEIT 1972. He is also right to refer to the topoi of the Hellenistic eulogy of rulers.

Orpheus. After the Georgics the poet's claim underwent no essential change. From a poet of poets and poetry, Virgil grew to become a poet of reality as a whole: in the Georgics of nature, in the Aeneid of history. Yet even here there are unifying elements, persistence in change. Nature and history were already themes of Silenus' song in the 6th Eclogue. On the one hand, historical themes intrude into the earlier poems at least in the shape of contemporary history (and into the Georgics in the shape of the 'origin of civilization'). On the other hand, the theme of natural philosophy is still at work in the Aeneid. A constant feature is the prophetic role of the poet, from the 6th Eclogue, where it falls to Silenus, and the Georgics, where Virgil formulates his claim to be a vates, to the Aeneid in whose 'prophetic' structure this claim is given practical reality.

Ideas II

As a young man, Virgil associated at Naples with the circle around the Epicurean Siro.<sup>1</sup> Horace too sympathized with Epicureanism, a philosophy exalting the pleasure of the individual, and was longer in its debt than Virgil, who soon felt the attraction of the more than personal world of the Stoa and of a Pythagoreanism tinged by Platonism.

As early as the Georgics Virgil professes a Stoic pantheism: 'That god permeates all lands, the waves of the sea and the height of heaven' (4. 221–222). Readers as early as the Church Fathers would connect this passage with the teaching of Anchises in the 6th book of the Aeneid: 'In the first place, an indwelling spirit nourishes heaven, earth and the watery levels, and reason moves the whole universe, is infused through all its limbs and mingled with the mighty frame' (6. 724–727).

Recently<sup>2</sup> attention has again been drawn to the important role played in the Aeneid by so-called 'physical theology', that is, the interpretation of mythical gods as representatives of natural phenomena. Thus Vulcan represents fire, and Juno air, and Virgil was conscious of these connections. He took for granted the allegorical interpretation of myth, as it had been practised in Greece since the 6th century B.C., and, more recently, by Stoics and other philosophers. In the Aeneid and Georgics, the 'elements' of ancient physics are constitutive parts of the imagery. In this respect the Aeneid can be considered a cosmological epic (which explains why the Middle Ages turned Virgil into a magician). Modern critics are inclined to neglect this physical side of the Aeneid, since they are more attracted to its historical features. At any rate, considerations of natural philosophy establish a bridge to the Georgics, thus contributing to the overall unity of Virgil's oeuvre.

<sup>1</sup> On Virgil and Philodemus: M. GIGANTE, M. CAPASSO, Il ritorno di Virgilio a Ercolano, SIFC ser. 3, 7, 1989, 3–6.

<sup>2</sup> For the Aeneid P. R. HARDIE 1986; earlier HEINZE, V.e.T., 298–299 (Engl. ed. 238–239); for the Georgics: D. O. ROSS 1987.

It is true that even in the Georgics nature is not studied for its own sake but in its relation to men, and agriculture is set in a larger context as a paradigm for civilization in general, for a fulfilled life, the responsibility of man for nature and the links between life and death. Yet the world around, its plants and animals, are considered here as beings, not as means to establish a mood or as simile. This fact was neglected by Seneca who conceded to the Georgics merely the aim of delectare, not docere. The manner in which technical writers such as Columella read Virgil, points to the contrary. Perhaps this factual, relaxed relationship to the material is also a reason for Dryden's description of the Georgics as 'the best Poem of the best Poet.'<sup>1</sup>

As for the portrayal of characters in the Aeneid, it does not fit into any philosophical pattern. It is true that, in the 4th book, Dido seems to maintain the Epicurean doctrine that the gods are unconcerned with the lot of individuals (4. 379–380). But her curse obviously presupposes a divine providence (Aen. 4. 607–629). An impressive simile (Aen. 4. 441–446), which is developed from a picture of nature in the Georgics (2. 290–297), illustrates Aeneas' steadfast character. But does that make him a Stoic sage? It was undoubtedly more realistic to compare him with the more modest type of the 'pilgrim' (προκόπτων) as developed by the Middle Stoa.<sup>2</sup> But this is open to two objections. First, every man in some degree resembles this type, and its invention was intended to allow everybody to identify themselves with this type. Second, there is no continual moral progress on Aeneas' part throughout the entire work. Therefore, this philosophical labeling is not particularly meaningful.

<sup>1</sup> L. P. WILKINSON 1969, 1.

<sup>2</sup> HEINZE, V.c.T. 278 (Engl. ed. 227).

In the character of Aeneas different strands of thought coexist. On the one hand there is the archaic epic hero,<sup>1</sup> on the other, the Augustan representative of humanitas and clementia. But there are even more aspects: Aeneas as representative of Pallas, who must exact blood vengeance, Aeneas as guest of Evander—pietas itself bids him kill his enemy.<sup>2</sup> The many sides of Aeneas' character are made clear in a comparison with the Georgics. There the pithy instruction is read that if in the hive two kings are found, one of them, the weaker, must be put to death (Georg. 4. 89–90). It is a relief that Virgil did not choose in the Aeneid to follow this easy way of settling the conflict between Aeneas and Turnus.

The inherited religion of the Aeneid is a mixture of Greek and Roman popular beliefs and of Hellenistic and oriental mystery religions. There are also traces of Platonic, Stoic, and neo-Pythagorean philosophy. But pride of place goes to the values of Rome, notably pietas, the right attitude towards country, parents, children, kinsfolk, guests and friends living and dead. This is the quality embodied by Aeneas. Just as at the end of the 2nd book he takes his father onto his shoulders, so at the end of the 8th book, he takes up the destiny of his descendants, symbolized by the shield. A moral idea like pietas, distinguishing Aeneas from Ulysses and Achilles, determines therefore both the imagery and the structure of the Aeneid.

It is also important that Aeneas is conducting a just war. For his behavior the Roman concept of the bellum pium et iustum is crucial. At times, behavior is found which seems to point beyond the Greek and Roman canon of virtues, such as the sympathy with his opponent in the Lausus episode.

In creating the Aeneid and its heroes, Virgil welded together into a new unity a great diversity of Greek, Roman, and oriental notions drawn not only from religion, but also from philosophy and society.

Likewise the main conceptual themes of the earlier works recur in Virgil's epic and are set in a yet wider context.

---

<sup>1</sup> A pioneering essay: H.-P. STAHL, Aeneas—An 'Unheroic' Hero?, Arethusa 14, 1981, 157–177; M. ERLER, Der Zorn des Helden, GB 18, 1992, 103–126 (on Philodemus and Virgil).

<sup>2</sup> In the expression meorum there is also for Aeneas a legitimization: see now C. RENGER 1985. Along with other archaic religious features we may mention the artistic employment of magic notions such as the curse on weapons taken from an enemy, which persecute and punish their new owner in the name of the previous owner.

Love, a principal theme of the Eclogues, is presented there in its omnipotence as an all-conquering passion (cf. the end of Eclogue 10). In the Georgics, love appears as a mighty force in the life of animals, while in the community of the bees their superiority to sexuality is emphasized as a special merit. In the story of Orpheus at the end of the Georgics love enters a larger context. It now bears human features and is linked with cycles of themes such as 'death and life' and 'the power of song and its limits'. The Aeneid depicts love as a fate which, however, can be no more than a counterpoint to the political misdeeds of the two protagonists. The collision between public and private destiny is tragic. Thus love's tragedy, already known from the Eclogues, recurs in the Aeneid but in a broader, heroic framework.

The changing aspects under which the motif of earth occurs exemplify the relationship to reality found in the different works. In the Eclogues the earth is not only the locale of the happy dreams of the shepherds and of a Golden Age, brought about by the birth of the child, but it is also quite specific, Italian earth, the object of land allocation and industrious toil (a feature pointing ahead to the Georgics).<sup>1</sup>

In the Georgics the earth is universalized and becomes the setting for life and death. As a political stage it serves the princeps, who is a star destined to win universal significance; and as a field it furnishes a motive for the peaceful and civilized activity the prototype of which is agriculture. But earth has another specific aspect. For the native of the country watered by the Mincio, it is embodied in Italy, whose central role emerges already in the Eclogues. In Virgil's didactic poem Italy is 'the mother of earth's fruits' (frugum), but also 'the mother of men' (virum, Georg. 2. 173–174). This last feature forms a parallel to the vision of heroes in the 6th book of the Aeneid, and thus the Georgics occupy a central place between the latter and the Eclogues.

In the Aeneid the earth is the scene for deeds of arms and history. Particular places gain significance, along with their geographical position (e.g. Aen. 1. 13 Karthago, Italiam contra) and the sequence of locales—among which Troy, Carthage, Sicily, and Italy may be mentioned. Passages rich in detail, such as catalogues skipped by hasty readers, suggest the physical presence of Italy, its cities, and their inhabitants. The predominantly contemporary perspective of the

<sup>1</sup> On this R. KETTEMANN 1977.

Eclogues is in the Aeneid definitively replaced with a panorama of world history. Virgil had to study Italy's early history in order to write his epic. But with this there also recurs the 'soteriological' aspect of the Eclogues, in the shape of the pastoral world of old Arcadia on Roman soil, found in the 8th book of the Aeneid. Thus Virgil's epic resumes and incorporates points of view found in bucolic.

Virgil immerses himself with great seriousness in the facts, without losing his way. This is shown also by his view of history. Drawing on Sibylline prophecies, the 4th Eclogue proclaims the birth of a new age within a 'cyclic' scheme of history. Late antiquity and the Middle Ages saw here a prophecy of Christian redemption. Historically this is incorrect, but the correspondences between the Jewish-Hellenistic, Roman, and Christian sense of mission and epoch are significant enough. The Aeneid's picture of history is determined by the fata. A linear development leads towards an eternal dominance of Rome. In the Iliad the prophecy relating to Aeneas' descendants is only an incidental feature, while in the Aeneid this concept determines the structure of an entire epic. It is no coincidence that the classical author of a Christian philosophy of history, Augustine, would later reflect critically on Virgil's theology of Rome.

Instead of theorizing about history, Virgil set before his readers living symbols of the future: in the eclogue to Pollio, the birth of the child embodying the new age, in the vision of heroes the throng of Romans yet unborn.<sup>1</sup> We are confronted therefore with the rare case of an epic whose final culmination is not downfall but the emergence of future life. In this reversal of the tendency seen in the Iliad, Virgil's genius gives proof of itself. In this, 'prophecy' is not only a technical means: the entire invention of the Aeneid is determined by its orientation towards the future, for this is to grasp Roman history by its very root. To some extent Virgil presents Rome in statu nascendi, that is at the moment when its potential energy was strongest. He was more concerned with the powers moving and shaping Rome's history than with particular details and the often accidental nature of events. For this reason the main action had to be fashioned as a myth. A unified action was to be narrated, whereas the diversity of actual history could be reflected and prefigured only indirectly. Virgil reversed, as it were, the intention of the methods of interpretation employed by the Homeric scholiasts<sup>1</sup> and created a Roman myth. This allowed him to avoid successfully the perennial temptation of historical epic, which is to become lost in details, and that of philosophy of history, to fall under the tyranny of schemes and theories. He created both a unified work and a unified picture of history.

---

<sup>1</sup> The similarity of the symbols in eccl. 4 and Aen. 6 is not a coincidence. The symbol of the newborn, like that of the prematurely dead, plays a decisive part in Virgil's reflections on death and life.

Just as the theme of 'nature' links the Eclogues and the Georgics, so the theme of 'history' links the Eclogues and the Aeneid, though the Aeneid is supplemented by theologia physica, as the Georgics are by the doctrine of the origin of civilization. In this respect too the Aeneid offers both the richest palette and also the widest-ranging synthesis of the great themes of 'nature' and 'history'.

Transmission

The transmission of Virgil is rich in both quantity and quality. A stemma cannot be established for antiquity because of the small number of the witnesses, nor for the Middle Ages because of their large number. We possess, either in whole or in part, the following ancient codices in majuscules:<sup>2</sup> Augusteus, Vat. Lat. 3256, Berol. Lat. 2° 416 (A; 5th century) from St-Denis, 8 leaves, with fragments of the Georgics and Aen. 4. 302–305; Sangallensis, miscellaneous codex 1394 (G; 5th century), 11 leaves with fragments from the Georgics and Aeneid; Veronensis 40. 38, rescriptus (V; 5th century), 51 leaves with fragments from Bucolics, Georgics, Aeneid along with the Veronese scholia; Mediolanensis (Ambrosianus), rescriptus, 81 verses from the 1st book of the Aeneid in Latin and Greek (B; 5th–6th century); Cod. Fulvii Ursini schedae bibliothecae Vaticanae, Vat. Lat. 3225 (F; 4th century) with illustrations, 75 leaves preserved without Bucolics, Georgics I and II, and Aeneid X and XII, and with other serious lacunae; Romanus, Vat. Lat. 3867 (R; 5th–6th century), with illustrations, contains Bucolics, Georgics, Aeneid with lacunae; Vaticanus Palatinus Lat. 1631 (P; 5th–6th century), contains all works with lacunae; Mediceus (Laur. plut. 39, 1), (M; 5th century), contains everything except eccl. 1–6. 47; the second corrector was Turcius Rufius Apronianus Asterius, consul 494. Editors rely mainly on M, P, and R. The medieval manuscripts are not without value.

<sup>1</sup> G. N. KNAUER 1964, 356; 358, following E. ZINN.

<sup>2</sup> Dating according to Mynors (edition). On illustrated manuscripts s. now: A. GEYER, Die Genese narrativer Buchillustration. Der Miniaturzyklus zur Aeneis im Vergilius Vaticanus, Frankfurt 1989; A. WLOSOK, Gemina Pictura. Allegorisierende Aeneisillustrationen in Handschriften des 15. Jh., R. M. WILHELM and H. JONES, eds., FS G. MACKEY, The Two Worlds of the Poet. New Perspectives on Vergil, Detroit 1992, 408–432.

Where P is deficient, the related Guelferbytanus Gudianus 2°. 70 (γ, 9th–10th century) is useful. Even the secondary tradition is not to be neglected, since ancient grammarians and commentators used at times a better text than we have.

The additional portions of texts transmitted by Donatus and Servius are however deeply suspect: the prelude to the Aeneid (1, A–D) and the Helen passage (Aen. 2. 567–588). They are not found in the ancient manuscripts. If the rather weak and maladroit<sup>1</sup> introduction (something I find incredible) really was found in the manuscript left by Virgil, its purpose was to identify the author, but not to form part of the epic. In any case, Varius and Tucca were right in deleting it. One might perhaps think of an early book seller, who, possibly on the occasion of the first edition, wanted to make capital by an allusion to the famous author. The Helen episode is at best a rough draft, and at worst a forgery.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

Virgil's work had repercussions even among his contemporaries, as for example Horace and Propertius. Ovid drew on the Aeneid especially in the Letter of Dido (Heroides 7) and in the later portions of the Metamorphoses. Moreover, the cosmological and erotic account of the universe in the sixth Eclogue is a prefiguration of the Metamorphoses, and it was left to Ovid to fulfill the plans of Gallus. The eulogy of the emperor and the story of Orpheus in the Georgics are other Virgilian passages which had their effect on Ovid.

Grammarians lost no time in busying themselves with Virgil. Much was done to establish a reliable text and its interpretation. The surviving commentary of Servius marks the final point of a long series.

For posterity Virgil set a lasting stamp on the genres of poetry he had practiced. He influenced didactic poetry, starting with Manilius and Germanicus; bucolic, from Calpurnius to Petrarch and modern times; and, of course, epic. Lucan, who boldly diverges from the norm, is, nevertheless, antithetically related to his great predecessor, whereas Valerius Flaccus, Statius, and Silius Italicus follow Virgil with veneration. Late antiquity witnessed, apart from Claudian's political epic, also his poem De raptu Proserpinae, which both in form and content makes an instructive counterpart to the Georgics. Nor was Virgil ignored by the writers of biblical epic (Juvencus, Sedulius, and others). In the eastern empire there were versions with interlinear Greek, intended to aid the understanding of the original.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> E.g. at in the last verse of the introduction is intolerable.

<sup>2</sup> D. COMPARETTI, Virgilio nel medio evo, 2 vols. (1872), new edition by G. PASQUALI, Firenze 1937–1941; E. NITCHIE, Virgil and the English Poets, New York 1919, repr. 1966; G. GORDON, Virgil in English Poetry (1931), The Folcroft Press 1974; W. SUERBAUM, Vergils Aeneis. Beiträge zu ihrer Rezeption in Gegenwart und Geschichte, Bamberg 1981; C. MARTINDALE, Virgil and His Influence, Bristol 1984; S. GREBE 1989; C. KALLENDORF, In Praise of Aeneas. Virgil and Epideictic Rhetoric in the Early Italian Renaissance, London 1989; K.-D. KOCH, Die Aeneis als Opernsujet. Dramaturgische Wandlungen vom Frühbarock bis zu Berlioz, Konstanz 1990; A. WLOSOK, Zur Geltung und Beurteilung Vergils und Homers in Spätantike und früher Neuzeit, in: A.W., Res humanae—res divinae. Kleine Schriften, Heidelberg 1990, 476–498; T. ZIOLKOWSKI, Virgil and the Moderns, Princeton 1993.

In considering the inheritance of form the reader is often tempted to forget the more important persistence of content. Even down to the Geoponica, Virgil is present as teacher. The emperor Constantine—or someone writing in his name—gave a Christian interpretation to the fourth Eclogue. Church Fathers,<sup>2</sup> among whom Augustine (d. 430) may be mentioned, took critical account of the theology of history developed by the poet. Macrobius (early 5th century) compared Virgil with the creativity of nature (Sat. 5. 1. 18–2. 3), and so approached the idea of poetic creativity. Fulgentius (end of 5th century) saw in the Aeneid a picture of human life;<sup>3</sup> in the 12th century Bernardus Silvestris would find in Aeneid 1–6 an allegory of the stages of human life.

Virgil was honored by the Middle Ages as a sage and magician. The period of Charlemagne particularly deserves the name of aetas Vergiliana, although he was read at all times and even quoted as the poet. Walahfrid Strabo (first half of 9th century) in his De cultu hortorum drew inspiration from the Georgics, as did Wandalbert of Prüm in his De mensium XII nominibus. In the 12th century, Virgil was temporarily eclipsed by the emotionality of Lucan.

The influence of the Aeneid cannot be described here in all its richness. Individual images such as that of the bees take on their own life.<sup>1</sup> The poets of the early empire followed Homer as well as Virgil. The Middle Ages read Virgil without Homer. Under Virgil's patronage, epics were written in medieval<sup>2</sup> and neo-Latin,<sup>3</sup> and soon in the vernacular languages.<sup>4</sup> For Dante (d. 1321) Virgil was the poet and, even more, his guide through the Inferno. Chaucer assigned Virgil a place of honor in his House of Fame. Early Renaissance readers set Virgil above Homer.

<sup>1</sup> B. ROCHETTE, Les traductions grecques de l'Énéide sur papyrus. Une contribution à l'étude du bilinguisme gréco-latin au Bas-Empire, LEC 58, 1990, 333–346; V. REICHMANN, Römische Literatur in griechischer Übersetzung, Leipzig 1943, 28–61.

<sup>2</sup> A. WŁOSOK, Zwei Beispiele frühchristlicher Vergilrezeption: Polemik (Lact. inst. 5. 10) and Usurpation (Or. Const. 19–21); in: V. PÖSCHL, ed., 1983, 63–86; E. HECK, Vestrum est—poeta noster. Von der Geringschätzung Vergils zu seiner Aneignung in der frühchristlichen lateinischen Apologetik, MH 47, 1990, 102–120; Jerome, who had been a pupil of Donatus, knew his Virgil perfectly. Proba wrote a Christian Virgilian cento, which, however, did not find Jerome's approval.

<sup>3</sup> Expositio Vergilianae continentiae secundum philosophos morales.

Virgil was much read and translated. Before 1400 a Gaelic version appeared. In the 15th century, there were French and Spanish paraphrases in prose (Guillaume Leroy, Enrique de Villena). About 1500, Octovien de Saint-Gelais produced the first regular French translation in verse.<sup>5</sup> No less a poet than Du Bellay translated books 4 (1552) and 6 (1561), and Desmases rendered the entire Aeneid (1560). Scotland and England were represented by Gawin Douglas (1513, published 1553), Richard Stanyhurst (1583: Aen. 1–4 in idiosyncratic English hexameters), and Germany by T. Murner (1515); Johann Spreng (1610; first German translation into verse). Spain witnessed a translation by Tasso's friend Cristobal de Mesa (16th century), followed in Italy by that of Annibal Caro (1581), and in Holland the greatest of Dutch poets, Vondel (d. 1679), presented in 1646 the whole of Virgil in 'Low German' Alexandrines, an impressive literary and linguistic achievement.<sup>6</sup>

Virgil provided lessons in writing poetry that deserved the name.<sup>7</sup> Epic in the Virgilian tradition divided into national and religious branches. Camões (d. 1580) composed his grandiose national poem

<sup>1</sup> J. VON STACKELBERG, Das Bienengleichnis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der literarischen Imitatio. Romanische Forschungen 68, 1956, 271–293.

<sup>2</sup> Ekkehard's Waltharius and the Alexandreis of Walter of Châtillon are illustrious examples (G. METER, Walter of Châtillon's Alexandreis Book 10. A Commentary, Frankfurt 1991).

<sup>3</sup> M. A. DI CESARE, Vida's Christiad and Vergilian Epic, New York 1964.

<sup>4</sup> S. GREBE 1989.

<sup>5</sup> T. BRÜCKNER, Die erste französische Aeneis. Untersuchungen zu Octovien de Saint-Gelais' Übersetzung. Mit einer kritischen Edition des VI. Buches, diss. Düsseldorf 1987.

<sup>6</sup> Parodies of Virgil began very early (e.g. vit. Verg. Don. 175–184; Petron. 112; 132; Auson. cento nuptialis) and continued well into the modern age: G. LALLI, Aeneida travestita, 1633; P. SCARRON, Le Virgile travesti, 1648–1653; J. A. BLUMAUER, Aeneide (a fragment), 2 vols., 1783; parodies of the Aeneid enjoy great popularity to the present day in Ukraine and Russia.

<sup>7</sup> Initially imitation had been frighteningly close: Boccaccio's Theseis comprised exactly the same number of lines as Virgil's Aeneid.

Os Lusíadas<sup>1</sup> with justified pride in the greatness of the Portuguese empire, eclipsing the voyages of both Ulysses and Aeneas. In comparison, later efforts such as that of Voltaire's Henriade and Chéraskov's Rossiada pale into insignificance. Vida (d. 1566), in his Latin Christias, gave to the gospels the garb of Virgilian humanism. Tasso (d. 1595),<sup>2</sup> in the train of the Counter-Reformation, combined medieval material with Virgilian sensitivity to form and Christian themes (Gerusalemme liberata). The perfect blending of three cultures was attained in Milton<sup>3</sup> (d. 1674). The employment of Virgil as a subtext, along with Homer and the Bible, reached in Paradise Lost a high point never again attained. The streams of exegesis and poetry, reception and creation here blended with an intensity matched elsewhere only in Dante and Virgil himself. Klopstock's (d. 1803) Messias fell short of its great predecessors in external and internal coherence. Furthermore the Aeneid strongly influenced opera.<sup>4</sup>

It was the increasing value set on 'original genius'<sup>5</sup> and on folk poetry (Ossian), as well as German philhellenism, that ushered in a period setting Homer above Virgil. The Virgil of J. H. Voss did not therefore become part of German literature to the extent that his Homer did. Goethe spoke of Virgil only incidentally and in somewhat patronizing terms, whereas Schiller<sup>6</sup> translated two books of the Aeneid into brilliant ottave rime. Pushkin (d. 1837), in his masterpiece Evgeniy Onegin, shaped with convincing poetic power the last encounter between Tatyana and Onegin as a modern pendant to Virgil's Dido scene in the underworld. C. F. Meyer (d. 1898), in what is perhaps his most personal story, Der Heilige, used the Aeneid as a subtext.<sup>7</sup> The same may be said of a story of Turgeniev (d. 1883). In a thoughtful comparison, Victor Hugo described Homer as the

<sup>1</sup> On Camões, Tasso, Milton see VON ALBRECHT, Rom 361–403; on Dante, Tasso, Milton see S. GREBE 1989 (with bibliography).

<sup>2</sup> F. J. WORSTBROCK 1963.

<sup>3</sup> C. MARTINDALE, John Milton and the Transformation of Ancient Epic, London 1986.

<sup>4</sup> K.-D. Koch, Die Aeneis als Opersujet, Konstanz 1990.

<sup>5</sup> Already Dryden, Pope, Addison set store by Homer. A milestone was formed by Robert Wood, Essay on the Original Genius of Homer (1769).

