Confessions of faith need to exist for the life of the Church and personal faith. In reciting a creed, each person gives content to his faith and acknowledges the unity* of the Church to which he belongs. Faith includes many other truths as well, but those set out in the symbols are central and irreplaceable. Karl Rahner* underlined the importance of these brief creeds while at the same time suggesting the possibility of reformulating faith today in a noncanonical way, in other possible texts, provided that such texts specify a faith in the historical Jesus*.

- A. Hahn, G.L. Hahn (1897), Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln der alten Kirche, Breslau (repr. Hildesheim, 1962).
- J. Stilmayer (1930), "Athanasie (le prétendu symbole d')," DHGE 4, 1341–48.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1950), Early Christian Creeds, London (3rd Ed., 1972).
- P. Benoit (1961), "Les origines du symbole des Apôtres dans le Nouveau Testament," in Exégèse et Théologie, vol. 2, CFi 2, 193–211.
- O. Cullmann (1963), "Les premières confessions de foi chrétienne," in La foi et le culte de l'Église primitive, Neuchâtel-Paris, 47–87.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1964), The Athanasian Creed, London.
- A. M. Ritter (1965), Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol, Göttingen.
- D. Stanley (1965), The Apostolic Church in the NT, Westminster.
- H. de Lubac (1969), La foi chrétienne: Essai sur la structure du Symbole des Apôtres, New Ed., Paris, 1970.
- H. von Campenhausen (1972), "Das Bekenntnis im Urchristentum," ZNW 63, 210–53.
- P. Smulders (1975), "The "Sitz im Leben" of the Old Roman Creed," StPatr 13 (TU 116), 409–21.
- K. Rahner (1976), Grundkurs des Glaubens, 430–40.
- R. Staats (1999), Das Glaubensbekenntnis von Nizäa, Konstantinopel: Historische und theologische Grundlagen, 2nd Ed., Darmstadt.

BERNARD POTTIER

See also Baptism; Constantinople I, Council of; Faith; Filioque; Heresy; Martyrdom; Nicaea I, Council of

B. Protestant Tradition

"For one is not acting like a Christian if one fears affirmations: on the contrary, a Christian must take joy in affirming his faith*, or else he is not a Christian. And first and foremost [...], what does this expression mean: 'a theological assertion'? It means to strongly bond with one's conviction, to affirm it, confess it, and defend it to the end with perseverance" (Luther*, Oeuvres 5, Geneva, 1958).

This passage by the German reformer clearly illustrates the importance of creeds in the Protestant perspective and just how intertwined with the very essence of Christian faith is the act of confessing that faith. Of course, in this matter the Protestant tradition* understood itself to be following in the steps of the early Church*; and when it came time to collect the source texts in books of rites, the Protestant Churches did not hesitate to include the ancient creeds of the Apostles, Nicaea-Constantinople, and Athanasius.

Therefore, it agrees with the ancient tradition that creeds are indispensable elements, for prayer* and praise* as well as preaching*, catechesis*, and teaching. In the context of the 16th century, creeds nevertheless took on new connotation, and these would mark Protestantism* up to the 20th century.

1. Insistence on the Doctrinal Element

To this day the Protestant tradition certainly uses creeds liturgically in the context of worship. But in the interconfessional confrontation of the 16th century, it was mostly as a clear definition of fundamental specifics that creeds doctrine played a decisive role. This doctrinal aspect can first be explained by the fact that the reformers debated the idea of a hierarchical and centralized Church authority*. Henceforth, the Church structures* that were established could be very diverse in terms of their place and time. The central reference of the Protestant faith was the doctrine, the coherent body of fundamental affirmations of that faith. The different creeds of the Protestant tradition aim to formulate this doctrine by giving it a visible, historical expression. They therefore play an essential role in the establishment and the life of Churches. Thus, when the pastor* is ordained, his admission to service in the Church depends not on his promise of obedience to a bishop* but on his acceptance of a creed.

At the same time, this doctrine is understood to play a role in the life of all believers and ought to enable them to assume, in full personal responsibility, a life before God*. In this case, the catechism acts as creed, and it is not by chance that the two are found side by side in Protestant confessional books.

2. The Principal Creeds: The Confessional Books

Creeds played an important part in the historic process of developing and strengthening different Protestant traditions. Regarded as the authorized expression of doctrine, they quickly gained force and appeared, beside the catechisms of various Reformations, in collections of reference texts called Confessional Books. Lutheranism*'s collection of confessional writings, the Book of Concord principally contains the creed known as the Augsburg Confession (1530) and its Apology but also the Smalkadic Articles (1537–38) and the Formula of Concord (1577). In the reformed work representative of Calvinism*, are the Confession of La Rochelle (1559), the Later Swiss Confession (1566), and the Canons of the Synod of Dordrecht (1619). In the case of Anglicanism* there are the Thirty-nine Articles (1571) in its Book of Common Prayer.

3. Theological Challenges

Because of their central place within the structures of Protestantism, creeds are of major theological importance.

a) Authority of Scripture and Authority of the Creed. Because the Reformation strongly emphasized recourse to Scripture (sola scriptura), it is advisable here to make a connection between creed and Scripture. In relation to the gospel, both Scripture and creed play the role of an authorized norm that aim to lead to the true living word* of God* that proclaims a Christ* to whom alone authority, strictly speaking, belongs. But at the same time there is a difference between them: the creed, in fact, is answerable to the Scriptures and only comments on it: it is, in other words, a “normed norm” (norma normata), whereas Scripture, in comparison, is a “normalizing norm” (norma normans).

b) Condemnation of Heresy and Concern over the Unity of the Church. A creed takes sides in both positive and negative senses. It reaffirms the essence of faith and counters threats against it. It therefore reveals abuses and condemns heresy*. Consequently, there is a divisive effect, and the Protestant Churches are today working on reinterpreting the divisions caused by 16th-century creeds. Indeed, in examining these divisions we can discover the true intention of creeds, which is unity* of the Church. In aiming to express what is essential, creeds call for a unity that strives to be universal. Particularity and universality constitute an irreducible tension in all creeds.

c) Confession of Faith and Witnessing. The preceding point emphasizes the importance of creeds in the Church. However, creeds also have a bearing on the life of the believer in a way that is expressed in witnessing. For the believer, a creed is the school in which individuals are apprenticed to the task of witnessing, of attesting to their faith before the world, by both word and deed and through their concrete commitments.

4. Recent Developments

a) Modern Debate. In modern times the act of confessing faith has often attracted criticism. Pietism*, for example, favored the living piety of the heart over dogmatic formulas, and during the Enlightenment, creeds were discredited, being seen as representing a servile and immature submission and as the source of fanaticism. As for historical criticism, it separated the traditional authority of ancient creeds by revealing the complexity of their history. And 19th-century liberal theology*, giving priority to religious feeling, denounced creeds as the obsessive objectification of this sentiment. This “liberal” rejection may have led to the emergence of national Churches (Reformed) that did not have creeds in their constitution.

b) Reaffirmation of Creeds in the 20th Century. In view of this debate, it was up to dialectical theology*, starting between the world wars, to reestablish the value of creeds. For Karl Barth*, for example, this resulted from the rediscovery of the word of God as something that demands a clear answer from its addressee. It was under the influence of this theology of the Word, emphasized by Dietrich Bonhoeffer* after Barth, that Protestant groups, in opposition to Nazism and its influence in the German Church, formed a Confessing Church as early as 1933–34. Its aim was to maintain the integrity of the Christian community during the crisis situation. In May 1934 a synod in Bar-men adopted a declaration known as the “Declaration of Barmen,” in which the status of creeds is discussed.

c) Status Confessionis. As early as the 16th century the distinction between those things that involve creeds and those that are indifferent in this respect (adiaphora) stirred up animated debate (the points at issue were things such as Catholic ceremonies and then, in the context of pietism, card games, dancing, and so on). This question was raised again by Bonhoeffer in the political context of the fight against Nazism when he declared that the Jewish question stemmed directly from faith and sin*. Throughout the 20th century the affirmation of status confessionis came to the forefront again in different sociopolitical debates (apartheid, nuclear arms, political asylum).

d) Multitudinist Churches and Creeds.—In accordance with concern over public space pronounced by the reformers, the Protestant churches considered themselves to be mostly multitudinist. The Churches born from the radical reform, however, asked for a much clearer commitment from members in terms of creeds and witnessing. And if this resolution may turn into a closing off, it remains true that the openness of multitudinist Churches does not necessarily entail the dissolution of creeds. Faith is not expressed once and for all. None of the creeds in history* would therefore be proposed as the creed par excellence. The unceasing confrontation with creeds inherited from the past does not mean that new ones cannot be written as part of the dialogue between the present situation and the Holy Scriptures.

- The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments according to the use of the Church of England, Cambridge and Oxford, s.d.
- BSLK (1930), 1986¹⁰ (FEL, 1991).
- BSKORK (CCFR, 1986).
- ♦ R. Mehl (1971), “La place de la confession de foi dans l’élaboration dogmatique,” FV 70, 214–25.
- J. Wirsching (1980), “Bekenntnisschriften,” TRE 5, 487–511.
- L. Vischer (Ed.) (1982), Reformed Witness Today, Geneva.
- E. Lorenz (Ed.) (1983), Politik als Glaubenssache? Beiträge zur Klärung des Status Confessionis, Erlangen.
- A. Burgsmüller (Ed.) (1984), Die Barmer theologische Erklärung: Einführung und Dokumentation, Neukirchen.
- G. Lanczkowski et al. (1984), “Glaubensbekenntnis(se),” TRE 13, 384–446.
- A. Birmelé (1991), “Sens et autorité de la confession de foi dans les Églises luthériennes,” FEL 13–21.
- A. Gounelle (1995), “Statut et autorité des confessions de foi réformées,” in M.-M. Fragonard, M. Peronnet (Ed.), Catéchismes et confessions de foi, Montpellier, 13–26.

PIERRE BÜHLER

See also Authority; Family, Confessional; Holy Scripture; Magisterium; Word of God

CROSS. See Passion

Crusades

In any theological dictionary the Crusades are of primordial importance both for relevance to the Christian Church’s process of self-definition, particularly with regard to the relationship between sacerdotal and secular jurisdictions over matters that are not entirely spiritual and, second, on account of the development of the Western Church’s penitential regime. They were also, outside any theological context, a major episode in the ongoing struggle between the Eastern and Western parts of the Christianized old Roman Empire.

Theologically, the Crusades were regarded by the participants, at least ostensibly, both as holy wars and as penitential pilgrimages for the purging of guilt, of greater atoning value than such alternatives as fasting and the self-infliction of physical pain. In fact they naturally also provided an outlet for territorial aggression in a way that allowed it to be regarded as spiritually enriching. In an era in which the unicity of a single sovereignty, both sacerdotal and secular, was being strongly reasserted in the form of papal overlordship of secular sovereigns, the extra spiritual benefit of visiting the places of Jesus' life and death, of standing on holy land, served to reaffirm what we can now see to have been a confusion between the temporal and the spiritual. The pilgrimage as penance seems to have arisen in the early eighth century. It gained its firm hold on the penitential practice of the West with the Cluniac revival, beginning in the 10th century.

The wars became possible, and perhaps inevitable, with the swelling in the numbers of pilgrims. In 1064, there were some 7,000 pilgrims to Jerusalem headed by the archbishop of Mainz. Later pilgrims joined together under armed guard for their own protection, gradually forming the view that the holy places belonged by right to the Christian Church and regarding their Turkish Muslim opponents as the aggressors. Crusading belligerence could then easily be transformed into a tool in the ecclesiastical and feudal diversion of purely aggressive martial instincts into righteous, holy, and spiritually beneficial warfare while also serving the apostolic ends of the Church, which aimed at the conversion and salvation of the infidel as well as the territorial extension of ecclesiastical power.

At the same time, the Crusades protected the West from the danger of being overwhelmed by the Islamic world, which existed almost constantly from the seventh century to the 17th. By keeping that danger at bay, the crusaders allowed the Church to develop its own practices and hierarchical structures, to have its legal system cloned in the secular world, and to elaborate its theology, relying heavily on antique concepts that had actually been mediated and modified as much by Arab theologians from Jerusalem as by those from northern Africa. The Crusades are therefore of importance in the Church's process of self-definition and in particular in forcing its ecclesiology to begin its retreat from claims to secular jurisdiction, whether direct or by means of a feudally conceived overlordship of secular sovereignties.

Relations between the Latin Church and Jerusalem at first remained good after the Hegira, or move of Muhammad to Medina in 623, and Muhammad's subsequent conquest of his native Mecca. They reached a peak of cordiality under Charlemagne. Only in the 11th century did they seriously deteriorate. The church of Christ's sepulchre was destroyed in A.D. 1010, and in 1071 the Seljukian Turks captured Jerusalem from the Arabs. The West was looking for new overland routes to the Far East, and the events of 1071 resulted in a Seljuk revival that temporarily crushed the Greeks and posed a serious commercial, military, and religious threat to the West.

In the ninth century, Leo IV had already promised spiritual profit to those who defended the Italian mainland against the Arabs, so assuming that spiritual sovereignty demanded temporal domination and could be used in its defense. In the late 11th century, Gregory VII, rallying to appeals from the East to protect Eastern Christendom from the incursions of the Islamic Turks, began to assemble an army. When Alexius Comnenus, the Byzantine emperor, appealed for reinforcements to recover Asia Minor for Eastern Christendom to Urban II, the pope gathered together in 1095 an army whose aims were not so much to recover Asia Minor for Alexius as to conquer Jerusalem for themselves. It was in Urban's pontificate that the term "Roman curia," with its overtones of pretensions to temporal power on the imperial model, appeared for the first time in a bull of 1089. The provision of military reinforcements to ensure the protection of Eastern Christianity had been turned into a holy war for the acquisition of sacred territory.

Furthermore, Urban granted a plenary indulgence* to all who took the Cross and either died on the crusade or won through to Jerusalem. This indulgence set a double precedent. It was apparently the first time a "plenary" indulgence, remitting all the vestigial punishment due to sin after absolution from guilt, had ever been issued, and it radically extended the pope's claim to be able not only to "bind and loose" in the sacrament of penance but also to usurp the divine prerogative of judgment after death.

Ways were invented in which the pope could be seen to be dispensing from an existing pool formed from the merits of Christ and the justified dead superfluous to what was necessary for the redemption and the justification of the righteous but that still further complicated the ecclesiology implied by the arrangement, introducing what could be mistaken for a system of weights and measures into the salvific work of Christ's redemption. The ability to grant plenary indulgences, later to become exploited widely and frequently, practically demanded a system that elevated the powers of Christ's vicar into those which were truly divine and were of their nature incapable of delegation.

There are many historical reasons, largely connected to the sociological consequences of plague and famine across northern Europe, for Urban's success at the March synod of Piacenza in 1095. They make understandable the wild enthusiasm generated by Urban's speech at Clermont later that year calling for the conquest of Jerusalem and promising members of the expedition the equivalent of full and complete penance. The crusade, preached in France on the basis of Urban's harangue, was essentially French. It established a French kingdom in the East, and the Crusades themselves quickly became both political, with French princes aspiring to establish principalities in the East, and mercantile, with predominantly Italian merchants seeking to establish profitable enterprises in the Middle East. What is important in the present context is the theological concept of papal dominion that underlay them and that had also underlain the investiture controversy of the 11th and 12th centuries.

When Jerusalem was finally taken after a month's siege in July 1099, there was some discussion about whether its government should be secular or theocratic. The matter seems to have been decided in favor of a lay ruler largely on grounds of available personalities, with a cleric to fill the vacant position of patriarch. The legal system adopted gave slightly more authority to ecclesiastical courts than was customary in the West, allowing them jurisdiction in all matters where Church property was concerned and also over all marital disputes, but this was not enough to imperil the principle adopted of independent lay sovereignty in temporal matters.

Although historians have given the Crusades numbers, they were in fact virtually continuous. After the second, which was preached by Bernard of Clairvaux but that failed, their religious nature was fortified by the launching of a successful counterwar by Saladin in 1187, an Islamic jihad that captured Jerusalem. The Third, Fifth, and Sixth Crusades were directed against the Islamic rulers of the holy places, but the word is also used of the Fourth Crusade against the schismatic Greeks, of the crusade against the Albigensian heretics of southern France, and against unsubservient Christian princes such as King John of England and the Hohenstaufen emperor Frederick II. "Crusade" came to denote virtually any military movement against insurrectionary, hostile, or heretical forces.

The Third Crusade to recapture the recently lost Jerusalem, while religious in conception and inspired by the idea of spiritual reform, was not papal but was organized in 1188 by the secular monarchs of Germany, England, and France. It was also much more conciliatory, finally ending with political union reinforced by marital arrangements and the foundation of the kingdom of Cyprus in 1195. The Fourth Crusade took place in the reign of Innocent III, who attempted to inspire the respect and power due to the vicar of Christ, his preferred title.

The Hohenstaufen emperor Henry VI, son the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, had died in 1197 preparing the Fourth Crusade after a reign of active hostility to Celestine III, who lived until 1198. Henry appointed his own bishops, spurned those nominated by the pope, and curtailed papal power in Sicily. However, he needed good relations with Celestine in order to have his son Frederick baptized by the pope with a view to becoming emperor and making the post hereditary. He offered to lead the Fourth Crusade but died before it was ready.

Innocent III attempted to adopt it and vainly sought to bring it back to its ecclesiastical objective and clerical direction. In the end, control was wrested from him by lay (mostly French) princes for their secular ends, forcing the papacy to retreat further from its aspirations to temporal sovereignty where that was possible and to feudal overlordship where it was not. The slow decline of an ecclesiology based on a theocratic ideal, vestiges of which would linger on into the 17th century, was forcing a major change in the way in which the Church was able to define its function. The crusading ideal, still much alive in the 17th century in France, where Père Joseph, Richelieu's gray eminence, was its staunch advocate, was by the early 13th century already declining into a political game. Even the crusade against the Cathars degenerated into a land-grabbing maneuver by the northern French barons.

ANTHONY LEVI

See also Catharism; Nationalism

Cult

a) The Experience of a New Cult. “Cult” and “cultish” designate a certain number of acts and practices for which early Christian communities did not have a common term, one that would have “embodied in its unity the diversity of new practices being formulated” (Perrot 1983). Conscious of the newness of the gospel and because they were participants in a thriving and rather agitated community life, the first Christians inherited a vision of cult that was mostly introverted and moralizing, drawing on the prophets* (Is 29:13), the Wisdom writings (Wis 3:6) or psalms (Ps 50, 51), and the preaching* of Jesus*. They were familiar with the terms that designated the ritual and ceremonial practices of the Temple*, but to a certain extent, they modified them. It was the life of Christ*, having become a salvaging destiny, the opus salutis of God*, for God and in God, that they henceforth considered in cultish terms: oblation, sacrifice*, priesthood* opening the way to God. A new word designated the “Lord’s supper,” that is, “Eucharist*.” The new “service of God” led by the Holy* Spirit of Jesus thus was intertwined with the new life lived according to the Beatitudes* and the Ten Commandments and with the service of neighbor and the proclamation of the gospel (Lyonnet 1967). Inaugurated by Baptism*, this new life was marked by fervent prayer*, both individual and common, by the use of a christological hymnology (Phil 2:6–11; Col 1:15–20; Rev 15:3), by an attentive reading of the Scriptures*, and by listening to preaching and sharing the Lord’s supper. All these practices fostered the status as an original, “new cult.” To designate services and roles, general terms such as leitourgia or diakonia were used (Lengeling 1968) or terms that were as far as possible from the sacerdotal vocabulary of the Temple (and a fortiori from the vocabulary of pagan cults). The words that were retained—apostles*, elders (presbuteroi), episkopoi—seem to insist on the function of legitimate guides who could ensure the instruction, cohesion, and fervor of a group of believers (Lyonnet 1967). The development of Christian institutions, together with the establishment of forms of prayer, religious exercises (e.g., fasting), liturgical gatherings, and the calendar, would later cause new problems. Such problems were often inextricable from specific doctrinal developments: the need to give equal adoration to the three divine persons*, the understanding of the eucharistic action, the question of what degree of homage was due to the Mother of God and so on. As it extended into areas of mixed population, pastoral work had to face practical questions concerning familial cults, funeral customs, and the many superstitious practices of everyday life. The confrontation with state paganism* in times of persecution, the merging of various religious movements (Neoplatonism, gnosis*), the success of Cicero’s and Seneca’s Roman conceptions—all these may have led Christian theologians and leaders to consider the domain of “cult” in concert, even if discordant, with various religious movements to which Christianity was opposed.

b) Augustine on Cult. This is, in fact, what is boldly highlighted in book VI of City of God, where it seems Augustine* wants to settle definitively the debate that opposed the Church to the cultish beliefs and practices of Greek and Roman antiquity. The first problem was one of vocabulary. In terms of “cult,” the language of Roman religious practice—even though it was adopted by authors as serious as Varro—could not properly express the uniqueness of Christian practice and thought. Latin translations* of the Bible*, on the other hand, tended to use terms in the colere/cultus family (absent of psalter) to designate pagan or Jewish acts (Dn 3:17; Acts 17:23) and, more specifically, the cult of idols in passages where the Greek used eidōlōlatreia (1 Pt 4:3; 1 Cor 10:14). Furthermore, its usage clearly showed that colere was never used in the first person (as an action) in private or public prayer, by contrast with verbs such as laudare, benedicere, adorare, and glorificare.

The theoretical problem is immediately raised in the preface of book VI. If cult is understood as a relationship of homage, recognition, and attachment, to be established with a divine being by means of ritual practice, a divine being to whom or to which this relationship is due as a form of service (servitus, Gr. Latreia), how can the truth of Christianity itself be expressed in terms of such a relationship, bearing in mind the failure of paganism? Augustine’s argument consists of showing that the cult relationship can concern only a unique and true God, the creator of all corporal and spiritual beings and the one solely capable of giving eternal life. It does not involve a multitude of gods each with a specific function (officium) that relates to the beliefs and needs of the city* or the material help that an individual expects. After briefly acknowledging Antiquities by Varro, a universal scholar, Augustine criticizes him for basing cult on human needs and the demands of civic life (“as if the painter came before the painting,” VI 4) and of thus degrading the figures of divinity. As for Christians, they certainly do have a “cult” (Nos Deum colimus VII), but the uniqueness of God the creator removes from cult any sense of a divinized intermediary to whom might be attributed a given element of the world or ownership of a given creature. On the other hand, this unique and true God needs neither our gifts nor our praises*, and our sinful condition makes us unable to harmonize with the liberality and gratuitousness of his gifts. It is therefore in Christ, the Word* of God and his light, that the verus veri Dei cultus announced by the sacramenta of the ancient covenant* can be established (VII). Therefore, in order to designate such a reality, the available words have to be readjusted. Too closely associated with Roman religion and capable of being used in profane and disrespectful ways, the terms from the colere/cultus family are discredited (X). The Greek term latreia, on the other hand, seems least inappropriate to express the absolute sovereignty of God and simultaneously opens up the opposite category of idolatry*. And because it also expresses the idea of a “cultish service” (servitus) susceptible of taking shape both in sacred signs (sacramenta) and within ourselves (in nobis ipsis), it can simultaneously consider cult as gesture and act and as interiorized attitude (X).

This interiorization can therefore be understood as God’s indwelling of the temples that we are, and this is the idea behind all harmony. Augustine can therefore extend the “cordial” cult metaphor in which the heart is the altar (ara cordis), the Son the priest*, and the sacrifice a life exposed “to the point of blood” and in which the incense is the fragrance of a sanctified love*. Within this temple of the heart there is a circulation constituted of gifts given and returned. Within the heart’s sanctuary, commemoration is made of divine gifts in a manner that recalls feasts and holy days. And in order for this commemoration to give rise to a sacrifice of fervent praise, the heart must purify itself of covetousness. In this way it certainly does imply a “consecration” (eius nomine consecramur), a reorientation of the entire being away from desire (appetito). The true cult, therefore, is a choice to be made over and over again since, in the end, it involves an exclusive love of God (in toto corde, in tota anima, and in tota virtute). Augustine later condensed his lyricism in a formula that won great success: nec colitur nisi amando (there is no other cult than love; Ep. 140, ad Honoratum 18, 45).

In a similar vein to Augustine, cultus also appears, something rare, in the text of a liturgical prayer. Indeed, in the Verona Sacramentary we read that in Christ “the fullness of the divine cult has come to us,” Divine cultus nobis est indita plenitudo. The writers of Vatican II’s constitution on the liturgy* would draw on this formula (c. 1, §5).

c) Cult and Virtue of Religion in Thomas Aquinas. Thomas Aquinas’s Summa Theologica is most certainly influenced by Augustine in its approach to cult, yet its true originality emerges when Thomas links cult, the very and immediate act of virtue* of religion (religio est quae Deo debitum cultum affert, IIa IIae, q. 81, a. 5), with the cardinal virtue of justice*. The formal goal of religion is indeed to express reverence toward the unique God (exhibere reverentiam) in terms of his excellence and his sovereignty as creator and ruler of all things (q. 81, a. 3). Acknowledging divine excellence and his own submission, man shows the fundamental axis of cult, and this axis operates according to a double movement, either as a manifestation toward God (exhibendo aliquid ei) or as appropriation of what comes from God, in particular, the sacraments* and the divine names* (q. 89 prol.).

The exterior acts of cult, it goes without saying, are subject to an interior attitude, a spiritual activity that is directed toward God (ordination mentis ad Deum q. 81, a. 7) and is stable enough to form a virtuous habitus—the virtue of religion. The habitus can be enriched only by such acts. Moreover, with regard to the virtue of religion, these exterior acts do not only maintain a simple relationship of spontaneous manifestation or even of pleasure. The exterior cult in which body and sensibility are involved (q. 84, a. 2) is a cult rightly due (cultus debitus): created and in possession of creation*, man must return the creation to God, its creator, as a tribute of “glorification.” Cult therefore pays homage to God’s creative sovereignty; it is the reflection of a faith* that is revealed in the signs that sustain it in such a way that cult in fact surpasses the banal opposition between interior and exterior: gestures contain their own intentional and significant interiority.

The connection between cult and the virtue of religion, which itself stems from justice, led Thomas to develop some paradoxes that were not without consequence. Although, for example, one cannot measure charity, one can measure cult and religion: because they stem from a “moral” virtue, they fall under the discernment of “just measure” (q. 93, a. 2). Discernment should first focus on the status of those to whom cultic reverence is addressed and therefore on the particular cultic form this reverence is to take on each occasion: the cult of “latria,” reserved for God alone, or the cult of “dulia,” expressing reverence due to a created being according to various degrees of honorability (q. 94, a. 1, q. 103, a. 3). Any departure from the just measure will henceforth come from superstition, which is the excessive and undue transferral of the religious relationship to objects that do not call for it. Idolatry is its most serious form.

The connection between cult and virtue of religion also led Thomas to consider the fact that cultic realities stemmed first from natural reason*, even if a positive right would be the element to determine the precise rules and forms of rites (q. 81, a. 2). It seems there is room here for an anthropology of rites and cult that involves understanding man as a religious animal. However, the transition that leads the general function of the cult to its positive ends obliges one to consider the irreversible historicity of the Incarnation* and Passion* of Christ and therefore “the strictly Christian regime of religion” (ritum christianae religionis) (IIIa, q. 62, a. 6). The Thomist interpretation of cult goes from a theocentric explanation of the cultic relationship to a Christocentric interpretation, and the latter aims to redefine more than one concept in the first explanation.

At the heart of this interpretation a particular thesis is proposed and supported: God is not the object of the cult but its end. It is the nature of theological virtue to have God as its only object, as when one says that the believer gives faith to God (credere Deo) (q. 81, a. 5) or that charity truly “reaches” God (q. 24, a. 5). The divine cult, however, is the object (formal and material) of the virtue of religion, which organizes and arranges the means, attitudes, and acts and so appears as one of the signs of faith (protestatio fidei per aliqua signa exteriora) (q. 94, a. 1). Thus, despite the relative autonomy that it seems to have, the cult cannot be considered as a kind of sacred mechanism that will “reach” God independently of grace* and of divine communication, which is the realm of theological virtues. Thomas specifies his position by referring to the concept of instrumental cause (IIIa, q. 62, a. 4), as used in the theology* of the sacraments. The sacrament, which is part of the divine cult, is all the more involved in God’s saving and sanctifying action (IIIa, q. 60, a. 5) in that it perfects the habitus on which the cult thrives in terms of the passion of Christ, founder of the new cult (IIIa, q. 62, a. 5). As an act that uses words, things, and people in a significant and palpable way, the sacrament cannot be reduced to a simple message. As an “instrumental cause,” it refers—in its very manifestation and with a drive that strictly stems from practice—precisely to the domain in which unfolds the action of which it is the sensible figure. It also refers to the domain of God’s good and sovereign will, which works to sanctify those with whom he has made a covenant.

Most important, in the end, is the specific refinement that Thomas contributed to the understanding of the cultic relationship in general and of the sacraments. The articulation of cultic life and the sacramental experience can be understood by reference to the Eucharist since it is in the Eucharist that “the divine cult is the main principle, in that it is the sacrifice of the Church, and the end and consummation of all the sacraments” (q. 63, a. 6). The Eucharist can be understood through the order*: for it is through order that the agents, legitimately qualified to transmit the sacraments, are born. It can be understood through Baptism and Confirmation since it is through these that emerge subjects who are capable of participating in the cultic and sacramental life of the Church*. The three sacraments (Baptism, Confirmation, Holy Orders), which grant a “character,” entitle the believer to the legitimate and sacred practice of divine cult. More precisely, “each believer is delegated to receive or transmit to others that which concerns the cult of God” since each believer participates in the priesthood of Christ, “to which the faithful are configured” (q. 63, a. 3 and 5) and that constitutes the principle of the entire cult.

d) Reforms and Cultural Spirituality. To a great extent the crisis of the Reformation revolved around questions of theology and cultural practice. Within the diversity of theories and countertheories, one can acknowledge that all the various Reformation movements (one can include the artisans of Catholic reform) championed the same cult policy of opposition to the cult—a confrontation between established forms and interior attitudes meant to correspond to them. Luther* and Calvin* did not hesitate to question the whole logic of established cultual forms (critique of sacramental and ecclesiastical mediation, concept of sacrifice). The Council of Trent*, besides reaffirming the Church’s sacramental and cultic practices, set itself the task of revalorizing them by restoring their “interior fullness” (Duvall 1985). It was hoped that this program would be through a renewal of Christian instruction—as well as by going back to the traditional form of cult and sacramental celebration—by providing the Church with ministers who could celebrate its cult and by favoring a genuine “participation” of the faithful. The Catechismus ad Parachos published in Rome* in 1566 (one of the first pastoral works to come out of Trent) offers a theory of this participation of the faithful, linking it, in the case of the Eucharist, to the central character of the sacrificial action (the only one that made full satisfaction, as was established in the council's session 22). Participating means "to participate in the fruits of sacrifice." However, the sacrifice of Jesus is both action and interior attitude: it is this attitude and this "mystery*" that pastors* have to carefully explain so that believers can develop an analogous attitude within themselves (can. 18, §7). Particularly revealing here is the distinction between the adverbs "sacramentaliter" and "spiritualiter." These were used to designate two dimensions that were intertwined in cultic practice (see session XIII of Trent, can. 8), and it justifies the practice of communion*, which would specifically be said to be "spiritual." This is a paradoxical conception, but it simultaneously leaves a vista open to a piety in which the Eucharist is the permanent horizon of thought and virtuous life, the horizon to which multiple forms of private and public devotions are connected (Duval 1985; Bremond 1932).

Pierre de Bérulle*'s disciples were to take the theological and ascetic notion of cult to its furthest extreme. As supreme act of adoration and reverence, cult is identified with the spirit of religion that allows the creature—once it recognizes the supreme sovereignty of God—to attain its highest dignity. This spirit of religion culminates in the person, the states and the sacrifice of Jesus, the incarnate Word, the "principle of grace and love in our nature" (Rotureau 1944). For this reason, any detachment from a noticeable good must be carried out and interpreted in terms of the religious states of Jesus Christ. It is sacrifice that is the key dynamic of these states and that sums up the entire work of Christ. Christians can participate in this through the Eucharist.

Such a vision of cult, beside its ascetic and moral weight, also involved ecclesiological theories since a central role was granted to the sacerdotal dimension of the ordained ministry, an idea that would be revived by the disciples and successors Bérulle, Condren, Jean Eudes, and J.-J. Olier. And it is finally notable that what appeared to be an entirely "spiritual" vision of cult and priesthood in fact revitalized the concrete forms of cultic action. Not only would the cult of the Church be the outside and formal facade of a religion that was experienced internally, but it was essentially meant to be an invitation to interiorize the "exteriora," to existentially conform to what one does when celebrating the mysteries. Vincent de Paul and Olier would make this principle the key to training priests.

e) Impoverishment and Revaluation of the Cultic Experience. History* nevertheless seems to show that the way Tridentine reforms were imposed on often unwilling populations led to a kind of drying out of cult thought and practice (Certeau 1975). This fact clearly appeared in the division of ecclesiastic teaching subjects. According to an entirely non-Aquinas perspective, cult is linked to morality, which is itself directed back to one's duty to God and expressed in the Decalogue*. Cult is discussed in terms of comments on the first three commandments. The sacraments themselves are partly analyzed in this way and presented as supplementary to moral life or as prescribed or recommended observances ("commandments of the Church"). Thus, cult was brought back to unanimity of good example and the ceremonial to a mostly uninspired didacticism. The instrumentalization of public cult during the Enlightenment (precisely on this point, Schleiermacher* mocked the "pedagogical mania") was most certainly related to a particular conception of divinity. "Christians," wrote Y. Congar (1959), "had somewhat lost the feeling of the inclusion of God's 'philanthropy' in the theological. Henceforth, this very theology was no longer a perfect theology of the Absolute and Love. It tended to become a theology of cult, yes, a cult, a duty carried out for an Absolute that was thought to be enthroned very high, in a kind of celestial Versailles." Around the end of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th, many religious thinkers shared the feeling that the cult experience was impoverished. The emergence of awakened movements serve as an example in the Protestant milieu. Within French-speaking Catholic circles it was perhaps in the work of a very close disciple of the first Lamennais, the Abbé Gerbet, that the tendency described by Congar was most obviously overturned; and it was in Dom Guéranger's work that the modern concept of cult most distinctly appeared. 1) In the Considérations sur le Dogme Générateur de la Piété Catholique (1829), Gerbet attacks rationalism* and deism*, but also, without naming it, he attacks the moral and disciplinary rigor that Guéranger would later denounce as having Jansenist origins. Before the spectacle of this "moral desert where the springs of love are drained, from where the living cult withdraws," he dismisses the solution proposed by pietism*. Instead he promotes a return to what he considers to be the "communion" dimension of cult, carried by a dogma* of which the content is precisely a "theandric" divine act. "Divine philanthropy" thus finds itself reestablished in its rights. "Rational charity" can give way to a "mystical charity" that finds "in every man's face the mark of a noble fraternity with the Man-God." The Catholic cult can therefore "banish the law of fear" and rediscover in itself its constituent dimension of "divine familiarity"; it can therefore reconcile dogma with the most experienced life. 2) Guéranger's Institutions Liturgiques (1840–51) adopt Gerbet's understanding of the fundamental link between cult and incarnation*, but the approach is more ecclesiological. The cult is an act, and fully an act as such: it cannot be reduced to its moral effects. This act is an act of the Church in the reality of society*. The Church exists as cult “in an act of religion,” and its liturgies are the “social form” of its religion. It would be a mistake, therefore, to find a pretext for “seeking religion in one’s own heart” since one would thus depart from “communion with this holy society,” a communion that is the foundation of religion itself. “What makes Christianity perfect is that the eternal Word of God [...] became flesh in time*, and lived among us to found religion on the true cult, the visible symbols of which contain grace, and, at the same time, signify it.” Thus, the social and tangible aspect of cult, henceforth considered “liturgy,” contains both the principle and the means of its renewal and, for Guéranger, becomes the primary source for Christian regeneration, the way to transform the means of expression into a genuine work of civilization (Guéranger 1885).

The term “liturgy” would henceforth be considered more adequate for designating the essentially active dimension of cult. H. Clérissac found it to contain the “hierarchical life of the Church” (Clérissac 1918). O. Casel, when reading the Fathers* again and granting liturgical requests that continue to thrive in the Church of the East, aimed to reconsider the objectivity of the cultic action independent of the subjective feelings of its participants. Considered in terms of the category of “mystery*,” cult is then seen as “divine action revealed with the intention that the celebrants participate in the very reality that is celebrated.” Christianity, therefore, cannot be reduced to a dogma and morality and emphatically not to a ritual apparatus concerned with aestheticism and ceremonial: the “mystery of cult” is simultaneously the revelation* and the fulfillment, “in Christ,” of what is revealed of Christ and by Christ (Casel 1922). In 1947 Pius XII (encyclical Mediator Dei) integrated the contributions of the liturgical movement with the official teaching of Catholicism*. Understood analogically in all its extended forms, the concept of cult here served as a means to think about the way all human existence was orientated toward God. Associated by Christ with the new cult of the new covenant, the Church, Christ’s mystical body, best expresses this orientation through liturgy. “The sacred liturgy is therefore the public cult that our redeemer, as head of the Church, renders to the Father; it is also the cult rendered by the body of believers to their founder, and through him to the eternal Father. It is, in short, the integral cult of the mystical body of Jesus Christ, that is to say, of the Head of his members” (La Liturgie, Solesmes 1954). Vatican II’s dogmatic constitution on the liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium, cites this definition in part. Nevertheless, it uses the vocabulary in an intentionally limited way. The overall concept here involves opus, the work of salvation*, considered in terms of its fulfillment in and by Jesus Christ. Carried out in the mystery of Easter, this work combines the salvation of human beings and the glorification of God. Derived from the very humanity of the Word, it introduces the “richness of the divine cult” to the human milieu. Henceforth the Church announces and exercises through its sacred liturgy “this work of salvation with which Christ associates it, and through which God is perfectly glorified, and men sanctified.” Thus, one sees “cult” giving way to “liturgy,” the latter concept seeming more able to realize the mystagogical impact of the officiating act and its “invitatory” character (Audet 1967). The terms “cult” or “spiritual cult” would then designate all that stems from an internal attitude of reverence and adoration experienced before God and, more generally, everything that a human existence includes that is “an agreeable offering to God” (Vatican II, GS 38, §1). And from this perspective, liturgical work would indeed include a cultic dimension, something that the CIC of 1983 clearly expresses (can. 834–40).

- Augustine (410–25), De civitate dei, BAug 33–37.
- J.-J. Olier (1676), Traité des Saints Ordres, Ed. J. Gautier, Paris, 1953.
- F. de Fénelon (†1715), Lettres sur divers sujets de métaphysique et de religion, New Ed., Paris, 1864, 265–310.
- P. Gerbet (1829), Considérations sur le Dogme générateur de la piété catholique, Paris.
- P. Guéranger (1840–51), Institutions liturgiques, 3 vols., Paris-Brussels (2nd Ed. [posthumous], 4 vols., Paris, 1878–85).
- H. Clérissac (1918), Le mystère de l’Église, Paris.
- O. Casel (1922), Das christliche Kultmysterium, Ratisbonne.
- Pie XII (1947), Mediator Dei, Vatican City.
- ♦ L. Maury (1892), Le réveil religieux dans l’Église réformée à Genève et en France, 1810–1850, Paris.
- H. Bremond (1932), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, vol. 9: La vie chrétienne sous l’Ancien Régime, Paris.
- G. Rotureau (1944), Le Cardinal de Bérulle, Opuscules de piété, Paris.
- J. Galy (1951), Le sacrifice dans l’École française de spiritualité, Paris.
- Y. Congar (1959), “Le Christ, image du Dieu invisible,” MD 59, 132–61.
- J.-P. Audet (1967), “Foi et expression culturelle,” in coll., La liturgie après Vatican II, Paris, 317–56.
- S. Lyonnet (1967), “La nature du culte dans le NT,” La liturgie après Vatican II, Paris, 357–84.
- F. Lengeling (1968), “Liturgie,” in L. Brunkhoff (Ed.), Liturgisch Woordenboek, vol. II, Ruremonde, 1573–96.
- M. de Certeau (1975), L’écriture de l’histoire, Paris.
- C. Perrot (1983), “Le culte de l’Église primitive,” Conc(F) 182, 11–20.
- J.J. von Allmen (1984), Célébrer le salut, Doctrine et pratique du culte chrétien, Geneva-Paris.
- A. Duval (1985), Des sacrements au concile de Trente, Paris.

JEAN-YVES HAMELINE

See also Liturgy; Mysticism; Religion, Philosophy of

Cult of Saints

a) The Fundamental Idea. Very early in the history of Christianity, and even though Paul uses the term “saints” to mean the group of the baptized (Rom 1:7; 2; Cor 13:12), a division was created between two classes of the dead. This distinction influenced family practices at tombs, practices that in large measure the Christians held in common with the pagans. There were the dead for whom Christians prayed, and then there were those whose prayers* they invoked, notably the martyrs, and soon other saints along with them. This invocation of the saints had two aspects. On the one hand, there was the celebration of the anniversary of their birth into heaven, their dies natalis. On the other hand, and more generally, their prayers were sought. To the latter was spontaneously added the veneration of their tombs or their relics* and soon their veneration also in the liturgy* itself. Recourse to the prayer of the saints is one of the features of the “communion* of saints,” which is at once a communion of holy people and a communion with those holy things that are the sacraments*.

b) Historical Development. Around the seventh century, in Rome as in Constantinople, the cult of the Virgin Mary* and of the saints in general had to some extent become delocalized—the universal celebration of a saint had earlier been an exception. From this time on, the cult was tied less strictly to the tombs of saints, even though these of course continued to be venerated. And in this way there would develop, within the Roman liturgy’s sphere of influence and more specifically in the Frankish countries when the Carolingians decided to adopt this practice, a general calendar of the feast days of the saints supplementing that of the principal liturgical* feast days. This new calendar was itself completed by the inclusion of certain feasts of a more local character. In addition to the Virgin Mary (Annunciation of our Lady, Assumption, Nativity of the Virgin), of Saint John the Baptist, and of the apostles*, with, after Christmas, the feasts of Saint Stephen, Saint John Evangelist, and the Holy Innocents, this calendar included primarily the Roman martyrs. From Charlemagne’s time, All Saints’ Day, when all the saints are invoked together, was added to it. Of Irish origin, this feast seems to have been introduced to the European continent by the English scholar Alcuin.

c) The Place of the Cult of the Saints in the Liturgy. In the Roman liturgy, and subsequently in the Roman-Frankish liturgy, on feast days the cult of the saints affected principally the mass, the chief canonical hours of the divine office, and possibly processions. Similarly, in various circumstances the singing of the litany of the saints, the core of which first appeared in Rome in the seventh century, in Greek and later in Latin, introduced for the first time the direct invocation of the saints: “Saint Mary, Saint Peter, pray for us.”

d) In the Mass and in the Divine Office. In the mass, at least since the time of Augustine, it is clear that the eucharistic* sacrifice is offered not to the saints but to God* in honor of the saints, who were commemorated on the day of their birth in heaven and mentioned every day in the Eucharistic Prayer. This practice followed the distinction made by Augustine (e.g., The City of God, X,1) between the worship rendered to God (in Greek latreia, latria) and the honor of a cult rendered to the saints (douleia, dulia). This distinction, which was to become classic in medieval theology (such as in Thomas Aquinas, ST IIa, IIae, q. 84–85 and 103), would be completed in the 13th century by the special category of the hyperdulia to the Virgin Mary (see Bonaventure*, In Sent. III, d 9, q. 3).

In the Roman liturgy the prayers, readings, and hymns of the old feast days have in many instances remained unchanged from the Carolingian period until the 20th century. In addition to the Eucharist*, the saints have been celebrated by the canonical hours of the divine office, particularly in nocturnal vigils, which held an important place among the pious practices of Christians. From the Carolingian period on, it was also during the divine office that the name day martyrology, a quotidian list of martyrs and other saints, was read.

e) The Calendar of Saints. The Middle Ages saw the number of feast days increase considerably, and the hierarchy of feasts came to be organized in a more complex way, with the latter even taking precedence over Sunday*. The new feast days concerned new saints or even newly honored aspects of sainthood—thus the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary (8 December) celebrated Mary as one who, from her very conception, had been exempted from original sin*. From the 10th century, the task of the entering of the name of a saint (canonization) on the list of saints (martyrology) fell more and more to the pope. From the 12th and 13th centuries, popes reserved for themselves the exclusive right of canonization, and since the end of the Middle Ages, Catholic theologians have considered that canonizations involved papal infallibility*. Moreover, in the second half of the Middle Ages it became the general custom to give the name of a saint to a child at the time of its Baptism*. Following the Council* of Trent*, the calendar was pruned, and an official edition of the Roman martyrology was added to the liturgical books. All matters concerning canonization were entrusted to a new institution, the Sacred Congregation of Rites (1588). In the 17th century, a new distinction was made between the saints and the blessed, the second category enjoying only a local liturgical cult. It was also from this period that scholarly research was undertaken into the history of the saints and their cult (hagiography), particularly among a specialist group of Belgian Jesuits, named “Bollandists” after their founder.

The constitution of Vatican* II on the liturgy stressed the necessity of defining clearly the cult of the saints together with the Easter mystery* (SC, no. 104) and stated the timeliness of exempting certain feast days from general celebration by the Roman calendar (no. 111). In order to lessen the number of saints to be celebrated obligatorily, the new Roman calendar (1969) took into account the work of historians. It introduced a new balance between saints associated with Rome* itself and the saints of different continents. In the liturgical texts the spiritual originality of every saint is emphasized more clearly. A new Roman martyrology is still in preparation.

f) The Protestant Reformation and the Cult of Saints. While strongly asserting the primacy of Christ* and protesting against the abuse of the cult of saints, Luther* intended to purify the cult: he did not reject it. Article 21 of the Augsburg Confession states that the memory of saints should be preserved, but they should not be understood as mediators of grace. Calvin* rejected the cult of saints (Inst. I,12, I), but he attached great importance to the “host of the elect,” understood as models of faith*. The Council of Trent proclaimed both the validity of the cult of saints (DS 1821–25) and the necessity of fighting against its possible abuses.

- H. Delehaye (1940), Martyrologium Romanum ad formam editionis typicae scholis historicis instructum, Brussels.
- P. Jounel (1983), “Le culte des saints,” in A.-G. Martimort (Ed.), L'Église en prière, New Ed., vol. 4, Paris, 124–45.
- K. Hausberger, C. Hannick, F. Schulz (1985), “Heilige, Heiligenverehrung,” TRE 14, 646–72.
- Ph. Harnoncourt (1994), “Der Kalender,” in Gottesdienst der Kirche: Handbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft 6/1, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2/1, Ratisbonne.
- H. Auf der Maur (1994), “Feste und Gedenktage der Heiligen,” in Gottesdienst der Kirche: Handbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft 6/1, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 2/1, Ratisbonne.
- P.-M. Gy (1995), “Le culte des saints dans la liturgie d'Occident entre le IXe et le XIIIe s.,” in Le culte des saints aux IXe-XIIIe s., Poitiers, 9–63.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Holiness; Liturgical Year

Culture. See Inculturation

Cyprian of Carthage

c. 200–58

Born into a wealthy pagan family, Cyprian converted to Christianity about the year 246. Having become bishop of Carthage in 249, he had to go into immediate exile to escape Emperor Decius's persecution, and he guided his community by correspondence for a year and half. On 14 September 258, he suffered martyrdom* under Valerian. We can lay aside his apologetic and moral theology, strongly influenced by Tertullian, in order to consider his theology of the Church* and its sacraments*, such as it emerges from his two most famous treatises and his bulky correspondence.

a) The Question of the Apostates. At the end of 249, Decius ordered his subjects to perform an act of piety toward the Roman gods, and many Christians obeyed. Later, these lapsi ("fallen ones") wanted to reenter the Church. Certain of the "confessors" (those who, for the faith, had endured prison and tortures) took on themselves the authority* to readmit them without conditions. Cyprian was opposed to this practice and in 251 published his De lapsis (on the Fallen Ones). He found extenuating circumstances for those who had yielded under torture (§13) but deplored that many had so easily chosen apostasy (§7–8) when they should, according to Matthew 10:23, have gone into exile (§10). He exhorted them not to demand an immediate pardon but to do penance and to give alms deducted from that wealth that, in order to escape persecution, they should have been capable of abandoning (§35).

On the other hand, and in the name of goodness and divine mercy*, Cyprian defended the reintegration of the apostates against the intransigence of Novatianism*. He rejected the view of the Church as a society of pure people: "When the apostle says 'In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver but also of wood and clay' (2 Tm 2:20) how can one dare to seem to choose the gold and silver vessels and [...] condemn the wooden and earthen ones?" (Ep 55, 25, 2).

b) A Certain Idea of the Church. Similarly, in his De ecclesiae catholicae unitate (On the Unity of the Catholic Church) of 251, Cyprian fought schisms* linked to the problems caused by the lapsi by preaching fidelity to the Church: "One cannot have God* as a father when one does not have the Church as a mother"

(§6). He based the principle of Church unity on the cohesion of the Trinity* (§6, citing Jn 5, 8) and especially on concrete signs: Christ's tunic (§7), the family* gathered at Rahab's (§8, following Jos 2, 18 et seq.), the commandment to eat the paschal lamb* in a single house (§8, after Ex 12:46), and the dove that settled on Jesus* at his baptism* ("a simple and joyful bird, with no malice," whose pairings know "peace* and harmony") (§9). And to the unity* of the Church corresponds a single episcopate, "one and indivisible."

Scribal tradition gives two versions of the famous §4: one speaks of the "primacy" (primatus) given to Peter*; the other, although more developed, does not utter a word about this. Certain specialists think that the short text is a forgery from the fourth-century Roman Chancellery; many others attribute both drafts to Cyprian. It was said that, at the time of his quarrel with Pope Stephen I, Cyprian had corrected a passage that he thought would prove too favorable to Rome's claims. Whatever the result of the philological debate, it calls for two remarks. On the one hand, letters by Cyprian present the see of Rome as the "matrix and root of the Catholic Church" (Ep. 48, 3.1) or as "The principal Church, which engendered episcopal unity" (Ep. 59, 14.1). On the other hand, at the time the first publication of his De unitate, Cyprian was already saying—as he would when opposing Pope Stephen (Ep. 72, 3, 2)—that "every bishop himself directs his own actions and his administration, on condition that he renders an account of them to the Lord" (Ep. 55, 21, 2). In short, he saw in the choice of Peter by Jesus* a sign of unity for the whole Church and not the justification of third century Roman ambitions.

c) The Quarrel about the Baptism of Heretics and Schismatics. Pointing to tradition*, Stephen, bishop of Rome from 254 to 257, considered that whoever had received baptism from a heretic or schismatic bishop could rejoin the Great Church—the whole of the churches in communion with the Roman one—without a new baptism. Invoking an African Council held about 220, Cyprian refused to follow Rome on this point. According to him, "without exception, all heretics and schismatics are divested of all power and all authority" (Ep, 69, 1,1). Having no proper idea of the Trinity or of the Church, they could not confer a valid baptism (Ep. 73, 23,1). The conflict ended only with the martyrdom of the two adversaries. Cyprian's view continued to prevail in Africa in the fourth century, particularly in Donatism*. Augustine contributed to the victory of the Roman custom.

d) On the Eucharist. Cyprian's long Letter 63, sometimes titled De sacramento calicis Domini (On the Sacrament of the Lord's Chalice), is the first piece of writing entirely devoted to the Eucharist*. While certain people (the "Aquarians") celebrated this sacrament by pouring only water into the chalice, Cyprian thought that wine should be mixed with it in order to "do [...] what the Lord himself had done" (10, 1). In his opinion the Eucharist constituted "an oblation and a sacrifice*" that corresponded "to the Passion*" (9, 3). The union of the water and the wine "shows" the union of Christ and his people* (13, 3), while the bread "shows" the unity of the Church: "just as many grains gathered together, milled and mixed together, form a single loaf, in exactly the same way in Christ, who is the bread of heaven, there is [...] only one single body" (13, 4).

- CChr.SL 3–3 B (Preferred Ed.).
in SC: A Donat. La vertu de patience (291).
Correspondance, CUFr, 2 vols.
The Letters of St. Cyprian of Carthage, New York, 1984–89, 4 vols. with commentary by G. W. Clarke.
- De l'unité de l'Église catholique*, by P. de Labriolle, Paris, 1942.
- ♦ M. Bévenot (1981), "Cyprian von Carthago," TRE 8, 246–54.
- J. D. Laurance (1984), Priest as Type of Christ: The Leader of the Eucharist in Salvation History according to Cyprian of Carthage, New York.
- S. Cavalotto (1990), Il magistero episcopale di Cipriano di Cartagine: Aspetti metodologici, Plaisance.
- V. Saxer (1990), "Cyprien de Carthage," DECA, 603–6.
- P. A. Gramaglia (1992), "Cipriano e il primato romano," RSLR, 28, 185–213.
- Ch. et L. Pietri (1995), Naissance d'une chrétienté (250–430), Paris, 155–69.
- La REAug publie une Chronica Tertulliana et Cyprianea.

JEAN-MARIE SALAMITO

See also Apologists; Baptism; Bishop; Church; Donatism; Eucharist; Martyrdom; Novatianism; Rome; Tertullian

Cyril of Alexandria

c. 380–444

a) Life and Works. Cyril was born into a family that had migrated from Memphis to Alexandria*. It was no doubt under the supervision of his uncle Theophilus, archbishop of Alexandria (385–412), that he received the serious lay and religious education to which his later writings attest. Hagiographic sources recount in a very picturesque way his five-year stay in the cloister of Makarios in Nitria (PO I/1, chaps. 11–12). In 403 his uncle Theophilus took Cyril to Asia Minor to the rather grim Synod of the Oaktree (Chalcedon), where, on Theophilus's initiative, John Chrysostom, archbishop of Constantinople, was deposed following false accusations (PG 103, 105–13). It was the first confrontation between Alexandria, Constantinople, and Antioch*, the town in which John Chrysostom had been educated. In 412, Cyril succeeded his uncle to the see of Alexandria. He was prominent from the outset through his very strong—and sometimes muddle-headed—concern for orthodoxy*, simultaneously opposing the Arians (Arianism)* and the Novatians, the Jews, and the pagans. The "hyperanimosity" for which Isidorus Pelusiota reproached him at the time of the struggle against Nestorius (Nestorianism*) had revealed itself well before this particular great quarrel (PG 78. 362).

Cyril's theological works are prolific. The year 429 is the watershed that divided them fairly clearly into two parts, with the start of the controversy with Nestorius. Two immense volumes on the Pentateuch (PG 68–69) constantly present Christ* as the prophetic truth* (tupos) of Mosaic law*. The Gloss on the Psalms, Isaiah, and the 12 Minor Prophets (PG 73–74) reveals the same preoccupation. The commentary on the Gospel according to John (PG 73–74), on account of its size and its wealth of doctrine, is, however, the most remarkable of Cyril's exegetical writings. His interpretation is less prone to the kind of allegorizing associated with writers such as Origen or Didymus and through his concern for the literal meaning. He sometimes even borrows from the work of Jerome (Kerri-gan 1952).

His specifically dogmatic works deal with the Trinity*: the Thesaurus (PG 75) and the Seven Dialogues on the Holy Trinity (SC 231, 237, 246). Cyril took his inspiration from Athanasius* and the great Cappadocians of the previous century, but he often rearranged the elements of the Christian views into an original synthesis. Man's kinship with the Word* incarnates him corporally and spiritually with God*. The Trinity, the Incarnation*, the Eucharist*, Baptism*, the indwelling of the Holy* Spirit, deification: all these major themes of his teaching Cyril constantly connected to each other, following the tradition of church fathers such as Athanasius and Gregory of Nyssa.

b) The Conflict with Nestorius. From 429 until his death* in 444, Cyril would focus his attention on the danger, to his mind, of the teachings of Nestorius, the priest from Antioch who, in 428, was chosen by Emperor Theodosius II to hold the see of Constantinople. Henceforth, letters, homilies, treatises (e.g., Five Books against Nestorius; PG 76–9-248) would have a single objective: the refutation of Nestorius's teachings on Christ. As early as 429, Cyril reacted against the new patriarch's sermons (Easter Homily, No. 17) (PG 77, 767–800, and his letter to the Egyptian Monks, ACO I, 1, 10–23). Cyril thought that Nestorius's objection to calling Mary* the Mother of God (theotokos) was a threat to the unity and even the divinity of Christ. Cyril wrote in an early letter to Nestorius that they have reached the point in certain circles "of no longer tolerating the admission that Christ is God; they prefer to say that he is the instrument or tool of the Deity; a theophoric man, or such like" (Ep 2: ACO I, 1, 23–25). A polemical exchange thus began in which Pope* Celestine was involved. Local synods were held in Rome* and Alexandria, which led to the emperor's convocation of an ecumenical council in Ephesus. Cyril hurriedly obtained the condemnation of Nestorius on 22 June 431.

c) Cyril's Christology. The Council of Ephesus thought that Cyril's second letter to Nestorius (Ep. 4; DCO II/1, 104–12) gave the authentic meaning of the Nicæan* symbol with regard to "the fact that the Word issued by God became flesh and became a Man": "The Word, having joined together by means of the hypostasis (kath'hupostasin) a living flesh and a rational soul*, became a man in an inexpressible and incomprehensible way and received the title of Son* of man, not by a simple wish or whim; neither, in addition, because he only took on the figure of a man (prosôpon); and we say that different are the natures gathered together in a true unity, and that from both together resulted a single Christ and a single Son, not that the difference in natures was eliminated by the union, but rather because the divinity and the humanity formed for us our unique Lord, Christ, and Son, by means of their ineffable and inexpressible coming together into the unity [...]. It was not an ordinary man who was first born of the Holy Virgin and on whom the Word descended later, but it is because, having been joined to his humanity from the very womb he is said to have suffered carnal generation, so much so that he appropriated generation through carnal means [...]. It is for this reason that the Holy Fathers have dared to name the Holy Virgin the Mother of God" (DCO II-1, 107–13). The unity of Christ required that the Word of God should himself be born of Mary. Were this not the case, we would be confronted by two subsistents, the Word and an ordinary man born of Mary. It is on account of the last-named attribute, the exercise of the concrete act of existing (hupostasis), that the Word claims as his own or assumes for himself generation through carnal means.

Cyril was perhaps the first to take up again in a christological context the distinction, first used to describe the Trinity, of the person* (Kath'hupostasin) and the nature (phusis). He also distinguished the hupostasis, the person that one is, from the prosôpon, the figure that one represents. The union realized here, which places the humanity of the Word made flesh in the category of the being* and not of the having*, is opposed to the union that would be created by "simple wish or whim."

Giving phusis a concrete meaning, Cyril would speak elsewhere, somewhat ambiguously, of a union kataphusin or phusikè (third letter to Nestorius, third Anathematism, DCO II/1, 142) and would also speak of "the unique, incarnated nature of the Word of God" (mia phusis tou thesou logou sesarkômenè) (Contra Nestorius I, PG 76, 60–93), an expression that he thought he was borrowing from Athanasius but that in fact came from Apollinarius (Apollinarianism*) (Ep. ad Jov. 250; ACO I/5, 65–66). These phrases would for a long time earn Cyril the title of the father of monophysitism*.

d) Reputation and Influence. Approved by the Council of Ephesus, integrated by those of Chalcedon* and Constantinople* II and III, the exegesis of Nicæa that Cyril had defended became a property of the Church*. Maximus* the Confessor, John of Damascus, Thomas* Aquinas, Denis Petau, and Scheeben*, among other theologians, would look back to Cyril. In 1882, Pope Leo XIII declared him a doctor* of the Church. In 1944, Pius XII devoted to him an encyclical letter, Orientalis Ecclesiae (AAS 36, 129–44).

• PG 68–77.

DCO II-1, 105–47.

Deux dialogues christologiques, SC 97.

Dialogues sur la Trinité, SC 231, 237, and 246.

Contre Julien, SC 322.

Lettres festales, SC 372 and 392.

♦ H. du Manoir (1944), Dogme et spiritualité chez saint Cyrille d'Alexandrie, Paris.

J. Liébaert (1951), La doctrine christologique de saint Cyrille d'Alexandrie avant la querelle nestorienne, Lille.

A. Kerrigan (1952), St. Cyril of Alexandria, Interpreter of the Old Testament, Rome.

J. Liébaert (1970), “L'évolution de la christologie de saint Cyrille d'Alexandrie à partir de la controverse nestorienne,” MSR 27, 27–48.

A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna, 637–91 (Le Christ dans la tradition chrétienne, CFi 72) (2nd Ed. 1990).

A. de Halleux (1992), “Les douze chapitres cyrilliens au concile d'Éphèse (430–433),” RTL 23, 425–58.

M.-O. Boulnois (1994), Le paradoxe trinitaire chez Cyrille d'Alexandrie, EAUG 143.

GILLES LANGEVIN

See also Appropriation; Christ/Christology; Ephesus, Council of; Hypostatic Union; Monophysitism; Nestorianism; Trinity

D

Daniel, Book of. See Apocalyptic Literature

Dante

1265–1321

Dante Alighieri cannot only be considered one of the greatest European poets but also a philosopher and a theologian of the highest rank. He knew how to use his poetic genius to express ideas that were often original and innovative.

1. Life

Dante was born in Florence in May or June 1265 in a noble but modest Guelph family. After elementary schooling in Latin grammar, his encounter with Brunetto Latini (politician, poet, and philosopher) and with the poetic and political milieu of Florence and of Bologna was decisive. It allowed Dante to deepen his knowledge of the Latin classics, rhetoric, philosophy*, and French poetry and to come into contact with contemporary Italian poetry. He completed his education, in all likelihood, auditing freely some courses at the Franciscan Studium of Santa Croce and at the Dominican Studium of Santa Maria Novella. This academic formation, received by Dante outside formal schooling, allowed him to make his own personal synthesis of the various elements of knowledge he had acquired.

At the age of 20 Dante married Gemma Donati, who bore him three or four children. In 1295 he embarked on a brief and disastrous political career: initially elected to various councils in Florence, he became prior in 1300 (15 June–15 August). Implicated in conflicts between the White Guelphs and the Black Guelphs, Dante sided with the former. Because of this he was condemned to exile at the beginning of 1302 and then to death. He lived for a while with other exiles on the outer edges of Tuscany, seeking a return to Florence, but around 1304 he started traveling in search of hospitable lords. He lived in various places, in Treviso, Lunigiana, Casentino, and Lucca, assuming some responsibilities in diplomacy or in chancellery. Profoundly marked by exile, he supported the expedition of Henry VII into Italy (1310), with the hope that this monarch would restore justice, peace, and freedom. But the premature death of the emperor (24 August 1313) brought an end to his dreams of ethico-political renewal. He spent his last years in Verona and Ravenna, where he never ceased hoping, until his death on 14 September 1321, that he would be allowed back to Florence because of his poetic merits (Paradise XXV).

2. Works

La Vita Nuova (c. 1294) marks the first step in Dante's career as a writer. The "libello" is made up of 31 poems interspersed in a text in prose (thus the name of prosimetrum) that is used as an autobiographical and self-interpreting framing device. Beatrice's presence acts as the fabric of this work—from the first encounter to a death that transforms Woman* into a "mediator of knowledge and of salvation*" (Contini)—in a path that will lead to the Commedia. Along with the Vita Nuova we should also mention the Rime, which bear witness to an "endless experimentation" (Contini), the Fiore, and the Detto d'amore, as well as two adaptations of the Roman de la Rose whose attribution to Dante rests on serious arguments. The Latin treatise De vulgari eloquentia, composed during the early years of exile (1303–5) and interrupted in book II (chap. XIV), presents itself, with good reason, as an original piece of work. Dante's goal is to offer a theoretical justification of the use, by writers in particular, of the so-called vulgar language, since this language enjoys priority and comes more naturally than Latin, which is fraught with artificiality. The treatise also includes original and important anthropological comment on the origin, the function, and the nature of language.

Composed during those same years and likewise unfinished (we have only 4 treatises instead of the projected 15), the Convivio was the first philosophical work to be written in Italian. A self-interpreting treatise, it owes much to Albert* the Great and Thomas* Aquinas. It presents itself as a collection of lessons given in the form of poems (the Vivanda of the Banquet) accompanied by a rich doctrinal commentary (Il Pane). In the first book Dante expounds the reasons for writing his commentary in Italian. His choice of language was made because the treatise was meant for a certain public: the people who have remained nella umana fame (in human hunger) for wisdom on account of family or civil obligations. In the second book, which relates the conflict between the old love (Beatrice) and the victorious love for la donna gentile (Philosophy), Dante expounds his views on the meanings of Scripture, which he then goes on to apply to his own work. He thus makes a distinction between the allegory of poets and the allegory of theologians. The former exposes a spiritual truth hidden under imaginary and untruthful facts; the latter exposes a spiritual truth hidden under historical facts (this difference will be eliminated in the Commedia, which uses allegory in both a poetic and a theological fashion). The third book is an opusculum that praises philosophy and is comparable to numerous contemporary opusculum written by masters of the Faculty of Arts. Finally, the fourth book is devoted to the study of the notion of nobility understood as "perfezione di propria natura in ciascuna cosa." In it, Dante tackles for the first time the political themes that are also central to the Latin treatise Monarchia (probably composed from 1316–17 onwards). Dante demonstrates with a remarkable syllogistic rigor the necessity of a universal monarchy; he makes of it the indispensable condition of peace* and of allowing the whole human race to realize its goal through the final actualization of the possible intellect (intellectualism*). Having stated the legitimacy of the Roman nature of the empire (book II), Dante goes on, in the last book, to establish its autonomy in relation to the Church*. He vigorously refutes the hierocratic interpretations of the pope's temporal authority and notably proves the illegitimate nature of Constantine's donation. Finally, he maintains that imperial authority has been delegated directly by God*: since human beings, who participate in corruptibility as well as incorruptibility, are ordained to two distinct ends, earthly beatitude and eternal beatitude*, God has delegated two distinct and independent guides, the emperor and the pope. That political doctrine, based on a clear distinction between theological and philosophical viewpoints, between the domain of faith and that of reason, was the result of some meditation, through which Dante—in spite of a constant presence of Thomist thinking—clearly broke away from Thomism*.

To these works should also be added a collection of 13 Latin epistles. Epistles V, VI, and VII were written on the occasion of Henry VII's expedition to Italy. Epistle XI was sent to the Italian cardinals assembled in a conclave to elect the successor of Clement V. Epistle XIII is a fundamental introduction to the Commedia and represents the third Dante commentary by himself. We should also mention two Latin eclogues (1319–20) and a lesson in natural philosophy entitled Questio de aqua et terra (1320).

3. The Divine Comedy

Composed in all likelihood between 1307 and 1321, not only is the Commedia Dante's major work, it also represents his theological synthesis. Rigorously structured around the numbers 3 and 10 for rhythm, the Commedia is made up of 100 cantos in "terza rima," divided into three canticles (Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise), each consisting of 33 cantos. The Commedia is the narrative of a penitential journey to the three kingdoms beyond the grave. The poet accomplishes the journey during Holy Week in the jubilee year of 1300 and is guided by Virgil in the first two kingdoms and by Beatrice (replaced finally by Bernard* of Clairvaux) in the third. A real summa of knowledge mixes several literary genres, showing in particular an excellent grasp of travel literature. The poem is the multifaceted expression of an experience* that is simultaneously poetical, philosophical, and theological. It accomplishes, while transcending it, the Convivio's doctrinal and pedagogical project. The narrative is governed by a practical and moral intention: the Dantesque journey is the journey of knowledge and at the same time one that is an ethical, political, and ecclesiastical renewal.

a) Hell. Located, according to Inf. XXXIV, at the center of the earth, which, in turn, is itself right in the center of the universe, hell* has the appearance of a crater divided into nine concentric circles. This place, where the damned suffer, is structured according to a strict ethical order, which is intelligible to the human mind. Virgil—whose explanations on hell's order (XI) are thought to be very clear because they explain “very well this abyss and those who are in it”—bases his classification of human misdemeanors on an Aristotelian distinction (EN VII, 1, 1145 a 15–17) between “incontinence, malice, and mad brutality.” As a consequence the first circles of hell enclose those who have indulged excessively in the sin of the flesh, in gluttony, and in temporal pleasures (circles II–V). To establish a hierarchy of sins* related to malice and brutality, Dante makes use of a Ciceronian distinction (De off. I, 13, 41) between injustice (iniuria) by force and injustice by fraud. Violence* against one's fellow human being (seventh circle) includes tyranny and violence against oneself, which includes suicide (XIII). Among those human beings whom he considers violent against God, Dante includes the blasphemers (XIV), the sodomites (XV–XVI), and the usurers (XVII). He describes with particular meticulousness, in the 10 “bolgias” (or chasms) of the eighth circle, the manifold forms of injustice that human beings can inflict upon others through deception: these range from flattery (XVIII) to hypocrisy (XXIII) and simonists (XIX), thieves (XXIV), treacherous counselors (XXVI–XXVII), and forgers. The ninth circle represents the indescribable “bottom of the whole universe” (XXXII) where, in a lake of ice, those who have betrayed their parents, their benefactors, and—even worse—the empire (Brutus and Cassius) and the Church (Judas) suffer with Lucifer, “Emperor of the kingdom of grief” (XXXIV). Since free will constitutes the foundation of this ethical (ethics*) topography and of its corresponding punitive system, those who are indolent—among whom are to be found the neutral angels* (III) and the great minds of ancient times (IV ☉ Paganism)—cannot find their place there. Heretics occupy a place apart in the sixth circle, between those who are incontinent and those who are violent.

b) Purgatory. According to Dante, purgatory* is a mountain located in the middle of the ocean. It was formed at the time of the fall of Lucifer and is divided into seven circular terraces where depraved tendencies are expiated through purgative sufferings whether of the physical or the moral order. Purgatory is preceded by the antepurgatory (for all those who were late repenting), and it is followed by the Garden of Eden, where the last acts of spiritual regeneration are accomplished. As with hell, the description of this kingdom is entrusted to Virgil, and it is to be found in the central canto of the Purgatorio (XVII), but it overflows, together with its doctrinal implications, into the adjoining cantos. In canto XVI the irascible Marco Lombardo, faithful to Thomas Aquinas (ST Ia, q. 115, a. 3–6), affirms in the face of astrological determinism the “libero voler” (76) of human beings, and he highlights the fact that “if mankind is perverted at present” (82), the ethico-political responsibility falls entirely on man's shoulders. The architecture of purgatory, described in canto XVII, follows precepts of a Scholastic (Scholasticism*) origin (they are partly at variance with the Aristotelian-Ciceronian criteria for hell). The distribution of souls (soul*-heart-body) on the seven terraces follows the order of the capital sins established by Gregory* the Great, and the doctrinal foundation borrowed fairly strictly from Thomas Aquinas is dependent on the Christian concept of love* as the cause of all actions (ST Ia IIae, q. 28, a. 6). Dante makes the distinction (ST Ia, q. 60, a. 1–3) between natural love (not culpable) and elective love (root of vices and virtues*). From this distinction follows a subdivision into three levels, as in hell, because love can be culpable in three different ways (95–96): “for the wrong object” (love of harming [evil*] others: pride, X–XII; envy, XIII–XIV; anger, XV–XVII), “for lack of vigor” (love for God expressed halfheartedly: laziness, XVII–XVIII), or “for too much vigor” (immoderate love for the material riches of this world: miserliness, XIX–XXI; greed, XXII–XXIV; lust, XXV–XXVII). Freedom and love are again analyzed in a synthetic fashion in canto XVIII, as factors in human action. Asked by Dante, Virgil explains what love is within the limits of reason and how man is free to follow an amorous impulse. Endowed with a natural disposition for love (identified with the desire to be joined with some exterior person or object), man pos-esses the freedom to evaluate—that is to welcome or to reject amorous passions*—while following his aspiration (which is also innate) for the real good*. The root of freedom is therefore in the intellectual soul and more precisely in the faculty of making judgments, a faculty that is found between understanding (its prerequisite) and appetite.

c) Paradise. To present the climb toward God, Dante relies on the cosmology of his time. In this, the third part of the Commedia, the ascent initially follows the order of the seven planets; then the pilgrim rises to the crystalline heaven of the fixed stars; and he finally reaches the empyrean. The celestial topography is bound by a rigorous logic. Those who have practiced the four cardinal virtues* (temperance, prudence*, fortitude, and justice) are accommodated in the first six heavens. In the eighth heaven Dante undergoes an examination on the three theological virtues (faith*, hope*, charity, XXIV–XXVI) before acceding to the crystalline heaven, where Beatrice, who represents theology*, explains the angelic world to him (XXVIII). And when, at the completion of his purification, Dante gets to the empyrean heaven, the pure kingdom of light, he has reached “that goal of all longings” (XXXIII). At this point the ardor of desire dies out in the presence of a light, truth* itself, which dwells in itself alone, knows itself, and which by understanding itself, loves itself. The sight of God, principle of the love that moves the sun and the other stars, constitutes, therefore, both the completion of the sacred poem and the goal of human existence. But never at any point does the doctrine erase Dante’s ethical and political concerns: we hear Saint Peter* heaping out invectives against papal abuses (XXVII), then Beatrice complaining that the human family is running wild for lack of rule and control (XXVII); canto VI celebrates the empire, and in canto XXX Beatrice shows Dante the Emperor Henry VII’s seat, placed in the celestial rose. The examination to which the apostles (apostle*) Peter, James, and John subject Dante, under Beatrice’s supervision, demonstrates the Comedy’s deep theological convictions. This context does not only help Dante formulate his Credo (XXIV), it also allows him to remind us that love is the main driving force of existence.

It would be absolutely disastrous to consider the Comedy as the mere narrative of a journey to the hereafter or even the expression of an extraordinary mystical (mysticism*) experience. In fact it is a work that uses all the knowledge of its time in order to describe the transcendent world, and it does so with a view to accomplishing a political and ecclesiastical reform of that world. It depicts the fate of human beings in the hereafter to show what must be. It is therefore quite fair for Dante to claim, as he does in his Epistle XIII, that the Commedia is an ethical work.

- Le opere di Dante, testo critico della Società Dantesca Italiana, Florence, 1921 (2nd Ed. 1960); La Commedia secondo l’antica vulgata, Ed. G. Petrocchi, 4 vols., Verona, 1966–67.
- Il Convivio*, Ed. C. Vasoli and D. de Robertis, in Opere Minori, I, II, Milan-Naples, 1979.
- Egloghe*, Ed. E. Cecchini, ibid., II.
- Epistole*, Ed. A. Frugoni and G. Brugnoli, ibid., II.
- Fiore and Detto d’amore*, Ed. G. Contini, ibid., I, 1984.
- Monarchia*, Ed. B. Nardi, ibid., II.
- Questio de aqua et terra*, Ed. F. Mazzoni, ibid., II.
- Rime*, Ed. G. Contini, ibid., I, I, 1984.
- Vita Nuova*, Ed. D. de Robertis, ibid., I, I.
- De vulgari eloquentia*, Ed. P. V. Mengaldo, ibid., II.
- ♦ Coll. (1920–) Studi danteschi, Florence.
- É. Gilson (1939), Dante et la philosophie, Paris (4th Ed. 1986).
- B. Nardi (1942), Dante e la cultura medievale: nuovi saggi di filosofia dantesca, Bari (2nd Ed. 1949); id. (1960), Dal “Convivio” alla “Commedia” (sei saggi danteschi), Rome.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1962), Herrlichkeit II/2, Einsiedeln, 365–462.
- F. Mazzoni (1967), Saggio di un nuovo commento alla “Divina Commedia”: Inferno, canti I–III, Florence.
- G. Contini (1967), Un’idea di Dante: saggi danteschi, Turin.
- G. Treccani (Ed.) (1970–78), Enciclopedia dantesca, 6 vols., Rome (2nd Ed. 1984).
- G. Petrocchi (1983), Vita di Dante, Bari.

RUEDI IMBACH AND SILVIA MASPOLI

See also Contemplation; Eschatology; Intellectualism; Naturalism; Political Theology; Scholasticism; Scripture, Senses of a) New Testament. Usually connected to the episcopates (bishop*) (Phil 1:1; 1 Tm 3:2, 8, 12), the office of deacon is described in 1 Timothy 3:8–13. The Seven from Acts 6:1, 6 were not the first deacons, even though the tradition is often associated with them. The office of the Seven was different: preaching*, baptism*, evangelizing (mission*) (Acts 6:8ff., 8:5–13, 8:26–40, 21:8). They did not receive the title of deacon, although it was given to the Christian woman Phoebe (Rom 16:1).

Day of YHWH. See Parousia

Deacon

b) Patristic Period. Rather vague on their functions, Ignatius of Antioch declared deacons to be messengers of the bishop (Philad. 10, 1; 11, 1). The Apostolic Tradition 8 underlines the direct link between the deacon and the bishop; the Apostolic Constitution (II, 29–32; SC 320, 248–50; III, 19; SC 329, 160–64) details his ministry* to the bishop: role in the liturgical assembly, tending to those in need (widows, orphans, sick, foreigners, etc.). There are deaconesses*, too, especially in the East.

In Rome* the seven deacons (for 42 priests), as everywhere, were in charge of finances and outside relations, which put them in a better position than priests for succeeding the bishop. Little by little, however, the deacons were entirely subordinated to the priests. And Jerome, by equating priests and bishops (Ep. 146), would arrive at a linear hierarchy of the three orders. Only the archdeacon was not included, while retaining a position of “vicar-general,” responsible for temporal matters and for the clergy.

The success of this “opinio Hieronymi” fed the medieval thesis of sacramental equivalence between bishops and priests, and, in turn, this thesis partially explained why the Reformed churches only rarely kept the episcopate.

c) Waning of the Diaconate. From the sixth century onward, and even in the East, deacons were restricted to liturgical service, and the rest of their tasks—their deaconship—were given to others. In the 11th century the archdeacon became a priest, and the diaconate simply became an intermediary position, except for a few cardinals (as, for example, in the case of Antonelli, secretary of state of Pius IX. Antonelli died in 1902).

d) Reestablishment of the Diaconate as a Permanent Ministry. Drawing mainly on French and German pastoral and theological thought, and encouraged by Pius XII (who ascertained the sacramental value of the diaconate in his Sacramentum Ordinis of 1947), Vatican* II reestablished the diaconate as a permanent ministry (LG 29; see AG 15–16). The Relatio before the vote (Acta Syn III, III, I, 260–61) clarified the distinct character of this ministry. Priests and deacons are ministers of the word* and the liturgy*: the pastoral ministry defines the former, the deaconship and charity the latter. The long list of tasks assigned to deacons does not express the essence of the diaconate and has no empirical value. The CIC of 1983 certainly seems to talk about deacons as pastors (pastor*) and representatives of the Christ-head. Their participation in the three functions of Christ* differs only slightly from that of priests and bishops. But when it specifically discusses the subject of the pastoral in can. 517 §2, it places deacons and laity (lay/laity*) on the same footing.

In terms of this ministry, the expectations of Vatican II are complex: to revive the deaconship within a Church that is poor and sees itself in a serving role to create new resources for ministry; to modify the canonical status of the cleric*; and to rediscover the full diversity of the ministry within orthodoxy*.

e) Systematic Theology. The backbone of the diaconate is the deaconship. It is not the aim that the ordination of a particular few of these individuals should give an example of service. Rather ordination gives them grace* and requires them to stimulate and organize the Christian service for everybody and to take the necessary initiatives in this direction. This focal point of their ministry colors their service of the word and their liturgical responsibilities in a way that conforms with tradition. In fact, the deacons of antiquity did not preach. It was only in 1925 that they became extraordinary ministers of baptism* and funerals, and until Vatican II they did not perform nuptial blessings in either the East or the West.

The ministry of deacons makes those who hold it the born helper of bishops, because, in doctrinal terms, deacons are not auxiliaries to priests. They can perform extra-parish or diocesan responsibilities and thus receive a sector-based authority* vis-à-vis the priests. Thus, the relationship between bishop-priest-deacon is more triangular than vertical; and it is not an isosceles triangle, since according to Nicaea* (can. 18) the “deacons, servants of the bishop, are situated one degree below priests” (COD 14–15).

f) Pastoral Interests. Intended to revitalize service in poor and serving Churches, the diaconate mostly grew in rich churches: 62 percent of the world’s deacons can be found in the United States and 40 percent of European deacons are in Germany. The ministry of deacons was meant first of all for young churches (AG 15–16), but 98 percent of deacons can be found in former Christendom.

The deacon promises a thorough evangelization: living in a family*, in a neighborhood, having a profession (able legally to participate in union activity and even in politics), deacons can bring social organizations and the Church closer together. Their experience can benefit preaching and decision making, and not only wedding (marriage*) celebrations, baptisms, funerals, and so forth.

Finally, Catholics can, thanks to deacons, be trained by a married, ordained minister and, moreover, can be called to the ministry*, a request that could be answered in the future. Most were called without volunteering, according to the needs of serving the gospel in the local church*, and on the basis of their known abilities rather than on the basis of candidature, something that is mandatory for priests (see Instruction de la Congrégation des Sacrements, AAS 23, 1930).

g) Ecumenical Perspective. The permanent diaconate draws a parallel between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches. Although the Reformation, focusing on the pastoral ministry, stressed the diaconship, the “document of Lima” (BEM n. 31) offers a significant opening by proposing to all that the threefold ministry be adopted and by describing the diaconate in terms acceptable to Catholics.

- A. Amanieu (1935), “Archidiacon,” DDC 1, 948–1004.
- Th. Klauser (1956), “Diakon,” RAC 3, 808–903.
- J. G. Plöger, H. Weber (1981), Der Diakon: Wiederentdeckung und Erneuerung seines Dienstes, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.
- H. Legrand (1985), “Le diaconat: renouveau et théologie,” RSPHTh 69, 101–24.
- J. N. Collins (1990), Diakonia: Re-interpreting the Ancient Sources, New York.
- H. Renard (1990), Diaconat et solidarité, Mulhouse.

HERVÉ LEGRAND

See also Bishop; Liturgy; Ministry; Presbyter/Priest; Vatican II, Council of

Deaconesses

a) In the Ancient Tradition. The name deaconess (Diakonissa) appeared in the fourth century, in both Greek (First Council of Nicaea*, can. 19) and Latin (Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, s.v). In the New Testament, however, there is one instance (Rom 16:1f.) of a woman named Phoebe, diakonos of the church* of Cenchreae. Historians are not sure about the exact significance of Phoebe’s role or of the role of deaconesses and widows in the Christian communities of the first centuries. Neither at that time, nor in the centuries that followed, was there a straightforward symmetry between the respective tasks of the deaconesses (mainly to help during the baptism* of adult women) and the deacons* (mainly the service of the Eucharist table and the proclamation of the Word*), nor between their respective liturgical and theological statuses. The deacons were greatly active in charitable service, but it is not clear whether deaconesses had a comparable role.

In the Byzantine liturgy* the rite of investiture or ordination* of deaconesses was particularly close to that of the ordination of deacons, but their role seems to have evaporated with the disappearance of adult baptism. In the 11th century the great Greek canonist Balsamon (PG 137, 441) noted this discontinuation. He considered the ordination of deaconesses of the abbesses of certain monastic communities to be “improper” (katakhrèstikôs). The possibility of restoring a female diaconate was discussed in the Catholic Church after Vatican II, taking into account on the one hand the differing witnesses of tradition on this question (Vagaggini, Martimort), and on the other hand the possible interpretations of the office of deacon and its relation to the Eucharist*.

b) In Protestantism Communities. In Protestantism communities, deaconesses developed from the 19th century onward. Their aim was to put into practice the New Testament notion of deaconship, not unlike certain Catholic communities that were committed to helping the poor.

- R. Gryson (1972), Le ministère des femmes dans l'Église ancienne, Gembloux.
- C. Vagaggini (1974), "L'ordinazione delle diaconesse nelle tradizioni greca e bizantina," OCP 40, 145–89.
- A.-G. Martimort (1982), Les diaconesses, essai historique, Rome.
- D. Ansorge (1990), "Der Diakonat der Frau," in T. Berger, A. Gerhards (Ed.), Liturgie und Frauenfrage, St. Ottilien, 31–65.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Deacon; Ordination/Order; Woman

Death

A. Biblical and Systematic Theology

From the beginning, human beings have constantly sought to give meaning to the unthinkable thing that is death by inventing either immortality or a beyond. But in contrast to the eschatologies* attested in many religions, in Christianity there appears the idea of a God* who triumphs over death in and by death itself. However, before being able to speak of a Christian sense of death and elaborating a theology of death, it is necessary to reconstruct the biblical experience of death, in all its complexity and with all its hesitations, up to the threshold of the New Testament.

I. The Biblical Experience of Death

1. The Experience of Death in the Old Testament

The elements of biblical literature concerning the experience of death cannot easily be harmonized. This experience, in fact, appears to be deeply ambiguous. On the one hand, death is experienced as the natural culmination of life, and the people of the Old Testament may believe in God without believing in a beyond. On the other hand, death is felt to be an ordeal, an enigma, a non-salvation; and there appears, even if rather late, some hope* in a victory won by God over death.

a) Death as the Natural Culmination of Life. For the Israelite, earthly life is the quintessential gift of God and to live "old and full of days" (Gn 35:29) is the sign of God's blessing*: "Abraham breathed his last and died in a good old age, an old man and full of years" (Gn 25:8). According to the logic of Hebrew anthropology*, death affects not only the flesh (bâsâr) but also the soul (soul*-heart-body) (nêfêsh). Thus, man who is made from dust returns to dust (Gn 2:7; 3:19; Ps 90:3; Jb 34:15; Eccl 12:1–7). Human beings have received the earth as a legacy, and their vocation is to make it fruitful and themselves to multiply. Death is a natural inevitability that engenders no tragic feeling, and the absence of survival is compensated for by a large posterity (see 2 Sm 14:7).

But for the just man of the Old Testament, fullness of life is not reduced to prosperity; it is life lived with God. For this reason, Sheol*, or the dwelling of the dead, a place of darkness (Jb 10:21f.), is a fearsome place; there man is definitively cut off from God and can no longer praise him (Is 38:18). The dead live in a permanent sleep; their existence is so insubstantial that it is close to nothingness*. In addition, the many ritual prescriptions intended to protect against contact with death as against a fundamental impurity (purity*/impurity) indicate how difficult it was for Israel* to integrate the realm of death into its life of faith, and they constitute a major difference from the surrounding paganism, which maintained a thriving cult* of the dead.

b) Death as an Ordeal and a Curse. Death as the peaceful culmination of life is only one aspect of the believer's experience of death in the Old Testament. Another aspect is indeed the scandal of sudden death "in the middle of my days" (Is 38:10). The Psalms* in particular speak of the threat of a "bad death" whose harbingers are illness, poverty, solitude, and despair. We then see the appearance of a link between death and sin*, and the only recourse making it possible for the just to escape from a "bad death" is to turn toward God, the source of life: "For you will not abandon my soul to Sheol, or let your holy one see corruption" (Ps 16:10).

For the consciousness of Israel, the supreme enigma is nevertheless that the just man, too, experiences a "bad death." Not only may he die too soon, but he also faces the fearsome threat of death while he is living; death is as much a curse for the just as it is for the sinful. Thus in the Old Testament (particularly for the Yahwist) there is a foretaste of a consequence that only the New Testament affirms clearly: something in any case inherent in human finitude, death is also the wages of sin. The narrative* of Genesis thus presents death as the punishment of the sin committed by Adam* and Eve (Gn 2:17), and the same teaching is found in the Wisdom of Solomon (2:24). But one may "wonder whether it is biological death that is seen by Genesis as a consequence of sin and not rather the 'spiritual' death which consists of the prohibition of the tree of life (see Gn 3:22)" (Gesché 1995). By disobeying, Adam has chosen to live under the rule of death. There is, however, an alternative: a fullness of life with God, symbolized by the tree of life. "See, I have set before you today life and good, death and evil" (Dt 30:15).

YHWH is the master of life and death: "I kill and I make alive" (Dt 32:39). But the forces of death are always at work in creation*, and it was centuries before the biblical tradition* began to formulate the idea of a definitive victory over death. It was only from the second century B.C., in the Book of Daniel and in the Second Book of Maccabees, that there appeared the explicit affirmation of a resurrection* of the dead. This late belief—but one that was widespread (see Puech 1993)—pays tribute to the universal power (omnipotence*) of God, which reaches as far as Sheol, and to his justice*, which cannot possibly leave unrewarded those who have died as martyrs in the name of their faith in YHWH.

2. The Meaning of Death in the New Testament

Of the two faces of death represented in biblical experience, it seems that the New Testament does not exhibit the first, death as the natural culmination of life, but only the second, death as the power of sin, which makes of that culmination an absurd interruption. This is demonstrated in the attitude of Jesus in the face of death; and it is verified above all in the letters of Paul, which contain a veritable theology of death. In Johannine* theology death is a distinctive characteristic of the "world*," contrasted dualistically to the kingdom* of life that Christ* has come to bring. Whoever believes has already passed from death to life (Jn 5:24), but on condition that he love his brother; whoever does not love has remained in death (3:14).

a) It would obviously be presumptuous to claim to know the inner feeling with which Jesus* experienced the instant of his death. However, many signs indicate that he experienced the anguish, solitude, and sorrow that accompany human death. He experienced neither the "good death" of the just of the Old Testament nor the peaceful death of Socrates (e.g., Jüngel 1971). He took on the death of the sinner; and if he asked his Father* to take "this cup" from him, this is perhaps because he experienced his death as the failure of his mission. His cry "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mt 27:46) can be interpreted as a cry of despair; but as the reference to Psalms 22 in Matthew and Luke suggests, it is at the same time a surrender to God, the source of life. In the death of Jesus, human death experienced under the sign of sin becomes an access to life. God thus remains faithful by raising Jesus into a new life. "Through the death of Jesus, the history* of the suffering and the death of the world is introduced into the history of God" (Greshake 1974).

b) Reflection on death is one of the keys of Pauline* theology, where death is directly linked to the apostle's teaching about sin, the flesh, the law, baptism, and the pneuma. All human existence is in fact understood as a field of tension between death and life. It is in Paul, furthermore, that the link between sin and death is affirmed in the most explicit manner (Rom 5:12; 6:23; 1 Cor 15:21), and in a way that was to be adopted by the entire subsequent Christian tradition. The old law was in the service of death (2 Cor 3:7ff.), and this death-dealing power of the law is conditioned by the flesh* (sarx) (Rom 8:3). Although the sarx, taken in itself, is not an active power of death, it is in it that the power of sin is manifested. What the law could not accomplish, God can; he thus sent his Son, who took on a flesh of sin to liberate us from the law of sin and death through the power of his spirit (Rom 8:2). Human beings are subject to biological death "because of sin"; but for whoever "dies with Christ," death is definitively conquered thanks to the Spirit that inhabits the Risen One.

For whoever is baptized in Christ, daily life is a death and a resurrection with him (Rom 6:2f.). Baptism* is a death mysteriously connected to the death and resurrection* of Christ; and for the baptized, all of Christian life, including physical death, is nothing but a permanent dying with Christ (Phil 3:21–23). By rejecting a life that wishes to be attached to itself and that is in reality only a death, the believer who lives in communion* with Christ has already conquered death. And this is why physical death, despite its somber and threatening character, is fundamentally relativized. “If we live, we live to the Lord, and if we die, we die to the Lord. So then, whether we live or whether we die, we are the Lord’s” (Rom 14:8).

II. For a Theology of Death

1. The Official Teaching of the Churches

This teaching can be summarized in a few propositions.

a) Death Is a Consequence of Sin. This is a classic patristic affirmation (Origen, Com. in Joh. 13. 60, PG 14. 513B; Cyril of Alexandria, De adoratione in spiritu et veritate 16, J. Aubert I, 554). The Council of Trent* adopted it explicitly in the decree on original sin (DS 788ff.). The same assertion is found in the constitution Gaudium et spes of Vatican* II: “Christian faith teaches that this bodily death from which man would have been preserved had he not sinned will one day be conquered.” (18). Similarly in the CCC of 1992: “Even though man’s nature is mortal, God had destined him not to die” (1008). The magisterium* refers to several scriptural passages, in particular Genesis 2:17; Wisdom of Solomon 2:23f.; Romans 5:12; 6:23. But it should never be forgotten that this traditional teaching presupposes a doctrine of immortality that conceives it as a preternatural gift inherent in the state of original justice and not as a natural property of human beings before the Fall. The thesis is also present in Protestant confessions of faith, for example, the Apology of the Augsburg Confession (FEL §91) and the later Swiss Confession (CCFR 220ff.).

b) Death Is a Universal Fate. Even though the tradition prefers to speak of “dormition,” Mary herself, who did not know sin, passed to God through death. And in 1 Corinthians 15:51 Paul asserts that those who are alive at the Parousia* will experience a radical transformation. The entire hymnography of the Byzantine Feast of the Dormition rings variations on this theme.

c) Death Is the End of Earthly Life. Catholicism*, and along with it the principal current of Christianity, rejects the idea of a universal salvation or a final restoration of all souls (apocatastasis*, anathematized by the Second Council of Constantinople; see DS 411), and it does not extend the concept of liberty* to its account of the afterlife. Death coincides with God’s definitive judgment* (DS 464, 530ff.). The idea of a final restoration is also rejected by the Augsburg Confession (FEL §23) and by the Catechism of Heidelberg (CCFR 150). In the same perspective, Christianity has always rejected the idea of reincarnation, regardless of the way in which it is understood.

2. The Recent Orientation of Theology

Traditional treatises on the Last Things proposed an implicit theology of death, but one that was concerned principally with the fate of the dead after death, and they frequently indulged in a kind of cartography of the beyond. Under the influence of existentialist philosophies (Marcel, Sartre) and of phenomenology (Heidegger*, Fink), theological analysis has recently concentrated on the question of dying, that is, on the very instant of death.

a) The Inadequacy of a Definition. Death is a specifically human event that concerns the entire being, inseparably spirit and flesh. Death is a biological given common to all living beings. But strictly speaking, only humans are “mortal,” insofar as they alone are capable of establishing a relationship with their own death. Following Heidegger, dying can be defined as the way of being by which Dasein relates to its death. We know death only through the death of others. But that is still death apprehended in a general sense, not death as the “inmost, absolute, uttermost possibility” of Dasein (Sein und Zeit 250). In defining existence as a being-toward-death, it is understood that human death is not an accident that comes from outside but a permanent possibility. Further, it is not only a sign of the innate finiteness of the human being; it can be the sign of an authentic existence. In contrast to Sartre, for whom death is an absurd interruption of temporality, for Heidegger it is precisely the daily confrontation with death that gives meaning to existence.

This ontological approach to dying brings out the inadequacy of the classic definition of death as the “separation of the soul from the body (soul-heart-body).” Indeed, this says nothing of the specificity of human death, insofar as it concerns the entire person as a spiritual and carnal entity. It designates death as the interruption of life but not death as a possibility immanent throughout existence and as a culmination of liberty. It is content with expressing in a descriptive way the traditional doctrine according to which, whereas the body decomposes after death, the soul of the just is introduced into communion with God. But in accordance with the unitary anthropology of the Bible*, the “soul” must be perceived “not as a part of man alongside the body, but as the vital principle of man considered in his unity and his totality, in other words, his ‘ego,’ the center of the person” (Katholischer Erwachsenen-Katechismus 1985). And it is possible to assert of the soul, understood in this way, that in death itself it experiences a greater proximity to the unity of this world of which the body is only a part. K. Rahner* (1958) goes so far as to think that “in death the soul does not become a-cosmic but, if one may say so, pan-cosmic.”

b) The Interpretation of Death as the Wages of Sin. The scriptural passages on which the traditional theory of death as the consequence of sin is based call for a hermeneutics* that does not confuse the religious import of the biblical message with teaching of a scientific order. God does not will death. But that does not mean that human beings, had they not sinned, would have had an unlimited life on earth. The death that punishes the sin of the first man is not biological death but “spiritual death,” that is, non-access to eternity, experienced in suffering and anguish as a fatal and absurd destiny; and the victory achieved by the risen Christ is not a victory over natural death but over the separation between man and the eternity* of God, of which it has become the most meaningful sign.

c) Death as Necessity and as Freedom. Human death is profoundly ambiguous. Just as man is spirit and matter, freedom and necessity, person and nature, so his death is a complex and dialectical reality. It is both the culmination of man as a spiritual person, that is, the fullness of his free spiritual reality, and the interruption of his biological life, that is, the most radical dispossession of the self (see Rahner 1985).

On the basis of this dialectic between necessity and freedom, between passivity and supreme accomplishment of the self, some theologians (Boros, Troisfontaines, Schoonenberg) thought it possible to develop the thesis of the final choice, according to which the instant of death coincides with an ultimate decision for or against God. But this hypothesis is by definition unverifiable, and the phenomenon of dying has all the appearances of a total dispossession of the self. Moreover, if we attempt in this context to think of a final act of freedom coinciding with the instant of passage, it has already escaped from temporality. The theory would therefore contradict the teaching of the Church on the irrevocable character of death as the definitive seal on our moral fate.

d) Death as a Paschal Mystery. If, finally, we leave the impenetrable instant of dying in order to take into account the death experienced by the dying person, that is, the passage, then, in a Christian perspective, we must speak of the two faces of death. Death indeed changes signs depending on whether it is the tragic manifestation of the power of sin (as a break with God) or the crucial site of the encounter with God. “Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from now on” (Rev 14:13). Death can become a salvific event that brings to completion in man a sacramental encounter with Christ inaugurated by Baptism and the Eucharist*. Insofar as it is identified with the death of Christ, human death is the paschal sacrament of the passage from this world to the Father.

- M. Heidegger (1927), Sein und Zeit, GA 2, Frankfurt, 1976.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1939), Apokalypse der deutschen Seele, III, Salzburg-Leipzig, 84–230, “die Vergöttlichung des Todes”; id. (1980), Theodramatik III, Die Handlung, Einsiedeln, 88–124, “Die Zeit und der Tod.”
- K. Rahner (1958), Zur Theologie des Todes, Fribourg.
- R. Troisfontaines (1960), Je ne meurs pas, Paris.
- L. Boros (1962), Mysterium mortis, Olden-Fribourg.
- E. Fink (1969), Metaphysik und Tod, Stuttgart; id. (1976), Grundphänomene der menschlicher Daseins, Freiburg-Munich.
- G. Greshake (1969), Auferstehung der Toten, Essen; id. (1974), “Pour une théologie de la mort,” Conc (F) 94, 79–93.
- D. Z. Phillips (1970), Death and Immortality, London.
- F. Wiplinger (1970), Der personal verstandene Tod, Freiburg.
- P. Grelot (1971), De la mort à la vie éternelle, Paris.
- E. Jünger (1971), Tod, Stuttgart.
- L. V. Thomas (1976), Anthropologie de la mort, Paris.
- J. Ratzinger (1977), Eschatologie: Tod und ewiges Leben, Regensburg.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1979), Face à la mort: Jésus et Paul, Paris.
- E. Biser (1981), Dasein auf Abruf: Der Tod als Schicksal, Versuchung und Aufgabe, Düsseldorf.
- H. Küng (1982), Ewiges Leben?, Munich.
- G. Couturier (Ed.) (1985), Essais sur la mort, Montréal.
- R. Martin-Achard (1988), La mort en face selon la Bible hébraïque, Geneva.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1990), Note sur le temps, Paris.
- O. González de Cardedal (1993), Madre y muerte, Salamanca.
- E. Lévinas (1993), “La mort et le temps,” in Dieu, la mort et le temps, Paris, 13–134.
- E. Puech (1993), La croyance des Esséniens en la vie future, 2 vols., Paris.
- Fr. Dastur (1994), La mort. Essai sur la finitude, Paris.
- A. Gesché (1995), La destinée, Paris.

CLAUDE GEFFRE

See also Adam; Life, Eternal; Resurrection of the Dead; Sin; Sin, Original

B. Moral Theology

a) Thou Shalt Not Kill. God* alone is the master of life, from its beginning to its end (Donum vitae, intr. 5). Taking his place in deciding on the death of a human being, one's own or that of another, constitutes not only an injustice, because man is disposing of what does not belong to him, but above all an act of idolatry*. This explains the prohibition in the Ten Commandments (Decalogue*): "You shall not murder" (Ex 20:13). This prohibition is total: the commandments represent the absolutes of love. It therefore has no exception or dispensation; it is never permissible to kill one's neighbor. Only the realms of war (doctrine of the just war and of legitimate defense) and justice (application of the death penalty [punishment*]) require that it be subjected to qualification. In the Christian tradition*, life received at birth is not given over to the arbitrary will of man, for he is not himself his own beginning. He is therefore not the owner of his life but its steward; it is entrusted to his prudence*; he will be required to account for the way in which he has maintained it. This placing of life in the hands of the only created being that God willed for itself entails a series of moral duties, sometimes assuming a positive form (an obligation to act), sometimes a negative form (a prohibition against acting).

b) Duty to Protect One's Life. The first positive duty consists of preserving the life entrusted to the vigilance of the subject, thus of defending it from threats weighing upon it. This duty is expressed in two principles: legitimate defense and the moral obligation to preserve one's own health; only the second is analyzed here.

Contrary to what may have been said of it, the Christian tradition has never made of physical life a moral absolute. Of course, it has declared that "life is sacred," but this must be interpreted as follows: the human person* is sacred because he is created in the image of God and destined for Trinitarian life; this applies, by extension, to everything that makes up the person. Just as there is a "hierarchy* of truths" in dogmatics (dogmatic* theology), so there is a "hierarchy of duties" in morality, in which the preservation of physical life does not rank highest. On the contrary, man has the duty to expose his life to pay tribute to higher values such as charity, truth, and justice, or to accomplish the mission that providence has entrusted to him.

The martyr illustrates the first case: he confesses his faith* and offers his life as a token of homage to the one from whom "we hold life, growth, and being*." Martyrdom* has sometimes been likened to suicide. Of course, the witness knows that his act will cost him his life, but he does not seek death for itself. Circumstances force him to recognize that his witness can take on no form but a bloody one; but it is this witness that he seeks ("direct will") and not its consequence, death ("indirect will").

Every Christian has received a mission to bear witness, and he must place his health at the service of that mission and thus preserve it. This term presupposes a definition of health. In a century dominated by utilitarianism*, emphasis on mere good physical condition has become dangerous. The person risks being reduced to mere material actions and social contributions. But health implies the harmonious development of all human faculties, physical, psychological, intellectual, social, moral, and spiritual. "A complete view of human health assumes the greatest possible harmony between the forces and energies of man, the most fully developed spiritualization of the corporeal aspect of man, and the finest possible expression of the spiritual. True health manifests itself in the self-realization of the human person who has reached the freedom that mobilizes all energies to accomplish his complete human vocation" (Häring 1975).

Human beings thus have the moral duty to preserve their health with the means appropriate to their condition: rest, relaxation, and daily hygiene in normal circumstances; recourse to medicine and application of suitable therapies in case of illness. Premature aging due to the negligence of the subject constitutes a moral fault.

c) Prohibition of Suicide. The divine prohibition of murder and the obligation to preserve one's health suggest the reasons that led the Christian tradition to condemn suicide. Suicide in fact represents a threefold injustice. It runs counter to the natural love that every man should bear love toward himself: suicide is an injustice against oneself. It unilaterally breaks the bonds of solidarity with other human beings, in particular with the members of one's own family*: suicide is an injustice against others. Finally, it amounts to using one's life as though one were its owner: suicide is an injustice against the Creator. Only the final objection is determinative, and the two others flow from it.

Without reference to God, as is the case in a secularized society* (secularization*), the moral condemnation of suicide has difficulty in finding justification. One of two things is true, in fact. Either the individual draws his human dignity from his membership of the social body, which would then have the duty of dissuading the potential suicide from leaving it without its permission and if necessary of preventing this from happening. This is the usual practice today, but it amounts to placing society above the person and exposing the person to the totalitarian temptations inherent in every society. Or else, with the Christian tradition, one asserts that only the human person is destined for beatitude*, and thus that society is at his service to help him to realize his supernatural vocation. Even without any reference to God, society certainly has the duty to attempt to persuade someone whose attempted suicide represents a disguised call for help; but it should give way before the free and lucid will of someone who has decided to put an end to his days.

The Bible* mentions few suicides (Abimelek [Jgs 9:53–54], Saul and his rider [1 Sm 31:3–5], Zimri [1 Kgs 16, 18], Judas [Mt 27:5], etc.). Moreover, the Christian tradition is surprisingly silent on the subject up to the fourth century. The early attitude of the Fathers* of the Church was to not totally exclude suicide (Eusebius of Caesarea, HE VIII. 8; John Chrysostom*, De consolatione mortis, PG 56. 299; Ambrose*, De virginibus, PL 16. 241–43). Augustine*, however, established the doctrine (City of God I. 16–18, 20, 22, 27): whoever willfully kills himself commits a homicide. The Council of Orange (533) denied religious burial to anyone who died by suicide. Toledo XVI (693) excommunicated those who attempted suicide. Modern Churches, however, have learned to distinguish between the various psychological motivations that may lead to this act, and the 1983 Code of Canon Law has lifted almost all the sanctions that affected suicides; their remains can now receive religious burial.

d) Euthanasia and Medical Prolongation of Life. Euthanasia has sometimes been compared to suicide, and indeed, the two practices pose similar ethical problems. The word originally meant a “gentle and peaceful death”; today, “the term euthanasia designates the practices whose objective is to bring about the death of others so that they may avoid suffering” (Verspieren). These practices include acts that actually kill (active euthanasia) as well as omissions (passive euthanasia). In order for there to be euthanasia, two essential elements must come together: a relationship of cause and effect between the act of the agent and the death of the patient and the deliberate intention to seek that death.

Moral judgment concerning euthanasia may vary. Pope John Paul II (1995) has condemned it categorically: “I confirm that euthanasia is a serious violation of the law of God*, as a deliberate and morally unacceptable murder of a human person. This doctrine is based on natural law and on the written word of God” (§65). Conversely, certain Reformed theologians emphasize the “quality of life which is more important than its length” (Thevoz, Baertschi 1993).

On the other hand, euthanasia does not occur if the patient refuses the treatment indicated, against the advice of the doctor. The practitioner is in fact at the service of the patient and must give way before his freedom, even if he believes the patient to be wrong. “The rights and duties of the doctor are correlative with those of the patient. The doctor may act only if the patient explicitly or implicitly authorizes him to do so” (Pius XII). Nor does euthanasia occur if the doctor abstains from undertaking a treatment that he considers disproportionate with respect to the expected results or too burdensome for the patient and his family. Finally, the term euthanasia is totally unjustified when the doctor takes proportional risks (analgesic risks) to relieve the suffering of patients. What is known as the law of twofold effect is present in this context: the administration of “pharmaceutical cocktails” aims at reducing suffering (direct will), even if the practitioner knows that death may thereby be accelerated (indirect will); there is thus no moral objection to the practice. Accompanying the dying constitutes one of the highest forms of love of one’s fellow beings. It sometimes takes the form of “palliative care,” which makes suffering more bearable in the final phase of illness and provides an appropriate human companionship for the patient. “Those who have the courage and the love necessary to remain with a dying patient, in the silence that goes beyond words, know that that moment is neither frightening, nor painful, but the peaceful cessation of the functioning of the body” (Kübler-Ross 1975).

- P.L. Landsberg (1951, 2nd Ed. 1993), Essai sur l'expérience de la mort followed by Problème moral du suicide, Paris.
- B. Häring (1975), Perspective chrétienne pour une médecine humaine, Paris.
- E. Kübler-Ross (1975), Les derniers instants de la vie, Geneva.
- P. Ramsey (1978), Ethics at the Edges of Life, New Haven.
- H. Thielicke (1980), Leben mit dem Tod, Tübingen.
- J.R. Nelson (1984), Human Life: A Biblical Perspective for Bioethics, Philadelphia.
- K. Demmer (1987), Leben im Menschenhand, Fribourg.
- Textes du Magistère (1987), Biologie, médecine et éthique, Paris.
- B. Brody (1988), Life and Death Decision-Making, Oxford.
- R. Veatch (1989), Death, Dying and the Biological Revolution, New Haven.
- B. Baertschi (1993), “La vie humaine est-elle sacrée? Euthanasie et assistance au suicide,” RThPh 125, 359–81.
- Coll. (1994), “Est-il indigne de mourir? Autour de Paul Ramsey,” Éthique 11, 6–99.
- L. Gormally (Ed.) (1994), Euthanasia, Clinical Practice and the Law, London.

H. Ebeling (1995), "Selbstmord," HWP 9, 493–99.
 Jean-Paul II (1995), Evangelium Vitae, Vatican City.
 J. Keown (Ed.) (1995), Euthanasia Examined, Cambridge.
 A. Fagot-Largeault (1996), "Vie et mort," DEPhM, 1583–90.
 G. Meilander (1996), Body, Soul and Bioethics, Notre Dame, Ind.
 Coll. (1998), "Euthanasia," SCE 11/1, 1–76.

B. Wannewetsch (1998), "Intrinsically Evil Acts," in R. Hütter, T. Dieter (Ed.), Ecumenical Ventures in Ethics, Grand Rapids, Mich., 185–215.

JEAN-LOUIS BRUGUÈS

See also Abortion; Ethics, Medical; Legitimate Defense; War

Decalogue

The term Decalogue has its origin in three passages of the Old Testament that contain the expression "the Ten Words," or as more commonly and loosely translated, "the Ten Commandments" (Ex 34:28 and Dt 4:13 and 10:4). Although it is derived from Greek the term does not appear in the Greek translation (translations* of the Bible, ancient) of the Bible,* but it is found in Ptolemy's second-century Letter to Flora, in Irenaeus's (c. 130–200) Latin translation (Adversus Haereses [Against Heresies]), and in Clement of Alexandria (c. 150–c. 215) (Paedagogus [Pedagogy]). By the third century it had become common in the writings of Christians.

There are two versions of the Decalogue, one in Exodus 20:2–17, the other in Deuteronomy 5:6–21, differentiated by around 20 variations. Some of these are minor, but one of the most important concerns the motivation that accompanies the prescription of the Sabbath*. In addition to these two versions, the text of the Decalogue can be found in the Samaritan Pentateuch (see translations of the Bible, ancient), as well as on the phylacteries of Qumran (4Q128–29, 134, 137) and in the Hebrew Nash papyrus (first century B.C.), where it is followed by the beginning of the Shema Israel. These are indications of how important the Decalogue was.

a) Context. The text of Exodus 20:1–17 is inserted into a vast literary ensemble, the theophany* of Sinai, but it cuts the theophanic narrative in two: Exodus 19:1–25 is followed by 20:18–21. The Decalogue, a text that had already been composed and was inserted at a late stage, is thus connected to the covenant* between God* and Israel*. The version in Deuteronomy displays a very similar context. Indeed, the prescriptions of the Decalogue, given by God "at the mountain, out of the midst of the fire" (Dt 5:4), are written by him on two tables of stone given to Moses (Dt 5:22), which are called "the tablets of the covenant" in Deuteronomy 9:9–11. Following the episode of the golden calf, new tablets are given by God to Moses, who has broken the first tablets: he places them in the ark (Dt 10:4–5). The Decalogue is presented as a primordially independent text, distinct from the sets of laws that form the Code of the Covenant (Ex 20:22–23:33) or the Deuteronomic Code (Dt chap. 12–26), yet connected with the covenant, which gives the Decalogue its dimension of revelation*. Moses is ordinarily the one who transmits the divine law*, but by way of its opening formula, at least, God directly communicates the Decalogue to the people* of Israel: "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt" (Dt 5:6).

b) Genesis of the Decalogue. The existence of two versions of the Decalogue, with their differences, is a primary indication that its text is the outcome of a long literary history. The presence of prescriptions of different lengths, some formulated in a curt and negative style, others in a positive style (concerning the observance of the Sabbath and the honor due to parents), and a phraseology that is both similar to and different from that of Deuteronomy, have led commentators to suggest a primitive form of the Decalogue. The solution most often put forward has consisted in "uncovering" 10 short, negative words, although they are clearly hypothetical in nature. Certainly, the existence of such a text would allow us to understand the expression "the Ten Words," but that is not enough to prove that this expression goes very far back in time. We shall simply observe that it is possible to find sequences that are fairly comparable to the Decalogue in Exodus 23:1–9; Leviticus 18:7–17, 19:3–4, and 19:11–12; and the series of curses in Deuteronomy 27:15–26. However, it is not easy to reach the number 10 in the texts just cited. On the other hand, it is possible that shorter sequences existed at an early stage, such as the triad of killing, stealing, and committing adultery, which is evidenced in Hosea 4:2, Jeremiah 7:9, and Job 24:14–15, although the order of the verbs is not always identical. Finally, it is also possible that worship played a role in the elaboration of certain positive or negative forms, as may be seen in Psalms 15:3–4 and 24:4. But there, too, there is nothing that would allow us to conclude that the Decalogue had an origin in worship. Its origin is lost to us, but the present condition of the text should be situated at the end of a long process that was not completed until the return from exile, when the observance of the weekly Sabbath was instituted. The motivation of the Sabbath in Exodus 20:11, which is no longer, as in Deuteronomy 5:15, the commemoration of the ending of bondage, suggests that it is based on Genesis 2:1–3, a text from the priestly redaction. God's resting on the seventh day then serves as the foundation for human beings' resting.

c) Structure of the Decalogue. Because the text of the Decalogue was written, according to the Bible, on two tables, the Ten Commandments have often been divided into two sets of five, the first concerned with God, the second with one's neighbor. This division into exact halves does not coincide with the literary structure of the text. Analysis permits us to discern three parts.

The first part (Dt 5:6–10) opens with the words: "I am the Lord your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." These find an echo in Deuteronomy 5:9: "I the Lord your God." The speaker is God; he first recalls the sign of his authority* and power (omnipotence*), the departure from Egypt, which for Israel was a departure from bondage. God sustains liberty*. However, the divine proclamation is not related only to the past; it is also turned toward the future of a covenant relationship, addressed to a people in which several generations coexist and which is faced with a choice between using its liberty to maintain the commandments of its God or not doing so. This God is presented as a jealous God, thus revealing a love* that is not indifferent to what the other is becoming, a love that punishes and shows mercy.

In the second part, God no longer speaks in the first person: instead, his name is pronounced in the third person (Dt 5:11–16). Here, the person being addressed is the male Israelite with responsibility for a household and for his parents. The observance of the Sabbath is based on the act of departing from Egypt, for which it serves as commemoration. Deuteronomy 5:15 refers back to the beginning of the Decalogue and structures the text around the theme of bondage and liberty.

In the third part (Dt 5:17–21), God is not named, but one's neighbor is mentioned four times. The male Israelite is invited to respect the life, wife, goods, and honor of his "neighbor."

Thus, the Decalogue lays down a way of life and liberty in a condensed style. The number of negative formulas—12 in all—shows that the role of the law is to be open to positive acts, to be developed unceasingly within the framework of the covenant.

d) Scope of the Decalogue. The second commandment states: "You shall not make for yourself a carved image" (Ex 20:4), but it is not directed against all figurative representation. It is only opposed to representations that are made into objects of idolatrous worship. Thus, Hezekiah uses it to justify destroying the bronze serpent made by Moses because the Jews burned incense before it (2 Kgs 18:4). The representations of animals* that could be seen in the Temple* at Jerusalem* had no more than an aesthetic value, whatever they may have signified originally (compare 1 Kgs 7:25, 29).

Respect for the name of YHWH (Ex 20:7) implies a ban on preaching false sermons while invoking this Name and, more generally, a ban on using it without a worthy motive.

"You shall not murder" (Ex 20:13) is aimed at illegal homicide and therefore at the murder of the innocent (the verb in Hebrew is ratsakh). This prohibition is located within the framework of a society* that did not regard the death penalty or war as transgressions of the Decalogue.

"You shall not steal" (Ex 20:15) concerns theft in general, not simply abduction, as may be supposed on the basis of Exodus 21:16 and Deuteronomy 24:7. The prescription has a universal application.

The "neighbor" mentioned in the final prescriptions of the Decalogue may have a limited range, being limited to members of the Israelite community (see Lv 19:16–18), but the term may be given a broader meaning.

Thus, the Decalogue establishes the law as a law of liberty, but it is not the whole of the law. It is addressed first and foremost to Israel, within the framework of the covenant, as is emphasized by the inclusion of the Sabbath, but also to every human conscience, called to recognize the creation as the work of a single God (Ex 20:11).

e) Decalogue and the New Testament. The Decalogue is quoted in the New Testament but never as a whole and never in the canonical sequence. The episode of the calling of the rich young man (Mk 10:17–22, Mt 19:16–22, and Lk 18:18–23) and the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:21–28) offer the best examples of this, for the quotations of the Decalogue concern only one's neighbor. In Romans 7:7, Paul also makes reference to the last part of the Decalogue. In Matthew 19:19, the prescriptions of the Decalogue on one's neighbor are reprised in a condensed manner with a quotation of Leviticus 19:18: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lk 10:27). This presentation can also be found in Romans 13:9–10, where love of neighbor is seen as the achievement of the whole of the law (as it is in Gal 5:14). James 2:8–11 also quotes the Decalogue and makes it a law of freedom in Christ*.

Perhaps the New Testament does not quote the whole of the Decalogue because knowledge* of the one God passes by way of Christ, who reveals God as the Father* and has all authority: "The Son of man is lord even of the Sabbath" (Mk 2:28). The first part of the Decalogue could not but be transformed by this revelation.

- J. J. Stamm (1959), Le décalogue à la lumière des recherches contemporaines, Neuchâtel-Paris.
- P. Grelot (1982), Problèmes de morale fondamentale, Paris, 107–15.
- F. L. Hossfeld (1982), Der Dekalog: Seine späten Fassungen, die originale Komposition und seine Vorstufen, OBO 45, Freiberg-Göttingen.
- J. Loza (1989), Las Palabras de Yahwe: Estudios del Decalogo, Mexico.
- G. Levi (1990) (Ed.), The Ten Commandments in History and Tradition, Jerusalem.
- W. H. Schmidt, H. Delkurt, A. Graupner (1993), Die Zehn Gebote im Rahmen alttestamentlicher Ethik, EdF 281.
- A. Wénin (1995), L'homme biblique: Anthropologie et éthique dans le Premier Testament, Paris, 105–29.

JACQUES BRIEND

See also Covenant; Cult; Ethics; Idolatry; Law and Christianity; Obligation; Sabbath; Theophany; War

Deification. See Holiness; Mysticism; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Deism and Theism

The term déiste, as P. Bayle noted, appeared in French in 1563 from the pen of the Protestant Pierre Viret (Instruction chrétienne) to denote those who believed in God* as creator, in divine Providence*, and in the immortality of the soul (soul-heart-body) but rejected revelation and in particular the dogma* of the Trinity. In English, deist appeared first in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (1621) and was subsequently used by Dryden in 1682. The libertine poem entitled Les quatrains du déiste has been dated to around 1620. Mersenne refuted it in 1624 in L'impiété des déistes, in which he presents the deist as a misanthrope damned by his own pride.

Deist was originally a polemical term denoting an anti-Trinitarian, a person suspicious of the supernatural*, of revelation and tradition*. Such a person demanded rational proofs for everything and relied on a foundation of ancient philosophical religion of a Stoic and Neoplatonic character to justify his beliefs by means of the theory of common notions (Cicero, De natura deorum II) and to insist on the possibility of a salvation* of the just in any religion, or indeed in none. The deist, an enemy of superstition, was afraid neither of death* nor of hell*, for which reason the soubriquet of Epicurean was sometimes applied to him. So as to be better able to attack the deists, their enemies attempted to classify them. G. Voetius (Disputationes selectae, Utrecht, 1648–60) counted them among the “practical atheists,” alongside the libertines and Epicureans, but S. Clarke suggested some finer distinctions: 1) the “Epicureans,” who believed in an infinite and intelligent eternal Being*, creator of the order of the world, but denied providence; 2) those who accepted providence but refused the idea of an absolute distinction between good* and evil* (erudite libertines); 3) those who accepted all the foregoing but denied the immortality of the soul and refused to consider human virtues* as identical to those of God*; and 4) those who had a sound and correct understanding of God and his attributes* but who rejected revelation. The glory of the pagan philosophers was that they had understood the duties of natural religion; the modern deists, by contrast, ridiculed all religion. Ultimately, Clarke made deism equivalent to atheism*.

a) Natural Religion. Herbert of Cherbury, considered the forefather of English deism, never used the term. He defended “lay religion,” which corresponded to natural and truly universal religion. Confident in the power of human reason and suspicious of a revelation seen as corrupted by superstition and the priesthood’s taste for power, he hoped to establish a kernel common to all religions, one that antedated all history* and therefore all revelation.

Natural religion comprised a small number of fundamental tenets: the existence of a supreme deity, intelligent, good, and provident, who was to be honored by the practice of virtue and who demanded the repentance of wrongs and promised reward or punishment after death. Christ* did not feature in it, though Jesus (“an Israelite theist,” according to Voltaire) was held to be an exemplary human being and a model of upright living. The forms of outward religion* were regarded with indifference, after the example of the Stoic adiaphora. The characteristics of this primitive religion, the common basis of all religions, were simplicity, rationality, universality, invariableness, tolerance toward all beliefs and rituals (as long as they were compatible with morality), and the undisputed primacy both of ethics* over dogma* and of the spirit over the letter. One of the generally accepted consequences of this was the subordination of religious power to civil power. Its principal representatives, apart from Herbert of Cherbury, were Grotius (De ver. rel. christ., I), Isaac d’Huisseau, and Spinoza (Tract. theol. pol., chap. XIV).

Natural religion fulfilled various roles for its supporters. For Cherbury and d’Huisseau it was conciliatory and aimed at reuniting the divided Christian world. For Grotius and Abbadie it was apologetic, preparing infidels and recalcitrant spirits for Christianity. Or it was polemical—either against the established religions, considered as dogmatic and superstitious, or against erudite libertinism, which retained traditional religion so as to control the masses while keeping for itself a minimal religion with no strong obligations.

b) Deism/Theism. At the end of the 17th century, natural religion, from being a retreat in the face of religious conflict, became a war machine aimed at Christianity—particularly in England, where, after Herbert of Cherbury, deism was typified by its savage critiques of miracles* (Woolston) and the supernatural. Toland transformed deism into pantheism*; and with Hume and Voltaire the term, which had become a euphemism for “atheism,” made way for theism, a purified religion befitting philosophers.

The word theism appeared in 1740 in Voltaire’s Métaphysique de Newton. The deist, wrote Diderot (Suite de l’apologie de M. l’abbé de Prades, 1752), affirms the existence of God and the reality of evil but denies revelation and doubts the immortality of the soul and the retribution to come. The theist, on the other hand, concedes these points “and awaits a demonstration of revelation before admitting it.” While the deist holds simple beliefs that make no practical difference to the demands of natural morality, the theist accepts the need for a form of worship, even if it is only a prayer* in adoration of the infinite* addressed to the rising sun, as in the case of Voltaire. Rousseau, Kant, and J. Simon returned to the concept of natural religion, although, in the “Savoyard curate’s profession of faith” (Émile, IV), Rousseau expresses the belief that “the life and death of Jesus are those of a God.”

Kant* identified the essence of religion with the ethical imperative “to recognize in our duties divine commandments (Decalogue*).” “Religion within the limits of simple reason,” undogmatic (since faith* provides neither knowledge nor forms of worship) and comprising only practical and unconditional precepts*, was the culmination of an evolution that progressed, by way of the superstitious and ritualistic religions, to a pure religious faith, which joined the conscience* of the moral imperative to the idea of divinity. The universal Church* was the union of all just human beings; it was pure, egalitarian, and free.

In the 19th century, deism and natural religion would survive only as an inspiration for Masonic codes and to fulfill an aspiration toward the eternal and the infinite, which metamorphosed into a “school of religion” within French spiritualism, notably in the work of J. Simon. In the face of both the freethinkers and the Ultramontanists Simon insisted on the right to be at the same time rationalist and religious.

- Les quatrains du déiste (c. 1620), in F. Lachèvre, Le libertinage au XVIIe siècle, vol. 2, Paris (1909).
- M. Mersenne (1624), L'impiété des déistes, Paris.
- E. Herbert of Cherbury (1645), De religione laici, London.
- A. Wissowaty (1676), Religio rationalis, Amsterdam.
- E. Stillingfleet (1677), A Letter to a Deist, London.
- J. Dryden (1682), Religio laici or a layman's faith, London.
- C. Blount (1683), Religio laici, London.
- J. Abbadie (1684), Traité de la vérité de la religion chrétienne, Paris.
- J. Toland (1696), Christianity Not Mysterious, London.
- Derham, William. Physico-theology; or, A demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God, from His Works of Creation. Being the Substance of Sixteen Sermons, Preached in St. Mary-le-Bow-Church, London. At the Honourable Mr. Boyle's Lectures, in the Years 1711, and 1712. London: W. Innys, 1742. (London, 1713) [selections].
- A. Collins (1713), Discourse of Freethinking, London.
- T. Halyburton (1714), Natural Religion Insufficient and Revealed necessary, Edinburgh.
- M. Tindal (1730), Christianity as Old as the Creation, London.
- J. Leland (1754), A View of the Principal Deistical Writers, London.
- D. Hume (1757), The Natural History of Religion, London; id. (1779), Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, London.
- Voltaire (1768), La Profession de foi des théistes, Geneva.
- E. Kant (1793), Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft, Königsberg.
- J. Simon (1856), La religion naturelle, Paris.
- ♦ C. M. D. di Accadia (1970), Preilluminismo e deismo in Inghilterra, Naples.
- G. Gawlick (1973), Der Deismus als Grundzug der Religionsphilosophie der Aufklärung, Göttingen, 15–43.
- Chr. Gestrich (1981), “Deismus,” TRE 8, 392–406.
- H. Gouhier (1984), Les Méditations métaphysiques de Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Paris.
- Y. Belaval, D. Bourel (Ed.) (1986), Le siècle des Lumières et la Bible, Paris.
- J. Lagrée (1989), Le salut du laïc, Paris; id. (1991), La religion naturelle, Paris.

JACQUELINE LAGRÉE

See also Atheism; Kant, Immanuel; Pantheism; Unitarianism; Virtues

Deity

I. Sources

a) Bible. The Greek theotes, or theiotes, translated by the Latin deitas, “deity,” but sometimes also by divinitas, “divinity,” signifies God* considered in his essence. Deity therefore carries a double meaning: 1) the divine essence both in general and in the abstract, as distinct from its creation* but revealed by that creation (Rom 1:20); and 2) divine nature* as it has been united with humanity through Christ* and as the Christian is united with Christ through baptism* (Col 2:9). This second meaning has also been developed in Trinitarian theology* to include the divine essence as distinct from the three divine persons*.

b) Greek Patristics. Theotes played an important role during the major Trinitarian controversies (for example, Cyril of Alexandria, Dialogues on the Trinity III, 465d), and up until the 2nd Council of Constantinople* (DS 421). At that point it signified the unity of the divine substance, its unique and identical nature, its being* shared with the three persons (Trinity*). The term was often used by the church fathers*, the Pseudo-Dionysius* in particular (over 40 occurrences) and John the Damascene, to designate the divine essence in general. It refers thus to God in himself, in an abstract form that signifies the being-in-itself of the divine principle. It also connotes divine providence*, evoked by the various etymologies proposed for the word theos “God,” deriving it from “to see” (theo), or from “to run” or “to burn,” according to Pseudo-Dionysius and John the Damascene. Deity sometimes refers to the divine nature of Christ, as distinct from his “humanity”: that is, the divine essence as distinct and separate from any other essence. This can come about in two ways: 1) Deity can be envisaged as the source from which all creatures emanate, creatures that, according to their degree of perfection, are imitations of a supreme perfection that is peculiar to divine nature. The divine nature par excellence contains all creatures inherently (according to a Neoplatonic interpretation of Rom 1:20). 2) The divine essence can also be considered in its relation with divine persons. Pseudo-Dionysius does not elaborate on this point, except with reference to the person of the Father*, “source of the supersubstantial deity” (DN 2, 4, PG 3, 641 D), but without denying that the other persons also have deity: “the Trinity which is deity” (DN 13, 3, PG 3, 980 C). John the Scot Eriugena’s Latin version of the Dionysian corpus transmitted to the Latin tradition this usage of the term deity.

2. Trinitarian Theology

a) In the 12th Century. In describing the origin of the Holy* Spirit, Saint Augustine wrote: “The Father is the principle of Divinity, better still, of Deity” (The Trinity, IV, 20, 29), so that the concept of deity would become the subject of bitter debate in Latin Trinitarian theology. Gilbert de la Porrée, bishop* of Poitiers (the school of Chartres*), made no clear distinction between the two meanings of deity, deity as a principle of creatures and deity as a principle of Trinitarian processions. For Gilbert de la Porrée the pair God/deity corresponds to the quod est and the quo est, “that which is” and “that through which this is,” inherited from Boethius*, for whom the pair expresses the composition peculiar to that which is being created (in contrast to divine simplicity*). If one disregards the persons, God is thus distinguished by his deity, defined as the principle quo est: there is therefore in God a principle by virtue of which and according to which God is God. But the rational distinction thus formulated, asserts Gilbert, cannot be posited as real in God, who in himself remains one and simple.

Gilbert’s adversaries, led by Bernard* of Clairvaux, criticized him violently, in particular at the Council of Rheims (1148). They rejected any composition in God and asserted that “everything which is in God is God.” They deemed the quo est principle to be like a cause on which God would depend, an anterior and superior principle. And to differentiate “God” and “deity,” they would only accept the grammatical pairing of the concrete and the abstract. Henceforth they would have to postulate that the divine attributes* (eternal, good, wise, etc.) were pure synonyms. But this synonymy would risk depriving each attribute of its literal meaning, which would amount to denying the terms of Trinitarian theology. Accused of heresy in Rheims, Gilbert mounted his defense effectively and competently, but the opinion prevailed, wrongly, that his thesis had been censured. In any case the debate led future theologians to adopt as their motto: “all that which is in God is God himself.” Once the problem was raised, however, it would remain unsolved until the next century.

b) 13th Century. The scholars of the 13th century took up the issue again: because of an improved knowledge of Greek and Arabic philosophy, they had at their disposal more refined logical and conceptual instruments. According to Albert* the Great, in God, essence (quo est) does not really differ from that which has the essence (quod est), but both truly express something of God: quo est does in fact play the role of formal cause. Albert returned to the work of John Damascene, for whom “deity is” signified that through which God is—quo est (Deus) (In De Divinis Nominibus 12, 3, Simon). According to Thomas* Aquinas, one can only form a true language of Trinitarian theology by simultaneously considering both the reality signified and the means of signification (ST Ia, q. 39, a. 4–5). He then introduces in God the notion of causal power and shows, with Augustine, that the generation of the Son must be understood as an intellectual procession implying a presence unto itself. And he adds: “The power to engender signifies id quo generans generat, that by means of which the genitor engenders” (ibid., Ia, q. 41, a. 4). The generating principle engenders in compliance with the form according to which it is the producer and by means of self-assimilation, and the Son is therefore constituted as similar in nature to the Father. Thus, that by means of which the Father engenders is shared by the engenderer and the engendered (ibid., a. 5). And one can therefore say that the divine essence, as an object of divine thought, is the quo principle of generation, the principle of the unity of persons and of their distinction. Father and Son are united through their eternal co-relation in the same and unique divine essence, the principle and compass of the act of engendering for the Father, and the principle and compass of the act of being engendered for the Son. Thus, “the Father is the principle of all deity,” and Thomas notes that in Trinitarian theology deity” is preferable to divinity. Although the two terms are frequently used indifferently, divinity, which derives from divinum, does indeed only express that which participates in deity and not that which is deity through its essence (that is, each of the divine persons: Sent. 1, dist. 15, expos. 2^{ae} p. text.). And to explain the pair quod est and quo est, Thomas has recourse to the fundamental distinction between that which is “by participation” (per participationem) and that which is “by essence” (per essentiam).

c) Meister Eckhart. Taking advantage of the debate on the status of deity, the Rhineland scholar adopted the term in order to interpret grace* as communion* with the intra-Trinitarian life of God (Rhineland*-Flemish mysticism). In a German Sermon, he declares: “The Father is the beginning of deity, for in himself he understands himself, and from him emanates the Eternal Word* which resides within him. The Holy Spirit proceeds from these two, remaining in them all the while, he who is the result of the deity” (S. all. 15, Deutsche Werke, [DW] I, 252, 2–4).

For this distinction without number, without multiplicity, one hundred is not more than one. If there had been one hundred persons in the Deity, it would be necessary to understand their distinction as being without number, without multiplicity, by recognizing One God therein. (S. all. 38, DW II, 234, 3–5)

In the Trinity, deity is anterior in nature (but of a timeless anteriority) to any emanation and to any knowledge that we can have of it. It is the divine essence as a measure and criterion of ad intra processions (S. all. 21, DW I, 363, 10ff.). It is the “chamber of treasures of eternal paternity,” there where the Son is (still) unexpressed and where, expressed, he will return, taking with him the soul in grace like the betrothed of the 45th psalm (S. all. 22, DW I, 388, 1ff. and 10ff.).

Eckhart tells us: “I love to speak of the deity, for from the deity emanates all our happiness. It is where the Father says (to us): ‘You are my Son, today I engender you in the splendor of sanctity (holiness*).’” (S. all. 79, DW III, 369, 2ff.). And to speak of it he returns to an analysis of Thomas, for whom the eternal procession of the Son is the formal and final cause of the temporal mission of that same Son in the soul (soul-heart-body) of the righteous person, who in this way becomes an adopted son. God would not be God if he did not communicate himself (S. all. 73, DW III, 265, 7–9), and it is therefore by virtue of his deity that he communicates himself to the righteous who receive his deity. To be baptized in the Holy* Spirit is to be born in deity in its fullness, where the Father continually engenders the Son (S. all. 29, DW II, 85, 4–86, 8). Numerous formulas of this kind thus followed from Thomasian thought on deity, as both the principle of intra-Trinitarian life and the source of grace.

Eckhart’s interpretation also continued some of Gilbert de la Porrée’s insights, and, through rigorous noetics, justified a complex Trinitarian theology, one that was compatible with the eminent unity peculiar to the triune God. But it was hardly understood, as is shown by a text from 1473 that describes the internal debates among theologians at the University of Paris: “The nominalists maintain that deity and wisdom are one unique and absolutely identical reality, for everything which is in God is God. The realists affirm that divine wisdom is distinct from deity” (E. Baluze, Miscellanea, Éditions J.-B. Mansi, Lucae, 1761).

- Eckhart, Deutsche Werke I–III, Ed. J. Quint, Stuttgart, 1936–.
- N.M. Häring, The Commentaries on Boethius by Gilbert of Poitiers, Toronto, 1966.
- Albert the Great, In Dionysium De Divinis Nominibus, Ed. P. Simon, Op. Omn. XXXVII/1, 1971; id., In Dionysium De Caeleste Hierarchia, Ed. Simon-Kübel, Op. Omn. XXXVI/1, Münster/W, 1993.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 3–42.
- ♦ A. Hayen (1935–36), “Le concile de Reims et l’erreur théologique de Gilbert de la Porrée,” AHDL 10, 29–102.
- M. E. Williams (1951), The Teaching of Gilbert of Poitiers on the Trinity as Found in His Commentaries on Boethius, Rome.
- M. A. Schmitt (1956), Gottheit und Trinität nach dem Kommentar des Gilbert Porreta zu Boethius, De Trinitate, Basel.
- H. C. van Elswijk (1966), Gilbert Porreta. Sa vie, son œuvre, sa pensée, Louvain.
- J. Jolivet, A. de Libera (Ed.) (1987), Gilbert de Poitiers et ses contemporains: Aux origines de la “Logica modernorum,” Naples.

ÉDOUARD-HENRI WÉBER

See also Asceticism; Deism and Theism; Incarnation; Modalism; Mystery; Simplicity, Divine; Tritheism

Democracy

Democracy, from the Greek dēmokratia, “rule by the people,” refers to a political system in which the people* is sovereign. Although often associated with liberalism or socialism, it does not necessarily imply the prevalence of individual rights of liberal democracy or the focus on social and economic justice inherent to social democracy.

During antiquity, drawing on Greek experience of democracy (Plato, Aristotle) and republican Roman institutions (Cicero), democracy was defined as the rule of the many, as opposed to the rule of the one (monarchy) or a few (aristocracy). The modern notion of democracy, however, goes back to the ecclesiology* and political theology* of the late Middle Ages. While a role for implicit consent to political authority* had long been recognized, the notion of government by the people began to emerge around 1250. The reappearance of Aristotelian thought gave credibility to the view that political society* and authority are autonomous and need not be instituted by God* and introduced the notion of participatory citizenship in the life of the city. This led Thomas* Aquinas, in contrast to the Augustinian tradition, to think that life within a political society was part of human nature (De regimine I c. 1). Authority may ultimately come from God, but Aquinas admitted that everyone's consent played a part in the establishment of a political society (ST Ia IIae, q. 90, a. 3; IIa IIae, q. 57, a. 2). Aquinas, however, rejected the theory of inalienable sovereignty of the people, although jurists went further: the Roman law maxim quod omnes similiter tangit ab omnibus approbetur ("that which concerns everyone should be approved by everyone") had been widely used to justify the consultative function of parliaments and to give a significant role to ecclesiastical elections in canon* law. Bartolo de Sassoferrato (c. 1313–57), for example, was bolder and developed the theory of the irrevocable supremacy of the people in the government of city-states. Marsilius of Padua (c. 1275/80–c. 1343) is, however, the best-known person in this regard. For Marsilius the authority comes from the people; it governs the church* as well as the temporal sovereign, who earns his position through elections and to whom the people delegate the power without alienating it (Defensor pacis, Dictio 1). William of Ockham (c. 1285–1347) was more moderate and conceded that the people's authority could be alienated; he thought, however, that the government was merely an instrument serving the needs of human beings originally created free. In general, conciliarism*, based on the theories of canon law, affirmed the supremacy of the church over the popes* and proved influential in the formation of modern political thought. Jean Gerson (1363–1429) and his followers used an analogy: as the general council* has legitimate authority in the church, the representative assembly has authority in secular society. Nicholas* of Cusa used the notions of original liberty* and equality, which are found in patristic and Roman law, to justify the existence of constitutional means of expressing consent (1433, II c. 14); for him, representation is not a symbolic personification, but delegation (ibid. c. 34).

The concept of democracy also owes a lot to the Reformation. The egalitarian potential of the Lutheran doctrine of the priesthood* of all believers was largely obscured by the invisibility attributed to the true church and its practical subordination to political authority. Calvinism*, on the other hand, played a major part in the development of the democratic thought because of the emphasis it placed on the idea of the covenant* as the foundation of ecclesial and political society. Particularly important contributions also came from the 16th-century Thomist revival among Dominicans, such as F. de Vitoria (c. 1485–1546) and D. de Soto (1494–1560), and Jesuits, such as Bellarmine* and Suarez*. These authors elucidated and systematized the Thomist doctrine of the naturalness of political society; that is, a doctrine implying that all men are originally social, free, and equal beings, which is essential to political consent. For Suarez, this meant that originally there had been a direct democracy (si non mutaretur, democratica esset, "if there had been no change, [society] would be democratic"; Defensio fidei III, 2, 9) but also complete alienation of power when choosing a prince (non est delegatio sed quasi alienatio, "it is not a delegation but almost an alienation"; De leg. III, 4, 1).

At the end of the 16th century, Huguenot writers thought that opposition to authority could be justified in some cases, which they proved by using Calvinist arguments to reconcile some resistance with the Paulinian notion of authority established by God (Rom 13:1–7). Some of them additionally used the analyses of the late Scholastics, especially the Vindiciae contra tyrannos (1579), which states that the prince is established both by God and constituted by the general consent of the people by means of a contract (pactum) between the people and him. Similar ideas can be found in Theodore de Beza (1519–1605). More revolutionary, the Scottish theorist George Buchanan (1506–82) rejected the Thomist notion of the irrevocable alienation of the people's authority as well as the Calvinist concept of covenant (foedus) between the people and God. Among the 17th-century English Levellers, who believed in the equality of all before God, an egalitarian theory of the sovereignty of the people finally appeared—a multitude of equal individuals to whom sovereignty is reverted if the prince were tyrannical. Locke (1632–1704) would formulate the classic expression of such ideas.

The Catholic Church's opposition to the rationalism* and anti-clericalism of the French Revolution* strengthened its misgivings about democracy. The popes rejected the attempts by "liberal Catholicism" (especially from Lamennais [1782–1854]) to renew Catholicism* with the separation of church and state, recognition of freedom of conscience*, and universal suffrage. They condemned all liberal and democratic ideas (Mirari vos, 1832, Singulari nos, 1834, Quanta cura, 1864, and the Syllabus, 1864). Under these circumstances, the concept of the authority of the prince coming from God was abandoned, and so were the potentially revolutionary notions of original freedom and equality, in favor of a “designation” theory in which authority is immediately granted by God while popular consent merely designates its bearer (Rommen 1945).

Democratic thought would be renewed in 20th-century Catholicism, especially thanks to Jacques Maritain (1882–1973), whose ideas inspired Christian Democratic political parties after World War II (Fogarty 1957). In its official teaching, the Catholic Church stated the right of citizens to “contribute to the common good” (Pacem in terris, 1963) and to “participate freely and actively in establishing the constitutional bases of a political community” (Gaudium et spes, 1965). It also warned against some of the dangers of democracy, especially the “risk of an alliance between democracy and ethical relativism” (Veritatis splendor; 1994). In Protestant thought, prominent theologians defended democracy against totalitarianism, including Karl Barth*, Emil Brunner (1889–1966), and Dietrich Bonhoeffer*, or in the United States Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971). Niebuhr thought that “Man’s capacity for justice makes democracy possible; but man’s inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary” (1944). At the end of the 20th century, the many forms of political theology seemed to find that democratic institutions, in any shape, were the best of all possibilities (Gruchy 1995).

- Marsile de Padoue, Defensor pacis (1324), Ed. R. Scholz, Hanover, 1932.

- Nicholas of Cusa, De concordantia catholica (1433), in Nicolai Cusani Opera omnia, Ed. G. Kallen, vol. 14, Hamburg, 1959–68.
- F. Suarez, Tractatus de legibus ac Deo legislatore (1612), Ed. L. Perena, V. Abril, P. Suner, Madrid-Coimbra, 1971–81.
- J. Locke, Two Treatises of Government (1690), Ed. P.L. Laslett, Cambridge, 1960.
- Thomas Aquinas, De regimine principum ad regem Cypri.
- ♦ J. Maritain (1936), Humanisme intégral, Paris; id. (1951), Man and the State, Chicago.
- R. Niebuhr (1944), The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness, New York.
- H. Rommen (1945), The State in Catholic Thought, Saint-Louis, Miss.
- Y. Simon (1951), Philosophy of Democratic Government, Chicago.
- M. Fogarty (1957), Christian Democracy in Western Europe, 1820–1853, London.
- J. Quillet (1970), La philosophie politique de Marsile de Padoue, Paris.
- Coll. (1974), Les catholiques libéraux au XIXe siècle, Collection du Centre d’histoire du catholicisme, Grenoble.
- G. Mairet (1986), “Marsile de Padoue, Le défenseur de la paix,” Paris, DOPol, 525–28.
- B. Roussel, G. Vincent (1986), “Th. de Bèze, Du droit des magistrats,” DOPol, 85–90 (bibl.).
- J. de Gruchy (1995), Christianity and Democracy, Cambridge.
- S. Veca (1996), “Démocratie,” DEPhM, 367–73.

ROBERT SONG

See also Church and State; Freedom, Religious; Law and Christianity; Law and Legislation; Revolution; Society

Demons

1. Bible

a) Old Testament and Postbiblical Literature. As with angels*, biblical demonology assumes the contribution of anterior civilizations but imposes on it three corrections: the reduction of the demons to the created status, the attribution of their perversity to their own liberty*, and the subordination of their action to divine permission.

In contrast with prebiblical times, the texts that take place before the Exile are rather austere. These offer allusions to the demons Azazel (Lv 16:8, 26), Lilith (Is 34:14), Rahab (Ps 89:11, Is 51:9), and Leviathan (Is 27:1), but the literary genre used does not encourage seeing these demons as real beings, no more than the “bad spirit” that agitates people (1 Kgs 22:22f.; 1 Sm 16:14–6, 16:23). Even Satan, the Accuser, the Adversary, the Slanderer (Septuagint: diabolos, Vulgate: diabolus, devil), qualified as “Son of God” in Job (1:6–12; 2:1–7), and the harmful and tempting serpent in Genesis (3:1–5), even though cursed by God* at the end of the narrative* (3:14f.), are not at first presented as demons. They are, however, after Exile (Zec 3:1f.; Wis 2:24; Tb 3:8, 17; the demon Asmodeus; 1 6:14). Isaiah 14:12ff. seems to adapt for the king of Babylon the tradition of a fabulous spirit named Lucifer, fallen because vanquished by God. Because of their malice, the demons are associated with infirmities and illnesses and are situated in the desert, the region of thirst and barren desolation. Postbiblical and Qumran writings, with their exacerbated apocalypticism (apocalyptic* literature), use obscure symbolism. In Qumran, the opposition is categorical between the Spirit of Light and the Spirit of Perversity or Darkness, and between God presiding over the army of the sons of God and the demons as the sons of Satan or Belial. Islam offers a demonology and suggests a crowd of evil spirits, such as Ifrit, Shaitan, Harut, and Marut, as well as the djinns, all ruled by Iblis, the main rebellious angel.

b) New Testament. The personification of Satan (37 occurrences), also called the devil (36 occurrences) or the enemy (Mk 1:13; 4:13–20; Mt 13:25, 28, 39; Lk 10:19; Acts 13:10; Rev 12:9, 20:2f.), is now clear. Satan is evil par excellence (Mt 13:19, 13:38; 1 Jn 2:13f.; Eph 6:16), he is the tempter (Mt 4:1–11; Lk 4:1–13; 1 Thes 3:5), the prince of this world (Jn 12:31, 14:30, 16:11) or the “god of this world” (2 Cor 4:4; Eph 2:2), and also Beelzebub “prince of demons” (Lk 11:15; Mk 3:22; Mt 10:25, 12:24–27; 2 Cor 11:14). Head of a group of followers (Mt 25:41), he tempts Jesus* himself (Mt 4:1–10) as well as Peter* and the disciples (Mt 16:23; Lk 22:31). As the liar and murderer (Jn 8:43f.), his most noxious influence is manifested in his obstinate refusal to receive Christ* the Revelator. But Christ vanquishes demons. He threatens them and gives them orders (Mk 5:9), and he reveals the proximity to the Kingdom* of God by chasing them and healing illnesses and infirmities (Mk 3:22–27; Mt 8:16f.; Lk 4:40f, 6:18f, 8:2, 27–13, 13:16) by virtue of the power he confides in his apostles* (Mk 16:17f.; Acts 5:16, 19:12).

2. Theology

a) Liturgy and Magisterium. To continue Christ’s victory over the demon and the demons, the Church* practiced, from its inception, exorcism* during the liturgy of baptism* or, following a codified ritual, in the case of possession. In 543 a synod* of Constantinople declared, against the Origenism that postulated a demon’s final repentance (apocatastasis*), that the free aversion to it was radical and definitive and that hell was therefore eternal for him (DS 409, 411). Against Manicheism* and Priscillianism, the first Council of Braga (561) cautioned that the devil had been created by God in a state of excellence (DS 455, 457).

b) Fathers. Irenaeus*, like other Fathers*, fought the dualist and Gnostic positions on evil* and the devil.

The Sayings of the desert fathers (monachism [monasticism*]) colorfully narrate their fight against the demons. Gregory* of Nazianzus viewed Satan’s fault as a sin of pride, and this opinion won over the fable of a sexual sin committed by fallen angels with women (woman*). Augustine* recalls that the devil became hardened in evil and corrects in his Revisions (II, 30) his earlier account on the possibility of demons directly knowing human thoughts, which he had previously stated. He attributed to them only the possibility of inferring, based on hints, our inner lives.

c) Medieval Theology. In the Fathers’ wake, Hugh of Saint Victor (school of Saint* Victor) claimed in the twelfth century that the demon’s pride was based on his desire to be equal to God (see Gn 3:5). Peter Lombard (around 1100–1160) summarized the principal theses of patristic demonology, especially those of Augustine. Theologians of the following century, notably Bonaventure* and Albert the Great*, advanced the subject. Thomas* Aquinas eliminated all anthropomorphism* in order to hold on to the realm of the intellect and will. His positions can be summarized as such: God submits all created subjects to the test of temptation by assuring him the grace of being able to resist it so that, with man, the demon cannot do anything against the will, which remains free. One cannot attribute to the demon the desire to be equal to God, because, being of superior intelligence, he knows that such a pretension is outrageous for any creature. In the will of the spiritual essence of the angel there is no natural inclination toward evil, because only good* solicits it; the nature of the revolted angel, made only by the Creator, remains, as taught by Pseudo-Dionysius*, intact and admirable, it is his person that is perverted and cast into misfortune and spiritual sufferance by the refusal of that ultimate good, which is God’s own beatitude* offered as a gift of grace. Lastly, concerning the problem of the moment of the fall of the supreme angels, Satan or Lucifer, argued by previous authors, Thomas studied the nature of intelligence and angelical will and the duration characteristic of the pure spirit. According to him, the angel first discovers the limits of his own perfection, which, even if eminent in the created register, does not include the absolute fullness of knowledge and love that pertains to God. The angel realizes that it is possible, by renouncing himself as rule and criteria, to receive this fullness through the divine offer to share by grace the infinite beatitude that belongs to the Trinitarian life (Trinity*). Faced with this invitation of grace, the evil angel did, in an ulterior moment, freely and definitively confine himself to his own noetic and volitive limits. Thus, he deprived himself of the coherence and radical unity that the communion* to the rule and ultimate measure of truth would have brought him. Thus deprived of what would have confirmed him in his own excellence, all that he is and all that he does turns in obscurity and hate. As such, the fire of hell is essentially a pain that cripples the person created by his own will and in his own darkened intelligence.

d) Modern Times. Thomas Aquinas's analysis, much like other "demonologies," depends on his doctrine of angels, which itself depends on anthropology*. It was accepted, nuanced, or rejected after him depending on the degree of agreement with his own fundamental principles. After Suarez*'s attempt at synthesis, there were few developments of the doctrine in Catholicism*, and from the 18th century the traditional conception recoiled in Protestantism* (LThK 3, III, 4). Modernity, which already had trouble considering seriously the idea of angel, most often dismissed the demon as a mythological superstition, and theologians preferred to remain silent on the subject. So much so that since Milton (1608–78), poets are the ones to have spoken about this matter in which the concept is voiceless. One need only think of Ivan Karamazov's temptation (Dostoyevsky, 1821–81), or that of Adrian Leverkühn, Thomas Mann's "Dr. Faustus" (1875–1955), or even of Eve in the Voyage to Venus by C. S. Lewis (1898–1963). Far from being picturesque scenes such as found in the Temptation of Saint Anthony, they show the abyss of the liberty created in the possible retreat over radical evil. It is important to note that in these very different works—and one can think also of Bernanos's Monsieur Ouine (1888–1948)—the demon appears as a character that is both fearsome and insignificant, truly a fallen angel, "an undone person" (Marion 1986). Whatever the psychological truth of such scenes, there is also without a doubt material there for the theologians' thought.

- Anselm, De casu diaboli, Œuvre II, Paris, 1986.

- Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica Ia, q. 49; q. 63–64; q. 109; q. 114; Summa Contra Gentiles III, c. 4–15; c. 108–110; IV, c. 90; De malo, q. 1–3; q. 16.
- ♦ E. Manguet, T. Ortolan (1911), "Démon," DThC 4, 321–409. Coll. (1948), "Satan," Etudes Carmélitaines, Paris.
- P. Auvray et al. (1952), "Démons," Cath 3, 595–603.
- N. Corte (1956), Satan, l'adversaire, Paris.
- A. Lyonnet et al. (1957), "Démon," Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 3, 141–238.
- L. Cristiani (1959), Présence de Satan dans le monde moderne, Paris.
- K. Rahner (1959), "Dämonologie," Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 2 3, 145–47.
- W. Foerster and Schäferdiek (1964), "Satanâs," Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament 7, 151–65.
- H. A. Kelly (1968), The Devil, Demonology and Witchcraft: Christian Beliefs in Evil Spirits, New York.
- A. di Nola (1970), "Demonologia," Enciclopedia dell' religione II, 635–47.
- D. R. Hillers, L. I. Rabinovicz (1971), "Demons. Demonology," Encyclopedia Judaica 5, 1521–33.
- Coll. (1971), Génies, anges et démons, Sources orientales VIII.
- A. J. Wensinck (1971), "Iblis," EI(f) 3, 690–91.
- E. H. Wéber (1977), "Dynamisme du bien et statut historique du destin créé: Du traité Sur la chute du diable de saint Anselme aux Questions sur le mal de Thomas d'Aquin," in Die Mächte des Guten und Bösen, MM 11, edited by A. Zimmermann, Berlin-New York, 154–205.
- O. Böcher et al. (1981), "Dämonen," Theologische Realenzyklopedie 8, 270–300 (bibl.).
- O. Böcher, W. Nagel (1982), "Exorzismus," Theologische Realenzyklopedie 10, 747–61.
- J.-L. Marion (1986), "Le mal en personne," in Prolégomènes à la charité, Paris, 13–42.
- J. Ries, H. Limet (Ed.) (1989), Anges et démons (Homo religiosus 14), Louvain-la-Neuve.
- Fac. Univ. St-Louis (1992), Figures du démoniaque hier et aujourd'hui, Bruxelles.
- W. Kornfeld, W. Kirchläger (1992), "Satan (et démons)," Dictionnaire de la Bible 12, 1–47.
- W. Kirchläger et al. (1995), "Dämon," Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche 3 3, 2–6; "Dämonologie," ibid., 6–7.

ÉDOUARD-HENRI WÉBER

See also Angels; Apocatastasis; Hell; Sin

Descartes, René

1596–1650

Descartes was not a theologian. He repeats on several occasions that he has "never made a profession of the study of theology*," that he has applied himself to it only for his "own instruction," and in particular that it can be learned only through divine "inspiration" or "assistance," that is, according to the authority conferred by the Church* (VIae Responsiones). This reservation itself is enough to indicate that Descartes understands by theology the explanation of “revealed truths that...are beyond our understanding” (Discours de la Méthode). As for commentary on the Holy Scriptures*, he engaged in it infrequently and only when circumstances demanded it, but when he did so it was with a great assurance in his interpretive choices. These choices locate him in the tradition of Bellarminian exegesis*. This is evidenced, for example, by the direct political application of 1 Corinthians 13 and Matthew 18:15–18 as instances of the “laws of charity,” made during his polemic in Holland with Voet (Calvinism*), the Calvinist critic of the Counter Reformation. Following Thomas* Aquinas (ST IIa IIae, q. 9, a. 2), Descartes made what would later become the subjects of so-called natural* theology (the demonstration of the existence of God* and of the immortality of the soul [soul-heart-body]) the matter of philosophy rather than of theology. Indeed, this is indicated by the very title of Meditationes de prima philosophia in qua Dei existentia et animae immortalitatis demonstratur (Paris, 1641; changed to in quibus Dei existentia et animae humanae a corpore distinctio demonstrantur, Amsterdam, 1642). Moreover, the dedicatory epistle of the Meditations, addressed to the faculty of theology of the Sorbonne, draws on the program prescribed by the Fifth Lateran* Council for “Christian philosophers.” However, Descartes is of interest to theology not because of his proofs of the existence of God and of the real distinction between soul and body (soul-heart-body); nor because of his redefinition of the respective degrees of certainty reached by faith and by reason (Regulae III and XII; IIae Responsiones); nor even because of his theory of freedom, which allows man to see himself as the image of God (thesis of the unlimited nature of the will, Meditations IV). His theological interest lies in 1) the primacy he gives to omnipotence among the divine attributes*; 2) the advent of the concept of causa sui, which, on the one hand, derives from this; and 3) from the physical explanation of the Eucharist* imposed on him, on the other hand, by his new theory of corporal substance.

a) The Incomprehensible Omniscience of God. The celebrated Letters to Mersenne, of 15 April and 6 and 27 May 1630, set forth a fundamental and unchanging thesis of Cartesian metaphysics, that of the free disposal of truths, often called the creation* of eternal truths. These truths, whether it is a question of essences or existences, have the same status with respect to God, whose will is their efficient cause: that is, the status of created things. “You ask me by what kind of cause God has established the eternal truths. I answer you that it is by the same kind of cause that he has created all things, that is, as efficient and total cause. For it is certain that he is the author of both the essence and the existence of created things.” It would be blasphemous to subject God to necessity, even logical necessity (the principle of contradiction), for that would be to conceive of him as finite; even his power (omnipotence*) is infinite and thereby incomprehensible. If God can do everything that we can conceive of, he is in no way limited by our rationality and can do what we cannot think of, particularly what appears to us as contradictory. Descartes thus repeats an Augustinian distinction: we can know God but not understand him. And he thereby opposes a vast movement of thought derived from Abelard*, in which the assertion that the wisdom* of God limits his freedom leads to the affirmation both that the divine will is determined by what his intellect represents to him and that divine and human rationality are analogous, indeed homogeneous. This current of thought culminates with Suarez*, who asserts the singleness of knowledge and, as something dependent on that, the singleness of being. Alone in his century, Descartes argued that “no essence can be attributed in the same way to God and to created things” (VIae Responsiones). In the face of this movement, which leads to the “emancipation” of philosophy from theology, we are compelled to locate Descartes on the side of a theological orthodoxy that maintains in its radicality the incomprehensible omniscience of God and stands firm on the refusal to distinguish faculties in God. “In God it is one thing to will, to understand, and to create, with none preceding any other, not even in reason.” However, the three major post-Cartesians, Spinoza, Malebranche, and Leibniz*, were to reject the positions of Descartes and to complete the movement of emancipation by holding that possibilities are imposed on God: that is, that truths, identical for a finite or an infinite intellect, impose themselves on his will. The first consequence of this would be the abandonment, shared by all three, of the doctrine of the creation of truths.

b) God as Causa Sui. It is thus in order to “speak of God more worthily...than the vulgar do” (that is, late Scholasticism*) that the Meditations and the Responsiones (Iae and IVae in part) make of the infinite* through which God is attained in Meditation III (which concludes with his contemplation*) or of his inexhaustible omnipotence (inexhausta potentia), brought together in infinita ou immensa potentia, the supreme divine name. Moreover, because for every being, including God, it is possible to seek “the cause for which it exists” (principle of causality [Iae and IIae Responsiones]), Descartes goes so far as to attribute to God the concept of causa (efficiens) sui (considered unthinkable from Anselm* to Suarez) in order to think positively about his aseitas*. The immense power in God is “the cause or the reason” for which he needs no cause to exist, and because this cause is positive, God can be conceived as the cause of himself. To deal with the objections of the theologians Caterus (1590–1655) and Arnauld (1612–94), Descartes later proposed modifications in the causa sui, presenting it as a “concept common” to efficient and formal causes or as a simple analogy* to efficient cause, but he always maintained the principle of the submission of all existence to causality. He thus made possible, despite its difficulties, an a priori proof of the existence of God through causality, a causality on which is built the whole architectonics of demonstrations and divine attributes. The other divine perfections flow from this, insofar as they are all stamped with infinity: plenary and indeterminate substance, immensity, incomprehensibility, independence (aseitas), and omniscience.

Having become futile, caught as it was between positive theology and mystical (mysticism*) theology, speculative theology was in a severe crisis “when Descartes appeared” (Gouhier). Descartes, in fact, is less one who proposes the services of a new philosophy, the philosophy of clear and distinct ideas, to theologians who have learned to do without speculative theology in order to develop a “simple” (Burman 1648) and effective (“to reach heaven”) theology, than the one who occupies the position of the last speculative theologian. At the very least, his discussion of the attributes of God in the Meditations and the Responsiones forms the last metaphysical repetition of the theological treatise on divine names (Marion), contemporary with the final Quinquaginta nomina Dei of Lessius (Brussels, 1640, posthumous). Bérulle had perhaps engaged the young Descartes in this matter in 1628; in any case it was approved by the Oratorians Condren and Gibieuf (De libertate Dei et creaturae. Paris, 1630). But it was also the tension prevailing in the architecture of divine names among infinity, perfection, and causa sui, as well as the primacy of the unconditioned omnipotence of God that the Cartesian theologians (Arnauld, Bossuet, and Fénelon) would have so much difficulty maintaining against the thesis that had become predominant (Spinoza, Malebranche, Leibniz*, Berkeley) of a rationality common to God and his creation, and against its corollary, the demand for a theodicy through which the 18th century would call on God to justify himself. And if Descartes wrote the last metaphysical treatise on divine names, this was probably because he was the first philosopher to be obliged to work at a time in which an established speculative theology using a philosophically convincing language was lacking.

c) Eucharist. From the moment when, (as early as the Meteors and the Dioptrique [1637]), and if considering real accidents as an unnecessary hypothesis, Descartes challenged the Aristotelian theory of the sensible world, he was obliged to formulate a theory of the Eucharist different from that of the Scotists or the Thomists. He develops it in the IVae Responsiones in replying to the Arnauld’s objections about the mode of conversion from one substance to another in transubstantiation: our senses are never affected by the substance but only by its surface. It is therefore necessary to take into account the permanence of the surface, which, as an intermediary between bodies, is not a quality of bodies themselves (Principia philosophiae [1644] II, art. 10–15) and so can remain the same when bodies change. There is thus a change of substance beneath the formal permanence of the surface. Descartes relied on the Council of Trent*, which used the vocabulary of the sacred species—and not that of accidents (Council of Constance*)—to think of the eucharistic conversion of the bread and wine. The permanence of the movement of the corpuscles of the bread and wine, entirely explicable by the forms and movements of the particles of matter, before and after their conversion, assures the phenomenal invariance of the surface and hence of sensory perception. The letter to Mesland of 9 February 1645, which is more problematic, elaborated on what concerns the mode of presence of the body of Christ* in the Eucharist. The Cartesian physical explanation of the Eucharist was taken up and extended by Maignan (1601–76), Desgabets (1610–78), and Cally (1630–1709). With this doctrine, Descartes had been less concerned with doing theology than in rigorously developing his theory of substance. This is why the Eucharist—his explanation of which he submitted to the authority* of the Church (several faculties of theology censured it in the last third of the 17th century)—constituted nothing more, and nothing less, than a crucial experiment in the new theory of sensation.

- For the years 1800–1960, G. Sebba, Bibliographia cartesiana: A Critical Guide to the Descartes Literature, The Hague, 1964. For the 1970s, le Bulletin cartésien, annual bibl. published in ArPh, 1972–.
- Œuvres de Descartes, Eds. C. Adam, P. Tannery (A-T), Rev. by P. Costabel, B. Rochot, 11 vols., Paris, 1964–74.
- ◆ É. Gilson (1913), La liberté chez Descartes et la théologie, Paris.
- A. Koyré (1922), Essai sur l'idée de Dieu et les preuves de son existence chez Descartes, Paris.
- H. Gouhier (1924), La pensée religieuse de Descartes, Paris (2nd Ed., 1972); id. (1962), La pensée métaphysique de Descartes, Paris; id. (1978), Cartésianisme et augustinisme au XVIIe siècle, Paris.

- J.-R. Armogathe (1977), Theologia cartesiana: L'explication physique de l'Eucharistie chez Descartes et dom Desgabets, The Hague.
- J.-L. Marion (1981), Sur la théologie blanche de Descartes, Paris; id. (1986), Sur le prisme métaphysique de Descartes, Paris; id. (1996), Questions cartésiennes II, Paris, I. II.
- G. Rodis-Lewis (1985), Idées et vérités éternelles chez Descartes et ses successeurs, Paris.
- V. Carraud (1989), "Descartes et la Bible," in J.-R. Armogathe (Ed.), Le Grand Siècle et la Bible, Paris, 277–91; id. (1993), "Descartes: le droit de la charité," in G. Canziani, Y.C. Zarka (Ed.), L'interpretazione nei secoli XVI e XVII, Milan, 515–36; id. (1996), "Arnauld théologien cartésien? Toute-

- puissance, liberté d'indifférence et création des vérités éternelles," XVIIe siècle, 191, 259–73.
- R. Ariew, M. Grene (Ed.) (1995), Descartes and His Contemporaries, Chicago.
- J. Biard (Ed.) (1997), Descartes et le MA, Paris.

VINCENT CARRAUD

See also Asceticism; Attributes, Divine; Bérulle, Pierre de; Conversion; Eucharist; Existence of God, Proofs of; Lateran V, Council; Mysticism; Natural Theology; Omnipotence, Divine; Soul-Heart-Body; Suarez, Francisco; Trent, Council of

Descent into Hell

a) Biblical References. To elaborate on the theme of Christ's descent into hell*, two kinds of scriptural reference are generally put forward: 1) Certain passages seek to express the humiliation of the Son in all its reality, according to the descent/exaltation model outlined in Philippians 2:5–11, and assert that he spent "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Mt 12:40), and that " 'He ascended' means that he had also descended into the lower parts of the earth" (Eph 4:9). Clearly these formulas refer to more than the entombment of Jesus*. The very word Sheol (hell*) is used to describe the final destination of this descent, but in a quotation of Psalms 16:10 used in Acts 2:27 (see also Rev 1:18, "I have the keys of Death and Hades," keys that Christ holds only because he went down that far). 2) Other texts speak of Christ's "visit," both a struggle and a foreshadowing, to the "dead" (1 Pt 4:6), of "spirits in prison" (1 Pt 3:19, "he went and proclaimed to the spirits in prison"), in order to tear them away from the "gates of hell" (Mt 16:18). The interpretation of 1 Peter 3:19 that sees therein an allusion to fallen angels (demons*) is not certain. Perhaps the description of tombs opening at the death of Christ in Matthew 27:51ff. is connected with this theme. 3) There is one last category, that is, texts that speak simply of a return from the place of the dead: " 'Who will descend into the abyss?' (that is, to bring Christ up from the dead)" (Rom 10:7); or "the God of peace who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus" (Heb 13:20).

These discreet affirmations would be elaborated in the early Judeo-Christian communities, to which intertestamentary literature (intertestament*) could provide an entire stock of speculations on the fate of people in Sheol (1 Hen., 4 Esd.). This is evident in the work Shepherd by Hermas (Sim. 9:16, 5), in certain apocryphal Gospels* (The Gospel of Nicodemus, The Gospel of Peter), and in Justin and Irenaeus of Lyons*, who mention an apocryphal text that they attribute at times to Isaiah, at times to Jeremiah: "The Lord God, the holy one of Israel, remembered his dead who slept in the earth of the tomb, and he came down to them to announce the good news of salvation*."

The imagery gained force, and writers claimed the presence at this event of John the Baptist and, counter to all chronology, that of the apostles*.

b) Patristic Theology. In the patristic literature devoted to the descent into hell from the time of Ignatius of Antioch, the central theme has been soteriological. Unlike the Gnostic hyper-spiritualization of Christianity, the stress is placed upon the reality of a death that leads to the knowledge of the state of death and the state of the dead. It was on this condition that Christ could hold the key "to death and to the afterlife." A theology* of the universality of salvation was soon added to this, according to which the descent into hell allowed Christ to meet with all of humanity who had died before the proclamation of the gospel and to offer them the remission of their sin* (Irenaeus of Lyons, Adv. Haer. 4, 27, 2).

The introduction of the formula et descendit ad inferna in the baptismal confession of faith* must be situated within this context. Absent from the Creed of Nicaea–Constantinople, it appeared in Semi-Arian formulations of faith of the mid-fourth century (Councils of Sirmium [PG 26, 693a] and of Nicaea [Theodoret, HE, 2, 21–4], 359), then more clearly at the end of the century in Aquila’s version of the Apostles’ Creed (DH 16) and gradually in various formulas of faith (see DH 23, 27s, 30, 76). From that time onward it would be part of the received text of the Apostles’ Creed.

Debate then moved into the domain of Christology, raising the issue of Christ’s human soul (soul-heart-body) (which enters hell alone, since his body [soul-heart-body] is in the tomb), and this some time before the Apollinarian dispute. Hippolyte, for example, speaks of the arrival of Christ in hell as of the presence of “a soul with souls” (Fr. pasch. 3, PG 10, 701A). Omitted by Athanasius of Alexandria* (Ad Epct. 5, PG 26, 1060), Hilary* of Poitiers, and Ambrose* of Milan, who attributed the descent into hell directly to the Word*, the mediation of the created soul of Christ later reappeared (Didymus, In Ps., PG 39, 1233A–C).

In the East as well as in the West, sacred iconography has assured the theme of the descent into hell a wide distribution: Christ is represented as breaking down the portals of death, crushing Satan, and taking Adam*, Eve, and (more or less recognizable) the patriarchs by the hand.

c) Medieval Theology. Medieval systematians were interested not so much in the identity of the dead liberated by Christ on Holy Saturday as in the precise terms of that liberation. From the time of Saint Augustine*, it has been more or less agreed that this liberation was granted to the just of the Old Testament. They suffered no punishment* for any personal failing, and were already justified by the faith that they had, in advance, in the one who was to come (according to Jn 8:56). Deprived of the vision of God by virtue of original sin, they were now to be liberated from that deprivation (Saint Thomas* of Aquinas, ST IIIa, q. 52, a. 5). As for the preaching* mentioned in 1 Peter 3:19, this could not be understood as a postmortem activity by Christ, but referred to the apostolic action that he exerted through the Church*.

In addition, the vocabulary increased in precision. Other words gradually came to replace the Hebrew terms Gehenna and Sheol, the former designating the lamentable fate of the outcast and the latter the waiting place of all the dead, just or unjust. Hell (which tended to be used in the singular by writers of French—enfer instead of enfes—and increasingly demonic in quality) became the place of the damned, while Limbo* came to refer most often to the waiting place (the “Limbo of the Fathers”), sometimes represented—as in Dante*’s Divine Comedy—by a circle on the periphery of hell proper.

d) Contemporary Reevaluation. The descent into hell has recently been the subject of a reevaluation in the work of Hans Urs von Balthasar*. Under the influence of the experiences of Adrienne von Speyr (mystically linked to the Passion* of Christ, on Good Friday she would experience a form of empathetic suffering that increased on Holy Saturday), Balthasar gives this theme a central place. In his treatment of the mystery of Easter he calls it the expression of the “display of the effects of the cross in the abyss of mortal perdition.” He explicitly rejects the idea of any triumphant activity of Christ in hell and seeks on the contrary to discern in the descensus an ultimate passivity: “the dead being of the Son of God.” His reflections upon the “final place” evoke motifs already present at the time of the Reformation in Anabaptist and mystico-spiritualist theologies, which considered this episode to be the lowest point of Christ’s journey. The Calvinist catechism of Heidelberg, moreover, opposed such motifs to the traditional concept upheld by the Lutheran Formula of Concord. For Balthasar, however, the interpretation of the descent into hell is not merely one theological thesis among others. Rather, it is the structural axis of his entire theology, and it will not be possible to deliver a definitive judgment on it until the principles applied have been made the object of theological and ecclesiastical reception. In any case one can emphasize that this interpretation amounts less to a mediating of the opposition between the Origenist (universal salvation: *apocatastasis) and the Augustinian concepts (salvation reserved for a small number) than to an almost total reevaluation of the traditional concept. This entails a reinterpretation, and an unprecedented expansion, of the notion of kenosis, as well as a new definition of sin as situated halfway between evil committed (moral evil) and evil suffered (physical evil).

- J. Daniélou (1958), Théologie du judéo-christianisme, Paris (2nd Ed. 1991), 295–311.
- Ch. Perrot (1968), “La descente du Christ aux enfers dans le Nouveau Testament,” LV(L) 85, 5–29.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1969), “Mysterium Paschale,” MySal III/2, 227–55.
- A. Grillmeier (1975), “Der Gottessohn im Totenreich,” in Mit ihm und in ihm, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna, 76–174.
- W. Maas (1979), Gott und die Hölle, Einsiedeln.
- E. Koch (1986), “Hölle,” TRE 15, 455–61 (bibl.).
- M. Lochbrunner (1993), “Descensus ad inferos: Aspekte und Aporien eines vergessenen Glaubensartikels,” in FKTh 9, 161–77.

KARL HEINZ NEUFELD

See also Creeds; Death; Hell; Limbo; Resurrection of Christ; Salvation; Wrath of God

Desire of God. See Supernatural

Deuterocanonical Books. See Apocrypha

Devil. See Demons

Devotio moderna

Conceived in the Netherlands at the end of the 14th century, devotio moderna was simultaneously a spiritual movement, a series of devotional practices, a certain concept of lay piety, and a particular form of communal life. Gerard Groote was its initiator (1340–84), and disciples soon took up his work through their deeds and their writings. During the 15th century the ideals and experiences characteristic of devotio moderna spread into a large part of northern Europe.

After university studies in Paris and a stay with the Carthusians (between 1374 and 1377), Groote, the son of a middle-class family, decided to lead a life devoted to reading, meditation, and prayer in his Deventer house. It was an austere life but quite moderate when compared with the asceticism* and penances that certain “religious laity” inflicted upon themselves during the same era. At the time of his “conversion*,” Groote had written Conclusa et proposita, non uota. In this he wrote that the experience he intended to undergo was a “project,” sealed by a “promise” and not by “vows” in the traditional sense. To “glorify, honor, and serve God*,” Groote renounced a considerable number of activities, which he enumerated in his Conclusa et proposita. He set himself a program of spiritual reading (from the Gospels to Henry Suso’s Horologium) and regulations designed to encourage “abstinence.” In his “Moral Allocution” (Zedelijke toespraak), he defined a form of spirituality that might be taken up by lay people who remained in the world*. His experience and writings manifest his desire to return to an original Christianity and to create a lay version of the apostolic model.

Groote had turned over a part of his Deventer house to a few young women who did not belong to any religious order but who were “in need of a roof for the love* of God, in order better to serve God there in humility and penance” (statutes from 1379 for the “house of master Gerard”). Moreover, his activity as a preacher facilitated the formation of a first group of disciples, which his closest collaborator, Florent Radewijns (1350–1400) set up in Deventer in his residence. Other communities later sprang up, whose members, both laymen and clerics*, were called “Brethren of the Common Life.” They shared a devout life, where their time was spent in copying manuscripts, in prayer, in works of charity, and, quite soon, in preaching.

Groote had already taken minor orders* so as to be able to recite the Gospels to the crowd and had requested a written authorization from the bishop* of Utrecht allowing him to preach in parishes. Within the houses of the Common Life, “conferences” (collationes) regularly brought together those brothers (sometimes designated by the term collatie broeders) and lay people who wished to hear their semipublic sermons. This type of mission*/evangelization facilitated the distribution of the ideals of devotio moderna. The brothers also shared the habit of taking personal notes while reading from the Holy* Scriptures and the great spiritual authors, and it was from this practice that the rapiaria originated. These were a sort of anthology or collection of quotations, serving as an aid to meditation. Most of the followers composed their own rapiarium. Some even compiled considerable works, like the Rosetum written by Jean Mombaer (vol. 1460–1501), which included texts drawn from his extensive reading. One version of the Rosetum, which would go through several editions, was preceded by an “invitatory to exercises of piety.” Reading had no other purpose than to encourage piety.

It was subsequently Florent Radewijns who gave a concrete—and institutional—form to Groote’s project. There is no doubt, however, that he impoverished his master’s ideas. Indeed, his only concern was to determine a method capable of visibly arousing the devotion of the brothers he had brought together, to lead them to self-knowledge, and to help them to repress their passions*. The brother Gerard Zerboldt from Zutphen (1367–98), to whom is attributed the treatise Super modo uiuendi hominum simul commorantium—a point-by-point justification of the fundamental principles of the Common Life—later endeavored to systematize Groote’s and Radewijns’s ideas. Thus, in his De reformatione uirium animae and De spiritualibus ascensionibus he defined a series of exercises (examinations of conscience*, meditations on the last rights and on the Passion*), which would allow the “spiritual ascension” of the devout. Dirc van Herxen (circa 1381–1457), who administered several of the houses of the Common Life, was the author of texts devoted to exercises of piety, prayer, and meditation, as well as four pedagogical treatises that affirmed the necessity of educating the young in the service of God from the earliest age. Because they had spent less time in the world, children and adolescents were less tainted by sin* and more open to instruction than adults. Teaching was therefore one of the most important activities of the Brethren of the Common Life, who set up schools in several towns. The insistence on a close link between study and (Christian) life, as well as certain pedagogical innovations characteristic of the brothers’ schools—for example the division into distinct classes according to the age and knowledge of the pupils—foreshadowed, at least for some historians, the ideals of humanist Christians and of Erasmus*.

In parallel to the houses of Common Life, Radewijns had opened in Windesheim, near Zwolle, a house of regular canons, which quickly found itself at the head of a sizable congregation. By the end of the 15th century this included a hundred or more houses throughout the Netherlands, the Rhineland, Westphalia, and the north of France. Jean Busch, a reformer of several religious houses, endeavored to disseminate the principles of piety characteristic of the Windesheim congregation (particularly in the Liber de reformatione monasteriorum). Unlike the Brethren of the Common Life, canons were clergy in the traditional sense, living according to a rule and devoted to contemplation. The environment in Windesheim seems to have been more sensitive to mystical experiences than that of the Common Life. Hendrick Mande (c. 1360–1431), who had the reputation of being blessed with frequent visions, wrote vernacular descriptions of contemplation* and of the soul’s (soul-heart-body) union with God. Gerlac Peters (1378–1411), initially a brother of the Common Life, then a canon in Windesheim, took up the defense of mysticism*. He recorded his thoughts in a Soliloquium (which seems not to have been intended for circulation), often finding inspiration in Ruysbroeck, Tauler, and Eckhart.

There were many spiritual works in the 15th century, commending devotional practices and the exercise of virtues*, that historians connect with the devotio moderna movement: the long treatises of Wessel Gansfort (c. 1419–89), for example, on the different methods of prayer, on the sacrament* of the Eucharist* and on the Mass; or the celebrated Imitation of Christ, anonymously attributed to Thomas À Kempis (1380–1471), a disciple of Florent Radewijns and author of numerous treatises intended for meditation. The eight hundred manuscripts of the Imitation (between 1424 and 1500), the printed editions, as well as the reworkings and translations, all attest to the considerable success of this work devoted to the contemplation of Christ*’s humanity. The characteristic ideals of devotio moderna now had a wide distribution. It would seem that even certain Franciscan preachers, such as Pierre-aux-Boeufs (c. 1370–c. 1425/1430) or Jean Brugman (c. 1400–1473) had contributed to them.

The new devotion was “modern” in more ways than one. The importance of personal meditation and inner life, the idea of an “imitation of Christ” through meditation and charity—tendencies that were fairly common during the later centuries of the Middle Ages—were affirmed in devotio moderna as never before. Without doubt, the point worth noting is that the interiority cultivated by the disciples and successors of Gerard Groot was characterized by a great defiance with regard to any excessive or uncontrolled form of piety. The devout were to apply themselves to practices of cautious asceticism and devotion rather than to ecstasy or visions. Their devout life kept them at a distance, moreover, from any “vain science” (that is, knowledge detached from piety) and pure speculation. In this regard, devotio moderna marked a break, not completed in Groot’s time, between theology* and spirituality (spiritual theology). And if we accept that such a break represented one of the characteristic traits of Catholicism* during this era, we must nevertheless strongly qualify the influence of “modern devotion” upon Protestantism*, and this despite certain shared features and despite the disappearance at the Reformation of most houses of the Common Life.

• P. Debongnie (1957), “Dévotion moderne,” DSp 3, 727–47.

- W. Lourdaux (1967), Moderne Devotie en Christelijk Humanisme, Louvain.
- R. R. Post (1968), The Modern Devotion: Confrontation with Reformation and Humanism, Leyden.
- G. Épiney-Burgard (1970), Gérard Grote (1340–1384) et les débuts de la Dévotion moderne, Wiesbaden.
- St. G. Axters (1971), De Imitatione Christi, Kempen-Niederheim.
- A. Ampe (1973), L’Imitation de Jésus-Christ et son auteur, Rome.
- W. Lourdaux (1977), “Frères de la vie commune,” DHGE 18, 1438–54.
- Coll. (1985), Gert Grote en Moderne Devotie, Antwerp.
- K. Egger, W. Lourdaux, A. van Biezen (1988), Studien zur Devotio Moderna, Bonn.
- H. Martin (1989), “Devotio moderna et prédication (début XVe–début XVIe s.),” Publication du Centre européen d’Études bourguignonnes (XIVe–XVe s.), 29, 97–110.
- G. Épiney-Burgard (1992), “Les idées pédagogiques de Dirc van Herxen,” in W. Verbeke et al. (Ed.), Serta devota. Pars prior: Devotio Windeshemensis, Louvain, 295–304.
- F. O. Schuppisser (1993), “Schauen mit den Augen des Herzens: Zur Methodik der spätmittelalterlichen Passionsmeditation, besonders in der ‘Devotio moderna,’” in W. Haug, B. Wachinger (Ed.), Die Passion Christi in Literatur und Kunst des Spätmittelalters, Tübingen, 169–210.
- A. G. Weiler (1994), “Il significato della ‘devotio moderna’ per la cultura europea,” Cristianesimo nella storia, 15, 51–69.

MICHEL LAUWERS

See also Beguines; Carmel; Imitation of Christ; John of the Cross; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism; Spirituality, Franciscan

Dialectical Theology. See Barth, Karl; Lutheranism

Didache. See Apostolic Fathers

Dilthey, Wilhem. See Hermeneutics

Diocese. See Local Church; Regional Church

Diodorus of Tarsus. See Antioch, School of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite

I. The Author and the Dionysian Question

The identity of the person who wrote the Corpus dionysiaticum or Areopagiticum under the pseudonym Dionysius the Areopagite, the man who was converted by Paul after his speech on the Areopagus (Acts 17:34), is unknown. His writings were referred to at the meeting of the Chalcedonian bishops with the Monophysite Severian bishops, which took place at the synod* of Constantinople in 532. Hypatius of Ephesus expressed some doubts on the authenticity of these writings; and later, Thomas* Aquinas himself did the same (see Hausherr, OCP 2 [1936], 484–90). During the whole of the Middle Ages, the authority* of the Corpus's author was founded on the fact that he was part of the apostolic age. The role of destroying that legend befell later to the humanists of the Renaissance, Erasmus* (In novum Testamentum annotationes item ab ipso recognitae, Basel, 1522) and Laurentius Valla (In novum Testamentum annotationes apprime utiles, Basel, 1526). The legend had, nonetheless, its defenders, even in modern times. Koch (Philologus 54 [1895], 238–454) and Stiglmayr (HJ 16 [1895], 253–73) ended up establishing definitively the dependence linking Dionysius to Proclus by showing that Dionysius had used, in his treaty on evil*, in chapter IV of the Divine Names, the De malorum subsistentia by Proclus.

J. Stiglmayr clarified the chronology of the Corpus, which came at a later date than the following events:

after the Council of Chalcedon* (451); after the introduction of the credo, in mass, by patriarch Peter the Foulon (476); and after Emperor Zeno's Henotikon (482). It came, however, earlier than the authors of the beginning of the sixth century, who quoted from it: Andreas Caesariensis and Severus of Antioch's letter to abbot John.

Attempts have been made to identify the mysterious author of the Corpus with numerous figures: Ammonius Saccas, Dionysius bishop of Alexandria, a disciple of Basil*, Peter the Foulon, Peter the Iberian, Dionysius of Gaza, Severus of Antioch, Sergius of Resaina (the first translator of the Corpus into Syriac, a short time after it came out), a friend of John of Scythopolis (the author of the first scholia of the Corpus), Stephanus Bar Sudaili, or Heraiscus, a friend and disciple of Damascius (see Hathaway, Hierarchy and the Definition of Order in the Letters of Pseudo-Dionysius, The Hague, 1969, and S. Lilla, Aug. 22, 1982).

The author of the Corpus was probably, as is shown by his knowledge of the liturgy* of Antioch, a monk of Syrian origin who had a close relationship with Proclus's ideas (see Saffrey, StPatr IX, TU 94, 1966) and perhaps, according to S. Lilla, with those expressed by Damascius, whose courses he might have followed in Athens.

The meaning of the pseudonym under which he wrote is in itself a message: Dionysius the Areopagite was converted by Paul on the Areopagus, and likewise the Pseudo-Dionysius wanted to convert Greek thinking by introducing it in Christian theology (that is why the Sophist Apollonphanes called him a “parricide” in Letter IV); he would thus get the benefit of the heritage represented by Athenian philosophy a short number of years before the closure of the academy by Emperor Justinian.

II. Works and Editions

I. Works

The Corpus, which has been transmitted to posterity, includes the Celestial Hierarchy (CH), the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy (EH), the Divine Names (DN), the Mystical Theology (MT) and a collection of ten Epistles (Ep).

a) Celestial Hierarchy. The treaty describes in 15 chapters the classes of angels* mentioned in the Old Testament and by Paul. The doctrine of Dionysius on the celestial hierarchy has Christian sources: Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VII), Gregory* of Nazianzus (Discourses 28 [theol. 2]), Cyril of Jerusalem (Catecheses 23 [myst. 5]), John Chrysostom* (Homeliae in Genesim and the eight baptismal homilies and the apostolic constitutions [VIII, 12, 7–8]). The ternary division of the hierarchical activity—an activity of purification, of illumination, of union—takes its inspiration, however, from Neoplatonic sources: one can see in Jamblique’s Book of Mysteries and in Proclus’s Platonic Theology the systematization of the notion of triad corresponds to a hierarchy of divine intelligences. For Proclus, any reality similar to the movement of intelligence—which is a movement from establishment, procession, and conversion (monè, proodos, epistrophè)—will be triadic. Dionysius reports on this doctrine to his master Hierotheus, whose writings he calls “second Writing” (deutera logia) (DN 681 B): “theology designates the totality of celestial essences with nine revealing names: our divine initiator divides them in three ternary dispositions” (CH 200 D). It is, however, the Bible above all that he invokes.

According to Dionysius, the ranks of the celestial hierarchy divide into three triads: 1) seraphim, 2) cherubim, and 3) thrones make up the first hierarchy or triad; 4) dominations, 5) virtues, and 6) powers make up the second; 7) principalities, 8) archangels, and 9) angels make up the third (CH, chapters VII–IX).

The first hierarchy receives directly the illuminations of the divine Thearchy (divining principle) and is united to it without intermediary. According to the Hebrew etymology invoked by Dionysius, the seraphim are the “burning ones”; the cherubim are those who are fulfilled with an outpouring of knowledge and of wisdom* (CH 205 B); and the thrones are those who receive and have God* in them (205 D).

The hierarchical order corresponds in decreasing degrees (starting from the summit) to the three activities that characterize any hierarchy, namely purification, illumination, and perfection or union. The second and third triads are united to God through the first one acting as an intermediary, and they receive a lesser illumination. As for the third hierarchy, it connects the celestial universe to the universe of human hierarchies. In that hierarchy, the angels are those who are nearest to human beings, and those who transmit to them the divine purification, illumination and perfection.

Regarding the exegesis* of the symbols used by the Holy* Scripture to mention the celestial dealings, Dionysius develops a whole theory of similar and dissimilar symbols, more appropriate than concepts to allude to spiritual realities that transcend the realities that can be felt. If the seraphim are represented by the image of fire, God himself is named at the same time “Sun of justice” and “Tenebrae better than luminous.” The value of any symbol, on the other hand, is linked to the value of the intelligence using it: the more purified and illuminated the intelligence, the more united it is to God; the better it will know how to rise toward God, the better that anagogical act will be able to discover God in signs and symbols.

b) Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. The treaty first introduces a doctrine of ecclesial hierarchy, followed by a description and interpretation of the six main rites in Christian liturgy: baptism*, Eucharist*, consecration of the holy* oils (the muron), sacerdotal ordination, monastic profession, and funerary rites. Each rite is considered first in its liturgical unfolding (mustèrion), then in a contemplative or allegorical meaning (theôria); the intelligible content of that meaning is released from the symbol being felt, like a stone being released from its gangue, thanks to anagogical and apophatic activity of the intellect.

The ecclesiastical hierarchy, in the image of celestial hierarchy, includes different ranks: the initiators (bishops*, priests [priesthood*], deacons*) and the initiated (the purified, the illuminated, those who are in a state or in a process of perfection, or the monks). The bishops exercise the three functions of initiation, of illumination, and of perfection. Finally, Jesus* leads the celestial hierarchy as well as the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

c) Divine Names. This treaty is made up of 13 chapters: they show the procession (proodos) of the divine names*, starting with the distinction (diakrisis) and the union (henôsis), which rule in Trinity. Having considered God as superessential Cause, unknowable and unspeakable, as the One in the first hypothesis of Parmenides, as Cause connected to all that is, and thus, likely to be known and named, then as the One in the second hypothesis of the Parmenides (chap. I); having shown the union (henôsis) and the distinction (diakrisis), in God (the divine persons*) and outside of God (the processions and the names) (chap. II); having underscored the importance of the prayer* as introduction to the theology of divine names and having conjured up the teaching of his master Hierotheus, Dionysius proceeded to explain the divine names.

It is possible to distinguish: 1) the names that suit the divine realities (596 D), in God: Unity and Trinity (chap. II), and outside God: the procession; 2) the names stemming from the operations of his providence* (596 D), namely a) the etiological names (645 A–B): Goodness (good*), Beauty, Light, and Love (chap. III–IV, 1–17), the Being* (chap. V), Life (chap. VI), and Wisdom (chap. VII), Power (omnipotence) (chap. VIII); names opposed to each other, such as Big and Small (chap. IX), Ancient and Young (chap. X); b) the names that concern the process of principle to the end (937 B): the Almighty (chap. X), peace (chap. XI), that converts everything to integral unity (948 D); and c) the divine names of the Cause of everything (972 A): God (chap. XII) and the One (chap. XIII), “unity of all the positive attributes of the One who is Cause of everything” (977 B).

The great movement involving procession and conversion of the divine names starts with Goodness and ends with the One, which is perhaps another name for Goodness, since Dionysius says that the movement follows the path “from Goodness to Goodness through Goodness.” However, if one notices that the procession of divine names is called “distinction” in opposition to the divine “union,” it can be said equally that the order of divine names by Dionysius himself, starts with Union (henôsis) and ends with the conversion of all toward the One (hen). From Union (henôsis) to the One (hen): such is the framework of the Divine Names.

d) Mystical Theology. This treaty, a few pages long, is divided into five chapters. It starts with a prologue made up of a prayer to the Trinity and of an address to Timothy, to whom Dionysius recommends to raise his spirit toward the contemplation of divine matters. In the first chapter, on divine Tenebrae, he distinguishes negative (or apophatic) theology from affirmative (or cataphatic) theology, and he interprets the rise of Moses on the Sinai as the elevation of the intellect toward God. The darkness of Exodus 20, 21 represents then the absolute lack of knowledge in which the spirit is buried.

Seeing and knowing this “darkness more-than-luminous” is like “knowing that it is not possible to see or know the One who is beyond view and beyond knowledge.” Like the sculptor who “carves” the blocks of marble to allow the shape of the statue to appear (Plotinus’s example in Enneads, I, 6 [1]), it can similarly be said that “by the abstraction of the essence of things, we can praise superessentially Him who is superessential.” Negative theology thus lets the superessential darkness appear by pushing aside what exists. It is necessary to “remove,” “suppress,” or “deny” all knowledge acquired in the contact of what is, in order to “know” the Unknown in the lack of knowledge and “see” the Darkness, which is usually concealed by the light present in what is. Negation, understood as removing or discarding (remotio), therefore has a role that is both ontological and liturgical, in the world of beings as well as in that of symbols: it must push light away from beings in order that divine darkness may appear in their hearts, and it must also lift the veil away from the symbols in order to show divine Beauty.

The negative way rises thus from negation to negation, starting with what is the farthest from the transcending Cause; that is contrary to affirmative theology, which starts with Principle to descend to the consequences that are farthest away. The movements of these two theologies, affirmative and negative, proceed therefore in opposite directions: they correspond respectively to a descending movement (proodos) by the intellect, and then to its ascending movement (anagôgè, epistrophè) (chap. II). The abundance or, on the contrary, the conciseness of the language correspond to these two movements: descent of what is intelligible toward the sensitive, or rise of the sensitive toward the intelligible and even beyond, all the way to the transcending Cause, for which speaking has to stop and only silence is appropriate. In this apophatic rise from outside to inside and from the lower to the upper, the logos diminishes and ends up in silence. Dionysius highlights the opposition between abundance (polulogia) of symbolic discourse on the one hand and both brevity of intellectual discourse (brakhulogia) as well as absence of words (alogia), characteristic of mystical union (chap. III), on the other hand.

This apophatic ascension toward the Cause via the sensible and the intelligible occurs in the last two chapters of the Mystical Theology (see chap. IV: “That he who is the pre-eminent Cause of all things sensibly perceived is not Himself any of those things”; chap. V: “That he who is the pre-eminent Cause of all things intelligibly perceived is not Himself any of those things”). Of that Cause, “there is no parole, no name, no knowledge” (we see once more, there, the affirmation of the first hypothesis of the Parmenide, 141e), and we therefore conclude to its transcendence and its unpredictability. Neither affirmative theology nor even negative theology can therefore characterize the Cause as such: they both remain in the realm of hypothesis, either before it or what comes “beyond it.” The transcendence of the Cause, which is the source of everything, while being simultaneously detached from everything, is beyond reach, indeed inaccessible. God is “beyond everything.”

e) Letters. There are 10 letters, which deal with the following: the 1st with the identification separating real knowledge and non-knowledge of God; the 2nd with Divinity beyond Goodness and beyond God (see beginning of the MT); the 3rd with the divine nature of Jesus, which remains hidden even after the Incarnation*; the 4th with Jesus and his “theandric” “activity” or “energy”; the 5th with divine darkness; the 6th with the refutation of errors to establish truth; the 7th with a polemic regarding Sophist Apollonius, who accuses Dionysius of “parricide” and of the solar eclipse both of them watched in Heliopolis; the 8th with the monk Demophilus, who does not respect his hierarchical rank; the 9th with the symbolism of the Scriptures; and the 10th with the captivity of John the Evangelist at Patmos and his prompt liberation.

Dionysius mentions other works, lost or fictitious:

1) On the Intelligibles and the Objects of the Senses, 2) Theological Sketches, 3) Symbolic Theology, 4) Divine Hymns, 5) On the Angelic Characteristics and Orders, 6) On the Just and Divine Tribunal, and 7) On the Soul.

Finally, several other works have come to us under the name of Dionysius:

1) three letters: a letter to Apollonius written in Greek between the sixth and the seventh centuries (CPG III, 6630); a letter to Timothy on the passion of apostles* Peter* and Paul, in different languages (Latin, Syriac, Armenian, Georgian, Ethiopian) (CPG III, 6631); and a letter to Titus kept in Armenian (CPG III, 6632);

2) an autobiography kept in Oriental versions (Syriac, Coptic, Arabic, Georgian, Armenian) (CPG III, 6633);

3) a treaty of astronomy in Syriac (CPG III, 6634);

4) a profession of faith in Arabic (CPG III, 6635);

5) a liturgical anaphora (Renaudot 2, 202–12, quoted by I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia syriaca, Rome, 1965, 251).

2. Editions

The first edition of the Corpus was published in Florence in 1516. Two other editions were published in the 17th century: the first was prepared by P. Lanssel, in Paris in 1615, and the second by B. Cordier S.J., in Antwerp in 1634 and Paris in 1644. It was Cordier’s edition that was re-edited in the Patrologia Graeca (PG III) in 1857. As for the 20th century, it gave us the first critical edition of the Corpus: it was prepared by B.R. Suchla (I, DN), G. Heil, and A. Ritter (II, CH, EH, MT, Ep). A third volume is being prepared: it will include the scholia in Greek, in Syriac, in Georgian, and in Armenian.

III. Translations and Medieval Commentaries

1. Translations

a) In Syriac. Dionysius’s writings became known and spread very early in Syria thanks to Sergius of Resaina (†536), translator of the Corpus, and its preface writer, who was suspected of being its actual author. That opinion was put forward by I. Hausherr and H. Urs von Balthasar (Schol. 15, 1940). Phocas (end of seventh–beginning of eighth century) started a new translation of Dionysius enriched by personal notes (see Sherwood, SE 4, 1952; Duval, La Littérature syriacque, Paris, 1907; Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur, Bonn, 1922).

b) In Armenian. A translation of Dionysius in Armenian was done as early as the eighth century by Étienne de Siounie.

c) In Latin. Dionysius became known in the West thanks to the manuscripts copied in the East and brought from there. Two studies on Dionysius’s manuscripts are authoritative: G. Théry, in NSchol 3, 1929, 353–442, and H.F. Dondaine (1953).

In 758, Paul I sent to Pépin le Bref the whole collection of Dionysius’s writings. In 827, at Compiègne, King Louis le Pieux received from the Eastern emperor a Greek codex of all of Dionysius’s writings. He requested from the abbot of Saint-Denis, Hilduin, that a translation be prepared. Around 832, Hilduin offered it to him: it was quasi illegible. Charles le Chauve then kindly asked John the Scot Eriugena to start a translation that would be more understandable. It was completed in 852. Around 1140, the monk Joannes Sarracenus, as well as Hugh of Saint Victor, decided to work on Scotus’s translation of the Celestial Hierarchy by making use of the notes left on the margins and between the lines by scholars John of Scythopolis, Saint Maximus* the Confessor, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and a few others. Sarracenus’s translation, very different from Hilduin’s and from Eriugena’s, is more faithful.

The Corpus was translated at the time of the Renaissance by Ambrosio Traversari and Marsilius Ficinus and during a period straddling the 16th and 17th centuries by Balthasar Cordier, Perionus, and Jerome Spert.

2. Medieval Commentaries

Hugh of Saint Victor (†1141) commented on two occasions the Celestial Hierarchy, his preferred text, on account of the importance that it gives to the notions of participation and of symbolism. Denys le Chartreux also gave his own commentary. The most important medieval commentary was delivered by Thomas Aquinas. Finally, during the Renaissance, Ambrosio Traversari (1431–37) and Marsilius Ficinus (1490–92) (see DSp, t. 3, 286–429) gave theirs.

- CPG III, 6600–35.

Dionysius Areopagita, Ed. B. Cordier, PG 3, 1857.

Denys l'Aréopagite, La Hiérarchie Céleste, Intr. by R. Roques, Study and critical text of G. Heil, Trans. and notes by M. de Gandillac, SC 58 bis; les Noms divins et la Théologie mystique, Critical edition by B. R. Suchla, A. Ritter, Intr., trans. and notes by Ysabel de Andia. (English translations: Celestial Hierarchies and Mystical Theology 2nd Ed. [London: Editors of the Shrine of Wisdom, 1965].)

Corpus dionysiacum I, De divinis nominibus, Ed. B. R. Suchla, PTS 33, 1990; II, De coelesti hierarchia, De ecclesiastica hierarchia, De mystica theologia, Ed. G. Heil, A. M. Ritter, PTS 36, 1991.

a) General Studies.

- H. Koch (1900), Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita in seinen Beziehungen zum Neuplatonismus und Mysterienwesen, eine literarhistorische Untersuchung, Mayence.
- R. Roques (1954), L'univers dionysien, Structure hiérarchique du monde selon le Pseudo-Denys, Paris (2nd Ed. 1983); id. (1957), "Dionysius Areopagita," RAC 3, 1075–21.
- R. Roques et al. (1957), "Denys l'Aréopagite (le Pseudo-)," DSp 3, 244–430.
- W. Völker (1958), Kontemplation und Ekstase bei Pseudo-Dionysios Areopagita, Wiesbaden.

- E. Corsini (1962), Il trattato "de Divinis Nominibus" dello Pseudo-Dionigi e i commenti neoplatonici al Parmenide, Turin.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato Christianus, Übernahme und Umgestaltung des Platonismus durch die Väter, Einsiedeln.
- J. P. Sheldon-Williams (1967), "The Pseudo-Dionysius," in A. H. Armstrong (Ed.), The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge, 457–72.
- B. Brons (1976), Gott und die Seienden: Untersuchungen zum Verhältnis von neuplatonischer Metaphysik und christlicher Tradition bei Dionysius Areopagita, Göttingen.
- G. J. P. O'Daly (1981), "Dionysius," TRE 8, 772–80.
- S. Lilla (1982), "Introduzione allo studio dello Ps. Dionigi l'Areopagita," Aug. 22, 568–77; id. (1984), "Dionigi," in E. Ancili, M. Paparozzi (Ed.), La Mistica. Fenomenologia e riflessione teologica, Rome, 361–98; id. (1986 a), Ps. Dionigi l'Areopagita, Gerarchia celeste, Teologia mistica, Lettere, Rome; id. (1986 b), "Note sulla Gerarchia Celeste dello Ps. Dionigi l'Areopagita," Aug. 26, 519–73.
- P. Rorem (1984), Biblical and Liturgical Symbols Within the Pseudo-Dionysian Synthesis, STPIMS 71.
- Y. de Andia (1996), Henosis: L'union à Dieu chez Denys l'Aréopagite, Leyden.

b) Latin Text and Medieval Commentaries.

- J. Durantel (1919), Saint Thomas et le Pseudo-Denys, Paris.
- P. G. Théry (1931), Scot Érigène traducteur de Denys, Paris; (1932), Études dionysiennes, Paris (about Hilduin's translation).
- Ph. Chevallier (1937/1950), Dionysiaca, Recueil donnant l'ensemble des traductions latines des ouvrages attribués à Denys de l'Aréopage, 2 vols., Paris.
- C. Pera (1950), Sancti Thomae Aquinatis in librum beati Dionysii De divinis nominibus expositio, Turin-Rome.
- H. Dondaine (1953), Le corpus dionysien de l'université de Paris au XIIIe siècle, Rome.
- B. Faes de Mottoni (1977), Il "Corpus Dionysiacum" nel medioevo: Rassegna di studi: 1900–1972, Rome.

YSABEL DE ANDIA

See also Attributes, Divine; Negative Theology; Platonism, Christian

Diphysitism

Diphysitism is a doctrine defined at the Council of Chalcedon*, according to which Christ* has two natures (duo phuseis), human and divine. It is the opposite of monophysitism*.

See also Monophysitism

Ditheism. See Tritheism

Divine Names. See Attributes, Divine

Divinity. See Deity

Divinization. See Holiness; Mysticism; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Docetism

The term docetism derives from dokein (to appear) and designates a theological concept shared by several gnostic heresies before it was also taken up by Manicheanism*. It consisted in granting to Christ* the Savior no more than a simple “appearance” (dokesis) of a human body. It represented the reaction of a Hellenistic thought, which bore the imprint of dualism and which sought to safeguard the transcendence and incorruptibility of the divine in the face of matter, considered a contrary principle. Christ, a spiritual being, could not have come in “the flesh*” but only as a spirit having taken on the appearance of “flesh.”

1. Development

During the apostolic and post-apostolic eras, John’s christological formulations, and some of his attacks (Jn 1:14; 1 Jn 4:2f.), or the clarifications of Ignatius of Antioch on the “complete” and “real” nature of the Incarnation* only afforded a glimpse of the poorly identifiable precursors of actual docetism. It was with the Gnosticism of the second century that Docetism would be established.

a) Among the Valentinians. Their system dissociates the Christ from above—an “aeon” issued from the “pleroma”—and the “psychic” Christ produced by the Demiurge. The historical Jesus* bore a body that contained no corruption. According to different schools, the nature of that body was either “pneumatic,” or “psychic.” He had passed through Mary* (per Mariam) like water through a tube: any generation of his body ex Maria was rejected. His “resurrection*” could only be understood in terms of his return to the pleroma.

b) In Marcionism. Docetism was even more radical in Marcionism because Marcion suppressed any idea of the birth and growth of Jesus Christ. According to Marcion, the Son of the superior god, a stranger to the material world, had appeared suddenly, in the 15th year of Tiberius, in an adult body. This body had had no earthly mother and presented only an appearance, an illusion of “flesh.” Through a unique divine dispensation, this putative “flesh”—which was in itself neither passible nor mortal—had truly known the Passion* and death* on the cross. This rigorous Docetism would be somewhat attenuated by Apelles, a disciple of Marcion who departed from his teacher’s thought and granted Christ a body that was real but exempt of birth, borrowed from the substance of the heavenly bodies.

All these christological concepts were accompanied by a same attitude of negation with regard to resurrection: the human body of flesh could be neither saved nor redeemed: salvation* and redemption concerned souls alone.

2. Reaction of the Church

Against these attempts at outrageous “spiritualization,” Irenaeus* and, in his wake, Tertullian*, defended the “rule of faith” by placing the accent on the veritable incarnation of Jesus Christ and on the true historicity of his redeeming act. They strongly affirmed/asserted the unity of Christ, which derived from the conjunction of the divine Logos and the “flesh”—the flesh designating human substance. It is this “flesh” that, having partaken through Christ of the vivifying divine power, would be destined for salvation and resurrection. Tertullian, who vigorously maintained the permanent reality of divinity (deus) and of humanity (homo) in the sole “person*” of Jesus Christ (Adu. Praxean 27, 11), insisted also upon the authentic and complete nature of this human component, including soul (soul-heart-body) and material body, which the Word* received through his birth of the Virgin: it is by taking on a true “flesh” that Christ can save that of mankind and assure them of resurrection.

- P. Weigandt (1961), Der Dokerismus im Urchristentum und in der theologischen Entwicklung des 2. Jahrhunderts, Heidelberg.
- J.-P. Mahé (Ed.) (1975), Tertullien, La chair du Christ (SC 216), Introduction, pp. 11–180.
- A. Orbe (1975), “La Pasión según los gnosticos,” Gr 56, 5–43; id. (1976), Cristología gnóstica: Introducción a la soteriología de los siglos II y III, I-II, Madrid; id. (1990 a), “En torno al modalismo de Marción,” Gr 71, 43–65; id. (1990 b), “Marcionítica,” Aug. 31, 195–244; (1993), “Hacia la doctrina marcionítica de la redención,” Gr 74, 45–74.
- A. Grillmeier (1979), “Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche,” I, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.
- C. Munier (1993), “Où en est la question d’Ignace d’Antioche?,” ANRW II, 27, 1 (especially 407–13).

RENÉ BRAUN

See also Apostolic Fathers; Attributes, Divine; Christ and Christology; Gnosis; Incarnation; Marcionism; Resurrection of Christ

Doctor of the Church

The term doctor originated in the New Testament title didaskalos (Acts 13:1, 1 Cor 12:28, etc.), a charismatic teacher in the service of the early Christian communities. It progressively took on a technical meaning, at any rate from the time of Pope* Leo the Great, to designate the ecclesiastic ministry of the major figures of theology. The doctoral ministry would later take on a university connotation, and there would be many professors of theology, and also medieval theologians, who would be known by a doctoral title. For example, Bernard* of Clairvaux was doctor mellifluus; Thomas* Aquinas, doctor angelicus; Alexander of Hales, doctor Irrefragabilis; Bonaventure*, doctor seraphicus; Duns* Scotus, doctor subtilis; Ruusbroec, doctor ecstaticus; William of Ockham, doctor invincibilis; Gerson, doctor christianissimus; and Gregory of Rimini, doctor acutus.

In 1298, on the initiative of Pope Boniface VIII, the Roman magisterium* began to confer the title of Doctor of the Church* upon theologians who were considered to have been privileged witnesses of the Christian tradition* (see Vatican* II's Presbyterorum Ordinis, 19). The first declarations did no more than ratify what had already been an ancient choice under Latin Christianity, which commonly placed its theology under the protection of Ambrose* of Milan, Jerome, Augustine*, and Gregory* the Great. Similarly, since the ninth century, the Christian East had granted preeminence to Basil* the Great, Gregory* of Nazianzus, and John Chrysostom*.

There are 33 Doctors of the Church. Eight have been recognized as such by tradition. They are: Basil of Caesarea (4th century), Gregory of Nazianzus (4th century), John Chrysostom (4th century), Athanasius* of Alexandria (4th century), Ambrose of Milan (4th century), Gregory the Great (5th century), Augustine of Hippo (5th century), and Jerome (5th century). The rest were solemnly proclaimed (the date of the proclamation follows the century in which they flourished): Thomas Aquinas (13th century; 1567), Bonaventure (13th century; 1588), Anselm of Canterbury (11th century; 1720), Isidore of Seville (7th century; 1722), Peter Chrysologus (5th century; 1729), Leo the Great (5th century; 1754), Peter Damian (11th century; 1828), Bernard of Clairvaux (12th century; 1830), Hilary of Poitiers (5th century; 1851), Alphonsus Liguori (18th century; 1871), Francis de Sales (17th century; 1871), Cyril* of Alexandria (5th century, 1893), Cyril of Jerusalem (5th century, 1893), John of Damascus (8th century, 1893), the Venerable Bede (8th century; 1899), Ephraem the Syrian (4th century; 1920), Peter Canisius (16th century; 1925), John* of the Cross (16th century; 1926), Robert Bellarmine* (17th century; 1931), Albert* the Great (13th century; 1931), Anthony of Padua (13th century; 1946), Laurence of Brindisi (17th century; 1959), Teresa of Avila (16th century; 1970), Catherine of Siena (14th century; 1970), and Theresa of Lisieux (19th century, 1997).

The theological criteriology that preceded Vatican II held that the quality of a Doctor of the Church corresponded to four distinctive marks: 1) sanctity (holiness*) of life, 2) orthodoxy of doctrine, 3) quality and scope of theological work (eminens eruditio), and 4) formal recognition by the Church (expressa ecclesiae declaratio). The first three criteria were also applied to Fathers* of the Church, from whom the Doctors were distinguished by the fact that they can belong to a recent period of the Church and that they can receive a solemn approval (and not a rather vague approbatio ecclesiae).

The fact that the more recently proclaimed Doctors, Teresa of Avila, Catherine of Siena, and Theresa of Lisieux, were the first women to be proclaimed Doctors, and the fact that they were women who possessed no technical competence in theology, incites one to review the traditional criteria. Eminens eruditio, quite obviously, no longer has any relevance here, and the fact that the title of Doctor has also been applied to Mary* in the capacity of “counselor of the Apostles*” also works against that criterion. Doctrinal orthodoxy and sanctity of life also took on a new and richer meaning when applied to those Doctors, in whom one could recognize—cum grano salis—a theoretical contribution (as in Theresa of Lisieux’s “Little Way”), but for whom it seemed of prime importance that they incarnate figures of Christian experience—thus, an “orthopraxy” (Balthasar 1970).

