

VOLUME 1
A-F

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE
EDITOR

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

VOLUME 1

CHRISTIAN
THEOLOGY

VOLUME 1

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF

CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE
EDITOR

A - F

ROUTLEDGE
New York • London

Published in 2005 by Routledge
270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016

Published in Great Britain by Routledge
2 Park Square
Milton Park, Abingdon
Oxon, OX14 4RN

Originally published as Dictionnaire critique de théologie (Nouvelle Edition), edited by Jean-Yves Lacoste (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1999), ISBN 2-13-048825-0
©Presses Universitaires de France, 1998 and 1999

Published with the participation of the Ministère français chargé de la Culture—Centre National du Livre (French Ministry of Culture—National Book Center)

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilized in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dictionnaire critique de théologie. English.

Encyclopedia of Christian theology / Jean-Yves Lacoste, editor.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 1-57958-250-8 (set: alk. paper)—ISBN 1-57958-236-2 (v. 1: alk. paper)—ISBN 1-57958-239-7 (v. 2: alk. paper)—
ISBN 1-57958-332-6 (v. 3: alk. paper) 1. Theology—Encyclopedias. I. Lacoste, Jean-Yves. II. Title.

BR95.D5313 2004

230'.03—dc22

2004004150

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free paper.

Contents

| | |
|------------------------------|------|
| Foreword | vii |
| Introduction | ix |
| Alphabetical List of Entries | xiii |
| Abbreviations | xix |
| Entries A to Z | 1 |
| Contributors | 1751 |
| Index | 1757 |

Foreword

A reader about to venture into a thick reference work (especially one dealing with theology) has the right to ask for additional mercy from its editor: that is, that the editor specifies the aim and use of the work. A few glosses about the title will answer this request. First and foremost, this is an encyclopedia of theology, meaning, in a restrictive sense that is also a precise sense, the massive amount of discourse and doctrines that Christianity has assembled about God and its experience of God. There are other discourses on God, and theology was often the first to champion their rationality. By selecting one term to refer to one practice (historically circumscribed) of the logos and one call (historically circumscribed) in the name of God, we do not pretend to deny the existence or the rationality of other practices or calls—we are only offering to make use of theological to name the fruits of a kind of covenant between the Greek logos and the Christian restructuring of the Jewish experience. When the philosopher discusses God, it rarely appears that his interest is theological, in the fixed sense of the term. Because Judaism was able to tie in the richest things it had to say without pillaging the theoretical legacy of classical antiquity, it is also unlikely that theological needs to be applied to its doctrines. Likewise, because the Islamic Kalam itself follows some rather original structuration rules, it is inadequate to baptize it “Islamic theology,” unless one accepts a certain vagueness. As for the rigorous comparative study of all the discourses in which the signifier God (whether its intervention be that of name, concept, or other) appears, it is still in its infancy.

Second, this is an encyclopedia, by which we mean an academic tool serving knowledge. It is one thing to produce knowledge and another to transmit it. Thus, we will not expect from this collegiate effort, which the present foreword concludes, that it was a work of creation. In the organized disorder presided over by the alphabetical order of the entries, its ambition was modest: to provide readers with a starting point for the main theological objects. Events, doctrines, contributors, theories and metatheories, over five hundred objects are to be found within the pages of this encyclopedia. The reader who wants to browse through the pages following a question will always find stand-alone entries and the point about the question. The reader who prefers long explorations can rely on the navigational tools provided to learn, one entry after another, for example, about Biblical theology in general or about medieval theology or about Lutheran theology or more. For want of a consensus among scholars, which cannot be found anywhere, this work is expected to keep the promises inherent to its scientific genre: legibility, intellectual honesty, and historical precision.

Last, this intends to be a critical work, which doesn't bound its fate to some deconstructing temerity but rather emphasizes the native condition of any academic endeavor at the service of truth. The first task of critical reasoning is to criticize itself. Although it was critical of the objects it inherited from tradition, the reason of the Enlightenment was less critical of itself, its powers, duties, and agents. One demand remains, which we owe and of which we should not be afraid: we will expect from the “critical” history of the doctrines or from the “critical” presentation of the theological traditions that they wanted to identify their own objects so that they appear as they are, in all their diachronic or synchronic complexity, sometimes in all indecision. Theology concerns itself mostly with phenomena that never demand intellection without also demanding adhesion, and the historical work of discernment that the encyclopedia undertook will not deprive anybody of the necessity to forge a personal opinion. One never believes, however, without knowing slightly. If one wants to forge a straight opinion, then it is best to know critically rather than precritically.

The editor has one pleasant remaining task: that of giving thanks. Firstly, he wishes to thank the 250 contributors, from about one hundred institutions and representing about fifteen nationalities. They made this encyclopedia and accepted the many constraints imposed by such an exercise. All graciously complied with the editorial goal of global cohesiveness, and their good will allowed the work to be more than a collection of stand-alone entries. All used their own voice, however, and this allows the work to let its authors speak with the accents peculiar to their cultural and scientific traditions.

Secondly, the editor wishes to thank all colleagues and friends who, flying to the rescue at the last minute, helped fill gaps, update bibliographies, refine translations, and verify thousands of references. I thus burn the incense of my gratitude to Daniel Bourgeois, Rémi Brague, Michel Cagin, Olivier de Champris, Michel Corbin, Michel Gitton, Jérôme de Gramont, Yves-Jean Harder, Max Huot de Longchamp, Goulven Madec, Thaddée Matura, Cyrille Michon, Bruno Neveu, Jacqueline de Proyard, and Daniel de Reynal. The members of the editorial board know how dear their collaboration was to me as well as the pleasure I had working with them. It is fair that the reader should know about them, too. My thanks turn superlative for Marie-Béatrice Mesnet, who bore the final responsibility of the French manuscript, from disks to proofs, including the organization of the bibliographies, cross-references, and abbreviations: I fear to think what we would have published without her help. As for Jacqueline Champris, she allowed for this work to be published while its editor was alive, or that its editor would not die in the process: each reader will judge its merit.

Our first French edition owed its index to Georges Leblanc, and we kindly remember Edith Migo providing us with secretarial help early on. The logistical support from François de Vorges and Didier Le Riche greatly eased the work of the editorial board. Françoise Muckensturm and Renza Arrighi also provided their biblical knowledge. The published work bore the mark of their labors.

Some members of the editorial board and the like spent more time than others in compiling the second French edition: my hat off thus to Paul Beauchamp, Olivier Boulnois, Vincent Carraud, Irène Fernandez, Marie-Béatrice Mesnet, Oliver O'Donovan, and Françoise Vinel as well as to the knowledgeable and devoted editor of the encyclopedia. As with the first, the second edition also had many benefactors who wrote entries in a few days, suggested useful amendments, and published encouraging notices. I cannot name them all, but I do want to name Cyrille Michon, Hervé Barreau, Rémi Brague, Claude Bressolette, Yves Delorme, Henri de L'Épervier, Bernard de Guibert, Dominique Le Tourneau, Roger Pouivet, Émile Poulat, Michel Sales, Yves Tourenne, and Claude Villemot. The first French edition was honored by the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, which awarded it the Chanoine Delpuech Prize. As for Tabatha, finally, she knows what we owe her: a lot.

Jean-Yves Lacoste

Introduction

The Dictionnaire critique de théologie was first published in French in 1998. When in 1999 work began on an anglophone presentation, the U.S. publishers had at their disposal the French additions and modifications to the original text undertaken with a view to its second edition. The present work is a translation of the second edition of the French original.

Users of the Encyclopedia of Christian Theology, whether chiefly interested in consulting it for specific information or in browsing more widely, may well wish to begin with the index. The French editorial committee and the editorial director have achieved the not inconsiderable feat of containing very nearly all the material falling within the ambit of a critical work of theology, as those terms are defined in the foreword, within some five hundred entries.

Theology remains the rationally structured discussion of the Christianized experience of Hebrew monotheism, as it was originally elaborated with the help of Greek philosophical categories and considerations familiar to the early Christian Greek-speaking world and subsequently developed during two millennia of Christian thought.

This has meant paying little more than passing attention to other important aspects of Christian life as it developed. Its liturgies, its widely diverging spiritualities, its administrative hierarchy, and its noncore teaching even about important moral and social issues occurring in response to the often political constraints that arose in the course of history are not central to its theology as here understood. Attention is concentrated on such matters as Trinitarian theology, Christology, the Incarnation, the Redemption, revelation, ecclesiology, and the understanding of the workings of the divine plan for humanity. The definition also excludes formal consideration of eastern religions and even of Islam, immensely powerful in its own right and also the vehicle for carrying the thought of Aristotle, heavily contaminated by Neoplatonism, to the Christian scholastic theologians of the High Middle Ages.

Philosophy itself, as an intellectual discipline, does not fall within the ambit of the reference function of the Encyclopedia, but its exclusion poses more difficult problems. As the editor of the French original, Jean-Yves Lacoste, points out in his own entry on philosophy, it is still possible in the twentieth century with Barth or Heidegger to conduct philosophical discussion without reference to any theological position. In fact, however, the possibility of the autonomous conduct of philosophical investigation, although it is not discussed in the Encyclopedia, looks today increasingly fragile.

Christian theology as a discipline, particularly on account of the Greco-Roman legacy still woven into it, is much more difficult to insulate from its philosophical substructure. In many of its entries, the Encyclopedia, having expounded the theology with which they are concerned, concludes them with philosophical considerations. Philosophically speaking, Christian theology has for centuries relied on a philosophia perennis, drawing its categories and premises largely from Aristotelian and Platonist traditions.

Certain aspects of that traditional substructure, notably its anthropology, its epistemology, and its ontology, are no longer generally considered useful and at least in non-English-speaking Europe have been replaced by a newer tradition. In the Encyclopedia, no attempt has been made to diminish the reliance on philosophical reflections developed from the mainstream European, mostly German-language tradition as it has emerged from Kant and the German idealists and subsequently been developed by Hegel, Husserl, and Heidegger, and from more recent variations of an essentially phenomenological approach to the subject such as appear also in the work of some modern theologians like Karl Rahner.

The content of the work, as indicated in the foreword, is laid out alphabetically, and anglophone readers will have no difficulty finding the keyword for many of the most important themes, events, people, and topics discussed. There is an elaborate system of cross-referencing, but, as the relative length of the entries and the bibliographies makes clear, a format of relatively long entries and essays, still within the scope of what is known as a dictionnaire in French, has been chosen rather than that of a high number of short entries generally denoted by the word dictionary in English.

Some of the new entries, like that for Moses, fill lacunae in the original text, and very few important topics will be found to have been altogether neglected, although to locate the several treatments of such themes as transsubstantiation or of theologians as important as Melancthon, it is necessary to refer first to the index. It is even possible that certain readers will feel that occasionally, like the original eighteenth-century French Encyclopédie, this Encyclopedia advances views or developments that it purports merely to transmit or that it gives an acceptably ecumenical doctrinal spin to the historical record by omitting to dwell on or even to note some of the harsher reactions perceivable in the decrees of the council of Trent or of Vatican I or in the decisions of the Pontifical Biblical Commission. Theologians of the last fifty years are not unreasonably accorded a prominence that implies a value judgment about their work, which is inevitably less certain to endure than judgments made about theologians from centuries earlier than the twentieth whose historical contribution to the development of today's theology cannot be challenged.

It will not be difficult for users to identify the corporate viewpoint of the editorial committee of the Encyclopedia. It is, however, as the third paragraph of the foreword makes clear, important to preserve the work's intellectual integrity. That means identifying and acknowledging what its point of view is, especially on account of the probability that here and there the more speculative essays may seem to be urging Catholic theology to develop in a particular direction and the further probability that any such direction will be one with which the original French readership may feel more at ease than theologians brought up in some of the traditions at present current in different degrees in the various anglophone regions of the globe.

The university level that determines the amount and type of information contained in the Encyclopedia requires its content to be not only historically accurate, deep enough for university-level reflection, and well enough written to be readily intelligible but also useful in a university context, that is, one in which reasonably ample library resources are available. Users wishing to follow up references to patristic works, the scholastics, or modern books and articles will often require the bibliographic resources normally found only in theological colleges or in large, general academic institutions.

Because the Encyclopedia is intended also to serve outside a formal university context as an initial guide to the state of theological discussion on all major topics covered by its definition of theology, the references to reviews, editions, and relatively small-circulation journals are included simply for the convenience of those who wish to pursue further research. Further investigation into most of the topics covered is likely to require access to good editions of the Fathers of the Church and, where there are any, of the scholastics, as well as to more recent theologians from the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The entries are written with a view to being easily intelligible even where there is no immediate access to the cited sources.

Some topics, like the Dead Sea Scrolls, have primarily been discussed only in languages other than English and chiefly in specialist journals. In such instances, the Encyclopedia attempts primarily to do service as a handbook or guide to the present state of discussion, giving only pointers in its references to places or sources where the discussion has been further developed or on which advocates of different views have relied. In all cases, and in spite of its inevitable point of view, the Encyclopedia attempts an objective exposition of the facts and arguments, without bias, prejudice, or any viewpoint that could be interpreted as sectarian.

The Encyclopedia does not aspire to be historical in that it does not undertake to cover the history of the theology of the topics that it includes except incidentally, in order to explain and contextualize them, and except insofar as the sources for contemporary theological views are necessarily grounded in the historic sources of the Christian revelation. The method adopted is, however, critical. At every point it goes out of its way to confront doctrines and views with the sources and traditions on which they rely, and it is relentless in its pursuit of theological truth as warranted by the sources and the historical facts. This criticism is not destructive of anything but falsehood, although when applied as rigorously as it is here to the legitimacy of some of the emphases of medieval theology, it produces results that are likely to surprise many brought up on a precritical tradition. The critical account of the tradition reveals, for instance, that the notion of an individual judgment at the moment of death appeared only relatively late in eastern theology and shows that the virginity of Mary has a less strong scriptural basis than is often assumed.

Without a doubt, the critical expertise of the theologians on whom the editorial committee has drawn for the entries is where this work's serious theological interest primarily lies. Whatever services may be rendered by the utility of its reference function, the most significant achievement of the entries in the work consists overwhelmingly in the critical acumen applied by its authors to their subject matter, invariably through a rigorous treatment of the sources and tradition underlying the historical and contemporary theological discussion of all theology's major issues. To this critical treatment of the tradition is often appended a more speculative section, as in the entry on being, pointing to tasks remaining to be accomplished and to directions in which theological discussion appears to be moving.

The critical method used is essentially based on a balanced appraisal of the theological sources that time, tradition, and individual religious spiritualities, such as those developed within the great religious orders or outside them by popular devotion, have inevitably tended to obscure. By confronting patterns of Christian religious belief and behavior with the sources of the Christian revelation and with the major developments in theological tradition, the Encyclopedia no doubt implicitly calls for a reevaluation of some views and attitudes that may at different periods have been too uncritically, and perhaps wrongly, assumed to have been dictated by fundamental theological dogma. The critical function of the Encyclopedia lies not in criticizing them but in confronting them with a more authentic understanding of the Christian revelation, leaving it to individuals to mold the moral and religious commitments that best both fulfil their own spiritual needs and accord with the revelation. Insofar as the Encyclopedia fulfils the task it has taken on itself, it must promote a pluralism of religious attitudes, both moral and devotional, capable of fulfilling the individual hunger for spiritual nourishment on the basis of a critical understanding of genuine theological truth.

It is difficult to think of any earlier attempt to produce a comprehensive critical theological handbook in the sense in which the Encyclopedia defines theology. There are no doubt historical reasons why this should be so, and the appearance of the Encyclopedia marks an important stage in the diminution of sectarian slants on theological discussion as well as a hope that a point has been reached when all those whose experience is enhanced by a spirituality situated within the Judeo-Christian religious tradition can look forward to agreeing on the theology that lies at its center. The Encyclopedia, in giving, however succinctly, a fully critical account of that tradition, is a product of progress already made as well as a pointer to what questions still urgently await their resolution and an indicator of the most promising paths to be followed. It summarizes the present state of theological discussion without dwelling on what has recently been achieved or laying down firm paths for the future. It may well constitute a milestone in the progress toward a truly critical theology and therefore also toward promoting a religious awareness and providing the basis for an intelligently reflective religious commitment without laying down new orthodoxies. Its task is to present the critical summary of Judeo-Christian theology necessary to further the personal and corporate attitudes of those who seek to live by the norms it promotes.

Anthony Levi

Alphabetical List of Entries

Volume 1

- Abelard, Peter
Abortion Action
Adam Adoptionism
Agape
Agnosticism
Albert the Great
Alexandria, School of Alphonsus Liguori
Ambrose of Milan
Anabaptists
Analogy
Angels
Anglicanism
Anhypostasy
Animals
Anointing of the Sick
Anselm of Canterbury
Anthropology
Anthropomorphism
Antinomianism
Antinomy
Antioch, School of Apocalyptic Literature
Apocatastasis
Apocrypha
Apollinarianism
Apologists
Apostle
Apostolic Fathers
Apostolic Succession
Appropriation Architecture
Arianism
Aristotelianism, Christian
Arminianism
Asceticism
Aseitas
Athanasius of Alexandria
Atheism
Attributes, Divine
Augustine of Hippo
Augustinianism
Authority
Balthasar, Hans Urs von
Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism
Baptism
Baptists
Barth, Karl
Basel-Ferrara-Florence, Council of Basil (The Great) of Caesarea
Beatitude
Beauty
Beguines
Being Bellarmine, Robert
Bernard of Clairvaux
Bérulle, Pierre de
Bible
Biblical Theology
Bishop
Blessing
Blondel, Maurice
Boethius
Bonaventure
Bonhoeffer, Dietrich
Book
Bucer, Martin
Bultmann, Rudolf
Calvin, John
Calvinism
Canon Law
Canon of Scriptures
Carmel
Casuistry
Catechesis
Catharism
Catholicism
Chalcedon, Council of

Alphabetical List of Entries

Character
Charisma
Chartres, School of Childhood, Spiritual
Choice
Christ/Christology
Christ's Consciousness
Chrysostom, John Church
Church and State
Circumincision
City
Cleric
Collegiality
Communion
Conciliarism
Confirmation
Congregationalism
Conscience
Constance, Council of Constantinople I, Council of Constantinople II, Council of Constantinople III, Council of Constantinople IV, Council of Consubstantial
Consubstantiation
Contemplation Conversion
Cosmos
Council
Couple Covenant
Creation Credibility
Creeds
Crusades Cult
Cult of Saints
Cyprian of Carthage
Cyril of Alexandria

Dante
Deacon Deaconesses Death
Decalogue
Deism and Theism Deity Democracy Demons
Descartes, René Descent into Hell
Devotio moderna
Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite Diphysitism

Docetism
Doctor of the Church Dogma
Dogmatic Theology
Donatism
Duns Scotus, John

Ecclesiastical Discipline Ecclesiology Ecology
Ecumenism
Edwards, Jonathan Enlightenment
Ephesus, Council of Epiclesis
Epieikeia
Erasmus, Desiderius
Erastianism
Eschatology
Eternity of God Ethics
Ethics, Autonomy of Ethics, Medical Ethics, Sexual Eucharist Evil Evolution
Exegesis Existence of God, Proofs of Exorcism Experience
Expiation

Faith Family
Family, Confessional Father
Fathers of the Church
Fear of God
Febronianism
Fideism
Filiation
Filioque Flesh
Freedom, Religious Freud, Sigmund Fundamental Choice Fundamental Theology
Fundamentalism

Volume 2

Gallicanism Glory of God
Gnosis

| | |
|------------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| God | Jansenism |
| Good | Jealousy, Divine |
| Gospels | Jerusalem |
| Government, Church | Jesus, Historical |
| Grace | Joachim of Fiore |
| Gratian (Francisco Gratiaziano) | Johannine Theology |
| Gregory of Nazianzus | John of the Cross |
| Gregory of Nyssa | Judaism |
| Gregory Palamas | Judeo-Christianity |
| Gregory the Great | Judgment | | | Jurisdiction |
| Hardening | Justice |
| Healing | Justice, Divine |
| Heart of Christ | Justification |
| Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich | |
| Hegelianism | Kant, Immanuel |
| Heidegger, Martin | Kenosis |
| Hell | Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye |
| Hellenization of Christianity | Kingdom of God |
| Heresy | Knowledge of God |
| Hermeneutics | Knowledge, Divine |
| Hesychasm | |
| Hierarchy | Lamb of God/Paschal Lamb |
| Hilary of Poitiers | Language, Theological | | History | Lateran I, Council |
| History of the Church | Lateran II, Council |
| Holiness | Lateran III, Council |
| Holy Oils | Lateran IV, Council |
| Holy Scripture | Lateran V, Council |
| Holy Spirit | Law and Christianity |
| Hope | Law and Legislation |
| Humanism, Christian | Lay/Laity |
| Hus, Jan | Laying on of Hands |
| Hypostatic Union | Legitimate Defense |
| | Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhem |
| Idioms, Communication of | Liberalism |
| Idolatry | Liberation Theology |
| Images | Liberty |
| Imitation of Christ | Life, Eternal |
| Immutability/Impassibility, Divine | Life, Spiritual |
| Incarnation | Limbo |
| Inculturation | Literary Genres in Scripture |
| Indefectibility of the Church | Literature |
| Indulgences | Liturgical Year |
| Inerrancy | Liturgy |
| Infallibility | Local Church |
| Infinite | Loci Theologici |
| Initiation, Christian | Lonergan, Bernard John Francis |
| Integrism | Love |
| Intellectualism | Lubac, Henri Sonier de |
| Intention | Luther, Martin |
| Intercommunion | Lutheranism |
| Intertestament | Lyons I, Council of | | Irenaeus of Lyons | Lyons II, Council of | | Israel | Magisterium |

Alphabetical List of Entries

Manicheanism
Manning, Henry Edward Marcionism
Market Economics, Morality of Marriage
Martyrdom
Marx, Karl Mary Mass, Sacrifice of the Mathematics and Theology
Maximus the Confessor
Mendicant Religious Orders Mercy
Messalianism
Messianism/Messiah
Methodism
Millenarianism Ministry Miracle
Mission/Evangelization
Modalism Modernism Monasticism
Monogenesis/Polygenesis
Monophysitism
Monotheism
Monothelitism/Monoenergism
Montanism
Moses Music Mystery
Mysticism
Myth

Name Narrative
Narrative Theology Nationalism Natural Theology
Naturalism Nature Negative Theology
Neoplatonism
Nestorianism
Newman, John Henry Nicaea I, Council of Nicaea II, Council of Nicholas of Cusa
Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhem
Nominalism
Notes, Theological Nothingness
Novatianism

Obligation
Omnipotence, Divine
Omnipresence, Divine
Ontologism
Orders, Minor
Ordination/Order
Origen
Orthodoxy
Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary

Volume 3

Paganism
Pagans
Pantheism Parable Parousia
Pascal, Blaise Passion Passions Passover Pastor
Patriarchate
Pauline Theology
Peace
Pelagianism Penance Pentecostalism
People of God Person
Peter Philosophy
Pietism Pilgrimage
Platonism, Christian Political Theology
Pope Positive Theology Postmodernism
Praise
Prayer
Preaching
Precepts Predestination
Presbyter/Priest Priesthood Process Theology
Procreation
Proexistence Promise Property
Prophet and Prophecy
Proportionalism

| | |
|---|------------------------------------|
| Protestantism | Simplicity, Divine |
| Protocatholicism | Sin |
| Providence | Sin, Original |
| Prudence | Situation Ethics |
| Psalms | Skepticism, Christian |
| Punishment | Society |
| Purgatory | Solidarity |
| Puritanism | Solovyov, Vladimir |
| Purity/Impurity | Son of Man |
| | Sophiology |
| Quietism | Soul-Heart-Body | | | Sovereignty |
| Race | Spiritual Combat |
| Rahner, Karl | Spiritual Direction |
| Rationalism | Spiritual Theology |
| Realism | Spirituality, Franciscan | | Reason | Spirituality, Ignatian |
| Reception | Spirituality, Salesian |
| Regional Church | Stoicism, Christian |
| Relativism | Structures, Ecclesial |
| Relics | Suarez, Francisco |
| Religion, Philosophy of | Subordinationism |
| Religions, Theology of | Substance |
| Religious Life | Sunday |
| Renaissance | Supernatural |
| Resurrection of Christ | Synergy |
| Resurrection of the Dead | Synod |
| Revelation | |
| Revelations, Individual | Temple |
| Revolution | Temptation |
| Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism | Tertullian |
| Rites, Chinese | Theological Schools |
| Rome | Theologumen |
| | Theology |
| Sabbath | Theophany |
| Sacrament | Theosophy |
| Sacrifice | Thomas à Kempis |
| SaintVictor, School of | Thomas Aquinas |
| Salvation | Thomism |
| Scandal/Skandalon | Tillich, Paul |
| Scapegoat | Time |
| Scheeben, Matthias Joseph | Trace (Vestige) |
| Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von | Tradition |
| Schism | Traditionalism |
| Schleiermacher, Daniel Friedrich Ernst | Traducianism |
| Scholasticism | Translations of the Bible, Ancient | | Sciences of Nature | Trent, Council of | | Scripture, Fulfillment of | Trinity |
| Scripture, Senses of | Tritheism |
| Secularization | Truth |
| Sensus Fidei | Truths, Hierarchy of | | Servant of YHWH | Tübingen, Schools of | | Sheol | |

Alphabetical List of Entries

Ultramontanism
Unitarianism/Anti-Trinitarianism
Unity of the Church
Universalism Universities
Utilitarianism

Validity
Vatican I, Council of Vatican II, Council of Vengeance of God
Veracity Vienne, Council of Violence Virtues
Vision, Beatific
Voluntarism

Waldensians War Wholly Other Wisdom
Wittgenstein, Ludwig Josef Johann Woman Word Word of God
Work Works World
World Council of Churches Wrath of God

Zoroaster
Zwingli, Huldrych

Abbreviations

A. Usual Abbreviations

| | | | |
|--------------|---|-----------|---|
| a. | articulus | gr. | Greek |
| ACFEB | Association catholique française pour l'étude de la Bible | GS | Gesammelte Schriften |
| adv. | adversus | GW | Gesammelte Werke |
| anath. | anathema | hb, hebr. | Hebrew |
| anon. | anonymous | hom. | homily |
| Apos. Const. | Apostolic Constitution | l. | liber |
| ap. | apud (according to) | lat. | latin |
| ARCIC | Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission | lect. | lectio |
| arg. | argumentum | MA | Middle Ages |
| art. | article | ms. | manuscript |
| BHK | Biblia Hebraica, ed. Kittel | mss | manuscripts |
| BHS | Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia | n. | note/ numerus |
| bibl. | includes a bibliography | NT | New Testament |
| c. | circa | O.P. | Order of Preachers (Dominicans) |
| CADIR | Centre pour l'analyse du discours religieux, Lyon | O.S.B. | Order of Saint Benedict (Benedictines) |
| can. | canon | OC | Œuvres complètes; Complete Works |
| CEPOA | Centre d'étude du Proche-Orient ancien, Louvain | Op. | Opera (Works) |
| ch(ap). | chapter | OT | Old Testament |
| COE | Conseil œcuménique des Églises (see WWC) | par. | parallel passages (in synoptic gospels) |
| col. | column | Ps.- | Pseudo- |
| coll. | collection | q. | quaestio |
| comm. | Commentum , commentary | qla | quaestiuncula |
| concl. | conclusio | quod. | quodlibet |
| d. | distinctio | quod sic | videtur quod sic |
| Decr. | Decretal | resp. | responsio, solutio |
| diss. | dissertatio | sess. | session |
| dub. | dubium | SIDC | Société internationale de droit canonique |
| ed. | edidit, editio | S.J. | Societatis Jesu (Jesuits) |
| ed. | editor | Sq | sequen(te)s , and following |
| ep. | epistula(e), letters | SW | Sämtliche Werke |
| f | next verse (biblical citations) | syr. | syriac |
| ff | two following verses (biblical citations) | tract. | tractatus |
| FS | Festschrift | v. | verse |
| GA | Gesamtausgabe | Vulg. | Vulgate, Latin version latine of the Bible, by Jerome |
| | | vv. | verses |
| | | WWC | World Council of Churches |
| | | WW | Werke |
| | | Ia Iiae | Thomas Aquina, Summa Theologiae, |

Abbreviations

| | |
|----------|---|
| | prima secundae , first part of the second part |
| Ila Iiae | Ibid. , secunda secundae , second part of the second part |
| LXX | Septuagint, Greek version of the Hebrew Bible |

B. Biblical Texts

The Hebrew and Greek transcription of biblical texts come from the Concordance de la Traduction œcuménique de la Bible.

Biblical References

Colon(:) between chapter and verse. For example, Dt 24:17 refers to Deuteronomy, chapter 24:verse 17.

Hyphen: indicates the verses. For example, Dt 24:17–22 (from v. 17 to 22).

The letter f next to a verse refers to this verse and the following one. For example, Dt 24:17f (chapter 24:verses 17 and 18).

The letters ff refers to the verse and the following two. For example, Dt 24:17ff (chapter 24:verses 17, 18, and 19).

| | |
|-------|----------------------|
| Acts | Acts of the Apostles |
| Am | Amos |
| Bar | Baruch |
| 1 Chr | 1 Chronicles |
| 2 Chr | 2 Chronicles |
| Col | Colossians |
| 1 Cor | 1 Corinthians |
| 2 Cor | 2 Corinthians |
| Dn | Daniel |
| Dt | Deuteronomy |
| Eccl | Ecclesiastes |
| Eph | Ephesians |
| Est | Esther |
| Ex | Exodus |
| Ez | Ezekiel |
| Ezr | Ezra |
| Gal | Galatians |
| Gn | Genesis |
| Hb | Habakkuk |
| Heb | Hebrews |
| Hg | Haggai |
| Hos | Hosea |
| Is | Isaiah |
| Jas | James |
| Jb | Job |
| Jdt | Judith |
| Jer | Jeremiah |
| Jgs | Judges |

| | |
|--------|-----------------|
| Jl | Joel |
| Jn | John |
| Jon | Jonah |
| Jos | Joshua |
| 1 Jn | 1 John |
| 2 Jn | 2 John |
| 3 Jn | 3 John |
| Jude | Jude |
| 1 Kgs | 1 Kings |
| 2 Kgs | 2 Kings |
| Lam | Lamentations |
| Lk | Luke |
| Lv | Leviticus |
| 1 Macc | 1 Maccabees |
| 2 Macc | 2 Maccabees |
| Mal | Malachi |
| Mi | Micah |
| Mk | Mark |
| Mt | Matthew |
| Na | Nahum |
| Neh | Nehemiah |
| Nm | Numbers |
| Ob | Obadiah |
| Phil | Philippians |
| Phlm | Philemon |
| Prv | Proverbs |
| Ps | Psalms |
| 1 Pt | 1 Peter |
| 2 Pt | 2 Peter |
| Rev | Revelation |
| Rom | Romans |
| Ru | Ruth |
| Sg | Song of Songs |
| Sir | Sirach |
| 1 Sm | 1 Samuel |
| 2 Sm | 2 Samuel |
| Tb | Tobit |
| 1 Thes | 1 Thessalonians |
| 2 Thes | 2 Thessalonians |
| Ti | Titus |
| 1 Tm | 1 Timothy |
| 2 Tm | 2 Timothy |
| Wis | Wisdom |
| Zep | Zephaniah |

C. Writings from Ancient Judaism

a) Qumran Writings

| | |
|-------|----------------------------------|
| 11QT | The Temple Scroll |
| 1QH | Hodayot, Hymns |
| 1Qisa | Great Isaiah Scroll (Is 1–66) |
| 1Qisb | Qumran Scroll of Isaiah |
| 1QM | Serekh ha-Milhamah, The War Rule |

| | |
|--------------|--|
| 1QpHab | Pesher on Habakkuk (Commentary) |
| 1QS | Serek ha-Yachad, the Rule of the Community |
| 1Qsa | The Rule of the Congregation |
| 4QapMess | Messianic Apocrypha (= 4Q521) |
| 4QDeutero-Ez | Deutero-Ezekiel (= 4Q385) |
| 4Qenastr | Astronomical fragment from the Book of Enoch |
| 4Qflor | Pesharim, 4Qflorilegium (= 4Q174) |
| 4QMMT | Miqsat ma'ase ha-torah (= 4Q394–399) |
| 4Qps-Danc | Pseudo-Daniel, ms c (= 4Q245) |
| 4QtestQah | Testament of Qahat |
| 4QtgJob | Targum de Job |
| 4QviscAmrf | Visions of Amram |
| CD | Cairo Damascus Document |

(The numeral preceding the letter “Q” indicates the Grotto number)

b) Other Writings

| | |
|-------------|--|
| Ant | Antiquitates judaicae (Flavius Josephus) |
| Ap | Contra Apionem (Id.) |
| 2 Ba | Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch |
| Bell | De bello judaico (Flavius Josephus) |
| 3 Esd/4 Esd | 3rd/4th book of Esdras |
| Hen | Henoch |
| Lib Ant | Biblical Antiquities (Pseudo-Philo) |
| Or Sib | Sibylline Oracles |
| Ps Sal | Psalm of Solomon |
| T | Targum |
| TB | Talmud of Babylon |
| TJ | Talmud of Jerusalem |
| Test | Testament |
| Test XII | Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs |
| Test Zab | Testament of Zebulon |
| Vita | Vita Josephi (Flavius Josephus) |

D. Documents from the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council

| | |
|----|--|
| AA | Apostolicam Actuositatem , decree on the apostolate of the laity, November 18, 1965 |
| AG | Ad Gentes , decree on the mission activity of the Church, December 7, 1965 |
| CD | Christus Dominus , decree concerning the pastoral office of bishops in the Church, October 28, 1965 |
| DH | Dignitatis Humanae , declaration on religious freedom, December 7, 1965 |
| DV | Dei Verbum , dogmatic constitution on divine revelation, November 18, 1965 |
| GE | Gravissimum Educationis , declaration on Christian education, October 28, 1965 |

| | |
|----|---|
| GS | Gaudium et Spes , pastoral constitution on the Church in the modern world, December 7, 1965 |
| IM | Inter Mirifica , decree on the media of social communication, December 4, 1963 |
| LG | Lumen Gentium , dogmatic constitution on the Church, November 21, 1964 |
| NA | Nostra Aetate , declaration on the relation of the Church to non-Christian religions, October 28, 1965 |
| OE | Orientalium Ecclesiarum , decree on the Catholic Churches of the Eastern rite, November 21, 1964 |
| OT | Optatam Totius , decree on priestly training, October 28, 1965 |
| PC | Perfectae Caritatis , decree on the adaptation and renewal of religious life, October 28, 1965 |
| PO | Presbyterorum Ordinis , decree on the ministry and life of priests, December 7, 1965 |
| SC | Sacrosanctum Concilium , constitution on the sacred liturgy, December 4, 1963 |
| UR | Unitatis Redintegratio , decree on ecumenism, November 21, 1964 |

E. Editions, Collections, and Classic Works

The journal and collections abbreviations are from Abkürzungsverzeichnis from the TRE (rev. ed. 1994).

| | |
|-----------|--|
| AA | Kant, Akademie Ausgabe |
| AAS | Acta apostolicae sedis, Vatican City , 1909 (ASS , 1865–1908) |
| AAWLM | Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften und der Literatur in Mainz, Mainz |
| AAWLM.G | —Geistes- und Sozialwissenschaftliche Klasse, 1950– |
| ABAW | Abhandlungen der (k.) bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Munich |
| ABAW. PH | —Philosophisch-historische Abteilung, NS, 1929– |
| ABAW. PPH | —Philosophisch-philologische und historische Klasse, 1909–1928 |
| ABC | Archivum bibliographicum carmelitanum, Rome, 1956–1982 |
| ABG | Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte , Bonn, 1955– |
| ACan | L'Année canonique , Paris, 1952– |
| ACar | Analecta Cartusiana, Berlin, etc., 1970–1988; NS, 1989– |
| ACHS | American Church History Series, New York, 1893–1897 |
| Aci | Analecta Cisterciensa , Rome, 1965– |

Abbreviations

| | | | |
|-------------------|--|---------------|---|
| ACO | Acta conciliorum œcumenicorum , Berlin, 1914– | ASCOV | Acta synodalia sacrosancti Concilii Œcumenici Vaticani II , Vatican City, 1970–1983 |
| Adv. Haer. | Irenaeus, Adversus Haereses (Against Heresies) | ASEs | Annali di storia dell' esegesi , Bologna, 1984– |
| AF | Archivio di filosofia , Rome, 1931– | ASI | Archivio storico italiano , Florence, 1852– |
| AFH | Archivum Franciscanum historicum , Florence, 1908– | ASOC | Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis , Rome, 1945–1964 (= ACi , 1965–) |
| AFP | Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum , Rome, 1930– | ASS | Acta sanctae sedis , Rome, 1865–1908 |
| AGJU | Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums, Leiden, 8, 1970–15, 1978 | ASSR | Archives de sciences sociales des religions , Paris, 1973– |
| AGPh | Archiv für Geschichte der Philosophie und Soziologie , Berlin, 1888– | A-T | Descartes, Œuvres (Works), eds. C. Adam and P. Tannery |
| AHC | Annarium historiae conciliorum , Amsterdam, etc., 1969– | ATA | Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen, Munich, 1908–1940 |
| AHDL | Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du Moyen Age , Paris, 1926/1927– | Ath | L'année théologique , Paris, 1940–1951 |
| AHP | Archivum historiae pontificiae , Rome, 1963– | AthA | Année théologique augustinienne , Paris, 1951–1954 (= REAug , 1955–) |
| AISP | Archivio italiano per la storia della pietà , Rome, 1951– | ATHANT | Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments, Zurich, 1944– |
| AkuG | Archiv für Kulturgeschichte , Berlin, 1903– | Aug. | Augustinianum , Rome, 1961– |
| ALKGMA | Archiv für Literatur- und Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters, Berlin, etc., 1885–1900 | Aug(L) | Augustiniana , Louvain, 1951– |
| Aloi. | Aloisiana, Naples, 1960– | AUGL | Augustinus-Lexicon , edited by C. Mayer, Basel, etc., 1986– |
| ALW | Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft , Ratisbonne, 1950– | AugM | Augustinus Magister ; Année théologique. Supplement, 3 vols., Paris: Études augustinienes, 1954–1955 |
| AmA | American Anthropologist , Menasha, Wis., 1888–1898; NS, 1899– | BAug | Bibliothèque augustinienne, Paris, 1936– |
| AnBib | Analecta biblica, Rome, 1952– | BBB | Bonner biblische Beiträge, Bonn, 1950– |
| AncBD | Anchor Bible Dictionary , New York: Doubleday, 1992 | BBKL | Biographisch-bibliographisches Kirchenlexicon, edited by F. W. Bautz, Hamm, 1970– |
| AnCl | Antiquité classique , Bruxelles, 1932– | BCG | Buchreihe der Cusanus-Gesellschaft, Münster, 1964– |
| Ang. | Angelicum , Rome, 1925– | BCNH | Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi, Quebec. |
| AnGr | Analecta Gregoriana, Rome, 1930– | BCPE | Bulletin du Centre protestant d'études , Geneva, 1949– |
| ANRW | Aufstieg und Niedergang des römischen Welt , Berlin, 1972– | BEAT | Beiträge zur Erforschung des Alten Testaments und des antiken Judentums, Frankfurt, 1984– |
| Anton. | Antonianum , Rome, 1926– | BEL.S | Bibliotheca (Ephemerides Liturgicae), Subsidia, Rome 1975– |
| AphC | Annales de philosophie chrétienne , Paris, 1830–1913 | BEM | COE, Foi et Constitution, Baptême, eucharistie, ministère. Convergence de la foi (Lima, January 1982), Paris, 1982 |
| Apol. | Luther, Apologia confessionis Augustanae (Apology of the Augsburg Confession) | | |
| Aquinas | Aquinas. Revista internazionale de filosofia , Rome, 1958– | | |
| ARMo | L'actualité religieuse dans le monde , Paris, 1983– | | |
| ArPh | Archives de philosophie , Paris, 1923– | | |
| AsbTJ | The Asbury Theological Journal , Wilmore, Ky, 1986– | | |

| | | | |
|--------|---|--------|---|
| BETHL | Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologiarum Lovaniensium, Louvain, 1947– | BSFP | Bulletin de la Société française de philosophie , Paris, 1901– |
| BevTh | Beiträge zur evangelischen Theologie, Munich, 1940– | BSGR | Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln der Alten Kirche , edited by A. and C.L. Hahn, Breslau, 1842; reprinted 1962, Hildesheim |
| BGLRK | Beiträge zur Geschichte und Lehre der reformierten Kirche, Neukirchen, 1937– | BSHPF | Bulletin de la Société d'histoire du protestantisme français . Paris, 1852– |
| BGPhMA | Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie (1928) und Theologie des Mittelalters, Münster, 1891– | BSKORK | Bekennnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der nach Gottes Wort reformierten Kirche , edited by W. Niesel, Zollikon, etc., 1937–1938; 2nd ed., 1938 (etc.) (CCFR, Geneva, 1986) |
| BHK | Biblia Hebraica, ed. R. Kittel. Stuttgart, 1905/1906; 16th ed., 1973 | BSLK | Bekennnisschriften der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche , Göttingen, 1930; 10th ed., 1986; 11th ed., 1992 (FEL, Paris-Geneva, 1991) |
| BHS | Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, Stuttgart, 1969–1975; 2nd ed., 1984 | BSS | Bulletin de Saint-Sulpice . Revue internationale de la Compagnie des prêtres de Saint-Sulpice, Paris, 1975– |
| BHSA | Bulletin historique et scientifique de l'Auvergne . Clermont-Ferrand, 1881– | BSSV | Bollettino della Società di studi Valdesi , Torre Pellice, 1934– |
| BHTh | Beiträge zur historischen Theologie, Tübingen, 1929– | BSt | Biblische Studien. Neukirchen, 1951– |
| Bib | Biblica . Commentarii periodici ad rem biblicam scientificè investigandam, Rome, 1920– | BT.B | Bibliothèque de théologie. 3rd ser. Théologie biblique, Paris, 1954– |
| BICP | Bulletin de l'Institut catholique de Paris , Paris, 2nd ser., 1910– | BTB | Biblical Theology Bulletin , New York, 1971– |
| Bidi | Bibliotheca dissidentium, Baden-Baden, 1980– | BTB(F) | —French ed. |
| BIHBR | Bulletin de l'Institut historique belge de Rome , Rome, etc., 1919– | BThom | Bulletin thomiste , Étiolles, etc., 1924–1965 |
| Bijdr | Bijdragen . Tijdschrift voor filosofie en theologie, Nimègue, etc., 1953– | BThW | Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch , Graz, etc., 1–2, 19673 (Eng. Ed. EBT) |
| BIRHT | Bulletin de l'Institut de recherche et d'histoire des textes , Paris, 1964–1968 (= RHT, 1971–) | BTT | Bible de tous les temps, Paris, 8 vol., 1984–1989 |
| BJ | La Bible de Jérusalem (Jerusalem Bible) | BullFr | Bullarium Franciscanum , Rome, etc., 1929–1949 |
| BJRL | Bulletin of the John Rylands Library , Manchester, 1903– | BWANT | Beiträge zum Wissenschaft vom Alten und Neuen Testament, Stuttgart, 1926 (= BWAT, 1908–1926) |
| BLE | Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique , Toulouse, 1899– | BWAT | Beiträge zum Wissenschaft vom Alten Testament , Stuttgart, 1908–1926 |
| BN | Catalogue général des livres imprimés de la bibliothèque nationale, Paris, 1897 (General catalog of printed works from the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris) | Byz | Byzantion , Bruxelles, 1924– |
| BN | Biblische Notizen . Beiträge zur exegetischen Diskussion, Bamberg, 1976– | BZ | Biblische Zeitschrift , Paderborn, etc., 1903–1938; NF 1957– |
| BPhM | Bulletin de philosophie médiévale , Louvain, 1964– | BZAW | Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, Berlin, 1896– |
| Br | Pascal, Blaise. Pensées . Brunschvig. | BZNW | Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft, Berlin, etc., 1923– |
| BS | Bibliotheca sacra , London, 1843 (= BSTR, Andover, Mass.; 1844–1851 = BSABR; 1851–1863 = BS, Dallas, etc. 1864–) | BZRGG | Beihefte der Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte, Leyden, 1953– |
| | | CA | Confession of Augsburg |

Abbreviations

| | | | |
|-----------------|---|-------------|---|
| CAG | Commentaria in Aristotelem Graeca, Berlin, 1883 | ChPR | Chroniques de Port-Royal , Paris, 1950– |
| CAR | Cahiers de l'actualité religieuse, Tournai, 1954–1969 [Continued after 1969 as Cahiers pour croire aujourd'hui] | CIC | Codex iuris canonici , Rome, 1917 and Rome, 1983 |
| CAT | Commentaire de l'Ancien Testament, Neuchatel, 1963 | CIC(B).C | Corpus iuris civilis , ed. P. Krueger, T. Mommsen, Berlin, -2. Codex Iustinianus , 1874–1877; 2nd ed., 1880, etc. |
| Cath (M) | Catholica. Jahrbuch für Kontrovers-theologie , Munster, etc. 1932–39, 1952/53– | CIC(L) | Corpus iuris canonici , ed. E. Friedberg, Leipzig, 1837–1839; Graz, 1955 (reprint) |
| Cath | Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui, demain , Paris, 1948– | CILL | Cahiers de l'Institut de linguistique de Louvain, Louvain, 1972– |
| CBFV | Cahiers bibliques de Foi et Vie , Paris, 1936– | Cîteaux | Cîteaux: commentarii cistercienses , Westmalle, 1959– |
| CBiPA | Cahiers de Biblia Patristica, Strasbourg, 1987– | Cîteaux, SD | — Studia et documenta , 1971– |
| CBQ | Catholic Biblical Quarterly , Washington, DC, 1939– | COD | Conciliorum oecumenicorum Decreta , eds. Albergio and Jedin, Bologna, 3rd ed., 1973 (DCO, 1994) |
| CCEO | Codex Canonum ecclesiarum orientali-um . Rome, 1990 | Com(F) | Communio. Revue catholique internationale , Paris, 1975/76– |
| CCFR | Confessions et catéchismes de la foi reformée, ed., Oliver Fatio, Geneva, 1986 (BSKORK, Zollikon) | Com(US) | Communio. International Catholic Review , Spokane, Wash., 1974– |
| CCG | Codices Chrysostomi Graeci, Paris, 1968– | Con | Contemporain , Paris, 1866– |
| CChr | Corpus Christianorum, Turnhout | Conc(D) | Concilium. Internazionale Zeitschrift für Theologie , Einsiedeln, 1965– |
| CChr.CM | —Continuatio mediaevalis, 1966 | Conc(F) | Concilium. Revue internationale de théologie , Paris, 1965– |
| CChr.SA | —Series Apocryphorum, 1983– | Conc(US) | Concilium. Theology in the Age of Renewal , New York, 1965– |
| CChr.SG | —Series Graeca, 1977 | ConscLib | Conscience et Liberté , Paris, 1971– |
| CChr.SL | —Series Latina, 1953 | Corp IC | see CIL (L) |
| CCist | Collectanea Cisterciensia , Westmalle, Forges, etc. 1934– | CPG | Clavis Patrum Graecorum, Turnhout, 1974– (= CChr.SG) |
| CCMéd | Cahiers de civilisation médiévale. X^e–XII^e siècles , Poitiers, 1958– | CPIUI | Communio. Pontificium Institutum Utriusque Juris , Rome, 1957– |
| CDTor | Collationes Diocesis Tornacensis , Tournai, 1853– | CPPJ | Cahiers de philosophie politique et juridique, Caen, 1982– |
| CEC | Catéchisme de l'Eglise catholique (Catechism of the Catholic Church) , Paris, 1992 (Typical Latin text, Vatican City, 1992; rev. ed., 1997). | CR | Corpus reformatorum, Berlin, 1834– |
| CEv | Cahiers évangile, Paris, 1972– | CRB | Cahiers de la Revue Biblique , Paris, etc., 1964– |
| CFan | Cahiers de Fangeaux, Fanjeaux, etc., 1966– | CrSt | Cristianesimo nella storia , Bologna, 1980– |
| CFi | Cogitatio fidei, Paris, 1961 | CR.Th.Ph | Cahiers de la Revue de théologie et de philosophie , Geneva, 1977– |
| CFr | Collectanea franciscana, Rome, etc., 1931– | CSCO | Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium, Rome, etc., 1903– |
| CG | Summa Contra Gentiles | CSEL | Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, Vienna, 1866– |
| CGG | Christlicher Glaube in moderner Gesellschaft , Fribourg, 1981–1984 | CT | Concilium Tridentinum. Diarium, actorum, epistularum, tractatum nova collectio , Fribourg, 1901–1981 |
| CHFMA | Classiques de l'histoire de France au Moyen Age, Paris, 1923– | CTH | Cahiers théologiques, Neuchâtel, etc., 27, 1949– (= CthAP, 1923–1949) |
| ChGimG | see CGG | CTH.HS | — Hors série , 1945– (Special edition) |
| ChH | Church History , Chicago: American Society of Church History, 1932– | | |

| | | | |
|--------------------|---|--------------|--|
| CTJ | Calvin Theological Journal , Grand Rapids, Mich, 1966– | | crétariat de la Conférence des évêques de France, Paris, 1965– |
| CUFr | Collection des Universités de France (Les Belle Lettres), Paris, 1920– | DOP | Dumbarton Oaks Papers , Cambridge, Mass., 1941– |
| DA | Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters , Marburg, etc., 1937– | DOPol | Dictionnaire des oeuvres politiques , Paris, 1986 |
| DACL | Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie , Paris, 1924–53 | DPAC | Dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane , edited by A. di Berardino, Casale Monferrato, 1–3, 1983–1988 (French trans. DECA) |
| DAFC | Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique , Paris, 1889; 4th ed., 1909–1931 | DPhP | Dictionnaire de philosophie politique , eds. Ph. Raynaud and St. Rials, Paris, 1997 |
| DB | Dictionnaire de la Bible , Paris, 1895–1928 | DR | Downside Review , Bath, 1880– |
| DBS | Dictionnaire de la Bible. Supplément , Paris, 1928– | DS | Enchiridion Symbolorum , eds. H. Denzinger and A. Schönmetzer, Freiburg, 36th ed., 1976 |
| DBW | Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Werke , ed. E. Bethge et al., Munich, 1986– | DSp | Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique , Paris, 1932–1995 |
| DC | Documentation Catholique , Paris: 1919– | DT | Divus Thomas. Jahrbuch für Philosophie und spekulative Theologie , Fribourg, 1914–1953 |
| DCO | Conciliorum oecumenicorum Decreta; Les Conciles Oecuméniques , II, 1 and 2. Les Décrets . ed. Albergio, Paris, 1994 (trans. of COD) | DT(P) | Divus Thomas. Commentarium de philosophia et theologia , Plaisance, 1880– |
| DCTh | Dictionnaire critique de théologie . ed. Jean-Yves Lacoste, Paris, 1998; 2nd revised ed., 1999 | DTF | Dizionario di Teologia Fondamentale , eds. R. Latourelle et R. Fisichella, Assisi, 1990. (Dictionnaire de Théologie Fondamentale , Paris, 1992) |
| DDC | Dictionnaire de droit canonique , Paris, 1924–1965 | DThC | Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique , Paris, 1–15, 1903–1950 + tables 1–3, 1951–1972 |
| DEB | Dictionnaire encyclopédique de la Bible , Turnhout, 2 vols., 1956–1987 | Dumeige | La Foi Catholique , G. Dumeige, Paris, 1975 |
| DECA | Dictionnaire encyclopédique du christianisme ancien . ed. A. di Bernardino, Paris, 2 vols., 1990. (Trans. of DPAC) | DViv | Dieu Vivant , Paris, 1945–1955 |
| DEPhM | Dictionnaire d'éthique et de philosophie morale , edited by M. Canto Sperber, Paris, 1996 | EAug | Études augustinienes, Paris, 1954– (Studies on Augustine) |
| DH | Enchiridion Symbolorum . Eds. H. Denzinger and P. Hunerman, Fribourg, 37th ed., 1991 | EBT | Encyclopedia of Biblical Theology , London, 1970, etc. (Eng. ed. of BThW) |
| DHGE | Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques . Paris, 1912– | ECQ | Eastern Churches Quarterly , Ramsgate, 1936–1964 (= OiC , 1965–) |
| DHOP | Dissertationes historicae . Institutum historicum FF. Praedicatorum, Rome, etc., 1931– | ECR | Eastern Churches Review , Oxford, 1966–1978 |
| DJD | Discoveries in the Judean Desert , Oxford, 1955– | EdF | Erträge der Forschung, Darmstadt, 1970– |
| DK | Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker , eds. H. Diels and W. Kranz, Berlin, 1903; 13th ed., 1972 (= FVS) | EE | Estudios eclesiásticos, Madrid, 1922– |
| DMA | Dictionary of the Middle Ages , ed. R. Strayer, New York, 1982– | EeT | Église et théologie , Paris, 1958–1962 (= BFLTP , 1934–1958) |
| DoC | Doctor Communis , Rome, 1948– | EETS | Early English Text Society, London, 1864– |
| Doc.-épisc. | Documents-épiscopat , Bulletin du se- | EFV | Enchiridion fontium valdensium , Torre Pelice, 1958 |

Abbreviations

| | | | |
|--------------------|---|---------------|---|
| EI(F) | Encyclopedia of Islam , French ed, Leyden. 1913–1936; new ed. 1954– | ETR | Études théologiques et religieuses , Montpellier, 1926– |
| EJ | Encyclopaedia Judaica , Jerusalem 1–16, 1971; 17, 1982– | EU | Encyclopaedia Universalis , Paris, 1968–1986, 1985–1988 |
| EKK | Evangelisch-katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, Neukirchen, 1975– | EvTh | Evangelische Theologie , Munich, 1934–1938; NS, 1946/1947– |
| EKL | Evangelisches Kirchenlexikon , Göttingen, 1956–1961; 2nd ed., 1961–1962; 3rd ed., 1986–1997 | EWNT | Exegetisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament , Stuttgart, etc., 1–3, 1980–1983 |
| EN | Ethica nicomachea Aristotle | FEL | La foi des Églises luthériennes: confessions et catéchismes, eds. A. Birmele and M. Lienhard, Paris-Geneva, 1991 (BSLK Göttingen) |
| En. Ps. | Enarrationes in Psalmos , Augustine | FOP | Faith and Order Paper(s), World Council of Churches, Geneva, NS, 1949– |
| EnchB | Enchiridion Biblicum , Rome, 1927; 4th ed., 1961 | FKTh | Forum katholische Theologie , Aschaffenburg, 1985– |
| EnchP | Enchiridion patristicum , M. J. Rouët de Journel, Fribourg, 1911; 25th ed., 1981 | FRLANT | Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, Göttingen, 1903– |
| EncProt | Encyclopédie du Protestantisme , edited by P. Gisel, Paris-Geneva, 1995 | FrSA | Franciscan Studies Annual , St. Bonaventure, NY, 1963– (= FrS , 1924–1962) |
| EncRel(E) | The Encyclopedia of Religion , edited by M. Eliade, New York, 1–16, 1987 | FS | Franziskanische Studien, Münster, etc., 1914– |
| EncRel(I) | Enciclopedia delle religioni , edited by M. Gozzini, Florence, 1970–1976 | FS.B | —Beiheft, 1915– |
| Enn. | Enneads , Plotinus | FSÖTh | Forschungen zur systematischen und ökumenischen Theologie, Göttingen, 1962– |
| EO | Ecclesia orans . Periodica de scientiis liturgicis, Rome, 1984– | FThSt | Freiburger theologische Studien, Fribourg, 1910– |
| EOr | Échos d'Orient , Bucharest, 1897/1898–1942/1943 (= EtByz , 1943–1946; REByz , 1946–) | FTS | Frankfurter theologische Studien, Frankfurt, 1969– |
| Eos | Eos . Commentarii societatis philologiae Polonorum, Wroclaw, etc., 1894– | FV | Foi et Vie , Paris, 1898– |
| Eph | Études philosophiques , Paris, 1927– | FVS | Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker , eds. H. Diels and W. Kranz, Berlin, 1903; 13th ed., 1972 (= DK) |
| EPRO | Études préliminaires aux religions orientales dans l'Empire romain, Leyden, 1961– | FZPhTh | Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie , Freiburg (Switzerland), 1954– |
| ER | Ecumenical Review , Lausanne, 1948– | GCFI | Giornale critico della filosofia italiana , Florence, etc., 1920– |
| ErIs | Eretz Israel , Jerusalem, 1951– | GCS | Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, Berlin, 1897– |
| EstB | Estudios biblicos , Madrid, 1929– | GNO | Gregorii Nysseni Opera , ed. Werner Jaeger, Berlin then Leiden (= Jaeger), 1921 |
| EstL | Evangelisches Staatslexikon , Stuttgart, 3rd ed., 1987 | GOTR | Greek Orthodox Theological Review , Brookline (Mass.), 1954– |
| EstLul | Estudios lulianos , Palma de Mallorca, 1957– | Gr | Gregorianum , Rome, 1920– |
| EtB | Études bibliques, Paris, 1903– | GRBS | Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies, Cambridge, Mass., 1958– |
| EtCarm | Études carmélitaines , Paris, 1911–1964 | | |
| Eth. à Nic. | Ethica nicomachea , Aristotle (Éthique à Nicomaque; Nichomachean Ethics) | | |
| Éthique | Éthique. La vie en question , Paris, 1991–1996 (22 issues) | | |
| EthL | Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses , Louvain, etc., 1924– | | |
| EtMar | Études mariales , Paris, 1947– | | |

| | | | |
|---------------------------|--|-----------------------|---|
| Grundfr. syst. Th. | Grundfragen systematischer Theologie , W. Pannenberg, Göttingen, 1967, vol 2, 1980 | HTTL | Herders theologisches Taschenlexikon , edited by K. Rahner, 8 vol., Fribourg, 1972–1973 |
| GS | Germanische Studien, Berlin, etc., 1919– | HUCA | Hebrew Union College Annual , Cincinnati, Ohio, 1924– |
| GuV | Glauben und Verstehen, Gesammelte Aufsätze , R. Bultmann, 4 vol., Tübingen, 1933–1965 | HWP | Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie , Basel-Stuttgart, 1971– |
| GVEDL | Die geltenden Verfassungsgesetze der evangelisch-deutschen Landeskirchen, edited by Emil Friedberg, Fribourg, 1885 and suppl. 1–4, 1888–1904 | HZ | Historische Zeitschrift , Munich, etc., 1859– |
| HadSt | Haddock Studies , Moulinsart, 1953– | IDB | The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , New York, 1/4, 1962 + suppl., 1976 |
| Hahn | see BSGR | IkaZ | Internationale katholische Zeitschrift Communio , Frankfurt, 1972– |
| HBT | Horizons in Biblical Theology , Pittsburgh, Pa, 1979– | IKZ | Internationale kirchliche Zeitschrift. Revue Internationale ecclésiastique. International Church Review , Berne, 1911– |
| HCO | Histoire des conciles œcuméniques , ed. G. Dumeige, Paris, 1962– | In Sent. Inst. | Commentary on the Sentences Institutes of the Christian Religion , Calvin |
| HDG | Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte , edited by M. Schmaus, A. Grillmeier, et al., Fribourg, etc., 1951– | Irén | Irénikon , Chèvotogne, etc., 1926– |
| HDThG | Handbuch der Dogmen- und Theologiegeschichte , edited by C. Andresen, Göttingen, 1982–1984 | Ist | Istina , Boulogne-sur-Seine, etc., 1954– |
| HE | Historia ecclesiastica . Eusebius | JAAR | Journal of the American Academy of Religion , Boston, Mass., etc., 1967– |
| Hermes | Hermes. Zeitschrift für klassische Philologie , Wiesbaden, 1866–1944, 1952– | JAC | Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum , Münster, 1958– |
| HeyJ | Heythrop Journal , Oxford then London, 1960– | JAC.E | — Ergänzungsband , 1964– |
| HFTh | Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie , edited by W. Kern et al., 4 vol., Fribourg, 1985–1988 | Jaeger | Gregorii Nysseni Opera , ed. W. Jaeger, Berlin then Leyden (= GNO), 1921– |
| Hier. eccl. | Hiérarchie ecclésiastique (Ecclesiastica hierarchia) | JBL | Journal of Biblical Literature , Philadelphia, Pa., 1890– |
| HistDog | Histoire des dogmes , Paris, 1953–1971 (unfinished trans. by HDG) | JCSW | Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften , Münster, 1968– |
| HJ | Historisches Jahrbuch der Görresgesellschaft , Munich, etc., 1880– | JEH | Journal of Ecclesiastical History , London, etc., 1950– |
| HKG(J) | Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte , edited by H. Jedin, Fribourg, etc., 1962–1979 | JES | Journal of Ecumenical Studies , Philadelphia, etc., 1964– |
| HMO | Handbook of Metaphysics and Ontology , eds. H. Burkhardt and B. Smith, Munich-Philadelphia-Vienna, 1991 | JHI | Journal of the History of Ideas , New York, etc., 1940– |
| HST | Handbuch systematischer Theologie , Gütersloh, 1979– | JJS | Journal of Jewish Studies , London, 1948– |
| HThK | Herders theologisches Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, Fribourg, 1953– | JLW | Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft , Münster, 1921–1941 |
| HThR | Harvard Theological Review , Cambridge, Mass., 1908– | JÖBG | Jahrbuch der österreichischen byzantinischen Gesellschaft , Vienna, etc., 1951–1968 (= JÖB , 1969–) |
| HThS | Harvard Theological Studies, Cambridge, Mass., 1916– | JRE | Journal of Religious Ethics , Waterloo, Ont., etc., 1973– |
| | | JSNTSS | Journal for the Study of the New Testament , Supplement series, Sheffield, 1980– |

Abbreviations

| | | | |
|----------------------|---|-----------------|---|
| JSOT | Journal for the Study of the Old Testament , Sheffield, 1976– | LouvSt | Louvain Studies , Louvain, 1966/1967– |
| JSOT.S | —Supplements Series, 1976– | LR | Lutherische Rundschau , Stuttgart, etc., 1951–1977 |
| JSPE.S | Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha . Supplement series, Sheffield, 1987– | LSEO | Libri symbolici Ecclesiae orientalis , ed. E. J. Kimmel, Iéna, 1843; 2nd ed., 1850 |
| JThS | Journal of Theological Studies , Oxford, etc., 1899–1949; NS, 1950– | LThK | Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche , Fribourg-Basel-Vienna, 1930–1938; 2nd ed., 1957–1967; 3rd ed., 1993 |
| KD | Die Kirchliche dogmatik , K. Barth, Zollikon-Zurich, vol. I to IV, 1932–1967 + Index, 1970 (Dogmatique , 26 vol., Geneva, 1953–1974, + Index, 1980) | LTP | Laval théologique et philosophique , Quebec, 1944/1945– |
| KiKonf | Kirche und Konfession , Göttingen, 1962– | LuJ | Luther-Jahrbuch , Leipzig, etc., 1919– |
| Kirch | Enchiridion fontium historiae ecclesiasticae , ed. C. Kirch, Fribourg, 1910; 6th ed., 1947 | LV(L) | Lumière et vie , Lyon, 1951– |
| KKD | Kleine Katholische Dogmatik , edited by J. Auer and J. Ratzinger, Ratisbonne, 1978–1988 | LW.F.R | Lutheran World Federation Report , 1978– |
| KJ | Kirchliches Jahrbuch für die Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland , Gütersloh, 1900– (= ThJb , 1873–1899) | Mansi | Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio , edited by J. D. Mansi, Florence, 1759–1827; Paris-Leipzig, 1901–1927 |
| KL | Kirchenlexikon oder Encyclopädie der katholischen Theologie und ihrer Hilfswissenschaften , edited by H. J. Wetzer and B. Welte, Fribourg, 1847–1860; 2nd ed., 1882–1903 | Mar. | Marianum. Ephemerides Mariologiae , Rome, 1939– |
| Kotter | Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskus , ed. B. Kotter, Berlin, 1969– | Maria | Maria. Études sur la Sainte Vierge , edited by H. du Manoir, 8 vol., Paris, 1949–1971 |
| KrV | Kritik der reinen Vernunft , Kant | MCS | Monumenta christiana selecta , Tournai, etc., 1954– |
| KSA | Kritische Studienausgabe , Nietzsche; edited by Colli and Montinari, ed. minor | MD | La Maison-Dieu. Revue de pastorale liturgique , Paris, 1945– |
| KuD | Kerygma und Dogma , Göttingen, 1955– | MDom | Memorie Domenicane , Florence, etc., NS, 1970– |
| Lat | Lateranum , Rome, NS, 1935– | MethH | Methodist History , Lake Junaluska, NC, 1962– |
| LCL | Loeb Classical Library , London, 1912– | MF | Miscellanea francescana , Rome, etc., 1936– (= MFS , 1886–1935) |
| LeDiv | Lectio divina , Paris, 1946– | MFEO | Monumenta fidei Ecclesiae orientalis , ed. H. J. C. Weissenborn, Iéna, 1850 |
| Leit | Leiturgia. Handbuch des evangelischen Gottesdienstes , Kassel, 1952–1970 | MFCG | Mitteilungen und Forschungsbeiträge der Cusanus-Gesellschaft , Mainz, 1961– |
| Liddell-Scott | A Greek-English Lexicon , Liddell-Scott-Jones, Oxford | MGH | Monumenta Germaniae historica inde ab a. C. 500 usque ad a. 1500, Hanover, etc. |
| LJ | Liturgisches Jahrbuch , Münster, 1951– | MGH.Conc | —Concilia, 1893– |
| LNPh | Les notions philosophiques , edited by S. Auroux, vol. II of the Encyclopédie philosophique universelle , edited by A. Jacob, Paris, 2 vol., 1990 | MGH.Ep | —Epistolae, 1887– |
| LO | Lex orandi , Paris, 1944– | MGH.L | —Leges, 1835–1889 |
| | | MHP | Miscellanea historiae pontificae , Rome, 1939– |
| | | MHSJ | Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu , Rome, etc., 1894– |
| | | MiHiEc | Miscellanea historiae ecclesiasticae , Congrès... de Louvain, 1960– |
| | | ML.T | Museum Lessianum . Theological section, Bruxelles, 1922– |

| | | | |
|--------|---|---------|---|
| MM | Miscellanea mediaevalia, Berlin, etc., 1962– | | 1957; 2nd ed., 1974 (F.L. Cross and E. A. Livingstone); 3rd ed. rev. and augm., 1997 (by E. A. Livingstone) |
| MS | Mediaeval Studies , Toronto, 1939– | | |
| MSR | Mélanges de science religieuse , Lille, 1944– | OED | The Oxford English Dictionary |
| MSSNTS | Monograph Series. Society for New Testament Studies, Cambridge, 1965– | OGE | Ons geestelijk erf , Anvers, etc., 1927– |
| MThZ | Münchener theologische Zeitschrift , Munich, etc., 1950–1984 | OiC | One in Christ , London, 1965– |
| MySal | Mysterium Salutis , Grundriß heilsgeschichtlicher Dogmatik, vol. I to V, edited by J. Feiner and M. Löhrer, Einsiedeln, etc., 1965–1976 + supplements, 1981, etc. (Dogmatique de l'histoire du salut , vol. I–III/2 and IV/1 (p. 457–599), 14 vol., 1969–1975) | OR | L'Osservatore romano , Vatican City, 1849– |
| NBL | Neues Bibel-Lexikon , Zurich, 1991 | ÖR | Ökumenische Rundschau , Stuttgart, 1952– |
| NCE | New Catholic Encyclopaedia , New York, 1967–1979 | Or | Orientalia , Rome, 1920– |
| NHThG | Neues Handbuch Theologischer Grundbegriffe , edited by P. Eicher, 2nd ed. augm., Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1991 | OrChr | Oriens Christianus , Rome, 1901– |
| Not | Notitiae. Commentarii ad nuntia et studia de re liturgica , Vatican City, 1975– | OrChrA | see OCA |
| NRTh | Nouvelle revue théologique , Louvain, 1869–1940; 1945– | OrChrP | see OCP |
| NSchol | New Scholasticism , Washington D.C., 1927– | OS | Ostkirchliche Studien, Würzburg, 1952– |
| NStB | Neukirchener Studienbücher, Neukirchen, 1962– | OstKSt | Ostkirchliche Studien , Würzburg, 1952– |
| NT | Novum Testamentum , Leyden, 1956– | ÖTh | Ökumenische Theologie, Zurich, etc., 1978– |
| NTA | Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen, Münster, 1908– | OTS | Oudtestamentische Studien, Leyden, etc., 1942– |
| NTS | New Testament Studies , Cambridge, 1954– | Par. | Paradosis. Études de littérature et de théologie ancienne, Fribourg (Switzerland), 1947– |
| NTTS | New Testament Tools and Studies, Leyden, 1960– | PAS | Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society , London, 1887; NS, 1900/1901– |
| Numen | Numen. International Review for the History of Religions , Leyden, 1954– | PatSor | Patristica Sorbonensia, Paris, 1957– |
| NV | Nova et vetera , Geneva, 1926– | PG | Patrologia Graeca, ed. J.-P. Migne, Paris, 1857–1866 |
| OBO | Orbis biblicus et orientalis, Fribourg (Switzerland), 1973– | PGL | Patristic Greek Lexicon , ed. G. W. H. Lampe, Oxford, 1961–1968 |
| OCA | Orientalia christiana analecta , Rome, 1935– | Ph | Philologus. Zeitschrift für das klassische Altertum , Wiesbaden, etc., 1846– |
| OCP | Orientalia christiana periodica , Rome, 1935– | Phil. | Philosophy , London, 1916– |
| Oec. | Œcumenica. Jahrbuch für ökumenische Forschung , Gütersloh, etc., 1966–1971/1972 | PhJ | Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft , Fulda, etc., 1888– |
| ODCC | Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church , edited by F.L. Cross, London, 1957; 2nd ed., 1974 (F.L. Cross and E. A. Livingstone); 3rd ed. rev. and augm., 1997 (by E. A. Livingstone) | PiLi | Pietas liturgica. Studia, St. Ottilien, 1983– |
| | | PL | Patrologia Latina, ed. J.-P. Migne, Paris, 1841–1864 |
| | | PLS | Patrologiae Latinae supplementum, Paris, 1958–1970 |
| | | PO | Patrologia Orientalis, Paris, etc., 1907– |
| | | POC | Proche-Orient chrétien , Jerusalem, 1951– |
| | | PosLuth | Positions luthériennes , Paris, 1953– |
| | | PoTh | Point théologique, Institut catholique de Paris, 1971– |
| | | PPR | Philosophy and Phenomenological Research , Buffalo, NY, 1940/1941– |
| | | PRMCL | Periodica de re morali, canonica, liturgica , Rome, 1907– |

Abbreviations

| | | | |
|----------------|---|----------------|---|
| PuN | Pietismus und Neuzeit , Göttingen, 1974– | RevBib | Revista biblica , Buenos Aires, 1939– |
| PTS | Patristische Texte und Studien, Berlin, 1964– | RevPhil | Revue de philosophie , Paris, 1900–1940 |
| QD | Quaestiones Disputatae, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna, 1958– | RevSR | Revue des sciences religieuses , Strasbourg, 1921– |
| QFRG | Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte , Gütersloh 1921–, includes QGT | RFNS | Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica , Milan, 1909– |
| QGT | Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer , Gütersloh 1951– | RGG | Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart , Tübingen, 1909–1913; 2nd ed., 1927–1932; 3rd ed., 1956–1965 |
| QRT | Quaker religious Thought , New Haven, Conn., 1959– | RH | Revue historique , Paris, 1876– |
| Qschr | Quartalschrift , Milwaukee, Wis., 1947– | RHDF | Revue historique de droit français et étranger , Paris, 1855–1869; 1922– |
| QuLi | Questions liturgiques , Louvain, 1910– | RHE | Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique , Louvain, 1900– |
| RAC | Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum , Stuttgart, 1950– | RHEF | Revue de l'histoire de l'Église de France , Paris, 1910– |
| RAM | Revue d'ascétique et de mystique , Toulouse, 1920–1971 | RHMo | Revue d'histoire moderne , Paris, 1926–1940 (= 1899–1914, 1954–, RHMC) |
| RB | Revue biblique , Paris, 1892–1894; NS, 1915– | RHMC | Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine , Paris, 1899–1914, 1954– (= 1926–1940, RHMo) |
| RBen | Revue bénédictine de critique, d'histoire et de littérature religieuses , Maredsous, 1890– | RHPPhR | Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses , Strasbourg, etc., 1921– |
| RDC | Revue de droit canonique , Strasbourg, 1951– | RHR | Revue de l'histoire des religions , Paris, 1880 |
| RDCCIF | Recherches et débats du Centre catholique des intellectuels français, Paris, 1948–1952; NS, 1952–1980 | RHSp | Revue d'histoire de la spiritualité , Paris, 1972–1977 |
| RdQ | Revue de Qumrân , Paris, 1958– | RHT | Revue d'histoire des textes , Paris, 1971– (= BIRHT) |
| RE | Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche , Gotha, 3rd ed., 1896–1913 | RICP | Revue de l'Institut catholique de Paris , Paris, 1896–1910 (= BICP , 1910–) |
| REAug | Revue des études augustinienes , Paris, 1955– (= AThA , 1951–1954) | RIPh | Revue Internationale de Philosophie , Bruxelles, 1938– |
| REByz | Revue des études byzantines , Paris, 1946– | RITh | Revue internationale de théologie , Berne, 1893–1910 |
| RECA | Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft , edited by A. Pauly, Stuttgart, 1839–1852 | RivBib | Rivista biblica , Rome, 1953– |
| RechAug | Recherches augustinienes , Paris, 1958– | RLT | Rassegna di letteratura tomistica , Naples, 1966– |
| RechBib | Recherches bibliques, Bruges, etc., 1954– | RMAL | Revue du Moyen Age latin , Paris, etc., 1945– |
| RecL | Revue ecclésiastique de Liège , Liège, 1905–1967 | RMM | Revue de métaphysique et de morale , Paris, 1893– |
| REG | Revue des études grecques , Paris, 1888– | ROC | Revue de l'Orient chrétien , Paris, 1896–1936 |
| REL | Revue des études latines , Paris, 1923– | RPFE | Revue Philosophique de la France et de l'étranger , Paris, 1876– |
| RelSt | Religious Studies , London, etc., 1965/1966– | RPL | Revue philosophique de Louvain , Louvain, etc., 1946– |
| RET | Revista española de teología , Madrid, 1940– | RSF | Rivista di storia della filosofia , Rome, 1946; NS, 1984– |

| | | | |
|---------------------|---|---------------|--|
| RSHum | Revue des sciences humaines , Lille, NS, 45, 1947– | SESJ | Suomen Eksegeettisen Seuran julkaisuja. Helsinki, 1966– |
| RSLR | Rivista di storia e letteratura religiosa , Florence, 1965– | SHCSR | Spicilegium historicum Congregationis SSmi Redemptoris . Rome, 1953– |
| RSPht | Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques , Paris, 1907– | SHCT | Studies in the History of Christian Thought. Leyden, 1966– |
| RSR | Recherches de science religieuse , Paris, 1910– | SJP | Salzburger Jahrbuch für Philosophie und Psychologie , Salzburg, 1957– |
| RThAM | Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale , Louvain, 1929– | SJTh | Scottish Journal of Theology . Edinburgh, 1948– |
| RThom | Revue thomiste , Bruges, etc., Toulouse, 1893– | SKG | Schriften der Königsberger Gelehrten Gesellschaft. Halle |
| RThPh | Revue de théologie et de philosophie , Lausanne, 1868–1911; 3rd ser., 1951– | SKG.G | —Geisteswissenschaftliche Klasse, 1924–1944 |
| RTL | Revue théologique de Louvain , Louvain, 1970– | SM (D) | Sacramentum Mundi. Theologisches Lexikon für die Praxis . ed. K. Rahner. Fribourg, 1967–1969 |
| RTLu | Revue théologique de Lugano , Facoltà di teologia di Lugano, 1996– | SM (E) | Sacramentum Mundi. An Encyclopedia of Theology . New York, 1968–1970 |
| Sal | Salesianum , Turin, 1939 | SO | Symbolae Osloenses. Oslo, 1923– |
| SBAB | Stuttgarter biblische Aufsatzbände, Stuttgart, 1988– | Sob | Sobornost . London, 1979– |
| SBi | Sources Bibliques, Paris, 1963– | Sommervogel | Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, new edition by C. Sommervogel, Bruxelles, 1890–1930; 3rd ed., 1960–1963 |
| SBS | Stuttgarter Bibelstudien, Stuttgart, 1965– | SOR | Sources orientales. Paris, 1959– |
| SC | Sources Chrétiennes, Paris, 1941– | SPAMP | Studien zur Problemgeschichte der antiken und mittelalterlichen Philosophie, Leyden, 1966– |
| ScC | Scuola Cattolica , Milan, 1873, 6th ser., 1923– | SpOr | Spiritualité orientale, Bégrolles-en-Mauges, 1966– |
| SCA | Studies in Christian Antiquity, Washington, D.C., 1941– | SSL | Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense, Louvain, 1922– |
| SCE | Studies in Christian Ethics , Edinburgh, 1988– | SST | Studies in Sacred Theology . Washington, D.C., 1895–1947; 2nd ser. 1947– |
| ScEc | Sciences ecclésiastiques: Revue philosophique et théologique , Bruges, 1948–1967 (= ScEs , 1968–) | ST | Summa Theologica , Thomas Aquinas Werke in Auswahl (Studien Ausgabe), P. Melancthon, edited by R. Stupperich, Gütersloh, 1951–1955 |
| ScEs | Science et esprit , Bruges, 1968– | StA | Studia Anselmiana. Rome, 1933– |
| SCH(L) | Studies in Church History, London, 1964– | StAns | Studia Anselmiana. Rome, 1933– |
| Schol. | Scholastik. Vierteljahresschrift für Theologie und Philosophie . Fribourg, 1926–1965 (= ThPh , 1966–) | StANT | Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament. Munich, 1960–1975 |
| Schr.zur Th. | Schriften zur Theologie , K. Rahner. Einsiedeln-Zürich-Cologne, 1954–1983 | StCan | Studia Canonica , Ottawa, 1967– |
| SE | Sacris erudiri , Steenbrugge, etc., 1948– | StEv | Studia Evangelica, Berlin, 1959–1982 (= TU 73, etc.) |
| SecCent | The Second Century . Abilene, Tex., 1981 | StGen | Studium Generale , Berlin, 1947–1971 |
| SémBib | Sémiotique et Bible , Lyon, 1975– | STGMA | Studien und Texte zur Geistesgeschichte des Mittelalters, Leyden, 1950– |
| Semeia | Semeia . An Experimental Journal for Biblical Criticism. Atlanta, Ga, 1974– | StMed | Studi medievali , Turin, etc.; NS, 1960– |
| SemSup | Semeia Supplements . Philadelphia, Pa., etc., 1975– | StMiss | Studia missionalia . Rome, 1943 |
| Sent. | Sententiarum Libri IV , Peter Lombard | StMor | Studia moralia , Rome, 1963– |

Abbreviations

| | | | |
|------------|---|---------|--|
| STMP | Studia theologiae moralis et pastoralis, Salzburg, 1956– | ThR | Theologische Rundschau . Tübingen, 1897–1917; NF 1929– |
| StPatr | Studia patristica, Berlin, 1957– | ThSt(B) | Theologische Studien, edited by K. Barth et al. , Zurich, 1938– |
| StPh | Studia philosophica , Basel, 1946– | ThTo | Theology Today . Princeton, N.J., etc., 1944/1945– |
| STPIMS | Studies and texts, Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, Toronto, 1955– | ThW | Theologische Wissenschaft , Stuttgart, etc., 1972– |
| Strom. | Stromata , Clement of Alexandria | ThWA | Theorie Werkausgabe , Hegel, Frankfurt, 1970, 20 vols. |
| StSS | Studia scholastico-scotistica. Rome, 1968– | ThWAT | Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament , edited by G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren, Stuttgart, etc., 1973– |
| StT | Studi e testi, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Vatican City, 1900– | ThWNT | Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament , edited by G. Kittel, Stuttgart, 1933–1979 |
| StTom | Studi tomistici, Vatican City, 1974– MMMM | ThZ | Theologische Zeitschrift , Basel, 1945– |
| StZ | Stimmen der Zeit , Fribourg, 1914– | TKTG | Texte zur Kirchen und Theologiegeschichte, Gütersloh, 1966– |
| SVF | Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta , ed. J. von Arnim, Stuttgart. 3 vol. + index, 1903–1924, etc. | TOB | Traduction oecuménique de la Bible |
| SVTQ | St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly , New York, 1969– | TPh | Tijdschrift voor filosofie , Louvain, 1939–1961 (= Tfil , 1962–) |
| Symb. Ath. | Symbol of Athanasius | Tr | Traditio. Studies in Ancient and Medieval History, Thought and Religion, New York, etc., 1943– |
| TAPhS | Transactions of the American Philosophical Society , Philadelphia, Pa, 1769–1809; NS, 1818– | TRE | Theologische Realenzyklopädie , edited by G. Krause and G. Müller, Berlin, 1976– |
| TDNT | Theological Dictionary of the New Testament , Grand Rapids, Mich., 1964–1977 (trans. of ThWNT) | Trin | De Trinitate , Augustine |
| TEH | Theologische Existenz heute, edited by K. Barth et al. , Munich, 1933–1941; NS, 1946– | TS | Theological Studies , Woodstock, Md., etc., 1940– |
| TFil | Tijdschrift voor filosofie . Louvain, 1962– (= TPh , 1939–1961) | TSTP | Tübinger Studien zur Theologie und Philosophie, Mainz, 1991– |
| THAT | Theologisches Handwörterbuch zum Alten Testament , ed. E. Jenni and C. Westermann, Munich, 1971–1976 | TTh | Tijdschrift voor theologie , Nimègue, 1961– |
| Theos. H. | Theosophical History . A Quarterly Journal of Research, London, 1985–1989; Fullerton, Calif., 1990– | TThQ | Tübinger theologische Quartalschrift , Stuttgart, 1960–1968 (= ThQ) |
| ThGl | Theologie und Glaube , Paderborn, 1909– | TThZ | Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift , Trier, 1947– |
| ThH | Théologie historique, Paris, 1963– | TTS | Tübinger theologische Studien, Mainz, 1973–1990 |
| ThJb | Theologisches Jahrbuch , Gütersloh, 1873–1899 (= KJ , 1900–) | TU | Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, Berlin, 1882– |
| ThJb(L) | Theologisches Jahrbuch . Leipzig, 1957– | TuG | Theologie und Gemeinde, Munich, 1958– |
| ThLZ | Theologische Literaturzeitung , Leipzig, 1876– | UB | Urban-Bücher, Stuttgart, 1953– |
| Thom | Thomist , Washington, D.C., 1939– | UnSa | Unam Sanctam, Paris, 1937– |
| ThPh | Theologie und Philosophie , Fribourg, 1966– | VC | Verbum Caro. Revue théologique et ecclésiastique œcuménique , Taizé, etc., 1947–1969 |
| THPQ | Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift , Linz, 1848– | VerLex | Deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters. Verfasserlexikon , Berlin, etc, 1933–1955; 2nd ed., 1978– |
| ThQ | Theologische Quartalschrift , Tübingen, etc., 1819– (1960–1968 = TThQ) | | |

| | | | |
|---------------|---|--------|---|
| VetChr | Vetera Christianorum , Bari, 1964– | ZAW | Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde des nachbiblischen Judentums , Berlin, 1881– |
| VieCon | Vie consacrée , Bruxelles, 1966– | ZDP | Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie , Berlin, etc., 1869– |
| VigChr | Vigiliae Christianae , Amsterdam, 1947– | ZDPV | Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-Vereins , Wiesbaden, 1978– |
| VS | Vie spirituelle , Paris, 1946– | ZevKR | Zeitschrift für evangelisches Kirchenrecht , Tübingen, 1951– |
| VT | Vetus Testamentum , Leyden, 1951– | ZKG | Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte , Stuttgart, 1877– |
| VT.S | —Suppl., 1953– | ZKTh | Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie , Vienna, etc., 1877– |
| VThB | Vocabulaire de théologie biblique , edited by X. Léon-Dufour, Paris, 1962; 2nd ed., 1970 | ZNW | Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche , Berlin, etc., 1900– |
| WA | Werke. Kristiche Gesamtausgabe , Luther (Weimarer Ausgabe), 1883– | ZSRG.K | Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. Kanonistische Abteilung , Weimar, 1911– |
| WA.B | — Briefwechsel , 1930– | ZPE | Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik , Bonn, 1967– |
| WA.DB | — Deutsche Bibel , 1906– | ZThK | Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche , Tübingen, 1891– |
| WA.TR | — Tischreden , 1912– | | |
| WBS | Wiener byzantinistische Studien, Graz, etc., 1964– | | |
| WdF | Wege der Forschung, Darmstadt, 1956– | | |
| Weischedel | Werkausgabe , Kant, edited by W. Weischedel, Frankfurt, 1958–1964 | | |
| WMANT | Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament, Neukirchen, 1960– | | |
| WSAMA.T | Walberger Studien der Albertus-Magnus-Akademie, Mainz, Theologische Reihe, 1964– | | |
| WUNT | Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament, Tübingen, 1950– | | |
| WuW | Wort und Wahrheit , Vienna, etc., 1946–1973 | | |
| | | | Frankfurt = Frankfurt am Main |
| | | | Fribourg = Fribourg-en-Brigau |
| | | | Fribourg-Paris = Fribourg (Switzerland)—Paris |
| | | | A hyphenated date (1963–) means that the publishing is not complete or that the collection or journal is still ongoing. |

A

Abelard, Peter

1079–1142

a) Life. Peter Abelard studied dialectics first with Roscelin de Compiègne, whose nominalism* led him to dispute the realism of William of Champeaux. After a short period of studies in theology* under Anselm of Laon, Abelard started teaching these two subjects at the cathedral school of Paris. Following the scandal of his affair with Heloise, he decided to become a monk at Saint-Denis (c. 1117). His teaching sought to lead toward theology through the study of secular authors. His first treatise on the Trinity* (Theologia summi boni, c. 1120) was condemned at the Council* of Soissons (1121). Between 1122 and 1127 he developed his concepts on the philosophical foundations of theology in an oratory dedicated by him to the Holy Trinity (it later became the Paraclete). In 1129, two years after becoming abbot of Saint-Gildas-de-Rhuys, he asked Heloise to transform this oratory into a monastic community. He started teaching again in Paris at the beginning of the 1130s, in the midst of controversy. In 1139 William of Saint Thierry drew Bernard* of Clairvaux's attention to a number of opinions expressed by Abelard. William accused Abelard of assigning full omnipotence only to the Father*, and thus denying that Christ* had become incarnate to free humanity from the devil. Bernard of Clairvaux took up these accusations in his turn, sent a treatise to Pope Innocent II, and succeeded in having Abelard excommunicated at the Council of Sens (1140). This excommunication was canceled thanks to the intervention of Peter the Venerable, who welcomed Abelard at Cluny and had him correct the controversial writings, thus obtaining an end to Bernard of Clairvaux's attacks.

b) Theological Contribution. Abelard's main contribution to theology is the systematic analysis of the traditional doctrines from a philosophical point of view. For him, Father, Son, and Holy* Spirit are names that signify the divine attributes* of power, wisdom*, and goodness that pagan philosophers and Jewish prophets* also recognize in their own way. He criticizes Roscelin's argument that the divine Persons* must be separate realities in order to be different from each other. He is particularly concerned for the aptitude of divine names* to create the intelligence (intellectus) of what they designate, according to a theme studied in his Dialectica and his Logica Ingredientibus regarding words (voces) in general. It is with their own specific words that the pagan philosophers gave rise to an intelligence of divinity similar to that of the prophets. Abelard suggests that the relationship between Father and Son is analogous to that existing between power and wisdom (capacity to discern), or between genus and species. His Trinitarian theology is more interested in the economy of God* in the world, above all through the Holy Spirit, than in his eternal nature. In his Christian Theology (1122–27) he outlines ideas on the rationality of divine action; these ideas are subsequently developed in the Introduction to Theology (Theologia Scholarium, started in the early 1130s). One of the most controversial theses was the idea that God cannot act any differently than he does.

On many points of his teaching, in questions regarding God, Christ, the sacraments*, or ethics*, Abelard starts from the Sic et Non (composed probably c. 1120–21); this list of patristic opinions, which are apparently contradictory, is preceded by a definition of his theological method. According to him it is essential always to make sure that one is not led into error by writings that are, after all, human and therefore fallible. Disagreements among the Fathers* should induce us to go all the deeper in the search for truth. In his Dialogue (generally dated 1140–42, but also perhaps 1125–27; Mews 1985), which is the debate of a philosopher with a Jew and a Christian about which road to take toward the Sovereign Good*, and on the nature of Good and Evil*, Abelard talks about the superiority of natural law* over written law and about the essential compatibility between the philosopher's ethical approach (ethica) and the Christian's theological approach (divinitas). But he does not give the Christian's answer regarding the road to follow in order to reach the Sovereign Good. It is only in his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (c. 1135?) that Abelard develops the thesis that the redeeming action of Christ does not consist in freeing man from servitude to the devil, but in inspiring in him the true love* of God through the example of his life and his death. Abelard deals again with moral questions in his Know Thyself (Scito teipsum): sin* is no longer bad will, as in the Dialogue and the commentary on Rm, but it is the consent to bad will through contempt of God. Abelard did not write a systematic treatise on all the questions raised in the Sic et Non, but his students kept notes of his Sentences, where he addresses faith* in God and in Christ, the sacraments, and charity as the root of all ethics.

- PL 178; Petri Abaelardi Opera, Ed. V. Cousin, 1849 (2nd Ed. 1859), G. Olms, Hildesheim, 1970.
- Philosophische Schriften*, Ed. B. Geyer, BGPhMA 21, 14, 1919–33.
- Scritti di Logica*, Ed. M. Dal Pra, Florence, 1954 (2nd Ed., 1969).
- Dialectica*, Ed. L. M. de Rijk, Assen, 1956 (2nd Ed., 1970).
- Historia calamitatum*, Ed. J. Monfrin, Paris, 1959.
- Opera theologica I–II*, Ed. E. M. Buytaert, CChrCM 11–12.
- III*, Ed. E. M. Buytaert, C. J. Mews, CChrCM 13.
- Dialogus inter Philosophum, Judaeum et Christianum*, Ed. R. Thomas, Stuttgart-Bad Canstatt, 1970.
- Peter Abelard's Ethics*, Ed. D. E. Luscombe, Oxford, 1971.
- Sic et Non*, Ed. B. Boyer, R. McKeon, Chicago-London, 1976, 1977.
- Des intellections*, Ed. P. Morin, Paris, 1994.
- ♦ J. Jolivet (1969), Arts du langage et théologie chez Abélard, Paris (New Ed. 1982).
- D. E. Luscombe (1969), The School of Peter Abelard, Cambridge.
- R. Weingart (1970), The Logic of Divine Love: A Critical Analysis of the Soteriology of Peter Abelard, Oxford.
- C. J. Mews (1985), "On Dating the Works of Peter Abelard," AHDL 52, 73–134.
- J. Jolivet (1994), Abélard ou la philosophie dans le langage, Paris-Fribourg.
- C. J. Mews (1995), Peter Abelard, London (bibl.).
- J. Jolivet (1997), La théologie d'Abélard, Paris.

CONSTANT MEWS

See also Language, Theological; Philosophy; Reason; Salvation; Tritheism

Abortion

Scripture is silent about abortion. Along with infanticide, abortion is only obliquely related to the biblical prohibition of child sacrifice (Lv 18:21, 20:2–5; 2 Kgs 21:6) and the liability incurred by those who cause a miscarriage by brawling (Ex 21:22).

a) Jewish Antecedents and Early Christian Doctrine. The question first emerged as an issue when the Jews confronted the Hellenistic world, where both abortion and infanticide were widespread. Jewish moralists of the Diaspora began to urge parents not to abort their unwanted children, or to leave them exposed. Thus Hecataeus of Abdera (300 B.C.) (in Diodorus Siculus 40, 3, 8) writes: "[Moses] required those who dwelt in the land to rear their children" (in contrast with the Greeks who exposed unwanted newborns). Somewhat later, Pseudo-Phocylides takes up the theme (first century A.D.) (Sentences 184–85): “A woman should not destroy the unborn babe in her belly; nor after its birth throw it before the dogs and the vultures as a prey.” Even more emphatically, Flavius Josephus (first century A.D.) (Contra Apionem 2, 245, 4–5) writes: “The Law ordains that all offspring are to be brought up, and forbids women either to cause abortion or to do away with the fetus. A woman convicted of this is regarded as an infanticide, because she destroys a soul and diminishes the race” (see also Philo of Alexandria, Hypothetica 7, 7.) This conviction in Hellenistic Judaism also found expression in the Septuagint. Exodus 21:22 had imposed a fine on anyone who by misadventure caused a woman to miscarry. The Greek translation required that “if the child is formed,” the principle of “life for life” must be applied and the death penalty exacted.

Christianity eagerly renewed this antipathy toward abortion as part of its larger moral agenda. Christians had inherited from Israel the duty to offer communal protection to four categories of defenseless people: kinless widows and orphans, resident aliens, and the indigent poor. Christian writers quickly broadened this doctrine by extending protection to four further sets of people at risk. Beyond widowhood, the wife was now protected by Jesus’ rejection of divorce (Mt 5:31–32, 19:3–15; Mk 10:1–12; Lk 16:18). The ethos of solidarity that had treated the resident alien as a neighbor was extended by Jesus’ injunction to love the enemy (Rom 12:14–21; Mt 5:43–48; Lk 6:27–36). Special consideration for the pauper was now enlarged by a call to consider slaves and masters as brothers in the Lord (Philemon). And the protection for orphans took bolder form in a defense of children whose parents wanted to eliminate them: the unborn were now protected against abortion, and the newborn against infanticide.

Within a Roman rather than a Jewish cultural context, Christians came to adopt the concept of inviolability, and to apply this to the case of the abandoned child. The Didache (first to second century A.D.) offers the earliest Christian example: “You shall not . . . murder a child by abortion, kill a newborn.” “Killers of children, destroyers of God’s handiwork,” were walking the “way of death” (2,2–3; 5,2. See also Ep. Barn. 19,5; 20,2).

The apologists* followed suit. Minucius Felix accuses the Romans of butchery: “You expose your own children to birds and wild beasts, or at times smother and strangle them—a pitiful way to die . . . and there are women who swallow drugs to stifle in their womb the burgeoning human life—committing infanticide even before they give birth to their infant” (30,1–2).

Athenagoras of Athens denied the rumor that Christians committed acts of cannibalism and slew infants to obtain blood for their eucharistic rites: “In our view, those who have recourse to methods of abortion commit murder, and they are answerable to God for this. How then could we commit such murders ourselves? The same person cannot regard that which a woman carries in her womb as a living creature, and therefore as an object of value to God, and then proceed to slay this creature once it has come forth into the light of day.” Tertullian* in Rome assailed the Stoic* belief that one’s first breath marks the beginning of life. To prevent the birth of a child is simply a swifter way to murder (de anima 38.1). The Apocalypse of Peter (Eth. 8) prescribes eternal torments for mothers who have aborted. Clement of Alexandria* writes that “women who resort to some sort of abortion drug slay not only the embryo but, along with it, all human love [philanthropia]” (Paidagogos 96). By the end of the second century it was established doctrine that abortion and infanticide were especially perverse forms of homicide.

Throughout the Christian world of the fourth century there were calls for severe church penalties against abortion. The Councils of Elvira in Spain (c. 305) and Ancyra in Galatia (314), as well as Basil* the Great in Cappadocia, Epiphanius in Cyprus, Ambrose* in Lombardy, Chrysostom* in Constantinople, and Augustine (De nupt. et con. 1,17) in Africa all witness to a broad repudiation of abortion. In Chrysostom’s words, it was “worse than murder” (Homiliae in Ep. Rom. 24).

b) Developments in Discipline and Doctrine. Since antiquity had no knowledge of the female ovum, it was thought that reproduction followed solely from the planting of the male seed, which then germinated and grew. Augustine’s supposition (based on Aristotle’s biology), that the beginning of life came only after the embryo had developed to some degree, justified continued speculation that fetal life began sometime after intercourse. This theory had practical consequences. If the youngest unborn were not yet humans then the disciplinary penalties for early abortion might be justifiably more lenient. Some canonists, including Gratian (1160) (C.J.C. i 1121–22) and Innocent III (1216) (C.J.C. ii 81) began to reserve the charge of homicide for later abortion—that is, abortion procured after the “infusion” of the human soul. Others, such as Raymond of Penafort (†1275) (C.J.C. ii 794) dissented. Since abortion was a capital offense before the civil courts, where the rules of evidence were correspondingly rigorous, it was commonly pled in the ecclesiastical courts, where sworn testimony was accepted and where there was a quite different penitential discipline.

This development in church discipline influenced theologians, and the idea of delayed ensoulment was taken up by Peter Lombard (†1160) (4,31,11), Bonaventure* (†1274) (in lib. iv Sent. 31, dub.4) and Thomas* Aquinas (Sent. 3, 3, 1.5 a.2, ST 2a 2ae 64, 8, ad2). It was only a question of deciding whether abortion could be regarded as homicide in a formal sense, though it was believed that abortion at any time was seriously sinful in intent and effect. By the 17th century opinion had turned away from the Aristotelian theory of delayed ensoulment in favor of believing that the soul was present from the moment of conception. These were the terms of the discussion that was pursued by casuists, from the 17th to the 19th century.

c) 19th and 20th Centuries. The existence of the female ovum was scientifically established in 1827, and by 1875 it had been proved that conception involves the joining of one gamete from each parent. This effectively quieted speculation about any later moment when the human fetus might undergo substantial change.

In the meantime another question arose: if an early pregnancy threatened inevitable death to both mother and non-viable child, would it be licit (perhaps dutiful) to save at least the mother by dismembering and removing her doomed child? The principle of double effect seemed unworkable, yet many theologians pursued an intuitive conviction that removing a child from the mother would be justified if it could not be saved and if her life could thus be spared. Others sympathized, but could not bring themselves to acquiesce in what seemed to be direct killing. When the question was formally proposed to the Vatican's Holy Office, the reply was hedged: it "could not safely be taught."

The Vatican then took the doctrinal initiative in abortion-related questions. In 1869 Pius IX removed an old restriction that withheld excommunication if the fetus were not yet "ensouled." In Casti Connubii (1930) he condemned all abortion and denied that any necessity could justify direct killing.

After World War II Japan adopted a population policy with abortion as a principal means of birth control. Throughout the Communist bloc, abortion was legalized, and indeed was often enforced when state population policy took an antinatal turn. In 1968 Planned Parenthood-World Federation reversed prior policy and approved of using abortion to curb population growth. Within 20 years, and despite various legal conditions, most industrial countries had adopted what was in effect abortion on demand.

Sympathy for feminism, as well as fears about population growth, led some Christian denominations to accept abortion as a moral and legal liberty rightfully due to women. The issue intensified when medical scientists began calling for tissues and organs obtained through abortion and infanticide to be used for research and transplantation.

Today, Catholics oppose abortion more than ever. In 1995 Pope John Paul II issued an encyclical letter entitled Evangelium Vitae, which speaks of a Christian "culture of life" facing a contemporary "culture of death."

- Sigrid Undset (1934), Saga of Saints, London.
- J. Crahay (1941), "Les moralistes anciens et l'avortement," AnCl 10, 9–23.
- J. Noonan (Ed.) (1970), The Morality of Abortion: Legal and Historical Perspectives, Cambridge (Mass.).
- J. T. Burtchaell (1972), Rachel Weeping and Other Essays on Abortion, Kansas City.
- J. Connery (1977), Abortion: The Development of the Roman Catholic Perspective, Chicago.
- O. O'Donovan (1984), Begotten or Made? Oxford.
- M. A. Glendon (1987), Abortion and Divorce in Western Law, Cambridge, Mass. London.
- D. Folscheid (1992), "L'embryon, notre plus-que-prochain," Éthique 4, 20–43.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1993), "Être, vivre, exister: Note sur le commencement de l'homme," RMM 198, 347–66.
- V. Bourguet (1999), L'être en gestation: Réflexions bioéthiques sur l'embryon humain, Paris.

JAMES TUNSTEAD BURTCHAELL

See also Casuistry; Church and State; Ethics, Medical; Ethics, Sexual; Family; Procreation; Soul-Heart-Body

Achard of Saint-Victor. See Saint-Victor, School of Action

1. Definition

The theory of human action starts with a distinction between events and actions: an event happens, an action is done. Various theories have tried to reduce the actions of humans to mechanistic, biological, or divine causalities, but these reductive accounts do not explain the reality of choice and responsibility in our actions, things of which we are convinced and that are expressed in law*, theology*, and common language.

The critical element in a theory of action is whether the agent has a reason behind what he or she does, a purpose in mind when performing the action. The distinguishing feature of actions is that they are events performed by people for reasons. An act with the same physical description can be a different human act entirely by the various purposes that may be served. Cutting off a person's hand, for example, could be an instance of torture, or legitimate punishment* (as in certain Islamic countries), or saving life (where the limb is affected by gangrene).

2. Historical Conceptions

a) Aristotle and the Stoics. Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) made a lasting contribution to the theory of human action in his Nicomachean Ethics. He distinguishes actions that are freely chosen (voluntary) from actions that are made under compulsion, and describes the elements of actions as acting in accordance with a purpose (telos), using deliberation (bouleusis) to determine the means, and choice (prohairesis), which results in the actions. The choice leading to the act is produced by neither intellect (nous) nor desire (orexis) alone, but is a combination of both. Most subsequent theories are elaborations of this one, with a changing emphasis on the importance of the rational or affective elements of action.

Stoic thinkers tended to modify Aristotle in several respects. They were not averse to the deterministic implications of theories of universal law, and practical reasoning was often reduced to attitudes of obedience to laws. More attention was given to “impulse” and other irrational factors in actions.

b) Scriptures. Beginning with the story of Adam and Eve, the Bible* emphasizes liberty*, responsibility, and obedience to God*. The importance of right intention* is illustrated by the story of Cain and Abel (Gn 4), and the need for wisdom* and prudence* in living according to God's will is a major theme of the Psalms* and Proverbs.

The teaching of Jesus deepens the connection between external actions and inner disposition. Many examples, including the parables of the two sons (Mt 21:28–32), the good and bad fruit (Mt 7:16–20), and the pearl of great price (Mt 13:45–46), illustrate these points about actions: neither good attitude without action, nor action without proper motivation, is sufficient; there should be complete harmony between inner attitude and external action; such harmony is based on love* of God and his kingdom*; and it presupposes complete change in mind and heart. The pictures of abiding in Christ (Jn 15:4–5), being conformed to the image of Christ (2 Cor 3:17–18), or walking in the Spirit (Gal 5:16–26) all describe the dependence of a Christian's actions on identification and union with Christ in mind and heart.

c) Patristic and Medieval Periods. Augustine (354–430) summarizes the Christian life by emphasizing knowledge of God's will informed by the Scriptures, and the ordering of love under love for God. Some Greek theologians retained an interest in the philosophical analysis of action, including Nemesius (late fourth century) and John of Damascus (eighth century). Thomas* Aquinas was able to make use of these enrichments in his combination of Aristotelian theory with an Augustinian view of the will, balancing cognitive and affective functions in action. This balance was upset by an emphasis on the will in later thinkers (John Duns* Scotus [c. 1266–1308] and William of Ockham [c. 1285–1347/49]), with these results: Will is responsible for choice and execution; reason* is restricted to deliberation; action is disconnected from the final end, and the importance of the moral virtues is minimized.

d) Modern Times. Distortions produced by voluntarism* affected the theology of the 16th and 17th centuries, even in the commentators on Saint Thomas, such as Cajetan (1469–1534) and the Salamanticenses. Actions came to be considered as discrete occasions of the will's obedience or disobedience to conscience*, weakening the classical and biblical emphasis on moral wisdom and development of character*. In secular ethics, severed from obedience to God, action became even more atomistic, as in John Locke (1632–1704), lacking any connection to a final end, whether emphasis was put on the passions* (David Hume, 1711–76) or on rationality (Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz* [1646–1716] or Immanuel Kant* [1724–1804]).

In the early 20th century, two influences on the theory of action may be noted. First is the innovative approach of Blondel*, who explored the dynamic quality of the will as the tension between necessity and freedom. He also put the discussion of action in a very broad context of science, art, and social life, and considered action the basis for contemplating our relationship with the divine. Next, the work of Freud* contributed to an understanding of the several levels of motivation. Actions may have a superficial explanation in terms of avowed purpose, but they may also be an expression of underlying subconscious or unconscious attitudes.

e) Contemporaries. Dissatisfied with behaviorism and other reductionist approaches, thinkers such as Anscombe and Davidson see the limitations of theories emphasizing irrational factors and, along Aristotelian lines, affirm the importance of reason in action, with descriptions combining belief and desire. The “causal” theory associated with Davidson, for example, takes the view that the total action includes belief, desire, and the exterior action. The chief contribution here has been to show how “having a reason” can be part of the description of the cause of an action. Although some (see Hornsby 1980) have argued for a notion of “trying” as part of mental action, most have agreed with the causal theory, which is also simpler and is compatible with Aristotle and Aquinas.

A continuing point of debate is the extent of an action, whether it is limited to the immediate “physical” action or includes direct effects. In an example from Anscombe (1963), a man pumps water from a poisoned well to a house. If he knows about the poison, then the description of his action should include more than the ensemble of his movements; it should mention the fact that they involve attacking the inhabitants of the house. Goldman (1970) argues for the limited version of the action description, but Davidson, as well as D’Arcy and Anscombe, argue for a more comprehensive view, claiming that the more restricted view is only a partial and incomplete description (summary in Neuberger 1993). This question is important for moral theology, because the question of responsibility often hinges on the correct description of an action; this is essential if deception and rationalizing are to be avoided.

3. Principles of Human Action

a) Motivation. All creatures act for an end: to fulfill a need or to reach a stage of completion. The dogma* of creation* allows us to place all these activities, originally without defect, under the plan and providence* of God. Human beings are self-acting because they can generate their own plans and have a wide range of purposes. Of course, people are often mistaken about real good and evil. Some actions, such as eating or talking with friends, are valuable in themselves and need no outside purpose to render them good or understandable; but often an action serves an end or purpose that may be remote from the action itself: undergoing painful surgery, for example, so that one’s health will be improved.

b) Mental Factors. Intellect and will (or, in biblical terms, mind and heart) are central to action. Intellect and will activate each other, and thus each expresses the unified attitudes, beliefs, and desires of a person*. Human freedom cannot be reduced to the will alone, since free choice is a function of both intellect and will.

c) Dispositions. Human action is not just a succession of occasional choices, but also expresses dispositions of the mind and emotions established in a person’s character. These dispositions (habitus) are acquired not mechanically but by patterns of thought and desire; by connection to goals and values, they become the foundation for virtues*.

d) Law and Grace. These are not interior principles of action, but exterior principles. Laws, both human and divine, direct action to the common good*, applying in situations where individual choices need to be harmonized, or where action is unclear. Grace* is the help given to the mind through the Holy* Spirit to enable the agent to see more clearly, and to be better attracted to genuine good.

4. Process of Action

Human action goes through stages of general desire, planning, deciding, and acting. In many accounts of Scholastic* theory, a multiplication of up to 12 stages can be found. However, when intellect and will are seen to be complementary, then it is possible to arrange the process of action in four steps: intention, deliberation, decision, and execution. Many actions are much simpler, and require little or no deliberation. In other cases, the decision is easy to reach, but the execution itself is difficult, and perhaps delayed or compromised. It becomes clear that a person's attitudes and purposes need to be good; that the deliberation must be open and accurate; that decisions must be made with wisdom; and that actions are to be executed in the right way.

5. Moral Assessment of Actions

a) End, Object, and Circumstances. From the moral perspective, voluntary actions are either good or bad (with a narrow range of trivial or inadvertent actions) depending on their ends and means. Taking a nap is good or bad depending on the circumstances: resting, or trying to avoid an unpleasant task.

It is useful to distinguish between the object and the end of an act. The object, the finis operis (end of the action), is what gives the act its species or definition; it is the description that the agent would give when asked what he has proposed to do. The end is the further purpose of the action, relating to the interior act of the will of the agent, referred to as finis operantis (end of acting). Both are part of the intention. For example, handing someone money is a neutral or physical description, which becomes a moral act when given a description, such as paying a debt, offering a bribe, or presenting a gift to the poor. These specifications of action are still affected in turn by the larger purposes that the agent may have: to cultivate a certain reputation, to further his interests, or to fulfill the terms of a will. Even a good act, such as giving money to the poor, may serve questionable purposes, including the enhancement of pride or silencing a guilty conscience. The money will still help the poor, but as an action of the giver it is defective. Or, the donor may have the right intention, but he may not recognize obligations to family or other responsibilities that he has, and under the circumstances the action becomes bad. If there is a defect in the object, purpose, or circumstances, then the act is vitiated, for all must be correct.

b) Consequences of Action. Some effects are direct and must be considered part of the action, since they are part of the intention. Other effects are subsequent results of the action and should not determine the morality of the act itself. Unlike theories that assess the goodness of actions in terms of consequences (consequentialism, utilitarianism*), the Christian view understands the criteria of good and bad as necessarily present in the agent's moral reasoning in the light of God's law. The consequences, however, are not irrelevant; they must be considered in a correct estimate of an action, and they may intensify the goodness or badness of an act.

c) Responsibility. The theory of action is very important for the notion of responsibility, and our assessment of praise and blame. The man pumping poisoned water cannot limit his responsibility to mere pumping if he knows that the result is likely to harm people in the house. But what of cases where the intention is for something good, but an accident or some other factor changes the expected outcome? To the extent that other factors should have been taken into account, the agent cannot excuse himself from his responsibility by saying that the outcome was not his intention. Thus, the scope of responsibility should be expanded from what is our will or intention to what is within our power. In taking a group of children on a hike, for example, one is not responsible for falling branches or sudden storms, but one is responsible for checking weather forecasts, having extra clothing or food for emergencies, and providing adequate supervision.

It must be pointed out that one cannot avoid responsibility by not acting, as is shown by the problem of negligence or omission. All negligence involves some failure to take due care; but sometimes this consists in a person's not taking care in the way he acts, sometimes in the way in which he prepares to act, and sometimes in not having thought at all. Having the correct desires and intentions is crucial, and shows why the virtues of prudence and charity are of prime importance for Christian action. Sometimes, the failure to act, or carelessness in execution, reveal a greater lack of charity than more obvious sins* do.

- Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics.
- Augustine, De Doctrina Christiana, BAug 11, 149–541.
- M. Blondel, L'Action, Paris, 1893.
- Nemesius, De natura hominis, PG 40.
- Salmanticenses, Cursus theologicus, 20 vols., Paris, 1870–83, vol. III, tract. II.
- Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, Ia IIae, q. 17–21.
- ♦ A. Gardeil (1902), "Acte humain," DThC 1, 339–46.
- E. Anscombe (1957), Intention, Oxford.
- E. D'Arcy (1963), Human Acts: An Essay in Their Moral Evaluation, Oxford.
- A. Goldman (1970), A Theory of Human Actions, Princeton.
- D. Davidson (1980), Essays on Actions and Events, Oxford.
- J. Hornsby (1980), Actions, London.
- G. Grisez (1983), The Way of the Lord Jesus, Chicago.
- S. Pinckaers (1985), Les sources de la morale chrétienne, Paris.
- R. Cessario (1991), The Moral Virtues and Theological Ethics, Notre Dame, Ind.
- M. Neuberg (1993), Philosophie de l'action, Gembloux.
- D. Westberg (1994), Right Practical Reason: Aristotle, Action, and Prudence in Aquinas, Oxford.
- R. Ogien (1996), "Action," DEPhM, 4–14.

DANIEL WESTBERG

See also Angels; Animals; Anthropology; Augustinianism; Cosmos; Creation; Death; Demons; Filiation; Myth; Pauline Theology; Sin, Original; Temptation; Woman

Adam

A. Biblical Theology

a) Adam in Hebrew. The Hebrew word adam has several meanings. 1) Used collectively, it means “humanity” (Gn 1:26–27). Ordinarily preceded by the article (ha-) in prose, but not in poetry, it signifies “human” as a complement to a substantive. 2) It is used to designate every individual member of the human race*, individualized or typical. 3) It is the proper name of the first man, and as such its first certain occurrence is in Genesis 5:1.

b) First Creation Narrative. Ha-’adam of Genesis 1:26–7 is a collective noun covering both sexes; it is literally “the adam,” but is usually translated as “man” or “humankind.” The words “God created ha-’adam in his own image” do not refer to a rational or spiritual essence, but rather to the power conferred on Adam over other creatures and, directly, over the animals*. According to W. H. Schmidt and, in particular, Wildberger, God manifests himself in Genesis 1 with the kingly qualities of power, wisdom*, and goodness, of which his “image” is the reflection. Tselem (clarified by the Babylonian tsalmu, applied to kings and to the priests of Marduk) implies the attributes of a viceroy of God.

c) Second Creation Narrative. Genesis 2:4–25, which is of a mythic type of narrative with a more ancient Yahwist source, is rich in subtle instruction. The creation* of ha-’adam out of the ’adamah (soil) opens a drama of the fragility and dignity of man, the proximity of animal and God. Prohibition and sanction presuppose responsibility, albeit limited. Does the creation of the woman* out of the man transpose the myth* of a primeval androgyny? In any case, the woman is desired as a “helper,” and kenegedo, the term used to describe her as such, expresses a reciprocity that excludes an inferior status (Gn 2:18–20).

The story of the first couple* is presented as a tragic case of innocence exploited. The first parents are said to be ’arummim (naked—here denoting vulnerability), and the serpent is said to be ’arum (subtle). At first, therefore, man and woman are victims. According to Irenaeus* and other Fathers*, they are not yet adults. The principal responsibility is imputed to the serpent, and it is he who speaks of becoming “like God” (the hubris of superhuman creatures is an ancient theme, see Gn 14:12–20 and Ez 28:1–19). The exegesis* that proceeds by decoding sexual allegories denies the importance of what is said and what is left unsaid, notably in the dialogue in Genesis 3:1–5. In fact, the word sin does not appear. The serpent is cursed, not the man. The soil is also cursed, in relation to human work. Nothing obliges us to see the expulsion from paradise as a punishment, since Adam and Eve are thus preserved, to remain without end in the condition in which they have been placed. Death* is the sanction for disobedience, but the myth does not say that man was created immortal, although Genesis 6:3 could suggest that. A parable or paradigm of human weakness and its consequences, Genesis 2 and 3 should serve as a mirror, calling each reader to a better understanding of himself (see the comments on 2 Bar, below). In fact, it may have been conceived in order to fulfill this function.

d) Other Texts of the Old Testament and Ancient Judaism. Another myth of the entry of evil* into the world—the Fall of the “Sons of God,” who have intercourse with women in Genesis 6:1–4—has been left to us in a truncated form. Genesis 6:3 leaves the evil tendency of man unexplained. The narrative sequence has gaps; 1 Enoch 6–8 (of which the ancient core dates from the third century B.C.) adds that the angels* gave instruction to men. This motif (as seen, e.g., in Ps 82) is undoubtedly anterior to Genesis 3 and 6. Genesis 3 transforms it in order to maintain human responsibility. Later, the writer of Wisdom of Solomon 2:24 replaced the serpent with “the jealousy of the devil.” Overall, Jewish and Christian tradition* have held that Adam was the direct addressee of the prohibition, and therefore had the principal responsibility. The misogynistic diatribe of Sirach 25:17–26 (see especially verse 24) has no doctrinal weight. According to 1 Timothy 2:14 it was “Adam who was not deceived, but the woman was deceived and became a transgressor.” Although this is without authority, harmful consequences have been derived from it.

At a later stage, Adam was exalted in Sirach 49:16: the collective Adam of Genesis 1:26–27 is thus assimilated to the father* of humanity in Genesis 2 (already an individual in Gn 5:3, but not yet an individual in Gn 5:1–2), with the implications of kingly dignity that Philo Judaeus (c. 15 to 10–c. 45 to 50) recognizes. Tobit 8:6 evokes the sanctity of marriage* with the figures of Adam and Eve. The Wisdom of Solomon 10:1 has Wisdom intervening immediately after Adam's transgression: "she delivered him from his transgression, and gave him strength to rule all things"; he remains "the first-formed father of the world." Conversely, the negative role of Adam is accentuated, notably at the end of the first century of our era. First and foremost, this role is a causal one. According to (the extracanonical) 4 Ezra 3:7, evil has prevailed because of Adam, even though the law* was also present in his "evil heart" (4 Ezr 3:20–22). This pessimistic version of the doctrine of the two "inclinations," which occupies a position within Judaism analogous to that of original sin in Christianity, comes closest to Romans 5, which very likely predates it. This role can also be reduced to that of an example. When (the extracanonical) 2 Baruch (which is contemporaneous with 2 Ez) declares: "O Adam, what have you done to the whole of your posterity?" (2 Bar 48:42), the reference is to death and other evils (2 Bar 56:6), but each person is responsible for his own destiny. Put on guard by the story of the first transgression, "everyone is his own Adam" (2 Bar 54:15), this doctrine prefigures the opinions of Eastern theology, rather than Augustinian views.

e) New Testament. References to Adam are to be found mainly in Paul's Letters to the Corinthians and the Romans, in which several allusions are made, forming the basis of moral exhortations.

In Matthew 19:4 ff. and Mark 10:5–8 Jesus*, questioned about divorce, refers once to Genesis 1:27 ("male and female he created them") and to 2:24 ("they become one flesh"). The name of Adam does not appear in the Gospels, except at Luke 3:38, where the genealogy of Jesus is traced back to Adam and, through him, to God.

Paul (c. 10–c. 67) presents Adam and Christ* as two contrasting archetypes. Death, sin, and the deprivation of grace* have come through one of them; through the other, there is a reentry into grace, a "new creation," and the promise* of life. However, the grace received infinitely exceeds the evil caused. Paul has no interest in speculating about Adam. Living at the time when the typology was being developed, Paul did not need to explain his theology with a "Gnostic myth of a Redeemer" (gnosis*). In 1 Corinthians 15, the parallel between Adam and Christ (the "first" and "second" Adams) takes two forms. In 15:21, the first brings death, the second life. Later (15:45–49), the first is made from dust by God, the other is a "man of heaven" (15:48) who has become a "life-giving spirit" (15:45) to the benefit of a renewed humanity. In Romans 5:12–21, Paul returns to the parallel between Adam and Christ, and the asymmetry between the consequences of their actions. This text is the principal scriptural source of the Christian theology of original sin and of justification*, but three centuries separated Augustine* (354–430) from Paul: his words must be read for themselves, while taking account of his rhetorical models. In Paul's eyes, Adam is certainly a historical figure in the same sense as Jesus is (Rom 5:14), but both continue to be conceived in a symbolic mode, as type and antitype. It is difficult to reach a conclusion about the type of causality attributed to Adam's act, because of the obscurity of eph' ho pantas hemarton (Rom 5:12), but in Romans 5:1–8, 39, the emphasis is placed on the experience of sin, as of Salvation, which is incommensurably greater. Romans 5:12–21 sheds more light on sin than on Adam himself, thanks to the rabbinical formula of qal ve-chômer (a fortiori, or "much more shall," used four times in 5:9–21). In spite of everything, Paul takes a more somber view of Adam's act than his Jewish predecessors did.

References to Adam are not always definite. In Romans 7:7–13, Paul describes the first person's experience of moral distress. Is he speaking of Adam, of himself before his conversion*, or of himself after it? The problem seems to be insoluble. In Philippians 2:5–11, the obedience of Christ is celebrated as the inverse of a compelled act by a creature in revolt against God. Is this a reference to Adam, to Lucifer, as in Isaiah 14:12, or to the angels in 1 Enoch 5–6? The text, which is poetic, may have more than one interpretation.

- R. Scroggs (1946), The Last Adam, Oxford.
- H. Wildberger (1965), "Das Abbild Gottes, Gen 1, 26–30," ThZ 21, 245–59, 481–501.
- W.H. Schmidt (1964), Die Schöpfungsgeschichte der Priesterschrift, WMANT.
- J. Barr (1968), "The Image of God in the Book of Genesis," BJRL 51, 11–26; (1972), "Man and Nature—The Ecological Controversy and the Old Testament," BJRL 55, 9–32.
- C. Westermann (1974), Genesis 1–11, Neukirchen-Vluyn.
- R. Murray (1975), Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition, Cambridge.
- J. Vermeulen (1980), "Le récit du paradis et la question des origines du Pentateuque," Bijdr 41, 230–50.
- R. Martin (1983²), Carmen Christi, Grand Rapids.
- P. Beauchamp (1987), "Création et fondation de la Loi," in La création dans l'Orient ancien (coll.), Paris, 139–80.
- J. Briand (1987), "Gn 2–3 et la création du couple humain," ibid., 123–38.
- P. Beauchamp (1990), L'un et l'autre Testament, vol. 2: Accomplir les Écritures, chap. 3: "L'homme, la femme et le serpent," Paris.
- P. O'Brien (1991), The Epistle to the Philippians, Grand Rapids.

J. Procopé (1991), "Hochmut," RAC 15, 795–858.
 R. Murray (1992), The Cosmic Covenant, London.

ROBERT MURRAY

See also Angels; Animals; Anthropology; Augustinianism; Cosmos; Creation; Death; Demons; Filiation; Myth; Pauline Theology; Sin, Original; Temptation; Woman

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

a) Patristic and Medieval Theology. The figure of Adam took on an increasing importance over the course of the first Christian centuries. A growing number of apocryphal works dealt with him, or carried his name; rabbinical thought developed a whole mythic elaboration of his character; and there were many Gnostic myths* of a protological orientation. Within patristic theology*, Adam was above all the occasion for treatments of general anthropological themes; and when the primitive church* began to take an even greater interest in Adam himself, and in his creation*, this was chiefly out of a concern to define the true nature of humanity. Indeed, it was Adam before the Fall, with the gifts and qualities that he lost as a result of his transgression, that defined an ideal humanity, the condition that humanity would rediscover at the moment of resurrection*.

The Apostolic* Fathers and the apologists* make several references to Adam, but the first to study him seriously was Irenaeus* (c. 120 to 140–c. 200 to 203), in the course of his struggle against gnosis*. Like Theophilus of Antioch (late second century), Irenaeus represents Adam and Eve as children. However, by contrast to Theophilus, for whom Adam was neither mortal nor immortal, but capable of becoming one or the other depending on his attitude to God*, Irenaeus thinks that Adam was immortal in the beginning and became mortal because of his disobedience, his refusal to recognize God as Lord. Before the Fall, Adam had self-confidence (parresia) before God, and was endowed with liberty* and knowledge. His domination of the earth extended to the angels*, but it was not yet manifested because he was still a child. Adam and Eve were not yet old enough to have children, and were entirely unaware of concupiscence. Irenaeus attributes this fact as much to the breath that had given them life (a breath in direct relation with the Holy* Spirit), as to that "robe of sanctity" that Adam "wore from the Spirit" but lost because of his disobedience. Although they were allowed to stray "from the beginning" (ab initio), Adam and Eve were not annihilated, but were "recapitulated" in Christ*, the new Adam, and Mary*, the new Eve, and their salvation* is evidence for the universal nature of the economy of salvation.

Other Greek Fathers* emphasize Adam's perfection before the Fall. Clement of Alexandria* (150–c. 215 to 215) also regards Adam and Eve as children, but after him this conception of them disappeared, and Saint Ephraem Syrus (c. 306–73) criticizes it as "pagan." Clement links the idea that Adam was a child to that of his development: Adam had certainly been created perfect, but that meant that he was perfectly capable of acquiring virtue* through the application of his free will, not that he already possessed a plenitude of virtue. This point of view is peculiar to Clement. John of Damascus (c. 675–c. 749) summarizes the teachings of the Fathers by writing that God created man innocent, righteous, free from all sadness and anxiety, and endowed with every virtue and goodness. Clement also has a personal conception of the action* of disobedience that constitutes the Fall: he sees in it a premature use of sexuality, even though, in itself, sexuality is natural to human beings. This specifically sexual notion of Adam's sin* is a rare one among the Fathers. It is true that some of the Greek Fathers seem to have believed that human sexuality was originally latent and was not experienced until after the Fall, for it had been created solely because of it. In general, however, the Fathers tend to conceive the Fall as an apostasy, an act of turning away from God, and, sometimes, in a more Platonic context (see Platonism*, Christian), as an act of turning toward the things of the body and the senses (e.g., see Gregory of Nyssa, PG 44; Maximus* the Confessor, PG 90). The idea that death* is a consequence of the Fall, and that Adam was therefore originally endowed with immortality, can be found in all the texts. According to Athanasius*, Adam, filled with grace from the beginning, had self-confidence before God and devoted himself to intellectual contemplation*. According to Cyril* of Alexandria and John of Damascus, Adam lived in the contemplation of God so far as his nature permitted him to do so. According to the homilies attributed to Macarius, the Holy Spirit was present with Adam in paradise, instructing him and inspiring his behavior—but this did not remove from Adam either his “natural thoughts” or his desire to realize them. According to John of Damascus, grace was the original condition of humanity, and was given so that humanity could live in communion* with God. One finds everywhere the idea that Adam possessed knowledge and wisdom*, which is why he received the privilege to call the animals* (Gn 2:19–20), but no special attention was paid to the question of the “infused” nature of this knowledge (see Sir 17:6 f.). According to Cyril of Alexandria, however, Adam did not acquire this knowledge with the passage of time, as we do, but had it from the beginning. According to other Fathers, Adam knew of the existence of good* and evil* even before the Fall, but thereafter this knowledge became a matter of experience (e.g., John Chrysostom*).

For the most part, the earliest Latin authors, above all Tertullian*, limit themselves to reprising these views. It was the Pelagian controversy that led the West, and principally Augustine*, to undertake a more profound reflection upon Adam. According to Augustine, Adam was fully adult. He had direct experience* of God, who appeared to him and spoke with him, although this does not necessarily mean that he perceived God through his physical senses. In paradise, Adam and Eve experienced neither spiritual disturbance nor physical disorder, since, in the natural condition of humanity before the Fall, all the parts of the body and all the motions of the soul* were subject to the will, which was itself subject to God, so much so that even procreation* would have taken place by voluntary decision, in the tranquillity of the spirit, and not in a state of passionate excitation. This harmonious submission of the body to the soul was due to the divine grace that Adam enjoyed in paradise. When he lost it because of his disobedience, he became subject to the desires of the flesh*: since he had not wished to obey, it was just that his desires no longer obeyed him. The Second Council* of Orange (529) confirmed that Adam had been created in a state of grace (can. 19).

Scholasticism* offered a systematic theology of the original condition of Adam. According to Thomas* Aquinas, Adam was created in full maturity of spirit and body, ready to have children, and endowed with an infused knowledge, comprising both knowledge of natural things and knowledge of supernatural* purposes. Aquinas accepts that Adam did not ordinarily see God in his essence, even if, perhaps, he experienced this sort of ecstasy during the sleep into which God plunged him (Gn 2:21), but, according to Aquinas, Adam had a much greater knowledge* of God than we do. He also thinks that, if Adam had not sinned, he would not have known error. Peter Lombard

(c. 1100–1160) and Alexander of Hales (c. 1186–1245) distinguish between two types of grace: the assistance given at the moment of creation—which made man capable of avoiding evil and living without sin, but not of doing good—and sanctifying grace, which makes man capable of doing good, living spiritually, and attaining eternal life*. By contrast, according to Aquinas Adam possessed sanctifying grace from his creation, and this was associated, as it was in Augustine, with the harmonious submission of the body to the soul, of the inferior powers to reason*, and of reason to God, making Adam capable of meritorious acts. However, Aquinas does not identify sanctifying grace with original justice*: the first is the efficient cause of the second, not its formal constituent. In his original condition, Adam was not disturbed by any ungovernable passions*, and had all the virtues appropriate to his condition: he was therefore capable of committing only venial sins. The Council of Trent* affirmed that Adam possessed “sanctity and justice” before the Fall (fifth session, cans. 1 and 2), but did not raise the question of the moment when he received sanctifying grace: in this regard it followed in the mainstream of the councils, which were always more reserved than the theologians on the subject of Adam.

b) Modern and Contemporary Theology. While the general acceptance of the theory of evolution*, originally proposed by Darwin, has forced theologians to rethink much of the teaching concerning the creation and original state of man, the required change of perspective occurred earlier, in the 18th and early 19th centuries, when Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744–1803), for example, reworked the concept of the image of God in terms of destiny: that is, the image is not something that mankind once had and has since lost, but something toward which we are progressing. This idea of the gradual and historical “humanizing” of man was complemented by a renewed attention to biblical criticism, especially by J. G. Eichhorn (1752–1827), which began to see the creation narratives in terms of myth* or saga. These two developments, later combined with Darwinism, prompted Protestant* theologians from Friedrich Schleiermacher* to Ernst Troeltsch (1865–1923) to abandon the idea of an original perfect estate of Adam, which was subsequently lost by the Fall, and to propose, in their various ways, alternatives that equated human perfection with the destiny or goal that man still has to attain.

One of the most important and interesting attempts to reinstate the doctrine of the original state, by giving it a new form, is that of Kierkegaard*. This is elaborated not so much in terms of an original historical beginning, a “fantastic assumption” of theology, but as a suprahistorical state. Kierkegaard wanted to explain the relation between the first sin and hereditary sin (see original sin*), and so needed to recall the figure of Adam, for to explain Adam's sin is to explain hereditary sin. This is due to the basic character of human existence: "man is an individual, and as such simultaneously himself and the whole race," so that the individual participates in the race and vice versa. As a state, this is the perfection of man. But it is also a contradiction, for the individual is not the race, and, as such, it is "the expression of a task." In the opening pages of Sygdommen til døden (1849; The Sickness unto Death), Kierkegaard describes how this task cannot be accomplished, and so produces despair. The "task" of reconciling the individual nature of man's self to his identity with the race of men results in the consciousness of a lost identity. The "original state" of man, together with the "Fall," thus becomes suprahistorical, but no less real.

With the leitmotiv of man "caught in contradiction," E. Brunner (1889–1966) develops Kierkegaard's thought as he also seeks to understand an original state based on an analysis of anxiety. Theology proposes to interpret man's dual experience of "grandeur" and "misery" as the conflict that sets man's origin against the contradiction (the Fall) opposed to this origin.

Brunner accepts the idea that there is "nothing left" of the traditional Christian picture of man's "origin." When he refers to the "origin state," he speaks of a man who has his original state in the thought, the will, and the creative action of God. The original state must thus be differentiated (yet not cut off) from man's empirical beginnings (individually, in the womb; as a race, in earliest "man"). It is only by this "origin" that we can understand the present state of man, who is living in opposition to it. Thus, for Brunner, the original state is not a historical or prehistorical period, but a "historic moment," that of the divinely created origin, which we know only in the conflict we experience with its opposite, that is, with sin.

In these and similar attempts, such as those of R. Niebuhr and H. Thielicke, to give a new sense to the concept of the original state, although man has in some sense lost his original identity or vocation, this is not explained in strictly historical terms, but is postulated as a suprahistorical presupposition explaining man's present existence. While these "existential" reinterpretations of the original state and Fall evade the problems raised by the theory of evolution*, doubts have been raised as to whether they offer a sustainable version of the traditional teaching. What, for instance, does recasting the term origin, from a historical beginning to the source of creation, imply for the figure of Adam? Furthermore, does not the concept of the "loss" of an original perfection imply the initial possession of that perfection, and, moreover, a chronological sequence of events?

Rather than elaborate such existential interpretations, modern Roman Catholic theology, on the other hand, has tended to attempt to establish a harmony between traditional theology and science (the sciences* of nature). While some theories of evolutionism, such as the multiple origin of the human race (monogenesis*/polygenesis), have been challenged as being incompatible with the teaching on original sin*, the basic framework of the traditional doctrine is maintained by pointing out that paleontology cannot disprove divine intervention in history. Thus, the direct creation by God of each human soul can be reaffirmed. Similarly, the special friendship between the first man and God need not be excluded on account of the supposedly primitive existence of the first man, while his special endowments can be interpreted as possibilities rather than realized perfections.

Abandoning both the existential interpretation and the program of demythologizing the Scriptures initiated by Rudolf Bultmann*, which considers the use of myth to reflect a mode of conception obsolete for the scientific thinking of modern man, and building on the work done in the field of comparative religion (especially by M. Éliade), contemporary theology has seen a return to viewing the Genesis accounts of the creation of Adam and his original state in terms of myth, or more precisely, as an etiological narrative. The location of myth in the primal age enables it to function as the basis for the present world order, as its legitimization rather than as a primitive explanation (understood by analogy to modern explanation). Moreover, an essential element in the structure of myth is its connection with the cult through which it is represented and reexperienced. However, the various elements of Babylonian mythology that supplied the imagery for the Genesis accounts, by being incorporated into the chronology of these accounts, lost the ability to be reenacted in a cult. There occurred what Pannenberg describes as a "historicization of myth." The mythical elements are used as images for the purpose of explanation: the desire of man and woman for each other, the pains of childbirth, the toil involved in our experience of work*, and, finally, death (Gn 2:23, 3:16–19). Mythical imagery is used to depict, by contrast with our present experience, a different and better mode of life, which man originally had and lost. More important, however, is the correspondence between the original state and the idea of an eschatological perfection. Within the Bible, the imagery used for paradise and Adam's original state is also used to describe the future age of the Messiah. But rather than being a simple return to the primal age, as the cyclical nature of myth would demand, the original state is not simply repeated in the eschatological age, but is itself surpassed and brought to perfection. Thus, instead of viewing the Genesis account of Adam in terms of the historical origins of the human race, contemporary theology has inscribed its protology within eschatology*, so that Adam is again understood in terms of the Pauline* typology of Adam and Christ*.

- S. Kierkegaard (1844), Begrebet angst. (English trans., The Concept of Anxiety, Tr. R. Thomte, Princeton, 1980); (1849), Sygdommen til døden. (English trans., The Sickness unto Death, Tr. H. V. Hong, Princeton, 1980).
- J.B. Kors (1922), La justice primitive et le péché originel d'après saint Thomas, Kain (Belgium).
- A. Slomkowski (1928), L'état primitif de l'homme dans la tradition de l'Église avant saint Augustin, Paris.

- I. Onings (1936), "Adam," in DSp 1, 187–95.
- E. Brunner (1937), Der Mensch im Widerspruch, Berlin.
- M. Éliade (1949), Le mythe de l'éternel retour: Archétypes et répétitions, Paris. (English trans., The Myth of the Eternal Return: Cosmos and History, London, 2nd Ed. 1965, Repr. 1989.)
- B.S. Childs (1960), Myth and Reality in the Old Testament, London.
- G. W. H. Lampe (Ed.) (1961), "Adam," in PGL, 26–29.
- A. Patfoort (Tr.), H.D. Gardeil (Comm.) (1963), ST Ia, q. 90–102: Les origines de l'homme, Paris.
- W. Pannenberg (1972), Christentum und Mythos, Gütersloh; (1983), Anthropologie in theologischer Perspektive, Göttingen.

JOHN BEHR

See also Anthropology; Creation; Death; Evolution; Monogenesis/Polygenesis; Sin, Original; Soul-Heart-Body; Woman

Adam of Saint-Victor. See Saint-Victor, School of

Adam of Wodeham. See Nominalism

Adoptionism

The word adoptionism originated in the eighth century, at the time of the Spanish controversy (see below); the meaning of this word was extended to characterize what may be considered more as a (permanent) temptation of theology* than a heresy*. It is the temptation of those whose conception of God cannot allow that, while yet remaining God, he might communicate himself to the extent of introducing a creature within the mystery* of divine generation. Christ*, therefore, whatever his dignity, remains a creature who has been adopted and chosen. The interest inherent in the study of adoptionism can be found in identifying the reasons that led some Christians to yield to the above-mentioned temptation.

There are three important stages in the adoptionist temptation: ancient church*, Spanish crisis, and Scholastic controversy. In the early days of the church, which had to develop its own formulas of faith within milieus as various as the Judaist, the Hellenistic, and the Gnostic (gnosis*) ones, the trends were very complex.

In Judeo-Christianity of the ebionitic form, adoptionism is perhaps to be associated with a particularly high evaluation of Christian baptism*, which is considered to bestow filial adoption (huiiothesia) at the end of the symbolic fight against the forces of evil*. In this context, Christ appears as the man in whom such an adoption has materialized in an exemplary manner, making him the Messiah*, and in a certain sense the root of all baptismal sanctification to come. Such ideas are also found, though with no apparent liturgical influence, in the early forms of Hellenistic Christianity, from Theodotus “the Byzantine” to Theodotus “the Banker,” Artemon, and Paul of Samosata. Here the ideas are given a more intellectual support thanks to Greek logic, which leads to an emphasis on the disjunction between God and man based on the irreducibility of univocal concepts. However, as J. Wolinsky remarks, “reducing Christ to being only one man went much too directly against the faith of Christians for adoptionism to have had a profound impact on the history of doctrines” (Sesboüé [Ed.], History of Dogmas I, Paris, 1994).

The Spanish adoptionism of the end of the eighth century is associated with the Spanish tradition of fighting for Nicene orthodoxy* (Councils* of Toledo). In order to better establish the divine nature of the Son of God, whether against Arianism* or, inversely, against some residual forms of modalism*, Christ’s humanity and divinity are separated from one another. His humanity is thus considered to be “adopted.” Christ’s filiation* is considered natural as far as his divinity is concerned, but adoptive and the result of grace* as far as his humanity is concerned: unigenitus in natura, primogenitus in adoptione et gratia (PL 101, 1324). Adoptionism is here associated with the names of Elipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel. Its refutation (propter unitatem personae, unus Dei Filius et idem hominis filius, perfectus Deus, perfectus homo, ibid., 1337) belongs to the body of dogmatic options of the Council of Frankfurt (794).

Scholastic adoptionism may have a more philosophical origin, being associated with the use of certain inadequately mastered logical categories that had been recently rediscovered in theological thinking. Schematically, Scholastic thinking in this area unfolds in the following way: 1) It is not possible to put “God” and “man” in an attributive relationship in such a way that formulas such as “God is man, man is God” are improper. 2) That being stated, since “God” is unquestionably substance and can be the subject of attribution, it is not possible to say that “man” designates substance; in technical terms, he is neither persona nor aliquid. 3) How then is it possible to speak of the union of God and man in Christ? This thought process is at the root of the three positions put forward by Peter

Lombard in the Sentences (I. III, d. 6–11), and the masters of early Scholasticism from Abelard fall within any of these three positions. First there is the theory of the habitus, which considers Christ’s humanity to be the “clothing” of his divinity. Second, the theory of the assumptus proposes that it is a man who is being assumed. Finally, there is the theory of subsistence. While this last theory heralds the thinking of high Scholasticism* on hypostatic* union, the first two favor a resurgence of the theme of adoption.

The early Scholastic masters in all likelihood lacked an in-depth analysis of the distinction between person* and nature, which might have allowed them to see clearly that, on the one hand, filiation always concerns the person and that, on the other hand, logical attributes have their own specific economy where Christ is concerned (communication of the idioms).

Can we say that modernity produces a revival of the adoptionist “temptation,” precisely on account of the crisis affecting our thinking on God? It does not appear to be so. Newton’s christological thinking, for instance, is consciously Arian. Spinoza’s and Lessing’s vision of Christ is that of the Summus Philosophus, perfect educator of humankind, outside of any Trinitarian vision of God (Trinity*), and thus of any perspective of incarnation*, even by adoption. The contemporary Scotist school, with which the names of Déodat de Basly and Léon Seiller are associated, takes up again the theme of the assumptus homo, but does not fall formally into adoptionism. Nowadays, the adoptionist temptation could well play into certain types of “humanistic Christology*” which are notable for the difficulty they have in expressing the divine aspect of Jesus Christ in proper and direct terms (that is, not only by allusion or imagery), perhaps precisely because such Christologies do not have at their disposal a language for speaking about God.

- E. Portalié (1902), “Adoptionisme,” DThC 1, 403–21.
- Déodat de Basly (1928), “L’assumptus homo: L’emmêlement de trois conflits, Pélagé, Nestorius, Apollinaire,” La France franciscaine XI, 265–313.
- G. Bardy (1933), “Paul de Samosate,” DThC 12, 46–51.
- L. Seiller (1944), L’activité humaine du Christ selon Duns Scot, Paris.
- L. Ott (1953), “Das Konzil von Chalkedon in der Frühscholastik,” in Grillmeier-Bacht (Ed.), Das Konzil von Chalkedon, Geschichte und Gegenwart, vol. II, Würzburg, 909–10.
- J. Daniélou (1958), Théologie du judéo-christianisme, Paris (2nd Ed. 1991), 284–93.
- A. Landgraf (1965), Dogmengeschichte der Frühscholastik II, 1, Regensburg, 116–37.
- A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- A. Orbe (intr.) (1985), Il Cristo, Milan, xlvii–lviii.

GHISLAIN LAFONT

See also Christ/Christology; Incarnation

Aelred of Rievaulx. See Bernard of Clairvaux

Agape

From the end of the apostolic era (Jude 12 and Ignatius of Antioch, Letter to the Smyrnians 8:1), Christians had given the name agape to communal meals that were distinct from the Eucharist* and were accompanied by prayers*. The word agape was taken from the Greek word for charity, with its emphasis on the communal aspect.

New Testament narratives of the Eucharist show that a link originally existed between the celebration of the Eucharist and a fraternal meal (on the subject of the wine cup blessed after the meal, see 1 Cor 11:25 and Lk 22:20). But there is no further evidence of this link after the New Testament, except perhaps in the milk and honey that, according to the Apostolic Tradition, were offered to the newly baptized between the taking of the bread and the taking of the wine (Gy 1959). These were perhaps also offered on the evening of Maundy Thursday, though this particular hypothesis has not been proved. In the time of transition between the apostolic era and the period that followed it, the brief text entitled the Didache (Teaching of the Twelve Apostles) mentions religious meals, though historians disagree about their nature.

Agape is frequently mentioned in writings of the second and third centuries, and it is described in the Apostolic Tradition (chap. 26). Thereafter, it seems to have gradually lost its importance.

- P.-M. Gy (1959), “Die Segnung von Milch und Honig in der Osternacht,” in B. Fischer, J. Wagner (Ed.), Paschatis Sollemnia: Festschrift J.A. Jungmann, Freiburg, 206–12.
- W.-D. Hauschild (1977), “Agapen,” TRE 1, 748–53.
- W. Rordorf, A. Tuillier (1978), La doctrine des douze Apôtres (Didachè), Paris.
- E. Mazza (1992), L’anafora eucaristica: Studi sulle origini, Rome.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Eucharist

Agnosticism

I. Overview

Appearing late in French, being adopted from English (T. H. Huxley 1869), the word agnosticism, in the literal sense, denotes the thesis that God* is unknowable, a tenet that leads to a suspension of judgment as to his existence. In this respect, agnosticism is related to skepticism and attempts to establish a distinction between the dogmatic negation of the existence of God and a simple refusal to decide. The critical dimension characteristic of the agnostic suspension of judgment is, however, ambivalent. By placing God above the order of the knowable, it may simply be a way of recognizing his eminence. But by saying of God that he has no existence for thought, there is also a possibility of denying him any kind of existence at all. Historically, it is the affinities between agnosticism and atheism* that have prevailed.

2. Philosophical Background

a) Skepticism. In ancient Pyrrhonism, skeptical doubt extends as far as knowledge of the gods, although Sextus Empiricus “asserts without dogmatism that the gods exist” (Hypotoposes III:2). This assertion is based on the simple anthropological fact of piety: it would be impossible for the divine not to exist. But the assertion defies demonstration, and we can form no concept of God (Hypotoposes III:3): “Similarly, since we are ignorant of the essence of God, we are incapable of knowing or conceiving of his attributes*” (Hypotoposes III:4).

In Hume’s Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, the critique of proofs by analogy* on which metaphysical theism (Deism*/Theism) is based leads to an agnosticism that seems compatible with fideism*.

b) Rationalism. Although Immanuel Kant* explicitly asserts the possibility of knowledge* of God based on analogy (Prolegomena §58), his critique of speculative proofs of the existence* of God, principally of the “ontological” proof, leads to the assertion that the Absolute is unknowable. The novelty of Kantianism in this regard is that it makes possible a new form of agnosticism, one that no longer depends on assuming a skeptical position toward knowledge in general, but is the corollary of an affirmation of scientific knowledge of the phenomenal world. If God is unknowable, this is because he is not an object, in the sense that modern natural science gives to the term. Once the determinism of the necessary laws of nature is accepted, God becomes an unnecessary hypothesis (Laplace).

3. Theological and Anthropological Aspects

Agnosticism cannot appeal to the theos agnotos of Paul (Acts 17:23), who is an “unknown god” of the Greeks and not an unknowable God. It was against agnosticism and other positions that the Second Vatican Council, relying on traditional affirmations (such as Rom 1:19–23), defined the possibility of a natural access by man to God. It insisted that whether it is ultimately joined to atheism or in solidarity with fideism, agnosticism is not only refuted by a God who reveals himself, it is also contrary to reason*, which needs no divine illumination to recognize the existence of a creator of all things.

Agnosticism may also call upon the theological argument that aims to establish the radical transcendence of the divine essence by denying the possibility of attributing to God the names that are suitable for created things. Indeed, for a discursive knowledge of God to be possible, it has to be shown that the use of divine names* derived from human language does not lead to complete ambiguity (see Thomas* Aquinas, Summa contra Gentiles I: chaps. 33–34 and 290–98). Thomas uses analogy as a solution.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) places agnosticism in the perspective of atheism and (in §2128) attributes to it a fundamental ambivalence: “Agnosticism can sometimes include a certain search for God, but it can equally express indifferentism, a flight from the ultimate question of existence, and a sluggish moral conscience. Agnosticism is all too often equivalent to practical atheism.”

Arising, at least in its modern form, in the context of the scientific objectification of reality, agnosticism might nevertheless, as a reaction against that context, maintain a resolutely positive meaning in both theological and anthropological terms. A product of nature, having become an object for the sciences* of nature, humankind may save its dignity only by presenting a dimension inaccessible to scientific knowledge. Unknowing then becomes the distinctive characteristic of religion and metaphysics, in an agnosticism that might refer to “learned ignorance” (Nicholas* of Cusa) or to Wittgenstein’s Tractatus. But it is really not certain that the limits of objective knowledge are the limits of the knowable, or that what we cannot speak about objectively we must pass over in silence.

- T. H. Huxley (1894), Science and Christian Tradition, London.
- R. Flint (1903), Agnosticism, Edinburgh and London.
- A. Angénieux (1948), “Agnosticisme,” Cath 1, 219–23.
- F. L. Baumer (1960), Religion and the Rise of Scepticisms, New York.
- J. Splett (1969), “Agnostizismus,” SM(D) 1, 52–55.
- W. Stegmüller (1969), Metaphysik, Skepsis, Wissenschaft, Berlin.
- J. P. Reid (1971), Man without God: An Introduction to Unbelief, London-New York.
- A. Ström, B. Gustafsson (1976), “Agnostizismus,” TRE 2, 91–100.
- H. R. Schlette (1979), Der moderne Agnostizismus, Düsseldorf.
- L. Kolakowski (1982), Religion: If There Is No God..., London.
- G. MacGregor (1983), “Doubt and Belief,” EncRel(E) 4, 424–30.
- Catéchisme de l’Église catholique (1992), Paris, §2127–28.

PHILIBERT SECRETAN

See also Atheism; Existence of God, Proofs of; Knowledge of God; Skepticism, Christian Agony. See Passion

Alain of Lille. See Scholasticism

Albert the Great

1200–1280

The Dominican Albert the Great was the first Scholastic interpreter of the works of Aristotle and teacher of Thomas* Aquinas both in Paris and at the Köln studium. He defended the mendicant orders in response to attacks by secular leaders and was consecrated bishop* of Regensburg (Ratisbon). In 1277 he was behind a last-minute attempt to avoid the condemnation of the Aristotelian theses by Étienne Tempier (naturalism*). Albert left a body of theological works that was as impressive as his philosophical works. His biblical commentaries (on Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Baruch, Daniel, and the minor prophets*) stand beside sermons and systematic theological works: Commentaires des sentences by Pierre Lombard, De Natura Boni, De Bono, Somme de Théologie called “from Paris,” Summa de Mirabili Scientia Dei, called “from Köln” (SC), Commentaries on Divine Names (DN), and the Mystic Theology of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite.

a) Scientific Status of Theology. A militant Aristotelian who acquired encyclopedic scientific knowledge, Albert played a large role in developing a theology conceived as a science, in the philosophical sense of that term. However, although Albert’s theology is modeled on the canons of Aristotelian science, it nevertheless cannot be reduced to the “natural” theology of philosophers. It is a practical science that considers “truth” not as simple truth, but as the “supreme source of beatitude” (summe beatificans) pursued by the “pious intention in the affect and works” (SC I, 3,3; Siedler 13, 65–72). Therefore, if Albert invokes Aristotle in order to explain the “contemplative bliss” that is the goal of a theology understood as “moral and practical” science, it is so that he can make an irreducible distinction between the practical philosophical sciences, which focus on works that are “perfect through the perfection of acquired virtues,” and theology, which involves works “that are perfect through the perfection of virtues instilled by grace*.”

More generally speaking, sacred theology is distinguished from philosophical theology in three ways. First, the “principal object of its principal part” is the God* of the Bible* and not Aristotle’s primary cause or primary motive. Second, the determinations (passiones) of its goal are not the being and its “properties” (to be) but “the Word* incarnate, together with the totality of the sacraments* that is carried out in the Church.” Third, sacred theology is distinguished by the principles of “probation” upon which its arguments are based. With reference to the last of these, what “confirms” a theological argument is not a “maxim” or a “well-known” suggestion, as it is in the case of philosophy, but faith* itself (the content of which established in the conviction defining what is “believed”) and what “precedes faith” as a logical antecedent: that is, the knowledge of Scripture*—in short, “revelation*.” If all sciences, even philosophical sciences, come from God as creator of the “connatural light” in the human mind, theological science is unique in that it comes from God who “reveals through faith.” Thus, theology is ultimately distinguished by the fact that it stems from “another light,” “supra-worldly,” which “shines” and illuminates “within the article of faith,” whereas the light inspiring philosophers shines in the proposition “known to one”: It is, therefore, a science of piety, in the literal sense of the term, scientia secundum pietatem (SC I, 3, 1; Siedler, 47–54, after Ti 1:1): that is, a science founded on the knowledge of theological faith.

b) From Theological Faith to Mystical Theology. The role played by the knowledge* of faith, “the undoubted knowledge of spiritual realities” (DN 2, §76), in Albert’s theology allows him to surmount the traditional debate relating to the superiority of love* over the intellect, something which was affirmed in the 12th century by the school of Saint*-Victor (voluntarism*). Indeed, by rendering the light of faith a theophany* that has an anagogical function (Scripture*, senses of), and by placing faith at the top of the “habitus of grace,” Albert establishes continuity between the “viatic” state (pilgrimage on earth) and celestial bliss. Often described as “intellectualist,” the theology of Albert the Great is rather a theology of the intellect, which, in the same “noetic” framework, involves knowledge of theological faith, the blessed vision, and mystical union. Describing the knowledge of faith in the viatic man (vision fidei in via) as “information of the intellect by the light of faith,” Albert the Great defines the beatific vision* with the theoretical instruments of Peripatetic noesis.

The vision of the chosen people in the heavens is a “junction” between man’s intellect and divine essence, an “intellectual” union, in that “he who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit with him” (1 Cor 6:17), of God and the intellect agent. However, the mystical union, the “theopathic” state that Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite attributes to his teacher, Hierotheus, is also intellectual. In the theophany of mystical darkness the intellect receives “an impulse stemming from the light of glory,” which “converts” it and “brings it back into the unity of the Father.” The theology of the intellect is thus the central piece in the theology of grace and the theology of the divine missions (Trinity*). The gift of infused wisdom* and the love of charity, in their very connection, bring about the fulfillment of theological faith in mystical contemplation*.

• Sancti doctoris Ecclesiae Alberti Magni, Ordinis Praedicatorum, Episcopi Opera omnia (Köln Ed.), Münster, Aschendorff, 1951.

Commentary on “Mystical Theology” Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, Tr. É.-H. Wéber (1993)

Both editions by P. Jammy (Lyon, 1651) and A. Borgnet (repr. of the former, Paris, 1890–99) are incomplete, faulty, and feature nonauthentic texts.

♦ F. Ruello (1963), Les “Noms divins” et leurs “raisons” selon saint Albert le Grand commentateur du De Divinis nominibus, Paris.

A. de Libera (1984), La Mystique rhénane: D’Albert le Grand à Maître Eckhart, Paris (2nd Ed. 1994); (1990), Albert le Grand et la philosophie, Paris.

ALAIN DE LIBERA

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Deity; Intellectualism; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism; Scholasticism; Thomas Aquinas

Albigensian. See Catharism

Alexander of Hales. See Scholasticism

Alexandria, School of

It is customary to contrast the School of Alexandria to the School* of Antioch, but these two expressions conceal a great variety of phenomena. The expression “School of Alexandria” (see Le Boulluec, “L’école d’Alexandrie: De quelques aventures d’un concept historiographique,” in coll. 1987) refers on the one hand to a certain method of exegesis* and on the other to strictly theological questions connected successively to the very origins of Alexandrian Christianity, to the fight against Arianism*, and to the Nestorian crisis.

a) Historical Background. Around the second century B.C., the large Jewish community of Alexandria produced the translation* of the Hebrew Bible into Greek, known as the Septuagint. According to a tradition recorded by Eusebius of Caesarea (HE II, 16), the apostle* Mark was the first to evangelize Egypt, but very little is known about the earliest Christian community of Alexandria. Pagan and Christian philosophers succeeded one another in Alexandria, among them Pantaenus and Clement, before the establishment of the Didaskaleion, a catechetical school that was officially dependent on the church*. Origen was its first leader, during the episcopate of Demetrius (189–231), and Didymus was his distant successor in the late fourth century. Hellenism, Judeo-Christianity, and Gnosticism, with its two illustrious representatives, Basilides and Valentinus (see Ritter in coll. 1987), thus formed the crucible in which Christians both appropriated and challenged ways of thought and modes of expression that were fruitful for the development of Christian orthodoxy. Although the influence of Alexandria was soon recognized, so that it was even made a patriarchate*, its relations with the Christianity of the Egyptian interior—and in the fourth century with nascent monasticism*—were sometimes difficult. Crises and schisms* followed one after another in Alexandria, as witnessed in particular by the troubled history of the episcopate of Athanasius*.

b) Alexandrian Exegesis. This was not limited, as a simplistic contrast between Alexandria and Antioch might lead one to believe, to a triumph of allegory over the literal meaning of the Scriptures*. To begin with, it was rooted in the secular philosophical tradition. The Neoplatonist commentators on Plato and Aristotle had established rules of interpretation that the Christians adopted (see Hadot 1987, on Origen’s commentary on The Song of Songs). For their part, Gnostic influences, also bearing the stamp of Platonism, oriented the understanding of Scripture in an esoteric direction. For example, Clement frequently referred to the Eleusinian mysteries to illustrate by analogy the way in which the teachings of Christ* should be transmitted and understood (Strom. VI, 15). Knowledge was not given to everyone (Strom. V, 3), and for Clement as for Origen, there were hidden meanings in Scripture, so that recourse to allegorical exegesis was necessary in order to reveal them. If Origen, who became very influential in both East and West, was the master of this technique (Treatise of Principles IV, 1–3; see Lubac* 1950), he was principally indebted to Philo of Alexandria (first century B.C.), himself heir to the dual Jewish and Greek tradition (see Nikiprowetzky 1977 and Runnia 1995).

The exegetical work of Hilary of Poitiers follows in the tradition of Origen, and it was thanks to the Latin translations of Origen’s works, made by Rufinus and Jerome as early as the fourth century, that Alexandrian hermeneutics* was disseminated in the West. The doctrine of the four senses of Scripture, put forward by Cassian and later by Gregory* the Great, was also derived from the triple sense defined by Origen (see Simonetti, “Quelques considérations sur l’influence et la destinée de l’alexandrinisme en Occident,” in coll. 1987).

c) Alexandrian Theologies of the Logos. The central place given by the Alexandrians to the doctrine of the Logos (Word*) had two consequences: Alexandrian thought played a decisive role in Christology*, and there was a recurring risk of heterodox deviations. The Johannine uses of the term Logos certainly provided a scriptural basis, but the complex philosophical heritage of the notion and its use (in the plural) by the Gnostics gave rise to ambiguities from the outset. Clement’s discourse on the eternal Logos of God* and its manifestation in the flesh opposed the singleness of the Logos to the Gnostic systems, but it could seem very much like Docetism*. After Clement, Origen seems not to have tied the mediating role of the Logos solely to the Incarnation* (see his commentary on 1 Tm 2:5 in Princ. II, 6, 1; Contra Celsum III, 34). Athanasius, relying similarly on an affirmation of the preeminence of the Logos in redemption as well as in creation, confined himself to a theology of the Logos-sarx (Grillmeier 1979) and in a sense left in suspension the questions of the soul* and of human knowledge of Christ. These Christologies took their place within a cultural model that was primarily Platonic (Simonetti 1992), and it was only later developments in Cappadocia which were to free them from this.

- R. Cadiou (1935), La jeunesse d'Origène: Histoire de l'école d'Alexandrie au début du IIIe s., Paris.
- C. Mondésert (1944), Clément d'Alexandrie: Introduction à l'étude de sa pensée religieuse à partir de l'Écriture, Paris.
- J. Guillet (1947), "Les exégèses d'Alexandrie et d'Antioche, conflit ou malentendu?" RSR 34, 257–302.
- H. de Lubac (1950), Histoire et Esprit: L'intelligence de l'Écriture d'après Origène, Paris.
- V. Nikiprowetzki (1977), L'interprétation de l'Écriture chez Philon d'Alexandrie: Son caractère et sa portée, Leyden.
- A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, vol. 1, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- M. Simonetti (1985), Lettera e/o allegoria: Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome.
- B.A. Pearson, J.E. Goehring (Ed.) (1986), The Roots of Egyptian Christianity: Studies in Antiquity and Christianity, Philadelphia.

- I. Hadot (1987), "Les introductions aux commentaires exégétiques chez les auteurs néoplatoniciens et les auteurs chrétiens," in M. Tardieu (Ed.), Les règles de l'interprétation, Paris, 99–122.
- Coll. (1987), Alexandria: Hellénisme, judaïsme et christianisme à Alexandrie. Offered to P.C. Mondésert, Paris.
- M. Simonetti (1992), "Modelli culturali nella cristianità orientale del II-III secolo," in De Tertullien aux Mozarabes. Offered to J. Fontaine, Ed. J.-C. Fredouille, Paris, 381–92.
- B. Pouderon (1994), "Le témoignage du Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae sur Athénagore et les origines du Didaskaleion d'Alexandrie," in G. Argoud (Ed.), Science et vie intellectuelle à Alexandrie. (Ier-IIIe s. ap. J.-C.), Mémoires XIV, Saint-Étienne, 163–224.
- D. T. Runnia (1995), Philo and the Church Fathers, Leyden-New York-Köln.

FRANÇOISE VINEL

See also Antioch, School of; Gnosis; Patriarchate; Platonism, Christian; Scripture, Senses of; Stoicism, Christian

Allegory. See Narrative; Scripture, Senses of

Almightiness. See Omnipotence, Divine

Alphonsus Liguori

1696–1787

Alphonsus Liguori was a precocious child. From an affluent family, he received a classical education at home and matriculated in the faculty of law* at the age of 12.

In 1713 he received a doctorate in utroque jure (civil and canon* law) and began practicing law. In 1723 he left the bar and entered a seminary where he studied moral theology*, particularly in the treatise tinged with Jansenist austerity of François Genet (1640–1702), “the leader of the probabiliorists” (Morale de Grenoble, 1677). Ordained as a priest* on 21 December 1726, Liguori’s first parish was in Naples, among the “debauched and dissolute,” then in a backward rural area where there was great ignorance about matters of faith*. In order to foster the evangelization of the countryside, in 1732 Liguori established a congregation of missionary priests, approved in 1749–50 by Benedict XIV under the name of the Institute of the Most Holy Redeemer (the Redemptorists). Addressing the pope* in 1748, he described its purpose: “With the help of missions, teaching, and other exercises, to serve the souls* of the rural poor who are most deprived of spiritual aid, for they often lack ministers, sacraments*, and the divine Word*.”

His pastoral activities, and particularly the practice of confession, led Liguori from probabiliorism to probabilism and then to equiprobabilism. In the seminary and as a young priest, he was an advocate of probabiliorism, which required the adoption in every moral dilemma of the “most probable” opinion: that is to say, in effect, the most certain opinion (tutorism) or the most rigid (rigorism). Along with his rural ministry, Liguori’s move from probabiliorism to probabilism was shaped by the study he made of the Medulla theologiae moralis by the German Jesuit Herman Busenbaum (1600–1688), a balanced probabilist. The Medulla, a fundamental text in the history of casuistry*, was reprinted more than 200 times between 1645, the date of its first edition, and 1776. From this period, after 1748, date several Dissertations and Annotations of the Medulla (which make up the first edition of the Theologia moralis).

Probabilism was introduced by a Dominican of Salamanca, B. Medina (†1580), and consists in maintaining that, in doubtful cases, it is legitimate to follow probable opinion, that is, an articulated opinion supported by strong reasons and approved by the authority of experts (one or more “solemn doctors”). A probable opinion may be followed even if the opposite opinion is more probable. Probability does not refer to mere possibility, but to a proof, in its original meaning: Probabilis means “plausible” or “provable,” in the sense of approvable. In 1762 Liguori published a treatise in Italian, On the Moderate Use of Probable Opinion (Dissertazione sull’uso moderato dell’opinione probabile), in which his doctrine reached its definitive form. It sets forth his system, called “equiprobabilism,” which is based on three major principles. The first states: “If the opinion that is in support of the law* (pro lege) seems certainly more probable, we are obliged to follow it, and we cannot follow the opposite opinion which is in support of liberty*.” This principle brings out the primacy of truth*, insofar as human action must be based on an authentic search for that truth. The second principle asserts: “If the opinion that is in support of liberty is merely probable, or as probable (aeque probabilis) as the one that supports the law, we cannot follow it merely because it is probable.” Liguori emphasizes that a very weak probability is no longer a probability, but only a false appearance of probability. He thus refutes the principle widely accepted in modern times: Qui probabiliter agit, prudenter agit (Whoever acts probably, acts prudently). The third principle holds: “When two opposite opinions are equally probable (aeque probabiles), the opinion in support of liberty enjoys the same probability as the one in support of the law. Consequently, the existence of the law is doubtful.” In order to create obligation, the law must be promulgated in such a way that it establishes the conviction that such a law does indeed exist. If this promulgation is lacking, the law is doubtful and therefore creates no obligation. Liguori thus defends the traditional principle: Lex dubia non obligat.

With equiprobabilism, he brings out three basic notions that, far from being in conflict, balance and mutually support one another: truth, liberty, and conscience. Conscience is here defined as “judgment or diktat” (dictamen; the word comes from Thomas* Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 79, a. 13), a practice of reason* by means of which we judge what is good and to be done or evil and to be avoided.

Through his original development of the primordial role of conscience, Liguori was not merely showing himself to be a follower of the casuists of the century before, whose equiprobabilist system was the latest embodiment of the doctrine of probability, but rather a contemporary of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Liguori set out his system in the Theologia moralis. Adding original exposition to his Annotationes on the Medulla of Busenbaum (1 vol., 1748), he published the two volumes of the second edition in Naples in 1753–55. It was, in effect, an original work. The Theologia moralis, continually revised and expanded, went through several editions during the author’s lifetime (the ninth edition, Venice, 1785, was in three volumes) and many in the 19th century. Indeed, it had considerable influence throughout that century, in particular on the attitude of confessors toward the sexual life of married people and the conditions of procreation*.

Appointed bishop* of Sant’Agata dei Goti in 1762, Liguori did not wish to write a specialist work of theological speculation but to develop a theology at the service of pastoral work and to strengthen the piety of the faithful. Among the many works he wrote, in both Italian and Latin, and ranging from the most highly technical to the most popular, there are 50 devotional texts, including the celebrated The Glories of Mary, one of the most important books of Marian devotion. After the Theologia moralis Liguori composed a number of short treatises, among which should be mentioned The Confessor of Country People (1764; a work preceded by Practical Instruction for Confessors, 1757, an abridgment of Theologia moralis for the use of confessors). It was specifically designed for rural priests, “who are little versed in the study of morals and who cannot buy expensive books, to make them capable of hearing the confessions of country people.”

The practice of confession constitutes an essential aspect of Liguori’s moral theology, which aims to reestablish a relationship of confidence between confessor and penitent and to restore to confession its character of an act of love*. From this point of view it is easy to understand why Liguori opposed the Jansenist practice of delay in sacramental absolution. The postponement of absolution was justified by the frequent relapses of sinners into the same sins*. Liguori took up the distinction between “habitudinary” and “recidivist” that moral theology had developed. The habitudinary confesses for the first time a sin that he has often committed, whereas the recidivist is one who falls into the same sin after confessing it. Refining this distinction, Liguori has no hesitation for the first case: The habitudinary must be absolved if he manifests sincere repentance. The case of the recidivist is more delicate. Liguori observes that, in general, relapses, even if they are frequent, are not incompatible with the resolution to sin no more and are thereby susceptible to absolution. An expert in humanity, Liguori observes that giving absolution is often a better remedy than delaying it. In addition, he was in favor of penance in proportion to the nature of the sin, penance that would not impel the penitent to stay away from the confessional. And in order the better to move toward God*, Liguori favored frequent, indeed daily communion*.

Liguori’s major distinction is that he helped stem austerity within Catholicism and opened the way to a broader moral theology that is more understanding of human weakness. He was canonized in 1839 and declared a doctor* of the church* in 1871. His Theologia moralis, for which he was granted the status of doctor, is no doubt the last major monument of the doctrine of probability. After Liguori, casuistry seems to have entered on an irremediable decline.

- M. de Meulemeester (1933–39), Bibliographie générale des écrivains rédemptoristes (up to 1939), 3 vols., The Hague-Louvain.
- A. Sampers (1953), Bibliographia alphonsiana 1938–53, SHCSR 1; (1957) Bio-bibliographia C.S.S.R., 1938–56, ibid., 5; (1960), Bibliographia scriptorum de systemate morali S. Alfonsi et de probalismo, 1787–1922, ibid., 8; (1971), Bibliographia alfonsiana, 1953–71, ibid., 19; (1972), 1971–72, ibid., 20; (1974), 1972–74, ibid., 22; (1978), 1974–78, ibid., 26.
- Critical edition of the ascetic works by Redemptorists; 7 vols., Rome, 1933 (to be reprinted in 18 vols. by Edizioni di Storia e Letteratura di Roma).
- ♦ J. J. I. von Dollinger, F. H. Reusch (1889), Geschichte des Moralstreitigkeiten in der römischkatholischen Kirche, 2 vols., Nördlingen (repr. Aalen: Scientia Verlag, 1968), vol. I, 356–476.
- C. Liévin (1937), “Alphonse de Liguori,” DSp 1, 357–89.
- J. Guerer (1973), Le ralliement du clergé français à la morale ligurienne: L’abbé Gousset et ses précurseurs (1785–1832), Rome.
- A. Dimatteo (1980), “Il differimento dell’assoluzione in S. Alfonso: Gli abituati o consuetudinari e i recidivi,” SHCSR 28, 353–450.
- T. Rey-Mermet (1982), Le saint du siècle des Lumières: Alphonse de Liguori, Paris.
- L. Vereecke (1986), De Guillaume d’Ockham à saint Alphonse de Liguori: Études d’histoire de la théologie morale moderne, Rome.
- M. Vidal (1986), Frente al rigorismo morale: Benignidad pastoral: Alfonso de Liguori (1696–1787), Madrid.
- D. Capone (1987), “La Theologia moralis di S. Alfonso: Prudenzialità nella scienza casistica per la prudenza nella coscienza,” StMor 25, 27–77.
- T. Rey-Mermet (1987), La morale selon saint Alphonse de Liguori, Paris.
- Coll. (1988), Alphonse de Liguori, pasteur et docteur, Paris.

MASSIMO MARCOCCHI

See also Casuistry; Conscience; Ethics, Sexual; Intention; Jansenism; Mission/Evangelization; Penance; Prudence; Suarez, Francisco

Ambrose of Milan

(337 or 339–97)

Around 370, Ambrose, who belonged to a senatorial family, became governor of the Roman province of Emilia and Liguria. The capital of the province was Milan, and in 374, while the Christians of that city* contested with one another concerning an episcopal election, he intervened to reestablish order and found himself being acclaimed as bishop*. Being only a catechumen at that time, he was baptized hastily and then ordained at the end of the year. During the 22 years of his episcopacy, and boosted by his political experience, he asserted himself, as one of the West's most influential personalities. He played a decisive role in Augustine*'s conversion. Well served by his mastery of Greek, he took inspiration from Philo of Alexandria (first century A.D.), Origen*, Athanasius*, and Basil* the Great, but he still showed real originality in matters concerning spirituality, pastoral work, and ethics*. The recent bilingual edition (Latin-Italian) of his Complete Works (SAEMO, see bibliography) is made up of 13 volumes of exegesis* (practiced according to the allegorical method of the School of Alexandria*), three volumes of moral philosophy and asceticism*, three volumes of dogmatic* texts, four volumes of speeches and letters, and one volume of poetry.

a) Doctrinal Controversies. Ambrose was at first an adversary of the western advocates of Arianism*, as much through his actions as through his writings. Between 377 and 380 he sent Emperor Gratian his major theological treaty, the De fide. For this work, Ambrose borrowed ideas from Athanasius and Hilary* of Poitiers, as well as from Basil, Gregory* of Nazianzus, and Gregory* of Nyssa, but did show himself to be original in places (Simonetti 1975). In 386, when Emperor Valentinian II ordered him to hand over one of Milan's basilicas to the Arians, Ambrose occupied it. In order to inspire courage in his followers, he made them sing hymns of his own composition, more popular than Hilary's. It was because of these hymns that Ambrose came to be regarded as the founder of Latin hymnology.

In his De Spiritu Sancto (381) he championed the divinity of the Holy* Spirit, notably by relying on the baptismal formula of Matthew 28:19 and on the mention of the Spirit in Genesis 1:2, as his Greek masters had done. He fought against Apollinarianism* by reaffirming Genesis in his De Incarnationis dominicae sacramento (382), the integrity of the humanity assumed by Christ*.

b) Eulogy to Virginité. Ambrose exalted virginité and widowhood in five works that marked a new stage in the history of Western spirituality. Like Athanasius, he saw in virginité a way of transcending nature, a "celestial pattern of living" made possible by the Incarnation* (SAEMO 14/1, 110, 116). The virgins already receive in this world the benefits of resurrection* (ibid., 152, inspired by Cyprian*). They are a "priesthood of chastity," a "living temple*" (SAEMO 14/1, 134; 14/2, 270). They must preserve integritas (integrity, purity*), not only that of the body but also that of the spirit (SAEMO 14/2, 24), and lead a life of prayer*, work*, poverty, and charity.

Ambrose does not condemn second marriages, but he disapproves of multiple remarriages (SAEMO 14/1, 300). He does not advise against marriage*, and in fact he attacks its detractors (SAEMO 14/1, 126; 14/2, 34). Listing the difficulties of family life, in order to exhort young ladies to preserve their virginité, he stops himself in his tracks for fear of discouraging those who are already "saintly parents" (SAEMO 14/1, 128). Marriage, widowhood, and virginité are but three ways of practicing chastity, because while integritas is only recommended, castitas is required of all Christians (SAEMO 14/1, 266; 306).

From eulogizing virginité, Ambrose goes on to eulogizing women (woman*). The widows who wish to remarry on account of the "vulnerability of women" are reminded by him that some women were able to reign as queens (SAEMO 14/1, 288). He refutes those who use the stories of the Creation* and the Fall to disparage women, and in Mary*, whose perpetual virginité he champions, he exalts all of womanhood (SAEMO 14/2, 122–34).

c) Theory and Practice of Penance. In his De paenitentia (SC 179) Ambrose fights against the belated followers of Novatianism*, who admit the perpetrators of grave sins* (apostasy, homicide, adultery) to penance* without the crowning step of reconciliation: "It is in vain that you claim you are preaching penance, when you are doing away with the fruit of penance” (SC 179, 125). Ambrose emphasizes divine mercy*: “even Judas could have managed . . . not to be excluded from forgiveness if he had done penance” (SC 179, 151). He champions above all the right of the church* to absolve sinners or not to absolve them, finding particular support for his arguments in Matthew 16:19 and John 20:22–23. On this same point, he accuses his adversaries of contradicting themselves by accepting baptism but not penance (SC 179, 85). Ambrose, however, allows Christians to resort to canonical penance only once in a lifetime; according to R. Gryson (SC 179, 48), this is a contradiction of his own principle, namely that no sin can be totally out of the church’s power to absolve or not to absolve.

Beyond its polemical character, the De paenitentia is intended both for the bishops who impose penance and for the believers who submit to it. It asks from the former a willingness “to share the sinners’ affliction from the bottom of their hearts” (SC 179, 181); and from the latter, it requires that they should know how to confess, weep, humble themselves, then live reconciliation as a total change (SC 179, 193). Heading a community not of pure people but of forgiven sinners, Ambrose says of himself that he is one of them (SC 179, 177): “I confess . . . that I was given more forgiveness myself when I was rescued from the quarrels of the madding crowd and from the formidable responsibilities of public administration to be called to the priesthood*.”

d) Attitude in the Face of Political Authorities. In 384 Ambrose exhorted Valentinian II not to yield to the pagan senators who wanted to reestablish the altar of the goddess Victory in the Roman Curia, and in 386 he again resisted Valentinian, who was demanding a basilica for the Arians (see above). In 388 he asked Theodosius not to force the bishop of Callinicum, a city in the region of the Upper Euphrates River, to rebuild a synagogue set on fire by monks. And when, in 390, the same emperor ordered the massacre of thousands of Thessalonians as punishment for the lynching of an officer, Ambrose forced him to do penance publicly.

With regard to the second of the events listed above, basing his decision on Matthew 22:21, Ambrose writes: “In matters of faith*, I do mean in matters of faith, it is up to bishops to pass judgment on Christian emperors, and not up to emperors to pass judgment on bishops” (SAEMO 21, 108). In the case of the other three events, he reminds the monarchs of their duties as believers. As a Christian, Valentinian “has learnt to honor only the altar of Christ” (SAEMO 21, 68), while with regard to the situation at Callinicum, Theodosius had to give preference to the “cause of religion” over an “appearance of public order” (SAEMO 21, 92). In 390 Theodosius had to do penance, just as King David had done in ancient times (SAEMO 21, 236). Ambrose does not make a distinction between the emperor as a Christian and the imperial function as an institution. He does not see himself in an abstract fashion as a spokesman for religious authorities in the face of political authorities, but presents himself as a spiritual adviser concerned for the sovereign’s salvation* (SAEMO 21, 86).

e) Social Morality. Ambrose, an aristocrat, wanted to reform the socioeconomic behavior of his milieu. His works draw an ideal profile of the Christian landlord at the head of a large estate. He does not practice usury (De Tobia), does not evict his neighbors from their humble properties (De Nabuthae). He does not overburden his feudal tenants with excessive charges (De officiis II, 16, 81). He remunerates fairly the day laborers he employs (SAEMO 6, 284), and he does not endanger the lives of those who work for him by assigning them hazardous tasks (SAEMO 6, 142–44). He does not hide his harvest in order to speculate on the price of wheat (De officiis III, 6, 37–44). On the contrary, he does the opposite: knowing that the fruits of nature are intended for all human beings, he opens his granary generously to the poor (SAEMO 6, 154). In short, he behaves as a protector of the weak (SAEMO 9, 258).

Displaying originality in his pastoral concern for virginity and penance, and in his actions and ideas in the face of political authorities, it is Ambrose, among all the Latin Fathers, who presents the most coherent teaching on social matters.

- Opera omnia di Sant’Ambrogio: Sancti Ambrosii Episcopi Mediolanensis Opera (SAEMO), Milan-Rome (the complete works—Latin texts and Italian trans.—were published in 24 vols. between 1979–94)
- In SC: Des sacrements; Des mystère; Explication du symbole (25 bis); Traité sur l’Évangile de saint Luc (45 and 52); La pénitence (179); Apologie de David (239).
- Les devoirs* (De officiis), 2 vols., CUFr.
- ♦ G. Madec (1974), Saint Ambroise et la philosophie, Paris.
- M. Simonetti (1975), La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome, 435–552.
- Coll. (1976), Ambrosius episcopus: Atti del congresso internazionale di studi ambrosiani, Milan.
- H. Savon (1977), Saint Ambroise devant l’exégèse de Philon le Juif, 2 vols., Paris.
- E. Dassmann (1978), “Ambrosius,” TRE 2, 362–86.
- Coll. (1981), Cento anni di bibliografia ambrosiana (1874–1974), Milan.
- P. Brown (1988), The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York, chap. 17.
- R. A. Markus (1988), chap. VI of J. H. Burns (Ed.), The Cambridge History of Medieval Political Thought, c. 350–c. 1450, Cambridge.