<sup>6</sup> On an older effort by Schiller: W. SCHUBERT, Schillers Übersetzung des 'Sturms auf dem Tyrrhener Meer' (Verg. Aen. 1. 34–156), in: A. AURNHAMMER (and others), eds., Schiller und die höfische Welt, Tübingen 1990, 191–212 (with further bibl.).

<sup>7</sup> VON ALBRECHT, Rom 106–107; on Turgeniev idem, forthcoming.

sun, and Virgil as the moon.<sup>1</sup> Baudelaire, Valéry, and Tennyson were under the spell of Virgil as well. As the 19th century waned, the affinity of that period for Dante indirectly prepared the way for a new understanding of Virgil.

The re-evaluation of the poet by scholarship about 1900 (R. Heinze, E. Norden) brought in its train the late rediscovery of Virgil for German literature. R. A. Schröder's translation (begun 1930, finished 1952) may be noted along with H. Broch's novel, Der Tod des Vergil (1945). According to Broch's poem Vergil in des Orpheus Nachfolge,<sup>2</sup> the shaping of earthly life is 'entrusted to those who have been in the darkness and yet have torn themselves free/like Orpheus to a painful return.' Much more than the embodiment of the 'classic' (T. S. Eliot), Virgil here again becomes the prototype of the poet and even of man as an intellectual being.

In antiquity, Virgil's bucolic poetry found independent successors in Calpurnius, the Einsiedeln Eclogues (1st century A.D.) and Nemesianus (second half of 3rd century). Calpurnius already interpreted the genre for his own time in a novel way; more than in Virgil and Theocritus, eulogy of the emperor strikes a dominant note. A Christian pastoral in asclepiads was composed by Endecheius (about 400).<sup>3</sup>

In the Middle Ages and modern period, the Eclogues inspired whole genres of literature, which here can only be mentioned in passing.<sup>4</sup> From the Middle Ages, for example, a double eclogue is known, addressed to Charlemagne by Modoin of Autun (9th century), who here, taking the name Naso, writes as a poet to defend his own cause and celebrates the new Golden Age. Here, the history of the influence of the Eclogues<sup>5</sup> joins the history of their interpretation, since already ancient scholarship had treated the Eclogues as biographical allegories. Aware of this school of interpretation, Dante used a Latin

<sup>1</sup> Préface à Cromwell (1827).

<sup>2</sup> H. BROCH, Die Heimkehr. Prosa und Lyrik, Frankfurt 1962, 174.

<sup>3</sup> Wolfg. SCHMID, Tityrus christianus, RhM 96, 1953, 101-165; repr. in: K. GARBER, ed., Europäische Bukolik und Georgik, Darmstadt 1976 (collection of articles), 44-121.

<sup>4</sup> K. KRAUTTER, Die Renaissance der Bukolik in der lateinischen Literatur des 14. Jh. von Dante bis Petrarca, München 1983. On Virgil and Petrarch see also VON ALBRECHT, Poesie 132-173; H. C. SCHNUR, R. KÖSSLING, eds., Die Hirtenflöte. Bukolische Dichtungen von Vergil bis Geßner, Leipzig 1978; A. PATTERSON, Pastoral and Ideology. Virgil to Valéry, Oxford 1988.

<sup>5</sup> Virgil did not call his poems eclogae. In ancient literary criticism the word denotes a poem selected (for example from the Bucolics).

eclogue to defend his employment of Italian in the Divine Comedy, and Petrarch (d. 1374) treated personal themes allegorically in the Carmen bucolicum which he composed in twelve poems, contributing his own commentary. A blend of pastoral poetry, hunting topics (inspired by the 10th Eclogue), and sublime allegory are found in the Ameto of Boccaccio (d. 1375). Sannazaro (d. 1530) was the author of an influential Arcadia, written in Italian in a mixture of prose and verse. The same poet also composed original eclogues in Latin on the life of fishermen. But the most famous writer of neo-Latin pastoral was Baptista Mantuanus (last third of the 15th century), who also ventured into social criticism. This same feature was found at the beginning of the 16th century in the Erfurt humanists, especially Joachim Camerarius and Euricius Cordus, who was influenced by Luther, though not in Eobanus Hessus. Pastoral poetry in German, as late as the graceful prose of Gessner (d. 1788), was mostly limited to the expression of personal feelings. The Spaniard Garcilaso de la Vega (d. 1536) produced long melancholy eclogues following Virgil and Sannazaro. Clément Marot (d. 1544) celebrated French country-folk in a French landscape. In the Six Eclogues of Ronsard (d. 1595), the presence of Virgil and Calpurnius is sensed. At the time of the French Revolution André Chénier (d. 1794) wrote his exquisite Bucoliques. The Après-midi d'un Faune of Mallarmé (d. 1898) inspired a Prélude of Debussy (d. 1918).

Spenser's elegant Shepherd's Calendar (1579) was influenced more by the Renaissance than by antiquity. Milton (d. 1674) reflected the two aspects of his life in L'Allegro and Il Penseroso. Pope's Pastorals should also be mentioned. The three greatest English pastoral elegies are Milton's Lycidas, the Adonais of Shelley (d. 1822) and the Thyrsis of Matthew Arnold (d. 1888).

Pastoral poetry, in the tradition of the Arcadia rather than that of Virgil, gave rise to narrative forms. Jorge of Montemayor (d. 1561), in his Diana, created from pastoral material a continuous erotic narrative, as had already been done in antiquity by Longus. From France must be mentioned the Astrée of Honoré d'Urfé (d. 1625) and the Paul et Virginie of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre (d. 1814). A less tranquil spirit is found in The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia by Philip Sidney (d. 1586).

A Renaissance creation was the pastoral drama, exemplified by Tasso's Aminta (printed 1580) and Guarini's Il pastor fido (performed 1595). Milton's Comus also deserves mention. Musical drama and opera often prefer a pastoral framework. Examples are the Acis and Galatea of Handel (d. 1759), the Phoebus und Pan of Bach (d. 1750), and the Orpheus und Eurydice of Gluck (d. 1787). In music, particular rhythms and keys are linked with the notion of pastoral music, not only in religious works, such as Bach's Christmas Oratorio, but also in the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven (d. 1827).

As a didactic poem on nature, the Georgics<sup>1</sup> have exercised considerable influence since the time of the Renaissance, at first in Latin, as for example in the Rusticus of Politian (d. 1494), the Syphilis of Fracastoro (d. 1553), and the De bombycum cura et usu by Vida (d. 1566). These were soon followed by works in the vernacular languages such as Le api of Giovanni Rucellai (d. 1525) and the Della coltivazione of Luigi Alamanni (d. 1556). In France, the Georgics had been admired from the days of Ronsard and Montaigne on. As late as 1665 Rapin composed his Hortorum libri IV in Latin, a work also studied in England. In Germany, the Lob deß Landlustes of Johann Fischart (d. 1590) stood in a tradition mingling the end of the 2nd book of the Georgics with Horace's 2nd Epode. In England, the Georgics exercised a powerful influence, notably in the 18th century. We may mention the Seasons of James Thomson (d. 1748) from which the libretto of the Seasons of Haydn (d. 1809) is drawn.

Even Virgil's poetic career, which led him from relatively small to ever greater compositions, would become a model for many poets and writers to come,<sup>2</sup> though this is so natural a sequence that the reverse order is difficult to imagine. Yet it remains significant that for many poets Virgil (usually considered the prototype of artistic poetry) proved to be a guide to a better understanding of the nature of things and of the poet's own nature.

Editions: With a dedication of Bishop Andreas of Aleria: Romae before 1469. * IO. L. DE LA CERDA (TC), 3 vols., Lugduni 1612–1619 (not yet replaced; extracts in the Editio Heyniana, vols. 3–6, Londini 1819). * C. G. HEYNE (important), G. P. E. WAGNER (TC), 5 vols., Lipsiae 1830–1841. * T. E. PAGE (TC), 3 vols., London 1896–1900. * T. LADEWIG, K. SCHAPER, P. JAHN, P. DEUTICKE (TC), 3 vols., Berlin, 1: 8th ed. 1907; 2: 13th ed. 1912; 3: 9th

<sup>1</sup> On the influence of the Georgics L. P. WILKINSON 1969, 270–313.

<sup>2</sup> Lucan, medieval poets (who called this pattern rota Virgili), Spenser, Milton, Pope, Proust, Joyce, Musil, and some Romantics (CONTE, LG 289).

ed. 1904. * J. CONINGTON, H. NETTLESHIP, F. HAVERFIELD (TC), 3 vols., London, 1: 5th ed. 1898; 2: 4th ed. 1884; 3: 3rd ed. 1883. * H. RUSHTON FAIRCLOUGH (TTrN) London 1916 and reprints. * R. SABBADINI, L. CASTIGLIONI, M. GEYMONAT, Torino 3rd ed. 1973. * R. A. B. MYNORS, Oxford 1969. * J. and M. GÖTTE (TTrN), 2 vols., München, 1: 5th ed. 1987; 2: 7th ed. 1988. * ecl.: C. HOSIUS (T), Bonn 1915. * G. ALBINI (TC), Bologna 2nd ed. 1920, repr. 1957. * E. DE SAINT-DENIS (TTrN), Paris 5th ed. 1987. * R. COLEMAN (TC), Cambridge 1977. * G. LEE (TTrC), Liverpool 1980. * W. CLAUSEN (C), Oxford 1994. * ecl. and georg.: C. DAY LEWIS (Tr), with introd. by R. O. A. M. LYNE, Oxford 1983. * georg.: W. RICHTER (TC), München 1957. * M. ERREN (TTrC), vol. 1, Heidelberg 1985. * R. F. THOMAS (TC), Cambridge 1989. * R. A. B. MYNORS (TC), Oxford 1990. * Aen.: J. W. MACKAIL (TN), Oxford 1930. * C. DAY LEWIS (Tr), Oxford 1952 and reprints. * D. WEST (Tr), Harmondsworth 1990. * Aen. 1 and 2: A. WEIDNER (C), Leipzig 1869. * Aen. 1: R. S. CONWAY (TC), Cambridge 1935. * R. G. AUSTIN (TC), Oxford 1971. * G. STÉGEN (TC), Namur 1975. * Aen. 2: R. G. AUSTIN (TC), Oxford 1964. * Aen. 3: R. D. WILLIAMS (TC), Oxford 1962. * Aen. 4: A. S. PEASE (TC), Cambridge, Mass. 1935, repr. 1967. * R. G. AUSTIN (TC), Oxford 1955. * Aen. 5: R. D. WILLIAMS (TC), Oxford 1960. * Aen. 6: E. NORDEN (TTrC, authoritative), Leipzig 3rd ed. 1926, repr. 1994. * R. G. AUSTIN (TC), Oxford 1977. * Aen. 7 and 8: C. J. FORDYCE (TC), Oxford 1977. * Aen. 8: P. T. EDEN (C), Leiden 1975. * K. W. GRANSDEN (TC), Cambridge 1976. * Aen. 9: E. T. PAGE (TC), London 1938. * Aen. 10: R. J. FORMAN (C), Ann Arbor 1973. * S. J. HARRISON (TTrC), Oxford 1991. * Aen. 11: H. E. GOULD (TC), London 1964. * K. W. GRANSDEN (TC), Cambridge 1991. * Aen. 12: W. S. MAGUINNESS (TC), London 3rd ed. 1964. * Appendix Vergiliana: W. V. CLAUSEN, F. R. D. GOODYEAR, E. J. KENNEY, J. A. RICHMOND, Oxford 1966. * Ancient Vitae: C. HARDIE, Oxford 1957. * Ancient commentaries: s. Servius. ** Ind., lexicon: M. N. WETMORE, Index verborum Vergilianus, New Haven 2nd ed. 1930, repr. 1961. * H. MERGUET, Lexikon zu Vergilius mit Angabe sämtlicher Stellen, Leipzig 1912, repr. 1960. * R. LECROMPE, Virgile, Bucoliques. Index verborum, relevés statistiques, Hildesheim 1970. * M. WACHT, Concordantia Vergiliana, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1994. * Enciclopedia Virgiliana, Roma 1984—(very helpful). ** Bibl.: W. SUERBAUM, Hundert Jahre Vergil-Forschung. Eine systematische Arbeitsbibliographie mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Aeneis, ANRW 2, 31, 1, 1980, 1–358. * Id., Spezialbibliographie zu Vergils Georgica, ibid. 395–499. * W. W. BRIGGS, A Bibliography of Vergil's Eclogues (1927–1977), ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, 1267–1357. * W. SUERBAUM, Autorenverzeichnis zu den Bibliographien, ibid. 1359–1399. * M. T. MORANO Rando, Bibliografia virgiliana, Genova 1987.

M. VON ALBRECHT, Einheit und Vielfalt von Vergils Lebenswerk, Gymnasium 90, 1983, 123–143. * P. J. ALPERS, The Singer of the Eclogues, Berkeley

1979. * Atti del Convegno virgiliano di Brindisi (1981), Perugia 1983 (collection of articles). * A. BARCHIESI, La traccia del modello, Pisa 1985. * G. BINDER, Aeneas und Augustus. Interpretationen zum 8. Buch der Aeneis, Meisenheim 1971. * M. BONFANTI, Punto di vista e modo di narrazione nell'Eneide, Pisa 1985. * I. BORZSÁK, Von Hippokrates bis Vergil, in: H. BARDON, R. VERDIÈRE, eds., Vergiliana, Leiden 1971, 41–55. * P. BOYANCÉ, La religion de Virgile, Paris 1963. * V. BUCHHEIT, *Vergil über die Sendung Roms. Untersuchungen zum Bellum Poenicum und zur *Aeneis, Heidelberg 1963. * V. BUCHHEIT, *Der Anspruch des Dichters in Vergils Georgika. Dichtertum und Heilsweg*, Darmstadt 1972. * K. BÜCHNER, P. VERGILIUS Maro, RE 8 A 2, 1958, 1266–1486 (1487–1493 appendix on the funeral games by E. MEHL). * E. BURCK, Vergils Aeneis, in: E. BURCK, ed., Das römische Epos, Darmstadt 1979, 51–119. * F. CAIRNS, Virgil's Augustan Epic, Cambridge 1989. * E. CHRISTMANN, *Zur antiken Georgica-Rezeption*, WJA 8, 1982, 57–67. * W. V. CLAUSEN, An Interpretation of the Aeneid, HSPH 68, 1964, 139–147. * W. V. CLAUSEN, Virgil's Aeneid and the Tradition of Hellenistic Poetry, Berkeley 1987. * G. B. CONTE, Il genere e i suoi confini. Cinque studi sulla poesia di Virgilio, Torino 1980. * G. B. CONTE, The Rhetoric of Imitation, Ithaca 1986. * G. D'ANNA, Virgilio. Saggi critici, Roma 1989. * J. FARRELL, Virgil's Georgics and the Tradition of Ancient Epic, New York 1991. * J. FERGUSON, Vergil and Philosophy, PVS 19, 1988, 17–29. * J. FOSTER, The End of the Third Georgic, PVS 19, 1988, 32–45. * G. K. GALINSKY, Aeneas, Sicily, and Rome, Princeton 1969. * G. K. GALINSKY, The Anger of Aeneas, AJPh 109, 1988, 321–348. * T. GESZTELYI, Vergil und die Politik, ACD 23, 1987, 51–56. * M. GIGANTE, ed., Virgilio e gli Augustei, Napoli 1990 (collection of articles). * R. GLEI, Der Vater aller Dinge. Interpretationen zur politischen, literarischen und kulturellen Dimension des Krieges bei Vergil, Trier 1991. * K. W. GRANDSEN, Virgil: The Aeneid, Cambridge 1990. * S. GREBE, Die vergilische Heldenschau. Tradition und Fortwirken, Frankfurt 1989. * M. A. GREENWOOD, Venus Intervenes: Five Episodes in the Aeneid, LCM 14, 1989, 132–136. * J. GRIFFIN, The Fourth Georgic, Virgil, and Rome, G&R 26, 1979, 61–80. * J. GRIFFIN, Virgil, Oxford 1986. * P. GRIMAL, Virgile ou la seconde naissance de Rome, Paris 1985. * T. HALTER, Form und Gehalt in Vergils Aeneis. Zur Funktion sprachlicher und metrischer Stilmittel, München 1963. * P. R. HARDIE, Virgil's Aeneid. Cosmos and Imperium, Oxford 1986. * E. L. HARRISON, Vergil's Introduction of Mezentius: Aeneid 7, 647–8, PVS 19, 1988, 70–77. * S. J. HARRISON, Oxford Readings in Virgil's Aeneid, Oxford 1990. * R. HEINZE, Virgils epische Technik, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1914, repr. 1994 (fundamental; s. now the English edition with a preface by A. WLOSOK, London 1993). * J. HENRY, Aeneidea, or Critical, Exegetical, and Esthetical Remarks on the Aeneid, 4 vols., London 1873–Dublin 1889. * N. HORSFALL, Virgilio: L'epopea in alambicco, Napoli 1991. * R. JOHNE, Dido und

Charikleia. Zur Gestaltung der Frau bei Vergil und im griechischen Liebesroman, Eirene 24, 1987, 21–33. * W. R. JOHNSON, Darkness Visible. A Study of Virgil's Aeneid, Berkeley 1976. * P. A. JOHNSTON, Virgil's Agricultural Golden Age, Leiden 1980. * P. E. KEHOE, Was Book 5 Once in a Different Place in the Aeneid?, AJPh 110, 1989, 246–263. * R. KETTEMANN, Bukolik und Georgik. Studien zu ihrer Affinität bei Vergil und später, Heidelberg 1977. * G. KLEMKE, Beobachtungen zur Vergilischen Parataxe: Das Phänomen der Entfaltung in der Aeneis, Frankfurt 1990. * F. KLINGNER, Virgil. Bucolica. Georgica. Aeneis, Zürich 1967. * G. N. KNAUER, Die Aeneis und Homer, Studien zur poetischen Technik Vergils, mit Listen der Homerzitate in der Aeneis, Göttingen 1964. * W. F. JACKSON KNIGHT, Roman Virgil, Harmondsworth 2nd ed. 1966. * W. KRAUS, Vergils vierte Ekloge: ein kritisches Hypomnema, ANRW 2, 31, 1, 1980, 604–645. * E. W. LEACH, Virgil's Eclogues: Landscapes of Experience, Ithaca 1974. * M. O. LEE, Death and Rebirth in Vergil's Arcadia, New York 1989. * R. O. A. M. LYNE, Further Voices in Virgil's Aeneid, Oxford 1987. * R. O. A. M. LYNE, Words and the Poet. Characteristic Techniques of Style in Virgil's Aeneid, Oxford 1989. * C. J. MACKIE, The Characterization of Aeneas, Edinburgh 1988. * F. MEHMEL, Virgil und Apollonius Rhodius. Untersuchungen über die Zeitvorstellungen in der antiken epischen Erzählung, Hamburg 1940. * G. B. MILES, Virgil's Georgics. A New Interpretation, Berkeley 1980. * R. C. MONTI, The Dido Episode and the Aeneid. Roman Social and Political Values in the Epic, Leiden 1981. * J. J. O'HARA, Death and Optimistic Prophecy in Vergil's Aeneid, Princeton 1990. * H. OPPERMANN, ed., Wege zu Vergil, Darmstadt 2nd ed. 1976. * B. OTIS, Virgil. A Study in Civilized Poetry, Oxford 1964, repr. 1967. * A. PARRY, The Two Voices of Virgil's Aeneid, Arion 2, 1963, 66–80. * C. G. PERKELL, The Poet's Truth. A Study of the Poet in Virgil's Georgics, Berkeley 1989. * V. PÖSCHL, Die Dichtkunst Virgils. Bild und Symbol in der Aeneis (1950; English ed.: The Art of Vergil, Ann Arbor 1962), Berlin 3rd ed. 1977 (modified). * V. PÖSCHL, ed., 2000 Jahre Vergil. Ein Symposium, Wiesbaden 1983. * M. C. J. PUTNAM, The Poetry of the Aeneid, Cambridge, Mass. 1965. * M. C. J. PUTNAM, Virgil's Pastoral Art, Princeton 1970. * M. C. J. PUTNAM, Virgil's Poem of the Earth, Princeton 1979. * M. C. J. PUTNAM, Virgil's Inferno, MD 20/21, 1988, 165–202. * K. QUINN, Virgil's Aeneid. A Critical Description, London 1968. * C. RENGER, Aeneas und Turnus. Analyse einer Feindschaft, Frankfurt 1985. * R. RIEKS, Affekte und Strukturen. Pathos als Form- und Wirkungsprinzip von Vergils Aeneis, München 1989. * F. ROBERTSON, Meminisse iuvabit: Selections from the Proceedings of the Virgil Society, Bristol 1988. * H. J. ROSE, The Eclogues of Vergil, Berkeley 1942. * D. O. ROSS, jr., Virgil's Elements. Physics and Poetry in the Georgics, Princeton 1987. * W. SCHADEWALDT, Sinn und Werden der Vergilischen Dichtung (1930), repr. in: H. OPPERMANN, ed., Wege zu Vergil, 43–68. * R. R. SCHLUNK, The Homeric Scholia and the Aeneid, Ann Arbor 1974. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Poetische Reflexion. Vergils Bukolik, München 1972. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Bukolische Leidenschaft oder Über antike Hirtenpoesie, Frankfurt 1987. * F. SERPA, Il punto su Virgilio, Roma 1987. * B. SNELL, Arkadien. Die Entdeckung einer geistigen Landschaft (1945), repr. in: H. OPPERMAN, ed. (s. above) 338–367. * H.-P. STAHL, Aeneas—an ‘Unheroic’ Hero?, Arethusa 14, 1981, 157–177. * R. F. THOMAS, Prose into Poetry. Tradition and Meaning in Virgil’s Georgics, HSPh 91, 1987, 229–260. * G. THOME, Gestalt und Funktion des Mezentius bei Vergil, Frankfurt 1979. * A. THORNTON, The Living Universe: Gods and Men in Virgil’s Aeneid, Leiden 1976. * J. VAN SICKLE, The Design of Virgil’s Bucolics, Rome 1978. * T. WEBER, Fidus Achates. Der Gefährte des Aeneas in Vergils Aeneis, Frankfurt 1988. * P. WIGODSKY, Virgil and Early Latin Poetry, Wiesbaden 1972. * R. M. WILHELM, H. JONES, eds., The Two Worlds of the Poet. New Perspectives on Vergil, Detroit 1992. * L. P. WILKINSON, The Georgics of Virgil. A Critical Survey, Cambridge 1969. * M. M. WILLCOCK, Homer’s Chariot Race and Virgil’s Boat Race, PVS 19, 1988, 1–13. * G. WILLIAMS, Techniques and Ideas in the Aeneid, New Haven 1983. * R. D. WILLIAMS, Virgil, Oxford 1967. * R. D. WILLIAMS, The Aeneid, London 1987. * W. WIMMEL, Hirtenkrieg und arkadisches Rom. Reduktionssmedien in Vergils Aeneis, München 1973. * A. WLOSOK, Die Göttin Venus in Vergils Aeneis, Heidelberg 1967. * A. WLOSOK, Der Held als Ärgernis: Vergils Aeneas, WJA n.s. 8, 1982, 9–21. * A. WLOSOK, Et poeticae figmentum et philosophiae veritatem. Bemerkungen zum 6. Aeneisbuch, insbesondere zur Funktion der Rede des Anchises (724 ff.), LF 106, 1983, 13–19. * F. J. WORSTBROCK, Elemente einer Poetik der Aeneis. Untersuchungen zum Gattungsstil vergilianischer Epik, Münster 1963. * E. ZINN, Epilogue to: Vergil, Aeneis, Tr. by R. A. SCHRÖDER, Frankfurt 1963, 312–322, repr. in: E. ZINN, Viva Vox, Frankfurt 1994, 185–196. * C. ZINTZEN, Die Laokoon-episode bei Vergil, AAWM 1979, 10.

Appendix Vergiliana<sup>1</sup>

Various minor works were current under Virgil’s name in antiquity which are either spurious or of doubtful attribution. They deserve a brief mention, since they illustrate the 'regular' Hellenistic trend of literary history. It is only against this background that the achievement of the Augustan classics is rightly appreciated in all its greatness. This makes it appropriate to examine the poems of the Appendix in the present context in spite of the uncertainty of their dates of origin.