The declarations of 1970 and 1997 (the Doctors recognized or declared before this time were all men belonging to the ecclesiastical hierarchy*) required, moreover, that a distinction be made between the charisma of the Doctors and the practice of a magisterium in the Church (Garrone 1971), while rendering null and void the distinction between the Church as teacher and the Church as matter taught.

The doctrinal role of the Doctors of the Church is distinct from the “unanimous consensus of the Fathers”—a notion that traditionally led one to consider the teaching of the Fathers as infallible insofar as they offered a converging interpretation of the Scriptures (Holy* Scripture)—but the attribution of the title of Doctor to authors who came after the era of the Fathers, whatever limits one might attribute to that era, probably conveyed the desire to allow the Middle Ages, then the modern age, to give their own Fathers (or Mothers) to the Church. But neither the works of the Fathers nor those of the Doctors were meant to be totally exempt of errors or theological imprecision. One should bear in mind simply that their main intention, the body of their doctrine, and the majority of their theses were in perfect communion with the orthodox teachings (Séjourné and Amman in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, vol. XIV).

Thomas Aquinas was acknowledged as having a certain primacy among the Doctors of the Church during a period of Scholastic renaissance, which was above all a Thomist renaissance (see Leo XIII’s encyclical Aeterni Patris, 1879, and also the Vatican II documents Gravissimum Educationis, 10, and Optatam Totius 16). However, the list of Doctors suffices to show that the intention of the Church was never to canonize one, or any, particular theological* school. The Doctors of the Church were privileged masters of doctrine and Christian experience. But the diversity of schools or tendencies within one and the same confessed faith has been a positive element, and one that has been encouraged, of the intellectual and spiritual life of the Church.

- E. Valton (1910), “Docteur de l’Église,” DThC 4, 1509–10.

- G. Marsot (1952), “Docteurs de l’Église,” Cath 3, 936.
- K. Rahner, H. Vorgrimler (1961), Kleines theologisches Wörterbuch, Freiberg.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1970), Schwestern im Geist, Einsiedeln, 14–349.
- G.-M. Garrone (1971), “Sainte Catherine de Sienne et sainte Thérèse, docteurs de l’Église,” DC LXVIII, 25–29.

GILBERT NARCISSE AND GALAHAD THREEPWOOD

See also Fathers of the Church; Loci theologici; Magisterium; Theology

Dogma

1. Concept’s History and Meanings

In current theological usage dogma refers to a truth that the Church* lays down as an obligatory belief. Although in the past, various concepts (“article of faith,” “Catholic truth”) were used in this sense, sometimes in an analogous way, since the Enlightenment era the idea of dogma has gradually superseded them. The term is also used in a wider sense to refer to the truths of faith that have not been raised formally to the status of a dogma (such as, for example, the profession of faith in the doctrine of the Trinity).

a) Secular, Jewish, and Christian Linguistic Usage in Antiquity. In its transitive form the Greek verb dokein means “to believe” or “to decide”: it gives rise to the noun dogma, “opinion” or “decision.” In its latter meaning, “dogma” appears as a technical term in legal language (“decree” or “law”: as for instance in Plato’s Republic, 414 b; Laws, 644 d, 926 d), while in its former we encounter it in the field of philosophy. In Plato, therefore, it can mean, “representation” (Theaetetus, 158 d), “opinion” (Sophist 265 c) or “principle, doctrine” (Republic, 538 c). It was the last meaning that the Stoa picked up and defined by postulating, in opposition to the suspension of judgment (epokhè) advocated by the Skeptics, the necessity of a dogma (Latin decretum), of an unequivocal intellectual understanding as a presupposition of moral action (see Cicero, Academics 2, 9, 27; Seneca, Letters 95; Epictetus, Dialogues, 4, 11, 8 passim; Marcus Aurelius, 2, 3; Sextus Empiricus, Hypotyposes pyrrhon, 1, 13–17). These principles differ according to the philosophical schools.

Although “dogma” is rarely mentioned in the Greek translations of the Old Testament, and when it is it occurs almost exclusively in the legal sense (see 4 M 4, 23s. 26 [LXX]; Dn 2, 13 passim [Theodotion]), Hellenistic Judaism actually used this term to refer to the Mosaic Tradition itself, which was thought to be superior to the philosophers’ dogmas (see 3M 1, 3; Flavius Josephus, Contra Appion 1, 42; 2, 168 Sq; Antiquities 15, 126; Philo, Legum all., 1, 54; 3, 1, 194 passim).

This Hellenistic usage turns up again in the New Testament (see Col 2:14; Eph 2:15), in parallel with the legal meaning (see Lk 2:1; Acts 17:7; Heb 11:23, variant). In Acts 16:4 the disciplinary decisions made by what is known as the “Council of the Apostles*” (see Acts 15:28) are called dogmata. Following the usage of Hellenistic Judaism, the Apostolic* Fathers spoke of “the dogma of the Lord” (dogmata tou kuriou: Ignatius of Antioch, Epistles to the Magnesians 13, 1; Epistle of Barnabas 1, 6) or they speak of the “dogma of the Gospels” (dogmata tou euangeliou: Didache 11, 3). The apologists* Justin, Tatianus, and Athenagoras—as well as the Alexandrians Clement and Origen*—applied the idea of “dogma” indiscriminately both to philosophical doctrines and Christian teachings, with the result that it seemed necessary to qualify the latter appropriately: Origen did this therefore by speaking of the “dogma of God*” (dogmata theou Comm. on Saint Matthew 12, 23), while Eusebius referred to “the dogma of the Church” (ekklesiastika dogmata) with reference to their contents (see HE 3, 26, 4) as well as to the way in which they were laid down (for example, as a result of a synodal decision: see ibid. 5, 23, 2; 6, 43, 2). According to present-day criteria, the decisions about the faith made by the ancient Church councils* would be considered to be dogma, but the assemblies themselves did not choose this term. Emperor Justinian, on the other hand, did name them thus, thereby giving them the same status as the Scriptures (Holy* Scripture) (Corp. Iur. Civ., nov. 131).

The term did not gain ground in the time of the Latin Fathers. Applied most often to philosophical doctrines or to Christian heresies*, they occasionally used the term to designate Christian doctrine. The situation stayed more or less the same throughout the Middle Ages. Only Vincent of Lerins’s Commonitorium (v. 434) gave dogma a central theological position; for him, in the above work, dogma stood for the teaching of the Catholic Church (dogma divinum, caeleste, ecclesiasticum, catholicum, etc.), which provided the standard for scriptural interpretation and must thus be distinguished from the doctrine of the masters of error (novum dogma, etc.). For Lerins, the criterion of dogma is “what has been believed everywhere, always, by everyone.” During the course of the centuries Church teaching might change in its form, but in its substance undergoes neither falsification nor dilution (see Commonitorium 23).

b) Medieval Concept: Article of Faith. In the Middle Ages the obligatory doctrines of the Church and the way in which they had been laid down were discussed, for the most part, under the term articles of faith. Tertullian* had already spoken of the Resurrection* as “the article which embodied the whole faith” (De resurrectione mortuorum 39: CChr. SL 2, 972). It was about the year 1150 that the term articulus fidei appeared in theological literature, replacing the expressions “pars fidei” and “sententia symboli” by which, until that time, the different propositions contained in the confession of faith had been designated. This notion, which at first only meant the smallest unit of a greater whole, received its first elucidation about the year 1230 (see the three “definitions” of the Summa de Bono by Philippe le Chancelier). This effort of conceptual clarification went hand in hand with a thorough study of the obligatory nature of the article of faith: in the first place, insofar as it was a necessity for salvation*, and in the second place, insofar as it actually pertained to divine truth. This double source of the obligation emerged clearly in the definition falsely attributed to Richard of Saint Victor: Articulus est indivisibilis veritas de Deo artans [sic] nos ad creden- dum (ibid.). By “article of faith,” Thomas Aquinas understood truths that 1) are revealed directly by the Holy Scriptures; 2) have great importance for the faith and the life of the faith, to the extent that they are related to humanity’s final end and to the Beatific Vision; and 3) are attached to a symbol (see especially ST IIa IIae, q. 1, a. 6–10). But the articles of faith do not only represent the standard of what the faithful are obliged to believe and the foundation of all Christian teaching. They also constitute the starting point for theology* as a whole.

When the great era of Scholasticism* turned again to the Aristotelian conception of knowledge it became necessary to establish what principles should be the starting points of theology, in order to reach by deductive methods a genuinely scientific knowledge. William of Auxerre deserves the credit for having been the first to have viewed the articles of faith as the principles of theological science (see the texts quoted by Lang 1964). Although the scientific nature of theology remained controversial, the idea that the articles of faith constituted the foundation of theology was not long in gaining acceptance. Even if all the truths of salvation are not stated explicitly in the articles of faith contained in the creed (as is the case of the Eucharist*, for example), to the schoolmen of that period they seemed to be particularly fruitful principles, from which could be extracted all the wealth of the faith. The late Scholasticism of the 14th century attributed not only to the articles of faith but to all the truths contained in the Scriptures the value of a first principle in the realm of theological science (see the evidence furnished by Lang 1964). At the same time, they questioned which truths should be considered to be “Catholic truths . . . necessary for salvation,” and which authority could designate them as obligatory beliefs (William of Ockham, Dialogus, in Koser 1963). It seemed that the body of truths based on God’s revealed authority* of God revealed (that is, divine faith, fides divina, corresponding to the explicit and implicit contents of the Scriptures) formed the nucleus of a more extensive field of truths, which also covered those revealed to the apostles* and transmitted orally, as well as the truths laid down by the first councils or those reserved for particular saints (as, for instance, the rules of the big monastic orders); these truths also possessed, in varying degrees, an obligatory nature. As for the authority to determine the faith of the Church, that was no longer attributed solely to the council, as the representative of the universal Church, but also, more and more, to the pope.

c) Rediscovery of “Dogma” in Modern Times. The Reformation had just revived the controversy about the obligatory doctrine of the Church when Vincent of Lerins's Commonitorium was rediscovered and edited by J. Sighard (Basel 1528). From then on, the term dogma, used in Vincent's work to mean the teaching perpetuated by the Church, gradually supplanted the medieval notion of "article of faith," whose meanings it appropriated. In opposition to the traditional Catholic understanding—adopted once again by the Council of Trent*—in which faith constitutes a harmonious whole encompassing various theological and disciplinary declarations guaranteed by the Church, there was an increasing insistence on the possibility of examining the validity of doctrine. Internal Church arguments about Jansenism*, Gallicanism*, and so forth and external criticisms of the Church from representatives of the Enlightenment reinforced this trend. The modern concept of dogma had its origin in an attempt to unite the different confessions around the central truths of the faith. In this connection, François Véron (1578–1649)—without employing the term dogma itself—spoke of declarations that, revealed by God, are proposed by the Church as truths that had to be believed: "part of the Catholic faith, and nothing but that, has been revealed in the word of God and proposed to all by the Catholic Church as obliged to be believed as coming from divine faith" (Regula fidei catholica, Latin translation Louvain, 1702, reproduced in Migne, Theologiae cursus completus I, Paris, 1839, 1037–112). His contemporary, Henry Holden (1596–1662), referred to such declarations using the traditional expression "articles of faith" but also as concepts of "dogma of the Catholic faith" or "divine" (catholicae or divinae fidei dogma). This usage was upheld particularly by theologians influenced by Enlightenment thinkers, theologians such as Felix Anton Blau (1754–98; Regula fidei catholicae, Mainz, 1780) and Philippe Neri Chrismann (c. 1751–1810; Regula fidei catholicae et collectio dogmatum credendorum, Kempten, 1792). For the latter, the dogma of the faith is "nothing else but... a doctrine and divinely revealed truth, and which has been proposed by the general opinion of the Church as obliged to be believed as divine faith, in such a way that the opposite doctrine is condemned by the Church as heretical" (ibid.).

While rejecting the reductive approach of these authors, neo-Scholasticism itself adopted the concept thus defined (see Joseph Kleutgen [1811–83], Die Theologie der Vorzeit verteidigt, vol. I, Münster, 2nd Ed. 1867: "The Christian Catholic Faith includes everything that the Church proclaims as being the truth which God has revealed to it, and it includes nothing other than that"). Without using the concept directly, Vatican* I defined dogma as a declaration contained in the Word* of God and laid down by the ordinary and universal magisterium* of the Church as an obligatory belief ("Let us add that one must believe by divine and Catholic faith everything which is contained in the Word of God, written or transmitted by Tradition, and which the Church proposes as a divinely revealed belief, either by means of a solemn proclamation, or through its ordinary and universal magisterium" [DS 3011]). The same council introduced papal infallibility*, claiming it as a "dogma revealed by God" (DS 3073). By this action the doctrine became definitive Church usage (see already DS 2629, 2879 s., 2909, 2922, 3017, 3020, 3041, 3043). Still, without using the concept itself (see LG 25; DV 7–10), Vatican II looked again at the fundamental problem before proposing a less doctrinal, more individual view of revelation and of the faith. In doing so it echoed the legitimate requests made at the turn of the century by the representatives of what is known as Modernism*.

Protestantism did not evolve along the same lines. Particularly in his dispute with Erasmus*, Luther*, who stressed the assertoric nature of faith, adhered to the medieval terminology, while disagreeing with the magisterium: "It is the word of God, and no one else, that must lay down the articles of faith" (BSLK 421, 24s.). He remained faithful, however, to the Trinitarian and christological confession of the first councils, not because he granted them any special competence regarding doctrine, but because he considered that their declarations were confirmed by the Scriptures and were therefore correct. The term dogma was then taken into the orthodoxy of early Protestantism in reference to the doctrine of the early Church, but when it came to the body of Protestant doctrine constituted in the 16th century, they talked of Confessio and of doctrina (see Ebeling 1964). After the Enlightenment, within Protestantism the term dogma became the object of a radical critique, the motives of which were partly of a spiritual kind and partly due to historical factors. But, while in the 19th century the Protestant call to subjectivity was in large part understood as the abolition of "dogma" (Baur; von Harnack), Barth* turned with renewed interest toward this concept. He himself defined dogma as "ecclesial preaching*", as long as it coincides with the word of God contained in the Bible*" (KD I/1, 283), while stressing the vast distance that separates this preaching from the word itself. Dogma, however, was widely challenged under the influence of Bultmann*, who demanded a modernized reinterpretation of the primitive Christian kerygma.

2. Dogma in Systematic Theology

Dogmas are for the Church the words that have an obligation. In this regard, despite their specificity, they must be viewed as the manifestation of a phenomenon of universal nature. All communities establish themselves and bind themselves together around certain fundamental convictions. Any challenge to these would threaten to destroy the whole. Even in the state governed by democratic law, where these convictions are based on the consensus of all the citizens and in this respect are considered to be open to revision, such beliefs express the “truth” according to which the community lives and acts. Now this truth, in the historic conditions contingent on its comprehension and wording, can only be grasped in particular and categorized declarations, which a transcendental meditation understands as so many signs and foreshadowings of absolute truth. It is also true of the dogmas of the Church, which want to express the divine truth in an obligatory way. Like all human definitions of truth, they take on an analogical form (see DS 806): that is, they translate only imperfectly that divine truth that, nonetheless, they do not disclaim that they express. In this way dogmas perform an indispensable role in the Church’s community of communication, making possible agreement on truth and a coherent expression of Christian identity. That is what is already clearly affirmed in the New Testament, where for liturgical and catechetical ends it sometimes seemed necessary to sum up the primitive Christian kerygma in a striking phrase (see, for instance, Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 15:3ff.). It is also what the symbols of the ancient Church confirm, as do the doctrinal definitions of the ecumenical councils.

In the last resort this state of affairs is based on the Incarnation* as a structure of divine revelation. God, in Jesus Christ*, speaks in both the historical and the eschatological mode; in the Holy* Spirit he provides permanent witness and the continually renewed acknowledgment of his own communication. The transmission, throughout the fluctuations of history, of the permanent witness of a divine truth communicated once and for all: that is the task entrusted to the Church. It must, for that reason, always abide within the truth (indefectibility*) (see LG 12). The dogmas must not be understood as new revelations but as the unfolding—under the impetus of various forces—of the founding revelation to which the Scriptures attest and that are transmitted by the tradition of the Church (theological loci*). It is not enough to single out such and such a declaration from the Scriptures, for it is precisely over the correct interpretation of a particular statement that disagreement is often provoked. For this reason Nicaea* I had already found itself forced to have recourse to a nonscriptural term (homoousios, “consubstantial*”) to put an end to the quarrel that certain theologians had started about the divinity of the Logos [Word], based on different biblical quotations. The Nicæan Creed, with its corresponding canons (see DS 125 Sq), can be regarded as a dogma before the fact. Over the course of history the Church can be seen to fix the truths of the faith in various forms: apart from the confessions of the early Church, pride of place should go to the decisions of the councils, which either present themselves as confessions of faith (as with the creeds of Nicaea I and Constantinople* I, in particular), or as doctrinal explanations, or as canonical decisions (by means of the traditional formula “si quis dixerit...anathema sit,” “if someone says...let him be anathema”). These decisions are not only related to questions of faith in the strict sense but also to Christian life and to the organization of the Church. With regard to the canons, since Vatican* I it has been thought that anathematization qualifies the incriminated thesis as heretical and therefore defines its opposite as “a divine and Catholic truth according to the faith.” Nonetheless this is not absolutely true of the canons of the Council of Trent, nor even of those of Vatican I. In fact, until the Council of Trent inclusively, it was not only opinions deviating from the faith of the Church that were anathematized but also disciplinary deviations. And Vatican I insisted on condemning not only the heresies that had appeared in the domain of the faith itself but also the errors concerning “the preambles to the faith.” Then Vatican* II abandoned the proclamation of anathematizations, as well as proclamations of dogmas in the strict sense, opting for a type of explanation of a pastoral nature.

Dealing with the doctrinal decisions of the Church, the magisterium assumed jointly by the bishops* and the pope performs a particular role as an authority that bears witness. According to the conception formulated by Vatican I and adopted again by Vatican II, the magisterium has the task of explaining in a definitive and obligatory form the truths of the faith contained in the Scriptures and in tradition. It can perform this task either by means of harmonized teaching by the pope and the bishops scattered over the whole world (ordinary teaching) or by a particular decision of a council or of the pope (universal teaching) (see LG 25; CIC 1983, can. 749). For believers, it is not only a question of accepting these dogmas obediently: in the present age, theology stresses the role of a more active reception of the doctrinal declarations (see Beinert 1991).

The idea of “dogma,” in the form in which it emerged by means of the theologians of the Enlightenment era, aimed rather at setting aside topics of disagreement by restricting the body of obligatory doctrines. The magisterium* adopted this concept, while stressing that the adhesion of the faithful could not and should not limit itself to the dogmas officially proclaimed. According to the declaration of Vatican II about the order or the hierarchy* of the truths relative to their christological base (see UR 11), the faith of the Church constitutes a “differentiated global structure” (Kasper 1991), in the context of which the particular statements must be judged and interpreted.

3. Problem of Dogmatic Development

All knowledge of truth is part of history. This historicity can be understood in a positive sense as a quality of opening up and of unfinished business. It therefore falls to human reason* to constantly enlarge its perception of truth. But it can also mean that no truth exists, or that we grasp it only inadequately, or even that we cannot grasp it at all. Already in classical philosophy, the term dogma expressed the conviction that, despite all the challenges from Skeptics, there is indeed a true knowledge, which, however, cannot prevent the development of contrary opinions. With regard to the Christian faith, the perception of the historical character of its wording raises the question of the way in which it was constituted and of the degree of truth of particular declarations. If one seriously acknowledges that God, in Jesus Christ, communicated with us in the definitive reality of eschatology, that Jesus Christ in person is therefore the definitive truth of God (see Jn 14:6; Heb 1:1ff.), there are then no more revelations to expect. One should, however, see in Jesus Christ not only the end but also the fulfillment of a revelation that, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, we have never finished understanding and assimilating (see Jn 14:26, 15:26, 16:13). Once they are set against this background, all the theories that interpret development unilaterally as tending either toward defection or toward progress are obviously inappropriate. According to the principles we have acknowledged, the development of dogma cannot be conceived except as “the explanation of what is implicitly contained in the original revelation” (Kasper 1991).

Such an explanation should not, however, be understood either according to a simple biological schema (see Vincent of Lerins, Commonitorium 23, cited by Vatican I [see DS 3020]) or in a purely logical sense (theology of the conclusion, neo-Scholasticism). The real process of the development of dogma is judged more fairly by viewing the tradition of the faith as a living event rather than as the transmission of particular theses (see DV 8). In the light of this, it is only of secondary importance to decide whether this event should be considered—citing only a few of the theories of dogmatic development—from the viewpoint of dialectics, as an auto-interpretation of the Christian idea (Möhlner, Kuhn); or from the viewpoint of typology, as the continuous unfolding of new aspects of the faith in the fixed context of a global type (Newman*); or from a vitalist viewpoint, as the constantly renewed attempt to put the Word of God to the test through action (Blondel); or lastly, from the viewpoint of theological transcendentalism, as the historico-categorical expression of a knowledge that at its origin is of a transcendental nature (Rahner*). Until now it has too often been forgotten that by understanding dogmatic development as a process of progressive explanation there is an ultimate risk of merging it with the idea of “progress”; and that it must therefore be viewed also as a process of reduction and of concentration around an original truth, without nonetheless falling into the theory of defection. The revelation happened once and for all, and the witnessing of it is incorporated into the Scriptures. It is by returning constantly to the Scriptures that we assure ourselves of a critical resort against a concept of dogmatic development subordinated too exclusively to an idea of “progress.” Even if the action of the Holy Spirit goes beyond the confines of a theory of dogmatic development, it is essentially this action that, according to Catholic belief, governs the evolution of doctrine and of religious life. The Holy Spirit acts within the Church, through the faith of the people of God (sensus fidelium), as well as through the preaching of doctrine, each depending on the other (see LG 12; DV 8). But the Spirit also intervenes in the work of the theologians, whose task is certainly not restricted to preparing the ground for the magisterium and to justifying its decisions after the event. That work also consists of studying the Word of God, such as it was pronounced once and for all, of examining the different interpretations to which it has given rise during the course of history, of reflecting on the internal coherence of the Christian message and of taking responsibility for it in face of contemporary questions. Although in the past it was particularly the existence of heretical movements within Christianity that inspired efforts to clarify and delimit dogma—except for the two Marian dogmas of 1854 and 1950, which reacted rather to religious requirements—Vatican II (particularly in the pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes) considered the great challenges of the present age to be the “signs of the times” that had to be interpreted in the light of the gospel (see GS 4, passim). As history recedes from us the declarations of dogmas in no way seem like the end of a discussion but rather as pertinent and incidental contributions, which cannot be extended to other historical contexts without a good deal of interpretation (see Mysterium Ecclesiae 5 [AAS 65 (1973), 402–4]). Such interpretation need not, however, mean the destruction of dogma, as long as with the help of the historical knowledge acquired in this domain it takes as a guide the wording found by the Church and makes sure of expressing the idea in conformity with the realities of a new situation. Today, discussions center above all on the question of how the faith can preserve and express its identity not only through succeeding epochs with the same cultural climate (Western) but also from one culture to another. In order to finally achieve an ecumenical approach it is essential to know whether the condemnations pronounced in the evangelical confessions of the 16th century and in the canons of the Council of Trent remain valid today (see Lehmann and Pannenberg 1986, 1989).

- ◆ G. Kittel (1935), "Dogma-dogmatizò," ThWNT 2, 233–35.
- A. Lang (1942–43), "Die Gliederung und die Reichweite des Glaubens nach Thomas von Aquin und den Thomisten: Ein Beitrag zur Klärung der scholastischen Begriffe: fides, haeresis und conclusio theologica," DT 20, 207–36, 335–46; DT 21, 79–97; id. (1953), "Der Bedeutungswandel der Begriffe fides und haeresis und die dogmatische Wertung der Konzilsentscheidungen von Vienne und Trient," MThZ 4, 133–46.
- J. Ranft (1957), "Dogma I," RAC 3, 1257–60.
- E. Fascher (1959), "Dogma II," RAC 4, 1–24.
- L. Hödl (1962), "Articulus fidei: Eine begriffsgeschichtliche Arbeit," in J. Ratzinger, H. Fries (Ed.), Einsicht und Glaube, Freiberg, 358–76.
- C. Koser (1963), De notis theologicis: Historia, notio, usus, Petropolis.
- G. Ebeling (1964), Wort Gottes und Tradition, Göttingen.
- M. Elze (1964), "Der Begriff des Dogmas in der alten Kirche," ZThK 61, 421–38.
- A. Lang (1964), Die theologische Prinzipienlehre der mittelalterlichen Scholastik, Fribourg.
- H. Hammans (1965), Die neueren katholischen Erklärungen der Dogmenentwicklung, Essen.
- W. Kasper (1965), Dogma unter dem Wort Gottes, Mayence.
- K. Rahner, K. Lehmann (1965), "Kerygma und Dogma," MySal I, 622–707.
- J. Ratzinger (1966), Das Problem der Dogmengeschichte in der Sicht der katholischen Theologie, Köln-Opladen.

- W. Pannenberg (1967), "Was ist eine dogmatische Aussage?," Grundfragen systematischer Theologie, Göttingen, 159–80.
- H.-J. Pottmeyer (1968), Der Glaube vor dem Anspruch der Wissenschaft, Fribourg, 300–304.
- H. Küng (1970 a), Unfehlbar? Eine Anfrage, Zurich; id. (Ed.) (1970 b), Fehlbar? Eine Bilanz, Zurich.
- J. Nolte (1971), Dogma in Geschichte, Fribourg.
- K. Rahner (Ed.) (1971), Zum Problem Unfehlbarkeit: Antworten auf die Anfrage von Hans Küng, Fribourg.
- G. Söll (1971), Dogma und Dogmenentwicklung, Fribourg.
- M. Elze (1972), "Dogma," HWP 2, 275–77.
- K. J. Becker (1973), "Articulus fidei (1150–1230). Von der Einführung des Wortes bis zu den drei Definitionen Philipps des Kanzlers," Gr 54, 517–69; id. (1976), "Dogma. Zur Bedeutungsgeschichte des lateinischen Wortes in der christlichen Literatur," Gr 57, 307–50, 658–701.
- P. Schrodt (1978), The Problem of the Beginning of Dogma in Recent Theology, Frankfurt.
- U. Wickert, C. H. Ratschow (1982), "Dogma," TRE 9, 26–41.
- P. F. Fransen (1985), Hermeneutics of the Councils and Other Studies, Louvain.
- W. Löser, K. Lehmann, M. Lutz-Bachmann (Ed.) (1985), Dogmengeschichte und katholische Theologie, Würzburg.
- G. Mansini (1985), "What Is a Dogma?" The Meaning and Truth of Dogma in Edouard Le Roy and His Scholastic Opponents, Rome.
- K. Lehmann, W. Pannenberg (Ed.) (1986), Lehrverurteilungen-kirchentrennend?, vol. I, Freiberg-Göttingen; id. (1989), ibid., vol. II, 15–170.
- J. L. Segundo (1989), El dogma que libera, Santander.
- W. Beinert (Ed.) (1991), Glaube als Zustimmung, Freiberg.
- J. Drumm (1991), Doxologie und Dogma, Paderborn.
- W. Kasper (1991), "Dogma/Dogmenentwicklung," NHThG 2, 292–309.
- N. Walter (1992), "Dogma," EWNT 2, 1, 819–22.
- E. Schockenhoff, P. Walter (Ed.) (1993), Dogma und Glaube, Mayence.

PETER WALTER

See also Dogmatic Theology; Faith; History; Loci theologici; Revelation; Theology; Word of God

Dogmatic Theology

a) History. In antiquity, before the noun dogmatics was ever formulated, the adjective dogmatic was sometimes used—to qualify an intellectual activity, for example, and oppose it to “practical” or “ethical” activities. Medieval Latin does not seem to have been familiar with the word dogmatic. It resurfaced in the West with the humanists. But, according to O. Ritschl in “Das Wort dogmaticus in der Geschichte des Sprachgebrauchs bis zum Auskommen des Ausdrucks theologia dogmatica” (1920), it was only in 1634 that a Lutheran humanist, G. Calixt, first used the adjective in connection with theology*. In 1659, another Lutheran, L. F. Reinhart, used dogmatic theology in the title of a work, according to G. Sauter in “Dogmatik I”

(1982). From approximately 1680, the expression began showing up in the titles of numerous treatises of Catholic theology, and in the 18th-century courses and textbooks frequently included dogmatico-Scholastic in their titles. The use of the term dogmatic theology at that point indicated a double distinction—on the one hand, from moral theology, which had just gained its autonomy, and, on the other hand, from Scholastic (Scholasticism*) theology, which left no space for a historical research into Christian dogmatic material.

Understood at that time to be the construction of a theological “system” juxtaposed to the Scriptures (Holy* Scripture), as Protestant theology was very early on, and as Catholic theology would later be under the influence of the methodus scientifica of Wolff’s school (Gazzaniga, for example, in 1768), dogmatic theology was an extension of much older forms of systematic theology.

Origen*’s Peri Arkhon or—perhaps more rightly so—Gregory of Nyssa’s Great Catechesis (in Patrologia Graeca) are generally considered to be the first attempts at a systematic articulation of the content of Christian faith. In the eighth century John of Damascus’s Expositio de fide orthodoxa (in Patrologia Graeca) is characterized even more clearly by fairly complete dogmatics. Even though he was undoubtedly more concerned with orthodoxy than with a deeper speculative examination, and even though his procedures in compiling somewhat offended the internal cohesion of the theological exposé, John of Damascus was a major witness to the evolution of theology. Latin theology received a first systematic summary with Augustine*’s De doctrina christiana (see Patrologia Latina), and the work’s influence was great, since the great Augustinian categories (res et signa, uti et frui) were still at work in the 12th-century system of Sentences by Pierre Lombard, as pointed out by M.-D. Chenu in La théologie au XIIe siècle (1957). Systematization would finally be accomplished in the various surveys. They included the enigmatic Summa sententiarum (in Patrologia Latina), treated by R. Baron in “Note sur l’énigmatique Summa sententiarum,” (1958); the Summa aurea by William of Auxerre (†1231), a true initiator in the theological use of philosophy; and the great constructions of the 13th century. These surveys saw theology as an organism built according to laws of Aristotelian science, and they believed that theology’s connections to the Scriptures were beginning to loosen.

Protestantism* at first sought to tighten those links, but it should be noted that the elaboration of a systematic theology began very early on in Protestantism, with Melancthon’s Loci communes (1535) and Calvin’s Institution (1539). Systematization grew still further under the Lutheran and Calvinist orthodoxy of the classical age, which did not hesitate to use even the conceptual methods of Aristotelianism* to grasp and present doctrinal content in the most systematic way possible—J. Gerhard, for example.

However, elaborated against the background of such a tradition, the first theologies to explicitly refer to themselves as dogmatic corresponded to a new climate. The project of a dogmatic thought expressed first of all the desire to move beyond the quarrels between schools to return to the official teachings of the Churches—the desire to teach a doctrine that was not subject to disputes, as noted by W. Kasper in Die Methoden der Dogmatik (1967). According to Karl Rahner’s Dogmatik (1959) and Sauter’s Dogmatik I (1982), dogmatic theology was thus understood to be a “science of the dogma* of the Church*,” which it was obliged at the same time to justify, on the basis of the Scriptures and tradition, and to deploy by means of conclusion, as Yves Congar holds in La foi et la théologie (1962). The fate of this new discipline had, therefore, to be closely linked with that of another new discipline, the scientific history of dogma.

Because the new climate of ideas was marked by the “crisis of European consciousness” and by the struggle of the Enlightenment against traditional beliefs, it was also to resist the re-evaluation of the dogma that theological systematization eventually had to be re-deployed under the modern form of dogmatics, W. Kasper holds in Dogmatik (1991). But because any apology of dogma was necessarily tied, in Catholic theology, to a defense and illustration of the Church as a teaching body, this evolution was not without risk. Catholic theology seemed, henceforth, to have found an immediate source in the magisterium—the Theologia Wirceburgensis (1771), for example, considers the Church to be a regula fidei proxima and situates it before the two regulae fidei remotae—Scripture and tradition—by a process that would have been equally incomprehensible to patristic and medieval theology.

Protestant theology in the 19th century, at Schleiermacher*’s urging, started off by taking its distances from systematic reasons, which were suspected of encouraging a confusion between theology and philosophy: It was as a “doctrine of the faith*” that Schleiermacher presented his synthetic summary. In his wake, influenced by his theory of feelings, the Erlangen school explained dogma on the basis of the experience* of faith, while the speculative theology of Hegel*’s disciples understood it as the self-explanation of absolute content, and Ritschl’s school grasped it from an ethical perspective. “Dogmatic” did, however, find a renewed usage in 20th-century Protestantism—in particular, thanks to Karl Barth* and Emil Brunner in Dogmatik (1946–60). During that century it was viewed from various perspectives. For example, Barth saw it as a “kerygmatic” intention; Paul Tillich*, as an opportunity to correlate human questions and theological answers; E. Jüngel, as a consequent exegesis; and Wolfhart Pannenberg, as a refounding of dogmatics within the framework of a theory of sciences.

Catholic theology in the first half of the 19th century saw the rise of a theology that conjugated strong ecclesiastical roots with a great openness to the intellectual currents of the era (the Tübingen* school was the best example of this). A hardening—“a change in the structure in Catholic theology” noted by B. Welte in “Zum Strukturwandel der katholischen Theologie in 19 Jahrhundert” (1965)—occurred, however, toward the middle of the century; and neo-Scholasticism then offered the spectacle of a systematism that tended to consider history as an element that could not be assimilated and modernity as a simple decline. It would be the task of Vatican* II, which reexamined and concluded numerous suggestions for renewal (patristic renewal, “new theology,” etc.), to set forth a more dynamic concept (Kasper 1967, Sauter 1982). Dogmatics had come to be understood as the work of interpretation at the service of the present manifestation of the Word* pronounced once and for all (Geffré 1983). Exegesis* was received as a point of departure and missionary preaching as a goal. It was not, therefore, a case of a simple “apology of dogma.” Several ways were open. The authors of Mysterium salutis adopted the perspective of the history of salvation*. Karl Rahner* was concerned with updating a deep (“transcendental”) connivance between the word of revelation and the internal structure of the human spirit (1976). A similar concern motivated the work published by Bernard Lonergan* in 1972. And the theological esthetics of Hans Urs von Balthasar* (published in 1961–69) found their center of gravity in the sovereign self-manifestation of divine glory. To tell the truth, the different paths of contemporary Catholic dogmatics—historical, anthropological, or theological—complement each other, and each would be unilateral if it ignored the part of truth contained in the other points of view.

b) Object. Dogmatic theology did not have only dogma, strictly speaking, as its object. It also focused on the totality of Christian revelation, which it sought to perceive in an all-encompassing fashion, seeking a total reading, which demands one’s attention to the results of Biblical theology*, which integrates in its understanding of God’s Word* the interpretations established by tradition and the magisterium, and which constantly seeks to actualize the permanent meaning of the Word (Kasper 1991). Dogmatic theology, in this way, holds a discourse quite distinct from that held by the magisterium of the Church, toward which it functions in the manner of an introspective authority. There should be nothing surprising about this. The transmission of Christian doctrines through a hierarchical authority, on the one hand, never leads to the superfluity of theological intelligence. And because the Church, subject to that which is revealed to it, can at no time act in an arbitrary fashion, it is on the other hand incontestable that the dogmatic work of theology is never without meaning for the magisterium itself and for the evolution of its pronouncements (Congar 1980). The hermeneutic* location of dogmatics is the encounter between faith and reason. Dogmatics speaks neither the language of reason alone nor that of faith alone (Congar 1962). And taking into account the fact that there is a labor peculiar to the fundamental* theology, which is that of the intellectus quaerens fidem, it must be concluded that the work peculiar to the dogmatic is that of fides quaerens intellectum. The two, assuredly, cannot be dissociated, and it can be conceded that the critical and justifying procedures of fundamental theology must be established at all levels of dogmatic work and in all the treatises on dogmatics (Geffré 1972 and Kasper 1988). Both Rahner, reiterating that there is never an affirmation of God that does not imply an affirmation of man, and Balthasar, who showed that a theological doctrine of perception and a theory of rapture are inseparable, have insisted, each in his own way, upon the link between these two disciplines.

c) Method. The first obligation of dogmatics is without doubt that of not dissociating positive procedure and speculative procedure (J. Beumer 1954). Because Scholastic theology had shown only a tepid interest in historical questions and in the problem of history, it was inevitable that an indirect consequence would be the birth of a more or less autonomous and separate positive theology. During the growth of historical sciences there were authors, like Melchior Cano (1509–60), who viewed the positive procedure as a function of all theology. However, there were even more systematicians of baroque Scholasticism who, with Jean de Saint-Thomas (1589–1644), were able to view the positive work as a preliminary activity and properly exterior to theology per se—an activity that, in fact, began only when it was possible to at last syllogize. Dogmatic theology could only bring its work to fruition through a movement of perpetual return through which the intellectus fidei made a “positive” return to the contingent sources of faith while, reciprocally, the auditus fidei was reflected in the “speculative” intelligence of what one believed (Rahner 1959; Congar 1962; Geffré 1972). The theological usage of all the resources of historical criticism is, therefore, on the schedule of conditions of all dogmatics, on the same level as the theological usage of all the resources of philosophical rationality. Dogmatic reason cannot, for all that, be reduced to a form of historical reason or a form of philosophical reason. Dogmatics, on the contrary, is faithful to its own reason, when history and reason are assumed, connected, and accomplished all together in reason through a truth* that surpasses them (Rahner 1968; Kasper 1991).

A second duty of dogmatics would no doubt be to refrain from claiming to be a science of conclusions, as did baroque Scholasticism and neo-Scholasticism. The concept according to which dogmatics would have as its major goal the preparation of new definitions actually constitutes a “malady of theology” (Congar 1962). Rather than within heuristics it is within hermeneutics* that dogmatics can be organized in a healthy fashion, by endeavoring systematically to recover the truths of faith in their unity and their internal coherence (nexus mysteriorum) by simultaneously showing their correspondence with the quest for meaning of each generation of mankind.

A third duty would be to connect service of the Scriptures to service of the Church. Vatican II considered the Scriptures to be “the soul, as it were, of all theology” (Optatam Totius, 16). To be sure, from a Catholic point of view, the Scriptures must be read within the tradition of the Church; but, reciprocally, the doctrine of the Church can itself only be interpreted on the basis of Scriptures, norma normans non normata. And if the facts illuminate the Scriptures while the Scriptures, in return, allow their true perspectives to be perceived, one must also add that dogmatics is not truly ecclesiastical by virtue of its ongoing fidelity to orthodoxy alone, but also because its care for the Scriptures and for tradition is experienced within a Church constantly faced with the issues of an era, receiving them as questions addressed to its own faith (Kasper 1967).

d) Articulation. The history of dogmatics suggests several types of articulation of arguments and treatises (Grillmeier 1975; Kasper 1991). Major historical works include the following.

The Peri Arkhon by Origen, after a prologue detailing the author’s intentions, is divided into two parts, the first of which (subdivided into three sections) outlines the doctrines of God, of rational creatures, and of the world, while the second discusses several difficult points. Because it does not venture to provide a complete theological synthesis, the work leaves out themes as important as the economy of salvation and the sacraments*.

The Great Catechesis by Gregory of Nyssa was composed as a triptych. The first part elaborates “theology” in the strictly patristic sense (the doctrine of one God in three persons*). The second treats the “economy” and is subdivided into a presentation of the historical effectuation of salvation (creation, sin, incarnation, and the cross) and a presentation of its appropriation (sacraments, faith, and spiritual life).

John Damascene’s De fide orthodoxa is divided into four books due to his Latin translators, but the general framework of one hundred chapters, into which the work’s content has been distributed, has a certain analogy with what later would be the syntheses of the 12th century (see E. Dublanchy’s “Dogmatique,” 1910): the doctrine of the knowledge* of God and of the Trinity (book I, chap. 1–14), creation and Christian anthropology (book II, chap. 14–46), Christology (Christ/Christology) (book III, chap. 47–81, and the beginning of book IV), and sacraments, the problem of evil*, and eschatology* (book IV, chap. 82–100, and the rest of book IV).

Augustine’s De doctrina christiana was organized according to one single, major articulation. The Trinitarian God (res qua fruendum) appears in it as the end of our navigatio. Christ and the Church are our means to arrive there.

In Augustine’s wake, Peter Lombard’s Sentences combine an exposition of the res (books I–III) and one of the signa (book IV, the sacraments). The res are, in turn, subdivided according to the Augustinian dichotomy of the frui (the Trinitarian God, book I) and the uti (creatures, book II). Christ’s own role is that of leading the utilia to the fruibilia (book III).

Still faithful to the narrative order—series narrationis—of the Scriptures, Hugh of Saint Victor (†1141) divided his De sacramentis christianae fidei by following the historia—a term designating not only the content of the economy of salvation but also the method enabling one to grasp it. The first book, which outlines the “work of creation,” covers “the beginning of the world to the incarnation.” The second, which outlines “the work of reparation,” covers “the incarnation of the Word* to the end and consummation of everything.”

It was yet another Augustinian scheme that Abelard* used: fides (Trinity-Creation-Incarnation), caritas (charity-virtues-precepts), and sacramentum. Abelard is more important, however, in the history of theology for having been the first author to totally abandon the historical order of reasons and reduce all the facts of the economy of salvation to “scientific” categories, allowing the organization of everything within the light of general notions and synthetic principles.

Thomas* Aquinas, in quest of an ordo disciplinae for his Somme, resorted to neither Augustinian schemes nor even Aristotle's organizing scheme for the cosmos but rather to the Neoplatonic scheme of emanation and return. It was on this curve that he located the facts and the gestures of the economy of salvation. The first two parts speak, therefore, of the God as principle and the God as end, respectively, while the third is devoted to Christ, who is for us the path to God, via est nobis tenendi in Deum (Chenu 1950).

Two distinct currents emerged, and Thomas's strict theocentrism contrasted with a tendency mingling the ideas of Augustine, Bernard, and Bonaventure, in which theology is constructed according to a Christological and soteriological format attentive to existential ideas and the "wisdom of the cross." Theology, in these currents, can certainly not be reduced to an economy of my salvation. It can be seen, however, how much is owed them by the radical refusal of any sapiential theology as expressed by Luther* in the opposition of the theologia gloriae and the theologia crucis.

Between an essential theocentrism, constantly tempted to forget that the "glory of God is the living man," and an existential anthropocentrism, constantly tempted to dissolve the very substance of the theological, dogmatics has no choice; it is in a dilemma. It would be thus a new duty of dogmatics to connect the two approaches, for if the unifying theme of theology is God himself (Thomas Aquinas), this God is the God of mankind through Jesus Christ and in the Spirit (Holy* Spirit)—thus, theocentrism must include a well-understood anthropocentrism, which grasps all truth of faith as a truth of salvation (Rahner 1959; Kasper 1991).

- B. Keckerman (1602), Systema SS. Theologiae, Hanover.
- G. Calixt (1634), Epitome theologiae moralis, Helmstadt.
- L.F. Reinhart (1659), Synopsis Theologiae Christianae Dogmaticae, Noribergae.
- M. Gazzaniga (1786), Theologia dogmatica in systema, Ingolstadt.
- F.D.E. Schleiermacher (1821), Der christliche Glaube, Berlin.
- M.J. Scheeben (1875–1903), Handbuch der kath. Dogmatik, Freiburg.
- J. Pohle (1902–5), Lehrbuch der Dogmatik, Paderborn.
- B. Bartmann (1911), Lehrbuch der Dogmatik, Freiburg.

- K. Barth (1932–67), KD, Zurich (Dogmatique, Geneva, 1953–74).
- M. Schmaus (1937–55), Katholische Dogmatik, Munich.
- E. Brunner (1946–60), Dogmatik, 3 vols., Zurich.
- P. Tillich (1951–63), Systematic Theology, 3 vols., Chicago.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1961–69), Herrlichkeit, Einsiedeln.
- B. Lonergan (1972), Method in Theology, New York.
- K. Rahner (1976), Grundkurs des Glaubens, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.
- ♦ H.-E. Weber (1908), Der Einfluß der protestantischen Schulphilosophie auf die orthodoxe-lutherische Dogmatik, Leipzig.
- E. Dublanchy (1910), "Dogmatique," DThC 4, 1522–74.
- O. Ritschl (1920), "Das Wort dogmaticus in der Geschichte des Sprachgebrauchs bis zum Aufkommen des Ausdrucks theologia dogmatica," in Festgabe für J. Kaftan, Tübingen, 260–72.
- K. Barth (1928), Die Theologie und die Kirche, Munich.
- M.-D. Chenu (1943), La théologie comme science au XIIIe siècle, Paris; id. (1950), Introduction à l'étude de saint Thomas d'Aquin, Paris; id. (1957), La théologie au XIIIe siècle, Paris.
- Y. Congar (1943–46), "Théologie," DThC 15, 341–502; id. (1952), "Dogmatique," Cath 3, 949–51; id. (1962), La foi et la théologie, Tournai; id. (1980), "Le théologien dans l'Église aujourd'hui," in Les quatre fleuves 12, 7–27.
- J. de Ghellinck (1947), "Pagina et Sacra Pagina," in Mélanges A. Pelze, Louvain, 23–59.
- J. Beumer (1954), "Positive und spekulative Theologie," Schol. 39, 53–72.
- R. Baron (1958), "Note sur l'énigmatique Summa sententiarum," RThAM 25, 26–41.
- G. Gloege (1958), "Dogmatik," RGG 2, 225–30.
- K. Rahner (1959), "Dogmatik," LThK 2, 446–59; id. (1968), "Dogmatik," SM(D) 1, 917–24.
- W. Kasper (1962), Die Lehre von der Tradition in der Römischen Schule, Freiburg; id. (1967), Die Methoden der Dogmatik, Mayence; id. (1991), "Dogmatik," NHThG 2, 310–20.
- B. Welte (1965), "Zum Strukturwandel der katholischen Theologie in 19. Jahrhundert," in Auf der Spur des Ewigen, Freiburg, 380–409.
- C. Geffré (1972), Un nouvel âge de la théologie, Paris; id. (1983), Le christianisme au risque de l'interprétation, Paris.
- A. Grillmeier (1975), "Vom Symbolum zur Summa," in Mit ihm und in ihm, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 585–636.
- W. Pannenberg (1977), Wissenschaftstheorie und Theologie, Frankfurt.
- G. Sauter (1982), "Dogmatik I," TRE 9, 41–77.

EMILIO BRITO

See also Canon of Scriptures; Dogma; Fundamental Theology; Gospels; Loci theologici; Notes, Theological; Theological Schools; Theology

Donatism

Named after its initiator, Donatus, Donatism was a protest movement that shook the Church of Africa over a period of three and a half centuries (fourth–seventh centuries). The movement did not leave many texts except for a few acts of councils*, acts of martyrs, and the Liber regularum by Tyconius. In large measure, our knowledge of it comes via those who opposed it, namely Optatus of Milevis and Augustine*.

Social, economic, and religious divisions prevailing in North Africa at that time should be cited among the causes of the movement, but an even more precise cause is known, linked with the problem of the lapsi, a term referring to the fallen, that is those who had reneged their faith during the persecution at the time of Cyprian. The synod* of 251 had proposed reintegrating the lapsi in the Church after a period of penitence (penance*). The new persecution of 303–5 led many clergymen to surrender the books of Scripture (Holy* Scripture) (“traditors”). Donatists were absolutely intransigent toward them, banishing them indefinitely from the Church. To give full weight to their attitude, they began by casting doubt on the Episcopal consecration of Caecilian, celebrated rapidly after the death of his predecessor Mensurius, without waiting for the arrival of the bishops* of Numidia.

They deposed Caecilian—who would be rehabilitated by the Edict of Milan in 313 and the Council of Arles in August 314, before being reinstated in the see of Carthage on 10 November 316. Moreover, the Donatists questioned the presence at Caecilian’s ordination* of another bishop, Felix of Aptunga, supposedly a traditor. (Felix would be absolved on 15 February 315.) The Donatists’ attitude led Emperor Constantine to decree a harsh law against them. But that did not stop them. They organized their propaganda by multiplying acts of martyrdom and by 336 Donatus was already able to convoke at Carthage a council of 270 bishops who had been won over to his cause.

In calling for a church of the pure, in aspiring to martyrdom, proclaiming that there is only one single baptism and one single Church, and affirming that they were necessarily in the right, the Donatists defined themselves as the true heirs of the Church of Africa. They aspired to be the heirs of Cyprian. This assured them the sympathy of the people, and yet they reinterpreted his views broadly. The Donatists even provoked rebellious gangs called circumcelliones who terrorized the countryside; they were quickly condemned for this. The Emperor Constantine severely suppressed the Donatists and banished Donatus, who died in exile in 355. But the movement resumed and developed after Julian the Apostate brought the Donatist bishops back from exile between 361 and 363.

The schism* was consummated at the Council of Bagai on 24 April 394: 310 bishops were favorable to Donatus’s successor, Primian. Augustine, after Optatus of Milevis, was one of the only bishops who could win out over the Donatists. After a conjunction of circumstances, the Catholics were able to call a conference in 403 with the purpose of defining the true representative of the Church in North Africa. Primian refused to take part. In 405 the emperor took a number of measures against the Donatists and in 411, when the balance was still fragile, the Conference of Carthage granted the victory to the Catholics. The Donatists gradually lost their influence, but continued to resist until the seventh century.

In their opposition to the traditors the Donatists were led to proclaim that the validity of the sacraments* depended on the sanctity of the ministers. Optatus of Milevis and Augustine argued against this thesis, advancing the catholicity of the Church, its universality that extended beyond the limits of Africa. And they countered an ecclesiology* that excluded sinners: they did so by arguing that baptism can be conferred by any Christian; the “ministers may change, but the sacraments are immutable” (Against the Donatists V, 4, 5) because their holiness comes from Christ* alone.

- Augustine, Works against the Donatists (BAug 28–32). Optatus of Milevis, Treatise against the Donatists (SC 412–13).
- ◆ P. Monceaux (1912–23), Histoire littéraire de l’Afrique chrétienne, vols. 4–7, Paris.
- Y. Congar (1963), “La théologie donatiste de l’Église et des sacrements,” in Introduction aux traités antidonatistes de saint Augustin, BAug 28, Paris, 9–133.
- R. A. Markus (1964), Donatism, the Last Phase: Studies in Church History, I, London.
- R. Crespin (1965), Ministère et sainteté pastorale du clergé et solution de la crise donatiste dans la vie et la doctrine de saint Augustin, Paris.
- S. Lancel (1979), “Les débuts du donatisme: la date du protocole de Cirta et de l’élection épiscopale de Silvanus,” REAug 25, 217–29, Paris.

Donatism

W.H.C. Frend (1971), The Donatist Church, a Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa, Oxford.

J.-L. Maier (1987–89), Le dossier du donatisme, 2 vols., Berlin.

C. Pietri (1995), “Les difficultés du nouveau système en Occident: la querelle donatiste (363–420),” in Histoire du chris- tianisme, vol. 2: Naissance d'une chrétienté (250–430), Paris, 435–51.

MARIE-ANNE VANNIER

See also History of the Church; Ministry; Unity of the Church

Double Truth. See Naturalism; Truth

Doxology. See Glory of God; Praise

Drey, Johann Sebastian von. See Tübingen, Schools of

Duns Scotus, John

c. 1265–1308

1. Biography

John Duns Scotus was born at Duns in Scotland. He became a Franciscan in 1280, studied in the colleges of his order, was ordained priest in 1291, and completed his training in Oxford around 1291–93. There, around 1300–1301, he produced a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. Called at the beginning of the academic year 1300 or 1302 to teach at the University of Paris as a bachelor under the tutelage of Gonzalvo of Spain, he probably took part in a dispute opposing his master and Eckhart (Rhineland-Flemish mysticism). In any event he set to work on a new Commentary on the Sentences, the Reportatio Parisiensis. However, his work on this was cut short in June 1303, when King Philip the Fair called for a council against Pope* Boniface VIII: Scotus refused to sign a petition to this effect and was forced into exile, presumably returning to Oxford. He later returned to Paris to teach, probably toward the end of 1304. Becoming a doctor in 1305, he was regent master (director of studies) of the Franciscan covenant in 1306–7. At the end of 1307 he left for Köln as a reader and died there on the 8 November 1308. Nicknamed the Subtle Doctor, accorded particular veneration within the Franciscan Order (above all for his defense of the Immaculate Conception) and in the diocese of Nola, his beatification was confirmed for the universal Church in 1993. He left numerous works, which form a critical dialogue with his contemporaries (Godfrey of Fontaines) and predecessors (Henry of Ghent at the University, Pierre de Jean Olieu among the Franciscans): commentaries on Porphyry and Aristotle, a thick Quodlibet, and three commentaries on the Sentences—a first version, the Lectura, representative of his Oxford teaching; a version consisting of notes taken from his teaching at Paris, the Reportationes Parisienses; and a final version, the Ordinatio, cut short in mid-revision.

2. Thought

a) Architecture of Theology. After the condemnations of 1277, which concerned 219 theses inspired by philosophy (naturalism*), Scotus, like many disciples of Bonaventure*, became convinced of the inadequacy of philosophy and the necessity of theology. “Philosophers maintain the perfection of nature and deny supernatural perfection,” while “theologians understand the deficiency of nature* and the perfection of the supernatural” (Ord. Prologue = Prol., §5). Aristotle had rightly said that everyone desires beatitude*, but beatitude was understood only in general terms: philosophers could attain a merely abstract notion of God*, in an incomplete part of man (the soul [soul-heart-body]), and subject to the practical vagaries of thought. For this reason human beings needed a revelation in order to know their end distinctly and to know that they would attain it in the flesh and in perpetuity (§16). “God is the natural end of man, although this end cannot be realized through natural, but only through supernatural means” (§32; supernatural*). It was by revelation alone that humankind knew which actions were meritorious, in other words freely accepted by God as allowing us to be blessed (§18). Scripture* was thus necessary and sufficient to man in order to attain his end. In particular it presented that end (the beatitude of body [soul-heart-body] and soul) and the means necessary to attain it: the Ten Commandments (Decalogue*), which were epitomized by charity (Dt 6:5; Mt 22:37ff.).

The ideal of theology as the sole science was unattainable. Therefore there were several theologies:

theology in itself (sufficient to its object) and theology for human beings (tailored to the human intellect). Their object was God, not as a common object (the subject of all theological propositions) but as a virtual object (capable of giving rise to all such propositions). In itself, theology was the intuition that God had of himself and of all things, and the blessed received a share in it. Human theology, in contrast, was abstract: it applied by default to the concept of God the most perfect concept that we can conceive, that of infinite* being (ens infinitum) (§168). It was of him that the first necessary truths were uttered (“God is Trinity*”); as for the rest, they were spoken of him, but not because of him. Thus divine omnipotence* was not deduced from the concept of God but received by faith and attached to that concept, which gave a unity to all the divine attributes.

Any science must fulfill four criteria: certainty, the necessity of its object, the evidence of its premises, and syllogistic rigor (§208). The theology of the blessed fulfilled these four conditions. Divine theology in itself fulfilled the first three but was intuitive: more than a science, it was a form of wisdom. Human theology, however, which was concerned with a contingent revelation and history, did not fulfill the second condition—but this very fact led to a revision of the concept of science, to the effect that the formal rigor of a science was of more importance than the necessity of its object, which could be revealed contingently (§212). Thus human theology was not “subsidiary” (subordinate) to that of the blessed (a view that contrasts with that of Thomas* Aquinas). Finally, the end of revelation was charity; and consequently theology was a practical science (Lect., Prol., §164). Everything that depended on practical reason—in other words, on the will—was practical. Morality, therefore, was the art of molding one’s actions to charity by means of the will, and in this way to prepare oneself to receive the supreme recompense, beatitude. Thus, in theology, everything that was not metaphysics tended toward charity (Ord. Prol., §322; see Boulnois 1997).

b) Unity and Trinity of God. The first and necessary part of theology took as its object the divine being in its Trinitarian manifestation. The existence of God was known by way of the concept of “infinite being,” which ensured the identity and uniqueness of the first principle reached by way of various metaphysical paths (Ord. I, d. 2; De primo principio): this was the beginning of a natural theology. God was known positively in the concept of being* (ens), which was applied in the same sense to him and to the created order, as with respect to his attributes and the concept of person* (analogy*); in this context negations were merely a way of denying the imperfection of created things and affirming divine perfection. God was distinguished from the created order by his infinity. His different attributes were distinguished from one another by their formal non-identity—what the historians call “formal distinction” (God is truly justice and truly mercy, but justice in God remains fundamentally separate from his mercy: see Boulnois 1988). The processions of the Trinity formed a strict sequence: the Word was engendered by means of nature, and the Spirit (Holy* Spirit) by means of will. Thus charity was the summit of deity* and was applied to one person (the Spirit) at the same time as defining God in his supreme essence.

Beyond the divine persons, necessary theology dealt with inward and outward emanations, with “instants of nature,” moments of the divine thought—self-reflection and the scheme of salvation*. In a first instant, God conceived himself (as infinite*); then he produced finite essences (the divine ideas), then supposed them as in part imitating his perfection, and finally conceived compatible combinations of essences (Ord. I, d. 43, §14 . 16; transl. Boulnois 1994), the “compossibles,” from among which his will chose a world, freely producing creation* outside himself. All that was created came after these necessary emanations and was thus contingent. But at the same time God had eternal foreknowledge of it: there was in God a science of the contingent—itself contingent because dependent upon the consent of his will.

c) Order of Ends and the Primacy of Christ. The second and contingent part of theology originated in the divine will. For Scotus, indeed, the contingency of the world did not result in short from the secondary causes but from the self-determination of the divine will. So, at the very moment when a thing was created, it could be non-existent. God’s absolute power could therefore intervene at any moment in the world to make another possible arise; the ordered power of God was forever revocable (Knuuttila, in Boulnois 1994). But the divine will was structurally good: it desired, of necessity, the infinite good* that was God himself and, contingently, all the other finite goods—doing so gradually, however, since it sought in them the greatest possible good.

The divine will was ordered and as such desired the end before the means. Since God was the final end “he loved himself first” in his three Persons, including that of the Word who was joined with humanity. The union of divine nature with human nature in Christ* was thus the final end in pursuit of which God desired creation: “Primo, God loves himself; secundo, he loves himself for others (amat se aliis), and this is pure love (amorcustus); tertio, he wishes to be loved by the other who, in the highest degree, can love him outside himself; quarto, he has foreseen the union of that nature which was to love him to the highest degree, even if nobody sinned” (Rep. III, d. 7, q. 4, §5; Wadding [W.] XI). In a Neoplatonic movement of procession and return, God extended his infinite love* by degrees through his creation and in return was loved by Christ with an infinite love. Christ was the end of all things (Rom 9), in him all people were predestined (Eph 1), for him all had been created (Col 1:15ff.). In the order of ends, Christ was willed for himself (as being alone capable of loving with an infinite love), man was willed next, and then creation. So the Incarnation* was willed and would have taken place even if Adam had not sinned. Thus Scotus responded to the question raised by Anselm*, Why a God who is man?, but in quite a different manner: God had to make himself man, independently of sin.

Nonetheless, in actuality Adam*’s sin had taken place. God had not wished it, but he had permitted it. He had also foreseen it and had planned a redemptive Incarnation, which would encounter the Passion and death (Rep. III, d. 7, q. 4, §4; W. XI, 451). But in the divine plan this meaning only arose after the event: in the first place God desired hypostatic* union, and after that the salvation* of all mankind; then he foresaw the fall of the latter and the corresponding remedy, “redemption through a mediator” (§3). The two meanings were linked: in point of fact the Son’s incarnation did have humanity’s redemption as its end, but “it would have taken place even if man had not sinned” (Opus Oxoniense = Ox. III, d. 7, q. 3, §3; W. VII, 202). The Incarnation was a metaphysical “and not a fortuitous” manifestation of divine generosity (Ox. III, d. 19, q. 1, §6; W. VII, 415). The motive for the Incarnation was not sin: in so much as he had foreseen and predestined Christ in the flesh and all the elected for grace and for glory, before he foresaw Christ’s Passion as a remedy for sin—in the same way that a doctor first desires a man’s health before prescribing a medicine for him (ibid.).

The Immaculate Conception (Mary*) ensued from Christ’s primacy. In the first place, original sin* was not transmitted as an infection of the flesh (concupiscence) but resided in the immaterial will (Ox. II, d. 30, q. 2, §2; W. VI, 936). Moreover, God had the power necessary to keep the Virgin from all sin in her soul. Finally, the order of ends was not chronological: in God’s plan it was appropriate that the most perfect mediator should mediate in the most perfect way; and so, by preserving Christ’s Mother first of all, the first link between Christ and humanity (Ox. III, d. 3, q. 1, §4; W.

VII, 92), God had given him the same grace, from the moment he came to life, as he gave to other human beings by means of baptism* (ibid., §9; W. VII, 94). And so he would not have been the most perfect redeemer “if he had not warranted Mary’s preservation from original sin” (ibid., §4; W. VII, 92). Christ’s primacy and the Immaculate Conception followed from the same principle of economy.

d) Grace and Predestination. Due to the identity between will and charity in God, the primacy of the divine will was that of grace—in complete contradiction of Pelagianism*. An action was meritorious only if God accepted it as such, by free will: therefore no finite action could oblige God to accept it (voluntarism*). God owed nothing to anyone, and grace was nothing but “the unforced will of God” (Ox. II, d. 2, q. 2, §15; W. VII, 83), without which no act had merit: it was a “God-shaped form” (Quodl. q. 17, §[5], 12; Alluntis, 616), which gave its status to every human action, a “participation in God” (Ox. III, d. 13, q. 4, §14; W. VII, 270), the indwelling of the Holy* Spirit in the human person. God’s assistance to human actions thus consisted of two concurrent causes contributing to the same effect (and making it more powerful): grace did not alter the nature of the act, for example the virtuous act, but it increased its intensity and marked it with divine acceptance. The human intellect and will pursued their objects naturally, but grace made these actions easier, more effective, and above all pleasing to God. Human thought was thus perfectly autonomous with respect to faith and action and will with respect to charity.

Divine freedom* was not arbitrary and desired only to bring about good things that would imitate its goodness (Rep. I, d. 47, q. 2, §[2]; XI, 237 a). The only necessary acceptance was that of the infinite good that was God by the infinite will that was God. The created order, for its part, was the object of a contingent and effective will, by which divine acceptance impelled it to exist (Quodl. q. 16, §[7], 29; Alluntis, 595): this was the second moment of acceptance. A third moment followed, by which God led the finite to eternal beatitude (Rep. I, d. 17, q. 2, §[4], W. XI, 96 b; see Ox. III, d. 32, §[2]; W. VII, 689). True beatitude was not acquired, like that of the philosophers, but received (Ord. Prol., §18). No human act was the exclusive cause of beatitude. Nothing was due, nothing was meritorious before God on its own account, except what he freely consented to recognize as such: human actions were therefore only an essential condition of beatitude, needing to be ratified by the divine will before the human person could receive the final bliss. “The reason for merit will derive completely from the divine will, which ordains each act to a recompense” (Ord. I, d. 17, §144—perhaps in response to Eckhart, Sermons 14 and 15). The act only became meritorious when it had been ratified by the free will both of God and of the finite intellectual subject: the act was within man’s power, since he had the use of his free will, but still he only prepared himself to receive the status of merit; a free divine dispensation would come to complete this disposition. Merit was therefore “an act of free power, realized in accordance with a gift of grace, and accepted by God as worthy of the recompense of beatitude” (Ord. I, d. 17, §146). And even though Scotus accentuated their opposition, free will and predestination* were perfectly compatible in his eyes, as were the contingency of the world and divine foreknowledge (Lect. I, d. 39).

e) Ethics and the Sacraments. God related to nature only by way of his freedom. Nothing of what was in nature*, neither moral excellence nor the sacraments*, could therefore bring about divine grace of necessity. The finite act did no more than seek the consent of the divine liberty. God was subject to no necessity, but he pledged his liberty in a covenant* or pact with mankind, in which he accepted certain signs and moral acts as worthy of receiving grace. The search for virtue* was necessary, but virtue and the observance of the natural law did not in themselves constitute merits: they became so only if they were inspired by charity (Ox. II, d. 7, q. 1, §11; W. VI, 566; Quodl. 17, §[5–9]; Alluntis, 615–22). As long as they acted with charity in mind, human beings could therefore be saved by conforming to the laws that God had set forth as conditions of grace and charity—the Ten Commandments. Only the first three, for that matter, belonged to the natural law, since their truth* was imposed on the divine intellect by an internal necessity, while the others were contingent, fixed by a divine will that could give exemption from them (Ox. III, d. 37, q. 1; W. VII, 857 Sq).

In the same way, sacramental formulae possessed no intrinsic virtue and were merely an essential condition, conferring grace in accordance with the free consent of the divine will, which had pledged to accompany such a sign of its grace (Ox. IV, d. 1, q. 4–5, §4; W. VIII, 81–82). What made penance* a sacrament was not the three human acts (contrition, confession, atonement) that were its conditions but the divine will to absolve, fulfilled when the priest (priesthood*) pronounced the formula of absolution—the priest for his part being in ignorance of God’s judgment* and of the penance appropriate to a given sin (Ox. IV, d. 16, q. 1, §7; W. IX, 247). In eucharistic theology, Scotus particularly criticized the theological concept of “transubstantiation.”

In his view, faith confined itself to the “conversion” of the bread into the body of Christ: there was no elimination of the first and production of the second but rather a “transformation” (translatio); there was no new substance but rather a new presence of God (Ox. IV, d. 11, q. 3, §13, 14, 22; W. VIII, 616–17, 618, 625–26).

3. Scotus’s Legacy and the Scotist School

The vigor of Scotus’s thought and the fame of his teaching made him the great Franciscan doctor of the 14th century, and his opponents—whether Thomists or nominalists—referred constantly to him. More than Scotus’s own responses, which are abstruse and hard to interpret, what stands out is the shift in the questions asked. Ockham confirmed his importance by frequently taking a view directly opposed to his (nominalism*). Scotus’s immediate followers, meanwhile, tried first and foremost to fill in the gaps in his uncompleted oeuvre. William of Alnwick (†1333) attempted to coordinate his theories on the object of divine thought. The greatest of these followers attempted to go further, but only the philosophical aspects of their work have been made the object of studies and editions. Peter Aureol (†1322) pondered the theory of knowledge as derived from the appearance of phenomena (notitia apparentium). Francis of Meyronnes (†1327), drawing on Pseudo-Dionysius*, emphasized God’s transcendence, which according to him was no longer to be seen as part of “common being”: God was no longer the infinite being but the infinity outside being. Meyronnes also offered a vigorous interpretation of formal distinction and went so far as to posit truly distinct “formalities” that composed the nature of simple things. John of Ripa (mid-14th century) attempted to incorporate the proof of God as infinite into a cosmology that accepted the infinity of the created world: God must consequently be referred to as immense, and his immensity must comprise a multiplicity of infinities.

So there arose a Scotist school, with its manuals, its tradition, its working tools, and its bitter and bilious feuds. It distinguished itself in disputation (the confrontation between Cajetan and Trombeta, see Boulnois 1993). Because it made Christ’s incarnation an end in itself, it influenced the French school of spirituality (Bérulle*). The doctrine of the Immaculate Conception spread through the Franciscan Order, then to the Catholic Church as a whole (Council of Basel*, 1439—albeit in a session held to be schismatic) until it was proclaimed in 1854. Because the Scotist school allowed the existence of an autonomous natural theology that dealt with God metaphysically, it influenced the structure of metaphysics from Suarez* to Kant* (Honnfelder 1979, 1990). Because it opposed the two theological poles of grace and nature, it formed a background against which Luther was able to bring about his theological upheaval (Vignaux 1934). And because it considered practical reason as belonging to the sphere of will, with no other consequence than to make human beings worthy of being blessed, it was a structural forerunner of the work of Kant (Möhle 1995).

- Opera omnia, Ed. Wadding, Lyon, 1639, repr. Hildesheim, 1968.
- Opera omnia editio nova juxta editionem Waddingi*, Ed. Vivès, 1891 Sq (in these two editions, use: Quaestiones super universalialia Porphyrii; Quaestiones in libros Elenchorum; Quaestiones in I et II librum Peri hermeneias; Quaestiones in librum Praedicamentorum; Quaestiones de anima; Quaestiones subtilissimae super libros Metaphysicorum Aristotelis [up to Book IX]; Collationes; Theoremata; Reportata Parisiensia).
- Critical edition: Opera omnia, cura et studio commissionis scotisticae, Ed. C. Balic, Vatican, 1950 Sq: Ordinatio I–II, d. 3; Lectura I–II (t. XVI–XIX parus). Plus two other editions.
- G. Guarrae, J. Duns Scoti, P. Aureoli, Quaestiones disputatae de Immaculata Conceptione, Quaracchi, 1904.
- Additiones magnae secundi libri*, Ed. C. Balic, Les commentaires de Jean Duns Scot sur les quatre livres des “Sentences,” Appendice, Louvain, 1927.
- Scotist School: François de Meyronnes, Doctoris illuminati passus super universalialia, Bologne, 1479; Opera, Venice, 1520; Quaestiones quodlibetales, Venice, 1507; Sent. I, Basel, 1489; II–IV, Venice, 1505–7.
- Quaestio de cognitione Dei*, Ed. C.R.S. Harris, Duns Scotus, vol. 2, The Philosophical Doctrines of Duns Scotus, Appendix, Oxford, 1927.
- Guillaume d’Alnwick, Quaestiones de esse intelligibili et de quodlibet, Florence, 1937.
- Tractatus de primo principio*, Ed. E. Roche, St. Bonaventure, N.Y., 1949.
- Jean de Ripa, Conclusiones, Ed. A. Combes, 1957; Lectura super primum sententiarum, 1961; Quaestio de gradu supremo, Ed. A. Combes, 1964; “De modo inexistendi divine essentiae in omnibus creaturas,” Ed. A. Combes, F. Ruello, Tr 23 (1967), 191–209; Lectura super primum Sententiarum, Prologi quaestiones ultimae, Ed. A. Combes, Paris, 1970.
- Cuestiones cuodlibetales*, Ed. Alluntis, Madrid, 1968.
- Translations: A. de Muralt, “Signification et portée de la pensée de Jean Duns Scot, Intr., trans. and commentary of the distinction 17 of the Opus Oxoniense II,” StPh 33 (1973), 113–49; “Pluralité des formes et unité de l’être, Intr., trans. and commentary of two texts from Duns Scotus, Sentences IV, d. 11, q. 3; Sentences II, d. 16, q. 1,” StPh 34 (1974), 57–92; Traité du premier principe, CR.Th.Ph, no 10, R. Imbach et al., 1983.
- Reportatio I A*, d. 2, Ed. A.B. Wolter, M. McCord Adams, “Duns Scotus’ Parisian Proof for the Existence of God,” FrSA, 42 (1982), 249–321.
- A. B. Wolter, Duns Scotus on the Will and Morality, Washington, D.C., 1986; Duns Scotus’ Political and Economic Philosophy, Santa Barbara, 1989; Duns Scotus’ Early Oxford Lecture on Individuation, Santa Barbara, 1992.
- A. de Muralt, “Commentary of the First Book of Sentences, d. 3, p. 3 (with an introduction on esse objectivum),” Philosophes médiévaux des XIIIe et XIVe siècles, 1986, 167–206.

- O. Boulnois, Sur la connaissance de Dieu et l'univocité de l'étant, Paris, 1988.
- G. Sondag, Le principe d'individuation (Ord. II, d. 3, p. 1), Paris, 1992; id., L'image (Ord. I, d. 3, p. 3, q. 1–4), Paris, 1993; id., La théologie comme science pratique (Prologue de la Lectura), Paris, 1996.
- ◆ P. Vignaux (1934), Justification et prédestination au XIVe siècle: Duns Scot, Pierre d'Auriol, Guillaume d'Occam, Grégoire de Rimini, Paris; id. (1972), "Infini, liberté et histoire du salut," StSS 5, Rome, 495–507; id. (1978), "Lire Duns Scot aujourd'hui," Regnum hominis et regnum Dei, Acta Quarti Congressus Scotistici Internationalis, Rome (= Philosophie au Moyen Age, 1987, 243–65).
- J. Owens (1948), "Up to What Point Is God Included in the Metaphysics of Duns Scotus?," MS 10, 165–71.
- É. Gilson (1952), Jean Duns Scot, Introduction à ses positions fondamentales, Paris.
- A. Magrini (1952), Johannis Duns Scoti doctrina de scientifica theologiae natura, Rome.
- W. Pannenberg (1954), Die Prädestinationslehre des Duns Scotus in Zusammenhang der scholastischen Lehrentwicklung, Göttingen.
- J. Finkenzeller (1961), Offenbarung und Theologie nach der Lehre des Johannes Duns Scotus, BGPhMA 38.
- W. Dettloff (1963), Die Entwicklung der Akzeptations- und Verdienstlehre von Duns Scotus bis Luther, Münster.
- E. Wölfel (1965), Seinsstruktur und Trinitätsproblem: Untersuchungen zur Grundlegung der natürlicher Theologie bei Johannes Duns Scotus, Münster.
- L. Veuthey (1967), Jean Duns Scot, pensée théologique, Paris.
- F. Wetter (1967), Die Trinitätslehre des Johannes Duns Scotus, Münster.
- L. Walter (1968), Das Glaubenverständnis bei Johannes Duns Scotus, Munich.
- M. Pellegrini (1970), La rivelazione nell'insegnamento di Duns Scotus, Rome.
- A. Ghisalberti (1972), "Il Dio dei teologi e il Dio dei filosofi secondo Duns Scotus," StSS 5, 153–64.
- L. Honnefelder (1979), Ens in quantum ens: Der Begriff des Seienden als solchen als Gegenstand der Metaphysik nach der Lehre des Johannes Duns Scotus, Münster; id. (1990), Scientia transcendens: Die formale Bestimmung der Seiendheit und Realität in der Metaphysik des Mittelalters und der Neuzeit, Hamburg.
- C. Bérubé (1983), De l'homme à Dieu selon Duns Scot, Henri de Gand et Olivi, Rome.
- A. B. Wolter (1990), The Philosophical Theology of John Duns Scotus, Ithaca.
- O. Boulnois (1993), "Puissance neutre et puissance obéissante: De l'homme à Dieu selon Duns Scot et Cajetan," in B. Pinchard, S. Ricci (Ed.), Rationalisme analogique et humanisme théologique, la culture de Thomas de Vio "Il Gaetano", Naples, 31–70; id. (1994) (Ed.), La puissance et son ombre, Paris; id. (1995), "Quand commence l'ontothéologie? Aristote, Thomas d'Aquin et Duns Scot," in S.-T. Bonino (Ed.), Saint Thomas et l'ontothéologie, RThom, 95, 85–108; id. (1997), Duns Scot. La rigueur de la charité, Paris; id. (Ed.) (1999), Duns Scot, de la métaphysique à l'éthique, Philosophie, no. 61.
- M. Burger (1994), Personalität in Horizont absoluter Prädestination: Untersuchungen zur Christologie des Johannes Duns Scotus und ihrer Reception in modernen theologischen Ansätze, Münster.
- H. Möhle (1995), Ethik als scientia practica nach Johannes Duns Scotus, Eine philosophische Grundlegung, Münster.

Bibliographies

- O. Schäfer (1950), Bibliographia de vita operibus et doctrina Iohannis Duns Scoti, Rome.
- S. Gieben (1965), Bibliographia scotistica recentior [1953–65], Rome.

OLIVIER BOULNOIS

See also Bonaventure; Justification; Predestination; Scholasticism; Thomas Aquinas; Thomism; Voluntarism

E

Easter. See Resurrection of Christ

Ecclesiastical Discipline

The expression ecclesiastical discipline refers to a group of laws, rules, and statutes that concern the organization and the activities of churches* and religious communities. It has an exact meaning in Protestant churches, but it also has its own sense in the Catholic Church, where there is a canonical law made of canons grouped in a code or in corpus. In canon law*, the expression ecclesiastical discipline refers to the part of law (sometimes called penal law) in which the exercise of the coercive power of the church over followers is organized, with excommunication as the ultimate realization. The churches of the Reformation, however, have strong reservations with regard to excommunication, although it appears in the founding texts.

a) Discipline in Protestant Churches. The term discipline is especially used in the reformed churches. For example, the Reformed Church of France publishes Statuts, discipline et règlement général d'application (Statutes, Disciplines, and General Rules of Application). More broadly, the term can designate in general the ecclesiastical law of the churches of the Reformation. In opposition to the canon law of the Roman Church, which many commentators try to base on or explain from the doctrine, discipline or ecclesiastical law, in this way, is based only on the need for organization. Thus, these churches make a fundamental distinction between doctrine and discipline. This organization must be just to meet the role the church should play in societies*, a responsibility that falls onto the communities themselves, especially through the processes of deliberation. This law contains the organizational rules for the local churches, catechesis, ministries*, the organization of the synods*, and so forth, all provisions that regulate and allow communal life and are therefore susceptible to revision and adaptation.

b) Ecclesiastical Discipline and Canon Law. An entire book of the code of canon law (1. VI) and a title of the code of canon of the Catholic Eastern Churches are devoted to sanctions in the Catholic Church. In the code of 1917, this law was called penal and, as in today's code, its rules were mostly technical. The principles it outlined explained how to apply this law. Canon 1317, for example, states that “penalties are to be established only in so far as they are really necessary for the better maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline.” But no explanation on the ecclesiastical meaning of this right can be found. The beginning of book VI of the code of 1983 states: “The church has its own inherent right to constrain with penal sanctions Christ’s faithful who commit offences.” Commentators are needed to understand this meaning. Some base the conception of “innate law” on the fact that the church is organized like a society that must regulate the activities of the faithful while protecting the institution and its realm of action against all acts that harm it. Without fully covering it, this position is in line with the ecclesiology* of the societas iudice perfecta that developed in reaction against the modern states that wanted power over their subjects themselves subjected to the church. Other commentators, without denying the necessity of having a body of rules guaranteeing discipline inside the church, questioned the exercise of an ecclesiastical power of coercion. To them it seemed exceeded by the existence of an ecclesiastical communion* stated in the texts of Vatican* II, and consequently they asked that a law of a retributive nature be replaced by a “penal system sui generis.”

Thus, these commentators ask us to look back to history and the formation of the church’s coercive power. Early and medieval church historians have shown that, since its beginnings, the church has had recourse to judicial practices to sanction faults (Mt 18:15–18; 2 Cor 2:6; 1 Cor 5:11 ff.). Before the 12th century, however, such practices developed without penal processes and the imposition of canonical punishment (excommunications, suspensions, depositions) was totally distinct. From the 12th to the 14th century, there is mention of “the interpenetration of penal and coercive aspects of ecclesiastical discipline,” as well as of “their progressive differentiation toward secular penal law” (Meunier 1975). The distinction made by canon law and the theology* of power of jurisdiction* alongside a power of order would allow for the building of a framework for the disciplinary power of the church and for differentiating it from penitential discipline. It was this power of jurisdiction that the Catholic Church would claim from the states, thus defining the church’s innate right to impose punishments. But the distinction made between coercive actions of the church on an external level and its action on an internal level or at the level of conscience* (by the sacrament of penance*, notably by virtue of the principle that “all offense is a sin*”) shows that, for the actual judicial system, penal law and penitential discipline still complete each other.

- C. Munier (1975), “Discipline pénitentielle et droit pénal ecclésiastique: Alliances et différenciation,” Concilium: Revue internationale de théologie 107, 23–32.
- A. Borras (1987), L’excommunication dans le nouveau Code de droit canonique, Paris.
- B. Reymond (1992), Entre la grâce et la loi: Introduction au droit ecclésiastique protestant, Geneva.

PATRICK VALDRINI

See also Canon Law; Jurisdiction; Law and Christianity; Law and Legislation; Penance

Ecclesiology

Ecclesiology is the study of the church*. It is an important aspect of dogmatic theology*, as significant as Christology*, pneumatology, eschatology*, anthropology*, and so on. It is the theological arena in which the church considers itself, the point of convergence of systematic, historical, and practical research, which it develops and expresses to today’s community of believers, who live and confess their faith* in diverse cultural and sociological contexts. The keynotes of ecclesiological discourse are the actualization and concretization of the biblical message in the daily lives of God’s people.

1. Historical Development

Although they mention the church and most of the themes on which ecclesiology would be based, biblical texts offer no ecclesiological treatise. Ecclesiological thought first appears in the works of the Fathers*. Ignatus of Antioch, for example, saw the church as a cosmic entity encompassing heaven and earth (Letter to the Ephesians 9, 1; Letter to the Smyrniotes 7, 2); Hippolytus of Rome understood it as a holy community prefiguring eschatological reality (Commentary on Daniel I, 14–18); Irenaeus* of Lyons spoke of a church founded on the Spirit and on truth*, from which the characteristics of the church derive (Against Heresies III, 24). Later, Cyprian* of Carthage maintained the necessity of the church for salvation* (De ecclesiae catholicae unitate 6) and the special place of the episcopal ministry (ibid., 17). Augustine*, meanwhile, proposed a distinction between the visible church and the invisible Church (De civitate dei XI–XXII) that would become central to later ecclesiology. These remarks cannot, however, be taken as constituting a comprehensive and systematically presented ecclesiology. The period was characterized by a variety of ecclesiological currents reflecting different ecclesial structures*, but no particular form of ecclesiology was positively adopted by the councils*.

In the West, the unification of canon law* under Gratian in the 12th century brought with it more systematic ecclesiological thought. The first complete theological treatises devoted to the church as institution soon appeared (See Jacques de Viterbe Christian Government or Giles of Rome's The Power of the Church, which was the inspiration for Boniface VIII's Bull Unam Sanctam of 1302; DS 870 Sq). The most important treatise was probably the one produced by the Spanish Dominican Juan de Torquemada around 1450 (Summa de ecclesia; see DThC XVI, 1235 Sq).

Unlike the ecclesiological works of the later Middle Ages, which are generally commentaries on canon law, the ecclesiology developed by the 16th-century Reformation was more dogmatic and catechetical in scope. The reformers saw ecclesiology as a theological statement that gave an account of the faith of believers confessing the one holy catholic and apostolic Church. This emphasis would be taken up by Catholic theology, which after the 18th century distinguished between an ecclesiology within fundamental* theology, a discourse that developed a vision of the church as the means and instrument of transmission of divine revelation*, and an ecclesiology within dogmatic theology, whose key topics were the origin of the church, its nature, structures and organization; its work and mission*; its mediation, its sacraments* and ministries*; its worship, liturgy* and preaching*; its piety and its future (eschatology).

The 19th century saw a number of comprehensive ecclesiological statements, initially from individual theologians such as J. A. Möhler or M. J. Scheeben*. It was intended to propose a comprehensive ecclesiology at Vatican* I, but only chapter nine of its Schema de ecclesia, the dogmatic constitution Pastor aeternus (DS 3050 Sq), was approved in 1870. The encyclicals Satis cognitum by Leo XIII (1896; DS 3300 Sq) and Mystici corporis by Pius XII (1943; DS 3800 Sq) marked important new stages. It was not until Vatican* II, however, that the Catholic Church put forward its first complete ecclesiological treatise to be authorized by the magisterium*, the dogmatic constitution on the Catholic Church Lumen Gentium.

By virtue of its desire for Church unity*, contemporary ecumenical dialogue is logically focused on ecclesiological issues. This dialogue has led most of the major denominational families to rethink and reformulate their ecclesiology. One might cite as an example the European Lutheran and Reformed Churches, which in 1994 approved and adopted “The Church of Jesus Christ,” their first joint ecclesiological text since the 16th century (Accords and Dialogues II, 81 Sq); or the work of the Commission on Faith and Constitution of the Ecumenical Council of Churches, which recently presented an important ecclesiological study, The Church and the World (1991).

2. A Special Difficulty of Ecclesiology

Seen from the standpoint of the theory of knowledge, ecclesiology belongs to a distinctive genre. The church is, generally speaking, both the subject and the object of its research, since the special preserve of ecclesiological research is the church itself. The main problem arises however from the difficulty of defining the church as an object of research. The same term church commonly denotes a spiritual entity as well as a number of very different realities: from matters of worship to ecclesiastical structures and authorities, from the local community to national and international organizations, from the worldly mission to sociological data, or even the simple designation of buildings. This multiplicity of meanings is significant, and flows inevitably from the fitting of the Church, as a spiritual reality, into the material life of human society*. If ecclesiological research limits itself to topics visible and accessible to human logic, namely the institution and forms of the institutional church and its history* and sociology, it risks losing sight of the unique characteristic of the Church (as community of believers throughout time), its link with the divine reality of grace* that is its true foundation. If research is focused on this last aspect, it can no longer resort to its usual scientific approach, and must instead employ images and analogies*—just as, for example, Scripture* and tradition* emphasize conceptions of the Church as “God’s people,” “the bride of the Savior,” “the body of Christ*,” or “the temple of the Spirit.” None of these images can fully express the unique nature of the Church, which transcends each of them, indeed all of them together.

Generally speaking, modern ecclesiology begins with biblical testimony and takes its cue from the Church's confession of faith over the centuries. The Christian faith lives by the certainty that the Holy* Spirit arouses faith and gathers believers into the one holy catholic and apostolic Church, the communion* of saints. This Church, originating with faith, appears in material forms that differ from century to century and from place to place. Starting with these two dimensions, ecclesiology attempts to make the theological approach and empirical research complementary.

3. Ecclesiology As a Subject of Debate

Ecclesiology inevitably takes a critical view of contemporary ecclesial pronouncements, which it analyzes and with whose development it must keep pace. It inevitably gives rise to reassessments that can cause conflicts at every level. This observation holds true for each separate ecclesiastical tradition (e.g., the debate aroused within the Catholic Church by the theology of H. Küng or L. Boff). It is also relevant to modern ecumenical dialogue, where ecclesiological issues remain the principal stumbling blocks in the search for Church unity. The difficulty becomes apparent as soon as there is any attempt to connect the Church as object of faith with the church as empirical reality. It gives rise to contradictory definitions that find expression for the most part in three closely connected areas, around which the great debates of modern ecclesiology are focused.

a) The first issue is the relationship between the Church as object of faith and the church as ecclesiastical institution. It is generally agreed that the communion of believers could not exist without an institutional structure, but not everyone accords the same importance to the latter. So, for the churches born of the 16th-century Reformation, the Church of Jesus Christ transcends any institutional form—no concrete expression of the church in this world can claim to be a full realization of the Church instituted by Christ. The ecclesiastical institution is a matter of human law; it is imperfect and always in need of reform. The Catholic and Orthodox Churches are reluctant to view their structural and institutional expressions in relative terms, considering them indeed to be as willed by God—even if, since Vatican II, the Catholic Church no longer considers itself the only possible expression of the Church of Christ (See ecumenism*). A similar approach in ecclesiology has obvious consequences for the view of hierarchy*, of church government*, and of authority* within the church, or for the understanding of the various ministries. This is not merely an interdenominational question, but a subject of debate within every Christian community. It is not simply a matter of time and place, but an expression of divergent systems of ecclesiology.

b) The second major difficulty of ecclesiology arises from the place accorded to the church within the divine mystery* as a whole. Some see ecclesiology as deriving from Christology and soteriology (Schmaus 1958; MySal 1972–73). For others it is a part of pneumatology (Pannenberg 1993), while still others hold it to be the keystone of all dogmatic theology (Tillard 1987; Siegwalt 1986). These individual interpretations reflect a fundamental choice, which Vatican II approached by asserting “that there is an order or ‘hierarchy’ of the truths of Catholic doctrine, by reason of their different relationships with the basis of the Christian faith” (decree on ecumenism, UR 11). Even though the council did not specify this “hierarchy,” the Catholic Church is undeniably a central element in it, as the ecclesiological constitution Lumen Gentium makes clear.

Some strands within Protestantism, following Schleiermacher*, have considered ecclesiology to be a mere appendix to dogmatics, since for them the Church, as a society of believers, is above all an empirical reality. Contemporary dialogues have enabled clear progress to be made, and the churches that began with the 16th-century Reformation today state that communion within the church cannot be dissociated from the justification* of the believer (The Church of Jesus Christ II, 87). Nonetheless, the church's place in God's work of salvation remains an open question in ecumenical dialogue, in which some attribute to the church and its mediations an importance that others cannot accept (See Birmelé 1986). These different approaches have resulted in a divergence in ecclesiology, leading some Christian traditions to consider themselves as the one true expression of the Church as body of Christ.

c) A third issue central to ecclesiology is the relationship between the church and contemporary society. All factions agree in emphasizing that the church must engage itself in the affairs of this world*, but they differ in their definitions of the terms of this mission and its consequences for the church. Some advocate a separation between the holy Church and the secular world (Zizioulas 1981), while others call for an osmosis (e.g., Rendtorff 1969). With its insistence on human dignity and on the need for interaction between the church and the world for the good of all humanity, the pastoral constitution put forward by Vatican II, “The Pastoral constitution on the church in the modern world” (GS), developed a comprehensive vision to a large extent shared by other Christian traditions. Nevertheless, the relations between church and state*, the understanding of the laity (lay*), questions of culture (inculturation*), and relations with other religions, as well as more sociological aspects such as minority-majority relations, all remain ecclesiological issues—and frequently sources of controversy, not only between the Christian churches but within each one of them. In all these fields, ecclesiology must try to offer solutions that will permit the church to fulfill its vocation; and it is obliged to take a stand. No systematic consideration of the church could remain neutral.

- Augustine, De civitate dei (PL 41).
- Cyprian of Carthage, De ecclesiae catholicae unitate (CChr.SL 3).
- Hyppolitus of Rome, Commentarium in Danielem (SC 14).
- Ignatius of Antioch, Letters to the Churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Rome, Tralles, Smyrna (SC 10).
- Irenaeus of Lyons, Against Heresies I-III (SC 263, 264, 293, 294, 210 and 211).
- Vatican II, decrees: COD 817–1135 (DCO II/2, 1661–2300).
- Église et monde: L'unité de l'Église et le renouveau de la communauté humaine* (text from Foi et Constitution, COE), Paris, 1993.
- L'Église de Jésus-Christ*, in A. Birmelé, J. Terme (Ed.), Accords et dialogues œcuméniques, Paris, 1995.
- ♦ Y. Congar (1941), Esquisse du mystère de l'Église, Paris (2nd Ed. 1966).
- H. de Lubac (1953), Méditation sur l'Église, Paris (2nd Ed. 1975).
- M. Schmaus (1958), Katholische Dogmatik III/1, Munich.
- H. Rahner (1964), Symbole der Kirche: Die Ekklesiologie der Väter, Salzburg.

- H. Küng (1967), Die Kirche, Freiburg-Munich (2nd Ed. 1980).
- T. Rendtorff (1969), Christentum außerhalb der Kirche, Hamburg.
- Coll. (1972, 1973), MySal IV/1 (contributions by H. Schlier, W. Beinert, H. Fries, O. Semmelroth, and Y. Congar) and IV/2 (contributions by P. Huizing and B. Dupuy).
- A. Dulles (1976), Models of the Church: A Critical Assessment of the Church in All Its Aspects, Dublin.
- W. Kreck (1981), Grundfragen der Ekklesiologie, Munich.
- H. Rikhof (1981), The Concept of the Church: A Methodological Inquiry into the Use of Metaphors in Ecclesiology, London-Shepherdstown.
- L. Boff (1985), Église, charisme et pouvoir, Paris.
- J. Zizioulas (1985), Being As Communion, Crestwood, N.Y.
- A. Birmelé (1986), Le salut en Jésus-Christ dans les dialogues œcuméniques, CFi 141.
- H. Döring (1986), Grundriss der Ekklesiologie, Darmstadt.
- G. Siegwalt (1986–), Dogmatique pour la catholicité évangélique, Paris-Geneva.
- J.-M. Tillard (1987), Église d'Églises, CFi 143.
- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie, vol. III, Göttingen.
- B. Forte (1995), La Chiesa Icona della Trinità, Milan.
- K. Rahner (1995), Selbstvollzug der Kirche, SW 19, Düsseldorf-Freiburg.
- J.-M. Tillard (1995), L'Église locale, CFi 191.

ANDRÉ BIRMELE

See also Authority; Church; Church and State; Communion; Council; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Ecumenism; Eucharist; Government, Church; Hierarchy; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility; Local Church; Magisterium; Ministry; Regional Church; Structures, Ecclesial; Unity of the Church

Eckhart von Hohenheim (Meister). See Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Ecology

Ecology is the study of the natural world as an interconnected whole in which all things, including human beings, are related in complex interdependence. Scientifically, all living things constitute an ecosphere that includes many ecosystems. On a philosophical, religious, or ethical level, ecosystems principally lead to notions that stress the intrinsic value and interdependence of all living things and nature. Of late there has been a growing awareness that human intervention disregards and destroys the interdependence of ecosystems and is responsible for a global ecological crisis, which endangers humanity by endangering nature. This calls for theological reflection, which needs to criticize and rethink the Christian view of the place of human beings in creation* and their responsibility toward other creatures. Ecological theology* and ecological ethics* in this sense are recent disciplines, but they incorporate earlier theological thought.

The biblical resources for Christian ecological thought comprise four main themes. 1) Human dominion: At the Creation, human beings were commanded by God* to “subdue” the earth and to “have dominion” over other living creatures (Gn 1:28; Ps 8:6–8). They have a unique role within creation. Their creation in the divine image is unique (Gn 1:26, 9:6), which enables them to represent God and rule over creation. However, there is no suggestion in the Bible* that the entire creation exists for humanity. 2) The community of creation: Human beings may stand above all other creatures, they are creatures themselves, who share the earth with all the beings that God has created. Thus, after the Flood God makes a covenant with all human beings and all animals (Gn 9:8–17). According to Psalm 104:23, human beings are just one of the living creatures for whom God provides; the earth is the habitat for living creatures, and each holds a God-given place. The same understanding is embodied in laws that restrict exploitation of the land (Ex 23:11; Lv 25:7), and in the teaching of Jesus* (Mt 6:25 f.). 3) Creation as theocentric reality: Creation exists not for humanity, but for the glory of God. All creatures, inanimate and animate, praise and adore him (Ps 148; Rev 5:13). Therefore each creature has worth, which is given by the Creator and offered back to him in praise. 4) The redemption of all creation: Biblical soteriology does not separate human beings from the rest of the world but recognizes their solidarity with all that was created (Col 1:20). The hope* of salvation* is extended to all creation, which in the end will be delivered from corruption (Rom 8:20–21) and be made new (2 Pt 3:13; Rev 21:1). Human beings have no future independent of the rest of creation.

In the theological tradition* up to the early modern period, the notion of human dominion over nature was interpreted through ideas drawn from the Stoics and Aristotle. This brought up the idea of a creation made for human beings, an idea that leads to a tendentious reading of Genesis. To dominate then meant that human beings had the right to use all creatures to meet their own needs. Many contemporary critics, following Lynn White (1967), have seen in this the ideological source of the exploitation of nature that has produced today’s ecological crisis, but this is very scant. Up to the Reformation, there was no sense of dominion as an obligation to extend human mastery over nature; further, people had no idea that nature could be completely transformed. To dominate nature simply meant the right to use it in the limited way that was then possible. Moreover, the view that the world exists for human benefit was balanced by the very idea of creation that made human beings creatures of God alongside other creatures.

The modern project of technological domination of nature has its direct roots not in the theological tradition itself, but in the way that it was modified by Renaissance* humanism and by Francis Bacon (1561–1626). For the humanists, dominion over the world was so sovereign and creative that human beings had both the ability and the right to refashion nature as they chose. Any sense of limitations inherent to the creature disappeared and was replaced by a limitless aspiration to master and to create. The Renaissance thus provided the vision that inspired the modern project of dominating nature, while Francis Bacon drew from Genesis a program of scientific and technological enterprise, in which mastery of nature’s laws was to be the means of subjecting nature entirely to human needs.

However, this was not the only way in which the role of human beings in the universe could be conceived. In the Middle Ages, an alternative conception appeared, for example, in hagiographies portraying human being living in paradisiacal harmony with all creatures, with a powerful eschatological symbolism. Here, dominion is benevolent rule with a strong sense of what all creatures have in common. This is shown in Saint Francis of Assisi (1181–1226) and the Canticle of the Creatures. An idea that first appeared in 17th-century England and that has become influential today (e.g., Wilkinson 1980) turns human beings into stewards of creation. In this light, human beings have received the task of managing God’s work on his behalf, and are responsible to God for how they do it. This view recognizes value in nonhuman creation, other than its usefulness to humanity, and gives human beings obligations to treat it accordingly. However, this implies that nature needs the active intervention of human beings. A truly ecological theology, on the other hand, holds that human beings have so little importance within the universe that it limits any notion of a rule over creation. Recent variations on the theme include ideas of human beings as priests of creation, enabling creation to be itself to the praise of God (e.g., Gunton 1992), or as servants of creation, participating in Christ's salvific role of delivering creation from human oppression (e.g., Linzey 1994).

Recent theology includes varied attempts to conceive the relationships of God, human beings, and the rest of the world in ways that replace the idea of hierarchical domination with that of ecological interconnectedness. These include Moltmann's strongly christological and pneumatological interpretation of these connections (1985, 1989); ecofeminist theologies that see the domination of nature as an aspect of patriarchy (e.g., Ruether 1993); the creation spiritualities of Matthew Fox (1988) or Thomas Berry (See Berry and Swimme 1992); and, finally, a trend moving away from anthropocentrism to return to the notion of "respect for life" of Albert Schweitzer (1885–1965), for example by L. K. Daly (in Birch, et al. 1990). There have even been attempts to show that the intrinsic value of nonhuman creatures forces human beings to recognize their responsibility toward them, and also implies that animals have rights (e.g. Linzey 1994), or of all participants in the ecosphere (Moltmann 1989).

- L. White, Jr. (1967), "The Historical Roots of our Ecological Crisis," in I.G. Barbour (Ed.) (1973), Western Man and Environmental Ethics, Reading, Mass.

- D. S. Wallace-Hadrill (1968), The Greek Patristic View of Nature, Manchester.
- L. Wilkinson (Ed.) (1980), Earthkeeping: Christian Stewardship of Natural Resources, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- J. Moltmann (1985), Gott in der Schöpfung: Ökologische Schöpfungslehre, 2nd Rev. Ed., Munich.
- M. Fox (1988), The Coming of the Cosmic Christ, San Francisco.
- R. D. Sorrell (1988), St. Francis of Assisi and Nature, Oxford.
- J. Moltmann (1989), Der Weg Jesu Christi, Munich.
- R. F. Nash (1989), The Rights of Nature: A History of Environmental Ethics, Madison, Wis.
- C. Birch, W. Eakin, J. B. Daniel (Ed.) (1990), Liberating Life: Contemporary Approaches to Ecological Theology, New York.
- T. Berry, B. Swimme (1992), The Universe Story, San Francisco.
- C. E. Gunton (1992), Christ and Creation, Carlisle.
- Com(F)* XVIII/3 (1993), L'écologie.
- R. R. Ruether (1993), God and Gaia: An Ecofeminist Theology of Earth Healing, London.
- Éthique* (1994/3), L'écologie: Humanisme ou naturalisme?
- A. Linzey (1994), Animal Theology, London.
- M. Oeschlager (1994), Caring for Creation: An Ecumenical Approach to the Environmental Crisis, New Haven.
- J. B. Callicott (1996), "Environnement," DEPhM, 498–501.

RICHARD BAUCKHAM

See also Adam; Anthropology; Cosmos; Spirituality, Franciscan; Woman

Economy of Salvation. See Salvation

Ecumenical Dialogue. See Ecumenism

Ecumenical Movement. See Ecumenism

Ecumenism

1. Origin and Significance

Oikoumenè, the past participle of the Greek verb oikein (to inhabit), was used by Herodotus (c. 490–425/420 B.C.) to designate the inhabited world. The biblical writings seldom use this term, although it was popular in the Hellenistic world of the era. The Septuagint (the first Greek translation of the Bible*, started in the third century B.C.) uses it to translate some passages of the Psalms*. In the New Testament, Luke 2:1 and Matthew 24:14 use it to designate the Roman Empire, and in Hebrews 2:5 Oikoumenè refers to the unity of humanity and God* in eschatology*.

In the ancient church*, Oikoumenè had both a political meaning (the Roman world) and church meaning (the totality of Christians). In Constantine's reign (306–37), the two meanings were confused. A decisive role was played by the synods* or councils* called ecumenical, for their decisions were applied to all of Christendom and to the whole empire. By the end of the Roman and Byzantine Empires, Oikoumenè was stripped of its political meaning, and only had church significance: the Oikoumenè was the universal Church. During the sixth century, the patriarchate of Constantinople was called “ecumenical” in order to signify its preeminence over several Eastern Churches. This preeminence had already been acknowledged by Emperor Constantine. This usage triggered animated reactions from pope* Gregory I (590–604). In the West the Reformation, which was reticent about the term catholic, generally a synonym for Roman Catholic, gave a new topicality to Oikoumenè. The notion then designated the fullness and unity* of the universal Church, the Christendom of all countries, brought together and guided by the Holy* Spirit. The Church is ecumenical, because, when announcing the gospel to the whole world, it is one and catholic, it is the Church in its fullness given by God.

It was only in the 20th century that the Swedish bishop N. Soederblom (1866–1930) gave Oikoumenè and the adjective ecumenical the sense that they have today in theology*: everything that relates to bringing together, to the reconciliation and to the unity of churches within what is called the Ecumenical Movement. The noun ecumenism was introduced in 1937 by the French Dominican, Yves Congar, and then was adopted and confirmed by Vatican* II in the Decree on Ecumenism, Unitatis Redintegratio. In a fundamental study (Geschichte und Sinn des Wortes “ökumenisch,” 1953), W. A. Visser't Hooft (1900–1985), the first secretary general of the World* Council of Churches (WCC), notes seven meanings of the adjective ecumenical over the course of history*. They are: 1) “what belongs to the inhabited world or represents it,” 2) “what belongs to the Roman Empire or represents it,” 3) “what has a universal Church value,” 4) “what concerns the universal missionary task” (mission*), 5) “what involves the relationships between churches or Christians of different confessional origins,” 6) “the spiritual consciousness of belonging to the world communion* of Christian churches,” and 7) “the availability of committing oneself to the unity of the Church.”

The use of the word ecumenical today goes beyond the single church category. Some use it to refer to the dialogue that churches have with other religions; others see it as a qualitative term for all efforts of consensus or unity between individuals or groups.

2. Churches' Commitment to Ecumenism

At first, ecumenism was the concern of Protestant churches. Around the end of the 19th century, the need for a better cooperation among churches led to the creation of the first international organizations, and these would lead to the birth of the WCC in 1948. This step was facilitated by the ecclesiological approach to Protestantism*. While understanding itself as the full and true expression of the unique church of Christ*, a church born of the Reformation nevertheless did not pretend to be the only authentic expression of the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church. The Church of Christ, moreover, existed in other forms and traditions. The division and mutual nonrecognition of churches were, however, unacceptable. Communion in the celebration of the Word* and sacraments* was the necessary and sufficient condition for two churches to become one, without, all the while, being uniform.

The concerns of Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed, Methodist, and Baptist Churches, among others, were twofold. On one hand, doctrinal controversy, which had brought about mutual condemnation, had to be transcended. On the other hand, a common form of commitment within society* had to be found. These two concerns were adopted by the Faith and Order Movement, as well as by the Life and Work Movement. Because these movements did not always have the same priorities, there was a certain tension—even opposition—in the two ecumenical options proposed by the churches born of the Reformation. Today, this tension is still perceptible, both within the WCC and within individual churches. Certain traditions, such as the Anglican Communion and Lutheran Churches, give more weight to the Church’s communal character in the Ecumenical Movement, the common commitment being the consequence of rediscovered unity. Other Protestant denominations give less importance to ecclesiology* and prioritize common social, ethic, and political initiatives. The visible unity of the Church would be one of the consequences of this ecumenism. The Protestant understanding of ecumenism is still marked by these various approaches, even if all involved agree that the unity of the Church could not be separated from the revival and unity of all humanity.

Insisting on the self-government of sister churches, the Orthodox Churches have always been committed to a council vision of the one Church, based on the unbroken tradition of the seven Ecumenical Councils—from Nicaea* I (325) to Nicaea II (787). While seeing themselves as belonging to the only true Church of Christ, they do not dismiss the presence of a church life beyond their limits. This option allows them to seek dialogue and cooperation with other Christian communities without, all the while, coming to a conclusion about their community qualities. In a 1920 encyclical, the patriarch of Constantinople called for a universal communion of churches. As early as 1927 several self-governed churches and a few formerly Eastern churches participated in the first international conference of the Faith and Order Movement in Lausanne. Orthodoxy* regards doctrinal consensus as preliminary to all ecumenical progress. Considering the obstacles that lie in the way of such a consensus, Orthodoxy has often adopted a prudent, wait-and-see policy. The churches in this tradition nevertheless joined the WCC in 1961, even though they still had various reservations, and, when necessary, expressed dissent.

The Roman Catholic Church and the Eastern churches that recognize the primacy of the pope joined the Ecumenical Movement at a later date. At first, all ideas about ecumenism were rejected. The 1896 encyclical of Leon XIII (1878–1903), Satis Cognitum (in Acta Apostolicae sedis, 1895–96) specifies that there is only one Church of Jesus Christ, the Church for which the Roman pontiff is responsible. To leave this Church means straying from the path of salvation* (Satis Cognitum). The 1928 encyclical circulated by Pius XI (1922–39), Mortalium animos (in Acta Apostolicae sedis, 1928) forbids any relationship with other Christian communities and all contact with the Ecumenical Movement.

The breakthrough came with Vatican II and was concretized when the Decree on Ecumenism was published. The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen Gentium, made this evolution possible by specifying that “the one Church of Christ . . . subsists in the Catholic Church, which is governed by the successor of Peter and by the bishops in communion with him” (LG 8). This subsistit in is the traditional is and it allowed the council to note about the Catholic Church that “many elements of sanctification and of truth* are found outside of its visible structure” (LG 8 and UR 3). While insisting on the uniqueness of the Catholic Church bound to the pope, the only Church in full, the council proposed common prayer*, doctrinal dialogue for a better mutual understanding, and reestablishment of unity, as well as collaboration in service in this world (UR 4–12).

This commitment to ecumenism was confirmed repeatedly in the years after the council—for example, in John Paul II’s 1995 encyclical Ut unum sint. The Catholic Church participated in several ecumenical dialogues under the charge of the Secretariat for Unity (today, the Pontifical Council for Unity). Councils of churches were established in several countries, and cults* and ecumenical gatherings have become regular occurrences. The Catholic Church’s self-understanding as the only Church in full, however, does not allow it to recognize separate churches and communities as “equivalent” partners. This point still lies in the way of its full participation in the WCC.

3. Multiple Forms of Ecumenism

Ecumenism—like all Church life—is a complex and multifaceted reality. Its integrity and indivisibility make it so that it cannot be reduced to a single aspect. One can, however, distinguish a few fundamental thrusts that interact to form the whole.

a) Doctrinal Ecumenism. Because the division of churches was condemned doctrinally, particular importance has been given to theological dialogues between churches. The majority of confessional families (family*, confessional) have participated and have been able to reach remarkable consensus that have allowed them to go beyond traditional controversy. The most significant results were obtained through the multilateral work of the Faith and Order Commission of the WCC and in bilateral dialogues, essentially between Roman Catholics and Anglicans, between Roman Catholics and Lutherans, and between the various traditions that came out of the Reformation. Among these, the consensus was such that, in many areas, full communion was reestablished, with communities mutually recognizing each other as the full and authentic expression of the one Church of Christ.

In the dialogues launched between the churches of the Reformation and the Roman Catholic Church there has been real progress, even if the final stage, that of full mutual recognition, has not been fully achieved. The remaining disagreements mostly concern the understanding of the role of the church in the saving act of God, the nature of ministries*, the exercise of authority*, and the primacy and infallibility* of the pope. Several classical differences of opinion—such as those concerning the understanding of salvation, faith* and works*, and reference to the Holy* Scripture—have, however, been overcome, and a mutual lifting of historical condemnations is no longer a utopian idea.

It should be noted, however, that this doctrinal ecumenism developed more specifically in the Western world. Coming to a mutual understanding is more difficult when partners do not have the same cultural roots. The dialogue between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches has already shown this. These important unions have not yet yielded the desired consequences and possibilities.

b) Spiritual Ecumenism. Every January since 1941, Catholics, Orthodox, and Protestants have celebrated a week of prayer for unity. All the churches emphasize the need for common prayer and liturgy, the unity of the Church being above all the work of the Holy Spirit, a spiritual reality offered by God. There are translations of the Bible that are common to all the churches of different languages. Prayer groups and common or shared Bible studies have developed in all countries, and these have allowed ecumenism to take root in local community realities. This spiritual ecumenism, closely tied to the life of local parishes and to initiatives launched by Christians of different origins in a given area, gives meaning to all the other dimensions of ecumenism. This “local ecumenism” is often at odds with the national or international ecumenical leadership of churches. Slow progress and prudence have proven to be irksome to local bodies.

c) Ecumenism in Witnessing and Service. Ecumenism in witnessing and service has been central from the very beginning of modern ecumenism, as shown by the Life and Work Movement; this dimension stresses the common action of churches in the face of the needs of the contemporary world. Local, national, and international ecumenism cannot ignore this common ethical and social commitment, for concern about renewing, reconciling, and overcoming all human misery, and the unity of all humanity, is part of the mission of all churches. The history and various programs of the WCC concretely illustrate this common commitment of churches—for example, the programs that fight against racism, education programs, aid to refugees, the fight against exclusion, the role of women (woman*) and youth, and the movement for justice*, peace*, and the integrity of creation*.

In many countries this ecumenism is also called “contextual ecumenism,” especially in Third World regions, where it is most urgent. Unfortunately, it has often been seen in opposition to the other forms of ecumenism, such as the champions of “secular ecumenism” around 1968. The same kind of unilateral vision neglects the complex nature of ecumenism and undermines its integrity.

d) Institutional Ecumenism. The contemporary Ecumenical Movement was born on the fringes of member churches. At first, it was the concern of a few pioneers. At present, most churches have integrated ecumenical concerns and have even grounded them institutionally. This anchoring has happened at the local level, in national instances that have established several ecumenical commissions, and on the level of large worldwide organizations. Such an evolution was wished for and necessary. It can, however, be accompanied by a certain ponderousness that slows down the movement by trapping it in administrative structures. This development helps give the impression that ecumenism is currently stagnating. It is true that the period of spectacular breakthroughs has passed and that we are now at a point of acceptance of what has been gained over the past years.

In seeking to overcome denominational, national, social, cultural, and ethical barriers, and thus seeking to promote the unity of the Church and of humanity, ecumenism has experienced the ups and downs that characterize all Church life.

- Y. Congar (1937), Chrétiens désunis: Principes d'un œcuménisme catholique, Paris.
- Actes du concile Vatican II*, Paris, 1966.
- W. A. Visser 't Hooft (1967), “Geschichte und Sinn des Wortes ‘ökumenisch,’” Ökumenischer Aufbruch: Hauptschriften II, Stuttgart-Berlin, 11–28.
- Coll. (1970), “L'œcuménisme séculier,” PosLuth 18, 48–61.
- E. Fouilloux (Ed.) (1976), “L'œcuménisme contemporain,” 2,000 ans de christianisme, vol. X, Paris.
- Coll. (1983), “L'œcuménisme au plan local,” PosLuth 31, 3–51.
- H. J. Urban (1985–87) (Ed.), Handbuch der Oekumenik I-III, Paderborn.
- K. Lehmann, W. Pannenberg (Ed.) (1986), Lehrverurteilungen-Kirchentrennung? Freiburg-Göttingen.
- J.-P. Willaime (Ed.) (1989), Vers de nouveaux œcuménismes, Paris.
- N. Lossky, et al. (Ed.) (1991), Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, Geneva.

- R. Frieling (1992), Der Weg des ökumenischen Gedankens, Göttingen.
 Coll. (1994), "Crise et défi du mouvement œcuménique: Intégrité et indivisibilité," PosLuth 42, 289–331.
 A. Birmelé, J. Terme (Ed.) (1995), Accords et dialogues œcuméniques, Paris.

Jean-Paul II (1995), Ut unum sint, Vatican City.

ANDRÉ BIRMELE

See also Family, Confessional; Protestantism; Unity of the Church; World Council of Churches

Edwards, Jonathan

(1703–58)

Born in Connecticut, Jonathan Edwards studied at Yale College where, in addition to reading the classics and Puritan* manuals, he discovered the writings of Newton and Locke. Appointed pastor in Northampton, Massachusetts, in 1727, he played a central role in the Pietist movement of the Great Awakening (1741–42), of which he became the theologian. Following disagreements concerning who should be admitted to Communion*, he was dismissed by his congregation. Sent to Stockbridge in 1750 as a missionary to the Indians, he wrote his major works there. He was then elected president of the College of New Jersey in Princeton, but he died almost immediately after assuming his position there in 1758. Edwards is considered the first philosopher and the greatest Protestant* theologian of the New World. Two major doctrinal elements of his thought merit particular consideration.

a) Sin and Responsibility. Edwards starts with the following difficulty: There is no sin* unless one freely chooses evil*; but is there free choice when the will is determined? To resolve this question, both intent to avoid the false sense of guilt that threatened Puritanism and troubled by the growing influence of Arminianism (Calvinism*), Edwards set out, on the one hand, a theory of the will, and, on the other, an explanation based on the identity of the person*.

To make responsibility and the absence of moral autonomy compatible, Edwards distinguishes the determination of the will in time from its nature. The will acts only if its inclination is determined, but because this depends on the perception of a real or imaginary good*, the will can never be truly autonomous. To be autonomous, it would have to determine itself—that is, its acts would have to be determined by a preceding volition, leading to an infinite regression. One of two things is true: Either one does not achieve original volition, or else, if it is original, it is not truly volition because it is determined by something other than a preceding volition. To avoid these contradictions, it must be admitted that the will, while always determined, remains voluntary, as he explains in Freedom of the Will (1754). The sinner has not himself chosen to will the sin of Adam*, but because he wills it in fact, he is guilty. Edwards therefore joins together determination of the will and responsibility, which the philosophical tradition had declared incompatible. He can then complete his theory of the will before sin by developing the doctrine of original sin—which he did in The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin, which was published posthumously—and the analysis of servile will.

If what makes the will of the sinner evil in each act (action*) is obviously its opposition to the good, the continuous exercise of this evil will, which is the only thing that allows it to be attributed to a subject, is due to an external constitution. Good and evil acts are in themselves only isolated acts, and the identity of the subject who carries them out depends on a continuous creation*. Theology* teaches us that our condition as moral subjects (with temporal continuity) is founded by a divine act, which establishes a relationship of identity between the personality of Adam and that of each one of his descendants. We are, of course, the responsible authors of our volitions, but we are ourselves only by virtue of the foundational act that connects us to Adam. God*, on the contrary, while he is at every moment the author of our establishment “in” Adam, remains foreign to the evil that we ourselves will. Beyond his original hypothesis on the transmission of original sin, Edwards thus rediscovered the classic thesis that distinguishes within evil a material element attributable to God and a formal element imputable to man.

b) Religious Feelings. Uncovering the spiritual condition of the believer is a central preoccupation of Puritanism. Good works* are the fruits of justification* (the doctrine of justification by faith* alone is one of the great commonplaces of Edwards's preaching*), but they are not unequivocal signs of justification. As for belief, purely intellectual adhesion to the Christian mysteries* is always within reach of the hypocrite. Nourished by the Calvinist spiritual tradition* that had been revived by the immense spiritual uplift of the Great Awakening, Edwards thus recognizes true religion through certain "affections," the first of which is love*. The devil may imitate the process of conversion*, but he is incapable of counterfeiting its nature, love.

A whole range of signs—Edwards enumerates 12 of them—helps the believer to discern his condition inwardly, but these signs are for others only objective universal criteria, and they do not make it possible to formulate a public judgment* on the faith of a believer. The highest result of conversion is the advent of a spiritual beauty that reflects "the holy beauty of God." This is why 2 Peter 1:4 is the favorite Biblical reference of Edwards. In his Treatise Concerning Religious Affections (1746) Edwards holds that the "grace* which is in the heart of the saints is of the same nature although of a lesser degree with the divine holiness."

An ecclesiology* immediately flows from this concern for coherence and authenticity. The founders of Congregationalism* in New England had required the expression of an experience* of personal conversion in order to be admitted to Communion. This principle had gradually fallen into disuse. But Edwards, refusing to surrender to the prevailing laxity, came to require that communicants confess their conversion.

What has been called the New Theology represents the posterity of Edwards. His disciples, systematizing his thought, present a unique example in Protestantism of a fruitful synthesis of dogmatic orthodoxy with evangelical pietism. These disciples include E. and J. Bellamy (1719–70), S. Hopkins (1721–1803), N. Emons (1744–1840), and the most important preacher of the Second Great Awakening, Timothy Dwight (1752–1817), Edwards's grandson. Edwards's writings were also a considerable influence on John Wesley and George Whitefield.

- The Works of President Edwards, London, 1817–47, 10 vols., New Ed., New York, 1968.
- The Works of Jonathan Edwards*, vol. 2: Religious Affections, Ed. John E. Smith, New Haven, 1959.
- ◆ F. H. Foster (1907), A History of New England Theology, Chicago.
- J. Ridderbos (1907), De Theologie van Jonathan E., The Hague.
- J. Haratounian (1932), Piety versus Moralism, New York.
- P. Miller (1949), Jonathan E., New York.
- C. Cherry (1966), The Theology of Jonathan E.: A Reappraisal, Garden City.
- J. P. Carse (1967), Jonathan E. and the Visibility of God, New York.
- A. Delattre (1968), Beauty and Sensibility in the Thought of Jonathan E., New Haven.
- T. Erdt (1980), Jonathan E., Art and the Sense of the Heart, Amherst.
- N. Fiering (1981), Jonathan E.'s Moral Thought and Its British Context, Chapel Hill.
- M. X. Lesser (1981), Jonathan E., a Reference Guide, Boston.
- N. Manspeaker (1981), Jonathan E.: A Bibliographical Synopses, New York.
- M. Vetö (1987), La pensée de Jonathan E., Paris.
- R. W. Jenson (1988), America's Theologian: A Recommendation of Jonathan E., New York.
- A. V. G. Allen (1989), Jonathan E., Boston.

MIKLOS VETÖ

See also Calvinism; Congregationalism; Liberty; Lutheranism; Methodism; Puritanism; Sin, Original

Enhypostasy. See Anhypostasy

Enlightenment

The Enlightenment signifies today the dominant rationalist and liberal cultural movement that occurred in Europe from roughly 1690 to the French Revolution (1789). The term can be traced to a sentence by Bernard Le Bovier de Fontenelle (1657–1757) in the preface to his 1702 History of the Renewal of the Royal Academy of Sciences, where it primarily denotes the progress which Fontenelle expected to see during “a century that will become more enlightened day by day.” Fontenelle was referring to the natural sciences, but the French term lumières (in the plural), and the equivalents in German (Aufklärung) and English (Enlightenment), became established to cover the major developments in all the arts, and above all in philosophy*.

The Enlightenment was primarily characterized by its commitment to empirical investigation in the sciences, its optimism about progress in all realms of life, and its belief in human perfectibility. It tried to replace authority by rational investigation, preferred rationally structured order to nature or sentiment in the arts, and made the critical examination of evidence the means of establishing truth* in matters of history* and theology*. Its philosophical core, articulating broader cultural changes, moved from the early rationalism of the Catholic Descartes* to the critical analysis of human intellection and morality of the Protestant Kant*, who, preoccupied with “the starry heavens above and the moral law within,” attempted to lay the foundations both for the certainty of modern science and for the possibility of human freedom.

The spirit of the Enlightenment is doubtless best summed up in the tentative and often amusing ironies of the after-dinner pieces of Voltaire (1694–1778), later worked up into contes (tales) such as Candide, which focused on Voltaire’s dislike of dogma (because it bred intolerance) and of rites (because they bred superstition). Voltaire wavered, but he cautiously advocated that organized Christianity be as unstructured as possible without compromising the sanction of posthumous divine remunerative justice, a belief that he still held necessary for the cohesiveness of human society. The possibility of an ethic unsupported by divine retribution after death* had, however, already been canvassed by the Protestant Pierre Bayle (1647–1706) in his 1683 Pensées diverses sur la comète, originally a pamphlet attacking as superstitious the view that the advent of comets presaged the occurrence of events on Earth.

The movement’s great monument was the 17-volume Encyclopédie, edited by Denis Diderot (1713–84) from 1751 to 1765. The Encyclopédie, although at first relying on contributions from ecclesiastics and purporting to provide only a systematization of contemporary knowledge, turned progressively in its later volumes into a vehicle for religiously skeptical propaganda.

a) Philosophy. The lifelong attempt of Descartes to provide apodictic metaphysical certainty for metaphysics, physics, medicine, mechanics, and ethics* had been apologetic in intention but it necessarily subverted the need for authority* in philosophy. Buoyed up by the optimism of France after the religious wars and fearful of the religious skepticism they had generated, Descartes sought to establish both the immortality of the human spiritual principle and the path by which human beings might attain to the highest virtue and happiness of which they were capable. He started with a purely methodical universal doubt of all that was not undeniably self-evident, exempting only the truths of revelation, and produced a system that was therefore a purely rational construct.

From that theory, Baruch Spinoza (1632–77) developed his deterministic pantheism, dangerously viewing the mind and body as expressing different attributes of the same substance. It was also against a Cartesian background that the desire for a rationalist explanation of human experience paradoxically led the Oratorian Nicholas Malebranche (1638–1715) and the Protestant Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz* (1646–1716) to assign to God* a direct intervention in human cognition, an idea that provoked a reaction among the English empiricists. For Malebranche, “we see all things in God.” The mind perceives only ideas representing material objects, and these ideas are themselves “the efficacious substance of the divinity.” For Leibniz, the appearance of interaction of substances is the result of a harmony preestablished by God. Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet (1627–1704), who thought of himself as a controversialist of Augustinian* stature in defense of Catholicism*, was sufficiently frightened by the writings of both Spinoza and Malebranche to turn against Cartesianism, writing on 7 December 1691 a famous letter on the subject to Pierre Nicole (1625–95), a Jansenist moralist who inspired Pascal*.

Directly opposed to the epistemologies deriving from a Cartesian background was the thought of the Protestant John Locke (1632–1704). His reference to the possibility of thinking matter, abolishing the absolute Cartesian separation of matter and spirit, was to inspire Voltaire's attack on Descartes and was a significant step on the path to materialism. Since the Middle Ages the immortality of the soul had appeared to be contingent on its spirituality. David Hume (1711–76) attacks not only revealed theology but also natural religion, and he grants an even bigger role than Locke to sensory perception in our understanding of the world, increasing the difficulty of defending immortality, which in private even Voltaire doubted.

b) Theology. There was a specifically theological Enlightenment tradition, most prominent in Germany. It derived from Christian Thomasius (1655–1728), a Leipzig professor chiefly famous for his hostility to prejudice and superstition. His religious views led to the withdrawal of his license to teach, and he moved to Halle, which was soon to become the center of Pietism*. Also associated with Halle was Christian Wolff (1679–1754), who was for a while dismissed from his teaching post on account of his theology, largely derived from Leibniz, which was an attempt to base theological truths on evidence of mathematical certitude. Wolff was reinstated and ennobled when Frederick the Great (1712–86) succeeded to the Prussian throne, but his thought was replaced in public esteem by that of Kant, whom it had much influenced.

Like Locke and Leibniz, Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744–1803) was influenced by recent scientific investigation. Court preacher at Wiemar from 1776, Herder's chief interest was the nature of language. Stimulated by Kant at Königsberg to critical inquiry, and prefiguring Hegel, whose dialectical theory of human history he inspired, he moved from early attacks on universal reason and happiness to a genuinely Enlightenment belief in the unicity of the world soul, "the one human reason, the one human truth." Herder combined his religious commitment with his belief in the progress of humanity, his status as a poet, his view that poetry was the original language, and his interest in the history of humanity, but his importance derives partly from his close relationships with such major literary giants of the Enlightenment as Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81), Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832), Christoph Martin Wieland (1733–1813), and Jean Paul [Richter] (1763–1825). An admirer of Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78), Herder finally repudiated the influence of Kant in his Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (1784–91). Although often regarded as a freethinker, he represents not so much the rationalist side of the Enlightenment as the interest in art, poetry, and literature that was to bear fruit in the Sturm und Drang movement and in the preromantic exploration of human harmony with nature in its wildness and its majesty.

Enlightenment rationalism replaced authority, whether that of revelation or that of Aristotle, with human reason as the principal criterion of truth. It was frequently on account of the theological implications, sometimes left merely implicit, of 17th-century discoveries in the natural science, notably in optics, medicine, and astronomy, that the Enlightenment came into conflict with the church. It was not the strongly skeptical and sometimes blasphemous satire that was new, but the attack on authority in the name of scientific experiment. Descartes himself had resisted both the discovery of the circulation of the blood by William Harvey (1578–1657) and the obvious conclusions to be drawn from the experiments with the vacuum of Evangelista Torricelli (1608–47), but these matters were mostly left to scientists, or made merely the subject of amused comment. When the teaching of Cartesianism in France was being widely prohibited, Nicolas Boileau-Despréaux (1636–1711) published in 1671 an Arrêt burlesque forbidding Reason to enter the schools of the University of Paris. Galileo Galilei (1564–1642) made numerous discoveries about the pendulum, specific gravity, gravitational force, optics, and the measurement of heat before he adopted the Copernican view that the earth revolved around the sun. It was largely on account of his publication of that view, which appeared to be incompatible with the account of the Creation* in Genesis, that scientific advance was made to appear incompatible with divine revelation.

The most important attack on ecclesiastical authority came when the Oratorian biblical scholar Richard Simon (1638–1712) declared that Moses* could not possibly be the author of all the works attributed to him. The whole run of 1,300 copies of Simon's Histoire critique du Vieux Testament was destroyed and had to be republished outside France in 1685, although the Protestant authorities were as enraged as the Catholics. After Simon it is primarily to oblique criticisms of authority that we must turn for evidence of a growing skepticism. The tone was often light, as in the satirical Lettres persanes (1721), anonymously published by Charles de Secondat, baron de Montesquieu (1689–1755), purporting to describe Paris as seen through the eyes of travelers from the East, or in Pierre Bayle's tongue-in-cheek use of contradictory historical sources to cast doubt on received views in his great 1696 Dictionnaire historique et critique, or in Fontenelle's insinuations about the credibility of miracles in his history of oracles and his book on the history of fables. The first works of more or less open atheism such as L'homme machine by Julien-Jean Offray de la Mettrie (1709–51), written in 1747, have a comparatively slender thread of provocative argument beneath an only semiserious surface. Like Paul-Henri Thiry, baron d'Holbach (1723–89) author of the atheistic Le Système de la nature (1770), La Mettrie was regarded by Diderot as dangerously compromising to what had become a secularizing campaign.

c) The Enlightenment also manifested itself in national literatures, the visual arts, and music. Other constitutive elements included the development of constitutional liberalism* by Locke, the adoption by Montesquieu in The Spirit of Laws (1748) of the natural law theory adopted from Grotius (1583–1645), the economic theories of Adam Smith (1723–90), and the philosophy of Giovanni Battista Vico (1668–1744) for his distinction between scientific and historical explanation. Like all major cultural movements, the Enlightenment contained within itself the seeds of its own disintegration, but it was the last period in European culture when a harmonious synthesis between thought and feeling was still generally possible, even if only among a literate social elite.

- P. Hazard (1954), European Thought in the Eighteenth Century: From Montesquieu to Lessing, London.
- L.G. Crocker (1959), An Age of Crisis: Man and World in Eighteenth-Century French Thought, Baltimore-London.
- L.G. Crocker (1964), Nature and Culture: Ethical Thought in the French Enlightenment, Baltimore.
- P. Gay (1966–70), The Enlightenment, 2 vols., London.
- A. G. Lehmann (1984), The European Heritage: An Outline of Western Culture, London.
- J. McManners (1998), Church and Society in Eighteenth-Century France, 2 vols., Oxford.

ANTHONY LEVI

See also Humanism, Christian

Ephesus, Council of

(A.D. 431)

a) Occasion and the Issue at Stake. The third ecumenical council*, in large part, was born from the tension between two major Christological* movements—that of Antioch, Syria, and that of Alexandria, Egypt. Represented by Athanasius at the Council of Nicaea* (325), the Alexandrian* school especially stressed the divinity and the unity* of the Person of Jesus*, the Word* begotten by the Father* and consubstantial* with the Father. The Antiochene school, which fought strongly against Apollinarius (and Apollinarianism*), stressed the full humanity of the Son of God* and the duality of his nature. This tension was exacerbated after 428, when use of the title Mother of God (theotokos), for Mary*, was questioned. Although the name theotokos was traditional, Nestorius, the new patriarch of Constantinople, insisted that Mary could be named the mother of *Christ or the mother of Jesus, but not the mother of God (Loofs 1905). The association of the Word with Christ was one of conjunction (sunapheia), imparting dignity and authority, and not a strict unity (henôsis) of “a one and the same” (ACO I, 5:1, 29–31).

Cyril*, patriarch of Alexandria, defended the title theotokos in the name of the strict unity of Jesus with the incarnate Word (DCO II, 1:107). Before the end of 429, there was an exchange of letters, and Pope* Celestine soon became involved as arbitrator. A Roman council demanded that Nestorius retract his views within ten days (ACO I, 2:7–12). A synod* in Alexandria in November 430 sent the third letter to Constantinople from Cyril to Nestorius, as well as a list of 12 anathemas (DCO II/1:124–26).

b) Events of the Council. On 19 November Emperor Theodosius II warned Cyril and the other metropolitans that he was calling a council at Ephesus during Pentecost, 7 June 431 (ACO I, 1, 1:114–16). Instructions for the council's procedure were based on those of the senate and took into consideration the goal of the debates (ibid., 120–21). After 15 days, on 22 June, Cyril opened the council before 154 bishops*, without waiting for the bishops from Syria and the Roman legates, who had sent word that they would arrive soon, and over the objections of Count Candidien, the emperor’s delegate, and 68 bishops—of whom only 17 were of Eastern origin (ACO I, 4:25–30).

The detailed minutes of the 22 June session are available. After reading documents from the proceedings, upon Cyril’s request, and after Nestorius was unsuccessfully summoned to the assembly, a second letter from Cyril to Nestorius was read, as was the response of the accused (DCO II/1: 104–12 and 112–24). Afterward, the bishops were asked to approve Cyril’s letter and condemn Nestorius, in light of the Nicene doctrine. The vote in favor was unanimous, and Nestorius was deposed from his see: “[W]e have been compelled of necessity...to issue this sad condemnation against him, though we do so with many tears. Our Lord Jesus Christ, who has been blasphemed by him, has determined through this most holy synod that the same Nestorius should be stripped of his episcopal dignity and removed from the college of priests” (DCO II/1: 146–8).

Disorder transpired once the Eastern bishops arrived on 26 June. Their assembly, consisting of more than 50 bishops, excommunicated Cyril and Memnon, the bishop of Ephesus (ACO I:1, 5, and 119–24). A rescript from the emperor cancelled the 22 June meeting and ordered the reopening of the council (ACO I:1, 3, and 9–10). The Roman legates, who had been given the order to conform to the acts of Cyril, arrived on 10 July. Five sessions were held in the presence of the legates, from 10 to 22 July. At this time, Cyril and Celestine were acclaimed, and the condemnations announced by the Eastern bishops’ assembly were voided (ACO I:1, 3, 15–26, 53–63, and I:1, 7, 84–117). At the beginning of August Theodosius dissolved the council (ACO I:1,7, 142).

c) Assessment of the Council. Over the centuries, all kinds of opinions have been advanced on the canonical value and doctrinal impact of these events, and there have been both “systematic defamation” and “easy apologies” (Camelot 1962). Cyril’s great haste and actions, as well as the excesses and sensibilities of the Eastern bishops, make it even more difficult to evaluate these unpleasant gatherings. Cyril, however, had been named president of the council by Pope Celestine (ACO I, 2:5–6), and the Roman legates joined together with him as soon as they arrived in Ephesus, delivering letters from the pope (ibid., 22–24). Cyril’s council was openly approved by Pope Sixtus III, Ce-lestine’s successor, in July 432 (see ACO I:1, 7, and 143–45).

Cyril had first turned the council into a “heresy* trial” for Nestorius (De Halleux 1993). However, if the votes for Nestorius’s deposition had a formal disciplinary character, Nestorius was censured for reasons of doctrine. To take a position, one had to focus on the Nicene Creed. What was at stake was the doctrine of the unity of the Person* of Christ (the hypostatic* union) and, consequently, Mary’s divine maternity. The possibility of “adding anything to the Nicene Creed was systematically rejected. Opinion, nevertheless, hardly ever wavered, and the decisions of the council were considered equivalent to a definition” (Jouassard, Maria, 1949).

At Ephesus great importance was attached to the tradition* of the Fathers* and particularly to the Nicene Creed, a confession to which the council forbade any additions (DCO II:152–56). The authority* of Rome* was also decisively ascertained because of the calls of Nestorius and Cyril to Celestine in 429, the judgement of the synod of Rome, and the sending of the legates and their role in the council’s denouement.

Epilogue: The 433 Formula of Union. After an incredible exchange of letters sent back and forth between the Cyrilians and the Easterners, Ephesus had a happy ending in 433. At the invitation of Emperor Theodosius II, John of Antioch wrote a profession of faith, and this “formula of union” was enthusiastically championed by Cyril of Alexandria (PG 83, 1420): “We confess then our lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, perfect God and perfect man of a rational soul and body, begotten before all ages from the Father in his godhead, the same in the last days, for us and for our salvation, born of Mary the virgin, according to his humanity, one and the same consubstantial with the Father in godhead and consubstantial with us in humanity, for a union (henôsis) of two natures took place. Therefore we confess one Christ, one Son, one Lord. According to this understanding of the unconfused union, we confess the holy Virgin to be the Mother of God (theotokos), because God the Word took flesh and became man and from his very conception, united to himself the temple he took from her” (DCO II/1:164–72).

There are three mentions of the Cyrilian term henôsis in the formula. Nestorius’s word sunapheia is not used to designate the pure union of natures in the unique prosôpon. As for Cyril, he spoke clearly of two natures after union and renounced the formulas in the letter to the excommunicated.

• F. Loofs (1905), Nestoriana, Halle.

Acts: ACO I.

A. J. Festugière (1982), Éphèse et Chalcédoine: Actes des conciles, Paris.

Decrees: COD 37–74 (DCO II/1, 97–174).
N. J. Tanner, Ed. (1990), Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils, vol. I, London-Washington, D.C.

◆ P.-T. Camelot (1962), Éphèse et Chalcédoine, Paris.

J. Liébaert (1963), “Éphèse (concile d’),” DHGE 15, 561–74.

A. de Halleux (1993), “La première session du concile d’Éphèse (22 juin 431),” ETHL 69, 48–87; (1995), “L’accord christologique de 433: Un modèle de réconciliation ecclésiale?” *Communion et réunion: Mélanges J.-M.R.

Tillard*, Louvain, 293–300.

GILLES LANGEVIN

See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christ and Christology; Cyril of Alexandria; Hypostatic Union; Idioms, Communication of; Nestorianism

Epiclesis

The Biblical notion of epiclesis was understood as a religious tribute and a recourse to God* and his name*. In the Christian tradition* after the New Testament it came to mean either an address to the Trinity*—as in the baptismal act and also perhaps in the more ancient perspective of the eucharistic prayer* (Casel)—or, progressively, as a request, an invocation to God the Father* (to whom the eucharistic prayer is most often addressed) that he send the Holy* Spirit. In the eucharistic prayer of the Apostolic Tradition, attributed to Hippolytus of Rome (third century), the Spirit is invoked for the unity* of the Church*. In the fourth and fifth centuries, in the eucharistic prayers of Antioch (Taft 1992) and then of Jerusalem*, it is invoked at the beginning—and for the purpose—of blessing the bread and the wine. In Egypt during the same period, the prayer known as the eucharistic prayer of Serapion includes an epiclesis that calls on the Logos instead of the Spirit. Historians cannot say with certainty if this was a tradition proper to Egypt. More likely, it was an isolated attempt to claim to be under the patronage of Serapion, bishop* of Thmuis, who, along with Athanasius* of Alexandria, was a champion of orthodoxy, an act that probably would have been an attempt to avoid confessing the divinity of the Spirit.

Whatever the case may be, the epiclesis in the Antiochene eucharistic prayers is placed after Christ*’s words at the Last Supper, whereas in the Egyptian eucharistic prayers it comes before those words, except for the double epiclesis, which is placed before and after Christ*’s words. In the Roman tradition prior to Vatican* II the eucharistic prayer did not include an invocation of the Spirit. However, it was comparable to the Egyptian eucharistic prayers in that, from the fourth century, the account of the institution of the Eucharist* was preceded by a paragraph of request that might be understood as an epiclesis in a broad sense.

In the eucharistic prayers of the Antiochene type (Antioch, Constantinople), the doctrine of the conversion of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ developed as an interpretation of the words of the epiclesis, pronounced after the account of the institution, whereas in the Roman eucharistic prayer, from the time of Ambrose* of Milan, it was Christ*’s words at the Last Supper that were understood as having the effect of consecration. In the second part of the Middle Ages (letter of Benedict XII [1341] on the subject of the Armenians, DS 1017), the Antiochene and Roman perspectives no longer seemed compatible, even though the celebration of the Greek eucharistic prayers has never been abandoned in the Communion* of the Roman Church.

Since Vatican II the new eucharistic prayers II, III, and IV in the Roman Mass include a double epiclesis. The Holy Spirit is invoked first before the words of Christ, for the transformation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ; and a second time after the anamnesis, for the sanctification of the communicants. Whatever the historical justifications invoked on this subject in the liturgical traditions of Rome and Egypt, this provision had the merit of giving a place to the Holy Spirit in Roman eucharistic devotion at a time when it was seeking to refocus on the eucharistic prayer.

All of the Protestant eucharistic liturgies* currently include an epiclesis.

- O. Casel (1923), “Zur Epiklese,” *JLW*3, 100–102; (1924), “Neue Beiträge zur Epiklese-Frage,” ibid. 4, 169–78.
- E. J. Kilmartin (1984), “The Active Role of Christ and the Holy Spirit in the Sanctification of the Eucharistic Elements,” TS 45, 225–53.

J.H. McKenna (1992), “Eucharistic Prayer: Epiclesis,” in A. Heinz, H. Rennings (Ed.), Gratias agamus: Mélanges B. Fischer, Fribourg, 283–91.

R. Taft (1992), “From Logos to Spirit: On the Early History of the Epiclesis,” ibid., 489–502.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Holy Spirit; Prayer

Epieikeia

The term epieikeia comes from the Greek epieikeia (adj. epieikes); it designates a virtue* that is difficult to define: ordinary or everyday virtue, virtue that has nothing heroic or exceptional about it. In the New Testament and patristic writings, it is the virtue expected of Christians. The texts provide us with a full description of epieikeia: one who has it is cool-headed, sensible, and balanced; good, tolerant, and understanding; restrained, down-to-earth, and disdains ostentation. Epieikeia is, essentially, moderation, understanding, and discretion. The epithet decent comes closest to capturing the nuances of epieikeia.

Epieikeia became a technical term in the 13th century with the translation of the Ethica Nicomachea (Nicomachean Ethics), making available a discussion (1137 a 31–1138 a 2) of how epieikeia relates to justice*. The two are distinct, but not heterogeneous. Epieikeia is just, but not with regard to law*. It corrects legal justice and is thus superior to it. Law is necessarily limited to prescriptions suited to the generality of cases; it can therefore fail to encompass a special case. Epieikeia, on the other hand, provides the correction that the lawgiver himself would have made if he could have been present. The individual who displays epieikeia does not press legal claims to the limit but accepts reasonable compromises.

The impression that this passage made upon medieval thinkers is suggested by the appeal made to epieikeia by Robert Grosseteste (c. 1175–1253), a translator of Aristotle and a commentator on the Nicomachean Ethics, in the course of a denunciation of the excesses of the papal curia delivered before Innocent IV at Lyons in 1250. Epieikeia is “halfway between natural justice and legal justice, and is shown in a judge’s unwillingness to punish infringements of positive law that do not offend natural justice, as when legal but unreasonable exactions for ecclesiastical visitations are resisted.” The reference to natural justice shows how epieikeia fitted into a train of thought already present in western jurisprudence, the notion of “equity.” This gives the use of epieikeia in Western Christendom a context in law that is not present in Aristotle. Thus, epieikeia is never conflated with conscience*: although both relate to the application of a law, conscience does so from the point of view of one who acts, epieikeia from the point of view of one who judges actions. Thomas* Aquinas explicitly equates epieikeia with equity (ST IIa IIae, q. 120, a. 1). There are occasions when the law fails to meet the case, and true respect for the law is shown at these times by not taking the law literally, but by doing what justice and the common good require. Epieikeia therefore belongs to the virtue of justice rather than to that of temperance (ibid., a. 2); and it thus contributed to that mingling of jurisprudence and moral theology that produced casuistry*.

With the Renaissance* and Reformation, a shift in emphasis occurred, from moderation to leniency. Seneca’s De clementia, widely read at that time, describes clemency as an “inclination...to mildness” characteristic of the best judges. It is not a question of pardoning or showing “compassion” (which Seneca thought was a vice), for the goal is to identify precisely what justice demands, remaining within the realm of law. Clemency so conceived was readily identified with epieikeia, which gave rise to a stronger criticism of “strict” justice: not only the occasional special case, but every case requires examining the context, which will moderate the severity with which one views an offense. In the growing Augustinianism* of the 16th century, this context included, as a matter of course, a sense of the judge’s own dependence upon the mercy* of God*. The story of the adulterous woman (Jn 7:53–8:11), mediated through mystery plays, was combined with the Reformation emphasis on justification* by faith* to define epieikeia/equity/clemency as a humble moderation in passing judgment, such as benefits those who know their own sinfulness (See Shakespeare, Measure for Measure and The Merchant of Venice). Thus, William Perkins (1558–1602), basing his discussion of epieikeia on Philippians 4:5 (“Let your epieikeia be known to all men. The Lord is at hand”), takes the latter part of the text as the clue to the whole. The nearness of divine judgment* demands that we are humble when judging others, since we hope to be treated with mercy ourselves. We are “flesh and blood, and full of infirmities,” and society* cannot endure if we judge with the rigor that an angel* might use. This is certainly not a reason to abandon justice, but justice must shake hands with mercy (See Ps 85 [84]:11, a text traditionally applied to the crucifixion.) The prince’s laws cannot be “perfect and absolute” as God’s laws are, but the prince may practice a merciful judgment witnessing to the divine work of reconciliation.

The power of dispensation from law thus came to be seen as an expression of epieikeia. Popes had always strongly maintained their right to deviate from universal ecclesiastic legislation (DS 731). Richard Hooker thought that a case could be made for the right of secular powers to dispense with law if absolutely necessary (Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity V, 9). Some evils cannot be eliminated, but their effects can be eased by equitable measures (V, 9), since “precepts do always propose perfection” (V, 81, 4)—thus reversing the traditional contrast of precepts* and counsel. The interpretation of epieikeia as higher justice found a new expression in Grotius’s contrast between justice “in the strict sense” and justice “in the larger sense,” also named “expletive” and “attributive.” The latter is concerned with deciding “what things are agreeable or harmful (as to both things present and things to come) and what can lead to either alternative,” and with “prudent management in expanding the goods proper to individuals and communities” (prol. 9 Sq; chap. I, 1, 8).

- R. Grosseteste, Ed. S. Gieben, “Robert Grosseteste at the Papal Curia: Edition of the Documents,” CFr 41 (1971), 340–93.
- Hugo Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis, Ed. P. C. Molhuysen, Leyden, 1919. (English trans., The Law of War and Peace, Tr. F. W. Kelsey, Indianapolis, 1962.)
- Richard Hooker, Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, in Works, Ed. W. S. Hill, Cambridge, Mass., 1977–93.
- William Perkins, Epieikeia; or, a Treatise of Christian Equitie, in Works, London, 1608.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST IIa IIae, q. 120; q. 80, a. 1, ad 5; Ia IIae, q. 96, a. 6.
- ♦ P. G. Caron (1971), “Aequitas” Romana, “Misericordia” Patristica Ed “Epicheia” Aristotelica Nella Dottrina Dell’ “Aequitas” Canonica, Milan.
- F. d’Agostino (1976), La tradizione dell’epikeia nel Medioevo latino, Milan.
- J. D. Cox (1989), Shakespeare and the Dramaturgy of Power, Princeton.
- R. W. Southern (1992), Robert Grosseteste: The Growth of an English Mind in Medieval Europe, Oxford.

OLIVER O’DONOVAN

See also Casuality; Justice; Law and Christianity; Law and Legislation; Virtues

Epistle of Barnabas. See Apostolic Fathers

Epistle to Diognetus. See Apostolic Fathers

Equiprobabilism. See Alphonsus Liguori

Equivocality. See Analogy

Erasmus, Desiderius

(1469–1536)

Although Erasmus did not present himself as a theologian belonging to a particular school, he had an immense theological influence at the dawn of the Reformation through his theses in defense of free will (in 1524 against Luther*), a return to evangelic and patristic teachings, the reduction in number of the articles of faith* required for salvation*, Christocentrism, and the primacy of orthopraxy over orthodoxy*. In order to defend what he called “the philosophy of Christ*,” Erasmus rejected the Scholastic method of argumentation and its neologisms and used all of the literary genres, including prefaces to his translations or editions of the Scriptures and the Fathers* of the Church, philological Annotations, his Paraphrases of the Bible*, Colloquia, and Adages.

The ironic style of his prolific correspondence easily veers into digressions, often allowing Erasmus to defend, as though it were a mere aside, a Christocentric theology* (which was more moral than speculative) without trapping himself in rigid, dogmatic positions. It was in 1516, the year his New Testament was published, that he first used the expression philosophia Christi: “Now the philosophy of Christ, which he himself called a rebirth, what is it but the restoration of the nature that was created good?” (Paraclesis). The expression—which he afterward sometimes varied as Christian, evangelical, or celestial philosophy—would henceforth signal in abundance his Christocentric biblism.

a) Life. The illegitimate son of a priest, he was baptized under the first name of Gerhardus Gerhardi; he would later Latinize this to Desiderius and adopt the name of Erasmus. Educated in traditional Scolasticism, and then in the spirit of the devotio moderna, as a monk from Steyn, Erasmus set out to study theology at Paris in 1495, then in England under John Colet, who initiated him into the works of Paul and into Florentine Platonism. Erasmus earned a doctorate of theology at Turin in 1506, and in 1516 he published his edition of the Greek New Testament, along with his own translation into classical Latin, dedicating it to Pope Leo X.

Erasmus applied his independent and flexible mind with his unswerving fidelity to the faith and unity* of the Church*. He also had a great love of humanist letters and philological matters, and insisted on inner religion and on the primacy of love* over knowledge. In his Manual, he writes “You like the arts? That is good if it is for Christ’s sake. . . . Better to know less and love more.” But all these things earned him harsh criticism from the Faculties of Paris and Louvain, who classed him among those humanisticae theologizantes whom they reproved.

Erasmus devoted his last years in Basel to the edition of the Fathers of the Church. His editions of Augustine*, Jerome, and Origen* were to remain the authoritative texts for a long time. First censured, and later rehabilitated by natural religion and Enlightenment* thought, Erasmus resurfaced in the 20th century—in his true role of Catholic theologian, irenic, and moralist—as one of the masters of 16th-century humanism.

b) Works and Thought. The Christ-centered thought of Erasmus is based on Holy Scripture and especially on the New Testament. The “philosophy of Christ”—the love of Christ as wisdom*—is developed in the whole of his output. His exhortation to a Christian life proposed in his Enchiridion Militis Christiani—or Manual (dagger) of the Christian Soldier (1503, 2nd Ed. 1518)—constitutes a free commentary on Ephesians 6:11–17. Erasmus defends Paul’s tripartite philosophy and some rules of true Christianity. The rules can be summed up as: “Love nothing, admire nothing, expect nothing but Christ or because of him.” True piety lies in so doing, and that encompasses religion, theology, and a Christian life.

Erasmus wrote The Praise of Folly (1511), which he dedicated to his friend Thomas More, in a playful and paradoxical style. That style allowed him to take digs at all the institutions (including universities, religious orders, and ecclesiastical structures*), plead in favor of the teaching of the Beatitudes, and address his comments to children and simple folk rather than to scholars—for in them weakness becomes strength, and the ignominious death* on the cross transforms into the glorious Resurrection*. He asks: “What do all those Scriptural texts cry out constantly but that all mortals are madmen, even the devout ones, if not that Christ, in order to come and succor the madness of mortals, to a certain extent became a madman” by taking on human nature and by saving mankind through the madness of the cross? In order to symbolize mystical (mysticism*) ecstasy, his speech then amounts to a commentary on Paul, who is also presented as mad (2 Cor 2:16 ff.).

In his Discourse on Free Will (1524) Erasmus also gives a theological definition of free will as “a power of will that allows man to use what leads him to salvation,” and he stacks up the scriptural references favorable to free will in order to defend a synergy of divine grace* and human will. Erasmus holds that grace bends, then leads the will, which has responded to its call. Incapable since the Fall of finding the good by itself, free will nonetheless cooperates with the good as soon as grace directs it and stimulates it. If that were not the case, Erasmus adds, then sin would not be imputable and God would be nothing but a tyrant.

His Paraclesis, one of the prefaces to his edition of the New Testament, harks back to the source of this message by specifying a theological method: “The pure and authentic philosophy of Christ is nowhere presented more felicitously than in the Gospels*, than in the Epistles of the apostles* . . . ; by philosophizing piously, praying more than arguing, seeking to transform ourselves rather than to arm ourselves . . . if we seek an ideal life, why would we find another example preferable to the model, Christ himself?”

Christian philosophy is nothing other than the Gospels, or rather, in the New Testament, the doctor Christ himself teaching (ipse Christus).

Erasmus’s theology is, therefore, closer to a pious reading of the Scriptures than to speculations or controversy. It is closer to imitation* of the Gospels and of Christ than to observation of the “Judaic laws”—that is, fixed rituals. And yet, except for certain points where his theoretical audacity is based on a strong sense of the historicity of doctrinal positions, or when he debates the role of mutual love as a condition of the indissolubility of Christian marriage*, it is difficult to find Erasmus lacking in doctrinal fidelity. In the debate against Erasmus over the question of free will, Luther saw very clearly that his opponent had managed to place himself at the center of the theological debate and that he revealed a firm attachment to the Catholic tradition*.

A practitioner of an evangelical and patristic theology, often moved to propose a witty and even an allegorical exegesis* (after all, his masters were Origen, Augustine, and Jerome), skillful at always reconciling it with a scholarly knowledge of the text, Erasmus gives an example of a fruitful alliance of erudite knowledge (historical and philological) and Christian wisdom.

- Opera omnia, Ed. J. Le Clerc, 1703–6, Leyden (repr. Olms, 1961).
- Opera omnia Desiderii Erasmi Rotterdami*, Amsterdam Critical Ed., 1969–.
- ♦ A. Renaudet (1926), Érasme, sa pensée religieuse et son action d’après sa Correspondance (1518–1521), Paris.
- E. Gilson (1932), “Le Moyen Age et le naturalisme antique,” in Héloïse et Abélard, Paris, 1938, 183–224.
- H. de Lubac (1964), Exégèse médiévale, II, 2, Paris.
- L. Halkin (1969), Érasme et l’humanisme chrétien, Paris.
- J.-P. Massaut (1969), “Humanisme et spiritualité chez Érasme,” DSp 7/1, 1006–28.
- M. A. Screech (1980), Erasmus: Ecstasy and The Praise of Folly.
- G. Chantraine (1981), Érasme et Luther, libre et serf arbitre, Paris-Namur.
- A. Godin (1982), Érasme, lecteur d’Origène, Geneva.
- L. Halkin (1991), Érasme, Paris.
- P. Walter, Theologie aus dem Geist der Rhetorik, Mayence.
- P. Jacopin, J. Lagrée (1996), Érasme, humanisme et langage, Paris.

GUY BEDOUELLE

See also Holy Scripture; Humanism, Christian; Liberty; Luther, Martin; Philosophy; Platonism, Christian

Erastianism

It is somewhat accidental that the name of the physician Thomas Erastus (Luber), 1523–83, became attached in English-speaking lands to a version of a late medieval tradition* of politico-ecclesiastical thought.

a) Thomas Erastus. A native of Basel, in 1558 Erastus became a professor of medicine in Heidelberg, where Elector Frederick III was shortly to introduce a Reformed Confession. Luber was a prominent opponent of the Genevan model of church government* with independent jurisdiction and successfully advocated the subordination of the presbytery to the civil government. His Explicatio Gravissimae Quaestiones, which denied to church authorities even the independent practice of excommunication, anticipated Bodin in its argument for an indivisible civil sovereignty. Attracting the attention of Archbishop Whitgift of Canterbury as a potential apology for royal supremacy, it was published posthumously in London in 1589. Among the Reformed churches, those under the British crown, in Scotland and the English Church of the Westminster Confession (1643), followed an Erastian position, as in the Netherlands did the Remonstrants, whose power was crushed at the Synod of Dort (1619).

b) History of Erastian Theory. While the concept of civil sovereignty over church affairs had remote historical roots in the Roman doctrine of imperium and its Christianized Byzantine and Carolingian expressions, its subsequent development arose from medieval quarrels of royal and imperial powers with the papacy. By the turn of the 14th century, extreme papal claims to temporal and spiritual “plenitude of power” (plenitudo potestatis) were eliciting strident counterclaims. In the disputes between Philip IV of France and Pope* Boniface VIII over ecclesiastical property and privileges, royal apologists came close to affirming the king’s jurisdictional supremacy, thus preparing the way for the full-blown theory of indivisible civil sovereignty propounded in 1324 by Marsiglio of Padua (another physician), just prior to his becoming embroiled in Ludwig of Bavaria’s war with Pope John XXII.

Marsiglio’s exposition of indivisible civil sovereignty had three foundational principles, only the second of which was shared by Erastus and Bodin: namely, popular sovereignty*, the identical membership of ecclesiastical and civil polity, and the sharp distinction within the human moral-political community between this-worldly and other-worldly ends. According to Marsiglio, the common will of the people (populus, universitas) is the original and perpetual source of political authority* and law*; rulers govern as its chosen representatives, and their actions are instrumental to and dependent upon the corporate body politic. As the citizen body in a Christian polity is also the body of believers, its unified will on ecclesiastical as on secular matters must be expressed in a single coercive jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical matters that lie within the jurisdictional competence of the body of believers and its governing agent pertain to this-worldly, or public and institutional, aspects of Christian faith* and practice, and include the selection, education, and appointment of clergy, the disposition of church* finances and property, the authoritative determination of church doctrine and practice, and the punishment of heresy* and other grave violations of divine law. The matters of faith and morals belonging exclusively to priestly authority pertain to Christ’s judgment and the salvation* of believers in “the next world” and involve no human jurisdictional competence in this one.

Marsiglio’s theory of unitary sovereignty contributed an influential laicizing strand to the conciliarist movement of the late 14th and 15th centuries, in that he invested the authority to define doctrine and practice in the universal body of believers represented at a general church council, to be convoked not by the pope but by the imperial government, which would also (along with lesser civil rulers) enforce conciliar decisions. Throughout the late medieval, Renaissance* and early Reformation periods, royal and imperial powers looked upon general church councils as tools to restrain the jurisdictional pretensions of the papacy, which the Councils of Constance* (1414–18) and Basel* (1431–49) and the conciliabulum of Pisa (1511–12) attempted to do.

The tradition of Sorbonnist conciliarism*, from d’Ailly and Gerson to Almain and Mair, provided crucial formulations of a natural-law basis for church polity into the 16th century, thereby fostering both Erastian and Gallican ecclesiologies. The English reform under Henry VIII and Edward VI asserted the monarch’s authority as “Supreme head in earth, nexte under Christe, of the Church,” yet preserved a dualism of jurisdiction under the crown through the role of convocation alongside Parliament. In the Elizabethan era, as the rhetoric was curtailed (giving the queen “the cheefe government”), so the jurisdiction was unified, and Parliament assumed the dominant role. The most formative exposition of the Erastian position in the English church, Richard Hooker’s Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, accomplished its defense of the Elizabethan Settlement through the interweaving of natural-law and biblical theological models in a manner characteristic of the Paris masters. However, his insistence on the identical membership of ecclesiastical and civil polity in a Christian commonwealth and on the solely sacramental powers of the priesthood brings him closer to Marsiglio than to his Sorbonnist predecessors.

- G. de Lagarde (1934–46), La naissance de l’esprit laïque au déclin du moyen âge, Paris.

- H. Kressner (1953), Schweizer Ursprünge des anglikanischen Staatskirchentums, Gütersloh.
- R. Wesel-Roth (1954), Thomas Erastus: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der reformierten Kirche und zur Lehre von der Staatssouveränität, Lahr-Baden.
- W. Speed Hill (Ed.) (1972), Studies in Richard Hooker: Essays Preliminary to an Edition of His Works, Cleveland.
- M. Löffelberger (1992), Marsilius von Padua: Das Verhältnis zwischen Kirche und Staat im “defensor pacis,” Berlin.
- A. S. McGrade (Ed.) (1997), Richard Hooker and the Construction of Christian Community, Tempe, Ariz.
- C. Russell (2000), “Parliament, the Royal Supremacy and the Church,” Parliamentary History 19, 27–37.

JOAN LOCKWOOD O’DONOVAN AND OLIVER O’DONOVAN

See also Calvinism; Church and State; Conciliarism; Council; Gallicanism; Political Theology; Society

Eros. See Love

Eschatology

1. Concept

The term eschatology—literally, “doctrine of the last thing” (eschaton)—appeared in the 17th century, but it is only since Schleiermacher* that it has been used increasingly to refer to the problematic (the “treatise”) that comes last in the theological curriculum. Previously, this had been customarily entitled De novissimis (On the Last Things). In general, eschatology is concerned with the goal and fulfillment of creation*, and the history* (individual and universal) of salvation*. Here, fulfillment not only means completion with time*, and an ending within space, but addresses the theme of Christian hope*. Everything that God* has created to be called to “fullness of life” does not return to nothingness*, but attains, in its totality and in each of its parts, the internal and lasting fullness of its essence, by being admitted to participation in the eternal life* of God. This presupposes, however, that the world* as we apprehend it has ceased to exist in time and space, or, better, that our present world is liberated from its fragility within the spatial and temporal order. It is indeed impossible to conceive of this fulfillment, that is, of the integral and lasting fullness of the whole, with all its components, under spatial and temporal conditions.

2. History of Eschatology

a) Early Church. In the first two centuries A.D., the end of the world and the return of Christ* were generally regarded as imminent. For this reason, the New Testament’s proclamation of Christ’s Resurrection*—which both realized and intensified the promises of the Old Testament—did not prompt any far-reaching reflection on the fulfillment that was promised. Instead, this was envisaged as a direct consequence, or even as a simple “extension,” of Christ’s Resurrection. The first major theological systems, which emerged from the early third century onward, tended to integrate eschatology into a vast theology* of history, seen through the prism of Christology*. Irenaeus* of Lyon, for example, writes of the “recapitulation and fulfillment of the history of salvation in Christ,” and Augustine* addresses the theme of fulfillment with the formulation “from Christ alone (Christus solus) to the whole Christ (Christus totus), head and body.” Alongside these large-scale perspectives, we also find some detailed eschatological statements and reflections on the “how,” the “when,” and the “where” of the fulfillment. These were developed by bringing together, often in a forced manner, scriptural passages related to these questions, intertestamental and apocalyptic* treatments of the end of the world, and philosophical considerations on the fulfillment of the ages. Some authors also invoked specific themes of eschatology, such as the resurrection of the dead, in order to combat gnosis* and its disembodied spiritualism, or, in the form of the coming of judgment* and the pains of hell*, in order the better to exhort human beings to act in a morally responsible manner. Both these themes appear, most notably, in the writings of Irenaeus and Tertullian*.

In addition, there was a tension to be resolved between, on the one hand, a conception of fulfillment as the internal result of the dynamic present in the history of salvation, and, on the other hand, a conception of fulfillment that related it to the notion of a ready-made salvation waiting in the afterlife which human beings only had to rejoin. Whenever this latter, ultimately nonhistorical conception prevailed—fulfillment as a sort of transition from this world to a celestial beyond—the development of millenarian ideas about the establishment of an earthly and messianic kingdom, before the world ended, was not unusual. These were intended to do justice to the idea, advanced notably in the Old Testament, that there would be an age of salvation, belonging (also) to historical time, to which the internal dynamic of the kingdom* of God, now being prepared, was leading (Justin, Papias, Irenaeus). This conception was developed into an eschatology by the early church*, despite the many questions and contradictions inherent in it: “Only the extreme spiritualization of eschatology, on the one hand, and complete millenarianism, on the other, were finally rejected” (E. May, TRE 10, 300).

b) Middle Ages. This situation began to change with medieval theology, which concluded the dogmatic theology with a treatise specifically concerned with eschatology.

From the time of Peter Lombard onward, the systematic framework for such treatises was usually provided by the doctrine of the sacraments* (Alexander of Hales), but there were also other approaches: eschatological themes were introduced into theologies of creation and/or grace* (Thomas* Aquinas, Bonaventure*). As in the early church, however, eschatology was envisaged above all as the conclusion to, or as an integral part of, Christology. These perspectives, pertinent in and of themselves, were not, however, integrated into an overarching, complete, and coherent conception of eschatology.

It was Scholasticism* that determined the later development of eschatology by incorporating it into a cosmological ontology dominated by the Aristotelian “scientific” ideal, and thus cutting it off from any foundation in the eschatological and apocalyptic beliefs that still flourished as part of popular piety. The result was to enclose eschatology within a doctrine of future events and places, more or less seen as things that were bound to be realized at the end of history and beyond it. Eschatology was almost assimilated to a “judicial inquiry” into ephemeral earthly realities, the future that would go beyond them, and the events that were to be involved in the transition from one sphere to the other. Yet there was no clear delineation of the essential internal link between history and eschatological fulfillment, other than the idea of a strict correspondence between the individual’s behavior during his or her earthly existence and his or her dispatch to heaven or hell. All the eschatological statements in the Bible* (Christ’s return, the end of the world, resurrection, and the rest) were interpreted exclusively in relation to the future end and to what lay beyond the whole of history; and, following Benedictus Deus, the dogmatic constitution of 29 January 1336 (DS 1000–1002), there was a particular emphasis on the fulfillment of the individual soul*. There was, then, at least a fear that eschatology would become a matter of less and less concern in this world; and Christian hope was in danger of losing sight of the present reality of everyday life and the need to confront history. Late Scholasticism and, in its wake, Neoscholasticism, kept up this reifying approach, which degenerated into a veritable “physics of eschata [last things]” (Y. Congar).

c) Early Modern Period. Reformation theology marked the emergence of a more “existential” and Christocentric approach to eschatology: for Luther*, for example, the faith that justifies was a truly eschatological reality (see Asendorf). However, what we may appropriately call Reformation orthodoxy went on to join with more traditional approaches. During the Enlightenment*, eschatology, whether Catholic or Protestant, came to be focused on the question of the immortality of the soul, and thus became part of the purely functional perspective of teaching on the rewards and punishments for moral conduct. Accordingly, to a large extent theological eschatology made itself responsible for its own secularization*, for if the central theme of eschatology is morality, then every transcendental dimension is eventually and decisively shown to be superfluous. The main question then becomes whether humanity can be “humanized” and thus establish the “kingdom of God on Earth.” The eschatology of the Enlightenment gave rise to the modern utopias that eventually culminated in Marxism (Marx*).

It was only with Schleiermacher, and after him, that broader conceptions were asserted once again, both within Protestant theology and in the Catholic school of Tübingen* in the 19th century. These new approaches, influenced by idealist philosophy*, were based on the conviction that history has an internal teleology, relating it to a kingdom of God that develops and progresses toward its final form. Such perspectives were eliminated from Catholic theology by the Neoscholastics’ understanding of eschatology, which conformed in this respect to late Scholasticism. By contrast, within the churches born out of the Reformation, and notably in “liberal Protestantism,” the idea of the kingdom of God was reduced to a moral reality given in the present state of the cultural existence of humanity (A. Ritschl). This interpretation distorted a crucial biblical concept in a completely anti-eschatological way.

d) 20th-Century Theology. An authentic renewal of eschatology took place in the early years of the 20th century among the representatives of what has been called “consistent eschatology” (J. Weiss, A. Schweitzer), who protested against the “reduction” of eschatology and argued that the expectation of an imminent irruption of the eschaton into history was a determining trait of primitive Christianity. The irrevocable sense of imminence in which the New Testament had been written was integrated programmatically, but not without far-reaching reinterpretation, into dialectical theology. Barth* certainly states that if Christianity were not absolutely and completely eschatology then it would be absolutely and completely foreign to Christ (Der Römerbrief, 1922). For the early Barth, however, biblical statements were no more than arguments and conceptual means for rejecting liberal Protestantism’s synthesis between the kingdom of God and the world of human culture, and for reestablishing an antithetical relationship between God and humanity: all eschatological statements are no more than ciphers for the sovereign transcendence of God in relation to the contingency and futility of created beings, who are touched by God only tangentially, at the moment of their encounter. In this kairos, the eschaton is present at every moment, as the transcendental meaning of all moments. Consequently, the end that is called for in the New Testament is not a temporal event, not a fabulous “end of the world”; it bears no relation to any hypothetical historical catastrophes, be they earthly or cosmic (ibid.). Barth then distanced himself from this conception and, with hindsight, had to make the following confession (KD II/1, 716): “It appears...that, having taken seriously the transcendental nature of the kingdom of God that is to come, I put myself at risk of not taking at all seriously his coming as such... It may be seen...how, with skill and eloquence, I neglected the teleology that it [Scripture] ascribes to time, and the idea of its progression toward a real end.”

Bultmann* went in a different direction, adopting the perspective of existential analytics developed by the early Heidegger* to describe the New Testament kerugma (proclamation) as an “eschatological event,” in the sense that the proclamation of the Word* of God tears human beings away from their lack of liberty in order to make them achieve liberty*. This new liberty is the eschaton, given and realized in the present, and every notion of a future that is still held in reserve within time is radically relativized (Geschichte und Eschatologie, 1958): “Do not look around you in universal history; on the contrary, you must look within your own personal history... In each moment the possibility that it will be the eschatological moment lies dormant. You must awaken it from its sleep.”

This “axiological” eschatology of dialectical and existential theology entailed a general broadening of the concept, to the extent that eschatological has since come to mean “definitively or supremely valid.” These attempts retain their importance: for the first time, there had been an endeavor to arrive at a coherent understanding of the imagery in eschatological formulas and to expound their theological meaning. However, those who remained loyal to traditional eschatology (notably O. Cullmann) responded to these attempts by arguing that, in reinterpreting the temporal future as a theological or existential opening to the future, they had evaded or eliminated the very dimension of the concrete future that the world and history still contain for us. It is precisely this deficit that has shaped the contemporary reorientation of eschatology.

3. Contemporary Problems and Priorities in Eschatology

a) Eschatology in the Theologies of Grace and History. In the second half of the 20th century, eschatology has primarily been shaped by the desire to understand, from the perspective of a theology of grace and a theology of history, what the Bible and tradition* have to say about the end of time.

The “new theology” (notably, Lubac*) has described how God’s grace is present throughout reality, tending dynamically toward its own fulfillment. Both as a whole, and through its specific statements, eschatology tells us something about the fulfillment of what is now at work within creation and history: the dynamic of God’s grace.

The treatment of eschatology from the point of view of the theology of history can be traced to two scholars above all others—W. Pannenberg and J. Moltmann—and, in Moltmann’s case, to his dialogue with Marxism (E. Bloch). Both these theologians argued, each in his own way, that the history of salvation, culminating in Jesus Christ, is made known through certain anticipations of the promised fulfillment, which thus become a stimulus to our understanding of universal history (Pannenberg) as well as to human action* (Moltmann). According to Moltmann, God no longer is the “wholly other” (der ganz Andere) situated above history but, because he asks for the historical commitment of humankind, he is the one who “makes everything other” (der ganz Ändernde) within history. Thus, the promised eschaton is always also a renewed and critical questioning of all the forces that reject the future that God has promised (eschatology as social critique). Within Catholicism, it has principally been Karl Rahner* and, in his wake, Johann Baptist Metz, who have emphasized this critical function and responded to the challenge of Marxism by articulating the future of the divine promise with the future of human action within history. Here, the “absolute future” of God is brought to bear against intrahistorical utopias, but it leaves human beings free to shape their own futures adequately, for Rahner and Metz reject the idea of a totalitarian human programming of the future, and place every action under an “eschatological reservation.” On the other hand, believers may perceive a contradiction between the biblical promises* and their present condition of loss and lack of liberty, in such a way that the concrete critical negations implicit in eschatological proclamations open up to them possibilities and motives for action. As against this conception of a fairly indirect and dialectical link between a transcendent eschatological future and an immanent future, South American liberation* theology has sought to order these two dimensions of the future in a more direct manner, where it has not simply identified them with each other. G. Gutiérrez (1971), for example, writes: “The growth of the kingdom is a process that is realized historically within liberation, to the extent that liberation means a better realization of humanity and the condition for a new society. Yet it goes beyond this, for it is realized in historical facts that have the potential for liberation, it denounces their limits and their ambiguities, it announces its complete fulfillment, and it impels it forward, in effect, toward total communion. We are not faced with an identification: without liberatory historical events, there can be no growth of the kingdom.”

It was on the basis of very different premises that Pierre Teilhard de Chardin attempted to reconcile history (and the cosmos*) with eschatology. He understood the whole of reality, from inanimate nature to humanity and its cultural expression, as a process of continuous evolution* toward the absolute future of “the omega point,” where the Whole is united with God, who is its motor, the point of convergence, the guarantee—in a word, the principle—of evolution (Teilhard 1955). However, this attempt has remained somewhat isolated, not to say marginal, within the framework of the most recent developments in eschatology, doubtless also because of the scientific questions and problems of interpretation that it raises.

b) Eschatological Hermeneutics. Aside from the perspectives opened up by the theology of grace and the theology of history, since the middle of the 20th century we have witnessed the development of various attempts to construct a specific hermeneutics* for eschatological texts. These attempts offer a new understanding of the eschata, opposed to the “reification” and “historicization” to which they were subjected by late Scholasticism. It is generally agreed that such a hermeneutics obeys the following “principles”:

- 1) Eschatological statements are concerned with the fulfillment promised by God and hoped for by humanity, which is the goal of the whole of creation, and toward which history is still progressing at the present moment. From this point of view, these texts are prophetic indications of the coming of God and the realization of his promise, and they call on human beings to prepare themselves and to place themselves hopefully on the road. However, they are not apocalyptic predictions capable of informing us about the unfolding of a goal that has been programmed in advance within the divine plan, or about a future that is already in a finished state in the beyond, toward which creation does nothing other than move forward.
- 2) The hope for the fulfillment of individual and universal history beside God, in God, and with God—indeed, the whole content of eschatology—should be interpreted in a resolutely personal sense, rather than in objective or spatial terms. Augustine remarked long ago that our “place,” after death, is God himself. Eschatology in this sense has nothing to do with the dramatic production of a “Last Judgment,” nor with heavenly felicity and the like, but is related to God who exists “as the heaven that we have gained, as the hell from which we have escaped, as the tribunal that examines us, and as the purgatory that purifies us” (Balthasar* 1960). However, as God is the mystery* that infinitely surpasses human beings, all statements related to fulfillment are essentially connected with the core of this mystery, and should be read as having been shaped by a negative* theology rather than an affirmative one.

- 3) It must not be forgotten that eschatological formulas are to be taken as figurative. To the extent that hope is turned toward something that is humanly “impossible,” it is precisely the function of an image to open up the imagination and to prepare for what is to come from God, beyond human possibilities. Yet the images of Christian hope are not simply “dream visions”: they are “extrapolations,” that is, “extensions” into the future, of experiences of salvation, or perdition, that have already been acquired. God does not come only “at the end” to complete the creation of the external world: it is the whole of history that bears the mark of the salvific coming of God, whose every act goes beyond himself to an absolute fulfillment. That is why the history of salvation recorded in Scripture* already provides “documentation” from which it is possible to extrapolate the future fulfillment and its structures. It is in this way alone, as extrapolated images and not as “reports from the future,” that eschatological formulas must be interpreted in order to reveal their true “content.”

There are two projects within contemporary theology that, although they have different emphases, are both aimed at developing a more precise and systematic interpretation of this hermeneutic operation. According to Hans Urs von Balthasar, eschatology is above all an “extended Christology”: all eschatological statements are primarily concerned with Christ, and only then, by extrapolation, with ourselves as well. It is therefore necessary to “read” what happens at death, and what judgment, heaven, and fulfillment are, first of all in relation to Christ, before extending them to ourselves, but in such a way that Christ is, and always remains, the indispensable mediator of the fulfillment of created beings. By contrast, Rahner sees eschatology as being principally an “extended anthropology,” even though it may find its condensed expression in the figure of Christ: the eschaton fulfils what has already been given to us in our present experiences of grace. Accordingly, these experiences constitute the basis from which we can extrapolate toward a future fulfillment, and thus connect the eschatological images in the Bible and tradition to their real content. These two ways of putting a specific hermeneutics of eschatology to work are not mutually exclusive, but are strictly coordinated.

4. Central Eschatological Statements in Context

While the fulfillment promised by God is certainly unitary, it is related to creation, in all its multiplicity and temporality, and therefore takes on a multiple and temporal form.

a) Eschatological fulfillment concerns human beings as individuals and as members of communities. That is why eschatology speaks as much of the end of the individual, in death*, and of individual fulfillment—the immortality of the soul, or resurrection, purification (purgatory), felicity with God—as of the end of humanity, and its universal fulfillment as an entity endowed with “solidarity,” in the end of the world, the resurrection of the dead, the last judgment, heaven, and hell. Since creation also has both material and spiritual dimensions, eschatology must also take care to distinguish their respective modes of fulfillment: “the separated soul,” the resurrection of the body, the new heaven and the new earth.

b) The fulfillment of the soul is not simply a matter of progressive and harmonious development in God. On the contrary, history is marked by antagonisms, born out of evil* and impiety, suffering and futility. This is why eschatology speaks of judgment, in which what is capable of being fulfilled is “separated” from what is not.

c) In fulfillment, it is God himself who realizes the fullness of humanity, but within the “time of pilgrimage” of this life human liberty can come into conformity with God or reject him. Accordingly, eschatology should speak not only of heaven, as the fulfillment of felicity, but also of hell, as the immanent consequence to which a liberty that radically rejects God is exposed. However, heaven and hell are not to be understood as being on the same plane, as two essentially symmetrical possibilities of fulfillment. God has done everything to bring about the salvation of humanity, and human beings themselves, such as they have been created, tend more toward Yes than toward No. That is why hope for a positive fulfillment, that is, hope for heaven, prevails absolutely over fear of hell. Radical rejection, and therefore also hell, remain possibilities nonetheless, and are inseparable from human liberty.

d) Although eschatology speaks of the definitive future of creation in the presence of God at the end of time, it is true, nevertheless, that God has already been communicating with the world throughout the whole span of time, in the external events of the history of salvation, which culminated in Christ, in the sacramental acts of the church, and in the communication of grace to human beings. From this point of view, eschatology is not merely the specific treatise in dogmatics relating to the future, it is also a decisive dimension of theology taken as a whole. Indeed, it exists in numerous forms of “present eschatology,” in which the final and the definitive are projected in anticipation, and human beings are encouraged to support and shape the “penultimate” reality of the world and history in the light of the “ultimate” reality. Earthly existence and history thus become, as Vatican* II declared, the “antechamber” in which human beings can already catch “a glimpse of the world to come”; what is more, it is in earthly existence and history that the “material of the heavenly kingdom” is formed, which human beings must carry, as the product of their history, into the fulfillment that is to come (GS 38, 39).

Such a conception retains some of the central meanings of millenarianism and worldly utopianism: the insistence on the fulfillment of the earthly quest for justice*, peace*, and humanization, and therefore on the fulfillment of earthly history. However, it would be a mistake to suppose that the potential for hope within creation is thus exhausted, or to lose sight of the lasting antagonism that pervades history. The fulfillment of creation can only be produced beyond the world as it now exists, with God himself, through the admission of humanity, as the communion* of saints, into participation in the life of communion of the triune God.

- P. Teilhard de Chardin (1955), Le phénomène humain, Paris.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1960), “Umrisse der E.,” Verbum Caro, Einsiedeln, 276–300.
- K. Rahner (1960), “Theologische Prinzipien der Hermeneutik eschatologischer Aussagen,” Schr. zur Th. 4, 401–28, Einsiedeln-Zurich-Köln.
- J. Mouroux (1962), Le Mystère du temps, Paris.
- J. Moltmann (1964), Theologie der Hoffnung, Munich.
- K. Rahner (1965), “Marxistische Utopie und christliche Zukunft des Menschen,” Schr. zur Th. 6, 77–88, Einsiedeln-Zurich-Köln.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), Grundfragen systematischer Theologie, Göttingen, 91–185.
- G. Greshake (1969), Auferstehung der Toten, Essen.
- K. Rahner (1970), “Die Frage nach der Zukunft,” Schr. zur Th. 9, 519–40, Einsiedeln-Zurich-Köln.
- G. Gutiérrez (1971), Teología de la liberación, Lima.
- D. Wiederkehr (1974), Perspektiven der E., Einsiedeln-Zurich-Köln.
- G. Greshake, G. Lohfink (1975), Naherwartung-Auferstehung-Unsterblichkeit, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1982.
- G. Martelet (1975), L’au-delà retrouvé, Paris (New Ed. 1995).
- C. Schütz (1976), “Allgemeine Grundlegung der E.,” MySal V, 553–700.
- J. Ratzinger (1977), E.: Tod und ewiges Leben, Regensburg, 1990.
- U. Asendorf (1982), “E.,” TRE 10, 310–34.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1983), Theodramatik IV, Einsiedeln.
- G. Greshake, J. Kremer (1986), Resurrectio Mortuorum, Darmstadt (repr. 1992).
- M. Kehl (1986), E., Würzburg.

GISBERT GRESHAKE

See also Beatitude; Hell; History; Hope; Life, Eternal; Limbo; Parousia; Vision, Beatific

Esoterism. See Theosophy

Essence. See Being; Deity; Nature

Eternity of God

The Eternal is my rock, my shepherd, my light, the Psalms* say. For a long time, it seemed completely natural that this adjective substituted for the name of YHWH in more than one translation of the Bible*. In his Consolation of Philosophy, Boethius* said that any man of sense recognizes that God* is eternal. But what does he recognize exactly?

1. The Bible

The term that is often translated as “eternal” or “eternity” is ‘olâm—or aiôn in the Septuagint (the first Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, begun in the third century B.C.). It did not originally designate the pure timelessness of God, but at first simply attributed an immense duration to him. It recognized in him an immemorial and indestructible existence. This existence is contrasted to the precariousness of the world* in Psalm 102 [101]:26 ff., a text that is applied to Christ by Hebrews 1:10 ff. It is also contrasted to the mortality of humanity—for example, in Psalm 90 [89] and Deuteronomy 5:23–26, God is the living God; in Deuteronomy 32:40, he says, “As I live forever.” His presence and action dominate time*. In his eyes, “a thousand years . . . are but as yesterday when it is past, or as a watch in the night” (Ps 90:4; 2 Pt 3:8). Furthermore, God remembers his Covenant* “forever” (lé ‘olâm)—or literally, for “a thousand generations,” (Ps 105 [104]:8). He is “from everlasting”—(mé‘olâm, Ps 93:2), and he was God before he had “formed the earth and the world, from everlasting to everlasting” (Ps 90:2). In this sense, as early as second Isaiah, eternity is clearly a divine attribute (Sasse 1933). This theme is reinforced by that of the preexistence of Wisdom* (Prv 8:22–31; Sir 1:1 [eis ton aiôna], 24:9) and of Christ* (e.g., Jn 1; Phil 2:6).

2. Theology

a) Classic Conception. In the Bible eternity is first and foremost a time without end and it cannot be imagined in another way, as is said again and again (See al-Razi in Arnaldez 1986; Sasse; Ernst 1995). This does not mean that God is attributed the same kind of duration as our duration, even if unlimited. Even this unlimited quality should be thought about, and can only be considered using the resources of philosophy*. This is why it seems vain to regret the Hellenization* of Christianity regarding this point, as Oscar Cullmann does. It is not certain, moreover, that the first Christians had a “naïve” view of the eternity of God as a time prolonged indefinitely (Cullmann 1946). It may even have been their faith* in an eternal God that allowed them to feel affinity with Platonism (Pannenberg 1988), particularly in the form it took with Plotinus.

For Plotinus, when one says that the eternal is “forever,” it is an image to say that it is veritably (Enneads III. 7. 6). Plotinus did not restrict himself to opposing a timeless eternity to a time that is not related to it; he turns eternity into the fullness of a life that is totally present to itself. “Eternity is God himself exposed . . . as he is” (Enneads III. 7. 5), the one “in whom nothing is missing and to whom nonbeing could not be added” (Enneads III. 7. 4); or, as Bossuet would say with regard to the eternity of God, “the one in whom nonbeing has no place” (Élévations sur les mystères, I. 3). Plotinus also talks about the relationship of time to eternity, even if only in the mythical form of the fall of the soul* that produces time in its anxiety (Enneads III. 7. 11). These elements would inevitably serve theological reflection. We find them, at least until the 17th century, modified accordingly, in what can be called classic considerations of the question (e.g., Petau 1644). Augustine* draws a close parallel between the eternity of God and his immutability*, and radically opposes time, created (Confessions XI. xiii, e.g.) and characteristic of the changing creature (Enarrationes in Psalmos 121, PL 37, 1623), with eternity, “the very substance of God, in which there is no change” (Enarrationes in Psalmos 101 [102], PL 37, 1311).

Boethius is more similar to Plotinus, as can be seen in his definition of eternity: “the complete, simultaneous, and perfect possession of life without end” (interminabilis vitae tota simul et perfecta possessio; Consolation V. 6). The word interminabilis, here, does not mean “interminable” in the usual sense, which connotes the whole experience and all the impatience of time; its rather designates the positive infinity of the being* of God, which we only understand negatively (see ST Ia, q. 10, a. 1, ad. 1). Boethius clearly defines the difference between a life that is simply “interminable” and the fullness of presence of life to itself to which a duration cannot be assigned (aliud est... per interminabilem duci vitam... aliud interminabilis vitae totam pariter complexum esse praesentiam). The world is perhaps “perpetual,” but only God is “eternal.”

These thoughts would be adopted and systematized by Thomas* Aquinas, for whom it is certainly not the fact of having neither beginning nor end that defines eternity with regard to time (ST Ia, q. 10, a. 4), but the simultaneity of presence to oneself (Ia, q. 13, a. 11). In this sense, God is not in time, but time is in God (ibid., a. 2, ad. 4, a. 4; Ia, q. 14, a. 13; q. 57, a. 3). Thus, Thomas explains the paradox of God’s knowledge of future contingents, which he does not anticipate, but rather sees as present (prout sunt in sua praesentialitate, Ia, q. 14, a. 13), since “at every moment in time, eternity is present” (CG I, 66).

b) Modernity. This classic conception was adopted again at the end of the 19th century by Vatican* I, which included eternity in the list of divine attributes (DS 3001; see Lateran* IV, DS 800). Yet, it was already not as fitting, contrary to what Boethius thought. Certainly, the negative aspect of eternity prevailed over its positive aspect in academic theology*, and eternity was no longer seen as simple timelessness. However, philosophies on future and on the evolution of the Holy Spirit and the Absolute (Hegel*, Schelling*) dominated at the time, and therefore first enhanced historicity. The eternity that Zarathustra loved was different from the one Augustine held dear (cara aeternitas; Confessions VII. x). It was, rather, an exalted absolute version of the future, of the “eternal return” to which Nietzsche* often turned. All of this made it difficult to see in immutability, impassiveness, the eternity of the positive attributes of divinity. It seemed more appropriate to define death* than life, of which Boethius spoke. There was only life if there was dynamism, future, progress, and conflict perhaps, and this had to be true of the living par excellence. This point of view still thrives: today, the word static is clearly pejorative, as opposed to the positive sense that ancient philosophy lent to nunc stans. To answer Augustine’s question vis tu... stare? (PL 37, 1623), we would tend resolutely to say “no.” Thus, contemporary theology, in many cases, aims to think about the “dynamism” of God, or at least his close connection to temporality and history*, which seems indispensable in understanding his love* for humanity. In extreme cases, as in “process* theology,” eternity is diluted in the undefined future of “events” that do not even form a world. In more classical theologies, thoughts of the past are not dismissed, but they are considered in new terms, by going back to biblical categories. Thus Karl Barth* comes to consider the eternity of God as a duration—“the time of God” (KD II/1, 691). It is so full that it has none of the limitations, instability, or disjunctions of created time (691); in a certain way, it constitutes the shape of Trinitarian life (693–4); it contains time (698)—God “has time for us,” and “he has time because he has eternity” (689)—and it is possible that it becomes temporal in Jesus Christ (695–6). One would even have to define it as pre-, super-, and post-temporality (698).

This lordship of God over time that Barth recognizes (692) is also asserted by Joseph Ratzinger (1959). Ratzinger is not satisfied either with a negative conception of eternity. This lordship takes shape in the Incarnation*, in which God participated in time to bring man to participate in his eternity (ibid.). One understands that, from this point of view, “eternal” life promised to men is in no way a simple life forever, bearing nothing of the eternity of God—and here we come back to Boethius. This, moreover, is where the interest lies in the notion of aevum, which was developed by Scholasticism* in order to try to consider the duration of angels* and souls—that is, in seeking to define a paradisiacal duration that is neither the world’s time, nor eternity, which belongs to God alone, but which involves both. “Eternal” beings are fixed in their essence, but their acts are successive. (ST Ia, q. 10, a. 5 and 6).

- Boethius, Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus, De Consolatione Philosophiae V, 6 (LCL 74).
- K. Barth, KD II/1, §31.3 (Dogmatique, Geneva, 1957).
- Plotinus, Enneads III. 7.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 10.
- ♦ D. Petau (1644), Theologica Dogmata, vol. I. I. III (Ed. Vivès, Paris, 1865).
- J. Guitton (1933), Le temps et l'éternité chez Plotin et saint Augustin, Paris (3rd Ed. 1959).
- H. Sasse (1933), “Aion,” ThWNT 1, 197–209.
- O. Cullmann (1946), Christus und die Zeit, Zurich.
- J. Schierse, J. Ratzinger, K. Jüssen (1959), “Ewigkeit,” “Ewigkeit Gottes,” LThK2 3, 1267–71.
- E. Jünger (1976), Gottes Sein ist im Werden, Tübingen.
- R. Arnaldez (1986), “Kidam,” EI (F), New Ed., 5, 97 b-101.
- D. H. Preuß (1986), “Olâm,” ThWAT 5, 1144–59.
- W. Pannenberg (1988), Systematische Theologie, vol. 1, chap. 6, §6, Göttingen.
- W. Hasker (1989), God, Time and Knowledge, Ithaca-London.
- A. Paus, J. Ernst, P. Walter (1995), “Ewigkeit, Ewigkeit Gottes,” LThK3 3, 1082–84.

IRÈNE FERNANDEZ

See also Attributes, Divine; Immutability/Impassibility, Divine; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Life, Eternal; Omnipresence, Divine; Omnipotence, Divine; Platonism, Christian; Predestination; Providence; Simplicity, Divine

Ethics

Every society* maintains its identity, coherence, and continuity through a set of values, rules, and practices that constitute its moral tradition. This is possible because human beings are social beings that depend on one another and have other interests beyond their own private concerns; it is necessary because human beings are also selfish beings with an inclination to pursue their own interests at the expense of others. One of the functions of moral traditions is to allow human beings to extend themselves by providing them with an authoritative system of acceptable practice. Such traditions also provide the context in which individuals determine their own aspirations and ideals.

Ethics generally refers to the systematic study of morality. It can be normative, seeking to set rules, or descriptive, seeking to systematize a society's virtues*, values, and obligations by placing them back in the context of the society's historical traditions, and in the light of some fundamental and authoritative principle or set of principles. Christian ethics is the study of that which constitutes the moral life in the light of belief in God* as Creator and Redeemer. Hence, whatever function it may ascribe to human moral intuition and reason*, it is fundamentally a "theological ethics," grounded in the will and wisdom* of God. In the Catholic tradition it is generally known as "moral theology*." Christian ethics is rooted in Scripture* and tradition*, but draws from philosophy*; during its early history it was, like the rest of Christian doctrine, much indebted to the Greco-Roman heritage.

1. Greco-Roman Heritage

a) Morality and Religion. Many mythological stories were far from edifying, and philosophers contended that they could not be taught as moral examples. Thus, explicitly or implicitly, philosophical ethics had a measure of autonomy in relation to religion and offered an independent criterion for testing the truth* of religious beliefs.

b) Law and Nature. If morality was not determined by the will of the gods, was it then determined by the will of human beings? And if so, of which human beings? In Antigone, Sophocles (c. 496–406 B.C.) portrays the moral conflict between Creon, who for reasons of state* has forbidden the burial of Polyneices, and Antigone, who disobeys Creon in order to pay her last respects to her brother. In thus observing the piety due to the family*, she appeals to a law* that is deeper and more authoritative than the law imposed by the state.

c) Right and Might. Debates about the source of moral authority* raised questions about the nature of that authority. The Sophists maintained that a moral pronouncement has the authority only of the person who makes it, since moral opinions reflect only the interests of those who hold them. Thus, the morality of a community reflects the interests of those who hold power. This view is ascribed by Plato* to Thrasymachus in the first book of The Republic (338 a–348 b). It appears, on the other hand, that Socrates spent much of his life contesting such views, on the grounds that the dialectic of moral argument implies the reality of a constant and unchanging norm, and not merely an infinite variety of opinions.

d) Time and Eternity. Plato continued the reflections of Socrates by giving them a metaphysical foundation. Ethical norms can exist only if they are grounded in transcendent Forms, each of which is unchanging and eternal. The crown of these Forms is the Form of the Good*, which is beyond all being* and knowledge, and is accessible to intellectual intuition only after a sustained period of education.

e) Morality and Happiness. Aristotle rejected the doctrine of the Good because it sheds no light on the practical moral problems of human existence. In its place, he undertook an investigation of what it is that human beings really want and how they might achieve their goal. Everyone, he assumes, wants happiness (eudaimonia). By "happiness," he means not simple subjective satisfaction, but a fulfillment of life that embraces both subjective feelings and objective elements. Such happiness depends upon the active and lifelong exercise of characteristically human virtues in accordance with human nature. Supreme among these virtues is the intellectual virtue of contemplation*, which offers the greatest happiness since it most nearly approaches the activity of the divine.

f) Pleasure and Duty. The Hellenistic period saw new ethical developments. The individual replaced the citizen, and values that had previously been associated with membership in a distinctive community were superseded by values associated either with the individual or with universal humanity. Epicureans emphasized individual feeling, and extolled a quiet life of pleasure and contentment, while Stoics emphasized universal rationality, which, they maintained, provides the norms of human behavior. To act in accordance with reason is to act in accordance with the ultimate nature of things, human nature included.

This whole tradition of philosophical reflection provided early Christian theologians with a conceptual framework for the exposition of ethics. The moral beliefs of Christians were largely derived from Jewish origins, although their social relationships were also influenced by the Hellenistic world (e.g., “household codes” regulating relationships between husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and slaves, in such writings as 1 Pt 2:18–25 and 3:1–17; Col 3:18–4:1; Eph 5:21–6:9). The ethical issues were the same as those of the Greek philosophers: the nature, source, and grounds of the moral claim; the relationship between individual, community, and human beings in general; the relationship between the conventional, the natural, and the metaphysical; the dialectic of liberty* and obedience, or virtue and happiness; and, especially important for theology, the relationship between morality according to reason and morality according to revelation*.

2. Judeo-Christian Tradition

At the heart of biblical ethics is faith* in the one God as Creator and Redeemer, and acknowledgment of the Covenant* that God has made with his people*: the Covenant with the Israelites after their departure from Egypt, and then the New Covenant with all who put their trust in Jesus* Christ raised from the dead. For a covenantal ethics, the basic concepts are the gift and the call, the promise* and the command.

a) The Mosaic Covenant. According to the terms of the Covenant made with Moses, God’s promise is a new life in a new and prosperous land, while God’s command is that his people respect the law, as summarized in the Decalogue* and explained in the Pentateuch. Thus, the ethics of the Covenant is a prescriptive ethics of obedience to God’s law as the way of salvation*: if the people respect the law, they will surely “live”; if they break the law, they will surely “die” (Dt 30:15–20; See Ex 20:1–21; Dt 5–7).

b) The Two Ages and the New Covenant. The history of Israel*’s obedience and disobedience gave rise after the exile to the imagery of the “two ages”: the present age, in which there is a continuing struggle between God and the forces of evil*, and the age to come, a messianic age in which God will establish a universal rule, and God’s people will live in holiness*, justice*, and peace*. At the heart of Jesus’ proclamation is the message that the kingdom is now at hand, and that people should pray and prepare for its coming. At that period, there were a variety of ways of representing the nature of this kingdom, and the precise intention of the preaching* of Jesus is open to more than one interpretation (See the phrase in Lk 17:20 on the kingdom of God, variously translated as “within you,” “in your midst,” or “in your grasp”). In any case, the effect of such preaching was twofold. First, it confirmed the basis of the Christian life in obedience to God, an obedience that is thankful for God’s love*, and called men and women to imitate such love in their relationships with one another. Second, it relativized the claims of all human institutions, such as the family and the state. The disciple should be characterized by love of God and love of neighbor, and the category of “neighbor” was expanded to include everyone in need whom the disciple was in a position to help (Lk 10:25–37).

Shortly before his death, Jesus anticipated the coming of the kingdom, and at the Last Supper he established a New Covenant (Mk 14:22–25 par.). After his death and Resurrection*, the expectation of the coming of the kingdom persisted (Parousia*). The disciples continued to accept social institutions and practices, but recognized that these belonged to the passing age and that, while they should be obeyed, they must now be obeyed “in Christ*” or “in the Lord.” This way of thinking doubtless left things as they were, but it also contained the seeds of radical criticism and transformation.

c) The Church and the World. The tension between living under the pressures and constraints of the present age, and anticipating the new life of the age to come, continued long after the expectation of Parousia had moved from the center of Christian consciousness. It can be discerned, for example, in the dialectic between desert and city*, between outright condemnation of riches and concern for their proper use, between celibacy and marriage*, and between an abnegation of coercive force and its employment in maintaining order and safety. Before the conversion* of Constantine (c. 274–337) and the establishment of Christianity as the state religion, Christian ethics could afford to remain an ethics of dissidence, but afterward, in one way or another it had to come to terms with the demands of social and political life. The aspiration to the perfect life of the new age was therefore confronted by the realism of the present age, with its moral and social needs. This situation called forth, on the one hand, an ascetic theology (asceticism*), as exemplified by the earlier documents of the Philokalia, and, on the other, a carefully considered social ethics appropriate to the political life of an imperial regime.

d) Augustine and the Two Cities. In De civitate Dei (The City of God), Augustine* combines a philosophy of history* with a philosophical basis for ethics. In line with Aristotle, Augustine assumes that all human beings seek happiness (CD, 10, 11). Because they have been created by God and for God, their true happiness, or blessing*, is to be found in God, who alone can satisfy their deepest longing. Thus, an ethics of self-fulfillment and an ethics of obedience are revealed to be one and the same. Loves for lesser objects are stepping-stones toward the ultimate love (CD 15, 22; Doc. chr. 1, 27). However, the sin* of love of self has perverted and displaced love of God, thus creating the earthly city in which the citizens of the city of God, on pilgrimage*, are also present until the end of history (e.g., CD 14, 28). In the present age, the law of God not only sets forth the true end of human beings and the way to achieve that end, but it also establishes moral boundaries that they must not transgress. Under the rule of God, the earthly city maintains order through restraint and coercion (e.g., Ep. 153, 6, 16), while the city of God is ruled by the grace* and persuasion of love (e.g., CD 19, 23). Since God wishes that evil should be repressed, Christians are justified in resorting to coercive force, in certain circumstances, but only if they hold political responsibility for the welfare of the community (CD 5, 24; cf. Ep. 93 and 185, where Augustine lays the foundations for what later became the doctrine of the just war*). Since Christians continue to be engaged in the two cities, an ethics that is intended to be Christian generally seeks some middle way between two extremes: the total rejection of the use of force, on the one hand, and the use of force for spiritual ends, on the other. The tension between the demands of law, order, and justice, and the counsels of patience, forgiveness, and love provides a recurrent theme of Christian ethics, and this tension finds expression in teachings such as the medieval doctrine of the “two swords” or Luther*’s doctrine of the “two kingdoms,” as well as in the espousal of nonviolence by some Christian sects and the justification of revolutionary force (revolution*) by some theologians of liberation*.

e) Thomas Aquinas and the Ethics of the Law. According to Thomas* Aquinas, the ultimate fulfillment of human beings and the daily ordering of human life are both grounded in the divine wisdom, the unchanging structure of which is the eternal law. This eternal law is reflected in the world through a triple law: natural, divine, and human (ST Ia IIae, q. 91). The new law of the gospel is the presence in the believer’s heart of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, who evokes a free response of wisdom and love, and gives spiritual discernment (ibid., q. 106, a. 1). Law is the expression of order, harmony, and fulfillment, and conformity with the law is the work of practical reason. Thus, love and wisdom form the mainstay of the good life, and the particular will of God is to be discerned as much by the Spirit of love as by the precepts* enshrined in written law. In a sense, Aquinas, while developing a different approach, is closer here to the Orthodox Church (orthodoxy*), with its emphasis on the divine “economy,” than are some other strains of Western Christianity, such as the penitentiaries, with their fixed tariffs for fixed categories of sin.

f) Conscience, Community, and Christ. The harmony achieved by Aquinas between the immediacy of spiritual discernment and the abstract mediations of the application of principles was not easy for everyone, and there was a great danger of privileging either intuitive reliance on the guidance of the Spirit or detailed casuistry*. The danger was accentuated by the disputes of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation. In the churches of the Reformation, with their condemnation of the hierarchical structures of the medieval church, their emphasis on the immediate access of the believer to the grace of God through Jesus Christ, and their consequent suspicion of any ethical system that smacked of legalism, there was increasing emphasis on the freedom of believers to make their own judgments on the basis of Scripture and the inward prompting of the Spirit. The Council of Trent* sought to respond to this tendency by a renewed practice of auricular confession. As a result, the work of the moral theologian was increasingly restricted to prescribing the minimal requirements of law, while mystical or ascetic theology concerned itself with the deeper aspects of spirituality as lived (life*, spiritual).

The teaching that conscience* is the supreme subjective authority, always to be obeyed but needing to be formed and informed by the objective moral order, must always guard against two dangers: that of relativism*, in which the individual conscience is given an objective authority that does not pertain to it, and that of legalism, in which the abstractions of an impersonal order are preferred to the real problems of human beings.

3. Age of the Enlightenment and the Challenge of Secularization

The Enlightenment and its aftermath saw the radical questioning of traditional ecclesiastical authority. Tradition as the justification of moral and religious belief was rejected in favor of reason, as with Kant*, or feeling, as with Hume (1711–76): an unquestionable foundation for morality was to be discovered in human nature. Sometimes, morality was assimilated to mathematics and its self-evident principles; sometimes, by contrast, it was assimilated to the apparent immediacy of the senses; sometimes, too, it was assimilated to a principle of maximization of interest. In any case, these proposals for grounding morality ascribed to it autonomy in relation to religion, and belief or disbelief in God was thus rendered ethically irrelevant. It would be difficult to find a more forthright assertion of the autonomy of ethics than Kant's celebrated remark: "Even the Holy One of the Gospels must first be compared with our ideal of moral perfection before we can recognize him as such" (Grundlegung).

The notion of the autonomy of ethics was intended to overcome the arbitrariness of religious ideology and to do justice to the freedom, dignity, and moral responsibility of the human agent. The human spirit was put in the place of God, and an innate sense of duty was substituted for obedience to divine law. However, the movement away from the moral object to the moral subject—that is, from moral law to the moral agent—carried within it the seeds of a more radical subjectivism, which rejected the whole idea of an objective morality. Growing awareness of the wide range of disparate and often conflicting beliefs and practices suggested that the idea of an essential humanity and a universal morality was an illusion. It seemed that there were many moralities, but no single morality, and that differing conceptions of morality were incommensurable. In such a situation, total moral anarchy is held in check solely by the fact that human beings must live together and therefore require a social morality, which brings order into their conflicting interests and is based on their common interests. Apart from this social morality, it is for individuals to choose their own values and style of life. Consequently, the primary virtue is no longer obedience to the universal moral law and a sense of obligation to one's fellow human beings, but sincerity and authenticity. In relation to society, it is no longer a question of responsibility, but of rights (See Sartre 1943 or Nozick 1974).

The radical subjectivism of contemporary ethics has often been criticized, and there is renewed interest among philosophers and theologians in the concepts of community and duty. However, the debate continues between those who believe that there are universal moral norms and those who believe that such norms are relative to specific systems of beliefs and values. In Christian ethics, the debate focuses on the relationship between natural and revealed morality, between that which is, in principle, the property of all human beings as made in the image of God, and that which is derived from Scripture and Christian tradition. However, although Christian ethics is concerned first and foremost with the community of the redeemed, it also aims at the fulfillment of the "true" humanity of human beings, and therefore, in principle, has a universal scope.

4. Future of Ethics

The clash of cultures and ideologies that threatens to take the place of conflicts between nations has made the advent of a universal ethics all the more urgent. Is such an ethics possible, however, or even, as the most radical pluralists would ask, desirable? If it is, will it be no more than a "negative" ethics, proscribing behavior that infringes against certain basic rights? Or will it include a "positive" ethics, prescribing certain virtues, values, and practices that contribute to human well-being? If the latter, how will this well-being be defined? And should this include the well-being of animals* and even of the environment (ecology*)?

In the second half of the 20th century, not least because of Vatican* II, there was a renewal of moral theology and of theological ethics. The council declared (Optatam Totius 16) that: "special attention needs to be given to the development of moral theology. Its scientific exposition should be more thoroughly nourished by scriptural teaching. It should show the nobility of the Christian vocation of the faithful, and their obligation to bring forth fruit in charity for the life of the world." This is a call for a new theological anthropology*, and a deeper understanding of the link between freedom and obedience, which will combine the faith that human beings are made in the image of God with all the insights into what makes human beings truly human. The idea of a "true" humanity need not result in a stereotype.

- Augustine, De civitate Dei, BAUG 33–37; De doctrina christiana, BAUG 11, 149–541; Epistula 153, CSEL 44.
- H. Bergson, Les deux sources de la morale et de la religion, Paris, 1932.
- E. Kant, Grundlegung der Metaphysik der Sitten, AA 4, Berlin, 1910.
- J.-P. Sartre, L'être et le néant, Paris, 1943.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 91–94; 100; 106–8.
- ♦ K. Barth (1951), KD III/4 (Dogmatique), Geneva, 1964–65).
- H. R. Niebuhr (1951), Christ and Culture, New York.
- H. Thielicke (1951–58), Theologische Ethik, 3 vols., Tübingen.
- B. Häring (1954), Das Gesetz Christi, Freiburg.
- P. Ramsey (1967), Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics, New York.
- G. H. Outka, P. Ramsey (Ed.) (1968), Norm and Context in Christian Ethics, London.
- K. Barth (1973–78), Ethik, 2 vols., Zurich.
- R. Nozick (1974), Anarchy State and Utopia, New York.
- J.-M. Hennaux (1975), "Cours de morale fondamentale," course notes, Institut d'études théologiques, Brussels.

- J. Gustafson (1979), Protestant and Roman Catholic Ethics, London.
- R. M. Hare (1981), Moral Thinking: Its Levels, Methods and Point, London.
- W. Schrage (1982), Ethik des Neuen Testaments, Göttingen.
- J. M. Finnis (1983), Fundamental of Ethics, Oxford.
- S. Hauerwas (1984), The Peaceable Kingdom: A Primer in Christian Ethics, London.
- J. McClendon (1986), Ethics, Nashville, Tenn.
- J. Macquarrie, J. Childress (Ed.) (1986), A New Dictionary of Christian Ethics, London.
- O. O'Donovan (1986), Resurrection and Moral Order, Leicester.
- B. Chilton, J. McDonald (1987), Jesus and the Ethics of the Kingdom, London.
- A. MacIntyre (1990), Three Rival Versions of Moral Enquiry, London.
- R. Spaemann (1990), Glück und Wohlwollen, Stuttgart.
- C. Pinto de Oliveira (1992), Éthique chrétienne et dignité de l'homme, Fribourg-Paris.
- R. McInerney (1993), The Question of Christian Ethics, Washington.
- C. E. Curran (1996), "Théologie morale," DEPhM, 1511–17.

PETER BAELZ

See also Asceticism; Conscience; Ethics, Autonomy of; Ethics, Medical; Ethics, Sexual; Good; Market Economics, Morality of; Society

Ethics, Autonomy of

1. Antiquity

It is said that Pythagoras was the first person to compare human life to the Olympic Games, at which one finds athletes, business people, and spectators. Counter to what we would do spontaneously, Pythagoras classifies them in ascending order, for they represent, respectively, those who devote themselves to the body, to action, and to contemplation*. Plato, who was the student of a Pythagorean, took up this value system when he gave the highest standing to contemplation. As with Pythagoras, this preference is explained by belief in the immortality of the soul* and in reincarnation. In Plato's mature work, the period of the Phaedo and Republic, for example, practical reason* has no independence from theoretical reason. Moreover, there is no terminological distinction. The virtue of both is wisdom* (phronesis). Wisdom, both theoretical and practical, is achieved in the grasp of the Forms, and the world of the Forms is unified under the Form of Good*. This world is accessible to the soul separate from the body. During incarnations, it loses touch with this world, under the clouding influence of the senses, but education can bring back reminiscences of it. In this case, reason then guides us into knowledge both of the nature of things and of the right principles of action. The whole of the soul, including the appetites and the spirit, comes under its control. This does not mean, however, that we cannot act contrary to reason. Republic (439 e 7–440 a 3) describes the case of Leontius, torn between his impulse to look at corpses, and his reason, which tells him not to, but still yields to his impulse. Here, Plato is different from Socrates, at least as the latter is represented in the Protagoras: according to Socrates, reason is always in control and cannot be "tugged all about like a slave" (352 b 3–c 2; 358 b 6–d 2).

Aristotle gives an account of the relation between theoretical and practical reason in which we discern the beginning of the autonomy of ethics. He makes a distinction between two intellectual virtues, theoretical wisdom (sophia) and practical wisdom (phronesis). Like Plato, he believes that there is something in us, the noûs, that survives the death* of the body, but the texts (especially De anima III. 5. 430 a 10–25) are obscure on this point. Moreover, Aristotle takes up neither reminiscence and reincarnation, nor the idea of Good. We achieve practical wisdom by an outward and inward path, similar to the track that starts and ends at the same place after retracing one's steps. We start from a mixture of desire and second-hand principles, taught to us by our parents and instructors. If we are fortunate, this starting point will enable us to proceed on the outward path, which is a sustained reflection on this mixture and which, at the turning point, reaches a consistent vision of good and of happiness (eudaimonia). This will be "truth in accordance with right desire," whereas the goal of theoretical reason is simply truth. The inward path is where this vision is put into practice, so that desire and thought are unified, leaving no frustration. It is important to note that phronesis is not purely intellectual for Aristotle, but also includes balanced desire (Ethica Nicomachea [EN] VI. 5. 1140 b 28–30). He makes contemplation (theoria) of the highest unchangeable realities, such as God* and human nature, an essential ingredient in human happiness, but because we are human and not divine, this is not the whole of our happiness. On the subject of the weakness of the will, Aristotle comes close to Socrates. If practical reason is fully engaged in both the general perception of the good and in its application to individual cases, the power of desire has already been encompassed, and reason cannot be “tugged all about.”