- S. Mazzarino (1989), Storia sociale del vescovo Ambrogio, Rome.
- P. Brown (1992), Power and Persuasion in Late Antiquity, Madison.
- J.-M. Salamito (1992), "Aut villa aut negotiatio," diss., University of Paris-Sorbonne.
- C. Marksches (1993), Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie, Tübingen.
- N. B. McLynn (1994), Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital, Berkeley.
- C. and L. Pietri (Ed.) (1995), Naissance d'une chrétienté (250–430), Paris.
- D.H. Williams (1995), Ambrose of Milan and the End of the Arian-Nicene Conflict, Oxford.
- H. Savon (1997), Ambroise de Milan, Paris.

JEAN-MARIE SALAMITO

See also Arianism; Church and State; Novatianism; Penance; Platonism, Christian; Precepts; Property; Spiritual Direction

Amish. See Anabaptists

Anabaptists

Anabaptism arose amidst the ferment of ideas and movements that marked the beginnings of the Reformation of the 16th century. Around this time, several attempts at reform received political support and were institutionalized. But some who wanted to reform the church*, and who were not (or were no longer) in agreement with Luther*, Zwingli*, or Calvin*, became dissidents. For polemical reasons, these Protestant dissidents have often been characterized as "Anabaptists." Contemporary historians, however, have pointed out the multiplicity and variety of this "left wing of the Reformation," or "radical Reformation," and have made distinctions among revolutionaries, spiritualists, Anabaptists, and anti-Trinitarians, which in the past had been seen as a homogeneous dissident whole. Anabaptism in the strict sense comprises various movements that arose in 1520–30 in several regions of Europe.

The earliest organized Anabaptism arose in Switzerland with Zwingli. Taking their inspiration from ideas coming from Luther, Zwingli, Erasmus, Carlstadt, or the peasant movement of 1524–25, men such as Conrad Grebel, Felix Mantz, and Balthasar Hubmaier came to reject the baptism* of infants and to formulate the idea of a "pre-Constantinian" church made up of members who had made a deliberate Christian commitment. Taking up the sola scriptura and the sola fide of the Reformation, these Swiss Anabaptists rejected the symbiosis between church* and state that the Reformers did not question. This rejection was accompanied by a Christocentric and communitarian ethics* and ecclesiology* advocating the practice of Nachfolge Christi (sequela Christi, imitation* of Jesus Christ) and, most often, a return to Christian "nonviolence." A series of theological disputes with Zwingli did not succeed in resolving all disagreements. The first baptisms on the basis of a profession of faith* (hence the name Anabaptist) took place in Zurich in January 1525 and led to the formation of a "Protestant" church lacking in political support. This church was able to survive only clandestinely, and it was in large part thanks to a former Benedictine, Michael Sattler, who drafted the seven articles adopted by the Swiss Anabaptist communities at Schleitheim in February 1527, that it persisted through harsh rejection and persecution. These articles confessed the baptism of adults, the necessity for a church discipline in conformity with Matthew 18:15–18, the impossibility of a Christian being a magistrate or using violence*, and a radical separation between the church and the world*.

Another Anabaptist movement arose around the same time in southern Germany and Austria. With leaders such as Hans Hut and Hans Denck, this Anabaptism was strongly marked at the outset by Rhenish mysticism*. The lay theologian Pilgram Marpeck developed a theology based on the humanity of Christ*. This influence was to survive lastingly, particularly in Moravia, under the leadership of Jakob Hutter. In the 1530s Hutter established an Anabaptism that was more radically communitarian than the Swiss movement and that practiced communal ownership of property. This Hutterite movement had a golden age during the second half of the 16th century, but was hard pressed to resist the Counter-Reformation.

A third movement, located in the Netherlands, was strongly influenced in its beginnings by the millenarian and spiritualist theology of Melchior Hoffman (†1534 in Strasbourg). This thinking met with popular support and contributed a good deal to the events in Münster in Westphalia (1534–35) where, under the leadership of Bernhard Rothmann and Jan van Leyden, an attempt was made to establish a Reformation based on Anabaptist ecclesiology and to prepare for the imminent return of Christ (Parousia*). Ending in bloodshed, the episode assisted the anti-Protestant polemic of the Catholic Church and drove Protestants to dissociate themselves as much as possible from any form of dissidence arising in their ranks. Dutch Anabaptism nevertheless survived in a pacific form thanks to the former priest Menno Simons, who assembled a large number of the refugees from Münster under a theology close to that of the Swiss Anabaptism coming out of Schleithem.

Rejected and persecuted by “official” Protestants as well as by Catholics, thousands of Anabaptists were killed (especially in the 16th century) or driven into exile or emigration. Only in the Netherlands did the Mennonites experience a fairly peaceful cultural assimilation from the 17th century onward (the painter Rembrandt was close to Mennonite circles, although it is not known whether he was actually a member). By the 17th century many Swiss, Alsatian, and German Anabaptists found a more welcoming atmosphere in North America. Emigration to the Americas continued as late as the period after the Second World War*. Finally, with the recent collapse of communism, many Russian Mennonites of Dutch or German origin have now settled in Germany. Thus, the spiritual descendants of the 16th-century Anabaptists are now living in many countries, including countries in Africa and Asia. They call themselves Mennonites, Hutterites, or Amish.

- Menno Simons (1681), Opera omnia theologica..., Amsterdam; The complete writings, Tr. L. Verdun, Ed. C. Wenger, Scottdale, Penn., 1956.
- Mennonistisches Lexicon*, Ed. C. Hege, C. Neff, continued by H. S. Bender, E. Crous, 1913–57, Frankfurt, 1958–, Karlsruhe. Bibl. in The Mennonite Quarterly Review, Goshen, Ind., 1927–.
- H. J. Hillerbrand (1962), Bibliographie des Täuferturns (1520–1630), Gütersloh (QFRG, 30–QGT, 10).
- N. P. Springer, A. J. Klassen (Ed.) (1977), Mennonite Bibliography (1631–1961), Scottdale, Penn.
- Bibliotheca dissidentium: Répertoire des non-conformistes religieux des XVIe et XVIIe s.*, Ed. A. Segueny, Baden-Baden, 1980–.
- ♦ The Mennonite Encyclopedia (1955–90), 5 vols., Scottdale, Penn.
- G. H. Williams (1962), The Radical Reformation, Philadelphia.
- U. Gastaldi (1972), Storia dell'anabattismo, I: Dalle origine a Münster (1525–1535); (1981), II: Da Münster ai giorni nostri, Turin.
- C. Bornhäuser (1973), Leben und Lehre Menno Simons. Ein Kampf um das Fundament des Glaubens (etwa 1496–1561), Neukirchen-Vluyn.
- M. Lienhard (Ed.) (1977), The Origins and Characteristics of Anabaptism / Les débuts et les caractéristiques de l'anabaptisme, The Hague.
- J. Séguy (1977), Les assemblées anabaptistes-mennonites de France, Paris-The Hague.
- N. Blough (1984), Christologie anabaptiste, Geneva.
- R. MacMaster (1985), Land, Piety, Peoplehood: The Establishment of Mennonite Communities in America, 1683–1790, Scottdale, Penn.
- J.-G. Rott, S. L. Verheus (1987), Anabaptistes et dissidents au XVIe s., Baden-Baden–Bouxwiller.
- C. Baecher (1990), L'affaire Sattler, Méry-sur-Oise–Montbéliard.
- N. Blough (Ed.) (1992), Jésus-Christ aux marges de la Réforme, Paris.
- M. Lienhard (1992), “Les anabaptistes,” in M. Vénard (Ed.), Le temps des confessions, vol. 8: Histoire du christianisme, Paris, 119–81.
- G. Williams (1992), The Radical Reformation, Kirksville.
- N. Blough (1994), “Secte et modernité: Réflexions sur l'évolution historique de l'anabaptisme aux États-Unis,” BSHPF 140, 581–602.
- A. Hamilton, S. Woolstra, P. Visser (Ed.) (1994), From Martyr to Muppy: A Historical Introduction to Cultural Assimilation Processes of a Religious Minority in the Netherlands: The Mennonites, Amsterdam.
- M. Lienhard (1994), “Réformateurs radicaux,” in M. Vénard, De la Réforme à la Réformation, vol. 7: Histoire du christianisme, 805–29.

NEAL BLOUGH

See also Analogy; Baptists; Calvinism; Millenarianism; Protestantism; Unitarianism

Anagogy. See Mysticism; Scripture, Senses of; Trace (Vestige)

Analogy

In theology*, analogy designates the gap between human knowledge* of God* and God himself. It expresses two requirements: respect for the absolute transcendence of God, who is ineffable and unknowable, and the preservation of a minimal intelligible pertinence in the discourse of faith*. The combination of these antagonistic elements has given rise to diverse syntheses embodying the vicissitudes of theological language*.

a) Proportion and Participation. The original meaning of analogy has to do with mathematical proportion, and represents a mid-point between total resemblance and complete dissimilarity. Etymologically, analogia (in Greek) is a simple relationship (logos), which is a logos of a logos, a relationship of relationships, a mediated identity. Prefigured in Parmenides and Heraclitus (Jüngel 1964), developed by the Pythagorean school, analogia is attested in Archytas of Tarentum in the sense of a mathematical proportion ($a/b = c/d$). Extended to all aspects of philosophy* (Boulnois 1990), it gradually came to be applied to relations between the sensible and the divine. The analogical method was disseminated by Middle Platonism as a path towards knowledge of the unknowable God, being understood also in relation to the paths of eminence (hyperokhè) and retrenchment (aphairesis). Such teaching is found in Celsus (True Discourse VII, 42; Glöckner 59), Maximus of Tyre (Dübner XVII, 9) and Albinos (Epitomè tòn Platônos dogmatôn X, 5; Louis 61). For Proclus, analogy assures the real continuity of degrees of being, each of which participates in the next higher degree; it no longer means a proportion, but a one to one relationship, a capacity to receive participative being* (In Timaeum II, 27, 13). For Damascius, on the contrary, analogy demonstrates our inability to know the ineffable God: “the analogy of being” leads us to the One established above the being, but attains it as unknowable (Of First Principles, the Ineffable, and the One, Werterink-Combès 69).

b) From the Creation to the Creator. Analogy entered Jewish and then Christian theology through the Wisdom of Solomon 13:5: “From the greatness and beauty of created things comes a corresponding perception of their Creator.” This verse echoes philosophical reflections asserting that the invisible divinity can be contemplated thanks to its visible works, for example in Pseudo-Aristotle, De Mundo VI, 399b 19–22: “Although invisible to any mortal nature, his works themselves manifest him.” Often linked by the Fathers* of the Church to Romans 1:20, analogy enables us to have knowledge of God through his creation*. For Athanasius*, Against the Pagans 44 (SC 18 bis, 199), the Word*, “being the head and king and the union of all beings, performs everything for the glory* and the knowledge of the Father and teaches us through his works.” According to Cyril* of Alexandria, in his treatise on the Trinity IV, 538b (SC 237, 240): “For God, it is the most beautiful and best part of his illustriousness and his glory to be able to create, because it is precisely in that way that we know who and what He is.”

Knowledge of God needs the analogical method: that is, the movement upward from works to the Principle. There is no theology, however, that does not rely on divine economy. Theology is not some kind of pure reasoning on the divine nature, but must rely on tangible manifestations in order to ascend toward the Creator. Moreover, analogy even makes it possible to think about the relation among the divine Persons: as creation manifests its author, so the divine Word* in turn reveals the Father* (Boulnois 1994, 44–49). Among the Fathers of the Church, Pseudo-Dionysius adopts the interpretation of Proclus: “God is known by analogy with those things of which He is the cause”

(Divine Names VII, 7; PG 3, 872), but he is not a being as such. Analogy further implies the diversity of hierarchical degrees, but it means that each existent has the capacity to receive God (Celestial Hierarchy III, 2; PG 3, 165). In the New Testament, Romans 12:6 requires that gifts be exercised “in proportion to our faith” according to the analogia fidei. Origen* emphasizes the gratuitousness of God’s gift, remarking that among the graces granted according to the analogy of faith “is included faith” itself (In Rom. III, 5-V, 7; Scherer 204). From now on, he adds, analogy is an incalculable relationship between two terms, because it includes both the divine gift and the relationship of humankind to that gift.

c) Semantics and Logic. Porphyry reduces the unit of reference among existents to an intelligible relationship by associating it with Aristotle’s paronymy and by justifying the relationships of meanings by the inflections of a word (In Categorias Aristotelis VI, 1, 133); between homonymy and synonymy, analogy becomes a mode of preaching. Alexander of Aphrodisias interprets this unity as a participation, which permits the deduction of categories (In Metaphysicam I, 243–44). In the Latin tradition*, Boethius* transforms the mathematical usage by translating logos (the relation between two terms) as proportio and analogia (in Greek) by proportionalitas (De institutione arithmeticae II, 40). Thus, analogia (derived from Dionysius by John the Scot Eriugena) might be a simple resemblance and proportio a simple relation between two terms. Applied to God, this grammatical and logical apparatus joins with a strong Dionysian trend for which contemplation of created beings makes possible the ascent to God. The Fourth Lateran* Council did this in Neoplatonic terms: between God and created beings, “however great the resemblance, the dissimilarity is even greater” (Mansi 23, 986; see Augustine*, De Trin. XV. xi. 21, BAug 16, 476; Proclus, Commentary on Parmenides, Cousin 1864).

Other shifts come from translations from the Arabic. Arabic authors interpret paronymie as a form of ambiguity (convenientia): “The convenants are intermediary between the univocal and the equivocal, as existence is attributed to substance and to accident” (Algazel, Logica chap. 3, ed. Liechtenstein 1506, 3 vo a). But the Arabic term was also translated as analogia. Hence, semantically, analogy occupies the midpoint between the univocal—the single meaning of a term applied to several referents—and the equivocal—difference in meaning according to difference in referents. But grammatical analysis is coupled with a logical problem: The question arises whether an equivocal term corresponds to several concepts (equivocity); to a relation between the anterior and the posterior (analogy); or to a single concept concealed beneath various modes of signifying (univocity; see Ashworth 1992).

Thus, Alexander of Hales (1186–1245) thinks of the relationship of created beings to God not as a convenientia secundum univocationem, which presupposes at least that they are of the same type, but as a convenientia secundum analogiam, which refers to the relationship between substance and accidents. In the plurality of meanings of being*, there is a primary meaning—“substance”—and the others are articulated with reference to that meaning in a sequence from posterior to anterior. The Good is said first of God by nature, then of created beings through participation (Summa Theologica I, Intr. q. 2, membr. 3, chap. 2 [§21]; Quaracchi, I, 1924, 32 a). But analogy did not impose itself on everyone who approached the question of the relationship between God and created beings. Divine attributes, such as justice, were said to be univocal to God and the creature (Prevotinus of Cremona, quoted by Schlenker 1938), as indeed being itself had been (Peter of Capua, ibid., 58, n. 107). For Alexander of Hales himself, the notion of person is thought of as univocal (op. cit., Pars II, Inq. 2, tract. 2, sect. 1, q. 1, a. 1 [§388]; 573). In the context of this terminological uncertainty, Albert* the Great connected the unity of perfections that God causes in each order with the finite receptive capacity of each created being, invoking the concept of univocitas analogiae (In de Div. Nom., chap. 1, 1 a). Bonaventure*, for his part, contrasted God, as pure act of unparticipated being, with the created thing which participates in it, esse analogum (Journey of the Soul toward God, Duméry 84).

Thomas* Aquinas argues against Maimonides (1135–1204), for whom there is nothing in common between God and created beings, which leads him to attribute being to God by a “simple homonymy” (Guide for the Perplexed I, chap. 56). For Thomas, nothing can be attributed to God univocally either, because there is no “reason” common to God and created beings: God is his own being, incommunicable. The attribution is therefore made by analogy (De Veritate, q. 2, a. 11; ST I, q. 13, a.5). To justify this analysis, Thomas advances various classifications of analogies, which had divided the commentators. However, at least the analogy of created beings to God is that of the multiple to the one, of the posterior to its center of reference (Montagnes 1963; Boulnois 1990). Thomas thus eliminates all the symbolic or metaphorical names, retaining only those that designate pure perfections (God* A. III).

The logical thought of Duns Scotus, while accepting the real analogy between God and created beings, dis-places the problem of the knowledge of God. God is reached within the univocal concept of ens, by the articulation of this concept and its mode, which is infinity (infinite*). Negativity and eminence are absorbed in the affirmation of positive divine perfections: “We do not supremely love negations” (Ordinatio I, d. 3, §10). From then on, the analogy between (created) being and God becomes an analogy within being, and God is reached within the concept of being—this is designated by the analogia entis, which arose in the Thomist school in the 14th century (Thomas Sutton, Contra Robert Cowton). For Wycliffe (Hus*), the notion of analogous being—that is, the notion of going from created beings to their idea in God—confirms this unification of being in a representation. The solutions proposed by Cajetan (Thomism*) and Suarez* were unable to free themselves from this primacy of the concept.

d) Analogy of Faith and Analogy of Being. Following Cajetan, the question of analogy became the pons asinorum of Neoscholasticism. Metaphysics, apologetics, and natural theology* were supposed to stand or fall with analogy. The fourth of the 24 allegedly Thomist theses imposed on the clergy in 1914 thus included the analogy of the Creator to created beings (DS 3604). This hypertrophy provoked an absolute rejection by Barth*, according to whom analogy is an “invention of the Antichrist” because it lays claim to knowledge of God outside revelation* (which is true of Neoscholasticism but not of Scholasticism*). He contrasts it to analogia fidei (Rom 12:6): the grace* of God alone provides the conditions for knowledge of him (KD I/1, 1932, 239 ff.).

For Erich Przywara, by contrast, analogia entis is “the fundamental form” of Catholicism*. It provides a philosophy of religion*, as well as an answer to Protestantism*, to modern thought on subjectivity, and to transcendental theology. Integrating pure logic and making analogy dialectical by a series of oppositions calling for their own overcoming, Przywara makes Western thought, in all its polarities, the content of analogy. Reality is merely provisional and awaits its accomplishment in God, with the overcoming of all contradictions. This historical and systematic work is rooted in a meditation on the text of the Fourth Lateran Council: dissimilarity greater than resemblance makes possible the avoidance of any “idolatrous” notion of analogy as affirmative knowledge.

Przywara was born in 1889 in Katowice, Upper Silesia, on the border of Germany and Poland. He joined the Company of Jesus in 1908 and studied in the Netherlands. From 1913 to 1917 he was director of music in Feldkirch, Austria. Ordained as a priest in 1920, he contributed to the journal Stimmen der Zeit from 1921 until it was banned in 1941. He pursued a dialogue with Barth, Buber, Husserl, Heidegger*, and Edith Stein, and inspired Rahner* and Balthasar*. Chaplain to the students of Munich from 1941, he gave lectures in Munich, Berlin, Vienna, and other cities. He died in 1972.

Przywara’s method consists of drawing from the most important writers an objective meaning, in order to understand them better than they understood themselves, according to the principle of hermeneutics*. Augustine*, the Rhineland*-Flemish mystics, the German romantics, Nietzsche*, Scheler, and Newman thus form nodes who oppose and answer one another in the history of thought, following an internal rhythm and reciprocal polarities. Their unity goes beyond these oppositions and is expressed in terms of analogia entis, transforming a Neoscholastic concept into a concord of opposites and a fundamental structure of universal (Catholic) truth*. The history* of thought thereby escapes from historicism, without being trapped in the Hegelian logic of irreversible progress (Hegel*) or in simple Christian apologetics. In the spirit of the Spiritual Exercises, Przywara wrote Christliche Existenz (1934), Heroisch (1936), Deus semper maior (1938), and Crucis mysterium: Das christliche Heute (1939), which also attests to the resistance to Nazism. He develops the question of the foundations of religion in Religionsphilosophie der katholische Theologie (1927), Das Geheimnis Kierkegaards (1929), Ring der Gegenwart (1929), Kant heute (1930), and Augustinus: Gestalt als Gefüge (1934). His debate with Luther* is set out in Humanitas (1952).

From a more detached standpoint, Hans Urs von Balthasar attempts to reconcile positions. Analogy is not a principle of natural knowledge but the condition of the created being, and yet this is recognized only through faith. In this way, analogia entis is integrated into analogia fidei (Karl Barth: Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie, 1962). From a Protestant perspective, Bonhoeffer* criticizes Przywara’s application of analogy to being (Akt und Sein, DBW 2, 67–70), but he outlines his own theory of analogia relationis to designate the relationship between humankind (the image of God) to its model (Schöpfung und Fall, DBW 3, 58 ff.). The analogy of relation was to be taken up and orchestrated by Barth (KD III/1, 218–20; III/2, 226 ff., 390 ff.). More recently, E. Jüngel (1977) has proposed a return to analogy as a way of thinking of God in his transcendence, while at the same time emphasizing the opposite pole, which is God’s mercy in revealing himself. He thereby proposes to reverse the formulation of the Fourth Lateran

Council and to see “in dissimilarity an even greater resemblance.”

- E. Przywara (1932), Analogia entis, Einsiedeln, 1962.
- Cajetan, De l’analogie des noms (text and tr. B. Pinchard, Métophysique et sémantique, 1987).
- ♦ E. Schlenker (1938), Die Lehre von der göttlichen Namen in der Summa Alexanders von Hales, Freiburg.
- J. Hellin (1947), La analogia del ser y el conocimiento de Dios en Suarez, Madrid.
- E. L. Mascall (1949), Existence and Analogy, London.
- A.-J. Festugière (1954), Révélation d’Hermès Trismégiste, IV: Le Dieu inconnu et la gnose, Paris, 92–140.
- E. Jüngel (1962), “Die Möglichkeit theologischer Anthropologie auf dem Grunde der Analogie. Eine Untersuchung zum Analogieverständnis Karl Barths,” Barth-Studien, ÖTh 9, 1982, 210–32.
- B. Montagnes (1963), La doctrine de l’analogie de l’être d’après Thomas d’Aquin, Louvain-Paris.
- E. Jüngel (1964), “Zum Ursprung des Analogie bei Parmenides und Heraklit,” Entsprechungen, München, 1980, 52–102.
- J.M. Bochénski (1965), The Logic of Religion, New York, §37 and 50 (Die Logik der Religion, 2nd Ed., Paderborn, 1981).
- S. George (1965), “Der Begriff analogos im Buch der Weisheit,” Parusia, Festschrift J. Hirschberger, 189–97.
- G. Siewerth (1965), Analogie des Seienden, Einsiedeln.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), “Analogie und Doxologie,” Grundfr. syst. Th., 181–201.

- B. Gertz (1969), Glaubenswelt und Analogie, Düsseldorf.
- L. B. Püntel (1969), Analogie und Geschichtlichkeit, Freiburg.
- R. Mortley (1971), “Analogia chez Clément d’Alexandrie,” REG 84, 80–93.
- D. Burrell (1973), Analogy and Philosophical Language, London-New Haven.
- E. Jüngel (1977), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen, 357–408.
- P. Secretan, P. Gisel (Ed.) (1982), Analogie et dialectique, Geneva.
- R. Mortley (1986), From Word to Silence, vol. II: The Way of Negation, Christian and Greek, Bonn.
- E. Naab (1987), Zur Begründung der analogia entis bei Erich Przywara, Regensburg.
- O. Boulnois (1990), “Analogie,” Encyclopédie philosophique universelle: Les notions philosophiques, Ed. S. Auroux, vol. I, Paris, 80–83.
- E. J. Ashworth (1992), “Analogy and Equivocation in Thirteenth-Century Logic: Aquinas in Context,” MS 54, 94–135.
- M.-O. Boulnois (1994), Le paradoxe trinitaire chez Cyrille d’Alexandrie, Paris.
- O. Boulnois (1996), “Duns Scot, théoricien de l’analogie,” John Duns Scotus, Metaphysics and Ethics, Ed. L. Honnefelder, Leyden, 293–315.

OLIVIER BOULNOIS

See also Attributes, Divine; Language, Theological; Name; Negative Theology

Andrew of Saint-Victor. See Saint-Victor, School of

Angels

1. Biblical Tradition

a) Old Testament and Postbiblical Tradition. With ancient civilizations, the Bible* acknowledges the existence of spirits, including angels and demons, but, in its strict monotheism, ranks them as creatures. There are superior spirits that serve God*—hence, the Hebrew title mal’ak (Greek: aggelos, Latin calque: angelus, meaning “envoy,” or “messenger [of God]”). Then there are spirits that are evil and in revolt against God.

The subordination of good angels to God can be seen in their role as executors of divine will. Genesis speaks of sentinel angels at the entrance of the garden of Eden (Gn 3:24) and of an intervening angel at the time of Isaac’s sacrifice* (Gn 22:11). Angels are called “sons of god” and form his court (Jb 1:6); some of them are called seraphim (Is 6:2), which means “burning.” Often angels are reduced to simple literary symbols that lend authority to the message they deliver through a vision or a thought (as in Dn 7:16). Hence, the more critical expression Angel of YHWH wherever the context suggests that it is God himself who is involved (Gn 32:24–30; Ex 14:19, etc.). It would be a later correction of the text that would safeguard divine transcendence in its immediate manifestation. The prophets*, rather silent on the theme of angels until exile, when it developed because of the Persian contract, insist on their condition as loyal servants and worshipers of God. Among the “thousand thousands . . . and ten thousand times ten thousand” angels (Dn 7:10) are distinguished “seven holy angels who present the prayers of the saints” (Tb 12:15), constantly worshipping God, as are three principal angels, or archangels, Raphael (Tb 12:15), Michael, and Gabriel (Dn 8:16, 9:21, and 10:13).

The pseudoepigrapha of the New Testament and postbiblical writings introduce many more angels, but without systematizing them. Philo combines angels with Greek winged spirits. Late Jewish literature, and especially the Talmud and the Midrash, claim that angels have flaming bodies and attribute numerous roles to them in relation to human beings. Sometimes angels are sent to punish, while on other occasions they communicate God’s favor. In addition to the few proper names for angels that can be found in the canonical books, there are many others, more than 250 general titles for good and bad angels, such as the Accusing Angel, the Angel of Darkness, and the Angel of Death. A certain dualism appears, with the good angels, who had been created on the first day, finding themselves at war with the rebellious angels, those ruled by the bad angel, who had been created on the ill-fated second day. Islam borrows from Jewish angelology and demonology, which has Christian connections. It assigns a large role to angels (Koran XXXV), including Gabriel, Michael (Mika’il), Cherubim, al-Hafaza, Throne Carrier, and Isrâfil. Among the innumerable angels, angel Djibril, “the loyal spirit,” is ranked up with Mika’il.

b) New Testament. Like the Old Testament, the New Testament refers to angels. Paul uses a number of accepted titles for angels, including: thrones, sovereigns, authorities, powers (Col 1:16, 2:14–15; Eph 1:21; and Rom 8:38). The Evangelists do the same (Lk 1:11, 1:26; Mt 1:20–21, 1:2, 1:13, and 4:11). Jesus* mentions angels quite a few times, notably in John 1:51, in Matthew 18:10 (a passage that has been understood as alluding to guardian angels), in Matthew 22:30, 25:31, and 26:53, and in Luke 12:8 and 15:10. Angels are clearly present in the accounts of the Passion* and the Resurrection* (Lk 24:4; Mt 28.2; and Jn 20:12). It is an angel, according to Paul, who gives the signal of judgment* (1 Thes 4:16). It is also an angel who frees

Peter* in Acts 5:18, and an angel who addresses the deacon*, Philip, in Acts 8:26, and so forth. In the account of Paul’s appearance before the Sanhedrin the disagreement between Pharisees and Sadducees over angels is brought up (Acts 23:8).

2. Christian Theology

a) Liturgy and Magisterium. Early Judeo-Christianity initially gave to Christ* the title of Angel, but Paul, followed by Hebrews and Apocalypse, specifies that the incarnate Christ-Son has primacy over all the angels, which are created by him and for him and are integrated into his body (Col 1:15–18). Christian liturgy, both Greek and Latin, honors angels as servants of God and friends of human beings: Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and all the anonymous angels. It associates its own celebrations with their heavenly liturgy. This can be seen, for example, in the Trisagion of John Chrysostom, and in the threefold Sanctus of the Latin liturgy. The Fathers* all believed that God confided missions to his angels to help human beings on their way to salvation*. The theme of guardian angels, as instruments of divine providence, is found in the writings of Clement of Alexandria (c. 150–c. 215), Irenaeus, Origen*, Ambrose*, Augustine*, and Jerome (c. 342–420), with a few hesitations when it comes to the question of how long these angels are assigned for, and to whom (only to the only converted, to the baptized, to every human being?).

Because the question of angels is secondary from the point of view of salvation, the ecclesiastical magisterium (thus Lateran* IV) only defined their creaturely status. However, since angels did not belong to the temporal order as experienced by human beings, the ancient councils ruled out the theory of the final conversion of fallen angels during the renovation (apocatastasis*) promised for all things, a theory supported by certain disciples of Origen.

b) Patristic Era. If the desert monks referred to angels according to the mentality of their own time, the first major theologians—men such as Irenaeus, Gregory* of Nyssa, Gregory* of Nazianzus, Basil of Caesarea, and John Chrysostom—offered more deeply considered discussions. In his critique of gnosis*, Clement of Alexandria teaches that the angels only know God the Father if they are “baptized in the Name*” (“above all names”), that is, in the Son (Extracts of Theodotus 27:2. SC 23, 101s). Irenaeus specifies that the angels only contemplate the Father* while contemplating the Son, and inasmuch as the Son reveals him to them (Adv. Haer. II, 30, 9, SX 294, 322). Augustine also says that only grace* allows angels to reach final bliss (City of God XII, 9 BAug 35, 174). This sovereignty of grace for their salvation explains Mary's superiority, as mother of the incarnate Word*, over all the angels, something which was affirmed as early as the Greek Fathers.

The fact the Paul gave them different names led to a hierarchization of angels. There was no system before Pseudo-Dionysius (Irenaeus talks of six degrees; Basil, five; Athanasius*, five; and Augustine, eight). It is Pseudo-Dionysius who, while relying on Proclus, creates a hierarchy of angels (Celestial Hierarchy, c. 6) in three triads of increasing dignity: angels, archangels, principalities; powers, virtues, dominions; thrones, cherubim, seraphim. This hierarchy would be borrowed by John Damascene and the entire tradition*. The whole hierarchy of angels, writes Pseudo-Dionysius, constitutes the theocracy that is ruled by the divine Trinity, its function being to assure the deifying salvation of believers. Origen accounts for this hierarchy of angels in terms of their individual merits (Principles 1, 8, 4, SC 252, 206), but Augustine declares himself to be ignorant on this point (Manual 15, 58, BAug 9, 206).

Although the Fathers were in agreement on the function of angels, they were not of one view when it came to their nature. Some, it seems, acknowledged individual spirit in the angels through a certain subtle corporeal state known as spiritual. Angels were thought to have an internal life that was greater than cosmic time, but less than the divine eternity, the latter being defined by Boethius* as "the simultaneity of all moments." It is named aevum, eviternity. Opposing Manichean dualism (Manicheism*), Augustine specified that the creation* of angels came before the moment they choose, therefore before their sanctification or before their reprobation. He distinguished three levels of angelic intellection. First, there was knowledge of the thing known in itself. Then there was knowledge according to two stages of transcendental illumination by the creating Word: vision in the morning light (the creating idea in the Word), and vision in the fading light of evening or in accordance with the unique nature of the angel (De Genesis ad litt. IV, 22, BAug 9–48, 334f.).

c) Middle Ages. The angelology of Pseudo-Dionysius, known in the West since the time of John the Scot Eriugena (c. 810–77), was common to all the medieval theologians. These scholars strove for ever greater rigor in their doctrine of angels. In his Sentences, Peter Lombard (c. 1100–c. 1160) brings together the teachings of Augustine, Jerome (an expert on the Greeks), Ambrose, Gregory* the Great, and Dionysius. The theory of an angel-creator is rejected and the theme of their fallible freedom, already examined by Anselm (the fall of the devil), is studied. With the theme of separated Intellects (independent of the corporeal level), which was borrowed from Greco-Arab philosophy*, critical demands increased. There were important essays on the noetics of pure spirit, which went all the deeper in that they provided an occasion for the development of a theory of knowledge in general, with angels representing a borderline case with regard to man. Albert* the Great hesitates to identify Intellects and angels. While he does draw comparisons with regard to their purely intellectual nature and their function in ruling the world, he thinks, following the Bible and Pseudo-Dionysius, that only angels transmitted the divine light of grace. From Pseudo-Dionysius, Albert the Great borrows the theme of the seraphim's immediate knowledge of God, and he extends this to the deifying illumination granted to human beings in eternal life*. Bonaventure* acknowledges philosophers' view on angels as pure Intelligence, and he applies the Pseudo-Dionysian idea of hierarchy to the human soul*. The soul is given a "hierarchical" character by its access to the light of revealed wisdom*, the illuminations of which it receives in accordance with an ascending order defined by Pseudo-Dionysius. This order becomes a series of stages in the progress of the soul, in which the angels cooperate in an occasional manner, by lifting obstacles (In Hexaem. III, 32; XX, 22–25, XXII, 24–34). For Thomas* Aquinas, the recognition of the existence of angels—identified with the separated Intellects in terms of their nature, but not in terms of the function in the order of grace—is necessary for philosophical reasons. Between God, Intellect or pure and infinite* thought, and man with his reason* linked to the palpable, one must, according to Thomas, acknowledge the reality of beings equipped. The nature of these beings remains unknown; one only makes out something through human intellection and desire, and by the corrections provided by negative theology. Only the Bible speaks of their contribution to the salvation of humanity. Like all free creatures, they had to convert to God in response to divine grace, of which Christ is "the efficient cause and example in his eternal mystery* of incarnation*" (In Ep., c. 1, lect. 3; In Col., c. 1, lect. 4–5).

All angels, according to Thomas, are strictly incorporeal. They are immaterial, being by nature exclusively intelligence and will. Each one is unique in its kind: the generic category of "angel" is a product merely of our own divisive way of reasoning. The multiplicity of angels does not form a homogeneous whole, or a univocal meaning, and is not to be specified like the things of this order. They can only be made into a hierarchy according to their relative distance from the divine essence; since we do not know it, we give them a mutual order because of the eminence of such a gift of grace, although all the gifts of grace are in all of us, but in varying degrees (In Col. c. 1, lect. 4). Having a simple spiritual nature, angels nevertheless have an ontological composition. Their essence (or nature) must be distinguished from their being* in action. The latter is truly in addition to the essence, for this being in action (in an entirely different way than the traditional meaning of existence) is both granted by the Creator and acquired during noetic and volitional operations that are referred to a reality that is superior to angels themselves. Not needing palpable knowledge like man, angels know through a transcendent illumination and in accordance with a priori principles, having more or less synthetic characters depending on how close they are to the absolute unity of divine thought.

Duns Scotus, for whom there are angelic genres, applies his own theory of knowledge to the intelligence of angels and therefore rejects the Thomist noetics of pure spirit (Ordin. II, 3, 2, 3, §388 f.). The nominalist theologians (nominalism*) continued in this vein.

d) Modern and Contemporary Theology. During the Reformation, Calvin* saw angels as administrators of divine providence and as friends of man (Inst. 1, 14, 1–12). Petau (1583–1652) summed up the tradition, as did Suarez* in his vast treatise on theme of angels and demons. More recently, Karl Barth*, while noting the difficult questions that the question of angels raises, underlined its importance in the Scriptures* and the revelation of salvation. The Bultmannian platform (Bultmann*) of demythologization led Karl Rahner* (1957) toward a radical critique of angelology: not only do angels have no place in the modern world, but those theological developments of which angels have been the object are incompatible with the fundamental doctrine of salvation by Christ alone. He denounces the rationalist hypothesis, adopted by Suarez, of the possibility of a natural salvation. But Paul and the first Greek Fathers, in their critique of the Gnostics, had already dismissed this by emphasizing the subordination of angelic spirits to the incarnate Son. The modern radical negation of the reality of angels stems from an easy rationalism* that biblical exegesis does not share, even when it interprets scriptural expressions, often as metaphors—something L. Scheffczyk has recently underlined (1993). From a strictly philosophical point of view, Leibniz* borrows the notion of pure spirit which he defines as monadic. Husserl (1859–1938), who took an interest in Thomas’s treatise on angels, uses this theme of the monad in his analysis of the world of interpersonal relationships (Médit. cartés. V).

- Albert the Great, In De caelesti hierarchia, Opera XXXVII, Münster, 1993.
- Augustine, De Genesi ad litt., BAug 48.
- Bonaventure, In Hexaemeron (Les six jours de la création, 1991).
- J. Calvin, Inst. I, 14, no. 3–12.
- John Duns Scotus, Ordinatio VII.
- E. Husserl, Cartésianische Meditationen und Pariser Vorträge, Husserliana, vol. I, 5th med., §55.
- Peter Lombard, II Sententiae 2, PL 192, 655–57.
- D. Petau, Theologica Dogmata (I–III, 1644; IV, 1650), III, 603–705 and IV, 1–121 (Ed. Vivès, Paris, 1865–66).
- Pseudo-Dionysius, Celestial Hierarchy, SC 58 bis.
- F. Suarez, Opera omnia II, 1–1099 (Ed. Vivès, Paris, 1866).
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 10, a. 4–6 (ævum); q. 50–64; q. 106–14; CG II, 46–91; In Ep. S. Pauli ad Ephesios; In Ep. ad Colossenses.
- ♦ J. Touzard, A. Lemonnier (1928), “Ange,” DBS 1, 242–62.
- G. Kittel (1933), “Aggelos,” ThWNT 1, 72–87.
- E. Peterson (1935), Das Buch von den Engeln, Leipzig, repr. in Theologische Traktate, Munich, 1950, 323–407.
- J. Duhr (1937), “Anges,” DSP 1, 580–626.
- J. Collins (1947), The Thomistic Philosophy of the Angels, Washington.
- K. Barth (1950), KD III/3, §51 (Dogmatique, Geneva, 1963).
- J. Daniélou (1952), Les anges et leur mission d’après les Pères de l’Église, Paris.
- K. Rahner (1957), “Angelologie,” LThK2 1, 533–38.
- P.R. Régamey (1959), Les anges au ciel et parmi nous, Paris.
- H. Schlier (1963), Mächte und Gewalten im NT, Freiburg.
- M. Seemann (1967), “Die Welt der Engel und Dämonen als heilsgeschichtliche Mit- und Umwelt des Menschen,” MySal II, 943–95.
- P.L. Berger (1970), A Rumour of Angels, Harmondsworth, Middlesex.
- G. Tavard (1971), Les anges, Paris.
- S. Breton (1980), “Faut-il parler des anges?” RSPHTh 64, 225–40.
- U. Mann, et al. (1982), “Engel,” TRE 9, 580–615 (bibl.).
- J.-M. Vernier (1986), Les anges chez saint Thomas d’Aquin (Angelologia III), Paris.
- W. Madelung (1987), “Mala’ika,” EI(F) 6, 200 b2–04 a.
- P. Faure (1988), Les anges, Paris.
- L. Scheffczyk (1993), “Angelologie,” LThK3 1, 649–51.
- B. Faes de Mottoni (1995), S. Bonaventura e la Scala di Giacobbe: Letture di angelologia, Naples.
- E. Falque (1995), “L’altérité angélique ou l’angéologie thomiste au fil des ‘Méditations cartésiennes’ de Husserl,” LTP 51, 625–46.
- A. Paus, et al. (1995), “Engel,” LThK3 3, 646–54.
- S. Pinckaers (1996), “Les anges, garants de l’expérience spirituelle selon saint Thomas d’Aquin,” RTLu 2, 179–92.

ÉDOUARD-HENRI WEBER

See also Demons; Hierarchy; Praise

Angelus Silesius. See Negative Theology; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Anglican Church. See Anglicanism

Anglicanism

a) Definition. Anglicanism is the body of beliefs and practices of those Christians who are in communion* with the see of Canterbury, and in particular insofar as they distinguish themselves from other Christian confessions by virtue of their ties to England. But Anglicanism is not only English, and it includes the members of all churches that belong to the Anglican Communion.

b) Origins and History. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the term Anglicanism was first used in English by Newman* in 1838, although it appeared in French as early as 1801. Some date the concept of Anglicanism much earlier, locating it at the origins of Christianity in the British Isles, punning on the origin of the adjective Anglican: anglicanus, English, from the Latin Angli “angles,” the source of the name England (Anglia in Late Latin), which appeared by the late ninth century. The present-day Anglican Communion, made up of autonomous churches in full communion with the see of Canterbury, includes 65 to 70 million members scattered throughout the world. Although Anglicanism was present outside England by the 16th century, thanks to English colonization and emigration, and later due to the efforts of missionaries, the Anglican Communion itself came into being in 1851. It was formalized with the 1867 convocation of the first Lambeth Conference, a meeting of all Anglican bishops* at the London residence of the archbishop of Canterbury. The conference meets every ten years. Conference resolutions, however, have legal force in a church only if that church confirms them. If it does not do so, they have only advisory value. Finally, the Church of England alone in the Anglican Communion is a state church.

c) The Idea Anglicans Have of Themselves. Conceptions of Anglicanism differ substantially depending on notions of its historical origin. The current tendency is to reverse the perspective and, instead of beginning with the 19th century and the first appearance of the term Anglicanism, to locate its beginnings in the early centuries of Christianity. For example, J. Macquarrie (1970): “Anglicanism has never considered itself to be a sect or denomination originating in the 16th century. It continues without a break the Ecclesia Anglicana founded by Saint Augustine thirteen centuries and more ago, though nowadays that branch of the Church has spread far beyond the borders of England.” Similarly, H.R. McAdoo (1965): “The absence of an official theology in Anglicanism is something deliberate which belongs to its essential nature, for it has always regarded the teaching and practice of the first five centuries as a criterion.” Thus, while some see Anglicanism as dating from the 16th or the 17th century, others assert its fundamental continuity with the early church.

And although it is true that Anglican was used as a geographical term for centuries before taking on its current meaning, the real problem arises from the fact that Anglicanism thinks of itself as both a Reformation and a pre-Reformation church, both Catholic and Protestant. This stance is not without its difficulties. (The adjective Protestant is found neither in the Book of Common Prayer nor in the Thirty-nine Articles, but most Anglicans generally consider themselves Protestants.)

d) Doctrine and Basic Texts. Anglicans profess the Catholic and apostolic faith*, based on Scripture* and interpreted in the light of tradition* and reason*. They proclaim the lordship of the dead and resurrected Christ*, recognizing him as the second Person* of the Trinity*. This faith finds its principal expression in the celebration of the Eucharist*, the chief act of Christian worship. The essential texts expressing the Anglican faith are the Bible*, followed by the ritual of the Anglican liturgy* in the Book of Common Prayer (a major doctrinal source), and the document called the Lambeth Quadrilateral (see j below), which summarizes the principal dogmas*. To these should be added the Thirty-nine Articles and various collections of Anglican canon* law. The Book of Common Prayer exists in various forms today, but the 1662 version is still authoritative for the Church of England.

e) Theological Method. In a sense it was Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603) who first formulated what was to become the normative principle of Anglican theology. According to her, neither her people nor herself were practicing a new and strange religion, but rather the very religion prescribed by Christ, sanctioned by the primitive Catholic Church, and approved by all the early Fathers* of the Church. It was thus a matter of finding a via media, a middle way between Catholicism* and Protestantism*, by relying on Scripture, reason, and tradition. Richard Hooker (1554–1600), the greatest of the Elizabethan theologians, defined the relationships of these three elements in his Ecclesiastical Polity (V. 8. 2): “What scripture doth plainlie deliver, to that the first place both of credit and obedience is due; the next whereunto is whatsoever anie man can necessarelie conclude by force of reason; after these the voice of the Church succeedeth.” In this, Hooker showed his opposition to the Puritans (Puritanism*), for whom Scripture alone could define faith, and he defended the right of the church to propose its own laws*, provided they were not contrary to Scripture. The following formulations permit an understanding of what this principle means for Anglicanism.

According to R. P. C. Hanson, for a given subject, “we must study as completely as possible the documents and the historical context; and if we have to come to theoretical or doctrinal conclusions, we should do so with the greatest circumspection.” And for A. R. Vidler: “Anglican theology is faithful to its spirit when it seeks to reconcile opposed systems, not considering them mutually exclusive but showing that the principle represented by each one has its place in the body of Christian faith and is truly assured... only if it is understood in the tension it maintains with apparently contrary but really complementary principles.” According to Anglicans themselves, this openness to all points of view is characteristic of Anglicanism.

f) Church of England before the Reformation. Very little written evidence of early English Christianity of the third and fourth centuries has remained. The earliest surviving documents date from the Celtic period of the fifth and sixth centuries, and these are essentially spiritual, consisting principally of prayers* and hymns. The theology found in them closely links redemption and creation*. After the Synod* of Whitby (664), Roman ecclesiology achieved dominance, an eventuality welcomed by the Venerable Bede (673–735) in his Ecclesiastical History. (Bede also produced an elaborate theology of history*, miracles*, providence*, and evangelization.) Later, there were poems such as The Dream of the Rood (c. 750) and, in the late 10th and early 11th centuries, theological works on kingship, monasticism*, the priesthood*, the liturgy, penitence, and pastoral duties—see the works of Aelfric (c. 955–c. 1020) and Wulfstan (†1023), The Law of Northumbrian Priests and the Monastic Agreement of the Monks and Nuns of the English Nation (c. 970). After the Norman Conquest (1066) the same themes reappear in the monastic constitutions of Lanfranc (c. 1010–89), the work of the Norman Anonymous, in various coronation rituals, and in treatises on relations between church* and state.

The greatest theologian of the medieval English church was Anselm*, Archbishop of Canterbury from 1093 on, but there was in fact no lack of excellent theologians. The humanist John of Salisbury (c. 1115–80) wrote the Policraticus in which he describes the ideal state, where spiritual and temporal power are in balance. Robert Grosseteste (c. 1175–1253), bishop of Lincoln, studied Scripture and the origins of Christianity. Then there was a remarkable series of archbishops of Canterbury. These included Cardinal Stephen Langton (†1228), who wrote commentaries on most books of the Bible and who is credited with dividing its books into chapters; the Dominican Robert Kilwardby (archbishop 1273, †1279), author of remarkable indexes of the Fathers of the Church; the Franciscan John Pecham (c. 1225–92); and Thomas Bradwardine (c. 1290–1349, archbishop 1349), whose work on theological determinism was interrupted by the Black Death. Other major theological figures were Duns* Scotus and William of Ockham (c. 1285–1347). In maintaining that it was impossible to present rational proofs* of the existence* of God or of the creation of the world, the latter produced a climate of theological thought in which all one could really do was assert that God makes himself known barely enough for salvation* to be possible—as did, for example, the Dominican Robert Holcot (†1349). This was the context for the work of John Wycliffe (c. 1330–84), whose philosophical ideas led him to attack the possession of earthly goods by the church and the reality of eucharistic transubstantiation. He had disciples, known as Lollards, and the Reformers of the 15th century found precedents in his work for their favorite doctrines, except for that of justification.

The 14th century also witnessed the flourishing of an English school of spirituality, notably including the hermit Richard Rolle (c. 1300–49) in Emendatio vitae et Incendium amoris; the poet and minor cleric William Langland (†1396) in The Vision of Piers Plowman; Walter Hilton (†1396) in The Scale of Perfection; the anchoress Julian of Norwich (c. 1342–c. 1417) in Revelations of Divine Love; the anonymous The Cloud of Unknowing (c. 1370); Margery Kempe (c. 1373–after 1433); and the solitary monk of the Isle of Farne. (In this context one might even mention Chaucer [c. 1343–c. 1400]: among other things, his Canterbury Tales does have some strictly theological content.) The Cloud of Unknowing is remarkable for its negative theology*, and the work of Julian of Norwich for its optimism and its doctrine of the maternity of God. In the late Middle Ages Reginald Pecock (c. 1393–1461) was the first English bishop to be condemned for heresy*. Even though his Repressor of Overmuch Blaming the Clergy (1455) had the aim of refuting the Lollards, he had placed the authority of reason above that of Scripture and tradition. By the late 15th and early 16th centuries, however, humanism* was in the wings. In relation to this latter we must mention the figures of John Colet (c. 1466–1519), one of the first to deny the literal inspiration of Scripture and to replace allegorical interpretation with a more critical reading; and Thomas More (1478–1535), beheaded for his rejection of the Act of Supremacy.

g) Reformation. The Church of England has been officially separated from Rome since the time of Henry VIII (reigned 1509–47), in the course of which it rejected the sovereignty of the pope* and represented itself as the local form of the universal Church. Henry VIII's repudiation of Catherine of Aragon was certainly one of the causes of the Reformation in England, but not the only one. In any event, it gave king and Parliament the opportunity to reject the primacy of the pope and to assert the supremacy of the crown over the church. The first phases of the Reformation, moreover, consisted essentially in emancipating the church from the authority* of the pope. Theological change was already in the air. However, because institutional emancipation was carried out before it was fully articulated, the actual change in theological thinking was generally more limited than it was elsewhere. The almost complete acceptance by the episcopate of the break with Rome, following the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556), gave Anglicanism a more conservative character than the other European churches that had willingly accepted the Reformation. Because this change was embodied in a ritual, the first Book of Common Prayer (1549, produced almost entirely by Cranmer), Anglican liturgy generally serves as a doctrinal reference for Anglican theology, by virtue of the ancient principle lex orandi lex credendi.

The same period witnessed the rewriting of the history* of the church in England with the aim of presenting the change as a restoration. Church and state were to be considered as forming a single national body in which a quasi-episcopal king replaced the pope. In this way, Anglicanism was later able to assert that the Reformation had merely purified the existing church and not created a new one. But the Reformation was also responsible for the Bible in English, the dissolution of the monasteries (although the reasons for that were more economic than religious), the marriage* of priests*, vernacular liturgy (new Books of Common Prayer were published in 1552, 1559, and 1662), and reform of canon* law to make it independent of papal jurisdiction* (see in particular the canons of 1604). The sense of all these changes is clear.

Edward VI (reigned 1547–53) attempted to make the Anglican Church more Protestant. After his death his sister Mary Tudor (reigned 1553–58) tried, by contrast, to bring it back to Catholicism. Her policies engendered a suspicion of Catholicism that was to last in England and the Anglican world for centuries. Reformers like Hugh Latimer (1485–1555), Nicholas Ridley (1500–1555), and Cranmer himself were executed during her reign, while many of those who had sought refuge in Europe exerted pressure to make the Church of England more Protestant. With the accession of Elizabeth I to the throne in 1558, and thanks to her moderating influence, Anglicanism began to take on the form in which it is now known. That is to say that it represented a synthesis of Protestantism and Catholicism in a single national church whose cohesion derived from the monarch as “Supreme Head,” and from a general adherence to the Book of Common Prayer. There were protests, nevertheless, from more radical Protestants and from the Calvinists, who were soon to be called Puritans (Puritanism*).

Although there was an official collection of homilies by 1547 and acceptance of the Thirty-nine Articles of 1563–71 soon became obligatory for ordained clergy and holders of benefices (a requirement that lasted with few modifications until late in the 19th century), there was no Anglican “confession of faith” comparable to those of other churches. Similarly, although the works of J. Jewel (1522–71; Apology of the Church of England, 1562) and Richard Hooker (Ecclesiastical Polity, 1594–97) clearly define the Anglicanism of their period, there was no dominant Anglican theologian comparable to Luther* or Calvin*. Indeed, in the church that took shape under Elizabeth I in the 16th century, the national experience of the unity of worship in the vernacular was much more important than theological passion. The Elizabethan Book of Common Prayer of 1559 was based on that of 1552, with a few inflections toward a moderate Protestantism. These positions were justified by Hooker, who even argued for their superiority over other forms of Protestantism.

h) 17th Century. James I (reigned 1603–25) pursued the same policies as Elizabeth. A new cause of conflict appeared, however, when the movement known as “High Church,” with its predilection for the primitive church and liturgical ceremony began to take shape around the figure of William Laud (1573–1645). Laud is also known for his argument with the Jesuit John Fisher (1569–1641; A Relation of the Conference between William Laud and Mr. Fisher the Jesuit, 1639). In it he argued that the Anglican Church and the Roman Church were both parts of the Catholic Church. During the Civil War and under Cromwell (1599–1658), Parliament abolished the episcopate and banned the Book of Common Prayer, but the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660 once again “established” the Church of England, and a revised edition of the Book of Common Prayer appeared in 1662. The new rite of ordinations, in particular, made ordination* by a bishop obligatory. During the reigns of James I, Charles I, and Charles II, the Church of England was the only acceptable form of Christianity in the kingdom. But with the accession of William and Mary in 1689, one of the first decisions of Parliament was passage of the Act of Toleration, which granted liberty of worship to all Protestants, with certain conditions. “Nonconformity” was thereafter tolerated in Anglican theology.

The 17th century is generally considered the golden age of Anglicanism, its thinking being particularly well expressed by the theologians of the Caroline period. A simple list of their names and works is eloquent: Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626), Preces Privatae; Richard Field (1561–1616), Of the Church; Joseph Hall (1574–1656), Episcopacy by Divine Right; James Ussher (1581–1656), Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates; John Bramhall (1594–1663), A Just Vindication of the Church of England; John Cosin (1594–1672), Collection of Private Devotions; Herbert Thorndike (1598–1672), Discourse of the Government of Churches; William Chillingworth (1602–44), Religion of Protestants; Henry Hamond (1605–60), Practical Catechism; Thomas Fuller (1608–61), Church History of Britain; Anthony Sparrow (1612–85), Rationale or Practical Exposition of the Book of Common Prayer; Jeremy Taylor (1613–67), Holy Living and Holy Dying; Isaac Barrow (1630–77), Treatise on the Pope’s Supremacy; George Bull (1634–1710), Defensio Fidei Nicaenae; Edward Stillingfleet (1635–99), Origines Britannicae; Thomas Ken (1637–1711), Exposition on the Church Catechism; or, The Practice of Divine Love; and finally, Thomas Comber (1645–99), Companion to the Temple.

In general, the via media sought by these writers was not that of a compromise, but an intellectual and spiritual attempt to recover the simplicity and purity of the primitive church. Some of them were inclined to recognize that the Church of Rome (which remained outlawed through the kingdom) did not teach only error, and in this they differed from the Puritans, who saw “papisty” as the very opposite of Christianity. And despite their attachment to the episcopacy and the apostolic* succession, they also displayed an irenic attitude toward the Protestant churches of Europe. Also of theological importance in the 17th century were the “metaphysical” poets: John Donne (1572–1631), Thomas Traherne (1636–74), and Henry Vaughan (1622–95). A major poet who did not belong to this group, George Herbert (1593–1633), a priest of the Church of England, gave an ideal image of what a parish priest* should be in A Priest to the Temple, or The Country Parson.

These theologians generally belonged to the High Church, but they also included “latitudinarians,” who attached little importance to dogma and ecclesiastical organization and granted so much value to reason that they sometimes seemed to deify it. In addition to Edward Stillingfleet, mentioned above, these included Simon Patrick (1625–1707), the historian David Wilkins (1685–1745), and Archbishop John Tillotson (1630–94). Liberal in spirit, they had contempt for “enthusiasm” and emphasized principally the ethical implications of Christian faith and the harmony between revealed religion and natural* theology. Some of them were close to the Cambridge Platonists, a group of mystical philosophers of the mid-17th century (the best known are Henry More [1614–87] and Ralph Cudworth [1617–88]), for whom reason was the very presence of the spirit of God in humankind—“the lamp of the Lord,” in the words of Benjamin Whichcote (1609–83), a reference to Proverbs 20:27. Heirs of the humanist tradition of Colet and More, they applied all the moral seriousness of the Puritans in search of a union of philosophy* and theology, faith and reason, Christianity and Platonism. John Locke (1632–1704) was much more reductive. For him Christianity was summed up in a small number of simple truths* accessible to reason (see Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 1690, and The Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695). He was an advocate of total religious liberty* within a national church that had a very broad confessional foundation.

i) 18th Century. Anglicanism went through a crisis in the 18th century when a certain number of High Church dissidents chose to separate from the established Church rather than swear allegiance to William of Orange and his successors (Nonjurors). Their knowledge of orthodoxy* and of the Fathers of the Church had a major influence on the Scottish liturgy, which served as a model for the Communion liturgy of the Anglican Prayer Book in North America. One of them, William Law (1686–1715), is the author of one of the classics of English spiritual literature, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728); and another, Robert Nelson (1656–1715), wrote a long popular book, a Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England (1704). Anglican theology of the early 18th century also had to deal with a deism* that was close to pantheism* and to Unitarianism*, something already seen in the previous century, for example in the works of Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1583–1648).

Locke was a deist, as was John Toland (1670–1722), who advocated a Christianity without a supernatural* dimension (Christianity Not Mysterious, 1696); and so too was Matthew Tindal (1655–1733), for whom Christianity added nothing to what nature had already revealed (Christianity as Old as the Creation, 1730). William Law combated deism in The Case for Reason (1731). The most important religious event of the 18th century, however, was the movement of evangelical Revival, characterized by a return to the Bible and to justification by faith, by an insistence on personal conversion* and social reform, and finally by a Christianity turned toward action. Although the movement led by John Wesley (1703–91), his brother Charles (1707–88), and George Whitefield (1714–70) ended by separating from Anglicanism (Methodism*), the evangelical strain was important in Anglicanism itself, being given impetus by laymen* like Lord Shaftesbury (1801–85) and William Wilberforce (1759–1833), as well as the other members of the “Clapham Sect.” The struggle of the latter against slavery (liberty*) helped to bring about its abolition. We may also mention Charles Simeon (1759–1836), one of the founders of the Church Missionary Society (CMS), and Hannah More (1745–1833), whose religious books were widely read.

The century also produced bishops who were theologians and philosophers, such as George Berkeley (1685–1753), who relied on natural theology to combat deism (The Analogy of Religion, 1736). The theologian Daniel Waterland (1683–1740) wrote influential works on the divinity of Christ and on the Eucharist. And we must not forget the poets, Blake (1757–1827), Coleridge (1772–1834), and Wordsworth (1770–1850), who were also in their way religious writers.

j) 19th and 20th Centuries. The Church of England was in a sad state in the early 19th century, with clergy holding multiple positions, as well as problems with nepotism, nonresident pastors, and a very unequal distribution of church wealth. Reform was urgently needed. Thomas Arnold (1795–1842), headmaster of Rugby, was one of the first to react with his Principles of Church Reform (1833), but spiritual and theological renewal came from the Oxford Movement, the key figures of which were John Keble (1792–1866), John Henry Newman, and Edward Pusey (1800–1882). Keble’s 1833 sermon on national apostasy was the movement’s founding act. It is well known that Newman for a time thought it possible to reconcile Anglicanism and Catholicism (see the famous Tract 90), but he joined the Catholic Church in 1845. It was Pusey who led the movement thereafter. These writers, known as Tractarians because of the theological tracts they published, were High Church supporters: as such, they advocated a return to the Fathers of the Church and Catholic tradition, and stressed the notions of apostolic succession, sacramental grace*, and ascetic sanctity.

The Oxford Movement, which took its inspiration from the Caroline theologians, but also from the romantic opposition to liberalism, transformed Anglicanism both in external appearance and in spirit. In this context, the term Anglo-Catholic appeared for the first time in 1838 and designated those who were seeking to establish “concordats” that were as close as possible with the other “branches” of Catholic Christianity (particularly the Roman and Orthodox Churches). The keen interest in the liturgy (sometimes to the point of ritualism) that the Oxford Movement advocated had first appeared in 1832 with the Origines Liturgicae of W. Palmer (1803–85). John Mason Neale (1818–66), for example, took an interest in rites, founded a religious community, was an active writer of hymns, and wrote a history of the Orthodox Church. A certain strain of High Church existed in American Anglicanism before the Oxford Movement, thanks to people like John Henry Hobart, Bishop of New York from 1816 to 1830, who was looking for a synthesis, and according to whom “the High Church must be evangelical.”

From the mid-19th century on, Anglican theology took an ever greater interest in social problems. The goal of Frederick Denison Maurice (1805–72), for one example, was to socialize Christianity and Christianize socialism (see The Kingdom of Christ, 1838). His ecclesiology links the family*, the state, and the church. Biblical criticism developed around the same time, particularly at Cambridge under the influence of J. B. Lightfoot (1829–89), B. F. Westcott (1825–1901), and F. J. A. Hort (1828–92). A very controversial work called Essays and Reviews appeared in 1860 and was a milestone in liberal Anglican theology. It was condemned by the ecclesiastical authorities in 1864. Its authors defended freedom of research in the religious realm and favored an opening to the intellectual and social movements of modernity. They rendered obsolete the distinction made by the latitudinarians between fundamental doctrines and secondary doctrines by extending critical method to the interpretation of Scripture and the creeds. For example, Benjamin Jowett (1817–93) argued that Scripture should be read “like any other book.” Similar positions were expressed in the “liberal Catholicism” of Charles Gore (1853–1932) and his coauthors of Lux mundi (1889). Their goal was to bring together the theology of the Tractarians, modern critical methods, and social concern. For example, they accepted the evolutionist point of view (evolution*) and a kenotic concept of the human science of Jesus*. These concerns can be found in two important collections: Foundations (1912) and Essays Catholic and Critical (1926). The interest in social problems was particularly evident in the work of William Temple (1881–1944), which dealt with the relationship between theology and human experience: see Mens Creatrix (1917), Christus Veritas (1924), Nature, Man and God (1934), and Christianity and Social Order (1942). In America during the same period, William Porcher DuBose (1836–1918) was pursuing important research into soteriology, the history of the ecumenical councils*, and the notions of high priest and sacrifice. This was also the period of a bitter debate on the Thirty-nine Articles: should the members of the clergy adhere to them literally? In any event, this requirement was substantially softened in 1865.

On the basis of the works of William Reed Huntington (1838–1909; The Church-Idea, 1870), in 1886 the American Episcopalian (Anglican) Church formulated four fundamental principles that were approved by the Lambeth Conference in 1888. This is what is known as the Lambeth Quadrilateral: 1) Scripture (Old and New Testaments) “contains everything needed for salvation.” 2) The Apostles’ Creed* and the Nicene Creed* provide a sufficient definition of Christian faith. 3) The church recognizes the sacraments of baptism* and Communion, administered with the very words and instruments used by Christ himself. 4) The institution of the episcopacy is essential to the church and is to be adapted to the needs of different nations. The Quadrilateral remains the basis for ecumenical discussions within Anglicanism today. A commission was charged with examining the state of doctrine in Anglicanism, and its report (Doctrine in the Church of England) was published in 1938. However, because it did not define that doctrine, it contributed little to establishing the boundaries of permissible diversity.

As in other Christian churches, liturgical renewal made itself felt from 1950 on, and this influenced theology as well as the revision of the Book of Common Prayer. The book by A. G. Herbert, Liturgy and Society (1935), and the conference whose proceedings he published as The Parish Communion (1937), played a decisive role, as did The Shape of Liturgy by the Anglican Benedictine Gregory Dix (1945). A specialist in mysticism*, Evelyn Underhill (1875–1941; Mysticism, 1911; Worship, 1936), also had considerable influence.

Anglican theology of the 20th century was marked by Anglo-Catholicism and a moderate neobiblicism up to the period of Vatican* II. On the other hand, since the 1960s, liberalism and radicalism have taken the upper hand, as evidenced by the publication of Honest to God (J. A. T. Robinson) in 1960 and of The Secular Meaning of the Gospel (Paul van Buren) in 1963. The debate on the ordination of women (woman*) was heated until the synod* of the Church of England approved it on 11 November 1992 (following many other churches of the Anglican Communion). The first ordinations of women took place on 12 March 1994. The problem of the status of sexual minorities and that of the separation of church and state continues to be troublesome. Nevertheless, a revival of the charismatic movement (Pentecostalism) has been witnessed, as well as a renewal of evangelism, but in a form that is more learned, sacramental, and ecumenical than that of its 19th century predecessors.

k) Ecumenism. The coexistence within Anglicanism of Protestant and Catholic characteristics and its participation in the formation of the Ecumenical Council of Churches in 1948 have made it possible for it to play an active role in the ecumenical movement, for which the Lambeth Quadrilateral provides an excellent basis. The birth of the Church of South India in 1947, the product of the union of a million members on the basis of the Quadrilateral, provides a good example. The ecumenical patriarch (patriarchate*) of Constantinople recognized the validity of Anglican orders in 1922, and there is an active dialogue (although without intercommunion*) with the Orthodox churches. Since the Bonn agreement of 1932 there has been intercommunion with most of the old Catholic churches. The work of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) from 1960 to 1980 also gave rise to much hope, until it received a negative reaction from Rome. Discussions are in progress with the Reformed churches and the Methodists, as well as with the Lutherans.

- Certain Sermons and Homilies Appointed to Be Read in Churches in the Time of Queen Elizabeth, London, 1899.
- J. V. Bullard (Ed.), Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, 1604, London, 1934.
- Anglican Roman Catholic International Commission. The final report: Windsor, September 1981.

J. R. Wright (Ed.), Prayer Book Spirituality, New York, 1989.

G. R. Evans, J. R. Wright (Ed.) The Anglican Tradition: A Handbook of Sources, Minneapolis, 1991.

♦ J. H. R. Moorman (1953), A History of the Church in England, London (3rd Ed. 1980).

F. L. Cross, E. A. Livingstone (Ed.) (1958, 3rd Rev. Ed., 1997), ODCC.

S. Neill (1958), Anglicanism, Harmondsworth (4th Ed., New York, 1978).

A. M. Ramsey (1960), An Era in Anglican Theology: From Gore to Temple, New York.

R. J. Page (1965), New Directions in Anglican Theology: A Survey from Temple to Robinson, New York.

J. Macquarrie (1966), Principles of Christian Theology, New York (2nd Ed. 1977).

T. A. Langford (1969), In Search of Foundations: English Theology, 1900–1920, Nashville, Tenn.

S. W. Sykes (1978), The Integrity of Anglicanism, London.

L. J. Rataboul (1982), L'anglicanisme, Paris.

M. D. Bryant (1984), The Future of Anglican Theology, New York-Toronto.

A. A. Vogel (Ed.) (1984), Theology in Anglicanism, Wilton, Conn.

N. Lossky (1986), Lancelot Andrewes le prédicateur (1555–1626): Aux sources de la théologie mystique de l'Église d'Angleterre, Paris.

S. W. Sykes (Ed.) (1987), Authority in the Anglican Communion, Toronto.

S. W. Sykes, J. Booty (Ed.) (1988), The Study of Anglicanism, London-Philadelphia (2nd Ed. 1996).

G. Rowell (Ed.) (1992), The English Religious Tradition and the Genius of Anglicanism, Nashville, Tenn.

J. ROBERT WRIGHT

See also Calvinism; Congregationalism; Lutheranism; Methodism; Puritanism

Anhypostasy

The terms anhypostasy and enhypostasy have been used since the 16th century by Scholastic theologians, both Catholic and Protestant, to designate the particular ontological status of the humanity of Christ*. What they mean to indicate is that the man Jesus* is not a hypostasis or concrete individual existing separately, but that his humanity receives its concrete reality, or is “en-hypostasized,” in the personal being* of the second Person* of the Trinity*. As Karl Barth* says, “as a man, he thus exists in and with the one God*, according to the mode of existence of the Son and the eternal Logos, and not otherwise” (Die kirchliche Dogmatik 1932–67; Church Dogmatics).

a) Patristic Context. The terms anhypostasy and enhypostasy, which evoke a process and a state, did not exist in classical or patristic Greek. However, the corresponding adjectives, enhypostatos and anhypostatos, were common; they meant simply “subsisting” or “not subsisting,” having a specific concrete reality or not. In Christian theology* they began to be widely used in the Trinitarian debates of the fourth century, to affirm that Father*, Son, and Holy* Spirit were not words corresponding to no reality (anhypostatoi), simple divine modalities, but possessed a real being (enhypostaton), although they were defined by their relations.

Anhypostasy and enhypostasy became technical terms in the christological controversies of the sixth century. Starting from the classic conception of the Cappadocians, according to which essence (ousia) or nature (physis) designates a universal reality, and hypostasis or prosōpon (Latin persona) a concrete individual substance, person, or thing, the adversaries of the Christology* of Chalcedon* seem to have relied on an anti-Platonic axiom that was probably widespread at the time and to have maintained that “a nature/essence that is not subsisting does not exist” (ouk esti physis/ousia anhypostatos): in other words, that universals have no reality apart from the concrete things in which they are embodied. From this they concluded that the Chalcedonian conception of Christ as a hypostasis existing simultaneously “in two natures” was contradictory. In order to avoid the “Nestorian” consequence, which would then make Christ two hypostases or two individuals—a man united by grace and divine favor to the divine hypostasis of the Son—the anti-Chalcedonians maintained that he could be conceived of only as a single nature and a “composite” hypostasis; according to the phrasing dear to Cyril* of Alexandria, “a single incarnate nature of the Word*.”

To answer them, an advocate of the Chalcedonian position, Leontius of Byzantium (c. 490–c. 545), distinguished between hypostasis and hypostatic (to enhypostaton). The latter term did not apply to concrete individuals as such, but to universals (essence, nature) that were found in them, and it indicated that they were concretely embodied. It must therefore be said that divinity and humanity, as complete and functional natures, are both “hypostatic” (enhypostata) in the person of Christ, but that they are not hypostases. Leontius also conceded what the supporters of Cyril considered most important, namely, that the humanity of Christ comes to concrete or hypostatic existence by being assumed “into” the person of the Word of God. This meaning is not directly indicated by the en- of anhypostatos, which is simply the opposite of an a-, meaning “privation.” In Ekdosis tes orthodoxou pisteos (Exposition of the Orthodox Faith), John of Damascus (c. 750–c. 850) gave a characteristically precise expression to this conception.

The flesh of the Word of God has no specific subsistence, it is not another hypostasis beside the hypostasis of the Word, but by subsisting in the latter, it is hypostatic (anhypostatos), and not a hypostasis subsisting by itself. Hence, it can be said neither that it is without subsistence (anhypostatos) nor that it introduces another hypostasis into the Trinity.

b) Modern Usage. Modern theologians who have adopted this terminology have not always fully understood it. They believe that, for the patristic tradition*, the divine Person of the Logos assumed a generic or “impersonal” human nature (this is how they understand anhypostatos) and gave it a personal existence “in” him (which, in fact, no ancient writer maintains). The position of Leontius of Byzantium has been summed up by Baillie (1956) saying that, for Leontius, “although the humanity of Christ is not impersonal, it does not have an independent personality... Human nature is personalized in the divine Logos that assumes it, it is thus not impersonal (anhypostatos) but ‘impersonal’ (enhypostatos).” Some 20th-century Protestant theologians consider the idea of an “anhypostatic” humanity of Christ very important because it gives rightful place to divine initiative in the work of salvation and avoids granting too much autonomy to the created order. Torrance, echoing Augustine* and Barth, sees in these two terms the basic structure of the relationship between God and humanity: “Anhypostasia asserts the unconditional priority of grace*, that everything in theological knowledge derives from God’s grace... But enhypostasia, asserts that God’s grace acts only as grace. God does not override us, but makes us free. In merciful and loving condescension, he gathers us into union with himself, constituting us as his dear children, who share his life and love.”

A Catholic writer, critical of Scholasticism, maintains on the other hand that a Christology that uses the concept of anhypostasy by that very fact denies the full humanity of Christ, and he therefore proposes a reconsideration of all the Chalcedonian terminology. But whether one is for or against the use of these concepts, it is always the modern notion of existence as a person that is sought beneath this ancient vocabulary of hypostasis and nature. It is therefore inappropriate to make affirmations about the economy of salvation on the basis of the subtle ontological dialectic of the universal and the particular characteristic of the sixth century. From the point of view of Chalcedonian Christology this both exaggerates the importance of the terms and fails to see their precise meaning and import.

- Anon. (6th c.), De sectis, PG 86, 1240 A1–1241 C12.
- Euloge d’Alexandrie, Sunēgoriai (frag.), in F. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi, Münster, repr. 1981, 193–98.
- John of Damascus, Expositio fidei, Ed. B. Kotter, II, Berlin, 1973, 128.
- John of Damascus De fide contra Nestorianos 6, Ed. Kotter, IV, 1981, 413 Sq.

Leontius of Byzantium, Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos, PG 86, 1277 C14–1280 B10.
Leontius of Byzantium, Epiluseis, PG 86, 1944 C1–945 B2.
Pamphilus, Quaestiones et responsiones 7, CCG 19, 173–77.
♦ H. M. Relton (1917), A Study in Christology, London.
A. Michel (1922), “Hypostase,” DThC 7/1, 369–437; “Hypostatique (union),” ibid., 437–568, especially 528 Sq.
K. Barth (1938), KD I/2, §15, 178 Sq. (Dogmatique, Geneva, vol. 3, 1954).

D. M. Baillie (1956), God Was in Christ, London, 85–93.
P. Schoonenberg (1959), Hij een God van Mensen, Malmberg NV (He is the God of Man, CFI 71).
T. F. Torrance (1969), Theological Science, London, 216–19 (New Ed. 1990, 238–40).

BRIAN E. DALEY

See also Constantinople II, Council of; Hypostatic Union; Nestorianism

Animals

I. Old Testament

1. Main Texts

a) Narrative of Origins. In Genesis 1–3 and 7–9, man is associated with animals, which are seen by God* as “good” (Gn 1:21–25). It is in his capacity as image of God that he receives an authority* over them, which nevertheless excludes violence* or exploitation (Beauchamp 1987). Genesis 1:29f. implies that the diet of human beings as well as of animals was originally vegetarian (another opinion can be found in Dequeker, Bijdr.). In Genesis 2:19f., where the creation of woman is also described, man is invited to “name” the animals, an act of knowledge and power. The negative role of the snake, creature of God (3:1), remains unexplained. The accounts given by Abel (Gn 4:4) and Noah (Gn 8:20f.) recognize sacrifice* to be a universal custom (cf. with Ps 50:9–14, e.g.). With Noah’s help, God guarantees reproduction for all species (Gn 6:9ff., 7–9 passim). After the Flood, he modifies the status of human beings by granting them the right to eat the flesh of animals. The two texts which record this change are followed by a third from the same source (Gn 9:8–17), which describes the Covenant* between God and all living creatures, and still places cosmic peace* above any other value. Animals and human beings are coparticipants in the divine Covenant: although rarely put explicitly, this concept (Hos 2:20; Murray 1992) and Job 5:23 (obscure: ibid.) takes over from the archetypes that inspired Genesis 1–2, 9.

b) Legislative Texts. These texts codify the distinction between pure and impure animals (Lv 11; Dt 14:3–20) and the sacrificial rites (Lv 1–7; etc.). According to Exodus 21–23, Leviticus 22–25, and Deuteronomy 14–22, animals (and even trees) will be treated humanely. Contrary to 1 Corinthians 9:9, Philo does not resort to allegory to comment on these laws* (De Virt.) (Carmichael 1976; Murray 1992).

c) Other Texts. Human beings share with animals the condition of being creatures, but also that of being mortals (Pury 1985) (Ps 49:13–21; plants: see Ps 103:15f.). God takes care of all creatures (Ps 104:10–30) and knows their ways (Jb 39). Sparrows nest near him in the temple (Ps 84:4). Directives and reprimands may come to human beings through animals (e.g., Is 1:3; Jer 8:7), and bonds of affection are frequent between them (Balaam’s female donkey: Nm 22:28ff.; the ewe lamb of the poor in Nathan’s parable*: 2 Sm 12:3). Compassion for the suffering of animals (Jer 14:5f.; Jl 1:18–20; see Prv 2:10). The study of animals (of plants, of the cosmos*) is part of wisdom* (1 Kgs 5:13; Wis 7:20).

2. Personifications

Whether it is a question of the faithfulness of cattle (Is 1:3), or the ant’s haste (Prv 6:6ff.), or the ostrich’s insensitivity (Jb 39:13–18), virtues or vices are attributed to animals, who, together with all creatures, praise the Lord (Ps 148; Dn 3 [LXX]; see the “chapter on hymns”; see Encyclopaedia Judaica, “Pereq shirah”; and Beit-Arié 1966 and Francis of Assisi). Poetic imagination expresses here, better than science, the solidarity of what is created (Murray 1992).

3. Metaphors

An inexhaustible reserve of meanings, the world of animals expresses beauty (Sg 4); or animosity: for example in the guise of dogs (anonymous enemies): Psalms

59:6f., 14f.; lions (Assyrians): Isaiah 5:29; a dragon (Pharaoh): Ezekiel 29:3ff.; 32:2–8; grasshoppers (unstoppable destruction on the Day of YHWH: Jl 2:1–11) (Beauchamp, Creation and separation, 1969); or wild animals (wrath of God): Hosea 13:7f., and so on.

Peace* is consented to by dangerous animals (Ez 34:25–28); or, more accurately, it prevails between wild animals and humans. This is the myth of a golden age, taken up by Isaiah 11:6–9, probably to represent the social peace that is expected with the imminent advent of an ideal king (Murray 1992). Various rereadings influenced by the theme of a “messianic age,” then made these aspirations appear more distant and hazier. Central to all this is the representation of the king as a shepherd (Gilgamesh; Homer: poimènè laôn), applied first to God (Ps 23, 80:2, 100:3, 78:52), to his tenderness (Is 40:1; see Ez 34:11–31). God bestows this function on the king, of which David is the paradigm (Ps 78:70f.). Conversely, the “bad shepherds” are the bad rulers (Ez 34:2–10). Notwithstanding the proscription imposed on the making of pictures (Ez 20:7, etc.), the kéroubîm have their place in the temple*. The human-animal characters that bear the weight of the divine chariot in Ezekiel 1 may suggest that the interconnection between humans and animals is modeled on what is in heaven.

II. New Testament

Jesus affirms that God takes care of sparrows (Mt 10:29), flowers (Mt 6:28 ff.), and lost sheep (Lk 15:3–7). According to the majority of exegetes, Mark 1:12f. (“He [Jesus] was with the wild beasts”) does not refer to the (Pauline) theme of a second Adam*. However, those who concede more room to the midrashic allusions, as well as some poets, do accept such an interpretation (Murray 1992). Peter*’s vision (Acts 10:10–16), in which he sees both pure and impure animals gathered together (“What God has made clean, do not call common”), interpreting this as a metaphor for the welcoming of Gentiles into the church*, is based more widely on a concept of the universal sanctity of what has been created. By way of contrast, the rigid anthropocentrism of Paul’s denial that God could take care of oxen (1 Cor 9:9; see Dt 25:4) comes as quite a shock. In the apocalypse, animal metaphors principally denote evil* and destruction. An angel* shouts, however: “Do not harm the earth or the sea or the trees, until we have sealed the servants of our God on their foreheads” (Rev 7:3). It is the repeated image of the shepherd-lamb* (7:17), pasturing his flock in the temple-paradise, that evokes the positive aspect of the biblical symbolism of animals.

- Philon, De opificio mundi, in Œuvres, vol. 1, Paris; De Virtutibus, in Œuvres, vol. 26.
- ◆ Beit-Arié (1966), Pereq Shirah, Critical Ed., 2 vols., Jerusalem.
- C. Carmichael (1976), “On Separating Life and Death: An Explanation of Some Biblical Laws,” HThR 69, 1–7.
- A. de Pury (1985), “Animalité de l’homme et humanité de l’animal dans la pensée israélite,” in L’animal, l’homme, le Dieu dans le Proche-Orient ancien, coll., Cahiers du CEPOA, Louvain, 47–70.
- P. Beauchamp (1987), “Création et fondation de la loi en Gn 1, 1–2, 4a,” in L. Derousseaux (Ed.), La création dans l’Orient Ancien, Paris, 139–82.
- R. Murray (1992), The Cosmic Covenant: Biblical Themes of Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation, London.

ROBERT MURRAY

See also Adam; Cosmos; Creation; Ecology; Purity/Impurity; Sacrifice; Violence

Anointing of the Sick

a) Early Christianity. In early Christianity a certain number of liturgical accounts, as well as accounts of other types, bear witness to the existence of a blessing with oil for the sick, or the practice of anointing them in accordance with the recommendation of James 5:14–15. The most important liturgical accounts are the Roman blessing of the oil for the sick, which took place at the end of the eucharistic prayer; and a prayer*, in Egypt, from a compendium called the Euchologion (c. 350; Sacramentary) of Serapion. The Roman blessing was already in existence in the Greek language, in the Apostolike paradosis (Apostolic Tra- dition) attributed to Hippolytus (c. 170–c. 236) (and this textual continuity is one of the elements of the complex debate regarding the specifically Roman nature of tradition). The text of the prayer for the blessing of the oil did not see much variation until the present time; but during the Middle Ages, the ministry* of this blessing came to be reserved for the bishop*, who consecrates the three holy* oils on Maundy Thursday in the course of the Mass of the Chrism. In the Greek-speaking East the prayer was already in existence in the fourth to fifth centuries in the Euchologion of Serapion, and has never ceased to be part of the Byzantine ritual of anointing, called the euchelaion, which meant, at first, “prayer on the oil,” then, more recently, “prayer oil.” The anointing of the sick is also mentioned in a letter addressed in 416 by Pope Innocent I to Decentius, bishop of Gubbio in central Italy. This anointing, which he relates to the Epistle of James, is intended for the care of the baptized who are sick (with the exception of public penitents). The oil is blessed by the bishop and may be brought to the sick by a priest or by a lay* person, and the Roman custom includes an internal as well as an external use of the oil. Similar customs were practiced in various Western countries until about the eighth century.

b) Middle Ages. From the Carolingian period at the very latest, the anointing was done exclusively by priests*. Since the custom was to wait until the last moment to resort to the sacrament* of penance*, the anointing was deferred, and what was expected from it was mainly the forgiveness of sins*, a conditional effect that is mentioned at the end of James’s text (“if he is a sinner, his sins will be forgiven”). After the middle of the 12th century, when the Latin list of the seven sacraments was established, the anointing of the sick was included. During the 12th and 13th centuries this anointing was commonly given the name extreme unction and dubbed “the sacrament of those who go away (exeuntium).” The liturgy* of the monks of Cluny, then that of the Papal Chapel, spread a custom whereby the sacramental anointing was applied to the organs of the five senses. In each case there was a formula asking “that you be forgiven for the sins you have committed with such or such sense.” In this perspective, any bodily effect of the sacrament is considered exceptional and nonessential. It became necessary, then, to distinguish between the effect of extreme unction and that of penance; the theologians of the later Middle Ages did this by stating that anointing had its own effect: it removed the remnants of the sin, and thus prepared the soul to appear before God. This opinion led to the practice of performing extreme unction after the viaticum; this became the rule of the Roman liturgy from the end of the Middle Ages until the liturgical reform of Vatican* II.

The liturgies of Eastern Christianity have different customs on this point. Copts, Western Syrians, Greeks, and Russians insist on the bodily effect of the sacrament (something that led Simeon of Thessalonica, the great Greek liturgical commentator to protest, in the 15th century, against the Western idea of extreme unction). Armenians and Eastern Syrians have, on the other hand, abandoned the practice of anointing the sick.

c) Protestant Reformers and the Council of Trent. Anointing of the sick is one of the sacramental rites accepted by the Roman Church* that the Reformers refused to include among the sacraments. In his treaty Von der babylonischen Gefängniss der Kirche (1520; On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church) Luther* thus puts in opposition the healing* ritual mentioned in the Epistle of James and the rite intended for the dying in the Roman Church. As for Calvin*, he thinks the gift of healing attested by the New Testament was not preserved beyond the apostolic era. The churches born of the Reformation were to maintain the blessing of the sick and the dying, while restricting it to an imposition of the hands to avoid any suggestion of a sacrament.

Contrary to this, in 1551 the Council* of Trent* passed a doctrinal decree on extreme unction. In a comprehensive account and in four canons, the Catholic Church formally declared that there was true homogeneity between the sacrament and the practice recommended by the Epistle of James, and it affirmed the sacerdotal identity of the minister of the sacrament. While designating the sacrament as extreme unction, however, the conciliar document avoided saying that such a designation belonged to the deposit of faith*. The Roman Ritual of 1614 includes a section on extreme unction corresponding to the teachings of the Council of Trent, and the practice there outlined has become more or less general in the Latin church.

In the liturgies of the Anglican Communion the first Booke of the Common Prayer and Administracion of the Sacramentes (1549) offered a rite of unction, which later disappeared. Similar rites would appear again in the 20th century, especially after Vatican* II. The Episcopal Book of Common Prayer of the United States (1977) provides a good example.

d) Second Vatican Council and Liturgical Reform. Vatican II’s constitution on the liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium 73; 1963), whose exact phrasing led to much debate, prefers the designation “anointing of the sick,” but it does not conclude in a really decisive way whether this sacrament is to be reserved for the sick who are in danger. Coming after the rite of the blessing of the holy oils (1971), a new rite for the anointing of the sick (1972) implemented the conciliar decision and replaced the anointing of the five senses, together with the corresponding sacramental formula, with anointing of the forehead and the hands. This new rite is accompanied by a formula directly inspired by the Epistle of James, which implies that the remission of sins through this sacrament is a conditional effect and not its main effect. The rite also offers also a choice of prayers adapted to the particular condition of each sick individual. This rite can be celebrated in a communal fashion, for sick or old people assembled together.

In the Orthodox churches the blessing before Easter of the oils intended for the sick is followed by the anointing of the congregation with the holy oil. This custom may have originated in an ancient ritual of reconciliation for penitents.

- A. Chavasse (1942), Étude sur l'onction des malades dans l'Église latine du IIIe au XIe s., vol. I: Du IIIe s. à la réforme carolingienne (vol. II was not published).
- J. Dauvillier (1953), "Extrême-onction dans les Églises orientales," DDC 5, 725–89.
- E. Doronzo (1954), Tractatus dogmaticus de Extrema-Uncione, 2 vols., Milwaukee.
- A. Duval (1970), "L'extrême-onction au concile de Trente: Sacrement des mourants ou sacrement des malades?" MD 101, 127–72 (Repr. in Des sacrements au concile de Trente, Paris, 1985, 223–79).
- R. Cabié (1973), La lettre du pape Innocent Ier à Décentius de Gubbio, Louvain.
- P.-M. Gy (1973), "Le nouveau Rituel romain des malades," MD 113, 29–49.
- H. Vorgrimler (1978), Buße und Krankensalbung, HDG IV/3.
- M. Dudley, G. Rowell (Ed.) (1993), The Oil of Gladness: Anointing in the Christian Tradition, London.
- P.-M. Gy (1996), "La question du ministre de l'onction des malades," MD 205, 15–24.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Baptism; Eucharist; Holy Oils; Marriage; Ordination/Order; Penance; Sacrament

Anselm of Canterbury

(c. 1033–1109)

An eminent representative of monastic theology*, Anselm principally looked for the reasons that would help elucidate the mysteries* of the faith*. His rational method led to him being seen as the "father of Scholasticism*."

a) Life. Anselm was born in Aosta (Italy) around 1033 and at a very young age formed the intention of joining the Benedictine monastery of his region. After his mother's death* Anselm left the family manor because of a difference of opinion with his father. After three years in Burgundy (1053–56) he decided to join Lanfranc, a famous scholar of that time, at the recently founded abbey of Bec in Normandy. As a monk at Bec from 1060 Anselm was entrusted with teaching duties by Lanfranc. He became prior of the community in 1063, exercising that function for 15 years. Elected as the second abbot of Bec in 1078, for another 15 years he governed an abbey with estates and priories that were rapidly spreading, on the Continent as well as in recently conquered England. During a journey to England in 1093 Anselm was forced by King William the Red (Rufus) to become archbishop of Canterbury. Anselm had to hold simultaneously the two functions of Primate of England and of First Baron of the Realm in a climate of perpetual tension, under two successive monarchs who governed as absolute rulers. In the face of royal power and at risk to his own life, he asserted and defended the primacy of spiritual power and the freedom of the church*. This cost him two exiles. During the first of these he lived in Rome*, attended the Council of Rome and also the Council of Bari (1098), at which the Latin church's doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit (*Filioque) was pitted against the Greek position. Having started Cur Deus homo (1098; Why God Was Made Man) at Canterbury at the height of persecution, Anselm completed it near Capua. After the death of William the Red he went back to England (1100), but the attitude of King Henry I Beauclerc obliged him to choose exile a second time (1103). After the meeting of l'Aigle (1105), where he threatened the King with excommunication, Anselm went back definitively to England and convened the Council of London in order to clarify the difficult situation of the Church of England. He died in Canterbury on 21 April 1109.

b) God. Anselm was approximately 40 years old when he wrote his first meditations: the Meditatio de redemptione humana (Meditation on Human Redemption). He was a highly valued lecturer in monastic circles, and his first spiritual writings spread rapidly. In these writings Anselm introduces a new method of meditating and praying*, one that has recourse to reason*. His methodological research sola ratione (through reasoning alone) was, in fact, the result of monastic exhortations (collationes), long discussions, and the teaching given at the school of Bec. It was there that Anselm started practicing the sort of research that so fascinated his listeners that they begged their master to put his unusual meditations in writing. The result was the Monologion of 1076. In it, Anselm reflects on the divine essence so that nothing will be imposed by the authority* of the Scripture*.

Anselm starts by proving that there exists something supremely good and supremely great, which is the summit (summum) of all that is. He establishes his thesis for the benefit of those who have never heard of a similar thing or who do not believe in it. With the latter in mind, he declares that each human being will be able to prove, through reason alone (saltem sola ratione), everything we necessarily believe about God* and his creatures. Anselm starts with the various degrees of kindness that lead necessarily to the assertion that there is such a thing as Sovereign Good*. The meditation deals next with the nature of God and of his absolute being*. This process, which is purely rational (disputatio), is applied to all the divine attributes*. It reaches its peak in the study of the Trinity* and ends with the question of the knowledge of the Ineffable. Borrowing generously from Augustine*, Anselm condenses in a dialectical synthesis everything we can know about God, except the Incarnation*. God is presented as Spirit.

Anselm's thinking is certainly that of a monk, but it would be a mistake to classify it with monastic thinking in general. Indeed, the mainstream monastic thinking of Anselm's time, as represented by Peter Damien and others (Gérard de Csanàd, Rupert of Deutz) is more or less a tendency to resist the intrusion of the profane sciences such as grammar and dialectics into the lectio sacra (sacred Word). Even Lanfranc avoids using dialectics for the elucidation of the sacra pagina (sacred page), except when he wishes to show that he is capable of mastering it when facing its champions, who resort to it in order to question certain dogmas*.

Anselm's attitude is totally different. In his first meditation on the divine essence (Monologion) he makes full use of every intellectual resources, not only of dialectics (disputatio), but also of introspection, to clarify the Christian mystery of the triune God with a philosophical framework. Anselm makes generous use of the fundamental philosophical notions accessible at the time and even deploys a radical ontology. This entails exploring in depth the problem of the God called Summus Spiritus, who is also presented as Summum Omnium—having absolute power, independent of anyone else, needed by all beings for their welfare and indeed for their mere existence. This ontology goes to the very roots of being: the sovereign being alone is, and all the rest is quasi-nothingness*. Anselm returns to the problem of nothingness in one of his letters (Epistle 91), in which he places it in relation to the definition of evil*; the deepest discussion of that problem is to be found in the De casu diaboli (On the Fall of Satan).

Because of the novelty of his method—the use of “necessary reasons” intended to prove what it is that faith says of God, and even of the mystery of the Trinity—Anselm could not avoid giving rise to severe disquiet and indeed criticism among his entourage, mainly from his old master Lanfranc, who in the meantime had become archbishop of Canterbury. To defend his orthodoxy Anselm invokes the authority of the Fathers*, and most particularly Augustine's (354–430) De Trinitate (On the Holy Trinity).

To the external criticism coming from those around him was soon added Anselm's critique of his own thinking. The rational approach he had deployed in the Monologion started to appear too complicated to him. He had the idea to put an end to what he called multorum concatenatione contextum argumentorum (the sequence of numerous arguments that are intertwined) and to replace the complicated arguments unfolded in the Monologion with a single argument. This produced the Proslogion in 1077–78, the work of a contemplative mind in search of a supremely logical synthesis of all our knowledge* about God, incorporating the irrefutable proof of his existence* and of his essence and attributes*. In the Proslogion, initially called Fides quaerens intellectum (Faith Seeking Understanding), a title that reveals a great deal about his entire program, one can find simultaneously the expression of the adoration of God, which has been revealed through faith; and a dialectical approach by the mind, which is attempting to understand the object of contemplation*, and engaging, in order to do so, its whole rational capacity (cogitari posse).

This dialectical approach is undertaken by means of the “principle of greatness”: aliquid quo nihil maius cogitari potest (something in relation to which nothing greater can be thought). If God is “the one in relation to whom nothing greater can be thought,” he is “the one who exists not only in thought, but also in reality.” This dialectics leads us at first to the obvious: there are things that exist only in thought, and there are also things that exist in thought as well as in reality. According to the hierarchy of dignities that this dialectics presupposes, what exists in reality is greater than what exists only in thought. Thus, if God is “the one in relation to whom nothing greater can be thought,” he must exist not only in thought but also in reality.

Anselm’s approach stems from two presuppositions: First, that God is “The one in relation to whom nothing greater can be imagined.” And second, that all that exists also in reality is greater than that which exists only in thought. Each of these two presuppositions implies an outlook that considers all things in the perspective of greatness.

Anselm ends up not only with the assertion that “God really is,” but also with the logical impossibility of negating the existence of God. That leads us to the following conclusion from the Proslogion: “That which you first gave me to believe, I now conceive in such a way, enlightened by you, that even if I did not want to believe it, I would be unable to unthink it.” For from the moment one poses the problem of God in the perspective of “the one in relation to whom nothing greater can be thought,” any denial of the characteristic “greater,” represented by the real existence of God in relation to the idea that we make of him, becomes a logical impossibility. When the “fool” of Psalms 14:1 and 53:1, who says in his heart that “there is no God,” hears that God is “the one in relation to whom nothing greater can be thought,” he finds himself in the logical impossibility of denying the real existence of God. The dialectical opposition between faith and reason reaches its climax. On the one hand, faith is placed inside brackets; on the other hand, it is impossible not to think that God does exist.

Most commentators on the Proslogion—from the monk Gaunilon, a contemporary of Anselm, to the commentators of our own time—stop at the proof of the existence of God, mistakenly called, since Kant*, the “ontological argument,” whereas it should be called the “dialectical proof through greatness.” And yet, Anselm’s project goes much further: it proposes to include everything we believe regarding the divine substance in that same dialectics of greatness.

According to this logic one is led to assert about God all that is better if he exists than if he does not, namely eternity*, omnipresence*, truth*, kindness (good*): in brief, all the perfections that might be said to constitute his essence and his attributes. In this first stage of the dialectical approach intelligence scours the whole of creation*. It undertakes to transcend the finite by means of logic, in order to dwell only on the perfections that represent a “plus,” something greater, in relation to the imperfections to which they are opposed. In this perspective what is eternal is greater than what is ephemeral: it follows that God must be eternal, not only in thought, but in reality.

However, the first stage of the dialectics of greatness considers everything in relation to intelligence, and so one might be tempted to identify God with “something” that is indeed in reality, but that can be “grasped” by intelligence. And yet, this is not the case in Anselm’s thought. By means of his dialectics he is able to transcend intelligence with intelligence by applying to human intelligence the same dialectical principle that had brought him to criticize the finite being. God is not only greater than what intelligence is capable of grasping, but greater than the concept itself. As he had done at his starting point, Anselm, now at the peak of his dialectical approach, addresses God directly to spell out his principle: God is not only that which completes the capacity of our intelligence, he is also that which transcends it. God, therefore, can only be pure surplus, pure excess, for had he not been surplus, one would be able to think of a being greater than him; and had he not been real—existing really as excess—one would be able to think of a being still greater than him. It is in this way that Anselmian dialectics arrives at its goal, with the assertion of God’s reality; this reality goes beyond anything the human mind can conceive and goes even beyond the boundaries of human intelligence.

The Proslogion was criticized by the monk Gaunilon in terms that foreshadowed the kind of criticism Kant would later make of the “ontological argument.” For Gaunilon, Anselm’s thought implies that one can talk about what precisely cannot be talked about: dealing with that topic is doing what is an antinomy of the undescrivable. In his reply Anselm tried to strengthen his argument with a series of demonstrations by contradiction, which are evidence of a subtle dialectical mind. He categorically rejected Gaunilon’s suggestion that it would be sufficient to imagine something greater than everything—such as “the lost island”—and deduce from this that it is in existence.

c) Salvation. After the Proslogion, Anselm, already an abbot, between 1082 and 1090 composed several dialogues, three of which—De veritate (Concerning Truth), De libertate arbitrii (On Freedom of Choice), and De casu diaboli (The Fall of Satan)—are designed to aid understanding of the Scriptures. They are not, however, biblical commentaries. What these dialogues do is explain a small number of biblical statements, the most important being: “God is truth.” Concerning Truth stems from the confrontation of traditional Augustinianism* (or from Augustinian Platonism*) with the Aristotelianism* of the logic corpus translated by Boethius*, the logica vetus, whose revival at the end of the 10th century brought about a rationalization of theology. Deus est veritas (God is truth) seems contrary to the Aristotelian definition of truth. Anselm solves the problem by insisting on the transcendental nature of the Truth that is God: the summa veritas causes the veritas essentiae rerum which, in turn, causes the veritas enuntiationis, the truth according to Aristotle.

On Freedom of Choice, as well as The Fall of Satan, discuss the Augustinian problem of freedom* and responsibility by proposing a totally new definition of freedom. Human beings are free not only because they can choose one thing rather than another, but also because they are capable of morality (iustitia). They can evade the determination of nature* only if they are morally good. Since God could not have determined that human beings can give up their just will (because in doing so he would be wanting what he does not want human beings to want, which would mean wanting what he himself does not want), the persistence of a just will in human beings is the result of an act of perfect self-determination, something praiseworthy and therefore responsible. God’s grace* does not change this, but it explains how human beings (who on their own, can only choose what seems pleasant to them) can be just, or morally good (how they can love God for his own sake): his justice* is always a gift of God.

De grammatico (De Grammatico: How Expert-in-Grammar Is Both a Substance and a Quality)—the only nonreligious writing by Anselm—dates from this period. In this original study on the problems of language he initiates his disciples into subtle exercises of logic, introduces a new terminology that allows raising the problem of the reference, and recognizes the usefulness of such exercise, in accordance with rules familiar to the dialecticians of the time.

Cur Deus Homo (Why God Made Man) is the third work among the most famous by Anselm. He started it in England right in the midst of persecution and completed it in Capua (1098) during his first exile. It outlines a bold soteriology—a theory of vicarious satisfaction—in which Anselm attempts to find the necessary reasons to justify the Incarnation. In the Monologion and the Proslogion Anselm had wanted to support, by purely rational means, the truth of revealed faith regarding the divine substance, with the exception of the Incarnation. He had left open the opportunity to treat this mystery separately, in the Why God Made Man, in the form of a diptych.

Why God Made Man is a dialogue between Anselm and Boson, a monk of Bec. Answering the question: For what reason or necessity did God decide to make himself man?, he inaugurated a literary genre that later had great success in the Middle Ages (Gilbert Crispin, disciple of Anselm, Abelard*, Nicholas* of Cusa). This important work is divided into two parts. The first contains the objections of the infidels who reject the Christian faith—because, according to them, it goes against reason—and the answers of the believers. In this work Anselm shows by means of necessary reasons that no human being can be saved without Jesus Christ*. In the second part he proves, still by rational means—as if nothing were known of Christ (remoto Christo)—on the one hand that human nature was created for eternal bliss and that human beings were meant to enjoy that bliss in both body and soul*, and on the other hand that this bliss can be realized only by the grace of the Man-God. As a consequence, all that we believe about Christ necessarily had to be realized before reason. Thus, those reasons that we seek will at the same time constitute the common point between the believer and the unbeliever. The object of the search is therefore common, and that is why a genuine dialogue can be established.

The fundamental question of the Incarnation is, at the same time, the challenge, the main objection (obicere) of the infidels, who ridicule “Christian naivety.” It also gives rise to many queries, from well-read people and uncultivated ones alike, who all ask for the reason behind that question (rationem eius).

The complete wording of the question comes from Boson: “For what necessity and for what reason, has God, who is nonetheless all powerful, assumed the humble condition and the infirmity of human nature in view of its restoration?” According to Anselm, in order to obtain a correct solution, it is indispensable to clarify certain fundamental notions, such as necessity, power, will, and the like, which, moreover, cannot be considered separately. Given that human beings are meant for beatitude*, given that they cannot avoid sinning in their present condition, and that they need the remission of sins*, it was necessary, “death having become part of human condition through the disobedience of a man, that in turn, life be reestablished through the obedience of a man.” It was fitting then (a necessity of appropriateness), given this premise, that “divine and human nature meet each other in the form of one sole person.” The Father* therefore wants humankind to be restored by the human act of the death* of Christ, greater than the sin of human beings, and the Son “prefers to suffer rather than leave humankind without salvation*.” Through that, he settles humanity’s debt and reestablishes divine honor. The satisfaction of sin is commensurate with the divine honor that has been injured; and as a consequence it cannot be done by a human being alone: “The sinner owes to the help of God what he cannot turn around by himself, and failing that help, he cannot be saved.” It is then necessary that someone “should pay to God, for man’s sin, something greater than anything that is, except God.” The author of the satisfaction must therefore be “a God-man,” because “nobody can do it, except a real God, and nobody should do it, except a real man”: the same one must be perfect God and perfect man.

Anselm also composed a few occasional works: Epistola de incarnatione Verbi (1095; The Incarnation of the Word) to refute the errors of Roscelin de Compiègne (tritheism*); De processione Spiritus Sancti (Concerning the Procession of the Holy Spirit). In this opuscle, which resembles a dialectical exercise, advancing by means of continual objections (questions) and answers, Anselm hopes to be able, by means of reason (rationabiliter), to bring the Greeks to recognize the procession of the Holy Spirit according to the doctrine of the Latin church*.

De conceptu virginali et de originali peccato (Concerning Virginal Conception and Original Sin) is a complement to Why God Made Man. Indeed, Boson, Anselm’s interlocutor, does not seem entirely satisfied with the reasons proposed by Anselm to explain how God, who is without sin, could have assumed his role as man, while mankind sins. De concordia praescientiae et praedestinationis et gratiae dei cum libero arbitrio (On the Harmony of Foreknowledge, Predestination, and the Grace of God with Free Will) deals with the problem of predestination*. This question originates in the apparent contradiction between the different biblical texts: some of them seem to imply that free will plays no part in salvation, and some others seem to suggest that salvation rests entirely on it. Thus the question of free will springs up like a real Sic et Non (Yes and No) a short time before Abelard.

Letters. Anselm left an abundant correspondence: 372 letters recognized to be authentic and covering some 30 years of his life. Some deal with doctrinal problems, but most are precious testimonies to his religious and political commitments, and accounts of his fights against abuses and royal tyranny and for the freedom of the church.

Anselm maintained assiduous relations with the most important personalities of his time, both political and religious: bishops*, abbots, popes*, dukes, counts, countesses, kings and the people close to them, but also ordinary monks, young students, and members of his own family. All of these looked to him for advice and regarded him as a trusted counselor. His letters show his limpid writerly style, marked by simplicity and conciseness; they focus on what is essential and guide his correspondents toward God.

d) Method: Faith in Search of Understanding. Anselm’s argumentation aims to be convincing “at least (saltem) through reasoning alone.” The addition of saltem to sola ratione makes us understand that, for him, the hierarchy of knowledge remains intact: the rational approach should always respect the superiority of faith. For, nisi credideritis, non intelligetis (if you do not believe, you will not understand): faith remains the starting point of all rational knowledge, even as far as the dialectical principle of the Proslogion is concerned. Throughout Anselm’s work, it is faith that pursues the search, it is faith that calls for intelligibility: Fides quaerens intellectum. Faith remains the starting point of the dialectical search, but not of all natural knowledge, because Anselm will always continue to pretend to the ability to convince even the pagans. He has therefore changed the original title Fides quaerens intellectum into Monologion, which indicates a certain philosophical intention.

In the Monologion Anselm does not invoke the help of any authority and does not quote the Scriptures. In Why God Made Man he neglects the fact of Christ (remoto Christo) and looks for “necessary” reasons to explain the necessity of the Incarnation by nevertheless finding support in the Scriptures. The rationes (reasons) are natural reasons as well as quotations from the Scriptures. However, as with the God of the Proslogion, the redemptive work of God here appears, in its greatness, to go beyond the human mind.

The expression sola ratione can be found in Augustine; the method it designates is, however, well and truly Anselmian. Anselm makes full use of all the resources of reason by drawing heavily on the philosophical arsenal of his time. He wants to arrive at a purely rational synthesis of the object of faith through the logical sequence of a series of necessary reasons. However, the rational approach as founded on faith relies on introspection as well as on concrete examples that are likely to clarify the mysteries.

The full use of reason is carried along by the momentum of an unending quest, a quaerere whose dramatic shape is mapped out by Augustine at the end of De Trinitate. That momentum is motivated by the quaerite faciem eius semper, the invitation of Psalm 105 to “seek his presence continually.” That search may be realized by means of rationes necessariae (necessary reasons), and it is here that dialectics, the use of logic and of the resources of logic, come into the picture (in the use of invincible arguments, of reductio ad absurdum, of philosophical notions, and in the deepening of the usus communis loquendi). Anselm attempts to adjust and purify these resources through a metaphysical form of thinking and through the use of similitudines drawn from experience*. He does this in order to render intelligible the question being asked, and to illustrate the truth that is to be sought and found.

Anselm recognizes, however, the possibility of finding better and more convincing reasons. Why God Made Man is a typical case of the extreme determination of Anselmian inquiry to explore matters to the fullest: having undertaken a prolonged search for reasons, Anselm leaves the door open, and he actually re-examines the same question in Concerning Virginal Conception and Original Sin because he feels that his interlocutor Boson is not satisfied.

On the other hand, the momentum of this search does not retreat in the face of any mystery that faith may pose: there is an a priori readiness to tackle any object. Fides quaerens intellectum is not only the statement of a method, it is also a research program, a program for a life nurtured by prayer.

Anselm's method was hailed by his contemporaries as a real liberation. William of Malmesbury makes a comparison between Anselm and the other theologians of his time, who were attempting "to extort their disciples' credulity by means of authority." Anselm, on the other hand, attempted "to corroborate their faith through reason, by demonstrating with invincible arguments that everything we believe is in accordance with reason and that it cannot be otherwise."

- Anselm, Opera Omnia, Ed. F.S. Schmitt, 6 vols., Seckau-Rome-Edinburgh, 1938–61.
- Eadmer, Historia Novorum in Anglia, et Opuscula Duo De Vita Sancti Anselmi et Quibusdam Miraculis Ejus, Ed. M. Rule, London, 1884 (2nd Ed. 1965).
- F. S. Schmitt, Ein neues unvollendetes Werk des hl. Anselm von Canterbury, BGPhMA, vol. 33/3, 1936.
- M. Corbin (Ed.), L'œuvre de saint Anselme de Cantorbéry, 10 vols. planned (6 published) (bilingual edition), Paris, 1986–.
- R. W. Southern, F. S. Schmitt, Memorials of St. Anselm, Oxford, 1991.

Collections

- Spicilegium Beccense, I: Congrès international du IXe centenaire de l'arrivée d'Anselme au Bec, 1959; II: Les mutations socioculturelles au tournant des XI-XIIe siècles, 1984.
- Analecta Anselmiana, 5 vols., Frankfurt, I: 1969; II: 1970; III: 1972; IV: 1975; V: 1976.
- Anselm Studies I: Anselm at Canterbury, London, 1983; II: Episcopi ad saecula—Saint Anselm and Saint Augustine, Villanova, Penn., 1988; III: Lewiston, N.Y., 1996.
- ♦ C. Filliatre (1920), La philosophie de saint Anselme: Ses principes, sa nature, son influence, Paris.
- A. Koyré (1923), L'idée de Dieu dans la philosophie de saint Anselme, Paris.
- K. Barth (1931), Fides quaerens intellectum: Anselms Beweis der Existenz Gottes im Zusammenhang seines theologischen Programms, Zurich.

- F. S. Schmitt (1932), "Zur Chronologie der Werke des hl. Anselm von Canterbury," RBen 44, 322–50.
- É. Gilson (1934), "Sens et nature de l'argument de saint Anselme," AHDL 9, 5–51.
- J. Rivière (1936), "La question du Cur deus Homo," RevSR 16, 1–32.
- P. Vignaux (1947), "Structure et sens du 'Monologion,'" RSPPhTh 31, 192–212.
- D. Heinrich (1959), Der ontologische Gottesbeweis, Tübingen.
- R. Roques (1962), "La méthode de saint Anselme dans le 'Cur deus Homo'," Aquinas 5, 3–57; (1963), Anselme de Cantorbéry: Pourquoi Dieu s'est fait homme, SC 91 (bibl.).
- C. Viola (1970), "La dialectique de la grandeur: Une interprétation du 'Proslogion'," RThAM 37, 23–55.
- J. Vuillemin (1971), Le Dieu d'Anselme et les apparences de la raison, Paris.
- Eadmer. (1972), The Life of St. Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, Ed. R. W. Southern, Oxford.
- H. Kohlenberger (1972), "Similitudo und Ratio," Überlegungen zur Methode bei Anselm von Canterbury, Bonn.
- H. de Lubac (1976), "Seigneur, je cherche ton visage": On chap. XIV of St. Anselm's 'Proslogion,'" ArPh 39, 201–25, 407–25.
- G. S. Kane (1981), Anselm's Doctrine of Freedom of the Will, New York-Toronto.
- K. Kienzler (1981), Glauben und Denken bei Anselm von Canterbury, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- G. R. Evans (1984), A Concordance to the Works of St. Anselm, 4 vols., Millwood.
- P. Gilbert (1984), Dire l'Ineffable: Lecture du Monologion de saint Anselme.
- Y. Cattin (1986), La preuve de Dieu: Introduction à la lecture du Proslogion d'Anselme de Canterbury, Paris.
- S. Vanni Rovighi (1987), Introduzione a Anselmo d'Aosta, Bari (bibl.).
- M. Parodi (1988), Il conflitto dei pensieri: Studio su Anselmo d'Aosta, Bergame.
- I. Biffi, C. Marabelli (Ed.) (1989) Anselmo d'Aosta: Figura europea. Convegno di studi, Aosta 1988, Milan.
- P. Gilbert (1990), Le "Proslogion" de saint Anselme: Silence de Dieu et joie de l'homme, Rome (bibl.).
- R. W. Southern (1990), Saint Anselm: A Portrait in a Landscape, Cambridge.
- I. Sciuto (1991), La ragione della Fede: Il Monologion e il programma filosofico di Anselmo d'Aosta, Genoa.
- M. Corbin (1992), Prière et raison de la foi: Introduction à l'œuvre de saint Anselme de Cantorbéry, Paris.
- C. Viola (1992), "Origine et portée du principe dialectique du 'Proslogion' de saint Anselme De l' 'argument ontologique' à l' 'argument mégalogique'," RFNS 83, 339–84; (1992), "'hoc est enim Deo esse, quod est magnum esse': Approche augustinienne de la grandeur divine," in Chercheurs de sagesse. Hommage à Jean Pépin, Ed. M.-O. Goulet-Cazé, et al., EAUG 131, 403–20.
- J. Zumr, V. Herold (1993), The European Dimensions of St. Anselm's Thinking, Prague.
- D. E. Luscombe, G. R. Evans (Ed.) (1996), Anselm: Aosta, Bec, Canterbury, Sheffield.
- R. W. Southern (1996), Saint Anselm and His Biographer: A Study of Monastic Life and Thought 1059–c. 1130, Cambridge.

COLOMAN VIOLA

See also Bonaventure; Chartres, School of; Duns Scotus, John; Existence of God, Proofs of; Saint-Victor, School of; Scholasticism; Thomas Aquinas

Anthony the Great. See Monasticism

Anthropology

1. Biblical Origins

a) Old Testament. The principal sources of a biblical anthropology are the passages from Genesis relating to the creation of man. In the priestly account, the creation of man in the image and likeness of God (Gn 1:26–27) is the result of a divine deliberation without equivalent in the history of religions. Similarly unique is the assertion that man exists as male and female. Man appears as the culmination of creation and is accorded dominion over the earth. In the Yahwist account (Gn 2:4b–25), man is described as being fashioned from clay, emphasizing his earthly reality and kinship with the rest of creation, and animated by the breath of God, making him “a living being” (Gn 2:7), and indicating a relationship to God. In this account, human sexual bipolarity is the result of God’s act of forming Eve from the side of Adam, and man’s dominion over the rest of creation is expressed in terms of his naming the creatures. Also of importance from Genesis is chapter 3, which describes the Fall*, the introduction of death*, the clothing of Adam and Eve in garments of skin, and their expulsion from paradise, with the consequent change in the conditions of human existence. The dependency of human life upon God, and his Spirit, is repeated throughout the Old Testament, especially in the Psalms (e.g., Ps 104:29–30). The Wisdom of Solomon introduces the further idea that man is created as the image of God’s eternity, and that it was toward this immortality, or incorruptibility, that God created man (Wis 2:23).

b) New Testament. While the Gospels emphasize the intrinsic dignity of the human being, it is Saint Paul who develops a more considered anthropology. The most important aspect of Pauline anthropology is its Christological perspective: the first Adam was a “living being,” animated by the breath of God, while the second and last Adam, the risen Christ, is “a life-giving spirit,” giving spiritual life to mankind; men who have shared in the existence of the first, earth-born Adam, can, in the resurrection, come to share in the heavenly, spiritual existence of the second Adam (1 Cor 15:42–50). Adam was created as a “type of the one to come” (Rom 5:14). The creation of man in the image of God is thus referred to Christ, who is himself the likeness and image of the invisible God (2 Cor 4:4 and Col 1:15), and so Paul’s anthropology has an eschatological orientation, unlike the protological mythologizing of the Gnostics (gnosis*). The continuity of man from his original creation to his future spiritual existence is guaranteed, for Paul, by the body (soma), an essential dimension of human existence (see 1 Thes 5:23, which refers to man as “spirit and soul and body”), and which is to be distinguished from the flesh* (sarx), the hardened state of man turned away from God.

2. Extrabiblical Origins

The larger context of Paul’s anthropology, and the background for later patristic developments, was that of Judaism, especially as represented by Philo (c. 20 B.C.–c. A.D. 50), Hellenism, and Gnosticism. Philo, interpreting Genesis with the philosophy of Middle Platonism, contrasts the two accounts of creation and elaborates a distinction between the heavenly, immaterial man (Gn 1:26), who exists before, and is the image for, the earthly man (Gn 2:7), who is identified with the mind (nous), which itself is the essential element of actual man. Hellenism, in its various forms, generally accepted the idea that the noblest part of man’s constitution, the soul or mind, is essentially divine, and, due to its kinship (syngeneia) with the divine, enables man, through knowledge, to know the divine. It is the soul, and not the composite of soul and body, that defines man, leaving man’s relationship to his body always uneasy. Gnosticism, in all its various manifestations, further deprecated the bodily nature of man. In its Christianized form, Valentinianism, for instance, differentiated between three classes of men: the hylic (material), the psychic, and the spiritual. Only the spiritual element of the last group will be saved, by nature, from destruction; the psychic can either become spiritual or return to the hylic state, in which, with those of the hylic class, they will be utterly destroyed. The Valentinians also differentiated between the man created in the image of the demiurge, and the psychic man created in the likeness, into whom had been breathed the spiritual seed that, through gnosis, can return to the divine. The fleshly bodies that can be perceived by the senses are the “garments of skins” added to the true human nature to enable its continuation in the fallen world (Gn 3:21), so giving the spiritual seed time to grow in gnosis and ultimately return to the Pleroma.

3. Patristic Era

While faith* in the reality of the Incarnation and the Resurrection of the body ensured that the generally accepted Greek body-soul polarity never became hardened into an unresolvable dualist separation, the expressions of this faith were so varied that one must distinguish among three different anthropologies, those of Antioch*, Alexandria*, and the West.

a) School of Antioch. The Antiochene tradition united the two creation accounts, so that the man made from clay is the same man as the one created in the image, and developed this within the Pauline framework of an anthropology grafted onto Christology. This approach begins with Theophilus of Antioch (late second century) and is most fully expounded by Saint Irenaeus*. Irenaeus adopts the eschatological orientation of Pauline anthropology, and, in his battle with the Gnostics, further emphasizes the earthly reality of man by describing him as essentially flesh rather than body. For Irenaeus, there is an intimate link between theology proper and anthropology: the truth of man is revealed in the Incarnation, which at the same time is the primary, if not the sole, revelation of God. Adam was created as a type of the One to come, and the manifestations of God in the Old Testament were always prophetic revelations of the Incarnate Son. Adam was animated by the breath of life, which prefigured the future vivification of the sons of God by the Spirit: initially, of the Incarnate Son and, subsequently, through baptism* of those adopted as sons. Christ revealed the full truth of man, vivified by the Spirit; in the present, adopted sons possess a pledge of “part” of the Spirit, preparing them for their full vivification in the resurrection. Thus, the truth of man is still “hid with Christ in God” (Col 3:3); it is an eschatological reality, anticipated in Christian life, and revealed most fully in the confession of martyrdom. The Spirit, though not a constituent of created human nature, is nevertheless essential to man to be what God intended: man lives in communion with God, partaking of the Spirit, and this living man is the glory of God. As the Incarnate Son is the model for man, Irenaeus locates the “image of God” in man’s corporeality, his flesh. This leads him to differentiate between the “image” and the “likeness”: the latter is revealed when man lives, in the Spirit, directed toward God. This likeness was lost in the Fall, breaking the communion between God and man, and so introducing death. The likeness can, however, be regained, in Christ, the true image and likeness of God, provisionally as adopted sons, and more completely in the Resurrection. While enabling the restoration of the likeness, the Incarnation does not simply return man to Adam’s original state: through the adoption that it makes possible, the Incarnation enables man to acquire the status of sons of God, growing ever closer to the stature of the Son. The potentiality of man’s original state is exemplified in Irenaeus’s depiction of Adam and Eve as children in paradise. Irenaeus thus inscribes anthropology within a dynamic understanding of salvation history: anthropology does not simply look at man as he was created, in some protological past, but strains ahead to what man is called to become.

A similar position with regard to the image of God in man can be found in Tertullian*, according to whom “the clay that was putting on the image of Christ, who was to come in the flesh, was not only the work but the pledge of God.” The later Antiochene tradition did not locate the image of God so concretely in the flesh. Diodorus of Tarsus († c. 390), polemicizing against the Alexandrians, refuses to refer to the image of man’s possession of an invisible soul, his intellectual faculty: for Diodorus, the image of God refers to man’s dominion. That is, the whole man, body and soul, in his vocation as lord of creation, is in the image of God.

b) School of Alexandria and Its Posterity. Alexandrian anthropology initially developed along the lines of Philo: the image of God has no reference to the body, but, as the image of the preincarnate Logos (i.e., “without flesh,” asarkos), it is located in the highest element of man, his intellectual (logikos) soul or nous, which is then used as the definition for the true man. This spiritual man nevertheless exists concretely as the earthly man of Genesis 2:7, from whose limitations the spiritual man must endeavor to free himself by asceticism*, and so achieve likeness to God. Christ, realizing both the image and the likeness, is the model or teacher for Christians, showing us the way by which to achieve this likeness. Origen*, further elaborating Philo's idea of double creation within his own system of an eternal creation, considers Genesis 1:26 to refer to the creation of the true, original man, who must be recovered, and Genesis 2:7 to indicate the fallen man, the nous clad in garments of skin. For Saint Athanasius*, it is man as a rational (logikos) being who is in the image of the Logos, and the Incarnate Logos who gives fallen man the possibility of regaining his true relationship to the Logos and hence his character as an image.

The Cappadocians inherited the basic tendency of Alexandrian anthropology to refer the image of God in man to the Logos. The most comprehensive anthropology was developed by Saint Gregory* of Nyssa (c. 330–c. 395), who wrote a treatise specifically on the topic, Peri kataskeues anthropon (also known as De hominis opificio; translated as On the Creation of Humanity). Gregory begins this treatise by setting the appearance of man within the creation of the cosmos as a whole: man appears as the culmination of the ascent made by creation from the lower levels of inert matter, vegetative life, animal life, to the rational animal, man. Man thus encompasses all previous levels of existence and, by virtue of his rationality, can fulfill their potential: for instance, all animals have the power of sensation and movement, but humans, who have bodies suitable for their rational souls (as they have dexterous hands, their mouths are adapted for speech rather than tearing meat), can use these capacities in a manner befitting a rational being. However, the true dignity of man is not in his existence as a microcosm, but in his being created in the image and likeness of God, terms that Gregory does not distinguish. Moreover, for Gregory the image is not to be located in a static ontological element of man, but is instead manifested in man's free exercise of virtue. Gregory also goes further than other Fathers in explaining the rationale of man created as male and female (Gn 1:27). Gregory teaches a dual Creation: first, man (meaning the whole of mankind) made in the image; second, the additional distinction of male and female, which has no reference to the Divine Archetype, but was added by God in foresight of the Fall. Although this is the order of God's intended creation, its temporal realization occurs in reverse: for Gregory, unlike Philo and Origen, man (the whole of mankind) created in the image (and neither male or female) preexists the actual appearance of mankind as male and female only in God's foreknowledge, and will be finally realized only at the end of time. While mankind was male and female in paradise, their sexuality was not as yet operative, but was, rather, latent, "in view of the Fall." Prior to the Fall, mankind would have multiplied as the angels*. Human sexuality, along with the characteristics of the flesh as we now know it, was realized in the "garments of skins" (Gn 3:21). These garments of skins are remedial, rather than punitive, enabling mankind to continue in existence in exile from paradise, and, as it is through these garments that mankind now reaches the foreordained number, they have a positive role to play in the fallen world. In the final consummation, when the fullness of mankind has been reached, God's originally intended creation will be realized, without the economic addition of the garments of skin.

The idea of man as a microcosm was further elaborated by Saint Maximus* the Confessor, who inherited much of his anthropology from the Cappadocians, including a position on human sexuality similar to that of Gregory of Nyssa. According to Maximus, man was intended to mediate within the five divisions of creation: between the sexes, paradise and the inhabited world, heaven and earth, intelligible and sensible creation, and, finally, God and creation. Man, as a microcosm, had the vocation of uniting these divisions (diareseis), through the exercise of virtue, so manifesting the theophanic character of the universe. Adam failed in this task. Only the man Jesus, because he is also God, was able to achieve this mediation. He is the new Adam, and only in him does the creation find its true harmony and communion with its Creator.

c) Western Tradition. In the West, anthropology (with the exception of the basically Asiatic position of Tertullian) developed as a form of Christian Platonism*, which referred the image of God in man to the unity and Trinity* of divine Persons*. The most important and influential person in this tradition was Saint Augustine* (354–430). Augustine detaches anthropology from its earlier Christological and cosmological settings. He uses the idea of man as a composite of soul and body, an "amazing" conjunction, and emphasizes their diverse roles, without denigrating either. Perhaps following Tertullian, Augustine differentiates between the breath (flatus) of Genesis 2:7, which is the soul of man, and the Spirit (spiritus), in terms of the created and Creator. However, Augustine's most important contribution to anthropology was to reorient the question of man as a call to a reflexive return inward: "Return within yourself; in the inward man dwells truth." The fundamental distinction, for Augustine, is not that between spirit and matter, or higher and lower, but that between inner and outer. While God can be known through the created order, our principal route to God lies "in" ourselves. The path leads from the exterior to the interior and thence to the superior, God, who is "more interior than my inmost self and more superior than my highest self."

Thus, through this reflexive approach, God is found to be the ground of the person, in the intimacy of their self-presence. Despite the route of this conclusion being anthropocentric, man is inconceivable without God, his proper end. This is the basis of Augustine's Trinitarian description of the image of God in the soul and its activity: as mind/self-knowledge/love* of self, or memory/intelligence/will. Memory (related to the Father) is the soul's implicit knowledge of itself. To be made explicit and full knowledge it needs to be formulated, put into words (the Word), which constitutes intelligence. Yet to understand one's true self fully is to love it, and so from intelligence comes will, and from self-knowledge comes self-love (the Spirit). Thus, man is most fully in the image of God through the intimacy of his self-presence and self-love.

Of further importance for Augustine's anthropology is his dissociation of the will from knowledge. Greek philosophy tended to make the will a function of knowledge: men act well and desire the good, unless they are led to evil through ignorance of the good. Augustine's teaching on the two loves allows for the possibility that our disposition may be radically perverse. Weakness of the will (akrasia) was a central problem for Greek philosophy; for Augustine it is the basic experience of fallen man. Because of original sin*, we have all lost the supernatural grace* and gifts that Adam originally enjoyed in paradise. These supernatural gifts enabled Adam to live righteously and in tranquility, himself subject to God, his lower appetites subject to his own reason and his will. Having been disobedient to God in the use of his sexual nature, it is fitting, Augustine argues, that human sexuality should be man's most unruly drive. Against the Pelagian* emphasis on the autonomy and capacity of man, Augustine stresses our need for grace, which for him is never opposed to human liberty*, but rather is its support. We need to be healed by grace before we can do good. Augustine thus differentiates between free will (velle) and ability (posse): it is grace that establishes free will as ability and so as true liberty. The Incarnation has the function of restoring the original condition of grace that Adam lost at the Fall; by a detour, our original destiny is fulfilled, but not transcended.

4. Scholastic Theology

With the reintroduction of Aristotelian philosophy in the West, a more holistic anthropology began to be developed, finding its most complete synthesis in the work of Saint Thomas* Aquinas (c. 1125–c. 1274). For Aquinas, man is more than a simple conjunction of a soul and body, two disparate elements, as for Plato and Augustine. The body is an essential element in the human constitution, yet it does not exist through itself, but by the intellectual soul, which is the form of the body, a form, moreover, that possesses and confers substantiality. The soul is act and itself a substance, but without the body it cannot fulfill its actuality; it would remain destitute without the body and its senses, while the body has neither actuality nor substantiality apart from that conferred by the soul. Thus, man is not a substance constructed from two self-subsisting substances, but is himself a concrete and complete substance. This implies a type of dualism, but one that does not impair man's substantial unity as a complex being: a unity of soul, which substantiates his body, and body, in which his soul concretely exists. Nevertheless, man's existence as a complex substance derives from the intellectual soul, which has in itself adequate reason for its own existence. In this way, without denigrating the importance of the body, the traditional priority of the spiritual over the material is maintained. Furthermore, it enables Aquinas to explain the immortality of the soul: the corruption of the body, when it is separated from the soul, that which gives it its actual being, cannot affect the soul itself. Despite Aquinas's emphasis on the complex unity of man, there is a novel departure from the biblical view as represented by Genesis 2:7. The latter describes the whole man, clay animated by the breath of life, as a living soul; for Aquinas, the concrete reality of man is governed by the intellectual soul (anima intellectiva), which has an autonomous existence as a substance. Moreover, Aquinas, following Augustine, rejects the connection between the breath of life mentioned in Genesis 2:7 and the Holy Spirit (as upheld, for instance, by Irenaeus), preferring to see, in the contrast that Paul draws in 1 Corinthians 15:45, two distinct and unrelated realities.

Following Saint John of Damascus, Aquinas distinguishes between the image and the likeness of God in man, and couples this with Augustine's teaching on the original state of grace: the image is the intellectual nature of man and his possession of free will, while the likeness was the gift of grace given to Adam, which was lost through sin and restored in Christ. Although it is by virtue of having a rational nature that man is considered to be in the image, as also are the angels, there is no connection between man's possession of logos and the divine Logos, as in Alexandrian anthropology. Man is said to be in the image with reference to both the divine Nature and the Trinity of Persons. Thus, the theology of the image is fully detached from Christology*. Existence as the image of God is an essential characteristic of man, enduring even after the Fall: for Aquinas, if man had lost his character as the image of God, his rationality and freedom, he would only be an animal, not a human responsible for his action and sin.

Possession of the image of God is, therefore, a presupposition for the likeness, the additional gift of grace, that is, the actual communion with God proper to the original, and the recreated, state. Thus, while generally following Augustine, Aquinas lays more emphasis on the free will and enduring dignity of man.

5. Reformation

The anthropology of the Reformation is based upon a radicalizing renewal of Augustine's doctrine of original sin and grace. Whereas Latin Scholasticism taught that the image of God was a formal property of human nature, a presupposition for the likeness, the Reformation did not differentiate between "image" and "likeness," but considered them to be equivalent to original righteousness, as Martin Luther writes: "The likeness and image of God consists in the true and perfect knowledge of God, supreme delight in God, eternal life, eternal righteousness, eternal freedom from care." In this perspective, the image of God in man is not a set of static ontological properties, but the complete orientation of life toward God. Inevitably, therefore, the Fall entailed a loss of both the likeness and the image. Fallen man is "totally depraved"; there is no aspect of man that remains unaffected by his sin. Man still possesses free will and reason, but as his will has lost the grace that constituted and empowered it, it has lost its true liberty. The loss of the image did not (despite Matthias Flacius Illyricus [1520–75]) affect our created nature as humans: man's faculties may be seriously weakened or leprous, but one can still call a leprous man a man. This ultimately led the later Reformation dogmatists to consider both the image and likeness, as well as human sinfulness, as accidental determinations of human nature.

Man can still perform good acts and keep the law, but these will be done with a depraved motivation (for instance, selfishness), rather than in the love that alone fulfills the law. In this situation, Luther denies philosophy the possibility of either understanding or defining the essential characteristics of man: it can only achieve an autonomous self-understanding, overvaluing the (for it, naturally immortal) soul and reason, or claiming full liberty. It is possible to comprehend the true nature of man, homo theologicus, a created and fallen being, only because, by the grace of God, we have the Scriptures. Through the gospel, the image is restored and man begins to be re-created, prepared for the truly spiritual life, in which man will exist in flesh and bones, not with an animal mode of life (eating, drinking, resting), but from God alone. Adam was also destined for this spiritual life and, if he had not sinned, he would, in due course, have been translated to it. Luther describes man of this present life as the matter out of which God will fashion the glorious form of eschatological man. However, while man is freed from bondage and restored to the original state of the image by Christ, the spiritual existence of eschatological man is not so intimately connected with the Incarnate Christ, as it was for instance, with Irenaeus, nor, consequently, does the work of Christ have the same eschatological orientation: ultimately, there predominates an understanding of the effect of the Incarnation—the return of man to his original relationship to God.

Calvin* vehemently opposed the idea that Adam was created as an image or type of the Incarnate Christ, as Osiander (1498–1552) claimed. The image and likeness are located in the integrity, righteousness, and sanctity of Adam's first estate. Calvin, however, maintains that the image was not totally effaced at the Fall, but "was so corrupted that anything that remains is a horrible deformity." The purpose of regeneration in Christ is to renew man in the image of God, but again, this identity does not lie in the Incarnate Christ. The later Calvinist tradition distinguished between a "narrower" and a "broader" sense of the image: in the narrower sense, it refers to man's original condition in paradise; in the broader sense, it refers to those characteristics of man that make him a human rather than a beast. The image, in the narrower sense, was lost at the Fall; while in the broader sense, it remains, though deformed.

6. 18th and 19th Centuries

A reorientation occurred in the 18th century, partly as a development from the humanism of the Renaissance and the Enlightenment, which recaptured the insight and perspective of Irenaeus. In the 15th century Giovanni Pico della Mirandola (1463–94) had suggested that Adam was created with an imprecise form, able to fix his own destiny through his free will; the fulfillment of this destiny lies in assimilation to God, which was only fully achieved by Christ. Herder (1744–1803) develops this idea, but, reacting against the Promethean pretension to human perfectibility through self-improvement, inscribes man's self-determination within divine providence*. While God gave instincts to animals, in man he carved his own image: religion and humanity. The outline of the statue is still obscure, lying deep within the block. Man cannot carve it out for himself; rather, God has given us tradition, learning, reason, and experience to this end. Thus, the image has a teleological function: it is something toward which we are working, rather than something that we once had and hope to regain. This perspective, moreover, applies to our status as human: "we are not yet men, but are daily becoming so."

Herder himself, however, does not relate the fulfillment of this vocation to the Incarnation of Christ. This was done, soon after, by Schleiermacher*, for whom Christ was “the completion of the creation of man.”

This reorientation had significant implications for the whole of the Protestant theology of the 19th century. Combined with the developments in biblical criticism, especially of J. G. Eichhorn (1752–1827), which tended more and more to remove any descriptive value from the accounts of the Creation, and then the first repercussions of Darwinist theories upon theology, 19th-century Protestant theology therefore necessarily came to understand the image in terms of the destiny or vocation completed in Christ, rather than the perfection of the original state that was lost in the Fall and regained in Christ.

- ♦ É. Gilson (1932), L'esprit de la philosophie médiévale, Paris.
- E. Dinkler (1934), Die Anthropologie Augustins, Stuttgart.
- T.F. Torrance (1949), Calvin's Doctrine of Man, Grand Rapids (2nd Ed. 1967).
- J. A. T. Robinson (1952), The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology, London.
- H. Crouzel (1956), Théologie de l'image de Dieu chez Origène, Paris.
- G.B. Ladner (1958), “The Philosophical Anthropology of St. Gregory of Nyssa,” DOP 12, 61–94.
- A. Burghart (1962), Gottes Ebenbild und Gleichnis, Freiburg.
- L. Thunberg (1965), Microcosm and Mediator: The Theological Anthropology of Maximus the Confessor, Lund.
- W. Joest (1967), Ontologie der Person bei Luther, Göttingen.
- C.E. Trinkhaus (1970), In Our Image and Likeness: Humanity and Divinity in Italian Humanist Thought, London.
- J. Pépin (1971), Idées grecques sur l'homme et sur Dieu, Paris.
- H.W. Wolff (1973), Anthropologie des Alten Testaments, Munich.
- J.-M. Garrigues (1976), Maxime le Confesseur: La charité avenir divin de l'homme, ThH 38.
- H. Köster (1979), HDG II. 3. b.
- A. Peters (1979), Der Mensch, HST 8.
- U. Bianchi (Ed.) (1981), Archè e telos: L'anthropologia di Origene e di Gregorio di Nissa, Analisi storico-religiosa, Milan.
- L. Scheffczyk (1981), HDG II. 3. a. 1.
- M. Schmaus, et al. (1982), HDG II. 3. c.
- Y. de Andia (1986), Homo vivens: Incorruptibilité et divinisation de l'homme selon Irénée de Lyon, Paris.
- P. Brown (1989), The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, London.
- H. Wißmann, et al. (1992), “Mensch I-VII,” TRE 22, 458–529.

JOHN BEHR

7. 20th Century

All the theological anthropologies of the 20th century seem to have one point in common: the recourse to the concept of “relation,” understood in the narrow sense of an intersubjective or interpersonal relation, as a key category. The main themes are: the widespread influence of philosophies of the “person,” of “dialogue” or of “existence”; the manifest reluctance to make any appeal to the idea of “nature”; the subordination of human being to human becoming, and the suspension of this becoming into an absolute future, which must be thought of in a christological manner; and, accordingly, the concern to give anthropology a strictly theological treatment.

It is probably in the work of Karl Barth* that these themes are most powerfully deployed, within a theology that perceives the covenant* precisely as the location of fully human existence. Understood in its theological sense, the humanity of man—and therefore the “likeness”—is not at all ontic, is neither a property nor a natural faculty, and therefore cannot be linked to a natural state of integrity that man has lost. In the covenant, a “pledge and promise” to which God has called man, man never “possesses” this likeness and therefore cannot be said to have lost it; and, as God’s promise, it is not even subject to partial destruction. Barth does, however, retain a correspondence between our created nature and our divine destiny. Man’s prototype is the relationship and differentiation between the I and the Thou in the Trinity: man was created as a Thou that can be addressed by God, and an I responsible to God. Based in the final instance on internal relations with the divine life and intended first and foremost as a conception of man as a being before God, this anthropology also names other relationships and gives them theological importance: the relationship between man and woman, social relations, and, above all, ecclesial relations, in which the being-before-God is accomplished in the form of a communion with Christ.

Emil Brunner (1889–1966) also related the idea of the image to relationships and to existence as a person, but he remained closer to the classic Protestant positions. Even though, like Barth, he abandoned the idea of original perfection, Brunner by contrast to Barth distinguished two primordial theological traits, liberty and the capacity to enter into a loving relationship with God. The second can be lost, but not the first, which is an essential trait of the personality.

Catholic and Orthodox theology frequently adopt similar language: the rooting of Christian experience* in communion is not a concern limited to just one Christian confession, having been present in the Catholicisme (1938) of H. de Lubac* and in the ecclesiologies* of the “mystical body” (cf. Mersch); outlined as a very prominent aspect in the few remaining texts by J. Monchanin; made into a program in the work of V. Lossky; and brought to its first synthesis by J. Zizioulas. The ontological language used to raise “being-with” (Mitsein) to the rank of a theological category is certainly a language in which Protestant theology has traditionally had very little confidence. However, the purpose for which this language is used is no longer to draw up a chart of human properties, in relation to believers in particular, but to give names to theological realities: being-in-the-church, communion, which finds its paradigm in the life of the Trinity—“We have to live in circumincession* with all our brothers” (Monchanin); the absolutely primordial character of personal existence, in the image of the Father, fons et origo totius divinitatis (fount and origin of complete divinity) (Zizioulas); the Christological theory of anhypostasy* as the keystone of a theological doctrine of the person (Lacoste); and so on. It should be remembered that within recent theology there remain a number of anthropological beliefs that lack any theological basis for their affirmation, such as the notion that anthropology is a constant of which Christology is the variable (H. Braun).

The theological status of the religious fact remains a source of discord between the different creeds. In a period in which there has been little concern with the “virtue of religion,” but a spectacular development of “religious sciences,” philosophy of religion*, and theology of religions*, there has been no lack of pronouncements on man perceived as animal religiosus (a religious animal), in a variety of styles. In the a priori theologies that began with J. Maréchal, and above all in the work of Karl Rahner*, the religious dimension of existence is interpreted in terms of transcendental aptitude. To be “spirit” in the “world” is to exist, in fact, as the addressee of a possible word spoken by the “free unknown,” of whom one may have a premonition that he governs the “mystery*” of being*. Among a posteriori theologies, responses diverge, ranging from a massive challenge to the religious fact (as in Barth) to a conceptual strategy of Christological criticism and integration (as in Balthasar*), or to descriptive analyses of the human condition in which the religious appears as the human experience that is the richest in possibilities (Pannenberg; Martelet). Theories of the religious as “experience” have been constructed, in a variety of ways, whether in response to William James or Rudolph Otto, or in response to Schleiermacher*’s Über die Religion: Reden an die Gebildeten unter ihren Verächtern (1799; On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers), perceived as a common ancestor; during the 20th century, there has been a tendency to combine such theories with a Christian hermeneutic* of the great religious traditions. While there may be an “aptitude for experience” (R. Schaeffler), and there may be some justification for a general theological evaluation of the behaviors that display this aptitude, it is nonetheless as “Jewish experience,” “Hindu experience,” and so on that religious experience is captured in any more precise description. Indeed, Vatican* II came to different conclusions about different religious commitments.

An epoch in theology that began with Weiss’s re-opening of the case of eschatology* could not fail to put forward, as well, an eschatological position on the question of man. Indeed, in many different ways 20th-century theology has emphasized the paradox of an object, man, who exists here and now, within the finite limits of the world, only in an inchoate and provisional mode. As Barth says, “Human existence is ontologically determined by the fact that among all human beings, one of them is the man Jesus*.” Man is a creature for whom Christ, and his life in Christ, is part of his existence. While this idea accounts for the present experience of the believer, it suggests, nonetheless, that the meaning of what man is to be apprehended on the basis of his future. This future is certainly what theological experience anticipates. According to Luther, fides facit personam (faith makes the person), and the existence of the believer has eschatological meanings that have been considered soberly within the framework of a doctrine of justification* and of liberty liberated (e.g., Jüngel; see also Pesch), or in a more exuberant manner, based on a doctrine of divinization (e.g., Lossky). However, these meanings, to which theology alone has access, are only the penultimate word of anthropology. Here and now, the definitive has not been realized. It is not, therefore, in his own visage that man can scrutinize his humanity, but in the visage of Christ resurrected, “in” whom believers already live an authentically human existence, while hoping for an absolute future of which they do not yet possess more than a deposit.

Some theologians, such as Bultmann*, have believed that the historical and worldly present of experience is capable of integrally providing a basis for man’s access to his “authentic” humanity. However, thinking of man on the basis of his accomplishment—and thinking of being on the basis of the eschaton—necessarily leads us to highlight the definitive realities, understood as parts of an economy of the provisional. The anthropology of relations uses the language of being but cannot conceal the fact that the most humanizing relationships—the esse ad Deum, the communion of persons—are works of liberty. Man is the being who can exist face to face with God (in G. Ebeling’s “coram relationship”), but first and foremost he necessarily exists within the world in a mode of opening up to the world. While an anthropology rooted in Christology must certainly reject every type of thinking that permits death to have the last word, the resurrected Christ should not make us forget that the disciples were not greater than their master and had to live, at first, with the image of Christ crucified.

What we shall be “does not yet appear” (1 Jn 3:2), and the definitive is no more at the disposal of theology than it is at the disposal of the believer. As against a factuality, or facticity, that can be interpreted completely without naming God, the whole of theology must object that man surpasses all that he is “in fact” because he is the bearer of a vocation. Whatever concepts one may adopt in thinking about the “being of vocation,” the definitive, the eschaton, the absolute future, and so on, and even though there is no shortage of biblical images for expressing what “resurrection” or the “reign of God” may mean, the problem of man leads back, in every sense, to the mystery of God—and the problematic, the “question,” that man represents for himself (Augustine) thus itself becomes part of the mystery. Man is the image of God in several different ways, one of which encourages us not to want to say too much about it: in the image of an incomprehensible God, man is also a being that we know without understanding. Man is also homo absconditus (Moltmann).

- E. Brunner (1937), Der Mensch im Widerspruch, Berlin.
- R. Guardini (1939), Welt und Person, Mainz-Paderborn (6th Ed. 1988).
- A. Gehlen (1940), Der Mensch, Frankfurt.
- R. Niebuhr (1941), The Nature and Destiny of Man, New York.
- K. Barth (1948), KD III/2 (Dogmatique), Vols. 11 and 12, Geneva, 1961).
- E. Mersch (1949), “Dans le Christ,” La théologie du corps mystique, vol. 2, Paris-Brussels, 165–398.
- K. Rahner (1957), Geist in Welt, 2nd Ed., Munich; (1963), Hörer des Wortes, neu bearbeitet von J.B. Metz, Munich (SW 4, Freiburg-Düsseldorf, 1994).
- P. Tillich (1957), Systematic Theology 2, Chicago; (1963), Systematic Theology 3, Chicago, 11–282.
- J. Macquarrie (1966), Principles of Christian Theology, London (2nd Ed. Rev. 1977, 226–33).
- V. Lossky (1967), A l’image et à la ressemblance de Dieu, Paris, chaps. 5, 6, 10, and 12.
- E. Barbotin (1970 a), Humanité de l’homme, Paris; (1970 b), Humanité de Dieu, Paris.

- G. Martelet (1972), Résurrection, eucharistie, genèse de l’homme, Paris.
- E. Coreth (1973), Was ist der Mensch? Grundzüge einer philosophischen Anthropologie, Innsbruck-Vienna-Munich (3rd Ed. 1980).
- P.J. Jewitt (1975), Man as Male and Female, Grand Rapids.
- H.U. von Balthasar (1978), Theodramatik II/2: Die Personen in Christus, Einsiedeln.
- G. Ebeling (1979), Dogmatik des christlichen Glaubens, 3 vols., Tübingen; vol. 1, §14–16; vol. 2, passim; vol. 3, §31–33, 40–42.
- J.B. Lotz (1979), Person und Freiheit, QD 83.
- E. Jüngel (1980), “Der Gott entsprechende Mensch. Bemerkungen zur Ebenbildlichkeit des Menschen als Grundfigur theologischer Anthropologie,” in Entsprechungen, BEvTh 88, 290–317.
- J. Macquarrie (1982), In Search of Humanity: A Theological and Philosophical Approach, London.
- G. Martelet (1982), “Christologie et anthropologie,” in R. Latourelle and G. O’Collins (Ed.), Problèmes et perspectives de théologie fondamentale, Tournai-Montréal, 211–30.
- W. Pannenberg (1983), Anthropologie in theologischer Perspektive, Göttingen.
- O.H. Pesch (1983), Frei sein aus Gnade: Theologische Anthropologie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1984), “Nature et personne de l’homme: D’un paradoxe christologique,” in La politique de la mystique, offered to Mgr. M. Charles, Paris-Limoges, 129–38.
- J. Moltmann (1985), Gott in der Schöpfung, Munich.
- J.D. Zizioulas (1985), Being as Communion, Crestwood, N.Y.
- N. Lash (1988), Easter in Ordinary: Reflections on Human Experience and the Knowledge of God, London.
- T. Koch, W. Hirsch (1992), “Mensch VIII-X,” TRE 22, 530–77.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), Expérience et Absolu: Questions disputées sur l’humanité de l’homme, Paris.
- Th. De Koninck (1995), De la dignité humaine, Paris.
- O. González de Cardedal (1997), “El Hombre y Dios,” La entraña del cristianismo, Salamanca, 103–342.

JÉRÔME DE GRAMONT

See also Adam; Creation; Death; Evolution; Monogenesis/Polygenesis; Resurrection of the Dead; Soul-Heart-Body

Anthropomorphism

In its broadest sense, anthropomorphism consists of representing in human form beings other than, and considered superior to, humans. Angels* and Wisdom* might thus fall into this category. But usage tends to confine the term to the problem of the representation of the divine, both in polytheism and monotheism*, and it is in this latter case that it has real force and interest.

1. General Characteristics of Biblical Anthropomorphism

Biblical anthropomorphism has two aspects. God* has a corporeal form. For example, in the myth of Adam he hears and walks. He also experiments (Gn 2:19) and comes down to find out what is happening on earth (Gn 11:5, 18:21). He “smelled the pleasing odor” of burnt offerings (Gn 8:21; see also Nm 15:24) and writes with his finger (Ex 31:18). Above all, he is “a man of war” (Ex 15:3), a “dread warrior” (Jer 20:11).

The second aspect of biblical anthropomorphism consists in attributing human passions and feelings to God. God takes pleasure in offerings (Gn 4). He shows anger and is jealous (Dt 5:9). He changes his mind (Gn 6:6–7; 1 Sm 15:11). These characteristics should not be seen as expressions that lay no claim to being assertions about reality (as would be the case, for example, if it were a question of setting the scene for a parable; see 1 Kgs 22:18–23 and the first two chapters of Jb), nor as what are often called poetic images (such as those in Ps 104:32). In fact, even when they come from ancient literary strata, they correspond to a perception of divine essence that will not be denied—for example, “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness” (Gn 1:26). But anthropomorphism has limits. Treachery is never attributed to God, and any sexual representation is ruled out. It is noteworthy that the Old Testament is very parsimonious in its attribution of the character of Father* to God; whereas Adam begot Seth “in his own likeness” (Gn 5:3), Genesis 1:26 does not say that Adam was begotten by God (but cf. this passage with Lk 3:38).

2. Correctives to Anthropomorphism in a Construct of Transcendence

If we agree that there are two basic forms in which the imagination can structure a universe, one tending to abolish borders (the extreme case being a world in fusion), the other emphasizing their distinctness (the extreme being a dualism with no possible passage between the two aspects), then the biblical representation of God avoids the former and provides correctives to anthropomorphism within the latter. These correctives can be reduced to three types. 1) The distance between human beings and God is marked out by intermediaries, no doubt creating a link but delaying contact: for example the angels, especially the “Angel of the Lord” who appears at those decisive moments when divine action is revealed to humankind (Gn 22:15; Ex 3:2; Nm 20:16, 22:22–35; and Jgs 2:4). Celestial beings intervene in visions of the Temple* (serafim in Is 6:2, 6:6 and kerubim in Ez 10:2), evoking the forms that had already been present in the Temple of Solomon (1 Kgs 6–8), carved images of Mesopotamian origin that were partially theriomorphic. 2) Instead of an angel, or along with him, there sometimes appear mysterious “men”—for example, the men at Mamre in Genesis 18, Jacob’s adversary in Genesis 32, and the even more mysterious adversary of Moses in Exodus 4:24. 3) Jacob’s combat ends with the request, “Tell me, I pray, your name*” (Gn 32:29), to which no other answer but a blessing* is given. Later texts mark a greater distance, particularly in two narratives* of similar inspiration that take up once again the Sinai theophanies*. In Exodus 33:18–23 Moses sees God’s back, and only as he passes by. Later, Elijah hears the voice of God that has become qol demamah daqqah—“a still small voice” (1 Kgs 19:12). God “is not a man that he should repent” (1 Sm 15:29), although he is said to have repented of having made Saul king (1 Sm 15:11). The Septuagint version of Isaiah 63:9 favors “face” and “Holy Spirit” over “messenger” and “angel.”

3. Word, Covenant, Partisan God

a) The Name. Jewish tradition* was very sensitive with respect to the ineffable name: it was forbidden to speak it. For the Deuteronomist, the Temple is simply “a house for my name” (2 Sm 7:13).

b) The Word. The current importance of philosophies of language encourages us to regard the word (“God speaks”) as being at the root of biblical anthropomorphism. This conception gives rise to two variants, one oriented toward heaven the other toward earth. On one hand the “Word” is presented as a distinct and eternal entity. On the other, the Word* of God comes out of the mouths of human beings, the prophets*, who say: “Thus says YHWH,” along the lines of a word of covenant*, the promise* of a homeland made to Abraham and later renewed, a covenant within which God may be represented as a bridegroom (Hos 2:16, 3:1; Is 62:4–5; Jer 2:2, 31:21–22; and Ez 16:8–60).

c) Critical Point. Anthropomorphism is put to the test when the notion of the chosen people makes God a partisan in human struggles, something that culminates in the extermination of the first-born of Egypt. The narrative wavers, sometimes attributing the deed to God himself, sometimes to a “destroyer” (Ex 12:23) distinct from him, whereas Psalm 136:10 sees the event only as a sign of God’s “steadfast love” (chesed) of his people*.

d) The Incarnation. With Jesus* Christ*, God takes on human form (Phil 2:7): the “true man, true God” is at the center of the confession of faith. But the corrective that untangles the obscurity and overcomes the impasse of a partisan God is the fact that Christ’s human form is one of weakness and humiliation, even unto death*. This death is not only the ritual, familiar to ethnology, of the king of fools; it also establishes the solidarity of this king with all humanity. As the first-born, the image of the invisible God, Christ is the restoration of man in the image of his Creator (Col 1:15–20). “And whatever you did to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me” (Mt 25:40).

4. Ambivalence of Anthropomorphism

a) Representation or Relation? Augustine* played a decisive role in the way Western thought has posed the question of anthropomorphism. In fact he gave the name anthropomorphites to the disciples of Audius who “in carnal thought, represent God in the form of a corruptible man.” Augustine thereby doubly cut through an ambivalence of anthropomorphism, as it had been developed at the crossroads of the biblical and Greek traditions. On the one hand, Augustine denies all that, in anthropomorphism, may reduce God to man or to draw man toward God in whose image he is made. On the other hand, to the negation of an anthropomorphism conceived in terms of being, he adds the negation of an anthropomorphism conceived in terms of representation—an anthropomorphism whose most famous formulation was given by Xenophanes: “If cattle, horses, and lions had hands like men, if they could paint like men and produce works of art, then horses would paint even the images of the gods as horses, cattle as cattle, and each would establish the corporeal form of its gods according to its own appearance.”

The Renaissance of the 13th century followed Augustine’s lead. Although analogy, a process used to answer the question, “What is God?,” played a role in the discussion of “divine names,” this relational dimension was set aside to enable these concepts to be used later, legitimately, provided that their lack of adequacy is taken into account.

b) Kant. Immanuel Kant* occupies a special place because of the particular way in which he approaches the ambivalence of anthropomorphism. Discussing “the determination of the limits of reason,” he observes that Hume’s skepticism toward all theology hardly affects deism* (dealing with the “supreme Being”) but does affect theism (Deism*/Theism) (which postulates a personal God); and only theism is of interest to man as a morally responsible being, but it is inevitably tainted with anthropomorphism. There is no solution if we rely on a “dogmatic anthropomorphism,” claiming to say something about what God is “in himself.” But it is proper to use a “symbolic anthropomorphism” that “concerns only language and not the object itself.” An analogy is at work in this instance. What is important here is the connection with the symbol, the problematics of which, in contemporary thought, originates with Kant. And what is most fruitful is the intuition of a link with language. In the case of anthropomorphism, this meant a return to the problematics of relation. It is in fact a question of freedom* as it is experienced in the awareness of the moral law*, which finds its true development only in interpersonal relations (Kant speaks of respect). This requires that we speak of God as we would of a person (hence, in contrast to deism). The symbol derives from an effort of the imagination, linked to the tangible world, which is not to be left behind because it provides the living experience of those words that remain necessary to express what God is for us. As É. Weil correctly observed, Kantian problematics are indeed those of theomorphic man.

c) Hegel and Kierkegaard. Fichte, Schelling*, and Schleiermacher follow in Kant’s footsteps. Kierkegaard* argues for a “vigorous and powerful anthropomorphism.” He is thereby opposed to Hegel*, whose interest in anthropomorphism is expressed in his emphasis on the way in which Christian forms depart from pagan forms through a critique of representation. The truth of this inevitable passage through man in order to express God is the identity of identity and difference, the heart of the Hegelian “concept,” the highest point of which is the idea of the Incarnation. But we can see that the emphasis returns to representation, even though this is done to criticize its inadequacy, whereas it is a struggle to maintain the weightiness of the tangible world.

d) Contemporary Thought. E. Jünger follows a Hegelian line when he justifies anthropomorphism both through man made in the image of God and through the Incarnation, a proximity of man and God that is, as it were, “the ‘result’ of an identity of God and man subsuming any difference.” Paul Ricœur is among those who has grasped what is of interest in Kant’s analysis of the symbol. He comes up with the programmatic formulation, “The symbol provokes thought.” Its first form is a reading of myths (including the myth of Adam) “with sympathy and imagination.” This procedure gives imagination its rightful place, but sets it in a relation of “sympathy.” As Ricœur says in an essay on the imagination, “Our images are spoken before being seen.”

e) Conclusion. Karl Barth* noted as a challenge to theology the obligation to speak in those circumstances in which speech knows that it is irremediably inadequate. This opens onto “negative* theology,” which is one of the fruits of the confrontation of the biblical and Greek traditions, leading toward the “beyond of being” that Plato set at the pinnacle of his dialectic. Kant’s “symbolic anthropomorphism” is in some sense a negative theology reduced to modest proportions. It authorizes a reading of the Bible that does not hesitate to spend time in work on images. Whereas the negative theology deriving from Dionysius approaches mysticism* and the “night of the senses,” the patient path through the tangible world is the road to “spiritual meanings.” This is the attitude of one who listens, whose eyes are open, who learns to feel and taste, touching with great respect the word of God.

- A. Sertillanges (1908), Agnosticisme ou anthropomorphisme? Paris.
- A. Abd El-Fattah (1951), “Introduction à l’anthropomorphisme,” diss., Paris.
- E. Amado-Lévy-Valensi (1957), “L’homme a-t-il créé Dieu à son image?” Eph 1957, fasc. 3, 19–24.
- F. Marty (1980), La naissance de la métaphysique chez Kant: Une étude sur la notion kantienne d’analogie, Paris.
- F. Christ (1982), Menschlich von Gott reden: Das Problem des Anthropomorphismus bei Schleiermacher, Einsiedeln.

- K. Heinrich (1986), Anthropomorphe: Zum Problem des Anthropomorphismus in der Religionsphilosophie, Basel-Frankfurt.
- J. Derrida (1987), “Comment ne pas parler: Dénégations,” in Psyché: Invention de l’autre, Paris, 535–95.
- E. Jüngel (1990), “Anthropomorphismus als Grundproblem neuzeitlicher Hermeneutik” (1982 text), in Wertlose Wahrheit, Munich, 110–31.
- J. Briend (1992), Dieu dans l’Écriture, Paris.

FRANÇOIS MARTY

See also Analogy; Angels; Bible; God; Idolatry; Immutability/Impassibility, Divine; Incarnation; Love; Myth; Name; Scripture, Senses of; Theophany; Word of God

Antinomianism

Antinomianism is the term for Christian rejection of the law* in the name of the Gospels. Antinomianism was already present in the apostolic age (see Rom 3:8), and it has been associated with Gnostic sects (Nicolaites, Ophites). The sharp distinction between law and gospel promulgated by the Reformation led to a revival of antinomianism, particularly in the “radical Reformation” (the polemic by J. Agricola [1492–1566] against Luther*, the Anabaptist* movement). The Lutheran theory of the “uses of the law” constitutes a moderate position, probably acceptable in Catholic terms.

- O. H. Pesch (1993), “A.,” LThK3, 1, 762–66 (bibl.).

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Law and Christianity; Luther, Martin

Antinomy

The concept of antinomy comes from philosophy and designates, for example in Kant*, the presence of two contradictory assertions both of which have legitimacy and a solid basis, making it impossible to apply to them the principle of the excluded middle. Antinomy has become a central theological term in recent Orthodoxy*.

Examples of antinomic assertions include the unity of the divine Trinity* or of human freedom* and divine predestination*. The concept of antinomy holds a key position, alongside that of mystery*, in the organization of Orthodox theology* as an apophatic theology. The word does not belong to the vocabulary of contemporary Catholic or Protestant theology. On the other hand, the doctrine is a part of the common Christian heritage. Moreover, contemporary logic has shown renewed interest for antinomy (“dialethic” or “paraconsistent” logic).

- P. Evdokimov (1965), L'Orthodoxie, Paris (2nd Ed. 1979), 48–56.
- J. Meyendorff (1975), Initiation à la théologie byzantine, Paris, 297–300.

G. Priest (1987), In Contradiction: A Study of the Transconsistent, Dordrecht.

K. Wuchterl, et al., “Paradox,” TRE 25, 726–37.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Negative Theology; Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary

Antioch, School of

a) Exegesis and Theology. The expression School of Antioch is merely a convenient name for designating the representatives of a form of exegesis* that favors the letter and the historical reality of Scripture*, in reaction against the tendency of Origen* and the Alexandrians toward what was considered an excessive reliance on allegory. The term should not, therefore, be given too narrow a meaning, nor should we posit too radical an opposition between the exegetical practices of Antioch and Alexandria. In each camp, however, use was made of different terminology to indicate closely related realities. What was true in the realm of exegesis was also true of theology* and Christology*. But here too, from Diodorus of Tarsus to Theodore of Mopsuestia and John Chrysostom*, and from Nestorius to Theodoret of Cyrhus, despite the affinities of certain patterns of thought, positions evolved and differentiated themselves. So it is not possible to speak of an “Antiochene Christology*” without making distinctions.

b) Early Antiochenes. Diodorus, whom Cyril* of Alexandria tried to depict, along with Theodore of Mopsuestia, as an ancestor of Nestorianism, seems to have been principally concerned with preserving in Christ* the divinity of the Logos, first against the attacks of the Emperor Julian and the Arians; and then against the danger represented for him by Apollinaris’s concept of a “substantial union” between the Logos and an incomplete humanity. He therefore avoided attributing to the Logos the human weaknesses of Christ, even if it meant giving the impression of a loose union with the flesh the Logos had assumed. Contrary to received notions, his Christology relied initially on a Logos-sarx (word-flesh) schema derived from Eusebius of Emesa, and much closer to Alexandrian Christology than that of Antioch, since it was shared by Athanasius*. Subsequently, as a consequence of the Apollinarian controversy, Diodorus argued more and more along the lines of the “Logos-man” schema, although without making of the soul* of Christ a “theological factor”: this was not the point on which his refutation of Apollinaris’s positions was focused.

In his almost exclusive concern with shielding the divinity of Christ from the attacks of the Arians, John Chrysostom in fact subordinated all Christ’s human and psychological activity to the control of the Logos, the only real principle of decision. So on this point he remained very close to his master Diodorus. In reality it was not until Theodore of Mopsuestia that the human soul of Christ really became a “theological factor.” Because the Logos had assumed the form of a perfect man—that is, a body and a rational soul—that human soul, endowed with immutability* by divine grace*, not only “animated” the person of Christ but also held the power of decision and action in him, something which in Apollinaris’s system was attributed to the Logos alone. With that assumption, how was it possible to prevent this union of God* and a perfect man from appearing to introduce into Christ a duality of persons* (prosōpa), or from allowing for the supposition of a loose and purely mental union? Theodore might very well propose the analogy of body and soul in order to explain that the distinction of natures in Christ did not entail recognition of two persons, but he failed to express in a satisfactory manner a unity which did not proceed, as in Apollinaris, from a close but natural union. The notion of “single prosōpon,” used to express the result of the union of two natures, is evidence, despite the ambiguity of the term in Antioch at the time, that he had an intuition of the true unity of Christ.

c) Nestorian Crisis and Theodoret of Cyrrhus. One positive aspect of the Nestorian crisis was that it forced the representatives of Antioch and Alexandria to refine their christological terminology and correct its inadequacies. Beginning with his refutation of the anathemas of Cyril against Nestorius, Theodoret (393–460) was led into a long and painful debate that, from the Council* of Ephesus to that of Chalcedon*, made him the major theologian of the School of Antioch. However, like Theodore of Mopsuestia, nicknamed “the interpreter,” he was primarily an exegete, and it was in this capacity that he challenged Cyril’s christological formulations—“union by hypostasis,” or “single nature of God the incarnate Word*”—which he considered devoid of any basis in Scripture. In his Christology, close to that of Theodore, the human soul of Christ also played a genuine role, as shown, for example, in his exegesis of Christ’s temptation in the desert in Scholia de incarnatione unigeniti (Scholia on the Incarnation). Because the “union by hypostasis” of which Cyril spoke meant for him a union by “nature” (physis) or “substance” (ousia), and seemed thereby to imply the idea of “mixture” (krasis), which called into question the divinity of the Logos, he was always careful in his commentaries to make a clear distinction between the divine nature and human nature. His reaction was therefore close to that of Theodore against the Christology of Apollinaris. It also explains his reticence toward the term theotokos (God-bearer) (although he recognized its legitimacy). Above all it led him to place so much emphasis on the duality in Christ that he might give the impression of distinguishing in him not two natures but two persons. This was all the more true because, until the Council of Ephesus, he frequently used concrete expressions to designate them.

After 431 (Ephesus), aware of the ambiguity of this terminology, Theodoret gave up speaking of the “Word assuming” or the “man assumed,” in favor of purely abstract formulations with which he was equally familiar. Despite an evident desire to emphasize dyophysitism, he was careful to state that it was a matter of a close and indissoluble union (henōsis), and not a mere juxtaposition, even less an “inhabitation” in the sense understood by Nestorius. Accomplished from the moment of conception, this union of divine and human natures remained close, even at the time of the Passion*, when impassive divinity “appropriated” the sufferings of our humanity, fully assumed by that divinity in Christ. It is therefore impossible to call into question Theodoret’s good faith when he asserted that he had never “divided Christ in two” or professed the existence of “two Sons.” Clearly, for him the distinction between natures occurred within a “single prosōpon,” within a unified subject, although he used this concept, at least until the Council of Chalcedon, in a sense close to the one it had for Theodore of Mopsuestia.

While never failing to assert the nonfusion of the two natures, in the course of the debate with Cyril, Theodoret no doubt arrived at a better understanding of the need to proclaim the unity of the person. The abandonment of concrete designations, the care taken to make Christ the only active subject, and the choice of the term henōsis to express union, rather than the term synapheia (conjunction) preferred by Nestorius, all revealed an evolution of his terminology more than of his Christology. He could thus assert that he had never professed any doctrine but the one that distinguishes in Christ the humanity from the divinity, without separating them, and that recognizes only one imputed subject, “the only Son himself, clothed in our nature.” Although the form of this expression, on the eve of Chalcedon, does not express a real doctrinal evolution, it at least makes it possible to recognize the deepening in his christological thinking since Ephesus. In this area, as in that of exegesis, this last major representative of the School of Antioch had thus managed to reach a proper balance, thereby contributing, as he already had at the time of the Act of Union (433), to the acceptance of the fact that, regardless of the different formulations bequeathed by tradition*, representatives of Alexandria and Antioch expressed the same faith*.

- M. Richard (1934), “Un écrit de Théodoret sur l’unité du Christ après l’incarnation,” RSR 24, 34–61.
- J. Montalverne (1948), Theodoretus Cyrensis doctrina antiquior de Verbo “inhumanato,” Rome.
- J. Liebaert (1966), L’incarnation I: Des origines au concile de Chalcédoine, Paris.
- A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J.-N. Guinot (1995), L’exégèse de Théodoret de Cyr, Paris.

JEAN-NOËL GUINOT

See also Alexandria, School of; Apollinarianism; Arianism; Immutability/Impassibility, Divine; Mary; Nestorianism

Antitrinitarism. See Unitarianism

Apocalyptic Literature

The literature genre of apocalypse (from the Greek apokalupsis, “revelation”) takes its name from the title of the last book* of the New Testament. The Book of Daniel is the only other apocalyptic book in the Bible*. The genre is widely represented, however, in both Jewish and Christian pseudepigrapha, from the Hellenistic period down to the Middle Ages. Some similar kinds of literature are found in Persia as well as in the Greek and Roman worlds, but it is not clear whether they significantly influenced Jewish and Christian apocalypses.

I. Definition

Apocalypse may be defined as a story type in which a supernatural being acts as the intermediary to communicate a revelation* to a human being. The object of such a revelation is a reality that transcends both time (as it discusses eschatological salvation) and space (the scene takes place in another world). Usually, apocalypses are pseudonymous: they are attributed to famous figures such as Enoch or Ezra, instead of their real authors. The supernatural mediator is usually an angel* in the Jewish apocalypses. In Christian works, this role is sometimes taken by Christ. The eschatological salvation can take various forms, and may involve the restoration of Israel* or a new creation*, but it invariably involves reward and punishment for individuals after death.

II. Typology

1. Historical Apocalypses

Two types of apocalypse may be distinguished. The first, exemplified by the Book of Daniel, may be called “historical.” In this kind of apocalypse, the revelation is given in the form of a symbolic vision, such as Daniel’s vision of four great beasts coming up out of the sea (Dn 7:3). This vision is then interpreted by an angel with reference to historical events. Sometimes, the revelation takes the form of a speech by the angel rather than a vision, or a dialogue between angel and visionary. In Daniel 9, the revelation arises from the explanation of a biblical prophecy (Dn 9:2; see also Jer 25:11–12 and 29:10). Often, history is divided into a set number of periods. Daniel speaks of 70 weeks of years. At the end, there is a great crisis, marked by war* and persecution. Then there is a divine intervention, followed by resurrection* and the judgment* of the dead. Besides Daniel, this kind of apocalypse is found in the Animal Apocalypse (1 En 85–90), the Apocalypse of Weeks (1 En 93, 91:12–17), 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, and the Book of Revelation.

2. Ascent into Heaven

The second type of apocalypse is characterized by the motif of ascent to heaven. Enoch is the prototypical apocalyptic visionary of this kind. In these apocalypses, the revelation takes the form of a trip to heaven with the angel serving as a guide. The emphasis is on the geography of the heavens; the classical model typically includes the realm of the dead, the place of judgment, and a vision of the divine throne. There may be also the prediction of the world’s destruction, and at times a trip across history as in the historical apocalypses. The eschatological expectation deals primarily with the afterlife of individuals. Apocalypses of this kind are found in the Book of the Watchers (1 En 1–36), the Similitudes of Enoch (1 En 37–72), 2 Enoch, 3 Baruch, the Apocalypse of Zephaniah, and the Apocalypse of Abraham. This kind of apocalypse enjoyed great popularity in early Christianity (Ascension of Isaiah, Apocalypse of Paul, Apocalypse of Mary, etc.).

III. Origins of Apocalypticism

1. Precedents

Apocalypticism is a literary genre that developed late (third century B.C.—intertestament*). The historical apocalypse has obvious roots in Old Testament prophecy, especially in the later prophetic books. Isaiah 24–27, a postexilic addition to the Book of Isaiah, is often called the “Apocalypse of Isaiah,” although it lacks the usual “revelation.” These chapters of Isaiah make heavy use of mythological imagery, much of it drawn from ancient traditions now known through Ugaritic texts from the second millennium B.C. The ancient myths often recount a battle between a god and a monster at the time of creation (Marduk and Tiamat in Babylonian myth, Baal and Mot [Death], or Yamm [Sea], in Ugaritic). The prophetic/apocalyptic texts project this battle into the future. Isaiah 25:7 says that God will swallow up death (Mot) forever, and Isaiah 27:1 says that God will punish Leviathan and slay the dragon that is in the sea. Daniel’s vision of beasts rising from the sea continues this tradition. The battle with the dragon is a central motif in the Book of Revelation, which also conjures up beasts from the sea in chapter 13.

Isaiah 26:19 uses the imagery of resurrection for the restoration of the Jewish people* after the exile. Isaiah 65:17 speaks of a new heaven and a new earth, a theme that also appears in Revelation 21:1. The formal side of the apocalypse also had a precedent in postexilic prophecy. The Book of Zechariah presents its revelations in the form of symbolic visions interpreted by an angel.

2. Original Characteristics

a) Daniel. The Book of Daniel goes beyond the prophetic tradition in several respects. First, there is the use of pseudonymity. The passages we have cited from the Book of Isaiah are anonymous oracles that were added to the book of the eighth-century prophet. With Daniel, and with Enoch, we have a new phenomenon, where books are ascribed to legendary characters. Daniel probably never existed. The first six chapters of the Book of Daniel describe the careers of Daniel and his friends at the Babylonian court during the exile. Daniel is supposedly a wise man who distinguishes himself by his ability to interpret dreams and mysterious signs. Enoch is also characterized as a scribe and a wise man, rather than as a prophet. Yet the Books of Daniel and Enoch bear little resemblance to Proverbs or Sirach. The Old Testament wisdom books have an empirical approach to life and avoid claims to special revelation. Apocalyptic wisdom, in contrast, is by definition inaccessible to normal human reasoning and relies completely on a supernatural revelation with mystery as its object.

Daniel also differs from the prophetic tradition in paying much more attention to angels. The divine throne in Daniel 7 is surrounded by thousands upon thousands of celestial beings. An angel explains Daniel’s visions. In the end, the salvation of Israel is achieved by the heavenly victory of the archangel Michael over the “prince of Greece” (Dn 10:20; see also Dn 11:2). The main difference between Daniel and the Hebrew prophets, however, may be the belief in the resurrection and judgment of the dead. This belief opened the way to a set of values quite different from those in the Hebrew Bible. In the earlier prophets and in Deuteronomy, salvation means that the days will be many in the land and prosperity of the people. From the apocalyptic perspective, salvation comes after death and so it is acceptable to lose life in this world to gain it in the next. In historical reality, the heroes of the Book of Daniel are the martyrs* who lay down their lives during the persecution of the Maccabean era.

b) Enoch. The ascent apocalypses associated with Enoch show less continuity with biblical prophecy than is the case of Daniel. The figure of Enoch seems to be modeled to a large extent after a Mesopotamian legend, Enmeduranki, who was taken up to heaven before the Flood. The Enochic Book of the Watchers is older than the Book of Daniel, probably dating from the third century B.C. Unlike Daniel, it is not associated with a particular crisis, such as the persecutions of the Maccabean era. It addresses the problem of the origin of evil* by expanding the story of the sons of God who come down from heaven and married the daughters of men (Gn 6:1–4). These “Watchers,” as they are called, are destroyed by divine decree. Enoch is then taken up to heaven and guided through a trip to the end of the earth.

The Book of the Watchers resembles Daniel in its interest in the heavenly world. The description of the divine throne in 1 Enoch 14 is very similar to Daniel 7. Both apocalyptic visions differ from older prophetic throne visions (such as Is 6) in emphasizing the number of celestial beings around the throne. Enoch, like Daniel, suggests that salvation* is not to be found on earth, but in a blessed life beyond death. A later section of the Book of Enoch (1 En 91–105) describes the afterlife in terms of life companionship with the stars and the angels (1 En 104:2, 4, and 6). This imagery is close to Daniel, who sees the wise shine like stars after the resurrection (Dn 12:3). Some apocalypses in the name of Enoch were also composed at the time of the Maccabean revolt (the Animal Apocalypse and the Apocalypse of Weeks). These apocalypses are of the historical type and closer to Daniel than to the Book of the Watchers.

IV. Qumran

Both Daniel and Enoch had a profound influence on the literature found in the Qumran writings. They represent the literature of a sectarian movement that should probably be identified with the Essenes, although the identification is disputed. They also include Enoch, Daniel, and other books that were not composed within the sect. There is no clear case of a sectarian apocalypse in the writings, but nonetheless they often exhibit an apocalyptic worldview. The specifically sectarian viewpoint is most clearly set out in the rule books, especially in the Community Rule (1 QS). According to the treatise on the Two Spirits in 1 QS 3–4, humanity is divided between Spirits of Light and Darkness, and these do battle within people's hearts. The ways of the Spirit of Light have their goal in eternal life*; those of the Spirit of Darkness in fiery destruction without end. God has set a limit to the time of this conflict, and in the end he will destroy the forces of Darkness. This dualistic view of the world is expressed in a number of sectarian writings. The Testament of Amran is one of the older sectarian writings, and appears to come from the second century B.C. According to this document, the Angel of Light is known by various names (Michael, Melchizedek) and so is the Angel of Darkness (Melchiresha, Belial). The most colorful dualistic document from the writings is the Rule of the War, which describes the final battle between the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness. The Sons of Light, the true Israelites, are helped by the celestial forces, and they do battle with the Kittim (probably the Romans, but possibly the Greeks) and with the forces of Belial. In the end, God exalts the princely power of Michael among the angels and the kingdom of Israel on Earth (1 QM 17). This is very similar to what is found in the apocalypses, and was probably influenced by Persian dualism.

The Qumran writings also show the influence of the more mystical side of apocalyptic tradition. The Hodayot (Thanksgiving Hymns) express the belief that the members of the community are already mingling with the angelic army in this life. The Songs of Sabbath Sacrifice describe the liturgy* of the angels. Because of this belief in present participation in the heavenly world, the writings pay little attention to resurrection.

V. Early Christianity

Apocalyptic traditions also had a profound influence on early Christianity. Ernst Käsemann's claim that "Apocalyptic literature is the mother of Christian theology" may be too simple, since Christian theology had many sources. Nonetheless, apocalyptic expectation played a crucial part in the formation of the church*. According to the synoptic Gospels, Jesus* affirmed Daniel's vision of the "Son of Man coming in clouds with great power and glory" (Mk 13:26). There is no consensus in modern scholarship as to whether Jesus actually made such predictions. There is no doubt, however, that the early Christians believed that Jesus himself would come again as the Son of Man on the clouds. The Resurrection* of Jesus was not perceived as an isolated miracle. Rather, in the words of Saint Paul, Christ is "the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep" (1 Cor 15:20), and his Resurrection marks the beginning of the general resurrection. Paul is confident that the process will be completed within a generation (1 Thes 4:14–16). This kind of scenario (archangel, trumpet call, dead in Christ rising into heaven, etc.) only made sense within the context of the apocalyptic traditions that had developed in Judaism in the preceding 200 years.

The Book of Revelation (Johannine* theology, Lamb of God/Paschal Lamb*), composed toward the end of the first century A.D., was not an aberration in early Christianity, but the culmination of trend that is well attested in Paul and the synoptic Gospels. It differs from Jewish apocalypses in not carrying a pseudonym, but is inspired by the imagery of Daniel. It was also inspired by the ancient myths of conflict. Satan is a dragon cast out of heaven. The Roman Empire is a beast rising out of the sea, or the great whore seated on the seven-headed beast. At the end, Christ appears as a heavenly warrior who strikes down the nations with the sword of his mouth. One of the principal purposes of this apocalypse was to support persecuted Christians and assure them of victory even though they were subjected to martyrdom, following the example of Christ, who conquered from the cross. The intensity of the apocalyptic expectations of certain currents within early Christianity can also be seen in 2 Peter 2:1–3 and 3.

VI. Later Developments

In Judaism*, apocalypticism seems to have faded in the second century A.D., probably because Jewish hopes of divine deliverance had been bitterly disappointed in the great revolts against Rome. We do, however, find occasional revivals of apocalyptic expectation down to the Middle Ages. The apocalypses had an important bearing on the history of Jewish mysticism.

In Christianity, too, the mystical side of the tradition continued to flourish. The influence of the ascent to heaven (and descent to hell) apocalypses can be seen in the great poems of Dante*. Over the centuries, apocalypses of the historical type were repeatedly revived by millenarian movements, notably Joachimism (millenarianism*). Today, millenarianism has fallen into disrepute mostly because of its connection to Christian fundamentalism*, which interprets biblical prophecies in an unduly literal manner, and which lacks a sense of the mystery of the ways of God.

VII. Permanent Value

Whatever meaning they had in their historical contexts, the apocalypses, with their imaginative force and their powerful symbolic content, have been a source of hope* for the victims of oppression and alienation. Both Daniel and the Revelation of Saint John, written during persecutions, deny their approval to those who seek to oppose persecution with violence*. Their visions have inspired a view of the world in which it is better to lay down one's life than to renounce the principles of one's faith. It is true that John's Apocalypse has often been criticized because of the role that it gives to the vengeance of God*. Its depiction of the destruction of Babylon (in fact, Rome) is not, perhaps, entirely charitable, but it should be placed in its original context. It provides a means of expression for irrepressible feelings of anger and resentment toward the oppressor, but it leaves vengeance in God's hands. The decision to include this book in the canon* of Scriptures has long been contested, but is justified by the symbolic force of its images. Apocalyptic literature still contains elements that can console the oppressed, provided that it is never forgotten that we see only an enigma, as in a mirror (1 Cor 13:12), and that it is not in our power to calculate the day or the hour when God will come (Mt 25:13).