---

<sup>1</sup> Editions: F. VOLLMER, Poetae Latini minores I: Appendix Vergiliana, Lipsiae 1910; R. GIOMINI (TTrN with ecl.), Firenze 2nd ed. 1962; H. NAUMANN (TTrN, part with ecl.), München 1968; W. V. CLAUSEN, F. R. D. GOODYEAR, E. J. KENNEY, J. A. RICHMOND (T), Oxford 1966; F. DELLA CORTE (TTr), Genova 1974–1975; A. SALVATORE (TN), Torino 1957–1960; A. SALVATORE (TC), Appendix Vergiliana I: Epigrammata et Priapea, Napoli 1963; II (TTrN, notes): Culex etc., Napoli 1964; concordance: H. MORGENROTH, D. NAJOCK, Concordantia in Appendicem Vergilianam, Hildesheim 1992; bibl.: K. BÜCHNER, Vergilius Maro, RE 8 A 1, 1955, 1062–1180;

Culex

There is good evidence that in his youth Virgil composed a Culex, though that does not necessarily prove that this was the Culex we have (414 hexameters). The numerous echoes of Virgil's later works in the poem may count just as much against as in favor of authenticity, although many important Latinists have believed the work was genuine.<sup>1</sup> Today most scholars date the Culex to the period of Tiberius and Claudius.<sup>2</sup>

The plot is quite simple. During his afternoon siesta a shepherd would have been bitten by a snake had he not been awakened and so rescued by

---

R. E. H. WESTENDORP BOERMA, OÙ en est aujourd'hui l'énigme de l'Appendix Vergiliana?, in: H. BARDON, R. VERDIÈRE, eds., Vergiliana. Recherches sur Virgile, Leiden 1971, 386–421; C. CONTI, Rassegna di studi sull' Appendix Vergiliana dal 1955 al 1971 (1972), BStudLat 3, 1973, 351–392; 4, 1974, 229–263; J. RICHMOND, Recent Work on the Appendix Vergiliana (1950–1975), ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, 1112–1154; E. BICKEL, Syllabus indiciorum quibus pseudovergiliana et pseudovidiana carmina definiantur, RhM 93, 1950, 289–324; G. E. DUCKWORTH, Studies in Latin Hexameter Poetry, TAPhA 97, 1966, 67–113 (Culex and Moretum close to Virgil; Ciris, Dirae, Aetna certainly spurious); R. O. A. M. LYNE, A New Collation of the Graz Fragment (Steiermärkisches Landesarchiv, Hs. 1814), WS 6, 1972, 79–92; M. D. REEVE, The Textual Tradition of the Appendix Vergiliana, Maia 28, 1976, 233–254; J. A. RICHMOND, Quaeritur quomodo Appendicis Vergilianae poemata in unum convenerint, RFIC 104, 1976, 26–30; A. SALVATORE, Virgilio e Pseudovirgilio. Studi su l'Appendix, Napoli 1994.

<sup>1</sup> Separate editions: C. PLÉSENT, Le Culex. Édition critique, Paris 1910; M. SCHMIDT (TTrN), Berlin 1959; A. SOLER (TTrN), EClás 16, 1972, No. 67, 1–29; bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, esp. 1125–1130; C. PLÉSENT, Le Culex, Étude, Paris 1910; in favor of authenticity: F. SKUTSCH, Aus Vergils Frühzeit, Leipzig 1901, 125 (similarly Näge, Teuffel, Ribbeck, Kroll, and many others); for the Augustan period: F. BÜCHELER, Coniectanea, RhM 45, 1890, 321–334, esp. 323; for the Tiberian period (convincing): E. FRAENKEL, The Culex, JRS 42, 1952, 1–9, repr. in: E.F., Kleine Beiträge zur klassischen Philologie, Roma 1964, vol. 2, 181–197; likewise D. GÜNTZSCHEL, Beiträge zur Datierung des Culex, Münster 1972; see now D. O. ROSS, The Culex and Moretum as post-Augustan Literary Parodies, HSP 79, 1975, 235–263; D. F. KENNEDY, Gallus and the Culex, CQ 76, 1982, 371–389; E. KLOPSCH, Der Culex. Eine Neuorientierung zur Echtheitsfrage, in: U. KINDERMANN, ed., FS P. KLOPSCH, Göttingen 1988, 207–232.

<sup>2</sup> W. AX, Die pseudovergilische 'Mücke'—ein Beispiel römischer Literaturparodie, Philologus 128, 1984, 230–249; W. Ax also thinks of irony at the emperors' expense in the Culex; W. Ax, Marcellus, die Mücke. Politische Allegorien im Culex?, Philologus 136, 1992, 89–129.

the sting of a gnat. But, on awaking, the shepherd naturally kills the gnat. The next night it appears to him in a dream in order to reproach him, and in the morning he builds a tumulus for it.

The literary technique is marked by the use of insets, such as a eulogy of the pastoral life (58–97), descriptions of the underworld, catalogues of trees and flowers. The epic style forms a contrast with the small dimensions of the topic (cf. Georgics 4). This is a graceful and playful minor work of respectable achievement.

Ciris

The Ciris<sup>1</sup> is dedicated to Messalla, and cannot be ascribed to Virgil.

The story of Scylla is narrated in the shape of an epyllion. After falling in love with Minos, who is besieging her city of Megara, Scylla has cut off the lock of her father, King Nisus, on which his own immortality and the well-being of his city depend. Minos accepts Scylla's treachery, but rejects her love. The girl is turned into a bird, the ciris. Her father Nisus becomes a sea eagle.

The author of the poem writes in the neoteric manner. He is fond of elisions and spondaic fifth feet, and is not at all reluctant to use words of four or even five syllables at the end of the verse. The use of long sentences and of a somewhat ponderous syntax is reminiscent of Catullus. Gallus has been credited with the poem; a late date may be supported at best by postulating either the backwardness of some poetic dilettante or the duplicity of an accomplished forger.

<sup>1</sup> Separate editions: A. SALVATORE (TC, discussion), 2 vols., Napoli 1955 (cf. RAAN 30, 1954, 53–152; appendix [on the Graz fragment]: AFLN 4, 1954, 25–39); A. HAURY (TTrN), Bordeaux 1957; D. KNECHT (TC, discussion), Brugge 1970; R. O. A. M. LYNE (TC), Cambridge 1978; bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, esp. 1137–1141; early dating (Gallus): F. SKUTSCH, RE 4, 1, 1900, 1348; in Virgil's early period: D. KNECHT, Virgile et ses modèles latins, AC 32, 1963, 491–512; A. SALVATORE loc. cit.; after Virgil and before Ovid (who uses similar sources): K. BÜCHNER, RE 8 A 1, 1955, 1109–1129 ('a poetic dilettante, with connections to the house of Messalla, an admirer of Catullus and Virgil'); later than Ovid: J. A. RICHMOND ibid. 1139; still later: R. O. A. M. LYNE, The Dating of the Ciris, CQ 21, 1971, 233–253 (late datings are improbable because of the neoteric style, unless S. MARIOTTI's theory of a conscious forgery is assumed: La Ciris è un falso intenzionale, Humanitas 3, 1950–1951, 371–373); W. EHLERS, Die Ciris und ihr Original, MH 11, 1954, 65–88; M. D. REEVE, The Textual Tradition of Aetna, Ciris, and Catalepton, Maia 27, 1975, 231–247; A. THILL, Virgile auteur ou modèle de la Ciris?, REL 53, 1975, 116–134; R. F. THOMAS, Cinna, Calvus, and the Ciris, CQ 75, 1981, 371–374; A. SALVATORE, Echi degli Aratea nella Ciris, Ciceroniana 5, 1984, 237–241; P. FRASSINETTI, Verifiche sulla Ciris, in: Filologia e forme letterarie, FS F. DELLA CORTE, Urbino 1987, vol. 2, 529–542.

Copa

A graceful, short poem in elegiac couplets displays as a theme the 'hostess'.<sup>1</sup> It comes from the classical period, as is evinced from the author's elaborate metrical skill. Its lively, almost frivolous tone, allied with some archaic affectation in expression, is not consistent with the style of the undoubtedly genuine works by Virgil. In his adaptation the German poet Geibel caught the tone of the original well enough, though omitting its somewhat risqué undertones.

Moretum

The Moretum<sup>2</sup> is nowhere attested in ancient sources as Virgilian. It offers the most detailed picture of the daily life of an Italian farmer. Its prosaic content forms a contrast with its highly poetic style. The close attention to detail is attractive. The author's coolly distant eye makes Virgilian authorship unlikely, though the work could be dated to the classical period.

Catalepton

This is the title of a collection of fourteen (really 17)<sup>3</sup> poems in elegiacs and iambs, and underlines the Hellenistic principle of small-scale refinement. It cannot therefore be surprising that Catullus is repeatedly imitated. The

<sup>1</sup> Separate editions: F. R. D. GOODYEAR (TC), BICS 24, 1977, 117–131; A. FRANZOI (TC), Venezia 1988; bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, esp. 1133–1135; Wilamowitz, Hellenistische Dichtung 1, 311–315; against his assumption of a Greek model: R. E. H. WESTENDORP BOERMA, On Dating the Copa, Mnemosyne ser. 4, 11, 1958, 331–338 (dependence on Propertius in spite of K. BÜCHNER taken for granted: origin shortly after 16 B.C.; against K. BÜCHNER's early dating); G. P. ZARRI, Une étude quentinienne sur la tradition manuscrite de la Copa, RELO 1974, 1, 1–16.

<sup>2</sup> Separate editions: A. PERUTELLI (TTTrC), Pisa 1983; E. J. KENNEY (TTTrC), Bristol 1984; bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, 1151–1152; A. SALVATORE, Tradizione manoscritta e lingua del Moretum, in: Studi in onore di L. CASTIGLIONI, Firenze 1960, 835–857; D. O. ROSS, The Culex and Moretum as Post-Augustan Literary Parodies, HSPH 79, 1975, 235–263; E. ÉVRARD, Quelques traits quantitatifs du vocabulaire du Moretum, Latomus 41, 1982, 550–565; M. RODRÍGUEZ PANTOJA, El Moretum. Estudio lingüístico y literario, Habis 8, 1977, 117–148; idem, La métrica del Moretum pseudovergiliano, Habis 7, 1976, 125–157; A. PERUTELLI, Epilegomeni al Moretum, MD 22, 1989, 189–200.

<sup>3</sup> Separate editions: R. E. H. WESTENDORP BOERMA (TC), 2 vols., Assen, 1949–1963 (assigns 1–8 and 10–12 to Virgil); M. and J. GÖTTE, K. BAYER (TTTrN with ecl. and georg.), München 1970; bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, esp. 1142–1154; M. SCHMIDT, Anordnungskunst im Catalepton, Mnemosyne 16, 1963, 142–156; V. BUCHHEIT, Literarische Kritik an T. Annii Cimber (Verg. catal. 2)..., in: Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, vol. 1, 37–45; G. I. CARLSON, E. A. SCHMIDT, Form and Transformation in Vergil's Catalepton, AJPh 92, 1971, 252–265; H. NAUMANN, Ist Vergil der Verfasser von Catalepton 5 und 8?, RhM 121, 1978, 78–93; J. A. RICHMOND, De forma libelli qui Catalepton inscribitur, ancient tradition maintains that the poems were prolusiones of Virgil. Some of the poems, however, on chronological grounds alone, cannot be by him. It is only for a few of these pieces that modern scholars are inclined to consider Virgilian authorship, as for example for catal. 5 and 8. In his will Virgil ordained that nothing of his should be published that he had not published himself. These parerga therefore should not attract overly prolonged attention. It is true, however, that some pieces taken together with relevant papyri give us a glimpse into the circle of Philodemus.

Aetna<sup>1</sup>

This poorly transmitted didactic poem on Mount Etna must be dated, because of its overripe verse technique, to the 1st century A.D.

Dirae, Lydia<sup>2</sup>

The Dirae, in 103 hexameters, contains curses against the property lost by the speaker during the Civil War. The poem is certainly not by Virgil, any more than the Lydia, a lover's lament, which is to be distinguished from it.

Elegiae in Maecenatem<sup>3</sup>

These elegies, written after Maecenas' death, cannot of course be by Virgil. The date presupposed in the text may possibly be accepted. The Consolatio ad Liviam presents similar problems.

Priapea

These poems will be discussed as part of the literature of the early Imperial period (vol. 2).

---

Mnemosyne 28, 1975, 420–422; idem, Quomodo textus libelli qui Catalepton inscribitur ad nos pervenerit, Eranos 74, 1976, 58–62; M. GIGANTE, M. CAPASSO, Il ritorno di Virgilio a Ercolano, SIFC ser. 3, 7, 1989, 3–6.

<sup>1</sup> Separate editions: W. RICHTER (TTrN, indices), Berlin 1963; F. R. D. Goodyear (TC), Cambridge 1965; Bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, esp. 1130–1133.

<sup>2</sup> Bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, es. 1122–1125.

<sup>3</sup> Separate edition: H. SCHOONHOVEN (TC, ind., bibl.), Groningen 1980 (proposed date: 3rd quarter of the 1st century A.D.); bibl.: J. A. RICHMOND, ANRW 2, 31, 2, 1981, es. 1135–1137; in favor of dating to the Augustan period: E. BICKEL, De Elegiis in Maecenatem monumentis biographicis et historicis, RhM 93, 1950, 97–133; in agreement J. A. RICHMOND ibid.; in favor of a late date (under Domitian): B. AXELSON, De aetate Consolationis ad Liviam et Elegiarum in Maecenatem, Eranos 28, 1930, 1–33.

B. LYRIC, IAMB, SATIRE, EPISTLE

HORACE

Life and Dates

Q. Horatius Flaccus was born on December 8, 65 B.C. at Venusia,<sup>1</sup> and so, along with Livius Andronicus and Ennius, must be numbered among the poets contributed to Rome by South Italy. His father, a freedman, took great personal pains to secure him the best possible education.

During his schooldays at Rome the doughty blows of his teacher, the famous Orbilius, instilled into him a lasting prejudice against old Latin poetry. He studied Greek philosophy and literature at Athens (epist. 2. 2. 44). There he threw in his lot with Brutus, and in a surprisingly high promotion<sup>2</sup> to the rank of military tribune he fought against the Caesarians. After the defeat at Philippi (42 B.C.; carm. 2. 7), and the loss of his father's estate, poverty allegedly made of him a poet, as he declares with satiric irony at his own expense (epist. 2. 2. 50–52). On his return to Rome he secured the respectable position of a scriba quaestorius.

He met well-known patrons of literature, including Asinius Pollio (cf. carm. 2. 1) and M. Valerius Messalla (cf. ars 371). His poems caught the attention of Virgil and Varius, who in 38 B.C. recommended him to Maecenas. Maecenas accepted him into his circle and, probably after the publication of the 1st book of the Satires (35 B.C.), presented him with a Sabine estate. Their friendship remained essentially undisturbed, since Maecenas was ready to tolerate the poet's requirement of great personal freedom (epist. 1, 7). Even Augustus, on offering him the position of private secretary, had to learn that the poet's services could not be bought and that the offer was declined. For the year 17 B.C. Horace received the commission of composing the Carmen Saeculare and rehearsing its presentation with a chorus of boys and girls. As the Roman lyricist—poet, musician, intermediary with the divine—he could now see himself recognized by the civilized world. Horace died on November 27, 8 B.C., soon after Maecenas, to whom he had long felt that his fate was linked (carm. 2. 17), and was buried next to him.

---

<sup>1</sup> Chief sources on the life: Suetonius' Vita Horati (repr. in the editions of Horace) and the poet's own works.

<sup>2</sup> This rank and the office of a scriba quaestorius suggest membership of the equestrian order: D. ARMSTRONG, Horatius eques et scriba: Satires 1. 6 and 2. 7, TAPhA 116, 1986, 255–288.

Horace's life led from juvenile exuberance and Republican allegiance to tranquillity and resignation. Only by taking seriously his youthful enthusiasm and ambition can the reader measure the cost of the serenity of old age, which no one but the hasty observer will take for granted.

The Satires were published after Virgil's Eclogues, perhaps 35/34<sup>1</sup> (book 1) and 30/29 (book 2). The Epodes appeared shortly after Actium (therefore after 31: epode 9). The first three books of Odes came out in 23 B.C., the 1st book of Epistles in 20 (epist. 1. 12. 27–28), the Letter to Florus (epist. 2. 2) before 19 B.C., the Carmen Saeculare in 17 B.C., the Letter to Augustus (epist. 2. 1) after the assumption of the genius Augusti into the worship of the Lares in 14 B.C., the 4th book of Odes after the emperor's return in 13 B.C. (carm. 4. 15). Scholars proposed various dates for the Ars Poetica (23–18 or 13–8).

The simultaneous appearance of the Epodes and Satires proves Horace's outgrowing the Lucilian tradition, since he clearly separates the genres of iambic and satire still united in his predecessor.

In the Epodes the poet of the Odes already is to be felt, and even here there may be chronological overlap. In theme the Odes are also connected with the Satires and Epistles, with which again they have partial chronological links.

The line of development traceable from the 1st to the 2nd book of the Satires and to the Epistles is paralleled in the transition from the Epodes to the Odes. The 4th book of Odes already belongs to the later phase of Augustus' reign, and again sets Horace in a new light.

<sup>1</sup> Or 33 B.C. after Sallust's death (R. SYME, Sallust, Berkeley 1964, 281).

Survey of Works

Odes (Carmina)Books 1-3

The collection is self-contained, framed by two odes dealing with poetry, written in the first asclepiad meter (1. 1 and 3. 30). The center is formed by a cycle<sup>1</sup> of twelve poems (2. 1-12), preceded and followed by 38 odes. There are further important groups: In the first place, we should mention the nine 'parade' odes opening book 1, of which each shows off a different meter. Furthermore, the 3rd book opens with the six so-called Roman odes all written in alcaics. Odes addressed to Maecenas are to be found in important positions: at the beginning (1. 1), after the middle (1. 20; 3. 16) and at the end of books (2. 20; 3. 29; and 30). The central cycle is framed by odes to Pollio (2. 1) and Maecenas (2. 12).

Book 4

The central poem of the new collection describes the power of poetry to give immortality. It is written in stichic asclepiads, as are the initial and final poems of the first collection, equally relevant to the overall structure. Poems thematically related are sometimes adjacent (as with the invitational poems 11 and 12) and sometimes separated.

Epodes (Iambi)

This collection, which was probably inspired by the Iamboi of Callimachus, consists of 17 poems: The 1st and 9th (the beginning and middle) are dedicated to Maecenas. Before and after the central poem (9) are two sets of eight. The last of each of these (8 and 17)<sup>2</sup> take aim at old women, the penultimate are directed to the Romans (7 and 16). Elsewhere, careful attention is given to variation.

SatiresBook 1

The 1st book contains ten pieces, like Virgil's Eclogues and Tibullus' 1st book. Satires 1 and 6 are addressed to Maecenas; 5 and 10 are closely related to his circle. This means that the collection falls into two halves. Variation is secured by the character of diatribe shared by poems 1-3 in the first half, and that of narrative shared by poems 7-9 in the second. Satires 4 and 10, dealing with literary theory, are not set in precise parallel. The first half of the book ends with narration, the second with discussion of literature.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> W. LUDWIG 1957; the regular sequence of alcaic and sapphic strophes is broken in 2. 12.

<sup>2</sup> In the third poem of the first series, Maecenas is addressed and Canidia is alluded to. The third poem of the second series (12) is directed to an old woman.

1 To Maecenas. Nobody is satisfied with his lot, although nobody would seriously consider exchanging it with another. Making provisions for one's own old age is only a pretext; greed spurred on by envy (110–116) is the real reason for restless activity. Hardly anyone knows how to observe moderation and to halt the search for gain in time to enjoy what has been gained already.

2 Just as there is a healthy mean between avarice and extravagance, so there is also in affairs of love. The extremes to be avoided are harlots and other men's wives. The golden mean is offered by freedwomen.

3 A distinction must be made between gross and minor mistakes. One should criticize oneself, but be forgiving towards one's friends.

4 Unlike Lucilius or Crispinus, Horace is not a particularly prolific writer. Ambitious individuals and those in search of money and pleasure, are afraid of verses and hate poets. Horace for his part does not regard himself as a poet, for the language of satire is, like that of comedy, related to everyday idiom. Horace need not be feared, for his works are not available at the bookstore. He reads them only to a small circle and even then under pressure. Slandering speeches are not in his manner, although to teach by using examples specified by name is something which he learned from his father. Writing poems is one of his minor faults.

5 Journey from Rome to Brundisium.

6 To Maecenas. In spite of his lowly origin, Horace is not despised by Maecenas. Thanks to his father<sup>2</sup> the poet received the best possible education. Being free from ambition, he can enjoy a happy life.

7 An amusing incident from the time when Brutus was praetor in Asia.

8 A wooden Priapus describes how he chased away two witches.

9 Horace is pestered on the Sacra Via by an ambitious interloper who would like to intrude into Maecenas' circle (often not quite accurately described as the 'chatterer').

10 Horace defends his criticism of Lucilius, made in l. 4, and briefly sketches his theory of satire. Lucilius was undoubtedly polished enough for his own day, but were he alive now, he would be more self-critical. Horace does not aim to please everyone, and he names the few to whose verdict he attaches some importance.

Satires

Book 2

The book consists of two sets of four satires. The penultimate poem of either group is in the style of the diatribe (3 and 7), and the last in both cases deals with gastronomy (4 and 8). The 1st satire, which is of particular importance, is rightly placed at the beginning. The 6th, which corresponds to it in importance, does not open the second half, but is displaced to avoid a too rigid symmetry. The 6th and 7th satires are complementary. They are juxtaposed because they reflect Horace's nature in two quite different ways.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. M. VON ALBRECHT 1986.

<sup>2</sup> A. ÖNNERFORS, Vaterporträts in der römischen Poesie unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Horaz, Statius, Ausonius, Stockholm 1974.

1 A witty consultation, rich in meaning, with the jurist Trebatius, containing a masterly evaluation of Lucilius. It defines proudly, with allusion to the doctrine of status,<sup>1</sup> the standpoint of the poet's own satiric compositions, somewhere between polemics and flattery, risk and acknowledgment.

2 The farmer Ofellus criticizes modern extravagance at the table and recommends homely fare.

3 Damasippus, a failed connoisseur of art and real estate dealer, converted by Stertinius to Stoicism, reproaches Horace with his lack of literary productivity, and reports a lecture given by his master on the madness of all fools, rounded off with a list of Horace's faults.

4 Catus initiates Horace into the higher wisdom of the cuisine (gastro-sophy) as a way towards a happy life.

5 The seer Teiresias reveals to Ulysses the mysteries of legacy hunting.

6 An expression of thanks to the poet's patron Mercury for granting him the Sabine estate. The troubles of city life. The illusions of others about Horace's influence with Maecenas. A dream of happy life in the country: the town mouse and the country mouse.

7 A sermon at the Satumalia by the slave Davus. 'In the city you wish you were in the country and vice versa. Maecenas' toady! Listen to the sermon which I heard from Crispinus' porter! If I visit a wench, and you another man's wife, who is then the greater sinner? You are not an adulterer, just as I am not a thief, merely out of fear. In many ways you are a slave: how dare you be my master? You are mad about expensive paintings, as I am about pictures of gladiators. Yet I am called a good-for-nothing and you a connoisseur . . . You are always running away from yourself and cannot stay on your own for an hour.' (The enraged Horace is about to throw a stone.) 'Either one is crazy or one writes poetry'.

8 A dinner with the nouveau riche Nasidienus, who ruins the evening with a tasteless embarras de richesse and long-winded explanations.

Epistles

Book 1

1 To Maecenas. Withdrawal from poetry in favor of moral philosophy.

2 To Lollius (like 18). Homer as instructor in morals.

<sup>1</sup> LEEMAN, Form 235-249 ('Horaz und die anderen Satiriker über die Aufgaben der Satire').

3 To Julius Florus (like 2. 2) and to the friends interested in literature who have accompanied Tiberius to the East (20 B.C.).

4 To Tibullus. The past and the gift of the present day. Epicurean reflections.

5 To Torquatus (cf. carm. 4. 7). Invitation to a simple meal on Augustus' birthday.

6 To Numicius. Nil admirari. A challenge to a virtuous life, combined with ironic advice about the pursuit of worldly goods.

7 To Maecenas. A candid excuse for a long absence.

8 To Celsus Albinovanus (cf. epist. 1. 3. 15), Tiberius' secretary. A satirical self-portrait of inconsistency, and advice to the addressee to bear his good fortune with moderation.