2. Christianity

a) Scripture. The Old Testament and the New Testament see ethics centrally as a matter of the law* or of the commandments given by God to his people. It is true that there is also in the Scriptures* the tradition of Wisdom, and that Christ* is both the Word* and Wisdom (1 Cor 1:24–30). Moreover, in Paul’s letters, the law is not seen as standing alone in mediating God’s will to us, but in a complex relation with grace* and faith* (Rom 7–8). Nevertheless, the emphasis on divine commandment gives Christian ethics a very distinct character.

b) Augustine. Augustine* came to Christianity by way of Platonism and, despite the evolution of his thought, Platonism remained for him a “preparation for the gospel.” He agrees with Plato’s postulation of an intelligible world of Forms, and follows the tradition that identified this world with the divine mind. Accordingly, he makes a distinction between two forms of mental activity and two forms of excellence, wisdom (sapientia) and knowledge (scientia). The intellectual cognizance of eternal things belongs to wisdom, but the rational cognizance of temporal things to knowledge (De Trinitate XII. xv). Action, in which we use temporal things well, therefore belongs in the domain of knowledge, and contemplation of eternal things in the domain of wisdom. At first glance, this seems like Aristotle’s division (EN 6, 1, 1139 a 6–8), but Augustine’s view is different in several respects. First, the eternal things are defined in terms of Christian theology*, especially God’s eternity* and our eternal life* with God. Second, Augustine sees the distinction between wisdom and knowledge in terms of another distinction, pervasive in his thought, between use (usus) and enjoyment (fruitio). We are to use changeable and corporeal things, which are good, but without taking them as our only objective or endpoint:

“Whatever we do rationally in the using of temporal things, we may do it with contemplation of attaining eternal things, passing through the former, but cleaving to the latter” (op. cit., 12, 13). Enjoyment is man’s proper attitude to God, and use is his proper relation to everything else. Human deterioration is the tendency to treat as our end what we should be merely using. The reason that has knowledge, in his sense, has appetite very close to it. Augustine compares knowledge to Eve, who alone spoke with the serpent and then gave the fruit to Adam*. In this same way, scientia has the capacity to be moved in the direction of the enjoyment of bodily things, and becomes conformed thereby to the image of the animals* rather than the image of God. What makes the difference as to the direction it moves is the presence or absence of faith. In this picture, practical reason is distinguished from theoretical reason, but ordered toward it teleologically. When this ordering is disturbed, the mind becomes estranged from itself, “stuck by the glue of its attachments” (10, 5).

c) Middle Ages. The Nicomachean Ethics was known by the great Arabic commentators but disappeared in Christian Europe until the 12th century. Abelard*, for example, shows no knowledge of the work. Its rediscovery was complicated by the fact that the first Latin translations covered only the first three books, which gave a misleading impression of Aristotle’s views. Indeed, without Books VI and X, which deal with the superiority of theoretical wisdom and locate the dominant place of contemplation in happiness, the autonomy of philosophical ethics from theology stands out more starkly. Aquinas had the whole of the Nicomachean Ethics, as well as Albert* the Great’s commentary, but like his 12th-century predecessors, he advocated a certain autonomy of ethics (ST IIa IIae, q. 47, a. 4): “The role of practical wisdom (prudentia, translating phronesis) is to charge our conduct with right reason (applicatio rationis ad opus), and this cannot be done without rightful desire. Prudence is therefore not only an intellectual virtue but a moral virtue.” Here, Aquinas goes further than Aristotle, who concedes that practical wisdom requires the moral virtues and vice versa, but does not count phronesis itself among the moral virtues. Aquinas’s philosophical ethics has a place for practical wisdom between theology and the immediate causation of moral behavior. Human beings can arrive at some knowledge of the natural moral law by the light of reason. This limited autonomy is consistent with the idea that “natural law is nothing else but a participation of a rational creature in eternal law, [for] the light of natural reason, whereby we discern what is good and what is evil... is nothing else than an imprint on us of the divine light” (ST Ia IIae, q. 91, a. 2). Even though natural moral law is a reflection of eternal law, or of God’s plan that directs all things to their ends, it does not need to be the object of a revelation*. Every human being possesses the capacity to reflect by theoretical reason on the fundamental inclinations of human nature, and to reach the universal rules of moral life. For Aquinas, however, philosophical ethics is limited in scope. Perfect happiness or beatitude* is for him the vision of the divine essence, and therefore a heavenly activity belonging to contemplative reason, not an activity of practical reason in action on earth. For Aquinas, the Nicomachean Ethics describes the two aspects of imperfect happiness—the happiness of the theoretical or contemplative life and the happiness of social life—that are distinct on this earth. This means, furthermore, that the domain of practical wisdom has a certain priority on earth. In this life, the will, by which we can love God, is superior to the understanding, since we cannot see God, even though, in itself and in the next life, the intellect is nobler (ST Ia, q. 82, a. 3). The Franciscan philosophers (Bonaventure*, Duns* Scotus, William of Ockham [c. 1285–1347]) gave an even greater priority to the will. For them, volitional activity and affective experience are more distinctive of humanity than any activity of the intellect, and moral values are dependent upon the free will of God, limited only by the bounds of logical possibility.

d) Reformation and Enlightenment. The synthesis of the authority of Aristotle and the authority of the church* was threatened by the Reformation and the new science of Copernicus (1473–1543) and Galileo (1564–1642). The rationalist philosophers, like Descartes* or Spinoza (1632–77), responded by trying to found knowledge and ethics more securely on the basis of reason. But reason itself was in turn critiqued by the empiricists, especially Hume (1711–76), who attacks the very idea of natural law. Distinguishing descriptive judgments (is, is not) from prescriptive judgments (you must, you must not), Hume asks how the second can be deduced from the first, since they are not of the same order (Treatise of Human Nature III, 1, 1). No term should appear in the conclusion that has not appeared in the premises: one cannot, therefore, make a valid transition from being to having to be, or from fact to value. Nevertheless, even if Hume is right about this, the point is not devastating to Aquinas’s project of deriving the precepts of the natural law from reflection about human nature and human inclinations, for he has resources for supplying in the premises the “ought” that Hume requires. More important is another of Hume’s arguments, that reason is inert, and it is only passion that moves us to action. He says that it is impossible that reason and passion can ever oppose each other, or vie for the government of the will and actions; but since morality can oppose the passions* and move us to action, morality is a matter of passion (albeit of calm passions such as benevolence), not of reason. Hume is not denying here that reason has an effect on action, but he claims (in order to bury Socrates) that reason’s proper role is to be the slave of the moral passions, showing them the way to reach satisfaction. Here, he echoes Aristotle, for whom “thought by itself moves nothing; what moves us is thought aiming at some goal and concerned with action” (EN 6, 2, 1139 a 35f). Thought gets to action through desire, but Aristotle does not say that desire is independent of thought, since it might be (and will be in a virtuous person) what he calls a rational wish (boulesis).

Kant*’s response to Hume takes us to an influential view about the autonomy of ethics. Kant wants to show that, contrary to what Hume thinks, reason can be practical, or binding, in the form of the categorical imperative. In order to do this, he has to limit the pretensions of theoretical reason. According to his famous phrase, it was necessary for him to “abolish knowledge to make room for belief” (preface to the Critique of Pure Reason, 2nd edition). The Greeks had thought that the objects of contemplation (theoria) are by their nature the most valuable (EN 6, 7, 1141 b 3), because, unlike the objects of praxis, they are eternally and necessarily what they are. Kant turns this argument on its head. It is because the objects of practical reason are superior that when cognition involves pure speculative reason and pure practical reason, the latter prevails (Critique of Practical Reason). Speculative reason can only use ideas of immortality, liberty*, and God as regulative or heuristic devices; it cannot make any conclusions about the existence of the objects of these ideas, since it can judge only what can be experienced with the senses. Practical reason, however, relies upon what Kant calls “the fact of reason”—the fact that there is a moral law; it can therefore transcend these limitations and use the ideas of immortality, liberty, and God as constitutive, proofs of the reality of their objects. In saying that reason can be practical, Kant is not denying Hume’s claim that humans must be moved to action by something “on the side of inclination,” but he says that we can be moved by respect for the moral law. He is also not denying theoretical reason a right of veto over belief. If reason in its speculative use could show that something was impossible, then practical reason could not legitimate our postulating its existence. However, Kant severely limits what speculative reason can show by way of possibility and impossibility. Finally, Kant does not extend the autonomy of ethics into independence of theology, although not all his interpreters agree with this. In the preface to the second edition of Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone, he proposes that we look at the pure religion of reason, which contains morality, as the inner of two concentric circles; the outer circle contains historical faith and revelation. He concedes that morality requires belief in some items in the outer circle, even though these items cannot be used in the maxims of speculative or practical reason. In particular, morality requires belief in God's grace in order to explain how human beings, in their condition of submission to radical evil, can ever please God. (op. cit., 61).

3. 19th and 20th Centuries

In the 19th century, Kant was interpreted in several manners, including by "right-wing" and "left-wing" Hegelians, and by opponents of Hegel*. Kierkegaard*, for example, reacted against Hegel by separating three kinds of life, the esthetic, the ethical, and the religious. The ethical life is reached by a mysterious revolution of the will within the esthetic life, but the ethical life itself fails and requires a leap of faith into the religious life, within which a "second ethics" is possible, by God's assistance, and we become able to live as God intends us to.

In 20th-century moral philosophy, the autonomy of ethics has grown as the prestige of speculative reason has declined. Thus, to give one example, the pragmatists follow Kant's dictum that "every interest is ultimately practical." For Charles Sanders Peirce (1839–1914), to be a pragmatist is to find a theory's meaning in the practical consequences that would necessarily result if the theory were true (Collected Papers V, §9). John Dewey (1859–1952) thought that there were no final ends and that we should therefore look at "ends in view," all of which may become means for further "ends in view." The existentialists urged that existence precedes essence, denying the role of natural law. Following Kierkegaard, but denying faith, Sartre (1905–80) insisted that we make ourselves what we are by our choice; our nature is not given to us. George Moore (1873–1958) objected to what he called "the naturalistic fallacy" of identifying "good" with any natural property. For emotivists (like Charles Stevenson) and prescriptivists (like Richard Hare), moral judgments are not assertions, but imperatives or means of influencing others; they do not deny, however, that practical judgments have their own kind of objectivity. Finally, some writers have taken up Kant's idea of the unity of nature, but denied the existence of freedom. As more has become known about the structure of the brain, artificial intelligence, and genetics, it has become tempting to think of morality and the freedom that it presupposes as illusions of common sense, just as the physicist can regard the ordinary concepts of tables and chairs as illusory in the light of what physics knows about the structure of matter. The paradoxical logic of this line of thought would lead to the disappearance of not only the autonomy of ethics, which would be absorbed within the scientific conception of nature, but also of the very value of reason, and therefore of science itself.

- Aristotle, Ethica Nicomachea; De anima.
- Augustine, De Trinitate, BAug 15 and 16.
- D. Hume, A Treatise of Human Nature, Ed. L. A. Selby-Brigge, Oxford, 1888.
- E. Kant, Kritik der reinen Vernunft, AA 3, 522–38; Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, AA 5.
- S. Peirce, Collected Papers 5, Ed. C. Hartshorne, P. Weiss, A. W. Burks, Cambridge, Mass., 1931–58.
- Plato, Protagoras, Phaedo, Respublica.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 94; Ia IIae, q. 47–50.
- ♦ É. Gilson (1948), Le thomisme: Introduction à la philosophie de saint Thomas d'Aquin, Paris.
- R. A. Gauthier, J. Y. Jolif (1970), L'Éthique à Nicomaque: Introduction, traduction et commentaire, Louvain-Paris.
- J. Harrison (1976), Hume's Moral Epistemology, Oxford.
- O. O'Donovan (1980), The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine, New Haven.
- A. W. Price (1995), Mental Conflict, London.
- J. E. Hare (1996), The Moral Gap: Kantian Ethics, Human Limits and God's Assistance, Oxford.

JOHN E. HARE

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Authority; Platonism, Christian; Sciences of Nature

Ethics, Medical

Jesus* was a healer, and in his healing miracles* the kingdom* of God already made its presence felt (e.g., Lk 11:20). Concern with the sick was therefore one of the traits of Christianity from the beginning.

a) Miracles, Magic, and Medicine. Against the cults* that practiced thaumaturgy, such as those of Asclepius or Serapis, the church* always insisted that the God* who healed was the God of Creation* and Covenant*, and that Jesus was the mediator of God's healing power. The confidence that God would act miraculously to heal was sometimes guarded: miracles are mentioned infrequently in the literature of the second and third centuries. In the fourth century, however, especially in the hagiographic literature, there were frequent reports of miracles (Marty and Vaux 1982). The cult of saints and relics*, and associated miracles, was important in the conversion* of western Europe (Numbers and Amundsen 1986), but it was also influenced by pre-Christian practices, so that it sometimes became difficult to distinguish miracle from magic.

Magical practices had been popular in late antiquity and had often been assimilated into healing communities. Religious figures, including Christ, are invoked in the magical papyruses (Kee 1986). Generally, however, the church, like Augustine*, associated magic with the "deceitful rites of demons" and rejected it as a reliance upon "incantations and charms" rather than upon God, even when the name of Jesus was invoked (City of God 10. 9, BAUG 34). Voices within the medieval church were regularly raised against the mingling of pagan magical practices with the veneration of saints (Numbers and Amundsen 1986).

Christianity could, however, accommodate Greek medicine without surrendering the conviction that all healing comes from God. Most Christians followed the advice of Jesus ben Sirach, who regarded physicians and their medicines as instruments of God (Ecc 38:1–14). There were some who regarded the use of medicine as faithlessness (e.g., Tatian, Ad Graecos 18, PTS, 1995). Most, however, commended the use of medicine (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 6, 17, PG 9, 379 C-394), while insisting that healing comes from God and must serve God's cause. The Reformers repudiated the popular and magical aspect of the cult of the saints (Thomas 1971). Their suspicion of any magical manipulation of a sovereign God, and their conviction that nature, no less than miracle, comes to us from God, helped secure the primacy of medicine.

b) Christian Medical Ethics. The church's acceptance of medicine did not mean that anything and everything medical was approved. When the church called Jesus "the great physician" (Temkin 1991), it honored physicians, especially those of the school of Hippocrates (c. 460 B.C.–c. 377 B.C.), commending their compassion and their commitment to the patient's good, but it also provided a model for medicine and set it in the context of the history of salvation*. Health thus became part of a larger good* and sickness part of a larger evil, the disorder introduced by sin* (see. e.g., example, City of God 14, 3; 22, 22, BAUG 35 and 37). Although physical affliction was an evil, it might, by the grace* of God, remind people of their finitude, their dependence, their sinfulness, and the disorder that characterized a person's relations with his or her body, with one another, and with God. To care for the sick was a reflection of God's care for sinners, and to heal the sick was a sign of God's triumph over sin. Both sickness and health served God. In short, health was not the sovereign good for Christians, who had to "take great care to employ this medical art... as redounding to the glory of God" (Basil*, Rules 55, PG 31, 1043 C–1052). This did not require Christians to undertake a complete rethinking of the basis of the practice of physicians, and they could therefore adopt and adapt the medical ethics epitomized by the Hippocratic Oath. The ascendancy of the oath itself was probably a result of the rise of Christianity (Edelstein 1943). There is a 10th-century version of the oath that is evidence for this adaptation. It begins not by invoking Apollo or Asclepius, but with a doxology, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." It omits the filial obligations of pupil to teacher; instead, there is a commitment to teach the art "willingly and without an indenture." There are, however, many provisions that stand in continuity with the original oath: fidelity to the sick, and prohibitions of euthanasia, abortion*, and sexual relationships with patients or members of their households.

This version also affirms the obligation of medical confidentiality. Patients, like penitents, were often required to reveal what they might prefer to keep secret, and the physician, like the priest, was forbidden to use such revelations for any other purpose than professional. Jerome (c. 342–420) notes the analogy in a letter in which he instructs a priest that it is his duty to visit the sick and commends the behavior of the Hippocratic physician who respects the intimacy of the households and the secrets of the sick (Ep. 52, 15, CSEL 54). The confidentiality of the confessional reinforced confidentiality in medical practice, but also helped identify its limits. Most medieval theologians agreed that secrets could be revealed when they involved serious threats to the public good or to innocent third parties; for example, in the case of a patient suffering from venereal disease who does not intend to disclose this fact to a potential partner (but only the person threatened should be warned, and one should not reveal more than necessary to prevent harm; Regan 1943).

One modification to the Hippocratic tradition was a greater concern about truth-telling. Some in the early church supported the “therapeutic lie” (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 7, 8, PG 9, 471–74). Augustine, however, rigorously rejected the lie told in order to help or spare the patient (Against Lying 18, 36, BAug 2). “The most revolutionary change,” however, was the preferential position granted to the sick (Sigerist 1943). The sick were seen as the very image of the Lord and caring for them reflected how one cared for Christ. Matthew 21:31–45 is cited in the instruction of the Rule of St. Benedict to care for the sick as if it were Christ himself whom one served (36, SC 182), and echoed in the vow of the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem to “serve our lords the sick” (Amundsen 1995).

Care for the sick also required competence and diligence. The penitential literature prompted by the decree of Lateran* IV (1215) imposed an annual confession, and physicians were expected to confess incompetence and negligence (Amundsen 1982). Both the lack of prudence* and excessive prudence were regarded as sins if it harmed patients or was useless. Exposing a patient, especially a poor one, to unnecessary risk for the sake of an experiment was also a sin. Care for the sick could not be reduced to medical care. Lateran IV also decreed that “physicians of the body [must] admonish the sick to call the physicians of the soul” (COD 245, §22). Because life and health are not the greatest goods, the means to preserve them must not violate the greater good. Physicians were forbidden to advise a patient to have recourse to “sinful means” to recover health (ibid.). Such “sinful means” included fornication, masturbation, magic, and breaking the church’s fasts.

By means of the requirement of confession and the penitential literature that guided it, the post-Tridentine Catholic Church exercised a remarkable control over every part of life, including medicine. Within the Protestant* tradition, medicine was still considered a vocation oriented to the service of God, but reflection about medical ethics was frequently marked by a suspicion of casuistry* and an emphasis on the liberty* of physician and patient.

c) Caring for the Poor. If one considers that Jesus was also a preacher of “good news to the poor” (Lk 4:18), one will understand why the clergy frequently took the lead in providing medical assistance for the sick and poor. From the early Middle Ages to the modern era, clergy members (Catholic, Orthodox, or Protestant) thus devoted themselves to caring for the sick poor. The tradition was discouraged, but not completely ended, both by the development of guilds and licensure in the late Middle Ages, and by suspicion within the church that some clergy were practicing medicine “for the sake of temporal gain” and “neglecting the care of souls” (Lateran II, COD 198, §9). Concern for the sick poor prompted the publication of medical texts such as John XXI’s Thesaurus pauperum in the 13th century, a list of simple herbal remedies available to the poor, or John Wesley’s Primitive Physick (1747), and also of treatises exhorting physicians to care for rich and poor alike (Marty and Vaux 1982).

The hospital has its origin in this same concern. In 372, Basil of Caesarea founded a vast xenodokheion, or hospice, to care for the sick poor, with separate buildings for contagious and noncontagious diseases, and a staff that included physicians. It quickly became the prototype for many other such institutions. The early hospitals were funded by bishops* themselves, but soon bishops raised funds by calling upon various benefactors. In the 11th century, the Pantokrator hospital in Constantinople had 17 physicians, 34 nurses, and 6 pharmacists; it served patients in five specialized wards, and also treated outpatients. Hospitals developed more slowly in the West, but followed the same pattern.

d) Retrieval of Medical Ethics. When, in the middle of the 20th century, hospitals became showcases for medical technology and patient care became increasingly “medicalized,” theologians retrieved important elements of this tradition and thus played a major role in the emergence of modern medical ethics. They opposed extravagant idolatry* of health and the idea that one could expect everything from medicine. Against reducing patients to their pathologies, they stressed the professional commitment of dedication to patients

(and research subjects) as persons, and underscored consent as a fundamental component of this fidelity (Ramsey, The Patient as Person, New Haven, Conn., 1970). Against reducing people to their capacities for action, they insisted on corporeal existence (ibid.). They also reiterated the importance of concern for the poor in debates about access to health care.

Advances in medical science and technology have prompted a series of dramatic questions. Experimentation on human subjects, transplantation and the definition of death*, the allocation of scarce medical resources (e.g., dialysis), prenatal diagnosis, genetic counseling, reproductive technologies, gametes donations: such questions are not just scientific but also moral. Efforts to answer such questions necessarily invoke value judgments about the ends to be sought with the powers that medicine gives, about the moral appropriateness of certain means, and about how to respect the human being on whom they work. Thus, the new questions lead quickly to some very old questions about life, death, suffering, freedom, and embodiment, to which the Christian tradition should offer its own elements of response.

- Hippocrates, Serment, J. Jouanna (Ed.), in Storia e ecdotica dei testi medici greci, Ed. A. Garzia, Naples, 1996, 269–70.
- ◆ W.H.S. Jones (1924), The Doctor's Oath: An Essay in the History of Medicine, Cambridge.
- L. Edelstein (1943), "The Hippocratic Oath: Text, Translation and Interpretation," Bulletin of the History of Medicine, suppl. 5, vol. 1, 1–64.
- R.E. Regan (1943), Professional Secrecy in the Light of Moral Principles, Washington, D.C.
- H. Sigerist (1943), Civilization and Disease, Ithaca, N.Y.
- L. Edelstein (1967), "The Relation of Ancient Philosophy to Medicine," in O. Temkin and C.L. Temkin (Ed.), Ancient Medicine: Selected Papers of Ludwig Edelstein, Baltimore, 349–66.

- K. Thomas (1971), Religion and the Decline of Magic, New York.
- H. Jonas (1974), Philosophical Essays, Chicago, essays 1–7.
- C. Bruaire (1978), Une éthique pour la médecine, Paris.
- D.W. Amundsen (1982), "Casuistry and Professional Obligations: The Regulations of Physicians by the Court of Conscience in the Late Middle Ages," in Transactions and Studies of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia 3, 22–39, 93–112.
- M.E. Marty, K.L. Vaux (1982), Health/Medicine and the Faith Traditions, Philadelphia.
- H. Jonas (1984), "Technique, morale et génie génétique," Com(F) IX/6, 46–65.
- H. Jonas (1985), Technik, Medizin und Ethik, Frankfurt.
- T.S. Miller (1985), The Birth of the Hospital in the Byzantine Empire, Baltimore.
- H.C. Kee (1986), Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Time, Cambridge.
- R.L. Numbers, D.W. Amundsen (Ed.) (1986), Caring and Curing: Health and Medicine in the Western Religious Traditions, New York.
- O. Temkin (1991), Hippocrates in a World of Pagans and Christians, Baltimore.
- J. Jouanna (1992), Hippocrate, Paris.
- M. Grmek (Ed.) (1993), Histoire de la pensée médicale en Occident, Antiquité et Moyen Age, vol. I, Paris (bibl.).
- Coll. (1994), Est-il indigne de mourir? Autour de Paul Ramsey, Éthique 11.
- D.W. Amundsen (1995), "History of Medical Ethics: Europe: Ancient and Medieval," in Encyclopedia of Bioethics, Rev. Ed., New York, 1509–37.
- J.-C. Sournia (1996), "Médicale (éthique)," DEPhM, 947–52.

Journals

- Hastings Center Report*, New York, 1971–.
- Journal of Medical Ethics*, London, 1975–.
- Journal of Medicine and Philosophy*, Dordrecht, 1976–.
- Ethik in der Medizin*, Heidelberg, 1989–.
- Éthique*, Paris, 1991–96.

ALLEN VERHEY

See also Death; Ethics; Resurrection of the Dead; Soul-Heart-Body

Ethics, Sexual

Augustine* was not the first Christian theologian to concern himself with sexual ethics, but he is the key figure in fixing and systematizing the main lines of the pattern of Western Christian teaching on this subject: the commendation of marriage* and celibacy as complementary vocations, and the requirement of chastity for all. Augustine's achievement lies in his attempt to understand the meaning and place of sexuality, in faithfulness to the teaching of the Bible* and within the history* of creation*, reconciliation, and redemption. All Christian thought in this area stands, whether consciously or unconsciously, in relation to Augustine, examining a single element in his analysis, perhaps shifting the emphasis between the elements, or, in more recent times, rejecting that analysis altogether.

a) The Bible and the Early Church Fathers. The New Testament gives an account of sexual sins* that differs very little from that of the Old Testament. Thus, in continuity with the latter (See Lv 18–20), Paul includes in his list of those who will not inherit the kingdom* of God (1 Cor 6:9), pornoi (the sexually immoral or fornicators), moikhoi (adulterers), malakoi (effeminate), and arsenokoitai (sodomites). The New Testament's regard for marriage also suggests continuity with Judaism*, but this is crucially qualified by a recognition of a vocation to celibacy (e.g., Mt 19:12). It was this qualification that was to cause the immediate divergence between the two traditions*. In the early patristic period, the ascetic movement commended celibacy, and Encratism, associated especially with Tatian (second century), even made celibacy into a requirement by denying baptism* to the married. Despite the condemnation of this movement, the treatment of marriage among its opponents (such as Tertullian* and Clement of Alexandria* [c. 150–215]) was significantly influenced by it. If marriage is accepted, it is placed in a hierarchy that has virginity at its summit. Moreover, continence is desirable after the childbearing years, and second marriages for those who have been widowed are suspect. In short, it is desirable that sexual activity should be very limited.

b) Augustine. There are three important strands of argument in Augustine's thought.

First, Augustine takes up a position against the disparagement of marriage by the Manicheans*, but also by those, such as Tertullian and more especially Jerome (c. 342–420), who were so vigorous in their espousal of continence or celibacy as to forget that, as Augustine has it, virginity is simply the “better of two good things.” He insists that marriage is good*, following especially Mark 10:6–9 and an increasingly literal reading of Genesis. Sexual union between man and woman* is natural, as presupposed in their very creation in sexual differentiation. Here, Augustine differs from Gregory* of Nyssa (De opificio mundi, SC 6), who taught that sex is an activity made possible after the Fall, by a divine dispensation intended to moderate the bitterness of death*. Among the goods of marriage are not only progeny, but also fidelity and, according to Ephesians 5:32, the sacrament* or sign of indissolubility, whereby it is a figure of the union between Christ* and the church*. These arguments add something to those of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 3, PG 8), who had answered an extreme asceticism by presenting marriage as preeminently a collaboration with the work of the Creator: Augustine finds other goods in marriage besides procreation*. This implicitly involves an account of sexual sin: all sexual relations that do not take this form and serve these ends are held to be contrary to reason* and sinful.

Second, if human sexuality belongs to the created order, it is not to be supposed, with Pelagianism*, that it lies outside the consequences of the Fall. In his controversy with Julian of Eclanum (c. 386–454) in particular, Augustine maintains that even intercourse for the sake of procreation—the only use of marriage that is not a sin, although intercourse for other reasons is merely venial—is still touched by concupiscence, that division of the self against the self, or flesh* against the spirit, that is, since the Fall, “both a consequence and a cause of sin” (Bonner 1986), and is here expressed in disorderly desire. Intercourse for the sake of offspring makes good use of concupiscence, but, before the Fall, Adam* and Eve engaged in sexual intercourse at the bidding of their wills alone, untouched by the disorderly lust that now animates and afflicts even marital union, and renders sexuality a force for unreason, distracting us from our pursuit of the summum bonum (highest Good).

Third—and here Augustine owes much to Paul—if marriage is good, virginity is nonetheless to be preferred, not as a recapturing of a prefallen condition, but as founded upon a hope* for the coming kingdom, the service of which, since the birth of Christ, no longer requires procreation. Celibacy witnesses that marriage, if good, is a good of creation that will yet be surpassed, as too does the qualified permission of remarriage.

c) Monastic Tradition and Eastern Christianity. Augustine's contemporary Cassian thought of the problems of human sexuality quite differently. In a way that was influenced by the spiritual and monastic tradition of the Desert Fathers, especially Evagrius (346–99), he made the stilling of the passions* the aim of the spiritual life. By this means, temptation could be overcome and the ladder to perfection climbed; but the temptation to unchastity was but one among these temptations, with greed typically regarded as fundamental. This pattern of thought, also characteristic of later Eastern Orthodox theology (e.g., Maximus the Confessor), continued to conceive of the opposition between flesh and spirit as a conflict to be overcome, and did not follow Augustine in his radical understanding of the self as disabled and wholly incapable, of itself, of loving and serving God*. Nor did it follow Augustine in his tendency to treat sexuality, albeit while stressing the significance of concupiscence, as peculiarly revelatory of the human condition.

(d) Middle Ages and the Reformation. Theologians of the Middle Ages and the Reformation maintained the broad lines of the Augustinian picture, but, while they overcame some of the tension implicit in it, they lost something of its subtlety and balance.

Gregory* the Great, for example, seems to have converted Augustine's suspicion of pleasure into a straightforward condemnation. According to Augustine, marital intercourse for the sake of procreation is not in need of pardon, even though the concupiscence by which it is affected is a result and a cause of sin. For Gregory, however, sin is to be found in every act of intercourse by virtue of the very pleasure that it causes (Registri epistolarum, PL 77, 1, 193–1, 198). Certainly, such a notion may have been instilled by the penitentials (the guides for confessors current from the sixth to the 11th centuries), with their various prohibitions of all sexual intercourse during liturgically significant days and seasons.

It is often said that Thomas* Aquinas had a more favorable view of sexuality, holding that sexual pleasure is natural and that ordinate desire for this pleasure is permissible. It is true that he maintains that the act of intercourse is not sinful simply on account of the fact that it prevents contemplation* of God (ST Suppl., q. 41, a. 3, ad 3); but it does bar such contemplation, and it is “ordinate” when the pursuit of it is related to one of the matrimonial goods. Now, while these goods may require sexual relations and thereby render them licit, they do not, of course, include the sexual relationship as such. Indeed, Aquinas holds, following Augustine, that the marriage of Mary* and Joseph contained all three matrimonial goods, although there was no sexual intercourse between the spouses (IIIa, q. 29, a. 2). Thus for Aquinas, as for Augustine, the goods of fidelity and sacrament relate to the sexual act only negatively. There is fidelity where there is no adultery (although fidelity may oblige a partner to “render the [conjugal] debt” [1 Cor 7:3]), and the sacrament where there is no divorce. The celebration of the marriage of the Virgin, a theme that had reached its apogee in the writings of Hugh of Saint-Victor (Saint*-Victor, school of), symbolizes the unwillingness even of Aquinas to make sense of sexual relations as a marital good. Moreover, the very notion that sexual desire and pleasure are natural goods is called into question by his explanation, essentially Augustinian, of the need for the virgin birth in order to avoid the transmission of original sin* (IIIa, q. 28, a. 1). In the light of this teaching, it would not be unreasonable to suppose that the perfection of the marriage of Mary and Joseph obtains, not in spite of, but because of, their lack of sexual relations. In that case, Augustine's contention that marriage is the lesser of two goods seems threatened. This question was being raised even at the time when the notion that marriage is a sacrament conveying grace* was being formalized at the Councils of Florence and Trent*.

If the Reformers reacted against the Catholic suspicion of marriage, it can hardly be said that they made a major contribution to the resolution of the implicit problems in the shared Augustinian heritage. There is no doubt that Luther* and Calvin* inverted the ancient perspective and developed a certain suspicion (though not a repudiation) of celibacy. They taught that it could not be required even of ministers. It is a burden too great for almost all to bear, and, even if it is observed, it is not a means of winning divine favor. Neither Luther nor Calvin, however, engaged in a serious rethinking of Augustine's concept of concupiscence, which had unbalanced the medieval picture of sexuality. Furthermore, their praise of marriage and family* could become essentially worldly, or at least forgetful of the eschatological direction of human existence to which celibacy might be a witness. The Reformers' respect for marriage did, however, encourage the according of greater significance to sexual satisfaction within the marital relationship. The English Puritan W. Perkins (1558–1602), for example, counsels against marriages where there is an excessive disparity of age, for fear that this satisfaction may be lacking. Here we see the beginning of a revision of the Augustinian account of pleasure, which both Protestants and Catholics were to pursue up to our own time.

e) Modern Catholic and Protestant Ideas. For Augustine and Aquinas, procreation alone is a lawful purpose of marital intercourse, although intercourse for the sake of the quelling of concupiscence is merely a venial sin. Catholics have increasingly distanced themselves from these views and accepted that intercourse serves to nurture and demonstrate conjugal love. The encyclical Casti Connubii (1930) speaks of the “fostering of mutual love” as among the “secondary ends” of marriage, holding that procreation is the primary end to which the secondary ends are subordinate. Vatican* II, in Gaudium et Spes, does not refer to hierarchically ordered ends of marriage, but, noting that the love between husband and wife is “uniquely expressed and perfected through the marital act,” speaks of the unitive and procreative meanings that belong to sexual intercourse. This way of thought is taken up and confirmed by Paul VI in Humanae Vitae, by John Paul II in Familiaris Consortio, and by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in Donum Vitae. It has not led to radical changes in practice, and has indeed been the basis for the renewed condemnation of contraception, but it does represent a reconception of Augustine's “good of fidelity” in terms of loving union. This in turn allows an understanding of sexual intercourse and sexual pleasure not so much as warranted by, but as constitutive of, marriage.

A more thorough and theological reappraisal of the Augustinian pattern is contained in Barth's treatment of creation in volume III of Die Kirchliche Dogmatik. Understanding creation in the light of the Covenant* to which it is directed, it is necessary, so Barth argues, to understand human beings as beings in communion*, interdependent rather than independent. Thus, we may make sense of sexual differentiation, which is the focus of both the accounts of Creation in Genesis, as the creaturely counterpart to the determination of humankind for God that is known in Jesus Christ. Thus, if human beings are beings in communion, they are specifically and concretely man or woman, or, more accurately, man and woman. The command of God is that we should live out the differentiation and connection in which we are created, and which is ordered by, and attests to, the union of Christ and the Church.

Here, one is quite far removed from Augustine's conception, but not in the same way as in recent Catholic thought (e.g., Häring 1979) that rethinks the natural in personalist terms. That is, it finds the meaning of sexual relations, no longer solely in their generative role, but also in their unitive capacity. It is thereby able to consider sexual relations that were essentially questionable for Augustine, with his largely negative conception of the good of fidelity, as unproblematic. For Barth, however, the natural does not simply take on a new and personalist dimension, but is radically transformed by the insistence that the Covenant is the basis for creation, that is, by the idea that the natural or created good is inherently eschatologically ordered. According to Barth, the sacramentum of sexual relations is not added to them, but is their essence; it belongs to them not in the indissolubility of marriage alone, but in the incorporation of sexual relations within the community of the life of man and woman, a being in fellowship, or covenant, that witnesses to its prototype. In consequence, the question of the acceptance or refusal of procreation ceases to hold the central place that it has had in the definition of sexual sin both in the thought of Augustine and in recent Catholic pronouncements, although it is still important.

f) Contemporary Critiques. If there are obvious differences between Barth's interpretation of the Augustinian tradition and the interpretation in official Catholic teaching, it remains the case that there is agreement on the first element in Augustine's synthesis, namely, that the goodness of sexual relations is to be understood within the community of husband and wife. This element has been subject to criticism on two fronts in recent debate. Some who allow that sexual relations should occur within a covenantal relationship hold that such a relationship need not be founded on sexual differentiation: thus they challenge traditional thinking on homosexuality. Others maintain, often together with the first thesis, that sexual experience can be good even outside a covenantal relationship, thereby challenging the established teaching, which stems from the biblical treatment of sexual sins, and forbids, for example, fornication, adultery, prostitution, and masturbation.

The main contention of those (e.g., Bailey 1955) who regard homosexual practices as licit is that, in condemning them, the tradition is unaware of modern theories that hold that homosexuality is a deep-seated orientation of the personality, not a matter of choice. This knowledge, they think, places a hermeneutic question mark over the biblical texts that condemn homosexual relations (Lv 18:22 f., 20:13; Rom 1: 26 f.; 1 Cor 6:9 f.; 1 Tm 1: 8–11), and subverts the traditional distinction between natural and unnatural on which the condemnation is based. Whether this knowledge is as decisive as is supposed is open to question, but so too is its status as knowledge. Michel Foucault (1926–84) argued that homosexuality is an invention, by which he meant that the very experience of sexual desire in a particular form is historically or socially determined. Such a claim ought at least to remind us that the key Christian notion is created order, not natural order, and that knowledge of the former is by no means a matter of empirical observation. According to Barth, as already pointed out, knowledge of the creation is first of all knowledge in Jesus Christ. This knowledge shows us that we were created for covenant. In the light of this knowledge, the symbolic significance that the Old and New Testaments find in the bond between man and woman becomes comprehensible. The determination of the male to the female and of the female to the male is the creaturely counterpart to the determination of humankind for God. The question that therefore arises for those who attempt to justify homosexuality is this: On the basis of what anthropology, or what doctrine of creation, do they set aside sexual differentiation, and how does this setting aside relate to the biblical witness?

There is something ironic in the contention that sexual experience can be good even outside a covenantal relationship, for it threatens to introduce again, in a different form, the very fault that beset the Augustinian tradition: its inability to discern the human significance of sexual desire and pleasure. If this significance escaped Augustine, some of his modern critics seem to deal with the problem not by advancing beyond him, but by declaring the problem not to be a problem. Sexual desire and pleasure are not to be accommodated within any deep conception of human good or flourishing, but instead are to be treated simply as functions of bodies, as they are treated in “sex education,” consisting in the imparting of purely biological information, or in “sex therapy,” consisting in the teaching of techniques of gratification. As Augustine would have realized, this is to remove sexuality altogether from the history of salvation* in relation to which one must understand Christian sexual ethics.

- Augustine, Contra Faustum manichaeum, PL 42, 207–518; Contra Julianum, PL 44, 641–880; De bono conjugali, BAUG 2, 15–99; De bono viduitatis, BAUG 3, 229–305; De civitate Dei, BAUG 33–37; De conjugii adulterinis BAUG 2, 101–233; De Genesi ad litteram, BAUG 48–49; De nuptiis et concupiscentia, PL 44, 413–74; De sancta virginitate, BAUG 3, 103–227.
- K. Barth, KD III (Dogmatique), Geneva, 1960–65).
- J. Calvin, Inst., Ed. J. Benoît, Paris, 1957–63, IV, 12, 23–28.
- J. Cassien, Institutions, SC 109.
- Congrégation pour la doctrine de la foi, Donum Vitae, 1988, AAS 80, 70–102.
- Hugh of Saint-Victor, De B. Mariae Virginitate, PL 176, 857–76.
- Jean-Paul II, Familiaris Consortio, 1988, AAS 74, 81–191.
- Jerome, Adversus Rufinum, SC 303.
- M. Luther, Ein Sermon von dem ehelichen Stand, WA 2, 166–71; Vom ehelichen Leben, WA 10–2, 275–304; Von den Ehesachen, WA 30–3, 205–48.
- Paul VI, Humanae Vitae, 1968, AAS 60, 481–503.
- W. Perkins, Christian Oeconomie, Kingston, 1618.
- Pius XI, Casti Connubii, 1930, AAS 22, 539–92.

- Tertullian, Exhortation to Chastity, SC 319.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Suppl., q. 41–49, 63–65.
- Vatican II, GS.
- ♦ S. Bayley (1955), Homosexuality and the Western Christian Tradition, London.
- S. Bayley (1959), The Man-Woman Relation in Early Christian Thought, London.
- J.-D. Broudehoux (1970), Mariage et famille chez Clément d’Alexandrie, Paris.
- A. Chapelle (1971), Sexualité et sainteté, Brussels.
- P. Ramsey (1975), One Flesh: A Christian View of Sex Within, Outside and Before Marriage, Bramcote, Notts, U.K.
- M. Foucault (1976), La volonté de savoir, Paris.
- B. Häring (1979), Free and Faithful in Christ, vol. 2, New York, 493–538.
- E. Schmitt (1983), Le mariage chrétien dans l’œuvre de saint Augustin, Paris.
- M. Foucault (1984), Le souci de soi; (1984), L’usage des plaisirs, Paris.
- G. Bonner (1986), St. Augustine of Hippo: Life and Controversies, 2nd Ed., Norwich.
- P. Brown (1988), The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, London.
- P. Ramsey (1988), “Human Sexuality in the History of Redemption,” JRE 16, 56–86.
- A. Soble (1996), “Sexualité,” DEPhM, 1,387–91.

MICHAEL BANNER

See also Asceticism; Augustinianism; Manicheanism; Sin, Original; Virtues

Eucharist

A. Biblical Theology

The term Eucharist (thanksgiving) comes from Luke 22:19 and 1 Corinthians 11:24. “The Lord’s Supper” (1 Cor 11:20) and “breaking [sharing] of the bread” (Acts 2:42; see 20:7) refer to the Last Supper of Jesus* with his disciples before his death. It took place on the last evening (“no more”: Lk 22:18; see Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25), “when the hour came” (Lk 22:14–20), “the night when Jesus was betrayed” (1 Cor 11:23–27). According to John 13 the meal was also taken at night, but the eucharistic words are mentioned in the speech of John 6: 51–58.

1. Literary Forms and Origin

a) Two Traditions. Mark, Matthew, Luke, and 1 Corinthians place at the forefront a liturgical tradition*, with the text of the institution of the eucharistic Lord’s Supper. Jesus gives his body and his “blood of the Covenant*” to communicate his life. According to these texts, the form that Jesus gives to this supper is liturgical, in the sense that it is turned toward the future, the “memory of the future” in which there will be a communion* of life (particularly in 1 Cor). This liturgy* is structured along three axes: Jesus and God*, Jesus and the disciples, the orientation of the present toward the future.

The other tradition, mostly represented by John, is in a testamentary form, in the style of a farewell speech; the synoptic Gospels* (Luke in particular) also retain traces of this. This tradition keeps the memory of what Jesus accomplished by offering himself “for the multitude” (which is a better translation than “for many”). The Johannine milieu celebrate the Eucharist as well (6:51–58). But, in the course of a long farewell speech pronounced one day before Passover*, John 13 replaces the gestures and the words of the institution of the Lord's Supper with the institution of the washing of the feet.

These two traditions represent ways of reaching the Risen One and of sharing his life today (Léon-Dufour 1982).

b) Original Sites. The four texts with a liturgical priority do not have the same origin: 1 Corinthians is the oldest text mentioned (A.D. 55). Paul quotes from it and may have received it in Antioch around A.D. 40. The accounts in Paul and Luke have many points in common, body and Covenant instead of body and blood, the anamnesis formula ("in memory of me"), and a more Hellenistic vocabulary. This is the Antiochene tradition. Mark and Matthew, on the other hand, with the exact parallelism of words: "This is my body," "This is my blood," with their more Semitic language, with the formula "for the multitude," represent a Palestinian or a Marcan tradition originating perhaps in Caesarea, even in Jerusalem* (Mark). Matthew has some Syriac characteristics. The exact places of origin are, however, difficult to ascertain. Although older in its composition, the Antiochene formula is of a more recent tradition.

2. Was the Eucharist a Paschal Supper?

Mark 14:12, Matthew 26:17, and Luke 22:7 set the meal on the day (Mark, Matthew: "first day") of the unleavened bread (Dt 16:1–8: celebration of the unleavened bread), but Matthew omits Mark's and Luke's specificity about the day "when the paschal lamb was sacrificed." On the evening starting the 14th day of Nisan, all traces of leaven had to be taken out of the homes, and the paschal lamb* had to be sacrificed "between the two evenings" (at twilight). The supper took place, therefore, in a paschal atmosphere, without the absolute certainty that the ritual followed was exactly that of a paschal supper. It could well be that it took place a day before the Jewish Passover.

For the synoptic Gospels the date of the Lord's Supper is the Passover vigil, which is the beginning of the day of Easter. For John, on the contrary, Jesus dies at the moment when the lamb is sacrificed for the paschal supper. According to that account, therefore, the Last Supper could not have been a paschal meal. The thesis of A. Jaubert (1957) assumes that, since the Essenian solar calendar always places Passover on a Wednesday, Jesus may have followed that same calendar and may thus have had his paschal supper on the Tuesday evening; his crucifixion took place on Friday, which, according to John, was the official Jewish Passover eve that particular year.

All the accounts give the impression of a supper of the Old Covenant transformed into a supper of the New Covenant. It is the result of Jesus' initiative. It is Jesus' death and Resurrection* that bestow upon this supper all its meaning.

3. Analysis of the Traditions

a) Paul-Luke. (Antiochene liturgical tradition, with a testamentary vestige in Luke). Luke 22:15 ff. is the only tradition to recount and to rewrite the Lord's Supper as the Passover meal: "I have earnestly desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer. For I tell you I will not eat it until it is fulfilled in the kingdom of God." Luke 22:17 continues: "And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks he said, 'Take this, and divide it among yourselves.'" Jesus then passes around a cup, which represents a future meeting in the kingdom of God. First Corinthians, Mark, and Matthew have omitted this prophetic account.

Luke 22:19–20 offers a long recension, which appears in most of the manuscripts, and a short recension in the text that is known as the "Occidental" text. The latter omits the continuation after "this is my body." In the short text Luke does not have the cup of the Eucharist, but only the cup of the future meeting. The short text may correspond to the accounts that include only the sharing of the bread (Lk 24 and Acts) and it may perhaps date back to an old tradition with the cup coming before the bread, in the order followed by 1 Corinthians 10:16 ff.: "The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ*? The bread that we break, is it not a participation in the body of Christ*?"

Paul, in 1 Corinthians 11:24, and Luke use the expression "thanksgiving" (eukharistèsas), which is more Hellenistic than "blessing" (eulogèsas, more Semitic: Mark and Matthew). In 1 Corinthians 11:25, in the formula "in the same way also he took the cup, after supper," the adverb "in the same way" does not occupy the same place as in Luke 22:20. In the perspective suggested by Paul, the paschal meal, which has become the Lord's Supper, would be included within the two eucharistic rites (bread and cup), which would explain the formula used by Paul. Paul and Luke have in common: "for you." "This is my body which is (given: Luke) for you (Paul and Luke)." Finally, after the bread (as in Luke), and another time after the cup, Paul places the formula of anamnesis: "Do this... in remembrance of me." "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" ("my": 1 Corinthians; "of me": Luke) clearly takes up the formula of Mark and Matthew:

“This is my blood of the covenant.” In 1 Corinthians and Luke the parallelism body/blood is broken in favor of the parallelism body/New Covenant.”

The two traditions of Paul and of Luke present similarities. Luke, with: “Take” (Mark and Matthew) and “given to you” (Paul: “which is for you”) creates with the formula “this is my body” something other than an objective report: take is a word that inks and engages the person who speaks and gives with the person who listens and receives. Whoever eats the bread enters into a communion of life with Jesus. The tradition of Luke and that of Paul are marked by the theology* in which Jesus is the one who gives of and offers himself and who produces the New Covenant (See Jer 31:31 ff.).

b) Mark-Matthew (Palestinian Liturgical Tradition, with Some Testamentary Traces). The two texts are closely related. In Matthew Jesus gives the consecrated and broken bread only to the disciples. Mark 14:7 has already indicated that Jesus was eating with “the Twelve.” Matthew adds the word “eat” to the word “take” in Mark. There is something original in Matthew: the addition of the words “for the forgiveness of sins*” to the prayer of thanksgiving over the cup (Mt 26:28). Thus is evoked the Covenant that implies the forgiveness of sins. The word for, expressed by the preposition huper, “in favor and in place of” in Paul, Luke, and Mark (see Rom 5:1–10: “Christ died for”), is expressed with the weaker peri in Matthew 26:28.

The new Passover takes place within the framework of the old one. The phrase “as they were eating,” taken over from 26:21 by Matthew 26:26, indicates that the second part of the paschal meal is starting. Jesus then innovates: 1) With “This is my body;” the liturgy roots this element in the story of the suffering and death of Jesus. 2) The verb to be, used in Greek, is not expressed in the corresponding Aramaic sentence, which would be “This my body.” These words link together Christ to his disciples and engage him with them. 3) The disciples do not bring anything; rather, it is they who receive. The blood, always placed in relation with the Covenant, is shed for the multitude, and in this way is given as an offering/sacrifice by Christ, as a sign of Covenant and not as atonement. It seals the forgiveness expressed by “in forgiveness of sins.” The reaction of the Old Testament against the practices of neighboring religions had already been reflected in the growing spiritualization of sacrificial rites; what was becoming essential among the Israelites was the “sacrifice* of praise*” (See Léon-Dufour 1982). The emphasis placed on “blessing” or “thanksgiving” is a reminder that Christ constantly transports believers from death to life.

Thus, 1 Corinthians, Luke, Mark, and Matthew presuppose the liturgical existence of this supper of Communion, which takes place for the multitude. Nothing is said of its frequency or its rhythm. They do not specify who will be empowered to preside. All must drink from the cup. Even if “new” does not appear in front of “covenant” in Mark and Matthew, that is indeed what the reference to covenant actually means, a meaning explicitly stated in 1 Corinthians and Luke (sacrament*).

4. Conclusion

Taking inspiration from the essay of X. Léon-Dufour (1982), which is briefer (our additions or changes are in italics) in order to get to the words spoken by Jesus himself, we obtain:

At the time of Passover, when evening came, Jesus had a last supper with his disciples. When the main course started, Jesus took some bread, and, having blessed it, he broke it, gave it to the disciples and said: “Take this and eat it, this is my body given for you. Do this in memory of me.” Moreover he took the cup at the end of the supper (after the supper), he offered thanks, gave the cup to the disciples and said to them: “Drink some, all of you. This is the cup of the New Covenant, it is my blood spilled (shed for the multitude) for you. Do this in memory of me.” And he told them: “I shall never drink from the fruit of the vine, not until the day when I can drink it, new, in the kingdom (realm) of God.”

It is to be noted that “last supper” should be qualified as “before his death,” because there had been other suppers taken with the Risen One. Thus, in the speech of Acts 10:39 ff., Peter* says: “we who ate and drank with him after his resurrection from among the dead.” In addition, mention must be made of the sharing of the bread with the disciples he met on the road to Emmaus (Lk 24:30 f.) and the meal that was shared with seven disciples in John 21:13.

The words spoken over the bread and the cup of the Covenant accompany two movements with which they are indissolubly connected. Jesus gives the bread: he thus shows “that he gives himself for” the recipient. He passes the cup around: in this way he shows that he is shedding his blood. All the dynamism of the life of Christ is represented and communicated by the eucharistic supper (Dussaut 1972).

- F.-J. Leenhardt (1955), “Ceci est mon corps”: Explication de ces paroles de Jésus-Christ, Cth 37.
- A. Jaubert (1957), La date de la Cène: Calendrier biblique et liturgie chrétienne, Paris.
- R. Le Déaut (1963), La Nuit pascale: Essai sur la signification de la Pâque juive à partir du Targum d’Exode XII 42, AnBib 22.
- J. Coppens (1964), “L’Eucharistie, sacrement et sacrifice de la

- Nouvelle Alliance, fondement de l'Église," in (coll.) Aux origines de l'Église, RechBib. VII, 125–58.
- J.-J. von Allmen (1966), Essai sur le repas du Seigneur, Cth 55.
- J. Jeremias (1967), Die Abendmahlsworte Jesu, 4th Ed., Göttingen.
- L. Dussaut (1972), L'Eucharistie, Pâques de toute la vie, LeDiv 74.
- Coll. (1982), La Pâque du Christ, mystère du salut: Mélanges offerts au Père Durrwell, LeDiv 112.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1982), Le partage du pain eucharistique selon le NT, Paris.

- S. Légasse (1994), "Jours et Heures," in Le procès de Jésus, l'histoire, LeDiv 56, 113–20.
- A. Marx (1994), Les offrandes végétales dans l'Ancien Testament: Du tribut d'hommage au repas eschatologique, Leyden.

MAURICE CARREZ

See also Blessing; Communion; Cult; Expiation; Jesus, Historical; Liturgy; Passover; Passion; Sacrifice; Soul-Heart-Body

B. Historical Theology

Concept: Eucharistia. The word is attested since the end of the apostolic age, or slightly after, by the Didache (9, 1 . 5), by the epistles of Ignatius of Antioch (Sm. 7, 1; 8, 1; Eph. 13, 1; Philad. 4, 1) and by Justin (I Apol. 65–66). It indicates at the same time the eucharistic action consisting of thanksgiving for bread and wine, as well as that bread and that wine once they have been consecrated (an act expressed by the Greek verb eucharistein, which is transitive in Christian Greek). We should note two points:

a) The Christian Eucharist operates at a remove from the Jewish category of blessing* (berakah); post-Christian Judaism* developed a lesser insistence on thanksgiving, whereas Christians fairly early placed Christian Eucharist and Jewish blessing in opposition. Thus in the Hippolytan treatise Refutation of All Heresies: "the Jews have not honored the Father*, but they have not practiced thanksgiving, because they have not recognized the Son." To this we should add that eucharistein is close to anapherein, "to offer," which in the sixth century would lead to the giving of the name of anaphoras to the Greek eucharistic prayers.

b) In Latin the eucharistic action was to be called gratiarum actio, whereas the Greek term eucharistia would be retained in order to designate the consecrated bread and wine. The connection between eucharistia and thanksgiving would soon be forgotten; and after Isidore of Seville, all the Latin Middle Ages would believe that eucharistia meant "good grace," bona gratia. On the other hand, the Latin Middle Ages gave the eucharistic action the name of missa, "mass," which appeared around the fifth or sixth century, at a time when this term had gone from its original meaning of "sending" to mean "part of the liturgical action." In reaction against any sacrificial interpretation of the missa, and eager to stick to the New Testament, the Reformers of the 16th century borrowed from Paul the name supper to replace that of mass; and for the Book of Common Prayer of the Anglican liturgy, Cranmer adopted the term Holy Communion.

1. The Eucharist and Its Theology in Early Christianity

a) Second to Fourth Centuries. The fundamental elements of the eucharistic celebration, which brought together, mainly on Sunday*, the bishop* and the ecclesial community, started to appear in the second century. The Eucharist, henceforth separated from the fraternal meal to which the name of agape* has been given, was preceded by a liturgy* of the word (which had possibly been taken over from Jewish synagogal worship). The baptized who were present, except for the penitents, received Holy Communion* every Sunday, and Communion was also taken to the sick who could not attend. The corpus of the New Testament texts was formed in the second century; similarly, during the same period or a little later, a corpus of sacramental practices may have gradually been formed, through processes of exchange and accumulation. This is attested by the collection bearing the name of Apostolic Tradition; it is attributed by some historians to Hippolytus, a Roman priest* of the first third of the third century, though the attribution and the date are challenged by others. It is a collection that presents itself as being in the tradition* descending from the apostles*.

According to the earliest documents that mention it, the eucharistic prayer* neither comes as a text transmitted word by word, nor is it endowed with a uniform structure; it comes, on the contrary, in a relative diversity of structures. The eucharistic prayer of the Apostolic Tradition, whose text forms a unit in itself, first gives thanks to God the Father for the salvation he has brought about in history* and completed in the redeeming work of Christ*. This thanksgiving leads to the account of the Last Supper and to the words of Christ over the bread and the wine. His words are followed by a paragraph that at once expresses that we remember him for his death* and for his Resurrection*, and that we offer the Father the consecrated bread and wine. Then there is a request for the sending of the Holy* Spirit on the offering and on the communicants (epiclesis*) and glory is rendered. That prayer does not include either the Sanctus (introduced into the eucharistic prayer around the same period, in Egypt or in Syria), or other secondary developments.

In Syria there is another eucharistic prayer, called the anaphora of Addeus and Maris. These were founders of the church* of Edessa. The prayer is close to that of the Apostolic Tradition as far as the period is concerned. But it differs from it in several respects, mainly because it appears to be made up of several juxtaposed prayers (a fact that brings it closer to the Jewish prayer patterns) and because it does not quote specifically the words of Christ during the Last Supper, although it does refer to them in the passage mentioning his death and Resurrection. This second point gave rise to some questioning among specialists: was the text in the same state before the seventh century? Is there a reason to consider this as being perhaps a primitive state of the eucharistic prayer, what E. Mazza has called the “preanaphora”? Is it possible to think that the words of Christ had their place at another moment of the celebration? Or, in an opposite direction, should we not grant a greater importance to the fact—as F. Hamm has shown in several examples—that the words of the Eucharist, in the course of the early centuries, were principally transmitted orally?

In its principal but not exclusive form, the eucharistic celebration is a celebration presided over by the bishop, surrounded, depending on the event, by priests and deacons*, and gathering together a whole Christian community. As far as we know about ancient practices, the priests showed, with a gesture, that they shared in what the bishop was doing, and they occupied their own distinct place in the assembly. It is not until the seventh or eighth century that, in Rome*, we see the priests (Ordo Romanus III) saying the eucharistic prayer with the pope*: this is a practice of which no similar example is known in the Eastern liturgies until after the Middle Ages, even for the words of Christ. Modern Christians speak here of “concelebration,” while wondering retrospectively about the exact significance of the concelebrants’ act. On the other hand, until the Middle Ages the church in Rome practiced the rite of the “ferment:” a consecrated eucharistic element was brought from the papal celebration to the other celebrations in town, in order to be mixed with the consecrated breads, as a sign of ecclesial communion, before the distribution of these breads to the faithful.

In the fourth century, at the very latest, the rule was established not to have either food or drink before Communion, the only exceptions being the Communion of Maundy Thursday and generally in the case of the dying. This rule has been considerably relaxed in the 20th century by the Catholic Church.

b) Principal Eucharistic Prayers of the Fourth Century and Their Catecheses. Owing to their rarity, the eucharistic prayers of the first three centuries constitute documents of exceptional historical importance. On the other hand, our knowledge of the fourth and fifth centuries is well documented, so much so that it is not possible to give a complete account here. It is therefore necessary to limit ourselves only to some of the major examples of Christian eucharistic practice and theology*: the Roman eucharistic prayer (which the manuscripts call the “canon of the Mass”), commented in Milan by Ambrose*; and the two eucharistic prayers of Basil* and John Chrysostom*, both of whom can now be safely considered to have rewritten or completed the eucharistic prayers of their respective churches—Caesarea of Cappadocia (Basil) and Antioch (Chrysostom). We could add to this the catecheses* on Christian initiation* (including therefore on the eucharistic action) of Chrysostom, those of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and those of the bishop of Jerusalem*, Cyril, or of his successor, John. In spite of their importance, however, these catecheses would not be sufficient, on their own, to allow us to reconstitute the text of the corresponding eucharistic prayers: the catecheses of Ambrose, for instance (namely the De Sacramentis for which we have the listeners’ notes and the De Mysteriis, the text of which Ambrose himself reworked), interpret in a personal manner the text of the Roman prayer.

At that time the Greek and Latin eucharistic prayers were in agreement on three points: 1) A central place is given to the account of the institution; 2) immediately after this account a paragraph says that the paschal mystery* is being remembered (at least the death and the Resurrection of Christ)—modern liturgists mention anamnesis here (the Greek word corresponding to memory); and 3) mention is made of an offering, at least in the anamnesis. On other points, however, important differences of emphasis can be noted among the local eucharistic traditions: 1) The Antiochene tradition gives ample thanksgiving for the unfolding of the story of salvation, whereas the Roman canon concentrates its attention on the Eucharist considered as sacrifice*. 2) The eschatological perspective of the Eucharist (already present in Ignatius of Antioch, Éph. 20, 2, the idea that the Eucharist is “remedy of immortality,” pharmakon athanasias) is expressed in different ways: in Antioch by means of an anamnesis that mentions simultaneously the death and the Resurrection of Christ, and evokes also his Parousia*; in Rome in the paragraph of the canon regarding the celestial altar (Supplices), as well as in the variable prayers of the Mass. 3) Finally, starting with Ambrose, Christ’s own words are brought into greater relief in the eucharistic prayer: it is not only the priest who pronounces them, but Christ himself, ipse clamat (De Mysteriis, 54); these words sanctify or consecrate the bread and the wine by changing them into the body and the blood of Christ. At Antioch the eucharistic prayer of John Chrysostom, who was an approximate contemporary of Ambrose, says in the very text of its epiclesis that the bread and the wine have been changed.

Among the Fathers of the Church it is Augustine* who attributes the greatest importance to the effects of the Eucharist on the Church, the mystical body of Christ. This doctrinal theme, brilliantly studied by H. de Lubac* (1944), is certainly present in the whole of Christian tradition, and in the thinking of medieval theologians, but it does not occupy much space in liturgical prayers. It would be a mistake, however, to think that the manner in which Augustine perceives the effects of the Eucharist is remote from the eschatological perspective to which other Fathers, for example Theodore of Mopsuestia, attach so much importance.

2. The Eucharist in Medieval Christianity

a) Medieval Eucharistic Practice. The eucharistic celebration (the Divine Liturgy for the Greeks, the Mass for the Latins) did not experience a change of structure in the Middle Ages. In the West, however, as had been the case earlier in the East, the eucharistic prayer came to be uttered in a whisper; and during those centuries when the celebration of the priest in private became more frequent, the ordo missae was complemented by a body of private prayers, particularly for use at the moment of the offertory. From the time of the Carolingian liturgist Amalaire, and under the influence of Greek liturgists, the details of the Latin Mass started to be interpreted symbolically. This symbolic interpretation referred to the different moments in the life of Christ. It lasted, in the West, until after the Middle Ages; and large parts of this interpretation have survived up to the present time in the Byzantine liturgy.

Just as the actual forms of eucharistic celebration changed in the Middle Ages, so did the theology associated with it. It was during the Carolingian era, or shortly after, that unleavened bread was adopted in the West for the Eucharist, and that the priest started giving Communion in the mouth. The Communion of the faithful, as far as historians are able to assess, seems to have become clearly less frequent than attendance at Mass, which of course affected the manner in which the Eucharist was understood. In the West at least, sacramental confession became for centuries the compulsory prerequisite for Communion, which appeared to sanction a high level of Christian life. From the practices of the previous period the Greeks decided to retain young children’s access to Communion of bread as well as Communion of the chalice; but in the West, Communion of the chalice and Communion of young children gradually fell into disuse around the 12th century. At that time attention to the apostle Paul’s recommendation that one ought to test oneself before taking Communion (1 Cor 11:28–31) assumed so much importance in Christian consciousness that this brought about the renunciation of Communion for children and the insistence on confession prior to Communion. It was in that perspective that canon 21 of Lateran* IV (DS 812) decided what the minimal rule should be for the practice, starting at the age of moral discernment, of annual confession and the Easter Communion; in the list of church commandments that was formulated at the end of the Middle Ages, they came to be called the third (the confession) and the fourth (the Easter Communion). The general rarity of Communion also explains the insistence on a duty to take Communion at the moment of dying, as a viaticum (a term meaning “money for a journey”) to assist one’s passage to the kingdom*. Moreover, the Council of Constance* found that the custom of taking Communion only with bread was legitimate (DS 1198–1200).

Despite the infrequency of Communions, or perhaps in a certain way as a compensation for it, as well as a reaction against the heresy of Berengarius of Tours (see b below), and under the effect of a growing devotion to the humanity of Christ, the devotion to the real presence underwent an important development in several ways: at the moment of the elevation during the Mass, and in a cult of the Eucharist outside the mass, crowned by the celebration of the feast of Corpus Christi. The elevation of the host (from around the tenth century, “host” was the name given to the bread meant for the Eucharist), then that of the chalice, was introduced. These elevations took place immediately after the words of consecration and were introduced at request of the faithful, so that although they were behind the priest, they might have the possibility of seeing and adoring the eucharistic elements. This practice started at the beginning of the 13th century, first in Paris but spreading quickly from there. The feast of Corpus Christi owed its institution in part to the fact that the liturgy of Maundy Thursday gave more attention to the betrayal of Jesus* by Judas than to the institution of the Eucharist, and also partly to the devotion of the Christian women of the region of Liège in the second quarter of the 13th century (Julienne du Mont-Cornillon). In 1264 Pope Urban IV, who had been a priest in Liège, instituted (DS 646–847) the celebration of Corpus Christi for all the Latin Church, with an office composed by Thomas* Aquinas. This feast, with its eucharistic procession, grew in importance in the period before the Protestant Reformation, and continued to do so after it; similarly for the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament outside the Mass.

The Carolingian era saw the development in the West of masses that were called “private” (the attendance was reduced to one server or a small number of persons). Their celebration was motivated either by the personal desire of the priest to offer the Eucharist, or by some particular intention; this meant that the mass was not offered, as it is on Sunday, by the ecclesial assembly itself, and for its own self, but specifically for a living or a deceased person. The later centuries of the Middle Ages in particular saw the increase of what were called mass foundations, and numerous priests were entrusted with the duty of servicing them.

b) Medieval Eucharistic Theology. In a cultural situation that was different from that of the patristic era, the eucharistic theology of Augustine ran the risk of being misunderstood and of appearing to contradict the theology of Ambrose, which corresponded largely to the liturgy and to the common way of practicing piety. That threat was realized in the ninth century, in the land of the Franks, in an initial controversy that pitted Paschasius Radbert, abbot of Corbie, against the Augustinian monk Ratramnus. In the 11th century the great debate aroused by the dialectician Berengarius of Tours, who placed symbolical and realistic interpretation in opposition to one another instead of synthesizing them, had the effect (Lubac 1944) of forcing theology to take sides in favor of realism only (as in the profession of faith* imposed upon Berengarius in 1059 [DS 690]), and it provoked a strong reaction among adherents to eucharistic piety. But it must also be said that the Augustinian formulations of the sacramentum assembled by Berengarius during this debate greatly contributed to the research on the concept of sacrament* conducted by the generations of theologians that followed, and they therefore helped to shed light on the sacramental septenary.

The second profession of faith imposed on Berengarius in 1079 (DS 700) holds that through the consecration, the bread and wine are “substantially changed” into the body and blood of Christ. Faith in the eucharistic change is already present within the early church; and as far as the category of the “substantial” is concerned, it has here a prephilosophical meaning, which was also to be true of the notion of “transubstantiation” when it made its appearance in the middle of the 12th century, and it seems not to have been different when it was taken up again (1215) in the profession of faith of Lateran IV (DS 802). The term transubstantiation did not at that time have the importance that would be attributed to it during the denominational debate of the 16th century. Thomas Aquinas prefers to use rather the term conversion. Nevertheless, Aristotle’s Metaphysics, which became known to Western theologians during the second half of the 12th century, would supply them, in the form of the distinction between substance and accidents, with the conceptual tool that would allow them to clarify the ultrarealism of the confession of faith of 1059—strictly speaking, the teeth of the communicant are chewing the “accidents” (see DS 690), whereas the substantial change pertains to an absolute affirmation of being*. In any case, theologians did not use the Aristotelian philosophical instrument in its original form: the negative reaction of the Averroists against Thomas Aquinas, on this very matter, makes this clear.

The profession of faith Firmiter credimus of Lateran IV expresses the eucharistic dogma* when it says (DS 802) that “the body and the blood of Christ are really (veraciter) present under the appearance (species) of transubstantiated bread and wine.” Did this formulation mean that one was perforce led to believe that the eucharistic conversion was total? Or did it mean it was simply possible to imagine that the reality of bread and wine was still there? Thomas Aquinas, who commented on this document (opuscule In Primam Decretalem), holds that his terms (which inspire the prayer of the celebration of Corpus Christi) preclude the fact of bread and Christ’s body being both present in the sacrament. In the 14th century John Duns* Scotus, followed by the nominalists, may have been tempted to accept this simultaneity (the “consubstantiation”), had it not been because of the authority* of the council. This helps us understand the position Luther* would later adopt.

The distinction between substance and accidents influenced Thomas’s eucharistic theology in a different way. Since the time of Hugh of Saint-Victor, theo-gians have been speaking of the “corporal presence” of Christ in the Eucharist, in reference to Matthew 28:20: “I am with you always, to the end of the age.” But Thomas rejects the eucharistic interpretation of that text, and he considers that the presence comes under the category of localization. In the document instituting the feast of Corpus Christi (the bull Transiturus), Urban IV put into circulation the notion of “real presence” (DS 846), but the liturgy of the feast does not mention it, nor does it refer to Matthew 28:20. Until the Council of Trent*, while standing by the dogmatic formulas of Lateran IV, theologians did occasionally have recourse to the notion of “real presence.”

In the Roman eucharistic prayer it is the words of Christ that are the keystone. Their importance was strongly emphasized by Ambrose, and his influence was enormous, for both the devotion of the faithful and for sacramental theology: theologians believed that they actually knew, thanks to a text of Gregory* the Great on the Our Father (Register 9, 26), that Christ had consecrated the Eucharist with these brief words, and that the canon of the Mass was added to them at a later stage. From the theological viewpoint Thomas Aquinas thought he could completely isolate the consecrating efficacy of the words of Christ from the rest of the eucharistic prayer, a point on which other theologians did not follow him. But aside from this, another of Thomas’s ideas was routinely accepted: the priest pronounces the consecrating words in persona Christi, by assuming sacramentally the role of Christ.

3. Reformation, the Council of Trent and Modern Theology

Before the Reformers of the 16th century, we should mention the two requirements of Hussism (Hus*) regarding the Eucharist: the chalice Communion of the faithful and the Communion of young children.

a) Doctrine of the Reformers in the 16th Century The Reformers were in agreement among themselves about taking the words of the Scripture* as the exclusive reference, but their disagreements on the Eucharist were also an essential factor in the debates that opposed them to each other. This was particularly so in the case of Luther’s debate with the Swiss Reformers, and with Zwingli* above all. Luther (Captivity of Babylon [1520]) demands chalice Communion and denies that the Eucharist is a sacrifice (Formula of Concord, Epitome VII, BSLK 801): what he understands from the word sacrifice is a “good deed” performed by man, whereas the Eucharist is purely divine grace*. He refuses the notion of transubstantiation (ibid.), because it involves an undue recourse to Aristotle. But he does care for the real presence, and in that respect he considers himself closer to the Catholics than to the Swiss Reformers (CA 10, BSLK 64–65; see Calvin* Inst. IV, 17). On the other hand, he insists on the liturgy of the word, and he condemns the private mass.

b) Council of Trent. The previous state of Catholic practices, as well as the circumstances of the council, were such that Trent dealt with the Eucharist in several distinct documents and dealt separately with the sacrament, Communion, and the sacrifice of the Mass.

To start with, in session XIII (1551) the council reaffirmed the faith of Lateran IV against the Swiss Reformer (decree on the Eucharist, chap. 1 [DS 1636] and canon 1 [DS 1651]), and it excluded the term consubstantiation in favor of transubstantiation, the use of which was said to be most appropriate (can. 2 [DS 1652]). Whereas Lateran IV was saying that the body and the blood are “truly contained,” the Fathers favored (1547) a wider formulation: “truly and really contained,” which they completed later (1551) with the term substantially. They also stated that Christ is “present sacramentally.” Subsequent to this, the notion of real presence became common in Catholic theology and catechesis. The council also claimed the legitimacy of the worship rendered to the real presence. Among other practices regarding the Eucharist, it reminded the faithful that sacramental confession of grave sins is prescribed before receiving Communion—but it did not present that point as a basic truth* of faith (DS 1661).

Ten years later, in session XXI (1562), the council stated that Communion from the chalice and the Communion of young children are not part of what is necessary for salvation*: the church exercises in such things the power with which it is entrusted regarding sacraments; the essential thing is that their substance be safe (DS 1728, 1731, 1734). Two months later, the council referred back to the pope the question of the concession of the chalice, whenever it was a need (DS 1760). The concession made in 1564 to the metropolitans of the German-speaking countries and of Hungary lasted 20 years; Communion from the chalice had already become a sign of denominational differentiation.

In session XXII (also in 1562) the council defined the content of the Catholic faith regarding the Mass: it is a nonbloody sacrifice, offered for the living and the dead, in which is made present the sacrifice of the cross; and the ministry* of that sacrifice was instituted in the Last Supper at the same time as the Eucharist (DS 1740, 1751–1754). On that occasion the council dismissed the wish that the Mass be celebrated in the vernacular language, but it recommended that it be explained to the faithful (DS 1747).

c) Roman Missal of 1570. The reform of the missal and of the breviary had been entrusted to the pope by the council. The missal reformed by Pius V, “according to the norm of the Fathers,” that is, according to the early church, generally confined itself to the state in which the liturgy of the Mass had been four or five centuries earlier. But in accordance with 16th-century practice it adopted as a fundamental form the Mass said by the priest with a small congregation, instead of the celebration in the ecclesial assembly. Although it had not originally been imposed on those churches that had their own liturgical tradition, in the course of the succeeding centuries this missal became the quasi-exclusive form of eucharistic celebration in the Western Catholic Church.

d) Eucharistic Theology after Trent. For more than three centuries Catholic theologians considered the way in which the Eucharist was realized as sacrifice. The history of doctrines attempted to group the diverse explanations (Lepin 1926): theories of the “real immutation” of Christ (thus Robert Bellarmine* and Alphonsus* Liguori), theories of his “mystical immutation,” and theories of oblation (French School, Bérulle* and the French Oratorians, as well as Bossuet). In the 20th century, with Casel and his circle of influence, there was a return to an idea close to Thomas Aquinas, the idea of the “mysterious presence” (Mysteriengegenwart) of Christ’s own action in the sacrifice of the Mass—an idea that seemed to allow Lutheran theologians to overcome the difficulties experienced in the 16th century.

4. Doctrine and Liturgical Reform of Vatican II

Vatican* II produced no document dealing specifically with the Eucharist. However, its texts make abundant mention of it, regarding its connection with the mystery of the Church, ecumenism*, the ministry of the priesthood, and particularly in the framework of the liturgy and liturgical reform. The following points are given particular emphasis: 1) Correlation between the respective tables of the Word and the Eucharist (SC 48, 51, etc.); 2) establishing the connection of the Eucharist, not only with the sacrifice of the cross (SC 47), but with the whole paschal mystery; 3) the place occupied by the Eucharist among the sacraments of Christian initiation* (SC 71, etc.); 4) interaction between church and Eucharist (see LG 26), in the perspective opened up by H. de Lubac, with a change of emphasis that signals a move from a theology of the church viewed primarily as an organized society* (e.g., with Bellarmine) to a theology of the church as sacrament; 5) the importance of the active participation of the faithful in the eucharistic celebration, following the line developed since Pius X (SC); 6) the Eucharist seen simultaneously as source and summit of Christian life (LG 11). The Eucharisticum Mysterium of 1967 was to sum up the teachings of the council on the Eucharist.

The reform of the Roman liturgy, determined and set in motion by the council, dealt in particular with the following questions about the celebration of the Eucharist: 1) The possibility of using the vernacular language; 2) the creation of a greatly enlarged cycle of readings to include, on Sunday, a supplementary reading from the Old Testament and a new insistence on the homily; 3) restoration of the universal prayer; 4) simplification of the offertory prayers; 5) concelebration by priests; 6) recitation aloud of the eucharistic prayer and the suggestion of several eucharistic prayers, including in particular an epiclesis; 7) Communion from the chalice along with the consecrated bread.

5. Latest Tendencies in Theology

It is certainly much too early to attempt a synthesis of the tendencies in contemporary eucharistic theology. We shall at least take note of the attention paid by theologians (claimed by Bouyer 1966) to the fundamental form of the action, whether it is a matter of comparing the memorial to the Hebrew zikkaron or of attempting to bring out the Sinngestalt from the action, its fundamental form (Lies 1978; Ratzinger 1981). What is underscored is the following: the connection of the Eucharist to the paschal mystery, to the history of salvation and to eschatology* (e.g., Tillard 1964; Durrwell 1980); its pneumatological dimension (importance of the epiclesis). In the problematics of the real presence, new concepts have been proposed, some of which were found gravely insufficient by Paul VI’s encyclical Mysterium fidei (“transfinalization,” “transignification”). Similarly, attempts have been made to employ the language of the presence in new philosophical contexts (see Marion 1982) or by resorting to the philosophy* of language (Ladrière 1984). Eucharistic theology has been used as a core around which to organize ecclesiology, as part of a particularly creative current in Orthodox theology (Afanassieff 1975; Zizioulas 1985; see McPartlan 1993); it has also been possible to link it to a sort of anthropology* (Martelet 1972), or to suggest a perspective borrowed from morality (Lacoste 1984). Last, ecumenical reflection endeavors to remove the misunderstanding remaining from the debates of the 16th century (Thurian 1981).

- Concept: G. Dix (1945), The Shape of the Liturgy, London.
- J.-A. Jungmann (1949), Missarum Sollemnia, Freiburg (5th Ed. 1962).
- C. Mohrmann (1965), Études sur le latin des chrétiens, vol. III, Rome, 351–76 (on missa).

- H.B. Meyer (1989), Eucharistie: Geschichte, Theologie, Pastoral, Regensburg.
- P.-M. Gy (1990), La liturgie dans l'histoire, Paris; (1992 a), "De l'Euch.: Prière au pain et au vin eucharistiés," in A. Heinz, H. Rennings (Ed), Gratias agamus: Studien zum eucharistischen Hochgebet: Mélanges B. Fischer, Freiburg, 111–16; (1992 b), "Le 'nous' de la prière eucharistique," MD 191, 7–14.
- T.J. Talley (1992), "Structures des anaphores anciennes et modernes," MD 191, 15–43.
- 1.
- A. Hänggi, I. Pahl (1968), Prex Eucharistica: Textus e variis liturgiis antiquioribus selecti, Fribourg.
- B. Botte (1972), La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte, 4th Ed., Münster.
- G. Kretschmar (1977), "Abendmahlsfeier I. Die alte Kirche," TRE 1, 59–89; "Abendmahl III. 1. Die alte Kirche," TRE 1, 229–78.
- A. Verheul (1980), "La prière eucharistique d'Addaï et Mari," QuLi 61, 19–27.
- P. Bradshaw (1995), La liturgie chrétienne en ses origines, Paris, 151–81.
- 1. a)
- F. Hamm (1928), Die liturgischen Einsetzungsberichte im Sinne vergleichender Liturgieforschung untersucht, Münster.
- B. Botte (1953), "Note historique sur la concélébration dans l'Église ancienne," MD 35, 9–23.
- E. Cutrone (1990), "The Liturgical Setting of the Institution Narrative in the Early Syrian Tradition," in J.N. Alexander (Ed.), Time and Community: Mélanges Talley, Washington, D.C., 105–14.
- E. Mazza (1992), L'anafora eucaristica: Studi sulle origini, Rome.
- T.J. Talley (1993), "Word and Sacrament in the Primitive Eucharist," in E. Carr, et al. (Ed.), Eulogèma: Mélanges Taft, Rome, 497–810.
- P.-M. Gy (1995), "The Shape of the Liturgy de Dom Gregory Dix (1945)," MD 204, 31–50.
- 1. b)
- J. Betz (1955–63), Die Eucharistie in der Zeit der griechischen Väter, Freiburg.
- Lies (1978), "Eulogia: Überlegungen zur formalen Sinngestalt der Eucharistie," ZKTh 100, 69–120.
- 2. a)
- M. Rubin (1991), Corpus Christi: The Eucharist in Late Medieval Culture, Cambridge.
- 2. b)
- H. de Lubac (1944), Corpus Mysticum: L'Eucharistie et l'Église au Moyen Age: Étude historique, Paris.
- H. Jorissen (1965), Die Entfaltung der Transsubstantiationslehre bis zum Beginn der Hochscholastik, Münster.
- I. Furberg (1968), Das Pater noster in der Messe, Lund.
- J. de Montclos (1971), Lanfranc et Bérenger: La controverse euchar. du XIe s., Louvain.
- B.-D. Marliangeas (1978), Clés pour une théologie du ministère: In persona Christi, in persona Ecclesiae, Paris.
- D. Burr (1984), Eucharistic Presence and Conversion in Late Thirteenth-Century Franciscan Thought, Philadelphia.
- G. Macy (1984), The Theologies of the Eucharist in the Early Scholastic Period: A Study of the Salvific Function of the Sacrament according to the Theologians c. 1080–c. 1220, Oxford.
- R. Imbach (1993), "Le traité de l'Eucharistie de Thomas d'Aquin et les averroïstes," RSPTh 77, 175–94.
- 3. a)
- K. Lehmann, W. Pannenberg (Ed.) (1986), Lehrverurteilungen-Kirchentrennung? Freiburg-Göttingen.
- 3. b)
- M. Lepin (1926), L'idée du sacrifice de la messe d'après les théologiens depuis l'origine jusqu'à nos jours, 3rd Ed., Paris.
- A. Härdelin (1965), The Tractarian Understanding of the Eucharist, Uppsala.
- J. Wohlmuth (1975), Realpräsenz und Transsubstantiation im Konzil von Trient, Berne-Frankfurt.
- 4.
- Instruction Eucharisticum Mysterium (1967), DC 64, 1091–22.
- R. Kaczynski (1976, 1988, 1997), Enchiridion documentorum instaurationis liturgicae I (1963–73), Turin; II (1973–83), Rome; III (1993–1993), Rome.
- 5.
- Bibliography of recent publications in M. Zitnik (1992), Sacramenta. Bibliographia Internationalis, 4 vols., Rome.
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1964), L'eucharistie, Pâque de l'Église, Paris.
- L. Bouyer (1966), Eucharistie: Théologie et spiritualité de la prière eucharistique, Paris.
- N. Lash (1968), His Presence in the World, London.
- L. Ligier (1971), Il sacramento dell'Eucharistia, Rome.
- G. Martelet (1972), Résurrection, eucharistie, genèse de l'homme, Paris.
- N. Afanassieff (1975), L'Église du Saint-Esprit, CFI 83.
- F.X. Durrwell (1980), L'eucharistie sacrement pascal, Paris.
- J. Ratzinger (1981), Das Fest des Glaubens, Einsiedeln.
- M. Thurian (1981), Le mystère de l'eucharistie, une approche œcuménique, Paris.
- J.-L. Marion (1982), "Le présent et le don," Dieu sans l'être, Paris, 225–58.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1984), "Sacraments, éthique, eucharistie," RThom 84, 212–42.
- J. Ladrière (1984), "Approche philosophique d'une réflexion sur l'eucharistie," L'articulation du sens, vol. 2, CFI 125, 308–34.
- J.D. Zizioulas (1985), Being As Communion, Crestwood, N.Y.
- H.B. Meyer (1989), Eucharistie, Geschichte, Theologie, Pastoral, Regensburg, 441–63.
- P. McPartlan (1993), The Eucharist Makes the Church: Henri de Lubac and John Zizioulas in Dialogue, Edinburgh.
- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie 3, Göttingen, 314–69.
- O. González de Cardedal (1997), La entraña del cristianismo, Salamanca, 463–522.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Anointing of the Sick; Baptism; Being; Communion; Confirmation; Marriage; Mass, Sacrifice of the; Mystery; Ordination/Order; Penance; Sacrament

Eucharistic Conversion. See Being; Eucharist

Eucharistic Presence. See Being; Eucharist

Euchites. See Messalianism

Eudes, John. See Heart of Christ

Euthanasia. See Death

Eutyches. See Chalcedon, Council of; Monophysitism

Evagrius Ponticus. See Asceticism

Evangelicalism. See Anglicanism; Methodism; Protestantism

Evangelization. See Mission/Evangelization

Evil

A. Fundamental Theology

a) Classical Theory. Does evil have a being? All the theoretical instincts of classical antiquity encouraged thinkers to respond to this question by attenuating the ontological status of that which contravened the harmonious order of things. Aristotle denies that there is anything evil among the eternal realities (Met. VIII, 9, 1051 a). According to Plotinus, evil cannot be present either in that which is, or in that which is beyond being; it is present only in material realities, because they are mingled with nonbeing (Enneads I, VIII, 3). Evil is therefore concealed within beauty* “in order that its reality should remain invisible to the gods” (Enneads I, VIII, 15).

However, the question appeared to be more pressing with regard to the coherence of theology* than it was for philosophical reasoning. If the world is indeed the work of a good and omnipotent God*, what status is to be assigned to evil? The classical response was adopted in response to the Gnostics (gnosis*), for whom the world was nothing other than the imperfect work of a demiurge, rather than of the supreme God. Above all, it was also adopted in response to the Manicheans (Manicheanism*), who asserted that evil has just as substantial an existence as good: from the beginning, and as a matter of principle, the combat between good and evil has informed history* with meaning. Christianity was able to articulate its response at an early stage, as in this passage from Origen* (Princ. II, 9, 2, In Joh. II, 17, PG 14, 137; see also Basil* of Caesarea, PG 31, 341): “Do not imagine that God is the cause of the existence of evil, or that evil has its own substance [hupostasis]. Perversity does not exist as if it was some living thing; one can never place its substance [ousia] before one’s eyes as if it truly existed.” In the writings of Augustine*, accepting the reality of evil seems still more of a concession to dualism: depriving evil of any reality becomes an elementary theological tactic for rendering dualism impracticable (e.g., Conf. III. vii. 12). Evil has no being in reality; it has no status other than as “privation of good” (privatio boni); it is the absence of that which should be; and God is not capable of being the cause of nonbeing (De quaest. 83, q. 21).

In the Middle Ages, the ontology of the transcendentals provided an ample framework within which to treat the nonreality of evil. If that which is, by virtue of being that which is, is one, true, and good, and if ens et bonum convertuntur (“being and good are interchangeable”), then evil in all its forms must be excluded from any ontological inventory of the world, in which it appears only as the limit of being. As L.-B. Geiger wrote (1969): “The realm of the good therefore extends as far as that of being, since the only positive element that distinguishes evil itself from nothingness pure and simple—that is to say, the requirement of being, the having to be—is still a good, and for that reason it is the indispensable foundation for whatever there is of evil.” To the extent that there is anything beautiful and good in evil, it was generally agreed that God, “the universal moderator of everything that is” (universalis provisor totius entis: Thomas* Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 22, a. 2), “has judged it better,” as Augustine puts it (Enchir. chap. 27), “to draw good from evil than not to permit the existence of any evil.” It was believed that God chastises, that he desires the evil of punishment*, but that his responsibility does not extend to moral evil or “sackcloth and ashes.” It was possible to give a brief response to the question of physical evil, although that response could also be expanded, or complicated, by adding that the fallen angels*, the demons*, are responsible to some extent for the physical evils that human beings suffer. On the other hand, it was possible to provide an elegant solution to the question of moral evil by attributing to humanity the privilege of being the first cause (Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 112, a. 3, ad 2), even while adding that humanity does not thus create anything. Maritain, in his original reinterpretation of Aquinas’s themes, was thus able to interpret sin as “the annihilating initiative of the created will” (1946, passim). In the terms adopted by Journet, moral evil is strictly speaking not a matter of action, but of “disaction” or deficient action (1961). In both cases, therefore, the denial that evil has any reality requires that an effort be made toward a rational discourse on nonbeing. Ontology cannot offer any hospitality to evil, but it can attempt to give it an appropriate “non-ontology.”

The classical theory cannot avoid addressing the problem of providence*. Once it is accepted that God is good and that he alone is God, two tasks must be accomplished: to remove from God the burden of responsibility for evil, and to place that burden on those who are created and endowed with liberty*. Yet if human beings are the primary cause of moral evil, is the fate of creation* out of the hands of God? Maritain sets up his argument by conceding to human beings the capacity to place obstacles in the way of divine grace*: a human being who enters into the logic of evil through “not considering the moral rule” receives divine motions, but these motions can be broken. One might then object (Nicolas 1960) that on this view God loses his sovereignty and ceases to be the author of the drama, becoming instead its principal player. Against the idea of a grace that sinners are able to resist, but that is accomplished as “unbreakable motion” in those whose wills do not falter, one could also have recourse to a concept derived from Aquinas, that of the “antecedent permissive decree,” and link it to the Thomist (Bañezian) notion of “physical pre-motion” (Bañezianism*-Molinism-Baianism, Thomism*). The same objections could also be raised in response to a more recent defense of God’s innocence (Garrigues 1982), which is based on the Thomist principle that God, being aware of his creatures only to the extent that he causes them, is incapable of forming the idea of evil (see Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 15, a. 3, ad 1). If one seeks a radical guarantee of the innocence of God, one will come to think that God is so transcendent that he has lost control of his creation (Nicolas, RThom 83, 649–59).

b) The Best of Worlds. Evil, even when deprived of any foundation in reality, does not cease to figure in any experiential inventory of the world: “to set forth the negative nature of evil is not to set forth its negation” (Geiger 1969). Accordingly, depriving evil of reality in principle does not settle any question. Perhaps because dualism no longer confronts modern thought as a real enemy—as it confronted Aquinas in the form of Catharism*—modern thought does not hesitate to accept that evil exists, and saves itself the trouble of asking whether this “existing” is or is not endowed with being. Instead, it handles the problem within the modern framework of theodicy. Should the world be accused of imperfection because of the presence of suffering and of evil wills? Can one consistently affirm that a good and omnipotent God has created this world in which there is evil? Leibniz* responds that in the lawsuit that human beings bring against God, he must be acquitted, because the world, as it is, is the best of all possible worlds. The evil in the world is not unreal, whether it is metaphysical evil (the limitation inherent in the creation, taken as such), physical evil, or moral evil. Evil is necessary for the promotion of the greatest possible created good. God could have created a world from which evil was absent, but such a world would necessarily have been a world from which every free creature was also absent. It would also have been less perfect than our world, in which we are free to will evil, but also to will good. This argument can be found as early as Augustine and has continued in use for a very long time (e.g., Swinburne 1979).

A. Plantinga deserves credit for having provided a significantly revised version of the argument in the course of recent discussions of the question. On the one hand, Leibniz's argument is shown to be invalid, because the concept of "the best of all possible worlds" contains the same type of contradiction as the concept of "the greatest prime number": however many worlds exist, one can always conceive a better one. On the other hand, by making use of the discussions about "possible worlds" within the contemporary logic, one can identify worlds that, in strict logic, God could not have "actualized." Finally, the examination of moral evil makes it possible to identify "transworld depravity," a form of malice that is valid not only for this world but for other possible worlds, and that shows up the inconsistency in the idea that Peter, while remaining Peter, might not have acted as he did act in this world. Accepting the logical necessities that weigh down on God himself thus allows us to affirm, within a framework that is not theodicy but a "defense of free will," that the existence of evil does not contradict either God's knowledge* or his power (see the summaries given in chaps. 4–8 of The Nature of Necessity, Oxford, 1974).

Thus, the modern treatment of evil does not prevent evil from continuing to be an ontological scandal. One must return to the theology of providence for an account of it, as well as to Hegel*. His concept of the negative provides a way of thinking about the contribution of evil to the history of the spirit as a necessary term in the dialectic, and thus endows thought with a theoretical instrument that is capable of ratifying the reality of evil, within the framework of an ontology that is concerned to get beyond the elementary opposition between being and nothingness, without placing the responsibility on God—who himself puts the negative to the test—and without permitting any drift into dualism.

c) Evil and Meaning. Evil is deprived of being in the classical theory, and is not necessarily present in the modern theory, except to promote the greatest good; however, it does not follow that the experience of evil is deprived of any meaning. The suffering of human beings—already omnipresent in the critiques leveled at Christian theories, such as Leibniz's, by Enlightenment thinkers such as Hume or Voltaire—is theoreticcally noteworthy in that it is capable of acquiring a meaning. Nevertheless, it acquires this meaning, not within the limits of its own experience, but from the human suffering and death assumed by God in Jesus Christ. Theology can shed no light on the scandalous experience of evil—whether it be the Lisbon earthquake, as for Enlightenment thinkers, or Auschwitz in contemporary thought—except by measuring it against the event at Golgotha. God on the cross did not take all suffering upon himself, since human beings have continued to suffer even after the crucified one suffered, but he does allow all human suffering to take on a degree of christological significance. Not only is suffering educational for human beings, but the suffering of believers achieves "what is lacking in Christ's afflictions" (Col 1:24). Without claiming to "explain" evil, a theology of creation could also perceive in the act of the creator a divine "self-limitation" (Jüngel 1990), which is not identical with a pure and simple kenosis* of divine omnipotence (as is the case in Jonas 1984), but permits a distancing of Christian theory from the God of metaphysics—and therefore also from metaphysical interpretations of evil.

The theological meaning of evil may also be radicalized in a different way when theologians attempt to introduce pathos with respect to God himself. The idea of a God who is the "companion of the sufferings" of human beings (A. N. Whitehead), and the range of systematic treatments of this idea in the various theologies of the suffering of God, in theopaschite Christologies*, and elsewhere, complete the project of theodicy within a mode of hyperbole. There is no need for any "lawsuit," for in a certain sense the test of suffering sets the seal on a communion* between God and humanity. The suffering that this world contains is not an expedient, permitting the engendering of a greater good: it is presented as the most human of experiences, being an experience that God undergoes within his own being.

Finally, is it necessary to rationalize evil (see Phillips 1986 versus Swinburne 1979 and Hick 1966)? Doubtless, following G. Marcel's distinction, we should accept that there is not exactly a problem of evil—for the existence of a problem implies the possibility of a complete solution—but rather, a mystery* of evil (Geiger 1969). In this regard, it is possible to accuse every theory of being cynical (e.g., G. Baudler, Wahrer Gott als wahrer Mensch, Munich, 1977). To deny that evil has any reality, or to integrate it into the productive logic that generates history, may lead us to forget that the question is less theoretical than practical: first and foremost, evil requires not to be understood, but to be combated. Dostoyevsky's Ivan Karamazov based his reasoned atheism* on the suffering of the innocent, but the only response that he receives is provided, indirectly, by the spiritual experience* of the starets Zozimus. The presence of evil is “radical” within humanity, according to Kant*, but good will can exist. The suffering of human beings is obvious, but we have a duty to relieve it. Pope Pius XII avoided a number of theoretical pitfalls when he declared that it is morally legitimate to give birth without pain and to use analgesics (DC, vol. 53, 87; vol. 54, 326–40). It is a commonplace truth that even the most intelligent morality or holiness* cannot hunt all the evil out of the world, yet theology operates on the presupposition that God gives a “response” to evil that is wholly action* rather than a use of words (Bouyer 1946). Humanity cannot come to the end of every evil, but the Resurrection* of Christ manifests God’s power and capacity. The question of the ontological status of evil in this world may therefore be left, wholly deliberately, in suspense. Even if God is no longer a hidden God, his work in the world remains a “hidden work” (opus absconditum).

- F. Billicsich (1936, 1952, 1959), Das Problem des Übels in der Philosophie des Abendlandes, 3 vols., Vienna.
- L. Lavelle (1940), Le mal et la souffrance, Paris.
- C. S. Lewis (1940), The Problem of Pain, London.
- L. Bouyer (1946), “Le problème du mal dans le christianisme antique,” Dieu vivant 6, 17–42.
- J. Maritain (1946), Court traité de l’existence et de l’existant, Paris, repr. in OC IX, esp. 98–118.

- A. G. Sertillanges (1948, 1951), Le problème du mal, 2 vols., Paris.
- K. Barth (1950), KD III/3 (Dogmatique), Geneva, 1962–63.
- B. Welte (1959), Über das Böse, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J.-H. Nicolas (1960), “La permission du péché,” RThom 60, 5–37, 185–206, 509–46.
- C. Journet (1961), Le Mal, Paris-Bruges.
- J. Maritain (1963), Dieu et la permission du mal, Paris (3rd Ed. 1993).
- J. Hick (1966), Evil and the God of Love, London.
- L.-B. Geiger (1969), L’expérience humaine du mal, Paris.
- D. Sölle (1973), Leiden, Stuttgart-Berlin.
- A. Plantinga (1974), God, Freedom and Evil, New York, 7–64.
- R. Swinburne (1979), The Existence of God, Oxford, 200–224.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1980), Theodramatik III, Einsiedeln, 125–86.
- Y. Labbé (1980), Le sens et le mal, Paris.
- W. Sparn (Ed.) (1980), Leiden: Erfahrung und Denken, Materialien zum Theodizeeproblem, Munich.
- J.-M. Garrigues (1982), Dieu sans idée du mal, Limoges (New Ed., Paris, 1990).
- H. Jonas (1984), “Der Gottesbegriff nach Auschwitz,” in O. Hofius (Ed.), Reflexionen finsterner Zeit, Frankfurt, 61–86.
- D. Z. Phillips (1986), “The Challenge of What We Know: The Problem of Evil,” Belief, Change and Forms of Life, London, 52–78.
- E. Jüngel (1990), “Gottes ursprüngliches Anfangen als schöpferische Selbstbegrenzung,” Wertlose Wahrheit, BEvTh 107, 151–62.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Being; Good; Peace; Violence; War

B. Moral Theology

The concept of moral evil attributes evil to the sphere of action. It presupposes the denial of ontic status to evil, and it situates evil entirely within the sphere of history.

In the course of its struggles with the Gnostics (gnosis*), Christianity identified as heresy* the notion that evil is attributable to the materiality of the world, and specifically of the body. Ascetic hostility to the actions of bodily life—eating, drinking, sexual intercourse, and so on—is suspect in the New Testament, as impugning the creation* (e.g., 1 Tm 3:3 f.). When New Testament authors speak of “flesh” to express the disposition of the moral agent to evil, they point not to the body as such, but to a state of moral psychology, phronema sarkos (Rom 6:6), in which one is dominated by material need and unable to act freely.

Evil may be considered under one of two descriptions, active or passive (malum actionis, malum passionis), as sin* or suffering. The Judeo-Christian theological tradition*, in which faith* in the purposiveness of divine providence* is fundamental, has maintained that suffering must be subsumed under the intentional interaction of God* and humanity. The inarticulate suffering of animals cannot be attributed to human beings. Suffering must speak of some divine purpose if it is to be comprehended within the history of a moral agent. “Does disaster come to a city, unless the Lord has done it?” (Am 3:6). Suffering thereupon becomes moralized as the occasion for responsive action, evil or good: patience or impatience under temptation*, honesty or dissimulation under punishment*, courage or cowardice before danger, and so on.

In making use of the concept of sin, one recognizes that evil is part of the evil action itself and is not to be imputed to circumstances or conditions. However, evil may be attributed objectively, to the form of the act, or subjectively, to the disposition of the agent. These two starting points have sometimes been contrasted with each other, but they are both necessary, and are mutually corrective in defining moral evil.

In an objective attribution, an evil action is an action that is not what it should be. This is the meaning of sin as “transgression” or “wrong,” terms that point to the idea of failure to accomplish. The Greek term hamartia, sometimes thought to encapsulate this idea, is often contrasted with a supposedly Jewish sense of “radical sin,” but this is misleading, since the most that can be demonstrated is a difference of emphasis. One might even say that precisely this notion of sin as transgression characterized the morality of the Pharisees, which Jesus* criticizes (“Now you Pharisees cleanse the outside of the cup and the dish, but inside you are full of greed and wickedness,” Lk 11:39), and that it belongs to the legalistic culture of ancient Judaism*. Here belongs much of traditional ethics* as a deliberative science, with its notion of moral law*, the distinction between sins of omission and sins of commission, and so on. The “manifold” character of hamartia, to which Aristotle draws attention in the Nicomachean Ethics (1106 b 28), springs from the manifold possibilities for action afforded by the complexities of the world. When one seeks the rules of action, evil acts have to be studied according to their different types, for they are not yet part of any subject’s history, and their formal relations to specific moral laws are all that there is to be considered. Such an ethics cannot, therefore, dispense with casuistry*.

According to Jesus’ critique of the Pharisaic exposition of the law, starting from such a point can never bring us to confront the personal and historical dimensions of evil. It views sin only as a possibility, and past sin only as a contingent accident. Yet behind every evil act there lies a subjective reality of evil: “For from within, out of the heart of man, come evil thoughts” (Mk 7:21). This is the meaning of sin as “guilt,” a subjective evil inherent in the moral orientation of the agent. To recognize evil as belonging to one’s acts, one must acknowledge not merely error or failure in performance, but disorder in one’s agency as such.

Jesus’ doctrine of the “heart” must not be confused with the modern (18th-century) concept of “motive,” a purely “possible” act of the mind supposed to lie behind each external act but not a root-source for all acts. The notion of “heart” lies, rather, somewhere between the notion of character* and the idea of original sin*, an involvement of the whole of humanity in evil. Whatever different forms sins may take objectively—Jesus lists a number of them—the decisive factor is their common source (Mk 7:1–23). Augustine* describes this root of sin as the love* of self, in contrast to the love of God (City of God 14, 28). As there is no real alternative to God that the heart may love, it turns on itself, negating the whole world of real existence to conjure up a solipsistic universe.

The complementarity of the two starting points can be seen as each takes on certain emphases of the other. On the one hand, the law in Jesus’ teaching is unified by a sovereign command of love, which undergirds all the rules, identifies one failure in which all possible failures are comprised: “If I speak in the tongues of men and angels, but have not love” (1 Cor 13:1; see Mk 12:28–31). On the other hand, the idea of a root source of evil is developed by differentiation into a specification of the corruptions to which the moral agent is liable. An analysis of the disorders of the soul in terms of “capital vices” has been common in the Evagrian tradition of spiritual* theology (e.g., in Maximus* the Confessor).

To recognize the evil of one’s action requires that one enter into this dialectic of objective and subjective attribution. Otherwise, in considering the idea of responsibility of moral evil, one is reduced to the pure incomprehensibility of “dumb” suffering. On the purely objective side, transgression dissolves into a failure of execution that befalls an act accidentally, without engaging the responsibility of the agent, as when an athlete fails to break a speed record because of a contrary wind. On the purely subjective side, the root of evil becomes so deeply hidden that it in no way characterizes the forms of objective action, which thereby become morally indifferent. The acceptance of responsibility for the evil of the action is lost sight of. Critics of Stoicism* in the ancient world thought that this followed from its doctrine of “things indifferent,” while in recent times proportionalism* has incurred the same objection because of its sharp differentiation of pre-evil and moral evil, the former being of no moral account, the latter lurking so deep in the depths of the “fundamental option” as to be discerned only in the anxious conscience* and never in categorically evil acts. Between the two, the guilty party, hunted by the philosophers of every continent, slips through undetected.

- Augustine, City of God, BAUG 33–37; The Nature of the Good, BAUG 1, 437–509.
- J. Edwards, On the Nature of True Virtue, in Ethical Writings, P. Ramsey (Ed.), New Haven, 1989.
- E. Kant, Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft, AA 6, 1968.
- Thomas Aquinas, De malo.
- ♦ K. Barth (1950), KD III/3 (Dogmatique), Geneva, 1962–63.
- I. Hausherr (1952), Philautie, Rome.
- B. Welte (1959), Über das Böse, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- P. Ricœur (1960), Finitude et culpabilité, Paris.
- O. O’Donovan (1979), The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine, New Haven.
- G. R. Evans (1982), Augustine on Evil, Cambridge.
- L. Thunberg (1995), Microcosm and Mediator, 2nd Ed., Chicago.

OLIVER O’DONOVAN

See also Action; Conscience; Ethics; Good; Sin

Evolution

1. Viewpoint of the Natural Sciences

a) Biological Evolution. In whatever way they might interpret it, no scientists contest the fact of evolution. Paleontological proofs are sufficient in themselves to establish its reality: the dating of fossils makes it possible to confirm the gradual increase in complexity and diversification of forms in the whole of the animal and plant kingdoms. A cluster of convergent supplementary arguments, drawn from embryology, comparative anatomy, and molecular biology, bolster these proofs. The fact of evolution also encompasses the appearance of the human race. In a nutshell, the first “chemical fossils” are contemporaneous with the earliest known sedimentary rocks, going back some three and one-half billion years. They are supposedly due to the action of immense colonies of bacteria, then to the action of Cyanophyceae (blue-green algae). The first eukaryotes (Protozoa and Protophyta) appeared about one and one-half billion years ago. Toward the end of the Pre-Cambrian era, the multicellular Metazoa arrived. In the Mid-Cambrian period the first chordates (animals with nonbony spinal cords) made their appearance, then the vertebrates came on the scene in the Silurian era. Starting at the beginning of the Mesozoic period, the age of reptiles, came the first mammals, which would develop in the Tertiary era at the same time as the birds. The first primates go back as far as the Cretaceous period, at the time when the dinosaurs were dying out.

b) Explanatory Theories. Unanimity evaporates as soon as explanatory theories of evolution come into play. No single one of these seems really satisfactory as an answer to Popper’s criterion of scientific “refutability” (or falsifiability). The synthetic or neo-Darwinian theory held sway for a long time, and its problematic nature stands out even more clearly today. The earliest evolutionary theorist was not Darwin (1809–82) but Lamarck (1744–1829), later discredited by the English biologist and his followers. Lamarck sketched out his theory in 1802. There, for the first time, the continuity, diversification, and complexity of animal species in their natural gradations were observed and understood as a kinship in which the most complex had descended from the simplest. However, his explanation of the mechanism of evolution could never be confirmed experimentally. It is based on two laws: in any animal*, use of an organ strengthens it “and gives it power in proportion to the length of that use,” while disuse causes its atrophy; and second, acquired characteristics are transmitted through heredity. This second law is the Achilles’s heel of Lamarckism.

The Darwinian theory of natural selection was established in 1858 by C. R. Darwin and A. R. Wallace (1823–1913). No doubt it was influenced by T. R. Malthus’s Essay on the Principle of Population (1798). Then it received the useful support of A. Weismann (1834–1914), who distinguished the Germen (germ-plasm), which includes inherited characteristics, from the Soma, the perishable body that has no influence on heredity—a distinction that dealt the death blow to Lamarckism. The synthetic theory was gradually developed in the years 1930–50, by merging the Darwinian principle with the hereditary laws of G. Mendel (1822–84) and with Hugo de Vries’s (1848–1935) theory of mutations.

Once it was fashioned in this way, for quite some time neo-Darwinism enjoyed the support of the great majority of biologists. Nonetheless, “Whatever form it takes, ‘Darwinism’ does not explain the great evolution that the organizational plan and the phylae, or branchings of classes and orders, involves” (Grassé). Even at the level of the formation of species, we possess no more than a system of plausible hypotheses, and up to now we lack any decisive experimental test. As for the necessary duration of time* that would explain evolutionary diversity, not to mention the evolution of symbiotic systems, the time span that the synthetic theory supposedly indicates seems to be of an entirely different magnitude from the incredibly short duration of actual evolution. In the case of the “neutrality theory of molecular evolution” or the “non-Darwinian” theory of M. Kimura et al. (1971), which studies, in a selective manner, neutral enzymatic variants linked to vast phenomena of genetic drift, these expectations have hardly been confirmed by experiment. It seems therefore that no explanatory theory to date has received any real experimental confirmation.

c) Emergence of Man. The paleontology of the great apes shows the gradual emergence of species that by degrees reached modern man, according to a schema that fits naturally into the evolution of the species of animals. In western and southern Africa the hominoids must have clearly distinguished themselves from the other anthropoidal primates about five million years ago. The oldest known fossils belong to the group of Australopithecidae of the gracilis type—the robustus type appeared two and one-half million years ago, only to disappear about one million years ago. These hominoids had a bipedal gait and an upright stature, but were not of the genus Homo. The first hominids made their appearance in western Africa in the form of Homo habilis, of which there are fossils going back from 2.3 million to 1.6 million years. The latter was the first hominid to make stone tools. Then Homo erectus appeared, between 1.6 million to less than 300,000 years ago. Starting out from western Africa, this species seems to have colonized Asia (especially Java and China), then Europe. Discovered in Java in 1886 and at that time given the name “Pithecanthropus,” Homo erectus managed to master fire (indisputable traces of that advance are found in Chou-Kou-Tien, near Beijing, dating from more than 500,000 years ago). In turn, H. erectus would make way (by progressive transformation?) for Homo sapiens neanderthalis, with a big brain of 1,500 cubic centimeters. This species, which may go back as far as 200,000 years, lived for the most part in western Europe and the Middle East. The Neanderthals were the first to bury their dead (death*), this burial being accompanied by symbolic actions. Did these have a religious significance? About 35,000 years ago the Neanderthals vanished entirely to leave the way open for Homo sapiens sapiens or Cro-Magnon man, our present species. Our direct ancestors probably came from western Africa by way of Palestine—where remains have been dated from 100,000 years ago—to arrive in Europe 35,000 years ago, at the time of the extinction of the Neanderthals. The two populations, which must have lived alongside each other for a long time in the Middle East, do not seem ever to have interbred. All human beings living today are only of the sapiens sapiens type. They reached America and Australia around 25,000 years ago.

2. Philosophico-Theological Viewpoint

a) Definition of Man. In order to judge the theological impact of evolutionary theories, a precise definition of “human” is required. Indeed, the positivist or materialist prerequisites defined by certain varieties of evolutionary theory make them unacceptable to all Christian theology* and explain certain overreactions. Although Cartesian dualism hardly seems capable of solving the problem, a pure monism would reduce us, through evolution, to pure and simple animality, which is not really compatible with the status of being imago Dei (in the image of God). How can one achieve a common ground in the division between the biological view, by which we belong to the order of primates, and a “spiritual” view, which transcends the former in a real way? But, are not the biological data enough to define without arbitrariness at which point the human truly begins? In this area, none of the traditional criteria seems to be conclusive. The ownership of a connected and symbolic language seems to be one decisive factor, but leaves no fossil traces. And it remains to be seen whether the evolution of the species is sufficient to explain it.

According to G. Isaye (1987), whose research lies within the framework of a critical proof at the level of basic knowledge, it is possible to establish two specific characteristics peculiar to human beings, irreducible to biological materiality: first, the consciousness of moral obligation; and second, the possibility of proving, without entering a vicious circle, the first principles of knowledge (according to the Aristotelian argument of retortion). In this context biological evolution would provide only the material conditions for the possibility—necessary conditions, but not sufficient—of the advent of a conscious and free man. The mastery of language that makes possible the development of culture would then come to humanize the hominid that had been formed by this evolution, though this development is not accounted for convincingly by the physiological transformations that made it possible. For Christian theology, the imago Dei, the fruit of a specific creative act (creation*), would have appeared complete with language, which opened the way to consciousness and freedom (liberty*).

b) 19th-Century Conflict about the Concepts and Its 20th-Century Resolution. During the 19th century, in the absence of agreement on the definition of man, conflict about these concepts could not avoid a head-on collision. Despite A. R. Wallace’s very laudable efforts to make an appropriate distinction between the biological and cultural aspects of man, Darwin and his successors in fact developed a form of biological materialism contrary to the conceptions of all the Christian churches*. Militant agnostics such as T. H. Huxley (1825–95) and E. Haeckel (1834–1919) found themselves in heated argument with churchmen such as the Anglican bishop S. Wilberforce (1805–73), who were determined to defend the Christian faith*. Although there was no official condemnation from the Roman magisterium*, in 1860 the provincial council of Köln declared “transformism,” when applied to the human body, to be contrary to the Scriptures and to the Catholic faith. As for Vatican* I, it contented itself with serenely recalling that it was not possible for the truths of the faith and reason* to contradict each other (Dei Filius, chap. 4, DS 3015–20).

In the same period, a series of attempts were made to reach agreement, such as the one by S. G. J. Mivart (1827–1900) that aimed to reconcile science and the literal interpretation of the Bible*. These attempts were destined to fail for lack of respecting the differences on the two respective planes. In large measure the real solution to the crisis was to come, on the contrary, from the renewal of biblical studies that began in the nonrationalist Protestant circles of the end of the 19th century, then emerged later in the Catholic world with the works of Father M.-J. Lagrange (1855–1938). The differences in literary* genres in the Scriptures, the real character of biblical Revelation*, which is not at all the same as that of the natural sciences*, combined with a more precise evaluation of the latter, was to lead to the resolution of the conflict, sanctioned in the Catholic Church by the declarations of the magisterium—starting with Pius XII’s encyclical letter, Divino afflante Spiritu, about the principles of biblical exegesis*, continuing with various constitutions and declarations of Vatican* II, and up to John Paul II’s speech on 22 October 1996 at the Pontifical Academy of Sciences (OR, 29 October). Meanwhile, a book was published that was to be particularly important for the assimilation of evolutionary theory by Christian thought. The book was by Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, who deserves a brief discussion.

c) Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955). Quite contrary to his intentions, Teilhard found himself in the midst of interminable controversies. For a long time he was suspected of heterodoxy, or even of pantheism*. He was never officially condemned but found himself “invited” to publish nothing outside his field of scientific competence in the strict sense, and he has been badly served by the faulty interpretations of his admirers as much as of his adversaries. All in all, therefore, it is not easy to arrive at a balanced judgment on him, especially in a few lines. H. de Lubac* (1962) rightly proved his religious orthodoxy; but the fact remains that the philosophical community, just like that of the theologians, still refuses to recognize him as one of its own.

Having been admitted to the novitiate of the Society of Jesus in Jersey—where he had as a companion and friend Auguste Valensin, a disciple of Maurice Blondel*—Pierre Teilhard de Chardin was above all a scientist, geologist, and paleontologist, with a well-earned international reputation. He occupied the chair of geology at the Institut Catholique in Paris, following his thesis on the mammals of the high Eocene period (1922) and after having contributed in a decisive way to the discovery of the Homo erectus of Chou-Kou-Tien. But he could not help thinking about the essential philosophical and theological implications of such discoveries. Turning away from the overly abstract and deductive Scholastic* philosophy* that he had been taught during his ecclesiastical studies, Teilhard aimed to incorporate his evolutionist concepts into a cosmic vision of universal scope, conceived as a “hyperscience,” to draw together the irreversible growth of unity in complexity at all the “biface” levels of becoming of matter and of the mind. In this way he did indeed construct a realist cosmology, certainly more dogmatic* than critical: the law of complexity-consciousness, the ascending convergence where “differentiated unity” took on the function of the necessary engine.

Although he was familiar, especially through Edouard Le Roy (1870–1954), with the evolutionary theory of Bergson (1859–1941), which was extremely different from his own, Teilhard was indebted for certain essential aspects of his own thought to that of Blondel, brought to his attention by Auguste Valensin. Two interconnected aspects of it should be mentioned: first, the one beneath the ambiguity of the expression “panchritism,” linked to the Leibnizian hypothesis (Leibniz*) of the vinculum substantiale (substantial bond); second, Blondel’s dialectics of action, which Teilhard would transport to the more naturalist level in his Energétique intégrale de l’Univers. Although Teilhard thereby lost Blondel’s critical rigor, he brought evolutionary theory into Christian thought on an equal footing, a status that the former has continued to occupy to the present day.

- J.-B. de Lamarck (1809), La philosophie zoologique, Paris; (1972), Inédits, Paris.
- C. Darwin (1859), The Origin of Species.
- A. R. Wallace (1870), Contribution to the Theory of Natural Selection.
- J. Huxley (1942), Evolution, the Modern Synthesis, London.
- E. C. Messenger (Ed.) (1952), Theology and Evolution, London.
- D. L. Lack (1957), Evolutionary Theory and Christian Belief, London.
- P. G. Fothergill (1961), Evolution and Christians, New York.
- R. J. Nogar (1963), The Wisdom of Evolution, New York.
- M. Kimura, T. Ohta (1971), Theoretical Aspects of Population Genetics, Princeton.
- P.-P. Grassé (1973), L’évolution du vivant, Paris.
- F. C. Lewontin (1974), The Genetic Basis of Evolutionary Change, New York-London.
- E. Mayr (1974), Populations, espèces, évolution, Paris.
- F. Ayala (1976), Molecular Evolution, Sinauer.
- C. Petit, E. Zuckerkandl (1976), Évolution, Paris.
- P.-P. Grassé (1978), Biologie moléculaire, mutagenèse, évolution, Paris.

- M.J.D. White (1978), Modes of Speciation, Freeman.
 P.-P. Grassé (1980), L'homme en accusation, Paris.
 L. Szyfman (1982), Lamarck et son époque, Paris.
 J. Ruffié (1986), Traité du vivant, Paris.
 G. Isaye (1987), L'affirmation de l'être et les sciences positives, Ed. M. Leclerc, Paris-Namur.
 H. de Saint Blanquat (1987), Les premiers Français, Tournai.
 A. Scott (1988), The Creation of Life, Oxford.
 J. Reichholf (1990), Das Rätsel des Menschwerdung, Munich; (1992), Der Schöpferische Impuls, eine neue Sicht der Evolution, Munich.
 M. Denton (1992), Évolution, une théorie en crise, Paris.
 S. Parker (1992), L'aube de l'humanité, Fribourg.
 L. Duquesne de La Vinelle (1994), Du Big Bang à l'homme, Brussels.
 P. Tort (Ed.) (1996), Dictionnaire du darwinisme et de l'évolution, 3 vols., Paris.
 J. Arnould (1998), Dire la création après Darwin, Paris.
 G. Martelet (1998), Évolution et création, vol. I: Sens ou non-sens de l'homme dans la nature, Paris.
 ♦ P. Teilhard de Chardin (works published in Paris) (1955), Le

- phénomène humain*; (1956), L'apparition de l'homme;
 (1956), Le groupe zoologique humain; (1957), Le milieu divin;
 (1959), L'avenir de l'homme; (1962), L'énergie humaine;
 (1965), Science et Christ; (1965), Écrits du temps de guerre, 1916–1919;
 (1976), Le cœur de la matière; (1961), Lettres de voyage (1923–1955);
 (1974), Lettres intimes à Aug. Valensin, etc., 1919–1955;
 (1965), Blondel and Teilhard de Chardin, corresp. by H. de Lubac, Paris.
 C. Cuénot (1958), Teilhard de Chardin: Les grandes étapes de son évolution, Paris.
 H. de Lubac (1962), La pensée religieuse du P.T. de Chardin, Paris.
 M. Barthélemy-Madaule (1963), Bergson et T. de Chardin; (1967), La personne et le drame humain chez T. de Chardin, Paris.
 H. de Lubac (1968), L'éternel féminin, followed by T. de Chardin et notre temps, Paris.
 C. Cuénot (1972), Ce que T. de Chardin a vraiment dit, Paris.

MARC LECLERC

See also Adam; Exegesis; Sciences of Nature

Exegesis

Exegesis is a set of procedures for establishing the meaning of a text. The need for it arises whenever a text continues to arouse interest or to be regarded as important, as in the case of laws*, treaties, or literary classics. It is not a requirement of the text at the moment of composition: authors and drafters aspire to make their meaning perfectly clear. Nor is it a private transaction between text and individual reader, permitting an unlimited range of interpretation. It is a product of the needs of the community that makes use of or cherishes the text.

Exegesis is of particular importance in a religious community that bases its doctrine, its moral norms, and its spirituality on texts believed to be inspired. Such a community will have an interest both in the elaboration of procedures for finding hitherto unsuspected meanings and applications in the text, and also in the control of types of exegesis that might influence the beliefs and the conduct of its members. For this article, the relevant communities are a) Jewish, b) ecclesiastical, and c) academic.

a) Jewish Exegesis. In principle, all Jewish exegesis presupposes a body of scriptural texts that is fixed, canonical, and authoritative. In reality, the Hebrew Scriptures evolved over many centuries, and the need to bring exegesis to bear on their older parts is already apparent in its later ones. Laws originally relating to a variety of sanctuaries were reinterpreted as prescribing a single centralized cult* (Ex 20:24; Dt 12:5–14). Warnings and prophecies* originally directed to a particular moment of decision were perceived to apply to longer-term historical developments (Is 1–23, 24–27). Narratives* were rewritten to bring out the moral and religious significance of previously recorded history* (1 and 2 Sm; 1 and 2 Kgs; 1 and 2 Chr). One particular form of exegesis, found in writings classified in modern times as apocalyptic*, begins in Deuteronomy (9:1 f.) with the reinterpretation of former prophecies in the light of later events; it continued for several centuries after the close of the Hebrew canon*. It also inspired many of the sectarian writings preserved in the Dead Sea Scrolls. A notable example is the Habakkuk commentary (1QpHab), where the recurrent formula peshet could be rendered “the exegesis of this is.” In exegesis of this genre, the fulfillment of ancient prophecies is discerned in events of the present or the near future.

Exegesis of this kind, though not unknown in the Greco-Roman world, is peculiarly Jewish. A more international style was also practiced in Jewish communities, particularly in Alexandria and most notably in the voluminous works of Philo (c. 20 B.C.—A.D. 30). Its principal tool, allegorical interpretation, was already known in the pagan world (Theagenus [sixth to fifth centuries B.C.], the Stoics), and had, in part, a similar motivation. Read literally, the behavior of the gods in Homer could seem shocking to cultivated sensibilities; read as allegory, it could be found to convey important truths. Similarly, with the Hebrew Scriptures, the earthiness of many narratives and the apparently crude anthropomorphism* of much of the language about God could be a deterrent to pagan sympathizers and disquieting for reflective Jews. We do not know for certain to which of these categories Philo's readers belonged, but both would be reassured if allegorical exegesis could reveal a congruence between inspired writings and truths discerned through pagan philosophy*.

Yet there were limits to the use of this exegetical technique. Philo himself (De Migratione Abrahami, §89–93) criticizes those whose practice of allegorical interpretation led them to neglect those observances that gave the Jewish people their identity—Sabbaths*, dietary laws, and festivals. It was indeed as a corpus of law that the Hebrew Scriptures exercised their greatest influence over the Jewish people. The most characteristic form of Jewish exegesis was the continuous tradition, mostly transmitted orally until the second century A.D., of interpreting legal texts in such a way as to show their bearing on every new circumstance of personal and social life. This began in the time of Ezra, and finds its fullest development in the Mishnah and the Talmud. In Rabbinic literature, halakha—the correct way of “walking”—was the primary goal of scriptural exegesis. By the application of simple rules of logic, and by endlessly bringing one text to bear on the meaning of another, the sages aspired to give honor to their sacred law-book, the Torah. They deduced rules from it to govern every eventuality of contemporary life, and also extracted directives from it to authorize those aspects of the Jewish code of conduct that, although established by long usage, were not directly ordained in Scripture.

Not that this was the only form of exegesis practiced by the rabbis. There was more to Scripture than law and moral instruction: there were riches waiting for “investigation” (one of the meanings of the word midrash) that could lead to a deeper knowledge* of God and his will for human beings. By now, the Hebrew Scriptures were a closed system. All resources for their interpretation could be found within them.

Every detail had to be scrutinized for clues to a correct or more satisfying interpretation; any word or text within the canon could be used to elucidate any other; inconsistencies and obscurities could be resolved by minute comparison with other instances, regardless of original intention or context. However, attractive and endlessly creative though this nonlegal exegesis (haggada) might seem, halakha remained the paramount form of exegesis.

b) Ecclesiastical Exegesis. “These things took place as examples for us”: so Paul (1 Cor 10:6) describes the significance of a series of key events that befell the Israelites in the desert. For Paul, the word example is virtually synonymous with allegory (Gal 4:24), but it serves to convey the particular thrust of the new Christian exegesis of Old Testament texts. A new factor had appeared in history in the person* and achievement of Jesus Christ. Yet it was also not new, in that it could be found to have been foretold and prefigured in the Hebrew Scriptures. The truth* of the Christian claims for Jesus was confirmed by Old Testament “types” of his salvific destiny; by the same token, Christians now possessed an exegetical key with which to discern hitherto unsuspected meanings in scriptural texts. The congruence of Old Testament prophecies and “types” with the new realities experienced by Christians was a source of profound encouragement (paraklesis, Acts 13:15; Rom 15:4) and edification (2 Tm 3:15 f.).

This congruence was also an important resource for the defense of the new faith* against its enemies and critics. The bitter opposition of the synagogue was a factor in the life of the church for the first two centuries of its history. The claim that Jesus was the Messiah* of Jewish expectation, if it was to be made plausible to Jews, had to be presented as a fulfillment of the true meaning of Old Testament texts. Exegesis was therefore central to the debate. Christological interpretation became a staple feature of Christian anti-Jewish apologetic, not only of prophecies accepted as messianic by Jewish exegetes, but also of many other texts that now seemed to take on new meaning as prefigurations of Jesus' Passion*, death*, and Resurrection* (e.g., Ps 22, 118:22 f.; Is 53). Such an interpretation already formed the substance of the argument in Pseudo-Barnabas and Justin. With the exception of a very few authors, this typological or allegorical form of exegesis became a standard feature of Christian writing in the post-apostolic and patristic periods.

In the second century, the church was challenged not only by Judaism but also by Gnosticism (gnosis*): its elaborate speculative systems were supported by allegorical interpretations of Scripture that ranged far wider than those of Christian orthodoxy did. To combat this threat, it was necessary for Christian exegetes to impose limits on the use of allegory and to insist, sometimes on the literal meaning of the text, at other times on Christian allegories in opposition to those of the Gnostics. A notable instance is the interpretation by a number of Church Fathers* (Justin, Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, Theophilus of Antioch) of Genesis 1–3, which they tended to take as a straight record of fact by way of contesting the cosmological speculations of the Gnostics. In the writers of this period, we see already a tension between the need to find christological meanings in Old Testament texts, through the use of typological and allegorical techniques, and the need to oppose the exaggerated use of allegory by the heretics, through an insistence on the literal meaning of certain texts. This tension was to characterize exegesis throughout the patristic period and beyond. In the absence of any clear principle of hermeneutics* that could serve as a guide, these writers were ready to fall back on the principle, already enunciated in the New Testament (e.g., Ti 3:9 f.), that any exegesis not authorized by the church is heretical.

Thus far, Christian exegesis has been primarily a tool for other purposes: apologetics, catechesis*, liturgy*. With a commentary on John by the Valentinian heretic Heracleon (second century) and another, on Deuteronomy, by Hippolytus (204), a new form appeared that was to recur again and again in the patristic period, that of the consecutive commentary on a biblical text. In this new phase, the Bible* was seen not so much as a resource for establishing and defending the faith of Christians, as a treasury capable of yielding untold wealth for the faithful through the diligence of the skilled interpreter. Yet the same tension persisted between literal and nonliteral exegesis. In the case of the Old Testament, it was taken for granted that behind the literal meaning there lay at least one deeper or more edifying meaning. In the case of the New Testament, the literal meaning was more often taken as paramount, especially in opposition to Gnostic allegorizations, which tended to discount the historicity of the Gospels*. Nevertheless, some details, notably in the parables, received elaborate allegorical treatment. The possibilities of allegory were exploited with unrestrained brilliance by Clement († before 215) and Origen* in Alexandria. A more disciplined and literal approach was practiced by the school of Antioch* (Diodorus in the fourth century, Theodore of Mopsuestia [352–428], John Chrysostom*). Overall, however much or little importance was ascribed to the literal meaning, exegesis in the patristic period always rested upon the presupposition that, in almost every case, the true meaning of Scripture was to be found at a deeper level than that of a literal reading of the text. This conception of Scripture as a collection of divine oracles, of which the true sense must be elucidated by disciplined yet imaginative exegesis, remained fundamental until at least the end of the Middle Ages.

c) Scholarly Exegesis. One consequence of this preoccupation with nonliteral exegesis was the additional assumption that Scripture could be interpreted from within. No information was needed from outside, for the Bible itself held all the necessary clues for discerning the meaning of any passage. Not that exegetes had always been blind to the resources offered by linguistic or historical study: ever since Jerome (c. 347–419/20), there had been those who, despite the anti-Semitic prejudices of the church, saw the advantage of consulting Jewish scholars for the elucidation of difficult Old Testament texts. However, it was the influence of Renaissance scholarship that delivered the fatal blow to allegorical exegesis with the introduction of criteria and information from outside the Bible. One of the most frequently cited justifications for reading a text as an allegory was that its literal sense was unintelligible, unedifying, or absurd. However, if scholars could not find parallels or comparable instances in other ancient literature, this alleged strangeness could be shown to be illusory, and recourse to an allegorical interpretation appeared to be unjustified. A series of commentaries therefore began to appear, laden with the fruits of research into comparative material in pagan and Jewish literature. J. B. Lightfoot in England (Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, 1658–78), J. Wettstein in the Netherlands (Novum Testamentum Graecum, 1751–52), P. Billerbeck in Germany (H. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, 1922–28), J. Bonsirven in France (Textes rabbiniques... à l'intelligence du Nouveau Testament, 1955), and, most recently, S. Lachs in the United States (A Rabbinic Commentary on the New Testament, 1987) represent a type of commentary in which the progress of exegesis is related to the growth of knowledge about the ancient world. This knowledge was not confined to literature. Other disciplines also began to form essential parts of the exegete's equipment: archeology (e.g., in relation to Old Testament history or to the journeys of Saint Paul); philology (enlarging the possibilities of interpreting rare Hebrew words or applying knowledge of koine Greek, gained from papyrus finds, to New Testament texts); and, above all, historical research into neighboring cultures. This, in turn, had another very important consequence: exegesis ceased to be a task performed within and controlled by the church. It used resources and disciplines freely available in the academic world, and was practiced by scholars for whom freedom of inquiry took priority over scrupulous obedience to the church. Hence, the most rapid progress was made by Protestant exegetes. The difficulties caused for the Catholic Church by the tension between the authority of the magisterium* and the necessity to participate in the academic enterprise can be charted in a series of papal and conciliar pronouncements (e.g., Divino afflante Spiritu [1943], or the constitution Dei Verbum issued by Vatican* II [1965]), as well as in the struggles of conscience of Catholic scholars (M.-J. Lagrange [1855–1938] 1967; P. Grelot 1994). The official evaluation of exegetical methods in the Catholic Church document of 1993, The Interpretation of the Bible within the Church, published by the Pontifical Bible Commission, displays a more open approach, although it still insists upon the ultimate authority of the magisterium in all exegetical questions.

The exegetical use of nonbiblical sources is well represented by the “History of Religions” school (religionsgeschichtliche Schule), which included J. Weiss (1863–1914), W. Bousset (1865–1920), and H. Gunkel (1862–1932). This group of mainly German scholars argued that many features of New Testament religion are best explained as deriving from the influence of pagan Hellenistic religions. This view was fiercely criticized at the time, and was subsequently found to be valid, if at all, only in the case of the Old Testament, where the influence of Canaanite religion is undeniable. This led to a certain reaction in favor of intratextual exegesis: the Bible itself once again became the prime source of knowledge. Now, however, whereas allegorists had regarded oddities or inconsistencies in the text as signs of deeper meaning, modern critics saw them as indications of its preliterary history. The presence of two barely compatible Creation* stories in Genesis must be the result of a compiler working with material from more than one source. Inconsistency in the use of the divine name* YHWH versus Elohim indicated that material from different traditions had been amalgamated into a single text. By separating out these strands, it was possible to discern particular tendencies in each, as, for example, in the priestly(P) tradition, a marked interest in ritual matters.

In the early days of this “source criticism” (Old Testament: theory of the four documents, K. H. Graf [1866] and J. Wellhausen [1876–84]; New Testament: theory of the two sources, H. J. Holtzmann [1863], etc.), it was assumed that the underlying materials consisted of written documents (book*). Entirely new possibilities of interpretation followed the recognition that much of this material—laws, narratives, songs of worship—was first handed down by word of mouth. Studies of oral tradition in other cultures made it apparent that transmission required established forms (literary* genres) according to the circumstances in which the material was used. Laws, for example, generally tended to have a casuistic form when cited in law courts but an exhortatory or apodictic form when recited in worship. The coexistence of such forms was a sign that they originated in different “life-situations” (Sitz im Leben) in society*. These in turn could yield precious information about the religious and cultural history of the people.

The “history of forms” (Formgeschichte), as it came to be called, originated in the study of the Old Testament, and achieved notable success, for example, in H. Gunkel’s work on the Psalms* (Commentary, 1926; H. Gunkel and J. Begrich, Einleitung in die Psalmen, 1928–33). However, it had its greatest influence on the study of the gospels (M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, 1919; R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 1921). It was not difficult to notice that certain short sections of text (pericopae)—such as a saying, a parable*, or an account of an exorcism—occur in different contexts from one Gospel to another. It could then be inferred that each must have existed independently of any context before it was incorporated into a Gospel. The correct way to study a Gospel, therefore, was to see it, no longer as the literary or inspired creation of a single writer, but as an editorial compilation of small scraps that owed their preservation to a period of oral transmission. Examined separately, these pericopae were found to have a number of distinct forms. From these forms, and from the pattern of their distribution in the Gospels (some occurring more frequently than others), it was possible to infer their original Sitz im Leben, and hence the interests and concerns of the churches in which these materials had been preserved.

This attention to an assumed preliterary phase in the compilation of a Gospel in due course created an interest in the character of the final compiler. Was he simply an editor, doing the best he could with a mass of jumbled material? Or had he a mind of his own, and the capacity to impose a distinctive character on his narrative? By noticing the subtle changes that each evangelist appears to have made in the treatment of such an element (whenever this comparison is possible), and by discerning a pattern emerging in these changes such as might indicate a particular interest of the author, it seemed possible to build up a profile of each evangelist, and to regard them, no longer merely as competent editors, but as creative writers, even—the ultimate accolade—as “theologians” in their own right.

This procedure has been given the name Redaktionsgeschichte, the study of the stages and aims of redaction: W. Marxsen on Mark (1956), G. Bornkamm on Matthew (1948), H. Conzelmann on Luke: Die Mitte der Zeit (1953). Along with Formgeschichte, it has had two consequences that their first practitioners could hardly have foreseen. First, by directing attention away from the Gospel narratives (of Jesus) to the factors that have determined the present forms of these narratives—the concerns of the church (Formgeschichte) or the interest and skills of the evangelists (Redaktionsgeschichte)—they have relegated the “quest of the historical Jesus” to secondary status (cf. A. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede, 1906; E. Käsemann, ZThK 51, 1954; J.M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1959). Admittedly, the application of these critical methods had begun to cast doubt on the possibility of any reconstruction of “things concerning Jesus” that could claim to be historically reliable. Even the more critically sophisticated “new quest of the historical Jesus” characteristic of the third quarter of the 20th century yielded no scholarly consensus on which a generally accepted life of Jesus could be founded, even though it found reasons to challenge the extreme skepticism of the principal representatives of Formgeschichte. Today, many specialists seem ready to accept that the only proper focus of exegetical interest is to be found in the writers and the writings of the New Testament. Jesus, who wrote nothing and has allegedly been shown to be historically inaccessible, seems barely worthy of serious attention. The second consequence has been a notable narrowing, until recently, of the field of inquiry, to the extent that the gospels are interpreted mainly in terms of biblical texts and a relatively small range of intertestamental writings. The most influential representatives of Formgeschichte, M. Dibelius and R. Bultmann, brought to their task a wealth of knowledge derived from a thorough education in classical culture, supplemented by an extensive study of relevant Jewish writings. Their followers, not having had the advantage of such a broad culture, certainly developed their critical techniques to a fine point, but they had little that was new to bring to their exegesis. As a result, their work, being concentrated on ever smaller areas of disagreement, began to show signs of diminishing returns and to lose the confidence of those who rely on scholarly exegesis to strengthen and enrich the teaching and preaching* of the Christian faith.

This apparent alienation of critical exegesis from the needs of any community of the faithful was in part responsible for the movement known as “canonical criticism” (research on the function assigned to a text in the elaboration of a corpus intended to be complete—a canon). This was inspired, and is still mainly represented, by the work of B. Childs (see especially his Exodus, 1974). According to Childs, although the stages antecedent to the formation of a biblical text and the historicity of the events it refers to remain legitimate objects of study, a more important consideration for exegesis is the fact that the text forms part of the canon of Scripture, which evolved within a community of faith. Thus, the fact that the Exodus narrative was given a prime place in the structure of the Old Testament, and the fact that there are frequent references to it in other canonical texts, constitute for Childs at least as important a factor for the understanding and exegesis of the narrative as the conclusions of any historical inquiry into what may actually have happened, or any critical reconstruction of the way in which the biblical accounts reached their present form.

Canonical criticism has won respect, but has not gained wide acceptance (cf. J. Barr 1983). There was a danger that modern critical techniques might have the result of reducing the interest of exegesis to ever finer points of detail within a generally agreed paradigm of interpretation. This danger was to some extent averted by the arrival on the scene of disciplines developed in other fields. Despite the very small sample of evidence available in the New Testament, models of interpretation borrowed from sociology made it seem possible to reconstruct the social and economic conditions prevailing either in Old Testament times (Max Weber 1923) or in the milieu of Jesus and the early church (G. Theissen, ZThK 70, 245–71; W. Meeks, The First Urban Christians, 1983). Similarly, certain techniques of literary criticism could be used to direct exegesis more securely in the direction of the meaning and the impact originally intended by the author or implied by the structure of the text (structuralism and the set of methods inspired by the functioning of verbal ensembles: the journals Semeia or Sémiotique et Bible, and other publications of Centre pour l’analyse du discours religieux [CADIR], under the direction of J. Delorme, Lyon; D. Patte 1983). Research into the literary genres and rhetorical devices (J. Mulenburg 1968, G. Kennedy 1984, R. Meynet 1989) consciously or unconsciously used by ancient Greek authors could be used to elucidate the argument of, say, a Pauline letter.

However, even if these and other new arrivals have introduced some fresh air into the somewhat fetid space of modern biblical scholarship, it may be doubted whether they have yet fulfilled all the conditions for making great advances in exegesis in its wider sense. In and of itself, neither a sociological reconstruction of the biblical environment, nor a close analysis of literary form and structure, necessarily promotes understanding of the meaning of Scripture and its relevance for today. Many church members may be tempted to persist in the notion that exegesis has today become an exercise of interest only to scholars. It is no accident that, in many churches today, the most popular form of exegesis is one allegedly based on a “simple” reading of the text, without the encumbrance or the diversion of critical procedures. This approach makes a slogan out of the principle that “the meaning lies on the surface” (R. Gundry, Mark, 1993).

Research into the principles of interpretation has aroused new interest in modern times. Some exegetes have profited from the work of Hans Georg Gadamer and Paul Ricoeur, but probably the most significant, though less often recorded, influence on exegesis has been that of the sociology of knowledge (Jürgen Habermas 1987). Albert Schweitzer’s famous dictum that anyone seeking to reconstruct the life of Jesus is like a man looking down a deep well and seeing only a reflection of his own face has been found to apply far more widely. Modern theory of knowledge has called into question the possibility of an objective interpretation of any ancient text. Each culture, each generation, brings to the task its own presuppositions, its own priorities, and its own agenda. This has been brought to light in a particularly challenging way by liberation* theology (J. Miguez Bonino, Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age, 1975). In the past, almost without exception, exegetes have been persons of at least moderate education, personal security, and material well-being. Now, however, exegesis is also in the hands of scholars who have identified themselves and shared their lives with the poor, the oppressed, and the marginalized. Under their scrutiny, and in the light of their presuppositions and priorities, the texts can yield new meanings and new applications (Rowland and Corner 1990). The same goes for black, feminist, and Asian theologians (inculturation*), indeed for any group whose experience and worldview are different from those of people trained in a traditional theological environment. Each of these may develop a distinctive style of exegesis and challenge traditional interpretations; each in due course will reveal its own bias; all must renounce any claim to be able to provide a definitive reading of the sacred text. Exegesis can never be either halted or finalized. This work of continual exploration and revision is a sign of the vitality of the community of faith with which exegesis must engage.

- J. Guillet (1947), “Les exégèses d’Alexandrie et d’Antioche, conflit ou malentendu?” RSR 34, 257–302.
- H.J. Kraus (1956), Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments, Neukirchen.

- H.J. Kraus (1967), Au service de la Bible: Souvenirs personnels, Paris.
- Cambridge History of the Bible* 1 (Early Church) (1970), 412–53; 2 (Middle Ages) (1969), 155–219.
- W. Kümmel (1970), Das NT im 20. Jahrhundert: Ein Forschungsbericht, Stuttgart.
- R. Kieffer (1972), Essais de méthodologie néotestamentaire, Gleerup-Lund.
- J. F. A. Sawyer (1972), Semantics in Biblical Research, London.
- F. Dreyfus (1975), “Exégèse en Sorbonne, exégèse en Église,” RB 82, 321–59.
- Sémiotique et Bible: Bulletin d’études et d’échanges publié par le Centre d’analyse des discours religieux (CADIR)* (1975–), Lyons.
- G. Vermes (1975), “Bible and Midrash,” Post-Biblical Jewish Studies 59–91 (bibl.), Leyden.
- D. and A. Patte (1978), Structural Analysis: From Theory to Practice, Philadelphia.
- B. S. Childs (1979), Introduction to the Old Testament As Scripture, Philadelphia.
- B. de Margerie (1980–83), Introduction à l’histoire de l’exégèse, 3 vols., Paris.
- A. Gibson (1981), Biblical Semantic Logic: A Preliminary Analysis, Oxford.
- M. Simonetti (1981), Profilo storico dell’esegesi patristica, Rome.
- J. Barr (1983), Holy Scripture: Canon, Authority, Criticism, Oxford.
- J. Barton (1984), Reading the OT: Methods in Biblical Study, London.
- M.-A. Chevallier (1984), L’exégèse du Nouveau Testament: Initiation à la méthode, Geneva.
- M. Fishbane (1985), Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel, Oxford.
- P. Guillemette, M. Brisebois (1987), Introduction aux méthodes historico-critiques, Québec.
- A. de Pury (Ed.) (1989), Le Pentateuque en question: Les origines et la composition des cinq premiers livres de la Bible à la lumière des recherches récentes, Geneva.
- B. Holmberg (1990), Sociology and the New Testament: An Appraisal, Minneapolis.
- C. Rowland, M. Corner (1990), Liberating Exegesis, London.
- J. Delorme (1992), “Sémiotique,” DBS 12, 281–333 (important bibl.).
- C. Coulot (Ed.) (1994), Exégèse et herméneutique: Comment lire la Bible? Paris.
- P. Grelot (1994), Combats pour la Bible en Église, Paris.
- P. Ricoeur (1994), Lectures 3: Aux frontières de la philosophie, Paris.

ANTHONY E. HARVEY

See also Bible; Biblical Theology; Book; Fathers of the Church; Fundamentalism; Gospels; Hermeneutics; History; Holy Scripture; Jesus, Historical; Literary Genres in Scripture; Magisterium; Narrative Theology; Scripture, Senses of; Tradition; Translations of the Bible, Ancient

Exemplarism. See Bonaventure

Exinanition. See Kenosis

Existence of God, Proofs of

By “proofs of the existence of God” is meant the totality of the intellectual procedures by which human reason* strives to affirm God*. They lie within a theological tradition* (particularly vibrant within Catholicism*) that derives in part from the Scriptures (above all Rom 1:18–25, which takes up Wis 13:1–9). The First Vatican* Council reiterated that “God, the source and end of all things, may be known with certainty by the natural light of human reason on the basis of created things” (Dei Filius). The antimodernist oath would subsequently reinforce this affirmation: if God could be known with certainty (cognosci potest), it followed that he could also be demonstrated (demonstrari potest) by “the visible works of the creation*, as a cause by its effects.” In the most general sense, the historical development of proofs of the existence of God is probably inseparable from the impulse that faith* imparts to human intelligence in its search for truth*.

1. History of the Proofs

a) Proofs of the existence of God have a prehistory in ancient thought. To justify the belief in the gods, Plato took up the lessons of Socrates—echoed in Xenophon’s Memorabilia (I, 4 and IV, 3)—and of a whole earlier body of literature, in particular Diogenes of Apollonia; he mentioned or developed at least three arguments based on the antecedence of the “self-moving” soul, the regular order of the universe and the universal consent of the races of humanity (see Laws

XII, 966 e, as well as the Philebus, the Sophists, the Phaedrus and the Timaeus for the first two arguments, and Laws X, 886 for the third). But it was above all the themes of the hierarchy of beings and of the universe of the Forms, which, reinterpreted in particular by Augustine* and Anselm*, would leave their mark on the formulation of proofs of the existence of God.

In his Physics VII-VIII and Metaphysics, Λ , Aristotle advanced an argument that would find great success: a consideration of movement led him to posit the existence of an “unmoved mover.” While the Physics defines this only in a negative sense, the Metaphysics conceives it positively as something living and intelligent ($\Lambda 7$, 1072 a, 20–25). This immobile prime mover, which moves all things in a desirable and good* manner, as a final cause, being both life and intelligence, is God, a thought that thinks itself and rejoices in itself. God is an eternal and perfect living being (ibid., 1072 b, 27–30).

Alongside Plato and Aristotle, mention may be made of Cicero, not so much for the originality of his thought as for the influence he exerted through his De natura deorum, his De oratore, and Macrobius’s commentary on Cicero’s Dream of Scipio. For example, one of the first dialectical arguments developed during the Middle Ages, that of Candidus of Fulda, makes use of the ideas of Chrysippus as set forth in the De natura deorum (II, VI), combining them with the Augustinian hierarchy of being*, life, and thought (Dicta Candidi).

b) The movement of Augustinian thought, as presented in the De libero arbitrio and the De vera religione (two texts strongly inspired by Plotinus), approaches God in two stages: ab exterioribus ad interiora and ab inferioribus ad superiora or, as Gilson glosses it, “from that which is inferior in interior things to the higher realities.” The De libero arbitrio, after reiterating that “we must first believe the great and divine truths that we wish to understand” (1. II, II, 6), offers a series of arguments whose power to prove rests on reason.

The point of departure of the proof is the certainty of having a personal existence and the breaking down of this into existence, life, and intelligence, thus establishing three properties of the human individual. The best of the three, which belongs to humanity alone, is the starting point for a new progression—from the external senses (which apprehend perceptible qualities) and the inner sense (which perceives and judges the external senses) to reason itself (which judges the inner sense). Reason is the best part of human nature, and it is on the basis of reason that the question of God can be posed. However, a difficulty is raised by Evodius: “If I am able to discover something better than what is best in my own nature, I will not immediately label it God. For it seems to me that I should name as God not the being to whom my reason is inferior, but him to whom nobody is superior.”

Augustine attempts to resolve this by showing that, if “by itself reason perceives something eternal” and immutable, then it must “recognize at the same time that it is inferior to this being and that this being is its God” (ibid., VI. 14). This thing that goes beyond reason, this thing independent of the soul, and which rules and transcends it, is the eternal, immutable, and necessary Truth; and the Truth, recognized in this way, testifies to the existence of God. It is therefore enough to go inside oneself to discover the Truth, that is to say God.

Augustinianism* permeated the whole of medieval theology, and is particularly noticeable in the work of Anselm. Reviving the Platonic approach to the Forms, the Monologion uses the experience* of good things, of great things, and of things that are, to affirm the existence of a being preeminent in Good, Being and Greatness, and one through whom all other things are good and great. Nevertheless, what posterity has undoubtedly retained is the sole argument of the Proslogion. Its simple formulation needs to be set out with precision.

The fool, he who has said in his heart that “God does not exist,” must nonetheless recognize that he has in his heart aliquid quo nihil maius cogitari potest (something than which nothing greater can be conceived).

Now this being than whom nothing greater can be conceived (“the unsurpassable,” C. Hartshorne) cannot reside in the intelligence alone—indeed intelligence can conceive of a being who would reside both in the intelligence and in reality; and hence id quo maius cogitari non potest would not correspond to his conception if he resided only in intelligence and not in reality. It is impossible, without contradiction, to conceive of a being than whom “nothing greater can be conceived” but who exists in the intelligence alone: in this case he would not in fact be the being than whom nothing greater can be conceived. The negative premise of the argument is essential: Anselm says explicitly, in response to Gaunilo, that the argument would not be immediately conclusive if the premise were affirmative and if the name* of God from which one began were “that which is greater than everything” (Quod est maius omnibus).

In his reassertion of Anselm’s argument, in particular in the disputed questions De mysterio Trinitatis, Bonaventure* sees it as “an absolutely evident truth” that the “first and supreme [Being] exists” (q. 1, a. 1, concl.). This obviousness, granted to the soul that allows itself to be purified by faith and lifted up by grace*, is not an intuition of the divine essence, but rather a contuition of its necessary presence in the creation. The Itinerarium mentis in Deum, meanwhile, places intellectual reflection in the context of a spiritual quest, where it becomes less a matter of proving the existence of God than of lifting the soul toward him to the point of mystical experience. Thus, just as the six days of the Creation were followed by a seventh day of rest, six illuminations, or enlightenments, prepare the way for the loving contemplation* of the Trinity*.

Thomas* Aquinas, who distinguished more clearly between the mystery* of the life of the Trinity and the considerations relating to the principle, denied Anselm’s argument the status of a proof. The existence of God was not evident to us; it had to be demonstrated, which presumed that it was actually demonstrable. The proof (probari) was to be effected by five means.

The first part of the process was as follows. Since everything that moves is moved by something else, if the source of the movement moves in turn, then it must be moved by something else; as it is impossible to carry on in this way to infinity, it is necessary to arrive at a prime mover that is not in itself moved; this prime mover is God. The second method refers to the concept of the efficient cause: it is necessary to suppose a first cause, for fear of doing away with the whole system of causes and effects, since no cause can be its own cause. The third method is based on the analysis of the possible and the necessary: if the possible refers to that which can either be or not be, then there cannot exist the possible alone, but some necessity must be allowed in things; and since infinite regression is impossible among necessary things in other fields, so there must be recognized a thing necessary of itself, which is God. The fourth method proceeds by way of the degrees to be observed in things: the more or less good, the more or less true, the more or less noble, are all assessed against the supremely Good, the supremely True, and the supremely Noble, which is also supreme in terms of Being, and which is God. Finally the fifth method approaches God by considering the ordering of things: there is in the world an intelligent Being who guides those things that lack understanding toward their purpose, which is the Good.

A. Wohlmann (1988) has pointed out that Aquinas's first three methods correspond to the first three speculations of Maimonides. Maimonides served as a link between Aquinas and Avicenna. It was Avicenna who had originally developed the concepts of the possible and the necessary later employed by the two thinkers. Equally, the importance in the history of the proofs of the existence of God of Averroes, who was the commentator par excellence of Aristotle and a critic of Avicenna, should not be overlooked.

For Duns* Scotus, as for Aquinas, the proposition "God is" was self-evident, but its obviousness escaped human beings because they lacked a distinct understanding of its terms. It was therefore necessary to prove the proposition. Scotus's proofs, as presented in the Opus Oxoniense and the Tractatus de Primo principio (probably among the last works of the Doctor subtilis), are proofs a posteriori (even though they proceed more geometrico), but in a different sense to those of Aquinas. Scotus takes as his starting point the metaphysical properties of being given by experience, in other words not its particular contingent properties but the conditions of its possibility—what Scotus calls "quiddity," or the possible-real. There is an essential order in things that expresses the intelligibility of the existing order while depending on it, and it is on this essential order that Scotus relies. In metaphysical terms, God is considered as the infinite* Being. The proof of God, the demonstration of the existence of an infinite Being, is therefore developed in two stages. One must first prove the existence of a first Being, and then prove that this first Being is infinite. To these two stages is added a final proof, based on the primacy of the infinite Being's will and liberty*. Three arguments borrowed from the analysis of the causal order (efficient causality, final causality, and order of eminence) lead to the affirmation of the first Being. Then, seven arguments referring to the nature of the intellect, the simplicity of the essence, eminence, finality, and efficiency enable Scotus to establish that this singular Being, who is primary, is in fact infinite.

c) Mainstream philosophy*, by developing the proofs of the existence of God into a purely rational form of argument, was to separate (or at least would claim to separate) metaphysics from any theological preconception. Descartes*'s Méditations advances three arguments in which the idea of God, considered as an innate idea, plays a fundamental, though in each case a slightly different, role. The third Méditation proceeds back from the idea of God as a supremely perfect and infinite Being to the being of God as its necessary cause; and then from the contingent being who conceives the idea of God to God as the Being who creates that contingent being and keeps him in existence. The fifth Méditation relies on the model of mathematical truth, and shows that existence, which is a perfection, belongs of necessity to the essence of the supremely perfect Being. Leibniz* would consider completing Descartes's proof by showing that the idea of God is a genuine one: the uncontradictory nature of the divine attributes* made it possible to establish that God was a possible being and consequently that he existed, since Deus est ens ex cujus essentia sequitur existentia.

Leibniz also offered a priori as well as a posteriori proofs. The Theodicy, which sees in God the final reason of a contingent world, singles out the attributes—understanding, will, and power—of a personal God whose perfection is not only metaphysical but also moral. The Monadology approaches God from the perspective of the possible, emphasizing that God is the actual condition of what is real within the possible (§43). In his pre-Critique period, Kant* would take up this argument and reflect upon the One Possible Basis for a Demonstration of the Existence of God, without perhaps giving sufficient consideration to Leibniz's concept of the reality of possibility.

By bringing out the speculative character of the proofs and claiming to establish their invalidity, the Kantian critique caused a decisive break in the history of proofs of the existence of God. On the one hand Kant underlined the systematic linking of the proofs (physico-theological, cosmological, and ontological) and applied his term "ontological" to the argument a priori. On the other hand he showed that the validity of the proofs was dependent on the ontological proof, which was itself invalid. There was no passage from essence to existence, or from concept to being, and it was not enough for God to be possible in order for him to exist, since existence is not a real attribute. The Critique of Practical Reason would nonetheless posit the existence of God as a postulate of moral reason: the will, in the ethical sense of the word, requires the possibility of a Supreme Good in the world. The Opus postumum was perhaps to go further, linking the affirmation of God directly to the categorical imperative (fascicle VII).

Hegel*, who toward the end of his life devoted some Lessons to the Proofs of the Existence of God, submitted Kant's critique of the speculative proofs to severe criticism. Hegel did not limit himself to reestablishing the metaphysical significance of the classical argumentation; he attempted to endow it with a new meaning. He therefore asserted that the cosmological proof contained no paralogism and did not assume the ontological proof; but, in order to be entirely convincing, the cosmological proof did assume two steps (being is infinite, and the infinite is) whose necessary connectedness referred to the nature of the Concept properly understood, in accordance with a speculative logic. He further asserted that the criticisms Kant had aimed at the physico-theological argument were baseless, if the end and the absolute Good were understood as Spirit. Finally, regarding the ontological argument, a genuine proof that transcended the many finite proofs, Hegel showed that the proof was as one with the development of the Concept itself, in that it provides its own definitions and its own objectivity. With the ontological proof we come to understand the activity of the Concept that eternally gives itself being and life. And by contemplating the idea of God in the ether of pure thought, Logic—which is as one with metaphysical theology—is revealed as the absolute discourse, in other words the discourse of the Absolute, which raises contradictions only to uphold and transcend them.

Schelling* reflected on the meaning of the ontological argument throughout his philosophical career, and offered an interesting clarification in his Philosophy of Revelation. He distinguishes what is irrefutable in the ontological argument—the “necessarily existent, insofar as it is nothing but this,” in other words, the existent needs no proof of its existence—and what is contestable, which is the fact that God exists. Schelling does not then set out to prove God's existence by beginning with the concept of God, but rather to see how “one may arrive at the divinity by beginning with the existent pure and simple.” The presupposition (prius) of Schelling's God is the act (actus); thus his divinity is seen to reside in power, the potentia universalis, and he is consequently revealed as the Super-Being, the Lord of existence (SW XIII, 159–60). In tandem with his distinction between rational or negative philosophy and positive philosophy, Schelling's line of reasoning thus inverts the ontological argument in two linked steps. In terms of negative philosophy the Supreme Being, if he exists, must be taken as the necessary existent; and in terms of positive philosophy, the necessary existent must be regarded (not of necessity but in fact) as the Being existing necessarily in a necessary manner, in other words, God. So positive philosophy opens the way to a philosophy of revelation. It reaches its fulfillment in an understanding of singular existence that goes beyond what can be comprehended by pure reason and by virtue of conceptual necessity alone.

d) Among contemporary thinkers, two authors have renewed the philosophical tradition. H. Duméry (1957) used technical concepts from Husserl's phenomenology in a revival of the Neoplatonist tradition. For Duméry, the mind's elevation toward God is not of the order of proof but rather of reduction. Reduction is “an act or movement that aims to cut across the various levels of consciousness in order gradually to arrive at their foundation.” This regression is not uniform. Indeed, Husserl distinguishes between eidetic reduction, phenomenological reduction, and constituent reduction. But this last transcendental gesture itself, while constituent and productive of essences, is not the final instance, since it is both one and multiple. A final reduction is therefore needed, which may be termed “henological,” and which gives the Principle, the ordinal One, beyond all determination. Reduction expresses the spiritual need for a pursuit of simplicity and unity. Here Husserl is in agreement with Plotinus.

This search for an indeterminate Absolute, taken up from Neoplatonism, was to find its most incisive critic in C. Bruaire (1964 and 1974), the author of a profound reworking of the ontological proof, for whom negative* theology came close to a negation of theology. According to Bruaire, the affirmation of God is demanded by the very logic of existence and arises once man understands that the desire to be God, which leads him to death* and annihilation, must be transformed into a desire for God, expressed in expectation and invocation. And this desire for God, formulated in terms addressed to God, is in turn conditioned by a language of God: in other words, by the discovery of a God able to express and reveal himself, and whose naming within philosophical discourse marks the limit of philosophy as such.

R. Swinburne (1979) is more concerned to maintain some contact with the scientific practice and meaning of proof, and attempts to assess the proofs of the existence of God in terms of the standards of the logic of proof. He bases his approach on the formalization of procedures for measuring the probability of a hypothesis (confirming or invalidating it) and develops the idea of a balancing of the cumulative effects of the different inductive arguments. If one considers the cumulative probability of the various arguments (cosmological, teleological, moral, etc.), putting to one side the counterarguments (e.g., the existence of evil*), it becomes clear, on the one hand, that a personalist explanation is required, to the extent that a purely scientific explanation is incapable of explaining why the laws of the universe are as they are, and, on the other hand, that the existence of a Creator God is more probable than any other personalist explanation of the universe. The explanatory force of theism is thus superior to that of any scientific hypothesis. Measured in the light of the epistemology of the experimental sciences, the a posteriori proofs of the existence of God stand up well to the criticism. The affirmation of God, as an explanatory hypothesis, has as much objective probability as the generally accepted scientific hypotheses.

2. Logic of the Proofs

a) The word proof denotes in judicial terms the establishing of a fact, in the experimental sciences the verification of a hypothesis, and in mathematics the demonstration of a theorem. "Proofs of the existence of God" can be taken in any of these three senses. Empirical investigation, the experimental method, and rational deduction constitute three methods of proof that make the affirmation of God probable or necessary. Swinburne does not consider deductive proof but restricts himself to a posteriori arguments. Insofar as he interprets induction according to the rules of experimental verification, he is led back to positivism and overlooks, in the sciences* of nature themselves, the epistemological limitations of empirical proof.

On the one hand, the development of any empirical proof already goes beyond sensory experience and its content. Kant recognized this when he attempted to invalidate a posteriori proofs, even though conceptual thought is always preceded by a movement of transcendence that makes it possible: the exercise of language. On the other hand, the taking as axiomatic of physical hypotheses and theoretical representations actually leads scientific thought to go beyond induction and the purely experimental method.

If mathematical deduction is the highest form of scientific proof, it might be supposed that the most significant proof of the existence of God would take a mathematical and a priori form, such as the formulation attempted by the ontological proof. The analysis of formal systems has nonetheless made it possible to establish rigorously what philosophy has known since Aristotle's time—that any theory of demonstration necessarily refers to undemonstrable principles. The most rigorous scientific proof can justify neither its presuppositions nor its method, and consequently cannot be taken as a model for metaphysical proof. Proofs of the existence of God cannot therefore be proofs in the usual sense of the term; they are not lesser proofs, but aim higher. The proofs here considered are insufficient as proofs but not as proofs of God. Indeed a proof of the existence of God cannot but refer to the linguistic resources required for a general proof to be possible. Thus Hegel's critique of Kant presupposes that the linguistic resources employed are those of speculative thought, which uses and goes beyond the contradictions of finite understanding. The proof of the existence of God then becomes the very logic of absolute discourse, the circular movement of the Concept determining itself by its own negativity and, as did the Logic, transcending metaphysics and theology. Substance, transformed into Subject, is realized and expressed as Totality.

b) This conclusion, though strictly Hegelian, probably does not do full justice to Hegel's project. The Philosophy of Religion argues that the ontological proof, the proof par excellence, is the translation into metaphysics of the Christian conception of God. The ontological argument implies the truth of the Christian revelation: God is Spirit, presenting himself freely and fulfilling himself in the action by which he becomes manifest. K. Barth* (1931) has clearly established that the historical sense of Anselm's argument presumed an adherence to the Word* of God. If Anselm was able to recognize and prove the existence of God, this was because he philosophized from the standpoint of faith, because "God permitted him to know him and because he was able to know God" (GA II, p.158). With Hegel this historical truth becomes a speculative proposition: the ternary structure of the Logic expresses God's Trinitarian existence as revealed in history*. But while this is the case for Hegel, the contingency of revelation and the essential duality of reason should perhaps be accorded more recognition than he gives them. Indeed, if there is "revelation," it can only be conceived of as a radical act of liberty, manifest within creation and able to be apprehended by the intelligence. God's supreme liberty is in fact constantly presupposed by the Christian affirmation, according to which God simultaneously both reveals and conceals himself within his revelation. When Schelling distinguishes between negative and positive philosophy (whatever the meaning that he assigns to this distinction might be), he clearly shows that intelligence and its sources have a dual structure. In affirming the existence of God, reason combines two intersecting movements. There is the upward movement of an intelligence seeking to make sure of its purpose in the necessary Being, driven by the desire to go beyond all limits. Then there is a downward movement by means of which the intelligence receives the Word* of an Absolute that freely determines, distinguishes, and objectifies itself. Proof then takes the form of allowing the divine liberty to unfold and fulfill itself within the human mind. In a world that contains the vestiges (traces*) of the Creator, man, the image of God, is able to receive his Word as a supreme gift. Blondel, who in L'Action saw the ontological argument as the Trinity's approach to us, was reluctant to close the circle of thought into a definitive discourse.

c) The concept of the proof of the existence of God can be subjected to a twofold criticism. The idea of proof is incompatible with the object of theology, which is not precisely an object, while existence, not being a real attribute, is not susceptible of proof. There is an answer to these objections: on the one hand, proof in this instance is more than a proof, in the sense of a definite process; and on the other hand, existence is the affirmation of a freedom that defines its own right and expresses itself in a particular language. Proof is always preceded by the movement of speech, and speech is the very word of liberty. A foundational act, speech does not contain totality as a completed and closed totality, but as the horizon of a transcendence. And by situating the totality of conceptual definitions in a movement that engages with the perceptible in order to put it into perspective, and detaches itself from the perceptible in order to consider it, speech contains the possibility of a metaphysical discourse aware both of its limits and of the infinity of which it is composed.

Lévi-Strauss's reflections on language (1950) are all the more interesting in that they seem removed from any preoccupation with metaphysics. He opposes "symbolism," which "is characteristically discontinuous," and "knowledge," which is "characterized by continuity," showing how "the two categories of the signifier and the signified came to be constituted simultaneously and interdependently, as complementary units; whereas knowledge, that is, the intellectual process that enables us to identify certain aspects of the signifier and certain aspects of the signified... only got started very slowly."

It is thus a characteristic of the symbolic thought at work in our natural languages that there should be a permanent disparity between signifier and signified, resulting from "a superabundance of signifier," a "surplus of signification." This excess, which bears on the exercise of thought as expressed in speech, can be encompassed only by the "divine understanding." G. Fessard's commentary on these passages (1984) locates in this disparity between the two complementary units of signifier and signified the basis for a metaphysics of language in which the floating signifier—the symbolizing power at work in all language—expresses and brings into play a transcendental, supernatural* dimension. This dimension goes beyond both nature and humankind in such a way that, in order to conceive of the link between humanity and nature, Lévi-Strauss is inevitably drawn to invoke divine understanding: God as the perfect unity of Being (signifier) and Thought (signified). Thus the least judgment expressed by means of language "contains an ontological argument." In the most insignificant speech act, which opens onto an infinite dialogue, language situates in God not merely the formal but the real condition of its exercise. I speak, therefore God is. God, engaged in the destiny of Speech, can be said by whomever seeks him in Creation, and can speak himself to humankind in the context of a story that becomes meaningful. The proof of God is the intersection or "the cross" of this double utterance.

- É. Gilson (1922), La philosophie au Moyen Age, Paris.
- K. Barth (1931), Fides quaerens intellectum: Anselms Beweis der Existenz Gottes im Zusammenhang seines theologischen Programms, GA II, Zurich, 1981.
- É. Gilson (1949), Introduction à saint Augustin, Paris.
- C. Lévi-Strauss (1950), "Introduction à l'œuvre de Marcel Mauss," in M. Mauss, Sociologie et Anthropologie, Paris (2nd Ed. 1968), IX-LII. (English trans., Introduction to the Work of Marcel Mauss, Tr. Felicity Baker, London, 1987.)
- É. Gilson (1952), Jean Duns Scot: Introduction à ses positions fondamentales, Paris.
- H. Duméry (1957), Le problème de Dieu en philosophie de la religion, Bruges.
- D. Henrich (1960), Der ontologische Gottesbeweis, Tübingen.
- C. Bruaire (1964), L'affirmation de Dieu: Essai sur la logique de l'existence, Paris.
- A. Plantinga (1967), God and Other Minds: A Study of the Rational Justification of Belief in God, Ithaca-London (6th Ed. 1990).
- J. Moreau (1971), Le Dieu des philosophes, Paris.
- J. Vuillemin (1971), Le Dieu d'Anselme et les apparences de la Raison, Paris.
- A. Dies (1972), Autour de Platon, Paris.
- C. Bruaire (1974), Le Droit de Dieu, Paris.
- R. Swinburne (1977), The Coherence of Theism, Oxford.
- R. Swinburne (1979), The Existence of God, Oxford.
- J. Mackie (1982), The Miracle of Theism: Arguments for and against the Existence of God, Oxford.
- G. Fessard (1984), La dialectique des exercices spirituels de saint Ignace, vol. 3: Symbolisme et historicité, Paris-Namur, 115–212, 494–513.
- N. Samuelson, et al. (1984), "Gottesbeweise," TRE 13, 708–84 (bibl.).
- D. Braine (1988), The Reality of Time and the Existence of God: The Project of Proving God's Existence, Oxford.

- A. Wohlman (1988), Thomas d'Aquin et Maïmonide: Un dialogue exemplaire, Paris.
B. Sève (1994), La question philosophique de l'existence de Dieu, Paris.
E. Scribano (1994), L'esistenza di Dio: Storia della prova ontologica da Descartes a Kant, Bari.
O. Muck, F. Ricken (1995), "Gottesbeweise," LThK 4, 878–86.

- J. Seifert (1996), Gott als Gottesbeweis: Eine phänomenologische Neubegründung des ontologischen Arguments, Heidelberg.
R. Messer (1997), Does God's Existence Need Proof? Oxford.

PAUL OLIVIER

See also Knowledge of God; Natural Theology; Philosophy; Reason; Revelation; Truth

Exorcism

From the Greek exorkizô (to ward off), "to exorcise" means to avert a devil by warding it off with signs of divine power: the name* of God*, the sign of the cross, laying on of hands, holy water, and so forth. "Imperative" exorcisms contain injunctions addressed to the demon; "deprecating" exorcisms are prayers* asking God to ward off an evil*, whether personified or not. A distinction can be made between the following kinds of exorcisms: baptismal exorcisms practiced on catechumens (baptism*); ancient exorcisms of inanimate objects (blessing*); exorcisms of the possessed, that is, of individuals considered to be invaded by a devil. Exorcisms are practically absent from the Old Testament; in the New Testament, the curing of possessed individuals by Jesus*—in a nonritual manner—are signs of his divine filiation* and of the coming of the rule of God (e.g., Mt 8:16 f., 12:28, 28–34). Frequent in the early church*, the practice of exorcism became scarce following abuses, criticisms, and changes in perception of the world.

Catholics and the Orthodox have never abandoned exorcism, but only the Catholic Church has a liturgical and canonical codification to set the norms of sacramental exorcism (sacrament*). Protestants have a wide variety of approaches concerning this matter. Exorcism is particularly frequent in the milieus of a fundamentalist or Pentecostal type, and in those milieus that are permeated by magic; its pertinence and its modalities remain the object of theological discussions.

The understanding of exorcism is closely linked to anthropology* and to soteriology (salvation*). Deliverance from evil, in all its dimensions, touches on the essence of Christianity: it is thus the church's duty to make salvation known to all those who are possessed by a spiritual conflict related to their psychosomatic condition, and which they cannot overcome through their own resources (recovery). Exorcism must be attentive to the modalities of incarnation* and grace*, and, more precisely, to inculturation* and the specific articulation—without confusion or exclusion—of the psychological and the spiritual.

- W. Kasper, K. Lehmann (Ed.) (1978), Teufel, Dämonen, Bessessenheit, Mayence.
- H. A. Kelly (1985), The Devil at Baptism, Ithaca.
- A. Vergote (1992), "Anthropologie du diable: L'homme séduit en proie aux puissances ténébreuses," in coll., Figures du démoniaque hier et aujourd'hui, Brussels, 83–110.
- D. Trunk (1994), Der messianische Heiler, Freiburg.
- M. Ott, et al. (1995), "Exorzismus," LThK 3, 1125–28.
- P. Dondelinger (1997), L'exorcisme des possédés selon le Rituel romain, Paris.

PATRICK DONDELINGER

See also Demons; Healing

Experience

a) Concept. As a primitive, fundamental fact, experience is contact with the real, a condition of all knowledge and all action. This contact must be distinguished from the knowledge that results from it (empeiria, Er-fahrung), as well as from the experiences acquired from ordinary living (Erlebnis) and from the experiment guided by particular inquiry or hypothesis (experiment). Certain scholars (Jankélévitch, Dufrenne) propose a distinction between empirical and meta-empirical, with the former designating the everyday course of life, the latter that which unexpectedly perturbs it, such as grace or inspiration.

As contact, experience is consciousness of a relationship with the world, with the other, with God*—of an encounter with otherness. More than simple knowledge, experience means to sense, feel, and perceive. But while the world is unconscious of itself and of the individual, the experience of the other implies an exchange of incarnated consciousness.

Aristotle stressed that experience is memory: like knowledge, it is born of a stock of manifold perceptions (Metaphysica I, 1). Experience condenses the “experiences of consciousness,” transcends their duration, anticipates the event, recognizes it in the moment, and comes back through memory and thought. It is not true experience unless there is the possibility of reflective return: death*, the suppression of that possible reflection, is not an experience.

Furthermore, I must be involved in duration through my body. The experience of one’s body (cenesthesia, kinesthesia, diverse sensations, pleasure, sorrow, etc.) underlies and conditions all experience of others, of the world, and even of God.

Experience as a whole has a yet more profound condition: the presence of the self to the self that constitutes consciousness. But this is not something that is present in its perfection from the outset: rather, it continues to grow through external experience. Otherness promotes consciousness of the self.

Therefore, despite the diverse forms of empiricism, experience is not mere endurance, a pure state of submission. Yet idealism tends only to see a spontaneity, a creation of the mind: if the only reality is the mind, experience is reduced to the experience of the self and its representations. In such a perspective, otherness constitutes an insoluble problem. In fact, experience is both reception and creation, acceptance and spontaneity in indefinitely variable proportions.

Mouroux (1952) distinguished several degrees of depth in experience. The empirical designates an experience that is undergone without critical reflection. The experimental experience is challenged by the experimenter, who coordinates elements of experience in order to constitute science. The experiential marks the most complete commitment of the person*; the person abandons himself to it along with his being* and his resources, his reflection and liberty*. It should be added that the person gives singular meaning to the event, and this new “meaning” can provide further evidence. “In this sense,” Mouroux emphasizes, “all authentic spiritual experience is experiential.” Thus, experience, born of what is simply lived, rises in the realm of science to the rational, and in special moments to the existential, or meta-empirical. Religious experience stems from this last type.

b) Experiencing the Sacred. Feeling the sacred is a criterion of humanity, a primitive fact that is therefore “archaic” and universal. Beyond all reference to personal transcendence, the sense of the sacred expects that beyond the perceptible, the utilitarian, there is a different order of reality that surpasses and envelops the former, granting it a mysterious meaning. The sacred is beyond my grasp, an invisible, inaudible, intangible reality. Direct contact with it would make me run the supreme risks: death, or even damnation.

However, this reserved “essence” paradoxically multiplies its “manifestations” (Van der Leeuw 1955) or “hierophanies” (Éliade 1965, 1968). Whether it involves the “natural” sacred linked to cosmic facts (mountains, storms, etc.) or the “existential” sacred, perceived at certain key moments in life (birth, marriage*, death, etc.), the sacred unites qualities that seem opposed, but are in fact inseparable: transcendence and immanence. It is because the sacred dominates the entire human spectrum that it penetrates it. This is true for both poles of the sacred: the divine, the holy, the majestic, the “consecrated”; and the diabolical, which is perverse, cursed, “execrable.”

Despite Girard (1972), the sacred is not essentially linked to violence*. It has an irradiant character, extends across multiple experiences, colors them, unites them, and constitutes one of their dimensions. Thus esthetic experience is the experience of an excess of reality and value that envelops the tangible object, removes it from the level of the utilitarian, and offers it for the happy contemplation* of the senses and spirit. The destruction of beauty is a profanation, a negation of the sacred as such. Moral experience is the experience of the absolute. The Good*, which judges not only my actions but also my feelings and most secret thoughts, imposes itself with extreme sacral force; it can lead me to the sacrifice of my possessions, my affections, or even my life. As for the connection between ontological experience and the sacred, this is noted by Éliade. The profane involves a degree of uncertainty within being, but the sacred is in the absolute sense; throughout the flow of events and the vicissitudes of history*, it remains immutable. It is also a principle of value, and so has a “hermeneutic*” aspect as giver of meaning. This is why societies* devoid of the sacred suffer from existential meaninglessness and vainly resort to a ritual of substitution.

The experience of the sacred seems to be a necessary condition, a “preamble” to the religious experience strictly speaking, in that the former is surpassed or amplified in the latter but remains separate from it: this would be the case with certain forms of animism, of humanism—res sacra homo—or the civic religion of Greco-Roman antiquity. It seems, however, that beyond traditional mythology, astral religion—including Plato’s God: the Idea of the Good (Republic VI); Aristotle’s God: Thought of thought (Metaphysica XII); and the One of Plotinus (Enneads VI)—the pagan soul* was in search of an ever higher and purer transcendence. Stoicism, especially among representatives of the imperial era—Epictetus, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius—offers the illogical aspect of uniting pantheistic affirmation (pantheism*) of an impersonal and material god with a religious feeling of true dependence. Epictetus’s religion, in particular, consists of praise, of giving thanks to an omniscient, provident, quasi-personal God.

c) Religious Experience. Express reflection on this form of experience is linked to the growing interest that Western culture has in its regard. Although, in the Protestant* movement, faith* was situated in will and affectivity, and although, on the other hand, during the romantic period, the strict deism* of the Enlightenment was rejected, religion and religious emotion were equated in Schleiermacher* (1958). It was intuition and feeling, inextricably linked, that constituted religion, without reference to any dogmatic objectivity received through a revelation*. It was in themselves that people would find religion. The believer was invited—and this not without a certain leaning toward pantheism—to perceive God as present in all things, to become one with the universe, understood as the divine. The same fundamental orientations can be found in W. James (The Varieties of Religious Experience, New York, 1902; Religious Experience, 1931). He reduces religion to an internal fact of experience and excludes all institutions or dogmatic elements. The affirmation of God is recognized as having only a practical value: it brings the believer the comfort of religious emotions, the tonic of a joy that transfigures existence and renders suffering and sacrifice acceptable. In sum, this pragmatism is less about serving God than about using him. As indicated by the word varieties in the title itself, the specifics of religion are dissolved in a fog of emotion and feeling. This specific aspect does indeed present the two elements of fear* (the tremendum) and seduction (the fascinosum), as distinguished by Otto (1917). But the religious attitude greatly surpasses these elements: it is characterized by a feeling of total dependence on the transcendent God. It is from him that the religious man acknowledges receiving the whole of his being, his essence and existence, the norm of his actions, as well as the sense and goal of his destiny. I call him “my God” not because I own him, but, on the contrary, because he gives me entirely to myself and because I find joy in this dependence. The “place” of this acknowledgement is prayer*, private or ritual, in the dialogue between the human I and the divine Thou. Within the complexity of the religious act—bodily attitude, the mind’s contemplation, offerings, and sacrifices—human beings express, through their whole being, their radical contingency, their reverential admiration for the Absolute of being, value, and meaning. In Jewish monotheism* the religious experience is specified by decisive elements: God, the Creator, has spoken in history. He has chosen a people, has liberated them from slavery in Egypt, has made a Covenant* of salvation* with them as codified in the Law on Mount Sinai. He has revealed his sanctity to Israel, his glory*, the blinding light of his mystery*. Through the voice of the prophets*, whose inspiration cannot be reduced to the expression, however privileged, of a personal experience (See Pius X, Pascendi, 1907, DS 3490–91), as well as through positive or negative events, God, the author of salvation and the one who reveals, sustains the messianic hope* of his people, corrects their infidelities, and prevents them from succumbing to the supreme infidelity that is idolatry*. But deep in the religious consciousness of Israel there is a division. On the one hand there is the desire to attain a greater knowledge of the holy God and of his glory, the desire to see him (Ps 63[62], 84[83]), but on the other hand, there is the suffering that comes from the impossibility of this: as creature and sinner, man cannot see the face of God and live (Gn 28:16 f.; Ex 3:4 ff., 19:12, 33:18–23). Furthermore, in the encounter of the Covenant, the parties are too unequal: the uncertain fidelity of human beings confronts the unfailing fidelity of God.

d) Christian Religious Experience. With belief in the Incarnation* of the Son of God, a decisive transformation takes place in religious experience. The believer can henceforth see the divine glory in the humanity of Jesus* and live on (Jn 1:14, 14:9). Man no longer hears the Word* of God through prophets, but through the Son (Heb 1:1 f.). One can even feel the flesh of the Risen One in order to convince oneself of its reality (Lk 24:39 f.; Jn 20:24–28); sensory experiences are coordinated, examined, and reiterated (1 Jn 1:1 ff.), especially during the post-Easter meals (Lk 24:26–43; Jn 21:9–14; Acts 1:3 f., 10:41). These experiences are intended to elicit and nourish faith. They do not limit it, since what is involved is a summons in the form of signs: the ambiguity of the sign preserves the freedom of the act of faith. Around Jesus, people divide into adversaries and disciples. But for the latter, the experience is so privileged that it inevitably engenders, after Pentecost, the duty and the act of witnessing, even at the cost of imprisonment, flagellation, and also death (Acts 1:6, 4:1–32, 5:15–41, 6:8–15, 7, etc.).

There is another type of Christian experience: one that, following the Ascension, is fed only by apostolic preaching*. In this case the “experience of Jesus” is had through the person and the words of direct witnesses; he is seen, heard, and touched through them and the vigor of their presence. This is a mediated experience, the experience of encountering Jesus “in others”—as in the experience of Polycarp, the disciple of John the Apostle.

After the death of the Twelve we find another type of experience. The Church* nourishes its faith through its only verbal witness, transmitted to tradition through the Scriptures. This is an experience, then, of faith alone. It is necessarily more austere, but there is a promise that it will bring to those who never knew either Jesus or the apostles the full benefit of a specific beatitude*: “Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed” (Jn 20:29).

This experience is an integral part of ecclesial communion*. Supported by the institution, it is the matrix of Christian existence. It is an experience of the realities of faith under the guidance of the Holy* Spirit (Jn 14, 15 ff. and 26, 16:12; Rom 8:16; 1 Cor 12) and the protection of the magisterium*. At once human and supernatural, it is made possible through baptismal grace* and comprises a dialogue with God in prayer, a certain vision (1 Cor 13:12; 2 Pt 1:19), and a certain presence (Mt 28:20). To this are added the experience of the daily struggle against sin*, with the law of the body constantly revolting against the law of the Spirit (Rom 6:12–19, 7:14–25; 1 Cor 9:24–27); the experience of struggle against the false evidence of the world*, which opposes the light of faith (1 Cor 1:17–2:16); the experience of alternation between blind faith and sensible fervor (2 Cor 1:3–11, 12:1–10), the impulses of religious affectivity being neither the source nor the measure of theological faith; the experience of persecution through blood, contradiction, and contempt (Mt 5:11 ff., 10:23; Lk 21:12–19; Jn 15:18–16:4); above all, the experience of an intimate and personal relationship between the believer and the triune God (1 Jn 5:5–12), between the human I and the divine Thou; the experience of a specific exchange between believing man and the man-God Christ (Jn 14:19 ff.); the experience of Christian assembly, of liturgical prayer, of ritual action, of the sacramental meeting between God the Savior and the person to be saved, of the eucharistic Communion with the sacrifice of the risen and glorified Lamb*; the experience of being in the world, of being in solidarity with all those to be saved, and yet without being of the world (Jn 15:18–21, 17:14–18; 1 Jn 3:13); the experience of Christian unity that is always to be perfected in the love* of God and the brethren (Jn 13:34 f., 17:11, 17:21–26); the experience of mission* (Mt 28:20) and witness (Acts 1:8); the experience of God’s patience (Rom 2:4, 3:26, 9:22), and of the impatient but blessed hope: “Come, Lord Jesus!” (Rev 22:20).

- E. Cramausel (1908), La philosophie religieuse de Schleiermacher, Montpellier.
- H. Pinard de La Boullaye (1913), “Exp. religieuse,” DThC V/2, 1786–1868.
- R. Otto (1917), Das Heilige: Ueber das Irrationale in der Idee des Göttlichen und sein Verhältnis zum Rationalen, Munich.
- H. Pinard de La Boullaye (1921), “La théorie de l’exp. religieuse de Luther à James,” RHE 63 Sq; 306 Sq; 547 Sq.
- A.J. Festugière (1932), L’idéal religieux des Grecs et l’Évangile, Paris.
- L. Cristiani (1939), “Schleiermacher,” DThC 14/1, 1495–1508.
- R. Lenoble (1943), Essai sur la notion d’expérience, Paris.
- J. Mouroux (1952), L’exp. chrétienne: Introduction à une théologie, Paris.
- L. Bourgey (1955), Observation et expérience chez Aristote, Paris.
- G. Van der Leeuw (1955), Phénoménologie de la religion, Paris.
- H. D. Lewis (1959), Our Experience of God, London.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1961), “Die Glaubenserfahrung,” Herrlichkeit I, Einsiedeln, 211–410.
- M. Éliade (1965), Le sacré et le profane, Paris.
- F. Alquié (1966), L’expérience, Paris.
- M. Éliade (1968) Traité d’histoire des religions, Paris.
- R. Girard (1972), La violence et le sacré, Paris.
- P. Miquel (1972), “La place et le rôle de l’expérience dans la théologie de saint Thomas,” RThAM 39, 63–70.

- M. Simon (1974), La philosophie de la religion dans l'œuvre de Schleiermacher, Paris.
 P. Miquel (1977), L'exp. de Dieu, Paris.
 E. Herms (1978), Theologie: Eine Erfahrungswissenschaft, Munich.
 J. B. Lotz (1978), Transzendente Erfahrung, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
 J.-P. Torrell (1981), "Dimension ecclésiale de l'exp. chrétienne," FZPhTh 28, 3–25.
 R. Schaeffler (1982), Fähigkeit zur Erfahrung: Zur transzendentalen Hermeneutik des Sprechens von Gott, QD 94.
 L. Bouyer (1990), "Exp.," Dictionnaire théologique, Paris.
 W. P. Alston (1991), Perceiving God: The Epistemology of Religious Experience, Ithaca-London.
 E. Barbotin (1991), "Témoignage," DSp 15, 134–41.
 J. Rudhart (1992), Notions fondamentales de la pensée re-

- ligieuse et actes constitutifs du culte dans la Grèce classique*, Paris.
 P. Rostenne (1993), Homo religiosus ou l'homme vertical, Bordeaux.
 J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), Exp. et Absolu, Paris.
 E. Barbotin (1995), Le témoignage, Turnhout.
 C. Berner (1995), La philosophie de Schleiermacher, Paris.
 R. Schaeffler (1995), Erfahrung als Dialog mit der Wirklichkeit, Freiburg-Munich.
 J. I. Gellman (1997), Experience of God and the Rationality of Theistic Belief, Ithaca-London.

EDMOND BARBOTIN

See also Credibility; Mysticism; Pietism; Religion, Philosophy of Expiation

I. Old Testament

1. Expiation among Human Beings

a) Compositio. Expiation means the settlement of conflicts by compensation instead of punishment* or violence* (Gn 32:21; Prv 6:35, 16:14). Spontaneous (e. g., Gn 32:21), or institutionalized by law* ("Code of the Covenant*": Ex 21:18–36), it is excluded in the case of premeditated murder (Ex 21:12 ff.; Nm 35:31). The exclusion of a settlement procedure (compositio) for voluntary homicide distinguishes Hebrew law from other forms of ancient law. The goal of expiation is reconciliation through the recognition of a (civil) responsibility and the provision of compensation. Expiation replaces conflict with mutual understanding and punishment with compensation.

Expiation as such does not imply a substitution, but a mediator (intercessor, arbiter, judge) may contribute to the compositio (Ex 21:22, 32:30; Mk 12:1–11 and parallel passages). The advantage of compensation offered and accepted (Gn 33:8–11) is the balanced distribution of negative effects: to the damage suffered corresponds the restitution claimed and granted. This is the satisfaction that compensates material and moral losses. Expiation is: 1) negotiated: the two parties seek a balance with one another; 2) directed toward the interest of all, that is, the parties in conflict and society*, which needs peace in order to prosper; 3) rational: instead of there being two negativities (damage inflicted and violent punishment), the positive character of reparation softens the damage inflicted; and 4) more durable than punishment because it is not hurtful.

b) Ethos of Expiation. Expiation presupposes moderation and gentleness by excluding vengeance and excess, by preferring peace* and equity to violence (Prv 16:14; Ps 103:9 f.), in the general interest. It resolves conflicts with clemency and by accommodating the parties: it calls for magnanimity from the wronged party and requires from the guilty party the intention to make reparation. It is creative: refusing to destroy, it creates compensation and peace. These qualities explain why compositio among human beings was transposed to the relationship between God* and humanity.

2. Religious Expiation

Before P (the "priestly" text; see Bible), expiation is seldom mentioned, but 1 Samuel 6, 26:19; 2 Samuel 21:3, and other passages evidence its existence in an early period. In P, expiation is organized into a complex sacrificial system. The principal expiatory sacrifices: chattât (Greek hamartia) 'âshâm (Greek plêmmeleia), and others, are distinguished by a particular rite of the sprinkling of blood (Lv 4–5). But the burnt offering is also expiatory (Lv 1:4).

Together with the Day of Atonement (yôm [ha-]kip-poûrîm, Greek hêmera [ex-]hilasmou), these sacrifices make up a system of forgiveness for different categories of sins*. In the P narratives* there are other means of expiation: incense (Nm 17:11 ff.), the image of the serpent (Nm 21:8 ff.), zeal (in the sense of “jealousy for God”) (Nm 25:10–13; Ps 106:30), intercession (Ex 32:30; Ps 106:23), a sacred personal tax during a census (Ex 30:11–16; 2 Sm 24), and votive offerings (Nm 31:50). But it is especially the blood of an animal—or, for the poor, flour (Lv 5:11 ff.)—that accomplishes expiation (Lv 17:10 ff.; See Heb 9:22).

3. Interpretation

Historically, the most widespread interpretation explains expiation as a substitution for the guilty person, replaced by an innocent victim who suffers death* in his place. It is based on a conception of sacrifice defined as the immolation of an animal victim, especially after the rite of the laying on of hands (semîkâ) by the sinner on the head of the victim, this rite being explained as an identification of the guilty one with the victim or a transfer of the sin to the victim. The theory of vicarious punitive substitution (the innocent victim punished in place of the guilty one) is seldom defended today, but the identification of the human subject with the victim (Gese, Janowski) or the diversion of social violence onto a scapegoat are variants of the theory. Milgrom interprets the sacrifices of expiation and of Yôm kippoûrîm as rites of purification. It seems that these interpretations have neglected the secular analogy of the ritual of expiation: the offering as compensation offered and accepted restores peace. The particular blood rites of expiatory sacrifices and of the Day of Atonement cause blood to splash in the direction of the veil of the sanctuary and enter into the Holy of Holies (Lv 16:14 f.), into the presence of YHWH. This rite seems to signify the presentation of blood by sinful human beings as symbolic compensation, prescribed by YHWH. The rite of the scapegoat* on the Day of Atonement (Lv 16:20 ff.) expresses the removal of sins and impurities (see the sacrificial bird, Lv 14:7, 53). The laying on of both hands (Lv 16:21) is distinct from the laying on of only one hand, which precedes all sacrifices (Lv 1:4, 3:2). This gesture (semîkâ) seems to signify that the victim becomes the possession of YHWH, or that the celebrant is its owner.

4. Biblical Theology of Expiation

Ritual expiation represents in liturgical symbols the reconciliation between God and human beings (individuals and community). In it, sin is understood as negativity and damage inflicted, producing a break in relation and a “responsibility” (an obligation to make reparation) in the sinner, God being the person harmed in this case. God renounces punishment by offering the possibility of a reconciliation through a ritual sign, that is, through the liturgy* of expiation and blood (Lv 17:10 ff.), which are expressions of his grace*. The offering of sacrifices brought by the sinner corresponds to a compensation that signifies regret for the evil* caused and the desire to accept the reconciliation offered by God. Expiation is an exchange in which God takes the initiative; the sinner responds to it. Hence, punishment or vindictive violence, effects of God’s anger, are replaced by a reparation that is both designated and accepted by him, thanks to his gentleness. Expiation is a nonviolent divine response. It is not the term satisfaction that is biblical, but the idea of the replacement of divine punishment (poena) by a compensation designated, given, and received with a view to a peaceful and definitive reconciliation.

II. New Testament

The reconciliation between God and human beings is thematized in narratives (parables*) and in the use of the Old Testament ritual terminology of expiation.

1. Parables

Mark 12:1–11, Matthew 5:25 f., and Luke 15:11–32 recount conflicts over money in which the protagonists may accept or reject an amicable settlement, favoring mutual understanding and favorable to the guilty or indebted party. In Mark 12:1–11, the owner’s son intercedes between the father* and the tenants to secure a negotiated and nonviolent reconciliation. The punishment of the rebellious debtors is delayed because of the owner’s kindness, to leave room for an amicable settlement, which fails. In Luke 15:11–32 the father chooses a smooth reconciliation with the prodigal son over punishing him for wasting his money, while the elder son thinks that his younger brother should be disciplined for that loss. In these three parables, secular compositio, a human though difficult solution, is the image of reconciliation with God, who prefers peace to strict justice* or violent punishment.

2. Logion of the Ransom (Mark 10:45 and Parallel Passages; 1 Timothy 2:6) and the Logion of the Cup (Mark 14:24 and Parallel Passages; 1 Corinthians 11:25).

The logion of the ransom is an embryonic parable: the “Son* of man” serves the “multitude” (the peoples?; see Dn 7; Is 53) by paying on its behalf and in its place the “ransom,” that is, the compensation necessary for the compositio. The terminology is not ritual but legal.

The metaphor of the “payment of a price” for the gift of life indicates that the “Son of man” fully commits himself (Mk 8:35 f. and parallel passages) in favor of the reconciliation of the multitude with God. The logion of the cup retains the expression “for (huper) the multitude” and replaces the life to be paid as compensation by the “blood to be shed,” a metaphorical designation of martyrdom* and an evocation of ritual expiation. Taken together, these two logia suggest the idea of the martyrdom of the “Son of man,” in view of a reconciliation between God and “the multitude,” by metaphorically using the language of secular compositio and ritual expiation (Is 53).

3. Terminology of Ritual Expiation

In Ephesians (5:2), Colossians (1:24), 1 John (2:2, 4:10), Hebrews (9 f.), 1 Peter (1:2), and Revelations (5:95 f.), the Old Testament ritual expressions of expiation serve to interpret the meaning of the violent death of Jesus Christ*. Blood evokes the ritual of blood, which is typical of liturgical expiation (yôm kip-pôûrîm). Romans 3:25 and Hebrews 9 f. establish a typological relation between the Old Testament ritual of expiation and the death and Resurrection* of Christ. Second Corinthians 5:21 can be read as an allusion to the sacrifice for sin (chattât, hamartia). The basis for the New Testament terminology of ritual expiation seems to be the metaphor of “blood spilled” for martyrdom. The metaphor also suggests the blood offered by YHWH on the altar to accomplish forgiveness (Lv 17:11). For martyrdom, in Israel*, reconciles God with his people* (2 Macc 7:37 f.) and takes the place of sacrifices (Dn 3:38 ff.). A martyr is a just person submitted to an extreme ordeal, obtaining as intercessor the salvation* of sinners and of Israel. The New Testament terminology of expiation combines the theology* of the martyr-intercessor with that of ritual reconciliation. The death of Jesus is understood in this context as the martyrdom of a just man, and the martyrdom of the just, persecuted from the second century B.C. on, is added, as another path of reconciliation, to the ritual expiation suppressed under persecution.

4. Conclusion

The New Testament links expiation to martyrdom because both accomplish reconciliation between God and the community. The vocabulary of “martyrdom” is based on the historical execution of Jesus the Just One, that of “expiation” on the grace of reconciliation. The martyrdom of a just person obtains that grace for the people as a whole (“the multitude”), but ritual expiation, the symbolic expression of the grace of reconciliation offered by God to the individual or collective sinner, has the same effect. One difference may be noted: ritual expiation is celebrated with no intermediary except the priest* (see the sacerdotal typology of Hebrews), but the martyr is an intercessor for others. The mediation of Christ Jesus, whereby he reconciles human beings with God, is rooted in his death as martyrdom, not in expiation. The terminology of expiation serves to underscore the grace of that reconciliation with God, who prefers gentleness to violence, peaceful understanding to punishment.

- K. Bähr (1839), Symbolik des mosaischen Cultus, vol. 2, Heidelberg.
- J. Herrmann (1905), Die Idee der Sühne im AT, Leipzig.
- A. Médebielle (1924), L'expiation dans l'Ancien et le Nouveau Testament, Rome.
- A. Büchler (1929), Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, New York.
- D. Schötz (1930), Schuld- und Sündopfer im AT, Breslau.
- J. Herrmann, F. Büchsel (1938), “hileôs, hilaskomai, etc.,” ThWNT 3, 300–324.
- L. Moraldi (1956), Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori nell'ambiente biblico e nell'AT, Rome.
- L. Sabourin (1961), Rédemption sacrificielle, Bruges.
- E. Lohse (1963), Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, Göttingen.
- R. J. Thompson (1963), Penitence and Sacrifice in Early Israel Outside the Levitical Law, Leyden.
- R. de Vaux (1964), Les sacrifices de l'AT, Paris.
- K. Elliger (1966), Leviticus, Tübingen.
- S. Lyonnet, L. Sabourin (1970), Sin, Redemption and Sacrifice, Rome.
- R. Girard (1972), La violence et le sacré, Paris.
- K. Kertelge (Ed.) (1976), Der Tod Jesu im NT, Freiburg.
- J. Milgrom (1976), Cult and Conscience: The ASHAM and the Priestly Doctrine of Repentance, Leyden.
- H. Gese (1977), Zur biblischen Theologie, Munich.
- H. Schürmann (1977), Comment Jésus a-t-il vécu sa mort? Paris.
- R. J. Daly (1978), Christian Sacrifice, Washington.
- M. Hengel (1981 a), The Atonement: The Origins of the Doctrine in the NT, London; (1981 b), La crucifixion dans l'Antiquité et le message de la folie de la croix, Paris.
- F. Vattioni (Ed.) (1981), Sangue e Antropologia Biblica, vols. 1–2, Rome.
- A. Wallenkampf (Ed.) (1981), The Sanctuary and the Atonement, Washington.
- B. Janowski (1982), Sühne als Heilsgeschehen, Neukirchen.
- A. Schenker (1982), “Substitution du châtement ou prix de la paix?” in M. Benzerath, et al. (Ed.), La Pâque du Christ Mystère de salut: Mélanges Durwell, Paris, 75–90.
- J. Milgrom (1983), Studies in Cultic Theology and Terminology, Leyden.
- B. Lang (1984), “kipper,” ThWAT 4, 303–18.
- R. Rendtorff (1985–), Leviticus, BK, Neukirchen.
- P. Bovati (1986), Ristabilire la giustizia: Procedure, vocabolario, orientamenti, Rome.
- N. Kiuchi (1987), The Purification Offering in the Priestly Literature, Sheffield.
- A. Schenker (1987), Chemins bibliques de la non-violence, Chambray-lès-Tours.
- B. Levine (1989), Leviticus, Philadelphia.
- J. Milgrom (1990), Numbers, Philadelphia; (1991), Leviticus I–XVI, New York.
- A. Schenker (1991), Text und Sinn im AT, Fribourg-Göttingen.
- F. Crüsemann (1992), Die Tora, Munich.

- A. Schenker (1992), "Die Anlässe zum Schuldopfer Ascham," in A. Schenker (Ed.), Studien zu Opfer und Kult im AT, Tübingen, 45–66.
R. Péter-Contesse (1993), Lévitique 1–16, Geneva.

ADRIAN SCHENKER

See also Cult; Eucharist; Passion; Purity/Impurity; Sacrifice; Scapegoat; Servant of YHWH; Sin;
Vengeance of God; Wrath of God

Extreme Unction. See Anointing of the Sick

F

Faith

A. Biblical Theology

Faith is the inner attitude of one who believes. The words of the Bible that we translate as “faith” or “fidelity” ('èmunâh, 'émèt), and as “believe” (hé'èmîn), come from the same Hebrew root ('mn); Greek shows the same relationship in pistis, “faith,” and pisteuein, “believe.” The underlying idea in Hebrew is that of firmness; in Greek, that of persuasion.

1. Old Testament

In English, “believe” can denote either an uncertain opinion or a strong conviction, based on an interpersonal relationship. The latter meaning is the one that is found in the Bible*; hence the frequency of the vocabulary of faith in the Psalms* (84 times); see also Deuteronomy (23 times), Isaiah (34 times), and Jeremiah (21 times).

a) Trust in God. The verb “believe” makes its first appearance in Genesis 15:6, a fundamental text. God* has made Abraham an improbable promise*, “And he believed the Lord, and he counted it to him as righteousness.” When God asks him to offer the son of the promise, Abraham’s faith is subjected to an ordeal (Gn 22:1), which he endures in obedience (22:2f., 22:18) and with confidence: “God will provide” (22:8, 22:14). Faith, confidence, and obedience are constantly linked. The converse is also true: faced with the land promised to them, the people refuse to enter it (Nm 13–14; Dt 1:19–45; Heb 3:7–4:11); they “despised the pleasant land, having no faith in his promise” (Ps 106:24). In the desert, instead of believing God at his word (Ps 78:22 and vv. 32, 37), they “tempted” him (vv. 18, 41, 56) (temptation*), that is, they wished to force him to act (Ps 95:7b–10; Ex 17:1–7; Nm 20:2–13).

Adherence to God, faith, is only possible to the extent that God makes himself known. God speaks to human beings. He opens Job’s eyes to the works of creation* (Jb 38:1–42:6). He addresses an assembly (Dt 5:22ff.), but more often a single person* (Gn 12:1; Ex 3:4ff.) with whom he establishes an intimate relation (Jer 15:16) by giving him a mission* for the benefit of others (Gn 12:1ff.; Ex 3:10; Is 6:8–13; Jer 1:9f.).

b) Trust in Men of God. The envoy in turn must be believed. On what basis? In many cases his message is recognized because it is similar to previous divine interventions. In other cases, God confirms it by wonders, as in the case of Moses (Ex 4:1–9, 14:31; see 19:9) or that of Elijah (1 Kgs 17:1–24). But miracles* are ambiguous (see Ex 7:11; Dt 13:2ff.) and discernment remains necessary. By accepting the mediation of accredited messengers, believers enter into a community of faith. This is what the Israelites formed because “they believed in the Lord and in his servant Moses” (Ex 14:31) after their liberation from Egypt. This is the path of the covenant* (Ex 19:5f., 24:3–8), in which fidelity and obedience predominate, the basis remaining the generous and gratuitous initiative of God. The recognition of such benefits for Israel* and for all human beings will always remain the Old Testament's essential "confession" of faith.

c) Faith, Religion, Ethics. Beginning with Elijah, the champion of faith in YHWH against the Canaanite cult* of Baal, the prophets struggled against idolatry* (Hos 8:4ff.; Jer 2:26ff., 10:2–5; Ez 9–12 and against a ritualistic conception of religion accompanied by what amounted in real, practical terms to disobedience of God. They gave vitality to the bond between faith and the practice of justice. The very politics of the city* had to have faith as a basis. This led to a refusal to rely either on military strength or alliance with major powers. Isaiah in particular followed this line: "If you are not firm in faith, you will not be firm at all" (Is 7:9, 28:16). The ordeal of the exile paradoxically led Israel to strengthen its monotheistic faith (Is 40:12–41:29, 44:6–46:13). But the message concerning the Servant* of YHWH was thought by Deutero-Isaiah to have come up against a refusal to believe: "Who has believed what they heard from us?" (Is 53:1; see Jn 12:38; Rom 10:16). The door opened onto what would later become the great apocalyptic revelations* (Dn 7–12), including that of the resurrection* of the dead (Dn 12:2; 2 Macc 7:9–29; Wis 5:1–5).

2. New Testament

a) Synoptic Gospels. In this historical context Jesus* proclaimed the imminent coming of the Kingdom* of God (Mt 3:17 and parallel passages). Mark summarizes his message in the terms of the first Christian preaching*: "Believe in the gospel" (1:15). But Jesus had already brought to the fore the fundamental significance of faith. He says to the person whom he has cured: "Your faith has made you well" (Mt 9:22 and parallel passages; Mk 10:52 and parallel passages; Lk 7:50). "All things are possible for one who believes" (Mk 9:23; see Mt 7:20 and parallel passages; 21:21 and parallel passages). In general he does not specify in whom one should have faith. He does not say, "Believe in me," but the circumstances reveal that the faith in God that he wants to encourage is linked to a faith in his own person. "He was teaching them as one who had authority*" (Mt 7:29 and parallel passages), as a fully accredited envoy. The expression "Amen, I say to you" is peculiar to Jesus (the Hebrew 'amen affirms certainty). The signs and wonders that accompany his speaking are above all cures, which are asked for with faith (see Mt 9:2 and parallel passages, 9:28ff., 13:58). Peter* acquired the conviction that Jesus was the Messiah* (Mk 8:29). But Jesus foresaw for himself a fate that seemed unworthy of the Messiah. His death on the cross provoked a refusal to believe that is reported in terms evoking the defiance of the people in the desert (Mk 15:32 and parallel passages; see Ps 78:18–22). It also provoked an adherence of faith (Mk 15:39 and parallel passages). The Good News was proclaimed in order to be believed by the entire world (Mk 16:15ff.).

b) Acts of the Apostles. For this narrative*, faith and baptism* "in the name of Jesus Christ" ensure for believers the forgiveness of sins* (Acts 2:38, 26:18), the purification of the heart (15:9), justification* (13:39), and salvation* (16:31). The first to be called to Christian faith are the Jews (3:26), and after them the Gentiles (13:46ff.). "Now the full number of those who believed were of one heart and soul*" (4:32). United by faith, they constituted the Church* (9:31).

c) Johannine Writings. They contain the verb "believe" 98 times. Unlike the synoptic Gospels, John's writings about Jesus often speak of belief in him (Jn 2:11, 3:16, 3:18). Jesus himself invites this belief (14:1), explaining that belief in him is belief in God, who sent him (12:44). The interpersonal aspect of faith is emphasized (1:35–51, 4:7–26), particularly through the parallelism between "come to" and "believe in" (6:35, 6:64f., 7:37f.). Faith establishes Jesus and the believer in a reciprocal inwardness (15:15; see 6:56, 17:20). A significant doctrinal aspect also appears, as witnessed in the profusion of the vocabulary of knowledge* and truth*. The word of Jesus reveals who he is (4:26, 6:35). It is supported by divine "works" that evidence his union with the Father* (5:36, 10:30, 10:38) and are "signs" likely to give rise to faith (2:11, 2:23, 20:30f.). The attachment to "signs and wonders" (4:48) impedes belief in Jesus on the basis of his words and, later, belief in the witnesses who have seen him risen (20:25): blessed is the one who believes without having seen (20:29)! Faith is expressed in explicit confessions of belief (6:69, 11:27). The declared aim of the writing of the gospel is to bring readers to "believe that Jesus is the Christ*, the Son of God" (20:31). Johannine faith encompasses simultaneously the gospel and the Scriptures of the Old Testament (Jn 2:22, 5:46, 20:8f.; cf. Luke 24:25, 44–47). It is a source of life (Jn 20:31, 11:25f.).

d) The letters of Paul give strong emphasis to faith ("believe" occurs 54 times; "faith," 152 times) and to its interpersonal aspect. Christ lives in the believer (Gal 2:20; Eph 3:17); the believer is "in Christ" (2 Cor 5:17; Phil 3:9) and is crucified with Christ (Gal 2:19, 5:24; Rom 6:6) in order to live with him as risen (Rom

6:4, 6:11). The doctrinal aspect is no less prominent: adherence to the message (1 Cor 15:3f.; Rom 10:5).

Apostle* to the Gentiles, Paul understood that human beings are “justified” by faith in Christ and not by observance of the Law* of Moses (Gal 2:16; Rom 3:28). Paul thereby defined the basis of Christian life. Whoever believes in Christ, who “died for our sins,” is freed from his sin “as a gift” (Rom 3:24). Paul rightly refuses to accept two heterogeneous bases for this fundamental justification, namely, faith in Christ and the “works* of the Law.” Galatians 3:6 and Romans 4 derive support from Genesis 15:6, reread in the light of the Christian situation. Perhaps to correct misunderstandings provoked by Paul’s paradoxes, the Letter of James (Jas 2:14–26) demonstrates that justification is not obtained by faith without works. James’s point of view is different: he is not concerned with initial justification but with the last judgment* and speaks not of the works of the Law but of those “of faith” (2:22). Paul, too, requires that faith not remain sterile: the last judgment will be made on each person “according to his works” (Rom 2:6; see 2 Cor 5:10; Gal 6:7–10).

In the letters written in captivity there is a notable emphasis on “the wisdom* and understanding” procured by faith (Eph 1:8, 1:17–20; Col 1:9) and on “mystery*” (Eph, six times; Col, four times). The pastoral letters are concerned with preserving faith from collapse (1 Tm 1:19, 6:20; 2 Tm 2:18), warning against “fables” (1 Tm 1:4, 4:7), and inviting the believer to embrace a “healthy” faith and doctrine (eight times).

e) The Epistle to the Hebrews presents the glorified Christ as our “merciful and faithful [Gr. pistos] high priest in the service of God” (Heb 2:17, 3:2; see Nm 12:7 Septuagint); it warns against the disastrous “lack of faith” (3:12–19) and invites the believer to a “full assurance of faith” (10:22). Hebrews 11:1–40, a splendid hymn in praise of faith and of the great believers of the Old Testament, shows faith at the origin of all worthwhile accomplishments, of triumphs achieved and of ordeals overcome. Along with the interpersonal aspect (11:6 and vv. 8, 11, 26f.) appear certain doctrinal aspects (11:3 and vv. 6, 19, 35), but the opening sentence defines faith by its effects. Neither specifically Christian nor even religious, this definition brings together two perspectives: one existential and biblical (accepting a promise with faith is “a way of already possessing what is hoped for”), the other intellectual and Hellenistic (accepting the word of a competent person with faith is “a way of knowing what cannot be seen”). The two perspectives recur in the rest of the chapter.

f) Pistis Christou. This Greek expression (Gal 2:16c; Phil 3:9) and several similar ones have provoked discussion because of their ambiguity. In fact, the act of believing, so often mentioned in the New Testament (Greek pisteuein: 241 times), is never attributed in the text to Jesus. On the other hand, the New Testament often speaks of “believing in him” (42 3) or “faith in him” (9 3). As a consequence, pistis Christou may be translated “faith in Christ,” as pistis Theou (Mk 11:22) is translated “faith in God.” But it may also be translated “fidelity of Christ.” Finally, reference can be made to Romans 3:3, where pistis corresponds to the Hebrew ‘émét and designates the absolute “faithfulness” of God.

- P. Antoine (1938), “Foi (dans l’Écriture),” DBS 3, 276–312; (1955), “Qu’est-ce que la foi? Données bibliques,” LV(L) 22, 425–531.
- A. Weiser, R. Bultmann (1959), “Pisteuô, pistis,” ThWNT 6, 174–230 (Foi, Geneva, 1976).
- P. Vallotton (1960), Le Christ et la foi, Geneva.
- E. D. O’Connor (1961), Faith in the Synoptic Gospels, Notre Dame, Ind.
- H. Ljungman (1964), Pistis, Lund.
- E. Grässer (1965), Der Glaube im Hebräerbrief, Marbourg.
- H. Wildberger (1968), “Glauben im AT,” ZThK 65, 129–59.
- F. M. Braun (1969), “La foi selon saint Jean,” RThom 69, 357–77.
- Colloque œcuménique (1970), Foi et salut selon saint Paul, Rome.
- A. Jepsen (1973), “‘âman,” ThWAT 1, 313–48.
- W. Mundle (1973), Der Glaubensbegriff des Paulus, Leipzig.
- J.-M. Faux (1977), La foi du NT, Brussels.
- J. Guillet (1980), La foi de Jésus Christ, Paris.
- F. Hahn, H. Klein (1982), Glaube im Neuen Testament, Neukirchen.
- R. B. Hays (1983), The Faith of Jesus Christ, Chicago.
- C. D. Marshall (1987), Faith as a Theme in Mark’s Narrative.
- A. R. Dulles (1994), The Assurance of Things Hoped For, New York.

ALBERT VANHOYE

See also Dogma; Fideism; Grace; Justification; Knowledge of God; Law and Christianity; Liberty; Luther, Martin; Pauline Theology; Preaching; Revelation; Salvation; Truth; Works

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

1. Patristics

The first theology* inherited from the Scriptures (which it saw as canonical) images and concepts of faith that were rich and flexible. This theology did not systematize such images and concepts but is remarkable by its choice of perspectives. It made these choices on both missionary and exegetical grounds.

Christianity was rather quickly classified, according to the sociological taxonomy of late antiquity, among the schools of thought (haireseis) and was never tempted to identify itself with a particular ethnic group; it had an essentially missionary vocation as a community sent by the one whom the Father* had sent. This mission was carried out in a totally exoteric manner. There was a Christian cult* and there were Christian “mysteries*,” just as there were at the time a cult and mysteries of Mithra. Hence, there was a Christian initiation* and liturgical actions to which only believers were admitted. But unlike Mithraism and any other mystery religion, Christianity saw itself from the beginning as the bearer of a true word that could be proclaimed in the agora or the forum as well as in Jewish synagogues, a word to which only Jewish theology and pagan philosophy* were capable of responding. No apologetics were necessary to defend the idea of faith in the face of Israel, since faith was a biblical concept: the pistis of which the Christians spoke articulated in Greek a form of conduct without Greek equivalent (contra Buber 1950). But distinctions were required with respect to Hellenism, and Clement of Alexandria* was the first to provide them.

Indeed, in the Platonic conceptual framework, “faith,” in comparison to true knowledge (epistemè, gnôsis), represented an impoverished form of knowledge. Clement adopted a dual strategy. 1) His first step was to rely on Aristotelianism against Platonism. Aristotle had in fact suggested a concept of faith that lent itself to theological acceptance. To be sure, faith was different from rigorous knowledge on the model of syllogistic reasoning based on experience. But although different, it was not of lesser value; rather, defined as the grasp of self-evident truths, it was more certain than reason* itself. Thus Clement in turn was able to define it by playing Hellenism against itself: “Faith, which the Greeks disparage because they consider it vain and barbarous, is a voluntary anticipation, a religious assent” (Strom. II. 2. 8. 4). 2) It was thereby possible to see faith as a near-synonym of knowledge (gnosis), and this second term made Christian experience* fully intelligible (and thus able to be used) in a mission* to the Greeks. Heterodox Gnosticism, to be sure, laid claim to “knowledge” (and also to faith); but for Clement, as was later true for Origen*, the fulfillment of Christian life in the contemplative experience of gnosis created no ambiguity. Gnosis did not abolish pistis; it was simply the full exercise of that faith.

Against Celsus, Origen enriched the theory with a reflection on the faith of simple people: the act of faith possessed the same dignity as the entry into philosophy, but it placed experience of a philosophical kind within the reach of everyone. Also against Celsus, he shed light on the believer’s trust in God with an analysis of the role played by confidence generally in interpersonal life. In the school of Antioch, and also relying on Aristotle, Theodoret of Cyr provided a new version of the theory. For him too, faith was the foundation on which one built gnosis, and gnosis was interpreted as a form of knowledge that exceeded the philosophical rather than being simply nonphilosophical; and he too contrasted the intuitive character of the grasp of faith with discursive reasoning. Theodoret offered the following definition: “Faith is the voluntary assent (ekousios sugkatathesis) of the soul, or else the contemplation* (theôria) of an invisible object, or the taking of a position with respect to what is (peri to on stasis), as well as a direct grasp (katalèpsis) of the invisible world, in harmony with our nature, or else an unambiguous disposition (diathesis) rooted in the soul* of those who possess it” (Therapeutics 1. 91, SC 571).