- Coll. (1977), Apocalypses et théologies de l'espérance, LeDiv 95.
- J. Lambrecht (Ed.) (1979), L'Apocalypse johannique et l'apocalyptique dans le Nouveau Testament, BETHL 80, Gembloux.
- B. McGinn (1979), Apocalyptic Spirituality, New York.
- C. Rowland (1982), The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity, New York.
- J.H. Charlesworth (1983–85), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, New York.
- D. Hellholm (Ed.) (1983), Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, Tübingen.
- A. Yarbro Collins (1984), Crisis and Catharsis in the Book of Revelation, Westminster.
- J. J. Collins (1984), The Apocalyptic Imagination, New York.
- C. Kappler (Ed.) (1987), Apocalypses et voyages dans l'au-delà, Paris.
- P. Sacchi (1990), L'Apocalittica giudaica e la sua Storia, Brescia.
- J.J. Collins, J.H. Charlesworth (1991), Mysteries and Revelations, Sheffield.
- F. Garcia Martinez (1992), Qumran and Apocalyptic, Leyden; Textos de Qumrán, Madrid.
- D. S. Russel (1992), Divine Disclosure: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic, Minneapolis.
- M. Himmelfarb (1993), Ascent to Heaven in Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, New York-Oxford.

JOHN J. COLLINS

See also Angels; Bible; Canon of Scriptures; Death; Eschatology; Intertestament; Judgment; Mystery; Prophet and Prophecy; Resurrection of the Dead; Revelation; Violence; Wisdom

Apocatastasis

Apocatastasis, a Greek word meaning “establishment” or “restoration,” is normally used in the language of Christian theology* to denote universal salvation*, principally because Origen* and other early Christian writers used the term to express a hope* for the restoration of all creatures endowed with reason* to their original state of unity with God*.

a) Scripture. Although the Hebrew Bible*, unlike other, earlier Semitic texts, does not conceive of human history* in terms of a cyclic conception of falls followed by restorations of cosmic well-being, a number of Old Testament passages express the hope that God will one day restore the security of Israel*, as he once brought the exiles back from captivity (Hos 11:11; Jer 16:15, 27:22; Dn 9:25; and Ps 126). The word apocatastasis is not used by the Septuagint, and appears in the New Testament only once, in Acts 3:21, where it seems to mean simply the “establishment” of the messianic kingdom* in fulfillment of God’s promise* (see also Acts 1:6). It is undeniable that many texts of the New Testament evoke the perspective of judgment* and eternal punishment for sinners, a number of others at least suggest that God’s “original” plan is to establish, through the risen Jesus*, a new life and a new cosmic unity that will include all people (e.g., Rom 11:32; Phil 2:9–11; Eph 1:3–10; Col 1:17–20; 1 Tm 2:3–6, 4:10; Ti 2:11; 2 Pt 3:9; and Jn 12:32).

b) Patristic Theories. Clement of Alexandria († before 215) was the first Christian theologian to suggest that the punishment of sinners, whether in this life or after death, is always therapeutic and therefore temporary. It is the only conceivable punishment. Once the soul* has been purified of its passionate attachments, it can accede to that eternal contemplation* of God that Clement calls its “restoration” or apocatastasis.

Origen came from the same cultural milieu as Clement and was surely influenced by his thought, but he developed an eschatology* that is at once more consciously biblical and more cautious in its speculation. Origen often mentions, but does not comment on, the biblical threats of the judgment and the eternal punishment of sinners, but he suggests that punishment must ultimately be psychological rather than material, and medicinal rather than vengeful. This leads him to develop, at least as a possibility, the doctrine of universal salvation usually associated with his name. Since, according to him, in God’s desired history “the end is always in the beginning,” and both God’s mercy* and human liberty* are indestructible, it is logical to think that all creatures endowed with reason will ultimately come, by God’s leading yet of their own choice, to lasting union with God. At times, Origen even seems to suggest that Satan and other evil spirits will be included in the final salvation, although in his “letter to friends in Alexandria” he denies having ever held this position (cf. Rufinus, De adulteratione librorum Origenis [397; On the Adoration of the Books of Origen]). In any case, Origen always expresses his theory of apocatastasis with great caution; as was said, he considered it “not as a certainty but as a great hope” (Crouzel 1978).

In the late fourth century, the same hope for universal salvation was expressed, even more cautiously, by Gregory* of Nazianzus. By contrast, Gregory of Nazianzus’s friend and contemporary, Gregory* of Nyssa, taught it quite openly in a number of his writings, as grounded both in the ontological finitude of evil* and in the natural dynamism that impels all creatures endowed with reason toward God. Beginning with the resurrection* of the body, final salvation will not be “restoration” in the sense of the regaining of a precorporeal state of the soul, but the realization of God’s eternal design for his angelic and human creatures, who will finally attain his image and likeness.

A revival of interest in the Origenist tradition—more precisely, in the extreme forms that it had taken in the writings of Evagrius Ponticus (late fourth century)—occurred among Palestinian monks in the sixth century, leading to conflicts and, ultimately, the condemnation of a number of Origenist doctrines during the reign of Justinian (527–65). Among the theses rejected by the Synod* of Constantinople in 543 (the condemnation of the synod was apparently confirmed, in an expanded form, by the assembly of bishops* before the start of the Second Council of Constantinople* in 553), was the following: “If anyone says or holds that the punishment of demons and of impious men is temporary, and that it will have an end at some time, or that there will be a complete restoration apocatastasis of demons and impious men, that is anathema.” This condemnation, which does not have the clear status of a decision of an ecumenical council*, is generally taken to be a rejection of the idea that one can know certainly that no one will be eternally damned.

c) Modern Theology. The doctrine of apocatastasis has continued to fascinate Christian theologians, even though it has never been a dominant opinion among them. Schleiermacher* considered the idea of eternal damnation to be incompatible with faith* in a just and good God, and thought that “a milder view” of salvation for all also had a scriptural foundation, with “at least equal rights” to credibility. According to Barth*, since our resistance to God is always temporal and finite, “the Eternal One cannot, as such, cease to negate that persistence in disbelief,” and that therefore “it is impossible to expect too much from God”; just as we cannot be certain that all will be elect of God, so we cannot exclude the possibility that God, in his freedom, will save all human beings. In recent Catholic theology, Balthasar* has been the most determined supporter of the thesis that, while one can never be absolutely certain of the final salvation of all, it belongs both to Christian hope* and to Christian love* to hold that it is possible, in the mystery* of God’s saving grace*. Ultimately, the question is whether human freedom is capable of definitively frustrating God’s purpose, or, put another way, whether the universal triumph of grace would mean the destruction of the created freedom that it justly seeks to transform and heal. It remains today a disputed question.

- Anti-Origenean canon of 543, ACO III, 213 Sq; of 553, ACO IV/1, 248 Sq.
- H. U. von Balthasar, Was Dürfen wir Hoffen? Einsiedeln, 1986; Kleiner Diskurs über die Hölle, Ostfildern, 1987; "Apokatastasis," TThZ 97, 1988, 169–82.
- K. Barth, KD II/2, Zurich-Zollikon, 1942, 286–563.
- E. Brunner, Die christliche Lehre von der Kirche, vom Glauben, und von der Vollendung (Dogmatik III), Zurich, 1960, 464–74; see Die christliche Lehre von Gott (Dogmatik I), Zurich, 1946, 375–81.
- Gregory of Nyssa, De anima et resurrectione, PG 46, 104 B11–105 A2, 152 A1–11, 157 B7–160 C12; De mortuis, GNO 9, Leyden, 1992, 28–68; Oratio catechetica, Ed. J. Srawley, Cambridge, 1903, 26, 100; 35, 138.
- Origen, De principiis I, 6, 1–3, SC 252, 194–204; I, 8, 3, ibid., 226 Sq; III, 5, 6–6, 9, SC 268, 228–54.
- F. Schleiermacher, Der christliche Glaube II, §163, Berlin, repr. 1960, 437 Sq.
- Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica Suppl., q. 93.
- ◆ J. Daniélou (1940), "L'apocatastase chez saint Grégoire de Nysse," RSR 30, 328–47.
- A. Méhat (1956), "'Apocatastase': Origène, Clément d'Alexandrie, Ac 3, 21," VigChr 10, 196–214.
- G. Müller (1958), "Origen und die Ap.," ThZ 14, 174–90; (1969), Apokatastasis pantôn. A Bibliography, Basel.
- P. Siniscalco (1961), "Ap., apokathistèmi nella tradizione della grande chiesa fine ad Ireneo," StPatr 3, 380–96.
- H. Crouzel (1978), "L'Hadès et la Géhenne selon Origène," Gr 59, 293–309.
- C. Tsirpanlis (1979), "The Concept of Universal Salvation in Saint Gregory of Nyssa," in Greek Patristic Theology: Basic Doctrine in Eastern Church Fathers I, New York, 141–56.
- L. Scheffczyk (1985), "Ap.: Faszination und Aporie," in IKaZ 14, 34–46.
- H. Crouzel (1987), "L'apocatastase chez Origène," in L. Lies (Ed.), Origeniana Quarta, Innsbruck, 282–90.
- J. Ambaum (1991), "An Empty Hell? The Restoration of All Things? Balthasar's Concept of Hope for Salvation (ap.)," Com(US) 18, 35–52.
- B. E. Daley (1991), The Hope of the Early Church: A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology, Cambridge.
- J. R. Sachs (1991), "Current Eschatology: Universal Salvation and the Problem of Hell," TS 52, 227–54; (1993), "Apocatastasis in Patristic Theology," TS 54, 617–40.

BRIAN E. DALEY

See also Hell; Hope; Salvation; Universalism

Apocrypha

a) Definition. The term apocrypha (secret, hidden), as applied to texts, has had varied meanings in the course of history and still seems resistant to any precise, stable, and widely accepted definition (Junod 1992).

In antiquity, the name apocrypha was given to certain books to which only the initiated were allowed access, or which were not supposed to be read in public. By the fourth century—that is, after the “canon*” of the Scripture had been definitively established—the term took on a negative connotation in the Christian church*, as well as a rather imprecise meaning. The term apocrypha was applied to noncanonical books said to have been written or used by heretics and supposed to have been written later than the canonical texts.

In the 16th century Catholics and Protestants raised questions about the status and the name to be used for a particular category of works that included Judith, Tobit, 1 and 2 Maccabees, The Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch, A Letter of Jeremiah, and passages in Esther and Daniel. The connection of these texts to the Old Testament had been discussed over time, particularly by Jerome, because they were not part of the Hebrew Bible*. Protestants called these works the Apocrypha, whereas Catholics designated them as “deuterocanonical” (made canonical in a second stage), a designation that gradually became standard. Even with the deuterocanonical works removed, the diffuse mass of the Apocrypha remained difficult to identify. From the 18th century on, scholars undertook the task of assembling and classifying texts in collections of Apocrypha of the Old Testament and Apocrypha of the New Testament. The title given to these collections, however, did not secure unanimous assent. To designate noncanonical Jewish texts composed in the Hellenistic period, the currently preferred terms are pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament and intertestamentary writings. As for Christian works, they are categorized as “Apocryphal Christian literature.” This article deals exclusively with the latter.

Apocryphal Christian literature is made up of:

- Texts of Jewish origin, but Christianized in the early centuries A.D., including the Ascension of Isaiah, Odes of Solomon, Sibylline Oracles, and Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.
- Christian texts composed in the first three centuries A.D.—that is, before the closing of the canon. They include various Gospels*, legendary acts of particular apostles or heroes, apocalypses, and conversations of the risen Christ with disciples.
- Christian texts composed after the establishment of the Christian canon, including narratives of the childhood of Jesus*, dormitions of Mary*, hagiographic lives of apostles and biblical figures, as well as chronicles, revelations, visions, and writings composed for liturgical purposes.

There has, in fact, been no interruption in the production of such texts between late antiquity and the present time.

The cultural connections of these texts, particularly the earliest ones, are various and include Jewish, Judeo-Christian, pagan-Christian and Gnostic communities, ecclesiastical circles in East and West, heterodox movements, and Manicheans. They all have in common two principal characteristics: 1) They are anonymous or pseudepigraphical (attributed to a saint or Church Father); and 2) they each have some connection to the books of either the New Testament or the Old Testament or both. This sometimes tenuous connection will be one of various kinds, the texts displaying one or the other of the following characteristics:

- They relate to events recounted or evoked in biblical books—for example, to the Transfiguration or the Passion*.
- They are situated before or after events recounted or evoked in those books—for example, the life of Mary before the Nativity or after the Passion and the narrative of Christ's descent* into hell.
- They are centered on characters who appear in those books—for example, the prophets* or the apostles.
- Their literary genre is similar to that of biblical writings—for example, letters and apocalypses.

b) History and Transmission of the Apocrypha. The ancient Apocrypha are badly preserved. To take the case of the gospels, it is known that, in addition to the four that were later included in the New Testament, a good dozen other gospels were circulating in Christian communities in the second century. But only fragments of these various narratives* survive: the Gospel of Thomas (in Coptic), Greek fragments of the Gospel of Peter, and a few gospel scraps that are rarely identifiable.

This partial transmission was an effect of the ecclesiastical condemnation that weighed on the ancient Apocrypha from the fourth century on. Certain marginal or heretical circles were suspected—not without reason, in the case of the Manicheans, the Priscillianists, and the Encratites of Asia Minor—of relying heavily on these texts, and so they were banned or destroyed. Nevertheless, the popularity they enjoyed among the people and the monks, combined with the fact that they had been translated very early from their original language (often Greek) into several other languages (Latin, Coptic, Syriac, Armenian, Arabic, Georgian, Irish, etc.), and thereby spread through various cultures, assured the survival of some of them. However, these texts rarely survived in their complete form and in their original language. Some of them managed to survive through the centuries only because they were rewritten, either to be purged of suspect elements or to be revised in line with current tastes.

The state of conservation of the texts, whether in the original language or in translation, in their ancient form or in one of their revised forms, represents a serious obstacle to the knowledge and use of ancient apocryphal literature.

c) Principal Types of Ancient Apocrypha. The division of ancient Christian apocryphal literature into four major genres (Gospels, acts, letters, and apocalypses) corresponding to the literary* genres of New Testament writings is seriously reductive and deceptive. On the one hand, the Apocrypha exhibit a much greater variety of genres and literary forms than is found in the New Testament; and on the other, division into four genres means that texts with little in common are grouped under a single heading. For example, the various apocryphal “Acts” of John, Andrew, Thomas, Peter*, and Paul do not belong to a defined literary genre identical to that of the Acts of the Apostles composed by Luke. Frequently, moreover, texts represent several genres. For example, the Epistle of the Apostles has the title of letter, whereas its form is related to the discourse of revelation and to conversation. The Clavis apocryphorum Novi Testamenti (Geerard 1992) provides a catalogue of the Christian Apocrypha of the first five centuries A.D.

Among the oldest Apocrypha, four genres seem to predominate:

- Gospels—either very similar to the synoptic Gospels, as in the case of the Gospel of Peter, or a collection of “sayings” (logia), as in the case of the Gospel of Thomas.

- Conversations of the risen Christ with disciples (and sometimes Mary*), as in the Epistle of the Apostles, Questions of Bartholomew, and so forth.
- Apostolic novels—for example, the Journeys of Peter (a pseudo-Clementine novel) and the Acts of John, Acts of Andrew, Acts of Peter, Acts of Paul, Acts of Thomas, and Acts of Philip.
- Apocalypses (centered on the Last Judgment* and hell*), including the Apocalypse of Peter and the Apocalypse of Paul.

d) New Perspective of Contemporary Research. Contemporary historical research has endeavored to reappraise the discredit that still weighs on the Apocrypha and to appreciate each text on its own terms. In particular it has modified the idea that the oldest Christian Apocrypha, by definition, propagated legendary traditions that were aberrant or clearly of secondary value (Koester 1990). It attempts to treat them as historical documents that provide invaluable evidence about the various circles in which they were written and which accepted them, as well as about the way in which the early Christians prolonged and enriched their memory of the founding heroes and events (Picard 1990). Finally, it seeks to bring to light the direct or indirect influence (in particular through the liturgy* and through iconography) that these texts have exerted on theology* and piety over the centuries.

- J. H. Charlesworth, J. R. Mueller (1987), The New Testament Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha: A Guide to Publications, with Excursuses on Apocalypses, Metuchen-London.
- M. Geerard (1992), Clavis Apocryphorum Novi Testamenti, Tournai.

Editions

J.-C. Thilo (1832), Codex apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Leipzig.
C. von Tischendorf (1866), Apocalypses apocryphae, Leipzig (Hildesheim, 1966); (1876), Evangelia apocrypha, Leipzig (Hildesheim, 1966).

R. A. Lipsius, M. Bonnet (1891–1903), Acta apostolorum apocrypha, Vols. 1–2, Leipzig (Darmstadt, 1959). (1983–), CChr.SA, Turnhout (text and translation).

Translations

J.-P. Migne (1856–58), Dictionnaire des Apocryphes ou collection de tous les livres ap. relatifs à l'Ancien et au Nouveau Testament, Vols. I–II, Paris (Tournai, 1989).

M. Erbetta (1966–81), Gli Apocrifi del Nuovo Testamento, vol. I, 1–2, vols. II and III, Turin.

F. Quéré (1983), Évangiles apocryphes, Paris.

W. Schneemelcher (1987–89), Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, vols. I–II, Tübingen.

J. K. Elliott (1993), The Apocryphal New Testament, Oxford.

F. Bovon, P. Geoltrain (Ed.) (1997), Écrits apocryphes chrétiens, I, Paris.

♦ F. Bovon (Ed.) (1981), Les Actes apocryphes des apôtres: Christianisme et monde païen, Geneva.

É. Junod, J.-D. Kaestli (1982), L'histoire des Actes apocryphes des apôtres du IIIe au IXe siècle, Lausanne; (1983), Gli Apocrifi cristiani e cristianizzati, Aug. 33; (1986), The Apocryphal Acts of Apostles, SemSup 38.

A. Y. Collins (1988), "Early Christian Apocalyptic Literature," ANRW II, 25, 6, 4665–4711.

(1990–), Apocrypha: Revue internationale des littératures ap., Paris-Turnhout.

H. Koester (1990), Ancient Christian Gospels, Philadelphia-London.

J.-C. Picard (1990), "L'apocryphe à l'étroit: Notes historiographiques sur les corpus d'apocryphes bibliques," Apocrypha 1, 69–117.

É. Junod (1992), "'Apocryphe du Nouveau Testament': Une appellation erronée et une collection artificielle," Apocrypha 3, 17–46.

J. H. Charlesworth (1997), "Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments," TRE 27, 639–45.

P. Pokornq, G. Stemberger (1997), "Pseudepigraphie," ibid., 645–59.

ÉRIC JUNOD

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Gnosis; Heresy; Intertestament; Judeo-Christianity

Apollinarianism

This doctrine takes its name from Apollinarius of Laodicea (c. 315–92), author of several books, many of which are completely or partially lost, or exist under an assumed name. His writings are apologetic, dogmatic (including Apodeixis, or Demonstration of divine Incarnation* by man's resemblance), polemical, and exegetical (numerous passages in the Chains: Apollinarius had a particularly strong reputation as an exegete). Apollinarius was ordained bishop* of the Nicaean community of Laodicea in Syria around 360 and his doctrines on Christ* soon provoked condemnation: from Athanasius in 372, in his Letter to Epictetus; and then from Epiphany, in 374. Furthermore, an investigation was conducted at Antioch, after which a warning on Apollinarian doctrine was included in the Panarion in 377). Several councils* condemned these doctrines: the Council of Rome (377 and 382), the Council of Antioch (379), and the Council of Constantinople* I (381 and 382). Gregory* of Nazianzus, Gregory* of Nyssa, in 385 and 387, as well as Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia wrote refutations.

Apollinarius wanted to safeguard the unity of Christ—God* incarnate, Word* made flesh*—against a viewpoint that saw in him the union of two Persons*. But true also to his Nicene instincts, he wanted to uphold the doctrine of Christ’s divinity. Apollinarius therefore first challenged all views that saw Christ as a man favored by divine grace* (anthrôpos entheos), any theology of the man who had been “adopted” (homo assumptus) by God. But in order to assert the substantial unity of flesh and Word*, he excluded the noûs, the mind, the rational intellect from the being* of Christ, insofar as he is able to determine himself: it is the divine element, divinity, the Spirit* of God, that takes this particular place (Apollinarius’s anthropology* usually has a tripartite character—mind, soul, flesh—but it is expressed at times as bipartite, and it is then said that Christ’s divinity serves as his soul).

It was his notion of fallen man and of salvation* that led Apollinarius to this Christology*. In fallen man the noûs has become carnal, and therefore no longer rules the passions* that are housed in the soul. But it is through the passions that sin* finds an entry into the person, and with sin comes death*. Things are quite different with Christ: in his case, the noûs is not conquered by flesh, because he is not human but divine, heavenly. As a result, sin and death are destroyed. Christ thus appears as a perfect man, in whom the divine Spirit prevails perfectly over flesh, which has been made divine, and over the passions of the soul. Taking up this position also allows Apollinarius to affirm, against Arius, Christ’s perfect immutability* during his life. There is, therefore, a substantial unity within him between Spirit and flesh, a unity that would be impossible between Spirit and a mind. In the latter case, there would only be a union of energy, as when the grace of God acts upon a human being. But in Christ there cannot be any action of grace since this would mean that he had need of salvation. And so we have the substantial unity of a perfectly unified being, which Apollinarius expressed in his famous formula: “One is the nature (physis) of the Word that has been incarnated.” Here the word *nature signifies concrete reality, hypostasis, person: because he is a strict Nicene, Apollinarius gives the same meaning to physis, ousia, and hypostasis. In Apollinarius’s theology, pneumatology therefore has a crucial role. The major argument that opposed Apollinarianism is well expressed by Gregory of Nazianzus: “What has not been assumed by Christ, in the incarnation has not been healed” (Letter 101: 32). Christ must therefore be a whole person body and spirit, if he is to save the whole of humanity.

- E. Muehlenberg (Ed.) “Apollinarios von Laodicea zu Ps 1–150,” in Psalmenkommentare aus der Kettenüberlieferung I, PTS 15, 1975, 1–118.
- É. Cattaneo (Ed.) Trois homélies pseudo-chrysostomiennes comme œuvre d’Ap. de Laodicée, ThH 58, 1980.
- ♦ G. Voisin (1901), L’apollinarisme: Étude historique, littéraire et dogmatique sur le début des controverses christologiques au IVe siècle, Louvain-Paris.
- H. Lietzman (1904), Apollinaris von L. und seine Schule, Tübingen.
- E. Muehlenberg (1969), Apollinarios von L., Göttingen.
- A. Grillmeier (1977), “Apollinarios,” TRE 3, 370–71; (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna; F.R. Gahbauer (1984), Das anthropologische Modell, Würzburg, 127–224.
- A. Grillmeier (1990), Le Christ dans la tradition chrétienne, CFi 72, 257–72.

PIERRE MARAVAL

See also Adoptionism; Antioch, School of; Arianism; Consubstantial; Nicaea I, Council of Apologetics. See Fundamental Theology

Apologists

a) Authors and Texts. Traditionally, apologists is the name given to Christian authors from the second century who sought to defend (apologeîn) their religion against pagan hostility, and less frequently, Jewish opposition.

Most of them were lay* people*, converted from Hellenism, educated in rhetoric and philosophy* in the main cultural centers of the empire. They addressed the pagan world in the second person, either directly to emperors, the Roman Senate, or individuals, or in the form of an open letter to the Greeks in general. The following are major examples of such apologetic writings: Aristides of Athens, Apology addressed to Hadrian (c. 145); Justin, Apologies, the first of which is notably addressed to Antonin (between 155 and 157) (I Ap. and II Ap.); Tatian, Discourse to the Greeks (between 152 and 177) (Tat.); Athenagoras of Athens, Petition about the Christians addressed to Marcus Aurelius and Commodus (177) (Ath.); Theophilus of Antioch, Three Books To Autolycum (after 180; perhaps in 181) (Theoph.); Letter/Epistle to Diognetus (between 12 and 200–210) (Dg.); Hermias, Satire on Pagan Philosophers (end of the second century?); Clement of Alexandria, Exhortation to the Greeks (195? 202?) (Clem.); Tertullian*, Apologetic, addressed to the magistrates of the Roman Empire (197) (Tert.) and Ad Nationes (197); Minucius Felix, Octavius (end of second century) (Minuc.). Several apologias addressed to emperors are entirely or partially lost. These include: Quadratus to Hadrian (c. 124–25); Apollinaris of Hierapolis, to Marcus Aurelius (c. 175–76); Melito of Sardis, to Marcus Aurelius (176 or 177); Militiade to the princes of this world (after 178). Other works contain apologetic elements, but do not belong to the second century context: Prediction of Peter (between 110–20?) and the pseudo-Justinian treaties; Oratio ad Graecos (end of the second century); Cohortatio ad Graecos (end of the second century or middle of the third century?) (Coh.); and De Monarchia (beginning of the third century?). The later apologists, while finding themselves in a rather different historical context from that of the second century, nevertheless developed themes that had often been proposed by the first apologists. Among the Greeks, we can name: Origen*, Against Celsus (246) and, after 313, Eusebius of Caesarea, Athanasius* of Alexandria, Theodoret of Cyr, and others; and among the Latins: Cyprian of Carthage, Arnobius of Sicca, Lactance, Firmicus Maternus, Prudentius, and Augustine* (Barnard 1978).

With the Jews, the apologists adopted a dialogue form, or else wrote their treatises in the third person: Justin, Dialogue with Trypho (after I Ap.) (D.); Tertullian, Against the Jews (c. 200).

The Discussion between Jason and Papiscus on the subject of Christ (c. 140) by Ariston of Pella has only partially survived.

b) Relationship to Judaism. By connecting Christianity to the Old Testament, the apologists hoped to demonstrate the great age of their religion to the pagans, thereby refuting accusations of its essential novelty (Tat. 31 and 35–41; Theoph. 3, 24–29; Coh. 9 and 12; Tert. 19, 1–8 and 47, 1). But they especially wanted to show that the fulfillment of the Old Testament prophecies* was the foundation of the truth* of Christianity and ignited faith* (Theoph. 1:14; see Justin, I Ap. 31–53; D. 8, 1 and 35, 2; Tat. 29; Tert. 20, 1–4). This argument also had significance for the Jews, since once the prophecies were realized, Jewish law* had to be considered as belonging to a preliminary time and henceforth no longer valid.

Underlying this vision and undoubtedly already in the New Testament, were collections of Testimonia relating to messianic prophecies, to the legal custom of Judaism*, to God's rejection of Israel* and to the calling of the pagans. Both Justin and Irenaeus made use of these. There were also Christian Midrashim that saw in the Old Testament a baptismal typology of paradise, of earth and water, of the Last Supper and the Passion*, and there are traces of these in the Epistle of Barnaby and in Justin (Prigent 1961). Theophilus tacitly acknowledges the same typology (Zeegers 1975 b).

From the Old Testament, the apologists adopted the notion of a single God* (Clem. 8, 77, 1–81, 4), of God as Creator (a nihilo: Theoph. 1,4; Coh. 22), and who provides for his creatures. God is transcendent, without a name* (Coh. 21; Minuc. 18,10). He is not diffused through matter (Tat. 4, 2), nor is he contained in a single place (Ath. 8, 4–7), for God is greater than all places (Justin, D. 127, 2–3; Theoph. 1, 3 and 2, 22; Minuc. 32, 1). They also retained from the Old Testament a sense of the prefigurations of the Christ: Wisdom* created by God before the world* so as to be associated with his creative work (Prv 8:22–31); and the Word* produced by God (Ps 44:2) in view of the creation* of the world (Ps 33:6) (Justin, II Ap. 6, 3 and D. 61, 1–5; Tat. 5, 1–2; Ath. 10, 1; Theoph. 2, 10 and 2, 22; Dg. 7, 2; Clem. 1, 5, 3 and passim; Minuc. 18, 7), charged with completing the divine missions on earth and with safeguarding the transcendence of God (Theoph. 2, 22). The events of the life of Christ also deserve faith because they were predicted (Justin).

Certain apologists drew inspiration from rabbinical exegeses* in order to interpret the hexameron (Grant 1947), notably to find a personal category (the Son or the Logos) (Zeegers 1975 b) in the en arkhè of Genesis 1:1.

c) Relationship to the Pagan World. First and foremost, the apologists sought to defend themselves against recurring accusations of immorality, atheism*, noncivic spirit, newness, of having blind faith in a crucified man, and an irrational hope* in the resurrection* of the body.

They also sought to justify their refusal to offer the emperor the worship that was due to God alone (Theoph. 1, 11; Tat. 4, 1; Tert. 27, 1 and 28, 3–34, 4). Some continued to pray for the prosperity of the empire and hoped for harmony between church* and state (Ath. 37, 2–3), by underlining the coincidence between the prosperity of the empire and the advent of Christianity (Melito in Eusebius, HE 2, 4, 26, 7–11).

Asserting all the while that Christianity was the only true philosophy, the apologists nonetheless recognized common points between the two thought systems. Most explained this harmony through the Greek “small thefts.” Others explained it more positively, in terms of the action of the Word (logos spermatikos), which instilled in all human beings the seeds of truth (Justin, I Ap. 44, 10; II Ap. 8, 1, 3 and 13, 5; Clem. 6, 68, 2 and 7, 74, 7). They went as far as asserting that those who have lived in accordance with the Word belonged to Christ (Justin, I Ap. 46, 3–4; see Ath. 7, 2; Minuc. 20, 1).

Notable points in common are the dualism of body-soul*, the rejection of idolatry*, the sign of universal cataclysm through fire, the just retribution for good and evil. Similarly, God is presented with features borrowed from Middle Platonism and Stoicism (see Spanneut 1957). He has negative attributes*, but he is also provident. His works, together with the harmony of the cosmos, reveal him as the Creator and Father of all things (see Plato, Timaeus 28 C). The Stoic terminology of logos endiathetos and logos prophorikos allows the two states of the Word to be expressed: it is simultaneously immanent to God and engendered in view of the creation (Theoph. 2, 10, and 2, 22). It is often also in Stoic terms that the pneuma (Holy* Spirit) is described. This presentation certainly ran the risk of erasing the specific contribution of the New Testament.

d) Relationship to the New Testament and Christian Doctrines. Some apologists cite Christ specifically. Aristides, for example, gives a summary of his life (15, 1–3; see Tert. 21, 14–23; in an anti-Jewish argument), while Justin asserts that the Immaculate Conception, miracles*, death*, and the Resurrection are fulfillments of prophecy (I Ap. 22, 2 and 23, 2.) The Cohortatio ad Graecos stresses that the coming of the Savior was predicted by the Sibylle (38). They do not insist on the folly of the cross or on its redemptive action. With the exception of Clement (9–12), they hardly refer to “a god who took flesh in accordance with the divine economy” (Ath. 21,4), “a god born in the form of man” (Tat. 21,1) and “the God who suffered” (Tat. 13,3). Most designate Christ using Old Testament titles, such as Word (Jn 1:1) and Wisdom (1 Cor 1:24) (Justin, D. 61, 1–3; 62, 4; 129, 3; Tat. 5, 1; Theoph. 2, 10; Dg., 7, 2); and when they describe the Word of the Son of God, it is in this same Old Testament context (Theoph. 2, 22; Ath. 10, 2–4 and 24, 2; Dg. 7, 4; Tert. 21, 11–14).

The Trinitarian formulations are sometimes specified (Aristides, 15, 1; Justin, I Ap. 6, 2; 13, 3; 61, 2 and 65, 3; Ath. 10, 5; 12, 3 and 24, 2). The term trias is found for the first time in Theophilus (2, 15), but it designates a less Trinitarian group than has been supposed (Zeegers 1975 a).

The apologists do not all offer the same anthropology*. Most adopt the dual body-soul scheme, whereas others employ the tripartite body-soul-spirit scheme (Justin, D. 6,2), asserting that the soul is not necessarily immortal (Tat. 13, 1–3). To refute the objection of God’s responsibility for the death of human beings (Tat. 11, 2; Theoph. 2, 27), they emphasize that God created human beings in an intermediate state between mortal and immortal (Theoph. 2, 24 and 2, 27) and granted them free choice between good* and evil*, between life and death, and therefore gave them responsibility for their own destiny (Justin, I Ap. 28, 3 and 43, 3–8; II Ap. 7, 3–6; Tat. 7, 2–3 and 11, 2; Theoph. 2, 24 and 2, 27). So they stress the reality of free will, but also humanity’s need of grace* (Justin, I Ap. 14, 2–3 and D. 116, 1; see D. 7, 2 and 58, 1; Dg., 8, 7–9, 6) and faith (Tat. 15, 4; Clem. 9, 87, 1). They assert that the salvation* of human beings is a gift from God (Theoph. 2, 26; Clem. 10, 94, 1) and that their vocation matches their dignity. Human beings, that is, are created by God's own hands (Theoph. 2, 18), in his image and likeness (Tat. 15, 1–2; Clem. 10, 98, 1). They are called to contemplation* (Justin, I Ap. 23, 3), to immortality in sharing divine life (Theoph. 2, 17; Clem. 1, 8, 4 and 10, 107, 1) and to divine filiation* (Clem. 10, 99, 3). The fundamental precepts* are those of the Decalogue*. Several apologists underline the stricter character of evangelical morality in conjugal matters (Mt 5:44–46; see Is 66:5; Aristide 15, 5–9; Justin, I Ap. 14, 3; 15, 9–13 and 16, 1–3; Ath. 11, 2–3 and 12, 3; Theoph. 3, 14; Dg. 10, 5–6; Tert. 39, 7–11; Clem. 10; 108, 5), the ideal of virginity (Justin, I Ap. 61, 1–13 and 66, 1; D. 13, 1–14, 2; 43, 2) and the precept of charity (Mt 5:44–46; see also Is 66:5; Aristide 15, 5–9; Justin, I Ap. 14, 3; 15, 9–13 and 16, 1–3; Ath. 11, 2–3 and 12, 3; Theoph. 3, 14; Dg. 10, 5–6; Tert. 39, 7–11; Clem. 10; 108, 5). With regard to these points, they readily highlight the contrast between pagan and Christian behavior (Tat. 32) and more generally the paradox of Christians' attitudes in the world (Dg. 5). The only sacraments* described are those of Christian initiation*: baptism* (Justin, I Ap. 61, 1–13 and 66, 1; D. 13, 1–14, 2; 43, 2) and the Eucharist* (Justin, I Ap. 65–67; D. 41, 1–3; 70, 4 and 117, 1–3).

In terms of eschatology*, the apologists do not base the resurrection of the body on the Resurrection of Christ, and rarely on the realization of Old Testament prophecies (see Ez 37:7–8; Justin, I Ap. 52, 5–6). Rather, they look to the omnipotence of God (Lk 18:27), who is capable of recreating what he created from nothing (Justin, I Ap. 19, 5–6; Tat. 6, 1–2; Tert. 48, 5–7; Minuc. 34, 9–10); to the soul's need to find an identical body (Tert. 48, 2–3); and to the analogies offered by nature* (Theoph. 1, 13 and 2, 14; Tert. 48, 8; Minuc. 34, 11) and in human procreation (Justin, I Ap. 19, 1–4). Here again the distinctive Christian dimension is sidestepped.

e) Conclusion. The apologist polemic against paganism*, both its writings and its rituals, was caustic. Stripped of any attempt to interpret, it was more likely to annoy than convince. The claim of apologists to be the only guardians of truth could not have been well received by the pagans, whom these same apologists regarded as thieves of truth, or by the Jews, who were said to have an outdated religion. If the apologists were at all successful in making the pagans reflect, it was perhaps because their writers were intellectuals, educated in the same school as the pagans themselves, and because their attempt to defend a banned religion naturally provoked an examination of it.

The apologists are important in that they attempted to present Christianity as a coherent doctrine, venerable because of its great age, and compatible with philosophy. They undoubtedly reduced the specific dimension of the gospel and did not answer the real pagan question: that of the scandal of the cross. But they did not intend to expound the whole of the gospel. They only wanted to show the pagans that revelation* contained acceptable philosophical foundations. From this point of view, the apologists were pioneers in transmitting the Christian message.

- M. Geerard, Clavis patrum graecorum, I, Turnhout, 1983.
- Corpus apologetarum christianorum saeculi secundi*, Ed. I. C. T. Otto, 9 vols., Jena, 1847–72; 3rd Ed. 1876–81 (repr. 1969). PG 6.
- Athenagoras, Supplique au sujet des chrétiens, Ed. and trans. B. Pouderon (SC 379), Paris, 1992.
- Clement of Alexandria, Protrepticus.
- Épître à Diognète*, Ed. and trans. H.-I. Marrou (SC 33 bis), Paris, 1965.
- Hermias, Mockery of the Heathen Philosophers.
- Justin, Apologies; Dialogue with Trypho.
- Minucius Felix, Octavius, Ed. and trans. J. Beaujeu (CUFr), Paris, 1964.
- Pseudo-Justin, Cohortatio ad Graecos, De Monarchia, Oratio ad Graecos, Ed. M. Marcovich (PTS 52), Berlin, 1990.
- Tatian, Oratio ad Graecos.
- Tertullian, Apologeticum.
- Theophilus of Antioch, Three Books to Autolycus, Ed. and Tr. R. M. Grant, Oxford, 1970.
- ♦ E. J. Goodspeed (1912), Index apologeticus siue clavis Iustini martyris operum aliorumque apologetarum pristinorum [Theophilus omitted], Leipzig (repr. 1969).
- A. Puech (1912), Les apologistes grecs du IIe siècle de notre ère, Paris (old and at times partial; remains useful).
- R. M. Grant (1947), "Theophilus of Antioch to Autolycus," HThR 40, 227–56; (1955), "The Chronology of the Greek Apologists," VigChr 9, 25–33.
- M. Spanneut (1957), Le stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église, de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie, PatSor 1, Paris.
- P. Prigent (1961), Les testimonia dans le christianisme primitif: L'Épître de Barnabé I-XVI et ses sources, Paris.
- N. Zeegers (1975 a), "Quelques aspects judaïsants du Logos chez Théophile d'Antioche," in Acts from the 12th Classical Studies Conference EIRENE (Cluj-Napoca, 2–7 October 1972), Amsterdam, 69–87; (1975 b), "Les citations du NT dans les Livres à Autolycus de Théophile d'Antioche," TU 115, Berlin, 371–81.
- L. W. Barnard (1978), "Apologetik, I: Alte Kirche," TRE 3, 371–411.
- R. M. Grant (1988), Greek Apologists of the Second Century, Philadelphia.
- N. Zeegers (1990), "Théophile d'Antioche," DSp 15, 530–42.
- C. Munier (1994), L'Apologie de saint Justin philosophe et martyr, Fribourg.
- B. Pouderon, J. Doré (Ed.) (1998), Les Apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, Paris.

NICOLE ZEEGERS-VANDER VORST

See also Gnosis; Judeo-Christianity; Marcionism; Messianism/Messiah; Philosophy; Platonism, Christian; Stoicism, Christian; Trinity; Word

Apophasia. See Negative Theology

Apostasy. See Cyprian of Carthage; Heresy

Apostle

1. History of the Concept

In secular Greek the word apostolos had a relatively broad range of meanings. Most often it designated the accomplishment of a mission (dispatch of a fleet, naval expedition) or the document authorizing the mission (passport, letter of escort, notice of delivery). It was only rarely applied to people (e.g., Herodotus I. 21, V. 38). In using apostolos from the outset as an established term designating a “plenipotentiary envoy,” early Christian literature was in fact recycling an Old Jewish Testament. This usage was rooted in the concrete framework of ancient Eastern law*, according to which an envoy represented and stood in for his representative throughout the duration of a particular mission. This legal principle is attested on several occasions in the Old Testament (e.g., 1 Sm 25:40 and 2 Sm 10:1–3), though the term apostolos itself appears only in 1 Kings 14:6 (Septuagint). Its classic expression is found in Mishna Berakhot 5, 5: “A man’s envoy is like that man himself.” Judaism* did not, however, institutionalize the function until after the catastrophe of A.D. 70, when the new central authority* created a body of commissioners charged with inspecting the communities of the Diaspora and collecting taxes from them. The official name of these functionaries was provided by the Aramaic verbal substantive shâlîach; and as Jerome correctly conjectured (ad Ga 1, 1), it corresponds exactly in form and content to the Christian term apostolos. The Christian idea of apostle chronologically preceded this fixing of the Jewish concept of shâlîach, and thus cannot be the result of a direct borrowing from Judaism. The two terms must rather be seen as parallel formations, derived from the same legal notion. The first uses of the word apostleship (Greek apostolè), as a Christian technical term designating a charge attached to the person of the apostle as a permanent agent of a mission*, are found in Paul (Gal 2:8; 1 Cor 9:2; and Rom 1:5; see also Acts 1:25).

2. The Two Sources of Christian Apostleship

a) Scholars are now in agreement in attributing a postpaschal origin to Christian apostleship. The identification of the prepaschal circle of the “Twelve” with the apostles—an identification that is merely incidental in Mark 3:14 and 6:30 and Matthew 10:2, and developed systematically only in Luke 9:10, 22:14, and 24:10—is the result of retrospective harmonization. The Twelve did not have the function of legal representatives of Jesus*, but that of a kerygmatic sign for Israel*. Their institution by Jesus was a significant act which illustrated the essence and the purpose of his mission to the people* of God*. The number 12, symbolizing the totality and integrity of that people, referred to the fact that Jesus had been given the task of reuniting all of Israel and leading it to its eschatological fulfillment. The Twelve then appeared, so to speak, as the founding fathers and the points of crystallization around which the people of salvation* were to gather at the end of time (Mt 19:28). They did not, however, represent an assembly in which certain functions had been institutionalized.

The circle of disciples who followed Jesus, within a community of vocation and service set under the sign of the imminent advent of the kingdom* of God, was not at all limited to the Twelve. Even after Easter, the circle of Twelve maintained for a time its meaning as a sign addressed to Israel. Having designated a new member (Acts 1:15–26) to take the place left vacant by the betrayal of Judas—who was “one of the Twelve” (Mk 14:10 and 14:43)—they took a public position in Jerusalem* by presenting themselves as the kernel around which the people of God should gather at the end of time (Acts 2). But the role of the Twelve began to decline by the mid-30s. The “apostles” then became the decisive group in the primitive community of Jerusalem (Gal 1:17), which no doubt reflects a change in the ecclesiological and missionary paradigm. The expectation of the reunion of Israel in Jerusalem was replaced by the awareness of a mission, which was to be actively assumed: a mission to Israel, and beyond that to the pagans.

Apostleship was founded on the apparitions of the risen Christ* (1 Cor 9:1 and 15:5–11). But not all the witnesses of the Resurrection* were considered apostles. For the church* of Jerusalem, only appearances that had the character of call and mission could legitimate those who experienced them as plenipotentiary envoys of Jesus Christ. Because Paul manifestly satisfied this criterion, he was recognized as the last apostle to be called (1 Cor 15:9–11).

The circle of those apostles called by the risen Christ was thus limited in number (1 Cor 15:7). We cannot clearly identify all its members. Peter*, first witness of the Resurrection, was thereby the leading apostle. The Twelve, named as witnesses of the Resurrection, were also without doubt apostles. To them should probably be added James the brother of Jesus and Barnabas, as well as Andronicus and Junias (Rom 16:7).

b) In addition to this clearly defined type of apostleship, as it was represented in Jerusalem, we find traces of a more open apostleship of a pneumatic and charismatic character in Antioch and its Syrian hinterland. Here the decisive factor was not the mandate of the risen Christ but the teaching of the Holy* Spirit. According to an ancient tradition (repeated in Acts 13:1–3, 14:4, and 14:14), it was through a prophetic testimony inspired by the Holy Spirit that Paul and Barnabas were invested with the charge of missionary envoys of the community of Antioch and thereby considered to be apostles. As a young man Paul had understood himself to be an apostle in this broad sense, and it was only after having established closer contacts with Jerusalem that he came to redefine his apostleship according to the criteria applied in that community. The origin of this second type of apostleship remains obscure. However, it may be presumed that it was rooted in the circle of itinerant Galilean-Syrian missionaries that came out of the prepaschal Christian community, a circle to which is connected the Q source, or Source of the Logia (Bible*, Gospels) (Mt 10:5–16 and Lk 10:1–12). The Didache (11:3–6), for example, attests to the continued existence in Syria in the early second century of itinerant charismatic preachers who were considered apostles. It is among these that we must look for the adversaries designated by Paul as “superlative apostles” (2 Cor 11:5 and 12:11) or “false apostles” (2 Cor 11:13). According to Paul, these individuals sought to legitimate their spiritual mandate by inspired speech (2 Cor 10:10 and 11:6), forcing Paul to compare himself with regard to visions (2 Cor 12:1) and the “signs of a true apostle” (2 Cor 12:12). The false apostles of Ephesus mentioned (in post-Pauline times) in Revelation 2:2 can also be included here.

3. Paul and the Pauline Tradition

a) Paul deserves particular recognition: in his vast theological reflection, he deepened the understanding of apostleship and developed it in different directions. Taking up the concept of apostleship based on the experience of the risen Christ, he interpreted his vocation as the act by which God “was pleased to reveal his Son” to him (Gal 1:16). He describes this revelation by making an obvious analogy with the calling of the Old Testament prophets* (Is 49:1 and Jer 1:16), and attributes a salvatory place in history to apostleship as a bearer and messenger of the eschatological, self-manifestation of God, where the prophets’ message is absorbed (Rom 1:2).

Elsewhere he emphasizes the essential relation between apostleship and the gospel. The apostle is “set apart for the gospel of God” (Rom 1:1). As final messenger of God, charged with proclaiming to the world the saving message of God’s imminent reign (Rom 10:14–17), Paul is an instrument for the fulfillment of the gospel. When, as an envoy of Christ, he implores, “be reconciled to God” (2 Cor 5:20), it is God himself who implores through Paul. He is not only the bearer and the messenger, but also the representative and personification of the gospel. His entire person and his way of life show the imprint of the gospel, of which Christ crucified forms the heart and the content. His sufferings (2 Cor 4:7–18), his weakness (2 Cor 12:9–10), and his life in the service of others (2 Cor 4:5) all reflect the structure of the gospel, founded on the journey of Christ. It is through its conformity with the gospel that the behavior of the apostle constitutes an ethical (ethics*) model (1 Cor 4:16 and 11:1; Gal 4:12).

Paul strongly emphasizes the ecclesiological dimension of apostleship. It is the apostle's task to bring together the community of salvation made up of Jews and pagans, to make of it the location for the presence of the gospel in history*. He has been called and sent "to bring about the obedience of faith for the sake of his name among all the nations" (Rom 1:5). This founding function distinguishes the ministry* of the apostle from the other ministries of the community: these latter, by contrast, are charisms through which the Holy Spirit acts within the Church. In the perspective of the history of salvation, the apostle's ministry is placed before all other ministries (1 Cor 12:28). He is the one who lays the foundations for the sacred edifice of the Church, a foundation on which others will build (1 Cor 3:9–17). He is the father who, in bringing the gospel, has engendered the Church (1 Cor 4:15 and Gal 4:12–20). In conformity with this founding function, the apostolic duty is not attached to a particular community but is connected to the universal Church. In relation to particular communities, their duties, and their services, the apostle is the one who sets down the basic foundations and establishes norms. And so it was that Paul, during the founding period of the Christian communities with which he was associated, exercised in exemplary fashion all the ministries that would later be attributed to different authorities. He was the master who transmitted the traditions and taught the basic doctrines (1 Cor 15:3–11, passim). He was the prophet who, according to the portion of the Holy Spirit that had been granted to him, interpreted Scripture and revealed what Christ, now ascended into heaven, wanted for the present (1 Cor 7:40 and 13:2). Finally, he was the leader of the community, charged with settling questions of organization (1 Cor 11:23). Through his Epistles, Paul continued to exercise all these functions after the establishment of the community, insofar as was necessary.

b) Paul's reflections are developed in the Deutero-Pauline writings (Colossians, Ephesians, pastoral Epistles), with the accent principally on the ecclesiological meaning of apostleship. Apostles are now considered founders and guarantors of the tradition on which the Church is based. According to Ephesians 2:20 (and in contrast to 1 Cor 3:10) they are, with the prophets, the solid basis on which the sanctified house of the Church stands. In the same spirit, the pastoral Epistles see Paul as the bearer and guarantor of the doctrinal treasure that the Church of future generations will have to preserve (1 Tm 6:20 and 2 Tm 1:14). In addition, Paul appears here as the normative authority in pastoral matters. Community leaders are required to follow the apostle in teaching and spiritual direction (1 Tm 4:11, 5:7, and 6:2), in the maintenance of community order (1 Tm 5:14), as well as in the witness given by their lives (2 Tm 2:8–13). They must consider themselves in all this as his successors and his replacements (1 Tm 3:15 and 4:13).

4. Other New Testament Writings

a) Luke also proposes a strong concept of apostleship in his work in two parts, Luke and Acts. In his view, apostles are above all the initiators and guarantors of the tradition* to which the Church must conform (Acts 2:42). In his concern with reporting the words and acts of Jesus by setting them out in a verifiable way, he limits the circle of apostles to those who accompanied Jesus from the beginning of his ministry and who witnessed both his life and his Resurrection (Acts 1:21–22). He thus repeats the notion, which Christians probably borrowed from Judaism (Rev 21:14), of the twelve apostles. In this perspective, which was integrated into the common understanding of the Church, Paul was to be sure a privileged witness of the gospel (Acts 26:16), but not an apostle.

b) John 13:16, 17:3, 7:18, and 7:25 and Hebrews 3:1 present an independent tradition that refers to the Jewish legal conception of the apostle as a plenipotentiary envoy (see 1 above). Jesus himself appears here as the envoy of God, charged with representing him in the eyes of the world. These two writings recognize no other disciple than Jesus.

5. Later Tendencies

From the second century on, apostles have generally been identified with the founding personalities of the earliest times of the church, those who established the norms of the tradition in matters of government* and doctrine.

a) The First Epistle of Clement (42; 44:2–4) thus relates ecclesiastical duties to a divine order, which extends from God to Christ and to the apostles, then to the bishops* and deacons* instituted by the apostles. We can see taking shape here the idea of an apostolic* succession. This would become the keystone of a hierarchy, and therefore the principal legitimizing source of authorities. On the other hand, Ignatius of Antioch believed that the presbyters* of communities, gathered around the bishop, reproduced the heavenly model of the “senate” of apostles assembled around God himself (Letter to the Trallians 3:1).

b) The adjective apostolikos (apostolic) appears for the first time in Ignatius’s Letter to the Trallians; which first refers to the model of the apostles, and then more generally to the norms established in their doctrine as in The Martyrdom of Polycarp 16:2. From then on, any doctrine was considered apostolic if it could be traced back to the origins of the Church, on the grounds of its being recorded in the New Testament witness of the apostles. The concept of apostolicity, which appears only in modern dogmatic terminology, also served to express this relationship to an original norm.

- G. Klein (1961), Die zwölf Apostel: Ursprung und Gehalt einer Idee, FRLANT 77.
- J. Roloff (1965), Apostolat—Verkündigung—Kirche: Ursprung,

Inhalt und Funktion des kirchlichen Apostelamtes nach Paulus, Lukas und den Pastoralbriefen, Gütersloh.

- K. Kertelge (1970), “Das Apostelamt des Paulus, sein Ursprung und seine Bedeutung,” BZ 14, 161–81.
- J. Delorme (Ed.) (1974), Le ministère et les ministères selon le Nouveau Testament, Paris.
- F. Hahn (1974), “Der Apostolat im Urchristentum: Seine Eigenart und seine Voraussetzungen,” KuD 20, 1974, 54–77.
- J. H. Schütz (1975), Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority, MSSNTS 26.
- F. Agnew (1976), “On the Origin of the Term ‘Apostolos,’” CBQ 38, 49–53.
- J. Roloff, G. G. Blum, F. Mildenerger (1978), “Apostel/Apostolat/Apostolizität,” TRE 3, 430–83.
- E. Fuchs (1980), “La faiblesse, gloire de l’apostolat selon Paul,” ETR 55, 231–53.
- K. Kertelge (Ed.) (1981), Paulus in den neutestamentlichen Spätschriften, QD 89.

JÜRGEN ROLOFF

See also Apostolic Succession; Church; Gospels; Israel; Jesus, Historical; Mission/Evangelization; People of God

Apostles, Symbols of. See Creeds

Apostolic Fathers

Introduced by scholars at the end of the 17th century, the expression Apostolic Fathers suggests that this generation of writers was in direct contact with the apostles*. This title initially designated the following set of writings: the Letter of Barnabas, the two letters of Clement of Rome, the letters of Ignatius of Antioch and Polycarp of Smyrna, and The Shepherd of Hermas. Later were added the passages of Papias of Hierapolis, the Letter to Diognetus, and the Didache. These writings have different origins, come from different eras, and vary in composition and style. For the most part, they are dated before A.D. 150 and tend to share a pastoral emphasis.

a) First Group. The Letter of Barnabas is a pseud-epigraphon, probably written in Alexandria between A.D. 70 and 100. It contains severe criticism of Judaism, particularly of its ritual and ceremonial requirements: the sacrifices* (§2), fasting (§3), circumcision (§9), the Sabbath* (§15), the temple* (§16). The Letter criticizes Jews for applying the Scriptures* literally instead of interpreting them allegorically. The work ends with an essay on the doctrine of two paths (§18–20). Clement of Rome’s Letter to the Corinthians was written around A.D. 96 by Peter*’s third successor, and in the name of the Christian community in Rome*. Meticulous in style, the letter describes the virtues* necessary for community life (repentance, faith*, humility, harmony: §4–36). It reminds the reader that the apostles themselves established their successors as episcopi and presbyters* (§44), and ends with a long prayer* that is filled with lightly Christianized references to the Old Testament (§59–61). Clement does not scruple about combining pagan themes, like the harmony of the cosmos* (§20), with several biblical citations. The so-called Second Letter of Clement is, in fact, an anonymous second-century homily on Christ as judge and Redeemer.

Around 110 Ignatius, bishop* of Antioch, wrote several letters in the course of his journey to Rome*, where he was martyred. Three of these were pre-served in a Syriac summary. In addition to the seven letters generally considered authentic, there were six other Apocrypha* from the fourth century. In an impassioned and sometimes uneven style, they assert the principle of the monarchical episcopate (Magnesians 6:1), of the necessary unity* of the community around its bishop (Philadelphians 4). The Eucharist, over which only the bishop can preside, is truly the body of Christ (Smyrniotes 1:1). They present martyrdom* as the supreme form of imitation* of Christ (Romans 5–6).

Ignatius's friend, Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, wrote a Letter to the Philippians. The story of his Martyrdom, which served as a model for this literary genre, explains the veneration offered to victims of persecution and bears the traces of ancient Christian prayers (§14). Hermas, perhaps the brother of Pope* Pius I, probably wrote The Shepherd around 150, the first text to explicitly refer to the possibility of a (single) penitence—after baptism. The visions, which have an apocalyptic* quality, present the Church* either as an old woman (Vision II), or a large tower (Vision III and Similitude IX). There are also long moral lessons (Precepts I–XII). Sometimes Christ is called the Venerable Angel* (Vision V), other times, the Master of the Tower (Similitude IX). This work is often considered an example of Judeo-Christian theology*.

b) Added Works. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, gathered all the information on the apostles that their disciples could convey. His work, which seems to have been rather anecdotal, is lost. Only a few passages survive. In them, Papias defends the millenarian thesis and reports that Saint Matthew first gathered the words of Christ in Hebrew.

The Letter to Diognetus is an apologia for Christianity, addressed to a cultured pagan. Both its author and intended recipient are unknown, as are the date and place of composition. Elegant in style, and attaining a remarkably high spiritual level, this work criticizes above all the idolatry* of the pagans and the formal ritualism of the Jews (§2–4). It then refers to the supernatural* life of Christians (§5–6). The work is sometimes placed among those of the Christian apologists of the second century.

The Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, is a collection of moral doctrines and church rules and is probably from Syria. The date of composition is unknown. After having developed the doctrine of the two ways (§1–6), the text explains the liturgical procedure of baptism* (§7) and of the Eucharist* (§9–10). It also tackles disciplinary problems associated with the place of prophets* and apostles (§11 and 13). In all these areas, the Didache seems to represent a particular or archaic stage in the organization of the cult and communities.

- K. Bihlmeyer, W. Schneemelcher (1970), Die Apostolischen Väter, 3rd Ed., Tübingen. SC 10, 33, 53, 167, 172, 248 bis.
- ♦ R. Brändle (1975), Die Ethik der Schrift an Diognet, Zurich.
- B. Dehandschutter (1979), Martyrium Polycarpi, Louvain.
- J. Kürzinger (1983), Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments, Regensburg.
- W.R. Schoedel (1985), Ignatius of Antioch, Philadelphia.
- K. Niederwimmer (1989), Der Didache, Göttingen.
- N. Brox (1992), Der Hirt der Hermas, Göttingen.
- P. Henne (1992), La christologie chez Clément d'Alexandrie et dans le Pasteur d'Herma, Par. 33, Fribourg.
- J.-C. Paget (1994), The Epistle of Barnabas, Tübingen.

PHILIPPE HENNE

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Judeo-Christianity; Millenarianism

Apostolic Succession

a) Definition. Apostolic succession refers to the continuity of the church* in its character as apostolic, the permanence of the ministry from generation to generation, and the teachings of the Apostles. Apostolic succession applies above all to the church as whole, since it is the church that is apostolic.

The phrase apostolic succession is often used more narrowly to refer to a succession of bishops* (episcopal succession) or of priests or presbyters (presbyteral succession) reaching straight back to the apostles. Such a succession can be “local” (successio localis), and consist of all the persons holding the same office (e.g., the line of bishops of Rome* or Alexandria, reaching back to the first bishop, ordained by an apostle) or “personal” (successio personalis); in this case it refers to a sequence of persons, each having ordained the next, reaching back to the first ordained by an apostle. While apostolic succession is often reduced to a “personal succession” of bishops, recent ecumenical discussions have emphasized the importance of a more comprehensive understanding of apostolic succession.

b) Biblical Background. Elements of the concept of apostolic succession can be found in the New Testament, although it is not explicitly developed. Paul already speaks of a tradition* that he has received and must transmit intact, for example, in relation to the Resurrection* (1 Cor 15:3) or the Eucharist* (1 Cor 11:23). In later texts, greater emphasis is placed on “the faith that was once for all delivered to the saints” (Jude 3). The recipients of the pastoral epistles are particularly admonished to hand on the tradition faithfully (1 Tm 6:20; 2 Tm 1:14 and 2:2; Ti 1:9). Second, Jesus* is depicted, both before the Resurrection (Lk 10:1) and after it (Mt 28:18–20), as sending out the apostles on a mission* in which they will exercise an authority derived from his (Lk 10:16; Jn 20:21–23). The post-Resurrection sending is to continue through history (Mt 28:19). Lastly, while the meaning of the word apostle varies in the New Testament, the apostles are referred to many times as the foundation of the Church (Eph 2:20; Rev 21:15). In Titus 1:5 the idea appears of a transfer of authority from Paul to the next generation.

c) Patristic Era. In the second century, the concept of apostolic succession was used to fight against Gnostic heresies. Already, Ignatius had stressed the key role of the bishop in the local church (Letter to the Magnesians 6) without, however, any notion of succession, and Clement of Rome had introduced the idea of a succession from Christ* to the apostles, then to the successors of the apostles and so on (1 Clem. 42). Irenaeus* then developed apostolic succession as an aspect of the apostolic tradition that distinguishes the true churches from their Gnostic competitors. Christ did not keep anything from his apostles, his closest disciples, and taught them the whole truth*, which the apostles in turn transmitted “above all to those to whom they confided the churches themselves,” that is, to the first bishops (Adv. Haer. III. 3.1). For the most important churches, most notably that of Rome, the line of bishops can be traced back to the apostles, “by which line and succession the Tradition of the church, beginning with the apostles, and the preaching of the truth, have come down to us” (ibid., III. 3.3). While Irenaeus does say of “the presbyters” that “with the succession in the episcopacy, they have received the certain charisma of truth” (ibid., IV. 26.2), his emphasis is on a successio localis as the sign of a continuity of apostolic tradition within a specific church, and thus as a criterion for identifying this tradition. Tertullian (De Praescriptione haereticorum; Adversus Marcionem) has a similar understanding of apostolic succession for the same anti-Gnostic reasons.

In Cyprian*, the succession of the entire episcopate from its single source in the apostles, and especially Peter*, is decisive both for the unity* of the entire church (De unitate Ecclesiae 5) and for the authority of each bishop over his church (Ep. 68). Nevertheless, apostolic succession still belongs to the church rather than to individuals. A bishop who, through heresy* or schism*, has left the unity of the church has also left the apostolic succession. The foundation for a more individually focused conception of apostolic succession was laid during the fourth and fifth centuries by an increased willingness to recognize the validity* of sacraments* and ordinations* performed outside the communion* of the church. If such ordinations were valid, they were then ordinations in apostolic succession, and bishops in heresy or schism simply were not outside this succession. It follows that apostolic succession must be less a characteristic of the church, focused in its leaders, and more a characteristic of persons ordained in a successio personalis, which these persons continue to possess even in heresy or schism. Augustine* laid the basis for this change, although his own explicit discussions of apostolic succession still generally follow the earlier lines.

Apostolic succession was self-evident and was not extensively debated during the Middle Ages. However, the development within Scholasticism* of a theology of orders, with its concepts of a power (potestas) and an indelible nature (character indelibilis) granted in ordination, strengthened the more individualistic understanding of apostolic succession. The absence of debate led to remaining imprecision. While it was agreed that apostolic succession was transmitted through the bishops, most Scholastic theologians held that no sacramental difference existed between bishops and priests. The grounds for denying a valid presbyteral succession were thus not clear.

d) Reformation and Post-Reformation Disputes. The various branches of the Reformation (Lutheran, Calvinist, and Anglican) rejected the contention that apostolic succession, in the sense of an episcopal successio personalis, was essential for a valid or effective ministry* of Word and sacrament. Luther's rejection of the ideas of a potestas or character indelibilis passed on in ordination undercut apostolic succession as it had come to be understood in medieval theology. True apostolic succession lay in holding to the apostolic gospel (WA 39 II, 176). While Melancthon was more favorable to episcopal order, he nonetheless thought that episcopal apostolic succession was not essential to the church (CR 23, 595–642). The Lutheran states, however, consistently maintained that they were willing to submit to the Catholic bishops, and thus accept an episcopal apostolic succession, if the bishops would permit the preaching of the gospel and certain Lutheran reforms (BSLK 296, 14 ff.). An episcopal successio personalis remained in the Swedish and Finnish Lutheran churches.

The Calvinist tradition likewise held that an episcopal apostolic succession is not essential to the church. In placing greater emphasis on the equality of all ordained ministers (e.g., in the Second Helvetic Confession, chap. 18), however, Reformed churches have usually been less open to traditional episcopal order than the Lutheran churches, and thus more opposed to apostolic succession as traditionally understood.

Episcopal apostolic succession was preserved in the Church of England during the Reformation and defended theologically against those who preferred a presbyterian polity. All Anglican churches have an episcopal order in a successio personalis. Most Anglican theologians and authorities have not held that churches that lose an episcopal apostolic succession are no longer true churches. Nevertheless, this question does not lead to unanimity, especially since the Oxford movement. The Anglican Church has always had the ecumenical policy (Lambeth Quadrilateral 1888) of rejecting full communion with churches not willing at least to reenter episcopal apostolic succession.

The Council of Trent* said little explicitly about apostolic succession, but implicitly reasserted the Scholastic doctrine. The Decree on the Sacrament of Order states that “the bishops who have succeeded the apostles belong in a special way to the hierarchical order” (ad hunc hierarchicum ordinem praecipue pertinere, XXIII, 4). Vatican* II is more explicit: “the bishops, by virtue of divine institution, are the successors of the apostles as pastors of the Church, in such a way that those who hear them hear Christ, while those who reject them reject Christ and him who has sent Christ” (LG 20). While apostolic succession is realized through an ordination in a successio personalis that transmits a spiritual gift (LG 21), emphasis falls on the collective succession of the entire body of bishops, as successors of the apostles in their office of teaching, sanctifying, and governing. The apostolic succession links the Catholic Church to the Orthodox churches (UR 15), while what is lacking in the sacrament of orders in the Protestant churches, presumably due to the absence of an episcopal apostolic succession, means that they lack “all the reality belonging to the eucharistic Mystery” (UR 22).

The Orthodox churches have not shared the debate over apostolic succession. They maintain that episcopal apostolic succession is an essential aspect of the church, but often criticize Western theology for conceptually separating continuity in ministry from the total continuity of the church (Zizioulas).

e) Ecumenical Issues. Apostolic succession has been one of the most difficult ecumenical topics. Disagreements over apostolic succession have become one factor blocking a mutual recognition of ministries between Catholic, Orthodox, and Anglican churches, on the one hand, and between the various Protestant churches, on the other. Recent discussions have given hope for a resolution of the differences.

The text Baptism, Eucharist, Ministry, issued by the World Council of Churches in 1982, finds the “primary manifestation of apostolic succession . . . in the apostolic tradition of the whole church” (M §35). “The succession of the bishops became one of the modes . . . by which the apostolic tradition of the church was expressed” (M §36). Appealing to the reality of the episkope, the oversight over ministry, in all churches, the text then seeks to understand episcopal apostolic succession as “a sign, rather than a guarantee, of the continuity and unity of the church” (M §38).

The concept of “sign” is further elaborated in the Anglican-Lutheran dialogue (Niagara Report 1988). The apostolic continuity of the church is maintained by the faithfulness of God*, despite human failings (28), through various means: the Bible*, the creed, and the continuity of the ordained ministry* (29). Since apostolic continuity is a feature of the entire church, the presence or absence of any single criterion (e.g., an episcopal successio personalis) is not sufficient to judge whether a church stands in the true apostolic succession. A more comprehensive judgment must be made, taking various factors into account (20). On this basis, Anglican churches might be made to see Lutheran churches that lack such an episcopal successio personalis as within apostolic succession, and the Lutheran churches that stand outside such a successio personalis might be able to see it as a useful sign of succession in the apostolic gospel. These arguments paved the way for the Porvoo Agreement (1994), which reconciles ministries among the Anglican churches, and the Nordic and Baltic Lutheran churches.

- Y. Congar (1966), “Composantes et idée de la succession apostolique,” Oecumenica 1, 61–80.
- E. Schlink (1961), “Die apostolische Sukzession,” Der kommende Christus und die kirchlichen Traditionen, Göttingen.
- G. Blum (1978), “Apostel/Apostolat/Apostolizität, II Alte Kirche,” TRE 3, 445–66.
- J. Zizioulas (1981), L'être ecclésial, Geneva.
- Baptême, Euchariste, Ministère* (1982), Paris.
- Rapport de Niagara* (1988) in Accords et Dialogues Oecuméniques, Ed. A. Birmelé, J. Terme, Paris.

MICHAEL ROOT

See also Authority; Bishop; Irenaeus of Lyons; Ministry

Apostolicity of the Church. See Apostle; Apostolic Succession

Appropriation

The term appropriation is used in Christology and Trinitarian theology.

a) In Christology, appropriations are an aspect of the communication of idioms* and correspond to communications proper. In the first case, the divine Person* of the Word* appropriates the realities of the human condition and the events experienced by Christ* (his birth, his kenosis*, his cross, etc.). In the second case, the divine Person of the Word communicates to humanity what is distinctive of divinity.

b) In Trinitarian theology, appropriations are a language* phenomenon that constitutes a third term between the essential attributes* or activities that are proper to the divine nature as such and the personal characteristics of the Father*, the Son, and the Holy* Spirit. To appropriate is to make a common noun serve as a proper noun. Trinitarian appropriation consists in applying an essential attribute to a person, as if it were his own, so as to “manifest” him. The language of the Scriptures* and tradition* appropriates to a particular person an attribute or an activity that is common to all the Trinity. Paul thus calls Christ the “power of God and the wisdom of God” (1 Cor 1:24). The Father is called “the Almighty” (Rev 1:8, chaps. 4, 8, etc.). Appropriation is commonly found in the liturgy. Thomas* Aquinas comments on four expressions of traditional appropriation. First there is that of Hilary* of Poitiers: “Eternity* is in the Father, beauty in the Image, joy in the gift that is offered to us [Holy Spirit].” Then there are those of Augustine*: “Unity is in the Father, equality in the Son, harmony between unity and equality in the Holy Spirit”; “The Father is power, the Son is wisdom, the Holy Spirit is goodness”; “‘From him’ it is said of the Father; ‘through him,’ of the Son; ‘in him’ of the Holy Ghost” (ST Ia, q. 39, a. 7–8). Similarly, the Trinity’s indwelling of the justified man is appropriated to the Holy Spirit. The basis of appropriation is the resemblance or the affinity of the considered attribute with the suitability of each person, an affinity that has its roots in the knowledge* that we can have of God, and therefore of his essential attributes, starting with the creatures. Appropriations involve conveniences and do not give way to any proofs. Their danger is that, on one hand, they continue to create confusion between properties and essential attributes, and on the other hand that, lacking referents, they represent nothing more than a language game. Nevertheless, they are not without value for a spiritual understanding of the Trinity.

- M.J. Scheeben (1865), Die Mysterien des Christentums (3rd Ed. 1958), Freiburg, §23–31.
- A. Chollet (1903), “Appropriation aux personnes de la Trinité,” DThC 1, 1708–17.
- J. Rabeneck (1949), Das Geheimnis des dreipersonalen Gottes, Freiburg.
- J. Auer (1978), Gott der Eine und Dreieine, KKD 2, 305–11.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1985), Theologik II, Einsiedeln, 117–38.
- E. Salmann (1986), Neuzeit und Offenbarung, Rome, 307–12.

BERNARD SESBOÜÉ

See also Father; Idioms; Trinity

Architecture

The earliest Christians had no special buildings devoted to the cult*; they worshipped in synagogues and the Temple*, and their distinctively Christian agape (love feast) meals were held in private houses. Christian worship does not require a particular kind of building, but from early times the church* has encouraged the provision of special places, to enhance solemnity and to use the building itself as a teaching resource.

I. Early Church

Already by the end of the first century, Christian communities had grown too large to meet in private houses and required a large hall with one altar, at which the bishop* presided. By the mid-second century, the eucharistic assembly had been separated from the agape meal and had been stylized into liturgy*. We know that there were buildings referred to by special names, including ecclesia (assembly) and domus dei (House of God*), but there is little direct evidence of what these were like, except that they tended to have ancillary rooms for cultic purposes, the major of which was the baptistery. The church at Dura Europos, converted from a private house in about 240–41, had been set aside to serve the needs of the congregation by being carefully decorated with images illustrating the meaning of the rites taking place within it. Archeological evidence in Rome suggests that the second-century dwelling on the side of the basilica of San Clemente had undergone such a process of adaptation in the third century, as had some of the other titular basilicas. By the beginning of the fourth century, larger hall churches were being built in other parts of the empire (Parentium, Qirkbize in Syria). It is not known whether there was any characteristic Christian architectural style before the fourth century. Pagan temples were unsuitable models because they were not designed to house large groups of worshippers. Christian churches, like synagogues, were built for large gatherings of the faithful. After 312, when the emperor Constantine converted to Christianity, the basilica form was most frequently adopted for churches. Basilicas were large, generally aisled halls used for a variety of secular and religious purposes. They were well lit by rows of windows in the side walls and above the internal arcades: some had a rounded apse protruding from the center of a long side or from one end. Basilica churches had the apse with an altar at one end and many were provided with an atrium at the other, entrance end. Some of the latter contained fountains, symbolizing the source of life, which could be used for ablutions before entering the church. By the fourth century, most churches were oriented with the entrance at the western end and the altar in the eastern end. In this way, at the morning service the congregation faced the rising sun, symbol of the Parousia* of Christ*, the Sun of Justice*.

During Constantine's lifetime were built not only the church of the bishop of Rome, on the supposed site of Peter*'s grave, but also the basilica of the Lateran, the first official church building of Christianity, begun c. 313, as well as several memorial chapels in cemeteries. In Rome, most of these churches featured an ambulatory—that is, a gallery linking the aisles and allowing to go around the altar (Santa Agnese, mid-fourth century)—but many others had centralized structures, modeled on pagan mausoleums. In Jerusalem*, the Anastasis (“Resurrection*”) Rotunda was built over the Holy Sepulcher, and in Bethlehem an octagonal chapel was erected over the Nativity grotto. The palace-church of Antioch (327–41) was also octagonal. Under Justinian the domed, centralized church of Saint Sophia in Constantinople was built. In Rome in the fourth century, the popes* founded the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore and the church of San Stefano Rotondo, whose plan is a cross inscribed in a circle. In the late fourth and early fifth centuries, pilgrimage* churches began to be built with (or existing ones supplemented with) galleries to provide extra accommodation, especially for women or for catechumens (the basilica of Trier, as rebuilt by Gratian c. 380). Saint Peter's in Rome had a choir enclosure: such enclosures became a standard way of providing space for the clergy (Saint Thecla, Milan, mid-fourth century). In the following years, this feature spread all over the Mediterranean. Some early basilicas had transepts isolated from the nave, giving a cruciform ground plan. The earliest true cruciform church, in which all four arms are of equal height, may have been the Apostles* church in Constantinople. In a church to which crowds of pilgrims came, Saint Simeon Stylites at Kal'ar Sem'an in Syria, an unroofed octagonal building surrounded the saint's column. The cruciform plan became very popular because it turned the entire building into an embodiment of the cross. In the fifth century were built the first churches with cupolas over central spaces, and also basilica complexes, such as that adjoining the Anastasis.

In some places, for example in Aquilera and Trier, double basilicas (in effect two churches placed side by side) were built. This strange form can be explained in terms of function. In addition to the churches required for regular worship, there arose a need for places in which to commemorate the martyrs. Structures were built over or near their tombs in cemeteries outside the city walls. As the number of pilgrims increased, these churches were added to, and by the fifth century some of them were connected with monastic complexes. The monastic communities were set up to minister to the needs of pilgrims, to ensure that continual prayer* was made over the graves of the martyrs, and also to serve as bases for missionary activity. After the Goth invasions of the fifth century, the bodies of the martyrs had to be moved from the cemeteries outside Rome into the city churches for safety and access. The relics* of the saints were spread among regular churches, and soon every church was required to own some relic. In Jerusalem, Rome, and Constantinople, “stational” liturgy gained importance. The bishop and the people processed from church to church, celebrating the Eucharist* and other services, with the purpose of sanctifying the whole city*. Such public processions were hardly possible before Christianity became the state religion. Processions within church buildings, so ubiquitous throughout the Middle Ages, seem to have developed from these. Various parts of the church, such as the baptismal font or the main doorway, provided stations where the procession paused for prayer, by analogy with the use of different churches as stopping points in outside processions.

II. Medieval Church

The medieval church building was considered a representation of the heavenly Jerusalem, as envisioned in the Apocalypse. From the 10th century, at the latest, the liturgy for the consecration of a church made this quite clear. The form and decoration of the building were designed to inspire the worshippers with a sense of the transcendence and nearness of God. This notion was common to all of Christendom, but the forms in which it was realized differed between the Eastern and Western churches.

1. Byzantium

In the East, the centralized domed church predominated for nearly a millennium. The form was probably inspired by centrally planned early structures such as martyrs' sanctuaries, baptisteries, and memorial buildings (Santa Constanza in Rome, the Anastasis Rotunda in Jerusalem), themselves inspired by the domed Pantheon in Rome. The Byzantine use of the dome, however, rapidly developed into new and exciting forms, straining Roman technology to the limits, particularly during the reign of Justinian. The first masterwork of this period is San Vitale in Ravenna (526–47), with an octagonal central dome surrounded by an aisle and galleries. There were many other early forms; one frequently copied in later, smaller churches was that of Saint John at Ephesus, which had a Greek cross plan with a central dome and domes over each arm. Saint Sophia in Constantinople (532–37, altered 558–63) became the paradigm of the imperial church. It had a huge dome, carried on the first large-scale pendentives (spherical triangular segments of the vault—the first ones to be this scale), which are graceful and carry the weight of the dome efficiently down to the pillars. The dome represents the heavens, covering without enclosing. In the ninth century, after the Iconoclast controversy, a new church plan was developed. More modest in size, it consisted of a barrel-vaulted cross inscribed in a rectangle, with a dome over the center, which later came to be raised on a drum.

All of these churches were decorated with mosaics or paintings, many of which were destroyed during the Iconoclast debate. The Ravenna mosaics are especially noteworthy. With the triumph of the icons from the mid-ninth century on, imagery began to be systematically applied to church interiors. The colonnade separating nave from the sanctuary was hung with icons and developed into the iconostasis, completely kept the Eucharist hidden, except when the center doors were opened.

The mosaics represented the heavenly hierarchy, with Christ in the central dome and a descending progression of the choir of angels*, patriarchs, and apostles, down to the local saints. The building became an earthly heaven in which God was mysteriously present. This style of architecture was preserved and developed in Greece through the Middle Ages. It spread also to Russia and the Balkans. Russia developed clusters of domes raised on tall drums; the domes were eventually transformed into the characteristic onion profile. Later, these forms were translated into wooden structures, thus combining the Byzantine esthetic with native building traditions. In the West, Byzantine influence is found in the churches of Norman Sicily. Saint Mark in Venice follows the pattern of Saint John at Ephesus and (as with the Sicilian churches) is decorated with mosaics.

2. The West

The majority of churches built in the West during the medieval period were inspired by basilicas. Important exceptions are those that copied early central structures, especially the Anastasis Rotunda. During the troubled centuries that followed the breakdown of the western Roman Empire, only small churches could be built. With more settled conditions and the advent of the Romanesque style, churches began to rival the Constantinian churches of Rome. Liturgy and ceremonial became more complex; the ruling that each priest* must say his own mass every day required multiple altars in cathedrals and monasteries where there were many priests. From the sixth century on, churches might possess more than one altar. By the mid-12th century, there were 20 in Saint Denis, Paris. Each altar was dedicated to a particular saint. The dual use of these great churches, for the continual prayer of divine office and mass, and for lay pilgrimage, led to the choir and sanctuary being more completely separated from the nave and ambulatory. Such separations survive in the cathedrals of Lincoln and Paris, both 13th-century. It was during this period that the classic design of monasteries was developed: a rectangular cloister surrounding a garden. Around the cloister were the church, the chapter house, the refectory, and the dormitory, with other domestic structures set with no particular order outside the walls. Freestanding baptisteries survived in many Italian towns; they were used for multiple baptisms* at Easter and Pentecost. In northern Europe, children were baptized individually soon after birth; each parish church had its own font, usually prominently placed inside the main door as a reminder that baptism is the sacrament* of entrance into the Christian community.

a) Romanesque. Romanesque was the major western European style from around 950 to 1150, so called because it was based on the use of the Roman semicircular arch. From 950 to 1050, its formative period, there were many regional styles. Later, Romanesque became an international style because of monasticism, which helped to spread ideas, blueprints, and masons along the great pilgrimage routes, and also those opened by the Crusades. The most common form was an expanded basilica plan, with the addition of bays. There was much experiment with vaulting and structural articulation. Lombard-Catalan architecture of the early 11th century was based on a direct revival of Roman techniques, with heavy tunnel vaults (Saint Martin-du-Canigou, 1001–26; Saint Maria Ripoll, 1020–88). Interiors were dark and unadorned, but exteriors were enriched with delicate blank arcading. The great pilgrimage churches developed ambulatory and radiating chapels around the eastern end, with an exterior effect of compact massing and multiple towers. German early Romanesque used a double-apsed plan and timber ceilings rather than stone vaults. At Gernrode (c. 980) and Saint Michael in Hildesheim, the interiors were articulated by systems of alternating supports forming double bays.

The international high Romanesque style flourished from around 1050 to around 1150. Major French pilgrimage abbeys (Tours, Conques, Limoges, Toulouse), modeled after Santiago de Compostela (c. 1075–1150), turned the basilica plan into a Latin cross with a transept, an ambulatory and chapels, a three-story elevation, and a double barrel vault with transverse ribs. Burgundian churches experimented with different vaulting (e.g., Vezelay, with its groin vaults). The third church at Cluny (1088–1130) seems to anticipate Gothic style with its height, light barrel vaults, buttressed by transverse ribs that carry the weight down on to compound piers, and the stilted pointed arches of the nave arcade. In western France, hall churches developed: Notre-Dame-la-Grande in Poitiers (c. 1130–45) and Saint Savin-sur-Gartempe (c. 1060–1115) have barrel-vaulted naves and aisles at almost equal height. In Aquitaine, under Byzantine influence, aisleless churches were covered in a series of domes on pendentives (cathedrals of Angoulême, c. 1105–25, and Périgueux, c. 1120). In Normandy and England, there were many structural experiments. Eleventh-century churches (e.g., Jumièges, 1040–67, Saint Étienne at Caen, 1066–77) used Germanic double bays and timber roofs. Most English churches also retained timber roofs.

b) Gothic. The Gothic style began in the early to mid-12th century in northern France (Saint Denis ambulatory and chapels, 1140–44); it lasted until the 15th century and, some would say, until the 16th century in France, and the 17th in England and Germany. Characterized by ribbed vaulting, deep buttresses, and tall piers, it made use of the pointed arch, which is more stable than the round arch: the angle and stiling of the arch can easily be varied to allow irregular spaces to be vaulted at uniform heights. There was thus no need for heavy walling, allowing gradual development of larger windows. Most Gothic churches have a strong vertical emphasis. In late 12th-century northern France, there were various experiments to find a satisfying bay design (Laon and Paris, c. 1160), but the rebuilding of Chartres (begun c. 1195) seems to have provided a pattern for classic Gothic: a three-story elevation, arcades, triforium passage, and tall clerestory, four-part vaults supported on buttresses, ambulatory, and radiating chapels. Thirteenth-century cathedrals in France strove for great height: the choir at Beauvais is the highest, at over 156 feet. In England, by contrast, the emphasis was on length, textural and color effects, size of windows, and complexity of vault ribbing (Lincoln, 1190s–1287; Salisbury, 1220–58). Tall spires heightened the impact. Germany and Spain did not adopt Gothic style before the mid-13th century, and then used its French form (Köln, begun 1248; Leon, 1254–1303; Toledo, begun 1227). Italy developed its own form of Gothic, retaining Romanesque techniques, using pointed arches and ribbed vaults to achieve broad, open spaces (Santa Maria Novella in Florence, begun c. 1278).

Later Gothic, from c. 1300 onward, developed decorative effects, openness, and lightness. In England the decorated Gothic style elaborated vault and tracery patterns. This was taken over in France and Germany as the flamboyant Gothic of the late 14th century, just as in England more austere effects were sought by using a perpendicular style. However, lightly decorated effects became popular again in the early 16th century with the use of the fan vault, a uniquely English form. Throughout western Europe, the interior of the late medieval church tended to be subdivided into a multiplicity of private and semiprivate chapels dedicated to various saints, or to praying for the souls* of the dead.

c) Renaissance. In Italy, beginning in the 15th century, the Renaissance style, which again looked back to the architecture of ancient Rome, gained some its impetus from the reconstruction of the early basilicas in Rome under the pontificate of Martin V (1417–31). San Lorenzo and San Spirito in Florence are the earliest examples. Appeal was made to antique precedents and principles, based on a rereading of Vitruvius. San Sebastiano in Mantua stems from designs of Roman baths; the facade includes elements of temples and triumphal arches. Centralized designs with domes were built (Pazzi chapel in San Spirito, San Biagio in Montepulciano, Bramante's "Tempietto" in Rome). Although the new style was certainly known north of the Alps, because of pilgrimages to Rome, it did not really catch on. However, Renaissance details were sometimes added to a Gothic design (Saint Eustache in Paris, the Fugger chapel in Augsburg, the screen and stalls in King's College, Cambridge).

III. Reformation and Counter-Reformation

1. Protestantism

An emphasis on preaching* and Bible* commentary, together with the rejection of the Catholic theology* of the Eucharist, transformed church interiors. Churches were built with galleries and tall pulpits to accommodate large congregations that could see and hear the preacher. Seating was arranged facing the pulpit rather than the Communion table. The Reformers rejected the idea that the building itself was holy, but this was frequently undercut by references to the Jerusalem Temple. The Anglican Church, however, retained the public singing in cathedral and college churches of morning and evening prayer, based respectively on the hours of Lauds and Prime, and on Vespers and Compline. This was reflected in the retention in such churches of medieval choir screens, which allowed nonparticipant visitors access to the nave without disrupting the office taking place in the choir.

In Lutheran Germany, as in England, the chancels of parish churches were used as Communion rooms, the communicants moving there from the nave before the prayer of consecration and gathering around the altar table. Luther* allowed many images and statues to remain; Calvin* and Zwingli* required their total removal. In Germany, castle chapels led the style of Lutheran churches (Torgau, centralized plan with galleries). Reformed churches in the Netherlands and France also often used centralized designs (La Rochelle, 1577–1603; Willemstad, 1597–1607), and these influenced Reformed churches in Germany and, later, in England. Only in the second half of the 17th century did the Renaissance style (baroque or classical) become the norm in Germany (after the Thirty Years' War) and England (after the Restoration). New churches built with this plan provided only a very small chancel for the altar table. Instances of this are the various small churches built to Wren's designs in London after the Great Fire of 1666. These display a wide variety of styles and plans, the most interesting being probably Saint Stephen Wallbrook, a rectangle in which classical columns inscribe what can be seen as either a Latin cross or a Greek cross with narthex, surmounted by a circular coffered dome. Wren's major work, Saint Paul's Cathedral in London, is the result of a compromise between the domed centralized structure that he favored and the Latin cross shape required by the chapter. Wren's work was influential throughout the 18th century in England, and also in North America, especially through the works of his pupil Gibbs (Saint Martin-in-the-Fields, 1722–26).

2. Catholicism

The Council of Trent* encouraged using fine arts. In 1576–77 Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, issued instructions for church building, referring to early Christianity. There were no stained-glass windows, since light is a symbol in itself; clear glass windows also allowed a better view of the works of art inside the church. Centralized designs were considered heathen, but this had little effect in practice. Chapels were needed along the sides of the church to provide for the cult of saints and the priests' private masses. The pulpit had to be seen in conjunction with the altar, symbolizing the unity of word* and sacrament. Robert Bellarmine* also emphasized this unity. His ideal church was divided into three parts—narthex, nave, and choir—after the pattern of Solomon's Temple. He stressed the significance of decoration to attract the faithful.

Baroque and rococo architecture both sought to engage the subjective experience of the beholder, either through the dynamic of the building or through its ornamentation. The epitome of baroque is Bernini's Andrea al Quirinale in Rome, which has a carefully orchestrated movement upward to the heavenly light of the dome. Rococo architecture tends to be simpler, with an emphasis rather on the complexity of its decoration. In France, the architecture of the 17th and 18th centuries was in a sober baroque, under strong Renaissance and Palladian influence (François Mansart's Val-de-Grâce, begun 1645; Jules-Hardouin Mansard's Dôme des Invalides, 1680–91). This "classical" style in turn influenced most of the countries of northern Europe (Prandtauer's Melk Abbey in Austria; Wren in England).

Rococo became most theatrical in Neumann's Vierzehnheiligen in Germany (1743–72). In Spain, the style tended to show an abundance of ornamentation, as in the facade of Santiago de Compostela (1738–49). This style also traveled to the New World, as can be seen in Ocotlán, Mexico (c. 1745).

At the same time, partly under the influence of Wren (Soufflot's Ste. Geneviève, now the Pantheon, 1755–95), France developed a neoclassical style arising from the arts of antiquity, especially those of Greece.

IV. 19th Century

At the beginning of the 19th century, church architecture in the West was still largely classical. Pierre Vignon's La Madeleine in Paris (1806–42) is still of Greco-Roman inspiration. However, interest in the medieval past had already begun in the previous century with romanticism, and an ever more serious study of medieval building techniques led to the revival of the Gothic style. Scholarly research and restoration were combined in the work of Viollet-le-Duc in France and George Gilbert Scott in England. Their restorations were controversial, and often overdone, but they did save a number of churches from destruction. England was the heart of the Gothic revival style, with the work of the Cambridge Camden (later Ecclesiological) Society and of the Pugins, father and son. It became the most widely used style in England, and spread to other English-speaking countries. The Catholic Cathedral of Saint Patrick's in Melbourne, Australia, begun in 1858, was designed in 13th-century style by Wardell, a pupil of the younger Pugin. The change in architecture became the physical expression of a renewed interest in medieval liturgy and ceremonial. In Anglican churches, the altar, now set against the east wall of an elongated chancel, became again the major feature of the church. Pews in medieval style faced east. The art of stained glass was revived to fill the windows with biblical scenes and figures of saints. Processions were also held once again by Protestants.

V. Contemporary Period

The liturgical movement and Vatican* II have changed the understanding of the liturgy, which is reflected in the design of churches. In many Protestant churches, the Eucharist has become more central and more often celebrated. In most major Protestant denominations, the font, pulpit, and altar are brought into visual relation with each other, to display the connection between word and sacraments. This has lessened the emphasis on the pulpit. The font, if not placed near the altar, is often given its own chapel. The rulings of Vatican II transformed the Catholic understanding of the mass. No longer is the priest leading the people* toward, and representing them before, God; instead, the laity gather before the altar, or sometimes around the altar, and participate fully in the liturgical action. This has created a tendency toward centralized structures.

Interestingly, in the late 20th century Protestant and Catholic churches have become less easily distinguishable from each other. There has also been an occasional return to the idea of the “house-church” (domus ecclesiae), producing small churches, often indistinguishable from surrounding houses. Many new churches are being designed for a wider range of functions and contain all sorts of ancillary installations.

Finally, together with the new theological approach to the liturgy, the 20th century has also witnessed a revolution in building materials and techniques. The new materials—iron, reinforced concrete, and glass—have been known since the middle of the 19th century: concrete was used by Bardot for Saint Jean-l’Evangéliste in Montmartre (1894–1902), iron by Boileau for Saint Eugène (1854–55) and by Baltard for Saint Augustin (1860–71). However, it was not until the 1920s or 1930s that they were extensively used to create new forms. Auguste Perret’s Notre-Dame-du-Raincy (1922–23) is one of the earliest examples. Its concrete roof rests on columns of reinforced cement, and the altar is raised on a platform. Reinforced concrete permits large spaces without supports, large glass surfaces, and parabolic vaults (Dominicus Böhm’s Saint Engelbert, Köln-Riehl, 1930). More recently, such materials have been used for Gothic churches, with shell vaults (Felix Candela’s Miraculous Virgin of Mexico, 1954; Gudjon Samuelson’s Hallgrim church in Reykjavik, Iceland, begun in 1945).

The crucial question for recent liturgical reforms has been the participatio actiosa (active participation, SC 14) of the whole congregation, instead of the “spectacle” performed by the clergy (and the choir). Nevertheless, the popularity of religious television programs suggests that the spectacular element of the liturgy still fulfills a real need for those who are unable or unwilling to go to church. Moreover, an excessive emphasis on the congregation normally leads to a restriction of the role played by the sense of divine transcendence, or to a forgetting of the dialectic that should be established between communal prayer and individual prayer. Finally, the assembly of the faithful around the altar may give the impression of a closed circle that excludes the seeker and the outsider. The way of the future may be to accept a plurality of liturgical conceptions and architectural solutions.

• I

- H. C. Butler (1929), Early Churches in Syria, Princeton, N.J. (repr. 1969).
- A. Grabar (1946), Martyrium, Paris.
- T. Bayley (1971), The Processions of Sarum and the Western Church, Toronto.
- T. F. Mathews (1971), The Early Churches of Constantinople: Architecture and Liturgy, University Park, Pa.
- C. Heitz (1974), “Architecture et liturgie processionnelle à l’époque préromaine,” Revue de l’art 24, 30–47.
- R. Krautheimer (1975), Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture, 2nd Ed., Harmondsworth.
- P.-M. Gy (1978), “Espace et célébration comme question théologique,” MD 136, 39–46.
- A. Chavasse (1982), “L’organisation stationnale du carême romain, avant le VIIIe s: Une organisation pastorale,” RSR 56, 17–32.
- J. F. Baldovin (1987), The Urban Character of Christian Worship, Rome.
- L. Michael White (1990), Building God’s House in the Roman World, Baltimore.

II

- P. Frankl (1926), Die frühmittelalterliche und romanische Baukunst, Potsdam.
- R. C. de Lasteyrie du Saillant (1929), L’architecture religieuse en France à l’époque romane, 2nd Ed.
- H. Focillon (1938), Art d’Occident, Paris.
- P. Frankl (1960), The Gothic: Literary Sources and Interpretations through Eight Centuries, Princeton.
- K. J. Conant (1966), Carolingian and Romanesque Architecture 800–1200, 2nd Ed., London.
- W. Braunsfels (1972), Monasteries of Western Europe, London.
- C. Mango (1976), Byzantine Architecture, New York.
- J. Bony (1983), French Gothic Architecture of the XIIIth and XIIIth Centuries, Berkeley.

III

- A. W. N. Pugin (1841), The True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture, London; (1843), An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture in England, London.
- E. E. Viollet-le-Duc (1854–68), Dictionnaire raisonné de l’architecture française du XIe au XIVe siècle, Paris.
- C. Eastlake (1872), A History of the Gothic Revival, London.

- K. Clark (1928), The Gothic Revival, London (repr. 1962).
L. Hauteceœur (1943–57), Histoire de l'architecture classique en France, Paris.
N. Lieb (1953), Barockkirchen zwischen Donau und Alpen, Munich.
J. Summerson (1953), Architecture in Britain, 1530–1850, Harmondsworth (repr. 1977).
R. Wittkover (1958), Art and Architecture in Italy, 1600–1750, Harmondsworth (repr. 1977).
E. Hempel (1965), Baroque Art and Architecture in Central Europe, Harmondsworth.
N. Yates (1991), Buildings, Faith and Worship, Oxford (unreliable for the pre-1700 period).

IV

- O. Bartning (1919), Vom neuen Kirchbau, Berlin.
H. R. Hitchcock (1958), Architecture, Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, Harmondsworth (repr. 1968).
P. Hammond (1961), Liturgy and Architecture, New York.
A. Christ-Janer, M. M. Foley (1962), Modern Church Architecture, New York.
G. Mercier (1968), Architecture religieuse contemporaine en France, Tours.

LYNNE BROUGHTON

See also Cult; Images; Liturgy; Music

Arianism

1. History

a) Arius (c. 260–336). Arius, of Libyan origin, was accepted to the diaconate by Bishop* Peter I of Alexandria (300–311) and then to the presbyterate by Achillas, before being put in charge of the parish of Baucalis under Alexander (312–28). He was soon denounced for his ideas on the Son of God*, whom he said was inferior to the Father*. Around 318–20, a local synod* excluded him from the church community. Despite considerable support from eastern bishops, he was also condemned in Antioch in early 325, then in Nicaea* in June 325. Exiled, and then called back from exile, Arius was not able to have himself reintroduced into the ranks of Alexandrian clergy. He died in Constantinople on a Saturday in 336. Two letters, a profession of faith*, a passage from a pamphlet in both verse and prose entitled Thalia, are his only writings that remain (Opitz, Boularand, Sesboüé), especially thanks to the citations offered by Athanasius* of Alexandria (Kannengiesser 1983).

b) Arians. Arius was excommunicated from the Alexandrian synod, around 319, along with five priests*, six deacons*, and two bishops, Theonas of Marmarica and Secundus of Ptolemais. At the Antioch synod, from the beginning of 325, three bishops were sentenced, including the famous Eusebius of Caesarea; however, these bishops sympathized less with the personal ideas of Arius than they disapproved of the blatant authoritarianism of their Alexandrian colleague. At the Council* of Nicaea, Theonas and Secundus were excommunicated again at the same time as Arius. Eusebius of Nicomedia, Arius's main champion, was exiled soon after the Council ended; but this was only for a lapse of time and because he pursued friendship with the condemned bishops, not because of heresy*. Moreover, he very quickly persuaded Constantine to initiate appeasement politics in the face of Nicene intransigence. He formed a coalition of eastern bishops, concerned with showing to the imperial court that religious peace* was more successfully maintained in the provinces without the Nicene protagonists. Eustathius of Antioch, Marcellus of Ancyra, and especially Athanasius of Alexandria, Alexander's successor, were sent into exile. After Constantine's death in 337, Athanasius became an unavoidable obstacle in the way of the political strategy of the Episcopal coalition, hostile to the Alexandrian reign. Because this strategy included revision, if not abolition, dogmatic decisions from Nicaea, all the while envisaging ecclesiastical hegemony supported by the imperial court, there is nothing surprising about the fact that Athanasius denounced his adversaries as "Arians," a polemical title having no precise doctrinal connotations.

One can get an idea of these more or less nominal "Arians" by studying their synods, which flourished everywhere after Nicaea until the Second Ecumenical Council, Constantinople* I, in 381 (Duchesne, Brennecke). Diverging doctrines soon complicated the advancements of the coalition. The "Homoeans," who supported the idea of only one Son "similar (homoios) in every way" to the Father, therefore, non "consub-stantial*,” seemed to dominate in Sirmium in 359. The “Anomoeans,” who were strict “neo-Arians” like Aetius the Syrian, or the Cappadocian Eunomius, for whom the Son bore “no resemblance (anhomoios) in accordance with the essence,” had their hour of glory around 360. They were quickly replaced by the “Homoousians,” or “Semi-Arians,” grouped around Basil of Ancyra. Their definition of the Son was “similar (homoios) in terms of substance (kat’ousian).” These moderates disapproved of the excessive ways of the more or less fanatic factions, always ready to seize a political opportunity in order to take power in churches*; they sought to get along with the Niceneans, the undisputed chief of whom was Athanasius, remaining all the while reserved on the subject of consubstantiality. From the depths of the Egyptian desert where he was then hiding, Athanasius agreed to this union. The synod of union and reconciliation that he was able to organize in Alexandria in 362 facilitated the final victory of the Nicene “consubstantial,” which was gained with the advent of Theodosius in 380.

The spread of Arianism in the west marked the Visigothic and Vandalic invasions. Indeed, it was Eusebius of Nicomedia, then reigning in Constantinople, who, around 341, consecrated Ulfilas as bishop of the Goths. His mission was to evangelize the Gothic people, who had recently settled in Roman territory.

c) The Imperial Court. Arianism in the fourth century would never have represented such a long and complex crisis without imperial interference. As Pontifex Maximus responsible for religion throughout the empire, Constantine favored the Christian bishops; in return, he expected them to actively contribute to the moral well-being of, and social peace among, his subjects. The Arian controversy, persisting after Nicaea, caused this plan to fail. Constantine died in 337, baptized on his deathbed by Eusebius of Nicomedia. His youngest son, Constantius II, was his successor, less than 30 years old and entirely unaware of Nicene issues. He was convinced that his most urgent task was to eliminate Athanasius of Alexandria, the declared enemy of the politics of compromise and appeasement, which was advocated by the episcopal coalition. The duel between these two men that resulted was unique in all of the empire’s history. Constantius died in 361, and after the intermediary court ruled by Julian, Athanasius had only to endure Valens, the Arian emperor (364–78), to drain Arianism to the last drop, which had become reason of state.

2. Arian Doctrine and Its Refutation

Arius’s personal doctrine was more orthodox than Origen’s teaching on the hierarchical functions of the Father, and the Holy* Spirit in terms of salvation. He transposed this hierarchy into the divine hypostases themselves: only the Father is God, strictly speaking; the Son, along with everything that exists, is created into being* through the will of the Father; like the Holy Spirit, he is not called God only as metaphor. Arius, as theologian, focused on the origin of the Son, with philosophical rigor reminiscent of Plotinus; this origin was to be considered without any anthropomorphism, like the kind he saw irreparably connected to homoousios (Williams). Arius’s strict rationalism* was not shared by his Episcopal champions, who continued to oppose the “consubstantial” concept in the name of their own form of traditional Origenism. Around 355, a neo-Arian movement was launched in Alexandria by Aetius, who was then deacon. Eunomius, Aetius’s secretary and disciple, soon overshadowed his teacher. Their “Anomoean” doctrine, which rejected all resemblance between the substance of the Father and that of the Son, strove to have “Inengendered” the proper name* of divinity and emphasized the radical transcendence of the Father, of whom even the Son’s knowledge was imperfect.

Athanasius of Alexandria, still at the heart of Origen tradition, developed the notion of divine “generation,” which was already favored by his predecessor, Alexander. By removing cosmological connotations that still existed in Origen’s work, he showed that one could assert the communication of substance of the Father to the Son without broaching Sabellius’s modalism*. He adopted this thesis from the point of view of the concrete realization of salvation* in the Church. His doctrine of saving “divinization” through the incarnate Word* formed his retort to Arian Christology*. According to Arius, the Word, incarnated into the body without soul*, replaced it: when Jesus* is hungry or thirsty, when he suffers or is unaware, is in anguish and dies, it is the inferiority of the divine Word that is revealed. This heroic savior needs to save himself in order to arrive at the full dignity of God. In response, Athanasius explained that the divine Word could not be affected by the inferiority of its incarnated condition; in his flesh, Christ accepted the Passion* and the cross so that we could rise with him in a transfigured human condition. The Platonist realism of this Athanasiusian conception of salvation would be borrowed by Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory of Nyssa, and Cyril of Alexandria. It offered an adequate response to Arianism within a framework of Christian Platonism* in the Alexandrian tradition.

- H.-G. Opitz (Ed.) (1934), Athanasius-Werke III, 1/2: Urkunden zur Geschichte des arianischen Streites, Berlin; (1935), Athanasius-Werke II, 1/2, 231–78.
- Athanasius of Alexandria, De synodis, PG 26, 682–794.
- ♦ L. Duchesne (1911), Histoire ancienne de l’Église II, 5th Ed., Paris.
- E. Schwartz (1959), Gesammelte Schriften III, Berlin.

- E. Bouларанд (1972), L'hérésie d'Arius et la "foi" de Nicée, Paris.
- M. Simonetti (1975), La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome.
- A. Ritter (1978), "Arianismus," TRE 3, 692–712 (bibl.).
- T. A. Kopecek (1979), A History of Neo-Arianism, Cambridge, Mass.
- C. Kannengiesser (1983), Athanase d'Alexandrie évêque et écrivain: Une lecture des traités Contre les ariens, Paris.
- R.D. Williams (1987), Arius, Heresy and Tradition, London.
- H.C. Brennecke (1988), Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer, Tübingen.
- R.P.C. Hanson (1988), The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, Edinburgh.
- C. Kannengiesser (1991), Arius and Athanasius: Two Alexan-

- drian Theologians*, Aldershot.
- T.D. Barnes (1993), Athanasius and Constantius: Theology and Politics in the Constantinian Empire, Cambridge, Mass.
- B. Sesboüé, B. Meunier (1993), Dieu peut-il avoir un Fils? Le débat trinitaire du IVe siècle, Paris.
- M. Vinzent (1993), Asterius von Kappadokien: Die theologischen Fragmente, Leyden.
- P. Maraval (1997), "Le débat sur les rapports du Père et du Fils: La crise arienne," Le Christianisme de Constantin à la conquête arabe, Paris, 313–48.

CHARLES KANNENGIESSER

See also Consubstantial; Nicaea I, Council of; Trinity

Aristotelianism, Christian

The encounter between Aristotle and the Aristotelianism of the disciples and commentators with Christian thought began with ignorance, and then turned to hostility. Some concepts deriving from Aristotelianism would subsequently be introduced into theological syntheses, but still at the cost of radical corrections.

a) A Threat to the Fathers. Initially Aristotelianism was coolly received. During the period when Christianity was coming into being, Aristotelianism was not dominant. Popular philosophy* was Epicurean or Stoic. Moreover, the central themes of Aristotelianism seemed hardly compatible with Christian dogma*. For example, was the eternity of the world, defended in De Caelo (II), compatible with the Creation* story in Genesis? And the idea of a God* who knew nothing of the world*, being its final cause but not its efficient cause (Metaphysica Λ,7 and 9), was inadmissible in a Christian context. Platonism*, on the other hand, seemed at first sight to be more acceptable. The figure of the Demiurge, in Timaeus, could be interpreted as a foreshadowing of the Creator in Genesis, while the idea of the immortal soul* was easier to extract from Pheidon. Even so, Plato, like Aristotle, was not accepted by the Fathers* without radical adaptation (Ivánka 1964).

For the first Fathers, Aristotle was above all the one who dared to limit divine Providence* to the world above the lunar sphere, thus denying the possibility of divine intervention in the sublunary (Festugière 1932).

The situation did not improve while the Trinitarian and christological dogmas sought rigorously to be expressed. They did so against thinkers who, like Lucian of Antioch, Arius's teacher, used Aristotelian logic in favor of heterodox solutions. Aristotle was therefore the "father of heresy*" (Clement of Alexandria, Protreptic V, 66, 4) and Basilides, the Gnostic, was Aristotle's disciple (Hippolytus, Refutation I, 20). From here came a certain recurring disingenuousness in the Fathers, who claimed to not understand Aristotelian language, but—in an allusion to Peter* the apostle*'s first trade—to be expressing themselves as fishermen (halieutikôs, ouk aristotelikôs) (Gr. Naz., Or. 23, 12; PG 35, 1164 c; Ambr., De inc. IX, 89; PL 16, 876). Nevertheless, even they would use the conceptual tool of philosophy, but only borrowing such as was needed to express a message that had come from elsewhere. Because of this there arose an eclecticism in which the Aristotelian sense of concepts was never exclusive, but always counterbalanced by their meaning in other systems—such as in the Stoic one. This is the case, for example, with the concept of substance (ousia). What the divine hypostases share is the same "substance," but the sense of this term is larger, less technical, than it is in Aristotle (Stead 1977).

Aristotle was directly attacked by the Pseudo-Justin, probably Diodorus of Tarsus († before 394), "Refutation of Certain Aristotelian Theses" (J. C. T. Otto, Corpus apologetarum christianorum saeculi secundi, Jena, 1849, vol. IV, 88–207 and PG 6, 1491 a 1564 c). After a short preface, in which the prophets* agreement about the Creation is contrasted with the contradictions of philosophers, the author cites and refutes, to various extent, 65 passages of Physica (from I, 7 to V, 1, then VIII, 1 and 6–8) and the first three books of De caelo.

At the beginning of the sixth century, the Alexandrian Johannes Philoponos (Böhm 1967; Sorabji 1987) launched a systematic attack against Aristotelian physics, but using the very weapons of Aristotelianism. He asserts the creation of the world in time* in two books. One of the books is directed against Proclus (De aeternitate mundi contra Proclum, ed. Rabe, Leipzig, 1899), while the other, of which only fragments remain, is directed against Aristotle himself, and is cited especially by Simplicius (Against Aristotle on the Eternity of the World, trans. C. Widberg, Ithaca and London, 1987). He denies that there is a difference between the fifth celestial element—quintessence or ether—and earthly fire. He acknowledges the existence of emptiness. He explains the movement of projectiles by an impetus (rhopè) which is internal to these projectiles. As a result of his doctrinal heterodoxy (he was a Monophysite and would be accused of tritheism), Simplicius's work was given only a modest reception in orthodox circles. It had more impact in the Christian Syriac East, where Simplicius was one of the “black-sheep” of the falāsifa, who were strict Aristotelians. He could be seen as the father of modern physics: his concept of impetus would be a distant foreshadowing of inertia.

b) A Tamed Aristotle. Neither the association of Aristotelianism with heresy, nor its refutations, would stop Leo of Byzantium and especially John Damascene from adopting it. Certain doctrines would still have to be made more acceptable through their refraction among commentators who were pagans. Themistios, for example, introduced the idea according to which God, in knowing himself, knows all things (Pines 1987; Brague 1991). Similarly, he extended to the individual soul the immortality that Aristotle had allowed only as impersonal identification with the agent intellect. At the same time, the Aristotelian corpus was expanded with apocrypha stemming from Neoplatonism. Among these apocryphal writings we find Aristotle's Theology, Plotinus's cento, very influential in Islam, or the Book of Causes, cento of Proclus's Elements of Theology, especially popular in Europe. In its final stages, antiquity made Aristotelianism the logical and physical foundation of a Neoplatonic metaphysics. The Greek Orient also pursued this path, and until the end of the Byzantine Empire the works of Aristotle were studied and commented upon (Benakis 1987).

The Syriac Orient applied itself intensely to translating and commenting on Aristotle's logical writings. The Categories was translated three times. Ninth-century translations of Aristotle into Arabic were simply a continuation of this effort.

For a long time, Latin Christendom only studied Aristotle in the form of the Dialectica and the Decem categoriae, both attributed to Augustine*, or else through the work of Martianus Capella (McKeon 1939), or in what Boethius* (†524) had translated, that is, the logica vetus: the Categories and Of Interpretation, introduced in Porphyry's Isagog. Theology* would lean on this logic that was still incomplete, but was never bound to it. For example, the eucharistic dogma of the real presence of the risen body of Christ* in the consecrated bread and wine would, following Paschasius Radbertus (†865), be expressed in terms of substance, until the idea of transubstantiation was conceived around 1140 and subsequently promulgated by Lateran* IV in 1215. But that of substance/species, a pairing unknown to him, superseded the substance/accidents pairing, classic in Aristotelianism. Indeed, it was devised in order to express a theory—species endure while substance changes—that, expressed in terms of the first opposition, would have seemed absurd to Aristotle.

In the 12th century the Toledo translators introduced a more complete Aristotle from the Arab world into Christendom, as well as commentaries by Averroes. The physics and epistemology that were thus discovered, together with the ideal of philosophical beatitude* developed by the Arabs, constituted a threat to Christian faith* and life. The theological authorities* began with a few preventive measures in the form of numerous bans on or restrictions of teaching (1210, 1215, 1231, 1263). Then they chose the riskier path of seeking to reexpress the whole dogma. Thomas* Aquinas (1225–74) played a central role in this. Basing himself on the Latin translation of William of Moerbeke, completed directly from the Greek, Aquinas commented on Aristotle's principal works (1267–73). Against Averroes, he sought an interpretation of Aristotle's psychology that would safeguard the individual style of knowing each soul*, and therefore its unique destiny (De unitate intellectus, Paris, 1270). He “fore-stalled” the question of the eternity of the world. For Aquinas, the doctrine of creation signifies that the world at every moment depends on divine will, as light depends on the sun. That there was a beginning in time is a matter of faith (De aeternitate mundi, Paris, spring 1271). In a rather general way, Aquinas conceives the world in an Aristotelian manner, the objects that form this world each have a stable and autonomous nature, and God created them to grant them an act of being. The idea of Providence can be found here: God gives each creature what it needs in order to attain the perfection that is proper to it. And the economy of salvation* is replaced, as an adaptation of Providence to man's nature*, led by his liberty* into a fall that only an intervention in history could redeem.

c) A Nuanced Integration. In opposition to the first condemnations, the study of Aristotle became mandatory in theological training. In this sense Christendom was distinct from the Muslim and Jewish worlds in two ways, the coexistence of which may seem paradoxical:

- 1) Never did Christendom consider, like al-Farabi, that after Aristotle there was nothing else to look for, and that it was only matter of teaching (Kitāb al-hurūf, §143, ed. Mahdi); or, like Averroes, that Aristotle was the unsurpassable summit of human possibility, a gift from God who only yielded such a gift to the prophets (Commentary on “De gen. an.” I: Ed. Des Juntas, vol. VI-2, Venice, 1562; “De anima” III, §14, Ed. Crawford; Tahāfut al-tahāfut III, §83, Ed. Bouyges). Rather, it followed Maimonides, who seemed to limit the validity of Aristotelianism to the sublunary domain; what is above—metaphysics—escapes him (Guide II, 22, Ed. Joël, Tr. Munk). Albert* the Great, for example, writes: “He who thinks that Aristotle was a God must think that he never made a mistake. But if one thinks he was a man, then, without a doubt, he could have made mistakes like us” (Physique VIII, Ed. P. Hossfeld, Opera Omnia, IV-2).
- 2) The Muslim and Jewish worlds never introduced the study of all of Aristotle's philosophy into the education of their elite. At most, Islam trained its jurists (fuqahā), cadis, and the like in the use of basic logic inspired in part by Aristotle. The primitive apologetic (kalām) most often rested on a discontinuous vision of the world, with material and temporal atoms, which are not so much borrowed from Aristotle as from his adversaries. As for the Aristotelian falāsifa, it was never able to get out of the private domain to acquire social legitimacy, and even less to enter into dialogue with something like a “theology.”

In Latin Christendom after the 13th century, Aristotelianism would be known above all within the context of Scholasticism. In similar fashion, after the 12th century Islam knew Aristotelianism in the form of Avicenna's synthesis, and Judaism* knew it through Maimonides, with whom Averroes would very soon be associated. In Greek Christendom, two factors were added: 1) The persistence of the Platonic tradition, starting with the Platonic dialogues, which Latin Christendom and Islam only knew in part; it constituted a counterbalance to Aristotelianism, the influence of which was therefore less exclusive; and 2) the Fathers' suspicion of the “logical subtleties” lasted to the end for the Byzantine theologians, who readily left Aristotle to mere philosophers.

Thinkers of the Italian Renaissance attempted to revive a more authentic Aristotle, sometimes borrowing the interpretation, more or less well known, of Alexander of Aphrodisias. This seemed to pose a threat to dogma, especially on the question of the soul's immortality (the Paduans, Pomponazzi). The Reformation began, and with that came Luther*'s systematic attack on Aristotle's role in theology: “It is a mistake to say: without Aristotle one cannot become theologian... On the contrary, one does become a theologian unless one does so against Aristotle... All of Aristotle is to theology what darkness is to light” (Disputatio contra scholasticam theologiam, 1517, §43 Sq, 50, WA, v. 1). Nor did Luther shy away from the lewd in making his attack: philosophy, he says, is “the whore of Aristotle.” This did not stop Melancthon from quickly making Aristotle a supreme authority of philosophy taught in Protestant universities, even to the point that the Disputationes Metaphysicae (1597) of the Jesuit Spaniard Francisco Suarez*, modeled on Aristotle's Metaphysics, became one of the basic books of German academic philosophy (Peterson 1921).

At the end of the 19th century, the Catholic world underwent a Thomist renaissance. In 1879 the encyclical Aeterni Patris of Pope* Leo XIII recommended the study of Saint Thomas. For some this was the occasion to reduce the Thomist theological synthesis—from which one attempts to extract a theory—to what comes from Aristotle, by eliminating Neoplatonic elements from it. Hence was formed an “Aristotelian-Thomist” philosophy, systematized in manuals and taught in seminaries in quasi-official fashion.

- P. Petersen (1921), Geschichte der Aristotelischen Philosophie im protestantischen Deutschland, Leipzig.
- A.-J. Festugière (1932), “Aristote dans la littérature grecque chrétienne jusqu'à Théodoret,” L'idéal religieux des Grecs et l'Évangile, Paris, 221–63.
- R. P. McKeon (1939), “Aristotelianism in Western Christianity,” in J. T. McNeill (Ed.), Environmental Factors in Christian History, Chicago, 206–31.
- J. H. Waszink, W. Heffening (1950), “Aristoteles,” RAC 1, col. 657–67.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato Christianus: Übernahme und Umgestaltung des Platonismus durch die Väter, Einsiedeln.
- W. Böhm (1967), Johannes Philoponos (...), Ausgewählte Schriften (...), Munich, etc.
- C. Stead (1977), Divine Substance, Oxford.

S. Lilla (1983), "Aristotelismo," DPAC 1, col. 349–63.

C.B. Schmitt (1983), Aristotle and the Renaissance, Cambridge, Mass.

L.G. Benakis (1987), "Grundbibliographie zum Aristoteles-Studium in Byzanz," in J. Wiesner (Ed.), Aristoteles Werk und Wirkung: Paul Moraux gewidmet, vol. 2, Berlin, etc., 352–79.

S. Pines (1987), "Some Distinctive Metaphysical Conceptions in Themistius' Commentary on Book Lambda and Their Place in the History of Philosophy," ibid., 177–204.

R. Sorabji (1987) (Ed.), Philoponus and the Rejection of Aristotelian Science, London.

R. Brague (1991), "Le destin de la "pensée de la pensée" des origines au début du Moyen Age," in T. de Koninck, G. Planty-Bonjour (Ed.), La question de Dieu chez Aristote et Hegel, Paris, 153–86.

RÉMI BRAGUE

See also Maximus the Confessor; Naturalism; Platonism, Christian; Stoicism, Christian; Thomas Aquinas; Thomism

Arminianism

Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609), a theologian from Leyden, was led by the study of the Epistle to the Romans to call into question the Calvinist doctrine of predestination*. In Leyden he encountered opposition from his colleague Francis Gomar (1563–1641), who accused him of Pelagianism* and Socinianism, accusations from which Arminius exculpated himself in a public debate in The Hague in 1603. He attempted without success to secure the revision of the two basic confessional documents of Dutch Calvinism*, the Confessio Belgica and the Catechism of Heidelberg. Arminius's doctrines were systematically set out in the "Remonstrance" of 1610: compatibility of divine omnipotence with human freedom*; Jesus died for all, not only for the elect; rejection of predestination, both after the Fall ("infralapsarian" predestination) and before the Fall ("supralapsarian" predestination). Orthodox Calvinist opposition to Arminius was led for a long time by Gomar. In 1618–19, the Synod of Dordrecht condemned Arminianism. The "remonstrants," also accused of collusion with Spain, were at first persecuted, then eventually tolerated. Arminianism exercised considerable influence on High Church Anglicans (notably on Archbishop Laud and the Erastianism* of his associates). It also exercised a decisive influence on John Wesley (Methodism*).

• G.J. Hoenderdaal (1979), "Arminius/Arminianism," TRE 4, 63–69 (bibl.).

A. F. L. Sell (1982), The Great Debate: Calvinism, Arminianism and Salvation, Worthing.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Calvinism; Erastianism

Art. See Architecture; Images; Music

Ascension. See Christ/Christology

Asceticism

I. Definitions

The word asceticism is derived from the Greek askèsis (from the verb askēō), meaning “training” or “exercise,” originally of an athletic nature. Already in Plato, the word had acquired the meaning of moral or philosophical training, or practice. Although the word is not used in the New Testament, it is found very early in the Apostolic* Fathers, in the philosophical sense (to practice patience: Ignatius of Antioch, Polycarp 9, 1), and also applied to martyrdom (Martyrdom of Polycarp). In later Christian writers, both the verb and the noun are used very generally in the sense of training the soul* to practice virtues* and overcome temptation, or to designate one who leads a life of self-denial, especially as a hermit or monk, that is, an “ascetic” (askètēs). Askèsis comes to be used generally to mean “austerity,” or a regime of austerity (as well as retaining the important meaning of “study,” especially of Scripture*), and an askètērion, or place of askèsis, was a monastery. This brief survey of the use of the Greek root-word reveals three things: the link quickly established between asceticism and monasticism*; the philosophical background of the term and concept; and an original link between asceticism and martyrdom.

II. Origins of Christian Asceticism

1. Asceticism and Eschatology: Martyrdom

The link between asceticism and martyrdom lies behind certain distinctive and lasting features of Christian asceticism. The use of the language of asceticism in relation to martyrdom was something inherited by the early Christian Church* from the Jewish experience, especially from 4 Maccabees, a late work of reflection on the experience of the Jewish martyrs under Judas Maccabaeus (†161 B.C.) that had a powerful influence on early Christian reflection on martyrdom, as can be seen in the early Christian accounts of persecutions and in the letters written by Ignatius of Antioch on his way to his own martyrdom. The text of 4 Maccabees uses the language of training and athletic effort in relation to the Jewish martyrs, because it considers these martyrs as soldiers enlisted in a holy war* against the powers of evil*, represented by the idolatrous government of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who sought to stamp out the Jewish religion. Similar ideas are found in the writings of the Qumran community, which also saw itself as a kind of standing army-in-training for the coming final outbreak of warfare between the powers of Good* (the faithful Israelites) and the powers of Evil (the occupying forces of the Romans). This notion of preparation for eschatological warfare, the holy war against the powers of Evil, meant that those in training for it observed the regulations for fighting a holy war, which included abstinence from sexual contact. Such abstinence had huge symbolic significance: it indicated that one was prepared for the end of history* and the coming of the kingdom* of God*, quite apart from any significance it might have as a mark of individual austerity. This has remained the case with Christian monasticism and Christian asceticism in general.

2. Protological Justification of Asceticism

The most important reason for early Christian asceticism was without doubt eschatological. There were, however, two other justifications, either given or implied, in much early Christian practice. Alongside the obvious moral or moralistic justification, which regards austerity as leading to personal self-control, there was another widespread justification that might be regarded as protological: that is, concerned with the restoration of the original state of humankind that has been overthrown by sin and the Fall (original sin*). This attempt to find one’s way back to the beginning, to the original state, was a concern that Christians shared with many of their contemporaries, both pagan and Jewish, and like them they saw the beginning as characterized by unity, distance from that unity being characterized by increasing multiplicity. Marriage* and procreation* could obviously be regarded as participating in multiplicity, and even adding to it; so, too, could alimentation, as prolonging into a cumulative future beings that had already wandered far from their origin. Sexual abstinence and rejection of marriage, together with abstinence from food and drink, could therefore be regarded as an attempt to stem further progress into multiplicity, and to mark the beginning of an attempt to trace one’s way back to the undivided unity of the origin (even though marriage, in itself, could certainly also be regarded as something unitive). Because sexual congress between Adam and Eve is first recorded after their expulsion from paradise (Gn 4:1), it became very generally held that in paradise itself there was no sexual activity, nor had sexual activity ever been intended for man in his unfallen state, despite Genesis 1:28; those who held this view also held that unfallen propagation would not have involved sexuality. Among the Fathers*, only Augustine (perhaps following the shadowy “Ambrosiaster”: Quaestiones 127) seriously and explicitly questioned this, upholding in the works of his maturity (e.g., De Gen. ad litt. 9, 3, 6) that marriage and procreation were part of God’s plan for the original paradisaical life (Irenaeus also perhaps envisaged something like this: see Demonstratio 14). This general acceptance that sexual differentiation and propagation of the species pointed away from the human primordial state provided a fertile intellectual context for the enthusiasm for sexual continence that was an aspect of Christianity.

III. New Testament

The idea of asceticism, of ascetic training, needs to be distinguished from the practice of the virtues as such. Asceticism means training for some purpose, whereas practice of the virtues, especially the practice of love*, is seen in the New Testament, and Christianity in general, as a manifestation of the fruits of the Spirit* (Gal 6:22).

1. Jesus Christ

The commandment to love (Mt 22:37–40 par.) is not primarily ascetic: it points to the essential nature of Christian community, which is itself a response to God’s love for mankind. Nonetheless, in a later Christian tradition*, even love is sometimes regarded in an ascetic light, as we shall see. Properly ascetic doctrine in the teaching of Jesus and in the rest of the New Testament is nearly always—like the understanding of martyrdom outlined above—eschatological: in other words, it concerns training for the end, the eschaton, the coming of the kingdom of God. The key themes in this teaching are patient endurance (hupomonè, which also has the sense of patient expectation) and vigilance. Following Christ* means “taking up one’s cross” (Mt 16:24): it is not a momentary decision, but a matter of one’s whole life. The “synoptic apocalypse” (Mt 24:4–36 par.), the teaching that Jesus gave to his disciples immediately before his final days, speaks constantly of patience and watchfulness, as do the parables* that follow it in the account in Matthew. It is these themes that are developed in the rest of the New Testament.

2. Paul

Paul puts patient endurance in a sequence that leads the Christian to openness to God’s love: “tribulation works patient endurance, endurance leads to testing, and testing to hope, and hope does not disappoint, because the love of God is poured out into our hearts by the Holy Spirit that has been given to us” (Rom 5:3 ff.).

In the New Testament, the word tribulation (thlipsis) usually suggests troubles that are signs of the final conflict between the forces of good and the forces of evil, and that might lead to martyrdom: throughout the New Testament, martyrdom and the expectation of the end (more precisely, the Second Coming of Christ) provide the horizon against which Christian action is played out.

3. Imitation of Christ

Jesus Christ is, of course, the model for such asceticism. His patient endurance is an example to those who seek to follow him (Ignatius of Antioch, Polycarp 8, 2): those who have been granted to become martyrs have been given the grace of special closeness to him. The martyr is the archetypal saint. However, although the New Testament presents Jesus as an example, as one to follow, the real goal is something much more inward, more intimate. Both Paul and John speak of indwelling: Christ dwelling in the hearts of Christians (Eph 3:17) or, more commonly, an indwelling of all Christians “in Christ” (Rom 12:5, but very commonly in the other Pauline epistles), and even the indwelling of the Trinity* in the disciples (Jn 14:23). On one striking occasion, Paul speaks of bearing the cross as an asceticism that leads to the manifestation of the life of the Risen Christ in one’s own life: “always carrying in the body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our bodies” (2 Cor 4:10).

IV. Development of Christian Asceticism

Early Christianity was enthusiastically ascetic: the origins of this asceticism were, we have argued, primarily eschatological, although protological considerations were powerfully supportive. Two features of Christianity were regularly cited by the apologists of the second century in favor of the truth* of the Christian religion: martyrdom and virginity (see Justin, 1 Apol. 15 f.). Martyrdom was evident witness to the truth of Christianity, and virginity, much prized by the philosophers though less commonly embraced by them, demonstrated the power of Christianity, a power that sprang from its truth. In some branches of early Christianity (e.g., in Syria, it is argued), a vow of celibacy may even have been a requirement for baptism*. Christianity was hard pressed to prevent Christian asceticism from leading to an outright rejection of the material in the name of a metaphysical dualism. Throughout Christian history, the attractions of dualistic movements (Manichaeism, Paulicianism, Bogomilism, Catharism) have posed serious problems.

1. Clement and Origen

The development of Christian ascetic theory has been largely the preserve of monasticism, but the ground was prepared by the Christian Platonists of Alexandria*, Clement and Origen* (Christian Platonism*). Clement, in particular, developed the ideal of martyrdom in the direction of an inward ascetic struggle, which he called “spiritual martyrdom” (spiritual life*, III), and made use of the ideas of classical philosophy, especially Platonic and Stoic philosophy, in his working out of this ideal. Clement seems to have been a favorite author with the more intellectually inclined monks of the desert, especially with Evagrius (†399), who was the theorist of this early monasticism. Also influential was Origen, although certain aspects of the Origenist influence led to controversy. Despite Evagrius’s condemnation as an Origenist—formally in the East, by the Patriarch of Alexandria, Theophilus, in 400, and by the Emperor Justinian in the sixth century, and informally, though much more effectively, in the West, explicitly by Jerome and implicitly by Augustine—the influence of Evagrius’s rationale of ascetic theology* had vast influence.

2. Evagrius

For Evagrius, the monastic life could be divided into three stages: praktikè, the active effort to form the virtues and to fight temptation; phusikè, natural contemplation*, that is, contemplation of the inner meaning and structure of the created order, including God’s design for humankind (his “economy”), which was worked out through that order; and, finally, theologia, the contemplation of the blessed Trinity*. What Evagrius has to say about asceticism is mainly found in his substantial teaching on praktikè, and draws, through Clement and Origen, on the psychological wisdom of the philosophers.

a) Platonic Doctrine of the Soul. Fundamental to Evagrius’s understanding of the soul is Plato’s division of it into three parts: intellect (noûs), aggressivity (thumos), and desire (epithumia). The true self, as with Plato, is the intellect, and its purpose is contemplation. Evagrius, however, puts this in a somewhat different way: for him, the natural state of the intellect is prayer (Practicos). Asceticism therefore concerns the training needed for the uninterrupted pursuit of prayer. He uses the Platonic tripartite understanding of the soul to elucidate what this involves. The lower parts of the soul can prevent the intellect from engaging in prayer, either by distracting it from its purpose or by blocking its activity.

The desiring part of the soul produces images of desirable things that draw the attention of the intellect away from God. What is involved here is more complex and more profound than is apparent. It is not just a matter of desirable objects, but rather the nexus of activities that absorb one’s energies as one seeks to satisfy desire. The resulting “distraction” breaks the intellect’s attention and withdraws it from prayer. Much of Evagrius’s ascetic theology is concerned with understanding the psychic mechanisms involved in desire and its satisfaction, but the purpose of all this understanding of the soul is to enable it to attain a state of perpetual prayer. The aggressive part of the soul hinders the intellect from prayer, not so much by distracting it, but, more fundamentally, by blocking it. Anger, Evagrius says, is like a cloud cutting off the soul from God. In both cases, Evagrius suggests various remedies for dealing with these distracting or blocking mechanisms (e.g., De oratione 9, 19–27, 31, 83, 90, 98, 105).

b) The Eight Logismoi. At this stage, Evagrius introduces a much more elaborate understanding of the temptations and propensities of the human person. Temptations play on the natural reactions, called in Greek pathè, or “passions*.” These passions are brought into play by thoughts or images, which Evagrius calls logismoi: perhaps not so much “thoughts” as “series of thoughts.” Particularly in the case of hermits (with whom Evagrius is mainly concerned), passions are aroused through the stimulation of trains of thought by demons*. In the case of monks living in communities, and even more so in the case of Christians living in the world*, the passions are aroused by friction with other people. These passions, or the logismoi associated with them, are grouped by Evagrius into eight categories: gluttony, fornication, avarice, grief, anger, listlessness, vanity, and pride. (This is the origin of the later Western doctrine of the seven deadly sins*.) Some of these passions are directly associated with one of the parts of the soul—gluttony, fornication, and avarice with the desiring part, anger with the aggressive part—but there is no strict correlation, and some of the passions affect more than one part of the soul (e.g., listlessness affects all three parts). Evagrius’s discussion of these passions (e.g., in Practicos) and, even more, the treatment of these passions in the sayings of the Desert Fathers (some collections of which have been organized around Evagrius’s leading notions), show a profound awareness of the kind of games that we play with ourselves. Gluttony, for instance, is not just greed for too much food, or for especially delectable food, but may also include worries about diet, and the way in which food itself, or the rituals of eating, can become a focus for deep-seated anxieties. Nor is fornication simple lust: dealing with fornication includes also acceptance of the fact that, however habitual one's austerity, one's body can still remind one of the realm within oneself that cannot be easily subjugated to the dictates of reason*, as well as being aware that the quest for a sexual relationship can be part of the longing for family life. Evagrius envisages the austere life of the hermit, but the principles that he discerns in his discussion of the ways in which the passions tend to make our lives reactive could easily be given a wider application.

c) Apatheia. For Evagrius, the intellect needs to be freed from the disturbance of the passions if it is to engage in prayer. Ascetic practice is aimed at preventing such disturbance, or at least rendering the intellect invulnerable to such disturbance. Central to Evagrius's discussion is the notion of apatheia (state of nonpassion, of "impassivity"), borrowed from the Stoics by way of Clement of Alexandria. Possession of apatheia means that the soul is free from reactive behavior and is able to direct its attention as it wants, which will mean primarily to God, but it also means that the soul will be able to tend effectively and disinterestedly to the needs of others. It is often misunderstood as a bleak lack of passion, not least by Jerome, whose misunderstanding meant that the term was never adopted in the West. Evagrius's disciple Cassian, who brought the wisdom of his master to the Latin world, spoke instead of "purity of heart," which has a very different resonance. The whole purpose of praktikè is, for Evagrius, to create a state of apatheia that will make it possible for the soul to love selflessly and pray undistractedly. However, natural contemplation (the object of phusikè) also has ascetic functions. First, in natural contemplation the intellect learns to contemplate, by learning how to behold the world without being attached to it. Second, the intellect begins to understand the constitution of the created order, and especially the human person. This understanding is an important quality in a spiritual father (spiritual life* IV 2 e) who is concerned to help others in finding their way to pure prayer.

d) Synergy. If there is very little said explicitly about grace* in Evagrius's ascetic theology, this is neither because Evagrius has a defective understanding of grace, nor because he understands asceticism to be a purely human activity, but rather because Evagrius, along with much of the Eastern tradition, takes for granted that any human striving toward God is, in fact, a human response to God, and thus a working together (sunergeia) with God. Asceticism then, in the Eastern tradition, presupposes grace. In the West, by contrast, the relationship between ascetic practice and grace poses a problem. Even before the Pelagian controversy, Augustine had come to mistrust the claims made for asceticism by some of his contemporaries: his self-analysis in the second half of Book X of the Confessions exposes in detail how deeply he is in need of grace, of the Mediator, and, rather than indicating any ascetic remedies, he makes clear how impossible it would be for any discipline to bring him to a fit state to behold God. This mistrust of asceticism was only deepened in Augustine's conflict with Pelagianism*, and in his final exchange with the monks of Provence he seems to set no store by asceticism at all. In his own life, however, Augustine was extremely austere, and in his monastic rule asceticism has an important place—not, however, as self-cultivation of the individual, but rather as setting down ground rules for a life of brotherhood.

3. Asceticism of the Common Life

a) Monasticism. In the practice of monasticism, the inexorable asceticism imposed by life in community quickly came to be regarded as being at least as important as austerity, as the way by which the individual sought to restore the image-likeness to God. In both the Rule of Basil and that of Benedict, the surrender of one's self-will for the sake of the common life, symbolized in the acceptance of obedience to the abbot, comes to be regarded as the center of the monk's inner asceticism. The monastic round of prayer, and especially the importance attached to vigil and prayer during the night, also preserves the eschatological root of asceticism. The danger that ascetic prowess may lead to a self-control that verges on pride is one that is fully recognized in the traditions of communal ("cenobitic") monasticism.

b) Overcoming the Isolation of the Fall. The deepest meaning of asceticism in a Christian sense is to work toward and restore the perfection of the image of God in human beings. It is therefore an attempt to restore the damage done by the Fall. As such, it is affected by how that Fall has been understood. If the Fall is understood as Adam's deception by Eve, then asceticism will stress avoidance of the bonds of sexual companionship and family. If the Fall is seen as submission to the pleasure of the senses (for the fruit of the tree was “a delight to the eyes”), the denial of sensuous pleasure will become an important feature of asceticism (encouraged by Platonic dualism). Both these views are found among Christian thinkers, but a much more general and fundamental understanding of the Fall sees it as an act of disobedience toward God, or as an assertion of self in place of God, or, more philosophically, as acquiescence in the illusion, which each human being has, that he or she is the center of the world. Hence the importance, found in all Christian asceticism, of self-denial, humility, and loving service toward others (in this sense, love assumes an ascetic role). Throughout the Christian tradition, the heart of asceticism is found in acceptance of the reality and claims of the “other,” the refusal to exploit the other, and, indeed, an acknowledgment of encounter with the other as encounter with Christ himself (Mt 25:31–45). In monasticism, the discipline of community life dwarfs other ascetic “disciplines.” The Rule of St. Benedict does not include chastity or poverty among the monastic vows: the monk vows himself to stability, conversion* of life, and obedience—that is, staying in the monastery, conforming his life to that of the community, and obedience to the abbot and the Rule. Chastity and poverty are the inevitable corollaries of such a communal life. Humility and repentance are the requirements of recognizing the other in each of one’s brothers. Such principles of asceticism could readily be worked out in relation to married life, where the relationship itself becomes the primary discipline, demanding humility and repentance if it is to last.

V. External Forms of Asceticism

To the modern ear, the word asceticism suggests nothing so apparently humdrum as faithfulness and putting the other first. One thinks of hair shirts, flagellation, or extreme fasts and sleep deprivation. All of these have had their place in the history of Christian asceticism, although in fact none of the classical monastic rules ever makes much mention of them (except to forbid excessive asceticism as exhibitionism, or, worse, a breach of obedience). They are also sometimes misunderstood. In general, mortification—especially in the form of flagellation, which was popular well into the 20th century—is muted in much modern practice. Insofar as this is a recognition of the ambiguity of any form of self-inflicted pain, with dangers of exhibitionism (always recognized) and sadomasochism (perhaps less so, although Saint John* of the Cross was well aware of this danger), it is hardly to be discouraged.

a) Fasting. Fasting, which has ceased to be a general requirement in modern Christianity, save for the Orthodox, is not a matter of food deprivation. One does not feel hungry during the Lenten fast, but food lacks variety and is less distracting: it also serves a symbolic function, in marking out Lent as a preparation for Easter. To put it bluntly: unless one fasts, feasting ceases to be feasting, a joyful celebration of days or periods as special.

b) Almsgiving. Almsgiving is one of the forms of asceticism most commonly recommended by the Fathers to those who live in the world. In the early centuries, and indeed well into the modern period, the almsgiving of Christians living in the world enabled the church, and institutions under the aegis of the church, to provide for the poor, the disabled, and the sick. In the modern world, in many countries such welfare provision has been taken over by the state. It is, however, precisely those countries where many Christians are comfortably off and need to regard almsgiving as an ascetic discipline.

c) Pilgrimage. Pilgrimage* is another ascetic practice, involving as it does, to some degree, an uprooting from comfortable familiarity, and a recognition of the need to go in search of the unum necessarium.

d) Fool for Christ. A further individual way of asceticism, commonly associated with the Byzantine East, though by no means confined to it, is the way of the “innocent.” Perhaps our modern technological society* has more need of this witness than of any other, since it runs counter to all its values. Christian asceticism may have a prophetic value, not simply being directed toward individual sanctification, but presenting a challenge to the accepted norms of society. However, the example of the fool for Christ brings out another aspect of asceticism, namely that, because each human being is a unique image of God, there cannot and should not be uniformity in ascetic practices.

- F. X. Funk, K. Bihlmeyer, W. Schneemelcher (Ed.), Die Apostolischen Väter, 3rd Ed., Tübingen, 1970.
- “Ambrosiaster” (unknown Roman priest whose exegesis was attributed to Ambrose), Quaestiones veteris et novi testamenti, CSEL 50.
- Augustine, Confessions, BAug 13–14; De Genesi ad litteram, BAug 48–49.
- Basil of Caesarea, Asceticon magnum, PG 31, 905–1305.
- Evagrius, Practicos, SC 170 and 171; De oratione, in Nicodème l’Hagiorite (Ed.), Philokalia, 5 vols., Athens, 1957 (3rd Ed. 1963), I, 176–89.
- Irenaeus, The Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, SC 62.
- Justin Martyr, Apologia, in E. J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten, Göttingen, 1914, 26–89.
- ♦ A. Stolz (1948), L’ascèse chrétienne, Chèvetogne.

- H. von Campenhausen (1960 a), “Die Askese im Urchristentum,” in Tradition und Leben: Kräfte der Kirchengeschichte, Tübingen, 114–56; (1960 b), “Die asketische Heimatlosigkeit im altkirchlichen und frühmittelalterlichen Mönchtum,” ibid., 290–317.
- S. Brock (1973), “Early Syrian Asceticism,” Numen 20, 1–19.
- R. Murray (1975), “The Features of the Earliest Christian Asceticism,” in Peter Brook (Ed.), Christian Spirituality: Essays in Honour of Gordon Rupp, London, 63–77.
- V. and E. Turner (1978), Image and Pilgrimage in Christian Culture, Oxford.
- J. Seward (1980), Perfect Fools: Folly for Christ’s Sake in Catholic and Orthodox Spirituality, Oxford.
- U. Bianchi (Ed.) (1985), La Tradizione dell’encrateia: Motivazioni ontologiche e protologiche, Rome.
- R. Brague (1985), “L’image et l’acédie,” RThom 87, 197–228.
- C. W. Bynum (1987), Holy Feast and Holy Fast: The Religious Significance of Food to Mediaeval Women, Berkeley.
- P. Brown (1988), The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York.
- V. Wimbush, R. Valentarsis (Ed.) (1995), Asceticism, New York.

ANDREW LOUTH

See also Contemplation; Life, Spiritual; Mysticism; Prayer; Spiritual Theology

Aseitas

a) Definition. The Latin word aseitas is the abstract form of ens a se. Aseitas is the fact of existing in oneself, of having esse by oneself, and can therefore be applied only to God*. The term is used in Latin ontological theology. In parallel with the division of being* by categories taught by Aristotle (substance and accident, per se and per aliud), this theology proposes another division based on the idea of the creation*: to the Creator corresponds the ens a se and to created beings the ens ab alio (abalietas). Aseitas thus negatively designates the absence of any ontological dependence, and positively the fullness of divine sovereignty. Although the idea of aseitas is present in various forms in Latin theology*, the term itself is recent and has been in frequent use only since the 19th century, within the Neoscholastic movement and particularly in philosophy* and theology influenced by Suarez*.

b) Patristics and Medieval Theology. The Greek fathers of the church* used several terms to indicate the absolute sovereignty of God, such as anarkhos (Tatian) and agennètos (Irenaeus*, Cyril of Jerusalem).

Augustine* is the distant herald of the notion of aseitas insofar as he rejects any comprehension of the Principle as causa sui: “Nothing exists that engenders itself” (De Trinitate I. i. 1; BAug 15. 89). The Neoplatonists, for their part, had no hesitation in attributing this property to the Principle: “He is self-producing” (Plotinus, Enneads VI. 8. 15); “he is himself the cause of himself (aition heautou), of himself and by himself” (ibid., 14, see 16). And Proclus even extended this eternal reflection to existences and intelligences that enjoy sufficient perfection to give themselves means of existence. “He is himself his own cause” (aition heautô) (Proclus, Elements of Theology no. 46, see no. 43). This proposition marked the birth of the causa sui in the Latin version of the Book of Causes: “And he becomes cause of himself (causa sui) only by his relation to his cause; and this relation is his very formation” (Book of Causes prop. 26, comm.). Some Fathers of the Church, such as Marius Victorinus, took up the concept. Cyril* of Alexandria, citing the Orphic Hymns (Kern Ed. 254), says of God that he is autogenètos (Contra Julian 35 c, SC 322, 176).

Augustine’s opposition was thus a break with Neoplatonism. In order to name what absolutely distinguishes the Creator from created beings, Augustine uses the expression habens esse ut sit (De Genesi ad litteram 5. 16, PL 34, col. 333, no. 34): God possesses in himself the being through which he is. The Augustinian principle was systematized by Nicholas of Amiens, De arte fidei I. 8 (PL 210, 600a): Nihil est causa sui (Nothing is the cause of itself). This would be quoted by all medieval theologians to support the interpretation of divine aseitas. The Augustinian formulation is nuanced in Anselm*. On the one hand, Anselm says a se instead of in se; on the other, he does not pose the problem from the point of view of esse (being, existence), but from the point of view of the divine nature (habeat a se sine alterius naturæ auxilio esse quiddid est; Monol. c. 26; see Schmitt I. 44). Following Augustine, Anselm emphasizes the absence of ontological indignation (nullo alio indigens; Prosl., Proemium, see Schmitt I. 93; Ep. de Incarnatione I, c. 11; see Schmitt I. 290), and positively asserts the idea of supreme perfection (esse perfectum; Monol. c. 28; see Schmitt I. 112).

Hugh and Richard of Saint Victor attributed to God esse a smetipso. Thomas* Aquinas proposed a primary division of being: “being by essence” (CG 2, c. 15, 4um) and “being by participation.” He proposed a secondary division corresponding to the division of being according to the categories of Aristotle: “being by itself” (substance) and “being by accident” (accidents). Even though the term aseitas is absent from his works (see Index Thomisticus), the equivalent is found in the expression “God is his own being” (De Ver. q. 2, a. 1, resp.; ST Ia, q. 3, a. 4, resp.), which constitutes the raison d’être of divine simplicity* (De Ver. q. 2, a. 1, resp.). The perspective chosen, that of being, esse, excludes any idea of “possession,” habere. And by saying that “God is his own being,” Thomas establishes the infinite nature of divine essence, as such radically different from any quantitative infinity (De Ver. q. 2, a. 2, ad 5). Analogous formulations can be found in Duns* Scotus. As for Nicholas* of Cusa, he associates and distinguishes at the same time causa sui and subsistence by oneself (auhupostatton), in a context inspired by Proclus: “All things that do not subsist by themselves, as they are not causes of themselves... are by a cause, which is their reason for being subsisting by itself” (Philosophisch-theologische Schriften, vol. 2, Vienna, 1966).

c) Modern Philosophy and Theology. The idea of aseitas is diametrically opposed to the idea of ens causa sui (Descartes, Spinoza), to that of a being that would be its own “cause.” Avicenna had already dismissed any idea of causality within the First (God), for the reason that God has no essence (quidditas). And Bonaventure* had excluded the idea of a God who was the product of himself, a se ipso[feri]. Descartes*, however, authorized the rule of causa sui by bringing together the two meanings of the expression, sovereign freedom and self-production, and attributing them to God. By virtue of the principle of reason, divine aseitas was therefore expressed in terms of reflexive causality: “This name [causa sui] can be no more usefully employed than to demonstrate the existence of God” (Descartes, Réponses aux quatrièmes objections). Thus God is himself through the identification of his power with the principle of reason, an ambivalent act in which is indicated both a submission to the principle and an absolute transcendence.

Having become the engendering of existence from essence, causa sui was to be the keystone of Spinoza’s Ethics: “By cause of itself I understand that whose essence envelops existence” (I. 1, def. 1). And in German idealism, even when the absolute is no longer substance but subject, the term “cause of itself” is still appropriate: “Spinoza’s error did not lie in this idea, but in the simple fact of positing it outside of any self” (Schelling*, On the Self). The absolute self, “being conditioned by itself” (Schelling, The Form of Philosophy in General), is both omnipotence and ontological proof, and the causa sui presides over the completion of ontology and theology, as set forth by Hegel* in the self-effectuation of the Absolute: it is “the absolute truth of the cause” (Encyclopedia of Philosophical Sciences I, Science of Logic §153). But causa sui has been distinctly rejected as contradictory in theology (Kleutgen) as well as in philosophy (Nietzsche*, Sartre). The notion of causality is of value within the realm of the created and does not apply to the Creator.

The two aspects, negative and positive, of aseitas have been brought to the fore by many representatives of Neoscholasticism (Billot, Farges, Scheeben*). For some (Billuart, Kleutgen, Lehmen, Lennerz), aseitas is the principal divine attribute*, or the metaphysical essence of God, essentia Dei metaphysica, from which all the other attributes logically flow. Debates on the “metaphysical essence of God” have also led to a distinction (Lafosse) between an “inadequate aseitas,” denoting the negative aspect, which is the exclusion of any causality; and an “adequate aseitas,” a concept designating the divine plenitude of Being. It is in this dual sense that Franzelin, for example, interprets the notion of ens a se: its content implies simultaneously the negation of any participation, and the affirmation of an Absolute Being that was already present in Anselm (“absolutum,” “absolute esse,” “solum esse”; Monol. c. 28; see Schmitt I. 46).

- C. R. Billuart (1754), Summa Summae S. Thomae, sive compendium theologiae..., I, diss. II, a. 1, §1 Sq, Liège.
- Lafosse (1839), Theologiae cursus completus (Migne) vol. 7, Paris, 83.
- J. Kleutgen (1867), Die Theologie der Vorzeit, vol. 1, Münster, 226–36.
- J. B. Franzelin (1876), Tractatus de Deo uno, sect. III, c. I, Rome, 259.
- A. Farges (1894), L’idée de Dieu d’après la raison et la science, Paris, 287.
- L. Billot (1897), De Deo uno et trino, Rome, 81.
- A. Lehmen, H. Lennerz (1923), Lehrbuch der Philosophie, vol. 3: Theodizee, 148–54.
- P. Descoqs (1925), Institutiones metaphysicae generalis: Éléments d’ontologie, Paris.
- E. Przywara (1932), Analogia entis, Munich (2nd Ed. Einsiedeln, 1962).
- M. Blondel (1935), L’Être et les êtres, Paris, 174–75.
- N. Hartmann (1935), Zur Grundlegung der Ontologie, Berlin.
- É. Gilson (1948), L’être et l’essence, Paris.
- C. Nink (1952), Ontologie: Versuch einer Grundlegung, Freiburg.

- É. Gilson (1964), Le thomisme. Introduction à la philosophie de saint Thomas d'Aquin, 6th Ed., rev., Paris.
- J. de Finance (1966), Connaissance de l'Être: Traité d'ontologie, Paris-Bruges.
- L. de Raeymaeker (1970), Philosophie de l'Être: Essai de synthèse métaphysique, 3rd Ed., Louvain-Paris.
- B. Weissmahr (1983), Philosophische Gotteslehre, Stuttgart.
- S. Breton (1986), "Réflexions sur la causa sui," RSPHTh 70, 349–64.
- C. Viola (1992), "hoc est enim Deo esse, quod est magnum esse": Approche augustinienne de la grandeur divine," in M.-O. Goulet-Cazé, et al. (Ed.), Chercheurs de sagesse, Hommage à Jean Pépin, EAUG (Antiquité) 131, 403–20.

COLOMAN VIOLA

See also Attributes, Divine; Being; Immutability/Impassibility, Divine; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Omnipotence, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine

Assumption. See Mary

Athanasius of Alexandria

(c. 299–373)

a) Life. Probably born in 299 (the Index of Festal Letters, established by his Chancery shortly after his death, states that he was not yet 30 years of age when he was consecrated in 328) to a Greek family in Alexandria*, Athanasius started, in 325, to serve as deacon* and secretary to bishop* Alexander, whom he accompanied to the Council* of Nicaea*. He was consecrated as "pope" (then a common title for the bishops of Alexandria) on 8 June 328. The first five years of his episcopate were marked by long pastoral visits to the monks of the Thebaid, the Pentapole and the Ammon deserts, or in the Delta regions. He was probably looking there for spiritual nourishment, which he greatly needed to assume his episcopal duties. These duties were weighty: the decrees of Nicaea regarding the reintegration of the Melitians to the ranks of the Catholic clergy (Melitius, bishop of Lycopolis, was opposed to Peter of Alexandria's patriarch about the reintegration into a Christian Church which had been apostatized during the Diocletian persecution, and whose bishops had been illegitimately ordained) had hardly been implemented by the old Alexander, and the opposition to the Nicene Creed persisted in the Eastern churches under a coalition directed by Eusebius of Nicomedia against the episcopal seat of Alexandria. An alliance among the schismatic Melitians, who had a slight majority in Egypt, and the vast coalition favorable to Arius (Arianism*) signified a premature end to the much too young bishop of Alexandria's episcopal ministry.

At the beginning of 331, Constantine summoned Athanasius to appear before his court because accusations had been made against him, but he was found to be innocent. The alarm sounded again in 334, when Athanasius received an order to present himself in front of a synod* apparently presided over by Eusebius of Caesarea. He refused to abide by that order. In 335, forced by another order from Constantine, he could not avoid the imperial Synod of Tyre, in Phoenicia. That synod, which sealed the alliance among Melitians and Arians, deposed him. He sought help in Constantinople from the emperor in person, who banished him at once to Trier, where his son Constantine II was residing. The emperor did not replace Athanasius, who therefore kept his seat; he was merely keeping him away from the commotion of clerical intrigues.

In Trier, the exile struck a friendship with the bishop Maximinus and the caesar Constantine. He touted the marvels of the monastic rise in the Egyptian deserts known to all around him, as a seed from which the oldest monasticism* would take germ. After the death of the emperor on 22 May 337, Constantine II authorized Athanasius to go back to Alexandria, which he did “in great triumph,” according to the Index of 23 November of the same year.

The episcopal coalition, hostile to the Alexandrian seat, did not tolerate this comeback. The Cappadocian Gregory, chosen as Athanasius’s replacement, was imposed to take the seat by force. Trouble arose; obliging Athanasius to withdraw underground on 18 March 339. Immediately after 15 April, which was Easter Sunday, the bishop left secretly for Rome*. He was received there by Pope* Julius I, whose synod soon recognized him, in 340, as the sole legitimate bishop of Alexandria. After an encounter in Trier with the Western emperor, Constans, whose support he obtained, Athanasius participated in 343 in the Council of Sardica (Sofia), where the episcopates of the East and the West refused to sit together, but where a fratricidal war between the two emperors, Constans and Constantius, was barely avoided. Marcellus of Ancyra, another victim of the Nicene after-council, who had the reputation of renewing the modalism* of Sabellius, had joined Athanasius in Rome. The two of them together had against them the unanimity of the Eastern bishops. In 346, the death of Bishop Gregory and his own precarious situation with the Persians finally justified, in the eyes of Constantius II, the recall of Athanasius and his return to the seat of Alexandria. His Alexandrine compatriots, Christians and pagans alike, celebrated the bishop as a national hero: “He was even honored with a triumphal reception before the one hundred thousandth,” notes the Index. But the Eastern coalition remained inflexible and the emperor Constantius was biased more than ever against Athanasius. When, in 350, Constans succumbed under the assaults of usurper Magnentius, Constantius II succeeded in getting rid of him and had nothing more urgent to do than organizing synods, at Arles in 353 and at Milan in 355, with the avowed purpose of obtaining Athanasius’s eviction from the seat of Alexandria and of setting up a regime of Christianity conforming to the Eastern coalition’s wishes. During the nights of 8 and 9 February 356, the church where the bishop was celebrating was stormed by troops headed by the dux of Syrianos. Once more, Athanasius succeeded in escaping. After bloody unrest in the Christian parts of town, the Arian bishop George of Cappadocia occupied the seat of Alexandria, while Athanasius sought refuge in the desert, where he was able to hide under the monks’ protection. Hidden until Constantius’s sudden death in 361, Athanasius did not wait for the authorization of Julian, the new emperor, to return to Alexandria. Around the summer of 362, he organized a synod known as the “synod of the confessors,” where people with different pro-Nicene tendencies decided to support the Homoousians grouped around Basil of Ancyra, which hastened the final victory of the “consubstantial*.” In the meantime, Athanasius had to, once more, go briefly into exile under Julian in 363 and under the Arian emperor Valens during the winter of 365–66. Having outlived all his adversaries, he was able to find some peace, build a few churches and carry on some epistolary exchanges before passing away at the beginning of 373.

b) Works and Doctrine. Athanasius’s literary activity, like his political career, remains marked by an astonishing continuity. Every year, circumstances allowing, the bishop published a festal letter, through which he announced the dates for Lent and Easter, with the appropriate spiritual and pastoral considerations. The first letters are marked by Origenist and monastic spirituality; from 340 on, the evangelical realism particular to Athanasius becomes the dominant feature. The first doctrinal writing of the young pastor, dating probably from 335, is entitled De Incarnatione. That essay, appended to an apology entitled Contra Gentes, which is based on older notes and has a more conventional structure, is the first of its kind to be composed by a church leader; and to diametrically oppose Arian theology*, although without naming it. Contrary to Arius’s assumption, the evangelical figure of Jesus* does not purport to reveal a weak and inferior Word* that has to earn its own divine exaltation through suffering. On the contrary, the divine Word has taken upon itself, within its own flesh, all of mankind’s distress, with the goal of transfiguring this distress, of “deifying” it, by changing its condition. Thus the mystery* of divine Incarnation* becomes central to Athanasius’s theological synthesis. Around 339, Athanasius composed the double Treatises Against the Arians, intended, according to the accompanying letter, To Monks, for the monks. Here, he sets the foundations of a Trinitarian theology in keeping with the Nicene dogma*, by insisting above all on the principles of an anti-Arian interpretation of the Scriptures*. In 339, an Encyclical Letter, which was in fact a long shout of horror and protest, denounced the assaults inflicted on Athanasius at the time he had to flee to Rome. After he came back from his second exile in 346, the bishop produced a vast documentary compilation, the Defense against the Arians, intended to prove the legitimacy of his episcopal title. Around 350 there followed a Letter on the Opinions of Dionysius, the predecessor from the previous century whose formulas the Arians believed they could lay some claim to, and an essay in epistolary form, On the Nicene Degrees. At the time of the riots in 356, Athanasius wrote—under a miraculous state of serene concentration—an Encyclical Letter to the Bishops of Egypt and Libya in which he offered his best synthesis of biblical* theology against the Arian Thalia's theses as he understood them. His desert exile inspired the following: the Apology to Constance, his only work in the polished style of the scholar, which was never made public during Constantius's lifetime; the Defence of His Flight; the Epistles to Serapion; a real cornerstone in dogmatic discussions preceding the First Council of Constantinople* (381); the long Letter on the Synods of Rimini and Seleucia, his longest written work, a documentary monument that is indispensable to the understanding of the Nicene after-council, and which serves as a direct preparation for the 362 synod of union, itself known thanks to the Volume to the Antiochenes; and above all, the Life of Anthony, perhaps written in its final stage after the end of the third exile, and intended to glorify, for centuries to come, the heroes of Egyptian eremitism, whose perfect model was, in Athanasius's eyes, represented by Anthony. The Letter to Epictetus, bishop of Corinth; the Letter to Adolphus, addressed to a longtime companion who had been at his side during some of his struggles; and a charming essay on the use of the Psalter, impossible to date, the Letter to Marcellin, complete Athanasius's literary legacy.

Centered on the mystery of divine Incarnation, Athanasius's synthesis examines notions of Trinitarian theology in more depth, without ever losing sight of the living experience* of faith. That synthesis, after many vicissitudes, led to a clear conscience of the separation between church* and state.

- Apologies (SC 56 bis).
- H.-G. Opitz (Ed.) (1934–41), Athanasius-Werke, Berlin.
- Epistles to Serapion* (SC 15).
- A. Martin, M. Albert (1985), Histoire "acéphale" et Index syriaque des Lettres festales d'Athanasie d'Alexandrie, SC 317
- Life of Anthony* (SC 400).
- On the Incarnation of the Word* (SC 199).
- (works by Athanasius): PG 25–27.
- ♦ E. Schwartz (1959), Gesammelte Schriften, III: Zur Geschichte des Athanasius, Berlin.
- C. Kannengiesser (Ed.) (1974), Politique et théologie chez Athanasie d'Alexandrie, Paris; (1983), Athanasie d'Alexandrie évêque et écrivain: Une lecture des traités Contre les ariens, Paris; (1990), Le Verbe de Dieu selon Athanasie d'Alexandrie, Paris.
- D. W. H. Arnold (1991), The Early Career of Athanasius of Alexandria, Notre Dame (bibl.).
- T. D. Barnes (1993), Athanasius and Constantius, Cambridge, Mass.
- A. Martin (1996), Athanasie d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV^e siècle (328–373), Paris.

CHARLES KANNENGIESSER

See also Arianism; Consubstantial; Incarnation; Nicaea I, Council of; Trinity

Athanasius, Symbol of. See Creeds

Atheism

A. Philosophical Problematics

1. General Definition

An atheist is one who denies the existence of God*. This nominal definition is insufficient because it leaves indeterminate not only the nature of the God that is denied, but, more importantly, the precise manner of the denial. If God is identified with an idol, denying his existence may be a way of affirming the existence of the true God: what presents itself as atheism is in truth theism. In this case, the denial is limited: a particular God is denied in order to affirm another one. But it is also possible to deny that any being whatever can exist for which the name* God is fitting. This denial still presupposes an idea of what is denied, and that would be enough for some to demonstrate its existence. The only coherent way of denying God or of affirming that God is nothing would be to reduce the idea of God to that of nothingness*—a delicate operation, for the idea of God is not of the same imaginary nature as that of a chimera.

From this difficulty, indeed impossibility, of denying the existence of God, it would be rash to deduce a proof* of his existence*. It is not possible, as for another being, to be indifferent about affirming or denying the existence of God. As Kant* has shown, although reason* enters into conflict with itself with respect to the world, there is on the other hand no rational antinomy concerning the existence of God. It is possible to deny that the existence of God is demonstrable; it is not possible to demonstrate that God does not exist. The metaphysical definition of God, as supreme Being, is such that atheism is not the simple antithesis of theism. In other words, atheism is not primarily an opposition to a rational thesis concerning the existence of God. Conversely, it is quite possible to have an idea of God, and even to come to a rational conclusion that he exists, and still be called an “atheist.”

If atheism, in its primary usage, is not a doctrinal or speculative position, this is because it is first of all defined in relation to a belief. An atheist is one who does not believe in God, who does not share the belief accepted in a community with a relatively wide social foundation. When the community is identical to the city* or the state, the definition of atheism is political: not to believe is to place oneself outside the state. The equation for atheism represents the reverse side of official religion. To be sure, there is also a rational atheism, but its belated appearance can be explained by the modern reversal that transformed a negative meaning, indicating an exclusion, into a positive meaning, associated with an idea of humanity. It is only after this reversal that theology* itself can make atheism an object of reflection and not simply of condemnation.

2. Accusation of Atheism

The theoretical determination of atheism is sought in order to meet political and juridical requirements: it is necessary to be able to define the one who, in not respecting the state’s gods, commits an act of rebellion against the state and its laws. The charge of impiety (asebeia) allowed the Athenians to institute proceedings against atheism. The most celebrated was the trial of Socrates in 399 B.C. The philosopher was accused of corrupting the young by “teaching them to believe in new deities instead of the gods recognized by the state” (Plato, Apology 26b). Strictly speaking, this formulation means that Socrates recognizes gods and that he is therefore not an atheist but merely an infidel (this might be called “weak” atheism). However, this difference appears subtle to the accuser Meletus, who has no hesitation in expressing the accusation in a radical form: “Yes, I say that you disbelieve in gods altogether” (26c). Thereafter, Socrates has no difficulty in refuting the accusation, since it is based on a contradiction: he is charged both with believing (in new gods, in daimonia [27d]) and with not believing (in the gods of the state). The defense is clever: while showing that he is not an atheist (in the strict sense), Socrates refrains from denying that he is an atheist (in the weak sense), that is, from affirming that he recognizes the gods of the state.

Trials for atheism are characterized by this argumentative structure. On one hand, the accuser claims that what must be condemned is not the theoretical position of atheism but its disastrous moral consequences for society*. On the other, the defendant denies that he is an atheist by invoking an idea of divinity superior to that of the accusers. The accusation can thus be turned against its proponent: the real atheist is not the one you think. Rather, he is the one who reduces God to an idol, and true religion to superstition. To clarify the concept of atheism it is therefore necessary to distinguish between the theologico-political point of view of the accuser and the dogmatic point of view of the accused. In one sense, the atheist is defined by opposition to an obligation both to believe and to practice the rituals of piety; in another, by opposition to the truth of the concept or the idea of God. There is not necessarily any connection between the two meanings.

3. The Theologico-Political Argument

a) Danger for Morality and Society. Both the obligation to believe in the existence of the gods, and its corollary, the prohibition of atheism, have a political basis, something which Plato makes explicit in Book X of the Laws. There the Athenian indicates the reason why it is necessary to conform to the requirements of state law in believing that the gods exist. It is a matter of countering the prejudicial objection through which the enemies of the laws might ruin the order of the state: if the gods do not exist or are not concerned with humankind (another form of atheism), everything is permitted (887e, 889e). The mob that obeys the laws because it anticipates heavenly retribution will cease to do so. “No man who believes in gods as the law would have him believe has ever yet of his own free will done unhallowed deed or let slip lawless discourse” (885b). Only atheism can lead humankind to transgress the laws. The Athenian does not assert that the atheism of the learned—that is, of the materialists, justly condemned for their impiety—is false. Rather, he considers it dangerous for the state as a whole because it provides arguments for the injustice of the ignorant. This position is symmetrical to that of Socrates: by affirming the necessity of a legislated theism, the question of theoretical atheism is left undecided. The only thing that is important for the state is that atheism not be allowed to spread, that it be censored; the question of its truth or falsity does not belong to the political order. The dissociation between opinion (or belief, which governs politics) and truth has as a consequence for the historical relativity of definitions of atheism: theism on one side of a border, atheism on the other. The contours of atheism match the contingencies of geography and history*. The Jews and the early Christians—“deadly superstition” (Tacitus, Annals XV: 44)—were condemned by the Roman emperors up to Constantine as denigrators of the gods of the official Roman religion. But after Constantine it was paganism that was prohibited (391). The political justification of religion contains in itself the very possibility of an intellectual challenge to religious truth.

b) Paradox of Atheist Theism. Even a philosopher such as Spinoza, who by means of demonstration reaches the mathematical certainty of the existence of God (Ethics I, Prop. 11), was considered an atheist during his lifetime (see Letter 30 to Henri Oldenburg). It was judged that his God “is only an imaginary God, who is anything but God,” as his biographer, Pastor Johannes Colerus, wrote in 1704. If, by any method whatever, God may be identified with created things, he ceases to be God. An atheist is one who, while affirming in words the existence of a being called God, denies the existence of the true God, that is, the personal, transcendent, Creator God known through revelation*. In this case, atheism means rejection of revelation or of the law*, as the unique or primordial source of the knowledge* of God. Theism derived from revelation, on the other hand, is compatible with a skeptical position on the capacity of reason to know God. Hence this paradox: Spinoza was called an atheist precisely because he asserted that he could know God a priori; and the accusation came from the very people who “openly profess to have no idea of God” (A Theologico-Political Treatise chap. 2).

4. Atheism As the Fate of Modernity

a) Atheism in the Face of Revealed Theology. Religion based on revelation is not satisfied with basing the duty to believe on the political argument, but wishes to be recognized as true. It does not dissociate knowledge of the true God from the practice of pious actions. Obedience takes the form of a total adhesion of the person*, both intellectual and moral. The way in which the truth that God exists is recognized determines the attitude toward atheism. Really to believe in God is to believe in the true God, as he has manifested himself to humankind. Conversely, to know God only through reason is to forge an idol. The first step toward atheism is taken when humankind gives up basing its knowledge of God on obedience in faith*. Because faith demands more than simply prudent, politically proper adhesion to a superior normative principle, it opens up at the same time the possibility of rejection.

The atheist, who risks damnation, becomes a bold spirit, a libertine. He is defined not so much by denial of the existence of God as by his liberation from revealed dogmas*. One who relies entirely on reason in all things and who, out of principle, challenges not the political but the spiritual authority* of the community of believers, is an atheist. This situation, which requires all people to situate themselves with respect to revelation, gives rise to a new form of atheism: not one defined negatively by an accusation, but one that the libertine assumes positively as a profession of faith. In the face of revelation, atheism becomes at least thinkable, if not actually acceptable, as its other. Modern civilization, based on the rationality of the natural sciences*, even makes of atheism a kind of common sense. It is belief that has become absurd and dangerous.

b) Atheism of the Enlightenment. Atheism can be extended to denote the affirmation of the primacy of reason in the discovery of truth. To cultivate reason and modern natural science is to reject dogma and therefore deny the revealed God. The denial (of the existence of God) is then the secondary consequence of a position that could be set out in a credo, the one that Molière puts in the mouth of the great libertine lord: “I believe that two and two are four” (Dom Juan III, 1). Confidence in the powers of reason and mathematical science is indeed atheism, for it implicitly excludes any transcendence. Atheism is the negative version of the same rationalist credo: “I believe only that two and two are four.” During the period running from the 16th to the 18th century, atheism gradually lost its taint of criminality. Enlightened thinkers led the way in this change, and their judgment was subsequently confirmed by legislation. Pierre Bayle (1697) challenged the final argument that maintained atheism in the realm of the illicit, and the identification of libertinism with dissolute morals. Not only could an atheist be an honorable man, but reason was a surer guide to good conduct than blind obedience to a retributive power or servile submission to clerical authority. Montesquieu rejected the penal character of crimes of opinion: “Where there is no public action, there is no element of crime” (The Spirit of Laws XII, 4). Along with the deism* of natural religion atheism became a militant form of humanism. The essential thing was not to carry on theoretical discussions about the existence of God but to fulfill a morality that, rather than enslaving humankind, guaranteed it dignity and responsibility. With modernity, atheism, which can be defined neither by the affirmation that God does not exist nor by indifference in matters of religion, derives its consistency from the critique of revealed religion. This is why, in relation to revelation, atheism and rationalist theism, although formally opposed, come together. Atheism belongs to the movement of the Enlightenment because its object is to liberate humankind from enslavement to dogmatic authority.

c) Humanism and Nihilism. Modernity thus reverses the direction of the traditional theologico-political argument: it is no longer atheism that is dangerous for truly human morality, but religion. Feuerbach’s position radicalizes Bayle’s: not only can an atheist be an honorable man, but only an atheist is an honorable man. To be an atheist becomes a duty of humanism, which consists in renouncing the illusion of an eternal* life, and so to concern oneself with the things of this world, seeking a happiness that is limited but remains within the scope of what humankind can attain.

Marx*’s critique of Feuerbach and, by extension, of Enlightenment humanism, claims that this humanism is derived, in its very anticlericalism, from a theological (that is to say, an ideological) problematic that misconstrues the reality of the material forces that make up its infrastructure. The humanist critique of religion in fact secretes a new form of religiosity: with reference to Bauer, Marx speaks of “atheism” as the “last stage of theism, the negative recognition of God” (The Holy Family chap. VI). If we want religion to cease dominating consciousness, it is useless to struggle against it with the weapons of rational argument. It is necessary to change the material conditions of existence: “Empty in itself, religion is not fed by heaven but by the earth, and it collapses by itself with the dissolution of the absurd reality of which it is the theory” (Letter to Ruge, 13 March 1843). Atheism, a “development of theoretical humanism,” must give way to communism, a “development of practical humanism” (Outlines of a Critique of Political Economy).

When Nietzsche* develops the notion of the “death of God” (The Gay Science §125), he is not describing the happy event of human liberation but the abolition of the meaning of existence. Atheism is the work of modernity, the most contorted face of nihilism, the disenchantment of the world. It has ceased to be a demand and a struggle, and has become a fate. The madman reveals to humankind the murder that they themselves have already committed: modern civilization, based on natural science* and technology, makes obsolete both any metaphysical resort to the idea of God and any faith in revelation. At the same time, Nietzsche opens the way to reflection on the religious meaning of atheism, for he provokes the question of which god it is that is dead.

B. Theological Problematics

The theological question of atheism is a recent one. Atheism was in fact almost nonexistent in the cultural world in which the earliest Christian theology was organized. The principal debates that accompanied and influenced that organization were those between Christianity and Judaism*, on the one hand, and Christianity and paganism, on the other, and atheism played no role in either. Considered within the category of idolatry*, paganism clearly seemed to be devoted to the cult* of false gods, whom the Church Fathers* easily saw as demons*. The idol—the god that is “the work of men’s hands” (Ps 115: 4–7), the god that is essentially available to humankind and reveals of the divine only what humankind needs—indicates perhaps that in some sense the religious life of paganism was possessed by evil numinous forces. But pagan cults were not the whole of paganism. When Christian theology came to conceptualize its relation to classical antiquity, it resorted to an interpretation of ancient philosophy to assert that the gospel of Christianity was its guardian; this was intelligible to the pagans because they had been “prepared” by the same Logos whose full manifestation in Jesus* of Nazareth Christianity itself proclaimed.

The Christian reading of the classical philosophers was certainly a tendentious one. The bias of Christian interpreters, however, should not conceal the principal fact: even if classical antiquity had not established a unified philosophical theism, the denial of God (of the god, of the divine) was almost entirely foreign to it. Whoever lived in the company of idols surely lived with no God and with no hope* in the world (Eph 2:12). And yet, the language that the pagans spoke allowed them to name God. Measured against the knowledge to which theology lay claim, that naming may have appeared meager. But theology always devoted its apologetics to this weak discourse and never to a denial of God.

It was only in modern times (see A 4 above) that the stakes and conditions of the naming of God were changed. When the denier of God appeared—very rarely—in patristic and medieval theology, it was in the guise of a madman. The desire to establish foundations was certainly vigorous enough in medieval thought to give rise to a language of rational demonstration, but the foundations were those given to itself by a faith in search of “intelligence.” Neither Anselm’s argument, nor the “ways” of Thomas* Aquinas, nor Duns* Scotus’s search for a first principle derived in any way from an apologetic intention. Patristic and medieval apologetics defended “Christian truth” against pagans, Jews, and heretics (a category that included dualists and Muslims). By contrast, the theological task of defending “religious truth” in the face of irreligious objectors is very much a modern one.

This complex task led to two theoretical strategies, neither of which can yet be regarded as obsolete.

- 1) By taking as its first goal the demonstration of the truth of the “religious,” the new apologetics—for which P. Charron suggested the sequence of treatises (De veritate religiosa, De veritate christiana, De veritate catholica)—clearly stated that the first words of theology are not uttered in the name of Christianity alone, but in the name of all practices (in ritual or in language) that rest on an affirmation of God, whether or not that affirmation has anything specifically Christian about it. On the theoretical stage of modernity, the atheist appears not as one who denies the reasons of Christianity, but as one who challenges the general framework of “religious” references within which Christian discourse seemed to take its place with ease. To confront this challenge there then arose a procedure of defense and illustration of the religious phenomenon, something which found its perfected form in the Discourses of Schleiermacher*. The procedure consisted essentially in answering the denial of God with an affirmation about humanity. Atheism is thus interpreted as a tragic gesture of self-mutilation brought about by denial of the most precious realm of human experience (see Lubac* 1944).

- 2) Because atheism, which is probably more than a philosophical opinion, is not less than such an opinion, it was no doubt legitimate that theology should want to confront it on its own terms by convicting it of irrationality. Superficially identical, the language of demonstration then reappears in the service of entirely different interests. The arguments used by medieval theology to confirm the rational basis of faith become only preliminaries to faith. The atheist frequently claims to be the true philosopher, and this is exactly what the modern form of the proof of the existence of God calls into question. Theology wants to say more about God than does metaphysical theism. But it does not want to say less, and it wants to say as much. So the fate of theism cannot be a matter of indifference to theology. A theology for which God was also the “prime unmoved mover” or “self-sufficient being” is thus succeeded by a theology for which the existence of the prime mover or of the causa sui must first be proved before these concepts can take on a specifically Christian character. It is also necessary that the Christian specifics be provided on the basis of a language sufficiently rational to be common to all.

If classic atheism thus provokes the response of a theology that says little about it, since it does not claim to possess more than the affirmative force of a reason that Catholic tradition* calls “natural,” it seems that this is because atheism itself says rather little on the subject. In a certain sense, atheism cannot help but provoke frustration in the theologian, for the very good reason that atheism is rarely interested in God, and because the denial of God is for atheism the opening move that allows it to gain access to what it regards as the real questions. Since atheists are people who want to stop talking about God altogether, it is not surprising that their denials are brief. Indeed, atheists are sometimes satisfied with the presumption of being right, leaving to theists the concern with longer arguments (Flew 1984; an inverse formulation in the “reformed epistemology” derived from A. Plantinga, in which the existence of God is an elementary, basic fact, which one may attempt to deny but which does not call for demonstration). The idea that the cause of God may not be quite what is called the “god of the philosophers” is in the end foreign to atheists.

There was thus a shuffling of the cards in the 19th century when atheism added a critique of theological reasoning to its classic procedure of denial. The new atheism derived from Feuerbach and reaching its paroxysm in Nietzsche certainly had no criticism to make of the small stock of materialist or determinist axioms that supplied classic atheism. But somewhere between La Mettrie or Holbach and Feuerbach, the God to be philosophically denied had changed faces. In the interim, indeed, the God of Jesus Christ had carried out what was perhaps his first entry into philosophy. After Hegel*, Schelling*, and Kierkegaard*, the task of atheism became for the first time that of an a-theology. If denial were necessary, it would have to go as far as they had carried their position. It would thus be necessary to deny an Absolute that had passed into history and of which history had preserved the trace (Schelling), to deny that the Absolute was life and that its life was the “play of love* with itself” (Hegel), to deny the paradoxical hypothesis of the Most High who draws near to humanity in the “form of the slave” (Kierkegaard). Atheism, therefore, took on its modern form by challenging arguments that, in its classic form, it had philosophical (and theological) license to ignore: that is, christological, soteriological, kenotic, and Trinitarian arguments.

It was precisely at this point that atheism became a theological problem, in the richest sense. The God whose death was proclaimed by Nietzsche’s madman in §125 of The Gay Science was in fact the one who had tied his fate to that of the Crucified One. The atheist presented himself as the “Antichrist.” And even though there has been no lack of chronologically post-Nietzschean philosophies that deny a pre-Christian God (logical positivism is the most brilliant example), recent theology has had to meet the challenge of the greatest denial, not of the supreme Being, but of creative and redemptive love. It did so and continues to do so in many ways, with answers that probably do no more than identify the terms of the problem.

- 1) Against the anthropological dissolution of Christian realities carried out by Feuerbach, one might argue (Barth*) that this was a pure and simple epistemological error. The aporia of atheist reason arises, in fact, precisely because it is carrying out the work of reason. Reason is defined by lack of faith, and so, faced with God, it adopts a theoretical posture that is existentially the most inadequate possible. It leaves itself the means only to construct its own god (which will thus be an idol), or to deny what it has not known, a denial that will thus have no impact, even if it takes on concepts of God with strong theological determinants. In a sense, Feuerbach was right, insofar as he proposed a critique of religion, seeing it as an act of piety to deny the god with which humanity maintains a “religious” relationship that excuses it from believing.