9 To Tiberius. An urbane letter of recommendation for Septimius.

10 To a friend, Aristius Fuscus (carm. 1. 22; sat. 1. 9. 61). The advantages of a modest life in the country.

11 To Bullatius. Tranquillity of mind and the folly of restlessness.

12 To Iccius (cf. carm. 1. 29). On self-sufficiency.

13 To Vinnius. Advice on the presentation of a copy of the Odes (1-3) to Augustus.

14 To his bailiff (vilius). The advantages of country life (cf. 10).

15 To Vala. Contentment with modest fortune does not preclude the enjoyment of comfort.

16 To Quintius. A description of Horace's estate. The right way to live and die.

17 To Scaeva. The way to behave towards those of higher social station. The examples offered by Aristippus and a Cynic.

18 To Lollius (cf. epist. 1. 2). The way to behave with friends. Equanimity (cf. epist. 1. 17; 1. 11).

19 To Maecenas (like epist. 1. 1 and 7). Literary imitation and originality.

20 To his book. An ironic picture of its future, and a self-portrait of the author.

Epistles

Book 2

1 To Augustus on the present state of Roman literature. The high esteem in which the Romans hold Augustus shows that in politics their judgment is more mature than in matters of literature. They treasure the old authors and hate those of the present. But, in Roman literature, age is no criterion of literary value, since Greek and Roman literature have developed under different conditions. If the Romans, who for so long were philistines, have now succumbed to the fashionable sickness of writing books, that has its good points. Poets are modest and useful citizens, good educators, interpreters of things divine. Older Latin literature does not lack tragic feeling, but polish. Plautus is content to make his audience laugh and his cash box jingle. In choosing the authors allowed to write about him, including Virgil, Augustus shows more power of judgment than Alexander the Great did. Horace, who does not feel called to such lofty political themes, can alas only bring out down-to-earth 'conversations'.

2 To Florus. You would like poems from me? An idle man, no longer under compulsion, cannot be expected to engage in any such selfless enterprise. After the defeat at Philippi, poverty turned me into a poet, but now I am provided for. Poetry belongs to the things of which old age has robbed me. Moreover, every reader wishes to hear something different. Besides, you cannot write poetry in a bustling city like Rome. Authors spend their time in mutual flattery. Bad poets shy away from self-criticism, and good ones have a hard life. The man living under a delusion is happier. I would rather leave such play to children and ask about the right measure in real life. Enough of money-grubbing! Seek a mean between avarice and extravagance. Test yourself to see if, as old age advances, you are becoming a better man. Bow out, before you make yourself into a fool.

Ars poetica

Bizarre combinations destroy the unity of a work of art. Mistakes arise from an exaggerated effort to secure the neighboring virtues. Thus brevity leads to obscurity. Even the poorest craftsman is a master of detail, but cannot conceive a plan of the whole. One should choose a topic matching one's powers. Structure demands selectivity and holding back what is to come later. Well-known words become novel in a studied combination. Neologisms and archaisms are permissible, and the criterion is linguistic usage.

The poem now takes up the different meters, genres, the appropriate stylistic means, the arousal of emotion and character portrayal. The poet should adhere to traditional themes, while avoiding slavish imitation. He should also guard against grandiloquent promises in his introduction. A poem should start in the midst of the events, and the poet should invent plots whose beginning, middle, and end are in harmony. The nature of the different ages of man is to be noted. What is ugly and improbable is to take place off stage. A play is to have five acts, and a god is to intervene only when necessary. Just three characters are to speak on stage, and the chorus is not to utter remarks irrelevant to the action.

There follows a treatment of musical history and satyr play. The trimeter is mentioned, along with its imperfect Roman adaptations. Roman playwrights have shrunk from the labor of the file. Without writing himself, Horace intends to serve as a 'whetstone' for others. Appropriate character portrayal, seeming to imitate life, is the principal need. Sober Rome was not at first suitable ground for poetry. Enjoyment and instruction need not be opposites. Homer may be forgiven for his trivial oversights, but mediocrity in poetry is deadly. The poet should not write without Minerva's inspiration. He should first present his work to critical readers and wait long before publication. The high dignity of the art of poetry is attested by Orpheus, Amphion, Homer and Tyrtæus. Nature (talent) and art must work in harmony. True friends should not keep their criticism to themselves, so that the crazy poet does not make himself ridiculous.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The great variety of the genres in which Horace worked reflects the complexity of his genius.<sup>1</sup> The model for his iambic poetry was Archilochus of Paros, although he contributed more to meter and the general pugnacious attitude than to motifs (epist. 1. 19. 23–25). Horace avoided uncompromising personal invective, characteristic of Archilochus, and attacked only unnamed or insignificant persons. A fresh inspiration allowed him to remodel a traditional literary form and to create a new genre in Roman literature. He had been schooled in the technique of Hellenistic poetry, by the Iamboi of Callimachus as well as by epigram. His distinguishing mark is a captivating elegance of style.

As models for the Odes, Horace names Alcaeus and Sappho. His link with the former<sup>2</sup> is much more clearly recognizable. Carm. 1. 23 recalls Anacreon (fig. 39 D.), who may also have influenced even the Epodes.<sup>3</sup> Pindar makes his influence visible, for example, in carm. 1. 12 (cf. Ol. 2). The Carmen Saeculare also displays Pindaric elements in its structure. In carm. 4. 2, with reference to Augustus, Horace expressly rejects any rivalry with Pindar, the towering master of the lyric; nevertheless, the lofty themes found elsewhere in the 4th book establish a parallel with Pindar. Yet the influence of Alexandrian poetry on the Odes is very great, and here, too, the techniques of Hellenistic epigram are frequently on display.<sup>4</sup> Paraenetic odes (e.g. 2. 14; 15; 16; 3. 24) are reminiscent of the diatribe, though this explanation falls short of their lyrical power. Philosophical reflection is a unifying element in all that Horace wrote.

In the Satires Horace is in the train of Lucilius, with whom he comes to critical terms (see below Ideas I, Reflections on Literature). Lucretius too is important for Horace, both as Epicurean and as

<sup>1</sup> E. ZINN 1970, 57.

<sup>2</sup> E. FRAENKEL 1957, 154–178 (on carm. 1. 14; 1. 37; 1. 10; 1. 32; 1. 9; 1. 18).

<sup>3</sup> D. A. CAMPBELL, Horace and Anacreon, AClass 28, 1985, 35–38.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. carm. 1. 5; 28; 30; 3. 22; 26.

composer of philosophical hexameters. The tradition of the diatribe<sup>1</sup> is recalled by allusions to natural appetites, the interpretation of punishments in the underworld, and the motif of the pilgrimage to hidden sources. There are also elements of Stoicism and Cynicism.<sup>2</sup> Horace explicitly refers to Bion of Borysthenes (epist. 2. 2. 60), though the influence of the diatribe, too, is not to be taken as absolute. For individual themes, the poet may have looked further for inspiration. In the area of gourmet taste (sat. 2. 4; 2. 8), he may be in debt to Arcestratus of Gela (period of Alexander the Great) and Ennius. The beginning of t. 2. 4 actually echoes Plato's Phaedrus (228 b).<sup>3</sup>

Lucilius had already written letters in verse, but with his Epistles Horace created an entirely new literary genre which allowed the treatment of a variety of themes of daily life and ethical struggle from a personal point of view. Horace knew the Stoics<sup>4</sup> and Epicureans, and it was to the latter that he was more sympathetic (e.g. epist. 1. 4. 16). But he was far from any dogmatic attitude. His aim was to communicate practical guidance for living.

In the Ars poetica Horace depended, according to Porphyrio, on Neoptolemus of Parium, but it is difficult to establish secure parallels.

Literary Technique

To a satire belong dialogue, narrative, reflection and sermon, though the proportions in which these ingredients are mixed vary. The Satires are largely conceived as conversations (sermones). Dialogue may serve as a framework for a lecture or a narrative.

Conversely, reflections or sermons may be enlivened by the interventions of an imaginary interlocutor. In the 1st book there are satires in which sermon or narrative stands indisputably in the foreground. In the 2nd book dialogic and dramatic treatments prevail, a type already realized in the masterly 9th poem of the 1st book. This means that the centrifugal elements are united in a whole. A high point is reached in the late Satire 2. 1, in which even reflections on literature are cast in the shape of a lively dialogue.

In conformity with the conversational character of the genre, the

<sup>1</sup> On the diatribe motifs: U. KNOCHÉ, Betrachtungen über Horazens Kunst der satirischen Gesprächsführung, Philologus 90, 1935, 372–390; 469–482; W. WIMMEL 1962.

<sup>2</sup> A. BARBIERI, A proposito della Satira 2, 6 di Orazio, RAL 31, 1976, 479–507.

<sup>3</sup> E. FRAENKEL 1957, 136–137.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. sat. 1. 3; 2. 3 (with critical remarks); epist. 1. 16.

themes appearing within a given satire are not always harmoniously reconciled. There may be discrepancies between the frame and the heart of the poem. The introduction may announce a somewhat different theme which then surprisingly takes an unexpected turn (disguised introduction). Thus the beginning of the 1st Satire discusses the dissatisfaction of mortals with their lot, the middle takes up avarice, while the end finds a causal connection between them both. Only attentive reading shows that the entire satire deals with what men say about themselves and their happiness. The 2nd Satire starts with a brief mention of extravagance, and then goes into detail about sexual matters. Both themes illustrate the golden mean.

The composition of the Satires displays gliding transitions, as well as abrupt endings and new beginnings. There is a dialectical tension between form and content to the extent that a particular variety of topic is offset by strictness of form (e.g. sat. 1. 5; 1. 9), while gliding transitions help to avoid a pedantic and overexplicit division into paragraphs (sat. 1. 3).<sup>1</sup>

The principle of the gliding transition prevails not only within the individual satire and ode, but also between successive poems. Between the satires there are connecting links. A basic motif of the 1st Satire is resumed at the beginning of the 2nd and set in relation with the new theme. The 3rd Satire starts like the 2nd with the person of Tigellius. The 4th recapitulates (25–32) the themes of the previous poems. The 6th Satire is connected with the 4th by its mention of Horace's 'mediocre faults', and its complimentary exaltation of his father.<sup>2</sup> The 5th and 6th Satires are linked by the names of those belonging to the circle of Maecenas. Similar thematic links also exist, for example, between the 'Roman odes'.<sup>3</sup>

The choice of the mask determines the effect produced. Sober moral instruction is notably refreshing when placed on the lips, not of a man of the world like Horace, but on those of candid spokesmen, such as the farmer Ofellus (sat. 2. 2), the slave Davus (sat. 2. 7) and even the poet's father (sat. 1. 4. 105–129).

Irony may result when the person of the speaker, even if not belying his own words, at least qualifies them. A particularly shrewd businessman is enthusiastic for obvious reasons about happy country life (beatus ille qui procul negotiis . . . 'happy the man who, far away from business cares . . .' epod. 2. 1). As a preacher of Stoic morals in succession to the eminently wise Stertinius, there appears on the scene—the bankrupt Damasippus (sat. 2. 3).

<sup>1</sup> W. HERING 1979.

<sup>2</sup> In this the fourth seems to presuppose knowledge of the sixth. Cf. also the mention of ambitio (1. 4. 26; 1. 6 passim, esp. 129).

<sup>3</sup> M. VON ALBRECHT 1988.

Conversely, comedy may be found in the fact that trivial and even detrimental advice may assume the guise of profound wisdom (sat. 2. 4 and 5).

The poetic technique of the Odes can be deciphered only to a limited extent, since in them for the most part several levels and facets of meaning combine to produce a complex effect. This is not the place for individual interpretation, and hints must suffice. In the arrangement of the poems (s. Survey of Works), apart from external principles (such as the relative eminence of the addressees and metrical similarity or difference), the continuity of themes is also important. Thus within the 'Roman odes' on several occasions one poem is linked by content with its predecessor.<sup>1</sup>

In turning to the structure of the individual odes, the reader notes that the poet often proceeds from a concrete idea, to which he may return after the development of the thought. This is true of carm. 1. 16, where the beginning and end form a palinode framing a section on anger in general. A weighty comparison may also serve as introduction (carm. 4. 4). At times the opening contains a programmatic echo of a famous Greek poem. Such quotations are intended to evoke, not so much a relation of content with a predecessor, as a mood or a particular stylistic level. Subsequently, the thought for the most part does not imitate the model.

The sequence of thoughts in a Horatian ode is guided, not so much by external paradigms or by any simple chronology, but by its own internal laws. The poet's gift for independent composition of convincing units is already revealed in the Epodes, where 9 and 16 show a remarkable artistry. Thematic orientation takes precedence for the poet over the coherence of the imagery or the uniformity of the background.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Carm. 3. 1 end and 3. 2 beginning: narrowness of space; 3. 2 end and 3. 3 beginning: the unjust and just man; 3. 3 end and 3. 4 beginning: address to the Muse; 3. 4 and 3. 5 Jupiter and Augustus.

<sup>2</sup> In juxtaposition are found different pictures of beasts (e.g. in epod. 6) and different seasons (e.g. in carm. 1. 9).

Sometimes the thought proceeds dialectically. In carm. 2. 16, the 'even' strophes form a contrast of content with the 'odd'. Several odes revolve around a central point. Thus carm. 2. 14 is grouped around a central strophe (1 + 2 + 1 + 2 + 1 strophes). The central strophes of carm. 3. 8 (3 + 1 + 3 strophes) and of carm. 4. 11 (4 + 1 + 4 strophes), contain an address to Maecenas.<sup>1</sup> Other odes are made up of two halves, such as carm. 1. 9 (3 + 3 strophes) and 3. 20 (2 + 2 strophes). The counter theme may also be introduced in the middle of a strophe, as is shown by carm. 2. 15, which consists of twice 2 1/2 strophes. The middle of the ode is the appropriate place for a change of theme or point of view, for important addresses or even gnomae.<sup>2</sup>

The conclusions of the odes are especially vivid and impressive. In Odes 1. 14, the idea of transience finally is condensed into the figure of an heir, carelessly spilling the precious wine which the dead man has so carefully guarded. Carm. 1. 9 culminates in a charming hide-and-seek of lovers, carm. 3. 20 in the graphic portrait of a beautiful boy, carm. 2. 19 in the picture of the surprisingly tame Cerberus. Carm. 3. 13 presents us at the end with the Bandusian Spring in all its picturesque beauty. A final vignette in carm. 1. 3 is offered by Jupiter as he hurls his thunderbolts. Carm. 1. 5 gives us a votive picture. The conclusions of poems are often distinguished also by striking, sententious utterances (carm. 4. 12; see also 3. 8 and 3. 9).

The above-mentioned discrepancies in space, time, and imagery are baffling enough for modern readers. But there is more: the poet's great boldness in his strongly realized presentations of miraculous events. Thus in carm. 2. 20, Horace confronts his reader directly with the naturalistic picture of his metamorphosis into a bird. The parallel in the previous poem (2. 19. 5-8), displaying a similar vividness and the same use of the present tense warns the interpreter against taking the easy step from the sublime to the ridiculous. Horace's daring imagination defies our professional wisdom which, faced with his diction, continually reacts with incredulity, and proclaims its perplexity by desperate efforts to introduce normality.

<sup>1</sup> In carm. 2. 12 Licymnia's name occurs in the central strophe.

<sup>2</sup> Gnome in the center: carm. 1. 9. 13; 3. 16. 21-22; in 2. 10 from the central point on the poem becomes noticeably filled with gnomae.

Language and Style

A number of words are found in the Odes which elsewhere are characteristic of prose rather than of poetry.<sup>1</sup> Some of them are regarded as unpoetic, but two considerations should be borne in mind. Since most poetic texts in Latin are written in dactyls, numerous words are missing from them, not because they are in any way unpoetic, but because they are metrically intractable. In his lyric meters Horace may employ them easily. Moreover, Horace is fond of replacing abstract expressions with concrete. Thus instead of ira he uses stomachus; instead of mare, Hadria; instead of vinum, Caecubum. Metonymy almost appears to attract him more than metaphor, although metaphor is nowadays taken for the essence of poetry. Goethe perceived the down-to-earth nature of Horace's manner of expression, in finding in him a 'frightful reality'.<sup>2</sup> In this way of handling language, an elemental energy is manifest, unexpected in the alleged poet of urbane manners. An author who is so able to stir the feelings is a great poet.

Yet Horace also understands the virtuoso manipulation of metaphor. He speaks of masters in terms appropriate to slaves: a transference which gains a special charm (sat. 2. 7) when coming precisely from the mouth of slaves.<sup>3</sup> This gives the idea of the Saturnalia a linguistic reality. The so-called master is a slave on many counts (totiens servus 70), a runaway and lazybones (fugitivus et erro, ibid. 113). A common notion, relating both to literature and life, is that of the mean and of modus (which implies both moderation and modulation). In a way both bold and profound, the aging poet re-applies the musical metaphors of this theme to life (epist. 2. 2. 143-144): Ac non verba sequi fidibus modulanda Latinis, / sed verae numerosque modosque ediscere vitae, 'and not to search out words that will fit the music of the Latin lyre, but to master the rhythms and measures of a genuine life'.

The poet shows extraordinary subtlety in distinguishing, both stylistically and metrically, between the genres. Unlike Lucilius, he draws a strict line between the iamb<sup>1</sup> and the now purely hexametrical satire. In order to preserve an appearance of everyday, his satirical hexameters are constructed somewhat less strictly than those of his lyric poems. Just as from his Satires the refined Epistles developed, so it appears that his lyric grew from the seedbed of the Iambi. The Odes are divided at times, as were the Epodes, into strophes of two lines, although mostly into strophes of four.<sup>2</sup> Yet this division is not inflexible. An example is found in carm. 1. 5, with its fluent counterpoint between sentence and verse. Three paragraphs cover four strophes. Horace prefers the alcaic and sapphic strophes, in which the strict rules of his treatment of quantities and verbal structure find striking illustration.<sup>3</sup> Yet he also uses other meters, such as asclepiads and even ionics. It was with good reason that Ovid called him 'rich in rhythms' (numerosus: trist. 4. 10. 49). This made Horace unique in Rome.<sup>4</sup> By his tireless struggle with language, style, and verse, he succeeded in imparting a wholly appropriate garb to the genres he shaped.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> B. AXELSON, Unpoetische Wörter. Ein Beitrag zur Kenntnis der lateinischen Dichtersprache, Lund 1945, 98-113; F. RUCKDESCHEL, Archaismen und Vulgarismen in der Sprache des Horaz, Erlangen 1911, repr. 1972.

<sup>2</sup> The continuation 'without any genuine poetry' shows that Goethe felt the difference from the modern poetry of metaphor: Goethe, Artemis-Gedenkausgabe, ed. by E. BEUTLER, 22 (Gespräche 1), Zürich, 2nd ed. 1964, 423; November 1806 to Riemer; on this (with a somewhat different explanation) H. HOMMEL, Goethestudien, AHAW 1989, 1, passim, esp. 18; 30.

<sup>3</sup> This individual garb lends to the Stoic paradoxes the charm of novelty.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Horace's Ars poetica is the most significant document in Latin on the theory of literature. It is doubly valuable because its author was one of Rome's greatest poets. But we should not approach this work with false expectations. Disappointment may ensue because the genre chosen to illustrate the theories is one from which Horace held aloof: the drama, especially the satyr play. This may have been determined by the fact that drama, not lyric traditionally served as object lesson in ancient poetics, and in any case for satire there was no Greek theory. Moreover, it may perhaps have seemed embarrassing to the poet to elaborate overtly in a long didactic poem on topics which

<sup>1</sup> In the iambi he does not confine himself to following the traces of the revolutionary poetry of the Caesarian period (epod. 17. 40; cf. Catullus 42. 24; 29. 7).

<sup>2</sup> K. E. BOHNENKAMP, Die horazische Strophe. Studien zur Lex Meinekiana, Hildesheim 1972.

<sup>3</sup> E. ZINN, Der Wortakzent in den lyrischen Versen des Horaz, 2 parts, München 1940 (forthcoming; a reprint with a substantial new introduction by W. STROH, Hildesheim 1997).

<sup>4</sup> Doubtless the luxuriance of meters in Plautus and the virtuoso play of Terentianus Maurus are in each case quite different.

<sup>5</sup> A word like tauriformis (carm. 4. 14. 25) is typical of the sublime style of the 4th book.

had engaged his own creative talent. Once again, Horace shows himself as a master of indirect presentation, parrying our curiosity. A second disappointment rests on another mistaken presupposition. The poet is not proposing a set of rules for poetry, even if he has often been wrongly interpreted in this sense. Horace remains true to himself. In a spirit of urbanity he clothes his teaching in the loose garb of the sermo and robs it of anything dogmatic. A third disappointment for readers who would like to look over the shoulders of a great writer lies in the fact that we hear hardly anything of inspiration. The crazy genius is actually made an object of ridicule. All the more is heard of self-criticism (ars 38–40; 385–390 al.), of willingness to learn, and hard work. However, natural talent and art must complement each other (408–411), and mediocrity is allowed in every sphere, except in poetry (372–373). But this is at least to touch the secret of greatness, if not to reveal it altogether. The reader who frees himself from all three false expectations is richly rewarded by the study of the Ars. He rediscovers in a thousand forms the principles of wisdom (sapere), and of decorum (aptum) which count among the recurring features in the poet's life and work. Horace does not talk of genius, but by its achievement his poetry established standards. It is rewarding therefore to investigate his poetics in his other works as well.

Critical discussion of Lucilius occupies much space in Horace's work.<sup>1</sup> In this, the defensive attitude of a modern author needing to assert himself against tradition (sat. 1. 4) modulates into the considered verdict of a literary historian (sat. 1. 10) and finally into a sympathetic evaluation (sat. 2. 1). For Horace, his Satires are close to everyday speech. If the meter is removed, the result is prose (sat. 1. 4. 39–63; sermones is also found at epist. 2. 1. 250). With self-irony, the poet refuses to decide whether in fact they are poetry at all. He emphasizes their lowly stylistic level not only to defend himself against claims on the part of Augustus (repentes per humum, 'crawling along the ground', ibid. 251–252).

In spite of the aloofness evinced by epist. 2. 2. 100, Callimachus<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> M. PUELMA PIWONKA, Lucilius und Kallimachos, Frankfurt 1949; M. COFFEY, Roman Satire, London 1976, 3–10; P. L. SCHMIDT, Invektive – Gesellschaftskritik – Diatribe? Typologische und gattungsgeschichtliche Vorüberlegungen zum sozialen Engagement der römischen Satire, Lampas 12, 1979, 259–281; C. J. CLASSEN, Die Kritik des Horaz an Lucilius in den Satiren 1. 4 und 1. 5, Hermes 109, 1981, 339–360.

<sup>2</sup> Cf. also carm. 4. 15 (following Callimachus Aet. frag. 1. 21–28 PFEIFFER; hymn. Apoll. 105–112).

inspires the keen sensitivity of the artist. His aim is to abide by the verdict of a small audience of experts (sat. 1. 10. 78–91). He sets a high value on the labor of the file (limae labor et mora: ars 291), and the toil of the bees (carm. 4. 2). He despises the ‘muddy stream’ (sat. 1. 4. 11; epist. 2. 2. 120–121) and the envious crowd (carm. 2. 16. 39–40). He cherishes the spiritus tenuis (carm. 2. 16. 38; cf. 1. 6. 9). The Ars poetica shows that Horace’s care and untiring diligence extend even to the individual word (e.g. archaisms and neologisms) and to skilful linkage of words (callida iunctura: ars 47–48).

In Horace’s apparent undervaluing of his own poems, a Socratic irony is at work. Conversely, his Callimachean apologetics often aid him to introduce exalted themes into the ‘modest’ genres of the ode or epistle.<sup>1</sup> Even when he rejects for himself Pindaric claims (carm. 4. 2), and remains aware (carm. 1. 6. 9–10) of the contrast between a lofty military theme and the simple, unwarlike lyre (or his ‘slight’ talent), early Greek lyric undoubtedly assisted him in surpassing the small-scale Hellenistic art which formed his first point of departure.<sup>2</sup> His encounters with Archilochus, Alcaeus, and Sappho enabled him to develop his own talent and freed his genius. This applies to both his content and his form.

He may therefore frankly and justifiably boast that it was he who introduced the iambic and aeolian lyric to Rome (carm. 3. 30. 13–14; epist. 1. 19. 23–24). He is right to be proud of the brilliance with which he has performed this difficult task (cf. carm. 3. 30; 4. 2. 31–32).

Yet, in his accomplishment, Horace sees more than the technical side. He describes himself as a vates (carm. 1. 31; 4. 3. 15; 4. 6. 44; cf. Romanae fidicen lyrae: carm. 4. 3. 23). He is conscious at times, above all when handling lofty themes, that he is divinely inspired (carm. 3. 25). Yet he is aware of the dangers of imitating Pindar recklessly (carm. 4. 2) and warns against it while preparing to do so. The 4th book of Odes attests a further stage in the evolution of his literary thought, continually making more subtle differentiations in genres. Just as in his youth Horace developed Epodes and Satires as separate literary genres, so in his maturity he developed the Odes, and at the end, in a new refinement, the 4th book of the Odes and the Epistles.