From the fourth century onward, pistis frequently became a synonym of “confession of faith” in Greek patristics, as, for example, in the expression “faith of Nicaea.” The most remarkable contributions to the doctrine of faith came in fact from monastic-mystical theology. Two major currents came into conflict, and the reconciliation of the two tendencies was to remain one of the permanent problems of Christian thought. A neo-Origenist tradition (Evagrius) thought of the life of faith in strictly intellectualist terms, while the Macarian tradition expressed it in purely affective terms. In addition, the noetics of Pseudo-Dionysius* provided a conceptual framework in which it was possible to articulate precisely the excess of ordinary reason in terms of the dialectical interplay of knowledge and unknowing that is characteristic of faith.

The Alexandrian concept of faith was not accepted as such by all of the Latin Fathers. Tertullian*, for example, sees faith as a relation to truth*, but the rationality of what is believable is denied, with celebrated rhetorical verve: the death* of the Son of God* “is believable because it is absurd”; and his resurrection* “is certain because it is impossible (credibile est, quia ineptum est... certum est, quia impossibile, De carne Christi 5). The theoretical contribution of the Latin Fathers was, however, composed of important assertions: that of the link between faith and the church’s regula veritas in the case of Irenaeus*; the affirmation of the free character of faith in the case of Zeno of Verona; the affirmation by Ambrose* of the virtuous quality of faith; and by Hilary of the clear distinction between belief and understanding (intelligere). It was left to Augustine* to create a synthesis out of these disparate elements. Setting himself to consider the relation between belief and knowledge, he sees faith as the prerequisite for any knowledge: Isaiah 7:9 (Vulgate), si non credideritis, non intellegitis, “if you do not believe, you will not understand,” is one of his favorite scriptural quotations. And in searching for the reasons for faith, he refers to grounds for credibility*—the fulfillment of the prophecies* in Christ*, miracles*, the success of Christianity—and bases the acceptance of faith on a theology of the authority* of the church (“For my part, I would not believe the Gospel if it were not transmitted through the authority of the Catholic Church,” CSEL 25. 197). The rationality of faith is complete, but in a mode that transcends the earthly uses of reason. Finally, Augustine formulated two distinctions that have remained canonical. On the one hand, he distinguished between the content of faith and the act of faith: aliud sunt ea quae creduntur, aliud fides qua creduntur (Trin. 13. 2. 5). And on the other, in the access to faith he distinguished a sequence of three acts: “believing God,” “having faith in God,” and “believing in God” (credere Deum, credere Deo, credere in Deum), of which only the third characterizes Christian experience.

In 529 the Second Council of Orange, assembled and inspired by Caesar of Arles and ratified by Pope* Boniface II, canonized the principal theses of Augustine on original sin*, grace*, and faith. At the end of the patristic age, the Christian West thus dogmatically confessed that “we must, with the help of God, preach and believe that the sin of the first man so diverted and weakened free will that no one since can love God as he should, nor do good for God, if divine grace and mercy* have not shown him the way” (DS 396).

The Christian East, although it had not had to refute Pelagianism*, and thus had not sharpened its formulations to this extent, would probably have accepted these assertions. And because it experienced no real debate about faith, the history of its theology of faith is that of a peaceful persistence of patristic conceptions.

2. Medieval Theology

Most medieval theologies of faith were also organized around a speculative exegesis* of Isaiah 7:9. In Anselm*, the leitmotif of a faith in search of understanding, fides quaerens intellectum, should be understood as what he says it is. The arguments and the apparently exorbitant desire to find “necessary reasons,” rationes necessariae, follow from beginning to end a believing process (see Barth* 1931), carried out by a reason to which the very act of believing has granted through grace the competence that it possessed before the Fall. Anselm’s primary purpose was not apologetic, but rather to articulate the logic of the language of faith. But because that logic unfolds under the presupposed aegis of harmony between rationality and faith, it is also the logic of a weakened (but not annihilated) reason, whose inherent dynamism leads it to seek faith (and hence, in a second stage, to seek and find itself).

In Abelard*, by contrast, we encounter a new missionary theology. Nurtured by the “arts of language” (artes sermoneales) that the Latin West was in the process of rediscovering (logic, rhetoric, grammar), this theology had as its goal the transmission of faith to simple people or its defense and illustration against heretics and non-Christians (for example, in the Dialogue between a Philosopher, a Jew, and a Christian). Like almost all theologians of faith and reason, Abelard commented on Hebrews 11:1 (Vulgate)—Fides est substantia rerum sperandarum, argumentum non apparentium, “faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen”—and places the emphasis of the commentary on his interpretation of argumentum, which he glosses as existimatio, “evaluation.” This presupposed an exalted idea of reason: the believer who addresses nonbelievers or other believers in these terms must himself possess an intellectus fidei capable of proving that the language of faith is fully invested with meaning. Abelard, however, knew the limits of discursive rationality: true knowledge* of God, cognitio, is without location in the world and the church; it is a purely eschatological reality.

Abelard’s theory found a relentless adversary in Bernard* of Clairvaux. Bernard did have an Anselmian conception of reason healed by faith, and this might have made possible a positive appreciation of Abelard’s work. But his monastic theology, focused as it was on spiritual experience, could hardly find a place for the instrumentalization of philosophical theories, and Bernard’s emphasis on the will and the emotions, like that of his disciple William of Saint-Thierry, led to a different understanding of the act of faith and of the life of faith.

We owe to the theologians of Saint*-Victor several original concepts and propositions. Also interested in the problem of the faith of simple people, Hugh of Saint-Victor interpreted it by reference to the solidarity of believers. The faith of the simple, like that of the just of the Old Testament (whose christological faith was only implicit), was carried by the faith of the clergy and the monks. Hugh elsewhere sketched a theory of knowledge illustrated by the model of the “three eyes”: the eye of the flesh making possible knowledge of the world, the eye of reason making possible knowledge of the self, and the eye of contemplation making possible knowledge of God. The eye of the flesh was not blinded by sin, so that it has the ability to ascend from the world* to God; and the three modes of knowledge are in addition interdependent, so that faith, by making contemplation possible, also affects knowledge of the self and the world.

Commenting on Hebrews 11:1, Hugh places the emphasis of his commentary on substantia, and posits that it is already eschatological goods that “subsist” in the experience of the believer. Finally, he provides his own definition: faith is certitudo quaedam animi de rebus absentibus, supra opinionem et infra scientiam, “an intellectual certainty concerning absent things, superior to opinion and inferior to science” (De sacram., PL 176. 330). And he contributed to thought about the balance between rational and emotional factors in positing that fides quae was governed by reason and fides qua by the powers of emotion, that the “matter” of faith lies in knowledge but its “substance” in affectio.

For Richard of Saint-Victor, commentary on Isaiah 7:9 did not lead to a theory of theological knowledge, as was the case for Anselm, but immediately to a theory of mystical knowledge. And for him, faith grasps the rationes necessariae in the framework of a mystical contemplation, in a manner rather close to that of Anselm. Peter Lombard was the first to articulate a problem that was to reappear in all later theologians, that of the faith of devils (Sent. III. d. 23, see Jas 2:19). If we must concede that devils believe, then we must admit the existence of a faith that is dead and of no use to salvation*, reduced to a pure act of knowledge. To demonstrate by contrast the true nature of credere in, Peter Lombard was then led to broaden the field of the quaestio de fide to encompass all theological experience (faith-hope*-charity). And it was in caritas, which he identified with the Holy* Spirit, that he saw the foundation of theological life, a foundation that was guaranteed by what was akin to an inspiration.

For his part, reflecting on the relation between faith and reason, Gilbert de la Porrée noted a reversal: in the things of this world, reason precedes faith; in the things of God, faith precedes reason. Gilbert was primarily a theoretician of the scientific practice of theology, for whom intellectus fidei was identical to theological knowledge. But, like Anselm, he described a labor of reason entirely pursued under the protection of the act of faith. He thus modified a classic Augustinian formulation: where Augustine defined faith as a cum assensione cogitare, a “thought with assent,” Gilbert defined it as a cum assensione percipere, a “perception with assent.” An early interest in what would later become the analysis fidei was beginning to surface. Finally, there was another beginning in Nicholas of Amiens, the first thinker to conceive of reason as entrusted with providing “preambles to faith.”

Two major tasks were thus bequeathed to the theologians of the 13th century: that of précising the place of faith in all cognitive experiences and that of integrating faith into the general economy of the Christian experience. The wish to accomplish both tasks was universally evident. In William of Auxerre, for example, we encounter a theory of theological knowledge in which the articles of faith make up the set of axioms on which a rigorous theology must be based; but speculative experience can nonetheless not be abstracted from Christian life as a whole, for faith also gives rise to the love* of God. For William of Auvergne, the weakness of reason in its worldly use is asserted with such force that faith in it becomes improbable, improbabilis, but the grace of faith is also asserted with similar force, and theological experience gives evidence of reason going beyond itself, making possible the dissolution of all improbability. In the Summa halensis, the theory of faith is first of all a theory of the bases for a science, but a science that attains its object by “tasting” it, secundum gustum, within an experience whose cohesion is ensured by emotional factors and the work of the will.

For Bonaventure*, the theory of faith is rooted in a theology of history* in which the preambles to Christian experience are not provided by philosophical work* (he constantly saw philosophy primarily as the legacy of a dead past) but by the history of Israel. It is incumbent on a theology of the Old Testament to provide the concrete precomprehensions and pre-experiences of Christian faith. At the center of his interpretation, the triad of “memory,” “intelligence,” and “will” composes an “image of the Trinity*,” imago creationis, in human beings. Sin has almost erased this image, but theological life restores it in the exalted mode of an imago recreationis. Faith is consequently an event that occupies the entire space of consciousness. Because human beings do not enjoy eschatological immediacy in their relation to God, their faith requires the speculative services of discursive knowledge—but on the path that leads the mind to God, faith is focused on mystical experience and is fulfilled in that experience as an immediate relation. A disciple of Bonaventure, Matthew of Acquasparta particularized the relation of will to intellect in terms that had a long-lasting influence: faith is related causaliter to will, it is related to intellect formaliter and essentialiter. He also produced a theory of knowledge according to which faith and knowledge can coexist in the same person.

The analysis proposed by Thomas* Aquinas remains the most straightforward, the least encumbered with nuances. The presupposition is intellectualist: “believe” is said of an assent to truths guaranteed by primordial Truth itself. But if there is room in the Thomist structure of knowledge for purely rational assent (for a pure and simple constraint exercised by truth on the intelligence), the natural operation of reason cannot go beyond a metaphysical affirmation of God, for which Thomas provides a model in the first questions of the Summa Theologica. The logic of belief is distinguished from a logic of pure intellection in that it is intellectual assent moved by the will; thus it is both a process of knowledge in the strict sense (its order is that of theôria) and a work of liberty* (hence meritorious). Because no one believes except by reason of an attraction exercised by God on him (Jn 6:44), faith is an innate virtue. And because it does not consist of a momentary act but of the permanence of a way of being, it is a habitus and an innate virtue. Christian experience, however, is not limited to the experience of faith; charity in fact is the “form of the virtues*,” of the theological virtues (faith and hope) as of the others. Faith, on the other hand, acquiesces to truths proposed in a linguistic form that make up a system, but its spiritual dynamism goes beyond—actus credentis non terminatur ad enuntiabile sed ad rem (“the act of believing ends not at the expressible but at the deed”; ST IIa IIae. q.1. a. 2. ad 2)—and aims toward God himself through what it causes us to say truthfully about him. And in the framework of an intellectualist eschatology* in which the absolute future of humanity is a plenitude of knowledge, faith itself takes on a certain eschatological coloration: on this side of death it is like a “foretaste of the future vision” (In Sent. III. d. 23. q.2. a. 1. ad 4) that it promises to human beings. The necessity of belief is finally rooted in the created nature of human beings (before the Fall, Adam* must have believed) and not in the concrete conditions of sinful existence.

Beginning with Duns* Scotus, followed by Ockham, medieval theology underwent a reorganization. The clearest result of this was a reduction of the field of philosophical knowledge and hence an enlargement of the realm of faith. When the order of things no longer appeared to be the product of a divine will conceived on the model of arbitrary will, Anselm’s idea of a discernment of “necessary reasons” was doomed to disappear in favor of other concepts: that of faith defined as “learned ignorance” or as an “incomprehensible grasp of the incomprehensible” (Nicholas* of Cusa); or that of a confidence that refused to base itself on any form of credibility* or to ally itself with any form of philosophy.

3. Reformation and Modern Theology

a) The theology of Luther* carried out a work of concentration: a christological concentration on the one hand, and a concentration on the living experience of faith on the other. A certain number of refusals followed: a refusal to accept the existence of a “dead faith” (the only mortal sin is the sin against the Holy Spirit, and its consequence is the disappearance of all faith); a rejection of the Augustinian distinction between fides quae and fides qua and of the distinction made by Peter Lombard between fides catholica and fides cum caritate; and a rejection of the distinction between acquired faith and innate faith (WA 6. 84–86). These refusals were the result of positions taken. Luther understood faith primarily as a salvific process that is worked out in human beings by the Holy Spirit. It is also understood as the birth certificate of the new person—fides facit personam (WA 39/1. 283. 1)—and as the focus of a theological experience (faith-hope-charity) from which it cannot be abstracted and in which, moreover, it appropriates traits characteristic of hope and charity. Faith also is born from the Word*—fides ex auditu (Rom 10:17)—and requires no legitimation.

Because it is based in Jesus Christ and is lived as faith in him (credere in), it is not possible to isolate the contents of faith that individuals might meditate upon in a first stage and then assent to in a second stage. In the end, only faith makes it possible to recognize the divinity of God, and Luther found provocative language for this assertion: “Fides est creatrix divinitatis, non in persona, sed in nobis—Faith creates divinity not in itself but in us; outside of faith, God loses his justice, his glory, etc.; where faith is lacking, there remains nothing of his majesty and his divinity” (WA 40/1. 360. 5ff.).

The Lutheran sola fide is intelligible only on the condition that we recognize that it depends on a new arrangement of the realm of faith by virtue of which “belief” receives an unprecedented extension. By refusing to distinguish in the act of faith between the work of reason and the work of will (and the emotions), Luther in fact posits that faith is a gift of the Holy Spirit to the entire person* and an offering of the entire person to God. The concept deserves to be called “existential,” something also shown in Luther’s lack of interest in protological (on the faith or the knowledge of Adam) or eschatological speculations. Faith is an act of the whole person, and it is so in a manner not susceptible to analysis. Finally, although the logic of confidence, fiducia, is also a logic of knowledge, since the particularity of faith is to recognize God given to humanity on the cross of Jesus*, it has no rational preamble and does not open onto a new use of speculative reason. The problem of the faith of simple people therefore does not arise, for the act of faith is the same in all, and in the world there is nothing beyond the act of faith.

The theory nevertheless required adjustments when the rebellion of a single man against medieval Catholicism took the form of a mass movement that was finally organized into a church. Lived faith had to be inscribed in symbolic books, and Reformation confessions of faith revived in Protestantism* the notion of fides quae. The experience of preaching* and especially the experience of confessional polemics also demonstrated that recourse to the purity of the gospel in fact required the development of a theology. It thus fell to Luther’s best disciple, Melancthon, to systematize the founding teachings of the Reformation in didactic form. The first important characteristic of this systematic organization was the reemphasis on the content of faith: “Fides est assentio, qua accipis omnes articulos fidei, et est fiducia acquiescens in Deo propter Mediatorem—Faith is the assent of whoever accepts all the articles of faith, and it is the confidence of whoever accepts God by reason of the Mediator” (CR 23. 456).

The act of faith is broken down into three stages: “perception” (notitia), “assent” (assensus), and “confidence” (fiducia). Perception and assent are the work of reason, confidence the work of the will. This conception might be called neoclassical. It does not distort the governing idea of faith alone as justification, and its general outline was adopted by Calvin*. However, Calvin introduced a new factor into the analysis, incredulity, of which he asserts that it is “always mixed with faith” (Inst. 1536, 3. 2. 4). Protestant theology of the 17th century did not modify this balance.

It was in its decree on justification* that the Council of Trent* responded to Protestant theologies of faith. First of all, Trent rejected the earlier concentration on the question of faith and reaffirmed the doctrine of the theological virtues: the union of human person and God could not be accomplished in the single element of faith but required hope and charity (DS 1531). It then rejected the concept of fiducia, which could lead to belief in the possibility of a subjective certainty of salvation: cum nullus scire valeat certitudine fidei, cui non potest subesse falsum, se gratiam Dei esse consecutum (DS 1534). The council further recalled that theological life is a response in man to prevenient grace (DS 1553), which enables free will to cooperate with the work of the God who “calls” him. Lastly, the grace of God does not revive a free will that original sin has abolished (“slave will”), but brings about its restoration.

b) From Trent to the early 20th century, two separate but linked problems were to occupy most of the attention of Catholic theology: the analysis of the act of faith and of the (rational) preambles to faith. In a complex history, two major tendencies stand out.

- 1) In response to the suspicions that the Reformation had brought to bear on the capacities of reason, there was a reorganization of apologetics from which was to arise a “fundamental* theology” endowed with an ambitious program: to demonstrate the “truth of religion,” “Christian truth,” and “Catholic truth” (demonstratio religiosa, demonstratio christiana, demonstratio catholica). New missionary necessities were added to the needs of confessional polemics. In the face of the libertines, arguments had to be made in favor of religion as such. A “new world” had to be evangelized. The duty of speaking presupposed the possibility of an intelligible and true discourse. Without the notion of a reason universally imparted to everyone, always present in sinful human beings who innately aspired to belief, this program could not be carried out. It is not without significance that the spearhead of missionary Catholicism, the Society of Jesus, chose as its official theologian Thomas Aquinas, one of the medieval thinkers most confident in the powers of reason. But while the arguments of medieval theologians, including Thomas, proposed first to explore the field of rational experience opened up by faith, and only secondarily to pick out the rational preambles to faith, modern apologetics was paradoxically constructed so as to delay the moment of belief in order to provide a better basis for the rationality of that belief. The central christological and Trinitarian affirmations of Christian discourse, were, of course, never subsumed under the authority of an apologetic demonstration—it is because G. Hermes assigned excessive tasks to its apologetic that he was accused of “rationalism*” in 1835. But in support of its preaching the church could rely either on facts (fulfillment of prophecies and miracles, with the resurrection of Jesus as the supreme miracle) or on universal truths of reason, above all the existence of God. And with perfect coherence, Vatican* I finally set the entire authority of the church behind a definition of the prerogatives of a nontheological knowledge of God in aid of faith—the prerogatives of a nontheological theoretical enterprise conducted under the supervision of theology.

During the same period there appeared in Catholic thought the form of irrationalism known as *fideism. In the form it assumed in the work of Bautain, and which was condemned, fideism was not identical to a rejection of all forms of credibility and of any preambles to faith. But it replaced the leitmotif of an intellect in search of faith with the idea of a cor quaerens fidem, the logic of which necessarily led to the diminution of the claims of rationality and a neglect of the tools of rational apologetics. A major point, however, is worth noting. The condemnation of fideism was made by positing the possibility of a certain knowledge of God through natural reason (DS 2751; repeated by Vatican* II, DV §6) and later (in the antimodernist Oath) even the possibility of a demonstrative proof of the existence* of God (DS 3538). But the documents do not at all suggest that this knowledge is achieved anywhere in a normative form. They speak rather of a perpetual labor of reason by saying that it can in principle be accomplished.

- 2) These concerns also led to new questions concerning the act of faith. The motive force of faith, its “formal object,” is the “authority of the God who reveals [himself]”; it is because there is free obedience that there is faith, which is a consent to believe where one does not see. A problem followed for the theoreticians of the analysis fidei: how to think of the personal contribution of the person to his or her act of faith. There was certainly no question of reconsidering the strictly supernatural character of faith as defined by the Council of Orange. But after those reversals in theory and in the church that were caused by the Reformation, it was, on the other hand, necessary to restate in new terms that the act of faith was—also—the meritorious result of a free decision.

The concerns of Christian humanism, as Erasmus* had defended them against Luther, were then taken over by the missionary concerns of the 16th and 17th centuries. In this case, too, the predominant role played by the Jesuits in the pastoral enterprises of the time, whether in the intellectual and spiritual training of the elite of the old world or in the evangelization (conversion*) of newly discovered cultures, largely explains the concern to grant to human beings, as creatures called on to believe, the greatest freedom that theology could countenance. Greek theology had resolved this problem in the patristic age by making use of the concept of cooperation between God and human beings (sumergeia), so that divine activity did not lessen human activity but made it fully possible. This concept, however, had never been articulated in a system (which probably explains its persisting suggestive power). The Catholicism of the Counter Reformation, on the contrary, wished to systematize, which led both to heterodox constructions (the “Augustinians gone astray” [Lubac*]: Baius and Jansenius) and to competing constructions among which the Roman magisterium* finally admitted it was unable to decide: Bañezianism* and Molinism. The debates had to do not only with faith: in fact, predestination* and the divine presence, together with the status of evil* and God’s permitting of it, were the most discussed questions. But whether one defended a theory of grace in which a divine gesture—“physical premotion”—was a precondition for any human spiritual decision (Bañez), or a theory of “concord” between nature* and grace (Molina), the question of the act of faith soon appeared in the debate. The intentions governing its appearance were no doubt pure. But the kinds of theological analysis to which they led (and to which they led all the parties to the debate)—breaking down the act of faith into moments, the distribution of intellectual and voluntary-affective factors according to the moments at which they came into play, the localization of the help provided by grace—had the result of putting theories into circulation, or creating a theoretical climate, in which faith lost all its lived unity. And the assimilation of the content of faith to a system of true propositions, a constant temptation of post-Tridentine theology, added a depersonalizing aspect to the doctrines that were proposed.

c) In the same period, Protestant theology had simultaneously to integrate the exigencies of an irrationalism—Pietism*—and those of rationalism—the Aufklärung or German Enlightenment.

- 1) Pietism was more a theology of Christian life than a theology of the access to Christianity, and its first distinctive note was the orchestration on a large scale of a traditional theme that the reformers had not forgotten, that of Christian experience as a new or a regenerated life. The Pietists affirmed this by linking justification with sanctification, by emphasizing the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in human beings, but also by dismissing any merely imputational concept of justification in favor of a conception of faith as the “life of Christ in us,” as the experience of a Christus inhabitans (already present in Weigl). Making its appearance later, the second distinctive note of Pietism was the assignment of Christian experience to the realm of the “heart.” The enterprise of Pietist theology was then to carry out an “affective transposition of doctrine” (Pelikan) in which the contents of faith were articulated in such a manner that they called for the assent of the heart rather than of reason, and in which faith in turn committed the believer to a life of “piety” and sanctification entirely governed by feeling. This theology intended to be “experiential” (Oetinger), understanding by that the immediate experience of the Holy Spirit. And it revealed its real provocative force when it asserted that the only ones who possessed fiducia (bluntly, the only ones who really had faith) were those who had known such an experience. These premises did not prevent Pietism from taking on missionary activities. In the late 18th century the Discourses of Schleiermacher* and the Génie du christianisme of Chateaubriand demonstrated that the religion of feeling could also be organized in apologetic form, and then Schleiermacher’s Christian Faith offered a dogmatics that is from beginning to end dominated by religious feeling.

- 2) It was principally as a response to the Enlightenment that the apologetics of feeling was conceived, and the faith it proposed was one that knew, or thought it knew, that reason no longer led to God. In the voice of Kant*, the moderate wing of the Aufklärung had said both that theoretical reason knew nothing of God and that that left the field open to faith. On the other hand, Enlightenment philosophy had also had its radicals, who had asserted that the limits of the rational were the limits of the knowable. The consequences were many: a grammar of belief translated into postulates of practical reason (Kant); a Christianity devoid of mystery (Toland); a first historicist “demythologization” of Christian origins (Reimarus); and a skeptical rationalism that knew no access to God other than the “leap” of faith (Lessing); among others. A faith not in search of reason and a reason not in search of faith, simplistic a dilemma as it may seem, does not overly distort the spirit of the age. Two theological tactics were possible and were followed: that of a rationalist theology principally concerned with justifying all its statements by the standards of enlightened reason (theological “rationalism,” in the technical sense of the term), and that of a systematic theology of feeling for which emotion alone is the organ of knowledge in religious matters (Schleiermacher and his posterity). The 19th century, however, saw the opening of a third path, a redefinition of the reciprocal positions of “reason” and “faith.”

- d) Destined to have no theological influence—or at least none that was faithful to their intentions—before the 20th century, the works of Hegel* and Schelling* contain a more or less revolutionary contribution to the disputatio de fide. The contents of faith, in Hegel’s Phenomenology and Logic and in Schelling’s Philosophy of Revelation, actually become philosophical objects in their own right. Christian exoterism is thus pushed to its highest point. The positivity of Christianity and the inscription of what is believable in Christianity in a history and in facts are all offered to the operation of the intelligence, on the sole condition that rationality sets itself no a priori limit, that is, on condition that it truly intends to perform a work of reason (Vernunft) and not to content itself, like the Enlightenment, with a work of understanding (Verstand). A hint of rationalism readily arises. If in Hegel there is still room for religious faith in the journey of the knowing mind, this journey concludes with a full experience of the rational, an “absolute knowledge” that knows faith better than faith knows itself; and knows the contents of faith better than faith itself knows them, because it knows them by means of conceptualization and faith knows them by means of “representation.” However, the idea of a reason essentially capable of thinking what faith believes corresponds in part to Anselm’s interest in “necessary reasons.” Furthermore, the idea of a philosophy that assigns central positions to a Christology* and a Trinitarian theology breaks down a barrier between philosophy and theology that had only been constructed in the 13th century and that Bonaventure himself had not really known. The question of a knowledge (gnôsis) that knows more and better than faith nevertheless raises objections that the texts cannot resolve satisfactorily. This is a culmination of theological intellectualism,* in the context of which the faith of simple people cannot be seen as embodying a fullness of experience. This position prohibits in advance someone like Theresa of Lisieux from playing a magisterial role in the church.

e) On the fringes of the debates of his time, the work of Kierkegaard also had to await the 20th century (namely, the appearance of “dialectical theology”) before it exercised real influence. It contains two aspects, the first of which easily masks the second. Against Hegelian intellectualism (the “system”), Kierkegaard is first of all the theoretician of a strict voluntarism* that frequently recalls Lessing’s “leap of faith.” Conceived in a strictly apophatic manner as an “absolute paradox,” separated from man by an “infinite qualitative difference,” the God of Kierkegaard makes impossible the traditional interplay between intellectus quaerens fidem and fides quaerens intellectum. On the one hand, faith does nothing but accomplish a break in relation to any other human act (intellectual or emotional). On the other hand, it is not defined as something that restores a reason weakened by sin (Bonaventure), or as establishing a reason even more reasonable than that of Adam—nothing lies beyond the pure act of belief. As rigorous a fideism as possible is linked, however, to a reorganization of knowledge in which, in a very paradoxical way, Kierkegaard accomplishes by other means a part of Hegel’s and Schelling’s program. In this instance too, a division of labor that had become canonical is abolished in favor of a unified field in which the logic of “existence” is given at bottom only a single duty, the defense and illustration of the Lutheran fides facit personam. The reasons governing the Philosophical Fragments are those of Christology. A dialectic of existence, clearly aimed at founding faith in no other way than on the paradox of the God who has come incognito among human beings, unfolds, however, in such a way that the Christian experience effects a horde of meanings. There is no “system of existence,” says Kierkegaard. The question of faith, moreover, does not have to do with a body of truths to be believed, but with the person of the God who invites us to follow him. The coincidence of access to Christianity and access to the self (to the truth of subjectivity), however, makes possible a recapitulation of the whole person in the life lived before God. And finally, by denying that belief was easier for the disciple of the first generation than it is for modern man, Kierkegaard is led to form a concept of “contemporaneity” that provides a first profound response to the challenges of the historical critique of the foundations of faith, whether that critique came from the Enlightenment or from the Hegelians of the left.

Protestant theology of the 19th century was divided among the various influences mentioned above. Schleiermacher’s idea of a faith coextensive with feeling was predominant. The work of the Aufklärung was also continued in the form of a historical-critical demolition of Christian sources that was to culminate in Schweitzer’s judgment that Jesus was totally unknowable, and his proposition of an act of faith that could no longer even claim certainly to derive from a gospel. Finally, Liberal Protestantism called into question the christological structure that the principal current of Christianity had always recognized in faith. Distinguishing faith in Jesus from the faith of Jesus (e.g., Harnack, Das Wesen des Christentums, 1900), and favoring the latter, made possible the appearance of a new notitia (entrusted with determining what critical history had left intact in Christianity) and a new assensus (entrusted with acquiescing to the Good News of God the Father); and although fiducia survived, it was only in the form of a certain piety.

From the Restoration to the First Vatican Council, the interventions of the Roman magisterium in theological life made it possible to lay out a path—that of a faith without fideism and a reason without rationalism—and the appearance of a triumphant Neoscholasticism sometimes seemed to indicate the appropriate way of following that path. The modernist crisis, however, was to demonstrate that more significant readjustments would be necessary. The crisis arose first from the repercussions of Protestant exegesis among the Catholic intelligentsia, and when it broke out, the Catholic tradition* and the Protestant tradition were on the point of once again taking up a common history.

4. Contemporary Theology

“New Thought,” the title of an article in which the Jewish philosopher Rosenzweig summarized the arguments of his Star of Redemption, also expressed the general ambition of contemporary forms of Christianity. Throughout various schools and confessions, common needs had in fact appeared, and new possibilities had surfaced.

- 1) The needs were linked to the appearance of philosophies “of the person.” Employed to designate the concrete individual engaged in the operation of all his or her faculties, the concept of person could render appreciable service by avoiding the subtle divisions between rational, voluntary, and affective factors characteristic of classical theology. In this context the merit of Rousselot (1878–1915) was to propose the first description of the access to faith that proceeded by means of a concrete integration of all the dynamics at work (credibility). Rousselot himself was influenced by the Grammar of Assent of Newman*, a book of 1870 that was nevertheless ahead of its time. Instead of treating assent as the final moment of an intellectual-discursive process, Newman linked it to a complex intuition

- based on a “sense of inference,” the illative sense. It was only after Rousselot that Newman’s epistemology became common currency.
- 2) The lexicon of the “personal” appeared elsewhere to criticize the representation of an “objective” and disinterested rational activity, a representation that was extremely difficult to use in a theory of the act of faith. The important book on this question was Personal Knowledge by the chemist and epistemologist Polanyi (1958). Devoted to bringing to the fore the uncriticized presuppositions of any intellectual work and the tacit beliefs that such work presupposed, to showing the element of self-implication (hence of “nonobjectivity”) that it involved, and to demonstrating the need for a certain theoretical aptitude (skills) that can derive only from concrete contact with reality, the book put an end to a caricature of scientific rationality. In doing so, it made possible a clearer perception that the act of faith is not rational despite what it contains of self-implication and decision (see Torrance, Ed., Belief in Science and Christian Life: The Relevance of M. Polanyi’s Thought for Christian Faith and Life, Edinburgh, 1980).
 - 3) Another related event was the theological acceptance of Gadamer’s hermeneutics*. Truth and Method by Gadamer (1960) carried out a critique in high style of “prejudices against prejudice,” which made possible a clearer apprehension of the (“hermeneutic”) logic according to which the act of faith included an act of comprehension, itself relying on precomprehensions. And because it included a rejection of all individualist theories and situated every work of interpretation within interpretive traditions, it also made possible the location of the act of faith within the total interpretive work of the Christian community.
 - 4) The ecclesial status of faith was also to become a major concern. Theologies dealt with it in different ways. In Catholicism by H. de Lubac (1938), “to believe” is conjugated in the plural by showing the presence of ecclesiological elements in the entire architecture of Christian dogma*. In the same period, philosophies of the person attempted to propose a concept of the “we” (e.g., G. Marcel). Later, J.D. Zizioulas was to emphasize the strictly “ontological” novelty of belonging to the church. As for narrative* theologies, they provided a useful description of faith as an entry into a community that affirms its identity by telling its founding stories and as a personal appropriation of those stories.
 - 5) After a long tradition of indifferent silence, it was thus impossible not to ask what “believe” means biblically. To be sure, it was still possible in 1952 to write a treatise on faith in which the present experience of faith is not thought of as a reactualization of acts normatively rooted in the experience of Israel and of the first Christian generation (Guérard des Lauriers, Dimensions de la foi), but as acquiescence to a doctrine, and thereby to ratify the opposition proposed by Buber (1950) between Jewish faith (“historical”) and Christian faith (“doctrinal”). Against Buber, however, the main current of theology was able to establish that in this domain continuity won out over discontinuity (see Flusser 1994; Werblowsky 1988), so that Israel’s capacities for the experience of God also entered into a Christian experience taken in its complete existential dimensions. Christian faith is not a Greek attitude.
 - 6) Also recuperated were patristic sources, and with them a concept of “knowledge” enriched with all the overtones of the gnōsis of Clement of Alexandria and Origen. The concept of fides quaerens intellectum consequently ceased to be that of a faith seeking to give itself conceptual tools, and could again designate an innate impulse of faith; “intellection” ceased to be understood primarily as the production of knowledge and revealed a more complex (and more experiential) logic of knowledge.
 - 7) A more flexible idea of rationality imposed itself all the more in the 20th century because belief frequently lost its status as an image of the irrational and was positively integrated into the logic of knowledge. In Husserl it could be learned that consciousness lives innately in the element of belief. By focusing on ordinary language and the experiences that it expresses, analytical philosophy was also able to observe that the border between belief and knowledge is less certain than the old models of reason suggested. The “Wittgensteinian fideism” of which D. Z. Phillips is considered the earliest proponent (see Nielsen, Philosophy, 1967) is the most brilliant example in the Anglo-American world of a philosophy that affirms the full legitimacy of belief while at the same time prohibiting any foundational maneuver.
 - 8) The disappearance of the propositional theory of revelation* (a product of post-Tridentine dogmatics) also made possible any dissociation between “believe in” and “believe that” (see Price 1965), in favor of the latter. In the principal theological currents of all confessions, the act of faith then appears less as an acquiescence to a body of truths (which it still is as late as Roussetot) than as the discovery of a divine Thou. An apologetics of proof necessarily tends to yield place to a pedagogy of spiritual experience aimed at providing a unified initiation into a Christian experience whose possibility it knows to be rooted a priori in every human person: for example, in the “transcendental Thomism” derived from Maréchal (Lotz, Rahner*, Coreth, and others); in Schaeffler (Fähigkeit zur Erfahrung, 1982), within the framework of a hermeneutics of meaning; and in J. Mouroux, in an approach that combines Thomist inspiration with personalist influences (L'expérience chrétienne, 1954).

- 9) Finally, we can note a new interest in the language of faith. The question was classically that of the contents of faith, of the true language used by the one who believes. The influence of research on self-involving languages (Evans, The Logic of Self-involvement, 1963) has, however, led contemporaries to be more willing to interpret the language of confessions of faith, of prayer*, and of the liturgy* (Bruaire 1977; Ladrière 1984). As for the secular philosophical research devoted in Great Britain to the phenomenon of faith (Price, Cohen, Helm, etc.), they are awaiting their theological reception from which could emerge a new evaluation of the fides quae as well as a new perception of the relationships between theological faith, belief, and knowledge.

Two common characteristics are shared by most of these tendencies. 1) The first is an interpretation of faith that sees it first as a reality that is destined to survive. Attributing to faith an eschatological or pre-eschatological dimension is not really theologically original. But whereas medieval theology placed primary emphasis on the distance separating faith and “vision,” contemporary theology is more willing to emphasize a continuity. This emphasis is expressed in radical form by von Balthasar*, who paradoxically maintains that faith is a divine mode of existence (1984). Another radical form is provided by the realized eschatology of Bultmann*, for whom a present faith today grasps the truth of existence in such a way that nothing remains to be hoped for. In any event, and excepting such extreme cases, theologies of the 20th century agree in describing the experience of faith as establishing in human beings modes of being that characterize their humanity in a definitive manner.

2) A theology concerned with distinguishing the factors—intellectual, affective, voluntary—that enter in the form of a sequence into the genesis of the act of faith has been replaced by a theology more concerned to describe the simultaneous cooperation of everything that makes up human beings (or the “person”). In the theory of faith proposed by Balthasar, the preeminence accorded to the concept of evidence and the choice of an aesthetic model bind truth and experience together in a meaningful way (evidence is the experience of truth) and give to experience a twofold content, intellectual and affective. What is given to be believed, insofar as it is given to be believed, is also given to be loved and so provides grounds for hope. An integral theory of faith does not seem to be thinkable if it is not in fact organized as a theological anthropology*.

- K. Barth (1931), Fides quaerens intellectum, Anselms Beweis des Existenz Gottes im Zusammenhang seines theologischen Programms, Zürich, GA II/2, 1981.
- M. Buber (1950), Zwei Glaubensweisen, Zürich, Gerlingen (2nd Ed. 1994).
- R. Bultmann (1953), Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Göttingen, §35–37 (8th Ed. 1980).
- J. Hick (1957), Faith and Knowledge, London (3rd Ed. 1988).
- H. D. Lewis (1959), Our Experience of God, London.
- K. Jaspers (1962), Der philosophische Glaube angesichts der Offenbarung, Munich.
- H. H. Price (1965), “Belief ‘in’ and Belief ‘that,’” RelSt 1, 1–27.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1967), “Bewegung zu Gott,” in Spiritus Creator, Skizzen zur Theologie 3, Einsiedeln, 13–50.
- J. Mouroux (1968), A travers le monde de la foi, CFI 31.
- L. Malevez (1969), Pour une théologie de la foi, ML.T 63.
- H. de Lubac (1970), La foi chrétienne: Essai sur le symbole des apôtres, 2nd Rev. Ed., Paris, 149–407.
- C. Bruaire (Ed.) (1977), La confession de la foi, Paris, 231–76 (article by G. Kalinowski, M. Constantini, and J.-L. Marion).
- W. Pannenberg (1980), “Wahrheit, Gewißheit und Glaube,” in Grundfr. syst. Th. 2, Göttingen, 226–64.
- G. E. M. Anscombe (1981), “Faith,” in Ethics, Religion, and Politics: Collected Philosophical Papers 3, Oxford, 113–20.
- R. Swinburne (1981), Faith and Reason, Oxford.
- J. Ratzinger (1982), Theologische Prinzipienlehre, Munich, 15–87.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1984), “Die Einheit der theologischen Tugenden,” IKaZ 13, 306–14.
- I. U. Dalferth (1984), Existenz Gottes und christlicher Glaube, BEvTh 93, §134–74.
- J. Ladrière (1984), L'articulation du sens, CFI 125 and 126.
- G. Lanczkowski et al. (1984), “Glaube,” TRE 13, 275–365.
- H. Fries (1985), Fundamentaltheologie, Graz, 17–103.
- G. Picht (1991), Glauben und Wissen, Stuttgart.
- D. Flusser (1994), “Buber’s ‘Zwei Glaubensweisen,’” annex to M. Buber, Zwei Glaubensweisen, Gerlingen, 186–247.
- W. Lad Sessions (1994), The Concept of Faith: A Philosophical Investigation, Ithaca-London.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE AND NICOLAS LOSSKY

See also Credibility; Hope; Love; Philosophy; Reason; Revelation; Truth

Faith of Christ. See Christ's Consciousness

Fall. See Sin, Original

Family

A religious conception of the family has been obvious since the epoch of the patriarchs in Israel*: the family is made for procreation* and is intended to transmit inheritance and secure the protection of its members, whether they be related by blood, marriage*, or adoption. These presuppositions are no longer accepted. Knowing that family and structures of kinship take many forms across cultures, we are tempted to say that the family is only a social construction. Some have gone further, stating that this construction is the enemy of individual liberty*, emotional fulfillment, or gender equality. It remains the case, however, that no known society* has left human sexuality to function in a purely anarchic way, and that the multiplicity of familial structures shares one common feature: the universal existence of rules of marriage and systems of kinship. The contemporary context is, in Western society, that of a crisis of the so-called “traditional” family, and economic globalization is tending to promote a similarly critical situation within other cultures. In the face of this crisis, and of the fact that it is not a development external to the church*, one might at least expect that moral theology* would be of service. In a situation of total uncertainty in secular discourses on the family, it might provide theologically exact coordinates for a Christian response to this crisis. The present crisis proves, perhaps, that the family is “a new idea, yet to be discovered” (Chapelle 1996).

a) Family in the Bible. In the Old Testament, family presupposes a patriarchal, largely patrilineal and endogamous kinship system, in which the production of male heirs is a chief concern. Israel needs sons: to ensure continuity of the people’s faith* and traditions* (Ex 13:14f.; Dt 6:20–25) and, in the pre-exilic period, to pass on family holdings (but see Nm 27:1–11 and 36:1–14 on female inheritance in default of a male line). Women* find their social and religious identity primarily as mothers. This is the basic purpose of marriage, even though, ideally, spouses should also be partners and friends linked by mutual fidelity (Gn 1–3). Marriage was sometimes polygamous in the patriarchal period and until about the time of the monarchy (Gn 29:21–30; 2 Sm 5:13–16; 1 Kgs 11:1f.). Concubinage was also permitted (Gn 16:1–4 and 30:1–13). Levirate marriage, requiring a man to marry his brother’s widow and beget sons in his name, provided protection to the bereaved woman and furthered continuation of the family line (Gn 38:8; Dt 25:5–10). Only husbands could initiate divorce (Dt 24:1–4; but see Mal 2:14f. for a critique of this situation). Sex outside marriage was prohibited, but much more stringently for women than for men (Lv 20:10; Dt 22:22–29; Prv 5:7, 5:27), since female promiscuity threatened patrilineal inheritance.

In the New Testament, this family-centered ethic is perceptibly amended, if not subverted outright. Marriage and family are the background for many of the sayings and parables* of Jesus*, and in them he takes up at least one position against Israelite family law*, in the form of his rejection of divorce (Mt 5:27f. and 19:9; Mk 10:11f.; Lk 16:18; 1 Cor 7:10f.). Of more importance, however, is the call to join the community of disciples, which is structured in a way that owes nothing to marital or familial status. Not only does the founding experience of individual call and individual response occur outside the institution of the family, but family loyalties can create an obstacle to the demands of the gospel (Mt 10:37 and 12:46–50; Mk 3:31–35 and 10:29; Lk 8:19f. and 14:26; Gal 3:28). It was certainly possible for late medieval theology to take the “holy family”—Jesus, Mary, and Joseph—as a model for every family of believers. However, in order to find scriptural legitimization for this model, it must be perceived as what it was, a family that God’s initiative had caused to deviate from all other received models.

In the Roman Empire, where Christianity first spread, the family, familia, was placed under the authority of the paterfamilias and included not only relatives in the strict sense but also slaves, servants, and property. In the form of marriage most common in the first century A.D., the wife remained under the authority of her natal familia and hence was not a member of that of her husband, though they shared a common domicile. Conversely, married children of the paterfamilias remained members of his familia, but usually occupied separate residences. Membership in a particular family considerably influenced a person’s identity and social role. Adoption (of an adult male, preferably from among kin) was a common means of transmitting and controlling a name, a patrimony, or a line of succession. Marriage served the same aim, and also served to increase a family’s influence and wealth. A hierarchical friendship between spouses and a long-lasting marriage were the ideal, but such an ideal was rarely realized, especially in the upper classes. Older men were usually married to younger women (girls married at 12), which often precluded egalitarian relationships; sexual activity outside marriage was accepted for men but prohibited for citizen women. Divorce and remarriage were frequent, for political as well as personal reasons; consequently, precariousness was an important feature of familial experience. In this context, the appearance of a group, the Christians, who downplayed the importance of family roles and regarded themselves as primarily a community of brothers, clearly called the patriarchal institution into question.

In the earliest Christian communities, the lively expectation of a Parousia* that was believed to be imminent certainly led to doubts as to whether it was appropriate to found a family. This reluctance dissipated as the Parousia was deferred into the future. Nevertheless, it left a trace, in the attribution of eschatological significance to celibacy chosen “for the sake of the kingdom.” More important, no doubt, was the very rapid appearance of “domestic codes” intended for married Christians. These codes were generally adaptations from Greek philosophical models and revealed a church eager to articulate norms for family life, partly because of the threat of persecution. They address the members of households in hierarchical relationships (husband/wife, father/children, master/slave) and urge submission on the subordinate party while exhorting the paterfamilias to love* and restraint (Eph 5:21–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1; 1 Pt 2:18–3:7). Abstracted from all the New Testament testimony, these texts have undeniably been used throughout the centuries to assert within the family a man’s authority and a woman’s submission, a practice that stands in tension with the egalitarian thrust of the preaching* of the Kingdom. A major theoretical task thus made its appearance: because the eschaton had not been realized in the “event of Jesus Christ,” the right of family structures to have a legitimate place among Christian realities had to be guaranteed; but because the eschaton had been well and truly anticipated, the fraternal experience of the disciples had to be permitted to become the measure and the norm for the family experience.

b) Family in Christian Tradition. The Encratite tendency to place a wholly negative value on the physical dimension of existence was very quickly rejected by the church, but it survived in a minor mode among patristic authors. Thus, some Fathers*, most notably Jerome (c. 342–420), came close to condemning marriage in their praise of virginity. The mainstream, represented, for example, by Clement of Alexandria (c. 150–215), saw marriage, lived in a spirit of self-control and aimed at producing children, as compatible with the Christian life (Stromata 2, 23, SC 38; Paedagogus 2, 10, SC 108). The family possessed theological legitimacy because it was a site for the transmission of faith: the religious education and spiritual good* of children was its true raison d’être. John Chrysostom*, who compared the family to a small church, urged married couples to turn aside from wealth and luxury, and to educate the members of their families for lives of prayer* and service (Hom. in Eph. 20, PG 62, 135–48).

The indissolubility of marriage was gradually imposed in theology and canon* law. By protecting women against divorce initiated by their husbands or fathers, indissolubility promoted equality within the couple* and gave couples some leverage against paternal power. With the reforms of Gregory VII (c. 1015–85), canon law prohibited remarriage after divorce. Since the theory of the purposes of marriage included the licit exercise of sexuality, each of the marital partners had the right to demand that the other perform his or her “conjugal duty.” On the other hand, men and women of all social classes could always enter into the religious life in the name of an ideal of virginity that trumped the demands of family life.

The position of the Reformers was partly a response to the abuses to which church regulation of marriage had given rise and partly a reaction against the celibacy that the church had not succeeded in imposing on clerics* in a satisfactory way. The logic of the Reformist reaction held that marriage and family were ordinary and blessed states of life, ordained by God for human benefit, and in relation to which the church had no function other than to attest God’s blessing*. Luther viewed the family as the basic unit of society, a privileged realm where a Christian bore the cross and served God and neighbor. Subsequently, Puritanism* established an exceptionally strong connection between the family and religious identity. God made a “covenant of grace” with believers and their descendants, in which children were not guaranteed salvation* but could be made more open to it by efforts of their parents. This benefit accrued even to servants who shared in the family’s religious discipline. The assimilation of the family to a basic form of Christian community was still to be found in the writings of F. D. Maurice (1805–72), the most important Anglican moralist of the 19th century. It was even at the center of the “cult of domesticity” as advocated by authors such as Alexander Campbell (1788–1866). Within Catholicism*, the 20th century has witnessed a notable development in the treatment of the purposes of marriage: the documents of Vatican* II and the revised Code of Canon Law (1983) henceforth identify the community of love and mutual aid (mutuum adiutorium) as being of the most importance.

c) Modernity. The ideas and the reality of the modern world could not fail to have an impact on the family in general, and on the Christian idea of the family. Modern ideas included the ideals of the Enlightenment: individual dignity, personal responsibility, and individual freedom. Modern reality was that of an industrialized and urbanized world that separated the private sphere of women (the home and the education of children) from the public sphere of men (waged labor and politics). With the advent of a cash economy, a situation arose in which children’s marriages no longer depend on inherited property and (hence) on parental approval. In industrialized countries, fertility declined rapidly near the end of the 19th century, at the same time as the right to education and the right to vote were becoming accessible to women. Life spans increased, posing the problem of the care of elderly family members. The fact that the modern family is mobile, often due to circumstances of employment, has fragmented the networks of extended kin in which children, the sick, and the aged were cared for in previous generations. (One should, however, avoid overgeneralization on this point; it has been shown that the nuclear family did not make its first appearance during industrialization.) These new circumstances demonstrate that it is not sufficient to wish to obey the injunction to honor one’s parents; one must also have the support of a social system. Since the forms of the family are changing, the exercise of family responsibilities is also required to take on a new aspect.

In practice, Europe and North America, heirs to an already ancient intellectual tradition that privileges contractual relations to the detriment of family relations, display little dexterity in the theoretical and practical treatment of family realities: if authentic interpersonal bonds are born only from consent, then biological bonds become almost irrelevant. Accordingly, we witness the rejection of the patriarchal family and the appearance of “nontraditional” family relations between heterosexuals or homosexuals. Medical techniques aimed at providing remedies for sterility permit couples to buy, sell, or trade gametes and embryos, creating new relationships between parents and children. Consequently, the biological relationship of parents and children seems no longer to have any meaning in itself. The facts of nature seem to be totally absorbed into totally cultural practices. The family is no longer a given, to be presupposed, but a plastic reality, completely in the hands of humanity.

The consistency of education also poses a grave problem. Western laws authorize serial marriages, but, after divorce, men in Western cultures hold less responsibility for their children than in African or Asian societies that permit polygamy or institutionalized concubinage. Economic, social, and emotional insecurity, especially for women and children, has been a major and troubling consequence of rising divorce rates. In certain countries, the state has taken over some of the functions of support and education once the domain of the family. However, it is unclear whether children can become responsible adults without a strong family network.

d) The Christian Position. A Christian discourse on the family must be organized around a number of doctrines. The theories of creation*, original sin*, and incarnation* provide the base for all possible theologies of the body, and they imply an ethic of corporeal realities that perceives procreation and kinship as strong determinants of family ties. At the same time, the position that love occupies in the logic of virtues*—it is both the “form” of all things and the qualifier of interpersonal relationships, as well as of the relationship with God—obviously prohibits us from regarding the family as a biologically grounded social mechanism for the efficient organization of reproduction, material life, and protection. And because, logically, human love must see in the beloved a gift of God, which calls for fidelity, it is not possible for Christians to accept the idea of an indeterminate series of contracts that one may freely choose or break to maximize one’s own best interests.

In its recent teaching, the Catholic Church has revived a concept from the patristic era, calling the family a “domestic church” (Vatican II, LG 11, GS 48; see John Paul II, Familiaris consortio 21). A similar view has been proposed by Protestants, like Erich Fuchs (1995). The idea reaches back to the house churches of the New Testament, which gathered in individuals’ homes to celebrate the cult and for the agape (Rom 16:3–5). The concept has certainly retained its force, both descriptive and prescriptive, even though it demands to be more finely determined. For example, family relations cannot consistently claim to have a strictly ecclesial dignity unless greater equality within the family—especially between men and women—has been established. Moreover, if the Christian family should be a place of evangelization, it can only do so by allowing its members to acquire social and civic virtues as well as familial virtues. The idea of the “domestic church” is not that of a private moral and religious haven, set apart from the city*, but that of a school for faith, peace*, and hope* in the service of the common good. All the Christian churches have at their disposal the ecclesiological resources that are needed to permit the family to take on, in a coherent way, the task of coexistence lived out as communion* and service. All the churches also have an experience of tradition capable of shedding its light on familial mediations.

Unlike the church, the family doubtless has no eschatological future. Its order is that of divine “mandates” that humanity accomplishes within worldly historical time*. Nevertheless, theology knows that provisional realities receive a new meaning in the Christian experience*; the family must therefore appear as a reality “before and after” (Bonhoeffer), destined to be erased, but capable of engendering that which shall not pass away.

- Augustine, De bono conjugali, BAug 2, 15–99.
- Augustine, De nuptiis et concupiscentia, BAug 23, 41–289.
- Augustine, Ep. 188, CSEL 57.
- Jean-Paul II, Familiaris Consortio, AAS 74, 81–191.
- M. Luther, Genesisvorlesung, WA 44.
- M. Luther, Vom Ehehlichen Leben, WA 10/2.
- Cotton Mather, Cares about the Nursery, 1702.
- F.D. Maurice, The Church a Family, London, 1850.
- ♦ E. S. Morgan (1944, 1966), The Puritan Family: Religion and Domestic Relations in Seventeenth-Century New England, New York.
- P. Ariès (1960), L'enfant et la vie familiale sous l'Ancien Régime, Paris.
- N. Davies (1975), Society and Culture in Early Modern France, London.
- L. Stone (1977), Family, Sex, and Marriage in England, 1500–1800, New York.
- J.L. Flandrin (1979), Families in Former Times: Kinship, Household, and Sexuality, Cambridge–New York.
- Coll. (1981), “Pour une théologie de la famille,” EeT 12.
- D. Schneider (1984), A Critique of the Study of Kinship, Ann Arbor, Mich.
- J. Brundage (1987), Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe, Chicago.
- S. Okin (1989), Justice, Gender, and the Family, New York.
- B. Fox (Ed.) (1993), Family Patterns, Gender Relations, Toronto–Oxford–New York.
- L. Cahill and D. Mieth (Ed.) (1995), La famille, Conc(F) 261.
- Coll. (1995), La famille: Des sciences à l'éthique (Acts from the European Colloquia for the Institute of Family Studies, Lyons, April 1994), Paris.
- É. Fuchs (1995), “La famille: Réflexions théologiques et éthiques,” EeT 26/1, 43–60.
- W. Right (1995), The Moral Animal: The New Science of Evolutionary Psychology, London.
- M. Banner (1996), “‘Who Are My Mother and My Brothers?’: Marx, Bonhoeffer, and Benedict and the Redemption of the Family,” Studies in Christian Ethics 9/1, 1–22.
- A. Chappelle (1996), “La famille dans la pensée moderne,” NRTh 118, 398–409.
- Coll. (1996), Famille en crise, Éthique, no. 21.
- É. Fuchs (1996), “Amour familial et conjugalité,” DEPhM, 51–55.

LISA SOWLE CAHILL

See also Couple; Ethics, Sexual; Marriage; Procreation; Woman

Family, Confessional

a) Meaning and Usage. In the early 19th century the Catholic theologian J.A. Moehler (Symbolik 1832) gave the name “confessions” to the various church currents internal to Christianity, which until then had been called “religions,” “religious parties,” or “Christian societies.” “Confession,” which already had various complementary meanings in theology*, has since then been the technical term used to designate a particular Christian tradition, a confessional family.

This usage can be explained historically and theologically against the background of the Reformation. Having challenged the magisterial and ministerial structures of the church*, as well as the centralized exercise of authority*, as being the glue and the expression of the unity* of the church, most of the communities that came out of the Reformation defined themselves in relation to doctrinal references set out in confessions of faith*. For example, the Augsburg Confession of 1530 became the common charter of the Lutheran churches; the Thirty-nine Articles that of the Anglican community; the Confession of Faith of La Rochelle (1559) that of the French Reformed churches. At their ordination*, pastors* committed themselves on the basis of these documents. Although their intentions were universal, these confessions defined the faith and identity of particular churches, and for that reason, when several of these churches made reference to a single document, they were called “confessions” or “confessional families”. In the late 19th century, geographical expansion led confessional families to organize themselves into world churches and to establish international structures. For example, in 1867 the Anglican Church organized the first meeting of the Lambeth Conference, which brought together all the bishops of that confessional family. In 1877, the Reformed churches founded the World Alliance of Reformed Churches; in 1881, the Methodist churches set up the World Methodist Council. The World Baptist Alliance was created in 1905, and the World Lutheran Federation in 1947.

Catholicism* and Orthodoxy* have always refused to be considered as confessional families. These churches do not see themselves as church traditions alongside others, but each one considers itself to be the sole full expression of the single Church of Jesus Christ. A more sociological approach to “confession” as the expression of a particular church identity would however lead to the inclusion of these churches within the group of confessional families. This notion is indirectly confirmed by the regular participation of the Orthodox patriarchate* and the Pontifical Council for Unity (Vatican) in meetings of the leadership of confessional families, which, since 1979, have preferred the title World Christian Communities.

b) Character and Structure of Confessional Families. For confessional families, it is understood that the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church takes on concrete existence in this world in plural forms. Each confessional family sees itself as an expression of that one church. Many consider themselves as world churches and are structured accordingly. This is the case for the Anglican communion and the communion of Lutheran churches, who each, in this way, approach the self-understanding of the Catholic and Orthodox churches. Others, by contrast, emphasize their character as free associations or federations of churches. Within a single confessional family, participating churches are conscious of belonging to the same spiritual family sharing a single historical heritage. Forms of piety and liturgical celebrations, doctrinal references, church structures*, as well as visions and priorities are the same, or at least very similar, for all. Member churches of a particular confessional family generally live in full church communion: communion in the celebration of the word* of God and of the sacraments*, as well as mutual recognition of ministries*. Their international bodies have analogous structures (regular general assemblies, executive committees, presidents and secretaries-general, commissions for theology, mutual aid, and education, etc.). The authority of international structures, however, remains limited. Member churches, generally organized into regional or national communities, insist on their autonomy, giving them the power of decision. After a difficult period during which many considered the Ecumenical Council of Churches (ECC) as a place in which distinctions between confessional families would be overcome, solid cooperation has now been established between the ECC and confessional families, almost all of whose churches are members of the ECC. Confessional families are the privileged locations for theological dialogue among Christian traditions. The reconciliation that has already taken place between various confessional families is essential for the unity of the whole church.

- H. E. Fey (1970), "Confessional Families and the Ecumenical Movement," in id. (Ed.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2: 1948–1968, Geneva, 115–42 (2nd Ed. 1986).
- Y. Ischida, H. Meyer, and E. Perret (1979), The History and Theological Concerns of World Confessional Families, LWF.R 14.

ANDRÉ BIRMELÉ

See also Anglicanism; Baptists; Calvinism; Catholicism; Creeds; Lutheranism; Methodism; Ecumenism; Orthodoxy; Pentecostalism; Unity of the Church; World Council of Churches

Father

A. Biblical Theology

a) Old Testament. The Hebrew word 'av means "father," but it is often also applied to a broader relationship across generations, for example, with the ancestor of a tribe (Gn 10:21, 17:4, 19:37), and, by extension, to the inventor of a skill or a mode of existence (Gn 4:20f.; Jer 35:6), a king (1 Sm 24:12), a prophet* (2 Kgs 2:12), a priest* (Jgs 17:10), a protector (Jb 29:16; Sir 4:10), a counselor (Gn 45:8), or the creator of rain (Jb 38:28, "Has the rain a father...?").

Fathers and mothers are to transmit instruction in wisdom* (Prv 1:8, 6:20), the narrative of Israel*, and the commandments (Ps 44:2, 78:3–8; Ex 12:26f., 13:14f.; Dt 6:20–25). The Law* prescribes duties in this domain (Ex 20:12, 21:15, 21:17; Dt 5:16; Lv 19:3). The rebellious son is to be punished with death*, but according to Deuteronomy 21:18–21, not by decision of his father alone, but after appearing before the elders (see Prv 30:17).

The predominantly patrilineal genealogies are an expression in time* of the union of the tribes in space (Gn 1–12; 1 Chr 1–9): they interpret God*'s plan. In relation to persons (A. Alt) or places (O. Eissfeldt), "the God of Abraham your father" (Gn 26:24 and, already in the sense of "ancestor," in Gn 28:13, 31:5, and 32:10) tends to become the "God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob" (Ex 3:6, 3:13). Deuteronomy (1:11, 1:21, 6:3) uses this formula to underline continuity from generation to generation. In Chronicles, it is a stereotype equivalent to YHWH (2 Chr 13:12), used in the struggle for conversion* (2 Chr 19:4) and against apostasy (2 Chr 34:33).

God is compared (analogy*) to a father who loves his children (Ps 103:13; Prv 3:12, 14:26). The filial status of the people is proclaimed (Dt 14:1; Is 1:2; Jer 3:19) as early as the eighth century B.C. (Hos 11:1). The assertion that Israel is the "firstborn son" of YHWH (Ex 4:22) is of uncertain date: according to Eissfeldt ("L"), this formula is part of the oldest stratum of the narrative, but according to Noth it may be Yahwist. It is set forth as the key to the whole narrative* of the departure from Egypt.

YHWH is also the father of the king. The notion of adoption, which was to play a major role in New Testament Messianism*, appears in Psalms* 2:7 (see 2 Sm 7:14 and 1 Chr 28:6). The king addresses YHWH as his "father," "the Rock of my salvation" (Ps 89:26). It is only later that God is more commonly invoked as a father (Sir 23:1 and 23:4 [Greek], 51:10 [Hebrew]; Wis 14:3), and that the just are described as "son of God" (Wis 2:16, 2:18, 5:5). The invocation "'avinou malkenou" ("our father, our king"), in the second blessing* in the Jewish liturgy*, probably dates from the first century A.D.

Finally, a symbolic feminine (Hos 11:8; Jer 31:20; Is 49:15) expresses God's tenderness toward Israel (Briend 1992).

b) New Testament. In the New Testament, the Greek word theos, "God," always means the Father (Rahner* 1954). Jesus* is aware of being his Son before his crucifixion.

The use of the familiar Aramaic 'abba, a term of family intimacy, to address the Father is peculiar to Jesus himself and has few Jewish parallels (Jeremias 1966; see the discussion in Schlosser 1987). In the Gospels*, Jesus always addresses God as his Father (Mt 17:3; Jn 17:3), with the sole exception of “Eli, Eli . . .” (Mt 27:46). However, it is thanks to his death (Mk 15:39) and resurrection* (Mt 28:19) that Jesus is confessed as the Son of God. Matthew inserts Christ*, born of God, in the lineage of David (Mt 1:16), and Luke relates him to God through Adam* (Lk 3:23–38). The book of Mark is the “gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God” (Mk 1:1).

Jesus reveals the Father to those around him in giving them knowledge of himself. He does not establish a household, or secure any progeny, but he insists on the commandment (Decalogue*) to honor one’s father and mother (Mt 15:4ff.) and on the Creator’s arrangements for establishing the human couple* (Mt 19:4ff.); yet one cannot follow him without being free from family* ties (Mk 1:16–20).

The Sermon on the Mount introduces the expression “Our Father” (Mt 6:7–13) in the midst of a series of “The Lord’s Prayer” (10:3, above 13:3 in Mt.). In the “hymn of jubilation” (Mt 11:25ff.), Jesus speaks of the mutual knowledge of the Father and the Son, and his joy in seeing his children receive his revelation*. All believers are called upon to use “abba” themselves, thanks to the Spirit, who makes them sons of God and co-heirs with the Son (Gal 4:6; see Rom 8:14–17). Finally, Acts (3:13 and 13:32) makes a connection between the Christian faith* and the Jewish heritage of “our fathers.”

The Father shows himself through Jesus in his solidarity with sinners following his baptism* (Mt 3:13–17). Peter’s confession (Mt 16:17) is attributed to “my Father who is in heaven.” The transfiguration illuminates the synoptic prefigurings of the Passion* and the resurrection by advancing the communication of the Father to the disciples by the Son (Mt 17:1–5).

In his agony, Jesus still cries “abba” (Mk 14:36). In Luke’s Gospel, the mercy* of the Father (see Lk 15:11–32, 6:36) is that of Jesus on the cross (Lk 23:34 and vv. 43 and 46). John (Johannine* theology) presents for our contemplation a Son who is the Father’s only child (monogenès; 1:14 and 1:18) and who was present “in the beginning” (1:1; see Gn 1:1). This filiation* implies a distinction between the Father and the Son, on the one hand, and, on the other, God’s pater- nity in relation to all believers, “born . . . of God” (1:13), “one” all together, as the Father and the Son are “one” (17:11 and 17:20–23). By contrast, to fail to believe in the Son is to fail to love him while hearing his word*, to have as one’s father the Devil (demons*), “a murderer from the beginning,” liar and father of lies, and to carry out his wishes (8:44), instead of performing the works* of Abraham (8:39), whose faith has made him become “the father of us all” (Rom 4:16–25). John reveals the unique fatherhood of God, exposing his imitators without falling into dualism.

- K. Rahner (1954), “Theos im Neuen Testament,” Schr. zur Th. 1, Einsiedeln-Zürich-Köln, 91–167.
- J. Jeremias (1966), Abba: Untersuchungen zur neutestamentlichen Theologie und Zeitgeschichte, Göttingen.
- H. Ringgren (1973), “’Av,” ThWAT 1, 2–19.
- G. Schelbert (1981), “Sprachgeschichtliches zu Abba,” in P. Casetti, O. Keel, A. Schenker (Ed.), Mélanges Dominique Barthélemy, Fribourg-Göttingen, 395–447.
- M. I. Gruber, “The Motherhood of God in Second Isaiah,” RB 90, 351–59.
- J. Schlosser (1987), Le Dieu de Jésus, Paris, 179–212.
- J. Briend (1992), “La maternité de Dieu dans la Bible,” in Dieu dans l’Écriture, Paris.

YVES SIMOENS

See also Creation; Family; Filiation; Knowledge of God; Monotheism; Trinity

B. Systematic and Historical Theology

a) Definition. The term “Father” when referring to God can signify the following: 1) priority in the order of creation*; 2) universal authority*; 3) benevolence toward his creatures; 4) an adoptive or familial relationship to man; 5) the begetting of the Son; 6) essential masculinity. Traditional Christianity has resisted meaning number 6, while distinguishing the three divine functions of creation (1–3), adoption (4), and generation (5).

b) Greek and Roman Antiquity. Zeus, conceived as masculine, is the “father of gods and men” in Homer (e.g., Iliad 1, 544), the title denoting authority over other gods rather than temporal priority. “Jupiter” contains the root pater, “father,” and is a title of Aeneas (Jupiter Indiges), who was often called father of the Roman nation. Augustus reinforced the divine sanction of his principate (27 B.C.–14 A.D.) by assuming the title “father of the fatherland” (pater patriae).

From the third century B.C., the Stoics employed the term to assert an affinity between gods and men, calling men the offspring of Zeus (Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus; Aratus, Phaenomena 5; see Acts 17:28). This kinship was believed to reside in intellect, but Seneca (De providentia I, 5) declares that it lies in virtue*, being acquired by imitation rather than inherited. Epictetus (Discourses II, 10, 7) reminds us that fatherhood still implies authority: just as all a son's things are at the disposal of his father, so all a man's things are at the disposal of God.

Plato calls the Good* the father of the Beautiful (Republic 509 b), and the Demiurge father and maker of the world* (pater kai poietes, Timaeus 28 c), adding that he is difficult to discover and impossible to reveal to all. Plutarch urges that no affinity between the highest God and the material world is implied: the Demiurge is father of the soul*, but only maker of the body (Moralia 1001 C). Numenius (middle of the second century A.D.) distinguishes the Demiurge from the transcendent deity*, calling the latter the "Father of the Demiurge" (Fr. 21 Des Places). Borrowing the language of archaic poets, he styles the first God "grandfather," the second his "son," and the world their "grandchild." Plotinus applies the term "father" to the mind in relation to soul, and to the One in relation to mind (e.g., Enneads III, 5, V, 5). The cardinal point is usually resemblance, since the lower reality is an image of the higher reality, and even matter is an emanation of divinity in his view. At the same time, the transcendence of the higher reality is implied, so that those who desert the Good for the Beautiful are styled undutiful sons (Enn. V, 5, 12). Plotinus holds that, although both the world and Mind are eternal, they are not consubstantial* with each other, or with the One.

In mystery religions, the savior God is often called the father of his initiates, obviously by adoption, and the Mithraic initiate may himself attain the rank of father. Finally, Platonists assert an intellectual affinity between all men and the gods, but progress in virtue can make a man a "father of gods" (Plotinus, Enn. VI, 9; Porphyry, Sententiae 32).

c) Judaism, Hermeticism, and Gnosticism. In Philo's De opificio mundi, the terms "father" and "maker," clearly derived from Plato, are at first interchangeable, denoting both the benevolence and the authority of God. In relation to man, his image, however, God is Father in a special sense, and the term "maker" disappears. The logos (Word*) is his firstborn, and the man whose reason* obeys it is "the heir of divine things" in the treatise of that name. Abraham is a father, not only biologically, but through a secret allegory: as the "chosen father of the sound" (De mutatione..., §65–68), he begets rational language.

Rabbis were called "Abba," but Jesus* may have been unique in using the term habitually of God. In Gnostic (gnosis*) and Hermetic literature, both of which have associations with Judaism, the secret teaching is passed from father to son, although it is not clear, in the Allogenes and Hermeticum 13, whether the relation is natural or nominal. Although the author of being is often called Father in Hermetic literature (e.g., II, 17), and is supposed to be an intellect, his transcendence is continually stressed, with allusion to both Timaeus (28 c) and the Jewish notion of God's inscrutability. Ibn Gabirol's teaching that matter is an emanation from the Godhead is therefore highly unusual.

Irenaeus* (Adv. Haer. I, 1), the Gnostic Valentinus (c. middle of the second century), averring that no name* is truly predicable of the highest principle, styled it propator ("ancestor"). For the Gnostics, the divine is often a combination (syzygy) of feminine and masculine, although the masculine principle always remains dominant. In their view, the Father of the Old Testament is a lesser divine being (the Demiurge), feminine or asexual rather than masculine, and limited in knowledge (e.g., Epiphanius, Panarion XXIII, 3–8). The true paternal being is the source of spiritual existence, but exercises neither authority nor providence* in the world. Nevertheless, the world is said to emanate from him, sometimes through the feminine power Sophia (see Prv 8:22).

d) Patristic. Early theologians inherited three conceptions of the fatherhood of God, who could be 1) Father of the world, according to one reading of Plato; 2) Father of the elect, according to Judaism and the New Testament; or 3) Father of the Son, according to the Gospels* and, presumably, the liturgy* (see Mt 28 finis; 2 Cor 13 finis). Three points defined orthodoxy*: to deny any natural affinity between creature and Creator, while affirming the adoptive relation that holds between the elect and their redeemer, and distinguishing this from the eternal generation of the Son. Nevertheless, these terms are not exactly synonyms, as the Son is both creator and redeemer of the world, and John 1:13 was read in some manuscripts as applying to Jesus.

Proclamations of God's fatherhood in apologetic texts, often based on Plato, illustrate his unity, his transcendence, and his providential government. Between 150 and 250, Timaeus 28c was quoted by Justin, Minucius Felix, Athenagoras, Tertullian*, Clement of Alexandria*, and Origen*. While the Gnostics and Numenius distinguished between the father of the intellectual realm and the maker of this world, Irenaeus asserted the unity of God's Kingdom over both matter and spirit. Where Jews maintained the unity of the Godhead, Justin (apologists*), in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. A.D. 140) also credits him with a Son who created, educates, and redeems humanity.

Trinitarian speculation in the third century led to a strong differentiation of dignity between Father and Son; this subordinationism* reached its extreme form in monarchianism, which denied internal relations in the Godhead, and therefore made the Father himself suffer on the cross (e.g., Tertullian, Adv. Praxeian 2). Even for Tertullian, however, the Son becomes hypostatic only for the creation of the world, and his power is delegated from a "monarchic" Father. Origen was the first to affirm that fatherhood is inherent in the Trinity*, Son and Spirit being coeternal with the Father; yet he protests against the practice of addressing prayer* to the Son. Prayer is addressed to the Father alone (De oratione 15), by the Son. In his Dialogue with Heraclides, Origen styles the Son a second God (heteros theos), but if, in a sense, there are two gods, both are one single God. Origen uses genesis ("genesis") and ktisma ("foundation") interchangeably with genesis ("procreation") as names for a productive activity peculiar to God, which is distinguished from human poiesis ("making"). Nevertheless, the subordination of the Son is clearly implied, as is also the case in Hippolytus of Rome (c. 170–235), who argues in his Contra Noetum and Refutatio X for a position like Tertullian's, but calls the Son genomenos ("brought into being").

After the Arian controversy, in the fourth century, orthodox writers generally distinguished between the genesis of the world and the eternal generation of the Son. Athanasius* makes no reference to Plato in his constant use of the term "Father," and introduces the adjective idios ("proper") to denote the Son's possession of his Father's essence (Contra Arianos I). Human beings obtain adoption only by partaking of the Son, to whom prayers are rightly offered by the church*. The extreme Arianism of Eunomius allowed for still more detail. According to Eunomius, the divine essence is fully knowable, and he identifies it as the quality of being ungenerated (agenneron): because the Son is generated (gennetos), he cannot therefore be God. The Cappadocians (Gregory* of Nyssa, Contra Eunomium, and Basil*, Ad Ablabium) replied that the divine essence is unknowable; that the division of the persons is one of operation rather than nature; and that the fatherhood of God is merely the priority of eternal cause over eternal effect. Their idiosyncratic contemporary Marius Victorinus (Contra Arianos I, 51) holds that the Spirit is (figuratively speaking) the mother of the Son.

Origen, who sometimes seems to allow only a moral union between Father and Son, postulates a natural affinity between man's mind and God's (e.g., De principiis I, 1; I, 3, 5). Gregory of Nyssa maintains (De opificio hominis 11) that the human mind is so like God that it is equally inscrutable, but the full affinity is possessed only by abstract humanity, before the Fall and the division of the sexes. The image, like all three Persons, transcends the categories of male and female (In Canticum canticorum; see Gregory* of Nazianzus, Oratio 31). Others insist that man achieves the image by adoption; thus Cyril* of Alexandria locates it in acquired virtue (Ad Calosirium). For Epiphanius (†403), the meaning of the term "image" is inscrutable (Anchoratus 56). The divine Fatherhood itself in relation to us is defined by Hilary* of Poitiers as "invisible, incomprehensible, eternal, self-existent, self-originating, self-sustained" (De Trinitate II, 7).

e) Mediaeval and Byzantine Period. The Lord's Prayer and, since the mid-second century, baptismal creeds connect the title Father with God's lordship over the world. In the Greek Church, the doctrine that the Father is the sole fountainhead of the Trinity remains a cardinal point of disagreement with the West, in whose creed the Spirit proceeds from both Father and Son (Filioque*). John the Scot Eriugena (ninth century), in his Peri physeon, makes matter an emanation from the Godhead; Gnostic views were also echoed by Joachim of Fiore (millenarianism*), who argued that a kingdom of the Son had replaced that of the Father, and that a kingdom of the Spirit would supersede that of the Son.

Thomas* Aquinas holds that the Father is so called both essentially and personally: in the latter sense, he is peculiarly the Father of the Son, but in the former he is the Father of all, in the sense that all receive from him (ST Ia, q. 33, a. 3).

f) Modern and Contemporary Era. Protestantism* has generally conceived of God as Father of his creatures rather than of the Trinity. Criticism of the idea of divine fatherhood has come from liberal theology*, psychological anthropology*, and political radicalism, and in each case criticism has led to a renewal of interest in Trinitarian speculation among orthodox theologians.

Luther* identified creation with fatherhood, but traditional Protestantism reserves the term "sons" for the elect. The liberal theologian Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930) finds the heart of the Gospel in God's paternal (i.e., benevolent) relation to all men (Wesen des Christentums, 1899–1900). Extreme liberals have argued that the concept of a personal God, implied by the term Father, is untenably anthropomorphic. Thus, Paul Tillich* prefers to call God the ground of being. The omission of the term “Father” is already notable in Schleiermacher*'s The Christian Faith (1830), where such terms as “creator” and “governor” are preferred, and the Trinity is relegated to a brief appendix.

Psychological theories see the notion of God as an extension of the attitude of children to their fathers. Ludwig Feuerbach (Wesen des Christianums, 1841) holds that Judaism and Christianity confer on a paternal God the infinite possession of those qualities that the worshippers find lacking in themselves. Freud* (1913–14) derives religion from the guilt incurred by the sons of a primeval ancestor who murdered him and then tried to retrieve his powers through the sacrifice* of a totemic animal. Jung (1952) sees the Bible* as the history of the slow education of a tyrannical father figure.

Political criticism of the concept of God as Father asserts that patriarchal theology justifies inequality in society* and the church. Authoritarian ideals have been supported by such works as Robert Filmer's Patriarcha (1680, rebutted by Locke), which derives kingship from the absolute rights conferred by God on Adam and transmitted by primogeniture. Feminist theologians contend that the exclusively male priesthoods* of the Orthodox and Catholic churches are combined with an authoritarian structure, and have campaigned for both women's ordination and the liturgical use of female terms with application to God. J. Bachofen and others have maintained that the worship of the Goddess was the original religion.

Barth* combines the Calvinist notion of elective fatherhood with Trinitarian theology in a powerful set of structures. The Father's liberty* is a property of his Trinitarian nature, and as the Father of the Son he elects mankind to salvation. Moltmann, who believes that only Trinitarian theology can prevent the use of God's name to support authoritarianism, presents the generation of the Son as the source of the Father's liberty and benevolence, since it enables him perpetually to act with regard to an Other. Nicholas Berdyaev offers a similar explanation for the creation of the world, since he makes the whole Trinity an emanation from a nameless ground of being. For all these writers, the fatherhood of God is both the guarantee of his ineffability and the clue to his relation with other beings. Catholic theology asserts the same paradox of concealment in revelation. Karl Rahner* frequently calls the Son the symbol of the hidden Father, while Hans Urs von Balthasar* (1967) says that the glory* of the Father is manifested through the kenosis of the Son in his incarnation and, above all, on the cross. Thus, the Trinitarian title that expresses God's omnipotence* and sufficiency is also the revelation of his inalienable love*.

One contemporary reconstruction, influenced by J. D. Zizioulas, has had an impact on the theology of the Trinity, as well as on other matters. Zizioulas, who is an exemplar of the “Greek model” of Trinitarian theology studied in his own time by Thomas de Régnon, conceives the Trinity on the basis of the kingship of the Father, without making use of the concept of divine ousia. God is without cause, but, in God, the Father is the cause of being, by communicating his being to the Son. Roman theology, which also understands the Father as the fons et origo totius divinitatis, should also show that it is capable of avoiding any construction of the Trinity on the basis of a divine essence.

- E. Norden (1913), Agnostos Theos, Leipzig.
- S. Freud (1913–14), Totem und Tabu, Vienna.
- C. C. J. Webb (1918), God and Personality, Edinburgh.
- J. Bachofen (1927), Mutterrecht und Urreligion, Basel.
- N. Berdiaeff (1935), De la destination de l'homme, Paris (trans. from Russian).
- C. G. Jung (1952), Antwort auf Hiob, Zürich.
- A. J. Festugière (1954), Le Dieu inconnu et la gnose, Paris.
- K. Barth (1945–50), Die kirchliche Dogmatik III/1–3, Zollikon (Dogmatique, Geneva, 1960–63).
- H. U. von Balthasar (1967), Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Ästhetik III, 2, Einsiedeln.
- M. J. Le Guillou (1972), Le mystère du Père, Paris.
- L. Bouyer (1976), Le Père invisible, Paris.
- R. R. Ruether (1983), Sexism and God-talk, London.
- S. Pétrement (1984), Le Dieu séparé, Paris.
- J. Moltmann (1985), Gott in der Schöpfung, Munich.
- J. D. Zizioulas (1985), Being as Communion, Crestwood, N.Y., 67–122.
- T. F. Torrance (1993), The Trinitarian Faith, Edinburgh, 47–109.
- P. Widdicombe (1993), The Fatherhood of God from Origen to Athanasius, Oxford.

MARK J. EDWARDS

See also Consubstantial; God; Hypostatic Union; Monotheism; Nicaea I, Council of; Subordinationism; Trinity; Word

Fathers of the Church

a) Origins of the Expression. Until the beginning of the fourth century the term Father was used sporadically in the texts as a sign of deference and gratitude to designate individuals whose teachings the author had followed—for example, Alexander of Jerusalem’s remarks about Pantaenus and Clement of Alexandria* (recorded by Eusebius in his History of the Church VI, 14:9) and, more generically, comments by Clement himself (in Stromata, I, 1, 3) and Irenaeus (in Adversus haereses VI, 14:9), who refers to the term’s being used by “one of his predecessors.” In the fourth century, even before “Father” began to be used in the plural to designate the members of the Council of Nicaea* (Basil* of Caesarea’s Letters, 52, II and I40, 2) or, more generally, to designate past links in Christian tradition (by Athanasius* in Ad Afros 6, and Gregory of Nazianzus—see Orientalia, 33:15), an approximation of the complete expression can be read in Eusebius.

Being fond of the epithet ecclesiastic, Eusebius included it in the titles of at least two of his works (Ecclesiastical History—or History of the Church—and Ecclesiastical Theology) and attached it (c. 336) at least three times to a mention of the Fathers in the course of his polemic with Marcellus of Ancyra (Contra Marcellus I:4 and II:4 and Ecclesiastical Theology I:14—in vol. 14 of Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte). In addition to the term “Father,” the expression “Ecclesiastical Fathers” is already sometimes applied to the bishops* at the council*, and sometimes applied to the whole body of those who, in earlier generations, accomplished a mission of explanation and transmission of church* doctrine.

Given the interchangeable character of the adjective and of the genitive case in the Greek and Latin of that epoch, it could be expected that our expression “father of the church” was already about to be born. But it was far from receiving immediate adoption. Although fifth-century writers continued, with increasing frequency, to refer to the Fathers, it was only at the Lateran Council of 649 that the expression was found simultaneously in both Greek and Latin. The proceedings of that council, written in Latin, were translated immediately into Greek by Maximus* the Confessor; they include the phrases: “All the recognized Fathers of the Church,” in canon 18, and, in canon 20, “the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church” (J.D. Mansi’s Sacrorem Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 10:1157–1158A and 1159–1160E, and Denchiridion symbolorum, 518 and 522). In both canons these mentions of the Fathers are linked together with the mention of the five Ecumenical Councils. The intention was probably to link the findings of the council to the teachings of the Fathers, as they appear in their individual writings, when they are completely consonant with the ones given in the council.

The more common expression the holy fathers appears in canons 1–11 and then again in canons 17–19 of the Lateran Council. Other contemporaneous documents use similar expressions, which suggests that the term “father of the church” was used almost haphazardly. Pope* Agatho spoke of “the Holy Fathers that the Apostolic Church of Christ receives” in 680, and there was mention of “the holy and acknowledged Fathers” at the Third Council of Constantinople* in 680.

From 392 to 393 Jerome had put into circulation a more flexible and comprehensive expression. Although the title of his work, through emulation of Suetonius, spoke of “illustrious men,” his prologue stated the intention of “drawing up a list of the writers of the Church”; and even though the first intention incited him to create the broadest listing, which included among these “illustrious men” Philo and Seneca, the second list provided a more useful criterion. It was “to introduce rapidly all those who published something on the Holy Scriptures*” (see Richardson, Ed., TU, XIV). Jerome’s continuator, Gennadius of Marseilles, cited the work under the title De viris illustribus (Of Illustrious Men); however, in his first introduction, he called Jerome’s book “catalogus scribarum” (“a catalogue of writers”).

b) The Expression’s Entry into the Canon. At the beginning of the sixth century, probably in Italy or in southern Gaul, an anthology was published known as Decretum Gelasianum. After giving lists of the canonical books of the Bible, the three Apostolic Sees, and the three Ecumenical Councils, this anthology adds a list of “short treatises of the holy fathers received into the Catholic Church.” These short treatises are by 12 authors—six are in Greek, six are in Latin, and a single piece is by Pope Leo I (IV, §2 and 3; 36–38). Following these lists, without a roll of names, comes a more inclusive definition: “in the same way, major and minor treatises of all the orthodox fathers who, without having deviated from a single tenet of the Holy Roman Church, without having left the faith* and its preaching*, participated in its communion*, by the grace of God, until the last day of their lives” (38–39).

The Council of Trent* used the traditional conciliar vocabulary when it referred to the “example of the orthodox fathers” at the moment that it accepted all the books of both Testaments (Conciliarum œcumenicorum decreta, 663:15ff.). What is even more important, it mentioned “a unanimous consent of the Fathers,” which should not be violated when interpreting the Scriptures (Conciliarum œcumenicorum decreta, 664:22ff.). The latter expression did not, however, lead Melchior Cano (1509–60) to identify in that statement a specific locus classicus or theological theme. Cano’s sixth such theme is, in fact, “the authority* of the saints,” and not that of the Fathers. In addition, Cano distinguishes this authority from a seventh one, which is “the authority of the scholastic doctors*” (De locis theologicis, 1563). Only in the edition obtained by Serry (1659–1738), which was reprinted innumerable times, are the titles in which the word “Father” occurs added to the chapter heads of Book VII. Sixtus of Siena (1520–69), another post-Tridentine theologian as well as a historian of exegeses*, uses the expression here and there. For example, he holds that the “most illustrious Fathers of the Church” had witnessed in favor of Origen (1566, I, IV, 439) and that certain writings from the New Testament had been held to be apocryphal* by the “earliest Fathers of the Church” (I, I, 2, 32). Sixtus also drew up a list of the authors who had written commentaries on the Scriptures. This very comprehensive list is much more in the line of the hieronymic “ecclesiastical writers.”

It would seem that it was in the 17th century that the big names in “Positive Theology” tended to distinguish more clearly “the Fathers” from more recent ecclesiastical authors. Perhaps this was due to the influence of the Protestant idea of a gradual corruption of the message of faith, for, until the Reformation, there was a tendency to recede ever further from the source. At least according to a survey, Petau (Theologica dogmata, 1644–59) prefers to speak of Patres et magistri (“Fathers and teachers of the Church”) or of Patres antiqui (“Ancient Fathers”); Thomassin (Dogmata theologica, 1680–89) speaks outright of Patres Ecclesiae (“Fathers of the Church”). But, since the communal nature of the Fathers’ statements is the most important point in this type of theology*, they hardly concerned themselves at this date with specifying what a father of the church was as an individual. Tillemont

(1637–98) stands essentially for the tradition of Jerome’s De viris illustribus (Of Illustrious Men) and of his list of “ecclesiastical writers.”

In the revised Dictionnaire de Trévoux (1752) a still quite elastic definition occurs: “Father, or Father of the Church, is said of ecclesiastical authors who preserve for us in their writings the tradition of the Church. . . . The name of Father or of Father of the Church is given to those who lived in the Church’s first 12 centuries. Those who wrote since the 12th century are called Doctors, not Fathers.”

C.L. Richard’s almost contemporary Dictionnaire gives no chronological limits, but it distinguishes the “former doctors of the Church who have preserved the tradition in their writings” from “the bishops assembled at Councils.” It must be noted that, as in the first usages, both expressions essentially concern collectives. Littré gives the same chronological limit as does the Dictionnaire de Trévoux: “The Fathers of the Church or, absolutely, the Fathers (capitalized), the holy doctors from before the 13th century, from whom the Church received and approved the decisions on matters of faith.” Then follow examples drawn from Pascal*, Fléchier, and La Bruyère (among which none contain the determiner “of the church”). Under the heading of “Father,” Larousse in his Grand dictionnaire universel du XIX^e siècle gives a definition inspired by Littré, shortening it by a few words; but in the entry “Patrology,” Larousse gives another and fuller definition, which is all the more remarkable for its different time-limit from the earlier entry: “The Fathers,” he holds, “can be split into two periods,” the first going from “the establishment of Christianity to the end of the sixth century”—and the names cited immediately afterwards confirm that indeed that was his end-date. Larousse also indicates that Catholics, such as Ellies du Pin and Bellarmine, after the example of Protestants, such as Cave and Oudin, list all the authors among the “ecclesiastical writers.” The Dictionnaire de patrologie (Dictionary of Patrology), in the series Bibliothèque du clergé, which was published between 1851 and 1859 under the general editorship of Migne, and edited by Sevestre, is in fact another De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis (On Ecclesiastical Writers). It goes as far as the 12th century and includes Abelard* just as readily as Origen* or other likely people.

It was in the manuals of Catholic patrology (from the ninth and 20th centuries) that attempts were first made to draw up a list of characteristic features that would determine the acceptance of such and such an ecclesiastic among the Fathers of the Church. J. Fessler gives three of them in his Institutiones patrologiae (1850): a) An orthodox doctrine and a knowledge that is essentially sacred; b) a saintly life; and. c) antiquity. But on the point of antiquity, the limits are quite loose. Fessler would gladly go forward as far as Bonaventure* and Thomas (25), while acknowledging that after Mabillon, Bernard* (who died in 1153) is most often called the “last of the Fathers.” To Fessler’s mind, the title of bishop is not indispensable, nor is that of priest*—he is anxious in fact to include Prosper of Aquitaine.

Without quite adopting them, O. Bardenhewer numbers four characteristics in his Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (1913): a) Orthodox doctrine; b) a saintly life; c) approval by the church; and d) antiquity. Earlier (I, 16) Bardenhewer mentions that a certain agreement had been reached in fixing the limits of that “antiquity” in the East, at John of Damascus (who died before 754), and in the West, at Gregory* the Great (who died in 604). On two occasions (DthC, 12/1, 1933) E. Amann gives this definition: “The Fathers of the Church are ecclesiastical writers from Christian Antiquity who should be considered particularly authoritative witnesses to the faith.” Amann then lists the four “attributes by which one recognizes a Father of the Church,” which are identical to those proposed by Bardenhewer, including the chronological limit, even though Amann points out that “even today, one still hears ‘Saint Bernard, the last of the Fathers,’ ” (ibid., 1197). Even though he adopts these attributes, Amann has to concede that each one is only usable with a certain margin of flexibility.

The same four attributes are found again in German Catholic publications, such as in the three editions of the LthK (1933, 1961, and 1997) and HTTL. On the other hand, dictionaries of Protestant inspiration (RE, TRE, and RGG) do not include an entry on Kirchen-vater (“Father of the Church”). The ODCC (1957) remarks that the term forms part of the popular language rather than of the technical language.

c) Present-day Usage of the Expression. The instruction of 10 November 1989 of the Congregation for Catholic Education, while going to some trouble to restore the distinction between patristic and patrology, gives no definition of the expression “father of the church.” It includes Clement of Alexandria and Origen among the Fathers cited, thereby tacitly abandoning some attributes that seem to be a 19th-century invention, restricted to the Catholic confession alone. Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, in his Theologische Prinzipienlehre (1982), concedes that serious questions arise from demanding orthodoxy and antiquity as characteristics for Fathers of the Church. He suggests a more theological and less historical definition: “The Fathers are doctors of the Church indivisible.” One problem would then remain: determining to what extent the rarity of the communications, often one-way, between the various parts of the Christian world, made it possible for any Father at all to practice a really ecumenical teaching role.

Benoît (1961) recalls the DThC’s definition, then proposes three others. The first, which in fact defines patristics, translates a text by Overbeck and depends on a conception that distinguishes radically between the Christian writings that have literary forms separate from the Greco-Roman models and those that adhere to them: “Patristics is the study of Greco-Roman literature of Christian confession and of Christian interest.” The Fathers are thus the authors of this type of Christian writing. After this first rather literary definition, the second revises a phrase by the historian Mandouze: “The Fathers are the authors of the first Christian centuries, who were universally involved as direct or indirect witnesses of the Christian doctrine or of the life of the Church at this epoch.” Lastly Benoît furnishes his own definition, more in conformity with the Protestant conception of the Christian message: “A Father of the Church [can be defined] as an interpreter or a writer of exegeses on the Scriptures. . . . A Father is defined by his attachment to the Church’s tradition, which itself is measured against the Scriptures, that is, in the last analysis by its faithfulness to the Scriptures.”

Faced with this wealth of choices, however, a Protestant author, Lods (1988), observed that “it is really impossible to give a definition of Father of the Church that satisfies everyone.” Indeed it seems that one risks indulging in a quite futile exercise with an attempt, by restricting the plural, to define the group very narrowly, or, by using in the singular an expression which designates a collective, to award to such and such an individual, to the exclusion of such and such another, the epithet of “father of the church,” treated as a sort of precocious ascendant of the title of doctor. The most useful word is no doubt the adjective “patristic,” a parallel to “monastic,” “scholastic,” and “Baroque,” which allows us—just as they do—to designate conveniently a certain period of theological and literary production. Otherwise, it would be better to stop at “ecclesiastical writers,” which is just as traditional a designation (or, if needed, given the equivalence noted, at “writers of the church,” writers who have tried as best they could to work and to produce within the bosom of the church). That policy avoids the ridiculous stance of having to exclude people like Origen or Hippolytus, or even Tertullian* or Lactantius. And the example given by Augustine* in the West, just as the one given in lesser measure by Cyril* in the East, shows the danger that might lurk in separating too thoroughly a Father, in the singular, from the whole of the group.

- M. Cano (1st Ed. 1563; 1704), De locis theologicis, Lyon.
 Sixtus of Siena (1st Ed. 1566; 1742), Bibliotheca sancta, Naples.
Dictionnaire universel français et latin... vulgairement appelé le Dictionnaire de Trévoux (1752), Rev. Ed., Paris.
 C.L. Richard (Ed.) (1759–61), Dictionnaire canonique, historique, géographique et chronologique des sciences ecclésiastiques, Paris.
 J. Fessler (1850), Institutiones patrologiae, Innsbruck.
 F. Overbeck (1882), “Über die Anfänge der patristischen Literatur,” HZ 48, 417–72, New Ed. Basel, 1966.
 O. Bardenhewer (1913), Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 2nd Ed., vol. I, Freiburg.
 A. Benoît (1961), L’actualité des Pères de l’Église, CTh, no. 47.
 F.L. Cross and E.A. Livingstone (Eds.) (1974), ODCC, 2nd Ed., Oxford (3rd Ed. 1997).
- J. Ratzinger (1982), “Die Bedeutung der Väter im Laufbahn des Glaubens,” in Theologische Prinzipienlehre, Munich, 139–59.
 M. Lods (1988), “La patristique comme discipline de la théologie protestante,” in J.-N. Pères and J.-D. Dubois (Ed.), Protestantisme et tradition de l’É., Paris, 317–31.
 Congrégation pour l’éducation catholique (1989), Instruction du 10 novembre 1989: L’étude des P. de l’É. dans la formation sacerdotale.
 Coll. (1997), Les Pères de l’Église au XXe siècle, Paris.

GEORGES M. DE DURAND †

See also Apologists; Apostolic Fathers; Doctor of the Church; Tradition

Fear of God

In the Bible*, fear gets hold of the human being whose life is threatened by a death* threat. But the expression “fear of God” covers a wider spectrum of meanings, some of which are known in the Egyptian, Mesopotamian, and Canaanitic religions.

The terminology of fear is rich in Hebrew: yâré’ (and its derivatives) is the most commonly used, but the following roots are also used: phd and ’ym (tremor, terror), chrd (tremor), chtt and ’rç (fright), gwr III (fright), to quote only the most frequent. In Greek, the verb phobeô and its derivatives are by far the most frequent, but the fear of God may be expressed with the sebomai group.

a) From Dread to Reverential Fear. The origin of the expression “fear of God” is probably to be found in the terror provoked by certain manifestations of God*, by which a human being experiences sanctity*, transcendence: theophany* (Ex 20:18), vision or dream (Gn 28:17), demonstration of force in creation* (Jer 5:22 and Ps 65:9), spectacle of a dignitary arrayed with his authority (Ex 34:30 and 1 Sm 12:18), and history* (Ex 15:15–16 and Ps 64:10)—in particular, in the wars* of YHWH (1 Sm 11:7 and 2 Chr 20:29) and his kingship (Ps 47:3 and 96:4).

The noun môrâ’ (“Terrible”) is a divine title (Ps 76:12) and the adjective with the same meaning, nôrâ’, in parallel with the predicates “great” and “saint,” describes YHWH (Neh 1:5), his Name* (Mal 1:14 and Ps 111:9), his Works* (Ex 34:10), his Day (Jl 2:11). Likewise, the high actions* of God are called nôrâ’ôt (Ps 106, 22) or môrâ’im (Dt 4:34).

In the Gospels* and the Acts of the Apostles, the fear of the beneficiaries or witnesses of apparitions (Lk 1:12 and 24:37), of miracles* (Mk 4:41 and 5:15; Lk 7:16; and Acts 2:43), and of the signs of resurrection* (Mk 9:6 and 16:8) must reflect the same respectful and admiring experience of recoiling in front of the Kingdom*’s signs.

Even in the Old Testament, and in particular in the texts quoted, one seldom finds unalloyed terror in front of the numinous; the notion takes on most often meanings of respect, of reverential fear, and of trust toward that God who saves man from death (Jer 32:39f.–40), even if the prospect of the Last Judgment* raises the fear of punishment* (Is 2:10; Ps 9:20f.; and 2 Cor 5:10f.).

b) “Do Not Fear!” The frequent formula “Do not fear” is used to reassure, to comfort, and to encourage in a moment of fear, of crisis, or of necessity (secular context: Gn 43:23 and 1 Sm 22:23). It is often pronounced by God himself or by his authorized representative. Thus, at the time of an encounter with God, particularly if the beneficiary knows he is a sinner, this formula means that God does not come for death, but for life, and as a result fear may change into respectful trust (Ex 20:20; 1 Sm 12:18–24; and Mk 6:50).

For those facing difficult circumstances and adversity, particularly war, the invitation not to fear is followed by a promise* of success or by a victory (Dt 31:6–8; Jos 10:25; Is 35:4; and Mt 10:26–31), which will arouse the fear of God (Ex 14:10 and vv. 13 and 31). The formula “do not fear” is also frequently used in the oracles of salvation* (Is 41:10 and Jer 30:10, and see also Gn 15:1 and Mt 28:5).

c) Developments of the Concept. In Deuteronomy and the deuteronomic literature, the fear of God is a key concept of the theology* of alliance. It designates loyalty toward YHWH and it materializes in observance of the Law*. The synonyms are significant: to serve God (Jos 24:14), to listen to his voice (1 Sm 12:14), to keep or practice his commandments (Dt 5:29), to love him and to become attached to him (Dt 10:12f. and 10:20), and to walk behind (Dt 13:4) or in the way of God (Dt 8:6). The opposite of the fear of God is idolatry* (Dt 6:13ff.).

In the biblical wisdom literature* (except for Ecclesiastes), the fear of God is close to wisdom* (Jb 28:28). It is its beginning (Prv 9:10), its early signs (Ps 111:10 and Prv 1:7), the schooling leading to it (Prv 15:33), and its root, fulfillment, and crowning (Sir 1:11–21). Linked to intelligence and knowledge* (Prv 1:29 and 2:1–6), the fear of God underscores the religious aspect of wisdom. It is experienced in ethical rectitude and in the refusal of evil* (Ps 34:12–15 and Prv 3:7 and 14:2), as seen in Job (1:8). Such a behavior leads to life (Prv 10:27 and 14:26f. and Sir 6:16).

The expression “God-fearing” is in keeping with the preceding developments, but it has various meanings. In the Psalms*, the God-fearing man is the just man whose behavior is honest. The plural of the same expression, the God-fearing men, designates the community assembled for worship* (Ps 22:23f.), all the people* of God (Ps 85:8f.), or only the believers (Ps 25:14). Switching to the Acts of the Apostles in the New Testament, when used with the term “worshipper” (sebomenos), “God-fearing” serves to describe pagans* who are close to Judaism* (Acts 10: 2 and 13:16).

Addressing the Philippians and exhorting them to “work out your own salvation” (Phil 2:12), Paul coined the phrase “fear and trembling” (phobos kai tremos), but said that if we follow the Spirit, we will be sons of God and so free from “fear” (Rom 8:12–15; see also 1 Jn 4:18). It is thus possible to see that the expression “fear of God” moves us somehow away from the ordinary meaning of the word “fear.”

- J. Becker (1965), Gottesfurcht im AT, Rome.
- L. Derousseaux (1970), La crainte de Dieu dans l'AT, Paris.
- H. Balz, G. Wanke (1973), “phobeō, etc.,” ThWNT 9, 186–216.
- H. P. Stähli (1978), “jr’ fürchten,” THAT 1, 765–78.
- E. H. Fuchs (1982), “jàrê,” ThWAT 3, 869–93.
- B. Costacurta (1988), La vita minacciata: Il tema della paura nella Bibbia Ebraica, Rome.
- H. P. Müller (1989), “pâhad?” ThWAT 6, 552–62.

ANDRÉ WÉNIN

See also* Decalogue; Filiation; Law and Christianity; Prayer; Spiritual Theology; Theophany; Word; Wrath of God

Febronianism

A German episcopal doctrine, analogous to Gallicanism*, the manifesto for which was De statu ecclesiae et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis liber singularis published in 1763 by J. Febronius (pseudonym of J. N. von Hontheim, auxiliary bishop of Trier and spokesman for the archbishop electors of Germany), Febronianism presented itself as a reform of the Catholic Church,* taking the primitive church as a model, preserving for the pope* only a primacy of honor, advocating greater power for bishops* and more autonomy for secular authorities. Febronian ideas expressed the wishes of a good number of the bishops and princes of the Holy Roman Empire. A new reform program was proposed by the archbishops of the Empire in 1786. Among other things, it proposed the end of exemptions for and the diminution of the powers of papal nuncios, but it had no effect. The political transformations resulting from the French Revolution changed the state of mind of German bishops; the age of Febronianism was followed by an age of ultramontanism*.

- W. Pitzer (1983), “Febronius/Febronianismus,” TRE 11, 67–69 (bibl.).
- R. Reinhardt (1995), “Episkopalismus,” LThK 3, 726–28.

THE EDITORS

See also* Gallicanism; Ultramontanism

Felicity. See Beatitude; Supernatural

Feminist Theology. See Woman

Ferrara, Council of. See Basel-Ferrara-Florence, Council of

Fessard, Gaston. See History

Fideism

Fideism, as the word indicates, attributes to faith* (fides) the principal role in religious knowledge, which, when taken to the extreme, however, leads it to question the very possibility of an authentic access to faith. Reacting to the exclusive rationalism* of the Enlightenment*, fideism is nevertheless dependent on certain fundamental presuppositions of the position that it challenges. Not only does it perpetuate the opposition between “reason*” and “faith,” conceived as two independent entities, it also accepts the technical-mathematical conception of “reason” that prevailed in the 18th century, and sets against it a global vision of knowledge that gives prominent status to immediate intuition, concrete historical reality, and affective and psychological dimensions. It also relies on the mediation of authority* and tradition*, denounced by Enlightenment rationalism. These themes make it possible to understand the development of fideism in the early 19th century and the importance it assumed, after the failure of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, in the context of the restoration of a system of Catholic theological teaching. Its influence was felt not only in France but also, to a lesser degree, in other countries (schools of Tübingen*).

The best known representatives of this movement were, under the label of “traditionalism*,” L. de Bonald (1754–1840) and H.-F.-R. de Lammenais (1782–1854), and under the label of “fideism,” Ph.-O. Gerbet (1798–1864), L.-E.-M. Bautain (1796–1867), and A. Bonnetty (1798–1879). Their attacks against the Scholasticism of their time, which they regarded as rationalist, provoked controversies that focused essentially on the status of knowledge within the framework of a fundamental* theology.

Under the influence of F. X. von Baader, Hegel*, Schelling*, and F. H. Jacobi, the Strasbourg professor L. Bautain accentuated the opposition to rationalism by relying on Augustine*'s distinctions and by defining true philosophy* as a quest for wisdom*, which was identified with religion itself. However, the positions he took caused difficulties, firstly with his bishop*, Mgr. de Trévern, which finally led to serious discussions in Rome*. At the conclusion of these discussions in 1840 Bautain had to subscribe to a series of theses (DS 2751–56) that accepted the possibility of reaching knowledge* of the existence* of God by inductive means, indicating that reason could precede or even lead to faith. These propositions were placed at the beginning of the German edition of the documents of the magisterium on the faith of the church (Regensburg 1938), so as to emphasize the decisive import of the questions that had been debated. And, to provide even more emphasis, extracts from the letter Qui pluribus of 1846 were attached, in which Pope* Pius IX had taken a position on fideism and traditionalism on the one hand, and on rationalism in Catholic thought on the other (G. Hermes). The magisterium* thereby attempted to remove the dangers of both sides by defining a moderate position between the two extremes. Other doctrinal statements followed, including the Syllabus of 1864 and the decrees of the First Vatican* Council in 1870.

The name “fideism” was also claimed around this time by a group of French Protestants represented by A. Sabatier and E. Ménégoz, who applied the principles of Schleiermacher* and adopted positions derived from the school of the history* of religions. It was of course possible to attempt to resolve these problems in the 19th century by adopting an intermediate formulation, dismissing the extremes while preserving the “parcel of truth,” which in fideism lies in the emphasis on the supernatural dimension of Christian truth* and its knowledge. But it is difficult to be satisfied with positions consisting of a superficial juxtaposition of different propositions that merely assigns to each one a positive or negative value. (This is the criticism that should be leveled at the declarations of the magisterium, as well as at the foundational work of Blondel*, Histoire et dogma [1904], even though the latter's philosophical-theological approach was aimed at going beyond a purely extrinsic juxtaposition of the competing arguments.)

To the extent that they put into play the relations between revelation* and reason, these controversies have continued in current ecumenical debates. Can human beings accede to or open themselves to revelation, and can the means that are universally available to them (ideas; concepts; language; acquired knowledge; logical or systematic associations; historical, social, legal, and cultural determinations; and so on) be used to express this kind of truth? The controversies necessarily raise the question of Christian anthropology*, and particularly the concept of knowledge that it presupposes. However indispensable distinctions in this area may be, it would, therefore, hardly be credible to defend a unilateral position that satisfied itself with challenging the presence in gospel truth either of a rational element or, on the other hand, a supernatural* element going beyond mere reason. Similarly, it is no longer acceptable to isolate each of the two components in a way that would exclude any articulation between them. Christianity, in fact, understands its message and the faith that responds to it as realities that are also rooted in the order of reason, as facts that certainly point beyond a purely rational world* but can in no way be conceived as contrary to reason. This is what makes that truth communicable, without in any way being detrimental to its specific content or altering its profound essence. For not only do the very dignity of human beings and the meaning of existence depend on this possibility of communication, but so too does the meaning of the history that unites God with humanity and with the world. In this respect, we cannot accept the existence of one all-embracing truth, endowed with its own logic, without introducing an open conception of reality. In this reality, the components are organized according to positive relations that themselves determine real differences, without making these differences into autarkical entities locked in their antagonism or reciprocal exclusion.

Fideism should thus be seen as an attempt to do justice at the level of human experience to what there is in concrete and immediate reality that is irreducible to the analyses of reason. It represents the quest for a wisdom superior to pure learning, the desire to keep reality open to a possible transcendence and everything that that implies. All these themes have met with increasing interest in our time. We can sense in them the attraction for a certain irrationalism (which, if its influence were to grow, would in turn require a reaffirmation of the rational factors in Christianity). It would, however, be better to define an approach that keeps a balance between the two poles, and so makes the pendulum swings between them unnecessary. A “logic of faith” should simultaneously do justice to human existence and to the meaning of the gospel. It will probably reach this goal if it is able to resist the restrictive approaches that ultimately contradict the very reality of man and expose him, individually and socially, to unnecessary dangers. Reason is a constituent part of a Christian faith that also contains human elements of a nonrational character. It should therefore be possible, even before fully formulating the idea of what Christian faith is, to carry out a consistent articulation of the rational and the nonrational, thereby providing spiritual access to supernatural faith.

- E. Doumergue (1892), L'autorité en matière de foi et la nouvelle école, Paris.
- M. Blondel (1904), "Histoire et dogme," La Quinzaine 56, repr. in Les premiers écrits de M. Blondel, Paris, 1956, 149–222.

- E. Doumergue (1906), Les étapes du fidéisme, Paris.
- E. Doumergue (1907), Le dernier mot du fidéisme, Paris.
- H. Haldimann (1907), Der Fideismus, Paderborn.
- W.F. Hogan (1957), A. Bonnetty and the Problem of Faith and Reason, Washington.
- P. Poupard (1961), Un essai de philosophie chrétienne au XIXe siècle: L'abbé L. Bautain, Paris.
- N. Hötzel (1962), Uroffenbarung im französischen Traditionalismus, Munich.
- H. Bouillard (1964), Logique de la foi, Paris.
- P. Walter (1980), Die Frage der Glaubensbegründung aus innerer Erfahrung auf dem I Vatikanum, TTS 16.
- E. Coreth et al. (Ed.) (1987), Christliche Philosophie im katholischen Denken des XIX. und XX. Jahrhunderts, vol. 1: Neue Ansätze im XIX. Jahrhundert, Graz.

KARL-HEINZ NEUFELD

See also Credibility; Faith; Modernism; Rationalism; Reason; Traditionalism; Wittgenstein

Filiation

In the Bible* the term son (bén in Hebrew and huios in Greek) is used to designate origin, dependence, or belonging, as well as the relationship of a father and mother with their offspring. The naming of Jesus* as God*'s only son and the adoptive filiation that follows for the believer occupy a central place in the New Testament.

I. Filiation in the Old Testament

1. Physical Parenthood and Figurative Senses

In the narrow sense, a son (or daughter) is anyone born from a father* and a mother. In a wider sense, sons include other descendants (Gn 29:5 and 31:28), and the Israelites are designated as "sons of Israel*" (Gn 32, 33; Ex 1:7 and 3:10), whereas the term "sons of men" designates humanity in general (Ps 12:1). (The English Standard Version of the Bible, however, renders these phrases as "people of Israel," "children of Israel," and "children of man.") According to the Law* of Moses, the family*'s firstborn male is consecrated to the Lord (Ex 13:1). Designated also as sons in the Old Testament are companions, disciples, servants, whoever is connected to a group, and whoever is a native of such and such a place.

2. Filiation with God

The angels* are sometimes called sons of God (Wis 5:5; Jb 1:6, 2:1, and 38:7). This expression comes from surrounding religions, and it has a figuratively weaker sense; it means that in the hierarchy of beings, the angels occupy a position close to being divine, without God being considered their father.

When Israel is called son of God, the intention is to translate in terms of human relationship the connection between God and his people*, as in the statement that the people whom Egypt had treated as slaves were adopted by God as sons (Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1; Jer 3:19; and Wis 18:13). Israel has done nothing to deserve such a filiation; it lives for receiving the Law and for remaining faithful to it. By extension, the members of the people who will remain faithful to the covenant* concluded in the Sinai are called "sons of the Lord" (Dt 14:1). The psalmist who keeps his heart pure does not betray the generation of the children of God (Ps 73:15). The just is persecuted for having called himself "God's son" (Wis 2:18). Conversely, God may bemoan the fact that the sons he reared up "have rebelled" against him (Is 1:2): they have become "rebellious children" (Is 30:1) or "faithless children" (Jer 3:14). The hope* remains however that the people remember having been adopted, and they go back toward their Father (Is 63:7–16, especially vv. 8 and 16).

If a founding oracle presents King David in a relationship of son to God (2 Sm 7:14 and Ps 89:26–27), it is never in the sense of the surrounding monarchies: David is never deified. It is, rather, a matter of insisting on the particular place he occupies, with his descendants, in the economy of election: the Messiah*, descended from David, will also be adopted by God and recognized as son (see Ps 2:2–8).

II. Filiation in the New Testament

1. Outside Christology

The same semantic universe of the expression that appears in the Old Testament is found in the New Testament. Sonship is used to describe family relationships in the literal sense, and is also widely used in the figurative sense, as in “sons of the Kingdom*” (Mt 8:12), “son of peace*” (Lk 10:6), “sons of this world” and “sons of light” (Lk 16:8), “son of perdition” (Jn 17:12), and “sons of the prophets*” (Acts 3:25).

2. Filiation of Jesus

The originality of the New Testament resides in the presentation of the filiation of Jesus.

a) Synoptic Gospels (Matthew, Mark, and Luke) If Jesus is the son of Mary* (Mk 6:3), the childhood narratives* (Mt 1–2 and Lk 1–2) highlight the particular nature of his filiation: the angel Gabriel announces to Mary that her son will be called “Son of the Most High” (Lk 1:32) and “Son of God” (Lk 1:35). Matthew 1:20 and Luke 1:35 translate into their narratives a theological affirmation: the double nature of Christ*, son of a woman* and only Son of God. The account of Jesus’ baptism* (Mk 1:9–11) and that of the Transfiguration (Mk 9:2–10) highlight the quality of this divine filiation of Christ: Jesus is Son of the Father in a unique relationship of communion*, that of “beloved Son,” of only Son.

The expression “Son of God” gives an account of the relationship of Jesus with his Father in a manner that is not devoid of ambiguity. In the account of the temptation* (Mt 4:1–11), Satan uses the title as a sign of omnipotence as do the devils expelled by Jesus (Mk 3:11 and 5:7). The evangelical narrative makes us discover that Jesus is “Son of God” in the humbling and acceptance of finiteness: it is the passage through death* that is the true sign of his divine filiation, a perspective that is unacceptable for the disciples who also form a notion of the divine filiation under the sign of omnipotence (see Mk 8:27–33 and Mt 16:13–23). Peter*, after his confession at Caesarea, is called Satan by Jesus because he refuses the perspective of the cross. Finally, at Gethsemane, in total obedience to the will of God (Mk 14:32–42), Jesus shows fully his unique filiation. By calling upon God as Father (Abba) and accepting death, Jesus reveals another comprehension of God. The confession of the Roman centurion (Mk 15:39) highlights this new discovery of the divine filiation of Jesus to the cross.

Finally, the use of the traditional messianic title “Son of David” is to be noted. This title is being used in spite of the fact the Gospels* have shown its insufficiency to account for what is new in Christ (see Mk 12:35–37).

b) Paul. If Jesus was born from a woman, it was as Son of God (see Gal 4:4, where biological and divine filiation coexist). This divine filiation of Jesus is recognized thanks to his resurrection* (Rom 1:3–4 and 1:9). This means that with God revealing himself to the world through the death of his Son, he is contesting the usual image that mankind has of him (see 1 Cor 1:18–25). In an altogether different language (that of the Son’s vocation), the Epistle to the Hebrews extends the paradoxical rapprochement anticipated by the Gospels and by Paul between filiation and sacrificing the Son for death (see Heb 1:2, 1:5–8, 5:1–8, 7:3, and 7:28).

c) John’s Gospel, the presentation of Jesus as the only Son, who reveals the Father, is of fundamental importance. All there is that must be known about God is from then on knowable in the meeting of faith* with the Son, the messenger who fully reveals to man the love* of his Father (Jn 1:18, 3:16–18, 3:35–36, and 5:19–30). Like elsewhere in the New Testament, this revelation* comes through via Jesus’ death, which is regarded as a glorification (Jn 12:16, 12:23, 12:28, and 13:31–32).

3. Filiation of the Believers

Starting with the particular filiation of Jesus, the New Testament develops the notion of the adoptive filiation of the Christians.

a) Synoptic Gospels. The relationship between the “sons” and the “Father” is often described through the intermediary of the language of parables (see Mt 21:28–32 and Lk 15:11–32). In the words of Jesus, God reveals himself as a compassionate Father of his children.

b) Paul. The major texts in which the theme of adoption (huiiothesia) is developed are Galatians 4:1–7 and Romans 8:14–17. The new condition of the believer is that of adopted son, heir to the Father and no longer a slave (in Gal 4:21–31, the believer is not son of the slave Hagar, but son of the free woman Sarah). It is faith in Christ and no longer obedience to the Law (Rom 3:21–31) that makes adoption possible, and it is the Spirit that makes us adopted sons and makes us cry out: “Abba! Father!” (Rom 8:15). By associating the believer with the death of Christ, baptism is the sign par excellence of his new condition (Rom 6:1–14).

c) John’s Gospel. The believer “must be born anew” (Jn 3:7), which means that he must find his origin in God, the Father. Freedom characterizes this newborn, who is like the wind—nobody knows where he comes from or where he is going (see Jn 3:8). Conversely, slavery characterizes those who have not recognized Jesus as the messenger of the words* of the Father, and who are sons of the devil in spite of their claim to be sons of Abraham (Jn 8:31–59). It is thus underscored that man is always son of someone, always in a state of dependency and never autonomous. Only those who are set free by the Son are really free (Jn 8:36). John’s epistles extend the same theological intuition: whoever confesses the Son “has the Father” and is “in the Son and in the Father” (1 Jn 2:22–24).

III. Conclusion: From the Only Son to the Adoptive Sons

According to the total corpus of New Testament evidence, the filiation of Jesus, if it preexists Creation* (Jn 1:1–10), is fulfilled and can be seen in the Incarnation*. It is through finitude in Jesus that God calls all men to filiation. Jesus reveals to mankind the new face of a God unveiling his voluntary limitation—not the face of a mighty Father who judges and condemns, but the face of a loving Father who is welcoming and willing to adopt mankind. Such a Father opens to mankind the road to a freedom, which, though finite, or in other words human, will still be one of the main attributions of a filiation that has been regained (Gal 5:1f., 5:13).

- O. Cullmann (1957), Die Christologie des Neuen Testaments, Tübingen.
- F. Hahn (1963, 3rd Ed. 1966), Christologische Hoheitstitel, Göttingen.
- A. George (1965), “Jésus Fils de Dieu dans l’Évangile selon saint Luc,” RB 72, 185–209.
- H. Conzelmann (1967), Grundriss der Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Munich.
- W. von Martitz et al. (1969), “Huios,” ThWNT 8, 334–402; 482–92.
- C. Burger (1970), Jesus als Davidssohn, Göttingen.
- J. Jeremias (1971), Neutestamentliche Theologie, I: Die Verkündigung Jesu.
- A. Descamps (1974), “Pour une histoire du titre Fils de Dieu,” in M. Sabbé (Ed.), L’Évangile selon Marc, Louvain, 529–71 (2nd Ed. 1988).
- M. Hengel (1975), Der Sohn Gottes, Tübingen.
- J.D. Kingsbury (1975), “The Title Son of God in Matthew’s Gospel,” BTB 5, 3–31.
- J.D. Kingsbury (1976), “The Title Son of David in Matthew’s Gospel,” JBL 95, 591–602.
- J. Ansaldi (1980), La paternité de Dieu: Libération ou névrose, Montpellier.
- F. Hahn (1983), “Huios,” EWNT 3, 911–38.
- W. Loader (1989), The Christology of the Fourth Gospel, Frankfurt.
- C. Breytenbach (1991), “Grundzüge markinischer Gottessohn-Christologie,” in C. Breytenbach and H. Paulsen (Ed.), Anfänge der Christologie, Göttingen, 169–84.
- C. Dietzfelbinger (1991), “Sohn und Gesetz: Überlegungen zur paulinischen Christologie,” ibid., 111–29.
- J.M. Scott (1992), Adoption as Sons of God: An Exegetical Investigation into the Background of “UIOTHESIA” in the Pauline Corpus, Tübingen.

ÉLIAN CUVILIER

See also Adam; Adoptionism; Anthropology; Ari-anism; Consubstantial; Couple; Family; Father; Messianism/Messiah; Prayer; Son of Man; Trinity; Woman; Word

Filioque

As the term itself suggests—filioque “and the Son”—the controversy known as the Filioque centered on the Latin theological doctrine expressed in the Nicene

Creed: qui ex patre filioque procedit, referring to the Holy* Spirit “which proceeds from the Father* and from the Son.”

a) From the Scriptural Evidence to the Schism of 1054. In the Gospel of John, Jesus speaks of “the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father” (Jn 15:26) (para tou Patros ekporeuomenon) and who “will take what is mine and declare it to you” (Jn 16:14). Paul speaks of the Spirit “of the Son” or “of Christ*” (Rom 8:4; 2 Cor 3:18; Gal 4:6; etc.). The creed of the First Council of Constantinople* states that the Spirit “proceeds from [ek] the Father.” A baptismal confession of faith* collected in the Ancoratus of Epiphanius (374) speaks of the Spirit that “proceeds from the Father and receives from the Son” (Hahn).

Toward the end of the fourth century, Latin theology* began to assert that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father and the Son. The beginnings of this assertion are to be found in the work of Hilary* (whose preferred formula is, however, that the Spirit proceeds “from the Father by the Son”). The doctrine also appears in the work of Ambrose*, although he uses the formula only with respect to the mission (Trinity*) of the Spirit (PL 16, 762, 783, 800, 810). The only place where it is fully set out is Augustine*’s De Trinitate. After Augustine it became widespread in Latin theology. Leo the Great adopted it in a vague form (SC 74, 150), and then explicitly in 447 (PL 54, 680—possibly apocryphal*). The Filioque appears in the so-called Athanasian Creed.

The doctrine is absent from Greek patristics. A few formulae of Epiphanius and Cyril* of Alexandria resemble it. Cyril even employs words close to those of Latin theology (e.g., PG 75, 585b): he talks of the Spirit “proper” (idion) to the Son (PG 71, 377d), and states that the Spirit “derives from” (proeisi) and “extends in front of” (prokheintai) the Son (PG 76, 173a–b). The Greek Fathers* preferred formula confines itself to the words of the Bible: the Spirit proceeds from the Father and receives from the Son (e.g., Pseudo-Cyril, PG 94, 1140b, John of Damascus PG 94, 821b). “From the Father by the Son” is in fact uncommon (but found as early as Origen*, In Joan. II, 73–75, dia tou logou; Gregory* of Nyssa, Jaeger III/1, 56; VIII/2, 760).

The discrepancy between the Latin and Greek theologies was first analyzed by Maximus* the Confessor in his letter to Marinus, in which he observes that the Filioque, confessed by Pope* Martin I, is equivalent to “from the Father by the Son.” Maximus restricts himself to a procession of the Spirit “by means of the Logos” (dia mesou tou Logou) (PG 91, 136). John of Damascus (c. 645–ca. 749) explicitly denied the Filioque: the Spirit “is the Spirit of the Son not because it comes from him (ouk ôs ek autou) but because it comes by him (all’ôs di’ autou) from the Father, for the Father alone is cause (monos aitios ho Patèr)” (PG 90, 849b).

The insertion of the Filioque into an official confession of faith was undoubtedly a Spanish initiative intended to combat Arianism* (while emphasizing the equality of Father and Son) and Priscillianist modalism*. The confession of faith of King Recared at the Third Council of Toledo (589) affirmed the Filioque. It was repeated by Toledo IV (633), and again in the profession of faith of Toledo XI (675). In 787 the Third Council of Nicaea* (images*) affirmed that the Spirit proceeded “from the Father by the Son” (Mansi 12, 1122). The Council of Frankfurt, called by Charlemagne in 794, refused this point: “by” the Son was not equivalent to “from” the Son (PL 98, 1117). The authority* of this last council, however, was not great.

In the ninth century a liturgical problem was added to the differences between the Greek and Latin theologies. Greek eucharistic liturgy* seems to have included a confession of faith since the fifth century (the practice was apparently initiated by the Patriarch of Antioch, Peter the Fuller), but the insertion of a similar confession into the Mass of the Latin Church came later. Toledo III called for the Creed of Nicaea and Constantinople to be sung in the course of the liturgy. Its use became widespread. In 794 Charlemagne had it sung (with the addition of the Filioque) at Aix-la-Chapelle. In 807 the abbot of the Mount of Olives introduced the practice to Jerusalem*; but the addition of the Filioque gave rise to a dispute with the Greek monks of Saint Sabas. The matter was referred to Pope Leo III and Charlemagne. The emperor’s theologians wrote a number of treatises on the Holy Spirit (Theodulf, Smaragdus, a pseudo-Alcuin). Leo III confessed the Filioque (PL 102, 1030–32) but refused to insert it into the Roman liturgical texts and called for its suppression from all liturgical formularies (PL 102, 971–76). His demand was in vain: the insertion of the Filioque was finally accepted by Benedict VIII in 1014 (at which date the Credo became part of the Roman eucharistic liturgy). The 16th-century reformers would retain the addition.

The charge of liturgical innovation was to recur constantly in Greek polemics against the Filioque. The Council of Ephesus* had declared the creed (the “faith,” pistis) of Nicaea-Constantinople inviolable (COD 65, 16 Sq), and the Council of Chalcedon* had repeated this declaration (COD 87, 3 Sq), so Latin liturgical practice was in violation of church* discipline. It appears, however, that this argument did not feature in the earliest debates. Photius did not use it; and it was only when Cardinal Humbert of Silva Candida, in his discussions with Nicetas Stethatos in 1054, accused the Greeks of deleting the Filioque from the creed that the patriarch Michael Cerularius realized that the Latins had added it.

In the meantime the Greeks' objections had been expressed more extremely by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, who in 867 put forward an opposing theology according to which the Holy Spirit proceeded "from the Father alone" (monopatristism) (PG 102, 292; also 721–42). The problem of the Filioque was to be among the causes of the schism* and would be central to all the debates between East and West; indeed it was probably more important than the issue of Peter*'s primacy.

b) Theological Development and Ecumenical Initiatives. From the 11th century onward, Latin theology was unwavering in its affirmation of the Filioque. In the Greek world, Gregory of Cyprus suggested a qualified wording: "[...] the Spirit accompanies the Word*, and it is by the Word that it proceeds, radiates, and appears in its eternal and pre-eternal splendor" (PG 142, 290c). Gregory* Palamas took up some of Gregory of Cyprus's ideas, and contrived a possible place for the Filioque in the order of "energetic manifestation": the Spirit—not as hypostasis, but giving hypostasis to the divine energy—pours forth from the Father "by the Son" (dia tou Huiou), and even "from the Son" (ek tou Huiou) (PG 147, 269–300). The Filioque was ratified by the Fourth Lateran* Council in 1215, reaffirmed at the unionist Council of Lyons* II (1274), and again at the council of union at Florence (1439). The latter declared it to be equivalent to the formula "from the Father by the Son"—giving preference to the Filioque, but without insisting that the Greeks incorporate it into the creed.

The union of Florence was short-lived, but it was again the desire for reunion that provided the impetus for a fresh consideration of the subject in the late 19th and the 20th centuries. In 1874–75, a conference in Bonn gathered together representatives of Russian Orthodoxy* and of the Old Catholic Church: the latter accepted Greek theology in its entirety. Some important theses by B. Bolotov, relating to this conference, were published in 1898. According to Bolotov, Photius's formula ("from the Father alone") was a theologoumenon, not a dogma*. Moreover, "The Filioque, as a particular theological opinion, cannot [...] be an impedimentum dirimens to the reestablishment of ecclesiastical communion" (thesis 27): this thesis was accepted in the 20th century by S. Bulgakov, P. Evdokimov, and L. Voronov, but rejected by V. Lossky. The Anglican Church, which was represented at the Bonn conference, has repeatedly declared itself ready to remove the Filioque from the creed, "whatever the merits or demerits of its doctrinal content" (Iren. 48 (1975), 362). K. Barth* was a notable defender of the Filioque in modern Protestant theology (KD II/2, 273 Sq), though the Protestant churches as a whole are prepared to abandon its liturgical use. The Catholic episcopate in Greece dropped it in 1973.

c) Reconciliation of Latin and Greek Views. The search for a solution to the problem of the Filioque took a number of forms in the history of theology after 1054. It seemed inconceivable to Duns* Scotus that there could be heresy* involved, in either Latin or Greek pneumatology (I Sent., dist. 11, q. 1). Bonaventure* distinguished between the faith common to all, the clarifications that had given rise to the divergence, and the formulae that stoked the controversy. Thomas* Aquinas pointed out that the Holy Spirit does not proceed from the Father by the mediation of the Son, since the Son receives from the Father (I Sent., dist. 12, q. 1, a. 3), and noted that the Greek ek is not equivalent to the Latin ab (ibid., a. 2, ad. 3). However, the most significant progress has been the fruit of recent research. The Greek concept of ekporeusis is one thing, and the Latin concept of procession (which entered theology with Tertullian) is another. Greek theology has two verbs, ekporeuesthai and proienai, to describe the (eternal) relationship of the Spirit to the Father and its eternal relationship to the Father and Son, while Latin dogmatics employs only procedere. Greek Trinitarian theology, on the other hand, is structured around the concept of the Father's "monarchy": the Father alone is the "principle" (arkhè) and cause (aitia). Thus Latin theology is able to say that "the Spirit proceeds in principle from the Father and, by means of the latter's immaterial gift to the Son, from both in communion* (communiter)" (Augustine, De Trin. XV, 25, 47, PL 42, 1095). It can even say that the Father and the Son are "a single principle" in relation to the Spirit (Augustine, PL 42, 921), and that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son "as from a single principle," tamquam ex uno principio (COD 314, 10; 526, 40–42)—which would be an absurdity within the conceptual framework of Greek theology.

A formula that will do justice to both Eastern and Western theology must therefore respect these conceptual differences. J.-M. Garrigues has proposed the following formulation: "I believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and giver of life, who issuing from the Father (ek tou Patros ekporeuomenon), proceeds from the Father and the Son (ex Patre Filioque procedit, ek tou Patros kai tou Huiou proion)" (1981). An Orthodox reception* of the Filioque is not inconceivable (Lossky 1967), and nor, even, is a Catholic reception of monopatrism (Halleux 1990). The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) may be overoptimistic when it speaks of a "legitimate complementarity" that, "provided it does not become rigid, does not affect the identity of faith in the reality of the same mystery* confessed" (§248). All the same, more than one Orthodox theologian acknowledges that the Son "is not uninvolved" in the ekporesis of the Holy Spirit (Bobrinskoy, Zizioulas).

- H. B. Swete (1876), On the History of the Doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit from the Apostolic Age to the Death of Charlemagne, Cambridge.
- B. Bolotov (1898), "Thesen über das 'Filioque,'" RITH 3, 89–95.
- S. Boulgakov (1946), Le Paraclet, Paris.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1950), Early Christian Creeds, London (3rd Ed. 1972).
- "Où en est la théologie du 'Filioque'?" (1950), Russie et chrétienté, 123–244.
- Vl. Lossky (1967), A l'image et à la ressemblance de Dieu, Paris, 67–93.
- S. Bilalis (1972), Hè haireisis tou Filioque, Athens.
- Y. Congar (1980), Je crois en l'Esprit Saint, vol. 3, Paris.

- J.-M. Garrigues (1981), L'Esprit qui dit "Père" et le problème du Filioque, Paris.
- L. Vischer (Ed.) (1981), La théologie du Saint-Esprit dans le dialogue œcuménique entre l'Orient et l'Occident, Paris-Cluny.
- Th. Stylianopoulos (1986), "The Filioque: Dogma, Theologoumenon, or Error?" GOTR 31, 255–88.
- H.U. von Balthasar (1987), Theologik 3, Der Geist der Wahrheit, Einsiedeln.
- A. de Halleux (1990), Patrologie et œcuménisme, Louvain (studies 8 to 12).
- Th. Stylianopoulos (1991), "An Ecumenical Solution to the Filioque Question?" JES 28, 260–80.
- Conseil pontifical pour la promotion de l'unité des chrétiens (1995), "Les traditions grecque et latine concernant la procession du Saint-Esprit," DC 2125, 941–45.

THE EDITORS

See also Ethics; Father; Trinity; Word

Finitude. See Death; Infinite; Nothingness

Flesh

I. Old Testament

1. Field of Reference

In the Old Testament, flesh signifies in a fairly general way human beings, man, humanity ("all flesh," as in Gn 6:12), the animal*, food (Ex 21:10), and, in a more restricted sense, man's fragility (Ps 56:4), or even the sexual organs (Ex 28:42). In the Old Testament, the most common meaning is concentrated on man as an individual or even as a collective. Three main axes mark the roughly 6,270 occurrences of flesh (bâsâr in Hebrew and sarx in Greek). They are: totality, vitality, and relationship. Because of the wealth of the topic, the lexicons of the original languages and those of translations align even less often than in other cases.

a) Idea of Totality. To express the completeness of the human being as an individual, biblical authors refer freely to the various parts of the human person (body, mind, blood, soul*, heart, bones, skin, kidneys, etc.); these terms accompany "flesh" in a synonymous parallelism, or they replace it. "Flesh" also refers to the collective, in order to stress the solidarity of earthly creatures. The syntagm kol-bâsâr ("all flesh"), which appears 40 times in the Bible*, takes into account either the whole gamut of creatures, including humans and animals (Gn 6:17, etc.), or the more restricted group of mankind (Is 40:5, etc.). This solidarity of the flesh and in the flesh expresses even more particularly the ties of blood, the union of spouses in a single flesh (Gn 2:24, or in Gn 2:23, where the concept is expressed as "flesh of my flesh"), and so on.

b) Vitality of the Human Being. This quality is recounted in various ways. In the Second Book of Kings, the leprous flesh of Naaman the Syrian becomes healthy and alive like a child's after his healing (2 Kgs 5:14). Ezekiel sees the Creator "cause flesh to come upon" a valley full of dry bones, which spring back to life (Ez 37:6).

c) Relationship. Lastly and above all, flesh implies the idea of a relationship. Man is understood in his condition as a creature in relation with God*, but also in his dialogue with other beings made of flesh.

2. From the Hebrew to the Greek of the Septuagint

Translating from one language into another (the Septuagint, or LXX) caused important semantic differences in the anthropological domain as well as in the theological interpretation.

a) The Hebrew bâsâr is rendered quite often (about 145 times) as sarx. Among other terms, the most frequently used is sôma (body).

b) The synonymic practice of the LXX differs from that of the Hebrew (see below). It tends, in fact, to create a distinction between flesh, body, mind, and so on, more in conformity with Greek anthropology*. The sôma (body) constitutes the human envelope; this latter is thereby distinguished from the pneuma (spirit), which therefore refers to an independent, more spiritual part of the human being. In the LXX, the stress is placed less on the whole; it expresses more the complexity of the being made of flesh.

II. New Testament

Paul's epistles and the Gospels* are the chief books to consider.

1. Authentic Epistles of Paul

Paul gives increasing importance to "flesh," about which he often creates a theological theme. Three stages are apparent:

a) Corinthians. In the First Letter of Paul to the Corinthians, it does not seem at first glance that Paul has yet organized any theological thoughts about the theme of the flesh. The word flesh takes on various meanings, in fact, which are quite commonplace. All the same, the milestones of his later development can already be discerned. This development has its origins in phrases such as kata sarka ("according to the flesh") in 1 Corinthians 10:18. Even if "flesh" is not mentioned directly in 1 Corinthians 6 (except in the citation from Gn 2:24 in 6:16), the first elements of the depreciation of the flesh begin to show there. In the Second Letter to the Corinthians, these sketches grow clearer, and the beginning of a more thematic theological meditation can be seen. Paul does not yet contrast the flesh and the spirit, but the terms kata sarka ("according to the flesh") and en sarki ("in the flesh") take on more definitive meanings.

b) Galatians. The Letter to the Galatians seemingly represents a very active period in Paul's meditations on the flesh. Indeed, these epistles contain the various meanings of flesh, including the human viewpoint indicated by flesh and blood and the weakness of the flesh that results in Paul's illness (Gal 4:13). But chapters 3 and 4 of Galatians constitute the letter's real center, and it is there that the theme is expressed. Paul accentuates the link between the flesh and sin*, either as a return to the pre-Christian era, or as desire for the sinful flesh (epithumia).

The apostle attacks violently those who want to turn from the spirit to the flesh and follow a path in opposition to the Gospel (Gal 3:3). The homily on the two unions, based on the allegory of Hagar, the slave whose son "was born according to the flesh," and Sarah, the free woman, whose son was born "through promise*" (Gal 4:23) brilliantly illustrates Paul's thought. The contrasting of the flesh (kata sarka) with the spirit (kata pneuma) begins to take on greater and greater definition. Finally, the quotation from Psalm 143:2 in Galatians 2:16 plays an important role in this period of theological maturation. Paul would take it up again in Romans 3:20. The Pauline version of this line from the psalmist states, "by works of the law shall no one [actually, pasa sarx, which means, literally, "all flesh"] be justified"—which distances itself from the Hebrew and from the LXX—and it is not a matter of chance. The steps have been marked already in Galatians; the route has been signposted for the theological treatise in the Epistle to the Romans.

c) Romans. In the Letter to the Romans, Paul takes up again the ideas sketched in 1 and 2 Corinthians, and especially the contrast between the flesh and the spirit, which was already developed systematically in Galatians. A violent inner struggle had taken possession of the apostle. He tries to explain it to himself from a theological point of view in his thematic perusal of the flesh and the spirit, Romans 7 to 9, the watershed of the two big sections of the first part of Romans (chapters 1 to 8 and 9 to 11), which preserves the traces of the apostle's inner struggle, specifically in his use of "flesh." Other thematic links are woven, with the theme of justification*, on the one hand, and with the theme of the salvation of Israel* on the other.

As an overture to the theme, the indictment in Romans 7 contrasts life in the flesh (en tē sarki), a place of sin, of aging, of death*, to the newness of the spirit (Rom 7:5, 7:6, 7:18, and 7:25). We are told that by “sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin, [God] condemned sin in the flesh” (Rom 8:3). Paul stresses the contradictions between the authority of the Law* and that of the Spirit, and he gradually introduces a theology* of the filial spirit, the gift of God for life. The word flesh invades the beginning of chapter 8, appearing in verses 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, and 13. In these verses the apostle affirms the perishability—even more, the death-dealing power—of the flesh. But, nevertheless, Paul in no way devalues Christ’s coming in the flesh. Chapters 9 to 11 emphasize the coming into the flesh of the Son born of David’s line (Rom 1:3). Focused on the problem of Israel’s abandonment, chapters 9 to 11 are framed by the question of the Salvation, which came in the flesh (9:3, 9:5, 9:6, and 11:14). As an introduction to this dramatic question, Paul lists the privileges of the Children of Israel (Rom 9:4–5), placing at the summit the supreme privilege of the Incarnation*—ho Christo te kata sarka (“Christ, according to the flesh”). In this way, Paul demonstrates the importance of the progression from the flesh to the promise (Rom 9:8).

2) In the Gospels

While the Gospel According to Mark and the Gospel According to Matthew, which follows Mark, give hardly any emphasis to the theme of the flesh, the Gospels of Luke and John—each in their own way—enhance this motive theologically.

a) Mark and Matthew. Mark’s three mentions of “flesh” are all placed within the words of Jesus*: In Mark 10:8 and Matthew 19:5, while addressing the question of divorce, Jesus cites Genesis 24. In Mark 13:20 and Matthew 24:22, the Greek word for flesh is used for life or person. Finally, in Mark 14:38 and Matthew 26:41, at the moment of the agony, Jesus recalls the weakness of the flesh. In addition to picking up these three traditional sayings from Mark, Matthew adds to the pericope of Peter*’s confession of faith, Jesus’ remark that the Father in heaven had revealed to Peter what he had confessed, and not “flesh and blood” (Mt 16:17). “Flesh and blood” is rooted in the Hebrew idiom bâsâr-wa-dâm, which recalls the limits of the human condition compared to divine revelation.*

b) Luke. Luke’s Gospel uses the word flesh in an original way. Near the beginning and at the end of his Gospel, Luke establishes an inclusive relation between the two common usages of flesh. In the quotation from Isaiah 40:5—“all flesh shall see the salvation of God” (Lk 3:6)—he uses flesh to mean humans. Then, in the words of the risen Jesus, he brings out the Greek contrast between the spirit and the flesh—“a spirit has not flesh and bones as you see that I have” (Lk 24:39). Luke also mentions the flesh three times in the second part of his work, the Acts of the Apostles. All three references (Acts 2:17, 2:26, and 2:31) come in Peter’s homily at Pentecost and are marked by the theme of hope* in the resurrection of all flesh.

c) The Fourth Gospel. The originality of the theology of the Gospel of John lies essentially in two passages in John 6 and in the prologue. In chapter 6, where Jesus speaks about the bread of life, the word flesh is used seven times. The first six occurrences (in vv. 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, and 56) refer to the eucharistic* flesh of Christ, which he is offering as a food that will give everlasting life. The last use of the word flesh in this passage (6:63) accompanies the other six in order to explain the role of the Holy Spirit. It reflects back to another use of the word in Jesus’ dialogue with Nicodemus (Jn 3:6).

Verse 14 of the prologue of the Fourth Gospel has delivered to Christian theology a confession of faith in the incarnation of Christ—“and the Word became flesh” (ho logos sarx egeneto). Today the phrase remains at the heart of Christian faith*. It is a unique occurrence, but it encompasses the whole of John’s theology. The manifestation in the flesh becomes one of the privileged themes of the glory* of Christ. John’s epistles tell of the importance that his communities gave to the recognition of Christ’s having come in the flesh (2 Jn 7).

A study of the context in which the word flesh is used should thus not be neglected and care should be taken not to come to hasty conclusions when determining the meaning of flesh in its different occurrences. In particular, the way in which the Bible sees flesh should be distinguished, in many instances, from the way in which it sees the body. But when all is said and done, several passages, especially in the New Testament (including 1 Cor 5:5, Col 2:23, and 1 Pt 3:21), still remain obscure.

E. Schweizer, R. Meyer (1964), “sarx,” ThWNT, 7, 98–145.

D. Lys (1967), La chair dans l’Ancien Testament. Paris.

R. Jewett (1971), Paul’s Anthropological Terms, AGJU 10.

• N. P. Bratsiotis (1973), “bâsâr,” ThWAT, 1, 850–67.

V. Guénel (Ed.) (1983), Le corps et le corps du Christ dans la première épître aux Corinthiens (Congrès de l’ACFEB, Tarbes, 1981), Paris.

J. Scharbert, P. Trummer (1991), “Fleisch,” NBL 4, 677–82 (bibl.).

MICHÈLE MORGEN

See also Adam; Animals; Anthropology; Cosmos; Johannine Theology; Law and Christianity; Pauline Theology; Resurrection of Christ; Resurrection of the Dead; Sin; Soul-Heart-Body; World

Florence, Council of. See Basel-Ferrara-Florence, Council of Forgiveness. See Mercy

Formgeschichte. See Literary Genres in Scripture

Formulas of Faith. See Creeds

Francis de Sales. See Spirituality, Salesian

Francis of Assisi. See Spirituality, Franciscan

Franzelin, Johann Baptist. See Tradition

Freedom, Religious

Religious freedom is an aspect of political freedom and should be distinguished from the idea of freedom found in the New Testament. Like other freedoms, religious freedom involves the rights and privileges of citizens within an organized political community, concurrent with the guarantee that the states will protect such rights. In Western democracies*, religious freedom is essentially the negative freedom to practice or not one's religion, to meet and assemble for religious purposes, and to change religion.

Until the fourth century, theological reflection had no occasion to address the questions that would divide Christians later: whether the civil authorities* ought to give active support to the Christian religion, abolish paganism*, give official recognition to ecclesiastical authorities, or punish heresy*. Scripture says nothing about religious freedom, but the early apologists* and martyrs liked to quote Peter*: "We must obey God* rather than men" (Acts 5:29). By obeying Christ's injunction to refuse to grant unto Caesar what was God's, they gave witness to the possibility of an alternative society* capable of resisting an empire with totalitarian pretensions.

Out of its early struggle for freedom from imperial domination, the church* gradually developed the notion of two different orders of authority. Later, this was articulated as the theory of the two powers: that church and state are each autonomous in their own spheres. The clearest statement of this doctrine is in the often cited letter of Pope* Gelasius (492–96) to the Emperor Anastasius I, written in 494: "There are two powers . . . by which this world is ruled, the sacred authority (auctoritas) of priests and the royal power (potestas)" (PL 59, 41–47). Centuries of debate followed over the relation between the two powers, particularly over the precise meaning of the "superiority" of the spiritual. Nevertheless, it is obvious that adopting the distinction ended the concept that dominated antiquity for which religion and city were interdependent. The modern concept of religious freedom could not have emerged without such controversies.

Following the Edict of Milan (313, in SC 39), which proclaimed universal toleration for all religious convictions within the empire, Christianity was soon placed in a privileged status, to the detriment of paganism. It is understandable that in the eyes of a church that had been persecuted for two centuries, and that had always been convinced, even in the midst of the harshest persecution, that rulers were "instituted by God" or "appointed by God" (Rom 13), Constantine could have appeared sent by God. However, it soon became clear that the support of the emperor confronted the church with new problems that potentially threatened its freedom. The state increasingly intervened in church affairs; from this followed the danger that crucial doctrines might be compromised for reasons of state. In the fourth century, for example, the empire temporarily supported Arianism*.

Constantine was indifferent to the theological controversy over the consubstantiality (consubstantial*) of the Word* with the Father* and considered all such disputes to be forms of childishness (Eusebius, Vita Constantini, GCS I, 67–71). However, it was also his conviction that he was a colleague of the bishops* (Vita, GCS I, 84, 20–23) and a "bishop of external affairs" (Vita, GCS I, 124, 9, 11). Because the theological dissension threatened the unity of the empire, he could not avoid the Trinitarian controversies and often counseled orthodox bishops to compromise with the Arians, threatening sanctions if they refused. When his son Constantius sought to impose Arianism, the church realized the threat to its independence.

The church was also forced to reflect on the proper relation between orthodox rulers and various heresies, especially those that threatened the unity of the empire. This issue came to a head at the time of the Do-natist crisis (Donatism*), which was to have an influence for centuries because of the role played by Augustine*. At first, Augustine advocated leniency toward the Donatists and rejected recourse to the secular power to bring them back forcibly into communion* with the church. He did change his views, however, and accepted the intervention of legitimate authorities (ordinatae a Deo potestates), thinking that coercion led to the return to the truth and salvation of many Donatists who would have remained so by force of habit (Markus 1970): “We see many who have renounced their former blindness; how could I begrudge them their salvation by dissuading my colleagues from exercising their fatherly care, by which this has been brought about?” (Ep. 93, CSEL 34–2). Augustine legitimized the use of force to compel heretics back into the church by appealing to Luke 14:23, “compel people to come in.”

Given other emphases in Augustine’s political theology* that mitigate the triumphalistic defense of a “Christian empire,” one wonders why it did not occur to Augustine, when he was thinking about religious coercion, to restrict the scope of the state’s actions. Perhaps it was because he did not consider Christian rulers and civil servants as members of the governmental machine, but as members of the church, through which the church uses their power for just ends. Augustine thus continued “to speak without inhibition of Christian emperors long after he had abandoned all talk about a Christian empire” (Markus).

Augustine’s view found ready application in the prefeudal world of the early Middle Ages, in which the distinction between civil and ecclesiastical authorities was acknowledged in principle but, in practice, it was much easier to think of political realities in terms of princes and officials than in terms of abstract political concepts such as “state” or “government.” Augustine believed that coercion was to be used only in exceptional cases, but its use was eventually given general validity, in no small measure because of Augustine’s authority.

According to Thomas* Aquinas, faith* is by nature an act of freedom, and it is therefore wrong to force infidels—Jews, Moslems, or pagans—to become Christians (ST IIa IIae, q. 10, a. 8). This does not imply that their religious practices should be tolerated within a Christian res publica. Such tolerance is permissible only if it leads to some great good* or prevents some great evil (ibid., a. 11). While Jews (Judaism*) may be permitted to practice their religion, since they prefigure the Christian faith and in a sense bear witness to it, other religions should not be tolerated except to prevent some greater evil (a. 11). As for the heretic who persists in his heresy, Aquinas articulates the common view in saying (ST IIa IIae, q. 11, a. 3) that “the church gives up hope of his conversion and takes thought for the safety of others by separating him from the church by sentence of excommunication; and further leaves him to the secular court, to be exterminated from the world by death.” Indeed, heresy appeared to medieval theologians to be a culpable error, an example of insincerity and bad faith, an error that should not be permitted to spread like a cancer through a morally and religiously unified body politic.

This view persisted after the breakup of Christendom into nations and after the fracturing of Western Christian unity in the Reformation. The views of the Reformers are accurately summarized in the Confessio belgica (1619, BSKORK 119–36): concerning civil magistrates, it is said that their office is not only to have regard to the welfare of the state, but also to protect the ministry*, and remove and prevent all idolatry* and false religion (article 36). Similarly, the Westminster Confession (1647) states (ch. 23) that it is the duty of the magistrate “to take order, that unity and peace be preserved in the church, and that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered and observed.”

The two heresies penalized by death in the Code of Justinian (482–565), the denial of the Trinity* and the repetition of baptism* (originally targeted at Arians and Donatists), were taken to justify action against anti-Trinitarians (e.g., Michael Servetus, 1511–53) and Anabaptists*. Luther*, Melancthon (1497–1560), and Calvin* all appealed to the imperial law. Only the Anabaptists were exceptional in rejecting all coercion in matters of faith, believing that compromise and worldliness inevitably result from church establishments.

The ideal of a society unified by a common faith and baptism remained long after heresy came to be seen as inculpable error. Cuius regio, eius et religio: this principle was imposed at the Peace of Augsburg (1555). When remedies to religious discord were supposedly found by adopting a skeptical or relativistic position, religious freedom was still not approved of, or it would even be suppressed for reasons of state as with Hobbes (1588–1679), or by the establishment of a “civil religion,” as with Rousseau (1712–78). If certain religious claims or forms of worship were by nature indifferent, they could easily be penalized or proscribed for the sake of political unity.

Before Vatican* II, the Catholic position was expressed by means of notions of thesis and hypothesis: religious pluralism was tolerated in hypothesis and rejected in thesi, in favor of a Catholic confessional state. This doctrine was still being defended by Leo XIII in Immortale Dei (1885). Largely through the efforts of the American Jesuit John Courtney Murray, this doctrine was rejected in the conciliar declaration on religious freedom, Dignitatis Humanae, which ranks among the most important ecclesiastical documents on the problem. While it clearly affirms the principle of religious freedom, it is very much a compromise document, which embodies a number of different arguments in support of the principle. These include, for example, alongside arguments from scripture, the idea of the right and duty to follow one's conscience* and seek the truth, as well as the constitutional principle of limited government. Murray, who was the defender of the "constitutional argument," found the other arguments less convincing.

- M. A. Huttman (1914), Establishment of Christianity and the Proscription of Paganism, New York.
- W. K. Jordan (1932–46), The Development of Religious Toleration in England, 4 vols., Cambridge, Mass.
- H. Rommen (1945), The State in Catholic Thought, New York.
- J. Lecler (1946), L'Église et la souveraineté de l'État, Paris.
- R. H. Bainton (1951), The Travail of Religious Liberty, New York.
- S. L. Guterman (1951), Religious Toleration and Persecution in Ancient Rome, London.
- G. H. Williams (1951), "Christology and Church-State Relations in the Fourth Century," ChH 20 (September), 3–33.
- W. H. C. Frend (1952), The Donatist Church, Oxford.
- J. Lecler (1955), Histoire de la tolérance au siècle de la Réforme, 2 vols., Paris.
- M. Bevenot (1954), "Thesis and Hypothesis," TS 15, 440–46.

- A. F. Carillo de Albornoz (1959), Roman Catholicism and Religious Liberty, Geneva.
- H. Rahner (1961), Kirche und Staat im frühen Christentum, Munich.
- G. H. Williams (1962), The Radical Reformation, Philadelphia.
- H. A. Deane (1963), The Political and Social Ideas of St. Augustine, New York.
- W. H. C. Frend (1965), Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church, Oxford.
- E. A. Goerner (1965), Peter and Caesar: Political Authority and the Catholic Church, New York.
- J. C. Murray (1965), The Problem of Religious Freedom, Westminster, Md.
- J. C. Murray (Ed.) (1966), Religious Liberty: An End and a Beginning, New York.
- G. Leff (1967), Heresy in the Middle Ages, 2 vols., New York.
- R. Regan (1967), Conflict and Consensus, New York.
- R. Markus (1970), Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine, Cambridge.
- N. H. Baynes (1972), Constantine the Great and the Christian Church, London.
- P. R. Brown (1972), "St. Augustine's Attitude to Religious Coercion," in Religion and Society in the Age of St. Augustine, London, 260–78.
- J. H. Yoder (1985), The Priestly Kingdom: Social Ethics as Gospel, Notre Dame, Ind.
- D. Gonnet (1994), La liberté religieuse à Vatican II: La contribution de John Courtney Murray, Paris.
- K. J. Pavlischek (1994), John Courtney Murray and the Dilemma of Religious Toleration, Kirksville, Mo.
- O. O'Donovan (1997), The Desire of the Nations, Cambridge.

KEITH J. PAVLISCHEK

See also Anabaptists; Church and State; Donatism; Martyrdom; Orthodoxy; Relativism; Revolution

Free Spirit. See Beguines; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism; Vienna, Council of Free Will. See Liberty

Freud, Sigmund

1856–1938

a) Psychoanalysis of Religion and Theory of Culture. Freud is known for having asserted ever more confidently an association between religion and obsessional neurosis. “[O]ne might venture to regard obsessional neurosis as a pathological counterpart of the formation of a religion,” he wrote in 1907 (“Obsessive Actions and Religious Practices”). This association, which appears throughout Freud’s work, is not a diagnosis drawn from clinical experience and observation of certain constants (endless repetition of rituals, magical expectation of their effectiveness, proliferating fabrications about their origin); it rather has to do with a theory of religion and a concomitant interpretation of culture. At the intersection of prehistory, ethnology, and psychoanalysis, Freud asserts that the establishment of collective ritual practices and the recognition of fellow human beings have a common foundation in the dissolution of social organization caused by a sexual impulse that also engenders neurosis.

During the founding events of collective life, this impulse is said to have destroyed the imaginary and megalomaniacal identification of the members of the primal horde with the supposed sexual omnipotence of their leader. This identification, by subjecting them to the authority* of the “archaic Father*,” and to the constraints guaranteeing the life of the group, provided them with sexual satisfaction only by means of the expectation of an imaginary legacy. The archaic Father is said to have been put to death in circumstances that excluded his customary replacement. The organization of the group is then supposed to have collapsed and required the establishment of a fraternal pact: that is, a new social organization based on a new distribution of sexual energy. The sons now have access to women and recognize one another as alike and equal; but because the catastrophe was just barely avoided, sexual energy is in part turned against the self. Anxiety therefore infuses sexuality and organizes its expression (incest taboo, exogamy, prohibition of killing the rival); anxiety is produced individually in the form of obsessions, and collectively in the form of a totemic cult, which oscillates between expiation for the primal murder, nostalgia for a return to the authority of the archaic Father, and exaltation over his removal. The establishment of the totem is interpreted to mean that the archaic Father is not dead and that his protective power has survived. The burdensome veneration he receives restores the former submission and deserves some recompense. As for the periodic sacrifice and eating of the totem, they symbolically repeat the action of the conspirators and confirm their descendants’ possession of the stolen omnipotence of the archaic Father. Totemism thus works to maintain the fraternal bond but allows guilt to spread and to be repeated.

All religions thus obsessively bring together a demand for sexual pleasure and the desire to reconnect with an omnipotence that has been overcome by proliferating sacrificial practices. Establishing a link between recognition of fellow human beings, religion, and neurosis, religion becomes an ambiguous partner of culture. It tames asocial instincts and participates in the psychic development of fear. Moreover, it evades the critique inevitably provoked by the conflict between illusory hopes and real sacrifices only by imposing itself on people at an early age and thereby limiting their intellectual development.

This analysis applies to Judaism* and to a lesser extent to Christianity. With respect to the Jewish religion, Freud thought it possible to establish that Moses was put to death by Egyptian slaves who had been led across the Red Sea. Evoking the unconscious memory of the primal murder, this crime violently divided Jewish consciousness between the expectation of the highest election and the necessity of subjecting themselves to divine law*. The result was an unequaled ethical tension finding its counterpart in an identity entirely based on the exaltation and the work of intelligence. Christianity is also rooted in the climate of totemism. In the Eucharist*, what is involved is an omnipotent hero, his putting to death, and the symbolic incorporation of his power. But by reason of the historical proximity of the death of Jesus*, Paul, the creator of this “new religion,” was unable to identify the omnipotence of Christ* with that of the archaic Father. Reviving fantasies that preceded totemism and are detectable in the cults of mother goddesses, he made Christianity into a “religion of the Son,” in which Jesus is the repository of an omnipotence that is to be shared, not challenged. This religion proposed a regression that was likely to reactivate polytheistic tendencies (the cult of Mary* and of the saints) but that would not have, theoretically, any cultural influence. Freud, however, took note of the cultural importance of Christianity, largely attributing the credit for this to the Reformation.

b) Reception of the Freudian Critique. Freud's analysis has lost the points of support on which it originally relied. Protohistorians soon abandoned the hypothesis of the primal horde, and ethnologists that of the descent of all religions from a totemic cult. Biologists have challenged the possibility of cultural heredity, and psychoanalysts have expressed surprise at Freud's silence on the position of women. Moreover, the Freudian theory of Christianity develops a second theory of religion hardly compatible with the first, neglects the developments of Trinitarian theology (Trinity*), and overemphasizes the cult of the Virgin.

Furthermore, Freudian analysis appears to have had little effect on many thinkers. Badly received in Jewish cultural circles, it was considered an unfortunate deviation (O. Pfister, R. Laforgue). Although some disciples (E. Jones, G. Roheim) drew on it in order to study myths*, these individuals' work made little impact on specialists in the history of mythology. As for other readers of Freud, either they did not attempt to articulate with reference to a particular point their general reservations concerning psychoanalysis, or they paid more attention to the relations between religion and psychoanalysis as articulated by Lacan (C. Lévi-Strauss, D. Vasse).

We might then conclude that the Freudian theory of religion is merely an extrapolation, outside its field of operation, of the nil nisi sexuelle dear to Freud, unless we consider that it sheds interesting light on the occupation with and contamination of religion by neurosis.

But we can go further. The Freudian approach to totemism under the categories of the archaic, the sexual, and the infantile certainly constitutes a myth (Freud himself calls it a "scientific myth"); it nevertheless produced a major shift with regard to the positivist interpretation of religion. By making the Parousia of the positive spirit the structuring axis of history*, A. Comte (1798–1857) had in fact strengthened the positions of rationalism* against religion: since humanity must necessarily move away from belief, it is appropriate to endure the rhythm of that movement. Far from flatly reiterating the positivist credo, The Future of an Illusion asserts that if there is indeed an illusion and its prompt dissipation is to be desired, its pure and simple disappearance cannot be expected. There is at work in it, even if awkwardly, a psychic dynamism that lies at the very foundation of our culture. Civilization and Its Discontents again considers the incapacity of the logos to provide an account of human development that has any immediacy. An irritating thorn is thus set in the heart of rationalist conviction, and it is not gratuitous. Classical philosophy* was interested in representation as a repository of knowledge; those representations were called religious that were devoid of any identifiable knowledge content. This simplistic definition of the religious was, however, challenged under the pressure of a critical movement internal to rationality. The advent of the natural sciences, and the role played in them by perception, led to the idea that representations do not come from two sources, one rational, the other affective, but that everything comes together in a representational process operating at the juncture of individual inclinations and stimuli emanating from reality. Taking up this argument, psychoanalysis investigates the dialectic of desire developing in religious representations and in their ritual staging. Without accepting everything that it says on the subject, we can agree that it does not dishonor religion by seeking to understand how the sexual, understood as the stimulus to an unavoidable interest in others, is at work in it; and how it serves, even awkwardly, the joint development of sociability and culture. Psychoanalysis would thus attempt to understand the transmutation of éros into agapè (love*).

- S. Freud, GW, London, then Frankfurt, 1947–87, 19 vols., 18 vols. (OC, Paris, 1989–).
- S. Freud (1907), "Zwangshandlungen und Religionsübungen," GW VII, 129–39 ("Obsessive Actions and Religious Practices," The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, vol. IX, 1959, 115–27).
- S. Freud (1908), "Die 'kulturelle' Sexualmoral und die moderne Nervosität," GW VII, 143–67.
- S. Freud (1909), "Bemerkungen über einen Fall von Zwangsneurose," GW VII, 381–463.
- S. Freud (1910), "Psychoanalytische Bemerkungen über einen autobiographisch beschriebenen Fall von Paranoia (Dementia Paranoides)," GW VIII, 239–320 (OC X, 225–304).
- S. Freud (1911), "Gross ist die Diana der Epheser," GW VIII, 359–61.
- S. Freud (1913), "Totem und tabou," GW IX.
- S. Freud (1921), "Massenpsychologie und Ich-Analyse," GW XIII, 71–161 (OC XVI, 1–83).
- S. Freud (1927), "Die Zukunft einer Illusion," GW XIV, 323–80 (OC XVIII, 141–98).
- S. Freud (1929), "Das Unbehagen in der Kultur," GW XIV, 421–506 (OC XVIII, 245–333).
- S. Freud (1939), "Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion," GW XVI, 101–246.
- ◆ O. Pfister (1919), Au vieil Évangile par un chemin nouveau, Bern.
- O. Pfister (1928), "Die Illusion einer Zukunft," Imago XIV, 2–3.
- R. Bienefeld (1938), Die religion des religionslosen Juden, Vienna.
- C. Lévi-Strauss (1949), Les structures élémentaires de la parenté, Paris.
- G. Roheim (1950), Psychoanalysis and Anthropology, London.
- E. Jones (1951), Essays in Applied Psycho-Analysis II, London.

C. Lévi-Strauss (1951), Le totémisme aujourd'hui, Paris.
 R. Laforge (1963), "Freud et le monothéisme," in Au-delà du scientisme, Geneva, 93–117.
 P. Ricœur (1965), De l'interprétation: Essai sur Freud, Paris.
 D. Vasse (1969), Le temps du désir, Paris.
 A. Vergote (1974), Dette et désir, Paris.
 J. Gagey (1982), Freud et le christianisme, Paris.
 H. Schott (1997), "Psychiatrie," TRE 27, 672–76.

K. Winkler (1997), "Psychoanalyse/Psychotherapie," ibid., 677–84.

JACQUES GAGEY

See also Ethics, Sexual; Hermeneutics; Marx, Karl; Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm; Pauline Theology; Sin

Fundamental Choice

Fundamental choice is a theory according to which the sequence of acts performed by an individual is underpinned by a fundamental choice for or against God*, for or against the good*. The theory makes the concept of "mortal sin*" impossible, that is, an individual sinful act that is enough in itself to separate man from God. The theory has a certain force: it compels us to evaluate every existence through the totality of its decisions and its developments. It also has a certain weakness: it presupposes the existence of an underlying coherence, both in the present and over time—but moral choices, in the plural, may very well be incoherent, both synchronically and diachronically.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

Fundamental Theology

Christianity is a religion of revelation, and this gives fundamental theology its primary and constant mission as well as its very content. "So faith comes from hearing" (Rom 10:17). But in what way is the proclaimed or well-understood announcement credible? Who guarantees it? The right to take a position freely before the challenge of the Christian preaching* entails the duty of being accountable for this decision to oneself and to others, as much as is rationally possible. The Bible defines the program of fundamental theology: "Always being prepared to make a defense to anyone who asks you for a reason for the hope that is in you" (1 Pt 3:15; see also Phil 1:7 and 1:16).

I. History of Fundamental Theology

The history of fundamental theology is first of all one of its content, and second, one of the names it has been given.

1. Stages of Apology and Apologetics

a) Antiquity and Middle Ages. In antiquity and the Middle Ages, Christian apologetics targeted, on the one hand, Judaism* and on the other, the Greek "pagan" environment where the first Christians lived. Later, it targeted Islam. The writings of the New Testament already sought to highlight their own consistency with the Old Testament, which could be read as typologically foreshadowing the arrival of the Messiah, Jesus*. Justin's Dialogue with Trypho (v. 160) opened a millennium of polemic literature, Adversus Iudaeos. A dozen or more classical apologists* in the second century A.D. raised their voices against the accusations and errors of the "Hellenes" (see F. Morel's Corpus Apologetarum, Paris, 1615). Subsequent times saw the development of great polemics against the "Mohammedans" or the "Moors," as in, for example, Pugio fidei adversus Mauros et Iudaeos, written by Raymond Martini in about 1220–1284.

b) From the Reformation to the Enlightenment. It was during this period that Christian apologetics underwent a sufficiently systematic development to earn its name, which did not appear until the 18th century, and then in Protestant literature! (See Ebeling 1970.) Marsilio Ficino (1433–99) shows the transition from circumstantial apologetics to a more fundamental one, which flourished later in the historic upheavals of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries (see Niemann's From Medieval Apology to Modern Apologetics, 1983). Precursors of the Reformation, such as John Wyclif (†1384) and Jan Hus*, had already questioned the legitimacy of the papal church* and its hierarchy*. The reaction to these criticisms engendered the first Tractatus de Ecclesia (Jean de Raguse, 1431; Juan de Turrecremata, 1486.)

Subsequently, the great Reformation of the Western Latin Church (Luther*, Zwingli*, Calvin*) enhanced the need for urgently defining the "True Church" by its essential characteristics, notae ecclesiae. Among all the qualities attributed to the Church of Jesus, four traits took shape based on the ancient symbols: unity*, sanctity*, catholicity (in the etymological sense of universality), and apostolicity. (For the Catholic Church, see Thils 1937, and for the Protestant churches, Steinacker 1982.) The Church of Rome* claimed exclusive ownership over these, and a very systematic part of its apologetics—the demonstratio catholica—was mostly devoted to justifying this claim.

Pierre Charron (1541–1603) in his apology of the Trois verités..., published in 1593, divided into three parts the issues that were to preoccupy theologians far beyond the Age of Enlightenment*. Here are the treatises corresponding to the three truths in question (2nd expanded edition, Paris, 1595):

1. Religion in general: "There is a religion accessible to all and to everyone, as against all atheists and nonreligious persons" (1).
2. Christianity: "Christianity is the best religion of all: opposing all nonbelievers, Gentiles, Jews and Mohammedans" (113).

3. The Catholic Church: "Of all the divisions existing in Christianity, the Roman Catholic is the best: opposing all heretics and schismatics" (193 and up to 607).

In his Triumphus Crucis (1497) Savonarola had already treated the triple issue of religion, Christianity, and the church, although he had only touched on ecclesiology* in a marginal way. On the other hand, the Huguenot Philippe Duplessis-Mornay (1549–1623), arguing against Catholicism*, devoted a special work to ecclesiology, the Traité de l'Église (1578), while the fundamental question of God* and Christianity from the perspective of Revelation* provided the subject for yet another book, De la vérité de la religion chrétienne (1581.)

In the tripartite structure of apologetics, strictly confessional defense is preceded by two other parts, devoted respectively to demonstratio religiosa and demonstratio christiana, and it is the latter that theologians of the Enlightenment emphasized. The issue was no longer the differences between Christians but Christianity as a religion of Revelation, which Deism* wanted to replace by a religion of nature* and reason*. Opposing that, the theologians evoked the miracles* of Jesus and the actualization of the messianic prophecies* of the Old Testament to prove Jesus' "supernatural*" and divine mission. Thus, a whole new subdivision devoted to revelation appeared within demonstratio christiana, and the issues of whether revelation was possible and necessary were most often discussed in rational terms, regardless of the fact that it had occurred in Jesus.

There was abundant apologetic literature of the 18th century (see Niemann 1983), and much of it illustrates the principle of the tripartite division—for example, in the Vertheidigung der natürlichen, christlichen und katholischen Religion nach den Bedürfnissen unserer Zeiten (1787–89), by Beda Mayr, O.S.B. The middle part of this work in its turn is divided into two volumes. The Irishman Hook, who taught at the Sorbonne, also wrote a Religionis naturalis et revelatae principia (1754) based on the model "natural religion—religion of Revelation—church."

c) 19th and 20th Centuries. The 19th and 20th centuries saw the spread of late-Enlightenment radical atheism* in the form of vulgar materialism, of dogmatic "dialectical" materialism, and even of a pathos of freedom based on existential precepts. The time had come for the third systematic part of apologetics, demonstratio religiosa, establishing the existence of God as a precondition for a possible revelation and discussing his qualities, as well as his relation with the world* and with humanity as the Creator. These fundamental questions took a place of prominence in voluminous works appearing in German around 1900 under the title of Christian Apologetics—for example, the works of Schanz, Hettinger, and Weiss. Neoscholastic thought had risen to the ranks of an official doctrine of the Catholic Church since the time of Leo XIII, and Leo's encyclical Aeternis Patris of 1879, and was grounded in the teachings of Thomas* Aquinas, who would inspire a number of manuals right up to the 20th century, such as those by Garrigou-Lagrange (Le Saulchoir, Belgique, 1929–31, 3rd Ed.), Dieckmann S.J. (Valkenburg, 1925–30), and Tromp S.J. (Rome, 1937).

Mention should be made of Lang, who wrote three books in Germany: one on religion (1957), another on the mission of Jesus, and the third on church ministry (1954, 1967–68, 4th Ed.). Also of note are the treatises on religion, revelation, and the church in the first three volumes of the four-volume Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie (1985–88) by Kern et al.

2. Fundamental Theology: Term and Content

The first work to use the title Fundamental Theology was a two-volume manual by Ehrlich (1810–64), published in Prague in 1859 and 1862. The author added to that two notebooks of Apologetic Supplements (1863–64), emphasizing in §34 that the task of fundamental theology “is the same as that of apologetics” (see also §16).

Prior to that, Schwetz's work Theologia generalis had appeared in Latin (Vienna, 1850) and would subsequently be republished with revealing changes of title: Theologia generalis seu fundamentalis (1854), then Theologia fundamentalis seu generalis (1858–82).

Similarly, there was A. Knoll's Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae generalis seu fundamentalis (Innsbruck, 1852) and Guzmics's Theologia christiana fundamentalis (Turin, 1828). The general metaphor of “fundament” (basis) appeared in apologetic literature of the early 18th century, and “Fundamental Theology” seemed to echo the then frequent title of Fundamental Philosophy (see Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie 2, 1972).

Ehrlich aims to show that salvation through revelation, as it appeared with Jesus, is the turning point of all human history*. This belies the strong influence of the Catholic School of Tübingen (from the first half of the 19th century)—specifically, that of Drey (1777–1853) and of the Freiburg professor Staudenmaier (1800–56); and through their influence Ehrlich would reveal himself to be an heir of Friedrich Daniel Ernst Schleiermacher*. Drey's main work, Die Apolo- getik als wissenschaftliche Nachweisung der Göttlichkeit des Christentums in seiner Erscheinung (1838–47) comprises three volumes: I, Philosophy of Revelation; II, Religion in Its Historical Development and Its Fulfillment in the Revelation of Christ; and III, Christian Revelation in the Catholic Church. Thus, Christianity is situated in the context of the universal history of religions, which finds in Christianity its culmination, and constitutes in its internal coherence and organic whole a history of divine revelation. For Drey, all religion is based on “man's [natural] contact and link with God,” an “internal revelation” (I), and an inspiration bestowed in the very act of creation. But there is also a need for an “external revelation” (see I), so that the “internal image” of God in the human being can acquire an explicit form. Just as creation is subdivided spirit and nature into two areas, divine revelation works by inspiration and miracle. Reality can only be proven through reality (see I). Thus, apologetics (whose name Drey retained) actually became fundamental theology.

Neoscholastics and the First Vatican* Council put an end to the spread of the ideas of the Tübingen School. Yet, manuals, even when following a more traditional apologetic line, continued to appear, preferably under the modern title of Fundamental Theology, which referred simultaneously to the justification of faith as a decision and the basis of theology*.

3. Fundamental Doctrine

In theology the term fundamental doctrine has a global concept that may refer to two areas: 1) a formal and epistemological approach to theological sources and methods, and (2) a materialistic and hermeneutic approach to the fundamental questions of the Christian faith.

a) Theory of Theological Knowledge. Works that sought to lay the foundations of a scientific study of theology were often given the title Theory of Theological Knowledge. Other titles given to such works included Encyclopédie théologique, Theologia generalis, Introduction..., and Prolégomènes de la dogmatique. Pierre Annat (1638–1715) accepted in 1700 that his Theologia positiva, devoted to these issues, be called Fundamentalis Theologia—the oldest occurrence of this term found to date (Stirnimann 1977).

In the beginning, the encyclopedic nature of these works was promoted. Schleiermacher's Brief Outline on the Study of Theology (1811) had a determining influence on Catholic theologians Drey in his Brief Introduction... (1819) and Staudenmaier in his Encyclopedia... (1834). In Pelt's Theologische Encyclopedie (1843) fundamental theology, or “the fundamental doctrine” (the first part of a systematic theology), is devoted to a discussion of the “principles of the unique Christian Church . . . and the principles underlying various confessions.”

It is in this framework that Gerhard Ebeling’s works (1970; 1975) aroused a new interest in fundamental theology in the Protestant world, even though it had long been considered “a Catholic specificity.” Here it was approached as the science of the basic principles underlying the whole of theology and all particular theological disciplines (1970). In 1974 Wilfrid Joest accomplished Ebeling’s program in his own way by publishing the first Protestant work under the title of Fundamentaltheologie; it was subtitled Theological Problems about Basis and Methods. The methodological part deals with theology’s function and (exclusively scriptural) sources; its hermeneutic, logical, and semantic problems; and, finally, its scientific character.

On the Catholic side, the theory of theological knowledge claims to have its roots in Melchior Cano’s Loci theologici. The classical scholastic work is Scheeben’s Theory of Theological Knowledge (1874.) The evolution of Catholic thought in the last century—affected, among other things, by Vatican* II—has influenced theological epistemology, which is the subject of the fourth treatise of the Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie. Its topics are: God’s word* and faith, the Holy* Scripture, tradition*, catechesis*, and theology as a science of faith and its scientific practice.

b) Toward a Fundamental Theory of Christianity. The need for such a theory has been largely felt. As Seckler (1988) has pointed out, “we are lacking genuine advanced research into the essential content of Christianity” on its basis and its central message. The Tübingen School largely opened the way in this direction. Recently there have been some landmark advances in the area of the so-called “fundamental items” (since the 17th and 18th centuries): the “essence of the Scripture,” the “essence of Christianity,” the “hierarchy of truths” (Vatican II, Unitatis Redintegratio 11) and the “abbreviated formulae of the faith.” Rahner’s Grundkurs des Glaubens (1976; translated into English in 1978 as Foundations of Christian Faith) has sought to play the role of an introduction to “the concept of Christianity.” Söhngen revived an older project of Rahner’s (see the Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2, 1960). It sought to construct a noology of revelation as a primary and rigorously formal science. (It would have been unfortunate to give this discipline the initially planned name of Fundamentale Theologie, since it would have been indistinguishable from Fundamentaltheologie except by means of an untranslatable graphic device.)

Joest reflects upon the “basis of faith” (26) and the “ultimate confidence underlying the faith” (50) in the part of his Fundamental Theology devoted to the principles of theology (see Seckler 1975). This primary foundation is Jesus Christ in whom “God Himself is present among humankind” (50.) But how he is present is only described within faith: the primary question of the justification remains to be answered, not that of faith itself but of the credibility* of its proclamation.

II. Understanding Revelation and Justifying Its Credibility

1. Traditional Approach of Vatican I

In its constitution, Dei Filius, promulgated on 24 April 1870, Vatican I made the following declaration against fideism* and traditionalism*: “God, who is the end and origin of everything, can be known with certainty through the natural light of the mind from all things created” (1991 Enchiridion Symbolorum 3004; see Rom 1:20). “Natural (or philosophic) theology” manifesting this knowledge is part of the “preambles of faith.” The council opposed rationalism*, specifically, the semirationalism of Hermes and Günther (Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche), who, following Kant* and Hegel* respectively, admitted that even the “mysteries*” of supernatural revelation could be grasped by reason in their internal possibility, once their reality was recognized. The council affirmed that there were terms of faith “totally surpassing human intelligence (humanae mentis intelligentiam omnino superant)” in such a way that their revelation by God is “absolutely necessary” (1991 Enchiridion Symbolorum 3005). These mysteries are believed, therefore, “not because of their intrinsic truth, acknowledged by the light of natural reason (non propter . . . intrinsecam veritatem) but by virtue of the authority of God himself as the author of revelation” (Enchiridion Symbolorum 3008). These are “secrets hidden in God,” propria dicta mysteria, among which theological education places highest the Trinity*, Incarnation*, and the Eucharist*.

Knowledge of (supernatural) revelation is justified above all by the miracles*, which are considered “absolutely certain signs, understandable to everyone,” as well as by the accomplishment of prophecies (Enchiridion Symbolorum 3033). The church “itself is a powerful and constant source of credibility . . . by virtue of its marvelous propagation, its eminent sanctity, and its inexhaustible generation of good” (the council borrowed this idea from Cardinal Dechamps). It is possible, moreover, that “reason enlightened by faith may yield the mysteries of faith to a certain intelligence that is sometimes extremely productive (aliquam . . . mysteriorum intelligentiam), relying just as much on the analogy* with objects of natural knowledge as on the consistency of the mysteries among themselves and with the ultimate human goal.” Thus, side by side with external criteria, Vatican I admitted both objective and internal criteria justifying the credibility of revelation.

2. New Approach of Vatican II

The transformation of Vatican I into Vatican II is marked by the influence of Pascal* and Newman*, through the intermediary of what is usually called the “apologetics of immanence”—see Blondel*, but also De la certitude morale (1919, 8th Ed.) by Ollé-Laprune (1839–98), Laberthonnière (1860–1932), and Gardeil (1859–1931). For this approach, it is not only the intellect but human beings as a whole, with their will and emotion, who must seek access to the revelation (see Aubert 1958 and Waldenfels 1969).

The old apologetics, which had been reproached with adhering almost exclusively to criteria external to the revelation, had been mostly derived from manuals of theology still subscribing to the demonstrative scheme of Thomas Aquinas’s Summa Theologica (III, q. 43, a.e 1): “For those things which are of faith surpass human reason, hence they cannot be proved by human arguments” but only “by the argument of Divine power: so that when a man does works that God alone can do, we may believe that what he says is from God.” This was followed by a comparison: “Just as when a man is a bearer of letters sealed with the king’s ring, it is to be believed that what they contain expresses the king’s will.”

a) Perfect Intelligence of Revelation. Aquinas’s comparison shows how much the event of revelation was reduced to the expression of a formal doctrinal authority, which, once legitimized, was to be accepted without questioning, whatever teaching it might proclaim. This presupposes, first of all, that it is possible to fundamentally separate the fact of a revelation from its content. However, that is not at all the case. According to Vatican II’s constitution, Dei Verbum, “It pleased God...to reveal himself and to make known the mystery of his will thanks to which men, through Christ...become sharers in divine nature; [in this revelation, the invisible God talks to men] to invite and receive them in communion with Him. The economy of Revelation is realized by deeds and words, which are intrinsically bound up with each other.” Revelation consists neither of words only, nor of various truths—in the plural—alone, concerning the mysteries, but in the reality of the unique mystery of the act by which God communicates his presence to the people. It is in the “fact” of revelation that his essential content—God himself—offers himself to us. The fact implies the content; the content renders the fact explicit. That is why no one can know the fact of revelation without being existentially confronted with its content.

b) Cumulative Justification. Revelation thus understood cannot be subjected to traditional demonstration. If it is impossible to separate the fact from the content of revelation, then it is imperative to abandon the second precept of Aquinas’s citation and deny that revelation, as a fact, can and must be the object of a direct and rigorous argument, based on the historical reality of miracles that can only be attributed to the actual power of God. This would mean taking the content of revelation, the global mystery of the faith, to the level of natural truths accessible to human reason.

This necessarily leads to rethinking the apologetic call for miracles, which should no longer be perceived as a break in the laws of nature by the sublime power of the Almighty but, in Augustine’s words, as an act “which contradicts not nature but only our experience of nature,” an act “going against the generally known course of nature” (De civitate Dei 1:21 and Contra Faustum 29:4). Therefore, miracles should be defined as unusual events in the structure of global meaning that religion establishes, as events, which one understands, while remaining open to them, as accomplished by God in a particular manner (through the intermediary of “secondary,” interworld reasons).

The Resurrection* of Jesus Christ surpasses by far all “physical miracles.” Paul lists in 1 Corinthians 15:5–8 those who witnessed the apparition of the Crucified whom they recognized as living. As for the via empirica, the empirical justification of the credibility of revelation through the practice of the actual church (according to Vatican I—see above), it can be obtained only through “the contribution of Christianity to a more human world” (Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie IV); the defense of human dignity; and the affirmation of the rights of all human beings to freedom and equality; but also through such peaks of literary apology as Le génie du christianisme (1802) by Chateaubriand (1768–1848), along with Les martyrs ou le triomphe de la religion (1809), and such official church documents as the pastoral constitution The Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes 5) by Vatican II and Pope Jean-Paul II’s inaugural encyclical Redemptor hominis. The “external” criteria, in their multiplicity and diversity, contribute by their global convergence—in Newman’s “illative sense” (Grammar of Assent, Chapter IX)—to creating a “moral” certainty with regard to the divine legitimacy of Jesus and the church, which lives and proclaims His Gospel.

c) “Internal Logos” of Revelation. “The miracles of Jesus also demonstrate that the kingdom has already come on: ‘But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you’ (Luke 11:20; see Matt. 12:28).” With this passage (from Lumen Gentium 5), Vatican II established that miracles are not only external signs. God’s Kingdom is manifested first and foremost “in the person* of Christ himself” (Lumen Gentium 5). His church constitutes “the sign and the instrument of the most intimate union with God, as the unity of the entire human race” (Lumen Gentium 5.1). Its members must be a “sign that renders Christ visible in a way that is perfectly adapted to our times” (Apostolicam Actuositatem 16.) All of this indicates that at the very heart of the person and work of Jesus one can find revelation, which he not only proclaimed but truly incarnated.

Vatican I accepted that the teachings of Jesus—as collected in the writings of the New Testament and interpreted by the councils* of the early centuries through the characteristic dogmas* of Christianity—also allow an individual in himself to attain a certain understanding of the mysteries of faith (Enchiridion Symbolorum 3016). How far can one go in this direction that fundamental theology has not yet exploited to the full? What is the boundary of the program of fides quaerens intellectum, the “faith seeking rational intelligence”?

Fundamental theology can and must adhere to this program: “The human reason, in its attempt to understand the content of faith, can find ‘material reasons’ that help satisfy the demands of justification” (Pottmeyer 1988). We must show “the internal coherence of the message of Revelation and the faithful interpretation that it is possible to give, through this message, of our experience* of reality”; we must bring to the fore its “internal rationality.” But can the internal coherence of the faith in the Trinity be proven—as Hegel undertook to do—“in the medium of intersubjective rationality” (Seckler 1988)? Can it even be “integrated into other non-Christian cognitive frameworks to find itself in them?” The Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie contains examples (I:189–93 and II:71–83; see also, on a more “material” level, II:197–222) ascribing to fundamental theology the task of “opening to knowledge” (IV:486) the “content of faith” (487)—to the extent that truth “given media coverage through faith can open itself to reason as governed by God” (477)! This is the task that a treatise on the “theory of Christianity” would have to fulfill (see above). But that would mean betraying its legitimate intention to expect answers from it that it could not provide.

d) Justification by Witnessing. Someone who represents a credible authority, worthy of confidence, is called a “witness.” He is the “appropriate intermediary of the message of Revelation” (Pottmeyer 1988). According to Vatican II, every Christian “must be a witness before the world to the resurrection and life of the Lord Jesus” (Lumen Gentium 38) and “must learn to give witness to the hope that is in them (1 Peter 3:15)” (Gravissimum Educationis 2). Over and above verbal testimony, the council promotes testimony from experience. Certainly, what matters in the long run is what the testimony tells of God and his Kingdom and thus of the eternal destiny of every human being. But “the testimony cannot be separated from what it testifies to, nor can the certificate be separated from its certified content” (Ratzinger, in the Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche II, 511; cited in Pottmeyer 1988). The witnesses give to the Kingdom of God a physical reality and a human face in concrete history. Thus, the testimony appears as an indispensable means of making revelation credible through experience, because truth acquires a convincing presence and an immediate transparency in the one testifying. This representation of the truth within and through the witness makes patently clear the conjunction of internal and external reasons on which faith in the revelation is founded, still without any doubt, and in varying proportions.

III. Toward Building a Fundamental Theology

The history of fundamental theology and the debate on the central articulation of revelation and credibility suggest the following agenda:

- A. Fundamental theology as a science of foundations (“material part”):
 1. Religion of the one God
 2. Revelation in and by Jesus
 3. Structures of the church
- B. Fundamental theology as a science of the basis (“reflexive part”):
 4. Theological epistemology
 5. Reflection on fundamental theology
 6. Theory of Christianity

Let us briefly explain this agenda: Part A preserves the tripartition of apologetics as it has appeared since the beginning of modernity and has been maintained throughout all changes of approach. By apologetics is meant not only the defense of Christianity “toward the exterior” but first and foremost the responsibility of Christians toward themselves and their companions in faith. In Part B.4: Theological epistemology discusses not only the sources and methods of theology as a science (see above) and its subdivision into various disciplines, but also poses in depth the question of how the church as a community of faith acquires specific knowledge (see Seckler in Theologische Quartalschrift, 1983). B.5 reflects more precisely—as we have tried to do here, however briefly and imperfectly—on the discipline of fundamental theology.

- K. Werner (1861–76), Die Geschichte der apologetischen und polemischen Literatur der christlichen Theologie, 5 vols., Schaffhouse (Catholic).
- O. Zöckler (1903), Geschichte der Apologie des Christentums, Gütersloh (Protestant).
- A. Gardeil (1908), La crédibilité et l'apologétique, Paris.
- X.M. Le Bachelet (1910), "Apologétique: Apologie," DAFC 1, 189–251.
- P. Rousselot (1910), "Les yeux de la foi," RSR 1, 241–59 and 244–75.
- G. Thils (1937), Les notes de l'Église dans l'apologétique catholique depuis la Réforme, Gembloux.
- R. Aubert (1958), Le problème de l'acte de la foi, 3rd Ed., Louvain.
- H. Bouillard (1964), Logique de la foi, Paris.
- J.-P. Torrell (1964–84), "Chronique de théologie fondamentale," RThom.
- H.J. Pottmeyer (1968), Der Glaube vor dem Anspruch der Wissenschaft, Freiburg.
- J. Schmitz (1969), "Die Fundamentaltheologie im 20. Jahrhundert," in Bilanz der Theologie...II, Freiburg.
- H. Waldenfels (1969), Offenbarung (Vat. II "auf dem Hintergrund der neueren Theologie"), Munich.
- G. Ebeling (1970), "Erwägungen zu einer evangelischen Fundamentaltheologie," ZThK 67, 479–524.
- A. Dulles (1971), A History of Apologetics, London.
- H. Bouillard (1972), "La tâche actuelle de la théologie fondamentale," Le point théol. 2, 7–49.
- E. Castelli (Ed.) (1972), Le témoignage, Paris.
- W. Joest (1974), Fundamentaltheologie: Theologische Grundlagen-und Methodenprobleme, Stuttgart.
- G. Ebeling (1975), Das Studium der Theologie: Eine enzyklopädische Orientierung, Tübingen (esp. 162–75).
- M. Seckler (1975), "Evangelische Fundamentaltheologie," ThQ 155, 281–99.
- H. Stirnimann (1977), "Erwägungen zur Fundamentaltheologie," FZPhTh 24, 291–365 and 460–76.
- L.W. Barnard, K.G. Steck, H.-R. Müller-Schwefe (1978), "Apologetik," TRE 3, 371–429 (omit the VIe–XVe c.).
- J.-P. Torrell (1979), "Questions de théologie fondamentale," RThom 87, 273–314.
- G. O'Collins (1981), Fundamental Theology, Ramsey, N.J., and London.
- J. Doré (1982, 1983, 1985, 1986, 1990, 1991, 1995), "Bulletin de théologie fondamentale," RSR.
- P. Latourelle, G. O'Collins (Ed.) (1982), Problèmes et perspectives de théologie fondamentale, Paris-Montreal.
- P. Steinacker (1982), Die Kennzeichen der Kirche, Berlin.
- F.-J. Niemann (1983), Jesus als Glaubensgrund in der Fundamentaltheologie der Neuzeit, Innsbruck.
- H. Wagner (1983), "Fundamentaltheologie," TRE 11, 738–52.
- R. Fisichella (1985), La rivelazione: Evento e credibilità, Bologne.
- H. Fries (1985), Fundamentaltheologie, Graz.
- W. Kern, H.J. Pottmeyer, M. Seckler (Ed.) (1985–88), Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie (HFTh), 4 vols., Freiburg.
- H. Waldenfels (1985), Kontextuelle Fundamentaltheologie, Paderborn.
- G. Ruggieri (Ed.) (1987), Enciclopedia di Teologia Fondamentale I, Genoa.
- R. Fisichella (Ed.) (1988), Gesù Rivelatore, Piemme.
- A.P. Kustermann (1988), Die Apologetik J. S. Dreys, Tübingen.
- H.J. Pottmeyer (1988), "Zeichen und Kriterien der Glaubwürdigkeit des Christentums," ibid., 373–413.
- J. Reikerstorfer (1988), "Fundamentaltheologische Modelle der Neuzeit," HFTh 3, 347–72.
- M. Seckler (1988), "Die Fundamentaltheologie: Aufgaben und Aufbau, Begriff und Namen," ibid., 450–514.
- S. Pié y Ninot (1989), Tratado de Teología Fundamental, Salamanca.
- H. Bouillard (1990), Vérité du christianisme, Paris.
- R. Latourelle, R. Fisichella (Ed.) (1990), DTF.
- F.-J. Niemann (1990), Jesus der Offenbarer (texts), 2 vols., Graz.
- H. Verweyen (1991), Gottes letztes Wort: Grundriß der Fundamentaltheologie, Düsseldorf.
- M. Kessler, W. Pannenberg, H.J. Pottmeyer (Ed.) (1992), Fides quaerens intellectum, Tübingen.
- G. O'Collins (1993), Retrieving Fundamental Theology, New York.
- E. Schockenhoff, P. Walter (Ed.) (1993), Glaube-Dogma: Bausteine zu einer theologische Erkenntnislehre, Mainz.
- O. González de Cardedal (1997), La entraña del cristianismo, Salamanca (2nd Ed. 1998).

WALTER KERN

See also Dogmatic Theology; Hermeneutics; Theology; Truth

Fundamentalism

Fundamentalism is a type of religious reaction to all forms of modernity. Within Christianity this phenomenon is mostly characteristic of Protestantism* but is also found in Catholicism*. In fact, the term fundamentalism was coined in the United States at the beginning of the 20th century, but it was only toward the end of that century that the term began to be applied to some Catholic movements.

a) Protestantism. Between 1900 and 1915 a group of conservative evangelical Protestants published a series of brochures entitled The Fundamentals. These brochures responded to a certain number of discussions that had been animating American Protestantism over the preceding half a century. In the beginning, Protestant evangelical churches*, although they had their differences, shared a certain common perspective, but toward the end of the 19th century three debates tore them apart. The first one occurred as a number of liberal- and modern-minded Protestants accepted Darwinian theories of evolution*. The second one was due to the teaching of biblical criticism (exegesis*) in some major seminaries. The final disagreement resulted from the progressive view of history* that was characteristic of liberal Protestantism: a view whereby an immanent God* was bringing forth his Kingdom* with the help of human effort. These ideas gained a lot of support at a time when many evangelists were ardent followers of millenarian and apocalyptic* views of the imminent end of the world*.

During the First World War, different churches fought for power. The conservatives (especially among some Baptists* and Presbyterians*) sought to keep their power when they had it or to regain it if they had lost it. They fought mostly about the teaching of theology* and the locations for sending out missions*. In 1919, a global association, the World's Christian Fundamentals Association, became the common mouthpiece for all churches concerned. In July 1920, a Baptist journalist, Curtis Lee Laws, editor-in-chief of Baptist Watchman-Examiner, appealed to all those who thought like him to call themselves fundamentalists, and the term prevailed. Laws criticized the conservatives' passivity: the church needed people who were ready to fight for the Lord. Thus, all who rallied to fundamentalism were considered fighters against modernity*. They practiced a literal interpretation of the Bible*: for them, Mary*'s immaculate conception had actually taken place, as had the punishment of Christ* for our sins (expiation*); real, too, were the physical resurrection* of bodies and the Second Coming. And underneath all this lay a literal conception of the infallibility of the Bible.

At the time of these debates fundamentalism received a certain amount of unwelcome publicity through a Tennessee trial about the teaching of evolution in schools. The moderates and liberals retained control over their churches while the defeated fundamentalists left the churches to establish their own confessional groups, biblical colleges, papers, radio stations, and so on. Opposing their extremist positions, in 1942 the moderates created a World Evangelical Association that the fundamentalists attacked. The fundamentalists became visible again in the last third of the 20th century, reacting against the liberal trends in major Protestant churches.

In the United States the first fundamentalist movement was generally apolitical; but the most recent movements, conversely, are openly and aggressively political. Building alliances with some more moderate evangelical conservatives, they have organized to seek political power. After 1980 they became very influential among the Republicans. About the same time identical, although less politicized, forces gained ground in Canadian Protestantism and, finally, in Latin America and other countries where the United States has been sending missionaries. This is how a fundamentalist party came to power repeatedly in Guatemala.

b) Catholicism. The fundamentalist movement in the Catholic Church has not been significant. The infallibility of the Bible is not a dogma* for Catholics, thus offering little ground for fundamentalism. Catholicism allows some leeway for developing dogma (John Henry Newman*) as well as for the importance of tradition* and, in contrast to the fundamentalists, it does not consider the Bible to be the only authority*.

Yet one can observe some Catholic movements today that are quasi-fundamentalist. They emphasize the conservative pontifical documents from the last few centuries and are wary of the more moderate decrees of Vatican* II (Monsignor Lefèbvre's anti-Vatican II movement in France is a vivid example). These movements did not draw undue attention from the hierarchy*, but they did influence certain informal developers of fundamentalism among some Catholics. Some such influences came from relations with Protestants—such as through charismatic movements that crossed denominational borders.

c) Main Characteristics of Fundamentalism. The array of conservative, orthodox*, and other traditional* movements are not necessarily fundamentalist. Their attitudes must be transformed for them to become fundamentalism. First of all, they have to become a lot more militant than they normally are. Fundamentalists claim orthodoxy, but they have a tendency to choose doctrines and practices that they qualify as fundamental. Feeling threatened by the destructive forces of modernity, they avidly grab at anything that might help them eliminate the threat to their faith* and their personal and social identity.

Being determined to defend themselves, fundamentalists take their position from a particular document (most often the Bible), which serves them as a rule to discern what is really “fundamental.” They have a tendency to constitute separate groups and clearly distinguish themselves, sometimes even in a Manichean way, from the rest of the Christians and the world around them. They leave no territory for agreement with others and no room for moderates. “True believers” find the moderates a lot more dangerous than the moderns or the “unfaithful.” Equipped with their principles, they apply Laws’s command: fight for God. They consider themselves specially chosen to accomplish the divine designs while confidently approaching the apocalyptic end of history. Indeed, moderate evangelical, pentecostal, and conservative movements are more popular than the fundamentalists; still, the fundamentalists have been thriving in the times of secular and ecclesiastic upheaval that are centered on the end of the second millennium. They appear authoritative to people who do not know what to hope for and easily accept the model of a church that would protect them from all others and would allow them to combat the forces deemed hostile to God.

- E. R. Sandeen (1970), The Roots of Fundamentalism: British and American Millenarianism, 1800–1930, Chicago.
- G. M. Marsden (1980), Fundamentalism and American Culture, New York.
- N. T. Ammermann (1987), Bible Believers: Fundamentalists in the Modern World, New Brunswick, N.J.
- B. B. Lawrence (1989), Defenders of God: The Fundamentalist Revolt against the Modern Age, San Francisco.
- M. E. Marty and R. S. Appleby (1991), Fundamentalism Observed, Chicago.

MARTIN E. MARTY

See also Choice; Eschatology; Literary Genres in Scripture; Messianism/Messiah; Millenarianism; Myth; Salvation; Secularization; Theology; Traditionalism

G

Gadamer, Hans Georg. See Hermeneutics

Gallicanism

Even though it wrongly suggests the existence of a uniform doctrine, “Gallicanism” is a useful term of reference for a series of distinctively French attitudes toward ecclesiastical power, and the principles on which they were based. Its unifying principle was a resistance on both political and ecclesiastical grounds to maximalist interpretations of pontifical primacy, as exemplified by ultramontanism*. However, the bedrock of Gallicanism was primarily political: it represented the concept of what would come to be called the “separation of powers,” the total division of the spiritual from the temporal.

1. History

The foundations of all future Gallicanism were probably laid by the juridical counselors who developed the principle of this separation during the conflict between Pope Boniface VIII and the French King Philip the Fair (1303), and also by the clerics* who simultaneously developed its dogmatic* aspects (Jean de Paris, 1302). References to the original Gallicanism, which brought into play a typically medieval conception of society*, would have a long life, but its interpretations would be rereadings and updatings. Another founding element of a “Gallican” conception was the prospect of an internal reform of the Church*, to be carried out by the General Council (Durand de Mende, 1312), and the Schism* of the West made this prospect seem quite real and imminent. By proclaiming the superiority of the Council as the representative of the Church militant, the Council of Constance* (1414–17) marked an important turning point. And although French authors held a central place in the elaboration of the Council’s theses, it was not only on account of their proposal of an ecclesiology* of a mystico-corporative type (Gerson, d’Ailly), but also because of their arguments against the defenders of papal power, a rationale based often on an ancient ecclesiastical right of which only France was supposed to have preserved the traces—the Freedoms of the Gallican Church, of which the monarchy was the protector. The Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438), an adapted acceptance of the Council of Basel*’s decrees, reinforced these abstract references and tendentious reconstructions.

Never put into effect, this text would become an idealized reference; in 1516, a concordat between France and the Holy See replaced it. While moderating the wording, the concordat upheld certain of the demands of the Pragmatic Sanction with regard to Roman interventions, but suppressed elections to benefices, entrusting these appointments to the sovereign, with a right of ratification being reserved to the pope himself. From that date onward, the French sovereign assumed the role of mediator between the Gallican demands of the juridic counselors and theologians, who were preoccupied with preserving a participatory ecclesial model, and the most extreme of the Roman theorists. The Reformation was to make the situation more complex. By forcing French Catholics to choose between fidelity to Rome* or rejection of Rome, it could only weaken Gallican attitudes in those who wanted to remain faithful to Rome. On the other hand, the wish to preserve the kingdom's integrity also encouraged a more "political" attitude, which favored dialogue with the Protestants and a search for union. One French response to the Council of Trent* would make these elements clear. At the close of this Council, two forms of Catholicism* confronted each other in France, both manipulated by the monarch, who was trying in this way to control them more easily. On one side were ranged a party of "Romans" or ultramontanes, anxious to reform the Church according to the Tridentine model and the wishes of the papacy; on the other side, the "Gallicans," whom reasons of national unity (but also ideological motives) drove to reject this conception, which they countered with the principles of the ancient Church. Thus it was that the Libertés de l'Eglise gallicane was published in a collection designed to supply proofs of a different practice, that is, its authorized precedents (Pithou, 1598; Dupuy, 1639). At this stage, the Gallican resistance came just as much from parliamentary circles as from the ranks of the theologians.

In this matter the works of Edmond Richer (1559–1631), syndic of the Faculty of Theology in Paris, took on particular importance. By publishing Gerson's writings and those of the more extreme conciliarist authors, Richer really adopted the stance of a redrafter of ecclesiological Gallicanism. He set himself apart from Gerson's democratic conception (his 18th-century disciples would return to it) in order to bend it toward "sacerdotalism." In particular he added a political component to it by expounding a systematic regalism in his short Libellus de ecclesiastica et politica potestate (1612). Richer was condemned at the Synod* of Sens in 1612, and the clergy rejected an article proposed to the Etats Généraux in 1614, which shows that these ideas were not majority views. It was not until almost the end of the century that editions and re-editions of the syndic's works would exert a real influence. But under Louis XIII, the Gallicanism of both the politicians and the ecclesiastics consisted above all in upholding national independence by maintaining a prudent relationship with Rome, on which Spanish influence was feared. The example of Richelieu, who used the Gallican arguments as a means of applying pressure or even of blackmailing, confirms the pragmatism of this attitude.

Of course, by asking the papacy to intervene in the Jansenist* question, France gave it the opportunity to assert its supremacy. Nonetheless, the French prelates were anxious to put into effect the reception of the papal bull Cum Occasione (1653) by adding their own interpretation. This effort, of which the archbishop of Toulouse, P. de Marca was the guiding spirit, simultaneously went against the varied strands of Gallicanism, the first successes of a renewal of the Catholic theology of the episcopacy, and the influence of historical works devoted to the great examples of the past. The successive interventions of popes concerning the Jansenist question and the difficulties to which it gave rise encouraged a more vigorous assertion of papal infallibility*. In theological circles strained relations resulted, and this tension soon took a political turn with the conflict between Louis XIV and Pope Alexander VII (1662). On that occasion the Faculty of Theology in Paris was "invited" to expound its doctrine on the points of contention. It obeyed in six articles (1663). The first three expressed the doctrine of the "separation of powers"; of the independence of royal power; and of the duty to obey. The other three contained an acknowledgment of Gallican liberties; a denial of papal supremacy over the Council; and a denial of infallibility. These prudently written proposals were taken up again, in part, in the Quatre articles du clergé de France of 1682.

The occasion which brought the latter into being was a new conflict between France and the papacy, this time about the right to regalia, that is, the king's prerogative to draw revenues from vacant abbeys, which had been extended to the whole of the kingdom. To put pressure on Innocent XI, the king and his ministers convoked a meeting of the clergy that produced a declaration in four articles. These articles, drafted by Bossuet, who instilled into them a patristic spirit, presented a codification of what until then had been simply a cluster of convergences:

- 1) In temporal matters, kings and sovereigns are subject to no ecclesiastical power within the order established by God. They cannot be deposed, either directly or indirectly, by invoking the authority* of the leaders of the Church. That same authority cannot dispense their subjects from the submission and obedience which they owe them, nor absolve these subjects from the oath of fidelity.

- 2) The total power that the Apostolic See and the successors of Peter*, vicars of Jesus Christ, hold over spiritual matters is such that the decrees of the ecumenical Council of Constance nonetheless retain their full force.
- 3) The exercise of apostolic authority should be modeled on the canons created by the Spirit of God and be confirmed by the general respect of all. The rules, customs, and constitutions accepted in the kingdom and in the Gallican Church must retain their full force and traditional usages must remain unchanged.
- 4) The pope has the chief role in matters of faith*, and his decrees concern all the churches and each church individually. However, his judgment is not final without the consent of the Church.

This declaration truly constituted Gallicanism, that is, a doctrine peculiar to France, since it was ordered to be taught throughout the kingdom. And since, rather than condemn it explicitly (Alexander VIII's apostolic constitution, Inter multiplices [1690], dealt more with the process of promulgation than its content [DS 2281–85]), Rome preferred to encourage refutations, commentaries and defenses were published that contributed to the deeper examination and circulation of Gallican ideas. Far from resolving the conflict with Innocent XI, the declaration aggravated it, and the pope refused to grant investiture to the bishops chosen from among the members of that assembly. In 1688 Louis XIV had an appeal drawn up to the future General Council, thereby adding a dangerous precedent to the Gallican arsenal. A compromise was negotiated with Innocent XII: the bishops appointed had to disavow the declaration and Louis XIV had to agree that it would not be taught. The king did not keep his word, and the teaching of the articles of 1682 remained obligatory during the whole of the Ancien Régime—which is what gave the 18th century French church its seeming Gallican homogeneity.

Anxious to control the religious situation in France, Louis XIV again approached Rome, which he asked to intervene in the issues raised by Quietism* (which the pope did in the 1699 bull Cum alias), then again on the question of Jansenism (Vineam Domini, 1705; Unigenitus, 1713). On those occasions the bishops insisted on verifying the pontifical judgment before giving their agreement (which they did in the assemblies of the clergy in 1700, 1705, and 1714). This insistence heralded the component of the long conflict with the papacy that would centre on Unigenitus. It was a multiform component moreover, since the “authoritative Gallicanism” of the bishops and the monarchy was joined by more extreme interpretations, inspired (through Richer, whose works were beginning to be rediscovered) by the conciliarist authors. The appeal to the Council, in 1717, was the culminating point of this “participatory Gallicanism” since it provoked the joint opposition of the pope and the king.

From that time onward two Gallicanisms existed in France and they also exerted an influence on the whole of European Catholicism. The two models persisted until the French Revolution, when they came into conflict on the subject of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1790). The constitutional Church and its defenders (Grégoire, Tabaraud) marked the end of this conception inspired by Richer; the episcopacy and many refractory members of the clergy demonstrated the continued presence of the other position.

The restoration of Catholicism under Napoleon was accomplished with the agreement of a papacy whose authority was very clearly on display, and it marked the end of the Gallican Church. Survivals of Gallicanism could be seen, but these were primarily matters of tradition and cast of mind: they represented above all a cultural continuity, via treatises of theology and history*, or of liturgical practices. One could also note the presence of an administrative Gallicanism, facilitated by the constitutional articles added to the Concordat of 1801, which had been anxious to control religious activity and also to orient it. These elements, and especially these attitudes, revived ultramontanism, which led to a reaction by several bishops and theologians in favor of a moderating episcopalism. A neo-Gallicanism can therefore be observed, which preferred to place itself in the tradition of Gerson and of Bossuet, but which was above all a response to ultramontane excesses (Mgr. Darboy, Mgr. Maret). Vatican* I permitted a major debate on these questions. In addition to the proclamation of papal infallibility, the confirmation of the primacy of the pope and the unchallengeable nature of his judgments marked the definitive end of Gallicanism.

2. Chief Characteristics

The above historical overview emphasizes the pragmatic character of the Gallican position. It represented a reaction to particular conditions, and more generally to direct or indirect strains in relations with papal authority. A dialectical element is associated with it, so it is important to resist too rigid a definition. In this sense, Gallicanism can be seen as a series of reactions to the demands of ultramontanism (both terms were coined in the 19th century), which indeed points to an ideological view.

Gallicanism was opposed to ultramontanism on the question of a “separation of powers,” since it denied the papacy any right to intervene in temporal matters, and even rejected, in addition to the demands of Boniface VIII's bull Unam sanctam (1302), the theory of an indirect authority. It opposed ultramontanism by defending episcopal jurisdiction* (in particular on everything that concerned the exempt religious orders) and by placing collegial action in the foreground. It denied papal infallibility in favor of ecclesiastical consensus; it relativized primacy; and above all it submitted the pope's Magisterium* to a process of active interpretation that considerably restricted its authority.

This resistance and opposition were based on a historicizing argument that drew from the past the elements that allowed it to reconstruct an ideal ecclesiological model. From that time onward, not one but multiple Gallicanisms existed, according to both the practical and utopian ecclesiological model that each particular individual or author constructed by manipulating his references.

3. Gallican Models

a) Two Constants. The first constant was a legal concept inherited from the Middle Ages, which adhered to the constitutional character of a Church ruled by the canons; that was the meaning of the Libertés de l'Église gallicane. It based itself on references to Antiquity—the mirror of the Church in its early period—allied to a reformist preoccupation, in order to rediscover the original purity. This view was stimulated by the wish to restore Christian unity* and heal the schism of the Reformation, the damage caused by which was felt on the national level. It drew on a static view that idealized the early Church and rejected any evolution in doctrine or in ecclesiastical* discipline. On the other hand, it approved of communion*, expressed by the joint action of the bishops united to the Holy See. It saw in the synods, the provincial and national councils, as well as in the ideal general council, events that formed part of the ordinary running of the Church.

The second constant was the national conception of the relations between Church* and State. The role of the monarchy was not perceived in the same way by the politicians and by the ecclesiastics, but they all agreed to acknowledge a secular power's right of regulation and of "protection," principally in its relations with the Apostolic See. In the ultimate Jansenist variation, it was agreed to transfer the powers of the monarchy to the nation, represented by its elected officials.

b) Two Models. These constants made possible the development of quite different ecclesiological models, founded on two conceptions of society. On the one side stood a participatory Gallicanism, and on the other, an authoritarian one. The former emerged from a medieval substrate founded on Aristotle's Politics, and it developed a democratic model centered on the ideas of interpretation and representation. It understood representation to be a process of definition of truth*, which starts from the base and rises through levels of authority to be expressed at the most elevated level. Reception, meanwhile, was viewed as an inverse process of adhesion that confirms and authenticates the decision. This was the conception held by parliamentary and university circles, and the one that the opponents of Unigenitus would adopt. As for authoritarian Gallicanism, it adapted the hierarchized Tridentine model to the interests of the monarchy and of the episcopacy. It would speak of regalism and episcopatism.

Many of the concepts circulated by the ecclesologies of the Gallican type belong to the orthodox core, such as the principle of communion, given new vigor in recent decades. Their polemical use provoked condemnations, and the condemnations elicited necessary clarifications.

- E. Puyol (1876), Edmond Richer, Étude historique et critique sur la rénovation du g. au commencement du XVIIe siècle, Paris.
- V. Martin (1919), Le gallicanisme et la réforme catholique, Paris.
- V. Martin (1929), Le gallicanisme politique et le Clergé de France, Paris.
- E. Préclin (1930), "Edmond Richer (1539–1631), Sa vie, son œuvre, le richérisme," RHMo 55, 241–69, 321–36.
- F. Gacquère (1932), Pierre de Marca (1594–1662): sa vie, ses œuvres, son gallicanisme, Paris.
- J. Lecler (1932–34), "Qu'est-ce que les Libertés de l'Église gallicane?", RSR 23, 385–410, 542–68; 24, 47–87.
- V. Martin (1939), Les origines du gallicanisme, Paris.
- J. Orcibal (1949), Louis XIV contre Innocent XI: Les appels au futur concile de 1688 et l'opinion française, Paris.
- A.-G. Martimort (1953), Le gallicanisme de Bossuet, Paris.
- R. Thysman (1957), "Le gallicanisme de Mgr Maret et l'influence de Bossuet," RHE 52, 401–65.
- J.R. Palanque (1962), Catholiques libéraux et gallicans en France face au concile du Vatican, 1867–1870, Aix-en-Provence.
- G. de Lagarde (1963), La naissance de l'esprit laïque à la fin du Moyen Age, Louvain and Paris.
- R. Duchon (1970), "De Bossuet à Febronius," RHE 55, 375–422.
- A.-G. Martimort (1973), Le gallicanisme, Paris.
- L.B. Pascoe (1973), Jean Gerson's Principles of Church Reform, Leyden.
- H.J. Sieben (1988), Die Katholische Konzilidee von der Reformation bis zur Aufklärung, Paderborn.
- J.M. Gres-Gayer (1991), "Le gallicanisme de L. Ellies Du Pin," Lias 18, 37–82.
- P. Blet (1995), Le clergé du Grand Siècle en ses assemblées, 1615–1715, Paris.
- J.M. Gres-Gayer (1995), "Le gallicanisme d'Antoine Arnauld: Éléments d'une enquête," ChPR 44, 31–51.
- J. Bergin (1996), The Making of the French Episcopate, New Haven and London.