- 2) The brutalities of “dialectical theology” could not be accepted unmodified by a Catholic theology whose supreme teaching authorities had made specific allowance for a rational knowledge of God (see especially Vatican* I, DS 3004, 3026). Its influence was nevertheless felt, in conjunction with a critique of which the Barth of the Römerbrief was unaware: that of Heidegger*. Of what god can it be said that he is dead? By transposing the concept of idol from the ethical-religious to the theoretical realm, J.-L. Marion (1976) set out a challenge to “conceptual idols.” Just as an idol of stone or wood places the god at the disposal of humanity, so a concept may be said to function in an idolatrous way by restricting God to the services he performs for a particular metaphysics. To the extent that one then adopts the Heideggerian reading of the history of “metaphysics,” it will be possible to say that the God who is dead is the God who has been at the service of ontology, the God of onto-theology. And the reply to a “conceptual” atheism is to speak of the “truly divine” God, the God who himself breaks all the idols when his paternal goodness is revealed in the face of Jesus Christ.
- 3) Thenceforth, theology would be able to carry out a critique of atheism only by also issuing a challenge to theism. The atheist may sometimes recognize that Christians are themselves atheists of many gods (the best example is Bloch 1968), and Christians often specify that they speak otherwise about God because they are speaking of a different God. Between theism and atheism, Protestant theology reacted in classic (or neo-classic) fashion by organizing itself as meticulously as possible as theologia crucis (Jüngel 1977; Moltmann 1972). In the age of the “death of God,” the God of whom it is possible to speak is precisely the God who has taken up the cause of one condemned to death. The veritas christiana is thus articulated in the absence of any veritas religiosa. Atheism, then, is not important by reason of its antimetaphysical burden, which it seems to share with Christianity. If it is really necessary to reply to atheism, it is in order to show (e.g., Piret 1994) that the Christian God confronts humanity as the giver of a future (in an age of the “eternal return of the same”); to show that he confronts humanity by instituting an economy of forgiveness that forces the dismissal of any ressentiment (the reference is to Nietzsche); or (referring again to Nietzsche) in order to counter an ontology of the will to power with a dialectic of crucified and conquering love. It was fitting that theology reply to the a-theological intentions of modern atheism by purifying what it says of God of any nontheological element.

- 4) The “death of God” is finally not only an event occurring in theory, it is the master event of an age and the presupposition of an experience of the world. The distinctive note of this age (an age of “secularization*,” an age of “nihilism”) is no longer that the existence of God is denied but that it is forgotten. Classic atheism weighed the proposition “God exists” and declared it false. In an age of nihilism, this proposition is no longer false, but devoid of meaning. Whoever speaks of God is not even in error, he is simply using words without meaning. And this atheism (already held by logical positivism) takes on what could be called its “postmodern” form under the influence of Jacques Derrida, finding its fulfillment in extremist demolitions of everything (“logocentrism,” “phonocentrism,” etc.) that seems tied to metaphysics. The reaffirmation of God in an age of nihilism thus stands alongside other reaffirmations, without which it would have only incantatory power: the reaffirmation of meaning, for example, of truth, of the humanity of humankind, among others. This work of reaffirmation is being carried out in various places and in diverse ways. Theologies of a “hermeneutic” type (Bultmann*, etc.) devote themselves to bringing to light the unforgettable questions to which the affirmation of God provides an answer. With H. U. von Balthasar*, the background of a doctrine of creation* requires that Christianity also answer for the “meaning of being*”; and if the case arises, it must answer by taking the place of those philosophical discourses that no longer do so (Herrlichkeit III). And, in the wake of the late works of Wittgenstein, theologians bring out the global reality of the “forms of life” and the “language games” within which one may speak of God without sinning against “grammar,” whether the grammar of concepts or the grammar of experience.

A problem that has been resolved is no longer a problem, and atheism remains a theological problem despite the attempts that have been mentioned. Some tasks remain.

- 1) If the God who is dead is only the God of metaphysics, the hypothesis advanced by Heidegger (Identity and Difference, Pfullingen 1957) must be subjected to the test of a detailed reading of the intellectual history of the West, of which we now possess only fragments. The God of the Disputationes Metaphysicae of Suarez* is unquestionably the God of onto-theology; the God of Anselm* or of Bernard* is unquestionably not; while the God of Thomas Aquinas may or may not be. But in order for theology to be able to maintain a fertile relationship with its past, we will have to know much more about that past and about the two logics that seem to have been operative in it: contamination of the theological by the metaphysical, as well as subversion of the metaphysical by the theological.
- 2) To an a-theological atheism, theology will reply with a theological position on the question of God in which christological and Trinitarian arguments play the role not of specifying an already formed concept, but of indicating what kind of God remains thinkable. The elimination of any “natural knowledge” in favor of “positive” thought (Schelling), or of a “more natural” theology (Jüngel) for which only “God speaks well of God” (Pascal*), nevertheless comes up against the utopian character of a strictly theological conception devoid of preexisting understandings. Taken in its kerygmatic dimension, theology aims its message at the Jews and the pagans. Insofar as its audience is pagan, it at least owes it the obligation of giving a meaning to words, beginning with the word God, before formulating for their benefit the complex statements in which God will attain its full meaning. This is so even if it involves criticizing in return the preliminary definition.
- 3) It may be conceded to Heidegger and to the heirs of Wittgenstein that it is important to praise God more than to think about him (Heidegger), or that the true place of “God” is in the language of prayer* and ritual rather than the language of a theory (e.g., D. Z. Phillips). The old question of the demonstratio religiosa ought then to reappear in a new guise.

For Hellenism, the interest in God or the divine was part of the bios theoretikos, the way of life fitting above all for the philosopher. But in late modernity, of what “life” can the interest in God be a part, and of what form of life can it be said that it is essentially atheist? These queries indicate that the question of God is inseparable from a question about humanity, and that the affirmation of God cannot be isolated from affirmations about humanity. There are several ways of answering them. It can be considered that the description of the world proposed by Heidegger in Being and Time is accurate enough for it to be necessary to grant atheism an existential status. In that case, the affirmation of God must be seen as a work of distancing (distance taken in relation to the innate conditions of experience—Lacoste 1994). One might also refer to Husserl’s descriptions of the “life-world” in order to bring out the original character of belief and to grasp it as an innate recourse against the reduction of reality to fact, something that plays a large role in the genesis of atheism. One might also borrow from the Augustinian tradition a hermeneutics of desire and of anxiety, attributing to humanity an eschatological and a priori openness that cannot be lost, and which prohibits reducing the question of meaning to an analytics of Dasein and of existence as being-for-death. Whatever the outcome of a debate that puts in play irreducible perspectives not necessarily implying a contradiction, one point at least must be set out forcefully. There can be no consistent theological answer to atheist denials, whether those of a classic, a modern, or a postmodern atheism, unless that answer is integrated into a broader logic than that of discursive-conceptual assertions. In short, they must be met with a distinctive logic of spiritual experience*.

- A. Harnack (1905), Der Vorwurf des Atheismus in den drei ersten Jahrhunderten, Leipzig.
- F. Le Dantec (1906), L’athéisme, Paris.
- P. Hazard (1935), La crise de la conscience européenne, Part 2: Contre les croyances traditionnelles, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1944), Le drame de l’humanisme athée, Paris.
- J. Maritain (1949), La signification de l’athéisme contemporain, Paris-Bruges.
- W. Nestle (1950), “Atheismus,” RAC 1, 866–70.
- J. Lacroix (1958), Le sens de l’athéisme moderne, Paris.

- G. Vahanian (1962), La mort de Dieu: La culture de notre ère postchrétienne, Paris.
- R. Verneau (1964), Leçons sur l’athéisme contemporain, Paris.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), “Typen des Atheismus und ihre theologische Bedeutung,” Grundfr. syst. Th., 347–60.
- K. Rahnner (1967), “Atheismus,” SM(D) 1, 372–83.
- E. Bloch (1968), Atheismus im Christentum, Frankfurt.
- J. Lacroix (1968), Athéisme et sens de l’homme, Paris.
- G. M.-M. Cottier (1969), Horizons de l’athéisme, Paris.
- A. McIntyre, P. Ricœur (1969), The Religious Significance of Atheism, New York.
- H. M. Barth (1971), Atheismus und Orthodoxie, Göttingen.
- J. Moltmann (1972), Der gekreuzigte Gott, Munich.
- C. Tresmontant (1972), Le problème de l’athéisme, Paris.
- F. Padinger (1973), Das Verhältnis des kirchlichen Lehramtes zum Atheismus, Vienna-Salzburg.
- F. Dezingher, et al. (1976), “Atheismus,” TRE 4, 349–436.
- J.-L. Marion (1976), L’idole et la distance, Paris.
- J. Natanson (1976), La mort de Dieu, essai sur l’athéisme, Paris.
- J. Figl (1977), Atheismus als theologisches Problem, TTS 9.
- E. Jüngel (1977), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen.
- É. Gilson (1979), L’athéisme difficile, Paris.
- J. B. Lotz (1981), In jedem Menschen steckt ein Atheist, Frankfurt.
- L. Kolakowski (1982), Religion: If There Is No God..., London.
- A. Flew (1984), God, Freedom and Immortality, Buffalo-New York, 13–68 (1st Ed., The Presumption of Atheism, 1976).
- W. Winiarczyk (1984), “Wer galt im Altertum als Atheist?” Ph. 128, 2, 157–83.
- M. J. Buckley (1987), At the Origins of Modern Atheism, New Haven.
- G. A. James (1987), “Atheism,” EncRel(E) 1, 479–90.
- W. Bauer, K. and B. Aland (1988), “Atheos,” Wörterbuch zum NT, Berlin.
- G. Almeras, S. Auroux (1990), “Dieu (critique de l’idée de),” LNPh I, 653–55.
- J. Deschamps (1990), “Nihilisme,” LNPh 2, 1748–50.
- D. Folscheid (1991), L’esprit de l’athéisme et son destin, Paris.
- Catéchisme de l’Église catholique* (1992), Paris, §2123–26.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), Expérience et Absolu, Paris.
- P. Piret (1994), Les athéismes et la théologie trinitaire, Brussels.
- G. Minois (1998), Histoire de l’athéisme, Paris.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Agnosticism; Existence of God, Proofs of; Faith; Knowledge of God

Attributes, Divine

I. Religious Knowledge of the Divine Names and Attributes

Believers of every religion have meditated on the divine attributes and have invoked a god or the gods using a variety of names. In the Bible*, God* himself reveals his perfections in the experience* that human beings have of him and that they express in their prayers*. It is in fact impossible to pray to God without recalling his goodness, his power, his mercy*, and his justice*. And in that other “book,” which is nature or the creation*, the human spirit discovers a whole series of perfections (beauty, order, light, and so on) that come from God.

1. Judaism

a) The Hebraic Notion of Name. In the Hebraic notion of shèm, “name*,” Procksch (Theologie des AT 1950) discerns two elements: the noetic and the dynamic. One is its meaning or its etymology, the other implies an archaic conception of the name, which includes a property that might have magical uses.

The name designates the secret nature of a being, without giving a logical definition or symbolic representation of it, and it contains the active presence or power of that being. The name of God*, therefore, contains his mysterious power, and by invoking his name we enter the sphere of mystery* or magic.

b) The Name of Exodus. The just men of the Old Testament wished to know the name of God. “What is your name?” ask Jacob (Gn 32:30) and Manoah (Jgs 13:17) of the angel* of YHWH. But the real meaning of the divine name is given only to Moses. In the theophany* of the burning bush, Moses says to God: “Suppose I go to the Israelites and say to them: ‘The God of your fathers has sent me to you,’ and they ask me: ‘What is his name?’ Then what shall I tell them?” God says to Moses: “I am who I am” (Ex 3:13–14) (see B. N. Wanback, Bib 59 [1978]). On Mount Sinai God reveals himself to Moses as “the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands” (Ex 34:6). God is praised in the Psalms* as the “saint” (Ps 33:21), “true” (Ps 57), “just” (Ps 89), “powerful” (Ps 89), and “merciful” (Ps 136) God. The divine names or attributes are thus revealed.

In Judaism* the name of God is not to be spoken (shèm ha-meforèsh), and God is called “the Place” (maqom) or “the Name” (Shèm) (see ThWNT, vol. 5, 251 ff.). In his letter to Marcella (Ep. 25), Jerome mentions ten biblical names that the Jews used to invoke their Lord.

2. Christianity

a) New Testament. John calls God “Spirit” (Jn 4:24), “Light” (1 Jn 1:5), “Love*” (1 Jn 4:8, 16). But where his Gospel is original is in the revelation* of the three personal divine names: Father*, Son, and Holy* Spirit. Jesus* revealed that “Father” is the true name of God (Jn 17:6; Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6).

b) The Fathers* of the Church* had a threefold motivation in their study of the divine attributes. They wished to teach Christian perfection as the imitation of God (this was the work of Athanasius* and the Cappadocians, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen*); to affirm Christian monotheism* against paganism*; and (in the controversies against Arius and Eunomius) to show the equality of the divine Persons* in the unity of the divine essence. Thus, divine names like “Light” are both names that characterize the divine essence and are common to the three Persons of the Trinity*, and the proper names of the divine Persons that express their relations among themselves and to humankind. Basil*, for example, shows in his Treatise on the Holy Spirit that “God is light,” the Son is the “Light born of the Light” (Nicene Creed*), and the Spirit is the “Light in which we see the Light” (Ps 35:4).

3. Islam

In Islam a celebrated hadith (the authenticity of which has been questioned) says that God has 99 names (100 minus one) and that “whoever keeps them in mind will enter paradise.” From this derives the use of the string of 99 beads (subha, misbaha), each one corresponding to a divine name: God is Existing, Eternal, Unique, Perfect, Living, Omnipotent, Omniscient, Creator, Sovereign, Master of Fates, Just, Certain, Guide, Benevolent, Generous, Indulgent, Friend of Believers, and so on. The one-hundredth name is the supreme Name, the hidden name that God reserves for himself.

Exegesis of the divine names has given rise in Islam to an extensive literature on the meaning of the names, their theological explanation in the framework of the sifat Allah, and their spiritual meditation as practiced by the followers of the tasawwuf. In his Maqсад, Gazali (†505/1111) presents an exegesis of the divine names characterized by “moderate Sufism,” based on the list of Walid (†468/1075), but he points out that both the Koran and the tradition attest to a certain number of other names.

II. Theological Reflection on the Divine Attributes

Philosophers and theologians have sought to ascend from the created perfections to the uncreated perfections of God. Nevertheless, treatises that proposed the divine attributes as objects of contemplation* were late in appearing.

I. The Divine Names by Dionysius the Areopagite

a) Title. In the late fifth or early sixth century the author who wrote under the pseudonym of Dionysius the Areopagite—known now as the Pseudo-Dionysius*—composed a treatise titled Divine Names (Peri theion onomaton) (see DN I, 585 B; XIII, 984 A and MT III, 1033A), in which he explains the names God gives to himself in Scripture*. The title locates this treatise in a whole Neoplatonic tradition. Porphyry had written the treatises, now lost, “On Divine Names” and “On Statues,” and a commentary on Cratylus. The treatise by Jamblicus “On the Gods,” and the one by Theodore of Asinus, “On Names,” have also been lost. The De Mysteriis of Jamblicus, which contains an explanation of divine names (I, 4), has survived.

b) Classification of Divine Names. In chapter III of Mystical Theology, Pseudo-Dionysius situates his Divine Names in relation to lost works (such as the Theological Sketches and Symbolic Theology) and to Mystical Theology, and he characterizes these treatises on the basis of the distinction between affirmative and negative theology*.

Affirmative theology deals with three categories of divine names: 1) Names concerning the single and trine divine nature, the Trinity and the Incarnation* of the Son, that Dionysius had set out in the Theological Sketches (MT 1033 A-B). 2) Intelligible divine names, such as Good* (chap. IV), Being* (chap. V), Life (chap. VI), Wisdom* (chap. VII), Power (chap. VIII), and finally the One (chap. XIII), all explained in Divine Names. 3) Symbolic divine names, that had been treated in Symbolic Theology: “In Symbolic Theology we dealt with the metonymies relating the tangible to the divine, we said what is the meaning in God of forms, figures, parts, and organs; the meaning in God of places and ornaments; the meaning of anger, sorrow, and resentment; the meaning of enthusiasm and intoxication; the meaning of oaths, curses, sleep, and waking, and all the forms with which divine sanctity is clothed to give it a face” (MT 1033 A-B).

Divine names thus have to do with the divine nature, its intelligible attributes, and the metonymies or metaphors that attribute to God human actions or passions*. God is both anonymous (DN 593 D) and polyonymous (DN 596 A), following the first two hypotheses of Parmenides: anonymous and ineffable in his absolute transcendence, polyonymous insofar as he may be glorified through the multiplicity of beings that proceed from and participate in him. God is known through both affirmative and negative theology. One follows the order of divine procession (proodos) which descends from the Principle to the lowest ranks of created things, the other follows the order of conversion* (epistrophè) of everything toward the Principle and ascends from what is “the furthest” from God to God himself. At the conclusion of this ascent we penetrate into the Darkness which is beyond the intelligible, and there is no longer merely concision but an absence of language, a total cessation of speech and of thought. God is the ineffable, like the One of Parmenides: “It is not named or spoken of, not an object of opinion or of knowledge, not perceived by any creature” (Parmenides).

c) Structure of the Divine Names. In the treatise divine names are organized following the fundamental distinction between 1) “the names suitable for divine realities” (DN 596 D); and 2) “the names derived from the operations of his providence*” (596 D). Dionysius gives the name “causative qualities” to “the Good, the Beautiful, Being, the Life-Giving, the Wise, and all those denominations that the Cause receives from the gifts that are fitting to his goodness” (640 B). With reference to the pairs of opposed categories in Parmenides, he makes it clear that these are “effigies” or “simulacra” (909 B) and, at the beginning of chapter X, that the “Omnipotent” and the “Ancient of Days” are “names that concern the procession (proodos) from the principle to the end” (937 B), which is also true of Peace*.

The divine names are the Good, Goodness, Beauty, and Love (chap. IV), Being (chap. V), Life (chap. VI), Wisdom, Intellect (chap. VII), Power, Justice*, Salvation*, Inequality (chap. VIII), Greatness, Smallness, Identity, Diversity, Resemblance, Difference, Rest, Movement, Equality (chap. IX), Time* and Eternity* (chap. X), Peace (chap. XI), Holy of Holies, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, God of Gods (chap. XII), the One (chap. XIII).

2. Thomas Aquinas

a) Commentary on Divine Names. Thomas* Aquinas wrote Expositiones super Dionysium de divinis Nominibus (Pera) around 1260–61 (according to Walz) or 1265–66 (according to Pera). His commentary is the last of the major Western commentaries on Divine Names, after those of Jean Sarrazin, Robert Grosseteste, and Albert* the Great. He transposed Dionysius into the Scholastic* world, while Dionysius became, through quotations from his works, one of the three most important writers in the Thomist synthesis.

b) Treatise of Divine Names in the Summa Theologica. Thomas Aquinas takes up the question of divine names in Summa Theologica Ia, q. 13, where he studies the relationship between divine names and divine essence and sets out his theory of analogy* with reference to the knowledge* of God. Indeed, all of questions 3 through 13 (q. 3: simplicity*, q. 4: the perfection of God, q. 5: the Good, q. 6: Goodness, q. 7: infinity, q. 8: the existence of God in things, q. 9: immutability*, q. 10: eternity, q. 11: unity, q. 12: knowledge of God, and q. 13: the divine names) in which he discusses divine perfections, make up a treatise on divine names within the Summa Theologica.

The question of divine names poses two problems with reference to the relationship between divine attributes and the divine essence. On the one hand there is the problem of the mode of attribution of divine attributes to the divine essence, on the other the problem of the multiplicity of divine attributes and the unity or simplicity of the essence. For Thomas, divine attributes on the one hand characterize (substantialiter) (Ia, q. 13, a. 2, resp.) the divine essence. But on the other, the distinction between the multiplicity of divine names and the simplicity of the essence is only a distinction of reason*. Thus, the Thomist doctrine of the predication of divine attributes and of analogy undermines agnosticism* and lays a foundation for the knowledge of God.

c) The Three Ways. Following Dionysius, Thomas distinguishes three ways of knowing God: the affirmative way, the negative way, and the way of eminence. The affirmative way names God on the basis of created perfections, the negative way excludes any limit to created perfections when it affirms them of God, and the way of eminence affirms that God eminently possesses in himself all the qualities or perfections of created beings. The resemblance between created beings and Creator makes it possible to attribute the perfections of the created to the Creator by analogy, but these qualities fit him so imperfectly that, when they are applied to God, their limitations must be denied. This is knowledge of God through negation. And because the divine essence cannot be known in itself, God remains ineffable.

An anonymous opusculum attributed to Thomas, De Divinis Moribus, which deals principally with divine attributes in relation to created beings, asks the Christian to imitate divine perfections.

III. Spiritual Contemplation of Divine Attributes

Along with theological reflection on divine names, there has also been extensive reflection of a more properly spiritual kind on the attributes of God, or the divine perfections. In the De perfectione Gregory* of Nyssa defines Christian perfection on the basis of the “names of Christ*.” Augustine* remarks that, according to Plato, the wise man is he who knows and imitates God and whose happiness is participation in divine qualities (City of God I. VII. chap. V), and he opens the first book both of the Soliloquies (I. c.1. 2–6) and the Confessions with an elevation on the names of God: “Who then are you, my God? What, I ask, but God who is Lord?” (Confessions I. iv. 4).

In his De Consideratione (I. V) Bernard* of Clairvaux implies a method for the “consideration” of the divine perfections. The Monologion of Anselm* is a speculative and emotional meditation on the divine attributes and the divine persons. God is the Sovereign Being; from this principle Anselm deduces all the perfections that are fitting to his divinity. Finally, in the De triplici via, Bonaventure* establishes a relationship between the divine names and the three ways, purgative, illuminative, and unitive. He locates the meditation on the divine attributes in the unitive way, as was also done by Garcia de Cisneros, in his Exercitatorium spirituale, and by Ignatius Loyola, in the fourth week of his Spiritual Exercises.

In the 16th century Teresa of Avila recommended to her nuns that they think of the attributes of God at the moment of beginning their prayers: “Oh Supreme Dominator... Bottomless Abyss of wonders! Beauty that enfolds all beauties! Strength that is strength itself! Oh God! Why do I not have all the eloquence, all the wisdom of mortals, to be able to set forth... a single one of those many attributes that reveal to us some little bit of that supreme Master, our supreme Good! (The Path of Perfection chap. 22). And, in the third stanza of the “Living Flame,” John* of the Cross compares the divine names to “lamps of fire” (lámparas de fuego), which give to the soul* a “warmth of love.” In the Contemplatio ad amorem Ignatius Loyola meditates on the divine names, which are like “rays coming down from the sun,” or like “waters flowing from the spring” (Exercises no. 237).

Turning to the 17th century, in 1620 the Jesuit Leonard Lessius published a treatise in Antwerp, De perfectionibus moribusque divinis, and then in 1640, and in Brussels, a treatise entitled Divine Names. He distinguishes between absolute attributes, which belong to God alone, and relative attributes, which concern created beings as well (e.g., providence and justice). He provides a logical division of the 14 divine attributes (infinity, immensity, immutability, eternity, omnipotence, wisdom, goodness of the divine being, sanctity, kindness, sovereign rule, providence, mercy, justice, last things) to which all the others are connected. This is why his treatise is divided into 14 books. His method of meditation is both speculative and emotional.

Jean-Jacques Olier composed an unpublished treatise on the divine attributes, in which he distinguishes 19 divine attributes, almost all unrelated to created beings: the existence of God, his necessity, his independence, his sufficiency, his unity, his truth, his perfection, his infinity, his simplicity, his sanctity, his greatness, his immensity, his eternity, his knowledge, his love, his will, his goodness, his justice, and his strength. He sets forth a method “for praying about the divine attributes.” In prayer, the soul “communes” with these divine attributes: “This contemplation [of the divine attributes] sets the soul in perfection. For, as these attributes are the perfections of God, the soul coming to commune with God and with his divine perfections, enters at the same time into sublime perfection” (vol. I).

Jean Eudes sets out this same doctrine in his Entretiens intérieurs de l’âme chrétienne avec son Dieu: “O my God, I give myself entirely to you: inscribe in me a perfect image of your sanctity and your divine perfections” (Entretien V).

It was probably Cardinal Bérulle’s “devotion” to the divine attributes, as expressed in his Grandeurs de Jésus, that prompted Bossuet to write his Élévations sur Dieu, sur son unité et ses perfections. Fénelon also wrote a Traité de l’existence et des attributs de Dieu. In it he establishes the existence of all the divine attributes by the fact that God is Being: “When I say of the infinite being that he is simply Being, and nothing more, I have said everything. . . . Being is his essential name, glorious, incommunicable, ineffable” (chap. V).

- C. Toussaint (1903), “Attributs divins,” DThC 1, 2223–35.
- P. Pourrat (1937), “Attributs divins,” DSp 1, Paris, 1078–98.
- R. Criado (1950), El valor dinámico del Nombre divino en el Antiguo Testamento, Granada.
- A.-M. Besnard (1962), Le mystère du Nom, LeDiv 35.
- J. Auer (1978), Gott der Eine und Dreieine, KKD 2, 356–580.
- G. Scholem (1983), Le Nom et les symboles de Dieu dans la mystique juive, Paris.
- D. Gimaret (1988), Les noms divins en Islam, Paris.
- E. R. Wierenga (1989), The Nature of God: An Inquiry into Divine Attributes, Ithaca-London.
- J. Werbick (1995), “Eigenschaften Gottes,” LThK 3, 528–29.

YSABEL DE ANDIA

See also Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite; Eternity of God; Jealousy, Divine; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Negative Theology; Omnipresence, Divine; Simplicity, Divine

Augustine of Hippo

Among the Fathers* of the Church, Augustine (354–430) left the largest body of work (more than 800 sermons, some 300 letters, and 100 treatises), in which he deals with all the fundamental problems of theology*. His life is also the best known. Not only did he write the Confessions, which, although not an autobiography, contains autobiographical elements, but he also had a biographer in the person of his friend Possidius, bishop* of Calama. To this may be added the information he himself provides in the Philosophical Dialogues, the Retractations, sermons, and letters.

1. Life

From all these documents it is evident that the whole of his subsequent life was marked by his experience* of conversion*. This did not take place on a single occasion but lasted for 14 years, and it represented a clear dividing line in his existence. Before his conversion Augustine led a life that was quite conventional for his period, and in particular had a brilliant career as a teacher of rhetoric. Born in the small town of Thagaste (present-day Souk-Ahras in Algeria) on 13 November 354 to a middle-class family, Augustine soon distinguished himself by his intellectual qualities. From 365 he was a student of rhetoric in Madauros, but for lack of resources he returned to Thagaste for a year. In 370 his father, Patricius, sent him to Carthage to continue his education, thanks to the support of Romanianus, a family friend. He became an outstanding rhetorician, seeking honors and pleasure. He soon chose to cohabit with a woman of an inferior class, whom he consequently did not marry, although she bore him a son, Adeodatus.

At the conclusion of his studies, before beginning to teach in Thagaste in 372, he read the Hortensius “by a certain Cicero.” The book provoked such turmoil in him that it marked a turning point in his life (Confessions III. iv. 7–8). This was the first step toward the discovery of God*, interior intimo meo et superior summo meo, the first moment of his conversion. Not only did Augustine move from rhetoric to philosophy*, but more deeply, he discovered Wisdom* and was led to read the Bible*. He was disappointed, however, to find that it did not display the stylistic qualities of Cicero.

Yet his thirst for truth* persisted, which explains why he became an adherent of Manicheism* and remained one for 10 years. An auditor, he hoped to be initiated into the mysteries as one of the Elect, and in doing so to replace faith* with reason*. But his encounter with Faustus of Mileu (in 382–83), who was reputed to be a most learned Manichean, made him realize that Manicheism was far from providing the key to all mysteries and that it was in fact contrary to rationalism* (Confessions V. vi. 10–vii. 13). Augustine therefore gradually distanced himself from it. In 384 his appointment as a teacher of rhetoric in Milan, although supported by the Manicheans, allowed him to break definitively with the group.

It was then that he met Ambrose*, whom he appreciated for his human qualities and his preaching*. Introduced by Simplicianus, friend and successor of Ambrose, to the reading of the Libri Platoniorum, he experienced a genuine intellectual conversion (Confessions VII. x. 16–xxi. 27). It cannot be determined with certainty whether these books were those of Plotinus or of Porphyry, or both. In any event, they oriented Augustine toward inwardness and led him to recognize the creative role of God. But by themselves they were not enough, and Augustine explains: “Unless I had sought your way in Christ* our Savior, I would not have been expert but expunged” (Confessions VII. xx. 26).

However, his reading of the Epistles of Paul in July 386 (Confessions VII. xxi. 27) still did not bring about his decision to ask for baptism*. To overcome his hesitations he required the example of the conversion of the rhetor Marius Victorinus (Confessions VII. ii. 3–iv. 9), the evocation of the life of the hermits of Trier (Confessions VIII. vi. 13–vii. 18), and above all the episode of the garden in Milan (Confessions VIII. xii. 28–30), where the conversion of his will was accomplished. He gave up his position as teacher of rhetoric and withdrew with a few friends to Cassiciacum, near Milan, to devote himself to prayer* and philosophical dialogue. On Easter night 387 he was baptized by Ambrose in Milan, along with his son Adeodatus and his friend Alypius. He stayed a while in Cassiciacum and then decided to return to Africa. Before embarking and after his celebrated ecstatic experience in Ostia (Confessions IX. x. 23–25), his mother Monica departed this life.

On his return to Thagaste in 388 Augustine organized a more structured community known as “the servants of God,” and avoided all cities that had vacant bishoprics. However, after the death of Adeodatus, he agreed to go to Hippo “to see a friend whom [he] hoped to turn toward God. . . . [He] was not worried, because there was a bishop. But [he] was seized, made a priest*, and that led [him] finally to become a bishop” (Sermon 355. 1).

In fact, Bishop Valerius, who was aged and knew little Latin, asked during a liturgical service for assistance from a priest. Augustine, who was unexpectedly present, was literally overcome by the crowd and led to the bishop. More than reticent because of his monastic commitment and what he considered his lack of preparation, he secured a delay, but was ordained in 391. Better educated than most of his colleagues, he pursued his conversion and devoted himself to the study of Scripture*. He was soon called upon to defend the faith against Donatism* and Manicheism, from which came his celebrated debate with the Manichean, Fortunatus, on 28 September 392. Valerius also helped him to establish a monastery in Hippo. Recognizing his abilities, Valerius almost immediately asked him to take on quasi-episcopal functions and had him preach on faith and the creed at the Council* of Hippo on 8 October 393.

In 395 he was consecrated coadjutor of Hippo, so that he might remain in that church. Then, on the death of Valerius in 395 or 396, he became titular bishop. Although Augustine was a contemplative, a renewal of conversion led him to agree to assume pastoral duties, including service and preaching*. He devoted himself wholeheartedly to these tasks, following the well-known maxim, "For you, I am a bishop; with you, I am a Christian" (Sermon 340). He was solicitous toward everyone, and particularly concerned for the cohesion of his community, threatened as this was by various heresies*, among which Pelagianism was noteworthy from 412 on. On this account he was reluctant to leave Hippo, but was brought to do so in order to participate in various councils, where he often played a decisive role. He thus traveled throughout North Africa.

In addition to the many works he wrote in this period, the Letters, discovered in 1975 by Johannes Divjak, and the Sermons, found in the Mainz library in 1990 by François Dolbeau, provide a better idea of his activity during these years. As a bishop who was also a monk, Augustine felt sorrow at his distance from the men with whom he had led a life in common in the monastery of Hippo: Alypius, Possidius, Evodius, and Profuturus, all of whom had become bishops. He nevertheless maintained a firm friendship with them, which contributed to the unity* of the African Church in a context made difficult by many heresies and by the fall of Rome*. It was in these circumstances that Augustine wrote The City of God and the Retractations. The latter represents a unique book in the history of thought. In it, Augustine takes up all his works one by one, providing correctives and additions. This was on the eve of his death, which occurred on 28 August 430, in a Hippo besieged by the Vandals.

2. Anthropology

Whereas Books I to IX of the Confessions constitute an important biographical source, Books X to XIII lay out the broad outlines of Augustine's anthropology. The Confessions (from the Latin verb confiteor) designate in fact a threefold confession: avowal of past sins, confession of faith, and thanksgiving for creation*, in which his anthropology is articulated.

In focusing solely on his writings concerning the Pelagian controversy and taking these out of context, or on the Jansenist* reinterpretation of his work, commentators have often criticized Augustine for propounding a pessimistic anthropology. This component exists, but it comes late in his work, dating from the years around 415. It derives from the requirements of a particular polemic, and therefore calls for a nuanced reading. In fact, Augustinian anthropology is resolutely optimistic and is defined on the basis of the schema: creatio, conversio, formatio. Furthermore, this schema is constant, even though it was masked by other questions in the course of the Pelagian polemic.

a) The Schema: Creatio, Conversio, Formatio. Augustine was made aware very early of the need to develop a solid anthropology. Having discovered through Ambrose's preaching the spiritual dimension of the image of God in the human person, he was thereby able to refute the Manicheans on this point (De Genesi contra manicheos) and to deepen the notion of the relationship between Creator and created being. But Augustine did not stop with a simple reflection on the image of God. He situated it at its point of emergence in the text of Genesis and, in the course of exercising his duties as bishop, he commented five times on the first chapters of that book (De Genesi contra manicheos, De Genesi ad litteram liber imperfectus, Confessions XI-XIII, De Genesi ad litteram, City of God XI). In doing so he proposed a theological ontology and a spiritual anthropology, and dealt with fundamental questions: "Who made created beings? How and why?" (City of God XI. 21).

Creation holds a central place in his commentary. In opposition to the Manicheans, he emphasizes its goodness and interprets it as the gift of being*. But, whereas all other beings are perfect according to their kind, man has an intermediate position (Letter XVIII): according to the inclination of his heart, he fulfills or destroys himself, and from this comes the decisive role of conversion.

As one who was strongly influenced by the Neoplatonic notion of conversion, and who went through the experience of conversion throughout his life, Augustine frequently emphasizes its necessity for the fulfillment of being (Confessions XIII. ii. 3). It is through conversion that "the created being takes form and becomes a perfect being" (De Genesi ad litteram I. iv. 9). Angels*, which for Augustine represent perfect creation, give an idea of this: "Turned from his unformed nature toward God who formed him, the angelic creature is created and formed" (De Genesi ad litteram III. xx. 31). Conversion and formatio are simultaneous for angels, while for human beings there is a gap between the two.

By the term formatio, a variant of forma difficult to translate, Augustine designates the fulfillment of being, which he expresses chiefly with the metaphors of illumination and rest in God, which goes some way toward evoking deification, in which freedom* and grace* act in concert.

b) Freedom and Grace, or the Echo of the Pelagian Polemic. The problem of the relationship between freedom and grace took on its full importance during the course of the Pelagian polemic. But from the moment of his conversion, as he was reiterating: “You converted me to yourself” (Confessions VIII. xii. 30), Augustine was aware of the synergy between freedom and grace. Although he stressed grace during the controversy, he nevertheless did not underestimate the role of freedom, as he explains in the Retractationes II. 37): “In my book The Spirit and the Letter, I violently combated the enemies of the grace of God,” that is, the Pelagians. He goes on (II. 42): “The book in which I answered Pelagius to defend grace and not to attack nature*, which is bestowed and governed by grace, is called Nature and Grace.” In fact he had no intention of calling nature into question. He simply wanted to show that, in itself, nature is nothing, and that the role of God is central. One particular form of Augustinianism, by radicalizing his positions, was to distort them.

Analogously, due to an erroneous exegesis of Paul (Rom 5:12) that he based on the inaccurate translation of the Vetus Latina, as well as to his polemical intentions, Augustine came to an excessively rigid position on the question of original sin* and infant baptism. If the context of all this is ignored, there is a danger of misinterpreting Augustine’s thought. It is important to see, as he explains in the Enchiridion, that he understands everything in the light of the new creation.

Moreover, Augustine simultaneously emphasizes the place of freedom and states that “he who has created you without you does not justify you without you: he has created someone who was not conscious, he does not justify someone without that person’s consent” (Sermon 169. 11).

Through grace, “free will is not removed but helped” (Letter 157. 2). Finally, Augustine comes to a very balanced vision of the relationship between freedom and grace, as evinced, for example, in his book The Spirit and the Letter (III. 5) and in Sermon 26. Polemic leads him into certain excesses, but his intention is to foreground the role of the Holy Spirit, as he does much more serenely in De Trinitate.

3. Trinitarian Theology

De Trinitate is an account of his meditation on the Trinity*. Augustine did not wish to publish it, but resigned himself to doing so around 426, after the first 12 books had been stolen from him and published without his knowledge. He did not purport to present a systematic exposition of the Trinity but an expression of his thinking, which he might continue to develop and deepen, as he had already done in Sermon 52. The book had an influence that he did not foresee and lastingly marked Western Trinitarian theology. Having read all the works on the Trinity that were extant at the time, Augustine in fact broached all basic questions pertaining to the subject: the relationship between the unity of essence and the Trinity of Persons*, circumcession*, the creative Trinity, and Trinitarian analogies*.

a) The Trinity: A Mystery of Love. From the moment of his conversion, Augustine attempted to understand the mystery* of God. He was soon absorbed by its dynamics, which is nothing other than Trinitarian love* (De Trinitate XV. ii. 3). His thinking, therefore, was not merely speculative, but also spiritual and mystical*. Some of his works—De Trinitate, On John’s Gospel, On John’s Epistle, and the Regulus—bring together themes that he was the first to treat in terms of their interrelationship. In all these books Augustine points out that charity is the basis of intellectual, spiritual, and community life, and he advocates a welcoming attitude in order to penetrate the mystery of love that God is. As he explains in the On John’s Gospel (76. 4): “The Father*, the Son*, and the Holy Spirit come to us when we go toward them; they come to offer us their help, and we offer them our obedience. They come to illuminate us as we contemplate, they come to fill us as we welcome them.” An exchange, a constantly renewed gift on the part of the Trinity is then accomplished, and we are introduced into the life of the Trinity.

Augustine also repeats an image, that of the cor unum of the first community of Jerusalem*, in order to express the life of the Trinity (On John’s Gospel 14. 9). Therein lies the entire mystery of the unity of the Trinity, a theme he develops extensively in De Trinitate. The creator of this unity is none other than the Holy Spirit. “When this Spirit, God of God, gives Himself to man, He inflames him with the love of God and of his neighbor, because He is Love. Man can love God only through God” (De Trinitate XV. xvii. 31). He thereby enters into this mystery of love and can love as the Father loves the Son, or as the Son loves the Father, or be love as the Holy Spirit is love, and live the life that is given to him by the Trinity. De Trinitate attempts to give an account of this very dynamism, which accounts for the structure of the work.

b) Two Books. Augustine begins with two books: Scripture and creation. In a first stage, corresponding to the first seven books of De Trinitate, he tries to define the nature of the Trinity as it appears in Scripture. Against the Sabellians, he first affirms the unity and equality of the Trinity, then he studies the distinctive mission of each Person of the Trinity in order to show that there is not subordination but equality among them. Thereafter, he rereads the theophanies* of the Old Testament to determine whether they evoke the Trinity. Having to engage in polemics with resurgent Arianism*, he recalls the divinity of Christ* and emphasizes Christology* and the mystery of the Incarnation*. In Books V and VII he proposes a specifically Trinitarian vocabulary. However, he soon sees that words are inadequate to speak of the Trinity. “What are these three?” To be sure, we do speak of three persons, but the term is only approximate, because the divine Persons are infinitely more than human persons (De Trinitate VII. iv. 7). Augustine does not go beyond a formal definition of person, but he prepares the way for further developments by Boethius*, Richard of Saint*-Victor, and Thomas* Aquinas.

Augustine gradually realizes, however, that the study of Scripture and a rational procedure do not allow him to go any further in his investigation. He therefore adopts a different perspective in Books VIII through XV. He no longer considers the Trinity in itself, but envisions it from the viewpoint of the human being, created in its image. He is then led to introduce what may be called Trinitarian analogies, which establish a link between anthropology and Trinitarian theology. The principal analogy, of the lover, the beloved, and the love, derives from his meditation on the Trinity. In Augustine’s view it characterizes the Trinity in itself, which is conceived as a circulation of love among the divine Persons, each Person being established in its being by the loving gaze of the other. The other analogies—the soul*, knowledge, and love (IX); memory, intelligence, and will (X); memory, inner vision, and will (XI)—refer only to the human being and have sometimes been defined as psychological. They are influenced by Neoplatonism, particularly by Porphyry, but Augustine proposes them merely as hypotheses and never as trinities in themselves. He applies them to the soul, insofar as it is created in the image of the Trinity (which Porphyry did not say), and attempts thereby to show that, although the Trinity may be inaccessible in itself, it is on the other hand accessible by taking as a point of departure its expression in the human person. Moreover, in Books XIV and XV he studies an important point: the renewal of he who is created in the image, a renewal that is accomplished in the image of the Trinity and which constitutes the human being as a subject. “We will then be transformed,” he writes, “that is, we will pass from one form to another, from the obscure to the luminous form. For the obscure form is already an image of God and thereby of His glory*... This nature, the noblest of created things, once purified of its impiety by its creator, leaves its deformed form to become a beautiful form” (De Trinitate XV. viii. 14).

Here he reiterates the reflections he had developed in his commentaries on Genesis. In Book XV he also considers the procession of the Spirit and sets out the preliminary elements for a theology of the Filioque. But when he comes to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and from the Son, it is the result of his investigation and not simply a dogmatic assertion.

4. The Two Cities

Another work by Augustine, published in the same period (c. 427), although it was begun in 412, had a great influence on later thought: The City of God. As in De vera religione, Augustine propounds an apologia for the true faith, the faith that leads to beatitude*. “Two loves have made two cities: love of self going as far as contempt for God has engendered the earthly city, love of God driven as far as contempt for the self has engendered the heavenly city” (XIV. 28). Augustine had long reflected on the theme of the two cities. It is found as early as De vera religione, De catechizandis rudibus, and De Genesi ad litteram, before being theorized in The City of God on the basis of a refutation of paganism* (I-X) and an affirmation of Christianity (XI-XXII). But the interpretation of the theme is difficult and has given rise to many controversies. One can no doubt see an opposition between Rome and the heavenly Jerusalem in the choice of civitas for the title of the work: it was written shortly after the fall of Rome and, while strongly marked by that event, intended to show that it was not the end of history*.

However, we should not be too hasty in assimilating the City of God to the Church*, as writers in the 19th century tended to do. Augustine begins rather with the parable* of the wheat and the chaff in order to situate these two realities. The Church has a central place in the thought of Augustine the pastor* of souls. He defines it as the mystical body of Christ, or even as Christ in his entirety, whose soul is the Holy Spirit (Sermon 267. 4). He develops his ecclesiology* principally in response to Donatism*, and in the light of the mystery of the Incarnation. He also points out that the Church presupposes communion* in faith, the sacraments*, and love, and that outside the Church there is no salvation*. This last point, however, needs some qualification, because Augustine is not referring here to the hierarchical church but to the Church understood as the community of the just, of both the Old and the New Covenant*. His perspective is thus much less restrictive than might have appeared at first sight. In fact, the City of God that he evokes is in some sense the city of which Scripture speaks. Its goal is beatitude, the eternal Sabbath* in which “we will rest and we will see; we will see and we will love; we will love and we will praise,” and in this we can see a link between the City of God and Augustinian eschatology*.

Moreover, Books XIX through XXII of The City of God are concerned with the final ends of the two cities and thus develop essential themes of Augustine's work, present from the earliest Dialogues: friendship, happiness, and peace*. These themes are supplemented, as in the works of the other Fathers of the Church, with a long reflection on the Resurrection* and salvation, interpreted in terms of the accomplishment of the six ages of the world*, which are understood as repeating the six days of Genesis and procuring beatitude and eternal rest.

Influenced by Porphyry, Augustine also presents in the work a theology of history, which to some degree reiterates and develops the celebrated reflection on time* that he had presented in Book XI of the Confessions.

Genius of the West, "doctor* of grace," Augustine left a considerable body of work, fragments of which are still being discovered, which strongly influenced the Latin Middle Ages. He was also the "doctor of charity," not only because of his famous maxim, "Love and do what you will," but also and especially because of the place he gives to charity, both in friendship, which was the very heart of his life, and in his pastoral duties and his spiritual* and communal life, of which it was the wellspring.

• Complete works: Mauristes, Paris, 1679–1700.

PL 32–46.

In addition: G. Morin (1930), Sermones post Maurinos reperti, Rome.

Letters 1–29, found by J. Divjak, BAUG 46B.

A. d'Hippone: Vingt-six sermons au peuple d'Afrique, Ed. F. Dolbeau, Paris, 1996.

Partial works: CSEL, CChr.SL, BAUG (with translation).

Possidius, Vita Augustini, text and Italian trans. by M. Pellegrino, Rome, 1955.

♦ L. S. Le Nain de Tillemont (1710), Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles, vol. 13, Paris.

J. Mausbach (1906), Die Ethik des heiligen Augustinus, Fribourg.

M. Heidegger (1921), Augustinus und der Neuplatonismus, in GA 60, Phänomenologie des religiösen Lebens, 1995, 160–300.

B. Roland-Gosselin (1925), La morale de saint Augustin, Paris.

H. Arendt (1929), Der Liebesbegriff bei Augustinus: Versuch einer philosophischen Interpretation, Berlin.

É. Gilson (1929), Introduction à l'étude de saint Augustin, Paris.

H.-I. Marrou (1938), Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris.

"Bulletin augustinien," Ath (1940–51), AthA (1951–54) and REAug (1955–).

P. Courcelle (1950), Recherches sur les Confessions de saint Augustin, Paris.

F. Masai (1961), "Les conversions de saint Augustin et les débuts du spiritualisme en Occident," RMAL 67, 1–40.

T. J. van Bavel (1963), Répertoire bibliographique de saint Augustin, 1950–1960, Steenbrugge.

G. Bonner (1963), St. Augustine of Hippo: Life and Controversies, London (repr. 1986).

A.-M. La Bonnardière (1965), Recherches de chronologie augustinienne, Paris.

P. Brown (1967), Augustine of Hippo, a Biography, London.

L. Verheijen (1967), La règle de saint A., I-II, Paris.

A. Mandouze (1968), L'aventure de la raison et de la grâce, Paris.

O. Perler (1969), Les voyages de saint Augustin, Paris.

R. A. Markus (1970), Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine, Cambridge.

G. K. Hall, et al. (1972), Augustine Bibliography, Boston (repr. 1981).

A. Trapé (1976), San Agostino: L'uomo, il pastore, il mistico (2nd Ed. 1988).

P. P. Verbraken (1976), Études critiques sur les sermons authentiques de saint Augustin, Steenbrugge.

A. Schindler (1979), "Augustin/Augustinismus I," TRE 4, 646–98.

K. Flasch (1980, 1994), Augustin: Einführung in sein Denken, Stuttgart.

O. O'Donovan (1980), The Problem of Self-Love in St. Augustine, New Haven-London.

L. Verheijen (1980–88), Nouvelles approches de la Règle de saint Augustin, Paris.

H. Chadwick (1986), Augustine, Oxford.

C. Mayer (Ed.) (1986–94), Aug(L), vol. I.

G. Madec (1989), La patrie et la voie, Paris.

C. Mayer, K. H. Celius (Ed.) (1989), Internationale Symposium über den Stand der Augustinus Forschung, Würzburg.

M.-A. Vannier (1991), Creatio, conversio, formatio chez saint A., Fribourg (2nd Ed. 1996).

J. Wetzel (1992), Augustine and the Limits of Virtue, Cambridge.

B. Studer (1993), Gratia Christi: Gratia Dei bei Augustinus von Hippo, Rome.

G. Madec (1994), Petites études augustinienes, Paris.

J. Rist (1995), Augustine: Ancient Thought Baptized, 2nd Ed., Cambridge.

R. A. Markus (1996), "A.," DEPhM, 101–8.

B. Stock (1996), Augustine the Reader: Meditation, Self-Knowledge, and the Ethics of Interpretation, Cambridge, Mass.-London (2nd Ed. 1998).

G. Madec (1998), Le Dieu d'Augustin, Paris.

MARIE-ANNE VANNIER

See also Augustinianism; Catechesis; Monasticism; Platonism, Christian; Political Theology

Augustinianism

“It was not always the best part of Saint Augustine* that in fact exercised the deepest or at least the most visible influence; the task set for us is thus easy to define: constantly to appeal from Augustinianism in all its forms to Saint Augustine himself” (Marrou 1955).

It is much more difficult to analyze the notion of Augustinianism, which covers a long history and is extremely complex. It is vague and, like many other “-isms,” easily carries a pejorative connotation, all the more so because there is only one noun to designate both Augustinian quality and Augustinist defect. E. Portalié (1903) distinguishes between: 1) Augustinianism, the doctrine of the Order of Hermits of Saint Augustine on grace* (2485); and 2) Augustinism, which “either designates in a general manner the totality of Augustine’s doctrines, or even the particular philosophical spirit which animates them; or, more particularly, his system of thought insofar as it considers the action of God*, grace, and liberty*” (2501). F. Cayré (1951) makes a number of subdistinctions: 1) historical Augustinianism, which is “the entirety of the doctrine of Saint Augustine as it appears in his work”; 2) contemporary, official Augustinianism, which is “the entirety of doctrines on grace which have since antiquity stamped the action of Saint Augustine and have entered into the common teaching of the church*”; 3) partial Augustinianisms, “particular aspects of the thought of Saint Augustine, emphasized at various times” (about 10); 4) great Augustinianism, an “ordered synthesis of the thought of Saint Augustine, not only on grace, but on the totality of Christian doctrine and on the principles that insure its vitality as evidenced by the persistence of its action; and 5) false Augustinianisms: predestinationism, Protestantism*, Jansenism*, and ontologism* (317–24). We will confine ourselves here to a brief and inevitably incomplete attempt at discernment: first, of the Augustinian spirit during Augustine’s own lifetime and then during a period of calm acceptance; and second, of the Augustinist crises that have occurred over the course of 15 centuries on the question of grace and predestination* and on the theory of knowledge.

I. The Augustinian Spirit

I. During Augustine’s Lifetime

a) Augustine’s doctrinal activity was in no way aimed at establishing a personal system. It was directed toward an understanding of faith* (following the principle, Crede ut intelligas, that was adopted by Anselm*), in and for the African Christian communities, through interpretation of the Holy* Scriptures, which contain Christian doctrine (the theme of De doctrina christiana).

b) But this interpretation was strongly influenced by the event of Augustine’s conversion* and the ensuing spiritual experience*. Three fundamental values can be discerned:

- 1) Interiority, the Deus interior intimo meo et superior summo meo (Confessions III. vi. 10), the discovery of the purely spiritual nature of God and of the soul*, thanks to the books of the Platonists; a theme deepened in the meditation on memory (Confessions X) and on Trinitarian spirituality (De Trinitate VIII–XV).
- 2) Community, incorporation into the Church through baptism*, but also the common life of brothers and then of the clergy*, based on the ideal of the apostolic community of Jerusalem* (Acts 4:32–35: cor unum et anima una), ideal form of the Church and prefiguration of the City of God. This practice of common life, following the Rule of Augustine, was continued in two families, the regular Canons and the Order (of Hermits) of Saint Augustine (O.[H.] S.A.)
- 3) The absolute primacy of God’s grace: the merciful kindness of God toward Augustine, experienced in his conversion. In 396–97, Simplicianus (Ambrose*’s successor as bishop of Milan) provoked Augustine to a profound meditation on chapters 7 and 9 of The Epistle to the Romans, after which he understood that the grace of God anticipates any human initiative, including belief and desire. Composed shortly thereafter and marked by this discovery, the Confessions contain the germ of the Pelagian controversy. Pelagius was scandalized by Augustine’s prayer: “Grant what you command, and command what you will” (Confessions X. xxix. 40).

c) At the same time, in concert with Aurelius (†432), bishop of Carthage and primate of Africa, Augustine played the role of theological expert in the Catholic episcopate of Africa, an honor that his colleagues obviously did not contest. To the many requests that were made of him he responded with thousands of sermons, hundreds of letters, and about a hundred books.

d) The controversies he provoked (Manicheanism*, Donatism*, Pelagianism*) themselves arose from his pastoral activity and were made necessary because of the various religious antagonisms with which African Christendom was afflicted. The controversial works are peremptory retorts that mercilessly refute the opposing argument point by point, using the techniques of legal dispute. They should not be and should not have been exploited (sometimes in a simplistic way) in any process of dogmatization (dogma*) of Christianity. In contrast, the great works of reflection (Confessions, De Genesi ad litteram, De Trinitate) are meditative and questioning, not at all inclining toward dogmatism.

e) In fact, after 40 years of service, Augustine had covered the entire field of Christian doctrine: God, the Trinity*, Christ* and salvation, the Church as Christus totus, the sacraments*, sin*, grace and predestination, personal and community spiritual life*—all without the slightest trace of a system. He certainly did not wish to establish an or the Augustinianism, but rather to pursue the defense and illustration of Christian truth*.

2. Calm Acceptance

a) Latin Christendom was to find in this body of occasional if not disparate works what might well be called its theological common property, incorporating in coherent form all the elements of Christian culture: philosophy*, theology*, law*, spirituality, mysticism*. And this was quickly recognized, as witnessed by the legend of the “portrait” of the old Lateran library dating from the sixth century: Diuersi diuersa patres, sed hic omnia dixit, romano eloquio mystica sensa tonans (Marrou 1955: “The various Fathers* of the Church have explained various things, but he alone has said all in Latin, explaining the mysteries* in the thunder of his great voice”).

b) In the sixth century, Caesar of Arles († c. 532) was still making frequent use of Augustine’s sermons and assured their diffusion through the collections he made of them. He did this not because he was some kind of plagiarist, as scholars too often conclude, but for the good of souls. In this he was merely conforming with Augustine’s own practice, since Augustine would habitually prepare sermons that would then be delivered by colleagues who were less gifted at preaching* than he was.

c) With copy after copy pouring forth from monastic scriptoria, the works of Augustine were extraordinarily widely distributed and exercised an incalculable influence on medieval, and especially monastic, spirituality. Homilies, collections of sermons that were read during the night office and later in the dining hall, had become widespread by the seventh century. Augustine’s theme of the restoration of the soul* in the image of God exercised a powerful influence, notably in the 12th century (Javelet 1967). The reception of the works of the Pseudo-Dionysius* did not eclipse that of Augustine by Meister Eckhart (†1327; Courcelle 1963) and among the Rhineland*-Flemish mystics generally. J. Ruusbroec (†1381) was an Augustinian canon in Groenendaal. He was responsible for the conversion of G. Groot (†1384), founder of the Brothers of Common Life and initiator of devotio moderna*, to which Gerson (Jean Charlier †1429) gave theological status. The Confessions was bedside reading for many contemplatives. Teresa of Avila, to cite only one example, saw herself in it as in a mirror (Courcelle 1963).

d) In the ninth century Augustine was considered as “the master, after the apostles*, of all the churches,” according to the testimony of Gottschalk of Orbais (Chatillon 1949), who considered himself an Augustinian in his (disastrous) preaching concerning dual predestination (see II 1 f above). Aside from being condemned by church councils, he was refuted by Duns* Scotus (Madec 1978), who contrasted the Augustinianism of predestination with that of the absolute simplicity* of God, indicating that everything can be found in Augustine. The refutation is worth what it is worth, but it certainly shows that Duns Scotus had a good Augustinian library at his disposal. He later found better arguments in the Greek fathers* of the church and was the first to apply the “law of communicating Platonisms,” in the phrase of E. Gilson (1972), that is, to combine Augustinianism and Dionysianism (Koch 1969).

e) During the “renaissance” of the 11th and 12th centuries, powerful doctrinal personalities such as Anselm of Canterbury, Bernard* of Clairvaux, but also Peter Abelard*, Hugh of Saint*-Victor, and many others, maintained their Augustinian inspiration, each according to his own inclinations and for his own benefit and that of his colleagues. Also in the 12th century, the librarian of the Abbey of Clairvaux gathered a large part of Augustine’s works into a Corpus of 12 volumes. But we can only speculate about the potential readership he had in mind, for there are no superstars in the quiet reading of the works of Augustine.

f) However, Peter Lombard freely mined those works for quotations, which he then put in “theological” order in the four books of the Sentences. They contain 1,423 mentions of Augustine, 4 of Pseudo-Dionysius, 193 of Ambrose, 150 of Jerome, and 139 of Gregory* the Great. Because of this manual, upon which it was obligatory to comment in all schools, basic theology during the major period of Scholasticism* came to be composed of 80 to 90 percent of Augustinian elements, even if these were passed through a Scholastic* filter. There are more than 2,000 quotations of Augustine in the Summa Theologica alone (Elders 1987). “Albert* the Great and Saint Thomas, far from presenting themselves as adversaries of Saint Augustine, as they were reproached for doing, set themselves to learn from him and, while modifying certain theories, introduced and absorbed the entire theology of the Doctor of Hippo. . . . Thus, there was no strictly Augustinian school . . . because all schools were. . . . What disappeared was Augustinianism in too narrow and limited a form, bestowed on it by particular questions then much debated, an Augustinianism that was too Platonic. But great Augustinianism, with its views on God, on divine ideas, on the Trinity, on revelation*, not to mention grace, still holds sway over our minds” (Portalié 1903).

g) The decadence of Scholasticism brought about serious crises, which will be considered in part II. Suffice it to say that these crises were at a point of no return, and it is perhaps useful to recall the judgment of Harnack (1907): “All the major personalities who recreated a new life in the Western church or who purified and deepened piety came, directly or indirectly, from Saint Augustine and were trained in his school.” This is to assert that the “heretics” themselves—Luther*, Calvin*, Baius, Jansenius, and the rest—before becoming “mis-directed Augustinians” (Lubac 1931), wished to be and believed they were good disciples of Augustine.

h) During the period of Christian humanism* there appeared the first editions of the Opera omnia, that of Amebach in Basel in 1506, and that of Erasmus* in 1528–29, also published in Basel and reprinted several times. The edition prepared by the theologians of Louvain, published by Plantin in Antwerp in 1577, also reprinted many times, was in use throughout most of the 17th century (Ceyssens 1982), before there appeared the edition of the Benedictines of Saint-Maur (Paris, 1679–90). This was also the time of the first translations: The City of God by Raoul de Presles, appearing as early as 1486. All of this is evidence of Augustinian vitality.

i) The Great Century in France has also been called “the century of Saint Augustine” (Sellier 1982). If this was the case, it was not only because of the Jansenist controversy. The spirituality of Bérulle, for example, is of Augustinian inspiration. Mersenne, Meslan, and Antoine Arnauld pointed out to Descartes* his affinities with Augustine (Lewis 1954). Pascal* was Augustinian in the Pensées as well as in the Provinciales (Sellier 1970). Father André Martin of the Oratorians (under the pseudonym of Ambrosius Victor), compiled a Philosophia christiana, a clever compilation of extracts from Augustine, which was of much use to another Oratorian, Malebranche. Bossuet was an Augustinian, as was Fénelon in another way, along with so many others that it would be tedious to list them all. Arnauld d’Andilly translated the Confessions; and his brother Antoine Arnauld translated not only the anti-Pelagian writings, but also various short works and the Sermons of Saint Augustine on the Psalms, in seven volumes.

j) After an eclipse, which was perhaps not total, during the Enlightenment and the French Revolution, Augustine gradually regained visibility in the difficult restoration of Christian thought, filtered through the work of Descartes and Malebranche. His presence is real, although ill defined, in traditionalism* (Lammennais, Bautain), in Christian rationalism* (Maine de Biran, Bordas-Dumoulin, Lequier), and in ontologism (Brancereau and Hugonin in France, Ubaghs in Belgium, Rosmini in Italy). It gained force in the work of Father Gratry. (On all these movements, see Foucher 1955.) The Annales de philosophie chrétienne, founded by A. Bonnetty in 1830, also belong to this movement.

In the Oxford Movement, Newman (Apologia pro vita sua) considered Augustine as “the great light of the Western world, who, though not an infallible teacher, shaped the mind of Europe.” Pusey published his own translation of the Confessions as the first volume of the Oxford Library of the Fathers. In Germany we must at least mention the school of Tübingen, the work of J. A. Möhler, as well as the Summa of J. Kleutgen, S.J., Theologie . . . and Philosophie der Vorzeit.

k) From 1841 to 1862 J.-P. Migne reprinted the Saint-Maur edition of the works of Augustine in Volumes 32–47 of his Patrologie latine. And by the end of the 19th century France could pride itself on being the only country to have two complete translations of the works of Augustine (Poujoulat and Raulx, Bar-le-Duc, 1864–73, in 17 volumes; Péronne et al., Paris, Librairie Vivès, 1869–78, in 34 volumes).

l) When he assumed the editorship of the Annales de philosophie chrétienne in 1905, L. Laberthonnière adopted the motto: “Let us seek as though we must find, let us find as though we must seek” (De Trinitate IX. i. 1). M. Blondel* (1930) celebrated “the constantly renewed richness of Augustinian thought.” As early as 1933 Father F. Cayré (1884–1971), concerned with balancing neo-Thomism with a kind of neo-Augustinianism, launched the Bibliothèque augustiniennne and in 1943 created the Centre d’Études augustiniennes, where Augustinian studies experienced a rapid expansion in the context of a movement of return to the Fathers of the Church. It has even been written that it was Augustine who was the great theologian of Vatican* II (Morán 1966). On this point, we should simply note that J. Ratzinger (1954), an expert on the council*, had written his thesis on the Augustinian doctrine of the church as people* and house of God. The thesis was published in the 16th centenary of the death of Augustine, something which was also celebrated by an important international congress that prepared a survey of Augustinian studies and so helped to ensure their revival. The proceedings of the congress were published in three volumes: Augustinus Magister. Even today, the Augustinian spirit flourishes where it will.

II. Augustinist Crises

1. Grace and Predestination

a) In order to attempt to achieve clarity, it is first appropriate to set out a strict and narrow definition of Augustinianism as a particular interpretation of the mystery* of salvation, an interpretation that can be and has been challenged. According to Dom O. Rottmanner (1908), it is “the doctrine of unconditioned predestination and particular salvific will as Saint Augustine developed it in the last period of his life... surrendering no part of it until his death.” Subsequent history then becomes a series of doctrinal crises and provocations.

b) An Augustinian Crisis? We noted above (I 1 b) that in reflecting on Romans in order to reply to Simplicianus, Augustine had had the revelation of an absolute primacy of grace over any human initiative. This has been interpreted as a doctrinal crisis, an upheaval that transformed Augustinian doctrine into a “nest of contradictions” (Flasch 1980). But in the mind of Augustine it represented progress. It has also been thought (Hombert 1966) that the work caused a falling out: the silence of Simplicianus and of Aurelius himself is thought to have been reproving. If this were the case, it would also have been reprehensible, for the result was that Augustine was later to become entangled alone in the excesses of his intellectus fidei (Solignac 1988).

c) The Pelagian controversy was essentially an affair of the church and the councils (Wermelinger 1975). Certainly, Augustine led the battle with his many writings against Celestius, Pelagius, and Julian of Eclanum, but the African bishops were behind him. However, it cannot be denied that his interpretation of the consequences of original sin* aroused protests. As early as 413, some went so far as to treat Augustine as a heretic (ibid.). In the heat of controversy, Augustine’s thought hardened, or rather his interpretation of Holy Scripture, especially Romans (see Solignac 1988), for it must be remembered that Augustine had no intention of constructing a personal system. The African bishops did not adopt his thought wholesale. The canons of the Council of Carthage (418; DH 222–30) make no mention of the limitation of saving grace or of predestination, and nor do pontifical documents (Innocent I, Zosima; DH 217–21).

d) Since the late 16th century, the monks of Provence, Cassian and his disciples, have inappropriately been characterized as “semi-Pelagians.” On the contrary, they in no way relied on Pelagius, but admired the works of Augustine. They merely challenged his theory of grace and predestination, which they deemed “contrary to the opinion of the Fathers of the Church and to the sense of the church” (Letter from Prosper to Augustine). In other words, they saw Augustine’s thinking in these areas as innovative and tending toward heresy*. It might be said that they were the first critical Augustinians. Augustine answered that although they had taken the trouble to read his books, they had not taken the trouble to make progress with him while reading them: that is, progress in the understanding of faith, which is the comprehension of Holy Scripture. Prosper of Aquitaine (†463) has been called the “first representative of medieval Augustinianism” (Cappuyens 1929), and he certainly did much work in defense of Augustine. By 431, a few months after Augustine’s death, he secured from Pope* Celestine a letter in praise of the great bishop* of Hippo and generally (that is, prudently) approving his doctrine, while recalling that his predecessors had always considered Augustine among the best teachers (DH 237). Prosper did much for the adoption of a moderate Augustinianism, opposed to the criticisms of the monks of Provence, while recognizing along with them that we must not discuss the mystery of predestination formulated by Paul in Romans 8:28 ff. (DH 238–49).

e) In fact there was a risk that the idea might logically degenerate into predestinationism: if God predestines the elect to eternal bliss, logically he also predestines the others, the reprobates, to eternal damnation. Perhaps this is “a fearsome weapon” forged in some anti-Augustinian circle (Orcibal 1989). But the priest* Lucidus had to issue a retraction on this question at the Council of Arles in 473 (DH 330–42). Around 520 Fulgentius of Ruspe also attempted to dissuade Monimus from this position. The Council of Orange (529; DH 379–97), under the impetus of Caesar of Arles, gave official status to a “softened,” “moderate” Augustinianism, and in the opinion of Portalié (1903, 2526), this was “the most important event in the history of Augustinianism”: “Already . . . all of Jansenism is condemned by the very council that most exalted Augustinian doctrine. It will remain definitively established that, in legitimate and Catholic Augustinianism, there is not, in the proper sense of the word, a predestination to death and further that God really wills the salvation of all men” (1527).

f) Nevertheless, there were serious resurgences. The first was provoked in the ninth century by Gottschalk, a renegade monk from Orbais, who began to preach on dual predestination, following a formulation of Isidore of Seville: “There is a dual predestination, that of the elect at rest, that of the reprobates in death” (Sentences II. 6. 1). Such an argument could have only disastrous consequences for pastoral activity. Gottschalk was condemned by several synods, including the Synod of Quierzy (DH 621–24). His refuter, Duns Scotus, was also condemned (see I 2 d above) at the synod of Valence (DH 625–33).

g) The great Scholastics, Thomas, Bonaventure*, Gilles of Rome (O.H.S.A., †1316), and the others, explained and developed the (Augustinian) doctrine of grace and liberty in their schools, variously in relative tranquility. But predestinationism returned in the form of the absolute determinism of Thomas Bradwardine (†1348) and was transmitted to John Wycliffe (1384). It was, however, condemned at the Council of Constance* (DH 1151–95). There were further resurgences with Luther* and especially Calvin*. On their Augustinianism, see L. Cristiani (1954) and J. Cadier (1954).

h) At the Council of Trent*, Jerome Seripando, prior general of the Order of Saint Augustine and later archbishop of Salerno (†1563), insisted that Augustine could be relied on as a faithful interpreter of Paul, rather than the schemas of the controversialist theologians. Although the council Fathers did take some note of his views, this was not true of the theologians, who continued to follow Scholastic methods of discussion.

In Louvain there was the affair of Baius (Michel de Bay †1589) (Bañezianism*-Molinism-Baianism), an avid reader of Augustine’s works but confused in his system of the natural and the supernatural*, as well as on the question of original sin and grace (Lubac 1965). Condemned at the Sorbonne and later in Rome* (DH 1901–80), Baius always submitted humbly. But the matter was not finished (see Orcibal 1989: “Rome, Louvain et l’autorité de Saint Augustin”). The controversy known as “De auxiliis” (on the different modalities of the assistance of grace) was provoked by the work of Father Luis Molina (†1600) entitled Concordia: The Harmony of Free Will with the Gifts of Grace, the Prescience of God, Providence, Predestination, and Reprobation (Lisbon, 1588; Antwerp, 1595). It opposed Dominicans and Jesuits, the former defending, with Bañez, physical predetermination (that is, efficient causality), the latter God’s “average science.” Pope Clement VIII created a commission that met more than 120 times between 1598 and 1611, though without reaching a conclusion. His successor, Paul V, thought it necessary to put an end to the debate and begged the adversaries to refrain from mutual censure (DH 1997).

But soon thereafter came Jansenius (Cornelis Janssen, 1585–1638), fellow student of Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, the future abbé de Saint-Cyran. In 1619 Jansenius discovered the central principle of Augustine’s doctrine in the distinction between two kinds of grace: the grace of Adam* and the grace of Christ, and he devoted twenty years to the preparation of Augustinus; or, the Doctrine of Saint Augustine on Health, Illness, and the Curing of Human Nature against the Pelagians and the Marseillais (condemned for five propositions by Innocent X; DH 2001–7). The posthumous publication of this work, in Louvain in 1640, in Paris in 1641, and in Rouen in 1643, would transform the intellectual and spiritual life of Christendom into an Augustinist battlefield.

i) Rather than the “century of Saint Augustine,” the 17th century might be called that of the failure of Augustinianism, if we accept the severe and striking verdict of L. Brunschvicg (1927): “It is a matter of determining who this Augustine is whom all parties agree in making the infallible arbiter of orthodoxy. Is he the theoretician of Ideas whom Neoplatonic speculations returned to the religion of the Word*? Is he the theoretician of grace, fired by zeal against the freedom of Pelagius as was the apostle Paul against the wisdom of the philosophers? Both, it will be said. Jansenius and Ambrosius Victor gave contradictory interpretations of Augustinianism; they do not, however, contradict one another as historians. But the century of clear and distinct ideas no longer resigned to simply recording a chaotic collection of heterogeneous texts.... It was thus inevitable that the contributions of Neoplatonism and of the Gospels to the work of Augustine be separated like two rivers on parallel courses, whose waters have never really mixed. And hence arose the conflict of two perfectly organic systems, both Augustinian, whose antagonism and incompatibility it is impossible to mask, once it is admitted that a synthesis, even if it were to take place above the level of reason*, nevertheless requires that it be defined for itself in its internal ordering.... In the end, although there has probably never been, in any period of religious history, a flowering of geniuses superior to the one that occurred in France with Pascal and Malebranche, Fénelon and Bossuet himself, it seems that this wealth had no effect but to make more dangerous the imaginary obsession with heresy—Jansenism or rationalism*, quietism* or Gallicanism*—which made each one suspect the others, and finally rarefied the atmosphere of French Catholicism to the point of making it unbreathable.”

The Jansenist drama of conscience (Ceysens 1954), as well as the misfortune of all the Augustinians of the period, lay in absolutizing the Augustinian doctrine of grace and predestination, in the “dogmatic monopoly” (Neveu 1990) against which Richard Simon (1693; see Ranson 1990) reacted healthily: “I only wish that those who pride themselves on being his disciples would not pass off all their master’s feelings as articles of faith.” This was not to Bossuet’s liking (Rouméliote 1988), but it was exactly the point of view of Augustine himself (Letters 148, 5).

2. Theory of Knowledge

a) For Augustine, all intellectual knowledge is participation in the Word, which is Truth* and Wisdom*. If the Platonists were able to know God, the true God, one in three, this was thanks to the Word, which illuminates anyone who comes into this world. The Christian, reading the prologue of the Gospel of John through to the end, adheres to Christ, the illuminating Word of God and the savior Word incarnate. This is the principle of Christian rationalism that can be found in various forms in Duns Scotus (Madec 1977), Anselm (Madec 1994), Peter Abelard (Gregory 1973), Hugh of Saint-Victor (Simonis 1972), Bonaventure (Madec 1990), and later Malebranche (Gouhier 1926).

b) With the establishment of the university in the 13th century, a clear distinction between philosophy and theology became essential. This brought in its wake new conceptions of the relationships between faith and reason and between nature* and grace, and new debates that lasted for centuries. Albert the Great advised Thomas Aquinas to follow Augustine in theology and Aristotle in philosophy. He followed the advice and discerned in Augustinian doctrine a different philosophical component. According to him, Augustine had followed Plato as far as Catholic faith allowed (De spir. creaturis X. 8). This perception was of capital importance, because it accredited the idea that Augustinian doctrine was a synthesis of Platonism and Christianity—it was a Christian Platonism*—an idea that has governed doctrinal studies on Augustine down to the present. It is, however, a false idea, for although Augustine did not hide his debt to the Platonists, he did not have the sense of being obliged to follow them, for the simple reason that he believed he had found in their books a doctrine that could be at least partly identified with that of the prologue of the Gospel of John.

c) Taking up the Thomist perception, P. Mandonnet (1911) offered a negative definition of philosophical Augustinianism as a state of doctrinal confusion: “Lacking formal distinction between the realms of philosophy and theology, that is, between the order of rational truths and the order of revealed truths.... A similar tendency, moreover, to erase the formal separation between nature and grace.” This notion is inconsistent (Madec 1988). It derives from a Scholastic discrimination whose rigidity constrains the inherent mobility of Augustinian doctrine. If the distinction between philosophy and theology is still compelling or pertinent, then all Augustinianism must be classified as theology.

d) Commentators have nevertheless striven to label an abstraction. É. Gilson (1926–27) created “the deplorably pedantic but clear expression ‘Avicennan Augustinianism’” to define “the position of Guillaume d’Auvergne, Roger Bacon, Roger Marston, and perhaps John Peckam,” and “Aristotelian Augustinianism” for the position of Alexander of Hales, Jean de la Rochelle, and Bonaventure. F. Van Steenberghen (1966) later dismissed the illusion of a “philosophical Augustinianism”: “Only in the realm of theology can there be any question of Augustinianism for the theologians of today; all the distinctive traits which have been used in an attempt to characterize ‘pre-Thomist Augustinianism’ or the ‘Platonic-Augustinian movement’ belong in reality to the theological movement formally considered and find their grounding in this fact.”

The fact remains, however, that the happily ineffective condemnation of certain Thomist theses by É. Tempier in 1277 (Thomism*) was, according to Portalié (1903), “the last victory of the Augustinians.”

e) The definition of political Augustinianism is modeled on the definition by Mandonnet: “It is the tendency to absorb the natural law of the state into supernatural justice* and ecclesiastical law. But what was only a tendency of mind for the African thinker became a doctrine for the heirs of his political thought, and a particularly vigorous doctrine, because it led to the theocratic conceptions of the Middle Ages” (Arquillière 1954). This formulation is as inept as the preceding one and the thesis was severely criticized by H. de Lubac (1984). It remains true that medieval theocratic theories are based on a radical misunderstanding in the interpretation of De civitate Dei (political theology*). In that work Augustine developed not a philosophy but a theology of history* (Marrou 1954), of the history of salvation completed with the Coming of Christ in the sixth age of humanity, one that cannot therefore be set out in detail through the history of the Church, contradictory to the theory of Joachim de Flore, as revised and corrected by Bonaventure (Ratzinger 1959).

f) According to F. Van Steenberghen (1966), “the doctrinal mission of Saint Bonaventure seems to have been to bring out the unity of Christian knowledge, at a time when growing emancipation was creating a serious threat of a break between reason and faith.” In order to accomplish this mission, he repeated the doctrine of the Word, God and man, who guarantees the unity of faith and understanding, science and wisdom, because he is the only Teacher (Madec 1990), “the environment of all sciences, in which are hidden all the treasures of the wisdom and the knowledge of God” (In Hex. coll. I. 11).

g) According to L. Brunschvicg (1927), Malebranche (1638–1715) was the promoter of “Catholic rationalism.” This was owed to Descartes, but especially to Augustine, who taught him that Christ is the internal teacher, the eternal Wisdom who presides over all minds in all their acts of thought: it is a question here not so much of any vision of God as such, but of vision in God. Christ is simultaneously the “eternal Word, [the] universal Reason of minds” and the “incarnate Word, Author and finisher of our faith.” The work of the incarnate Word is related to contemplation* of the eternal Word as faith is to understanding. The way in which Malebranche had the Word speak in his Méditations chrétiennes provoked sharp responses from Antoine Arnauld and Pastor Jurieu, but their intention was simply to malign Malebranche’s meditations and prayers (Madec 1969).

h) In the 19th century the theme of the vision of God inspired several Christian thinkers (see I 2 j above) in the movements known as Christian rationalism and ontologism. But there was a certain degree of confusion engendered, probably because these thinkers had no means of freeing themselves from the philosophy-theology grid. The condemnations from Rome that some of them suffered certainly derived from a Scholastic conception of the relationships between faith and reason and between nature* and the supernatural. It will suffice to mention the cases of A. Rosmini Serbati (†1855) (DH 3201–40), A. Günther (†1863) (DH 8228–31; Simonis 1972), and J. Froschammer (1821–93) (DH 2850–61; Simonis 1972).

i) The expression “Christian philosophy” has been generally and peacefully used for a long time. It is contained in the title of the oldest French journal of philosophy (see I 2 j above). It was only in the heyday of Neoscholasticism that it became the object of a vigorous debate (Henry 1955), in which historians argued like philosophers attached to the definition of philosophy through the autonomy of reason. The debate barely touched on the Fathers of the Church or Augustinianism. H. de Lubac (1979), however, notes that the problem was mentioned at the session of the Thomist society in Juvisy in 1933 by Father A.-D. Sertillanges, who immediately dismissed it: “The new sense of the word ‘philosophy’ symbolizes a conquest to which we cannot submit. Since Saint Thomas Aquinas, the two realms of reason and faith have in principle been clearly distinct. . . . Replacing in any way philosophy under the dependence of faith would be ‘to retreat to before Saint Thomas,’ to return to the confusionism of medieval Augustinianism, and by the same token to put ourselves ‘in a very bad position, isolating us from the thinking world that means to think freely.’”

L. Laberthonnière (†1932), the troublesome friend of Blondel, cut off by ecclesiastical prohibitions, did not participate in the argument, but he alluded to it. According to him, “we can only speak of ‘Christian philosophy’ if what we call by this name is Christianity itself. This is what was done in the beginning. And it was only after the invasion of Aristotelianism* that, in separating on the pretext of distinguishing, we created the mortal conflict between philosophy and theology, the natural and the supernatural, within which we struggle so miserably” (1942). The question should remain open, peacefully.

- A. Harnack (1900), Das Wesen des Christentums, Leipzig.
- E. Portalié (1903), “Augustinianisme (École et système des augustiniens),” DThC 1, 2485–2501; “Augustinianisme (Développement historique de l’—),” DThC 1, 2501–61.
- O. Rottmanner (1908), Geistes Früchte aus der Klosterzelle, Munich, 11–32.
- P. Mandonnet (1911), Siger de Brabant et l’averroïsme, Louvain.

- É. Gilson (1926–27), “Pourquoi saint Thomas a critiqué saint Augustin,” AHDL 1, 5–127.
- H. Gouhier (1926 a), La philosophie de Malebranche et son expérience religieuse, Paris; (1926 b), La vocation de Malebranche, Paris.
- L. Brunschvicg (1927), Le progrès de la conscience dans la philosophie occidentale, Paris.
- M. Cappuyns (1929), “Le premier représentant de l’augustinisme médiéval: Prosper d’Aquitaine,” RThAM I, 309–37.
- M. Blondel (1930), “La fécondité toujours renouvelée de la pensée augustinienne,” Cahiers de la Nouvelle Journée 17, 1–20.
- H. de Lubac (1931), “Deux augustiniens fourvoyés: Baius et Jansénius,” RSR 21, 422–43; 513–40.
- L. Laberthonnière (1942), Esquisse d’une philosophie personnelle, Paris.
- F. Chatillon (1949), “Le plus bel éloge de saint Augustin,” RMAL 5, 234–37.
- F. Cayré (1951), “Aug., Note complémentaire,” DThC, Tables I, 317–24.
- H.-X. Arquillère (1954), “Réflexions sur l’essence de l’augustinisme politique,” AugM II, 991–1001.
- J. Cadier (1954), “Calvin et saint Augustin,” ibid., 1039–56.
- L. Ceysens (1954), “Le drame de conscience augustinien des premiers jansénistes,” ibid., 1069–76.
- L. Cristiani (1954), “Luther et saint Augustin,” ibid., 1029–38.
- G. Lewis (1954), “Augustinianisme et cartésianisme,” ibid., 1087–1104.
- H.-I. Marrou (1954), “La théologie de l’histoire,” AugM III, 193–212; (1955), Saint Augustin et l’augustinisme, Paris.
- J. Ratzinger (1954), Volk und Haus Gottes in Augustins Lehre von der Kirche, Munich.
- L. Foucher (1955), La philosophie catholique en France au XIXe siècle avant la renaissance thomiste et dans son rapport avec elle, Paris.
- A. Henry (1955), “La querelle de la philosophie chrétienne, Histoire et bilan d’un débat,” in Philosophies chrétiennes, RDCCIF 10, 35–68.
- J. Ratzinger (1959), Die Geschichtstheologie des heiligen Bonaventura, Munich-Zurich.
- P. Courcelle (1963), Les Confessions dans la tradition littéraire, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1965), Aug. et théologie moderne, Paris.
- J. Morán (1966), “La presenza di San Agostino nel Concilio Vaticano II,” Aug. 6, 460–88.
- F. Van Steenberghen (1966), La philosophie au XIIIe siècle, Louvain-Paris.
- R. Javelet (1967), Image et ressemblance au XIIIe siècle, Paris.
- J. Koch (1969), “Augustinischer und Dionysischer Neuplatonismus und das Mittelalter,” in W. Beierwaltes (Ed.), Platonismus in der Philosophie des Mittelalters, Darmstadt, 317–42.
- P. Sellier (1970), Pascal et saint Augustin, Paris.
- W. Simonis (1972), Trinität und Vernunft: Untersuchungen zur Möglichkeit einer rationalen Trinitätslehre bei Anselm, Abelard, den Viktorinern, A. Günther und J. Froschammer, Frankfurt.
- É. Gilson (1972), Le thomisme, 6th Ed., Paris.
- T. Gregory (1973), “Considerazioni su ratio e natura in Abelardo,” StMed 14, 287–300.
- O. Wermelinger (1975), Rom und Pelagius, Stuttgart.
- G. Madec (1977), “L’a. de Jean Scot dans le De praedestinatione,” in R. Roques (Ed.), Jean Scot Érigène et l’histoire de la philosophie, Paris, 183–90; id. (1978), Iohannis Scotti De diuina praedestinatione, CChr.CM 50, Turnhout.
- H. Gouhier (1978), Cartésianisme et augustinisme au XVIIIe s., Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1979), “Sur la philosophie chrétienne: Réflexions à la suite d’un débat,” in Recherches dans la foi, Paris, 127–52.
- K. Flasch (1980), Augustinus: Einführung in sein Denken, Mayence.
- L. Ceysens (1982), “Le ‘saint Augustin’ du XVIIe siècle: l’édition de Louvain (1577),” XVIIe siècle 34, 103–20.
- P. Sellier (1982), “Le siècle de saint Augustin,” XVIIe siècle 34, 99–102.
- H. de Lubac (1984), “Augustinianisme politique?” Théologies d’occasion, Paris, 255–308.
- L. Elders (1987), “Les citations de saint Augustin dans la Somme théologique de saint Thomas d’Aquin,” DoC 40, 115–67.
- G. Madec (1988), “La notion d’augustinisme philosophique,” in Jean Scot et ses auteurs, Paris, 147–61.
- A. Rouméliote (1988), “Bossuet gendarme de l’augustinisme face à R. Simon et J. de Launoy,” in P. Ranson (Ed.), Saint A., Dossiers “H,” 399–405.
- A. Solignac (1988), “Les excès de l’intellectus fidei dans la doctrine d’Augustin sur la grâce,” NRTh 110, 825–49.
- J. Orcibal (1989), Jansénius d’Ypres (1585–1638), Paris.
- G. Madec (1990), Saint Bonaventure: Le Christ Maître, Paris.
- B. Neveu (1990), “Le statut théologique de saint Augustin au XVIIe s.,” in coll., Troisième centenaire de l’édition mauriste de saint Augustin, Paris, 15–28.
- P. Ranson (1990), Richard Simon ou du caractère illégitime de l’augustinisme en théologie, Lausanne.
- V. Carraud (1992), Pascal et la philosophie, Paris.
- G. Madec (1994), Petites études augustiniennes, Paris.
- P.-M. Hombert (1996), Gloria gratiae, Paris.

GOUUVEN MADEC

See also Augustine of Hippo; Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Grace; Jansenism; Pelagianism; Political Theology; Predestination; Sin, Original

Authority

A. In the Church

a) New Testament and the Fathers. In the ancient Roman Empire, auctoritas indicated power endowed with prestige, an indirect social power that was superior to immediate, coercive power (potestas). Since Augustus, supreme authority had been represented by the emperor, from whom magistrates and jurists in turn derived their authority.

The New Testament contains no direct equivalent of this Roman concept, and the Vulgate itself does not use the word. However, the terms dunamis (e.g., in 2 Cor 8:3 and Eph 3:16) and exousia (e.g., in Mt 21:23–27) are of interest in this regard. While dunamis means power and the means of executing it, in a general sense, exousia more specifically indicates a mandate legitimized by God*. As a relational concept, with reference to the origin of legitimization (emperor, God), exousia has certain features in common with auctoritas.

The Latin Fathers* from Tertullian* onward speak of auctoritas Dei or Christi. This authority could be extended to witnesses and disciples: there are references, in this sense, to the authority of the apostles* and of the ancients, but also to the authority of the canonical books* of the Bible*. This usage took as its model the authority of the emperor, from which legitimate representatives derived their own power. Thus, authority was assimilated to the notion of tradition* and the doctrine of apostolic* succession.

In the writings of Tertullian and, for example, Cyprian*, authority remained a derivative from Roman legal terminology. Augustine*, however, used the notion in a less institutional perspective, giving it a place in his theory of knowledge: divine authority, and the authority of Holy* Scripture, form the basis for authentic knowledge. Although he allotted first place to the authority of the Catholic Church*, as the ultimate criterion of truth*, Augustine did not mean by this any specific legal institution, but rather the authenticity of the universal Church. Nevertheless, by subordinating the individual reason* of Christians to the authority of the church, Augustine helped to create the basic problems that were to disrupt Christianity at a later stage.

b) Middle Ages and the Reformation. The principle of the authority of Holy Scripture was never called into question during the Middle Ages. However, in practice authority was directly linked to the people who governed the church. Just as the philosophers of antiquity and the Fathers of the Church were considered in the universities as auctoritates, so popes*, bishops*, and other holders of church offices were considered to have a natural authority, which was conflated with that of the church and the apostles. This implied a broadening of the range of written sources of authority within the church: Scripture in the strict sense was supplemented by the decisions of councils*, papal decrees, canon* law, and the texts of the Fathers*. As a result, members of the church hierarchy could cite a multitude of established authority, external to Scripture but all theologically justified.

The Reformers denounced this development. Luther* in particular gave Holy Scripture an absolute priority over all other authority, human or institutional: “We do not accord to the church any authority that goes beyond Scripture” (WA 40 3, 434, 13). This idea was clear enough in itself, but it did not resolve the concrete problems of church government, nor did it provide any hermeneutic* rules for the correct interpretation of Scripture. Most of the churches born out of the Reformation were quick to recognize the need for a church magisterium* endowed with authority, despite the divergent evolution of their respective structures*. The principle of authority was also applied in the interpretation of Scripture, for which the readings of ordained ministers and trained theologians came to be valued as standard. Nevertheless, it may be concluded that, because of the emphasis that they placed on the primordial authority of Scripture, the churches that developed out of the Reformation always retained a certain critical potential in this domain.

c) Modern Times. Ever since antiquity, philosophy* has regarded the critical use of individual reason and obedience to traditional authority as two antithetical attitudes. This tendency was especially reinforced during the Enlightenment and found its political expression in the French Revolution.

The systematization of modern thought on the basis of opposition to the concept of authority was principally the work of Kant*. In his view, the philosophy that preceded his was a “dogmatism” linked to authority, because it did not examine the conditions for the possible exercise of reason from a critical point of view. In the domain of moral philosophy, Kant taught that ethical authority must depend upon an internal principle, that is, on a good will determined by duty. In the final analysis, external authority always remained unjustified; only the autonomous person*, taking reason as his guide, could give a credible form to his own convictions. Drawing out the consequences of this principle of individual autonomy, modern philosophy adopted a critical attitude to all external authority from the outset. To the extent that it largely corresponded to the view that modern man took of himself in an individualist society*, modern philosophy could not help but enter into conflict with the Christian churches, which traditionally grounded their authority in the “external” jurisdiction of Holy Scripture and the church magisterium.

The authority of a religious text presents a complex hermeneutic problem, which may be clarified, on the one hand, by the theory of the divine inspiration of the text itself and, on the other, by the idea of a magisterium authorized to provide an interpretation of the text. While the Christian churches teach that the clarity (Luther, WA 18, 609, 4) and the obviousness of Scripture are enough to attest their authority, and that the Bible should be accessible to all believers (DH 4229), they also emphasize the necessity of the magisterium and of the theory of inspiration. Thus, Vatican* II assigns to the magisterium—“whose authority is exercised in the name of Jesus Christ” (DH 4214)—the task of authentically interpreting the word* of God.

d) Different Types of Authority. The philosophical critique of authority does not, of course, mean that the real organizations of the modern world have no dependence on relations of authority. In particular, Max Weber’s distinction among three types of authority has been of great interest in sociology. Weber conceives authority within an organization as a relation of “domination,” and distinguishes among “traditional” authority, “legal” (rational, bureaucratic) authority, and “charismatic” authority. The church represents an ideal type of traditional domination or authority; its power is organized hierarchically and is legitimized by a relation with the past. Legal authority is vested in the holder of an office by reference to his position within a system, independent of any personal quality; charismatic authority, by contrast, is legitimized by purely individual characteristics. Although Weber’s classification is only one of numerous modern typologies of authority, it has dominated theoretical developments in the sociology of religion, as well as the empirical study of existing churches. A fourth type of authority has often been proposed, that of the specialist who has acquired a certain prestige through his competence but who does not enjoy any charismatic power in Weber’s sense.

e) Authority in Discussions among the Churches. The Catholic and Anglican Churches have issued a document entitled Authority in the Church, in which Holy Scripture is defined as “the normative statement of the authentic foundations of faith... It is through these written words that the authority of the word of God is transmitted” (op. cit., 2). The authority of the church is here placed first, yet it is Jesus Christ who constitutes “the authentic foundation,” not Scripture itself. Dialogue arises, not from individual interpretations, but from “common faith,” the yardstick by which each person tests the truth of his own belief. This common faith presupposes a community, a koinonia (op. cit., 4). Thus, the koinonia becomes a guarantee for the authority of Scripture. Within this community, people can also exercise authority. Certain persons, “by the internal quality of their lives,” inspire a respect “that permits them to speak with authority in the name of Christ.” Other people receive their authority from the ordained ministry*, which is “intrinsic to the structure of the church” and constitutes “another form of authority.” Thus, “the perception of God’s will for his church does not belong to the ordained ministry alone; it is shared by all its members” (op. cit., 4–6).

Rome did not approve this document, but this dialogue illustrates the way in which the question of authority has been addressed in numerous contemporary churches: it has been given traits that are simultaneously charismatic (the interior quality of life), traditional, and legal (the ordained ministry). The authority of Scripture, as well as that of persons, is rooted in a community that maintains the “common faith” as a criterion of truth. The modern notion of individual autonomy is taken into consideration in the form of the idea that each person, through the interior quality of his life, can have a share in authority.

It is the question of the authority of the pope over the bishops and the whole of the koinonia that presents the most difficult problem for the concrete reality of oikoumene. On this question, the dialogues have not produced any definitive results. In his encyclical Ut unum sint (1995), Pope John Paul II starts from the notion that the bishop of Rome must secure the communion* of all the churches “by the power and the authority without which this function would be illusory.” In this sense, the function of the papacy still presupposes real power and authority, and cannot be purely symbolic.

Despite the difficulties that have been encountered, important convergences have become evident in recent times with regard to the way in which the churches understand the authority of the ordained ministry. The depth of this agreement is attested in the document Baptism, Eucharist, Ministry, published by the Commission on Faith and Constitution of the World Council of Churches. According to this text, the authority of the ministry is founded upon Jesus Christ: “authority has the character of a responsibility before God and is exercised with the participation of the whole community” (15). Although this authority comes from Christ, the authority of Christ remains unique. Yet it provides a normative model for the church: “authority in the church can be authentic only if it seeks to conform itself to this model” (16).

- H. Meyer, L. Vischer (Ed.), Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, Geneva, COE, 1984.
- Jean-Paul II, Ut unum sint: Encyclical Letter on Ecumenical Engagement, Vatican, 1995.
- ♦ J. M. Todd (Ed.) (1962), Problèmes de l'autorité, Paris.
- W. Veit, H. Rabe, K. Röttgers (1971), “Autorität,” HWP 1, 724–34.
- J. Miethke (1979), “Autorität I: Alte Kirche und Mittelalter,” TRE 5, 17–32.
- O. O'Donovan (1986), Resurrection and Moral Order, Leicester.
- P. Avis (1992), Authority, Leadership and Conflict in the Church, London.
- G. R. Evans (1992), Problems of Authority in the Reformation Debates, Cambridge.

RISTO SAARINEN

See also Council; Holy Scripture; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility; Magisterium; Ministry

B. Political Authority

Every theory of political authority must give an account of its purpose, the source of this authority, and the structure and limits of its actions. A theological account takes its bearings from Christian faith* in God's work of creation*, providence*, and salvation*. The diversity of theological accounts, past and present, is traceable to differing interpretations of the moments or phases of this divine work, and of the relationship of political authority to them.

a) Theological Positions and Their Historical Transformations. The main theological issue concerns the nature and extent of the involvement of political authority in the divine work of salvation. On this issue, there are broadly two positions. One presents political authority as belonging to God's preservation of his creation in the present conditions of humanity after the Fall. This preservation is the condition of his salvific action, but does not define it. Following the “two cities” schema of Augustine* and Luther*, this position stresses the unnatural, volitional basis of political authority, its entanglement with sinful strivings for power, the limited scope of its power, and the merely external (only indirectly moral) character of the social order upheld by it. The other position presents political authority as participating in the redemption of communal life, as both the object and the instrument of God's redeeming love*. In line with classical political thought, and authoritatively systematized by Thomas* Aquinas, this position stresses the naturalness and legitimacy of political authority that creates an order with moral and spiritual power, and strengthens social bonds.

However, the opposition between these ideas has not always been maintained with all desirable clarity over the historical course of Christian political thought. For example, the “political Augustinianism” (to use Arquillière's phrase) of the medieval Latin church* strictly subjected secular rule to ecclesiastical rule, converting morally ambiguous and nonsalvific political activity into a function of the church, the community of salvation. Luther's Augustinian revival, by contrast, placed the community of salvation beyond the political reach, thus facilitating the absorption of the visible church into the state. On the Thomist side, the 19th century saw the Catholic Aristotelian vision of a harmonious society* united by political authority turn into the sociological vision of a functionally unified society that could do without political authority.

Such paradoxical transformations were due in part to the interaction between ecclesial and civil political concepts. These notions are linked to the established relationship between the law of the gospel and the law of creation, between love and justice, supernatural and natural virtues*, reason and revelation*. Generally speaking, the greater the opposition between these notions, the more church and state have divergent political theories. The weaker the opposition, the closer are the church and state political theories. Historically, the pressures for theoretical and practical parallelism have predominated: the Latin church and the Western empire, for example, engaged in ceaseless mutual plundering of each other's political ideology, organization, and political operations. Although religion became a private matter in the modern era, the trend toward institutional homogeneity still dominates: today, church and state alike must conform to the prevailing liberal and democratic political ethos. The more radical theological dualisms, with their antithetical constructions of ecclesial and civil community, have tended to be historical undercurrents that periodically erupt into challenges to the status quo.

b) Purposes of Political Authority. The New Testament portrays rulers as appointed by God to judge, punish, and reward (Rom 13:2–4; 1 Pt 2:13–14). It was to such texts that theologians up to the 13th century, and the Protestants of the 16th and 17th centuries, constantly referred in order to consider political authority in a theological manner. Thus, the Latin Fathers*, under Stoic influence (e.g., Ambrosiaster [fourth century], Ambrose*, Augustine) saw political authority as a postlapsarian divine ordinance that simultaneously expresses God’s wrath against sinful humanity and his merciful will to protect the fragility of the social bond from wayward human passions*: it is a means of limiting inevitable punishment*. Accordingly, political action presupposes a common conscience of good and evil, of order and disorder, of individual good and the common good, according to which justice may be rendered. There is thus an objectivity of justice, law, and common good, recognized but not created by the ruler. Until the 17th century, it was commonly thought that the authoritative articulation of what was good and fair was found in Scripture*, preeminently in the two great commandments (Mt 22:36–40; Mk 12:28–31) and in the Decalogue, which specifies in more detail what is owed to God and to our neighbor. This forms the substance of justice or natural law (lex naturae, ius naturale). One should not, however, understand this notion too simply, for there are at least four “natures”—human nature as it was created, fallen nature, redeemed nature, and nature in the state of perfection—each of which has a distinct legal determination.

In the Augustinian tradition, society before the Fall was based on natural law: sexual union, procreation, education of children, common possession of material goods, equality, and unrestrained freedom. After the Fall, however, society was based on ius gentium (law of people) and ius civile (civil law), which, as inferior expressions of the natural law, establish private property*, the inequality of master and slave, of ruler and ruled, and the positive legal curtailment of individual freedom. The redeemed society is based on the gospel law of faith, hope*, and love. However, in an eschatological perspective, the penitential laws referring to purgatorial punishment played an increasing role over time. Traditionally, the secular jurisdiction* was modeled after, without being coterminous with, the institutions and laws of fallen nature, preoccupied with the protection of the property* and privileges of all and guaranteeing the safety and satisfaction of all needs. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, for its part, extended to those institutions and societies based on natural and divine law: marriage* and family*, monastic communities, religious fraternities, churches, and charitable and educational institutions. This division was not always clear, for it was constantly challenged from the temporal side by the theocratic aspirations of kings and emperors. Inspired by Israelite monarchy and the Roman Empire, they claimed a universal jurisdiction that encompassed all matters of common interest (communis utilitas), including the entire visible organization of the church (doctrinal, administrative, and disciplinary).

Such claims were not imposed until the late 13th and early 14th centuries, when the consolidation of territorial polities was expedited by the appearance of a number of favorable factors: the revival of Roman law, the reception of Aristotelian political philosophy, and the resurgence of classical patriotism and republicanism. The outcome of these movements was a vision of the city founded within nature and reason, autonomous and unified by a single political and legal authority. This political authority, whether hereditary or elected, was thus conceived increasingly in terms of broader legislative and administrative functions, rather than as a simple juridical power. This conceptual change both reflected and reinforced the increasing importance of the nation on every level (economic, financial, legal, religious); and this was to produce modern European states. The unwitting contribution of the church to this development was formidable. By 1300, a succession of jurist-popes (e.g., Alexander III, Innocent III, Gregory IX) had welded the visible church into an organized hierarchy, integrated by a systematized body of canon law and by obedience to the supremacy of the pope, therein furnishing a relatively efficient model of the unitary state. Further, the ecclesiastical synthesis of corporational, imperial, feudal, and theocratic principles laid the foundations of the absolutist states of the 16th and 17th centuries.

Despite the Machiavellian tendency of the 16th and 17th centuries to make the stability and aggrandizement of the state the chief purpose of political authority, they were, nevertheless, the seedbeds of modern liberal conceptions. It was the social fact of religious divisions, together with the individualist and voluntarist strains in the Reformation, that offered fertile soil for the growth of ideas of personal rights and freedoms, voluntary community, active citizenship, representation, and self-government. The seeds were supplied by earlier generations: the Aristotelian ideal of a free and autonomous city, Christianized by Aquinas; the concepts of natural, ideas of natural law prior to the creation of states, and the notion of compact between individuals developed by Duns* Scotus, William of Ockham (c. 1285–1387), the Parisian nominalists, Pierre D'Ailly (1352–1420), Gerson (1363–1429), and, later, Almain (c. 1480–1515) and Mair (c. 1468–1550); and, finally, the principle of the jurisdictional supremacy of the community, supported by the conciliarists against papal absolutism, which entailed its rights to elect rulers, to consent to laws, and to be represented by an assembly. For these ideas, the rise of Protestant and, later, Catholic dissent supplied an urgent use; but, more importantly, it supplied the different theological underpinnings that gave them new directions. Most notably, the central Reformation (especially Lutheran) doctrine of the individual's faith as the unifying principle of the believing community gave to the concept of subjective right (both individual and collective) a foundation in radical spiritual freedom. Similarly, the Calvinist emphasis on the dependence of the political community on the Covenant* between God and humanity, on the model of God's successive covenants with Israel*, gave a religious and moral substance to the concepts of social contract, collective jurisdiction, political consent, and political participation. On the other hand, the revitalized Augustinian association of government with restraint, the coercive settling of conflicts, and the ordering of merely material benefits underscored the unnatural basis of political authority in the contractual agreement of calculating wills.

The 18th and 19th centuries witnessed a reaction against this conception of the external, unnatural, and coercive character of political authority, which had been perfectly expressed by Hobbes (1588–1679) and Spinoza (1632–77), with their concept of a formal legal mechanism of concentration of power. There was an interest in replacing the principle of outward conformity to a divinely ordained sovereign will with an organic and independent principle of social order. However, society was no longer defined in the classical Christian manner by a common theological and ethical rationality. In the deistic theodicy of the liberal economists and English utilitarians (e.g., Adam Smith [1723–90], David Hume [1711–76], J. S. Mill [1806–73], and Jeremy Bentham [1748–1832]), it is the spontaneous operation of market forces that best serves the natural end of society, namely, economic security. In a system in which the operation of these forces is acceptable because it is impersonal, democratic, and nonviolent, the role of political authority is restricted to the enforcement of property rights. Liberalism may have glorified the pursuit of happiness, but it had to acknowledge that the individual conscience needs to take society into account for fear of anarchy (Wolin 1960). By contrast, the sociological reaction against the formalism of political power began with the socialized conscience, which makes individuals susceptible of scientific study and social manipulation. According to the theocratic Catholicism of counterrevolutionary French writers (Joseph de Maistre [1753–1821] and Louis de Bonald [1754–1840]), society owes its unity to a mysterious divine mythos whose cultural and institutional forms are revealed before being unified by a conscious political and economic effort. It is not political authority alone, but the whole social hierarchy culminating in king and pope that embodies the unified common will. Later, Saint-Simon (1760–1825), Comte (1798–1857), Durkheim (1858–1917), and Marx* converted this theological socializing of the divine into a profane and scientific socializing of what transcends individuals. Thus the active principle of social cohesion is found, according to Durkheim, in “collective representations” or, according to Saint-Simon, in industrial organization. From this viewpoint, political authority has little purpose other than setting up a harmonious, self-functioning social system, or occasionally helping the administration of experts.

Contemporary theological conceptualizations of the purpose of political authority continue to reflect the somewhat tense interactions of the Thomistic-Aristotelian and Augustinian traditions bequeathed by the Reformation and the Counter-Reformation. At the core of both Catholic and Protestant thought is the notion of human rights, transpolitically rooted in subjectivity. For Protestant thought, heir to the liberalism of Locke (1632–1704) and the economists, political authority has the restricted mandate of securing the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and property. In the tradition of Augustinian realism, refined by post-Kantian pluralism (of which Reinhold Niebuhr [1892–1971] is representative), the competence of the state is limited to the securing of the rights of every person and to the arbitration of conflicts of interest, even though it also needs to create the moral consensus required for justice in the city. However, modern technological development, with all the ensuing possibilities, leads even the most classical liberals to sanction increased intervention by political authority to ensure equality of rights. Thus, there has been a partial rapprochement between contractarian liberalism and the Catholic tradition, which has always accorded to political authority a more comprehensive mandate to define, create, and sustain both the spiritual and material common good of society. Modern Catholic philosophers such as Etienne Gilson (1884–1978) or Jacques Maritain (1883–1973), along with Protestant natural-law thinkers such as Emil Brunner (1889–1966), have no difficulty in extending human rights to include certain social rights. Maritain and Gilson have more difficulty in sustaining the attribution of independent rights to collectivities, whether natural or supernatural, as was characteristic of earlier Catholic thought (see Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum or Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno). Today, it is not so much the rights of families, churches, or guilds that political authority is responsible for safeguarding as the rights of persons*, by means of a plurality of institutional involvements. Hence, the complex governmental apparatus for administering the provision of goods and services does little to advance the integrity and harmonization of the community so central to the Thomist vision. Current theological emphasis on the church's prophetic and critical role, as in both liberal and Marxist versions of liberation* theology, is accompanied by a deemphasizing of her political structure* of authority and discipline, and of her role as public educator.

c) Sources of Political Authority. For the most part, the Christian political tradition has presented a dual-source theory of political authority: divine election and human election. Until the late 13th century, the Pauline premise of God's ordination of rule and rulers held sway. God's continuing sovereignty in the human community requires that rulers be considered as delegates or representatives of God, "images" of "the divine majesty," "earthly substitutes for his hand," exhibiting universally "his justice and his mercy" (John of Salisbury, Policraticus 4, 1). From Carolingian times onward, the designation of both temporal and spiritual rulers as "vicars" of God or of Christ was intended to convey the strict feudal subordination of vassal to lord, and the divine liege-lord's power to remove the title to rule from a rebellious vassal. As medieval coronation ceremonies reveal, communal consent in the institution of monarchs largely amounted to recognition of God's appointment of the ruler, albeit the divine election operated through legal traditions of royal lineage or hereditary succession. Not until the absorption of Aristotle, and the revival of Roman law and a republican culture, was the people's essential role in the election of political authority widely acknowledged.

The theory of popular election, as developed in the late Middle Ages, was that God, from whom all political authority originates, invests all self-sufficient and independent, or "perfect," human associations with the right to establish a political authority to serve the common good. Scotist and Ockhamist voluntarism* introduced an individualist leaning into the idea of natural community by basing it on a pact (pactum) of individuals endowed with natural rights anterior to the creation of the state. Common to both Thomistic and nominalist thought, especially as mediated to the 16th and 17th centuries by the Parisian conciliarist tradition, was the notion that political authority owes its legitimacy to God, who uses the human institutions.

Introducing the biblical theme of the Covenant into the question of choosing a government reinforced the prominence of divine institution. In the most celebrated of these theories, found in a Huguenot pamphlet entitled Vindiciae contra tyrannos, God grants equal authority to both contractual parties, in return for promises of obedience to God's law, each having responsibility for its own and the other's compliance with the terms. However, while the more theocratic (Protestant and later Catholic) conceptions of the Covenant thus gave way to the divine will, rival secular conceptions derived the "fundamental law" of the political covenant exclusively from the communal will, identifying it with the ancient custom of the realm. The 17th century was dominated by the polarization of two absolutized political wills: the unlimited divine right of hereditary monarchs and the parliamentary repositories of popular sovereignty. Nevertheless, despite the extreme voluntarism of Hobbes, Spinoza, and Pufendorf (1632–94), the Scholastic natural-law tradition was revitalized in both Catholic circles, by Vitoria (c. 1483–1546), de Soto (1495–1560), Molina (1535–1600), and Suarez* (1548–1627), and Protestant circles, by Grotius (1583–1645) and Althusius (1557–1638). Although indebted to individualist and voluntarist currents, these theorists thought that governmental or popular political will had to take into account certain constraints, such as man's social and reasonable nature, the objectivity of God's commandments, or the existence of a universal moral community and immutable justice.

One momentous contribution of this Scholastic revival was the basis it provided for international law by avoiding systems of thought in which there is no political right beyond the state. Drawing on the concept of universality developed by Roman civil and canon law—the universality of empire, of reason, of papal jurisdiction—these theorists articulated the idea of an international activity of lawmaking and law-abiding infused with intimations of a natural community of divine law. Throughout the era of sovereign nation-states, this idea of the foundation of international relations has been the only one that has permitted opposition to the more pervasive view of an international moral vacuum in which relations of force are qualified only by treaties and agreements. It is not coincidental that in our own time the Catholic natural-law tradition has supported both the idea of just war and the enterprise of international political authority, whether the United Nations or the European Union. True to its Thomistic and Aristotelian inspiration (in, e.g., Gilson, Maritain, John XXIII), Catholic thought has generally entertained high expectations of the competence of free and equal states to construct and administer the international common good.

d) Structure and Limits of Political Authority. The older view of political authority, with its biblical, Stoic, and patristic roots, emphasized the ruler's judicial role and assimilated his legislative and administrative role into it. Until the late 12th century, even the promulgation of a new law had a judicial character, being presented always as the interpretation, clarification, restoration, or reduction to writing of ancient custom. The proliferation of statute law, together with the extension of royal administration to new domains, provoked a concern with the problem of limiting governmental powers. The idea of the separation of powers, or of their division among numerous centers, came to the fore. This federalist idea was based on the Aristotelian description of political society as a composite whole made up of smaller units, defined by the experience of corporations. Such a pluralistic vision had two unsurpassed exponents in Nicholas* of Cusa and Althusius. A conciliarist steeped in Christian Platonism*, Nicholas of Cusa depicted the church, and analogously the empire, as a mystical hierarchy of corporate bodies and representative authorities, each constituted by and acting through divine will and human collective will. Two centuries later, Althusius conceived political society as an association of lesser associations, both private and public, each a political community formed by contract according to natural, divine, and positive laws. The German tradition of political, legal, and social pluralism, descending through Hegel* and the historical school of philosophical jurisprudence, has left its mark on all subsequent Christian pluralist theories. Common to Dutch neo-Calvinist, Swiss Reformed, and Catholic social philosophies, and their applications by Christian political parties throughout Europe, has been the endeavor to combine traditional Christian social and political principles (whether articulated as laws of nature or as divine ordinances) with a concept of historical dynamics. They all envisage the historical unfolding of differentiated structures and institutions of society according to divinely given interior norms, the state being only one structure among many, limited by the rights of the others. Today, Dutch neo-Calvinism (represented by Herman Dooyeweerd [1894–1977] and his followers) and Catholicism (represented by postwar Thomism) are the most optimistic about the harmonious integration of society on Christian principles. By contrast, the Swiss Reformed tradition (represented by Brunner) retains more Lutheran pessimism about the politically and socially achievable good. Brunner's stronger emphasis on the irreducible disordered state of fallen community, and the gulf between earthly justice and divine charity, distances him from the hopes for the spiritual transformation of society entertained by the Calvinist and Thomist approaches. These latter, however, differ in their conceptions of social structure and the state in relation to it. From the Dutch viewpoint, society comprises a set of intersecting spheres on the same plane, the state sphere being sharply defined by its public and legal aspect; from the Catholic viewpoint, society comprises a hierarchy of natural and voluntary communities, the state being the most inclusive, powerful, and broadly competent. Thus, despite the extensive development by Catholic social philosophy of the principle of "subsidiarity," requiring that greater communities respect the integrity and competence of the lesser communities embraced by them, Catholic thinkers still exhibit more willingness than their Calvinist contemporaries to endow the most universal authority with a broader, integrative social role.

Traditionally, however, Catholic social teaching has rigorously qualified state authority by the church's magisterium*. Until its concessions to democracy in the wake of World War II, the Catholic hierarchy upheld medieval Gelasian dualism, modified to accommodate the reality of modern states. This doctrine no longer distinguished, as had Pope Gelasius (492–96), between two orders of authority—spiritual and temporal—within the single ecclesial community, but rather distinguished two separate, self-sufficient, and self-governing communities of church and commonwealth. Protestant thought has, by contrast, tended to cement the church's link to the state, either by subjecting the church to the secular power (as in Lutheran and Anglican established churches), or by merging the civil and ecclesiastical aspects of political authority (as in Swiss, Dutch, or Scottish Calvinism). Lutheranism*, by virtue of its radically spiritual conception of the church as constituted by God's free word* of grace*, is theoretically more disposed toward political subversion and opposition. In the Dutch Reformed tradition, the church benefits from the self-regulation accorded to all institutional "spheres" but imposes no special limitations on the action of political authority.

The contemporary political creed of liberal democratic pluralism that has become the civil religion of most developed polities since the end of World War II seriously challenges the traditional theological circumscriptions of political authority. Its central tenet is that the political common good consists in an indefinitely extendable set of individual rights and freedoms, the securing of which is the purpose and justification of political authority. These rights and freedoms, required for the self-determination of persons, do not permit the public expression or legal protection of institutions and prerogatives that operate to limit them. Hence, it seems that no effective theoretical limitations of political authority can now proceed from Catholic or Protestant circles—not from the Catholic concept of the church as a superior societas perfecta, nor from the Calvinist principle of the sovereignty of each in his own “sphere,” nor from the Lutheran ideal of radical Christian freedom, at least without critical reappraisal of political individualism and the dominant discourse of human rights.

- J. Althusius, Politica methodice digesta, Ed. C.J. Friedrich, Cambridge, Mass., 1932.
- Augustine, De civitate Dei, BAug 33–37.
- E. Brunner, Gerechtigkeit, Zurich, 1943.
- J. Calvin, Institution de la religion chrétienne, Ed. J.D. Benoît, vol. 5, Paris, 1957–63.
- H. Dooyeweerd, De Wisbegeerte der Wetsidee, Amsterdam, 1935–36.
- [P. Duplessis-Mornay], Vindiciae contra tyrannos, Ed. H. Weber, et al., Geneva, 1979.
- J. Gerson, De potestate ecclesiastica, in Œuvres complètes, Ed. P. Glorieux, vol. 6, Paris, 1965, 210–50.
- H. Grotius, De jure belli ac pacis libri tres, Amsterdam, 1646 (repr. Oxford, 1925).
- John of Salisbury, Policraticus, Ed. C.C.J. Webb, Oxford, 1909.
- John XXIII, Pacem in terris, AAS 55 (1963), 257–304.
- Leo XIII, Rerum novarum, in Acta Leonis XIII, vol. 4, 1894, 177–209.
- M. Luther, Von weltlicher Obrigkeit, wie weit Man ihr Gehorsam schuldig sei, WA 11, 245–80.
- J. Maritain, Man and the State, Chicago, 1951.
- F. Suarez, Tractatus de legibus ac Deo legislatore, Ed. L. Perena, V. Abril, P. Suner, 8 vols., Madrid, 1971–81.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 96, a. 4; IIa IIae, q. 42, a. 2, ad 3; De regimine principum ad regem Cypri.

- ♦ R. Scholz (1944), Wilhelm von Ockham als politischer Denker und sein Breviloquium de principatu tyrannico, Stuttgart.
- R. Folz (1953), L'idée d'Empire en Occident du Ve au XIVe siècle, Paris.
- H. X. Arquillière (1955), L'augustinisme politique, Paris.
- J. W. Gough (1957), The Social Contract: A Critical Study of Its Development, Oxford.
- E. H. Kantorowicz (1957), The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Medieval Political Theology, Princeton.
- S. S. Wolin (1960), Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought, Boston.
- B. Hamilton (1963), Political Thought in Sixteenth Century Spain: A Study of the Political Ideas of Vitoria, De Soto, Suarez and Molina, Oxford.
- M. Reydellet (1981), La royauté dans la littérature latine de Sidoine Apollinaire à Isidore de Séville, École française de Rome.
- J. H. Burns (Ed.) (1988), The Cambridge History of Medieval Political Thought c. 350–c. 1450, Cambridge; (1991), The Cambridge History of Political Thought, 1450–1700, Cambridge.
- J. Milbank (1990), Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason, Oxford.
- E. Herms (1994), “Obrigkeit,” TRE 24, 723–59 (bibl.).

JOAN LOCKWOOD O'DONOVAN

See also Aristotelianism; Christian; Augustinianism; Church and State; City; Conciliarism; Political Theology; Rome; Sin, Original; Stoicism, Christian; Traditionalism

Average Science. See Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Knowledge, Divine

Averroism. See Naturalism; Truth

Awakening. See Edwards, Jonathan; Methodism

B

Baianism. See Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism

Balthasar, Hans Urs von

1905–88

More than any other contemporary theologian, Hans Urs von Balthasar encouraged theology* to rediscover the vital essence of its strictly scientific thinking. No one has been more insistent about the need to recover the long-lost unity of theology and holiness*, in the sense of a full and total opening of the spirit to God*'s revelation*. Guided by Anselm*, Balthasar understood how important to an authentic theology was the adoratio of one who understands with all his powers of reason* that the mystery* is beyond understanding. The invitation of Dei Verbum to make "Scripture*... the soul of theology" (DV 24) is applicable to little 20th-century theology. Even though Balthasar often preferred to take account of the four senses of Scripture rather than following the strict rules of historical and critical exegesis*, the reader of his work is nonetheless offered an intimate engagement with the Bible*.

A large part of his childhood was devoted to music*, for which he had real talent and which was to play an important part in his theological output. At the same time, he undertook research in philosophy* and literature (German doctoral thesis: Apokalypse der deutschen Seele). He entered the Society of Jesus and studied philosophy and theology at Pullach, then at Lyons. These years of deep friendship with E. Przywara (1889–1972), Lubac*, H. Bouillard, J. Daniélou (1905–74), and D. Mollat gave him the opportunity to immerse himself not only in the Church Fathers* and the masters of the Middle Ages, but also in the work of modern thinkers such as G. Bernanos and C. Péguy. In 1940 he met Adrienne von Speyr, whom he received into the Catholic Church: she was to influence the most decisive stages of his life (such as his leaving the Society of Jesus in 1950). Balthasar wrote of her: "Her work and mine cannot be separated, either on psychological or on philological grounds: they are two halves of a whole that, at its center, has a single foundation." Through her agency he made contact with Barth*. The deep influence of his dialogue with the Calvinist theologian would be seen in the texts collected in a volume of theological essays, Verbum Caro, in Theologie der Geschichte, and in Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe, introduction to The Glory of the Lord.

Balthasar was not called to participate directly in the work of Vatican II, an exclusion mitigated by his appointment by Paul VI to the International Commission on Theology. A profoundly open man and a stubborn defender of tradition, Balthasar was made a cardinal in 1988. Averse to public celebration, he had an intuition that he would never don the cardinal's vestments: he died two days before his public elevation to the College of Cardinals, on 26 June 1988.

With the Epilog of 1987, Balthasar concluded his 15-volume synthesis of theology. Few, least of all the author, believed that it could be brought to completion. Taking the form of a trilogy, it is based on the theological use of two transcendentals (beauty 2, c), the True (verum) and the Good (bonum), and of a third concept to which he also accorded the status of transcendental, the Beautiful (pulchrum). The order of these concepts is reversed to give first place to the pulchrum, and they form the basis, respectively, of a theological esthetics, a theo-dramatics and a theo-logic. Two works offer a guide to the logical construction of the trilogy: the first being Rechenschaft (1965), with the later addition of Noch ein Jahrzehnt (1978), and the second being Epilog. While in Rechenschaft Balthasar sets out the key points of his theological output, Epilog offers more of a testament that links in retrospect the fundamental ideas found in the triptych. The trilogy sets out to show that the center of revelation is still today the one wholly meaningful reality. Paradoxical as it may seem, given the complexity of the subject matter and the difficulties it offers the reader, Balthasar sets out to present his contemporaries simply with the "reasons for hope" in Christianity (see 1 P 3, 15) and can be seen as one of the long line of apologists who, over the centuries, have presented the center of the Christian faith.

a) Theological Esthetics. For too long, Balthasar has been regarded as an esthete, and he is in danger of being remembered for even longer only as the author of Herrlichkeit. Such a partial reading is unjustified and threatens to get in the way of an understanding of his theology. Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Ästhetik must be considered as the first part of the system, complete and organic in itself, but also and simultaneously as a first step toward the overall presentation of the mystery. Revelation, in Balthasar's scheme, does not arrive solely by way of the pulchrum, which presents the first act by which it may be discerned; it must be continued and integrated into the bonum and the verum.

This part of the work is therefore entitled Herrlichkeit (glory): the philosophical pulchrum is studied in the context of the Biblical kabod and the Johannine doxa. Glory is the irradiation of being itself, which presents itself thus, sic et simpliciter, with no outward covering. In its free revelation, glory is gratuitous and transcendent; it is the first expression of God's opening toward the world. The theological esthetic can be understood with the help of several keys to interpretation.

One may first distinguish between the perception of glory and the rapture or ecstasy that follows it. The "perception" is the object of fundamental theology; dogmatics, meanwhile, deals with the "ecstasy". The Erblickungslehre, as a doctrine of perception, studies the double movement that constitutes the evidence of revelation. The objective movement consists of the manifestation of the phenomenon, which carries within itself the reasons for its essence and existence, while the subjective movement relates to knowledge by faith. According to Balthasar, perception is possible insofar as God reveals his Gestalt. This is the expression of the absolute, the revelation that begins from itself but "refers back" to its constituent essence and depth. And in this revelation, the content (Gehalt) is identical to the figure that expresses it (Gestalt). With these assertions Balthasar anticipates the closing pages of Herrlichkeit, where he will in fact emphasize that the New Testament gives the Gestalt its whole meaning: the mystery of God's incarnation visually perceived by the believer in Jesus' self-presentation. The stage of perception is followed by that of subjective evidence, by which a fitting knowledge of the Gestalt is obtained. The subject still moves toward the object; but in this case God offers both an object to be perceived and the means to receive this object properly. To the richness of the Gestalt—to the objective evidence that fully expresses the divine doxa—there must therefore be added a corresponding faith, in other words, the simplicity of a cognitive act whose capacity for receiving truth (Wahrnehmung) enables it to give full expression to the meaning of the perception. What is given in theological terms, in short, is the primacy of a fides quae that enables the fides qua to be understood as an act whose content is already, in itself, rich in the fullness of the mystery. So, in its self-presentation, the manifestation of glory reveals at the same time its form and its content (envisaged as a constant referral beyond the form itself), on the one hand; and on the other hand faith, as an adequate and coherent understanding of the content as much as of the form.

A second stage gives content to the pulchrum: this is the rapture or ecstasy engendered by receptiveness to an ever growing sense of wonder (a receptiveness that itself results from man's first astonishment when confronted with the mystery). In this case the ego goes beyond itself, breaks with its individuality and allows itself to be absorbed by the Gestalt; and the demands of the glory that appears and promises personal participation in the mystery of the divine life, then lead to a behavior approaching Gelassenheit, in other words, to a complete and total relinquishment of the self to the mystery. This philosophical perspective is clearly dependent on Eckhart (1260–1328) and Heidegger*, although to understand its full significance it must be considered in the context of Ignatius Loyola (Ignatian spirituality*). Balthasar was always influenced by Loyola's viewpoint, and in his writing Gelassenheit initially implies total obedience, a laissez-faire attitude toward the actions of others, a renunciation that results from the believer's radical receptiveness and openness toward God's will. Whoever wishes to enter into God's revelation (Selbstausslegung Gottes) thus has no other path to take but that of the overall figure (Gesamtgestalt) revealed by God's incarnation. Balthasar is thus able to forge an unbreakable link between the historical revelation of Jesus* of Nazareth, the true heart of revelation, and its mediation or historical continuation through the presence of the church*, the context for every authentic act of faith.

The particular nature of Balthasar's Christology* may be seen here, as expressed in the category of obedience, and culminating in kenosis*, interpreted in the Johannine* sense of glory and love. Indeed Balthasar continually emphasizes that love is a necessary condition for any action of the Trinity. For him this love, the essence of the divine nature itself, keeps nothing back; it is not measured by the standard of human love, but is determined only by the free initiative of God. This analysis allows Balthasar to avoid christological representations predetermined by anthropology*. The act of loving, of which the Son's kenosis offers the only full realization, is on the one hand the condition that allows God to retain his freedom*, and, on the other hand, the one "transcendental" condition needed in order to participate in the mystery of his revelation.

The church is analyzed in the same manner in several of Balthasar's writings (see Sponsa Verbi, Der antirömische Affekt or Schleifung der Bastionen). Considered as the "body" of Christ, and above all as his "bride," the church contains in essence the complexity of the mystery: it is both a reality dependent on its "head" and a free agent capable of choice. The church expresses the logic of mediation, revealed principally in Christ, that invites us to understand faith simultaneously as a human and a divine act. It is indeed the church of Mary, and thus a pure fiat of obedience toward its Lord; but it is also the church of Peter*, and so a ministry* with the aim of developing the community. Balthasar is thus able to set out an ecclesiology* based, on the one hand, on the act of welcoming the gift of grace*—whose theological paradigm is provided by Mary*'s "passivity"—and on the other hand, on concrete decisiveness and action, as exemplified by Peter's ministry. This ecclesiology, moreover, exposes a rather independent tone, especially in its insistence on the theological interpretation of womanhood (woman*) or of the ministry.

b) Theological Dramatics. Theological dramatics establishes and ensures a coherent progress from the pulchrum to the verum. Between "seeing" and "speaking" there must be placed a bonum, which reveals on the one hand God's pure and freely given gift to the world, and, on the other hand, mankind's free and responsible reply. The term dramatics here has a meaning close to the theatrical sense: it concerns that dynamic by which the public and the actor encounter one another, by which the spectator can be aware of himself as a participant inasmuch as he is immersed in the heart of the logic of representation, and by means of which, finally, we find ourselves fundamentally engaged in questions that involve not one moment of life, but existence itself. Thus the very nature of theology demands that it contain a dramatic narrative—its object, indeed, is the drama that is played out in the relationship between God and humanity. The special characteristic of drama is to "transform an event into a visual image," and to force a consideration of personal existence in the light of a "role" and a "mission*" that shatters the image of the self as the outcome of pure chance. So, in the face of the evidence of earthly being, the framework of existence is constructed with an awareness of this mission and this role; and it is by understanding them with reference to the existence of the man Jesus, which can itself be interpreted in terms of pure mission and pure obedience to the Father, that one can allow this mission and this role to unfold fully.

The volume entitled Prolegomena sketches in the axes along which Balthasar's anthropology* is to develop—an anthropology that takes shape and evolves in the light of, and along the trajectory of, the self-expression of the Gestalt Christi. Balthasar's anthropology, indeed, is not based on any self-unfolding of human subjectivity, but is composed solely on the basis of the objectivity of the Gestalt Christi, since this contains the true reasons that can account for the subject who receives it. The drama is therefore formed of God's engagement with humanity, and from the basis of God's very power of action.

The starting point of Balthasar's thinking here is the theology of the Incarnation, inasmuch as it presents in concrete form a relationship between mankind and God (Mit-Einander) by which man becomes essentially a participant (Mitspieler). The question of mankind is thus expressed in terms of two fundamental themes: the formulation of the role and the mission, and the relationship between finite and infinite* liberty. With the definition of the first, the subject discovers that he can be God's partner in a dramatic action. The second allows him to glimpse, on a formal level, the development of the drama. The latter enacts the fundamental question that constitutes personal existence—"Who am I?"—and no one can answer this question without identifying himself, at least implicitly, with a "role." Scripture, for its part, obliges us to see ourselves each as receiving a "mission," summoned and sent forth by the Father* in the image of Jesus Christ. Inevitably, the question of personal liberty then arises: only an analogia libertatis (analogy*) is capable of setting down and explaining the relationship between mankind's finite liberty and the region of infinite liberty to which he is summoned.

Because it is created, personal liberty gives rise to a dramatic existence: according to our decisions, the "being-toward-another" (Zu-Einander) may become a "being-for-another" (Für-Einander) or equally a "being-against-another" (Gegen-Einander). The liberty of the subject, in consequence, does not begin by confronting another finite liberty, but rather by opening immediately onto an absolute liberty—and even, in the light of revelation, onto a "triune" liberty. In the "experience of liberty," the subject understands himself to be constantly approaching this liberty, and is perhaps even aware that he is only free insofar as he is traveling toward it. This discovery further reveals to the human subject the absolutely unshareable nature of his "very being" (Ichsein) and the unlimited extent to which being* may be shared.

The essential problem remains, however: "Who is man?" The answer is clear: imago Dei. This Biblically modeled anthropology sees in the theme of God's image the fullest expression of what man is, because it is directly linked to the act of the Creator God (creation*). Man is the reflection (Abbild) of an archetype (Urbild), and is enveloped by the mystery that grants him, as an essential dimension, the ability to attain full self-realization in freedom. Balthasar's debt to Irenaeus* is very clear at this point.

The Theodramatik also studies the problem of the meaning of the death on the cross as a sign of the love of the Trinity. God reveals himself here in his intimate nature: he is a God who approaches death as a loving God. The quotation from Kierkegaard that appears as an epigraph to the final volume of the Theodramatik makes all the clearer the project and the aim underlying ing the whole second part of the trilogy: the cross and the death of the innocent are "the pure expression of the Trinity's eternal vitality." Pain, suffering, the cross, and death are the ultimate expressions of God's love: they constitute a unique sign that allows us to see how far God can go when he expresses himself in the essence of his being, which is love. The absolute uniqueness and singularity of Jesus of Nazareth are therefore crucial: indeed, they reveal not only the soteriological value (salvation*) of this death, but also the fact that this event alone is a concrete demonstration of God's action. "One of the Trinity* has suffered" (DS 401, 432) is the leitmotiv running through this set of themes. The event of the Crucifixion can already be discerned in the event of the Incarnation: Jesus, in a constant and "progressive" kenosis, breaks with the glory of divinity, assumes human flesh*, and finally encounters death and the experience of the tomb. These pages betray the great fascination that, consciously or otherwise, Adrienne von Speyr held for the theologian of Basel.

Kenosis in Balthasar's work is to be taken as the last word*, expressed in human language, that makes credible God's manifestation to humanity. The hymn to the Philippians (Phil 2:6–11) undoubtedly offers a basis for this theology. In this christological hymn, indeed, it is the intertrinitarian origin of kenosis that is highlighted: it is always seen as a constant, eternal movement of renunciation based on obedience. It can, moreover, be said of the Father that he performs a first, original "kenosis" when he begets the Son: freely but totally, he empties himself of his divinity and passes it in its entirety to the Son. Thus is clarified by the meaning of the words by which Jesus expresses his awareness of his relationship with the Father: "All that is mine is yours" (Jn 17:10). The same free and total giving, by which the Father becomes a "father" and the Son a "son," is also manifest in the Holy* Spirit, which guarantees that this act of dispossession is indeed based on love. Balthasar attempts, by way of this divine self-dispossession, to situate in the immanent Trinity each of the further possible "separations" that can be seen in the economic Trinity. The Son's abandonment on the cross—the extreme expression of separation—is possible only because it is already implicit in the first, insurmountable separation that produces the Trinitarian impulse. In this way the cross expresses in human terms (with an analogy whose correspondence is imparted exclusively by Jesus himself) what is confirmed within the Trinity—the act of total and absolute giving in love. The Trinity is thus defined as a "Person*" in the act by which God gives himself utterly as the Father, and receives himself utterly as the Son. Such a definition implies that the total separation of Father and Son, in Jesus' death, could be achieved only in a total intimacy between one and the other (engendering). The unity experienced by the divine Persons in their relations within the Trinity is thus the basis of the unity and singularity achieved by death when it separates the Son from the Father. Obedience to the Father's will and obedience to the Holy Spirit henceforth constitute the hermeneutic* keys that allow the Crucifixion to be read as a death by love and in the name of love. On this depends love for the Father, understood as a fulfillment of his will that is received in a pure and simple acceptance that goes as far as death. So this viewpoint transforms the event of death into a Trinitarian event: the whole Trinity is engaged and involved in Jesus Christ. In the light of Christology, the "death of God" becomes for Balthasar the fundamental point toward which revelation itself leads—as the Bible* itself testifies. This death, moreover, is also the moment at which the soteriological meaning of the sufferings endured for us by the innocent man is revealed. The Christ who becomes "sin*" and on whom God wreaks his "anger" at the sins of the world is none other than the Son who freely accepts the "pain" felt by God at mankind's refusal of love. The traditional theme of vicarious substitution must then arise; and from Balthasar's standpoint its appearance only serves to highlight "the omnipotent impotence of God's love" (divine omnipotence*). The Son refused and forsaken by the Father is actually a Son forever welcome, since his life is bound up with that of his Father. This Son therefore bears the sins of the world (Rom 9:22f.), and dies on the cross so that nobody after him may die with God's approval. In this way, nothing that occurs is brought to pass by the world, and everything displays the constant and fundamental difference that exists between this action of God's and every possible human realization.

God's Trinitarian love upon the cross is therefore not, as it would be in a Plotinian reading, an impoverishment of all love. On the contrary, this moment reveals precisely the very essence of God and indeed allows us to understand truly what it means to love "until the end" (Jn 13:1). While death represents the limit beyond which man cannot go, and while the suffering of the innocent man may make us empathize with Dostoyevsky's doubt and may lead us to cry scandal* at the mention of God's love, still it must equally be maintained that God has not remained immune to this scandal and this limit. On the contrary, he has accepted them into himself: it is only in this way that they can be decisively conquered and seen to have a meaning. When death becomes the expression of infinite love, one can still speak of a mystery, but only through the paradox of the cross, the last real victory in a drama that does not end in tragedy.

c) Theological Logic. The Gestalt Christi, which has been encountered in the context of "glory," where it was offered to a faithful contemplation, and then in the "drama," to make mankind capable of involving himself in the divine action and thus experiencing his own liberty to the full, now reaches the last act: the definitive form of truth*. The Theologik is largely concerned with analyzing the relationship between divine truth and created truth: can the Truth of revelation be expressed within the structure of created reality? The key questions that take shape over the three volumes of the Theologik attempt to express the "fundamental mystery" (Grundgeheimnis) of the Christian faith: how is it ontologically possible for a human logos to possess the divine Logos within itself? The logos is therefore at the heart of the Theologik—not in its transcendental precomprehension as verum, but rather in what goes beyond this, as alètheia, in the sense of John's Gospel*. Indeed, John's vision determines Balthasar's understanding of truth: John 1:18 opens his christological considerations (in Wahrheit Gottes), and John 16:13 concludes his interpretation of truth (in Der Geist der Wahrheit) in pneumatological terms. Jesus of Nazareth is the Father's exegete, but it is the Holy Spirit that opens the eyes of believers so that they can see the truth in its entirety.

The understanding of the concept of truth and of its links with the bonum and the pulchrum serves here as a preamble to strictly theological analysis. The first volume of the Theologik, Wahrheit der Welt, reuses unaltered a work that first appeared in 1947. There was good reason for placing this text at the start of the Theologik, since it clearly points up latent intuitions that slowly took shape later on, leaving their mark on Herrlichkeit as much as the Theodramatik. It is in this volume that the relationship between the Gestalt and the Grund is analyzed in depth; and one can recognize in it with hindsight the origin of the remarkable developments of the first volume of Herrlichkeit.

What is truth? A simple answer in terms of metaphysical thought would immediately fall short, for while the verum is certainly "a property of being in its manifestation," such a definition must nonetheless be supplemented by the many connotations of the Biblical term 'emet. For Balthasar, truth is a disclosure of being, and this disclosure is by its nature an offering. It could be argued that the Theologik's original intuition lies in its recognition of the mystery of being. Not only absolute being, but all being, partakes of the mysterious, and it is the mystery of liberty and knowledge themselves that force us constantly to go beyond each finite form of liberty and knowledge. For Balthasar, however, the mystery is not something incomprehensible: on the contrary, it is a reality that one may experience, and which becomes manifest through images and words. Images, because they refer constantly to the root of the manifestation and mark the beginning of an encounter between subject and object; words, because they give a stable form to the dialogue between the I and the Thou and facilitate an understanding of the self and the world.

The interpretation of the mystery allows other characteristics of truth to be defined, first and foremost freedom. Truth, indeed, is given in a dynamic movement that refers appearance back to the fundamental essence of which it is the expression; thus one can only arrive at truth to the extent that the essence is revealed in its mystical nature. This implies that the truth of being will always be determined by a dialectic of “disclosure and dissimulation” (Enthüllung-Verhüllung); this relationship allows the identity of being to be discovered, not merely as “being-in-self” (An-Sich-sein) but also and above all as “being-for-self” (Für-Sich-sein).

Existence is the mode of being of truth, and it is up to this essential freedom, which is unconditional and therefore supreme, to choose to reveal its own foundation. So, while the act of knowing gives truth its final connotation, nevertheless knowledge does not derive from the subject, but rather from being, which freely decides to open itself and reveal the foundation of its own existence. Thus truth acquires the full sense of alètheia: it is simple revelation, the pure manifestation of being, which “eludes all meanings and systematizations” and which expresses itself ultimately as love. It is therefore the responsibility of truth to be believable and shared.

Just as in the case of Beauty and Goodness, the content of Truth, which Balthasar identifies with its foundation, cannot be “defined” by human reason. Its nature is such that its essence transcends historical existence. And if one must then have recourse to another logic, it can only be that of love, since it allows us to apprehend the true dimensions of the eternal mystery.

Balthasar was certainly not gifted with concision: his output over half a century consists of more than a thousand items (monographs, articles, commentaries, translations, introductions to various works, critical editions, etc.). However, one short phrase, written almost on the spur of the moment, may be taken as the kernel of his whole theological oeuvre: “To make the Christian message credible and acceptable to the world.” These words summarize Balthasar’s theological project, which finds its best and most audacious expression in Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe (Love Alone), the essential starting point for anyone wishing to come to grips with his work.

It is impossible to approach without a certain sadness the image in the Epilog with which Balthasar describes his work: a bottle thrown into the sea, which floats on until, perhaps, somebody may find it. Contemporary theology has not yet had the courage to face up to Balthasar or to plunge into his enormous output. For all its fascination and appeal, this is difficult theology. Poetry, theater, music, art, and philosophy take their places beside a reading of Scripture in the tradition of the Fathers, the master theologians and the saints, to make up a unique whole that offers an assurance of hope*—a hope that consists of a certainty of God’s free and merciful love. In this context, Balthasar was able to express his conviction that hell* might be empty. This viewpoint does not imply a hereafter without a hell; rather it involves a responsible conception of a believer’s present, offered to his contemporaries in the true light of revelation—to show God’s face in a crucified man brought back to life.

- H. U. von Balthasar (1948), “Theologie und Heiligkeit,” WuW 3, 881–96, New Ed. in Verbum Caro, Einsiedeln, 1960, 195–225.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1950), Theologie des Geschichte, Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1952), Schleifung der Bastionem, Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1960–86), Skizzen zur Theologie, 5 vols., Einsiedeln [vol. 1 (1960), Verbum Caro; vol. 2 (1961), Sponsa Verbi; vol. 3 (1967), Spiritus Creator; vol. 4 (1974), Pneuma und Institution; vol. 5 (1986), Homo Creatus Est].
- H. U. von Balthasar (1961–69), Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Ästhetik, 7 vols., Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1963), Das Ganze im Fragment, Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1963), Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1965), Rechenschaft 1965.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1973–83), Theodramatik, 5 vols.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1974), Der antirömische Affekt, Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1985–87), Theologik, 3 vols., Einsiedeln.
- C. Capol (1990), H. U. von B.: Bibliographie 1925–1990, Einsiedeln.
- ♦ M. Albus (1976), Die Wahrheit ist Liebe, Freiburg.
- W. Löser (1976), Im Geiste des Origenes: H. U. von B. als Interpret der Theologie der Kirchenväter, Frankfurt.
- G. Marchesi (1977), La cristologia di H. U. von B., Rome.
- R. Fisichella (1981), H. U. von B.: Amore e credibilità cristiana, Rome.
- M. Lochbrunner (1981), Analoga caritatis, Freiburg.
- A. Vignolo (1982), H. U. von B.: Estetica e singularità, Milan.
- G. de Schrijver (1983), Le merveilleux accord de l’homme et de Dieu: Étude de l’analogie de l’être chez H. U. von B., Louvain.
- E. Babini (1987), L’antropologia teologica di H. U. von B., Milan.
- L. Roberts (1987), The Theological Aesthetics of H. U. von B., Washington.
- A. Scola (1991), Hans Urs von B.: Uno stile teologico, Milan.
- K. Lehmann, W. Kasper (Ed.) (1991), Hans Urs von B.: Gestalt und Werk, Einsiedeln.
- R. Fisichella (1993), “Rileggendo Hans Urs von B.,” Gr 71, 511–46.

- G. Marchesi (1997), La cristologia trinitaria di H. U. von B.: Gesù Cristo pienezza della rivelazione e della salvezza, Brescia.
- R. Nandkisoré (1997), Hoffnung auf Erlösung: Die Eschatologie im Werk Hans Urs von B., Rome.

RINO FISICHELLA

See also Analogy; Barth, Karl; Beauty; Bultmann, Rudolph; Descent into Hell; Glory of God; Johannine Theology; Kenosis; Lubac, Henri Sonier de; Mystery; Rahner, Karl; Revelation; Theology; Truth

Bañezianism–Molinism–Baianism

a) Definitions. These terms designate three theological systems and trends that came to light in the 16th century and were inspired respectively by the writings of Domingo Bañez (1528–1604), Luis de Molina (1535–1600) and Baius (Michel de Bay, 1519–89). Each of these theologians claimed he was able to give a rational basis to the relations between grace and freedom, as well as to questions related to divine science* and to God*'s determination of future contingents. These attempts took place in a particular context: on one side there was the fight against the Lutheran and Calvinist negation of free will; on the other side, the effort to avoid the pitfall of Pelagianism*. The reaction provoked within Catholic theology* by Protestant notions stirred one of the liveliest debates it had ever experienced on the role of freedom in supernatural* acts.

The Society of Jesus found itself at the center of these controversies, since Molina himself was a Jesuit and since his colleagues were determined to defend Molinism against its various adversaries. In any case, the Jesuits were not as faithful to the ideas defended by Molina as to the fundamental inspiration of Molinism, which consisted in asserting the role of freedom in supernatural acts in a manner that was in full agreement with the instructions of Ignatius of Loyola (17th orthodoxy rule in the Constitutions; Ignatian spirituality*); and also, most probably, with the humanistic pedagogy brought into play in Jesuit colleges. This inspiration of Molinism placed it in opposition both to Baianism and to Bañezianism, whose theories stated that free will could not refuse grace as long as it is an effective grace. Bañezianism quickly became the official doctrine of the Dominicans. As for Baianism, it was initially the theory of a handful of Lovanist theologians but took on a new lease of life in the 17th century, when it was paradoxically revived by the Augustinus (1640) and the Jansenist movement.

b) History of the Controversies. The background to these debates is the Council of Trent*'s decree on justification*, dated 13 January 1547 (session VI, chap. V, COD 671–81, DS 1525–80). According to this decree, justification goes beyond the unaided forces of man and requires prevenient grace, through which God helps man to convert without any merit on man's own part. But according to that same decree, man does not receive that grace passively, without any cooperation on his part, and this means he is given a chance to refuse it rather than accept it.

The first conflict on the question of the agreement between grace and freedom occurred in January 1582. It was, therefore, a good deal earlier than the publication of Molina's Concordia. Bañez, a Spanish Dominican, was confessor to Teresa of Avila (Carmel*). From 1581 he occupied the first chair in theology at the University of Salamanca, where he opposed what has been called a "pre-Molinist" tendency. This happened on the occasion of a dispute defended in Salamanca by the Jesuit Prudencio de Montemayor, who held that Jesus Christ* would not have died freely, and would have procured no merit, if he had received from his Father* the command to die. Discussions followed, on both predestination* and justification: these discussions pitted Bañez, on the one side, against the Augustinian Luis de León, a defender of the Jesuit, on the other. The tribunal of the Spanish Inquisition in Valladolid refused to condemn Luis de León's theses, but it did decide, on 5 February 1584, to forbid him to teach them in public or in private.

On the other hand, starting in 1585 the Jesuit Leonard Lessius (1554–1623) inaugurated his professorate in Louvain by combating the theses of Chancellor Michel de Bay, whom he accused of getting dangerously close to Pelagianism in his refutation of “Calvin*’s Manicheanism*.” When Lessius intervened, Baius had already been engaged (since 1567) in a long exchange with the pontifical authorities, on account of his notion of original gifts. He thought that, although these gifts were not natural, they were due to the integrity of nature*, so that “God could not, in the beginning, have created man as he is born today”: that is, willing to do good*, but incapable of this without divine help (DS 1901 Sq). This has been called the thesis of the impossibility of the state of pure nature. In 1586 Lessius published his Theses theologicae, which denounced Baius’s doctrine. They were censored in 1587 by the Faculty of Louvain (censura lovaniensis), which accused them of semi-Pelagianism. Lessius appealed to Pope* Sixtus V, who cancelled the censorship in 1588 with the reassurance that Lessius’s doctrine was sound.

The theses that set Lessius and the Faculty of Theology in opposition to each other were as follows. According to Baius and his defenders, it is God* who determines the will, so that effective grace is a grace that cannot be rejected, with Providence* and predestination not taking into account either the determination of secondary causes or each individual’s merit. For his part, Lessius defends the notion that in the determination of will, the role of divine grace is only one of cooperation, because will is determined on its own, even in the supernatural order. Grace is therefore not effective on its own but only insofar as the will accepts it and cooperates with it. Providence and predestination take into account the secondary causes as well as the merit of each individual, which means that they bring into play divine prescience of conditional futures.

The controversy took a new meaning again in 1588 with the publication of Molina’s Concordia in Lisbon. Molina was a Spanish Jesuit who was teaching theology in Evora during that time. His Concordia dealt with divine science and will, with Providence and with predestination (see Thomas* Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 14, 19, 22 and 23), and it endeavored above all to reconcile these with human freedom (which explains the title), by means of a theory fairly close to that of Lessius. The Portuguese Dominicans were disturbed to recognize in the book some of the theses defended in 1581 by Montemayor. Cardinal Albert of Austria, the Inquisitor General in Portugal, suspended the sale of the book and consulted Bañez, who uncovered in the Concordia some 10 propositions, the teaching of which had already been forbidden to Luis de León. He condensed his criticism in three objections, but Molina refuted these and as a consequence the suspension of the book was reversed in July 1589. In an appendix of a new edition of the Concordia, Molina wrote his answer to Bañez’s objections.

However, the controversies surrounding the Concordia did not then cease. They pursued their course in Rome*, at the time of the “congregations de auxiliis,” which were consultative theological debates for the study of Molina’s book. Initiated by Clement VIII, these explored the problem of the infallibility of effective grace (is it irresistible? Does it produce its effect as a matter of necessity?). The Dominicans Diego Alvarez, P. Beccaria, and Thomas de Lemos distinguished themselves in these debates, as did the Jesuits Robert Bellarmine*, Claudio Aquaviva, Michel Vasquez, Pierre Arrubal, and Gregory of Valencia. The two great Jesuit theologians Francisco Suarez* and Gabriel Vasquez did not participate in any of these congregations, but their influence on them was considerable. The congregations were spaced out between 1598 and 1607, and Paul V brought them to a close on 28 August 1607. In accordance with the opinion of the bishop* of Geneva, Francis de Sales (1567–1622), whom he had consulted, Paul declared that the “physical premotion” of the Dominicans was not Calvinist, and that the “simultaneous help” and “average science” of the Jesuits did not fall under the accusation of Pelagianism. He also forbade anyone from censoring either opinion as long as the Holy See did not find it opportune to make a definitive decision regarding the controversy (DS 1997)—something he never did. The quarrel went on in spite of this ban, so that in 1611 Paul V forbade the publication of any work on the subject of grace that had not received the authorization of the Inquisition. The ban was reiterated by Urban VIII.

The controversy was revived later with Cornelius Jansen, or Jansenius (1585–1638), a former student of Jacques Jansson, himself a former student of Baius, and one who had been entrusted in Louvain with the investigation into Lessius. Jansenius obtained his doctor’s degree at Louvain in 1619. His Augustinus (published posthumously in 1640) was intended to oppose the position defended by the Jesuits in the congregations de auxiliis, a position that fell, according to him, under the accusation of semi-Pelagianism. His doctrine on grace was later defended against the Molinists by Antoine Arnauld and Blaise Pascal*, in particular in the second of the latter’s Provinciales (1656), which was devoted to the subject of sufficient grace and effective grace. (For the controversy that brought the Molinists and Jansenists into opposition, see Jansenism*.)

c) Average Science, Physical Premotion, and Predetermination. The core of the debate between Dominicans and Jesuits is an alternative between two concepts, that of physical premotion and predetermination and that of average science. The major stakes are the relations between freedom and grace and the relations between primary cause and secondary causes; the role of the knowledge of future contingencies (notably the forecasting of merits) in divine preordination (involving questions about Providence and predestination); the definition of effective grace and sufficient grace; the foundation of the infallibility of divine grace and science; and finally, the nature of freedom.

Molinism is a theory of the simultaneous participation of grace and free will: once human will is elevated through grace to the capability of accomplishing supernatural acts, it freely produces those supernatural acts. In this regard, Molinism is opposed to the Dominicans' majority thesis, according to which grace not only cooperates with will but, on top of the influx that makes the will capable of supernatural acts, also exerts upon it a motion that causes it to perform these acts. So it is not so much a question of a cooperation between grace and free will as of a subordination of free will to divine causality. This "premotion" is called "physical" in order to express the fact that the motion of grace is not merely moral, and to show that in this case, free will does not possess the power to thwart it. A physical determination, in fact, is a determination ad unum. In the theory of simultaneous participation, on the other hand, the motion exerted by grace upon the will is of a moral nature only and is such that its effect depends on the cooperation of the will, which could very well choose not to cooperate. The question raised by both doctrines is therefore that of the principle that causes the will to produce supernatural acts. Does this determination come totally under grace? In other words, is the will able or unable to withhold its consent to grace? And how can one establish the difference between sufficient grace and effective grace, on the one hand, and between prevenient grace and cooperating grace, on the other? Does one designate that the intrinsic characteristics of graces that have different natures (as the Dominicans would like), or rather the determinations that manifest the relationship between grace and a will which is free to consent to it or not (as the Jesuits want)? For the Molinists, it is the cooperation of the will that renders divine help efficient, and this divine help is not of a different nature when the will does not consent to it. Whether it gives its assent or not, the will is at the source of what characterizes the same grace as effective or sufficient, prevenient or cooperating.

As for the theory of physical premotion and effective grace, it allowed the Dominicans to establish the infallibility of divine science on a simple principle: God determines reality in accordance with his decrees. For Molina, this meant annihilating the freedom of creatures. That was why he took up a theory of the Jesuit Pierre Fonseca (1528–99), who had already influenced Lessius. According to Fonseca's theory, besides the natural science (of the possible) and the free science (of the real, a science that takes into account the divine decrees through which God has decided on such state of things rather than another), one should see in God a third science, through which he knows what the free will would do in all the circumstances in which it might find itself. And since this average science (scientia media), as Molina calls it, distinguishes itself from free science and thus anticipates the determination of divine will, it allows the determination of created wills to have some independence with regard to the divine decrees, while maintaining the infallibility of the divine prescience. Indeed, it is sufficient for God to know the real circumstances where created wills are (which falls under free science) in order to know what they will in fact do. In this way the theory of average science allows for a bringing together of divine prescience and the self-determination of created wills. It refuses an infallibility founded on a grace acting ab intrinseco, subscribing instead to the idea of an infallibility that rests on a grace acting ab extrinseco. The Dominican view, therefore, opposed to this a divine knowledge of conditional futures through free science; the view on predetermination thus served to show the anteriority of the divine decrees over the divine knowledge of future contingencies. The alternative, average science or free science, thus had as its principal theological stake the role held by the forecasting of merits in predestination: it was therefore a matter of solving a question left undecided by the cautious formulation of the Tridentine decree of 1547.

d) Historical Impact of These Debates. The controversy was so far-reaching that no one was able to avoid it altogether, and most of the great thinkers of the 17th century had to confront it one way or another. This was the case for Arnauld and Pascal, of course, but also for Descartes*—whose concept of human freedom has been shown by Gilson to owe, on the purely philosophical level, a debt to the theological controversies of his time. Even Malebranche addressed it, in his Réflexions sur la prémotion physique of 1715. There he intended to criticize the Thomist understanding of the connection between freedom and grace, a misconception which could, he claimed, be solved with recourse to his own system. The quarrel did not completely fade away during the 18th century and the French Revolution. Indeed it was revived in the course of the 19th century, after the encyclical Aeterni Patris of Leo XIII (4 August 1879) made a call to reestablish Catholic teaching on the basis of Thomas Aquinas's thought. The Thomists saw in this an implicit approval of the doctrine of Bañez. As for the Jesuits, who had always identified with Thomas Aquinas, they applied themselves to showing the agreement between Molinism and Thomism*, and to distinguishing Bañezianism from Thomism. At the forefront of the polemic were T. de Régnon, defender of Molinism, and H. Gayraud, who championed Bañezianism. The debate continued into the early 20th century, placing on opposing sides the Molinist A. d'Alès and the Bañezian R. Garrigou-Lagrange. As a matter of fact, it was only at the beginning of the 20th century that the two religious orders involved in these controversies ceased to demand of their respective members that they conform to their official position on these questions (see letter no. 1 by P.G. Smith, S. J., to Father de Lubac*, and no. 3, in Lettres de monsieur Étienne Gilson au Père de Lubac, Paris, 1986). However, these doctrines did not disappear, a fact attested to by J.-H. Nicolas's polemic against J. Maritain, who had proposed to introduce into the problematic of evil* the concept of breakable divine motion, and who thus came up against the opposition of what he himself called a "neo-Bañezianism."

- Baius (1563), De libero hominis arbitrio et ejus potestate, Louvain; (1563), De justitia et justificatione, Louvain; (1565), De meritis operum, Louvain; (1696), Michaelis Baii celeberrimi in Lovaniensi Academia Theologiae opera: Cum bullis Pontificum..., Köln.
- Bañez (1584), Commentarium in Iam partem summae theologiae; Commentarium in IIam IIae..., Salamanca.
- Molina (1588), Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis, divina praescientia, providentia, praedestinatione et reprobatione ad nonnullos partis divi Thomae articulos, Lisbon; (1589), Appendix ad concordiam liberi arbitrii, Lisbon; (1595), Liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis... concordia, altera sui parte auctior, Antwerp.
- Lessius (1610), De gratia efficaci, decretis divinis, libertate arbitrii et praescientia Dei conditionata, Antwerp; (1641), Censura Lovaniensis, Paris.

- J.-H. Nicolas (1960), "La permission du péché," RThom 60, 5–37, 185–206, 509–46.
- J. Maritain (1963), Dieu et la permission du mal, Paris.
- ♦ A. Serry (1700), Historia congregationum de auxiliis..., Louvain.
- L. de Meyer (1709), Historiae controversiarum de auxiliis divinae gratiae..., Antwerp.
- Du Chesne (1731), Histoire du baianisme, Douai.
- F.H. Reusch (1873), Luis de León und die spanische Inquisition, Bonn.
- G. Schneemann (1881), Controversiarum de divinae gratiae liberique arbitrii concordia initia et progressus, Freiburg.
- T. de Régnon (1883), Bañez et Molina, Paris.
- H. Gayraud (1889), Thomisme et molinisme, Paris.
- X. Le Bachelet (1903), "Baius," DThC 2/1, 31–111.
- P. Mandonnet (1903), "Bañez," ibid., 140–45.
- H. Quilliet (1907), "Congruisme," DThC 3/1, 1120–38.
- A. Astrain (1913), Historia de la Compania de Jesus en la Asistencia de España, Madrid.
- É. Gilson (1913), La liberté chez Descartes et la théologie, Paris.
- X. Le Bachelet (1913), Auctarium Bellarminianum, Paris.
- R. Garrigou-Lagrange (1915), Dieu, son existence, sa nature, Paris.
- X. Le Bachelet, et al. (1924), "Jésuites," DThC 8/1, 1012–1108.
- A. d'Alès (1927), Providentia et libre arbitre.
- F.-X. Jansen (1927), Baius et le baianisme, Louvain.
- E. Vansteenbergh (1929), "Molina," DThC 10/2, 2090–92 and 2094–2187.
- H. de Lubac (1946), Surnaturel: Études historiques, Paris (2nd Ed. 1991).
- H. Rondet (1948), Gratia Christi, Paris.
- J. Orcibal (1962), "De Baius à Jansénius: le comma pianum," RevSR 36, 115–39.
- H. de Lubac (1965), Augustinisme et théologie moderne, Paris; Le mystère du surnaturel, Paris.
- J. Orcibal (1985), Jansénius d'Ypres (1585–1638), Paris.
- W. Hasker (1989), God, Time and Knowledge, Ithaca-London, 19–52.
- W. Hübener (1989), "Praedeterminatio physica," HWP 7, 1216–25.
- T.P. Flint (1998), Divine Providence: The Molinist Account, 2nd Ed., Ithaca-London.

LAURENCE RENAULT

See also Bellarmino, Robert; Calvinism; Conversion; Grace; Jansenism; Justification; Knowledge, Divine; Liberty; Pascal, Blaise; Pelagianism; Predestination; Providence; Spirituality, Ignatian; Supernatural; Trent, Council of

Baptism

I. In Scripture

1. Terminology

The verb baptizein, from baptein, which had only secular usage, means “to submerge, to baptize.” It is used in this general sense in the Septuagint (2 Kgs 5:14). The New Testament also contains this usage (Mk 10:38), but uses the word principally to designate Christian baptism. Hence came the nouns baptismos (the act of immersion, which from the third century came more frequently to designate baptism) and baptisma, baptism.

2. Jewish World

The Old Testament mentions the use of water for ritual purification (Lv 14–15; see Mk 7:1–5). The members of the Qumran community advocated daily ablutions in their intense desire to purify themselves (1QSIII, 3–11). Toward the first century, in addition to circumcision, the baptism of converts developed, as something designed for the purification of pagans who wished to become Jews. Extant sources do not permit a precise dating of its appearance, and current scholarship tends to the view that it had no influence on Christian baptism (Légasse 1993).

3. New Testament

The presentation of baptism in the New Testament is not uniform. It underwent an evolution and has reached us via differing traditions.

a) Baptism of John the Baptist. What was usually called the Baptist movement (Thomas 1935) is now seen as an array of different trends, and there is a tendency to situate John the Baptist’s action within its singularity. The Gospels* and the Acts take pains to harmonize their respective traditions concerning John and Jesus*. They make the former the precursor of the latter, regardless of the conflicts between the two groups, and distinguish their respective baptisms by means of the opposition between water and spirit (Mt 3:11 and parallel passages). John “proclaimed a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins” (Mk 1:4; see Lk 3:3). Matthew, who restricts the remission of sins to the person of Jesus (1:21, 26:28), speaks with respect to John only of a “baptism of repentance” (3:11) and thereby indicates the efficacy attributed by other witnesses to the baptism of John. The latter had several characteristics. First was the active role of the baptizer: unlike ablutions, when one washes oneself, baptism was administered by another person. Second, it was a unique act, open to all willing to convert. It was finally an eschatological task, carried out by the prophet* of the last days, and a way to “flee from the wrath to come” (Mt 3:7). The ritual is not precisely described: water was used, but nothing indicates total immersion.

b) Baptism of Jesus by John. The fact is attested to, even though it has seemed shocking that Jesus received a baptism for the remission of sins. Matthew explains that he had in this way to “fulfill all righteousness” (3:15). The texts hardly describe the baptism itself. Rather, they tell of the prophetic investiture (Perrot 1979) of Jesus, on whom the Holy* Spirit descends like a dove, and the inauguration of his ministry*. The scene is Christianized to the point that it later served as a model for the baptism of Christians. By the same token, the characteristics of the baptism of John were transferred onto Christian baptism—with the essential difference, however, that the latter involved a relationship with Jesus.

c) Jesus the Baptist. The current tendency is to accept the testimony of John 3:22f., even though a gloss specifies that “Jesus himself did not baptize, but only his disciples” (Jn 4:2). There is no later mention of these early days of Jesus as a Baptist, perhaps for theological motives. On the one hand, John specifies that the Holy Spirit had not yet been given (Jn 7:39), while on the other hand, all the actions of Jesus tend to show that salvation* comes less from a ritual gesture than from his very person.

d) Baptism of Christians and Its Meanings. The New Testament writings give evidence of theological work on the meaning of baptism (lists of pericopes, or brief passages, in Guillet 1985). The earliest information is provided by Paul, who already speaks of baptism as a received tradition* (1 Cor 1:11–17). But we lack information for the period separating the baptism of John

(c. 30) and the earliest writings of Paul (c. 55). We therefore do not know whether the first Christians abandoned circumcision, which Pauline circles were already placing in opposition to baptism (Col 2:11ff.), nor why they adopted baptism as a rite of adherence (Acts 2:41) to Christ and to his body. The baptism received by Jesus himself probably had nothing to do with it.

Paul developed the theology* of baptism in a very original way by deepening the relationship between the baptized and Jesus, going so far as to assert that “all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death” (Rom 6:3). The pneumatological and ecclesiastical meaning of baptism is nonetheless affirmed, because “in one Spirit we were all baptized into one body” (1 Cor 12:13). Colossians, which constitutes an admirable baptismal catechesis*, elaborated still further the relationship to the Resurrection at a later stage of the tradition (2:12).

In the synoptic Gospels, baptism is presented as a rite of water that Jesus himself received, with the Holy Spirit, at the beginning of his mission.

As for Acts, this book poses in particular the problem of the relationship of baptism to the Holy Spirit. According to Acts 2:38 and 10:47, baptism is accompanied by the gift of the Holy Spirit (after or before). According to Acts 8:15 f. and 19:2–6, the laying* on of hands is added to the baptismal rite with a view to the gift of the Holy Spirit. Attempts have been made to distinguish these two traditions by the formulations used: baptism in (or on) the name of Jesus Christ (Lucan tradition, with the gift of the Holy Spirit); baptism for the name of the Lord Jesus (Pauline tradition, with the laying on of hands; see Quesnel 1985). According to Légasse (1993), the second expression is the older one. Initially indicating only the relationship to Jesus, it acquired a stronger theological sense by following the evolution of Christology*. As for the relationship between baptism and the Holy Spirit, the tradition is ambivalent.

John 3:5 reaffirms this relationship and sets out the necessity of baptism in order to enter into the kingdom* of God*, an affirmation that later took on great significance. 1 John 5:6ff. leads toward a synthesis in attesting that Jesus Christ came not with water alone (John), nor blood (Paul), nor by the Holy Spirit of pneumatology, but that these three move toward the One, the Christ*, the wound in whose side let flow blood and water before he gave up the spirit (Jn 19:30–34).

The most complete presentations of baptism are found in the conclusions of Matthew and Mark, which belong to later textual strata. In both, the risen Christ solemnly sends his apostles on a mission. Mark 16:16 establishes a link between baptism and faith*, whereas Matthew 28:19 presents a Trinitarian formulation whose success was later evident in baptismal liturgies.

Beyond the diversity of its traditions, the New Testament thus ends by presenting baptism as a unique act with water (Eph 4:5), carried out by the church* in the name of the Trinity* to join the baptized to the community. As for the rite, it is nowhere described precisely. Acts 8:38 indicates that Philip and the eunuch go down “into the water,” while verse 37 (Western tradition) points to a christological profession of faith.

II. In History

I. First Four Centuries

The diversity of traditions encountered in the New Testament continued, since Christian baptism did not refer back to an originating biblical text, as the Eucharist* did to the Last Supper. And although the baptismal ritual expanded during Christian antiquity, there was only a single celebration of Christian initiation*. Unity came more from a general understanding of baptism as a Trinitarian celebration of entry into the Church than from a (nonexistent) ritual uniformity.

Evidence from the second century is scant (Benoît 1953). Chapter seven of the Didache presents baptism after the instruction of the first six chapters. It mentions baptism in the name of the three divine Persons*, but also in the name of the Lord (9, 5). It provides details on the use of water, possibly only by sprinkling, and on the fasting that was counseled for all those who were able. Justin added in the middle of the century that the meaning of baptism is an illumination (phôtismos), and he noted that the celebration leads to the Eucharist (I Apol. 61, 65).

The third century saw significant expansion of ritual (exorcisms, holy* oils, laying on of hands) which basically derived from Scripture*, even though this expansion found support in practices of the ancient world. Tertullian* was the first to provide a treatise on baptism (early third century). The Apostolic Tradition (in Rome c. 215) offers the first ritual worthy of the name. It begins with a catechesis (numbers 15–20), which might last for three years, and is presented as an ordeal with many exorcisms. Baptism takes place after a vigil (probably at Easter). After the renunciation of Satan and a first anointing by the presbyter* with the oil of exorcism, the naked candidates go down into the pool with a deacon*, for a threefold profession of faith by means of questions and answers and a threefold submersion in the water. There follows a christological anointing by the presbyter with chrism, reclathing, and entry into the church. There the bishop* lays his hands on each person while making a prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit. Then he performs a third, Trinitarian, anointing, and gives each person the kiss of peace. There follows a general prayer and the bringing of gifts for the Eucharist. This very ample ritual influenced the entire Western tradition. Its ecclesiastical sense should be emphasized: having become Christians on their entry into the catechumenate, and chosen (electi) in the final phase, the baptized become worshipers by receiving the sacrament of faith and thereby truly enter into the Christian community. The celebration is carried out by the bishop, accompanied by deacons and presbyters, and it is crowned by the Eucharist.

One cannot generalize on the basis of this information, however, particularly with respect to the Eastern Church, in which various traditions were present. In Syria, for example, the Acts of Thomas (Syriac, early third century) linked the gift of the Holy Spirit to a pre-baptismal anointing (the seal), and this was still the case with John Chrysostom*: they contained neither a profession of faith nor an act of renunciation. In Alexandria baptism took place at the Epiphany, the feast of the baptism of Christ and hence of Christians. The Coptic liturgy developed a baptismal theology along the lines of the synoptic Gospels. Like Jesus, the Christian was baptized at the outset of his existence, thus receiving the Holy Spirit in view of his mission. Forty days later there took place a presentation at the temple*.

The second half of the fourth century saw a flowering of major baptismal and mystagogical catechesis* that reflected the importance attributed to Christian initiation by the bishops of the time: Cyril (or John) of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Ambrose. They provide plentiful information on baptismal theology and rites (Camelot 1963), which at the time tended to be communicated from one church to another. They indicate the greater importance attached to the Pauline* theology of baptism, as a passing through the death and Resurrection of Christ. This notion, infrequently represented before this time, helped to give the gift of the Holy Spirit a more prominent place, in parallel with the Council of Constantinople* of 381. Postbaptismal rites also appeared where they had not existed earlier.

Baptism of infants is mentioned explicitly for the first time by Tertullian in the early third century, in order to express his opposition (“Yes, let them come, but when they are older, old enough to be taught,” De baptismo 18, 4. The Apostolic Tradition indicates clearly, moreover, that there was no question, as in later practice, of baptizing children alone. They were baptized with their parents (a probable continuation of the “household” baptism mentioned in Acts 16:15). Thereafter, in the fourth century, we can observe a wave of delay in baptism. The Cappadocians, John Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine*, and others, born of Christian parents, were baptized as adults, perhaps for reasons relating to penitential discipline (Jeremias 1967), but once they had become bishops, they declared themselves in favor of infant baptism.

Theological difficulties arose with the appearance of Novatianism*. The disciples of Novatian rebaptized Christians wishing to join their movement. In the church as a whole there were two traditions on this point: Africa and Asia Minor also rebaptized, whereas Rome* and Egypt were satisfied with a laying on of hands. There was a vigorous controversy between Africa and Rome in the mid-third century. Several African councils met to consider the question, and Cyprian wrote his letters 69 through 74 on the subject. Pope* Stephen held to the principle: Nihil innovetur nisi quod traditum est, ut manus illis imponatur in paenitentiam (Ep. 74. 2. 2–3): “Let there be no innovation, but let us merely follow the tradition by a laying on of hands as a sign of penance*.” Cyprian, for his part, argued that there was only one baptism, the one conferred by the central church, for there was only one Church and only one Holy Spirit, and no one could have God as a Father* if he did not have the Church as a mother (Ep. 74. 7. 2). Moreover, “outside the Church, there is no salvation” (Ep. 73. 21. 2). In baptism, the church transmitted what belonged to it. The so-called baptism of heretics was nothing but an aquatic rite.

This position was not maintained. The Council of Arles in 314 adopted the Roman idea and affirmed that the value of baptism depended on the content of the faith professed (can. 8). The Council of Nicaea* in 325 ratified these views (cans. 8 and 19).

The controversy continued against Donatism*, in the form of a conflict that Augustine succeeded in resolving by moving from Cyprian’s ecclesiological concept of baptism to a christological one. Baptism did not belong in the first instance to the church, but to God and to Christ. Whoever the minister, it was always Christ who baptized (Jn 1:33), hence the celebrated sentence: “If Peter baptizes, he [Christ] baptizes; if Paul baptizes, he baptizes; if Judas baptizes, he baptizes” (Commentary on John VI. 5–8, CChr.SL 36. 56–57). In this context arose the technical notion of minister of a sacrament. Augustine distinguished the potestas of baptism (which belonged only to Christ) from the ministerium of the minister. The latter did not give of himself (Cyprian), he was only the servant of Christ. From that point on, it has been accepted in the West that, in case of emergency, anyone can baptize, even someone who has not been baptized, provided he intends to do what the Church does (DS 1315, 1617).

The critique of Pelagianism* provided the occasion for further refinements. The Pelagians did baptize infants, but on account of the innocence of infants, the Pelagians denied that they received baptism for the remission of sins. Augustine made the objection that their baptism itself indicated that they had to be saved. "From what, if not from death, from vices, from the bonds, the slavery, the darkness of sin? As their age prevents them from having committed any personally, there remains original sin" (On the Merits of Sins and Their Remissions, and on the Baptism of Little Children 412, I. 26. 39, PL 44, 131).

We can thus see the development of the doctrine of original sin in Augustine, under the dual presupposition of the personal innocence of children (presupposed by the argument) and the already accepted baptism of infants that was bestowed "for the remission of sin." Once asserted, the doctrine in turn became a motive for baptizing children. Infant baptism later prevailed in the West, to the point of obscuring the positive values of baptism asserted, for example, by John Chrysostom (Baptismal Catecheses III. 5–6).

In the Donatist controversy Augustine further developed the features of what was to become the doctrine of the character of baptism (DS 1609). Wishing in fact to emphasize the definitive aspect of the sacrament, he spoke of sacramentum manens. Among the images used to explain its reality was that of the sheep marked with its owner's brand.

From the second half of the fourth century on, the majority of the Mediterranean population became Christian. This success brought about changes in the sociological composition of the Church, as witnessed by the letter of Innocent I to Decentius of Gubbio, showing the consequences of this new situation for baptism and confirmation, the Eucharist, and the ministries*. As for Christian initiation, East and West took separate paths. The former gave pride of place to the unity of initiation and granted to presbyters the right to confer it in its entirety. The West maintained for confirmation* a link to the bishop, which led to a gradual dissociation between baptism and confirmation.

2. High Middle Ages in the West

In the fifth century infant baptism became more frequent than baptism of adults. In episcopal cities baptism was still administered at Easter by the bishop, who performed confirmation and gave the Eucharist in the same ceremony. In rural areas priests increasingly baptized children at birth and gave them Communion with the sacred blood. On rare occasions Communion was delayed until a visit by the bishop.

Liturgical books of the eighth century, after providing questions and answers on faith, added a baptismal formula modeled on Matthew 28:19, which, it may be assumed, was already known in the West two centuries earlier (De Clerck 1990). The relationship between faith and baptism was thereby modified. One was no longer baptized by professing one's faith, and the pattern of questions and answers can be seen as a kind of preliminary condition for baptism, which was itself performed by the minister with the help of a formula designating precisely him as subject of the action ("I baptize you"). This formula became the pattern for other sacraments*.

3. Middle Ages in the West

It can be said that from the 12th century the West practiced baptism quam primum: that is, administered it as soon as possible after birth. This represented a complete break with paschal baptism, and also with First Communion*, which was postponed around this time until the age of reason. Thus, each of the three sacraments of Christian initiation, once parts of a single celebration, became autonomous. In the list of the sacramental septenary established in 1150, baptism, confirmation, and the Eucharist are listed separately. For their part, the Scholastic theologians systematized the teaching received, as can be seen, for example, in the Summa Theologica of Thomas* Aquinas, IIIa. q. 66–71.

The question also arose of children who died without baptism, a pressing question in a society with high infant mortality and where the theology of baptism was dominated by the consideration of original sin. There was a refinement of the theory of the "limbo*" (intermediate place) of children." Not having been baptized, they could not enter the kingdom of God, according to John 3:5. On the other hand, their innocence made it repugnant to think of them as damned. According to Thomas (Sent. II. d. 33, q. 2), these children were deprived of the beatific* vision, but because nature was not in itself turned toward the supernatural*, they did not suffer from this loss: "There is no sadness in being deprived of a good to which one is not suited" (Boissard 1974). This theology, softer than Augustinian views, was never adopted as a doctrine of the church. It nevertheless had a great deal of influence and did not dispel all fears. In this connection there were "sanctuaries of respite," places of pilgrimage* where children who had died without baptism were carried and placed on the altar, where some of them seemed to recover a brief moment of life, which was taken as an opportunity to baptize them.

4. Reformation and Modern Times

The major figures of the Reformation challenged neither baptism as such nor infant baptism in particular. Criticism came from the Anabaptists*, who opposed infant baptism on the biblical premise that the New Testament requires faith for baptism; as well as on the ecclesiological premise that the Church can be made up only of those who confess their faith. The Anabaptists were the precursors of the 17th-century Baptists*, who professed the same theology of baptism and administered it through immersion.

5. 20th Century

This century is marked by two major events, the ecumenical movement and the Second Vatican* Council*.

a) The constitution Sacrosanctum Concilium of Vatican II devotes numbers 64 to 70 to baptism. Number 64 decides on the restoration of the adult catechuminate, to be accomplished in stages. Number 66 calls for the revision of the rite of infant baptism in order “to adapt it to the real situation of the very young.” Number 69 proposes, for a child baptized in an emergency, the composition of a rite of welcome into the community (see chap. VI of the Rite of the Baptism of Little Children) and, for people baptized in other faiths, a rite of admission into full communion with the Church (in the Ritual of the Christian Initiation of Adults).

These proposals were carried out by the Consilium for the realization of the constitution. The Ritual of the Baptism of Little Children was published in Latin in 1969, and the same year in a provisional French translation. The French text was finally approved in 1984. It contains important “doctrinal and pastoral Notes” that provide a key for the ritual part. The principal modifications are of two kinds. On the one hand, baptism has again become a liturgy of the Word*. On the other, this was the first time in the history of the church that it published a ritual “adapted to the real situation of the very young,” a fact that permits the assertion that in the consciousness of the church the theological model of baptism is indeed that of adults. This adaptation also means that parents, and not godparents, are now in the forefront. They “exercise a true ministry*” (Notes, no. 40) when they request baptism for their child and themselves profess the faith of the church. The Ritual for the Christian Initiation of Adults was published in Latin in 1972, in a provisional French edition in 1974, and an approved edition in 1997. The notion of Christian initiation, rediscovered by L. Duchesne in the late 19th century, was adopted by Vatican II and heads all rituals. The Ritual for the Christian Initiation of Adults is a large book that, in addition to “doctrinal and pastoral Notes,” contains the ritual of catechesis, which may last as long as three years, and the ritual of the sacraments of initiation. It is structured in four periods (first evangelization, catechesis, final fast, and mystagogy), and three celebrations (entry into catechesis, decisive call and inscription of the name, and the sacraments themselves). The sacraments are customarily celebrated during the Easter vigil by the bishop, or else by the priest, who in this case may himself confirm the newly baptized (no. 228; see LG no. 26, stipulating that the bishop is the originating minister of confirmation). This prescription is the exact opposite of that of the High Middle Ages, and thus does away with the principal cause of the dispersal of Christian initiation through several rituals.

b) The ecumenical movement has obviously been concerned with baptism. From its first conference in Lausanne in 1927, “Faith and Constitution” placed on the agenda the question of a document of doctrinal convergence on baptism. It went through various versions before being published in Lima in 1982 under the title of Baptism, Eucharist, Ministry (BEM), so that it might be examined by various churches, whose responses led to a report published in 1991.

These advances have allowed for mutual recognition by churches of baptisms celebrated within each one, in particular in Belgium (1971), France (1972), and Germany (Concord of Leuenberg, 1973) (Sicard 1991). The CIC now favors the validity of non-Catholic baptism; it stipulates: “People baptized in a non-Catholic church community must not be baptized conditionally, unless there is a serious reason to doubt the validity of the baptism, considering both the matter and the formula used for its administration, as well as the intention of the adult who has been baptized and the minister who has done the baptizing” (can. 869 §2).

III. Theology of Baptism

The Christian initiation of adults constitutes the model of baptism. It best realizes its ritual expression and offers the best basis for theological reflection. Indeed, it is on the basis of the initiation of adults that an understanding of the particular case of infant baptism can be attained.

1. Baptism and Personal Fate

Baptism, whether of children or adults, constitutes the basis of the personal identity of the Christian. In the case of infant baptism, its principal sign is the bestowal of the name, which begins the ritual procedure. For the adult, this identity is received in the midst of the tragic course of his existence. It is a deliberate choice, on the one hand against the evil* that he has experienced in his former life (renunciation), and on the other, in favor of God, his Christ, and the Holy Spirit, whose love is stronger than any form of death (profession of faith).