In his view of himself as an author, Horace for the most part shows a surprising sobriety. Open to the demands of his fellow men, he regarded the poet as a useful member of society (utilis urbi: epist. 2. 1. 124) and speaks, not without some irony at his own expense, of his pedagogic tasks (os tenerum pueri balbumque poeta figurat, 'the poet fashions the tender, lisping lips of childhood' epist. 2. 1. 126). Occasionally, he proves with a smile that the reading of Homer may, in Stoic fashion, serve the purpose of moral instruction (epist. 1. 2). It is significant in general for Horace's interpretation of his writing that he prefers younger contemporaries as his addressees (carm. 3. 1. 4), and it is these he seeks to guide (Lollius: epist. 1. 2; 1. 18; Florus: epist. 1. 3; 2. 2; Vinnius: epist. 1. 13; Scaeva: epist. 1. 17. 16; the Pisones: ars).

<sup>1</sup> E.g. carm. 1. 6; 4. 2; 4. 15; WIMMEL, Kallimachos in Rom.

<sup>2</sup> G. PASQUALI 1920.

The lofty demand to establish respect and piety and to restore a good relationship between the state and the gods (cf. epist. 2. 1. 132–138) was met by Horace in the Carmen saeculare (cf. carm. 4. 6). In the Roman odes and in poems such as epodes 7 and 16, he felt himself to be the teacher of his people. The restraining advice of the Muses is valid even for the emperor (carm. 3. 4. 36–42), although at the outset a courteous reference is made to poetry's restorative influence.

Elsewhere, too, Horace emphasizes the relaxation afforded by lyric, modestly enough, although in accordance with Epicurean aesthetics (cf. carm. 2. 10). Song dissolves cares (carm. 4. 11. 35–36). It softens suffering (carm. 1. 32. 14). It is a comfort in old age (carm. 1. 31. 19–20). The poet offers sincere gratitude to the Muse (carm. 4. 3). This reference to divine grace finds a creative counterpoint in the poet's proud claim on grounds of his own merit, which guarantees his immortality (carm. 3. 30; 2. 20). The poet is even more powerful than the statesman, since he is able to give or deny immortality to the latter. The poet is even capable of creating gods (carm. 4. 8 and 9): a majestic declaration of the poet's independence in the Augustan period.

Horace's thoughts on literature are never fixed. Their interplay necessarily draws them towards constantly new reflection, refinement, and metamorphosis. Just as in the 4th book of Odes lyric comes more and more to depart from its personal roots, so in the Epistles literature, shaped by reflection, goes beyond what is specifically literary. This remark may be substantiated by reference to a basic theme, that of relationship to truth. As a satirist, Horace's aim is 'to tell the truth with a smile' (sat. 1. 1. 24). Thanks to his love of truth, a rare quality in Roman society, he has gained the friendship of Maecenas (sat. 1. 6. 60). Even in Epistles 1. 7 it may be seen that the poet demands much from his patron in this respect. In his literary activity, the author is even less inclined to compromise than in life. Dicere

verum is and remains in its different literary forms a token of Horace's poetry, although not in any too crudely assertive fashion. And yet in this area the Epistles mark a new phase.

Slyly, Horace describes poetry as one of his minor faults (sat. 1. 4. 139–140). It would be better for him to leave it alone, but he cannot sleep (sat. 2. 1. 7) and he will never abandon writing (sat. 2. 1. 60). Later, in the Epistles, he will try to let fall this habit in order to turn to practical philosophy, right living. But his literary commitment is stronger than his will. 'I said that I would not write any more, but more of a liar than the Parthians—I demand at early morn my writing tablets' (epist. 2. 1. 111–113). Paradoxically in this way, with his 'turn away' from literature, he has ascended to a new stage of literary achievement. This does not justify the reader in using literary considerations to rob the poet's preoccupation with ethics of its force. Horace was winning for literature areas of life which for Romans were of basic significance. The mastering of real life, by being given superb formulation, was confirmed in its reality. After all, where the word is lacking, nothing exists.

Ideas II

Horace began with quite sharp criticism of contemporary society. In the course of his satiric poetry, philosophical and aesthetic themes came to receive greater emphasis. Then he dropped the satirical genre, and turned to the more serene Epistles. The development from Epodes to Odes is comparable. With the 4th book of the Odes there arose again a type of lyric, novel even from the political standpoint. And yet, in spite of all, the poet remained extraordinarily true to himself.

In considering the content of his poems, it is not sufficient to declare that, in conformity with the 'bourgeois' spirit of his time and class, the poet celebrated carefulness, prudence, and personal modesty.<sup>1</sup> Certainly, after decades of civil war, it was urgently necessary to find an equilibrium in all areas of life. To Roman knights, who did not cherish lofty political ambitions, moderatio in this regard did not pose problems. And yet this is only a partial truth, for, if Horace had reflected the thoughts of so broad a segment of readers, he would inevitably have been more popular in his time than he actually was.

<sup>1</sup> On the social background H. MAUGH 1986.

His independent greatness and intellectual significance are to be understood rather by recalling that, neither under Augustus nor on other occasions, is moderation the gift of a particular class or audience. It is a difficult task and something equally unpopular with representatives of all ranks. Now Rome had to meet the historical challenge and establish a new political order based on a rising group of property owners; consequently, Horace's generation was especially tempted to overvalue material goods. Here the poet emerged to offer an unwelcome reminder. His nature was not at all tranquil, but sensitive and vulnerable. Yet he championed aims that were both aesthetic and ethical, and for their realization fought a remarkably consistent battle in all areas.

The theme of measure is found throughout his works, and given concrete expression in every sphere of life. Its formulation in each case is both individual and yet extraordinarily diverse. In the Satires an easily detected play on words leads him to urge what is satis. In the Epistles he is concerned with recte vivere. Both points of view are also continually present in the Odes. For example, carm. 2. 10 masterfully develops thoughts known from Greek popular wisdom, poetry, and philosophy. Here too the reader should be careful not to trivialize. The only reason why such thoughts are often on men's lips is because they are so seldom realized. In his poems Horace traverses practically all spheres of human life, and sheds continually fresh light upon them from his personal point of view, with different circumstances and readers in mind.

To his feelings about life as an individual, the views of the Epicureans corresponded in many respects. He belonged to no particular school<sup>2</sup> (epist. 1. 14) and wavered, as he himself admits, between the Stoa and Hedonism. Of Stoic philosophy he had a good knowledge. The recognition of one's own particular capabilities was an aim of the Middle Stoa represented by Panaetius, and Horace accepted this also as a basic premise of poetics (ars 38–40). This is a sign of the convergence between his understanding of literature and of life. Yet the dogmatic rigidity of the traditional Stoa was something he found amusing, as also its paradoxes, such as that all sins are equal (sat. 1. 3. 96); that only the wise man is king (sat. 1. 3. 124–142); that all fools are mad (sat. 2. 3); and that all fools are slaves (sat. 2. 7). He makes no secret of his opposition to the intransigence of the Cynics, and prefers Aristippus' accommodation to the mighty (epist. 1. 17), although this must not be purchased at the cost of freedom. He wittily calls himself a pig from Epicurus' sty (epist. 1. 4. 16). Epicurean wisdom also speaks in his vixi (carm. 3. 29. 41-43); and his disbelief in the Manes (carm. 1. 4. 16) and the irony of his ode about Archytas (carm. 1. 28) point in the same direction. As prescribed by the ancient rules of meditation, he daily examined his conscience. His feeling that he should enjoy every day as a gift in the face of death, so that he could leave life's table like a guest who has eaten to the full, is Epicureanism rooted in a life.

---

<sup>1</sup> On Horace's independent attitude R. MAYER 1986.

Horace is well aware of his own weaknesses, and makes no effort to conceal them.<sup>1</sup> Yet he also continually emphasizes that he has only moderate foibles. He does not share the zeal shown by some Christians in presenting themselves as the greatest of sinners. He wins his readers' sympathies by stating that he is content with modest good fortune but perfectly ready to appreciate greater comfort (epist. 1. 15. 42-46). As a moral teacher, Horace occasionally compares himself with a blind man who tries to show another the road (epist. 1. 17. 3-4). By revealing such human traits he not only makes his doctrines more palatable to his listeners, but also in a unique way transfers elements of Socratic irony into the sphere of Roman humanitas.<sup>2</sup>

Among the themes of his poetry, apart from these basic principles of moral philosophy, are found those of friendship (an especial note of sincerity sounds in carm. 2. 17, addressed to Maecenas) and love. Love is not experienced with the passionate surrender of the elegists (cf. carm. 1. 5), but rather suffered in silence. But his lines, which at times seem so lightly thrown off, must not lead to insensitive conclusions. Horace's love is less possessive than that of Propertius, yet in him there is no lack of sincere tones, and he also knows what it is to fall victim to passion, though he does not raise this into a principle for living (carm. 3. 9; 4. 11). The themes of danger and death permeate all his work. The somewhat self-ironic manner (e.g. 2. 13) adopted at times must not deceive the reader about Horace's being in earnest.

<sup>1</sup> Hor. sat. 2. 3. 300-326; epist. 1. 8. 3-12; 1. 20. 25.

<sup>2</sup> E. ZINN 1970, 53.

The gracefulness of Horace's lyric defies any dissecting analysis, as does the poet's ability in few words to communicate atmosphere and mood (already found in epode 13) or to destroy it. Horace's Odes as a collection are a unique reflection of the world found in an individual soul. Gods, nature, state, friends of both sexes, and the poet's own ego form concentric circles. The mature capability of Latin lyric to discharge such a wide-ranging task was proved by Horace for the first and only time. It was he who conquered for Latin poetry quite new territories.

Transmission

The transmission of Horace on the whole is good, which means that the study of its history is unlikely to produce revolutionary improvements of the text. At the same time, the richness and complexity of the traditio present almost insoluble problems. In spite of devoted efforts by generations of scholars, it seems impossible at this time to classify the numerous manuscripts, some of which go back to the 9th century. Investigation and critical understanding of the transmission are deeply indebted to editors such as Keller, Holder, and Vollmer. Building on their results, in his edition F. KLINGNER distinguished two strands of transmission reaching back to antiquity (Ξ and Ψ) along with a mixed recension, Q. This division has now been shown to be untenable by the edition of S. BORZSÁK. A new edition, not yet in prospect, would contribute considerably to the credit of classical philology. For all these reasons, editors of Horace are especially thrown back on their gift of divination. If they believe at times that they must prove this at the boldest and best passages of Horace's poetry, this is part of the risks of their profession.

Influence<sup>1</sup>

Horace found imitators as early as Ovid, yet a genuine Roman lyric poet after Horace does not exist. Statius created his own genres of poetry, and is not to be compared. Prudentius played the role of the Christian Horace.

---

<sup>1</sup> E. STEPLINGER, Das Fortleben der horazischen Lyrik seit der Renaissance, Leipzig 1906; E. STEPLINGER, Horaz im Urteil der Jahrhunderte, Leipzig 1921; G. SHOWERMAN, Horace and his Influence, Boston 1922, repr. 1963; Orazio nella letteratura mondiale, Roma 1936; HIGHER, Class. Trad., index s.v.; M.-B. QUINT, Untersuchungen zur mittelalterlichen Horaz-Rezeption, Frankfurt 1988; England: M. R. THAYER, The Influence of Horace on the Chief English Poets of the 19th Century, New Haven 1916; C. M. GOAD, Horace in the English Literature of the 18th Century,

In satire Persius and Juvenal each came to their own independent terms with Horace. Seneca took up his idea of writing philosophical letters, but he did so in prose and his quotations of Horace's Epistles are surprisingly scarce.<sup>1</sup> By contrast, the authors from whom Boethius drew consoling maxims include Horace.

Horace also became, as he had feared (epist. 1. 20. 17–18), a school author. Of the lively activities of commentators in antiquity, we possess survivals in the commentary of Porphyrio, the scholia of pseudo-Acro, and the Commentator Cruquianus. Porphyrio is less attentive to historical matters than to grammar and sense, poetic beauty and the correct method of delivery.

Alcuin, who called himself 'Flaccus', knew at least the Ars poetica<sup>2</sup> and the Satires. In the Middle Ages Horace was valued as a moralist,<sup>3</sup> receiving the sobriquet ethicus. From the 8th century on, excerpts of his work frequently appeared in florilegia.<sup>4</sup> This meant that the focal point of interest lay in his Satires. Jean de Meung (d. about 1305) in his Roman de la rose cites the Satires and Epistles but not the Odes.<sup>5</sup> Dante (d. 1321) mentions Orazio satiro as the second greatest poet after Homer (inf. 4. 89), but does not show himself well acquainted

New Haven 1918; F. STACK, Pope and Horace. Studies in Imitation, Cambridge 1985; D. HOPKINS, C. MARTINDALE, eds., Horace Made New, Cambridge 1993; Germany: G. RÜCKERT, Mörke und Horaz, Nürnberg 1970; W. J. PIETSCH, Friedrich von Hagedorn und Horaz, Untersuchungen zur Horaz-Rezeption in der deutschen Literatur des 18. Jh., Hildesheim 1988.

<sup>1</sup> Among the rare allusions to Horace, those to the Odes seem to prevail.

<sup>2</sup> Moreover, a Carolingian commentary on the Ars poetica is known.

<sup>3</sup> To him, for example, the epic in hexameters about beasts Ecbasis cuiusdam captivi per tropologiam (c. 1040) is indebted. Sextus Amarcus Gallus Piosistratus (11th–12th century) composed four books of satiric sermones.

<sup>4</sup> E.g. Exempla diversorum auctorum (8th century): 74 quotations; Brunetto Latini, Li livres dou tresor (c. 1260): 60 quotations (HIGHET, Class. Trad. 634; also important for what follows).

<sup>5</sup> Hugh of Trimberg (d. after 1313) speaks expressly of the slight value set on the Epodes and Odes in his day (Registrum auctorum 2, 66–71). Recent scholarship has shown that before that time (i.e. in the 11th–12th centuries) the Odes enjoyed more attention than in the 13th century (K. FRIIS-JENSEN, in: Horace. Entretiens [Fondation Hardt] 39, 1992, 257–298); Horace in the Archepoet's works: H. KREFELD, ed., Der Archipoeta, Berlin 1992, esp. 17–18; 20; 96–99; a musical composition of the Ode to Phyllis (4. 11) dates from the 10th century. In the 12th century, Metellus of Tegernsee imitated Horace's Odes and Epodes in his polymetric praise of St. Quirinus (CONTE, LG 318).

even with the Satires. Petrarch (d. 1374) quotes Horace almost as often as Virgil. A lyric poet himself, he shows an excellent knowledge of the Odes, and in him the taste of the new age makes itself felt. His lyric poetry in Italian is, however, un-Horatian. Spenser (d. 1599) knew the Epistles, Odes, and Epodes.

In the Renaissance Horace continued to be a school author, and was read as a moralist. Montaigne (d. 1592) cites him, for example, in Latin. Along with Lucretius, he was Montaigne's favorite poet. Both are quoted 148 times. Montaigne's freely drawn picture of himself is reminiscent of Horace's comment on Lucilius.

Complete translations of the Satires<sup>1</sup> and Epistles<sup>2</sup> appeared earlier than of the Odes. Yet in the 16th and 17th centuries, many individual poems were translated. The imitation by Milton (d. 1674) of the ode to Pyrrha may be mentioned. Complete translations were attempted by the French author Mondot (1579) and the Italian Giorgino (1595). The Ars poetica, which occupied a key position in Renaissance literary theory, was translated into Italian by Dolce (1535) and paraphrased by the important critic Robortelli (1548). In French Grandichan (1541) and Peletier du Mans (1544) made the Ars poetica accessible, followed by T. Drant in English (1567) and Luis Zapata in Spanish (1592). The earliest German translation of Horace was made by A. Buchholtz (Leipzig 1639).

In Italian satire, which is of pioneering importance, Juvenal takes precedence over Horace, although in Ariosto's seven satiric discourses (between 1517 and 1531) Horace is duly noted.

Mathurin Régnier (d. 1613), the creator of verse satire in French, remained faithful to Horace's gentle humor even when claiming to succeed Juvenal (sat. 2). The same may be said of Boileau (d. 1711), from whom there are also Epistles and the celebrated Art poétique.<sup>3</sup>

Many English satirists gave preference to Juvenal. Yet Horace's influence was felt, as in John Donne (d. 1631) and in the 'toothless' group of Joseph Hall's Satires (d. 1656). Alexander Pope (d. 1744) composed Imitations of Horace and, like Boileau in France, may pass as the Horace of his time and nation.

Satire in debt to antiquity, while at the same time critical of its age, was less prominent as a typical Renaissance phenomenon in countries like Spain and Germany. In his Narrenschiff, Sebastian Brant (d. 1521) also made use of the ancient satirists, though without taking over the generic style. Abraham a Sancta Clara (d. 1709), as preacher, was still firmly anchored in the medieval tradition. Rabener (d. 1771), who composed prose satires, could not however rival those of France and England.

<sup>1</sup> Italian: Dolce 1559; French: Habert 1549; English: T. DRANT 1567.

<sup>2</sup> Italian: Dolce 1559; French: 'G.T.P.' 1584; English: T. DRANT 1567.

<sup>3</sup> Diderot (d. 1784), too, wrote satires in the vein of Horace.

In the Renaissance Horace's Ars poetica exercised strong influence on the theory and practice of drama. In the Baroque period Horace commanded almost more respect as a literary critic than as a poet. A direct line of descent links Aristotle and Horace with Julius Caesar Scaliger (Artis poeticae libri septem 1561) and goes down to Opitz (Buch Von der deutschen Poeterey 1624) and Boileau (Art poétique 1674). It was only with the 'storm and stress' of the pre-Romantics that Horace's treatise lost importance.

The influence of the Odes was no less significant. Neo-Latin poets down to Balde (d. 1668) and Sarbiewski (d. 1640), the 'Christian Horace', gave fresh life to the ode, and Horace's lyric meters also affected those used in Latin school plays. Gradually Horace found imitators in the vernacular languages. Their lyric at first had followed late Medieval and mainly southern French models and so, unlike drama, had developed independently of ancient influences.

Italy discovered Horace the lyric poet. Landino and Politian chose the Odes as their model. Tasso's father, Bernardo, published Horatian odes in 1531, soon followed by Spanish efforts in modern meters; for example, those of Garcilaso de la Vega (d. 1536), Luis de León (d. 1591) and Fernando de Herrera (d. 1597). To some degree, the ancient meters were adapted to the modern languages, a fascinating process of creation at which here it is only possible to hint.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> From Italy may be mentioned Chiabrera (d. about 1638)—and even Carducci (d. 1907; alcaics: Per la morte di Napoleone Eugenio; sapphics: Piemonte, Ode alle fonti del Clitumno, Miramar etc.), from Spain for example Villegas (d. 1669), from Rumania Eminescu (d. 1889; VON ALBRECHT, Rom 473–490); efforts are also known from France (D. P. WALKER, French Verse in Classical Metres, and the Music to which it was Set, of the Last Quarter of the 16th Century, Oxford 1947). In England, e.g. Watts (d. 1748) wrote religious hymns such as Day of Judgment in sapphic strophes. The meter, as in the case of the Italians, observes the normal Latin word accent. The same is true of German hymns such as Herzliebster Jesu, was hast du verbrochen by J. HEERMANN (d. 1647). The change to quantitative reading of Latin verse in Latin schools (putting an ictus of stress on long syllables) is reflected in the quite different treatment of Horatian meters in later German poets, e.g. Klopstock (d. 1803) and Hölderlin (d. 1843); W. STROH, Der deutsche Vers und die Lateinschule, A&A 25, Ronsard (d. 1585) was the creator of a lofty lyric not only for France, but for Europe. He and Du Bellay (d. 1560) expressed their proud experience as founders of a new poetry in verses which at times sound almost like translations, but which, because of their rivalry with Horace, give utterance to the highest poetic self-confidence. Ronsard's late lyric, in turning away from Pindar, is close to that of Horace in spirit.

In England Ben Jonson (d. 1637) was both in theory and practice the first Horatian. To him and Milton (d. 1674) the ode in England owed a rebirth. Herrick, Marvell, Collins, Pope, and Keats were other followers of Horace.

In Germany Weckherlin (d. 1653) independently of Opitz (d. 1639) consciously raised the Horatian claim of wishing to please only a few, and thus, in Ronsard's wake, he became a reformer of German poetry. In the course of his many travels he wrote in German, Latin, French, English, and Swabian. Hagedorn (d. 1754), who like Weckherlin experienced English influence, saw in Horace his 'friend, teacher, and companion'. It was Horace and Anacreon that he followed in his Odes. Under Horatian inspiration J. P. Uz (d. 1796) became, from a devotee of Anacreon, the founder of the philosophical ode in Germany. Ramler (d. 1798) proved his abilities as a careful court poet and particularly as a translator of Horatian lyric. Klopstock (d. 1803) was educated at Schulpforta, where Latin was still spoken, and always carried quotations from his favorite Horace on his lips. Nourished at the spring of antiquity, he conquered new dimensions for German lyric both in form<sup>1</sup> and content. Lessing (d. 1781) was a profound student of the Odes.<sup>2</sup> Herder (d. 1803) and Wieland (d. 1813), the latter the author of the standard German translation of the Satires and Epistles in blank verse, were sensitive to Horace's 'humor' or 'irony'. For Schiller (d. 1805), Horace was the true founder and the still unsurpassed model of the 'sentimental' style of poetry.<sup>3</sup> Johann Heinrich Voss (d. 1826), in his complete translation in meter, gave 1979, 1-19; idem, Wie hat man lateinische Verse gesprochen?, in: Musik und Dichtung, FS V. Pöschl, Frankfurt 1990, 87-116.

---

<sup>1</sup> Predecessors in the use of Horatian meters were Lange and Pyra.

<sup>2</sup> Rettungen des Horaz; see also his annihilating review of Lange's Horace.

<sup>3</sup> Herder, Adrastea, vol. 5: Briefe über das Lesen des Horaz, an einen jungen Freund (1803): Sämtliche Werke, ed. SUPHAN 24, 1886, 212; Wieland, Horazens Satiren, Leipzig, 2nd ed. 1804, part 2, 6-7; Schiller, Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795): Werke ed. R. BOXBERGER, vol. 12, 2, 360; cf. E. ZINN 1970.

an impression of the poet's art. He did not spare his readers the difficulties of the original, especially in the Odes, but he did succeed, in spite of many forced renderings, in outshining with his subtle music many of his successors.

Pushkin (d. 1837), Russia's greatest poetic genius, and Eminescu (d. 1889), the Rumanian Horace, nourished a deep sympathy for the poet and expressed their consciousness of their poetic mission in Horatian terms.<sup>1</sup> Horace's role as reviver of lyric began in Russia in the 18th century with Lomonosov (d. 1765) and Derzhavin (d. 1816). It continued down into the 20th century with Blok, Bryussov, and Yevtushenko.

Even at the time of the Enlightenment and the French Revolution, Horace was still treasured for his maxims, and was excerpted several times in the collection of quotations made for himself by President Jefferson (d. 1826). In Goethe's Wahlverwandtschaften there is an aging gentleman who is continually recalling quotations from Horace on all possible and impossible occasions, which however he keeps to himself to avoid seeming pedantic. In his older years Goethe shared much with Horace, as, for example, the striving for inner balance. But a romantic poetics, guided by the young Goethe, could make little of the Roman poet, since at that time he labored for the younger generation under the double disadvantage of being both a courtier and a poet of art. The 19th century therefore, by and large, could not boast of any particular sympathy with the poet. The demands of education required that he should be studied and read in the original, but since such study was often unenjoyable, it was only rarely that it bore fruit. There were exceptions among educated Italians and Englishmen of the day, who still felt the direct presence of antiquity or who sought to restrain romanticism by a search for a new Renaissance. Ugo Foscolo (d. 1827) actually began one of his sonnets with a quotation from Horace: non son chi fui (cf. carm. 4. 1. 3), and Carducci (d. 1907) adopted the proud odi profanum vulgus, 'I hate the uninitiate crowd' (carm. 3. 1. 1). But Victor Hugo (d. 1885) never recovered from the experience in his schooldays of once being required to copy out 500 lines of Horace instead of keeping a date with a young lady.<sup>2</sup> Byron (d. 1824) too found that his pleasure in

<sup>1</sup> W. BUSCH, Horaz in Rußland, München 1964; VON ALBRECHT, Rom, ch. 11 and 14.

<sup>2</sup> Contemplations 1, 13 (À propos d'Horace).

Horace<sup>1</sup> was spoiled by unhappy recollections of school; he nevertheless imitated the third Roman ode.<sup>2</sup> Tennyson (d. 1892) was compelled by his father to learn all Horace's odes by heart. His respect for the poet seems to have survived this trial. Platen (d. 1835) imitated Klopstock and Horace, his constant companion, in his Odes. Nietzsche (d. 1900) wrote a trenchant evaluation of the verbal structure of the Horatian ode, preparing the way for a fresh understanding.

In France poésie absolue seemed to open a new path towards Horace. There are parallels with the moderns in strictness of form and the equal status given to poetry and reflection on poetry. But Horace does not annihilate reality. In him an equilibrium of intellect and feeling prevails. Nor does he take for granted the isolation of the lyric ego.