JACQUES M. GRES-GAYER

See also Conciliarism; Jansenism; Ultramontanism

Gattungsgeschichte. See Literary Genres in Scripture

Gautier of Saint-Victor. See Saint-Victor, School of

Gehenna. See Hell

Gentiles. See Paganism; Universalism

Gerdi, Hyacinthe Sigismond. See Ontologism

Gilbert de la Porree (Gilbertus Porretanus/Gilbert of Poitiers). See Chartres, School of

Gilson, Etienne. See Thomism

Glory of God

a) Old Testament. Whereas the Greek doxa suggests reputation, fame, the Hebrew kâvôd (adj. kâvéd) expresses the weight, the value of a person (Gn 13:2) or of a city (Is 62:2). The term is chosen to designate possessions (see Ps 49:17; Jb 19:9; 29:20)—such as those of Abraham (Gn 13:2) and of Jacob (31:1)—and the “weight” or “importance” (TOB) of Joseph in the heart of Pharaoh. Glory is what characterizes the king, whether he is divine (Ps 24) or human (Prv 25:2). The glory of one at prayer may be God* himself (Ps 3:4; 57:9; 62:8). The glory of the flesh is perishable (Is 40:6; see 17:4 in the Septuagint). The glory of God (“glory of the Lord”—the phrase appears 53 times in Psalms) is associated with his name* (Ex 33:19; see Ps 29:2; 72:19; 79:9; 96:2f., 7f.; 102:16; 113:3f.; 115:1; 145:5), with his splendor (tife’ârâh: Is 63:12, 14). It is present in the cloud (Ex 40:34f.; 2 Macc 2:8), in the ark (1 Sm 4), in the temple* (1 Kgs 8:10), and in Zion (see especially Is 4:5; 24:23; 60; 62:2; 66). If holiness* defines God in himself, glory is his radiance (Is 6:3). It is God communicating about what he is by what he does.

It is because God creates by the Word* (Gn 1:1–2:4a) that the heavens “speak” in recounting his glory (Ps 19:1), that he is celebrated in reply (Ps 104:31–34; 147:12). The cosmos* (Sir 43:1, 9, 12, 44) and man (Sir 44:2) attest to the permanence of his glory. Theophanies* assume cosmic aspects (Jb 38:31–38); those psalms* that are called psalms “of the King of glory” (Ps 24; 29; 96; 97; 145) glorify God as creator and eschatological judge. The theophanies of the covenant* give full prominence to the theme of glory (Ex 24:15bff.). Once Moses has been made aware of this glory, even and especially after the idolatry* of the golden calf (contrast “glory/idol”: Ps 106:20; Jer 2:11; see Rom 1:23), he can only aspire to see it again (Ex 33:20), although it is not now linked to a cosmic phenomenon. Moses’ face “shone” (Ex 34:29f., 35), which the Septuagint renders as doxazesthai, “to be glorified.”

Ezekiel, while having as a priest an acute sense of the glorious presence of the Lord in the temple, also perceives (and it is all one) how divine glory overflows the site of its manifestation. The same glory that appears in personal form to the prophet* (Ez 1:28; 8:2, 4) is present in the temple, but not restricted to that place (10:18f.). It accompanies the people* of God into exile (11:22f.) and on their return from exile (43:4). Glory and Spirit interpenetrate in a conception that develops that of the new covenant according to Jeremiah 31:31 (see Ez 36:26). Prophet of the glory of YHWH, Ezekiel is also, and correlatively, the prophet of his Spirit. The description of the future temple, once again inhabited by glory, prepares for the apocalyptic continuations (also evoked by Hg 2:3, 9; Zec 2:9).

The literary sources most in harmony with the theme of glory are those that emanate from circles close to the temple (priests, psalmists); they help to describe the great theophanies of Sinai (Ex 24:40; Lv 9:6, 23; Nm 14:10). In the late period of the Old Testament, the wisdom writings see in Wisdom* the divine manifestation that gradually encompasses all the others. They link it to the theme of glory (Sir 24:17), and emphasize its parallel with the glory of the cult* (Sir 45; 50:5–13). Wisdom itself is “the radiance of the glory of the All-Powerful” (Wis 7:25; see 9:11).

b) New Testament. Doxa, in the theological sense, is very frequent in the New Testament (appearing more than 200 times). The complex meaning of kaukhasthai (“to glorify oneself, display one’s pride”) should not be overlooked. It is, for example, characteristic of the Pauline* corpus (where it is found more than 50 times), expressing the way in which human beings are given prestige, either vainly (Rom 3:27; Gal 6:13), or in God, in Christ* (Rom 5:11) and his cross (Gal 6:14), and particularly in the community of the apostle Paul's disciples (1 Cor 15:31; 2 Cor passim).

The continuity between the glory of the temple and the new glory is attested by the hymn of Luke 2:29–32; it is in the temple that Simeon recognizes in the child Jesus* the “glory of Israel.” The same jubilation recurs throughout the other gospel authors.

2 Corinthians 3:4–5:6, the locus classicus of Pauline theological aesthetics (Balthasar* 1969), closely ties together the themes of glory, the “new covenant,” and the Holy Spirit, on the basis of an echo of Exodus 32 and 34. The glory of God in Christ is communicated to the community of believers by the integration of the Torah, the prophets (repetition of Jeremiah), the wisdom books (theme of “reading”: 2 Cor 3:15), and apocalypics* (2 Cor 3:13—the telos). In John, the glory of the Son in the flesh culminates in his final prayer* (Jn 17:5), which presents a synthesis of the theme: the one of whom “we have seen his glory” (Jn 1:14) has shown it in many signs (Jn 2:11) until it reiterates Isaiah's vision of that glory (Jn 12:41). He has not however obtained the personal union of “belief.” The rejection is interpreted as a preference for the glory that comes from human being over the glory given by God (Jn 12:43). Conversely, Jesus exalts the communication of glory between the Father*, himself, and his disciples. He shows its nature in this way: “The glory that you have given me I have given to them, that they may be one even as we are one” (Jn 17:22). To be sure, it was necessary to wait for the cross, the Passion*, and the Resurrection* for a total manifestation of that glory to the disciples. But for John 13:31f., it is from eternity to eternity, so that, through the prologue, the perspective extends to the entire history* of mankind.

When it comes to the revelation of glory, a special place is reserved in the synoptic tradition for the transfiguration (Mt 17:1–8 and parallel passages). The substance of this episode is reflected back onto the narrative* of the baptism* of Jesus (Mt 3:3–17 and parallel passages) and forward onto that of his agony in Gethsemane (Mt 26:36–46 and parallel passages). The entire life of Jesus is thus permeated by his glory.

By “doxologies” is understood the formulas (preserved in all the “glory to”s of Christian liturgies*) by which God and his Christ are glorified. Their frequency in the Pauline writings (Rom 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; 16:25ff.; 2 Cor 1:20; 4:15; Gal 1:5; Eph 3:21; Phil 4:20) shows that this homage of praise held the principal place in the prayers of the earliest communities. Indeed, glory is the end of all things (Eph 1:6, 14), those of God and those of man, who in the end are one. The Book of Revelation illustrates this in its doxologies (1:6; 5:12f.; 19:1) and in the picture (inscribed in traditional visions) of Jerusalem* illuminated by the glory of God, toward which flows the “glory of the nations” (Rev 21).

- H. U. von Balthasar (1969), Herrlichkeit III/2, Einsiedeln.
- Y. Simoens (1981), La gloire d'aimer: Structures stylistiques et interprétatives dans le Discours de la Cène (Jn 13–17), An-Bib 90, Rome.
- M. Weinfeld (1982–84), “Kabôd,” ThWAT 4, 23–40.
- Y. Simoens (1997), Selon Jean, 1. Une traduction, 2. Une interprétation, Brussels, 29–77.
- F. J. Moloney (1998), The Gospel of John (Sacra Pagina Series 4), Collegeville, 33–48.

YVES SIMOENS

See also Holy Spirit; Name; Praise; Temple; Theophany; Wisdom; Word

Gnosis

a) Gnosis and Gnosticism. At the beginning of the Christian era the term gnosis, meaning knowledge, signified exclusively a particular type of knowledge having to do with the essence of things, such as the mysteries of the divine world and celestial beings. The term went beyond simple pistis (faith*). The “gnostic” who was initiated into this knowledge was guaranteed salvation. The concept was susceptible to orthodox theological use. Thus Clement of Alexandria, followed by other fathers* of the church, proposed the ideal of the “true gnostic” as a perfect Christian who allows himself or herself to be transformed by “knowledge” in such a way as to live in harmony with God*. The term gnosticism, then, is better suited than gnostic to signify the religious movement that developed, over the first centuries of Christianity, into a multitude of sects that shared the same conception of gnosis, a conception the Church* fought against and rejected. This movement is known to us first through the polemics of the heresiologists, who often distorted it in their descriptions, and more lately through an increasingly rich collection of rediscovered original texts, the most important being the Coptic library found at Nag-Hammadi.

b) The Characteristics of Christian Gnosticism. It is impossible for a single definition to encompass gnosticism as a whole because of the variety of its theories, but its principal distinctive traits can be described as follows: 1) A dualistic factor tends to dissociate creation* from redemption, just as it tends to separate completely the material world, dominated by evil or limited powers, from the spiritual world, the domain of the transcendent and “unknown” God. It is from this latter world that human souls* emanate, souls of spiritual essence, prisoners of this world on earth. It is from the spiritual world, too, that the Savior descends in order to bring back to the higher world the souls of the elect—those who possess gnosis. This dualism can be explained by the anguished priority given to the problem of evil—of its origins and why it exists. It attempts to disengage the human soul from any personal responsibility. 2) A privileged knowledge, transmitted through secret, unveils the mysteries of the celestial world. 3) Speculation, which explores the plenitude of the divine (or Pleroma), tries to discover the entities (or aeons) of which it is formed in a manner that tends toward mythologizing. 4) A form of anti-Judaism sees in the “god of the Jews” only a demiurge, creator of the universe.

c) The Great Gnostics of the Second Century. Not including Marcion*, who is not a gnostic in the strict sense of the word, Basilides and Valentinus are the most important gnostics of the second century. Basilides’s system is not well known. It seems to have philosophical resonances and includes a negative conception of being*; the “unknown” God becomes, for Basilides, “non-existent” and produces a seed, a sort of primitive chaos, in which is enclosed all future evolution*. His eschatology* is marked by pessimism, with everything in this world returning to a state of cosmic forgetfulness. Valentinus, whose sect flourished with great success, is more important. Metaphysician and mythmaker, he is the author of a system dominated by the notion of the syzygy (conjunction) of male and female entities. Starting from the Father* (who is Void and Silence) the Valentinian Pleroma is deployed by successive emanations of pairs of aeons. The last aeon, Sophia, is at the origin of the production of the material world by the demiurge. Humanity is divided into three categories: carnal people, psychic people, and spiritual people. It is only to these last that certain salvation is promised through the aeon Jesus*, Savior, fruit of the Pleroma. Valentinus found justification for his system in the Old and New Testaments and used a particular exegetical method in which allegory played a large role. His theological concepts stimulated the thinking of the fathers of the church and resulted in their elaboration of the dogma of the Trinity*. The sect of Valentinus developed into two schools, the Italianate and the Oriental, with doctrinal and exegetical variations. Several Nag-Hammadi documents (notably the Gospel of Truth) contributed to a better knowledge of Valentinianism and of the stages of its evolution.

d) The Origins of Christian Gnosticism. The extremely difficult problem of the origins of gnosticism has not yet been satisfactorily solved. The fathers of the church perceived gnosticism to be an internal deviation from Christianity due to its contamination by philosophy, particularly by Platonism. This is generally corroborated by the explanation of Adolf von Harnack, who wrote of the “chronic Hellenization of Christianity.” This thesis is simplistic, however, and recent research considers the gnostic phenomenon rather as an intellectual or spiritual attitude with universal influence and scope. The tendency is to ascribe the gnosticism of the first centuries of Christianity to the development of religious syncretism that issued from Alexander’s conquests (especially the influence of Persian dualism). Mention must also be made of the existence of a pre-Christian gnostic (Simon of Samaria) and especially of a Jewish gnosticism (gnostic elements are present in some of the intertestamentary writings). Resurgences of an Egyptian religious mentality must not be excluded either.

- E. de Faye (1913), Gnostiques et gnosticismes, Paris.
- S. Pétrement (1947), Le dualisme chez Platon, les gnostiques et les manichéens, Paris.
- F.-M. Sagnard (1947), La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée, Paris.
- G. Quispel (1951), Gnosis als Weltreligion, Zurich.
- H. Jonas (1958), The Gnostic Religion, Boston (Rev. Ed. 1970).
- R. M. Wilson (1958), The Gnostic Problem, London.
- J. Dorese (1958–1959), Les livres secrets des gnostiques d’Égypte, Paris.
- A. Orbe (1958–1966), Estudios valentinos, Rome.
- G. G. Scholem (1960), Jewish Gnosticism, Merkabah, Mysticism and Talmudic Tradition, New York.
- R. M. Grant (1964), La gnose et les origines chrétiennes, Paris.
- Coll. (1967), The origins of Gnosticism, Colloque de Messine, Leyden.

M. Tardieu (1974), Trois mythes gnostiques..., Paris.
The Nag Hammadi Library in English (1977), Leyden.
 H.-C. Puech (1978), En quête de la gnose, 2 vols, Paris.
 M. Tardieu, J.-D. Dubois (1986), Introduction à la littérature gnostique I, Paris.
 Ch. Marksches (1992), Valentinus Gnosticus?, Tübingen.
 M. Simonetti (1993), Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Milan.
 W. A. Löhr (1996), Basilides und seine Schule, Tübingen.

K. Rudolph (1996), Gnosis und spätantike Religionsgeschichte: Gesammelte Aufsätze, Tübingen.

RENÉ BRAUN

See also Alexandria, School of; Fathers of the Church; Heresy; Intertestament; Judaism; Manicheanism; Platonism, Christian; Scripture, Senses of God

A. Theological Problematics

I. Biblical Theology

In its more normative occurrences (those of the burning bush and of the Shema Yiserâél), the biblical naming of God, YHWH 'Elohîm, is a double naming. YHWH (conventionally rendered as “Yahweh” when the vowels omitted in Hebrew orthography are added) records a unique and indispensable historical revelation, while 'Elohîm refers just as much to what the pagans call “God,” even when an idol is designated. This bipolarity continues into the New Testament, whose message cannot be conveyed without the association of the word that names Jesus* and the one that, in any language, names God.

1. The Old Testament

a) How Does the Biblical God Make Himself Known? The Book* cannot be understood as a direct and immediate communication from God. It conveys in written narrative form the fact that certain people, especially in the beginning, heard God speak to them, directly or not. Sometimes God showed himself: this event was exceptional (Ex 24:10; Is 6:1; Am 9:1), or was reported with reservations and corrections (Dt 5:24ff.; Nm 12:6ff.), or even denied completely (Dt 4:15; Ex 33:20; Jgs 13:22). The recipients of the divine communication were usually individuals, chosen to address their communities.

b) The Object of Divine Communication. God behaves in the same way as humans do, in the sense that God reveals less what he is than what he likes and what he feels. What pleases him is declared to the people* through the law* of Moses and through the prophets*. It is especially through the latter that what he feels is shown, the intensity of divine pathos even going so far as to give himself up to be read in the bodily history of his messengers (Is 8:1–4, 18; Hos 1:1–3; Jer 16:1–9; Ez 24:15–27). Wisdom* transmits the word along with life itself, from parents to children, and it enables both to go back to their divine origin (Prv 1–9).

c) God's Identity. The message is authenticated by God's signature, which is the Name*. This name, YHWH, refers back to history. It is linked to the Mosaic Law: the burning bush next to Sinai (Ex 3).

The word YHWH is formed of two components: the subject (third person: “He”) and the verb to be, in the third person. As it stands, the narrative* interprets YHWH as derived from the verb in the first person, for first of all God utters it in this form in Exodus 3:14 (adopted in Hos 1:9, in the negative form in the Hebrew!). Here the Vulgate—Ego sum qui sum (Ex 3:14a: “I am who I am,” not retained in 14b, despite the Hebrew)—is more faithful to the Hebrew than the Septuagint's ho ôn (“the being”).

God's name makes him known as subject: it is in the act of speaking that his essence of being is given, by his signing of a promise*. For this reason he calls out, he is called to, he is announced, without ever losing the link that ties him to the founding event (Ex 3:15 ab). The covenant* can be considered the authorization and foundation of the exchange of words between God and humanity. Committed to a covenant that cannot proceed without controversy, the biblical God exposes himself to history*. One of the biblical epithets that best sums up the divine manifestations is that of “living” (1 Kgs 18:15; 2 Kgs 2:2; 3:14; Jer 10:10; 23:36). God is living, although immortal. Correlatively, the idol is a god who is not living.

d) Transfers. “The Lord our God, the Lord is one” (Dt 6:4). Now, biblical monotheism* has two aspects: its exclusiveness, and its capacity for infusing with YHWH’s identity those manifestations of the divine that, in olden times, did not claim to be His: according to Exodus 6:3, if the patriarchs did not know YHWH, it was because he appeared to them under another name. According to a different tradition*, Abraham was able to recognize YHWH in the “God Most High” (Gn 14:22) whom the kings of Canaan worshipped (14:18). To oblige the people to choose either Baal or Yahweh (1 Kgs 18:21) was also to displace onto YHWH some of Baal’s characteristics (Hos 2:18b). These kinds of connections did not necessarily spring from a spirit of annexation. Rather than a wish to conquer the surrounding surface, the narrative aimed to conquer time*—from before Israel* up to its origins. More than others, the narrative encountered other cultures and religions along the way: it did not suppress these interferences. The fact that a journey so attracted toward the Unique one has left such visible traces of its vicissitudes is worth mentioning. It should be added that fidelity to the one God was not originally focused on the number (monotheism): it was part of an effort not to confuse him with what might be another god, even under his name.

e) Ambivalences. God has spoken “at many times and in many ways” (Heb 1:1): this variety is also characteristic of his actions. Some of them unfold in a mixture of light and darkness whose ambivalence the narrator stresses or does not manage to hide. There are moments of dread when a humano-divine being becomes Jacob’s enemy (Gn 32:23–33), or when YHWH (Ex 2:24ff., MT; LXX: his Angel) tries to kill Moses’s son (or Moses himself?). There is a crucial moment, at the heart of this history, when the division of roles between God and the “destroyer” (Ex 12:23.27) is still not clear, in the extermination of the first-born of Egypt. God already ratified the violence* of the whole mass of humanity after the flood (Gn 9:2). Ezekiel’s temerity in having God say: “I gave them statutes that were not good” (Ez 20:25) is a unique example. With regards to the enormous cultural amount of bloody sacrifices*, however, the uncertainty is not lifted: did God want them (Jer 7:22; Am 5:25; Ps 15:18ff., but v. 21) or did he not?

The biblical narrative reveals precisely what will later become its crises: that is, where the irrepressible rather than the intended character of its truth* is revealed. The texts are in no way eager to show God dissociating himself from the darkness. The opacity of these texts also lends them weight. God strangely assumes humanity’s darkness, as if he could heal humanity from darkness only by accompanying it through. The most convincing aspect of the process is its slowness, because God’s purpose is that the whole humanity* becomes a holy society*. That is why he is called king, one of his most remarkable titles (Nm 23:21; Is 6:5; 44:6; Ps 24:7ff.; 48:3).

f) Holiness and Love. “I am holy,” says God (Lv 11:44ff.; 19:2; 20:26; 21:8). Thus is expressed that property of God which is his insofar as he is the only one to be God; a property, nonetheless, which is able to touch human beings (Lv 21:8) as the burning coal touched Isaiah (Is 6:6–7). This characteristic pervades the whole ethical domain from further back, from his founding. It ensures him his position as one who respects the singular, of the proper name that, within the network of kinships, designates the sanctuary of each being (Lv 18). The communication of what is unique can be called love*: God loves Israel (Dt 4:37; 7:8; Hos 11:1) and calls on Israel to love him. The encounter with the holiness of the biblical God is a test, a shock, a “fear*.” There is no reason to be surprised that it is in continuity with the experience* of God’s love.

g) Divine Paternity. God speaks as subject. God is alive. God is holy. God loves. His position as speaker already places God in a contradictory position with respect to himself. And he speaks to himself (“Let us make.”) before making man in his image. The fact that in his image he makes man masculine and feminine could tell us something about what he is, the nearest deduction being that he contains a difference. Genesis 1:27 does not call the Creator “Father” (despite Gn 5:3). According to Proverbs 8:22 from the beginning God engenders eternal Wisdom. This introduction of a God who engenders Wisdom points toward the identity between divine speech and divine life, toward a God who is father of life and truth. This God is indeed invoked in the texts, although sparingly, under the name of Father*. To call him so had been the privilege of the king (Ps 2:7; 89:27; see 2 Sm 7:14).

Since Israel has the role of the mother and sons (Hos 2:4), God is sometimes featured as her spouse (Hos 1–3) and as her father (Hos 11:1), or as her spouse and creator (Is 54:5; Is 62:5 [?]). Maternal feelings are not alien to him. The implication of God in the couple’s relationship supplies the Song of Songs with its full meaning. His implication in the genealogies, illustrated particularly in Genesis, is always assumed. The intersection of nuptial language and the political register (e.g. Jgs 9:3; 2 Sm 5:1; 19:13f., and Gn 2:23) is not a justification for conflating them, but indicates a decisive locus of the divine manifestation.

h) A God of Excess. The law maintains evil* as well as good* within boundaries. Transgression of the law is only remedied and healed by excess, heralded by certain prophecies inspired by the upheaval of the exile (Is 54–55; 59:21; Jer 31:31–34; Ez 16:59–63; 20:44; 36:16–32; Joel 3:1–5). To his people who will break the covenant, God will respond by giving it more than he had already given; more than the renewal of the covenant, he will give his people the ability to be faithful to it, which their awareness of sin* will make possible. Where biblical anthropomorphism is principally transcended is perhaps in this excess of forgiveness: “I will not execute my burning anger (...) for I am God and not a man” (Hos 11:9). Jer (31:31) calls it the “new covenant.” Israel then wonders about God’s compassion toward its rightful sufferers.

2. The New Testament

The God of the New Testament makes himself known through the voices of those who spread the “good news” (gospel), which is destined first of all for Israel (Rom 1:16), then for the whole of humankind. The announced novelty consists in the fact that God gives himself entirely to his Son Jesus. Now, this gift has further repercussions: “How will he not also with him [his Son] graciously give us all things?” (Rom 8:32).

a) Difference in God. Jesus’ relationship with God can be understood in the difference. Jesus has taken his place among the Jews who worship God. When called “good,” Jesus points out that only God is good. Dying, he cries out: “My God, My God” (see Jn 20:17b). In reply (Heb 5:7) the Father (designated as “God”) raises Jesus from the dead (Acts 3:14ff.), exalts him (Acts 5:31), makes him Lord and Christ (Acts 2:36), and makes him Leader and Savior (Acts 5:31; see Rom 1:4 “proved that Jesus is the powerful Son of God”).

b) Divine Unity and Unicity. This difference is that between a “Father” and a “Son.” The character of Jesus’ filiation* is unique (monogenesis*). In Jesus, God has “his own Son” (Rom 8:32), his beloved Son. No other expression of the relationship between God and Jesus has been so widely turned into a theme as that of their paternity-filiation: the life given by God is the life received by Jesus. It is only Jesus’ way of being that fully reveals what the condition of son of God is, and thus “equal with God” (Phil 2:6). To be son is not to be slave. The synoptic Gospels make this visible already through of the Son’s regal style: “But I tell you” (Mt 5), his liberating “authority*” (Mt 7:29; Mk 1:27), his daring to absolve sinners, the biblically unprecedented calls to suffer “because of me” (Mt 5:11). John takes it all up schematically: “No man ever spoke like this man” (7:46). Those who hear the speech see the actions: “Whoever has seen me has seen the Father” (Jn 14:9). The Son can reveal the Father without reserve because the Father, this God without jealousy, “shows him all that he himself is doing” (Jn 5:20). “All that I have is yours, and all that you have is mine” (Jn 17:10); this authorizes the New Testament’s most radical statements, such as “I and the Father are one” (Jn 10:30) or the “My Lord and my God” (Jn 20:28), addressed to the risen Jesus. A hymn borrowed by Paul puts the name of Jesus alongside the name formerly revealed to Moses: “above every name” (Phil 2:9). The divine essence, by remaining attached to a narrative series, confirms its own unicity, symbolized by the theme of the name: “...your name, which you have given me,” says the Son (Jn 17:12; see Jn 6:27: the “seal” of the Father).

c) The Work of the Son. God is not fully known as long as the ambivalence is not resolved, the veil lifted with which he had wished to cover himself during the time of his “forbearance” (Rom 3:26). The era of biblical slowness is over: Jesus does indeed follow the rhythm that tells him his “hour” has come, but this hour precipitates the victory of the light and tears the veil. In his son, God himself does more than pardon: he delivers himself without resistance into the hands of sinners, experiencing the evil that he heals. The Pauline teachings will show that the cross reveals with shattering clarity the way in which sin and death* have made use of the law for their own benefit. As can already be discerned in the Old Testament, God’s way of experiencing human history continues right to the end. Darkness can only be vanquished by being walked through. The excess which tears the veil of the old law is also the very one that the whole Old Testament heralded. It is in the forgiveness that turns the instrument of malediction, the cross, into an instrument of salvation* destined first of all for those who have desired it, that God definitively reveals who he is, without need for any later additions.

d) “All who are led by the spirit of God are sons of God” (Rom 8:14). The hour of Jesus draws brothers into the filiation that is his own. The specific nature of the gift of the Holy* Spirit offered to human beings signifies that “brothers” are at the same time “children” (tekna: Jn 13:33; paidia: Heb 2:13f.); but also something other than simply Jesus’ heirs or continuators during the course of history, and more than disciples (Jn 6:45; 16:12f.): they breathe the same life-truth that Jesus had received, it is through liberty* that they share the condition of son that belongs to this Jesus whom they call “Master and Lord” (Jn 13:13). This still incomplete expansion of the filial condition gives, or will give, its full magnitude to the divine work.

God does not withdraw from time. The capacity of the biblical God to reveal himself as having been there already will also apply to the Father of Jesus Christ. For that to come about, an era of patience reopens. The discursive undertaking of a rereading which relates the two Testaments to each other makes possible the broad propagation of the gospel message, and above all ensures its penetration in depth. This message not only wins adherents to a new religion, it discloses its prehistory. The Gospel* of John recounts in particular how the coming of the Word* made flesh reveals the work that the Father was doing, before that advent of the Word, among the “children of God who are scattered abroad” (Jn 11:52), in every human group that is “not of this fold” (Jn 10:16): “Everyone who is [already] of the truth listens to my voice” (Jn 18:37; see 3:21). The bipolarity, which the Old Testament had outlined, between the God of a singular series and the God of all people is adopted again as a promise.

- W. Thüsing (1986), Per Christum in Deum. Das Verhältnis der Christozentrik zur Theozentrik, 3rd Ed., Münster.
- J. Schlosser (1987), Le Dieu de Jésus: Étude exégétique, Paris.
- H. Cazelles (1989), La Bible et son Dieu, Paris.
- H. Niehr (1990), Der Höchste Gott, BZAW 190.
- J. Briend (1992), Dieu dans l’Écriture, Paris.
- A. de Pury, “Le Dieu qui vient en adversaire: De quelques différences à propos de la perception de Dieu dans l’Ancien Testament”, in R. Kuntzmann (Ed.) (1995), Ce Dieu qui vient, 45–68, Paris.
- J. Schreiner (1995), Theologie des alten Testaments, Würzburg.

PAUL BEAUCHAMP

See also Anthropomorphism; Father; Monotheism; Name; Theophany; Word of God

II. Patristic Theology

1. Preliminary Remarks

The theology* of the fathers* of the church was organized at first as a discourse on God the Father of Jesus Christ, to become with Augustine* a theory of God the Trinity. God is of course the God of the Jews (Justin, Dialogue 11, 1) and of the pagans, but he is known in a new way (Tertullian*, Adversus Praxean 31, 2; Clement of Alexandria, Stromata VI, 5, 41–42). There is a central paradox: God is both alone and not alone, single and multiple (Tertullian, Adversus Praxean 5, 2; Hippolytus, Contra Haeresin Noeti 10). The Father cannot be named without also naming along with him his Son and his Holy Spirit, which are like his “two hands” (Irenaeus*, Adversus Haereses IV, 7, 4; 20, 2). The Son, in his turn, cannot be named without the world and human beings entering into the theme: for “God is love*” (1 Jn 4:8, 1 Jn 4:16), and loving human beings constitutes his “distinguishing characteristic” (Gregory of Nyssa, Catechetical Orations 15).

The Christian God is both like and unlike the Absolute known by paganism*. In pagan thought there reigns an absolute transcendence with which one can only communicate through mediators, within a hierarchical system. But the Christian God is a personal God, whose transcendence does not forbid proximity and who appears in history as “Emmanuel,” “God with us.” In paganism, moreover, the Absolute—Plotinus’s “the One,” for instance—necessarily engenders, “like an overflowing crater” (Gregory of Nyssa, Catechetical Orations 29, 4; see Enneads V, 1, 6), or more precisely he does not engender but radiates (this is, the second hypostasis which “engenders” the Forms or the Ideas: see P. Hadot in Plotinus, Treatise 38, 1987). He gives nothing, and above all does not give “himself.” By contrast, the God who is Father of Jesus is the bearer in himself of a mystery* of donation and of alterity in which is rooted another type of alterity, the creation*. In this, theology very early recognized a new sign of transcendence (creation ex nihilo: Hermas, The Shepherd 26, 1 [Mand. 1]; see G. May, Schöpfung aus dem Nichts, Berlin, 1978). In order to be understood, the church fathers’ expositions on God must not be separated from a double context: the name of “God” applies to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and “theology,” which is the contemplation* of God in God, is inseparable from the “economy” in which God manifests his love for human beings, his philanthrôpia (Titus 3:4).

2. Before Nicaea I

God was spoken about in the daily life of the Church, in its catechetical and cultural experience, before he was discussed in the works of theologians: therefore the oldest language* (and a language that theologians would be able to use almost permanently) was that of the Easter kerygma, of doxology, of the baptismal liturgies* associating Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But since the goal of Christian language was not only to allow believers to testify to and verify as a community what they believed, but was also a language aimed at non-Christians, Christianity would not be able to avoid using the words and arguments that seemed the most universal, those of philosophy*. The Apostolic* Fathers already casually employed a lexicon imbued with a philosophical tone (Clement of Rome, Correspondence, 20 and 24, 5; Ignatius of Antioch, Polyc. 3, 2; Eph. 7, 2). Begun in fact before the Christian era (by thinkers such as Philo of Alexandria), the confrontation of biblical faith* with Greek rationality became necessary among the fathers with the advent of the apologists*. Thus, Justin commended the practice of idolatry for the sake of a purer conception of God, of whom he saw traces among the pagans themselves (Apol. I, 5 and 46; II, 8–11). Moreover, he transferred certain features of the God of late Greek philosophy onto the God of Jesus Christ: God receives the titles of unbegotten (agennètos) and of impassible, and is placed at a distance from the world. It becomes unthinkable that the unbegotten “should have left the super-celestial regions in order to appear in a corner of the world” (Dial. 60 and 127). It is not him but his Word who appeared in the Old Testament (Dial. 60–61; 127–128; Apol. I, 63). When the apologists state that God possesses a creative power that allows him to come into contact with what is not him, they are therefore making almost the same statement as the philosophers—but by identifying this power with Jesus of Nazareth (Daniélou 1961), they simultaneously distance themselves as far as possible from philosophy’s conceptual framework.

If it had to be proved that there is no ambivalence between the Christian and the philosophical naming of God, it also had to be proved that the God known in Jesus Christ was a God already known in the Old Testament. To counter Marcionite and Gnostic dualism, Irenaeus of Lyons stated forcibly that the same God is creator and savior, the God of Israel and the Father of Jesus, God both just and good, uniting in himself superficially irreconcilable attributes*. No other God stands above him, for he encompasses and dominates everything (Adv. Haer. II, i, 1–4). Here we stand at the origins of the first affirmation of the symbols of the faith (“I believe in one God, the Father, the Almighty,” see Irenaeus, ibid. I, 10, 1, Apostolic Tradition 85 [SC 11 bis, p. 85]; DS 1–15, 125, 150). In addition to its anti-Judaism, Gnosticism represented a second challenge for theology: it claimed specifically to have a knowledge of God (a “gnosis”) superior to faith. In Irenaeus’s terms, the gnosis claimed to know God according to his greatness and thus came to a deadlock, for no one can see God thus and live (Ex 33, 20). On the other hand, according to his love, God is “seen by man, by those he chooses, when he chooses, and how he chooses” (Adv. Haer. IV, 20, 5): it is in the element of faith that he is known then, through the “various divine economies” which he chooses in order to allow himself be known (ibid. I, 10, 3; II, 28, 1–3; IV, 20, 5–7).

Among the pre-Nicene fathers it fell to Origen* to make the most systematic and speculative propositions, and perhaps also to use simultaneously the most philosophical as well as the most biblical language. Origen borrowed from Clement of Alexandria (for instance Strom. V, 12–13) a necessary insistence on God’s unknowability. He also shared the Greek understanding according to which the infinite* is unthinkable as such, unthinkable without a determination. But since the divine paternity stands foremost in his axiomatics, to speak of the Father “without limits” (apeiros, aperigraphos) is only possible by speaking simultaneously of the Son who is his “delimitation” (perigraphè) and thus makes him knowable and shareable (see Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. IV, 4, 2; IV, 6, 6; see the Gnostic theories, ibid., I, 2, 2, Daniélou 1961; and Crouzel, SC 253). The concepts are metaphysical, but they are in keeping with a historical framework within which the contemplation of the Son’s sufferings authorizes even Origen to challenge the Greek dogma* of divine impassibility: “We must dare to say that Christ’s goodness has seemed greater and more divine and truly in the image of the Father when he abased himself, making himself obedient even unto death, and unto death on the cross.” (Com. in Jo. I, 32, §119)

A reconciliation of divine unity and the multiplicity of the created, such as the mystery of Christ, allows it to be understood (ibid. I, 20 §119); a reconciliation of divine incomprehensibility and the revelation in Jesus Christ of God’s paternal secret—it is very clear in Origen that theology cannot speak of God and of his relationship with man without developing a trinitarian discourse. Even if Origen’s trinitarian theology suffers from a certain subordinationism* (for instance ibid. XIII, 25, §151–53)—which would be reinforced later by Eusebius of Caesarea and even more so by Arius—in any event, the language used is Christian through and through.

3. After Nicaea I

It fell to Athanasius* of Alexandria, the greatest of the Nicene theologians, to develop a trinitarian discourse that could not fall back into the old ruts of modalism* or into subordinationism, and that could refute the Arian conception of the intermediary, of the Son that God produced in order to produce the world (Contra Arianos II, 24, PG 26, 200A). The Son is not a son in order to be a demi-god: “Even if God had thought it well not to create the world, nonetheless he would have had his Son” (ibid. II, 31). The trinitarian mystery of God is, moreover, a shareable mystery: “Not only has God created men, but even more so he has also called them ‘sons,’ in the sense that he has engendered them” (ibid. II, 39). One cannot speak about God in a Christian context without also speaking about man, because it is in the christological unity of the human and the divine that the divine can be most fully apprehended. What is more, it is of all human beings that one must speak when speaking about God, for the divine relationship between Father and Son is an open relationship, in which room is made for a “filial adoption” that realizes an assumption of the created within the Trinity.

Nicene theology was to extend and refine itself in the theology of the Cappadocian Fathers, to whom first of all we owe the refinement of the trinitarian vocabulary: unicity of the divine substance, triplicity of the hypostases. These expressions would govern all the affirmations of divine unity. The classic questions about knowledge and participation had to undergo a similar refinement in the controversy with Eunomius. According to the latter, in fact, man can know God as God knows himself (Socrates, Hist. eccl. IV, 7, PG 67 B; see SC 28 bis, nn. 4, 12), but no one, not even the Son, can share in him. Gregory of Nyssa’s response first of all made it possible for him to formulate a theory of grace* that makes thinkable the participation of the created in the uncreated through the Son’s mediation. Furthermore, it allowed him to maintain the absolute unknowability of the being* of God (of his ousia), while at the same time conferring a positive meaning to the confrontation between man and divine infinity. In fact the infinity of the ousia corresponds to a desire to which the divinity of God opens a limitless field: that is why Moses, “having set his feet on the ladder at the top of which stood God, does not stop climbing, for each rung which he reaches in the heights always opens onto a beyond” (Life of Moses II). Thus, theological science has always to be accompanied by a certain nescience. But if God’s grandeur is the gauge of our scanty knowledge, God’s grace and condescension contain the conditions for a fortunate knowledge and relationship, in the eschatological perspective of man’s eternal ecstasy toward God.

Augustine’s speculation began in the context of Neoplatonism, the schema of “exit” (proodos), of “conversion*” (epistrophè) and of “dwelling” (monè) in God thus providing the framework for a consideration of the ascent toward God, of anagogy. All the same, post-Nicene demands soon forced him to have recourse to a consideration of analogy* (O. du Roy, L’intelligence de la foi en la Trinité selon Saint Augustin, 1966), in which man’s spiritual life* is the complete image of divine life, in such a way that it becomes possible to speak about God in the terms that rational psychology uses to speak about human beings. Moreover, making a distinction, with regard to God, between the “absolute” names which are suitable for the three divine persons* and the “relative” names which characterize each of them in their relation to the two others, Augustine imposed a theory of relation, coordinated in his case with a notion of the divine substance, a notion destined to dominate Western theology. He also had to distance himself from Plotinus’s conceptualizations by making a major decision: unlike Plotinus, he would no longer place above everything an Absolute which was “beyond being”; rather, in line with a metaphysics of “degrees of being,” doubtless inspired by Porphyry, he would place above everything the God-Trinity identified with the Supreme Good and with Being (Sermon 7; Civ. Dei XI, 28; see du Roy 1966; Madec, La patrie et la voie, Paris, 1989; Solognac, Les Confessions, BAUG).

The tradition of Plotinus, received in the context of thinking in terms of “exit” and “return,” exitus et reditus (Proclus), was to find in Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite its most remarkable sphere of influence. Theology divides at this point: on the one hand into a theology of affirmation (cataphatic), which sets out the manifestations of God with regard to human beings; and on the other hand into a theology of negation (apophatic), in which human beings go beyond the content of what they understand in order to strain in ecstasy toward union with God. Richer than the affirmative way, the apophatic path differs from the former notably in that it has far less to do with any kind of discursive-conceptual practice than with an experience. Whether apophatic knowledge is considered as Pseudo-Dionysius’s last word (Lossky 1944), or whether it is understood as a stage on the way toward a third moment, that of going beyond by means of eminence (Puech, En quête de la gnose I, 1978), or whether going beyond by means of eminence itself is based on the mystery of Christ taken in its integral aspects (Corbin, RSPHTh 69, 65–75), one aspect of the Dionysian contribution remains primary and incontestable: in short, if one can “speak about God,” exactness demands an admission that one is speaking about the “mystery of God”; and if therefore theology proves itself adapted to its object by making itself a “mystic” theology, it is to experience*—to the experience of the one who allows himself to be initiated into the mystery—that God offers himself, and for this experience, God is not the one about whom it speaks but the one whom it “honors in silence.”

The end of the patristic era and of Byzantine theology would see confirmed in a few great creative syntheses the work of the previous centuries. For Maximus* the Confessor the paradox of the Christian God appeared even stronger in the light of Chalcedonian Christology*: God shows himself to be still more God not only because he is both one and triune, but also because in Christ comes to pass the union without confusion or separation of the one and the multiple (Quest. ad Thal 60; Letter 44; Quaestiones et dubia q. 173, CCG 10). God appears in Christ in total truth, as the trinitarian lord of the universe. Man appears in Christ in total truth, as the adoptive son existing in the image of the eternal Son. One problem still remains, that of the real condition of the divinization, theôsis, that God proposes to man as his absolute future. How could the unsharable be shared? Pseudo-Dionysius contented himself with naming the problem: “It is shared unsharably.” In the twilight of Byzantine history, Gregory* Palamas would try to solve the problem by applying to it in a new way a distinction already known by the Greek Fathers: a distinction between the divine essence, which remains strictly unsharable, and the “uncreated energies,” which divinize the one who shares in them. Doubtless the theory’s originality is less important than the permanence of the preoccupations to which it responds. Patristic thought, and the thinking to which it gave rise, never ceased to meditate on God’s transcendence except to meditate on a condescension that they knew to be just as great: trinitarian theology, Christology, the theory of divinization, all the patristic discourses aim to express the necessity of this double meditation, as it is imposed by knowledge of a God who is recognized as Father in the Son who became one among human beings.

- J. Lebreton (1928), Histoire du dogme de la Trinité, vol. 2, Paris.
- G.L. Prestige (1936), God in Patristic Thought, London (2nd Ed. 1952).
- VI. Lossky (1944), Théologie mystique de l’Église d’Orient, Paris.
- J. Daniélou (1961), Message évangélique et culture hellénistique, Paris (2nd Ed. 1990).
- A.H. Wolfson (1964), The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, 2nd Ed., Cambridge, MA.
- R.M. Grant (1966), The Early Christian Doctrine of God, Charlottesville.
- R. A. Norris (1966), God and the World in Early Christian Theology, London.
- A.H. Armstrong (Ed.) (1967), The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), “Die Aufnahme des philosophischen Gottesbegriffes als dogmatisches Problem der frühchristlichen Theologie”, Grundfr. syst. Th., 196–346.
- J. Pelikan (1971), The Christian Tradition, vol. 1, Chicago.
- C. Stead (1977), Divine Substance, Oxford.
- C. Stead (1994), Philosophy in Christian Antiquity, Cambridge.

JOSEPH WOLINSKI

See also Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite; Gregory Palamas; Negative Theology; Platonism, Christian

III. Medieval Theology

1. The Name

In the Middle Ages the name of “God” (God = theos) was associated with two origins: theorô (“I see”: Pseudo-Dionysius, Divine Names XII, 2, 969 C) to refer to the coincidence between the divine vision and the creative act; or theô (“I run”), to indicate the cosmogonic course of the Word touching all beings to give them life (John the Scot Eriugena, De divisione naturae). God’s unicity, revealed by the Bible* as well as by the Koran and confirmed by Neoplatonic speculations, renders problematical the use of the name in the plural: God is a proper name; it is improper, idolatrous, meaningless, to speak about several “gods” (William of Auxerre, Summa aurea). But is it the name that is most proper to God himself? Under the influence of Maimonides this status came to be reserved for the name YHWH, the only name that is but God (Bonaventure*, Sentences I), that human beings cannot utter, and that God alone knows. God can be named only by God, that is why he reveals himself in the Scriptures* by names whose multiplicity compensates for this partial approach. Following Augustine, a primary distinction is made between the “name of substance” (“whose name is ‘I am,’” Ex 3:14) and the “name of mercy*” (“the God who was worshipped by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,” Ex 3:16), thus coordinating divine economy and theology.

2. Knowledge and Revelation

Knowledge* of God is a response to divine revelation. But God does not reveal himself in the Holy Scriptures alone. He also reveals himself in his work, the “book of the world” (Hugh of Saint Victor, PL 176, De arca Noe morali II, 12; Didascalicon VII, 3, 814 B). Creatures are “mystical likenesses,” making possible the contemplation of their author (Baldwin of Canterbury, De sacramento altaris, PL 204, 744 D). Thus a symbolic theology unfolds, for which nature* is a system of correspondences that expresses the glory* of God. The very structure of the theology articulated around the opposition between things and signs (Peter Lombard, Sententiae I, Grottaferrata, 1971, d. 1) makes God the Signified par excellence in all creation. The medieval encyclopedias shared in this work of listing and understanding the divine works, in order to better know their author.

For Augustinian tradition it was by retreating inside his soul* that man could best reach the one of whom he was the image: through the image, he would glimpse the original (Augustine*). Socrates’s injunction, “Know thyself,” thus became the way to know God (Courcelle 1975). God is therefore in the depths of the soul, more elevated than the soul, but reached through its highest point. Union with God can be achieved through two of the soul’s faculties, intellect or love (intellectualism*, voluntarism*). “Charity itself is the eye by which God is seen” (William of Saint Thierry, La nature et la dignité de l’amour). In a more veiled but fundamental way, God is also reached in an ethical and emotional dimension, as the one who is the object of the desire for God, or of the fear of him. Adopted in a theological context, these qualities imply that he is present and knowable through fraternal love: “Fraternal love is God,” said Peter Lombard (Sententiae I).

Knowledge of God culminates in the admission of his unknowability: he surpasses any image (William of Saint Thierry, Meditativae orationes), he is incomprehensible (Alexander of Hales, Summa theologica I), inaccessible (Bonaventure, Hexaemeron). But formulating this unknowability remains the only way of understanding it; to think about God is not only to think about something greater than all else (majus omnibus), but to test the unthinkable (quo maius cogitari nequit, Anselm*), to know God as unknown (Thomas* Aquinas).

For this learned ignorance (Nicholas* of Cusa), the highest speculation about God attains the same object as does the simple believer’s faith. However, it implies a survey of inappropriate positions, and a critique of naive, magical, or anthropological elements. It is theology’s task, therefore, to separate the concept of God from the metaphors, the narrative interlacings, and the textual contradictions. Thus, the translatio in divinis never ceases to test human language, submitting it to logical rules in order to reach in a fitting way God’s nature and attributes (Boethius*). Several “paths” intended to purify our knowledge of its finite imperfections and to raise them to a pure perfection converge at their summit: it is necessary to sort out what is said about God without truth and what is said about him with truth, even if the latter be denied with more truth (Pseudo-Dionysius, Divine Names, I, 3). A distinction must be made between: the image of God and what is only its trace* (its more or less erased vestiges); proper names and names that are metaphorical, foreign, or improper; and the absolute perfections (simpliciter) that are better than their negations, and which can be attributed to God (“better than everything which is not him,” according to Anselm), and mixed perfections, which can be attributed to certain beings, but not to God (analogy*). These paths are integrated in several ways, sometimes by stressing God’s unknowable transcendence, beyond every perfection (Rhineland*-Flemish mysticism, Nicholas of Cusa), sometimes by stressing the constitution of a transcendental concept applicable to God envisaged as the maximum of perfections (John Duns* Scotus: “We do not love negations in a sovereign way,” Ordinatio I).

3. Principle, Middle, and End

According to a Platonic schema, God is often characterized as principle, mediator, and end of the universe as he is of human existence. “What then is God? For the universe, the end; for choice*, salvation*; for himself, he knows what.” (Bernard* of Clairvaux, De consideratione, Opera omnia)

The ultimate end, God is the one who can only be enjoyed (frui) and never exhausted as a means (uti), the one toward whom the whole cosmos* and all human action reach, he is beatitude*, glimpsed here below through shadowy sketches, and which will be fully grasped only in the celestial homeland. As principle, God is creator, such that his capacity to create and to preserve the world suffices to reveal his nature. “Whatever creature comes along, if they make such a heaven and such an earth, I shall say they are God” (Peter Lombard, Sententiae). God’s nature is studied first in a reflection on the Trinity, essential in the confrontation with Judaism* and Islam: the unity of the essence that, following Augustine and Boethius, is distinguished from the trinity of persons, makes possible a speculation on God’s existence and his nature. If God is said to be “substance,” it is in a sense that transcends the limits of this category, since it cannot lend itself to accidents. Of a spiritual nature, he is characterized as life, sovereign good, perfection, and above all, charity: by essence, God loves himself and all things, the good he does and not the evil that we do. Thus, his attributes are truth*, immutability*, simplicity*, such that all that is in God is God, including his operations: prescience (divine knowledge*), providence*, omnipresence*, predestination* (justice* and mercy*), omnipotence*, and will (in the order given in Peter Lombard’s Sententiae, and their commentaries). His relationship with the world presents the problem of non-reciprocal relations between eternity and time*: although God is in himself “Lord” of all eternity, he is not the “ruler of the world” until after the creation (Alexander of Hales, Summa theologica).

As mediator, God wills the salvation of human beings, and he alone can restore them to the image of God. The history of salvation is thus marked by long stages, and is understood according to a trinitarian rhythm, following Joachim* of Fiore and Bonaventure*: a reign of the Father (creation, revelation), of the Son (incarnation), of the Holy Spirit (in grace* and in the sacraments*). The questions then become: can one say that “God is [a] man,” or is it only the person of the Word who unites himself with humanity? (Peter Lombard, Sententiae). Can God suffer? Is he really present in the Eucharist*? The autonomous development of a theology of essence made these questions all the more pressing.

4. Birth of a Natural Theology

Scholasticism* assimilated the philosophical theology of Antiquity (Proclus, Elements of Theology) and found itself confronting Jewish and Islamic theology (Maimonides and Avicenna respectively). After its confrontation with the logic and grammatical disciplines, Scholasticism turned theology into a scientific discipline. The possibility of a philosophical theology, then of a theological philosophy, is founded on Romans 1:20, interpreted by Peter Lombard's Gloss (PL 191, 1327). Natural theology gradually separated itself from the economy of salvation and from speculation about the Trinity to acquire its own autonomy. From the 13th century onward, knowledge through faith became detached from the Scriptures and the world, setting up a third form of revelation (Alexander of Hales, in I Sent.).

This move was characterized by the constitution of "God" in a concept, distinct from everyday, natural, and religious usages. In the first place, he is often replaced by a proper term developed by the theologian in his speculation on God. This trend is visible as early as Anselm (Monologion), with the concepts of summa essentia, summus spiritus, ipsum bonum. Each theologian would thus deploy his own proper name for God, allowing him to contemplate God's existence, nature, and main attributes: ipsum esse in Thomas Aquinas's case, Necesse esse for Henry of Ghent, ens infinitum for John Duns Scotus (De primo principio, Bonaventure), and, more idiosyncratically, maximum et minimum, "Non-other," or even the untranslatable possest, in Nicholas of Cusa (Triologus de possest). A series of calls to order countered this trend of specialization in infinite scission: Bernard of Clairvaux denounced Abelard's use of logic, Bonaventure thundered against the masters of arts, Gerson demanded the return to current vocabulary ("Letter to Pierre d'Ailly"). These theologians thus emphasized that the God of the believers possessed attributes unknown to the philosophers, such as liberty, love, and omnipotence (Damian, Letter on Divine Omnipotence, SC 191). The concept constructed by philosophical reason alone diverged increasingly from the God known through revelation.

Secondly, this plurality of divine names was confronted by the ontological affirmation of God. Since God's names must transcend the limits of the finite meanings of being, they are acceptable only to the extent that they express the attribute transcendently. Thus, the Augustinian school favors the True; a Pseudo-Dionysian trend prefers to speak about God as Good, rather than as Being (Bonaventure, Itinerarium Mentis in Deum); another, Proclusian, school of thought named him as One (Dietrich of Freiburg, Berthold of Moosburg); yet another, blending Aristotelianism and Platonism*, would speak about Being itself (Thomas Aquinas). But they all ran the risk of being reduced to the existing (ens) in general, even if it were distinguished as infinite (John Duns Scotus). One way of transcending the transcendental itself was then to imagine God as nothingness* (John the Scot Eriugena, De Divisione Naturae, Hadewijch of Antwerp, Eckhart, Suso, Angela di Foligno).

Thirdly, scholastic theology increasingly constructed a priori the philosophical name of God, to the point of forming a true natural* theology: reason* alone possesses the principles that make it possible to demonstrate God's existence and nature. While Thomas Aquinas's five paths left to faith the job of acknowledging the unity of their five respective goals, and their identity with "what everyone calls God" (ST Ia, q.2, a, 3), Henry of Ghent stressed the necessity of starting from a previous concept that implied a priori "God's" unicity and singularity. With Henry, then with John Duns Scotus, the a posteriori proof simply verified the existence of a term corresponding to the concept. God is reached metaphysically, independently from all cosmology, as the "first principle" in conformity with his concept. John Duns Scotus's Tractatus de Primo Principio (c. 1308) completed this journey by presenting the first autonomous metaphysical treatise about God. Nicholas of Cusa brought out its implications: the thought of God becomes a conception of the Concept (Idiota de sapientia, Opera omnia V), and God is absorbed into the thought that engenders him. Ockham (Quodlibeta septem, Opera theologica IX), Bonaventure, then the Nominalists* would deny that the proof of God reached the one God—thus confirming the split between theology and philosophy.

- J. Kilgenstein (1898), Die Gotteslehre des Hugo von St Viktor, Würzburg.
- M. Chossat (1911), "Dieu (connaissance naturelle de)," DThC 4/1, 756–874.
- S. Guichardan (1933), Le problème de la simplicité divine, en Orient et en Occident au XIVe et au XVe siècle: Grégoire Palamas, Duns Scot, Georges Scholarios, Lyon.
- M. Schmaus (1935), "Die Gotteslehre des Augustinus Triumphus nach seinem Sentenzenkommentar," in Albert Lang, Joseph Lechner, and Michael Schmaus (Ed.), Aus der Geisteswelt des Mittelalters: Studien und Texte Martin Grabmann zur Vollendung des 60. Lebensjahres von Freunden und Schülern gewidmet, Münster, 896–935.
- J. Déchanet (1945), "Amor ipse intellectus est", RMAL 1, 350–374.
- H. de Lubac (1956), Sur les chemins de Dieu, Paris.
- J. Leclercq (1956), L'amour des lettres et le désir de Dieu, Paris.
- VI. Lossky (1960), Théologie négative et connaissance de Dieu chez Maître Eckhart, Paris.
- A. Lang (1962), Die Entfaltung des apologetischen Problems in der Scholastik des Mittelalters, Friburg.
- E. Gössmann (1964), Metaphysik und Heilsgeschichte: Eine theologische Untersuchung der Summa Halensis, Munich.
- U. Horst (1964), Die Trinitäts- und Gotteslehre des Robert von Melun, Mainz.
- A. C. Pegis (1968 Sq.), "Toward a New Way to God: Henry of Ghent", MS 30, 226–247; 31, 93–116; 33, 158–176.

- E. Gössmann (1971), Glaube und Gotteserkenntnis im Mittelalter, Friburg.
- K. Flasch (1974), "Gott VI. Mittelalter," HWP 3, 741–748.
- L. Oeing-Hanhoff (1974), "Gotteserkenntnis im Licht der Vernunft und des Glaubens nach Thomas von Aquin," in L. Oeing-Hanhoff (Ed.), Thomas von Aquin, 1274–1974, Munich, 97–124.
- P. Courcelle (1975), "Connais-toi toi-même": de Socrate à saint Bernard, Paris.
- P. Vignaux (1976), De saint Anselme à Luther, Paris.
- E. Zum Brunn, Z. Kaluza, A. de Libera et al. (1984), Maître Eckhart à Paris: une critique médiévale de l'ontothéologie, Paris.
- É. Gilson (1932), L'esprit de la philosophie médiévale, Paris.
- A. B. Wolter (1990), The Philosophical Theology of John Duns Scotus, Ithaca.
- S. T. Bonino (Ed.) (1995), "Saint Thomas et l'onto-th.," RThom 95/1.

OLIVIER BOULNOIS

See also Aristotelianism; Deity; Existence of God, Proofs of; Negative Theology; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism; Scholasticism

IV. Reformation and Modern Theology

1. From Luther to the Protestant Orthodoxies

The theological controversies sparked off by the Reformation had no effect on the content of the trinitarian and christological confession: in these areas Luther* took over in its totality the legacy of patristic and medieval theology. All the same, the seamless continuity of a confession of faith cannot lead to neglect of the fact that the order of reasons was subjected to profound upheavals. In fact it was Christology, and more particularly the theology of the cross, that provided Luther with a focus for theological organization. God is indeed firstly the transcendent lord of history, the omnipotent and sovereign will on whom everything depends, and in whose hands creatures are mere "puppets." But if there is a theology that assigns itself the mission of speculating on the inaccessible lord of creation—a theologica gloriae—this theology suffers from a deficit: it cannot know God's love, and it can only acknowledge that the Almighty is also, christologically, the All-Near. Now, it is indeed charity and the nearness of God that matter when theology is articulated as the "theology of the cross," theologica crucis. The God revealed through his opposite on the cross of Christ, the God to whom only faith gives access, it was this "burning furnace filled with love" that Luther experienced, and it was its paradoxical manifestation that he thematized. All natural knowledge is excluded: it is in Christ, and nowhere else, that God entrusts his promises, proves his fidelity, and reveals his trinitarian secret. Not only is theology alone able to speak about God, but it can also only do so by basing itself on a christological contemplation.

A shared fundamental agreement about the faith confessed by the Church, together with a new outline of theology's path, was also encountered in Calvin*—and this new outline did not always meet the Lutheran path. Divine majesty and glory were the key concepts. Calvin's God was primarily the one who had created everything for his glory, and whose glory, in conformity with the doctrine of double predestination (and in opposition to Lutheran indeterminism), revealed itself as much in the election of some as in the reprobation of others. Divine proximity was therefore absent from this theology; and it would be one of Calvinism*'s constant tasks, faced with Lutheranism*, to propose a Christology in which, in the name of the founding principle that wanted the finite to be incapable of harboring the infinite (finitum non capax infiniti), God would reveal himself in any event as the Almighty. Here again, the thought is strictly theological, and natural reason can only attain fruitless knowledge. But it was undeniably another image of God that was provided. Such a theocentrism was present in Zwingli*, where it was additionally fed by humanist influences. As for Bucer's theology, first structured as a theology of the Holy Spirit, it would evolve later toward a christocentrism.

The Reformers' primordial intuitions had to undergo a certain marginalization from the second half of the 16th century onward. Melancthon's Loci—the first of the Protestant dogmatics—exhibit, during the course of their redevelopments, a return to favor of the theoretical moves that Luther and Calvin had excluded. The proofs of the existence* of God regained there a rightful theological place; Luther's insistence on the "hidden God" was recalled, but exerted no strong influence; lastly, the systematic scaffolding tended to obfuscate Luther's primarily existential interests. Later, Protestant theology would turn into a new Scholasticism, which certainly owed its confession of faith to the Reformers, but which also owed a good part of its conceptual trappings to post-Tridentine Catholic theology, and to Suarez* principally, while at the same time it marked a new chapter in the history of Christian Aristotelianism*.

2. The God of the Enlightenment

Although at the dawn of modern theology God appeared as omnipotence and love, classical rationalism* did not fail to influence theology in its own turn. From Descartes* to Leibniz* and Wolff, the God of the philosophers did not experience any great metamorphosis with regard to his classical or medieval forms, when he was conceived as supreme power or supreme reason. Nonetheless, this God, who is also God the warrantor of a perfect mathematization of the real (he is also Newton's God) would enter theology without any part of his concept being thought through again. Enlightenment theology was very willing to be theologica more geometrico demonstrata; its God would borrow more than one major trait from the God of theism (deism*). The notion of God's omnipotence in creation therefore tended to overshadow any sense of a historical revelation. Divine love was largely interpreted in terms of a universal benevolence, which itself tended logically to preclude any possibility of divine wrath. In the face of the avowed reality of evil, the question of providence acquired an urgency that it had never had before: and if it was a matter of admiring the universe, as science revealed it, it was just as much a matter of acquitting a God being tried by human suffering. Natural knowledge of God ended up by becoming the focus of theology—and even more so in Protestantism* than in Catholicism*. From “physico-theology” to “neology” and to strict “rationalism,” an exemplary path thus envisaged the theological crowning of the God of pure reason—a God who was perhaps nothing more than the apotheosis of the enlightened intellectual.

3. The God of Feeling

The 17th and 18th centuries were not only an age of pure reason and of theological rationalism*. As early as the mid-17th century the divorce pronounced by Pascal* between the “God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob” and the “God of the philosophers and scholars” was pregnant with a theological task that relaunched the Reformation's initial impulses. This task was to define itself steadily, and doubtless be diverted, when Pietism* arose to ask theology to speak to it of a God “felt in the heart” (soul*-heart-body). Beyond confessional barriers, the “emotional transposition of doctrines” (Pelikan) is thus the exact counterweight of a rationalism to which the Enlightenment, nevertheless, cannot be reduced. Here the merciful Savior counters the all-powerful Creator, the sorrowful face on the cross counters an almost faceless God; and the establishment of a close link between theological work and the spiritual experience of “regenerated” man counters a practice of theology where only the scientific/rational is of significance. Thus God intervenes as the one who moves man's emotions: once again he is that “furnace of love” of which Luther spoke, and the in-self of the divinity is important only because of what it is for me. These strains are noticeable in the work of the greatest Anglo-Saxon theologian of the century, Jonathan Edwards*, and they certainly find their most compelling (and conclusive) expression in Schleiermacher*'s work. In his Reden über die Religion (1799), the latter had striven to give credit to religion from the perspective of a somewhat Rousseauist contemplation of the universe. His Dogmatik (1821) went considerably further. It proposed a condition for access to God, the “feeling of absolute dependence,” in which man abdicates any claims to absolute autonomy: “God” acquires his meaning in the element of feeling, of the Gefühl. Even more importantly, everything that is said about God is only said about him obliquely, and informs us only of what feeling grasps according to its own logic. The in-self of the divinity then vanishes; and those doctrines that the theologian does not manage to topple under the influence of feelings cannot help but be marginalized—thus trinitarian theology is relegated to an appendix of the work.

4. The God of Ethics

If it was necessary for Schleiermacher to have recourse to feeling, this was because pure reason, in its use of metaphysics, no longer seemed to permit access to God. To the growing Pietism, the God of reason did not seem quite capable of inspiring piety. But Kant* had intervened between this Pietism and Schleiermacher, and after the demolition of the proofs of God's existence that was undertaken in the Critique of Pure Reason, the God of reason had disappeared to make way for the God of practical reason, at once moral legislator, sovereign Good, and eschatological judge. With religion reduced to morality, the result obtained by Kant could not but be accepted by rationalism, and in fact accompanied it until its disappearance, when the quarrel between rationalism and supranaturalism ended and the theological world's interest was captured by the episodes of Hegel*'s legacy. The moral God was to reappear, perhaps even more strongly, in the middle of the 19th century, when A. Ritschl (1822–89) started his polemics against “metaphysical idols.” He based his theology on Christology and on the concept of love, the latter being reduced to its ethical content. Kant's God would be the God of liberal Protestantism: he was therefore the God whose death would be announced by Nietzsche*.

5. The Absolute and the Spirit

The God of pure reason certainly did not die as a result of Kant's critique, and the philosophies of German idealism were to give him currency. Thought of as “Absolute,” “Absolute Idea,” “Absolute Spirit,” or “Lord of being,” the God of Fichte, Hegel, and Schelling* is in each case the God of metaphysics, a God whose manifestation ad extra (“economy”) requires him to be deciphered on the basis of the moment of “immanence” of the divine life, and a God who remains unknown in the realm of feelings. On the one hand, the a priori requirements of reason are once again honored: thus,

Hegel proposes an ample defense and illustration of the proofs of God's existence. On the other hand, however, Hegel's and Schelling's God (but not Fichte's) is indeed the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob who has entered philosophy; a redefinition of the "philosophical" in its relations with the "theological" is at work here, and represents what is perhaps the most important intellectual event in the theology of the 19th century. All the same, Hegel had to wait until the 20th century for a theological hearing that would respect the aims and the actual contents of his texts, and the theological reception of Schelling's late texts has only begun. The history of 19th century Schellingianism is one of a strongly influential school of thought (see Wolf, PhJ, [98] 1991, 145–160), but one which almost fell into oblivion. And the history of Hegelianism* presents the pathetic spectacle of faithful and not very talented heirs (the "old Hegelians"), incapable of preventing the "young Hegelians" from proceeding to a total secularization* of the master. The same would happen to the protest made by Kierkegaard* against Hegel in the name of a subjectivity that sought the Absolute, not in history*, but in an experiential logic of faith (a protest that, moreover, should not mask the fact that both thinkers exhibited the same contempt for the classically defined boundaries of the philosophical and the theological!), with the result that it would not be properly heard until the 20th century. The 19th century remains the century of Schleiermacher.

- W. Gass (1854–64), Die Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik in ihrem Zusammenhange mit der Theologie überhaupt, 4 vols., Berlin.
- K. Barth (1947), Die protestantische Theologie im 19. Jh., Zurich.
- E. A. Dowey (1952), The Knowledge of God in Calvin's Theology, New York.
- Th. L. Parker (1952), The Doctrine of the Knowledge of God: A Study in the Theology of John Calvin, London.
- E. Hirsch (1954), Geschichte der neuern evangelischen Theologie, 5 vols., Gütersloh.
- W. A. Neuser (1957), Der Ansatz der Theologie Philipp Melancthons, BGLRK 9/1, Neukirchen.
- G. Ebeling (1964), Luther: Einführung in sein Denken, Tübingen (4th Ed. 1981).
- K. H. Ratschow (1964–66), Lutherische Dogmatik zwischen Reformation und Aufklärung, 2 vols., Gütersloh.
- J. Pelikan (1966–68) (Ed.), Makers of Modern Theology, 5 vols., New York.
- A. Peters (1969), "Die Trinitätslehre in der reformatorischen Christenheit", ThLZ 94, 561–570.
- U. Asendorf (1971), Gekreuzigt und Auferstanden: Luthers Herausforderung an die moderne Christologie, Hamburg.
- R. Stauffer (1978), Dieu, la création et la providence dans la prédication de Calvin, Bern.
- A. I. C. Heron (1980), A Century of Protestant Theology, Guildford.
- J. Pelikan (1984, 1989), The Christian Tradition, vol. 4 and 5, Chicago.
- J. Wallmann (1990), Der Pietismus, Göttingen.

See also Being; Deism and Theism; Descartes, René; Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich; Kant, Immanuel; Kierkegaard, Soren Aabye; Luther, Martin; Pietism; Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von; Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst

V. Contemporary Theology

1. The God of Crisis

The inaugural act of contemporary theology was unquestionably to break away from Schleiermacher and his heirs, and the manifesto of this rupture was Barth's Römerbrief (1919), a plea for divine transcendence and alterity, for faith as the only element of a just affirmation of God, and for a strict theological theocentrism. Whatever the names given to this reorientation by Barth ("dialectic theology," "crisis theology"), the return to a pure Calvinist conception of divine majesty was undeniable. "God" intervenes here as judge and critical authority in relation to what man could say about him that he has not said about himself; he intervenes as the one par excellence who cannot be appropriated, denouncing the "religious" constructions that make him a god tailored to human needs or a god measured by human experiences (Erlebnisse). Thus, a hermeneutics* of feeling in its religious function (Schleiermacher) is opposed on the one hand by the Word in which God expresses himself objectively, and on the other hand by a divine inaccessibility that dooms to failure any self-transcendence of man toward God. The demolition of any anthropocentric base would be pursued methodically, and in a manner independent of all the changes of direction that Barth's thought would later take—thus his trinitarian theology would avoid the concept of person, because of the weight of anthropological reference with which modernity had loaded it, and would have recourse instead to the concept of the "mode of being," Seinsweise. This purification of theological language also led to a rejection of any form of natural* theology and to a fierce polemic against the concept of analogia entis, which was viewed as "an invention of the Anti-Christ." Only divine liberty and divine love open the field to a knowledge of God and to a discourse about God. Several thematics arising from the early Barth would live on vigorously through the course of the century, and would often cut across confessional boundaries.

a) God's unavailability, relayed by the criticism of the objectifying language provided by Heidegger* in his Being and Time, would supply an organizing concept to all the theologies anxious to free God from the clutches of metaphysical thought. Whether it was a matter of writing a theology of the Crucified Christ “between theism and atheism*” (Jüngel); of thinking of God as existing “without being” (J. L. Marion); of setting up the “trial of God’s objectivity” (Colette et al., CFI 41); or still of thinking of God as “ever greater,” or as a “God ever more God” (M. Corbin), the desire to let God alone say who God is remained a common preoccupation despite the diverse approaches.

b) The unknowability of God outside of faith is a classical theme of the Reformation, but it has taken on a new urgency in the wake of Barth. This theme is linked to the one above: natural theology is criticized for having boarded God for inspection by the world and by man. Nonetheless, the theme becomes complicated insofar as God’s unavailability is tied here to a theology of revelation occupied with freeing the term “God” from all meanings and references other than Christian ones. Whether through a criticism of conceptual “idols” (Marion), through a challenge to “religious” language in the name of a non-religious reading of the biblical texts (Bonhoeffer*), or through the redevelopment of an integrally theological ontology (Dalferth), the debt to Barth is clear, whether it is acknowledged or not.

c) Barth was not without precursors. E. Schaefer had already protested theological anthropocentrism, and the Kantian phenomenology of the sacred developed by R. Otto (Das Heilige, 1917) had prepared the way for an exaggerated affirmation of divine alterity. This second reference is paradoxical, however, for reticence before the “sacred” is a characteristic sign of Barth’s influence in theology. E. Levinas would provide a useful conceptual couple when, in a context outside that of Christian theology, he would distinguish the “sacred” from the “holy”: this distinction goes to the heart of Barthian and post-Barthian criticism of the “religious.” One then realizes that the theologies of secularization* (Van Buren) or the theologies of the world (Metz) have perhaps fed on crumbs from Barth’s table—if the enchantments of the sacred in fact reveal a divine that is not God, then the disenchantment (Weber) of the world is an event worthy of applause.

2. The God of History

Another path was opening up to whoever wanted to have done with both moral and emotional theological anthropocentrism, the path of a particular understanding of Hegel. To the Barthian theme of a divine eternity as the judge of time, W. Pannenberg and J. Moltmann opposed the theme of a universal history with which the divine manifestation is strictly co-extensive, and the theme of a God who is craftsman of history and craftsman of the future. Contemplation of the “infinite qualitative difference” that separates the Creator from the creature then yields to an essentially “economic” theology, busy deciphering the traces of a divine interest in the history of man; the God of crisis cedes place to the God of the eschatological promises that have already been proleptically realized (Pannenberg), and whose complete fulfillment is history’s secret (Moltmann). Thus God enters theological discourse as the one who has come. Whether the traces of his passage are readable by any kind of historiography (Pannenberg’s extremist position) or whether their interpretation requires a hermeneutic based on faith (Cullmann), theology’s first task remains the same: to identify a divine signature in the facts of the world. And to the extent that these attempts are contemporaneous with the “new research on the Jesus* of history,” launched by E. Käsemann in 1953, it is hardly surprising that the question of God is first asked there in a christological context and that the trinitarian perspective only reveals itself at a later stage. For the looming of eternity over the present time (Barth) is thus substituted an appeal for direction coming from the end, an appeal for eschatological accomplishment to loom over history. Waiting for the Parousia*, therefore, becomes a substitute to the memoria Dei in Christo; God is the one who will come. At the time of writing, the best textbook on Catholic theology to have been published for a very long time, Mysterium Salutis (1965–75), also presents itself as a broad reading of the “history of salvation.” And even the most speculative of the Catholic theologies of the period, that of H. U. von Balthasar, adheres to this logic—a logic that Vatican II also made its own.

3. The God of Subjectivity and the Lord of Existence

Although the publication of Barth’s Römerbrief should be considered Kierkegaard’s first theological victory, subjectivity, existence, and the existing influenced other theories than crisis theology; and they did not do it under Kierkegaard’s aegis alone.

a) Thus it was in the line of a certain Kantianism (from the Post-Kantian Thomism arising from P. Scheuer and J. Maréchal) that K. Rahner*’s transcendental theology was organized—a theology in which the historical (the “categorical”) reveals nothing, or almost nothing that is not deducible a priori (“transcendentally”) in the interpretation of the spiritual dynamisms of subjectivity or the lacunae that affect it.

Theological anthropology* thus becomes once again the matrix of the whole theology. Rahner was to make a terminological proposal close to Barth’s by suggesting that “person” in trinitarian theology be replaced by the concept of “mode of subsisting,” Subsistenzweise, and he did it for the same reason, to avoid anthropomorphism*. Nonetheless, his viewpoint is the opposite: Barth’s starting point was the eruption of a word of truth into the human world; Rahner’s was an ontological/existential qualification which makes man a “hearer of the Word” even before it has been uttered.

b) It was under the influence of Heidegger that Bultmann, the young Barth’s fellow traveler, was led to express the question of God in an existential way. Here history is not forgotten in favor of the transcendental, but in favor of the eschatological, itself imagined in terms of “authentic” existence wrested by faith from the daily misfortunes of being-in-the-world. On (über) God himself, theology cannot speak; it can only speak of (von) him; and of him, it can only confess in faith his grace and his mercy. The historical reference therefore vanishes even before Bultmann’s exegetical skepticism* has led him to brand with unknowability the facts that the theology of the history of salvation invoked. Only God counts, in Bultmann’s view—the God who saves me today. Fichte can be paraphrased: it is the existential, and not the historical, that gives beatitude*.

c) Heidegger’s influence (but this time the influence of his philosophy of language) is also highly visible in the hermeneutical theologies of E. Fuchs and G. Ebeling, and to some extent in that of E. Jüngel. Yet again, the present is central: it is now that the Word must be heard and accepted, because it is now that the text of Scripture becomes a Word for me. And because theological interpretation aims to be existential, speaking about God is only possible with the presupposition, already adopted in Bultmann, that God is involved in the very structures of existence. The spoken Word, welcomed in the present where it is uttered, is a word understood beforehand.

4. The Death of God

Although Christianity is perfectly equipped to understand that even at the moment of death* God can find a place in himself, it fell to the 20th century to think of an Easter Saturday that is followed by no Easter joy banishing the darkness. The concept of “Christian atheism*” may indicate first of all, in a provocative way, a refusal to let the logic of theism put pressure on the confession of the God of Jesus Christ—and understood thus, almost the whole of living theology in the century shares this refusal. The “theology of the death of God,” however, has more than that to say. It says no less and proposes (in the case, for instance, of J. A. T. Robinson) to take leave from an onto-theological God. But it aims to proclaim such a concentration of the divine in Jesus that on Good Friday it is indeed the whole divinity who dies on the cross, without anyone being able to resurrect him. The “gospel of Christian atheism” (Altizer) is thus the good news of a transfer in meaning: what “God” meant has passed entirely into man’s history. Chapters on theology may still have to be written after the death of God (Sölle), but this death is real, and the God who dies in the Hegelian sense of the definition remains dead in the Nietzschean sense of the definition: what was said about him must then be found to be said about another, or must also die. A generation later, the post-modern “atheologies” would adopt the majority of the themes of the theology of the death of God, by transposing them in a hermeneutical and grammatical perspective inspired by J. Derrida (Taylor etc.) and often by placing their “deconstruction” efforts under the aegis of classical negative theology. Lastly, without belonging to the movement—an Anglo-Saxon one above all—of the Death Of God Theology, H. Braun treads the same waters when he attributes to the term “God” only the quality of being “a certain form of interpersonality,” eine Art Mitmenschlichkeit.

There have certainly been other discourses in the 20th century. As responses to theological criticism of theism there have been efforts to defend and to illustrate the God of Scholasticism (e.g. Mascall); there have been strictly metaphysical redevelopments (e.g. Swinburne, or God as the “foundation of being” of Macquarrie); in contemporary orthodox theology there are trinitarian discourses which are careful not to compromise themselves with talk of the divine “essence” or “substance” (e.g. Zizioulas). Moreover, this critique is intensified in Process* theology, with its renewed challenge to divine absoluteness and the shifts it makes in the concept of divine eternity. It is intensified, in the same way, in the various readoptions of the theopaschite theme—without there being any unified school, K. Kitamori’s God escapes from the conceptualities of classical theism as much as does the God of F. Varillon or W. M. Thomson. One point at least is abundantly clear: whether it is a question (in the majority of attempts) of taking a definitive leave of him, or of making a new covenant with him (Rahner), the God of the philosophers is always present in contemporary theology, in the wings or on the stage.

- H. Zahrnt (1966), Die Sache mit Gott: Die protestantische Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert, Munich.
- H. Vorgrimler and R. Vander Gucht (1969–70), Bilanz der Theologie im 20. Jh., 4 vols., Friborg-Basel-Vienna.
- J. Macquarrie (1981), Twentieth-Century Religious Thought, Rev. Ed., London.
- P. Lønning (1986), Der begreiflich Unergreifbare: Sein Gottes und modern-theologische Denkstrukturen, Göttingen.

- R. Gibellini (1992), La teologia del XX secolo, Brescia.
 E. Vilanova (1992), Historia de la teología cristiana, vols. 3, Barcelona.
 K. Blaser (1995 a), La théologie au XXe siècle, Lausanne.
 K. Blaser (1995 b), Les théologies nord-américaines, Geneva.

See also Barth, Karl; Being; Christ and Christology; Eschatology; Heidegger, Martin; Language, Theological

VI. Systematic Theology

Informed by almost 20 centuries of the Christian utterance of God's name, and whatever might be the multiplicity of contemporary expressions, whose coordination is extremely difficult, a systematic discourse could be organized according to the following currents of thought.

1. Christological Reduction

Christian Theology's first words are a christological confession: Kurios ho Iêsous, Jesus is lord/Lord, and its first task is to associate God with the specificity of Jesus' fate. God's name is certainly not utterable exclusively with regard to the "event of Jesus Christ." Nevertheless, the New Testament requires an assertion that this horizon is at least the only adequate one. No one has ever seen God, but the one who is closest to the bosom of the Father has made him known (Jn 1:18); whoever has seen Jesus has seen the Father (Jn 14:9). And based on the developments that these affirmations received during the early centuries of Christianity, christological mediation seems to be theology's identifying principle: "For in him the whole fullness of deity dwells bodily" (Col 2:9). The paradoxical coherence of Christian discourse requires therefore that everything that can be stated about God should hang on a christological interpretation. Theology only speaks about God by basing itself on a divine authorization: whether it uses the concept or not, it lives in order to make a constant appeal to a revelation, to a divine self-revelation; in Jesus' destiny it sees the perfect image of this unveiling. Therefore, it is first of all a matter of setting aside all the contents of the meaning of the word "God" that are not acquired or integrated christologically. The primordial element of the Christian naming of God is therefore memory. God is not primarily the one who is, but the one who has come: his "immanent" divinity is only strictly confessable when his "economic" divinity has first been confessed. It is a certain hermeneutics of a certain history that gives its exact meaning to the word "God"; the God who is discussed theologically is a God who gave rise to himself and gave himself a face.

2. The Trinitarian Unfolding

If theological reason is a reason certified by memory, it must also be stated at once that the God known in Jesus Christ is not an Absolute who has placed himself at the disposal of human beings by assuming their humanity, that God has not died in his divinity (in his transcendence, in his "highness") in order to give himself, in Jesus, a being-in-the-world. The christological economy of revelation, in fact, absolutely forbids a reduction in what we say about God to what we can say about Jesus: it is precisely christo-logical, which is more than Jesus-logical, because Jesus is recognized as Christ, as one signed with a messianic anointing that does not come from himself. Only a trinitarian hermeneutic can do justice to the "event of Jesus Christ" in such a way that the "opposition of relationship" between Jesus and the one he calls Father (and between Jesus and the Holy Spirit that he gives to his disciples) does not contradict the strict unity claimed by the Johannine Christ, and in such a way that it is necessary to speak about God simultaneously in the plural and in the singular (hèn esmen, unum sumus, Jn 10:30). The concept of self-revelation should therefore be defined. Jesus is not Lord as a revelation of himself, but as revealed by the Father and by the "unknown beyond the Word" (Balthasar). Speaking about God thus requires the use of a double language: both the language of subsistence, according to which God dwells in Jesus, and the language of iconicity, according to which Jesus is "the image of the invisible God" (Col 1:15; see 2 Cor 4:4) and "the radiance of his glory" (Heb 1:3). The one who comes is indeed the one who is; and in saying this we are not referring to the faceless being of a substance or divine essence, but to the "mystery" (mustèrion) par excellence, to which the "Jesus Christ event" yields itself in order to initiate (muein) reason, that of a divine life that is communion*. Jesus' resurrection*, then, is only the first word in Christology (Pannenberg, Moingt et al.) by being the first word in trinitarian theology. What God shows himself to be in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus ("economically"), so he is still (in an "immanent" way). Whether "God," theos, names the Father (in the New Testament) or the triad of persons (from Nicaea I onward), the christological faith cannot in any case unfold except in a trinitarian mode.

3. The God of Jesus Christ, the God of Israel

God expresses himself and shows himself in Jesus. Nevertheless, the christological "fullness of time" (Gal 4:4) cannot be interpreted as the first occurrence of divine word. The God of Jesus Christ is not a God immured in his own transcendence until the time of condescension has come—he is the God of Israel, already known, being already linked to humanity through a covenant. For this reason Old Testament pre-comprehensions are not optional in a hermeneutic of New Testament texts and of the confession of Christian faith. The first great theoretical debate into which the primitive Church had to enter was the debate provoked by Gnosticism and Marcionism*: a debate led by theologians announcing another God and abrogating the experience of Israel. If it has to be conceded that Christianity speaks about God differently than does biblical (and post-biblical) Judaism, the lesson from this debate is indeed that a Christianity that would disqualify the God of Israel would deprive itself ipso facto of the semantic, metaphorical, and symbolic resources necessary for the structuring of a christological affirmation. The discourse of alterity (“God otherwise”) cannot be maintained here without being tied dialectically to a discourse of continuity, and therefore without the formulation of a project for a christological reading of the Old Testament. When the curtain of the temple* is torn (Mt 27:51) and God is no longer present in the world except sub contrario, on the cross of Jesus, displacement and discontinuity are warded off—the God of Jesus Christ “scandalizes” Israel (1 Cor 1:23). Yet discontinuity cannot be imagined except in the light of an equally strong continuity. Post-biblical Israel can (or should) try to de-Judaize Jesus (“on his lips, we do not recognize our own verses”—Levinas) in order to contradict any Christian claim to continuity, but the pagano-Christian Church must itself maintain with all its might the homogeneity of the same speech act which fashioned Israel’s experience, and which makes possible the—difficult—recognition of the God of Jesus Christ as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

4. A Universal Meaning

If “God alone speaks properly of God” it is inevitable that theological statements systematically make their initial reference to the history in which the Absolute pitched his tent among human beings. Nevertheless, the provincial specificity of the “history of salvation” cannot all the same obscure the fact that God’s name is not just uttered within the confines of Israel and the Church. This has to be taken into account at several levels.

a) First of all, the God of Israel only takes his place among human beings, in the specificity of a culture, and subject to the accidents of language, by identifying himself at the same time as lord of the whole cosmos*; and what is more, as lord integrating all that is within the sphere of the covenant. The God of the covenant is God the creator and not one of those gods who would share between themselves the sovereignty of the world and its peoples. But, reciprocally, God the creator is also the God of the covenant, and this (at least) means that there could be no question of man without God himself also coming into question. It is certainly “more natural” (Jüngel) for theology to organize itself christologically and in a trinitarian way than to make an appeal to meanings taken on by the word “God” in other spheres of experience than those of Israel and the Church. But the fact that that name is not theology’s exclusive property is itself a major theological fact; between what theology says about God and what non-biblical cultures and religions say about him, there could not exist a pure and simple ambivalence.

b) The importance of universality of a meaning and of a reference has a strongly attested place in philosophical rationality. It matters little here whether God entered philosophy so that his name might be sanctified in it or his divinity finally forgotten in it. The only thing that matters is the intersubjective agreement on what the words mean; and the service that can be asked of them here, and that they undeniably perform, is to prevent any referential errors. After all, such an ill-famed concept as that of causa sui has only God as possible referent. Its extreme poverty can be granted. But it must also be agreed that it refers to God without any ambivalence. Looking at it this way, the “God of the philosophers” is not the other of the “God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.” Some other terms are undeniably naming procedures, and names may be different, but the one that they name is the same. Doubtless God is misunderstood wherever the historical conditions of his manifestation are not admitted and considered. Nonetheless, that is not to say that God is unknown there, or unknowable.

c) Therefore it must be proposed that the God of Jesus Christ cannot be expressed if he has not already been pre-expressed; and if the pre-diction has the faith of Israel as its favored modality, it is also realized in the expectation of the nations. Although first in the order of systematizing reasons, Christology and trinitarian theology do not have the first word; their discourse is only audible because God has already been spoken about. And in whatever way one gives theological status to the expectation of the nations (in patristic terms of the theory of the “evangelical preparation,” or in J. S. von Drey’s of a theory of the “originating revelation,” etc.), it is important to note that God is never spoken about christologically/trinitarily without this language being partially receivable because it is partially pre-understood.

5. Word and Liturgy

Theology speaks about God and constructs propositional sequences with the same structure as the sequences constructed for any other body of knowledge. But whatever it says about God, we cannot say it without confessing that God does not stand face to face with the human person in the manner of a supreme object, but in the manner of a You, and therefore that we speak about God while presuming that we can speak to God. The theological assertion therefore cannot close full circle on itself, and its final coherence only emerges in the links that unite it to the doxology. Since this is so, it is not enough that God should be the universal object of successful semantic transactions: it is also necessary that the community of those who give a common meaning to “God” should also exist as a liturgical community of praise* and thanksgiving. It is certainly a sign of our historicity that we can speak about God, and moreover that we must do so. But amid the tasks (kerygmatic, reflexive, etc.) that history imposes on theology, it is also possible to set the whole histori-ality aside in order to anticipate liturgically a transcending of objectifying language. Theology certainly could not absorb itself without remainder in the doxological, for the empire of praise would then be bought at a high price—that is, at the price of a closure on itself of the liturgical community and a ban on its telling the reasons for the praise. But neither can theology reduce itself to the dimensions of a theory of the divine, for it would cause the subtraction from this theory of the sphere of existential verification which only the experience of the liturgy, and of any prayer*, gives it. Such an oscillation is essential for the proper use of God’s name. Theory refers to liturgical practice as to the best use we can make of our words, while liturgical practice bases itself in turn on theoretical language as the condition of a universal communication of the reasons for believing in God and for speaking to God.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Language, Theological; Praise; Philosophy; Theology

B. Philosophical Problematics

1. An Impossible Definition

Metaphysics seeks an unconditioned first principle, an absolute that goes beyond the rationality that is proper to the class of the conditioned; through this transcendence, metaphysics finds open the possibility of encountering the one who is beyond all finite names and that philosophical tradition itself has called, from the time of its Greek origins, ho theos, “God.” But what this name covers is essentially problematic, because philosophy, forbidding itself to accept as truths historical data received through a tradition, can only know of God—if indeed it can know anything about God—that which comes from rational investigation (Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q.1, a.1). The fact that God is a subject for rational thought is itself a problem. Philosophy does not propose a unanimous doctrine about God, but only questions. What is this God, who can neither be found in experience, since he is the supersensible foundation of all empirical reality, nor be known in a sacred doctrine, since reason rejects the historicity of revelation, nor be met in a personal face-to-face encounter, since first principles are universal? Is it not simply a name given for convenience to the abstraction of a transcendental X? Could one not, in that case, challenge the legitimacy of this denomination and identification? Why “God”? Why not the Absolute, the First, the Supreme being? Rather than speaking of “God,” should we not speak of the “Divine,” the anonymous principle of the supersensible? Is it not the nearness, importunate but insistent, of the religions that call for a revelation, and in particular of Christianity, that, despite the methodological resolutions, causes a contamination of the God of metaphysics by the personal God, and that leads the philosopher, a Christian, to cross the threshold separating a principle of establishment and order from personal existence, and eternity of essences from eternal *life? But if metaphysics is suspected of being nothing more than a theology in disguise, a surreptitious introduction to obedience in faith, should not a philosophy freed of all authority challenge fundamentally the claim to speak about God, and apply itself to a radical critique of the practices of power that, in God’s name, and in the name of a supposed knowledge of the supersensible, hold consciences in ideological dependency? Philosophy’s task would then be a deconstruction of the God-idol of metaphysics. And by doing this, would all thinking about God be invalidated, or reduced to the status of a historically obsolete tradition?

Swinging between the two extremes of methodological atheism and rational theism, philosophical discourse unfurls the whole range of human attitudes when faced with God. There is nothing that philosophy can say about God that does not also refer to man, or tell about one of man's ways; for it starts from man, uncertain about the end of its quest. Philosophy does not and could not claim to say everything about God, but at least to stay attentive to what every man can say about God. The question is to find out whether the God of the philosophers represents only a way of stating the essence of man, or if it is possible for reason to reach that which exceeds itself.

2. God and the Divine

a) The Divine as Image of Ideas. While it is a human discourse on God, philosophy is not for that reason anthropology, for its methodological demands imply a setting aside of those cultural and religious data from which man derives an initial definition of his relation with the divine. The first Greek philosophy, challenging the divinity of the natural elements, broke with the universe of polytheistic mythology; Anaxagoras, Protagoras, then Socrates were condemned for impiety. Plato went on to set subtly at a distance what he called "theology" (Republic II, 379 a), meaning by that, not the philosophical discourse on the gods but the poets' well-regulated mythology. If the philosophical norm corrected the traditional, Homeric representations, it was by founding itself not on a knowledge of the gods' true nature, but on the idea of justice*, of which the gods must be, for human beings, satisfactory images. The psycho-cosmic theology of Plato's Laws (I. X) does not claim to state a final truth about the gods, but only to produce, through a persuasive, incantatory discourse (903d), belief in an order of retributive justice, a belief that, gently and without constraint, ultimately favors obedience to the Laws.

Thus the gods are useful images, pointing out to the soul the care it should take of itself—that is, of its original rooting in truth, as is shown by the myth of the winged steeds in Phaedrus (26 et seq.). The gods are immortal. The soul therefore is immortal in what brings it closer to the divine (see Republic. X, 611c). "The divine is what is beautiful, learned, good, and everything of that nature" (246d). The gods are the blessed (247a; see Banquet 202 c), whose lives, moving about among the numerous "blessed contemplations," are devoted to "thought, nourished by intellect and unadulterated knowledge" (Phaedrus 247 d); they possess the necessary knowledge (Parmenides 134 e). The divine therefore makes it possible to imagine the philosophical life. "Only the philosopher's thought is winged" (Phaedrus 249 c) because the philosopher, "always open through his reasonings to the idea of the being... turns his eyes to the divine" (Sophist 254 a-b); but if the philosopher alone can be called divine, it is not that in reality he has become a God, nor even that he finds in the gods models to imitate: it is because he attained the very reality that makes the gods (ibid.), a reality of which they themselves are only the images. The divine, blessed life is an image ad usum populi of the philosophical life: "he is possessed by a God, but the masses do not suspect it" (Phaedrus 249 c).

Plato therefore is not developing a theology for its own sake. He is not seeking the essence of the gods, nor that of the divine. His recourse to a mythical discourse is a way of evoking the Ideas, of translating philosophical concepts, into the language of Greek culture.

b) The First of the Beings. What Ideas have in common with the Olympians is separation; the God, or the divine, on whom the philosopher (to protect him from any specificity) does not confer any mythological name, is the transcendent—the one who, in contrast to the daimôn, "does not mix with man" (Banquet 203a; see also Parmenides 134 e). Aristotle retains this essential characteristic of the God, while criticizing the Platonic theory of the separation of Ideas. Consequently, the divine ceases to be identified with the world of Ideas, and theology as an autonomous science becomes possible, constituted by its proper object, and no longer as an ideological expression. The immanence of the intelligible consecrates the transcendence of the intelligence: it is the real registration of the birth of God in philosophical thought. "There is no doubt that, if the divine exists somewhere, he exists in that 'immobile and separated' nature..." (Metaphysics E, 1, 1026 a, 18 et seq.). In addition, this being is, with regard to every being, "the sovereign and first principle" (Metaphysics, K, 7, 1064 b1). Knowledge of the being as a being thus has with theology, or first philosophy, a favored relationship, even though—an arguable point—it might not blend with it. One cannot imagine what causes a being to be what it is, without imagining every being's first cause, which is the same thing as their end.

Aristotle initiated this theology in his Metaphysics L, 6–10. First, he proposed (L, 6) the existence of an immobile, separated, eternal being who is the cause, the end, the impetus of movement in nature (see Physics VII and VIII). But it is not enough to have discovered a first principle in order to talk about God; one must also assure oneself of the excellence of the life that the principle leads; because what God possesses in his own right is a perfect and eternal life (Metaphysics 1071 b 28). The perfection, the happiness that is felt in joy, in pure pleasure, belongs to the pure action, which has no other end beside itself; now, only contemplation (9*b* 24), or thought in conformity with itself (b 18), realizes in man already this coincidence of the act and the end. It is therefore as an “act of intelligence”—that is, “life in conformity with itself of the intellect, excellent and eternal” (b 27)—that the pure act can be described as divine. Chapter 9 specifies that “the sameness of the intelligence and the intelligible” (b 21), which characterizes the very act of thought in general, implies not only that God’s life must be an intelligent life, but, much more, that God is thought itself, in conformity with itself—that is, “the thought of the thought” (b 34).

Theology is not reduced to thought about the principle, it is linked to a thought about the life of excellence. God’s happiness surpasses everything that mortals will ever experience in their most perfect moments; but it is also the norm of the happiness of man, who is only man insofar as he is not only man (Eth to Nic. X, 7, 1178 a 5–7). This man par excellence, the most divine of all, is the philosopher; for Aristotle, as for Plato, to speak about God is to speak about knowledge of the divine, which is also divine knowledge, philosophy.

3. The Philosophical Contribution to the Theological Construction

a) The One and the Unique. For Greek thought, the superiority, the very transcendence of the divine, does not imply a commensurability of man and God; the divine is thought of as an extreme possibility of man. Paradoxically, God does not become radically other except in the greatest proximity with man. By making himself a man, God stops being divine and becomes foreign to man: madness for the wise, wisdom for the mad. God does not manifest himself as man imagined him. That is, Christianity had to appear before God became the infinite that no human understanding could understand, before the relation between God and man became that of the Creator to the ens creatum.

When Christianity wanted to find a philosophical model on which to build a theology, it did not therefore turn either to Aristotle or to Plato, but toward a late interpretation of Platonism, based on the fundamental dissociation between the primordial One and the Aristotelian order of the intelligence, which is homologous to that of being. The definition Plato applied to the Idea of Good (epekeina tès ousias, Republic VI, 509 b) is the keyword in a theology that affirms in its most radical consequences the transcendence of the One (see Plotinus, Enneads; Proclus, Platonic Theology; Pseudo-Dionysius, Divine Names). This encounter between the monotheistic revelation and philosophical mysticism is a crucial event, not only for Christian theology, but also for the philosophical naming of God. The name “god” is not, in a theology of the polytheistic hierarchy, the proper name of the transcendent One, since it extends to the divinity of all other gods, among whom beings also participate (Proclus). If the One is “the cause of all deity,” and if “the gods owe everything for their being gods to the first God” (Proclus), is the name “God” for this reason univocal, when it is a question of first among others? Strictly speaking no name, not even the name “God” is suited to the first one. Revelation, however, brings about, in the sphere of philosophy itself, a reversal in terms: on the basis of Holy Scripture, God can be named; but at the same time he is the one who is called unknowable and transcendent.

The analogy no longer consists of sharing out divinity among the first and the others, but in sharing out names (Being, One, Good, whichever might be the one granted preeminence) between God and creatures; on the other hand, God’s mode of being cannot be shared by any other being (see ST Ia, q. 4, a 3; 1, q. 13, a 11, resp.). Henceforth, the Christian adoption of Neoplatonic theology makes it take on a quite different meaning: it is definitely God who is spoken of, in giving him a name that cannot be given to any other being (ST Ia, q. 13, a. 9).

b) God as Being. It remains to be discovered by what right philosophy can talk about God. If the decisive passage from thought about the supersensible to thought about God presupposes revelation; if God is not per se notus, knowable through himself alone, that is, by the sole aid of reason; then metaphysics may well be sermo de divinis (Thomas Aquinas, In metaphysicorum, L, VI, I, 1168), scientia divina ST Ia, q. 1, a.1), but not, strictly speaking, theologia.

According to Thomas Aquinas, the common use of reason is not only insufficient for obtaining knowledge about God’s essence (ST Ia, q. 12, a 4 and a.12), but does not even manage to understand the meaning of the name “God,” since certain individuals (the Stoics), using their reason alone, did not flinch at the conception of God as corporeal (ST Ia, q. 2, a. 1). It is therefore not possible to be certain of the univocity of the meanings of the name “God” according to whether it is used by philosophers, apart from revelation, and by theologians or the faithful. Furthermore, even if one were to admit, with Anselm of Canterbury, that every human being can be convinced sola ratione, according to the simple necessity of reason, of the necessary reason for a summum omnium quae sunt (Monologion I), and can deduce its essence from this concept to the point that huic soli summae essentiae proprie nomen dei assignatur (ibid.), the fact remains that rational investigation has its limits, for God is not only, as quo maius cogitari nequit, the necessary subject of thought, he is also quiddam maius quam cogitari, going beyond all thought, all finite understanding (Proslogion).

For God to become the subject not only of revealed theology, but of a philosophy based on natural light, he must be reduced to a common denominator. Although he restricts knowledge of God to the doctrina sacra, Thomas Aquinas opens the way for a secularization by finding, beyond Neoplatonism, the equivalence between God and being. 1) Among the names of God, “who is” is for him, in preference to the others, the proper one (ST Ia, q.13, a. 11). 2) God is identified with his own nature (deity*) or essence (ST Ia, q. 3, a.3); “God is not only his own essence . . . but he is his own being (existence)” (CG I, 21; ST Ia, q. 3, a.4). 3) On the purely metaphysical level the difference between the ens primum and the ens commune is abolished (In Metaphysicorum, Prooemium). The confusion between the being of creatures and God’s being is only avoided by means of a theory of analogy, which retains the preeminence of the esse divinum. However, to raise oneself to this level, one must abandon the resolutions that belong to finiteness, and therefore experience the esse commune, which is not the esse divinum, but its closest term in the order of being. Even if theology is not reduced to ontology, it becomes inseparable from it.

4. God and Nature

a) God as the Basis of Scientific Knowledge. Modernity’s inaugural event is the reduction of nature to what is mathematically knowable. The philosophical problem of God is consequently asked in new terms, independently of all revealed theology when, after Descartes, metaphysics is defined as the foundation of physics.

In fact this methodological overturning has the following consequences for the God of the philosophers. 1) Natural knowledge of God is based directly on the idea of God, which is neither received from tradition nor derived from the experience of creatures, since this knowledge has the same rationality as mathematical ideas. 2) This methodological identity between the knowledge of God and the knowledge of nature makes it possible to base the certainty of the latter on the former, because the creative act establishes a dependency, acting as a guarantee, between God and the ideas of things. 3) This dependency implies the immeasurable-ness of the infinite from the finite, of God from nature as of God from the finite mind. Therefore, the properly Cartesian proof of God’s existence (Méditation III) takes its starting point not so much from the idea of God, “infinite, eternal, immutable, independent, all-knowing, all-powerful substance and through which myself, and all the other things which are . . . have been created and produced” (ibid., A-T, IX, 36), but from the fact that finite understanding can have an idea of him. If the idea of the infinite is the clearest and most distinct of all ideas (ibid.), that is the sign of the divine registration in human thought: it is precisely because the infinite is incommensurable with the finite that the mind must propose the Other, that which it is not, as the cause of the idea of God. The foundation of natural science is therefore not the “I think,” because thought’s turning back in itself does not reach the otherness of an object to be discovered, but God, for it is only his veracity*, linked to his perfection, that guarantees the idea’s relation to an object, to an essence (Méditation V), as it does to an existence (Méditation VI).

However, this dependency on the physical with regard to God, which is characteristic of the 17th-century philosophers, and which Pascal attacked specifically when he spoke of the “God of the philosophers [i.e., first of all the physicists] and of the scholars” (our emphasis), inversely reduces God’s role to its epistemological dimension, disregarding the living God. Modern vanity consists of wanting nature to be founded on the idea of a rational God. The God of the modern (meta)physicians opens the way to atheism. In fact, God’s metaphysical condition is ambiguous: rational knowledge of God is certainly indispensable with regard to primary philosophy, but it comes to its end in what it founds, which is secondary philosophy. This secondary philosophy, considered in its proper class, can also just as easily do without God.

b) The Need for God causa sui. Either physico-mathematical rationality develops its potentialities independently of any foundation; or, on the contrary, rational theology extends its sphere from the foundation up to the whole of the real and becomes an exclusively rational and totally ontotheological system (Spinoza). Understanding has freed itself from authority in the knowledge of nature by introducing into nature the principle of necessity; it should obtain the same result in its knowledge of God. The fundamental prejudice of theologians and of the majority of philosophers is the identification of power with indifference. Nature would thus be contingent with regard to God, although necessary with regard to us, as physics shows. Yet it is opposite that is true: our imaginations introduce contingency into nature, while the things that depend on the immutable power of God cannot be other than what they are because “God’s will cannot be other” (Ethics I, prop. 33, note 2). The only thought in conformity with reason is that “God does not produce his effects through free will” (Ethics, I, 32, cor. 1) but through the necessity of his nature (Ethics I, 16, 17). God’s causality is not the relation to an exteriority: he is the cause of finite beings by being the cause of himself; he does not relate to nature as if to something other than himself (Ethics I, 18). In short, it is impossible to associate the idea of God with the idea of transcendence. The relationship between cause and effect is internal to God’s necessity (as with the relation of naturizing nature to nature: Ethics I, 29), and it is only from this viewpoint that he can be said to be a free cause (Ethics I, 17, cor. 2). The radical equivocity between the God of reason and the God of the theologians leads to this conclusion: if one admits the latter, then the system founded on the former is undeniably atheism. If God is not a separate being, situated outside the being of nature, he has no being of his own. But one can just as well say that it is the traditional theological system that constitutes an atheism, because it does not know what it is talking about when using the name “God”: “Men professing openly to having no idea of God and not to know him except through created things (whose causes they are ignorant of), do not blush to accuse philosophers of atheism” (Gebhardt).

The Spinozist system considers in all its rigor what one cannot not think of God. The necessity of rationality unites with the very necessity of God. It follows that Spinoza has exhausted all that reason can say about God and that, as a result, any rational system ends necessarily with Spinozism, and thus with atheism. That is the conclusion which Jacobi draws from his examination of Lessing’s Spinozism, leading the problem of God into a dilemma—either rational atheism, or fideist theism—which also tolls the death knell of all theology, both rational and revealed, leaving to feeling and belief the privilege of a relation to the true and living God.

5. The End of the Metaphysical Concept of God

a) God as Idea. Kantian criticism of metaphysics confirms Jacobi’s analysis up to a point. On the one hand transcendental philosophy, which shows how the object is constituted a priori in the subject’s faculties for knowing, founds the science of nature without recourse to God. On the other hand transcendental dialectics throws light on the logical defect that undermines any rational attempt to pass from the concept of God to his reality (Critique of Pure Reason).

Kant does not deny the necessity of thinking about God as summum ens, ens realissimum, ens necessarium; but he challenges the transition from this necessity in the realm of thought to the affirmation of a thing outside the realm of thought, which would correspond to necessity. God is not a concept describing a real being such as one might experience. It is an idea, a rule that reason makes for itself in order to thematize its own tendency toward the unconditioned, “a true abyss of human reason” (Critique of Pure Reason, AA III). Nothing in the order of being—that is, in nature constituted by understanding—corresponds to God. The ideal of pure reason, the regulator in the theoretic domain, corresponds in the practical domain to a God called up by the rational demands of the should-be (Critique of Pure Reason, AA V). But this moral God, moral author of the world (Critique of Judgment, §86–88), universal imperans of the categorical imperative (Opus posthumum, AA XXII) is only within ourselves, a product of practical reason, “the ideal of a substance that we create for ourselves” (Opus posthumum, AA XXII). However, reason constituted as desire demands not only transcendence but also the representation of God, thanks to an analogical path that makes it possible not only to reach it, but to think about the relation between the supersensible term and our reason (Prolegomena to any Future Metaphysics, §5–59; Critique of Judgment, §90).

b) The Crisis of Metaphysics and the Death of God. The rift between philosophy and life, between reason and belief, between speculation and revelation, is the symptom of a crisis. How can reason be deprived of the absolute? How can the revealed God remain hidden to the faculty in human beings that understands? This crisis has its origins in the confrontation between modern rationality springing from the natural sciences, and traditional metaphysics. To the extent that the physico-mathematical, as the norm of all scientificity, defines the sphere of the knowable in terms of what is quantifiable, empirically verifiable, God cannot be the subject of knowledge. However, the extenuation of the concept of God—one of the aspects of what Nietzsche calls the death of God—is not due only to the epistemological hegemony of measurable nature or to man’s emancipation with regard to all transcendent authority, it is the result of a confusion proper to metaphysics itself. In fact metaphysics has constituted itself in such a way that the name of “God” has reached the point of covering what Aristotle called “being as being”; in other words, this name has been changed from the truth of being in its totality. As such, he is ruled by necessity: necessity of thought—he is the one that one cannot not think about—and necessity of being—he is the one who is necessarily such as he is, eternal and immutable (see Metaphysics, L.7, 1070b 10). The 19th century gives this subject of necessity another name: humanity (A. Comte), the Great Being, the being par excellence, for whom the whole of being is knowable through science, transformable through technique, and that manifests itself to itself in the process of history. The death of God is the moment of transition during which man discovers that the founder's position is vacant, but has not yet understood that he must occupy it himself, by becoming the subject in God's place.

c) God, the System, and Reaching Beyond Metaphysics. The equivocity that has undermined the concept of God since the encounter between Greek philosophy and monotheistic revelation derives from the fact that the same name is used to refer to the absolute subject and the Holy One of the Scriptures. The point of divergence of the two traditions is creation, which assumes the radical inequality of the created and the Creator; for reason, the break in the continuity of causality is a contradiction. That is why the article of faith encompasses the essential of revelation; revelation thus remains, in the main, incomprehensible, and therefore hidden. But does not the admission of a hidden God amount to a refusal to welcome the fullness of revelation? God as such is not thinkable unless the rational absolute and the revealed mystery are not reconciled in a dualist juxtaposition, but totally identified. The high point of metaphysics is where the concept of God is blended with God. Such is Hegel's speculative logic: the creative contradiction is the movement of the concept.

God not only manifested himself, he is the manifestation itself; in the act of creation, he moves out of himself in order to manifest himself. He is therefore, as Creator, what he is as God. Creation is consubstantial with him as both act and result (Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion). Similarly, the logical concept is the gesture of placing oneself in finitude and, by this self-differentiation, of maintaining an infinite relation with oneself. Creating is identically the act of God and the act of the absolute Idea (Enc. §163). Contrary to the logic of understanding, which determines spiritual contents as external objects identified with their predicates, speculation understands God's determinations internally, as its own. By identifying itself with the God of revelation, the God of philosophy is no longer the being abstractly opposed to the void, he is the movement by which being finds its meaning, finds itself—by denying itself; in short, he is the Spirit (Enc. §384).

Comprehension of God can be interpreted indiscriminately as the sanctification of philosophy (making it a form of divine service), or as the dissolution of the divine in the human. This time it is not only reason but revelation itself that seems to lead back to man: God has delivered himself entirely, and in his manifestation there is no remainder. It follows, after Hegel, that God cannot return in philosophy except in the background (see Heidegger, Beiträge). If all God's names have been exhausted in the history of metaphysics, the end of metaphysics, and therefore of its theology, opens up the possibility of thinking—but is it still a question of thinking?—about the one that Schelling, the first thinker of this goal, evokes as the Unvordenklich, the one who can only be thought about in advance.

- É. Gilson (1941), God and Philosophy, New Haven and London.
- W. Schulz (1957), Der Gott der neuzeitlichen Metaphysik, Pfullingen.
- D. Henrich (1960), Der ontologische Gottesbeweis, Tübingen.
- C. Bruaire (1964), L'affirmation de Dieu, Paris.
- J. Moreau (1969), Le Dieu des philosophes, Paris.
- Col. (1970), Dieu et l'être, Paris.
- W. Weischedel (1972), Der Gott der Philosophen, 2nd Ed., Darmstadt.
- B. Welte (1973), "Versuch zur Frage nach Gott", in J. Ratzinger (Ed.), Die Frage nach Gott, QD 56, 13–26.
- W. Brugger (1979), Summe einer philosophischen Gotteslehre, Munich.
- É. Gilson (1979), L'athéisme difficile, Paris.
- A. Kenny (1979), The God of Philosophers, Oxford.
- R. Kearney and J.S. O'Leary (Eds.) (1980), Heidegger et la question de Dieu, Paris.
- J.-L. Marion (1982), Dieu sans l'être, Paris.
- J. Greisch (Ed.) (1985), Dieu, Paris.
- D. Dubarle (1986), Dieu avec l'être, Paris.
- W. Röd (1992), Der Gott der reinen Vernunft, Munich.

YVES-JEAN HARDER

See also Being; Heidegger, Martin; Love; Nothingness; Philosophy; Reason; Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von

Good

Theological reflection on the nature of good represents the confluence of two distinguishable streams of thought, one deriving from the Bible*, the other from philosophical traditions. By far the greatest philosophical influence has come from Greek speculation, particularly that of Plato, Aristotle, the Stoics, and the Neoplatonists. From the patristic period until the Reformation, Greek philosophy* formed a generally recognized frame of reference and was used in thinking about the idea of good contained in revelation* and dogma*. The Greek framework remains influential, owing in part to the importance for Catholicism* of Thomas* Aquinas's synthesis, and in part to the continued and, today, particularly strong interest in ancient and medieval philosophy.

The predominant features of the Greek framework are its metaphysical account of good in general (bonum in commune), and the idea of the importance of the metaphysical and psychological foundations of specifically human or moral goodness. The latter feature explains the eudemonistic structure of the ethical theories associated with this tradition, and the centrality of the concepts of virtue* and right reason*. Within this broad theoretical framework, Christian thinkers debated the nature of divine goodness, divine law*, evil*, sin*, grace*, and the beatific vision*. Modern philosophical accounts of good have been less amenable to broad systematic development and adaptation to theological purposes. For that reason, none has achieved the sort of hegemony in theological discussion of good that Greek speculation has.

1. Good in General

Classical thought provides two models for understanding the nature of good, both of which postulate a necessary connection between good (agathon, bonum) and fundamental reality or being* (einai/to on, esse/ens). Each model is found in Christian thinkers.

a) Participation. In the first model, Plato and others pointed to a dependence of being on good. In The Republic (508 b–509 b), Plato asserts that the form of Good, that which is good in itself (agathon kath' auton), is the source not only of everything that is good, but also of all the other Forms, and hence of all being. All other realities have their being and their goodness by virtue of participating in that Form. In the Timaeus (29 e–30 b), Plato suggests that this account of the metaphysical priority of goodness could be developed into a theory explaining the origin of the universe. The Neoplatonists developed this idea into a full-fledged cosmology involving the emanation of all things from the Good and their return to it.

Many early Christian thinkers found this cosmological view congenial. They found it natural to identify the Christian God* with the Good and, while recognizing the incompatibility of the doctrine of creation* with Neoplatonist emanationism, they were able nevertheless to accommodate the notion of participation within the doctrine of creation. For Christian Platonists such as Augustine* and Boethius*, this idea meant that the created being necessarily depends on God, who is the Good; as for the goodness of created things, that arose from their participation in—their being derived from—that which is good in itself. In the third of his theological treatises (Quomodo substantiae, c. 140–50), Boethius uses the language of emanationism: created things are good in virtue of their having “flowed from” (fluxit ab) God, the Substantial Good. In De divinis nominibus (IV, 693 b–700 c, 705 c–708 b), Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite characterizes Good as essentially diffusive of itself, by its very nature pouring itself out into creation. This outpouring of the divine nature results in a hierarchy of created beings that participate in the divine goodness to various extents.

These ideas about participation led in the direction of an explicitly theological and relational conception of good: God is the first and highest good, and all created good is good in virtue of a certain relation—participation—to good in itself.

b) Natural Teleology. The second model links the notion of good with the notion of an end. A natural substance is constituted by a substantial form or nature, by virtue of which the substance possesses a capacity for performing the activity or function characteristic of substances belonging to that species. The end, completion, or perfection of a natural substance is its having fully actualized its capacity, its performing the activity for which its form or nature provides the capacity. Since the state or activity that constitutes a substance's full actuality is that substance's end, and since the end is good, that state or activity constitutes the substance's good. On this account, good for a substance of a given nature is the end determined by its nature, the fact of its being fully actual as a thing of that nature. One does not arrive, in this case, at an essentially theological or relational conception of good: the goodness of a thing consists in the actualization of a nature, and the state that results from it is intrinsic to the thing itself.

The natural-teleology account has extremely influential proponents in Augustine and Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas in particular developed its Aristotelian underpinnings in elaborate detail. The rational soul*, for example, is a human being's substantial form (its first actuality or actus primus) and gives to that human being the complex set of faculties and capacities (powers, potentiae) grouped together under the heading "reason" (ST Ia, q. 95, a. 1). These "powers" are disposed for the relevant activity (operatio) or final activity (actus ultimus) by certain settled dispositions (habitus), which are the intellectual and moral virtues. The activity characteristic of human beings as such is living in accordance with reason. Aquinas, then, identifies good with actuality or being, claiming that good for a given substance is that substance's actualization of its specifying potentialities. A thing is good to the extent that it has actualized the potentialities specific to its species.

Despite their differences, the participation and natural-teleology approaches are not necessarily incompatible, and philosophical theologians such as Augustine and Aquinas have held them together. They thought of natural teleology as specifying or explaining what it is for a created thing to participate in the divine goodness. Each created thing's nature is a limited and partial representation of God, and a created thing participates more fully in the divine nature to the extent to which it realizes or actualizes its constitutive potentialities.

c) The Hierarchy of Goods and the Highest Good.

Both these accounts of good imply a hierarchy among the constituents of reality. On the participation account, a thing is more or less good to the extent to which it participates in, or in some way represents, good. In accordance with the metaphor of "emanation," things that participate to a greater degree in good are "nearer" to it and things that participate less are "farther" from it. The highest good (summum bonum), the reality at the top of the hierarchy of goods, is that that possesses in its own unified nature all the perfections represented in fragmented and diminished ways in the variety of particular goods. According to Anselm*, we can identify pure perfections by finding those attributes that it is unqualifiedly better to possess than not to possess. The supreme nature must possess every pure perfection (Monologion, 15).

The natural-teleology account defines a hierarchy of goods in terms of degrees of actuality. Different substances belonging to the same species possess more or less actuality depending on the extent to which they have actualized their specifying potentialities. Moreover, substantial forms (the first actualities, in virtue of which things are the kinds of things they are) vary in their degrees of actuality insofar as they constitute kinds whose activities are more or less rich, full, and complex. It is from this perspective that one can understand Augustine's famous hierarchy, which rises from inanimate beings by way of living beings to beings endowed with reason. The activity characterizing each level of being includes the activity of lower levels of being: human beings exist (as stones do) and live (as plants and animals* do), but they also understand (as neither stones nor animals do). The highest good in the hierarchy is God, who not only exists, lives, and understands, but is Truth* itself, the eternal and immutable measure and source of all understanding. Augustine's hierarchy, therefore, is a ranking of things both according to their goodness and according to their degree of being. The supreme good, Augustine argues, is also the Supreme Being, the God whose name is "He who is" (Lib. arb. II, 3–16). In similar fashion, Aquinas describes the summum bonum as pure and complete actuality (actus purus) and as being itself (ipsum esse) (Ia, q. 3, q. 4, a. 2).

d) The Universality and Transcendentality of Goodness, and the Nonreality of Evil.

It is a consequence of both the participation account and the natural-teleology account that everything that has being is good. A thing is good either in virtue of participating in that which is good in itself—that is, in God—and everything that exists participates in him; or it is good in virtue of actualizing its nature, and everything that exists is in actuality to some extent. Christian philosophers and theologians were intrigued by the universality thesis not only because of the support that it received from respected authorities, but also because it was confirmed by the Bible, for example in Genesis 1:31—"And God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good"—or 1 Timothy 4:4—"For everything created by God is good."

The medieval doctrine of the transcendentals is closely related to the universality thesis. Beginning in the early 13th century (see Philippe le Chancelier, †1236, Alexandre de Halès c. 1186–1245, Albert* the Great, Bonaventure*, and Aquinas), this idea was discussed as part of a larger doctrine that holds that being (ens), the one (unum), and the true (verum), in addition to good (bonum), transcend the Aristotelian categories. While the ten categories identify ten irreducible ways of being, being transcends the categorical structure of the world. Anything that is ontologically classifiable is a being, and to say of anything that it is a being is not to identify it as a member of some kind distinct from other kinds of things. According to the classical doctrine, being is the primary transcendental, and other properties are transcendental because the ontological ground of their application to a given thing is the same as the ontological ground in virtue of which that thing can be called a being. In the case of good, for example, the actualities in virtue of which a thing is good are precisely those in virtue of which it has being. Transcendental terms are convertible, or the same in reality (idem secundum rem). They are not synonymous, however, since they are conceptually distinct (differunt secundum rationem).

If goodness is a transcendental, and therefore universal, feature of reality, evil cannot be a reality. In Book Seven of the Confessions, Augustine explains how this idea was the cornerstone of his intellectual reconciliation to Christianity. Augustine had returned to Manichean dualism because it offered a clear explanation of the existence of evil: just as good things have flowed from that which is good in itself, evils have flowed from that which is evil in itself—a highest evil opposed to the highest good. His reading of the Platonists, however, convinced him that evil is not a nature or substance, but a corruption or privation. If evil is corruption, it must be corruption of something that is good in some way and to some extent: what has no good cannot be corrupted. Moreover, there cannot be anything that is pure corruption or privation, and so there can be no pure or highest evil opposed to the highest good, as the Manicheans supposed. All substances are good to some extent and, as goods, all flow from God, the highest good.

2. Human Good

a) Happiness. The metaphysics of good inherited from classical Greece provided grounds for a eudemonistic account of the human good: the human good is the state or activity in which complete actuality as a human being consists. Following the ancient tradition, thinkers in the Middle Ages called this state “happiness” (felicitas) or, with a theological nuance, beatitude* (beatitudo). Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics, which, after its full recovery in the early 13th century, exercised enormous influence over reflection on good, presents two apparently conflicting accounts of the activity constitutive of happiness. The account in the early books of the Ethics suggests that eudaimonia consists in an active life lived in accordance with practical wisdom*, whereas the account in Book Ten suggests that it is to be found in the activity of contemplation*, which is characteristic of the gods. Each of these accounts has attracted Christian thinkers, the former providing a model for the active life of service to others, the latter providing a model for the life of prayer* and contemplation.

However, from the Christian perspective, Aristotle provides at most an account of imperfect or merely human happiness. For Christianity, the ultimate end of human life is supernatural union with God, a state unattainable in this life. The ultimate good for human beings—perfect happiness—is therefore beyond this world, and beyond the natural capabilities of human beings. According to some theologians, special revelation is necessary in order for human beings to come to know what their supernatural ultimate end is, and special divine aid (grace) is necessary for attaining it.

b) Virtue, Right Action, Right Reason. According to the Greek tradition, the specifically human capacities (those possessed by virtue of having a rational soul, in particular, intellect and will) require certain habits (habitus) that dispose them toward their complete actuality. These habits are the intellectual and moral virtues, and they dispose a human being toward the performance of the activities in which human perfection consists. The acquisition and exercise of the virtues, then, is an integral part of attaining happiness. In addition to the traditional cardinal virtues that dispose human beings with respect to purely natural, imperfect beatitude, Christianity has held that there are certain theological virtues—faith*, hope*, and charity (love*)—that dispose human beings toward their supernatural end. Moreover, the notion of grace gives rise to the notion of infused virtues: these are not only theological virtues, but also moral virtues, which are needed to incline human beings toward their supernatural end, and which are infused by grace rather than acquired through moral effort.

Later medieval philosophers applied their metaphysics of goodness not only to agents but also to human actions*. Actions can be viewed as realities or beings, and they can be judged good to the extent to which they possess all the attributes (actualities) that they ought to possess. Since any human action is an entity—a reality—just in virtue of being an action, it possesses goodness to some extent (natural goodness), but it may also possess generic moral goodness, specific moral goodness, or gratuitous goodness, provided that certain other conditions are satisfied. Provided the act (for example, the giving of alms) has an appropriate object (a person in need), the act has generic moral goodness: that is, it satisfies the most basic of several conditions necessary for the action's being purely and simply good. It has specific moral goodness if it is done for an appropriate end, in an appropriate way, and in appropriate circumstances. Finally, an action possesses gratuitous or meritorious goodness if it is performed out of charity.

Since the determination of the conditions of a good action is a matter for reason, these conditions were often summarized by saying that a good action must be in accordance with right reason. On the model of Aristotelian deduction, practical reasoning came to be viewed as starting from self-evident principles and progressing deductively to more determinate principles, and to applications of those principles in particular circumstances. The body of practical principles, whether self-evident (either to all people or only to the learned) or derived from such principles, is the body of natural law*.

c) Law and Divine Commands. For Augustine and Aquinas, the notion of law is closely connected with that of reason. Augustine identifies what he calls the eternal law as the source of all that is just and right in the laws that human beings develop to govern their temporal affairs, and he calls the eternal laws “the highest reason” (Lib. arb. I, 6–8). Developing these ideas of Augustine's, Aquinas holds that law is essentially an expression of reason. The eternal law, to which we have partial access through reason and revelation, is an expression of divine reason. The part of the eternal law to which we have access through reason is the natural law (Ia IIae, q. 90–94). Kant* falls squarely within this tradition that connects law with reason. For Kant, pure practical reason is the giver of the moral law. The rational will's dignity and autonomy consists in its being subject only to its own legislation (Grundlegung 1).

All Christian thinkers have recognized the existence of divinely revealed laws and precepts*, paradigms of which are found in the Decalogue*. However, contrary to some caricatures, very few have unequivocally endorsed a “divine command” theory of rightness and wrongness. Such a theory holds that the moral value of any act consists solely in its being approved or disapproved, commanded or forbidden, by God. Aquinas claims that only commands that issue from reason can have the force of law. Some thinkers, however, such as John Duns* Scotus or William Ockham (c. 1285–1347), clearly distinguish between positive and natural moral law. They claim that, in the case of divine positive moral law, the rightness of the acts commanded consists solely in their being commanded by God, and they take the prohibition of adultery and theft, for example, as falling within this category. Accordingly, these acts are morally wrong because God has prohibited them, and would be right if God enjoined them. Scotus and Ockham maintain, by contrast, that natural moral laws command or forbid actions the rightness of which is independent of the divine will. According to Ockham, not even God can alter the moral value of acts that depend on these laws, because that would involve a contradiction.

The view that God's commands or God's will fundamentally determine what is good or right represents a kind of theological subjectivism. This position prima facie appears to preserve God's independence and sovereignty by making God the creator of value, but the greater part of the Christian tradition has joined Augustine and Aquinas in eschewing it, preferring to think of the divine reason rather than the divine will as the ground of value.

3. The Philosophy of Good after the Reformation

In the modern period, philosophical reflection on the nature of good has generally led away from the idea that goodness supervenes on being. The most radical alternative is that presented by subjectivism. David Hume (1711–76), for example, argues that value is not an objective property: a thing's having value consists solely in its being valued by some agent. Value is something that agents impose on the world, not something they discover in the world. Christian thinkers have for the most part found subjectivist accounts unattractive.

The deontological tradition deriving from Kant leads away from the traditional idea of good in a different direction. Kant argues that the only thing that is unconditionally good is the good will, the will that is manifest in acting for the sake of duty. Kant conceives of duty as an imperative that is imposed on us by the universal moral law. His account therefore places the notions of duty and law at the center of moral philosophy, and philosophers who follow Kant in this respect begin not from an account of good, but from an account of justice*.

Finally, modern consequentialism is similar in structure to the tradition stemming from Greek thought: both provide what we might call a metaphysical account of good, and hold that morality has to do with promoting, maximizing, or bringing about good. The hedonistic utilitarianism* of John Stuart Mill (1806–73) exemplifies this view. According to Mill, the only thing intrinsically good is pleasure. All other goods are good, and actions are morally right, only insofar as they promote pleasure. Mill's utilitarianism is a monistic account of good insofar as it holds that only a single thing—pleasure—is intrinsically good. Many consequentialist accounts, however, are pluralistic, identifying more than one intrinsic good. G. E. Moore (1873–1958), for example, held that personal affection, aesthetic enjoyment, and knowledge are among the things that have intrinsic value (1903).

- Anselm, Monologion, in M. Corbin (Ed.), L'œuvre de S. Anselme de Cantorbéry, vol. I, 1986.
- Augustine, Confessions, BAUG 13–14; De libero arbitrio, BAUG 6, 155–529; De natura boni, BAUG 1, 437–509.
- Boethius, Tractatus and De consolatione philosophiae, LCL no. 74, 1973.
- D. Hume, A Treatise of Human Nature, I. II., 1740, London.
- E. Kant, Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten, A. A. 4, Berlin, 1910.

- J. S. Mill, Utilitarianism, London, 1863.
- G. E. Moore, Principia Ethica, Cambridge, 1903.
- Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, PG 3, 585–996, ch. 4.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 5, 6, 49; Ia IIae, q. 18–21; De veritate, q. 21.
- W. D. Ross (1930), The Right and the Good, Oxford.
- O. Lottin (1942, new edition 1960), Psychologie et morale aux XIIIe et XIVe siècles, Gembloux.
- G. H. von Wright (1963), The Varieties of Goodness, London.
- S. MacDonald (1991), Being and Goodness: The Concept of the Good in Metaphysics and Philosophical Theology, Ithaca, NY.
- L. Becker (1992), A History of Western Ethics, New York.
- R. M. Chisholm (1996), “Bien et mal,” DEPhM, 150–154.

SCOTT MACDONALD

See also Aristotelianism; Conscience; Ethics; Manicheanism; Platonism; Stoicism

Gospels

Following contemporary usage, the word “gospel,” derived from the Greek eu-aggelion in the singular, means the declaration or the message of the “good news” of salvation* in Jesus Christ. In the plural form, it is generally used to refer to the four Gospels regarded as canonical—that is, accepted by the churches* according to the rule (Greek kanon, anglicized as “canon*”) of faith*. These four Gospels are arranged in the order Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, but this has no chronological significance, and the order has changed from time to time and from place to place. John’s Gospel, for example, has sometimes been put at the head of the list; the sequence Matthew, John, Luke, Mark is also found. Other gospels, referred to as apocryphal, are known in addition: they include the Gospel of Peter, of which no more than a fragment has been preserved, and several sections of the Gospel of the Hebrews, which was used by some Jewish Christians. Finally, still other gospels, originating at later dates, were circulated in gnostic circles, including the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of Philip, which were recently rediscovered at Nag Hammadi in Egypt.

The canonical Gospels, gradually designated as such over the course of the second and third centuries, were circulated initially in the form of anonymous writings before they acquired titles and were ascribed authors. The Gospels “according to Matthew” and “according to John” were given the names of two of the apostles*; then the other two evangelists were named in the titles of the Gospels “according to Mark” and “according to Luke.” These attributions were made at a very early stage, during the lifetime of Papias, who was Bishop of Hierapolis in the early second century. They have every appearance of being historically authentic, even though it remains necessary to keep a distance between the Greek scripture of the Gospel known as Matthew, and the Semitic tradition* related to this Galilean apostle. It is also very likely that there was a considerable lapse of time between the earliest oral traditions gathered from among the followers of the apostle John and the definitive compilation of the Gospel that bears his name. With that said, it is difficult to date any of the Gospels with certainty. However, in line with the earliest approximations, and following the mainstream exegetical consensus—while not denying that discussions continue on this subject—we can specify that: 1) Mark’s Gospel was written in Greek around the year 70, and, according to Irenaeus*, probably in Rome* after the death of Peter* (Adversus Haereses III, 1. 2); 2) Matthew’s was written around 80–85 in Antioch; 3) Luke’s was written around the same time, perhaps in Greece; and

4) John's was written around 95, probably in Ephesus in Asia Minor. All four gospels, like the rest of the New Testament, were written in Greek, though some of them may have been partly based on now-lost sources in Aramaic.

It should be mentioned that one of the oldest-known fragments of any of the Gospels, known as Rylands Papyrus 52, is from John's Gospel, and was written during the first half of the second century, barely a few decades after the text was probably first written down. In fact, we no longer possess the original forms of any New Testament texts. But numerous items of evidence in manuscript form allow us to work out the first states of these lost originals with some certainty, as is the case with some 108 fragments on papyrus, ranging from the second century to the fourth, and around 274 manuscripts in uncial (majuscule) Greek text from the fourth to ninth centuries, not to mention the very old versions in Latin and Syriac (eastern Aramaic). Of course, there is a relatively large number of variant readings among these manuscripts, but they are often of secondary importance. The main variations are indicated in critical editions of the New Testament—such as K. Aland and Bruce M. Metzger's The Greek New Testament (1983)—and are also mentioned in the notes attached to many of the various translations of the Gospels. Nevertheless, specialists in textual criticism have achieved some reliable reconstructions of the various states of the Gospel texts as they were transmitted in the churches in the second century and after, and have demonstrated the faithfulness of the tradition and transmission of the four Gospels.

It was somewhat later that Irenaeus (martyred in around 202) compared the Gospels to the four rivers of Paradise (Gn 2:10–14) and the four living beings who support God's throne (Ez 1:5–14 and Rev 4:6ff.). The iconographic symbols associated with each evangelist, and hence with each Gospel, are derived from this assimilation, by way of Jerome (the man for Matthew, the lion for Mark, the ox for Luke, and the eagle for John).

I. The Earliest Christian Discourse

The gospel—the proclamation of the Good News—was initially expressed in the register of speech, and therefore of orality, before it found written expression in the four Gospels, which were composed in the broad context of the destruction of the Temple* in Jerusalem* and its aftermath, between the year 70 and the end of the first century. The gospel tradition remained an oral one in Paul's time (between around 51 and 58). Various words are used to refer to this initial spreading of the word, notably proclaim and proclamation, witness and evidence, evangelize and gospel.

1. Three Modalities of the Word

The terms “to proclaim” (kerussein), “to witness” (marturein), “to evangelize” (euaggelizomai) evoke the idea of a word* of salvation, proclaimed with sovereign authority by one who does not himself claim to be its author, for its principle is God*, Jesus*, or his Spirit. Such words of revelation* are spoken in the name* of God, in the manner of the ancient prophets* of Israel*. In this way, they are to be distinguished from simple speech (lalein or legein), and even from the giving of instruction about God or Christ* (didaskhein). Later, however, the ministers established within the churches as successors to the apostles and the first Christian prophets preferred to use the vocabulary of instruction, or tended to assimilate to one another the verbs just cited. Even so, each of these verbs retained its own nuances within the framework of classical rhetoric, the “deliberative” or “persuasive” type being related to proclamation (kerugma), the “judicial” type to witness (marturion), and the “demonstrative” or scholarly type to instruction (didache), in which the speaker is located objectively, as if at a distance from the words being spoken. We shall examine each of these three modalities in turn.

a) To Proclaim. A kerygma, or proclamation, is a speech delivered in a loud voice, in public, and in the name of an authority* to which it refers. Through the mouth of a herald (kerux), a proclamation announced the holding of games and religious festivals. In aretalogies (collections of narratives* about miracles* and other claims to glory), or within the framework of mystery cults*, proclamations were concerned with the powerful workings of various divine beings. This pagan context probably led the compilers of the Septuagint to limit their use of the word (it appears there only 33 times, including in Genesis 41:43; see ancient translations* of the Bible). However, the verb kerussein (“to proclaim”) was adopted in translating several prophetic texts that were to play major roles in Christian reinterpretation—notably Isaiah 61:1, Zephaniah 3:14, and Zechariah 9:9, where the word is related to themes of liberation and salvation.

The verb is used frequently in the New Testament (nearly 61 times), other than in the Johannine* tradition, to mean not simply preaching*, but also a performative speech that effects salvation by proclaiming it. Like prophetic speech, it is already an act of God. Thus, Jesus proclaims the coming of the kingdom, and brings it about (Mt 4:17; Mk 1:38–39). The disciples proclaim it in their turn (Mk 3:14 and 13:10). In the Pauline* writings in particular, such proclamations are directly related to the theme of the cross of the Risen One (1 Cor 1:23: “We preach Christ crucified”); and the Apostle proclaims “the word of faith” (Rom 10:8). However, just as, according to Greek custom, a herald was to be honored by all, so the kerux of such a proclamation appeared as his image inverted.

b) To Evangelize. Evangelizing, in the sense of announcing the “good news,” was also a matter of using the register of performative speech, but in this case the content of the speech is more directly in consideration. The gospel is the Good News of a salvation that affects both the present, in all its novelty, and the future last days. It is the performative speech of a confession of faith (Rom 1:16); it has to do with a mission, and tends toward fulfillment (Mk 13:10). Here, too, there is a significant difference from the way the same verb was used in the Hellenistic world, where it connoted only the idea of destiny or good fortune, while the noun euaggelion simply evoked the idea of a reward or victory. In the later context of the worship of emperors, it was sometimes adopted to refer to the “good news” of the birth or enthronement of an emperor.

In the Hebrew Scriptures, the verb basar, meaning to announce the joyful news of a victory (2 Sm 4:10), had already become important. It is sometimes linked to the theme of salvation (Ps 96:2 and Is 40:2, 52:7, and 61:1). However, the Greek equivalent of this verb was rarely used by the compilers of the Septuagint, while the noun euaggelion was little known, or unknown, in Hebrew as in Greek. Nevertheless, the following version of a passage from Isaiah has been found at Qumran: “so that [the Master of Justice] announces the good news in the time of your goodness, evangelizing the humble according to the abundance of your mercy” (1QH XVIII, 14; cf. Lk 4:18).

Verb and noun alike then became very important in the Pauline writings (where they are used 60 times) and in the churches that were influenced by them, as well as in the writings ascribed to Luke (Luke’s Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles). The Johannine tradition does not use either word, although the theme of witness plays a major role in it.

c) To Witness. Witness was understood as an aspect of the “judicial” type of rhetoric, within a situation of conflict in which the discourse of salvation is given confirmation by authentic testimony. In this case, both the verb (marturein) and the noun were used widely across the Hellenistic world. They both appear in the Septuagint (Is 43:9–12), and both John and Luke use them frequently. This insistence on the notion of reliable testimony, evident in the statements of those who witnessed the events of salvation (Acts 1:8 and 1:22), may be explained by reference to the need to stand the test of time and the challenge of the persecutions, during which some went so far as to give their lives to support their testimony (Rev 2:13)—hence the current meaning of the word “martyr*.”

2. Paul’s Gospel and Mark’s Writings

In the Pauline writings, which were composed between around A.D. 51 and 58, euaggelion is not used to refer to any written text, but evokes all the force of a speech that effects salvation: “The Gospel is the power of God for salvation to everyone who has faith. . . . For in it is the righteousness of God” (Rom 1:16–17). In the Pauline writings, “righteousness” refers to the salvific action* of God, who pervades this speech, and acts through his very proclamation. Henceforth, Christ—and, therefore, the speech that proclaims him—is the only power of salvation, replacing the law* of Moses. Every part of that law retains the whole of its value as revelation, but it is now to be taken in relation to the new gospel as the promise* that points to its own fulfillment in Christ.

The earliest groups of Christians displayed a variety of opinions on this very question of the Mosaic Law. Some Jews who had become Christians sought to maintain the Law in its integrity, while the apostle to the nations insisted on the radically new nature of faith in Jesus Christ, which is offered to all believers, whether Jewish or not, and is effectively transmitted by his gospel (Rom 2:16 and Gal 1:7). This gospel openly confesses the cross of the Risen One as the principle of salvation. Paul proclaims it without even making use of the narratives or discourses that would later become the basis for the texts of the canonical Gospels. He was undoubtedly aware of these evangelical traditions, but he makes practically no reference to them, other than the narrative of the Last Supper (1 Cor 11:23ff.). Rather than reciting the words and acts of Jesus, Paul recreates their internal meaning—in his own terms, he “imitates” the Lord. Paul’s gospel, then, is the proclamation of salvation through the cross of the Lord of Sacrifice. Occasionally, Paul even seems to minimize the importance of one of the other ways of gaining knowledge* of Jesus, “from a human point of view” (2 Cor 5:16).

The Apostle, of course, gives all his attention to the cross of the Lord who lives forever, but the prolonged existence of the church, and the political upheavals that accompanied the Jewish uprising in the years 66–73, posed a direct threat to the memory of Jesus’ acts—it was no longer sufficient merely to allude to them, as in the Pauline corpus. It therefore became necessary to gather together in written form the various traditions of the churches in Jerusalem, Antioch, and elsewhere, in order to safeguard the tradition as a whole. It was probably in the wake of various earlier attempts (evoked in Lk 1:1–4), that the first of the narrative ensembles now known as “Gospels” (Mk 1:1) was written down, and it was probably Mark’s. It stands midway between a proclamation of faith, in the Pauline manner, and a new type of presentation of the story of Jesus, transmitting his life and his words into the present within a didactic framework. Next, Matthew placed greater emphasis on Jesus’ words, while Luke, an historian, brought to his compilation a style of presentation that made it more like a biography. As for John, he adopted an entirely different style of presentation, which is both precise and symbolic, being centered on the interior life of Jesus and of the one whom the Gospel calls the “disciple whom Jesus loved” (Jn 21:7).

II. Forms and Functions of Evangelical Writings

Mark’s narrative was innovative in its comprehensive representation of Jesus, but its richness was drawn from a variety of sources. A critical reading of the four Gospels allows us to distinguish, even now, the specific features of these elements of the tradition, as Martin Dibelius and Rudolf Bultmann*, in particular, demonstrated in the first half of the 20th century. Here, we may cite only a few of the main elements, which were initially transmitted orally within the Christian communities before they were partially put into written form. Each of the evangelists made his own use of this heritage, in line with his own christological and missionary purposes.

1. Main Literary Forms

To begin with, the gospel was a confession of faith, a brief formulation of the kerygma (proclamation) of a Christian community, and presented in response to its needs. Traces of such confessions of faith are particularly evident in the Pauline writings (1 Cor 15:1–8), but they also appear in the Gospels (see Mk 15:39, Jn 20:28, etc.). Similarly, one also finds elements of blessings* (Mk 11:9–10) and even of ancient Judeo-Christian hymns, applied to Mary* or Zechariah (Lk 1:46–55 and 1:68–79), as well as elements of doxologies (Lk 2:14). However, the main materials of the Gospels may be classified as narratives or discourses.

a) Narratives. The Gospels contain several types of narrative. The narrative of Christ’s passion* is the only one that follows a sustained chronological sequence

(such as laid out in Mk 14:1–16:8). Other narratives, initially transmitted in isolation from each other in the oral traditions of the Christian communities, include: apothegms in which a statement (Greek, logion) made by Jesus is inserted into a small-scale narrative framework (Mk 10:13–16); accounts of controversies or polemics (Mk 3:1–6); tales of miracles (Mk 1:29ff.) or exorcism* (Mk 5:1–20), in which the emphasis is placed on Jesus’ salvific action and his struggle against the forces of evil*, and that are aimed at the active proclamation of the coming of God’s kingdom; narratives with a biographical or christological focus (Mk 1:9ff and 9:2–10); popular legends (Mk 6:17–28); and, finally, accounts of the appearance of the Risen One (Mt 28 and Lk 24). There are also accounts of Christ’s childhood, which were written at a later period (Mt 1–2 and Lk 1–2).

b) Discourses. The discourses are assemblages of the Lord’s remarks (logia) put together according to the theme that they share. As examples are five discourses found in Matthew’s Gospel: the Sermon on the Mount, which is a program for the evangelical life (Mt 5–7); the discourse on the mission*, which provides rules for the apostles whom Jesus has sent out (Mt 10); the discourse, in the form of parables*, on the kingdom of God (Mt 13); the discourse on communal life (Mt 18); and the eschatological discourse on the destruction of the Temple and the last days (Mt 24–25). These discourses are paralleled in Mark and Luke, although on a smaller scale.

2. Early Narrative Assemblages

It has also been recognized that, in addition to the groups of logia just discussed, the Gospels contain narrative assemblages, such as, in Mark’s Gospel, a group of controversies (Mk 2:1–3:6), a group of miracles (Mk 4:35–5:43), and a group of apothegms or “nested remarks” within a narrative (Mk 10:1–31). Some of these assemblages, which made things easier for those Christians who first preached on given subjects, must have been put into writing at a very early stage, and the literary style of each of the evangelists remains recognizable. Such a procedure would not have been at all astonishing in the culture of that time. The historians of the ancient Greek world, for example, arranged their materials topic by topic, depending on the subject, without any great concern for the chronology of events. In other words, writers and readers alike knew in advance that the placing of an evangelical statement or narrative within a work of literature did not in itself say or imply anything conclusive about its precise historical placing within the ministry* of Jesus.

3. The Four Gospel Narratives

Mark was the first to organize these isolated traditions, these blocks of narratives and discourses collected in the various communities, into a narrative ensemble that progresses from Christ's baptism* to his passion. Thus, he drew from the tradition the large-scale biographical portrait that is glimpsed in Acts 1:22 and in Peter's speech at Joppa (Acts 10:37–43). Matthew and Luke then worked from Mark's text, correcting it, reorganizing it, and manipulating it with the aid of new materials. The Johannine tradition is much more independent. In every sense, each of the evangelists provides a synthesis of everything that goes to make a life, within the framework of his own particular Gospel. Each of them gathered memories of the Lord from those who survived him, and summarized the confession of faith of his own community, as well as the rules that should be observed in dealing with the faithful or their enemies, without overlooking the rituals of baptism and communal dining that structured his community. We shall now say a little about the way in which each book* is structured.

a) Mark. The evangelist known as Mark presents a discourse that has a proclamatory or confessional finality, within the framework of a sequential narrative that takes us from the baptism to the cross. Mark's introduction describes the baptism of Jesus by John the Baptist (Mk 1:1–13). The figure of Jesus, who is presented as the Son of the God in the strongest sense of the term, and his acts of salvation are continually emphasized throughout the three specific stages of the narrative: Jesus' ministry in Galilee and up to its frontiers (Mk 1:14–8:26); his journey to Jerusalem (8:27–13:37), which is punctuated by three announcements of the passion (8:31ff., 9:30ff., and 10:32ff.); and, finally, the account of the passion itself (14:1–16:8). Mark 16:9–20 is an addition, dating from the second century. The whole narrative is also structured around three pivotal moments at which God himself reveals his son: the baptism, the transfiguration (Mk 1:9ff. and 9:2–10), and the Roman centurion's confession of faith at the foot of the cross, "Truly, this man was the son of God!" (Mk 15:39). At the end, God, through the intermediation of his angel*, declares that Jesus has risen. This is the core of the Easter message (Mk 16:6).

Around the year 70, probably in Rome, and as a member of a church that admitted many different nationalities, Mark reworked an old Judeo-Christian catechism*, known in Peter's circle, placing greater emphasis on the theme of salvation through the cross. This brought him closer to Paul, whose companion he had once been (Acts 12:25). In this way, Mark, who was described by Papias, in the early second century, as "Peter's interpreter," stood at the meeting point of two traditions.

b) Matthew. The Greek-speaking evangelist known as Matthew is traditionally situated within the sphere of influence of the Galilean apostle Matthew. He reworked and completed Mark's narrative. As a member of a church that was still largely Judeo-Christian, Matthew presents his Gospel in the form of a catechism, constructed chiefly on the basis of the five discourses mentioned above. The plan of his Gospel generally follows that of Mark's, but he added an account of Jesus' childhood (Mt 1–2) and some reports of the appearance of the Risen One (Mt 28:9–20). Matthew also reorganized the tales of miracles taken from Mark (Mt 8–9) and made use of numerous elements, unknown to Mark, that were collected from a second source, now known as "Q" (from the German Quelle, or "source"). This Judeo-Christian evangelist places a strong emphasis on the messianic figure of Jesus, who is Christ (that is, Messiah*), "son of David," and Lord.

c) Luke. The Greek-speaking evangelist known as Luke set to work as an historian (Lk 1:1–4) on a large-scale text arranged in two main sections. The first, Luke's Gospel, relates the life of Jesus; the second, the Acts of the Apostles, is the history of the first churches, gathered around Peter and Paul. As a member of a church of former pagans, which owed part of its heritage to Paul's apostolic activity, Luke reworked Mark's materials in his own way. His Gospel also contains an account of Christ's childhood (Lk 1–2) that is very different from Matthew's, as well as accounts of the appearance of the Risen One (Lk 24:13–53). Luke omitted certain elements from Mark (Mk 6:45–7:37) that a Greek readership would barely have understood; and, above all, Luke added a whole new set of the sayings of Jesus, most of them taken from "Q" (Lk 9:51–18:14). From the outset, Luke refers to Jesus as Lord (Lk 2:11), just as Paul had applied this title to Jesus. Lord evokes the idea of transcendence, and in the Septuagint the Greek word used refers to God.

d) John. The framework of John's Gospel, which starts with the testimony of John the Baptist and ends with the resurrection*, is very different from that of the three synoptic gospels. Here, the sayings and deeds of Jesus are depicted as much in relation to Judea as to Galilee, following a sequence of selected events generally accompanied by speeches (Jn 5:1–18 and 5:19–47). Ten of the narratives in John's Gospel have parallels in Mark's (for example, Jn 6:1–15); otherwise, John restricts himself to highlighting certain particularly significant events, starting with the miracle at Cana, the first of the signs presented by Jesus (Jn 2:1–12). John’s main concern is not to pile up the logia or the actions of Jesus in the style of the synoptics, but to insert his own profound understanding of the sayings and deeds of the Lord. On more than one occasion, John gives the impression that he is addressing the material from a more mystical or symbolic perspective. In addition, he gives us a more precise and exact view of the chronology of Christ’s ministry than Mark does. His allusions to the building of the Temple at Jerusalem (Jn 2:20) and to Jesus’ three pilgrimages* to that city at the time of the Jewish Passover (Jn 2:23, 6:4, 12:1) allow us to establish that Christ’s ministry lasted for more than two years, beginning around the year 27. These major differences between John’s Gospel and the synoptics suggest that his was written in a very specific communal milieu, which was of a Judeo-Christian type but was also probably influenced by the Essenes and, still more, by an elaborate conception of Christ as the Word* of God preexisting in the world* (Jn 1:1, 8:58, and 20:28).

III. Brief History of the Exegesis of the Gospels

Since the early second century (I Apologia 67), the time of Justin, if not earlier, the texts of the Gospels have been interpreted in the context of the liturgy* and with reference to the Lord’s Supper. The Gospels have functioned, in a sense, in line with their original purposes—to confess the faith, and to help the community to live. Of course, from the first centuries of Christianity onward, there have been attempts to reduce, if not eliminate, the differences among the four narratives, but as early as the late second century Irenaeus called for the unity of their message to be respected, whatever the diversity in their statements of it.

Much later, starting in the 18th century, and notably with Reimarus in Germany, and with Voltaire and the Encyclopedists in France, the language of the Gospels, which is shot through with images and symbols in the Semitic manner, increasingly came to seem hermetic, and to be used in ways that contradicted modern views of history*. Little or nothing of Jesus’ life seemed capable of surviving the historicism and positivism of the early modern era. Ernest Renan’s novelistic biography of the Galilean, La vie de Jesus (1863; The Life of Jesus) represents something of an attempt to escape from this positivist straitjacket, but its literary success does not compensate for its methodological defects. A better understanding of the language of the New Testament has been promoted by major literary and archeological discoveries in the Middle East—notably at Qumran from 1947—and these have at last allowed us to make some more pertinent assessments of the literary methods used by the writers of antiquity.

Critical study of the Gospels has been undergoing vigorous development for more than 100 years, starting with the work of J. Weiss and J. Wellhausen, and passing through several stages in succession. 1) First, critical discussion of the sources of the synoptic gospels has shed more light on the literary connections among them. Two conflicting theories have been elaborated. One theory postulates the existence of two sources underlying Matthew and Luke—Mark’s Gospel and the source known as “Q”—inferred from the presence of common elements in both Matthew and Luke despite the fact that these two evangelists had no known contact with each other. This theory is upheld today by F. Neiryck of Louvain, among others. The other theory, associated with L. Vaganay, M.-E. Boismard, and X. Léon-Dufour, postulates one or several texts in Aramaic and Greek underlying all three synoptic Gospels. 2) From around 1920, however, Dibelius and Bultmann drew attention to the ancient literary forms that evolved from the oral tradition, launching a far-reaching reinterpretation of the Gospels known as Formgeschichte (form criticism). Bultmann was also the originator of a new hermeneutics* of the Gospels, adopting an existential interpretation inspired by his reading of Heidegger*. 3) From 1950 onward, a greater interest developed, in the Redaktionsgeschichte of the Gospels, and in the theology* or Christology* of each of the evangelists, as in Hans Conzelmann’s study of Luke. Since then, what is known as historico-critical exegesis has become better equipped to understand the literary genesis of each Gospel and to trace the Traditionsgeschichte associated with it from the first oral traditions to the stage of composition in written form, which came with varying lapses of time in each case. 4) Since 1970 there has been a reaction against these earlier interpretations, which are reconstructions of the literary history of the texts rather than readings of the Gospels as they now are. Some new literary approaches have gradually received recognition, including the semiotic method inspired by A. J. Greimas, and the exploration of the structural or rhetorical procedures of antiquity. 5) Today, the study of the Gospel texts exploits, without bringing into conflict, both synchronic procedures—reading the texts in terms of their present literary state and internal mechanisms—and diachronic procedures—interpreting them by reconstructing the stages of their development. In particular, attention is being paid, within the framework of the sociology of religion, to the different milieus of the Judeo-Christian and Helleno-Christian communities from which the earliest elements of the Christian “memory” of Jesus were drawn. Such varied studies allow us to discuss the story of Jesus while taking account of the social and communal contexts of these elements. Reacting against some of Bultmann's conclusions, E. Käsemann has laid the foundations for a historical methodology that could underpin evaluations of the authenticity of the reported sayings and deeds of Jesus, including his miracles. Located at a distance from novelistic biographies of Jesus, and refraining from any interference with internalized religious interpretations, critical research on the Gospels remains open to an improved understanding of the Gospels and, through them, to an approach to the figure of Jesus, who nonetheless remains mysterious.

• General Introduction

- X. Léon-Dufour (1963), Les évangiles et l'histoire de Jésus, Paris; (1976), "Les évangiles synoptiques," in A. George and P. Grelot (Ed.), Introduction à la Bible: L'annonce de l'Évangile III/2, 11–237.
- R. Brown, J. A. Fitzmyer, and R. E. Murphy (Ed.) (1990), The New Jerome Biblical Commentary, Avon.

Apocryphal Gospels

- E. Hennecke (1959), Neutestamentliche Apokryphen I-II, Tübingen.
- J. Jeremias (1963), Unbekannte Jesusworte, Gütersloh.

Criticism (study of manuscripts)

- B. M. Metzger (1968), The Text of the New Testament, 2nd Ed., Oxford.
- L. Vaganay, C. B. Amphoux (1986), Initiation à la critique textuelle, Paris.

Some Critical Commentaries

- M.-J. Lagrange wrote a series of commentaries on the Gospels, published in the Etudes bibliques, 1927–1929.
- V. Taylor (1952, 1969), The Gospel according to St Mark, London.
- P. Benoit, M.-E. Boismard (1965, 1972), Synopse des quatre évangiles I-II, Paris.
- P. Bonnard (1966, 1970), L'Évangile selon saint Matthieu, Neuchâtel.

- R. Brown (1966, 1970), The Gospel according to John I-II, Anchor Bible, New York.
- R. Pesch (1976, 1977), Das Markusevangelium I-II, Friburg.
- M.-E. Boismard, A. Lamouille (1977), L'évangile de Jean III, Paris.
- J. A. Fitzmyer (1981, 1985), The Gospel according to Luke I-II, New York.
- F. Bovon (1991), L'évangile selon saint Luc I, Geneva.

Synoptic Question and Some Studies on the History of the Tradition

- M. Dibelius (1933), Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, 2nd Ed., Tübingen.
- L. Vaganay (1954), Le problème synoptique, Paris.
- W. Marxsen (1956), Der Evangelist Markus: Studium zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Evangeliums, Göttingen.
- J. Dupont (1958, 1969, 1973), Les Béatitudes I–III, EtB.
- H. Conzelmann (1960), Die Mitte der Zeit: Studien zur Theologie des Lukas, 3rd Ed., Tübingen.
- E. Trocmé (1963), La formation de l'évangile selon Marc, Paris.
- R. Bultmann (1971), Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 3rd Ed., Göttingen.
- M. Didier (Ed.) (1971), L'évangile selon Matthieu: Rédaction et théologie, Gembloux.
- M. Sabbe (Ed.) (1974), L'évangile selon Marc: Tradition et rédaction, Louvain.
- J. Dupont (1985), Études sur les évangiles synoptiques I–II, Louvain.

On Historical Jesus

- A. Schweitzer (1913), Geschichte der Leben-Jesu Forschung, Tübingen, gives precious indications on the ancient authors: Reimarus, Paulus, D. Strauss, J. Weiss, and J. Wellhausen (2nd Ed. 1951).
- E. Käsemann (1954), "Zur Frage des historischen Jesus," ZThK 51, 125–53.
- C. Perrot (1979), Jésus et l'histoire, Paris (2nd Ed. 1993).
- J. P. Meier (1991 and 1994), A Marginal Jew I–II, New York.

CHARLES PERROT

See also Bible; Book; Canon; Christ/Christology; Literary Genres in Scripture; Intertestament; Jesus, Historical; Messianism/Messiah; Miracle; Myth; Narrative; Parable; Passion

Gottschalk of Orbais. See Augustinianism

Government. See Authority

Government, Church

The government of the Church encompasses all the duties and powers assigned to the Church of Jesus* Christ to enable it to fulfill its mission in history*. This mission, in accordance with the Church's fundamental mandate, is to proclaim the gospel, to administer the sacraments*, and to guide communities in a pastoral spirit, while respecting different sociocultural contexts. The Church cannot achieve this aim in practice without the function of internal government involving an institutional dimension. The various denominations, according to their respective ecclesiological principles, have established different forms of government. They are, however, united insofar as they maintain the essentials of all the structural elements prescribed by the New Testament, though each organizes these in its own way. This is why, for all the frequently unilateral exercise of government within each Church, dialogue is an important element, and vital to the success of the Church's work. Throughout history the question of what form Church government should take has often been linked to the problem of relations between Church* and State, initially from the standpoint of their external form (Caesaropapism/Papocesarism, State Church/Church-State or city* of God*), then from the standpoint of the integration into the Church of political forms of government (the Church as monarchy, the debate over democracy*).

a) The Catholic Church. Its fundamental organization is not laid down by a constitutional charter, but is codified along with other regulations, chiefly in the Code of Canon Law (CIC) of 1983. It is underpinned by the conviction that the visible institution of the Church is the incarnation of the religious reality of grace*. As the people* of God, the Church is composed of believers among whom "there exists, as far as their dignity and activity is concerned, a real equality in accordance with which all work together at constructing the Body of Christ, each according to his own station and function" (can. 208, CIC). They are guided in this by a number of duties and rights, among which are freedom* of opinion, apostolic activity, spiritual* direction, and freedom of association (can. 209–31).

The Church is structured vertically into universal Church, local* Church, and community (parish). In it, authority is exercised by an ecclesial power (sacra potestas), hierarchically organized and having divine right, within which should be distinguished the power of order (potestas ordinis) and the power of jurisdiction (potestas iurisdictionis). The former is conferred by the sacrament of order, is absolutely inalienable, and is composed of prerogatives linked to episcopal, priestly, or diaconal ordination*. The latter may be temporally restricted; it is subdivided into legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The Pope* holds supreme jurisdiction over the universal Church, over all the particular churches, and over every believer. His authority is unlimited and not dependent upon any other organ of government. He is elected by the members of the College of Cardinals who have not passed the age of eighty, and he assumes his dignity (provided he is already a bishop*) by the simple act of accepting his election. He loses it only on dying, unless he abdicates, commits heresy*, or becomes insane. To exercise his universal ministry* he has at his disposal the Synod of Bishops, the College of Cardinals, the Roman Curia, legates, and nuncios. A bishop receives his ministry by delegation from the Pope, and is in charge of a local Church of which he is the legislator, administrator, and supreme judge. In these functions he calls on a diocesan curia that comprises the holders of various offices: vicar general, vicar episcopal, official, chancellor, notaries, trustees of the episcopal estate, and treasurer. The cathedral chapter is often replaced by a council of diocesan priests or a college of advisers. Bishops belong to the episcopal college, whose members are hierarchically joined (communio hierarchica) to their head, the Pope. Except in the context of this union, they do not hold the supreme power of the Church, either in ecumenical councils or in the joint official decisions that they make across the world. The bishops, in addition, are generally assembled into an episcopal conference. At the community level it is the parish priest who fulfills the responsibilities of government, by delegation from the bishop.

This rigorously hierarchical structure is counterbalanced by a synodal principle of co-responsibility, in other words the working together of all the members of the Church according to their status. This principle expresses itself, on the level of the universal Church, in the ecumenical council and the Synod of Bishops (which since 1965 has been an assembly of bishops from different regions acting as a consultative body to the Pope). At the level of the regional or national church it can be seen in the episcopal conference (a permanent assembly of the bishops of a region or country, who exercise their pastoral responsibilities in it as a college; it is appointed by the Pope and constitutes a distinct legal entity), as well as in the regional councils (the plenary council for the territory under the authority of an episcopal conference, the provincial council for an ecclesiastical province). At the level of the particular church it appears in the diocesan synod, the presbyteral council, the pastoral diocesan council, and the board of trustees of the diocesan estate. At parish level it is to be seen in the pastoral council and the board of trustees of the parish estate. All these synodal bodies—with the exception of the ecumenical council and the authorities administering the estates of particular churches—have a merely consultative role and do not challenge the hierarchical principle.

b) The Orthodox Churches. While the different regional or national churches of the Orthodox community are governed by a common law, the principle of autocephaly and the lack, during the second millennium, of ecumenical councils with authority over the Church as a whole have made it impossible to codify the countless distinctive practices. Dispensations, and the principle of “economy” (which adapts legislation to different practical situations), serve moreover to give legal validity to departures from the regulations enacted by the first seven universally recognized councils. The basic church structure* is the local church, which administers the Eucharist* and is governed by a bishop. It is joined by the catholicity of the Church (in the koinonia—the communio) to all the other local churches, through their own bishops. In concrete terms, local communities joined together at an early date into regional unions, from which arose the patriarchates* and the autocephalous churches. The Orthodox Church has no central government as Catholicism* does. An autocephalous church is a particular church whose leader, usually a patriarch, is not appointed by a superior authority (patriarch, metropolitan, or archbishop), but rather elected and enthroned by a synod of bishops. He thus holds the entire power of jurisdiction, with the proviso that the rights of each particular bishop are preserved. The priest and real head of a local church is the bishop, on whom devolves the power of order (exousia hieratikè), of teaching (exousia didaktikè), and of jurisdiction (exousia dioitikè). His autonomy cannot be questioned by any other member of the hierarchy* (unless he is accused of neglecting the duties of his ministry).

The real constitutional principle of the Orthodox Church is the synodal structure, which has its theological basis in the equality of all the local Churches (and thus of their bishops). This principle is embodied in the following manner: the regional synod (sunodos topikè) is the supreme doctrinal, legislative, and judicial body of an autocephalous church, and has the right to elect its leader (a patriarch or other hierarch). The regional synod is either episcopal (composed only of bishops) or eparchial (also open to priests, monks, and lay* members). The sunodos endèmousa, a typically Byzantine structure, gathered together on an almost daily basis the bishops who were present at the patriarchal see. It has equivalents (the holy synod) in most of the autocephalous churches (for the ecumenical synod, see council*). The primatial principle also plays a part in the Orthodox Church, however, more or less pronounced in accordance with the bishop’s authority over his diocese, of the metropolitan over his province, of the patriarch over the autocephalous church, and of the ecumenical patriarch over the autocephalous churches as a whole. The power of this last is admittedly contested, but there is a tendency nowadays to accept that the unity of the Church requires the existence of a superior authority.

The laity—the community at the mercy of the hierarchy—has a relatively strong position within the Church structure, which is expressed through the interpenetration of Church and State, on the model of the sumphonia between the Patriarch (the Church) and the Emperor (the State), which has allowed the apparatus of the State to have a great influence on the Church. The principle of catholicity aroused an interest on the part of 19th-century Slavophile Russian theology* (A. S. Khomiakov, 1804–1860) in the involvement of all Christians in the destiny of the Church. According to this approach, the responsibility for administrative and doctrinal government extends to all the faithful through the reception* of hierarchical rules, as well as by teaching in the faculties of theology (generally entrusted to lay-people) and by preaching* (which may also be entrusted to them). Furthermore, the Church as a whole is infallible.

c) The Churches Originating in the Reformation. On account of their origins, these churches are clearly differentiated from the hierarchical structure of the Catholic Church. They emphasize instead the common priesthood* of all the faithful and the unity of the spiritual ministry, whose different expressions are in their view a matter for human law (ius humanum). All ecclesiastical offices are temporally limited on principle. The freedom that the Protestant churches have thus granted themselves, but also historical circumstances (since not one German bishop adopted Lutheranism* in the course of the 16th century, the bishop's role in government was transferred to the prince as summus episcopus in externis), have brought about a proliferation of forms of government, which are codified in the key regulations of the various churches. We will consider only a few elements that they all have more or less in common.

In Lutheranism, a ternary structure is often encountered: within the parish community the tasks of government and administration are the responsibility of one or more pastors*, as well as a collegiate body (presbyteral council) consisting of the latter along with members elected from among the community. The parishes are grouped into associations on an intermediate level ("inspectories," ecclesiastical districts, deaneries, or consistories), generally under a minister, council, or synodal body. The highest authority is the provincial or regional church (Landeskirche), whose system of government varies greatly from one region to another. Generally speaking, authority is held by the synod, the bishop (or president of the regional church), or a directory: these are responsible for maintaining the unity* of the regional church, coordinating its activities, and supporting the communities in their church work. In addition, there is an administrative structure and a judicial authority. There are also denominational federations on a national level (such as that Alliance nationale des Églises luthériennes de France) or the international level (the Lutheran World Federation). In the Reformed Churches, the "presbyteral" form of government was established from the outset, with a ministerial structure on four levels: pastor, reader, elder, and deacon*. In 1559 the French national synod incorporated this form of government within a synodal structure (the moderamina). Authority is never vested in an individual ministry. The Anglican Communion, by contrast, has retained the episcopate and accords a large measure of authority by divine right to the bishop, who takes his or her place in the apostolic* succession. The Church of England is a state church, which grants an important role to the episcopal and, to a lesser extent, the synodal authorities. It is subject to the Crown, and Parliament and the Government also have a right of intervention. The government of the Church is organized hierarchically around the ministries of the bishop, priest, and deacon. The parish councils, cathedral chapters, diocesan assemblies, and General Synod of the Church all have their own specific rights. The latter has the power to adopt laws, which must however be ratified by Parliament.

- E. Wolf (1961), Ordnung der Kirche, Frankfurt.
- H. Dombois (1961–74), Das Recht der Gnade, 3 vols., Witten and Bielefeld.
- A. Boussé, A. Mandouze (1963), L'évêque dans l'Église du Christ, Paris-Tournai.
- G. Caprile (1968–78), Il sinodo dei vescovi, 5 vols., Rome.
- W. Aymans (1970), Das synodale Element in der Kirchenverfassung, Munich.
- H. Frost (1972), Strukturprobleme evangelischer Kirchenverfassungen, Göttingen.
- W. Maurer (1976), Die Kirche und ihr Recht, Tübingen.
- J. Listl, H. Müller, H. Schmitz (1983), Handbuch des katholischen Kirchenrechts, Regensburg.
- K. Walf (1984), Einführung in das neue katholische Kirchenrecht, Zurich.
- G. Ghirlanda (1985), "De natura, origine et exercitio potestatis regiminis iuxta novum codicem," PRMCL 74, 109–164.
- E. G. Moore, T. Briden (1985), Moore's Introduction to English Canon Law, 2nd Ed., London and Oxford.
- A. Jensen (1986), Die Zukunft der Orthodoxie, Zurich.
- H. Frost, E. Wolf, W. Aymans (1987), "Kirchenverfassung," ESL 3 I, 1711–71.
- A. Anton (1989), Conferencias episcopales – instancias intermedias, Salamanca.
- W. Aymans (1991), Beiträge zum Verfassungsrecht der Kirche, Amsterdam.
- M. Kaiser, "Potestas iurisdictionis?," in W. Aymans (Ed.) (1991), Fides et ius, Regensburg, 81–107.
- R. Puza (1993), Katholisches Kirchenrecht, 2nd Ed., Heidelberg.

WOLFGANG BEINERT

See also Collegiality; Communion; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility; Jurisdiction; Orthodoxy; Protestantism

Grace

Grace is the very essence of God's solicitude for mankind, as it is incarnated in Jesus* Christ and is communicated to the depths of human nature* as a gift from the Holy* Spirit. It also sums up the relationship that, based on this gift, is established between God* and a human being who will still need grace to answer to grace.

I. Biblical Theology

1. The Old Testament

The whole Bible* is a testimony of the act of God's grace. This purpose crystallizes in different concepts of the Old Testament, which are combined in many ways by formulas of reverence (for example, in Ex 34:6). At the same time, it points to the central importance of the confrontation of man with a God of grace in the veterotestamentary faith.

The Hebrew chmn, which, in human relationships, designates an attitude of kindness—most often from a superior to a subordinate—is the theological expression of God's boundless love* (Gn 6:8). The divine chèsèd founds a certain relationship with mankind, one that is marked by fidelity (Jer 31:3) and takes shape in the favors given by God (Gn 32:11); rçhm represents the parental tenderness (Is 49:15 and Ps 103:13) and çdq an action dictated by fidelity to the community (Ps 36:7–9).

The veterotestamentary conception of grace is characterized by the consciousness of the free and unconditional solicitude of a God (Ex 33:19 and Dt 7:7f.) that exists for his people* (Ex 3:14). God's grace is shown in the Covenant* with Israel*, to which he binds himself as to a fiancée (Hos 2:21f.). His solicitude is seen in forgiveness and mercy*, YHWH answering to infidelity with more love (Is 54:7–10). Divine grace is also expressed in historical events (Is 63:7–14 and Ps 136), especially the Exodus. It is grace that prevents extreme peril or unjust persecution, that forgives a fault and favors prosperity on earth (by granting descendants or a country). The act of God's grace is first shown to a people, but as belief in his choice* falters, grace tends to be experienced by individuals. Post-biblical rabbinical Judaism* includes the events of Salvation*, in particular the Covenant and the Torah, as proofs of grace.

2. The New Testament

In the New Testament the act of God's grace finds its eschatological figure in Jesus Christ, in whom “the kingdom* of God is at hand” (Mk 1:15 par) and eternal life is granted (Jn 3:16). It is only in Pauline* theology that the term kharis itself becomes a central concept of the Christian message. Grace, here, is carried out above all in the justification* of sinners by Jesus Christ, who gave himself for them (Rom 3:23f.; 5). In Christ*, grace is offered to all men without consideration of merit (Gal 2:21). It is the power that triumphs over sin* and death*, and thus, that brings liberty* (2 Cor 3:17). A person participates in grace by proclaiming the Gospel*, faith (Rom 1:16), and baptism* (Rom 6). The act of God's grace unfurls in the charisma that forms the body of Christendom (Rom 12:3–21 and 1 Cor 1:4–9). The Deutero-Pauline emphasize the present existence in grace (Eph 1:3–14) which is granted in Jesus Christ (2 Tm 1:9f.), who is grace itself (Ti 2:11).

II. History of Theology

1. The Ancient Church

a) The Apostolic Fathers. Just as the neotestamentary epistles were already relating the consolation of grace offered in Jesus Christ to the exhortation of living in accordance with it, several texts by the Apostolic* Fathers stressed the ethical demands that the gift of grace entails. More specifically, it was in monasticism*, throughout the history of Christianity, that interest in the ethical consequences of grace was perpetuated.

b) Greek Patristics. The Greek patristics developed a doctrine of grace integrated into the universal perspective of the history of Salvation. Irenaeus* of Lyons thus understood grace as a salvific event (oikonomia) through which God, in a pedagogical process (paideia), brings man to participate in divine life, in accordance to an end assigned to him since his creation*. This concept holds the seed of the distinction between an original grace (resemblance to God) and a salvific grace (deification). The central event of this process of fulfillment of grace is the Incarnation*, through which the degraded image of God is restored and completed in man.

The conception of grace elaborated by Clement of Alexandria (140/150–c. 216/217) and Origen* is also from the perspective of the final deification of man. Influenced by Platonism* and stressing the free cooperation of man in the gift of grace, they opened the way to a mysticism* inspired by Neoplatonism (Evagrius Ponticus, 345–99, and Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite) that interprets grace as purification, enlightenment, and union.

In the fourth and fifth centuries, christological and pneumatologic doctrine developed under the influence of the idea of deification, insofar as it presupposed the divinity of the Son and the Spirit. This allowed theologians to specify the tie between deifying grace with the Man-God Jesus Christ and the regenerative act of the Spirit, as well as the Trinitarian dimension of grace, as the dwelling of the three divine persons in man.

c) About Orthodoxy. The Eastern doctrine of grace perpetuates the notion of the Greek Fathers. Jesus Christ's grace, divine life bestowed upon man through the abundance of Christ's life, is closely linked to the operation of the Spirit. Grace makes man similar to God and includes him in the communion* of intratrinitary life. It is above all in liturgy* that this deification is carried out. Gregory* Palamas's theology played an important role in the Orthodox doctrine of grace.

d) Western Patristics. The West integrated this doctrine on grace, which the Eastern Church saw on a universal and cosmic plan, in an entirely different context. Christianity here was understood as the institution and materialization of a new legal relationship between God and man. It involved understanding how the individual, a prisoner of his sin, might find the path to salvation through his personal liberty*. Grace, in this perspective, is considered a divine force that helps man reach salvation. This thought, which has roots in Tertullian* and Cyprian*, found its shape in Augustine*'s theology. For Augustine, the powerlessness of the sinner to do good*, and also his non-liberty, must be abolished, healed, and transformed from the inside by God's grace before the sinner can make progress toward his salvation by himself. Through this strict definition of the respective powers of liberty and grace, Augustine established a competing relationship between the two that would considerably concern theology*.

Pelagius and his disciples opposed the Augustinian concept of grace. They wanted to include what they thought to be latitudinarian tendencies by relating man to an immanent grace, already manifested in his own natural aptitudes, as well as to external forms of grace (gratia externa)—the Law*, Jesus Christ, the Scriptures, and the Church*. Because God does not demand anything that man cannot accomplish, it is fundamentally possible for man to live without sin after his baptism, and he must endeavor to do so. And it is precisely this possibility that Augustine, in an in-depth analysis of the vicious circle of sin, excludes. Beyond instructions and external models, man needs grace like he needs an internal force (gratia interna), the initiative of which radically and fully determines the salvific process.

In 418, against Pelagianism*, the regional Council of Carthage, influenced by Augustine—though not agreeing with him on every point—declared that man absolutely needs the specific help of grace (DS 225–30). In response to Augustine, John Cassian (c. 360–435) and the monastic theologians of Provence championed a theology that left more room to the liberty of man. Named “semi-Pelagianism” sometime after, this theology was to be rejected in 529 at the Council of Orange (DS 370–97).

2. The Middle Ages

a) The Scholastic Development. The Augustinian problematics (grace as a particular force through which God determines man from the inside, and the relationship between grace and liberty) thrived until medieval times. In accordance with the anthropological perspective that led the West to favor the practical and ethical aspect of faith, grace was then often integrated into the doctrine of virtues*. Peter Lombard (c. 1095–c. 1160), like any Augustinian, resolved the question of the relationship between grace and liberty in terms of the precedence of the former. Grace precedes the movement of the free will: it is an “infused” quality (habitus infusus) and not “acquired.”

The essential elements of Thomas* Aquinas's conception of grace were developed in the Summa Theologica Ia, IIae, q. 109–14. According to Thomas, man, from the beginning, is destined to communion with God, which he would never be able to accomplish without grace (in any case and even independently from sin he could not accomplish it—even though, in fact, his sin makes grace a necessity). Grace being thus situated relatively to the external principles of action, it seems that man does not possess grace on his own, but receives it from God as sanctifying grace (gratia sanctificans), in such a way, however, that it becomes truly internal (habitual grace, or gratia habitualis). The distinction between uncreated grace (gratia increata), which is nothing else than God himself in his love for man, and created grace (gratia creata), which is the effect of the act of divine grace in man, corresponds to this double aspect of grace.

b) Later Scholasticism. This internal connection between the divine aspect and the human aspect of grace waned in later Scholasticism*, which explains how, for example, champions of nominalism* could have wondered if the adoption of man by God depended on the internalization of grace. To preserve the liberty of God, it was thought that there was only a necessity of fact, which did not prevent a very optimistic view of man's natural capacity to prepare himself for grace through his own merits. The Reformers would object first and foremost.

3. Modern Era

a) The Reformation. It was first as an act of justification* of man that Luther* understood divine grace. The sinner, who seeks in vain to justify himself by his works* against the accusation of the Law, cannot find grace in God's eyes outside of the justification brought by Jesus Christ and which he only receives in faith. The union with Christ produces a real justice* that regenerates man from the inside. It cannot be, however, attributed to him by merit; it does not require any ontological roots—no created grace residing in man—but rather appears as the fruit of a new relationship with God, which gives man the liberating certainty of being saved. In the Lutheran tradition, the interest in grace as the bearer of salvation (sanctifying grace) was developed by Melancthon (1497–1560). Pietism* would make the connection between justification and sanctification even clearer. Calvin* saw grace more as a link between the justifying and redeeming work of Christ, on one hand, and its assimilation in the life of Christians as influenced by the Holy Spirit, on the other. The federal theology stemming from Zwingli* saw grace from a theocentric point of view, highlighting God's global covenant with his creatures.

b) The Council of Trent. The Council of Trent* rejected the position of the Reformers, but answered it with key explanations: it thus stressed the necessity of grace and subordinated the doctrine of grace to that of justification, without reducing it to that (DS 1520–83). The grace of God, which awakens and rescues the creature (DS 1525), has absolute priority over all human action; however, man's liberty (DS 1521 and 1554–55), and the possibility he has to cooperate in a commendable way with grace (DS 1545–49 and 1582), are not abolished. Although the Council, in the debate that put it at odds with the Protestants, had to set itself apart from the reforming theses on faith and the certainty of Salvation (DS 1531f, 1562, 1533f, and 1563–66), it is the basic agreement between their respective positions that is more striking to us today. Suspecting that, for the Reformers, justification did not truly transform man, the Council specified the action of created grace in terms of effects in man and on man: the distinction was to be referred to often. With regard to this foundation, the theology of the Counter-Reformation would mainly focus on the anthropological aspect of grace—on created grace and on the ethical consequences of justification.

c) Post-Tridentine Theology. The relationship between grace and liberty, and the idea that this involves a competition, gave rise, between 1597 and 1607, to the “grace dispute.” The Thomist theologian Domingo Báñez (1528–1604) characterized grace as infallibly efficacious (gratia efficax), man's liberty therefore being preserved only by the basic concept of a sufficient grace (gratia sufficiens) that, as a result, does not reach its goal. Conversely, the Jesuit Luis de Molina (1535–1600) stressed man's liberty, the sovereignty of God thus only being preserved by “middle knowledge” (scientia media), which allows him to foresee the result of human actions. In 1607 Pope Paul V forbade the defenders of these two systems of grace to condemn each other (DS 1997).

Behind this dispute, two divergent images of man opposed each other, and the difference came to the forefront when Baius (1513–89), Jansen (1585–1638), and Quesnel (1634–1719) adopted Augustine's thought on the real corruption of nature by sin in order to apply it to the abstract concept of nature (to nature in its essence). Thus nature remains incomplete in man without grace and is destroyed in the fall. Grace is needed to complete the essential aspect of nature, but it is, by this fact, naturalized—that is, understood as an integral part of nature. This notion was to be officially condemned (DS 1901–80 [1567], 2001–07 [1653], 2301–32 [1690], and 2400–2502 [1713]).

It then became necessary to specify that the theological concept of nature did not include grace, and this terminological clarification gave rise to Baroque Scholastic and Neoscholastic speculations on “pure nature” (natura pura), a closed-in nature, geared toward its own end, to which an extrinsic grace is added, like a supplementary stage. It is against this background that the optimism of the Enlightenment (and the overestimation of nature's powers) developed, as did the processes of secularization* (concerned with ridding the secular world of a grace stripped of significance for the natural existence of man). It was to these tendencies, which sought to separate grace and nature, that apologetic thought on immanence (Blondel*) attempted to respond.

4. Contemporary Theology

In Protestant theology, which was more receptive to Enlightenment thought, it was Karl Barth* (1886–1968) who protested more than anyone against reducing grace to a simple ethical force, and did so in the name of the immeasurable character of grace. In the Catholic camp, theological historians were charged with unearthing the patristic concepts of the history of Salvation and opening the way for the true intentions of Scholastic thought. Furthermore, dialogical personalism played a strong role in reviving the perception of a reality that had almost ended up being reduced to its ontic and natural dimension (E. Brunner and R. Guardini). Some theologians developed theories on the inhabitation of the Holy Spirit in man (Matthias Joseph Scheeben*) or the initial act of communication of God's self (Karl Rahner*). Thus, the unilateral interest in created grace waned, and it was henceforth more clearly connected to the initiative of a God of grace. In this way, they were given the means to avoid seeing the relationship between nature and grace in terms of juxtaposition and superposition—recognizing that the former came metaphysically after the latter (Eschweiler and Schmaus) and crediting man as having a natural desire for supernatural communion with God (Maréchal).

Contemporary theology is no longer based on an abstract nature with its own end, but on real man. It is man, in his historical and concrete being, who, from the moment he is created, calls to grace (“new theology”—Lubac*). He immediately moves, in fact, in the horizon of the act of grace through which God wanted to communicate with him and which determines him in an existential manner (Rahner's “supernatural existential man”). Moreover, this in no way diminishes the unmotivated character of grace, as emphasized in the encyclical Humani Generis (1950). The idea that God freely introduced the supernatural end of human nature, prior to all work, is, on the contrary, the most certain guarantee. From these theoretical specifications, the theology of grace finally evolved into a larger field than the one belonging to the Christian institution; its effects can also be extended all the way to the entire cosmic process (P. Teilhard de Chardin).

A tighter connection between nature and grace was also expressed in Vatican II (see, for example, LG 36 and 40). The Council fathers referred to the communion dimension of grace and focused on the signs of grace outside of the Church (LG 13 and 16).

The most recent works deal with the meaning of grace in the realization of the humanity of man (Schillebeeckx, Küng), the intelligence of grace as the advent of liberty (Rahner, Greshake, Pröpper), its communal and ecclesial dimension (Greshake), the worldly character of its experience, and its extension into ethical and political action (political* theology and liberation* theology).

III. Systematic Theology

1. The History of Salvation Perspective

Above all, grace is God himself, the triune and gracious God who offers his love. In his universal wish for salvation, he destined man from the beginning to be in communion with him, not so as to offer him something, but to share himself and his divine life. Even though this participation is meant to lead to a dialogical relationship, the eternal wish for salvation does not only have to be considered as an immaterial horizon; on the contrary, it materializes in history* and is there to be chosen freely by man. Sin, through which man hides from the call of grace, introduces a new accent in this divine act. Grace is now seen as signifying the forgiving pardon and the redeeming act through which the sinner finds himself justified, as well as the help that allows him to return to and continue down the path of God.

The history of the Covenant, through which God, for the first time, showed favor to the Israelites, culminated in the Incarnation of the Logos, which extended the Covenant to all of humanity. Jesus Christ is not only the outside mediator of God's grace; he is grace itself, which has been incarnated into human life to bear its responsibility and to deify it irrevocably. The life of Jesus materializes God's proximity and love* for the sinner. By acting as man in suffering and dying on the cross, he assumes sin, through which man closes himself off from God and grace, and in this very act, he establishes a new relationship between God and man and becomes, in his own being, the place of their reconciliation. Ascended to heaven, he sends the Holy Spirit, who is God's gift of himself, occupying man's heart (see soul*-heart-body). It is the Holy Spirit, which, for the Church as for the individual, transforms the external figure of Jesus into an internal reality through which they both participate in the life of God. The goal of the act of divine grace is the perfect communion of God's kingdom.

2. (Free) Grace and Nature

God, in his act of grace, is entirely free and sovereign. He is interested in man only out of pure choice of grace. Grace is therefore not primarily a reaction to man or his merits, but an original love that alone gives rise to the qualities of man, making him worthy of love. Therefore, the sinner is justified outside of all his prior merit, through a pure act of grace. His conversion* and his faith presuppose that God turned toward him with prevenience (gratia praeveniens). The priority of grace as God's free initiative does not, however, relate to the fact that it is offered, without reason, to man living fully in sin. It already appears in the Creation itself, through which God made man into a being looking outside himself. In this respect, it is not nature that asks to be carried out by grace, but grace that gives itself a nature that is able to receive grace, able to find its fulfillment in it.

Tradition* strove to define this relationship by acknowledging that man had either passive anchorage (obeiential potency or potentia oboedientialis) or an active desire to commune with God (natural desire for the Beatific Vision*, or desiderium naturale visionis beatificae). The axiom that says, “grace does not destroy but supports and completes nature,” falls in line with the theme of unity as a result of grace and nature. Grace presupposes nature and leads it to its fulfillment. It therefore does not establish a “supernature,” but rather introduces a complementary, and nevertheless new, dimension of grace in natural reality. However, nature and grace exist as distinct realities. Here, nature represents a basic concept (pure nature or natura pura), in which is expressed the fact that the relationship of grace between God and man is neither deducible from human essence, nor divine essence. It rather stems from a behavior that God freely chooses to adopt with regard to man. Paradoxically, grace—exactly inasmuch as it is free, unmotivated, and asks to be freely accepted—constitutes the gift of this love, which man needs in order to find the final fulfillment.

3. Grace and Freedom

God calls man to a personal communion with him, so that the free divine solicitude with regard to man only really takes effect if man freely agrees. This is why there is not a competitive relationship between grace and free will. Grace, does indeed work with sovereign power, but is not violent against man. Man, for his part, is not a static power before God, but a creature endowed with freedom in relation to God, a freedom that allows him to choose whether or not to respond to the call of grace, and so commit himself to the dynamic that fills him.

The freedom offered by God and directed toward him as it is toward its end, is nevertheless still an open freedom; it can, therefore, just as well reject grace—but, in this case, it rejects God’s solicitude, without which it loses meaning. Before man in crisis, grace presents itself as an initiative force that starts by emancipating enchained freedom from its shackles. Man is not, as a result, able to rise to God through his own strength, but, from this, he recovers at least one freedom capable of being sought.

As a last resort, it is impossible to define the respective parts of grace and of freedom in faith. It is also impossible to say how the possibility of resistance of human free will before the sovereign efficaciousness of grace is reconciled with the power that the latter has to conquer human resistance. There is a double mystery* here, in which the paradigm of predestination* takes root.

In the interactive play between grace and free will, God and man, therefore, do not represent two competing causalities. On the contrary, grace confronts the human will and sets it free (operating or prevenient grace or gratia operans or praeveniens) in order to act in conjunction with it (cooperating or concomitant grace—gratia cooperans or concomitans). It is in this cooperation between divine grace and human free will that each finds—in accordance with the Council of Chalcedon*’s christological model—its whole and specific efficaciousness without, all the while, canceling that of the opposite pole. Grace is revealed as the force that initiates, makes possible, and supports man’s attempts to reach God, and free will is revealed as the force that God wants to engage in these attempts.

4. Uncreated and Created Grace

Because grace seeks to establish a relationship, the concept does not only designate God himself (uncreated grace), but also the different ways in which God transforms worldly reality and man himself (created grace). The incarnation of grace, God made man in Jesus Christ, moves through the Church and is mediated in several ways, notably through the Word* and the Sacraments*. Grace specifically deals with man as an individual, in his plural and corporeal reality, in the different stages of his life. It must, therefore, adapt itself both to situations and to the being* of man himself, bringing about a new form and a new idea of meaning (habitus, gratia habitualis). These two things do not result from any kind of human learning, but are, rather, integrally assimilated by man. For the movement of grace aims to establish a dialogical relationship, and, for this reason, sustains man in a state in which he becomes capable of responding to love from his own reality. Therefore, even though the relationship between God and man is a goal of created grace, a person cannot, without losing its essential substance, consider it an experience that can be separated from the act of grace. The gifts of the Holy Spirit, in particular, are there to remind us that man cannot assimilate grace that is offered to him if he is not supported again by divine efficaciousness.

5. The Communion Character of Grace

The dynamic of Salvation granted to a being-in-communion, God’s triune grace does not only establish a new communion with God, it also heals and transforms the relationship between men. This is why, by sharing himself, Jesus Christ founds the Church as his body. In order to establish this communion and to fulfill the Church's mission, grace is given in the charisma (gratia gratis data) that include man in the movement of love of God. Among the obligations that grace makes known to man, there is commitment, with the force that it fills him with, to the work to eradicate sin.

6. The Experience of Grace

Inasmuch as grace allies itself with nature and articulates itself on the categoric level, it is also part of the concrete existence of man. Yet, we must not forget that in experience we only grasp the mediated forms of grace, while their original form, that is to say God himself, escape all experience. Also, the experience of grace is essentially ambivalent and grace itself remains hidden: it can only be seized as grace through faith, and can just as well be concealed in hardship and the cross—that is, in its opposite, sub contrario.

- J. Van der Meersch (1925), "Grâce," DThC 7/2, 1554–1687.
- H. Bouillard (1944), Conversion et grâce chez saint Thomas d'Aquin, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1946), Surnaturel, Paris (new edition 1991).
- A. M. Landgraf (1952), Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik 1/1, Regensburg.
- K. Rahner (1954–1960), Schr. zur Th. 1, 323–45 . 347–75; 3, 105–109; 4, 209–236, Einsiedeln.
- U. Kühn (1961), Natur und Gnade, Berlin.
- J. de Baciocchi (1963), "Grâce," Cath. 5, 135–72.
- M. Flick and Z. Alszeghy (1964), Il Vangelo della grazia, Florence.
- H. Rondet (1964), Essais sur la théologie de la grâce, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1965), Le mystère du surnaturel, Paris.

- K. Rahner (1968), Gnade als Freiheit, Friburg.
- H. J. Stoebe (1971), "äm gnädig sein," THAT 1, 587–97.
- G. Greshake (1972), Gnade als konkrete Freiheit: Eine Untersuchung zur Gnadenlehre des Pelagius, Mainz.
- H. Conzelmann and W. Zimmerli (1973), "kharis, etc.," ThWNT 9, 363–93.
- Gross et al. (1974), "Gottes Gnadenhandeln," Mysal IV/2, 595–984.
- K. Koch (1976), "ödq gemeinschaftstreu/heilvoll sein", THAT 2, 507–530.
- G. Liedke (1976), "shpt richten", ibid., 999–1009.
- L. Boff (1977), A graça libertadora no mundo, 2nd Ed., Petrópolis.
- G. Greshake (1977), Geschenkte Freiheit, Friburg (new edition 1992).
- Y. M.-J. Congar (1979), Je crois en l'Esprit Saint, vol. II: "Il est Seigneur et Il donne la vie," Paris.
- J. Martin-Palma (1980), Gnadenlehre: Von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart, HDG III/5 b, Friburg.
- O. H. Pesch, A. Peters (1981), Einführung in die Lehre von Gnade und Rechtfertigung, Darmstadt.
- M. Theobald (1982), Die überströmende Gnade, Regensburg.
- O. H. Pesch (1983), Frei sein aus Gnade, Friburg.
- H. Reventlow et al. (1984), "Gnade", TRE 13, 459–511.
- Th. Pröpper (1988), Erlösungsglaube und Freiheitsgeschichte, Munich (3rd Ed. 1991).
- A. Ganoczy (1989), Aus seiner Fülle haben wir alle empfangen, Düsseldorf.

EVA-MARIA FABER

See also Anthropology; Augustinianism; Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Covenant; Jansenism; Nature; Pelagianism; Sin, Original; Supernatural

Gratian (Francisco Gratiaziano)

c. 1090–1159

Francisco Gratiaziano, known as Gratian, was a Camaldulensian monk who drew up what became the single most influential codification of the legal decisions that together came to constitute canon* law. His great compilation, usually known as the Decretum, although more properly entitled the Concordia discordantium canonum, attempted to resolve the discrepancies and contradictions in the legal promulgations and decisions emanating from the supreme source of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

The compilation was made from the papalist point of view, emphasizing papal authority in the investiture controversy of 1076 between Pope Gregory VII and the Emperor Henry IV, in which the conflicting claims of sacred and secular sovereignties confronted one another. Gratian's compilation implicitly defended papal claims to the right of investing prelates with their sees against the emperor's desire to retain a lucrative feudal suzerainty over ecclesiastical benefices, which in fact thrived on concubinage and simony. Its principal importance was to serve as a handbook of legal principles and decisions, and consequently to become almost a constitutional handbook for the jurisdictional and other papalist claims of the Roman church.

However, it was also important on account of the quotations from the Fathers* that it contained, and that played a disproportionate part in subsequent medieval theological debate. It was often the only, and even more frequently the most easily available source for the views of the Fathers. It also attracted a very large number of glosses, and became a principal source for the development of doctrine in the later Middle Ages, a counterpart to Peter Lombard's four books of Sententiae, also of the mid-12th century. Both north and south of the Alps, faculties of canon law were quickly established in the universities. Alongside theology*, medicine, and civil law, canon law, anchored in Gratian's Decretum, became one of the four graduate faculties when the universities north of the Alps came to be founded around 1200.

Ancient Roman legislative constitutions had been gathered together on the orders of Justinian into what was intended to be a definitive codex, in which form it was promulgated in A.D. 529. It later needed substantial modification and expansion, and was then re-promulgated in 534, lapsing in Europe under barbarian rule and a weakening papacy in the tenth century. It lingered on in Constantinople's fluctuating sphere of influence; and also, in part, in Spain, where the early-seventh century Collectio canonum Isidoriana was attributed to Isidore of Seville (570–636), as was an enlarged ninth-century version, now known as the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals. Most local* churches had their own legislative codes, collecting, organizing, and unifying imported legal norms. Scales of penances for sins began to circulate from the sixth century.

The revival of interest in Roman law started in the late 11th century in Bologna, where Irnerius (1055–c. 1125) was the most important master teaching in the law school. He systematically collated and compared the texts of Lombard and Roman law, and himself wrote glosses, summaries, treatises, and interpretations. By the end of the 12th century, Ivo of Chartres (c. 1040–1116), relying on a compendium compiled by Burchard of Worms († c. 1023), was able to produce his Tripartita, with 655 fragments of decretals, 789 conciliar canons or patristic texts, and 861 fragments of his own Decretum, altogether a compilation of 3,760 ordered, brief, and concise chapters in 17 parts, which constituted a compendium of canon law.

Inspired by Ivo and Irnerius, and relying on Isidore, Gratian undertook his huge task, codifying some 4,000 earlier legal enactments according to the categories of Roman law, without regard either to the dates of the decretals he included or to the clashes of legal principle between them, and only occasionally offering his own view of disputed matters. His collection of decrees and decisions formed the first section of the Corpus iuris canonici when it was eventually printed privately under that title (1499–1502), and later, under the same title, with its text authenticated by Gregory XIII, in the official Roman edition of 1580. That was the only authoritative compilation of the whole of canon law until the Codex of 1917. Gratian is also the chief source influencing the acceptance by the Middle Ages of the privileged status of the decrees of the councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, which he regarded as normative and as containing all the essentials of Christian belief. (Dict. Grat. before Pars 1a, dist. 5).

Gratian was concerned to reconcile the traditions and categories of Roman law with the Frankish codes of the barbarian tribes, which had obtained over most of Europe during the early Middle Ages, and to this purpose could draw on the work of other 11th and early-12th century predecessors, including Bernold of Constance, Ivo of Chartres, and Alger of Liège, all of whom had sought to distinguish particular cases from general principles in their works on church law. Gratian was also influenced by Abelard*'s attempt to show the contradiction between different Christian beliefs in his book of theological contradictions, Sic et non of about 1115.

Gratian followed the usual practice of prefacing the consideration of canonical practice with a theoretical section on the nature of law*. Since Europe's later secular legal systems, whether claiming to be based on customary law, on common law, on statutory law, or on Roman law, all derived more or less directly from ecclesiastical legal practice and the semi-theological jurisprudence set out by Gratian and his commentators, it is important to notice the ambiguities in Gratian's view. He makes natural law not only identical with the revealed provisions of divine law—which makes canon law a theological discipline—but he also makes it identical with the law ordained by human reason, which puts it in the realm we know as philosophy*.

Gratian follows Isidore in holding that natural law is that which is contained “in the law and the gospel” (Dist 1a, dict. Grat. See also Pars 1a, dist.v, dict. Grat.), and makes natural law identical with divine law, “everything which is legitimate is ascribed to divine and natural law” (Pars 1a, dist.1, c.i, dict. Post. See dist. 9, c.xi, dict. Post). But he also makes natural law the pure product of human reason, originating from the constitution of rational creatures, not varying in time, but remaining immutable (Dict. Grat. Before Pars 1a, dist.5). Both sides in the great theological debate of the later Middle Ages—whether holding on the one hand that divine law was the product of the divine reason*, of which human reason was a derivative reflection or, on the other, that divine law was decreed by God* without reference to human intellectual powers—could therefore claim inspiration from Gratian himself.

Gratian's compendium was adopted in the schools and by the Roman curia, even though it was not endorsed by the Church* as such until 1580. In the mid-12th century, supplements, commentaries, and glosses started to appear almost immediately, raising questions that the popes were asked to resolve. A further systematic collection of decretals or legal decisions from 1127 to 1170 was compiled by Bernard of Pavia in about 1179, who himself produced a collection of 900 decretals from 1140 to 1191, arranged in five books, which also became the subject of a dozen commentaries.

This was the first of five Compilationes antiquae, the most important decretal collections between Gratian's Decretum and 1234. It chiefly contained decretals subsequent to Gratian's Decretum, including those of the Third Lateran* Council in 1179. The second compilation of the five was so numbered because it contained decretals from the immediately subsequent quinquennium, but earlier than those of the third compilation, which included the decretals from the first twelve years, 1198–1210, of the reign of Innocent III, and was the first legal compilation to be officially promulgated to the whole Church.

The fourth of the Compilationes antiquae contained the later decretals of Innocent's reign, which ended in 1216, including the canons of the Fourth Lateran* Council in 1215. It may have been promulgated, as the fifth of the compilationes certainly was, by Honorius III in 1226, containing as it did the decretals of his pontificate. Glosses were written on all five of the books, and taken into account when the Decretals of Gregory IX were compiled following the general plan of the Compilatio prima, and incorporating 1,771 chapters of the 1,971 contained in the complete set of Compilationes antiquae. The most important of the glosses was the 1216 glossa ordinaria of Johannes Teutonicus, particularly important for its view that popes lost their jurisdiction ipso facto if they fell into heresy. It followed from this view that the ultimate criterion of orthodoxy* could not simply be the pope*'s view, but only the sensus fdelium, normally apparent only through a council of the universal Church.

The Decretals of Gregory IX, drawn up by Raymond of Pennafort, was the first authentic general collection of legal principles and decisions to be issued. Known also as the Liber extravagantium, it was promulgated in 1234, and unleashed a new wave of glosses and commentaries. The Teutonicus glossa ordinaria was brought into line with it between 1240 and 1245, leaving a single-volume compendium of canon law, which made possible the promotion of a centralized and unified ecclesiastical society. Supplements with later decisions and further glosses and commentaries continued to be drawn up until 1317, when John XXII promulgated the Constitutiones Clementinae, the final document in the Corpus iuris canonici, which consisted of Gratian's Decretum, the Decretals of Gregory IX, and four further books, the Liber sextus, the Clementinae, the Extravagantes Joannmis XXII, and the Extravagantes communes. By 1338 the whole flood of glosses and commentaries had been reduced to coherence, and there was a recognized canon law that, although it continued to grow, governed, at least in principle and in outline, the constitution and procedures of the Church.

It is to the principles of canon law, themselves often transmitting the more ancient principles of Greek and Roman law, that European legal systems ultimately owe the foundations of international law and the notion of a public law flowing from the exercise of sovereignty*. Modern concepts of personal property, the concepts of equity and good faith*, and the regulation of matrimonial relations were developed from ecclesiastical law, and until very recently the English concept of "contempt of court" remained a clear secularization of the canonical procedures governing excommunication. In many of its most important principles, medieval canon law was also adopted in the reformed communions of the 16th century. Modern US law owes to canon law many of the principles underpinning matrimonial law, criminal law, the laws of succession, property, human rights, and the principles of proof and evidence.

- (1879) Corpus Iuris Canonici, I. A. Friedberg (Ed.), Leipzig.

ANTHONY LEVI

See also Canon Law

Gregory of Nazianzus

c. 330–390

a) Life. In Eastern Orthodox Tradition, Gregory of Nazianzus is known as “the theologian.” A doctor, like Athanasius*, of the Eastern Church, Gregory of Nazianzus stands together with his intimates Basil* of Caesarea and Gregory* of Nyssa among the Cappadocian Fathers. (The fourth century would come to be considered the “golden age” of patristics.) Born the son of the bishop of Nazianzen, a small town in Cappadocia, Gregory supplemented his Christian education with studies in rhetoric and philosophy, first in Constantinople and then in Athens. These studies were undertaken at the same time as Basil. His desire to reconcile Greek culture and Christian faith* provoked his great virulence against the religious policies of Emperor Julian, who in 362 had banned Christians from the teaching profession (Discourses 4 and 5, no doubt composed after Julian’s death). Ordained a priest, then appointed a bishop (apparently much against his will, since he himself had chosen the monastic life), Gregory was to play an important role in the Church of Constantinople, where, after Archbishop Meletius’s death, he was to preside over the Council of 381 (the Council of Constantinople* I), before resigning from his position to be replaced by Nectarius. His autobiographical work (Carmina de se ipso, PG 37), together with his correspondence, reveals the anxieties and the mystical aspirations of a Christian poet. Contrary to a tradition accepted until the 16th century, strong doubts exist today as to his authorship of the Christus patiens (SC 149), a pastiche of lines from Euripides, which form a Christian tragedy, probably dating from the Byzantine era.

b) Theological Contributions. As a preacher and theologian, along with Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus contributed at Constantinople to the victory of Nicaean orthodoxy over the supporters of Arianism* (Discourse 27, “Against the Eunomians”). His Theological Discourses 27 to 31, speeches delivered in 380 (which are the chief source of Gregory’s influence and posthumous fame) present his trinitarian theology* in a style that combines dogmatic rigor and lyricism. At the same time, he underlines the theologian’s task: the theologian is one of those who “walked in the recesses of the deep” (Jb 38:16; Dis- course 28:12) and in the theologian’s works an apophatic language should counterbalance the elaboration of theological concepts. Gregory himself conforms to this prescription.

It was the idea of relationship (skhèsis) that made it possible for Gregory to define the differences between the three persons* encompassed in the Trinity*: “The Father* is neither the name of a substance nor the name of an action; it is the name of a relationship, a name showing the Father’s position with regard to the Son or the Son’s with regard to the Father” (Disc. 29:16). As for Gregory’s theology of the Holy* Spirit, it daringly develops the themes of Basil’s Treatise on the Holy Spirit, and it would be a deciding factor at the Council of 381. Against the Pneumatomachians, whom he accused of ditheism (Discourse 31:13), Gregory insisted that the scriptural argument gave legitimate grounds for asserting the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Neither did he hesitate to apply to the Holy Spirit the term homoousios, a point on which the Council of 381 would not follow him. Gregory deserves the credit of having coined the term “ekporeisis” (ekporeusis, “procession,” Discourse 31:8), which allowed him to distinguish the relationship of the Holy Spirit to the Father from the generation of the Son (Filioque). Pointing out that each of the persons of the Trinity had been the object of a gradual revelation, Gregory concluded his speech devoted to the Holy Spirit by showing that the Spirit’s divinity had not been clearly manifest until after the coming of Christ* (Discourse 31:26).

Gregory’s Christology* preceded the answers that the councils of Ephesus* and Chalcedon* would give to the Nestorians, and it affirmed the unity of the person of Christ. All the same, his presentation of the Son’s humanity stumbles over the dilemma of Christ’s will and of his ignorance. Maximus* the Confessor, in his Ambiguum liber, was therefore to come up against several points in Gregory’s Christology that he was obliged to develop before he could assert their complete orthodoxy (see A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, in C. Moreschini 1992).

c) Posthumous Fame. The acuity of Gregory’s trinitarian theology, and his role in the first Council of Constantinople, assured his fame. His joint composition with Basil of the Philocalia, drawn from Origen's works, which was widely circulated and has preserved for us fragments of other works lost today, attests to Gregory's loyalty to Alexandrian exegesis*. Evagrius Ponticus, the propagator of Origenism in the era of early monasticism*, acknowledged Gregory as his master, a master whom he had served as a deacon in Constantinople. Until the Middle Ages, Gregory's dogmatic works, especially the Theological Discourses, translated into Latin by Rufinus of Aquileia as early as the beginning of the fourth century, inspired many commentaries in both East and West.

• PG 35–38

Discourses, SC 247, 250, 270, 284, 309, 318, 358

Letters, Ed. and translated into French by P. Gallay, 2 vol, CUFr, 1964–67, Paris; Lettres théologiques, SC 208.

(1997), Le Dit de sa vie, text and French trans., Geneva.

♦ P. Gallay (1943), La vie de saint Grégoire de Nazianze, Paris.

F. Lefherz (1958), Studien zu Gregor von Nazianz, Bonn.

J.-M. Szymusiak (1963), Éléments de théologie de l'homme selon saint Grégoire de Nazianze, Rome.

J. Rousse (1967), "Grégoire de Nazianze", DSp 6, 932–71, Paris.

J. Bernardi (1968), La prédication des Pères cappadociens, Paris.

T. Spidlik (1971), Grégoire de Nazianze, Rome.

F. Trisoglio (1974), S. Gregorio di Nazianzo in un quarantennio di studi (1925–1965), Turin.

C. Moreschini and G. Menestrina (Ed.) (1992), Gregorio Nazianzeno: teologo e scrittore, Bologna.

J. Bernardi (1995), Grégoire de Nazianze: Le théologien et son temps (330–390), Paris.

FRANÇOISE VINEL

See also Constantinople I; Hellenization of Christianity; Negative Theology; Spiritual Theology

Gregory of Nyssa

c. 331–394

1. Life and Works

a) Life. Gregory of Nyssa and his brother Basil* of Caesarea were children of an aristocratic family from Cappadocia. Born about 331 in Pontus, Gregory belonged to the third generation of Christians in his family. He seems to have turned toward a rhetorical and philosophical education after having held the office of lector in the church. A married man, he was called to the episcopacy and appointed to the see of Nyssa, near Caesarea, c. 372. He would assert himself as the representative of the Nicæan faith, especially after Basil's death. A victim of Arian opponents, Gregory was deposed as bishop, probably in 375–76, and forced into exile until the end of 377, when Emperor Valens abolished sentences of exile. Gregory was then restored to the see of Nyssa (see Basil, Ep, 225). In an attempt to bring to an end the doctrinal divisions linked to the Arian crisis (see Ep, 2, 3, 5), he traveled as far as Jerusalem*, visiting several episcopal sees in Asia Minor. He made a strong impression during the first council of Constantinople* in 381.

Under Basil's influence, monasticism* enjoyed considerable success in Cappadocia. Gregory too supported this movement and encouraged the development of the small monastery founded on the family property of his sister Macrina and their mother (De virginitate; Vita Macrinae).

b) Works. The chronology of Gregory's works is uncertain. Just like the more prolific correspondences of Basil and of Gregory* of Nazianzus, his Letters give us some insight into the way in which he performed his duties as bishop during troubled times. The three parts of Contra Eunomium, the short trinitarian treatises (Adversus Arium et Sabellium de Patre et Filio, De deitate Filii et Spiritus Sancti, De differentia essentiae et hypostaseos), as well as the Catechetical Oration, revealed the broad lines of his theology*. Gregory presents himself explicitly as the continuator of Basil's work and also gives a role to his sister Macrina: thus, in a setting reminiscent of the Phaedo, or as Diotima inspiring Socrates, Macrina answers Gregory's anxieties about death* and the beyond (De Anima et Resur- rectione). Lastly, the scriptural commentaries—and chiefly the Homilies on Christ and the Life of Moses, written in the last years of his life—showed how much the different senses of Scripture* render exegesis*, theology, and mysticism* inseparable. Gregory of Nyssa's hermeneutics* owes a great deal to Origen*, and therefore to Alexandrian exegesis, which was initially derived from Philo. Moreover, Gregory acknowledged his “close and fervent reading” of Origen (Hom. I On Christ). The idea of akolouthia, of the logical “linking” of the verses of Scripture, served to show revelation* at work in the biblical text, and so all the more enabled Gregory to bring human reason into harmony with the logic of the divine plan.

2. Doctrine and Spirituality

a) Theology of Creation and Anthropology. Like Basil, Gregory commented on the Hexameron, which he extended with a treatise on the Creation* of man (De hominis opificio). Gregory borrowed, not without a certain eclecticism, the concepts of Greek ontology (see Stead 1985). But in his case, by a decisive evolution, he placed little stress on the distinction between the sensory and the intelligible in order to accentuate the differences between the created and the uncreated. The concepts of limit and moderation therefore defined the diastèma (spacing out, temporal interval) of the Creation. Gregory made a close connection between cosmology and anthropology* in his meditation on nature* (phusis). He linked together ethics* and “physics”—Qo, on which Gregory wrote a commentary (In Ecclesiasten Homiliae) is, in patristic tradition*, the book of “physics,” of knowledge of the created universe and of its limits—thanks to the idea of moderation. Man himself stands on the boundaries (methorios), on the borderline between the sensory and the intelligible; and in conformity with an anthropocentric viewpoint, man is the apex of creation (see De hominis opificio, chap. 2–4). The concept of the pleroma (see Ep. I, 23)—applied just as readily to the cosmos* as to the qualities shared by all humanity, and by the Church in search of its unity*—means in Gregory's work an accomplishment to which all creation aspires.

The verse from Genesis 1:26: “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness,” is a key reference for Nyssean anthropology. The affinity (suggeneia) of nature that links man to the divine is shown, according to Gregory, by the existence of his fundamental liberty*, of a capacity for wanting and doing good, which is in fact its definition. The finality of human life is an “assimilation with God*,” a Platonic expression (Theaetetus 176 b) adopted by Gregory. Taking the path of righteousness (see In Inscriptiones Psalmorum, on Psalm 1) “results from freedom of choice [prohairesis] and we are thus, in a sense, our own parents” (Life of Moses II, 3)—an audacious statement, often repeated by Gregory. Since they are created by God, realities can only be good; consequently, evil* is nothing more than “what is not” (to mè on), and it only occurs as a result of using freedom* badly.

In Gregory's works the definition of man as the image of God takes clear precedence over the Stoic thesis of man as microcosm, which he also borrowed; but he expressed this idea in dualistic terms. Gregory thus made a distinction between the soul* and the body that owed a great deal to Platonism, and he located sin* in the realm of sensual and irrational urges, which mar the “resemblance” to God without however totally erasing the seal of “the image.” Sexual differentiation (see Gn 1:27) was neither the cause nor the result of sin, and it was through a stroke of divine foresight (De hominis opificio 16–17) that it assured the continuity of the created in its finiteness. To define the soul and its “localization,” Gregory was first inclined to refute the theory (defended by Origen in particular) of the pre-existence of souls and, through this very opposition, to reject the idea of metempsychosis (De hominis opificio 28–29; De Anima et Resurrectione 88s). Quite the contrary, the creation of both the soul and the body were concomitant—and Gregory's interest in the medical conceptions of his time gave him a concrete approach to man's constitution (De hominis opificio 30). It was the intellectual part of the soul that, in the case of man, authorized the free choice of his actions. Conversely, “thoughtlessness” (aboulia) is what led to sin. To describe man's fallen nature (Daniélou 1944; Hom. on Christ), Gregory spoke of the “garments of skins” (see Gn 3:21), and interpreted them in a metaphorical sense. Finally, Gregory devoted the last part of his treatise De Anima et Resurrectione to the doctrine of the Resurrection*: this was a “restoration of our nature to its original state” (apokatastasis, see apocatastasis), everything that caused this original nature's dissolution—passions, sin, death*—being annihilated, in the end, by divine omnipotence*.

b) Christological and Trinitarian Doctrine. In his Contra Eunomium, which is much more developed than Basil's work on the same subject, Gregory answered the logical arguments of his adversary by stressing first of all the limits of the knowledge man can have of God—and therefore the limits of human language as applied to God (see Canévet 1983). In various ways the divine names* showed the energies of an unknowable divinity (theotès), offered only for contemplation* (thea; a word play on the two terms in To Ablabius: that there are not three Gods, GNO III, 1, 44). The treatise provided a classification of these names, of the scriptural terms that refer to God by means of the most material realities to the very names of Father*, Son, and Spirit. Gregory stressed their analogical status: the essence of the divinity was “above every name” (Phil 2:9). The three persons* worked together within the Trinity* and manifested themselves in an order that revealed the differences between the names. To make a clear distinction between ousia and hypostasis, Gregory resorted to analogy*, based on the distinction common to nature and the individual. Refuting thus the accusation of tritheism*, he confessed “a single God in three persons [prosôpa] or hypostases” (Epistle to the Greeks, based on commonly held ideas, GNO III, 1, 33)—prosôpon and hypostasis therefore both referred to the person, which statement notably clarified the trinitarian debate.