2. Meaning of the Baptism of Adults

All baptisms are carried out through the mediation of a Christian community, but this is not the ultimate purpose of the ritual. The questions asked immediately before the administration of the water concern faith in the Trinitarian God. This expresses the sacramental value of the event as an act of God, carried out by his Church, and not merely a rite of belonging. This sacramental logic leads naturally to a consideration first of the ecclesiastical relations established by baptism, followed by a contemplation of the Trinitarian relations in which baptismal grace* resides.

a) Baptism as the Establishment of a Relation to the Church. According to Acts 2:41, “there were added that day about three thousand souls”; and since the verb has no object, it can be understood that the newly baptized were added to Christ, in whose name they were baptized, as well as to the community. Verse 47 supports this interpretation: certain variants name the Church. Every baptism is carried out by the Church and one of its ministers (bishop, priest, or deacon) in the Church (for “no one can have God as a Father if he does not have the Church as a Mother” Cyprian, Ep. 74. 7), with a view toward establishing the Church. What church does the baptized person join? Not only the local community, because moving to another community does not involve rebaptism. The sacramental dimension of baptism and the recent agreements for interchurch recognition of baptism encourage the assertion that the baptized are joined to the Church of God. But this is necessarily accomplished through the mediation of a particular church. And because all churches are not in communion with one another, it must be recognized that although the baptized are joined to the Church of God, at the same time they become members of a denominational church, although the Catholic Church, for one, considers that there “subsists” in it the fullness of “churchness.” Under the heading of Incorporation into the Body of Christ, the BEM writes: “Celebrated in obedience to our Lord, baptism is a sign and a seal of our engagement as disciples. Through their own baptism, Christians are led to union with Christ, with every other Christian, and with the Church of all times and places. Our common baptism, which unites us to Christ in faith, is thus a fundamental bond of unity*. We are one people and we are called to confess and to serve one Lord, in every place and throughout the world. The union with Christ that we share through baptism has important implications for Christian unity: ‘There is...one baptism, one God and Father of all’ (Eph 4:4–6). When baptismal unity is realized in the one holy, Catholic, and apostolic Church, an authentic Christian witness may be rendered to the love of God that cures and reconciles. This is why our single baptism in Christ constitutes an appeal to the churches for them to overcome their divisions and to visibly manifest their communion” (no. 6). Baptism indeed constitutes the foundation of the unity of Christians, within a Church of which one becomes a member by an act of Christ (and not by the cooptation of other members), as well as among churches that find in that unity the reason for their ecumenical efforts.

Baptism establishes a relationship to God through the mediation of a church, but it does not exclude other paths to salvation by Christ, for “all things were created through him and for him” (Col 1:16), and “God our Savior...desires all people to be saved” (1 Tm 2:4). For although it is correct to say that baptism in faith does save, it is more accurate to assert that it is God who saves through baptism, or through other means of his mercy*. According to classical theology, the necessity of baptism is as a precept*, and not as a means, for “God has not tied his power to the sacraments” (Thomas Aquinas, ST IIIa, q. 64, a. 7). The necessity for baptism is felt by anyone who perceives in the sacrament the realization of a covenant* with God.

b) Baptism as the Establishment of Trinitarian Relationships. The relationship to Christ, chronologically the first (Acts 2:38; 1 Cor 1:13), also turns out to be the most fundamental (Rom 6:3–11). This is corroborated by the first gesture of the celebration, the making of the sign of the cross, and by the Western tradition of celebrating baptism at Easter. From the point of view of the baptized, in fact, baptism consists of passing into the death of Christ in order to rise with him and “walk in newness of life” (Rom 6:4). From the point of view of Christ, baptism is the act through which he commits his faithfulness to those who have given him their faith, and this is affirmed in other terms by the doctrine of baptismal character (DS 1609). We can thus see a structure of reciprocity governing the logic of the sacramental act. The intention of God in Christ is received by people who answer him in the Holy Spirit, with a view to building the Church. In baptism Christians receive their vocation. As the prayer accompanying the anointing with chrism states: “Henceforth, you are one of His people, you are members of the body of Christ, and you participate in his dignity as priest, prophet, and king.” This vocation is elaborated in Lumen Gentium 34–36. Read in this way, the Christian life is from beginning to end a baptismal life.

The relationship to the Holy Spirit is affirmed in the New Testament. For Luke it is the strength of God received for mission*, while for Paul the emphasis is on inward transformation and sanctification. Even though there is a specific gift of the Holy Spirit at confirmation, its absence at baptism does not follow, since baptism is given in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The gift of the Holy Spirit is the remission of sins (Jn 20:22f.). To be baptized is thus to receive a Spirit different from one's own and to be called to bear its fruits (Gal 5:22) in a "spiritual" life*.

"All who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God" (Rom 8:14). The outcome of the baptismal process is the relationship to God, recognized as Father and Creator, with the confident existence that this relationship provides, for "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (Rom 8:31–39).

3. Particular Meaning of Infant Baptism

a) Justification for Infant Baptism. Since baptism is a sacrament of faith, how can we accept the validity of a true baptism celebrated at an age that in principle excludes any personal expression of faith? The answer consists in asserting the need for a substitution, a vicarious faith that the tradition of the Church locates at two levels. On the one hand, there is the faith of the Church, in which every sacrament (and not only infant baptism) is celebrated. This compels the recognition that the expression "baptism, a sacrament of faith" has not only a subjective meaning (the baptized must give their answer of faith), but also an objective meaning: by baptizing, the Church establishes the sacramental figure of its faith in the salvation of God. This permits us to understand that the subject of faith is not primarily an individual, but the Church, the people of God. In other words, the existence of infant baptism also brings to the fore the dimensions of faith itself.

On the other hand, the faith of others (fides aliena) is required, in the sense that the faith of the Church must be transmitted by concrete individuals. In the view of theologians who accept it, infant baptism is justified when it is requested by believers (Thomas Aquinas, ST IIIa, q. 68), and these do not necessarily have to be the child's own parents.

b) Reasons for Infant Baptism. Among the theological reasons for infant baptism, first place must be given to God's will for universal salvation, which is also applied to little children. The very existence of infant baptism demonstrates that they matter in the eyes of God. Another reason is original sin. Even though no current sin is clearly imputable to infants, they are nevertheless born into a world in which human beings have immemorially needed to be saved by God (DS 1514). Moreover, infant baptism is a perfect image of the gratuitous nature of salvation: even before children can possibly respond, God's initiative is celebrated for their benefit. This is the reason for the prevenient grace that is of such importance to Lutherans. It can be elaborated along more existential lines by showing how infant baptism comes together with the very mystery of human existence. Humankind in fact has little mastery over its own life. In any event, no individual initiates his own coming into existence. Infant baptism represents a symbolic reduplication of this fact, which probably explains its persistence through history, despite constant criticism. Finally, infant baptism offers a paradigm of ecclesiastical solidarity, because it would have no meaning if salvation were only individual. Here too, then, it brings to the fore various dimensions of faith.

c) Objections to Infant Baptism. These have often been expressed and are summed up in the Instruction on the Baptism of Little Children promulgated by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in October 1980. In addition to the impossibility of a profession of faith already mentioned, the two principal objections concern the kind of Church to which infant baptism leads, and the question of liberty*.

The critique of the multitudinist Church to which the practice of infant baptism leads has often been voiced during the second half of the 20th century. This voice has also been heard, and many churches have taken measures in the face of "generalized infant baptism" (J.-J. von Allmen 1967), in particular regarding the preparation of parents. Social and ecclesiastical changes in the West have brought about a more open position with respect to infant baptism (Gisel 1994).

The most frequently heard objection concerns the liberty of children and a sectarian conception of the baptism of little children. Whatever may have been true in the past, the new Catholic rite is addressed to the parents, and it is they who are invited to profess their own faith at the baptism of their child. The child is of course the one who is baptized, but a possible later withdrawal by the child cannot be considered an apostasy, insofar as the child has not yet personally adhered to the faith of the baptism. Moreover, the objection can be refuted by a philosophical reflection on liberty, which is not, in fact, to be confused with perpetual caprice, but represents the power to make choices and to register them throughout life. One might equally ask if this objection does not also reveal some uncertainty on the part of the parents regarding their own practices of faith.

d) Particularities of the Baptism of Adults and Children. We can hold to the traditional assertion according to which there is only one baptism (Eph 4:4) if we clearly bring out the different logical bases of infant baptism and adult baptism. The differences between the two forms of baptism are obvious. They concern the subjects (adults—little children), the minister (bishop—priest or deacon), and the ritual sequence (three years—a single celebration). Beyond these differences, there are two distinct models. In the Christian initiation of adults, numerous elements of the approach to faith precede baptism. Baptism is celebrated on Easter night along with confirmation and the Eucharist (see RCIA, no. 34), which initiate the time of mystagogy. When it comes to infant baptism, the model is exactly the reverse: everything that precedes baptism for adults comes after it for children. We are thus confronted with two different logical bases for the same baptism, a logic of conversion* for adults, and a logic of ongoing education for children (De Clerck 1991).

• 1. General Works

- A. Hamman (1969), Baptême et confirmation, Paris.
 H. Bourgeois (1982), L'Initiation chrétienne et ses sacrements, Paris.

2. Scripture

- J. Thomas (1935), Le mouvement baptiste en Palestine et en Syrie (150 av. J.-C.–300 ap. J.-C.), Gembloux.
 J. D. G. Dunn (1970), Baptism in the Holy Spirit: A Re-examination of the New Testament Teaching on the Gift of the Spirit in Relation to Pentecostalism Today, London.
 C. Perrot (1979), Jésus et l'histoire, Paris (2nd Ed. 1993), 95–136.
 J. Guillet (1985), Entre Jésus et l'Église, Paris.
 M. Quesnel (1985), Baptisés dans l'Esprit B. et Esprit Saint dans les Actes des Apôtres, LeDiv 120.
 S. Légasse (1993), Naissance du baptême, LeDiv 153.

3. History

- J. Daniélou (1951), Bible et liturgie: La théologie biblique des sacrements d'après les Pères de l'Église, Paris.
 A. Benoît (1953), Le baptême chrétien au IIe siècle: La théologie des Pères, Paris.
 L. Villette (1959–64), Foi et sacrement, vol. 1: Du Nouveau Testament à saint Augustin, Paris; vol. 2: De saint Thomas à Karl Barth, ibid.
 M. Dujarier (1962), Le parrainage des adultes aux trois premiers siècles de l'Église, Paris.
 J. Ysebaert (1962), Greek Baptismal Terminology: Its Origin and Early Development, Nimègue.
 P. T. Camelot (1963), Spiritualité du baptême, Paris (2nd Ed. 1993).
 J. C. Didier (1967), Faut-il baptiser les petits enfants? La réponse de la tradition, Paris.
 J. Jeremias (1967), Le baptême des petits enfants pendant les quatre premiers siècles, Le Puy.
 G. Kretschmar (1970), "Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche," in K. F. Müller, W. Blankenburg (Ed.), Leiturgia: Handbuch des evangelischen Gottesdienstes, vol. 5, Cassel, 1–348.
 E. Boissard (1974), Réflexions sur le sort des enfants morts sans baptême, Paris.
 G. Kretschmar (1977), "Nouvelles recherches sur l'initiation chrétienne," MD 132, 7–32.
 A. Jilek (1979), Initiationsfeier und Amt: Ein Beitrag zur Struktur und Theologie der Ämter und des Taufgottesdienstes in der frühen Kirche (Tr. ap., Tertullian, Cyprian), Frankfurt.
 P. De Clerck (1986), "La dissociation du baptême et de la confirmation au haut Moyen Age," MD 168, 47–75.

- V. Saxer (1988), Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du IIe au VIe siècle: Esquisse historique et signification d'après les principaux témoins, Spoleto.
 A. Benoit, C. Munier (1994), Le baptême dans l'Église ancienne (I-IIIe siècles), Berne.

4. Liturgy

a) Contemporary Rites

- Ordo baptismi parvulorum*, Rome, 1969 (2nd Ed. 1973).
Ordo initiationis christianae adultorum (OICA), Rome, 1972.
 "Ordo initiationis puerorum qui aetatem catechetica adepti sunt," chap. V, OICA.

b) Studies

- A. Stenzel (1958), Die Taufe: Eine genetische Erklärung der Taufliturgie, Innsbruck.
 A. Kavanagh (1978), The Shape of Baptism: The Rite of Christian Initiation, New York.
 R. Cabié (1984), "L'Initiation chrétienne," in A.-G. Martimort (Ed.), L'Église en prière, New Ed., Paris, 21–114.
 B. Kleinheyer (1989), Die Feiern der Eingliederung in der Kirche, Regensburg.
 P. De Clerck (1990), "Les origines de la formule baptismale," in P. De Clerck, E. Palazzo (Ed.), Rituels: Mélanges offerts à P.-M. Gy O.P., Paris, 199–213.
 O. Sarda (1991), "Baptême des enfants en âge de scolarité: La situation en France," MD 185, 61–83.
 N. Duval, J. Guyon (1993), "Le baptistère en Occident," MD 193, 53–70.

5. Ecumenism

- A. Houssiau (1970), "Implications théologiques de la reconnaissance interecclésiale du baptême," RTL 1, 393–410.
 A. de Halleux (1980), "Orthodoxie et catholicisme: Un seul baptême?" RTL 11, 416–52.
 COE, Foi et Constitution (1982), B., Eucharistie, Ministère: Convergence de la foi (Lima, January 1982), Paris.
 Presses de Taizé (1991), Rapport sur le processus "BEM" et les réactions des Églises, 1982–1990 (repr. Paris, 1993).
 D. Sicard (1991), "Reconnaissance du baptême: Perspectives œcuméniques," MD 185, 117–30.
 G. Sava-Popa (1994), Le baptême dans la tradition orthodoxe et ses implications œcuméniques, Fribourg.

6. Theology

- J.-J. von Allmen (1967), "Réflexions d'un protestant sur le pédobaptême généralisé," MD 89, 66–86.
 K. Barth (1967), KD IV/4 (Dogmatique), Geneva, 1969, vol. 26).
 J.-J. von Allmen (1978), Pastorale du baptême, Fribourg.
 Congrégation [romaine] pour la doctrine de la foi (1980), Instruction sur le baptême des petits enfants, DC 77, vol. 1797, 1107–13.
 A. Houssiau, et al. (1983), Le baptême, entrée dans l'existence chrétienne, Brussels.
 H. Bourgeois (1991), Théologie catéchuménale: A propos de la "nouvelle" évangélisation, Paris.
 P. De Clerck (1991), "Un seul baptême? Le baptême des adultes et celui des petits enfants," MD 185, 7–33.
 P. Gisel (1994), Pourquoi baptiser: Mystère chrétien et rite de passage, Geneva.

PAUL DE CLERCK

See also Anointing of the Sick; Confirmation; Eucharist; Marriage; Ordination/Order; Sacrament

Baptists

Baptists believe that only those who make a personal profession of faith* in Jesus Christ should be baptized, and that baptism* should be by immersion. They believe, furthermore, that every member of a local church should participate in the government of that church, and that no external authority, ecclesiastical or political, should interfere in its affairs.

a) Origins. There were two kinds of Baptism in England in the 17th century: these were known as General Baptism and Particular Baptism. The former group carried the conviction, inspired by Arminianism (Calvinism*), that redemption was “general” and that all men could be saved. It was at first an extreme form of Puritanism*. Some of the members of this group sought refuge in Amsterdam where, under the influence of the Anabaptist* movement, they became convinced that baptism should be reserved for believers. In 1609 their spiritual leader, John Smyth (c. 1554–1612), baptized himself before baptizing his companions. In a treatise written the same year (Parallels, Censures, Observations) he defended the idea that each “federal community,” or community of covenant*, constituted a church in which ecclesiastical authority* fully inhered.

In 1612 Thomas Helwis (c. 1550–c. 1616) took part of the group back to England and published an appeal for complete religious toleration, The Mystery of Iniquity. From this group sprang others that would, in time, baptize only by immersion. Particular Baptism, on the other hand, held to the strict Calvinist doctrine that Christ* had died only for the “particular” group of the elect. This current formed in London in the 1630s by separating from Congregationalism*. Its 1644 creed* holds that baptism is only for those who have faith, relying in part on Matthew 28:18 f. (McBeth 1990). Another confession, published in 1689, long remained the touchstone of orthodoxy in this group.

b) 18th Century. The rationalism* of the 18th century led most Baptists of the first group to adopt a Christology* that was more or less close to Arianism*. By 1719 a majority of them refused to reaffirm their belief in the Trinity*, and at the end of the century some of them were very close to Unitarianism*. The second group, in contrast, adopted a strengthened Calvinism. Its best theologian, John Gill, was a resolute defender of the doctrine of election* (The Cause of God and Truth, 1735–38). In the second half of the century, under the influence of the Great Awakening, a more moderate version of Calvinism gradually came to predominate, placing on believers the obligation to proclaim the gospel. Expounded by Andrew Fuller (1754–1815) in The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation (1785), this more moderate Calvinism gave impetus to the creation of the Baptist Missionary Society (1792). In North America the “Separate” Baptists, products of the Great Awakening, swelled the ranks of the Particular (also called “Regular”) Baptists. There were also General Baptists (known as “Freewill” Baptists) in England and the United States. Some of their North American leaders, including Isaac Backus and John Leland, helped to impose the idea of a separation between church* and state.

c) 19th Century. The number of Baptists increased in the 19th century, and theological precision came to count for less than the expansion of the church. In 1833 the New Hampshire Confession, widely adopted in the United States, was deliberately silent on the points of disagreement between the Regular and Freewill Baptists (who had opposing views on predestination*). In England Robert Hall (1764–1831) succeeded in persuading his coreligionists to admit to Communion Christians who had not been given the baptism of believers. The Baptists who did not agree with this development formed separate groups: the “Anti-Mission” Baptists in the United States, the “Strict and Particular” Baptists in England. In the southern United States, which had formed a separate convention since 1845, the “Landmark” movement became distinctly sectarian by deciding in the 1850s that baptism was valid only when it was administered by Baptists. In 1887–88 in England, the beginnings of a certain theological liberalism came under attack from Charles Haddon Spurgeon (1834–92), the greatest English-language preacher of the time. The Baptist Union, which absorbed the General Baptists in 1891, maintained a very conservative Protestantism*. During this time, Baptism had established a foothold in Europe, largely due to J.G. Oncken (1800–84), and in other parts of the world due to foreign missions.

d) 20th Century. In the early 20th century North American Baptism produced an eminent representative of social Christianity, Walter Rauschenbusch (1861–1918), and a modernist* theologian, Shailer Mathews. Fundamentalism* nevertheless predominated between the wars, with such writers as W.B. Riley, J. Frank Norris, and T.T. Shields, for whom orthodoxy consisted in believing in the imminence of the Second Coming of Christ (Parousia*). The resulting debate provoked the secession of a large number of Baptists and the formation of new groups, who still called themselves Baptists but had a visceral distrust of biblical criticism and any other symptom of liberalism. This debate had repercussions outside North America, but theological polarization was generally less pronounced. Later, the ecumenical movement (although supported by the English historian Ernest Payne) was regarded with suspicion, especially out of fear of a compromise with Catholicism*. Since 1979 the Southern Baptist Convention, the largest Protestant denomination in the United States, has been torn by quarrels over the inerrancy of the Bible*. Undoubtedly, the most well-known Baptists of the modern era have been Billy Graham (1918–) and Martin Luther King (1929–68).

- W.L. Lumpkin, Baptist Confessions of Faith, Valley Forge, 1959 (Rev. Ed., 1969).
- H.L. McBeth, A Sourcebook for Baptist Heritage, Nashville, Tenn., 1990.
- ♦ E.C. Starr (1947–76), A Baptist Bibliography, 25 vols., Philadelphia.
- G. Rousseau (1951), Histoire des Églises baptistes dans le monde, Paris.
- R.G. Torbet (1955), Ventures of Faith, Philadelphia.
- B.R. White (1983), The English Baptists of the XVIIth Century, London.
- M. Thobois (1986–91), “Histoire des baptistes de France,” Croire et Servir, Paris.
- H.L. McBeth (1987), The Baptist Heritage, Nashville, Tenn.
- W.H. Brackney (1988), The Baptists, New York.
- T. George, D.S. Dockery (Ed.) (1990), Baptist Theologians, Nashville, Tenn.
- B. Stanley (1992), The History of the Baptist Missionary Society, 1792–1992, Edinburgh.
- J.C. Fletcher (1994), The Southern Baptist Convention, Nashville, Tenn.
- A.W. Wardin (Ed.) (1995), Baptists around the World, Nashville, Tenn.

DAVID W. BEBBINGTON

See also Anabaptists; Calvinism; Congregationalism; Fundamentalism; Protestantism; Puritanism

Barth, Karl

1886–1968

Karl Barth was certainly the most influential Protestant theologian (Protestantism*) since Schleiermacher*, leaving a body of writing that has been the subject of constant debate. His major work, Die Kirchliche Dogmatik (Church Dogmatics), could be compared to a cathedral of theological thought.

I. Life and Work

Barth was born in Basel in 1886, to a family of theologians. In turn he studied theology with the leading representatives of 19th-century liberal theology*: A. von Harnack (1851–1930), H. Gunkel (1862–1932), and W. Herrmann (1846–1922). In Geneva he became familiar with Calvin*'s work. Then he was appointed pastor at Safenwill parish in Aargau, where the social structure led him to join the movement for social Christianity and encouraged him to join the battle for social justice geared toward the coming of the kingdom of God*.

The war of 1914–18 had a profound and decisive impact on Barth: the conformist stance taken by many of his teachers brought him to question the very foundations of their thought. He therefore focused on the Epistle to the Romans in order to try to find an answer to the questions that weighed on him. As a result he wrote Commentary, of which both editions (1919, 1922) acted as a sign of contradiction in the German theological heaven, and, along with a few lectures, marked the emergence of what is known as “crisis” or “dialectical” theology.

Barth was appointed to teach in Germany, at Göttin-gen, Münster, and then Bonn. With several young colleagues (F. Gogarten, E. Thurneysen, E. Brunner, G. Merz, and R. Bultmann*), he traced the fundamental features of dialectical theology, which found its main organ of expression in the magazine Zwischen den Zeiten. After a first unfinished essay (1927) he began writing his brilliant work Die Kirchliche Dogmatik. This work took almost 30 years to complete and finally consisted of no fewer than 26 volumes.

Adamantly opposed to the rise of Nazism, Barth was one of the main actors in Kirchenkampf, in the founding of the church, and the primary writer of the Barmen Theological Declaration in 1934. This last contrasts the service of Christ* alone to that of secular ideologies and powers. He was subsequently denied his chair in Bonn and took refuge in Basel, where he taught until 1962, and worked tirelessly on the construction of the theological edifice that would bring him worldwide fame. In the meantime he continued to formalize his vision of the relationship between church and state (church* and state) in Christian Community, Civil Community (1935), and produced a magisterial commentary on the Credo. He also gave a more “human” dimension to his project by offering the Humanity of God (1956) as a starting point for all theological thought, and during his last semester of teaching he summarized what seemed to him to be essential for all theological approaches in Introduction to Evangelist Theology. Once again, Barth played a decisive role in the formation of the Ecumenical Council* of Churches (Amsterdam, 1948). He was never willing to accept that Nazi totalitarianism and communist totalitarianism were basically equivalent, and after the Second World War he continued to sympathize with socialism. Solicited during Vatican* II, he related his reflections in Ad Limina Apostolorum (1966). A great music lover and admirer of Mozart, Barth died in Basel on 10 December 1968.

II. Theological Work

Marked by tremendous scholarship (the excursions extracted from Dogmatics can at times be like small monographs), Barth’s thinking did not develop in a strictly systematic way. Rather, in its presence, one feels as if it is the free course of a huge river, swelling as it merges with all the bodies of water it meets. Nevertheless, what unifies the whole is its tremendous capacity always to start from the point of view of God in order to properly speak of men and to promote the idea that this God is never so much God as in the revelation* of God: Jesus Christ. Three periods can be distinguished in the expression of this impressive thought: early stages (until 1919), the period of Barth’s dialectical theology (1920–1932), and after 1932, the mature thinking of Dogmatics.

1. Early Stages

The early stages of Barthian theology are marked by his liberal training—according to which it was appropriate to find the paths to the best possible “adaptation” of the spirit of Christianity to the realities of modern culture. Moreover, moved by the difficulties of working-class life, the young pastor at Safenwill was influenced by the thinkers of social Christianity (H. Kutter and L. Ragaz) and by the social eschatology of Blumhardt, father and son, which led him to join the Swiss Social-Democratic party in 1915.

Moreover, all his life he remained convinced that preaching was the fundamental loci theologicus; he did not hesitate to preach regularly, would qualify his great word as “ecclesial” (Kirchliche Dogmatik), and could admit that: “I was always more inclined . . . to concern myself with the pastoral problem par excellence, the problem of preaching. I sought to pave my way between the problem of human life and the contents of the Bible*. As a pastor*, I had to speak to men faced with the contradictions of life, and speak to them about the incredible message of the Bible. . . . Often these two splendors, life and the Bible, gave me the impression—and still, no?—of being Scylla and Charybdis. If this was it, the origin and goal of Christian preaching, I said to myself, who then can be, who then must be, pastor and preacher? . . . It is this critical situation that made me discover the essence of all theology” (Word of God and the Word of Man).

With the First World War striking Barth as the failure and collapse of liberal theology, he returned to the Word* of God; the first commentary on The Epistle to the Romans (1919) launched a way of reading Biblical texts that would reveal “God as God.” God escapes all human speculation but, in Jesus Christ, offers to pronounce a formal and definitive yes over the sinful world. Thus, in the Gospel, there is the “revolution* of God,” which “breaks all the dependent ties to this world” and which, because it comes from God, is “even the revolution of everything that the world can call revolution.”

2. Dialectical Theology

At the same time the school of theology known as dialectical emerged. Its major themes were especially expressed through the magazine Zwischen den Zeiten, the second edition of Römerbrief (1922), and the studies that appeared in French in Word of God and Word of Man. Here, God is essentially presented as the “wholly Other”; God alone is God, infinitely different from his creature, who cannot, alone, have access to God. But what man cannot attain by himself, God will give him through his Word, through which God can be revealed, and put within human reach. However, the word thus pronounced in Jesus Christ on humanity is none other than an unshakeable “yes,” overcoming all the “no’s” that nevertheless call, as if by the essence, nature, and sin of men. The theology that tries to recognize this God and this “yes” can only be dialectical; it develops in the never resolved tension that lies between the might and the truth of God and the human weakness and error, which the former—in Jesus Christ—nevertheless never ceases to invest and subvert: “During the Resurrection*, the new world of the Holy Spirit* touches the old world of the flesh*. Nevertheless, it touches it—like the tangent of a circle—without touching it; and while it doesn’t touch it, it touches it like the new world” (Epistle to the Romans). This is why dialectical theology also appears like a theology of crisis, for the investing and subversion of the revelation puts the humanity of humans in permanent “crisis” (etymologically, “in judgment”). The eschatology* thus invests the present through the Word of God pronounced on it and makes it into a time “between time”; “the destiny of our generation is to find itself between two eras. Perhaps one day we will belong to time coming?... We find ourselves in the very middle. In this empty space.... The space has opened for the question of God” (Gogarten).

The group of theologians who recognized each other in this movement were soon to disband under the pressure of centrifugal force and their magazine ceased to be published in 1933. But Barth had already begun Dogmatics.

3. Dogmatic Theology

The first volume of Dogmatics was published in 1932, a year that marked the beginning of an intense period of literary production that lasted almost until Barth’s death*. It was marked by the appearance of 26 volumes of this large work (almost 10,000 densely packed pages), which nevertheless was not finished, as well as by several independent books. Dogmatics systematizes and deepens the major notions of dialectical theology: God is God, and only God can make it known who God is; the objective truth about the world and humans (created, reconciled and saved by God) is not grasped through the subjective perception that they may have but through the revelation that God gives. Dogmatics therefore is divided into five major parts: 1) the prolegomena, which presents the Word of God, through which the only access to God is possible; 2) the doctrine of God, in which we see the God of Jesus Christ revealed as Trinity*; 3) the doctrine of creation* (corresponding to the work of the Father*); 4) the doctrine of reconciliation (Versöhnung), indicating the work of the Son—incomplete; 5) the doctrine of the final redemption (Erlösung), which more specifically bears on the work of the Holy Spirit—and which Barth did not have a chance to start.

a) Divine Revelation and Analogia Fidei. Two methodological principles dominate the huge structure of Dogmatics: on one hand, the challenge, at the base of all theological undertaking, of the play of analogia entis (analogy of being*) in favor of an analogia fidei (analogy of faith); and on the other hand, a pronounced christological focus. The first of these principles corresponds to Barth’s constantly reiterated point concerning the qualitative difference separating God from the world and humans and the fact that, because only God is able to speak about God, we cannot have access to God except through his revelation. The idea of founding theology on some kind of continuity of being between the world and humanity on the one hand, and God, on the other, is dismissed; the Thomist theologies (Thomas* Aquinas, Thomism*) and Scholastics* are blamed for doing so in the name of the principle of analogia entis. This is what Barth begins to show in his commentary on Anselm* of Canterbury’s Proslogion—on the proofs of the existence* of God—published in 1931 under the title Fides Quaerens Intellectum (Faith in Search of Its Intelligence): theology cannot be understood as a philosophical (philosophy*) kind of undertaking, developing “natural” knowledge of God, starting from an analysis of the world or the human condition to get to being; it only counts in terms of the self-comprehension of faith in search of its own intelligence. Of course, theology cannot speak of God except through analogy, even if analogy can only stem from the domain of faith (analogia fidei) and not being. Hence, the famous declaration from the prolegomena of Dogmatics: “I regard analogia entis as an invention of the Antichrist and I believe that it is because of this that one cannot become Catholic. To this I will add that all the other reasons that one may have for not becoming Catholic seem childish and not very substantial” (KD I, 1, p. XII).

From this perspective, theology was to develop as a kind of commentary on the Word of God, the prolegomena of which (“doctrine on the Word of God”) shows that it evolves and pronounces itself in three forms: 1) the preaching* of the Church; 2) itself, submitted and subjected to the written work of biblical accounts; 3) Jesus Christ in person, the Word of the true God, heart of the Gospel and measure of all interpretation (hermeneutic*) of the Scriptures* and thereby also of all preaching. Moreover, from the same drive that rejected analogia entis, Barth—combining critiques of religion, especially those of Marx*, Nietzsche*, and Freud*—denied that there was any theological value in religion as religion, which was understood as a human attempt to appropriate God, and contrasted the “descending” movement of faith to it.

b) Trinitarian God and Christological Focus. The second characteristic trait of Barth’s theology involves the christological focus that it carries out: “An ecclesiastical dogmatic* theology must be christological in its fundamental structure as in all of its parts, if it is true that its only criterion is the revealed Word of God, evidenced by the Scriptures and preached by the Church, and if it is true that this revealed Word of God is identical to Jesus Christ. A dogmatic theology that does not, from the beginning, seek to be a Christology* is under a foreign yoke and very nearly no longer serves the Church. . . . Christology must be everywhere in theology. . . . Christology is everything or nothing” (KD I/2, p. 114 §15.1). This christological emphasis led Barth to solve several fundamental theological questions in a specific way: the Trinitarian notion of God that marks his entire oeuvre does not come from any particular metaphysical speculation, but from the revelation of God who is only unveiled through the work of Christ and his Spirit; the Creation doctrine is not understood as an objective presentation of the “natural” fact, but as the very place of God’s Covenant* with the world and humans (KD III, 1–4); the notion of predestination* is perceived only as the extension of the doctrine on choice*, the heart of which is Christ.

Through the years and pages, the radical thoughts of the early period gradually gave way to an approach that was more attentive to the depth of the human condition. This is what the 1956 programmatic lecture on the Humanity of God translated in condensed fashion: “With Jesus Christ, as the Bible shows, we are not dealing with man in an abstract manner: this is not a man who thinks he is self-sufficient with a little religion and religious morality, thus becoming God himself; at the same time, this is not an abstract God, that is, separated from man by his divinity, distant and foreign and therefore not human, but in some way, inhuman. . . . In his person, Jesus Christ is precisely the true God to man, and as true man, the faithful partner of God; He is both the Lord who lowers himself to communicate with man, and the Servant*, raised to the point of communion* with God. . . . Thus he announces and assures man of the free grace of God, as he also attests and assures God about man, and, at the same time, the right of man before God. . . . What God is in truth, as what is man, is something we don’t have to search blindly for or invent; it is to be discovered where the truth about one and the other reside: in Jesus Christ, where, the fullness of their coexistence and their Covenant* is presented to us” (Humanity of God, 1956).

The various points thus referred to are particularly developed in the last, only partially written part of Dogmatics. The outline of this part, in relation to the work of reconciliation carried out by Christ, was to include three stages: the Lord as servant (vere Deus), the servant as Lord (vere homo), the veritable witness. The last two volumes concern baptism*—understood as the human act* of receiving grace, and excluding from this fact the baptism of small children—and the ethic presented as prayer* and as invocation.

c) Ethics: The Law, Form of the Gospel. For Barth, Christian ethics depend completely on the revelation of God to which those ethics respond. Each part of Dogmatics thus leads to a series of ethical questions. In the doctrine of God (KD II/1 and 2, v. 6–9), the essay on choice and grace is followed by a presentation of the “commandment of God*.” The law is presented in an original way, not as separate from the announcement of the gospel, but as its “form.” Barth thus distances himself from Luther*. He asserts that his doctrine of the “two reigns,” separating the religious domain from the political one and connected to an overly radical distinction between law and gospel, may have led to the blindness of the German protestant Churches before the rise of Nazism. However, to obey God’s commandment is to attest that one lives well from and under the grace of God; to conform to the commandments of the law is to concretely translate the reality of the “yes” pronounced on this world by the gospel. In the same way, the questions connected to sexual ethics* or to life—biological, social, or professional—are discussed at the end of the part devoted to the doctrine of creation and influenced by liberty* (KD III). Lastly, in analyses that are more strictly christological (KD IV), ethics take the form of commentary on Our Father: to obey the commandment of God therefore means invoking God in a practical and concrete manner and to be ever more influenced by God’s paternity.

Barth’s Influence

Barth’s influence was as immense as his oeuvre, and his disciples came from all parts of the theological scene: some developed the almost sacred transcendence of God, while others insisted that faith needed to make a political commitment. In fact, Barth’s remarkable success favored the conjunction of two a priori independent movements that are nevertheless convergent: his rigorous defense of the autonomy of God and of the “scientific nature” of theology, on the one hand, and his opposition to Hitler and his defense of the underdog, on the other. In fact, it was as a herald of extreme causes and contested and threatened dignities, nevertheless demanded and defended with vigor, that Barth perhaps, without really knowing, most marked his era. This being the case, he combined, in a most dialectical way, the “no” and the “yes”: God’s “no” to the sinning world, condemned and rejected, and yet at the same time irrevocably accepted in Jesus Christ; “no” to Nazism, but also—on another level entirely—to E. Brunner’s natural* theology, nevertheless accompanied and subverted by the “yes” of this prolific author, who considered the simple acquiescence of God’s commitment to the world the height of faith and theology. It is expressed by the sigh, “Ach, ja!”—“Well, yes!”

Barth’s posterity comes in many shapes: “on the right,” it includes certain forms of orthodoxy that insist on the need to return to the Scriptures, on referring to reformers and the urgency of organizing theological thought in systematic fashion. But there are also various kinds of “leftist Barthianism” (F. Marquardt, G. Casalis), which promote theology’s essential commitment and are interpreted in many ways (P. Maury, J. L. Leuba, R. Mehl, H. J. Iwand, H. Vogel, O. Weber, W. Kreck). Barth’s Catholic audience was large and did manage to renew several problems (Balthasar*, H. Bouillard, H. Küng). However, generally speaking Barth did not have any real successors. Perhaps he was too big; although anyone studying theology today must study his thought, his very radical character and his rejection of certain problems, which sometimes goes as far as denying the existence of these problems—notably that which touches on the particular substance of the world and the humanity of humans—make it difficult for it to confront the challenges that constantly lie before theology in the present and future.

- K. Barth (1932–67), Die Kirchliche Dogmatik, Zollikon-Zurich, vols. I–IV and Index 1970.
- K. Barth (1935), Communauté chrétienne, communauté civile, Geneva.
- K. Barth (1950), Esquisse d’une dogmatique, Neuchâtel.

- K. Barth (1956), The Humanity of God.
- K. Barth (1958), Word of God and the Word of Man, Tr. Douglas Horton, Mangolia, Mass.
- K. Barth (1966), Ad limina apostolorum, Zurich.
- K. Barth (1971–), Gesamtausgabe, Zurich.
- M. Kwiran (1977), Index to Literature on Barth, Bonhoeffer and Bultmann, Basel.
- H. A. Drewes (Ed.) (1984), Karl Barth Bibliographie, Zurich.
- ♦ H. U. von Balthasar (1951), Karl Barth, Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie, Einsiedeln.
- G. C. Berkouwer (1957), Der Triumph der Gnade in der Theologie Karl Barths, Neukirchen.
- H. Bouillard (1957), Karl Barth, 3 vols., Paris.
- H. Küng (1957), Rechtfertigung: Die Lehre Karl Barths und eine katholische Besinnung, Einsiedeln (2nd Ed., Munich, 1987).
- G. Casalis (1960), Portrait de Karl Barth, Geneva.
- O. Weber (1964), La dogmatique de K. Barth, Geneva.
- H. Zahrt (1969), Aux prises avec Dieu: La théologie protestante au XXe siècle, Paris, 11–66, 107–60.
- H. J. Adriaanse (1974), Zu den Sachen selbst: Versuch einer Konfrontation der Theologie Karl Barths mit der phänomenologischen Philosophie Edmund Husserls, The Hague.
- W. Härle (1975), Sein und Gnade: Die Ontologie in Karl Barths Kirchlicher Dogmatik, Berlin.
- E. Busch (1978), Karl Barths Lebenslauf, Munich.
- E. Jüngel (1982), Barth-Studien, Gütersloh-Zurich-Köln.
- K. Hafstad (1985), Wort und Geschichte: Das Geschichtsverständnis Karl Barths, Munich.
- M. Beintker (1987), Die Dialektik in der “dialektischen” Theologie Karl Barths, Munich.
- K. Blaser (1987), K. Barth 1886–1986: Combats—idées—reprises, Bern.
- P. Gisel (Ed.) (1987), Karl Barth: Genèse et réception de sa théologie, Geneva.
- C. Frey (1988), Die Theologie Karl Barths, Frankfurt.
- H. Köckert, W. Krötke (Ed.) (1988), Theologie als Christologie: Zum Leben und Werke Karl Barths, Berlin.
- R. Gibellini (1994), Panorama de la théologie au XXe s., Paris, 11–32.
- A. J. Torrance (1996), Persons in Communion: An Essay on Trinitarian Description and Human Participation, with Special Reference to Volume One of Karl Barth’s Church Dogmatics, Edinburgh.
- J. Webster (1998), Barth’s Moral Theology: Human Action in Barth’s Thought, Edinburgh.

JEAN-FRANÇOIS COLLANGE

See also Balthasar, Hans Urs von; Bonhoeffer, Dietrich; Bultmann, Rudolf; Lonergan, Bernard John Francis; Lubac, Henri Sonier de; Tillich, Paul

Basel-Ferrara-Florence, Council of 1431–45

The Council* of Basel-Ferrara-Florence was the 17th ecumenical council of the Catholic Church*. It brought together two councils that differed in context, orientations, and to some extent in participants: Basel represented the continuation of Constance* and of conciliarism* (and is considered ecumenical by Catholics only with regard to its first 25 sessions, before the breaking off of relations with the pope*); Ferrara-Florence was led by the pope and devoted to union with the Greeks.

1. Council of Basel (1431–49)

a) Convening and Chronology. The Frequens decree of Constance had provided for the regular convening of a council. In conformity with the decisions taken at Pavia-Siena (1423–24), Martin V convened a general council in Basel at the beginning of 1431 and appointed Cardinal Cesarini as president (Mansi 29, 11–12; Cardinal Aleman succeeded him in 1438).

That council held 45 sessions in Basel (1431–48) and five in Lausanne (1448–49). Eugenius IV, who succeeded Martin V in March 1431, dissolved it in December 1431 in order to transfer it to Bologna (Mansi 29, 564–67). He then revoked his decision in 1433 when faced with the council's resistance (Mansi 29, 78–79), dissolved the council again in September 1437, with its transferral to Ferrara (Concilium Florentinum... I-1, 91–99) confirmed at the end of December (ibid., 111–12). In spite of the opening of the new council in Ferrara, Basel continued to consider itself as the sole legitimate council and as superior in power to the pope. Indeed, it deposed him in June 1439 (Mansi 29, 179–81), replacing him in November with the antipope Felix V. The latter resigned in April 1449, thus dealing its death blow to the assembly of Basel-Lausanne.

b) Activity of the Council. During its first session, in December 1431 (COD 456, 14–22), the council decided to adopt three objectives: rooting out heresy*, establishing peace* among all Christians, and reform of the church. The Hussite heresy was not eradicated (Hus*), but the diplomatic action taken by the council was certainly important. As for the attempts made to reform the church, these did produce some results (which a number of national concordats ratified), but such attempts were transformed into a fight to impose upon Eugenius IV the authority* of the council. That authority, however, did gradually weaken, (political support, for it was in decline, but it should also be mentioned that there were fewer bishops* than clerics* in the assembly and that each of its members had a vote). Not only did the council fail in its attempt to reform the church, but it also failed to bring about a successful union with the Greeks, although some contacts were established. Its final theological result was slim, despite the historical importance of what was an important gathering place for the climate of a newly burgeoning humanism.

2. Council of Ferrara-Florence (1438–45)

a) Chronology. The council opened in Ferrara on 8 January 1438 under the chairmanship of Cardinal Albergati (COD 513–17). The Greeks arrived in March, but although the solemn inauguration of the council took place on 9 April, they did not want to broach the essential point (that of adding the Filioque to the creed) for several months. The first question to be raised was that of purgatory, in June-July, while the eight sessions devoted to the Filioque took place from October to December. Because of the plague, the council was transferred to Florence by Eugenius IV on 10 January 1439, with the agreement of the Greeks and the Latin synod (COD 523). Eight dogmatic sessions were held there in March. After this there were some partial meetings and a few other sessions until 6 July, when a solemn session marked the celebration of union with the Greeks. The council continued its meetings after the departure of the Greeks, and on 14 October 1443 was transferred to Rome* (COD 583–586), where it closed some time in 1445 (Hofmann 1949).

b) Activity of the Council. Conducted by Eugenius IV in the presence of the patriarch of Constantinople, Joseph II, and of the Byzantine emperor, John VIII, this council made it its task to achieve union with the Greeks by discussing, in sequence, all the contentious points: the procession of the Holy Spirit and the principle of its addition to the creed, purgatory, the primacy of the pope, the Eucharist* (which part of the anaphora accomplishes the consecration?), the liturgical use of unleavened versus leavened bread, and the vision of God* in beatitude*. Once union was achieved with the Greeks, Eugenius IV endeavored to extend it to other Eastern churches.

Ferrara devoted its discussions of the summer of 1438 to the question of purgatory, although without achieving any results (Greek doctrine was very vague on this point, but the Greeks rejected the Latin idea of a purifying fire). Discussions in the autumn of 1438 dealt with the addition of the Filioque to the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople and with the meaning of the interdicts that Ephesus* and Chalcedon* had imposed on any addition. The Latins claimed that the Filioque was not an addition but an explanation required by the circumstances. On this occasion, the Greeks encountered considerable dialectical artfulness of the Latins. But for their own part—notably through their principal spokesman, Mark Eugenikos—they insisted on traditional argument. This put them in an inferior position during the discussions, which they were tempted several times to break off. It was in Florence in March 1439 that the important dogmatic sessions on the procession of the Holy Spirit took place. Mark Eugenikos, for the Greek side, confronted the Dominican Jean de Montenero, for the Latin side.

In these exchanges there was a very generous use of biblical and patristic florilegia (often prepared in advance, florilegia dealing with the Filioque represented a literary genre in their own right). The Church Fathers* most in demand were Basil* of Caesarea, Cyril* of Alexandria, Epiphanius, Didymaea, and, on the Latin side, Augustine*. The Greeks preferred this patristic approach to dialectics, even if the quotations were subsequently exploited by Montenero in a Scholastic* manner. Montenero relied on a humanist of the first order, Ambrose Traversari, general of the Camaldolese order, to find and translate the Greek texts.

This method, which was intended to shed light on the harmony between the Greek and Latin Fathers, won over some important Greek delegates (Bessarion, Isidore of Kiev, George Scholarios), who were able to influence their own camp (except for a few irreducible followers who grouped around Mark Eugenikos) in favor of union. Several months, however, were required in order to get to that point. The Latin dialectics was not to the liking of the Greeks, and the patristic texts were not sufficiently precise on the contentious points (does the Spirit proceed from the Son or through the Son?). An agreement was reached, however, on 8 June. The decree of union, Laetentur caeli (6 July 1439), stipulates that both expressions concern the same faith*, which is the following: “the Holy Spirit is eternally from the Father* and the Son, it gets its essence and its living being from both Father and Son, and it proceeds eternally from the former and the latter as if from one sole principle and from a single inspiration” (COD 526, 39–45). The definition makes room for the two languages, Greek and Latin, by naming the Son “cause” or “principle” of the Spirit with the Father (ibid., 527, 6–10), and it makes it clear that it is from the Father that the Son receives all, including the fact that the Spirit proceeds from him (ibid., 11–16).

Following this agreement, which brought a solution to the most difficult point, the other matters were dealt with in less than a month (continuation of the decree on union, COD 527, 17–528, 43). The addition of the Filioque to the creed was declared legitimate; the use of unleavened bread and that of risen bread were declared equally valid, according to the tradition* of each church; the soul* could be purified after death* by punishment in purgatory, and souls were assisted by the prayers of the living; the blessed contemplated God as he is in himself (but in varying degrees according to merit: the Greeks were insistent on having this clarification; on the Greek position, see Alberigo 1991); finally, the Roman pontiff, successor of Peter*, held preeminence over the whole universe, with all the other patriarchs keeping their privileges and rights (patriarchate*, jurisdiction*). (As far as the Eucharist was concerned, the question of the “form” of the sacrament* (the consecrating words) had been reserved for an oral agreement.) On all these points, the procedure that was followed involved the use of cedulae, or written texts put forward in advance by the Latins, who therefore had an advantage. The problem of the primacy of the pope was one of the most difficult to settle, in particular because it put at stake the power to convene a council*, which the emperor did not want to give away to the pope. As a result, this issue did not figure in the text of the decree.

Encouraged by the success of the union and by the decree stating the primacy of the pope, Eugenius IV launched another attack against the council of Basel (Moyses vir Dei, 4 September 1439, COD 529–34). He then sent all the Eastern churches the text of the decree confirming union and asked for their support. They answered favorably, and other unions were thus concluded. First, union with the Armenians, who had been invited to the council and who had arrived there in August 1439 (COD 534–59); the definition of Chalcedon*, which they had never received, was passed on to them, as was, in addition, the Latin teaching on the sacraments. Union with the Copts came on 4 February 1442. The Copts were called “Jacobites” because they were monophysitic (monophysitism*) (COD 567–83): the decree contained a Trinitarian account, the canon* both of the Old and New Testaments, and a christological account, as well as an explanation of salvation*, and of rites and sacraments. On 30 November 1444 there followed union with the Syrians (COD 586–89); they were supplied with details on the procession of the Holy Spirit, the two natures of Christ* and the two expressions of his will (with quotation from Chalcedon and Constantinople* II; see monothelism*). Finally, on 7 August 1445, a union with the Chaldeans, Nestorian obedience, and the Maronites of Cyprus, who had a reputation for being monothelites (COD 589–91), completed Eugenius IV’s unifying work.

c) How the Council Was Received. There is still an explanation to be given regarding “the failure of this success,” to use Gill’s expression. The Orthodox people never accepted the union, and accused their bishops of having betrayed their faith. These very bishops, once they were back home, had the impression they had been operating under duress in Florence: the precariousness of their situation, their isolation from home, the emperor’s eagerness to conclude the union in order to obtain the pope’s help against the Turks and save Constantinople, all these considerations contributed to a strengthening of that feeling (even though, in the course of the discussions, the emperor had exercised no pressure and the pope no blackmail). The circumstances were ambiguous, and the union was concluded too quickly (for an example of misunderstanding, with the Copts, on the matters of primacy and dogma, see P. Luisier, OCP 60, 1994). Furthermore, Popes Martin V and Eugenius IV, in contradistinction to the council of Basel (Alberigo, 1991), considered union above all as a return to the Roman Church. As a result, instead of leading to the communion* of churches that others desired, their approach ended up more often than not as a uniatism, denounced as representing the annexationist ambitions of Rome.

It can be added that the Latin theological methods had not succeeded in convincing the Greeks (except Bessarion or Isidore, who became cardinals of the Roman Church), and that the council, kept much too busy with the objective of quickly finding an acceptable text for the union, had neglected other factors that were essential for the lasting success of the agreement: for example, the question of liturgical communion between the two parties (Alberigo 1991).

- Acts: Mansi 29–31.
Decrees, COD 435–591 (DCO II/1, 931–1210).
Concilium Basiliense, Studien und Quellen zur Geschichte des Konzils von Basel, Ed. J. Haller, 8 vols., Basel, 1896–1936.
- Concilium Florentinum, Documenta et Scriptores*, 11 vols. in 14 vols., Rome, 1940–77.
- Monumenta conciliorum generalium saeculi XV*, vols. I–III (Basel), Ed. F. Palacky, E. Birk, R. Beer, Vienna, 1857–92 (one index vol., Vienna, 1935).
- ◆ G. Hofmann (1949), “Das Konzil von Florenz in Rom,” OrChrP 15, 71–84.
- J. Gill (1959), The Council of Florence, Oxford; (1964), Personalities of the Council of Florence, Oxford; (1965), Constance et Bâle-Florence (HCO 9), Paris.
- J. Decarraux (1970), Les Grecs au c. de l’union, Ferrare-Florence 1438–1439, Paris.
- J. W. Stieber (1978), Pope Eugenius IV, the Council of Basel and the Secular and Ecclesiastical Authorities in the Empire, Leyden.
- J. Helmroth (1987), Das Basler-Konzil 1431–1449: Forschungsstand und Probleme, Köln.
- J. Gill (1989), Church Union: Rome and Byzantium (1204–1453), London.
- Coll. (1989 and 1990), AHC 21 and 22 (colloquia on Ferrara-Florence).
- M. Mollat du Jourdin, A. Vauchez (Ed.) (1990), Histoire du christianisme, VI: Un temps d’épreuves (1274–1449).
- G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1991), Christian Unity: The Council of Ferrara-Florence 1438/1439–1989, BETHL 97.

BERNARD MEUNIER

See also Conciliarism; Constance, Council of; Filioque; Humanism, Christian; Pope; Schism; Structures, Ecclesial; Unity of the Church

Basil (The Great) of Caesarea

c. A.D. 329–79

a) Life. Basil of Caesarea was the oldest of many children in a patrician Christian family in Cappadocia. Among his brothers and sisters were two bishops (Gregory* of Nyssa and Peter of Sebastea), an ascetic, and a virgin. Basil was a good student in Caesarea and later in Constantinople and Athens, where he studied with famous rhetoricians. He made the acquaintance of Gregory* of Nazianzus who became his dearest friend. Gregory's education took place at the confluence of Christian faith* and the finest Hellenistic culture. Charmed by the gospel, he gave up the profession of rhetorician, had himself baptized, and decided to enter the monastic life. But he soon became concerned with the affairs of the church* at Caesarea. He helped his bishop*, was ordained as a priest* in 362 or 364, and was elected bishop of Caesarea in 370. Over the course of a few years, Basil carried out intense doctrinal and ecclesiastical activity. He died while still young—in 379, according to tradition, or perhaps in 378.

Basil was a man of the church and a man of action, a key figure of his age and an organizer and leader of men, but he was also a man of the heart, fragile, and sensitive. Even though he was afflicted with ill health, Basil was active in many domains, including theology*, monastic life, preaching*, politics, social action, the defense of justice*, and the liturgy*.

b) The Theologian. Confronted with the second generation of Arians, represented by Aetius and Eunomius, Basil concerned himself with three major doctrinal questions touching mystery of the Trinity*.

DIVINITY OF THE SON. Basil's first theological work, Contra Eunomium (Against Eunomius), dismantles the calm rational argument with which his adversary wished to establish, on the basis of an analysis of language, the created nature of the Son. Eunomius called the Son "offspring," and used the unique and incommunicable term "unengendered" to express the substance of God*. The essential point of Basil's speculative analysis is to establish the distinction between essential and relative attributes* in God and to show that the latter imply no proliferation of a single and identical substance. The names Father* and Son, then, are relative names (Contra Eunomium). With this work, Basil inaugurated the shift that allowed the term hypostasis to move from its original meaning of "substance" to that of "act of persisting in substance" or "subsistence."

DEVELOPMENT OF TRINITARIAN DOCTRINE Throughout his life, Basil sought to reconcile the churches of the East. This reconciliation depended on the reconciliation of Trinitarian formulations used by the various churches: The Nicenes, who upheld that the Persons of the Trinity* were consubstantial*, sometimes with an ambiguity as to its mode, had to resolve this ambiguity by clearly affirming the three divine hypostases. For their part, those who upheld the three hypostases had to wholeheartedly accept the consubstantial in order to avoid being suspected of believing in three hypostases that were unequal in substance. The unilateral formulations of both camps would thus complete and balance one another. The result of this work was to settle the dogma* of the Trinity, which was affirmed in the East following the First Council of Constantinople*.

DIVINITY OF THE HOLY SPIRIT Basil's major doctrinal work was the treatise De Spiritu Sancto, in which he attacked both the radical Arianism* of Aetius and Eunomius and the position of the Macedonians at the First Council of Constantinople. The occasion for the treatise was a challenge concerning the liturgical doxology used by Basil: "Glory to the Father, with the Son and the Holy Spirit," his adversaries preferring the doxology "through the Son and in the Holy Spirit." Behind these nuances among prepositions lay hidden the question of the equality or dissimilarity of the three divine Persons*. Against the adage of his adversaries, who argued from the difference of language that there was a difference in nature, Basil showed that Scripture uses all these prepositions for all three Persons, and he asserted that this lexical resemblance expresses the identity of their common nature. Then, relying on the Trinitarian baptismal formula, the author set forth a long doctrinal argument on the basis of the biblical names of the Holy* Spirit, the Spirit's activities, and the Spirit's gifts for our salvation* in order to show that the Holy Spirit must be “co-numbered” with the Father and the Son and receive the same honor (homo-timie) as they.

c) Basil's Other Fields of Action. Basil was not the inventor of Eastern monasticism*, but he was a major maker of rules for it. His Moral Rules classify 1,542 verses of the New Testament under 80 headings and present a practical exegesis* of biblical teachings for those who wish to live the gospel in a community. The author addresses not only monks but also lay* persons belonging to a movement of Christian reform that was attempting to impose itself on the faithful as a whole. The Large and Small Rules are a gathering of questions raised by disciples on the different aspects of religious life, and Basil always seeks to give answers taken from Scripture. Basil was also a major liturgical reformer. The Eastern tradition* attributes to him a Liturgy that is still being used in the churches of the East.

Removed early from monastic life in order to concern himself with the church and the problems of his time, Basil was primarily an eloquent and effective preacher. His homilies on wealth were as radical as the later ones of John Chrysostom*. Basil severely condemned lending at interest (understood as lending for consumption). He took initiatives in favor of the poor, “opening the granary of the rich,” struggling against the “black market” during a famine, and organizing soup kitchens from which pagans and Jews also benefited. Finally, he was an innovator in creating in his city an immense hospital, the Basiliad.

Basil left a large correspondence (around 360 letters) in which can be found his strategy for the government* of churches, his doctrinal struggles in the East, the contradictions he encountered, his attitude toward Rome, his courageous opposition to the Arian emperor Valens, and, finally, a network of deep and moving friendships.

- Paul Jonathan Fedwick, Bibliotheca Basiliana Universalis: A Study of the Manuscript Tradition, Translations and Editions of the Works of Basil of Caesarea, IV: Testimonia, Liturgical and Canonical Compositions, Florilegia, Cate-nae, Iconography; IV, 2: Manuscripts—Libraries (Corpus Christianorum), Turnhout, 1999.
- Basil of Caesarea, Against Eunomius the Heretic.
- Basil of Caesarea, Hexaameron.
- Basil of Caesarea: Letters, Defferrari, R.J. (Ed. and Tr.), Loeb Classical Library 1926–34.
- Les règles monastiques* and Les règles morales et portrait du chrétien (1969), Maredsous.
- ♦ P. Humbertclaude (1932), La doctrine ascétique de Basile de Césarée, Paris.
- S. Giet (1941), Les idées et l'action sociale de saint Basile, Paris.
- D. Amand (1949), L'ascèse monastique de saint Basile: Essai historique, Maredsous.
- H. Dörries (1956), De Spiritu Sancto: Der Beitrag des Basilios zum Abschluss des trinitarischen Dogmas, Göttingen.
- T. Spidlik (1961), La sophiologie de saint Basile, Rome.
- J. Bernardi (1968), La prédication des Pères cappadociens: Le prédicateur et son auditoire, Paris.
- R. Courtonne (1973), Un témoin du IVe siècle oriental: Saint B. et son temps d'après sa correspondance, Paris.
- P.J. Fedwick (1979), The Church and the Charisma of Leadership in Basil of Caesarea, Toronto; id. (Ed.) (1981), Basil of Caesarea: Christian, Humanist, Ascetic, 2 vols., Toronto.
- J. Gribomont (1984), Saint Basile Évangile et Église: Mélanges, 2 vols., Bégrolles-en-Mauges.
- B. Gain (1985), L'Église de Cappadoce au IVe s. d'après la correspondance de Basile de Césarée, Rome.
- R. Pouchet (1992), Basile le Grand et son univers d'amis d'après sa correspondance, Rome.
- B. Sesboüé (1998), Saint Basile et la Trinité: Un acte théologique du IVe s.: Le rôle de Basile de C. dans l'élaboration de la doctrine et des langages trinitaires, Paris.

BERNARD SESBOÛÉ

See also Arianism; Constantinople I, Council of; Liturgy; Modalism

Beatification. See Holiness

Beatitude

A. Historical Theology

The concept of beatitude is limited to the ancient and medieval world; it was definitively replaced by the concept of happiness in the 18th century. The shift from the ancient philosophical to the medieval theological concept of beatitude is, however, subject to discussion, and to some degree it raises the question of the nature of the relationship between Christian theology* and ancient philosophy*. Finally, the shift from beatitude to happiness has yet to be examined. This discussion will be confined to these two points, providing for the latter only a brief outline.

The concept of beatitude is central for a theological determination of the aim of human action. To the extent that the revelation given to Abraham prescribes for humankind, in the three monotheistic religions, a renunciation of any purely earthly happiness (“Go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to the land that I will show you”; Gn 12:1), beatitude designates in part the state of the soul after death. The concept of beatitude can be broken down into three categories: earthly beatitude (the existence of which is questionable), the aim of human action; the heavenly beatitude of the blessed; and the intermediate beatitude obtained by the fulfillment of salvation, which is neither purely earthly (on this earth but not of this earth), nor yet fully heavenly, because it is experienced by an earthly being. It is this problematic status of beatitude, worked out in developments based on the ancient philosophical concept, that is worth considering.

The concept of beatitude has three principal sources: a) biblical, b) philosophical (largely Aristotelian and Stoic), and c) Augustinian. The Augustinian concept is a revision of the philosophical concept on the basis of biblical revelation*.

1. Sources

a) Biblical Sources. The happiness promised by God* in the Pentateuch is tied to the grant of a country to his people and to the prolongation of earthly life (see Deuteronomy): It is a good land that our Lord gave us. Israel* ought to find happiness...the two words are related in Hebrew (Ecumenical Translation of the Bible). This happiness is linked to obedience to the Law* (Dt 5:16); it is an earthly beatitude summed up by the possession of a family, a house, and a vineyard, in an ideal of security and prosperity (Dt 28:30). The Book of Job would show the limits of this Deuteronomic conception of beatitude but not radically challenge it. The failure of the conception is such that the hypothesis of divine sadism is seriously considered (Jb 10:13–17, 16:14, 30:21), and is contradicted only by the hope of resurrection* (Jb 19:26; see Ez 37:1–14). The choice seems clear: either life is limited to this earth and it is impossible to speak of beatitude (impurity of man, universal iniquity, absence of God), or else a resurrection* is possible, and the beatitude that is bound to it with the promise of a contemplation of God is of an eschatological order. Everything concerning beatitude is summed up in these words: “But when I hoped for good, evil came; and when I waited for light, darkness came” (Jb 30:26). The two speeches of YHWH and the two answers of Job contain nothing, on either earthly beatitude or beatitude after death, that can attenuate this recognition.

Eschatological beatitude, which takes the form of a messianic joy in the prophetic literature (Is 9:2, 35:10, 55:12, 65:18), is realized in the New Testament in the form of a participation in the joy of the resurrection manifested in Christ: “that my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be full” (Jn 15:11). In the Epistle to the Romans Paul uses the term makarismos, often translated as “blessing,” to express beatitude in a context in which happiness is linked to the forgiveness of sin: “So also David pronounces a blessing [makarismos] upon the man to whom God reckons righteousness apart from works” (Rom 4:6). Makarios is frequently used in the Gospels*, particularly (13 times) in the text of the Beatitudes (Mt 5:3–11; Lk 6:20–26). This text articulates nothing about the character of beatitude; it is a sequence of declarations of thanksgiving setting out the paradoxical conditions for an entry into the kingdom* of God.

b) Philosophical Sources. According to Democritus, the noun eudaimonia expresses the fact that beatitude has its seat in the soul*, which is also the location of the daimôn (Dem. B 171). Euripides defines beatitude as the government of the soul by a good daimôn (Orestes, line 677). With Plato and Aristotle, beatitude is connected to philosophy, which observes that all men seek beatitude, but only philosophy can obtain it. For Plato, happy is the man who is just and good, unhappy the man who is unjust and wicked (Republic 353e–354a). Only the philosopher succeeds in seeing through every good the source of all of them, the Good* itself. Beatitude is the fruit of a conversion* toward the Good; it belongs to whoever flees the multiplicity of goods to move toward the One, toward the Good beyond essence. Socrates is the image of the wise man, of whom Xenophon asserts that he is the “happiest” (Memoirs IV. 8) and whom Plato considers “the most just of all men” (Phaedo).

Aristotle states an axiological axiom: “Everyone acts for a good that represents the supreme Good” (Politics 1252a 2–3). Beatitude is thus health for the sick or subsistence for the poor. For Aristotle, the prefix eu of eudaimonia means “to live well and to act well” (“to eu zèn kai to eu praktein,” Nicomachean Ethics 1095a 19–20). Beatitude is sought as a good, and a good that is an end in itself, a teleion agathon (ibid. 1097b 8). Beatitude is further an autarchic state; there can be no beatitude without self-sufficiency: “a complete and autarchic state, beatitude is the end of all activity”—ton prakton (ibid. 1097b 20–21); prakton was later interpreted as “active life.” It is appropriate to make a distinction between this beatitude, which is at least the implicit aim of any practical activity, and the beatitude specific to the theoretical life, the beatitude of the philosopher, a beatitude that is possible only because something divine, the intellect, is contained in man (ibid. 1177b 26–28).

The beatitude of the philosopher is distinguished from that of the common man only by the reflexive element that it borrows from divine intelligence. Therefore, we cannot really speak of “philosophical beatitude” but, at most, of “intellectual beatitude,” meaning the reflexive beatitude of the man who discovers in the theoretical life the greatest beatitude. Intellectual beatitude is thus not superimposed on beatitude in general; their relations are more complex. Intellectual beatitude presupposes beatitude in general, but cannot be reduced to it. More precisely, intellectual beatitude comes as an addition to beatitude in general. Christianity was to break this relationship of supplement by setting out an ideal of eschatological beatitude that presupposes the correctness of Job’s recognition of the impossibility of earthly happiness defined in terms of security and prosperity. This ideal of beatitude took shape in various forms of asceticism and hermitic life, providing anticipatory confirmation for Nietzsche’s notion of “hatred of life.”

The Aristotelian doctrine nevertheless leads to an aporia, insofar as the articulation between the two types of beatitude leaves open the question of the exact connection between intellectual beatitude and contemplation (theoria). At least two paths opened up to overcome this aporia. The Christian path and the emanationist interpretation derived from the 11th-century Islamic philosopher-scientist Avicenna. Avicenna made intellectual beatitude into a divinization of the pars melior nostri (Spinoza), the intellect. The physicalist and naturalist interpretation derived from the 12th-century Islamic philosopher Averroes left this ideal of intellectual beatitude intact while emptying it of any mystical* and visionary element. The church* fought against this ideal in the name of the personal character of salvation*, for to conceive of intellectual beatitude as the exercise of an intellect as a common agent leads to a kind of suprapersonal incorporation, or indeed to a pantheist absorption into pure intellectuality.

c) The Augustinian Source. Augustine* accomplished a synthesis of the two preceding sources from the beginning of his intellectual career (386–91), and this synthesis, which remained unchanged, makes up a kind of foundation for his Trinitarian and historical-political speculation. even though, particularly under the influence of his theology of grace*, he later corrected its voluntarist intellectualism. Augustine translates eudaimonia by felicitas and blends the two conceptions of beatitude, the ancient and the Christian, into a synthesis of eudaimonia and makarismos. He identifies as esse cum Deo life according to reason* and vita beata, the happy life (De ord. II. 2. 4–10). He establishes a hierarchy of goods at the summit of which stands the supreme Good (summum bonum), definable as supreme Truth* and supreme Beauty. This hierarchy is constructed on the basis of two principles. The first is “Everything that is is good,” or in another form, “Nature as nature is good,” omnis natura in quantum natura est, bona est (De Lib. Arb. III. 13. 36). The second principle holds that life and the search for truth are distinguishing criteria, which means that a horse is better than a stone and a man better than a horse, even if his will is perverted. Beatitude thus consists of the knowledge of truth: “Because the supreme Good is known and preserved in the truth, and because that truth is wisdom*, let us discern in it and let us preserve the supreme Good, and let us take joy in it. . . . For this truth reveals to us all the goods that are true” (ibid. II. 13. 36).

The best commentary on these passages from Augustine is provided by Pascal*: “The soul* goes forth in search of the true Good. It understands that the good must have these two qualities: that it lasts as long as the soul and can only be taken away from the soul with the soul's consent, and that there is nothing more worthy of love. . . . The soul traverses all created beings and cannot cease its journey until it has reached the throne of God, in which it begins to find its rest" (On the Conversion of the Sinner). Pascal is also Augustinian in his contempt for philosophy. The Platonist philosophers are the closest to the truth insofar as they emphasize the contemplative search for the supreme Good by the soul, closer in particular than the Stoics, who count only on their own resources, while the Platonists count on participation in the supreme Good, but they lack the virtue of humility (which is all the more lacking in the Stoics).

2. Medieval Development of Beatitude

The development of the notion of beatitude in the Middle Ages was extremely complex and remains largely uninvestigated. The part that has been most studied concerns Thomas* Aquinas. The interpretation of thinkers like Dante* or Meister Eckhart remains extremely open and is still problematic.

a) Before the Translation of the Nicomachean Ethics (1246–47). In the Cur Deus Homo, Anselm* proceeds along Augustinian lines, and makes beatitude the center of his ethical reflection. Similarly, for Abelard*, in the Dialogus inter Philosophum, Iudaeum et Christianum, the true ethics is the one that discovers the beatitudes, an ethics in conformity with the Beatitudes of the Gospels, which is thus not an earthly ethics. The Sentences (c. 1155–58) of Peter Lombard (†1160) present a discussion of ethics that remains in part centered on the nature of beatitude, particularly in relation to the desiderium naturale (op. cit. IV. d. 49, 1). Lombard wrote shortly before the translation of the Nicomachean Ethics, which was to change the manner in which the problem was considered.

b) Albert the Great and Aquinas as Readers of the Nicomachean Ethics. The translation of the Nicomachean Ethics by Robert Grosseteste, because it made commentary on the text possible, brought about a profound change in the understanding of Aristotle. The first attempt at a synthesis of the ancient and Christian doctrines of beatitude, that of Augustine, then came into rivalry with a second attempt, carried out chiefly in two stages within the Dominican school by Albert* the Great and Thomas Aquinas, while the first continued to inspire in part the debate on ethics in the Franciscan school. The debate between Augustinians and Thomists was thus a debate between Franciscans and Dominicans—that is, between mendicants and preachers. It is customary to contrast the voluntarism of the Augustinian Franciscans (through Duns* Scotus up to Luther*) to the intellectualism* of the Aristotelian Thomists. But this schematization is superficial. Franciscan teachers such as Alexander of Hales (1165–1245) used Aristotle positively, and German Dominicans were very strongly influenced by the Neoplatonism of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite in a way that substantially changed their reception of Aristotle and introduced significant nuances into their intellectualism (in the end, voluntarism does not necessarily imply anti-intellectualism). Albert the Great wrote two commentaries on the Nicomachean Ethics—the first in Köln in 1248–52, immediately after the complete translation of the text, and the second in 1268–70. However, it was Thomas Aquinas who drew from the text all the resources that it offered for a Christian theological deepening of the notion of beatitude.

Thomas came up against a whole series of difficulties. The most immediate were that, on the one hand, Aristotle defines only one beatitude for this life, and even though he mentions beatitude as linked to the theoretical life, it is not certain that he accepts the possibility of a continuation of this state of intellectual beatitude in a hypothetical survival of the divine element of man. On the other hand, Thomas does not raise the question of divine beatitude (in Aristotelian theology, the Prime Mover does not experience beatitude). With respect to the latter point, the solemn doxology of 1 Timothy 6:15 mentions “the blessed and only Sovereign” (see 1 Tm 1:11: “the blessed God”) and thus places on the same level the oneness, transcendence, and beatitude of God. Thomas shows both that beatitude, in the Aristotelian sense, is in fact humanly inaccessible and that being-with-God, in which beatitude after this life consists, is the fruit of grace. Beatitude is nothing other than possession of the supreme Good, and this can only be anticipated in this life.

Dante systematized this separation by distinguishing, within this first distinction between the beatitude of mortal life and the beatitude of eternal life*, three types of beatitude: 1) beatitude of active mortal life, 2) beatitude linked with the contemplative life, and 3) beatitude of eternal life. There is a hierarchy: the third is at the summit, as it is the supreme beatitude, the fruition of the supreme Good (fruitio Dei); the second is almost perfect; and the first is almost imperfect (Convivio II. iv. 10; IV. xvii. 9): “Our beatitude . . . we may find in some imperfect way in active life—that is, in the operations of the moral virtues*—and then in an almost perfect way in the exercise of the intellectual virtues” (ibid. IV. xxii. 18). Dante thus does two things: he confines truly human beatitude to beatitude in the first sense, which is the fruit of the practical intellect, and simultaneously accepts a supreme felicity (somma felicitate) linked to speculation. He was anticipated on this point by Thomas Aquinas, who strongly emphasized the absolute superiority of “speculative felicity” (felicitas speculativa) (Exp. EN X. lect. XII, s116 ff., see CG III, 37).

3. Later Times: The Concept of Happiness and the Critique of Theology

While the medieval development is complex, the shift from the concept of beatitude to the modern concept of happiness is even more obscure. A first cause of a break appeared in the 13th century, among nontheological thinkers (e.g., in the Faculty of Arts in Paris, Siger de Brabant and Boethius of Dacia). These men reappropriated the Aristotelian concepts of beatitude and the philosophical life by bracketing the Christian bond between beatitude and eschatological hope; but philosophical felicity did not yet exclude the existence of a theological beatitude. Some Renaissance texts, on the other hand, provide a vivid sense of the moment of passage from the thought of beatitude to the thought of happiness, with surprising forms of compromise. For example, Valla writes, “Who can doubt that beatitude is identical to and can be given no better name than pleasure?” (De Voluptate III. ix, fol. 977). Cassirer comments: “Christianity, according to Valla’s argument, is not hostile to Epicureanism; it is itself nothing but an elevated and so to speak sublime Epicureanism” (1927).

Thomas Aquinas had emphasized the fact that delectation (delectatio) is necessary for contemplative beatitude, but only in a concomitant fashion (ST Ia IIae, q. 180, a.7). The critique of theology and the development of hedonism challenged this subjection of delectation and allowed for a revaluation of pleasure and even of sensuality. The concept of happiness, from this point of view, can be considered as resulting from a secularization of the concept of beatitude, or at least of that part of the concept that has to do with “natural beatitude,” as distinct from “supernatural* beatitude”

(a distinction contrary to the ancient and medieval spirit). The relation (whether teleological or dependent) between these two types of beatitude was thus deeply compromised. For example, Spinoza identified one with the other and even reversed the Thomist relationship: “We delight (delectamur) in whatever we understand by the third kind of knowledge, and our delight is accompanied with the idea of God as its cause” (Ethics V, prop. XXXII). The claim for autonomy of natural beatitude was thus linked to a critique of theology. Natural beatitude underwent a mutation and was transformed into a happiness that contained pleasure as a component. Supernatural beatitude, detached from natural beatitude, thereby became an autonomous object, whose reason for being lay in the brutal certainty of the impossibility of human happiness (demonstrated by Kant*). This provided weapons for the critics of theology. The concept of happiness could then take on not only a critical, but a subversive meaning: “Happiness is a new idea in Europe” (Saint-Just).

- H. Sidgwick (1886), Outlines of the History of Ethics, London.
- É. Halevy (1901–4), La formation du radicalisme philosophique, 3 vols. (repr. 1995).
- E. Cassirer (1927), Individuum und Kosmos in der Philosophie der Renaissance, Leipzig-Berlin, (7th Ed. Darmstadt, 1994).
- K. E. Kirk (1931), The Vision of God: The Christian Doctrine of the Summum Bonum, New York.
- E. Cassirer (1932), Die Philosophie der Aufklärung, Tübingen.
- A. J. Festugière (1936), Contemplation et vie contemplative selon Platon, Paris.
- J. Maritain (1950), Philosophie morale, Paris.
- R. A. Gauthier (1951), Magnanimité, Paris; (1958), La morale d’Aristote, Paris.
- J. Dupont (1958, 1969, 1973), Les Béatitudes, 3 vols., Paris.
- R. Mauzi (1960), L’idée de bonheur au XVIIIe siècle, Paris (2nd Ed. 1995).
- G. H. von Wright (1963), The Varieties of Goodness, London.
- D. Roloff (1970), Gottähnlichkeit, Vergöttlichung und Erhöhung zu seligem Leben, Berlin.
- J. Ritter, O. H. Pesch, R. Spaemann (1974), “Glück, Glückseligkeit,” HWP 3, 679–707.
- A. de Libera (1992), Penser au Moyen Age, Paris.
- D. Bradley (1996), Aquinas on the Twofold Human Good, Washington.

FRÉDÉRIC NEF

B. Systematic Theology

Secularized and transmuted into happiness, beatitude thus seems to need to be rethought in new terms and to be hoped for again. The question of happiness, moreover, seems to require being given theological coordinates. In any event, the historical and theoretical facts are relatively clear.

There can be no doubt that the eclipse of beatitude is the index of a certain death of hope. The systems of thought through which the metaphysical fate of the West has been carried out have been numerous, but they all have in common at least either the realization of the eschaton in history (Hegel), or a rigorous discrediting of the eschatological problem (Nietzsche*). And they implicitly consent to a reign of death over man (and over the access to meaning), of which Heidegger* has provided two expositions, in the period of Being and Time through a meditation on being-for-death, and in the “late” texts through a meditation on “serenity” that provides “mortals” with their proper existential relationship to being*. Philosophical references, on the other hand, should not conceal the fact that the crisis of hope is also an intratheological crisis. The return to prominence of the eschatological problem has certainly (since J. Weiss) been the principal distinctive characteristic of theology*. This return to prominence is, however, ambivalent. In the more traditional theologies, it may point to the reunion of man with the beyond. But it may also be expressed in the form of eschatologies* carried out during the course of history (Bultmann*), or in the form of a neomillennarianism for which the future provides “a new paradigm of transcendence” (J. Moltmann). A world for which it was essential that its form “is passing away” (1 Cor 7:31) seems to have been replaced, in more than one field of theological research, by a world in which it would be required (in the very name of eschatological critiques) to build a dwelling for man (J.B. Metz, et al.). And the existence of Christians who profess the creed in its entirety with the exception of the last article is not a case of theological teratology, but demonstrates that the shadow of nihilism can cover even a part of the Church*.

Beatitude, as distinguished from happiness, might therefore provide a major conceptual tool for a theological critique of nihilism. This critique would require the performance of a work of genealogy. Did the appearance of the concept of “pure nature*” and the repression of the “natural desire for the beatific* vision” lay the groundwork, from within theology, for the secularizing work of modernity (Lacoste 1995 b)? Was what came to light in Hegel, Nietzsche, and Heidegger a certain real fulfillment of what theologians had previously accomplished in the realm of the hypothetical, the reduction of man to the present conditions of the exercise of his humanity? Is God* “dead” because men wished to satisfy themselves with their present experience* of God? These questions describe in brief the distance that has to be traveled in order to deconstruct the despairing concepts of the humanity of man.

An eschatological reality, beatitude is not on the scale of Heidegger’s Dasein or “mortals,” nor on the scale of the Nietzschean superman, nor that of Hegel’s wise man who has reached the fruition of absolute knowledge. In order to be thought and desired, it therefore requires the dissolution of the relationships of representation according to which Dasein, or the “mortals,” and similar notions, stand for a true manifestation of the humanity of man. The task is thus to establish an eschatological position on the question of man, permitting the destruction of any equation between being and being-in-the-world, or being and being-in-history. And the paradoxical concept of the “natural” desire for the “supernatural*” clearly authorizes this destruction by forcing us to think of man on the basis of his absolute future, and to measure according to that absolute future any present experience that we have of ourselves and of God. Happiness, in this way, would be worthy of man only by being simultaneously incapable of fulfilling man, in the recognition that it is not beatitude. The critical authority for any form of happiness, beatitude would thus allow granting to human finitude the only horizon—infinite*—on the basis of which man exists in the theological truth of his being; it would allow us to think of what we are in fact on the basis of what we are by vocation.

Criticizing happiness does not amount to denying it, but would well and truly permit the establishment of the conditions for a Christian eudaemonism. The experience of the world, taken in the strict sense, is perhaps the pathetic experience of precarious joys lived under the rule of death. But if the world is not the Creation* and nothing more, it is not the opposite of Creation either, and it maintains enough of its created reality for the desire for happiness not to be contemptible (or impious). The Old Testament representations of the happy life lived in the land given by God must therefore maintain a certain validity after the work of undermining to which they were subjected by the New Testament promises* of beatitude. The experience of happiness must involve an element of discomfort, for happiness is only happiness. This experience, however, must be able to take place without the hoped-for beatitude giving a taste of ashes to the happiness possessed. Happiness has its theological secret, which is to stand as a memory of Creation in the history of the world. This memory cannot claim to erase the world-becoming of the Creation, or put in parentheses the eschatological challenge of happiness by beatitude, but its right to exist is incontestable. The world is not man’s homeland, and any logic of dwelling stumbles against the more primordial quality of nondwelling, Unzuhause (Heidegger). It is possible, however, in the world or at least at its edges, without shame, and without the suspicion of a touch of any kind of “inauthen-ticity,” to have the experience of a well-being there (Lacoste 1995 b). Thus defined, happiness no longer stands in opposition to beatitude as a secular reality to a theological reality; the tension between happiness and beatitude is in fact an intratheological tension. Happiness, therefore, no longer appears as a denial of hope; it is a sabbatical experience, in which man lives from the blessings* pronounced by God in the first days on the work of his hands.

The subversive force of the promises of beatitude cannot, however, be obfuscated, nor can the fact that beatitude is an eschatological experience that can be anticipated in the time of history. The words of beatitude addressed to the poor, the meek, and the persecuted in Matthew and Luke are not words of happiness, and are intelligible only when cast against the background of the anthropological displacement that sees a humiliated and crucified Messiah* become the most exact witness of the humanity of man. “Perfect joy” is not found where a theory of happiness would locate it, but is, in fact, bound up intrinsically with modes of being properly kenosised (kenosis*). The time before the end, the preeschatological time of the Church*, is under the sign of “tribulation” (thlipsis). This time is devoid of neither the joys of contemplation* nor the joys of the liturgy*, and can thus shelter experiences that must be interpreted as icons of eternal beatitude. But it is inseparably a time lived under the sign of the cross, in which the blessed life lies in the paradoxical acts of the imitatio Christi. This time is indeed pre-eschatological, and the joy of being saved must be its dominant tone. This time is, however, pre-eschatological, and cannot bestow the fruition of the goods of the kingdom*, but puts them at man’s disposal only in a paradoxical mode, which requires us to keep our distance with respect to any logic of happiness while not entering into possession of a beatitude that remains an object of hope. Dominated and criticized by beatitude, happiness is also dominated by the kenotic activities of the one who prepares himself to welcome beatitude by welcoming the biblical word of the Beatitudes. The humanity of man, in a world that is saved but remains worldly, would thus be to inhabit the space between happiness and beatitude.

- J. Pieper (1967), Hoffnung und Geschichte, Munich.
- J. Greisch (1980), “La contrée de la sérénité et l’horizon de l’espérance,” in R. Kearney, J. S. O’Leary (Ed.), Heidegger et la question de Dieu, Paris, 168–93.
- G. Greshake (1983), Gottes Heil—Glück des Menschen, Freiburg.
- D. Mieth (1983), “Das ‘christliche Menschenbild’—eine unzeitgemäße Betrachtung?” ThQ 163, 1–15.
- R. Spaemann (1990), Glück und Wohlwollen: Versuch über Ethik, Stuttgart.
- O. Boulnois (1995), “Les deux fins de l’homme: L’impossible anthropologie et le repli de la théologie,” EPh 2, 205–22.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1995 a), “Le désir et l’inexigible: Préambules à une lecture,” EPh 2, 223–46; (1995 b), “En marge du monde et de la terre: L’aise,” RMM 100, 185–200.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Contemplation; Ethics; Life, Eternal; Naturalism; Secularization; Vision, Beatific

Beauty

1. Antiquity and the Middle Ages

a) Divine Beauty. There is no biblical theology* of beauty, and yet the Fathers of the Church, Augustine* and the Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite in particular, speak of divine beauty. Of course, the Platonic, or Neoplatonic, climate in which Christianity developed does play a role, but it cannot explain everything, for Plato had put his finger on an essential element of human experience that must have made complete sense to Christians. In describing the revelation of ideal Beauty in perceptible beauty, “the most obvious (ekphanestaton) and attractive” of all the images of Ideas of this world (Phaedrus 250 d), and the elevation of the soul* of beauties to Beauty, Plato, and afterwards Plotinus, did indeed introduce, with unprecedented strength, the theme of the supremely desirable nature of the Absolute.

The Beauty of which Plato speaks is far from being, like Kantian beauty, the object of “disinterested” pleasure—that is, without desire (AA V, 203–210). Rather, it gives rise to Eros by definition (Symposium 203 c, 204 b). The experience of beauties “mixed” with this world, says .in Enneads (I. 6. 7; V. 8. 7), wakens love* of “Beauty in itself in all its purity” (I, 6, 7) and sets the soul* in motion toward its “home” (I. 6. 8). It is still necessary to go to the end. If the particular feature of beauty is indeed a “call to oneself” (vocare ad se), as Albert* the Great repeats in De pulchro et bono (Of the Beautiful and the Good, q. 6, a. 1; see Pseudo-Dionysius, Divine Names IV, 7), all finite and moral beauty (Jüngel 1984, citing Schiller) nevertheless runs the risk, if one is deaf to the call of supreme Beauty, of becoming that “bitter” beauty that Rimbaud cursed.

It is undoubtedly easier to hear this call than to follow it, as Augustine* shows when he tells how he found himself enchanted by divine beauty and taken from himself, “ravished” in the literal sense—“ravished to you by your beauty” (rapiebar ad te decore tuo; Confessions VII. xvii)—yet was still a prisoner of earthly beauties: “I loved you very late, beauty so old and so new” (sero te amavi pulchritudo tam antiqua et tam nova, ibid. X. xxvii). Pseudo-Dionysius, on the other hand, describes the end, or goal, of ascension. By identifying the Beautiful with the Good*, he pronounces a hymn to the beauty of God* (Divine Names IV, especially 7 and 10, but also 14, 18) in genuine “liturgical rapture.” The Platonic erotic element is then adopted again, but in a subversive manner, with help from a completely different but closely related theme—that of hope*. It is in connection to promises of eschatological beatitude* (the “life of the world to come”) that desire is determined.

To speak of divine beauty, as is done in ancient theology, is not to say that Beauty is God and thus make it absolute. “God is not God because he is beautiful, he is beautiful because he is God,” says Karl Barth* transposing Augustine’s suggestion on the objectivity of beauty in Kirchliche Dogmatik (1932; vol. II). Nor is it to define something in God that we would know exactly; it is rather to express a fervor, as can be seen in the language of the mystics*. There are many examples. John* of the Cross writes, “I know there could not be a more beautiful thing” (“I Know the Source,” v. 4; see Spiritual Canticle 5, 7, 24, 35). The English poet George Herbert (1593–1633), expresses it in “Dulnes,” a poem from The Temple, by stating: “Thou art my lovelines, my light, my life/ Beautie alone to mee.”

b) Beauty in the World and Concept of Beauty. Nevertheless, inasmuch as the ancient and medieval theologians give content to the idea of beauty, they extract it from the experience of beauty in the cosmos* and from everything that it contains, rather than from the experience of art. In their eyes, art is not the source of beauty. A beautiful piece of art does not belong to the scale of beauties referred to in the Symposium, and Plato is able to condemn art without contradicting himself (e.g., in Republic X). Of course, Christian antiquity and the Middle Ages created major art, but undoubtedly not for itself, and without any clear consciousness of the specificity of the fine arts (Eco 1987). Love of the beauty of God’s house (see Ps 26:8) fills church builders, but it is not a love of “pure” beauty. When Suger (c. 1081–1151) had the abbey church of Saint Denis built and decorated, he was more spell-bound by the sparkle of the gold and gems, and especially by the light streaming into the church, symbol of divine light, than conscious of a specific beauty of Gothic architecture (Erwin Panofsky, Gothic Architecture and Scholasticism, 1957). Suger was not the only one to perceive above all the beauty of the world, created reality that allows one to imagine the Beauty of the Creator and to which not one single human creation can compare. The Fathers had already reinterpreted the Stoic and Neoplatonic themes of cosmic beauty in light of Genesis and saw in this beauty a gift from God. For Augustine, God spreads beauty over the world abundantly, for he “is not jealous of any beauty,” as he states in De musica (On Music, VI, §56). For the Pseudo-Dionysius, “the superessential Beauty” makes the outpouring of this radiant source that springs up from itself shine forth upon all things to adorn them in beauty (Divine Names IV, 7). And the perception of these two beauties is linked, as is shown by the formula with which Thomas* Aquinas sums up the Pseudo-Dionysius on this subject: Dionysius “says that God is beautiful inasmuch as he is the cause of the clarity (claritatis) and harmony (consonantiae) of the world” (ST IIa IIae, q. 145, a. 2).

Claritas, clarity or light, and consonantia, harmony or proportion, are the elements that classically entered into the definition of beauty during the Middle Ages. (See De musica VI, §58, in which Augustine writes that the beauty of the world is due to the harmony of the four elements; and De divisione naturae III, PL 122, 638A, in which John the Scot Eriugena [c. 805–77] describes this beauty as stemming from the harmony between the different natures that compose the world. For examples of the “esthetics of light,” see Eco 1987, chaps. 3 and 4.) These elements can also be found in the criteria of beauty—claritatis, consonantia, and integritas—specified by Aquinas (ST Ia, q. 39, a. 8), who is therefore not original on this point (the integritas, or perfection, which appears in this passage only, is not explained). Moreover, Aquinas never examined the esthetic question for itself, and one cannot ramble on about these criteria by isolating them from their context (Eco 1970), inasmuch as it does not involve a general theory of beauty, but a theory of Beauty of the Son, consonantia in terms of image of the Father* and claritas in terms of the Word*, lux and splendor intellectus.

Even when Aquinas takes a more direct look at beauty, it is again through a question on another subject that he introduces his famous definition, pulchra enim dicuntur quae visa placent, or “beautiful things are those that are pleasing to look at” (ST Ia, q. 5, a. 4, ad 1). This should not imply naïve indulgence in the pleasure of seeing or hearing, but rather the idea that beauty results from a judgment and even a “disinterested” judgment. This formula does explain a principle that has just been introduced: “The beautiful concerns knowledge” (respicit vim cognoscitivam). For Aquinas, the beautiful does not give rise to desire directly, like the Good; it is even through this relationship to knowledge that the idea of the beautiful distinguishes itself from that of the Good (ST Ia IIae, q. 27, a. 1, ad 3). The beautiful is what is pleasing about simple knowledge—cuius ipsa apprehensio placet (ibid.; see Eco 1970; 1987).

2. Modern Times

a) Reformation. Criticizing Roman statuary, Bernard* of Clairvaux said that he admired its beauty rather than respected its sacred character (mirantur pulchra quam venerantur sacra, PL, 182, 915). Aquinas thought that musical instruments should not be used in divine ceremony, for they gave pleasure rather than encouraged good interior disposition (ST IIa IIae, q. 91, a. 3, ad 4). The reformers felt the same way, but in much more systematic fashion. For Hegel, “religious representation retreated from the perceptible element and entered into the interiority of the soul and thought” (Aesthetics, ThWA 13, 142). Furthermore, the reformers’ rejection of the Catholic use of images*, which they considered idolatrous, led them to doubt “religious” beauty, and even, in the case of Reformed churches, the use of music* in worship (see Söhngen 1967).

The Calvinist and Zwinglian liturgies, therefore, excluded all music except for the singing of psalms*. Some iconoclasts even destroyed organs along with statues (Cottin 1995). Luther*, on the contrary, had theological reasons for considering music “ranked right behind theology” (WA 30/2, 696). For him, music was not invented by man. Rather, it was God’s creation that filled the whole world—invenies musicam inditam seu concreatam creaturis universis (ibid.). It was a precious gift that soothed the soul and chased away the demon* (ibid.; see WA.B 5, 639). It therefore had an entirely natural place in worship (Söhngen 1967) in all its forms and not only in the form of singing in unison.

Even today, although some theologians hope that Protestantism* will steer away from its excessive “liturgical fast” (Cottin 1995), others don’t want to forget “that beauty, especially the religious kind . . . can be a trap” (Gagnebin 1995). The Catholic Reform movement, on the other hand, was in full support of the object of baroque beauty, glorifying the glory* of God.

b) Philosophy. Beauty rejected or accepted in this way does not belong to the world, but to art, and this is the beauty that will be the goal of modern esthetics, or esthetics in general. (The term esthetics appeared for the first time in 1750, in A.G. Baumgarten’s Aesthetica.) Kant* even preferred nature’s beauty to the beauty of art (Critique of Judgment, §42, AA V, 298–303), but Hegel began his Aesthetics by “excluding” “natural beauty” because it was foreign to the spirit (Introduction, ThWA 13, 13). Just as the spirit is above nature, artistic beauty is above natural beauty (ThWA 13, 14; see 27). This change in perspective is not different from the theological point of view, for the focus of attention is thus shifted from God to man. The idea of a nature foreign to the spirit is no longer the idea of creation*, in which the preceding centuries saw the work of divine art; the only work in which one can recognize the spirit is human art. In the perceptible form, of course, the spirit is still alienated, and art is but the first stage in its self-blooming—a stage that is skipped today (ibid., 25), since spiritual beauty cannot be represented by beautiful form (ThWA 14, 128–29) and the Christian God can only be expressed in all the depth of the concept through exterior form (ThWA 13, 103). But inasmuch as art belongs to the same sphere as religion and philosophy*, in terms of the perceptible presentation of truth* (ThWA 13, 21–22) and the “manner . . . of expressing the divine” (ibid. 21), it thus acquires a dignity that it never had and that it retains in our culture, no matter how we consider it. Even in Nietzsche*’s work, where the anti-Platonic stance divides truth from beauty, there are “ugly” truths—Zur Genealogie der Morale (1887). Even “truth” itself “is ugly,” Nietzsche holds in Kritische Studienausgabe (XIII), and while the contrast between a “real world” and a world of appearances is an illusion, he writes in Götzendämmerung (1889; “Twilight of the Idols,” KSA VI), it is art, the extolling of vital power, that shatters this illusion. Beauty is the sign of this power (ibid.); Socrates’s ugliness, a sign of “decadence,” refutes the value of his thought, Nietzsche holds in “The Problem of Socrates” (§3, ibid.). And although Heidegger* neither contemplates beauty nor forms an esthetic, all viewers are indeed absent from the essay, “The Origin of the Work of Art.” Nevertheless, Heidegger grants a power to art, that of calling forth and expressing “truth.” This pushes the major trends in the philosophies of art to an extreme.

c) Theology. This absolute approach to art and beauty was reluctantly received by the theologians, who only acknowledged one veritable expression of Truth, divine revelation* (Jüngel 1984). Thus, Kierkegaard* radically separated the esthetic domain from the domain of faith*. The esthetic relationship to Christianity in no way involves the fact of living. The Christian, “apostle,” or “martyr of truth,” is not a poet of the religious.

This point of view could perhaps be useful when considering the problem of beauty in the liturgy*. In the liturgy the beauty of the music, objects, and architecture “are oriented toward the infinite* beauty of God” in certain ways (Vatican* II, SC, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, chap. 7, art. 122). Objects used in worship must be beautiful, “so as to signify and symbolize celestial realities” (ibid.); exterior forms are made to “arouse contemplation” of the heart of things (Council of Trent*, session 22, chap. 5). It is therefore appropriate for the liturgy to be beautiful—or at least not ugly, so as not to distract attention. The focus should not be on the forms of the ceremony, but, obviously, it does not involve procuring an esthetic experience. It is not beauty in itself that gives access to God, and the liturgy is prepared in the midst of a sacramental presence that is in no way immediately perceptible or immediately desirable. C. S. Lewis writes: “This bread, this wine: no beauty we could desire” (Poems, 124). And in the poem “Consécration,” Claudel writes: “Cet objet entre les fleurs de papier sec, c’est cela qui est la suprême beauté”—that is, “This object between the dried-paper flowers—this is what supreme beauty is” (La messe là-bas).

The passages that Barth devoted to divine beauty and included in the definition of the glory of God provide a good example of this reluctance to apply the idea of beauty to God. Barth holds that beauty is not a “major notion” or a divine attribute* to be placed on the same level as the others, and that, above all, one must not fall into “estheticism” (Kirchliche Dogmatik, II). A theology that is loyal to what God reveals of himself must nevertheless acknowledge that “God is beautiful” (Gott... auch schön ist), source of joy and object of desire. In fact, Barth uses very strong expressions in this sense. Therefore, three aspects of divine beauty can be distinguished: the beauty of the fullness of divine essence, the beauty of the Trinity* of God, which is “the mystery* of his beauty,” and the paradoxical beauty of Jesus Christ, who “had no form or comeliness that we should look at him, and no beauty that we should desire him” (Is 53:2), but who nevertheless reveals all the beauty and all the glory of God.

The Swiss theologian Hans Urs von Balthasar* (1905–88) formally acknowledges Barth for recognizing divine beauty (Herrlichkeit, I), but he wants to go much further and “develop” this notion, as he already says in the first sentence of Herrlichkeit, “Christian theology in the light of the third transcendental”—that is, Beauty.

By thus naming Beauty “the third transcendental,” Balthasar also carries out a genuine “theoretical coup” (Lacoste 1986), already initiated by E. Przywara. The Beautiful does not, indeed, belong to the classic list of those general properties of Being* that “transcend” the limits of categories and that the Scholastics* called transcendental. Nor is there a fixed number of them. When there are only three, these involve Being, Truth, and Good, and not beauty. The thing (res) and the something (aliquid) can also be cited. Nevertheless, the identity of the Beautiful and the Good, which differ only in notion (ST Ia IIae, q. 27, a. 1, ad 3), allowed some to think that the Beautiful should be added to the list. Jacques Maritain (1935) firmly supported this position. Not only is the Beautiful transcendental, but it is “the splendor of a total of all that is transcendental” (see also Coreth, Metaphysik, Innsbruck, 1963). Eco (1987) only acknowledges “an implicit integration of the beautiful into the transcendental.” He thinks it happened progressively and discretely in medieval thought.

Be that as it may, the reason for this decision is obvious. It clearly calls for distinguishing the work of founding a theological esthetics, from all that would be considered a theology of esthetics (H I) and, therefore, not confusing “the transcendental Beauty of revelation” with “secular beauty”—for example, as Chateaubriand does. The task of this theology of esthetics (a theological doctrine of perception) is precise. It is to decipher the “configuration” (Gestalt) of God, that is revealed in the story of salvation*, and eminently in Christ*, “center of the configuration of revelation” (H III, C). Although the nonsecular esthetic experience in which he perceives the appearance of divine glory in the finite configuration, the unique and absolutely privileged figure of Jesus, must be analogous* to all experience of beauty, it is also in the “unconfiguration” (Ungestalt) of the Crucified One that God allows himself to be known, and this recognition does not have a secular analogue. And although the nonsecular esthetic experience through which one perceives the appearance of divine glory—in the finite, unique, and absolutely privileged figure of Jesus—must be analogous (analogy) to all experience of Beauty, it is also in the Ungestalt of the Crucified One that God allows himself to be known, and this recognition does not have a secular analogue.

- Albert the Great, De pulchro et bono, in Thomas Aquinas, Opera omnia, Ed. Busa, Stuttgart, 1980, VII, 43–47.
- Augustine, De musica, BAug 7.
- H. U. von Balthasar, Herrlichkeit, Einsiedeln, 1961–69.
- K. Barth, KD II/1, §31, 733–51 (Dogmatique, Geneva, vol. 7).
- G. W. F. Hegel, Vorlesungen über die Ästhetik, ThWA 13–15.
- M. Heidegger, “Der Ursprung des Kunstwerkes” (1936), in Holzwege, Frankfurt, 1949, 7–68.
- E. Kant, Kritik der Urteilskraft, AA V, 167–485.
- S. Kierkegaard, Ou bien... ou bien (Either-Or), OC III and IV, Paris, 1970; Étapes sur le chemin de la vie (Stages on Life’s Way), OC IX, 1978; Post-scriptum aux Miettes philosophiques (Concluding Unscientific Postscript to Philosophical Fragments), OC X and XI, 1977.
- Plato, Banquet, Phaedo, Hippias Major.
- Plotinus Enneads I, 6 and V, 8.
- Pseudo-Dionysius, Divine Names IV, 7 and 10.
- Thomas Aquinas, Commentary on the Divine Names IV; ST Ia, q. 5, a. 4, ad 1; q. 39, a. 8; Ia IIae, q. 27, a. 1, ad 3.
- ♦ J. Maritain (1935), Art et scolastique, Paris.
- E. de Bruyne (1946), Études d’esthétique médiévale, Bruges.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato Christianus, Einsiedeln.
- O. Söhngen (1967), Theologie der Musik, Cassel.
- I. Murdoch (1970), The Sovereignty of Good, London.
- U. Eco (1970), Il problema estetico in Tommaso d’Aquino, 2nd Ed., Milan (bibl.).
- P. Evdokimov (1972), L’art de l’icône: Théologie de la beauté, Paris.
- A. Grabar (1979), Les voies de la création en iconographie chrétienne: Antiquité et Moyen Age, Paris (2nd Ed. 1994).
- A. Nichols (1980), The Art of God Incarnate, London.
- E. Jüngel (1984), “Auch das Schöne muß sterben, Schönheit im Lichte der Wahrheit,” ZThK 81, 106–26.
- W. Jens, H. Küng (1985), Dichtung und Religion, Munich.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1985), “Visages: Paradoxe et gloire,” RThom 85, 561–606; (1986), “Du phénomène à la figure,” in “Minima Balthasariana,” RThom 86, 606–16.
- J. Riches (Ed.) (1986), The Analogy of Beauty: The Theology of Hans Urs von Balthasar, Edinburgh.
- U. Eco (1987), Arte e bellezza nell’estetica medievale, Milan.
- F. Burch Brown (1990), Religious Aesthetics, London.
- C. Harrison (1992), Beauty and Revelation in the Thought of St. Augustine, Oxford.
- M. Sherringham (1992), Introduction à la philosophie esthétique, Paris.
- P. Sherry (1992), Spirit and Beauty: An Introduction to Theological Aesthetics, Oxford.
- M. Zeindler (1993), Gott und das Schöne: Studien zur Theologie der Schönheit, Göttingen.
- W. Lesch (Ed.) (1994), Theologie und ästhetische Erfahrung, Darmstadt.
- J. Cottin, L. Gagnebin (1995), “Art,” Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Paris, 48–62 (bibl.).
- P. Évrard (1995), “Esthétique,” ibid., 521–27 (bibl.).
- F. Samuel (1996), “La question de l’économie divine et la pensée de Hans Urs von Balthasar,” Aletheia 10, 59–77.
- J.-L. Chrétien (1997), “Du Dieu artiste à l’homme créateur,” in Corps à corps: A l’écoute de l’œuvre d’art, Paris, 91–121.
- L. Karfiková (1998), De esse ad pulchrum esse: Schönheit in der Theologie Hugos von St. Viktor, Turnhout (bibl.).

IRÈNE FERNANDEZ

See also Glory of God; Idolatry; Images; Liturgy; Love; Platonism, Christian

Beghards. See Beguines; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Beguines

The diversity of forms of life considered by historians as “Beguinal” and the variety of terms that designated such experiences in the late Middle Ages make any definition of the phenomenon difficult. The Beguine movement can at least be placed in a precise context. Beginning in the late 12th century, throughout the West, new religious experiences developed that associated the laity with a life made up of penitence and contemplation*. Women (woman*) were particularly likely to adopt this way of life; they entered upon the service of God* without taking monastic vows or accepting the constraints of communal living or a rule approved by the ecclesiastical hierarchy*. Living as nuns, they remained secular. These “semi-nuns,” as many historians now characterize them, were at first designated by the term mulieres religiosae (religious women). But in the northern half of Europe, they were soon given the name beguinae. Elsewhere, the same experiences received other names. According to Jacques de Vitry (†1240), one of the first to write about the movement, “they are called béguines in Flanders and Brabant, paipelardes in France, humiliées in Lombardy, bizokes in Italy, and coquenunnes in Germany.”

It was in urban settings that the Beguine experience proliferated. Some Beguines lived alone, leading an itinerant existence or living under the family roof; others gathered together in a house; still others resided in “courts,” called “Beguinares.” Veritable villages within the city, these Beguinares were made up of several houses or convents, which were provided with a chapel, a hospital, and other common buildings. The Beguines lived on charity and the work* of their hands. By the 13th century, numerous cities sheltered several dozen Beguine communities, but it is impossible to give precise numbers or to provide a map for the Beguine movement. Many Beguines lived in solitude and, in contrast to traditional convents, many communities left no documentary traces. The phenomenon was nonetheless widespread and substantial. A demographic imbalance characterized by an excess of women, very high among populations emigrating to cities, and a certain resistance of traditional religious orders to new spiritual tendencies go some way toward explaining its magnitude.

In the beginning, Beguine was a deprecatory term, a synonym for heretic, for the movement had many detractors. To be sure, the pope had approved the Beguine communities in 1216, “not only in the diocese of Liège, but in the kingdom of France and in the empire” (according to a letter by Jacques de Vitry). In addition, a bull of 1233 had granted them pontifical protection. However, many churchmen had difficulty in accepting the intermediate situation (Zwischenstand) of the Beguines, which implicitly called into question the distinction between clergy* and laity that had been reaffirmed by the Gregorian reform, as well as all the social and legal classifications familiar to the church*. Because they did not know where to locate them, the laity reproached the Beguines for their “hypocrisy,” whereas the secular clergy were hostile to the privileged relations that often bound them to the mendicants (Franciscan spirituality*) and removed them from the jurisdiction of the clergy. In addition, the networks of informal social relations in which the Beguines participated could only trouble the institution of the church.

Even outside their communities, the Beguines met, prayed together, and discussed their experiences. Above all they read, used writing, and appropriated the sacred texts and translated them into the vernacular languages. Some of them composed treatises, as evidenced by the mystical works of Beatrice of Nazareth (†1268), Hadewijch of Antwerp (c. 1240), and Margaret Porette (†1310). The immediate relationship that some maintained with God in contemplation* and ecstasy left no role for priestly mediation. Moreover, several English historians consider the mystical adventures of the Beguines as a kind of refuge for women who felt excluded from a church controlled by men. It would, however, be inappropriate to reduce the Beguine movement purely and simply to the mystical* element, which engaged probably only a small number of Beguines. Similarly, there was never a spirituality (and still less a theology*) particular to the Beguine movement.

In dealing with the Beguines, the institutional church adopted two different attitudes. Sometimes it rejected the Beguines; at other times it tried to assimilate them.

In rejecting the Beguines, the church identified them as heretics*. This was particularly true in the Rhineland, where the Beguines were persecuted as early as the 13th century. Then, at the Council of Vienna* of 1311–12, a major condemnation was delivered against some Beguines in the decrees Cum de quibusdam mulieribus and Ad nostrum. These decrees were promulgated in 1317–18 by John XXII, who in a new decree, Sancta Romana, grouped the Beguines together with the Fraticeli. First mentioned in 1311 in a pontifical brief, “The Sect of the Free Spirit,” to which Beguines and Beghards were accused of belonging, never had any substance except in the mind of inquisitors (and for some uncritical historians). The heresy of the “Free Spirit” denounced in Vienna was, in fact, essentially the result of a compilation produced on the basis of quotations extracted from The Mirror of Simple Souls, the banned treatise of the Beguine Margaret Porette, who was declared a heretic and burned in Paris in 1310.

Conversely, in attempting to assimilate the Beguines, the church forced some Beguines to adopt the rule of Saint Augustine* or to join a third order. In the diocese of Liège and in Flanders, the church authorities and the civil government carried out a kind of enclosure of the Beguines. Those who were isolated were assembled in particular places, called “Beguinares,” which from then on were the only authorized form of association for the Beguines. Adherents were given rules and regularly visited by priests* who were specifically assigned to them. While the Beguine movement faded elsewhere, the large Beguinages in the north survived the crisis of the first quarter of the 14th century.

- A. Mens (1941), Oorsprong en betekenis van de Nederlandse Begijnenbeweging, Louvain.
- S. Axters (1950), Geschiedenis van de vroomheid in de Nederlanden I, Antwerp.
- E. W. McDonnell (1954), The Beguines and Beghards in Medieval Culture, New Brunswick, N.J.
- R. Manselli (1959), Spirituali e Beghini, Rome.
- H. Grundmann (1961), Religiöse Bewegungen im Mittelalter, 2nd Ed., Darmstadt.

- R. Guarnieri (1965), Il movimento del Libero Spirito, Rome.
- R. E. Lerner (1972), The Heresy of the Free Spirit in the Later Middle Ages, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London.
- J. Tarrant (1974), "The Clementine Decrees on the Beguines: Conciliar and Papal Versions," AHP 12, 300–308.
- J.-C. Schmitt (1978), Mort d'une hérésie: L'Église et les clercs face aux béguines et aux béghards du Rhin supérieur du XI^e au XV^e siècle, Paris.
- R. E. Lerner (1983), "Beguines and Beghards," DMA 2, 157–62.
- W. Simons (1989), "The Beguine Movement in the Southern Low Countries: A Reassessment," BIHBR 59, 63–105.
- G. Epiney-Burgard, E. Zum Brunn (1992), Femmes troubadours de Dieu, Paris.

MICHEL LAUWERS

See also Priesthood; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism; Woman

Being

Ontology is a term that appeared late (in Goclenius's 1613 Lexicon philosophicum); and the philosophical tradition from Plato to Meinong and beyond speaks of objects said to be located beyond being (the Good* or the One in Platonism and Neoplatonism), or beyond being and nonbeing (Meinong's "nonexistent objects"). Notwithstanding these two reservations, the term ontological may be applied to any ordered inventory of those things to which a reality is attributed. Theology deals with objects whose reality it is not alone in asserting (God*, evil*), and with objects whose reality it alone asserts (intradivine relations), but it always claims to name those objects in an order that corresponds to their reality. As a result, theological discourse is impossible without articulated ontological decisions, and that discourse must necessarily situate itself in relation to ontological decisions that are made within nontheological frames of reference.

a) Divine Substance, Logos, and Metaphysics. Choosing the God of the philosophers against the gods of paganism was one of the major decisions of the early church* (Ratzinger 1968; see also Pannenberg 1967, Stead 1986). The choice of logos over muthos, the conception of Christianity as "true philosophy*" and of pagan philosophy as a "preparation for the gospel," and the development of a Christology* that linked the Johannine Word/Logos to the Hellenistic Logos/Reason are all factors showing how Christianity developed its doctrines (its canonical interpretation of the foundational texts, whose authority* it based on the authority of God) by making use of the conceptual resources offered by Greece. On the other hand the intellectual climate of late antiquity, characterized by an eclectic practice of philosophy, a frequently religious conception of the philosophical life, and the dissemination of doctrines in a "popular" form (see Nock 1964, e.g.), explains the style of the Christian use of Greek words and ideas. This took the form of isolated borrowings rather than the adoption of theories, and the theological appropriateness of these borrowings sometimes concealed spectacular philosophical blunders and imprecisions.

The entry of Greek concepts into Christian language was solemnly ratified when the Council* of Nicaea* inserted into its confession of faith* a nonbiblical word, homoousios, "consubstantial*" (from ousia, "essence" or "substance*"), in order to affirm the divinity of Jesus Christ, while simultaneously denying, against Arius, that he was an (intermediate) god born from the supreme God. Because the Nicene formulation made it possible to name what God the Father* and Jesus Christ are in common (what Aristotle calls "primary substance," Cat. 5, 2a 11–19), but not to name what each one possesses uniquely, the future would belong to new conceptualizations that originated in both Greek and Latin: the introduction of the concepts of hupostasis and prosôpon/persona (respectively, “hypostasis” and “persons”). But the orthodoxy that was thus constituted, with the dual goal of evangelizing the empire and replying to formulations that were considered inadequate, set itself up as the correct reading of the founding events of Christianity only by partially substituting the language of being for the language of history* and narrative*. This assertion must, of course, be qualified. On the one hand, any question about the identity of God or of Jesus* could be answered by reference to the many names and titles contained in the biblical text. On the other, the establishment of a theology interested primarily in the being of God and Christ* (this interest defined in the strict sense what Greek patristics called theologia from the fourth century; see Eusebius of Caesarea, HE I. 1. 7) would never be an obstacle to the proclamation of the great deeds of God and of everything called in Greek the “economy” (oikonomia) of the Covenant* and of salvation*. A complex system of cross-references, lastly, would always unite “theological” and “economic” concerns, with the latter never being fully absorbed by the former. But a displacement had in fact taken place.

In saying of the homoousios of Nicaea that it made it possible to “grasp the coherence of the intrinsic ontology of the gospel,” Torrance’s argument in favor of the patristic theology of the first four centuries (1988, 144; cautious discussion in Lehmann 1973) expressed an idea held by the patristic era and by medieval theology. But there is another characteristically modern idea according to which there was an inherently corrupting element in the Greek logos. The idea was developed starting with Luther*’s polemic against Scholasticism*, which he considered a modern counterpart to Augustine*’s struggle against Pelagianism*. Against a theology based on the belief that one could not become a theologian without studying Aristotle, Luther proposed a theology born from experience* (WA 1. 226. §43 f.; WA 5. 163. 28: Vivendo, immo moriendo et damnando fit theologus, non intelligendo, legendo aut speculando; “one becomes a theologian by living, or rather by dying and being condemned, not by understanding, reading, or speculating”). Against the classic concepts of Christology (dogmatic interest in the being of Christ), he set up the primacy of soteriology and the believer’s living relation to Jesus as his savior: “Christ is not called Christ because he has two natures. What difference does that make to me? But he bears the magnificent and consoling name of Christ because of the ministry* and the burden that he took up; that is what gives him his name*. That he is by nature man and God is a matter that concerns him. But the fact that he devoted his ministry and poured forth his love* to become my savior and redeemer is where I find my consolation and my good” (Commentary on Exodus, WA 16. 217–18). The polemic was ritually repeated and amplified in Protestantism* after the Reformation (see Le platonisme des Pères dévoilé by M. Souverain [1700], a French Huguenot who converted to Anglicanism*), and Luther’s tone reappears in the rejection of “metaphysics” in favor of ethics formulated by Ritschl in his magnum opus on justification* (1870–74). The sharpest form of objection, however, derived from theoretical developments occurring outside theology. 1) The linguistic theory of W. von Humboldt (1767–1835) was the first of these developments. By saying that every language carried out a prismatic decomposition of the world and then conducted a sui generis organization of reality, Humboldt (On the Kawi Language of the Island of Java,” GS VII/1) in fact laid out the bases for a linguistic critique of ontological categories (see, e.g., Benveniste, Problèmes de linguistique générale 1, Paris, 1966; see C. H. Kahn, The Verb “Be” in Ancient Greek, Dordrecht-Boston, 1973). It then became possible to ask each language to reveal its vision of the world, and thereby its philosophy. A discipline, “ethnophilosophy,” was created with the work of P. Tempels S. J. (1906–77) on the implicit ontology of the Bantu language (La philosophie bantoue, 2nd Ed., Paris, 1948; see also A. Kagame, La philosophie bantu-rwandaise de l’être, Brussels, 1956). And it also became possible to identify a new object, “Hebrew thought,” and methodically to distinguish it from another object that was called “Greek thought.” In its fully developed form (T. Boman, Das hebräische Denken im Vergleich mit dem Griechischen, 2nd Ed., Göttingen, 1954), this led to the identification of a dynamic kind of thought as opposed to a static one. In the dynamic kind of thought (Hebrew), appearance is reality, as opposed to a thought concerned with what lies beneath appearances; it is a thought concerned with history, not ignorant of it; a thought of concrete totality as opposed to an abstracting and individualizing thought. The philological merit of J. Barr was in showing (Semantics of Biblical Language, Oxford, 1961) that this involved an unjustified identification. What had been attributed to a language was not rooted in the structure of that language but in what the biblical writers using it had wanted to say. But even after such a refutation, the question of a biblical experience of the world, unquestionably different from that of Hellenism, remains open. 2) The second theoretical development was the appearance of a philosophical critique of Hellenism, from Nietzsche* to Heidegger* and beyond. In Nietzsche the attack on Christianity is carried out as an adjunct to the attack on Platonism*: for the use of the “people,” Christianity had doctrinally adopted a Platonic rejection of movement, time*, and the reality of things as they are in the here and now. In Heidegger a new object was identified under the name of metaphysics, by which must be understood a finite manner of thinking (“closure of metaphysics”), one born (in Greece) and mortal, governed by presuppositions that it cannot itself criticize (e.g., a certain rule of presence, a certain forgetting of being in favor of the existent), and living thought has the task of “overcoming” (überwinden) it (“Das Ende der Philosophie und die Aufgabe des Denkens,” in Zur Sache des Denkens, Tübingen, 1969). And because any discourse linked to the Greek logos was metaphysical during the time of metaphysics, it goes without saying that the task assigned to “thought” in general by Heidegger is also assigned ipso facto to any theology that wishes to survive metaphysics.

Recent scholarship has thus seen a replacement of the theological polemic against the Hellenization* of Christianity by a theological critique of metaphysics, often intensified under the influence of objections formulated by E. Levinas, in the name of the “question of the other,” against any thought of being (including Heidegger’s). In a realm characterized more by projects than actual realizations, several directions are open. If the terms of metaphysics are all obsolete, what texts can be found to enable theology to perform its role? 1) As an initial response we can assert the urgency of a rigorous reading of the biblical text. And in a cultural climate marked by the development of sciences of the text, the desire to preserve intact the exigencies of theological method might lead to attributing to those sciences (because they are dignified by the name sciences) the capacity to provide theology with conceptual tools free of metaphysical contamination. Structural linguistics thus appears (G. Lafon, CFi 96; A. Delzant, CFi 92; see also M. Costantini Com(F) I/7, 40–54) as a new organon for theology. 2) In response to the presumed exhaustion of the key words of metaphysics, it was necessary to call on that which metaphysics had left unthought. A theology asserting the death of the concept of substance would thus attempt to respect the signifying intention that guided the adoption of consubstantial at Nicaea by moving from the language of substance to the language of love—the agape of Jesus is one with the agape of the Father, homoagape (Hick 1966; but see Mackinnon 1972). A theology concerned with maintaining its distance from a representation of God on the Greek model of noûs (adopted by Philo), or on the modern model of subjectivity, would find in the biblical lexicon of spirit (ruach-pneuma) the basis for attempting a new language (Lampe 1977 [but one that leads to a unitarian theology]; Pannenberg, 1980, Syst. Theol. I, Göttingen, 1988; see Stead 1995).

3) Beyond fragmentary conceptual rearrangements, the idea of a theological overtaking of metaphysics (Marion 1977; Milbank 1997) is congruent with the hypothetical assertion that metaphysics had already been overtaken in the time of metaphysics (“a nonchronological exit from metaphysics,” Carraud 1992), or that certain forms of thought (“spirituality” according to Martineau 1980) have, by their essence, a capacity for avoiding metaphysics. What is left unthought by Heideggerian “destruction” is, therefore, just as important as what is left unthought by metaphysics. And if it is true that the history of metaphysics still remains to be written after the fragmentary indications supplied by Heidegger (for an outline, see H. Boeder Topologie der Metaphysik, Freiburg, 1980), a history of the nonmetaphysical moments or tendencies of Christian discourse has also yet to be written. 4) Assuming that the late 20th century has experienced “the end of philosophy,” theology is not alone in confronting the “task of thought,” and a theology with postmetaphysical intentions cannot be indifferent to other forms of discourse with similar intentions. Substituting a thought of the gift for a thought of the object in order to reject the naming of the human person as a subject (J.-L. Marion, Étant donné, Paris, 1997); conceiving of an “ontology with a human face” (Chapelle 1982 or C. Bruaire); rooting the meaning of human experiences in a “metahistory” (M. Müller)—these ways of talking about human beings are close enough to discourse about God for the interest of theology in such approaches to be obvious. And when theology also recognizes that its mission includes a universalizing contemplation of the meaning of being (Balthasar*, Herrlichkeit III/1, 974–83), this involves in addition a theological contribution to the task of thought and to the survival of thought in an age of nihilism.

During the same period, more than one historical issue has been subject to a reexamination that has led to significant conclusions (see E.P. Meijering, ThR 36 [1971], 303–20; A.M. Ritter, ThR 49 [1984], 31–56). Studied on the basis of Greek theories of substance, and then with reference to the theological struggles that led to its adoption, the homoousios of Nicaea appears in fact as the product of a desire for meaning surpassing any philosophical conditioning, so that its use, and the confession of belief in it, remain possible regardless of the fate of Greek concepts of ousia when they are considered with philosophical rigor (Stead 1977, 1985; Grillmeier 1978; Hanson 1988; Barnes and Williams 1993).

Patristic studies have produced a good deal of evidence that the Christian restructuring of Platonism* (Ivanka 1964; see Waszink 1955; E.P. Meijering, VigChr 28 [1974], 15–28) produced more than merely a new Platonism. In this regard we can cite Gregory* of Nyssa's construction of a concept of the infinite that owes nothing to Greek metaphysics (Mühlenberg 1967); the development from Pseudo-Dionysius* through Gregory* Palamas of theories of participation in God that subvert the entire Greek ontology of participation (survey in Karayiannis 1993); and Augustine's insertion of relation at the heart of substance (see below). Christian dogma* and its language no longer appear as “a work of the Greek spirit on the ground of the Gospel” (Harnack, Lehrbuch, 4th Ed., 1909; repr. Darmstadt, 1983) but as the fruit of a kerygmatic effort carried out with the help of Greek words whose conceptual charge was changed in the process as a general rule (e.g., with reference to the definition of Chalcedon, A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1979).

Hence, whatever the relevance of an interrogation of the meaning of being in the dimensions of universal history (Heidegger), and whatever usefulness its theological reception might have, it should perhaps become apparent that the question of the links to be established between Christianity and Hellenism/metaphysics is primarily a hermeneutical* question.

The technical language of theology is an interpretive language, and its interpretation is carried out with reference to the biblical text. The words chosen for the process of interpretation are available words, selected because they are endowed with a meaning that permits inserting them into true propositions. Because words with meanings do not exist in isolation but within languages and, in the case of concepts, within theories (whether established in rigid form, as in the case of the Aristotelian theory of ousia, or more flexibly, as with the general ideas about ousia in the philosophical koinè of late antiquity), no terminology can of course enter theological usage without carrying traces of its pretheological usage, with the latter perhaps having some influence on the former. But because theological usage itself is established by reference to the biblical text, the first question must concern the elementary logical or ontological requirements of the Christian faith as these emerge from the reading of the Bible. Thus, the homoousios of Nicaea articulates in a rigorous form what is already said in John 10:30—“I and the Father are one.”

Theology speaks of its particular objects in a language that has been used for naming other objects. The biblical text itself is not written in a sacred language that has been created for the naming only of theologically significant realities. It is therefore a work of piety—of theological critique—to analyze the nontheological implications carried by theological words and concepts. The deep symbolism of the Pentecost narrative (Acts 2:1–13), however, shows that the “wonders of God” can be expressed in, or translated into, any language. In the hermeneutic terms derived from Gadamer and Ricoeur, fusion is always possible between the perspectives of the biblical text and the perspectives of any present moment, and the “world of the text” of the Bible is always accessible to any individual, no matter which “world” his own language and epistèmè make him an inhabitant of.

The history of theology should be read as a history of meaning—of a will to interpret—bound up with a capacity to speak. Meaning exceeds what is said, in this domain more than any other (on this excess as a general law of hermeneutics, see J. Grondin, L'universalité de l'herméneutique, Paris, 1993), and the idea of the final word is foreign to the forms of logic that should preside over the work of theology, which are forms of logic of present interpretation (J.-Y. Lacoste RPL 92, 1994, 254–80). Present interpretation obviously cannot find its conceptual tools in just any pretheological or theologically neutral ontology. But in order to name rigorously the realities it has the task of discussing, theology may draw on the resources provided by more than one philosophical inventory of reality. And of the three principal procedures adopted by the philosophy of the present time to question the reality of reality—first the “question of being” and the “destruction of metaphysics,” second ontology as hermeneutics, and finally analytic philosophy and the “theory of objects”—it seems clear that each one can contribute to the precise formulation of a Christian discourse that wishes to express the “excess of God” in relation to any metaphysical sense (Marion 1977; Corbin 1997); or to the continuity of a provision of meaning within the discontinuity of the ages of thought; or, finally, can provide the basic grammar that must govern any use of Christian words that seeks an exact reference to the objects of faith (e.g., Mackinnon 1972).

- J. H. Waszink (1955), “Der Platonismus und die altchristliche Gedankenwelt,” Entretiens sur l'Antiquité classique III, Vandœuvres-Geneva, 139–74.
- E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato christianus, Einsiedeln.
- A. D. Nock (1964), Early Gentile Christianity and Its Hellenistic Background, New York.
- J. Hick (1966), “Christology at the Cross Roads,” in F. G. Healey (Ed.), Prospect for Theology, London, 137–66.
- E. Mühlenberg (1967), Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen.
- W. Pannenberg (1967), “Die Aufnahme des philosophischen Gottesbegriffs als dogmatisches Problem der frühchristlichen Theologie,” Grundf. syst. Th., 276–346.

- J. Ratzinger (1968), "Der Gott des Glaubens und der Gott der Philosophen," Einführung in das Christentum, Munich, 103–44.
- F. Ricken (1969), "Nikaia als Krisis des altchristlichen Platonismus," ThPh 44, 321–41.
- D. M. Mackinnon (1972), "'Substance' in Christology—A Cross-Bench View," in S. W. Sykes, J. P. Clayton (Ed.), Christ, Faith and History, Cambridge, 279–300.
- K. Lehmann (1973), "Kirchliche Dogmatik und biblisches Gottesbild," in J. Ratzinger (Ed.), Die Frage nach Gott, QD 56, 116–40.
- G. Lampe (1977), God As Spirit, London.
- J.-L. Marion (1977), L'idole et la distance, Paris.
- C. Stead (1977), Divine Substance, Oxford.
- C. Andresen (1978), "Antike und Christentum," TRE 3, 50–99 (bibl.).
- A. Grillmeier (1978), "Piscatorie-Aristotelice," in Mit Ihm und in Ihm, 2nd Rev. Ed., Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 283–300.
- E. Martineau (1980), "Gilson et le problème de la théologie," in M. Couratier (Ed.), Étienne Gilson et nous, Paris, 61–71.
- W. Pannenberg (1980), "Die Subjektivität Gottes und die Trinitätslehre: Ein Beitrag zur Beziehung zwischen Karl Barth und der Philosophie Hegels," Grundfr. syst. Th. 2, 96–111.
- A. Chapelle (1982), "Ontologie," course notes, Institut d'études théologiques, Brussels.
- C. Stead (1985), Substance and Illusion in the Christian Fathers, London; (1986), "Die Aufnahme des philosophischen Gottesbegriffes in der frühchristlichen Theologie: W. Pannenberg's These neu bedacht," ThR 51, 349–71.
- R. P. C. Hanson (1988), The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy 318–381, Edinburgh.
- T. F. Torrance (1988), The Trinitarian Faith, Edinburgh.
- V. Carraud (1992), Pascal et la ph., Paris.
- M. R. Barnes, D. N. Williams (Ed.) (1993), Arianism after Arius, Edinburgh.
- V. Karayiannis (1993), Maxime le Confesseur: Essence et énergies de Dieu, ThH 93, 31–276.
- B. Pottier (1994), Dieu et le Christ selon Grégoire de Nysse, Turnhout, 83–142.
- C. Stead (1995), Philosophy in Christian Antiquity, Cambridge.
- M. Corbin (1997), La Trinité ou l'Excès de Dieu, Paris.
- J. Milbank (1997), "Only Theology Overcomes Metaphysics," in The Word Made Strange, Oxford, 36–52.

b) God and Being. It was in the very text of its Scriptures* that Christianity found the suggestion of a thought of God as being. Exodus 3:14, in the Septuagint, says in effect "I am the existent" (egô eimi ho ôn). The translation is hardly defensible philologically (see Caquot in Coll. 1978, 17–26); Aquila and Theodotion translated it closer to the Hebrew, "I will be who I will be" (esomai hos esomai), and so did the Vulgate "I am the one that I am," "I am the one that I am" (Ego sum qui sum). But as soon as a theological language with conceptual characteristics began to take shape alongside biblical language, and in order to provide biblical language with added precision, the Septuagint version of Exodus 3:14 unflinchingly provided a major biblical anchor for the idea of a God who, before all, is—an idea it had already supplied to Philo. (Other biblical references were adduced: the claims of authority by the Christ of John ["I am"]; Rom 4:17: God "calls into existence the things that do not exist"; Rev 1:8: "[God] who is.")

It has been said of Latin patristics that, from the first use of Exodus 3:14 (by Novatian), "the ontological meaning of the name* revealed to Moses caused no difficulty for anyone" (G. Madec in Coll. 1978, 139). In this tradition* Augustine provided a classic interpretation of the theological primacy of being (but he also referred to Ps 4:9 and 121:3, in order to express the sum qui sum, an expression that he used in a technical sense and that does not articulate being: the idipsum [see Conf. IX. iv. 11; De Trin. III. iii. 8; En. Ps. 121]). The God of Augustine reveals himself under two names, his "substantial name" (nomen substantiae: sum qui sum) and his "name of mercy*" (nomen misericordiae: God of Abraham and Isaac). If God is, however, then man, inhabitant of the "region of unlikeness" (Conf. VII. x. 16, himself seems to be one who is not. Contemplated in God, being is immutability* and eternity*. In that case, being can be attributed to man only with reservations. Defined as the one who changes and passes, man is also the one of whom it can be said that he "is" not. He is defined by his sin* as "the one who goes far away from being [and] travels toward nonbeing" (En. Ps. 38. 22; CChr.SL 38, 422). He is also the one who truly is only at the conclusion of a conversion*. Augustine's contemporary, Jerome, also affirmed that God alone truly is, and further believed that the name given in Exodus 3:14 revealed the divine essence (Ep. 15. 4. 2, CSEL 54. 65. 12–18).

Greek theology also affirmed the being of God. Despite his knowledge of Hebrew, Origen* continually quoted the Septuagint version of Exodus 3:14; and this was the text he relied on to develop the notion of God's relationship to created beings as a relationship between the one who "truly is" to something that is by participation. In Gregory* of Nazianzus, God is an "infinite and undetermined ocean of essence" (Or. 38. 7, ousia), and John of Damascus quoted this blend of a concept and an image, with reference to the name revealed to Moses, by saying that God had "totally gathered ousia into himself, like an ocean" (Fid. Orth. I. 9). However, the influence of Platonism on the Greek Fathers* qualified these assertions. The Good, according to Plato "transcends essence," epekeina tês ousias (Republic VI, 509b), and the One of Plotinus transcends intellect and being (e.g., Enneads VI. 9. 3; on the history of this theory before Plotinus, see J. Whitaker, VigChr 23, 1969). The idea of a God who is not, or who does more than be, was an idea that could be, and was in fact, formulated in a radical way by the Gnostic Basilides: "The God who is not," ho ouk ôn theos (Hippolytus, Ref. VII. 20). And although the Fathers did not formulate it in a radical way, there was enough Neoplatonism in Pseudo-Dionysius that his God was not being but the “demiurge of being” (Divine Names V. 817 C), and that anonymity was seen to be better suited to God than any name, including the name of being, and that everything belonging to the realm of being issued from God as absolute goodness (ibid., 820 C). Another Platonist, Marius Victorinus, was also the only Latin Father to assert that God—the Father—transcends being.

It was left to Byzantine theology, and especially to Gregory* Palamas, to specify the terms of a theory of participation in God. If the absolute future of man must be thought of under the figure of “divinization,” theôsis, in accordance with 2 Peter 1:4, then God (or at least his “nature,” phusis) must be open to participation. To indicate that a doctrine of divinization does not undermine the doctrine of divine transcendence, Pseudo-Dionysius had proposed a paradoxical formulation: God is “the unshareable shared,” ametekhtôs metekhetai. In Gregory Palamas the already classic distinction (e.g., Basil, PG 32, 869 AB) between divine energies (open to participation, the dunamis of Pseudo-Dionysius) and essence (not open to participation, the henôseis of Pseudo-Dionysius) provides a coherent solution to the problem. The prerogatives of apophasis are preserved, because the divine essence (or “superessence,” hyperosiotês) remains strictly incomprehensible. But the prerogatives of an ontology of the divine are also preserved. By forcing the development of an eschatological doctrine of the humanity of man, the concept of divinization also makes it necessary to speak of a God who is—with the qualification, of course, that “if it was necessary to distinguish in God between essence and what is not essence, this is precisely because God is not limited by his essence” (V. Lossky, A l’image et à la ressemblance de Dieu, Paris, 1967).

Two theories were thus bequeathed to the Latin Middle Ages: the Dionysian primacy of the Good and the Augustinian primacy of Being. Although there was no lack of nuances and intermediate positions, several distinct positions can be identified. 1) His teacher, Albert* the Great, had passed on to Thomas* Aquinas a thought of the anteriority of being in respect to goodness which simultaneously preserved the unknowability and anonymity of the divine being. The two directions were preserved by Thomas within an impressive orchestration. On the one hand, the primacy of being is the keystone of the entire theological-philosophical edifice. God is “pure act of being,” actus purus essendi (hence nothing in him exists in the mode of the possible), and he is “subsistent being itself,” ipsum esse subsistens.

Hence the Absolute does not appear as an existent but as being in the infinitive sense (the distinction between esse and existens was probably transmitted to the Latin Middle Ages by Boethius*; see Hadot in Coll. 1978). The epistemology of Thomas Aquinas is not, however, governed by the exegesis* of Exodus 3:14, but by that of Romans 1:20 (“his [God’s] invisible attributes, namely, his eternal power and divine nature, have been clearly perceived, ever since the creation of the world, in the things that have been made”). And since God is knowable through creation, the omnimodal perfection of the divine esse is set forth only at the conclusion of a conceptual ascent for which the existents given to perceptual experience provide both a point of departure and a direction. On the other hand, in order to preserve divine unknowability within the very conceptual structure that binds the Creator to creation, Thomas attributes to the concept of being the modality of analogy: being is not understood of God in the way it is understood of creation. And by postulating that the real difference between essence and esse, which applies to all created beings, does not apply to the Creator, he preserves the transcendence of God by affirming his simplicity. 2) Bonaventure responded to the Augustinianism* of Thomas by a reaffirmation of Dionysian theology. The Itinerarium records the movement from a metaphysics of divine being to a thought of the Good that locates its scriptural basis in Luke 18:19 (“No one is good except God alone”) and Matthew 19:17. And to an inductive ontology for which created beings provide the first steps in the reasoning process, Bonaventure responds with an ontology that attempts to apprehend all existents in the light of the Trinitarian mystery* (see d below). 3) Another ontology was constructed by another Franciscan, Duns* Scotus, and based on a univocal concept of being that led him to see in the infinite the sign of the divinity of God. Recalled in the prayer* that opens the De primo principio, the revelation* of the divine name in Exodus 3:14 is taken as an invitation to seek God through reason in the historical present of experience. Scotist theology aims, however, to be a practical science oriented toward charity: the speculative primacy of being is therefore limited. 4) The attempt to reconcile the Dionysian and Augustinian viewpoints was the distinctive characteristic of the Rhineland-Flemish theology derived from Albert the Great (see Libera 1984). “Purity of being,” puritas essendi, divine life understood as “bubbling,” bullitio, are the words Eckhart used to create a mystical* ontology of divine being. This mystical ontology achieved its pure form in the work of Ulrich of Strasbourg. It has God alone as object, and because it speaks of being in a sense that belongs only to God, it can see being as a specific name of God. Later spiritual tradition frequently followed a similar approach. For example, God showed himself to Catherine of Siena while saying to her that he is the one who is, and she is the one who is not (Martène and Durand, Amplissima collectio, vol. 6, col. 1354, Paris, 1729). We might also mention the representative of another school, the Dionysian Thomas Gallus (Thomas of Verceil, †1246), a theologian of Saint-Victor, author of a mystical reading of Exodus 3:14. Instead of appearing as an “intelligible name,” intended to open the path to rational inquiry, the name given to Moses is a “unitive name,” a name whose meaning is reached only in the unitio of the soul* with God.

If ontology is a modern word, this is because modernity unquestionably strove to think of God only within the context of being, as the first thinkable entity, and it did so by subverting the Augustinian point of view. For example, Suarez* replaced a God of whom it must be admitted that he is because he says that that is his name, with a God about whom, before asking what he is, metaphysics sets out beforehand all the logic of what being means. The primus ens, seu Deus, does not appear until the 30th of the Disputationes metaphysicae, and neither his infinity, nor his status as first cause call into question the meaning of being. There was thus established in the 17th century (see Wundt 1939), and fully developed in the 18th by C. Wolff (1679–1754) and his students, a general science of the ens in latitudine sumptum which made of theologikè epistèmè a special science, “dealing with a particular region of the existent as a whole, while the primacy of that singular existent . . . neither enclosed nor any longer contained within itself any possibility of a correlative universalization of its field” (Courtine 1990).

The reaction against the God of Suarez and Wolff came first from Hegel*, for whom God is not an existent but the existent itself—Gott ist das Seyende selbst. This thesis, the preeminent speculative thesis, makes it possible to make the unveiling of the meaning of being dependent on the unveiling of divine life. Reaction also came from Schelling*, who says that God is not an existent but the “Lord of being,” the “superexistent” (das Überseiende), defined first by his liberty* (Ex 3:14 translated as “I will be whom I will”). He is not the God of an ontology but of a “meta-ontology” (Courtine in Libera and Zum Brunn 1986; see also Hemmerle 1968). Lastly, Kierkegaard*’s reaction: separated from all created beings by an “infinite qualitative difference,” revealed to man in the form of an “absolute paradox” (the morphè doulou of Jesus Christ), God ceases to be an object of thought and the confession of his mercy makes any discourse on his being unnecessary. Of these currents, Kierkegaard was the first to be accepted by contemporary theology, in which he presided over “dialectical” thought, the thought “of the crisis,” organized by Barth* and his followers. Probably derived from R. Otto (Das Heilige, 1917; but already in the valde, valde aliud of Augustine, Confessions VII. x), the idea of a God “wholly other” (das ganz Andere; see Römerbrief, 1921) recapitulates an old hyperbolic affirmation of divine transcendence, that of God as “nothingness*.” Barth later modified it (as early as the studies of Anselm* published in 1931) with more positive statements. A constant remained, however, which was the concern to prohibit theology from containing a discourse on God made up of philosophical or ontological elements; and Exodus 3:14 was therefore subjected to a disontological exegesis that read it as a revelation of God’s faithfulness.

But the strongest critiques of ontological language were to come from within philosophy. Devoted to raising a question—the question of the “meaning of being”—that the metaphysical tradition was said to have forgotten, Heidegger’s enterprise led him to postulate: 1) that metaphysics had neglected being to interest itself in the idea of supreme existent (and had granted to God this status of supreme existent); and 2) that the God who had come into philosophy, as guarantor of the “onto-theological constitution of metaphysics,” was ipso facto a God sentenced to death. Even though he says why the “God of the philosophers” is dead, Heidegger nevertheless does not suggest another way of speaking of God, and limits himself to asserting the absolute heterogeneity of language about being versus language about God: “Being and God are not identical, and I would never attempt to think of the essence of God by means of being. . . . If I were still obliged to set out a theology in writing—which I am sometimes inclined to do—then the term being could not possibly ever enter into it. Faith has no need of the thought of being. When faith relies on it, it is no longer faith” (Poésie 13, 60–61). Theological consequences inevitably followed. A theological interest in God, for example, led to the assertion (Marion in Bourg, et al. 1986) that making being the first name of God condemned God, “in every form of metaphysics, to submit himself to the new demands imposed on him by philosophy.” And if it is thus necessary to think of God “without being,” or (Levinas 1982) of a God “not contaminated by being,” the critique of onto-theological idols can then assume its positive face in a theory of divine names for which the Good (charity, agape) possesses absolute primacy (Marion 1982). Exodus 3:14 must then be given an apophatic reading, and the naming of God finds its canon in 1 John 4:7 and parallel passages, the duty to think of God as actus parus amandi or caritas ipsa subsistens.

Other tendencies exist. The Neoplatonic conception of a Principle of existents which itself does not have to be is not dead, whether it leaves open the possibility of an affirmation of God (e.g., I. Leclerc, RelSt 20, 63–78; see S. Breton, Du principe, Paris, 1971) or combines the influence of Plotinus with that of Meinong to think of an Absolute that perhaps does not exist (Findley 1982). It is just in regard to divine being that, defended by the thesis “Being that is only spirit is being that is only being” (Bruaire 1983), the recent posterity of Hegel inquires about the meaning of being. Having learned from Heidegger that God is not an existent, but wishing to maintain a theological usage of the lexicon of being, we may also speak of God as “sanctity of being,” holy Being (J. Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, London, 1977). For Tillich, God appears as Being-itself (Systematic Theology 1, 264–65), and this is so in order to provide theology with its only nonsymbolic assertion. It is finally a characteristic of recent scholarship that Protestant theology has begun to exorcise its fear of being and to acknowledge the ontological implications of Christian discourse (Dalferth 1984).

The 20th century has also witnessed a notable renewal of the Thomist metaphysics of esse. Indeed, it was Gilson who coined the expression “metaphysics of Exodus” to designate the ontological interpretation of Exodus 3:14. In response to Heidegger’s hypothesis of a metaphysical “forgetting” of being, German interpreters of Thomas (Siewerth 1959; Lotz 1975; et al.) have asserted that the God of Aquinas is not the sovereign existent of onto-theology (a point conceded also finally by J.-L. Marion, RThom 95, 31–66), and that the onto-theological constitution of metaphysics perhaps also grew out of a forgetting of esse. At the same time, interpretation attempted to grasp once again the Thomist doctrine of analogy*, which had long been obscured by the distortions of Cajetan (Montagnes 1963). Despite the repercussions of Barth’s protestations (KD I/1, VIII, 40, 138, 178–80), in which he attacks analogia entis as the pure and simple invention of the Antichrist, asserting rather that Creator and created being can enter into a relationship of analogy only in the eyes of faith (analogia fidei), the Przywara’s meditation on analogy has certainly provided conceptual tools for thinking about the transcendence of God (see the canon of Lateran* IV that Przywara has set at the center of his investigation: “Between Creator and created being, we may not make note of a likeness without at the same time noting an even greater unlikeness” [DS 806]).

Let us lastly mention that the recent Jewish translations and readings of Exodus 3:14 (H. Cohen, the revelation of “the being who is an I”; F. Rosenzweig, revelation of the name as promise* to be there with the people*; M. Buber, a God who promises his presence and whom it is not necessary to evoke as one evokes the gods of Egypt) have had some effect on Christian writers who no longer read the Old Testament in the Septuagint and one of whose principal concerns is to substitute historical for metaphysical categories. Although the nomen substantiae has recently been vigorously debated—and the debate remains open—it is certainly the nomen misericordiae that has received the most attention.

- M. Wundt (1939), Die deutsche Schulmetaphysik des 17. Jahrhunderts, Tübingen.
- M. Heidegger (1957), “Die onto-theo-logische Verfassung der Metaphysik,” in Identität und Differenz, Pfullingen, 31–67.
- G. Siewerth (1959), Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger, Einsiedeln.
- B. Montagnes (1963), La doctrine de l’analogie de l’être d’après saint Thomas d’Aquin, Louvain-Paris.
- K. Hemmerle (1968), Gott und das Denken nach Schellings Spätphilosophie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- É. zum Brunn (1969), “La ph. chrétienne et l’exégèse d’Ex 3, 14 selon É. Gilson,” RThPh 94–105.
- J. Whittaker (1971), God Time Being, Oslo.
- W. Beierwaltes (1972), “Deus est esse—Esse est Deus: Die onto-theologische Grundfrage als aristotelisch-neuplatonische Denkstruktur,” in Platonismus und Idealismus, Frankfurt, 4–82.
- J. B. Lotz (1975), Martin Heidegger und Thomas von Aquin, Pfullingen.
- Coll. (1978), Dieu et l’être: Exégèses d’Exode 3, 14 et de Coran 20, 11–24, Paris.
- A. Chapelle (1979–80), “Dieu dans l’histoire,” course notes; School Saint-Jean-Berchmans, Namur.
- M. Couratier (Ed.) (1980), Étienne Gilson et nous, Paris, 80–92 (P. Aubenque), 103–16 (J.-F. Courtine), 117–22 (P. Hadot).
- J. N. Findlay (1982), “The Impersonality of God,” in F. Sontag, M. D. Bryant (Ed.), God: The Contemporary Discussion, New York, 181–96.
- E. Levinas (1982), De Dieu qui vient à l’idée, Paris.
- J.-L. Marion (1982), Dieu sans l’être, Paris.
- C. Bruaire (1983), L’être et l’esprit, Paris.
- É. Gilson (1983), “L’être et Dieu” (169–230) and “Yahweh et les grammairiens” (231–53), Constantes phil. de l’être, Paris.
- I. U. Dalferth (1984), Existenz Gottes und christlicher Glaube: Skizzen zu einer eschatologischen Ontologie, BEvTh 93.
- A. de Libera (1984), Introduction à la mystique rhénane, Paris.
- U. G. Leinsle (1985), Das Ding und die Methode: Methodische Konstitution und Gegenstand der frühen protestantischen Metaphysik, Augsburg.
- A. de Libera, É. zum Brunn (Ed.) (1986), Celui qui est: Interprétations juives et chrétiennes d’Exode 3, 14, Paris.
- D. Bourg, et al. (1986), L’être et Dieu, CFI 138.
- J.-F. Courtine (1990), Suarez et le système de la mét., Paris.
- L. Honnfelder (1990), Scientia transcendens: Die formale Bestimmung der Seiendheit und Realität in der Metaphysik des Mittelalters und der Neuzeit (Duns Scotus–Suarez–Wolff–Peirce), Hamburg.
- S. T. Bonino, et al. (1995), RThom 95, 5–192 (articles on Thomas Aquinas, Heidegger, and metaphysics).

c) Eucharistic Conversion. “This is my body, this is my blood”: The theology of the words of the Eucharist spoken over the bread and wine necessarily called upon concepts charged with naming the process during which what was bread and wine becomes the body and blood of Christ. After long being satisfied with saying that bread and wine “become” the body and blood of Christ (Irenaeus*, Adv. Haer. V. 2. 3), Greek patristics proposed a long list of verbs, all of which expressed the notion of change without presenting any real conceptual differences between them (Betz 1957): metaballein (Clement of Alexandria, Exc. ex Theod. 82 [GCS III, 132, 12]; Pseudo-Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. myst. 4, 2; 5, 7 [SC 126, 136, and 154]; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Fragment on Matthew 26:26 [PG 66: 713]; Theodoret, Eranistes dial. I [PG 83: 53, 57]; liturgy of Saint John Chrysostom*); metapoiein (Gregory of Nyssa, Or. cat. 37, 3 [Strawley, 143, 149]; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Fragment on I Corinthians 10:3 f. [Staab, 186]; Cyril* of Alexandria, Fragment on Matthew 26:26 [TU 61: 255]); John of Damascus, De fide orth. 4, 13, [PG 94, 114]; methistanai (Gregory of Nyssa, Or. cat. 37, 2 [Strawley, 147], Cyril of Alexandria, Fragment on Matthew 26:26 [TU 61: 255]); metarrhuthmizein (John Chrysostom, Hom. de prod. Judae 1, 6 [PG 49: 380]); metaskeuazein (John Chrysostom, In Matthias Hom. 82, 5 [PG 55:744]; John of Damascus, Vita Barlaam [PG 96: 1032]); metastokheiouin (Gregory of Nyssa, Or. cat. 37, 3 [Strawley, 152]); and metaplassein (Cyril of Alexandria, Fragment on Matthew 26:26 [TU 61: 255]). Ambrose*, the principal Latin exponent of a theology of eucharistic conversion, used a fairly rich vocabulary, in which mutare, convertere, and transfigurare named the event of the Eucharist (mutare: Sacr. 5. 4. 15, 16, 17; 6. 1. 3; Myst. 9. 50, 52; convertere: Sacr. 4. 5. 23; 6. 1. 3; transfigurare: De Fide IV. 10. 124; De incarn. 4. 23). To name the eucharistic conversion is not to theorize it, and the terms employed bear little conceptual weight. And when they wanted to integrate the Eucharist into a larger theological framework, the Fathers frequently set up an analogy between the Eucharist and the Incarnation* (already in Justin, Apol. I. 66. 2 and in Irenaeus), the birth of what would become the doctrine of impanation (Betz: “sacramental incarnation”).

As they were seeking to name the event of the Eucharist, the Fathers were simultaneously seeking to name the relationship that the bread and wine of the Eucharist maintained with the glorified Christ sitting at the right hand of the Father. In the Eucologue of Serapion, the bread and wine are the homoïôma of the body and blood of Christ (Funk II, 174, 10–24); in the Dialogus de recta in Deum fide (c. 300), Adamantius speaks of eikones; in Theodore of Mopsuestia, the categories are those of “image” and “symbol” (Hom. cat. 16. 30; Tonneau-Devreesse 581–83); while in Pseudo-Dionysius, the mystical participation in Christ in the Eucharist takes place in the order of meaning (sè-mainetai kai metekhetai, PG 3: 447C). Tupos and antitupos were frequently used. From Tertullian* on, the Latin Fathers frequently relied on the vocabulary of figura to deal with the question: Gaudencius of Brescia saw in the Eucharist an “image,” imago, of the Passion* of Christ; and in Augustine, signum and similitudo are the most frequent terms. But this lexicon is intelligible only if it is interpreted within the framework of an epistemè in which the symbol really participates in what is symbolized and the image participates in the reality of what it represents. The language of conversion (“metabolic” language) and “symbolic” language do not at all challenge one another.

However, once Ratramne (†868) decided to contrast in figura and in veritate, the balance between symbolism and metabolism was destroyed; and in the two debates on the Eucharist in the Latin Middle Ages, from the refutation of Ratramne to that of Bérenger (†1088) and beyond, a new lexicon was to appear and become predominant, that of substance. The concepts later used by Scholasticism were already present in Lanfranc, probably the first theologian to investigate the Eucharist using a primarily ontological approach: substance, essence, conversion (PL 150: 430B). Guitmond of Aversa spoke of “substantial transmutation,” substantialiter transmutari (PL 149: 1467B, 1481B). In 1140–42, the author of the Sentences of Roland coined the neologism transubstantiation, which was accepted by the Church in 1215 at the Fourth Lateran Council (COD 230, 35–37).

It was during the unionist debates of the 13th century that metousiôsis got the technical meaning of a Greek equivalent for transsubstantiatio. It was not until the confession of faith of Dositheus of Jerusalem (1672) that it became commonly used in an Orthodox theology that was then broadly Latinized (modern and contemporary Orthodoxy*). But it played only a marginal role (reactions provoked by the confession of faith of Cyril Lukaris) in discussions of the Eucharist arising out of the Reformation.

It was before the appearance of Aristotle’s Physics and Metaphysics on the Western intellectual stage that Latin theology gave prominent status to the concepts of “substantial conversion” and “transubstantiation.” And although it is true that Aristotle’s philosophy of nature provided a pair of terms (substance/accident) to express the mystery of the bread and wine that remain phenomenally bread and wine while their deepest “being” has become the body and blood of the risen Christ, the concept of transubstantiation clearly appeared as something unthinkable within Aristotelianism. Proof that the concept of transubstantiation was not a contradiction in terms, that the thing was metaphysically possible, thus required that Thomas Aquinas redefine accidents so that they might exist without a subject, only to be accused by the Averroist philosophers of using a monstrous notion (see R. Imbach, RSPHTh 77, 1993, 175–94). From its appearance to its development by Thomas, a term that probably at the outset said nothing more than the compounds with meta- of Greek patristics was thus encumbered with a large burden of description and explanation. Thomas Aquinas’s theorization was not universally accepted, and the status of “eucharistic accidents” (see F. Jansen, DThC 5/2, 1368–1452, still indispensable) was a preoccupation of (Western and Catholic) theology until the 20th century, during the course of many debates in which there regularly reappeared (as with Wycliffe and Hus*, among others) an empiricist conception of the “nature” or “substance” of things that necessarily led to a eucharistic theology of consubstantiation (impantation, the substance of the bread and wine remain, after the consecration, united to the body and blood of Christ). Nor was acceptance of an ontology of nature at two levels, substantial and accidental, sufficient to impose the idea of substantial conversion. Hence, Duns Scotus held to a description that postulated an adduction of the body and blood of Christ that does not produce a new substance but a new presence.

In the meantime a term already used by Ambrose (Myst. 3. 8, CSEL 73: 91 ff.) and Gaudentius of Brescia (Tractatus 2. 30, CSEL 68: 31), praesentia, was taken up by the theologians of Saint-Victor (see Hugh of Saint-Victor, De sacramentis 11. 8. 13, PL 176:470–71, on the distinction between “corporal presence” and “spiritual presence”). Bonaventure (In Sent. IV, d. 12, a. 1, q. 1), and William of Auvergne (De Sacramento Eucharistiae, Venice, 1591), frequently used the notion of praesentia corporalis with reference to the Eucharist. Thomas Aquinas, on the other hand, showed some reluctance, because the idea of presence seemed to him linked to that of localization. For this reason the praesentia in terris of the Eucharist was not a dominant element in the Office of Corpus Christi promulgated in 1264 by the bull Transiturus, and was Thomas’s work (Gy 1990). Praesentia appeared in one of the errors of Wycliffe, the condemnation of which was ratified by the Council of Constance* in 1415 (DS 1153).

From the 13th to the 15th century the identity of words could not conceal the shift in meanings, and the metaphysical concept of substance tended more and more to become a physical concept—a concept for which nominalist thinkers had no need. A fear of annexing the gift of the Eucharist to the sphere of worldly realities, the refusal to use superfluous entities, and the rejection of any takeover by philosophy of theology, all help to explain Luther’s rejection of tran-substantiation (after a first stage in which he saw it as a mere academic hypothesis, WA6: 456, 508; WA B10: 331). The Formula of Concord provided the official explanation of this rejection (BSLK 801: 5–11). Confession of belief in presence, on the other hand, remained complete (vere et substantialiter; CA 10, Apol CA 10), and Luther supplied a theory for it that had two aspects. On the one hand, he postulated that the risen Jesus can be present in the bread and wine insofar as he takes part in the ubiquity of the Word by virtue of the communication of idioms (“ubiquism”). On the other hand, recourse to the patristic model of the “eucharistic theology of incarnation” and to the Stoic model of the complete interpenetration of bodies, velut ferrum ignitum (WA6: 510), allowed him to affirm the combined gift in the sacrament* of the substance of the bread and the substance of the body and blood of Christ (BSLK 983: 37–44). Hence, there is both impantation and consubstantiation, although it appears that Luther never used the second term (the concept does not necessarily imply a formal negation of Catholic transubstantiation, since “substance” is not understood univocally in the two cases; see J. Ratzinger, ThQ 147 [1967], 129–58, especially p. 153).

Calvin*’s understanding is not as clear. On the one hand, he frequently used the notions of figura, signum (distinguished from its res), imago, and symbolum. But on the other hand, he saw the sign as “linked to the mysteries,” mysteriis . . . quodammodo annexa (Inst. IV. 17. 30), and rejected all strictly symbolic interpretation (see his Petit Traicté de la Sainte Cene de Nostre Seigneur Jesus Christ of 1541). The idea of corporal, somatic presence is rejected. But against Lutheran ubiquism is set a pneumatological hypothesis that makes it possible not to conclude from this rejection that the risen Christ is absent: “Given that the body of Jesus Christ is in heaven, and we are on this earthly pilgrimage,” how can the body of Christ possibly be given in Communion? “It is through the incomprehensible virtue of his Spirit, which joins well together things separated by distance” (Geneva Catechism of 1542, §354). It would thence be possible to confess that, “by the secret and incomprehensible virtue of his Spirit, [Christ] nourishes us and gives us life with the substance of his body and his blood” (Confession de foy of 1559, §36).

Zwingli*, on the other hand, held to a strict symbolism: “believing is eating” (SW 3: 441), and the bread and wine perform a labor of meaning just as an inn’s sign announces the wine on sale (see G.H. Potter, Zwingli, Cambridge, 1976). Anglicanism rejects the notion of transubstantiation. It confesses that “the body of Christ is given, received, and eaten at Communion, but in a celestial and spiritual manner,” and its lex orandi prohibits the worship of the consecrated bread and wine (Article XXVIII; see the “Black Rubric” that concludes the “Order for the Administration of the Lord’s Supper” in the Book of Common Prayer: “The bread and wine of the sacrament remain still in their very natural substances and thus may not be worshipped”).

Reaffirmed at the Council of Trent* (which also used the language of presence, DS 1636) and considered at the time “very apt” for naming the eucharistic conversion (DS 1652; see also 1642), the concept of transubstantiation was not called into question within Catholicism* before the 20th century. Protestant doctrines experienced no significant developments during the same period, which saw above all a considerable marginalization of the practice of the Eucharist in the churches born of the Reformation (except for the Anglican Church). On the other hand, the post-Tridentine period saw sustained philosophical interest in the problem of the eucharistic conversion, in two ways: 1) With new ontologies of the thing, there were new ways of saying that the nature of things (physics) did not make the Eucharist absurd. Thus, Descartes, Malebranche, and Leibniz attempted to prove that the expression of faith in the Eucharist was not compromised by philosophies of nature in which the substance of bodies was reduced to extension (Descartes), in which only metaphysical atoms possessed reality in the last instance (Leibniz), and so on (see Armogathe 1977; Tilliette 1983). 2) At the very time that philosophy was supposedly separate from theology, the questions raised by the eucharistic conversion also provoked thought among philosophers. From Leibniz to Blondel*, taking in F. von Baader and Rosmini (three of whose theses were challenged after his death by the Roman magisterium* in 1887, DS 3229–31) along the way, the eucharistic misadventures of substance have shown that they were not limited to defying logic and metaphysics but that they had a genuine capacity to enrich thought.

Hegel (Encyclopedia §552) is important here for having incidentally inserted a critique of the Catholic theory of the Eucharist in the framework of a general critique of Catholicism, which he accuses of revealing its lack of inwardness when, in the host, it offers God up for worship with the external aspect of the thing (als äußerliches Ding). This foreshadowed the way in which classic conceptualizations would be called into question by recent speculation, in the last debate devoted to the Eucharistic conversion. In a time when there were hardly any theologians who asserted that the eucharistic conversion was a physical process (but see F. Selvaggi, Greg. 30 [1949], 7–45 and 37 [1956], 16–33), after the ground-breaking work of J. de Ba-ciocchi (1955, 1959) and in the sphere of influence of Dutch theologians (P. Schoonenberg [e.g., Verbum 26 (1959), 148–57, 314–27; 31 (1964), 395–415]; E. Schillebeeckx 1967), as well as of the member of the Swiss Reformed Church Leenhardt (1955), it was against any philosophy of nature and not simply Aristotelian-Thomist hylemorphism, that objections were commonly raised in the 1960s. Philosophy of nature was held to be incapable of giving a true account of the eucharistic conversion. An ontology of the thing was said to be inadequate, or to have become inadequate (Gerken 1973, bibl.; see W. Beinert, ThPh, 1971, 342–63). And in the programmatic framework of an existential ontology, a relational ontology, or an ontology of the sign, new names were proposed—“transignification,” “transfinalization”—to express the newness that comes about when the bread and wine are consecrated (to complete the concept of transubstantiation, J. Monchanin had already coined the words “transituation” and “transtemporalization”).

We can summarize what has been accomplished by this discussion, now finished. 1) Having made its appearance before the establishment of Scholastic Aristotelianism, the concept of transubstantiation is not necessarily destined to disappear simply because Scholastic Aristotelianism is dead. Thus it has been said that the concept contained nothing more than a “logical” explanation of the words of the sacrament taken literally (Rahner 1960); and Anscombe, a disciple of Wittgenstein, proposed her own defense of the concept (1981; see Cassidy 1994). 2) The fate of the concept of being is not tied to that of substance (Welte 1965; on contemporary questions linked to substance, see Loux 1978 and HMO 871–73), which was the reason Schillebeeckx proposed replacing transubstantiation with the neologism transentatio. Each particular ontology, on the other hand, is not equally capable of expressing the eucharistic conversion. There are realities whose being is identical to the meaning they have for human beings (money, according to Anscombe, the flag, according to Welte), but it is not certain that an ontology of the sign or an ontology of finalization, whatever their good intentions, can fully express the eucharistic conversion (see, e.g., the critiques of C.J. de Vogel ZKTh 97, 1975, 389–414; reply by Gerken, ibid., 415–29; summing up by J. Wohlmuth, ibid., 430–40). Bread and wine designate more than physical-chemical objects, but they do not designate less (see E. Pousset, RSR 54 [1966], 177–212). 3) Not very determinate when it began to be commonly used in eucharistic theology, the concept of “presence” in recent philosophy and theology has acquired determinations that have enriched its use and have preserved the idea of real presence from any danger of connoting a reification. In its enriched contemporary sense, presence is a mode of being of the person* in relation. (But it should perhaps be recalled that Durand de Saint-Pourçain was already speaking of the “relational presence” of Christ in the Eucharist, and that in the 19th century G. Peronne and A. Knoll gave privileged status to relation in their interpretation of the Eucharist.) Within the sphere of influence of the Mysterienlehre, on the other hand, the eucharistic conversion probably requires integration into a broader economy of the presence of Christ: current presence of salvation* in the liturgical celebration and real presence of the body and blood of Christ cannot be dissociated from one another (see Betz, MySal 4/2, 263–311; broad agreement in Pannenberg 1993; see also Lies 1997). Lastly, the clearer understanding of the link between memory and anamnesis (e.g., A. Darlap ZKTh 97 [1975], 80–86) makes it possible to organize a fully theological concept of presence and its specific temporality (e.g., R. Lachenschmidt, ThPh 44 [1966], 211–25; J.-Y. Lacoste, Note sur le temps, Paris, 1990), and thus to present arguments that leave no openings for Heideggerian critiques of “metaphysics” (Marion 1982).

- J. de Baciocchi (1955), “Le mystère euchar. dans les perspectives de la Bible,” NRTh 77, 561–80.
- F.J. Leenhardt (1955), Ceci est mon corps, Neuchâtel-Paris.
- J. Betz (1957), Die Eucharistie in der Zeit der griechischen Väter I/1: Die Aktualpräsenz der Person und des Heilswerkes Jesu im Abendmahl nach der vorephesinischen griechischen Patristik, Freiburg.
- J. de Baciocchi (1959), “Présence euchar. et transsubstantiation,” Irén. 33, 139–64.
- G. Ghysen (1959), “Présence réelle et transsubstantiation dans les définitions de l’Église catholique,” Irén. 33, 420–35.
- K. Rahner (1960), “Die Gegenwart Christi im Sakrament des Herrenmahls,” Schr. zur Th. 4, 357–86.
- M. Schmaus (Ed.) (1960), Aktuelle Fragen zur Eucharistie, Munich.
- B. Neunhauser (1963), Eucharistie in Mittelalter und Neuzeit, HDG IV/4 b.
- J. Betz (1964), Die Eucharistie in der Zeit der griechischen Väter III/1: Die Realpräsenz des Leibes und Blutes Jesu im Abendmahl nach dem Neuen Testament, 2nd Ed., Freiburg.
- B. Welte (1965), “Zum Verständnis der Eucharistie,” in Auf der Spur des Ewigen, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 459–67.
- E. Schillebeeckx (1967), Die eucharistische Gegenwart, Düsseldorf.
- A. Gerken (1973), Theologie der Eucharistie, Munich.
- J.-R. Armogathe (1977), “Theologia Cartesiana,” L’explication physique de l’euch. chez Descartes et dom Desgabets, The Hague.
- M. J. Loux (1978), Substance and Attributes, Dordrecht.
- G. E. M. Anscombe (1981), “On Transubstantiation,” in Collected Philosophical Papers 3, Oxford, 107–12.
- J.-L. Marion (1982), “Le présent et le don,” in Dieu sans l’être, Paris, 225–58.
- X. Tilliette (1983), “Eucharistie et philosophie,” course notes, Institut catholique de Paris.
- P.-M. Gy (1990), La liturgie dans l’histoire, Paris, studies 11 and 12, 223–83.

- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie 3, Göttingen, 325–56.
- N. Slencza (1993), Realpräsenz und Ontologie: Untersuchung der ontologischen Grundlagen der Transsignifikationslehre, Göttingen.
- D. C. Cassidy (1994), “Is Transubstantiation without Substance?” RelSt 30, 193–99.
- L. Lies (1997), “Realpräsenz bei Luther und die Lutheraner heute,” ZKTh 119, 1–26, 181–219.

d) Being, Relation, and Communion. The reasons for theological interest in the being of relation are obvious. In fact, theology’s first task was, and remains, to elucidate a relation, that between Jesus of Nazareth and the God of Israel*. The one who is called “Lord,” and who thereby participates in the sphere of existence of YHWH, is also “Son” and “Servant.” And when Nicaea* I defined the consubstantiality of God the Father and the Son, Christianity thereby recognized an intradivine reality in relation. Against Arianism* it was said that the engendering of the Son was not an opening of the divine onto the nondivine, but an eternal event coming to pass in God alone. And against any form of modalism* it was thus said that Father, Son, and Holy* Spirit were not only names designating ways in which God had made himself knowable, but that the divine monad contained in fact an eternal triplicity. The development of Trinitarian and later of christological dogma thus occurred through the articulation of paradoxes. To affirm the irreducibility in God of the being-Father, the being-Son, and the being-Spirit, the Cappadocian Fathers coined a formulation that was to be accepted by the entire church: the unity of essence (ousia) in God contains a triplicity of hypostases (hupostaseis) or persons (prosôpa). And when it was necessary to affirm the radical unity of the human and the divine in Jesus, another formulation was created, it was not as widely accepted: in the single hypostasis/Person of the Son, divine nature (phusis) and human nature are united. Some conclusions followed from this: 1) If, on the one hand, nothing exists in God in the mode of accident, and if, on the other, the being-God (the divine substance) is common to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and finally, if nothing else is specific to each one but the mode in which he possesses divinity, then relation (ad aliquid) is indeed internal to God (Augustine, De Trin. IV. V. 5–6; IX. xii. 17). This led Thomas Aquinas to formulate the unprecedented concept of subsistent relations (ST Ia, q. 30, a. 2; q. 41, a. 6; CG IV. c. 24. 3606, 3612). The detailed construction of the paradox according to which relation is in God a res subsistens was the major contribution of the Latin Middle Ages to Trinitarian theology (see Krempel 1952, DThC 15, 1810 ff.; Henninger 1989). 2) And if the christological mystery is not that a divine hypostasis is united in Jesus to a human hypostasis, but that a human nature is united to divine nature in the single hypostasis of the Son, or Word, then the humanity of Christ is paradoxically an an-hypostatic, a-personal humanity, a lexicon worked out in detail by “neo-Chalcedonian” theology in the sixth century.

Decisions made by theologians and councils did not bear on the being of relation in general, but on the being of certain relations. The Latin Middle Ages, which carried out a Trinitarian glorification of the esse ad, also used a general ontology in which the esse ad was qualified only as an esse minimum (see Breton 1951). And it was in fact a definition of the person, the letter of which did not take into account the most remarkable thing that theology had to say concerning what “person” means in regard to God—namely, Boethius’s definition (the person is an “individual substance with a rational nature”)—which carried the most weight in what the Christian West thought concerning the person (but see Dussel 1967 on the theological context that shows the full meaning of the definition, and C.J. de Vogel, ZKTh 97 [1975], 400–414, on the real implications of a metaphysics of rational substance). What was developed under the pressure of the internal necessities of Trinitarian theology and Christology was nevertheless destined to find a broader application. Stoicism* saw in man a being of communion, zōon koinōnikon (Chrysippus), but when patristics meditated on the bond of communion* that should prevail in the Church, it formulated the explanation in reference to Trinitarian unity (Cyprian*, CSEL 3: 285; see the eighth preface for Sundays per annum of the Roman Missal of 1969). Divine transcendence is unceasingly affirmed in Christian discourse (going as far as the extreme forms taken by the proclamation of a God who is “entirely other”), but Christian discourse also proclaims the absolute future of the human person in terms of a participation in the divine nature (divinization, theōsis; see 2 Pt 1:4). The Protestant tradition is alone in raising objections to this, suspecting a desire to be God in the place of God, a refusal that God be God, something that Luther sees as the secret of sinful man (see the Disputatio contra scholasticam theologiam of 1517, WA 1: 225, §17, and Jüngel 1980). Between God/Christ and human beings, moreover, a relation of imitation, mimēsis, is presented as necessary and possible as early as the writings of Paul. However modest a place is held in the Scripture by the theologumen of the creation in the image and likeness of God (see DBS 10: 365–403; TRE 6: 491–98), it is nonetheless omnipresent in patristic and later literature.

That the human modalities of being maintain a relationship of image to model with the divine and christological modalities of being, and that being-in-relation is in this connection a decisive factor, have only been clearly set out in recent theory. Certainly, from Augustine onward theological descriptions have had ternary rhythms (e.g., in Augustine, the triad of memory, intelligence, and will) that set them in a relation to the Trinitarian rhythm of divine life. The theologians of the 12th century made frequent use of this convention, and the interpretation of the creation by reference to vestiges of the Trinity* was impressively developed by Bonaventure and gave off its final glimmers in Nicholas* of Cusa (“every created thing . . . is a bearer of an image of the Trinity,” De pace fidei VIII). Equally, since the patristic era the central place of a logic of love in Christianity conferred a key position on the interpretation of the relation to others (e.g., Gregory* the Great, PL 76: 1139), to the point that Richard of Saint-Victor attempted a construction of the Trinity following the human model of loving interpersonality. But if the human person exists as an image of God, the great majority of patristic writings, as well as the medieval theologians, saw the best evidence for this elsewhere: in the being of spirit that is specific to human beings in the midst of creation or in an incomprehensibility that human beings share with God. Neither Trinitarian relations nor the mystery of the humanity of Christ was dealt with by the different theories and practices of analogy developed from the 13th century onward. For example, Suarez had a theology of divine relations but conceived of “real created relations” (Disp. Met. 27) in a way that owed nothing to theology. Neoscholasticism hardened the terms, but it was certainly faithful to a general orientation. “No doubt . . . the cause imprints its likeness on what it produces, but if this effect is inadequate, the likeness as well is deficient; thus the created being and God do not fit univocally in any perfection; and those perfections that are analogically common to them are entirely general properties of being, among which—barring the assertion of a more or less generic resemblance between the first cause and its effect—it is not possible to include the vital exchanges that faith sees within the divine” (M.T.-L. Penido, Le rôle de l’analogie en théologie dogmatique, Paris, 1931). Between human person and divine Person “a minimum of (proportional) unity of meaning” is of course guaranteed. On either side the being-person is substantiality and incommunicability (ibid.). But one thesis admits of no restriction: “There is no analogy between the created personality and the ‘subsistent relation’ that theology discovers in God” (ibid.).

In order for this thesis to cease being self-evident, two conditions had to be fulfilled: a philosophical acceptance of Trinitarian and christological reasoning, and the appearance of an ontological vulgate in which the esse ad was no longer the most tenuous of entities but the fulfillment of being. 1) Hegel was certainly the first thinker to methodically allow Christology and the logic of divine life to carry out a labor of reorganization on the logos of ontology. The Phenomenology of Mind is placed under the protection of an Absolute that is conceived both in Trinitarian terms (“interplay of love with itself”) and christological terms (an interplay that experiences “seriousness, patience, pain, and the work of the negative”). The system assembled in the Encyclopedia includes a Christology (see Brito 1983), and finally an anonymous Christology and triadology preside over the unfolding of the Science of Logic. The theological ambitions of the system were obscured by the Hegelian Left’s production of a partial Hegelianism* that retained the dialectic while dismissing Absolute Spirit. Another philosophy that chose to know the absolute only by thinking of the “positive” content of its revelation, the later philosophy of Schelling, had no real influence on the theology of its time. By refusing to dissociate discourse on the One God from discourse on the Triune God, both philosophies, in any event, sounded the knell for any separation between theology and ontology. 2) The philosophical glorification of relation (which, in the end, meant barely more than interpersonal relation) took several forms. In the popular form that it assumed in philosophies of dialogue (M. Buber, F. Ebner; see Theunissen 1965; Böckenhoff 1970) it consisted in denying the possibility of giving an account of the human ego in terms of a substantial identity with itself (“adseity”) and to situate the concrete advent of the I in the encounter with the Thou. In the cautious form it assumed in Heidegger, the determination of being-in-the-world as “being-with,” Mitsein (Sein und Zeit, §25–27), is an existential determination, an a priori element of existence. In G. Marcel it was in the guise of the priority of the we and of communion that Mitsein assumed a preeminent place in Francophone philosophy. And there is a long list—the project of a “metaphysics of charity” in Laberthonnière, the Ordo amoris of Scheler (GW 10: 345–76), G. Madinier (Conscience et amour, Paris, 1938), D. von Hildebrand, among others—of contemporary thinkers who could have taken as their own the words of C. Secrétan describing a reign of love that would produce “the most perfect conceivable unity, the living unity of converging, intertwined wills which, reciprocally penetrating one another, mutually affirm one another and come together in a single will” (Le principe de la morale, Paris, 1884).

Taken on by theology, such themes could not fail to receive an exuberant welcome. 1) An ontology in which the meaning of esse remains unperceived as long as the esse ad is not thematized necessarily had an influence on ecclesiology*. As early as the Catholicisme of Lubac* (1938), reliance was placed on an existential ontology to think of the “social aspects of the dogma.” On the one hand, the Church appeared to be the location of fully “personal” existence; on the other, “the supreme flourishing of the personality... in the Being of which every being is a reflection” (op. cit., 256) was called on to illuminate the “personal” meaning of belonging to the Church. The newness out of which Christian experience claims to live could then be thought of as the gift of an ecclesial mode of existence (or “ecclesial hypostasis”) that a phenomenology of the eucharistic celebration had the task of describing (Zizioulas 1985). The pairing “visible” and “invisible,” or “empirical Church” and “essential Church” (Bonhoeffer*), thereby ceased to govern interpretation. The essential in fact (the definitive, the eschatological) is really given within the empirical Church in the liturgical acts where its total identity is manifested, but the essential (a fully ecclesial and a fully personal existence) has a presence in the mode of anticipation, in the mode of a meaning that takes possession of the present on the basis of an absolute future (Zizioulas). Being thus ceases to manifest its meaning only in the order of the factual; the being of fact is determined by the being of vocation (Lacoste 1994). 2) A redistribution of reasons then occurred, in which the concept of person has presided over a back-and-forth between anthropology and Trinitarian theology. On the one hand, a concept of person refined by intersubjective experience has served to project onto the mystery of God an insight acquired by the work of philosophical anthropology (e.g., Brunner 1976), and this has restored currency to the question of anthropomorphism* (see Jüngel 1990). On the other hand, notions developed to express divine life have been called on to serve (half descriptively, half prescriptively) to express the being of man. In hyperbolic formulations, J. Monchanin (1895–1957; fragmentary work scattered in De l’esthétique à la mystique, Paris, 1957; Mystique de l’Inde, Mystère chrétien, Paris, 1974; Théologie et spiritualité missionnaire, Paris 1985), for example, writes that “we have to live in circumcession with our brothers” (TSM, 37). Indeed: “There is... a profound analogy between human person and divine Person, subsistent relations... Both are esse alterius... Is this analogy not required by the creation of man ad imaginem Dei? What is deepest in him, the personality, cannot be essentially other in him than in God” (TSM, 55). 3) This intellectual climate thus made possible the program of a “Trinitarian ontology.” To the observation that “never in the history of Christianity did Christian specificity (das unterscheidend Christ- liche) determine newly in a durable way the precomprehension of the meaning of being and the point of departure of ontology” (Hemmerle 1976), the reply was given that “if love is what remains, then the emphasis shifts from the same to the other, then it is movement... then it is relation that occupy the center” (ibid., 38). It has also been asserted that “communion constitutes life. Existence is an event of communion. The ‘cause’ of existence and the ‘source’ of life are not being in itself... it is the divine Trinitarian communion that personalizes being as an event of life” (C. Yannaras, La liberté de la morale, Geneva, 1982). The ecclesiology of communion is also fulfilled here: “If by nature the being of God is relational... should we not then conclude, almost inevitably, that given the final character of the being of God for every ontology, substance, insofar as it indicates the final character of being, can be conceived only as communion?” (Zizioulas 1985; see Lossky already in 1967).

The imago Trinitatis is consequently not only the secret of the human person, but purely and simply the secret of being, an argument defended in investigations begun by T. Haecker, followed by C. Kaliba (1952) (a student of Heidegger influenced by Siewerth), and including H.E. Hengstenberg (1940) (to whom we owe the formulation “Trinitarian metaphysics”). With Balthasar (1983) the theme is integrated into the general history of Christian concepts (summary in Oeing-Hanhoff 1984). H. Beck has provided the leitmotif for these investigations: “If every finite existent is a divine creation, and if this creation necessarily bears a resemblance to and a participation in its creator, then every existent is an image of the Trinity: analogia entis ultimam est analogia trinitatis” (SJP 25, 1980). It was also in the divine life—the Trinitarian life of absolute spirit—that C. Bruaire (1983), on the basis of a new reading of Hegel, saw the unfolding of a logic of the gift that revealed all the secrets of being (“ontodology”). 4) While remaining at a distance from these discussions and programs, Protestant theology has not, however, been entirely absent from them. Long suspicious of the lexicon of being, it has recently learned again how to use it. In the work of Ebeling (1979), it is indeed in the framework of an ontology of relation, and in order to provide a theological contribution to ontology, that theological anthropology thinks of the being-before-God, the “coram relation.” In Jüngel, the eschatological existence that the new man lives in faith is a mode of being, in the strict sense, and man is ontologically determined by the relation that makes him “hearer of a word* that essentially constitutes him” (1980). With entirely different philosophical tools, Dalferth works toward the same juncture of the reasons of being and the reasons of the eschaton (1984). Much less dominated by the pathos of absolute otherness than were his early works, Barth’s Dogmatik already proposed more than one link between Trinitarian theology, Christology, and theological anthropology (see, e.g., Jüngel, Barth-Studien, ÖTh 9, 127–79, 210–45; see also Torrance 1996). And despite all its vagueness, the theory of the new Being proposed by Tillich (Systematic Theology 2: 78–96, 118–36, 165–80; 3: 138–60) in its way performed a similar service. A Catholicism that conceives of the relations between theology and philosophy more subtly, a Protestantism that is no longer afraid of philosophy, and an Orthodoxy* working toward the marriage of patristic thought with some modern themes—the three branches of Christianity now seem to be treating as a common task the development of a theological ontology.