In his Horatius travestitus Christian Morgenstern (d. 1914) shifted Horace's lyric into the present age, using contemporary place and personal names. This was an ingenious contribution to the understanding of a characteristic peculiarity of Horatian diction.<sup>3</sup> The translation of Horace's lyric poems by R. A. SCHRÖDER (d. 1962) is capricious in its use of language, but it signals a new German appreciation of the poet. The same may be said of the Jamben of R. BORCHARDT (d. 1945). Brecht (d. 1956) came to critical terms with Horace and aimed in his own work to link prodesse and delectare. Horace also influenced Heiner Müller.

The echoes of Horatian lyric in European music are especially wide-ranging.<sup>4</sup>

In his Epodes and Odes, Horace realized many of lyric's features, and this means that every generation and every reader may discover new treasures in him. To reduce Horatian lyric to a single notion would be an impoverishment. And how great is the range of a genius who could write Odes as well as Satires and Epistles! An evaluation of the Epistles as a work of art—something hardly as yet begun—would

<sup>1</sup> Childe Harold's Pilgrimage 4, 74–76.

<sup>2</sup> Translation from Horace.

<sup>3</sup> The same is true of Anna Elissa Radke's transposition of Horation motifs into a modern university town.

<sup>4</sup> DRAHEIM 41–99; 184–208; J. DRAHEIM, G. WILLE, eds., Horaz-Vertonungen vom Mittelalter bis zur Gegenwart, Amsterdam 1985; W. SCHUBERT, Elemente antiker Musik im Werk Georg von Albrechts, in: M. von Albrecht, W. Schubert, eds., Musik in Antike und Neuzeit, Frankfurt 1987, 195–208, esp. 207; R. WIETHOFF, Horaz-Vertonungen in der Musik des 16.–20. Jh., Köln 1990.

be a step forward in the correct assessment of the complex unity of his rich achievement.

What is the significance of Horace for Europe? Along with Aristotle he influenced the theory and practice of drama; along with Juvenal, he set his mark on satire; along with Seneca, he provided the moralists with words of gold. Principally, however, along with Pindar, he inspired the development of sublime lyric in the vernacular languages by setting artistic standards for poets, compelling them to exercise extreme concentration, and at the same time communicating to them the highest conceivable notion of their activity. The vocation and mission of the poet are learned from Horace, whose own spiritual independence here exercises a liberating influence on the greatest minds.

Editions: Editio princeps in folio, sine loco et anno, Italy about 1470. * R. BENTLEY, Cambridge 1711, repr., ed. K. ZANGEMEISTER, 2 vols., 1869. * O. KELLER, A. HOLDER, Leipzig 1864–1870. * E. C. WICKHAM, H. W. GARROD, Oxford 1912 (dated) * R. A. SCHRÖDER (Tr), Wien 1935 (= Ges. Werke, vol. 5, Berlin 1952, 613–779; 959–1024). * A. KIESSLING, R. HEINZE (TC), 3 vols., ed. E. BURCK (with bibl.), new ed. with add. Berlin 1968–1970. * F. KLINGNER, Leipzig 3rd ed. 1959 (= 6th ed. 1982). * M. SIMON, W. RITSCHEL (Tr), Berlin 2nd ed. 1983. * S. (= I.) BORZSÁK, Leipzig 1984. * H. FÄRBER, W. SCHÖNE (TTr), München 10th ed. 1985. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Stutgardiae 1985, 3rd. ed. 1995. * carm.: T. E. PAGE (TC), London 1895. * P. SHOREY, G. J. LAING (TN), Chicago 1911. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Die Lyrik des Horaz. Eine Interpretation der Oden (C), 2 vols., Darmstadt 1972–1973. * R. G. M. NISBET, M. HUBBARD (C), carm. 1, Oxford 1970; carm. 2, 1978. * carm. 3: G. WILLIAMS (TC), Oxford 1969. * carm., epod.: C. E. BENNETT (TTrN), London 1918 and reprints. * epod.: A. CAVARZERE (TC), Venezia 1992. * D. MANKIN, Cambridge 1995. * sat.: P. LEJAY (TC), Paris 1911. * sat., epist., ars: H. RUSHTON FAIRCLOUGH (TTrN), London 1926 and reprints. * C. M. WIELAND (TTrN), ed. by M. FUHRMANN, Frankfurt 1986. * O. SCHÖNBERGER (TTr), Berlin 2nd ed. 1991. * epist.: C. M. WIELAND (TTrN), ed. by B. KYTZLER, Stuttgart 1986. * epist. 1: O. A. W. DILKE (TN), London 1966. * C. W. MACLEOD (TTrN), Rome 1986. * C. O. BRINK, Horace on Poetry: 1: Prolegomena to the Literary Epistles, Cambridge 1963; 2: The Ars Poetica, 1971; 3: Epistles, Book 2, 1982. * N. RUDD (TC), Epistles, Book 2: Epistle to the Pisones, Cambridge 1989. ** Ancient Commentaries: F. HAUTHAL, 2 vols., Berolini 1864; 1866. * A. HOLDER, O. KELLER, 2 vols., Innsbruck 1894. * A. HOLDER, O. KELLER, 2 vols., Lipsiae 1902; 1904. ** Concordances, lexica: L. COOPER, A Concordance to the Works of Horace, Washington 1916, repr. 1961. * E. STAEDLER, Thesaurus Horatianus, ed. by R. MÜLLER, Berlin 1962. * D. BO, Lexicon Horatianum, 2 vols., Hildesheim 1965–1966. * J. J. ISO, Concordantia Horatiana. A Concordance to Horace, Hildesheim 1990. * Cf. also: W. GEMOLL, Die Realien bei Horaz, 4 fascicles, Berlin 1892–1894. ** Bibl.: W. KISSEL, Horaz 1936–1975, ANRW 2, 31, 3, 1981, 1403–1558. * E. DOBLHOFER, Horaz in der Forschung nach 1957, Darmstadt 1992. * W. KISSEL, Gesamtbibliographie zu Horaz 1976–1991, in: S. KOSTER, ed., 1994, s. below.

D. ABLEITINGER-GRÜNBERGER, Der junge Horaz und die Politik. Studien zur 7. und 16. Epode, Heidelberg 1971. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Horaz, in: J. ADAMIETZ, ed., Die römische Satire, Darmstadt 1986, 123–178. * M. VON ALBRECHT, Horazens Römeroden, AAntHung 30, 1988, 229–241. * D. ARMSTRONG, Horace, New Haven 1989. * Atti del Convegno di Venosa (1992). Comitato Nazionale per le celebrazioni del bimillenario della morte di Q. Orazio Flacco (articles by 16 authors), Venosa 1993. * C. BECKER, Das Spätwerk des Horaz, Göttingen 1963. * L. BÖSING, Griechen und Römer im Augustusbrief des Horaz, Konstanz 1972. * J. BOLLÓK, Horace and Astrology, ACD 29, 1993, 11–19. * V. BUCHHEIT, Einflüsse Vergils auf das Dichterbewußtsein des Horaz, I. Vacui sub umbra lusimus, Atti del Convegno Virgiliano Mondiale 1, 1984, 212–226; II. Macht der Dichtung, SO 60, 1985, 79–93; III. Einladung beim Dichter (carm. 1, 17), SO 63, 1988, 77–94. * K. BÜCHNER, Horaz. Studien zur römischen Literatur, vol. 3, Wiesbaden 1962. * G. CALBOLI, Wortstellung und literarische Nachahmung im vierten Odenbuch des Horaz, Klio 67, 1985, 168–176. * R. W. CARRUBA, The Epodes of Horace. A Study in Poetic Arrangement, The Hague 1969. * J. J. CLAUSS, Allusion and Structure in Horace, Satire 2. 1. The Callimachean Response, TAPhA 115, 1985, 197–206. * N. E. COLLINGE, The Structure of Horace's Odes, London 1961. * S. COMMAGER, The Odes of Horace, New Haven 1962. * P. CONNOR, Horace's Lyric Poetry. The Force of Humour, Berwick, Austr. 1987. * E. COURBAUD, Horace: sa vie et sa pensée à l'époque des Epîtres, Paris 1914. * C. D. N. COSTA, ed., Horace, London 1973. * V. CREMONA, La poesia civile di Orazio, Milano 1982. * G. DAVIS, Polyhymnia: The Rhetoric of Horatian Lyric Discourse, Berkeley 1991. * H. DETTMER, Horace. A Study in Structure, Hildesheim 1983. * E. DOBLHOFER, Die Augustuspanegyrik des Horaz in formalhistorischer Sicht, Heidelberg 1966. * D. ESSER, Untersuchungen zu den Odenschlüssen bei Horaz, Meisenheim 1976. * G. C. FISKE, Lucilius and Horace, Madison 1920. * E. FRAENKEL, Horace, Oxford 1957. * B. FRISCHER, Shifting Paradigms: New Approaches to Horace's Ars Poetica, Atlanta 1991. * D. GAGLIARDI, Studi su Orazio, Palermo 1986. * O. GALL, Die Bilder der horazischen Lyrik, Königstein 1981. M. GIGANTE, S. CERASUOLO, eds, Lecturae oraziane (various authors), Napoli 1995. * M. A. GOSLING, By Any Other Name . . . Horace Sermones 2. 8 and Juvenal 5, LCM 11, 1986, 101–103. * V. GRASSMANN, Die erotischen Epoden des Horaz, München 1966. * P. GRIMAL, Essai sur l'Art poétique d'Horace, Paris 1968. * T. HALTER, Vergil und Horaz. Zu einer Antinomie der Erlebnisform, Bern 1970. * S. J. HARRISON, ed., Homage to Horace. A Bimillenary Celebration (articles by 17 authors), Oxford 1995. * R. HEINZE, Die horazische Ode, in: R.H.: Vom Geist des Römertums, Darmstadt 1960, 172–189. * R. HEINZE, Horazens Buch der Briefe, ibid. 295–307. * K. HELDMANN, Die Wesensbestimmung der horazischen Satire durch die Komödie, A&A 33, 1987, 122–139. * W. HERING, Die Dialektik von Inhalt und Form bei Horaz. Satiren Buch I und Epistula ad Pisones, Berlin 1979. * H. HIERCHE, Les Épodes d'Horace. Art et signification, Bruxelles 1974. * H. J. HIRTH, Horaz, der Dichter der Briefe, Hildesheim 1985. * P. HOHNEN, Zeugnisse der Altersreflexion bei Horaz, Gymnasium 95, 1988, 154–172. * Horace. Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 39, Vandœuvres-Genève 1992. * G. HUBER, Wortwiederholung in den Oden des Horaz, diss. Zürich 1970. * W. KILLY, ed., Geschichte des Textverständnisses am Beispiel von Pindar und Horaz, München 1981. * R. S. KILPATRICK, The Poetry of Friendship: Horace Epistles I, Edmonton 1986. * R. S. KILPATRICK, The Poetry of Criticism: Horace Epistles II and Ars Poetica, Edmonton 1990. * U. KNOCHE, Horazens Satiren und Episteln, in: U.K., Die römische Satire, Göttingen 4th ed. 1982, 46–62. * H. D. KOGELSCHATZ, Die Idee der Armut bei Horaz, diss. Freiburg 1975. * S. KOSTER, ed., Horaz-Studien (articles by: W. KISSEL, S. KOSTER, U. SCHMITZER; bibl. 1976–1991 by W. KISSEL), Erlangen 1994. * H. KRASSER, Horazische Denkfiguren. Theophilie und Theophanie . . . , Göttingen 1995. * F. KUHN, Illusion und Desillusionierung in den erotischen Gedichten des Horaz, diss. Heidelberg 1973. * B. KYTZLER, Horaz. Eine Einführung, München 1985. * R. A. LAFLEUR, Horace and ὁνομαστί κωμῳδεῖν. The Law of Satire, ANRW 2, 31, 3, 1981, 1790–1826. * A. LA PENNA, Orazio e l'ideologia del principato, Torino 1963. * E. LEFÈVRE, Horaz, München 1993. * W. LUDWIG, Zu Horaz, cam. 2. 1–12, Hermes 85, 1957, 336–345. * G. J. MADER, Poetry and Politics in Horace's First Roman Ode: A Reconsideration, AClass 30, 1987, 11–30. * H. MAUCH, O laborum dulce lenimen. Funktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur römischen Dichtung zwischen Republik und Prinzipat am Beispiel der ersten Odensammlung des Horaz, Frankfurt 1986. * R. MAYER, Horace's Epistles I and Philosophy, AJPh 107, 1986, 55–73. * M. J. MCGANN, Studies in Horace's First Book of Epistles, Bruxelles 1969. * R. MINADEO, The Golden Plectrum. Sexual Symbolism in Horace's Odes, Amsterdam 1982. * T. OKSALA, Religion und Mythologie bei Horaz, Helsinki 1973. * H. OPPERMAN, ed., Wege zu Horaz, Darmstadt 1972. * G. PASQUALI, Orazio lirico, Firenze 1920. * V. PÖSCHL, Horaz und die Politik, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1963. * V. PÖSCHL, Horazische Lyrik, Heidelberg 2nd ed. 1991. * D. H. PORTER, Horace's Poetic Journey. A Reading of Odes 1–3, Princeton 1987. * M. C. J. PUTNAM, Artifices of Eternity, Horace's Fourth Book of Odes, Ithaca 1986. * K. J. RECKFORD, Horace, New York 1969. * N. RUDD, The Satires of Horace, Cambridge 1966. * M. S.

SANTIROCCO, Unity and Design in Horace's Odes, London 1986. * A. SETAIOLI, ed., Orazio. Umanità, politica, cultura. Atti del convegno di Gubbio (1992), Perugia 1995. * E. SCHÄFER, Horaz nach Actium, WJA n.s. 13, 1987, 195–207. * E. A. SCHMIDT, Horazens Sabinumdichtung, SHAW 4, 1995. * U. W. SCHOLZ, Der frühe Lucilius und Horaz, Hermes 114, 1986, 335–365. * D. R. SHACKLETON BAILEY, Profile of Horace, London 1982. * W. STEIDLE, Studien zur Ars poetica des Horaz. Interpretationen des auf Dichtkunst und Gedicht bezüglichen Hauptteils (1–294), Würzburg-Aumühle 1939, repr. 1967. * H. P. SYNDIKUS, Die Lyrik des Horaz. Eine Interpretation der Oden, 2 vols., Darmstadt 1972–1973. * C. A. VAN ROOY, Studies in Classical Satire and Related Literary Theory, Leiden 1965. * F. WEHRLI, Horaz und Kallimachos, MH 1, 1944, 69–76. * D. A. WEST, Reading Horace, Edinburgh 1967. * W. WILLI, Horaz und die augusteische Kultur, Basel 1948, 2nd ed. 1965. * L. P. WILKINSON, Horace and his Lyric Poetry, Cambridge 1945, 3rd ed. 1968. * W. WIMMEL, Vergils Eclogen und die Vorbilder der 16. Epode des Horaz, Hermes 89, 1961, 208–226. * W. WIMMEL, Zur Form der horazischen Diatribensatire, Frankfurt 1962. * W. WIMMEL, Die Bacchus-Ode carm. 3. 25 des Horaz, AAWM 1993, 11. * W. WIMMEL, Sprachliche Ambiguität bei Horaz, München 1994. * C. WITKE, Latin Satire. The Structure of Persuasion, Leiden 1970. * C. WITKE, Horace's Roman Odes. A Critical Examination, Leiden 1983. * J. E. G. ZETZEL, Horace's Liber Sermonum. The Structure of Ambiguity, Arethusa 13, 1980, 59–77. * E. ZINN, Ironie und Pathos bei Horaz, in: A. SCHAEFER, ed., Ironie und Dichtung, München 1970, 39–58. * E. ZINN, Erlebnis und Dichtung bei Horaz, in: H. OPPERMAN, ed., Wege zu Horaz, Darmstadt 1972, 369–388. * E. ZINN, Viva vox, Frankfurt 1993.

C. ELEGY

ROMAN LOVE ELEGY

General Remarks

We begin with some formal characteristics of elegy. The meter is elegiac distichs. Solon calls them ἔπη, but, unlike the epic hexameter, the elegiac favors the development of the thought in parallelism or antithesis: 'In the hexameter rises the fountain's silvery column;/In the pentameter aye falling in melody back' (Coleridge). In principle elegies have wider scope than epigrams, though there is overlap. Typical of elegy is association of ideas and ring-composition.

In their content, whether sincerely or fictitiously, elegies often serve as a vehicle to secure a particular purpose, whether personal or political. Unlike the epic poet, the elegist may present a personal attitude to his theme. His aim may be instruction or the arousal of sympathy (Catullus 38. 8; Hor. carm. 1. 33. 2-3). Although in classical Greece ἔλεγος was thought to denote a poem of lament, regardless of its form (Eur. Helen 184-185; Aristoph. Birds 218), the derivation of ἔλεγος from ἔλε λέγειν, however, is no more than a popular etymology.<sup>1</sup> It is only secondarily that the notion of lament eventually comes to play a part in the understanding of the elegy, and even then such a theme is not universal. The oldest Ionian elegies cannot be subsumed under the idea of lament.

For the description of the Roman love elegy as a genre s. Roman Development and Reflections on Literature below.

Greek Background

The first elegiac poets made their appearance in Ionia. Callinus (7th century B.C.) summoned his audience to battle. Archilochus (7th century) wrote confidently of war, peace, love and death. Mimnermus

---

<sup>1</sup> Perhaps the word is connected with the Armenian elegn ('pipe,' 'flute') unless it originated in Asia Minor.

(7th century) emphasized life's brevity and challenged his listeners to the enjoyment of love. His book is said to have taken its name from his beloved (Nanno), a practice which continued later. Propertius subsequently appealed to Mimnermus as a poet of love (1. 9. 11), though the Greek poet, so far as may be seen, lacked the subjective element.

Tyrtaeus (mid-seventh century) and Solon (ca. 640–560) were the first elegists from the Greek mainland. Solon conferred on elegy a wide-ranging subject matter, addressing an audience of all Athenians. His poems may be regarded as political pamphlets.

Xenophanes (6th–5th century) clothed his philosophical notions of reform in elegiacs. Theognis (6th century) gave to his elegies and epigrams, not to be too clearly distinguished, a paraenetic purpose. Elegy in this older period aimed to persuade and to communicate useful knowledge, though it also strove to immortalize the beloved.

Antimachus (ca. 400) dedicated to his dead wife Lyde a series of erotic mythical narratives. This was the ancestor of the tradition, important at Rome, of elegiac narrative.

In the Hellenistic period, elegy enjoyed a brief efflorescence under Ptolemy II (d. 246 B.C.) and Arsinoë II. Hellenistic elegiac poetry was learned, to which was added myth, both to provide erotic subject-matter and to give aetiological explanation. What we know of longer elegies suggests that they did not deal subjectively with love in the Roman fashion.<sup>1</sup> This is true of the princeps elegiae (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 58) Callimachus (3rd century), of Philetas (2nd half 4th century; Prop. 2. 34. 31–32; 3. 1.1), and of Phanocles, as well as of the miniature epics of Eratosthenes (3rd century) and Euphoriion (3rd century). Hellenistic epigrams, however, like the Garland of Meleager, are a different case, for they do depict subjective feeling, and thus are important for the development of Roman elegy.

Roman Development

Elegia quoque Graecos provocamus (Quint. inst. 10. 1. 93). The problem of the origins of Roman love elegy is unsolved. Its development at Rome seems to have been rather independent.

Generally, the 'subjective' Roman elegy of love is contrasted with the Hellenistic elegy and its mythological objectivity. This theory is defensible so long as no Greek papyri are discovered which would refute it. But it must be noted that in every case the 'subjectivity' of the erotic experience describes only the pose assumed by the speaker of the poem and nothing about the author's own experience. Numerous Hellenistic erotic epigrams of a 'subjective' character are preserved. In comparing them, the reader should not exaggerate the opposition which is sometimes apparent between 'Greek' playfulness and 'Roman' seriousness. The business of weighing souls is mostly artificial and of little profit to the scholar.

<sup>1</sup> The existence of an—unattested—subjective Hellenistic love elegy is assumed by LEO, Plaut. Forsch. 129.

The considerable differences between the individual Roman elegists may prevent us from establishing the theory of a single source. So far as may be seen, Augustan elegy does not derive from any one specific Greek genre, but rather is made up from individual elements found in different genres. In their programmatic poems the Romans appealed to Mimnermus as a love poet, to Philetas and Callimachus as poets of Hellenistic art, and also to Euphorion. The influence of the epigram is important,<sup>1</sup> but it is not the sole model for Roman elegy.<sup>2</sup> The stock of elegiac characters bears some similarities to that of comedy, and resemblances go beyond parallels conditioned by circumstance. The influence of Menander's character portrayal and humanity was not limited to comedy. Even the pastoral leaves traces in elegy.

In Rome love elegy enjoyed only a brief heyday, lasting from Gallus to Ovid. Its social background was the discontent of a younger generation feeling alienated from the political circumstances of the late Republican and early Augustan period. Another factor was the experience of free love, partly inspired by the role of the hetaera in Greek society. Among Roman predecessors, along with some of the epigrammatists, we may note Catullus in particular, with his Allius elegy (poem 68) and poem 76. But Catullus did not publish a book of elegies and did not present the typical topoi of the Roman love elegy, so far as he was aware of them at all, with the provocative sharpness and one-sidedness of the later elegists. It is then Cornelius Gallus (d. 26 B.C.) who must be regarded as the real founder of the genre.

Who was Cornelius Gallus? He was a Roman knight who became the first prefect of Egypt, where he immortalized his achievements in proud inscriptions, one of which was on the obelisk now adorning St. Peter's Square. He was accused of disloyalty and committed suicide in 26 B.C., an early victim to imperial jealousy. Of Gallus' poems, written perhaps around 40, we knew until recently only a single verse, along with the important evidence in Virgil's Eclogues.<sup>1</sup> There is some suggestion that Ovid's Metamorphoses may have been inspired by his poetry and its cosmic and erotic aspects. The modern reconstruction of a poem on Milanion,<sup>1</sup> deduced from Propertius and other authors, is fascinating and even convincing, and it sheds light on the history of the genre. Newly discovered papyrus fragments,<sup>3</sup> however, leave the reader with a disappointing picture of the celebrated poet's talents. Should this be a coincidence? However, in the text essential—for some suspiciously many—features of Roman love elegy appear in inchoate form.<sup>4</sup> Since the genuineness of the find can hardly be challenged, new questions arise: Are the poems of Gallus to be regarded as epigrams without point, or as elegies without coherence? Is it possible that Gallus was rightly forgotten? Was he merely an influential amateur? Or a talent incapable of exercising self-criticism publishing good and bad without distinction? Was Virgil's<sup>5</sup> sympathy (ecl. 6 and 10) inspired more by personal than literary motives, and Ovid's sincere posthumous admiration by political rather than poetic reasons?

<sup>1</sup> F. JACOBY 1905, esp. 81-98.

<sup>2</sup> E. SCHULZ-VANHEYDEN, Properz und das griechische Epigramm, diss. Münster (1969) 1970.

In general, the particular constellation of motifs in Roman elegy may be regarded as the creation of Cornelius Gallus.<sup>6</sup> In all probability it was he who set his stamp upon the genre by putting at its center the notion of surrender to the beloved (servitium amoris) and the total

<sup>1</sup> Some of Virgil's admirers doubt the statement of Servius (ecl. 10. 1; georg. 4. 1) that Virgil wrote the Aristaeus episode found in the 4th book of the Georgics to replace a eulogy of Gallus after his disgrace.

<sup>2</sup> In the works cited, W. STROH offers hints towards a convincing reconstruction. Bold hypotheses on works of Gallus are found in D. O. ROSS 1975.

<sup>3</sup> Is the addressee Augustus or Caesar? The address to (Valerius) Kato (sic) rather suggests a dating in favor of the latter, which would make Gallus have written his poems in the 40's. The scandalous goings-on of Cytheris ('Lycoris') were at their height in precisely this period. See most recently M. GLATT 1990–1991, 23–33; Text: R. D. ANDERSON, P. J. PARSONS, R. G. M. NISBET, Elegiacs by Gallus from Qaṣr Ibrīm, JRS 69, 1979, 125–155; W. STROH 1983; on the scholarship: N. B. CROWTHER 1983; G. PETERSMANN, Cornelius Gallus und der Papyrus von Qaṣr Ibrīm, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1649–1655. The authenticity is doubted by F. BRUNHÖLZL, Der sogenannte Gallus-Papyrus von Kaṣr Ibrīm, Cod Man 10, 1984, 33–40. His literary judgment is better than his arguments which are expressly refuted by J. BLÄNSDORF, Der Gallus-Papyrus—eine Fälschung?, ZPE 67, 1987, 43–50 (with bibl.).

<sup>4</sup> W. STROH 1983.