The Incarnation*, in the Nyssean view of divine economy, was first of all an answer to the great swarm of evil, to its maximal unfolding in the world (Disc. cat. 29, 4). Opposed to Apollinarianism*, Gregory was preoccupied with reconciling the twofold affirmation of divine impassibility and the complete humanity of Christ. Through incarnation, the Son shared in the “nature common” to all men, which included growth and “passions,” pathè (that is, the ability to change from birth to death, Orat. cat., 16, 6): this “yet without sin” (Heb 4:15). In order to connote the union of both natures in Christ, Gregory continually gave priority to a vocabulary signifying mixture, and he could affirm that the double union of the divinity with both the soul and the body of Jesus* subsisted until death (Ep. 3, 22; De tridui spatium, GNO IX, 273–306, The Pascal Christ, hom. 2, p. 45–71), as a guarantee of the total resurrection of the human composite. It was also because this human composite was a mixture of the immaterial soul and of the body, even after death, that a resurrection of the flesh was possible; and every soul also possessed the ability to recognize the body to which it was joined (De Anima et Resurrectione, 97; see Le Boulluec 1995). Finally, Gregory’s Catechetical Orations stresses the cosmic dimension of the cross on which Christ “binds the universe tightly into a union and adjusts it to himself, by bringing the diverse natures of the world into one accord and one harmony” (32, 6).

c) Mystical Theology. “For from the greatness and beauty of created things comes a corresponding perception of their creator” (Wis 13:5). On several occasions Gregory relied on this verse (CE 2, 13.154; in Eccl. 1 and 8; De hom. op. 2) to define simultaneously and paradoxically man’s ability to know and name God, and the limits of his knowledge faced with divine infinity*. Gregory made of Moses the model of our access to the inaccessible; and, in order to recount this spiritual experience, favored the metaphors of darkness and the luminous cloud (Life of Moses, Hom. on Christ).

Although his treatise, De Anima et Resurrectione did not go beyond a conception of desire as a passion destined to disappear, the Life of Moses and the Homily on Christ provided the doctrine of another desire, the “epektasis” (see Phil 3:13 “Forgetting what lies behind and straining forward [epekteinomenos] to what lies ahead”; see Daniélou 1944); and in the logic of that desire, the man who turned towards God was led into an endless ascent. Moses (Life of Moses II, 224s) and the bride of Christ provided Gregory with the models of this never-ending ascent: “He who ascends never stops, rising from one beginning to another, and the beginning of the ever-increasing good has no end” (Hom. VIII the Christ). The concept of epektasis also gave a full range of meanings to a dynamic view of the eschaton; and in the image of the mystery* of the union of the two natures in Christ, the movement that led the created “from one degree of glory* to another” (2 Cor 3:18) in no way affected the permanence of the divinity: “The soul...never stops growing, but the good in which it shares remains the same, always revealing itself as just as transcendent to the soul which shares ever more in it” (Hom. VII on Christ).

3. Legacy

The first sign of Gregory’s enduring influence was the circulation of his work, particularly of the treatise De hominis opificio and the Homily on Christ, of which translations existed in the various Eastern churches. A second sign was the extracts from his commentaries to be found in the works on the Scriptures composed from the start of the sixth century and in the anthologies of patristic texts. Latin translations gave his commentary on Christ, and also the one on Origen, a wide circulation in medieval monastic circles.

Cappadocian theology contributed to bringing the Arian crisis to an end by assuring a balance between the Christologies of Antiochian inspiration and those of Alexandrian inspiration. Through his philosophical range, Gregory assimilated and metamorphosed fundamental traits of Platonism* and of Neoplatonism*, which were integrated into the common expression of the faith* (see Ivánka 1964). His mystical theology, propagated particularly by Maximus* the Confessor and Pseudo-Dionysius*, has had a wide inspirational influence on Eastern Christian spirituality.

• PG 44–46; Gregorii Nysseni Opera (GNO), Ed. W. Jaeger, H. Langerbeck et al., 10 vols., Berlin then Leyden, 1921–.

- SC 1 bis (Life of Moses), 6 (On the Creation of Man), 119 (On Virginity), 178 (Life of Macrina), 363 (Letters), 416 (Hom. On Ecclesiastes).
- (1908) Discours catéchétique, French trans. L. Méridier, Paris.
- (1992) Le Cantique des Cantiques (Homélie), Paris.
- (1995) Gregory of Nyssa's Treatise on the Inscriptions of the Psalms, Introduction, Translation and Notes, R.E. Heine, Oxford.
- (1995) Traité de l'âme et de la résurrection, trans. J. Terrieux, Paris.
- H. Urs von Balthasar (1942), Présence et pensée: Essai sur la philosophie religieuse de Gr. de Nysse, Paris (2nd Ed. 1988).
- J. Daniélou (1944), Platonisme et théologie mystique: Doctrine spirituelle de Gr. de Nysse, 2nd Ed., Paris.
- H. Merki (1952), Homoiôsis Theô: Von der platonischen Angleichung an Gott zur Göttähnlichkeit bei Gr., Friburg.
- J. Gaïth (1953), La conception de la liberté chez Grégoire de Nysse, Paris.
- J. Lebourlier (1962–1963), "A propos de l'état du Christ dans la mort," RSPTh 46, 629–49; and 47, 161–80.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato christianus: Übernahme und Umgestaltung des Platonismus durch die Väter, chap. IV, Einsiedeln.
- D.L. Balàs (1966), Metousia Theou: Man's Participation in God's Perfections According to Saint Gregory of Nyssa, Rome.
- W. Jaeger (1966), Gregor von Nyssa's Lehre vom Heiligen Geist, Leyden.
- M. Canévet (1967), "Grégoire de Nysse," DSp 6, 471–1011.
- J.R. Bouchet (1968), "Le vocabulaire de l'union et du rapport des natures chez saint Gr.," RThom 68, 533–82.
- M. Harl (1971) (Ed.), Écriture et culture philosophique dans la pensée de Gr. De Nysse Actes du Colloque de Chèvetogne, Leyden.
- J. Fontaine and Ch. Kannengiesser (Eds.) (1972), Epektasis: Mélanges patristiques offerts au cardinal J. Daniélou, Paris.
- R. Hübner (1974), Die Einheit des Leibes Christi bei Gregor von Nyssa, Leyden.
- H. Dörrie et al. (1976), Gregor von Nyssa und die Philosophie. Zweites Internationales Kolloquium über Gregor von Nyssa, Leyden.
- M. Alexandre (1981), "Protologie et eschatologie chez Gr. De Nysse," in U. Bianchi (Ed.) L'antropologia di Origene e di Gregorio di Nissa, 122–59, Milan.
- M. Canévet (1983), Grégoire et l'herméneutique biblique: Étude des rapports entre le langage et la connaissance de Dieu, Paris.
- D.L. Balàs (1985), "Gregor von Nyssa," TRE 14, 173–81.
- C.G. Stead (1985), Substance and Illusion in the Christian Fathers, London.
- Th. Ziegler (1987), "Les petits traités trinitaires de Grégoire de Nysse, témoins d'un itinéraire théologique (379–383)," thesis, University of Strasbourg.
- ♦ M. Altenburger, F. Mann (1988), Bibliographie zu Gregor von Nyssa: Editionen, Übersetzungen, Literatur, Leyden.
- H.R. Drobner and Ch. Klock (Eds.) (1990), Studien zu Gr. und der christlichen Spätantike, Leyden.
- G. Castelluccio (1992), L'antropologia di Gr., Bari.
- B. Pottier (1994), Dieu et le Christ selon Grégoire de Nysse, Brussels.
- A. Le Boulluec (1995), "Corporéité ou individualité? La condition finale des ressuscités selon Grégoire de Nysse," Aug. 35, 307–326.

FRANÇOISE VINEL

See also Alexandria, School of; Apollinarianism; Arianism; Platonism, Christian; Stoicism, Christian

Gregory of Rimini. See Nominalism

Gregory Palamas

1296–1359

The theology of Gregory Palamas is a major phenomenon of late-medieval Byzantine culture. A part of doctrine in the Eastern Orthodox Church, as well as a polemical crux between the Christian East and West, this theology* constitutes a dogmatic statement of Hesychastic* spirituality and represents one of the stakes in the ecumenical dialogue, as much by the soteriology that it encourages as by the closely connected notions that it implies regarding tradition*, pneumatology, and eschatology*.

a) Historic Landmarks. A monk of Mount Athos, archbishop of Thessalonica, and canonized in 1368, Gregory Palamas is commemorated as “Doctor of grace*.” His teaching, expounded in the Hagioritic Tome or “The Book of Holiness” of 1340, then approved by the synods* of Constantinople of June and August 1341, was solemnly confirmed by the Council of Blachernissa in 1351. He also features in the Synodikon, the dogmatic anthology proclaimed liturgically on the Sunday called “On the Victory of Orthodoxy.” His most systematic accounts can be found in the Triad or “Apology for the Holy Hesychasts” (1341) and the CL Chapters (1349).

“Palamitism” arose from a dispute about the relativism preached about the Filioque* by the philosopher Barlaam during the negotiations with Rome*. Barlaam’s virulent attacks against Hesychastic circles spread the controversy. Complicated by the civil war of 1341–47, this dispute irremediably divided Byzantine intellectuals. This quasi-gnosticological controversy, hinging on such recurrent themes as the quality of prayer practices, the value of profane wisdom*, or the authority* of patristic sources, bore essentially on the nature of mystical experience as a way of attaining a knowledge* of God. The opposition to Gregory Palamas brought together two currents of anti-monastic humanism that had been regularly marginalized from the time of the iconoclastic period in the eighth and ninth centuries. The first movement, largely of Neoplatonic inspiration (Barlaam, Gregoras), aimed at the emancipation of philosophy*. The second, of conservative (Akyndinos) or pre-Scholastic slant (Kypariossitès), took up a position in favor of a rational theology, and would end by acknowledging itself as Thomist* (P. and D. Kydonès). Animated by the same preoccupation with a return to Hellenism and by a common interest in the new thinking coming from the West (among which was Scotism), the thinkers of both the above movements rejected the Palamite theses, holding them to be heretical. They themselves were anathematized for “atheism*.” A century later, the representatives of the first movement (Bessarion, Plethon), as well as those of the second (Kalekas, Chrysobergès), would become the promoters of the Union of Florence, while the strict Palamites (Marcus of Ephesus), or the moderate ones (G. Scolarios), would reject it.

From that time onwards, the “Palamite error” would become a leitmotiv of the Catholic polemicists, a polemic sustained in the 16th century by the Latinized Greeks (Allatius, Arcadius, etc.); taken up again in the 17th century by the Jesuit “missionaries” (F. Richard) and the Dominicans (Le Quien), as well as by the systematicians (Petau); and lastly, perpetuated by the Greco-Catholics until the beginning of the 20th century. In the period between the two world wars, Gregory Palamas was still represented as an obscurantist pietist, the author of irrational dogmatics*, with neither precedents nor posterity (Jugie 1936). At the same time, the Neopatristic school, the chief expression of the theological renewal of modern Orthodoxy*, confirmed Palamitism as a doctrinal reference and a synthetic axis of the whole eastern tradition. Heralded by the methodical restructuring of V. L. Lossky and G. Florovsky, as well as by the work of B. Krivoshein, D. Staniloae, and C. Kern, J. Meyendorff’s thesis (1959) revived research. Since that time, Palamitism’s irreducibility to an ideological consequence of imperial Romanism (Meyendorff), its formative role in the neo-Hesychastic proselytism of the 14th and 15th centuries (Obolensky 1971), and its permanence and its dogmatic function in modern Orthodoxy (Podskalsky 1988) have been established. The debate is therefore no longer about the historic validity of Palamitism but its theoretical coherence.

b) Doctrinal Aspects. Gregory Palamas’s first aims, the normativity of the context of his thought, and the topicality of certain major points of his spirituality, has also all been demonstrated. An organic whole thus emerges, centered on a concept of true participation in God which implies a realization in the present of the eschatological mystery, a whole that includes both the conceptual schemas of Greek patristics and those of Byzantine thought (Gregory of Cyprus), the asceticomystical postulations of early Hesychasm (Evagrius, Macarius) and those of later Hesychasm (Symeon the New Theologian, Gregory the Sinaite). From the polemical essay of the Triad to their summary exposition in the CL Chapters, several synthetic axes thus emerge, which are classics of Orthodox thought. There is a christological conception of the history of salvation* (Tr: III, 1, 16) in which, from the Creation* to the Parousia, the Incarnation* determines a cosmic dynamic of transfiguration (Ch. 2); a theocentric and monist definition of anthropology*, in which the ideas of continuous prayer*, of spiritual meaning, of the joint illumination of both the intellect and the heart (see soul*-heart-body; Tr: II, 2, 12–13) enter a theory of corporeal existence that aims to prove the superiority of human beings over the angels* (Ch. 39); and a charismatic ecclesiology in which the primacy of contemplation* has as corollary the prophetic ministry* of monasticism* (Tr: II, 1, 36), without its being, however, disassociated from the sacramental order (Ch. 57).

Once this whole was agreed upon (Kern, Meyendorff, Mantzarides, etc.), the cardinal sign of Palamitism still remains its dogmatics. How can transcendence and communion* be reconciled? While the anti-Palamites insisted on interpreting it as “ditheism,” the simultaneous distinction and unity of the ousia and the energeia in God helped Gregory Palamas to found a theory of deification. The final aim of the Christian experience*, the vision of God (“immediate, supra-intellectual, transfiguring”), implies that “grace*, which comes from the eternal Father*,” is “uncreated” (T. Hag., PG 150, 1225 s). The distinction between essence and energy corresponds to this implication. In fact it describes how, “without abandoning its non-manifestation,” essence manifests itself as an energy—Gregory Palamas also speaks of the “energies,” using a plural which does not connote any division—which is inseparable from it, “radiance,” divine glory*, and splendor, which reveals and imparts trinitarian life through the power of the Holy* Spirit (see omnipotence*; T. de 1341, PG 150, 680 B). Palamitism thus portrays itself as a development of the ecumenical councils: there must be added to the communion kat’ousian of the Trinity* (one nature, three hypostases) and to the communion kath’hupostasias of the Word* incarnate (one hypostasis, two natures), the communion kat’energeian, which makes it possible for “myriads” of human hypostases to become participants, through grace, in the unique divinity (T. de 1351, PG 151, 448B). The distinction, therefore, uncovers a mystery* that its antinomic structure reveals as such; it does not depend on our intellectual grasp of this mystery but is “real” (VI. Lossky).

c) Theological Views. In outline, the construction is opposed to the Latin and Scholastic* theory of the Beatific Vision* of the divine essence, which is based on divine simplicity and on a mediate, deliberate conception of participation. Its contradictory canonization by Orthodoxy* and Catholicism* explains the contemporary debate. For J. Meyendorff, Gregory Palamas has perfected the patristic and conciliar heritage, against the secularizing tide that heralds the Renaissance and the Reformation, by correcting its Platonizing excesses along biblical and personalist lines. Palamitism, which is impossible to compress into a system, is then viewed as the apophatic expression of a mystical existentialism. Accepted by the Orthodox world (with the exception of Romanides), this thesis justifies the Palamite character of contemporary research devoted to ontological criticism (Yannaras), to the metaphysics of the person* (Clément), and to the phenomenology of ecclesiality (Zizioulas) or of the Holy Spirit (Bobrinskoy). It has received a mixed reception in the Catholic world. There have been, on the one hand, widespread refutations: it was the opposite of his intention that Palamitism, which arose from a purely Byzantine dispute (Beck), should crystallize a mistaken reading of Greek tradition to the point of freeing from it its latent Neoplatonism, with the result of diluting its christological gain in knowledge into an essentialism that leaves place only for a degraded participation to divinity (Ivánka 1964). In this case it therefore becomes necessary to differentiate genuine Palamitism from Neopalamitism, the latter representing a disguised return to Maximus* the Confessor, nonetheless cut off at its roots from its evolution toward Thomist intentionality (Le Guillou 1974). Elsewhere one meets attempts at reconciliation: recognition of the interpretive legitimacy of Gregory Palamas would make possible the acceptance of a “theological pluriformity at the center of a unity of faith* and beyond all dogmatic exclusivism,” and Palamitism could contribute to the solution of certain problems within the Latin Tradition (de Halleux 1973). In fact, the debate on sources—“Palamitism before Gregory Palamas”—seems to have run its course, and the most impartial commentators agree that there can be identified in the structure of thought and the conceptual elaborations of the Cappadocian Fathers (de Halleux 1975), of Pseudo-Dionysius* (Kühlmann), and of Maximus (Thunberg), prefigurations or models inherent in the Palamite distinction. Another fact: the reform of the Augustino-Thomist inheritance proposed by K. Rahner*, and at its heart the revision of the debate on nature* and grace, seems to be in harmony with Palamite preoccupations and feelings. A more realistic and optimistic understanding of salvation would imply the notion of uncreated grace. Is that sufficient to permit the passing over of the fundamental opposition of both the eastern and western hermeneutic circles?

From this viewpoint, the Palamite pneumatology of Eros (Lison 1994) seems essential. How is the eternal existence of the Holy Spirit with the manifestation of its gifts articulated within the divine plan? For Gregory Palamas, divinization is the coming of the Kingdom*, already received here below by adoption. Now, the Church is not the Kingdom but its icon: the personal dimension of sainthood (see cult* of saints) thus remains irreducible. Thus there would be, according to a theory sketched by VI. Lossky but subsequently neglected by Orthodox theology, a “double divine plan,” one but distinct, for the Son and the Spirit. There, it seems, lies the key to future research.

- G. Palamas (1959), Défense des saints Hésychastes, Ed. and Trans. J. Meyendorff, SSL 30–31.
- (1962–88), Suggràmata, Ed. P. Krèstou, Thessalonica, 4 vols.
- N. Gregoras (1976), Antirrhethika I, edited and translated by H. V. Beyer, WBS 12, Vienna.
- G. Akyndinos (1983), Letters, edited and translated by A. C. Hero, Washington.

- (1988), The One Hundred and Fifty Chapters, edited and translated by R. E. Sinkewicz, STPIMS, Toronto.
- (1995), Traité apodictiques sur la procession du Saint-Esprit, French trans. E. Ponsoye, Paris.
- ♦ M. Jugie (1936), Theologia Dogmatica, II, Paris, 68–183.
- B. Krivochéine (1938), “The Ascetic and Theological Teaching of Gr.P.,” ECQ 3, 26–33.
- VI. Lossky (1944), Essai sur la théologie mystique de l’Église d’Orient, Paris.
- C. Kern (1950), Antropologia S. Grigoriia Palamy, Paris.
- J. Meyendorff (1959), Introduction à l’étude de Gr.P., Paris.
- J. Romanidès (1960–61), “Notes on the Palamite Controversy,” GOTR 6, 186–205.
- H. G. Beck (1963), “Die Byzantinische Kirche: Das Zeitalter des Palamismus,” in HKG(J) III, 2, 588–624.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato Christianus, Einsiedeln.
- J. Kühlmann (1968), Die Taten des Einfachen Gottes, Würzburg, 43–104.

- D. Obolensky (1971), The Byzantine Commonwealth, London, 377–479.
- A. de Halleux (1973), “P. et scolastique,” RTL 5, 409–442.
- G. Mantzaridès (1973), Palamika, Thessalonica.
- M. J. Le Guillou (Ed.) (1974), “Jugements sur les Églises d’Orient au XVIIe s.,” Ist 19, 301–320.
- A. de Halleux (1975), “P. et tradition,” Irén 48, 479–93.
- L. Thunberg (1985; 2nd Ed. 1995, augmented Ed., Chicago and La Salle), Man and the Cosmos, New York, 131–56.
- G. Podskalsky (1988), Griechische Theologie in der Zeit der Türkenherrschaft, Munich.
- J. Lison (1994), L’Esprit répandu, Paris.

JEAN-FRANÇOIS COLOSIMO

See also Ecumenicism; Fathers of the Church; Hesychasm; Spiritual Theology; Thomism; Vision, Beatific

Gregory the Great

c. 540–604

1. Life

Gregory I was born into the senatorial class and was Prefect of Rome in 573. He became a monk in 574, and the pope’s legate (apocrisarius) in Constantinople around 578. On his return to Rome, around 585, he became an abbot, and then pope* in 590. He concentrated as pope both upon the pastoral duties of his mission and upon the development of a theology of episcopal ministry*.

(a) Gregory was a significant figure in the process by which the Bishop of Rome came to claim and establish a hegemony among the ancient patriarchates*. By Gregory’s time, the papacy, which had always been more autonomous, had largely taken over the running of Rome*; this gave it a temporal authority that was to be important to its subsequent development in the long-running struggle between church* and state during the Middle Ages.

(b) As an abbot, Gregory seems to have preached on the First Book of Kings, the Prophets, Proverbs, and the Song of Songs. In around 591, he completed the Moralia in Job, probably the most widely read of his works in the Middle Ages. In the same period, he worked on the Regula Pastoralis. In 591, ill and unable to preach, he composed sermons on the Gospels*. While the Lombards were besieging Rome, he gave his Homilies on Ezekiel, which he later published in two books (601). Some have doubted the authenticity of his Dialogues (593–94), which contain, most notably, a life of St. Benedict and accounts of miracles*, and they seem rather to represent Gregory’s attempt at a different literary genre, akin to the lives of the desert fathers. A substantial body of letters survives.

2. Theology

Gregory was not an original thinker. His achievement was to present much of the body of Augustine*’s thought for a popular audience and to integrate something of the spirituality of the eastern tradition in a balanced presentation of Christian life. He worked for the most part through the exposition of scripture, tracing imagery and drawing out meanings whose vividness gave them wide currency throughout the Middle Ages.

(a) For Gregory, preaching* was the means by which a bishop* properly fulfills his function of guardianship and maintenance of the faith*. He was largely responsible for the model of the four senses of scripture* that scholars used in the West until the 16th century: a literal or historical sense, an allegorical sense, an anagogic sense (prophesying eternal life*), and a tropological or moral sense.

(b) Gregory saw the Eucharist* as a manifestation of a harmony in the universe. It is a mediation between the human and the divine, a healing of all divisions. In the Eucharist, the saints are already united with God in this life. Christ* is offered as victim (hostia) and sacrifice* (a thesis stressed by Gregory, and an important contribution) in a humility and obedience that is the pattern for all Christians. The Eucharist's effectiveness depends upon participation in Christ's body, which means that Christians must not only practice contemplation*, but also seek to serve their neighbors. Finally, the Eucharist is able to benefit souls after death*.

Gregory himself constantly felt the existence of a tension between contemplation and action, and linked it to the bipolarity of the "inward" (the spiritual) and the "outward" (the bodily). Outwardly, all is distress, change, and decay. Inwardly, there is peace and tranquility, the foretaste of a Heaven that Platonists as well as Christians could long for. The late antique preoccupation with the dichotomy of body and soul* is developed by Gregory with a new richness of imagery. His emphasis on illumination is also typically Platonist in style, but for Gregory it is the divine light of grace* that shows us what we could not otherwise see in our sinful blindness.

(c) Gregory's use of biblical imagery in speaking of Christ has exerted a major influence on Christian language. Christ, the Church's Bridegroom, is the model for the intimacy that ought to exist between Christ and the soul. Christ is the gateway by which Christians come into the presence of God. Preachers imitate Christ in this. The church itself is the gateway between this world and the next. Christ's headship of the church is a paradigm for the bishop's authority*. Christ is also the Judge who weighs men's merits with both justice* and loving kindness.

3. Posterity

The Regula Pastoralis was to influence the medieval conception of the role of a bishop. Bernard* of Clairvaux used it in writing the De Consideratione for Eugenius III, and it thus affected theories of papal supremacy in the later Middle Ages.

The Dialogues were important in the success of Benedictine monasticism*, which provided the Rule by which western monks were to live at least until the 12th century. Gregory also advised Augustine of Canterbury, whom he had sent as his missionary to Great Britain, to make a sensible selection from all the existing rites so as to construct an appropriate rite for the new Christians of the island. A number of practices in the liturgy of the West, for example the use of the Lord's Prayer at the end of the Eucharistic prayer, seem to be indebted to Gregory's guidance. The Gregorian Sacramentary that was sent by Pope Hadrian I to Charlemagne around 790, and was thereafter circulated widely in the Frankish empire, goes back to Gregory's pontificate.

- PL 66 and 75–79; CChr.SL 140–44; Homilies on Ezekiel, SC 327 and 360; Commentary on the first Book of Kings, SC 351 and 391; Moral Exposition on the Book of Job, SC 32 bis, 212 and 221; Dialogues, SC 260 and 265; Letters SC 370–371; Regula Pastoralis, SC 381–82.
- R. Wasselinck (1965), "L'influence de l'exégèse de saint Grégoire le Grand," MSR 22, 205–219.
- C. Dagens (1977), Saint Grégoire le Grand, culture et expérience chrétienne, Paris.
- J. Richards (1980), Consul of God: The Life and Times of Gregory the Great, London.
- W.D. McCready (1981), Signs of Sanctity: Miracles in the Thought of Gregory the Great, Toronto.
- D. Norberg (1982), Critical and Exegetical Notes on the Letters of St. Gregory the Great, Stockholm.
- J.M. Petersen (1984), The Dialogues of Gregory the Great in their Late Antique Cultural Background, Toronto.
- G.R. Evans (1986), The Thought of Gregory the Great, Oxford.
- L. La Piana (1987), Teologia e ministero della parola in San Gregorio Magno, Palermo.
- C. Straw (1988), Gregory the Great: Perfection in Imperfection, Berkeley.
- R. Godding (1990), Bibliografia di Gregorio Magno (1890–1989), Rome.

GILLIAN R. EVANS

See also Holiness; Mass, Sacrifice of the; Platonism

Groote, Gerard. See Devotio Moderna

H

Hadewijch of Antwerp. See Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Happiness. See Beatitude; Supernatural

Hardening

a) Old Testament and Judaism. The terminology is very rich: hardness, rigidity (châzaq, qâshâh; Gr. sklêrunô, sklêros; pôroô, pôrôsis, sometimes synonymous with “blindness”); heaviness (kâbéd, Gr. barunô, bareô); stoutness, impermeability (shâmén, Gr. pachunô); deafness, blindness (often paired: Dt 29:3; Is 6:10, 42:18ff.; Jer 5:21); giddiness (Dt 28:28), vertigo (Is 19:14); torpor (Is 29:10); drunkenness (Ps 60:5); delirium (Dt 28:28; Zec 12:4); and so on. The eyes and ears are affected, but above all the heart, in the Semitic sense, as the center of conscious life. It is the most serious consequence to which sin* can lead: a spiritual condition in which an individual not only does not want to convert himself or herself, but is no longer able to do so (Jer 13:23). The good*, the path of salvation*, the voice of God* is not merely refused: it is no longer perceived.

The agent of this hardening is occasionally specified. Sometimes it is man himself, as in the case of Pharaoh (Ex 7:13, 14, 8:15, 9:35; Dt 29:18; Ps 95:8; Jer 7:24, 9:13, 11:8; Zec 7:11f.). However, the originator is often YHWH, who may bring it about for the purpose of punishment (1 Sm 2:25; 1 Kgs 12:15), but also of salvation (Ex 4:1, 7:3, 22, 9:12, 10:1, 20, 27; 14:4, 8, 17).

In later writings there appears a tendency on the one hand to eliminate this mode of expression (for example, the modifications of the Septuagint in Is 6:9f.) and, on the other hand, to accentuate it by coming close to a dualist and predestinarian vocabulary. What is involved, however, is more than an imperfection of thought and language, a sensibility less attuned to distinguishing between consequence and finality, between “permitting” and “wishing,” or between the “first cause” and the “second cause.” Beyond all these psychological or linguistic considerations, necessary as they may be, remains a more strictly theological content, indispensable and linked to the deepest core of the faith* of Israel*, to the biblical understanding of God and humanity.

By underlining the seriousness of the situation brought about by sin and the impossibility of curing or remedying it by human agency, the concept of hardening opened the way to a deeper understanding of salvation as grace*, as a gift of God (Ps 51:12; Is 63:17; Jer 31:18) and an eschatological event. One day, the incurable obstinacy of the human heart will be vanquished, in Israel as in the nations (Jer 3:17): God will remove the heart of stone and provide a new heart (Ez 11:19, 36:26f., 39:29; Jer 24:7, 31:33, 32:39; Dt 30:6), and eyes and ears capable of hearing (Is 32:3; Bar 2:31).

b) New Testament. More than to pagans or to unbelievers and sinners in general (Eph 4:18; 2 Cor 4:3f.; Heb 3:8, 15; 4:7), the theme of hardening is applied to Israel’s unbelief. By linking it above all with Isaiah 6:9ff., this most mysterious and shocking fact is explained, at least in part. We are faced both with an apologetic argument (even in the fact of being rejected, Jesus* fulfilled the Scriptures*!) and, perhaps more important, with a theological interpretation. The situation in question had already been permitted by God himself in the past. If it comes to pass both now in the face of Christian preaching* (Rom 9:18, 11:7; 2 Cor 3:14f.; Acts 28:26f.), and already in Jesus’ time in response to his own person (Mk 4:11f.; Jn 12:40), then it heightens God’s mystery*.

Blindness, however, is in no way equivalent to a curse or a definitive rejection. Far from expressing an “anti-Judaic” attitude, this theological theme presupposes Israel’s irreversible choice* as an actual race* and the certainty of its full participation in eschatological salvation (Rom 11:25–32; also 2 Cor 3:14ff.; and probably also Mk 4:21–25; Mt 23:39; Lk 13:35; 21:24).

- K. L. Schmidt, M. A. Schmidt (1954), “pakhunô ktl.,” ThWNT 5, 1024–32.
- J. Gnilka (1961), Die Verstockung Israels, Isaia 6, 9–10 in der Theologie der Synoptiker, StANT 3.
- H. Räisänen (1972), The Idea of Divine Hardening: A Comparative Study of the Notion of Divine Hardening, Leading Astray, and Inciting to Evil in the Bible and in the Qur’an, SESJ 25.
- V. Fusco (1980), Parola e Regno: La sezione delle parabole (Mc 4, 1–34) nella prospettiva marciiana, Aloi, 13, 221–304.
- J. Delorme (1982), “Savoir, croire et communication parabolique,” in Actes sémiotiques-Documents IV/38, CNRS, Paris.
- J. Delorme (1987), “La communication parabolique d’après Marc 4,” Sémiotique et Bible 48, 1–17.
- C. A. Evans (1989), To See and Not Perceive: Isaiah 6, 9–10 in Early Jewish and Christian Interpretation, JSOT.S 64.
- R. Küschelm (1990), Verstockung, Gericht und Heil: Exegetische und bibeltheologische Untersuchung zum sogenannten “Dualismus” und “Determinismus” in Joh 12, 35–50, BBB 76.
- L. Perrone (Ed.) (1992), Il cuore indurito del Faraone: Origene e il problema del libero arbitrio, Genoa.

VITTORIO FUSCO

See also Conversion; Heart of Christ; Mercy; Wrath of God

Harnack, Adolf von. See Hellenization of Christianity; Liberalism

Healing

The Hebrew râfâ (“to heal”) is linked to rôfé (“doctor”). The Greek Rhaphaël, in Tobit, directly transcribes the Hebrew: “God* heals.” To heal is also very simply “to live” or “make live” (Gn 20:7 and 2 Kgs 8:8). The Greek books use therapeuô or iaomai for “to heal,” and only iatros for doctor. The neuter iama (1 Cor 12) is reserved for the charisma of healing.

Healing, in literal sense, designates deliverance from physical evil*; in the figurative sense, it means deliverance from moral evil, relief from pain. While a contemporary Westerner is used to making the distinction between the two, the Scriptures* tell stories in which the literal and figurative senses intertwine. Sickness and sin* intersect, for the human body can be adequately treated only at the crossing of the two planes. The concept of healing cannot be separated from the notion of salvation*, nor from the notion of purification. The request for salvation from a patient can just as well be a request for organic remedies as a call for the words of the therapist.

The Old Testament records healings obtained through a man of God’s prayer* or by his actions. To be noted are (1) the talking presence of an intermediary; (2) the sick person’s effort to revisit in words his or her suffering (Ps; Is 38:10—“I said”); and (3) the insertion within the symbols of communal living. In the New Testament, healing becomes a privileged place in which the figure of Jesus is revealed as Christ* and Savior. The narratives of healing and discourses of teaching are so closely related that teaching-healing can be considered a key pair in interpreting them.

1. Doctors, Remedies, the Sick

a) Medicine. Job links doctors and charlatans (Jb 13:4). Tobit says that the physicians could not help his blindness (Tb 2:10), but that the angel would recommend a remedy. As opposed to the major literary works of ancient Egypt or Mesopotamia, the Old Testament attaches little importance to medicine. Ben Sirach judges it with moderation (Sir 38:1–14). A few remedies are mentioned (Is 1:6): the gall of the fish for Tobit’s eyes (Tb 6:4f., 11:8, 11:12), a cake of figs for boils (2 Kgs 20:7), the leech, the use of healing herbs (Sir 38:4 and Wis 7:20). Wisdom of Solomon knows and uses the medical notions from the Greek world.

The New Testament mentions wine and oil (Lk 10:34), and Jesus uses his spit (Mk 7:33, 8:23; Jn 9:6) and touch (Mt 8:15; Lk 22:51). Most often, healing occurs during a verbal exchange with patients.

b) Places to Be Healed. Sickness, often contagious or considered as such, is considered a social plague, such as leprosy. It leads to exclusion, therefore healing requires control: the sick person presumed to be healed has to go and be examined by competent authorities—priests and Levites. The descriptions of procedures and prescriptions play an important role in the Torah (Lv 13f.). In the Gospels*, when Jesus heals the lepers, he subjects his patients to this law and sends them to priests (Lk 17:14).

c) Healers. Healing comes from God alone. The prophets* obtain it from him. Thus Elijah (1 Kgs 17:17–24), Elisha (2 Kgs 5), and—a typical case—Isaiah (2 Kgs 20:1–11; Is 38). The narratives focus on what the sick person and the one from whom he requests help have in common: there is no healing without true words. Jesus places healing within the creative work that gathered all people in a single, unique humanity. Upon YHWH’s order (Gn 20:7), the pagan king Abimelech receives Abraham’s intercession (he is then called “prophet”) and is healed.

This request for the fulfillment of the creative work is carried out in prayer (mediators: Ps 35:13f.). The psalms*, in which most hardships are expressed through repercussions in the body, address the complaints of the suffering to God, who saves the innocent and sinners alike. The wounded man who exposed himself before God discovers cultural and social proximity in praise*.

2. Christological Dimension of Healing

In the desert, the people were healed from snake bites (punishment for revolt) by looking at a bronze snake that Moses placed on a pole (Nm 21:6–9). The typology of John 3:14f. sees Jesus’ cross in the episode. Healing is henceforth perceived in unique connection to Jesus’ body. The journey includes the presentation of the Lord as “I am the Lord, your healer” (Ex 15:26); it includes the vision of the Savior as both “lifted up” (Is 52:13; Jn 8:8, 12:40) and “healing” (53:6) blind eyes (Is 6:10 and Mt 13:15). The sick are healed by Jesus through his body and toward his body. They enter the world of the living, of the talking and seeing. After Pentecost, the lame man at the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:1–16), after being taken “by the right hand” by Peter*, “clung to Peter and John.” The place given in this story to the “name*” of Jesus (Acts 3:6, 16) suggests that we should understand healing as transplants onto the body of those named by Jesus Christ.

Healing

From the perspective of the healing stories, the body seems to be the manifestation of the intangible and problematic encounter between word and flesh*, thus suggesting the work to be done and the risks to overcome when it involves taking care of what is and continues to be the suffering in every man.

- H. W. Wolff (1974), Anthropologie de l'Ancien Testament, Geneva.
- C. J. Groesbeck (1975), “The Archetypal Image of the Wounded Healer,” Journal of Analytical Psychology 20, 122–45.
- E. de Rosny (1984), “Les nouveaux guérisseurs africains,” Études 361, 661–79.

- F. Laplantine (1986), Anthropologie de la maladie, Paris.
- L. Perrin (1987), Guérir et sauver, Paris.
- D. Le Breton (1990), Anthropologie du corps et modernité, Paris.
- J. Delorme (1991), Au risque de la parole: Lire les Évangiles, Paris, 17–92.
- G. Kowalski (1991), “Santé et salut à l’interface entre biologie et société,” BICP 40, 197–224.
- M. McGuive (1991), “Religion, santé, maladie,” Con. 324, 109–21.
- P. Gisel (1992), Corps et Esprit, les mystères de l’incarnation et de la résurrection, Geneva.
- X. Lacroix (1992), Le corps de chair, Paris.
- T. Nathan (1994), L’influence qui guérit, Paris.
- H. Avalos (1995), Illness and Health Care in the Ancient Near East: The Role of the Temple in Greece, Mesopotamia, and Israel, Atlanta.

CÉCILE TURIOT

See also Anthropology; Faith; Flesh; Jesus, Historical; Miracle; Name; Psalms; Purity/Impurity; Sacrament; Salvation; Sin; Soul-Heart-Body

Heart. See Soul-Heart-Body

Heart of Christ

The heart was long considered the origin or seat of the feelings, in particular, of love*, before it became its permanent symbol. This metonymy and later this metaphor, which have exploited a great number of phrases from Scripture, have been used in extremely variable ways, which range from the most dolorous sentimentalism to the most decided voluntarism*, and from the most rhetorical piety to the most precise conceptuality. The ancient veneration of the wound in Christ’s side (Jn 19:34) was very quickly reinterpreted as a prehistory of the devotion to the heart of Christ* or the heart of Jesus* via medieval meditation on the Song of Songs and on John 13:23–25 (John leaning against the bosom and the breast of Jesus) and John 19:37 (the piercing by the lance exhibits the “inner” Jesus, his “bowels of mercy*,” according to Bernard* of Clairvaux), and the veneration of the crucifix in the devotio moderna*. In the 17th century, the devotion to the five wounds of Christ (Father Joseph de la Tremblaye, 1577–1638) and the devotion to his heart took separate paths. The common reference to the heart acquired a mass of voluntarist and affective meanings, being used first to refer to Mary* and then also to Jesus; these meanings communicated a renewed piety, in which the classical theology* of redemption was mixed with the idea of a duty of reparation. From that time onward, the devotion to the Sacred Heart, the carnal heart of Jesus wounded for our sins*, would consist in giving special honor to the love of Jesus Christ for mankind.

a) Heart and the States of Jesus. For the most part we owe the theology of the heart of Jesus to John Eudes (1601–80), an Oratorian (1623–43) very close to Father de Condren and later a founder of the Congregation of Jesus and Mary (the Eudists). In his Le Coeur admirable de la très sainte Mère de Dieu of 1681, John Eudes recognized eight principal meanings in the “heart”: 1) the “corporeal and material heart,” which 2) symbolizes memory or 3) “means the understanding by which holy meditation occurs”; 4) in the soul*, free will, and particularly 5) “the point in the spirit where contemplation* occurs”; 6) “the whole inner part of man”; 7) the Holy Spirit, “which is the heart of the Father* and of the Son”; and 8) the Son of God*, “called the heart of the eternal Father,” but also “the soul of our soul, the heart of our heart.” John Eudes does not suggest choosing between these meanings but rather their organization into a sequence that continually proceeds to an ever greater interiority, toward “the interior of Jesus.” H. Bremond saw in this taxonomy an oscillation between the heart-as-person*—inherited from Bérulle*, and which would be found again in Pascal*—and the heart-as-love, preached by Bernardine of Siena, and which would reveal itself to Margaret Mary Alacoque. However, the two meanings merge in the connotation of a hypostasized love. In the Man-God himself there are three hearts: the divine one, the spiritual one, and the corporeal one. The first is the indissoluble expression of the Son’s love for the Father, of the Word*’s love for humankind. The second is Christ’s will to love what is lovable, to hate what is hateful (the identification of the heart and the will is characteristic of 17th-century voluntarism). The third is that “muscle” that the Jansenists (Jansenism*) scoffed at as the center of a spirituality. In fact, the whole of the Eudist typology is governed by his re-adoption of one of Bérulle’s theories: that of the “states” (feelings or states of mind of Jesus) as it appears in the 1623 treatise De l’état et des grandeurs de Jésus, in which the proper role of the Word is always referred back to the Father (whence its theocentrism). The heart, synonym of the interior in John Eudes as in Jean-Jacques Olier (1608–57; Catéchisme chrétien pour la vie intérieure [1656]), transposes Bérulle’s “state” into a less metaphysical piety, but one where we can still find all of Bérulle’s most characteristic theses, such as that of the incarnate Word’s fatherhood toward Christians—Jesus “father of hearts,” or again, “a supplement for our duties” (Olier)—ideas that make it possible to conceptualize Christ’s mediating function (La vie et le royaume de Jésus dans les âmes chrétiennes, Caen, 1637). That is why the mysteries* of the faith*, in particular those that Bérulle examined—the Incarnation* and the Redemption, but also and above all the Trinity*—can be meditated on through the heart of Jesus. In this way, while creating an original work, John Eudes provided solid doctrinal foundations for devotion to the heart of Jesus.

b) Cult of the Sacred Heart and Its Doctrinal Acknowledgment. With Margaret Mary Alacoque (1648–90) the Trinitarian meditation dissipated to make way for a meditation on Jesus’ love of humankind. Especially associated with this was the idea of a misunderstanding of, or contempt for, Jesus’ love, which no longer required from the faithful a supportive solidarity, but an act of reparatory love—theocentrism thus became a preoccupation with reciprocity. In June 1675, this Visitationist sister from Paray-le-Monial received a vision of Jesus, who, “uncovering his heart” to her (that Jesus should show himself is an essential component of this spirituality), said: “Here is this heart which has loved mankind so much that it spared itself nothing, Even to the point of exhausting itself and pining away in order to show them this love, and by way of gratitude in return I receive from most of them only ingratitude.”

Supported by her confessor, the Jesuit priest Claude de la Colombière, Margaret Mary circulated images abroad, asking for holy hours of reparation, and that people dedicate themselves to the heart of Jesus.

There is, however, an undeniable doctrinal continuity between the Feast of Jesus instituted by Bérulle in the Oratory in 1625 (or that of the “Vie intérieure de Notre-Seigneur” instituted at Saint-Sulpice by M. Olier) and that of the Sacred Heart inaugurated at Caen in 1678 by John Eudes (after the first celebration of the liturgy* of the heart of Mary in Autun in 1648); and still later, with that of the hearts of Jesus and Mary (John Eudes spoke “of the heart of Jesus and Mary,” in this way reconstituting for Mary the Pauline ideal of life in Christ), which was authorized by a certain number of bishops* from 1672 onward; and with the Mass and Office of the heart of Jesus (in the litanies of which are found the multiplicity of meanings of “heart” and its Trinitarian core), which were conceded by the Congregation of Rites in 1765 after some reticence, refusals, and all kinds of pressure. Particular mention must be made here of the 18th-century Jansenists’ opposition to this cult* of the “muscle,” subscribed to by the “Cordicolae” (Scipion de Ricci, 1741–1809), an opposition that contrasted with the opinion of their elders at Port-Royal. And so the cult became public. The pastoral importance in the 19th century of a devotion to the heart of Jesus in which the aspect of redress or of reparation continued to grow should not be underestimated. Its voluntarist affectivity was a corrective to sentimentalism.

On 25 May 1899, Leo XIII's encyclical, Annum sacrum, dedicated the human race to the heart of Jesus, in this way inviting the unbaptized to baptism*, that is, to a recognition of what the heart of Jesus had won for them. By the bull Miserentissimus Redemptor (8 May 1928) Pius XI emphasized the obligation of adding man's subjective reparation to Christ to Christ's objective reparation of humanity. Finally, in Haurietis aquas (15 May 1956) Pius XII gave a specific definition of the nature of the cult: the heart of Jesus, pierced by the transfixion of the side, "so that through the visible wound we may behold the invisible wound of love" (a phrase attributed to Bonaventure*), is the "natural sign and symbol of his boundless love for the human race." Moreover, this encyclical settled a disputed question—can uncreated love form part of the proper objective of the heart of Jesus?—by specifying that this cult can elevate us to "the adoration of the divine love of the Word incarnate." The encyclical also uses the expression "eucharistic heart." Among the rare contemporary attempts that have been made to plumb the mystery of the heart of Jesus must be mentioned that of H. U. von Balthasar*, who gives it a cosmological dimension in Das Herz der Welt (Zürich, 1945).

- Œuvres complètes du vénérable Jean Eudes, Ed. J. Dauphin and C. Lebrun, 12 vols., Vannes and Paris, 1905–11.
- J. de Galliffet (1726), De cultu SS: Cordis Dei et Domini Nostris Jesu Christi, Rome.
- Vie et œuvres de sainte Marguerite-Marie Alacoque*, Ed. L. Gauthey, 3 vols., Paray-le-Monial, 1915.
- Le Sacré-Cœur: Textes pontificaux*, Ed., Trans., and Comm. P. Galtier, Paris, 1936.

- Cor Jesu*, Ed. A. Béa, 2 vols., Rome, 1959.
- ♦ J. V. Bainvel (1921), La dévotion au Sacré-Cœur de Jésus, Paris.
- H. Bremond (1923), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France..., vol. III, Paris.
- A. Hamon (1924–40), Histoire de la dévotion au Sacré Cœur, 5 vols., Paris.
- C. Lebrun (1933), La spiritualité de saint Jean Eudes, Paris.
- Coll. (1950), Le cœur, EtCarm.
- J. Chatillon et al. (1953), "Cor et cordis affectus," DSp 2, 2278–307.
- A. Hamon (1953), "Sacré-Cœur," ibid., 1023–46.
- J. Arragain (Ed.) (1955), Le cœur du Seigneur: Études sur les écrits et l'influence de saint Jean Eudes dans sa dévotion au cœur de Jésus, Paris.
- H. Rahner (1956), "Les fondements scripturaires de la dévotion au Sacré-Cœur," in J. Stierli (Ed.), Le cœur du Sauveur, Mulse, 29–52.
- P. Blanchard (1961), Sainte Marguerite-Marie, Paris.
- K. Rahner (1966), "Der theologische Sinn der Verehrung des Herzens Jesu," Schr. zur Th. 7, Einsiedeln-Zürich-Köln, 481–90; "Einheit-Liebe-Geheimnis," ibid., 491–508.
- F. degli Esposti (1967), La teologia del Sacro Cuore di Gesu, da Leone XIII a Pio XII, Rome.
- B. de Margerie (1971), Le Christ pour le monde, Paris.
- P. Milcent (1974), "Jean Eudes," DSp 8, 488–501.
- M. Walsh (1977), The Heart of Christ in the Writings of K. Rahner, Rome.
- J. Solano (1979), Teología y vivencia del culto al corazón de Jesús, 4 vols., Madrid.
- J. Le Brun (1980), "Marguerite-Marie Alacoque," DSp 10, 349–55.
- Coll. (1982), Le cœur de Jésus cœur du monde, Paris.
- B. de Margerie (1992 and 1995), Histoire doctrinale du culte au (envers le) cœur de Jésus, 2 vols., Paris.

VINCENT CARRAUD

See also Bérulle, Pierre de; Love; Mercy; Passion; Penance; Quietism; Soul-Heart-Body; Voluntarism

Heaven. See Kingdom of God; Life, Eternal; Vision, Beatific

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich

1770–1831

a) Life and Work. George Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel was born in Stuttgart on 27 August 1770. After studying philosophy* and theology* at the Stift in Tübingen (1788–93), where his friends included F. Hölderlin (1770–1843) and Schelling*, he became interested, among other things, in Kant* and the ideals of the French Revolution. He gave up his intention of becoming a pastor and became a tutor in Bern and Frankfurt (1793–1800). At the time he wrote a number of minor works on religious problems. While he was a teacher in Jena (1801–07) he published The Difference between the Systems of Fichte and Schelling (1801) and also collaborated with Schelling on the Critical Journal of Philosophy, but broke with him at the time of publication of the Phenomenology of Mind (1807). While he was director of the gymnasium at Nuremberg, he published The Science of Logic (1812–16). After a short stay in Heidelberg (1816–18), where he refined his philosophical system (Encyclopedia of the Philosophical Sciences, 1817), he finally became a professor at the University of Berlin. In 1821 The Principles of the Philosophy of the Law was published, and in 1822 he wrote a preface for a book on religion and science by H.F. Hinrichs. The book opposed Schleiermacher*. He died on 14 November 1831. His courses on the philosophy of religion*, on the philosophy of history*, on aesthetics and the history of philosophy would be the subject of a posthumous publication (Rosenkranz 1844).

b) Early Theological Writings. In his early work notes, Hegel envisaged the idea of a subjective, not positive, religion, which would reply to the demands of practical reason* yet would nourish sensibility (GW 1, 75–164), and to him it seemed essential for humanity to transform “fetish-faith” in order to bring it closer to rational religion. Rational religion opposed itself to an objective religion that was expressed more through a theological knowledge than through moral action. Hegel then asked himself about the possibility of creating a people’s religion that, through its art and its festivals, would encourage the spontaneous display of fine moral sentiments and privilege the spirit over the letter. Indeed, the French Revolution already represented for him the victory of the living spirit of a people over its dead institutions (Legros 1980). The Life of Jesus, written in Bern and inspired by Kant, saw in Jesus* only the preacher of a religion that was purely moral and that issued entirely from practical reason (GW 1, 205–78). This book understood the birth of Christianity as resulting from a re-Judaization of the Gospel (Peperzak 1969). As for the Positivity of the Christian Religion (GW 1, 281–378), the text saw in Jesus’ own religion a tendency, accentuated by the sectarian spirit of the apostles*, toward a religion of external authority* (Legros 1987).

After the so-called Bern period, with its exegesis* strongly inspired by Kant, there followed a more “mystical” perspective (Bourgeois 1970) during Hegel’s stay in Frankfurt. And so we find The Spirit of Christianity and Its Fate dominated by notions of life and of love* (Nohl 1907). Life, as an originary unity, tears itself apart and grows hostile toward itself, but it overcomes this split through a reconciliation with itself. Love is then conceived as the feeling of life being rediscovered; destiny is reconciled (Haering 1929). Faith in Jesus, who reconciled everything in love, presupposes a unity of spirit, that is, a presence of the divine in the believers themselves (Nohl; Leonard 1970). But such a presence remained imperfect in the first disciples. They clung to the Risen One rather than recognizing the Spirit that was calling them from within (Nohl). An understanding of this type of Christian religion in terms of life and spirit prefigured the notion of dialectics as a unity that embraces all splits by suppressing them (Marsch 1965; Brito 1983).

c) Writings from Jena. In Faith and Knowledge (1802), Hegel considers the phrase “God is dead” to be the expression of the culture of his era, as “the feeling on which the religion of the new era is based” (GW 4, 315–414; Link 1974). Hegel’s point is not to justify atheism* but to go beyond it by conceiving this death* as the event of God*’s self-negation: God does not want to remain “in himself,” or abandon the world* to its finitude (Brunkhorst and Hasenclever 1976; Brito 1986).

The Phenomenology of Spirit is a treatise on the progress of consciousness from its first immediate opposition between it and the object to absolute knowledge. The seemingly chaotic wealth of phenomena of the spirit was laid out here according to a necessary order. In this order, imperfect phenomena dissolve progressively and turn into superior phenomena that constitute their closest truth* (Heinrich 1974). They eventually find their closest truth in religion (GW 9, 363–421) and finally in the knowledge of the absolute, which is the result of full comprehension of all these phenomena. Until consciousness arrives at an adequation with the system of “essences” it does not correspond exactly to its concept, and it is precisely this discrepancy between what it is in itself and what it is for itself that drives it forward. At the end of this process, religion reveals the absolute concept, but only in its relation to consciousness, that is, as a phenomenon.

Three stages scan this phenomenological development. In natural religion, the spirit perceives itself in an immediate manner (GW 9, 369–75); in the Greek religion of art, it knows itself in the figure of suppressed naturalness or of the self (GW 9, 376–99); while in the context of a Christianity perceived as a revealed religion, the spirit takes the form of the unity of consciousness with self-awareness (GW 9, 400–421). The subjective-for-itself of the unhappy consciousness and the substantial-in-itself of faith are united and accomplished in a double Christian alienation-projection (Entäusserung). Substance, or God, removes itself from its abstraction by taking incarnation in the consciousness of a self, while the consciousness of self externalizes itself in a universal essence (GW 9, 403). Phenomenology articulates the stages of Christian spiritual content: the pure Trinitarian essence, the evolution of essence (creation*, fall, reconciliation), and community (Guibal 1975).

d) Encyclopedic System. The Encyclopedia laid out Hegel’s system in its definitive structure: logic, philosophy of nature, philosophy of spirit. Taking up again the essential points of logic, the first stage establishes an identity between the laws of thought and those of being*, in the sense where the movement of being leads to the realization of the concept. Dialectics takes a ternary course here: being (immediacy), essence (reflection), concept (liberty*). Following a certain neo-Platonic and Christian tradition, Hegel compares the Idea-Logos (Word*) with the eternal essence of God before the creation of nature and of a finite mind (Bruaire 1965; Lakebrink 1968). But logic already contains the seeds of the two other stages of philosophy. Indeed, since it is identical to itself, thought is a return to itself from a being other than oneself. It is the negation of its own differentiation. The distance from self to self implied by this identification with oneself constitutes the idea as nature, and in this way founds the philosophy of nature as a science of the idea in its particularity (GW 20, 235–375). As for the act of identification with oneself, it constitutes the idea as spirit and founds the philosophy of spirit as a science of the idea in its singularity (GW 20, 379–572).

The different moments of the subjective spirit (soul*, consciousness, consciousness of self, and reason, theoretical and practical spirit) are like a series of way stations along the path through which the spirit rids itself of the contradiction of its natural immediacy and manages to become aware of its own concept, freedom. In the second stage of its liberation, that of the objective spirit (law, morality, family*, society*, state, history), spirit appears bearing the features of a world it produces as such. Liberated from any dependency with regard to the nature from which it emerged as a subjective spirit and of which it was a part as an objective spirit, the concept of the spirit finally has, as an absolute spirit, its reality in the Spirit. Art, religion, and philosophy represent the moments when the identity of absolute spirit with its concept is affirmed. As philosophy progressively frees itself from the formal unilaterality of art and religion, it raises them to the absolute form of the thinking idea. Since it is for itself a relation of self to self, absolute spirit is, globally, religion (Theunissen 1970), but its perfect form does not appear until the end, in philosophy. Philosophy, placing itself above the figure of faith, thus dominates religion understood in a restricted sense (GW 20, 555–69).

e) Philosophy of Religion. The Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion (GW 17) have justly been considered Hegel’s “theological summum” (Küng 1970). It is true that they do take up the principal points of Christian dogmatics*; focusing on the intelligence of faith, they concur with theological perspectives and are able to connect with a conception of theology as a science subordinate to the knowledge* of God by God. However, far from limiting itself to considering God as essence, Hegel’s philosophy of religion knows only the God-Spirit that is only for the spirit and thus distinguishes itself from traditional natural* theology.

Hegel articulates the concept of religion, and thus the structure of his Lectures, in three stages: objective determination, the subjective dimension of consciousness, and the reconciliation of these two aspects in the Christian cult* (GW 17, 33ff.). Thus the givens of representation are closely akin to the speculative definition of religion as a knowledge of self peculiar to absolute spirit (Jaeschke 1986). Hegel points out that the content of religion and that of philosophy are “the same,” that is, “God and his explanation.” But the absolute content that religion seeks to represent must be elevated by philosophy to the form of thought by seizing its ideality.

In the first of its three parts this work details “the concept of religion,” the logical germ that virtually exhausts the religious possibilities of humanity. Going on in the second part to describe the different stages of religion (being, essence, concept) in its objective being, Hegel follows the development of “determined” or finite religion, a religion that has not yet attained the fullness of the idea (religions of nature, of spiritual individuality, of finality). Finally, he presents absolute religion (Christianity) in which the concept of religion, completely objectified for itself, is revealed as spirit.

Expounding on each of these religions according to the same rhythm (metaphysical concept, concrete representation, cult), Hegel sees the concept of absolute religion in the God who gives himself objectivity and who is thus the absolute idea. The Christian God can thus determine himself metaphysically by means of the ontological proof that, although inadequate in language, leads from the concept of God to his being (proofs of the existence* of God; Ogiermann 1948). The concrete representation of the Christian religion is deployed in three spheres. The first, in the element of thought, considers the Trinitarian God in his eternal essence within himself, in the form of universality. The second, in the element of representation in the strict sense of the term, considers creation, the conservation of the finite world, and the natural particularity as a phenomenon of the Idea. The third, in the element of intuitive effectivity, presents the Christian history of salvation* (original sin*, the Incarnation*, and the Redemption) as the accomplished objectivity of the divine history of the spirit in its absolute singularity. The transition to the Christian cult indicates not only the passage from the one to the many, but also that of the objective representation of God in a human form to the region of the subjective immanence of the spiritual community. After the general determination (the Spirit of Christ*) and the objective reality of the community (faith and worship, the Eucharist*) the Lectures describe its spiritual disappearance: the church* finds its fulfillment beyond itself, in the eternal presence of philosophy (Fackenheim 1967; Schlitt 1990).

f) Structure of Theology. According to Hegel one can only conceptualize Christian revelation* by making use of the plurality of intentionalities of religious consciousness: to the varying dimensions of religious conscience correspond different levels of theological language* (Bodamer 1969).

- 1) To the level of representative consciousness corresponds the point of view of “dogmatics” from the Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion. This dogmatics begins with the logical concept of the Christian God, then goes on to discuss the naturally objectifying representation of the history of salvation, and concludes with the passage to the spiritual realm (Kingdom* of God) of the community and of the cult. This “positive* theology” is articulated according to a successive order of traditional representation and grants a large place to the language of historical effectivity.

- 2) The level of consciousness of self determines the theological perspective peculiar to the Phenomenology. In accordance with the global movement by means of which the phenomenological procedure detaches itself from immediate consciousness in order to arrive in the logical element, this “ascetic theology” (asceticism*) discerns, in the representation of the consciousness of self, the spiritual location where revealed religion relinquishes naturality and accedes to the rationality of absolute knowledge.
- 3) Reason finds itself within its own mode in the theology of the Encyclopedia. The universality of the truth appears there neither in an archeology of the concept of the Christian religion (see the Lectures), nor as a finalizing eschatology* of science (Phenomenology), but as the very element of the discourse (Chapelle 1971). Revealed truth is then seen to be the absolute mediation of the Spirit, which, by assuming the natural objectivity of historical representation and by reflecting the subjective demands of consciousness, systematically articulates therein its eternal life* (GW 20, 549ff.).

g) Dogmatic Content of Hegel's Thought. Hegel does not reduce divine attributes* to representations of abstract reflection, and he refutes all agnosticism* that thrusts the infinite* into a beyond that cannot be approached by speech (Brito 1991). Instead of dissociating metaphysical predication from concrete truth, as nominalism* does, Hegel conceives of the doctrine of divine names* as the speculative apprehension of the free deployment of the historical revelation of God. The Trinity*, the Creation, and biblical history are thus understood as correlative moments of the same process of revelation.

Hegel means to speak of the Trinity itself (Splett 1965), in its pure eternity*, but he thinks of it dialectically, that is, in terms of its historical involvement in the missions of the Son and of the Spirit. Hegel's Trinitarian speculation was elaborated as the deployment of lack with which the primary penury of the abstract universal and the native poverty of determined difference efface each other, in the final assent of the Spirit to its necessary division and its free reconciliation (Chapelle 1967).

As for the representation of the ex nihilo, it is not, according to Hegel, indispensable to Christian theology: the absolute Idea in fact posits everything on the basis of itself (Brito 1987). While acknowledging the originary unity of the creative Idea and created nature, Hegel absolutely distinguishes the eternal Son from the temporal world. Creation is the work of liberty, for it is the display of the Spirit; but this liberty excludes free will and implies that the Creator has exhausted his creative possibilities. Hegel also upholds the difference between possible and finite reality, but he challenges the possibility of another reality and therefore the contingency of the creative choice. In this way, pure contingency and the only possible possible [sic] are posited by creative freedom only to be denied.

Hegel reduces the representation of the Fall to the concept of natural man, torn by the contradiction between his natural immediacy and his spiritual potentiality (Ringleben 1977; Pottier 1990). In the wake of the Lutheran version of the communication of idioms* the Hegelian concept of the Incarnation dialectically articulates virtual unity and the effective union of divine and human natures. Far from preserving its own properties, each nature must deny itself in its other. Hegel does not deny that the Logos became flesh in the singularity of one man. But, if divinity must place itself outside of itself in renounced individual finitude, humanity reveals itself definitively absorbed in the divinity of the Logos (Brito 1983). Hegel consequently appears as a thinker of the cross: he places it at the center of his system, where all negativity and all contradictions are concentrated (Schultz 1964).

The scission of the Idea can be apprehended in the death of Christ. There, God achieves the transposition of his Trinitarian being in the effectivity of human history, in such a way that the appearance of the Kingdom in effective reality makes history the place of all reconciliations. With the “death of the death” of Christ, the immediate individual presence disappears and the intimacy of the infinite spirit bursts forth as the negative of the negative (Tilliette 1992). In such a scenario the Resurrection* is no more than the return already contained within death. As the ascent to the Father is speculatively excluded, Hegel knows no other exaltation than the elevation on the cross, which leaves the disciples in infinite sorrow. And so it is that in the renunciation of everything visible, the community discovers the life that is immanent to it. With unequaled power, Hegel envisions the Calvary of the Absolute, though without excluding from his speculative discourse the positive fullness of Easter (Brito 1983; Stähler 1928).

• Sämtliche Werke (1927–1939), so called “Jubilee Edition,” Ed. H. Glockner, 20 vols., Stuttgart.

- Gesammelte Werke* (1968–), Hambourg.
Hegels theologische Jugendschriften (1907), Ed. H. Nohl, Tübingen.
 K. Steinhauer (1980), Hegel-Bibliographie, Munich.
Vorlesungen über die Philosophie der Religion (1983–85), 4 vols., Ed. W. Jaeschke, Hamburg.
 ♦ K. Rosenkranz (1844), G. W. F. Hegels Leben, Berlin.
 W. Stähler (1928), Zur Unsterblichkeitsproblematik in Hegels Nachfolge, Münster.
 Th. Haering (1929), Hegel: Sein Wollen und sein Werk I, Leipzig (2nd Ed. 1963).
 H. Ogiermann (1948), Hegels Gottesbeweise, Rome.
 A. Chapelle (1964), Hegel et la religion, vol. 1 (La problématique), Paris.
 W. Schultz (1964), “Die Transformierung der Theologia crucis bei Hegel und Schleiermacher,” NZStH 6, 290–317.
 Cl. Bruaire (1965), Logique et religion chrétienne dans la philosophie de Hegel, Paris.
 W.-D. Marsch (1965), Gegenwart Christi in der Gesellschaft: Eine Studie zu Hegels Dialektik, Munich.
 J. Splett (1965), Die Trinitätslehre G. W. F. Hegels, Freiburg-Munich.
 A. Chapelle (1967), Hegel et la religion, vol. 2 (Dieu et la Création), Paris.
 E. Fackenheim (1967), The Religious Dimension in Hegel's Thought, Bloomington.
 B. Lakebrink (1968), Die europäische Idee der Freiheit, I. Hegels Logik und die Tradition der Selbstbestimmung, Leyden.
 Th. Bodammer (1969), Hegels Deutung der Sprache, Hamburg.
 A. Peperzak (1969), Le jeune Hegel et la vision morale du monde, The Hague.
 B. Bourgeois (1970), Hegel à Francfort, Paris.
 H. Küng (1970), Menschwerdung Gottes: Eine Einführung in Hegels theologisches Denken als Prolegomena zu einer künftigen Christologie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
 A. Léonard (1970), La foi chez Hegel, Paris.
 M. Theunissen (1970), Hegels Lehre vom absoluten Geist als theologisch-politischer Traktat, Berlin.
 A. Chapelle (1971), Hegel et la religion, vol. 3 (La théologie et l'Église), Paris.
 R. Heede (1972), Die göttliche Idee und ihre Erscheinung in der Religion: Untersuchungen zum Verhältnis von Logik und Religionsphilosophie bei Hegel, Münster.
 J. Heinrichs (1974), Die Logik der “Phänomenologie des Geistes,” Bonn.
 C. Link (1974), Hegels Wort “Gott selbst ist tot,” Zürich.
 E. Schmidt (1974), Hegels System der Theologie, Berlin-New York.
 F. Guibal (1975), Dieu selon Hegel: Essai sur la problématique de la “Phénoménologie de l'Esprit,” Paris.
 A. Brunkhorst and Hasenclever (1976), Die Transformierung der theologischen Deutung des Todes bei Hegel, Bern-Frankfurt.
 E. Jüngel (1977), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen, 83–131.
 J. Ringleben (1977), Hegels Theorie der Sünde, Berlin-New York.
 R. Legros (1980), Le jeune Hegel et la naissance de la pensée romantique. Appendix: Le Fragment de Tübingen, Brussels.
 E. Brito (1983), La christologie de Hegel, Paris.
 W. Jaeschke (1983), Die Religionsphilosophie Hegels, Darmstadt.
 E. Brito (1986), “La mort de Dieu selon Hegel: L'interprétation d'Eberhard Jüngel,” RTL 17, 209–308.

- W. Jaeschke (1986), Die Vernunft in der Religion: Studien zur Grundlegung der Religionsphilosophie Hegels, Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt.
- X. Tilliette (1986), La christologie idéaliste, Paris.
- E. Brito (1987), "La création chez Hegel et Schelling," RThom 87, 260–79.
- R. Legros (1987), "Introduction" to Hegel, Fragments de la période de Berne, Paris.
- B. Pottier (1990), Le péché originel selon Hegel, Namur.
- G. Fessard (1990), Hegel, le christianisme et l'histoire, Paris.
- D.M. Schlitt (1990), Divine Subjectivity: Understanding Hegel's Philosophy of Religion, London-Toronto.
- E. Brito (1991), Dieu et l'être d'après Thomas d'Aquin et Hegel, Paris.
- X. Tilliette (1992), La Semaine sainte des philosophes, Paris.
- Ph. Soual (1998), "Amour et Croix chez Hegel," RPFE 188, 71–96.

EMILIO BRITO

See also Hegelianism; Kant, Immanuel; Kenosis; Kierkegaard, Soren Aabye; Marx, Karl; Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm; Passion; Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von; Sin, Original

Hegelianism

a) Division of Hegelian School. The split of the Hegelian school into a "right" of "old Hegelians" and a "left" of "young Hegelians" was produced by differences that were more political and religious than philosophical (Moog 1930; Gebhardt 1963; Serreau 1971). The distinction, which is still employed today, was first made by D.F. Strauss and then by K.L. Michelet. Among the old Hegelians (the term designated at the outset the school founded by Hegel* himself) were H.F. Hinrichs, K.F. Göschel, G.A. Gabler, and K. Daub, as well as most of those involved in the publication of Hegel's works (von Henning, Hotho, Förster, Marheineke). Also known as old Hegelians were those who, after the revolutionary period, were the true preservers of Hegelian philosophy* (Rosenkranz, Haym, Erdmann, and Fischer). K.L. Michelet occupied an intermediate position between young and old Hegelians; his long life (1801–93) made it possible for him to establish connections between original Hegelianism and the beginnings of modern neo-Hegelianism (Löwith 1941).

At first the expression "young Hegelians" merely designated the younger generation of Hegel's students. It later took on the meaning of "left Hegelians" (Löwith 1962) and encompassed the handful of revolutionary thinkers claiming inspiration from Hegel: L. Feuerbach, A. Ruge, M. Hess, M. Stirner, B. Bauer, and Marx*. For these philosophers, attracted as they were by the Hegelian principle of dialectical negation, the argument of the Philosophy of Law that the real is rational (interpreted in a conservative sense by the right) turned into its opposite: the rational is real.

The left Hegelians directed their efforts toward a methodical reversal of Hegel's philosophy, desiring, as it were, to liberate their teacher from himself. These efforts dealt first with his philosophical theology. D.F. Strauss (1808–74), for example, attributed to Hegel the idea of a critique of evangelical history*, a critique already contained in Hegel's philosophy insofar as it assimilated historical events to forms of representation. But the methods were different: Hegel transposed religious representation into concepts, whereas Strauss related it to myth* (Brito 1979). And this mythical interpretation led to the conclusion that humanity was the true and absolute content of Christology* (Strauss 1835–36).

Independently of "theist" objections (deism*/theism) relating to the personality of God* (see Weiße and Fichte), Hegel's philosophical theology was historically subjected to three critiques. Focusing on the problems of the immortality of the soul* and the humanity of God, all these critiques—those of L. Feuerbach, B. Bauer, and K. Marx—reduced the essence of religion to man. Beginning like Strauss from Protestant theology, Feuerbach (1804–72) set the theme of personal immortality in a Hegelian perspective: individual subjectivity, destined to surpass itself in the objectivity of reason*, implied death* (Feuerbach 1830). Indeed, this theme occupied a preponderant place in the debate over the religious content of Hegel's philosophy. For example, in the wake of Feuerbach, F. Richter stressed that personal immortality was incompatible with the Hegelian concept of absolute reason (Richter 1833; Cornehl 1971); whereas right-wing Hegelians would attempt to demonstrate the opposite. Feuerbach himself saw Hegel's philosophy as the last refuge of theology: refusing to transform "images" into "thoughts," as Hegel had done, he wished to strip from religion its "theological essence" in order to bring it back to its anthropological truth* (anthropology*) (Feuerbach 1841). He thereby returned to the "feeling" that had been scoffed at by Hegel. By considering God as a reflection of man, Feuerbach reversed the Hegelian identification of God and man: for Hegel, in fact, the argument that the absolute was the essence of man did not mean the divinization of man, but on the contrary his relativization.

In his religious critique, A. Ruge (1802–80), for his part, started from the Hegelian "spiritualization" of Christian representations and adopted an attitude close to that of Feuerbach: at the conclusion of religious evolution, humanism was to replace Christianity. B. Bauer simulated an orthodox pietism* in order to unmask the atheism* that he claimed Hegel concealed under the exterior of a philosophical rehabilitation of dogma* (Bauer 1841). In the final analysis, according to Bauer, Hegel had set self-consciousness in the place of God.

Finally, seeing in religion nothing but the "inverted world*" engendered by real poverty, Marx recognized in the process of objectification only the absolute negativity of mind acceding to itself. Consequently, he made no distinction between Entäusserung (alienation) and Entfremdung (estrangement) of consciousness.

b) Hegelianism and Protestant Theology. K. Daub and Ph. Marheineke are typical representatives of a speculative dogmatics* of a Hegelian persuasion. Influenced first by Kant* and later by Schelling*, Daub (1765–1836), beginning in 1818, rethought his entire theology in the spirit of Hegel's philosophy. Based less on biblical evidence and confessions of faith* than on a speculative understanding of the idea of God, and centered around the Trinitarian doctrine that Daub sought to elevate from faith to knowledge by deducing its necessity, his dogmatics was unable to resist the Hegelian subordination of history to the concept (Daub 1833).

At least in its second edition, the Dogmatik of Marheineke is the work of an orthodox Hegelian and was recognized as such by Hegel himself. Despite its strong points (the importance it grants to the concept of revelation* and to the Trinitarian pattern), because of the identity that it posits between thought and being* it tends to abolish the difference between the divine Spirit and the human spirit. Marheineke paid more attention to Luther* than Daub, and the affinity of his theology with Lutheran Christology has frequently been noted, particularly by Barth* (1969).

Hegel's system led F.C. Baur (1792–1860)—the founder of the new Protestant school of Tübingen—to comprehend history as the manifestation of the self-movement of the idea. Resistant to any mixture of the human and the divine, the exegete and systematizer W. Vatke (1806–82) tended to go back from Hegel to Kant. Concerned with ascending from representation to speculative concept, the Dogmatik of his disciple A. E. Biedermann (1819–85), however, shows Hegel's persistent influence: Biedermann, for example, does set himself apart from Hegel by denying that the infinite spirit can have a personal existence. Not wishing to restrict himself to speculation on either the objective or the subjective, the dogmatist I. A. Dorner (1809–84) attempted to associate Hegel and Schleiermacher* and thereby distinguished himself from both (Barth 1969).

c) Neo-Hegelianism. Against all expectations, Hegelianism seemed to revive in the early 20th century, particularly through the works of W. Dilthey (1833–1911) on the young Hegel (Dilthey 1925) and the publication of the early theological writings by H. Nohl (1907). In 1905 Pastor G. Lasson undertook a critical edition of Hegel's complete works. In his famous lecture of 1910, W. Windelband officially proclaimed the "renewal of Hegelianism." Hegel was first considered from the point of view of orthodox Hegelianism, even that of an affirmation of Prussian-Protestant superiority (Kroner, Glockner, Haering), then along Marxist or marxisant lines (Lukács, Bloch, the Frankfurt School, Marcuse).

In France, J. Hyppolite (translation of The Phenomenology of Mind, 1941) and A. Kojève had a strong influence on the existentialists and brought about a revival of Hegel studies (Kojève 1947). The Jesuit G. Fessard (1897–1978) was one of the groups of thinkers who participated in Kojève's famous seminar from 1934 to 1939. A philosopher of liberty* and of history, Fessard drew theologically fruitful inspiration from Hegel's dialectic. But far from advocating a "Hegelian Christianity," he demonstrated its limits, particularly by criticizing the Hegelian primacy of sign over symbol (Fessard 1990). Following Fessard, and engaging first in a debate with Hegel's logic—whose dialectical challenges and syllogistic forms he accepted—the work of the Catholic thinker C. Bruaire (1932–87) showed with increasing clarity that the Hegelian enterprise had failed to grasp the theme of superabundance, the foundation of Christian pneumatology (Bruaire 1980).

Among the theologies of the death of God that flourished in the 1960s, that of Th. Alitzer (b. 1928) used Hegel to interpret the self-negation by which God becomes Emmanuel. The attempt by J. Moltmann (b. 1926) to transcend by means of dialectics the theist concept of an impassive God would appear more relevant if it did not, in an almost Hegelian way, link the Trinity* to the history of earthly passion*.

- H. F. Hinrichs (1822), Die Religion im innern Verhältnisse zur Wissenschaft, Heidelberg.
- Ph. Marheineke (1827), Die Grundlehren der christlichen Dogmatik als Wissenschaft, Berlin.
- K. F. Göschel (1829), Aphorismen über Nichtwissen und absolutes Wissen, Berlin.
- L. Feuerbach (1830), Gedanken über Tod und Unsterblichkeit, Nuremberg.
- K. Daub (1833), Die Dogmatische Theologie jetziger Zeit, Heidelberg.
- F. Richter (1833), Die Lehre von den letzten Dingen, Breslau.
- D. F. Strauss (1835–36), Das Leben Jesu kritisch bearbeitet, Tübingen.
- B. Bauer (1841), Die Posaune des jüngsten Gerichts über Hegel den Atheisten und Antichristen, Leipzig.
- L. Feuerbach (1841), Das Wesen des Christentums.
- M. Stirner (1845), Der Einzige und sein Eigentum, Leipzig.
- G. Lasson (1916), Was heißt Hegelianismus? Berlin.
- R. Kroner (1921–24), Von Kant bis Hegel, Tübingen.
- W. Dilthey (1925), Die Jugendgeschichte Hegels, Gesammelte Schriften IV, 1–187, Leipzig-Berlin.

- A. Kojève (1947), Introduction à la lecture de Hegel, Paris.
- C. Bruaire (1980), Pour la métaphysique, Paris.
- G. Fessard (1990), Hegel, le christianisme et l'histoire, Paris.
- ♦ W. Moog (1930), Hegel und die Hegelsche Schule, Munich.
- K. Löwith (1941), Von Hegel zu Nietzsche, Zürich.
- H. Arvon (1954), Aux sources de l'existentialisme: Max Stirner, Paris.
- K. Löwith (1962), Die Hegelsche Linke: Einleitung, Stuttgart–Bad Cannstatt.
- H.-M. Saß (1963), Untersuchungen zur Religionsphilosophie in der Hegelschule 1830–1850, Münster.
- J. Gebhardt (1963), Politik und Eschatologie: Studien zur Geschichte der Hegelschen Schule um den Jahren 1830–1840, Munich.
- K. Barth (1969), La théologie protestante au XIXe siècle, Geneva.
- P. Cornehl (1971), Die Zukunft der Versöhnung: Eschatologie und Emanzipation in der Aufklärung, bei Hegel in der Hegelschen Schule, Göttingen.
- R. Serreau (1971), Hegel et l'hégélianisme, Paris.
- E. Brito (1979), Hegel et la tâche actuelle de la christologie, Paris-Namur.
- J. Simon (1985), “Hegelianismus,” TRE 14, 550–60.

EMILIO BRITO

See also Kierkegaard, Soren Aabye; Lutheranism; Religion, Philosophy of; Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von; Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst; Tübingen, Schools of

Heidegger, Martin

1889–1976

Heidegger's relationship to Christianity and its theology* is in the first place biographical. A brief attempt at joining the Society of Jesus, two years of theological studies at Freiburg (also interrupted for health reasons), the rapid acquisition of a reputation as the great philosophical hope of German Catholicism*, the recognition of his debts to Neoscholasticism, and his lectures on Paul and Augustine* constituted a first period. A second was marked by his refusal to have his first son baptized into the Catholic Church, his declared sympathy for Lutheran theology, his association with theologians at Marburg (in particular Bultmann*) during his years as a lecturer at the university there, and his insistence on philosophy*'s right to a methodological atheism. After his return to Freiburg, a third period was characterized by a cautious but undeniable anti-Christian polemic, on the basis that the Christian faith* denied the believer any philosophical experience. The fourth and longest period began with the Kehre, the “turnaround” in which he aimed to consider being* on its own terms and no longer on those of mankind: the “divine” and the gods made an appearance in his work, he developed a true phenomenology of the pagan experience (starting with the Beiträge of 1936, and then in “The Thing”), reopened a dialogue with theologians, and acknowledged theological “origins” that might retain some future importance (“Herkunft aber bleibt stets Zukunft,” in Unterwegs zur Sprache, GA 12, 92). Heidegger's funeral took place in the Catholic church in his village of Messkirch, but did not follow the Catholic rite. The philosopher B. Welte (himself a Catholic priest) gave a short address. The burial followed the Catholic rite. However, Heidegger's tomb bears no Christian symbol.

a) Theology and Existence: Reception of Being and Time. In a letter of 19 August 1921 to his pupil K. Löwith, Heidegger still defined himself as a "Christian theologian." By 1927, on the other hand, he presented Being and Time as a philosophical treatise entirely free from theology. It speaks of man—Dasein—as having "fallen" into the world*, but this "fall" makes no reference to a protology or to a lost status pristinus. The experience of transgression is presented, but culpability is linked neither to a lost innocence nor to a pardon received or hoped for. Dasein exists incontestably in the world in the absence of God*: it can attain what is most proper to it there—an "authentic" existence—without needing to invoke an Absolute. Though it may seem surprising that such a work received a theological reception, this surprise soon fades. The atheism of Dasein does not in fact tax God with nonexistence. It announces the reality of a structure of experience (being-in-the-world) in which no place is left to know God or to speak of him. Heidegger's world consequently lends itself to an interpretation that sees it as equivalent to the Pauline kosmos in which, precisely, man lives atheistically without God (Eph 2:12). So the basis of a possible theological reading appears. Man has no right to God's proximity by simple birthright. A hermeneutics* of "facticity," of the simple fact of being in the world, must therefore speak of man's wretchedness. God is he who appears; and to conceive of his arrival demands agreement too on mankind's distress after the fall. In other words, the sinner's condition is understood to be what reduces mankind to an existence on the model of Dasein. In this light, it can be understood how easily Hans Jonas could exploit Heideggerian concepts in an interpretation of the Gnostic experience (Gnosis und spätantiker Geist I, Göttingen, 1934) as an exacerbation of certain fundamental Christian experiences. There was another possible theological interpretation of the book, more readily adopted moreover, which took the form of reading Being and Time by way of a focus provided by the hermeneutic theory of comprehension. What was at issue—being and its meaning—was what Dasein had in any case already understood in advance. A shift in meaning was then possible: according to Bultmann, who incidentally coined the term "precomprehension," Vorverständnis, comprehension also involved God himself. To exist on the model of comprehension was in fact to ponder God; theological discourse was thus essentially one of response, and its first task was to take as its theme the theological questions implicit in the logic of existence. Then, on the assumption that the man to whom the Christian kerygma was addressed was indeed the one to whom the Heideggerian analytics of Dasein referred, a final step became possible in which the approach to faith could be interpreted as an exemplary passage from "inauthenticity" to "authenticity."

Notwithstanding these conflicting readings, the work's theological significance remains incontestable. In the conference "Phenomenology and Theology" (1927–28), Heidegger stated axiomatically that "theology is a positive science and, for this reason, is absolutely distinct from philosophy" (Frankfurt, 1970), and specified further that "theology, as a positive science, is fundamentally closer to chemistry and mathematics than to philosophy" (ibid.). This was undoubtedly a verdict some theologies could strongly relate to: Barth* had recourse to an equally strict separation between the theological and the philosophical in order to deny all validity to Bultmann's program. But this verdict too could doubtless be contested by way of the resources that Being and Time offers to any consideration of the intended beneficiary of theology and the "revelation*" that it proposes.

b) Theology and Ontology: God and Being. Regarding the relationship between ontology and theology, Heidegger expressed himself in the most forthright way possible on the occasion of a meeting with students from Zürich: "Being and God are not identical, and I would never attempt to consider the essence of God in terms of being If I was again obliged to set down a theology in writing—something to which I sometimes feel myself prompted—the term being would in no circumstances have any part in it. Faith has no need of the 'thought' of being. When it has recourse to it, it is no longer faith" (in Poetry 13, 60–61). The theological implications are clear: these sentences confirm the death of the God of the philosophers; and, by denying the existence of a "point of connection," Anknüpfungspunkt, between the discourse of philosophy and that of theology, they call for a theologically pure reconstruction of theology. Whether in picturing a God "uncontaminated by being" (E. Levinas), or in considering "God without being" (J.-L. Marion) as a love* that had no need of being in order to love and to give, the lesson was learned. Heidegger intensified his warnings, moreover. By bringing God into philosophy and obliging him to serve as the pinnacle of the edifice of "metaphysics," of an "onto-theological" structure, the way was in fact being prepared for the death of God. Those who introduced God into conceptual systems were forgetting that man's relationship with him was primarily one of worship and liturgy, and that God had less need of being considered than of being worshipped. The task of theology, then, was twofold: on the one hand it must free itself of all involvement with metaphysics, and on the other hand it must dissociate its destiny from that “school of thought” that, after metaphysics, seeks to welcome the truth of being. Of course, the mere fact of being assigned a task does not provide the means of accomplishing it. But if Heidegger’s view of the question of being is correct, then theology must either face up to this task or strip God of his divinity.

c) Speech, Event, Hermeneutics. No part of Heidegger’s oeuvre lent itself better to theological interpretation than the texts devoted to language. From 1934, commentary on poetic texts—Hölderlin, Trakl, Rilke, George—and consideration of the essence of utterance were among Heidegger’s main preoccupations. These preoccupations were strictly ontological: speech was considered as the abode of being, so what was in question was merely the advent of the sense of being and its associated meanings (the diction of the sacred, of earth and heaven, etc.). But by refusing to link his investigation of speech to an investigation of the speaker, by denying that the production of utterances was the paramount and essential task of speech, and by considering speech on its own basis (“speech speaks”; die Sprache spricht), Heidegger replicated in the secular sphere the discourse that theology maintains concerning another speech—the speech of God. The themes of speech as event and as expression did not have to be unduly stretched for them to give rise, even before the publication of Approaches to Speech, to attempts at an interpretation that would allow the Word to speak in the very act in which it was produced—in the theological hermeneutics of E. Fuchs (Hermeneutik, 1954) and G. Ebeling (“Hermeneutik,” RGG3 3, 1959, 243–63; “Wort Gottes und Hermeneutik,” Wort und Glaube I, 1960, 319–48) and in the whole movement known as “new hermeneutics.” The concepts of “speech event,” Sprachereignis and Wortgeschehen, do not imply that Heidegger attributed to the words of the poet or the philosopher a vital force that belongs by right to God’s word alone—but they do at least show that not every philosophy of language can be placed in the service of a theology of the Word, and they suggest that there can be no theology of the Word that is not based on a philosophy of language. Heidegger’s influence was also to be felt, in a mediated form, through that of H.-G. Gadamer.

d) Sacred and Divine Beings: Reverse of the Theological. God might be “dead” as a result of entering into the constitution of metaphysics, while perhaps remaining theologically conceivable to anyone who freed him from any relationship with being; nonetheless it remained possible for Heidegger to speak philosophically of the divine, and even of God. The Letter on Humanism (1947) stipulated precisely the conditions for this possibility: “It is only on the basis of the truth of being that the essence of the sacred can be conceived. It is only on the basis of the essence of the sacred that the essence of divinity is to be conceived. It is only in the light of the essence of divinity that we can conceive and utter that which the word ‘God’ must designate” (GA 9, 351). This divine subordinated to being takes its place, in Heidegger’s late works, within the structure of the “Quadripartite,” the Geviert, in which “earth” and “heaven,” “mortals” and “divine beings” answer and correspond to one another. God’s transcendence therefore gives way to the transcendence of being and to its direction; and the theology that is thereby established from the time of the Beiträge is in consequence supremely atheological. Is Heidegger’s “theological” secret, then, the search for a substitute for the Christian experience and the Christian formulation of the conceivable? Characteristics such as the central role he accords to “serenity” (Gelassenheit) in the absence of any hope*, the subordination of God to a faceless sense of the sacred, and an account of the history of philosophy from which all reference to Christianity has been erased, among others, should enable us to conclude that theology has nothing to learn here, except that which it is absolutely not—which is, however, a most useful lesson.

- Gesamtausgabe, Frankfurt, 1976–, 102 vols. Works published during Heidegger’s lifetime and not yet in the GA: Vorträge und Aufsätze, Pfullingen, 1954; Was heisst Denken? Tübingen, 1954; Was ist das—die Philosophie? Pfullingen, 1956; Identität und Differenz, Pfullingen, 1957; Zur Sache des Denkens, Tübingen, 1969; Phänomenologie und Theologie, Frankfurt, 1970; Schellings Abhandlung über das Wesen der menschlichen Freiheit, Tübingen, 1971.
- ◆ G. Siewerth (1959), Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger, Einsiedeln.
- J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb (Ed.) (1963), The Later Heidegger and Theology, New York.
- J. Macquarrie (1965), An Existential Theology: A Comparison of Heidegger and Bultmann, New York–London.
- B. Welte (1965), “Die Gottesfrage im Denken Heideggers,” in Auf der Spur des Ewigen, Freiburg–Basel–Vienna, 262–76.
- G. Nöller (Ed.) (1967), Heidegger und die Theologie, ThB 38 (articles and texts by K. Heim, R. Bultmann, K. Löwith, E. Brunner, E. Fuchs, K. Barth, H. Jonas, etc.).
- J. Macquarrie (1968), Martin Heidegger, London.
- J. Möller (1968), “Zum Thema ‘Der spätere Heidegger und die Theologie,’” TThQ 147, 386–431.
- K. Lehmann (1969), “Christliche Geschichtserfahrung und ontologische Frage beim jungen Heidegger,” in O. Pöggeler (Ed.), Heidegger: Perspektiven zur Deutung seines Werkes, Köln, 140–68.
- A. Gethmann-Siefert (1974), Das Verhältnis von Philosophie und Theologie im Denken Martin Heideggers, Freiburg.
- A. Jäger (1978), Gott: Nochmal Martin Heidegger, Tübingen.

- R. Schaeffler (1978), Frömmigkeit des Denkens? Martin Heidegger und die katholische Theologie, Darmstadt.
- R. Kearney and J.S. O'Leary (Ed.) (1980), Heidegger et la question de Dieu, Paris.
- A.C. Thiselton (1980), The Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description with Special Reference to Heidegger, Bultmann, Gadamer, and Wittgenstein, Exeter.
- L. Weber (1980), Heidegger und die Theologie, Königstein (Taunus).
- J.-L. Marion (1982), Dieu sans l'être, Paris.
- H.G. Gadamer (1987), "Die Marburger Theologie," GW 3, Tübingen, 197–208.

- H.J. Braun (Ed.) (1990), Martin Heidegger und der christliche Glaube, Zürich.
- F. Dastur (1994), "Heidegger et la théologie," RPL 92, 226–45.
- P.L. Coriando (Ed.) (1995), "Herkunft aber bleibt stets Zukunft": Martin Heidegger und die Gottesfrage, Frankfurt.
- E. Brito (1996), "Les théologies de Heidegger," RTL, 27, 432–61 (bibl.).
- Ph. Capelle (1998), Philosophie et théologie dans la pensée de Martin Heidegger, Paris.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Being; Experience; God; Hermeneutics; Philosophy

Hell

A. Biblical Theology

"I have set before you life and death" (Dt 30:19): by the time of Jesus*, a considerable section of Judaism* had already come to understand this ancient choice in the sense of an eternal bliss contrasted with utter destruction or even eternal woe. But it had not always been so.

a) Old Testament. Until the Hellenistic period, when the apocalyptic* genre of literature appeared, sheol was merely the abode of shadows. The sinner's punishment remained a miserable life, then death. It was extremely rare for the hand of God to strike an individual sinner (Nm 16:30–34: the earth opens up; see 2 Kgs 1:9–12). Concerning the hereafter, Isaiah (66:24) ("their worm shall not die" and "their fire shall not be quenched"—the conclusion of the whole book!) undoubtedly develops on Jeremiah 19:2–15: unburied corpses beside the ruins of Jerusalem, in the valley (g'éy) of Ben-Hinnôm, which would become "Gehenna," from geenna (New Testament Gr.) < Aram. gehinnam < Heb. g'éy hinnom. Daniel 12:2 offers few words ("everlasting contempt") whose meaning is clear if one understands the eschatology* of the period (c. 160 B.C.) (see 1 Hen 10:7–16, 27:2f., 63:6). Jubilees 36:7–11 even declares that whoever harms his brother is liable for the eternal fire. Wisdom of Solomon, dating from the beginning of the Roman period, offers in veiled terms an eschatological transposition of the Exodus: the destruction of the sinner by his own sin* (Wis 11:16, 12:23, 17:21), and the intervention of the cosmos* (5:20, 16:17; see Lv 18:27f.) concerned at that sin. Wisdom 4:19 is a commentary on Daniel 12:2.

b) New Testament. According to Matthew 3:10–12, the unquenchable fire is uppermost in John the Baptist's message. Jesus puts the emphasis elsewhere, though his meaning is no less plain—indeed he is more explicit than anybody else in the Bible*. What he says of the final punishment takes on its full depth in the parables*: the chaff, the fish thrown back, the guest not wearing the nuptial robe, the unfaithful steward, the servant hoarding his talent, the wicked rich man. In view of all these, less vivid expressions such as "I will also deny before my Father who is in heaven" (Mt 10:33) or "I do not know you" (Mt 25:12) probably foretell a no better fate for the person rebuked. Jesus is the only person to speak of Gehenna (11 times). The most common image is that of fire (Mt 13:40, 13:50, 18:8 Sq; Lk 16:24), and the suffering is physical (Mk 9:43–47: hands, feet, eyes). Even the pain of separation is expressed in physical terms: "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 13:42, 13:50, 22:13, 24:51; Lk 13:28). "You will never enter the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5:20, 18:3, 23:13) probably hints at an equally serious punishment. To be "outside" is also a way of expressing hell (Mt 8:12, 22:13, 25:30). What is unexpected is the contrast between the offence and this punishment*, which is visited only on those who fail to perform simple acts of compassion (Mt 25:24–28, 25:45). This must be seen as a key for interpretation: the accounts are brushed aside and humanity is confronted with two irreconcilable options, as vital in small matters as in great ones. What is at stake in each case is made unequivocally clear.

Hades (the sheol of the Greeks; four times in the synoptic Gospels), like the “abyss” (Lk 8:31), is a portion of the cosmos destined to be banished to the depths (Lk 10:15), with or without torments. It is not the “eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Mt 25:41). Although they mostly relate to the body, Jesus’ images remain similar to those of the apocalypses, which are mainly cosmic: “the lake of fire” (Rev 20:14f.), “the lake of fire and sulphur” (Rev 20:10, 21:8). Death destroys itself endlessly, since this is where it is thrown (20:14). Sinners are those who are in league with it.

Paul (Pauline* theology) expresses himself altogether differently. Admittedly, he does describe the final punishment in an apocalyptic manner in 2 Thessalonians 1:9: “eternal destruction [olethros] away from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his might.” Elsewhere, though, he confines himself to “perdition” (apollumi, apolluiō, apoleia: Rom 9:22; 1 Cor 1:18; 2 Cor 2:15, 4:3; Phil 3:19). To eternal life for some he opposes “wrath* [thumos] and indignation” for the rest, in the context of the “day of wrath” (orgè: Rom 2:5–8). It is “the wrath to come” (1 Thes 1:10). It is noteworthy that katargein (1 Cor 2:6, 15:24ff.; 2 Thes 2:8) is closer in meaning to an annihilation of the spirits of evil* than to their punishment. Hebrews 10:26–31 does not describe an eternal hell but suggests a punishment worse than death.

John uses few images (only Jn 15:6). He leaves it to the reader to interpret the words “resurrection of judgment” (5:29: resurrection of life) or “you will die in your sin” (Jn 8:21–24), “perish” rather than having “eternal life” (Jn 3:16). There is a sin that differs from other sins in that it “leads to death” (1 Jn 5:16f.); then it is a matter of “the second death” (Rev 2:11, 20:6, 20:14, 21:8).

• J. Jeremias (1933), “Hadès,” ThWNT 1, 146–50; “Geenna,” ibid., 655–56.

F. Lang (1959), “Pur,” ThWNT 6, 927–48.

X. Léon-Dufour (1979), Face à la mort: Jésus et Paul, Paris, 47–61.

PAUL BEAUCHAMP

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Cosmos; Demons; Eschatology; Evil; Hardening; Judgment; Limbo; Purgatory; Resurrection of the Dead; Sheol; Soul-Heart-Body; Vengeance of God; Wrath of God

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

A theologian approaching the words of Scripture* on the subject of hell must first accept the meaning that the authorized teaching of the church bestows upon them and the explanation that it offers us for them.

a) Dogmatic Statements. Over the centuries this teaching, without ever being elaborated, has never varied. Since the so-called faith of Damasus of the fifth century (DS 72), it has been declared that “at the general resurrection, eternal life* will reward the good* that is deserved and eternal torture will be applied to sins*.” The creed Quicumque (DS 76), also from the fifth century, together with the Fourth Lateran* Council at the beginning of the 13th century (DS 852), and the councils of Florence in the mid-15th (DS 1351) and Trent* in 1547 (DS 1575), all repeat the same doctrine. In 1992 the CEC adopted it in turn: “The teaching of the Church affirms the existence of hell, and its eternity. Immediately after death the souls of those who die in a state of mortal sin descend into hell, where they suffer the punishment of hell’s ‘eternal fire’ ” (no. 1035). What links the church’s language to that of Scripture is that it does not prevaricate and avoids understatement. The two differ, however, insofar as Scripture generally talks in images that the church, when dealing with hell, reduces to a single image, terrible nonetheless in its uniqueness: that of an “eternal fire.” While not emphasizing the metaphorical nature of this “fire,” for fear of neutralizing the spiritual consumption that it symbolizes, the magisterium* forbids itself all the flights of imagination in which popular preaching* has long, and in vain, delighted. Nowadays historians (Delumeau 1983; Minois 1991 and 1994) readily condemn such excesses. “Infernalism,” in all its forms, has discredited the faith* more than it has shaped truly Christian hearts (heart of Christ*). It has helped bring about a cultural world devoid of God* by disfiguring his true face. Harmful as these excesses may be, the teaching of the magisterium has never been based on them, but rather on Scripture alone and on what it reveals to us about judgment*.

b) Hell and Judgment. Among the well-known passages (including Mt 25), the Second Epistle of Peter (3:7), which echoes the text of Malachi on the day of YHWH, deserves special mention here. It speaks explicitly: “Judgment and destruction of the ungodly” (2 Pt 3:7). Malachi, meanwhile, which offers a synthesis of prophetic doctrine on the “day of YHWH,” declares frankly to the faithful that the historical success of the wicked is misleading: “Then once more you shall see the distinction between the righteous and the wicked, between one who serves God and one who does not serve him. For behold, the day is coming, burning like an oven, when all the arrogant and all evildoers will be stubble. The day that is coming shall set them ablaze, says the LORD of hosts” (Mal 3:18–4). While awaiting judgment on the conduct of mankind, Scripture is categorical: there is for God, and thus also for us, no historically or eschatologically possible confusion between good and evil*. It was this obvious fact that John Paul II took as the inspiration for his encyclical Veritatis Splendor (no. 35, 41, 54 with a reference to GS 16). So hell signifies first and foremost that the difference between good and evil will never be revoked. It is this difference that opens or shuts the doors of the Kingdom*, depending on whether one respects or violates it, so giving us the right and the duty to distinguish the “accursed” from the “blessed” (Mt 25:41, 34). To question the status of hell as an unequivocal sign of this distinction between good and evil would be to shake the eternal foundations of the world. There is thus no question of doing so.

It is understandable that the Gospels* were obliged to use the most violent expressions that alone would be capable of denouncing, across the whole course of history*, the error from which we must be delivered at any cost. So they speak of the day of judgment in terms of “a fire which is never extinguished,” of “Gehenna,” of the “gnawing worm,” of “outer darkness,” and of “weeping and gnashing of teeth.” The church interprets this by saying that for a free agent having the power to choose mortal sin “for ever, with no turning back” (CEC, no. 1861) to yield to this “possibility” is to expose oneself to “[that] state of definitive self-exclusion from communion* with God and the blessed [that] is called ‘hell’ ” (CEC, no. 1033). Hell represents a choice of unequalled gravity, and some have sought to soften the horror of this choice by seeing hell as an “annihilation” of the damned rather than an eternal punishment (Lassiat 1974, 1979; Schillebeeckx 1989). This position, in spite of the attempts made to justify it by referring to second-century writers (see Lassiat on Irenaeus* especially), is alien to tradition*. In traditional terms, no creature can annihilate itself, even by its own sin, any more than God can think of annihilating it.

c) Unanswered Questions. Nevertheless, the way in which Augustine* (e.g., De civitate Dei XXI, 12), followed by Thomas* Aquinas (ST Ia, q. 20–25; Ia IIae, q. 87; De malo, q. 5), saw judgment merely as a work of justice* gives such a merciless image of God as to be unworthy of the one whose revealed essence is love* (1 Jn 4, 16). The excesses of popular preaching have found a regrettable justification in Augustine’s rationalization of hell in accordance with his own view of predestination*. It is possible, however, without in any way doing away with the distinction between good and evil, and while remaining faithful to the Gospels, to conceive of hell not as an inescapable reality for the free agent who believes or wishes himself to be devoted to evil, but as an avoidable contingency, which points us back to the innate greatness and crucial importance of a freedom that is given to itself so as to be able to respond to the love that is its foundation (Fessard 1967).

Scripture makes plain, however, that this sense of contingency does not eliminate the reality of hell, at least in one particular case: that of the “Devil” (demons*) and “his angels*” (Mt 25:41)—in other words that of the “prince of this world*,” an emblematic figure who is primarily responsible (Jn 8:44) for the evil driven out by Christ* (Jn 12:31). Once again, without denying the difference between good and evil, nor the punishment that their incompatibility justly demands (represented in Scripture by the “wrath of the Lamb*” before which no one “can stand” [Rev 6:16–17]), should not a further distinction be made between the criterion for the judgment, in itself unmerciful, and the act of judgment? Surely this act must involve a rigorous execution of justice, or else how could it be a judgment? But should this judgment be, indeed can it be anything other than justice, when it is the judgment reserved to the One who “saves the upright in the heart” (Ps 7:10), and that John tells us is “greater than our heart” (1 Jn 3:20)? Surely God has the power, even while dealing with sin as it deserves, not to identify the sinner with it, however culpable he may be?

When indeed we glimpse the terrifying possibility of an “upside-down eternity” (Durrwell 1994), we are forced to confront “the darkness of all darknesses” (Ratzinger 1960) and the scandal of all scandals: how can this infernal reality exist, even for a single being? Faced with an infinity of joy transformed into misfortune, “incurable and sterile” (Elluin 1994), the church fathers* (led by Origen*) as well as other mystics and theologians did their utmost to find an emergency exit from this aberration in our freedom and from the non-meaning that it presupposes on the part of the damned person himself. There is a temptation finally to reduce God's mystery* to that of a justice that it is hard in this case not to see as purely vindictive. We are also faced with a double anomaly: on the one hand, we accord a finite being, who is rightly denied the power to save himself on his own, the power to damn himself, which is in a sense infinite; on the other hand, we establish for ever, until the end of history, an anti-God whose existence is rightly called into question from the outset. It is at this point that there arises in counterpoint a spiritually inevitable hope*, which cannot be silenced. Here, as much as or even more than elsewhere, the abyss calls for the abyss; the abyss of horror and the abyss of hope. Balthasar* (1986, 1987) (and Elluin before him) set himself up toward the end of his life as the courageous defender of such a hope, which is generally overlooked in this context, except by Orthodox theology (Evdokimov 1959). Perhaps it remains to be stated more clearly that its foundations lie deep within the Trinity.

d) Unfathomable Openness of the Trinity in Christ. Our creation* in Christ has made us, by vocation, into beings to whom the Father* is as essential as he is, by paternity, to the Son himself. But we should not forget the other face of this mystery, whereby we appear, in Christ, as eternally irreplaceable to the Father as the Son is to him. Confronted with the suicidal decision to reverse into hatred the love for which we have all been created, and which makes us, in the Father's eyes, inseparable from the person* of his Son, could God, even out of respect for our freedom, abandon forever the person who destroys himself in the self-torture of his aberration? How could he do so, this God who, in Christ, wishes to raise us by pure grace* to his likeness, and promises to share with us the life of his uncreated Son? Such in the choice is the unfathomable depth of his love for us. Henceforth there is no human rule, no safeguard of morality that can prohibit God from loving madly the madman who believes that in order to exist he must refrain from loving him who is love itself! God's remedy for madness consists then in bringing into play all the resources of his love to help the rebel overcome his insane refusal to love. For what kind of God would he be who, despite being declared all-powerful, was forever incapable of releasing from his mortal spell a freedom that was received without being requested, and that could become a snare of pain and hatred to its recipient, for all eternity?

Faced with the lights of the Kingdom of heaven in the night (in itself hopeless) of hell, we are therefore empowered by faith to throw ourselves naked into the love of God. As worthy descendants of Abraham—"In hope he believed against hope" (Rom 4:18)—we hope that the bottomless depths of God's fatherhood, of Christ's Passion*, and of the resources of the Holy Spirit* will allow us to escape from the fiery prison that is hell. We can say nothing of how this might be; but we must trust absolutely in the reserves of love, grace, and glory*, whose only measure is God's love for the Son in the Holy Spirit, a love in which we are forever included. Moreover, since God has revealed to us in his Son that we are saved and savable by pure grace, and never by our works* (Rom 1–4), how could it be otherwise when the eschatology* of every creature is decided, at the crowning moment when the mystery of grace, in which we have been established for all time by God himself, will be fulfilled?

In this light, hell becomes, with regard to a boundless faith, the locate of choice for God's victory over the most incomprehensible rejection—victory that could be called humanly unexpected and that is for the prayer of the spiritual and for the thought of the theologian "able to be hoped for."

- M. Richard (1924), "Enfer," DThC 5/1, 28–120.
- S. Merkle (1930), "Augustin über die Unterbrechung der Höllestrafen," in Aurelius Augustinus, Köln, 197–201.
- K. Adam (1951), "Zum Problem der Apokatastasis," ThQ 131, 129–38.
- G. Jacquemet (1956), "Enfer," Cath 4, 168–86.
- J. de Mahuet (1956), "Iconographie," "Enfer" V, ibid., 186–87.
- P. Evdokimov (1959), L'Orthodoxie, Neuchâtel, 324–34.
- J. Ratzinger (1960), "Hölle," LThK2 5, 446–49.
- A. Turincev (1966), "Une approche de l'eschatologie orthodoxe," Contacts 18, no 54.
- G. Fessard (1967), "Enfer éternel ou salut éternel?" AF, 223–64.
- K. Rahner (1967), "Theologische Prinzipien der Hermeneutik eschatologischer Aussagen," Schr. zur Th. 4, Einsiedeln-Zürich-Köln, 401–28 (Écrits théologiques 9, 1968, 141–70).
- H. Lassiat (1974), Promotion de l'homme en Jésus-Christ d'après Irénée de Lyon, témoin de la tradition des Apôtres, Paris, 393–434.
- G. Martelet (1975), L'au-delà retrouvé, Paris, 1995, New Ed.
- O. Rousseau (1977), "L'éternité des peines de l'enfer et l'immortalité naturelle de l'âme selon saint Irénée," NRTh, 834–64 (about and against Henri Lassiat).
- H. Lassiat (1978), "L'anthropologie d'Irénée," NRTh, 399–417 (response to Olivier Rousseau); (1979), Jeunesse de l'Église, la foi au IIe siècle, vol. II, Paris, 77–93.
- J. Delumeau (1983), Le péché et la peur: La culpabilisation en Occident, XIIIe-XVIIIe siècles, Paris.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1986), Was dürfen wir hoffen? Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1987), Kleiner Diskurs über die Hölle, Ostfildern.
- E. Schillebeeckx (1989), Mensen als verhaal van God, Baarn.
- G. Minois (1991), Histoire des enfers, Paris.
- G. Martelet (1992), "Malédiction, damnation, enfer...," VS 147, 59–75 (about Balthasar's thought on hell).

- E. Guerriero (1993), Hans Urs von Balthasar, preface by J. Guilton, Paris, 316–21.
 F.-X. Durrwell (1994), Regards chrétiens sur l'au-delà, Paris.
 J. Elluin (1994), Quel enfer? foreword by Y.-M. Congar, preface by G. Martelet, Paris.
 G. Minois (1994), Histoire de l'enfer, Paris.

- G. Martelet (1996), “Sur l’ultime violence,” LV(L) 226, 53–62.

GUSTAVE MARTELET

See also Demons; Eschatology; Evil; Judgment; Life, Eternal; Limbo; Predestination; Purgatory; Vision, Beatific

Hellenization of Christianity

a) Judaism and Hellenism. The principality of Judaea, governed by the Ptolemies from 301 to 198 B.C., then by the Seleucidae until 63 B.C., was not exempt from the general movement of Hellenization that touched all the territories of the ancient Persian empire that had been conquered by Alexander. This movement saw the introduction of “common” Greek (koinè) as both an official and a vernacular language, as well as the creation of new towns and the establishing of a Hellenic style of life in the ancient cities (thus the construction in Jerusalem* of a gymnasium and a palestra). In spite of resistance, which was at times frenzied and fanatical, Hellenism penetrated deeply into the daily lives of the Judaeans, even among those groups that were most attached to the Law* (for example, the sectarians of Qumran). It was Hellenism’s religious ambitions—primarily the desire to reinterpret the cult* of YHWH and make it a local form of the cult of worshiping Zeus Ouranios—that were globally opposed, at least as early as the Maccabean revolt.

On the other hand, because of the harsh fiscal policy in effect in Palestine, the Hellenistic period saw a substantial Jewish emigration into the neighboring countries. Surrounded by a Hellenophone population, the Jewish Diaspora adopted a Hellenic lifestyle (see Hengel 1969) and Greek became a commonly spoken language in its midst (the “Hellenists” of the Acts 6:1 and 9:29). It was for these Hellenophone Jews that the Bible* was translated into Greek in Alexandria, in a version—the Septuagint (LXX)—permeated with the Greek genius. It was the milieu of this Judaism* that made possible the philosophical and theological activity of Philo of Alexandria, a contemporary of Jesus*. His apologetic project was to rekindle traditional beliefs that had been given up in favor of Hellenic doctrines, by showing that biblical thought and these doctrines (Platonism above all) were in fact complementary.

b) Christian Origins. The Hellenization of Christianity, therefore, was not born from the late encounter of two entities already in existence and independent from one another in their respective contexts; nor did it occur in a world where only Greek culture and civilization deserved to be described as “Hellenic.” On the contrary, what we call the “Jesus-Christ event” may descend directly from the Jewish tradition*, but it is also inscribed within this extended Hellenic framework. Moreover, it was documents written in Hellenistic Greek and characterized by Hellenistic realia that bore primary witness to the event.

The very fact that the apostle* Paul belongs to three different groups—religious (Jewish Pharisee), cultural (Greek), and political (Roman citizen)—illustrates quite well the complexity of the Jewish milieu that provided Christianity’s mission* with its starting point. Paul uses Greek literary sources (Acts 17:28): he is sufficiently familiar with popular philosophy* to be able to practice the genre of the diatribe, in imitation of the Stoic preachers, or to handle the skeptical paradox of the “liar” (Ti 1:12), at the service of a discourse that always finds its sources in the LXX version of the Jewish Scriptures. When he sets Jews and Greeks in opposition to each other (1 Cor 1:21f.), or Jews and pagans, this does not represent the opposition of two cultures: it is rather the clash of two spiritual destinies, both of which he understands as finding their realization in the Christian faith*.

Thus the first communities founded in the Diaspora and in pagan milieus spontaneously gave birth to a Christianity that had been explicitly Hellenized, using Greek as a liturgical language (Latin had to wait till the fourth century to become the liturgical language of the Western Church*). This Hellenized Christianity took on a preponderant importance for the whole of the Christian world, while, on the other hand, the Jewish Christianity of Palestine and Syria disappeared between the Jewish revolt of A.D. 66 and the final excommunication of the Judeo-Christians by the Sanhedrin at Jamnia (addition of the birkat ha-minim to the “Eighteen blessings,” under Gamaliel II, v. 90).

c) Patristic Age. Rhetorically and conceptually the discourse of the Greek and Latin Fathers* was bound to be a Hellenic discourse. But even if their culture was indeed Greek, for many other Christian authors, Christianity constitutes a kind of parallel culture or counter-culture, at least up to a point. This is evidenced in the way they use the Greek of the LXX or the Latin of the Itala (the first Latin translation* of the Bible), or even in their use of the very first Christian texts, which were devoid of any kind of literary pretense. Since Christian apologias were intended in the early centuries for a civilization that was simultaneously pagan and Greek, a global evaluation of Hellenism was required. Three distinct positions emerged: 1) the total rejection of any Hellenic philosophical doctrine, considered to be untruthful and immoral (Tatian, Ad Graecos): “What is common to Athens and Jerusalem? What is common to the Academy and the Church*?” (Tertullian*, De praesc. 7, 9); 2) a moderate overture that bases its argumentation on a supposed dependence of the Greek philosophers on the Hebrew books and insists on the monotheistic tendencies of Greek thought: “To look upon God*, for this is the end of Plato’s philosophy” (Justin, Dial. 2, 6; see Athenagoras, Pro christ. 6); and 3) a positive evaluation that goes as far as a passionate defense of Hellenism: for example, the beneficent “showers” of truth* sown by the Logos of the Greek philosophers (Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 1, 7, 2), and the necessity of an extensive knowledge of Greece (Origen*, Against Celsus).

d) Middle Ages. The influence of Hellenism was preserved in Byzantine and Latin theologies. These retained the patristic heritage, and remained in debt* for a long time to Platonism*, whether through the guarantee given by Augustine* to the libri platonici or through the reorganization of the neo-Platonic cosmos* by the Pseudo-Dionysius*. On the other hand, the Middle Ages saw a noteworthy intellectual crisis, sanctioned by the Parisian condemnations of 1277. Aristotelianism*, in its Averroistic version, had been introduced into the newly created universities of the Christian world by Arabic translators and commentators. It had not merely supplied theologians with new conceptual instruments, but had also presided (e.g., in the cases of Siger of Brabant [1240–84] or Boethius of Dacia [?–c. 1270]) over a movement for the freeing of philosophical work and for the revival of the ideals of vita philosophica. These two aspects of its influence appeared to threaten Christian doctrine (for instance, that of the Creation* of the world and that of freedom*), as well as the very style of Christianity (as, e.g., when the enthusiastic use of the concept of magnanimity, the key to Aristotle’s ethics, led to a refusal to call humility a virtue). By condemning 219 theses of Aristotelian and Averroistic origin on 7 March 1277, the bishop of Paris, É. Tempier, and his theologians were, in a way, only emphasizing an old methodological rule, the necessity of a critical reception of Hellenism, and we may consider that the faculties of theology did in fact hear the reminder. However, the condemnations did not prevent the survival, in university circles (in the faculties of philosophy), of a non-Christianized Hellenism, which was present in philosophies that aimed to be free of any theological interference. Through these philosophies, Christian intellectuals were assuming the task of cultivating Greek thought devoid of any Christian inflection.

e) Renaissance and Humanism. The Renaissance is the age of the De transitu Hellenismi ad Christianismum by G. Budé (Paris, 1535), a text in which the problem of Christian Hellenism is raised with real urgency. It is the age during which another new censorship was imposed (by the Fifth Lateran* Council, in 1515) against Averroistic Aristotelianism (in this particular instance, that of P. Pomponazzi). It is also the age of a revival of classical antiquity, over and above what the Middle Ages had managed to retain of it, a revival that sometimes seemed intent on introducing a lifestyle that owed more to paganism* than to Christianity. It is the age when Luther* developed a “theology of the cross,” a theology that refused the Christian acceptance of external intellectual elements. On the contrary, it claimed that it could discern in the past alliances of Christianity and Hellenism a ferment that could corrupt the church. Since then, the hypothesis of a falsification of the Christian reality by the Greek spirit has always retained a sort of topicality, while any interest in Greece tended to represent more and more a kind of protest in favor of paganism (Veillard-Baron 1979).

f) Modern Developments, Metaphysics, and the Problem of Inculturation. Thus, when A. von Harnack (1851–1930) speaks of the Christian dogma, in a famous definition, as if it were a “creation of the Greek mind on the gospel’s land” (Lehrbuch, 1909, 4th Ed.), the historiography of dogmas appears to have been an attempt at emancipation, aimed at retrieving an essence of Christianity that had been misrepresented. The attempt was, however, bound to fail, just as any juxtaposition of a pure Hellenism and a Palestinian Judeo*-Christianity that was itself allegedly intact and free from outside influence is bound to produce misinterpretation (see Meijering, BZRG 20, 1978). And against Harnack, recent research has been able to bring into play the principles of a more refined analysis of the relations between Christianity and Hellenism: 1) To the myth that opposed a “Greek way of thinking,” substantialist and ahistorical, and a “Hebrew way of thinking,” purely descriptive and historical (e.g., Boman 1954), it has been possible to reply that the myth was supported above all by semantic and logical confusion (Barr 1961): the structures of a language do not constitute the theoretical a priori of the people who use that language. 2) To the hypothesis of a distortion of the Christian kerygma through the recourse to concepts that are Greek in origin, recent patristics has been able to respond by underscoring the inflections given by patristic theology to the Hellenic schemata it uses (e.g., Ivánka 1964). Much more than simply making concessions to Greece, theology is in fact abounding in Greek-looking concepts, all of which constitute conceptual monsters in Greek terms: connection of the logos and the “flesh*” in Johannine* theology, accidents deprived of their substance in the speculations on Eucharistic transubstantiation, and so forth. 3) To the idea of cultures so closed that translation of their contents into the language of other cultures is impossible, recent treatments of inculturation have countered with the idea of a Christianity that is essentially translatable and capable of using the linguistic and conceptual resources of any culture. The encounter of Hellenism and Christianity, from the time the latter came in existence, may indeed serve as a model for any evangelization that aims to transmit its good news in an intelligible form, and for any pastoral activity concerned with enriching the church with the universal values present in any cultural milieu (Neuner 1995).

The debate is not over. Recent discussion has still seen J. B. Metz and J. Habermas criticizing the fundamental concepts of a metaphysics supposedly too rigid “to be able to restore rationally, without mutilation, without any loss in the multitude of specific meanings, these experiences of redemption, of universal covenant, and of irreplaceable individuality that were expressed in Judeo-Christian terms in the history of salvation*” (Habermas 1992). And by interpreting “metaphysics,” a Greek creation, as a closed figure of thinking, governed by the unthought that determines this enclosure—and therefore as something that one would need to escape in order to really be able to “think”—Heidegger* renewed the problematics and asked some questions to which answers (other than naive ones) remain to be found. No theological reason can oblige us to believe in the existence of a perennial reality of Hellenism as such; and neither can any theological reason oblige us to want to protect Christian discourse against “metaphysical” contamination. And if the history of metaphysics, in its Heideggerian sense, still remains to be written, the history of Christian doctrine is itself sufficiently well known to be able to appear as that of a fundamental loyalty to the words of its origin.

- R. Cohen (1939), La Grèce et l'hellénisation du monde antique, Paris.
- H. R. Niebuhr (1951), Christ and Culture, New York.
- Th. Boman (1954), Das hebräische Denken im Vergleich mit dem Griechischen, 2nd Ed., Göttingen.
- J. Barr (1961), The Semantics of Biblical Language, Oxford, London (7th Ed. 1983).
- P. H. Camelot (1962), “Hellénisme,” Cath. 5, 588–92.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato christianus, Einsiedeln.
- A. D. Nock (1964), Early Gentile Christianity and Its Hellenistic Background, New York.
- H. Chadwick (1966), Early Christian Thought and the Christian Tradition, Oxford.
- B. F. J. Lonergan (1967), “The Dehellenization of Dogma,” in A Second Collection, Toronto, 11–32 (2nd Ed. 1996).
- P. Stockmeier (1968), “Hellenismus und Christentum,” SM(D) 665–76.
- P. H. Camelot (1969), “Hellénisme,” DSp 7, 145–64.
- M. Hengel (1969), Judentum und Hellenismus, Tübingen (2nd Ed. 1973).
- J.-C. Fredouille (1972), Tertullien et la conversion de la culture antique, Paris.
- D. M. Mackinnon (1972), “‘Substance’ in Christology: A Cross-Bench View,” in S. W. Sykes and J. P. Clayton (Ed.), Christ, Faith, and History, Cambridge, 279–300.
- C. Andresen (1978), “Antike und Christentum,” TRE 3, 50–99.
- J.-L. Vieillard-Baron (1979), “Platonisme et paganisme au XVIIIe s.,” ArPh 42, 439–56.
- M. Hengel and H. Lichtenberger (1981), “Die Hellenisierung des antiken Judentums als praeparatio evangelica,” in Humanistische Bildung, Ostfildern-Stuttgart, 1–30.
- E. S. Gruen (1984), The Hellenistic World and the Coming of Rome, 2 vols., Berkeley, Calif.
- H. D. Betz (1986), “Hellenismus,” TRE 15, 19–35.
- E. Arens (Ed.) (1989), Habermas und die Theologie, Düsseldorf.
- J. Habermas (1992), “Exkurs: Transzendenz von innen, Transzendenz ins Diesseits,” in Texte und Kontexte, 2nd Ed., Frankfurt, 127–56.
- C. Stead (1994), Philosophy in Christian Antiquity, Cambridge, 79–244.
- P. Neuner (1995), “Die Hellenisierung des Christentums als Modell von Inkulturation,” StZ, no 213, 363–76.
- J. Pelikan (1997), What Has Athens to Do with Jerusalem? Timaeus and Genesis in Counterpoint, Ann Arbor.

MICHEL GITTON

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Being, Inculturation; Judeo-Christianity; Philosophy; Platonism, Christian; Stoicism, Christian

Henoch. See Apocalyptic Literature

Heresy

a) Concept. The Theologische Realenzyklopädie (Protestant) recommends (t. 15, 320; see 325) the use of the concept of “heresy” in the traditional sense as defined in Catholic canon law* (Code of Canon Law 1983, c. 751): heresy is a baptized person’s obstinate denial (or doubting) of any truth* of faith*. It is to be distinguished from schism*, in which the believer refuses communion* with the pope* or other members of the Catholic Church*, and apostasy, which is total rejection of the Christian faith.

b) History of Heresy and Heresiology. In the New Testament (Acts) the religious parties of the Sadducees (5:17) and the Pharisees (15:5, 26:5) are designated as haireseis; Christian sects were similarly designated by Jews (24:5, 24:14, 28:22). Paul called the internal tensions and splits within the Christian communities “heresies” and “schisms” (Gal 5:20; 1 Cor 11:18f.). Pernicious teachings are clearly stigmatized as heresies in Titus 3:10 and 2 Peter 2:1. The pastoral Epistles mention present and future false doctrines (1 Tm 1:3–11, 4:1–5; 2 Tm 2:14, 4:2ff.; Ti 1:10–16, 3:9ff.). Ignatius of Antioch (†117) denounced as “heterodoxy” the heresy of Docetism* (Magn 8, 1), which denied the reality of the suffering and death* of the Son of God; for Ignatius, heresy meant “separation” (Eph. 6, 2; Trall 6, 1). Around 150 the philosopher and martyr Justin (†165) (who passed on to us the words of Jesus*: “There shall be schisms and heresies” [Dialogue with Trypho 35, 5]) wrote a Syntagma against all heresies. This work, which later disappeared, marked all subsequent catalogues of heresies. Justin argued that heresy is almost always a false doctrine of God; it is the work of demons*, and the arch-heresiarch is Simon Magus (Apol. 1 20, 4; see Acts 8:9–24). Irenaeus* of Lyon († c. 202) is the author of an Adversus haereses against the Gnostics, which remains our major source of information on a heresy that posed a mortal threat to second-century Christianity. According to the jurist Tertullian* († c. 220), the Gnostics disqualified themselves from the start by their disagreement with the tradition* of the faith. Heresiology reached a—strictly quantitative—height with the Panarion of Epiphanius of Salamine (†402), a “universal history” that established an uncritical inventory of the 80 heresies dating from before and after Christ*. The fight against Arianism*, which was triumphant for some time, continued throughout the fourth century. In the following century, Augustine*, in his relentless battle against Manichaeism*, Pelagianism*, and Anabaptist Donatism*, finally had to call in the civil authorities. In 385—undoubtedly for the first time—a “heretic,” the Spanish Priscillian, was executed in Trier. In the 12th and 13th centuries the Cathars* (from the Greek katharos meaning pure) were accused of heresy, as were the Waldensians*, a sect that still exists today, and the Albigenses; later, Hus* and Wycliff were denounced as heretics. The 16th-century Reformers were accused of heresy by the Catholics, who were themselves labeled “papists” by the Reformers; but both of these great churches agreed in condemning the anti-Trinitarians (Socinians) and “fanatics” (Anabaptists*, etc.) as heretics. Under the influence of humanism, pietism*, and the Enlightenment, judgments were sometimes reversed: Sebastian Franck (1499–1542) stigmatized all established orthodoxy as heresy, whereas Gottfried Arnold, in An Impartial History of the Church and All Heresies, reserved his sympathy for the latter.

c) “There must be heresies among you.” It is said in 1 Corinthians 11:19 that factions are necessary to put Christians to the test. Christian revelation* establishes “the radicality of an altogether particular ethics* of the truth*” (Rahner 1962) on which the eternal salvation* of humanity depends. Paul declares that (Gal 1:8f.)

even if an angel from heaven announced something different, “let him be accursed!” We might assume that the attempt to develop a theological system on the basis of a single idea inevitably entails a tendency to produce heretics. In fact the great synods* of the early church drew christological and Trinitarian dogmas* from the opposition between different heresies (e.g., monophysitism* and Nestorianism*, modalism* and tritheism*). Even today, error and contradiction can help the church to progress in knowledge and truth (just as they must bring Israel* out of its blindness; see Rom 9–11) to the extent that some essential features of Christianity, that the church possesses virtually, have not yet been fully realized (see K. Rahner, LThK2 5, 8–10).

d) Where Does Heresy Lie Today? The Second Vatican* Council does not use the term “heresy.” Since the council does not exclude from salvation any person of goodwill (Nostra Aetate 2; Lumen Gentium 16; Gaudium et Spes 22) and designates non-Catholic Christians as “separated brethren” (Unitatis Redintegratio passim), the question is posed for Catholics themselves. Their heretical tendencies seem to be primarily expressed within the church (see Rahner 1970), and perhaps this contributes to preserving them from the “obstinacy” that distinguishes “formal” heresy from simple material heresy.

- G. Welter (1950), Histoire des sectes chrétiennes des origines à nos jours, Paris.
- J. Brosch (1956), Das Wesen der Häresie, Bonn.
- K. Rahner (1962), “Was ist Häresie?” Schr. zur Th. 5, 527–76.
- E. Droz (1970–76), Chemins de l’hérésie, 4 vols., Geneva.
- K. Rahner (1970), “Häresien in der Kirche heute,” Schr. zur Th. 9, 453–78.
- Y. Congar (1972), “Die Häresie,” MySal IV/1, 426–39.
- M. D. Lambert (1977), Medieval Heresy, London.
- A. Séguenny (Ed.) (1980–), Bidi, Baden-Baden.
- H. D. Betz, A. Schindler, W. Huber (1985), “Häresie I–III,” TRE 14, 313–48.
- K. Lehmann, W. Pannenberg (Ed.) (1986–90), Lehrverurteilung-kirchentrennend? 3 vols., Freiburg-Göttingen.
- L. Gerosa (1993), “Schisma und Häresie,” ThGl 2, 195–212.
- B. Neveu (1995), L’erreur et son juge, Naples.

WALTER KERN

See also Authority; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Jurisdiction; Notes, Theological; Schism

Hermas. See Apostolic Fathers

Hermeneutics

An art or science of interpretation, hermeneutics is a product of the cultural or chronological distances that interfere with the understanding of texts. Confronted with the problem posed by meaningful objects whose meaning escapes us, or about which we believe that they hold a deep meaning to which we do not or no longer have access, hermeneutics proposes to determine what those objects really intend to say and to test whether what they say is relevant here and now. Theology* attains to its “thing”—God* and all realities subject to consideration sub ratione Dei—only through the mediation of textual objects stamped by a culture and by a “world” that no one any longer inhabits as a birthright. It is therefore necessary that theology include a hermeneutic moment. The Latin term hermeneutica appeared in the 17th century as a designation for the ars interpretandi, at a time when this was becoming an independent discipline, an auxiliary to theology (hermeneutica sacra), philosophy*, philology (hermeneutica profana), and law* (hermeneutica juris).

1. Prehistory

a) Classical Antiquity. Without sacred texts, it was in reading the classics, more precisely the Homeric corpus, that the Greeks felt the need to postulate the existence of a deep meaning hidden behind the letter of the text (Pépin 1988). In its earliest stages hermeneutics came into existence in the form of allegoresis, as a way of making readable once again a language that had become shocking, either because it attributed to gods behavior unworthy of their divinity or because of the philosophical demand placed on myth* that it justify its existence by disclosing its rational content. Appearing cautiously in Plato, allegoresis was to be used more systematically in Stoicism. Philo of Alexandria was an heir of this philosophical tradition and put it to use in a broad allegorical reading of the Jewish Bible*. This had a decisive effect on patristic allegoresis, from Clement of Alexandria to Ambrose*.

b) Patristic and Medieval Theology. In Christianity the need to interpret arose from one of the first doctrinal decisions taken by the early church*, the decision to give canonical status to the Jewish Scriptures*. If the God of Jesus Christ was the God of Israel*, and if it was therefore necessary to reject the “anti-Semitic” tendencies of Gnosticism* and Marcionism*, then it was necessary to think of the relationship between Jewish and Christian experience* in terms of fulfillment. The problem was thus to provide a Christian reading of what thereby became the “Old Testament.” The questions raised were many: Did Jewish legal texts still have meaning for a community that claimed to be authorized to no longer observe the commandments of the Torah? Did the warlike and violent history of the people of Israel still carry lessons for a community that intended to live in anticipation of eschatological peace* and harmony? Patristic exegesis* responded to such challenges by a proliferation of meaning; a spontaneous practice of typology and of allegory made it possible to theorize the plural meanings of the Scripture. The hermeneutics that was thereby established, and that governed the Christian reading of the Bible until the Reformation, was a “regional” hermeneutics, created to fit a text that faith* declared to be unparalleled and that it asked to determine everything: what had happened (the letter, littera gesta docet); what must be believed (allegory, quid credas allegoria); what must be done (tropology, moralis quid agas); and what must be hoped for (anagogy, quo tendas anagogia). But in dealing with a text, hermeneutics encountered the problems of interpretation raised by any text recognized to have authority*.

c) From the Reformation to the Enlightenment. Two rejections and an affirmation made up the core of Lutheran hermeneutics. On the one hand, the theory of the fourfold meanings of Scripture was discarded in favor of the literal meaning alone, which was deemed sufficient for the word* of God as expressed through the Scriptures. On the other hand, church statements outside the Scriptures were no longer valid as the norm for a proper reading of the Scriptures. Finally, Scripture was the Word insofar as it spoke of Christ*, the center and the heart of divine revelation*. And if we agree with Luther* that the literal meaning of the Scriptures is generally clear, then the problem of interpretation does not arise. If obscurity exists, a better knowledge of the language and reliance on parallel passages are enough to dissipate it (Matthias Flacius Illyricus, Clavis scripturae sacrae, 1567). The real need for hermeneutics arose less from the century of the Reformation and humanism—a time that in fact held the total readability of ancient texts as one of its articles of faith—than from the later appearance of a consciousness of history*.

The development of historiography and the appearance of the philosophy of history, together with the birth of modern science and of an epistemology organized around the concept of “fact,” and the challenge to the processes of tradition*, these were all factors that led to the Christian Scriptures seeming to become partially obscure. In a world without miracles*, did miracle stories still have meaning (Hume, Lessing)? In a world that wondered about the true “aim” of Jesus* and his disciples (Reimarus), what veracity* could be attributed to the New Testament interpretation of what had in fact happened? More general questions were raised concerning the status of any work containing signification. In a world whose frontiers had expanded beyond those of the Western oikoumenè, cultural distances were objects of intense scrutiny; opacity was something that the monuments of primitive Christianity shared with those of China. In a world moving toward secularization*, any religious text began to take on the strangeness that I. T. Ramsey recognized as essential to religious language. In a world in which reality began to be identified with the observable, what knowability could be attributed to the past? What value should be given to a past process of meaning? To respond to these challenges, neither philology nor biblical exegesis could be of much help.

2. History

a) Schleiermacher. We owe to Friedrich Schleiermacher* (1768–1834) the first project for a general hermeneutics that might be capable of interpreting any object carrying meaning. A theologian and philologist, Schleiermacher was enough of an heir of the Enlightenment to know the value of criticism. Thus, the first task of hermeneutics was “grammatical” (or “objective,” or “negative”): only someone who knew the culture in which a writer lived and the language that he spoke could, in a second stage, perceive the contributions to meaning that the writer made in an original manner. But Schleiermacher was also a romantic thinker, and the second task of hermeneutics (called “technical,” or “psychological”) consisted—in order “to understand a writer as well as, and even better than, he had understood himself” (Herm., Ed. Kimmerle)—of carrying out a sympathetic introspection close to divination. Taking from romantic philosophy “its deepest conviction, that the spirit is the creative unconscious at work in individuals of genius” (Ricœur 1975, 82), Schleiermacher thus based the possibility of interpretation on an idea, “connaturalism.” Through the mediation of the work, spirit spoke to spirit.

b) Dilthey. Between Schleiermacher and W. Dilthey (1833–1911) a century elapsed that saw the science of history reach its peak. Writing after Ranke and Droysen, and in an intellectual climate in which the dominant influence was neo-Kantianism, Dilthey had a single project, that of constructing a critique of historical reason. And because Dilthey also lived in a period that witnessed a certain triumph of positivism (the reign of objectivity considered as the measure of all reality), his ambition was to establish a kind of knowledge as valid as scientific knowledge, but served by entirely different cognitive instruments. The proper task of the objective sciences was to “explain” (erklären), while that of the sciences of the mind (Geisteswissenschaften) was to “understand” (verstehen). And since what was to be understood was the life of others, as that was expressed in structured and meaningful forms, Dilthey was led to adopt the psychological hermeneutics of Schleiermacher. With Dilthey, too, hermeneutics had a philological component; and here also, the interpreter was able to grasp meaning by transporting himself into others. It is of the author of the work that we ask for the revelation of the work’s secrets, and we presuppose that the question can receive a satisfactory response.

c) Heidegger. While Dilthey is concerned with interpreting “life” as it takes on objective form, Heidegger* gives a new meaning to hermeneutics. At the core of Being and Time lies a reversal. Hermeneutics presupposed that one interpreted with the aim of understanding. But according to Heidegger, it is in fact the understanding that provides the object of interpretation. Understanding is what man—the Dasein—has always already done. When we raise the question of meaning (and for Heidegger this is an arch-meaning, the “meaning of being”), this is a question that we have already answered by anticipation, by the simple fact that we exist. “Existence,” by which must be understood a mode of being that belongs to us and only to us, is in any event an act of understanding. Hermeneutics is thus an interpretation of “facticity,” the interpretation of an existence located in a world, the interpretation of a finitude that is experienced in the dual mode of Befindlichkeit (“affection,” “the meaning of the situation”) and Verstehen. The theoretical reorganization is complete in several steps: recognition of the circular structure of hermeneutics (the “hermeneutic circle”); substitution of an ontological problem for the epistemological problem that troubled Schleiermacher and Dilthey; abandonment of a theory of understanding by means of sympathetic introspection in favor of a relationship between the self and the world; and the generalization of hermeneutic concerns that bear on the totality of the knowable and not merely on the products of human speech and art.

d) Gadamer. It fell to one of Heidegger’s students, H.G. Gadamer (1900–), who heard the lectures on hermeneutics given before the publication of Being and Time, to resume a dialogue with the sciences of the mind, or human sciences, for which the fundamental ontology of his teacher left no room. Gadamer retains from Heidegger the idea of an anticipatory structure of knowing, which allows him to challenge the “prejudice against prejudice.” It is an essential mark of human finitude, on the contrary, that we know only within traditions that provide us with a stock of preinterpretations. It is essential to the work of art, moreover, to have a “history of its effects” (Wirkungsgeschichte), the influence of which affects every consciousness that confronts the work (and that is thus defined as wirkungsgeschichtliches Bewußtsein). The task of hermeneutics, consequently, does not require the adoption of a scientific “method,” something that Gadamer suspects of establishing an alienating distance (Verfremdung) between “subject” and “object.” Rather, it requires the existence of a relationship of belonging (Zugehörigkeit) within which the perspectives inherent in the work may blend with those specific to the reader. The “fusion of perspectives” (Horizontverschmelzung) thus makes it possible for the relationship between the reader and the work to bear fruit in a dialogue. This dialogue will never produce the last word in interpretation, nor indeed a better interpretation. It will produce another interpretation, in which the text will speak directly to the reader and to the world he inhabits.

e) Ricœur. Between Gadamer and P. Ricœur (1913–) came an event that marked the latter’s hermeneutics, the growth of the “sciences of the text” derived from linguistic structuralism and structural semantics. In response to the appearance of analytical and objectifying disciplines that he generally found fruitful, Ricœur’s ambition was to do away with Dilthey’s distinction between “explaining” and “understanding” in order to make explanation the necessary basis for understanding. Objectifying distancing no longer functions as an obstacle to interpretation, and the fascination exercised by critique and method probably comes together with the older influence of Husserl’s phenomenology so that we may establish as a principle that the primary effort of hermeneutics is to allow the text to be itself, so that it must be read before it can be interpreted. Thereafter, phenomenology also provides material for understanding and a concept capable of articulating it. Around a text that is well read, says Ricœur, a “world” unfolds, which is offered for the reader to inhabit. That the “world of the text” can become “my world” proves both the classic character of the text and the exactness of the interpretation. And when I understand a classic text, I am in fact invited to understand myself through its mediation: “We understand ourselves only through the great detour of the signs of humanity deposited in the works of culture” (1975). We also need to note that in Ricœur’s hermeneutics, as in the “sciences of the text” with which it is concerned, the author of the work has disappeared; the aim of interpretation is not the “pathetic search for buried subjectivities” (ibid.) but the search for a meaning of the work available in the work.

3. Theological Receptions

a) From Bultmann to the “New Hermeneutics.” Incomplete and published posthumously, Schleiermacher’s Hermeneutics became a point of reference only in the 20th century, and it was in fact the influence of Heidegger on Bultmann*, his colleague in Marburg, that determined the hermeneutic interests of recent theology. From Heidegger, Bultmann had learned that understanding is always preceded by “preunderstandings” (Vorverständnisse), the function of which is “to make possible an orientation for thought, not to dictate what must be thought” (Greisch 1985). From his own critical practice of exegesis, on the other hand, he had additionally learned that the biblical text is perhaps the most difficult of all texts. Finally, he had retained from the Enlightenment the very vivid sense of a modernity that had rendered obsolete the vision of the world accepted in biblical texts (see Thistleton 1980). Two tasks then seemed necessary: to identify the human questions to which the text offers a response; and to deliver the text from all the (“mythic”) elements that are unable to contribute to the creation of a theological understanding of the self. The historical character of existence and the anticipatory structure of understanding are borrowed from a general hermeneutics that takes an interest in anything interpretable, and for which, besides, everything must be interpreted. Demythologization and the establishment of a relationship between the true “thing” (Sache) of the text and the ultimate human questions are, on the other hand, procedures of a specifically theological hermeneutics. It is the goal of this particular hermeneutics to make it possible for the text to speak in the name of God.

The specifically theological contributions of Bultmann, together with a renewal of Lutheran studies, explain why the word was the center of the hermeneutic concerns of two of Bultmann’s principle disciples, E. Fuchs (1903–83) and G. Ebeling (1912–). Reference to Luther, especially in Ebeling, makes it possible to name precisely the (strictly theological) problem of hermeneutics: through a text, interpretation should make it possible for the word of God to be heard. This theological necessity, reinforced by Heideggerian influences, led to the attribution of the status of key hermeneutic concepts to what Fuchs and Ebeling called “speech process” (Wortgeschehen) or “speech event” (Sprachereignis). The critical-exegetical process is not disavowed, but it is marginalized. Hermeneutic circularity is still presupposed, but the urgent hermeneutic work is to allow the Word to speak its own language (for Fuchs, the language of love*) and to prevail over any other language by virtue of its eschatological dimension. In the final analysis it is in preaching* that the Word comes in exemplary fashion. The desire to construct a theology that can be preached thus makes it possible for the “new hermeneutics” to coincide with a central concern of the young Barth*.

b) Theological Reception of Gadamer. The philosophical discussion of the arguments proposed in Truth and Method has been constant since the publication of the book. Objections are not lacking. For Popperian “critical rationalism,” represented in Germany by H. Albert (1971), Gadamer’s hermeneutics has as its principal characteristic the rejection of the Enlightenment’s legacy of rationality. To this critique, Habermas (1970) added that the rehabilitation of “prejudice” makes impossible any critique of ideologies, and hence any social praxis. For Betti (1967), a defense and illustration of “method,” as well as the use of objective canons of interpretation stand in opposition to Gadamer. But in the end the most radical objections have come out of the critique of the word developed since 1962 by J. Derrida: for a thought that asserts the priority of writing (“grammatology”), understood as “trace,” as principle of “differance” and “dissemination,” hermeneutics obviously falls victim to all the condemnations of “metaphysics,” “logocentrism,” “white mythology,” and the like.

For obvious reasons, Gadamer’s rehabilitation of prejudice was received with the greatest attention first of all in Catholic theology. What was in fact found in it, at first sight, was the controlling idea of a fundamental* theology of tradition. However, it soon became clear (see Hilberath 1978; Stobbe 1981) that while theology certainly conceives its work as that of an interpretive reading of the founding testimonies of faith within the very community that established those founding testimonies, it also understands interpretation as a critical procedure (e.g., Schillebeeckx 1971; Geffré 1983). It is then the principle of an open multiplicity of readings, all different and none definitive, that is learned from Gadamer. Although not resting on a choice between one or the other, what is involved here is the respective weight given to general hermeneutics and the (special) hermeneutics of the theologians. A theological hermeneutics can be developed on the basis of Gadamer’s arguments, and can have as its aim the bringing to light of a principle of continuity, and of the existence of a place—the church—in which the “fusion of perspectives” and the dwelling in the “world of the Scriptures” come about without friction. We thus see extremist theories know the ecclesiastical conditions of interpretive success so well that they can rely on a paradigm supplied by Eucharistic ecclesiology* (the bishop* concentrating in himself all theological competence when he comments on the Scriptures in the liturgy) to quickly resolve any hermeneutic question (e.g., Marion 1982). The debate is, however, dominated by more prudent voices, united by the rejection of any theological discourse that claims to hold an absolute point of view, and united in the recognition of a fruitful tension between tradition and critique; but carrying diverse emphases, according to whether they agree with Ricœur that the “thing” of the biblical text, “the new being” that it unfolds, has the reality of an inhabitable “world” (see also Tracy 1981), or whether they share with Bultmann the fear of past worlds believed to have been abolished by history. (e.g., Jeanrond 1991)

c) Perspectives. The finitude of existence and the finitude of knowledge: these two axioms of philosophical hermeneutics have been accepted by almost all recent theologies. Pannenberg (1967), for instance, has managed to recognize the truth of the hermeneutic problem, and to reformulate it in the framework of historical reference that he takes largely from Hegel*. The establishment of a general hermeneutics authorized to impose its problems on theology and in part to dictate solutions to theology has also been widely accepted. There is, however, room for dissension based on the uniqueness that faith recognizes in the biblical text. For example, on the basis of structural semiotics, it has been argued that the Bible “is not a text” (Costantini 1976). Others have relied on the work of H. de Lubac* (Exégèse médiévale, Paris 1959–64; see van Esbrook 1968) to propose an alliance between contemporary hermeneutics and the older theory of spiritual meaning, or else (Chapelle 1973) to sketch out a systematic organization of theological language*. The questions that occupied the prehistory of hermeneutics are still genuine and live ones, and they make it impossible to believe too quickly in the existence of a general hermeneutics that one need merely apply to Christian texts: whether it is a question of seeing the Old Testament fulfilled in the New (see Beauchamp 1977 and 1990) or of reading the Scriptures in the communion of a tradition that lays claim to the right to provide a normative interpretation of those Scriptures. The theory of dogma* (e.g., Rahner* 1960), the theology of magisterial discourse, the theory of theology, the theory of loci theologici*—services are expected from hermeneutics that it has yet to render in a satisfying manner.

- F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1805–33), Hermeneutik, nach den Handschriften neu herausgegeben und eingeleitet von Heinz Kimmerle, Heidelberg (2nd Ed. 1974).
- W. Dilthey (1883 a), Einleitung in die Geisteswissenschaften, GS 1–2, Stuttgart-Göttingen (2nd Ed. 1959); (1883 b), Vorlesung zur Einleitung in die Geisteswissenschaften, GS 20, Göttingen, 1990, 127–64; (1910), Der Aufbau der geschichtlichen Welt in den Geisteswissenschaften, GS 7, Stuttgart-Göttingen (2nd Ed. 1958).
- M. Heidegger (1927), Sein und Zeit (GA 2, Frankfurt, 1976).
- R. Bultmann (1952), “Das Problem der Hermeneutik,” GuV 2, 211–35.
- E. Fuchs (1954), Hermeneutik, Bad Cannstadt (2nd Ed. 1958 with supplement).
- G. Ebeling (1959 a), “Hermeneutik,” RGG 3, 243–62; (1959 b), “Wort Gottes und Hermeneutik,” Wort und Glaube I, Tübingen, 1960, 319–48 (3rd Ed. 1967).
- M. Heidegger (1959), Unterwegs zur Sprache (GA 12, Frankfurt, 1985).
- E. Fuchs (1960), Zum hermeneutischen Problem in der Theologie, Tübingen.
- H. G. Gadamer (1960), Wahrheit und Methode, Tübingen.
- J. Derrida (1962), La voix et le phénomène, Paris.
- E. Betti (1967), Allgemeine Auslegungslehre als Methodik der Geisteswissenschaften, Tübingen (abr. and rev. version by the author of the Teoria generale della interpretazione, Milan, 1990, 2 vols.).
- E. Fuchs (1968), Marburger Hermeneutik, Tübingen.
- J. Habermas (1970), “Die Universalitätsanspruch der Hermeneutik,” in R. Bubner, K. Cramer, and R. Wiehl (Ed.), Hermeneutik und Dialektik: Festschrift für Hans-Georg Gadamer, Tübingen, 73–104.

- H. Albert (1971), Plädoyer für den kritischen Rationalismus, Munich.
- P. Ricœur (1975), "La tâche de l'herm." and other essays, in F. Bovon and G. Rouiller (Ed.), Exegesis, Neuchâtel, 179–228.
- ♦ K. Rahner (1960), "Überlegungen zur Dogmenentwicklung," Schr. zur Th. 4, 11–50.
- E. Castelli (Ed.) (1963), Ermeneutica e tradizione, Rome.
- J.M. Robinson and J.B. Cobb (Ed.) (1964), The New Hermeneutic, New York.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), "Hermeneutik und Universalgeschichte" and "Über historische und theologische Hermeneutik," Grundfr. syst. Th., 91–122 and 123–58.
- C.E. Braaten (1968), History and Hermeneutics, New Directions in Theology Today 2, London.
- B. Casper (1968), "Die Bedeutung der philosophischen Hermeneutik für die Theologie," ThQ 148, 283–302.
- M. van Esbroeck (1968), Herm., structuralisme et exégèse: Essai de logique kérygmatische, Paris.
- R.E. Palmer (1969), Hermeneutics: Interpretation Theory in Schleiermacher, Dilthey, Heidegger and Gadamer, Evanston, Northwestern University Press.
- E. Biser (1970), Theologische Sprachtheorie und Hermeneutik, Munich.
- E. Schillebeeckx (1971), Glaubensinterpretation: Beiträge zu einer hermeneutischen und kritischen Theologie, Mainz.
- A. Chapelle (1973), Herm., photocopied lecture, Institut d'études théol., Brussels.
- H.W. Frei (1974), The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics, New Haven–London.
- R. Marlé (1975), Parler de Dieu aujourd'hui: La th. herm. de G. Ebeling, CFI 82.
- J.-P. Resweber (1975), La th. face au défi herm., Louvain-Paris.
- M. Costantini (1976), "La Bible n'est pas un texte," Com(F) I/7, 40–54.
- F. Mußner (1976), HDG I . 3 . c (2).
- P. Beauchamp (1977), L'Un et l'Autre Testament I; (1990), II, Paris.
- J. Greisch (1977), Herm. et grammatologie, Paris.
- B.J. Hilberath (1978), Theologie zwischen Tradition und Kritik: Die philosophische Hermeneutik H.-G. Gadamer als Herausforderung des theologischen Selbstverständnisses, Düsseldorf.
- S. Breton (1979), Écriture et révélation, CFI 97.
- A.C. Thiselton (1980), The Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description with Special Reference to Heidegger, Bultmann, Gadamer, and Wittgenstein, Exeter.
- G. Stobbe (1981), Hermeneutik—ein ökumenisches Problem: Eine Kritik der katholischen Gadamer-Rezeption, ÖTh 8.
- D. Tracy (1981), The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism, London, esp. 99–153.
- J.-L. Marion (1982), "Du site eucharistique de la th.," in Dieu sans l'être, Paris, 197–222.
- C. Geffré (1983), Le christianisme au risque de l'interprétation, CFI 120, 19–104.
- J. Greisch (1985), L'âge herm. de la raison, CFI 133, esp. 15–121.
- J. Pépin and K. Hoheisel (1988), "Hermeneutik," RAC 14, 722–72.
- W.G. Jeanrond (1991), Theological Hermeneutics, London.
- W. Alexander (1993), Hermeneutica generalis. Zur Konzeption und Entwicklung der allgemeinen Verstehenslehre im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert, Stuttgart.
- J. Grondin (1993), L'universalité de l'herm., Paris (Einführung in die philosophische Hermeneutik, Darmstadt, 1991).
- J. Ladrière (1993), "Interprétation et vérité," LTP 49, 189–99.
- J. Grondin (1994), Der Sinn für Hermeneutik, Darmstadt.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), "Urgences kérygmatisques et délais herm. Sur les contraintes élémentaires du discours théol.," RPL 92, 254–80.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Exegesis; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Scripture, Senses of

Hermeticism. See Theosophy

Hesychasm

The semantic complex formed by hèsukhia and its derivatives represents a key concept in the ascetico-mystical literature of the Christian East, attested from the dawn of monasticism* to the present day. Of uncertain etymology (hèsthai: to be seated?) and difficult to translate (tranquility, vacuity?), it has undergone a variety of historical developments. It may denote a state of soul* (consisting of withdrawal, peace*, and silence), a way of life (the eremitical state), a method of prayer* (known as monologistos or “Jesus* prayer”), a theory of contemplation* (linked to the soteriology of the Greek Fathers*), a theological system (developed by Gregory* Palamas in the 14th century), or a cultural referent shared by different religious movements (including, from the 18th century, that of the Philocalia). Taken as a whole, these layers and meanings constitute for the Orthodox Church a methodical spirituality, organized according to dogmatic* theology.

a) Primitive Hesychasm. From the fourth century onward, hèsukhia summarized the two fundamental obligations of monastic life: outward anchoritism (seclusion from the outer world) and inward asceticism*. The writings attributed to Anthony (†356) and his disciples, the Apophthegmata Patrum, and the narratives of the chroniclers of the church (from Palladius’s Lausiac History [c. 420] to the Spiritual Meadow [c. 610] by John Moschus), all restrict the title of hesychast to hermits alone. There is no hèsukhia without monôsis, solitude, or at the very least isolation. However, the organization into lavrae, the apostolic dimension of spiritual* direction (recognized in Ammonas’s first Letter on hèsukhia), the equally contemplative vocation of cenobitism (intrinsic to the Rule of Pachomius, †346), and the model of reclusion in a community (promoted by Barsanuphius of Gaza, †540), underline the rapid rise to dominance of the inward sense of the term. As well as being a way of life, hèsukhia was also “an art and a grace” (Evagrius Ponticus [†399], Treatise, PG 40, 1260–62 a). It required apatheia, mastery of the passions*; amerimnia, absolute indifference to worry; katharsis, the discernment and eradication of thoughts (logismoi); and nèpsis, vigilance over the intellect and heart. The means and the end of these states was the mnèmè tou theou, the suppression of the world of the senses, imagination, and intellect, a suppression that made possible the recollection of God*—or more precisely of Jesus—in prayer. Based on a typological exegesis* of mystical preeminence (with the figures of Moses, Elijah, Mary of Bethany, and John the “beloved disciple”) and a literal interpretation of the New Testament commandment to pray continually (Lk 18:1; Eph 6:18; 1 Thes 5:17), meletè or meditative prayer consisted of the oral repetition or mental contemplation of a formula of contrition, usually taken from the Psalms (Ps 6:3, 25:16, 51:3, etc.) or the Gospels* (the tax collector, the blind man, the Canaanite woman). A method of constant epiclesis* (which according to Cassian [†432] constituted the “original secret” of the desert tradition [Conferences, X, 10]), hèsukhia opened the way to the anticipation of the Kingdom* and the vision of God (Pseudo-Macarius, 5th century, Hom. I, 12).

b) Prayer of Jesus and the Sinaitic School. The doctrinal formulation of hesychasm was faced from the outset with two major accounts of monastic life, each of which incurred a suspicion of heterodoxy. On the one hand, there was the Evagrian corpus. Rooted in an extreme intellectualism* inspired by the school of Origen, and notable as much for its psychological as for its lexical architecture, this body of work was later disseminated pseudonymously. On the other hand, there was the pseudepigraphical corpus of the Macarian Homilies, with its powerful biblical realism characterized by the concepts of experience*, of the heart, and of felt grace*, but open to question as to its possible Messalianism*. In the Gnostic Chapters, Diadochus of Photike (fifth century) achieved a christocentric and sacramental synthesis of these two currents that would be given its classic form by the Sinaitic school. The practice known as “prayer to/of Jesus” probably became associated with it by a process of gradual evolution, in the context of a continuous transmission. John Climacus (†649), who defined hèsukhia as “an uninterrupted service of God,” stipulated that “the recollection of Jesus should be as one with breathing” (Ladder 27). Hesychius of Batos (eighth century) insisted on perpetual prayer and frequently employed the theme of respiration (Centuries I, 5, PG 93, 1481 d). Thus numerous parallels link the name* of Jesus and/or the activity of breathing with monological prayer. Their precise value and meaning (e.g., Nilus of Ancyra [ODCC calls him Nilus the Ascetic] [† c. 430] Letters III, 33, PG 79, 392 b), or their exact dating (e.g., Philémon, seventh century?, Very Useful Discourse, Philocalia II, 241–52), remain subjects of debate. Nevertheless, after the eighth century all metaphorical interpretation was ruled out, and the invocation assumed the now-familiar form: “Lord Jesus Christ*, Son of God, Saviour, have pity upon me, a sinner.”

c) Method of Prayer. The hesychastic renaissance that occurred at Mount Athos between the 13th and 15th centuries coincided with the revelation of a psychosomatic technique—no doubt of earlier date and originating from within the tradition—that complemented the prayer of Jesus. Its classic statements are The Method of Holy Prayer by Pseudo-Symeon (perhaps attributable to Nicephorus [† c. 1280], himself the author of a short work, Nèpsis and the Care of the Heart), as well as two treatises by Gregory the Sinaite (†1346) titled Of the Modes of Prayer and Precepts for Hesychasts. The method, stated simply, consisted of withdrawing into a dark cell, sitting down with the head bent, controlling one's breathing, looking into "the place of the heart," and rhythmically repeating the prayer. Although some physiological explanations and descriptions of its effects appear to cast doubt on the purely instrumental character of the method, its only goal remained receptiveness to grace (Of the Modes, PG 150, 1329 b–1332 a). Theoleptus of Philadelphia (†1326), a disciple of Nicephorus, does not mention it (On Secret Activity, PG 143, 388 ab), and Gregory Palamas (†1359), associated with Gregory the Sinaite, plays down its importance in order to exclude any mechanical conception of hēsukhia (Tr. I, 2, 3–9). For all that, it became the pretext for the "hesychastic controversy" and shed light on far more decisive theological issues.

d) Byzantine Neo-Hesychasm. "To contain the incorporeal in a corporeal dwelling" (Climacus, Ladder 27): a doctrine as much as a form of spirituality, hesychasm contained something of the Greek Fathers' gnosiology. It verified it experimentally and gave it concrete expression by confirming the reality of divinization: full personal communion* with God realized the eschatological promise here on earth; participation in the mystery* was real and in no way diminished it. In parallel with the establishment of christological dogma*, the main current of patristic thought, from the Cappadocian Fathers (fourth century) to John Damascene (†749), incorporated the vocabulary of hēsukhia, its use of apophasis (negative formulations) and antinomy (contradictory constructions), and its discursive reduction to soteriological principles alone. The theory of divine indwelling adopted the anthropology* of the desert and its principal expressions—the transfiguration of the body, the spiritual senses, the heart as a projection of the noûs (the intellect or "transcendent I") and of the human totality. Hesychasm likewise helped to form a representation of deification (by way of the themes of light, glory*, and gifts) while at the same time prohibiting its conceptualization: the passage—the Passover—which made "man God by grace" implemented a radical disjunction with the whole of creation (Maximus* the Confessor [†662], Theol. and Ec. Chap. I, 51–60, PG 90, 1101–05). From the ninth century onward, Byzantine theology* would formalize this dialectic of divine incommunicability and communication by applying it to pneumatology. Symeon the New Theologian (†1022), a defender of the charismatic nature of the church, placed the vision of God in the perspective of a baptism* experienced consciously (Cat. XIV, 68–164). According to Gregory the Sinaite, an analysis of the intellect and its manifestations tended to affirm an absolute transcendence of pure prayer, under the sole influence of the Holy Spirit* (On hēsukhia, PG 150, 1303–12): beyond the minor phenomenon of ecstasy, the state of divinization was seen to be both stable and dynamic. Finally, Gregory Palamas, reacting against the violent attacks of the philosophers and humanists of his time, endowed hesychasm with a dogmatic expression by defining the unity and distinctness of the essence and the uncreated energies. Sustained by a desire for liturgical reform, a return to the sources of iconography, and an intense activity of translation, and supported by the patriarchate of Constantinople, which had been won over to Palamism, neo-hesychasm spread across the whole Byzantine world. It was disseminated by Theodosius of Tarnovo (†1363) in Bulgaria, Romil of Vidin (†1375) in Serbia, Nicodemus of Tismana (†1409) in Wallachia, and Sergius of Radonezh (†1392) and Metropolitan Cyprian († c. 1420) in Russia. This inheritance was to play a decisive part in the development of modern Orthodoxy*.

e) Revival of the Philocalia. Hesychasm continued to fulfill the function of a theological benchmark in the general crisis that affected the Orthodox Church from the 16th to the 18th century: although marginalized, the "nonpossessors"—whose Rule, promulgated by Nil Sorsky (†1508), advocated this method of prayer—brought to completion its reception in Russia. And limited as they were, the efforts at publishing that accompanied the internal mission undertaken by the patriarchate of Jerusalem* under the pontificates of Nectarius, Dositheus, and Chrysantus (1661–1743) resulted in better access to the texts. As a result of the importance accorded to the monasteries, and to the institution of spiritual father (the gerôn or starets) in the preservation of the faith*, the Jesus prayer was taught to a wide circle of the laity*. It was, however, with the publication of the Philocalia in 1782 that the theoretical resurgence came to completion. This anthology of texts from the fourth to the 15th century, compiled by Macarius of Corinth (†1805) and Nicodemus the Hagiorite (†1809), was expressly intended to confront Enlightenment rationalism* with an encyclopedia of hesychasm, Palamite in its ambitions and linking dogma with spirituality. This revival was initially apparent in Greek- and Arabic-speaking circles. Thanks to the Dobrotolubije, a Slavonic version of the Greek text published in Moldavia by Paisy Velichkovsky (†1794) and simultaneously in Moscow in 1793, it then spread to central Europe, the Balkans, and Russia. The latter saw a flourishing of the Philocalian spirit during the 19th century. The translation of the original collection (St. Petersburg, 1857) by Bishop Ignatius Brianchaninov (†1867) was followed by a new, more extensive compilation by Theophan the Recluse (†1894), which, however, betrayed a pietistic bias in its cuts and additions (Moscow, 1877). Made famous by major figures of sanctity such as Seraphim of Sarov (†1833) or the startsi of Optino (especially Ambrose [†1891]), popularized by the anonymous work The Sincere Narratives of a Pilgrim to His Spiritual Father (Kazan, c. 1870), hallowed by art and literature (Dostoyevsky's The Brothers Karamazov being but one example), hesychasm regained all its cultural value. In 1912–13, however, the condemnation of the “onomatolaters” (“name-worshippers”), Russian monks of Athos who worshipped the divinity of the name of Jesus itself, revealed the difficulties inherent in this expansion.

f) Prospects. In the 20th century the monumental Romanian Philocalia of Dumitru Staniloae (†1994) significantly accorded pride of place to theoretical writings and in particular to Maximus the Confessor and Gregory Palamas. In contemporary Orthodox theology the neopatristic school regards hesychasm as a summary mapping of the Christian experience*, and indispensable as a prism through which to interpret that experience. At the same time, a movement toward the revival of monasticism has laid claim to its entire heritage; and as the writings of Joseph the Hesychast (†1954) and Paissios of Cappadocia (†1995) make clear, Mount Athos is still its epicenter. This air of completion and unchangingness are entirely characteristic. Hesychasm cannot be reduced to a matter of sub-religious technique, and comparisons with prânâyâmâ yoga, the Indian Japa, or the nembûtsû of Zen Buddhism (with the exception of the Sufi dhikr, which may have a related ancestry) fall within the province of fundamental anthropology or syncretistic sociology. Neither can it be classed as an Eastern variant of ejaculatory prayer, such as the Benedictine quies or the Ignatian Exercises, since the superficial similarities are canceled out by the difference in systematic and historical scope. In the consciousness of Orthodoxy, hêsukhia holds together spirituality and theology, prophecy* and tradition, truth and the Holy Spirit. The closest equivalent one might suggest would be “the logic of grace”—provided that it is understood as an experience incapable of being conveyed in words.

- Athanasius of Alexandria, Vie et conduite de notre père saint Antoine, PG 26, 837–976; SC 400; SpOr 28.
- Apophtegmes des Pères*, “série alphabétique,” PG 65, 71–440 (French trans. SpOr 1, 1966), “série systématique,” PL 73, 851–1222 (French trans. Solesmes, 1970; 2nd Ed. 1976); SC 387.

- Evagrius Ponticus, Practicos, PG 40, 1220–76; SC 170–71.
- Macaire, Homélie spirituelles, PG 34, 449–822; SpOr 40; Die 50 geistlichen Homilien des Makarios, Ed. H. Dörries, PTS 4.
- Diadochus of Photike, Œuvres spirituelles, SC 5 ter.
- Jean Climaque, L'Échelle sainte, PG 88, 631–1164; SpOr 24.
- Simeon, The New Theologian, Catecheses, SC 96, 104, 113; Hymns, SC 156, 174, 196.
- Grégoire le Sinaïte, Œuvres, PG 150, 1237–1330.
- Gregory Palamas, De la déification de l'être humain, trans. J.-M. Monsaingeon and J. Paramelle, Lausanne, 1990.
- Nicodème l'Hagiorite and Macaire de Corinthe, Philokalia, Venice, 1787 (repr. Athens, 5 vols., 1957–63); SpOr, 11 vols. (2nd Ed. 1994–95, 2 vols.).
- Paissy Velichkovsky, Autobiographie d'un starets (French trans. SpOr 53).
- Ignace Brianchaninov, Approches de la prière de Jésus (1867), Saint Petersburg (French trans. SpOr 35).
- Théophane le reclus, Dobrotoloubije, Moscow, 1877–1905, 5 vols. (New Ed. New York, 5 vols., 1963–66).
- Dimitru Staniloae, Filocalia, Sibiu-Bucarest, 1949–90, 12 vols.
- Joseph the Hesychasm, Grammata, Mount Athos, 1982 (French trans. “Letters,” Contacts, 1990, 42, 168–73).
- ♦ K. Holl (1898), Enthusiasmus und Bußgewalt beim griechischen Mönchtum, Leipzig.
- J. Bois (1901), “Grégoire le Sinaïte et l'hésychasme à l'Athos au XIVe s.,” EOr 5, 65–73.
- I. V. Popov (1906), “Ideia obozhenia v drevne—Vostochnoi tserkvi,” Voprosi Filosofij i Psixologij 97, 165–213.
- S. L. Epifanovich (1915), Propodobnyi Maksim Ispovednik i vizantiiskoe bogoslovie, Kiev.
- J. Gross (1938), La divinisation du chrétien d'après les Pères grecs, Paris.
- H. Dörries (1941), Symeon von Mesopotamien: Die Überlieferung der messalianischen “Makarios” Schriften, TU 55, 1, Leipzig.
- P. Galtier (1946), Le Saint-Esprit en nous d'après les Pères grecs, AnGr 37, Rome.
- L. Gardet (1952–53), “La mention du nom divin dans la mystique musulmane,” RThom 52, 662–79; 53, 197–216.
- S. Boulgakov (1953), Filosofia Imeni, Paris (trad. fr. Lausanne, 1991), Philosophie du verbe et du nom, 171–207).
- W. Nölle (1954), “Hesychasmus und yoga,” Byz 47, 95–103.
- A. Scrima (1958), “L'avènement philocalique en Roumanie,” Ist 3, 295–328, 443–74.
- I. Hausssher (1960), Noms du Christ et voies d'oraison, OCA 157, Rome.
- A. Guillaumont (1962), Les “Kephalaia gnostica” d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens, Paris.
- VI. Lossky (1962), Vision de Dieu, Neuchâtel.
- J. Leclercq (1963), “A propos de l'hésychasme en Occident,” Le millénaire du Mont-Athos I, 253–64, Chèvotogne.
- L. Thunberg (1965), Microcosm and Mediator, Lund.
- W. Völker (1965), Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden.
- D. J. Chitty (1966), The Desert a City, Oxford.
- I. Hausssher (1966), Hésychasme et Prière, OCA 176, Rome.
- M. Lot-Borodine (1969), La déification de l'homme, Paris.
- A. Scrima (1969), “L'apophase et ses connotations selon la tradition spirituelle de l'Orient chrétien,” Hermès 6, 157–69.
- K. Ware (1970), “Tradition and personal experience in late byzantine theology,” ECR 3, 131–41.
- G. Maloney (1973), Russian Hesychasm: The Spirituality of Nil Sorskiij, The Hague.
- J. Meyendorff (1974), Byzantine hesychasm, London.

- H. Dörries (1978), Die Theologie des Makarios/Symeon, Göttingen.
- J. B. Dunlop (1978), Starets Amurosy, Oxford.
- I. Gorainoff (1979), Seraphim de Sarov, Paris.
- A. Guillaumont (1979), Aux origines du monachisme chrétien, SpOr 30, 67–212.
- B. Krivochéine (1980), Dans la lumière du Christ: Saint Syméon le Nouveau Théologien, Chèvetogne.
- J. Gouillard (1981), La vie religieuse à Byzance, London.
- D. Staniloaë (1981), Prière de Jésus et expérience du Saint-Esprit, Paris.
- J. Meyendorff (1983), Byzantine Theology, 2nd Ed., New York.
- B. Fraigneau-Julien (1985), Les sens spirituels et la vision de Dieu selon Syméon le Nouveau Théologien, ThH 67, Paris.
- P. Deseille (1986), L'Évangile au désert, Paris.
- T. Spidlik (1988), La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien, OCA 206 and 230, Rome.
- O. Clément, J. Serr (1989), La Prière du cœur, 2nd Ed., SpOr 6 b.
- P. Miquel (1989), Le vocabulaire de l'expérience spirituelle dans la patristique grecque, ThH 86, Paris.
- B. Bobrinskoy (1992), Communion du Saint-Esprit, SpOr 56.
- K. Papoulidès (1993), Hagioreitika, Mount Athos.

JEAN-FRANÇOIS COLOSIMO

See also Experience; Gregory of Palamas; Knowledge, Divine; Monasticism; Negative Theology

Hexapla. See Translations of the Bible, Ancient

Hierarchy

In canon law* the word “hierarchy” (from the Greek hieros, “sacred,” and arkhè, “origin,” “domination”) designates a religious structure characterized and determined by a power of transcendent origin. This kind of structure comes about only in a context in which essential theological decisions are constantly needing to be made. In a religion of the Law* or of the Book*, for example, where the principal concern is to interpret established principles, there can be no hierarchy. This is why hierarchy is a typically Christian phenomenon.

a) Development of Hierarchy in Christianity. The concept of hierarchy is not found in the New Testament, although it does present distinctions of rank among the associates of Jesus* (the primacy of “the Twelve,” the special role of Peter*) and among the post-Easter communities (the authority of Paul, the gradation of ministries [1 Cor 12:28], emphasis on the role of the episkopos). It was out of these distinctions that there arose in the second century the ministerial triad (bishop*-presbyter*-deacon*). Pseudo-Dionysius* was probably the first to apply the term “hierarchy” to church structures*, by establishing an analogy between the threefold heavenly order and the ternary organization of the church* on earth. In this instance, hierarchy was a speculative category making it possible to interpret the order of salvation* (see Cael. Hier. 3. 1). With the development of canonical ecclesiology* in the 12th century, the church was characterized as a society* (societas perfecta) comparable to a political community, made up of unequal classes—clergy and laity*—the various functions of which determined in turn further differences in rank. For this reason, and also because of the importance of the clergy for the church as a whole, hierarchy became a central canonical concept. However, it presupposes a sacramental order (ministry*), so that it is encountered (in theory and in practice) only in Christian confessions that have such an order (the Catholic Church, the Orthodox churches, the Anglican Communion). While the churches that came out of the Reformation do also ordain their ministers, because of their doctrine of universal priesthood* the ministry has only a functional role.

Hierarchy

b) Catholic Position up to the Second Vatican Council. Early on, bishops (as true holders of the ministry) received upon ordination* full power (potestas sacra) over a particular local* church (relative ordination). In the 12th century the idea emerged that ecclesial power contains two elements, one resulting from ordination (potestas ordinis) and the other from jurisdiction* over a particular church (potestas iurisdictionis). The power of ordination is gradually conferred by the sacrament* of ordination (deacon, priest*, bishop) and determines the hierarchy of the clerical order. The power of jurisdiction is attached to the ministries of the pope* and the bishop, falling to the former by the acceptance of his position and to the latter by his appointment. All other responsibilities are derived from one of these two hierarchical degrees. The pope thereby possesses primacy in matters of jurisdiction, but not in matters of ordination. Strictly speaking, the two elements should be linked in such a way that only an ordained minister would also have the power of jurisdiction. But in practice this principle is not respected at the present time (CIC of 1983, can. 129, following which the potestas regiminis falls to ordained ministers, while the laity* have the right to participate in the exercitum potestatis). Even today the fundamental solidarity of these two elements is evident in the fact that the hierarchical order is attributed to “divine right” (can. 330–31, 375, 1008). But because the church understands itself essentially on the basis of the idea that the community of believers makes up the people* of God, and also because relative ordination still defines hierarchy in relation to a particular community, hierarchical absolutism has never taken root. This is clearly highlighted in the doctrine of the sensus fidei* and the sensus fidelium, in the place of scientific theology*, and in reflections on reception*.

c) Vatican II and Current Law of the Catholic Church. Vatican* II attempted to combine the medieval model of the church as “society” with the concept of communio developed in the early church. This led to a reevaluation of the functions of the bishop, the local churches, and the laity. The concept of communio hierarchica made it possible to link the two approaches (LG 21). Particular emphasis was placed on the absolute bond between the church and the Pope (LG 22; nota praevia 3). The distinction between sacramental ordination and canonical mission was maintained by emphasizing the latter. In the CIC (Codex Iuris Canonici) the hierarchical structure is presented in the following manner: The pope holds supreme power—plenary, direct, regular, and universal power, that he may exercise freely at any time—in the legislative, executive, judicial, and doctrinal domains; and doctrinally he possesses infallibility when he speaks ex cathedra. The episcopal college, led by the pope, shares this full and supreme power in the official acts of its members, whether they are scattered around the world or meeting in an ecumenical council*. In addition there are certain organs common to the church as a whole: the synod* of bishops, the college of cardinals, the Roman curia, papal legates, and apostolic nuncios. The CIC of 1983 does not contain the noun hierarchia, but only the adjective hierarchicus, associated with the terms “structure,” “constitution,” “community,” “recourse,” and “superiors.”

• Canon Law Texts.

- R. F. Hathaway (1969), Hierarchy and the Definition of Order in the Letters of Ps.-Dionysius, The Hague.
H. Dombois (1971), Hierarchie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
P. Krämer (1973), Dienst und Vollmacht in der Kirche, Trier.
H. Patee (1973), Hierarchy Theory, New York.
E. Schillebeeckx (1988), Das geistliche Amt, Düsseldorf.
G. O. Daly (1989), “Hiérarchie,” RAC 15, 42–74.
P. Eicher, “Hiérarchie,” NHThG2 2, 330–49.
G. Muselli (1992), Storia del diritto canonico, Turin.

WOLFGANG BEINERT

See also Authority; Church and State; Communion; Government, Church; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility

Hilary of Poitiers

?—died c. 366–368

Between the years 350 and 360, Hilary, Bishop* of Poitiers, was one of the most skilled spokesmen for the pro-Nicaean West. Except for his relations with Martin of Tours, whose monastic plans he favored, our knowledge of his life, based on the documentation at our disposal today, is contained in his works, almost all of which were inspired by his stance in favor of the Nicaean Creed. Although Hilary did not have the gift for speculative virtuosity of his exact contemporary Marius Victorinus, nonetheless, his works established him as an exegetist of absolutely first-rate abilities, well qualified to develop a biblical* theology of rare scope.

a) Brilliant Exegetist. The earliest of Hilary's works to have come down to us, a commentary on Matthew, already shows signs of his great hermeneutic agility in allegorical interpretation of the Gospels*. Because the allegorical method was rare in Western Christendom, Hilary's use of it proves the independent circulation of Origen's principles of exegesis*—apart from Hilary's personal knowledge of that master of Alexandria's treatises. Hilary's scrupulous regard for method, his careful implementation of the most coherent system possible for deciphering the Scriptures, was allied to his very uncommon purpose at this time, to propound a unitarian reading of the texts of the Gospels.

By means of a very Irenaean grasp of the whole plan of the history of salvation*, Hilary was intent on interpreting all the deeds and sayings concerning the life of Christ*, while preserving throughout their literal meaning, as forecasts of their later consequences—such as the incredulity of the Jews, the communication of the Good News to the Gentiles, and the growth of the church*. The annotations of doctrinal character that punctuate his work clearly reveal Hilary's debt to Tertullian* and Novatian—and, whenever the commentary touches on ecclesiology*, to Cyprian*, too. The first hints of an anti-Arian polemic can also be discerned in this work.

b) A Nicaean Astride East and West. A victim of the policy of bringing the Western episcopacy into line, a policy directed by Constantius II (an emperor concerned with safeguarding the empire's religious unity, founded on an expression of faith* hostile to the Nicaean Creed), and a policy enforced in the Gauls by Saturninus, Bishop of Arles, Hilary was exiled to Asia Minor in 356. His four-year-long stay in the East not only enabled him to discover the wealth of Eastern spiritual and theological exegetical tradition*—his works, Tractatus super Psalms and a Tractatus Mysteriorum, no doubt composed when he returned from exile, show Origen*'s renewed influence on him. But his exile also allowed him to get to know at first hand the main documents in the Arian controversy, such as the Epistle from Arius to Alexander of Alexandria and certain confessions of faith from the anti-Nicaean synods, while he admitted to having discovered the Nicaean Creed only a short time before his banishment (De synodis 91).

More than any other Westerner, Hilary concerned himself with evaluating the complexity of the Eastern theologico-political field at a point in time when this domain, with the explosion of the anti-Nicaean front, was undergoing profound evolutions and reconstructions. Through this interest, he made close contacts with the chief representatives of the Homoiousian Movement. Members of this movement balked at the concept of homoousios (consubstantiation*) and claimed that the Son was not of the same substance as the Father, but merely of a similar substance (homoiousios). At the same time, these homoiousians remained just as vigorously opposed to both the radical Arianism of an Aetius or an Eudoxus as to the homoiousianism promoted by Valens of Mursa and Ursacius of Singidunum at the Council of Sirmium in 357.

In this context, Hilary saw the necessity of considerably modifying the schematic and oversimplistic view, largely derived from that of Athanasius of Alexandria, that the badly informed Westerners held of the Arian crisis and the theological positions of its various protagonists. In Hilary's eyes, all the adversaries of homoousios were not necessarily Arians, and the Nicaeans ought to try to seek agreement with these anti-Nicaean anti-Arians at a crucial moment in the Arian crisis (the meetings of the two Councils* of Rimini and of Seleucia had just been announced). He thus proposed himself as a sort of mediator (De synodis 7) between the two circles of influence, and it was to this purpose that at the end of 358 or the beginning of 359 he addressed to the bishops of Gaul and of Brittany, some of whom had consulted him, a treatise-epistle, the De synodis, in which he tried to demonstrate the significant conformity concealed beneath the terminological disagreement between the Homoiousian and Homoousian theses.

In the first part (De synodis §1–65), Hilary stressed the Homoiousian rejection of the “Blasphemy of Sirmium” of 357 (a commentary on the anathemas of the Synod that Basil of Ancyra had convened in 358 for this purpose) in order to bring about an examination of the confessions of faith to which this group subscribed: Antioch—351, Sardis—343, Sirmium—351. No doubt Hilary had already begun to apply such a method for the collation of a dossier of historicodogmatic testimonia in a work of which only fragments are extant today, published under the title Collectanea antariana parisina, whose stages of composition are obscure. He deliberately exploited the lack of mention or imprecision with regard to the key points of the controversy, which these different creeds contained, as well as their repeated condemnations of radical Arianism, and he claimed to extract from them a Trinitary theology* in conformity with the Nicæan canons. Hilary’s acuity deserves a passing mention: he was one of the first of only a few Westerners to perceive (De synodis §32) that the Latin term substantia can be translated just as well by ousia as by hupostasis, the Greek terms understood respectively as the unity of substance and the distinction of the Persons*.

In a second section (De synodis §66–92), he compared homoousios and homoiousios in order to show the equivalence of the two terms. Although he was under no illusions about the difficulties of the enterprise and the resistance it aroused in both parties to the dispute—the work included an address to the Homoiousian bishops—he attempted nonetheless to provide an Homoousian exegesis of homoiousios, in the framework of a homology between similitudo (similarity) and aequalitas (equivalence).

In the short run, Hilary’s efforts were fruitless, or almost so. The Homoiousian positions were victorious finally at the Councils of Rimini and Seleucia (359). Moreover, Hilary’s negotiations with Constantius II, thanks to his coming to Constantinople in 360, ended in failure, as seen in Ad Constantium and In Constantium. Lucifer of Cagliari and other radical Nicæans accused Hilary of betrayal. As for Athanasius, in the Peri sunodôn, which he composed between 359 and 361, he cast the confessions of faith dear to the Homoiousians into the abyss of Arianism. Although Athanasius might have borrowed the title of his work from Hilary, he never mentioned him in any of his writings. Hilary’s success was therefore confined to Gaul above all. His influence on the synodal decree of the Council of Paris of 360–61, addressed to some Eastern bishops, is patent.

In 364–65, together with Eusebius of Verceil, Hilary failed in an attempt to oust the Homoiousian Auxentius from the See of Milan (see Contra Auxentium). Deeply conscious of his duties as a pastor*, Hilary was one of the first in the West to compose anti-Arian hymns, of which only fragments survive. His most lasting contribution is a great work, probably elaborated in its entirety in the East, the De Trinitate, to borrow the title given to this work since the sixth century, which demonstrates clearly the fruits of his Eastern exile.

c) Doctrinal Modifications and a New Style of Nicæan Theology. De Trinitate, an imposing treatise in 12 books written in an often difficult language, is not a general survey of theology drawn up according to a prearranged plan from its beginnings (see M. Simonetti’s Note sul commento a Matteo de Ilario di Poitiers, 1964). It is a work of exceptional scope for the Nicæan West, and it leads progressively to the refutation of the Arianizing theses and their defenses, not without recapitulations, digressions, or anticipations, and it presents a very specific defense and demonstration of the Nicæan position. The rejection of technical argumentation, which was largely indebted to the philosophical field, in favor of a lavish biblical theology is coupled to very meaningful lexical choices. The Nicæan term homoousios is hardly mentioned, consistent with the reticence that is clearly evident in his other work of this period, De synodis. Contrary to Athanasius, Marius Victorinus, and Gregory of Elvira, Hilary thought that without a gloss, this term, just like homoiousios, was open to a “heretical” as well as an “orthodox” interpretation (De synodis 70–71). That is because his contact with the Homoiousians had given him a “strong anti-Sabellian outlook” (Simonetti) that made him condemn not only Photinus but also Marcel of Ancyra (De Trinitate VII:3).

Henceforth, Hilary constantly avoided all traditional analogies* that sought to explain the relations of the Father* and the Son, such as root/plant, source/stream, or fire/flame (De Trinitate IX:37). Moreover, he was keenly aware of the inadequacy of human language when speaking of God* (De Trinitate IV:14 and X:67), and his arguments spring above all from exegesis, especially of the Johannine writings. All the same, he did not abandon the theological tradition inaugurated by Tertullian and Novation. Rather, he used this tradition copiously to demonstrate, at one and the same time, the unity and the plurality of God (natura/persona), as well as the copresence of two centers of distinct characteristics in Jesus Christ*. However, he was not its slave; he abandoned the Tertullian doctrine of the corporeity of the soul*; he also developed an original doctrine (but one not exempt from Docetic traits) of the celestial body of Christ (De Trinitate X:14f.).

Despite the title under which his work is known, Hilary gave very limited space to the Holy* Spirit, which he considered to be a gift and which he never described as a persona. His whole effort was bent on showing, in the Father and the Son, that total copenetration of being, of action, and of will that their origin clearly distinguished, since the Father had engendered and the Son was engendered.

Augustine* would later recall this first attempt, which was created as a global confrontation of the most profound doctrinal issues of the Arian crisis, an attempt of which his commentary on Psalm 138 gives a synthesis.

- E. Dekkers (1995), Clavis Patrum Latinorum, 3rd Ed., Turnhout, no. 427–72.
- Tractatus mysteriorum* (SC 19 bis); Tractatus super Psalmos (CSEL 22), incl. Tract. sup. Ps CXVIII (SC 354 and 357); In Matthaeum (SC 254 and 258); De Trinitate (CChr.SL 62–62A); De synodis (PL X, 479–546, and TU 133, 539–47); Collectanea antiariana parisina (CSEL 65, 43–193); Liber II ad Constantium (CSEL 65, 193–205); Liber in Constantium (SC 334); Contra Auxentium (PL X, 609–18); Hymni III e cod. Aretino (CSEL 65, 209–16).
- ♦ P. Smulders (1944), La doctrine trinitaire de saint Hilaire de Poitiers, Rome.
- A. Fierro (1964), Sobre la gloria en San Hilario, Rome.
- M. Simonetti (1964), “Note sul commento a Matteo di Ilario di Poitiers,” VetChr 1, 35–64; (1965), “Note sulla struttura e la cronologia del ‘De Trinitate’ di Ilario di Poitiers,” Studi Urbinati 39/1, 274–300.
- C.F.A. Borchardt (1966), Hilary of Poitiers’ Role in the Arian Struggle, The Hague.

- Ch. Kannengiesser (1968), “L’héritage d’Hilaire de Poitiers,” RSR 56, 435–56.
- Coll. (1969), Hilaire et son temps: Actes du Colloque de Poitiers à l’occasion du XVIe centenaire de la mort de saint Hilaire, Paris.
- Ch. Kannengiesser (1969), “Hilaire de Poitiers,” DSp 7/1, 466–99.
- J. Doignon (1971), Hilaire de Poitiers avant l’exil, Paris.
- C. Moreschini (1975), “Il linguaggio teologico di Ilario di Poitiers,” La Scuola Cattolica 103, 339–75.
- M. Simonetti (1975), La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome.
- L.F. Ladaría (1977), El Espíritu Santo en San Hilario de Poitiers, Madrid.
- G.M. Newlands (1978), Hilary of Poitiers: A Study in Theological Method, Bern.
- A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I: Von der apostolischen Zeit bis zum Konzil von Chalcedon, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 451, (2nd Ed. 1990).
- P.C. Burns (1981), The Christology in Hilary of Poitiers’ Commentary on Matthew, Rome.
- E.P. Meijering (1982), Hilary of Poitiers on the Trinity, De Trinitate, 1, 1–19, 2, 3, Leyden.
- M. Figura (1984), Das Kirchenverständnis des Hilarius von Poitiers, Freiburg.
- M. Simonetti (1985), Lettera e/o allegoria: Un contributo alla storia dell’esegesi patristica, Rome.
- M. Simonetti (1986), “Hilaire de Poitiers,” Initiation aux Pères de l’Église, IV: Les Pères latins, Ed. A. Di Berardino.
- M. Durst (1987), Die Eschatologie des Hilarius von Poitiers: Ein Beitrag zur Dogmengeschichte des IV. Jhdts, Bonn.
- R.C.P. Hanson (1988), The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, Edinburgh, 318–81.
- J. Doignon (1993), “Hilaire de Poitiers,” in Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, Ed. R. Herzog and P. Lebrecht Schmidt, vol. 5, Turnhout, §582, 503–37.
- Coll. (1995), Biblia Patristica, vol. 6, Strasbourg.
- P. Smulders (1995), Hilary of Poitiers’ Preface to His Opus historicum: Translation and Commentary, Leyden.

MICHEL-YVES PERRIN

See also Arianism; Athanasius of Alexandria; Trinity

Hirscher, Johann Baptist von. See Tübingen, Schools of

History

Two things are to be understood by history: a scientific discipline (the “investigation,” Greek historia [references in Winkelmann 1991] of mankind’s past) and the overall object of this discipline (“that which has taken place,” “that which has happened,” insofar as it has involved people). The quality of being “historical” is consequently attributed both to texts—to “history books”—and to facts or events—“historical events”: a double meaning that inevitably gives rise to ambiguities and calls for lexical clarifications. It might be added that the proper object of historical research (see A below) is the past, but that the philosophy and theology of history (see B below) generally permit themselves to consider history as a totality encompassing past, present, and future. Lastly, for the historical method and its employment in the interpretation of the New Testament corpus, see in the first instance Hengel 1979.

A. Historical Knowledge

Although prefigured elsewhere in the form of annals or chronicles, history originated in Greece, where it acquired the dual vocation of literary work (there could be no historian without the art of writing) and strict cognitive process. It was nonetheless in the modern period that it assumed its canonical form; and once the 16th century had made possible the advent of modern science and endowed it with statutes (Bacon), it took the greatest possible share of those enviable statutes. The subject matter of history, whether “fact” or “event,” certainly has the capacity to perplex the historian (and especially the philosopher!). It is evident, simply by definition, that the past no longer exists, that it no longer has being other than in the traces, monuments, archives, and memories that it has left. The significance of a paradox advanced by Wittgenstein* may be understood in this light: all our archives and all our memories together do not prove that the world, and we ourselves, have existed for more than a day or two, since a perverse creator could well have made everything two days ago, including in his creation* everything that we take as proof that there has been a past. How then are we to speak of the past, when any interaction with it is forbidden, when experience (in the scientific sense) is only ever possible in the element of the present, when we always require a kind of “core of belief,” in the Husserlian sense, in order to ascribe to a text, building, and so forth the status of a vestige or monument? The answer, which enables us to offer a solution to Wittgenstein’s paradox and at the same time to specify the method that should be used in history, consists of an appeal to the idea of witness. Just as “exact” science, according to Bacon, is a matter of “making nature* talk” in the same way that in the process of law a suspect is made to talk, so texts and archives, insofar as they are accorded the status of witnesses (and common sense leads us to acknowledge that among all the objects of the present there are some that are the remains of the past), may be forced to tell the truth*. This insistence has a name: criticism. The aim of criticism is to understand the evidence (to speak the language that the witness speaks, to know what literary genre he or she is employing, and first of all to establish the exact text of the evidence, etc.) and to assign it a truth value without naïveté. Only facts or events that the historian acknowledges to be knowable to him through the mediation of trustworthy witnesses can have the status of “historical.”

There remains one problem, however, that appears with growing insistence throughout the development of the historico-critical project: a witness is only trustworthy (a necessary though not a sufficient condition) if he or she gives evidence of a historical object that is accepted a priori to be possible. The existence of tales of miracles, as Hume remarked and Lessing reiterated, does not prove the existence of miracles. The critical standard for the past is revealed to the historian by the present—for where else could one be found? What is real at the present time reveals to him what may have been. The axiom upon which history is founded, as formulated by Troeltsch (1913), thus has every appearance of being indisputable: only things that could equally well happen today can aspire to the status of historical reality (event, speech, etc.). The past (and the future too, by the by) is expected to maintain a relationship of analogy with the present—a relationship in which similarity outweighs any dissimilarity. If, however, the question is asked what the present contains, man's modern, "scientific" ambitions lead necessarily (and tritely) to the conclusion that it contains facts, which we can try to deal with just as the "hard" sciences deal with the physical realities that fall within their domain. History does not claim to lay down the law on the level of existence proper to social, economic, or religious "facts," for example, but is content merely to record their existence. In so doing, however, it defines and establishes its subject matter: it is not the reality of the past, but that of the present, that dictates the meaning of "historical."

The consequences of such a problem need give no cause for alarm, provided that one is prepared to confront them head on. It is straightforwardly true, after all, that Troeltsch's axiom provides the starting point for any coherent ontology of the past, that "that which is" provides the most reliable criterion we have to interpret "that which is no longer." It is besides quite obvious that as far as what is concerned, the historian's starting point, because "scientific," is secularized. That which is—that which is in the factual order—includes neither the miracles, nor the wonders, nor the battles with giants, which are often the favorite ingredients of precritical ("premodern") narrative. That which is is defined as such in the context of a "vision of the world," our own, and within this framework some things exist and others do not. There are fairy stories; but a critical history of fairies would be no more than the history of a belief or superstition—it being understood that beliefs are historical objects just like any other.

One or two initial truths can thus be recognized: 1) The rules of what constitutes historical objects, to begin with, since they belong to science, to a "new science" (Vico) that appeared in the wake of the natural sciences*, are rules just as strictly atheistic as those of physics or chemistry, and displaying an atheism* just as strictly methodological. There is thus no unjust accusation to be leveled at what the critical historian has to say: he will never vouch for the reality of a miracle (whether worked by Jesus or by the spurious miracle worker Alexander of Abonuteichos, and whether recounted by the evangelist Mark or by Lucian of Samosata), for the good reason that his heuristic and hermeneutic principles deny that there can have been one; but the rationality of these principles prevents them from setting themselves up as absolutely right to the exclusion of any other correct statement. The critical historian can no more regard his statements as absolute than the physicist can make his theories absolute. Both would in fact jeopardize the scientific nature of their projects were they to lose sight of the axiomatic decisions that define their territory and their way of occupying that territory. 2) While history is competent only concerning historical matters, we should not be tempted to see it as devoted to a rather banal kind of positivism. Even that most spectacularly positivist of philosophers, Carnap (the architect of "logical positivism"), concluded his resolution of all philosophical problems by admitting the existence of enigmas (death*, evil*, etc.), which do not correspond to any scientific question, and which therefore do not call for a scientific response, but which must all the same be recognized to exist. The same goes for the historian. If he is naive, he will believe that nothing has existed that is not, ipso facto, a historical object—that "being historical" and "having been" are interchangeable. If he is less naive, he will say that the historical is merely historical, that "contingent historical truths" cannot be "proofs of the Spirit and strength" (Lessing, then Kierkegaard*; also Fichte, followed by Bultmann*, etc.), and that the important things—spiritual life, faith—begin by way of the leap that gives access to another territory. But why leap at all, if not because the past, even glimpsed within the limits of historicity pure and simple, also possesses a genuine and mysterious force—if not because the historical may also conceal more meaning, or more being, than its critical constitution assigns it a priori?

Epistemological common sense leads us here to a lexical distinction that has marked all the debates that have focused on the "historical Jesus*" and the "Christ* of faith," from M. Kähler (1896) to the New Quest of the Historical Jesus (Robinson 1959) and beyond: that between (in German) the historisches and the geschichtliches—one might say between the historical (as it has been defined on the basis of the historico-critical practice that constitutes it) and the historial (which may be defined, as generally as possible, as the flux of that which passes, that which has passed, and that which will pass, insofar as this flux is an object of human experience). Understood in terms of its more or less obvious meaning, the distinction expresses a refusal to authorize critical history to have the last word as to what has taken place. Taken positively, furthermore, it expresses a fruitful resolve to subject critical history to criticism. Such criticism, of course, must not end by stretching the links between the historical and the historical in such a way that the historical, in the eyes of the believer (and the theologian), ceases to appear as anything but a “factuality” immaterial to the logic of belief (Bultmann). Neither God* nor the miracles of Jesus nor his resurrection* are potential historical objects. Once it has done its round of the facts, history remains history; and if it encounters, for example, the mystery of an empty tomb, it cannot legitimately draw theological conclusions from it. Nevertheless, this distinction between the historical and the historical does not aim to support a gnosiological dualism, but rather to point out that the reality of the past goes beyond what history, as a science, can consider as absolutely certain. Because theology consists in the first instance of an act of memory, historical knowledge and theological knowledge are two ways of apprehending and interpreting the same reality. And while it is clear, in historical terms, that the past is accessible to whomever has eyes to see (and intelligence enough to assess the credibility* of the evidence), it is also clear, in theological terms, that the “eyes of faith” (Rousselot) see their object—the “image” or “face” of revelation* (Balthasar*)—only by being passionate for it (Kierkegaard) in a way that is either not truly “scientific” or else represents a scientific nature entirely of its own kind (e.g., T.F. Torrance).

Three codicils may be added. 1) History (Historie) itself has its history (Geschichte), within which objects have at times lost their historical status, but within which the nonhistorical may also become historical. The extreme theoretical illustration of this is to be found in the fundamental* theology of Pannenberg, according to whom any historical reality and any theological object are candidates for inclusion in the class of historical realities. 2) A scrupulous definition of critical work, moreover, would also demand that one consider the use, within the writing of history, of a well-known epistemological principle, the “principle of charity” (in which any evidence is assumed to be innocent as long as its guilt has not been proved), and the tacit use of an opposite principle that could be called the “principle of suspicion” (any evidence is assumed to be guilty as long as its innocence has not been proved). 3) Finally, however much critical history is motivated by a desire for neutrality, the narratives it presents are still only theories, correct or incorrect, which reveal the theorist’s viewpoint—his “tendencies”—as much and sometimes more than they reveal their subject. Some viewpoints are better than others; but in history just as in theology and indeed everywhere else, there is no “divine viewpoint” (H. Putnam).

- M. Kähler (1896), Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus, Leipzig (Rev. Ed. Munich, 1956).
- E. Troeltsch (1913), “über historische und dogmatische Methode in der Theologie,” GS 2, Tübingen, 729–53.
- R. Carnap (1928), Der logische Aufbau der Welt, Vienna, 183 (Rev. Ed. Hamburg, 1998).
- J. M. Robinson (1959), A New Quest of the Historical Jesus, London (Rev. Ed. Philadelphia, 1983).
- A. C. Danto (1965), Analytical Philosophy of History, Cambridge.
- F. P. Hager et al. (1974), “Geschichte, Historie,” HWP 3, 344–98, “Geschichte/Historie,” ibid., 398–99, “Geschichtlichkeit,” ibid., 404–08, “Historik, ars historica,” ibid., 1132–37.
- M. Hengel (1979), “Historical Method and the Theological Interpretation of the New Testament,” in Acts and the History of Earliest Christianity, London, 129–36 (Zur urchristlichen Geschichtsschreibung, Stuttgart, 1979).
- G. Lanczkowski et al. (1984), “Geschichte, Geschichtsschreibung, Geschichtsphilosophie,” TRE 12, 569–698 (bibl.).
- J. Pelikan (1989), The Christian Tradition, 5: Christian Doctrine and Modern Culture, Chicago, 60–117 and 230–81.
- S. Auroux (1990), “Histoire (épistémologie de l’),” LNPh 1, 1151–52 (bibl.).
- F. Winkelmann (1991), “Historiographie,” RAC 15, 724–65.

B. Theology of History

a) Biblical Theology. The theology* of history begins with the experience* of Israel*. It is the experience of a past perceived as the gift of order and finality: man lives in a creation*, within which a logic of choice* and salvation* governs the destiny of the people. It is the experience of a present structured by divine law* and the Covenant*, and in which the liturgy* serves as a perpetual reminder of God*’s great deeds (ma’asey elohim). Finally, it is an experience directed toward an absolute future: the Covenant is sustained by divine promises* compelling a hope* of which prophecy*, messianism*, and apocalyptic* literature serve as reminders. Onto a cyclical experience of time*, marked out in religious terms by agrarian rituals, a linear temporality is superimposed whose divine origin ensures its intelligibility and continuity. A transcendent scheme of definitive peace* and salvation remain at work within the violent contingencies of human action, or simply in the succession of the generations (toldoth).

In the New Testament, a language of fulfillment—of imminent fulfillment, moreover—takes the place of the language of promise. Not only does Jesus* preaching* announce the extreme proximity of the Kingdom of God (Mt 3:17, etc.), not only is Jesus presented as him in whom Israel's expectations and Scriptures* are fulfilled (Mt 1:22, Mk 14:49, Lk 4:21, Jn 12:38, etc.), but his recognition as the Messiah* obliges us to accord his mission a strictly eschatological sense. Israel's history has reached its conclusion; and since this history is biblically inseparable from the history of all nations, the "fullness of time" (Gal 4:4) may be regarded as the end of history itself. Primitive Christianity was aware that it had arisen from a history, and that a new era was beginning with it; and it neither knew nor believed itself to be charged with any other mission than to call people to conversion* while awaiting the imminent return (the Parousia*) of the risen Messiah. The idea that the church* could have a history was not absent from the primitive Christian consciousness, whether the sense of this history resided in the mission* to the pagans (Paul, Luke) or was based on the "patience" of God, who allowed an extended time for this conversion (2 Pt 3:8f.). The first church appears furthermore to have been a structured community, not an enthusiastic sect incapable of surviving a delay in the Parousia. At any event, there was one key feature: the reality of this continuing history was only temporary. Whether the history of the world would continue after the world's salvation had been accomplished undoubtedly represented a major theological problem. At the end of the apostolic age, the problem was resolved in practical terms. But the New Testament clearly offers no more than the first rudiments of a theology of history for the use of believers for whom the future is no longer charged with any promise of salvation or revelation*.

b) History of the Church and the City of God. A radical refusal of the world and of history is one of the essential characteristics of gnosis*, and the Christian refusal of gnosticism reveals among other things an alliance between Christianity and history—retrospectively in Israel's experience, and prospectively in that of the church, history is subject to the benevolent government of divine providence*. There is admittedly an "eschatological impatience" (which would recur periodically) to be seen in numerous patristic texts. The deadline allotted to history was a short one—Lactantius still expected the world to end in 500. Millenarianism*, moreover, expressed dissatisfaction with the present conditions of historical existence by hoping for a history to come (a "millennium") in which Christ* would reign visibly in the world. The future belonged to other lines of thought, however. For Irenaeus* (despite his millenarian sympathies) a theology of tradition* and eschatological recapitulation (anakephalaiôsis) made it possible to ensure the conditions both of the church's perpetual fidelity to its mission and of a fruitful historical development. Eusebius of Caesarea, for his part, considered the new position the church occupied in the Roman world after the conversion of Constantine. The Christianization of the empire, in this earliest of all Christian political* theologies, appears as the fulfillment of history. The triumph of the imperial monarchy and the triumph of monotheism* are two events linked by providence; and the concept of "evangelical preparation" makes possible a broad account of universal history in which everything culminates in the dual, and unique, offer to mankind of the pax romana and the pax christiana.

Byzantine theology would retain Eusebius's overall scheme, and it reappeared without fail in Latin theology every time a secular power claimed to be the church's providential protector. The most confusing theological critique, however, arose as early as the fifth century. In 410, the sack of Rome* by Alaric marked the end of the pax romana. For Orosius, a disciple of Augustine*, this conclusion played out without any great drama marked a transition: the empire's civilizing mission was now inherited by the church. For Augustine, who wrote his City of God between 412 and 426, the death of the western empire was the occasion for an all-encompassing interpretation of history, which recognized that civilizations were mortal, and drew the appropriate lessons from this. History, in fact, was twofold: the history of the "City* of God," beginning with Abel, and the history of the "earthly city" beginning with Cain. Since Christ's coming, humanity had been living out the world's last age (the sixth), whose duration was unimportant. During this age, as during the previous ones, the City of God existed in the world in the form of the "pilgrimage*" (peregrinatio), without undergoing any progress, always endowed with the same love* of God, visible in the church without being identified with the visible church, the two cities never ceasing all the while to be "interlinked" and "intimately mingled" (Civ. Dei I, 35). The details of universal history therefore ceased to be important. History was no longer any more than the arena in which "the two loves who have built the two cities" confronted one another. The theological significance of universal history was merely to accommodate that confrontation, which therefore manifested itself in every locus of experience. Providence could place a civilization at the service of the City of God—but civ-ilizations themselves, and their histories, were mere secular realities.

While still accorded lip service, Augustine's theology of history was gradually overshadowed during the Middle Ages as attention came to be seized by the church's visible successes: so Otto of Freising concluded his Historia de duabus civitatibus (1147) with the observation that the two cities now formed just one, which was the church. The Middle Ages, moreover, witnessed the rise of the unprecedented theories (Lubac* 1978) of Joachim* of Fiore: the idea of an imminent Age of the Spirit, which would follow the Age of the Father* (the Old Testament) and the age of the Son; the idea of a monastic and ascetic church taking over from a church of the clergy (from the ordo clericorum); and the idea of an "eternal Gospel" of which the present time was still unaware—later taken up by the "Spiritual Franciscans" and destined to have a considerable following. Joachim was refuted by Thomas* Aquinas, and his historical preoccupations (and those of the Spiritual Franciscans) received an even more trenchant response from Bonaventure*. Leaving aside this major debate, however, the interest of the Middle Ages in history was slight, and their interest in a theological theory of history almost nonexistent. Authors such as Gehroh of Reichersberg, Honorius "of Autun" (c. 1080–c. 1156), Hugh of Saint-Victor (†1141), Rupert of Deutz (c. 1070–1129), Anselm of Havelberg (†1158), or Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179) produced a symbolist and typological interpretation of history (both biblical and universal) that deserves attention—but Scholasticism* would follow other paths.

Augustinian nuances were to return with insistence in the theological polemics of the Reformation, whether it was a matter of rejecting the visible church's pretensions actually to be the Kingdom* of God or of maintaining, as in the radical theology of S. Franck (1499–1542), that the true church had never existed except as an "invisible diaspora." From Augustine to Luther*, or Catholicism*'s apologies against the Reformation (e.g., in the writings of C. Baronius [1538–1607]), one fact in any event remains constant: when history does appear, it appears first and foremost as a theological object; secular history only deserves mention by virtue of the theological services it renders or does not render to the church.

c) History, Secularism, Philosophy. It may be said that one and the same period, the 16th century, witnessed the birth of a scientific history of the church and saw history lose its status as a uniquely theological subject. Modernity arose, crucially, by secularizing history. According to J. Bodin (1529–96) the historia divina coexisted in principle with a historia naturalis and a historia humana, but it was the latter, stripped of any theological impulse, that would henceforth attract all the attention. Christological and soteriological meanings were not denied; nonetheless the emphasis passed to a future, which they did not really determine, and which, it was accepted, had been committed into man's hands. Conversely, I. de la Peyrère's (1594–1676) speculations concerning the "Preadamites" extended history to encompass a prebiblical past. In 1681 Bossuet was still able to propose a biblical interpretation of history as governed by providence and leading to the triumph of the church. But the view expressed by Lord Bolingbroke (1678–1751) when he stated "man is the subject of all history" would come to dominate.

In 1735 G. B. Vico (1668–1744) published the first edition of his Scienza nuova; in 1765 Voltaire coined the expression "philosophy of history." Vico was a Christian and Voltaire a deist; nonetheless their affinities are stronger than their dissimilarities. Seeking an unshakable foundation on which to base his "new science," Vico had in effect concluded that truth and fact (what man does) were interchangeable; and while he spoke of a divine providence that had given mankind history, and controlled it in a purely immanent manner, in practice nothing distinguished this immanent government from the merely initial responsibility exercised over humanity by Voltaire's God. In the ascents and descents (corsi e ricorsi) that according to Vico constituted the original rhythm of history, biblical events did not enjoy any privileged position—and from here it is easy to progress to Voltaire's idea of a history of civilizations in which biblical experience, compared, for example, to the wisdom of the Chinese, is seen as no more than a case of sheer barbarism.

During the Enlightenment theological motifs did not altogether disappear from the newly constituted philosophy of history. G. E. Lessing (1729–81) established a positive connection between reason* and revelation in the "education of the human race"; J. G. Herder (1744–1803) spoke of man producing history because he had received the "divine gift of reason." These motifs tended nonetheless to fade into the background in a process in which the idea of progress secularized the concepts of providence and salvation. Rousseau (who was not a proponent of progress) was certainly the first to offer an entirely secular interpretation of history. The Voltairian undertones, meanwhile, became more pronounced in the progressive visions of Turgot (1727–81) and Condorcet (1743–94): "The triumph of Christianity," wrote the latter, "was the signal for the complete decay both of the sciences and of philosophy" (Esquisse d'un tableau historique des progrès de l'esprit humain, Paris, 1795). And while Lessing played an important part in the history of theology, this was largely because he believed and stated that eternal beatitude* could not be based on “contingent historical truths.”

The theology of history was however to be revived within philosophy itself. In 1799 Novalis (1722–1801), in the context of a romantic rehabilitation of the Middle Ages, declared that “all history is Gospel”—an approach continued by F. Schlegel (1772–1829). As early as 1800, Schelling* put forward the concept of a history impelled by the manifestation of the Absolute: Hegel*, too, was to view history in these terms. Catholic traditionalism* and the Catholic school of Tübingen* echoed these reassessments, each in its own way. According to J. S. von Drey (1777–1853), at the root of universal history there was an innate revelation, which ensured its theological coherence; history appeared less as a human artifact than as a place of disclosure, and the condition by which that disclosure could reach all people. Schleiermacher*, though he employed a quite different theological axiomatics, also pondered the theological meaning of history, and saw the Spirit as “the ultimate force which constructs the world”; this appeal to the Spirit recurs in the work of J. T. Beck (1804–78) and F. A. G. Tholuck (1799–1877). Finally, the theologians of the school of Erlangen (G. C. A. von Harleß [1806–79], J. C. K. von Hofmann [1810–77], and F. H. R. von Frank [1827–94]), with their concept of the “history of salvation,” Heilsgeschichte, provided the rallying-cry for all future theology of history.

The developments of historical criticism and its application to the sources of theology soon proved, however, that dogmatic assertions, even supported by the best philosophies of the time, were inadequate as a response to secularizing currents of thought. And while it is true that the Hegelian right was unquestionably more faithful to Hegel’s intentions, the 19th century nevertheless saw the victory of left-wing followers (most notably D. F. Strauss) whose historiography undermined the foundations of all theology of history. Marx* consolidated this victory by proposing a radical secularization* of history, along with an equally secularized eschatology*. Henceforth only the earthly city existed; and at the end of history (at its conclusion and at its goal) the only conceivable salvation was offered by the intervention of a messianic class, the proletariat, anointed not by God but by dialectical laws inherent in the world. It is ironic that atheism* thus seized control of theology’s most distinctive possessions at a time that also witnessed the appearance, under the guise of liberal Protestantism* (“cultural” Protestantism), of a theology notable for being purged of any eschatological reference.

d) History of Salvation and Eschatological Meaning of the Christian Experience. The most substantial critic of Christianity was not Marx, however, but Nietzsche*. The difficulty of atheistic historicism resides in the production of theodicies without God (Löwith 1949; Marquard 1973); Nietzsche’s assertion of the “eternal return of the same” leads the negation of the Christian God to its only totally coherent conclusion: if this God is dead, then history too must be dead. Perhaps it was no coincidence, then, that the period of most radical negation coincided theologically, more or less, with the reopening of a subject that had long been closed, but whose reexamination made possible a theological reconceptualization of history—biblical eschatology. The reconsideration of this topic, at the turn of the 20th century, led to a new awareness of the real theological problem of historical time. In 1892 and 1893, J. Weiss (1863–1914) and R. Kabisch (1868–1914) put Jesus’ preaching back in the apocalyptic* context of an expectation of the end. In 1906 A. Schweitzer (1875–1965) maintained that the idea of a history that would survive Jesus was alien to Jesus’ own “thoroughgoing” eschatology. In opposition to thoroughgoing [see above] eschatology, Heidegger*’s influence led Bultmann* to develop an “existential” eschatology, in which the “authentic” existence that faith* attained was ipso facto the end of history. In parallel to Bultmann (though without much systematic interest), C. H. Dodd (1884–1973) suggested an interpretation of Johannine* theology under the banner of “realized eschatology.” These interpretations were counterbalanced by O. Cullmann’s work on the proper theological basis of church time. The scientific conflict between these interpretations of eschatology ultimately led, moreover, to the observation that the New Testament does not offer a unified theology of the last days and of church time, but rather a multiplicity of tendencies (Conzelmann, Kümmel, Käsemann, etc.). Leaving aside a debate that cannot be regarded as finished, and leaving aside the denominational choices that often underlie it, it may at least be suggested that the main benefit of this debate is the fact that it draws attention incontestably to one fact: for a theology that is faithful to its logos, eschatology always comes first, and the historical is always meaningful by virtue of its relationship with it.

The restoration of eschatological meanings and the collapse of systematic philosophies of history have together led recent theology to structure itself basically as a new Augustinianism*. The original outline of the problem has certainly not disappeared. J. Moltmann’s (1926–) theology of hope, for example, is presented as a revival of Joachimism provoked by a confrontation with Marx and the utopian Marxism of E. Bloch, in which the future ends by offering “a new paradigm of transcendence.” Hegel’s theological impact, within both Protestant (Pannenberg, 1928–) and Catholic (Fessard) theology, led to a conception of history as hardly more than the arena for the “peregrinations” of the City of God. However, the choice between a theology of “existence” that was ignorant of history and a theology of history, which obliged Christianity to await a City of God embodied in the earthly city, would be misleading. The Christian experience has its place, which is the church; and while no Christian denomination—Catholicism included—is (or could be) tempted any longer to write a history of the world culminating explicitly in the church’s present successes, nevertheless the church’s missionary relationship with the world imposes a conception of history (e.g., Danielou 1953) just as much as does its ecumenical relationship with itself in the context of a divided Christianity. While moreover contemporary Catholic theology likes to speak of the church as a “sacrament* of salvation” among the nations (e.g., Vatican* II, LG 48), these terms do not betray a religious introversion, but rather signal a revival of Irenaeus’s theology of recapitulation—for example, in the work of Balthasar*—in what may be seen as a process of christological deduction and reduction of history.

e) An Extraordinary Work. Twentieth-century Catholicism owes to G. Fessard S.J. (1897–1978) a powerful and original contribution to the philosophy and theology of history. From 1934 to 1939 Fessard took part in the seminars on Hegel’s Phenomenology of the Spirit conducted by A. Kojève at the École Pratique des Hautes Études, whose other participants included G. Bataille, J. Lacan, M. Merleau-Ponty, and R. Aron. He was one of the greatest French thinkers of his period to devote himself to political philosophy, which he did not separate from active political resistance to Nazi and Marxist totalitarianism. In his theoretical works, Fessard establishes a philosophy of history in which he distinguishes three levels—natural, human, and supernatural. In his analysis of historical processes, he accords preeminence to dialectics such as those between man and woman*, between Jew and pagan, and between master and servant (see De l’actualité historique, vol. 1, Paris, 1960). The existence of these dialectics does not deny Paul’s assertion that in Christ “you, brothers, like Isaac, are children of promise” (Gal 3:28): rather it reveals that we are living at present in history and not in a fulfilled eschatology. The eschaton can thus be considered as an abolition of these dialectics, although it remains possible to use them in a Christian (pre-eschatological) way that attempts to free each one from its potential content of violence*. One of Fessard’s original touches is the choice of a commentary on the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius de Loyola (3 vols., Paris, 1956, 1966, Paris and Namur, 1984) as a framework for his greatest systematic work: by pointing out how all reality is structured around the spiritual choice, and by showing to what extent Ignatius’s choice is modern, he offers a genealogy of the whole of modernity in outline. Fessard’s followers included important thinkers such as A. Chapelle S.J. and C. Bruaire, and his influence was felt throughout a whole school of Hegelian studies (Leonard, Brito S.J.)—see the bibliography in G. Fessard, Hegel, le christianisme et l’histoire, Paris, 1990; see also Le mystère de la société, recherches sur le sens de l’histoire, Ed. M. Sales, Brussels, 1997.

f) Outlook. The eschaton, then, is not realized whenever man grasps that which defines him in theological terms: on the one hand because Christian hope is not primarily concerned with the absolute future of the individual, but with that of a people (e.g., Lubac 1938), and on the other hand because the believer is a sinner and a mortal, and because the present of his experience is always a judged present, lived out in the certainty of a pardon but never restored to complete innocence. Nonetheless the eschaton is not history’s abstract hereafter, but its present theological secret. The eschaton is not only that to which history cannot give rise, it is not only the critical authority of history—it has a hold upon it already. And it is impossible to speak of that hold without appealing to practical reason.