- T. Haecker (1934), Schöpfer und Schöpfung, Leipzig.
- H.E. Hengstenberg (1940), Das Band zwischen Gott und Schöpfung, Regensburg.
- S. Breton (1951), L’esse in et l’esse ad dans la mét. de la rel., Rome.
- C. Kaliba (1952), Die Welt als Gleichnis des dreieinigen Gottes, Salzburg (2nd Ed., Frankfurt, 1991).
- P. Hünemann (1962), Trinitarische Anthropologie bei F.A. Staudenmaier, Freiburg.
- A. Krempel (1962), La doctrine de la rel. chez saint Thomas d’Aquin, Paris.
- M. Theunissen (1965), Der Andere: Studien zur Sozialontologie der Gegenwart, Berlin-New York (2nd Ed. 1977).
- E. Dussel (1967), “La doctrina de la persona en Boecio: Solución cristológica,” Sapientia 22, 101–26.
- V. Lossky (1967), “La notion théol. de personne humaine,” in A l’image et à la ressemblance de Dieu, Paris, 109–21.
- J. Böckenhoff (1970), Die Begegnungsphilosophie, Freiburg.
- G. Siewerth (1975), “Das Sein als Gleichnis Gottes,” in Sein und Wahrheit, Düsseldorf, 651–85.
- A. Brunner (1976), Dreifaltigkeit: Personale Zugänge zum Geheimnis, Einsiedeln.
- K. Hemmerle (1976), Thesen zu einer trinitarischen Ontologie, Einsiedeln.
- G. Ebeling (1979), Dogmatik des christlichen Glaubens 1, 334–55, 376–414.
- E. Jüngel (1980), “Der Gott entsprechende Mensch: Bemerkungen zur Gottebenbildlichkeit des Menschen als Grundfigur theologischer Anthropologie,” in Entsprechungen, BevTh 88, 290–317.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1983), “Welt aus Trinität,” Theodramatik IV, 53–95.
- E. Brito (1983), La christologie de Hegel, Paris.
- C. Bruaire (1983), L’être et l’esprit, Paris.
- I. U. Dalferth (1984), Existenz Gottes und christlicher Glaube, BevTh 93.
- L. Oeing-Hanhoff (1984), “Trinitarische Ontologie und Metaphysik der Person,” in W. Breuning (Ed.), Trinität: Aktuelle Perspektiven der Theologie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 143–82.
- J. D. Zizioulas (1985), Being As Communion, Crestwood, N.Y.
- E. Salmann (1986), Neuzeit und Offenbarung: Studien zur trinitarischer Analogik des Christentums, Rome.
- M. Henninger (1989), Relations: Medieval Theories 1250–1325, Oxford.
- E. Jüngel (1990), “Anthropomorphismus als Grundproblem

- neuzeitlicher Hermeneutik," in Wertlose Wahrheit, BevTh 107, 110–31.
- J. Splett (1990), Leben als Mit-sein: Vom trinitarisch Menschlichen, Frankfurt.
- P. Schulthess (1991), "Relation," I, "History," HMO, 776–79.
- M. Erler, et al. (1992), "Relation," HWP 8, 578–611.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), Expérience et Absolu, Paris.
- J. Splett (1996), "Ich und Wir-Philosophisches zu Person und Beziehung," Katholische Bildung, 97, 444–55.

A.J. Torrance (1996), Persons in Communion: Trinitarian Description and Human Participation, Edinburgh.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Aristotelianism; Christian; Communion; Eucharist; Nothingness; Philosophy; Platonism; Christian; Theology

Bellarmino, Robert

1542–1621

a) Life. Francesco Roberto Bellarmino was born in Montepulciano, and was the nephew of Cardinal Cervini, who chaired the Council* of Trent* during several sessions and reigned as pope, under the name of Marcellus II, for a few weeks in 1555. The young Bellarmine joined the Society of Jesus in 1560, and after his studies at the Roman College he was entrusted with the charge of various commissions in Italy, where he revealed his talents as a poet and a preacher. Delegated to Louvain in the spring of 1569 in order to preach against the Protestants, he started there with the teaching of theology*.

It was the beginning of a long teaching career, with an inclination toward controversy. In fact, it was for teaching controversial matters to the English and German students that the fourth general of the Jesuits, Everard Mercurian, called him back to the Roman College in 1576. These controversial courses were published under the title Disputationes de controversiis christianae fidei in Ingolstadt in 1586–93 and in Venice in 1596. In 1589–90 Bellarmine accompanied Cardinal Henri Cajetan in France as theological counselor. He was appointed rector of the Roman College in 1592, and became the theologian of Clement VIII (1592–1605), who made him cardinal in 1599.

After a brief interval as archbishop of Capua (1602–5), Bellarmine came back for good to Rome*, where he was asked to conduct some complex and dangerous affairs for the papacy. They included an "Interdict" ruled by Paul V in 1606 against Venice, following some detrimental measures it had just taken against the church and the clergy; affairs regarding England in 1607–9 because of the oath imposed by King James I on all Catholics; the Gallican controversies of 1610–12, including the anonymous publication in 1609 of the De potestate papae by William Barclay; and Bellarmine's reply, in 1610, with the De potestate summi pontificis in rebus temporalibus (see Gallicanism*). Bellarmine's functions at the Holy Office and his intellectual curiosity made him the privileged discussion partner of Galileo, who dedicated to him his discourse on floating objects (August 1612) and to whom he had to announce the condemnation of 1616.

In his late years, Bellarmine devoted himself to commentary on the Psalms*, In omnes psalmos dilucida expositio (Rome, 1611), and to the composition of treatises on piety, among which the most famous is the De ascensione mentis in Deum (Rome, 1615). He died almost an octogenarian in 1621. His posthumous fortunes are linked to the history of the Society of Jesus. The matter of his beatification, which started as early as 1627, was stopped and relaunched several times and did not come to a successful end until the 20th century (1923; canonization, 1930).

b) Works. The works of Bellarmine are surrounded by controversy, and so are closely associated to the circumstances of his life and to the needs of the church* at that time: among other things, Bellarmine was connected to the condemnation of Giordano Bruno in 1600 and to the trial of Thomas Campanella in 1603. Bellarmine's works revolve around two main areas: biblical criticism and ecclesiology*—along with the political philosophy* that is closely related to it. In the internal quarrels on grace* Bellarmine's attitude was always moderate, both in Louvain with Baius and his disciples and in Rome, where in 1602 he dissuaded Clement VIII from engaging his authority in this matter (Bañezianism*). While the Society of Jesus endeavored to support the middle-course position of Luis de Molina's Concordia (1588), Bellarmine remained in the background, and he even had to intervene in 1614 to moderate the positions of his former student Leonard Lessius (1554–1623). The particular nature of Bellarmine's task often allowed him to propose compromises, when facing Protestant theologians, and a middle-of-the-road approach concerning the questions being disputed.

Regarding the sources of revelation*, in his Controversia (1590), Bellarmine underscores that the Word* of God* may be written or nonwritten. The first three of the work's four volumes are on The Written Word of God. Volume I covers the list of the canonical books, volume II examines the different versions and translations, and volume III is concerned with the elements of interpretation. With regard to biblical inspiration, Bellarmine opts for a position in favor of a simple assistance from the Holy* Spirit, and not for a direct and permanent inspiration of the Scriptures*. Bellarmine holds that God did not reveal himself in the Scriptures only, but also in traditions*. He then proceeds to carefully sort out divine, apostolic, and ecclesiastical traditions and those traditions touching on faith* and customs. Making distinctions among the traditions allows a better understanding of the criteria of validity and the degrees of authority* that come into play. Borrowing certain points from Augustine*'s treaty De Doctrina Christiana, Bellarmine establishes rules for a better distinction between the false traditions, which are to be discarded, and traditions that are really necessary for Revelation (Controversia, vol. IV, The Unwritten Word of God). As for the meanings of passages, Bellarmine asserts quite strongly that the judge of the Scriptures is the church.

The other point discussed is that of political power and of its relation to ecclesiastical power, in particular with the pope*'s (3a Controversia, De summo pontifice). Facing the Venetian, Anglican, and Gallican theologians, Bellarmine resorts to a fundamental political analysis: no civil authority can rightly claim a divine right. Rather, political power is dependent on the right of the people, and public officials should be chosen by the majority of the people, who can therefore modify the shape of the government. Things are different, however, in the ecclesiastical regime, which is divinely established like a monarchy tempered by the aristocracy (the bishops are real ministers* and princes in the particular churches*). The relationship between the two authorities rests on their respective orders. Bellarmine borrows from tradition the thesis of an indirect authority held by the Roman pontiff (which is to be understood from its object, not from its mode), that allows him to intervene in temporal affairs, not directly in their quality as temporal, but when it is relevant to save or protect spiritual interests.

Bellarmino's doctrine on the relationship between political and ecclesiastical authority is based on an ecclesiology that revealed itself to be a determining factor in two ways. He defined the church as a societas juridice perfecta, a juridically complete society* (Congar), since it possesses indeed its own aims, members capable of reaching those aims, and an authority* that ensures the relationship that makes them into a society. The lengthy and strong analyses made by Bellarmine were not merely of capital importance to post-Tridentine ecclesiology, but they also largely influenced modern political thought, mainly with those who, opposed to Bellarmine on the question of the relation between church* and state, have attempted to transfer Bellarmine's definition of the church onto the state itself (Hobbes, primarily).

A learned exegete aware of the intellectual responsibilities that fall on the shoulders of a Roman pontiff whose authority he exalted, Bellarmine showed the cautious side of his character at the beginning of Galileo's difficulties. Although in the anti-Protestant controversies he was anxious to protect the literal interpretation of the Bible, he was not an adversary of the new physics. In his letters to Federico Cesi, founder of the Academy of Lynxes, and to the Carmelite Foscarini (1615), a defender of Copernicus, he recommended proposing heliocentrism as a hypothesis (ex suppositione) and not in an absolute manner. The importance of his works and the positions he held make him the initiator of choice presented by the Society of Jesus, between Scholastics and "innovators," in the different realms of ecclesiology*, political philosophy*, exegesis*, and the new science.

• Opera omnia (1721), Venice; (1856–62), Naples; (1870–74), Paris.

Ed. and trans. until 1890; see Sommervogel vol. 1, col. 1151–1254; vol. 8, col. 1797–1807 then S. Tromp (1930), De operibus S. R. B., Rome.

X.-M. Le Bachelet (Ed.) (1911), Bellarmin avant son cardinalat, 1542–1598: Correspondance et documents, Paris; (1913), Auctarium Bellarminianum: Complément aux Œuvres du cardinal B., Paris.

De laicis or the Treatise on Civil Government, Tr. K. E. Murphy, New York, 1928 (New Ed., Westport, Conn., 1979).

♦ X. Le Bachelet (1903), "B.," DThC 2/1, 560–99.

J. de La Servière (1909), La théologie de B., Paris.

J. Brodrick (1928), The Life and Works of Blessed Robert Cardinal B., 2 vols., London.

X. Le Bachelet (1931), Prédestination et grâce efficace. Con-

Bellarmino, Robert

troverse dans la Compagnie de Jésus au temps d'Aquaviva (1610–1613), 2 vols., Louvain.

Y. Congar (1952), "Église et État," Cath 3, 1430–41 (repr. with other articles in Sainte Église: Études et approches ecclésiologiques, Paris, 1963).

G. Galeota (1966), B. contro Baio a Lovanio, Rome; (1988), "Robert B.," DSp 13, 713–20.

M. Biersack (1989), Initia Bellarminiana: Die Prädestinationslehre bei Robert B. S. J. bis zu seinen Löwener Vorlesungen, 1570–1576, Stuttgart.

L. Ceysens (1994), "B. et Louvain (1569–1576)," in M. Lambertis (Ed.) L'augustinisme à Louvain, Louvain, 179–205.

JEAN-ROBERT ARMOGATHE

See also Augustinianism; Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Church and State; Ecclesiology; Gallicanism; Pope; Society

Benedict of Nursia. See Monasticism

Berengarius of Tours. See Eucharist

Bernard of Chartres. See Chartres, School of

Bernard of Clairvaux

1090–1153

1. Life

Born at Fontaine-lès-Dijon, Bernard was a member of the Burgundian nobility. He received his first instruction from the canons of Saint-Vorles de Châtillon. In 1113, accompanied by his brothers and a number of his friends whom he had persuaded to accompany him, he entered Cîteaux, the new monastery founded in 1098, to follow the Rule of Saint Benedict more strictly than was the case under traditional monasticism*. In 1115 he was sent out to found Clairvaux, of which he would be abbot until his death. The monastery developed very rapidly under his energetic leadership, and from 1118 on, other monastic foundations began to proliferate from it. During the first years of his abbacy Bernard enjoyed the friendship and teaching of William of Champeaux, founder of the Abbey of Saint-Victor and latterly bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, and was thus able to complete his intellectual training. He also befriended another William, the Benedictine abbot of Saint-Thierry, near Reims, with whom he studied the Song of Songs and the commentary on it by Origen. Bernard rapidly made a name for himself as a spiritual master. His written work, which he began around 1124 with the treatise On the Degrees of Humility and Pride and the homilies Super missus est, revealed from the outset a remarkable literary talent. He was to maintain this all his life with a variety of treatises, numerous liturgical sermons, the series of 86 Sermons on the Song of Songs (generally recognized as his masterpiece), and a correspondence of which more than 500 letters survive.

The extraordinary rise of the Cistercian order during the first half of the 12th century brought conflict with the monks of Cluny, and Bernard was forced to justify himself in the Apology. His desire for reform was not limited to monasticism, but extended to the life of the clergy and the bishops, and to the church as a whole. Bernard therefore found himself rapidly caught up in matters which were then troubling the church—in the affair of the schism of Anacletus, he took Innocent II's side and had him recognized as the rightful pope (1130–38)—and he was obliged to travel throughout Western Europe. In 1140, urged on by William of Saint-Thierry, he opposed Abelard and obtained his condemnation at the Council of Sens. He intervened again in 1148 at Reims against Gilbert de la Porrée (c. 1075–1154), though the latter was not condemned. In 1145 one of his disciples was elected pope under the name Eugenius III, and Bernard continued to advise him, in particular addressing to him the five letters which compose the treatise De consideratione (1148–52). Eugenius III sent him to the Languedoc to preach against the Cathars. It was again at Eugenius's behest that he preached the Second Crusade, for the failure of which he was held partly to blame.

Bernard died at Clairvaux on 20 August 1153. A controversial and much-criticized figure, though highly influential, he was widely considered a saint while he was still alive (it was in such terms that William of Saint-Thierry began to write his biography between 1145 and 1148), and was canonized in 1174. The 12th century was the golden age of the Cistercians, a monastic order distinguished by numerous writers of great literary, theological, and spiritual worth, all of whom had come under Bernard's influence. We will mention here only those who, along with Bernard, have been called “the four evangelists of Cîteaux”: William of Saint-Thierry (c. 1075–1148), who forsook his abbacy and the Benedictine order in 1135 to become an ordinary Cistercian monk at Signy, Guerric d'Igny (1070?–1157), and Aelred of Rievaulx (1110–67). While they had a common doctrine, each presented it with an individual style and nuance, helping to make this century an exceptionally fruitful period.

2. A Monastic Theology

“Chimera of his age,” as he called himself (Letter 250, 4), adviser to popes, spiritual master—Bernard was all these, but was he a theologian? Since the appearance of Gilson's study (1934) this question seems to have been settled. Yet Bernard would probably have rejected the term for himself, since he uses the words theologus and theologia only with reference to Abelard and his work. While a few of his own writings, such as Grace and Free Will, Letter 77 on baptism, or Book V of De consideratione do have a clear theological content, many are devoted to monastic and spiritual instruction. It is this dual aspect of Bernard's work, however, which allows us to understand the special status of his thought. He never sets out to deal with theological questions for their own sake, but is always seeking how a meeting between humankind and God may take place. It is very much in this context that he comes to consider the relations within the Trinity or the Word's union with humanity in Christ. So in De consideratione, after asking himself five times in succession what God is, and replying in a variety of ways, he repeats the question and answers it thus: “What he is to himself, he alone knows” (V. 24). While he shows himself to be not insensitive to this kind of questioning, and even demonstrates some virtuosity in his handling of it, it is not his habitual register and he prefers to leave it alone. The final formula referred to above is more a nonanswer than an evocation of God's transcendence, since what interests Bernard is not the definition of the divine essence but the fact that God reveals himself as both an interlocutor with humanity and its final goal.

This fundamental tendency in Bernard's thought makes it impossible to distinguish the “theological” (speculative) element in his work from the spiritual or ascetic part. The pro nobis that is God's special characteristic keeps Bernard from becoming mired in speculation, and focuses his thoughts on mankind's turning—or turning back—toward God, a process that culminates in mystical and beatific union. Bernard's habitual concern is with the history of salvation in all its aspects. In this context he plays constantly on the twin identities of the “bride” spoken of in the Song of Songs—she is at once the Church and the individual soul*—and hence comes to see the history of salvation as the history of all humanity. Knowing is an activity of tasting for oneself what one has discovered from God. Understood in these terms, theology* involves not only anthropology* and the liturgy*, but also asceticism*, obedience, and so on. It is only authentic when put into practice, and in such a way as to bring about an increase in charity. The theologian is not, therefore, one who has studied under eminent teachers, but the one who allows himself to be taught by the Holy* Spirit itself in the course of his daily work, as Bernard wrote to Aelred of Rievaulx—in other words, he who has experienced God’s goodness and can thus evoke that experience in his readers or listeners (Letter 523). In this way a return is possible to the early sense of theologian, which is to be encountered especially in monastic literature and in particular in the work of Evagrius Ponticus (c. 345–99). In order to distinguish it from the academic variety, theology of this kind is referred to as “monastic theology,” by which is meant a theology based on experience* (Leclercq 1957; Gastaldelli in Aci, 1990, 25–63)—a practical theology encompassing the whole of existence (Hardelin 1987).

3. Teachings

a) Humility. In his first work, The Degrees of Humility and Pride, Bernard defines three degrees of truth*: humility, charity, and contemplation*. The primary impetus of that theology which strives after union with God is anthropological. It consists of self-knowledge: in other words, knowledge of one’s own nothingness*. Man is only a creature. While he is superior to the animals, who lack reason*, he is inferior to the angels*. Above all, he has failed to maintain his original state, and that failure has estranged him both from God and from himself, placing him in a “region of difference.” It is through humility that he may return to himself and achieve self-knowledge, stripping himself of everything with which pride has covered him. Humility is therefore the first degree of truth because it allows one to know what one is: nothing. “When I did not yet know the truth, I believed that I was something, while in fact I was nothing” (Humility IV, 15). Elsewhere Bernard emphasizes the “miracle” that is man, this being in whom opposites meet: reason* and death, nothing and something—or better, nothing and something great, since God magnifies this nothing. But even as it leads man back to himself, humility is already leading him back to God, too. Indeed, the humble man, who is only himself, renounces the possession of something unique to himself that would define him; and by abandoning all proprium, he opens in himself the space in which God can act. Humility leads back to the pure form in which man was created. Man is nothing (in his own right) because his being* is to be the image and likeness of God. He fulfills himself in this openness to God.

From here it can be seen what direction Bernard’s Christology* will take. The Word is both that which gave man his form, in the beginning, and that which now re-forms him in the image of Jesus Christ. The Word is a constant mediator between God and man, both as an image of the divine substance and as an example of perfect humility. Bernard firmly insists upon the exemplary nature of Christ’s humanity. But he points out that Christ did not come solely to offer an example to be followed (as he criticizes Abelard for saying): he is in himself the Savior. He is not merely the way and the truth, he is also the life: “Great indeed, and most necessary, is the example of humility, great and deserving of welcome is the example of charity, but neither one nor the other has any foundation, nor in consequence any solidity, if redemption is lacking. With all my strength I wish to follow the humble Jesus*; I wish to kiss him, to render love* for love to him who has loved me and given himself for me, but I must also eat the Paschal lamb” (Against the Errors of Abelard 25). Much has been said (admittedly largely on the basis of ill-attributed texts) of the devotion of Bernard and the Cistercians to Christ’s humanity. But it has not always been noticed what lies at the root of this devotion: the restoration of the image and likeness, understood as a reformation—in other words, as a conformation to him who is the true Image. Man’s salvation, from this point, proceeds by way of participation in Christ’s Passion* and the cross. Following the Epistle to the Romans, Bernard sees this participation as fulfilled in baptism*, and then in monastic profession understood as a second baptism (On Precept and Dispensation XVII, 54).

Liturgy* plays an essential role here in that it represents the various moments of the life of Christ by means of monstration and actualization (“Just as in a sense he is sacrificed again each day when we proclaim his death, so he seems to be born again when we have visualized [repraesentavimus] his birth with faith”; Sermon 6 for the Christmas Vigil, 6); and this act of making present in turn implies imitation*. Aelred of Rievaulx would develop this theme at more length.

b) Charity. “Our Savior wished to suffer so as to be able to sympathize, to become unfortunate so as to learn to be merciful, in order that, just as it is written of him” (Heb 5:8). “So might he also learn mercy*. Not that he did not know beforehand how to be merciful, but what he had known by nature through all eternity*, he now learned within time* through experience” (Humility III, 6). Because it is the divine act which truly takes account of human suffering and death, the Incarnation* therefore exemplifies a charity that is the second degree of truth. Charity can be attained only under the influence of the Spirit, which purifies the will and enables mankind to persevere in its conversion*. The pinnacle of charity is the fusion of man’s will with that of God—a fusion in which the reality of love is clearly manifest. The theme of the prescription of charity is central to Bernard and the other Cistercians. This is especially so for Aelred, who approaches it in his Mirror of Charity with the image of the “three Sabbaths*,” which stand for three progressive loves: love of self, love of one’s neighbor, and love of God. In his Spiritual Friendship, Aelred further describes the progress from friendship with one’s neighbor to friendship with God.

c) Contemplation. The third degree of truth represents humanity’s realization of its destiny: union with God. But is this unitas spiritus equivalent to the union of Father* and Son in the Trinity*? Bernard refuses to make this identification (On the Song 71), but William of Saint-Thierry and Aelred maintain it, and in doing so propose a daring theology of deification (sanctity, in Bernard’s terms). Such an identification is possible when the Spirit “becomes in its own way, for man’s relationship with God, exactly what it is, in consubstantial* unity, for the Son’s relationship with the Father or for the Father’s with the Son; . . . when in an ineffable, inconceivable manner the man of God deserves to become, not God, but what God is: man becomes by grace what God is by nature*” (William, Letter 263). Mystical phenomena such as ecstasy anticipate the eternal union of God and man. But the latter is already encountered in much more frequent experiences—daily even, according to Bernard—in which the individual person is visited by the Word or the Spirit. This leads Bernard (followed by Gueric d’Igny and Aelred) to posit an intermediate advent of Christ between his coming in the flesh and his coming in glory*. This second advent consists of the indwelling of the Trinity* in man, and is more beneficial than the first advent since, according to Bernard, Christians should not restrict themselves to contemplating Christ’s humanity, but go beyond knowledge* “according to the flesh*,” which is normally the preserve of the novice. This striving toward something beyond Christ’s flesh is expressed by the recurring quotation in Lamentations 4:20, “Under his shadow we shall live among the nations,” where “shadow” denotes the incarnation. Christ’s flesh thus has a didactic value to those who are still “carnal” or children (On the Song 20, 6–7; William, Oration X), who recognize in it the nearness of God and who rely on it to convert their desire. So Bernard and William, but above all Aelred, do not hesitate to put imagination into the service of meditation.

It should be added that the three degrees of truth are implicated in one, and in particular that the exercise of charity is already a union with God and may be presented as an anticipation of eschatology. This would at least be so in the case of William and Aelred, although rather than anticipation, for them, it is more a matter of a temporality governed by what Gregory* of Nyssa termed epektasis, an infinite progression toward union with God. Moreover, the practical and the contemplative life are intimately connected, and for this reason the principle of union is man’s conformation to Christ (“I am united when I am conformed”; On the Song 71). Bernard’s mysticism* is inseparably spousal and communitarian.

d) A Theological Aesthetic. The idea of form is central to Bernard, and by extension it is able to express the central tenets of Cistercian thought: humanity being alienated from God in the land of unlikeness (deformation), redemption (reformation), and the life of conversion (conformation) that leads to union with God. At the heart of this process is the notion of Christ as the creating and re-creating Form. The same category, furthermore, serves to express the truth of everything that is, in other words the appropriateness of each thing to its form, and hence the beauty* (formositas, species) of each thing. Bernard rails against “the deformed beauty and beautiful deformity” (deformis formositas ac formosa deformitas) of the sculptures in some cloisters (Apology XII, 29); and the austerity of Cistercian architecture* was an attempt to convey only the purity of form. Everything that obscures form distances us from truth and similarly from beauty. In general terms, “he is wise for whom things have the taste of what they are” (Miscellaneous Sermons 18, 1). The concept of form also guides the whole quest for simplicity characteristic of the monastic and Cistercian ideal, and leads Bernard and his disciples to talk of the beauty of the saints. Only humility transforms the individual being into a theophany*.

e) Mariology. While Bernard has the reputation of being a “Marian doctor,” he owes this largely to texts that have been wrongly attributed to him. He is in any case against the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin (Letter 174), and says nothing on the subject of her bodily assumption (Amadeus of Lausanne [c. 1110–59] and Aelred were the first two Cistercians to maintain the latter doctrine). But while he talks less about Mary* than others do, he remains nonetheless one of her most inspired eulogists.

f) Sources. Bernard's main source, and that of his disciples, is Scripture*. All their works are steeped in it. To Scripture are added the Latin Fathers*, especially Augustine* and Gregory* the Great. The influence of the Greek Fathers remains controversial except for that of Origen, which is undisputed. Ancient monastic literature, such as Cassian, the Vitae Patrum and so on, represents another important source.

- Aelred de Rievaulx, Opera ascetica, Ed. A. Hoste, C. H. Talbot, CChr.CM I, 1971 (Le "Aelred de Rievaulx," Miroir de la charité, Bégrolles-en-Mauges, 1992; L'Amitié spirituelle, Bégrolles-en-Mauges, 1994; Sermones I-XLVI, Ed. G. Raciti, CChr.CM IIA, 1989; Sermones inediti, Ed. C. H. Talbot, Rome, 1952).

Bernard of Clairvaux, Sancti Bernardi Opera, Ed. J. Leclercq, H. Rochais, C. H. Talbot, Rome, 1957–77 (complete works in publication, SC).

Guerric d'Igny, Sermons, SC 166 and 202.

Guillaume de Saint-Thierry, La contemplation de Dieu, SC 61; Lettre aux Frères du Mont-Dieu, SC 223; Guillaume de Saint-Thierry, Le miroir de la foi, SC 301; Oraisons méditatives, SC 324.

- ◆ É. Gilson (1934), La Théologie mystique de saint Bernard, Paris; (1953), Saint Bernard théologien, ASOC 9.
- J. Leclercq (1957), L'Amour des lettres et le désir de Dieu, Paris; (1963–92), Recueil d'études sur saint Bernard et le textes de ses écrits, 5 vols., Rome.
- A. Altermatt (1977), "Christus pro nobis: Die Christologie Bernhards von Clairvaux in den 'sermones per annum,'" Acti 33, 3–176.
- A. Härdelin (1987), "Monastische Theologie: Eine 'praktische' Theologie vor der Scholastik," ZKTh 109, 400–415.
- Coll. (1990), La dottrina della vita spirituale nelle opere di San Bernardo di Clairvaux, Acti 46.
- P. Verdeyen (1990), La Théologie mystique de Guillaume de Saint-Thierry, Paris.
- J. R. Sommerfeldt (Ed.) (1991), Bernardus magister, Kalamazoo-Cîteaux, SD 42.
- Coll. (1992), Bernard de Clairvaux: Histoire, mentalités et spiritualité, SC 380.
- R. Brague (Ed.) (1993), Saint Bernard et la philosophie, Paris.
- Coll. (1993), S. Aelred de Rievaulx: Le Miroir de la charité, CCist 55, 1–256.
- C. Stergal (1998), Bernard de Clairvaux: Intelligence et amour, Paris.

PHILIPPE NOUZILLE

See also Abelard, Peter; Beauty; Love; Mary; Monasticism; Mysticism

Bernard Sylvester. See Chartres, School of

Bérulle, Pierre de

1575–1629

a) Life. Pierre de Bérulle was born on 4 February 1575 at the castle of Sérilly, in the province of Champagne, to a family that belonged to the noblesse de robe owing to its role in the magistracy. He received his early schooling at the collège of Boncourt, then at the collège of Bourgogne, and finally, from 1590 on, with the Jesuits at the collège of Clermont. When he returned to his mother's home he came into contact with the circle of devout individuals around his cousin Marie Acarie (1566–1618), Benet of Canfield (1562–1610), Father Coton (1564–1626), Michel de Marillac (1563–1632) and Pacifique de Souzy. The following year Bérulle he gave up his law* studies and turned instead to the study of theology* at the collège of Clermont, then at the Sorbonne, since the Jesuits had been expelled from the kingdom. He was ordained priest* in 1599 and appointed king's chaplain. In that capacity he assisted Du Perron (1556–1618), bishop* of Évreux and future cardinal, at the Conference of Fontainebleau (4 May 1600), against the protestant Du Plessis Mornay (1549–1623), author of the Traité sur l'Eucharistie (1598) in which he attacked the doctrine of the real presence and identified the pope* as the Antichrist. The broad culture of the young Pierre de Bérulle made him, on that occasion, a polemicist of great value. In 1602, after showing some hesitation about joining the Society of Jesus, he devoted his energies to the reform of Catholic institutions in France. Bérulle was active in the coming to France of the Carmelites, recently reformed by Teresa of Avila (1515–82). He remained, until his death, their Father Superior and their Perpetual Visitor. By imposing on the Carmelites of Châlons (1615) a vow of servitude to Mary*, Bérulle started a violent conflict with the Carmelites, who attempted in vain to take over the government of the nuns. The spiritual renewal of France required also a profound reform of the clergy. In 1611, at the request of the bishop of Paris, Bérulle founded the Oratory of Jesus, a society of priests following the model of the Oratory of Philippe Néri (1515–95). The Oratorians put themselves at the disposal of the ordinaries (local bishops) while remaining exempt juridically. They did not take religious vows. Like the Jesuits, they took on the management of colleges more often than parishes or seminaries. Bérulle was also a diplomat. In 1619 he forced the queen mother, who had fled to Angoulême, to make peace with Louis XIII, and in 1624 he obtained from Urban VIII (1623–44) the required dispensations for the marriage* of Henrietta of France, the king's sister, to the future king of England, Charles I. Being pro-Spanish, Bérulle came into conflict with Richelieu's policy, which favored an alliance with England, and he thus fell from grace. Urban VIII made him cardinal in 1627. He died on 1 October 1629.

b) Writings. Bref discours sur l'abnégation intérieure (1597); Traité des énergumènes (1599); Trois discours de controverses (sur la mission des pasteurs, le sacrifice* et la présence réelle)* (1609); Discours de l'état et de la grandeur de Jésus (1623); Vie de Jésus (1629); Élévation à Jésus-Christ Notre-Seigneur sur la conduite de son esprit et de sa grâce vers Madeleine (1627); Opuscules de piété (OP); Lettres. These works were published by Bourgoing in 1644.

c) Theological Ideas. The path followed by Bérulle's thought took him from a theology of the insignificance of creatures to a christological anthropology*, via a meditation on the humanity of Jesus*. Bérulle's first work was the Bref discours de l'abnégation intérieure. He took inspiration from the Breve compendio intorno a la perfezione cristiana composed by Isabelle Bellinzaga, most probably under the guidance of the Jesuit Father Gagliardi (1538–1607). Already discernible here is one of Bérulle's fundamental notions: Christian perfection consists in driving away by means of abnegation the self-love that forms an obstacle to the love* of God*; and the double foundation of that abnegation is the inseparable knowledge* of God and of oneself. Consciousness of the greatness of God, a consciousness of having no existence by oneself but only according to the manner of a created being, and finally, a consciousness that the creature cannot concern itself with its Creator without admitting hyperbolically that this creature himself exists according to the manner nothingness* rather than on that of being*: all this produces abnegation and makes it the gate through which spiritual experience* must find its way. One must indeed “consent to one's origin,” and human beings cannot have recollection of their creation, cannot accept what they are before God, without denying or renouncing whatever gives them the appearance of being: that is, without rooting themselves in an essential nothingness.

The theme of annihilation thus brings Bérulle close to Benet of Canfield, an Englishman converted from Anglicanism*, who had already suggested that it was by means of annihilation that human beings pass from natural to supernatural* existence. There is, undoubtedly, a difference of emphasis: with Canfield, the annihilation is effected through meditation on the suffering Christ* and through exterior actions*, whereas in Bérulle we do not as yet find the explicit reference to Christ. In any case, however, it is via Canfield that Bérulle found a language and overtones close to the Théologie mystique by Harphius (1400–1477), to Ruusbroec (1393–1481), and to Alphonse de Madrid (†1535).

Proceeding from a thoroughly Augustinian acknowledgment of the nothingness of man, Bérulle next concentrated on a second annihilation, the divine kenosis* of Philippians 2:6–11. Then came the major discovery, brought about by the Audi filia (1574) of John of Avila (1499–1569): if the humanity of Jesus has its “subsistence” in God's Word*, this means that it does not have its subsistence in a human being*. The anhypostasis* of the humanity of Christ thus gives the example of the most radical type of abnegation, a self-denial lodged in the very core of the human being. The aim of spiritual life became then, for Bérulle, a matter of living one's “servitude” in the image of Christ the “slave,” taking part in the morphè doulou. Received as a grace*, while at the same time being integrated into a logic of choice, servitude is both ontologically revealing and offers a pattern for actual living. Man is nothingness striving toward nothingness (Duns* Scotus). “We have nothing, if not our nothingness and our sin” (Collationes, Sept. 1615), and sin is “a second nothingness that is worse than the first” (OP, 228). Ratifying in servitude, however, what makes the creature (and a fortiori the sinning creature) a nothingness rather than a being is paradoxically the experience that allows man to remain a being; and that experience speaks the double language of a theology of Creation* and a theology of Incarnation*.

Bérulle does not approach the Incarnation by the path of imagination, but rather via the divine idea, closer to the Platonic thought of the Rhineland*-Flemish mystics. Following Gabriel Biel (1425–95), Benet of Canfield’s Rule of Perfection (1593) defined the spiritual* life with a maxim: the will of God is God himself. Bérulle was consistent with this tradition. According to him, in fact, the possession of God happens through knowledge of his will, and knowledge of the divine will is carried out in the renunciation of self-will. Henceforth, the Incarnation, that “divine invention” whereby God has mysteriously joined the created and the uncreated, reveals the ultimate meaning of such a renunciation. The secret of this “new mystery” is, in fact, “the destitution that the humanity of Jesus* feels in renouncing its own and ordinary subsistence in order to be clad in a foreign and extraordinary subsistence... what is renounced is the divine subsistence, the actual Person of the Son” (Grandeurs II, X). So the logic of nothingness and abnegation is not nihilistic. On the contrary, it is the logic of a greater real intimacy between Creator and creature.

On the motive of Incarnation, Bérulle’s Christology* fluctuates between the views of Duns Scotus and Thomas* Aquinas. The Scotist thesis stated that Incarnation would have taken place even if man had not sinned; Bérulle’s early writings did in fact frequently present Christ as completion; the idea was also the underlying theme of Christ as the “true worshipper” (OP, 190). At the time of Grandeurs (1620), however, Bérulle’s emphasis was on the theme “for our salvation*” (the propter nos homines et propter nostram salutem of the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople), and he thus aligned himself with the Thomist position: the Incarnation is first of all considered a work of salvation*. From the Trinitarian decree of the Incarnation (“the will of God to send his Son on earth”), Bérulle’s contemplation* of the mystery* of Christ went next to the “being of Jesus... who offered himself”: the Christology of the Incarnation then opened out into a Christology of sacrifice*, all the more necessary since the sacrifice of the cross was already entirely present at the moment of the Incarnation (Heb 10:5). And because the sacrifice offered by Christ was indicative, to the highest degree, of him being the “monk of God,” Bérulle’s Christology led to a real sacerdotal anthropology, allowing the creation of a theology of priesthood that sustained for a long time the post-Tridentine clergy.

The “mysteries of Jesus” developed as a new theme. After the solemnity of Jesus (1615), Bérulle initiated a feast celebrating “Jesus among men” (1625), in which a sacred court gravitated around Christ, composed of the saints who were closest to him during his “itinerant” life: the Virgin Mary*, the Apostles*, Mary Magdalene, John the Baptist. In 1615 Bérulle drew all the possible spiritual consequences from a Chalcedonian and post-Chalcedonian Christology of the nonsubsistence of the humanity of Christ, whereas in 1625 he was primarily contemplating God made man in all the concrete relations he had entered into with humanity. From the substance of mystery, Bérulle went on to its economy. This shift gives the clearest indication of his change from a Scotist perspective to a Thomist one.

The Incarnation, therefore, inaugurates a new type of relationship with God, expressed through the servitude of Christ himself, and expressed also in an exemplary manner by Mary, who supplied Bérulle with a model. Servitude is “essential” for Bérulle because it achieves a just relationship between God and creature, between “being and nothingness”; and that is why the upholding of being can be truly real in human beings only in the “substance in Jesus” (OP, 226). The man Jesus, in perfect abnegation, does not subsist in himself but in the Word. Likewise, human beings must subsist in God with Jesus: “Man is sanctified outside of himself” (OP, 244). Bérulle said also, in Johannine* terms, that one must subsist in Jesus as Jesus subsists in the Father*. And in terms closer to Thomas Aquinas he also spoke of relation, of “relation toward” Jesus (OP, 249). The notion of “cohesion” means, in this context, voluntary adhesion to the Son, subsistence in him.

Bérulle’s influence was considerable, first of all on the Oratorians: on Charles de Condren (1588–1641), for example, who developed the Berullian notion of the sacrifice and abnegation of Christ in the Eucharist*; and on Guillaume Gibieuf (1580–1650), who continued with the Marian devotion of the founder of the Oratory. Carmelites such as Madeleine de Saint-Joseph (1578–1637) also felt Bérulle’s influence, as did important figures such as Vincent de Paul (1581–1660), who learned from him the role of the priest as being at the service of all, and Jean Duvergier de Hauranne (1581–1643) (Jansenism*). Bérulle's theology of the priesthood* had an impact on seminaries run by the Eudists, the Lazarists, and the priests of Saint-Sulpice, which had been founded by Monsieur Olier (1608–57). At the beginning of the century, Henri Bremond, referring to Bérulle, spoke of a “French school” of spirituality. Today, the notion of a Berullian school is preferred.

- Pierre de Bérulle (1644), Œuvres de l'Éminentissime et Révérendissime Pierre Cardinal de Bérulle, Ed. R.P.F. Bourgoing, 2nd Ed., 1657, Paris; photographic by l'Oratoire, 2 vols. (Montsoul, 1960); (1856), Œuvres complètes de Bérulle, cardinal de l'Église romaine, fondateur et premier supérieur de l'Oratoire, Ed. Migne, Paris; (1937–39), Correspondance, Ed. J. Dagens, 3 vols., Paris-Louvain; (1995–), OC, Paris.
- C. de Condren (1943), Lettres du Père C. de Condren (1588–1641), pub. P. Auvray, A. Jouffrey, Paris.
- ♦ H. Bremond (1921), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, vol. III: La conquête mystique, Paris.
- C. Taveau (1933), Le cardinal de Bérulle, maître de vie spirituelle, Paris.
- J. Orcibal (1947 and 1948), Les origines du jansénisme, II et III: Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, abbé de Saint-Cyran et son temps (1581–1638), Paris-Louvain.

- J. Dagens (1952), Bérulle et les origines de la restauration catholique (1575–1611), Paris.
- P. Cochois (1963), Bérulle et l'École française, Paris.
- M. Dupuy (1964), Bérulle, une spiritualité de l'adoration, Paris.
- J. Orcibal (1965), Le cardinal de Bérulle: Évolution d'une spiritualité, Paris.
- M. Dupuy (1969), Bérulle et le sacerdoce: Étude historique et doctrinale: Unpublished Texts, Paris.
- F. Guillèn Preckler (1974), “État” chez le cardinal de Bérulle: Théologie et spiritualité des “états” bérulliens, Rome.
- S.-M. Morgain (1995), Pierre de Bérulle et les Carmélites de France, Paris.
- M. Vetö (1997), “La christo-logique de Bérulle,” in Opuscles de piété, Paris, 7–136.
- Y. Krumenacker (1998), L'école française de spiritualité: Des mystiques, des fondateurs, des courants et leurs interprètes, Paris.

STÉPHANE-MARIE MORGAIN AND JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Anhypostasy; Carmel; Descartes, René; Devotio moderna; Nothingness; Platonism, Christian; Priesthood

Bible

Jews and Christians give the whole of their sacred writings the name of Bible, from the Greek biblia, meaning “books*.” The Jews traditionally give their 24 holy books the name of Tanakh, which is an acronym of Torah (Law*), Nevi'im (Prophets*), Ketuvim (Writings). The Christian Bible consists of the Old Testament—39 books in the Protestant canon* (the same books as in the Jewish Scriptures, though differently divided) plus seven deuterocanonical books in the Catholic canon—and the 27 books of the New Testament. At the beginning of our era, despite their common origin, Samaritans, Jews, and Christians did not have the same collections of books for their Holy* Scriptures. The present notion of the Bible, a fixed list of books, with the codex showing them in a well-determined order, did not really appear until the third or fourth century. What the New Testament calls “the Scriptures” is the Old Testament. The term New Testament (testament or covenant*, Greek diathèkè) comes from the prediction by Jeremiah of a “new covenant” (Jer 31:31–34). The pair Old Testament/New Testament has its origin in the fact the Christians repeated Jeremiah's prophecy* (see 1 Cor 11:25; Lk 22:20; 2 Cor 3:5–14; Heb 8:7–13, 9:15, and 12:24).

1. Old Testament

At the beginning of our era, the order of the biblical books was, as follows, for the rabbis: Pentateuch, Prophets (Former and Latter), Writings; for the Christians, following the Septuagint and Vulgate translations: Pentateuch, Historical Books, Books of Wisdom*, Prophets. The final spot thus assigned to the Prophets was due to the belief in the fulfillment, by Christ*, of their oracles (Scripture*, fulfillment of).

The composition of the Old Testament is spread out over the first millennium B.C. The main Hebrew manuscripts that served as sources for the modern translations go back to the 10th and 11th centuries. Some earlier translations (essentially the Septuagint, a work done by Jews whose language was Greek, second century B.C.), as well as the Hebrew and Aramean biblical texts from Qumran (first century B.C.) and other sites, have confirmed the essential fidelity of the Hebrew textual tradition.

A large part of the Old Testament is made up of works of great length, in which the main periods of the history* of Israel* are reflected, and in which it is possible to distinguish the following periods: the period of the Twelve Tribes (or the period of the Judges, or the Pre-Monarchical period, c. 1220 B.C.–1020 B.C.); the United Monarchy (Saul, David, and Solomon); the Divided Monarchy (c. 922 B.C.–587 B.C.), with the Northern Kingdom of Israel (c. 922 B.C.–721 B.C.) and the Southern Kingdom of Judah (c. 922 B.C.–587 B.C.); the Babylonian Exile (587 B.C.–539 B.C.); the postexilic period, or period of the Second Temple*, also called Persian period (539 B.C.–333 B.C.); the Hellenistic period (333 B.C.–63 B.C.); and, finally, the Roman period, starting in 63 B.C.

The last edition of the major literary series is now generally believed to date from the period of the Second Temple, but the core of these works is older; it grew as a response to historical events.

a) Pentateuch. The history proper of Israel started with the conquest of Canaan, c. 1220 B.C. National identity started then, with the help of an oral narrative: the God of nations and of Israel (universalism*) created the world (creation*), called the patriarchs, and made their descendants, the Hebrews, go from slavery in Egypt to his service in Canaan. The anomalies that do not allow attributing authorship of the Pentateuch to Moses were accounted for, starting in the 18th century, but it was not until the 19th century, above all in Germany, that there appeared the hypotheses that classified the sources according to their period. The most famous of their proponents was Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918). More recent scholarship has not invalidated his reconstruction of the Bible's history, which still serves as a basis for numerous research endeavors. Wellhausen presented his findings as follows:

A first narrative was written in prose at the time of the United Monarchy, from a monarchical point of view. It is known as the J, or Yahwist, source because it singles out YHWH, or Yahweh (Jahweh in German), as a divine name*. One century later, there was another version in the Northern Kingdom, the E (Elohistic) source, which favors the divine name of Elohim. That source is now often considered to be a mere supplement of J. Finally, J and E were combined and gradually completed. The Pentateuch reached its present state during the exile, thanks most probably to a third source, the P, or priestly, source, which added some material made up of laws and archives while reorganizing the previous traditions.

The conclusion of the five books of the Torah, leaving the Israelites in the plains of Moab, at the doorstep of Canaan, of which they had not yet taken possession, was adapted particularly for people living in exile. However, in spite of all the additions brought about during four centuries, the basic pattern of the Pentateuch was still faithful to the first narrative: Creation of the world, election of Israel, liberation from Egypt, serving God in the Promised Land.

b) Historical Books. The fifth book of the Pentateuch, Deuteronomy or “Second Law,” is independent from sources J, E, and P, and stands out somehow from the narrative rhythm of the first four, which it concludes, for it is connected to the Book of Numbers (Dt 1–3). In its latest form, it presents four speeches addressed by Moses to Israel as the people are getting ready to cross the Jordan River and enter Canaan. The core of the book is said to be, according to many critics, Deuteronomy 5–26, in other words the “Book of Law” discovered in 622 B.C. by King Josiah, who made it the basis of his reform (2 Kgs 22–23). While concluding the Pentateuch, Deuteronomy connects it to the part of history that came later. That “Deuteronomist” part of history (Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kings) stretches from the time of Moses (13th century B.C.) to the death of King Josiah (609 B.C.); it emphasizes the Sinai Covenant (Mount Sinai is called “Horeb” in this version) and the Davidic Covenant. Obeying the word of YHWH brings about the blessings* promised by the Covenant, whereas disobedience brings about curses, in particular the loss of the Promised Land.

A resumption of older traditions thus ended up with a unified whole, most likely in two steps. There was first a narrative dating back to the seventh century to support Josiah's reform. That narrative presents Josiah as the worthy successor of Moses and David. A revision (at the latest in 561 B.C., the date when Joachin was given a reprieve by the king of Babylon) adapted the text for the somber reality of the exile (2 Kgs 21:10–15 and 23:25b–25:30). The Book of Chronicles is more recent; it covers approximately the same span of time as the earlier books, but the dominant point of view is the reconstruction of the Second Temple, after the exile. Esdras and Nehemiah, which also date back to the fifth or fourth century B.C., although most probably from another author, extend the Book of Chronicles to the Persian period. Facing Hellenization, 1 and 2 Maccabees (deuterocanonical books) tell the story of the successes of the Jews' resistance and of the unforeseen turn of events in the seizure of power. The First Book of the Maccabees uses again the narrative patterns of Joshua's conquests; the Second Book thematizes the theological interpretation of the conflict. All these works, dating back to the period of the Second Temple, often resort to the process of systematically rereading and reusing expressions, images, and patterns borrowed from earlier narrations.

c) The Wisdom Literature. The Song of Solomon, a collection of love* poems, is part of this literature and is attributed to Solomon, the sage par excellence (see Song 1:1, 3:7, 3:9, 3:11, and 8:11). These works represent literary* genres that are well known in Middle-Eastern court literature—instructions given by a father to his sons, dialogues on justice* and suffering, royal autobiographies, essays in verse—but they all bear the mark of faith in YHWH, the God of Israel. Except for the Wisdom of Sirach (written c. 200 B.C.–175 B.C.), it is possible only to speculate about the dates of the Books of Wisdom*, since they do not make reference to history. A great part of the Book of Proverbs is from a preexilic period; Job, with the trauma of exile as its background text, is from the sixth century; Ecclesiastes corresponds well to the crisis caused by the Hellenistic ideas of the third century B.C.; finally, the Wisdom of Solomon dates from the first century B.C.

It is usual to classify the 150 Psalms* in the same category of works. Through the conventions of their form (corresponding to their liturgical use) the depth of human sensitivity expresses itself. A good third of the Psalms are individual laments; the remaining psalms fall into the categories of community laments, hymns, expressions of thanksgiving, royal psalms, and canticles from Zion.

d) The Prophets. The prophets, who were said to be active “writers” under the Divided Monarchy, during the Exile, and during the Restoration (c. 750–450 B.C.) are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel (the four “major” prophets), and Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi (the “minor” Prophets, this adjective being used on account of the brevity of their surviving texts). The Lamentations, traditionally attributed to Jeremiah, are a collection of liturgical pieces devoted to the ruin of the Temple. These books contain the constant themes present from the eighth century on in prophetic predication: the apostasy of Israel brought about the breaking off of the first relation that united God and his people; the judgment* of God, which will be executed by human agents (pagan nations); and, finally, the reestablishment of the Jewish people on its land—this last theme becoming more marked and definitely clearer after the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile of 587.

The words and actions of the prophets were recorded in books, sometimes with narratives, that were developed in such a way that they would be applicable to Israel at all times. As a consequence, the books were often revised and augmented with prophecies from a time subsequent to that of the prophet whose name they bear. The deuterocanonical Baruch is a reflection on the meaning of exile and of the restoration of Israel.

e) Other Writings. Some books can hardly be considered to belong to one of the preceding four categories. They are brief narrations composed with art (Ruth, Esther, and the deuterocanonical Tobit and Judith), whose heroes are exemplary individuals, rather than rulers, and are often women (woman*). With the possible exception of Ruth (which is significant for David's genealogy), these narratives date from the Second Temple.

The last impetus of literary fertility in the Old Testament arose from the Jewish resistance to the Seleucid tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.–164 B.C.). The book of Daniel bears the name of its hero, whom it places during the Babylonian Exile (to be decoded as “Seleucid domination”). The visions of Daniel 7–12 constitute the first upsurge, in the Old Testament, of an apocalypse in the full sense of the word. These texts give the people of the Almighty and Daniel's party the assurance of victory and of eternal* life. This literary genre, already announced in Ezekiel, Isaiah 24–27 and 40–66, and Zechariah, reaches its peak with the first Judaism* and the New Testament.

2. New Testament

The four Gospels*, the Acts of the Apostles*, the 13 Pauline Letters, the Letter to the Hebrews, the seven so-called catholic, or universal, letters, and the Revelation to John—these are the 27 Books of the New Testament. They were all written in Greek (the Greek of the koinè), around the Mediterranean, between A.D. 50 and the beginning of the second century. The oldest written documents are fragments of papyrus from the second and third centuries. The oldest of the documents that are complete are written on parchment, and are spread out from the fourth to the ninth centuries.

a) Letters of Paul. The seven “authentic” letters of Paul (in other words, those whose attribution is not contested) are the oldest documents of the New Testament, even though they do mention earlier Christian traditions (e.g., Rom 1:3–4, 3:25–26; 1 Cor 15: 3–4; Phil 2:6–11; and Gal 3:28). Paul wrote these letters when he was performing his duties as pastor* and theologian, and so they fit the situations in the communities that he had founded or knew.

In the First Letter to the Thessalonians (A.D. 51–52), Paul reestablishes friendly relations with the community and speaks up on various subjects, above all on the “second coming” of Christ. In the Epistle to the Galatians, Paul says that Christians who have converted from paganism* do not have to conform to such Jewish observances as circumcision. The First Letter to the Corinthians gives the apostle’s opinion on the divisions in the community, on a case of incest, on trials, on marriage* and virginity, on the food offered to idols, on the assembly of the community, and on resurrection*. The Letter to the Philippians and the Second Letter to the Corinthians have as their themes the attacks endured by Paul in the course of his ministry*, financial problems, life after death*, and the obstacles brought against Gentile Christians by the Judeo-Christian missionaries. The Letter to Philemon is a petition addressed to the head of a Christian family to have him greet, once more, in his home, Onesimus, his runaway slave. The Letter to the Romans (A.D. 58), the last and longest of Paul’s letters, teaches that both Jews and Gentiles have equal need for the justice* of God to be revealed to them in Christ; it teaches that faith* is what gives access to the benefits of this revelation*, that the death and Resurrection of Jesus have brought freedom* (liberation from sin*, from death, and from law*) and make life possible according to the Spirit, that the rejection of the gospel by Israel is neither total nor definitive, that the tensions between “strong” and “weak” in the community may find a resolution inspired by the pattern of the future reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles.

b) Gospels and Acts of the Apostles. The first three Gospels are called “synoptic” because it is possible to draw parallels among their respective versions on the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus. The patristic tradition’s claims that the four Evangelists were eyewitnesses to the events they were relating are not, in all likelihood, very plausible. The Evangelists most probably worked on the basis of written traditions and perhaps oral ones. Writing shortly before or shortly after the destruction of the Second Temple (A.D. 70), and within a climate of imminent or present persecution, Mark was the first one to make use of the traditions that reported on the teaching of Jesus (including parables*, controversies, and proverbs), on his healing* powers, and on his Passion*. Mark gives his writings the form of an unbroken narrative, in which Jesus appears as a master, a healer, and a suffering Messiah*. The narrative stops suddenly at 16:8. In 16:9–20, the Gospel of Mark is an abstract of some accounts of ap-partitions borrowed from the other Gospels (second century). In about A.D. 90 Matthew and Luke seem to have made use (independently of each other) of the Gospel of Mark, a collection of logia or “pronouncements” by Jesus called the Q Source (from the German Quelle, or “source”), and some other traditions.

Matthew tries to show to his community, where the Judeo-Christian element was dominant, that God’s promises to Israel have been realized with the coming of Jesus, and that it is the permanent presence of Christ that henceforth must found the existence of the people of God.

Luke addresses his Gospel (and the Acts of the Apostles) to Theophilus (meaning “friend of God”), who may have been either a real person or a typical reader. For the use of Gentile Christians, Luke presents the ministry* of Jesus (prophet, martyr, and role model) as a new era in the history of salvation*, and the Twelve Apostles as the link between Jesus and the Church* led by the Spirit.

John brings in a chronology and different characters; he puts long speeches in Jesus’ mouth. This fourth Gospel is the outcome of a whole process in the Johannine “school,” bearing the traces of independent sources, including the hymn of John 1:1–18, a series of seven “signs,” the farewell speech, and the Passion narrative. The moment when the Christian Jews were expelled from the synagogues was perhaps the opportunity to write it up in its final version (see Jn 9:22, 12:42, and 16:2). The essential mission* of the Johannine Jesus is to reveal his divine Father*. Far from being a defeat, the cross represents the exaltation of Jesus, the “hour” toward which all his life and all his teaching were aiming, the beginning of eternal life for the believers.

The Acts of the Apostles is a continuation of the Gospel of Luke and is by the same author. Acts is devoted to the activities of Peter* and Paul, and relates the spreading of the gospel from Jerusalem* to Rome* under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Luke has a tendency to idealize the life of the Christian community and presents a portrait of Paul that is different from the one found in Paul’s own letters. Luke wants to show that, in spite of the opposition to which they are subjected by the Jews and the pagans, the Christians do not represent a political threat for the Romans, and they never ceased to be guided by the Spirit.

c) Deutero-Pauline Letters. There are six letters that are traditionally attributed to Paul, but whose attribution is contested to varying degrees. The historical context of these letters is from around the year 100. Their authors—admirers, or perhaps disciples, of Paul—wished to keep his spirit alive and to respond to new situations in the way he would have done so himself, or in the way he ought to have responded, according to them. Pseudepigraphy was, at the time, a common and accepted practice.

The Second Letter to the Thessalonians recommends caution regarding the speculations on the Parousia* and their consequences on the evaluation of human activity. The Letter to the Colossians stresses the unique fulfillment of the new life that only Christ can bring to us. The Letter to the Ephesians, which assimilated the substance of the Letter to the Colossians, develops the main Pauline themes and sets forth the designs of God: the Gentiles are now part of the people of God, in equal terms with the Judeo-Christians, in a quasi-preexistent Church. The Pastoral Epistles (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus) give instructions on ecclesiastical life and discipline, and exhort the Christians to practice the virtues* that are appropriate for good citizens of the Roman Empire.

d) Other Letters. Intended for the Judeo-Christians who lose their courage, the Letter to the Hebrews has as its main themes Christ as grand priest, the perfect effectiveness of his sacrificial death, and the celestial cult* thus established. Strangers and travelers on earth, Christians have in Jesus a chief and a guide for their pilgrimage*.

The universal, or catholic, letters have titles that associate them with apostles' names, but in all likelihood these are borrowed pseudonyms. Of these, James's Epistle gives practical instructions for everyday life and warns against a radical interpretation of the Pauline doctrine, which would enhance faith to the detriment of good works. The First Letter of Peter is concerned with the social alienation of the Christians of Asia Minor, who have come from paganism*, and reminds them of their dignity as chosen people. Jude stigmatizes the perversion that turns the gift of God's grace* into license to such an extent as renouncing Christ. The Second Letter of Peter declares that the Parousia will come in due time, and implies that the faithful were misled by a wrong interpretation of the Pauline doctrine.

The three Letters of John reflect the history of the Johannine community, which a split over the matter of the humanity of Jesus seems to have torn apart.

e) Revelation to John. This book is simultaneously epistle, prophecy, and apocalypse; it is intended for the Christians of Asia Minor at the time when the authorities wanted to force them to take part in the cult of the deified emperor, toward the end of Domitian's reign (A.D. 95–96). An author by the name of John (who does not claim to be the apostle or the evangelist) conveys a message to the seven churches of Asia. The clairvoyant uses images from Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Jewish apocalypses to urge these churches to hold out, because the victory already won by the Resurrection of Jesus will soon manifest itself to the whole world. The faithful will then live in beatitude* with Christ, the Lamb* of God, in the New Jerusalem.

The author's hostile attitude toward Rome and its representatives is totally different from the cooperative attitude recommended by Paul, the Pastoral Letters, and 1 Peter. One may wonder about the Book of Revelation's general movement: does it describe a linear process directed toward a peak, or does it keep coming back to the same events under slightly different guises? That debate is an old one; whatever the interpretation, a fundamentalist, or literal, reading does not do justice either to the historical design or to the literary strength of the work.

3. Two Testaments

The Old Testament focuses on narrating the stories of the Creation, the election of Israel, and the Exodus and conquest and on relating the service of God. The New Testament's core is Jesus' kerygma. It announces his death and his Resurrection "in conformity with the Scriptures" (1 Cor 15:3–4).

a) Fulfillment. The authors of the New Testament all had in common the certainty that the promises of the Jewish Scriptures had been fulfilled in Jesus Christ (Scripture*, fulfillment of). Speaking of "fulfillment" does not imply in the least the end or the revocation of the Old Testament. The early Christians, including those who came from paganism, considered the Old Testament to be still valid in its scope as God's Word*.

Considered this way, Jesus is the new Moses, the mediator of the New Covenant, the long-awaited Davidic king. With his coming, the Holy Spirit has finally spread.

There is no book in the New Testament that is not saturated with references to or borrowings from the Scriptures (e.g., Is 61:1–2 is cited in Lk 4:18–19), that does not reuse Old Testament metaphors (the Royal Pastor in Jer 23 and Ez 34 is used in Jn 10), that does not use Old Testament stylistic devices, such as Christ a spurting rock (1 Cor 10:4) or a new Adam* (Rom 5:14). Jesus appears as the new Elijah (1 Kgs 17:17–24; Lk 7:11–17; 2 Kgs 4:42–44; and Mt 14:13–21), as Wisdom dispensing life (Prv 8:22, 9:1–6 and Jn 6), as the Creator (Gn 1:1–5 and Jn 1:1–18), and as the just one condemned and rehabilitated, according to the pattern of the plaintive Psalms, in the Passion narratives (notably, the use of Ps 22 in Mt 26–27).

New contents are assigned to such venerable Old Testament terms as law, justice, and life because "at many times and in many ways, God spoke to our fathers by the prophets, but in these last days he has spoken to us by his Son" (Heb 1:1–2).

The structure of fulfillment is well attested within the Old Testament proper. In it God is seen fully involved in human history*, being faithful to his Word, which is in command of this history. The New Testament has merely radicalized what the Old Testament had always done. To that effect, a key period of the Old Testament has served as a model to the New Testament. The sixth-century exile and the return from exile were indeed interpreted as a new exodus, a repeat of that founding moment when the people of Israel, liberated from Egypt, entered the Promised Land. The first Christians lived their experience as a renewal of the same type, even though there was no common measure between their circumstances and the preceding ones.

Some of the aspects of the Jewish Scriptures were, however, considered unsuitable for the novelty of proclaiming Our Lord Jesus as sole authority. The Law started to be reinterpreted (Mt 5–7, Gal, and Rom). A contrast was emphasized, through which the new prevailed over the old (Heb 8:8–13, 9:15, and 12:24). Designating the Jewish Scriptures under the name of Old Testament, or Old Covenant (2 Cor 3:14; see also 2 Cor 3:6), became common toward the end of the second century (Melito of Sardis in Eusebius, HE, 4, 26, 14). The Christian interpretation thereafter oscillated between two poles: continuity and discontinuity.

b) Interaction. A certain consciousness of problems of terminology raised by the expressions Old Testament and New Testament becomes manifest today. The pejorative connotation of the word old, when it tends to mean "outdated," is being felt. As for the word testament, it no longer has any connection, as far as we are concerned, with the notion of the Covenant. To talk about "Jewish Scriptures," as has been suggested, runs the risk of neglecting the Deuterocanonicals, which, though completely Jewish, even when written first in Greek, are absent from the Jewish Bible. Other designations have been tried, such as "First Testament" (an ancient solution was prius Testamentum, but this has never been adopted for good). However, neither second in relation to first, nor new in relation to old has any chance of being accepted. In any case, the usage has not changed much.

It is at a deeper level that the question of the Christian attitude toward the revelation transmitted by Old Israel arises. In the second century, Marcion proposed the elimination of the Old Testament. It has always been maintained, however, in the Christian Bible. How is it to be understood? Is it a collection of religious writings to be read for their own sake? Is it there in preparation for learning the gospel, or is it merely a necessary prerequisite for understanding the New Testament?

Christians, of course, have to read the Old Testament by piecing together, with the help of history, the author's communication with his contemporaries, which amounts, at least as a first step, to not referring him immediately to the New Testament or to the Christian faith. Other readers will be sensitive to the human and religious values of the texts, as well as to the literary genius of the authors. But since, to a lesser degree, the Christian Bible is not exactly the same whether the Deuterocanonicals books are included in it or not, the presence, beside the Old Testament, of the New Testament, cannot be without impact on our reading of the former.

- P. Beauchamp (1976), L'un et l'autre Testament, vol. 1: Essai de lecture, Paris.
- P. Grelot (Ed.) (1976), Introduction à la Bible, vol. 3: Introduction critique au Nouveau Testament, Tournai-Paris.
- J.D.G. Dunn (1977), Unity and Diversity in the New Testament, London (2nd Ed., 1990).
- R.N. Soulen (1981), Handbook of Biblical Criticism, 2nd Ed., Atlanta.
- J.A. Fitzmeyer (1982), A Christological Catechism: New Testament Answers, Ramsey (2nd Ed. 1991).
- N. Frye (1982), The Great Code: The Bible and Literature, New York-London.
- H. Koester (1982), Introduction to the New Testament, Philadelphia.
- R. Rendtorff (1983), Das Alte Testament: Eine Einführung, Neukirchen-Vluyn.
- P. Beauchamp (1987), Parler d'Écritures saintes, Paris.
- G. Jospovici (1988), The Book of God: A Response to the Bible, New Haven-London.
- N. Lohfink (1989), Der niemals gekündigte Bund, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- P. Beauchamp (1990), L'un et l'autre Testament, vol 2: Accomplir les Écritures, Paris.
- R.E. Brown (1990), Responses to 101 Questions on the Bible, Mahwah, N.J.
- R.E. Brown, J.A. Fitzmyer, R.E. Murphy (Ed.) (1990), The New Jerome Biblical Commentary, Englewood Cliffs, N.J.
- J. Reumann (1991), Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought, Oxford-New York.
- B. S. Childs (1992), Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments, Minneapolis.
- R.E. Brown (1994), Introduction to the New Testament Christology, London.
- C.-B. Amphoux, J. Margain (Ed.) (1996), Les premières traditions de la Bible (coll. "Histoire du texte biblique," no. 2), Lausanne.
- R. Dupont-Roc, P. Mercier (1997), Les manuscrits de la Bible et la critique textuelle, Paris.

RICHARD J. CLIFFORD AND DANIEL J. HARRINGTON

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Apocrypha; Book; Canon of Scriptures; Exegesis; History; Intertestament; Jesus, Historical; Johannine Theology; Judaism; Law and Christianity; Literary Genres in Scripture; Myth; Narrative; Pauline Theology; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Scripture, Senses of; Tradition; Translations of the Bible, Ancient

Biblical Theology

Introduction

Biblical theology: this expression might seem like a pleonasm in Christianity; and yet, biblical theology does have its own mission to fulfill: to give a rational account of the outward way Christian faith* is expressed today, to evaluate how faithful it is to biblical writings, and to rejuvenate this fidelity. Exegesis* and theology* are not reducible to one another: biblical theology's function is to articulate them with each other. The problem is an old one: "Will we reach the point of being unable to do anything without you?" (ut tu solus necessarius videaris), wrote the bishop*-theologian Augustine* (PL 22, letter 104) to the exegete Jerome. Biblical theology does not have its own definite boundaries in academia. The majority of endeavors in biblical theology do not show under that field's label. The most recognizable form, with a didactic end, is called either "theology of the Old Testament," or "theology of the New Testament." A theology of the two Testaments is called upon to show what kind of connection unites them. We will adopt here the latter perspective. A farthermost goal, yet an old one.

In 1956, R. de Vaux wrote that a biblical theology "founded on both Testaments" is "the final outcome of our studies" (ZAW 68, 225). In 1960, G. von Rad considered that a biblical theology that "will overcome the dualism" between a treatment of the "arbitrarily separated" Old Testament and New Testament is "the still more distant aim of our efforts." In 1962, P. Grelot presented his Sens chrétien de l'Ancien Testament as an "outline" (see P. Beauchamp, L'un et l'autre Testament: Essai de Lecture, 1976).

No one underestimates the difficulties. The final aim, which gives value to partial attempts and unites scholars, relies on a fact. The first bearers of the biblical books* are the communities of observant Jews for the Old Testament, and Christians for both Testaments. From the beginning, these communities bring together both knowledge* and faith*, on account of the fact they are assembled for celebration (liturgy*) around the Book. This reading is articulated with preaching*, instruction, and prayer*. If it works well, then biblical theology will also. At the same time, the Bible not being the exclusive property of any group, the language the believers use about it must be intelligible to all. Biblical theology teaches how to abandon prejudice, verifies whether the presuppositions given by doctrine bear fruit or not: there is nothing there to isolate the discipline.

1. Problem of the Unity of the Bible

The project of a biblical theology, thus conceived, presupposes that the notion of a unity of the Bible is acceptable; but then, that notion is not purely and simply imposed from the outside by the limits of the canon*: rather, it is a notion that has presided over the phases of its composition, and it has even left some traces. The Bible is often called a "library rather than a book." This pedagogical formula should not replace one kind of naivety with another. Commentators discover in the Old Testament a "library" where certain books communicate with each other because writers and editors have attempted to harmonize them.

If we detect these transversal interventions, it is thanks to the commentators: "deuteronomistic revisions" (e.g., prophecy*-fulfillment), "sacerdotal resumptives" (covenants of Noah and Abraham), repetition of the kings' story by the Chronicler (the lineage Adam-Moses-David), narrative thread of the Gospels* linking units previously independent of one another, and so forth. Other processes are less artificial: narrative surveys, summaries such as those that von Rad called "Credos"; globalizations: "all the prophets*" (Jer 7:25, 28:8; Ez 38:17; 2 Chr 6:15); repetition of Isaiah and of all the revelations* of the past in the "Deutero-Isaiah" (Is 41:22, 43:8-13, 44:7); or summaries in the latest Wisdom* literature: Wisdom 10:1-11:4; Sirach 44-49. It was necessary, when going from age to age, that the heavy mass bequeathed by previous generations should be made "portable" and readily remembered. The sustained series of resumptives is indicative of the fact diversity was welcome. Finally, and above all, there is the same function in the New Testament, which is "also a theology of the Old Testament" (E. Jacob 1968): a claim to fulfill "law and prophets" (Mt 5:17), a recourse to "all the Scriptures*" (Lk 18:31; see also Lk 24:44; Acts 3:18; Jn 19:28, etc.).

One learns thus that there is no appropriation of the Bible by one community without those risky shortcuts that have recurred at every stage and continue to do so today. The phase of deconstruction is not invalidated for that. It contributed to the discovery of multiple meanings (Clavier 1976) by using instruments that lose their effectiveness in one particular direction: why, then, should one be surprised that they do not lead toward it? In matters of faithfulness to a certain heritage (here, a cultural and spiritual genealogy), faith is not the only approach in which interpreting is equivalent to making a choice.

It has been said that the Bible, as a literary work, has no center. That is no longer valid if it is considered the basic book for all communities. Celebrations of Easter or of Atonement, catechesis*, and preaching order ways of interpreting. Biblical theology is not free, for instance, to turn away from the account of Christ's Passover* to Israel*'s Passover, nor is it free to elude the confrontation between Paul and the law* of Moses. Granted that Christ's cross is the center of both Testaments, the paths that are opened are numerous.

The concept of unity (one of the names of transcendence) crumbles if unity is accomplished by smoothing over the outlines of what is being assembled. This applies to all levels, but above all to the line (union and separation) that goes in between the two testaments. Within each one, the tensions are not all loaded with equal meaning.

The pair Law/Prophets is signaled by the canonical form of the book, said to be at once unified and divided. The multiple transversal interventions show what is done between these two areas (Deuteronomy between Law and Prophets). A third one (Writings, Psalms, and Wisdoms) bears the words of man (unrevealed experience, questions, requests) whereas Law and Prophets bear the Word* of God.

The poles are there only to help toward an exchange in movement. Let us note here that the Old Testament can and must be considered first within its own perimeter, whereas the New Testament can in no case be understood without the former.

2. Biblical Theology and the Sciences

The critical requirements concern the state of the text, its circumstances, and the conditions of its production. Efforts expended in these areas open up, in terms of the search for meaning, a space that is not always occupied; but biblical theology cannot rush immediately into it. Criteria must be found in a reflection of a philosophical nature. Assuming, said Augustine, that I can get to Moses, "how would I know that he is saying the truth?" (Confessions XI. iii. 5). The Bible, wrote M-J. Lagrange in 1904, "depends no more exclusively on history* than it does on philosophy*" (La Méthode historique, xv); this is a way of saying that, separated from one another, neither history (taken as encompassing all the sciences of man), nor philosophy can sus-tain theology. In that very same year, Maurice Blondel published his essay "Histoire et dogme: Les lacunes philosophiques de l'exégèse moderne," in La Quinzaine, 1904 (repr. in Blondel's OC 2, Paris, 1997).

Given below is only a brief outline of the principal itineraries possible.

a) Language. "The grammatical is the theological" (Primo grammatica videamus, verum ea theologica), declares Luther* at the opening of the 1519 Operationes in Psalmos (Jena Ed., 1600). The very first step of biblical theology consists in going to concepts through the paths of words, those of the biblical Hebrew and Greek, an indispensable path to the feeling of cultural unfamiliarity and the reclassifying of ideas. G. Kittel (Tübingen) is the author of the best-known work on the Greek words of the New Testament; these words are preceded by the treatment of their usage in their environment and in the Old Testament (ThWNT: 1933–73).

Invited to write a few pages in Kittel's work (1964), Cardinal A. Bea hailed it as "the most important achievement of contemporary Protestant exegesis in the entire world," and he also expressed the wish that some day a single author would do the same thing, "in the same spirit" for both Testaments. He remarked, in passing, on the "undeniable inconvenience" of separating them in their teaching. From another viewpoint, J. Barr had already expressed some scathing criticisms of this work, among which the following: "The nonreligious language of the Bible has as much theological importance [emphasis added] as its religious language" (The Semantics of Biblical Language, Oxford, 1961).

Since then, Kittel's work has been followed by other glossaries (for the Old Testament, Botterweck and Ringgren, ThWAT, 1973–). There are innumerable studies on "themes" (with a more or less complex lexical content) that supply us with the components of a biblical theology.

b) Literary Form. The study of literary form has asserted its rights since Richard Simon, who blamed the theologians, in 1678, for "not having done sufficient thinking on the different manners of speaking about the Scripture" (Critical History III, 21). He recognized that setting this point straight is a way of sparing theology from making errors, but it does not sustain it: the grammarians "do explain the history of the Old Testament, but they do not contribute to a better knowledge of religion" (III, 8). This "way" of talking comes from society* (the "Republic of the Hebrews"). The mid-18th-century book by Bishop R. Lowth (1710–87), De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum Praelectiones (Oxford, 1753), is an achievement that stands out in history: it suggests a purely stylistic study of the Bible and expresses reservations regarding theologiae sacraria (Praelectio II). That particular work influenced J.G. Herder (1744–1803), a humanist, philosopher, and preacher who attached importance to the value of esthetics in enhancing knowledge, and who refused to put poetry and truth* in opposition to each other. H. Gunkel (1862–1932), founder of the Gattungsgeschichte (history of literary* genres, also called Formgeschichte), inherited the same spirit. He aimed at selecting the most archaic spots of enunciation (preliterary), but also at recognizing, with the Sitz Im Leben (life-situation) of textual units, the communicative contracts to which their forms (preliterary or literary) belonged. Already “the work’s intention” tends to supplant “the author’s intention.” This method occupies an intermediate position between linguistics and the social sciences. Today exegesis more distinctly perceives that the message of faith is entrusted also to the sensitivity of the addressee, thanks to images, rhythms, and symbols, and thanks as well to the power of representation radiated by a narrative*. An esthetic theology (beauty*) was thus launched.

c) Social Sciences. The Formgeschichte scarcely inquired into the social body: progress in this direction is a challenge of present research, triangulated around the individual body, the social body, and words. Formerly dominated by history, the position of the social sciences has gradually been reversed, and from there, these sciences can be raised to a higher level through an exploration of the “mystery of society” (G. Fessard), enlightened by the Bible and enlightening it in return.

1) The theme of covenant* comes not only under the comparatist’s domain (political treaties in the ancient Near East), but also under the theory of contracts in a philosophy* of law that contributes to the intelligibility of history. 2) The internal and external relations of Israel went through successive phases leading to the phase of the first church*, whose social model concerns the Bible (political theology*). 3) History is interested not only in change, but also in long periods. The history of Israel is that of a culture. The Word* could not become flesh in man unless it existed in a culture: therefore, biblical theology records the significance of that concept.

3. Shifts in Biblical Theology

a) Beginnings. “Far from being a novelty, biblical theology was the original form of theology” (F. Prat 1907). The allocution form (sermons, apologies, catecheses) is dominant. The nascent biblical theology was relaying the dialogue between the gospel and the Old Testament. It was not only a matter of legitimizing the social status of a religion, nor was it merely a strategy or an expedient to convince or to defend oneself. It was meant to renew in oneself “the constant passage, thanks to Christ, from the Old Testament to the New Testament,” in which Origen* (†253–54) saw, with reason, “a fundamental characteristic of Christianity, and somehow its birth certificate forever being renewed in people’s minds” (H. de Lubac*, Histoire et Esprit, 1950). This passage is renewed because the depth of its origins signifies its constant presence.

Passage: this word allows a choice among several meanings: continuity, progress, leap, and at the limit, rupture. The fact that this passage is “constant” means, in any case, that the point of arrival never exhausts the resources of the point of departure. Irenaeus* (†195), facing the awe-inspiring arguments of Marcionism*, had honored the notion of pedagogy, in continuity. When Trinitarian (Trinity*) theology assumed its full importance, it needed the space of both Testaments to present itself according to the economy of revelation: “The Old Testament manifested the Father*, the Son (filiation*) more obscurely. The New Testament manifested the Son and allowed a glimpse of the divinity of the Holy* Spirit. Today, the Spirit is among us and it lets itself be known more clearly” (Gregory* of Nazianzus, PG 36, 161).

Being a determining factor for the theological use of the Bible, this relationship between obscurity and clarity gets various treatments. It is the simple relationship of the visible to the invisible, of the terrestrial to the celestial; or it is the disclosure of the meaning of a first obscure event, thanks to the impact of a subsequent event. That later event is the coming of Christ, to whom the eyes owe their healing*: the range of meanings in the Scriptures (Scripture*, senses of) fluctuates among these orientations. A point of capital importance, the theme of obscurity is rooted in the gospel itself: the parables* are obscure; the eyes and the heart* are blind, even to the life of Jesus*, and finally to the whole Scripture (Mt 13:15, 13:34 f.).

b) Theology As Science. When the Middle Ages made it their task to have a theology that would be a real discipline, there was an obstacle; it was brought about by the poetic writing of the Bible, which constituted an obstacle to the systematic expression of truth. Thomas* Aquinas’s Summa Theologica faced that obstacle; and it was eventually overcome with the help of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite. Precisely because they are the “lowest” (infima) forms of knowledge, images and representations are the best suited to lead to such a high level of knowledge that it is above our understanding (ST Ia, q. 1, a. 9, ad 3). The esthetics that cares for figures of style is therefore welcome right away, but it is a secondary principle that passes on its style to the doctrine: the Bible formulates in the literal sense all the truths that are necessary to faith (Ia, q. 1, a. 10, ad 1). By this, Aquinas refers to that which is “necessary to exhibit it without error” (fides quae).

c) Turning Point of the Reformation. The Renaissance introduced an entirely new form of obscurity, first with more requirements in philology, and gradually with less credulity in matters of history. Tradition* no longer being received in the same capacity as the Bible as a source of revelation, the clarity of the Scriptures (perspicuitas), which tradition had obscured, was asserted. Out of this came simultaneously: an unprecedented new energy allowing for a maximum of critical certainty, and a strong intensity of theological investment in exegesis. As a theologian, Luther maintained that the opposition of Law and gospel (Gesetz und Evangelium), already present in the Old Testament, did not disappear from the New. His method was not typological: faith opens directly the words of the Old Testament to their Christic meaning. Distrusting allegories as Luther had done, Calvin* gave more importance to typology, a mode of reading that recognizes in the realities of the Old Testament a veiled presence of the Christian mystery*. A new crisis eventually occurred, with the questioning of the credibility* of the Scriptures as historical document.

d) Richard Simon and Pascal. With the Histoire critique du Vieux Testament (1678, 5th Ed. 1685), Richard Simon (see 2 b above) opened debates with the Protestants. He denied that the Scriptures were clear, and he was pleased to see that tradition was trying to find a cure for their obscurity. Pascal* (†1662) had placed the discussion on a different field. The Pensées are what Pascal left of a project centered on biblical theology: he used, in writing them, the style of an allocution, which had been used in very early works of theology; he assembled notations on the biblical “manners” of speaking, deductive reasoning leading to decision making, a Christian anthropology*, and hermeneutics* inspired by the gospel. The obscurity of the prophecies, of rhetorical figures, and of Jesus’ miracles*, can be clarified only with a change occurring in the heart* that they had previously disturbed: everything takes a meaning in the “order of charity.” Inclined to take too much advantage of the miseries of man, with a view to convincing him, Pascal was indifferent to the historical problems raised by Richard Simon; he nonetheless succeeded in bringing about a revival of the old hermeneutics for use in the modern age.

e) Liberal Exegesis and Theologies. In fact, the gap between the scholars’ interests within Protestantism* was increasing. Scholars studying history and science would be the first to show a greater creativity, which would emancipate them to varying degrees from a theology less than sensitive to biblical modality (it had become closer to it, e.g., with J. Cocceius; see covenant*). J.-P. Gabler (1787, in Strecker 1975) stands out for assigning separate titles to two theologies, the biblical and the dogmatic*. The object of the latter is to “philosophize on divine matters,” but as far as biblical theology is concerned, there is no suggestion that it should philosophize: it belongs to the realm of history, and is supposed to teach “the thoughts of holy writers of the past on matters of a divine character” (ibid., p. 35). The tendency of this type of biblical theology made it impossible to distinguish it from the history of religions. In a university where theology never lost its place, it appealed to some philosophers (such as Schleiermacher*, then Hegel*), detached from dogma*, but more open to religious matters than the philosophers of the Enlightenment. From the 19th to the 20th century, the task to be accomplished involved recognizing the stalemates of liberalism and collecting the benefits associated with it. J. Wellhausen (1844–1918), a writer and researcher of exceptional brilliance, extremely productive in history but increasingly unfamiliar with theology, went far in his separation of the two Testaments. The Old Testament is, in his opinion, the account of decadence, starting from beginnings that had been brilliant, and the gospel serves above all as an internal norm for human beings. For A. Harnack (1851–1930), a prominent figure in erudite liberal circles, the churches show their paralysis by delaying their separation from the Old Testament: the very same reasons that had led the church, when it faced Marcionism*, to accept the Old Testament, should lead the church of today to dissociate itself from it. The propensity (which had its political implications) to see in the variety of cultures separate essences lends further weight to the “Athens versus Jerusalem*” stereotype. Because of the specialization of disciplines, focus is on the respective environments of the Old and of the New Testaments rather than on what connects them. A. Schweitzer (1875–1965), musicologist, physician, exegete, and writer, celebrated 150 years of “The Lives of Jesus” by concluding: “We have the right to detach Jesus from his period” (Das Messianitäts- und Leidensge- heimnis: Eine Skizze des Lebens Jesu, 1901, 3rd Ed. 1956, Tübingen), because his expectation of an end to the world, the key to his biography, cannot be repeated. The secret of his life is his heroic fidelity to the oracles of the Servant*. We have to join him through a decision “of will to will.” Elaborated away from dogma*, in a sort of semi-rupture with liberalism, Schweitzer’s contribution counts.

f) Renaissance of Protestant Theology. His contribution counts for Bultmann* (1884–1976). With the Lutheran Bultmann and the Calvinist K. Barth* (1886–1968), we witness a Renaissance of the founders’ theology. Kierkegaard* (1813–55) had already prepared that revival. Both Bultmann and Barth agree to break away from a biblical theology, which would be reduced to mere scientific description. Bultmann, however, values it greatly. He “demythologizes” (myth*) in order to suppress this “false scandal*” that hurts the sciences* of nature, but he considers this approach of science to be merely the condition allowing it to better hold to “the true scandal of faith” (P. Ricœur). He understands this faith according to Luther, in a doctrine of a vigorous economy. His concept of the connection between decision and knowledge lies within the framework that he finds in Heidegger*. His theology of the New Testament explores Paul and John in particular: “He does not take sufficiently into account the synoptic tradition” (Conzelmann). Correlatively, the function of the narration (narrative* theology) is severely reduced in his works. The Old Testament is necessary only to show that since man is accountable to the Law, he is also in a position to be accountable to the gospel. The synoptic narrative fades away in favor of the kerygma. Even Kant* gives more importance to factors affecting sensibility and to esthetics. The primacy of charity receives its rightful place, but its ecclesial forms are not theologically relevant. Bultmann’s itinerary as a theologian starts with exegesis. As for Barth, he is an exegete only when it comes to theology. His commentary on Romans aims to bring out “the concepts’ internal tension” present in the text (Römerbrief, 2nd Ed. 1922), and even if it means “being severely blamed,” it also means striving to go to the “very core of the enigma rather than merely be content with the document. . . . I am absolutely overwhelmed by the desire to do so!” (ibid.). At a considerable remove from Bultmann, his reading of the Old Testament is truly christological. He dismisses allegory, but he occasionally practices an audacious typology (KD III/1: Christ and the Church Read in Genesis 2). This work, rich and vigorous, involved in the tragedies of that time, has been given dimensions that are in proportion to the Bible itself. Always under the authority of the absolute alternatives, its perspective is not hermeneutic.

g) Old Testament As Opening Point. Instead of revealing the “truths” of the Old Testament, G. von Rad (1957, 1960) prefers to classify its “traditions,” which are superimposed and combined versions of history. Their relevance for biblical theology is not their objective content, but the beliefs (the Credos) they encourage on the gracious gift; he orders each version around his declaration or kerygma, in sequence, and he infers the ritual setting (Sitz im Leben). That is how the capacity for “creative reinterpretation” of the narrative is measured in the Old Testament, and how much appeal the book will have in the future. Von Rad can conclude: the reinterpretation of the Old Testament by the New is radical, but interdependent with a series, which invites the theologian to rethink the problem of the unity of the Testaments. This work, which is in Bultmann’s sphere of influence, has been judged hardly sensitive to the radical discontinuities (Conzelmann 1964). Its repeated defense of typology, even if it gives few examples of it, has met with reservations. On the other hand this work, for not having highlighted wisdom and apocalyptic* writings, has drawn the criticism (Pannenberg) of giving too narrow a basis to a Christology* that wants to be coextensive to the duration of the universe, a basis that the Old Testament should have supplied. Any biblical theology reopens questions on the connection between the carnal fact and the Word*.

h) Catholic Exegesis Today. It often presents, in its task, the deficit and the advantage of a smaller theological investment. “The study of the Holy Scripture must be like the soul of theology”: this maxim from Vatican* II (DV 6, 24) reinforces a wish expressed by Benedict XV (1920, EnchB 483), who quoted Leo XIII (1893, ibid., 114). In spite of the obvious character of this maxim, practicing it is not easy. The norms of the magisterium* that were most noticed in modern times have more than once restrained the fruitfulness of exegesis, but their bearing was exercised more often on the narrative than directly on biblical theology. Present-day biblical theology gets its material in several ways. First of all, through living tradition, including through the spiritual writers, old and recent, that are closest to the biblical source. The renewal of interest for patristic literature (SC 1942–) will sooner or later benefit exegesis, inasmuch as the exercise of hermeneutics teaches us to find inspiration in ancient writers without actually reproducing them. The Catholic exegetes of today are becoming more sensitive to the theological implications of the studies carried out by Protestant exegetes. Catholic exegetes have often evaluated the works of their Protestant counterparts only from the point of view of the historian. Protestant exegetes have obtained results that the Catholics could not obtain for themselves, the reason being that they did not have the freedom to push their research very far; but things having settled down for a century and a half, today's Catholic exegetes are indebted to the Protestants for their good work. Historical-critical exegesis is now incorporated for good in the norms and in the history of Catholic tradition*, and it is not fair to blame it for its limits. If those limits were better recognized, they could lead to articulate exegesis to other practices. In 1943, Pius XII (Divino Afflante Spiritu) gave biblical exegesis a place of honor that he certainly would not grant to "spiritual meaning" (Scripture*, senses of). By way of compensation, this major document contained provisions that gave it its balance: it assigned as first objective (potissimum) to exegesis the elucidation of the "theological doctrine" of the texts (EnchB 551). This directive was not what attracted the greatest attention. The object of the constitution Dei Verbum of Vatican* II (1965) was wider. It asserted the parity and the tight union between Scripture and tradition*. It further stated that "it was not only from the Scripture that the Church took its certainty on all the points of the revelation*" (DV II, 9): with this point concerning "certainty" according to faith, junction of Scripture and tradition, the field of biblical theology is defined, as well as the risks it entails. This same document enhances without fuss a typological reading (DV IV); but, on the other hand, inasmuch as "theological studies and fraternal dialogues" bring Christians and Jews closer to each other, as recommended by Nostra Aetate (1965, no. 4), biblical theology is encouraged to respect the specificity of the Old Testament and to find the spiritual scope of its "literal meaning."

• Reference Works with Extensive Bibliographies

- Dictionnaire de la Bible*. Supplement, 1928–, Paris.
 G. Strecker (Ed.) (1975), Das Problem der Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Darmstadt (collection of articles 1787–1974).
 H. Graf Reventlow (1982), Hauptprobleme der alttestamentlichen Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert, WdF 367. (English trans., London, 1985.)
 H. Graf (1983), Hauptprobleme der biblischen Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert, Darmstadt. (English trans., London, 1987.)
 R.J. Coggins, J.L. Houlden (Ed.) (1990), A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, London.

Modern Problematics

- Interpretation: Biblical Theology Bulletin* (trimestrial), Grand Rapids (1946–).
Interpretation: A Journal of Bible and Theology (trimestrial), South Orange, 1971–.

Biblical Theology: Problems and Propositions

- R. Simon (1678), Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, Paris, Rotterdam (5th Ed., 1685).
 F. Prat, "La théologie biblique et son enseignement dans les séminaires," Recrutement sacerdotal, December 1907, 1–15.
 P. Grelot (1962), Sens chrétien de l'Ancien Testament: Esquisse d'un Traité dogmatique, 2nd Ed., Paris.
 B. S. Childs (1970), Biblical Theology in Crisis, Philadelphia.
 H. J. Kraus (1970), Die biblische Theologie: Ihre Geschichte und Problematik, Neukirchen-Vluyn.
 X. Léon-Dufour (1970), Vocabulaire de théologie biblique, 2nd Ed. Paris.
 P. Beauchamp (1976), L'un et l'autre Testament: Essai de lecture, Paris.
 H. Clavier (1976), Les variétés de la pensée biblique et le problème de son unité, Leyden.
 P. Beauchamp (1982), "Théologie biblique," in B. Lauret, F. Re-foulé (Ed.), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, vol. 1: Introduction, 185–232, Paris; (1990), L'un et l'autre Testament, vol. 2: Accomplir les Écritures, Paris; (1992), "Accomplir les Écritures. Un chemin de théologie biblique," RB 99, 132–62.
 N. Lohfink (1993), Studien zur biblischen Theologie, Stuttgart.
 P. Ricœur, A. Lacocque (1998), Penser la Bible, Paris.

Old Testament Theologies

- W. Eichrodt (vol. 1, 1933; vol. 2, 1935; vol. 3, 1939), Theologie des Alten Testaments, Leipzig.
 G. von Rad (1957), Theologie des Alten Testaments, vol. 1: Die Th. der geschichtlichen Überlieferungen Israels; (1960), vol. 2: Die Th. der prophetischen Überlieferungen Israels, Munich.
 E. Jacob (1968), Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2nd Ed., Neuchâtel.
 G. Botterweck, H. Ringgren (Ed.) Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament (ThWAT), (1973–, 8 vols. published in 1997) (English trans., Grand Rapids, 1974–.)
 R. Rendtorff (1983), Vorarbeiten zu einer Theologie des Alten Testaments, Neukirchen-Vluyn. (English trans., 1994.)
 C. R. Seitz (1997), The Old Testament As Abiding Theological Witness, Grand Rapids-Cambridge.

New Testament Theologies

- M. Meinertz (1950), Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Bonn.
 H. Conzelmann (1967), Grundriss der Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Munich.
 R. Bultmann (1968), Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 5th Ed., Tübingen. (English trans., London, 1965.)
 J. Jeremias (1971), Neutestamentliche Theologie, vol. 1: Die Verkündigung Jesu, Gütersloh.
 L. Goppelt (1975, 1976), Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 2 vols.
 For additional bibliographic references see Scriptures, Senses of.

PAUL BEAUCHAMP

See also Bible; Canon of Scriptures; Exegesis; Hermeneutics; History; Holy Scripture; Jesus, Historical; Johannine Theology; Literary Genres in Scripture; Narrative; Narrative Theology; Pauline Theology; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Scripture, Senses of

Biel, Gabriel. See Nominalism

Bishop

1. New Testament

a) Definitions. There are five different usages of the word episkopos in the New Testament. It is the title of Jesus Christ* in 1 Peter 2:25, and it designates Christians in charge of a ministry* of vigilance in Acts 20:28; Philippians 1:1; 1 Timothy 3:2; and Titus 1:7. In Ephesus, the expression is used for elders designated by the Holy* Spirit as pastors* of the Church* of God* (Acts 20:28).

This term, which was already secular in the Septuagint, was borrowed from the profane Greek, and that does not exclude the influence of the synagogal model, which sees the arkhisunagôgos being assisted by the huperetès, like the episcopate being assisted by the deacons*. The influence of the mebaqquer of Qumran on the origins of the episcopate does not seem plausible.

b) Episcopate. In charge of a local church*, the bishops are distinct from the apostles*, prophets* and doctors*—itinerant and charismatic—and also from the deacons, their collaborators. On the other hand, it is not possible to distinguish them in any other way than through the vocabulary of the presbyterium who occupy the same functions in communities that are more Judeo-Christian (Acts 20:17 and 28 place them in the same category). They are always mentioned in the plural (the singular of 1 Tm 3:2 and Ti 1:7 is generic, like presbuteros in 1 Tm 5:1). They are also presidents (Rom 12:8; 1 Thes 5:12; 1 Tm 5:17) and pastors (Eph 4:11).

In the Pastorals, the episcopate is being entrusted with the teaching ministry regarding prophets and doctors (1 Tm 3:2: didaktikos, 4:11, 6:2; Ti 1:9), which is what Didache 15, 1–2. says explicitly. Faith is left in their custody (1 Tm 6:20; 2 Tm 1:12, 14, and 4:2; Ti 1:13). They are required (1 Tm 3:1–7) to have solid Christian qualities, a good family life (“the husband of one wife...with all dignity keeping his children submissive”) and good standing in society (“he must be well thought of by outsiders, a statement of good character from people in the community”).

2. Classical Profile of the Bishop

a) Monoepiscopate. In the Didache (98) and the writings of Clement (96?), which reflect the context of Corinth and of Rome* (and it was probably the same in Alexandria), the épiskopè is exercised collegially (1 Clem. 44, 1. 4–5). The letters of Ignatius of Antioch (110–150?) are the first clear evidence of the monoepiscopate (for Syria) and of a subordinate articulation of priests* and deacons. Monoepiscopate and tripartition of the ordained ministry are not therefore scriptural: Vatican* II mentioned tripartition as being ab antiquo (LG 28). In any event, the uniqueness of the bishop and the territoriality of his jurisdiction represent signs and safeguards regarding the actual catholicity of the eucharistic and ecclesial assembly (“Wherever the bishop appears... the Catholic Church is present,” Ignatius, Sm. 8, 2; see also Nicaea*, can. 8, COD 9–10); bishops without a well-determined seat and territory and auxiliary bishops are unknown (coadjutors are extremely rare). As for chorebishops in charge of rural districts, they would be downgraded and called presbyterium after the Peace* of the Church.

Monoepiscopate does not mean monarchical episcopate: the bishop must be elected with the support of his church; he must have the benefit of reception*, in his church as well as from his colleagues, in order to keep his office. As attested by Cyprian*, he deals with his colleagues, but also with his people* (Ep 14, 4; 34, 4).

b) Election. Election is necessary, but it is not sufficient for obtaining the office: also needed is the laying* on of hands of all the bishops of the region (at least three, Nicaea, can. 4, COD 7), which is accompanied, for the ordained, by the gift of the Holy* Spirit.

c) Apostolic Succession. Clement (1 Clem. 44, 2–4) invokes already the rule of the apostolic* succession. Irenaeus* (180) reproduces the Roman list, which comes from Hegesippus (150?). Peter* is not mentioned at the top of the list, because bishops do not take the place of the apostles* and they only in part succeed them; the succession is not established according to the uninterrupted chain of the laying on of hands, but according to the presidency of a local* church, which expresses the link uniting the apostolic faith* of all and the apostolic ministry of a few.

Succession lists—which later on would start with the mention of the founding apostle—were established everywhere (Antioch, Alexandria, etc.) according to the same principles.

d) President of the Local Church and Link with the Catholic Communion. Established symbolically by the whole group of his colleagues, the local bishop represents, in his church, the faith and the communion of all the Church. He is thus ordained to preside over the service of the word* and of the sacraments* (baptism*, Eucharist*, reconciliation). Both elected and received, simultaneously, by his church, he can represent it in its relationship with all the others. He is the link par excellence of the ecclesial communion*. This provides the basis for the ecclesiological weight of the regional and ecumenical councils*.

e) The Metropolitan. Established in the regional capitals, the Metropolitan also presides over the councils under his jurisdiction. Canons 4 and 6 of Nicaea (COD 7, 8–9) back his customary role (future patriarchate*), to the point that an episcopal ordination* is null and void without his consent: the sacramental power of the ordained bishop is regulated by the higher power of the ecclesial communion.

In the preceding stipulations, the Catholic bishop (or the present-day Orthodox bishop) sees the classical role of his ministry as pastor and celebrant, with the major responsibility of announcing the apostolic faith as well as the communion in his church and among the churches. Without corresponding literally to the absolute will of Jesus Christ*, this role appears, however, to be a faithful transcription of it, for which there is no prescription in spite of numerous historical vicissitudes.

3. Subsequent Evolution

In the East, Justinian imposed celibacy on the bishops (CIC (B). C 2, 25–26), who until recent times were recruited among the monks or widowers. Popular participation in the election of the bishops has survived only in Cyprus and in Antioch: the Byzantine emperors, then the czars, eliminated it elsewhere. Finally, for want of an effective primate, among other factors, the Orthodox bishops have not met in ecumenical council* since A.D. 787.

In the West, despite numerous holy bishops, and attempts at reform in capite et in membris, the vicissitudes of the episcopate were much more serious following its integration into feudal structures, then later into those of the ancien régime. In spite of the general law, political authorities quite often controlled the election of bishops; they were even able to get the right to do so by obtaining a concordat from Francis I. The Germanic principalities and the Italian peninsula during the Renaissance witnessed the gravest kinds of abuses: holding more than one bishopric, failing to reside in the diocese, nonordained bishops (because of the split between order and jurisdiction*), monopoly exercised by the nobility, lack of reaction against the Reformation. In spite of the Council of Trent*, it was only the fall of the ancien régime that brought an end to such abuses, which were still being practiced at the time.

While frequently keeping an episkopè that was larger than the local pastorate and was endowed with a different kind of base, the Reformation often had to reject an episcopate that was hardly credible evangelically. The German Lutherans transferred that function to the temporal authority of the prince, on the basis of praecipuum membrum ecclesiae.

4. Theology of the Episcopate after Vatican II

Completing the work of Vatican* I, which had remained unfinished, Vatican* II presented the episcopate against the background of the communion of the local churches, by establishing its foundation on its sacramentality and to a degree renewing its relationship with the Roman primacy. Four orientations are notable:

a) Pastoral service is again at the forefront (LG 18, 1; LG 24, “the task has been entrusted to the pastors... a true service following the Scripture*”; LG 27, “to be of service”). As a consequence, the benefice system is abolished for good.

b) Sacramentally Based. Based on Jerome’s opinion (Ep. 146), the medieval thesis (P. Lombard, IV Sent. 24, PL 192, 904) according to which the episcopate distinguishes itself from the presbyterate only for a matter of jurisdiction has been corrected: “the episcopal ordination confers fulfillment of the sacrament of the order*"; furthermore, "as it confers the task of sanctifying, it also bestows that of teaching and governing" (LG 21). As matters of principle, order and jurisdiction are reunited, with orthodox theology* are rekindled, and the episcopate becomes again a full-fledged ministry: "the pastoral charge... is fully entrusted to the bishops; they should not be considered as the vicars of the Roman pontiffs, because they do exercise their own power, a power that is theirs... and that is not at all obliterated by the superior and universal authority; on the contrary, it is strengthened, reinforced, and defended by it" (LG 27).

c) Exercising the Triple Ministry of the Word, the Sacraments, and the Pastorate. Vatican II (LG 25–27) specifically states the mutual inclusion, in the episcopate, of the pastorate (organizing concept), the ministry of sacraments, and the ministry of the word*, by granting the latter a privilege: "preaching* the gospel is the first responsibility of the bishops" (LG 23).

d) Forming a College with Peter's Successor at Their Head, the Bishops Have in Their Charge the Whole Church. "The order of the bishops that succeeds the apostolic college in the magisterium* and in the pastoral government*... constitutes, in union with the Roman pontiff, its head, and never without its head, the subject of a supreme and plenary authority over the whole church" (LG 22). The institution of the episcopal conferences is strengthened by this, as well as the existence of the regional churches within the whole church. But the college as such is not empowered to act without the pope's authorization (authority*).

5. Ecumenical Requests

a) Growing Consensus Regarding the Episcopate. For the Orthodox Christians, who have only a regional primate, the relationship between bishop and pope remains a problem. The Anglican Church has kept the episcopate along with the presbyterate and the diaconate, but it hesitates to see in this a condition of the church's esse. The Lutherans officially accept entering into communion with the "historical" episcopate, but they enhance that according to their tradition*. The Reformed are more reticent. The Lima document (BEM) recommends in any case that all churches accept the episcopate, on the condition that it be linked together with collegial and synodal responsibility.

In 1982, this document, emanating from the ecumenical Faith and Constitution Commission of the Church of England (a commission of which the Catholic Church is a member), took up again a suggestion that had already been made in Lausanne in 1927: "In the constitution of the early church one finds the episcopal commission as well as the council of elders and the community of believers. Each of the three systems of church organization (episcopalism, presbyterianism, and congregationalism*) has been accepted in the past for centuries, and is still accepted by important portions of Christendom. Each of them is considered by its supporters as being essential to the church's good working order. Consequently, we consider that, under certain conditions, to be stated more clearly, the three systems will have to take their respective places simultaneously in the organization of the reunited Church" (BEM, no. 26).

b) Possible Contributions of Catholic Ecclesiology. Certain kinds of progress are possible here, as long as the divine right of the episcopate is better circumscribed and episcopocentrism is toned down by showing that the episcopate is at the service of realities that are more decisive than itself—the Holy Spirit, the gospel, the Eucharist, the people* of God (CD 11)—and by linking it in a better way with local synodality (synods* and councils). Collegiality* can become acceptable to other churches insofar as it shows that the bishops do not so much constitute "the higher governing body of the universal Church" (K. Rahner*) as the organs of communion among the local diocesan churches that make up the whole Church. Finally, the historical determinations contingent on the present relationship between primacy and episcopate (for example the direct nomination of almost all the bishops by the pope) should be recognized as such.

- H. W. Beyer, H. Karpp (1954), "Bischof," RAC 2, 394–407.
- L. Koep (1954), "Bischofsliste," ibid., 407–15.
- Y. Congar (Ed.) (1962), L'épiscopat et l'Église universelle, UnSa 39 (contributions by Y. Congar, H. Marot, C. Vogel).
- H. Legrand (1969), "Nature de l'église particulière et rôle de l'évêque," in coll., La charge pastorale des évêques, UnSa 74, 103–223.
- J. Neumann (1980), "Bischof I," TRE 6, 653–82 (bibl.).
- H. Legrand, J. Manzanares, A. Garcia (Ed.) (1988), Les conférences épiscopales: Théologie, statut canonique, avenir, CFi 149.
- R. Brown (1989–91), "Brief survey of New Testament evidence on episkopè and episkopos," in Episkopè and Episkopos in Ecumenical Perspective, FOP 102.
- The Porvoo Common Statement with Essays on Church and Ministry in Northern Europe* (1992), London.
- H. Legrand (1993), "Les ministères dans l'Église locale," in B. Lauret, F. Refoulé (Ed.), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, 3rd Ed., vol. 3, 181–285.
- J. B. d'Onorio (1994), "Nomination des évêques," in P. Levillain (Ed.), Dictionnaire historique de la papauté, Paris, 1178–83.
- H. J. Pottmeyer (1994), "Bischof," LThK 3, 2, 484–7.

HERVÉ LEGRAND

See also Apostolic Succession; Collegiality; Communion; Deacon; Local Church; Pope; Presbyter/Priest; Regional Church; Vatican II, Council of

Blessing

A. Biblical Theology

Blessing is speech endowed with power that communicates the benefits of salvation* and life. It is also a prayer* of praise and thanksgiving for benefits received.

a) Vocabulary of Blessings. Hebrew lexicons identify two groups of words with the root brk. One group is related to kneeling (from bèrèk, “knee”); the second, which is used nearly 400 times in the Old Testament, has the sense of blessing. It is found most frequently in Genesis (88 times), particularly in the story of the patriarchs, and in Psalms* (83 times), in connection with the praise of God*. The language of praise is also well represented in Deuteronomy (51 times) and to a lesser degree in the Wisdom* books, but it plays only a minor role in the books of the Prophets.

The root brk has the basic meaning of the power of life and of salvation. Associated to a very great degree with speech, it has a similar efficacy. Hence, blessing accomplishes what it expresses. Although not equivalent to them, it has strong affinities with the words *peace (shâlôm), happiness (tûb), and life (chaiîm). It frequently appears in contexts involving the vocabulary of love ('ahab*), *grace and benevolence (chén), fidelity and loyalty (chèsèd), and success (çalach). Another term meaning “happiness” ('èshèr) is practically synonymous with blessing, and is sometimes translated as such. Not as rich in nuances as the root brk, it has a clearly declarative sense: happy/blessed ('ashrè) “is the man who walks not in the counsel of the wicked...but his delight is in the law of the Lord” (Ps 1:1–2). The word 'ashrè, translated as makarios in Greek, introduces the literary form of the Beatitudes (see Mt 5:3–11).

The vocabulary of the curse, on the other hand, is very diversified. The curses of the Covenant* (Dt 27:11–26) contrast the blessed (bârûk) to the cursed ('ârûr). The verb in the intensive means: “to make a curse effective.” There is also the root 'âlâh, “curse,” qâlal, which adds the nuance of being small or contemptible, qâbab, which expresses execration in a somewhat magical sense, and zâ'am, which communicates the idea of anger. The interjection hôi can be either an exclamatory curse (Is 1:4) or an expression of mourning: “Alas!” (1 Kgs 13:30).

b) Diverse Expressions. In its simple active form, the verb is used only as a passive participle, bârûk, in various formulations: “Blessed be the LORD, who has delivered you” (Ex 18:10); “Blessed be Abram by God Most High” (Gn 14:19); and “May he be blessed by the Lord, whose kindness has not forsaken the living or the dead!” (Ru 2:20). The participle designates the state of the one who possesses the blessing and who, as such, deserves appreciation, homage, or praise.

The intensive conjugation is by far the most frequently attested (233 times in the active voice). To bless someone is to grant him or wish for him the power needed to accomplish a particular task in a particular situation. The verb takes on various nuances depending on whether the person being blessed is a superior, an inferior, or someone of equal rank. It is not necessary to articulate the contents of the blessing; the verb has intrinsic power. When a person blesses God, the blessing is akin to praise. The noun berâkâh appears 71 times (16 in Genesis and 12 in Deuteronomy) with the many nuances of the verb.

c) Meaning of Blessing. In the Bible*, the blessing has lost the magical quality that it may have had in the Semitic world. Its efficacy derives from the Word* of God, a God who wills the happiness of man, but who does not bring it about outside the bounds of his liberty*. By promoting the good of the other and by recognizing his merits, the blessing first of all expresses a bond of solidarity and communion among beings, even in those circumstances in which it is the equivalent of a greeting. People who bless one another are bound together. The curse that excludes a person from the group makes life impossible for the rejected individual. God blesses his Chosen People* and its members. He communicates his blessing directly or through authorized mediators, such as the head of the family, the king, the priest*, or the prophet. The blessing God grants to Abraham is a pledge that all the families of the earth are called upon to benefit from it by reference to Abraham (Gn 12:1–3). The blessing that God gives to man when he creates him includes all living things in the universe (Gn 1:28–30). It is to be transmitted from generation to generation. The family is the first site of this transmission, as the history* of the patriarchs shows (Gn 27). The blessing is tied to the Covenant, and observance of the law is the condition enabling the people to enjoy happiness and prosperity on the land that God has given them (Dt 30:15–20). The blessing is an integral part of worship, as can be seen in Solomon’s prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kgs 8:54–61).

When man blesses God, he responds by praise and thanksgiving to the work of God. The blessing is a major element in the prayer of Israel*. Thus the root brk is often found in the Psalms, linked with such other terms as hâlal (to praise) and yâdâh (to confess). Indeed, the blessing bursts through the bounds of ritual, because it is a spontaneous expression of the soul of Israel.

d) Blessing in the New Testament. The Septuagint translates brk most often with the verb eulogêô and its derivatives, eulogêtos and eulogia. The Semitic background prevents the interpretation of these terms as merely “speaking well.” In the New Testament the verb is found 41 times, the adjective 8 times, and the noun 16 times. It is most frequent in the synoptic Gospels (particularly Luke), Paul’s letters, and Hebrews.

Following the lines of the doxologies of the Old Testament and Jewish tradition*, God is the first to be blessed (Lk 1:68). He is blessed as Creator (Rom 1:25) and as “Father* of the Lord Jesus” (2 Cor 11:31). Several blessings provide elaborations of God’s work in the history of salvation, culminating in Jesus Christ (2 Cor 1:3–7; Eph 1:3–14; and 1 Pt 1:3–9). Jesus* is the quintessentially blessed (Lk 1:42 and 13:35). It is in Christ that the Father blesses his faithful with all spiritual blessings (Eph 1:3). It is through him that the blessing given to Abraham may reach all humanity (Acts 3:25–26). Mary* is the first blessed among all women (Lk 1:42), and the elect are blessed of the Father (Mt 25:34). At the Last Supper, Jesus pronounced the blessing on the bread (Mt 26:26; Mk 14:22). Far from being a magical formula, this blessing is a prayer of thanksgiving for the work of salvation accomplished by God, as suggested by Jewish ritual. The accounts establish a connection between the verbs eulogêô and eukharisteô, “to give thanks.” In the doxologies of the Book of Revelation, the association of eulogia with the terms *glory and honor support the meaning of praise.

- H. W. Beyer (1935), “Eulogêô,” ThWNT 2, 751–3.
- J.-P. Audet (1958), “Esquisse historique du genre littéraire de la ‘bénédictio’ juive et de l’Eucharistie chrétienne,” RB 65, 371–99.
- W. Schenk (1967), Der Segen im NT, Berlin.
- C. Westermann (1968), Der Segen in der Bibel und im Handeln der Kirche, Gütersloh.
- J. Guillet (1969), “Le langage spontané de la bénédiction dans l’AT,” RSR 57, 163–204.
- J. Scharbert (1973 a), “Krb hkrb,” ThWAT 1, 808–41; (1973 b), “Die Geschichte der bârûk Formel,” BZ 17, 1–28.
- C. A. Keller, G. Wehmeier (1978), “Brk pi. segnen,” THAT 1, 353–76.
- H. Patsch (1981), Eulogêô, EWNT 2, 198–201.
- C. T. Mitchell (1987), The Meaning of brk “to bless” in the Old Testament, Atlanta.

JOSEPH AUNEAU

See also Covenant; Creation; Cult; Eucharist; Father; Filiation; Praise; Prayer; Psalms

B. In the Liturgy

a) Overview. Christian liturgies* in both East and West bring together under the heading “blessings” very diverse prayers, at least some of which are continuous with prayer* practices previously used in Judaism*. Some of these prayers—such as those for blessing or consecrating oils for liturgical use or for blessing a spouse at a wedding—are integrated with the celebration of the sacraments*. Others have a place within the celebration of the Eucharist or among the prayers of the divine office. Still others are related to all the various circumstances of the life of families, societies, and religious communities.

The importance of these blessings has varied a great deal according to times and places. In addition, their religious tone has also varied to a certain degree, depending on whether the particular blessing emphasized thanksgiving for divine benefits, with a tone close to that of the ancient Eucharist, or involved, as in the Middle Ages in Germany, an aspect of exorcism*. In any event, it is essential for every blessing that it be an invocation of divine goodness.

Blessings are important in the life of the church*, the family*, and society*. As a result, various blessings, depending on their field of importance, have always been under the auspices of the particular ministry* of the bishop*. For example, as a general rule, the consecration of churches—or, in another domain, royal coronations—are reserved for bishops. Most other blessings, in the Catholic Church, have been assigned to priests*, with no sharp demarcation between a blessing given by a priest and one pronounced by the father in a family setting.

b) Main Collections of Blessings in the Liturgical Tradition.

- Apostolic Tradition (probably Rome, first third of the third century) preserves two examples of blessing: the blessing at the end of the eucharistic prayer and the blessings of the milk and honey in the celebration of baptism*. The latter followed a practice of the very early church, before the separation between the Eucharist and a meal took place. At that time milk and honey were given to the newly baptized between the Communion* of bread and the Communion of wine, in a sort of ritual of the Promised Land, in antithesis to the bitter herbs of the Jewish Passover ritual (which recalled the exodus from Egypt).
- Sacramentary of Serapion (bishop of Thmuis), a collection of Greek prayers from Egypt (probably from the fourth or fifth century).
- Byzantine Euchologe, body of liturgical prayers from around the ninth century.
- In the West, various formulations of the blessing of the Easter candle by the deacon*, which had remained rather close to the Jewish blessing of light (there are examples beginning in the fourth century, of which the best known is the Exultet of the Roman liturgy).

- Episcopal blessings given at the end of the Mass. These blessings are of Gallican origin, and their form was restored for festivals in the Roman Missal of 1970.
- Sacramentary of Gellone, a Carolingian manuscript that gives the earliest evidence of the body of rural blessings used in the Middle Ages.
- Rituale Romanum (1614), with a limited number of blessings, considerably expanded in 1874 and 1895.
- After Vatican* II, the De Benedictionibus (1984), which eliminates the element of exorcism and presents a proclamation of the Word* of God* as a preamble to any blessing. In addition, the ministry of blessing is carried out in certain cases by a deacon or a member of the laity*.
- J. Goar (1730), Euchologion sive Rituale Graecorum, 2nd Ed., Venice.
- A. Franz (1909), Die kirchlichen Benediktionen des Mittelalters, Freiburg.
- P.-M. Gy (1959), “Die Segnung von Milch und Honig in der Osternacht,” in B. Fischer, J. Wagner (Ed.), Paschatis Sollemnia: Festschrift J. A. Jungmann, Freiburg, 206–12.
- B. Botte (1963), La Tradition apostolique de S. Hippolyte: Essai de reconstitution, Münster.
- A. Stuiber (1966), “Eulogia,” RAC 6, 900–928.
- E. Moeller (1971–79), Corpus benedictionum pontificalium, CChr.CM 162–162 c.
- A. Heinz, H. Rennings (Ed.) (1987), Heute Segnen: Werkbuch zum Benediktionale, Freiburg.
- A.-M. Triacca, A. Pistoia (Ed.) (1988), Les bénédictions et les sacramentaux dans la liturgie, Rome.
- S. Parenti, E. Velkovska (1995), L'Eucologio Barberini gr. 336, Rome.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Cult; Liturgy; Praise; Prayer; Sacrament

Blondel, Maurice

1861–1949

1. Renewal of Philosophical Perspectives

a) Early Writings. From his work L'Action (1893) to “Principe élémentaire d’une logique de la vie morale” (1903), Blondel uses the “method of immanence” that appeared in the Lettre sur l’apologétique (1896). The perspective is centered on the inherent content of human action, and its full application leads to the necessary presence of transcendence within the heart of our acting. This phenomenological analysis is an attempt to solve the problem set forth in the short thesis De Vinculo substantiali (1893), the action being identified with the substantial link that is sought. However, Blondel tends more toward a Pascalian than a Leibnizian perspective: reason* should acknowledge its own insufficiency and openness to the hypothesis of the supernatural, which could be verified only by the faithful action.

b) Prospecting and Reflection. In “Le point de départ de la recherche philosophique” (1906), Blondel distinguishes two complementary directions of thought: that of “prospecting,” oriented toward synthetic and concrete action, and the analytical and derived “reflection” or “retrospection” by which thought reflects upon its action to analyze its conditions and components. Philosophical knowledge only emerges by taking into account both of these dimensions. Thus it can either be a reflection on the integrity of the prospective synthesis, as was L’Action in 1893, or a prospective grasping of the reflection itself, eliciting this “metaphysics to the second power” used in the trilogy.

c) Later Works. The achievement period begins with L’itinéraire philosophique de Maurice Blondel (1928), in which he rereads his own history and announces the main themes to come; it ends with Exigences philosophiques du christianisme (1950), which gives precious insights about his methodology. At the center, there is his great work: the trilogy (La Pensée I and II, 1934; L’Être et les êtres, 1935; L’Action I and II, 1936–37) and La philosophie et l’esprit chrétien (I and II, 1944–46). Blondel thus tried to solve the problem posed in 1930 in *Une énigme historique: Le “Vinculum Substantiale” d’après Leibniz—a deeply modified continuation of his Latin thesis. Blondel now uses a “method of implication” with metaphysical reach. The fundamental relation is the tension between the noetic and the pneumatic, inseparable and unconfusable. The noetic, “concrete universal,” remains only in the pneumatic, “singular concrete,” an original point of view on the universal, the “ontological breath” in a center of perception. The irreducibility of the noetic to the pneumatic in any finite being, a sign of its finitude, such is matter, of which only God* is exempt. Consequently, Blondel builds an integral realism that overrides the impasses of both dogmatic realism and critical idealism. He thus opens philosophy* to a dialogue with “the Christian spirit,” the enigmas of reason and the revealed mysteries elucidating each other.

2. Blondel and Catholic Theology

a) Historicism and Extrinsicism: History and Dogma (1904). Applying the philosophy of action to the biblical question, at the heart of the modernist crisis, Blondel first denounces the historicism that substitutes the “science” of history* for its reality and the extrinsicism that only establishes an extrinsic relationship of the facts with dogma*. These two “incomplete and incompatible solutions” miss the mediation between history and the dogma constituted by tradition*, the faithful action of Christian people* that ties us to the founding action and from which is “extracted what enters little by little in writings and formulas.” In this way he resolves the modernist crisis, in right if not in fact.

b) “Efference” and “Afference”: The Social Week of Bordeaux and Monophorism (1910). Under the pseudonym Testis, Blondel set forth to untangle the “fundamental crisis,” which is symmetrical to modernism. He defends social Catholicism* against the attacks of those who assimilate it to “sociological modernism.” He establishes that the thesis of the purely extrinsic afference of Christian truths* “is no less inexact than the thesis according to which everything derives from within, by efference”: two varieties of the same type, which he would call “monophorism.” On the contrary, Christianity thrives on the intimate conjunction of a double afference, internal and external. This was already shown in the “Méthode de la Providence” by Cardinal Dechamps, which Blondel studied in 1905–7, and also in Le problème de la philosophie catholique in 1932.

c) Blondel’s Impact on Contemporary Theology. It is difficult to measure Blondel’s impact on theology, which is more often implicit. It does seem considerable, however, particularly with regard to the fundamental developments of Vatican* II. To mention only two central figures, Blondel’s influence on Lubac was key, not only on the supernatural or the sense of active tradition, but also on the entire philosophical substructure of his “organic work.” Balthasar*’s theology was also influenced by Blondel, even though Balthasar initially distanced himself from Blondel. Still, his last works acknowledge Blondel’s capital importance.

- R. Virgoulay, C. Troisfontaines (1975–76), M. Blondel: Bibliographie analytique et critique: I. Œuvres de M. Blondel (1880–1973); II. Études sur M. Blondel (1893–1975), Louvain.
- C. Troisfontaines (Ed.), OC, Paris, 1995.
- ♦ A. and A. Valensin (1911), “Immanence (méthode d’),” Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique 2, 579–612.
- R. Virgoulay (1980), Blondel et le modernisme: La philosophie de l’action et les sciences religieuses, 1896–1943, Paris.
- P. Favraux (1987), Une philosophie du Médiateur: M. Blondel, Paris-Namur.
- P. Gauthier (1988) Newman et Blondel: Tradition et développement du dogme, Paris.
- C. Theobald (1988), M. Blondel und das Problem der Modernität, FTS 35.
- M. Leclerc (1991), L’union substantielle: M. Blondel et Leibniz, Namur.

Blondel, Maurice

R. Virgoulay (1992), L'Action de M. Blondel (1893): Relecture pour un centenaire, Paris.

H. Wilmer (1992), Mystik zwischen Tun und Denken: Ein neuer Zugang zur Philosophie M. Blondels, Freiburg.

MARC LECLERC

See also Balthasar, Hans Urs von; Catholicism; Experience; Lubac, Henri Sonier de; Modernism; Newman, John Henry; Pascal, Blaise; Philosophy; Rationalism; Relativism; Religion, Philosophy of; Revelation

Body. See Soul-Heart-Body

Boethius

c. 480–524

Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus Boethius was the son of Flavius Manlius Boethius, consul in 487. Boethius was treated as friend and adviser by the Arian emperor Theodoric, and was himself consul in 510. An undeserved charge of treason kept him under house arrest until his execution. Dante* placed this “last of the Romans and first of the Scholastics” among the doctors* in his Paradise.

I. Works

a) Boethius perceived the danger that the increasing linguistic separation of the eastern and western halves of the Roman Empire, and the encroachments of the barbarians, would put access to Greek philosophical culture at risk in the West. He therefore set about translating Plato and Aristotle into Latin, but only a small part of the logic corpus was completed before his death, together with commentaries on Porphyry’s Isagoge and Cicero’s Topics, and some logical monographs of his own. With these should be grouped the treatises De arithmetica and De musica, both heavily dependent upon Greek sources.

b) Boethius also wrote five short theological tracts: On the Catholic Faith; Against Eutyches and Nestorius; On the Trinity; Whether Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are Substantially Predicated of the Trinity; and De Hebdomadibus. The influence of Augustine* is clear, but Boethius goes further and develops arguments of his own. The first tractate is a confession of faith*, without detailed philosophical analysis. The second was prompted by the debate invoked by a letter from an Eastern bishop* to the pope* on points of Christology. Present at the debate, Boethius learned of the Nestorian view that Christ* is both of and in two natures, and the Monophysite, “Eutychian” view that Christ is of two natures, but not in two natures. He therefore addresses the underlying questions about “nature” and “person*” and their relationship, and created a definition of the person which would have the most influence (a person is “an individual substance of a rational nature,” naturae rationabilis individua substantia, Contra Eut. et Nest. 3). The christological controversy had been going on in Greek: Boethius was the first to attempt a comprehensive treatment in Latin. He was thus led to complete the philosophical terminology of Cicero and, with Marius Victorinus, determined the Latin equivalents of the Greek terms for the whole of the Middle Ages. In the two tractates on the Trinity*, of which the first is by far the more developed, Boethius explores concepts of form, unity, plurality, identity, and difference. He makes the point that the Aristotelian categories apply differently to God*. In the Godhead all accidents are substantive. Only relation exists absolutely between the Persons of the Trinity. The De Hebdomadibus, on “How substances are good in virtue of their existence without being substantial goods,” takes the form of a series of axioms that can be applied by those wise enough to the resolution of the problem that is the subject of the treatise.

c) The Consolation of Philosophy depicts Boethius in prison awaiting execution, discoursing with a personified Philosophy about how to come to terms with the problems of evil*, liberty*, and providence*. Boethius begins from a Stoic viewpoint, but moves with Philosophy’s help to a position in tune with Christian Platonism*. The duty of the soul* is to seek its Creator, the One who is above all change and who has nothing to do with evil. All goods are one, and the pursuit of happiness is the pursuit of unity with the One who is the Good*. Eternity he sees as the complete, simultaneous and perfect possession of endless life (interminabilis vitae tota simul et perfecta possessio, Cons. V, 6), another definition that was to have a major influence. Boethius owes a substantial debt here to the first part of Timaeus (all that was then accessible in the West). Providence now begins to look different: it permits things that we do not perceive as good at the time but that prove to be right for us. Boethius thus comes to a different kind of acceptance from the Stoic, and to hope. The Consolation of Philosophy led its medieval readers to wonder whether Boethius was a Christian, for there is no question in it of Christ or of salvation* by the cross. Nevertheless, everything in it is *theology, in Augustine’s sense, and there is nothing in Boethius’s Platonism that is incompatible with Christian faith.

2. Posterity

a) Boethius’s logic texts shaped the study of logic in the West until the 12th century, when the remainder of Aristotle’s texts on logic were rendered into Latin. Boethius’s contribution encouraged the early medieval emphasis on problems of epistemology and signification.

b) Boethius’s theological tractates were taken up with enthusiasm by scholars of the early 12th century (such as Gilbert de la Porrée), and they had an important influence on the development of the use of logic in theology. The De Hebdomadibus prompted an interest in demonstrative method that was to grow with the translation of Euclid and the reintroduction of Aristotle’s Posterior Analytics into the West, also during the 12th century. The De Trinitate contains a version of the Platonic division of knowledge that places mathematics between theology and the sciences* of nature. This encouraged 12th-century attempts to classify the sciences and, importantly, implicitly stressed the division between those aspects of theology that can be attempted by philosophical methods and those that are historical, depending on revelation* (a division taken up by Hugh of Saint*-Victor and others). Use was also made in the Middle Ages of what Boethius has to say about which of the Aristotelian categories apply to God, and the ways in which they do so.

c) Boethius’s most influential work throughout the Middle Ages was The Consolation of Philosophy. This work was much imitated, notably by Gerson in his De Consolatione Theologiae.

- Boethius: PL 63–4 (complete works).
- Commentarii in librum Aristotelis De Interpretatione*, Ed. C. Meiser, Leipzig, Teubner, 1877–80.
- De arithmetica* and De musica, Ed. G. Friedlein, Leipzig, Teubner, 1867 (repr. Frankfurt, 1966).
- De Consolatione Philosophiae*, Ed. L. Bieler, CChr.SL 94.
- De syllogismis hypotheticis*, Ed. L. Obertello, Brescia, University of Parma, 1969.
- In Isagenon Porphyrii Commenta*, Ed. S. Brandt, CSEL 48.
- Theological Tractates* and De Consolatione Philosophiae, Ed. H. Stewart, E. K. Rand, S. J. Tester, LCL.
- ♦ M. Nédoncelle (1955), “Les variations de Boèce sur la personne,” RevSR 29, 201–38.
- P. Hadot (1963), “La distinction de l’être et de l’étant dans le De Hebdomadibus de Boèce,” MM II, 147–53.
- P. Courcelle (1967), La consolation de Philosophie dans la tradition littéraire: Antécédents et postérité de Boèce, Paris.
- L. Obertello (1974), Severino Boezio, 2 vols., Geneva.
- H. Chadwick (1981), Boethius: The Consolations of Music, Logic, Theology and Philosophy, Oxford (repr. 1990).
- M. Gibson (1981) (Ed.), Boethius: His Life, Thought and Influence, Oxford.
- M. Masi (1981), Boethius and the Liberal Arts, Berne.
- L. Pozzi (1981), “Boethius,” TRE 7, 18–28 (bibl.).
- A. J. Minnis (1987) (Ed.), The Medieval Boethius: Studies in the Vernacular Translations of the De Consolatione Philosophiae, Cambridge.
- C. Micaelli (1988), Studi sui trattati teologici di Boezio, Naples.

GILLIAN R. EVANS

See also Arianism; Aristotelianism, Christian; Attributes, Divine; Monophysitism; Nestorianism; Stoicism, Christian

Boethius of Dacia. See Naturalism; Truth

Bogomiles. See Catharism

Bonaventure

1217–74

I. The Franciscan

1. Life

Giovanni Fidanza, the future Bonaventure, was born about 1217 in Bagnoregio, a little town near Orvieto. His father was a physician. At about the age of 12 Giovanni recovered from a serious illness through the intercession of Saint Francis of Assisi. After his studying at the Faculty of Arts in Paris from 1235 to 1243, he entered the Franciscan Order, taking the name of Bonaventure. He studied in the Faculty of Theology under Alexander of Hales, John of La Rochelle, Eudes Rigauld, and William of Middleton. He was licensed as a bachelor of Scripture in 1248, produced a commentary of the Sentences of Peter Lombard in 1250, received a master's degree in 1252, and was granted his licentia docendi (teaching license) at the end of 1253 or the beginning of 1254. Forthwith he became a teaching master in the friars' schools. Then, on 2 February 1257 he was elected minister-general of the Franciscan Order.

In October 1259 at Mount La Verna Bonaventure conceived the idea of his Itinerarium mentis in Deum (The Soul's Journey into God). He visited Italy, then France, and in Paris he preached the Collationes de Decem Praeceptis (Collations on the Ten Commandments) from 6 March to 17 April 1267, De Septem Donis Spiritus Sancti (On the Seven Gifts of the Holy Spirit) from 25 February to 7 April 1268, and In Hexaemeron (In the Six Days: The Hexameron) from 9 April to 28 May 1273. The last of this series of lectures was interrupted when Pope Gregory X made him cardinal-bishop of Albano. Consecrated bishop* in Lyons on 11 November 1273, Bonaventure prepared the Second Ecumenical Council* of Lyons*, which opened on 7 May 1274, and he preached a sermon at the council on 29 June 1274.

On 15 July 1274 Bonaventure was dead. He was buried in the Church of the Franciscan Friars in Lyons. Brother Peter of Tarantasia, a Dominican and cardinal-bishop of Ostia, celebrated the mass, preaching on the text of 2 Samuel 1:26, Doleo super te, frater mi Ionatha ("I am distressed for you, my brother Jonathan"). He said: "There were many tears and lamentations. God, indeed, had given him such grace that whosoever met him, their heart was instantly won over with love for him" (Ordinatio Concilii). Canonized on 14 April 1482, Bonaventure was declared a doctor* of the church on 14 March 1588.

2. Franciscan Roots

a) Franciscan Vocation. Saint Francis of Assisi's influence manifested itself several times in Bonaventure's life. The first of these interventions constitutes a kind of miracle*. Seriously ill, Bonaventure was vowed to Saint Francis by his mother. He would always feel fervent gratitude for the healing* thus brought about. This is why in 1260 he agreed to the Narbonne chapter's request and began to compose The Life of Saint Francis, which is known under the title of the Legenda Maior (The Major Life). For Francis, the friars' fundamental virtues* were simplicity, a prayerful mind (prayer*), and poverty. Knowledge as such, or study, had nothing to do with this. But, although Francis was not an intellectual, his thought and experience* had not made him an enemy of learning. Francis merely judged scholars in light of their relations with God*. He forbade neither study nor learning, on condition that the friars abandoned all attachment to possessions and were theologians "on their knees."

In Francis's various writings, which were known by Bonaventure, certain themes appear, which have contributed to the development of his theological thought. In Francis's "Letter to All the Faithful" (Writings and Early Biographies: English Omnibus of Sources for the Life of St. Francis, 4th Rev. Ed., 93), the address is revealing: "I decided to send you a letter bringing a message with the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Word of the Father*." In chapter 23 of the Rule of 1221 he writes: "Almighty, most high and supreme God, Father, holy and just, Lord, King of heaven and earth, we give you thanks for yourself. Of your own holy will you created all things spiritual and physical, made us in your own image and likeness." In the same chapter of the Rule, Francis's first rule, he continues: "We are all poor sinners and unworthy to even to mention your name, and so we beg our Lord Jesus Christ, your beloved Son, in whom you are well pleased (Mt 17:5), and the Holy Spirit to give you thanks for everything, as it pleases you and them; there is never anything lacking in him to accomplish your will, and it is through him that you have done so much for us."

The theme of God's humility may have been suggested to Bonaventure by the Letter to a General Chapter (Omnibus), where Francis wrote: "What wonderful majesty! What stupendous condescension! O sublime humility! O humble sublimity! That the Lord of the whole universe, God and Son of God, should humble himself like this and hide under the form of a little bread, for our salvation. Look at God's condescension, my brothers, and pour out your hearts before him." (Ps 61:9).

b) The School in Paris. The friars arrived in Paris in 1219 and set up their school in 1239 at the Monastery of the Cordeliers under the headship of Alexander of Hales. Bonaventure entered this monastery in 1243. There he increased his knowledge* of the mystery* of God by familiarizing himself with the works of Alexander, including his Glossa (Glosses), his Disputed Questions (antequam esset frater), or Questions Discussed (Before Becoming a Friar), and his Questions (postquam esset frater), or Questions (After Becoming a Friar). Alexander borrowed from the Greek Fathers* a theology* of the Trinity* that tackles this mystery* from the standpoint of the distinction among the divine Persons*, a view that Bonaventure adopted, while remaining Augustinian in the bulk of his thought. Thus, as he discusses in On the Mystery of the Trinity (q. 8, Quaracchi, vol. V, 115), the highest knowledge of the Trinity is found at the level of the primitas (primacy/prime person): "The Father produces the Son, and by means of the Son and with the Son, he produces the Holy Spirit: God the Father is, therefore, by means of the Son and with the Holy Spirit, the principle of all creation. For if he did not produce them eternally, he could not, through them, continue to produce through the span of time*. On account of this production, as is right, he is therefore called the source of life. For, since in this way he possesses life within himself, by means of himself, he empowers the Son to possess life. Eternal life* is therefore the only life, with the result that the reasonable mind, which emanates from the blessed Trinity and which is its image, returns in a sort of intelligible circle by means of memory, intelligence, and will, as well as by means of the deiformity of glory*, to the blessed Trinity."

It is clear that Bonaventure assimilated the teaching of Alexander, whom he called his "father and master"; and he profited from Alexander's sources, the Greek Fathers, especially from John of Damascus, Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, and the theologians who wrote in Latin, including Hilary* of Poitiers, Anselm*, Bernard*, and Richard of Saint*-Victor.

II. The Theologian

1. Writing and Theology

For Bonaventure, Scripture* was an absolute, the Word* of God. In the prologue to his Breviloquium (Summary) commenting on the text of Ephesians 3:14–19, Bonaventure writes: "One must begin at the beginning—that is to say, accede with pure faith* to the Father of light—by kneeling in our hearts*, so that through his Son, in his Holy Spirit, he gives us the true knowledge about Jesus Christ and, together with his knowledge, his love*. Knowing him and loving him, and as it were buttressed by faith and rooted in charity, it will then be possible for us to know the breadth, the length, the height, and the depth of the Holy Scripture, and, through this knowledge, to reach the total knowledge and inordinate love of the blessed Trinity. The saints' desires bend toward it: therein lies the end and aim of all truth and of all good*.”

Knowledge of the cosmic Christ* is thus the source of an understanding of Scripture. Here on earth, we cannot possess this knowledge except through faith, for which God grants us the necessary wisdom*, for only wisdom allows us to penetrate the development of the Word of God and, in its light, to grasp the contents of the universe in its true dimensions. Scripture was made for man. Man is therefore capable of acquiring this knowledge and, through this knowledge, of discovering God's plenitude, in knowledge and love. Bonaventure describes the start, the revelation* that one receives through faith, progress, which covers the contents of the history*, and the end, which is the plenitude of God. Theology thus makes it possible to embrace at a glance the breadth of Scripture and to draw spiritual nourishment from it in an effective way. It is the epignosis of revelation: “Theology is the pious knowledge of truth* understood through faith” (De Septem Donis, col. 4, n. 5, Quaracchi, vol. V, 474). As Yves Congar says of Bonaventure in his “Théologie” (DThC XV, 394–97): “Rather than being an expression of faith in reason*, the light revealed in the human intellect is a gradual reintegration into the unity of God, through love and for love, of the intelligent man and of all the universe known by him.”

2. Science and Wisdom

Scripture, therefore, is not a branch of learning; it is the Word of God, who seeks to make us better. Theology, on the other hand, is a branch of learning, unified and perfect. And what is more, it is a form of wisdom, for it does not merely exercise our faculty of reason. It is a living knowledge, in which intellectual meditation is constantly renewed and awakened through religious experience*.

Bonaventure's overall work is immense. It comprises 10 volumes of a critical edition, under the general editorship of Fidelis a Fanna, in Quaracchi (1882–1902). Bonaventure commented on Ecclesiastics and on the Gospels* according to Luke and John. He “read”—that is, he explained and commented on—the four books of Peter Lombard's Sentences. He discussed the Trinity, knowledge* about Christ, and evangelical perfection. As minister-general, and because of his teaching duties, he gave Collations (Lectures) on the Ten Commandments, on the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, and on the six days of Creation* (In Hexaemeron). We know his 50 model sermons for Sundays*, 395 sermons destined for special Holy Days, and 62 sermons de diversis. But Bonaventure's two capital works are his Breviloquium and his Itinerarium mentis in Deum.

According to H. de Lubac* in his Exégèse médiévale (Medieval Exegesis, Paris 1961), Breviloquium, which will be discussed later, “shows a capacity for total synthesis never perhaps equaled.” The Itinerarium mentis in Deum is, as it were, a discourse on the best method of reaching God through contemplation*. Bonaventure's Franciscan experience made God present in his heart and readable by him in Creation. Moreover, his philosophical viewpoint led him to follow back in time toward God himself the traces* (vestigium) and images of God. But the theologian takes precedence over the metaphysician in guiding the mind to the heart of the religious mystery and to contemplating God, no longer as the Creator but as God the Trinity, living infinitely and causing to live he who abandons himself to the effusions of his Holy Spirit, God All-Being and All-Good. Thus he succeeded in creating a synthesis of the Pseudo-Dionysian schemas and Augustine*'s authentic thought, an achievement that is all the more remarkable in that Bonaventure had to overturn the fundamental orientation of the Pseudo-Dionysius, which was totally alien to his Christocentrism.

What separated Bonaventure's conceptions from those of Thomas Aquinas could be described as a fundamental difference over the interpretation of given reality. Thomas stands firmly within the notional category, Bonaventure refuses to abandon the historic category, in which Jesus Christ is the intermediary in all methods, in all knowledge, and in all activity, being the way, the truth, and the life, the unique and universal center. As E. Gilson says: “As the two most universal interpretations of Christianity, Saint Thomas's and Saint Bonaventure's philosophies complete each other, and it is because they complete each other that they can neither exclude each other nor coincide” (1943, 396).

III. Bonaventure's Exemplarism

1. Vision of the World

M.-D. Chenu thought the Breviloquium “the most satisfactory embodiment—after the Itinerarium mentis in Deum—in a theological compendium of knowledge, of Franciscan inspiration.” Indeed, Bonaventure developed his theological knowledge there according to a clear and limpid plan. After a prologue in which comments on the text of Ephesians 3:14–19 and discovers in it the foundation of theology as scriptural teaching—sacra Scriptura quae Theologia dicitur (“Holy Scripture as recounted by theology”)—Bonaventure develops a very spare exposition, organized so as to be meditated on rather than to be taught. The general structure of the Breviloquium is very simple: Part one (9 chapters) deals with the Holy Trinity; part two (12 chapters) with the world, the Creation of God; part three (11 chapters) with corruption due to Original Sin*; part four (10 chapters) with the incarnation* of the Word*; part five (10 chapters) with the grace* of the Holy Spirit; part six (13 chapters) with sacramental remedies (sacrament*); and part seven (7 chapters) with the Last Judgment*. Bonaventure describes his goal as the following (Breviloquium, Prologue, 6, Quaracchi, vol. V, 208). “Since theology speaks of God, who is the first principle; since, as the highest branch of knowledge and doctrine it resolves everything in God as the first principle and sovereign, in the allocation of reasons, in everything that is contained in this short treatise, I have striven to seek the explanation in the first principle, in order to show that the truth of the Holy Scriptures comes from God, deals with God, is in conformity with God, has God as its end, in such a way that indeed this branch of knowledge seems unified, ordered, and, with good reason, is named theology.”

a) The Trinity as Creator. Bonaventure as theologian does not describe God. Rather, he recounts him, and he always recounts him as God the Trinity. As the Breviloquium (p. 1, c. 2; vol. V, 211a) reads: “Faith, because it is the principle of the cult* of God and the foundation of the doctrine in accordance with piety, requires us to hold a very high and very pious opinion about God. We would not hold a very high opinion about God if we did not believe that God can reveal himself totally. We would not have a very pious opinion about him if we believed that he could do it, but did not want to. Thus, having a very high and very pious opinion about God, we will say that he reveals himself completely while possessing eternally a loved one and another-one-loved-mutually. Thus God is one and threefold.”

In a Christmas sermon preached in 1257, Bonaventure expressed himself thus: “When the fullness of time decreed in the divine presence came to pass, the Word, formerly concealed within God, came into the bosom of the very chaste Mother. Thus Christ came into the flesh without, as it were, leaving the fountainhead, as John says in chapter 14, verse 10.” In the capital question through which Bonaventure explores whether the divine nature* was capable of uniting itself with human nature (In III Sent., d.1, a.1., q.4; III, 8; see Christ* and Christology), he gives his definitive answer in the form of a meditation on the history of salvation, or rather, on the history of creation. In this case his theology is based on arguments about what is appropriate rather than on what is necessary. Among the divine Persons, the one who is the most capable of being incarnated is the Son, because if the form of man is assumable because of man’s status as the image of God, the Son is the image of the Father. Man therefore assumes, outside of God, the role assumed within God, in the full sense, by the Son, who is “the image of the invisible God” (Col 1:15). On earth man continues to fulfil the vital and original function that the Son fills in the inner life of God. Now the Son is the Word of the Father. The Father shows himself through him. Therefore, in the same way that in order to show the idea the sense of the Word is joined to the tangible word, in order to reveal God it was proper that the Word of the Father should unite himself with flesh. Moreover, the Son is a Son engendered eternally. It was proper then that God incarnate should be of the race of men, therefore Son* of man (filiation*). At the heart of creation, the Son-Being is therefore a pale reflection of what the Son-Being in himself represents exemplarily in God himself. The creature, a copy of God, of exemplary origin at the start, cannot be known in his structure except if the original is known, since the structure lives in its entirety only by means of the original and reflects that original in attenuated form. The world is a mirror of God in which the threefold structure is reflected. And in the primitive structure of the creation, the Son possesses a special relationship with the world, on the grounds of exemplary causality.

Bonaventure always links the fact that Christ is a model or exemplar of man to the fact that the eternal Word is himself the exemplar of every creature: “Christ’s generation was the exemplary reason for every emanation, because God had placed everything in the Word that he had engendered. For the same reason, his predestination* was the exemplary reason for every predestination” (In III Sent., d.11, a. 1, q. 2). Bonaventure bases himself here on a metaphysical principle that guides his thoughts: Posterius per illud habet reduci, quod est prius in eodem genere (“The posterior must turn back to what is anterior of the same kind”). The density of being of this exemplary cause, of this prius (anterior) ontology, is so great that the return, the reducio, of the creature to the Creator, can only be managed through him, the ontological prius, the original model.

It can be said that the threefold appropriations* are the foundation of Bonaventure’s exemplarity. In fact Bonaventure explains that the Father is the fountain of plenitude, “a spring of water gushing up to eternal life” (Jn 4:14) that is manifested in the Son and empowers him to manifest it in creation. If creation is the work of the three Persons, each Person expresses himself in it according to his attributes—the Father with his all-powerfulness, the Son with his wisdom, the Holy Spirit with his goodness.

b) Creation, Contemplation. For Bonaventure, every creature is a vestige of God, not in an accidental way but in a real way. Man is naturally and substantially an image of God because he receives continually from God—who is present within him—a creative influence, which makes him capable of taking him for subject. As L. Mathieu says (1992, 99): “The Father, at the heart of the divinity, utters speech eternally, his Word, in whom he tells his whole being* and his whole power, and who contains the eternal reasons of beings; it is the eternal Word or the Word uncreated. And in the same way that the Father expresses himself and declares himself through his Word, the Persons of the divinity express themselves and declare themselves through a temporal word, which is the creature or verbum creatum, a reflection or echo of wisdom expressed eternally by the Father in the Word uncreated.” “Every creature is a word of God,” writes Bonaventure himself when commenting on Sirach 42:15 (c.1, q. 2, resp., Quaracchi., vol. VI, 16).

c) Path to God. When he discovers himself to be the image of God, man recognizes himself to be the subject of a quasi-original relationship between God and himself. As soon as God draws the world toward himself and thus introduces it into his inner being, the circle of the Trinity, which until that time was closed on itself in spite of all the exemplary relations, reveals itself to the world through a transcendence of the exemplary relationship. Bonaventure sees this transcendence in the Incarnation* of the Son and in the sending of the Holy Spirit.

Bonaventure defined the different stages of the return to God in his Itinerarium mentis in Deum. The first stage leads us toward the traces* of God, the physical world in which we contemplate the power of God, his wisdom, and his goodness: God is present in the center of things. Then starting with the physical, the study of the microcosm makes us scale the ladder of created beings as far as the world of the spirit, which is free from any physical limits. Further still, the study of the powers of the soul grants us access directly to God, since our soul is his image and our soul receives the light of his eternal reasons: we discover in ourselves the personal action of God, recreating our supernatural* being and inaugurating thus a new relationship, the presence of grace. Thenceforth, we find ourselves ready to contemplate God in the unity of his essence and the plurality of his person. First of all, we discover the idea of being in our smallest pieces of knowledge, for it is implied in every concept. The idea of Good, of the Being that reaches outside itself and gives itself, raises us ever higher until we contemplate the Trinity, whose fruitfulness is the supreme explanation. At the end of the ascent, silence falls. Let us pass, once Jesus* is crucified, “from this world* to the Father. After having seen the Father, we can declare along with Philip: ‘that is enough for us’” (Itin. c.7, n.6, Quaracchi, vol. V, 313).

2. Theology of the Poor

For Bonaventure the presence of God is both a simple and a complex process. We must go outside ourselves by accepting the idea that we cannot exist by our own means and by asking for the help of the divine light, because reading, which ends with words, is not enough. The inner gaze, which goes beyond the words and reaches the reality that they express, is also required. Withdrawing into oneself again constitutes a haphazard groping for that source in whom we have motion, life, and being. It is rising above our condition while trying to reach the inaccessible. It constitutes an abandonment of all sustenance required for being, because nothing can assuage us except what exceeds our capacity (De scientia Christi, q. 6, resp., Quaracchi, vol. V, 35).

The notion of God implies all that, but also the idea of realizing that God himself has taken our poverty in hand in a real plan for salvation (Breviloquium, p.5, c.2, n.3, Quaracchi, vol. 5, 253–54). For we would like to be happy and we chase after happiness, but happiness is like the shore, which seems very close to the sailor but always remains very far away (In II Sent., d. 19, a 1, 1, resp. Quaracchi, vol. II, 460). We want to be happy and we only know how to create our own misery. But God, in his abundant mercy*, becomes man for us. He does not do so because we are worthy, but he makes us worthy by the very fact that he makes himself man. God created the world in order to make himself manifest, according to Bonaventure. Taking to extremes his meditation of a poor man following in the footsteps of Saint Francis, he concludes: “Everything is made manifest on the cross” (De triplici via, c.3, n.5, Quaracchi., vol. VIII, 14). Christ—in fact, God made man—won at that moment, in an incomprehensible poverty, the right to be our partner in a dialogue where it is no longer clear who is the poorer. In the history of the world, always in the process of making itself, God abandoned himself thus, without defense, by placing man in the position of being the wealthier, of being the one who was in a position to give. God made himself indigent. It is up to us to give ourselves by giving something to the poor man. Thus, in God, closes the circle of love that Bonaventure had spread in his work (Apologia pauperum, c.2, n.12, Quaracchi., vol. VIII, 242–3).

- Sancti Bonaventurae, Opera omnia, 11 vols., Quaracchi, 1882–1902.

- Sancti Bonaventurae, Opera theologica selecta, ed. minor, 5 vols., Grottaferrata, 1934–35. Works of St. Bonaventure. St. Bonaventure, New York: Franciscan Institute, 1955–
- Ewert Cousins (Tr.), The Soul's Journey into God, The Tree of Life, The Life of St. Francis. New York, 1978.
- Lawrence Cunningham (Tr.) The Mind's Journey to God, Chicago, 1979.
- E.E. Nemmers (Tr.), Breviloquium. St. Louis, 1946.
- Les six lumières de la connaissance humaine*, Tr. P. Michaud-Quantin, Paris, 1971.
- Sermones dominicales*, Ed. J.-G. Bougerol, Grottaferrata, 1977.
- Questions disputées sur le savoir du Christ*, Ed., Tr. and Intro., E.-H. Weber, Paris, 1985.
- Le Christ Maître*, Ed., Tr. and Comm. of the sermon “Unus est magister noster Christus,” G. Madec, Paris, 1990.
- Sermones de tempore*, Ed. J.-G. Bougerol, Paris, 1990.
- Les six jours de la création*, Tr. M. Ozilou, Paris, 1991.
- Sermones de diversis*, Ed. J.-G. Bougerol, Paris, 1993.
- Les dix commandements*, Tr. M. Ozilou, Paris, 1994.
- J.-G. Bougerol, Bibliographia Bonaventuriana (1850–1973), Grottaferrata, 1974.
- ◆ É. Gilson (1929), La philosophie de saint B., 2nd Ed., Paris, 1943.
- F. Stegmüller (1947 Sq), Repertorium Commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi, Würzburg.
- J. Ratzinger (1959), Die Geschichtstheologie des Heiligen Bonaventuras, Munich.
- H.U. von Balthasar (1962), Herrlichkeit II/1, Einsiedeln, 267–361.
- A. Gerken (1963), Theologie des Wortes, Düsseldorf.
- J.B. Schneyer (1969–90), Repertorium der lateinischen Sermones des Mittelalters, BGPhMA 43.
- J.-G. Bougerol (1973), “Une théologie biblique de la Révélation,” in coll., La Sacra Scrittura e i Francescani, Rome-Jerusalem, 95–104.
- E.H. Cousins (1978), Bonaventure and the Coincidence of Opposites, Chicago.
- J.-G. Bougerol (1988), Introduction à saint B., Paris; (1989), Saint B.: Études sur les sources de sa pensée, London.
- L. Mathieu (1992), La Trinité créatrice d'après saint B., Paris.
- A. Murphy (1993), “Bonaventure’s Synthesis of Augustinian and Dionysian Mysticism: A New Look at the Problem of the One and the Many,” CFr 63, 385–98.
- A. Nguyen Van Si (1993), “Les symboles de l’itinéraire dans l’Itinerarium mentis in Deum’ de B.,” Anton. 68, 327–47.
- O. Todisco (1993), “Verbum divinum omnis creatura: La Filosofia del Linguaggio di S. Bonaventura,” MF 93, 149–98.

IV. In the Tradition of Bonaventure

Bonaventure’s genius inspired an abundant line of disciples, who engaged in numerous controversies concerning Franciscan spirituality*, poverty, and eschatology*, but also concerning the classic problems of metaphysics and theology. Among them can be cited the headmasters who succeeded Bonaventure: Guibert of Tournai, Eustache, Guglielmo di Baglione, Walter von Brügge, John Pecham, William de la Mare, Matthew of Aquasparta, Bartholomaeus of Bologna, John of Wales, Arlotto di Prato, Richard Middleton, Raymond Rigauld, John of Murren, Gonsalvo of Spain, and Alexander of Alexandria.

Guibert of Tournai, who immediately succeeded Bonaventure in the chair of the school of the friars (headmaster 1257–60), is known for his sermons and his treatise Eruditio regum et principum (The Study of Rules and Principles). Eustache (headmaster 1263–66) is the author of Quodlibets, Disputed Questions, and a few sermons. Guglielmo di Baglioni (headmaster 1266–67) left several Disputed Questions and Quodlibets. Walter of Bruges (headmaster 1267–69), author of a Commentary on the Sentences, became bishop of Poitiers in 1279. John Pecham (headmaster 1269–71), archbishop of Canterbury in 1279, is the author of the Tractatus pauperis contra insipientem (1270; Treatise on the Poor Man Compared to the Foolish Man) and of several quodlibets. William de la Mare is known above all for his authorship of the Correctorium fratris Thomae (Of the Correctors of Brother Thomas), in which he criticizes the work of Thomas Aquinas.

Matthew of Aquasparta is the most famous of the disciples of Bonaventure, whose Augustinianism* he brought to perfection. Father Victorin Doucet wrote as an introduction to the critical edition of Matthew’s Quaestiones disputatae de gratia (Quaracchi, 1935; A Discussion of Questions about Grace), an exhaustive study of the life, writings, and doctrinal authority* of this man who was named cardinal in 1288 and was entrusted with political missions for the pope. Bartholomaeus of Bologna (headmaster 1276–77) left behind sermons and Disputed Questions. Richard Middleton (headmaster 1284–87) is known above all for his Commentary on the Sentences, his Disputed Questions, and his Quodlibets. Although he refused to sit for his degree and therefore for his masters degree, Petrus Joannis Olivi is edited and studied more and more, for he represents one of Bonaventure’s most remarkable disciples (Council of Vienna*). Lastly must be cited Alexander of Alexandria (headmaster 1307–8) who wanted to deliver an Abbreviato Commentarii Santi Bonaventurae (Digest of Saint Bonaventure’s Commentaries).

In the 14th century the Franciscan School neglected Bonaventure to rally around John Duns* Scotus, who had managed to create a synthesis between Bonaventure’s thought and that of recent developments in logic and metaphysics—despite the efforts of Chancellor Jean Gerson (nominalism*). In 1482 Sixtus IV canonized Bonaventure. In 1588 Sixtus V raised him to the ranks of the doctors of the church. Between 1588 and 1596, the Vatican edition of Bonaventure’s writings was published at the pope’s urging. It contains 94 works and short treatises whose authenticity is not always well established. Nonetheless, it has the merit of having collected Bonaventure’s works. The editions of Mainz (1609), Lyons (1678), Venice (1751), and Paris (1864–71) simply reproduce the Vatican edition. The Conventual Franciscans founded the College of Saint Bonaventure in Rome, but they did not pursue the study of Bonaventure's work and thought. The Irish Franciscan Luke Wadding tried to sift out the doubtful short treatises, but his death prevented him from finishing this work. In 1722, Casimir Oudin published a Dissertatio on Bonaventure's writings.

In 1772–74 Benedetto Bonelli turned again to the work of the Venetian Franciscans and, after his Prodromus ad opera omnia Santi Bonaventurae, published three volumes entitled Santi Bonaventurae operum supplementum. But all these efforts did not succeed in reinvigorating the study of Bonaventure's thought. It could be said that from the 14th to the 15th century—apart from the Capuchin friar, Bartholomaeo de Barberis, who proved to be their best interpreter—the school of Bonaventure no longer existed, even if numerous quotations from Bonaventure can be found in the works of Bernardino of Siena (1380–1444).

Then, in 1874, thanks to the activity of Father Bernardino da Portogruaro, Franciscan minister-general, as well as that of Fathers Fidelis a Fanna and Ignatius Jeiler, the Saint Bonaventure College was created in Quaracchi and entrusted with taking up again the critical edition of Bonaventure's work. As E. Longpré says, "This monumental edition has brought about the renaissance of Bonaventure's works, of which, in France, the important book by Étienne Gilson has given the signal. This return to Saint Bonaventure in Christian thought must be considered as one of the most important events in contemporary religious history" (Longpré 1949).

- Gilberti de Tornaco, Tractatus de pace, Ed. E. Longpré, Quaracchi, 1925.
- Gonsalvi Hispani, Quaestiones disputatae et de Quodlibet, Ed. L. Amoros, Quaracchi, 1935.
- Guillelmi de Militona, Quaestiones de Sacramentis, Ed. C. Piana, G. Gàl, Quaracchi, 1961.
- Ioannis Pecham, Quodlibet quatuor, nunc primum edidit Girardus J. Etzkorn, Grottaferrata, 1989.
- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Quaestiones disputatae de gratia, cum introductione critica de magisterio et scriptis eiusdem doctoris, Ed. V. Doucet, Quaracchi, 1935.
- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Quaestiones disputatae de productione rerum et de providentia, Ed. G. Gàl, Quaracchi, 1956.
- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Quaestiones disputatae de fide et cognitione, Quaracchi, 1957.

- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Quaestiones disputatae de Incarnatione et de lapsu, Quaracchi, 1957.
- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Quaestiones disputatae de anima separata, de anima beata, de ieiunio et de legibus, Quaracchi, 1959.
- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Sermones de B.M. Virgine, Ed. C. Piana, Quaracchi, 1962.
- Matthaei ab Aquasparta, Sermones de S. Francisco, de S. Antonio, de S. Clara. Appendix: Sermo de potestate papae, Ed. G. Gàl, Quaracchi, 1962.
- Petri Ioannis Olivi, In II Sent., 3 vols., Quaracchi, 1922–26.
- Petri Ioannis Olivi, Quaestiones quatuor de Domina, Ed. D. Pacetti, Quaracchi, 1954.
- Petri Ioannis Olivi, Quaestiones disputatae de Incarnatione et Redemptione. Quaestiones de virtutibus, Ed. A. Emmen, E. Stadter, Grottaferrata, 1981.
- E. Longpré (1928), "Matthieu d'Aquasparta," DThC 10, 375–89.
- L. Veuthey (1931), "Alexandre d'Alexandrie, maître de l'université de Paris," EtFr 43, 145–76, 319–44.
- A. Teetaert (1932), "Pecham," DThC 12, 100–140.
- P. Glorieux (1933), Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIIIe s., II, Paris.
- L. Jarreaux (1933), "Pierre Jean Olivi," EtFr 45, 129–53.
- V. Doucet (1934), Maîtres franciscains de Paris, in AFH 27, 531–64.
- E. Longpré (1949), "Bonaventure," Cath. 2, 122–28.
- R. Manselli (1955), La Lectura super Apocalipsim di Pietro di Giovanni Olivi. Ricerche sull'escatologismo medioevale, Rome.
- E. Stadter (1961), Psychologie und Metaphysik der menschlichen Freiheit: Die ideengeschichtliche Entwicklung zwischen Bonaventura und Duns Scotus, Munich-Paderborn-Vienna.
- P. Mazzarella (1969), La doctrina dell'anima e della conoscenza in Matteo d'Acquasparta, Padua.
- D. Burr (1976), The Persecution of Peter Olivi, Philadelphia.
- C. Bérubé (1983), De l'homme à Dieu selon Duns Scot, Henri de Gand et Olivi, Rome.
- D. Burr (1989), Olivi and Franciscan Poverty, Philadelphia.
- F.-X. Putallaz (1991), La connaissance de soi au XIIIe s.: De Matthieu d'Acquasparta à Thierry de Freiberg, Paris.
- F.-X. Putallaz (1995), Insolente liberté: Controverses et condamnations au XIIIe s., Fribourg-Paris.
- F.-X. Putallaz (1997), Figures franciscaines, de Bonaventure à Duns Scot, Paris (bibl.).

JACQUES-GUY BOUGEROL †

See also Augustinianism; Beatitude; Cosmos; Duns Scotus, John; Life, Spiritual; Millenarianism; Mysticism; Scholasticism; Spirituality, Franciscan; Spiritual Theology; Vienna, Council of; Voluntarism

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich

1906–45

a) Life. A Lutheran theologian from the cultured German middle class, Bonhoeffer was appointed in 1931 to the posts of private lecturer and university chaplain in Berlin. In the debates sparked within the Protestant churches by Hitler's accession to power in 1933, he emphatically dissociated himself from the "German Christian movement" and the National Socialist regime. In 1935, after briefly serving as a pastor* to the German communities in London, he became head of the Confessing Church seminary at Finkenwalde (Pomerania). His literary output from this period comprises The Cost of Discipleship (1937) and Life Together (1939). His participation in the resistance to Hitler subsequently brought him new experiences within the secular sphere, and these would find expression in his unfinished Ethics. He was arrested in 1943 and at first interned in the military prison of Berlin-Tegel. Thanks to the leniency of some of the guards, he was able to carry on an uncensored theological correspondence with his friend E. Bethge, who was to publish these letters in 1951 under the title Letters and Papers from Prison (Resistance and Submission). Shortly before the end of the war, on 9 April 1945, Bonhoeffer was hanged at the concentration camp of Flossenbürg, along with other conspirators. The day before, he had taken his leave of an English fellow-prisoner with the words, "It is the end—and, for me, the beginning of a new life."

b) The Church. In his thesis, Sanctorum Communio, Bonhoeffer set himself the task of carrying out a "dogmatic investigation toward a sociology of the church*," which was nonetheless to lead him to a "theological transcendence of sociology" (Soosten 1992, 263). "We do not believe in an invisible Church... we believe that God* has made the concrete and empirical church, in which the Word* and the Sacraments* are administered, into his community" (SC 191). With this assertion Bonhoeffer distanced himself on the one hand from E. Troeltsch, who concerned himself with the religious nature of the Christian personality rather than with the church, and on the other hand from K. Barth*, whose idea of revelation* implied a critical questioning of the empirical church.

Bonhoeffer saw the "recognition of the revealed reality of God's community" as the starting point of theology*, and as a faithful disciple of his Lutheran teacher R. Seeberg, acknowledged the possibility of "positive theological knowledge" (SC 81). His expression, derived from Hegel*, of "Christ existing as a community" (SC 128 and passim) takes up some of Saint Paul's pronouncements (the typology of Adam* and Christ, the community as the body of Christ). Ecclesiology* is here rooted in a Christology* and a soteriology of substitution. Bonhoeffer never lost sight of the irreversible relationship of priority that exists between Christ as head and the body of his community. He saw in Christ "the measure and the norm of our actions" (SC 120). Consequently, there could be no doubt in 1933 as to the status confessionis of the "Jewish question," and Bonhoeffer demanded that his church take up the cause of the persecuted. In the event that this protest should prove ineffective to dissuade the state (church* and state) from its policy, he urged that an "evangelical council" should publicly denounce the regime's iniquity. The Confessing Church, however, never entirely shook off its cautious reticence regarding the anti-Semitic policy of the Nazi state. It was for this reason that in 1944 Bonhoeffer wrote, in Widerstand und Ergebung, that "it has fought during these years only for its own preservation" (WEN 328), whereas "the church is only a church when it exists for others" (WEN 415). This new church would be characterized by voluntary poverty and by the capacity to proclaim Christ, the Lord of the world, to an emancipated and secularized humanity. From this viewpoint, it was up to theology to interpret Christianity in secular or nonreligious terms. Bonhoeffer, however, did not get the opportunity to carry out this task himself in a developed and systematic form.

c) Ethics. At the beginning of the 1930s Bonhoeffer put into perspective the Lutheran doctrine of the orders (which persisted, in a modified form, in his Ethics) with reference to Jesus Christ. The orders were no longer to be seen as inviolable "orders of creation," but simply as "orders of conservation." The individual's love* of his own race* was subordinated to the Christian commandment of peace*. This idea (encouraged by the friendship he had formed with the French pacifist Jean Lasserre in 1930 at the Union Theological Seminary) led him to join the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches. This activity culminated in 1934 in his address to the assembly of church representatives at Fanö in Denmark, in which he urged them to present themselves as an “ecumenical council” and forbid all Christians to take part in war*. In Nachfolge Bonhoeffer rejects the “cheap grace*” proclaimed by the evangelical church, as well as the notion that the personal journey of Luther*, who left the cloister to return to worldly life, could be taken as justification for an exclusive devotion to the performance of professional duties. He reiterates and clarifies the Lutheran tradition* with this principle: “Only the believer obeys, only the obedient believes” (N 52).

In his Ethics, which he worked on from 1940, Bonhoeffer extends the domain of Christian activity. While he had originally intended an Ethics aimed at the radical wing of the Confessing Church (those known as “Dahlemites”), he now asks in a more general sense how Christians, by their way of life, offer a response to Jesus Christ. It is in this spirit that he introduces the concept of responsibility into theological ethics. By taking up the christological category of “substitution,” he is able to derive a fundamental anthropological structure, that of “existence for others.” “All responsibility to God and for God, to mankind and for mankind, is always the responsibility of the cause of Christ, and in this way only of my personal life” (E 255). Thus Bonhoeffer dissociates himself from the modern notion of individual autonomy and goes beyond the idea (always conducive to political compromise) of a Christian life devoted to the performance of professional duties.

d) Christology. Several of Bonhoeffer’s works take ecclesiology and ethics directly as their themes, but he offered only one development specific to Christology. However, this development is central to his theology. It is to be found in the lectures he gave under this title at Berlin in 1933 and which were preserved in the form of the notes taken or copied by students. In considering the doctrine of the Person* of Jesus Christ, Bonhoeffer begins with the presence of the Lord crucified and raised up to heaven. He discusses at length the dogmatic constructions of the early church and the Reformation, and approaches the christological controversies of the Reformation period as a disciple of Luther. He agrees with K. Barth and E. Brunner in considering the Council of Chalcedon* to be the touchstone of dogmatics*. In the Ethics, too, Christology plays a fundamental role in the understanding of reality. Since in Jesus Christ “the reality of God passed into the reality of this world,” it is for Christians to “participate through Jesus Christ in the reality of God and of the world” (E 39 Sq). The positive link between Christ and the world is further emphasized in Widerstand und Ergebung. To live a life of “self-responsibility,” to wish to “assume an existence without God,” is not therefore to live impiously, because “God allows himself to be expelled from the world and nailed to the cross,” and because it is “only in this way that he can be with us and help us” (WEN 394).

e) Legacy. Certain of Bonhoeffer’s writings, such as Widerstand und Ergebung (translated into 16 languages) have been read the world over. On the level of academic theology, however, his work has had few repercussions, even in German-speaking countries. Some individual theologians have drawn inspiration from him (in particular his Widerstand und Ergebung) in the working out of their own agendas: for example, G. Ebeling in his hermeneutic* theology, W. Hamilton in his “theology of the death of God,” and H. Müller in his attempt to reconcile Protestant theology with the ideological dominance of the Communist party in the GDR. Through the work of A. Schönherr, a pupil of Bonhoeffer, the phrase “the church for others” played a key role for an evangelical church seeking a path between compromise and refusal in the socialist society of the GDR. Beyond Europe, in Latin America, South Africa and East Asia, Bonhoeffer’s voice has echoed as an encouragement in the ears of Christians fighting for greater social justice.

- D. Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung, Munich, 1951 (Rev. Ed. 1970).
- D. Bonhoeffer, Werke, Ed. E. Bethge, et al., 16 vols., Munich, 1986–98.
- D. Bonhoeffer, Sanctorum Communio: Eine dogmatische Untersuchung zur Soziologie der Kirche, W 1, 1986.
- D. Bonhoeffer, Nachfolge, W 4, 1989 (Le prix de la grâce, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1962).
- D. Bonhoeffer, Ethik, W 6, 1992.
- ♦ H. Müller (1961), Von der Kirche zur Welt: Ein Beitrag zu der Beziehung des Wortes Gottes auf die societas in Dietrich Bonhoeffers theologischer Entwicklung, Leipzig (2nd Ed. 1966).
- E. Bethge (1967), Dietrich Bonhoeffer: Theologie, Christ, Zeitgenosse, Munich (6th Ed. 1986).
- A. Dumas (1968), Une théologie de la réalité: Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Geneva.
- E. Feil (1971), Die Theologie Dietrich Bonhoeffers: Hermeneutik, Christologie, Weltverständnis, Munich (4th Ed. 1991).
- C. Gremmels, I. Tödt (Ed.) (1987), Die Präsenz des verdrängten Gottes: Glaube, Religionslosigkeit und Weltverantwortung nach Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Munich.
- G. Carter, et al. (Ed.) (1991), Bonhoeffer’s Ethics: Old Europe and New Frontiers, Kampen (From the Fifth Conference of the International Bonhoeffer Society, Amsterdam, 1988).
- J. von Soosten (1992), Die Sozialität der Kirche: Theologie und

Theorie in Dietrich Bonhoeffers, Sanctorum Communio, Munich.
 E. Feil (Ed.) (1993), Glauben lernen in einer Kirche für andere: Der Beitrag Dietrich Bonhoeffers zum Christsein in der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik, Gütersloh.
 Coll. (1995), Dietrich Bonhoeffer heute, EvTh 55.

E. Feil (Ed.) (1997), Internationale Biographie zu Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Gütersloh.

ERNST-ALBERT SCHARFFENORTH

See also Balthasar, Hans Urs von; Barth, Karl; Bultmann, Rudolf; Secularization; Tillich, Paul

Bonnetty, Augustine. See Fideism

Book

The Hebrew séfer, which appears approximately 190 times in the Bible*, probably comes from the Akkadian sipru (meaning “letter” or “written document”), which also yielded saparu (“decree” or “legal document”). In the Septuagint it is most often translated by the Greek biblion, and sometimes biblos (feminine). The same terms appear in the New Testament (biblion appears 34 times and biblos, with a similar meaning, 10 times). The transposition of the Greek plural (1 Macc 1:56), which in Latin became biblia, produced the French feminine form la Bible. Translation by the word book covers very diverse meanings, to be evaluated case by case. In the Bible, a book is a document written in any of several different media—stone (the “tablets” of Ex 24:12, 31:18, and 32:15), clay, wood, papyrus, leather (parchment), and copper—of very variable length. These writings were endowed with a particular authority* and intended to be read by a defined human group.

Because of the materials used, and especially because of the difficulties of writing, written documents were long the reserved domain of specialized scribes. Their activity took place in five privileged areas. First came everything that touched on the founding myths*, including the epic Gilgamesh and the creation* poem Enuma Elish, both of which took on their classic forms in Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar I. Texts of laws were also inscribed, such as the code of Hammurabi, ruler of Babylon in the 18th century B.C. (The diorite stele enscribed with Hammurabi’s code is now in the Louvre Museum.) Documents were often kept in temples (see Dt 31:24–26). Diplomatic or commercial treaties were also committed to writing. Scribes also kept in writing the annals of the kings, such as those of Sennacherib and Assurbanipal (eighth century B.C.). We no longer have the sources cited by the compilers of the Bible, such as the “Book of the Acts of Solomon” (1 Kgs 11:41), the “Book of the Annals of the Kings” of Israel and Judah (1 Kgs 14:19, 29; 2 Kgs 23:28, 24:5). Finally, the scribes took the trouble to preserve accounts of wisdom*, often very ancient—for example, the Egyptian “The Instruction of Amenemope,” which has parallels in Proverbs 22:17–23:14. Deuteronomy 6:9 and 11:20 presuppose a democratization of the practice of writing, as it instructs the father of the family* is to write excerpts from the law* for his household.

Around the beginning of the first millennium B.C., the alphabet supplanted the cumbersome pictographic systems of Egypt and Mesopotamia, and insured a more rapid spread of writing, as attested by archeology. As a result, at the time of the first kings of Israel a substantial body of oral traditions came to be transcribed in writing. Transcription became necessary to enable all the tribes to possess a common history*. We no longer have the “Book of the Wars* of the Lord,” cited in Numbers 21:14, nor the “Book of Jashar” (see Jos 10:13 and 2 Sm 1:18), which was probably related to the entry into Canaan. The book form would also become the instrument for a common law. A great place was given to the discovery of the book in the Temple* in 622 B.C. (2 Kgs 22 and 23). The identification of this book with a part of Deuteronomy (De Wette 1817) is now generally accepted. But the book that was preserved in the Temple lacked readers. With the reform of Josiah, the “book of the law,” in the words of Deuteronomy (28:58 and 61, 29:20, and 31:26), Joshua (1:8, 8:34, and 24:26), and Nehemiah (8:3 and 9:3) became a reference for the people*. What was written was normative, even for the king (Dt 17:18). This was “the Book of the Covenant*” (2 Kgs 23:2, 21)—that is, it contained what had to be done to remain within that Covenant. The loss and the forgetting of the book brought about the loss and the forgetting of the Covenant.

The word of the prophet* dies at the very moment that it is spoken. But, in order to keep these words alive and ensure the survival of some witness to the pronouncements made against an Israel* that was unfaithful to the law, the prophets set them down in writing (Is 30:8; Jer 30:2; Hb 2:2) or, more often, their disciples did so (Jer 36:2 and 36:18). This writing was often carried out over the course of several centuries, before concluding in a completed book containing oracles from which “nothing will be taken away.” The documentation that was assembled by Nehemiah (according to 2 Macc 2:13–14) deals essentially with kings and prophets. Far from being devalued speech, writing became an enduring reality, making sense for times and situations other than those in which the word was originally proclaimed, and supporting repetitions for readers still to come.

Gradually, the “book” was able to bear a strong symbolic charge. Whereas God had put his words directly into Jeremiah’s mouth (Jer 1:9), Ezekiel is given a “book” to eat (Ez 3:1). The prophet incorporates a divine will that takes the form of a universal project covering all of history. The author of Ecclesiasticus identifies personified Wisdom with the “Book of the Covenant” (Sir 24:23), in which he discovers the work of God since the Creation*. There came a time of apocalypses, which gave prominence to the theme of the sealed book, the ultimate revelation* (Dn 7:10; Rev 5:1–10 and 20:12). The New Testament (especially the Gospel according to Luke) presents Jesus* with the book (Lk 4:16–21) and sees Jesus as a hermeneutic interpreter of all the Scriptures* (Lk 24:27, 44 f.).

- L. Alonso-Schoeckel (1965), La Palabra inspirada, Barcelona.
- L. Febvre (1971), L'apparition du livre, Paris.
- S. Breton (1979), Écriture et Révélation, Paris.
- A. Lemaire (1981), Les écoles et la formation de la Bible dans l'ancien Israël, OBO 39.
- B. Gabel, C. B. Wheeler (1986), The Bible as Literature, Oxford.
- W. Kelber (1991), Tradition orale et écriture, Paris.
- J. Goody (1993), The Interface between the Written and the Oral, Cambridge.
- A. Paul (1995), “Les diverses dénominations de la Bible,” RSR 83, 373–402.
- J.-P. Sonnet (1997), The Book within the Book: Writing in Deuteronomy, Leyden.

ALAIN MARCHADOUR

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Bible; Canon of Scriptures; Holy Scripture; Law and Christianity; Word of God

Brethren of the Common Life. See Devotio moderna

Bruno, Giordano. See Naturalism

Bucer, Martin

1491–1551

Martin Bucer, son and grandson of coopers, was born in Sélestat and died in Cambridge. His life as a reformer reflected a turbulent time, was laden with theological and ecclesiastical plans, and was filled with success and failure. After joining the Dominican order in Sélestat in 1506–7, he was restless for more than 10 years—“need makes the monk,” he would say later. Fate would have it that he would join the friars of the Heidelberg order, where, in 1518, he met Martin Luther*, who was then at the beginning of his public career as reformer. The Heidelberg debate converted* Bucer to “Martinian” ideas. Luther’s theology*, in its basic assertions, was thenceforth part of Bucer’s own thinking. They included the priority of the Scriptures over tradition*, justification through faith* alone, and the primacy of academic theology over traditional ecclesiastical institutions.

In 1521 Bucer withdrew from his order, left the priesthood, and was officially relieved of his monastic vows. He spent some time with the knights Franz Von Sickingen and Ulrich Von Hutten, the last defenders of a form of feudalism that had been momentarily revived by humanism*. He married Élisabeth Silbereisen, a cloistered nun, who had also been recently defrocked. Because authorities wanted to excommunicate him, Bucer took refuge with his pregnant wife in Strasbourg, where his father was citizen. He then launched a 23-year-long career as pastor* and reformer in that Alsatian city. From there, he traveled through a large part of Europe, on horse or by mail coach, turning his city into one of the centers of the Reformation. For Bucer, Strasbourg was an ideal platform for the reform movement, not only inside his own pastorate but outside it as well. The ministry* of the reformer would go out and bring his reforms into the Strasbourg commune. Moreover, this partnership between a man and his city was characteristic of the Reformation, finding echoes in Luther, Zwingli*, Farel, Calvin*, and many others.

From the beginning of his ministry, Bucer had a fundamental insight: the church is thrust into the center of a society* and must always continue evangelizing. The church and Christendom are inextricably linked together, including all of humanity. Both have a continual missionary task.

Both in his thinking and destiny, Bucer had a kind of stigmata, a chronic wound from his century, that never healed, but was constantly being reopened. It resulted from the conflict between seeing the church as responsible for all of human society and seeing it as an inward-looking entity on the margin of the “other” humanity—an inclusive or exclusive church. Bucer himself would never undo this Gordian knot, preferring to defend the idea of a church that is both at the same time, like the mission* that Christ* himself seemed to have entrusted to his disciples (Mt 28).

In 1524, in his capacity as secular priest*, Bucer was appointed preacher of one of seven parishes of the Alsatian city of Sainte-Aurélien, the community of the guild of market farmers. The people there were unhappy with their parish priest’s lack of theological education. In the parish ministry, Bucer suggested that in order for the Reformation to be genuine, it had to constantly have practical repercussions. Consequently, he became pragmatic and remained so from then on, never hesitating to change opinion or direction when required to do so as the pastor of his flock. Historians have often commented on Bucer’s changing quality. He never became a theoretician and didn’t want to. This partly explains why he was not understood in his lifetime—in particular, among his theologian colleagues. He never liked overly resolved positions. For Bucer, the meaning of all human existence was living otherwise by living for others as they are in their everyday life. Service in love*—charity—is the only goal worthy of saved man; it is the antidote for egotism, real life that has become possible again. All of Bucer's theological thought stems from this standpoint, and the church was to be the place to establish this "living in Christ."

As early as 1530, at the imperial Diet of Augsburg, Bucer specified the principal points that were particular to his ecclesiastical plan: 1) The multitudinous aspect of the church (open to society, in accordance with a maximalist definition) should coexist with the professing aspect (intense personal commitment and claimed as such) as experienced in the parish and in "small Christian communities" (ecclésiotes, in French) that are created within them; 2) plurality of the ministries; 3) collaboration between ministry and civil authority*; 4) ecclesiastic* discipline based on ordinances expressed by the magistrate; 5) restructuring of the parishes; 6) regular synods* composed of secular* delegates and "pastors"; 7) catechetical education for both children and adults; (8) baptism* of children, followed by a reformulated confirmation*; and 9) attempts to reconcile ecumenical bodies with the dissidents of the magisterial Reformation as well with the traditional church.

All of Bucer's work—theological, pastoral, literary, and diplomatic—was devoted to these nine major points. And yet, his standards seem to have been set too high. As early as 1540–41, his undertakings, which were formerly successful, began to deteriorate. Although he struggled, traveled relentlessly through Europe, and wrote more incisively and extensively, nothing developed. His ecclesiastic plan, symbolized by the final attempt at "Christian communities," those small local churches among large parishes, crumbled. Ostracized from Strasbourg in April 1549, he lived in exile in Cambridge. Disappointed but headstrong, Bucer tried one more time, in England, to launch his plan. Time had taken its toll. He still had the heart, but no longer the strength. He died two years after his arrival in Cambridge, complaining of English fog and "bad" times. Forgotten by his peers, his vision for the church would take root in Protestantism* like a rhizome, cropping up in different forms, especially in 17th- and 18th-century Pietism*, and in the 19th century's Great Awakening.

- Bucer, Martin. Consilium theologicum privatim conscriptum. (Martini Bucer Opera omnia. Series II, Opera Latina; vol. 4) (Studies in Medieval and Reformation Thought; vol. 42), Leyden-New York, 1988.
- Bucer, Martin. Enarratio in Evangelion Iohannis. (Martini Bucer Opera Omnia. Series II, Opera Latina; vol. 2) (Studies in Medieval and Reformation Thought; vol. 40) Leyden-New York, 1988.
- ♦ C. Hopf (1946), Martin B. and the English Reformation, Oxford.
- K. Koch (1962), Studium pietatis: Martin B. als Ethiker, Neukirchen.
- J. Müller (1965), Martin B. Hermeneutik, Gütersloh.
- P. Stephens (1970), The Holy Spirit in the Theology of Martin B., Cambridge.
- M. de Kroon, F. Krüger (Ed.) (1976), B. und seine Zeit, Wiesbaden.
- G. Hammann (1984), Entre la secte et la cité: Le projet d'Église de Martin B., Geneva.
- J. V. Pollet (1985), Martin B., vol. I: Études; vol. II: Documents, Leyden.
- M. Greschat (1990), Martin B.: Ein Reformator und seine Zeit, 1491–1551, Munich.
- Coll. (1993), Martin B. in Sixteenth-Century Europe: Actes du Colloque de Strasbourg (28–31 août 1991), vols. I and II, Leyden-New York-Köln.
- D. F. Wright (Ed.) (1994), Martin B. Reforming Church and Community, Cambridge.