<sup>5</sup> Does Virgil intend to give a survey of his friend's poetry? So F. SKUTSCH 1901, 18; a more cautious account in N. B. CROWTHER 1983, 1635–1636.

<sup>6</sup> W. STROH 1983.

obedience of the lover (obsequium). Whereas in Greek poetry for the most part the woman appears as the slave of the man, in Roman elegy the relationship is reversed. Among the Greeks at most male lovers were represented as slaves of favorite boys. In Roman society the woman as domina enjoyed great respect, and yet slavish subjection to the will of a woman of questionable repute must have been seen as a provocation even at Rome. A further characteristic of Roman love elegy, which we no doubt also owe to Gallus, is the topos of 'utility'<sup>1</sup> which must be discussed again later in connection with the views of the elegists on poetry. The evolution in Propertius' creativity is also examined later.

Ovid described Cornelius Gallus as the founder of the genre, and declared that Tibullus, Propertius and he himself were Gallus' successors. In the corpus Tibullianum, the passionate missives of Sulpicia offer a fascinating insight into the possible roots of the genre, while the respectable craftsmanship of the worthy Lygdamus permits the reader to estimate the artistic level of the tresviri amoris. In Ovid Augustan love elegy reached a point from which further advance seemed impossible, and Ovid himself opened new paths for elegy. The newly created genre of the Heroides gave speech not to the man, but to the woman and selected a mythical garb. In these two respects love poetry returned to its Greek pattern. A novel element was the union in elegy of epistolary style, dramatic monologue and features of the rhetorical suasoria. The Ars amatoria and Remedia amoris were the logical culmination of the road from the subjective to the objective, already foreshadowed by the self-irony and distance exhibited in the Amores. The choice of meter was suggested by the erotic subject, and was not wholly inappropriate to a didactic poem, since from the outset didactic features had formed part of the elegiac genre. The Metamorphoses returned to a mythical subject matter and even to the epic meter. The Fasti, in the tradition of Callimachus' Aetia and Propertius' 4th book, again revived aetiological elegy. In the Tristia and Epistulae ex Ponto the elegiac epistle, which at first had been cast by Ovid in mythological form, was once again filled with personal content, and at the same time the old purposefulness of elegy now reappeared. On the whole it may be said that Ovid took Augustan love elegy as his point of departure, perfected it and then set it on new paths in different ways, partly by a return to Hellenistic or even older traditions, partly by the use of rhetoric, and partly by the continuance of Roman personal poetry.

<sup>1</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie.

In the Christian period Lactantius (early 4th century) in his Phoenix elegy produced a new justification of the aesthetic.<sup>1</sup> Ausonius (4th century) and Claudian (ca. 400) employed the elegiac meter in different minor forms, though more or less within a traditional framework. The pagan Rutilius Namatianus (early 5th century) composed a travelogue in elegiacs which he linked with a eulogy of Rome. The Christian Maximian (first half of 6th century) busied himself once more with love elegy in the strict meaning of the word, setting his poetry about love against a contrasting background of old age, and thus gaining new effects. The Middle Ages later read him as ethicus.

Literary Technique

Roman love elegy was made up of typical characters and situations. The erotic theme as well as the method of literary treatment resulted in many parallels with comedy: e.g. the soldier as rich lover, the advice given by the lena. Even closer is the relationship to epigram, and some elegies of Propertius may be understood as expanded epigrams. One feature affecting the overall structure of elegies is the Hellenistic principle of centrality.<sup>2</sup>

Each poet displays a personal preference in the forms he chooses. Tibullus and Ovid are two extremes. The former, inspired by Hellenistic models, aims for a composition touching on many themes, in which the different topics are linked through association. Ovid presents a single theme and handles it with a certain rigor. Propertius stands between these two, though many of his elegies, like those of Ovid later, are thematically self-contained and resemble extended epigrams. The poets infused the modest Hellenistic-style poem with personal feeling, and developed it into something monumental.

<sup>1</sup> A. WLOSOK, Wie der Phoenix singt, in: Musik und Dichtung FS V. PÖSCHL, Frankfurt 1990, 209–222 (with bibl.).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. A. WLOSOK, Die dritte Cynthia-Elegie des Propertius (Prop. 1. 3), Hermes 95, 1967, 330–352; now in: W. EISENHUT, ed., Antike Lyrik. Ars interpretandi, vol. 2, Darmstadt 1970, 405–430; about 60% of Propertius' elegies obey such structural principles.

In Propertius myth serves as 'gold background', elevating the significance of the private realm. Tibullus does without learned mythology, and instead, in the shape of an exaltation of country life and peace, nurses a personal 'myth', though in places he deliberately robs it of its magic (Tib. 2. 3).

In his handling of the myth Ovid unites Propertian technique with an effort, reminiscent of Tibullus, to secure intelligibility, and a concern, peculiar to himself, for visual and conceptual acuteness.

The employment of the first person has important consequences for literary technique. The elegiac 'I' is subjective in the author's intention, but in fact there are so many topical and typical situations, combined with improbabilities and contradictions, that a biographical interpretation of the elegies is ruled out. Of course this does not mean that we should deny personal experience, for the inspiration it gave was perhaps irreplaceable. But, in the subjectivity of the Roman love elegy, it is hardly more than the indispensable speck of dust around which the work of art crystallizes, and which then disappears into it. Tibullus' immediacy is often overestimated.<sup>1</sup> In Propertius, as we proceed through the poems, the distance between the poet and his subject-matter grows, and even in the 1st book a certain 'absence of distance' is the product of a consciously maintained literary program, and therefore equally artificial. It is not the task of the interpreter either to reconstruct or refute a biography, but to study the literary means of subjective representation and their changes from author to author and within each work.

Within Augustan elegy, and especially within Ovid's work, we can trace a development in elegiac narrative,<sup>2</sup> which should not, however, be stringently opposed to that of epic. Rather, the elegists understand how to give elegy a subjective color and, at the same time, how to enrich it with epic elements. Thus it is not a question of establishing lines of demarcation, but rather of the mutual complementarity of the two genres.

<sup>1</sup> Good remarks in W. KRAUS, Zur Idealität des 'Ich' und der Situation in der römischen Elegie, in: Ideen und Formen, FS H. FRIEDRICH, Frankfurt 1965, 153-163.

<sup>2</sup> A treatment going beyond that of R. HEINZE (Ovids elegische Erzählung, SSAL 1919) is particularly found in B. LATTA, Die Stellung der Doppelbriefe (Heroides 16-21) in Gesamtwerk Ovids. Studien zur ovidischen Erzählkunst, diss. Marburg 1963; H. TRÄNKLE, Elegisches in Ovids Metamorphosen, Hermes 91, 1963, 459-476. Thorough-going rejection of HEINZE is found in the arguments of D. LITTLE, Richard Heinze: Ovids elegische Erzählung, in: E. ZINN, ed., Ovids Ars amatoria und Remedia amoris. Untersuchungen zum Aufbau, Stuttgart 1970, 64-105.

Language and Style

Roman elegy employs the highly cultivated language of Augustan poetry, though there are considerable differences. Undoubtedly Propertius, even in language, is the most colorful and difficult of the three great elegists. His style is unconventional. The arduousness of the reader's task, which is not merely the consequence of poor transmission, lends to Propertius' elegies the charm of the mysterious and personal.

Tibullus is a purist in his very choice of words. Even his treatment of meter—for example, his decided preference for the disyllabic pentameter ending—gives to his poetry a noble, pure, and profoundly musical ring.

Metrically Ovid follows Tibullus. He strives to outdo both his predecessors in language and style by his search for precision and clarity, and it is to this that he owes, for example, the pleasure he takes in antithesis.

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

The predecessors of Augustan love elegy—Cornelius Gallus and Catullus—have quite different notions of the role of poetry in life. Though Catullus does write about his personal experience, for example in the Allius elegy, elsewhere he emphasizes with surprising sharpness the distinction between poetry and life (16. 5–6). This sets him in opposition to later love elegy, even if the poet's remark, made in a particular context, is not to be taken as programmatic. Gallus on his side champions, as the young Propertius was later to do, a 'total' servitium amoris. Poetry is entirely subordinated to love as a lifestyle.<sup>1</sup> The 'utility' of poetry—persuasion, transformation of reality—is retained in love elegy as a fiction. In this genre the fascination therefore lies in the tension between its literary character and the emphasis laid on its 'unliterary'—'utilitarian'—character by the poets.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In their 1st books, Tibullus and Propertius do not maintain that the poet's life is the essential content of the existence they long for or actually enjoy, and even less that poetry ennobles their private life. W. STEIDLE 1962, 118–120 is right against E. BURCK 1952, 183.

<sup>2</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie 194.

In the course of his development Propertius supplements elegy as courtship by a loftier theme. He promises his beloved immortality and thus ascribes to poetry, in spite of all, the power to grant immortality. Elegy not only forms a counterpart to epic; it rivals it and even outdoes it. From his 2nd book on, Propertius gives stronger emphasis to his link with Callimachus and Philetas. In the 4th book he becomes—however this may be interpreted in detail—the Roman poet of aetia. Cynthia is present now only as a shadow.

Tibullus hardly finds room for any theoretical discussion of his poetry. He is aware of the elegiac topos of 'utility' (Tib. 2. 4. 15), but as an Augustan he sometimes interprets his poetic activity as a priesthood, and ascribes to himself the role of vates. Of all the Roman poets Ovid makes the most frequent use of the idea of inspiration.<sup>1</sup> Similarly he often speaks of his ingenium, and in this had been preceded by Propertius (3. 2. 25–26). The subjective self-awareness of the elegist is united in Ovid with the objective social claim of the vates. Thus he is able to oppose the power of his ingenium even to the central political authority (trist. 3. 7 passim).

Yet he again emphasizes the difference between art and life, as once Catullus had done, when he is thrown onto the defensive (trist. 2. 353–354).

Next to the claims to inspiration stands the interpretation of poetry as play in the Callimachean and neoteric tradition. Even in his epitaph Ovid still describes himself as tenerorum lusor Amorum (trist. 3. 3. 73; 4. 10. 1).

In his poetry of exile, elegy, in conformity with a theory known at Rome, returns to its own sphere, that of lament. Since Ovid's aim is to change his external situation by his poems, he does not write disengaged elegy in the modern sense. Rather, following a well-established ancient tradition, he uses elegy as a vehicle to secure a particular purpose.

Yet the more the poet confronts the immutability of his exile, the more he emphasizes another function of poetry. The Muse appears to him to give comfort. It is she who enables him to do spiritually what is otherwise forbidden, to change his milieu. With that, writing is reduced to a means of passing time. This last observation is also meant to arouse sympathy.

<sup>1</sup> Est deus in nobis, et sunt commercia caeli (ars 3. 549); est deus in nobis, agitante calescimus illo (fast. 6. 5); deus est in pectore nostro; haec duce praedico vaticinorque deo (Pont. 3. 4. 93–94).

Ideas II

The elegists ostentatiously part company with the social norm. Basic to the genre is the notion of love as a lifestyle, of a βίος ἐρωτικός. This novel system of values challenges and confronts the claims of traditional Roman society. The elegist can describe himself as the 'poet of his own naughtiness (nequitia)' (Ovid am. 2. 1. 2). The serious servitium amoris shown by the man in his love for his domina is, so far as may be seen, a novelty on the part of Roman elegy. Greek literature shows men reduced to erotic slavery only in comedy and in love for the same sex.

Not only poetry but all other values are subordinated to love and defined only by it. This is true—to cite an extreme example—even of Tibullus' ideal of country life. As soon as Nemesis asks him to earn money, the elegiac lover is ready to abandon all his ideals and to follow her wishes (Tib. 2. 3).

Yet from this unconventional system of values some path, however artificial, may still be traced which bridges the way to Augustan peace and its praise. The elegist and his beloved take part in the military victories of the mighty in their own way. They welcome them as occasions for merry-making and feasting. Thus the pax Augusta is incorporated into the peace of the elegy, unmilitary and even anti-military though it may be.

Roman elegy enjoys a relationship of fruitful tension with the Augustan state. What is personal and private gains in interest in a society where the individual can no longer find fulfillment in politics, and this explains why the Augustan period was love elegy's natural seed-bed. On the other hand, the poets at first take up a critical attitude to political reality. In the bloodbath instituted by Octavian at Perusia, Propertius had lost a relative (1. 21), and he declares with determination that no son of his will ever be a soldier (2. 7. 14). Ovid was proud that in the Social War his homeland had been the center of resistance to Rome (am. 3. 15. 8–10) and criticizes the divinization of Caesar (am. 3. 8. 51–52). Gallus and Tibullus were the only elegists to perform military service. In their later years Propertius and Ovid became poets of Roman aetia, seeking in this way to make their peace with the regime without surrendering their identity as elegists.

The values of the elegists are moreover not at all out of sympathy with the mood of the times. Elegiac lovers endeavored to understand their partners, something particularly clear in the latest elegist Ovid, who strives—and not simply in the Heroides—for empathy with the feminine heart. In many areas of the Roman society, compromise and harmonization of opposites were felt to be the need of the moment. A rediscovery of the humanity of Menanders comedy of bourgeois life seemed to be a logical response.<sup>1</sup> Examples are Livy's picture of Roman concordia or the kind of sympathy with an opponent displayed by Virgil's Aeneas in his encounter with Lausus.

The effort to summarize 'Roman' features of Augustan love elegy<sup>2</sup> reveals a direct juxtaposition of elements both old and new: loyalty and frivolity, action and inaction, war imagery and love of peace, modesty and boastfulness, levity and religious feeling, liberation and self-subjection, joy in life and mortal pain. To some extent, old Roman categories are boldly transferred to a new 'un-Roman' context.

Inner conflict is expressed in different ways. In Tibullus, a tension prevails: in theory he condemns a way of life from which in practice he cannot free himself.<sup>3</sup> Conversely, already in his 1st book Propertius has committed himself irrevocably to a private lifestyle, a lifestyle that for him is exclusively determined by love. This is perhaps the first considered renunciation of the conventional career of politics and soldiering on the part of a poet of the upper classes.<sup>4</sup>

The argument goes a step further with the assertion that the elegists (from Gallus on) were not merely compelled to express another ideal of life, but consciously aimed to shock, and to champion their attitude as an alternative morality.<sup>5</sup> Recently, scholars have been inclined to trace the affirmative remarks of late Propertius about the regime, not to any conviction, but to increasing political pressure.<sup>6</sup> Propertius' eventual silence would thus be an expression of protest. This is interesting idea, but an argumentum ex silentio. At least, the turning away of the maturing poet from elegiac love is a further factor which should be taken into account.<sup>7</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> This is the serious side of the proximity of the elegists to comedy, although analogies between elegy and comedy hardly suggest a lack of contact with reality. Daily experience is full of topoi.

<sup>2</sup> E. BURCK 1952, 168.

<sup>3</sup> W. STEIDLE 1962, 109.

<sup>4</sup> W. STEIDLE 1962, 109–110.

<sup>5</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie 222; W. STROH 1983, 246; R. O. A. M. LYNE 1980, 65–81.

<sup>6</sup> H.-P. STAHL, Propertius: 'Love' and 'War.' Individual and State under Augustus, Berkeley 1985, 133–135.

<sup>7</sup> K. NEUMEISTER, Die Überwindung der elegischen Liebe bei Properz (Buch 1–3), Frankfurt 1983.

Bibl.: G. LUCK, Probleme der römischen Liebeselegie in der neueren Forschung, ANRW 1, 3, 1973, 361–368; N. HOLZBERG 1990 (s. below).

L. ALFONSI, W. SCHMID, Elegie, RLAC 4, 1959, 1026–1061. * BARDON, s. General list of abbreviations. * F. BEISSNER, Geschichte der deutschen Elegie, Berlin 1941. * E. BURCK, Römische Wesenszüge der augusteischen Liebeselegie, Hermes 80, 1952, 163–200; repr. in: E.B., Vom Menschenbild in der römischen Literatur, Heidelberg 1966, 191–221. * F. CAIRNS 1979: s. Tibullus. * E. CASTLE, Das Formgesetz der Elegie, ZÄsth 37, 1943, 42–54. * N. B. CROWTHER, C. Cornelius Gallus. His Importance in the Development of Roman Poetry, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1622–1648. * A. A. DAY, The Origins of Latin Love-Elegy, Oxford 1938. * B. GENTILI, Epigramma ed elegia, in: L'epigramme grecque, Entretiens (Fondation Hardt) 14, Vandœuvres-Genève 1967, 39–90. * M. GLATT, Die 'andere Welt' der römischen Elegiker. Das Persönliche in der Liebesdichtung, Frankfurt 1991. * J. GRIFFIN, Augustan Poetry and the Life of Luxury, JRS 67, 1977, 17–26. * J. HOFFMANN, Poeta und puella. Zur Grundkonstellation der römischen Liebeselegie, diss. Erlangen 1976. * N. HOLZBERG, Die römische Liebeselegie. Eine Einführung, Darmstadt 1990. * E. HOLZENTHAL, Das Krankheitsmotiv in der römischen Elegie, diss. Köln 1967. * F. JACOBY, Zur Entstehung der römischen Elegie, RhM 60, 1905, 38–105; repr. in: F.J., Kleine philologische Schriften, vol. 2, Berlin 1961, 65–121. * D. F. KENNEDY, The Arts of Love. Five Studies in the Discourse of Roman Love Elegy, Cambridge 1993. * S. LILJA, The Roman Elegists' Attitude to Women, Helsinki 1965. * G. LUCK, The Latin Love Elegy, London 1959, 2nd ed. 1969. * R. O. A. M. LYNE, The Latin Love Poets. From Catullus to Horace, Oxford 1980. * P. MURGATROYD, Servitium amoris and the Roman Elegists, Latomus 40, 1981, 589–606. * F.-H. MUTSCHLER 1985, s. Tibullus. * L. NICASTRI, Cornelio Gallo e l'elegia ellenistico-romana, Napoli 1984. * A. F. POTTS, The Elegiac Mode. Poetic Form in Wordsworth and Other Elegists, Ithaca, N.Y. 1967. * R. REITZENSTEIN, Zur Sprache der römischen Erotik, SHAW 1912, 12. * D. O. ROSS, Backgrounds to Augustan Poetry. Gallus, Elegy, and Rome, Cambridge 1975. * F. SKUTSCH, Aus Vergils Frühzeit, Leipzig 1901, repr. 1982. * F. SKUTSCH, Gallus und Vergil. Aus Vergils Frühzeit II, Leipzig 1906. * A. SPIESS, Militat omnis amans. Ein Beitrag zur Bildersprache der antiken Erotik, diss. Tübingen 1930. * H.-P. STAHL 1985: s. Propertius. * W. STEIDLE, Das Motiv der Lebenswahl bei Tibull und Propertius, WS 75, 1962, 100–140; s. also: W.S., Ausgewählte Aufsätze, Amsterdam 1987, 139–179. * STROH, Liebeselegie. * W. STROH, Die Ursprünge der römischen Liebeselegie. Ein altes Problem im Lichte eines neuen Fundes, Poetica 15, 1983, 205–246. * W. STROH, Quid de obsequio suo in amore poetae elegiaci senserint, in: Tredici secoli di elegia latina. Atti del Convegno internazionale, Assisi (1988) 1989, 25–62. * P. VEYNE, L'élégie érotique romaine. L'amour, la poésie et l'Occident, Paris 1983, Engl. ed. Chicago 1988. * R. WHITAKER, Myth and Personal Experience in Roman Love-Elegy. A Study in Poetic Technique, Göttingen 1983. * WIMMEL, Kallimachos in Rom. * M. WYKE, The Elegiac Woman at Rome, PCPhS 213, 1987, 153–178. * J. C. YARDLEY, The Elegiac Paraclausithyron, Eranos 76, 1978, 19–34.

TIBULLUS

Life and Dates

Albius Tibullus came from a well-to-do family of equites. Scholars doubt, whether he, like Virgil and Propertius, suffered from Octavian's confiscations of land in 41/40 B.C. (1. 1. 19). When he speaks of his poverty, he must not be taken too literally, since that is part of the elegiac program. Tibullus belonged to the circle around M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, and under his generalship took part in the expedition against the Aquitani<sup>1</sup> (1. 10) and celebrated (1. 7) Messalla's triumph (September 27 B.C.). He was prevented from accompanying Messalla to the east by illness (1. 3). The poet's year of birth is unknown. It is set between 54 and shortly after 50, since Horace addresses him as if he were a younger contemporary (carm. 1. 33 and epist. 1. 4), and the difference of age between him and Virgil must have been considerable.<sup>2</sup>

Tibullus died shortly after Virgil, either in 19 or at the beginning of 18. Marsus' epigram on the death of both poets (cf. the previous footnote) would lose its point if the lapse of time had been greater. The dating to 17 is therefore less probable, and the use of the Aeneid in 2. 5 does not compel us to date this elegy after the Aeneid's posthumous publication, since private readings must also be taken into account.

The 1st book of elegies appeared after Messalla's triumph (1. 7) and therefore after September 27. The 2nd contains only six poems.

<sup>1</sup> The dating of Messalla's campaigns in Aquitania and Asia Minor is disputed. Probably Messalla fought in Gaul and North Spain in 30 B.C. and travelled to Syria as governor in 28 (W. WIMMEL 1968, 249). The early dating to 32 B.C. (P. GRIMAL, Les conséquences d'un cursus: Tibulle, Propertius et Messalla, in: Mélanges d'archéologie, d'épigraphie et d'histoire offerts à J. CARCOPINO, Paris 1966, 433–444) is less probable. See now H. TRÄNKLE 1990 (Appendix Tibulliana, see editions): activity in Syria in 30 or 29; Tibullus proconsul in Gaul 28 B.C.

<sup>2</sup> This is deduced from the addition of iuvenem in Domitius Marsus' epigram (fig. 7 MOREL = fig. 7 BÜCHNER).

Modern scholars are inclined to assume that this book, too, was published during the poet's lifetime.

The remainder of the poems gathered in the corpus Tibullianum derive from Messalla's circle but are more or less generally agreed not to have been written by Tibullus. Ovid at least in his funeral elegy for Tibullus (am. 3. 9) mentions only the mistresses occurring in the first two books, Delia and Nemesis.

In all probability, both the Priapean poems attributed to Tibullus are also spurious.<sup>1</sup>

Survey of the Work

1: Just like Virgil's Eclogues and the 1st book of Horace's Satires, Tibullus' 1st book is made up of 10 artistically arranged poems. The 1st, 3rd, and 7th elegies are addressed to Messalla and Messalla is also mentioned in the 5th. Delia is encountered in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 5th, and 6th poems. A counterpoint is provided by the boy Marathus in the 4th, 8th, and 9th poems. Two of these elegies show didactic features: in 1. 4, the god Priapus instructs the poet how to court boys. In 1. 8, Tibullus advises a girl to requite Marathus' love. The 9th poem contains a farewell to the faithless boy. It is clear that in 1. 8 and 9 the themes of love for boys and women, presented separately at the beginning, are now juxtaposed. The 10th elegy, by way of conclusion, develops the theme of peace. The theme of 'social criticism' links 1. 10 with 1. 1 and 1. 3, though not exclusively. The themes of the 1st book are thus artistically entwined. The poems about Delia are complemented by elegies treating other topics, which also show a tendency to appear in groups of three.

2: The 2nd book begins with the description of a country festival, displaying close links with the opening and concluding poems of the 1st book. In second place there is a birthday poem addressed to Cornutus. Third comes a surprising farewell to the idealization of country life so far observed in the poet. Now Delia's successor, Nemesis, has gone off to the country with another. In a similar way, the 4th elegy emphasizes the poet's total subjection to Nemesis' dominance. The 5th poem honors Messallinus, while the 6th contrasts the poet's own hopes of love with the departure of his friend Macer for war. It seeks the source of the poet's own unhappiness, not with the beloved, but with the accursed lena. This means that in the middle of the 2nd book there are two poems dealing with Nemesis (3 and 4). They are framed by two greetings to friends (2 and 5) and two programmatic poems (1 and 6), aiming to show Tibullus on the one hand as a poet of the gods of country life, and on the other as a lover. The theme of 'country life' is concluded in the book's first half (2. 3). The surrender to the beloved, treated independently in 2. 4, is also a main theme in 2. 6. The 2nd book is therefore constructed symmetrically.

<sup>1</sup> Text: G. LUCK, ed., 108–110; on the Priapea E. M. O'CONNOR, Symbolum Salacitatis. A Study of the God Priapus as a Literary Character, Frankfurt 1989, 34–35; cf. further V. BUCHHEIT, Studien zum Corpus Priapeorum, München 1962, 65, note 1; H. DAHLMANN, Priapeum 82: Ein Gedicht Tibulls?, Hermes 116, 1988, 434–445.