History, taken in its most neutral modern sense, is the indefinite arena of human action. Theology may define this arena, assign it limits and a teleology—but only on condition that it no longer interprets history naively as a clear and distinct manifestation of divine benevolence (on condition that it refuses the possibility of a theodicy conceived in Leibniz*’s terms), but instead searches it for “signs” offered by a hidden God. Man, Luther said, is “God’s disguise” (WA 15, 373). The spectacle of the world would nonetheless be a theologically unwholesome game if man were to forget that his primary role in history is that of an agent. The precise locus of the Christian experience is in the interval that separates the “world*” from the “Kingdom.” Within this interval, the words of Barth are completely true: “God’s judgment is the end of history; one drop of eternity* has more weight than the whole sea of things subject to time” (Römerbrief, 1922). But nobody can give himself over to the contemplation of this if he does not also refuse to leave the “earthly city” as the sole mistress of history. The eschatological meaning of the Christian experience would lose itself in an eschatological dream if the theology of history did not link Christianity's oldest requests ("Thy kingdom come," "May thy grace come, and the world pass"—Didachè X, 6) to the concrete demands of theological ethics* and political* theology.

- H. Thielicke (1935), Geschichte und Existenz, Gütersloh (2nd Ed. 1964).
- C. H. Dodd (1936), The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments, London.
- H. de Lubac (1938), Catholicisme: Les aspects sociaux du dogme, Paris.
- O. Cullmann (1946), Christus und die Zeit: Die urchristliche Zeit- und Geschichtsauffassung, Zürich (3rd Ed. 1962).
- J. Taubes (1947), Abendländische Eschatologie, Bern.
- K. Löwith (1949), Meaning in History, Chicago (Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen, Stuttgart, 1953).
- R. Niebuhr (1949), Faith and History, New York.
- H. Conzelmann (1953), Die Mitte der Zeit, Tübingen.
- J. Daniélou (1953), Essai sur le mystère de l'h., Paris (2nd Ed. 1982).
- R. Bultmann (1957), History and Eschatology, Edinburgh.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1959), Theologie der Geschichte, neue Fassung, Einsiedeln.
- J. Ratzinger (1959), Die Geschichtstheologie des heiligen Bonaventura, Munich-Zürich.
- G. Fessard (1960), De l'Actualité historique, Paris, 2 vols.
- E. Käsemann (1960, 1964), Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, Göttingen, 2 vols., New Ed. in 1 vol., 1970.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1963), Das Ganze im Fragment, Einsiedeln.
- J. Moltmann (1964), Theologie der Hoffnung, Munich (8th Ed. 1969).

- M. Seckler (1964), Das Heil in der Geschichte: Geschichtstheologisches Denken bei Thomas von Aquin, Munich.
- O. Cullmann (1965), Heil als Geschichte, Tübingen.
- G. Jossa (1965), La teologia della Storia nel Pensiero cristiano del secondo secolo, Naples.
- W. G. Kümmel (1965, 1978), Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, Marbourg, 2 vols.
- J. V. Langmead Casserley (1965), Toward a Theology of History, Oxford.
- G. Sauter (1965), Zukunft und Verheissung, Zürich.
- E. Heimann (1966), Theologie der Geschichte, Berlin.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), "Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte," Grundfr. syst. Th., Göttingen, 22–78.
- H.-I. Marrou (1968), Théologie de l'h., Paris.
- F. Flückiger (1970), Theologie der Geschichte, Wuppertal.
- R. A. Markus (1970), Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine, Cambridge.
- O. Marquard (1973), Schwierigkeiten mit der Geschichtsphilosophie, Frankfurt (2nd Ed. 1982).
- F. P. Hager and G. Scholtz (1974), "Geschichte," HWP 3, 344–98.
- H. de Lubac (1978, 1980), La postérité spirituelle de Joachim de Flore, Paris-Namur, 2 vols.
- J. I. Saranyana (1979), Joachin de Fiore y Tomas de Aquino, Pamplona.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1990), Note sur le temps, Paris.
- B. Forte (1991), Teologia della storia, Milan.
- R. Schaeffler et al. (1995), "Geschichte," LThK3 4, 553–63.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Eschatology; History of the Church; Time

History of the Church

For Christian theology*, the history* of the church* forms the focal point for ecclesiological questions, about the nature of the church; dogmatic questions, about the theology of the Incarnation*; and a discourse, often couched as a narrative and with an apologetic dimension, whereby its credibility in relation to the culture in which it is immersed is put at stake.

1. Chronological Landmarks

a) Antiquity. The expression "history of the church" acquires its meaning from the attempts of members of the Christian church to interpret their own religious destiny in the light of historical events. The Acts of the Apostles may be taken to be the first such attempt, although other New Testament texts are also marked by reflection on the meaning of human history and the impact of Christ's advent upon it.

In his Historia ecclesiastica, Eusebius of Caesarea (265–340) ranges from the birth of Jesus* to the year 323, presenting both a cosmological explanation—the church's struggle against the world* reproduces the struggle led by God* against Satan—and an apologetic justification: the church remains faithful despite persecutions and heresies. This vision of history became a model, which was adapted and expanded by Socrates the Scholastic (c. 380–c. 450), Sozomen (c. 400–43), and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (393–c. 460) in support of orthodoxy, while Philostorgius (368–c. 425) upheld the Arian point of view. Theodore the Lector (c.

525–?) and Evagrius Scholasticus (536–600) adopted the same perspective. In the 14th century, Nicephorus Callistus (†1350) wrote an ecclesiastical history that takes the narrative up to the early 10th century.

Within the Roman Church, Rufinus of Aquileia (c. 340–410) made an abridged translation of Eusebius's history, taking it up to the late fourth century. In his Chronicle, Jerome (c. 347–420) repeats the work of Eusebius and Rufinus; his book on the great men of the church was expanded by Gennadius (?–495) and Isidore of Seville (c. 570–636). In his Historia sacra (Sacred History), the Gallic priest Sulpicius Severus (c. 360–c. 420) reprises the history of the world from the Creation* and takes the history of the church up to the late fourth century. Cassiodorus (c. 480–c. 575) used the works of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret as sources when composing his Historia Ecclesiastica Tripartita, which became a standard reference, alongside Eusebius's history, throughout the Middle Ages.

b) Middle Ages. These large-scale syntheses then gave way to local and national histories, which were often written by monks: for example, the Historia Francorum, in which Gregory of Tours (c. 538–c. 594) gives the principal dates in the history of the world, followed by the ecclesiastical history of the Gauls; or the Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum (731) by Bede “The Venerable” (637–735), which begins with the conquest of Britain by Julius Caesar.

c) Humanism and the Reformation. The 16th century witnessed an extensive revival of Christian consciousness of history. On the one hand, humanism* promoted an awareness of the age of the documents on which historians worked, as demonstrated by Lorenzo Valla (1407–57) in relation to the forged “Donation of Constantine.” On the other hand, the Reformation reopened the question of heresy*, and both Protestants and Catholics used the history of the church to establish their doctrinal legitimacy.

The approach adopted in the Centuriators of Magdeburg, published in Basel from 1559 to 1574 under the editorship of the Lutheran Flacius Illyricus (1520–75), resembles the apologetics of the historians of antiquity, but the struggle between the church and the world is presented differently: Satan has introduced himself into the church, engendering superstition and error, and the papacy is presented as the work of the Antichrist. Drawing on the papal archives, Cardinal Baronius (1538–1607) opposed the Centuriators with his Annales ecclesiastici, published in Rome* from 1588 to 1607. In both these cases, the history of the church was used as a weapon in confessional controversy.

Catholic authors followed the example set by Florimond de Raemon (†1602) and assimilated Protestantism* to the heresies of the past. Bossuet (1627–1704) and others claimed the dogmatic heritage of the Fathers* and the councils*, drawing a contrast between them and the variety of doctrines among Protestants. In the Protestant camp, authors such as Flacius or S. Goulart (1543–1628) sought to establish that authentic Christianity had always been professed by a minority that had been opposed to Rome ever since the time of the apostles. Other Protestants, such as J. Daillé (1594–1670), sought to prove that Protestant doctrine was in accordance with the teachings of the church fathers. In opposition to the Catholic affirmation of the unchanging persistence of the faith*, Protestants undertook critical interpretations of the origins of medieval Christianity.

d) From the 17th Century to the Enlightenment. Nevertheless, during the 17th century the history of the church was not entirely held captive by controversy, as witness the labors of the Maurists, who edited patristic texts, J. Hardouin (1646–1729), who edited the documents of the councils, and the Bollandists, who researched the lives of the saints; as well as the birth of diplomatics (Jean Mabillon [1632–1707]), and the emergence of a critical historical consciousness (Pierre Bayle [1647–1706]). The increase in the number of historiographic tools, which continued in the 18th century (S. Le Nain de Tillemont [1637–1698], J.-D. Mansi [1692–1769]), and the development of rigorous methodologies gradually led to the appearance of a history of dogmas*. The defense of orthodoxy was also called into question. Gottfried Arnold (1666–1714) devalued the importance of dogmatic disputes and displayed sympathy for heretics. J.L. von Mosheim (1694–1755) sought to analyze the church as if it was the same as any other society*, with a maximum degree of objectivity. Johann Salomo Semler (1725–91) placed a clear distance between himself and any dogmatic or confessional presuppositions, asserting that dogma, far from being immutable, is impermanent and fluid. This idea that the truth of dogmas is relative, depending on the epoch, was taken up again by A. Loisy (1857–1940) and within modernism*.

2. History of the Church and Theology Today

a) History as the Church's Understanding of Itself. The history of the church is conceived and practiced in terms of a tension—which sometimes becomes a contradiction—between the requirements of historical method and the expectations of theology. From the theological point of view, the history of the church is generally conceived as a part of Christian thought, a “theological locus” (Congar), an activity of ecclesiastical consciousness. Thus, the possessive form in the expression “history of the church” is not only objective but also subjective, since it is conceived as an effort at “self-understanding [Selbstverständnis] by the church” (H. Jedin), an effort that is legitimate and indispensable within a systematic framework fundamentally structured around the advent of God himself within human history.

However, this traditional conception creates certain problems. First, the history of the church also turns out to be its lack of self-understanding, given that any form of self-awareness can be illusory or misleading (É. Poulat). Second, to the extent that Christianity is characterized by conflicts over interpretation, whether they are exegetical, ecclesiological, dogmatic, or historiographic, it is preferable to speak of a plurality of forms of self-understanding. Finally, the scientific nature of historical inquiry depends, at least in part, on the capacity of historians to detach themselves from the object that they are studying.

b) History and Theology of History. The history of the church appears, therefore, to be epistemologically ambiguous. On the one hand, it is heir to the discipline of theology, whose task is to conceive ecclesiology* as an expression of God’s revelation* within history. On the other hand, however, it tends to be aligned with general methodologies of history, that is, with the view that it should be practiced independently of any presuppositions of belief. We may, of course, make a typological distinction between a history of the church, developed within the church, and forming part of its reflection on its identity and its role in the world, and a “history of Christianity,” which addresses the question of the phenomenon of Christianity in history from an external position. Such a distinction is pertinent to the extent that it underlines the specific position of those church historians whose discourse, from the beginning of their research to the end, is related to theological reflection. It hardly affects the question of methodology, however, for in both cases history is constructed through the elaboration of hypotheses, and the ordering, handling, and cross-referencing of sources whose language historians refrain from reproducing (e.g., by repeating anathemas against heretics).

Moreover, the history of the church is no longer limited to the gathering of conciliar texts, heresiological or hagiographic catalogs, or dogmatic syntheses. It has been profoundly influenced by the renewal of approaches, methods, and topics within the discipline of history as a whole. It now seeks to diversify its domains of investigation and its sources; and it also seeks to integrate the domain of theological ideas and religious mentalities within the larger domain of a history of representations and practices. In addition, the history of the church is conceived rather as a history of churches. The impossible goal of synthesizing and honoring the epistemological assumptions of both history and theology has been abandoned, and there is a tendency to leave reflection on the findings of historians to systematic theologians, working within a “theology of history.”

On any hypothesis, the church, as an institution and as a population of believers, remains a crux of religious history that cannot be ignored. Moreover, the history of the church in particular and history in general are still obligatory ports of call for theological reflection. On the one hand, theology accounts for the history of a world in which God wished Jesus Christ to dwell. On the other hand, the community of faith finds in its own history one of the criteria by which it can measure its loyalty to the Gospel that it has a duty to preach.

- F. Bonifas (1879), “Histoire de l’Église,” in F. Lichtenberger (Ed.), Encyclopédie des sciences religieuses 6, Paris, 279–96.
- A. Fliche, V. Martin (Ed.) (1934–64), Histoire de l’Église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours, 21 vols., Paris.
- H. Jedin (1961), “Kirchengeschichte,” LThK2 6, 209–18.
- R. Aubert, A. Weiler (Ed.) (1970), “L’histoire de l’Église au tournant,” Conc(F) 57.
- A. Weiler (Ed.) (1971), “L’histoire de l’Église comme auto-compréhension de l’Église,” Conc(F) 67.
- E. Stöve (1988), “Kirchengeschichtsschreibung,” TRE 18, 535–62.
- F. Lebrun (Ed.) (1989), Les grandes dates du christianisme, Paris.
- G. Bedouelle (1992), L’histoire de l’Église, science humaine ou théologie? Milan.
- K. Ganzer et al. (1997), “Kirchengeschichte,” LThK3 6, 2–10.
- J.-M. Mayeur et al. (Ed.), Histoire du christianisme, 14 vols. Paris.

HUBERT BOST

See also Apologists; Catholicism

Holiness

A. Biblical Theology

Holiness belongs to God* alone. The term refers to the radiance of his power, the perfection of his being. He alone has the capacity to make those whom he calls to live in his presence participate in his holiness.

a) Vocabulary of the Sacred and the Holy. The root form qadash, used within the religious register, covers the notions of both the sacred and the holy. In ancient religions, it expressed the majesty and activating power of the divinity. Used in Semitic languages with the meaning of “consecration and purification,” it has a primary positive sense of consecration and belonging, and a secondary sense of separation: thus, the statal verb qadosh may be translated as “to be holy,” “to be consecrated,” “to be set apart.” In the intensive (76 times), it has the sense of “to consecrate,” “to set apart,” “to consider as holy.” In the causative (45 times), it means “to consecrate,” “to declare holy.” Other forms of the verb indicate that God “manifests his holiness” and “is recognized as holy,” or again, that human beings “are sanctified” for the purposes of a ritual act. The adjective qadosh (116 times) is used of God himself (Is 6:3), but also describes those persons and things that have a relation with him. The abstract noun qodesh, which is by far the most common form of this root (469 times), refers to holiness and what it affects. It can also have the meaning of “sanctuary,” and in this sense comes close to another derivative, miqdash.

The “sacred” circumscribes the domain of divinity and of all that is related to it, whether persons, objects, times, or places. It is contrasted with the “profane” (chol), which derives from pro fanum, “in front of the temple*,” a term applied to whatever was located outside the temple. The couplet “sacred” and “profane” has parallels with the couplet “purity*”/“impurity” (Lv 10:10; Ez 44:23). This refers primarily, and in most cases, to a ritual purity that defines one’s capacity to take part in worship; rituals of purification are required if one is impure. Another Hebrew root, nazar, also expresses the idea of consecration to the divinity.

In the Septuagint, in the vast majority of cases, qadash is translated as hagios or one of its derivatives, all related to a verb, hazomai, that means “to feel a respectful fear,” often with a religious nuance. These terms facilitated the transition from the notion of the sacred to that of moral holiness; hagios was preferred to hieros, which is oriented more toward the sacred. In the Septuagint, hieron is restricted to the temple.

b) The Sacred and the Holy in the Old Testament. The majority of the 842 examples of the root qadash are to be found in the priestly texts of the Pentateuch (Ex 102 times; Lv 152 times; Nm 80 times); in the book of the prophet and priest Ezekiel (105 times); and in the Levitical and priestly redactions of the Chronicles (120 times). Its usage remains fairly frequent in Isaiah (73 times) and the Psalms* (65 times), but is little documented in the wisdom* literature.

Moses experiences the place where the Lord presents himself as holy ground (Ex 3:5; see Jos 5:15). In Exodus, God, the liberator of his people, reveals himself “majestic in holiness” (Ex 15:11). The people* must be sanctified in order to go to their encounter on Mount Sinai (Ex 19:10). Deuteronomy, and the texts compiled under its influence, emphasize that Israel is a “holy nation” (Ex 19:6), a people consecrated to the Lord their God, chosen to become his personal portion among all the peoples on the surface of the Earth (Dt 7:6). The paragraphs of the Law* of Holiness (Lv 17–26) proclaim the affirmation both that the Lord is holy and that it is he who sanctifies. He calls his people to holiness—“You shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy” (Lv 19:2)—a holiness that, over and above rituals, demands a moral comportment that extends to loving one’s neighbor as oneself (Lv 19:18). The priestly code contains an elevated notion of the holiness of a God whom one does not approach without impunity unless one has met the required conditions, which are particularly demanding for the priests consecrated to the service of the holiness of the people of God. The priestly texts tend to give greater weight to separation from the profane (Ex 19:12f., 19:20–25). The construction of the sanctuary and the installation of priests both draw attention to the degrees of participation in the holiness of God.

Ezekiel denounces the moral failings and disloyalties of the people and their rulers. Drawing on both liturgical and legal traditions, he envisages a new temple at the center of a purified land in which the people, sanctified and renewed by the Spirit, live in the presence of their God. Isaiah encounters the thrice-holy God in the temple at Jerusalem* (Is 6:3); he and his successors celebrate the greatness of the God of Israel (Is 57:15), and announce that Jerusalem will be called the “the Zion of the Holy One of Israel” (Is 60:14). The people are condemned, but the stock that survives will be “the holy seed” (Is 6:13). The prayer* of Israel echoes these statements of Isaiah’s: the Lord is great in Zion, he is holy (Ps 99:2f.).

God is a holy and transcendent deity whom it is possible to approach. The prophets developed an understanding of holiness in a more moral sense: to consecrate oneself to God requires a faithful and resolute commitment, and an awareness of the necessary ruptures.

c) Holiness in the New Testament. In the New Testament, following the usage adopted in the Septuagint, the root qadash is translated as hagios or one of its derivatives: hagiazō, “to sanctify,” “to consecrate” (28 times); hagiasmos, “sanctification,” “consecration” (10 times); hagiotēs, “holiness” (two times); or hagiosune, also “holiness” (three times). These last three terms are found only in the Gospels. Ninety of the 230 examples of hagios in the New Testament refer to the Holy Spirit*. Hieron refers to the temple, yet the adjective hieros appears only three times.

Jesus* addresses his prayer to the “Holy Father” (Jn 17:11) and calls his disciples to pray so that the name* of the Father* will be sanctified (Mt 6:9; Lk 11:2). Jesus is the one whom the Father has consecrated and sent into the world* (Jn 10:36); he is the “Holy One of God” (Mk 1:24), the “holy servant” of God (Acts 4:27). The Holy Spirit has been at work since his conception (Lk 1:35). Invested by the Holy Spirit at his baptism* (Lk 3:22), Jesus walks in the fullness of the Spirit (Lk 4:1). Jesus offers participation in the holiness of God to all believers: he who sanctifies and they who are sanctified have the same origin (Heb 2:11). Through a unique sacrifice, Jesus leads those whom he sanctifies to perfection (Heb 10:14). From this time forward, the church* is the holy nation, the people that God has redeemed (1 Pt 2:9; see Ex 19:5f.). Saints—holy ones—by vocation (Rom 1:7), Christians may receive this title now, even if their lives are not yet perfect. God’s will is that they be sanctified; and this implies ruptures (1 Thes 4:3–8). The Holy Spirit has been active in the church since the Pentecost (Acts 2:1–13), and the way of holiness consists in allowing oneself to be guided by the Spirit, who dwells in each person and intercedes for the saints (Rom 8:1–17).

The sense of the greatness and holiness of God, and the assurance that he wants his people to participate in his holiness, form part of the heritage that Christians have received from Israel. By giving his life, Jesus has offered participation in the holiness of God to all, without any distinction, going beyond the cleavages and separations in the old covenant.

- F. J. Leenhardt (1929), La notion de sainteté dans l’Ancien Testament: Étude de la racine, QDSH, Paris.
- O. Procksch, K. G. Kuhn (1932), ThWNT 1, 87–116.
- H. P. Müller (1976), ThWAT 2, col. 589–609.
- M. Gilbert (1978), “Le sacré dans l’Ancien Testament,” in J. Ries et al., L’expression du sacré dans les grandes religions, Louvain-la-Neuve.
- H. Cazelles, C. B. Costecalde, P. Grelot (1985), “Sacré (et Sainteté),” DBS 10, 1342–1483, Paris.
- J. Ries (1985), Les chemins du sacré dans l’histoire, 2nd Ed., Paris.
- W. Kornfeld, H. Ringgren (1989), ThWAT 6, 1179–1204.
- Ph. P. Jenson (1992), Graded Holiness, Sheffield.

JOSEPH AUNEAU

See also Cult; Expiation; Glory of God; Holy Spirit; Justice; Name; Priesthood; Purity/Impurity; Sabbath; Sacrifice; Temple

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

Only God* is holy. For created human beings, holiness consists in sharing God’s life. On this subject, John says: “we shall be like him because we shall see him as he is” (1 Jn 3:2). The two halves of this statement have given rise to the two traditions* of divinization in the East (theosis or theopoiesis; see Maximus* the Confessor, PG 90, 1193 D) and the vision of God in the West (beatific vision*; see Augustine*, PL 35, 1656 and 1895). The fact that these two traditions spring from the same text emphasizes that they belong together, as complementary accounts of holiness.

1. Eucharist and Church

Holiness is not an abstract concept. Concretely, holiness will consist in membership of the eschatological community in “the holy city, the new Jerusalem” (Rev 21:2), where, according to another typical Johannine vision, the assembly will wear radiant robes washed white in the blood of the Lamb* (7:14) and gaze upon God (7:9f.). In the heavenly Jerusalem, “the dwelling place of God is with man” (21:3), and human beings are persons, in the image of the God in three persons, in everlasting communion with Christ*, as the Son and the Spirit* are in eternal communion with the Father*. Holiness is identical with being a person, and it is essentially in the celebration of the Eucharist*, where we are one with the church* on high (see Heb 12:22ff.), that we are made holy, consecrated, as persons in anticipation. In the eucharistic setting of the Last Supper in John’s gospel*, Jesus* prays to the Father: “for their sake I consecrate myself, so that they also may be sanctified in truth” (Jn 17:19).

2. Augustine and the West

In his Confessions, Augustine describes the call to holiness, the call to belong no longer to himself but to God, that he heard before his baptism*. He saw with the soul’s eye the immutable, transcendent light of God, and trembled as he felt a mixture of love*, awe, and a feeling of “dissimilarity” (see PL 32, 813)—the characteristic combination of attraction and rejection, familiarity and strangeness, that an encounter with the holy engenders (Otto 1917). The Word* of God spoke to him, saying: “I am the food of the fully grown; grow and you will feed upon me. And you will not change me into you, as food for your flesh; but you will be changed into me” (Conf. VII, 10, PL 32, 742). Henri Sonier de Lubac* interprets this as an anticipation of eucharistic participation in the communion of the church. Those who heard these words of Christ, he says, understood “that through the reception of the Eucharist they would be more deeply incorporated into the church” (1938, 7th Ed. 1983). Augustine emphasizes that holiness is ecclesial by likening the process of making the eucharistic bread to that of initiation into the church. Commenting on Paul’s doctrine of “one bread . . . one body” (1 Cor 10:17), he urges: “Therefore be that which you see, and receive that which you are” (PL 38, 1247–48). To receive Christ is, in fact, to be received by him into the church: “He is himself the body of which those who eat it become the nourishment” (Lubac 1944, 2nd Ed. 1949).

At the start of the Confessions, Augustine diagnoses the condition of every human being: “You have made us, Lord, for yourself, and our heart is restless until it rests in you” (PL 32, 661). Each heart has a natural élan toward God, which is the vocation to holiness. This diagnosis echoes that of Irenaeus* and foreshadows the teaching of Thomas* Aquinas. According to Irenaeus, “the glory of God is man who lives; and the life of man is the vision of God” (Adv. Haer. IV, 20, 7). God and man are here set in a dynamic relationship, with the vision of God clearly identified as the end for which man was made. Over a thousand years later, Aquinas voiced the same coherent Western tradition when he taught that there is a natural desire for the (supernatural*) vision of God: “the end of a reasonable creature is to attain to beatitude,” which is “the vision of God” (CG 4, 50, 5). More precisely, “every intellect naturally desires the vision of the divine substance” (3, 57, 3).

3. Gregory Palamas and the East

a) Hesychasm. According to hesychasm*, the Eastern tradition of inner prayer* that goes back to the earliest centuries and was defended by Gregory* Palamas, the object of the beatific vision is not God’s essence, as in the West, but the uncreated energies of God. The divine energies constitute the light that shone from Christ at the moment of his Transfiguration, a light that can be seen, according to this teaching, by the purified eyes of the holy while praying in this life. Using a specific posture to channel the mind into “the prayer of the heart,” the monks believed that this method could yield direct experience* of God.

When Barlaam claimed that this practice violated the apophatic sense of God’s unknowability (negative* theology), Palamas defended the reality of communion with God. Relying fundamentally on the distinction between the essence and the energies of God (PG 150, 1169 C), his doctrine preserves both the real transcendence of God and the real divinization of man, but although it is only in God’s energies that we participate, these energies are uncreated and truly divine.

b) Complementarity of West and East. Barlaam alleged that the distinction of essence and energy in God undermines the divine simplicity* (Jugie 1932; Williams 1977). By contrast, Meyendorff, a neo-Palamite theologian, alleges that the human simplicity, so to speak, of Byzantine anthropology* is undermined by the static, Western scholastic categories of nature* and grace*. In fact, both West and East can be seen to have adopted different, and incompatible, strategies in pursuit of the same goal that deeply unites them, namely that of preserving the crucial distinction between the creator and creation. The simplicity either of God or of man must be apparently disrupted in order to provide a “buffer” between God and man, preventing them from being thought of as equal partners, with man literally becoming God or God sharing all of his being* with man. The creator is essentially holy, and the creature is only called to be holy.

It was the foundational insight of Athanasius* that “the Son of God made himself man in order to make us God” (PG 25, 192 B; see Irenaeus, PG 7, 1109 A); but Aquinas likewise said that “the only Son of God . . . assumed our nature in order that he, being made man, might make men God” (Opusc. 57, Office of Corpus Christi, see ST Ia IIae, q. 3, a. 1, ad 1). These two affirmations are rightly found together in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (§460). The Catechism readily invokes the Eastern Fathers* to emphasize the mystery* of divinization (see §1589, 1988), which Catholic and Orthodox have affirmed together in describing the destiny of man as “his deification through victory over death” (Catholic-Orthodox Commission 1987, n. 31; see 1982, I, 4 a and 4 b). It is simply aspects of the one mystery of the call to holiness that East and West vary in explaining, with varying degrees of success.

c) Deification. If the West is concerned with sin* and the fall from grace, the anthropological “simplicity” of the East focuses upon its stark consequence, death. Athanasius, for example, teaches that “man is mortal by nature, since he has issued from nothingness” (PG 25, 104 C). Sin cuts us off from God and renews the menace of death. The soul* is not intrinsically immortal, but equally threatened by the return to nothingness, for it too is created. The Western tendency to distinguish mortal body and immortal soul is thus overcome: it is body and soul, “both together,” that have been created in the image of God (PG 150, 1361 C).

The image tends toward likeness, which is deification: “the image predestines man to theosis” (Evdokimov 1979). Gregory* of Nazianzus echoes Basil*’s words, that man is a creature who has “received the order to become a god” (PG 36, 560 A), although the distinction of essence and energies is found more clearly in Basil (PG 32, 869 A–B) than in Gregory (PG 36, 317 B–C). The Eucharist particularly accomplishes this deification (PG 35, 1200 B). Gregory* of Nyssa corrects the impression that the journey into God has an end in a static “vision” when he teaches that, even in the world to come, we shall ascend “from beginning to beginning, through a series of beginnings that never ends” (PG 44, 941 C). He adds that “Christianity is the imitation of the divine nature” (PG 46, 244 C), thereby clarifying that growth in likeness to God (for which free cooperation, synergy, with his grace is needed) is growth toward being a person who embodies the fullness of human nature, just as, in God, each person bears the totality of the divine nature.

Thus, deification consists in acquiring, not the divine nature, which is impossible, but the divine way of being, as persons in communion. Because God’s way of being has been introduced into humanity by Jesus Christ, deification is found by sacramental union with him, reinforced by the Jesus Prayer in hesychasm. Zizioulas (1975) thinks that, because of the priority it traditionally gives to nature over person in its Trinitarian theology, the West has never really accepted theosis, because man can never acquire God’s nature. However, restoring priority to the person enables the concept to be embraced fully.

4. Nature and Person

a) Protestant Reaction. Western reluctance regarding the notion of deification is particularly found in the Reformed tradition. Barth* rejects it firmly, actually in reaction to the Lutheran doctrine (Lutheranism*) that “the Son of God communicated his divine majesty to his assumed flesh” (Formula of Concord). It is notable that Barth’s argument is conducted in terms of natures rather than persons (KD IV/2). The Formula explains the divinization of Christ’s humanity by the interpretation of his divine nature, which Barth rejects as compromising both the true divinity and the true humanity of Jesus Christ. Moreover, since Christ’s humanity is that of all men, its deification implies that all are able to be deified, or perhaps even have been deified, by his coming, and can therefore abandon him as the one hope for salvation* and look to their own potential. The doctrine destroys Christology*.

However, this implication only follows when the discussion is purely of impersonal natures rather than of living persons. Christ’s humanity is divinized by being assumed by the person of the Son, and human beings are divinized by entering into personal relationship with Christ. Pannenberg (1966) thinks that the dispute between Lutherans and Reformed arises because both start from the Incarnation*, and understand Christ to be fully God and fully man already at his birth, instead of examining the utterly unique course of his life and concluding that he is the incarnate Son. The latter approach, we may note, is focused dynamically upon Christ’s person rather than statically upon his natures, and allows for growth. Gregory of Nyssa believed that the divinization of Christ’s human nature was a process accomplished only at the Resurrection* (PG 45, 1261 C–1265 B).

b) Sanctifying Grace. The Council of Trent* likewise taught that Christians grow in the life of grace (DS 1535). With Luther*, it affirmed that grace is necessary for all stages of justification*, but against him it taught that the human will must cooperate, and that justification brings not only forgiveness but also sanctification (DS 1521–29). The grace of charity inheres in the just; they do not simply have Christ’s justice* imputed to them (DS 1530, 1561). These texts ground the Catholic doctrine of sanctifying grace, the transformation wrought in the just by the gift of the Holy Spirit (Rom 5:5). Because the transformation occurs in a creature, it is called “created grace”—hence the distinction of nature and grace disliked by the Orthodox (see above and, e.g., Zizioulas 1984), as well as by the Reformed—but the gift itself is “uncreated grace.”

However, created grace is not a commodity separable from God. “It is not at all a question of conceiving a sort of entity separated from its source, a sort of cooled lava, that man appropriates to himself” (Lubac 1980). Lubac thinks that justification brings Christ to dwell in the faithful and that the mystical life begins with the welcome that he is given (1984). Created grace can then be seen as the Christian’s bond with the Christ who indwells, and, since Christ is now actually enthroned with the Father, the effect of created grace is in fact to draw us out of ourselves, to live in the heavenly church that shares his glory (Col 3:1–4). “The fruit of the sacramental life is that the Spirit by adoption deifies the faithful, uniting them in life with the only Son, the Savior” (Catechism of the Catholic Church §1129). Barth’s misgivings about the apparently excessive inwardness of mysticism (KD I/2, 839–40) and the apparent independence of created grace as “product” (KD IV/1, 89) can thus be overcome in personal terms.

5. Vatican II

It is strictly in relation to the church that Vatican* II defines holiness as “perfect union with Christ” (LG 50). Significantly treating “the call to holiness” within its Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Ch. 5), the Council first acknowledges that it is only the Trinity* that is truly holy. From this source, holiness is communicated to the church by Christ, who gave himself up to it precisely to make it holy (Eph 5:25f.). All Christians are called to holiness by their very membership in the church. It is by participating in her holiness that they will find holiness, and, in turn, will sanctify others (LG 39). It follows that, although “the forms and tasks of life are many,” nevertheless “holiness is one” (LG 41), always being prompted by the same Spirit (LG 39).

Moreover, since the Spirit is “the guarantee of our inheritance” (Eph 1:14), holiness is not only ecclesial but also eschatological. Like the church in which it is acquired, holiness “will attain its full perfection only in the glory of heaven” (LG 48). Meanwhile, the call to holiness involves participation in the tension between the present and the future that marks the life of the church itself. Our communion with the saints, who already contemplate “in full light, God himself triune and one, exactly as he is” (DS 1305), inspires us.

We “cleave together” with them in Christ, and they “establish the whole church more firmly in holiness” (LG 49).

6. Canonization of Saints

During the early Christian centuries, the saints inserted into the “canon” of those to be venerated in the liturgy were martyrs. Antony (†356) and Martin of Tours (†397) were among the first “confessors,” martyrs in voto (“in desire”), heroic in spiritual struggle (see PG 26, 909 C–912 B; PL 20, 179). The saints were proclaimed either by public acclamation or by episcopal decree, and canonization, the inauguration of an official cult*, consisted in the “translation” of the saint’s body into a tomb with an altar, which became the center of the cult. The spread of such cults brought papal intervention, and the first canonization by a pope* occurred in the late 10th century. Gregory IX restricted all canonization to the papacy (1234) and Sixtus V established the Sacred Congregation of Rites to deal with the scrutiny of candidates (1588). In 1969, the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints took over this rigorous task, and the process of canonization was most recently revised by John Paul II in the Apostolic Constitution Divinus perfectionis magister (1983). Evidence of the heroic virtues and local cult of a candidate is required, together with a miracle* for beatification and a further miracle for canonization. Proclamations of a new “Blessed” or “Saint” are made by the pope in the context of the Eucharist.

In the Orthodox churches, canonizations are usually made by the synod* of bishops* of an autocephalous church and are then proclaimed by the patriarch (patriarchate*). The traditional term is not “canonization” but “glorification.” God is glorified when the disciples of Christ do his work and bear fruit (Jn 15–17), and the saints are those whom the faithful have found to be great intercessors with God. By officially recognizing their status, the church glorifies God and glorifies the saint. A formal, evening, noneucharistic ceremony marks the new saint’s transition from being someone prayed for to being someone prayed to: a final service of commemoration for the departed person is immediately followed by the first service of prayer to them. Next morning, the liturgy* is celebrated, with the new saint honored eucharistically for the first time.

- R. Otto (1917), Das Heilige, Stuttgart.
- M. Jugie (1932), “Palamisme,” DThC 11/2, 1735–76.
- M. Lot-Borodine (1932), “La doctrine de la ‘déification’ dans l’Église grecque jusqu’au XIe s.,” RHR 105/106, 5–43.
- K. Barth (1938, 1953, 1955), KD I/2, IV/1, IV/2 (Dogmatique, Geneva, 1954–55, 1966–67, 1968–71).
- H. de Lubac (1938), Catholicisme (7th Ed., Paris, 1983).
- A. Michel (1939), “S.,” DThC 14, 1841–70.
- H. de Lubac (1944), Corpus mysticum (2nd Ed., Paris, 1949).

- VI. Lossky (1944), Essai sur la théologie mystique de l'Église d'Orient, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1946), Surnaturel (2nd Ed., Paris, 1991).
- H. Rondet (1948), Gratia Christi, Paris.
- P. Blanchard (1953), Sainteté aujourd'hui, Paris.
- L. Hertling (1953), "Canonisation," DSp 2, 77–85.
- J. Meyendorff (1959 a) (Ed.), Grégoire Palamas: Défense des saints hésychastes, Louvain.
- J. Meyendorff (1959 b), Introduction à l'étude de Grégoire Palamas, Paris.
- J. Meyendorff (1959 c), Saint Grégoire Palamas et la mystique orthodoxe, Paris.
- G. Thils (1961), Sainteté chrétienne, Paris.
- M. Labourdette (1965), "La sainteté, vocation de tous les membres de l'Église," in G. Baraúna (Ed.), L'Église de Vatican II, III, 1105–17, Paris.
- I. Iparraguire (1965), "Nature de la sainteté et moyens pour l'obtenir," ibid., 1119–35.
- W. Pannenberg (1966), Grundzüge der Christologie, Gütersloh.
- Y. Congar (1972), "Die heilige Kirche," MySal IV/1, 458–77.
- G. Philips (1972), "La grâce chez les Orientaux," EThL 48, 37–50.
- G. Habra (1973), La transfiguration selon les Pères grecs, Paris.
- J.-P. Houdret (1974), "Palamas et les Cappadociens," Ist 19, 260–71.
- J. Meyendorff (1974), Initiation à la théologie byzantine, Paris.
- A. de Halleux (1975), "Palamisme et tradition," Irén 48, 479–93.
- J.D. Zizioulas (1975), "Human Capacity and Human Incapacity: A Theological Exploration of Personhood," SJTh 28, 401–48.
- R.D. Williams (1977), "The Philosophical Structure of Palamism," ECR 9, 27–44.
- P. Evdokimov (1979), L'Orthodoxie, Paris.
- Y. Congar (1980), Je crois en l'Esprit Saint III, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1980), Petite catéchèse sur nature et grâce, Paris.
- G. Thils (1982), Existence et sainteté en Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- Commission mixte internationale de dialogue théologique entre l'Église catholique romaine et l'Église orthodoxe (1982), "Le mystère de l'Église et de l'Eucharistie à la lumière du mystère de la Sainte Trinité," Irén 55, 350–62.
- J.D. Zizioulas (1984), "Christologie et existence: La dialectique créé-incréé et le dogme de Chalcedoine," Contacts 36, 154–72 (see also ibid., 37, 60–72).
- H. de Lubac (1984), "Mystique et mystère," in Théologies d'occasion, Paris, 37–76.
- D. Staniloae (1986), "Image, Likeness, and Deification in the Human Person," Com(US) 13, 64–83.
- Commission catholique-orthodoxe (1987), "Foi, sacrements et unité de l'Église," Irén 60, 336–49.
- P. Nellas (1987), Deification in Christ: Orthodox Perspectives on the Nature of the Human Person, New York.
- J. Meyendorff (1989), "Theosis in the Eastern Christian Tradition," in L. Dupré and D.E. Saliers (Ed.), Christian Spirituality, III: Post-Reformation and Modern, New York.
- T. Spidlik et al. (1990), "Saints," DSp 14, 196–230.
- P. McPartlan (1993), The Eucharist Makes the Church: Henri de Lubac and John Zizioulas in Dialogue, Edinburgh.

PAUL MCPARTLAN

See also Asceticism; Beatitude; Cult of Saints; Faith; Hope; Imitation of Christ; Person; Sin; Spiritual Theology

Holy Oils

Oil, an unctuous liquid that has soothing absorptive qualities, has always been a preferred substance in religious rituals. In the Old Testament it is used for the anointing of kings (1 Sm 10:1), and after the subsequent exile of the high priest (Ex 29:7). However, the anointing of prophets* was metaphorical (Is 61:1). According to the New Testament, Christ*, whose title means "the Anointed One," "the one anointed with oil," receives the prophetic anointing at his baptism* (Acts 10:38; see Lk 4:18–21). Hebrew 1:9 also grants Christ the royal anointing of Psalm 44:7f. The imagery of anointing (2 Cor 1:21ff., 2:15f.; 1 Jn 2:20, 2:27) is also employed in speaking of his disciples.

As early as antiquity oils were commonly used in ritual celebrations of the Christian sacraments*. In the Apostolic Tradition (Rome, v. 215) the bishop* blesses an oil that will be used to comfort the sick (# 5). During baptism the bishop blesses an oil of exorcism* (oil of the catechumen) and an oil of thanksgiving with which the priest*, and then the bishop, will perform the postbaptismal anointings (# 21). In the West this perfumed oil received the name "holy chrism," and in the East the name muron.

After the fifth century, Maundy Thursday would become the day, in the West, for blessing the oils to be used during the baptisms at the Easter vigil. The 1955 reforms of Holy Week revived the Mass of Chrism, to be celebrated on Maundy Thursday (or on one of the days close to Easter). In the Rituel of 1970 the bishop, surrounded by his priests, blesses the "the sacred chrism" (see a recipe in Ex 30:22–25) that is to be used in baptism and confirmation*, as well as in the ordination* of priests and bishops. He can also bless the oil of catechumen and the oil for the sick, but in the Rite (# 7) the former can be blessed by the priest when it involves adults (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults 131). The same is true, when necessary, for the oil used in the anointing* of the sick (70).

- Ordo benedicendi oleum catechumenorum et infirmorum et conficiendi chrisma, Rome, 1970 (Bénédition de l'huile des catéchumènes, de l'huile des malades, et confection du saint-chrême, Paris, 1990).

- ♦ P. Jounel (1972), "La consécration du chrême et la bénédiction des saintes huiles," MD 112, 70–83.
- E. Cothenet, J. Wolinski (1982), "Onction," DSp 11, 788–819.
- B. Varghese (1989), Les onctions baptismales dans la tradition syrienne, CSCO 512.
- W. Klein et al. (1999), "Salbung," TRE 29, 707–17.

PAUL DE CLERCK

See also Anointing of the Sick; Baptism; Confirmation; Initiation, Christian; Ordination/Order

Holy Saturday. See Balthasar, Hans Urs von; Descent into Hell

Holy Scripture

1. Origin of the Term

In 2 Chronicles 30:5, it is recorded that under Hezekiah the Mosaic prescriptions concerning the celebration of the Passover* had not been observed "as prescribed" (kakkâtoûb), a phrase translated in the Septuagint as kata tèn graphèn, "according to the Scripture." Furthermore, the books* of the Old Testament were sometimes known as "the (holy) books" (Dn 9:2; 1 Macc 12:9; 2 Macc 8:23; 2 Clement 14, 2; perhaps 2 Tm 4:13; Flavius Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Proem.). No doubt under the influence of the expressions "for it is written" and "as it is written," the books of the Old Testament came to be referred to in the New Testament as "the Scriptures" (Mt 21:42; Lk 24:45; Rom 15:4; 2 Pt 3:16) or "the holy Scriptures" (Rom 1:2). Their unity was emphasized by the singular "Scripture" (Jn 10:35). These Scriptures were referred to as holy inasmuch as they were inspired by God* and transmitted wisdom* promoting salvation* in Jesus* Christ (2 Tm 3:15ff.). Certainly from the second century, if not earlier (see 1 Tm 5:18, which cites as Scripture a sentence from Lk 10:7 alongside Dt 25:4), the books of the New Testament were also considered an integral part of the Holy Scriptures. The expression "the holy books" may have tended to denote the books themselves as material objects, with the term "the Scriptures" referring more to their content.

2. Respective Positions of Tradition and Scripture within Their Common Relationship to the Word of God

By focusing attention on Scripture and its authors, the question of inspiration may encourage an unduly absolute and exclusive identification between Scripture and the word* of God. In fact tradition* has played an important part in the gradual development of the Scriptures.

a) In the Old Testament. Revelation* occurs by means of an experience undergone by the people* of God and interpreted in an utterance. These two linked elements were initially preserved and transmitted not in written form but in the continuity of community observances, such as the Passover celebration, which involved the recollection of divine acts (Ex 12: 25ff.). It was gradually, and much later, that the events and words of the past were put into writing. It may consequently be said that, on the one hand, the living tradition developed the potentialities of the message and adapted it to new circumstances; and, on the other, progressive recording in written form allowed the message to escape the vagaries of oral and observational transmission.

b) In the New Testament. The mission of introducing the gospel to the world was entrusted to the group of apostles*. The apostolic tradition, the fundamental and permanent basis of the faith* and practice of the churches*, consists of the memory of the acts and words of Jesus, recollected and understood profoundly in the light of his Resurrection* and of his entire mystery*. The apostolic churches would gradually set down a diverse and many-sided apostolic tradition, developed in response to the various needs of ecclesial life. This written recording was neither systematic nor complete. While the New Testament is an authentic representation of the apostolic tradition, it does not explicitly convey its full riches. It is for this reason that the Catholic faith refuses the Lutheran principle of the Scriptura sola, which is seen as giving a truncated picture of the apostolic tradition. Incidentally, some modern Protestant theologians (E. Käsemann, G. Ebeling, P. Gisel), while remaining true to this principle, emphasize the extent to which the Scriptures do not merely present a uniform word of God offered for our reinterpretation, but represent in themselves acts of interpretation that have their own history* and bear witness to the word of God.

3. Inspiration of Scriptures

In what is a continuation of the Jewish tradition, all Christian denominations make special reference to a collection of texts (canon*) that are regarded as establishing conventions for the faith and life of the community, since they are assumed to be inspired by God or the word of God. This profession of faith is linked to the conviction that God and his plan for humanity have been revealed through the covenant* with Israel* and the New Covenant in Jesus Christ. Faith in the divine inspiration of the Scriptures is thus an expression of faith in the privileged status of the Jewish and Christian traditions as regards divine revelation.

A number of indications of this faith are already to be found in the Bible* itself. God speaks through the voices of the prophets (Is 1:2, 6:6–9; Jer 1:9; Ez 3:10f.; Heb 1:1f.); he writes the Law* (Ex 24:12; Dt 4:13, 10:4) or dictates it to Moses (Ex 24:4; Dt 31:9); he commands that his divine acts be recorded in writing so that their memory should not be lost (Ex 17:14; Nm 33:2). In the same way, primitive Christianity accepted the Jewish Scriptures of the Old Testament as the word of God (Mt 15:6). Quoting Jeremiah 31:33ff., the author of Hebrews introduces it with the words “And the Holy Spirit also bears witness to us” (Heb 10:15ff.); and in Acts 28:25 the quotation of Isaiah 6:9f. begins with these words of Paul: “The Holy Spirit was right in saying to your fathers” (Acts 28:25). Even more clearly, 2 Tm 3:15 talks of the “sacred writings” (2 Tm 3:15f.) and refers to all Scripture as “breathed out by God” (theopneustos; 2 Tm 3:16). Finally, regarding scriptural prophecies, 2 Peter 1:21 states that “No prophecy was ever produced by the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit.” This last quotation shows well the insistence characteristic of biblical tradition. The personal contribution of the prophets or writers is not emphasized. Since it is not immediately evident, however, there is an insistence on the fact that in this Scripture God’s word and intentions are expressed. The theandric process, that is to say the connection and cooperation between the divine author and the human author, is not considered important in this context and receives no explanation.

The same convictions and the same lack of theoretical development on the theandric process are found in the patristic period. The church fathers*, who scarcely distinguished between the theology of inspiration and the theology of revelation, made a twofold contribution. Firstly, since Jesus had fulfilled the Scriptures, they regarded as equally inspired the texts about him that originated in apostolic circles. For the Fathers, God was the author of both Testaments, each of which was to be preserved in its entirety (against Marcionism* and Manicheism*). Secondly, in talking of inspiration, they had recourse to a variety of images.

They spoke readily of “Scripture dictated by the Holy Spirit” (Eusebius, HE 5, 28, 18; PG 20, 517; SC 41, 78), or even of “the Holy Spirit who dictated these things through the Apostle” (Jerome, Letter 120; PL 22, 997; CSEL 55, 500). In the same tradition, if more subtly, Augustine* writes: “Through the human nature which he assumed, Christ is the head of all the disciples, who are as the limbs of his body. For this reason, when these disciples wrote what Christ had shown and said, it may be said that it was Christ himself who wrote, since the limbs expressed what they knew under dictation from the head” (De consensu evangelistarum 1, 35; PL 34, 1070; CSEL 43, 60).

The other image employed, that of the musical instrument, allows for a subtler exposition. According to Athenagoras, “the spirit of God moves the mouths of the prophets like instruments. . . . The Spirit used them like a flute-player blowing on his flute” (Petition concerning the Christians 7, 9; PG 6, 904, 908). In the Co- hortatio ad Graecos (PG 6, 256 Sq; a pseudo-Justinian work of the second or third century) it is also said that, in order to receive divine revelation, “it was enough for them to offer themselves sincerely to the action of the Holy Spirit, for that divine plectrum to come down from heaven, using men just like musical instruments, and to reveal to us celestial and divine realities.”

Within the field of inspiration, it was above all prophetic inspiration that interested medieval theologians. The inspiration of all Scripture was taken for granted, and barely figured in teaching, to the extent that no mention of it is to be found, for example, in the Sentences of Peter Lombard. Scholastic theologians, for their part, attempted to develop a theory of inspiration with the help of philosophical categories. To express the respective roles of God and the human author, Albert* the Great talks of the “primary efficient cause” and the “next efficient cause” (Institutiones biblicae 20); while Thomas* Aquinas calls the Holy Spirit the “principal author” and man the “instrumental author” (Quodlibet 7, art. 14, ad 5); and Henry of Ghent refers to the former as the “principal author and one true author” and to the latter as the “secondary author, acting as minister,” or alternatively as the “true author, albeit of the second degree” (Summa Theologica, a. 9, q. 2).

Luther*'s Reformation gave especial prominence to the authority* of Holy Scripture, considered as the unique source and sole norm for Christian faith and preaching* (Scriptura sola). Thereafter considerable efforts were made to develop a real knowledge of the Bible. The individual relationship of every Christian to Scripture was deemed essential, even if, in practice, it was through worship and catechetical* teaching that knowledge of the Bible was disseminated. The Catholic Counter-Reformation (Bellarmine*) responded by highlighting the Christian's relationship to the church, and maintained that access to Scripture was legitimate only through the intermediary of the latter. In order to protect the authority of Scripture, later Protestant theology was based on a strict teaching of the verbal inspiration of the Holy Scriptures. This conception, widely shared by Catholics at the time, led to a partial or complete questioning of inspiration following the development of biblical criticism from the 17th century onward (R. Simon). The customary, sometimes maximalist representations of the divine origins of Scripture, particularly when conceived in terms of an almost word-for-word dictation, were in fact badly shaken by the rediscovery of the role of human authors and of the culturally dated nature of their vision of the world. While the Eastern church remains focused on patristic exegesis* and seems hardly to have been touched by such debates, in the Western churches confrontation with the natural sciences and the human sciences, especially in a historical context, sparked a particularly serious crisis in the 19th century with the development of historico-critical exegesis.

On the Protestant side, the advent of liberal criticism tended to bring about the disappearance from theology of the doctrine of Scriptural inspiration, in favor of a more general doctrine of revelation. Nevertheless, Schleiermacher*, for example, accepted the personal inspiration of the apostles. He did not however believe that the books of the Bible called for a hermeneutical* and critical treatment that was distinct from usual procedures and would be based on divine inspiration. More recently, dialectical theology (Barth*) has brought the affirmation of a qualified Scriptural inspiration strongly back into favor, while strict verbal inspiration is still defended by fundamentalism*.

On the Catholic side, various reductive views of inspiration have been offered with the aim of resolving the crisis. These theories have been judged inadequate to convey steadfast faith in the divine origin of the whole of the Scriptures.

J. Jahn (1802) proposed a theory by which inspiration consisted of a negative divine assistance allowing the writer to avoid errors, while according to D.F. Haneberg (1850) it was a text's subsequent approval by the church that made it sacred (theories rejected by the constitution Dei Filius of Vatican* I; see EB 77). Then again, A. Rohling (1872) proposed that inspiration be materially restricted to those passages that constituted the essential basis of a dogmatic* or moral proposition (a theory rejected by Leo XIII's encyclical Providentissimus Deus in 1893) (see Burtchaell 1969).

Returning to the Thomist synthesis, M.-J. Lagrange presented scriptural inspiration as a special instance of the collaboration between Creator and creature: God causes the activity of the hagiographer and at the same time makes it truly free. God is the principal cause and the writer is the instrumental cause, although free. Inspiration is a charism by which God enters into, and makes his own, the free human activity of the sacred author, in such a way that the latter may be called an instrument of God. Pius XII's encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943) speaks of a “living instrument endowed with reason*...who, acting under divine impetus, employs his faculties and talents in such a way that everyone may easily discern, from the work that has left his pen, ‘his own personality and the marks and characteristics which distinguish him.’ ”

The constitution Dei verbum of Vatican* II is even more explicit on this point: “In order to compose these sacred books, God chose men to whom he had recourse in the full employment of their faculties and abilities, so that, as he worked in them and through them, they might put into writing, as true authors, everything which accorded with his desire, and that alone” (DV §11). Starting from these assumptions, later theology significantly rescues scriptural inspiration from the isolation in which it had been confined, by developing analogies of inspiration (P. Benoit). Divine inspiration is split into three types: dramatic or pastoral inspiration, which animated the shepherds of the chosen race and thereby sacred history; oratorical inspiration, which accompanied and complemented the pastoral inspiration; and scriptural inspiration, which brought about the setting down in writing of the things done and said. This division makes it possible to reconcile with a theory of scriptural inspiration the fact that the biblical text is the outcome of a long and sometimes turbulent history*, animated in its totality by the Holy Spirit. The writer’s charism is but one of the charisms associated with the Word of God—the one that allows this word to become Scripture.

Moreover, the analogy between the mysteries of inspiration and the Incarnation*, highlighted by DV §13, is readily explained: “The words of God, passing by way of human tongues, assumed the character of human language, in the same way that, once, the Word* of the eternal Father*, having assumed the weakness of our flesh*, became like men.” It is along these lines that theology nowadays attempts to conceive the collaboration between God the true author and the real human authors (DV §11), taking care not to formulate it on the model of competition which has proved so harmful in the past, as was also the case in Christology*. The Bible is the work of both man and God because it is the result of their meeting and communion, the perfect example of which is Jesus Christ, the incarnate Word.

4. Truth of Scriptures

The Fathers developed no theory on this subject. The truth* of Scripture as regards salvation was acknowledged and formed a background to theological thinking. At most, in response to the objections of Jewish or pagan opponents such as Celsus, Porphyry, or Julian the Apostate, a few simple explanations were developed for the supposed contradictions between the two Testaments or the four Gospels*.

It was above all the progress of science that, from the Renaissance onward, caused the truth of the Bible to be called into question. The natural sciences were the first to arouse conflict, as illustrated by the affair of Galileo (1564–1642). In the field of astronomy, Galileo professed the heliocentric system proposed by Copernicus (1473–1543). This questioning of the geocentric system ended in Galileo’s being tried for heresy* by the Inquisition and forced to recant. His new system did not, indeed, correspond to the biblical authors’ representation of the world, and contradicted passages such as Joshua 10:12f., in which Joshua stops the sun. The questions had barely begun, however, and were to multiply. They ran from the smallest (it is incorrect to class the hare among the ruminants, as do Lv 11:6 and Dt 14:7) to the greatest: what remains of the truth of the stories of the Creation and original sin when they are put face to face with the theories of evolution* and polygenism. The church’s first reactions were of two kinds: either it concluded that science must bend before the truth of Scripture (the affair of Galileo), or it sought to demonstrate at all costs the marvelous concord between the Bible’s scientific teachings and those of contemporary science. However, both these approaches would soon end in deadlock. Concordism misunderstood the nature of science and was too ready to take as definitively proven matters that scientists considered as mere hypotheses within a given system of interpretation. Moreover, both approaches misunderstood the nature of the Bible and the teaching it offers.

On this subject, it was prudent to go back to the great principle already set out by Augustine*: “The Holy Spirit, which spoke through them [the sacred writers] did not wish to teach men things which were of no use for salvation [ista . . . nulli salutis profutura]” (De Genesi ad litteram 2, 9, 20; PL 34, 270). This was the principle that Leo XIII took up in the encyclical Providentissimus Deus, specifying the things that are of no use for salvation with the words: “in other words, the intimate composition of perceptible things.” Augustine also wrote: “We do not read in the gospel that the Lord said ‘I will send you a Paraclete to teach you the courses of the sun and moon’; he wished to make Christians, not mathematicians” (Contra Felicem 1, 10; CSEL 25, 812). Galileo’s friend Cardinal Baronius was inspired by this to remark: “The Holy Spirit does not aim to teach us how the heavens work, but how to get there.”

The conflict was revived in the 19th century with the development of a positivist historical science modeled on the natural sciences* and a fastidious quest for perfect objectivity. On this basis the documentary value of the books of the Bible was soon contested. This was one of the hotly contested issues of the Modernist crisis. The deadlock lasted as long as traditional apologetics questioned the value of historical research for the Christian faith instead of criticizing the assumptions of a rationalist view of history. Indeed it was only ended by criticizing these assumptions, and by reaching a deeper and at the same time more flexible understanding of history.

Faced with these objections, the first attempts at a solution at the end of the 19th century were not very successful. The theories of the material limitation of inspiration or of inerrancy (absence of error) were explicitly rejected by the encyclical Providentissimus Deus. Otherwise, while this encyclical already offered an important principle for the resolution of the relationship between the Bible and the natural sciences, it was only in 1943 with the encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu that the Catholic Church fully opened the way for literary and historical criticism of the Bible. Pius XII recommended the application “to the related sciences, in particular to history” of the Augustinian principle that Leo XIII had applied to the natural sciences. Furthermore he makes it the duty of Catholic exegetes to research “what literary genres the writers of those distant times sought to employ and did in fact employ.”

Indeed, “in the sacred writers as in all the ancients, we encounter certain methods of exposition and narration, certain idioms, particular especially to the Semitic languages, and known as approximations, and certain hyperbolic or sometimes even paradoxical expressions, which impress the thought more strongly upon the intellect. None of these ways of speaking which were habitually employed in human language among the ancients, especially the Eastern peoples, is excluded from the Holy Books, always provided that the language used does not in any way offend against God’s sanctity or his veracity*.”

The constitution Dei Verbum, the most controversial of Vatican II, confirms these essential points. The narrow apologetic vocabulary of “inerrancy” is decisively abandoned in favor of the positive vocabulary of “truth,” in the singular. The intellectual conception of revelation is left behind—the need is no longer to defend truths or religious doctrines, but to promote the search for the truth that leads to salvation and that is revealed by words and actions in Scripture. There is no longer any question of materially limiting the truth of the Scriptures, but it is made clear that the Bible expresses its truth from the particular formal standpoint of the order of salvation: “The books of Scripture teach firmly, faithfully, and without error the truth which God, for the sake of our salvation [veritatem quam Deus nostrae salutis causa], wished to see recorded in holy Letters” (no. 11). This fundamental theological principle met with a great deal of opposition at the Council before finally being adopted, even though it was entirely traditional. Not only had Augustine already expressed it, but 2 Timothy 3:15 stated that “the sacred writings . . . are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus”; and Thomas Aquinas, quoting John 16:13, added two words to the original: “When the Spirit of truth comes, he will guide you into all the truth necessary for salvation [saluti necessariam]” (De veritate, q. 12, a. 2).

Among the elements that helped to overcome the deadlock of traditional apologetics, without calling rationalist assumptions into question, was the rediscovery of the biblical understanding of truth.

The Greek concept of truth (a-lètheia) was linked to the idea of a revealing of reality or of an illumination of what was previously hidden. In these terms, truth was the true nature of things, the reality finally unveiled by intelligence. In this view the intellect is dominant. For the Bible, knowledge of the truth (‘èmèt) is knowledge of the plan to which God remains faithful through his covenant (Old Testament), a plan that is fully revealed and fulfilled by and in Christ (New Testament). Consequently, truth is revealed first and foremost not through teaching but through people and actions expressing a fundamental faithfulness. God’s truth denotes in the first place his loyalty (the root ’mn) to his promise* concerning humanity’s salvation. One can speak of dynamic truth in the sense of making the truth live in human beings, which also implies saving them.

By using the concept of truth as employed in the Bible itself, many spurious difficulties arising from a misconception of the type of truth that it offers can be avoided. This rediscovery opens the way to a calm and productive dialogue with the other orders of truth, once the salvation-centered truth of the Bible is no longer seen as being in competition with them. Biblical truth is a matter of the confession of faith, of trust in a God who is faithful to his promises. Far from being confused with the truth of experimental science, it should be appreciated in terms of its poetic dimension, in the sense in which Ricœur developed the concept of poetic truth.

What is more, exegetical research is emphasizing ever more clearly the plurality and diversity that exist within the Bible, which is understood as a library whose composition was spread over a number of centuries and associated with many quite different historical and geographical situations. Truth, of course, carries within it the desire for unity. There has been no lack of temptation through Christian history to wish to bring about this unity at all costs, even by force. Modern theology is conscious of the need for “eschatological caution”: the unity of truth will never be fully achieved except through eschatology. The dynamic truth of Scripture—the word of many ages and many voices—can be grasped only by taking account of the whole, without singling out one part or another in order to create the illusion of a complete and simple truth. However, readers of Scripture tend to view this multiplicity hierarchically, the better to discern the word of God that is given and hidden behind the words of the Scriptures. In their search for truth, Jews find the unifying principle of the Bible in the Law, while Christians find it in a New Testament that refers to the person* of Christ. Even more precisely, Protestant theologians locate it in the Pauline epistles (Romans and Galatians according to Luther), while Catholics look more to the Gospels.

5. Authority and Role of Holy Scriptures in Christian Communities

In order for its sanctifying power to come into play, it is not enough for Scripture to be inspired. It must also be inspiring, and must therefore be received by the communities of the faithful, “read and interpreted by the light of the same Spirit which caused it to be written” (DV §12). Listened to, enacted, invoked, and shaped in the communities of Israel and the early churches, the word of God has been transmitted in inspired Scriptures that in turn inspire the life, prayer*, and activity of present-day communities. Never changing, yet always in need of translation, the Bible challenges each age and generation for whom it is the source of faith and life. Its authority is not tyrannical: it is at the service of the liberty* of the children of God. While Scripture is sacred as a witness to God’s otherness, to his transcendence and his promise of love* for his people, it is also sanctifying inasmuch as reading it sustains the life of a people in covenant with God. It might therefore be expected that all Christians would be encouraged to study Scripture assiduously, since it is the source of life and faith for the people of God. But this has not always been the case.

a) In Catholic Church. Lectio divina has of course been promoted since antiquity. This protracted and patient reading, developed through meditation, contemplation*, and prayer, and especially cultivated in the monastic life (Rule of Saint Benedict, c. 48), was recommended to all clerics* by Pope* Pius XII in 1950 (De scriptura sacra; EnchB 592). As far as Christian people were concerned, however, contact with the Bible, at least in the Catholic Church, was provided indirectly by means of the liturgy*. The same church long displayed an explicit reluctance for the Bible to be read directly by nonclerics.

So, the famous fourth rule of the Index of Trent (1564) “made the reading of Scripture in the vernacular subject to written permission granted by the bishop on the advice of the parish priest or confessor” (Savart 1985, 22). It was not until long after it was abandoned in practical terms that this rule was tacitly abolished, when Leo XIII did not reiterate it in his constitution Officiorum ac munerum (1897), whose wording nonetheless remains negative: “All versions in indigenous languages, even those published by Catholics, are absolutely forbidden unless they have been approved by the Apostolic See, or edited under the supervision of the bishops with annotations drawn from the church fathers* and from learned Catholic writers.”

The approach adopted in the Catholic Church appears in a better light with Dei Verbum’s recognition of the need “for access to the Holy Scripture to be widely available to Christians” and its envisaging the possibility of translations that “would be the fruit of a collaboration with our separated brethren” so that they may be “used by all Christians” (DV §22).

Certainly it is the clerics* who are the first to be called on to read the Scriptures assiduously and study them in depth, but the faithful are also exhorted to this. For, as the council says, taking up a sentence of Jerome, “ignorance of the Scriptures is ignorance of Christ” (DV §25). The bishops have a responsibility not to teach the content of the book while exempting their flock from the necessity of reading it, but “to teach the faithful in their charge, in a suitable manner, to make the correct use of the divine Books” (ibid.). Finally, there is a recommendation judiciously to disseminate the Holy Scriptures “even for the use of non-Christians” (ibid.). On this basis it seems legitimate to suggest “that a proposal of biblical reading made according to the unfolding of God’s mystery must be addressed, not exclusively to the man who acknowledges the Christian faith in himself, but to whomever might open his whole being to another truth besides the one he may already have mastered” (Beauchamp 1987).

Another important change introduced by Vatican II concerns the use of Scripture in the liturgy. The employment of vernacular languages in the liturgy has diminished the sacred distance that was maintained before the holy texts, and has developed their role of communicating meaning, a tendency further accentuated by an insistence on the homily (a sermon based on the text). Moreover, until Vatican II, the Roman liturgy drew only sparingly on scriptural sources. Thus the regular Sunday and feastday worshipper heard scarcely any Old Testament text, and only 4 percent of Maccabees or 2 percent of Revelation, the most frequently used book being Matthew (32 percent); and the same texts were repeated every year (Savart 1985). Following the council’s recommendation to “read to the people over a set number of years a more significant proportion of the Holy Scriptures” (De sacra liturgia II, 51), liturgical reform has allowed the continuous reading, on a three-year cycle, of the Gospels and the Pauline epistles, and substantial portions of the Old Testament retained on account of their thematic coherence with the Gospel.

On another level, returning to ancient tradition, DV §24 recommends that the study of Holy Scripture should be the very soul of theology and expresses the hope that it will give rise to a ceaseless rejuvenation of theology. By way of these efforts the council looks forward to a growth in the life of the church resulting from the reading of the Scriptures: “Just as the Church receives an increase in its life through regular participation in the mystery of the Eucharist, so it may be hoped that a renewal of spiritual* life will flow from a growing veneration for the word of God” (DV §26).

It remains to be said that for the Catholic Church it is not Scripture alone that brings knowledge* of God and salvation. “Somebody has read Scripture before us, and offers us a key to it, declaring this key to be fully in accordance with Scripture. If you accept this key, you will be entering the Book on his word: this process corresponds to what we mean by tradition” (Beauchamp 1987). The magisterium* ensures this transmission of evangelical truth within the church, while being subject to the word of God, which it is responsible for protecting and interpreting. And while there is a plurality of legitimate interpretations, as indeed the Pontifical Biblical Commission’s recent document on “The interpretation of the Bible in the Church” (1993) made clear, “in the last resort it is the Magisterium which has the responsibility of ensuring the authenticity of interpretation, and of indicating when necessary that a particular interpretation is incompatible with the authentic gospel.” This responsibility is presented as a service of the communion of the body of Christ (III, B, 3). The multiplicity of interpretations presented in a favorable light by the Biblical Commission is in itself an indication of the contemporary interest in the Bible and the many ways in which the Christian people approaches its sacred Scriptures.

b) In Protestant Churches. The authority of Scripture and the general recommendation to read it individually and collectively are fundamental characteristics of these churches. In order to facilitate general access to this reading, the need to translate the Bible into the vernacular was emphasized from very early on. Its dissemination, moreover, was taken in hand by numerous highly effective Bible societies. Following in this tradition, the Universal Bible Alliance, founded in 1946, set itself the task of translating the Bible into the greatest possible number of world languages and dialects (2,092 complete or partial translations by 1995) and of distributing it in cheap editions. In this way it has enabled a majority of the world’s people to read the Bible privately.

In addition, the purely moralistic interpretation and use of the Bible by Kant* exerted a strong influence in Protestant intellectual circles in the 19th century. Catechetical teaching reacted by attempting to oppose what was perceived as a drift, in order to give more prominence to the dialogue between the Trinitarian God and the reader. Henceforth, far from neutrally imparting Biblical knowledge, the teacher had the task of announcing the word of God and conveying it in terms of the language and prior understanding of its readers.

In the second half of the 20th century, interest in the Bible and the role accorded to it underwent a considerable development due to the importance attached to the hermeneutic dimension. On the one hand, the debate over the interpretation of Scripture was boldly revived by E. Käsemann, according to whom the New Testament canon was not the basis of church unity*. Suddenly there arose the question of a canon within the canon, or indeed of deciding whether and in what way an interpretive canon was inevitable in the reading of a diverse Scripture. On the other hand, as early as the Second World War, Bonhoeffer* was emphasizing the extent to which the Bible does not by itself offer an answer to all our questions. While previously the Bible had enjoyed an almost indisputable authority in all areas of life, from the mid-1960s onward it was subjected to critical questioning by an ever-growing number of Christians. The solutions to many personal and collective problems were less and less sought directly in Scripture, but rather in scientific and ethical knowledge. This led to a partial loss of motivation with regard to reading the Bible and undertaking Bible study, but also to a refocusing on its essential role of calling, questioning, and offering a critical authority regarding the meaning of life.

Even though the 20th-century biblical renewal initially overshadowed to some extent a similar development among Catholics, it is nonetheless very real among them too. Among Christian people as a whole, the elements of prior understanding associated with a secularized mode of thought transcend denominational differences. Moreover, the approach to the Scriptures is undergoing a more or less parallel development in both Western traditions. This is undoubtedly due in part to the joint work of exegetes of various denominations, not forgetting the willingness of pastors to embrace ecumenism. The Traduction œcuménique de la Bible (TOB) completed in 1972 (New Testament) and 1975 (Old Testament) marked an important step in this progress.

- M.-J. Lagrange (1896), “Inspiration des livres saints,” RB 5, 199–220.
- R. Bultmann (1933), “Alètheia,” ThWNT 1, 233–48.
- K. Rahner (1958), Über die Schriftinspiration, Freiburg.
- P. Grelot (1965), La Bible, Parole de Dieu, Paris.

- P. Lengersfeld, H. Haag, G. Hasenhüttl (1965), MySal I/2 (Mysterium Salutis: Dogmatique de l'histoire du salut, vol. 2, 1969).
- B.-D. Dupuy (Ed.) (1968), Vatican II: La révélation divine, 2 vols., Paris.
- P. Benoit (1968), "Inspiration scripturaire et herméneutique," in id., Exégèse et théologie, vol. III, Paris, 17–156.
- J.T. Burtchaell (1969), Catholic Theories of Biblical Inspiration since 1810: A Review and Critique, Cambridge.
- E. Käsemann (1970), "Begründet der neutestamentliche Kanon die Einheit der Kirche?" Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, vol. 1, 6th Ed., Göttingen, 214–23.
- L. Alonso Schökel (1971), La Palabra inspirada, Barcelona.
- J. Beumer (1972), L'inspiration de la Sainte Écriture (Histoire des dogmes 5), Paris.
- E. Oikonomos (1976), Bibel und Bibelwissenschaft in der orthodoxen Kirche, SBS 81.
- P. Ricœur (1977), "Herméneutique de l'idée de révélation," in coll., La révélation, Brussels, 15–54.
- P. Gisel (1977), Vérité et histoire: La théologie dans la modernité: Ernst Käsemann, Paris-Geneva.
- H. Wildberger, "'mn, fest, sicher," THAT 1, 177–209.
- H. Graf Reventlow (1980), Bibelautorität und Geist der Moderne, Göttingen.
- G. Wanke, E. Plümacher, W. Schneemelcher, H. Karpp, K. Wegehast (1980), "Bibel," TRE 6, 1–109.
- C. Savart, J.-N. Aletti (Ed.) (1985), Le monde contemporain et la Bible (BTT 8).
- K.R. Trembath (1987), Evangelical Theories of Biblical Inspiration: A Review and Proposal, New York-Oxford.
- P. Beauchamp (1987), Parler d'Écritures saintes, Paris.
- R.E. Brown, J.A. Fitzmeyer, R.E. Murphy (Ed.) (1989), The New Jerome Biblical Commentary, Englewood Cliffs, Part 2 (Topical Articles): R.F. Collins, "Inspiration," 1023–33; R.E. Brown and R.F. Collins, "Canonicity," 1034–54.
- H. Bourgeois, P. Gibert, M. Jourjon (1989), La cause des Écritures: L'autorité des Écritures en christianisme, Lyon.
- Commission biblique pontificale (1993), L'interprétation de la Bible dans l'Église, Paris.
- J.A. Fitzmeyer (1995), The Biblical Commission's Document "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church" (Subsidia Biblica, 18), Rome.
- F. Martin (1996), Pour une théologie de la lettre: L'inspiration des Écritures (CFi 196), Paris.

CAMILLE FOCANT

See also Bible; Biblical Theology; Book; Canon of Scriptures; Ecumenism; Exegesis; Hermeneutics; History; Liturgy; Magisterium; Modernism; Protestantism; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Scripture, Senses of; Theology; Tradition; Truth; Veracity; Word of God

Holy Spirit

A. Biblical Theology

I. Old Testament

1. Terminology

In a little more than half of its occurrences in the Old Testament, the word roûach (fem., 378 times) is used in the physical sense of wind or breath. It also designates (approximately 80 times) the human spirit in the psychological sense of the term. The divine connection of the Spirit is noted in expressions such as "Spirit of YHWH," "Spirit of God," and, in context, "my Spirit" (13 times), "his Spirit" (10 times), "your Spirit" (eight times). In Genesis 1:2b "the roûach of God" circulates on the water. "Holy Spirit" is rare: Isaiah 63:10f.; Psalms 51:13; Wisdom 9:17.

2. Actions of the Spirit

The theme and its theological content appear in three main areas: 1) Archaic traditions related to the sudden intervention of an individual seized by the Spirit—saviors in the period of Judges, King Saul, Elijah, and Elisha. In these cases the Spirit is "on" or comes "over" someone. It may be "evil" (1 Sm 16:23) and yet come from God (Jgs 9:23; 1 Sm: four occurrences; 1 Kgs 22:2f.). 2) In Hosea 9:7 the prophet* is called "Man of roûach." In Numbers 11:16f., 11:24–30, and Joel 3:1, the exercise of prophecy is called a gift of the Spirit (see Nm 11: 25, 24:2; Neh 9:30; and, by contrast, 1 Kgs 22:24). 3) The Spirit can pass from one inspired person to a successor (case of Moses: Dt 34:9, laying on of hands, and Elijah, 2 Kgs 2:15) or even to a people (Is 59:21).

3. Properties of the Spirit

The immaterial, personal nature of roûach makes it appropriate to signify circulation, intimacy, and communication of intimacy. The Spirit spreads out (Is 32:15, 44:3), fills, and vivifies (Ez 37). Holy, it sanctifies. It approaches wisdom* when it becomes a permanent presence attached to a chosen one or to the people (Is 11:1f.; Prv 1:23; Ps 51:8, 51:13; Wis 1:6, 7:7, 7:22ff.; 9:17).

4. Promised Spirit

In the late writings of the Old Testament the concept of Spirit is associated with eschatological times (Jl 3:3f.; see Is 63:19: the “separator of the heavens” carried over in Mk 1:10) and the promise*. Insofar as it is inscribed within a new understanding of the covenant* (Is 59:21; Ez 11:19f.; 36:25ff. after Jer 31:33), it is seen as the principal object of the promise (see Lk 24:49). The concept of creation* is conceived by way of this novelty (Ps 51:12f.).

PAUL BEAUCHAMP

II. New Testament

1. Terminology

The Greek substantive pneuma (379 times) has four meanings in the New Testament: 1) the literal sense of breath or wind (three times); 2) the anthropological (approximately 47 times) sense of “Spirit” as breath, the spirit of life (Mt 27:50 etc.), but also of the human person in his or her totality or inwardness; 3) the demonological sense that goes back to impure or evil spirits (especially in the Gospels* and Acts (approximately 38 times); and 4) the theological sense, which is dominant (the transcendent Spirit of God or Christ* (approximately 275 times). The Spirit in the theological sense is used 149 times in the absolute sense; 93 times as Holy Spirit or holiness* (pneuma hagion or hagiosunès), 18 times as Spirit of God, once as Spirit of the Father, five times qualified christologically. It should be noted that with the exception of the Lucan corpus, the expression “Holy Spirit” is not dominant in the New Testament.

2. Pre-Pauline Usage

a) Historical Jesus. All the earthly Jesus*’ logia on the Holy Spirit are probably post-paschal (see, e.g., Mk 3:29 parallel passage, 13:11 parallel passage; Mt 12:28, 28:19; Lk 4:18, 11:13). However, it would seem that the historical Jesus presented himself as invested with the Spirit (prophetic). The authority* he claims in his preaching* and actions is the demonstration of it—his proclamation of the imminent coming of the Kingdom* of God, his sovereign interpretation of the Law* (Mt 5:21ff.), his sending of the disciples on mission*, (Mk 6:7 par.), and his eschatological interpretation of exorcisms (Lk 11:20).

b) Easter. The oldest pre-Pauline formulas discern in Jesus’ Resurrection* an act of God, sometimes described as the expression of the activity of the Spirit of God (Rom 1:3f., 8:11, etc.).

c) Hellenists and Hellenistic Communities. The Hellenists (see Acts 6–7) would seem to be the first group that claimed possession of the eschatological Spirit. In support of this thesis should be noted their characteristic thaumaturgic activity and their critiques of the Temple* and the Law. This vivid awareness of their possession of the Spirit was probably the profound reason for the rupture with the primitive community of Jerusalem*. It was subsequently perpetuated in the Hellenistic community of Antioch and was at the origin of the mission to the pagans (paganism*) (see the example of Paul, heir to Antiochian theology and apostle* to the Gentiles). However, it cannot be affirmed with certainty that Palestinian Judeo*-Christianity (especially the community of Jerusalem) shared this pneumatological consciousness.

3. Paul

To grasp the Pauline notion of the Holy Spirit we must be attentive to the circumstantial quality of his letters and the theological development of his thought (from the rudimentary affirmations in 1 Thessalonians, to the Corinthian controversy on pneumatic phenomena, concluding with the fully developed pneumatology of Romans 8). The dynamics of Christian existence is the privileged site where Paul’s understanding of the Spirit appears in all its clarity.

a) Foundation and Fulfillment of Christian Existence according to the Spirit.

1) CHRISTOLOGY. The proclamation of the gospel of Christ* is the work of the Spirit (1 Thes 1:5; 1 Cor 2:4; Kgs 15:18f.). The Spirit inspires faith* (1 Cor 12:3). Only the Spirit makes it possible to confess Jesus as Lord.

2) SOTERIOLOGY. The Spirit creates life. By the Spirit, man is torn away from the power of sin* and death* and placed in the space of life and liberty* inaugurated by Christ (see Rom 8; Gal 5; 2 Cor 3:17). Baptism* is the sacramental sign of this change of allegiance.

3) ECCLESIOLOGY. The Spirit unites people in the visible communion* of the body of Christ (see 1 Cor 12). In the controversy with the Corinthian enthusiasm (1 Cor 12–14), Paul uses the notion of body to support his argument that all manifestations of the Spirit must be subordinated to the edification of the community.

The greatest charism is love* (1 Cor 13), which thus becomes the critical standard of all gifts of the Spirit. The theological perspective that supports this notion is the theology* of the cross.

4) ETHICS*. The Spirit is the agent of all action corresponding to the will of God (see the metaphor of the “fruit of the Spirit” in Gal 5:22), which can only be an action accomplished with love. The concrete expression of Christian freedom is love.

b) Eschatology. The Spirit’s action is central to the fulfillment of the Christian existence. Though Paul, true to the tradition*, understands the Spirit as an eschatological gift, he makes a clear distinction between the Spirit and the eschaton; the gift of the Spirit is but the premise of the glory to come (1 Cor 1:22, 5:5; Rom 8:23). In this respect, it is the foundation of hope* (Rom 8).

4. Work of Luke

a) History of Salvation. This history is determinant for the notion of the Spirit in Luke. The promise of the Spirit dominates the Old Testament period. During Jesus’ lifetime the activity of the Spirit is almost exclusively concentrated on his person, making him an almost exclusive depository. His birth manifests the creative activity of the Spirit of God (Lk 1:35) and his baptism makes him its messianic bearer (3:22). The narrative of the temptation* shows that Satan must retreat in the face of the bearer of the Spirit (the time of Jesus is a time when Satan is absent, until the Passion* (4:13, 22:3). The inaugural preaching in Nazareth connects the gift of the Spirit and the proclamation of the gospel (4:18f.). Only after he was raised to the Father*’s side did Jesus transmit the Spirit to believers (Lk 24:29; Acts 1:8, 2:33). The time of the church* is the time of the gift of the Spirit to all believers; Pentecost (Acts 2) is the act of foundation of the first Christian Church and the beginning of the time of the church. In becoming a constituent part of the third period of the history of salvation*, the Spirit no longer has eschatological grandeur, strictly speaking; it is an element of the penultimate time.

b) Reception of the Spirit during Time of the Church. Baptism and reception of the Spirit are also closely connected in Luke, but their articulation may take different forms. For one, baptism in the name* of Jesus is none other than the expression of the conversion* of a person to God and to Jesus; in view of this, it precedes the gift of the Spirit (see Acts 2:38). Prayer* also can prepare for reception of the gift of the Spirit (Acts 4:31). Second, reception of the Spirit may also precede baptism (see Acts 10:45–48). In this respect, the role played by the laying* on of hands should be noted (Acts 8:14–17, 19:2–6).

c) Functions and Effects of the Spirit. During the time of the church, four functions are enumerated: 1) The Spirit is given to all members of the church, and this gift is lasting. 2) The Spirit can manifest itself in a perceptible way: extraordinary physical and psychic phenomena are irrefutable exterior signs of the presence of the Spirit (Acts 2:3f., 4:8, 4:31, 10:45, 19:6). 3) The Spirit’s most important function is prophetic-kerygmatic. The Spirit makes it possible to decipher the future (Acts 11:28, 20:23) and discern the hidden will of God (Acts 8:29, 10:19f.); above all it constitutes the foundation of the church’s preaching (Acts 1:8, 4:8, 4:31, 6:10, 18:25, etc.). However, neither miraculous acts nor faith, prayer, and love are explicitly presented as fruits of the Spirit. 4) Luke’s concentration on the ecclesiological dimension of the history of salvation should be noted. The Spirit determines the church’s path in the world and guides it. Thus it ensures the continuity of the last phase of the history of salvation.

5. John

a) Points in Common. Aside from the farewell discourses (Jn 13–17), and despite noteworthy differences in emphasis, John’s conception of the Spirit is close to that of classical primitive Christianity (especially Paul and Luke). The Spirit is conceived as a divine and transcendent grandeur (Jn 3:6, 6:63). It is the eschatological gift par excellence, proper to post-paschal times (7:38f., 20:22). Communicated at the moment of baptism (3:35), it is a vivifying force (6:63). Only the Spirit leads one into authentic prayer (4:23f.) and obtains the forgiveness of sins (2:22f.).

b) Farewell Discourses. This is where the specifically Johannine reflection on the Spirit appears, with the introduction of the “Paraclete,” a new concept closely related to that of the Holy Spirit (14:26) or the Spirit of truth* (14:17, 15:26, 16:13). The five passages on the Paraclete are found in John 14:16f., 14:26, 15:26, 16:7–11, and 16:13ff.: 1) It is almost impossible to give a good translation of the concept of the Paraclete; each of the classical translations (helper, comforter, advocate, etc.) gives only one aspect. 2) The Paraclete and the Johannine Christ are related by an identity of function; what the earthly Jesus said and accomplished not long ago, the Paraclete says and accomplishes today in the church. In this sense the Paraclete is none other than the authentic representative of the earthly Jesus during the post-paschal period. 3) As a consequence of this subordination of pneumatology to Christology the central function of the Paraclete is bound to the message. Essentially, the Paraclete is the post-paschal agent of Jesus' eschatological preaching (this concentration of the Spirit on the word is unique within budding Christianity). 4) The first role of the Paraclete is that of bringing to mind the words of Jesus (Jn 14:26). He enables a retrospective understanding of the person and history of Jesus. This makes him the central agent of the new interpretation of the story of Jesus, of which the Fourth Gospel is the figure. Subsequent reflection on the Paraclete, initiated in John 16, shows that he not only actualizes the past of the revelation* but interprets post-paschal time in its present and future dimension (judicial function: 16:8–11; hermeneutic: 16:13). 5) In agreement with the whole of budding Christianity, John sees the Paraclete as a gift of the last times. But he radicalizes this notion; the Paraclete is not a transitional figure between the time of the Incarnation* and the time of the final fulfillment. In the coming of the Paraclete it is the coming of the risen Christ that is fulfilled—Easter, Pentecost, and Parousia* become one and the same event. The Parousia always happens anew in the coming of the Paraclete.

- E. Käsemann (1958), "Geist. IV. Geist und Geistesgaben im NT," RGK 2, 1272–79.
- E. Schweizer (1959), "pneuma, pneumatikos: Das Neue Testament," ThWNT 6, 394–449.
- D. Lys (1962), "Rûach," in Le souffle dans l'Ancien Testament, Paris.
- F. Hahn (1974), "Das biblische Verständnis des heiligen Geistes," in Erfahrung und Theologie des heiligen Geistes, Ed. C. von Heitman and H. Mühlen, Munich, 131–47.
- H. Schlier (1974), ibid., "Herkunft, Ankunft und Wirkungen des Heiligen Geistes im Neuen Testament," 118–30.
- J. Kremer (1983), "pneuma," EWNT 3, 279–91.
- J. Guillet et al. (1991), "Saint-Esprit. II. Nouveau Testament," DBS 11, 172–398.
- F. W. Horn (1992), "Holy Spirit," AncBD 3, 180–260.

JEAN ZUMSTEIN AND ANDREAS DETTWILER

See also Church; Communion; Eschatology; Flesh; Holiness; Johannine Theology; Love; Pauline Theology; Promise; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Trinity; Word of God

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

The Holy Spirit is the third Person* of the Trinity*. It is unique, equal to the Father* (Paraclete) and the Son, of the same substance and the same nature (Toledo synod XI, 675, DS 527). The Spirit is distinguished from the Father and the Son as a "Person" but is not of the same caliber with them as "God*" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, 1992, §253–56). The Holy Spirit is distinguished from the two other persons by a relation of origin, which is understood differently in the Catholic and the Orthodox traditions (tradition*). The Father sends the Son and, through the Son, the Holy Spirit for a history of salvation* that begins in the Old Testament (interventions of the Spirit in prophecy) and culminates in the New Testament with the Incarnation* of the Son (gift of the filial Spirit), but is still actualized in time by the Spirit. In this context the Spirit is given many different names (name*): Paraclete, Gift, Sanctification, Energy, Image of the Son, Unction and Seal, Love*, and Charity. Still other names are mentioned in the CEC (§691–702).

1. The Holy Spirit in the Tradition up to Council of Florence (1439–1445)

The theology of the Holy Spirit is elaborated between two extremes. The first, the illuminist tendency, already mentioned by Paul (the enthusiasts of 1 Cor 6:12–19), dreams of living a universal Pentecost and a palpable experience of the Spirit. This tendency includes Montanism* (second century), Messalianism* (fourth century), Macarius-Symeon (†430?), Joachim of Fiore (†1202) (millenarianism*), medieval mendicant orders, and post-Reformation pietist movements. At the other extreme, a rationalizing movement (Arianism*) made the Holy Spirit a superior vital principle in man, which is not God but an intermediary between God and man. A theology that gave value to the divinity of the Spirit and its personal existence gradually developed between these two extremes.

a) Beginnings. Primitive Christianity is characterized by the fundamental experience* of the presence of God in human beings through the Spirit (TRE 12, 194), which is the overflowing onto them of Christ's Resurrection* (Acts 2; J1 3:1–5; Eph 1:18ff.), bringing them peace*, joy, inner freedom, freedom before God (par-rèsia), fraternal love for each other, and filial love for God. The paschal mystery inaugurates a new era, and the Spirit is its guarantor.

Faith* in the Holy Spirit is rooted in the paschal kerygma (Acts 2:7, 2:32f.), the baptismal formula (Mt 28:19), and the Eucharistic celebration (Justin, Apologies I, 65 and 67; Martyrdom of Polycarp 14, 2–3). The Spirit inspires the bishop* (Ignatius, To the Philip-pians 7, 1–2) and the “prophets*.” The prophetic spirit abandoned the Jewish people and was concentrated in Christ; from Christ it is given to all believers (Justin, Dialogue with Trypho; Origen, De principiis). Montanus presented himself (c.155–60) in Phrygia (Asia Minor) as the prophet who is the embodiment of the Holy Spirit–Paraclete (Jn 14:26) chosen to inaugurate, on the fringes of the church*, the time of the Spirit. After 200 Montanism reached the West, where it was adopted by Tertullian, who gave it his own style. The individuality of the Spirit was not always gainsaid (e.g., Athenagoras). Certain texts where the Holy Spirit is not mentioned are sometimes considered binitarian (Tertullien non montaniste, Hermas, Le Pasteur 59: see R. Joly, SC 53, p.32).

Irenaeus* of Lyons was the first to give an extensive description of the work of the Spirit (Adversus haereses. III, 1; Epidexis tou apostolikou kerygmatos 5–7). He clearly distinguished the Son and the Spirit, which are like the two hands of the Father (Haer. V, 20, 1; II, 7, 5). The activity of the Spirit is in the service of the Son who is himself subject to the Father (Epid. 6–7). His argument for the connection between the Holy Spirit and the church countered the Montanists, (Haer. III, 1, 1; 4, 1–2; 24, 1), while his emphasis on the economy of salvation (Haer. IV, 20, 6–7) was an answer to the Gnostics.

Tertullian*, in his reaction to the monarchianism of Praxeas, who denied the individuality proper to the Spirit, took the Montanist binitarian images and added a third term, the Spirit: “They are three. Third is in fact the Spirit out of God and the Son, just as third out from the root is the fruit that comes from the branch, and third coming out from the spring the brook that goes out of the river, and third coming out of the sun the point that comes from the ray” (Against Praxeas 8). The relationship of origin is envisaged but kept in the background; the perspective is primarily economic. “The Spirit of God” designates the Holy Spirit as it designates the Son or the being* (substantia) of God the Father who unfolds in the Son and the Holy Spirit.

The last is a “portion” of the total substance of the Father. It is numbered with him from the beginning (meaning forever) because it is “in the Son” who is numbered with the Father (Moingt). The Son is born of the Father and returns to him (Novatian, De Trinitate 31). Zeno of Verona makes the point that the Spirit comes from him, exultation of the one in the other (Tractatus II, 3; see I, 2, 9; II, 5, 1: Patrologia Latina 11). His unifying role in the church flows from the Trinitarian unity (Cyprian*, On the Unity of the Catholic Church; Letter 74, 4). Marius Victorinus (v. 360: Hymns, SC 68, 620 and 650), and even more so Augustine, believe that the Spirit is the connection (copula, complexio) between the Father and the Son. Ambrose* focuses on the unity of name and substance in God, to the point that what is proper to the Spirit in the common activity is blurred (De Spir. I, 13; De sacram. VI, 2, 5: Patrologia Latina 16 and SC 25 bis). It is not always possible to see what distinguishes the Spirit within the Trinity (Rufinus, Commentarius in symbolum apostolorum).

Origen*, on the basis of baptism*, associates the Spirit with the Father and the Son (De principiis I, 3, 2 and 5) and wonders about its origin, which is not mentioned in Scripture (ibid., Pref. 1; I, 3, 1). Arguing against the monarchians, he applies to the Spirit these words from John 1:3: “All things came to be [egeneto] through him [the Son]” giving egeneto the broad sense of a simple derivation in being. Thus the Spirit receives “from the Son,” and that is why it is distinguished from him (Comm. John II, §75–76). In the following century the derivation of the Spirit with regard to the Son is evident for the Arians and the Macedonians concerned by the First Council of Constantinople* (381). Origen argues that the Spirit that receives from the Son “provides so to speak the matter of the charismas/gifts of God [hulled tôn kharismatôn] which, produced out of the Father by the Son subsist according to the Spirit” (Comm. John II, §77: see De principiis II, 7). The gifts subsist in him insofar as he actualizes them in us (On Prayer II, 6; Commentary on John VI, §225; Fr. 8 on Ephesians 1, 13; Ser. Commentary on Matthew 134). This theme is developed in De principiis I, 3, 5–8 and II, 7.

b) Fourth Century. Absent at Nicaea (325), the question of the Spirit did not come up for discussion until 359–60. Christians in Lower Egypt who accepted the equality of the Son with the Father made the Holy Spirit a “serving spirit,” different only in degree from the angels* (Athanasius*, To Serapion I, 1: SC 15). In 374 the “Macedonians” (named after Macedonius, patriarch of Constantinople, deposed in 360) took a position close to that of Nicaea (Homeousians), but they too refused to confess the Holy Spirit as God, though never claiming he was a creature (Socrates, Ecclesiastical Hierarchy II, 45; Ps.-Dionysus, Of Trinity II, 7, 3, and II, 8; Ps.-Athanasius, Dial. Maced. I, 4; I, 15). An anonymous Macedonian provided the key to their attitude: “‘No one can say that Jesus* is Lord except by the Holy Spirit’ (1 Corinthians 12:3). Therefore, the introduction to God must necessarily be made by another—the Holy Spirit. It follows that if I adore the Holy Spirit, by whom and in whom will I have access to him [the Holy Spirit] to adore [him]?” (Dial. Maced. I, 4; Patriologia Graeca 28, 1293 CD).

Since the Son is not there any more to make an imaginary bridge between God and man, the Holy Spirit does it in his place. This is what Athanasius and Basil* of Caesarea refused to admit. If the Holy Spirit makes divine, then its nature can no doubt be that of God (Athanasius, To Serapion I, 23; I, 25). It works by coming into man as a transforming power (energeia) and donation (dôrea) (ibid., I, 20; see Basil, Of the Holy Spirit 16, 47: SC 17 bis). But in the Spirit that comes there is the Son who gives it, and in the Son the Father (To Serapion I, 30).

The Cappadocian Fathers* (Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory of Nazianzus) defended the divinity of the Holy Spirit against the Arian Eunomius. For the latter, the being (ousia) of God can be known because it was revealed, but it cannot be communicated, not even to the Son. Gregory* of Nyssa affirms conversely that the being of God is absolutely unknowable to the creature but is communicated to the Son in eternal generation, and may be participated in by creatures by virtue of “energies” (energeiai) that God distributes to them, and which are identified with the Holy Spirit insofar as the latter gives himself to believers. Basil insists on the fact that the Spirit reveals the Son without any intermediary, “in himself” (in heautô: Of the Holy Spirit 16, 47). Basil also defends the liturgical expression attacked by the Homeousians: “The Father is glorified with [meta] the Son and with [sun] the Spirit.” Reserving the title of God for the Father, he thus expresses the divinity of the Holy Spirit by giving value to its homotimie (equality of honor) with the Father and the Son. Elsewhere, specifying what is proper to each of the Three in the Triad, he advances the properties of paternity, *filiation, and sanctification (Letter 236, 6; see Letter 214, 4). Gregory of Nazianzus substitutes for sanctification the word procession (ekporeusis: Discourse 31, 8). The connection with the creature, still felt in the word sanctification (Basil), disappears with the use of the word procession, which takes a fully intra-Trinitarian sense (Gregory). This emphasizes the perfect independence of God with regard to the creature, but may lead to forgetting the bond that God freely made with the creature, and which is testified in Scripture.

c) Augustine. It is with Augustine* that the doctrine of the Holy Spirit as love or charity comes to impose itself in the West (De Quant. animae 34; De fide et symbolo 9, 19–20; Trin. VI, 5, 7; XV, 19, 37). The Spirit is the love of the Father and the Son “hypostasized” in a third “Person,” but also the love of God spread in our hearts (Rom 5:5 cited more than 200 times by Augustine). This theme of the Spirit-as-love is one of the themes that structures Augustine’s thought (Congar, Bibliothèque augustiniennne).

In the anagogical context of the neoplatonic emanatist scheme, the Spirit constitutes, at the term of the exitus-reditus, the stabilization (monè) in love that unifies and brings happiness (Soliloquies I, 1, 3; De ver. rel. 55, 113). The psychological analogy* puts it parallel to human will and love. The link between Holy Spirit and love finds one of its justifications here (O. du Roy, L’intel. de la foi en la Trinité selon saint Augustin, 1966).

Augustine’s distinction between absolute and relative divine names (Trinity*) raised a problem because in the “relative” double name Holy Spirit the two words are equally appropriate for the Father and the Son, but this is proper to “absolute” names. Augustine sees this as an indication that the Holy Spirit belongs to both of them (*Filioque). The name Gift of God (Acts 8:20) does have a “relative” character, but ad extra. So Augustine calls on two other names, donabile and donatum. The Holy Spirit is in all eternity susceptible of being given (donabile) and this is why, within time, he is effectively given (donatum). The work of salvation thus finds a certain foundation in God himself.

d) Middle Ages. Augustine did not dare to apply the triad “lover, loved, love” to God (Trin. VIII, 10, 14). It can be found in operation in Richard of Saint-Victor (†1141; Of the Trinity III, 2; III, 18). Love implies openness and alterity (condilectio, consocialis amor) and thus “Trinity,” a theme taken up by Bonaventure* (I Sent., d. 13, q. 1). It survived in its Augustinian form, as illustrated notably by Anselm* of Canterbury (†1109), who underscores the extraordinary coincidence of intra-Trinitarian love (Monologion 53) with its overflow ad extra (De la procession du Saint Esprit, 9, Ed. M. Corbin, 1990, Œuvres).

Like Augustine, Paschasius Radbert (†860), William of Saint Thierry († c. 1149), and Peter Lombard (†1160) identify the Spirit and love (caritas), the Spirit being one with grace*, the Giver identified with the gift (I Sent., d. 14 and 17; III, d. 22, q. 13 and d. 23, q. 30). Alexander of Hales (†1245) unites created grace (in man) and uncreated grace (the Holy Spirit present) on the basis of the hypostatic* union. The whole body communes in the grace of the head (Summa Theologica III, inquis. I, tract. I, q. 2, no. 609 resp.; tract. III, q. 1, no. 99 resp. and no. 112 resp.). Contrary to this, Thomas of Aquinas distinguishes grace—created gift—and the person of the Spirit—uncreated gift—truly given (Summa Theologica Ia IIae, q. 110; Of Truth, q. 27, a. 2; Summa Theologica IIa IIae, q. 23, a. 2 resp. where Thomas argues against I Sent., d. 17 by Paraclete Lombard).

Thomas* Aquinas systematized the ideas of Augustine; the procession of the Spirit is made by way of will. It proceeds from the Father and the Son “as from a single principle” by a unique spiration (Trinity). In Commentary on the Sentences by Peter Lombard, Thomas presents the Trinitarian mystery* as the site where a theology of grace is rooted. An entire spiritual edifice is founded on the gift of the Spirit, personal intra-Trinitarian love, which makes itself temporal gift, principle of the gifts granted to human beings so that they might be adopted and made divine in the Son. The Summa Theologica carries over these ideas, but blurs the link between the Trinity and the deification of man. The Trinity is envisaged in itself and the divine Persons as such are isolated from the work of salvation. This can be seen as a “retreat” of the master under the hold of an Augustinianism* that dissociates the Trinity from its works (Bouyer 1980). In line with the inseparabiliter operari (Augustine, Trinity I, 5, 8), he treats filial adoption on the same footing as the Creation*, as a work ad extra. Consequently, in the rigor of terms we are not the sons of the Father but of the Trinity (Summa Theologica IIIa, q. 23, a. 2 resp. and ad 2; see Gregory* Palamas, Patrologia Graeca 110, 1213 AC). This trend of overly speculative theology gave rise finally to a reaction of opposition in medieval spiritual movements and, at the dawn of the modern era, Luther’s Reformation.

e) The Spirit and the Mystics. Meister Eckhart (†1327), heir to Thomas and Augustine but also to Origen, takes up the theme of the believer endlessly engendered by the Father “in the Holy Spirit” (Deutsche Werke I; see Livre consol. divine, éd. Libera, 1993; see M. Vannini, “La justice et la génération du Logos,” in Voici Maître Eckhart, 1994). John of the Cross declares that the soul* loves God as much as it is loved by him, “because it loves him with the will of God himself, in the same love with which he loves it, which is the Holy Spirit” (Cant. Sp. 38, 2). The Spirit informs it “so that it will aspire to God with the same aspiration of love that the Paraclete aspires for the Son and the Son for the Paraclete, which is the Holy Spirit itself.” (ibid., 39, 3).

2. Conciliar Definitions

A major reference for the Christian creed, the Nicaea Council (325) mentions the Holy Spirit in a brief but significant formula at the end of its “Symbol,” referring to it as a trace of the rite of baptism in the creed: “And [I believe] in the Holy Spirit” (DS 125). Constantinople I (381) mentions the Spirit in two places: “We believe . . . in Jesus Christ, made flesh of [ek] the Holy Spirit and [of] the Virgin Mary*.” And, further on: “And we believe in the Holy Spirit, Lord and vivifier, who proceeds [to ekporeuomenon] from the Father [ek tou patros], who with the father receives like adoration and like glory, who spoke through the prophets” (DS 150). This second development defends the divinity of the Spirit against the Macedonians. The substitution of ek for the para of John 15:26 must refer to the Nicaean ek, which has the strong sense of the origin “coming from the substance” (of the Father). But the technical vocabulary of Nicaea was not carried over. The origin from the Father is the principal sign testifying to the “divinity” of the Spirit, equally suggested by the divine title of Lord (to kurion) and the divine action of vivifying (kai zôpoion). The adoration and glorification of the Spirit with the father and with the Son signifies that it has the same rank (connumeration: Basil, Of the Holy Spirit 17, 42–3), but also that it is a divine “Person,” receiving as and with them the same worship. By its liturgical and soteriological reference the symbol recovers the “economic” perspective of Scripture. Other councils mentioned the Holy Spirit. Toledo (several synods: DS 188, 470, 485, 490, 527); Lyons* II (1274), where it was specified that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son “not as from two principles, but as from a single principle . . . , by a unique spiration” (DS 850); and Florence (1439–45), where the question of the Filioque was answered at length (Enchiridion Symbolorum 1300–1302) and it was recalled that “in God all is one where an opposition of relation is no obstacle” (DS 1330).

3. Turning Point of the Reformation

a) Luther* broke with the traditional reading of Scripture and excluded the church’s mediation in interpretation of the sacred text, leaving all the room for the Holy Spirit. His notion of justification* further increased the importance of the Spirit: human beings are justified insofar as, by the presence of the Spirit, Christ with his justice* covers the injustice of the sinner (WA 56, 280). The gift of grace must be received on a base of a sin* that endures. This is why the Holy Spirit is both the Illuminator who elucidates by “inner testimony” the word* of God and the Comforter who rescues from despair. The church remains the place where the gospel is announced. Salvation is accomplished within it but does not come from it. It directly reaches individuals, who constitute the invisible church, whose unity* is ensured by the Spirit (J.L. Witte, DSp 4, 1961, 1318–33; F. Refoulé, RSPPhTh 1964, 428–70).

Calvin* adopted and organized Luther’s thought. He emphasized the bond between the Spirit and the visible church. The presumption plays in favor of the church when it comes to interpreting Scripture, but in the last resort the decision is up to the believer who receives the immediate testimony of the Spirit (De Inst. IV, 9, 12; see DSp 4).

On the fringes of traditional Protestantism*, the pietist movements (pietism*) also emphasized the personal action of the Spirit, in a way that could make the “external testimony” of the church unintelligible. They could not surmount the 18th-century wave of rationalism, which dissociated the activity of Christ from that of the Spirit. Christ becomes a simple moral example and the Spirit a “divine force” identified with human intelligence. Nineteenth-century idealism, notably with Hegel*, developed a notion of the Spirit (Allgeist) in which it is very difficult to find the third Person of the Trinity. Schleiermacher*’s (1768–1834) attempt to reconcile Christian discourse with the exigencies of the new rationality worked to the detriment of the divine personality of the Spirit. A. Ritschl (1822–89) abandoned, in the name of reason*, the doctrine of the Trinity as dogma* of the faith. A. von Harnack in Germany and A. Sabatier in France reduced the dogmatic formulations to simple transitory expressions of Christian thought that can be explained by the historical conditions of their elaboration, consequently void of any constraining value in the present day. In the early 20th century Barth opposed the tendencies of what was known as “liberal” theology with his “dialectical theology.”

b) Karl Barth* developed at an early stage a pneumatology based on the lordship of the Holy Spirit (see “The Lord, is that Spirit” [2 Cor 3:17]). This lordship is exercised over the destiny of man, who must recognize himself as radically a sinner, placed under the judgment* of God so that a new man will be born in him by the work of the Spirit. This is presented as the “subjective revelation*” of God coming to man by the Son. The Incarnation of the Son does not make the Spirit’s mission useless; it postulates it. For man is in fact incapable all alone of opening himself to the Son as God and to the Father. The opening of man to God, on the one hand, and the freedom of God to come into man, on the other hand, are identified with the given Holy Spirit. The Spirit actualizes in us that which is revealed, that is, our redemption. This thought shares the perspective of the church fathers, especially the Greek Fathers rediscovered in the 19th century.

4. Current Questions

a) Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Human Person. At the end of the 19th century, Scheeben* and Th. de Régnon (†1893), using D. Petau’s (†1652) works on the church fathers, sought to give restored value to the personal role of the Holy Spirit in the work of salvation. A brief on the question was assembled by P. Galtier (Le Saint-Esprit en nous d’après les Pères grecs, Rome, 1946). His critique of Régnon is limited to the refutation of a thesis that supposedly makes the Holy Spirit’s activity so personal (“hypostatic”) that it would exclude the roles of the other two Persons. But this argument deforms Régnon’s thesis and fails to consider the patristic texts and the true weight of the “becoming-son” that places man within and not outside the Trinity. “Those are not... pure relations with the outside, because just as well grace makes us really penetrate ad intra Dei” (G. Philips, EThL, 1948, 134). More recently, Bouyer (1980), Rahner* (Theological Writings 1, 110–11; 3, 65–69), and Congar (1979, vol. 2; see Chrétiens en dial., 1964) have demonstrated that the patristic approach is in accord with Scripture.

b) Discernment of Spirits. In the primitive perspective, man is surrounded by various spirits, some of them working for the good spirit and others for the evil one. He must recognize what comes from which one, it being understood that the evil spirit tries to fool him by trying to pass for the good one (see Gn 3). This theme is already found in the second-century works of Hermas (Le Pasteur, 33–49: SC 53). It reaches a peak with Origen, who had a lasting influence on Eastern and then Western monasticism* (DSp). A significant resurgence (ibid.) is found in the teaching and practice of Ignatius of Loyola (†1556) (Ignatian spirituality).

c) The Holy Spirit and the Church. Russian Orthodox theology (modern and contemporary Orthodoxy*) was stimulated in the late 19th century by the thinking of Khomiakov, who claimed that the church is not first a visible institution but an invisible reality animated by the Spirit. What constitutes it “is neither the numerical figures of believers nor their visible assembly; it is the very bond that unites them. The church is the revelation of the Holy Spirit to the mutual love of Christians, and the very love that leads them to the Father by his incarnate Word” (L’Église latine et le protestantisme, Lausanne, 1872).

This pneumatological ecclesiology* was balanced by contributions of other Orthodox authors (Soloviyov*, Boulgakov, Florovsky, Afanassieff, and recently J. Zizioulas). But the restoration of the Spirit’s value remains an accepted fact. It is also found in Germany (J. A. Moehler, 1796–1838) and England (Newman*).

In the Catholic Church some importance was given to the theme of the Spirit as soul of the church. It was rare in the earliest centuries. With Origen this role is played by the Word (Contra Celsum VI, 48). Augustine refers to it twice (Sermons 267, 4 and 268, 2; beginnings in Commentary on John XXVI, 6, 13 and XXVII, 6, 6). Thomas Aquinas takes it up and refines it (De veritate 29, 4 c). It is found in Leo XIII and Pius XII (Mystici Corporis, 1943; Tromp, Litt. encycl., 3rd Ed., 1958). The comparison is not useful unless the difference from hypostatic union is noted. The Spirit in the church intervenes only on the level of freedoms (Vl. Lossky, Essay on the Mystic Theology of the Eastern Church, 1944, and already Origen, De principiis 3, 5: the Spirit acts only on the saints, who adhere freely to Christ). It is from the heart of believers that it establishes with Christ—and through them—a particular type of unity.

Mühlen (1964), going on the ancient notion of persona (Tertullian; Augustine and the only “persona” of “the complete Christ,” both Head and Body of the church), takes from Thomas Aquinas the expression “mystical person” to say that the Holy Spirit is “a person in multiple persons.” “Person” designates here the Spirit as engaged in a complex play of relations within the church, the “body of Christ” in the sense of collective body, in line with the Old Testament basar (flesh), but transposed to designate a “corporate personality” (J. A. T. Robinson, The Body, London, 1952; J. de Fraine, Adam et son lignage, Paris, 1959; R. H. Gundry, Sôma, Cambridge, 1976). This “body” of Christ, the new community of believers, is constituted in relation with the risen Christ. Christ unfolds in a “grand ego” (Mühlen) that is not the prolongation of the Incarnation but a distinct reality, constituted under the influence of the Spirit: “Just as the Logos really made itself man in the unique human nature [see Jn 1:14], so the Spirit of Jesus really ‘made’ itself Church in the social organism of the Church” (ibid.).

Y. Congar also noted the importance of the Holy Spirit in theology after Vatican* II, in counterbalancing a legitimate but sometimes overly unilateral emphasis on Christology*. The role of Christ is not limited to putting visible structures in place. Within the framework of a “pneumatological Christology,” his role must be understood in relation to the action of the Spirit, which is necessarily invisible. But the Spirit in turn cannot be isolated from Christ. The church is the (mystical) body of Christ, not of the Holy Spirit (Congar 1979; see id., Mélanges G. Philips, Gembloux, 1970).

d) From Sects to Charismatic Movements. The sects (taken in the sociological meaning of the term) give great importance to the Spirit, which is generally accepted as the third Person of the Trinity, even if the mystery is often obscured. Its function is to realize “the inner illumination” in believers that unites them with the Spirit itself or with God. The emphasis is placed on the felt experience of a personal intervention of the Spirit in the individual, with particular attention to certain charismata (special gifts: 1 Cor 12), connected to the event of Pentecost. The “charismatic movements” or “movements of renewal” are a special case, distinguished from the sects, because they are officially recognized by the Catholic hierarchy* and have recently come to play a significant role in the life of the churches (Congar 1979; see Pentecostalism*).

e) The “Theology/Economy” Relation and the Filioque. Orthodox theology, insofar as it maintains a radical monopatrism (the Spirit proceeds from the Father alone), not as a theologoumenon but as a dogma of faith, cannot accept transposition from the level of economy, where the Son intervenes in the gift of the Spirit, to the level of theology, where he does not intervene (see the declaration of S. Verkhovsky at the Colloquia of Saulchoir [1950], Russia and Christianity). However, for Catholic theology, the correspondence from one level to another is evident (ibid.). Everything that the Old Testament reveals of God is done in an economic context. Rahner advances the axiom according to which “the Trinity manifest in the economy of salvation is the immanent Trinity and, reciprocally” (Theological Writings, 1967, MySal II/1, 328). In the economy God is revealed as he is in himself because his plan is to make us participate in his intra-Trinitarian life such as it is in itself, by making us “sons in the Son” by the gift of the Spirit.

Equally for Barth (1932), there is no other reality behind that of the revelation that would be God: “It is because of the intra-divine reciprocal communion* of the Holy Spirit that proceeds from the Father and the Son that there is, in the revelation, a communion of God and man, in which God is not only there for man but—and that is the donum Spiritus sancti—where man is also really there for God.” The inconceivable possibility of communion with God already exists in the Trinity: it is the Holy Spirit, eternal foundation in God of what is given to humanity within time.

f) Among other subjects that could still be envisaged one might mention: 1) the question of the eucharistic epiclesis (does the conversion of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ in the eucharistic consecration depend on the words pronounced by the priest in the name of Christ, or on the invocation of the Holy Spirit?), with the more general question of the role of the Holy Spirit in the liturgy; and 2) the question of the Spirit in the ecumenical movement. Another subject has hardly been studied though clearly suggested in Scripture (Acts 2; Rom 1:4)—the connection between the Holy Spirit and the paschal mystery. This is the theme of a resurrection that has already begun (2 Tm 2:18; Phil 3:1), of that resurrection as the overflow upon all humanity of the Resurrection of Christ. It is a theme that runs through the whole of patristic literature, but as evidence that one does not seek to demonstrate. It is concealed within a vocabulary where the Holy Spirit has an important place, but the word “resurrection” does not appear. Seeking deeper into this theme in Scripture and the church fathers might provide the occasion for developing a theology that interrogates the mystery of God through the extraordinary gift he made of himself to himself through man . . . in the Spirit.

- Th. de Régnon (1892 and 1898), Études de Théologie positive sur la Sainte Trinité, 4 vols., Paris.
- K. Barth (1932), Die Kirchliche dogmatik I/1, §12 (Dogmatique, Geneva, vol. 2, 1953, 140–78).

- Coll. (1950), “Le Filioque,” Russie et chrétienté.
- J. Guillet et al. (1961), “Esprit Saint,” Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 4, 1246–1333.
- Coll. (1963), Le Saint-Esprit, Geneva.
- H. Mühlen (1964), Una mystica persona: Eine Person in vielen Personen, Paderborn.
- G. Kretschmar (1968), “Le développement de la doctrine du Saint: Esprit, du Nouveau Testament à Nicée,” Verbum Caro: Revue théologique et ecclésiastique oecuménique 88, 5–55.
- P. Evdokimov (1969), L’E.S. dans la tradition orthodoxe, Paris.
- Coll. (1972), “La Procession du Saint Esprit,” Ist 17, 261–456.
- Rahner (1975), Schr. zur Th. 12, Zürich-Einsiedeln-Köln.
- Coll. (1978), L’Esprit Saint, Brussels.
- F. Bolgiani (1979), “La th. de l’Esprit Saint, de la fin du Ier s. au concile de Constantinople (381),” Les quatre fleuves, no. 9, 33–72.
- Y. Congar (1979–80), Je crois en l’Esprit Saint, 3 vols., Paris; New Ed. in 1 vol., 1995.
- L. Bouyer (1980), Le Consolateur, Paris.
- J. Lison (1980), L’Esprit répandu: La pneumatologie de Grégoire Palamas, Paris.
- Coll. (1983), Credo in Spiritum Sanctum, Atti del Congresso . . . di Pneumatologia, 2 vols., Rome.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1987), “La th. et l’E.,” NRTh 109, 660–71.
- H.U. von Balthasar (1987), Theologik. 3. Der Geist der Wahrheit, Einsiedeln.
- A. de Halleux (1990), Patrologie et œcuménisme, 303–442 (repr. of six pneumatology studies).
- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie 3, Göttingen, 13–114.
- B. J. Hilberath (1994), Pneumatologie, Düsseldorf.
- O. González de Cardedal (1997), “El Espíritu, la Iglesia y el Mundo,” in La entraña del cristianismo, Salamanca, 683–870.

JOSEPH WOLINSKI

See also Christ and Christology; Filioque; God, Father; Trinity; Word

Hope

a) Biblical Theology. “The undoubted expectation of beatitude to come” (Thomas* Aquinas, ST IIa IIae, q. 18, a. 4) linked in Pauline* theology to faith* and to charity (1 Cor 13:13), hope is only theologically intelligible in a framework of biblical references in which the category of promise* plays a special role. The experience of Israel* does indeed replace the cyclical notion of time* that predominated in paganism* with the linear notion of a time arranged into a history*. In this history God* manifests himself as the master of the future, and destines human beings to a future—the very name* of YHWH, as it is revealed in Exodus 3:14, is perhaps already the guarantee of a future. Open by promises, the hope of Israel itself had to know a history. After the promise of a land there followed the promises made to the monarchy of David (2 Sm 7:12–17) or the prophetic announcement of eschatological salvation* (e.g., Ez 8:23b–9:6). The Deuteronomist tradition* retains the hope of renewal and a universalization of the covenant* (Ez 34:25, 37:26), of a revivification of man (Ez 11:19f., 18:31, 36:26) and a new presence of YHWH amidst his people* (Ez 40–47). In the Psalms*, hope is expressed as trust in God in the midst of suffering (13:6, 22:5, etc.), or else it is a source of praise* (33:18–22). The various messianic representations orient history toward the people’s absolute future; and in the face of death*, apocalyptic theology looks to the absolute future of the individual (Is 26; Dn 12:1ff.), while trust in the closeness of God is encountered even at the very heart of death (Ps 73:26ff.).

To an experience placed under the sign of unfulfillment, the New Testament first of all opposes an experience of fulfillment, such that hope cannot play a primary role and that, paradoxically, the fullness of theological realities is first offered to an act of memory. The event on which the Christian understanding of man and God is based—the “Jesus Christ event”—happened when “the time had fully come” (Gal 4:4); in Jesus* of Nazareth, it is equally the “fullness of God” that lived among men (Col 1:19, 2:9); and again, on Good Friday, it is a word of accomplishment that the Gospel* of John puts in the mouth of the Crucified (Jn 19:30). After the imprecise wait for the messiah that characterizes the time of the pre-paschal ministry*, there comes the time of the messianic confession; and if Jesus is indeed the Messiah* of Israel and the savior of nations, it must be said that, in him, the time of promise has come to an end. The first word of Jesus’ preaching announces the proximity of the Kingdom* (Mk 3:2; Mt 10:7; Lk 10:9) and gives rise to an expectation—on Easter Day, it does seem that the time of waiting has passed.

The new classification of future promises is nevertheless essential to the Christian experience, even if it only happens subsequently. Since the founding events remembered in the liturgy*, the permanent—the eschaton—has its hold on the temporary—history—and the canon* of the New Testament refracts this hold in a plurality of eschatological notions that in different ways link the eschatological and the christological. Beyond this irreducible plurality (in Matthew, the eschatology* of the fulfillment of promises made to Israel; in John, a theology of the glory* of God manifested in the world; in Luke, the elucidation of the meaning of the time of the church*; etc.; see Woschiz, 1979), it remains true that in Jesus new promises were made to human beings, and that, in the time of the world, they must remain unfulfilled. Understood as promise (e.g., Rom 8:29), the resurrection* of Jesus teaches hope. Even for communities who expected the imminent return of Christ, it was quite necessary to name hope at the same time as faith and charity (1 Cor 13:13); and the symbols of faith were to express the meaning of the fundamental Christian hope in speaking of awaiting “the resurrection* of the dead” (“of flesh”) and “the life of the world to come” (“eternal life*”).

b) Patristic and Medieval Theology. For classical antiquity, the concern for the present through the future, through both hope and fear, belonged only to the logic of affects, and the Stoic ethic concluded that access to virtue—to ataraxia—entailed the command of all hope. Except for Zenon of Verona († c. 375), author of the first treatise De Spe, Fide, et Caritate (PL 11, 269–80), Thomas Aquinas, and also Ambrose* of Milan (In Ps. 118 Sermo Tertius, PL 15, 1223–40) and Augustine* (Enchiridion de Fide, Spe et Caritate, PL 40, 230–90), the theology of hope would integrate the pathos of waiting within the framework of a doctrine of the virtues*.

The present of Christian experience cannot, in fact, really harbor the blessed life. And even if man does experience peace*—hèsukhia, quies—this is never the possession of definitive goods, but rather the pleasure of their “guarantee” (see 2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:14). The ancient vision of an uncertain future that disturbs the present is then replaced by a present concerned with a promised beatitude that is not comparable to any bliss that can be experienced in the time of the world, a beatitude that is nothing man can give to himself, and cannot be hoped for without a divine initiative (grace*) that makes of man someone who hopes. The order of hope is that of the theology: like faith and charity, hope is therefore totaliter ab extrinseco (Thomas, ST Ia Ilae, q. 63, a. 1).

But, just as theological faith and charity are not the only human experiences signifying love and having faith (just as there is also a “natural” experience of believing and love*), the supernatural logic of hope can be interpreted against the background of a “natural” capacity of hoping that can itself take place in a theory of virtue. Augustine had already interpreted the basic modes of temporality as preunderstandings of the fundamental logic of the Christian experience. Thomas went further. He considered that there exists a virtuous relationship between natural man and the future, and identifies magnanimity as the virtue that holds its (in proper Aristotelian terms) between the two vices of presumption and despair in order to wisely welcome what is not yet.

One can therefore offer an analysis of hope that pertains to the natural element as well as the theological one (In Sent. III, d. 16, q. 1–5). It is hope’s distinctive feature to reach out toward a good, toward a good that is difficult to get to (arduum), to a future good, finally to a possible good. The present of all hope is therefore marked with insufficiency: just as one cannot “see” what one does not “believe,” one does not possess what one hopes, both in the natural order and in the theological order. But because nonpossession is theologically linked to a certitude, it does not engender any misery. Thomas does of course acknowledge that a certain insecurity (anxietas, angustia) affects the hoping conscience (ST Ia IIae, q. 40, a. 8). The absolute future to which theological hope is related is nevertheless promised with enough strength for hope to hope “certainly”: the reasons for hoping are rooted in the reasons for believing; thus, hope is as reasonable as it is virtuous.

c) Secularized Hope. Hope hopes for the eschaton, under the formality of an eschatological beatitude that the time of the world cannot harbor. Its content is therefore that of the last item of the creeds of faith, and is especially only this; and if historic goods can also be hoped for, it would exclusively be “spiritual or temporal possession that are valuable as means for obtaining eternal life” (Billot 1905). Henceforth, history is only history. And if this history has its theological secret, which is to shelter the “city* of God” in its temporal peregrinations, hope in no way ceases to give believers a manner of referring to definitive realities. The classical theology of hope (theology for which nothing that happens before death can be the object of a theological hope, except for that in the world that brings a person to their eternal beatitude) is not, however, the first word of theology, nor the last possible figure of a hope.

In the church’s beginnings, the millenarian temptation (that of waiting for a time before the end of time in which Christ visibly reigns amidst his people) was not that of a possible abolition of hope within a historical experience, but did lead to a new messianic dynamic of history. And although Joachim of Fiore’s new millenarianism* did not hope either that the eschaton would happen fully in the “age of the Spirit” that he foresaw, his hope did postulate that there were still divine promises that would be realized in a coming history (or even an imminent one). The former millenarianism was eventually considered incompatible with an orthodox Christian eschatology, and Joachimism emerged as early as the 13th century as a heterodox version of Christian hope. Nevertheless, the “spiritual posterity” (Lubac* 1979–80, already Löwith 1949) of a vision of history that greatly influenced the modern reorientations of Christian hope was more considerable than the critiques of Joachimism by Bonaventure (Ratzinger 1959) or Thomas Aquinas (Saranyana 1979). Is it possible to imagine a history that leaves nothing to hope for? Modern thought suggests this by acting as substitute for traditional theological discourse on history. Outlining an approach to the idea of universal history, Kant* observed that “philosophy* too has its millenarianism” (Weischedel VI, 45). For Hegel*, philosophy is written at the end of history; and if this end is not an end of time, it at least opens a new aeon in which no eschatological tension seems to be able to animate human beings anymore. For Schelling*, the pneumatological wealth of the present and the mysticism* of the “Johannic” church also loses interest in hope. This immediately implies a God that no longer imposes the duty to hope on man has died, favoring immanent processes that govern the world; it also implies that man can also understand and master, in a way that he gives himself reasons to hope. There was also a theological debate during the classical age, with the quietism* controversy, in which the defense and illustration of hope had significance for the decisions of the Roman magisterium* (DS 2201–69, 2351–74). When they pleaded for a spiritual experience influenced by “quietude,” the quietists or semiquietists seemed to disassociate man from his absolute future: pure love is given to God for the love of God, and not out of hope that God will fulfill promises; the “children” of God “love the Father* selflessly, not out of hope or fear*” (Fénelon, Explication des Maximes des Saints . . ., Ed. Chérel, Paris, 1911). The sustained language is in fact the language of eschatological anticipation, and therefore must be sustained with caution. Fénelon was right to recall the rights of mystical experience. These rights, however, can only be defended by simultaneously recalling that no kind of anticipation gives the mystic possession of his absolute future; the most “disinterested” hope continues to be a hope and proves that the praying figure today lives in the element of provisionality; all sound logic of spiritual life* must include a logic of eschatological desire.

The modern secularization* of hope was moreover accompanied by the disappearance of the idea of beatitude. With Fichte and also Hegel, it was possible for them to sustain the language of beatitude to express a philosophical experience that questioned the Absolute. But, when it involved giving a hope to human beings that divine promise no longer expresses, philosophy will promise them a bliss experienced in the shadow of death. Atheist and secularized eschatologies can certainly call on hope (see Bloch 1954–55). They can use the entire system of biblical images and symbols for their messianism. They can sustain the language of salvation (the world as laboratorium possibilis salutis). They can criticize the present in the name of an “ontology of being* that is not yet,” for which the basic formula is not about a subject receiving a predication (the sky is blue), but about the predication being not yet possible (the world is not yet man's happy home). Nevertheless, they come up against death as against what is unthinkable, which they can only silence or trivialize; and the hope to which they give rise is in fact the unhoped for.

d) Contemporary Trends. Theology responded to the secularization of eschatology by spectacularly reaffirming its own logos and by affirming the eschatological weight of all its discourse. However, this response is not unified, and clear tendencies emerge. 1) Confronting Heidegger*'s existential analytics on the one hand, and inheriting on the other hand a project of demythologization that goes back to the Enlightenment, Bultmann* considers the eschaton in the present: the existence that seizes what is most its own—that reaches its authenticity—is eschatological existence. The meaning of its present cannot only (Heidegger's lesson) unfold in this single present: eschatological existence must have its own relationship to the future. But just as traditional representations of the absolute future were rejected as mythological products, a theology in which the conceptual pairing “available” and “unavailable” (verfügbar/unverfügbar) replaced “natural” and “supernatural*” had nothing better to categorize, in terms of hope, than an opening to the future understood as an opening to the God who is coming. It is postulated that it dissipates fears of death (1961)—a hope that is weak enough to be manipulated by F. Buri, whose “dekerymatized” eschatology once again entrusted human beings with their own forces and offered a hope that was comparable to “new liberal Protestantism” (Dogmatik... III, 277–576). 2) In answer to theories for which the eschaton is a predicate of existence (Moltmann 1964; Metz 1968), there are theories for which the eschaton is the prolific instance of a historical practice. A concern for the “last things” comes first, because the first word belongs to the resurrection of Jesus. Hope, however, does not only hope for the last things. The time before the end of time—the time of the “second-to-last things”—should also be understood in light of theological hope: divine promises are not yet fulfilled. In theologies where “being itself must be considered from the future” (Pannenberg 1967), God and Christ therefore keep a “future,” and it is by being at the service of God's future (ibid.) that the Christian experiences hope. According to Bloch, man will, in the end, give himself a “homeland” (Bloch 1955). Theology has a twofold answer to the offer of a secularized Kingdom. It concedes, on the one hand, that the present realm of Christian experience is not the eschatological homeland, but affirms that Christian eschatological hope nevertheless has the status of a “historical force generating creative utopias” in world history (Moltmann 1969). On the other hand, it recalls that promises that allow for hope come from beyond death, in such a way that it would not be possible to experience the fulfillment of all these promises on this side of death.

The possibility of holding together this concession, this affirmation, and this reminder is without a doubt the articulus stantis et cadentis of such a theology. 3) Relearning to hope in the plural is not the smallest achievement of recent theology. The place of hope is the church, and being-in-the-church is being-in-communion. The idea of hoping to the end of one's eschatological destiny, and this idea only, is then clearly inconsistent. Formulated in 1689 by the Jesuit Th. Muniessa, then rediscovered and championed by P. Charles (1889–1954) (NRTh 1934, 1009–21 and 1937, 1057–75), the idea of a hope of Christ contradicts the Augustinian axiom according to which one hopes only for oneself (see Enchiridion ... PL 40, 235). And if Christ hoped (during his life on earth) and continues to hope (until the predestined have come into possession of celestial glory), it therefore means that the object of hope is not the eternal beatitude of the one who hopes, but the beatitude of all those who are capable of it. Hope, therefore, is found in the communion* of saints. In an almost purely philosophical analysis, G. Marcel also notes: “‘I hope in you for us’; this is perhaps the most adequate and developed expression of the act that the verb to hope still translates in a confused and general way” (1944). Balthasar* (1986) would also insist that the absolute future of others is not the object of eschatological speculations, but the object of a hope that applies to all. J. Daniélou (1905–74) had said it already: “Hope concerns the salvation of all men—and it is only in so far as I am included among them that it has any relevance for me” (Essai sur le mystère de l'histoire, Paris, 1953). 4) Continuing in the line of the theses of Muniessa and Charles, the classic theory that sees in hope a virtuous way to live in the element of the provisional had to be contested. Balthasar's christological interpretation of hope is mirrored by a threefold interpretation: the real secret of hope is the secret of a logic of giving, surrendering, and trusting in others in which one must see an image of divine life (1984). Rahner* had a similar suggestion. Considered as “a fundamental mode of the relationship to the definitive” (1967), Rahnerian hope is not understood in the light of an eschatological “possession” that is meant to abolish it, but is incorporated into a spiritual topology of that which is called to “abide” (1 Cor 13, 13): because God cannot be “possessed” and because he will eternally be “unavailable,” unverfügbar, hope belongs both to the temporary structure as it does to the definitive one. 5) Lastly, the concept of hope was not ignored by philosophers of the first half of the 20th century. In a Bergsonian perspective, E. Minkowski categorized the conversion of our “becoming” into a “future” (Lived Time, 1970). O.F. Bollnow (1941) sought to bring to light a hope lodged at the root of our emotional life. Pieper (1935) “gave new clothes” to a theory of “natural” hope that could be harmoniously joined to a theology of “supernatural” hope. B. Welte reflected on hope and despair as two original ways of being, and saw in it a need for and an appeal to salvation in a way that the philosophical description leads to the “threshold” of faith (1982), in any case, Lain-Entralgo’s conclusion echoes: “Man hopes, naturally, for something that transcends his nature; what is natural, in man, is to be open to the supernatural” (1956). A similar pathos also fills the writings of J. Monchanin: “Hope is consubstantial with the very movement that goes from matter to consciousness through life and ends with man going beyond himself, accepting to be polarized by the Absolute” (1949).

e) Questions. Philosophies of hope cannot, however, hide an important fact, and one that triggers a new hermeneutic situation. Do human beings hope a priori, in accordance with a transcendental determination of what they are? And does the kerygmatic work of theology consist in answering a vague hope, or in awakening hopes that are foreign to each other, by giving reasons to hope? This was the case, in the highly modern framework of a conflict of hopes in which it seemed absolutely established that man is a hopeful animal, and in which the only thing that mattered was proving that Christianity gives at least as much to hope for as secularized eschatologies and all historical progressivism (Moltmann, Metz, Lash, etc.). However, in the last years of the 20th century there emerged a questioning of all hope. After the time of the “principle of hope,” there came the time of the “principle of responsibility” (H. Jones); after the time of utopias, there came a time in which the highest human expectations were simply the expectations of successful communication (J. Habermas, K.O. Apel). Henceforth, it was only right to debate the possibility of hope as is: it was no longer appropriate to question what we could hope for (Kant), even supposing that we want to hope. Rather, it involved radically knowing if we are still able to hope, and who will give us reasons to do so. Theology classically sustained the language of hope by presupposing its intelligibility and was able in this way to give itself the sole task of manifesting the truth of its discourse. But as soon as precomprehensions and intuitions are lacking, a new endeavor emerges that dictates a new program for the fundamental* theology of hope: that of proving that the language of hope is a sensible language. Relying on one of the most venerable of Christian concepts, classical theological interpretation, with regard to hope, retained the language of fulfillment: the promises transmitted by Christianity came to satisfy a desire—for eternity, for beatitude—that is present in all human expectations. But if the time of the “death of God” is also the time when this desire is most denied, a new practical theology of hope becomes necessary, the first job of which is precisely that of learning how to hope.

However, the reasons of Christian hope are not commensurate with our present and are only revealed through an act of memory (e.g., H. Thielicke, Der ev. Glaube, v. III, Tübingen, 1978). And although the world no longer offers any prenotation of a possible hope, the wisest words are words of resignation (or of serenity: Heideggerian Gelassenheit), and although no theism any longer really has the means of offering a corresponding hope, it is before, in the “absolute past” of the “Jesus Christ event,” that a logic of hope can be formed again. To those who live in a time that leads them to death, the words of promise pronounced and proleptically fulfilled in the story of Jesus say that it is really a question of a pre-paschal time, of a being towards death that is not a being for death. Those who remember the Risen One remain mortal. But through memory they learn that their destiny is linked to his. Their faith, in a certain way, compels them to hope. (Lacoste 1990).

Perhaps such an epochal situation reveals, slightly better than others, the factual condition of man called to believe and hope in the time of the world. There is prestigious support for those who suggest that hope is essentially Christian. Pagan existence is defined in Ephesians 2:12 by atheism and lack of hope. In The Sickness unto Death, Kierkegaard* has only one thing to say: that despair is the secret of the pagan experience, including a paganism experienced at the heart of visible Christianity. And when (as Heidegger has it) man only exists within the limits of the world, while the concrete reality of all his hopes is measured by the single eschatology that henceforth remains, death and the whole idea of absolute future is integrated again in the notion of an “authentic” present for which death, understood as a final possibility, is the only master of meaning. The idea of a human nature that is essentially open to a supernatural destiny, from which stems the idea of a certain natural ability to hope, is not thereby invalidated: it is not the supposed omnipresence of a mental fact that is called upon to prove the existence and the topics of the desiderium naturale. But a shift is necessary. The one who speaks of being-in-the-world speaks of despair, or rather, unhope (G. Marcel). But the world (understood in both a New Testament and a phenomenological way) is what theological life partly allows to subvert the experience, in a subversion that returns man to the most profound determinations of his being—"authentic" existence is theological experience. The protologic a priori ("natural desire for the beatific* vision," and therefore transcendental hope) is an altered a priori that can be restored through an act of faith. The theological virtues come to man from outside himself—to awaken in him the fundamental acts of existence experienced before God and in the memory of the mystery* of Easter. In the experience of these virtues, man passes Dasein as he passes the "mortal."

- L. Billot (1905), De virtutibus infusis commentarius . . . , vol. 1, 2nd Ed., Rome, 355–85.
- J. Pieper (1935), Über die Hoffnung, Leipzig (Werke, vol. 4, Hamburg, 1996, 256–94).
- O.F. Bollnow (1941), Das Wesen der Stimmungen, Frankfurt (8th Ed. 1995).
- G. Marcel (1944), "Esquisse d'une phénoménologie et d'une métaphysique de l'espérance," in Homo Viator, Paris, 37–86 (2nd Ed. 1963).
- K. Löwith (1949), Meaning in History, Chicago.
- J. Monchanin (1949), "La crise de l'espérance," Église vivante 1, Louvain, 18–35.
- E. Bloch (1954–55), Das Prinzip Hoffnung, 2 vols., Frankfurt.
- R. Le Senne (1955), La découverte de Dieu, Paris, 249–78.
- P. Lain-Entralgo (1956), La Espera y la Esperanza, Madrid.
- J. Ratzinger (1959), Die Geschichtstheologie des heiligen Bonaventura, Munich-Zürich.
- R. Bultmann (1961), "Die christliche Hoffnung und das Problem der Entmythologisierung," GuV 3, 81–90.
- J. Moltmann (1964), Theologie der Hoffnung, Munich (8th Ed. 1969).
- G. Sauter (1965), Verheißung und Erfüllung: Das Problem der

Zukunft in der gegenwärtigen theologischen und philosophischen Diskussion, Zürich.

- W. Pannenberg (1967), "Der Gott der Hoffnung," Grundfr. Syst. Th., 387–98.
- K. Rahner (1967), "Zur Theologie der Hoffnung," Schr. zur Th. 8, 561–79.
- J. B. Metz (1968), Zur Theologie der Welt, Mainz (CFi 57).
- F. Kerstiens (1969), Die Hoffnungsstruktur des Glaubens, Mainz.
- J. I. Saranyana (1979), Joachin de Fiore y Tomas de Aquino: Historia doctrinal de una polemica, Pamplona.
- R. Schaeffler (1979), Was dürfen wir hoffen? Die katholische Theologie der Hoffnung zwischen Blochs utopischem Denken und der reformatorischen Rechtfertigungslehre, Darmstadt.
- K. M. Woschitz (1979), Elpis-Hoffnung: Geschichte, Philosophie, Exegese, Theologie eines Schlüsselbegriffs, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- H. de Lubac (1979–80), La postérité spirituelle de Joachim de Flore, Paris-Namur, 2 vols.
- B. Welte (1982), "Dasein als Hoffnung und Angst," in Zwischen Zeit und Ewigkeit, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 72–95.
- J. Ratzinger (1983), "Über die Hoffnung," IKaZ 13, 293–305 (Com[F] IX/4, 32–46).
- H. U. von Balthasar (1983), Theodramatik IV, Das Endspiel, Einsiedeln, 122–67, "Die Gestalt der christlichen Hoffnung."
- H. U. von Balthasar (1984), "Die Einheit der theologischen Tugenden," IKaZ 13, 306–14.
- N. Lash (1986), "All Shall Be Well: Christian and Marxist Hope," in Theology on the Way to Emmaus, London, 202–15.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1986), Was dürfen wir hoffen? Einsiedeln.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1990), Note sur le temps: Essai sur les raisons de la mémoire et de l'espérance, Paris.
- O. González de Cardedal (1995), Raíz de la esperanza, Salamanca.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Beatitude; Eschatology; Faith; History; Love

Hugh of Saint-Victor. See Saint-Victor, School of

Humanism, Christian

According to classic historiography, an educational revolution started in western Europe during the second half of the 15th century and continued throughout the 16th century. Due, above all, to the rediscovery of ancient languages, advocated and taught by teachers of the studia humanitatis—the humanists—it then flourished as the movement of thought that historians have labeled “humanism.” In fact, the noun was coined in Germany during the Enlightenment, while “humanist” entered into general use during the Renaissance. However, it should not be forgotten that during this period the advocates of Christian humanism, who were not all professional teachers, although they were concerned to teach and to communicate, shared a number of convictions that formed a coherent vision, a type of theological anthropology*, and believed that they could rediscover within it the major intuitions of the Bible* and the church fathers*. Whether in terms of method or of content, the Christian humanism of the Renaissance meant a return to the sources.

Humanism was often grounded in an opposition to medieval Scholasticism*, which it displayed with varying degrees of discretion, and defined its method as a return to the sources of pagan and Christian antiquity. This meant, first of all, a return to the Bible, or, more precisely, to its original texts, which the supremacy of the Vulgate had supplanted. The point of departure for this enterprise was provided by Lorenzo Valla’s comparison of the text of Jerome’s Latin translation of the New Testament with the Greek manuscripts, and his discovery of inaccuracies in the former. In 1504, the discovery of the versions of Valla’s work led Erasmus* to translate the New Testament, annotate and paraphrase it, and make it the center of his theology. Biblical studies developed from this point on, thanks to innumerable new translations* into Latin, which were more accurate or more classical than the older ones, and then, soon after, into vernacular languages. Humanist “workshops” were set in motion, compiling multilingual Bibles, as at Alcalá and then at Anvers. At the Dominican friary of San Marco in Florence, Sante Pagnini completed translations that had an influence throughout the 16th century.

Numerous Greek scholars who fled from the Turkish conquest of Constantinople (1453) arrived in western Europe and taught their language there, making a significant contribution to the fashion for Greek that accompanied the rediscovery, not only of the Greek Fathers, but also of the philosophers of antiquity, and of a more precise approach to texts and manuscripts. Marsilio Ficino reinterpreted Plato and the neo-Platonists; Lefèvre d’Étaples provided a pedagogic presentation of Aristotle; Johann Reuchlin rediscovered Pythagoras. This German humanist also took an interest in Hebrew, and in the texts of the Talmud and the Cabala.

This general curiosity was in danger of spreading itself too thinly, yet it was an indication of a positive attitude to learning. Christian humanists wanted to find “prefigurings of the Gospel” in the pagan authors, but in the course of comparing them, dating them, and seeking to understand the meanings intended by all these authors, whatever they might be, they also tended to adopt a more historical approach. The period of the Renaissance was the age of perspective, which had arisen within Italian painting, and which inevitably signified distanciation, the involvement of the spectator, and a certain relativization of the object. From the second half of the 15th century onward, the invention of printing increasingly allowed an unprecedented diffusion of these texts and ideas. All these means, methods, and multipliers were based on a theological vision that, beginning with meditation upon the Incarnation*, recognized the dignity and liberty* of created human beings and sought to lead human beings to charity, the founding principle of authentic peace*.

a) Dignity and Liberty of Human Beings. The theme of human dignity was frequently addressed in the Italian Renaissance of the 15th century. For example, Bartolomeo Fazio (1442) and Gianozzo Manetti (1452) both exalted “the excellence of man.” However, it was Giovanni Pico della Mirandola above all who developed this theme, in his Oratio de dignitate hominis (1486; Oration on the Dignity of Man). Pico, who was a friend of Ficino’s, but not one of his disciples, since he preferred to be a disciple of Savonarola, asserts that dignity is not simply a quality of humanity, but is part of its very being*. Human beings have been created by God* to love and admire creation*; they are themselves microcosms of creation because of their noble intelligence. Their intellects have their origin in God, one and triune, who has created humanity “in his image.”

Human dignity in turn forms the basis for human liberty, a liberty that in reality is an existence characterized by metamorphosis and oscillation, for human beings partake of two different worlds, and are halfway between God and the animals. In their liberty, human beings choose between becoming like animals and being transfigured. Their greatness lies precisely in the fact that, being their own masters, they choose for themselves the forms that they prefer. In this way, Pico expresses both the open-ended nature of humanity and its divine vocation.

The Christian humanists coupled their affirmation of liberty with a more technical defense of free will. Valla had already written on this subject in his De libertate arbitrii (On Free Will), in which he asserted that God’s foreknowledge does not impose any constraints on our will. In his polemic with Luther*, who accused him of Pelagianism*, Erasmus defended, with a seriousness that was unusual for him, the idea that the humanists regarded as the very core of Christian anthropology and the logic of creation: that God himself saves and renews the liberty of the creature that reflects his image, with a mercy* that is so generous as to make human beings collaborators in their own salvation*. Even so, contrary to what Luther thought, the cross of Christ* is not eliminated. If God indeed crowns Christ’s own merits by crowning the merits of human beings, then those merits have some substance after all. The Council of Trent* reaffirmed this conviction of the Christian humanists who had preceded it, although in more scholastic terms, by specifying the notions of merit and works*, which come together in charity (love*).

b) From Philautia to Charity. Christian humanists took a dynamic, plenary, theological view of charity, rejecting the egotism and self-love that the Renaissance, following the Greek fathers, called philautia. In the Tiers Livre (Third Book) of Rabelais’s Gargantua and Pantagruel, Panurge embodies this bad choice: “Philautia and self-love deceive you” (ch. XIX). Trapped between marriage* and celibacy, in an ego-centric perplexity, Panurge is possessed by his love for himself. Like Erasmus, Rabelais recommends what seems to human beings to be folly: “Forget yourself, go outside yourself. . . . That which vulgarly is imputed to folly” (ch. XXXVII). Thus, charity is taught by the poor in spirit, in the Sermon on the Mount, the foundation of “Christ’s philosophy.” The Kingdom* of God is made for pure and charitable hearts that liberate themselves from philautia by fulfilling God’s will. Entry into the abbey of Thelema, whose name means “will,” is forbidden to “hypocrites,” who had already been rejected in the Gospel. The abbey’s motto, “Do what thou wilt,” should be understood as choosing God’s will, that is, charity.

Just as Thomas More’s Utopia is a subtle humanist construction, intended to show the community of believers that part of the righteousness of the Kingdom that natural reason* already permits us to prefigure and to realize, so Rabelais’s utopia affirms its grounding in human nature solely in order to provide a broader vision of the Gospel ideal. Rabelais’s comedy, with its sexual and scatological jokes, should be seen as a continual reminder of the animal nature of humanity united with the spirit. For Rabelais as for Pico, humanity is truly copula mundi. This human comedy, which is both humanist and Christian (Screech 1979), suggests that it is only through Christian wisdom* that human beings can recall their place in creation and in God’s plan.

c) Harmony, Concord, and Utopia. Christian humanism was stamped with the seal of an optimism that one could characterize as theological, and sought harmony. Pico della Mirandola was obsessed with reconciling Plato and Aristotle, yet this young philosopher, writing to Aldus Manutius, shows that he was aware that revelation* alone provides the key to the unity of human thought: “philosophy seeks truth, theology finds it, religion possesses it.” This truth is Christ, principle of synthesis and Prince of Peace. Indeed, in Pico’s writings the quest for unity is combined with a desire for religious concord, and he places himself in the tradition that runs from Nicholas* of Cusa to Jean Bodin.

Lefèvre d’Étaples, the first person to edit Nicholas of Cusa’s writings, had a similar aim. His hermeneutic ideal (hermeneutics*) was to reconcile literal exegesis* with spiritual meaning. He raised “concordance of the scriptures” to the level of a principle of interpretation in order to combine the Old and New Testaments in a single view of Christ. In addition, Lefèvre sought to avoid opposition between faith* and works when commenting on the Epistle of James. Luther’s disciple Philipp Melancthon also tried to avoid sacrificing free will for the sake of justification* by faith.

This aspiration to reconciliation and unity, which was an aspiration to the coming of the Kingdom of God, is reflected in the architectural and social reveries of utopias, whether carved in stone or written on paper, from Pope Pius II’s (unfinished) city of Pienza to the works of More (1516) and Campanella (1602). Erasmus was a pacifist and a precursor of toleration, as was logical for one who gave primacy to charity, even though it led to accusations of relativism*.

It is a paradox that the 16th century was precisely the age of the great religious rift in western Europe. By the end of the century, the enthusiasm that had given rise to predictions of the return of the golden age had disappeared. The age of another type of genius had arrived—the age of Montaigne, Cervantes, and Shakespeare, in whose works it is more difficult to pinpoint Christian ideas. The mystic* and pastor* François de Sales (Salesian spirituality*) retained the dynamism of early humanism with a balance that was both a maturation and a transcendence of the humanist movement. Touched by the grace of the imitation* of Christ, he taught humility and also stood witness to it. In the last months of his life, he wanted to write a sequel to his Traité de l'amour de Dieu, an Histoire théandrique in four volumes, but did not have the time to achieve what would have been a summary of devout humanism, giving shape to the intuitions of nearly 200 years of Christian humanism.

- C. Vasoli (1968), La dialettica e la retorica dell'Umanesimo, Turin.

- H. de Lubac (1974), Pic de la Mirandole, Paris.
A. Prévost (1978), L'Utopie de Thomas More, Paris.
M. A. Screech (1979), Rabelais, London.
J.-C. Margolin (1981), L'humanisme en Europe au temps de la Réforme, Paris.
C. B. Schmitt (1983), Aristotle and the Renaissance, Cambridge, Mass., London.
L. W. Spitz (1986), "Humanismus/Humanismusforschung," TRE 15, 639–61 (bibl.).
G. Bedouelle and B. Roussel (Ed.) (1989), Le temps des Réformes et la Bible, Paris.
J. Pic de La Mirandole (1993), Œuvres philosophiques (Ed. O. Boulnois and G. Tognon), Paris.
B. Pinchard and S. Ricci (Ed.) (1993), Rationalisme analogique et humanisme théologique: La culture de Thomas de Vio "Il Gaetano", Naples.
G. Fraccadori (Ed.) (1994), Bessarione e l'umanesimo, Naples.
E. Rummel (1995), The Humanist-Scholastic Debate in the Renaissance and Reformation, Cambridge, Mass.

GUY BEDOUELLE

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Erasmus, Desiderius; Platonism, Christian; Skepticism, Christian; Stoicism, Christian

Humility. See Bernard of Clairvaux

Hus, Jan

c. 1369–1415

The Czech theologian Jan Hus (from Husinec in Bohemia) was condemned by the Council of Constance* and burned alive. His death and that of his friend Jerome of Prague, burned in Constance a year later, were one of the causes of the Hussite rising of 1419. Hus's supporters joined forces with the advocates of Wycliffism to create a Hussite movement that broke with the papacy. This led to the organization under the Emperor Sigismund of Luxembourg of a series of crusades against Bohemia. As a result Czechs consider Hus a martyr* for truth*, for the national cause, and for reform.

Hus studied under the direction of Stanislav of Znojmo, the first important Wycliffite at Prague. John Wycliffe (1328–84), the English reformer, had become master of arts in 1361 and doctor of theology in 1372. Entering the service of the Crown as ambassador to Gregory XI, he opposed the policies of France and of the papacy. Against nominalism* he championed an extreme realism. Universals were of two kinds, uncreated and created: the first were identical to the divine Ideas, the second had real existence in the form of singular beings, from which they were strictly distinct.

Between the two extended the analogical being*, created instantaneously, in which resided the types of the genera and species according to which God* created singular beings.

Wycliffe argued for a return to Augustine* and to the Bible*, and in his De benedicta incarnatione (1370) undertook a Platonist synthesis of philosophy* and theology.* His work had strong political implications, as the titles De dominio divino (1375), De civili dominio (1376), De officio regis (1378), and De potestate papae (1379) clearly show. Wycliffe's God exercised his power directly over all earthly possessions, without the pope*'s mediation. Kings were therefore accountable only to God, and the church had no right to own property. Wycliffe's (Ghibelline) position was close to that of Marsilius of Padua. The true church was the sum of the faithful in a state of grace, the "assembly of the predestined"; and since God alone was the cause of predestination*, human beings could not hope to join the community of the elect other than by attempting to imitate Christ*. The holding of church office should be the simple consequence of a life of grace*, and so was annulled by mortal sin*. Because clerical abuses and the scandal of the Schism* were making church reform a matter of urgency, Wycliffe proposed a return to the ancient church, that of the time before the Donation of Constantine, which implied an abandonment of the hierarchical structure. Since the forgiveness of sins issued directly from God without human mediation, there was no reason for indulgences*. And since none other than God could rightly designate the pope, it would be better if he were chosen by lot. Already critical of the papacy, which he saw as an "addition" to the evangelical truths, Wycliffe's attitude developed markedly at the time of the Schism. Henceforth the pope himself, rather than the antipope, was the Antichrist.

Wycliffe seems to have acknowledged the sacraments*, on condition that the priest* be in a state of grace, without which they had a merely moral value. He confessed the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist* but criticized theories of transubstantiation. He understood the body of Christ to be really present in the nature of the bread, but present by its power (virtualiter) and not in substance—since by reason of its magnitude the nature of Christ was to be found only in heaven. He acknowledged the sacrament of confession, but recommended that it take place in public. He coordinated the propagation of his ideas by sending out his disciples, the "Lollards," to preach in the countryside. But their preaching* turned into social revolt (the Peasants' Revolt of 1381). Condemned by the archbishop of Canterbury in 1382, and struck by paralysis, he died in 1384. The Council of Constance (1415) repeated the condemnation of his writings. But his teachings were spread by clandestine circles in Oxford. There his works were incessantly copied—at just the time when Anne of Bohemia, wife of Richard II, was drawing the Czech elite to her court in England. They were subsequently circulated in central Europe and inspired the Hussite movement.

Hus became master of arts at Prague in 1396, and was appointed dean of the faculty in 1401 and rector of the university in 1409. He was ordained priest in 1400 and studied theology, though events prevented him from attaining the level of doctor. In 1402 he was appointed rector and preacher of the Bethlehem Chapel, founded to "offer the Czech population religious instruction in its native language" (De Vooght). This activity gave rise to a series of conflicts with the clergy, exacerbated by a crisis in the church* that was then reaching its peak (the rivalry between the three popes), by the weakening of the royal power, and by divisions within the university. Hus then became the leader of the reformists, mostly followers of Wycliffe, who gathered around him in his role of professor. He broke with Archbishop Zbynek, whose most valued collaborator he had been for the previous five years. In Prague, where several reformers before him had announced the imminent arrival of the Antichrist, Hus identified Zbynek's cause with that of the Antichrist. His open opposition to the archbishop, as well as his public criticism of John XXII's pseudo-Crusade against the King of Naples and of the selling of indulgences that was intended to underwrite it, earned him three excommunications, including a major one in 1412. At this point he exiled himself from Prague. Two years later he attended the Council of Constance, where he was imprisoned, tried, condemned to death, and executed on 6 July 1415. This sequence of conflicts shows that for Hus there was always an authority* higher than the one that judged and punished him at each stage. Thus he appealed against his bishop* to the pope, and against the pope to the forthcoming general council, ending at Constance with a solemn appeal to Jesus Christ.

Hus was completely bilingual, writing in Latin and Czech and translating into the latter. His academic works comprise occasional speeches, sermons, polemical texts, and questions, a Quodlibet (1411) debated in the Faculty of Arts, a commentary on the Sentences (1407–8), and a treatise, De ecclesia (1413), that was censured at Prague, Paris, and Constance. Apart from the sermons his Czech works include spiritual writings and works of exegesis*. His doctrines, as much philosophical as theological, are influenced by Wycliffe, although the nature and extent of this influence are disputed.

His commentary on the Sentences is conventional, however. For example, he makes no mention of Wycliffe's doctrine of the two stages of the Creation (in any case of Augustinian origin), or that of a created world that cannot be annihilated by God, while accepting their philosophical consequences—the concept of analogical being (not to be confused with the analogy* of being) and the realism of the genera and species. This same prudence can be observed in Hus's reformist activities: while a formidable critic of the clergy, the practice of simony, indulgences, and excommunications (at that time numerous and improperly applied), he was also a timid traditionalist who acknowledged the priestly function and the authority of the hierarchy*.

Before and after the Council of Constance Hus's opponents criticized him for his realist conception of the universals, accusing him of considering them as eternal and uncreated beings, existing independently of God*. He is usually spoken of as displaying an "extreme realism," without going into more detail. In fact in Hus's terms, just as in Wycliffe's, genera and species exist either in the analogical being ("the first created thing," according to the Book of Causes), or in singular things. In the first case they are the models for the singular things; in the second they have real, but formal, existence. The formal distinction (see Duns* Scotus), accepted by the whole Wycliffite school, is thus of primary importance. Pierre d'Ailly attempted to draw a connection between Hus's realism and the doctrine according to which the actual substances of the bread and wine remain after the eucharistic consecration—but in fact Hus constantly and clearly rejected this view, and this despite the opinion of several Prague theologians.

Hus defined the universal Church as the totality of the predestined living in the past, present, and future. To this concept he contrasted that of the local* church, in either a geographical or a moral sense; as in, for example, a gathering of several of the predestined (De ecclesia, c. 1). In absolute terms the unity of the former "consists of the unity of predestination*...and the unity of beatitude*." In temporal terms, "it consists of the unity of faith* and virtues*, and of the unity of charity" (c. 2). "Gathered and united by the bond of predestination," the members of the church constituted the mystical body of which Christ alone was the head (c. 3). Analysis of the concepts of the universal Church, faith, foundation, and ecclesiastical power led Hus to rule out any identification of the Roman Catholic Church with the church of the predestined (c. 7–11).

Hus's ecclesiology* poses numerous problems of interpretation, however, and its analysis often depends on the personal convictions of the historian. The non-Catholic tradition points to the place occupied in Hus's thought by the concept of predestination, the importance of his distinction between the state of grace and that of mortal sin* as a means of legitimizing (or not) ecclesiastical and civil power, the resemblances to Wycliffe's doctrines, the interpretation of simony as a heresy*, the possibility of an appeal to Christ, and so on. The Catholic interpretation of Hus, on the other hand, seeks to put his ecclesiology back in a traditional* context, and makes an effort to distinguish his actual assertions from the implications of his text—and from the accusations of his opponents. It attaches great importance to the precise analysis of Hus's language and of the limits of Wycliffe's influence. On occasion it even replaces historical analysis with a reference to the current state of theological knowledge. In short, the non-Catholic tradition emphasizes the factors that distance Hus from the Catholic Church, while the Catholic reading points out those that bring him close to it.

- P. Spunar (1996), Repertorium auctorum Bohemorum provecum idearum post Universitatem Pragensem conditam illustrans, I, Wrocław, Polish Academy of Science, 211–13.
- Hus, Opera omnia, unfinished work by W. Flajshans and M. Komínková, 8 vols., Prague, 1903–7.
- Hus, Opera omnia, Académie des sciences, vol. 1 and 4, 7–9 (Sermones de tempore, Passio Christi, Lectionum pars prima), 13 (Postilla adumbrata), and 22 (Polemica), Prague, 1959–.
- Hus, Tractatus responsivus, Ed. S. Harrison Thomson, Prague, 1927.
- Hus, Quodlibet, Ed. B. Ryba, Prague, 1948.
- Hus, Tractatus de ecclesia, Ed. S. Harrison Thomson, Cambridge, Mass., 1956 (same text in the Prague edition, 1958).
- Wyclif, The Latin Works, 35 vols., London, 1883–1922, repr. Frankfurt, 1964.
- Hus, Tractatus de Universalibus, Ed. I. J. Mueler, Oxford, 1985.
- ♦ M. Vischer (1955), J. Hus, Aufruhr wider Papst und Reich, Frankfurt.
- P. De Vooght (1960), L'hérésie de Jean Huss, Louvain (2nd Ed. 1975).
- P. De Vooght (1960), Hussiana, Louvain (2nd Ed. 1975).
- M. Spinka (1966), John Hus' Concept of the Church, Princeton, N.J.
- P. De Vooght (1969), "Huss (Jean)," DSp 7/1, 1194–1200.
- J. Macek (1973), Jean Hus et les traditions hussites, Paris.
- W.R. Thomson (1983), The Latin Writings of John Wyclif: An Annotated Catalog, Toronto.
- E. Werner (1991), "Jan Hus im Spiegel moderner Historiographie," Heresis: Revue d'hérésiologie médiévale 16, 37–54.
- Fr. Machilek (1986), "Hus/Hussiten," TRE 15, 710–35.
- O. Chaline (1998), La reconquête catholique de l'Europe centrale (XVIe-XVIIIe s.), Paris.

ZÉNON KALUZA

See also Constance, Council of; Ecclesiology; Predestination; Protestantism

Hutterians. See Anabaptists

Hypostasis. See Person

Hypostatic Union

a) In Cyril of Alexandria and until Ephesus. Hypostatic union is the expression used since the Council of Ephesus* to designate the union of the divine and the human in one single entity, Christ* (DS 250). It translates in technical terms the statement of John's gospel*, "And the Word* became flesh" (1, 14), as well as the confession (creeds*) of the Council of Nicaea*, "One Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God*, the only-begotten of the Father*,...who for us men and for our salvation* came down from Heaven, became incarnate, and was made a man" (DS 125). This formula answers the question: under what condition was born of Mary, in time, the very one and the same who is begotten by the Father from all eternity? How can one and the same being be true God and true man?

The hypostatic union, as understood by Cyril* and the Council of Ephesus, implies a number of givens that are closely linked: 1) Christ was not made of two concrete coexisting beings, as if the Son of God and Christ were "one and another"; or as if the Word, instead of becoming man, had merged with one particular man. 2) The union is so intimate that it occurs at the level of the very act of subsisting, where the Word "claims temporal birth as its own," and not at the level of natures, divinity and humanity remaining intact and distinct. 3) The act of subsisting can only be that of the Word, the eternal Son, who imprints on humanity his very own act of existing. 4) The humanity of Jesus has no existence prior to the Incarnation*, nor independently of the fact that the Word assumes it as his own. 5) The properties of the two natures communicate between themselves indirectly, through the intermediary of the subject, "the one who exists"—for example, the temporal birth of the Word is said to be of the Word or of God, not of divinity, as attested by Mary's title of "Mother of God" (theotokos) recognized by the church*.

b) Etymology of the Term "hypostasis." The notion of hypostasis had traveled a long road before Christ; it was first introduced into christology*, according to M. Richard (1945), to designate the principle of existence or reality as opposed to phusis or the essence of a thing. The term, borrowed from Greek natural science, was first synonymous with "precipitation," with obvious implications of solidification and manifestation. Subsequently, it meant for the Stoics the last stage of the individualization of an essence. With Origen* (Contra Celsum 8, 12: SC 150, 201), and then the Cappadocians, Christian theology* used the term to characterize the entities Persons of the Trinity* as against the essence (ousia) of divinity. The teaching of Christ, initially proposing itself perhaps rather more in a category of intuition than of definition, later constituted a decisive contribution that subsequent councils—from Chalcedon* to Constantinople* III—only revived and deepened.

c) Modern Difficulties. The hypostatic union, with the hegemony of the divine element that it entails, has seemed in our own time to endanger the authenticity of Christ's humanity or deprive it of the solidity that the personality gives it. Besides the fact that the old, purely ontological meaning of person does not agree with the modern psychological understanding, it has been argued that "affirming the transcendence of the divine subject to include hypostatic union is both a warrant of the independence of man and the alterity of God" (R. Virgoulay, RSR 28, 1980). On the other hand, the humanity that the Word assumes, far from being depersonalized, in fact endows the entity with the personality that gives it existence.

d) Recent Reformulation. Relying on the fundamental identity of being* and consciousness, and deriving from that, as the principal model of being, not the opaque thing itself but the cognizant and free subject, K. Rahner* has attempted an "ontological" transposition of the doctrine of the hypostatic union. Expressed until then in terms of an "ontic" mode, for Rahner the hypostatic union is like the union of a question with its absolute answer. The question is human nature, whose entire pursuit of knowledge* and love* is polarized and animated by the quest for God. Human nature in itself is a fundamental act of transcendence, received from God and turned toward him. The answer lies in God's self-communication to the opening that he creates, in this case, to be welcomed as an absolute gift.

Since the question is an intrinsic part of the answer, it is simultaneously the distinctive reality of God and a reality governed by him from the very beginning.

For Donald Baillie, who has considerably influenced the Anglo-Saxon world, the "paradox of grace*" is supremely at play in the Incarnation. While God in his grace creates in man that for which he himself is fully responsible (1 Cor 15:10), God is fully present in the particular man Jesus, who "always does that which is pleasing to God" (1948). But others have wondered why the constancy of the action would introduce anything else but a degree of difference between the condition of Christ and that of Christians (Robinson 1966).

- A. Michel (1922), "Hypostatique (Union)," DThC 7/1, 437–568.
- M. Richard (1945), "L'introduction du mot 'hypostase' dans la théologie de l'incarnation," MSR 2, 5–32, 243–70.
- D. M. Baillie (1948), God Was in Christ, London.
- M. Nédoncelle (1948), "Prosopon et persona dans l'Antiquité classique," RevSR 22, 277–99.
- H. N. G. Robinson (1966), Theologians of Our Time, Edinburgh.
- J. Meyendorff (1969), Le Christ dans la théologie byzantine, Paris.
- K. Rahner (1977), Grundkurs des Glaubens, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- A. de Halleux (1992), "Les douze chapitres cyrilliens au concile d'Éphèse (430–33)," EThL 23, 425–58.

GILLES LANGEVIN

See also Anhypostasy; Christ and Christology; Constantinople II, Council of; Cyril of Alexandria; Ephesus, Council of; Trinity

Icons. See Images; Nicaea II, Council of

Idealism. See Realism

Idioms, Communication of

This phrase explains one of the classical practices used to express the conviction that Jesus* is a single person* who is at once both fully divine and fully human: attributes predicated of him as a man are associated with titles denoting him as God* and reciprocally. Based on an understanding of Jesus's ontological status that is at the center of Christianity, it is essentially a rule of language* that allows the use of deliberately paradoxical phrases, such as referring to Mary as "Mother of God" or affirming that "one of the Trinity died on the cross."

(a) New Testament. The beginning of this practice can be discerned in the New Testament, where such paradoxical phrases are used to underscore the true identity of Jesus, the crucified Messiah (messianism/Messiah*): for example, Acts 3:15 ("You asked for a murderer to be granted to you, and you killed the Author of life"), 1 Corinthians 2:8 ("They would not have crucified the Lord of glory"), and Romans 9:5, as it was usually understood by early Christianity ("From their Jewish race, according to the flesh, is the Christ who is God over all"). The presupposition behind such phrases is that Jesus has his origin in, and is identified with, the mystery* of God (see Lk 1: 35, Jn 1:14, Phil 2:5–11, Ti 2:13).

(b) Patristic Usage. The first to notice this practice explicitly, and to formulate the reason for it, was Origen* (De principiis II, 6, 3). To emphasize the degree to which the Son of God has become identified with the soul (soul*-heart-body) of Jesus and with “the flesh that it has taken,” one can actually say that “the Son of God has died” and that the Son* of man “will come in the glory of God the Father”; “for this reason,” says Origen, “throughout the whole of scripture* we see the divine nature spoken of in human terms, and the human nature in its turn adorned with marks that belong to the divine.”

During the age of christological controversies in the fifth century, in which the school of Antioch* opposed the school of Alexandria*, this paradoxical exchange of attributes played a major role in the intensification of the debate. The school of Antioch displayed great reluctance about the idea that God had truly taken part in human history, particularly in physical submission and suffering; against this position, Cyril* of Alexandria insisted on the importance of the description of Mary as “mother of God,” which Nestorius had called into question, and also insisted that “the flesh of the Lord gives life,” and that “the Word of God suffered in the flesh and was crucified in the flesh,” because the Word* forms only a hypostasis or concrete individual with its “flesh” or humanity (ep. 3, to Nestorius, anath. 1, 2, 11, 12). This principle was accepted, not without hesitation, by the theologians of Antioch Theodore of Mopsuestia (hom. cat. 6, 7) and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (Eranistes, dial. 3).

It was only in the sixth century that the vocabulary of Porphyry and of Neoplatonism (Christian Platonism*) began to be used to indicate the ontological basis of this phraseology, under the name of “communication of idioms.” In Neoplatonic terms, an individual (atomon, hypostasis) is defined and even constituted by the “specific traits” (idia, idiomata) that permit him to be recognized (Porphyry, Isagoge, CAG IV, 3, 90, 6f.). According to Leontius of Byzantium, because the unique hypostasis of Christ concretely unites divine nature with human nature “their characteristic traits idiomata are common to both of them,” while each nature remains unchanged in respect of its own traits (Epil., PG 86, 1941 A; Contra Nest. et Eut., PG 86, 1289 C6–8). For the Greek Scholasticism* of the sixth century, as for later theological tradition, to speak of mutual “communication” (antidosis) or “exchange” (perikhoresis) of “idioms” between the two natures of Christ did not mean that there was any change in these natures, nor did it mean attributing traits that were foreign to them. It was simply a way of showing that the unique person of Christ, who could legitimately receive both human titles and divine titles, possesses in himself all the qualities of both natures.

(c) Later Usage. Since the sixth century, this theological principle, reaffirmed at the Second Council of Constantinople* (553), has been one of the touchstones of christological orthodoxy* for the Orthodox, Catholics, and Protestants alike. It also lies behind the paradoxes that poets and preachers have been happy to evoke in respect of Christ, above all at Christmas (e.g., Gregory* of Nazianzus, De oratione 38, 13; Augustine*, Sermons 184, 3; 187, 1; 191, 1), and it explains the practices of piety in which certain aspects of the humanity of Jesus are adored, such as the sacred heart (heart* of Jesus) or the Precious Blood.

- Gregory of Nyssa, Contra Eunomium III, 4, 64, GNO II, 158 Sq; A Théophile, GNO III/1, 137 Sq.
- John of Damascus, Expositio fidei, 47 s., in Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos (B. Kotter, Ed.), Berlin, 1973, II, 115–18; Contra Jacobitas 81, Kotter IV, Berlin, 1981, 138 Sq.
- Leo the Great, Tomus ad Flavianum 5, ACO II/2, 1, 29.
- Leontius of Byzantium, Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos, PG 86, 1289 B2–D3; Epiluseis, PG 86, 1940 C11–1941 A14, 1945 B4–D6.
- Leontius of Jerusalem, Contra monophysitas 25, PG 86, 1785 B14–D1.
- Maximus the Confessor, Opuscula, PG 91, 189 C8–192 A15; 237 D8–240 A9; Dialogue with Pyrrhus, PG 91, 296 D4–297 A6.
- Origen, De principiis II, 6, 3, SC 252, 314 Sq.
- Pseudo-Cyrille (VIIth c.), De Trinitate 27, PG 77, 1172 A7–D14.
- Theodoret, Eranistès, Dial. III, Ed. G. Ettliger, Oxford, 1975, 226 Sq.
- Theodotus of Ancyra, Expositio symboli nicaeni 16, PG 77, 1336 D4–11.
- Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica IIIa, q. 16 (especially a. 4).
- ♦ A. Michel (1922), “Idiomes (communication des),” DThC 7/1, 595–602.
- K. Barth (1955), KD IV/2, 79–91 (Dogmatique, Geneva, 1968).
- A. Grillmeier (1979, 1989), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I, II/2, Freiberg-Basel-Vienna.

BRIAN E. DALEY SJ

See also Anhypostasy; Chalcedon, Council of; Christ and Christology; Constantinople II, Council of; Ephesus, Council of; Hypostatic Union; Nestorianism

Idolatry

a) Vocabulary Is Varied—It May Be Either Concrete or Metaphorical. To describe an idol in material terms the MT speaks of çèlèm, sculpture or engraving (Nm 33:52); of ‘açabbîm, sculptures (2 Sm 5:21); and more rarely (five times) of sèmèl, image (Dt 4:16); but above all of massékâh, cast metalwork (Ex 32:4, 8) and pèsèl, sculpture in stone (Is 21:9) or wood (40:20). A value judgment is implied by the terms gilloûlîm, filth (Lv 26:30), ‘èlîlîm, worthless objects (Lv 19, 4), shiqqouç, horror (Ez 20:7s.), to‘ebâh, abomination (Is 44:19), hèbèl, vanity (Jer 10:14–15), or by the expression ma-aséy yâdèykâ, work of your hands (Dt 31:29; Mi 5:12; Is 2:8; Jer 25:6). People make (‘asâh) an idol (1 Kgs 14:9), follow it (Jer 2:5, 23, 25), prostrate themselves before it (Is 44:17), and serve it (‘âbad: Ez 20:39). To do so is to prostitute oneself (zânâh: Ez 20:30), to commit adultery (nâ’af: Jer 3:9), and to provoke the jealousy of YHWH (qn’hifl: Ps 78:58).

The Septuagint employs the classical terms agalma, statue (Is 21:9) and eikon, image (Dt 4:16) but introduces the term eidolon in the sense of idol (image in classical Greek). The New Testament, meanwhile, gives us the words idolater (seven, including Eph 5:5) and idolatry (four, including Col 3:5).

b) History. In ancient times there was some use of representations in the worship of YHWH. The golden calf (Ex 32) was not seen by Aaron as a case of religious infidelity, since the animal (animals*) symbolized the pedestal of the unrepresented deity. The same may have been true of the two golden calves erected at Bethel and Dan by Jeroboam after the schism* of 931 (1 Kgs 12:28f.). At the time of the Judges, Micah (Jgs 17–18) had at home a representation of YHWH (or of his bovine pedestal) in carved wood covered in silver. He also had an ‘éfôd and some terâfîm (Jgs 17:3ff.): the l’‘éfôd (see Jgs 8:27) may have been the covering of a statue, and the terâfîm, mentioned as early as the time of Jacob (Rachel’s theft: Gn 31:19, 34), may have been household idols. These objects would have been used for divination (1 Sm 15:23). Tolerated initially (Hos 3:4; 1 Sm 19:13–16; 21:10), in time they were proscribed (1 Sm 15:23; 2 Kgs 23:24). The same went for the bronze serpent destroyed by Hezekiah (2 Kgs 18:4). On the other hand, the cherubim (Ex 25:18; Ez 10:18) placed on the ark of the covenant*, and later interpreted as angels*, were accepted. The disappearance of any other representation from the worship of YHWH is a result of their prohibition by the Ten Commandments (Decalogue*) (Ex 20:4; Dt 5:8, of disputed date). In any case the prophets (prophet and prophecy*) of the eighth century attacked such representations (Hos 8:5; 10:5f., 13:2; Am 8:14). They were derisively regarded as idols for which the glory* of YHWH had been bartered (Hos 4:7; Jer 2:11; Ps 106:20; see Rom 1:23).

The Hebrews’ neighbors, and the peoples whose territories they conquered, did make representations of their own gods, most often in human form: the statue of Dagon (1 Sm 5:1–4) is one of the earliest examples. Throughout the whole royal period a religious struggle was waged against pagan cults. The Canaanite influence, with Baal, Astarte, and Asherah, remained strong for a long time, and latterly (Am 5:26, quoted in Acts 7:43) Assyrian deities were introduced. Elijah fought against the cult of Baal in defense of the one religion* of YHWH, but it was apparently only after his time, in the eighth century, that attempts were made to stamp out idols. The kings had introduced these idolatrous practices: Solomon (1 Kgs 11:5–8; 2 Kgs 23:13), Athaliah (idol of Baal: 2 Kgs 11:18), Ahaz (idol of Baal: 2 Chr 28:2), and Manasseh (idol of Asherah: 2 Kgs 21:7) were those principally accused. Asa (late 10th century: 1 Kgs 15:12f.) was supposed to have reacted against idolatry, but it was Hezekiah (2 Chr 29:5, 16) and Josiah (2 Kgs 23:13) who, influenced by the prophets, reacted strongly with their Deuteronomistic reforms. Idolatry became one of the most serious accusations made by the prophets, who foretold the punishment of the guilty (Am 5:26; Jer 16:18) and the destruction of idols (Mi 1:7; Is 2:18; Jer 10:11, 15; Ez 7:20; Zec 13:2). They foretold the exile as one of the punishments for this infidelity (Jer 13:24–27, 16:16f.; 25:6f.; Ez 22:3ff.), and the conversion of the people was also prophesied (Is 30:22; Ez 11:18, 20:39–44). Even the pagans’ idols would disappear (Is 21:9; Jer 51:18, 52; Ez 30:13; Na 1:14). During the period of exile deuterio-Isaiah marked an important stage in the clarification of the worthlessness of idols.

After the exile the Canaanite temptation disappeared, but in the second century, in the face of Hellenistic influence, the fight against pagan idols resumed. The oppressiveness of the Seleucids, in particular of Antiochus IV, ignited the Maccabean revolt (1 Macc 1:43; 2 Macc 12:40; Dn 3). The satirizing of idolatry became more widespread (Dn 14:1–22; Lt-Jr). At the dawn of the Christian era Songs 13–15 developed this current of thought, taking up the usual themes of anti-idolatrous criticism and adding that of the mysteries and the cult of rulers.

Among the Jewish community addressed by Jesus, idolatry no longer had a place—or at least there appears to be no allusion to it among his words. On the other hand, Christianity's contact with the Hellenistic world inevitably led to a revival of the subject.

It is Paul above all who finds himself confronted with idols (at Athens, Acts 17:16, 29; at Ephesus, Acts 19:26). He appeals to the pagans to renounce them and turn to the living creator God (Acts 14:15), as the Thessalonians (1 Thes 1:9) and Corinthians (1 Cor 12:2) had done. While Acts of the Apostles 15:20, 29 forbids the eating of idolothytes (food offered to idols), Paul imposes conditions on their consumption (1 Cor 8, 10:14–30). In any event he calls for idolatry to be abandoned (1 Cor 10:14). In his view the immorality of paganism derives from idolatry (Rom 1:23; see Sg 14:11–31). It is included among catalogues of vices (1 Cor 5:10, 6:9). In Ephesians 5:5 and Colossians 3:5 cupidity is itself considered as idolatry (see Mt 6:24). 1 Corinthians 10:20 and Revelation 9:20 follow Deuteronomy 32:17 in classing idols as demons*. Finally, Revelation 14:9ff. proclaims the punishment for worshippers of the idol of the beast. It is in the metaphorical sense of the erroneous doctrines of false prophets that 1 John 5:21, like the Qumranians (1QH4, 15f.), urges its readers to beware of idols.

c) Biblical Discussion. At Horeb-Sinai YHWH had not revealed himself: only his voice was heard. This, according to Deuteronomy 4:12 (a Deuteronomistic text), justifies the refusal of any representation of YHWH. Idolatry is first and foremost an act of infidelity to YHWH, as suggested by the Ten Commandments and maintained by the prophets (Hos 14:4; Is 57:11; Jer 2:26–29) and Deuteronomistic history (2 Kgs 17:7–17, 21:22). Idols are worthless (1 Sm 12:21), “vanity” (Ps 97:7: hbl, emptiness), and their followers too are reduced to vanity (Hos 9:10; Jer 2:5; Ps 115:8). In contrast with YHWH the creator (Jer 10:8ff.) they cannot bring salvation (Hos 14:4; Jer 2:28), since, being the work of human hands (Is 2:8), they are mute (Hb 2:18s.) and incapable of movement (Jer 10:5; Ps 115:4–7). Their manufacture is a butt of irony (Jer 10:3ff., 9). Deutero-Isaiah deepens the criticism with its insistence on Yahwist monotheism*: YHWH is the one God, the pagan deities do not exist, and so idols are nothing. The prophet enacts trials that oppose YHWH to the pagan deities and their idols (41:1ff., 21ff., 43:9ff.; 44:6ff.): the one creator, the one master of history, the one foreteller of the future, YHWH is the one and only God. It is he who has made Israel* and will set her free, while the nations make powerless deities (40:19f., 41:6f., 44:9–20, 46, 6s.). Following the examples of the Ten Commandments (Ex 20:3ff.–Dt 5:7ff.) and of biblical tradition (Dt 4:16–19; Jer 7:1–8, 3; Ez 8; Dn gr. 14)—also followed by Philo (Decalogue, 52–81) and the Letter of Aristeas (134–139)—Wisdom 13–15 places its criticism of idolatry in a wider context, attacking as well the pagans' other erroneous forms of worship. Idolatry is nonsense: made by God in his image, man makes for himself an idol that resembles him but is lifeless. This inversion of roles (Wis 15:11, 15:16f.) is sterile. Furthermore, as a repudiation of the true God idolatry leads to immorality (14, 11–31; see Hos 4:1), a theme that Paul (Rom 1:18–32) will develop in turn, showing also the extent to which paganism* stands in need of redemption (3:21ff.).

- A. Gelin (1949), “Idoles, idolâtrie,” DBS 4, 169–87.
- M. Gilbert (1973), La critique des dieux dans le Livre de la Sagesse (Sg 13–15), Rome.
- W.M.W. Roth (1975), “For Life, He Appeals to Death (Wis 13:18). A Study of Old Testament Idol Parodies,” CBQ 37, 21–47.
- E.M. Curtis (1992), “Idol, Idolatry,” AncBD 2, 376–81.

MAURICE GILBERT

See also Decalogue; Images; Monotheism; Paganism; Sabbath; Work

Ignatius of Antioch. See Apostolic Fathers

Ignatius of Loyola. See Spirituality, Ignatian

Illative Sense. See Newman, John Henry

Image of God. See Anthropology; Trace (Vestige)

Images

1. Definition and Preliminary Remarks

a) “Image” is a notion whose semantic richness leads to ambiguity. We will examine here the theological reflection on the history of the Christian usage (abstention, refusal, destruction; fabrication, possession, exhibition, veneration, devotion, and piety) of the plastic image. We understand this as a fragment of matter, in two or three dimensions, defined as such (by its edges, its frame, or its surface) and composed according to a certain order, with greater or lesser degrees of art, sensitivity, style, science, or eloquence, to be recognizable and draw attention, and yet also lead that attention on to something further. We shall therefore leave aside the theology of the image in any sense of the term that is christological (Christ*, “image of the Father*”), anthropological (man created “in the image of God”), literary (metaphors, symbols, analogies used by the Bible* and then spirituality, and, to a lesser degree, theology and preaching), or psycho-sociocultural (for example, the “image” of the father, or of woman, or of God*, as reconstructed by the history of religious mentalities). While a connection between these issues and the notion of image is conceivable, it could only be tenuous.

b) In Latin (icona or vera icona, imago, simulacrum, idola, statua, effigies, etc.), in Hebrew (çèlèm, pèsèl, massékât, etc.), and especially in Greek (agalma, eidôlon, eikôn, etc.), the terms that serve to designate images of worship were far more numerous than they are in living European languages, which is further proof of the wealth of religious uses of the image in antiquity. Imago and eikôn are the most general terms for designating these two realms, which overlap significantly.

c) More than a mere vocabulary, emerging Christianity inherited a context and a problematic linked to the proscription in the Ten Commandments (Decalogue*): “You shall not make for yourself a carved image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. You shall not bow down to them or serve them” (Ex 20:4–5), together with its initial interpretation, which was literal and restrictive during the entire era of persecutions. Aimed at preventing all forms of idolatry*, the commandment did not stop the Jews from decorating some of their synagogues with frescoes, such as that of the Doura Europos, which was decisive in the birth of Christian art (middle of the third century; Weitzmann-Kessler 1990); and very early on it was confronted with other arguments by Christians, in apparent contradiction, on the existence of images from the first covenant (the bronze serpent, Nm 21:9; the cherubs of the ark, Ex 25:18–22; the decor of Solomon’s temple*, 1 Kgs 6:18, 35, 7:23–26).

2. Historical Overview

a) Jesus seems to have been unfamiliar with the problem of religious art. He did not have recourse to plastic images in preaching the Kingdom and revealing the Father. He did not encourage his disciples to make images of himself or of his mother, and still less, images of his Father in heaven. Nor is there any trace of a preoccupation with images in the preaching of the apostles (apostle*). And yet sculpted images, both small and large, abounded in towns around the Mediterranean. Thus the proclamation of the gospel took place without images, and there is every reason to believe that it still can. Orthodox Christians do of course remain very attached to the traditional belief according to which the preaching of the gospel was achieved from the beginning as much through the image as through the word (Ouspensky, 1980). Historical evidence does not, however, support the historicity of the acheiropoietes images (the legends of Abgar, Mandyion, or Veronica, Saint-Suaire: Celier 1992) or “apostolic” images (the image of the Virgin supposedly painted by Saint Luke), not to mention the statues of Christ alleged to be sculpted on the orders of the haemorrhoids (according to Eusebius of Caesarea) and Nicodemus (Belting 1990).

b) During the first three centuries, to dissociate themselves from the pagans, who used images extensively, and also because of the persecutions that deprived them of the means to produce and exhibit images, the early Christians created or copied very few images (for example, those of orants, sinners, the Good Shepherd; see Prigent 1995), and only did so on small objects (seals, chalices) and in their catacombs (from the second century on). They were inclined, rather, to mistrust images and were opposed to their use for worship (Council* of Elvira; Minucius Felix, Octavius). The advent of Constantine (313), to whose sister Eusebius of Caesarea wrote (between 313 and 324) that Christ could not be represented (Dumeige 1978), was not a turning point in favor of images: instead, the turning point would come when, under Theodosius in 386, Christianity was recognized as a religion of the empire. It was then that a specifically Christian art was developed (reliefs on sarcophagi, the sculpted door of St. Sabinus in Rome, mosaics, the use of gold, etc.; sculpture in the round remained rare or even forbidden). This Christian art marked the initial overcoming of theological hesitation regarding the interpretation of the second commandment [AuQ8] (Decalogue*), a hesitation that would be finally overcome only by the Council of Nicaea II.

c) From Nicaea I* (325) to Nicaea II* (787), in the light of the christological elaboration itself and through periods of crisis, a theological justification for the use of images slowly emerged, concerning itself first of all with images of Christ. Those who were opposed to the making of such images (“iconophobes,” from Eusebius to Constantine V) claimed that they were unlawful because they represented a paradox: it is impossible to portray the God in Jesus Christ, and to portray the man in him is to deny one’s faith (Council of Hieria, 754). The only tolerable “icons,” if the leaders of the “iconophobic” party (such as Constantine V) were to be believed, were the cross and the Eucharist*. All the efforts of iconodulist (“image-worshipping”) theology (John Damascene, Nicephorus of Constantinople) would consist in moving beyond this aporia by explaining that the icon of Christ represents neither human nature, nor divine nature, but the union of both of them, “without mixture or confusion” (see Chalcedon*) in a “theandric hypostasis” (the human-divine person) of Jesus Christ (Schönborn 1976). Crowning the christological work of the first six ecumenical councils, this doctrine would triumph at Nicaea II, after Byzantium had experienced “the quarrel of [the] images” (Dumeige 1978). It held iconodulism to be a consequence of christocentric nature of revelation. Regarding the icon as a tradition handed down from the apostles, and not an innovation, it declared that the image had a justification insofar as it confirmed, in its own particular way, what the kerygma announced: “the real, and not illusory, incarnation* of the Word of God.” Henceforth, the icon (and after it religious images in general, though with certain reservations) could be perceived as a second voice supporting but not replacing the first voice of the kerygma, that of the witness in body proper prepared to become a martyr (martyrdom*) (Bœspflug 1993). The conciliar decree enumerated four subjects of the icon: Christ, the Virgin, angels, and saints (the Trinity* and God the Father were passed over in silence, the silence of deliberate exclusion, not omission). The decree recommended producing and exhibiting images everywhere, in such a way that Christ's belonging to the oekoumenè would be confirmed. Moreover, by applying Basil* the Great's christological affirmation (Treatise of the Holy Spirit) the council emphasized that although adoration was for God alone, the image-icon, like the sign of the cross, was an object for legitimate reverence (prostration, kisses, lighted candles, etc.) insofar as the honor that was paid to it did not stop with the image's material nature but "goes as far as the prototype" (doctrine of transitus, that is, of the holy person that it represents).

In the East, after its reaffirmation at the Fourth Council of Constantinople in 870, the conciliar decree would remain until our own time an effective reference point and a source of inspiration, providing an ongoing and uninterrupted proof, if not of the artistic fertility of religious art (icons were often repetitive), then at least of its own regulating influence over the icon, the art of the Church*. In fact churches in the East hardly knew of any other art than that that was a call to veneration. There was no purely ornamental art, nor was there any purely didactic art, even in the private sphere.

In the West, on the other hand, in spite of pontifical declarations that, at the height of past and present debates, from Gregory II (PL 89,511) to John Paul II (apostolic letter Duodecimum saeculum in 1987), marked their unremitting iconophilic position and their sympathy with the decree of Nicaea II (see Lanne in Bœspflug-Losky 1987), the reception of this conciliar decree by the Holy See did not always have an effect in religious art. In the last centuries of the first millennium the West did indeed have a perception of the image that was already influenced by the strictly didactic point of view formulated around the year 600 by Pope* Gregory the Great, on the occasion of a bout of iconoclastic fever in Marseilles. According to Gregory, images were not to be adored, but they had established themselves as a kind of alternative to the Bible for those who were unable to read. Soon convinced, on the basis of a faulty translation of the decree and quite contrary to its genuine content, that the Eastern Fathers were encouraging the adoration of icons, the Carolingian theologians took it upon themselves to dispute Nicaea II on this point (Livres carolins, Council of Frankfurt), believing that they must remind people that "God cannot be painted." As for the rest, the theological question of images did not precipitate in the West the same passionate confrontations as in the East. A. Chastel had no fear of sustaining his view that, strictly speaking, the West had never had a theology of the image. But that lack did not preclude Latin religious art from producing, notably from the 12th century on, all kinds of figurative art of an indisputably theological density, such as the Majestas Domini and the Madonna and Child.

d) West and the Icon. From the Middle Ages until the present day the theoretical position stated by the West on the subject of the veneration of images has sought to be identical, or in accordance with, that of Nicaea II: witness Thomas* Aquinas, in his ST IIIa, q. 25, on the subject of the veneration due the images of Christ. Against the Reformation and its sometimes violent questioning of the veneration of religious images (Zwingli* and Calvin* would encourage waves of iconoclasm), the Council of Trent, in its turn, referred to the decree of Nicaea II during the 25th session (1563), something that the principal Treatises of Holy Images written by Catholics (Molanus, 1570 and 1594; cardinal Paleotti, 1594, see Prodi 1962) also did. In the same manner Vatican II referred to it on two occasions (see Bouchet in Bœspflug-Losky 1987). The fact remains that this common reference to the seventh ecumenical council led, in both the East and the West, to the development of two forms of art whose differences—not only in style and iconography but also in status—would be increasingly accentuated. Furthermore, any influence of one upon the other would be generally deplored by the influenced party, even up to our own time.

It was not that the icon was ignored in the West or was on the point of losing any of its prestige. On the contrary, it was actually "imported" into the West—albeit on a more restricted basis than has sometimes been estimated—following the Crusades and the sack of Constantinople (1204). But even though a good number of themes (in particular those of the cycles of the Incarnation and Passion*: the Annunciation, the Nativity, and the Baptism* of Christ; Ecce Homo, the descent from the cross, "images of pity") were borrowed from the icon, Western art was taking an increasingly autonomous course. Its language was being emancipated from the magisterial Church, from theologians, and, to a certain degree, from the liturgy. While hesychasm* in the East was perfecting the doctrine of uncreated light (Gregory Palamas), which would lead to the concept of the icon as an anticipation of eschatological glory and as signifying the mysterious presence of the sanctified-transfigured—the icon being, in this sense, a "window onto the absolute"—the religious image of the Western Middle Ages was becoming exploratory and exoteric, decorative and playful. It proposed itself as the visual translation of Scripture and of doctrine and of narratives of the lives of saints, the virtuoso presentation of the cross-references between the Old and New Testaments. The medieval “typology” that blossomed in the 12th century informed scholarly stock of images as represented by, among other things, the new basilica of Saint Denis inspired by Suger, the moralized Bible, the Speculum humanae salvationis, the Biblia pauperum, not to mention the frescoes, stained-glass windows, capitals, and tympanums of the Romanesque or Gothic churches. These were like so many books to be deciphered, inventing a multitude of formulations while giving voice to the feelings that arose from worship. In a way that with hindsight seems spectacular, through the intermediary of “speaking reliquaries” Western Christianity reconciled itself to statuary in the round, something that was almost totally absent throughout the first millennium in the West and remains so to this day in the East.

e) Theology’s hold over medieval art has been greatly exaggerated. During the latter half of the Middle Ages Latin artists, who until the 12th century had been closely linked to the monastic scriptoria, would work in increasing numbers within the context of studios belonging to urban guilds and/or for the pleasure of those who gave them commissions, such as princes and merchants. The requirements of these patrons had only the most random, or even strained, relation to the theology and liturgy of the Church. The result was a courtly art that could be moving and carefully executed but that was not always in perfect harmony with the Christian theology of revelation. The movement to found communes and universities led to the rise of a new sort of artist: lay artists, often much sought after and extremely well paid, who would set up their own autonomous workshops as masters. Giotto, Masaccio, and Piero della Francesca would open new paths and create a new pictorial space. By the end of the Middle Ages, with the reappearance of the portrait, the discovery of perspective, and the interest in anatomy and landscape, the work of religious art became above all a work of art: the period of art, das Zeitalter der Kunst (Belting 1990), had begun. The artist was glorified for his imagination, for his genius. This also led to a multitude of “abuses” due to the growing popularity of the religious image: deviant representations, too numerous or too luxurious; superstitious devotional practices. From time to time certain theologians (Bernard* of Clairvaux, Savonarola) would raise their voices in protest against the invasive prestige of images, against their cost, their “worldliness,” and the risk of “distraction” they represented. Protests were also heard against certain types of iconography that were considered aberrant or dangerous (Antonin de Florence, Gerson), or against superstitious uses (Erasmus*). In short, the idea that reform was necessary to control excesses in religious art was in the air well before the Reformation. The Council of Trent would attempt to find a remedy. But there was something lasting, if not irreversible, about this evolution. For a long time in Western art, and often, the religious subject would remain an opportunity, if not a pretext. The searing—but not always unjust—criticism that iconophile Christians (of East or West) voiced with regard to this art could be condensed into a few grievances: naturalism, sensualism, worldliness, or religiosity. The links between this art and the veneration of the mystery were loosening: a semblance of restraint and ecclesiastical regulation, of a theologically informed distance able to use symbolism, was being lost. Thus by the dawn of the 18th century, as Hegel* would point out, the image reputed to be holy no longer caused one to genuflect.

3. A Touchstone: The Question of “Images of God”

Proof of this evolution is provided by the rise (between the ninth and the 12th century) and dissemination (from the 13th century onward) of the figure of God the Father as an old man and, by way of consequence, of an entire collection of anthropomorphic representations of the Trinity that departed definitively from the outline traced by Nicaea II, a departure that would never take hold in the East (Böespflug-Zaluska 1994). One could take the measure of the theological rift that had opened between the two art forms by comparing two works—Rublev’s Trinity and that of Masaccio at the church of Santa Maria Novella in Florence—that differ in every aspect except their subject and their era (c. 1420–30). The former illustrates the Hospitality of Abraham (Gn 18), interpreted as prefiguring the Trinity. The latter makes use of a specifically Western iconographic type (the throne of grace) that could not claim to belong to any scriptural theophany. Furthermore, it presupposes an assemblage of motifs, portrays God the Father as a Jovian graybeard—anticipating Michelangelo’s depiction of him as Creator in the Sistine Chapel—and takes the opportunity to demonstrate for the first time Brunelleschi’s discoveries in linear perspective. Over two centuries later the Grand Council of Moscow (1666) once again condemned the figurative depiction of God the Father, while in the West on the other hand, in 1690, Pope Alexander VIII sided against the Jansenists and their opposition to images (Böespflug 1984). The status of these Western images of God and of the Trinity remained problematic. The Council of Trent declared them to be “symbolic,” that is, having no resemblance to the “prototype,” which was equivalent to excluding them from the list of objects to be venerated. But it is doubtful whether this distinction between representative images and symbolic images was clear to the faithful.

The Catholic Church continued to teach that religious images were to be venerated; and yet those images, when they were recent, and whatever their other merits, were hardly venerable any more and hardly sought to be venerable. The images of God the Father as an old man with a crown (like a king, an emperor, or a pope) or as a Christianized Jupiter (Michelangelo) no longer succeeded in conveying his mystery in a credible fashion: the humanization of God was taken to its summit, like the confusion between the “economic Trinity” and the “immanent Trinity.” And although these subjects have rarely been portrayed by artists for over a century, a critical summing-up should be made of this era of figurative representation. We might indeed suspect this figure of a “human, too human” God of having something to do with the rise in religious indifference and even of atheism. But theological reflection on what is at stake in this remarkable evolution has only just begun.

4. A Few Theological Tasks

The theological questions raised by the Christian images of the past or present cannot be dissociated from a reinterpretation of the decree of Nicaea II.

a) Images and Truth. In a world where images abound, and where their relation to reality is increasingly tenuous, one might wonder whether the theory of the transitus can be maintained without ambiguity. The religious image is indeed in danger at present of being stripped of the purpose assigned it by the Fathers of Nicaea II: to bear witness to a historical and “not illusory” reality of the Incarnation. The daily accumulation of images that are glimpsed but not contemplated shunts those images toward fiction and strips them of reality. How can they continue, after that, to bear witness to a historical truth? The answer requires a new Christian practice where the image is concerned, one that will be frugal, attentive, and selective. This practice would in turn imply some form of Christian instruction in the use of the religious image and a critical reappropriation of the traditional heritage.

b) Images and Style. Dissociated, or at least dissociable, from a theoretical approach to art, beauty, or language, Christian theology has as yet paid little attention to what, in an image, actually constitutes the image. It is difficult, however, to accept that an image might be reduced to lines and color, that the transmission of the gospel through the image is equally compatible with all styles, and that its “message,” or its “presence,” is independent of its specific language. Although the principle of acculturation reiterated by Vatican II (“The Church has considered no artistic style as its own [. . .], but has accepted the styles of each era”: SC VII, 122–23) remains the best guarantor of the freedom of local churches (church*) and their artists, its reaffirmation must not evade the problem of the image’s legibility, its theological content, and its ecclesial function.

c) Images and Ecumenism. The controversial nature of the Christian use of images was for a long time the main aspect under which theologians encountered this issue. Nowadays, however, there is no longer a live controversy among Christians regarding this subject. The last “quarrel of sacred art” occurred in the 1950s and was primarily among Catholics. Since that time, a complex of historical factors has affected the issue: the failure of pious art; increasingly distant relations between the art world and the churches; the dubious nature and rarity of commissions; latent aniconism and chronic lack of concern with the liturgy of the recent tendencies in cutting-edge art; the movement to purify the churches; and the spread of icons in successive waves, most of which were related to Russian emigration during the 1920s and the Renewal shortly after 1970. As a result, there has been a slow convergence of the ways in which images are used, while official doctrines have not shifted from their positions. The two major signs of this are the reevaluation of images in some reformed circles in the West (Ramseyer 1963; Cottin 1994) and the reconciliation of the icon and Catholicism*, an event that, in the space of two decades, has seen Rublev’s icon of the Trinity become the most widespread of the images of God, with all the ambiguities implied by this unpredictable transplantation.

d) Images and the Proclamation of the Gospel. All the Christian churches are now faced with the growing need for a traditional religious set of images. They are also faced with the challenge offered by the new techniques of communication, be it in the classical media or in the more recent multimedia contexts. However, either through a lack of interest or education, inclined as they are by tradition to view it as a mere adia-phoron, a question without importance, Catholic theologians are largely uninterested in the matter, favoring other questions deemed to be more urgent and considering the religious image to be, at best, a hobby. If need be they will apply themselves to thinking about the cinema, television, advertising images, or even virtual images and multimedia—in short, those forms of the image that have the most obvious relation to power. This has given rise to a considerable gap between the wealth of the artistic heritage of Christian art, in Europe and in those parts of the world touched by missionary work, and the relative poverty of contemporary creation in the domain of sacred art of biblical and Christian inspiration. Theological reflection on this gap is in itself all too rare, which also explains the improvised, to say the least, or perhaps chancy nature of the decisions adopted with regard to the media (televised broadcast of the Mass, for example). There is no doubt that this debate must be intensified in the decades to come: the theology of images, in view of the concrete situation facing the witnessing of the faith in the third millennium of the Christian era, is suffering at present from a certain shortfall in terms of elaboration and realization.

- H. Hennehof (1969), Textus byzantini ad iconomachiam pertinentes, Leyden.
- Nicephorus, the Patriarch (1990), Discours contre les iconoclastes, translation of the Antirerhetici (PG 100) by M.-J. Mondzain, Paris.
- D. Menozzi (1991), Les images. L'Église et les arts visuels, coll. "Textes en mains," Paris.
- Saint John Damascene (1992), La foi orthodoxe, suivi de Défense des icônes, Trans. and notes E. Ponsoye, Suresnes.
- H. G. Thümmel (1992), Die Frühgeschichte der Ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, TU 139.
- F. Bœspflug, O. Christin, B. Tassel (1996), Molanus, Traité des Saintes Images (1570, 1594), Paris.
- Theodore Abu Qurrah (1997), A Treatise on the Veneration of the Holy Icons, English trans. S. H. Griffith, Louvain.
- ◆ M. Denis (1890), La peinture religieuse, Paris.
- V. Grumel (1927), "Images (culte des)," DThC VII/1, 766–844.
- H. Jedin (1935), "Entstehung und Tragweite des Trienter Dekrets über die Bildverehrung," ThQ 116, 143–88, and 404–29.
- V. Lossky, L. Ouspensky (1952), The Meaning of Icons, Berne; New York (2nd Ed. 1982).
- A. Grabar (1957), L'iconoclasme byzantin. Le dossier archéologique, Paris (4th Ed. 1984); id. (1968), Early Christian Art: From the Rise of Christianity to the Death of Theodosius, New York; id. (1979), Les voies de la création en iconographie chrétienne: Antiquité et Moyen Age, Paris.
- P. Prodi (1962), "Ricerca sulla teoria delle arti figurative nella riforma cattolica," AISP 4, 121–212.
- J.-P. Ramseyer (1963), La Parole et l'image, Neuchâtel.
- R. W. Lee (1967), "Ut Pictura Poesis," The Humanistic Theory of Painting: XV–XVIII c., New York.
- G. Lange (1968), Bild und Wort: Die katechistischen Funktionen des Bildes in der griechischen Theologie, Würzburg.
- C. von Schönborn (1976), L'icône du Christ: Fondements théologiques élaborés entre le Ier et le IIe c. de Nicée (325–787), Fribourg (2nd Ed. 1986, Paris).
- C. Murray (1977), "Art and the Early Church," JThS 28, 303–45.
- P. Dumeige (1978), Nicée II, Paris.
- L. Ouspensky (1980), La théologie de l'icône dans l'Église orthodoxe, Paris.
- H. Belting (1981), Das Bild und sein Publikum im Mittelalter: Form und Funktion früher Bildtafeln der Passion, Berlin; id. (1990), Bild und Kult: Eine Geschichte des Bildes vor dem Zeitalter der Kunst, Munich.
- F. Bœspflug (1984), Dieu dans l'art, Paris; id. (1993), "La Seconde voix. Valeur et limites du service rendu par l'image à la prédication," in F. Bœspflug, D. Menozzi, "Predicazione della Parola e immagini," CrSt XIV/3, 647–72.
- P. Brown (1985), "Une crise des siècles sombres: aspects de la controverse iconoclaste," dans La Société et le sacré dans l'Antiquité tardive, Paris, 199–244.
- F. Bœspflug, N. Lossky (sous la dir. de) (1987), Nicée II, 787–1987: Douze siècles d'images religieuses, Paris.
- J. Wirth (1989), L'image médiévale: Naissance et développements (VIe–XVe siècle), Paris.
- K. Weitzmann, H. Kessler (1990), The Frescoes of the Dura Synagogue and Christian Art, Washington.
- G. Thümmel (1990), Bilderlehre und Bilderstreit: Arbeiten zur Auseinandersetzung über der Ikone und ihre Begründung vornehmlich im 8. und 9. Jahrhundert, Würzburg.
- J. E. Ziegler (1990), Sculpture of Compassion: The Pietà and the Beguines in the Southern Low Countries, Bruxelles-Rome.
- N. Duval (Ed.) (1991), Naissance des arts chrétiens: Atlas des monuments paléochrétiens de la France, Paris.
- O. Celier (1992), Le signe du linceul: le Saint Suaire de Turin, de la relique à l'image, Paris.
- F. Bœspflug, Y. Zaluska (1994), "Le dogme de la Trinité et l'essor de son iconographie, de l'époque carolingienne au IVe c. du Latran (1215)," CCMéd XXXVII, 181–240.
- J. Cottin (1994), Le regard et la parole: Une théologie protestante de l'image, Geneva.
- S. Michalski (1994), The Reformation and the Visual Arts, New York.
- P. Prigent (1995), L'art des premiers chrétiens: L'héritage culturel et la foi nouvelle, Paris.

FRANÇOIS BŒSPFLUG

See also Anthropomorphism; Architecture; Catechesis; Liturgy; Music; Nicaea II, Council of; Scripture, Senses of

Imitation of Christ

The three major Christian confessions tend to view the imitation of Christ in different yet complementary ways. For Catholics, it signifies the acquisition, through actual mimesis, of virtues* exemplified by Jesus, and leads to a certain moral asceticism*. For Protestants, it suggests rather a conformity to Christ manifested by the discipline by “following” (akolouthēin) Jesus in acts of love toward one’s neighbor. Here, the stress is less on the acquisition of virtues than on salvation* by grace* received through faith. As for the Orthodox, they regard “imitation” as a “participation” in divine life through sunergeia or “cooperation” with God, through sacramental communion*, with a view to reaching theosis or “deification.”

(a) Biblical Foundations. The Synoptics hardly explore the theme of the imitation of Christ, although it remains implicit. Jesus is the Son, and he teaches his disciples to have toward God the attitude of a son (filiation*), in prayer and in the call to be perfect “as your heavenly Father” (Mt 5:48; see Lv 19:2). He calls them to have attitudes that he himself assumes, as expressed by the Beatitudes (Mk 5; Lk 6). Jesus sends his disciples out to continue his own ministry* of proclaiming the Kingdom* and casting out demons. A common fate is promised to Jesus and to them: to be rejected (Mt 10:25). The necessity of following Jesus is more explicit: he summons that his cross be carried and that he be followed (Mk 8:34ff., 10:39). As the Suffering Servant and Son of man, Christ calls his disciples to follow the path of obedience to the Father’s will and purpose, which inevitably involves the stations of the cross that he himself experienced.

The Johannine tradition turns the imitation of Christ into a formal precept. The episode of the washing of the feet highlights the example to follow (Jn 13:15f.). In John 15:12, the commandment of fraternal love is grounded in the expression “as I have loved you,” which emanates from “as the Father has loved me” in John 15:9. Thus, Peter, summoned to feed Christ’s sheep, will “follow” his master to martyrdom (Jn 21:15ff.). The imitation of Christ involves both behavior (to do as Jesus did) and participation in him who is the Way, the Truth*, and the Life (Jn 14:6). In 1 John, being “like” Jesus is presented as an object of hope* (3:2), but it is in this world (4:17) and “like” Jesus that the Christian is “in the light” (1:7), “pure” (3:3), and “righteous” (3:7), when he “walks in the same way in which he walked.”

In Paul’s epistles, Christ is the “image of God” (2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15), the archetype of agape* or self-giving love (1 Cor 13). The Christian is predestined to be “conformed” to the image of the Son of God (Rom 8:29). For Paul, the imitation of Christ is first and foremost a conformity to the death and resurrection of Jesus (Rom 6). Imitation cannot be separated from sacramental “participation” through baptism* but also through eucharistic communion (1 Cor 10:16ff.).

Paul can also speak of himself as an “imitator of Christ” (“Be imitators of me as I am of Christ,” 1 Cor 11:1; see 1 Cor 4:16; 1 Thess. 1:6; Thes 2:14; and the unique occurrence of summimetes, “imitator with,” in Phil 3:17). As elsewhere in the New Testament, the verb used with mimetes, imitator, is ginomai, “be” or “become.” It implies spiritual warfare against sin* that dwells within us (Rom 7:7–25), a continual struggle in and through the Holy* Spirit, which leads to life “in accord with Christ Jesus” (Rom 15:5), conformed to “the mind of Christ” (Phil 2:5). Paul’s imitation of Christ, however, does not mean an exact reproduction of Jesus’s specific acts or types of behaviors. It involves rather an absolute obedience to the will of God for the upbuilding and sanctification of the church: “Be imitators of God, as beloved children, and walk in love, as Christ loved us and gave himself on behalf of us, a fragrant offering and sacrifice to God” (Eph 5:1f.).

Elsewhere, the New Testament speaks of imitating examples other than Christ, such as the Israelite ancestors (Heb 11). Yet here as well Jesus, as “founder and perfecter of our faith” (Heb 12:2), serves as the prime model for Christian conduct. The supreme expression of this model remains his Passion and redeeming death. “Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example that you should follow in his steps” (1 Pt 2:21).

(b) From the Testimony of the Fathers to the Reformation. During the first centuries of Christianity, the imitation of Christ occupied a central place in the definition of a specific way of life, but the interpretations that it received varied according to the historical contexts and the actual situation of Christians in the Roman Empire. Up to the early fourth century and the official recognition of Christianity, and above all during periods of persecution, to imitate Christ was first of all to accept martyrdom, if not seek it out. Early in the second century, Ignatius of Antioch begged the Christians of Rome* not to prevent his martyrdom, so that he might, as he said, “imitate the passion of his God” (Ep. Ad Romanos 6, 3). The dissemination of accounts of the acts and passions of martyrs and the establishment of liturgical celebration in their honor show how Christian perfection was defined first and foremost through this imitation of Christ’s suffering and death. In the third century, this theology* of martyrdom played a prominent role in the letters that Cyprian* of Carthage addressed to confessors of the faith before he himself was martyred. Origen and Tertullian* wrote treatises exhorting martyrdom (see the texts collected in Le martyre dans l’Église ancienne, Paris, 1990). Paul’s texts on baptism had made the imitation of Christ’s Passion and death the crux of the definition of this sacrament*, and in the first centuries baptismal catechisms and treatises on baptism frequently reiterated it. Basil* of Caesarea emphasizes that such imitation is unavoidably an imitation of the perfections of Christ and, through baptism, an imitation of his interment (De Spiritu Sancto). The entire Christian life must therefore be in conformity with Christ, the imitation of Christ being the foundation of Christian morality; homilies thus give a great deal of attention to this theme. The prominent place given to the monastic life underlines this ideal of the full accomplishment of the virtues. However, the emphasis in the Epistle to the Hebrews on Christ as high priest also led to the development of a theology of priesthood* centered on the imitation of Christ: “the pontifical dignity...implies the imitation of the high pontiff Jesus” (Apostolic Constitutions, VIII, 46, 4).

By emphasizing the sinful condition of man, in the course of his polemic against Pelagianism*, Augustine created conditions in which the imitation of Christ could be called into question. His conception, developed within a largely Pauline* theology, had a broad resonance among the Lutheran Reformers. The imitation of Christ (Nachahmung Christi) was largely interpreted as succeeding Christ (Nachfolge Christi), in light of the emphasis on justification* by faith or grace* alone. The concept of moral and spiritual transformation through ascetic discipline gave way to that of the obedience of the disciple, a distinction that Augustine had explicitly rejected (Quid est enim sequi, nisi imitare?- De sancta virginitate 27). For Calvin and the Genevese Reformers, however, active imitation—taking up one’s cross in self-denial, to enable true participation in Christ’s holiness*—remained the central tenet of a biblically based ethics. The most radical denial of any concept of imitation perhaps came from the Quietists of the 17th century, and especially Miguel de Molinos (†1697). For the Quietists, perfection consists not in imitation of Christ but in an experience in which one rejects all effort and, consequently, all responsibility, resulting in a complete passivity that gives free rein for divine action.

(c) The Imitation of Christ by Thomas à Kempis. The attribution of The Imitation to Thomas Hemerken à Kempis (c. 1380–1471) is no longer disputed (Delaissé 1956). The most widely circulated Christian work after the Bible, its title was supplied by his publisher in the late 15th century, at a time when the vogue for Plutarch compelled people to think of all pedagogy in terms of the imitation of illustrious individuals. The Imitation is a collection (or rapiarium) of rhythmic sentences that can easily be memorized, for use by the young canons regular of the abbey of Mont Sainte-Agnès (Netherlands) in their orations. This abbey, which was affiliated to the congregation at Windesheim, stood at the confluence of Ruusbroecian mysticism*, the erudition of Saint* Victor of Paris, and the interiority of the devotio moderna* of the Brothers of the Common Life. Thomas à Kempis studied with the brothers at Deventer in the days of Gert Groote and Florent Radewijns, who initiated the pre-Jesuit educational tradition. They provided the basic content of The Imitation, Thomas’s contribution being more its form, which he developed along with his own monastic ruminatio.