GOTTFRIED HAMMANN

See also Calvin, John; Calvinism; Gospels; Luther, Martin; Lutheranism; Methodism; Protestantism

Bultmann, Rudolf

1884–1976

I. Life and Works

Between 1921 and 1951, after completing studies in theology, Rudolf Bultmann taught the New Testament in Marburg, West Germany. In 1923 he met Heidegger*, who greatly influenced his thought. Most of Bultmann's writing focuses on exegesis of the New Testament. His thought has a threefold mission: to attest to the radical exigency of God* calling man; to read texts expressing this exigency, using all the resources of modern literary criticism; and to understand that this calling plays an essential role in recording the human condition, which is seen as existential.

II. Theology

1. Reading and Understanding the New Testament

As a teacher of the New Testament, Bultmann first and foremost had remarkable knowledge about the world and Greek culture, and he was an unparalleled exegete. To the end, his work revolved around questions relative to the New Testament. Bultmann's theological genius lies in the fact that he is far from being purely erudite; he questions the significance of ancient texts for today's world and raises the question of modes of interpretation.

a) History of the Synoptic Tradition. In 1921 Bultmann was one of the first to show the "mechanism" behind the literary formation of the synoptic Gospels*. By comparing the three synoptic Gospels, in his History of the Synoptic Tradition, he shows that the current gospel framework is not formed by a single story, but by relatively small units that, to start, were more or less independent. Therefore, he retraces the "history of forms" (Formgeschichte). Analyzing each of these "forms," or basic units, Bultmann is led to determine the life situation—or Sitz im Leben—in which they may have been written. He then reconstitutes the stages of writing that, ever since the first texts were collected, may have led to the present text of the Gospels. It is from this history that Bultmann is able to tackle the question of the historical Jesus.

b) Jesus. According to Bultmann, in Jesus (1926; translated into English as Jesus and the World, 1934), there is almost nothing to say about the historical Jesus inasmuch as the texts of the New Testament are more testaments of the faith* of the early Christians than historical documents. As a result, in terms of faith, what is important is not so much the content as the radical event to which it attests, essentially indicated by the message brought by Jesus. Indeed, even though only some historically questionable facts are known of Jesus' life, the Nazarene's message is not beyond reach. In essence, Jesus announced the approaching kingdom* of God—that is to say, God himself—and called for a decision. Jesus' call to faith is thus like an invitation to "take the omnipotence of God (divine power) seriously, at precise moments in life. . . . It is the conviction that the faraway God is, in reality, the nearby God, under the condition that man decides to let go of his normal attitude and that he is really ready to see the nearby God before him" (Jesus).

c) Existential Interpretation and Hermeneutics. Bultmann saw the New Testament as fundamentally revealing the existential reality of the human condition. His reading of the Bible* strives to be resolutely modern or contemporary in at least two ways: "scientific," in that it retraces the evolutionary stages of the faith of the early Christians and reveals truly fundamental elements of the mythical elements that propel them, and "existential," in the sense of the existential philosophy* that was then emerging—the message in the Bible shows elements of the authentic coming of the human subject before his humanity, which is ek-sistence, stemming from the self to access the self, through the event of grace* and the decision of faith. This method of interpretation, which Bultmann took from the New Testament itself, especially allows us to better understand the "genius" of his commentary on the Gospel According to John (1941) and it opens the way for his Theology of the New Testament (1953).

d) Kerygma and Mythos. In 1941 Bultmann gave a lecture titled "New Testament and Mythology" (see L'interprétation du Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1955) that, once the war ended, caused a great uproar that lasted until the mid-1960s. The lecture shows that the language of early Christianity is prescientific and essentially influenced by myth*. The same is true for early Christian representations of the world in general and the more or less "miraculous" ways of describing things, particularly the interventions of God. Nevertheless, although the forms of this language seem irretrievably outdated and incomprehensible to modern man, the message, or kerygma, within the text remains relevant and contemporary.

It belongs to the theology that is forever extracting the message—kerygma or Word* of God—from the mythic layers in which it is both couched and imprisoned, thus making the message available to readers of this day and age. This is the goal of "demythologizing" the New Testament. This idea caused a great uproar and was widely debated; it was both enthusiastically supported and vehemently condemned. Most of the components of the controversy appear in the five volumes of Kerygma und Mythos (1948–55).

2. Man before the Calling of God

a) Faith and Understanding. Glauben und Verstehen (Faith and Understanding) is the title of the four volumes that collect the essential aspects of Bultmann's strictly theological thought. It indicates that the two realities of faith and reason* do not contradict each other, but rather echo each other, while being on different levels. Indeed, faith is strictly existential. It does not consist in understanding something, but in understanding itself in a radical, authentic way. To believe is to understand oneself before God. However, sinners "want to live on their own, by their own means, instead of living from radical abandonment to God, which God grants and sends. The grace of God liberates them from this sin*, they open themselves to it through radical abandon—that is, into faith" (Glauben und Verstehen, II, p. 60). As for "understanding," the essential goal is to allow human reason to play its part autonomously. It is not existential, but it sheds light on the existential, reveals the forms of its language, and allows us to return to the event of the decision of which it is made and to its consequences. To "understand" is to have a foretaste—a "precomprehension" (ein Vorverständnis)—of authentic existence. It does not, however, bring it about. Only the daß can reach it, the pure kerygma event that tears man from his inauthentic torpor.

b) History and Eschatology. Led by the decision of faith, to be made again and again at every moment in order to exist authentically, the believer reaches authentic humanity, stamped with the seal of historicity. To exist is to tear oneself away from anonymous destiny; it is to enter into one's own historicity, discovering one's ability to decide. The eschatological dimension that fills the entire New Testament is henceforth understood as the horizon of the "final" call that, from God himself, rings out to summon us to the authentic decision and to bring about genuine historicity.

In Jesus' preaching, the "end" of history, about which eschatology* speaks in general terms, is understood as the end of the individual it addresses, and the individual confronts the "final" responsibilities that are his own. Thus, the New Testament both individualizes and historicizes eschatology. Eschatology no longer only belongs to the end of history, but penetrates it in order to transform it. Playing off semantic meanings that do not work in other languages, Bultmann says that eschatology brings history from the pure occurrence of facts (Historie) to Geschichte (from the verb geschehen, meaning "to arise," "to come to pass," or "to happen"). At this point, man finds himself formed in his very historicity (History and Eschatology, 1957).

c) Ethics. The sign of kerygma renders a decision on ethics necessary. This is, however, but another form of the decision of faith itself. The fundamental ethical decision only implements the opening that the decision of faith creates because of its very nature. This opening then takes on the form of neighborly love*. As radical exigency, open to all neighbors without restriction or discrimination, love is certainly called to take on concrete forms every day. However, love is not exhausted in these forms, and what characterizes it above all involves the infinite exigency that it fundamentally carries.

III. Posterity

We have especially discussed the Bultmannian school from the 1950s and 1960s, in relation to his proposal for demythologizing the New Testament and the consequences it could have both in terms of the faith of the believer and in terms of possible investigations into the "historical Jesus." Following E. Käsemann's lead, some have indeed shown that the "historical Jesus" is perhaps not as unattainable as our Marburg professor had thought. Moreover, theologians like Oscar Cullmann have attempted to react to this way of dissolving history by developing a theology of "the history of salvation." Nevertheless, despite some exaggerations, Bultmann was able to develop a proposal that strongly marked his era and he did so with rare coherence.

- A bibliography of Bultmann's works (1908–67) appears in Bultmann (1967), Exegetica, Ed. E. Dinkler, Tübingen. For 1967–74, see ThR (1974) 39, 91–93. See also M. Kwiran (1977), Index to Literature on Barth, Bonhoeffer und Bultmann, Basel.
- R. Bultmann (1921), Geschichte des synoptischen Tradition, Göttingen.
- R. Bultmann (1926), Jesus, Berlin.
- R. Bultmann (1949), Das Urchristentum im Rahmen des antiken Religionen, Zurich.
- R. Bultmann (1953), Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Tübingen.
- R. Bultmann (1955), L'interprétation du Nouveau Testament, Ed. and Tr. O. Laffoucrière, Paris.
- R. Bultmann (1933–65), Glauben und Verstehen, 4 vols., Tübingen.
- R. Bultmann (1958), Geschichte und Eschatologie, Tübingen.
- ◆ K. Barth (1952), Rudolf B.: Ein Versuch, ihn zu verstehen, ThSt(B) 34.
- G. Ebeling (1962), Theologie und Verkündigung: Ein Gespräch mit Rudolf B., Tübingen.
- R. Marlé (1962), Mythos et Logos: La pensée de Rudolf B., Geneva.
- G. Hasenhüttl (1963), Der Glaubensvollzug: Eine Begegnung mit Rudolf B. aus katholischem Glaubensverständnis, Essen.
- R. Marlé (1966), B. et l'interprétation du Nouveau Testament, Paris.
- W. Schmithals (1967), Die Theologie Rudolf Bultmanns, 2nd Ed., Tübingen.
- A. Malet (1968), B., Paris.
- J. Florkowski (1971), La théologie de la foi chez B., Paris.
- A. Malet (1971), La pensée de Rudolf B., Geneva.

- M. Boutin (1974), Relationalität als Verstehensprinzip bei Rudolf B., Munich.
- G. Ebeling (1977), Gedenken an Rudolf B., Tübingen.
- W. Schmithals (1980), "Bultmann, R.," TRE 7, 387–96.
- A. C. Thiselton (1980), The Two Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description with Special Reference to Heidegger, Bultmann, Gadamer and Wittgenstein, Exeter.
- M. Evang (1988), Rudolf B. in seiner Frühzeit, Tübingen.
- E. Hausschildt (1989), Rudolf Bultmanns Predigten: Existenziale Interpretation und Lutherische Erbe, Marburg.
- E. Jüngel (1990), "Glauben und Verstehen, Zum Theologiebegriff Rudolf Bultmanns," in Wertlose Wahrheit, Munich, 16–77.
- E. Baasland (1992), Theologie und Methode: Eine historiographische Analyse der Frühschriften Rudolf Bultmanns, Wuppertal.
- F. J. Gagey (1993), Jésus dans la théologie de B., Paris.
- R. Gibellini (1994), Panorama de la théologie au XXe s., Paris, p. 33–62.

JEAN-FRANÇOIS COLLANGE

See also Barth, Karl; Bonhoeffer, Dietrich; Canon of Scriptures; Heidegger, Martin; Hermeneutics; Literary Genres in Scripture; Myth

Cajetan, Thomas de Vio. See Thomism

Calvin, John

1509–64

The most important figure in the Protestant Reformation after Luther*, Calvin was born in Noyon in 1509. His father was a notary and secretary of the episcopal court and planned a career in the Church for his son. Calvin had a thorough education and solid humanistic training. We know that he spent a year (1522–23 or 1523–24) at the Collège de la Marche in Paris and then four years at the Collège Montaigu, where he earned a master of arts. He should then have begun theological studies, but contrary to his original intention his father had him study law*. Calvin says that this was because law was more lucrative, but it was probably not by chance that at the same time his father was in conflict with the cathedral chapter (he died excommunicate a few years later). Calvin studied law for four years in Orléans and Bourges and during this time began to study Greek with Melchior Wolmar. He then began a career as a humanist, as evidenced by the publication in Paris in 1532 of his commentary on Seneca's De clementia. It is not known whether Calvin was already consciously a Protestant at this time; the date of what he was to call his sudden conversion* (subita conversio) remains unknown. But in 1533 his friend Nicolas Cop, rector of the University of Paris, delivered an inaugural lecture that owed a good deal to Luther. Cop had to leave Paris as a consequence, and Calvin did the same. There followed three years of wandering in and out of France, during which Calvin went as far as Ferrara. In 1534 he abandoned the church livings that had allowed him to finance his studies, and in 1535, in Basel, he finished the first edition of Christianae Religionis Institutio, adorned with a dedication to François I that was at the same time a passionate defense of the persecuted French Protestants. The work was published in Basel in early 1536. At around the same time, Calvin returned to France for the last time and left with the intention of making a literary or scholarly career in Strasbourg or Basel, both of which were centers of Protestant humanism*. But his journey took him to Geneva, and this was the decisive moment of his life.

Geneva had just become independent from Savoy and joined the Reformation, largely impelled by the fiery preaching* of Guillaume Farel (1489–1565). When Farel learned of the presence of the young Calvin in Geneva, he came to ask him to stay and help him construct a Protestant Church and a Protestant society. Nothing was further from Calvin's intentions. He had no experience of organization or administration and wished for only one thing: to lead the quiet life of a scholar. But Farel solemnly cursed Calvin's future studies if he did not stay in Geneva. Calvin recognized the voice of God* and stayed.

He was first named a simple reader at Saint-Peter, but he soon became the leading minister. By 1537 he had already sketched plans for the organization of the life of the Church of Geneva, a confession of faith, and a catechism. But the population did not look kindly on the Church that had now been reformed at the hands of the French. The crisis came to a head at Easter 1538, when the three ministers, Calvin, Farel, and Coraud, refused to celebrate communion* because of the tensions existing in the city. They were immediately expelled. Calvin accepted an invitation from Martin Bucer (1491–1551) to Strasbourg, where he was minister of the French community in exile from 1538 to 1541. However, the political climate of Geneva changed, and he returned there in the autumn of 1541 and stayed until his death in 1564.

His second stay in Geneva was marked by a certain number of conflicts, many of which have left traces in the image we have of him. The best-known episode is the condemnation of Michel Servet (1511–53), who died at the stake because of his heretical views on the Trinity*. It is still spoken of as though it were the act of Calvin alone and as though it were an exceptional case in the 16th century. Other cases (such as that of Bolsec [?–1584] in 1551, tried for having opposed the Calvinist doctrine of predestination*, and the execution of Gruet in 1547 for blasphemy and pornography) and the generally negative image that we have of the way in which the consistory imposed the discipline of the Church point in the same direction. However, Calvin was never a dictator. Until at least 1555 his position in the city was precarious; and as for the decisions of the consistory (including those of Calvin), they were not always as harsh as certain extreme cases might lead one to believe. Recent historical work presents a more balanced picture, but the caricature of Calvin, as repeated, for example, by Stefan Zweig in Castellio gegen Calvin, will no doubt be difficult to change.

When Calvin arrived on the theological stage, the Protestant movement was already strongly divided by disagreements about the Eucharist between supporters of Luther and supporters of Zwingli*. Calvin felt closer to Luther, although he did not accept his more extreme views, in particular the conception (“ubiquism”) that accorded omnipresence to the risen humanity of Christ*. But his principal concern was to reconcile the opponents. In this he was in agreement with Bucer, although he did not appreciate Bucer's tendency to rely on the ambiguity of formulations to conceal real doctrinal differences. He was persuaded that the reasons for the conflict would disappear if a serious study of the question were made from biblical and theological perspectives, and he at first thought—as seen, for example, in his Short Treatise on the Lord's Supper (1541)—that this was possible. But although he was able to reach a doctrinal agreement with Heinrich Bullinger (1504–75), what is now known as the Consensus Tigurinus of 1549, and to come to a common view with Ph. Melancthon (1497–1560), the controversy revived in his final years, particularly with the most rigid Lutherans, such as Westphal and Heshusius. Their disagreement on the Eucharist, on some points of Christology*, and on predestination thus separated the Lutheran and Reformed Churches until the Concord of Leuenberg in 1973. But the dispute had political or ecclesiastical significance only in places where large numbers of the two communities lived side by side, that is, especially in Germany. In Geneva, Calvin was the principal planner, organizer, and leader of the Reformed Church. He was the one who gave the Church its structure, its liturgy*, its religious music*, and its discipline. As early as his proposals of 1537, he intended to organize the spiritual life* of the community around the regular celebration of Communion, but he never managed to persuade the Genevans to make it as frequent as he wished.

He did accomplish two of his plans: the introduction of the singing of the Psalms* in the liturgy and the establishment of a system of supervision by the elders. In the Ecclesiastical Ordinances of 1541 Calvin proposed a fourfold division of functions in the Church (pastor*, doctor, elder, and deacon*), as well as the establishment of a consistory, a group of ministers and elders that was to supervise the life of the Church and examine cases worthy of censure (from reprimand to excommunication). He thereby established the presbyterian-synodal system of church government* that is still, broadly speaking, in operation in Reformed Churches throughout the world.

From the liturgical and homiletic point of view, Calvin's Geneva followed the Swiss tradition inaugurated by Zwingli. The structure of the service was founded on that of the medieval sermon rather than that of the Mass, and preaching followed the method of lectio continua of the Bible* rather than the division into pericopes used in the Middle Ages. Calvin himself preached in an improvisatory style several times a week. From 1549 his sermons were transcribed and corrected for distribution. We have several hundred of them (189 on Acts and 342 on Isaiah). He also frequently made commentaries on the Old and New Testaments in his capacity as doctor of the school of Geneva, which was to become an academy in 1559 when Théodore de Bèze (1519–1605) was called to Geneva to assume leadership of it.

We may classify the very numerous works of Calvin under five rubrics:

- 1) The Institution of Christian Religion, “in which is included a summary of piety, and almost everything that it is necessary to know in the doctrine of salvation.” In the first edition (1536), written in Latin, the Institutio contained six chapters and followed the outline of Luther’s catechisms: law*, faith*, prayer*, the sacraments*, the false sacraments, and Christian liberty*. In 1539 Calvin reworked and augmented the text, abandoning this outline but not replacing it with a different coherent structure. The third edition in 1543, modified again in 1545 and 1550, was even longer and still without a satisfactory form. Finally, the fourth edition of 1559, longer than all the earlier ones, organized the material into four books following the pattern of the earlier creeds: knowledge of the Creator, knowledge of the Redeemer, participation in the grace* of Christ (broad terms, the themes of sanctification, justification*, and predestination), and visible mediations (particularly the Church and the sacraments but also political organization in the final chapter). This edition of the Institutio is the most thorough and complete exposition of Calvin’s theology. It well deserves its status as a classic of Christian dogmatics*, even though a substantial number of the additions made between 1536 and 1559 are strongly polemical and reflect all the controversies in which Calvin had been involved over the quarter century separating the first from the final version. It is a systematic work: that is, it presents only one aspect of Calvin’s thought, although it is an essential aspect. Other works show the operation of this constantly probing intelligence from other angles, and the Institutio alone cannot provide an accurate idea of its author. The French translation of the Institutio by Calvin himself, published in 1541, also played a decisive role in the evolution of the French language and French literature.
- 2) The exegetical work. Alongside the hundreds of sermons already mentioned, there are a series of Commentaries on the entire New Testament, with the exception of 1 and 2 John and Revelation. The latter he admitted barely understanding. These commentaries appeared at irregular intervals between 1540 (Romans) and 1555 (Harmony of the Gospels). Calvin did not write commentaries on all of the Old Testament, and only some of the works that he published on the subject, from 1551 on, can be considered commentaries in the modern sense of the word (Isaiah, Genesis, Pentateuch, and Joshua). The others are the fruit of sermons or exegetical lectures.

- 3) The polemical work. Calvin also wrote a large number of apologetic works defending the Reformation and polemical works on controversial theological subjects. A good example of the former is the Reply to Sadolet that Calvin wrote during his stay in Strasbourg in 1539. The best known of the latter is the treatise De aeterna praedestinatione Dei of 1552, which repeats and develops arguments on free will and predestination already used against Albert Pighi (c. 1490–1542) in his Defensio sanae et orthodoxae doctrinae (1543).
- 4) The catechisms and confessions. Along with the Ecclesiastical Ordinances should be mentioned the Geneva Catechism and Form of Prayers and Ecclesiastical Chants (both 1542). It was also Calvin who prepared the first sketch of the Confessio gallica in 1559, one of the major texts of this kind in the 16th century.
- 5) The correspondence. This was very large, and extended from England in the west to Poland and Hungary in the east. Like Bullinger in Zurich, Calvin was in constant contact not only with friends or other reformers but also with entire communities, refugees, former students in prison and sometimes martyred for their faith, members of the petty or high nobility, princes, and monarchs. His letters shed extraordinary light on his life, his interests, and his activities but also on the tumultuous history of the Reformation and the beginnings of the Counter-Reformation.

The principal characteristics of Calvin’s theology are as follows. Like Luther, Calvin belongs to the Augustinian tradition, which explains his insistence on the corruption of human nature, the ineffectiveness of works for salvation, and justification sola gratia and sola fide. It is in this context that we must situate his concept of dual predestination. However, Calvin goes much further in this area than the Augustinian tradition, as represented, for example, by Thomas* Aquinas, for he holds not only that some are predestined for salvation while others are cast aside (the “outcast”) but also that predestination to damnation is a deliberate act of divine sovereignty. Such an idea of God obviously poses a problem, from which have arisen many conflicts in Reformed theology up to and including the recapitulation of the entire question by Barth* (KD II/2). But it is not really the confessional specificity of Calvinism*, which is limited to making explicit ideas that were indeed bequeathed by Augustine*.

There are also differences between Calvin and Luther, some of which are due to Calvin's humanistic education. Alongside justification, Calvin laid emphasis on sanctification, the continuous work of the Holy* Spirit, on the tertius usus legis (ethical practice) as the principal function of the law as opposed to Luther's preference for the usus elencticus (law made to convict man of sin*), and on the continuity between the Old and New Testaments. The importance of the role of the Holy Spirit is particularly apparent in the Calvinist doctrine of the Eucharist: it is the Spirit that "abolishes distance" and unites us in the sacrament with the risen Christ who has ascended to heaven. This last point brings to the fore what Lutherans were to call the "extra calvinisticum," the idea that the divine nature of Christ transcends the confines of his humanity. One might say that on this point Calvin is close to the school of Antioch*, while Luther has more affinities with the school of Alexandria.* But Calvin also went further than Luther on another point in restoring force to the second commandment* (the prohibition of images*) and by strictly imposing it in the architecture* and decoration of churches.

In contrast to medieval theology—about which he generally spoke ill, although he certainly owed more to it than he thought—Calvin, like other reformers, criticized speculation and allegory. Allegory finds in texts meanings that are not there, and speculation seeks a knowledge of God that is abstract and therefore sterile. Calvin thus begins the Institutio by clearly indicating the link between knowledge* of God and self-knowledge, asserts that all true knowledge of God comes from obedience—that it serves the honor of God and our interests and is inseparable from piety—and asks what God is in relation to us rather than what he is in himself (Institutio I. 1–2). In his exegesis* of the Old Testament in particular, Calvin is careful not to give a prematurely christological interpretation of texts, and he pays much more attention to the traditions of Jewish exegesis than many other commentators.

Calvin did not believe himself called on to do original work, rather that he had been given the task of restoring the "true face of the Church," something that had been more visible in the early centuries, according to him, than in the thousand years preceding the Reformation. The Institutio was in his view a manual of Christian philosophy: once it existed, he would be able to devote himself to exegesis of and commentary on the Bible without the need to undertake investigation as each new theological problem arose. Calvin's commentaries and his correspondence broadened the audience for his work in Geneva without changing its nature. It was always a matter of reforming the Church for the glory of God and the good of the people of God. There can be no doubt that Calvin was a major figure in the history of the Church.

- Joannis Calvini, Opera omnia, vols. 1–59, Brunswick (1869–95).
- Joannis Calvini, Opera selecta, vols. 1–5, Stuttgart, 1926–36.
- Joannis Calvini, Institution de la religion chrestienne, repr. of the 1541 Edition (J. Pannier, Ed.), 4 vols., Paris, (2nd Ed. 1961); repr. of the 1560 edition (J.-D. Benoît, Ed.), 5 vols., Paris, 1957–63.
- Joannis Calvini, Supplementa calviniana, vols. 1–8, Neukirchen, 1961–94.
- Registres de la Compagnie des Pasteurs de Genève au temps de Calvin*, Ed. R. M. Kingdon, vols. 1–2, Geneva, 1962–64.
- A. Erichson (1900), Bibliographia calviniana, Berlin (Repr. Nieuwkoop, 1960).
- W. Niesel (1961), C.-Bibliographie, 1901–1959, Munich.
- D. Kempff (1975), A Bibliography of Calviniana, 1959–1974, Leiden.
- See Calvin Bibliography published yearly in Calvin Theological Journal since vol. 6 (1971).
- ◆ J. Doumergue (1899–1927), Jean Calvin: Les hommes et les choses de son temps, 7 vols., Lausanne.
- F. Wendel (1950), Calvin: Sources et évolution de sa pensée religieuse, Paris (bibl.); 2nd Rev. Ed., Geneva, 1985.
- P. van Buren (1957), Christ in Our Place: The Substitutionary Character of Calvin's Doctrine of Reconciliation, Edinburgh.
- A. Biéler (1959), La pensée économique et sociale de Calvin, Geneva.
- A. Ganoczy (1964), Calvin théologien de l'Église et du ministère, Paris.
- R. Stauffer (1964), L'humanité de Calvin, Neuchâtel.
- A. Ganoczy (1966), Le jeune Calvin, Wiesbaden.
- T. H. L. Parker (1986), Calvin's Old Testament Commentaries, Edinburgh.
- T. H. L. Parker (1987), John Calvin: A Biography, London.
- E. A. McKee (1988), Elders and the Plural Ministry. The Role of Exegetical History in Illuminating John Calvin's Theology, Geneva.
- T. F. Torrance (1988), The Hermeneutics of John Calvin, Edinburgh.
- R. Gamble (Ed.) (1992), Articles on Calvin and Calvinism, 14 vols., London.
- O. Millet (1992), Calvin et la dynamique de la parole, Paris.
- W. de Greef (1993), The Writings of John Calvin: An Introductory Guide, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- T. H. L. Parker (1993), Calvin's New Testament Commentaries, Edinburgh.
- B. Cottret (1995), Calvin: Biographie, Paris.
- J.-F. Gilmont (1997), Jean Calvin et le livre imprimé, Geneva.
- O. Millet (Ed.) (1998), Calvin et ses contemporains, Geneva.

ALASDAIR HERON

See also Bucer, Martin; Calvinism; Humanism, Christian; Luther, Martin; Lutheranism; Protestantism

Calvinism

Calvinism is not understood as a precise doctrine. Very broadly, the term designates everything that is closely or distantly related to the history and culture of the Reformed Churches*, although John Calvin* (1509–64) was neither the first nor the only leader of the Reformation, and although after Calvin's death, Calvinism was not always faithful to its namesake's way of thinking.

The terms calvinien and Calvinist seem to have appeared in France and England in the second half of the 16th century, which shows the extent to which Calvin was already seen as the principal figure of the Reformation. But the Reformation had begun with Zwingli* in Zurich, and many Reformation leaders, both French and German speaking, were older than Calvin and had become involved in the movement much earlier than he. The Germans included Martin Bucer* (1491–1551), Wolfgang Capiton (1478–1541), Leo Jud (1482–1542), Oswald Geishüsler—also known as Oswald Myconius—(1488–1552), Johannes Huszgen (1482–1531), and Heinrich Bullinger (1504–75). Among the French reformers were Guillaume Farel (1489–1565) and Pierre Viret (1511–71). In the succeeding generation, however, Calvin and Geneva dominated the scene, and his personal influence was considerable throughout Europe, from Hungary to Scotland. Because Calvin's influence was decisive in the Reformed Churches, they can be called Calvinist, even if the title is not entirely accurate. In France, the pejorative synonym “Huguenots” was used, perhaps first applied to the Genevans and then to all Calvinists, derived from the German Eidgenossen, meaning “confederates.”

A sketch of the history of Calvinism in general is essential before being able to provide details of its theological, intellectual, and cultural history. Most of Germany and Scandinavia supported Luther*, whereas the Reformation narrowly defined spread to eastern and western Europe. In the Holy Roman Empire, it took root particularly in the western part of what is now Germany as well as in Bohemia and Hungary. Unlike Lutheranism, the Reformed Church was not officially recognized in the empire until the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648. In France the Huguenots made up a significant minority within a fundamentally hostile state, as attested by the wars of religion in France, the Edict of Nantes, and the consequences of its revocation. Calvinism triumphed in Holland and Scotland, and its widespread influence in England was among the causes of that nation's religious and political crises in the 17th century. Then Calvinism spread to North America with the Puritan emigration. The intellectual history of Calvinism is thus linked to the history of western Europe and North America, particularly in the late 16th and the 17th centuries, when it dominated the scene. The gradual decline of Calvinist orthodoxy, on the other hand, did not bring an end to the influence of Calvinism in general. In eastern Europe, the outcome of the Thirty Years' War did not completely destroy the Calvinist Churches but reduced them to silence. It was only with the Edict of Toleration of Holy Roman Emperor Joseph II in 1781 that they recovered some degree of freedom of expression.

Different forms of Calvinism can be distinguished in the 16th and 17th centuries. In Switzerland the memory of Zwingli remained alive, and Bullinger seemed as important as Calvin to his contemporaries. When the Reformation spread into Germany, Zurich did not play a lesser role than Geneva. And when a particular form of Calvinist theology was developed in Heidelberg around 1560, with Kasper Olevian (1536–87) and Zacharias Ursinus (1534–83), who together drew up the Heidelberg Catechism of 1563, Calvin, Bullinger, and Melancthon (1497–1560) all contributed to it; but this theology, the first form of “federal” theology, was nonetheless a new synthesis.

The influence of Calvin was most notable in France, Holland, and Scotland, although the theologies of resistance to “impious monarchs” that were to be developed in those three countries were entirely contrary to his convictions and recommendations. The indirect consequence of this development was that the second entry of the Reformation onto German territory, around 1600, was more distinctly Calvinist but in a form developed well after the death of Calvin. The political ambitions of the Reformation princes, which were to lead to the disaster of the Thirty Years' War, played a significant role in this outcome. It can nevertheless be said that one of the strengths of Calvinism in general was its capacity to survive even in hostile surroundings, thanks to a rather typically Calvinist sense of the independence of the church* from the state and thanks to specifically ecclesiastical institutions (consistory, synod*, and so on) that had been created in a form that made them impervious to political authorities.

What may be called classical Calvinism was established after the death of Calvin and combined elements taken from Zurich as well as from Geneva. It reached its full development with the Theology of the Covenant (or federal theology) of the mid-17th century. This was a synthesis of the particularly Calvinist notion of predestination* and of a conception of the covenant* that owed more to Zwingli and especially to Bullinger than to Calvin. Bullinger had developed the theme of the single covenant of the Old and New Testaments to defend the practice of the baptism* of children against the Anabaptists*. A distinction was later added between the “covenant of works” (the original Covenant) and the “covenant of grace” (after the Fall), which is in some sense equivalent to the Lutheran dialectic of law and gospel. In Scotland, the concept of covenant took on a markedly social and political connotation, and the idea of the covenant of works was used as a framework for thinking about the political order and natural law, a task to which a number of Reformation writers devoted themselves in the 17th century in Scotland, England, France, Holland, and Germany. Along with the thought of the Puritans, which was decisive in North America, that of the French and English adversaries of absolute monarchy was one of the essential sources of the modern conception of democracy*, the separation of powers, and the social contract.

Federalism reached its full theological development in the middle of the 17th century as evinced by the Westminster Confession (1647) and the Summa Doctrinae de Testamento et Fœdere Dei (1648) of Johannes Koch (1603–69). Meanwhile, the importance of predestination in Reformation doctrine had been brought to the fore by the Arminian controversy. On this question, Jacob Harmensen (1560–1609) defended a more moderate view than Calvin’s and deemed that God decides that some will be saved because he foresees that they will have faith (to a certain extent, they might even “merit” their salvation). In 1618–19, the Synod of Dort rejected five theses presented by the Arminians in their Remonstrance of 1610. The name Remonstrants was later used to designate the Arminians, and the term counter-Remonstrants—or sometimes Gomarists—was used for the victorious supporters of Franciscus Gomarus (1563–1641).

In place of the rejected Arminian theses, the Synod of Dort formulated what are known as the five essential points of Calvinism. They are the following: 1) Human nature is totally corrupted by sin*, (2) divine election is unconditional, (3) the reconciliation bestowed by God* in Jesus Christ is in fact confined to the circle of the elect, (4) grace is irresistible, and (5) the elect will persevere until final salvation*. Thereafter, this unambiguous doctrine of “dual predestination” was to be a source of constant conflict in the Reformation tradition, and only a minority of Churches and theologians would subscribe to it today.

The most remarkable attempt at a reformulation is no doubt that of Karl Barth* (1886–1968) in Die kirchliche Dogmatik (“Church Dogmatics,” II/2, 1–563), although this type of theology is not a Calvinist invention but belongs to the Augustinian tradition (see, e.g., Thomas* Aquinas’s Summa Theologica Ia, question 23). As these examples demonstrate, Calvinist thought is greatly concerned with being systematic, rational, and coherent. This concern with clarity and method is in part the legacy of humanism*, which played a cardinal role in the Reformation. It can also be seen at work in Calvinist circles in the interaction between theology and other disciplines, such as jurisprudence, philosophy*, and the sciences. And in the generations that followed the apogee of federal theology, Reformation thinkers were indeed more creative in these areas than in theology itself, with the remarkable exception of Jonathan Edwards*.

Calvinism generally remained in contact with the movement of ideas. For example, Pierre de la Ramée (1515–72), a professor at the Collège de France who was assassinated in the Saint Bartholomew’s Day Massacre, became a Calvinist at the Colloque de Poissy in 1561, and his logic, linked to Melanchthon’s theology, exercised a profound influence on Protestant thought of the late 16th and the 17th centuries. As another example, the theological and scientific ideas of England’s Francis Bacon (1561–1626) probably owed a good deal to Calvinist influence. We should also note that the Calvinists of the 17th century were generally open to Cartesian ideas—with the exception of the Dutch counter-Remonstrants, who were dominated by the imposing Dutch theologian Gijsbert Voet (1589–1676). And John Locke (1632–1704), although hardly orthodox, was a typical product of the Calvinist intellectual tradition in England. Of primary importance, however, was the Académie réformée of Saumur, founded in 1593. An intellectual center for all of western France, it was particularly remarkable for its professors of Oriental languages and its jurists, who formed what has been called the “critical school,” whose members included John Cameron (1579–1625), Louis Cappel (1585–1658), and Moïse Amyraut (1596–1664). Also important was the Academy of Sedan, among whose teachers was Pierre Bayle (1647–1706), compiler of the celebrated Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (from 1684) and author of the monumental Dictionnaire historique et critique (Rotterdam, 1697). Bayle's influence on the Enlightenment cannot be overestimated. It can thus be said that Calvinism in its way fostered both the Enlightenment (because of its intellectual and systematic aspect) and Pietism*, which was directly derived from the Puritan systematization of the ordo salutis in terms of stages of Christian experience (see the Westminster Confession, X–XX).

Calvinist theology underwent considerable renewal in the 19th century. The father of liberal theology, Friedrich Daniel Ernst Schleiermacher* (1768–1834), belonged to the Reformed tradition, as did more conservative theologians such as the leader of Dutch neo-Calvinism, Abraham Kuyper (1837–1920), Charles Hodge (1797–1878) and Archibald Hodge (1823–86), and Benjamin Warfield of Princeton (1851–1921), not to mention those who inspired the liturgical renewal in the United States and Scotland. In addition, 19th-century Calvinists tried to remedy the fragmentation of their Churches, and the first steps were taken toward federation. The World Alliance of Reformed Churches, created in 1875, is today the largest existing Protestant confessional family and includes more members than the families of Lutherans, Anglicans, Methodists, or Baptists.

The greatest Reformed theologian of the 20th century—although he cannot be confined to narrow confessional limits—is Karl Barth*. One of his most remarkable students, the Scottish theologian T. F. Torrance (1913–), has undertaken an extension of the domain of theological reflection beyond its traditional boundaries by taking into account the problems posed by the natural sciences*. In North America an important role was played by a more conservative and confessional Calvinism of Dutch origin (Cornelius van Til, 1895–1987), but the influence of Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971), who came from a German Reformed background, was probably more significant in the long run. In the years following World War II, along with the Scotsman John Baillie, he was the only Protestant theologian who could really be set against Barth.

- H. Hepppe (Ed.), E. Bizer (Rev.) (1958), Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformierten Kirche, Neukirchen.

- E. F.K. Müller (Ed.) (1903), Die Bekenntnisschriften der reformierten Kirche, Leipzig, Repr. Zurich, 1987.
- W. Niesel (Ed.) (1938), Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der nach Gottes Wort reformierten Kirche, Zurich.
- G. Thompson (Ed.) (1950), Reformed Dogmatics Set Out and Illustrated from Sources, London, repr. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1978.
- L. Vischer (Ed.) (1982), Reformed Witness Today: A Collection of Confessions and Statements of Faith Issued by Reformed Churches, Bern.
- O. Fatio (Ed.) (1986), Confessions et catéchismes de la foi réformée, Geneva.
- ♦A.A. van Schelven (1943, 1951), Calvinisme Gedurende Zijn Bloeitijd, vols. 1–2, Amsterdam.
- J.T. McNeill (1954), The History and Character of Calvinism, Oxford.
- K. Halaski (Ed.) (1977), Die reformierten Kirchen, Stuttgart.
- J.H. Leith (1977), Introduction to the Reformed Tradition, Atlanta.
- W. Neuser (1980), “Dogma und Bekenntnis in der Reformation: Von Zwingli und C. bis zur Synode von Westminster,” HDThG 2, 165–352.
- H. Hart (Ed.) (1983), Rationality in the Calvinian Tradition, Lanham, Md.
- M. Prestwich (Ed.) (1985), International Calvinism 1541–1715, Oxford.
- R. V. Schnucker (Ed.) (1988), Calviniana: Ideas and Influence of John C., Kirksville, Mo.
- E.A. McKee, B.G. Armstrong (Ed.) (1989), Probing the Reformed Tradition: Historical Studies in Honor of E.A. Dowey, Louisville, Ky.
- H.A. Obermann (Ed.) (1991–92), Reformiertes Erbe: FS für Gottfried W. Locher zu seinem 80. Geburtstag, vols. 1–2 (Zwingliana 19/1–2), Zurich.
- Coll. (1992), Encyclopaedia of the Reformed Faith, Louisville, Ky.
- R. Gamble (Ed.) (1992), Articles on Calvin and Calvinism, London.
- D. C. McKim (Ed.) (1992), Major Themes in the Reformed Tradition, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- W.F. Graham (Ed.) (1994), Later Calvinism: International Perspectives, Kirksville, Mo.
- H. Blocher (1995), “Néo-calvinisme,” Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Paris, 174–75.
- P. Gisel, F. Higma (1995), “Calvin,” Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Paris, 172–73.
- W. McCormish (1995), “Calvinisme,” Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Paris, 173–74.

ALASDAIR HERON

See also Anglicanism; Calvin, John; Congregationalism; Family, Confessional; Lutheranism; Methodism; Protestantism; Puritanism

Cano, Melchior. See Loci theologici

Canon Law

The term canon law is used to designate the body of law that organizes the activity of the Catholic and Orthodox Churches*. The Churches that came out of the Reformation tend to speak of “discipline” instead. The term is a translation of the traditional Latin expression ius canonicum.

a) The Law of the Catholic Church. The law of the Church is contained in two codes. The first, called Codex Iuris Canonici (“Code of Canon Law”), is concerned with the Roman Church. It was promulgated in 1983 by Pope John Paul II following a revision of the first code promulgated by Benedict XV in 1917. The second code, called the Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium (“Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches”), is concerned with the Eastern Catholic Churches and was promulgated in 1990. It took up the uncompleted work of codification begun in 1927 under the pontificate of Pius XI, which was halted in 1958 because, on 25 January 1957, John XXIII had announced the convening of the Second Vatican Council* as well as the revision of the Code of Canon Law of the Catholic Church. It was thus already clear that the future canon law would make reference to the declarations of Vatican* II. It took 20 years to complete the revision of the Roman code, following work by committees in which canonists from around the world participated. In a similar way, the code of canons of the Eastern Catholic Churches was prepared by a long effort lasting 16 years.

The law of the Catholic Church is not confined to the codes, although between the two of them they make up the most important part of the universal law of the Church—that is, the law applicable throughout the Church and promulgated by the pope*. Canon law is also contained in scattered official texts, rarely brought together, either of universal law or making up the body of the particular law of the Church. The latter category of law is important because it emanates from institutions capable of creating their own law or has to do with groups able to be endowed with a particular law. This is true of particular Churches or local* Churches and their associations (ecclesiastical regions and provinces and conferences of bishops). It is also true of all associations, whether or not they fall under the jurisdiction of sacred institutions. Taken as a direct application of universal law when that law so provides or, more broadly, promulgated in conformity with universal law, particular law has the capacity to be more flexible and closer to local or specific conditions. Communities of the Church count on it to provide a framework for their activity and to demonstrate their identity.

In addition, there are other sources of law, for canon law is a legal system developed in the way that major modern legal systems have developed. These sources include general principles of law and authentic interpretations provided by the legislative body itself. To these sources is added the jurisprudence produced by ecclesiastical courts, either in matrimonial matters—when the courts have ruled on requests for annulment of marriage*—or on administrative questions following disputes brought before the jurisdiction authorized to hear complaints against decisions made by people in power. Closely related to canon law itself, there are two important bodies of law. First is the concordat law, made up of documents of all kinds, defining the relations between the Catholic Church* and states or political societies*. There is also what is called in the Catholic Church ecclesiastical civil law, covering all the branches of national law encompassing religious life, the law of physical and legal persons, and the law of property. For example, for France, this law includes the rule of separation applied to religious denominations, the rule of recognized and nonrecognized denominations in Alsace-Moselle, and the statutes in force in the overseas departments and territories.

b) Codification. The use of codification in order to present the basic sources of canon law is recent. It dates from the late 19th century, a period in which the Napoleonic Code served as a model. In fact, at the time there was a problem of accessibility of the law. This problem was due to the increase in the volume of legal texts in the period following the Council of Trent*, when the popes were very active in legislative matters, in particular through the dicasteries (bureaucratic subdivisions) of the Roman Curia that were created as early as the mid-16th century. The process of codification provided a clear presentation of the law in short articles. However, this required an effort of logical construction, which accomplished a break with the preceding method. Until this break occurred, the principle of corpus iuris canonici had been followed, consisting in providing to the jurist the whole body of law that had previously been promulgated. The jurisconsult, before codification, could resolve questions posed to him by going through previous law as far back as Roman law, relying on the authority of published texts. It should be recalled that, as early as the fourth century, canon law was assembled in collections, at first chronological and later systematic, bringing together various sources, conciliary decisions, pontifical decretals, and even Roman civil law.

In 1140, Gratian, a monk of Bologna, began, on his own, to attempt a unification of previous law by publishing a compilation of texts under the title Concordia Discordantium Canonum (“Concordance of Discordant Canons”). After presenting texts on a single subject from various authorities, Gratian provided an opinion. Collectively, these opinions were known as the dicta Gratiani. The work had great success and gave rise to the work of the men known as decretists, or commentators on the decrees of Gratian. A century later, Pope Gregory IX decided to have Raymond de Pennafort carry out work similar to Gratian’s, with a view to provide knowledge not only of law before Gratian but also of law that had been promulgated after him. Once the work had been completed, it was promulgated in the famous bull Decretals of Gregory IX. Thus augmented and commented on by the decretists, all these laws were once again assembled in 1500 in a single volume called the Corpus Iuris Canonici (“Body of Canon Law”) so as to refer to the Corpus iuris civilis of Justinian.

In 1917 jurists found themselves facing a legal text that was novel in relation to those they had known earlier. They had to transform their method of working. Trained to reason as jurisconsults, they had to start relying on the text of the code in their reasoning. There followed a period in which the activity of the canonist was confined to a labor of exegesis. This goes a long way toward explaining the disaffection toward canon law that was particularly noticeable in the years following World War II—in France, for example, where the Catholic Church went through the experience of a missionary pastoral movement. Canon law seemed unable to provide a framework for this movement. Limited by its method, it was even more limited by its categories, based on an ecclesiology* that defined the Church alone as societas iudice perfecta.

A new interest in canon law made itself felt after the promulgation of the second Code of Canon Law in 1983. The question arose as to whether the procedure of codification would be repeated or whether there would be a return to a more traditional method of presentation of the law. But, even though it was vigorously debated, this was not an essential question. It was considered more important that the new code had incorporated the ecclesiological categories of Vatican II. The council thus appeared as the originator of many new institutions and legislative materials that a jurist could use as a basis for his interpretations.

c) Content of the Two Codes of Canon Law. In 30 headings for the Code of Eastern Churches and in seven books for the Roman Code, canonic legislation is presented in several key groups: the organization of the Church and its canonical offices of government*, law concerning forms of worship, and law dealing with the teaching function. There is—explicitly in the Roman code and implicitly in the Eastern code—a presentation organized around the three functions that Christ—who is priest, prophet, and king—had entrusted to the Church: teaching, sanctification, and government. The baptized or the faithful participate in the exercise of these functions, either individually (following the law of physical persons) or grouped in communities (following the law of associative communities). Their participation takes on a particular character within the communities erected by the Church itself—that is, dioceses and parishes. The ecclesiological reality of particular Churches “in which and through which the Catholic Church exists” (Canon 368) is fundamental. It allows us to understand and to situate in another way the legislation concerning the institutions that exercise a hierarchical power over the entire Church (or the patriarchates* in the case of the Eastern Churches). There are also legislative sections devoted to institutions specific to the Catholic Church, such as laws governing the consecrated life and a law of sanctions (or, following the old terminology, penal law).

d) Canonic Doctrine. Because of the place given to the teaching of canon law in the Catholic Church, particularly in the many university faculties, a doctrine does exist that is large and vigorous and available in several dozen specialized journals. All questions related to canon law and its legal institutes can be treated there. At the same time, it should be noted that, by the end of Vatican II, several theories on the bases of canon law had come to light, sometimes going so far as to be organized into schools. Among the most well known, those classified under the broad designation “theology of canon law” attempt to give an essentially different character to canon law as compared to national law. This is true for the German Mörsdorf, whose approach dismisses a preexisting general notion of law but provides a supernatural* basis for canon law on the grounds of the theological notions of Word* and sacrament*. It is also the case for the Swiss Corecco, who structures law as ordo fidei and not as ordo rationis.

This enterprise of a new foundation for canon law is generally presented as a renewal within the Catholic Church of a movement inaugurated among German Protestants in the middle of the 20th century, when the Evangelical Churches organized themselves in a specific way in the face of the state. On the other hand, other schools are attached to the autonomy of canonic science in relation to theology*—for example, the editorial board of the journal Concilium and the school of Navarre, which gives canon law the role of establishing the proper relation between the constitution of the Church and its reality as a sacrament of salvation*. In addition to these schools, there are methods in which the practice and the application of the law provide a status for its development and interpretation.

e) Orthodox Canon Law. For the Orthodox, canon law is a theological and legal discipline. The body of ecumenical conciliary canonical legislation, which is known by the common title Nomocanon or Syngtama Canonum, was officially confirmed by the synod* of Constantinople in 920. It makes up the ratio materiae of that law and consists of 85 canons attributed to the Apostles*, canons decreed by the first seven ecumenical councils of the first millennium, canons decreed by 11 local councils (third to ninth centuries), and canons of 13 Fathers. All this makes up the Corpus iuris canonici of the Orthodox Church. This conciliary legislation is an integral part of the canonical tradition. The fundamental canonical principles expressed by this legislation are fully affirmed in our day in the text of all the constitutional status, or charters, of the Orthodox Churches and govern their organization and functioning.

- (1984) Code de droit canonique, Texte officiel et traduction française, Paris.
- E. Corecco (1985), “La réception de Vatican II dans le Code de droit canonique,” in G. Alberigo, J.-P. Jossua (Ed.), La réception de Vatican II, Paris, 327–91.
- D. Le Tourneau (1988), “Dix ans d’application de code en France,” ACan 34, 11–116.
- P. Valdrini (Ed.) (1989), Droit canonique, Paris (2nd Ed. 1999).

PATRICK VALDRINI

See also Ecclesiastical Discipline; Gratian; Jurisdiction; Law and Legislation

Canon of Scriptures

1. History

a) The Jewish Bible. The Hebrew Bible was assembled gradually. The Torah (Genesis through Deuteronomy) was the first to be completed; its establishment is attributed to Esdras (see Neh 8:2), which places it in the middle of the fifth century B.C. or perhaps at the beginning of the fourth. In the course of the third century B.C., it was translated into Greek by a group of Jews at Alexandria by royal request and for cultural (indeed, political reasons, as recounted in the Letter of Aristeas) as well as for liturgical reading. This was the beginning of the Septuagint (also known as the LXX).

The prophetic corpus was assembled at the latest during the third century B.C. since at the beginning of the second century, Jesus ben Sirach was familiar with Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve Minor Prophets* (as can be seen in Sir 48:22–25 and 49:6–10); indeed, toward 164 B.C., Jeremiah was numbered among the “books*.” Around 116, the Greek translator of Sirach shows in his prologue to the book that he knew the two groupings of the Law* and the Prophets, which appear by then to have become closed, while a third group consisted of an indeterminate number of writings and apparently remained open to new additions.

By Prophets must be understood the earlier prophets, that is to say our historical books from Joshua to 2 Kings, and the later prophets, from Isaiah to Malachai; the other books consisted at least of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, and even Daniel. At the time of ben Sirach’s translator, most of these books had been translated into Greek, but “what was originally expressed in Hebrew does not have exactly the same sense when translated into another language. Not only this work, but also the law itself, the prophecies, and the rest of books differ not a little as originally expressed” (Sirach prologue). At the turn of the first century, 2 Maccabees 2:13 attributes to Nehemiah the gathering together of the “the books about the kings and prophets, and the writings of David [that is, the Psalms],” an undertaking continued by Judas Maccabeus around 160 B.C. The Law and the Prophets are mentioned in 2 Maccabees 15:9, and 1 Maccabees 12:9 speaks of the encouragement given by “the holy books which are in our hands.” In addition, there is a quotation from Psalm 79 in 1 Maccabees 7:17.

While Judaism* was thus enlarging its scriptural corpus little by little, the Samaritans, who had been hostile to the Jews since the fourth century, restricted themselves to the Pentateuch. Their refusal of the Prophets and the other books may have been absolute by the time their schism was consummated in 128, with the destruction of their sanctuary at Gerizim by John Hyrcanus I. In the first centuries B.C. and A.D., opinions within Judaism diverged. The Sadducees recognized the authority* of the Torah alone, though this does not preclude their having known the other books (see TJ, Megillah 7, 70 d). The inhabitants of Qumran seem to have accepted all the books that would be accepted after their time in the Hebrew canon (except possibly Esther), but they found room in addition for Sirach and for Enoch and other apocalyptic writings.

The Jewish translators at Alexandria had used a Hebrew text in its premodern state; in this respect, 1 Qumran Isaiah^a resembles the Septuagint, while 1 Qumran Isaiah^b foreshadows the Hebrew text that would become canonical. At the beginning of our era, Judaism had a standard Hebrew text, on the basis of which a partial revision of the Greek translation was apparently undertaken in Judea, as evidenced by the manuscript of the Minor Prophets found in a cave at Nahal Hever. The first Greek translation of Ezra-Nehemiah, the 1 Esdras of the LXX, had already been supplanted in the previous century by a new translation, the 2 Esdras of the LXX. Song of Solomon, Ruth, and Lamentations were translated for the first time, in Judea, perhaps for use among the Diaspora at major festivals. In the case of Esther and Tobit, there is no trace of a Judaeian revision of the original Greek translations, although the latter has been found at Qumran in both Hebrew and Aramaic. Ecclesiastes would not be translated into Greek until the end of the first century A.D.

For the Pharisees, the basis on which a book was accepted seems to have been its composition prior to the cessation of prophecy (see 1 Macc 9:27) during the Persian period and its transmission to the Great Synagogue (Mishnah, Abôt 1, 1; see Neh 8?). Taken literally, even Ezra-Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Daniel (considered as prophetic, as seen in Mt 24:15) and Song of Solomon were accepted, but Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Sirach posed a problem. After the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Pharisean assembly of Jamnia around the year 90 seems to have taken a stand on only two points relating to the canon: the Song of Solomon “stained the hands” (i.e., it was sacred and canonical) and thus could not be used at secular festivals, while Ecclesiastes, already accepted by the school of Hillel, continued to be accepted, though some would keep questioning its canonicity until the end of the second century. On the other hand, Sirach, which may have been accepted at Qumran, was not discussed, and it remained outside the canon. Greatly appreciated among Jewish families (see 2 Macc 15:36), but lacking at Qumran, Esther seems to have been accepted only after the assembly of Jamnia.

Soon afterward, Josephus, in Flavius Josephus against Apion, asserted that the Pharisaic canon was fixed and consisted of 22 books, including Esther and Ecclesiastes but combining Ruth with Judges and Lamentations with Jeremiah. At the end of the second century, the Hebrew canon (TB, Baba Bathra, 14 b) consisted (and would henceforth consist) of 24 books, Ruth and Lamentations being by that time distinct from Judges and Jeremiah. The closure of the Hebrew canon was imposed on Pharisaism, the only current form of Judaism that had survived after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Before or during the second Jewish revolt (A.D. 131–135), Akiba excluded the “outer books” (Mishnah, Sanhedrin 10, 1), these being “the gilyônîm and the books of the minim” (Tosefta, Yadaim 2, 13). This has often been interpreted as an allusion to the Gospels* and other Christian writings, but some scholars take it to refer to books originating with the Jewish sects of the period. Was Christianity the principal motive? This seems unlikely since the process of the formation of the Hebrew corpus led it to become closed at the moment when Judaism was aiming to ensure its survival by means of what remained to it—its sacred books along with its God*.

The list of 22 books given by Flavius Josephus (Against Apion, 38–41) contains the five books of the Law, 13 books of the “prophets who were after Moses” (probably Joshua, Judges-Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah-Lamentations, Ezekiel, the Twelve, Job, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles, and Esther), and four “Writings” (Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon). Probably a century later, the list of TB Baba Bathra, 14b, gives a different composition: the Prophets now consist only of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve, while to the group of Writings have been added all those other books previously considered as prophetic, with Ruth preceding Psalms, Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes; Daniel is no longer regarded as prophetic. This new division into 24 books would change no further, except for the order of the Writings; the five “scrolls” (Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther) would not be grouped together until the Middle Ages.

b) The Christian Old Testament. At the time of Jesus*, Hellenistic Jews had a collection of books in Greek more extensive than the list fixed by the Pharisees at the end of the first century.

This larger Greek collection may have been assembled on principles similar to those advocated by the Pharisees. Besides Proverbs, they read two books attributed to Solomon—Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon. The LXX added the Wisdom of Solomon (composed in Greek). They combined Lamentations and Jeremiah. The LXX further added Baruch and the Letter of Jeremiah to Jeremiah. They retained Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles as history and supplemented the LXX with 1 and 2 Maccabees and even 3 and 4 Maccabees. Fictionalized stories (Ruth, Jonah, and Esther) were accepted. The LXX also admitted Tobit and Judith. Finally, Sirach, which had remained outside the Pharisees’ canon, although frequently cited by them, was retained in the LXX. From this time on, there is a noticeable tendency on the part of both the Pharisees and the LXX to be wary of the apocalyptic writings (other than Daniel) that were so valued at Qumran.

With the exception of Jude, the New Testament displays the same reservations toward Jewish apocalyptic* literature and is restricted largely to the books retained by the Pharisaic canon. Christianity subsequent to the New Testament found itself faced with two collections of books, the Hebrew corpus and the LXX.

While used by the early Christians, the LXX was little by little rejected by Jews in favor of the Greek translations by Theodotion and Aquila. The Christians, largely ignorant of Hebrew, read the LXX. Justin Martyr, for example, did so around A.D. 160 in his disputes with the Jews, though he was aware of the differences between the Greek text and the Hebrew one used by Trypho (Dialogue, 73; 89). In any case, Justin made no use of books that were absent from the Hebrew canon. Even before 150, Marcion rejected the entire Old Testament and retained only Paul and Luke from the New Testament: Justin, Tertullian*, and Irenaeus would refute this anti-Judaism (Marcionism*).

Around 170, Melito of Sardis (Sc 31, 21 Sq) brought back from Palestine a list of books recognized by the Jews; these books, also accepted by the Christians, included neither Esther nor the books peculiar to the LXX, although Melito drew inspiration from Wisdom of Solomon for his Easter homily. On the other hand, at the same period, Christians in Africa translated the LXX into Latin (the Vetus Latina), including Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, and so on. At the end of the second century and the beginning of the third, Tertullian and, more explicitly, Cyprian* drew on these books that were not in the Hebrew Bible, as did Clement of Alexandria, who made much use of Wisdom of Solomon and Sirach and even cited apocalyptic writings on occasion.

Origen*, who in his Hexapla would compare the LXX and the other Greek translations to the Hebrew text, was aware of the difference between the Hebrew Bible and the LXX. His contacts with Judaism initially made him cautious regarding the books and additions specific to the LXX, and he did not comment on any of them. It may be that the texts peculiar to the LXX were not read in Christian liturgical assemblies, but Origen continued to cite them from time to time, even as scriptural text (see SC 71, 352f). Around 240, in his Letter to Africanus (SC 302, 532–535), he declared that even though he had not, in his dialogues with the Jews, made use of the books refused by them, there is no reason for Christians to feel obliged to reject the books derived from the LXX, which they currently used. At the end of his life, Origen excluded the “Apocrypha*,” which he opposed to the “testamentary” books, in other words, those of the Hebrew Bible (Endiathêkoi: Commentary on John II, 188). It is unclear whether he reserved the books specific to the LXX for the use of novices (see SC 29, 512 Sq) or even of initiates.

The fourth and early fifth centuries were a time of contrasts. Around 350, Cyril of Jerusalem knew the 22 books of the Hebrew canon (PG 33, 497 c-500 b). Reacting to those who rejected the Old Testament and those who were attached to the Apocrypha, he asked, “What is the point of wasting one’s efforts discriminating between the controversial books, if one is ignorant of those that are recognized by all Jews and Christians?” (PG 33, 496 a). The 22 books were, however, read in the text of the LXX, including Baruch and the Letter of Jeremiah with Esther. Cyril also sometimes cites Wisdom of Solomon and Sirach.

In his Easter letter of 367 (PG 26, 1 436–1 440), the more open-minded bishop of Alexandria, Athanasius*, distinguished the “Apocrypha” from the 22 Hebrew books (except for Esther), read in the text of the LXX, but he added a group of “uncanonical” books intended for novices: Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Esther, Judith, and Tobit, to which he appended the Didache and The Shepherd of Hermas. The canon of Athanasius’s

Old Testament prefigured that of the Council* of Laodicea in 360, which included Esther (canon 59). It was at this period that the biblical corpus began to be referred to as a “canon” (from the Hebrew qânêh, a stick or cane, hence a rule or norm).

The contrasts grew even more marked in the Latin Church. Jerome, working in Bethlehem, at least between 391 and 404, retained only the books of the Hebrew Bible. He regarded Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon, Judith, Tobit, and 1 and 2 Maccabees as doubtful (PL 29, 404 c) and “apocryphal” (PL 28, 556) books. They could be read in order to edify the people but not to confirm the dogma* of the Church (PL 28, 1243 a), an ambiguous position that confused Athanasius’s distinctions. Around 400, Rufinus referred to the books that were read in church, but that were not the basis of the faith, as “ecclesiastical” (CChr.SL 20, 170 Sq).

Astonished by the Latin translations of Jerome, who advocated veritas hebraica, Augustine remained strongly attached to the LXX’s traditional place within the Church, which included books to which Christians in Africa had been attached since the second century. Augustine* took part in the Council of Hippo in 393 and, as a bishop, in the Councils of Carthage in 397 (CChr.SL 149, p. 340) and 418. These councils fixed the Old Testament canon, which included without any distinction the books considered controversial in the East, or Rufinus’s “ecclesiastical” books. Augustine restricted himself to this list (Doctrina Christiana, II, 8, 13). In 405, Innocent I did likewise in his letter to Exuperius, bishop of Toulouse. The Vulgate, probably assembled as early as the fifth century, would include the books that the Hebrew canon had excluded.

In the 12th and 13th centuries, doubts resurfaced as to the canonical status of these books. Hugues de Saint-Cher excluded them, and Thomas Aquinas accepted them. In 1441 the Council of Florence admitted them, but the influence of Jerome was still felt. Luther* disallowed them, as did Cardinal Cajetan (1532). In 1546 the Council of Trent* included them officially in the canon of the Roman Catholic Church. However, in 1566, Sixtus of Siena proposed the term deuterocanonical for the books that Rufinus had called ecclesiastical—Esther, Tobit, Judith, Baruch, the Letter of Jeremiah, the Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, the Greek additions to Daniel, and 1 and 2 Maccabees. The Protestants would term them “apocryphal.”

c) The New Testament. For the Christians of the first two centuries, mention of the Scripture* or Scriptures (Mt 26:54) implied the Old Testament. The earliest use of the words Old Testament in the sense of a collection of books is found in 2 Colossians 3:14. On the other hand, the expression New Testament appeared only around 200 in the writings of Clement of Alexandria (Stromata 5, 85, 1) and Origen (De Principiis 4, 1, 1) to designate the corpus that had itself only gradually been formed. The Second Letter of Peter (written around 125?) seems intended to complete the New Testament corpus, which collects the letters of Paul (referred to in 2 Pt 3:16) and also contains Matthew, Luke-Acts, 1 Peter, and Jude. All these writings are referred to in 2 Peter, but the letter mentions neither John, the three letters of John, nor James.

The Apostolic* Fathers and the apologists* still had no New Testament corpus and only rarely cited New Testament texts as Scripture. Justin was the first to refer to the Gospels* as “Memoirs of the Apostles” (Apology 1, 66, 3), and may have been dependent on an early “evangelical harmony,” composed around 140 (see Boismard-Lamouille). The best-known such work was the Diatesseron, which combined the four Gospels. It was produced around 170 by Tatian, who had to know all four Gospels in order to do the work. Several factors would lead the Christians to fix the New Testament canon. From the first half of the second century, the Judeo-Christians had their own (apocryphal*) gospels, some of which had disturbing features. Other texts of a suspect pietism appeared. Then came Gnosticism* (already mentioned by the Apostles but resurgent), the sectarian spiritualism of Montanus, Marcionism*, which accepted only ten of Paul’s letters and a mutilated Luke (see Irenaeus, Against Heresies, 1, 27, 2–3). Finally, there was the danger that the Diatesseron might supplant the four Gospels.

The earliest list of the New Testament writings that has come down to us may be the Muratorian Canon, which was discovered and published in 1740 (see DACL 12, 1935, 543–60). The original may have dated from the end of the second century, although A. C. Sundberg (1973, HTh 66, 1–41) dates it from the middle of the fourth century. This fragmentary annotated list, perhaps Roman in origin, omits Hebrews, James, 1 and 2 Peter, and 3 John but adds the Wisdom of Solomon and expresses reservations about the Apocalypse of Peter and The Shepherd of Hermas; finally, it challenges the texts of Marcion and other heretics.

Before 200, Irenaeus was the first to draw on the New Testament more than on the Old Testament; he distinguished the time of the prophets (the Old Testament), the life of Jesus* (the Gospels), and the testimony of the Apostles* (the remainder of the New Testament). Thus, because it was apostolic and traditional, almost the whole of the New Testament (except for Philemon, Hebrews, James, 2 Peter, and Jude) was one with the Old Testament. In Irenaeus’s view, there were only four Gospels. This “tetramorphic gospel” was closed and was to be regarded as Scripture, as were the letters of Paul and Acts (Against Heresies, 3, 12, 9, 12).

The list given by Origen in the Homily on Joshua 7:1 was already complete but, except for the Gospels, remained open. Cyprian cited almost all the New Testament writings as Scripture, though he, like Tertullian, may have excluded Hebrews.

The sixth-century Codex Claromontanus (D) includes a Latin list of the books of Old and New Testaments, which is based on a Greek original that may go back to around 300. The few omissions are probably due to scribal error, and Barnabas, The Shepherd of Hermas, the Acts of Paul, and the Apocalypse of Peter are marked off with a line. Around 350, Cyril of Jerusalem (Catechesis 4, 36) had a fixed canon, but it did not include Revelation. The same omission was made in the canon of the Council of Laodicea, about 360. Soon afterward, Athanasius, in his Easter Letter of 367, gave what would become the definitive list, though this did not stop Gregory* of Nazianzus from omitting Revelation again a short while later. In 397, on the other hand, the third Council of Carthage declared the complete New Testament canon closed, with the same 27 texts as Augustine's (Doctrina Christiana, II, 8, 13).

In Syria, the Diatesseron was abandoned in favor of the four Gospels only during the fifth century, while the Peshitta still lacked 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. The Councils of Florence (1441) and Trent (1546) officially proclaimed the canon of 27 New Testament books. Erasmus*, while accepting this complete canon, expressed doubts about the apostolic origin of Hebrews, James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Revelation. And Luther, too, found Hebrew, James, Jude, and Revelation less valuable—an echo of the ancient uncertainties. Today the New Testament canon, for all the Western Churches, includes the 27 books fixed on in the fourth century.

2. Theology

According to Luke 24:27, the Old Testament foretells the coming of Jesus Christ*, to whom the New Testament bears witness. Relying on this principle, the Fathers and the councils who enumerated the books of the canon produced lists for both Testaments.

a) The Christian Canon. In establishing a list of books, the Christian canon, unlike the Jewish one, specified neither language nor edition. History records and exegesis* demonstrate the multiplicity of accepted texts. Christians in more direct contact with Judaism—in particular Jerome—tended to restrict themselves to the canon recognized by Jewish tradition, but this was not the position of the entire Church, which read the LXX and the translations derived from it. The LXX, of course, presented a text that often differed from the Masoretic texts and added further books. The canonical status of the added books, which has been debated right up until the present day, divides Catholics and Protestants. Catholics incorporate these books into the body of the Old Testament. Protestants generally place these “deuterocanonical” or “apocryphal” writings between the Old Testament and the New while recognizing their importance to an increasing extent.

The very diversity of the textual traditions, for example, between the LXX and the Masoretic texts, of which the early Christians were aware but which is more fully studied today, does not alter the necessity of consulting the texts in their original languages. However, the study of these Greek and Hebrew texts reveals more clearly the polymorphous aspect of the ancient textual traditions (going back before Christianity in the case of the Old Testament), without making it possible to exclude any particular form of the text. Adopted by the ancient Church, the LXX, itself subject to occasional variation (e.g., by the inclusion of Sirach and Tobit, not to mention the translation of Daniel by Theodotion), was often spoken of as divinely inspired. In the New Testament, passages of unknown origin and transmission that were sometimes disputed are generally recognized as canonical today (e.g., Mk 16:9–20; Lk 22:43–44; Jn 7:53–8:11).

b) Criteria for Canonicity. The criteria for canonicity are few but strict. Literary authenticity—the fact that the Torah, for example, is attributed to Moses and James, 2 Peter, and Jude to one Apostle or another—no longer figures among the criteria. Modern exegesis has achieved a clearer picture of the origins and literary history of the texts without casting doubt on their canonical status. Within Judaism, the doctrinal criterion of coherence to the Torah was already added to the historical criterion of transmission to the Great Synagogue.

Within Christianity, the first criterion is that of apostolicity, the testimony of the primitive Church. This is also the basis for the acceptance of the Old Testament, as Jesus and the Apostles knew it, as well as for the inclusion of the apostolic writings.

The ancient uncertainties concerning the “catholic” epistles and Revelation were resolved by other criteria, one of which was the traditional reception* of these various writings within the early Christian communities and in particular their liturgical use. Augustine (Doctrina Christiana, II, 8, 12) favored the testimony of the most important Churches, in particular those whose origins were linked to an Apostle.

Orthodoxy* was another criterion that, from the second century, led to the exclusion of pseudepigrapha, apocalypses, gnostic writings, and so on. A canonical writing was one that bore witness to the “rule of faith*” (Irenaeus, Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, 3).

c) A Canon Within the Canon? Within the Jewish canon, the Torah holds a preeminent position. The other books comment on its reception, present rereadings of it, or derive prayers from it. Within the New Testament, Vatican* II (Dei Verbum, 18) recognized the superiority of the Gospels, which bear witness to the life and the words of Jesus. But these questions of precedence do not affect the canonicity of the other accepted writings.

In the case of the New Testament, the debate took another turn with A. Käsemann’s continuation of the Lutheran principle. Käsemann studied the internal contradictions in the New Testament (e.g., the ones between Romans and James) and in particular those that exhibit Frühkatholizismus, or “protocatholicism*,” and seem to point to typically Catholic doctrine—such as sacramentalism, hierarchy, and the dogma of Acts, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and 2 Peter. The problems of internal criteria he found there led him to consider Romans and Galatians, along with their treatment of justification* by faith, as the heart of the New Testament. Catholic theology refers to the principle of the development, of the Church, even in the time of the Apostles, under the guidance of the Holy* Spirit.

- E. Käsemann (1951), “Begründet der neutestamentliche Kanon die Einheit der Kirche?,” EvTh 11, 13–21.
- H. von Campenhausen (1967), Die Entstehung der christlichen Bibel, Tübingen.
- J. A. Sanders (1972), Torah and Canon, Philadelphia.
- J.-D. Kaestli, O. Wermelinger (Ed.) (1984), Le canon de l’Ancien Testament: Sa formation et son histoire, Geneva.
- J. A. Sanders (1984), Torah and Community, Philadelphia.
- B. S. Childs (1985), Old Testament in a Canonical Context, Philadelphia.
- B. M. Metzger (1987), The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development, and Significance, Oxford.
- Ch. Theobald (Ed.) (1990), Le canon des Écritures: Études historiques, exégétiques et systématiques, LeDiv 140.
- J. A. Sanders, H. Y. Gamble, G. T. Sheppard (1992), “Canon,” AncBD 1, 837–66.
- Y.-M. Blanchard (1993), Aux sources du canon, le témoignage d’Irénée, CFi 175.
- L. M. McDonald (1995), The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon, 2nd Ed., Peabody, Mass.

MAURICE GILBERT

See also Apocrypha; Bible; Book; Exegesis; Hermeneutics; Holy Scripture; Intertestament; Magisterium; Marcionism; Tradition; Translations of the Bible, Ancient

Canonization. See Holiness

Cantor, Georg. See Infinite

Cappadocian Fathers. See Basil (The Great) of Caesarea; Gregory of Nazianzus; Gregory of Nyssa

Capreolus, John. See Thomism

Carmel

Rooted in the founding experience of the desert, established under the patronage of the prophet Elijah (“gather all Israel to me at Mount Carmel,” 1 Kgs 18:19), Carmel owes its mystical vocation to strictly theological tasks: realizing the experience* of a living God and, at the same time, exploring the human soul seized by contemplative grace. Although very much in evidence in the thinking of Thomas Aquinas, these preoccupations were more or less completely absent from the Scholastic theology of the following generation. And precisely because it persevered in its primary intention, the Carmelite theological tradition was generally underestimated. However, teachers like John* of the Cross (1542–91) or Anthony of the Mother of God (†1641) brought to it all the power of their own biblical and patristic learning, as well as their Scholastic training, putting these at the service of a spiritual pedagogy that more official theological approaches of the time lacked.

1. Until Teresian Reform

The Carmelite Rule (produced in the Holy Land around 1210) called on members of that order to “meditate day and night on the law of the Lord.” Carmelite theology was born from this prayerful contact with the biblical text. It adopted the monastic tradition of lectio divina: through allegory and tropology, the literal meaning of the Scriptures leads the reader to an ana-gogical understanding—the only strictly mystical one—of the mystery that it expresses. The interaction between prayer (which was not formalized as a separate religious exercise until the Renaissance, something that can be seen in the timetables and methods for it) and theology in the modern sense of the word is permanent here. Having this purely contemplative aim, it was between 1250 and 1260 that Carmel had progressively to leave the Holy Land because of pressure from the Muslims and came to establish itself in the major Western university centers of Cambridge, Oxford, Paris, and Bologna. While it triumphed in the top Scholastic circles, it prolonged the monastic exegesis* and helped channel it toward what would henceforth be artificially known as “spirituality.” In any case, the balance between reading, study, and theological work here corresponds to that of the ancient otium, being an outer complement to the inner quies. This state entails engaging in a minimum of outward activities and is far from “earthly uses, even apostolic,” pure from all intention to seek earthly recompense. However, this distancing from pastoral service was continuously debated within Carmel from the moment it came to Europe.

The first Western Carmelite text that has come down to us is Ignea Sagitta (1271) by Nicholas of France. It is an apologia for a way of life that still fundamentally considers itself to be eremitical, its themes being the fuga mundi (escape from the world*), silence, and quies: fuge, tace, quiesce (“distance yourself, be silent, keep quiet”). At a time when Europe was in the throes of urbanization, it involved rediscovering the desert, that place where Jesus* speaks to his friends in their heart and reveals his mysteries to them. Henceforth, this desert would become that of the cell, outside and inside, of the “cellar” of the Song of Songs, where the Holy* Spirit strengthens, nourishes, and fills the inner person. “Purity of heart” allows the contemplative to become intoxicated from the “Lord’s cup” rather than from the “chalice of Babylon.” The radical choice between these two “cups” determines the spiritual path, which is represented as an ascent of Mount Carmel, at the summit of which there is the genuinely Christian mystical experience. Here one can recognize the outline of what would become, three centuries later, the Ascent of Mount Carmel of John of the Cross. There are also the seeds of Teresa of Avila’s major themes, such as, for example, her description of prayer as “the exchange of friendship.” We might also note the emphasis placed on the emotional life of the spirit, something drawn very much from the Cistercian tradition of Saint Bernard of Clairvaux and William of Saint Thierry, a tradition that would subsequently permeate the entire Carmelite tradition. Within university circles, Gerard of Bologna (head from 1296 to 1318), was the first Carmelite university teacher in Paris. The Aristotelianism he used was derived from Averroes. Otherwise, he followed the intellectualism of Godfrey of Fontaines and asserted the radical passivity of the will as well of the intellect. Generally, the Carmelites were known to be inclined toward nominalism*. Such was the case, for example, with Guido Terreni (†1342), Baconthorpe’s teacher, and, with Jean de Pouilly, the main representative of the derivative Aristotelianism* of the period. With the emergence of John Baconthorpe (†1348), who was, by contrast, a hyperrealist, Carmel entered the top rank of university life. Known as the quasi-official theologian and philosopher of the order, the doctor resolutus should be considered in the first place for what he brought to the tradition of lectio divina. His distinctive contribution in this area involved his perception of the unity of the two Testaments. According to Baconthorpe, the revelation* of the mystery of God, perceived by Elijah only in “a low whisper” (1 Kgs 19:12) of the desert breeze, is fully realized in Jesus and offered to the Christian contemplative soul.

On a more academic level, Baconthorpe’s critical spirit was compared to that of Duns* Scotus. His method places him between Thomas Aquinas and Pierre d’Auriol. Although Baconthorpe cannot be regarded as a disciple of Thomas, the latter is ranked high among the doctors he cites, and he often refers to Thomas’s doctrine to confirm his own. Nevertheless, he distinctly criticizes the Aquinate, especially those of its arguments favoring the thesis that “the intellectual soul is the substantial form of the body” (CG II, 68). Even if he claims to acknowledge the thesis, Baconthorpe underlines its weak points and holds that none of the proposed arguments is entirely convincing. Although he acknowledges that the union of body and soul is “natural,” it is only in the sense in which that union is not self-contradictory, which is all that is needed for God to have been able to carry it out through his potentia absoluta. This critique must be read in the context of a rather weak notion of “demonstration” and “certitude:” for Baconthorpe, truth results more from the absence of any objection than from a clear affirmation.

In terms of the philosophy of nature, Baconthorpe championed physical atomism, which continued to form part of the Carmelite ratio studiorum until the 17th century. It was this Christian atomism that would be the primary source for the philosophy* of Pierre Gassendi (1592–1655).

Shortly after Baconthorpe, Philippe Ribot (†1391)—his Tractatus de quattuor sensibus sacrae scripturae (manuscript Vat. Ottob. Lat 396) has just been found—offered Liber de Institutione primorum monachorum, a fundamental text in the development of Carmelite spirituality. Considered for a long time to be the “primitive rule,” in the 15th century it was translated into English, French, and Spanish. Teresa of Avila annotated this last translation, which helped her learn about the primitive life of Carmel. Ribot’s work is a commentary—indeed, a rather bare allegory—on Elijah leaving for the banks of the Kerith (1 Kgs 17:2–6). Ribot proposes two objectives of Carmelite monastic life: one that is within human power, the other remaining in God’s power alone: “We will acquire the first through our work and virtuous effort, with help from divine grace. It consists in offering God a holy heart, unsullied by all immediate stains of sin*. We reach this goal when we are perfect and in Kerith, which means buried in charity. The other goal of this life is sent to us through a pure gift of God...: to taste, to a certain extent, in one’s heart, and to experience in one’s mind the forces of divine presence and gentle glory* from above. This is called ‘drinking from the stream of God’s delight’” (I, c. 2)

Here we can recognize the two aspects of all Christian life, that of nature* and that of grace, which have become the two aspects of Mount Carmel insofar as they involve the contemplative experience. Genuinely typical of Carmelite theology (see H. de Lubac*, Exégèse Médiévale, 1964), this commentary has a striking Christocentrism, with Jesus offering his disciple the perfect realization of this double faithfulness to the Creator and the creature.

From the end of this first period, we must also cite Michele Aiguani (or Nicolas of Bologna, † around 1400), lecturer on Holy Scripture in Paris in 1360 and the author of an important commentary on the Psalms* in which he follows Rabbi Salomon (“great doctor of Jews”) and Nicolas de Lyre for the literal meaning. At around the same time (1364, to be precise) another Carmelite, Saint Peter Thomas, founded the Faculty of Theology in Bologna, while yet another, Mathurin Courtoys, did the same in Bourges. In England, the academic vitality of the Carmelites placed them at the forefront in the battle against Wyclif’s heresy* (John Wyclif, 1328?–84). John Cunningham, in particular, won fame.

With the reformer Jean Soreth (1394–1471), under whose leadership the female branch of the order was born and grew rapidly, Carmel’s biblical tradition was reoriented in an emphatically modern direction: meditatio et oratio, in his work, take on an autonomy that relates them to the devotio moderna*, paving the way for the spiritual growth of Teresian Carmel. Along with this evolution and within the same tradition of a devout humanism*, Battista Spagnoli (1447–1516, the “Christian Virgil,” according to Erasmus*) found a way to reconcile classical culture and Christianity by showing how Christians had historically received pagan literature (De Vita beata and De Patientia). As a final representative of this pre-Renaissance period, we should note Nicolas Calciuri (†1466) and his description of the spiritual life as a threefold “desire for celestial things:” desirous love*, delectable love, and gracious love.

This period opened the way for the era of the great modern doctrinal debates. Theologians such as Everard Billick in Köln (†1557) and the Prior General Nicolas Audet (1481–1562), who took part in the Council of Trent*, would play significant roles. A century later, Giovanni Antonio Bovio (1566–1622) would take part in the controversy over grace (bañezianism*) by defending the Jesuit stance.

2. Around the Teresian Reform

Teresa of Jesus (of Avila) (1515–82) and John of the Cross (1542–91) did not, therefore, emerge miraculously within a Carmel that is too often characterized in modern times as an intellectual desert. The themes that these Doctors* of the Church would make particularly their own were already present in their heritage. Indeed, their brilliance must not make us forget other significant representatives of the same tradition. There is also Jaime Montanes (1520–78), for example, whose christological overtones can be related to Teresa’s requirement of exclusive love, or John of the Cross’s “todo y nada”: “To not look for something, to not look at anything, to listen to nothing, desire nothing, and finally, to love nothing other than the only Jesus Christ, for he alone is the life of our soul.” In the same vein, we might also cite Miguel Alfonso de Caranza (1527–1606), Diego Velasquez, Juan Sanz (1557–1608), Francesco Amerly (†1552), Miguel de la Fuente (1573–1625).

a) The Doctrine of the Reformers. Teresa defines prayer as an affective discourse sustained by a simple gaze upon Christ. The fundamental role of the humanity of Christ is evident in his prayer that is closest to his experience, in contrast to a theological framework of which Teresa knows more than her protestations of ignorance imply. Faithful to the devotio moderna, she binds herself to Christ’s humanity for the whole length of the spiritual journey, right up to the highest state of union. The two Carmelite masters present infused contemplation*—grace freely given—as the end of contemplative life. Nevertheless, it is an end for which the soul prepares itself through practicing the virtues, in a phase of the spiritual life when it apparently retains more initiative*. A certain imprecision of terminology, in Carmelite writers as well as in the work of authors such as Molinos, allows for an intermediate form of prayer that occurs between meditation and contemplation, that is, “acquired contemplation”: John of the Cross does not entirely abandon the concept, which we can see clearly represented, for example, in Thomas of Jesus, who discusses a “mixed contemplation” that corresponds to the kind John of the Cross himself describes in The Ascent of Mount Carmel. Similarly, Joseph of Jesus-Mary (Quiroga) distinguishes infused contemplation from the form of contemplation that is obtained through the help of faith* and the ordinary assistance of grace. The notion of God’s presence put forward by the Frenchman Laurent de la Résurrection (1614–91) can be compared to that proposed by Thomas of Jesus: acquired contemplation unifies the action of grace with the simplified activity of the will, while in infused contemplation it is God alone who supports the soul.

Teresa distinguishes three forms of God’s taking control of the faculties of the unified soul: the will is appeased, the intellect is simplified, and the memory is suspended. This mystical union is transient and is usually accompanied by moments of ecstasy during the “spiritual betrothals” (V Demeures), but it becomes permanent in the “spiritual marriage” (VI and VII Demeures) (this is the founding terminology of Teresian mystical literature). The soul, at that time, is in a state of spiritual perfection, which is not, however, to be identified with the perfection of charity, even if the two states are normally connected. The rule is that “God only gives himself entirely to us when we give ourselves entirely to him” (Chemin de Perfection, 28, 12).

b) Legacy. Among the immediate disciples of the two Carmelite doctors, we should note John of Jesus and Mary (Aravalles) (1549–1609, author of Tratado de Oración and Instrucción de Novicios); Innocent of Saint-André (1553–1620), who wrote Teologia Mistica (1615) under the name Andrès Locara; Gratien of the Mother of God (1545–1614), who wrote a Dilucidario and De la Oración Mental; and Mary of Saint Joseph (†1603), author of Libro de la Recreaciones. In the Congregation of Italy (canonically autonomous since the reform of 1600), John of Jesus and Mary, known as the Calagurritain (1564–1615), was the theologian who most echoed Thomas Aquinas, writing Theologia Mystica (1607) and Schola de Oratione et Contemplatione (1610). In his Suma y Compendio de los Grados de Oración (Rome, 1610), Thomas of Jesus (1564–1627) studied the problems of mystical theology from a Scholastic perspective, reversing the approach of his teachers. He wrote De Contemplatione (Anvers, 1620) on the forms of infused contemplation, De Oratione Divina (Anvers, 1623) on contemplative supernatural life, and De Perceptionibus Mentalibus, which was not completed. An unconditional advocate of John of the Cross and who fell out of favor among reformers when John died, Joseph of Jesus and Mary Quiroga (†1628) aimed to show that there were parallels between his teacher’s doctrine and the doctrines of Dennis and Thomas Aquinas. Finally, Philip of the Trinity, with his Summa Theologiae Misticae (Lyon, 1656), completed the Scholastic summary of mystical theology that Thomas of Jesus had started.

Strictly mystical theology lost its popularity in the 18th century in Carmel and other movements. It was not until 1874 that the Teresian tradition would be reignited: Berthold-Ignacious of Saint Anne’s republishing, in Brussels, of the Summa by Philip of the Trinity and by publication of Instruction des Novices by John of Jesus and Mary. This was the eve of a new spiritual birth of Carmel, that of Thérèse of the Child Jesus (spiritual childhood*) and Elizabeth of the Trinity*. Under the auspices of Father Bruno of Jesus-Marie and maintaining itself very much in the Teresian tradition from 1931 on, Carmelite studies would prove to be a veritable laboratory of mystical psychology and theology laboratory, paralleled by Teresians such as Father Marie-Eugène de l’Enfant-Jésus among the French Carmelites.

c) Theological Reverberations. The great mystics Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross were theologically valuable in that they triggered considerable developments in the study of the human soul. But this birth of modern religious psychology in no way contradicts a strictly doctrinal rigor: both Teresa and John saw the good spiritual director as first of all a letrado, an expert in the tradition*. The search for such theological competence, combined with the anxiety evoked by the misbehavior in student life outside convents and monasteries, led rapidly to the foundation of disalced colleges in the university centers of Spain: Alcalá de Henares in 1570, Baeza in 1597, and Salamanca in 1581. As early as 1592, when Teresian Carmel was canonically separated from the rest of the order, the Constitutions of the reform required students to follow “the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas, both in terms of philosophy and theology”: the fundamentally contemplative nature of Thomism* was valuably recognized here.

The intellectual life of the reformed Carmel henceforth saw a flourishing at the philosophical level, first of all in the Commentarii cum Disputationibus in Universam Aristotelis Stagiritae Logicam (Madrid, 1608) by Diego of Jesus (†1621), which opened the way for the Cursus Complutensis (Alcalá, 1624–28), published by Michael of the Trinity (1588–1661), Anthony of the Mother of God (1583–1637), and John of the Saints (1583–1654), which was then further complemented in 1640 by Metaphysica de Biagio de la Conception (1603–94). The determination to be absolutely loyal to Thomas Aquinas, combined with a desire for intellectual unanimity within the Alcalá school, meant that only propositions accepted by all these religious figures (or at least by a majority vote) came to light. As a result, the work that did get through was extremely scholarly and polished.

On the theological level, the famous Cursus Theologicus de Salmenticensis obeys the same rules. Its definitive form is that of 14 volumes of literal commentary on the Summa Theologica of Aquinas. The first volume was published in Salamanca in 1631 and the final one in Madrid in 1712 (final edition, in 20 vols., in Paris, from 1870 to 1883). The first of its authors, Anthony of the Mother of God (1583–1637), comments on the De Deo Uno, the De Trinitatis, and the De Angelis; Dominic of Saint Teresa (1604–59) comments on beatitude, human acts, and the virtues; and John of the Annunciation (1633–1701) comments on grace, justification, charity, the religious state, the Incarnation, the sacraments in general, and the Eucharist and penance. Anthony of Saint John the Baptist (1641–99) published the first part of volume 12, and Ildephonsus of the Angels (1663–1737) finished the work. Later, and in the same tradition of a theology that was principally academic, teachers such as Anastasius of the Cross (1706–61) and Paul of the Conception (1666–1734) followed the Salmenticensis. However, a certain Philip of the Trinity (Cursus Theologicus, 5 vols., Lyon, 1633–63) and Gabriel of Saint Vincent chose instead to comment directly on the Summa.

3. After the Teresian Reform

The rest of the order did not, however, remain unproductive while the theology of the reformed Carmel theology was flourishing. In Italy the prolix revelations* of Marie-Madeleine de Pazzi (1556–1607) point to a complete inner experience that gave rise to authentically theological thought despite what she herself claimed. The depth and precision of her intuitions, like the biblical structure of her texts, provide the elements of some very rich doctrinal thinking on grace, the humanity of Christ, the relationship between the Church and the Trinity*, and even on the role of the Holy Spirit in the work of salvation*. In France, at the beginning of the 17th century, the entire Carmelite family participated in a decisive manner in the “mystical invasion” brilliantly described by H. Bremond. On one hand, the introduction of Teresian Carmel under the influence of Pierre de Bérulle* and of Bernières de Louvigny and Madame Acarie’s circle would enrich the doctrine of the French school as well as that of authors as eminent as Francis de Sales. On the other hand, the non-Teresian branch of the order discovered a new vitality, notably around the figure of the humble blind friar Jean of Saint Samson (1571–1636), the “Saint John of the French Cross,” according to Bremond. Having entered the Carmelite order after visiting the Paris monastery on the Place Maubert, it was in Brittany (in the monasteries of Dol and Rennes) that he would become the soul of what was known as the Touraine reformation, in particular through his disciples Dominique of Saint-Albert (1595–1634) and Léon of Saint John (1600–1671).

Jean of Saint Samson’s brilliant spiritual discourse has a rare mystical power, and although the structure is often chaotic, it fills more than four thousand pages. These were more or less put together by his friends (edited by Donatien of Saint Nicholas in 1651 and 1656). A critical version is still to be published. In these writings can be detected the influence of a wide spiritual reading. Rhineland-Flemish mysticism can be discerned and was very influential in France at the time. But there are also traces of the writings of Constantin de Barbançon, Pierre Guérin, and Thomas Deschamps and even of Catherine of Genoa and Achille Gagliardi. Indeed, the writing reflects a theological renaissance that owed less to Scholasticism than to prayer itself and to a love of literature. Notably, themes inherited from Ruusbroec and Harphius are developed in the account of the most intense states of union. This experience is reflected in a Trinitarian and eucharistic doctrine that very boldly describes the journey between the soul and God that leads to “pure love.” In the Bonaventurian tradition, the favored path is that of “aspiring” prayer*, “the loving and passionate impulse of the heart and mind through which the soul goes beyond itself and all created things,” intimately joining with God in the ardor of a love that is in itself knowledge and thus near to theology.

In Flanders, the Touraine reform would influence Michel of Saint Augustine (1621–84). His Institutionum Mysticarum Libri Quatuor (Anvers, 1671), published in Latin and Flemish, showed him to be an important theorist on mystical life, which, according to him, is “nothing other than the practice of God and the science of divine things. Therefore, it involves both speculation and practice, modeling man after God in intellect and will.” Even after the direct influence of the major reformers had waned, Carmelite thinkers of the 18th and 19th centuries continued to produce important works. Among the discalced monks, let us simply mention Theodore of the Holy Spirit (†1764) and his De Indulgentiis and Jubilaeo by a reference work in its area and also the huge exegetical work of Cherubim of Saint Joseph (†1716). Finally, apart from dogmatic theology, the Cursus Theologiae Moralis from Salamanca (7 vols., 1665–1753) is one of the most sizeable works on morality ever published, and it would be appreciated as such by Alphonsus* of Liguori and the 18th-century moralists. As for the old observance, one should note Spain’s continuous return to Baconthorpe’s doctrine, thanks to Cornejo de Pedrosa (†1618) in the 17th century and to Emmanuel Coutinho (†1760) in the 18th century.

4. The Contemporary Period

As regards the traditional observance, we ought to note in particular the role played by Titus Brandsma, a Dachau martyr (1942), in the study and publication of traditional Carmel. This role was furthered by the institute, within the university of Nijmegen, that bore his name, and by the works of the Institutum Carmelitanum, founded in Rome in 1951. Mention must also be made of the dogmatic theologian Bartolomeo M. Xiberta (1897–1967), expert at Vatican* II. His christological and sacramental studies foreshadowed the works of B. Poschmann and Karl Rahner*. At the same time, among the discalced Carmelites, the Térésianum in Rome, founded in 1935, has become an international center for the study of mystical literature and theology.

5. Carmel and Marian Theology

From the moment it appeared in the West, the white cloak of Carmel has represented devotion to the one who has always been “Our Lady of Mount Carmel.” We ought not to be surprised, therefore, to learn of an omnipresent Marian theology. Baconthorpe or Ribot, for example, strongly promoted the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, the liturgical celebration of which was introduced as early as the 14th century into the order’s calendar. At the same time, Saint Simon Stock’s supposed vision—he was prior general of the order from 1254 to 1264—stressed devotion to the scapular, which was associated with “Sabbath privilege,” which involved release from purgatory* for Carmelite scapular wearers as early as the Saturday after death. This devotion grew rapidly. During the 15th century, the Carmelite confraternities achieved great popularity, to the point where donning the scapular became one of the principal Marian devotions of Christendom.

It was at the end of the 15th century that Arnaldo Bostio developed the Carmelite outline of Marian devotion by collecting scattered elements. Friars were to offer everything to God through the hands of Mary* and be in a constant relationship with her in order to acquire an intelligence and heart that is entirely devoted to inspiring all good work.

Standing at the crossroads between mysticism and Mariology, Michel of Saint Augustine and Mary of Saint Teresa (Maria Petyt, 1623–77), whom Michel guided, would receive the gift of mystical union with Mary. Maria Petyt’s accounts, published by her spiritual director in her Life (in Dutch) and in De Vita Mariaeformi, distinguish three stages of mystical union. In the first, the soul perceives the presence and help of the Virgin. Mystical contemplation occurs in the second, where God is perceived in Mary or Mary is perceived in her union with God. In the third stage, “there is such an intimate and stable connection to God and Mary that, because of dissolving love, God, Mary, and the soul seem to form one, as if dissolved, absorbed, submerged, and transformed into a single thing. This is the final and supreme end that the soul can reach in the Marian life.”

Beyond works of devotion, this Marian piety would result in a strong theology, represented, for example, in the meditations of Jean de Saint-Samson on the role of Mary during the Passion* of her Son. It would have great pastoral importance in modern times, where it especially served as antidote to a widespread Jansenism* and went far beyond Carmel, propagated especially by Jesuit preachers.

- Teresa of Jesus, Obras, 1st Ed. by Luis de León, Salamanca, 1588.
- Teresa of Jesus, Obras completas, 1st critical Ed. by S. de Santa Teresa, 9 vols., Burgos, 1915–24.
- Teresa of Jesus, Obras completas, critical Ed. by E. de la Madre de Dios and O. del Niño Jesús, 3 vols., Madrid, 1951–59 (1 vol., 1962).
- Luis de León, Opera, vols. I–VII (1891–1896), vols. VIII–IX (1992, 1996), vol. X, Escorial.
- Martial de S. Paul, Bibliotheca scriptorum... c. discalceatorum, 1730.
- Bartholomæus a S. Angelo-Henricus a SS Sacr. (1884), Collectio scriptorum Ord. c. excal, Savone, 1884.
- ♦ H. Bremond (1921), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France..., vol. 2: L’invasion mystique, Paris.
- G. Etchegoyen (1923), L’amour divin, essai sur les sources de sainte Thérèse, Bordeaux-Paris.
- B. Xiberta (1931), De scriptoribus scholasticis saeculi XIV ex Ordine Carmelitarum, Louvain.
- Élisée de la Nativité (1935), “La vie intellectuelle des Carmes,” EtCarm 20, 93–157.
- J. Brenninger (1940), Directorium carmelitanum vitae spiritualis, Rome.
- J. Dagens (1952), Bibliographie chronologique de la littérature de spiritualité et de ses sources (1501–1610), Paris.
- Enrique del Sagrado Corazón (1953), Los Salmenticensés, Madrid.
- T. Brandsma, G. de Sainte-Marie-Madeleine (1953), “Carmes,” DSp 2/1, 156–209.
- B. Xiberta (1956), Carmelus, Commentarii ab Instituto Carmelitano editi, Rome.
- J. Orcibal (1959), La rencontre du C. thérésien avec les mystiques du Nord, Paris.
- M. Jiménez Salas (1962), Santa Teresa de Jesús, Bibliografía fundamental, Madrid.
- L. Cognet (1966), La spiritualité moderne, vol. 1: L’essor: 1500–1650, Paris.
- O. Steggink (1970), “L’enracinement de saint Jean de la Croix dans le tronc de l’Ordre carmélitain,” in Actualité de saint Jean de la Croix, Bruges, 51–78.
- O. Steggink (1972), “Carmelitani,” Dizionario degli Istituti di Perfezione 2, 460–507.
- Simeone della Sagrada Famiglia (1972), Panorama storico-bibliografico degli autori spirituali carmelitani, Rome.
- M. Andrés (1976), La teología española en el siglo XVI, Madrid.
- P. Garrido (1982), Santa Teresa de Jesús, San Juan de la Cruz, y los Carmelitas españoles, Madrid.
- J. Smet (1985), The Carmelites: A History of the Brothers of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, 4 vols., Darien.

CARLO CICONETTI AND STÉPHANE-MARIE MORGAIN

See also Bérulle, Pierre de; Contemplation; John of the Cross; Life, Spiritual; Mysticism; Prayer; Spiritual Theology

Carmelites of Salamanca. See Carmel; Thomism

Casel, Odo. See Mystery

Cassian, John. See Prayer

Casuistry

Casuistry is the art of judging particular cases (casus in Latin) in the light of moral rules. Most of the time we know immediately that a given action is, for example, a murder or a robbery. Conscience* makes the judgment at once (conscientia in Latin, literally “the fact of knowing at the same time” the abstract principle and the concrete case). But the situation is not always so simple. Conscience can be confused by an unusual case and not know what to think of it. Casuistry then becomes necessary. The principle of casuistry is that it is necessary to decide difficult cases by reasoning in the light of moral principles and not, for example, by obeying a concrete commandment of God immediately perceived. This is to say that there is an important place for deliberation in the moral realm.

a) Judaism. It is logical that in Judaism, where the Law is so important, there is a very rich jurisprudence and casuistry, collected in the tradition* of the scribes and rabbis and found both in Scripture* (e.g., Ex 20:1–23:19) and in the Midrash (especially the Halakha).

b) The New Testament. It can be said that Jesus* and Paul belong to some degree to this tradition. On several occasions in the Gospels*, Jesus is seen making an interpretation of the requirements of the Law, for example, with respect to divorce (Mk 10:2–12; Mt 19:1–12) or the sabbath* (Mk 2:23–28). As for Paul, in 1 Corinthians 8, he discusses the question of whether it is legitimate to eat the meat offered in sacrifice to idols. Paul and Jesus, however, criticized certain aspects of the casuistry of their time, either because it lost sight of the true intent of the law (Mk 2:27), because it was obsessed with the letter (1 Cor 8), or because it invented ingenious ways of avoiding true moral requirements (Mk 7:9–13).

c) Patristic and Medieval Periods. Casuistry could not degenerate into legalism or sophistry in the patristic period because it was firmly situated in the larger context of moral and spiritual education. Developing moral rules and studying their application to particular cases was subordinate to the requirement to foster virtues* and conquer vices.

In the Middle Ages casuistry was essentially an adjunct to private confession. Beginning in the sixth century in the West, first in Celtic regions then throughout the Church*, there were manuals for confessors—“penitentials”—that analyzed and classified sins* and indicated the corresponding penances*.

d) Greatness and Decline of Protestant Casuistry. The Reformation was at first hostile to casuistry. Luther* considered the late medieval penitential system to be moralizing and reproached it for concentrating on acts of sin and penance and for failing to see that sin and repentance are above all spiritual directions. Further, in reaction against Scholasticism*, Luther thought reasoning was a hanging offense.

At the end of the 16th century and in the beginning of the 17th, English Puritans such as William Perkins (1558–1602) and William Ames (1576–1633) considered it indispensable to provide the faithful with subtle moral guidance, on the model of the summae of Catholic casuistry (Summae casuum conscientiae), but based on the principles of Protestantism*. They were the pioneers of the Anglican tradition of casuistry that flourished with theologians such as Jeremy Taylor (1613–67) and that Kenneth Kirk (1886–1954) attempted to revive in the 1920s. Unlike its Catholic counterpart, Anglican casuistry is not linked to the confessional and does not seek to judge the gravity of sins already committed. It seeks, rather, to shed light on the line of conduct to be adopted in a particular situation.

Before the end of the 17th century, the Lutherans themselves had taken up casuistry (e.g., J.H. Alsted [1588–1638], F. Balduin, C. Dannhauer [1603–66], J.A. Oslander [1622–97]), but the tradition of Protestant casuistry came to a sudden end shortly thereafter. The reasons for this are various. We can note the influence of Lutheran pietism* and its reaction against the theological and ethical rationalism* of Protestant Scholasticism. Pascal*'s Provinciales (1656–57), which denounced the permissiveness of the probabilist casuistry of the Jesuits, was also greatly influential. Then there was the apparent growth of a certain complacency regarding the individual's capacities of judgment, emanating from a newly minted confidence in the autonomy of the moral sense, reason, and conscience. Finally, there was the almost exclusive interest of the moralists of the late 17th and 18th centuries in metaethical controversies, dealing either with the nature or with the foundations of morality.

e) Catholic Moral Theology. During this time the place of casuistry in Catholicism remained stable. In reaction against what it saw as the moral laxity of Protestantism, the Catholicism of the Counter-Reformation placed even greater emphasis on moral law. From that period until World War II, its moral theology took the form of manuals of casuistry, the model for which had been provided by Jean Azor (1536–1603) in his Institutiones morales of 1600–1601. The most influential of these manuals was the Theologia moralis (1748) of Alphonsus* Liguori, who has been the patron saint of confessors and moral theologians since 1950, which clearly indicates the permanence of his authority. Alphonsus Liguori managed to put an end to the debate, which had raged in the 17th century and continued in the 18th, on the possibility of legitimately straying from the moral law. In the middle of the 17th century, probabilism, a theory formulated by Bartolomeo de Medina (1527–80), was widespread in the Catholic Church. According to this theory, conduct not in conformity with the law but that can with reason be morally defended (i.e., conduct that is “probable”) is morally acceptable, even if there are stronger arguments in favor of different conduct. “Probability” can be “intrinsic” and consist of the strength of the argument or “extrinsic” and consist of the prestige of the authority that can be invoked in its favor. The Jansenists were horrified by a doctrine that could justify the loosest conduct, sometimes on the basis of a single authority. They were on the contrary advocates of an austere form of “tutorism.” This holds that in case of doubt one must make the surest (Latin tutor) decision, and in its austere form it considers that the safest course is to act in conformity with the law. On three occasions (1665, 1666, 1679), the Church condemned the laxity of the conclusions of certain probabilist arguments, and by the late 17th century, laxism had practically disappeared. But in 1690, Rome* also condemned the extreme forms of tutorism. The continuing debate between the more moderate forms of these positions was resolved by the “equiprobabilism” of Alphonsus Liguori. According to this, one may prefer a probable opinion over the law, but only in cases in which opinions for and against have the same force. Since the 1950s there has been a preference, over the legalist concerns of the manuals, for a moral theology more sensitive to the spiritual context of moral deliberation. The significant work of Bernard Häring (1954), for example, sees in moral life a response to the grace of God, and conversion and the growth of virtue are essential themes.

The role of law in moral life has also been relativized because it has been shown that law is not enough to make a decision. Between a law and its application there must be a deliberation, which is more than a logical operation. Discernment and prudence* are required: discernment of the intent of the law and of the moral character of the situation and prudence in order to understand them through one another. Conscience is a matter not only of conformity but also of creativity.

For the advocates of proportionalism* (e.g., R. A. McCormick), casuistry cannot consist of conforming oneself to the requirements of the law. Its role is to discern and to choose, in a given situation, the conduct in which there is the greatest proportion of good in relation to evil. On the contrary, for the “absolutists” or “deontologists” (e.g., Germain Grisez and John Finnis), the casuist must have certain absolute moral rules as guides. In particular, any intent to harm is strictly forbidden.

f) Contemporary Protestantism. Similar debates have recently taken place in Protestant moral theology, although there is a strong prejudice against law and rational deliberation and a preference for focusing on spiritual context and moral intuition. Barth* saw casuistry as an abstract and rationalistic method for arriving at moral judgments through deduction: this point of view was shared by Bonhoeffer*, Emil Brunner (1889–1966), and Helmut Thielicke (1908–86). Following Barth, Richard Niebuhr (1894–1962) and Paul Lehmann (1906–94) prefer vague formulations: a good action is a “response” or a “correspondence” to divine activity. The ethic* of Joseph Fletcher’s situation (1905–91) manifests the usual Protestant suspicion toward law and casuistry but opens the door to a certain rationality in accepting that it is legitimate to calculate the conduct most likely to maximize well-being (utilitarianism*). The most remarkable of those who have opposed this Protestant depreciation of the role of rules is Paul Ramsey (1913–88). He produces convincing arguments in favor of the necessity for clear and definite rules of conduct. For him, certain moral rules for him are “without exception.” He is finally an advocate for a form of casuistry in which the rules and their relationships would be revisable in the light of what is taught by morally novel cases.

- J. H. Alsted (1621), Theologia casuum..., Hanover.
- W. Ames (1639), Conscience with the Power and Cases Thereof, repr. Amsterdam and Norwood, N.J., 1975.
- J. Caramuel y Lobkowitz (1651–1653), Theologia moralis fundamentalis, Frankfurt.
- B. Pascal (1656–57), Les Provinciales.
- H. Busenbaum (1657), Medulla theologiae moralis, Paris.
- A. de Liguori (1748), Theologia moralis, repr. P. Leonardi Gaude, Graz, 1953.
- K. E. Kirk (1927), Conscience and Its Problems: An Introduction to Casuistry, London.
- B. Häring (1954), Das Gesetz Christi, Fribourg.
- J. Fletcher (1966), Situation Ethics, Philadelphia.
- P. Ramsey (1967), Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics, Lanham, Md.; “The Case of the Curious Exception,” in G. H. Outka and P. Ramsey (Ed.), Norm and Context in Christian Ethics, New York, 1968, 67–135.
- ♦ É. Baudin (1947), La philosophie de Pascal, vol. III (“Pascal et la casuistique”), Neuchâtel.
- R. Brouillard (1949), “Casuistique,” Cath. 2, 630–38.
- J. T. McNeill (1951), A History of the Cure of Souls, New York.
- Thomas Wood (1952), English Casuistical Divinity: With Special Reference to Jeremy Taylor, London.
- A. R. Jonsen, S. Toulmin (1988), The Abuse of Casuistry in Early Modern Europe, Cambridge.
- N. Biggar (1989), “A Case for Casuistry in the Church,” in Modern Theology 6/1, Oxford, 29–51.
- P. Cariou (1993), Pascal et la casuistique, Paris.
- J. Keenan, Th. Shannon (Ed.) (1995), The Context of Casuistry, Washington, D.C.
- V. Carraud, O. Chaline (1996), “Casuistique,” DEPhM 213–22.
- J. Mahoney (1997), “Probabilismus,” TRE 27, 465–68.

NIGEL BIGGAR

See also Alphonsus Liguori; Ethics; Intention; Jansenism; Proportionalism; Spiritual Direction

Cataphrygians. See Montanism

Catechesis

The word “catechesis” and its cognates (“catechism,” “catechumen,” “catechist,” and so on) are connected with the Greek verb katekheo (“to resound”) and first meant “oral teaching.” This meaning is found both in the New Testament and in Hellenistic writings (e.g., Cicero, Ad Atticus 15, 12, 2; Flavius Josephus, Vita, 65; Lucian, Asinus, 48). Since Christian initiation* (and thus baptism*) required knowing both Christian dogma and moral, the history of catechesis is also that of teaching lay Christians, especially children, the essential elements of Christianity.

a) Old Testament Background, the New Testament, and the Apostolic Fathers.* In the few cases of conversion found in the Old Testament, such as Ruth, no prior instruction is required (Ru 1:16). The texts, however, stress the duty of teaching the commandments of God* to children (e.g., Dt 6:7 and 20). Moreover, religious reforms required a catechesis of the whole nation, such as is described in 2 Kings 22 and in Nehemiah 8. Judaism*, which practiced proselytism, had certainly found the means to teach newcomers, but little is known in this regard. One can infer they served as models for the catechesis of the new religion: Christians were made, not born, since all Christians were converts. Instruction about Jesus and his teaching, the “gospel,” therefore formed part of what was handed on. Instruction about the relation of the new religion to the law of Judaism was of special importance at the stage when conversion was principally from Jewish communities (see Heb 6:3). The earliest catechesis of which we have details is given in the Didache, in which a text called “The Two Ways” (cc. 1–6), repeated in the Epistle of Barnabas and elsewhere, was probably based on a Jewish model. This text presents the duties of the convert to the “Way of Life” (honesty, chastity, humility, and charity), which separates him from the world and from the “Way of Death.” The Shepherd of Hermas (Book 2) hints at a similar prebaptismal catechesis in Rome.

b) From the Apologists to the Council of Nicaea.* There is no reliable information on the catechesis of the early second-century Christian gnostics*, such as Valentinus or Basilides. We know a little more about the adherents of the “great Church.” Justin (†165) alludes to catechesis in his First Apology (65), describing the baptism and first Eucharist* of new Christians. We do not know who taught them since the catechist was not a separate office. Irenaeus* addresses his Proof of the Apostolic Preaching to Marcian, presumably a layman, “setting forth the preaching of the truth to confirm his faith.” The method of catechesis in Rome in the early third century is disclosed in the Apostolic Tradition, ascribed to Hippolytus of Rome. This set of rules specifies who can be admitted to baptismal catechesis (cc. 15f.), the length of their preparation (three years, but it could be less) by a lay or clerical teacher, and their status in the assembly (cc. 17–19). As for the didaskaleion of Alexandria*, mentioned by Eusebius (v. 260–340) in his Church History (Books 5, cc. 10f.; 6, c. 63), it had nothing to do with elementary instruction.

c) The Imperial Church. With the end of persecution and the official promotion of Christianity came widespread conversions and a new Christian literature. Much of this literature is related to catechesis inasmuch as it promotes transmitting the knowledge of what makes up Christianity, but it is aimed at instructors (now almost universally the clergy) rather than at the laity they taught. Numerous prebaptismal catecheses have also survived, for example, by either Cyril (or John) of Jerusalem (v. 315–86), John Chrysostom*, Ambrose* of Milan, or Theodore of Mopsuestia (v. 350–428). Two treatises dealing with method and content of catechesis, for the use of catechists, deserve special mention: the Catechetical Oration of Gregory* of Nyssa and Catechizing the Uninstructed by Augustine*. Gregory adopted a dogmatic* presentation of the content of the faith, privileging the affirmation of the Trinity* and the doctrine of salvation*; the theology* of baptism and of the Eucharist formed the final part of his work. In contrast, Augustine, in his treatise addressed to a deacon named Deogratias, who had questioned him on several points, adopted a narrative that followed the order of the Bible, from the creation* to the beginnings of the church. Neither Augustine nor Gregory, however, explicitly mentioned the Creed or the Lord’s Prayer as bases of catechesis.

d) From the Patristic Period to the Reformation. Following the conversion of Germanic peoples to Christianity and the generalization of infant baptism, pre-baptismal catechesis ceased in the Christian world. It was replaced in the West by the instruction of children and young people. Numerous injunctions from local councils and bishops* in the period 800–1500 show the efforts made to ensure that the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ave Maria were known and understood by all. Summaries of what needed to be taught were written, such as the Elucidarium by Honorius of Autun (early 12th century; PL 172, 1109–76), in a question and answer format. In the next century, Thomas Aquinas also wrote such texts (Opuscula 4, 5, 7f., and 16), which were widely diffused. Jean Gerson (1363–1429) owns a special place in the history of catechesis. Concerned with education (he wrote several pedagogical works), he wrote a short catechism for children, the ABC des simples gens. He thus prepared the grounds for the publication of Luther*'s two Catechisms in 1529. Luther may not have invented a new literary genre, but he helped the spread of such works throughout Europe. His Catechisms, which were thought to hold the substance of his doctrine, came to be seen as authoritative works in Lutheranism*. The catechism was key in the propagation and strengthening of Protestantism*, in parallel to the multiplying reformed confessions. Calvin*'s Geneva Catechism (1541), which followed his Instruction in Faith (1537), was a great success and came to be used, for example, by churches in Scotland and England. The Heidelberg Catechism (1563) brought together Lutheran and Calvinist elements in 129 questions and answers divided into three sections (man's misery, man's redemption, and the action of grace). One may also cite the Anglican catechism in the Book of Common Prayer of 1662 (with material taken from the Prayer Books of 1549, 1552, and 1604), which was widely used until the mid-20th century.

The Catholic Church's response to the Reform catechisms came with the Roman Catechism, developed by the Council of Trent*. Unlike the important question-and-answer catechism (1555) of Peter Canisius (1521–97), it was made to be used by pastors* (hence its title Catechismus... ad parochos). Surprisingly free from the polemics of its time, it seemed a synthesis of Catholic doctrine.

e) From the Reformation to the Present Day. The 17th and 18th centuries saw the production in many churches of manuals to teach children, as well as catechisms, often in the form of questions and answers.

In France, there was the catechism of Bossuet (1627–1704), the Catéchisme du diocèse de Meaux. Par le commandement de Mgr. l'illustrissime et révérendissime Jacques Bénigne Bossuet Evêque de Meaux, Conseiller du Roy en ses Conseils, cy-devant Précepteur de Monseigneur le Dauphin, premier Aumônier de Madame la Dauphine (1687). It consists of three catechisms (questions and answers): one for beginners and those to be confirmed, one for the more advanced and those preparing for first communion, and, finally, for the even more advanced, a catechism on the feasts and observances of the church. In a warning (Avertissement) to the priests, curates, fathers, mothers, and all the faithfuls of the diocese, Bossuet wrote that parents were the first catechists and ought therefore to know the catechism. He approved of the Grand Catéchisme historique (1683) of Claude Fleury (1640–1723), the church historian, a work that was also popular. An interesting, if ephemeral, attempt to impose a single catechism throughout France was made with Napoleon's Catéchisme à l'usage de toutes les églises de l'Empire français (1806), also known as the Catéchisme impérial. Based on Bossuet's second catechism, it was produced during a troubled time in the history of the French church. Its advocating devotion to the Napoleonic dynasty ensured its obsolescence after 1814. Dupanloup's Catéchisme chrétien (1865) is also interesting. The full title is Le catéchisme chrétien ou un exposé de la doctrine de Jésus-Christ, offert aux hommes du monde par Mgr. l'évêque d'Orléans de l'Académie française, suivi d'un Abrégé et sommaire de toute la doctrine du Symbole par Bossuet. Intended for adults as a summary of the Christian faith, it follows a dialogue format that owes much to Bossuet.

One of the most significant publications in the late 20th century has been the Catechism of the Catholic Church, which was approved by Pope John Paul II in 1992 (text revised in 1997, standard Latin edition). An extraordinary assembly of the Synod* of Bishops, held in 1985 for the 20th anniversary of the end of Vatican* II, had voiced the desire for “a catechism or compendium of all Catholic doctrine, both on faith and on morals,” that could serve as “a reference” for the catechisms written in various countries. The presentation of the doctrine had to be biblical and liturgical, and a sound doctrine was to be suited to Christians' life in today's world. The format of the Catechism owes to the Catechism of the Council of Trent, with its division into four parts: “The Profession of Faith” (the Creed), “The Celebration of the Christian Mystery” (the sacraments*), “Life in Christ” (the Commandments), and “Christian Prayer” (The Lord's Prayer). It takes into account the dogmas of Mary* (1854, 1950) and papal infallibility as defined by Vatican* I. Its content reflects the teachings of Vatican II but also addresses somewhat the issues of the liberation* and feminist theology and even animal rights. Its most striking feature, however, is the constant recourse to the Bible* and to liturgy. In this, it is faithful to what was initially requested. It is too early still to say whether it has succeeded in the second task (being adapted for modern life). If postmodernism* has undermined the authority* of Bible and liturgy, it may not be relevant to refer to them. On the other hand, the prudence* of the Catechism, its approach to controversial issues, and the willingness to explain and to listen allow an effective presentation of Catholic convictions. It has been widely diffused, and there is no doubt that it will constitute a reference for catechesis for some years to come, both inside and outside the Catholic Church.

- Mgr Hézard (1900), Histoire du catéchisme depuis la naissance de l'Église jusqu'à nos jours, Paris.

- G. Bareille (1923), "Catéchèse" and "Catéchuménat," DThC 2/2, 1877–95 and 1968–87.
 E. Mangelot (1923), "Catéchisme," DThC 2/2, 1895–1968.
 J.-C. Dhotel (1967), Les origines du catéchisme moderne, d'après les premiers manuels imprimés en France, Paris.
 A. Lapple (1981), Kleine Geschichte der Katechesen, Munich.
 G.J. Bellinger (1983), Bibliographie des Catechismus Romanus ex decreto concilii Tridentini ad Parochos: 1566–1978, Baden-Baden.
 E. Germain (1983), Deux mille ans d'éducation de la foi, Paris.
 G.J. Bellinger (1988), "Katechismus," TRE 17, 710–44.
 Ch. Bizer (1988), "Katechetik," TRE 17, 687–710.
 W. Jetter (1988), "Katechismuspredigt," TRE 17, 744–86.
 K. Hauschildt (1989), "Katechumenat/Katechumen," TRE 19, 1–14.

LIONEL R. WICKHAM

See also Baptism; Initiation, Christian

Catechism of the Catholic Church. See Catechesis

Catharism

a) History. It was thanks to commerce and to the Second Crusade (1147) that Catharism, a dualist heresy*, spread from Constantinople through the Balkans, Germany, Italy, and the south of France.

The genealogy and history of dualist doctrines has not yet been written, and it would be risky to specify the doctrinal link that led from early Manicheism* to the Western Cathars of the 12th century. It is nevertheless known that the Byzantine Empire in the 10th century experienced movements of opposition to the political and religious capital. In Bulgaria, where Christianization was recent and where Paulicianism (a dualist sect that appeared in the seventh century) had maintained some influence, a protest movement crystallized around the priest Bogomil. In the refutation produced by Cosmas in the late 10th century (Puech 1945), Bogomilism appears as a heresy with strong assetic tendencies closely connected to local monasticism*. The patriarch of Constantinople, Theophylact, defined Bogomilism as "Manicheism mixed with Paulicianism" (Obolensky 1948). The Bogomils' influence reached as far as Constantinople itself. The link between national claims and dualist tendencies was found during the same period in the dualist sects of Asia Minor, the Phoundagiagites.

Between 1167 and 1172 (or around 1176; Thouzelier 1984), during a Cathar council held near Toulouse, Nicetas, the "pope" of Constantinople, converted to an absolute dualism the heretical bishops of Carcassonne, Albi, Agen, and Toulouse, along with the Lombards, who had been moderate dualists until then. The doctrine prospered in Languedoc and maintained a certain cohesion there. Its representatives taught in public and were willing to debate. They traveled from place to place in pairs and had as many women as men in their ranks—the women conducted schools and had their own houses in villages. They found help, hospitality, and protection from many nobles. In Italy, by contrast, dissensions arose rather early and gave rise to several Cathar factions.

The Albigensian Crusade was launched against protectors of the heretics after the murder of a papal legate in 1208. Many nobles of the south of France were dispossessed of their estates, which became royal lands. The tribunal of the Inquisition was established in 1233 to fight heresy and to prosecute the heretics and their followers. Deep discontent ensued, and the action of the inquisitors provoked movements of rebellion, such as the unsuccessful revolt of Trencavel in the jurisdiction of Carcassonne in 1240. Some who escaped from war* and prosecution took refuge in Lombardy and Aragon, and others followed the last bishops and parfaits into regions in which the king as yet had no hold. These last bastions of resistance fell in turn in 1244 (Montségur) and 1255 (Quéribus). From then on, Catharism was maintained in secret.

Differences had long existed between the kings of France and Spain over the sovereignty each one claimed in the regions of the south of France. The Treaty of Corbeil (1258) had officially put an end to the dispute. However, when the domain of Toulouse was directly subjected to French authority because of the death of Alphonse de Poitiers and of Countess Jeanne (1271), the Comte de Foix formed an alliance with the infante of Aragon, whom some Toulousains wished to have as ruler of the region. Philip the Bold came in person to take possession of his uncle's legacy and took the Comte de Foix prisoner (1272). For their part, the inquisitors obtained confessions from nobles who had been vassals of the king of Aragon and allies of the Comte de Foix. These accused men maintained relations with former compatriots who had been judged and released and had established communities in and around Toulouse.

A few years later, inhabitants of the jurisdiction of Carcassonne, who had not obtained the protection they expected from Philippe le Bel against the activities of the inquisitors, turned to the son of the king of Mallorca (a relative of the king of Aragon and the Comte de Foix) and asked for his help. There were riots in Carcassonne and Limoux, a royal city. They were followed by massive arrests and hangings. Among the people captured in Limoux in September 1303 was the parfait Jacques Autier. His father Pierre, former notary of the counts of Foix, had become a Cathar minister. He had traveled through Languedoc with his son and reorganized their church. Many communities, disseminated over a wide territory, lived there in religious autarchy, and family connections played a significant role in the transmission of Catharism. These believers were for the most part descendants of former landowners or even of faidits (banished) nobles. United by their belief in a religious doctrine, they formed an active minority in opposition to French settlement. They shared neither the language nor the culture of the men of the north of France.

Appointed by the pope to the head of the tribunal of the Inquisition in Toulouse in 1307, the Dominican Bernard Gui began to track down the last of the parfaits, their accomplices, and their followers, some of whom had been questioned by his predecessors and by the inquisitor Geoffroy d'Ablis in Carcassonne. The arrest of Jacques Autier in 1303 and that of his father probably in the following year tolled the knell for Catharism. In the course of the 17 years of his mandate, the inquisitor Bernard Gui passed sentence on 650 people.

Without the support of Philip the Bold in 1274 and Philippe le Bel in 1304, the Inquisition would have been unable definitively to halt the rise of Catharism in Languedoc. This religious movement was an important cause of political instability.

b) Doctrine. Catholics gave these heretics various names, including Cathars—from the Greek katharos, meaning “pure.” Other names either followed the classifications of patristic heresiology, such as Albigensians and Manicheans, or referred to their geographic origin, their occupations, or their leaders. They called themselves “good men,” “good Christians,” or friends of God*.

The members of the sect based their teaching on the Bible*, from which they excluded almost all the Old Testament and which they interpreted in their own way, paying particular attention to the Gospel* According to John. The doctrine was built on the belief in the existence of two gods, one good and the other evil, who were hostile to one another from all eternity*. These gods created two worlds, one material and the other spiritual and invisible. Satan, the evil god, left his kingdom and invaded the court of heaven to seduce the angels*. The good Father God drove him out along with his troops and the fallen angels. (In Italy there was a less radical variant that preserved a monotheist theology: although omnipotent, God allowed Satan to organize chaos.) Fallen souls* had fallen to earth and were imprisoned there in bodies created by the devil. In order for the soul seeking the lost paradise to recover its spiritual body, abandoned inert in the world of the good God, the individual had to join the Cathar sect. During a particular ceremony called consolamentum, the officiant (or parfait) freed the soul. This sacrament*, the only one that the Cathars recognized, was performed by the imposition of hands and of the évangélique. It was the baptism* of the Spirit, “spiritual baptism of Jesus Christ, and baptism of the Holy Spirit” (Cathar Ritual, SC 236 §9, 227). It came “as a supplement” to “the other baptism,” the baptism of water, “which was insufficient for your salvation” (ibid., §13, 253–55). The parfait then revealed to the new member the Our Father of which he was the guardian and which he alone had the right and the duty to pronounce. An ordinary believer would be authorized to recite it only at the hour of his death*.

The consolamentum was both a rite of ordination* for the parfaits and the supreme sacrament for the ordinary believer, received at the moment of his death. To receive the consolamentum and enter into the Cathar brotherhood, the future parfait had to commit himself to strict asceticism*, marked by long periods of fasting. He refused to lie, to swear, or to kill. From then on, he no longer feared death, for he knew that it enabled the soul to return to the spiritual world. Finally, his diet excluded (except for fish) any food that was of animal origin or that was the result of sexual intercourse. Because sexuality was considered diabolical by nature, he took a vow of chastity. Believers waited for the hour of death to ask for this sacrament. It was granted to them without confession of their sins, if they had not lost the power of speech and could recite the Our Father that the parfait then taught them. They then had to maintain a total fast until their death. Most of the time, believers had previously made a pact with a parfait in order to be sure of being received into the sect, a custom that was established during the siege of Montségur (1244) under the name of convenenza. If the believer could not be “consoled” or “hereticized,” his soul would then wander from body to body until it encountered the body of a believer purified by this sacrament before his death. This belief in metempsychosis seems to have been brought to Languedoc in the late 13th century by ministers of the sect who had spent time in Lombardy.

In known Cathar rituals—whether in Provençal, late vulgar Latin, or Latin—the Lord’s Prayer is always quoted in Latin, sometimes with a commentary. There are two minor variants from the version of the Latin Church. The first is in the fourth petition (“Give us this day our daily bread”), where epiousios is translated supersubstantialem (“supersubstantial”), as in the Vulgate, and not “daily.” The Cathar interpretation here follows a Greek patristic tradition that sees it as an allusion to the Law* and to the teaching of Christ and not to the Eucharist. The prayer concludes with a doxology (“For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory for ever and ever. Amen!”), which was then unknown in the Latin liturgy* but used by the Eastern Church. As for the rest, it is plausible that the Cathar traditio orationis derives from the Gelasian heresy and “is rooted in the Christian subsoil of the primitive churches of Africa and Northern Italy” (ibid., intro., 56). Other rites performed among parfaits or among believers and parfaits, such as the adoration, signified both respect and recognition among followers of Catharism.

Both heresy and non-Christian religion, Cathar dualism represented a real danger for orthodoxy, for it was preached within the framework of well-organized ecclesial structures*, with its dioceses, bishops, and clergy*, the hierarchy of which was modeled on that of the Roman Church. The refutation of Cathar dualism (and of dualism in general) was a major theological task that permitted a reaffirmation of Christian monotheism* confronted with the problem of evil*.

- H.-Ch. Puech, A. Vaillant, Le traité contre les Bogomiles de Cosmas le prêtre, Paris, 1945.
- Chr. Thouzellier, intro., Ed., trans. and notes, Rituel cathare, 1977, SC 236.
- Anselme d’Alexandrie, Tractatus de hereticis, Ed. A. Dondaine, “La hiérarchie cathare en Italie,” II, AFP XX, 1950, 308–24.
- Bernard Gui, Liber Sententiarum inquisitionis Tholosanae, Ed. Ph. van Limborch, Amsterdam, 1692; Manuel de l’Inquisiteur, vol. I, Ed. G. Mollat, CHFMA, 8, 1926.
- Bonacursus, Manifestatio haeresis Catharorum, PL 204, 775–92.
- De heresi catharorum in Lombardia*, Ed. A. Dondaine, AFP XIX, 1949, 306–12.
- Disputationes Photini Manichaei cum Paulo Christiano, Propositiones adversus manicheos*, PG 88, 529–78.
- Durand de Huesca, Liber antiheresis, Ed. K. Selge, Die ersten Waldenser, II, AKuG 37, 2, 1967; Liber contra Manicheos, Ed. Ch. Thouzellier, Une somme anticathare. Le Liber contra Manicheos de D. de Huesca, SSL Études et documents, 32, 1964.
- Eckbert de Schönau, Sermones contra Catharos, PL 195, 11–102.
- Ermengaud de Béziers, Contra haereticos, PL 204, 1235–72.
- Euthyme Zigabène, De Haeresi bogomilorum narratio, Ed. A. Ficker, Die Phundagiagiten, Leipzig, 1908, 87–111; Panoplia dogmatica, XXVII, 19, PG 130, 1290–1332.
- Jacques de Capellis, Summa contra hereticos, Ed. D. Bazzochi, L’eresia catara, t. II, Bologne, 1920.
- Livre des deux principes*, Ed. Ch. Thouzellier, SC 198, 1973.
- Moneta de Crémone, Adversus catharos et Valdenses, Ed. Th.-A. Ricchini, Rome, 1743, New Ed., Ridgewood, N.J., 1964.
- Raynier Sacconi, Summa de Catharis, Ed. A. Dondaine, Un traité néomanichéen du XIIIe s., Rome, 1939, 64–78; Ed. F. Sanjek, AFP 44, 1974, 31–60.
- ♦ C. Douais (1900), Documents pour servir à l’histoire de l’Inquisition dans le Languedoc au XIIIe et au XIVe siècle, 2 vols., Paris.
- D. Obolensky (1948), The Bogomils: A Study in Balkan Neomanichaeism, Cambridge.
- A. Dondaine (1949, 1950), La hiérarchie cathare en Italie, AFP XIX and XX.
- Y. Dossat (1959), Les crises de l’Inquisition toulousaine au XIIIe siècle (1233–1273), Bordeaux.
- A. Borst (1953), Die Katharer, Stuttgart.

Catharism

- M. Loos (1974), Dualist Heresy in the Middle Ages, Prague.
J. Duvernoy (1979), Le catharisme: L'histoire des cathares, Toulouse.
G. Rottenwohrer (1982–93), Der Katharismus, 4 vols. (8 vols.), Bad Honnef.
Chr. Thouzellier (1984), “Cathares,” EU 4, 379–85.
A. Pales-Gobilliard (1991), “La Prière des cathares,” in Prier au Moyen Age, Paris.
A. Pales-Gobilliard (1994), Poursuites et déplacements de population après la croisade albigeoise, CTh HS, Amiens.

- A. de la Presle-Evesque (1994), Le conflit franco-aragonais de la fin du XIIIe siècle et ses conséquences religieuses et politiques, CTh HS, Amiens.

ANNETTE PALES-GOBILLIARD AND GALAHAD THREEPWOOD

See also Evil; Gnosis; Manicheanism; Marcionism; Waldensian

Catholic Church. See Catholicism

Catholicism

While there are some concepts that denote very broad groupings encompassing several Churches or Christian communities (e.g., the “genus” of Protestantism or its “species” Calvinism), Catholicism is, strictly speaking, a useless category. Its original usage, faithful to its etymological meaning, has declined, giving rise to the doctrinal or geographical doublet “Catholicity”; and the Catholic Church, according to its own ecclesiology, is the sole constituent of Catholicism. Inasmuch as the word’s contemporary usage includes social and cultural aspects, however, it would be impossible to limit Catholicism to its place in doctrinal history. Hence, three principal definitions of Catholicism are offered.

1. Catholicism as a Denomination

The Catholic Church is the largest and, geographically speaking, the most widely distributed of all the Christian Churches. With over a billion members, it includes a good half of all who belong to a Christian Church worldwide. Although its heartland is in Europe, it is not restricted to a single ethnic or geographical milieu (Kaufmann 1994). The Second Vatican* Council, using models developed by the two previous councils

(those of Trent* and Vatican I*), set out its official definition of itself at length, notably in its dogmatic constitutions Dei Verbum and Lumen Gentium.

A doctrinal and cultural whole, known for convenience as Catholicism, can be extracted from these texts, making possible a sociocultural approach to the Church (the word “Catholicism” itself appears neither in Dei Verbum nor in Lumen Gentium). According to these texts, one of the distinctive features of Catholicism is the universal government of the Church (LG 23) exercised by the pope as bishop of Rome, in communion with the college of bishops. The ordained ministry in the Catholic Church has the role not only of ecclesiastical government but also the official proclamation of dogma (the teaching role) and the celebration of the sacraments (the sanctifying role); on a local level it is structured according to three degrees: bishop, priest, and deacon (see LG 27–29) and restricted to men. Ministerial and baptismal priesthoods cooperate in different ways in the celebration of the sacraments (LG 11). Each believer is a bearer of the Christian message by word and example (LG 12), but only an explicit ecclesiastical mission can confer authoritative character on that message. The right of determining the content of the Christian faith and of excluding unorthodox interpretations (heresy* and infallibility*), is the preserve of councils, bishops in communion with the pope, or the latter alone (LG 25). The exercise of the magisterium* concerns not only the expression of faith (dogma) but also Church structures* (including law), customs (in other words, the various forms of divine worship), and even some fundamental points of ethics*.

The doctrinal basis of Catholicism comprises Holy* Scripture (canon* of Scriptures) and the more or less normative interpretations of it given by the ecclesiastical magisterium and the authorized witnesses of the Church past and present (tradition*; Theological Places*) (DV 10). The development of Church structures and of their mode of operation is regulated by universal or local decisions having legal status (canon law; jurisdiction).

Despite the strikingly unified nature of its structure and teachings, Catholicism in its various forms exhibits an irreducible diversity, including theological schools, local churches, inculturation, and distinctive traditions (see LG 13). Moreover, its history has always been characterized by internal movements of opposition to the prevailing doctrine—for example, Jansenism*, Gallicanism*, and Modernism*—whose formulations were sometimes condemned and sometimes not. Certainly the Catholic Church no longer claims in the face of the other Christian Churches to hold a monopoly on ecclesiality and the authentic conditions of the Christian experience. It does, however, maintain that it is a visible manifestation of the Church of Christ, with all its necessary components (LG 8).

Catholicism condemns the Orthodox and Protestant churches, above all, in the Orthodox and Protestant churches for their refusal to recognize the pope's universal episcopate and, in the latter case only, the lack of a ministry legitimized by apostolic* succession. To these points should be added doctrinal differences that, even though numerous ecumenical initiatives have enabled them to be somewhat reduced, still remain unresolved. These concern the Eucharist, the procession of the Holy Spirit, Mary, the cult of saints, and the theology of ministries.

2. Catholicism as a Vision of the World

If there exists a “Catholic” experience of the world, it is not to be confused with the manifestations of the Christian Church that bears that name, though it is at least historically linked to it. It is based on attitudes, movements of thought, and modes of behavior in part determined by the life and doctrine of the Roman Church, though not directly deducible from these (Gabriel and Kaufmann 1980). So, for example, in the view of C. Schmitt (1923), Catholicism is linked to a political conception grounded in “the rigorous application of the principle of representation.”

3. Normative Definitions of the Catholic Phenomenon

While the epithets “Roman” and “Catholic” have a long history (Congar 1987), the noun “Catholicism” appeared only during the modern era (Imbs 1977). And it was even more recently—during the 19th century—that it took on the connotation of a qualitative definition. Three principal varieties of this are met with.

a) The Complementary Nature of Catholicism and Protestantism. Schelling* (1841–42), in his Philosophie der Offenbarung, saw Catholicism as a necessary but one-sided impulse that Christianity was destined to transcend as its historical course unfolded (see also Heiler 1923). For Schleiermacher* (1830), it was a legitimate form of the Christian faith, but one to which Protestantism was destined to remain irredeemably alien.

b) Catholicism as an Aberrant Development. From this standpoint, Catholicism is perceived as a judicial and dogmatic distortion of Christianity. This development is seen as having originated far in the past (Protocatholicism*) but as reaching its fullest manifestation in the modern period (e.g., Sohm 1892; Harnack 1931–32).

c) Catholicism as a Positive Definition of the Essence of Christianity. Since the start of the 19th century, theologians (especially Catholic ones) have tried to define the “essence” of Christianity. The most striking formulations in this regard are to be found in the work of J. A. Möhler (1825), who holds that “only everybody can compose the whole, and the unity of the whole cannot but be a totality”; in K. Adam (1924), who writes of “the integral assertion of values, an opening to the world in the most comprehensive and most noble sense, the marriage of nature with grace, of art with religion, and of science with faith, so that ‘God may be all in all’”; in Henri Sonier de Lubac* (1938): “To see Catholicism as one religion among others . . . is to mistake its essence . . . Catholicism is Religion. It is the form that humanity must put on so as to at last be itself. It is the one reality which has no need of conflict in order to exist, and is thus the opposite of a “closed society,” though here Catholicism denotes less a “content” than a “spirit”; and finally in Hans Urs von Balthasar* (1975), who employs the adjective while as far as possible avoiding the noun, writes of “a revelation and communication of the divine Totality.”

Catholicism

Today, however, this set of themes is rarely approached under the heading of “Catholicism” but rather from the standpoint of a catholicity that goes beyond the confessional boundaries of Catholicism in its fulfillment of the Church’s vocation (Congar 1949; Seckler 1972, 1988).

- J. A. Möhler (1825), Die Einheit in der Kirche und das Prinzip des Katholizismus, Darmstadt, 1957.
- F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1830), Der christliche Glaube, 2nd Ed., vol. I, Berlin.
- F. W. J. Schelling (1841–42), Philosophie der Offenbarung (copy Paulus), Frankfurt, 1977.
- R. Sohm (1892), Kirchenrecht, vol. I, Leipzig.
- F. Heiler (1923), Der Katholizismus, Munich-Basel.
- C. Schmitt (1923), Römischer Katholizismus und politische Form, Hellaerau.
- K. Adam (1924), Das Wesen des Katholizismus, Augsburg.
- A. von Harnack (1931–32), Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, 5th Ed., 3 vols., Tübingen (repr. Darmstadt, 1983).
- H. de Lubac (1938), Catholicisme: Les aspects sociaux du dogme, Paris.

- Y. Congar (1949), “Catholicité,” Cath 2, 720–25.
- W. Beinert (1964), Um das dritte Kirchenattribut, Essen.
- M. Seckler (1972), Hoffnungsversuche, Fribourg, 128–40.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1975), Katholisch, Einsiedeln.
- P. Imbs (Ed.) (1977), Trésor de la langue française, vol. V, Paris, s.v.
- K. Gabriel, F.-X. Kaufmann (Ed.) (1980), Zur Soziologie des Katholizismus, Mayence.
- Y. Congar (1987), “Romanité et catholicité,” RSPHTh 71, 161–90.
- A. Dulles (1988), The Reshaping of Catholicism, San Francisco.
- M. Seckler (1988), Die schiefen Wänden des Lehrhauses, Fribourg, 178–97.
- F.-X. Kaufmann (1994), “Christentum VI,” LThK 3 2, 1 122–126.

LEONHARD HELL

See also Anglicanism; Calvinism; Church; Infallibility; Lubac, Henri Sonier de; Lutheranism; Orthodoxy; Pope; Protestantism; Universalism

Causa Sui. See Aseitas

Cause. See Being; Creation

Censorship, Doctrinal. See Notes, Theological

Chalcedon, Council of 451

The Council of Chalcedon* made a major contribution to christological dogma. It must initially be viewed in the context of the progress of debate since the time of the Council of Ephesus*.

1. From Ephesus to Chalcedon

a) The Repercussions of Ephesus. The Council of Ephesus (431) had reached its conclusion with the “act of union” of 433. John of Antioch, representing the theology of the school* that had trained Nestorius, had accepted that Mary should be known as “Mother of God” (Theotokos) and, while distinguishing the human and the divine natures of Christ, acknowledged in him a single “person” (prosôpon). Cyril* of Alexandria had acquiesced, renouncing his own formula, “the unique nature of the incarnate Word*.” Soon afterward, in 435, Bishop Proclus had substituted for this phrase the expression “a single hypostasis of the incarnate Word,” and the introduction of the term “hypostasis” (in the sense of “physical act of existence” or “existing person”) foreshadowed the future definition of Chalcedon.

However, the “act of union” of 433 had not put an end to the divisions. Some Eastern Christians continued to regard Cyril as a heretic, either because they misunderstood his earlier pronouncements or because they were still followers of the Nestorianism* condemned at Ephesus. On the other hand, some of Cyril’s supporters criticized him for having approved in 433 a form of words that spoke of “two natures.” Some believed that this formula implied a separation of human and divine nature, while others were already tempted by what would become the heresy* of the monk Eutyches.

The latter, indeed, would adopt a position totally opposed to the doctrine of Nestorius. Professing a radical Monophysitism*, Eutyches was summoned before a synod by Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, and excommunicated (448). But the emperor Theodosius II, convinced of Eutyches’s doctrine, in turn convoked a council that met at Ephesus on 1 August 449.

b) Leo the Great and the “Tome of Leo”. A native of Tuscany, Leo had become bishop of Rome in 440. He was to play a major political role at a time when barbarian invasions threatened the western part of the empire. He also proved to be a remarkable pastoral priest, working at the organization of the liturgy and of monastic life in the Roman community and giving sermons striking for their doctrinal solidity and purity of style. His concern for orthodoxy and for the peace of the Church would lead him to intervene decisively in the christological controversies of his time. It was in this context that on 13 June 449 he addressed a long dogmatic letter, the “Tome of Leo,” to the patriarch of Constantinople. Refuting the heresy of Eutyches, in which he saw a new form of Docetism*, Leo emphasized that the properties of Christ’s human nature and of his divine nature must be preserved. Such a distinction did not, however, entail separation since, as he pointed out, the two natures were themselves joined in “a single person”: “Each form accomplishes its own task in communion with the other.” This unity of the person made it permissible to say that the Son of man descended from heaven or that the Son of God was crucified (one can recognize here what later theology would term the “communication of idioms*”). By its insistence on the two natures, Leo’s doctrine was of course nearer to Antioch’s position than to that of Cyril. Nonetheless, it attained a balance in its formulations that directly foreshadowed the theological synthesis of Chalcedon.

c) From the “Robber Council of Ephesus” to the Council of Chalcedon. The “Tome of Leo” was aimed at the bishops who were to meet at Ephesus in August 449. But this council took place in the worst of circumstances: a majority in favor of Eutyches had been arranged in advance. Despite the presence of the Roman delegates, Eutyches was rehabilitated, while Flavian was to be barred from the episcopate and sent into exile. Pope Leo was told of this tumultuous assembly, which he labeled a “robber council.” Challenging everything that had occurred, he asked Theodosius to convene a general synod* in Italy, but the emperor did not reply and let it be known that he entirely approved of the council of 449.

It was only after the death of Theodosius (450) that the situation could progress. The new emperor, Marcian, suggested to the pope that a new council should be held in the East. Then, despite Leo's misgivings, he announced his decision to call one at Nicaea. Leo did not oppose this but requested that agreement be reached on the faith set out in the "Tome" and indicated that he would preside over the assembly himself through the intermediary of his legates. Marcian finally transferred the council to Chalcedon, opposite Constantinople, where the bishops, some 500 or 600, began their work on 8 October 451.

2. The Work of Chalcedon

a) The Dogmatic Decree. At first the bishops were unwilling to add a new definition to that of Nicaea* I. Then, after the teachings of Cyril and of Pope Leo had been approved, the imperial commissioners announced that a formulation of the faith would be worked out by the council. It was solemnly proclaimed in the emperor's presence at the sixth session (25 October 451).

After a long preamble, exhorting the preservation of the faith formerly defined by Nicaea and Constantinople* I, the document restates the two opposing errors of Nestorius and Eutyches and sets against them, respectively, the letters of Cyril and Leo. Next follows the definition proper: a broad, majestic statement, blending formulae from various sources and, above all, showing the influence of the theology set out in the "Tome."

This definition begins by confirming the doctrine promulgated in 431 by the Council of Ephesus. It is punctuated, indeed, by the expressions "a single and same Son" (at the beginning and end) and "a single and same Christ" (about halfway through, where the description of Mary as Theotokos also appears). The progression of the statement is thus revealing, beginning as it does from a consideration of unity, with which it also culminates.

Against this background, however, the text's original feature resides in its affirmation of duality. This first stands out in the first part: "our Saviour Jesus Christ, equally perfect in divinity, and equally perfect in humanity, at once truly God and truly man, of a rational soul and body, consubstantial with the Father* by his divinity and at the same time consubstantial with us by his humanity." Most notably, the second part of the statement introduces the terminology of the two natures: "recognized in two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, and without separation (asugkhotôs, atreptôs, adiairetôs, akhôristôs), the difference in these natures being in no way annulled as a result of union, the particularity of one and the other nature being on the contrary preserved, and convergent in a single person and a single hypostasis, a Christ neither splitting up nor dividing into two persons, but a single and same Son." Certainly the standpoint of unity remains clearly present even in these formulations, as witnessed in the two adverbs translated by "without division" and "without separation" and the attribution to Christ of a single "person" or "hypostasis." But the first two adverbs ("without confusion, without change"), the affirmation of a single hypostasis "in two natures" (and not merely "of two natures"), and the insistence on the respective properties of either nature all attest to the particular thrust of Chalcedon, which, while confirming the contribution made by Ephesus, was opposed as a matter of priority to the errors of Eutyches and his supporters.

b) The Conciliar Canons. The work of Chalcedon was not confined to its definition of dogma. The council also had the task of ruling on matters regarding individuals (so, e.g., Theodoret, suspected of Nestorianism, was rehabilitated), and it produced 28 canons concerning clerical and monastic discipline as well as problems of ecclesiastical administration.

Canon 28, however, was to be the cause of some serious incidents. Not only did it accord "primacy of honor" to the bishop of Constantinople, the "new Rome" (as the first Council of Constantinople had done). It also gave him a power of jurisdiction* over a large part of the East, and, while admitting the preeminence of the Apostolic See (the old Rome), it linked this preeminence to the imperial city's prestige and not to the authority conferred by Jesus on Peter*. Canon 28 was challenged by the Roman legates. The conciliar Fathers*, followed by Marcian and the patriarch Anatolius, wrote to Leo asking him to approve the council in its entirety. But the pope would give his assent only on matters of faith. He therefore ratified the doctrinal decrees of Chalcedon while rejecting canon 28.

3. The Legacy of Chalcedon

a) The Reception of the Council. The dogmatic definition of Chalcedon gave rise to violent conflicts during the following century. While the West received it without difficulty, the East was split into three factions: the Chalcedonians, the upholders of Nestorianism, and the proponents of Monophysitism. In the sixth century, the emperor Justinian, who advocated a form of "Neochalcedonism," aimed to reconcile the Monophysites and the Chalcedonians. He exerted a considerable influence on the second Council of Constantinople (553), whose dogmatic canons constitute an Ephesian interpretation of Chalcedon. Despite this effort at clarification, however, the Church* would remain split until the present day between "Chalcedonian churches" and "pre-Chalcedonian churches."

b) Chalcedon Today. In spite of some criticisms directed by Luther* at the terminology of the two natures, the definition of Chalcedon was generally accepted in the modern West as the major expression of christological dogma. The anniversary of the council in 1951 stimulated an attempt at a contemporary reinterpretation: “Chalcedon, end or beginning?” Subsequently, the dogmatic definition was subjected to harsh criticisms: its conceptual language was inadequate, the term “nature” was ambiguous, there was a risk of dualism, and there was an ignorance of the historical dimension and an ineffectiveness in resolving the christological problem. However, some of these objections have been removed because of a hermeneutics* that takes account of the context of Chalcedon as well as the scope of its definition. It may certainly be admitted that the image of the two natures expresses the identity of Christ in too static a way and that the concepts employed bear the mark of the culture of the time. The contribution of Chalcedon was nonetheless to establish a norm for Christology*, which must attempt to consider the union of humanity and divinity in Jesus Christ “without confusion, without change, without division and without separation.”

• Acts: ACO II.

A.-J. Festugière (1982), Éphèse et Chalcédoine: Actes des conciles, Paris.

A.-J. Festugière (1983), Actes du concile de Chalcédoine: Sessions III–VI, Geneva.

Decrees: COD 75–103 (DCO II/1, 175–234).

♦ J. Lebon (1936), “Les anciens symboles dans la définition de Chalcédoine,” RHE 32, 809–76.

A. Grillmeier, H. Bacht (Ed.) (1951–54), Das Konzil von Chalcedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 vols., Würzburg.

H. M. Diepen (1953), Les Trois Chapitres au concile de Chalcédoine, Oosterhout.

R. V. Sellers (1953), The Council of Chalcedon, London.

A. Grillmeier (1958), “Der Neu-Chalcedonismus,” HJ 77, 151–66.

P.-Th. Camelot (1961), Éphèse et Chalcédoine, Paris.

J. Liébaert (1966), L’Incarnation, I: Des origines au concile de Chalcédoine, Paris, 209–22.

J. Pelikan (1971), The Christian Tradition. A History of the Development of Doctrine, I: The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600), Chicago, chap. 5.

W. de Vries (1974), Orient et Occident: Les structures ecclésiales vues dans l’histoire des sept premiers conciles œcuméniques, Paris, 101–60.

A. de Halleux (1976), “La Définition christologique de Chalcédoine,” RTL 7, 3–23 and 155–70.

B. Sesboüé (1977), “Le Procès contemporain de Chalcédoine,” RSR 65, 45–80.

A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I: Von der apostolischen Zeit bis zum Konzil von Chalcedon (451), Fribourg-Basel-Vienna, 751–75 (2nd Ed. 1990).

J.-M. Carrière (1979), “Le mystère de Jésus-Christ transmis par Chalcédoine,” NRTh 101, 338–57.

L. R. Wickham (1981), “Chalkedon,” TRE 7, 668–75.

B. Sesboüé (1982), Jésus-Christ dans la tradition de l’Église: Pour une actualisation de la christologie de Chalcédoine, Paris.

A. Grillmeier (1986), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche II/1, Das Konzil von Chalcedon: Rezeption und Widerspruch (451–518), Fribourg-Basel-Vienna (2nd Ed. 1991).

B. Sesboüé (Ed.) (1994), Histoire des dogmes, t. I: Le Dieu du salut, Paris, 393–428.

MICHEL FÉDOU

See also Christ/Christology; Cyril of Alexandria; Ephesus, Council of; Hypostatic Union; Mono-physitism; Nestorianism; Person

Character

“Character” comes from the Greek kharakter (“imprint”), which itself comes from the verb kharattein (“to engrave”). It usually refers to the distinctive features of a person or thing. Two particular meanings should be noted: 1) within the Catholic theology of the sacraments*, character refers to the lasting spiritual impression through baptism*, confirmation*, and ordination*, and 2) in contemporary ethics*, philosophy*, psychology, and theology, character is the set of particularities of one person as distinct from another. We shall concentrate on the significance of character for Christian anthropology and ethics and on the philosophical resources that inspire contemporary discourses.

Philosophers such as Martha Nussbaum and Alasdair MacIntyre are reflecting, however differently, on the constructive potential of an ethics based on notions of virtue and moral character. Paul Ricoeur deals with character in the context of personal identity within the larger framework of his ethical project: “character . . . indicates the set of durable dispositions by which one recognizes a person” (Ricoeur 1990).

Among contemporary theologians, Stanley Hauerwas (1944–) has been most prominent in attempting to construct an ethics in terms of the idea of character: “The language of character cannot be avoided in Christian ethics if we are to do justice to the significance of the continuing determination of the self necessary for moral growth” (Hauerwas 1985 [1975]).

For MacIntyre, Hauerwas, and others, the failure of the Enlightenment project of justifying morality obliges us to search for more tenable ethical theories: hence the retrieval of classical theories of virtue and character, especially those of Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas, and analyses of the role of communal traditions in the formation of moral character.

Aristotle treats what today we call “moral character” in the Ethica Nicomachea (Nicomachean Ethics), where he stresses the agent’s good or bad formation through his actions. Thus, an action cannot be deemed good or bad in itself but has to be considered together with the agent’s intention. Only when the agent knows what he is doing, when he has made a conscious choice on behalf of a certain action for its own sake, and when he acts in accordance with a firm and reliable character can his action be deemed just and reasonable (EN 1105a, 28–32). “Character” here translates the Greek word ethos, while ethike arete can be translated as “excellence of character” or “moral excellence.” The excellences of character are distinguished from the excellences of intellect but also related to them because intellect and character complement each other. According to Aristotle, character is closely linked to appropriate action. An action is appropriate, according to the famous definition, if it is in a mean between excess and deficiency. The mean is concerned not only with actions but also with passions. The choice of the mean is the result of reasoning (EN 1106b, 36–1107a, 5), which depends on practical reason (prudence), an indispensable notion if one wishes to understand what character is. Indeed, the truth that practical wisdom seeks is that which coincides with right intention (EN 1139a, 26–30), without which moral character does not exist.

Moral character includes not only excellences such as courage, truthfulness, justice, and moderation but also aspects considered in terms of good social behavior, such as generosity, mildness of temper, humor, modesty, and a broad sense of hospitality and friendship. But how is this character formed? According to Aristotle, one becomes virtuous by doing virtuous things. First, we are engaged in such acts because we have been taught to do so; later, we understand that our virtuous actions are right. Moral maturity is achieved through both education and habituation, within a favorable social environment. This is why Aristotle stresses the importance of the role that parents, teachers, and the polis play in this formation and the ensuing danger when they fail.

Thomas Aquinas generally agrees with Aristotle about character but adds some clarifications, especially with regard to the concepts of will and intention. Moreover, he considers the character-forming virtues from a Christian theological perspective, stating that charity (love*) is the form of all the virtues. For Aquinas, choosing between different possibilities is dependent on both reason and desire, but choice is in itself an act of determination and will. Choice is, then, the result of intention, and this intention is morally significant because by it we are formed as agents of the act (STh Ia IIae, q. 19, a. 7). Both Aristotle and Thomas underline the need to will to do good, not just to do good.

“For Aristotle and Aquinas, therefore, to say that a man has character seems to mean at least that he has acquired certain kinds of habitus called virtues” (Hauerwas 1985 [1975]). These “habitus” are not habits in the ordinary sense of the term; they are “readiness for action” that is not momentary but lasting (ibid.). Thus, character is formed “from repeated acts of deliberate decision and, when formed, issues forth in deliberative decision” (ibid.). The difference between teleological action and intentional action is crucial for Hauerwas. Intention is distinct from mere purposive behavior. “We are profoundly what we do, for, once action is understood in its essential connection with our agency, it is apparent that by acting we form not merely the act but ourselves in the process” (ibid.). Hauerwas explores both the private and the public aspects of character and its possibilities of change and growth, but, notwithstanding how our character is formed, “it must be nonetheless our character if . . . men are self-agents” (ibid.). Hauerwas frequently developed a theological thesis: that “the idea of character can provide a way of explicating the kind of determination of the believer in Christ without necessarily destroying the tension between the ‘already but not yet’ quality of the Christian life” (ibid.). Hauerwas, together with many other theologians, demands in this respect a new appraisal of the function of narrative* in the moral development both of an individual and of the Christian community in which the individual is formed (Hauerwas 1981). The importance of others must be acknowledged in any Christian ethics of character: it is, indeed, others who transmit founding narratives and examples of the Christian life (Hauerwas 1983).

A Christian ethics of character, however, is only one among the different approaches to Christian life advocated today. Its particular emphases on the individual person, on his or her formation as a responsible agent, on the role of narrative, and on the church as the milieu for the formation of character provide essential aspects, but an ethics of character also includes the potential of conflict. The best Christian might at times be forced to make painful decisions and to violate his or her own Christian character. When it is necessary to make a moral decision and neither the Christian tradition nor the Christian community is able to offer enough help, when the plurality of aspects of an individual character is shocking because of its contradictions, and when, finally, all kinds of Christian and non-Christian narratives call for attention, then recourse to some understanding of natural law or obligation, to teleological ethics, and to discourse ethics may be of help. A Christian ethics that ignores character is as insufficient as an ethics of character that takes no account of any other element of the moral life.

- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 19 and 49–67.
- S. Hauerwas (1975, new Ed., 1985), Character and the Christian Life: A Study in Theological Ethics, Notre Dame, Ind., and London.
- S. Hauerwas (1981), A Community of Character: Toward a Constructive Christian Social Ethics, Notre Dame, Indiana, and London.
- S. Hauerwas (1983), The Peaceable Kingdom: A Primer in Christian Ethics, Notre Dame, Indiana, and London.
- A. MacIntyre (1985), After Virtue: A Study in Moral Theory, London.
- J. Stout (1988), Ethics after Babel: The Languages of Morals and Their Discontents, Boston.
- P. Ricoeur (1990), Soi-même comme un autre, Paris.
- M. Nussbaum (1993), “Non-Relative Virtues: An Aristotelian Approach,” in M. Nussbaum and A. Sen (Ed.), The Quality of Life, Oxford, 242–69.
- M. Canto-Sperber, A. Fagot-Largeault (1996), “Caractère,” DE-PhM, 200–209.

WERNER G. JEANROND

See also Ethics; Virtues; Wisdom

Character, Sacramental. See Sacrament

Charisma

In the New Testament, “charisma,” from the Greek kharis (“grace*”), designates the exceptional gifts given to some of the faithful for the good of the community. In 1 Corinthians 12:8–11, Paul offers a list of charismata: wisdom, knowledge, faith, the gift of healing, the working of miracles, prophecy, the discernment of spirits, speaking in tongues (“glossolalia”), and its interpretation; in verse 28, he adds the charismata given to the apostles, the prophets, teachers, and leaders of the community. In medieval terminology, charismata are elements of grace given for the edification of the community (gratia gratis data) and not for the sanctification of individuals (gratia gratum faciens). The term “charisma” achieved prominence in the sociology of religion and political sociology thanks to the influence of Max Weber. Pentecostalism*, both Protestant and Catholic (“Charismatic Revival”), has given a prominent place to the Pauline emphasis on charismata. The emphasis given by Vatican* II to the multiplicity of charismata in the one Church, the recipient of the gifts of the Holy* Spirit, has provided the basis for a renewal of the theology of charismata.

- W. E. Mühlmann et al. (1971), “Charisma,” HWP 1, 893–999.
- K. H. Ratschow et al. (1981), “Charisma,” TRE 7, 681–98.
- G. Dautzenberg et al. (1994), “Charisma,” LThK3 2, 1014–18.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Grace; Pentecostalism

Charity. See Love

Chartres, School of

a) To give even just a general view of the school of Chartres, it is impossible to dispense with a detour through historiography. Its fame began at the end of the 19th century. According to R. L. Poole and A. Clerval, it had been one of the most prestigious centers of studies and teaching in the 11th and 12th centuries. Good and excellent works, devoted to authors more or less attached to this school, have consolidated its reputation since that time. But in 1970, R. W. Southern expressed an iconoclastic opinion. He stated that we possess very few reliable documents on this school, and he concluded from this that Chartres was nothing more than an episcopal school like so many others. Indeed, it was much less important than the ones in Paris and in Laon, and its teaching was outdated. However, the well-argued responses of P. Dronke, N. M. Haring, and E. Jeaneau, among others, have led to a general agreement that the school of Chartres certainly existed as an organized institutional body, although not a well-known one and no doubt less exceptional than first assessments had claimed. In addition, the quality of its masters (more numerous than Southern had thought), as well as the propagation of its teachings and of what can be called the spirit of Chartres, ensured its important place in the intellectual history of the 12th century.

Bishop Fulbert (1006–28) gave the school an early brilliance. At the beginning of the 12th century, this bishop, together with the great canonist Ivo of Chartres (1090–1115) and the first of the school's great masters, Bernard of Chartres, made their mark. From the latter's time, complex networks extending both inside and outside the school can be seen to emerge, and the best way of presenting them is to follow them.

b) A subdeacon in Chartres from the beginning of the century until his death (c. 1126, no doubt), Bernard was a master at the cathedral school in 1112 and chancellor in 1124. These are the only facts we possess about him. As for his thought, until the 1980s it was known only through a few doxographic elements, the most detailed of which came from John of Salisbury, himself a student of the pupils of Bernard. In particular, John relates that the latter was a grammaticus—a master of grammar and literature—of high quality but also “the most perfect Platonist of his times.” He cites especially Bernard's way of drawing a parallel between the grammatical fact of the paronymy and the cosmography of the Timaeus (which, nonetheless, John himself does not cite). Another comparison was that of the three states of the idea: first of all isolated in its purity, then tending toward the material, and finally imbued with its subject. Lastly, John drew attention to Bernard's comparison of the series of noun/verb/adjective: albedo (whiteness), albet (whitens), and album (white).

In 1984, P. E. Dutton announced his discovery of Bernard's glosses on the Timaeus. The glosses were on only the first half of the Timaeus since that was all that was known of it in the Middle Ages (it appeared in Calcidius's translation and with his commentary). Dutton published Bernard's glosses in 1991. This important text increases considerably our knowledge of Bernard's philosophy* and of certain aspects of his influence. Several allusions in this commentary reveal an interest in morality that did not emerge from the doxography. Above all, his commentary makes his Platonism clear. The data supplied by John of Salisbury gave a static image of it: there is the idea, the matter and the composite of the two, unstable and without real existence. As for the glosses, they very often emphasize the formae nativae, “the forms which come into the world*,” images of the ideas that enter into matter to produce the world of the senses. Of course, that concept was already indicated in the Timaeus (50c), but Calcidius did not stress it, while Bernard makes it a principal element of his cosmology. In addition, there can be discerned in these glosses an effort to attribute to matter a specific role in the constitution of the tangible, but the idea is suggested several times without any development. Bernard was not a theologian; he was a Platonist. It is true that Plato, along with Macrobius and Boethius*, pervades everything in the 12th century and even in theology, where the reading of the Timaeus is a parallel to the meditation on the first lines of Genesis. The practice of linking these philosophical and literary studies is in any case characteristic of the school of Chartres.

Two of Bernard's pupils were among the greatest minds of the century: William of Conches and Gilbert de la Porrée (Gilbert of Poitiers).

c) Not much is known about the life of William of Conches. He began to teach in 1120. Various clues lead to the supposition that it was in Chartres, but no formal proof of this exists. Around the year 1140, he left his place of teaching for the court of the duke of Normandy, Geoffroy le Bel Plantagenêt. William died soon afterward, in 1154. His work is composed of fairly numerous commentaries on different authors; of a Philosophia, which is a work of his youth; and of a Dragmaticon, which takes the form of an erudite dialogue with Geoffroy le Bel. According to John of Salisbury, William was "the most learned grammaticus after Bernard of Chartres," and he is known to have commented on the Institutiones Grammaticae of Priscian, on Virgil, on Juvenal, and on the Marriage of Philology and Mercury by Martianus Capella. He himself said he was a physicus, interested in nature. Specifically, he knew the Arab works of medicine translated in the 11th century by Constantine the African. A theologian, William analytically traced the route from the creature as far as God: the effective cause of the world is divine power, its formal cause is wisdom, and its final cause is goodness. We next discover the three persons of the Trinity* that Abelard* had presented in this way as early as 1120 (divine attributes; appropriation). In his glosses on The Consolation of Philosophy by Boethius* and on the Timaeus and in his Philosophia mundi, William, like Abelard, ventured to identify the Holy Spirit as the Soul of Plato's world; and again like Abelard, he retracted in the face of criticism. His annotated readings of Boethius and of the Timaeus, as well as his reading of Macrobius's Commentary on the Dream of Scipio, were grist for his Platonism. As with his interest in the poets, the interest William took in this philosophy is no doubt the result of Bernard's teaching.

But William's most original trait is certainly that he constructed the concept of nature*. He definitely did not know Aristotle's Physics, but the Timaeus taught him that forms, images of the "ideas that really exist in the archetypal world," "enter" the primordial matter of the world. In this way are formed the elements. According to Constantine the African (c. 1020–87), these are minimal particles, each made up of two compatible qualities of which each element got one from itself and the second from another (fire is hot in itself, dry because of motion; air is humid in itself, hot because of fire; and so on). As an image of its archetype, the world is "the ordered set of all creatures." Following Calcidius, William discerned in the world the work of the Creator, the work of nature, and the work of the artisan. He thus diverged from an Augustinian view, scriptural and ultratheological, according to which everything is a divine miracle*, the ripening of the grape just as much as the changing of the water into wine in Cana. For William, "the Creator's work consists of having created at the beginning all the elements, or of having done something against nature; nature's work consists in the fact that like engenders like: men engender men; donkeys engender donkeys"; or again, "from the trunk of a tree God can make a calf, but has he ever done so?" William of Saint-Thierry accused William of Conches of having "followed the insane philosophers for whom nothing exists except bodies and bodily things, without any other god in nature than the aid of the elements and natural regulation." But William of Conches stated that he "took nothing away from God" since nature was God's work. We therefore find in his ideas a form of physics and naturalism* that is compatible with a Christian theology and the novelty of which was rooted in Platonist soil.

d) Gilbert de la Porrée was born about 1075. After studies at the schools of Chartres and Laon, he taught in Paris and at Chartres, where he was chancellor from 1126 to 1137. In 1142 he became bishop of Poitiers, his native town. He died in 1154.

In the main, his work consists of commentaries on books of the Bible (Psalms, Epistles of Paul) and of Boethius's theological opuscles. In the latter, Gilbert put forward a philosophy that has to be reconstructed, for it is presented there in fragments according to the requirements of a text glossed phrase by phrase. Gilbert constructs in this way a deep and original ontology whose pivot is the Boethian distinction between "what is" (id quod est) and being* (esse). He rewords this conceptual pairing by using the respective terms "what is" and "that whereby it is" (id quo est). Or else he uses another pairing, that of "subsisting" and "subsistence." The individual being is what it is on account of a group of subsistences stacked up as are the universals on Porphyry's tree, moving from the species to the most general kind. These are its specific subsistence and its generic subsistences. The subsistences have no existence since they constitute the “being,” which, according to Boethius’s own words, “is not yet” (non dum est); and as for the quod est, it does exist “once it has received its form of being.” For Gilbert, then, only the individual exists (individuum), while the universal, which he calls the dividuum, results from a “similarity” among individuals of the same genus, of the same kind, which are united only by a “conformity” and which do not possess the sort of ontological identity postulated by the various realisms. Each individual (id quod est) is something (est aliquid) through one set of subsistences, of which each subsistence is an individual only insofar as it belongs to that composite of all of them together, which is identical to no other. In this way, “the platonitas, constituted by the whole of everything which, in deed or by nature, has belonged, or belongs, or will belong to Plato.” This agglomeration (concretio) “does not produce, but exhibits” (non fecit sed probat) individuality, which is therefore a unifying subsistence.

So in Gilbert we encounter a Platonist who welcomes nominalist ontology (nominalism*). In fact, Gilbert remains a Platonist: the “concrete” forms (in concretione in abstractae) that constitute the substance of a subsistant are for him “the image of ideas” (idearum icones). From Bernard’s teaching he retains the formae nativae (but not the phrase, which does not occur in Gilbert’s work).

A theology that can be called philosophical developed on the base of this ontology. Following Boethius, who himself followed Aristotle, Gilbert made theology the third and highest of the “speculative sciences,” the other two being physics and mathematics. According to Gilbert, of the nine “rules” Boethius formulated in his short treatise called hebdomades, only the seventh is really theological. It states that “for all that is simple, its being and what it does are one and the same” (omne simplex esse suum et id quod est unum habet). There is in God, therefore, an identity of the quod est and of the quo est: for this reason, his power, his wisdom, and so on do not differ from “the essence by which we claim he is” and which is “a single form.” “God is just for the very reason for which he is God”; or again, “God is essence, he is not something” (aliquid).

According to Gilbert, to say that “God is by reason of his essence” does not mean that the essence is other than him and that the same idea is true when one considers the Trinity. The persons of the Trinity are God “by reason of the divine essence,” and since this essence is single and one, each person is one for that reason, and all of them together are one. Bernard* of Clairvaux wanted to have Gilbert condemned at a council* held in Rheims (1148), accusing him of having taught that “the divine nature, or divinitas, is not God but the form by means of which he is God, just as humanity is not man but the form by which he is man” (deity*). Gilbert was not condemned. He had not taught what Bernard was claiming he had taught, and his stunning theological erudition had given him the means of shoring up his doctrine with solid guarantees. It is clear that if the esse and the id quod est do not equal one in God, it is not possible to say that the “divinity” is in himself the same way that humanity is in man.

Apart from this philosophical theology, we find in Gilbert, who was educated at Laon as well as at Chartres, a theology of the glossator, something that is seen in his scriptural commentaries. This theology is also a “science,” but one with a specific status: “The face of God is reflected in the mind (in mente) as in a mirror; when under the influence of the Lord the power of the mind which is called the intellect is brought to bear, that is called a science” (unpublished, cited by Nilsen). Gilbert distinguishes two sorts of truths: that of grammar, of dialectics, and so on and that of the Law, the prophets, of the Gospels. The second is “according to piety,” but not the first.

e) Thierry was the third great chancellor of Our Lady of Chartres, where he succeeded Gilbert in 1141. It was probably he who had spoken in defense of Abelard at the Council of Soissons (1121), and he attended the Council of 1148 in Rheims, when Bernard of Clairvaux failed to have Gilbert condemned. He is the one to whom Bernard Silvestris dedicated his Cosmographia and Hermann of Carinthia dedicated his translation of Ptolemy’s Planisphere. Thierry annotated Cicero’s On Rhetorical Invention and compiled and commented on the texts that make up the Hep-tameron—a manual of liberal arts, which proves in particular that he knew Aristotle’s treatises on logic, barely glimpsed by Abelard. He wrote a treatise on the six days of creation* (De sex dierum operibus) and composed a commentary on Boethius’s De Trinitate, apparently on several occasions, if we can believe the editor who attributed three commentaries to him. Even though such repetition seems unlikely, these three commentaries attributed to Thierry allow the inference of the existence of a tradition homogeneous enough that it can be called the tradition of Chartres.

The above bibliography reveals Thierry’s to be a mind that ranged over different areas of knowledge, and his polymathy inspired in him differing ways of treating fundamental theological themes. For instance, he proposed a mathematical formula of the Trinity. If one considers in the first place that God is a unity, one will conceive that the unity applying itself to itself engenders “the equivalent of the unity”: thus, the Father engenders the Son, “a perfect image of unity.” In the second place, the principle of cohesion according to which everything attaches to its own unity is illustrated in God in the form of a love between the unity that engenders and the unity engendered—this is the Holy* Spirit, the “connection” from one to the other, which is not unequal to them and is not different. Besides, “the divine form is every form” since all forms share in him and therefore share in the unity. They therefore derive from him just as numbers derive from the mathematical unity, in such a way that “the creation of the numbers is the creation of things”; and these things are affected by the initial multiplicity, which is duality.

All the above reveals to us a pythagorism that is inherent in Platonism. In the same way, Bernard’s and Gilbert’s formae nativae appear again when Thierry says that the forms of things are the images of the true forms and that certain phrases by classical philosophers, “understanding of the divinity, wisdom of the Creator,” prove that they glimpsed something of the subsistence of forms in the Son*. Although Thierry borrowed the double schema of the threefold relationship and of creation from Platonizing arithmetic, he also superimposed on grammar a theological interpretation of the meaning of names: “Names are joined eternally in the divine mind (in mente divina) even before men impose them on things; therefore men imposed them on the things to which they were joined in the divine mind—and it seems to us that men did that under the influence (instinctu) of the Holy Spirit. As for “physics,” an area alien to the liberal arts, it gave him the means to explain by means of the nature of the elements the order of the six days of creation.” Light, the first thing created, is the light of fire, naturally placed first among the elements. Its heat produces vapors that settle above the air and therefore makes the surface of the water fall. Thus, land appears, and once warmed, it produces plants. From the vapors, stars are formed, and their motion increases the warmth to the point of causing animals to appear, fish, birds, land animals, and man among them. The first six verses of Genesis can be recognized in this process, and springing from them, the “seminal reasons,” placed by God in the elements, develop into later productions.

f) Clarembaud of Arras, who died after 1170, had Hugh of Saint*-Victor and Thierry of Chartres as his teachers. He annotated Boethius’s Hebdomades and De Trinitate and was the author of a short unfinished treatise on creation that he had intended as a complement to Thierry’s. In any event, he remained close to the latter. He took up again the arithmetical speculation on the Trinity and the concept of God as forma es- sendi (a form coming into being), which in any case is a Boethian theme, and he interpreted the forms in material shape as images of divine ideas. He kept his distance from Gilbert, whose nominalist conception of the universal he particularly rejected: “Although renowned doctors have propagated the idea that singular men are men by dint of singular humanities, we have tried to show that there exists a single and same humanity through which singular men are men.”

g) Bernard Silvestris, who was born about 1100 and died about 1160, taught at Tours. He is linked to Chartres only because of his dedication of his Cosmographia to Thierry, but one could add that he is also linked to Chartres by his culture and cast of mind—the “Spirit of Chartres,” which is recognizable by intuition but cannot be localized. Bernard annotated Martianus Capella and the first six chants of the Aeneid, considered as the metaphorical account of “what a human mind suffers when lodged for some time in a human body.” He wrote a Mathematicus, a poem where astrology is challenged; an Experimentus, a treatise on divination of Arab origin; and, above all, a Cosmographia, which was written in alternating prose and verse and treats, in two parts (Megacosmos and Microcosmos), the genesis of the world and of man while dealing along the way with an abundance of encyclopedic material. Its style is beautiful in both verse and prose. As for the content, three aspects are noteworthy. First, his Platonism: as in the Timaeus, matter is in a state of disorder but remains a source of inexhaustible fecundity. It receives “forms,” the first of which are those of the elements, before one sees the whole of the cosmos* unfold. But in Bernard Silvestris’s work, the myth expands far beyond Plato’s into a real metaphysical epic. At the beginning, matter, called Silva, implores Noys, who is divine thought, to rescue her from the “confusion” of her situation. Apart from Noys, a host of characters (Natura, Endelichia, Physis) will intervene to save the world from chaos. They are all female, and the character that dominates it all receives names from all three genders: Deus, Usia Prima, and Tugaton. Second, the feminism: in addition to the primacy of feminine personifications of cosmological events, a superimposing of images identifies Eden, the first garden where humanity came into being, with a pregnant belly. The masculine sex is not mentioned until the end of Book II. Finally, the paganism*: a few allusions to Christian beliefs, very rare and without links among them, do not counterbalance a fable that is entirely philosophical and, more specifically, Greek.

h) Can John of Salisbury (born between 1115 and 1120) be considered as belonging to the school of Chartres? The fact that he was bishop in this town from 1176 to his death in 1180 has nothing to do with it. However, he provides information on several members of the school of Chartres and its teachings. His own masters were William of Conches, Thierry of Chartres, and Gilbert de la Porrée. Moreover, he had also heard Abelard, the logician Alberic of Paris, and the grammarian Pierre Hélie. From 1148 he spent his life involved in the affairs of two archbishops (Thomas à Becket was one of them) and of one pope. He was the author of the Policratus, a political work (“on the frivolity of courtiers”), of the Pontifical History, but also of the Metalogicon, where, in elegant Latin and amid many scholarly digressions, he dealt with the content of Aristotle’s Organum, about knowledge and reason*. It is the work of a somewhat disillusioned great man of letters who recommends a tempered skepticism in matters “doubtful for the wise.” If one holds, perhaps arbitrarily, the characteristics of the school of Chartres to be a taste for “grammar,” Platonism, and the invention of nature, John can lay claim only to the first of these characteristics. From the philosophy he learned at the school of Chartres, he retained only a few facts, quite precise ones, but also fragmentary and even anecdotal.

- Bernard de Chartres, The “Glosae super Platonem” of Bernard of Chartres, Ed. P. Dutton, Toronto, 1991.
- Bernard Silvestre, Bernardus Silvestris. Cosmographia, Ed. P. Dronke, Leiden, 1978.

- Bernard Silvestre, The Cosmographia of Bernardus Silvestris, trans. W. Wetherbee, New York, 1973.
- Clarembaud d’Arras, N.M. Haring, Life and Works of Clarembald of Arras, Toronto, 1965.
- Gilbert de la Porrée, N.M. Haring, The Commentaries on Boethius by Gilbert of Poitiers, Toronto, 1966.
- William of Conches, Philosophia, PL 90, 1127–78; 172, 39–102.
- William of Conches, Dragmaticon; it. trans. E. Maccagnolo, Il divino e il megacosmo, Milan, 1980, 251–453.
- William of Conches, Glosae super Platonem, Ed. E. Jeuneau, Paris, 1965.
- John of Salisbury, PL 199; Policraticus, Ed. C.C.J. Webb, Oxford, 1909.
- John of Salisbury, Metalogicon, Ed. J.B. Hall, Turnhout, 1991.
- Thierry de Chartres, N.M. Haring, Commentaries on Boethius by Thierry of Chartres and His School, Toronto, 1971.
- ♦ Notes on Bernard de Chartres, Bernard Silvestre, School of Chartres, Clarembaud d’Arras, Gilbert de la Porrée, William of Conches, John of Salisbury, Thierry de Chartres, with bibl. (Ed., studies) in Dictionnaire des lettres françaises: Le Moyen Age, Paris, 1992. Also: L.O. Nielsen (1982), Theology and Philosophy in the Twelfth Century, Leiden (on Gilbert).
- P. Dronke (1984), “Bernardo Silvestre,” Enciclopedia Virgiliana, I, 497–500.
- J. Jolivet (1995), “Les principes féminins selon la ‘Cosmographie’ de Bernard Silvestre,” in Philosophie médiévale arabe et latine, Paris, 269–78.

JEAN JOLIVET

See also Humanism; Christian; Intellectualism; Natural Theology; Nature; Philosophy; Platonism, Christian; Theological Schools

Chenu, Marie-Dominique. See Thomism

Childhood, Spiritual

The expression “spiritual childhood” is today inseparable from the “way of childhood” of Theresa of Lisieux (also known as Sister Teresa of the Child Jesus, 1873–97), who gave shape to a basic attitude that was first biblical and then Christian.

a) Biblical Roots. There is no child without a father. The increasingly vivid experience of the fatherhood of God, for Israel first (“Thus says the Lord, Israel is my firstborn son”; Ex 4:22) and then for everyone on the basis of the choice of Israel (“And of Zion it shall be said, ‘This one and that one were born in her’; Ps 87:5), runs through the entire Judeo-Christian revelation*. As the ultimate expression of this, Jesus* presents himself as the only Son, “the firstborn among many brothers” (Rom 8:29), making the father–son relation the one from which all others proceed (Eph 3:15).

In this perspective the theme of spiritual childhood crystallizes around the concern of YHWH for his people*, whom he bears “as a man carries his son” (Dt 1:31), so that the faithful are invited to discover themselves in a total dependence on God (“Is not he your father, who created you, who made you and established you?”; Dt 32:6), outside of which their fragility is absolute (“Ah, Lord God! Behold, I do not know how to speak, for I am only a youth”; Jer 1:6). The proper attitude is thus one of total confidence (God replies to Jeremiah, “Do not say, ‘I am only a youth’”; Jer 1:7), bringing about a tranquillity and passivity that define the normal interior state of the human person before God: “I do not occupy myself with things too great and too marvelous for me. But I have calmed and quieted my soul, like a weaned child with its mother” (Ps 131:2). We should note that in all this, although there is tenderness (“Can a woman forget her nursing child...?”; Is 49:15), there is above all humility, and biblical civilization hardly sees in childhood the ideal state of positive innocence that characterizes the modern view of it.