Between both books there is an antithesis. In five poems of the 1st book, Delia<sup>1</sup> plays a part, and the poet dreams of a life with her in the calm of the countryside. The 2nd book is inspired by another mistress, Nemesis. The tone is more brusque and ironic than in the 1st book. Country life must now yield to the service of Venus. Besides the deliberate contrast in content there are certain formal correspondences. The opening poems (2. 1 and 1. 1) are related. The final elegy (2. 6) is in counterpoint to 1. 1, and the three festive poems of the collection—a further cycle of three—are spread over two books (1. 7; 2. 1; 2. 5). This makes it probable that the arrangement of both books stems from the poet himself, and that they were published in his lifetime. The 2nd book complements the 1st, although it was not necessarily conceived at the same time.

Sources, Models, and Genres

The origins of Roman love elegy were already discussed (cf. pp. 742–747). For Tibullus, Gallus was more important than Propertius. Literary shaping is unmistakable even in the five poems addressed to Delia. Well-known types of poem, such as the propempticon (1. 3) or the paraclausithyron (1. 2), are varied. Literary inspiration is even clearer in the elegies addressed to the boy Marathus (1. 4; 8; 9), which may be compared with epigrams in the 12th book of the Anthologia Palatina. The type of 'festive poem' (1. 7) is twice represented in the 2nd book (2. 1; 2. 5). In comparing his inertia with the soldierly service he has performed for Amor, Tibullus picks up a motif of Roman comedy, found perhaps already in Hellenistic poetry.<sup>2</sup> He views Aeneas and Rome (2. 5) through Virgil's eyes.<sup>3</sup> We can even feel the presence of

<sup>1</sup> According to Apul. apol. 10 a pseudonym for Plania.

<sup>2</sup> J. VEREMANS 1983.

<sup>3</sup> V. BUCHHEIT, Tibull 2, 5 und die Aeneis, Philologus 109, 1965, 104–120; H. MERKLIN, Zu Aufbau und Absicht der Messallinus-Elegie Tibulls, in: W. WIMMEL, ed., Forschungen zur römischen Literatur, FS K. BÜCHNER, Wiesbaden 1970, 301–314; W. GERRESSEN 1970; D. N. LEVIN, Reflections of the Epic Tradition in the Elegies of Tibullus, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 2000–2127; A. GOSLING 1987.

Lucretius, both as philosophical source and as literary model.<sup>1</sup> Etymological plays on words point to a knowledge of Varro,<sup>2</sup> whose love for Rome's pious rural past marked the mood of the age. Tibullus' refined technique of imitation, which can be shown with certainty where he is in debt to Virgil, allows us to form a high opinion of his intellectual approach to his art. The poet must also be credited with a considerable amount of Hellenistic learning.<sup>3</sup> Alexandrian standards of quality were normative for him, though his dislike for all that was contrived or exaggerated allowed him to follow his own path.

Literary Technique

Since Catullus there had been longer elegies showing a typically Roman 'mimesis of excited first-person speech'<sup>4</sup> on the lips of a lover. In this regard, Tibullus marks a high point. The fluency of his emotionally charged discourse is so convincing that its transitions deceive even experts. A principal problem of Tibullan scholarship, therefore, is that of the structure of his poems. At first scholars found him so baffling that they violently transposed lines, or declared the poet to be a dilettante, or indeed expressed doubts about his capacity for logical reasoning. Progress was marked by the sensitive understanding of his elegies as series of thoughts unfolding in dreamy association.<sup>5</sup> Finally, the effort to understand Tibullus as a 'composer'<sup>6</sup> who develops many themes in a single elegy allows the reader to sense the hidden calculation beneath the surface, finding expression, for example, in symmetries.<sup>7</sup> The subtle counterplay of emotional feeling and intellectual order is a token of 'lyrical meditation'.<sup>8</sup>

At the beginning of the poems a situation may be sketched in the style of the epigram, likewise a feature of Hellenistic tradition. In what follows, any sharpness in the contours is smoothed away. Unlike Ovid, Tibullus avoids an emphatically rhetorical development,

<sup>1</sup> A. FOULON, Les laudes raris de Tibulle 2, 1, 37–80, REL 65, 1987, 115–131.

<sup>2</sup> Convincing arguments in F. CAIRNS 1979, 90–99.

<sup>3</sup> F. CAIRNS 1979.

<sup>4</sup> C. NEUMEISTER 1986, 152.

<sup>5</sup> F. KLINGNER 1951; U. KNOCH 1956.

<sup>6</sup> M. SCHUSTER 1930.

<sup>7</sup> G. LIEBERG 1988. Illuminating remarks on the structure are found in W. WIMMEL, Zur Rolle magischer Themen in Tibulls Elegie 1. 5, WJA n.s. 13, 1987, 231–248.

<sup>8</sup> A. LA PENNA, L'elegia di Tibullo come meditazione lirica, in: S. MARIOTTI, ed., Atti ... 1986, 89–140.

both of details and of the poetic structure as a whole. The reader is surprised by the lack of any display of mythological learning, in comparison, for example, with Propertius. As a master of refined simplicity, Tibullus is close to the creator of the Eclogues.

Language and Style

Tibullus' language and style<sup>1</sup> are distinguished by an unobtrusive elegance. The poet's metrical mastery, and notably his preference for disyllabic words at the end of the pentameter, were regarded as exemplary already by Ovid. Tibullus worked with a limited store of words and ideas, again and again combined in new ways, and here he may be compared with an Austrian poet like Trakl. Of all the Roman elegists he has the purest, the finest and the most controlled style. Just like Caesar among prose writers, Tibullus must count as a master of classical Attic elegance among the elegists. Tersus atque elegans were the accolades he received from Quintilian (inst. 10. 1. 93).

Ideas I Reflections on Literature

Tibullus never lays aside the literary fiction in which he disguises himself, and rarely expresses any opinion of his own craftsmanship. In principle he subordinates poetry to love, understanding by love the service of Venus. Without his beloved Nemesis he cannot write a single verse (2. 5. 111–114). 'Off with you, Muses, if you are of no avail to the lover' (2. 4. 15). In his final poem (2. 6) he still professes to be a love elegist, using the topoi of the apology.<sup>2</sup> In conformity with the so-called 'tearful' character of his genre (flebilis 2. 4. 22; cf. 1. 4. 71–72), the elegist weeps before the closed door, and elegy is thus interpreted as paraclausithyron. But Tibullus also understands indirect courtship: boys should gratify poets, for poets have the power to confer immortality (1. 4. 61–66). Tibullus seems to have been the first Roman love elegist to develop this aspect of immortality.<sup>3</sup> After all, he does have a high opinion of poetry. He is aware that he enjoys divine protection, and at a festival he describes himself even as a holy seer (2. 5. 113–114).

<sup>1</sup> F. CAIRNS, Stile e contenuti di Tibullo e di Propertio, in: S. MARIOTTI, ed., Atti . . ., 47–59; C. NEUMEISTER 1986, 17–34 (with bibl.).

<sup>2</sup> J. VEREMANS, Tibulle 2. 6. Forme et fond, Latomus 46, 1987, 68–86.

<sup>3</sup> STROH, Liebeselegie 110–125; C. NEUMEISTER 1986, 137–138.

Ideas II

Tibullus was not a philosopher. The essential content of his poetry can be deciphered partly from its principal themes, and partly from the dialectical development of polar aspects. As a lover, Tibullus is the servant of Venus. In a number of elegies he handles the typically elegiac topic of the servitium amoris. He links this motif with the topos of inertia, life spent in perpetual otium, and with the ideal of vivere parvo contentum.<sup>1</sup> Everything must yield to the service of Venus; this is true even of romantic Augustan notions of country life, although it is with this ideal that many readers of his 1st book have too quickly identified him. A reading of 2. 3 enables us to realize how soon the poet is ready to curse the country which he has previously glorified. If his mistress in the company of another man vents the country or if she makes great demands on his purse, the country loses all its appeal to the poet.

The possession of two mistresses is of itself enough to distinguish Tibullus from the other elegists, but in addition he deploys the theme of homosexual love,<sup>2</sup> which he links with erotic didacticism. His criticism of his age is given more independent treatment than in the other elegists. Examples are his rejection of wealth and greed (e.g. 1. 1) and the glorification of peace (1. 10). Merchant and soldier, figures resulting from the progress of civilization (a Lucretian theme), represent a counterworld, standing in the way of the lover's happiness. Tibullus dreams of the return of a primitive age with all its freedom. The multiplicity of themes both in the work as a whole and in individual elegies justifies us in regarding Tibullus not simply as a poet of love, but as a poet of his own world.

To ask about the reality of Delia-Plania, of Nemesis and Marathus is pointless, particularly when judgment is based on personal sympathy, with Delia considered real, but Nemesis and Marathus dismissed as inventions. Scholars' views, both positive and negative, on this topic intervene roughly in the poet's tender poetic world without succeeding in shedding light on it.

<sup>1</sup> J. VEREMANS 1983.

<sup>2</sup> M. J. MCGANN, The Marathus Elegies of Tibullus, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1976–1999.

In his relationship to Augustus, Tibullus held himself more aloof than the other Augustan poets. This attitude conforms with his membership in the circle of M. Valerius Messalla. In the corpus Tibullianum, the names of Caesar and Augustus never appear. The only elegy in which political questions play a significant role is the homage to Messallinus (2. 5), written on the occasion of his entry to the college of the quindecimviri sacris faciundis. The poet's numerous allusions to the story of Aeneas and the prodigies of the Civil War remain locked in the past. Tibullus does not name Augustus as Aeneas' descendant, nor does he mention Caesar's death, although in Virgil (georg. 1. 464–514) it was this death which provided occasion for recounting the prodigies.

The list of divinities appearing in Tibullus is telling. Gods of love play the most important role. In second place come the gods of poetry, and in third those of home and country toil. Last of all are found Isis and Osiris as harbingers of the religion of the Empire. Allegorical figures are Pax and Spes, who in Tibullus enjoy particularly high esteem.

Tibullus' elegies encompass quite different realms of reality and give more emphasis to social criticism than other works of the same genre. Tibullus, who had himself seen military service, was not a convinced pacifist like Propertius, but he reflected seriously on peace (1. 10). A surprising feature of Tibullus in comparison with Propertius is his ability to empathize with different aspects of life and to play different parts. Examples are the dialectical tension between the poems dealing with Marathus and Delia, or that between the construction of a system of country values in the 1st book and its destruction in the second. The creation of this multifaceted and tension-filled work presupposes a special kind of poetic gift, one which combined empathy and distance with a high degree of intellectual self-control.

Transmission<sup>1</sup>

The first two books were probably published in succession during the poet's lifetime. The approximately 150 manuscripts—all of them recent—often contain as well either Catullus or Propertius or both. The transmission is not satisfactory. In places medieval florilegia can help. In the late Middle Ages, two or three different texts or a manuscript with variae lectiones may have existed. It is impossible to establish a stemma. Modern editors rely chiefly on: Ambrosianus R. sup. 26 (A; 14th century); Guelferbytanus Aug. 82, 6 fol. (G; 15th century), Vaticanus 3270 (V; 15th century). From the Bruxellensis Bibl. Reg. 14 638 (X; 15th century) G. Luck established at l. 2. 81 the reading violavit.

---

<sup>1</sup> See the prefaces to the editions: G. LUCK, Studien zur Textgeschichte Tibulls, in: J. DUMMER (and others), eds., Texte und Textkritik. Eine Aufsatzsammlung, Berlin

The nature of the transmission allows criticism wide freedom. The peculiar structure of the elegies was for a long time misunderstood. Scholars transposed lines (Scaliger), or made textual conjectures (Muretus), or presupposed lacunae (Heyne). The edition with commentary of the corpus Tibullianum by C. G. Heyne (Lipsiae, 2nd ed. 1777) was a milestone. J. H. Voss proved that the Lygdamus poems are not by Tibullus.<sup>1</sup> The recensio of manuscripts was completed by K. Lachmann in 1829, although on the basis of insufficient material.

Influence<sup>2</sup>

The respect enjoyed by Tibullus in antiquity is attested by the poems Horace addressed to him (carm. 1. 3; epist. 1. 4), by Ovid's poetic in memoriam (am. 3. 9) and by his frequent imitation of Tibullus, even in his didactic poetry and in his epic. Velleius (2. 36) regards Tibullus along with Ovid as among those who are perfectissimi in forma operis sui, 'those who achieved perfection in their own branch of literature'. Quintilian praises his style (s. above). Martial (14. 193) shows that in his time both books of Tibullus were offered as presents. Tibullus is also cited by Sidonius Apollinaris (carm. 9. 260; epist. 2. 10. 6).

In the Middle Ages the corpus Tibullianum was little read. In France it was known to the Latin poet Hildebert de Lavardin (d. 1133), who opened the age of courtly culture. In the late Middle Ages, Tibullus was known from collections of excerpts, originating for the most part in France.

---

1987, 331-349; U. PIZZANI, Le vite umanistiche di Tibullo, Res publica litterarum 5, 1, 1982, 253-267; J. G. TAIFACOS, A Note on Tibullus' Indirect Tradition, Philologus 129, 1985, 155-159.

<sup>1</sup> Musenatmanach 1786, 81 (note) and translation of Tibullus, Tübingen 1810, pp. xvii-xx.

<sup>2</sup> HIGHER, Class. Trad., Index s. v.; M. VON ALBRECHT, De Ovidio Tibulli imitatore, in: De Tibullo eiusque aetate, Academia Latinitati fovendae, Commentarii 6, Romae 1982, 37-45.

In the modern period Jacopo Sannazaro (d. 1530) imitated Tibullus in his pastoral poem Arcadia in passages which include his description of country life and landscape. The Calabrian humanist A.J. (= Gi.) Parrhasius (d. 1522) composed a commentary on Tibullus.<sup>1</sup> In Italy, Tibullus' influence extended from the Renaissance<sup>2</sup> to Carducci (d. 1907). Once again, however, it was France that became a focus for the influence of the elegists,<sup>3</sup> and, in French poetics of the 16th century, Tibullus' poems are taken as a model for the elegiac genre. Tibullus also enjoyed general popularity with the poets of the Pléiade, who mention his name and draw on his elegies for both motifs and language. He exercised his greatest influence on the work of Pierre de Ronsard (d. 1585). Tibullan ideas were also developed by Rémy Belleau (d. 1577).

La Fare (d. 1712) translated some of Tibullus' elegies. A novel about Tibullus, with many imitations and free adaptations of poems from the corpus Tibullianum, was published in 1712–1713 by Jean de La Chapelle (d. 1723). Voltaire (d. 1778) showed skepticism towards the poet. In the second half of the 18th century, because of the sincerity of his expression of feeling, Tibullus was preferred to the other Roman elegists. Motifs and lines from Tibullus' elegies were included in their own poems by: the Duke of Mancini-Nivernais (d. 1798); Ponce Denis Ecouchard Le Brun (d. 1807); Jean-François de la Harpe (d. 1803); Evariste-Désiré de Forges de Parny (d. 1814), called by his contemporaries 'Tibulle français'; Antoine de Bertin (d. 1790), and André Chénier (d. 1794). Chateaubriand (d. 1848), as a young man in love, discovered his own problems in Tibullus.<sup>4</sup>

German poetry was affected by Tibullus as well, for example Goethe's Römische Elegien. Goethe had the translation of Tibullus by the German poet and physician J. F. Koreff (1810) read to him, and compared it with the original. The most beautiful tribute comes perhaps from the pen of Eduard Mörike (d. 1875).<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> L. CASTANO, Il commento di A. J. Parrasio a Tibullo, Vichiana 14, 1985, 117–121.

<sup>2</sup> E.g. Luigi Alamanni, Felicità dell'amore (15th century), and Pietro Bembo's (d. 1547) elegies in praise of Lucrezia Borgia (CONTE, LG 329).

<sup>3</sup> M. ECKLE, Tibull in der französischen Versdichtung, typescript, diss. Tübingen 1955.

<sup>4</sup> Mémoires 2. 3; CONTE, LG 329.

<sup>5</sup> Mörike wrote a memorable epigram on Tibullus; he also took five elegies of Tibullus (1. 1; 3; 4; 8; 10) and six poems concerning Sulpicia and Cerinthus (4. 2; 3; 5; 6; 7; 11) into his Classische Blumenlese (1840).

It is difficult to find a place for Tibullus in the history of literature. It is probably correct to view him as continuing in the tradition of Cornelius Gallus (Ovid trist. 4. 10. 53). Unlike Propertius, Tibullus sets more than one mistress at the center of his poetry, and allows mythological adornment to assume a lesser role. He does not usurp (as Propertius does in 1. 11. 53–54) the values of the Roman family. Augustan elements in any political sense are also less prominent. Country life plays a greater part than in other elegists. Themes of peace are handled more independently. Tibullus' elegy is no longer that of the neoterics and does not yet show strong rhetorical influence. His achievement was to contain Hellenistic thematic variety in a universe of language and ideas whose classical status depends on strict selectivity.

Among the great Augustan poets, Tibullus is the one so far least understood. The deep contrasts and contradictions in his nature are, because of the elegance of his style, often overlooked. In spite of the apparently easy accessibility of some facets of his poetry, he is one of the most difficult and enigmatic of Latin authors.

Corpus Tibullianum

Since the time of the Humanists, the 3rd book transmitted under Tibullus' name has often been divided into two (books '3' and '4'). It is not by Tibullus. J. H. Voss proposed the commonly accepted assignment of the first six poems of the 3rd book to a certain Lygdamus. The Panegyric on Messalla (3. 7) and the poems dealing with Sulpicia and Cerinthus (3. 8–12) are also regarded as spurious.<sup>1</sup>

Poems 3. 13–18 indicate that they are letters of Messalla's niece Sulpicia.

Lygdamus

The six elegies by a poet from Messalla's circle calling himself Lygdamus<sup>2</sup> deal with his love for Neaera. His beloved has left him and he hopes to win her back by the gift of his book of poems (3. 1). If Neaera does not become his wife, Lygdamus sees death as his only recourse (3. 2). A modest happiness with her is more precious than all riches. Once again, death lurks in the background (3. 3). In a dream, Apollo appears to the poet with the message that Neaera loves another, but may be won over by flattering laments (3. 4). Suffering from illness, the poet bids life farewell (3. 5). The conclusion of the cycle is formed by a prayer to Bacchus. Lygdamus strives in vain to forget Neaera (3. 6).

<sup>1</sup> K. BÜCHNER, Die Elegien des Lygdamus, Hermes 93, 1965, 65–112.

<sup>2</sup> K. BÜCHNER, ibid. (Lygdamus predates Ovid). Contrary arguments in O. SKUTSCH, Zur Datierung des Lygdamus, Philologus 110, 1966, 142–146 (spurious poetry of Ovid's youth). STROH, Liebeselegie 126–140 (bibl.); E. COURTNEY, Problems in Tibullus and Lygdamus, Maia n.s. 39, 1987, 29–32; L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands: I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1461–1467; M. PARCA, The Position of Lygdamus in Augustan Poetry, in: C. DEROUX, ed., Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History 4, Coll. Latomus 196, Bruxelles

The elegies show points of contact with Tibullus and Ovid. The year of birth (43 B.C.), 'in which two consuls fell victim to the same fate' (3. 5. 17–18), is reminiscent of Ovid (trist. 4. 10. 5–6), though the line has also been connected with the year 49 B.C., requiring the reading cessit.

Some scholars consider an even earlier year of birth,<sup>1</sup> and regard the name Lygdamus as a Greek version of Albius, that is, Tibullus. In spite of many points of contact with Tibullus however, this identification causes problems. The elegies of Lygdamus on average are considerably shorter than those of Tibullus. In content they adhere more strictly to a single theme. Their formulations are often sharper and display epigrammatic point, even rhetorical organization in places, which seems to point to Ovid. Yet Lygdamus is distinguished from Ovid by a certain naiveté and strength of feeling. The poems can hardly be one of Ovid's youthful works. Certainly there were more authors in Rome than professors dream of, even in Ovid's year's class. There are metrical differences, too, from Tibullus' and Ovid's technique; for example not avoiding trisyllabic and polysyllabic words at verse end. A date in the 1st century A.D.—a forgery of a youthful poem of Ovid?—also presents problems because of the apparent 'earliness' of the motifs and language. At any rate, because of their freshness these poems deserve to be rescued from oblivion.

The Panegyric of Messalla

The Panegyric of Messalla (3. 7)<sup>2</sup> elaborates in its introduction the themes of the author's modesty (1–27) and the greatness of Messalla who surpasses his

---

1986, 461–474. According to H. TRÄNKLE (s. below under Editions) 2; 58–63 Lygdamus wrote later than Ovid (1st century A.D.).

<sup>1</sup> L. PEPE 1948.

<sup>2</sup> L. DURET, Dans l'ombre des plus grands. I. Poètes et prosateurs mal connus de l'époque augustéenne, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, esp. 1453–1461; J. HAMMER, Prolegomena to an Edition of the Panegyricus Messalae. The Military and Political Career of M. Valerius Messala Corvinus, New York 1925; R. PAPKE, Panegyricus Messallae und Catalepton 9. Form und gegenseitiger Bezug, in: P. KRAFFT, H. J. TSCHIEDEL, eds., Concentus hexachordus. Beiträge zum 10. Symposium der bayerischen Hochschullehrer für klassische Philologie in Eichstätt 1984, Regensburg 1986, 123–168; H. SCHOONHOVEN, The Panegyricus Messallae. Date and Relation with Catalepton 9, ANRW 2, 30, 3, 1983, 1681–1707.

ancestors (28–39). His achievements in war and peace are evenly matched (40–44). Before the people and before the courts he is more eloquent than Nestor and Ulysses, whose adventures are enumerated in an excursus (45–81).<sup>1</sup> No less worthy are Messalla's soldierly abilities (82–105), as a list of the peoples he has conquered proves (106–117). Favorable omens promise Messalla further victories and triumphs over the world; this gives occasion to a cosmological digression (118–176). In a kind of ring-composition, the personal introduction and epilogue correspond (1–39 and 177–211), and the first and last main sections are each expanded by an excursus (52–78; 151–174). The author shows special subtlety by his initial refusal to write a cosmological poem (18–23), which he is then forced to compose because of Messalla's world renown. The motif of the recusatio also acts as a frame (18 and 179–180), developed in the second instance into a compliment to the poet Valgius. It is no coincidence that the listing of Messalla's actual victories begins precisely in the middle of the panegyric (106). As for the unknown author, we learn from the poem that, although he was prosperous in earlier days, he now depends on Messalla's help. The time of composition<sup>2</sup> is perhaps to be set between 31 and 27 B.C., since there is no mention of Messalla's triumph.

Sulpicia and Cerinthus<sup>3</sup>

A special charm, united with unobtrusive learning, characterizes the poem in which Sulpicia celebrates the festival of the 1st of March (3. 8). Sulpicia's concern for Cerinthus, who is absent on the hunt, is set in counterpoint with a barely indicated parallel to the legend of Venus and Adonis (3. 9). The poet entreats Phoebus on behalf of the ailing Sulpicia and consoles Cerinthus (3. 10). On Cerinthus' birthday, Sulpicia begs the gods that Cerinthus will show her love and faithfulness. With particular elegance, Sulpicia turns to advantage the circumstance that Cerinthus' shyness has put her in the role of suitor: 'Why does it matter whether silently or aloud he courts me?' (3. 11). Sulpicia celebrates her birthday. She has made herself beautiful,

<sup>1</sup> D. F. BRIGHT, The Role of Odysseus in the Panegyricus Messallae, QUCC n.s. 17, 1984, 143–154.

<sup>2</sup> A survey of the problem of date is given by B. RÍPOSATI, 2nd ed., 1967, 62–63. According to H. TRÄNKLE (s. below 'editions' 2; 179–184 certainly later than Ovid (early 2nd century A.D.)).

<sup>3</sup> R. ZIMMERMANN, Die Autorschaft Tibulls an den Elegien 2–6 des 4. Buches, Philologus 83, 1928, 400–418 (against Tibullan authorship); R. FEGER, W. WILLIGE, Albius Tibullus, Cerinthus und Sulpicia (3. 8–12), Gymnasium 61, 1954, 338–345; R. W. HOOPER, A Stylistic Investigation into the Third and Fourth Books of the Corpus Tibullianum, diss. New Haven 1975; J.-P. BOUCHER, A propos de Cérintus et de quelques autres pseudonymes dans la poésie augustéenne, Latomus 35, 1976, 504–519; S. C. FREDERICKS, A Poetic Experiment in the Garland of Sulpicia (Corpus Tibullianum 3. 10), Latomus 35, 1976, 761–782.

however, for more than the goddess, and secretly prays for the fulfillment of her love (3. 12).

The five poems dealing with Sulpicia and Cerinthus are remarkable for their brevity, thematic coherence and delicate sympathy with the feminine heart. They must be by a genuine poet. They are not merely literary play by distinguished amateurs.

Sulpicia