Modern spirituality grew out of The Imitation, a spirituality more psychological than intellectual or moral, concerned with pinpointing and discerning the motions of the soul (soul*-heart-body) that has resolved to follow Christ. Spiritual life then became inner life. Biblical expressions are favored to report this spirituality: 1,500 quotations, most of which are implicit, notably from the Psalms*, the books of wisdom, and Paul. There are also numerous borrowings from Augustine, Bernard of Clairvaux, Bonaventure*, David of Augsburg, and from Suso, who gives the text its melancholy tenderness overtone, if not a certain pessimism. Misled by the title and a certain kind of Stoicism*—Seneca’s—that looms over modern spirituality, some read The Imitation as a work of asceticism. However, the moral aspect of the text as a whole is much less important than its resolutely mystical purpose, which is to invite the young monk to undertake an internal dialogue with Jesus, to bring him back, unceasingly, to the source hidden within himself and from which divine life springs. This religious pedagogy places personal pietas above observance of rules, and thus provides a spiritual basis for all the forms of the religious life that were to flourish during the Renaissance.

This absolute Christocentrism is grounded in consideration of the humanity of Jesus, the Friend (in the chivalrous sense that was to be shared by Ignatius of Loyola) rather than the Spouse, up to the mystic union. Among the four books that comprise The Imitation, the second and the third, the author's true spiritual journal, make this doctrine of friendship as a form of "pure love"; the first book is an initiation to the monastic life according to the Windesheim ideal; and the fourth is a collection of meditations on the Eucharist*.

(d) Imitation of Christ and the Christian Life Today. Nowadays, thanks to the ecumenical movement (ecumenism*), much has been accomplished in terms of the recognition of attitudes that are at least comparable among Christians of different traditions, and this also involves the imitation of Christ. A large majority of Christians have rediscovered patristic theology and its refusal to separate theology from spirituality. In addition to the collection of the Sources Chrétiennes, we should also mention the rapprochement—and the observation of a frequently common experience—among the religious in the various churches. While the forms of the imitation of Christ are not always the same, its deep meaning is felt by all as a growth in life in Christ.

In the early 20th century, a time of conflict between East and West, some Orthodox theologians stated that the East did not know of the imitation of Christ (in relation to a "naturalistic" imitation of Christ). One can no longer say this. Indeed, if only during the Holy Week, the Byzantine tradition possesses numerous texts such as the following: "Initiating your disciples, Lord, you instructed them with these words: 'O my friends, awaken! Let not any fear separate you from me. What I suffer is for the sake of the world. Do not be troubled on my account, for I have not come to be served, but to serve, and to give my life as ransom for the world. If you are my friends, do as I do: so that he who would be first shall be last, so that the master becomes the servant. Dwell in me and you shall bear fruit, for I am the vine of life.'"

On the other hand, contemporary Protestant theology owes to Bonhoeffer*, and then to Barth*, the vigorous rehabilitation of the sequela Christi through a resumption of intuitions found earlier in Kierkegaard*.

The vision of the imitation of Christ unites most Christians in a tension around the teaching of Christ (Lk 22:24–27): "I am among you as the one who serves" and in the memory of Galatians 3:27 "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

- D. Bonhoeffer (1937), Nachfolge, Munich (DBW 4, Munich, 1994).
- I. Hausherr (1948), "L'imitation de Jésus-Christ dans la spiritualité byzantine," Mélanges offerts au R.P.F. Cavallera, 231–59, Toulouse.
- L. M. J. Delaissé (1956), Le manuscrit autographe de Thomas à Kempis and L'Imitation de Jésus-Christ: examen archéologique et édition diplomatique du Bruxellensis 5855–61 (2 vols.), London.
- E. J. Tinsley (1960), The Imitation of Christ: An Essay on the Biblical Basis of Christian Spirituality, London.
- A. Schulz (1962), Nachfolgen und Nachahmen: Studien über das Verhältnis der neutestamentlichen Jüngerschaft zur urchristlichen Vorbildethik, Munich.
- K. Barth (1964), KD IV/2, Die Lehre von der Versöhnung, 603–26.
- H. D. Betz (1967), Nachfolge und Nachahmung im Neuen Testament, Tübingen.
- M. Hengel (1968), Nachfolge und Charisma, BZNW 34, Berlin.
- R. Lovatt (1968), "The Imitation of Christ in Late Medieval England," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series, 18, 97–121.
- A. Ampe, B. Spaapen (1970), "Imitatio Christi," DSP VII/2, 2338–68.
- E. Cothenet et al. (1970), "l'imitation du Christ," DSP VII/2, 1536–601.
- W. C. Creasey (1989), The Imitation of Christ by Thomas a Kempis, Macon, Ga.
- U. Luz et al. (1994), "Nachfolge Jesu," TRE 24, 678–713.

JOHN BRECK

See also Conversion; Experience; Heart of Christ; Holiness; Kenosis; Monasticism

Immaculate Conception. See Mary

Immensity of God. See Infinite

Immutability/Impassibility, Divine

I. Philosophy and Scripture

At the beginning of the Christian era, it was already traditional to contrast reason, a stable and relatively self-moved force, with the emotions, the domain of “passion,” in the sense of “submission to an alien force” (Frohnhofen, 1987). However, only the Stoics espoused apatheia, an ideal state of impassibility in which the mind is undisturbed by any sort of movement. As for transcendental realities, they were conceived, following Plato and Aristotle, to be without change or passion.

Several passages in the Bible seemed to conflict with this notion by describing God as moved to regret, pity, or anger (Gn 6:6, etc.). However, other passages (e.g., Mal 3:6, “For I the Lord do not change”; see Ps 102 [101], 27, Jas 1:17) appeared to suggest that the former passages should be interpreted either figuratively or as implying an emotion in God that was constant and depended only on himself. The same duality was repeated and intensified in the christological context. Ignatius of Antioch affirms, more explicitly than the New Testament, “the passion of my God” (Ad Romanos 6, 3), but on the other hand speaks of him “who cannot suffer, who for our sakes endured suffering” (Ad Polyc. 3, 2).

II. Patristic and Scholastic Discussions

1. Passion and Emotion

Of all the fathers of the church, only Clement of Alexandria, who assimilated love* to a state of true knowledge (gnosis), espoused the Stoic position on apatheia. Most of the fathers were rather partisans, as with Augustine (Civ. Dei VIII, 17), of the good use of the passions and an incorporation of the Platonic eros (e.g., the Cappadocians, Augustine, Pseudo-Dionysius*). However, beyond the legacy of philosophy, the fathers and the Scholastics (Scholasticism) insisted on constant emotions, such as love or compassion, as attributes of the Godhead and thereby started to separate emotion from passion (John Damascene, Expositiones de fide iii, 18; Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 20, a. 1).

2. Apatheia and Orthodoxy

Since the 19th century, there has been a tendency to suppose that the question of God’s apatheia arose within Christian thought because it was caught between a need to relate to a God who is not impassible and the logical requirements of metaphysics. There is some truth in this view, and one finds Anselm, for example, wondering how God could be both “pitiful” and “impassible” (Proslogion 8). However, more crucially, it can be argued that it was part of the inner logic of Christian orthodoxy to think more and more clearly about the absolute as unchangeable and impassible, to the extent that the concepts inherited from philosophy were modified through the teaching of the Bible. This resulted in new distinctions, not just between passion and emotion, but also between passivity and receptivity. The argument concerns especially the areas of creation, the theory of the Logos (Word), and Christology (Christ and Christology).

(a) Creation. In the first two centuries of the Christian era, the idea of ontological mediation between creator and created had priority over any doctrine of an absolute distinction between the two. In consequence, the Logos, taken to be not fully divine, could be passible, such that the sufferings of Christ raised relatively few problems (Mozley 1926; see Rowan Williams, Arius). Sometimes, this was conjoined with the view that while, by nature, God was impassible, he had freely chosen to become subject to suffering. Even those authors who accepted the full divinity of the Logos dealt in this way with the question of the sufferings of the Logos in the flesh* (Mozley).

In this context, the cosmological debates of the third century, and especially the work of Methodius of Olympus († c. 311), are of crucial significance. For Methodius, there is a radical ontological distinction between creator and created, such that there can be absolutely no sense (as with Origen) that in creation some aspect of God proceeds outward from him and so is passively affected by God himself: the passionless God is not changed through the creation of the world (De creatis, PG 18, 331–44). Nor can the Incarnation* involve any change in the Logos. God does not subject himself to suffering in Christ's sufferings, which are therefore pure paradox: he suffered while remaining impassible (De cruce et passione Christi, PG 18, 398–403).

A further crucial aspect of Methodius's position is the denial, against Origen, of the eternity of the world and of any sort of subsistence or permanence of matter as a principle of things. Otherwise, the creating God must have been engaged with some reality outside himself and so been, to this degree, "passive." For this reason, Gnostics such as Valentinus denied that the supreme God is also the creator God. Dionysius of Alexandria († c. 264) had remarked that, if matter was unoriginate, it was strange that it was not, like God himself, impassible and immutable (Epistolae, Ed. C.L. Feltoe, Cambridge).

The insistence on creation ex nihilo by Methodius and others was required to get rid of this inconsistency and ensure God's full activity in creating. Basil and Gregory of Nyssa (Contra Eunomium VI, 3) added that, if the creation is "of itself" nothing, then even within the creation there is no ontological passivity, but only degrees of participation in divine activity. The world is composed of bundles of active qualities, not of compounds of form and matter. Such a position meshes very well with their view, also found in Athanasius (De Incarnatione, SC 199, 7), that human beings were originally created incorruptible and that the Incarnation restores this incorruptibility.

Hence, the implication of the strict thinking through of creation ex nihilo was not that God was entirely active, whereas finite things were essentially passive, but rather that created things also, when not impaired by sin, were entirely active yet never received the infinite measure of divine action. This indicates a kind of paradox: to participate in divine activity is not fully to receive it in its infinite plenitude. This paradox could only be spelled out in terms of the theology of the Trinity.

(b) The Logos. One of the grounds for the opposition of Arius and Eunomius to the divinity of the Son was that this contaminated divine impassibility: first, because a generation in God implied passion; second, because the emanation of the Logos was intrinsically linked to the work of creation, and that implied passionate involvement (Mozley). Arianism* avoided a solution of the Valentinian type through a voluntaristic theology that claimed that a God absolutely one and simple in essence had nonetheless willed to descend into creation and incarnation. Its exaltation of divine sovereignty, and its preference for a negative theology, left it with hardly any possibility of ascribing feelings to God. Hence, even though the Arians accepted the sufferings of the Logos, they recognized no natural grounds for involvement with finitude and passibility within the Godhead. For more orthodox thinkers, such as Tertullian, certain divine attitudes, for example, those of love and mercy, were permanent and unalterable. Hence, a biblically derived emotive characterization of the absolute demanded an "essentialist" characterization of God as unchanging and impassible.

Athanasius, in opposition to Arius, and Gregory of Nyssa, in opposition to Eunomius, insisted that generation in God does not necessarily imply passivity. Even natural generation does not necessarily divide the essence of a thing, and in divine generation there is only the action of the Father and the Son, as fire gives out light. It was possible to conceive of a reception so intrinsic to the being that receives it that it is not strictly speaking passive in relation to that reception, it is that reception (Gregory of Nyssa, Contra Eunomium 1, 13). In consequence, the finite creation does not fully share in the plenitude of the divine act, not because it is essentially passive, but because, unlike the Logos, it does not fully receive.

Hence, action itself is redefined to mean "to give, to effect, to influence," and, at the same time, "to receive, to be effected, to be influenced by." Just as it had been realized that emotions might be active, and that creation does not impair autonomy, so also it was now realized that action could be relational and even receptive. By these means, the idea of impassibility was in a new sense reinforced. The more the emanation or utterance of the Logos was recognized as fully divine, the less could the divine nature be subject to suffering, and no act of will could alter anything.

(c) Christology. Trinitarian orthodoxy therefore rendered impossible the voluntaristic solution of the problem of God's suffering, a solution that was in any case subject to the suspicion of attributing Christ's sufferings to the Father (patripassionism). The legates of the Cappadocians and the school of Alexandria insisted that no change or passivity was involved for the Logos in the Incarnation. At the same time, the primacy of salvation* in Athanasius and Cyril led them to insist that we are healed by the divine initiative, and that we can only escape from passion and suffering if God has first assumed them by taking on our mortal condition (Athanasius, De Incarnatione SC 199, 7). Hence, Cyril insists strongly on the Logos as subject to the passion and repeats Methodius's paradoxical formulations (Epistola dogmatica 3).

However, a ground for this paradox gradually emerged as the doctrine of the hypostatic* union was formulated. Since what holds together divinity and humanity in Christ is not a substantial reality, the same divine hypostasis that of its essence does not suffer can express itself both in the eternal impassibility proper to the divine, and in the suffering proper to human nature. This is nonetheless an entirely active suffering because it is freely chosen, in a manner impossible for a sinful creature, for whom involuntary suffering is an inevitable consequence of sin. Since entirely active suffering is immediately transfigured into pure activity, the notion of apatheia is used to grasp the specificity of redemptive suffering: an entirely nonreactive and unresented suffering that is imposed from without and yet consists of a gift offered freely from within and that reveals the constancy of love.

III. Modernity

Luther* went beyond Cyril in his version of the communication of idioms, declaring that God himself has suffered and died for us. However, the exact import of this claim remained unclear, and it was rejected by several Lutheran Scholastics, as well as by Calvinists (Mozley). Only in the 19th century did divine impassibility become subject to widespread rejection, partly among Lutheran kenoticists but more drastically with a group of English and Scottish theologians.

In their view, only a God who is capable of sorrow and compassion is a God whom we can recognize as truly God. At first sight, one might think that theologies of a compassionate or essentially historical God, and christologies of kenosis*, in which the Logos loses its character as God, free the biblical vision from the shackles of metaphysics. What one sees instead is surrender to secular categories, for all these constructions assume the prime reality of evolution and the idea of progress through struggle and sacrifice. The ideas of an original perfection of creation and of the Fall (original sin) recede into the background, and a human experience is idolatrously projected upon God and made absolute. Mozley cites the Anglican Storr, for example: "He God enters into creation, experiences the struggle, feels the pain of the whole of His creation. He does so because it is love's nature to go out of itself in self-sacrifice." God comes to be regarded as worthy of love and worship simply because he is involved in the same struggle as human beings and has played a supremely heroic part in it. These theories have had two consequences. First, the idea that redemption involves a transformation of our mortal condition is lost sight of; instead, purely human goals—the struggle of mankind for the future and the quest for the perfect city—are made absolute. Second, the nature of redemptive suffering is misconstrued, for where suffering is eternally inevitable (as in the common 19th-century idea of "a cross always in the heart of God") and sacrifice is held to be the essence of virtue (virtues), the evil occasion of suffering is secretly celebrated as the occasion for heroism (Mozley). The truth is that suffering is only redemptive when embraced (if necessary) in order to manifest a free self-bestowing gift prior to all evil, such that to suffer is to continue to give in dire circumstances, rather than to prove oneself "virtuous."

The reaction against the idea of impassibility therefore risked distorting Christianity into a sickly celebration of sacrifice and weakness. Given this development, Nietzsche*'s reaction was salutary; and yet his lesson has scarcely been learned by much 20th-century theology.

In more recent debates, one can contrast the position of Eberhard Jüngel with that of Hans Urs von Balthasar* on this subject. For the former (1978), God is only "established" through the encounter with meaninglessness, suffering, and death. This view is subject to the same suspicions that have been voiced. For Balthasar, by contrast (1993), the passionless generations of the life of the Trinity are nonetheless the ground for divine involvement in the world and in suffering. Such a view recaptures the best patristic intentions.

- J. K. Mozley (1926), The Impassibility of God, Cambridge.
- B. R. Brasnet (1928), The Suffering of the Impassible God, London.
- G. Koch (1968), Die Zukunft des toten Gottes, Hamburg.
- K. Kitamori (1972), Theologie des Schmerzes Gottes, Göttingen (1st Japanese Ed. 1946).
- J. Maritain (1973), "Quelques réflexions sur le savoir théologique," in Approches sans entraves, Paris, 292–326.
- W. Maas (1974), Veränderlichkeit Gottes, Paderborn.
- F. Varillon (1975), La souffrance de Dieu, Paris.
- J. Galot (1976), Dieu souffre-t-il?, Paris.
- E. Jüngel (1978), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1983), Theodramatik IV, Einsiedeln, 191–222.
- H. Frohnhofen (1987), Apatheia tou Theou, Frankfurt.

JOHN MILBANK

See also Aseitas; Attributes, Divine; Eternity of God; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine; Simplicity, Divine

Impurity. See Purity/Impurity

Incarnation

The term goes back to the prologue of the Gospel of Saint John where it is said that “the Word became flesh.” Here we offer a brief interpretation of this prologue, a summary of the treatment of the topic in ancient and then medieval theology, and finally, indicate several issues raised in recent theology by the use of the concept of incarnation.

1. Theology According to John

To understand the perspective adopted by John we must first show how the prologue to the Fourth Gospel (Gospels*) establishes a connection, through the concept of the “flesh,” between the two titles it gives Christ: “Word” and “Son.”

a) John clearly gave the term Word (logos) the broadest possible meaning. From a biblical point of view, “Word” evokes the prophecies (prophet and prophecy) marking God’s intervention in human history and revealing his purpose (see Heb 1:1). It also evokes (especially with regard to literary form) the wisdom that accompanies God in his creation of the world and even, according to more recent texts (Sir 24; Bar 3:37f.; Wis 7:17, 10, etc.), in the history of Israel. This is a wisdom to which later biblical speculation would attribute a still uncertain hypostatic character, while Paul would see it as effectively actualized in Christ. Wisdom 9:1f. associates “Word” and “Wisdom” with God to an equal extent. The Word is treated as mystery, that is to say, as the plan of salvation hidden in God since eternity*.

Yet all of these biblical associations between the two testaments are contained in the Greek word logos, which in Stoicism denotes the immanent and eternal “reason*” for the world’s cohesion, the living principle of its intelligibility. In Middle Platonism it also points to the first emanation of the unknown God, the emanation through which he manifests himself. A complex interaction between the Greek and Hebrew concepts was bound to occur.

All these meanings relate to the world and to humans as well as to God considered in his economy. But the opening formula of John’s prologue (v. 1) uses a preposition (“the Word was with God”) and a verb (“the Word was God”) and so introduces a paradoxical relationship of simultaneous difference and identity between God and his Logos.

b) “And the Word became flesh” (v. 14). This phrase, which stands at the origin of the term incarnation, suggests more than the mere unification of the Word with human nature. “Flesh*” connotes the precarious condition of human beings who are subject to death. Thus the term also alludes to a communication with human beings that shows them the way through the history of salvation.

c) At first glance the title of Son complements that of Word. With its accompanying epithet of monogenic, “only”, “Son” expresses the relationship between the unique Word and God’s own uniqueness and, at the same time, what distinguishes Christ from the other “children” of God (v. 12). Glory* is the very sign of God and it is through it that the Father communicates with his Son. This “only” Son is “at the Father’s side” (v. 18) and the one who “has made him known” (ibid.), the one who externalizes him.

All his action in the world thus appears as a manifestation of God, an externalization for the people and for their benefit of “the glory that I [the Son] had with you before the world existed” (Jn 17:5). In other words, “things [that] were made through him” (1:3)—that is, creation and salvation—find their meaning in a precise historical event: “without him was not any thing made that was made” (1:3). Hence, this event and its meaning, as well as all the other events with their meaning, have an existence in God that the Logos expresses. Reciprocally, the Logos is externalized in the events of creation and history until the decisive moment of the Incarnation—by means of which, as well as by means of the events themselves, the Logos reveals God to those who believe.

Christ thus reveals the Father's glory in and through an authentic human history. The incarnation of the Word and "all things . . . made through him" are truly of this earth but they also express a mystery that is interior to God, and they lead to him by communicating the divine reality that fills them. Furthermore, this flesh is not isolated in history: it fulfills what happened in Israel and recapitulates the entire work of creation. So we see that there is a definite continuity here between a series of distinct levels: the theological level (that which is in God), the level of creation, the level of "Israel" (what happened before the Incarnation, represented by Moses and John the Baptist), the ecclesial level, and, finally, the level of the Incarnation.

Thus, in John's prologue, Christology (Christ and Christology) is primarily a theology: it draws its unity from "at God's side" or alternatively, "in the bosom of the Father." The two aspects, theological and historical, while each retains its own specificity, are indivisible.

2. Patristic Developments

In the patristic era the historical dimension of John's global perspective was to a certain extent overshadowed. What mattered most of all to the church fathers was salvation through knowledge. In order for such a doctrine of salvation to be possible it was necessary that the Word had really contemplated that which was in God in order to reveal it; therefore, the Word needed to be truly God since only God could know God completely. This presupposed, on the other hand, that the Word had become truly human. In this way there was no separation between the one who revealed and those to whom he was revealed, neither from the ultimate perspective of knowledge, nor from the intermediate perspective of the stages by which human beings (especially as sinners) were rendered capable of knowing God's glory. Finally, it was necessary that Christ, "consubstantial* with God in divinity, consubstantial with men in humanity" (Chalcedon), remained one. Thus, a systematic theory of the Incarnation developed in which focusing on Christ's being* eclipsed certain meanings (creation, history of salvation) that were essential to Johannine theology.

The historical stages of this discussion are well known. The cultural world of Alexandria focused on the Logos. This favored a christological perspective inspired by John 1:14, dominated by the distinction word/body (soul*-heart-body), logos/sarx, and in which some difficulty was experienced in attributing to Christ a created human soul (soul*-heart-body). Sometimes this is even explicitly rejected and the Word is substituted for the soul, whether it is considered as something created (Arianism) or as something uncreated and consubstantial (Apollinarianism*). We may even observe a prudent silence over this difficult issue (Athanasius*). When, in reaction to the above, it becomes necessary to highlight Christ's total humanity (logos/anthropos), the discussion shifts to the mode of union. It is from this necessity that we should begin to understand the emphasis placed in Ephesus* on the unity of Christ proclaimed as truly God; then, to try to understand the efforts made at Chalcedon to establish a distinction between the two "natures" and the unity of "the person*"; and finally, to comprehend the statements on Christ's will and human action that were made during the final two centuries of the patristic era. Throughout these various stages a fundamental hermeneutic (hermeneutics*) principle was at work: affirming the perfection of what was divine and what human in the unity of Christ ensured human salvation through true knowledge.

Such an endeavor, pursued over the course of centuries, gave theology the opportunity to elaborate on the philosophical categories it had borrowed from Greek authors with whom they dialogued or disputed. The concepts of "substance," "relation," "essence," "nature," "faculty," and furthermore, the analysis of knowledge and will, as well as the refinements required by the theme of the communication of idioms*—all this represented a conceptual benefit for Western thought as a whole. The noun "incarnation," ensarkosis, appears in Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. III, 18, 3.) Incarnatio came into usage in Latin in the third century.

3. Scholastic Theology

Partly through a rereading of ancient conciliar texts, Scholastic (Scholasticism) theology inherited from tradition a developed concept of the Incarnation. The christological dogma was fixed and the concept of the Incarnation did not seem to call for further refinement. It will suffice here to outline two persistent themes: that of the mode of union and that of the motive of the Incarnation.

a) If we consider the problem of maintaining the humanity of Christ in his divinity, we find several possible solutions, all of which come down to the issue of the hypostatic union. These ideas or "opinions" were summarized in a famous text by Peter Lombard (adoptionism*) that opened the way for Thomas Aquinas's classical speculations on “the union in the person” and his analysis of the characteristics of each of Christ’s natures, especially his human nature.

b) As to the “motive for the Incarnation,” we can formulate the question as follows: “Had there been no sin to expiate, would the Word have become incarnate?” There are in fact two types of theology to be discerned behind this supposition. One is centered on the theme of creation considered as a sufficient manifestation of the being, the power (omnipotence*), and the eternity of a God whose unity is perhaps more crucial than his Trinitarian nature. From this point of view the Incarnation is not required in order to demonstrate God’s being per se, but it testifies to his infinite mercy* (see Thomas Aquinas, ST IIIa, q. 1, a. 3, ad 2.) The other theology, on the contrary, sees the Incarnation as fulfilling God’s design for the world. Here the history of salvation and God’s Trinitarian being become central. The Incarnation is the most important moment of God’s manifestation by the Word who is the Creator of the world, the inspiration of the Scriptures, the savior of the human race, and the fulfillment of all things and all events (see Bonaventure, Coll. in Hexaemeron, Prol. and I, 10–26.)

4. Contemporary Problems

“The Word became flesh”: this was the basis of the treatises of Verbo incarnato—but the Christologies of the 20th century, which have replaced the Scholastic and Neoscholastic treatises of former times, make it appear more as the conclusion. A brief account of the most notable christological works offered since the 1960s will suffice to show this important shift. In Pannenberg’s Grundzüge der Christologie (1964), the point of departure is a paschal recognition of the divinity of Jesus, which permits a retrospective interpretation of the pre-Easter events; it is only the last theorems that give a thought to such crucis interpretum as the anhypostasy* and the communication of idioms. The Incarnation is very much the last word. In Moltmann’s Der Gekreuzigte Gott (1972) a theologia crucis absorbs everything and reduces the theme of the Resurrection to a congruent portion; and the passion for the future (including “the future of Jesus Christ”) regards with indifference all “non-historical” questions on the Incarnation. Schillebeeckx’s Jesus (1975), undoubtedly the most articulate of contemporary endeavors, uses a combination of an exegetical critical method and a hermeneutic (hermeneutics) procedure, which allows the author to follow Jesus from his preaching to his death in order to reinterpret the theologoumena of the Resurrection and determine the very meaning of Christology as the idea that “in Jesus a definitive salvation has come to us from God.” O. Gonzalez de Cardedal, in his no less complex book of 1978, organizes first an anthropology of man’s meeting with God before adopting three perspectives aimed at defining Christ’s “newness”: a metaphysical horizon, an anthropological horizon, and a secular ethical (ethics*) horizon. Since the emphasis is now placed on Christ as living and encountered, the Incarnation is as much presupposed as passed over in silence. Finally, another example is B. Forte’s Jesus of Nazareth (1981), which makes a convincing effort to answer a good question: “How can a divine subject be the agent of a human history?” It tries to link the pre-Easter events to the post-Easter events by means of a very flexible hermeneutics—which, however, certainly does not draw from the Christology of John’s prologue.

We can see, therefore, that the Christology of the Incarnation is to a certain extent put in parenthesis. We may cite, for example, J. Galot’s neoclassical essay (1980), L. Bouyer’s more eclectic one (1974), both explicating the Incarnation with the help of the patristic traditions, together with M.-J. Le Guillou’s unclassifiable work of spiritual theology, L’Innocent (1973), an unfashionable meditation on John’s Christ and his consciousness (Christ’s consciousness). We can also cite G. Lafont’s outline (1969) of a Christology that is interested in the Word as invested with human consciousness, a Christology consequently designed “to enlarge, if not [...] transform the metaphysical method used in post-Nicaean theology.” In addition we might note that a kind of classical Lutheranism—Jüngel 1976—in trying to open a way between theism (deism*/theism) and atheism at the time of the “dead God,” is fully capable of developing a theologia crucis that attain to the secrets of Trinitarian love* by linking “the word of the cross” and “the Word made flesh” under the theme of “the humanity of God.” But, faced with these defenses of a theology that is little practiced today, we need only mention a few of the criticisms made of it. Starting from the very idea of the Incarnation, J. Hick and various Anglo-Saxon authors loudly proclaimed that it was perhaps not the best theory for explaining the divine aspect of Christ (Hick 1977; Lampe 1977) and that Christianity could happily dispense with such a myth. On the other hand, a certain vague criticism of “metaphysical” language among those who have read a bit of Heidegger* invariably leads them to note that terms such as person, nature, hypostasis, and Logos are all related to one and the same episteme and that no episteme has words of eternal life*—this is how J.-M. Pohier proposed to bring an end to the “metaphysics” of the Incarnation in order to start talking about God’s presence in Jesus as “a Shekinah mode.” Finally, a new—political—aspect of theologia crucis leads us, quite logically, to suspect that both a post-cross (Resurrection) and a pre-cross (Incarnation) discourse would be totally deaf to the cries of the poor (Sobrino 1978).

Some responses do indeed exist or have been in the process of formulation. T.F. Torrance, a theologian and amateur physicist (to the point of authoring a critical edition of the Scottish physicist J.C. Maxwell), devoted two works to situating the Incarnation in time and space (1969 and 1976), which are considered important enough to be cited as opening the cosmological dimension of Christology. There is some awareness of the problem of metaphysical statements. We cannot be certain that J. Moingt’s treatise (1993) has succeeded in its ambitious mission: to attach consistently some simple “rumors” about Jesus to the paschal faith of the disciples, to a pre-Easter Christology, and finally, to the reemerging Nicaean idea of the consubstantial, all of which use the fluid and historical categories largely borrowed from Hegel—but it is important that the author tries to achieve it. D.M. MacKinnon (1972) also expressed some doubts about the supposedly “metaphysical” character of christological statements.

Perhaps what all of these attempts were seeking was simply an integral Christology. Having been plagued for a long time by an opposition between “Christologies from above” and “Christologies from below,” which, according to N. Lash (1980), only obscured rather than enlightened the subject, current research can at least guard itself against the dangers of a one-dimensional Christology. The object of such inquiry is something temporally defined—the “event of Jesus Christ”—which must be interpreted in all its logic by precisely following the traces it has left. It does not then matter if Christology chooses to have John’s prologue as a beginning or as an end. What matters is constructing a rich theology of the Incarnation, drawing on all the perspectives offered by other major concepts and capable of accomplishing an inquiry first into the “earthly Jesus,” then into “Christ risen and glorified,” through a contemplation of “the mystery of Jesus Christ” (for example, Kasper 1974). It can thus be said, for example, that: “at the basis of the movement through which Jesus, just as any of us, achieves the truth of what we are and reveals himself as the Other, divine and filial, there is another movement, an unthinkable initiative by which the Other freely enters destiny or allows destiny to enter him” (Sesboüé, 1982).

- See also the general bibliography for “Christ/Christology.”
- P. Lamarche (1964), “Le Prologue de Jean,” RSR 497–537.
- W. Pannenberg (1964), Grundzüge der Christologie, Gütersloh.
- R.E. Brown (1966), The Gospel According to John I, Garden City, NY.
- G. Lafont (1969), Peut-on connaître Dieu en Jésus-Christ?, CFI 44; id. (1986), Dieu, le temps et l’être, Paris.
- T.F. Torrance (1969), Space, Time and Incarnation, London; id. (1976), Space, Time and Resurrection, Edinburgh.
- D.M. MacKinnon (1972), “Substance in Christology,” in S.W. Sykes, J.P. Kleyton (Ed.), Christ, Faith and History, Cambridge, 279–300.
- J. Moltmann (1972), Der gekreuzigte Gott, Munich.
- M.-J. Le Guillou (1973), L’innocent, Paris.
- L. Bouyer (1974), Le Fils éternel, Paris.
- W. Kasper (1974), Jesus der Christus, Mayence.
- E. Schillebeeckx (1975), Jesus: Die Geschichte von einem Lebenden, Freiberg-Basel-Vienna.
- E. Jünger (1976), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen.
- J. Hick (Ed.) (1977), The Myth of God Incarnate, London.
- G. Lampe (1977), God as Spirit, Oxford.
- O. Gonzalez de Cardedal (1978), Jesus de Nazaret. Aproximación a la Cristología, Madrid.
- J. Sobrino (1978), Christology at the Crossroads, New York.
- M. Goulder (Ed.) (1979), Incarnation and Myth, London.
- J. Galot (1980), Who Is Christ? A Theology of the Incarnation, Rome-Chicago.
- N. Lash (1980), “Up and Down in Christology,” in New Studies in Theology, vol. 1, London, 31–46.
- B. Forte (1981), Gesù di Nazaret, storia di Dio, Dio della storia, Rome.
- A.E. Harvey et al. (1981), God Incarnate, Story and Belief, London.
- B. Sesboüé (1982), J.-C. dans la tradition de l’Église, Paris.
- J. Moingt (1993), L’homme qui venait de Dieu, CFI 176.

THE EDITORS

See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christ and Christology; Ephesus, Council of; Hypostatic Union; Kenosis; Word

Incomprehensibility, Divine. See Knowledge of God; Negative Theology

Inculturation

Theologically, pastorally, and liturgically, inculturation is one of the most striking elements of the late 20th century. Defined as an adequate relationship between faith and any human person (or community) in a particular social and cultural situation, inculturation is doubtless a reality as old as the history of salvation. One might even assert that all acts of faith and all understanding and experience of faith are, in the end, a question of inculturation. However, the missionary encounter of the “old Christendom” of Europe with peoples of different cultures and beliefs, and the option of Vatican II* for an evangelization (mission*/evangelization) and a Church that would be in close touch with the “world of today,” have led to a renewed understanding of the importance and urgency of the cultural grounding of the message of salvation. The neologism “inculturation” thus corresponds to a new state of awareness.

1. Inculturation, a New Concept

To designate the encounter of the biblical message and various cultures, use has been made of a plethora of terms each one as unsatisfactory as the others: stepping stones, adaptation, accommodation, indigenization, implantation, contextualization, incarnation, and so on. It required progress both in theology and in the social sciences to put at our disposal the concept of inculturation. North American anthropologists, who invented the term, spoke of acculturation as early as 1880 to designate the phenomena of contact and interaction between different cultures. In the same anthropological circles in the 1930s, “acculturation” was linked to “inculturation” to define the mechanism of ongoing integration of any individual into the culture of the group to which he or she belongs.

It was no doubt under the conceptual influence of this research in cultural anthropology that missionary theology, followed by the official discourse of the Church, began to use the terms acculturation and inculturation indiscriminately. From 1953 the Belgian missionary theorist, P. Charles, followed by other theologians, used “acculturation” in this sense. Pope John Paul II also used it as a synonym of “inculturation,” explaining that this “neologism perfectly expresses one of the elements of the great mystery of the Incarnation.”

“Inculturation” has gradually achieved dominance over “acculturation,” since it underlines that the encounter between the gospel and a particular culture is not reducible to a simple relationship between cultures. Rather, it sees the Good News as a factor of conversion and enrichment of culture while simultaneously making culture the location of a deepening of the message of salvation. It was used in this sense in Louvain in 1959, at the 19th Week of Missiology, to designate the existence of a Catholicism that was open to the major human cultural groups. In 1975 Y. Congar asserted that the word inculturation had been used in Japan as a modification of the term acculturation, in the sense of “planting the seed of faith in a culture and causing it to develop there, to express itself according to the resources and the spirit of that culture.” But it was not until 1977 that an official Roman document, the message to the people of God from the synod* on catechesis*, used the word for the first time.

Since then, the concept of inculturation has been both a frequent subject of theological investigation and a term used in declarations of the magisterium*. In more than one local church, of all denominations and in every country, inculturation has taken the form of liturgical, catechetical, and pastoral praxis, a set of concrete activities intended to associate faith closely with life, so that it might be understood, celebrated, proclaimed, and lived in relation to the aspirations and concerns of the particular milieu.

As a result, the notion of culture implied by inculturation cannot be defined by using a sketchy analysis of “archaic societies” trapped in the myths, rites, and symbols of primeval times. Vatican II used a fortunate expression when it affirmed that the human person attains true and full humanity only through culture, and when it defined culture as “everything through which man affirms and develops the many capabilities of his mind and body (soul-heart-body), transforms the world, humanizes social life, and preserves the great spiritual experiences and the major aspirations of mankind” (GS §53–1). Hence, all cultures from antiquity to the present contain three characteristics. First, every society is an object and subject of culture; that is, it produces and fosters normative representations, a project of a collective identity. There is no society without a specific cultural heritage and a specific cultural identity. In other words, culture represents both the reason for being and the way of being of any given society. It is thereby easy to understand—and this is the second characteristic—that there is a plurality of cultures and cultural particularities, because every human society has its own heritage, a source of particular and universal values. Finally, the third characteristic is that culture has no goal but to bring the individual and society to fulfill themselves by internalizing in the logic of the system the available endogenous and exogenous forms.

These considerations, sketchy as they are, confirm the fact that inculturation is not only a process necessary for any life of faith and hence for every local church, but that it is also a reality as old as the history of salvation.

2. Inculturation, a Permanent Reality

The process of inculturation has never been absent throughout the history of salvation. We know “the debts of the Old Testament to the surrounding cultures” (Cazelles 1981). For example, circumcision, one of the oldest and most sacred of Jewish practices (Jesus was circumcised), was originally a rite of initiation into marriage, specific to totemic cultures. The sacrifice of Passover* is a spring sacrifice for nomads engaged in transhumance. The Sabbath*, the name given at a certain period to the rest of the seventh day, was already known among the Semites (Ugarit). Of course, in assimilating these cultural elements, the Bible subjected them to profound transformations. But in preserving them it maintained something of the aspirations of the peoples to which they belonged. This is the case with the respect for God and for one’s neighbor recommended by the Ten Commandments*(Ex 34:20; Dt 4:13, 10:4): these are found in Egypt and Babylon, in different but stereotypical formulations. Similarly, the God of Abraham, honored under the name of El, was the supreme deity of the Caananite-Phoenician pantheon (Ugarit), worshipped in the Caananite sanctuaries frequented by the patriarchs (Gn 14:19, 16:13, 21:33). In the early monarchy, Israel honored its God under the name of “Baal,” “the master” (Eshbaal, son of Saul, 1 Chr 8:33), a name that the Bible later rejected (Hos 2:18). Hellenism also posed problems of inculturation to Judaism*, a term that appeared in 2 Maccabees to express the way of life of the peoples of the Torah. Under the influence of Greek art and rationality, the groups springing from the breakup of Judaism did not have the same interpretation of the Torah, but a continuous reference to revelation caused them to respect fully the divine value of the Torah and allowed them to traverse the centuries in osmosis with various civilizations. The Bible is thus not tied to any particular culture but rather uses cultures to express and stabilize a unique religious experience that is fulfilled in the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The process of inculturation continued in the New Testament. The four versions of the single gospel (Gospels*), written according to the cultural and contextual particularities of local communities; the specific language of Paul’s letters, a teaching closely connected to the religious and existential questions of the time; and similar phenomena were all practices of inculturation of the Word of God made flesh into the history of humankind. The relationship of Christianity to Judaism, and thereafter to paganism, was a source of tension and conflict. Jesus’s debates with the scribes and pharisees, and dissensions within the Christian community of Jerusalem* (Acts 6:1–6) and between Jewish Christians and converted Gentiles (Acts 15: Council of Jerusalem), posed the thorny problem of the movement of faith from one culture to another, the problem of faithfulness to the elements of the faith in the face of the requirements of conversion and of the fostering of diverse cultures.

The Church has always been confronted with this problem, since, as Vatican II declared, “from the beginning of its history, it has learned to express the message of Christ by using the concepts and the languages of diverse peoples” (GS 44–2; UR 14–3). For example, the question of the various rites and customs of local churches was long a subject of vigorous debate between the papacy and the bishoprics (Congar 1982). In the late second century Irenaeus* attempted to prevent Pope Victor from excommunicating the churches of Asia that, because they broke their fast on the 14th day of Nisan, celebrated Easter on different days of the week. “This diversity of observances,” he wrote, “has not come about now, in our time, but came about long ago, under our predecessors. . . . All of them nevertheless kept peace with one another; the difference in the fast confirms the agreement in the faith.” In April 591 it was the turn of Pope Gregory the Great to write to Bishop* Leander of Seville concerning the rite of baptism* by immersion: “If there is unity of faith, a difference in custom causes no harm to the Holy Church.” Unity* in diversity thus became a basic principle of various local churches confronted with the challenge of inculturation. To be sure, Pope Damasus, in contrast, argued that unity of faith called for unity of discipline, and Gregory the Great said the same. Gregory VII went so far as to order that the Spanish-Visigoth liturgy be replaced by that of Rome. The expansion of the gospel into other cultural traditions, however, almost always led the Church to reassert the imperative of inculturation. For example, in 1659 an instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda (now the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples) addressed to the apostolic vicars of Annam, China, Korea, and Tartary recommended respect for the customs of the country. Leo XIII (Apostolic Letter Ad extremas, 1893) and Benedict XV (encyclical Maximum Illud, 1919), not to mention Pius XI (encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae) and Pius XII (encyclicals Summi Pontificatus, 1939, and Evangelii Praecones, 1951) each in turn insisted that the particular values of the peoples being evangelized be taken into consideration. But it was not until Vatican II, and in its wake Paul VI and John Paul II, that there was talk of cultural exchange as a source of mutual enrichment within a single Church, and that the new churches were exhorted to borrow from the customs and traditions of their people everything that might help to bring Christian life within them to fruition.

It is in this tradition, as old as the history of salvation, that is rooted the question of inculturation in Africa, Latin America, and Asia. As the bishops of Africa asserted, meeting for the first time in Rome as a continental synod in 1994, inculturation is a priority and a matter of urgency for particular churches, a major stage on the road toward full evangelization. This is not merely a pastoral strategy, and therefore optional and secondary, but a condition for the relevance and credibility of evangelization. And as a consequence inculturation appears not only as an essential element in the manner of evangelizing but also and primarily as a specific characteristic of the gospel itself. In Santo Domingo in October 1992 the Fourth General Conference of Latin American Bishops declared: "The analogy between the Incarnation and Christian presence in the social, cultural, and historical context of peoples leads us to the theological perspective of inculturation. Inculturation is a dynamic process that moves from the gospel to what is the heart of each people and community, through the mediation of language and symbols that are accessible and that are accepted by the Church."

3. Inculturation, a Requirement of Faith

Christian faith bears on what Jesus Christ, the fullness of revelation, showed about God and about man, and it thereby bears on the relationship between God and man, between man and man, and between man and his cosmic environment. The Good News of the Word made flesh is thus the basis of faith's own relationship to the believing person; and it consequently provides the decisive criterion for the content, as well as for the hermeneutical, methodological, and practical norms of inculturation. The theological question of inculturation thereby has three aspects, relating to Trinitarian theology, to creation, and to redemptive incarnation.

a) Unity in Diversity within the Trinitarian God. The mystery of the Trinitarian God, the primordial and total object of faith, is that of the communion of three genuinely distinct persons and of a communion in which the specificity of each is as essential as their unity. The Father is God only as Father, the Son is God only as Son, the Holy Spirit is God only as Spirit (Holy Spirit). God is God and one God only in the unity of nature and the distinction of persons, in a relation of perfect love (1 Jn 4:16) that can be characterized as a "communion of differences." In God, difference is not an obstacle to communion but a demand for perfect communion. The theology of inculturation can find a model here. By agreeing to establish itself analogically in God, the enterprise of inculturation derives its true benefits not primarily from the particularity of a given culture but above all from the inexhaustible mystery of love of the Trinitarian God, the creator of all things.

b) Unity in Diversity at the Heart of Creation. By making human beings in his image and likeness, God created them both similar to and different from himself, on the one hand; on the other hand he made them both similar to (of the same nature) and different from one another (man and woman) (Gn 1:26f.). He thus intended to establish with human beings and among human beings a relation of love—both identity and otherness—the secret of which is Trinitarian. The Trinitarian theology of creation thus confirms that the problematics of inculturation are indeed those of a relationship of unity in diversity, of a communion of differences. Since each person and each people are a unique and irreducible image of the infinite riches of the Creator, it seems that this image, constitutive of his personal dignity, is the necessary location for his understanding and experience as a believer. This leads to two implications. Firstly, and because he or she is created in the image and likeness of God, every human being is a "sacred history," the bearer of specific values useful for the human race. And inculturation specifically takes into account this dimension of human person, helping individuals to be aware of it and to enrich it so that they may be ever more faithful to their dignity. As a consequence, and this is the second implication, interpersonal and intercultural relations cannot be defined a priori in terms of antagonistic opposition but in terms of an encounter among equals and of complementary exchanges. Because its goal is the communion of differences, inculturation is thereby opposed to any form of discrimination or exclusion.

c) The Mystery of the Redemptive Incarnation, an Enterprise of Inculturation. Perceived as a real entry of the eternal Son, Word of God and God himself, into the human and carnal world, the event of Jesus Christ is the unfolding of the love of the Trinitarian God in the history of human beings and of the world. The Word of God truly dwelt among us; he established his tabernacle there (Rev 21:3). He was recognized as a man like all men, says Paul (Phil 2:7f.); and the Epistle to the Hebrews emphasizes that Jesus made himself like his brothers in every way (2:17). The incarnate Word is thus the first to inculturate himself (see Sales 1980–81). He does this first by “taking on flesh”—the Gospel of John speaks of the Word “becoming flesh” (Jn 1:14) rather than “becoming man” and thereby emphasizes the realism of his humanity and his total insertion in the history of humanity. He does it also by his death, for in dying crucified like a common criminal, Jesus goes to the limit of man condemned to death, and that in the most ignominious conditions. He does it finally by his resurrection*—glorification, because he thereby reaches and fully achieves the desire for eschatological beatitude* inherent in every human person. It must be added that the inculturation of Jesus Christ is not a conformist solidarity with the human race; it is aimed rather at removing human beings from everything that might undermine their dignity as creatures of God. One might speak here of “desolidarizing solidarity.” Christ thus appears as the unique incultured and inculturing model, as the decisive and ultimate norm of any enterprise of inculturation. The problematics of inculturation thus turn out to be essentially christocentric. As the image of the invisible God, the first born of all creation, and the first born from among the dead (Col 1:15, 18), only Christ establishes and reveals the origin and the aim of every relationship between the Creator and his creation. He alone brings to perfect realization, in and by his person, the relation of love of God with human beings in which is accomplished the definitive fulfillment of every person. And this is indeed the object and the aim of inculturation, which is in fact directed toward the embodiment of Christ’s message of salvation in all sectors of life, so that any experience of faith may be expressed in particular cultural forms, and especially so that that experience may become a principle of inspiration, of interpretation, and of conversion of those cultural forms themselves. Inculturation thus raises the two related problems of the evangelization of cultures and the cultural understanding of the gospel. It was indeed a back and forth movement of this kind between faith and culture that led John Paul II to say in 1982: “The synthesis between culture and faith is not only a requirement of culture but also a requirement of faith. A faith that does not become a culture is a faith that is not fully received, entirely thought through, and faithfully lived” (DC 1832, 1982. 604–6).

- M. J. Herskovits (1936), Man and His Work, New York.
- R. Redfield, R. Linton, M. J. Herskovits (1938), “Outline for the Study of Acculturation,” AmA 38, 149–52.
- P. Charles (1956), Études missiologiques, Louvain.
- Coll. (1959), Missions et cultures non chrétiennes. Rapport et compte rendu de la XXIXe Semaine de missiologie, Louvain.
- J. Masson (1962), “L’Église ouverte sur le monde,” NRTh 84, 1032–43.
- T. Tshibangu (1974), Le propos d’une théologie africaine, Kinshasa.
- M. Hebga (1976), Émancipation d’Églises sous tutelle. Essai sur l’ère postmissionnaire, Paris.
- Coll. (1979), Libération ou adaptation? La théologie africaine s’interroge, Colloque d’Accra.
- B. Adoukonou (1980), Jalons pour une théologie africaine: Essai d’une herméneutique chrétienne du “vodun” dahoméen, 2 vols., Paris-Namur.
- J.-M. Ela (1980), Le cri de l’homme africain: Questions aux chrétiens et aux Églises d’Afrique, Paris; id. (1985), Ma foi d’Africain, Paris.
- P. de Meester (1980), Où va l’Afrique?, Paris.
- M. Sales (1980–81), “Le christianisme, la culture et les cultures,” Axes, October 1980–January 1981, 3–40 (repr. in Le Corps de l’Église, Paris, 1989, 145–79).
- A. Shorter (1980), Théologie chrétienne africaine, Paris.
- O. Bimwenyi-Kweshi (1981), Discours théologique négro-africain. Problème des fondements, Paris.
- H. Cazelles (1981), “Quelques dettes de l’Ancien Testament envers les cultures ambiantes,” in coll., Foi et culture à la lumière de la Bible, Turin, 17–27.
- F. Eboussi-Boulaga (1981), Christianisme sans fétiche: Révélation et domination, Paris.
- J.-M. Ela, R. Luneau (1981), Voici le temps des héritiers: Églises d’Afrique et voies nouvelles, Paris.
- Y. Congar (1982), Diversités et communion, Paris.
- A. T. Sanon, R. Luneau (1982), Enraciner l’Évangile: Initiations africaines et pédagogies de la foi, Paris.
- C. Geffré (1983), Le christianisme au risque de l’interprétation, Paris; id. (1987), “Mission et inculturation,” Spiritus 109, 406–27.
- Coll. (1984), Théologie et choc des cultures, Paris.
- E.-J. Pénoukou (1984), Églises d’Afrique: propositions pour l’avenir, Paris.
- F. Lapointe (1985), Une expérience pastorale en Afrique australe pour les communautés enracinées et responsables, Paris.
- E. Messi Metogo (1985), Théologie africaine et ethnophilosophie: Problèmes de méthode en théologie africaine, Paris.
- E. Mveng (1985), L’Afrique dans l’Église: paroles d’un croyant, Paris.
- J. Doré (Ed.) (1986), Chemins de christologie africaine, Paris.
- M. J. Agossou (1987), Christianisme africain: Une fraternité au-delà de l’ethnie, Paris.
- H. Carrier (1987), Évangiles et cultures: De Léon XIII à Jean-Paul II, Paris.
- R. Luneau (1987), Laissez aller mon Peuple: Églises africaines au-delà des modèles, Paris.
- A. Mbembe (1988), Afriques indociles: Christianisme, pouvoir et État en société postcoloniale, Paris.
- A. Peelman (1988), L’inculturation: L’Église et les cultures, Paris.

- P. Poupard (1989), L'Église au défi des cultures: inculturation et évangélisation, Paris.
- F. Eboussi-Boulaga (1991), A contretemps: l'enjeu de Dieu en Afrique, Paris.
- F. Kabasele-Lumbala (1993), Le christianisme en Afrique: une chance réciproque, Paris.

- K. Ä. Mana (1993), Théologie africaine pour temps de crise: christianisme et reconstruction de l'Afrique, Paris.

EFOÉ-JULIEN PÉNOUKOU

See also Hellenization of Christianity; Religions, Theology of; Rites, Chinese

Indefectibility of the Church

According to the Nicene Creed the Church is “holy.” But theologians have also described it, in its concrete reality, as a corpus permixtum, made up of sinful members who are to some extent unworthy, a body in constant need of reformation. Although sanctity (holiness*) and sin are not directly opposed, we may ask to what extent such judgments are compatible with the idea of a “holy Church.” In its constitution on the Church (LG 8), the Second Vatican* Council says that the Church “is holy, but [that] it also always needs to be purified.” The decree on ecumenism (UR 3) reduces the scope of this declaration by establishing that the people of God, during its pilgrimage, remain “subject to sin in its members.”

Protestant theology, for its part, has not hesitated to speak of a Church entirely delivered into sin. Luther’s formulations sometimes led to making the “sinful Church” (peccatrix, WA 34/I. 276. 7ff.) into a confessional “criterion” (Jüngel 1983) characterizing the manner in which the Church views its relationship with God. But despite divergent formulations, it is legitimate to ask whether there is in this regard a basic difference between Catholics and Protestants, for “the belief in the indestructibility, in the continuity, and in the permanence of the one and holy Church also constitutes for the Lutheran Reformation an essential characteristic of its conception of the Church” (Meyer 1989). Turning to the patristic tradition, we are struck by the abundance of images through which this question is treated (Balthasar 1960). For the fathers of the church, it was especially the prostitute Rahab, impious and impure (Jos 6:25; Heb 11:31; Jas 2:25), who became the paradigm of pagan Christianity, and hence of the Church of Christ. They also attributed to the Church the words of the bride of the Song of Solomon (1:5): “Let the Church say: ‘I am very dark, but lovely,’ dark according to your judgment, but lovely according to the radiance of grace” (Gregory the Great, PL 79. 486). Thomas Aquinas wrote: “The Church, ‘glorious, with no stain or wrinkle’ (Eph 5:27) is the ultimate end to which we are led by the Passion of Christ. It will therefore be realized only in the heavenly kingdom, and not in this life in which ‘if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves’ (1 Jn 1:8)” (ST IIIa. q.8. a. 3. ad 2).

In current ecumenical discussions Church and Justification, a document realized by Lutherans and Catholics, attempts to find common formulations. For example, the text confirms the doctrine of Lumen Gentium (LG), according to which the Church is “indefectibly holy” (150; LG 39). From this point of view it is possible to say “there is no difference between the two parties with respect to the fact that the Church is at the same time ‘holy’ and ‘sinful’” (156).

What precise meaning should be given to the term indefectibilitas in LG 39? There is no doubt that all Christians, as members of the Church, must pray: “Forgive us our sins” (Mt 6:12). We may also observe that the council document does not attribute the predicate of sanctity to the eternal Church alone but also to the earthly Church, indicating thereby the “subjective” holiness of its members and not the “objective” holiness of institutions and doctrines. But, whereas particular members of the Church may be, for Catholics as for Protestants, “simultaneously justified and sinners,” Catholics do not extend this characteristic to the Church itself. The Church is not simply simul iusta et peccatrix, for its sanctity prevails over its sin. Holiness is an essential mark of the Church, determinative in relation to sin (Rahner 1965). In the same context (LG 41) the ministerial grace (gratia muneris) of bishops (bishop*) and priests is presented as a source of their exemplary sanctity. Although the concept of indefectibility does not appear here, the close link between the sanctity of the Church and that of its ministers may pose ecumenical problems, in particular because UR (3. 32) points to “defects” (defectus, defectus sacramenti ordinis) in other Christian Churches. Although Protestant Churches often use the expression “sinful Church” without reservation, it goes without saying that a local* church cannot purely and simply accept the obvious sins of a sister church. Ecumenical discussions on what is called the status confessionis illustrate the attitude of Protestant Churches in this kind of case. The exclusion from the ecumenical community of the South African churches that practiced apartheid was thus referred to the status confessionis, in the absence of which it would be impossible to identify and judge a “sinful church.” The discussions were not able to establish whether apartheid, in this case, was to be considered a heresy* or a moral fault (or both at once).

- LG, AAS 57, 1965, 5–64.
UR, AAS 57, 1965, 90–99.
Kirche und Rechtfertigung, Paderborn, 1994.
- ♦ H. U. von Balthasar (1960), Sponsa Verbi, Einsiedeln.
- K. Rahner (1965), “Sündige Kirche nach den Dekreten des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils,” Schr.zur Th. 6, Einsiedeln, 321–47.
- E. Jünger (1983), “Die Kirche als Sakrament?,” ZThK 80, 432–57.
- A. Birmelé (1987), “La peccabilité de l’Église comme enjeu œcuménique,” RHPPhR 67, 399–419.
- H. Meyer (1989), “Sündige Kirche? Zur katholisch/evangelischen ‘Grunddifferenz,’” ÖR 38, 1989, 397–410.
- F. Herzog (1991), “Status confessionis,” Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, Geneva, 956–57.

RISTO SAARINEN

See also Church; Infallibility; Sin

Indulgences

An indulgence is the remission before God of the temporal punishment* for sins (sin) whose error has already been absolved. The faithful who are well disposed to receive remission can obtain it with the Church’s help under certain well-defined conditions. As minister of redemption, the Church distributes and applies with authority the treasure of the satisfactions of Christ and of the saints (Paul VI in 1965, definition used again in CIC of 1983, can. 992). The conditions are defined as a spiritual work (a pilgrimage* or a visit to a church, prayer, almsgiving, etc.). An indulgence can be partial or plenary (can. 993) and can be applied both to the living and the dead (can. 994).

a) The Birth of a Practice. The first evidence of indulgences can be traced back to the 11th century and is linked to the changing nature of penitential discipline. In ancient public discipline the conversion of a sinner could not be accomplished without him or her devoting to penance a certain amount of time proportional to the seriousness of the sin. During this time the repentant sinner was refused the Eucharist and had to undertake various ascetic practices. Reconciliation was not granted until the end of this process. It was accompanied by the prayers of the Church, and such prayers were judged as being indispensable for obtaining pardon. These two aspects of this practice are combined in an indulgence: sin engenders “temporal punishment”; the execution of this punishment is inseparable from the prayers of the Church.

From the moment absolution is given, immediately after confession and before the accomplishment of an often rigorous and long “satisfaction” (determined in penitential “tarifs” and expressed in weeks, months, or years), the sacramental absolution of the sin must be distinguished from the liberation from the “temporal punishment” due to sin, which is the purpose of the indulgence. In addition, the faithful ask that a long punishment be commuted to a shorter, if the shorter punishment comprises an onerous act, such as a pilgrimage. For its part, the Church is conscious of its duty to help the sinner through intercession and to contribute to the lightening of the “temporal punishment” by invoking ecclesial solidarity—which is nothing less than the communion* of saints—and by drawing on the “spiritual treasure” of Christ’s merits (all redemption comes from Christ) and of the saints justified by his grace. This is the origin of the indulgences through which bishops (bishop*) or the pope* propose to Christians certain satisfiable brief practices in place of temporal punishment for their sins.

Indulgences multiplied in the 12th century. The most famous indulgence was that of Portiuncula in Assisi and involved a pilgrimage. The idea of a plenary indulgence came about when the popes remitted of all their temporal punishments Christians who took part in the Crusades. In 1300 Pope Boniface VIII announced the first Jubilee with a plenary indulgence for those Christians who visited the four Roman basilicas.

b) Classical Theology of Indulgences. Abelard* had vigorously opposed the principle of indulgences. The first Scholastic (Scholasticism*) theologians were hesitant. Thomas Aquinas formulated a doctrine of indulgences that would remain a classic (ST, Suppl. 25–27). He regarded them as being derived from the “power of the keys” given by Christ to his Church (Mt 16:19). This power is just as effective in heaven before God as it is on earth in the Church, where the pope is its guardian. In such circumstances the Church uses its “key to jurisdiction,” which is not sacramental. An indulgence relies on the superabundance of the Church’s treasure and has no value if it is not accomplished in charity and piety.

Catholic theology has always remained circumspect on two points. On the one hand, the success of the practice of indulgences has led to abuse on the part of those with authority to bestow them, and the multiplication of indulgences has often reduced them to insignificance. The faithful have sometimes too easily seen them as works that were automatically effective, as a sort of assurance of salvation. This mentality has engendered a banklike conception of the Church’s treasure and a commercial perception of an exchange of merits to profit the dead. On the other hand, the actual way indulgences work poses a problem. An action “through absolution” for the living has been distinguished from an action “through intercession” for the dead, who do not fall under the Church’s jurisdiction. Nonetheless, “even in the case of a plenary indulgence, [...] assurance cannot be given that it has been completely remitted at God’s tribunal” (Didier, 1963).

c) Reformation’s Contestation of Indulgences. Despite some intervention by the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) and severe criticism by J. Wyclif (1378) and J. Hus (1420), the proliferation of the practice of indulgences in the 14th century and 15th century (during which time they were applied to the dead) led to financial malversation in the course of “quests for indulgences.” Indulgences became the object of organized trade. Various collective bodies, and even bankers, were charged with their distribution. Preaching on the subject of indulgences gave way to a dangerous simplism. The indulgence preached by the Dominican Tetzel, the profits of which went to the construction of Saint Peter’s in Rome, was accompanied, according to Luther, by the following formula: “The money has barely clinked into the offertory plate and already the soul has leaped out of Purgatory*.” The question of indulgences would become central to the conflict of the Reformation. Luther rejected them in his 95 theses of Wittenberg in 1517. He considered them contradictory to the doctrine of justification by faith alone, independently of all works, and held them as an example of the abuse of spiritual power within the Roman Church.

In response to this situation the Council of Trent* formulated a reminder of the doctrinal principle of indulgences. The power to bestow them had been given to the Church by Christ; their use, approved by the council, must be preserved due to their salutary nature for Christian people. Those who claim that indulgences are useless, or who deny that the Church has power to grant them, are anathema (session 25). The council also recognized the abuse to which indulgences were subject and prohibited any monetary trafficking in respect of them.

d) Renewing the Doctrine. In 1948 B. Poschmann proposed a “new” theological conception of indulgences with which K. Rahner agreed. They combined the old “absolution” of temporal punishment for sin—efficient absolution as the Church’s prayer—with a jurisdictional remission of ecclesiastical penance. The same held for plenary indulgences: the Church could only attempt to gain temporal remission of all punishment for a sin, but it could not guarantee with any certainty that the punishment had been entirely remitted by God (K. Radner 1955, trad. Fr. 123). Taken in this sense, an indulgence always works through intercession, whether for the living or for the dead. But it is an official intercession, undertaken by the Church under the authority of the apostolic ministry, which relies on the merits of Christ and the saints. This position was defended at Vatican II by the Patriarch Maximos IV.

In 1967 Pope Paul VI reexamined the doctrine and formulated new norms. He rejected the banking concept of the treasure of the Church: there is not a totality of goods but a whole that is Christ Himself. The doctrine of “treasure” is none other than that of the communion of saints. With indulgences, however, the Church, as the dispenser of the redemption of Christ, not only prays but in its authority distributes the treasure of the satisfactions of Christ and the saints to the well-disposed faithful for the remission of temporal punishment (DC 62, 210). Conversion is nonetheless always necessary, or else the indulgence is illusory. Finally, the practical norms that accompany the Constitution of Paul VI prohibit all quantification of partial indulgences. Rahner believed that prayer and authority should not be opposed and that indulgences were at once a form of prayer and an act of authority and that they carried all the efficacy of the Church's intercession. Rightly understood, the theology of indulgences is then an aspect of the theology of grace and of the communion of saints, and its practice is of the order of works of faith. This theology does not put justification into question. The teachings of the Catholic Church would nonetheless gain much from using language that avoids all ideas of mechanical efficacy ("to gain" an indulgence) and by underlining the value of indulgences as intercession.

Indulgences

- F. Beringer (1925), Les indulgences: Leur nature et leur usage, 4th Ed., Paris.

- B. Poschmann (1948), Der Ablass im Licht der Bußgeschichte, Bonn; id. (1951), Buße und letzte Ölung, Freiberg.
- K. Rahner (1955), "Bemerkungen zur Theologie des Ablasses," Schr.zur Th. 2, 185–210 (Écr. th. 5, 1966, 111–40).
- J.-C. Didier (1963), "Indulgences," Cath. 5, 1520–28.
- Paul VI (1967), Const. apost. Indulgentiarum doctrina, DC 64, 198–218.
- K. Rahner (1967), "Kleiner theologischer Traktat über den Ablass," Schr.zur Th. 8, 472–87; id. (1967) "Zur heutigen kirchenamtlichen Ablasslehre," ibid., 488–518. G. A. Benrath (1976), "Ablass," TRE 1, 347–64.
- H. Vorgrimler (1978), Buße und Krankensalbung, HDG IV/3, 203–14.
- B. Sesboüé (1983), "Les indulgences. Problème œcuménique à nouveau posé?," Études 359, 115–21.

BERNARD SESBOÜÉ

See also Communion; Expiation; Justification; Luther, Martin; Penance; Purgatory; Solidarity; Works

Inerrancy

Inerrancy is a concept used in ecclesiology* and in theological epistemology in conjunction with the concepts of infallibility* and indefectibility*. A negative concept (like the other two), inerrancy means first that Holy* Scripture, both as the Word* of God and as words about God, cannot lead to error (corresponding to the negative concept of inerrancy in this context is the positive concept of inspiration). Inerrancy also means that the Church cannot "err" in its doctrine (corresponding to the negative concept of inerrancy in this context is the concept of assistance given by the Holy Spirit to the Church). In recent discussions about the exercise of the magisterium in the Catholic Church, there has been a tendency to consider inerrancy as an inclusive concept—the Church cannot deceive through its teaching—often linked to a theory of doctrines that accepts that Catholic dogma* is inalterable but that there is a constant possibility that it may be reformulated. Inerrancy also means the continuity of a true word through the diachronic multiplicity of words and concepts serving to affirm that doctrine. A teaching of the Church, finally, might possess the charisma of inerrancy without involving infallibility as that has been defined by the two Vatican councils.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Holy Scripture; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility

Inerrancy of Scriptures. See Holy Scripture

Infallibility

a) Use of the Concept. According to Roman Catholic doctrine, the charism of infallibility is granted to the Church* and is also bestowed on the episcopal body when that body exercises the supreme magisterium* in conjunction with Peter*'s successor (LG 12, 25).

The Catholic doctrine of infallibility emphasizes that the revealed truths have remained unaltered in the Church's proclamations. All the same, this characteristic is subject to the given historic conditions and to the analogical nature of all theological statements. That is why even infallible doctrinal decisions cannot express the whole truth* of the supernatural* object of the faith* (Lang 1965).

The Protestant Churches do not teach infallibility. However, most of the Christian confessions have defined the conditions that the teaching within the Church must satisfy, founded on the principle that the continuity of the Christian faith is guaranteed by the Holy Spirit. Thus Luther's Reformist thought teaches that the Church as a whole cannot err, because, according to John 10:28, Christ* promised that no one could snatch it out of his hand (Pannenberg 1993). The infallibility of the Holy Scriptures, which is both the consequence and the proof of their true inspiration, is stressed by many Churches.

b) History of the Concept. In the New Testament, the idea of infallibility is founded mainly on the passages in which Jesus gave his disciples or the apostles (apostle*) the authority* to teach (for example, Lk 10:16) or on the definition of the Church as "a pillar and buttress of truth" (1 Tm 3:15). In the early Fathers, in Irenaeus for instance, there are statements that describe the Church as the guardian of the whole of Christian truth. Although such passages indeed show that, from the beginnings of Christianity, the Church exercised control over the doctrinal opinions of its members, nonetheless, historical criticism cannot find any actual doctrine of infallibility in them. As Hans Küng puts it: "With regard to infallibility, in the sense of the impossibility of falling into error, as little mention is made of it in the texts of the Scriptures as in the rare quotations from the Fathers" (Küng 1970).

Even though, during the whole of the Middle Ages, the Church's supervision often manifested itself in rigorous disciplinary forms, it has to be admitted that as far as concepts are concerned, infallibilis remained primarily—for instance in Thomas Aquinas and Luther—a characteristic of God, a consequence of his prescience and of his providence*. In the Middle Ages the question of infallibility was discussed from the most diverse angles (Tierney 1972). From the end of the Middle Ages, the partisans of papal infallibility (for example, Pierre Olivi and Guido Terreni) did however single out the broad theological aspects of this issue.

The concept of infallibility took on particular importance from the time of the decision made at Vatican I* (1870). The dogmatic constitution Pastor aeternus attributed infallibility to the pope when he spoke ex cathedra—that is, when he made a decision, in the discharge of his pastoral (pastor*) duties and as a teacher of all Christian people, that a doctrine regarding faith or "morals" (mores) should be held by the universal Church (DH 3074). From 1870 onward, the question of papal infallibility has dominated public theological debate. Vatican I had already planned to expound a general doctrine about the infallibility of the Church, but circumstances prevented its dealing with these questions. A detailed development of this notion had to wait for the texts that resulted from Vatican* II, and especially for the constitution concerning the Church (LG). The latter document stresses that the community of the faithful cannot err and that the laity (lay*/laity) shares in the "supernatural appreciation of the faith (sensus fidei*) of the whole people"—that is, in the instinctive sensitivity and discrimination that the members of the Church possess in matters of faith (LG 12; see also DH 4852). Within this community, the pope is endowed with infallibility "by virtue of his office." But the infallibility held in common by the bishops (bishop*) is also emphasized. When the bishops teach points of faith or of morals unanimously and authentically, they infallibly proclaim the doctrine of Christ (LG 25).

Since Vatican II this extension of the Catholic doctrine of infallibility has often been criticized. That was the central theme of the polemic provoked by Küng's theses (1970). In its 1973 declaration Mysterium Ecclesiae (see DH 4530–41), the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith confirmed the decisions resulting from the two Vatican Councils.

c) Infallibility in Interconfessional Discussion. Among the various Christian confessions, the Eastern Orthodox and the Anglican faiths are relatively open to the idea of the Church's infallibility, although they reject the primacy of the pope. In the joint text drawn up in 1984 under the title "Declaration of Dublin," they sum up as follows their conception of infallibility (29–30): "The Eastern Orthodox and the Anglican believers consider that infallibility is not the privilege of a particular person in the Church. . . . We believe that, by virtue of their ministry, all the bishops hold the power to attest to the truth; but if the doctrine of infallibility means that it is possible, by means of external criteria, to guarantee the absence of error in such and such a declaration by a particular bishop, then we cannot accept this doctrine. What is more, such a guarantee cannot be given regarding the declarations of a council of bishops, since the ecumenicity of a council can only be demonstrated by the fact of its recognition by the whole Church."

Despite all these reservations, the declaration did not deny the principle of infallibility. And specifically, ecumenical councils recognized by the universal Church might be infallible. The first seven councils fulfilled the set conditions and are therefore infallible. The "Declaration of Dublin" (29) quotes, in addition, the agreement of the 1982 Anglican–Roman-Catholic International Commission (The Final Report, 32), according to which infallibility "in an absolute sense is applicable only to God." This obvious postulate translates the fact, important to many confessions, that in the history of dogma infallibility is seen, above all, as a divine characteristic, and for this reason it cannot be extended directly to the earthly Church.

As early as 1972 the Lutheran-Catholic dialogue stated that: "Despite the historic vicissitudes of preaching, Lutherans and Catholics are convinced that the Church is constantly guided to the truth by the Holy Spirit and, through this Spirit, it is kept within the truth. It is in this context that the notions of indefectibility* and infallibility, current in Catholic Tradition*, must be understood. . . . Infallibility should be recognized above all as a gift bestowed on the universal Church, which constitutes the people of God."

Although infallibility continued to pose an ecumenical problem, the Lutherans and the Catholics made another joint statement, published in a document of 1985: "There thus exists in both Churches a supralocal responsibility as regards doctrine: It is exercised in different ways, but with a certain concordance. In both Churches, as far as doctrinal affairs are concerned, this responsibility is included within their testimony to the faith of the universal Church. In this matter, both Churches recognize their subjection to the authority of the Gospels."

Aside from the question of the magisterium, the current discussion about infallibility is engaged with the fundamental question of whether the idea of theses a priori infallible can have any theological legitimacy, inasmuch as the truth of these declarations would not then need to be recognized by the faithful. According to Vatican I, the exercise of an infallible magisterium was the privilege of the pope who does not depend on the ecclesial reception of his teaching (DS 3074). Now, as W. Pannenberg has stated, it is "a known fact from the earliest days of Christianity" that no doctrine can be authoritative if it is not accepted by those to whom it is communicated (Pannenberg 1993; an opinion that is shared by all engaged in the dialogue with Catholicism).

- LG, AAS 57, 1965, 5–64.
- ARCIC, The Final Report, London, 1982, 79–98.
- H. Meyer et al. (Ed.), Dokumente wachsender Übereinstimmung 1–2, Paderborn, 1983–92.
- The Dublin Agreed Statement*, London, 1984.
- Commission internationale catholique-luthérienne, Face à l'Unité, Paris, 1986.
- ♦ A. Lang (1965), "Unfehlbarkeit," LThK 10, 482–87.
- E. Castelli (Ed.) (1970), L'inaffabilité, Paris.
- H. Küng (1970), Unfehlbar? Eine Anfrage, Zurich.
- K. Rahner (Ed.) (1971), Zum Problem Unfehlbarkeit, Freiberg.
- B. Tierney (1972), Origins of Papal Infallibility, Leyden.
- P. Chirico (1977), Infallibility: The Crossroads of Doctrine, London.
- H. Fries (1985), Fundamentaltheologie, Graz, §58, 480–95.
- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie 3, Göttingen, 458–72.

RISTO SAARINEN

See also Church; Magisterium; Word of God

Infinite

In theology the attribute of infinity designates that absence of intrinsic limits that is proper to the divine essence. In the absolute sense, infinity signifies divine perfection, simplicity, and uniqueness; it can only apply to God. A being whose essence is limitless possesses all possible perfection to the sovereign degree. Such a being cannot enter into composition with anything and no other being could share this attribute (attributes*, divine). Therefore, this being is unique. Moreover, absolute infinity excludes all indeterminacy, insofar as God is a distinct, singular being. The divine essence remains unknowable to a finite intelligence. The infinity of the essence of God thus founds his unknowability.

Theology* has always conceived God's power (omnipotence*) as infinite, but the application of the concept of infinity to the divine essence has not always seemed legitimate. The Bible does speak of divine perfection (Mt 5:48 and Is 40:17), eternity* (Dt 32:40), and so forth, but there is no passage where it is said that God is infinite. The one that comes closest is Psalm 145:3, which reads: "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised, and his greatness is unsearchable" (the Vulgate translated the last two words as "non est finis" or "without end"). Though the affirmation did not seem to create any problem for certain Neoplatonists and Fathers of the Church, it was achieved at the cost of many battles in the Latin Occident. The infinity of the divine essence was not explicitly proclaimed until a 19th-century synodal text (Vatican I, DS 3001*).

A. Greek Antiquity

a) From the Pre-Socratics to Plato. Anaximander was the first to use the word infinite for the first principle. He reasoned that because the origin cannot be identified with any of the elements at its source, the principle can only be indeterminate or infinite. Infinity maintained its importance for the Pythagorists, but apeiron was conjugated in the finite in the production of things. The infinite is a material principle, the finite a structuring, determinant principle. There is no place for infinity in the thought of Parmenides: the One is immutable, simple, but finite. Melissos, another Eleatic, stood against his master on this point. He argues that the uniqueness of the One presupposes its infinity: the One would not be unique if it were finite; by its infinity it is the positive principle of real. Anaxagoras, Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurius also conceived the infinite as a perfection, as opposed to both Parmenides and Pythagoras and also to Plato and Aristotle.

In Plato's Philebus, the infinite and the finite are, as for the Pythagorists, the two constituent principles of reality. The infinite of indetermination connotes the excessive and imperfect; for the constitution of things it requires a limit (peras). However, in the second part of Parmenides (137 d.) there is a brief allusion to the infinity of the One that hardly accords with the doctrine of Philebus. Plato hypothesizes that "If it is true that it has no beginning and no end, then it is true that the One is infinite." And since Parmenides was the subject of a large number of commentaries by the Neoplatonists, who took its hypotheses as descriptions of reality rather than logical exercises, the text is a source of the Plotinian (and even the Dionysian) doctrine of the infinity of the One.

b) Aristotle. Even if Aristotle did not know the ontological infinite, the long analyses in Physics, l. III were a major influence on the history of this concept in the sciences and theology. Aristotle conceived infinity as an exclusive attribute of quantity (numerical or dimensional); therefore it can never be encountered in the form of a finished whole. The infinite is always in potential, which led to the idea that "the infinite as infinite is unknowable," cited by medieval thinkers in support of divine unknowability, and the principle that “nothing is greater than the infinite,” invoked in favor of the absolute, inexhaustible nature of the divine essence.

c) Plotinus. Plotinus was the first thinker to attach importance to the divine infinity. The One is infinite, he declared, in that it is not contained by any form and escapes all specific or material determination. All that exists has an essential determination; by its infinity the One is radically distinguished from the intellect, the soul (soul*-heart-body), and being*. This is by no means a negative or extrinsic characterization of the infinite and cannot be reduced to saying that the One has a limitation individually different from that which affects beings; on the contrary it implies that the One is, by essence, free of all limitation.

B. Christian Era

1. Patristic

Many Latin church fathers and to an even greater extent the Greek Fathers conceived of God as infinite. Marius Victorinus saw God as pure esse (“to be”), or infinitive being, which was distinct from and prior to participial “being.” If every being is a particular thing, that is, a form partially participating in being, pure being is infinite, limitless (infinitum, interminatum). If the determination of participial-being implies limitation (because this being is not that other one), God is determined only by the infinity of the being that he fully is. Victorinus’s doctrine, by attaching infinity to the being of God, announces the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas. However, Marius differs from the latter by conceiving the infinity of being as incompatible with God’s simplicity or uniqueness. He argues that pure being is so totally non-participial that it must be conceived par excellence as before the one and beyond simplicity. But Victorinus did not feel the need to imagine a sur-infinity—as Pierre de Candie would do in the 14th century—which shows that the concept of infinity was in itself sufficient to express absolute transcendence.

Augustine did not have much to say about infinity as attribute of the divine essence. The infinite figures in his thought as a synonym for eternity, almightiness (omnipotence*), or incomprehensibility, depending on the context; in God it signifies the absence of spatial and temporal boundaries. Generally speaking, Augustine thought of infinity in its mathematical sense; but toward the end of his life he also evoked the possibility that God is infinite (aliter).

In his Life of Moses, Gregory* of Nyssa described the divine as infinite according to its nature, that is, as non-circumscribed by a limit. And in Against Eunomius, he gave the first definition of the infinite as positive attribute: “The infinite (to aoriston) is not such with regard to a relation to something else, but thought according to itself it escapes from all limits.” Basil*, similarly, made God an aoristos and apeiros with no boundaries. Analogous thoughts are expressed in the works of Clement of Alexandria and Gregory* of Nazianzus.

Though infinity is relatively absent from Latin speculation from the fifth to the 12th century, the contrary is true in the Byzantine tradition, starting with Pseudo-Dionysius*. The Dionysian reflection reveals two influences that nourish two antinomic doctrines of infinity. One group of texts subordinates the peras and apeiron of the One, following the Neoplatonic tradition (Proclus and Damascius) but, in another group of texts, the Pseudo-Dionysius attributes the infinite directly to God. In Divine Names, c. 5, he states that “God does not exist in this or that way, but possesses all being ever since the origin, simply and without limits (aperioristôs).” The Dionysian reflections were made available in a 13th-century Latin Corpus dionysien with glosses attributed to Maximus* the Confessor. One of these glosses (written in fact by Jean of Scythopolis) describes God as infinite (aoristos) “because he does not fall within any limit.” Albert* the Great comments on this assertion, applying it directly to the essence of God. Jean of Damas explains that “Who is” is the name that best suits the essence of God, which explains his incomprehensibility for a finite intelligence.

2. Latin Middle Ages

a) Before the 13th Century. The 11th- and 12th-century Latin authors hardly attached any importance to divine infinity. Anselm*, for example, never writes that “God is infinite.” A century later, Peter Lombard would say that God is infinitely powerful, without thinking of applying infinity to the essence. Pierre de Poitiers, in the last third of the 12th century, did not use the word, nor did Robert de Melun. Stephen Langton saw it as nothing more than a synonym for indetermination; Hugh of St. Cher took it as a synonym for divine incomprehensibility. And yet Liber de causis, an Arabic work of Neoplatonic inspiration that explicitly named the Primus “infinite being,” was translated in the 12th century. The Primus, being nothing but its being, is pure being bereft of all other formal (hilyah) determination. Its determination lies in its very infinity. This is constitutive of God’s ipseity.

b) Doctrinal Condemnation of 1241. The question of infinity rebounded with a controversy over the possibility of seeing the essence of God in patria (beatific [beatitude*] vision). Some early 13th-century authors, influenced by Pseudo-Dionysius and John the Scot Eriugena, accentuated the distance between God and creatures, with particular emphasis on the unknowability of the divine essence. They were able to draw on a rich tradition, and yet they brought Aristotle into the argument: in De caelo it is declared that “between the finite and the infinite there is no proportion.” Invoking this lemma was recognizing that God is infinite and is distinguished from the creature by that attribute. But this notion was condemned in 1241, and certain authors later contested the right to preach for the divine essence, an attribute that Aristotle said was applicable only to quantitative magnitude. Gueric of Saint-Quentin, for example, considered the question “Is God finite or infinite?” meaningless. The divine essence, by definition immaterial, is not one of the things about which one can ask if they are finite or infinite, so speaking of an infinite essence is committing an error of category. Bonaventure* argued that the contemporaries of Gueric would have even said that God is finite with regard to essence. In fact, the real problem at that period was to reconcile divine simplicity (which excludes composition) with infinity (which supposes it), and this reconciliation would rapidly occur. Richard Fishacre, Albert the Great, Alexander of Hales, and John Pagus were the first authors to maintain that God is both knowable by the beatified intellect and simple and infinite in his essence. Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas were inspired by their solution.

c) Propositions of the Great Scholastic. The absence of biblical texts that clearly state the infinity of God posed a problem for medieval thinkers who sought to legitimize this controversial concept. The silence of Scripture was interpreted by some as a guarantee. The author of Summa halensis explains that God must be infinite in his essence because the Bible does not state the contrary! For lack of biblical references, there were attempts to rely on synodal authorities but they offered little more than (pseudo-) symbol of Athanasius, who speaks of immensity. That was enough for Bonaventure, who identified immensity and infinity, followed later by John of Ripa; this provided him with an adequate point of contact between the authority and the new doctrine. In order to put this idea in accord with Aristotle’s claim that infinity can only apply to quantitative substances, a different acceptance of the term had to be found for theological purposes. Three distinctions were introduced. Two different kinds of quantity were posited: “dimensional” quantity (that of Aristotle) and “virtual” quantity (which designates the degree of perfection of a being that one may consider infinite without betraying Aristotle). Two types of infinity, privative and negative, were distinguished. A being to whom it pertains to have an end but who does not have one is privatively infinite. A being to whom it does not pertain to have an end and who has none is negatively infinite (it is in this sense that God is infinite). And a distinction between the absolute infinite (simpliciter) and the relative infinite (secundum quid) parries all danger of confusion between God and the creature, because an infinity realized in matter—supposing that such a thing were possible—could never be but a relative infinity. An infinitely large body would be limited by the matter in which it is found. Therefore, only God is infinite in the full sense.

These distinctions were widespread in the Middle Ages, but each author used them in his own way. In Thomism*, the privative-negative notion was articulated on the distinction between material infinity and formal infinity. Matter is determined (finitur) by form, and form is determined by matter. However, the lack of (formal) determination in matter is synonymous with imperfection, the absence of (material) determination allowing form to reach its fullness. Here matter is a hindrance; there it is the necessary condition for access to substantiality.

In the thought of Alexander of Hales, Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, and Bonaventure, the infinite qualifies in its own right the divine essence, but always in terms of the negative attribute. Infinity means absence of limits, which certainly connotes perfection, but it does so in denying that the essence has a term; therefore it designates in God nothing positive that would correspond to our idea of infinity. Another conception, sketched out by Bonaventure, came to light at the end of the 13th century in the thought of Henry of Gand and Richard Middleton, culminating with Duns* Scotus. The latter argued that infinity is both the most adequate concept of God and his distinctive modality, prior to all propriety. I can think God without thinking of him as perfect or good, but I cannot think him without thinking of him as infinite. Infinity becomes a positive attribute that adds something to God. Duns Scotus founded the ontological primacy of infinity on an authentic demonstration of the “thinkable” nature of this concept. In the fifth Quodlibet, he shows that going from the infinite in potential of Aristotle one can arrive at an intensive infinity that encloses all perfection of the entity. His disciple Francis of Mayronnes established an even closer connection between the infinite and God in affirming the priority of infinity over existence.

d) Late Middle Ages. Nicholas* of Cusa conceived God as an infinity in which are dissolved the oppositions of the finite. The infinity of God is not simply opposed to a universe that contains infinities in potential, but to a universe that constitutes an infinity in act, in the quantitative order. The closed world* of antiquity burst open to leave room for an infinite universe whose very existence testifies to the infinite power of its creator. In the thought of Giordano Bruno, the infinity of space, conjugated with that of God and his power, brings along the existence of a limitless number of worlds. The difference between the infinity of God and that of the created universe tends to fade (pantheism*).

3. Modern Era

Descartes* reversed the classic conception of the negative infinite. Duns Scotus had already seen the infinite as designating a pure positivity, but Descartes went one step further in posing primacy of the infinite with regard to the finite in the very order of the ideal genesis. The infinite, adequate attribute of God, has par excellence the status of clear and distinct idea because it is the idea of absolute perfection, with regard to which the thinking substance grasps itself as limited and blemished with imperfection. It is in fact the absoluteness of that perfection that gives the thinking ego to understand that it cannot have for cause a being other than one who has in formal reality the same degree of perfection it has in objective (thinkable) reality. The idea of infinity—which Descartes distinguishes from the indefinite, characteristic of numbers and geometrical or physical magnitudes—is ontologically anterior to the idea of the finite. Descartes denies “that we conceive the infinite by negation of the finite, seeing that, on the contrary, all limitation includes the negation of the infinite.” For Spinoza the last step would be: The existence of the infinite substance makes impossible its coexistence with all other substance. One could not go any further in the affirmation of the primacy of the infinite.

Other noteworthy 17th-century authors are Charron, Malebranche, Pascal*, and Leibniz*. Leibniz, inspired by the results of infinitesimal calculation, confounded the Aristotelian axiom related to the impossibility of an infinity-in-act in nature. He admits the existence of actual infinities, whether in a continuum or in simple or composed substances. However, this does not affect the notion of divine infinity: “God is absolutely perfect; perfection being none other than the grandeur of positive reality taken precisely, setting apart the limits or boundaries in these perfect things.”

The empirical tradition was an exception to the unanimous medieval belief in the necessity of conceiving God as infinity. Hobbes, for example, was impenitently agnostic in the matter. He argued that because all knowledge comes from the senses, the infinite is never given to us in experience and so cannot be the subject of knowledge. This skepticism was a prelude to the generalized mistrust of natural* theology that prevailed in the 18th century. D’Alembert declared that asking oneself about the infinity of God is a simple case of “abusive metaphysics.” Kant* went so far in this direction that his thought could be described as a “philosophy* of finitude.” He raises the problem in the context of the insoluble antinomies of pure reason; infinity falls out of the field of categories of application of pure reason. Kant described the divine nature as “almighty” or “perfect” rather than infinite.

Hegel*, on the contrary, saw the finite and the infinite as interpenetrating. He introduced a new distinction between poor infinity (schlechte Unendlichkeit), which is but the negation of the finite, and an authentic infinity (wahrhaft Unendliche), which he saw as the negation of the negation, the conquest of self by the mediation of the other. Authentic infinity is, first, that of the Spirit conceived as negativity, and the Spirit does not reach full infinity but as absolute Spirit, at the term of a process of self-realization during which it actively frees itself of all finitude. The reciprocal admission of the finite and the infinite leads to elimination of the distinction between absolute Spirit and created being. Furthermore, this conception of infinity, which is both dynamic and negative, prevents seeing in infinity an attribute referring to immutability, the autarchy of the divine being.

4. Contemporary Period

Speculation on the infinite was not neglected in the 19th and 20th centuries, but the most original reflections are situated in the field of science (physics and mathematics) and ethics.

a) Ethics and Infinity. The doctrine of infinity in its traditional theological form found its most original expression in the 20th century in the thought of E. Levinas, rooted in a reflection on alterity. The Western conscience, in its epistemological function, has always tended to bring the Other down to the same. However, the Cartesian analysis of the infinite, in Méditation III, permits a reversal of this logic of assimilation. What Levinas found remarkable in the Cartesian idea of infinity is that its ideatum surpasses its idea: Thinking infinity I think more than what I think. Nonetheless Levinas believes that the infinite takes all its sense in the field of ethics, not theology. The infinite is an experience of irreducible alterity; its paradigm is revealed to me in the face of the Other and the Other's resistance to my desire to assimilate. The logical structure of the Cartesian analysis is thus retained in preference to the divine referent it was destined to manifest. The concept of infinity that medieval thinkers sought to attach to the divine essence is thereafter considered usable in other contexts.

Many original contributions mark the history of the infinite, but it can be said that the essential was already glimpsed by Marius Victorinus, and even Plotinus, and clearly stated by 13th-century Scholastics. They all expressed the existence of an infinite being, unique and distinct in virtue of this very infinity. It is, again, that fundamental intuition that Descartes adopted and modulated and Cantor did not disavow.

- Aristotle, Physics III, chap. 4–8.
- Augustine, The City of God XII, chap. 2, 4, 8–9.

- Bonaventure, Sentences I, d. 43, art. unicus, q. 2 (Quaracchi, vol. I).
- Jean Damascene, De fide orthodoxa I, chap. 9; II, chap. 3 (Kotter I, II).
- Descartes, Méditations métaphysiques (A–T, vol. IX–1).
- Duns Scotus, Quodlibet V (Vivès, vol. 5).
- E. Levinas, “La philosophie et l’idée de l’i,” RMM 62 (1957), 241–53.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST I, q. 7, a. 1.
- ♦ H. Guyot (1906), L’infinité divine depuis Philon le juif jusqu’à Plotin, Paris.
- A. Edel (1934), Aristotle’s Theory of the Infinite, New York.
- É. Gilson (1954), “L’infinité divine chez saint Augustin,” AugM, I, 569–74.
- C. de Vogel (1959), “La théorie de l’apeiron chez Platon et dans la tradition platonicienne,” RPL 49, 21–39.
- P. Vignaux (1976), “Être et infini selon Duns Scot et Jean de Ripa,” in De saint Anselme à Luther, 352–66.
- J. W. Dauben (1977), “Cantor and Pope Leon XIII: Mathematics, Theology and the Infinite,” JHI 38, 85–108.
- L. Sweeney (1992), Divine Infinity in Greek and Medieval Thought, Berne-New York.
- A. Côté (1995 a), “L’infinité divine dans l’Antiquité et au Moyen Age,” Dialogue (Revue canadienne de philosophie) 34, 119–37; id. (1995 b) “Guerric de Saint-Quentin et le problème de l’infinité divine,” in Les philosophies morales et politiques au Moyen Age: Actes du IXe Congrès international de philosophie médiévale III, Ottawa, 1132–48.

ANTOINE CÔTÉ

See also Attributes, Divine; Duns Scotus, John; Negative Theology; Omnipotence, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine

Initiation, Christian

Initiation can be understood to have three meanings. For the fathers of the church, who adopted the notion from the religions with holy mystery, it designated the sacraments (sacrament*) through which one is made a Christian. Today is added the idea of a progressiveness, of entering upon a journey (initiation to). Finally, the ethnological sense designates the process by which individuals reach a new membership status to a tribe or specific group.

The fathers recognized the notion of initiation as early as the second century but hardly used it before the end of the fourth century. From then on they used it to indicate the sacraments that determine Christian identity: baptism, together with its related rites that would later receive the name confirmation*, as well as the first Eucharist. According to Kretschmar (1977), baptism “is the original name for initiation in its entirety.”

The concept was unknown during the Middle Ages except in the vocabulary of the religious novitiate (the shift is significant). It would be revived by scholars from the Renaissance onward, but especially, at the end of the 19th century, by L. Duchesne, who devoted a chapter to it in his Origines du Culte Chrétien (1889). It was adopted by the Vatican* II Council: AG 14 (which also included the catechumenate) and PO 2 speak of the sacramenta initiationis christianae; SC 71 affirms “the close connection between this sacrament [confirmation] and the entire Christian initiation,” and the apostolic constitution that introduces the 1971 Rite of Confirmation speaks—for the first time in an official document—about the “unity of Christian initiation.” Henceforth, the mention of Christian initiation acted as a title for the Rites of Baptism and Confirmation, and for the presentation of the three sacraments in the CEC.

The theological notion signifies the restoration of an encompassing vision of the three sacraments, beyond their medieval independence. The Notes Doctrinales et Pastorales in Rituel de l'Initiation Chrétienne des Adultes express it with vigor: “According to the oldest usage, [...] an adult will not be baptized without receiving confirmation immediately after the baptism, unless there are serious reasons presented. This connection expresses the unity of the paschal mystery, the close relationship between the mission of the Son and the gift of the Holy* Spirit, and the conjunction of these sacraments through which Christ* and the Holy Spirit communicate with the Father to the baptized” (n. 34, see CIC, can. 866). The unity of the three sacraments is therefore not only circumstantial: it stems from Trinitarian theology. This theological unity, however, is realized differently in the respective cases of adults and children. At the paschal vigil the former usually receive the three sacraments at the hands of the bishop, though the priest (priesthood*) is lawfully permitted to administer them in the bishop’s absence (Rituel, 228). In the case of children, the Western Church spreads these three celebrations over a period of time, while the notion of initiation means that they are nonetheless understood in terms of a dynamic unity rather than as isolated celebrations. These perspectives were accepted, with some variation, by the Orthodox and Catholics (document by Bari 1987).

Another question concerns the relationships between the structures of initiation of a specific society and Christian initiation. This question certainly influenced the history of the West (question of spiritual relationship, see Lynch 1986), while today it is crucial in several African countries (Sanon-Luneau 1982) where the debate concerns its pertinence for the future of a continent that is more and more influenced by Western lifestyles.

- P.-M. Gy (1977), “La notion chrétienne d’initiation Jalons pour une enquête,” MD 132, 33–54.
- G. Kretschmar (1977), “Nouvelles recherches sur l’initiation chrétienne,” MD 132, 7–32.
- A. T. Sanon, R. Luneau (1982), Enraciner l’Évangile: Initiations africaines et pédagogie de la foi, Paris.
- J. Lynch (1986), Godparents and Kinship in Early Medieval Europe, Princeton.
- J. Ries, H. Limet (1986), Les rites d’initiation, Louvain-la-Neuve.
- Commission mixte internationale catholique-orthodoxe (1987), “Foi, sacrements et unité de l’Église” (doc. by Bari), DC 85, 1988, 122–26.
- A. de Halleux (1988), “Foi, baptême et unité: A propos du document de Bari,” Iren. 61, 155–87.
- E. Lanne (1988), “Réflexion complémentaire sur le document de Bari,” ibid., 189–205.
- A. Fayol-Fricout, A. Pasquier, O. Sarda (1991), L’initiation chrétienne, démarche catéchuménale, Paris.

PAUL DE CLERCK

See also Baptism; Confirmation; Eucharist; Inculturation; Sacrament

Inspiration of Scripture. See Holy Scripture

Integrism

Integrism (from the French, intégrisme) is a term that appears in sociology and religious history and that is almost totally lacking in theological (or philosophical) development. Intégrisme is commonly understood in the Catholic world as the conjunction of fundamentalism*, ultramontanism*, an erroneous concept of tradition*, and the fear inspired by modernity. Intégrisme wishes to preserve the integrity and the entirety of the doctrines and institutions of the Church*, but at the cost of a strict prohibition of any change in doctrines and any legitimate reform of institutions. The opposite of intégrisme is “progressivism,” another phenomenon that has not been given adequate theological analysis.

- Y. Marchasson (1993), “Intégrisme,” in P. Poupard (Ed.), Dictionnaire des religions, Paris, 3rd Ed. I, 963–68.

THE EDITORS

See also Fundamentalism; Liberalism; Tradition-alism

Intellectualism

1. Definition

“Intellectualism” made its appearance toward the end of the 19th century, in the historiography of the Latin Middle Ages, as an antonym of “voluntarism*.” It is important to keep in mind that it is a concept developed by commentators and is absent from the original sources. It is used to designate several different arguments, all of which arise from the same impulse: an affirmation of the primacy of the intellect over the will. It is also sometimes used in a less precise sense to designate confidence in the intellect’s capacity to attain to the divine, a confidence that rests on an affirmation of the divine nature of the intellect itself.

2. History

The privileged domain to which the concept, in its strict sense, is applied is Scholastic (Scholasticism*) thought of the 13th and 14th centuries. The controversies that arose in this period, in particular those between Franciscans and Dominicans, clearly set forth the alternative that until then had been latent between the primacy of the intellect and the primacy of the will. Dominican thought was at the time predominantly intellectualistic and was opposed to what has been called “Franciscan voluntarism.” During the same period another movement with an intellectualistic tendency appeared, based on the adoption by Albert* the Great of the Aristotelian notion of “conjunction” (Christian Aristotelianism*). This movement developed in two directions: on the one hand, Latin Averroism, notably in Jean de Jandun (naturalism*); on the other, the German Dominican school, notably in Meister Eckhart and Dietrich of Freiburg (Rhineland-Flemish mysticism*). We will leave it to one side: in fact, it chiefly emphasizes philosophical happiness without implying an intellectualistic theory of beatitude*, whereas the debate between intellectualism and voluntarism in the 13th and 14th centuries grew primarily out of theological questions.

If intellectualism experienced a rapid expansion in the 13th century, this was by virtue of its privileged relation to Aristotle, whose works were then being rediscovered in the West, particularly the theories of choice (Nicomachean Ethics III. 5; VII. 5), happiness (Nicomachean Ethics X. 7), and knowledge (De Anima III. 5). However, it is not in the 13th century that the birth of intellectualism should be situated, nor can it be thought of solely with reference to Aristotle. The first appearance of intellectualism in the strict sense can be traced back to Greek patristics with the intellectualism

(in the broad sense) of Platonic thought and its adoption in a Christian context.

3. Theological Issues

The affirmation of the primacy of the intellect over the will in created beings raises two principal questions: the basis of liberty in higher beings and the nature of the movement toward beatitude.

a) Liberty. A theory of liberty is intellectualistic if it bases free will on the intellect and not the will. The will is directed toward absolute good. But nothing in this life fully realizes the good, because all good is mixed with evil. This gives rise to two consequences: on the one hand, a finite thing can never be desired except as a means to the end, and it thereby escapes the necessity that binds the will to its end; on the other hand, no finite thing provides the will with the means necessary for it to reach its end. Free will therefore functions in the determination of means to the end. But for intellectualism, this choice of means does not derive from the will; it is the intellect that convinces the will to will a certain object, and it does so according to the way in which it conceives that object, presenting it to the will as something that is good or evil. The apprehension of the object therefore determines the desire or repulsion that the will experiences with respect to that object, for the will does not have the power to reject what the intellect perceives to be good or to desire what the intellect perceives to be evil. Intellectual knowledge thus plays the role of determining cause in the specification of the acts of the will. The will, according to the intellectualistic conception of free will, is not free to choose what it wills, neither its end nor the means leading to that end. It is the object, insofar as it is known, that causes the determination of voluntary acts; free will is thus based on the indeterminacy of judgment and not on an indeterminacy of the will itself. Historically, it was Boethius*'s commentaries on Aristotle that provided the Latin tradition with an intellectualistic conception of liberty as liberum de voluntate iudicium (PL 64. 492–93). This conception, for which free will resides in reason, was adopted and developed by Abelard* and Prevotinus of Cremona, and then by William of Auxerre, before flowering in Thomas Aquinas and Godefroid of Fontaines. Some Averroists adopted it for their own, notably Siger of Brabant. In the list of theses condemned by Étienne Tempier in 1277, propositions 151 and 162 to 166 correspond to this position (naturalism).

b) Nature of the Movement toward Beatitude. In the treatment of this question, the intellectualistic theory asserts that the essence of beatitude resides principally in the action of the intellect and not the action of the will. Many arguments can support this affirmation of the intellectual character of ultimate happiness. One can rely first on the superiority of the intellect as a faculty. It will then be said that the intellect is a nobler faculty than the will because the will is an appetite and because every existent is endowed with appetite, whereas intellect belongs only to higher beings; it is therefore more fitting that the process by which those beings attain their particular end be produced by the intellect. It also happens that the intellectualistic conception is based on the comparison of acts of intellection and volition in relation to the end sought, namely, union with God. By reason of the unifying capacity of those acts, a hierarchy is established between the faculties. The matter at issue is important. Does the most perfect access to divinity derive from knowledge or from love? Any answer to this question requires a determination of which of the two acts most fully unites us with its object and a decision as to whether or not love may be conceived as that which makes it possible to go beyond the limits of knowledge. According to the intellectualistic answer, the act through which we are most intimately united with God is an act of intellection, and love does not go beyond knowledge. Like any act of will, love proceeds from knowledge and receives from it its limits; since its object is external to it, it falls short of the kind of union with the object that can be produced by intellection. The Aristotelian theory of an intellect that becomes everything makes it possible in this context to describe union with God in terms that ensure the superiority of intellection.

It should be noted that this argument does not necessarily apply to intellectual knowledge in via (intellectualism is not necessarily a naturalism, although naturalism is its constant temptation). The question of the primacy of intellectual knowledge over love is indeed complicated when a distinction is established between the historical reality—in via—and the eschatological reality—in patria—of both of these acts. Thus, an intellectualistic understanding of beatitude is perfectly compatible with the argument according to which the ecstasy of love in this life goes beyond any intellectual knowledge of God (Gregory* of Nazianzus, Pseudo-Dionysius*), or even with the affirmation of a primacy of the will within the limits of this life (Thomas Aquinas).

The intellectualistic understanding of beatitude often relies on John 17:3, and it appeared as early as the Greek Fathers, particularly Justin (apologists*), Clement of Alexandria, and Origen*. It was later developed in the Latin tradition, particularly by Abelard*. And in the 13th and 14th centuries it was under the influence of the theme of theoretical happiness in Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics that the intellectualistic understanding of beatitude achieved prominence both in the faculty of arts (philosophy) and in that of theology. Whether happiness and beatitude were identified with one another (as for Pseudo-Peckham and Arnoul de Provence), or philosophical happiness was conceived of as an imperfect beatitude (according to Thomas Aquinas, Boethius of Dacia, and Gilles d'Orléans), the Aristotelian description of theoretical happiness provided the model in both cases according to which beatitude was conceived, and it was principally concerned with the intellect. It was particularly on this point that the Franciscan Guillaume de la Mare attacked Thomas Aquinas in his Correctoire, and the Franciscan order officially gave him its support in 1282, prohibiting any reading of the Summa Theologica that was not supplemented by the reading of the correction. Godefroid de Fontaines and the literature of the "corrections of the corrupter" came to the defense of Thomas and strengthened intellectualism. And the question was again at the heart of the debate that, in the early years of the 14th century, would oppose Meister Eckhart and Gonzalvo of Spain, both directly and indirectly (a debate in which "Eckhart's reasons" were clearly intellectualistic). Points of opposition were nevertheless not always as clear-cut as it may seem, as evidenced precisely by Eckhart's conception of beatitude (which involved love as well as knowledge) or, in the Dominican John of Paris (Quidort), a conception of reflexive vision that attempted to combine intellectualism and voluntarism.

4. Intellectualistic Theory Applied to God

A certain manner of understanding divine liberty and power (omnipotence*) also deserves to be called intellectualistic. But intellectualism in this context can no longer signify a primacy of the intellect over the will, which moreover are not really distinct in God. It offers an answer to the question of the relation between divine will and the good or the relation of divine intellect and the possible. On the one hand, does the good impose itself on God or does God determine the good? On the other hand, does the possible impose itself on God or does the power of God go so far as to determine the possible? These are the questions.

In one discussion, it seems that only Hugh of Saint-Cher and Descartes* asserted that God determines the possible. Thomas Aquinas, Duns* Scotus, William of Ockham (nominalism*), and later Leibniz* all asserted in one way or another that the possible does not depend on God.

The other discussion has patristic origins, and Augustine already provided an understanding of divine action according to which God does not determine the good and cannot do evil. This notion recurs in Abelard, directing God's action toward the best so that God cannot do evil, but above all can do only what he does. This extreme argument, which limited God's liberty in the name of his wisdom, was condemned by the Council of Sens. The principal writers of the 13th century, notably Thomas Aquinas, belonged to this tradition. It was only in the 14th century, with speculations on divine power, that the contrary argument was developed, particularly in the nominalist movement. For this argument, divine will does not have to submit to the good, because that will on the contrary determines the good (voluntarism*). Leibniz returned to the "intellectualistic" tradition by allowing the principle of the best to provide a norm for divine action.

- Abelard, Epitome theologiae christianae, c. 20, PL 178, 1724–28; Introductio ad theologiam, l. III, c. V, ibid., 1093–103.
- Boethius, In librum Aristotelis de interpretatione libri sex., PL 64, 492–93.
- Boethius of Dacia, Opuscula, Copenhagen, 1976. Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis, Ed. Denifle-Chatelain, Paris, 1889–91.
- Clement of Alexandria, Stromata V, SC 278, ch. X–XIII, p. 124–72, and XIV, 94-3, 96-3, p. 180–82.
- Pseudo-Dionysius, De divinis nominibus, Ed. B. R. Suchla, PTS 33, 1990; De mystica theologia, Ed. G. Heil and A.M. Ritter, PTS 36, 1991.
- P. Glorieux, Les premières polémiques thomistes, vol. 1: Le correctorium corruptorii "quare", n. 24, 54, 58, Kain, 1927; vol. 2: Le correctorium corruptorii "sciendum", Paris, 1956.
- Godefroid de Fontaines, Quodlibeta, in Les philosophes belges, vol. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 14, Louvain, 1904, 1914, 1931, 1935, 1938, especially II, q. 9; III, q. 15–16; VI, q. 7–10; VIII, q. 16.
- Jean Quidort (Ed. J.-P. Muller), Le Correctorium Corruptorii "circa" de Jean Quidort de Paris, Rome, 1941.
- Justin, Dialogus cum Tryphone judaeo, Text and French trans. by G. Archambault, 2 vols., Paris, 1909, chap. 2–6.
- Origen, Contra Celsum, SC 132, 136, 147, 150, and 227 passim, see index s.v. gnôsis, noûs, pisteuein, pistis.
- Siger de Brabant, Quaestiones in Metaphysicam, l. V, q. 8; l. VI, q. 9, Louvain, 1981 and 1983; Quaestiones super Librum de causis, q. 25, Louvain-Paris, 1972.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 82, a. 1, 2, 3; q. 83, a. 1, 3, 4; Ia IIae, q. 3, a. 4; q. 8, q. 9, a. 1, 3, 4; q. 10, a. 1, 2; De Veritate, q. 22 and 24; Quaestiones disputatae de Malo, q. 6.
- William of Auxerre, Summa aurea, l. II, vol. X, c. II, Paris-Rome, 1980–87.
- ♦ P. Rousselot (1924), L'intellectualisme de saint Thomas, Paris.
- O. Lottin (1925), "L'intellectualisme de la morale thomiste," Xenia thomistica I, Rome, 411–27.
- M. Grabmann (1940), "Das Studium der aristotelischen Ethik an der Artistenfakultät der Universität Paris in der ersten Hälfte des 13. Jhs.," PhJ 53, 339–54.
- O. Lottin (1942), Psychologie et morale aux XIIIe et XIVe siècles, Louvain.
- J.-P. Muller (1947), "La thèse de Jean Quidort sur la béatitude formelle," Mélanges A. Pelzer, Louvain, 493–511.

- N. Wicki (1954), Die Lehre von der himmlischen Seligkeit in der mittelalterlichen Scholastik von Petrus Lombardus bis Thomas von Aquin, Freiberg.
- R.-A. Gauthier (1964), "Les questiones supra librum Ethicorum de Pierre d'Auvergne," RMAL 20, 233–60; id. (1975), "Le cours sur l'Ethica nova d'un maître ès arts de Paris (1235–1240)," AHDL 42, 71–141.
- R. Hissette (1977), Enquête sur les 219 articles condamnés à Paris le 7 mars 1277, Paris-Louvain.
- E. zum Brunn, Z. Kaluza, A. de Libera (1984), Maître Eckhart à Paris, une critique médiévale de l'ontothéologie, Paris.
- A. de Libera (1984), Introduction à la mystique rhénane, Paris.
- A.J. Celano (1986), "The 'finis hominis' in the thirteenth cen-

- ture commentaries on Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics," AHDL 53, 23–53.
- O. Boulnois (Ed.) (1994), La puissance et son ombre, de Pierre Lombard à Luther, Paris.
- F.-X. Putallaz (1995), Insolente liberté: Controverses et condamnations au XIIIe siècle, Fribourg-Paris.
- C. Trottmann (1995), La vision béatifique, Des disputes scolastiques à sa définition par Benoît XII, Rome.

LAURENCE RENAULT

See also Beatitude; Liberty; Love; Vision, Beatific; Voluntarism

Intention

(a) Definition. Intention is the goal that one hopes to achieve through an action. Since aims may be immediate or long term, and since an action may serve multiple purposes, intention refers to the entire structure of meaning that informs the action. Intention is one of the crucial aspects of the morality of an action.

(b) Thomas Aquinas's Analysis. In the summary of the process of action (ST Ia IIae, q. 12), intention comes first, since all action begins with the desire to reach some end. This ending may be general and true for all people, such as health, or it may be particular to the individual, such as an ambition to become an architect. In the latter case, a genuine intention results in preparations in order to make the goal a reality. Intentions are not vague wishes.

Both an end and the means (or series of means) leading to it are included in intention. The end can be realized only through particular means, and the means need to be chosen in relation to the desired end in order to initiate the execution of the action. Thus, intention includes both the overall purpose or "ultimate" end, such as health, and the object of the act or its "nearing" end, such as the preparation of a remedy (ST Ia IIae, q. 12, a. 3). Desire for an end is properly a matter of the attraction of the will to what appears good (Ia IIae, q. 8, a. 1), but the intellect also plays a part, since there is no intention without knowledge of its end (Ia IIae, q. 12, a. 1, ad 1).

(c) Modern Viewpoints. Modern moral ideas tend to take the goodness of the end as a sufficient condition for the goodness of the act, forgetting that intention includes the means toward this end. With utilitarianism* especially, one can easily justify actions from which good results are expected. Another tendency has been to make the end subjective (Pinckaers 1961). This results in the substitution of vague sentiments, such as benevolence, rather than actual goods (good*) as objects of intention.

(d) "Double Effect." The nature of intention can be better understood when considering the problem of an action with two effects—one good and one bad—and distinguishing between the intended good effect and the evil result as a side effect. Thomas* Aquinas evokes this possibility while discussing legitimate* defense (ST Ia IIae, q. 64, a. 7): a person has the right to defend him- or herself against unjust attack by using force, perhaps even killing the assailant, but the prime intention must be to save one's own life and not to harm the attacker, plus the use of force must be proportionate to the situation.

Further treatment of this idea, especially by Vitoria (c. 1485–1546), Suarez*, and Jean de Saint-Thomas (1589–1644), resulted in the formulation of the following criteria: 1) the act itself must be good, or indifferent; 2) the good effect must be what the agent intends; 3) the good effect must not be produced by the evil effect; and 4) a proportionately grave reason is required for allowing the evil effect. Some think that this is in continuity with the doctrine of Aquinas (Mangan 1949), others that it is a significant departure from his thought, especially on the part of Jean de Saint-Thomas (Ghoos 1951).

Critics of double effect argue that if the evil consequences are foreseen, then they are intended, because the agent knows that the act, freely performed, will have these results (e.g., that attacking a group of terrorists will result in the death of some civilians). The negative effects are part of the action and must certainly be considered part of the agent's responsibility. The objection fails to realize, however, that intention involves more than awareness, since it is a matter of the will, and that it is not the results of an action that determine its moral value.

The distinction between formal and material cooperation in sin also illuminates the role of intention: material cooperation consists in coming to the aid of a criminal or a sinner, without condoning the sin, while formal cooperation involves sharing the intention and agreeing with the purpose of the sinner.

Despite the risks of self-deception or rationalizing (in particular, in time of war), the importance of intention must be acknowledged to judge the value of an act. The double effect doctrine may seem artificial or casuistic in a bad way, but the idea of providence must imply a similar analysis. The presence of evil in the world is explained by making a distinction between God's intention of creation, which is that the universe should be good, and the foreseeable yet unintended results that are sin and evil.

- H. D. Simonin (1930), "La notion d'intentio dans l'œuvre de saint Thomas d'Aquin," RSPHTh 19, 445–63.
- J. T. Mangan (1949), "An Historical Analysis of the Principle of Double Effect," TS 10, 41–61.
- J. Ghoos (1951), "L'acte à double effet: étude de théologie positive," ETHL 27, 30–52.
- S. Pinckaers (1961), "Le rôle de la fin dans l'action morale selon saint Thomas," RSPHTh 45, 393–421.
- E. Anscombe (1963), Intention, Oxford.
- J. Finnis (1991), "Object and Intention in Moral Judgments According to Aquinas," Thom 55, 1–27.

DANIEL WESTBERG

See also Conscience; Legitimate Defense; Ethics

Intercession. See Indulgences; Prayer

Intercommunion

(a) Definition. Intercommunion means, most generally, Eucharistic fellowship between distinct churches, but its meaning has become more restricted in the course of the 20th century. At the First World Conference on Faith and Order (1927), the term complete intercommunion was synonymous with "full communion" or "complete collaboration" (Acts 453, 462). Already, however, the term "intercommunion" was criticized as "ambiguous" (462).

Spurred by the lack of mutual admission to the Eucharist* by the Churches, the Faith and Order Commission conducted a major study of intercommunion in preparation for the Third World Conference in Lund (1952). In its definitions, the conference distinguished "intercommunion" from "full communion." Intercommunion exists where two churches that are not in the same confessional family agree to permit their communicant members to take part in the holy supper or to participate in the Eucharist freely in one or the other church. In most cases, intercommunion involves intercelebration, that is, that "the ministers can celebrate the sacrament...freely in one or the other church"

(Rapport 1952). At the request of the World Council of Churches, in 1968, the commission again took up the question of intercommunion and (redefined it) simply as “reciprocal admission” to the (Eucharist) by two or more churches (1971).

This definition corresponds to the present use of the term intercommunion. Intercommunion exists between two churches that officially and reciprocally admit members of the other to partake of the Eucharist. It may be strengthened when the churches not only admit but reciprocally invite members of the other churches to participate or when the churches urge their members to accept such an invitation.

(b) History and Present Situation. In the patristic church, intercommunion without full communion was understood as fellowship with schism* or heresy* and, therefore, was rejected (Elert 1954). Lutherans and Calvinists maintained a similar policy following the Reformation; intercommunion was a sign of unity* in the faith, which it presupposed (Baillie-March 1952). The Orthodox churches, the Catholic Church, and some conservative Protestant churches still maintain such a policy.

In the first half of the 20th century, the question of intercommunion was central to certain bilateral agreements that stopped short of full communion, such as those between the Church of England and the Scandinavian Lutheran churches. In the middle of the century, restricting communion to members of one’s own church or of churches in full communion with it was increasingly questioned in many Protestant churches (see, e.g., the studies of Koinonia [1957] by the Lutheran churches in Germany and Intercommunion Today [1968] by the Church of England). In 1954, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches recommended the admission of all baptized Christians to the Eucharist, regardless of their church of origin. Many Lutheran and Anglican churches adopted similar policies. Explicit declarations of intercommunion among these churches thus lost much of their significance, since intercommunion is implicitly practiced between all churches, in the sense that their members are admitted to communion. Declarations of intercommunion have remained significant as elements within more comprehensive declarations of communion (e.g., the Leuenberg Agreement [1973] among Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches in Europe).

(c) Theological Problems. Intercommunion raises the question of the relation between the eucharistic fellowship realized by reciprocal admission to the Eucharist and the unity that exists or is sought in the church. Churches that admit all baptized Christians to the Eucharist sometimes argue that such general intercommunion is demanded by the unity given in baptism. Such general intercommunion expresses the unity of all Christians more than the unity of any specific churches.

Official declarations of intercommunion, especially when accompanied by joint celebrations of the Eucharist, are sometimes seen as foretastes of a fuller communion that the churches are seeking (see the Meissen Agreement [1991] between the Church of England and the Evangelical Church in Germany).

For the Orthodox churches, the Eucharist, as the sacrament of the unity of the church, is incompatible with division. Inter-communion is a contradiction in terms, for communion points to the unity of the church while inter- indicates a plurality of churches. The Eucharist thus can be rightly celebrated and received only by those within the unity of the church.

The Catholic Church also insists that “eucharistic communion” is “inseparably linked to full ecclesial communion” (Ecumenical Directory). Intercommunion is therefore rejected in principle. Nevertheless, because a real but imperfect communion is acknowledged with all baptized Christians, with other “ecclesial communities,” and especially with the Orthodox churches, the Catholic Church is open to “a certain communion in sacris, and therefore within the Eucharist,” with the Orthodox churches (CEC, 1399), and accepts to administer the sacraments in case of emergency to “Christians who do not have full communion with the Catholic Church... provided they manifest Catholic faith in these sacraments and are properly disposed” (ibid. 1401). Since it does not recognize the validity of the sacrament of ordination (priesthood*) in the Protestant churches, “eucharistic intercommunion with other communities is not possible for the Catholic church” (ibid. 1400).

- Foi et Constitution (1927), Actes officiels de la Conférence mondiale de Lausanne, Paris.
- D. Baillie and J. March (1952), Intercommunion, London.
- Foi et Constitution (1952), Rapport de la Conférence œcuménique de Lund, Paris.
- W. Elert (1954), Abendmahl und Kirchengemeinschaft in der Alten Kirche, hauptsächlich des Ostens, Berlin.
- Oekumenischer Ausschuß der Vereinigten evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche Deutschlands (1957), Koinonia.
- Archbishops’ Commission on Intercommunion (1968), Intercommunion Today.
- Foi et Constitution (1971), “Au-delà de l’intercommunion,” in Ist 16 (1971), 352–75.
- G. Limouris (1986), “The Eucharist as the Sacrament of Sharing: An Orthodox Point of View,” ER 38, 410–15.
- Catéchisme de l’Église catholique* (1992), Paris, par. 1398–402.

MICHAEL ROOT

See also Church; Communion; Eucharist; Unity of the Church

Interpretation. See Hermeneutics

Intertestament

1. Terminology

The term intertestament covers both a period, from the second century B.C. to the second century A.D., and a literary production. But, with the discovery of the manuscripts of the Astronomical Book of Enoch found in Qumran, the period has been extended back to the late third century B.C. From the literary point of view, the intertestament brings together, over the course of these centuries, heterogeneous Jewish writings representing the interpretation of the biblical revelation in different circles. Some reject the term intertestament as being too ambiguous and prefer to speak of “ancient Jewish literature.” For: 1) Chronologically, the intertestament is not located “between” the Old Testament and the New Testament but encompasses the two eras. 2) The idea of the two testaments is Christian. Judaism prefers to speak of “Jewish literature between the Bible and the Mishnah” (Nickelsburg 1981). 3) This title itself is equivocal, because the concept of Bible as a completed book presupposes a canon* of Scripture, a definition that, for Jews as for Christians, took place only at the turn of the second century, precisely when the intertestament came to an end.

However, Mosaic law* was very early considered the quintessential book (Sir 24:23) and the focal point of divine revelation, seconded by the writings of the prophets (prophet* and prophecy) (see the Greek prologue to Sirach; Mt 5:17). Different Jewish circles supplemented this central axis with various writings that made it possible for them to specify their particular orientations. Following the model of the ambient Hellenistic culture, Jewish culture of the period tended to fix its history and traditions (tradition*) in writing, in order to identify itself in relation to other groups and nations. Some of these books entered into the canon of Hellenistic Judaism (Tobit, Judith, the additions to Daniel and to Esther). Others were excluded from the Jewish canon but accepted by certain churches (church*): for example, the Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch (Chaldean Church) and the Ethiopian Enoch. As a consequence the border between “biblical” and “intertestamentary” writings has become porous. It is difficult to specify further here the fruitful concept of intertestament and to retrace “the social space of the book” (A. Paul, EU 15. p. 996), everything through which, in its diversity, the ancient Jewish world evidenced its manner of receiving and interpreting the divine revelation to which it lay claim.

2. Stakes

Christian exegesis* long paid special attention to the influences that inserted the ancient Church into the currents of the Roman Empire: Hellenistic-Oriental religions, Gnosticism, Mandeism. Christianity was given a privileged status as the child liberated from its Jewish matrix, and the literature of the intertestament served as a foil demonstrating the superiority of Christian ideas over Judaism. For its part, Jewish scholarship removed from the intertestament, as heterodox, everything that rabbinic Judaism had later excluded (Urbach 1979), namely the apocalypses and pseudepigrapha (or apocrypha*) of the Old Testament. By the beginning of this century Christian writers had the intuition that the roots of Christianity were better explained in terms of its Jewish origin than by Hellenistic or Mandaean influences. From this came the literary monument of Pfarer P. Billerbeck, sponsored by H.L. Strack: Kommentar zum neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrash (1926). But the documentation assembled by Billerbeck was often from a period too late to shed valid light on the New Testament. Similarly, later popularized works, which were based on Talmudic documentation from the fourth and fifth centuries, tended to make Jesus into a rabbi (see Tassin 1986).

Current interest in the intertestament has its sources in a methodological reorientation. Whereas rabbinic

Judaism subsequent to the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 appears as a unified world, earlier Judaism, by contrast, was polymorphous and scattered. Its diversity is shown both in ancient translations of the Bible and in pseudepigrapha. This Judaism was a mosaic that included the pharisees, the sadducees, the Essenes, the Baptists, and the movement of Jesus, not to forget the Jewish diaspora that set out to translate the biblical message in the Hellenistic environment.

The Jews of the first century did not read the Bible as a bare text but spontaneously supplemented it with interpretive traditions that were ramified in the profusion of the intertestament. For example, the exultation of Abraham in John 8:56 is understood in the context of a Judaism that, in Genesis 17:17, changes the incredulous laughter of the patriarch into joy; hence the translation of the Targum of Onqelos: "He rejoiced." But this theme had already been emphasized in the second century B.C. in the book of Jubilees (14:21, 15:17, 16:19; Grelot 1988 RdQ 49–52, 621–28). The intertestament thus requires critical work that attempts to date the development of traditions (Vermes 1961) in order to distinguish those that are capable of restoring the Jewish background to the New Testament. La nuit pascale (Le Déaut 1963) represents a model of this method.

3. Works

It is impossible to enumerate and classify here all those works that have in common their Jewish origin and thereby are to be distinguished from the New Testament apocrypha. They include the apocalyptic* literature and the pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament. This latter category includes books that "rewrite" the Bible, such as the Apocryphal Genesis (in Aramaic) found in Qumran, and texts providing elaborations on biblical characters, such as Joseph and Aseneth, a religious romance of love and knighthood. But other works do not fit into these categories. Based on the narrative of the martyrs in 2 Maccabees 6–7, the Fourth Book of the Maccabees (first century A.D.) sets out an argument, influenced by Stoicism, on the value of "pious reason*" in ordeals. Some religious narratives are not directly rooted in biblical texts. The Letter of Aristeus to Philocrates (second century B.C.) recounts the legendary origin of the Septuagint. The Third Book of the Maccabees is a novel, frequently confirmed by the hazards of history, about a persecution suffered by the Jews of Egypt. An entirely different category is represented by the works of Philo of Alexandria (born c. 15 B.C.) and Flavius Josephus (born 37 A.D.).

The study of the intertestament must deal with three problems:

a) Dating. Works are often anonymous or conceal their author behind a pseudonym; for example, the Sentences of Phocylides (first century A.D.), a gnomic poem that "transposes into Greek form elements of Jewish wisdom*" (Grelot 1994). As for the apocalypses, they mask events by the use of hermetic images. In short, the attempt to date documents as earlier or later than the beginning of our era is sometimes impossible.

b) Revisions. By the end of the first century A.D., Judaism's interest in this abundant literature had been superseded by its interest in wisdom literature. Christians, on the other hand, preserved these texts in which they saw, according to the title of Eusebius of Caesarea, a providential praeparatio evangelica. The documents were thus transmitted with Christian interpolations, like the Trinitarian doxology that concludes the Testament of Abraham. But the identification of Christian additions is often a matter of debate, with respect to the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs (Levi, 18:6–8; Judah, 24:2), for example.

c) Language of Transmission. Many of these writings, particularly in Alexandria, were composed in Greek, a language that assured them a wide audience, even if there is some question as to whether this literature was read outside Jewish circles (Tcherikover 1956, Eos 48, 169–93). Because of their transmission by Christians, some books from Palestine have survived only in the languages of the early Churches: Latin (Biblical Antiquities of Pseudo-Philo, Testament of Moses), Syriac (2 Baruch), Ethiopian (1 Enoch, Jubilees), or Slavonic (2 Enoch). But fragments discovered in Qumran have restored the antiquity and the original language of several of these works—Aramaic for 1 Enoch and Hebrew for Jubilees.

4. Elements of Classification

With no claim to establishing a precise classification, we can distinguish five groups:

a) Works of Philo and Josephus. They are precisely situated in time, and if they did not exist we would know almost nothing of Jewish history from the end of the Persian era to the end of the Jewish war* against Rome (Philo: In Flaccum. Legatio ad Gaium; Josephus: The Jewish War; Autobiography). In addition, Josephus sets forth his understanding of Mosaic institutions and biblical history (Antiquities of the Jews, Against Apion). In doing so he echoes interpretive readings and, through cross-references, confirms the antiquity of documents that are less definitely dated. Similarly, beneath the allegorical surface of Philo's commentaries ancient Palestinian traditions emerge.

For example, in Exodus 28, Philo, Josephus, and the Targum agree in giving an allegorical interpretation of the high priest's costume.

b) Qumran Writings. They present not only an outline of a particular sect. The biblical manuscripts of the caves now clarify certain discrepancies in ancient translations. The biblical commentaries of Qumran (pesharim) and other anthologies and Testimonia confirm the convergence of biblical interpretations known from other documents with respect to eschatological expectations: the prophets Elijah, Moses, and the Messiah (messianism/Messiah*), and even the use of the figure of Melchizedek in the Epistle to the Hebrews (replaced by Elijah in the rabbinical tradition).

c) Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament. They include the apocalypses, legendary histories (3 Maccabees), instructions in narrative form (Jubilees), and poetic works: in Alexandria, for example, Ezekiel the tragedian presented the Exodus of the Hebrews in the form of a tragedy in verse. There is also a large number of "Testaments": The fiction is that a biblical hero on his deathbed brings his heirs together and gives them his spiritual testament. This genre influenced the New Testament (Lk 22; Jn 13–17; 2 Tm; 2 Pt). It is still difficult to evaluate the size and identity of the public reached by the pseudepigrapha.

d) Targums. Targums, on the other hand, reached the broad audience of the synagogues. These are versions of the Bible in Aramaic, at first oral, in the framework of the liturgy, for listeners who no longer understood Hebrew. The Targum often uses paraphrase. Even though the versions from synagogues that we have are late and require critical analysis, this type of writing is ancient, since a Targum of Job has been found in Qumran (4QtgJob). The traditions transmitted by Targums were addressed to the popular audience of the synagogues, who spontaneously rejected interpretations that were too sectarian or too innovative. They thereby reflected a kind of consensus that flourished in rabbinic literature.

e) Midrashim, the Mishnah, the Talmud. In ancient synagogues and in schools, explicit interpretation of the law was often entrusted to "wise men" or "scribes" (Mt 23:2). Between the beginning of our era and the early third century, they made up the generation of Tanna'im ("tutors"). Their scholarship was nourished by the intertestament and enriched it in return. It took concrete form in midrashim (commentaries) of the Pentateuch, of which only later recensions survive. It led to the publication of the Mishnah (see Strack-Stemberger 1986). With the Mishnah began a sifting and a codification of the proliferating traditions of the intertestament. What had been merely "the traditions of the elders" (Mt 15:2) became the oral law, supposed to have come from Moses himself, endowed with an authority equal to that of the written law, and later to be set out precisely in the Talmud.

A new history begins at that point. On the one hand, Christians collected the writings of the intertestament. In the framework of their mission to the Gentiles they appreciated the pseudepigrapha that attempted a "Greek explanation" of biblical revelation to the Jewish diaspora. As for the Palestinian traditions of interpretation of Scripture, Christians placed them at the service of faith in Jesus the Messiah. On the other hand, in the wake of the destruction of the temple, Judaism abandoned Jewish-Hellenistic writings, considered too dispersed and thereby dangerous for an identity that had to be reconstructed, and it selected in the intertestament legacy everything that might focus believers on the Torah and the Torah alone. In short the intertestament was a breeding ground that made it possible for the disciples of Jesus to identify themselves as a "Church" and for ancient Judaism to become rabbinic Judaism.

- T. Reinach (Ed.) (1900–1932), Flavius Josèphe, Œuvres complètes, Paris.
- Flavius Josèphe, Contre Apion (1930), Text by Th. Reinach; Trans. L. Blum, Paris.
- R. Arnaldez, J. Pouilloux, C. Mondésert (Ed.) (1961–88), Les œuvres de Philon d'Alexandrie (Text and trans.), 36 vols., Paris.
- A. Pelletier (1962), Lettre d'Aristée à Philocrate (Text and trans.), Paris; id. (Ed.) (1975–84), La Guerre des Juifs (Text and trans.), 5 vols., Paris.
- M. Schuhl (Ed.) (1974, 3rd Ed. 1983), Les Maximes des Pères (Text and trans.), Paris.
- J.H. Charlesworth (Ed.) (1983–85), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (2 vols.), London.
- A. Dupont-Sommer, M. Philonenko (Ed.) (1987), La Bible: Écrits intertestamentaires, Paris.
- ♦ P. Dalbert (1954), Die Theologie der hellenistisch-jüdischen Missionsliteratur, Hamburg.
- G. Vermes (1961), Scripture and Tradition in Judaism, Leyden.
- R. Le Déaut (1963), La nuit pascale: Essai sur la signification de la Pâque juive, AnBi 22; id. (1984), "La Septante, un Targum?," in R. Kuntzmann, J. Schlosser (Ed.), Études sur le judaïsme hellénistique, Paris.
- A.-M. Denis (1970), Introduction aux pseudépigraphes d'Antien Testament, Leyden.
- A. Paul (1972–), "Bulletin critique" bisannuel sur l'Intertestament, RSR; id. (1975), Intertestament (CEv 14), Paris.
- E.E. Urbach (1979), The Sages (2 vols.), Jerusalem.
- A. Dupont-Sommer (1980, 1996), Les écrits esséniens découverts près de la mer Morte, Paris.
- J.H. Charlesworth (1981), The Pseudepigrapha and Modern Research, Missoula.
- G.W.E. Nickelsburg (1981), Jewish Literature between the Bible and the Mishna, London.
- A. Diez Macho (1982), El Targum, Madrid.
- J. Cazeaux (1983), Philon d'Alexandrie (Supplement to CEv 44), Paris.

M.E. Stone (1984), Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, Assen-Philadelphia.
H.L. Strack, G. Stemberger (1986), Introduction au Talmud et au Midrash, Paris.
C. Tassin (1986), Le judaïsme (CEv 55), Paris.
A. Paul (1987), Le judaïsme ancien et la Bible, Paris.
S. Safrai (1987), The Literature of the Sages, Assen/Maastricht-Philadelphia.
M. Hadas-Lebel (1989), Flavius Josèphe, Paris.
See also in New Jerome Biblical Commentary (1989), p. 1054–82; R.E. Brown, “Jewish Apocrypha,” §1–52; “Dead Sea Scrolls,” §79–123; A.J. Saldarini, “Philo, Josephus, Rabbinic Literature,” §124–143 (bibl.).

P. Grelot (1994), L’espérance juive à l’heure de Jésus, new Ed., Paris.

CLAUDE TASSIN

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Apocrypha; Bible; Book; Canon of Scriptures; Gospels; Holy Scripture; Israel; Judaism; Law and Christianity; Translations of the Bible, Ancient

Investiture Dispute. See Lateran I, Council

Irenaeus of Lyon

c. 140–200

1. Biography

a) Life. We have little information on the life of Irenaeus. Everything we know derives from his still extant works or from lost works of which a few extracts were preserved by Eusebius of Caesarea in his Ecclesiastical History. Irenaeus came originally from Asia, perhaps from Smyrna. In any event, it was there, while still a youth, that he listened to the teachings of Bishop* Polycarp, who was already an old man (HE 5, 20, 5–8). The difference in age between Irenaeus and Polycarp and the date of the latter’s martyrdom* (155/156 or 167) make it possible to place Irenaeus’s birth about the year 140.

Without our really knowing the reasons why, except that there were very strong links between the Christian communities of Lyons and Asia, Irenaeus came to Lyons. He was already there at the time of the persecutions of 177, in the course of which Pothinus, the first bishop of this town, met his death. Irenaeus succeeded him before his journey to Rome as the community’s representative in order to bear a letter to Pope Eleutherius (HE 5, 4, 1). Irenaeus also interceded with Pope Victor (189–98) about the currently disputed question of the date of Easter. We know nothing more about Irenaeus, not even the date of his death. The traditional story that Irenaeus was a martyr dates from the beginning of the 6th century.

b) Works. Irenaeus wrote several works in Greek, the list of which figures in Eusebius (HE 5, 26; 5, 24; 5, 20, 1). Only two among them are extant. Composed of five books, the Elucidation and Refutation of Pseudo-Gnosticism exists in its entirety only in a Latin translation from the fourth century. Apart from fragments in Armenian and in Syriac, we also own the Armenian translation of books IV and V. Only fragments of the Greek text remain, especially for book I. This work is better known under the title of Against Heresies (Adversus Haereses), given by certain manuscripts and by its first editors. The second work, entitled Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, is extant in a sixth-century Armenian translation only.

Can these two works be dated? In the conclusion of the Demonstration, Irenaeus referred to his Against Heresies. That might indicate that the two works were written at the same time, or, more probably, that the Demonstration followed closely on Irenaeus's first treatise. Moreover, in Against Heresies (3, 3, 3), Irenaeus mentioned Victor's predecessor Eleutherius as bishop of Rome*. It can therefore be confirmed that at least the first three books of Against Heresies were written before 189, the first year of Victor's reign as bishop.

The Demonstration is a catechesis that interprets the sacred history of Israel as a prophecy (prophet* and prophecy) of Christ Jesus. On the other hand, his Against Heresies is a theological treatise in which Irenaeus refutes three main types of heresies: Ebionite, Marcionite, and Gnostic. In reality Irenaeus himself had only met with Gnosticism. But the systematic nature of the treatise encompasses in fact the whole theological domain and uses the heresies as counter-proofs in order to expound the Catholic doctrine.

2. Irenaeus's Theology

a) Sources and Theological Method. Irenaeus had read his predecessors. But he worked above all on the Scriptures, and it was in the biblical domain that he was most influenced by these predecessors. From them he got the Testimonia, those collections of more or less enlarged scriptural quotations. Also from that source, particularly from Papias, Polycarp, and Justin, he inherited a method of interpreting the Scriptures. And he borrowed Justin's way of understanding the Old Testament as a prophecy of the New Testament. The Old Testament tells of God's deeds undertaken in favor of the men of that time and of the words that He transmitted to them, and these deeds and words prefigure and herald Christ Jesus. The Scriptures form a whole: the New Testament is the realization of the Old Testament (Adv. Haer. 4, 26,1).

The Scriptures and their interpretation by the Church are the nucleus of the doctrine preached, particularly during baptismal instruction; they are summed up by the rule of faith and the rule of truth (Adv. Haer. 1, 9, 4). Scriptures and doctrine belong to the tradition of the Church, a tradition that is inseparable from the apostolic* succession of the bishops. According to Irenaeus, the Church cannot in fact exist except when grouped around the bishop, who transmits the tradition and guarantees the apostolic origins of the Church by reason of his belonging to a line going back to the apostles (apostle*) (Adv. Haer. 3, 3, 1). Of course the episcopal structure (structures*, ecclesial) of the Church was established only in the second century and contrasts with other more ancient forms of organization. But, having become acquainted with this structure only through Polycarp, Irenaeus had no doubt that it went back to the apostles.

Meditation about faith takes place in the Churches governed by bishops by means of the tradition that they transmit and the control that they ensure. For Irenaeus, those who do not recognize the episcopal organization are therefore outside the communion of the Church: those are the heretics whom he refutes.

Citing no Marcionite documents, Irenaeus likely borrowed from Justin his presentation of Marcionism* and arguments to refute it. As for Gnosticism, Irenaeus had read several Gnostic texts, especially those by the Valentinians. Here too he completed his information with the help of Justin's works.

In the state in which it has come down to us, the documentation collected by Irenaeus did not always allow him to make an exact and thorough interpretation of Gnosticism. Despite that, he was capable of perceiving the theological issues, which set the Church against Gnosticism. It was primarily a question of man's salvation, in his soul and in his body (soul*-heart-body), and consequently of the salvation of the material world. The controversy bore correlatively on the status of the Son and the Holy* Spirit in relation to the Father*; they depend solely on him and have no share in the divine plan. In this context, Irenaeus used in a personal way several ideas found in the Scriptures and in his predecessors' works, in which moreover they played only a restricted role. He used them to explain the Church's teaching on salvation and on God. Theology then becomes a meditation on the divine plan of salvation that leads to the mystery of God.

b) Plan of Salvation. God had a plan and he realized it: that is what Irenaeus calls the "economy," or plan of salvation, a central idea in his theology. God created man in order to have him share in his life (Adv. Haer. 4, 14, 1). Creation was undertaken for man's sake in order to bring about the meeting of God and man (Adv. Haer. 4, 7, 4; 4, 20, 4; 5, 29, 1). Irenaeus took from the Scriptures different ways of presenting salvation.

A prime notion is that of the adoptive filiation (Gal 4:4-6) that Christ Jesus brings to men through the gift of the Holy Spirit (Adv. Haer. 3, 6, 1; 3, 19, 1). Another derives from the theme of man created in the image of God and in the likeness of God (Gn 1:26). Body and soul, man is naturally the image of God by reason of his corporeity (Dem. 11). To put it more precisely, man is the image of the Word made man Christ Jesus, the prototype of humanity brought to full perfection by the gift of the Spirit, and therein lies the resemblance (Adv.

Haer. 5, 6, 1). The presence of the Spirit thus perfects the modeling of man, who increasingly comes to resemble Christ.

These examples show that the plan is divided into two phases. The first phase starts with the beginning of the world and prepares the incarnation of the Word of God; during the second phase, humanity is brought to its perfection. The transition from the first phase to the second is accomplished by the Word of God made man, Christ Jesus. That is what is called the recapitulation, anakephalaiósis. It carries out the transformation of the whole human race, not only of the future generations until the end of time, when creation itself will be transfigured (Adv. Haer. 5, 36, 1.3), but also of preceding generations as far back as Adam* himself (Adv. Haer. 3, 23, 1; Dem. 78).

Through this recapitulation Christ Jesus gathers all men together. He also conquers the devil, sin, and death, and frees men from them (Adv. Haer. 3, 18, 7). Finally he brings man to perfection by giving him the Holy Spirit (Adv. Haer. 4, 33, 8; 5, 20, 2). During the second phase Irenaeus no longer links the plan to the Son but to the Spirit. After the ascension and the gift of the Spirit, Christ in fact works through the Holy Spirit that lives in man. The Spirit prolongs Christ's work. It makes men new by freeing them, by gathering them together, and by perfecting them (Dem. 6). Irenaeus thus perceives two characteristics of the effusion of the Spirit. On the one hand, Christ spread the Spirit throughout the whole human race (Adv. Haer. 3, 17, 1–2; Dem. 6 and 89). On the other hand, this Spirit is transmitted to believers by means of baptism (Dem. 42) and the Eucharist (Adv. Haer. 4, 18, 4–5 and 5, 2, 3) in order to create the Church as its visible abode (Adv. Haer. 3, 24, 1).

c) Christ's Recapitulation of Adam: Creation and Salvation. Adam was the first man. But he is also a collective figure, for all men have their origins in him through succeeding generations, and for this reason they compose a single humankind (Adv. Haer. 4, 33, 15).

Similarly, Christ Jesus is the origin of this new humanity, that is, of this spiritual humanity. In his work of recapitulation, Christ is in the same situation as was Adam with regard to the human race, for he was modeled from virgin clay as Adam had been. "Just as the first man to be modeled, Adam, received his substance from a still virgin and intact clay . . . so, recapitulating Adam in himself, the Word's generation, which is the recapitulation of Adam, very fittingly came about by means of the still virgin Mary*" (Adv. Haer. 3, 21, 10).

But, placed in an identical situation, Christ Jesus succeeded where Adam had failed. Indeed, the disobedience of the first model—which subjected man to sin, death, and Satan—corresponds to the obedience of the second one, who freed man from those powers (Adv. Haer. 3, 18, 6–7; 3, 19, 3; 5, 21, 3). All the same, Christ also confers divine life, which Adam could not impart. Insofar as Christ is man and Word, he could on the one hand be tested and obey the Father, and on the other hand be glorified for thus transmitting divine life to the other men (Adv. Haer. 4, 20, 2).

Lastly, just as Adam transmitted to man his nature and his state of sin, so Jesus gave to man the Spirit, which perfected that nature and corrected that state by destroying sin. The relations between Adam and Christ thus express the link between creation and salvation. Adam gives his humanity to the Son by means of Mary, but it was for the sake of Christ's advent that Adam had been created. Salvation is the completion of creation.

d) Christ Jesus, the Origin and the Purpose of the Divine Plan. The plan for salvation presupposed the existence of a Savior and the existence of men to be saved. But for Irenaeus, the Savior does not exist because there are men to be saved—on the contrary, there are men to be saved because the Savior pre-exists. "It is for this reason therefore that Paul calls Adam himself the 'pattern of the one to come'" (Rom 5:14); because the Word, the artisan of the universe, had sketched out in advance, in order to prepare the ground for himself, the future plan of the human race in its relation to the Son of God, with God first of all establishing natural man in order, quite obviously, that he might be saved by spiritual man. Indeed, since he who would be the Savior pre-existed, it was necessary that what would be saved should also come into existence, for this Savior had to have a raison d'être" (Adv. Haer. 3, 22, 3).

In this text (see Fantino 1994), Irenaeus established that the relation between Adam and Christ is the same as the one between natural man and spiritual man (1 Cor 15:45s.), the one between the pattern and the perfected reality. Thus Adam is the pattern of Christ Jesus, who came in order to realize in himself perfect humanity (Rom 5:14). But, as Paul teaches (1 Cor 15:42–48; quoted in Adv. Haer. 5, 12, 2), what existed first was the pattern, Adam, the natural man, transformed later into the perfect man, a spiritual man. Therein lie the two phases of the plan. The creation of humanity comes first, secondly comes its perfection through the incarnation of the Son, Christ Jesus, who transmits the Spirit to the whole human race. But it is only at the end of time that the full gift of the Spirit will come, an event linked to the Resurrection and to the advent of the Kingdom of the Father. The key to the whole plan manifested in creation is not the exist-tence of evil or of sin but of the person of the Savior. Sin is incorporated into the realization of the plan, which in effect includes the freeing from sin (Adv. Haer. 3, 19, 3; 3, 23, 1).

Irenaeus does not identify evil with sin. In fact he recognizes two types of evil. Physical evil arises from the nature of the creature, for it is due to the opposition of contrary forces or to the sequence of events that obey natural laws: what seems to be an evil in the short run is a good on the cosmic (cosmos*) scale (Adv. Haer. 2, 25, 2). The second type of evil, moral evil, is sin. It arises from the jealousy of Satan and of certain angels* who lured Adam into transgression (Adv. Haer. 3, 23; Dem. 16). Following Johannine writings, Irenaeus considers sin to be a condition of human existence rather than a collection of individual actions.

In his prescience, God had foreseen the angel's sin as well as that of man, including the consequences, and he had sanctioned it (Adv. Haer. 3, 20, 1; 3, 23, 1; 4, 38, 4; 5, 36, 1). But putting man to the test is part of God's original design (Adv. Haer. 5, 24, 3; Dem. 15). For it is through experience that man acquires knowledge and therefore knowledge of good and evil (Adv. Haer. 4, 37, 6–7; 4, 38, 4).

e) Plan Reveals the Mystery of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Basing himself on the plan, Irenaeus reflects on the salvation that God bestows on man and on the means by which he grants it to him. Since the Son and the Spirit indeed transmit God's life to us, it is because they themselves possess this life. They are therefore not created, their existence is not "part of the divine plan."

In this way Irenaeus makes a clear distinction between the uncreated, which is God, and the created. The created consists of the temporal world, both visible and invisible. The Father, the Son, and the Spirit, co-eternal, belong to the uncreated. For Irenaeus, the divine nature of the Son and the Spirit is revealed by the Scriptures. But, although the Son and the Spirit are uncreated, nonetheless they have their origin in the Father.

Irenaeus states precisely the difference in origins of the Son and of the Spirit on the one hand and of creation on the other. The created arises out of the divine will. The Son and the Spirit themselves sprang from the substance of the Father. The act of generation established the unity of the Father and the Son as well as their difference. Insofar as the Spirit is concerned, Irenaeus is more reserved. He follows the Scriptures. The Spirit is co-eternal with the Father and the Son, not a creature but sprung from God, and remains forever with the Father and the Son.

The unity of the three lies not only in the realm of action but also in the realm of being. Irenaeus recognizes God as a single substance. But he expresses this unity through recourse to images, for example, God's hands, the Son and the Spirit, are always attached to him (Adv. Haer. 5, 28, 4). This procedure stresses the constant presence, and indeed, the eternal one, of the Son and the Spirit alongside the Father.

However, Irenaeus acknowledges a difference among the three with regard to the plan and attributes a specific role to each. Here again he follows the tradition of the Scriptures. The Father decides, the Son acts, and the Spirit orders and makes grow, but there is only one divine action (Adv. Haer. 4, 20, 1; 4, 38, 3). That interpretation is in harmony with the fact that Irenaeus's theology is founded on the plan. Indeed, it is through this plan that men accede to the Father, to the Son, and to the Spirit, who realize the plan by creating man and by leading him to his destiny: that of meeting and loving God, that is to say, the three. In theology, the transition from the plan to the mystery of God is therefore quite natural for Irenaeus, because it corresponds to the progress of the plan, which is a road to God.

- Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, Ed. K. Ter-Mekerttschian (1919).
- A. Houssiau (1955), La christologie de saint I., Louvain-Gembloux.
- A. Benoît (1960), Saint I., Introduction à l'étude de sa théologie, Paris.
- Against Heresies*, Ed. and trans. in French by A. Rousseau (1965–82), SC 100, 152–53, 210–11, 263–64, 293–94.
- A. Orbe (1969), Antropología de san Ireneo, Madrid; id. (1985–88), Teología de san Ireneo, comentario al libro V del Adversus Haereses, Madrid.
- L. Doutreleau, L. Regnault (1971), "I. de Lyon," DSP 7, 1923–69.
- H.J. Jaschke (1976), Der Heilige Geist im Bekenntnis der Kirche, Münster; id. (1987), "Irenäus von Lyon," TRE 16, 258–68.
- New Arminian Fragments from Adversus Haereses and Epideixis*, Ed. and trans. in French by C. Renoux (1978), PO 39.
- R. Berthouzo (1980), Liberté et grâce suivant la théologie d'I. de Lyon, Paris-Fribourg.
- Y. de Andía (1986), Homo vivens, incorruptibilité et divinisation de l'homme selon I. de Lyon, Paris.
- J. Fantino (1986), L'homme image de Dieu chez saint I. de Lyon, Paris; id. (1994), La théologie d'I., Paris.
- R. Aubert (1995), "I. (saint)," DHGE 25, 1477–79.

JACQUES FANTINO

See also Apologists; Creeds; Gnosis; History; Salvation

Israel

1. Old Testament and Judaism

a) Terminology. “Yisrâ’él” is among the proper names most frequently used in the Masoretic text (2,514 times). In Genesis it is essentially applied to the patriarch Jacob after his change of name, interpreted in Genesis 32:29 (see Hos 12:4) as “to fight with God*” (however, in theophoric names, God is subject: “God combat,” “God reign”). Thereafter, “Israel” almost always designates the people* (“sons of Israel” 637 times, “House of Israel” 146 times, “land of Israel” 17 times). They are designated in other ways such as “my people,” “Jacob,” “Jerusalem,” “Zion,” “you,” and so forth.

From the beginning the ethnic and religious aspects are inseparable: “Israel” designates a league of tribes united not only by political ties but also by the covenant with the Lord, who in turn is defined by the relationship with his people: “God of Israel” (201 times; a total of 231, with other analogous syntagms: “the Holy One of Israel,” etc.).

This remains constant down through the vicissitudes of history. After the schism of the ten tribes (1 Kgs 12:20–33), “Israel” designates the northern kingdom and “Juda” the southern kingdom (1–2 Kgs, passim, particularly in political contexts). This may be a return to an older terminology (1 Sm 17:52, 18:16; 2 Sm 2:8–11, 5:1–12, 19:41–44, etc.). Nevertheless, in more explicitly religious contexts the name Israel still indicates the people as a whole, particularly in Prophets (prophets* and prophecy) (Is 1:3, 8:18; Am 3:1, 9:7...) and Deuteronomy.

After the period of exile, the people is practically reduced to the tribe of Juda, and the name “Jew” (Hebrew yehôûdî, Aramaic yehôûdây, Greek ioudaios) becomes current. The term is used by foreigners (Ezr 5:1; 1 Macc 11:30), and also by Jews themselves, in an ethnico-political context (1 Macc 12:3). But the name Israel does remain, taking on an even more decisive religious value (Is 44:5; Ezr 2:2; Neh 9:1s.; Sir 36:11; Jdt 4:1, 4:8; 1 Macc 13:26).

b) Theological Dimension. Despite an ever-increasing emphasis on individual responsibility (see Ez 3:16–21, 18:1–32), the collective aspect maintained its place within the development of the theological reflection with its new reading of the past from the angle of the history of salvation* (choice*, promise*, covenant*), and the projection toward an eschatological future. The promises are not delivered to a group of individuals but to the people as such. Sometimes, in the perspective of judgment, the people is limited to a faithful “remnant” (Is 1:9, 4:2–6, 10:20–23; Jer 21:7; Am 3:12, 5:15, 9:8f.; Mi 4:7, 5:6f.; Sg 3:12f., etc.); and sometimes it is also globally included in salvation, which will be the gratuitous work of God’s power (omnipotence*) (Jer 31:31ff.; Ez 36:26f.).

The reconstitution of the twelve tribes becomes an object of prayer*, an eschatological hope* (Ez 47:13–48, 35; Sir 48:10; Ps Sal 17). With the image of the pilgrimage* to Zion, the nations are brought within the perspective of final salvation without loss of their respective identities (Is 2:1–5, 25:6–9, 45:14–25, 60:1–22, 66:18f.; Zec 14:16).

2. New Testament

a) Jesus and Israel. In announcing the kingdom of God, Jesus* did not proclaim a general ethico-religious message but rather the eschatological fulfillment awaited by Israel. His constitution of a group of Twelve shows he knew that he was sent to constitute the eschatological Israel (Mt 19:28 par.; Lk 22:28ff.). He spoke of the salvation of pagans using Old Testament images of the pilgrimage and the banquet (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:29). Jesus came “born under the law*” (Gal 4:4), to interpret it “as one who has authority*” (Mt 7:29), but he definitely did not abolish it or abrogate any part of it. He accomplishes his service in favor of the circumcised (Rom 15:8), limiting his activity and that of his disciples to the “lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Mt 10:6; though these expressions may be post-paschal they are inspired by the historical reality). His encounters with pagans (Mk 5:1–20 par., 7:24–30 par.; Mt 15:31; Jn 12:20ff.) or Samaritans (Lk 17:11–19; Jn 4:1–42) were never more than occasional.

Jesus interpreted his own mission within the horizon of the faith of Israel and at the same time gave the definitive interpretation of Israel. This is what he did when he connected the Kingdom to the mystery of his own person and demanded an adherence of unconditional faith, beyond all other criteria and every other authority, from those he called to “follow” him. In this sense, even if the movement he initiated might on a purely sociological level seem to be one among many “reform movements” that arose within Judaism at that time, it cannot be reduced to that. Subsequent developments, no matter how gradual and tortuous—conflicts with the Jewish authority, constitution of the Church as a distinct religious community, evangelization of pagans, going beyond the law—originated not only in the paschal event but also in the pre-paschal teachings and practices of Jesus.

b) New Testament Reflection on Israel. The lexical framework is formed by the more solemn and religious term Israel but includes others such as Jews, the people, this generation, and so forth. As for the historical framework, New Testament writings reflect the experiences of Christian preaching to Jews and to pagans. Never more than partially successful with the Jews, it ended in failure and rupture, whereas it was increasingly successful with the pagans and ended up making them (at least in tendency) the majority and giving them a dominant position. These writings also reflect the attempt at theological interpretation of such experiences in order to situate them within God’s plan. This reflection, which was never fully systematic (and is not so in Rom 9–11), puts multiple categories into operation and leads to various perspectives.

The author who undertook the most profound approach to the question was Paul, precisely the one who placed the greatest emphasis on the newness of Christianity. His path led him from a more conflictual vision (1 Thes 2:14ff.; Gal 3–4) to a more positive, serene position in Romans 9–11. Without denying his whole theological vision of the law and the cross, or (better) in giving to gratuity the statute of fundamental instance, he crowns these chapters with the announcement of the final salvation of all Israel.

Some writings—Mark and even more so John—bear hints of a polemical vein against the unbelief of Judaism (always meaning, concretely, the Judaism contemporary with Jesus and the first communities). Coexisting with these positions are others that recognize the special role of Judaism in the history of salvation (Jn 4:22, 11:51f.), though there is no attempt at synthesis. Matthew is more systematic, being dominated by the polemical schema of “substitution”: “the kingdom of God will be taken away from you, and given to a people producing his fruits” (Mt 21:43). Once the priority of Israel has been respected by the earthly Jesus (even if the end result is negative), the Crucified immediately sends his disciples to the nations (Mt 28:16–20) with no further mention of Israel.

He simply refers in passing to the future salvation of this people (Mt 23:29).

In Luke-Acts, on the contrary, the Crucified asks the disciples not to go far from Jerusalem, to bear witness to him above all in that city (Lk 24:46–49; Acts 1, 5). Evangelization (mission*/evangelization) will gradually embrace the gentiles as well (Acts 11:18): “a light for revelation to the Gentiles, and for glory to your people Israel ” (Lk 2:32). These pagans will be received, not to take a place that has been left vacant but to fulfill the universalist prophecies (prophet* and prophecy) of the Old Testament. The unbelief of the Jews is not considered final (Lk 13:34f.; Acts 1:6ff.). Its historical consequence will be that, after a certain point, preaching can only be addressed to the pagans (Acts 13:46, 18:6, 28:125). This is how the historical reconstruction of Luke is turned into a legitimation of the missionary Church.

Apocalypse also distinguishes between the chosen people of the tribes of Israel and the chosen people of the nations (Rev 7:1–10; see also 21:12, 24). However, in other writings the distinction seems to pertain only to the past (Eph 2:11–18); it is never mentioned in Hebrews.

Nonetheless, the role of Israel in the history of salvation is not denied, as it would be later, for example with Marcion (Marcionism*). There is no affirmation of an absolute rejection of the Jewish people as such, nor of its pure and simple replacement by the Church. The term always keeps its original meaning, the idea of the Church as “the true Israel” being basically foreign to the New Testament, even if some texts seem to move in that direction. Galatians 6:16, Israël tou Theou, remains controversial. 1 Corinthians 10:18 Israël kata sarka is not the opposite of a “spiritual Israel.” If the salvific prerogatives of certain Jews are sometimes denied (Rom 9:6f.; Jn 8:31–58; Rev 2:9, 3:9), those of the people in general are never denied. They are sometimes extended to Christians, called the descendants of Abraham (Gal 4:21–31), people of God (Acts 15:14), chosen lineage, holy people (1 Pt 2:9), people of the diaspora (Jas 1:1). These expressions do not yet have the meaning that they would subsequently acquire, that of an exclusion of the historical Israel.

- E. Peterson (1933), Die Kirche aus Juden und Heiden, Salzburg.
- G. von Rad, K. G. Kuhn, W. Gutbrod (1938), “Israël,” ThWNT 3, 356–94.
- G. A. Danell (1946), Studies in the Name Israel in the Old Testament, Uppsala.
- M. Simon (1948), Verus Israel. Étude sur les relations entre chrétiens et juifs dans l’Empire romain, Paris, 135–425.
- J. Jeremias (1956), Jésus et les païens, Neuchâtel-Paris.
- W. Trilling (1964), Das wahre Israel: Studien zur Theologie des Matthäus-Evangeliums, StANT 10.
- A. George (1968), “Israël dans l’œuvre de Luc,” RB 75,

- 481–525, repris in Études sur l'œuvre de Luc, Paris, 1978, 87–125.
- R. de Vaux (1971), Histoire ancienne d'Israël des origines à l'installation en Canaan, EtB.
- J. Jervell (1972), Luke and the People of God, Minneapolis.
- L. De Lorenzi (Ed.) (1977), Die Israelfrage nach Röm 9–11, Rome.
- F. Mußner (1979), Traktat über die Juden, Munich.
- V. Fusco (1980), Parola e Regno. La sezione delle parabole (Mc 4, 1–34) nella prospettiva marciana, Aloï 13; id. (1986), “Progetto storiografico e progetto teologico nell’opera lucana,” in coll., La storiografia nella Bibbia, Bologna, 123–52; id. (1989), “Rivelazione di Gesù—rivelazione di Dio. Il problema del ‘Dio di Gesù Cristo’ nella prospettiva marciana,” ScC 117, 149–66; id. (1993 a), “Gesù e le Scritture di Israele,” in E Norelli (Ed.), La Bibbia nell’antichità cristiana, I. Da Gesù a Origene (La Bibbia nella storia, 15/a), Bologna, 35–63; id. (1993 b) Le Scritture nella tradizione sinottica e negli Atti, ibid., 105–49.
- H. J. Zobel (1982), “Jisrâ’el,” ThWAT 3, 986–1012.
- M. Remaud (1983), Chrétiens devant Israël serviteur de Dieu, Paris.
- E. P. Sanders (1983), Paul, the Law and the Jewish People, Philadelphia.
- F. Refoulé (1984), “... et ainsi tout Israël sera sauvé”: Romains II, 25–32, LeDiv 117.
- R. Albertz et al. (1987), “Israel,” TRE 16, 368–93.
- J. D. G. Dunn (Ed.) (1992), Jews and Christians. The Parting of the Ways. A.D. 70–135, WUNT 66.
- G. M. Smiga (1992), Pain and Polemic. Anti-Judaism in the Gospels, Mahwah, NJ.
- D. Sänger (1994), Die Verkündigung des Gekreuzigten und Israel. Studien zum Verhältnis von Kirche und Israel bei Paulus und im frühen Christentum, WUNT 75.
- D. Marguerat (Ed.) (1996), Le déchirement. Juifs et chrétiens au Ier s., Geneva.
- G. Caron (1997), Qui sont les juifs dans l’Évangile de Jean?, Québec.
- A. Marchadour (Ed.) (1998), Procès de Jésus, procès des Juifs, Paris.

VITTORIO FUSCO

See also Apostle; Choice; Church; Eschatology; Jerusalem; Jesus, Historical; Judaism; Messianism/Messiah; Paganism; Pauline Theology; People of God; Promise; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Universalism

J

Jansenism

Strictly speaking, Jansenism is a heresy* defined by several condemnations of the post-Tridentine magisterium*. More generally it designates a movement within Catholicism* that denies the need for these condemnations, limits their impact, and especially seeks to present an image of Christianity that is faithful and loyal to its origins and its objectives.

1. Jansenist Heresy

In the beginning there was Augustinus (1640), the book by Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), professor of Holy Scripture at the University of Louvain, then bishop of Ypres. The elaboration of this Augustinian synthesis on salvation and grace was a counter-offensive intended to weaken the impact of the Molinist opinions (Bañezianism*-Molinism-Baianism) that were being taught by the Jesuits. Its publication contravened the pontifical decisions that forbade disputing these themes after the closing of the De Auxiliis assemblies. This was the cause of an initial wave of condemnations, the principle one being the bull In Eminenti (1642, published 1643). This censure was explicitly presented as something that did not call into question the privileged status of Augustinianism* with regard to these discussions.

This matter had reverberations in France, where it took on the politico-religious complexion that would mark it to the end. A friend of Jansen, Jean du Vergier de Hauranne, the abbot of Saint-Cyran (1581–1643), had a major influence, advocating Catholic reform based on the model of the early Church* (in writings under the name of Petrus Aurelius) and a spirituality of inner renewal. He turned a monastery of Cistercian nuns, Port-Royal, into an influential center for these views. Disagreeing with Richelieu's Protestant covenants, he also opposed the cardinal on the subject of penance* (notably the question of attrition, or imperfect sorrow for sin). He charged Antoine Arnauld (1612–94), one of his disciples as well as a Sorbonne doctor, with researching the Church's ancient tradition with regard to penance and the Eucharist*. The essay met with some difficulties in Rome* (La Fréquente Communion, 1643). Arnauld also came to the defense of Augustinus, which had been publicly attacked by Isaac Habert, the canon of Paris.

It was through the upholding of theses at the Faculty of Theology of Paris that Jansenism found its first expression. By asking the Faculty to take a stand (1649), the syndic Nicolas Cornet sought to impede the reinforcing of a strict Augustinianism among the younger generation. The Faculty doctors were too divided to act and five propositions out of the seven noted in Augustinus were subjected to the judgment of the Holy See by several French bishops. They were judged heretical and were condemned by the apostolic constitution Cum Occasione (May 31, 1653, DS 2001–7).

The five propositions were as follows:

- 1) Some of God's commandments (Decalogue*) are impossible for the righteous who want and

- strive to follow the forces they currently have; they also lack the grace that would make them possible.
- 2) In the state of fallen nature, one can never resist internal grace.
 - 3) In order to fall or not in the state of fallen nature, the liberty that excludes the need is not required; the liberty that excludes the constraint is enough.
 - 4) The semi-Pelagians acknowledged the need for a prevenient interior grace for each specific act (action*), even for the act of initial faith, and they were heretical in that they wanted this grace to be such that the will could either resist it or obey it.
 - 5) It is semi-Pelagian to say that Jesus Christ is dead or that he shed his blood generally for all men.

The Roman consultors had proceeded, as they usually did, by focusing on the meaning contained in the examined propositions. They situated their condemnation in the continuation of the teaching of Trent* but added necessary clarifications. Only “the first of the propositions can be found textually in the Augustinus, the four others correctly express doctrine that it does contain, extensively elaborated upon and developed in many forms” in the book (the Brière 1916). Could this condemnation fall on Augustinianism? Innocent X had explicitly dismissed it. Moreover, it was Jansenius’s book, mentioned twice, that provided the context for the condemnation. And it was the connection between the propositions and the book that reignited the debate, provoking new interventions. Against Arnauld and his friends, who acknowledged the abstract condemnation (the right) but denied the fact, that is to say the verbatim presence of the propositions in the book, Pope Alexander VII followed the French clergy and asserted that they were found here and that they had been condemned in the sense of the author (Ad Sanctam, 1656, DS 2010–12); he later imposed a decree in this line (Regiminis Apostolici, 1665, DS 2020). The decision was important since it affirmed the Church’s authority to establish “dogmatic facts” and in this way demanded the consent of faith. Arnauld was censured by the Paris Faculty of Theology* for his Seconde Lettre à un Duc et Pair (1655), in which he was held to have revived the error condemned in the first proposition and also to have shown disrespect by denying the fact. He was dismissed along with a great number of doctors (1656). This decision was due more to political than to religious considerations, and it gave rise to the successful counter-offensive of Pascal*’s Lettres Provinciales.

Pascal was able to shift the debate to the domain of moral theology and with some success since both the Paris Faculty and the Roman Inquisition then published severe condemnation of latitudinarian propositions (1665–66; DS 2021–65, 1679, DS 2101–67).

Negotiated in 1669 to resolve Gallican tensions that resulted from various Roman condemnations, the “Peace of the Church” should have marked the end of the dispute, because it implicitly acknowledged the distinction by authorizing a “respectful silence.” This was a fruitful period for the Port-Royal circle, which devoted itself to biblical, patristic, and liturgical renewal in an anti-Protestant perspective (Perpétuité de la Foi, Bible de Sacy). However, the tensions endured and even grew as a result of underground initiatives on both sides. They were given a particular boost in 1704 with the publication of a “matter of conscience” that was submitted to the Paris Faculty of Theology and that concerned inner submission to the pontifical condemnations. As a result of this, previous judgments were reiterated (Vineam Domini, 1704, DS 2309), and especially the censure expressed in the constitution Unigenitus (1713) of 101 propositions extracted from the Réflexions Morales by Pasquier Quesnel, one of Arnauld’s disciples (DS 2400–502). This last condemnation showed that Jansenism had, by that stage, taken on a new meaning, since in terms of grace (prop. 1–43) it added an extreme conception of the role of theological charity (prop. 44–93) as well as of the origin and character of the powers within the Church (prop. 94–101). The Roman text nevertheless lacked clarity, and qualifications applied in globo were susceptible to varying interpretation. Sizable and highly vocal, resistance to Unigenitus exposed real differences within French Catholicism (call to council, 1717). It gave rise to a new condemnation, Pastoralis officii (1717), as well as to vigorous intervention on behalf of the political powers. This resistance gave its specific identity to a certain “Catholic Enlightenment” (katholische Aufklärung), which won sympathy during the 18th century in most Catholic countries. In the Netherlands it triggered the schism of the Old Catholics (1724). The acts of the synod* of Pistoie (1783), censured by the bull Auctorem Fidei (1794), provided the most complete example of this Jansenism, elements of which could also be found in the Church that issued from the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1790). Auctorem fidei thus condemned (DS 2600–700) errors concerning the constitution and the authority of the Church (prop. 1–15), the natural and supernatural condition of man (prop. 16–26), the sacraments (sacrament*) (prop. 27–60), cult* (prop. 61–79), religious figures (prop. 80–84), and the convocation of a national council (prop. 85).

2. A Reformed Catholicism

Recent historiography has tended to highlight the nuances and differences that prevent us from considering Jansenism as a coherent whole. On the dogmatic level it is most certainly true that Jansenius's intransigent Augustinianism can hardly be detected in his later disciples. A. Arnould himself, in his successive explanations, eventually criticized Thomist thought. There are, however, common elements, beyond political components, that express a particular vision of Catholicism, and of precisely the kind that the Roman condemnations sought to prohibit, directly or indirectly, with measures that had serious repercussions on the evolution of faith and Christian practice in general.

a) An Austere and Demanding Christianity. This is the popular image of Jansenism, according to which it is seen as contradicting the kind of easygoing, extroverted Catholicism associated with the Society of Jesus. But the real opposition was less clear since the rigorous quality of Jansenism was in fact characteristic of the Catholic reform in general. But it remains true that wherever the Jansenists had influence, a distinctly severe notion of salvation was subscribed to. This notion was linked to a rejection of the Molinist concept of grace and, especially, to the accent placed on the primacy of love of God and on the efficacy of divine help. It is this rejection of "sufficient grace," noted as early as the publication of Augustinus, that justifies the anti-Jansenist accusations summarized in the five propositions.

b) The insistent demand for "truly" sacramental practice—mainly penance and the Eucharist—but also a liturgical one, with a request for active participation that was at the origin of several translations (Scriptures, missal, breviary) and a revision of the liturgy (neo-Gallican liturgy).*

c) An ecclesiology of participation, and therefore a profound and active resistance to an authoritarian type of Church. This perspective, already expressed by Saint Cyran, was only amplified in reaction to magisterial decisions. Corresponding to a particular form of Gallicanism, it was abused in a millenarian, convulsionary, figurist way. These somewhat reactionary tendencies, reminiscent of the early church, were nevertheless combined with progressive elements, which explains the transformation of Enlightenment thinkers.*

d) Individualism. By opposing their meaning to the judgment of the pope, the champions of Augustinus, and then of Réflexions Morales, expressed the rights of conscience and Christian liberty.

e) Rationalism.* By stressing the rational character of their process, they set in motion an important discursive process, distinguished by logic (Logique de Port-Royal, 1662) and Cartesian philosophy.

f) Political Theology. By finally justifying their disregard of the laws of the state, they developed a new and influential theology of authority.

Jansenism disappeared with the turmoil of the Revolution, even if the term was widely used by the 19th century Ultramontanes to disqualify their austere, Gallican adversaries.

- Y. de la Brière (1916), "Le jansénisme de Jansenius," RSR 6, 270–301.
- A. Gits (1940), La foi ecclésiastique aux faits dogmatiques dans la théologie moderne, Louvain.
- L. Ceyskens (1957), "L'origine romaine de la bulle In Eminenti," in Jansenistica: Études relatives à l'histoire du j., Malines, 9–110.
- L. Cagnet (1961), Le jansénisme, Paris.
- B. Plongeron (1969), "Recherches sur l'Aufklärung catholique en Europe occidentale (1770–1830)," RHMC 16, 555–605.
- L. Ceyskens (1971), "Les Cinq propositions de Jansenius à Rome," RHE 66, 449–501, 821–86; id. (1980), "L'authenticité des Cinq propositions condamnées de Jansenius," Anton. 50, 368–424.
- B. Plongeron (1973), Théologie et politique au siècle des Lumières (1770–1820), Geneva.
- M. Rosa (Ed.) (1981), Cattolicesimo e lumi nel settecento italiano, Rome.
- L. Ceyskens, J. A. Tans (1987), Autour de l'Unigenitus, Louvain.
- J.M. Gres-Gayer (1988), "The Unigenitus of Clement XI: A Fresh Look at the Issues," TS 49, 259–82.
- J. Orcibal (1989), Jansenius d'Ypres (1585–1638), Paris.
- P. Blet (1993–94), "Louis XIV et les papes aux prises avec le jansénisme," AHP 31, 109–92; 32, 65–148.
- L. Ceyskens (1993), "Que penser finalement de l'histoire du jansénisme et de l'anti-jansénisme?" RHE 88, 108–30.
- B. Neveu (1993), L'erreur et son juge: Remarques sur les censures doctrinales à l'époque moderne, Naples.
- P. Stella (1994), Il Giansenismo in Italia: La Bolla Auctorem Fidei nella storia dell'ultramontanismo: Saggio introduttivo e documenti, Rome.
- J.M. Gres-Gayer (1995), Le jansénisme en Sorbonne, 1643–1656, Paris.
- L. Kolakowski (1995), God Owes Us Nothing. A Brief Remark on Pascal's Religion and on the Spirit of Jansenism, Oxford.

JACQUES M. GRES-GAYER

See also Augustinianism; Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Gallicanism; Grace; Pascal, Blaise; Ultramontanism

Jealousy, Divine

“[T]he Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God” (Ex 34:14). This title for YHWH, used in texts of major theological significance (such as the Ten Commandments: Ex 20:5 and Dt 5:9) is one of the most peculiar descriptions of the God of Israel*.

In Hebrew the concept of jealousy is expressed by the root qn' (83 times); the noun qin'â is very frequent (43 times), the adjective “jealous” is rarer and used exclusively of YHWH (qannâ': Ex 20:5, 34:14; Dt 4:24, 5:9, 6:15; qannô': Jos 24:19; Na 1:2). The Septuagint usually translates this as zêloô (or derived verbs), with nouns and adjectives from the same root; whence our terms jealousy and zeal. The NT has substantially adopted the terminology of the Septuagint, but the concept of “divine jealousy” is infrequently used (2 Cor 11:2; Heb 10:27).

The term jealousy designates a powerful passion (Sg 8:6), where love and hatred seem to be united and inseparable (Eccl 9:6). Its various manifestations are neither all morally acceptable nor all applicable to divine behavior.

Among human beings jealousy is often the equivalent of envy: the desire to possess that which belongs to others, something that causes hatred and violence (Gn 26:14, 30:1, 37:11; Prv 27:4; Sir 30:24, etc.). As such, the Scriptures (Scripture*) condemn this emotion (with particular emphasis in the NT: Mt 27:18; Rom 1:29; 1 Cor 13:4; 2 Cor 12:20; Gal 5:20f, 26, etc.) and obviously do not ascribe it to God.

In marriage jealousy is displayed as possessive love, with the connotation of suspicion with regard to the beloved (Nm 5:14–30) and vindictive anger against the rival (Prv 6:34). There are very few biblical passages in which such a meaning of the term is applied metaphorically to God (Ez 16:38, 16:42, 23:25) Those that do so are to be found within the context of parables, where the history of the covenant* is described in terms of a conjugal relation. There, jealousy is identified with the punitive wrath that punishes adultery.

Finally, words with the root qn' describe the feeling of passionate and exclusive love for a given object. In modern languages this nuance of meaning is conveyed by the word zeal. However, this does not adequately express the character of all-encompassing passion, with a touch of extremism, that belongs to the biblical concept. Human beings can feel this kind of exclusive jealousy for God (Ps 119:139; Jdt 9:4; Rom 10:2), for the temple (Ps 69:10; Jn 2:17), for the law (1 Macc 2:27, 50; 2 Macc 4:2; Acts 21:20, 22:3; Gal 1:14), and for the good (Ti 2:4; 1 Pt 3:13). The Scriptures praise those who uncompromisingly choose the cause of God by giving themselves utterly to it—individuals such as Phinehas (Nm 25:11ff.; 1 Macc 2:54; Si 45:23), Elijah (1 Kgs 19:10, 14; 1 Macc 2:8; Si 48:2), Jehu (2 Kgs 10:1), Mattathias (1 Macc 2:2ff.).

It is this last aspect that will enable us to understand the meaning of “divine jealousy,” God’s exclusive and irrevocable attachment to Israel as his partner in the covenant (Renaud); and it is through this concept that the Bible* expresses the unique and absolute nature of YHWH as the God of Israel. Indeed the concept of a “jealous God” appears to be the foundation of the law of monotheism* and provides the justification for the absolute prohibition of other gods or the worship of idols (idolatry*) (Ex 20:5; Dt 4:24, 5:9, 6:15, 32:16, 32: 21; Jos 4:14, etc.).

Divine jealousy implies two apparently contradictory aspects. The first is the most obvious and the most widely attested: “I the Lord your God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers on the children to the third and the fourth generation of those who hate me” (Ex 20:5). This is a punitive expression in which jealousy and anger appear as closely related (Dt 29:19; Ez 5:13, 35:11, 36:5f.; Na 1:2; Sg 1:18, 3:8, etc.). This aspect shows how serious the choice of adhering to a “holy” God is (Jos 23:16, 24:19) and how the betrayal (or “hatred”) of his love is the equivalent of death (Dt 6:15, 29:19).

The other aspect of the jealousy of God must not, however, be neglected: “but showing steadfast love to thousands of those who love me and keep my commandments” (Ex 20:6). In this case jealousy signifies election (choice*), an overwhelming and eternally faithful love. The term is applied above all when Israel finds itself in conditions of extreme need, and then the jealous love of the Lord of armies will come down upon the enemy (Is 26:11; Zec 1:14f., 8:2), while revealing itself as mercy and salvation to God’s own people (Is 9:6, 37:32, 42:13, 59:17, 63:15, etc.).

- H. A. Brongers (1963), “Der Eifer des Herrn Zebaoth,” VT 13, 269–84.
- B. Renaud (1963), Je suis un Dieu jaloux: Évolution sémantique et signification théologique de qine‘ah, LeDiv 36.
- W. Berg (1979), “Die Eifersucht Gottes—ein problematischer Zug des alttestamentlichen Gottesbildes?” BZ 23, 197–211.
- C. Dohmen (1990), “‘Eifersüchtiger ist sein Name’ (Ex 34, 14):

Ursprung und Bedeutung der alttestamentlichen Rede von Gottes Eifersucht,” ThZ 46, 289–304.

E. Reuter (1993), “qn’,” ThWAT 7, 51–62.

PIETRO BOVATI

See also Anthropomorphism; Choice; Love; Universalism; Wrath of God

Jerome. See Scripture, Senses of; Translations of the Bible, Ancient

Jerusalem

The name Urusalim is attested from the time of the pharaoh Amenophis IV (1377–58). It appears in the Old Testament as Yeroušhālam, in the Septuagint in the Semitic form Ierousalēm, carried over into the New Testament where the Hellenistic form Hierosoloma is also used.

a) Old Testament. Jerusalem is not named in the Pentateuch but simply suggested by anticipation as “the place that he will choose, to make his name dwell there” (Dt 14:23). Genesis 14 probably connects Jerusalem to that “Salem” whose king Melchisedek collected the tithe of Abraham (Ps 110:4; Heb 7:4). David made Jerusalem his city (2 Sm 5:9; Is 22:9, 29:1)—until then it had been in the hands of Jebusite Canaanites (Jos 10:1; 15:63). He installed the ark there and acquired the land where Solomon would build the temple (1 Kgs 6–8). Jerusalem then became the religious center of the whole of Israel, though competing sanctuaries were built in the northern kingdom. The old Canaanite name “Zion” designated the Temple Mount. Jerusalem was besieged by the Assyrians in 701 (2 Kgs 18:17–19, 35), captured by the Babylonians in 597, and reconquered and sacked in 587 (2 Kgs 24:10–25, 21).

The city was reconstructed when the Israelites came back from exile during the Persian era (Ezr 3–6; Neh 3–6) and remained the great center of attraction for the Jews of the Diaspora and those of Palestine (Is 60; Ps 122, 126).

“Daughter of Zion” had been a collective name for exiles welcomed (Is 1:8) into a neighborhood of Jerusalem after the destruction of the northern kingdom, but from the time of the exile it came to denote the population of the entire city (Is 52:2, 62:11; Zec 9:9).

Dominated by the successors of Alexander the Great and in the grips of internecine conflicts, the city was liberated by the Maccabees (reconsecration of the temple that had been profaned by Antiochus IV: 1 Macc 4:36–59). Then, under the Romans, Herod restored the former splendor of the city and the temple.

The major testimony of the extraordinary symbolic and theological charge with which the city became invested is found in the Books of Isaiah and Psalms (Ps 46, 48, 84, 87 and within the “psalms of ascent,” 122, 125–129, 132–134). The prophets (prophet* and prophecy) reproach the personified city (Is 5:3, 40:2, 9...) for its crimes (Is 1:21, 5:3, 28:14; Jer 2:1–3, 5), predict its ruin (Is 29:1–7; Jer 7:1–8, 3, 11:11, 26), and weep for it (Lam). But, in the name of an irrevocable promise (Is 28:16, 54:6), Jerusalem will see the eschatological paroxysm of triumph and rejoicing (Is 51–54, 60–62; see oracles of salvation added to the Old Testament after the misfortunes of Israel: Is 1:25ff., 4:4ff., 6:13; Jer 3:14–18). The wife that YHWH cannot repudiate, and mother of every man and of all other pardoned cities (Ez 16:53–63), Jerusalem, washed and purified, will become once more the permanent abode of God* (Ez 48:35) and of justice, the meeting place of the surviving remnant of the nation (Ez 4:2f; 1 Jn 3:1–5), the chosen focal point of a vision of salvation for all nations (Is 2:2ff., 65:18–21; Mi 4:1ff.; Hg 2:6–9; Zec 14:16; Tb 13). The fate of Jerusalem is bound to the fate of the Davidic dynasty (Ps 132; Is 22:9; Jer 33:15f.) or detached from it (Ez 45:7–46, 18).

b) New Testament. In the Gospels Jerusalem is first and foremost the site of the Passion* and Resurrection* of Jesus Christ. Jesus* fulfills the prophecy of Zechariah 9:9 by his final entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21:5; Jn 12:15), and here the symbolic, prophetic name “Daughter of Zion” is used. John differs from the synoptics by punctuating his whole narrative with various passages that see Jesus in Jerusalem, from 2, 13–25.

In the Gospel of Mark, Jesus’ entry into Jerusalem frightens the disciples who are following him. Jerusalem becomes the place of suffering and death (Mk 10, 32 Sq). By contrast, Galilee becomes the place of resurrection and revelation (14:28, 16:7). Matthew modifies Mark: at the death of Jesus the rebellious city becomes the “holy city” (Mt 27:53 prepared by 4:5), where the chosen are for a time raised from the dead and appear to a great number of people.

Jerusalem is highly significant in the book of Luke. He brings together all the apparitions of the risen Jesus (Lk 24) in one single day in Jerusalem or nearby, making that place the unique center of the redemptive drama, the city of the Risen One, the site of the Pentecost and the beginnings of the Church (Acts 1–7), where God’s plan is fulfilled, where Jesus realizes salvation in history. The community of Jerusalem (Acts 15; Gal 1:18–2, 10) is the starting point of the mission* (Lk 24:47; Acts 1:8) and the center of the new faith* (Acts 2:14, 5:28, 9:21).

It seems on several occasions that Luke deliberately uses the Hellenistic form Hierosoloma to designate the unfaithful city; the form is used in Acts 21–23 when Paul is arrested and held in Jerusalem before being transferred to Caesarea (La Potterie 1981 and 1982, Sylva 1983). The fourth gospel (Gospels*), written after the destruction of Jerusalem, uses this form. In Galatians Paul uses the Semitic form for a positive or negative symbolic meaning (4, 25f.) and the Greek form for a geographical meaning (1:17, 2:1).

In Hebrews 12:22, Christians approach Mount Zion and the city of the living God, the celestial Jerusalem (Semitic form). Greater than the city of David and prefigured by it, Jerusalem is the “celestial Jerusalem” called “new Jerusalem” in Revelation 21:2, permanently, indestructibly founded by God (Heb 11:16, 12:22); Jerusalem comes down from heaven next to God (Rev 21:2, 10–27). It reveals the true nature of the Church as the people* of God, both body and city.

- J. Jeremias (1962), Jerusalem zur Zeit Jesu, 3rd Ed., Göttingen.
- W. D. Davies (1975), “Jérusalem et la terre dans la tradition chrétienne,” RHPPhR, 491–533.
- E. Otto (1980), Jerusalem, die Geschichte der Heiligen Stadt: Von den Anfängen bis zur Kreuzfahrerzeit, UB 308.
- I. de La Potterie (1981), “Les deux noms de Jérusalem dans l’Évangile de Luc,” RSR 69, 57–80; id. (1982), “Les deux noms de Jérusalem dans les Actes des Apôtres,” Bib 63, 153–87.
- Dennis D. Sylva (1983), “Ierousalem and Hierosoloma in Luke-Acts,” ZNW 74, 207–22.

MAURICE CARREZ

See also Apocalyptic Literature; City; Eschatology; Israel; Jesus, Historical; Kingdom of God; Parousia; Rome; Temple; Universalism

Jesus Christ. See Christ and Christology; Jesus, Historical

Jesus, Historical

The term Jesus of history, or historical Jesus, designates the Jesus whose life can be reconstructed on the basis of “scientifically neutral” historical data. Neutrality is understood here as either in opposition to the intervention of faith—which transforms historical (history*) data—or in opposition to the distortions of time—which alter the memories of witnesses.

I. How Can the Historical Jesus Be Reconstructed?

Due to the scarcity and particularities of available information, methodological problems inevitably arise in any attempt to reconstruct the life and the words of a personage from antiquity. In the case of the historical Jesus the enterprise is both facilitated by the multiplicity of sources and complicated by the nonhistoriographical approach of testimonials.

1. Documentary Sources

We do not have direct access to Jesus’ thought, as no document written by him has been handed down to us. We do have indirect access in the form of five different types of documentary sources (see Meier 1991) from various historical witnesses.

a) Sources from Christian Canon (in Chronological Order). The most ancient of these is the Pauline correspondence (from the years 50–58). In addition to discussing the Crucifixion and Resurrection* of Jesus, Paul reports four pronouncements of the Lord (1 Cor 7:10 and 9:14, 1 Thes 4:16, and Rom 14:14). The apostle seems to be acquainted with some early collections of Jesus’ sayings, which he uses (sometimes without quoting them) in his argumentation. There, the fundamental structure Jesus’ ethics—an ethics of love (as stated in Gal 5:14)—can be found, along with the idea of an essential coherence between his life and death (2 Cor 8:9, Gal 1:3–4, and Rom 3:24–25).

The second source is the so-called Q source, sayings pronounced by Jesus as a master of wisdom within the horizon of the eschatological kingdom. Collected in Palestine in the years 50–60, and subsequently lost, these sayings are postulated by the majority of exegetes as underlying the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. The third source is the Gospel of Mark (written about the year 65), which is the first document that integrates the teachings of Jesus into the narrative of his life. Mark draws on the collections of miracles (miracle*), parables (parable*), and sayings presented by tradition, combing them with a narrative cycle of the Passion that had been established in the 40s within the Church of Jerusalem*. The Gospels of Matthew and Luke, which integrate materials from Q, constitute the fourth source. The fifth source is the Gospel of John, which includes fragmentary historical information.

b) Christian Apocrypha Sources. The dating and the historical accuracy of the Christian apocrypha, which consists of various extracanonical early writings, are intensely debated. The oldest texts are dated from the middle of the second century, but the traditions they represent may have been taken from archaic forms close to the historical Jesus. This might be true of the Egerton 2 papyrus and the papyrus of Fayoum; the Fathers handed down to us fragments of Judeo-Christian gospels (from the Nazarenes, Ebionites, and Hebrews). The Coptic Gospel of Thomas (from about 170) includes 114 sayings, some showing a late Gnostic influence while others are a more sober (therefore archaic?) version Jesus’ word attested by the synoptic Gospels. Certain of these sayings might emanate from teachings of Jesus that were not preserved elsewhere. For example, the Gospel of Thomas 82 reads: “Jesus said, ‘He who is near me is near the fire, and he who is far from me is far from the Kingdom.’ ” A fragment of the Gospel of Peter (from about 150) narrates the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus with motifs close to those of Matthew’s Gospel. The Protoevangelium Jacobi (150–200) relates the childhoods of Mary* and of Jesus, in which the theological fictions recounted may indeed contain hints of historical truths. In general, it is preferable to avoid sweeping judgments and evaluate case by case the credibility of material contained in apocryphal sources.

c) Jewish Sources. Jewish sources are extremely rare. This quasi-silence can be explained by rivalry between Jews and Christians and hostility toward the founding hero of the Christian movement. There are about 15 allusions to Yeshua in the Talmud; they mention his activity as a healer and his execution (Baraittha Sanhedrin 43 a Abodah Zara 16 b-17 a). A popular fifth-century text, the Toledoth Yeshua, is ironic about Jesus' impurity (purity*/impurity) and contradicts his virgin birth, making him the illegitimate son of the soldier Pentera, who supposedly suborned Mary.

Events are related on an entirely different level in a fragment of the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus's Testimonium Flavianum, dating from 93–94: "Now there was about this time, Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works,—a teacher of such men who receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles. . . . And when Pilate . . . had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him" (Antiquities of the Jews Book 18, 3:3; see also Book 20, 9:1). Although Flavius Josephus's actual text was glossed over by a Christian scribe, but with a primitive core still possible to attribute to the author, it stands as the sole attestation of Jesus independent of Christianity.

d) Latin Sources. Latin historians had more to say about the faith of the first Christians than about their master. The oldest document is a letter from Pliny the Younger to Trajan (about 111–12). This was followed by Tacitus (Annals 15:44) and Suetonius (Life of the Emperor Claudius 25:4).

2. Problems

Nevertheless, historians have no other documentation so readily abundant or close to historical events on any other figure of antiquity other than the life of Jesus. Although the Gospels were written between 65 and 90 and are based on an oral tradition and collections of sayings or narratives subsequently lost, some of which go back to the 40s, this chronological gap is minimal for ancient historiography.

But major difficulties are encountered in attempts to exploit these sources, which are not firsthand documents or neutral accounts and which do not seek the documentary exactitude demanded of a modern historian. On that count, they are no different from other biographies and histories of Jewish and Greco-Roman antiquity. Ancient historians were, of course, bound by an ethic of precision and verification of facts (see How to Write History, written by Lucian of Samosata in about 160). But their writings were also meant to defend a position or a point of view, which led them to select, interpret, and distort the data they collected. Neutrality was not of concern to ancient historiographers, whether Greek, Jewish, or Roman.

Furthermore, the Gospels create an additional problem for historians. Not only is their understanding of history governed by a confession of faith, but this faith in the glorified Lord is also their very reason for telling the story of Jesus and his disciples. Consequently, the modern historian in search of the historical Jesus studies the Gospels with a documentary perspective that does not coincide with the theological edification that motivated them. It is erroneous to claim that the ancient Church was not interested in setting down the words and deeds of the earthly Jesus. On the contrary, the Church believed that the glorified Lord could not be known outside of the life of the man from Nazareth. But this interest in the story of Jesus was not archeological; words and deeds were recorded in order to express their meaning for the community at hand. The miracles of healing* were told because they attested to the power (omnipotence*) of God acting through Jesus and because this power reverberated within the community. The words of Jesus were preserved but, because they were recognized as authority, they had to be modified to adapt to the situation of those who received them.

Therefore, scholars looking for the historical Jesus view the narrative framework attributed to the words and deeds of Jesus with suspicion. For example, the Formgeschichte, the school of literary genre or form, has demonstrated that this framework is largely a product of the literary activity of the Evangelists. Scholars search for information on the social, cultural, economic, and religious context of the land where Jesus lived, which is missing from the Gospels. This requires knowledge of intertestamentary Jewish writings, Jewish historiography (Flavius Josephus), rabbinical literature (the Mishnah), and Roman law. Cultural anthropology* gives an idea of the social fabric of an agrarian society in antiquity (see Crossan 1991).

3. Criteria of Authenticity

Oscar Cullmann is basically correct when he asserts that everything in the tradition of Jesus is secondary because it is all filtered by the faith of the post-Pascal community, and at the same time everything is authentic because whatever changes are made by the community, they are made in order to transmit the message of Jesus (Cullman, 1925). Nonetheless, four primary criteria and three secondary criteria of authenticity are applied in research aimed at going back to the most ancient strata of the tradition of Jesus (see Meier 1991; Fusco in Marguerat 1997).

Primary criteria: 1) Multiple attestation: The words and deeds of Jesus are reputed authentic if they are attested by at least two literary sources independent of each other (Q, Mark, Paul, John, Gospel of Thomas, etc.) or in more than one literary form (parable, controversy, miracle, logion, etc.). 2) Ecclesiastical difficulty: The words and deeds of Jesus that have created difficulties (historical or theological) in their application within the first Christian communities are retained. 3) Discontinuity: Any tradition is considered authentic if it “cannot be deduced from Judaism* or attributed to primitive Christianity, particularly where Judeo-Christianity tempered the received tradition as audacious or rearranged it” (Käsemann 1954). This criterion should be balanced by the following: 4) Sufficient explanation (or historical continuity): Anything may be attributed to the historical Jesus that helps explain certain incontestable facts about his destiny (e.g., the conflict with the authorities in Jerusalem and his physical elimination) and who helps us understand the diversity of movements derived from him in primitive Christianity (e.g., differing positions on the question of the Torah). The secondary criteria include 5) Coherence: It is postulated that the various characteristics attributed to the historical Jesus should not contradict each other. 6) Language: Words attributed to Jesus must allow for retroversion in Aramaic and have characteristics of Semitic rhetoric (antithetical parallelism, alliteration, divine passive, etc.). 7) Conformity with the Palestinian environment: Words and deeds are accepted if they mention customs, beliefs, legal procedures, commercial and agricultural practices, or socio-political conditions historically attested in first-century Palestine.

The presumption of authenticity demands the joint use of several of these primary or secondary criteria.

4. Framework for the Biography of Jesus

Reconstruction of the life of the historical Jesus operates within a chronological and geographical framework marked out by the testimony of sources and data from Jewish historiography. Researchers agree on the following information:

Birth: the year 4 B.C. (the year of Herod the Great’s death).

Death: April 7 A.D. 30, which on the Jewish calendar is Friday, 14 Nizan. (Another possible date is April 3 A.D. 33.)

Public activity: three years, mainly in Galilee (miracles, preaching to the humble, infractions against the code of purity); then journey to Jerusalem, where he came into conflict with religious authorities, precipitating the decision to have him put to death.

II. The Historians’ Quest

Up to the Enlightenment period, the question “Who is Jesus?” was answered in dogmatic* terms. Precursors of the late 17th-century English school of Deism* (John Locke et al.) had already expressed doubts on the relevance of this response.

1. Initiator

Hermann Samuel Reimarus’s work Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger, which was published posthumously by Lessing in 1778, caused an uproar. The author maintained that the teachings of Jesus had been falsified by his disciples, who were disappointed by the failure of their master’s pretensions to political messianism. Reimarus founded a new literary genre, the “Life of Jesus,” which was marked by three major characteristics: 1) The biography of the historical Jesus was reconstructed above and beyond evangelical information, and often opposed to it. 2) The alternative between the Jewishness of Jesus and his quality as founder of a new movement was posed, and if one of these was affirmed the other tended to be denied. 3) The works created controversy within the Church; they were reproved as subversive and even blasphemous.

2. The Rationalist Quest

In a first current, the Life of Jesus imposed upon the Evangelical tradition a rationalist critique mistrustful of everything supernatural. H.E.G. Paulus (1828) and Friedrich Daniel Schleiermacher* (1832) accepted the miraculous only when it conformed to a rational explanation. A mythological current—including D.F. Strauss (1835–36), L.Couchoud (1924), and the Tübingen* school (F.C. Baur) saw the Gospels as a symbolic expression of spiritual truths; the historical reality of the life of Jesus dissolves into nothing more than a mythological concretion derived from the religious imagination of the first Christians.

3. The Liberal Quest

The middle of the 19th century is marked by the strong return to the humanity of Jesus. The Gospels are taken as biographical-type documents created out of followers’ spontaneous interest. Jesus is seen as a fascinating religious personality whose psychological development needed to be reconstructed. There was a plethora of liberal “Lives of Jesus,” including works by E. Renan (1863), A. Sabatier (1880), B. Weiss (1882), and A. Reville (1897). Renan’s study was a brilliant success, which cannot be explained exclusively by its excellent literary quality. Renan succeeded in making an audacious synthesis of the positivist heritage (“everything in the story has a human explanation”) and the imagination and sensitivity of the romantic tradition.

4. The Apocalyptic Quest

In 1906 Albert Schweitzer, summing up two centuries of “Lives of Jesus,” came to a devastating conclusion on their methodological fragility—every period dressed “its” Jesus in the ideological outfit that suited it. But his combat against the recuperation by modernity of the historical Jesus did not stop there. Inspired by the works of J. Weiss (1901), Schweitzer affirmed that the reign of God, which represents the heart of Jesus’ preaching, should be understood in the Jewish apocalyptic* sense. Jesus was aware of living the imminence of the end of the world and precipitating its coming by his prophetic activity; his ethics is radical because it holds for that short intermediary period remaining before the great upheaval.

The double traumatism provoked by the publication of Schweitzer’s book stopped the flow of liberal biographies by declaring the failure of the attempt to give to modernity a “non-dogmatic” Jesus bearing universal values. But the reestablishment of the image of the historical Jesus in his times was so powerful that it brutally cut him off from the movement derived from him. That position was summed up in the slogan formulated by A. Loisy (1902): “Jesus announced the Kingdom and it is the Church that came.”

5. The Existential Quest

The school of literary form, which followed immediately after Schweitzer, saw the primitive Church as the author of the tradition of Jesus, thus destroying every possibility of reconstructing the biography of Jesus. Rudolf Bultmann*’s Jesus (1926) illustrates this program, which created an unbridgeable gap between Jesus and the kerygma. Nevertheless, under the impetus of E. Käsemann, a “new quest” took shape in 1953 around the determination to articulate the historical Jesus and the kerygma. This was the line followed by Joachim Jeremias (1947), E. Fuchs (1956), Hans Conzelmann (1959), J.-M. Robinson (1960), Norman Perrin (1967), and particularly Gunther Bornkamm (1956). While recognizing the post-Pascal origin of christological formulations, these disciples of Bultmann gave value to the salvational dimension of the words and deeds of Jesus in which the present offer of the Kingdom is concretized. At the most a mediating function is recognized for the historical action of Jesus, though its christological reach is “implicit.”

6. Return to the Jewishness of Jesus

The quest for the historical Jesus is currently split into three currents, whose common denominator is a revalorization of his Jewishness.

One trend is fed by the rediscovery of the Judaism of Palestine beyond the caricatures left to us by history. It underscores Jesus’ participation in the apocalyptic effervescence of his times and his proximity to messianic ideals of the restoration of Israel. From this viewpoint, integration of Jesus into the Jewish faith is admitted without reserves (Vermès 1973; Sanders 1985).

Conversely, a neoliberal current purges the tradition of Jesus of all apocalyptic elements (which are considered post-Pascal). It recenters the preaching of Jesus on a sapient-type moral message of direct communion with God, material egalitarianism, and spiritual fraternity. On the basis of strong exploitation of extracanonical traditions (Crossan 1991), the provocative preaching of Jesus is assimilated with the teaching of the cynical philosophers (see Chilton-Evans 1994).

Proponents of a sociopolitical trend detect a state of social and cultural crisis in first-century Israel. The successive messianic eruptions that marked the period are understood as attempts to reform Palestinian society, and Jesus is placed within this series of protest reformers (Horsley 1985, Theissen 1986).

III. Jesus: A Unique Figure?

Palestinian Judaism at the time of Jesus was not monolithic; the sociocultural fabric was varied and multicolored. A profusion of groups, parties, and subversive cells rubbed together, sometimes actively proselytizing. Can Jesus’ group be assimilated with one of them?

1. Comparable Figures

Jesus had little in common with the Saducees, the priestly aristocracy, and members of the sect of Qumran, who practiced retreat from the world. The closest comparable figures would have been the rabbi, the zealot, and the messianic prophet (see Schubert 1973).

Jesus shared several features with Pharisaic rabbis, including interest in commentary of the Torah (see Lk 6:20–49 and accounts of controversies), concern for educating the people, and formation of a circle of students who shared the life of their master. The miracle-making rabbi was also a familiar figure in Judaism (Honi le Traceur de cercles, Onias le Juste et Hanina ben Dosa in the first century B.C.; see Vermès 1973). It has been shown that most of the sayings in the Sermon on the Mount are closely analogous to the rabbinical teaching preserved in the Mishnah (see Klausner 1933). But the historical Jesus partially escaped from the model in several ways. His teaching does not enter into the casuistic (casuistry*) game of the rabbis (Mt 5:21–48). The state of disciple was neither voluntary nor transitory but permanent and on call from the master. Jesus was nomadic, unmarried, and expressly committed to breaking away from the family (Lk 14:26) in contradiction with the family ethic and sedentarization of the rabbis.

Jesus is radically separated from the Zealot movement by his ethic of non-resistance to others (Lk 6:27–35). Nevertheless, Jesus' awareness of a crisis brought about by the imminence of the Kingdom, and the active reaction it demanded, explains a rapprochement with the Zealot project, apparently with the consent of Pilate (Mk 15:2–9 and 15:17–20 and Jn 19:19).

There is greater proximity between Jesus and the numerous first-century messianic prophets (prophet and prophecy) (see Grelot 1978). John the Baptist animated a popular movement of awakening and baptized people in the Jordan for remission of sins (sin*) (Mk 1:4–5). Shortly after Jesus' death, a Samaritan prophet led a crowd of followers to Mount Garizim, with the promise of letting them see the sacred bowls that Moses had buried there; Pilate's repression was so murderous that it cost him his appointment (Josephus' Antiquities Book 18, 4:1–2).

The entire period of the procurators was marked by these charismatic figures who announced the advent of a "sign" that would typologically repeat the story of salvation. These miracles, which were connected with the Exodus or the entry into Canaan, brought back Israel's sacred past. Before he succumbed to Roman repression, Theudas had rallied hundreds to the messianic cause by promising them to part the waters of the Jordan in order to give them an easy passage across it (Antiquities Book 20, 5:1). Another prophet of the new times, the Egyptian referred to in Acts 21:38, stirred up the crowd at the Mount of Olives, predicting that they would see the walls of Jerusalem come crumbling down as in the days of Jericho (Antiquities Book 20, 8:6).

Jesus—who assembled disciples, preached to the crowds, announced the Kingdom, and worked signs and miracles—can be more easily compared with the messianic prophets than with the rabbis and Zealots. And it would seem that this was his contemporaries' opinion because the Gospels say that the crowd took Jesus for a prophet (Lk 7:16 and 7:39 and Mk 14:65 and 16, 4) or compared him to prophets of old (Mk 6:15 and 8:28). The people asked him for a "sign" (Lk 11:29). The loaves shared in the desert (Mk 6:34–44) are certainly a substitute for manna. Furthermore, the discourse of Jesus included typical elements of prophetic discourse, such as announcements of salvation, threats, predictions, and visions (Lk 10:18).

But what accounts for this profusion of messianic prophets in first-century Israel?

2. Messianic Protest Movements

Close study of sociocultural components of first-century Palestinian society reveals a situation of social and religious crisis (see Theissen in Marguerat 1997). Though the country enjoyed the exceptional political stability prevailing in the Roman Empire during the Principat (pax romana), this facilitated the forceful strategy of cultural assimilation practiced in the provinces under the Roman yoke. The Pilate government (A.D. 26–36) consistently strove to acculturate Palestine to the values of the empire. Coins were minted with pagan symbols, military insignia with the effigy of the emperor were introduced in Jerusalem, and the treasure of the temple was spoliated to finance public works (see Antiquities Book 18, 3:1).

The greatest resistance in the entire empire against this policy of assimilation was in Palestine. On the death of Herod the Great (4 B.C.), a "war of brigands" brought forth numerous messianic pretenders to the throne; the shepherd Athronges crowned himself with the royal diadem before a crowd of enthusiastic followers. When Archelaus was deposed (6 A.D.), Judas the Galilean led a campaign of refusal to pay taxes based on the theology that the land belongs to YHWH. His partisans, fired by this theocratic ideal, were crushed by the Roman legions. Josephus highlighted John the Baptist's strong criticism of Herod Antipas on the grounds of morality and respect for the law (Antiquities Book 18, 5:2). It is no surprise that in this tense atmosphere Jesus was interrogated on the emblematic question of taxes due to Caesar (Mk 12:13–17).

The growth of messianism* in first-century Palestine should be understood against a background of resistance against cultural assimilation. This resistance came from the common people because the aristocracy of Judea and Galilee (including the Saducees) were affiliated with the values of the ruling power. The survival of Israel's religious traditions was endangered under pressure from Roman modernism. This caused an effervescence of messianic piety focused on the imperative need to restore the purity of a land sullied by the presence of sinners and the impious. It led to the emergence of charismatic prophets, spiritual adventurers who exacerbated Jewish nationalism under the theocratic ideal of the Kingdom of God.

The activity of the historical Jesus should be situated in a context of the rise of protest messianism. This helps us understand how Jesus aroused the interest of the humble, but it also explains why some were disappointed and rejected him because he did not support rising Jewish nationalism.

3. Jesus, Disciple of the Baptist

The Gospels let us imagine a close affinity with one of those prophets, John the Baptist, whose role was changed by the Christian tradition after the facts. Jesus, like John, proclaimed a message of conversion. The first Christians reversed their roles, making John a precursor of Jesus when in fact he was the master and Jesus the pupil.

The comparisons are obvious. Jesus presented himself to the baptism* of John; this episode is related to the manifestation of the divine filiation* of Jesus (Mk 1:9–11). The public activity of Jesus in Galilee followed that of John (Mk 1:14). The two are often associated, either by Herod (Mk 6:16), by the multitudes (Mk 6:14 and 8:28), or by Jesus himself, who associates his rejection with that of John the Baptist (Mk 11:27–33 and Mt 11:18–19). Jesus honored John and raised him above the Old Testament prophets (Mt 11:9 and Lk 7:26).

The first Christians did not invent these parallels. On the contrary, the proximity of these two prophets of the Kingdom soon became troublesome for the primitive Church, which was in rivalry with Baptist circles. The criterion of ecclesiastical difficulties applies here. Christianity strove to subordinate John the Baptist to Jesus; the fourth gospel is the clearest testimony to this reversal of hierarchy (Jn 1:19–36 and 3:22–4:3).

It is most likely that when John was executed in the year 28, Jesus took over for his master (Mk 1:14). Like his master, he called for conversion and founded the urgency on the proximity of the Kingdom (Mt 3:8 and 4:17). Like John, he destroyed all spiritual security based on belonging to the holy people (Mt 3:7, 12:41, and 8:11–12). His first disciples came from John's circle (Jn 1, 29–42). Jesus did not found a separate community like the Pharisees or members of the sect of Qumran. Jesus addressed himself to all the people and particularly to the outcasts of the official religion as did John (Lk 3:10–14, 7:28–29, and Mt 21:32).

But these close affinities also enlighten Jesus' originality. The very fact that the Baptist movement and the Jesus movement became competitive early in their development indicates that these two theologies, which arose in the same place, were not identical. The first difference is that Jesus was not an ascetic; he did not live in retreat in the desert but favored public places. In fact, he was reprimanded for not fasting (Mk 2:18) and called a glutton (Lk 7:33–34). The second difference, judging from the scattered remnants of John's preaching available to us, is that John's announcement of the conversion seemed to function against a background of the wrath of God. Jesus transformed the Baptist's preaching of judgment and restructured it around a God of grace, breaking the crime-punishment correlation. Jesus' God is a God of limitless love, a God who loves bad people as much as good people (Mt 5:45). The announcement of judgment persists in Jesus' teaching but the primacy of salvation, backed by miracles, is patent; divine wrath is no longer the reason for action. On this major point, the Galilean reversed his master's message (see Becker 1972 and 1996).

A third difference touches on Jesus' statute. Jesus does not announce, he accomplishes. By acts of exorcism*, he makes the royalty of God intervene as a present rather than a future reality. "But if it is by the finger of God that I cast out demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you" (Lk 11:20). John threatened the imminent advent of the God of wrath; Jesus was aware that he accomplished, by his words and deeds, the turn of events called for in the incantations of the messianic prophets. The future of God is so pressing that it has already invaded the present; the Kingdom is "in the midst of you" (Lk 17:21). The man from Nazareth was aware of causing an upheaval in the history of God and men.

IV. The Horizon of the Reign of God

Initiatives taken by Jesus concretize a strong conviction: Jesus was aware of living and, by his words and deeds, hastening the coming of the reign of God. His activity was thoroughly invested in the face of the basileia tou theou, a concept that is both spatial (Kingdom of God) and temporal (reign of God), open to the immediacy of an "already there" and the imminence of a "not yet."

1. Insuppressible Urgency

The words and deeds of Jesus were dominated by a sense of urgency. The call to follow him upset the most untouchable solidarities. To follow Jesus was to take leave of his kind (Lk 9:61–62), ignore burial duties for his own father (Lk 9:59–60), and even "hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and sisters" (Lk 14, 26). This disregard for funeral rites and familial responsibilities was a radical departure that was unknown in antiquity, except among the Greek cynical philosophers.

There were other signs of the urgent need to announce the Kingdom. Disciples were ordered to bring neither purse nor sandals and not to greet anyone on the way (Lk 10:4). Pressed by the imperative necessity of saving lives, Jesus healed on the Sabbath* (Mk 3:4 and Lk 13:15). In Jesus' commentary on the Torah, the imperative of loving others outweighed all other rules; even the sacrificial rite at the Temple of Jerusalem had to be interrupted, if necessary, to reconcile with others (Mt 5:23–24). The parables of judgment induced a rapid, decisive reaction in the face of the coming event (Mk 13:34–36, Mt 25:1–13, and Lk 12:42–48 and 16:1–8).

In short, the state of emergency dictated by the imminence of the Kingdom precipitated everything, including the call of Jesus to walk in his footsteps (sequela Christi), the healing, the reading of the Law, and the discourse in parables. "Truly I say to you, there are some standing here who will not taste death before they see the kingdom of God has come with power” (Mk 9:1). Jesus had the conviction that he was living in the immediate proximity of the coming of God who, by his judgment, would eliminate all causes of suffering and assemble his own around him. Nothing else mattered but the call to convert before the coming of the great day of liberation (Mk 1:15).

2. Signs

The conviction of the approaching reign was concretized in acts that have the power of signs—healing and speaking in parables.

There are many traces in the Gospels of Jesus’ miraculous activity. Five different types of miracles are attributed to him: healing (to the point of raising the dead), exorcism (where a man is liberated from the evil spirit that dispossessed him of himself), miracles justifying a rule (for example, forgiving sins), feats of generosity (the abundance of the loaves), and lifesaving on the lake (vanquishing the disciples’ fear).

As a matter of fact, miracles of this sort were known in Jewish writings and Greco-Roman literature. The Romans had healers such as Apollonios of Thyane, the Jews had miracle-making rabbis and messianic prophets who performed feats. The miraculous activity of Jesus was not an exception. Jesus had the same skills as other first-century miracle-makers, and the way he cured a deaf mute (putting a finger in the ears, spitting, and touching the tongue; Mk 7:33) corresponds to common therapeutic practices in antiquity.

Nonetheless, it cannot be concluded that the healing activity of Jesus blended in with commonplace popular medicine of his times. Jesus gave an uncommon sense to his miracles. He made them signs of the reign already there (Lk 7:20–22 and Mt 11:2–5). The distinction between Jesus and other healers in his times lies in his assigning the miracles to the royalty of God. His cures and exorcisms were indications that God’s titanic battle against evil was under way then and there in the combat of Jesus against illness, which disfigures humanity. Sending out 72 disciples charged with the power to exorcise, he exclaimed: “I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven. Behold, I have given you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall hurt you” (Lk 10:18–19). By his healing acts Jesus restored the dignity of the human in the order of creation, contesting a religious culture in which evil was taken as a fatality and a divine sanction and the ailing were considered responsible for their suffering (Jn 9:2–3).

Jesus did not invent parables as a form of communication but he made much greater use of them than did the rabbis from whom he borrowed the form. Jesus did not eschew the charm of tales. The Gospels attribute some 40 parables to him. Why was that so? Parables, by their indirect veiled discourse, are the language suited to the Kingdom; they make it known that an event has taken place in the present, which changes the face of things. But this mystery must be sought out. The parables of growth give to understand that the grandeur of the reign is to be paradoxically discovered in the humble environment of the activity of Jesus (Mk 4:3–9 and Lk 13:18–21). The relation between history and the reign is reversed. History is not hurtling to a brutal end as described by the Apocalypticists; the reign invests the present. The parable gives word to the hidden presence of a God whose surprising initiatives upset the everyday order (Lk 15:11–32 and Mt 20, 1–16).

There is a correspondence between the parables and the activity of Jesus, which can be seen in their biographical dimension. The meals Jesus shared with the sinners emerge in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15, 11–32) and the invitation to the banquet (Lk 14:15–24). His offer of forgiveness (Mk 2:5) appears in the story of the merciless debtor (Mt 18:23–35). His openness to marginal religions comes through in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10:30–37) and the one about the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18:9–14). The patron of the Workers in the Vineyard justifies his apparent disdain for the law (Lk 20:1–16). Thus the narrative material of the parables, fruit of the free imagination of Jesus, was also steeped in his life, encounters, and conflicts. It verbalizes his experiences and includes a clearly autobiographical dimension.

3. The Choice of Social Solidarity

The Gospels and the Talmud agree in noting the shocking liberty taken by Jesus in his associations. He espoused all social categories marginalized by Jewish society of the times, whether by social or political distrust or religious discrimination.

Jesus did not accept the ostracism of tax collectors for political reasons (Lk 19:1–10 and Mt 11:19) or the Samaritans for religious reasons (Lk 17:11–19). He chose children as the model of openness toward God (Mk 10:13–16). He refused the religious disqualification of women (woman*) by accepting them in his entourage (Lk 8:2–3). He allowed the ailing to approach and touch him and used his healing powers to reintegrate them into the holy people. He spoke out to country people, those people of the land (ham-ha-aretz) decried by the Pharisees because they could not respect the code of purity and pay the three tithes levied on every product.

The meal partaken with the reprobates and women of easy virtue was the most stinging sign of Jesus’ re-