In the New Testament and the tradition*, it is under the sign of this humility that childhood expresses the spiritual attitude appropriate to the new birth (Jn 6:1–6): “Whoever does not receive the kingdom of God like a child shall not enter it” (Lk 18:17). In the background there will always be the example of Jesus himself, who, “born of woman” (Gal 4:4), has joined us in our essential fragility, while teaching us to live it as sons of Mary* and Joseph.

b) Before Theresa. Over the centuries, the fact that Christian life was understood as the birth and growth of divine life meant that spiritual childhood became a central theological theme. It was developed by the mystics* in the direction of the necessary passivity of the human person in the hands of God. Countless writers developed one or another of the theme’s aspects before it was treated as a specific inner way by French writers of the 17th century. Bérulle* and the Oratorians, as well as the reformed Carmelites* (particularly that of Beaune), associated this way of childhood with the contemplation* of the infant Jesus, that is, with “adherence” to the God hidden beneath the infirmities of his incarnation, making us divine to the extent of our own spiritual childhood.

c) Theresa de Lisieux. It was with Theresa, proclaimed a doctor* of the Church in 1997, that spiritual childhood became a distinct spiritual school. Following in the tradition of Bérulle, on the decisive Christmas night of 1886 she perceived her apostolic vocation as an appropriation of the childhood of Jesus: “On this night when he made himself weak and suffering for my love*, he made me strong and courageous, he clothed me with his armor” (Manuscript A, 44 v). There had just taken place in her the Copernican revolution that characterizes spiritual childhood: totally powerless before the ordeals of life, both great and small, she made of this very powerlessness the wellspring of a total abandonment in God, observing the promise of Saint Paul, “I will not boast, except of my weaknesses” (2 Cor 12:5), and determining never to attempt to overcome them by herself. From that time forward her own weaknesses became an additional capacity for allowing Jesus to manifest his strength in her weakness, right up to the death* she experienced in the most extreme pain as well as the most extreme jubilation. Two months earlier she had explained to her sister what she understood by “remaining a little child before the good Lord.”

It is recognizing one’s nothingness*, awaiting everything from the good Lord, as a “little child expects everything from his father; it is not worrying about anything, not making a fortune. Even the poor give a child what he needs, but as soon as he grows up his father no longer wants to feed him and tells him: ‘Work now, you can take care of yourself.’ It’s so I wouldn’t hear that that I did not want to grow up, feeling unable to earn my livelihood, the eternal life* of Heaven” (Conversation, 6 August 1897).

Her “little way” overwhelmed later spirituality, making of Theresa the most popular mystic of modern times and making spiritual childhood the almost obligatory form of all inner life. It remained for philosophy* belatedly to bring forth a way of thinking about childhood, for example, in F. Ulrich, Der Mensch als Anfang, and G. Siewerth, Metaphysik der Kindheit.

- H. Bremond (1921), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, III, 2, Paris, 202–49.
- A. Combes (1948), Introduction à la spiritualité de sainte Thérèse de l’Enfant-Jésus, Paris.
- H. Paissac (1951), “Enfant de Dieu,” VS 85, 256–72.
- M.F. Berrouard et al. (1959), “Enfance spirituelle,” DSp 4, 682–714.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1970), Schwester im Geist, Ensiedeln, 14–349 (Thérèse de Lisieux: Histoire d’une mission, 1973).
- P. Descouvemont (1990), “Thérèse de l’Enfant-Jésus,” DSp 15, 576–611.
- Thérèse de l’Enfant-Jésus (1992), OC, Paris.

MAX HUOT DE LONGCHAMP

See also Life, Spiritual; Mysticism

Choice

1. Old Testament

God's initiative toward Israel* is described as "choice," especially in Deuteronomy, where its gratuitous nature is strongly emphasized. Whereas with human beings choice is always motivated, God's choice of Israel is a case of pure predilection. It is incomprehensible, unmotivated, filling one with amazement and gratitude (Dt 4:37; 7:6ff; 9:4ff, 10:14f; see Ps 33:12; 135:4). The commitment to service and fidelity that this gratitude entails is only a response to this predilection (Dt 14:1).

a) Terminology. The term "to choose" (bâchar 164 times, Greek eklegesthai) belongs to everyday life. One chooses people or things appropriate for a particular purpose: men for a military operation (Ex 17:9), stones for a sling (1 Sm 17:40), and so on. Choice is also expressed by other terms—to take (lâquach: Jos 24:3), to love ('âhab: Hos 11:1; Mal 1–3), and to know (yâda?: Am 3:2; Gn 18:19)—or it is implied by expressions such as "people* of the Lord" (Ex 19:5f.; Dt 26:18f.; Ps 28:9).

b) Beneficiaries of Choice. The category of choice is employed in interpreting the past: Abraham (Neh 9:7), Jacob (Ps 105:6), Moses (Ps 106:23; Sir 45:4), and the Exodus (Ez 20:5). It is applied to the heart of a people, to kings (Dt 17:15; 2 Sm 6:21, 16:18), to priests (Nm 16:4–7; Dt 18:5, 21:5; 1 Sm 2:28), and especially to Jerusalem* (Dt 12:18; Jos 9:27; Ps 78:68, 132:13f.) and the dynasty of David (2 Sm 7:14ff.; 1 Kgs 8:16; Ps 78, 89; see messianism*).

c) The Dramatic Aspect of Choice. The prophets* do not like to speak of "choice" with regard to themselves (see "take": Am 7:15; "send": Is 6:8; "establish": Jer 1:10). They fear that this idea may be wrongly understood as implying an automatic guarantee of salvation. The more ancient of the prophets do not even speak of a unique choice of Israel or Zion; rather, they seem to make it purely and simply relative (Am 9:7: "Are you not like the Cushites to me, O people of Israel? [...] Did I not bring up Israel from the land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir?") or to see in it a mark of greater responsibility (Am 3:2: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities").

Thus, the theological aporias that lie in the idea of choice come to the surface. The opposite concept, "reject" (mâ'as), emerges. One finds "to not choose," "to pass over," as with the brothers of David (1 Sm 16:6–10), but also the stronger sense of "reject," "annul the choice already made," as in the case of Saul (1 Sm 16:1) or of the ancient cult sites (Ps 78:67). Faced with the infidelity of a people, one is impelled to ask God, "Have you utterly rejected Judah? Does your soul loathe Zion?" (Jer 14:19; see 6:30, 7:29; Ps 89:39–46). The historical book of Deuteronomy does not offer a clear answer. It notes the infidelity of the two kingdoms and their "rejection" (2 Kgs 17:20, 23:27, 24:20). If hope does survive, it is not explicitly expressed (2 Kgs 25:27–30).

Conversely, during the exile and after, according to the prophets, the possibility of rejection is decisively excluded, in such a way that a new choice of Israel is spoken of (Zec 1:17, 2:16; Is 14:1) or in such a way that the irrevocability of the first choice is emphasized (Jer 31:37, 33:23–26; Is 41:8f., 44:1–5; Ez 20:32ff.), on grounds of its gratuitous nature (Is 43:10, 20f.; 45:4). The perfect fusion between divine choice and man's response is outlined in the mysterious figure of the "Servant," the "Chosen One" (Is 42:1, 49:7).

Once the idea is established that the people of God have been irrevocably chosen, there remains the problem of individuals: who, after all, really belongs to the chosen people? The expression "chosen ones," first used to name an entire people (Ps 105:43, 106:5; Is 65:9, 15, 22; 1 Chr 16:13), comes to have an eschatological connotation. In contradistinction to the "impious," it denotes "the just," "the humble," or "the saints" (Is 65:9, 15; Wis 3:9; 1 Hen 1:1, 5:7s, 25:4f., 38:2, ff., 39:6f.) and no longer simply coincides with the empirical Israel. In Qumran, the expression "the chosen ones" becomes a term of self-designation for the community, but always within an eschatological perspective (1QSVIII, 3; 1QXXI, 16; 1QHII, 13; 4QflorI, 19).

2. The New Testament

While still referring to the choice of Israel (Acts 13:17), the irreversibility of which Paul reaffirms (Rom 11:28f.), in the New Testament the term is applied to Jesus*, the Church*, and the individual believer.

a) Jesus, God's Chosen. Used in very few but nevertheless important texts to express the intimate relationship between Jesus and the Father*, as part of the Servant figure (Jn 1:34; Lk 9:35, 23:35), the theme never developed. The title "Son" proved to be more suitable to express Jesus' uniqueness.

b) The Church, the Chosen. Divine choice is at the root of the calling not only of the Twelve (Lk 6:13; Acts 1:2; Jn 15:16, 19; see Mk 3:13f.) and of Paul (Acts 9:15) but of all Christians (1 Thes 1:4; Acts 15:7). It connotes an entirely altruistic nature and a preference for the poor (1 Cor 1:26ff.; Jas 2:5). The term "kingdom of priests, holy nation, chosen people" (Ex 19:6; Is 43:20) is given to the Church in 1 Peter 2:9. Local communities can be symbolically designated by the name "chosen" (2 Jn 1, 13; 1 Pt 5:13). Christians are called "chosen" (Col 3:12; 1 Pt 1:1; 2 Tm 2:10), but only in Romans 16:13 is the term used in the singular: "Greet Rufus, chosen in the Lord." Is this a softened meaning of "eminent Christian"?

The Pauline writings in particular, by using apocalyptic* categories, understand election as being part of God's eternal intention. It is interpreted christologically: through pure grace*, the Father loved us and chose us in Christ, through Christ and in consideration of Christ, from time* immemorial (Rom 8:28ff.; Eph 1:3–14).

c) The Choice of the Christian. Nevertheless, the Christian is subject to the final Judgment Day. The Divine choice offers grounds for trust: "Who shall bring any charge against God's elect?" (Rom 8:33), but believers must commit themselves "with fear and trembling" (Phil 2:12): "Therefore, brethren, be all the more diligent to make your calling and election sure" (2 Pt 1:10). In John, the tragic proximity of Judas the betrayer casts a shadow of uncertainty: was he chosen as well (Jn 6:65, 10:29, 17:2), or was he not (Jn 6:70, 13:18)? In some texts, the accent falls on caution: "For many are called, but few are chosen" (Mt 22:14), and the term retains all its eschatological value (Mk 13:20, 22, 27; parallel passage in Mt 24:22, 24, 31; Lk 18:7; Rev 17:14).

- G. Schrenk, G. Quel (1942), "eklegomai/eklogè/eklektos," ThWNT 4, 147–97.
- H. H. Rowley (1950), The Biblical Doctrine of Election, London.
- P. J. Daumoser (1954), Berufung und Erwählung bei den Synoptikern, Eichstatt.
- K. Koch (1955), "Zur Geschichte der Erwählungsvorstellung in Israel," ZAW 67, 205–26.
- P. Altmann (1964), Erwählungstheologie und Universalismus im AT, BZAW 92.
- H. Wildberger (1970), "Die Neuinterpretation des Erwählungsglaubens Israels in der Krise der Exilzeit," in H. J. Stoebe (Ed.), Wort-Gebot-Glaube: Beiträge zur Theologie des AT. W. Eichrodt zum 80. Geburtstag, AThANT 59, 307–24.
- J. Bergmann, H. Ringgren, and H. Seebaß (1973), "bär," ThWAT 1, 592–608.
- J. Coppens (1981), "L'Élu et les élus dans les Écritures saintes et les Écrits de Qoumrân," EthL 57, 120–24.
- P. Beauchamp (1995), "Élection et Universel dans la Bible," Études 382, 373–84.

VITTORIO FUSCO

See also Covenant; Israel; Messianism/Messiah; People of God; Predestination; Universalism

Christ/Christology

The term Christ (Hebrew māshîach, messiah*; Greek christos, anointed) recapitulates the confession of Christian faith. The whole body of titles attributed to Jesus of Nazareth are summed up in this word, which has semantically subsumed all other titles that indicate the identity of Jesus (Lord, Son of God*, and so on) and has imposed itself in the designation of the one called Jesus Christ. This is so true that in Antioch, the "disciples of the way" of Christ were called Christians (Acts 11:26). Later, Ignatius of Antioch invented the neologism "Christianity (Ad Magn. 10. 3, SC 10 bis, 105).

For this obvious reason, many other articles in this encyclopedia take up in one way or another the subject of Jesus in history* and in Christian dogma*: the Son of the Father* in the Trinity, the Son* of man, the Servant, the Lamb* of God. They deal with his "mysteries" (Incarnation*, Passion*, Resurrection*) as well as with the development of Christology (particularly on the basis of the first seven ecumenical councils*). On the other hand, the primary motivation for Christology lies in the doctrine of salvation. This article, devoted principally to the human-divine identity of Christ, sets out a synthesis and refers throughout to relevant specialized articles.

1. Genesis and Development of the Christology of the New Testament Between Jesus and Christ lies the space of the confession of faith, “Jesus is the Christ,” in which the verb was soon replaced by the juxtaposition of subject and attribute. For the disciples of Jesus, this confession is the fruit of the Easter mystery*: “This Jesus God raised up, and of that we all are witnesses . . . God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified” (Acts 2:32–36). The proclamation of the Resurrection has been called the “cradle of Christology” (Schnackenburg). But for the disciples it came at the conclusion of a period of companionship with Jesus and inaugurated a broad movement of reflection that made his identity explicit.

a) From Jesus to the Confession of Christ. The Gospels retrace for us the development of the faith* of the disciples through the pre-Easter ministry* of Jesus. Although the Gospels clearly have a theological purpose, they nevertheless allow us to grasp some of the concrete experiences of history (the historical Jesus*) that do not depend on that crystallization of faith provoked by the Resurrection. Jesus met men whom he called to follow him and to live with him. Everything took place within the framework of a life lived in common. The human identity of Jesus is an evident fact that leaves no room for doubt. He is a being of flesh and blood, who eats and drinks, who is capable of joy and sadness, of tenderness and anger. It was on the basis of the speech and behavior of this man that the disciples were invited to recognize that there was more in him than in Jonah or Solomon (Lk 11:31), that he was more than just a man. Indeed, this man speaks with a unique authority and not like the scribes (Mk 1:21–27). He proclaims that the kingdom* of God is at hand, as his own presence indicates. He speaks in parables* that are figurative expressions of the event inaugurated by his presence.

His behavior is in total harmony with his speech: he says what he does, and he does what he says. He proclaims the mercy* of God for sinners, and he shares their table. He gives concrete expression to the salvation he brings by performing miracles* that are an anticipatory sign of the salvation of the body. His speech is inhabited by an unprecedented claim: to forgive sins* (Mt 9:1–9; Lk 7:36–50), to fulfill and even to correct the law* of Moses through his own teaching (Mt 5:21–48, 19:8). He calls on people to leave everything to follow him (Mt 10:37). He lays claim to a unique relationship to God (Mt 11:27; Lk 10:22; Mk 13:32), whom he calls his own Father (Abba; Mk 14:36) with words that no Jew before him had dared use. In the pivotal scene at Caesarea, Jesus questions his disciples about his own identity: “But who do you say that I am?” (Mt 16:15). Peter*, on behalf of the other disciples, answers by expressing his dawning faith: “You are the Christ.” Matthew completes this first confession by adding “the Son of the living God,” so that the primitive Church*’s confession of paschal faith* makes explicit Peter’s act of messianic faith. Jesus authenticates this word of faith as a word of revelation* (Guillet 1971).

In the exercise of his ministry, Jesus attracts opposition and threats. He goes up to Jerusalem*, where he knows that death awaits him, just as it awaited many prophets*. The danger and the final ordeal do not cause him to deviate from his mission*. His life has been an existence for his Father and for His brothers, a “pro-existence” (Schürmann). The same will be true of his death, the meaning of which he himself provides by instituting the meal of the Eucharist*. His death on the cross (Passion*) is the preeminent scandal, one that disperses the group of Twelve. Apparently, everything is against Jesus: the Jews and the Romans (the pagans) have joined together to defeat him. His friends desert him, and even God does not answer his cry of abandonment (Mt 27:46). What, then, is left of his claim to be the “Son”? However, the centurion overseeing the execution confesses, “Truly this man was the Son of God!” (Mk 15:39) or “Certainly this man was innocent” (Lk 23:47). In his manner of dying, Jesus gave a sign of his true identity. But it will take the Resurrection and all the reflection to which it gives rise for the scandal to be overcome and changed into an emblem of glory.

It is generally agreed today that it is inappropriate to look to the lifetime of Jesus for the use of titles explicitly expressing his identity. The pre-Easter ministry of Jesus was a period of implicit Christology. His identity was already revealed at that time through his speech and behavior. The disciples groped for ways of expressing that identity by using various terms from the Old Testament that they adjusted to Jesus’ in order to articulate the excess of meaning that they saw in him. At first, they probably understood him as the “eschatological prophet” (Schillebeekx), that is, not only the last of the prophets but a prophet unlike the others, the “definitive” or “absolute” prophet. The term Messiah (Christ) and the title “Son of David” were used for him, as evidenced by the inscription on the cross. But the Gospels never put this term in the Jesus’ own mouth. He maintained a certain reticence on the subject because of the political and temporal ambiguity to which it might give rise. Jesus truly accepted it only in the scene of his trial before Caiaphas (Mk 14:61), when the ambiguity is definitively resolved. On the other hand, “by always placing the expression Son of Man on the lips of Jesus to identify himself, the Aramaic-speaking Christian community surprisingly recalls the I of Jesus, and with such frequency that it can only be explained by the shock produced on Jesus’ own disciples” (Ch. Perrot). As for the title “Son of God,” to the extent that its use goes back to a pre-Easter practice, it is closely united with the prophecies of the Old Testament because it had been applied to the people of Israel* (Ex 4:23ff.). Paradoxically, in the light of future developments, in these early times it is employed less than the expression Son of Man. The claim to call oneself “the Son” is more important than the specific title (Kasper).

b) From the Christology of the Resurrection to the Christology of the Incarnation. The point of departure for the explicit Christology of the New Testament is the Resurrection of Jesus, which sets the divine “seal” on his pre-Easter journey and confirms all his claims. From now on, the scandal of the cross will assume meaning. The disciples can proudly proclaim the Resurrection of the Crucified One: “Christ died for our sins in accordance with the Scriptures...he was buried, ... he was raised on the third day in accordance with the Scriptures” (1 Cor 15:3f.). This event is immediately given a threefold interpretation: 1) Jesus has been exalted (Acts 2:33) and now sits in his humanity at the right hand of God in his glory*, which means on an equal footing with him. 2) The Resurrection confirms Jesus’ claim to divine filiation (Ps 2:7, quoted in this context by Acts 13:33 and Heb 1:5). God has definitively revealed himself in Jesus (Pannenberg). The term Son of God thenceforth takes on the strong meaning that Christian dogma will always recognize. 3) Finally, the Resurrection inaugurates the time of eschatology*: “If Jesus is risen, it is already the end of the world” (Pannenberg). The soteriological dimension of the Resurrection is also emphasized: Jesus died “for all” (2 Cor 5:15), and raised “for our justification” (Rom 4:25), and risen, he has bestowed the Holy* Spirit. The Ascension scene recapitulates in its own symbolism these ever more lofty assertions: of Jesus of Nazareth it is said that he has been “declared to be the Son of God in power according to the Spirit of holiness by his resurrection” (Rom 1:4). The subject is Jesus considered in his humanity; the divine titles are presented as complementary attributes. The “lofty titles” conferred on Jesus are, in effect, interpretations of his identity. The Christian community confesses as the Son of God one who called himself “the Son” in an absolute sense and who behaved in a filial manner to the point of death. This is what contemporary theology* has vulgarized with the expression “Christology from below,” or primitive Christology, an already complete Christology that could not be repressed by subsequent developments. It is not a Christology of “adoption” of the man Jesus as Son of God because the one who was thus declared with power was already “his Son” (Rom 1:3).

On this foundation, which contains within itself all future developments of Christology, the reflection of the faith of the disciples, as it is set forth in the New Testament, was to effectuate a movement going from the end of Jesus’ journey to its beginning. “Son” is itself a term of origin. Who was this risen one, exalted on the right hand of the Father, in the eyes of God “before” his manifestation in our history? What meaning ought to be given to the title “Son” that he so strongly claimed for himself? This led to two kinds of reflection.

- 1) On one hand, there was a rereading of the ministry and death of Jesus in the definitive light of his resurrection. In compositional terms, the writers of the Gospels intended to testify that the Jesus with whom they had lived was already the one whom he claimed to be and that his resurrection fully revealed the Son of God: “The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God” (Mk 1:1). Many Gospel scenes are therefore constructed as proclamations (kerygma) that invite an explicit confession of faith. The scenes of revelation, such as the Baptism* of Jesus and the Transfiguration, play an important role in this respect. The manifestations of the power of Jesus are also emphasized, creating a tension with his condition as “Servant.” In the same perspective, the accounts of Jesus’ childhood in Matthew and Luke, which are really prefaces added to narratives that began with his public life, give a sign of his divine origin by converging in the same affirmation of his virginal conception (Mary*).
- 2) On the other hand, the vision of faith seeks to fathom the origin of Jesus before his manifestation in the world. Pauline* Christology, for its part, describes this vast movement, which begins with the experience of the Risen One on the road to Damascus, then focuses on the mystery of the cross and opens out into a Christology of mission: “God sent forth his Son” (Gal 4:4); “sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh” (Rom 8:3). Then, in a series of hymns, some of which may have had a liturgical origin, Paul inscribes the event of Jesus in a great parabola that comes from God and returns to God. The hymn of Philippians 2:6–11 thus describes the journey of abasement (kenosis) and glorification of the one who at the outset “was in the form of God.” The preexistence of Christ is thereby assumed. The hymn of Colossians 1:15–20 broadens the theme by showing that the primacy of Christ in the order of redemption and reconciliation corresponds to and has its basis in his primacy in the order of creation: “all things were created through him and for him” (Col 1:16). Paul applies to the person of Christ what the Old Testament said of the Wisdom* that was present alongside God at the creation of the world and that is mysteriously personified in certain biblical passages (Prv 8:22–31; Jb 28; Bar 3:9–4:6; Eccl 24; Wis 7). But the identification is not complete because the divine reality present in Christ goes beyond that of Wisdom. The hymn of Ephesians 1:3–14 goes back to describe the purpose that God foresaw in Christ from before the creation of the world. Christ, in whom the entire universe is to be “united” (Eph 1:10), is already the heart of the Father’s plan in the original mystery of the divine life. The same epistle contains a passage that shows the inversion between the movement of discovery and that of exposition, an inversion that accomplishes the passage from a Christology from below to a Christology from above: “In saying ‘He ascended,’ what does it mean but that he had also descended into the lower parts of the earth? He who descended is the one who also ascended far above all the heavens, that he might fill all things” (Eph 4:9f.).

The Ascension, which was first in the order of manifestation, turns out in fact to be second in the complete order of realization. It was with the Ascension that the quest of faith began to ask itself about the descent; the normal exposition of the mystery begins with the origin and goes on to the end. The Epistle to the Hebrews—taking account of its particular status in the Pauline corpus—presents the Son, in whom God has spoken to us in these last days and “whom he appointed the heir of all things” and also as the one “through whom also he created the world,” “the radiance of the glory of God, and the exact imprint of his nature” (1:2–3). Here too, “his glorification reveals the profound being of Jesus; it leads to a recognition of His preexisting filiation” (A. Vanhoye).

The Gospel of John is shot through with the question of the identity of Jesus: “Who are you?” (4:10, 5:12f., 8:25, 12:34), “Whence have you come?” (3:8, 7:27f.), and “Where are you going?” (8:14–22, 13:26, 14:5, 16:5). Jesus himself knows “where I came from and where I am going” (Jn 8:14). But it is the movement of his existence that accomplishes this revelation, for “no one has ascended into heaven except he who descended from heaven, the Son of Man” (Jn 3:13); and again, “Then what if you were to see the Son of Man ascending to where he was before?” (6:62); “And now, Father, glorify me in your own presence with the glory that I had with you before the world existed” (17:5). “The return reveals the origin, the ascent the descent, the glory the Son of man and the foundation of the Kingdom*, the return home the original home” (Van den Bussche). The prologue of John is the last word of the Christology of the New Testament. It brings us back up in God to that absolute beginning of the one who was both with God and God himself, the divine and creating Word* that was made flesh. This definitive formulation sums up the movement of a Christology descending from above.

This movement has been discussed as a “projection” of the end onto the beginning (Thüsing). This projection is not psychological but rather “logical” and “intrinsically necessary” (Jüngel) and even “ontological” by virtue of the biblical principle, “What is true of the end must also already determine the beginning” (Pannenberg, Thüsing). What concerns God is from always to always. Rigorously speaking, one does “not become” God: Jesus was manifested according to what he had always been. The idea of preexistence was drawn from the eschatological assertions themselves: the Omega and the Alpha coincide (Hengel, Perrot). This idea had many attestations in the Bible (Is 41:4, 44:6; Rev 1:8, 21:6, 22:13); we meet it again in the Epistle of Barnabas (6, 13; SC 172, p. 125).

2. Development of Christological Dogma

The New Testament’s identification of Jesus as Christ, Lord, and Son of God was strongly affirmed in the earliest confessions of faith during the period of the Apostolic Fathers. Differing formulas coexisted—first those of the authors and then those of the churches. The ecclesiastical symbols resulted from the encounter between two types of confession of faith: the Trinitarian confession and the strictly christological confession that reflected the kerygmatic discourse of Acts (see Acts 2). On one hand, the second Trinitarian article came to include the christological titular of Jesus; on the other, the christological sequence became attached to the second article.

In these early days, from Clement of Rome to Justin, the Christology of the Church Fathers recapitulated the development of New Testament Christology. Very quickly, however, the “descendant” point of view came to dominate the “ascendant” view, though both remained present. In one sense, the last word of New Testament Christology—“The Word is made flesh”—became the first word of patristic Christology, linked with another text, Philippians 2:6–11.

a) Pre-Nicaean Christology. The confession of Christ was equally provocative for the Jewish world and the pagan world of the time in three ways: it proclaimed the divinity of a man, which seemed to call monotheism* into question; it claimed that salvation came through a man who had suffered the most degrading corporal punishment; and it spoke of immaculate conception, which reminded both cultures of mythological stories of a dubiously sexual kind. Thus, it was soon attacked by both Jews and pagans (Justin). The first conflict in Christian circles questioned, for various reasons, the humanity of Christ; it arose in particular from the Gnostics* and their Docetism*. The glorification of the resurrected Christ in the divine realm made it seem unbelievable that the Word of God had been present in a human form afflicted with so many humiliations. Docetism raised again the idea that the earthly manifestation of Jesus was simply an apparition, his flesh was illusory, he had received nothing from the Virgin, and it was not he who suffered on the cross.

In the face of this serious conflict concerning the humanity of Jesus, the ecclesiastical reaction was quite clear. On the first stirrings of docetism, Ignatius of Antioch stressed the confession of “Jesus Christ of the lineage of David, [son] of Mary, who was truly born, who ate and drank, who was truly persecuted by Pontius Pilate, who was truly crucified and died [...] who was also truly resurrected from among the dead” (Aux Trall. 9, 1; SC 10 bis, p. 119). The battle against gnosticism and docetism would continue to be waged tirelessly by Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen*. Against these tendencies, Irenaeus was the first to articulate, with great realism, a Christology in which a true God becomes a true man (Adv. Haer. III, 21, 4), “recapitulating” in this act the entire history of salvation, from beginning to end, in order to bring it to fruition (III, 23, 1, etc.). He emphasized in particular the symbolic parallel between the creation of Adam*, drawn from virgin earth by the hands of God, and the generation of Jesus, formed in the womb of a virgin by an act of God (III, 21, 10). Tertullian, in his turn, would be a vehement defender of the reality of the flesh of Christ, flesh that is “the joint of salvation” (Res. 6; PL 2, 802). This argument for the generation of Jesus was intended to conserve the human truth of his earthly journey, in particular the reality of his death and resurrection. However, there was an inverse temptation to reduce the mystery of Christ by making Jesus an “adopted” man, a divinity dwelling temporarily among humans. It was for this view, known as adoptionism*, that Paul of Samosata was condemned.

b) The Christology of the Great Councils. In the early fourth century, Christology entered a new phase, which we may term the conciliary phase, between the first and second Nicaean* councils. (Each of the seven councils* is discussed in its own entry in this work, so it will suffice here to summarize the dialectical movement that continued through them.) Arius questioned the divinity of the person of Jesus of Nazareth on the ground that a God who is one could not undergo change and suffering. The Council of Nicaea affirmed the divine, eternal, and consubstantial* filiation of the man Jesus. The movement in response, matching that of the question, goes from the human to the divine, in an ascendant perspective. At Nicaea the confession of the divinity of Christ was the object of a distinction that on the one hand translated it into the terms of Greek thought and on the other reinforced its radicality. This definition, connected to the innovations drawn from the conceptual vocabulary of Greek philosophy into the text of the Creed, provoked numerous troubles in the East that were not really resolved until the First Council of Constantinople*. But in the interim, Apollinarius, a Nicaean convinced of the divinity of Christ, rejected the idea that he had a real human soul. His thinking was rooted in the schema Word-flesh (Logos-sarx), which arose in Alexandria, but in a sense that excluded the soul: the Word occupied in Christ the place of the human spirit, will, and liberty*. The motivation was both religious (the divine Word cannot co-exist with a truly responsible and free human spirit) and speculative (two “complete” realities, divinity and humanity, cannot form a real unity). But Christ then became a kind of theological monster, for human flesh separated from a human spirit does not constitute a human being. The scriptural and rational arguments of the Fathers* of the Church stated the objection that the unique mediator must be as completely a man as he is perfectly God. Up to that point, the temptation to reduce the mystery of Christ had elicited significant clarifications concerning the completeness of his humanity (flesh, soul, and spirit) and the full truth of his divinity. With these points thenceforth beyond challenge, debate shifted to the manner of the union between the Word of God and his humanity.

In the fifth century, as part of a backlash following the definition of Nicaea, the problem took its point of departure not from the man Jesus but from the Word of God. The question became one about the modality of the incarnation or humanization of the eternal Son insofar as it conditioned the constant ontological constitution of his simultaneously divine and human being. In the way he understood the “conjunction” between the divinity and the humanity of Christ, Nestorius established a distance between the two, to the point of rejecting the traditional communication between idioms*. If the Word underwent a second generation in the flesh, Mary is in a sense the true “mother of God”; the Word was the subject of the Passion, and Christ died in a true sense. Hence, the Council of Ephesus* (431), giving canonical status to a letter that Cyril* of Alexandria had addressed to Nestorius, affirmed, in light of the rule of faith of Nicaea, that the eternal Son of God himself conformed to generation in the flesh by reason of His action of persisting according to the hypostasis, that is, not as a reality external to him but as something affecting His very person. What occurred at that moment implicated the concrete unity of the Word and His humanity for His entire existence. Underlying the debate on dogma at Ephesus, there was a persistent tension between the two schools of Alexandria* and Antioch, the first thinking according to the schema Word-flesh and the second supported by the schema Word-man (logos-anthrôpos). It was not until the act of union of 433 that the two schools were reconciled in the text of a christological confession that leaned more toward Antioch and became the matrix for the definition of Chalcedon.

But, although the Council of Ephesus clearly brought out the unity of Christ, it remained vague on the distinction remaining in him between divinity and humanity. The monk Eutyches, trapped by what was not yet clarified in the language of Cyril, intended to confess only a single nature after the union; but he understood the matter in a superficial way and asserted a fusion or confusion between humanity and divinity, as though the former had been lost in the latter like a drop of water in the ocean. After the vicissitudes of the robbery at Ephesus (449), the Council of Chalcedon* (451) received the dogmatic letter of Pope Leo to Flavian and composed a new confession of christological faith that clearly affirmed the unity of the person of Christ “in two natures.” It thus emphasized distinction.

Unity and distinction remained the two poles of the debate on the interpretation of Chalcedon. This council, seen by some in the East as a return to Nestorianism, provoked the schism* of some churches attached to the Monophysitic language of Cyril. The emperors sought to restore the religious unity of their subjects by intervening with a series of dogmatic edicts. Summoned by Emperor Justinian in an atmosphere of violent conflict with Pope* Vigilius, the Second Council of Constantinople* (553) attempted to win over the Severian Monophysites to the letter of Chalcedon by proposing an interpretation of Chalcedon in the light of the doctrine proclaimed at Ephesus, that is, by emphasizing the unity of Christ. “In two natures” had to be understood “solely from a conceptual standpoint” (tê theôria monè) and not as positing the two natures existing separately. The communication between idioms was illustrated by an extreme formulation: “He who was crucified in the flesh... is true God, Lord of glory, and one of the Holy Trinity*” (can. 10).

In the seventh century, the controversy over the interpretation of Chalcedon sprang up again. Intending to emphasize the unity of Christ, two Eastern patriarchs, after proposing the ambiguous doctrine of a single “theandric” operation of Christ, won Pope Honorius over to the doctrine of a single will in Christ. The difficulty raised earlier by Apollinarius resurfaced: how could two wills not oppose one another? At the heart of the debate was the interpretation of the scene of Christ’s agony. The First Lateran Council of 649, in formulations composed by Maximus* the Confessor, asserted that there were two wills in Christ, as a very function of His two natures, because the will is a faculty of nature. The Third Council of Constantinople*, in a new interpretation of Chalcedon emphasizing distinction this time, confirmed these assertions. The last council with a clearly christological program was Nicaea* II. After the iconoclastic crisis that raged in the East in the eighth century, it affirmed the legitimacy of the cult of images* on the foundation of the incarnation because the Word of God, the perfect image of the Father, had made himself visible in the Christ, who could say, “Whoever has seen me has seen the Father” (Jn 14:9). With this council, the strictly dogmatic development of Christology can be considered complete. Subsequent councils made only brief allusions to christological dogma, most frequently to repeat past affirmations. The latest council, Vatican* II, established its anthropology (GS) on the mystery of Christ with the intent of showing that this mystery is the truth of man.

3. Medieval Christology

The Middle Ages thus inherited as a given the christological dogma developed in the patristic period. The contribution of the scholastic theologians, whose intention was to shift theological discussion from authorities to reasons, was to turn the results of previous work into speculative questions. Thus, from the Council of Frankfurt in 794 to Thomas* Aquinas, three opinions presented by Peter Lombard vied for support among writers on the question of the mode of union of the divine person to the humanity of Christ (adoptionism*). Thomas held the opinion that the man Jesus Christ is made up of two natures and that he is a single person, simple before the incarnation and “compound” thereafter, an opinion that became something more than an opinion because he considered that the other two had been condemned (ST IIIa, q. 2, a. 6).

Another question was posed along the same metaphysical lines: does the humanity of Christ possess an existence distinct from that of the Word (its own esse)? The condemned opinions said yes. But is it possible in light of the only valid opinion? Does the unity of subsistence recognized in the two natures of Christ necessarily imply their unity of existence (esse)? Thomas opted for the numerical unity of the act of existing in Christ. But later, considering that the humanity of Christ must not be deprived of an act that seemed to belong to the completeness of nature, Scholastic* theology tended to maintain the thesis of two esse in Christ, sometimes recognizing its opposition to Thomas, sometimes trying to reconcile the two theses. The documents, recently reconsidered (Patfoort), show that the angelic doctor constantly professed the unity of existence in Christ, with the exception of one passage indicating a moment of hesitation.

Another major medieval debate concerned the motives for the incarnation. Early on, Anselm* of Canterbury wrote a work titled Why did God become man? The question was later posed in these terms: Was the incarnation exclusively the consequence of man’s sin (the Thomist position), or did it belong to the creative plan of God (the Scotist position; see incarnation*). Nor did Thomas neglect to treat at length the mysteries of the life of Christ with a concrete perspective.

The Middle Ages was also involved in thorough reflection about the knowledge of Christ, which was not called into question in Catholic theology until about a century ago (Christ’s* Consciousness). Throughout the medieval period, popular spirituality and piety developed great devotion to the humanity of Christ, as illustrated in the hymn attributed to Bernard* of Clairvaux, Jesu, dulcis memoria.

4. Modern Period

The Christology of Luther* remained basically that of the ancient tradition*, even though he criticized its excessively speculative orientation. Taking its inspiration from Alexandria, it strongly emphasized the divinity of the Mediator who had taken on as a man the path of kenosis. For Luther, Christ is above all the Savior, and the solus Christus is inseparable from the sola fide. In his interpretation of salvation, did he overemphasize the role of the divinity of Christ at the expense of His humanity (Congar)? Although certain passages point in this direction, the humanity of Christ, in Luther’s view, plays its full role for our salvation (Lienhard).

The Christology of Calvin derives more from Antioch, is sometimes close to the formulations of Saint Leo I, and emphasizes the humanity of Jesus: The incarnation is the place of mediation in which God and man are both different and in dynamic relationship (Gisel). The principle of the extra calvinisticum, whereby the incarnate Lord never ceased to have his existence and his truth “also outside the flesh,” was at the origin of a polemic with Lutheran theologians, particularly with reference to the sacraments*. This thesis seemed to call into question the unity of the two natures of Christ. According to Calvin, this unity is dynamic but is not a fusion; he rejected any deification of the humanity of Jesus and all “Christolatry” (Gisel).

One of the strong points of early modern Protestant scholasticism was the development of the doctrine of the three offices (officia) or functions of Christ—prophet, priest, and king—which originated, it seems, with A. Osiander (1498–1552). By reason of his human-divine person, Christ is in fact our only doctor and master (Mt 23:8ff.), he is an eternal priest of the order of Melchizedek (Ps 110:1), and he is the king who reigns eternally over the house of Jacob (Lk 1:32ff.). These three functions develop the idea of anointment present in the term Christ. In the Old Testament the king and the priest were anointed with oil, while anointment by the Spirit established the ministry of the prophets. Calvin made this a central theme of the Reformation by developing the doctrine in The Christian Institutes and had it introduced into catechisms. The schema of the three offices of Christ served to systematize the doctrine of salvation. It is noteworthy that it was adopted by Catholic theology in the course of the 19th century and used in ecclesiology*. It is found again in Vatican* II to express the three functions of the people of God (by reason of the royal and universal priesthood*) and also the three truly ministerial functions of the ordained ministry (LG 25–27).

5. The Christology of the East

The Orthodox East (Orthodoxy*) has always remained faithful to the Christology of the fathers of the church and of the ancient councils, which it rereads in the light of the teachings of the synthesizers John of Damascus, Maximus the Confessor, Pseudo-Dionysius*, and later Gregory* Palamas. This Christology has remained “from above”: it is the Christology of the incarnate Word, God made man. But it remains wary of certain imbalances because of Monophysite tendencies that leave little room for the human. It likes to place to the fore the human-divine theandric energy of Christ as well as the synergy of His two natures. Without neglecting the kenosis of Christ or the mystery of the cross, the East emphasizes the resurrection. The Jerusalem church that the West calls the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is for the East the Church of the Resurrection (anastasis); in soteriology, it emphasizes the divinization of man by the humanity of the Son of God. Orthodoxy respects the depth of the mystery and does not question the how of it. Christ is above all the very icon of God among men: "The humanity of Christ is the human image of His divinity, the icon of Christ reveals the mystery of unity, and depicts the theandric image" (Evdokimov).

Thus, the Orthodox East is very reticent toward the developments of Christology in the West, criticizing them for falling into a human Monophysitism: "The balance of Christological theandricism is broken" (Evdokimov). This perplexity is also felt toward the contemporary procedures of interpretation of the Scriptures in the West.

6. Philosophical Christology in the West

The Enlightenment of the 18th century produced a major rationalist critique of the dogmatic image of Christ presented by the churches. Philosophy* opposed to this image an interpretation of Jesus in the light of reason*, which exalts the exemplary quality of His humanity. Jesus is thus the "Wise Man of Nazareth," the "master of the human race," the preeminent philosopher," who goes to His death "more nobly than Socrates," a "martyr of truth* and virtue*" (F.X. Arnold). This is the Jesus of Herder. Kant*, in Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793), presents the first "philosophical Christology": Jesus is the exemplary divine man, the idea and the image of whom Kant deduces from the ideal embedded in our reason. The role that philosophy then gave to itself was to translate the meaning of revealed representations into the language of reason. Even though, in the view of Christian faith, this enterprise is reductive, the image of Jesus that it offers is not without grandeur.

Today, philosophers and theologians are conscious of a major phenomenon: for three centuries the philosophy of Western Europe has made the person of Christ a central matter of its concern. This is obvious in Hegel* but is also found in many others: in Europe, Spinoza, Leibniz*, Fichte, Hölderlin and Schelling*, Schleiermacher*, Kierkegaard*, Nietzsche*, and in France alone, Pascal*, Maine de Biran, Rousseau, Bergson, Blondel*, Simone Weil, and many others. With diversified approaches, philosophical Christology is an investigation of the Idea Christi, that is, of the manifestation of the Absolute in the contingency of history*. Christology sheds light on the cardinal notions of philosophy: "subjectivity and intersubjectivity, the transcendental, temporality, corporeality, consciousness, death, and so on, all realities that Christ made his own by being incarnate" (Tillette).

The 19th century approached the problem of Christ not from the point of view of reason but from a historical perspective. It saw the beginning of the opposition between the "historical Jesus" and the "Christ of faith," which still influenced the first half of the 20th century (Jesus*, Historical).

7. The Christological Movement of the Second Half of the 20th Century

It is generally agreed that the contemporary christological movement began in 1951, that is, on the 15th centenary of the definition of Chalcedon. At the origin of this movement lies the work of Rudolf Bultmann* on the Protestant side and of Karl Rahner* on the Catholic. Adopting a view opposite to that of the liberal theology of the 19th century, for both exegetical and theological reasons, Bultmann deems that we can know almost nothing about Jesus. What counts is not Christ according to the flesh but the preached Christ, who is the Lord and whose word "calls out" to me today. The dogmatic problem posed by Bultmann lies in the distance he sets between fact and meaning. For his part, in 1954, Rahner proposed a program for the renewal of Christology: to rethink the relationship between classic Christology and biblical evidence; to complete ontological Christology with an existential Christology; to question the definition of Chalcedon, considered more as a beginning than an end; and to develop a transcendental Christology, that is, to deduce the conditions of possibility in man for the credibility* of Christ. Since then, a number of Protestant (Tillich*, Pannenberg, Moltmann, Jüngel) and Catholic (von Balthasar*, Rahner, Kasper, Schoonenberg, Schillebeeckx, Forte, Gonzalez de Cardedal, Moingt, Hünermann) theologians have produced works of Christology.

Let us simply mention a few dominant characteristics. A primary concern is that of verification: Christology can no longer be built on the basis of the confession of faith and conciliar definitions without in turn grounding that confession in the history and the fate of Jesus (Pannenberg, Kasper). In other words, the questions of fundamental* theology must be integrated into the exposition of dogmatic theology. The second concern, related to the first, has to do with the movement of Christology. Whereas classic Christology took its immediate point of departure from the incarnation, contemporary theology, faithful in this respect to the New Testament, generally gives priority to Christology "from below" or ascending Christology, that is, consideration of the man Jesus confessed as Lord, Christ, and Son of God (Pannenberg, Küng). “Christology from above” or descending Christology, then, takes over in a second stage, in the light of the writings of Paul and John. For the same reason, the contemporary christological movement has carried out a massive return to Scripture (in particular with Schillebeeckx) while respecting the difference between implicit and explicit Christology and the originality of the different traditions about Christ. Christology has thus displaced its traditional center of gravity from the incarnation to the Easter mystery. It takes into consideration the history of Jesus and articulates the relationship between history and faith in light of the correspondence between the earthly Jesus and the glorified Christ (Thüsing, Kasper). The most recent essays give their full weight to the narratives themselves, with the effects of meaning that are particular to them. From the preoccupation with history, there is thus a movement toward a Christology of narrative*. Many writers read the revelation of the Trinitarian mystery in the cross of Jesus (Balthasar, Moltmann, Jüngel).

In this context, the difficult question of the consciousness and the knowledge of Jesus, for long stymied as a result of the modernist crisis, could be taken up again, particularly in the contributions of Rahner, who at first suggested a distinction between “immediate vision,” expressing the immediate relationship of Jesus to His Father, and strictly “beatific*” vision, the latter being in no way a prerequisite for the former. Then he provided an account of the way in which the phenomenon of hypostatic union could become in Jesus a lived experience by placing it at the primordial, “transcendental” pole of His consciousness and not at the categorizing, thematic, and objective pole (Christ’s* Consciousness).

Let us finally mention the originality of the Christology of liberation (liberation* theology) in Latin America. It is characterized by the interest shown in a historical Jesus who shared human suffering and contradiction in order to proclaim a kingdom of justice* and of “liberation.” Faith in Jesus requires not only orthodoxy but also “orthopraxis,” that is, “correctness of action in the light of Christ” (Boff). This Christology has been suspected of revolutionary and Marxist deviation because of its manner of promoting the struggle of the poor for their liberation. Justice nevertheless requires that we recognize that the divinity of the Risen One is in no way obscured.

8. Christology and Cosmos; Christ and Other Religions

By the middle of the century, a reaction against a Christology that was too exclusively redemptive raised again the question of the cosmic dimension of Christ (Teilhard de Chardin). This perspective was supported by the patristic movement, which rediscovered the ancient Christologies of Irenaeus and Tertullian, in which Christ appears both as the creator of the cosmos* and as its center and its goal. The Christocentrism of the creation has become a common assumption, present in the documents of Vatican II.

The question raised most recently with great intensity is that of the universality of Christ with respect to the salvation of all humankind. There is more and more awareness that Christianity is a religious tradition among many others. In the perspective of interreligious dialogue, can we consider these other religions as “ways of salvation,” and in what sense can we do so without calling into question the uniqueness of Christ Mediator, who presents himself as “the way”? Three positions have been taken on this question (J. Dupuis): exclusivism (there is no salvation outside the Church* that professes Jesus Christ), inclusivism (the uniqueness of the person of Christ is the constituent and universal element of salvation), and “pluralism” (a theocentrism in which the person of Christ is considered either normative or not normative). The last position, which speaks of a “Copernican revolution,” constitutes a radical challenge to Christian convictions. The meaning of these debates is still open.

• a) General Works

J. Feiner, M. Löhrer (Ed.) (1969–70), MySal III/1 and 2: Das Christus Ereignis (Mysterium Salutis: Dogmatique de l'histoire du salut, vols. 9–13, 1972–74), especially R. Schnackenburg, “Christologie des NT” (III/1) and H. Urs von Balthasar, “Mysterium Paschale” (III/2).

B. Lauret, F. Refoulé (Ed.) (1982), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, II: Dogmatique 1, Paris (3rd Ed. 1988).

b) Christology of the New Testament

L. Cerfaux (1951), Le Christ dans la théologie de saint Paul, Paris.

V. Taylor (1953), The Names of Jesus, London.

O. Cullmann (1957), Die Christologie des Neuen Testaments, Tübingen.

F. Hahn (1963), Christologische Hoheitstitel, Göttingen.

P. Bonnard (1966), La Sagesse en personne annoncée et venue: Jésus-Christ, Paris.

A. Feuillet (1966), Le Christ, Sagesse de Dieu d'après les épîtres pauliniennes, Paris.

P. Lamarche (1966), Christ vivant, Paris.

A. Vanhoye (1969), Situation du Christ. Hébreux 1–2, Paris.

J. Guillet (1971), Jésus devant sa vie et sa mort, Paris (2nd Ed. 1991).

J. Dupont (Ed.) (1975), Jésus aux origines de la christologie, Louvain (2nd Ed. 1989).

M. Hengel (1975), Der Sohn Gottes, Tübingen (Jésus, Fils de Dieu, 1977).

H. Schürmann (1977), Comment Jésus a-t-il vécu sa mort?, Paris.

Commission biblique pontificale (1984), Bible et christologie, Cité du Vatican.

- J. A. Fitzmyer (1986), Scripture and Christology: A Statement of the Biblical Commission with a Commentary, New York.
 B. Sesboüé (1994), Pédagogie du Christ, Paris.

c) Dogmatic Development

- M. Schmaus et al. (Ed.) (1965–80), HDG III: Christologie-Soteriologie-Mariologie.
 A. Grillmeier (1975), Mit ihm und in ihm: Christologische Forschungen und Prospektiven, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.
 A. Grillmeier (1979, 1986, 1989, 1990), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I, (2nd Ed. 1990), II/1 (2nd Ed. 1991), II/2, II/4, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna (Le Christ dans la tradition chrétienne, CFI 72 (I), 154 (II/1), 172 (II/2), 192 (II/4)).

d) Scholasticism

- P. Kaiser (1968), Die Gott-Menschliche Einigung in Christus als Problem der spekulativen Theologie seit der Scholastik, Munich.
 F. Ruello (1987), La christologie de Thomas d'Aquin, Paris.
 E.-H. Weber (1988), Le Christ selon saint Thomas d'Aquin, Paris.

e) Reformation Christology

- M. Lienhard (1973), Luther témoin de Jésus-Christ, Paris.
 N. Blough (1984), Christologie anabaptiste: Pilgram Marpeck et l'humanité du Christ, Geneva.
 P. Gisel (1990), Le Christ de Calvin, Paris.
 M. Lienhard (1991), Au cœur de la foi de Luther: Jésus-Christ, Paris.
 N. Blough et al. (1992), Jésus-Christ aux marges de la Réforme, Paris.
 P. Gisel (1995), "Jésus (images de)," Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Geneva-Paris, 750–85.

f) Orthodox Christology

- P. Evdokimov (1959), L'Orthodoxie, Neuchâtel-Paris.
 P. N. Trembelas (1959), Dogmatique de l'Église orthodoxe catholique, vol. 2, Chêvetogne.
 J. Meyendorff (1969), Le Christ dans la théologie byzantine, Paris.

g) Philosophical Christology

- W. Schönfelder (1949), Die Philosophen und Jesus Christus, Hamburg.
 S. Breton (1954), La passion du Christ et les philosophes, Teramo.
 H. Küng (1970), Menschwerdung Gottes: Eine Einführung in Hegels theologisches Denken als Prolegomena zu einer künftigen Christologie, Fribourg.
 Th. Pröpper (1975), Der Jesus der Philosophen und der Jesus des Glaubens, Mayence.
 E. Brito (1979), Hegel et la tâche actuelle de la christologie, Paris-Namur.
 X. Tilliette (1986), La christologie idéaliste, Paris.
 X. Tilliette (1990), Le Christ de la philosophie: Prolégomènes à une christologie philosophique, Paris.
 X. Tilliette (1992), La semaine sainte des philosophes, Paris.
 M. Henry (1996), C'est moi la vérité, Paris.

h) Modern Christological Movement (Systematic Essays)

- P. Tillich (1957), Systematic Theology, vol. 2, London.
 K. Rahner (1954), "Probleme der Christologie von heute," Schr. zur Th. 1, Einsiedeln, 169–222.
 R. Bultmann (1958), Jesus, Tübingen.

- K. Rahner (1960), "Zur Theologie der Menschwerdung," Schr. zur Th. IV, 137–56.
 R. Bultmann (1961), Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Tübingen.
 W. Pannenberg (1964), Grundzüge der Christologie, Gütersloh.
 C. Duquoc (1968, 1972), Christologie, vol. I: L'homme Jésus; vol. II: Le Messie, Paris.
 P. Schoonenberg (1969), Hij is een God van Mensen, Malmberg, Nev.
 H. Urs von Balthasar (1969), Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Aesthetik, III/2: Neuer Bund, Einsiedeln.
 J. Moltmann (1972), Der gekreuzigte Gott, Munich.
 K. Rahner and W. Thüsing (1972), Christologie: Systematisch und Exegetisch, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.
 C. Duquoc (1973), Jésus, homme libre: Esquisse d'une christologie, Paris.
 L. Bouyer (1974), Le Fils éternel, Paris.
 W. Kasper (1974), Jesus der Christus, Mayence.
 H. Küng (1974), Christ sein, Munich.
 E. Schillebeeckx (1974), Jezus, het verhaal van een levende, Bloemendaal.
 A. Schilson, W. Kasper (1974), Christologie im Präsens, Fribourg.
 O. Gonzalez de Cardedal (1975), Jesus de Nazaret, Madrid.
 H. Urs von Balthasar (1976), Theodramatik, II/1: Die Personen des Spiels (1978), II/2: Die Personen in Christus, Einsiedeln.
 Bloemendaal (German trans.), Christus und die Christen: Die Geschichte einer neuen Lebenspraxis, Fribourg, 1977.
 E. Jünger (1977), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen (trad. fr. 1983, 2 vols.).
 K. Rahner (1977), Grundkurs des Glaubens, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna (trad. fr. 1983).
 E. Schillebeeckx (1977), Gerechtigheid en liefde: Genade en bevrijding.
 E. Schillebeeckx (1977), "Jésus de Nazareth: Le récit d'un vivant" LV(L) 134, 5–45.
 F. J. Van Beeck (1979), Christ Proclaimed: Christology as Rhetoric, New York.
 B. Forte (1981), Gesù di Nazaret, storia di Dio, Dio della storia, Rome (trad. fr. 1984).
 B. Sesboüé (1982), Jésus-Christ dans la tradition de l'Église, Paris.
 J. C. Dwyer (1983), Son of Man and Son of God: A New Language for Faith, New York.
 H. Urs von Balthasar (1985), Theologik, II: Wahrheit Gottes.
 J. Moltmann (1989), Der Weg Jesu Christi: Christologie in mesianischen Dimensionen, Munich.
 J. Moingt (1993), L'homme qui venait de Dieu, Paris.
 J. Dupuis (1993), Introduzione alla cristologia, Casale Monferato.
 P. Hünermann (1994), Jesus Christus Gottes Wort in der Zeit, Münster.
 I. U. Dalferth (1994), Der auferweckte Gekreuzigte: Zur Grammatik der Christologie, Tübingen.

i) Liberation Christology (Latin America)

- L. Boff (1972), Jesus-Cristo libertador, Petropolis.
 J. Sobrino (1977), Cristologia desde America latina, Mexico.
 J. L. Segundo (1982), El hombre de hoy ante Jesus de Nazaret, 3 vols., Madrid.
 J. Sobrino (1982), Jesus en America latina, Santander.
 J. Sobrino (1991) Jesucristo libertador, Madrid.

j) Christology and Cosmos; Christ and Other Religions

- R. Pannikar (1964), The Unknown Christ of Hinduism, London, New Ed., 1981.
 P. Teilhard de Chardin (1965), Œuvres, vol. 9: Science et Christ, Paris.
 G. Maloney (1968), The Cosmic Christ: From Paul to Teilhard, New York.
 D. Flusser (1970), Jésus, Paris.
 G. Vermes (1973), Jesus the Jew, Londres.
 P. Lapide (1976), Ist das nicht Josephs Sohn? Jesus im heutigen Judentum, Stuttgart-Munich (Fils de Joseph?, 1978).
 R. Arnaldez (1980), Jésus, Fils de Marie, prophète de l'islam, Paris.
 E. P. Sanders (1985), Jesus and Judaism, London.

- R. Arnaldez (1988), Jésus dans la pensée musulmane, Paris.
 J. Dupuis (1989), Jésus-Christ à la rencontre des religions, Paris.
 S. J. Samartha (1991), One Christ-Many Religions: Toward a Revised Christology, New York.

k) Images of Christ in Culture

- F. P. Bowman (1973), Le Christ romantique, Geneva.
 D. Menozzi (1979), Lecture politique di Gesù, Brescia.
 A. Dabiezies et al. (1987), Jésus-Christ dans la littérature française: Textes du Moyen Age au XXe siècle, Paris.
 B. Cottret (1990), Le Christ des Lumières: Jésus de Newton à Voltaire (1680–1760), Paris.

BERNARD SESBOÛÉ

Christ's Consciousness

Great reserve is required when treating a question as intimate and as delicate as Christ's consciousness. And yet it is Jesus* himself who invites the question with the insistent call he addresses to whoever takes an interest in him: "But who do you say that I am?" (Mt 16:15). Traditional faith and theology have not lacked for positions on the matter over the centuries. Contemporary thought has been able to produce a number of invaluable clarifications.

1. The Ancient Tradition

The earliest Christian centuries did not consider problematic what later centuries were to treat under the name of the "knowledge" (more "objective") and then the "consciousness" ("subjective") of Christ. The apostolic witness, its New Testament crystallization, and finally the resulting faith* in the truth of the humanity of Christ led the early Fathers* of the Church to accept, without prejudice to his divine identity, that Christ's human intelligence had been exercised according to the common human condition, ignorance included.

However, two approaches to the mystery* of Christ, broadly distinguishable in the patristic period, had an influence in this area. More intent on emphasizing the conditions of the concrete historicity of the life of Jesus, the school of Antioch*—Eustathius early on, probably Diodorus of Tarsus, but especially his pupil Theodore of Mopsuestia and certainly Theodoret of Cyrillus—placed maximum emphasis on the humanity assumed by the Word*. Along with the capacity of Jesus to work autonomously, they emphasized the correlative limitations affecting him, in the order of knowledge as in the order of will. The tendency was reversed in the school of Alexandria*. Origen*, for example, assimilated the condition of the soul* assumed by the Word to that of iron plunged into the fire: "As iron is in the fire, so the human soul [of Christ] is always in the Word, in Wisdom*, always in God*"; and everything that it does, everything that it thinks, everything that it understands, is God" (De Principiis II. 6. 6). In order to avoid the risk of later providing support for Arianism*, there were ingenious "economic" explanations of an "ignorance" that the New Testament makes it necessary, in spite of everything, to recognize in Christ (Athanasius*, Contra Arianos III. 43f.; Cyril* of Alexandria, Thes. XXII; Basil*, letter 236; Gregory of Nazianzus, Discourses 30. 15f.). But this ignorance also allowed for a contrasting emphasis on the "perfection in divinity" of the Word. It was specified that the ignorance was compensated for by that direct communication between the divine and the human that was guaranteed by the hypostatic* union. A particularly suggestive passage of Cyril, principal representative of the school of Alexandria, says, however, "The Word of God, by virtue of economy, has allowed this flesh that is his to follow the laws of its own nature. For it is human to progress in age and wisdom, and I would add, even in grace... By virtue of this plan [of economy], he thus allows human limitations to govern him" (Christ is one, 74).

Although their positions bore on the being* of Christ, the great christological councils* did not directly address his psychology, and it was only in the sixth century that this was explicitly considered. Around that time, one notes in Severian circles the affirmation of Christ's omniscience. But then a movement derived from the school of Antioch, attached to the Anomoean Eunomius (Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History VII. 17), replied with the affirmation of Christ's ignorance, in support of which it referred to Mark 13:32 and John 11:34. This was the crisis of the "Agnostes" (or of the "Themistians," from the name of Themistios, deacon of Alexandria c. 536–40). They were fought by Theodosius of Alexandria (536–67), then by Eulogius of Alexandria (580–607). The latter even corresponded about them with Gregory* the Great, who condemned them in 600, as did the Lateran Council in 649 (DS 474–76 and 419). The movement had little influence in the West because of the analysis articulated by Augustine* (Letter 219) with reference to a comparable position of Leporius. In his Letter XIV to the deacon Ferrand, Fulgencius of Ruspina wrote for his part, "We may clearly affirm that the soul of Christ has the full consciousness of its divinity. However, I do not know whether we should say that it knows divinity as God knows himself, or rather that it knows divinity to be divinity but not as divinity." The theory of omniscience (from the mother's womb) thus prevailed thereafter, by reason of the hypostatic union and the communication of qualities that it induced (idioms*) (see John of Damascus, Orthodox faith III. 21f., and the compilation called Doctrine of the Fathers, chap. 16, second half of the seventh century). The extreme development of this tendency was reached in the ninth century with Candidus, "a little-known theologian of the beatific* vision of Christ" (H. de Lavalette).

2. From the Medieval Period to the Threshold of the Current Age

Medieval theology developed a systematic reflection on the knowledge or, rather, on "the knowledges" of Christ and even went so far as to distinguish six of them. Abelard*, for his part, still represented those positions that belonged to the end of the patristic period: "Christ saw God with the greatest perfection" (Epitome of Christian Theology c. XXVII).

As for Thomas* Aquinas, in distinguishing in Christ a threefold human knowledge, he staked out a position that established a school. The three forms of this knowledge were the knowledge of the blessed (comprehensorum, ST IIIa, q. 10, a. 1–4), innate knowledge (indita or infusa, ST IIIa, q. 11, a. 1–6), and experiential knowledge (acquisita, ST IIIa, q. 12, a. 1–4). Rooted in concrete experience, the third was by definition limited and incremental, and Thomas in fact gave it more and more consideration, with Scripture* forcing its recognition. The second was communicated to human intelligence "directly from above," but by means of the mediation of "impressed species." In that lay its difference from the first form of knowledge, that immediate and perfect participation in the vision of God himself, which was the prerogative of the blessed in heaven. There was, however, a strict relationship and a close correspondence between the knowledge of vision and innate knowledge, the former constituting the foundation and the content of the latter, which in turn provided the former the means for its human manifestation.

In the Renaissance, Erasmus* (on the basis of reference to Scripture, especially Lk 2:52) and then, in the framework of the Reformation, Luther* and Calvin* (on the basis of a strong attachment to the truth of the Incarnation*) called for circumspection with respect to the "communication of properties" (see Institutes XIV. 1). There were in Jesus real limitations and an actual development in the order of knowledge*.

It was not until the late 19th century that medieval positions were once again questioned by Catholic theologians. This was done not for theoretical or ideological reasons but out of a concern to take into account the results achieved by the application of the historical and critical method to the texts of the Gospels. This was the case with the theologian H. Schell (1850–1906), who denied to Christ not only the beatific vision but any form of omniscience and, for this reason, saw his Katholische Dogmatik put on the Index of forbidden works in 1898. But it was especially true for the modernist* camp and for Loisy first of all. His radical positions provoked reactions that the magisterium saw fit to bring to an end with two severe interventions.

In 1907 the decree Lamentabili, 32, condemned the proposition according to which "one cannot reconcile the natural meaning of the gospel texts with what our theologians teach about the consciousness and the infallible knowledge of Christ" (DS 3422). The same Holy Office answered in 1918 that one could not teach without danger that it was "not evident that the soul of Christ, during his life among men, possessed the knowledge enjoyed by the blessed" or that "the soul of Christ had been ignorant of anything" (DS 3645–47). Again, in his encyclical Mystici corporis (1943), Pius XII thought it necessary to repeat the classic opinions on the perfection of the "knowledge of vision" realized "from the very first instant of his incarnation" (DS 3812).

3. A Transformation of the Problem

These positions taken by the hierarchy were directly aimed only at avoiding misconstructions in the common teaching of the early part of the century. They were not intended to settle debates still in progress or not yet open. Proof of this can be found in the fact that two recent documents (Commis. bibl. pontif., Bible and Christology, 1984; Commis. theol. intern., The Consciousness That Jesus Had of His Mission, 1985) refrain from mentioning any beatific vision in the pre-Easter Jesus.

a) Mention should be made here of the discussion, particularly vigorous after World War II and in a context arising out of modernism, on the existence in Christ, alongside his divine "I," of a human "I" that was the subject of his human thoughts and actions and that is manifested in the gospel narrative*. Another proposition distinguished two "selves" within the single "I" of the divine person*, two distinct centers of consciousness, one divine, the other human. On the basis of this discussion, in which P. Galtier and P. Parente were the notable participants, it became clear that if (as Pius XII suggested again in Sempiternus rex in 1951, DS 3905) Chalcedon* was to be respected, it had to be judged that, as a single person and hypostasis, the incarnate Word is also a single subject conscious of itself, hence a single "I," a single personal consciousness. This made it necessary to leave the problematics of an (objectifying) "knowledge" tied to the perspective of a rational and metaphysical psychology and resolutely adopt the problematics of consciousness, something particularly emphasized by M. Nédoncelle.

b) A decisive stage was reached with the "Dogmatic Considerations on the Psychology of Christ" by Karl Rahner* (1962), which followed a 1954 article on Chalcedon. In any spiritual being, the theologian pointed out, being and being present to oneself go together. Thus, the hypostatic union of human nature with the person of the Word brought about in itself, for that nature, a consequence in the order of consciousness. Christ's consciousness of himself is the consciousness that he is the Son of God. We may continue to designate as "vision" that immediate relationship with God, but it is then to be understood as not beatific. It is a fundamental condition of existence, a primordial ontological determination, of a transcendental and not a categorizing or thematic order.

Giving a "quasi-mythological" cast to the idea of a beatific vision realized from the very first moment of conception, such a consciousness is called on to actualize itself, to grow and develop throughout the historical course of an existence in fact set under the sign of human temporality. By the same token, the "principle of perfection" that had so broadly predominated until then was subject to fundamental revision. The patristic formulation of Chalcedon, "perfect in humanity," then appeared to be understood as stating that Christ is a "complete" man, "fully" a man. He is not a being who enjoys all the perfections ideally possible for a man, including those of the realm of consciousness, since this would indeed be contrary to the truth of the Incarnation.

c) In all these developments, closer attention to the evidence of the Gospels on the historicity of the human condition of Jesus played a major role. On the gradual nature of his coming to consciousness of the danger that weighed on him and on the questions of his ignorance of the Day of Judgment* or of the expansion of the fruit of his mission beyond Israel*, the work of exegetes such as R. Schnackenburg and A. Vögtle required the revision of medieval and classic opinions. For, whatever may be true of the claims of transcendence actually manifested by Jesus, it is nevertheless necessary to accept the truth of those facts that only persistent a priori positions had prevented us from seeing clearly set out in the gospel narrative. Jesus experienced wonder, disappointment, and surprise. He developed both in the discovery of beings and situations and in the knowledge of his own fate. He was even lacking in knowledge, and he had to learn and practice obedience day by day.

It is essential here to avoid projecting into the psychology of the pre-Easter Jesus what is true only of the preexisting Word or the glorified Christ. This is so even if Jesus of Nazareth is never presented as being unaware of the unique character of the relationship he had always maintained with the one he did not fear to designate as his own Father* (see the episode of the Temple*, Lk 2:49).

4. The Faith of the Son of God Incarnate

In the end it is the question of the identity of Christ that is at stake in the question posed about his knowledge and his consciousness. Jesus is an authentic man. As Hans Urs von Balthasar*, among others, notes, "the inalienable nobility of man lies in his being both able, and obliged to freely project the plan of his existence into a future that he does not know." But Jesus is also the Son of God, in the unity of a single concrete being. He has agreed to bring everything that he is as Word and Son of God to that choice that he has made, according to the will of the Father but in full harmony with him, to make himself truly a man. The result is that, in his incarnate state, the Word has agreed to receive and to know according to the pattern of human knowledge even what God gives him to be and to know according to his relationship of intra-Trinitarian immanence with him. In this way, in Jesus Christ, incarnate Word, there is not on one side an omniscient Word and on the other a man limited in knowledge in every direction but rather "one and the same Son and Word of God" who, having truly taken on the human condition, knows himself, wills himself, and lives himself according to the truth appropriate to that condition.

Jesus always perceived his relationship of filiation to his Father as one of absolute intimacy, well conveyed in human words by the term "Abba" ("papa"). This relationship always appeared to him as constitutive of his being and of all his conditions of existence, including his existence as a man. This relationship set the whole of his life under the dual sign of growth and obedience. It allowed the Epistle to the Hebrews to hail in him "the founder and perfecter of our faith" (Heb 12:2; see Balthasar, J. Guillet, A. Vanhoye). In the final analysis it explains his abandonment and his total surrender of self on the cross as it explains his resurgence from among the dead. It was in this relationship that he knew himself humanly as God/Son of God.

- P. Galtier (1939), Vérité du Christ, Paris.
- A. Michel (1941), "Science de Jésus-Christ," DThC 14, 1628–65 (+ Tables 2583–86 and 2650–55).
- P. Parente (1951, 1955), L'Io di Cristo, Brescia.
- E. Gutwenger (1960), Bewußtsein und Wissen Christi, Innsbruck.

- H. de Lavalette (1961), "Candide, théologien inconnu de la vision béatifique du Christ," RSR 49, 426–29.
- H. Urs von Balthasar (1961), Fides Christi, in Sponsa Verbi, Einsiedeln, 45–79.
- K. Rahner (1962), "Dogmatische Erwägungen über das Wissen und Selbstbewußtsein Christi," Schr. zur Th. 5, 222–45 (2nd Ed. 1964).
- A. Vögtle (1964), "Exegetische Erwägungen über das Wissen und Selbstbewußtsein Christi," in Gott in Welt: Festgabe für K. Rahner, Fribourg-Bâle-Vienne, I, 608–67.
- M. Nédoncelle (1965), "Le Moi du Christ et le moi des hommes à la lumière de la réciprocité des consciences," in Coll., Problèmes actuels de christologie, Paris, 215 Sq.
- A. Feuillet (1966), "Les Ego eïmi christologiques du quatrième évangile," RSR 54, 5–22 and 213–40.
- H. Riedlinger (1966), Geschichtlichkeit und Vollendung des Wissens Christi, Fribourg-Basel-Vienne.
- H. Urs von Balthasar (1966), Zuerst Gottes Reich, Einsiedeln.
- A. Grillmeier (1979 and 1989), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I (2nd Ed. 1990) and II/2, Fribourg-Basel-Vienne.
- J. Guillet (1980), La foi de Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- J. Moingt (1993), L'homme qui venait de Dieu, Paris, 561–90.
- E. Poulat (1996), Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste, Paris.

JOSEPH DORÉ

See also Beatitude; Christ/Christology; Hypostatic Union; Incarnation; Jesus, Historical; Kenosis; Monophysitism

Christmas. See Liturgical Year

Chrysostom, John

c. 350–407

Born into the aristocracy in Antioch, John Chrysostom belonged to a Christian family and from his youth would be in contact with monastic circles. After being ordained a priest* in 386, he was soon entrusted by the bishop* Flavian with preaching* in the church* of Antioch, and his reputation as a preacher explains his epithet of "chrysostom," or "golden-mouthed." In 398 he succeeded Nestor, bishop of Constantinople. Having quickly come into conflict with the imperial family and particularly with the empress Eudoxia, he was twice sentenced to exile and died of exhaustion in 407. He is held in great honor in the Orthodox world, where he is viewed as a martyr.

a) The Christian Life Defined. At the end of the fourth century, John Chrysostom reflected on the early history* of the Church. His homilies on the Acts of the Apostles, the only integral commentary on the Acts to have come down to us from the patristic period, show that he saw in the first Christian community a model for his contemporaries, a model, moreover, that had been renewed in the angelic life of the first monks. Since Pentecost, which he called “the metropolis of Christian feasts,” the Holy* Spirit has spread everywhere, calling the baptized to lead that perfect life of which the apostle* Peter provides the example. Chrysostom was aware that henceforth it was a matter of rooting Christian usages in a popular church (“multitudinist”). The rite of baptism* gave entry to a new life (Baptismal Catecheses SC 50 and 366), and the preacher developed a spirituality of Christian virtues* (Wenger 1974). His praise of virginity and the predominant place that he gave to monastic life was counterbalanced by his lauding of marriage* and of the parental role in the teaching of the faith*.

b) The Priesthood. His treatise on the priesthood* (SC 272) was widely circulated in the early Church. Including both bishop and priest under the term hierous, John Chrysostom stated the unique character of the episcopal ministry* and defined its three distinctive traits: the bishop was the leader of the faithful and guided the Church, he celebrated the Eucharist, and, as the guarantor of the integrity of the faith, he had to ensure its transmission. The very profusion of John Chrysostom’s homiletic works bears witness to the importance he attached to preaching activities. Himself a target of violent attacks, he rose up against the political maneuvers that prevailed at certain ecclesiastical elections (On Priesthood III, 11).

c) Reflections on Society. Following Basil* the Great of Caesarea and Gregory* of Nyssa, John Chrysostom viewed slavery in the same way that he viewed private ownership. That is to say, he saw both as resulting from original sin*. Going so far as to envisage a society* in which slavery would no longer exist, particularly in his homilies on the Acts of the Apostles, he made a proposal for social reform that included the common ownership of goods, based on the example of the first Christian community (In Acta ii, 3; PG 60, 93). The bishop must be entrusted with the management of the ecclesiastical patrimony and with the organization of the various charitable works—on this point John Chrysostom stood for a centralizing notion of clerical functions. But the novelty of Chrysostom’s thought resided in the prominence given to education (“On Vain Glory and Childhood Education”). He emphasized that in the first instance the responsibility for forming the new generations of a Christian society fell to the parents.

d) His Polemic against the Judaizing Christians and the Jews. Modern readers are bound to be repulsed by Chrysostom’s homilies Adversus Judaeos and the amount of space allotted in the body of his works to the polemic against the Judaizing Christians and against the Jews. The historical role of his works in the development of Christian anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism must be acknowledged. However, historians such as Wilken (1983) suggest that this condemnation should be tempered by a few observations. In Antioch, where the Adversus Judaeos homilies were delivered, the Jewish community was not a repressed minority but a large and powerful group that, moreover, exerted a strong attraction on very many Christians. John Chrysostom could also remember the favors from which the Jews had benefited under Julian’s reign, particularly from the plan for rebuilding the Temple* of Jerusalem*. Educated in the school of Libanius, John Chrysostom resorted to defamatory rhetoric that he used virulently and in bad faith, employing a whole sheaf of hackneyed arguments, including the Old Testament prophecies* against Israel*. But his words consisted of a polemic and not a call to violence* and persecution, and this polemic could not be defined as anti-Semitic since racial references do not occur in it at all. He even occasionally held up Jewish piety as an example to his followers. But he was certainly incapable of conceiving of Judaism’s survival after the advent of Christ, particularly when the capture of Jerusalem and the destruction of the second temple marked the fulfillment of the prophecies.

In addition to these historical considerations, it should be mentioned that the late 19th-century French translations of John Chrysostom’s works are also not exempt from anti-Semitism and must be used with caution. Moreover, it would be wise to take another look at the whole manuscript tradition in order to eliminate from them the Byzantine interpolations, which are likely to have reinforced the polemic against the Jews.

- PG 47–64; over 20 volumes published in SC, some edited by A.-M. Malingrey. Palladius, Dialogue sur la vie de Jean Chrysostome (SC 341–42).
- ◆ Ch. Baur (1920–30), InChr. und seine Zeit, Munich.
- A.-J. Festugière (1959), Antioche païenne et chrétienne: Libanius, Chr. et les moines de Syrie, Paris.

- D. C. Burger (1964), A Complete Bibliography of the Scholarship on the Life and Works of Saint JnChr., Evanston, Illinois.
- E. Nowak (1972), Le chrétien devant la souffrance: Étude sur la pensée de JnChr., ThH 19.
- A. M. Ritter (1972), Charisma im Verständnis des JnChr. und seiner Zeit, Göttingen.
- G. Dagron (1974), Naissance d'une capitale: Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451, Paris.
- A. Wenger (1974), "JnChr.," DSp 8, 331–55.

- Coll. (1975), JnChr. et Augustin (Actes du Colloque de Chantilly, 22–24 septembre 1974), Paris.
- R. L. Wilken (1983), JnChr. and the Jews, Berkeley.
- M. A. Schatkin (1987), JnChr. as Apologist, Analekta Vlatadon 50, Thessalonique.

JEAN-MARIE SALAMITO

See also Baptism; Bishop; Judaism; Presbyter/Priest; Property; Virtues

Church

1. Biblical Roots

a) The Old Testament. In the context of Christian theology*, the term "Old Testament ecclesiology*" can be used only in an indirect sense. The Church in the Christian understanding does not make its appearance until New Testament times and presupposes the coming of Jesus Christ. The idea that Christians have of themselves as a Church is nonetheless influenced by certain elements drawn from the Old Testament. This is indicated in the first place by the concept of "ekklèsia," the principal term used to designate the Church in the New Testament and the term that most frequently translated the Hebrew "kahal" (assembly of the political and ritual community) in the Septuagint. The link can also be seen in images designating Christianity as "a royal priesthood" (1 Pt 2:9), a "temple" (e.g., 1 Cor 3:16), the "people* of God*" (Heb 4:9), and in the way in which Paul uses the image of the olive tree to connect the community of Christians to the promises* of the Old Testament (Rom 11:18). Much more than the repetition of old ideas, this represents the expression of a material continuity between the old covenant* and the new.

The concept of the "people of God" represents the principal Old Testament "prefiguration" of what would later be called the "Church." Used originally to designate the patrilineal family group, the term increasingly came to be used to mean the whole of Israel*, as opposed to other peoples. According to Deuteronomy 4:7 and 7:7, Israel is a people to whom God is particularly close, smaller than others, but distinguished from them by virtue of its having been adopted and chosen by God. It received its identity from God, in his act of bringing it out of Egypt and making with it the covenant of Sinai. It thereby became both a political and a religious entity. The evolution of the idea of choice* in early Judaism* nevertheless shows the gradual growth within Israel itself of a separation between the chosen and sinners. This is confirmed by the two other basic concepts of Old Testament "ecclesiology," kahal and edah. The former designates the assembly of those who receive the law* of YHWH and practice the divine cult*. Although this assembly is not identical to "the people established as a state" (Berger 1988), the link with political reality is stronger here than in the parallel concept of edah, which denotes only the ritual community. These notions and representations took on particular significance as the political identity of Israel was called into question, and they were further developed in Hellenistic Jewish thought. Old Testament ecclesiology thus gradually moved away from the founding political choices in an attempt to define the true Jew, who, as such, would be able to triumph in the final battles (Apocalyptic* Literature). This can be seen as a precursor of the idea of the New Testament community, which was not made up of one nation alone but brought together "Jews and pagans," stamped by their belonging to Christ,* of which baptism* was the seal.

b) Jesus and the Church. Jesus* of Nazareth makes no more mention of an explicit ecclesiology than does the Old Testament. To be sure, the New Testament puts the word ekklèsia in his mouth, but this should probably be attributed to the primitive Christian community (Mt 16:18, 18:18). Did the post-Easter community, by developing the Church and its institution, thereby distort the message of Jesus (Loisy: “Jesus proclaimed the kingdom* of God, but it was the Church that came”)? Once again, it is more accurate to speak of a fundamental continuity, and it even seems possible to attribute to Jesus something like an “implicit ecclesiology” (Trilling). What is meant by this is that, in proclaiming the reign of God, Jesus was not, so to speak, launching his message into the void. He also called disciples and determined the manner in which they should commit themselves to following him. The disciples who were called were those who accepted the three essential signs of the “kingship of God”: a fundamental openness to a God of goodness and mercy*, the only source of life and of a future; the radical practice of the new justice* and of the commandment of love*, including reconciliation with and love of enemies; and the willingness to sacrifice* oneself even to the point of death*. If it is possible to see in these tendencies the concrete basis from which the “Church” was to arise, then there was a deep reason for the primitive community to attribute to Jesus explicit ecclesiological statements (whatever may be said in addition about the use made of these statements in the history* of the Church).

c) The Church as Ritual Assembly. New Testament accounts show that those who believed in Jesus began to meet in assemblies immediately after Easter. In Acts this movement is linked to the outpouring of the Holy* Spirit and to Peter*'s Pentecost speech, which brought about the conversion of a large number of people. Acts 2:42 sets out the ideal model of the primitive Christian community, whose essential characteristics are the teaching of the apostles*, the breaking of bread, and prayer*, as well as certain forms of common life of a charitable nature. These elements are also found in other places in the New Testament, particularly in Paul, as distinctive signs of the Church. This organization—particularly in the primitive community of Jerusalem*—raised some questions of articulation with and demarcation from Judaism, as evidenced by the Johannine corpus and by the reported fact of the Christians of Jerusalem assembling in the Temple* to pray (Acts 2:46). The image of these assemblies or meetings most particularly suggests the use of the term ekklesia.

d) Paul: The Church as the Body of Christ. Theological reflection on the Church as the community of Christ has followed various models. The most fully developed concept of it is certainly found in Paul and his disciples. A fundamental characteristic of Pauline ecclesiology is its christological underpinning. Christians form a community through their existence “in Christ.” Baptism is a participation in the death* and resurrection* of Christ (Rom 6), and this belonging to Christ renders the differences among people (according to sex, nationality, social position) free of any power to separate them (1 Cor 12:12f.; Gal 3:26ff.). In the same way the Communion of the Lord gives us a share (koinônia) in the body and blood of Christ, so that those who in this way participate in Christ form a single body: the “body of Christ” (1 Cor 12:27), the “body in Christ” (Rom 12:5), or even Christ himself (1 Cor 12:12). In Paul this idea is associated with the image, drawn from Greek political philosophy*, that assimilates the city* to a body made up of several members, each one of which carries out its own task. The description of communitarian reality in terms of a diversity of duties and ministries*, in Romans 12:4–8 and 1 Corinthians 12:12ff., follows this model. This does not hold for the deutero-Pauline epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians, where Christ is presented as the head of the body (Eph 1:22, 5:23; Col 1:18), and the difference between Christ and his members is emphasized. Paul also on occasion describes the community from the point of view of the power of the Holy* Spirit. The spirit of the new life is the “Spirit of Christ” (Rom 8:9). The Lord himself is the Holy Spirit (2 Cor 3:17). In the Holy Spirit we have been baptized into a single body, and we have been given one Spirit to drink (1 Cor 12:13; see 10:4), and the variety of ministries represents a single gift (charisma) of the one Spirit (1 Cor 12:11). It can be seen that the difference between the spiritual reality of the Church and its concrete manifestation was not yet the fundamental problem it would become in the context of a later ecclesiology.

e) The Church and Israel. In addition to the central schemata of the Pauline corpus, the New Testament provides other ways in which to interpret the theological reality of the Church. Matthew, for example, proposes an image of the Church that has been described as centered on “the true Israel” (Trilling). It is sketched in particular in the passages dealing with a mission of Jesus directed especially toward Israel (Mt 10:5f., 15:24). The Twelve Apostles represented the 12 tribes of the Israel to come (Mt 10:1f., 19:28), while the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7) offered a summary of the “Torah of the true Israel,” something that was concretized in the order of the Christian community (Mt 18). This vision of Matthew's, however, makes room on the one hand for an awareness of the sin of an Israel that did not recognize the hour of Christ's visitation (Mt 21:33ff., 23) and on the other for the idea of a universal salvation*, by which Christ's mission* was extended to the entire world, so as to include all peoples in the Church (Mt 28:19ff., 5:15; see also Acts 28:26–28). The theme of "Israel and the Church" appears again, under different guises, in other New Testament passages. There is, for example, the image of the bridegroom and the bride, the latter representing both Israel, to which the Messiah* has come (Lk 12:36: the disciples belong to the bridegroom; Mt 25:1–13), and the community of Christians (2 Cor 11:2). The image of the heavenly Jerusalem (Gal 4:26f.; Heb 12:22f.; Rev 21:10–27) inscribes the Church among the future events awaited by the Jews, thereby dissociating it from the present reality of Israel. On the other hand, the New Testament also puts forward the idea of a permanent and continuous link, for example, in the chapters on Israel in Romans 9 through 11, where the Church of the pagans is included in the promise made to Abraham (11:17ff.), while at the same time there is expressed the hope that all of Israel will finally be saved. The passages on the Temple, which is the community (1 Cor 3:16), or on the people of God, to whom rest is promised (Heb 4:9), show a similar continuity between Israel and the Church.

f) Services and Ministries. From the time of the New Testament, the Church developed ministerial structures that took on a multiplicity of forms, and these are not of a nature to provide a direct model for the Church of today. Jesus himself "instituted" no ministry, but the choice of the Twelve Apostles, which must probably be attributed to Jesus himself, shows that even before Easter the movement did not lack a certain internal articulation. Later we can distinguish in the earliest communities at least two kinds of structure. On the one hand, there were ministries based on the gifts enumerated in the Epistles of Paul (1 Cor 12; Rom 12); among them in particular was apostleship, which shows that the charismatic character of these ministries did not necessarily exclude the exercise of doctrinal and pastoral authority*. It was also up to the apostle to bear direct witness to the Resurrection, a function that could not of course be perpetuated by any permanent structure. We can also recognize on the other hand a form of organization—clearly based on Jewish models—centered on the role of the elders (see Acts 19), in which various duties (particularly the doctrinal and pastoral functions linked to apostleship) might also be transmitted by ordination* (1 Tm 4:1–4, 5:22; 2 Tm 1:6). We can see here the outlines of the problem of "proto-Catholicism*," though it is unclear to what extent this problem simply reflected the demands weighing on the community as the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus became more distant in time (e.g., the requirement of preserving Christian identity in the face of the growing danger of doctrinal error) and to what extent it was related to the Christian community's break with Judaism (see Berger 1988). The problem, in any event, could not be ignored, and it continued to hold the Church in a state of uncertainty. There is no doubt that the Church is not the kingdom of God. But in the variety of its forms as an empirical social entity, it is nevertheless composed of the people of that kingdom, who attest to its coming and await its fulfillment. In every age, the social reality of the Church must in any case be evaluated and critiqued in relation to its testimony and to its hope.

2. Representations and Concept of the Church in the Course of Its History

a) The Early Church. The Church of the earliest days developed ecclesiastical structures* that were already contained in embryo in the New Testament. The problem of the internal and external unity* of the Church, and hence of its capacity to remain in the truth*, became ever more pressing. As characteristic points of this development, we should mention the growing role played by the bishop*. He was responsible for each particular Church, guaranteeing its truth in Christ, and presiding over the celebration of the Eucharist* (see Ignatius of Antioch, Ad. Smyrn. VIII). In addition, certain Episcopal sees gained considerable influence because of the growth of urban communities that were established as regional ecclesiastical centers (they would later become archbishoprics and patriarchates*). Irenaeus* of Lyon was the first to introduce a significant ecclesiastical emphasis into ancient theology. For him the Church was the place of the Spirit of God, the house of truth and salvation. It was founded on the Holy* Scriptures, which it preserved in faithfulness to the preaching* of the apostles. The Church's ministers, having their place in the apostolic* succession, guaranteed the complete transmission of apostolic truth. Hippolytus of Rome went further than Irenaeus in asserting that sinners did not truly belong to the Church, a thesis that brought him into conflict with Callistus I of Rome. This disagreement already reflected the tension that existed between the true Church and its material institutional reality.

In Eastern theology of the third century, Clement of Alexandria emphasized the coincidence of the earthly with the heavenly Church, while Origen* insisted on the necessary spiritual and moral sanctity of the members of the Church, in particular of its ministers. In the West, around the same time, leaving Tertullian aside, it is especially important to mention the importance of Cyprian* of Carthage, whose ecclesiology granted a central place to the episcopal function. Cyprian was convinced that the unity of the Church had to be guaranteed by the unity of its bishops; it was to this Church, structured and represented by the bishops, that devolved the role of being the sole path to salvation (“no salvation outside the Church”).

b) Augustine. The theology of the early Church developed no ecclesiological program more significant than that of Augustine*. It reflected, more than any others did, the new situation that had been created and the new questions that had been raised since the Church (through the act of Constantine) had formally entered the political realm. Opposing the tendency that, particularly in the East, aimed at establishing a positive relationship between Church* and state, a relationship that might signify in the very history of salvation, in the City of God Augustine emphasizes the differences between the two orders. He distinguishes between two great “cities”: the city of God, the communion* of those who are moving toward the divine goal, and the city of the devil, bringing together human beings and angels* who have chosen the way of evil*. Knowledge of who belongs to which group is the privilege of divine predestination*. As for the Church, it is manifestly a compound of good and evil, elect and outcast. The call that comes through baptism is not identical to the eternal election of God. Augustinian ecclesiology thus recognizes a tension between the true Church of the elect and the external visible institution that prefigures many later developments in theological thought. The visible institution of the Church, under the leadership of the bishops, nonetheless remains the salvific body to which it is necessary to belong in order to enter into beatitude*. In this sense (as conditio sine qua non), the ancient principle of “no salvation outside the Church” still holds for Augustine. The state, on the other hand, that “great gang of bandits,” has no other function but that of integrating and moderating all the egotistical motives of mankind in such a way as to preserve external peace* as much as possible. In this respect at least, it supports the work of the Church.

c) The Middle Ages. The question of the primacy of the pope* played an important and constant role in medieval Latin ecclesiology. This can be explained by the growing political ambitions of the bishop of Rome* and by the conflicts that set him in opposition both to the representatives of temporal power (emperor, princes) and to church authorities (bishops, councils*). Although the teaching of early scholasticism* favored a relative independence of temporal power from the pope (Rupert of Deutz), other voices arose that gave to the Church (i.e., the pope) supremacy over temporal power (Gerhoh of Reichersberg) by virtue of the universal sovereignty of Christ. This line of argument, which was to prevail over the one that favored the independence of temporal rulers, is clearly visible in the ambitions of Innocent III, who laid claim to complete spiritual and temporal power over the Christian people. It found its supreme expression in 1302 in the bull Unam Sanctam of Boniface VIII. According to this document, Christ entrusted to the pope the two swords, temporal and spiritual, and total submission of the person to the pope is a necessary condition for salvation. The crisis of the papacy in the 14th and 15th centuries later provoked a quarrel over the relations between the pope and the council of bishops. The “conciliar” option, which subjected the pope to the authority of the Church and its councils (decree “Haec sancta synodus” of the Council of Basel* in 1415), conflicted with the “papalist” option, which granted absolute primacy to pontifical power and authority (bull “Laetentur caeli” of the Council of Florence* in 1439) and condemned conciliarism*.

Until the 14th century, Latin theology possessed no dogmatic* treatises that dealt specifically with ecclesiology. It tended instead to examine the nature of the Church within the framework of sacramental theology or Christology*. We are touching here on the second focus, more strictly theological, of medieval ecclesiology. Baptism and the Eucharist are the two sacraments* to which early Scholasticism (Hugh of Saint-Victor) attributed the power of integrating the believer into Christ and into his mystical body the Church. The Eucharist is not only the symbol (as a sign of the abundance of wheat and grapes) but also the efficient cause and the vital principle of the mystical body of the Church. By receiving the Eucharist in a worthy manner, believers come together as one in the peace of the Church. At the same time, the offering of the eucharistic sacrifice* by the priest is understood as an act in which the entire Church participates, as a kind of mysterious sacrificial communion (Peter Damien, Eudes of Cambrai). Major Scholastic theology (Bonaventure*, Thomas* Aquinas) added christological depth to this idea, affirming that it is the gratia capitis of Christ, which, in its superabundance, overflows onto the members of the body of the Church. According to Thomas, the humanity of Christ is the instrumentum coniunctum (joint instrument) of this operation, and the sacrament is its instrumentum separatum (separate instrument) (ST IIIa. q. 62. a. 5). The members of the Church are the saints in heaven (including those of the old covenant) and the just on the earth—those, that is, who possess faith* and love—whereas sinners, who are not in a state of grace*, are often considered dead or imperfect members. From this, late Scholasticism derived the idea that only the predestined are truly members of the Church (Wycliffe, Hus*). The opposing argument (anticipating the position of Bellarmine*) defined the Church as the communion* of those who observe and outwardly confess the true faith, participate in the sacraments, and submit themselves to the pope (John of Ragusa, Juan de Torquemada). The universal Church was thus identified with the Church of Rome.

d) The Reformation. Luther* forged his conception of the Church in opposition to the claim of the “papal Church” that it was the only true Church. For his part, Luther understood the Church as the people of God gathered in the Holy Spirit and receiving its existence and its sanctity from the divine Word (the Church as “creature of the Word*”; WA 6. 650). The preaching of the Word is therefore the essential characteristic of the true Church, even if other elements may be added to it (Baptism, Communion, ministries, prayer, the cross, respect for authority). For Luther, the Church of Rome was not the “true old Church,” for it had falsified the gospel. The ecclesiastical theses of Lutheran confessional writings—most of them composed by Philipp Melancthon—define the Church as “the assembly of the saints, in which the gospel is taught in its purity and the sacraments administered according to the rule” (CA VII). The Church represents the ritual assembly of all those who are living in justifying faith and so have received new birth by the Holy Spirit. The signs and distinctive marks of this assembly are the preaching* of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments (by ordained ministers: CA XIV). These two activities alone make of it a Church because they transmit and continually retransmit the Holy Spirit, who brings forth faith (CA V). In order to preserve the true unity of the Church, it is enough if it preaches the gospel and administers the sacraments in conformity with Scripture. The ceremony of worship may vary, and even less is it necessary to adopt a specific hierarchical structure (bishops, pope), even though Lutherans explicitly accept the episcopacy as a regional authority of an essentially doctrinal character, without temporal power (CA XXVIII). Opposing the Catholic position, Lutherans make a distinction between the Church understood as a visible assembly, brought together through participation in the sacraments, and the true Church, understood as a communion of hearts* in the Holy Spirit. The latter is nevertheless recognizable by the external signs of the Word and the sacraments (dual sense of Church in Apol. VII). Melancthon later placed more and more emphasis on the visible Church, which he saw as an assembly of the chosen, or coetus vocatorum, sometimes also called coetus scholasticus. Out of the plurality of ministries that Luther still accepted, Melancthon gradually eliminated all but one, the primary duty of which was public preaching of the Word. He showed little interest in the specific meaning of the sacraments for the essence of the Church.

Calvin*'s ecclesiology, which played a decisive role for the Reformed Churches, was based on the idea of predestination*, that is, on the idea of the Church as the communion of the elect in Christ, as electorum turba (Inst. IV. 1. 2). On the other hand, Calvin speaks above all of the visible Church, which he describes as the mother of all pious souls*. The true Church, the Church of pure preaching and the administration of the sacraments, is opposed to the false, papal Church. Christ instituted four kinds of ministers: pastors*, doctors*, elders, and deacons*, among whom the first (who have the duty of preaching the Word) occupy the most important position. The elders have chiefly to watch over the good conduct of the members of the community and hence also over disciplinary measures in the Church (in concert, if necessary, with civil authorities). In this respect, the Reformed tradition approaches the Church from a totally different angle than that of Lutheranism*.

e) Later Protestantism. Later Protestantism, in contrast to the Reformation and to Protestant orthodoxy, developed its idea of the Church on the basis of particular orientations of the believers who adhered to it. Pietism*, for example, emphasized personal faith and sanctification and relegated the pure preaching of doctrine to second place (Spener, von Zinzendorf). In the Enlightenment, it was moral sentiment that was understood to unite individuals in a “Republic governed by the laws of virtue,” whereas the institutional Church, with its “statutory” rites and dogmas*, was seen at best as fulfilling only a propaedeutic function for those who did not have the moral force to do without it (Kant*). These two tendencies came together in the thought of Schleiermacher*, who defined religion as a “feeling of absolute dependence.” This feeling, with which no one was as “powerfully” inspired as Jesus of Nazareth, represents the “total life” in which all who believe in this same Jesus commune; ultimately—and here Schleiermacher departs from Kant—it finds its necessary form in the visible Church, which is a part of society* insofar as it introduces the religiosity attached to Jesus into social and cultural reality (we can see here the beginnings of the “cultural” approach of liberal Protestantism*). Despite certain divergences in the area of the philosophy of religion*, this cultural concept of the Church continued to guide Protestant theologians of Hegelian inspiration, down through

R. Rothe, according to whom the ecclesiastical form of Christianity tends to become dissolved in the whole of the social body and its political organization. Theologians such as A. Ritschl—for whom Jesus, in proclaiming the kingdom of God, was aiming at a “moral organization of humanity”—and E. Troeltsch—for whom Christianity represented the most important historical expression that had ever appeared of the a priori religiosity of man—were also, in a different way, dependent on this neo-Protestant approach.

In the 19th century, there came from confessional Lutheranism (Löhe, Vilmar, Klieforth, and, to a lesser extent, von Harless and Harnack) the strongest reaction against this vision of a Church reduced to the level of a mere religious or moral consciousness. For these writers, the Church is above all the institution of salvation founded by Christ. It must administer the Word and—most particularly—the sacraments through the intermediary of an ordained minister who stands before the community in the name of Christ. The confession of faith—that is, the confession of Lutheran faith, the only true faith—plays a decisive role here. In relation to that confession, moral consciousness, religion, and piety appear as subjective factors of secondary importance.

f) The 20th Century. It fell above all to Barth* to take a position against neo-Protestantism and its notion of the Church. For Barth the central task of the Church is to proclaim the word of God revealed in Christ. Hence, there is a long discussion in his Dogmatik of the gathering together, the building up, and the mission of the Christian community, as these were carried out by Christ in the Holy Spirit. This missionary Church of Barth played a decisive role in the image that the German Confessional Church formed of itself in the National Socialist period and in its fight against the false doctrines that claimed to accommodate the unique word of Christ by attaching to it other slogans, such as “people,” “race*,” and “history*.” With Bonhoeffer*’s maxim calling for a “Church for the others,” this image also marked the consciousness of the evangelical Church under Communist domination (Alliance of Evangelical Churches of the DDR), as attested by the proposal for a Church that would be a “communion of witness and ministry,” the idea of which was taken up in the oikoumenè as a whole.

Apart from this vision of the Church, and apart from the renewal of the Lutheran confessional idea (Elert, Althaus), other approaches remained more faithful to the legacy of the 19th century. We should mention here the late thinking of E. Brunner, who essentially wished to see in the Church a simple meeting of persons*, devoid of any institutional character. In this he repeated the argument of the canonist R. Sohm concerning the fundamental contradiction between the Church and the law*. We should also recall Tillich’s concept of the Church in which the notion of “spiritual communion” played a central role. This spiritual communion, to be sure, finds in the “manifest” Church (characterized by preaching, the sacraments, and the confession of faith) its decisive and—by its explicit reference to Christ—exemplary expression, but it also takes place in many other movements and groups, even outside the Christian religious and philosophical framework. Tillich also endeavored to study the influence of the Christian spirit on culture and to denounce the contradictions that were supposed to exist between Christian preaching and the world* of today.

This line of thought has recently been taken up in the discussion of the multitudinist Church. In opposition to a vision of the Church understood as a communion of confession and service, some theologians have adopted the perspectives of the sociology of religion and argued for a churchliness, which would also take into account people who are distant from the Church, in their concrete Christianity. As an “institution of liberty*” (Rentdorff), the Church offers the gospel but prescribes no particular social form, no communitarian commitment. It simply wishes to encourage the development of a religious and ethical* consciousness, Christian in the broadest sense, thereby endowing itself with the internal openness necessary for it to have a presence in culture and society.

g) Catholic Ecclesiology since the 16th Century. The development of the Catholic Church since the 16th century has been first of all marked by an anti-Reformation emphasis. Against a vision based on justifying faith and preaching of the Word, Bellarmine, taking up pre-Reformation principles, described the Church as an assembly of persons* who possess three characteristics: they confess the same faith, they participate in the same sacraments, and they recognize the authority of the Roman pontiff. The Church thus defined is, according to Bellarmine, as visible as the Republic of Venice. Gallicanism* in the 17th century and Febronianism in the 18th sought (without ultimate success) to limit the sovereignty of the pope by means of the general council. In the Enlightenment period the Church was described as a spiritual society whose members pursue happiness through shared religious practices, a happiness that leads them toward humanity in the spirit of that religion; this is precisely the goal toward which the hierarchy established by Christ is aiming. In the 19th century it fell especially to the Catholic school of Tübingen (Drey, Möhler, Döllinger) to develop a deeper analysis of the spiritual essence of the Church. For these writers the Church is an organism imbued with the Holy Spirit, which at different levels creates the hierarchical articulations—duties and ministries—necessary for the preservation of its unity. By contrast the so-called school of Rome (Scheeben*), which prepared the ecclesiological theses of Vatican* I, focused exclusively on the Church's legal structure. In the dogmatic constitution Pastor aeternus promulgated by that council (dated 18 July 1870), nothing is in fact discussed but the pope. It dogmatically establishes his jurisdictional supremacy in the Church and, as a corollary, his doctrinal infallibility* when he speaks ex cathedra. The council, which initially intended to prepare a general ecclesiological program, did not succeed in dealing with other subjects, so that consequently the idea of the Church was effectively reduced to its legal-hierarchical dimension. This conception was later broadened in different directions, thanks to a new approach to divine worship (liturgical movement, encyclical Mediator Dei of Pius XII [1947]) and to a deeper christological analysis that, on the basis of Scripture, understood and described the Church as an institution both of law and of love (encyclical Mystici Corporis of Pius XII [1943]). A new movement of secular apostleship would also be influential, as would, finally, the ecclesiology of Vatican* II (in particular the dogmatic constitution Lumen Gentium [1964]). Indeed, on more than one point Vatican II went well beyond the official ecclesiology that had been established until then. The council broke new ground by using different biblical images, particularly that of the pilgrim people of God. It took a positive attitude toward non-Catholic Christian confessions (and the non-Christian world), which it integrated into an ecumenical vision of the Church. The council also developed the doctrine of the episcopal college, which—when it meets in council and in communion with the pope—holds supreme authority in the Church. In addition, Vatican II came to a new understanding of the ministry of the bishop in relation to his consecration and his functions, and it reintroduced the diaconate as a specific ministry in the Church. The development of the Catholic notion of the Church since Vatican II has been particularly concerned with the concept of “communio.” This, however, presents a profound ambivalence since it can denote the coming together of Christianity, in all its diversity, around the altar or an ecclesial unity founded on the pope and given legitimacy by him alone.

3. The Different Approaches of the Church in the Current Ecumenical Dialogue

We can briefly distinguish three ecclesiological approaches in the contemporary ecumenical movement, depending on whether the Church is understood from the Orthodox perspective, the Catholic perspective, or the point of view of the heirs of the Reformation. But Orthodox ecclesiology did not go through a historical evolution comparable to that of the two major Western traditions* as just outlined; and the Churches descending from the Reformation provide a large spectrum of ecclesiological conceptions that diverge from one another in details.

a) Eastern Churches. The ecclesiological thought of the Eastern Churches is characterized by conscious recourse to the Trinitarian model. They seek a middle way between “christological sacramentalism,” which leads to institutionalism and clericalism, and “pneumatological propheticism,” threatened by the specter of subjective spiritualism (Kallis). To this end and by reference to the image of the body of Christ, they understand the Church as a living organism, one that finds its center and its everlasting source in the celebration of the Eucharist (the “eucharistic ecclesiology” of Afanassieff, Schmemmann, Zizioulas) and that the Spirit of God transforms into a new creation (divinization, theôsis). On the organizational level this ecclesiology focused on the local* Church uses on the one hand the autocephalic principle, according to which the local or national Church does not constitute a part of a whole but the concretization of the whole. On the other hand this very principle obliges local churches to come together in synods* and thus to be governed by a consensus that guarantees the unity of the body of Christ. The ministry of the bishop, placed in the apostolic* succession, constitutes the link that maintains that unity in time* and in space. As bearer of the truth spoken by the Holy Spirit, the Orthodox Church takes note of the existence of other Christian Churches, but it can enter into full eucharistic communion with them only if there is a consensus on the fundamental questions of ecclesiology.

b) The Catholic Church. In the 20th century the ecclesiology of the Catholic Church was formulated in the decrees of Vatican II. The principal difference from the Eastern approach lies in the legal form inherited from the Latin tradition and particularly from Vatican I. The Catholic Church appears here as a legal entity governed by the bishop of Rome, who holds supreme jurisdictional power and absolute doctrinal authority (in the final analysis he is infallible). In parallel and jointly with the pope, the episcopal college (placed in the apostolic succession) represents the pastoral and doctrinal organ of the universal Church, an organ that has taken on new importance since Vatican II, particularly in the extraordinary form of the council. This legal framework constitutes the bond by which the Church, as the spiritual people of God, is gathered together and governed. As in Eastern ecclesiology, the center of spiritual life is the celebration of the Eucharist, with which the other sacraments, in particular Baptism, are coordinated. The preaching of the word of God contributes to the edification of hearts, to the education of minds, and to the proclamation of the will of God for the world. In and with the Church, all its members—particularly those known as the laity—are called to serve one another and to serve the world in love. It is in these basic ecclesiastical perspectives, to which all members of the Church are subject, that the different ministries are rooted: that of the bishop (endowed with the fullness of the sacrament of ordination*) and that of the priest—both of whom possess sacerdotal, doctrinal, and pastoral functions—as well as that of the deacon*. The Church in this complex sense is designated in its entirety as a “sacrament,” that is, as “a sign and an instrument through which is achieved intimate union with God, as well as the unity of the entire human race” (LG 1). In spite of the many spiritual bonds that have been tied with other Christian Churches, first of all with the Eastern Churches—but also with believers of other religions and all nonbelievers of goodwill—the goal of ecumenical effort remains the unity of all Christians and of all Churches in communion with the bishop of Rome.

c) The Churches Descended from the Reformation. The Churches laying claim to the legacy of the Reformation are to be differentiated on three principal points from the Eastern Churches and the Roman Church. They are characterized in the first place by the ecclesiological primacy granted to the word of God transmitted through Scripture and preaching. Faithful to the formulation of Luther, defining the Church as a “creature of the divine Word,” they have in many respects given the Word a privileged position over the sacraments, to the point of seeing in the latter only specific forms of the Word. The second distinctive element of this ecclesiological tradition consists in its granting to the question of ministry and ecclesiastical structures only a secondary role. To be sure, all the evangelical Churches have ministries, among which, as a general rule, there is a special ministry, conferred by ordination, for the public preaching of the Word and the administration of the sacraments. Many Churches that sprang from the Reformation also accept the episcopacy, or at least the functions of a regional episkopè. But in no case does the episcopal structure represent a necessary condition for churchliness or for church unity. This explains why the (forced) break in the apostolic succession of the bishops in the evangelical Churches in Central Europe in the 16th century does not constitute, in their view, an essential ecclesiastical deficiency despite objections from the Orthodox and Catholic Churches. This naturally implies an alternative concept of the conditions for church unity. According to CA VII, in order for there to be true unity, all that is needed is agreement in the preaching of the gospel and in an administration of the sacraments (Baptism, Communion) in conformity with their original institution, and this thesis—which is found in the current ecumenical canon of the Protestant Churches—constitutes one of the most serious difficulties for ecumenical dialogue. Their specific approach to the question of the ministry has led the Churches descended from the Reformation—this is their third major characteristic—to involve the laity in the administrative and doctrinal responsibilities of the Church. This is clearly evidenced in the evangelical synod, made up of both lay members and ordained clergy. The synod is to a great extent charged with establishing church regulations, which also quite often involves doctrinal decisions.

On the basis of these specific orientations, there is nevertheless a large variety of possible options and forms of organization. For example, the Anglican Church, the North American Episcopal Church, and the Lutheran Churches of Scandinavia grant particular importance to the office of bishop and to the apostolic succession, although that does not constitute an insurmountable obstacle to their eucharistic communion with other Churches founded on different principles. There are also some Churches of the congregationalist type (congregationalism*, disciples of Christ), in which universal structures are little developed or even nonexistent. Finally, there are Churches (Baptists*, Quakers) in which the sacraments are understood and administered in an entirely different way from that in other Churches. Positions also diverge as to the normative doctrinal value of confessions of faith. These differences are the subject of interconfessional discussions that have often opened up possibilities for ecclesiastical communion (on the basis of the criteria of CA VII) inconceivable in other traditions. We may add that the Old Catholic Church, within the sphere of influence of the Catholic tradition, and certain particular Churches (notably in India) in the Orthodox sphere have shown themselves to be more flexible toward the conditions of church unity than the principal currents of their respective traditions.

4. Principles of an Ecumenical Ecclesiology

The Church is, in the first instance, the communion of all whom God has called in the Holy Spirit by Jesus Christ, whether this communion is seen on a local or a world level. If it is impossible to speak of an explicit institution of the Church by Jesus before Easter, it is on the other hand possible to see its “implicit” origin in the kingdom of God whose coming Jesus proclaimed as well as in the group of men that he called to him and whom he bound to his message. The Church is the work of the Holy Spirit through the Word, through faith, and through Baptism. In the Holy Spirit, the crucified and risen Jesus Christ is present as the real and constant foundation of the Church. In its earliest form the Church was a ritual assembly where the gospel was preached and Communion was celebrated in memory of the Lord, where participants prayed to God in recognizing their sins, giving thanks, and begging for his help (see Acts 2:42). In this ritual practice and especially in the sharing in the body and blood of the Eucharist, the Church established itself and continually renewed itself as the “body of Christ” (1 Cor 10:16f.). Through the Spirit of God, it was able to confess the Lord Jesus (1 Cor 12:3). It was the “temple” in which dwelled the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 3:16). It expressed itself as a communion of love and established itself as a community through the variety of gifts and ministries bestowed by the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 12:12ff.), among which also appears the ministry conferred by ordination. At the same time, it was sent to proclaim the gospel throughout the world (Mt 28:19ff.) and to serve all humankind. As the “people of God” (Heb 4:9), it knew that it could rely on the promises* made to the Fathers of the old covenant (see Rom 11:18) and understood itself as traversing the ages toward the eschatological goal that had been assigned to it (see Heb 13:14).

According to the creed of Nicaea-Constantinople, the marks (“notes”) of the Church are these: unity, conferred on it by the will of God who calls it through Christ in the Holy Spirit, as people of God over the ages, despite all sectarian divergences and cultural disparities, but also as a communion of the living and the dead; sanctity, which God grants it, despite its sins*, by daily forgiving and renewing it; catholicity, as the qualitative fullness of salvation that is offered to it and to all creation* and that confers on it, in a more quantitative sense, its saving meaning for all mankind; and it is apostolic because it is founded on the testimony and the ministry of the apostles and because it is sent into the world as messenger of the kingdom of God. The distinctive signs of the Church, which are simultaneously its constituent elements, are the preaching of the gospel in faithfulness to Christ and the celebration of the sacraments—particularly the Communion of the Lord (the Eucharist) and Baptism—in accordance with their original institution. The Church as eucharistic communion is first of all a local community, but it also exists at a regional and a universal level. It is the place and the very communication of salvation in Christ, which does not by any means exclude the possibility of salvation outside the Church.

This Church of the confession of faith, the “idea” of which we have just described, existed de facto in a concrete and empirical form and was therefore stamped with the rupture of sin. The Church, as communion of all the baptized, is a mixture (“corpus permixtum”) made up of those who, in their heart* and in their life, follow the call addressed to them in Baptism and of those who do not live that calling. The numerous intermediate degrees between these two choices make any division that claims to be definitive impossible (Mt 13:24ff.) and pose the real problem of the multitudinist Church. The imperfection of the empirical Church is also expressed in sectarian divisions that reflect not only a legitimate diversity but also a deformation of the single Christian truth and the inevitable resulting quarrels. The ecumenical movement has shown, however, that the predicates “true” or “false” cannot unequivocally be attributed to one sectarian Church or another.

As the original witness of the apostles grew more distant in time and the Church was confronted with new cultural, existential, and political situations, the problem of a possible historical deviation in relation to the single truth was posed ever more acutely. At the same time, the growth of the Church made its unity a question of survival. From the time of the primitive Church, these two factors brought about the creation of institutions designed to make it possible for Christianity to remain in the truth and to continue to live in communion. It was this concern that gave rise to the canon* of Scripture, the confession of faith (along with the dogmatic decisions made by the later Church), and church structures (particularly the episcopacy and synods or councils). Added to this is the fact that institutions are, generally speaking, indispensable for the establishment of rules of common conduct and the definition of laws that a living community might accept in order to forestall dissensions that might threaten its existence. The traditional distinction between institutions of divine law (the sacraments, the ministry) and institutions of human law holds in this respect only relative value, insofar as we must also deal with the question of their respective justifications and their concrete limits.

This problem is expressed in a particularly acute form in the question, also under debate in the ecumenical movement, of the ministry of the Church. The ministry now conferred by ordination is not attested in that form in the New Testament, and even less may it be said that it was instituted by Jesus of Nazareth. This is true for the ministry of the preaching of the Word and the administration of the sacraments, which the Lutheran tradition considers to have been instituted by God (CA V), as well as for the episcopal structure of Orthodox and Catholic conceptions. Prefigurations of the pastoral ministry can of course be found in the New Testament, with the apostles and their successors responsible for teaching and practical life within their community, but this duty was not yet linked to any power to administer the sacraments. On the other hand, at least in Pauline communities, we encounter a multiplicity of services and titles that already suggest a certain degree of structural differentiation. But if theology is justified in relating to Christ himself the later institution of a church ministry conferred by ordination, this is because it judges that there took place in history a development in accordance with Christ's intentions, a development that the Lord of the Church placed at His service. This is precisely what makes it impossible to distinguish, in the analysis, between a "divine" law and a "human" law. But this means, above all, that the reality of the ministry, as it has developed in the course of history, does not have the fundamental importance for the Church that must be recognized in the preaching of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments. The same observation applies to the apostolic succession of bishops—which certainly represents an appropriate sign but can be neither a guarantee nor a condition of validity* for ministries (Lima, Porvoo)—and to the historical form of the papacy—whose role, dogmatically established by the two Vatican councils, still constitutes an obstacle among Churches. What can be said on this subject is that there must necessarily be a specific ministry on the local level, endowed with particular competence in matters of doctrine, the administration of the sacraments, and church unity, thereby guaranteeing the common exercise of gifts and duties. And if it is appropriate for such a body to exist regionally and universally, it is nonetheless necessary that this ministry, insofar as it is responsible for problems of doctrine and discipline, be bound on the local, regional, and universal levels to synods and councils that are also open (in accordance with the Protestant approach) to members of the Church who are not ordained. This is why one or another historical form the ministry may have assumed cannot be erected into a sine qua non for church unity and true churchliness. It is of course necessary, particularly on the universal level, to find forms of common decision making for the different Churches, and the question of a universal ministry for church unity must be taken into consideration, even in the Protestant perspective. But the ecumenical model, which views church unity as a conciliar communion bringing together Churches that are different both confessionally and culturally, starts in any event from the principle that differences in structure are not an obstacle to such a communion, as long as the duty of a regional episkopè is properly exercised in these Churches, in one way or another. It is also necessary to arrive at a fundamental consensus on matters of faith and doctrine as well as on the understanding of the sacraments. This, however, does not preclude possible divergences in dogmatic formulations. Finally, it is necessary that the perfect communion of Churches, as realized at the table of the Lord, also be confirmed in the face of the problems of the world today, in a common responsibility of service and love.

5. Ethical and Sociological Aspects

If an understanding of the Church involves ethical aspects, this is not only in the sense that its members are regenerated in the Holy Spirit and called to a new life in love and responsibility. The Church itself should also be seen as the (collective) subject of ethically responsible action. This aspect of its reality is revealed, both internally and externally, in the manner in which it determines and manages its structures as well as in the way in which, by the positions it takes and its collective conduct, it assumes or evades its responsibilities. The oft-raised topics of "democracy*" and "bureaucracy" in the Church raise questions about large areas of church reality where the mode of operation, as set in place by human beings, may or may not be faithful to the essence lying behind that reality. The truth assigned to the Church is of course, in itself, inviolable and thus cannot depend on a democratic decision. But the search for relevant and current forms of expression, as well as the manner of assuming its responsibilities in preaching and particularly of choosing its leaders in one area or another (e.g., bishops)—all these together, for a Church that understands itself as the people of God, call for democratic procedures and structures (synod).

It is also by an ethical choice that the Church decides how it will assume its task in society and what structures should be chosen for that purpose. In the course of its history the Church gradually came to exercise a share of responsibility over the social body as a whole, in particular with the Constantinian turn, which played a fundamental role, especially for the medieval order. In modern times the process of secularization* has brought about a retreat of the Church in public life, and in some European countries Church members now make up only a minority of the population. Any theocratic pretensions of the Church toward society would therefore not only be subject to challenge on dogmatic and ethical grounds but also anachronistic. Freedom of opinion and conscience must remain guaranteed to citizens. According to the functionalist-pluralist theory of society (Luhmann), religion and the Church that “administers” are there to respond to a limited number of needs that still exist in modern society (“control over contingency”). The Church is not, however, ready to confine itself to that role. Rather, it sees its prophetic and diaconal mission to be that of affirming God’s goodwill toward all people: by giving an orientation to human endeavor, by drawing attention to error, and by offering charitable assistance. The Church cannot give up this mandate, even when official society wishes to challenge it, as might be the case, for example, in modern dictatorships. It is in just this perspective that the relation between Church* and state must also be considered. Starting from the principle of separation between these two orders, a principle in accordance both with the understanding the Church has of itself and with the modern idea of a state free of any credo, one might consider a structure that would facilitate an encounter between the Church and those in secular society without however subjecting the Church to legal supervision. In this respect the legal model of the “corporate person subject to public law” would, from the Church’s standpoint, provide a better basis than that of an institution governed by private law. For a modern society that is confronted with many dangers, this would also be an opportunity to take into account, through a certain number of structural adjustments and contractual rules, the contribution of the Church to the preparation of a future worthy of humankind.

- Lumen Gentium, Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 21 November 1964.
- Baptême, eucharistie, ministère* (texte de convergence de Foi et Constitution), Paris, 1982.
- ♦ Y. Congar (1941), Esquisse du mystère de l’Église, Paris (2nd Ed. 1966).
- L. Cerfaux (1942), La théologie de l’Église suivant saint Paul, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1953), Méditation sur l’Église, Paris.
- O. Semmelroth (1953), Die Kirche als Ursakrament, Frankfurt (2nd Ed. 1963).
- T. F. Torrance (1955), Royal Priesthood, Edinburgh.
- K. Barth (1964), L’Église, Geneva.
- H. Mühlen (1964), Una Mystica Persona: Die Kirche als das Mysterium der Identität des heiligen Geistes in Christus und

- den Christen—eine Person in vielen Personen*, Munich-Paderborn-Vienna (Rev. Ed. 1967).
- H. Rahner (1964), Symbole der Kirche: Die Ekklesiologie der Väter, Salzburg.
- H. Küng (1967), Die Kirche, Fribourg.
- N. Nissiotis (1968), Die Theologie der Ostkirchen im oekumenischen Dialog: Kirche und Welt in orthodoxer Sicht, Stuttgart.
- L. Bouyer (1970), L’Église de Dieu, Corps du Christ et temple de l’Esprit, Paris.
- MySal* (1972), IV/1 (contributions by N. Füglistler, H. Schlier, W. Beinert, H. Fries, O. Semmelroth and Y. Congar).
- MySal* (1973), IV/2 (contributions by P. Huizing and B. Dupuy).
- Y. Congar (1975), Un peuple messianique, salut et libération, Paris.
- J. Moltmann (1975), Die Kirche in der Kraft des Geistes, Munich.
- W. Pannenberg (1977), Ethik und Ekklesiologie, Göttingen.
- U. Kühn (1980), Kirche, HST 10, Gütersloh (2nd Ed. 1990).
- J. Zizioulas (1981), L’être ecclésial, Geneva.
- F. Refoulé and B. Lauret (Ed.) (1983), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, vol. III, Dogmatique 2 (2nd Ed. 1993) (contributions by J. Hoffmann, H. Legrand, and J.-M. Tillard), Paris.
- A. Houtepen (1984), People of God, London.
- G. Martelet (1984–90), Deux mille ans d’Église en question, 3 vols., Paris.
- H. Döring (1986), Grundriss der Ekklesiologie, Darmstadt.
- J.-M. Tillard (1987), Église d’Églises, CFi 143.
- K. Berger et al. (1988), “Kirche,” TRE 18, 198–344 (bibl.).
- E. Herms (1990), Erfahrbare Kirche: Beiträge zur Ekklesiologie, Tübingen.
- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie 3, Göttingen, 13–567.
- A. Birmelé (1995), “Église,” in P. Gisel (Ed.), Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Geneva-Paris, 483–99.
- A. Birmelé, J. Terme (Ed.) (1995), Accords et dialogues œcuméniques, Paris, 81–117 (“L’Église de Jésus-Christ: La contribution des Églises issues de la Réforme”).
- B. Forte (1995), La Chiesa della Trinità, Rome.
- K. Rahner (1995), Selbstvollzug der Kirche, SW 19, Düsseldorf-Fribourg.
- J.-M. Tillard (1995), L’Église locale, CFi 191.
- O. González de Cardedal (1997), La entraña del cristianismo, Salamanca, 247–300, 683–811, and passim.

ULRICH KÜHN

See also Authority; Baptism; Being; Church and State; Communion; Council; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Eucharist; Gospels; Government, Church; Hierarchy; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility; Local Church; Magisterium; Ministry; Priesthood; Regional Church; Sacrament; Schism; Structures, Ecclesial; Synod; Unity of the Church; Word of God

Church and State

According to the Bible*, God* alone is the sovereign master of humanity, of its peoples and history*. All power proceeds from him (Jn 19:11; Rom 13:1), to be placed at the service of justice* and peace*. Such is Caesar's limited field of action, by comparison to God's, which is virtually limitless (Mt 22:21). Conscience*, truth*, and meaning are a matter for God alone. The power that punishes crime and inclines to good* is "the servant of God" (Rom 13:4), and 1 Pt 2:13–15 exhorts us to obey "every human institution" in all conscience. But when power forsakes the order established by God and declares itself divine, "We must obey God rather than men" (Acts 5:29). When power deifies itself, it must be met with resistance and condemnation (see Rev 13:7–18). The issue of the relations between Church and state is raised by the way in which the Christian community understands its role in society and by the degree of control which the state attempts to exert over religious life. These relations may take the form of distinction or interpenetration, of hostile separation or of cooperation.

1. From Persecution to Interpenetration

a) Antiquity. Until 313 Christianity was a religio illicita. The apologists of the second and third centuries pleaded that Christians should have the mere right to exist. Tertullian demanded libertas religionis (see Apologeticum 24, 6; Ad Scapulam 2, 2) for Christians within the pagan state, declaring their loyalty toward the empire. The persecutions of Decius (250), Valerian (257), Diocletian (303–4), and Galerius (305–11) attempted, on a huge scale but without success, to put a halt to the Christian phenomenon. Constantine and Licinius (Milan, 313) gave Christians the freedom to honor the supreme deity in accordance with their rites, individually and as a collective body. Constantine entrusted the bishops* with civil and judicial responsibilities and took initiatives to resolve the Donatist and Arian crises by calling the councils* of Arles (314) and Nicaea* (325). He exiled the bishops who were deposed and so was born the confusion between the political and ecclesiastical spheres. At the same time, Eusebius of Caesarea developed a political* theology* according to which the emperor had received from God the mission of governing the Church* as a "common bishop" or "external bishop." Henceforward the interpenetration of political and ecclesiastical power got under way. Theodosius I would soon impose the Nicene faith* on the whole empire (380).

The Byzantine "monist" model persisted until 1453, kept up in the state Orthodox churches. The autocephalous churches tended to identify themselves with one nation ("phyletism"). The monarch led the church, which was inseparable from the political establishment, leaving the bishops to administer the sacraments* and preach* dogma*.

In the West there was from the fourth century an emphasis on the distinction between the different spheres of activity. Ambrose* of Milan made it clear to Theodosius that he was "in the Church and not above the Church" (Ep. 20, 36). Pope* Gelasius I summarized in a celebrated phrase the necessary distinction between auctoritas sacerdotale and potestas imperiale (Ep. ad Anastasium), both having their origins in God. There were now two centers in what had become a Christian society. Thus arose the "dualist" model—the dialectic between temporal power and spiritual power—characteristic of the West.

b) The Middle Ages. The Germanic kingdoms held that the Church's property and its ministers were at the disposal of the sovereign. In the case of the Franks and the Visigoths in Spain, the king, consecrated by unction, appointed the bishops, who were thus instruments of government.

Alcuin suggested to Charlemagne that he was the new David. He himself wrote to the pope telling him that he should confine himself to prayer*. The supervision of christianitas was the king's affair. Under the successors of Louis the Pious, however, the divided imperial power began to crumble, and the Frankish bishops assumed the role of the nation's conscience (council of Metz, 859).

During the age of feudalism, bishops and abbots were chosen by their overlords, who conferred on them pastoral responsibility (officium) along with temporal remuneration (beneficium). This "secularization*" of the hierarchy* resulted in a corrupt attitude to ecclesiastical office (simony) and a decline in the morals of the clergy (Nicolaitanism). In the wake of the monastic reforms of Cluny and Gorze, the forces of renewal became centered on the papacy from Leo IX (1073–54) onward, culminating in the initiatives of Gregory VII. The “Gregorian reform” marked the turning point of the Middle Ages. In the name of libertas Ecclesiae, it fought for the freedom* of investiture, a right obtained with the empire in the concordat of Worms (1122) and with the major Western monarchies in similar agreements. Elections were to be free, and the temporal powers would now confer only the beneficium. The hierarchical Church once again presented itself as independent of political power and frequently in opposition to it. From the eighth century, the papacy headed a state (the Patrimony of Saint Peter) that was intended to guarantee its independence.

With its two recognized heads, Western Christianity threw itself between 1150 and 1300 into a power struggle between Sacerdotium and Regnum that concluded in the papacy’s favor. From Innocent III (1198–1216) to Boniface VIII (1294–1303), the papacy was at the height of its temporal influence. It upheld the right of the spiritual power to have control over the temporal power and to intervene as required (occasionaliter) when the latter failed in its responsibilities (ratione peccati). The theory of “direct power,” which would come to the fore in the texts of Boniface VIII (see the bull Unam Sanctam, 1302), asserted that the pope, as vicar of Christ*, was the agent of his power in both the temporal and the spiritual orders.

The “exile in Avignon” (1305–76) and the ruptures of the Great Schism* (1378–1417) resulted in a strengthening of the power of Christian monarchs. Some theorists, inspired by William of Ockham, handed over to temporal power the task of ensuring Christian unity. In England, Wycliffe proposed the king as the head of the national church. In the 15th century, “nation” states wrung increasingly extensive concessions from the papacy regarding the nomination of bishops, such as the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges in 1438 and, later, the Concordat of Bologna (1516).

c) Reformations and Confessionalism. In this context, the Lutheran, Calvinist, and Anglican Reformations offered new conceptions of the relations between Church and state. Luther* envisaged a total separation between the “temporal kingdom,” devoted to maintaining society within the law*, but without significance in terms of redemption, and the “spiritual kingdom” governed solely by the Word* of God and the gifts of the Holy* Spirit, but with no bearing on the temporal order. The prince was responsible for calling synods* and for ensuring the purity of the faith. The Church, which was “spiritual,” existed in seclusion in the midst of a political community, under the orders of the prince. A secularization of the ecclesiastical institution is visible here, associated with a new sacralization of temporal power. Protestant law, as represented by Samuel Pufendorf, would state that the Church had legal existence only by virtue of the rights that the prince graciously conceded to it. In the Holy Roman Empire the system of the denominational state (Lutheran, Reformed, or Catholic) held sway from 1555 to 1806, according to the principle of cuius regio eius religio (“of which region, of that religion”). The Anglican Reformation placed the national Church under the dominance of the king.

Catholic rulers had obtained ecclesiastical rights by means of papal concessions. From the 16th century, Spain and Portugal enjoyed a right of patronage—in other words, of complete control over ecclesiastical life—in their colonies in Latin America, the Indies, and the Philippines. In Europe rulers had the right of veto (placet) over documents from Rome and heard all appeals against ecclesiastical jurisdiction* on “appeal ab abusu.” In the Germanic countries Febronianism (a movement with episcopalian tendencies, comparable to Gallicanism*) intensified the desire for withdrawal into national churches. In Austria, Joseph II suppressed the convents and confraternities and imposed scrupulous regulation of worship* and religious teaching. During the Enlightenment period, ecclesiastical institutions were tolerated as long as they contributed to cohesion and social control, in other words, to the aims of political power.

In this context a new canonical discipline evolved: “ecclesiastical public law.” Fostered by the school of Würzburg, it drew on a category already employed by Bellarmine* in the 16th century to the effect that the Church was a society governed by its own law that did not derive from that of the state. Its sphere of competence was distinct and autonomous from the state’s. In joint matters, however, the two powers, in the service of the same people, were required to cooperate.

2. Between State Neutrality and Hostility

a) The American and French Revolutions. The American and French Revolutions brought to an end the age-old interpenetration between the two powers of Church and state. In the United States a new model came into being. The First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1791) prohibited the making of any law concerning the establishment of religion or forbidding its free exercise. America advocated the liberty of citizens and the absolute neutrality of the state in matters of religion. In France the Declaration of the Rights of Man of 1789 granted freedom for all “opinions, even in religion” (art. 10). The Convention nonetheless attempted to nationalize the Church by imposing on it the unilateral legislation of the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1790). The philosophy of Napoleon Bonaparte's Concordat (1801) and of the Organic Articles relating to the "recognized religions" (Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish) was that religion, being useful for social control, should be regulated and remunerated by the state.

b) 19th-Century Nostalgia for the Confessional State. Under the aegis of ultramontanism, the papacy again became the emotive center of the Catholic world, while the regalism of previous centuries lived on in the Catholic states, both in Europe and in Latin America.

Gregory XVI and Pius IX condemned liberal thinking on religious freedom*, rationalism*, indifference, and the separation of Church and state (see Syllabus, 1864). Leo XIII regarded Church and state as distinct but called to peaceful cooperation. From 1860, Church public law conceptualized the relationship between Church and state as one between "two legally perfect societies." The Church hoped to preserve its independence by presenting itself, like the state, as a society in possession of all the elements necessary to its mission,* and it insisted on its freedom as an institution. Some authors have taken this model as the basis for a theory of the "indirect power of the Church in temporalibus."

In the 20th century no further right of episcopal presentation or nomination was to be granted to civil authorities, with the exception of Spain in 1941. The concordats signed by Pius IX approved the dual principle of the Church's autonomy in its own field and of collaboration with states in matters referred to as mixed, such as marriage* legislation, religious education in state schools, and religious assistance to armies, prisons, and hospitals. The creation of the Vatican City state by the Lateran Accords (1929) was intended to ensure the temporal independence of the Holy See.

c) Hostile Divisions. A violent anticlerical backlash brought about a unilateral breaking off of the traditional links between Church and state in Catholic countries such as France (1905), Portugal (1910), Mexico (1910), and republican Spain (1931). The concordats with fascist Italy (1929) and Nazi Germany (1933) did not prevent Pius XI from condemning these two ideologies, with Redemptor hominis and Mit brennender Sorge (1937), respectively.

From 1917 in the Soviet Union and then after 1945 in its European satellites and in Asian and African Communist countries, the Churches were faced with a new type of state characterized by an antireligious ideology. These countries set out in their constitutions the principle of a dual separation between Church and state and between the Church and education, established on 23 January 1918 by the Decree of the Soviet of the Commissars of the People. They maintained the freedom of conscience and worship at the same time as that of antireligious propaganda. The state imposed dialectical materialism as its official philosophy and discriminated against professed believers. China stipulated further that no religious community should receive any order from abroad (1949), leading to the creation in 1957 of the Patriotic Catholic Association, with no links to Rome*. Communist Albania claimed the distinction of being the first entirely atheist state in the world. The fall of Communism in Central and Eastern Europe in 1989 and 1990 led these countries to adopt liberal principles concerning religious freedom.

d) The Right to Religious Freedom. Since 1945 the principle of religious freedom has come to the fore in the constitutions of democratic states and international agreements. In 1948 and again in 1961, the Ecumenical Council of Churches* adopted a declaration on religious freedom that envisaged it as a right deriving from the dignity of the person*, a right whose effective exercise should be guaranteed by the state. At Vatican II (1962–65), the Catholic Church in turn, with the declaration Dignitatis humanae, moved from a moral to a legal conception of this right and acknowledged that the state must guarantee citizens and their religious communities the freedom necessary for the exercise of the various personal, family, educational, cultural, and associative aspects of religious faith, within the limits implied by the maintenance of order, health, public morality, and the rights of third parties (DH 7). DH 13 asserted that the freedom of the Church as a social group was sufficiently guaranteed when the common right to religious freedom was ensured. It further reiterated that the Church's innate divine right to liberty was the "fundamental principle of the Church's relations with public authority and the whole civil order." The constitution Gaudium et spes (76, 2–3) reaffirmed the reciprocal autonomy and cooperation necessary between Church and state.

3. Current Models

These remain marked by the tensions of the past.

a) Persecution. There are still in existence religious regimes that prohibit the exercise of other religions (such as Saudi Arabia) or that discriminate against their adherents. Similarly, some officially atheist states limit religious freedom.

b) State Churches. The "established churches," such as the Church of England or the Lutheran Churches in Scandinavia, are administered by the civil legislature and executive. Their status does not, however, imply any limiting of the religious freedom of other denominations. The Greek Orthodox Church and the Reformed Churches in some cantons of Switzerland enjoy the status of churches protected and supervised by the state.

c) Institutional Separation. In the United States, France (since the law of separation of 1905), and the Netherlands (since 1982), the Churches now have a status only in private law.

d) Institutional Separation and Cooperation. In Ireland the Church runs the education system. In the Latin countries, cooperation is defined by concordat: in Portugal (since 1940), in Spain (1976–78), and in Italy (1984). Germany, Austria, and most of the cantons of Switzerland exhibit the most developed form of institutional cooperation, guaranteed by the constitution and augmented by concordats or bilateral agreements with the various denominations. The churches are recognized as corporations under public law, with the power to levy taxes on their members.

e) Recognized Religions. The French system of 1801 survives in the legislation concerning religions in Belgium and Luxembourg, and also in Alsace and Moselle in France, where the Concordat of Napoleon is still current.

f) The International Character of the Holy See. The Holy See—rather than the Vatican state—is active as either a member or an observer in the international organizations of the United Nations system. It also takes part in international conferences and is a signatory to numerous international conventions while emphasizing its unique character. The Catholic Church participates in relations with the international community by virtue of its own constitution as a transnational body with supreme power in its own domain and maintains relations with states on a basis of judicial parity. The international position of the Holy See, a product of history and of the Church's definition of itself as a society sui iuris, autonomous and independent of any temporal power, is consistent with the model of relations between Church and state that the Catholic Church has defended over the centuries.

- J.B. Lo Grasso (1940), Ecclesia et Status: Fontes selecti, Rome (2nd Ed., 1952).
- ◆ A. Ottaviani (1925), Institutiones Iuris Publici ecclesiastici, 2 vols., Vatican (4th Ed., 1958, 1960).
- H. Rahner (1964), L'Église et l'État dans le christianisme primitif, Paris.
- G. Barberini (1973), Stati socialisti e confessioni religiose, Milan.
- E.R. Huber, W. Huber (I 1973, II 1976, III 1983, IV 1988), Staat und Kirche im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, Berlin.
- J. Listl (1978), Kirche und Staat in der neueren katholischen Kirchenrechtswissenschaft, Berlin.
- L. Spinelli (1979), Libertas Ecclesiae, Milan.
- J. Térán-Dutari (Ed.) (1980), Simposio sudamericano-alemán sobre Iglesia y Estado, Quito.
- R. Minnerath (1982a), Le droit de l'Église à la liberté. Du Syllabus à Vatican II, Paris; (1982b), L'Église et les États concordataires (1846–1981), Paris.
- R. Minnerath (1986), "Église et État dans l'Europe des Douze," ConscLib 32, 11–143.
- M. Pacaut (1988), La théocratie: L'Église et le pouvoir au Moyen Age, Paris.
- L. Bressan (1989), La libertà religiosa nel diritto internazionale, Padua.
- R.M. Grant et al. (1989), "Kirche und Staat," TRE 18, 354–405.
- J.-B. d'Onorio (Ed.) (1989), Le Saint-Siège dans les relations internationales, Paris.
- J.-B. d'Onorio (Ed.) (1991), La liberté religieuse dans le monde, Paris.
- Coll. (1991a), "La liberté religieuse dans les pays musulmans," ConscLib 41, 7–109.
- Coll. (1991b), "La liberté religieuse en Europe de l'Est," ConscLib 42, 36–127.
- Coll. (1992), "La liberté religieuse en Afrique," ConscLib 43, 17–107.
- Coll. (1993), "La liberté religieuse en Amérique latine," ConscLib 45, 21–113.
- Coll. (1994), "La liberté religieuse dans le Pacifique Sud," ConscLib 47, 36–119.
- Revue européenne des relations Églises-État* (1994–), Louvain.

ROLAND MINNERATH

See also Authority; Church; Government, Church; Secularization; Society

Circumincession

In Trinitarian theology*, circumincession expresses the dwelling of the persons* of the Trinity* in one another as well as their mutual gift. In Christology, it means the interpenetration of divine and human natures in the person of Christ* Jesus*.

a) Biblical Basis and Early Patristic Development. It is essentially in the Johannine* writings that the ideas of dwelling and mutual gift are found, for example, “Believe me that I am in the Father and the Father is in me” (Jn 14:11). Christian soteriology is presented as entry into the relation that unites the Father, the Son, and the Holy* Spirit: “In that day you will know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you” (Jn 14:20) or “By this we know that we abide in him and he in us, because he has given us of his Spirit” (1 Jn 4:13).

These passages are of course focused on the unity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in action. But this unity implicitly refers to the unity of being*, and it is in this sense that the Fathers* of the Church* understood it. The point of departure for thinking in this area was the relation between Father and Son:

The Father is in the Son because the Son proceeds from him. The Son is in the Father, because he derives from no other his being as Son (Hilary*, Trin. 3. 4; CChr.SL 62. 25). Hence, the Father and the Son dwell in one another and give themselves to one another because they are consubstantial* (Cyril* of Alexandria; PG 74. 244c). With the development of Trinitarian theology, assertions concerning the Father and the Son were extended to the Three Persons: The true God* is a Trinity by persons, One by nature. Through this natural unity, the Father is entirely in the Son and the Holy Spirit, and the Son is entirely in the Father and the Holy Spirit, just as the Holy Spirit is entirely in the Father and the Son. No one among them is external to the others (Fulgencius of Ruspina, De fide ad Petrum 4, CChr.SL 91A. 714).

b) Greek Theology. Until the seventh century, the fathers of the church had no special term for the mutual indwelling and the gift of the Three Persons. In the Greek world, christological controversies fostered the introduction of a specific vocabulary with the verb perikhôrêô and the noun perikhôrêsis. Gregory* of Nazianzus introduced the verb to explain that the unity of the two natures in Christ has the effect that what is particular to God can be attributed to human beings and vice versa: this is known as the communication of idioms* (Ep. 101. 31; SC 208. 48). The interpenetration of the two natures establishes the exchange of properties. Maximus* the Confessor used this notion and introduced the noun. Perikhôrêsis thus designates in the person of Christ the movement of penetration of divine nature into (eis) or toward (pros) human nature. With pseudo-Cyril in the late seventh century, the notion entered into the domain of being. So, Perikhôrêsis designated the penetration of human nature by divine nature within the hypostatic* union. The unity of the person established the coinherence or perikhôrêsis of the two natures (Trin 24; PG 77. 1165cd).

The same writer introduced the vocabulary into Trinitarian theology: Other words related to Christ concern the perikhôrêsis of the persons one in the other, as, “I am in the Father and the Father is in me” (Jn 15:16) (Trin 23; PG 77. 1164b).

Perikhôrêsis thus expresses the union of the three persons in a single essence (Trin 10). They are a single God, for each is in the two others and each gives himself to the two others. This doctrine was taken up by John of Damascus (Fid. 1. 8; Kotter) and by later Greek theology. It made it possible to avoid the two pitfalls of all Trinitarian theology: the separation of the three persons (Arianism*, tritheism*) or their confusion (modalism*). Moreover, the perikhôrêsis of the two natures in Christ is based on that of the three persons of the Trinity (John of Damascus, Fid. 3. 7; Kotter 2. 126).

c) Latin Theology. In the 12th century, the notion of indwelling was taken up again in Trinitarian theology on the basis of the Scriptures* and the Latin Fathers, without recourse to a technical term. The term circumincessio was, however, introduced into theological vocabulary with the translation of De fide of John of Damascus by Burgundio of Pisa in 1153–54, although Peter Lombard, who cited it, did not adopt the word (Sentences 1. 19. 4). It did not appear until the following century, in Alexander of Halès (†1245), in reference to works by Peter Lombard and John of Damascus (In Sent. 1. 19. q. 2).

After Alexander of Hales, the term “circumincession” became common, first in the Franciscan school, then among other theologians, although it did not gain universal currency. Writers also continued to present the notion of indwelling without using the term, for example, Thomas* Aquinas (ST Ia, q. 42, a. 5) and the Council of Florence* (Decree of Union with the Jacobites, 1442; bull Cantate domino, DS 1330).

Independently of Trinitarian theology, the concept of circumincession appeared in Christology in Albert* the Great (In Dyon. ep. 4; Simon 489, 492). It underwent little development. The spelling circuminsessio is found from the late 13th century both in Trinitarian theology (Durand de Saint-Pourçain, In Sent. 1. 19) and in Christology (Henry of Ghent, Quodlibet 13). This is due to the “French” pronunciation of Latin, in which ce and se are identical.

The notion of circumincession has also made some mark in the 20th century in the Trinitarian anthropology* of J. Monchanin (1895–1957), according to whom “we must live in circumincession with our brothers.” (See in particular Théologie et spiritualité missionnaires; Paris, 1985.)

- A. Deneffe (1923), “Perichoresis, circumincessio, circuminsessio: Eine terminologische Untersuchung,” ZKTh 47, 497–532.
- G.L. Prestige (1936), God in Patristic Thought, London.
- M. Schmaus (1963), “Perichorese,” LThK2 8, 274–76.
- P. Stemmer (1983), “Perichorese: Zur Geschichte eines Begriffs,” ABG 27, 9–55.
- V. Harisson (1991), “Perichoresis in the Greek Fathers,” SVTQ 35, 53–65.

JACQUES FANTINO

See also Consubstantial; Salvation

City

I. Old Testament

The word “city” in the biblical context does not have the resonance given to it by Greco-Roman civilization. It refers solely to the urban phenomenon. It designates the political and social representation of a people* through the form of authority that is exercised in a visible way (institutions, monuments, symbols) in the socioeconomic form of a city. The Hebrew word ‘ir, the one most frequently used (1,087 times), has generally been translated into Greek by polis, but it simply means “town.” We also find qireyâh (from qîr; “wall,” with place-names using qireyat) and the metonymic use of she‘arîm (“doors”: Ex 20:10; Dt 5:14), which imply the existence of walls. These walls, and the towns they protected, existed in Canaan long before the history* of Israel* began.

1. Before the Monarchy

Unlike many civilizations, Israel did not attribute its existence as a people to the “foundation” of a city. It was a “wandering Aramean” and not a founding hero whom it recognized as “father” (Dt 26:5). The narratives* of origin and the patriarchal cycles give the impression of an identity acquired at the price of a negative view of the world of cities. The first city to appear in the Bible* is the city of Enoch built by Cain the murderer (Gn 4:17); and the Babel episode (Gn 11) denounces humankind’s attempt to “make a name for ourselves” against God by building “a city and a tower.” In this perspective, no city can claim to be the center or the model of the world*. The division of land between Abram and his nephew Lot (Gn 13:11ff.) clearly illustrates a fundamental choice: Lot chooses to live “among the cities” and Abram “in the land of Canaan” (Gn 13:12). The good choice is made by the one who remains apart from the cities and their dangers (as evidenced by Sodom and Gomorrah). From the outset the history of Israel is founded on an experience of displacement—a displacement, nevertheless, that looks toward the fulfillment of a promise* and is marked by attempts to settle in a land.

The history of the conquest, as narrated in Joshua, preserves this negative vision. The tales of the capture of cities such as Jericho and Ai involve the total destruction of the city in question (Jos 6:20f., 8:28). This signifies a great suspicion of these rich and idolatrous city-states of Canaan (Ez 16:49). Deuteronomy expresses another point of view in recognizing that Israel has found a “land that he swore to your fathers . . . with great and good cities that you [Israel] did not build” (Dt 6:10), and it formulates a set of laws adapted to urban communities. It is possible to conclude, particularly on the basis of Judges, that the Israelites gradually settled into the urban system of Canaan while neither creating new cities nor reestablishing old ones. Later, the view taken of very large pagan cities (Ez 27–28: Tyre; Jon 3:3, 4:11: Niniveh) did not always lack elements of admiration.

2. The Cities of Israel

a) The Power of the Kings. It was in fact on the basis of an already established city—Jerusalem*, capital of the Canaanite Jebusites—that David brought the city into the history of Israel (2 Sm 5:6–12). He seized a fortified city, and by installing the “house of the king” there he made of it “the city of David” (mentioned 22 times in Samuel and Kings: see also ark of the covenant*; royal sepulchres). He and his successors also provided the kingdom with a network of border cities (e.g., Beersheba). From then on the city became an indispensable element for the people under the monarchy. King Omri even replaced the first capital of the kingdom of the North, Tirzah, by the only genuinely new city, Samaria (1 Kgs 16:24). The Israelite city experienced the ambiguities of the institution of royalty: power and justice* rarely went together. Force ruled: the city was surrounded with solid ramparts (Is 22:9ff.)—according to Leviticus 25:31, this is the difference between a “city” and a “village”—and possibly with a citadel. It was thus able to shelter the inhabitants of the countryside in case of an invasion. It concentrated political power since it contained the palace of the king or of a governor and religious power since the Deuteronomic reform, in principle, limited this to a single sanctuary, the Temple* of Jerusalem alone. It held military (1 Kgs 9:22), administrative (scribes), and ritual (priests) personnel and fostered the growth of crafts and commercial activities (1 Kgs 10:15). Justice was put to the test in the city: the abuse of power and wealth created new conflicts that the Israel of the desert could not have imagined, and these can be seen in the survival of idolatrous cults* and conflicts between rich and poor. The religious and social order depended on the authority of the king. After the exile this authority was taken over by the priests of the Temple and groups of “elders” who dispensed justice at the “gates” of the city in the name of “Wisdom” (Prv 8:3, 31:23). It is difficult to tell to what extent the law* establishing “cities of refuge” (Nm 35:9ff.; Dt 19:1–13) was applied.

b) Dangers and the Promise. The prophets* perceived the painful ambiguity of the world of cities. Often of rural origin, devoted to the salvation* of the people, they denounced the perversion that led to ruin: the nadir of this perversion was represented by inequality (Am 3:9–15), arrogance (Is 9:8f.), and religious faithlessness (Hos 10:1–5). Transgression by a city was punished by its destruction by an enemy through starvation, massacre, and razing of its walls. The prophets proclaimed this in Samaria as in Jerusalem* and in the great capitals of the East. For them, there was only one city, Jerusalem. It could never be destroyed without one day being rebuilt (Ez 40; Zec 14). This current of belief in a sure and certain restoration (Is 1:26, 24:23, 48:35) was also reflected in poems, psalms*, and prophetic texts that exalted the “holy city” (Is 52:1).

II. New Testament

1. The Scene of the Proclamation

The synoptic Gospels* present Jesus* preaching in cities as well as villages. When he preached outside towns, it was to a public that had come from those towns to seek him out. He was not seen in Caesarea. In fact, he avoided cities (Mk 1:45) in order to forestall public demonstrations. Luke uses the word polis for cities such as Nazareth and Bethlehem (Lk 2:3f.), which were not “cities” in the political sense like the cities of the Decapolis, and Mark uses it for Capernaum (Mk 1:33). Jesus inveighed against the cities of Israel (Mt 11:20–24 and parallel passages) as well as Jerusalem (Mt 23:37 and parallel passages) as collective entities, in the manner of the prophets.

Integration into an urban world determined the early development of the apostolic mission* (Lk 10:1). In obtaining hospitality, as in preaching in the synagogue or the public square, the apostles found the city an essential component in the acceptance or rejection of the Good News (Acts 13–16). The routes of Paul’s missionary journey’s passed among the great cities of the “diaspora,” out of which Paul himself had come, enjoying the rights of a Roman citizen as a native of Tarsus. It was in cities that “churches” were organized by “elders” (Acts 15:23; Ti 1:5). This universe of Greco-Roman cities had a broad influence on the way of life and the institutions of the emerging Church, particularly on their combination of communitarian and hierarchical aspects.

2. The Image of the City

Several lines of interpretation take shape on the basis of the always ambiguous image of the city: 1) a traditional line of hostility to the “city” as a place that is closed off to God and that fosters human pride. Jesus laments over the cities of the lake: Bethsaida, Chorazin, and Capernaum (Lk 10:12–15). The “great city” of Revelation 16:19 is doomed to destruction with all the other “cities of the nations,” whereas the “holy city, the new Jerusalem” (Rev 21:1) is not a human work* but comes from God. 2) A new line of interpretation appears in the letter to the Ephesians. Israel is represented there as a city that has the power to grant citizenship to new inhabitants. Excluded from citizenship of Israel (i.e., because they lack circumcision), Gentiles can become instead “fellow citizens” of the “saints” (Eph 2:11f.) of the new community saved by Christ*. “Legal” status takes precedence over ethnic or geographical situation and makes possible the beginnings of thinking about universality. 3) The richest line of interpretation for ecclesial tradition* is set out in the letter to the Hebrews, which speaks of the journey of the people of God toward the heavenly city. The Christian has no “permanent city” but seeks a “city to come” (Heb 13:14), which Abraham had already hoped for (Heb 11:10). Christians can also play a role in history* without subordinating themselves to the authorities, as was proved by the attitude of Christians loyal to the structures of the Roman world. The city of which God is the architect (Heb 11:10) and the “constitution” (politeuma) that Philippians 3:20 sets in heaven (“our citizenship is in heaven”) make possible a radical challenge to all secular appetites and powers as well as to theocratic pretensions. This theology* of the “two cities” was to have a long-lasting legacy.

- R. de Vaux (1967), Institutions de l'Ancien Testament I et II, Paris.
- Colloque de Cartigny (1983), La ville dans le Proche-Orient ancien. Cahiers du CEPOA 1, Louvain.
- G. A. London (1992), “Tells: City Center or Home?,” Eretz Israel 23, 71–79.
- C. H. J. de Geus (1993), “Of Tribes and Towns: The Historical Development of the Israelite City,” ErIs 24, 70–76.
- M. Beaudry (1994), “L’urbanisation à l’époque du Fer,” in J.-C. Petit (Ed.), Où demeures-tu? La maison depuis le monde biblique: En hommage au Pr G. Couturier, Montreal, 31–51.

XAVIER DURAND

See also Authority; Jerusalem; Kingdom of God; People of God; Political Theology; Prophet and Prophecy; Temple

Clarembald of Arras. See Chartres, School of

Clement of Alexandria. See Alexandria, School of

Clement of Rome. See Apostolic Fathers

Cleric

Klèros, which in biblical Greek means “share,” “legacy,” took on a religious nuance in Philo: God* is the “share” of his people* and the people is the “share” of God. The idea was adopted by Christians and became for them a permanent tradition*. In the second and third centuries, a distinction between clergy and laity* appeared, the clergy being those in the Christian community who were especially attached to the service of God. The expression was to retain a broader and somewhat vague sense, designating more than the principal ordained ministries*. In the Roman-Frankish liturgy, the Supplement to the Gregorian Sacramentary contains a rite of tonsure to “make a cleric,” distinct from ordination* to any ministry (Deshusses ed. I, 417).

As the canonists and theologians of the Middle Ages saw it, all the baptized benefited from the Christian cult*, and their participation consisted of joining in without being its performers in the strict sense. The public ritual of the Church* was carried out only by public persons, the clergy, in a division of labor that broadly corresponded to the existing levels of culture and to the medieval idea of the division of roles among the major social categories, the “orders,” that is, the “prayers” (oratores), the “fighters,” and the “workers.”

In the Roman Church the evolution of culture and, simultaneously, a more positive perception of the place of the baptized in the Church have together strengthened the idea of active participation and a diversity of roles in the church assembly (see Vatican* II, SC no. 26). On the other hand, by abolishing orders* below the diaconate in the Latin Church, Paul VI (Ministeria Quaedam, 1972) and the Code of Canon* Law of 1983 (c. 217, §1) have now established an identity between clergy and ordained ministers (except that an ordained minister can lose clerical status but not the ordination he has received [can. 290]). A point has thus been clarified that the Council* of Trent* had left imprecise when it asserted that there was a distinction between clergy and laity according to divine law (DS 1776). Paul VI’s decision limits clerical status to bishops, priests*, and deacons* and abolishes lower ranks of the clergy.

The orders below the diaconate (subdeacon, lector) survive in the Eastern Church.

- Y. Congar (1954), Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat, Paris.
- H. Mülleians (1961), Publicus und Privatus im Römischen Recht und im älteren Kanonischen Recht, Munich.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Hierarchy; Lay/Laity; Orders, Minor; Ordination/Order

Code. See Canon Law

Collegiality

The debate on collegiality—a term in fact not used in Vatican* II—was the most vigorous of the council* (along with the debate on Mary*). It led to §§19–27 of LG, in which “college” is understood as the body (collegium, corpus, ordo) made up of all the bishops*, including the bishop of Rome*, by reason of their identical ordination* and their hierarchical communion* with the pope* and among themselves: “Hence, one is constituted a member of the episcopal body in virtue of sacramental consecration and hierarchical communion with the head and members of the body. . . . The order of bishops, which succeeds to the college of apostles and gives this apostolic body continued existence, is also the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church, provided we understand this body together with its head the Roman Pontiff” (LG 22). Considered by some as the backbone of Vatican II, the importance and the limits of this doctrine can be more clearly seen today.

1. Importance

It is in ordination, in a unified fashion, that the doctrine locates the origin of the power of order and jurisdiction* of the bishops. Three consequences follow from this.

a) Until then (restatements of this opinion had come from Pius XII and John XXIII), many thought that bishops received their jurisdiction from the pope. For Vatican II, on the other hand, that jurisdiction comes to them directly from Christ* through their ordination. “Every legitimate celebration of the Eucharist is regulated by the bishop, to whom is committed the office of offering the worship of Christian religion to the Divine Majesty and of administering it in accordance with the Lord’s commandments and the Church’s laws, as further defined by his particular judgment for his diocese” (LG 26). Any split between order and jurisdiction is overcome, and bishops must therefore be seen as “vicars and ambassadors of Christ” and not to be “regarded as vicars of the Roman Pontiffs” (LG 27).

b) In the area of canonical principles, there follows a new organization of powers between the pope and the bishops. The former no longer grants powers to the latter, but he keeps for himself, because of his primacy and for the common good of the Church, certain prerogatives that the bishops could, by right, exercise.

c) Institutions are thus beginning to make possible a more vital expression of the communion of churches, in particular the episcopal bodies, which “are in a position to render a manifold and fruitful assistance, so that this collegiate feeling may be put into practical application” (LG 23). According to the synod* of 1985, no one can doubt their pastoral usefulness and even less their necessity in the current situation. Inspired by the ancient patriarchal churches, are they prefigurations of new forms of those churches?

2. Limits

The assertion according to which the college holds in solidarity all ecclesiastical power has probably not allowed the realization of all the hopes that many Fathers placed in it. Collegiality in fact suffers from practical inefficacy and theoretical ambiguity, both of these being due to its definition on the basis of pontifical power.

a) In the first place, the college of individual bishops was insufficiently understood in terms of the communion among the churches over which they preside. Ordination is, to be sure, presented as the basis for communion, but LG 22 (quoted above) speaks only in terms of its relation to the universal Church. From this comes the inability to correctly articulate collegiality and the communion of churches. If this is so, it is probably because empirically 44 percent of the members of the college (according to the Annuario Pontificio of 1995) either do not preside over a Church or no longer do so; and this is verified in the chain of reasoning of the CIC of 1983, which believes it possible to establish what is meant by clergy* and laity*, the pope, the college of bishops, the Roman Curia, and the nuncios, before any consideration of the local Church. Such a modern conception, which understands collegiality on the basis of universal primacy, could not possibly be ratified by the Orthodox Church or form a basis for the requests of particular churches for more responsibility.

b) The college, in addition, remains dependent on its head, but the latter does not have a canonical obligation to act in collaboration with the college. Thus, if the college is understood on the basis of its head, who personally has the same power as the entire membership, and simultaneously the college can never act without its head (which is called hierarchical communion [LG 21 and 22]), whereas by virtue of his office the pope has “full, supreme and universal power over the Church. And he is always free to exercise this power” (LG 22), then collegiality does not necessarily change the centralized image of the Church based on Vatican* I, which the majority of the fathers of Vatican II precisely wished to attenuate by means of this doctrine. This interpretation can be based on the magisterium by John-Paul II (motu proprio Apostolos suos, 1998).

The weakness of the doctrine of collegiality also derives from a lack of correlation between the college of bishops and the communion of diocesan churches because Vatican II generally places the bishop facing his Church and almost never in it (exceptions: two quotations, one from Cyprian* [LG 26, no. 31], and the other from Augustine*: “For you I am a bishop; but with you I am a Christian” [LG 32]). The silence on the Episcopal ministry* of the pope in Rome, mentioned only in a historical aside (LG 22), is a symptom of the same lack.

3. The Possible Development of Collegiality

The fruitfulness of the doctrine of collegiality, within the Catholic Church as in the ecumenical area, is dependent on the doctrinal integration of the most novel (but traditional; see Cyprian, Ep. 36 and 55) axiom of Vatican II, “particular churches (31), fashioned after the model of the universal Church, in and from which churches comes into being the one and only Catholic Church” (LG 23). This axiom is incompatible with the guiding image of a college that brings together, in the same way, bishops who are bishops only by ordination and those who preside over a church. Moreover, the idea that the bishops are all equal and interchangeable in the college of which the pope is the head has to be supplemented by the traditional perspective according to which the bishops have always assembled (metropolitan and patriarchal jurisdictions, of considerable weight in relation to simple dioceses) to take charge of the encounter of the gospel with each specific culture, thus giving rise to the providential multifariousness (LG 23) of regional Churches in matters of liturgy*, theology*, spirituality, and canon* law. In this respect, the link established by LG 23 between the reality of the patriarchates* and that of bishops’ conferences should still prove fruitful.

- Congar (Ed.) (1965), La collégialité épiscopale: Histoire et théologie, UnSa 52.
- J. Grootaers (1986), Primauté et collégialité: Le dossier Gérard Philips sur la Nota Explicativa Praevia, Louvain.
- H. Legrand, J. Manzanares, A. Garcia (Ed.) (1988), Les Conférences épiscopales: Théologie, statut canonique, avenir, CFi 149.
- H. Legrand (1991), “Collégialité des évêques et communion des Églises dans la réception de Vatican II,” RSPHTh 75, 545–68.
- A. de Halleux (1993), “La collégialité dans l’Église ancienne,” RTL 24, 433–54.

HERVÉ LEGRAND

See also Apostolic Succession; Bishop; Communion; Jurisdiction; Local Church; Ordination/Order; Regional Church; Vatican II, Council of

Commandments. See Decalogue

Communion

It is not fortuitous that the ecumenical movement and the implementation of the major orientations of the Second Vatican* Council* have provoked new interest in what is known in the West as communion and in the East as koinônia. In fact these two traditional terms—which are not entirely synonymous—designate a range of realities that are closely related and are all at the heart of the Christian experience*: the new relationships that the Easter of Christ brings into being in a humanity “recapitulated” in Christ, the nature of the Church* of God*; the bond between the divine persons* in life the Trinity, and the oikonomia. But it is impossible to approach this subject without first having clarified the question of vocabulary. Communio and koinônia do not cover precisely the same range of meanings. In addition, the root koinon has no exact equivalent in Hebrew or Aramaic, and the biblical words translated by terms formed on its basis are many. Furthermore, they often have extremely varied uses (as in the case of habûrah).

I. The Terms and Their Origin

I. Communio-Communicatio

a) Communio. Contrary to belief and appearances, communio does not come from cum (with) and unio. It comes from cum and munis, an adjective derived from munus (office, duty) meaning “that fulfills its office.” Something is com-munis that “shares the office” and, in a derivative sense, what is “shared among all,” hence in common. This relationship of the term to the idea of a large number had the effect that sometimes it came to evoke banality, vulgarity, or even impurity*. In classical Latin the noun communio means sharing, shared ownership, common characteristics, and sometimes community (Ernout-Meillet 1951). It is a rather rare term, although it is used by Cicero.

In patristic Latin, when the term was applied to Church matters, this classical meaning took on particularly Christian overtones. These were derived from the fact that the community in question had its source in what God himself continually communicates to the Church (Word*, ministry*, sacraments*, the most important of which is the Eucharist*) and what believers are called on to communicate to one another, particularly through mutual material assistance. There was communio in the goods communicated by God, and it embraced all the members of the body of Christ (see, e.g., Tertullian*, De Virg. vel. 2. PL 2. 891). In this communion, societas, congregatio, fraternitas, concordia, and pax, all fruits of the Eucharist, attained their fulfillment.

In the Latin Middle Ages the noun communio was used almost exclusively to designate the receiving of the Eucharist. The other elements of the communal experience of the Church were then evoked especially by the term communicatio.

b) Communicatio. Like the verb communicare, the noun communicatio comes from an adjective, unicus, derived from munis (in the way that civicus is derived from civis). Communicare has several meanings, including “to tell” and “to share or participate.” The effect of this is communio. This is why the nouns communicatio and communio are close and sometimes used interchangeably, although they are not strictly synonymous.

The Christian Latin of the early centuries seems to have preferred communicatio to communio, probably because it added a dynamic element. It also evokes, at least implicitly, the active presence of Christ in his Holy* Spirit and the mutual dependence of the disciples. Christ is the communicator of salvation*, the Holy Spirit the communicator of the gifts of the Father* that give concrete form to that salvation in a communio of grace*; and in the community, each one is a communicator of the benefits of divine generosity. In prayer*, particularly in the synaxis of the Eucharist, Christians know that they are communicantes with all the saints throughout the ages (Roman canon). For typical uses of the vocabulary of communicatio, among countless examples, see especially, in addition to Tertullian (De praescr. 43. 5, PL 2. 58–59; De virg. vel. 2. PL 2. 891; De pud. 22. 2, PL 2), the Vulgate of Jerome (Acts 2:42; Rom 12:13; 1 Cor 10:16; 2 Cor 8:4, 9:13, 13:13; Gal 6:6; Eph 5:11; Phil 4:14–15; 1 Tm 5:22, 6:18; Phil 6; Heb 2:14; 1 Pt 4:13, 5:1; 2 Jn 11), which uses communio only once (Heb 13:16). The new edition of 1986, however, has frequently corrected the old editions by favoring the word communio. A glance at the Tabula aurea (by Peter of Bergamo) and the Index thomisticus shows the frequent use by Thomas Aquinas of communicatio and communicare.

Antonyms to altari communicare, meaning “to take part together at the altar” where the sacrament of communio is celebrated, are the verb ex-communicare and the noun excommunicatio. To exclude from the (eucharistic) communio is above all to deprive one of the communicatio of those benefits of which the celebration of the Eucharist is the sacrament, particularly the fraternal communicatio that binds the community together. The sign of exclusion is precisely this barring from church life. Local councils wanted it to be radical (e.g., Toledo I in 400, can. 15, Mansi 3. 1000; Second Council of Arles in 443, can. 49, Mansi 7. 884, etc.). But from the 12th century a distinction was established between the excommunicatio that “a communione fidelium separar” (separates from the communion of the faithful) and the excommunicatio that simply deprives one of the sacramental communicatio (Decr. I. v. tit. 39. c. 49). The latter cuts one off from the communicatio in sacris (communion in the sacraments), but not necessarily from everything implied by the belonging to Christ for which the baptismal character remains the sign. In the wake of Vatican II we speak therefore of a communicatio in spiritualibus (spiritual communion, which in the Middle Ages was the equivalent of communicatio in sacris: see Thomas Aquinas, ST IIIa, suppl. q. 21, a. 4), which is the foundation of a true communio etsi non perfecta that remains (UR 3). It is on this imperfect communio of all the baptized, the source of which is the Holy Spirit who continually communicates the benefits of Christ even beyond the visible borders of that communio, that the Catholic Church has grafted its ecumenical commitment.

2. Koinônia

a) From One Language to Another. The passages of the Vulgate that we mentioned to show the New Testament basis of the Western theology* of communicatio and communio are passages in which the Greek terms translated come from the root koinos (koinônia, koinônein, koinônos, koinônikos). This root also has for its semantic field (in contrast to idios, what is particular to each one, private) ideas of common participation, association, and common sharing of a single reality. We are thus close to the Latin communio; in this case too there is a suggestion of the idea of vulgarity or impurity, even in the New Testament (Mk 7:2–5; Acts 10:14–15, 11:8f.; Rom 14:14; Rev 21:27). However, in biblical Latin, the Greek words formed on the basis of koinos are also translated by terms other than those derived from munis (or munus). These terms are principally participatio and particeps (1 Cor 9:23, 10:16, 18, 20; Rom 15:27; Rev 1:9; 18:4), consors (2 Pt 1:4), and societas and socius (Mt 23:30; Rom 11:17; 1 Cor 1:9; 2 Cor 1:7, 6:14, 8:23; Gal 2:9; Phil 1:7, 2:1, 3:10; Phlm 17; Heb 10:33; 1 Jn 1:3, 6, 7). On the other hand, the Latin term used to translate a word from the koinos group can also translate other Greek terms, such as metokhos and its cognates. Thus, koinônia is translated once as communio, eight times as societas, six times as communicatio, once as collatio, and once as participatio. But in 2 Corinthians 6:14, participatio also translates metokhè. It is clear, then, that koinônia and communio and communicatio are not entirely synonymous. Generally, koinônia emphasizes participation in a common reality, communicatio the dynamism of the gift, and communio the resulting situation. But the meanings are rarely very sharply distinguished.

In addition, in the Septuagint and the New Testament, the koinos group is used to define several Hebrew terms, although it is not the only way in which they are translated. In fact, the root koinos has no exact equivalent in Hebrew. In addition, some of its implications did not apply in Israel*. The closest root is hbr; but few (13) of its instances are translated by words from the koinos group. It is used to describe the unifying bond of the people* (as in Ez 37:16ff.) and avoiding evocation of community with YHWH, to condemn association with the pagan gods (Hos 4:17). The most important derivative of hbr for our purposes is habûrah. This refers, especially in Pharisee circles, to a community generally united around a teacher, in which the desire to follow the Law in a strict fashion creates particular bonds of fraternity and solidarity. The Qumran community, however, rarely used terms derived from hbr to express its ideal, which was also stamped by a radicalizing reading of the precept of love* of one’s neighbor. Rather, it gave itself the name yachad, which emphasizes cohesion, unity, solidarity and which the Septuagint sometimes translates as homothumadon or epi to auto (which is found in Acts 1:14, 2:44ff.) (Fabry 1982). In the context of Hellenistic Judaism, Philo and Josephus used terms derived from koinos, particularly koinônia, to present the ideal and the way of life of the Essenes and the Therapeutics (e.g., Quod omnis probus liber sit, 80–84: Spec. Leg. I, 131–221). But this brought new overtones, inherited from Greek culture, to the Old Testament vision of the community. These then passed into Christian tradition, even as early as the New Testament.

b) Koinônia in the Greek World. In classical Greek, words derived from koinos were generally used to designate matters concerning various groupings or associations of citizens (e.g., state*, family*, sexual encounter, trade association, union with the gods). It was always a matter of indicating a community that was created in virtue of its sharing in the same realities (koina pasi panta, said Pythagoras: Jamblique, Vie de P., 30, 168), of participating together in a common good, and, as a corollary, to bring about that participation. Association and participation were inseparable in this context. Hence, koinônia was the form of life corresponding to the social nature of human beings. It reached its apex in friendship (philia): “Among friends, everything is in common.” Plato has no hesitation in associating the gods themselves with the perfect koinônia he aspires to (Gorgias 508 a). Aristotle gives a prominent place to the dimension of friendship that imbues any koinônia (Nicomachean Ethics VIII. 11. 1159; IX. 12. 1171). In the Politics he uses the word almost as a synonym of community (Gauthier-Jolif 1959). We should especially recall the ideal of the adelphoi assembled by Pythagoras of Samos (c. 580 B.C.): the certainty of belonging to the same God led them to mutual devotion concretized by the common ownership and sharing of goods that was emphasized in neo-Pythagoreanism. We might also point to the way in which the Stoics saw the human being as a koinônion zôon, a communal being. It is certain that these ideals, particularly those of small groups or fraternities hungry for authentic koinônia, remained very much alive in those Greek cities where the gospel was proclaimed (Popkès 1976).

In the New Testament, terms derived from koinos are used rather infrequently. There are 73 occurrences, among which 19 are of koinônia (13 of these are in the Pauline corpus, where words derived from koinos appear 33 times). Again, they do not appear at all in Clement of Rome, only infrequently in the writings of the Apostolic* Fathers*, though more frequently in Justin. Thereafter their use burgeoned. Such terms sprang spontaneously from the pens of the Cappadocian Fathers, where they expressed various elements of church life, often in relation to the Eucharist (Lampe 1968). But here too, other Greek terms that had been Christianized expressed the same ecclesial reality, such as ekklēsia and sunagôgē. The depth of fraternal koinônia is often expressed by sumphonēsis; by the verb metekhein (already in 1 Cor 10:17–21, in parallel with koinônia), which emphasizes participation; and by the nouns metokhē, eirenē, agapē, and generally by all expressions concerning unity (sun-), fraternity (adelphotēs, already in 1 Pt 2:17, 5:9, which the Vulgate translates as fraternitas), unanimity (already in Phil 2:2), cohesion, association, and community. It is therefore clear that theological reflection cannot confine itself to a narrowly focused study of the uses of the term koinônia in the Scriptures*.

In the New Testament, the Greek term, which had a multiplicity of meanings, came to indicate those values that, belonging to Christ, contributed to the life of the community. These values included participation of all in the same gift of God actualized by the body and blood of the Lord (1 Cor 10:16, 1:9), association with the life of God that this gift provides (2 Pt 1:4; 1 Jn 1:3; see 2 Cor 13:13), the resulting union with Christ (Phil 3:10; 1 Pt 4:13), consequent fraternal bonds (1 Jn 1:7; 1 Cor 10:18ff.; 2 Cor 1:7; 8:23; Gal 2:9; Phil 1:5ff.; Phlm 6:17), the form of community life that actualizes those bonds (Acts 2:42), the disinterested spirit of sharing (Rom 15:27; 2 Cor 9:13; Heb 13:16) manifested in material assistance to poor churches (2 Cor 8:4) and to the missionaries of the gospel (Gal 6:6; Phil 4:14), and association with the suffering and the promises of the gospel (Rom 11:17; 1 Cor 9:23; Heb 10:33). Koinônia is never given as a definition of the Church, but it is understood that everything expressed by the term or its cognates belongs to the essence of the Church. This is why—without it being burdened with overtones foreign to its use in Scripture—the term koinônia gradually came to be seen, along with communio, as the equivalent of a definition of the Church considered in its being of grace (that which the hierarchical ministry* is called on to serve). Bilateral ecumenical dialogues and the declaration of Faith and Constitution “received” at the Seventh Assembly of the COE (Canberra 1991) helped this development.

We will adhere to what is now the generally current usage and will avoid any distinction between communio (communicatio) and koinônia. We will therefore speak of communio-koinônia, presupposing all the nuances we have just presented.

II. Salvation of the Human Person in Communion

1. The Person

The Christian tradition asserts that the human beings are fulfilled and saved in communio-koinônia. It thus makes of communio-koinônia—with God and among human beings—the essence of salvation.

a) For the Scriptures, in fact, the human being is by nature a relational being, turned toward the other, because he has been created in the image and likeness of God. On the one hand, he has his being* only from God, in a constant relation of dependence on divine generosity, actualizing himself in an individual relationship as one who speaks with God or indeed as a responsible partner with him. The human being can exist only from God and before God. On the other hand, for the two traditions of the first chapters of Genesis, the human being is created both as singular and plural: “in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them” (Gn 1:27); “It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a helper fit for him” (2:18). The woman* (‘ishâh) is for the man (‘ish) the equal that allows him to be himself, precisely through her difference. Each of them is thus created toward the other (2:18–24). Each fully possesses human nature. They exist as fully independent subjects, neither being a part of the other. But they are subjects open to the other, in a relationship that belongs to their nature. Hence, they are an “image of God” only in this mutual openness. Their identity is inseparable from the otherness that makes each of them fully a subject, either of whom may, however, attain realization without a communion of the I and a you in a we. They are persons in communion.

b) On this basis the Christian tradition established a distinction between individual and person that was deepened by its reflection on the mystery* of the divine Trinity*. There is a single human nature, but it exists only in a diversity of persons. Each person is unique, irreplaceable, not interchangeable. Each one is different, hapax. Now this otherness opens out onto communion. In Greek, “person” is prosôpon, a word made up of pros and a derivative of ôps (eye, look), hence “what is in front of the eyes of others,” as “the person opposite someone” (Chantraine 1974). The understanding implied here points to a recapitulation of the totality of human nature in a mode that, going beyond the various determinisms that human nature involves, renders it singular “in the eyes” of God and others, something that exists in freedom and otherness. The concept of the individual disregards the otherness of the concrete human being because it designates him as bearer of the objective properties of common human nature. It perceives him in his belonging to what is the lot of all human beings, the possession of what constitutes universal humanity, the definition of homo. The concept of person, on the other hand, distinguishes him by seeing him as an I set in a face-to-face encounter with other persons. To this encounter he brings that which he alone is, whatever makes him different from others. And it is precisely on the strength of this irreducible particularity that, far from blending into the identity of a common human nature, he can enter into a communion of giving and receiving. The person is revealed only in the operation of mutual relations and communion. As individual, the human being is defined by the integrity and perfection of nature in him; as person, he is defined by the singularity that allows him to go beyond himself in communion with others. When it came to an understanding of how God himself is a communion of three persons, the tradition specified that every human being is an image of the creator God precisely because he is called on to realize himself by establishing with others a flourishing community on the basis of a single and indivisible human nature. In this he realizes his vocation (Lossky 1944). The person fulfills himself only in his relation with others by making his own originality and difference not the source of an asphyxiating self-enclosure but rather the source of a gift in which the very attributes of nature are directed toward communion.

2. The Restoration of Communio-Koinônia

For the Scriptures, the tragedy of humanity comes from the breaking of the communion with God and among human persons. Already in the Yahwist stratum of Genesis, after the break with God (3:6), the man dissociates himself from the woman (3:12). From Cain onward, the rest of history* is stamped by the transformation of what should be communion into rivalry. This is the origin of human misfortune. And the salvation offered by God has as its object the “recapitulation” (anakephalaôsis) of communion (Irenaeus*).

a) The Old Testament already points in this direction. The covenant (especially Hos 2:21f.; Is 54:1–17; Jer 31:2–34; Ez 16:59–63), illustrated by the relation of bride and bridegroom (Jer 2:2, 3:6–12), establishes between God and the people a bond of fidelity that is salvific for the people. But according to the law of the covenant, it is also necessary to restore fraternal bonds (see Lv 19:1–37; Dt 15:1–18), “you shall love your neighbor as yourself” (Lv 19:18). God wishes to reassemble (roots hbr; koinos) the people that has been split into two kingdoms (Ez 37:15–28; Mi 4:6; Is 43:5ff., 49:5, 56:8; etc.), and all the nations are drawn into this assembly (Is 2:2; Ps 87; etc.). Thus, the promise to Abraham—that all nations would be blessed in him (Gn 12:1–3, 17:4–8, etc.)—will be fulfilled in a communion according to the grace that is his as father of the faith*.

b) For John the Baptist the moral ideal that goes inseparably with conversion* is essentially marked by a relation to one’s neighbor and to the community (Lk 3:10f.), in a way that radicalizes the Torah. Christ deepens this message not only in the encounter with a rich man (Lk 18:18–30; Mt 19:16–30; Mk 10:17–31) but also in the totality of his words and signs. He desires to transform human relations by giving them a communitarian meaning of sharing and of attentiveness to the needs of others. This is what the Kingdom* requires. Alms and concern for little children and the suffering belong to the Good News. The dual commandment to love God and one's neighbor here reveals its deepest meaning (Mt 22:36–40; Mk 12:28–34; Lk 10:25–28). It implies a challenge to any rigid separation between the just and sinners (Lk 15:1f.; Mt 9:11, 11:19; Mk 2:16; Lk 5:30, 7:34, 19:7), Jews and Gentiles (Lk 10:29–37; Mt 15:21–28). Although Jesus* states that he was sent only to the lost sheep of Israel (Mt 15:24) and before his resurrection* sends his disciples only to the Jews (Mt 10:5f.), the gathering of all humanity is proclaimed in the eschatological promise of a feast to be shared with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Mt 8:11). Jesus' commissioning of the disciples in Matthew 28:16–19 (see also 24:14) strikes a corresponding note. Never evoked explicitly, communio-koinônia does nevertheless find expression through the ministry of Jesus.

c) The Letter to the Hebrews understands the coming of the Son of God in human flesh as a communio-koinônia: “Since therefore the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise partook of the same things. . . . Therefore he had to be made like his brothers in every respect” (Heb 2:14–17). The reality of what the tradition calls “incarnation*” comes from the realism of this communio-koinônia, which makes Christians in turn “sharers” (metokhoi) in that which is Christ (3:14). This unites them among themselves and commits them to the koinônia of sharing. The mutual communion implied by the Incarnation is expressed here more explicitly than in Romans 1:3, Galatians 4:4, Philippians 2:7, 1 John 4:2, and even John 1:14. On this Son-humanity communio-koinônia, in our view, is grafted the communio-koinônia humanity-Christ. Paul sees it above all as the participation of adopted children in the inheritance of the Son (Rom 8:17; Gal 4:4–7) and in his glory* (Rom 8:17; 2 Cor 4:14–17) but also as koinônia in his suffering (Phil 3:10; Rom 8:17). There, everything is lived with him (sun-) in the Holy Spirit. The Johannine* tradition emphasizes this association differently but just as strongly (Jn 12:26, 14:3, 17:24). The church fathers (e.g., Athanasius*, Incar. 5. 11. 54) say that the koinônia of the Son and humanity is so deep and intimate that the knowledge* of God and even incorruptibility become possessions of a divinized humanity. The communion that is the Incarnation governs the divine purpose.

d) Without using the word koinônia in this context, the Pauline corpus (Rom 10:12; 1 Cor 12:13; Gal 3:28; Col 3:11) sees realized en Christô and en pneumatî the coming together of all human, religious, and social categories. But Paul (1 Cor 12:12–31) inserts that unity into the operation of mutual relations by which the body of Christ, the Church, lives (1 Cor 12:27f.). The author of Ephesians (who uses a verb derived from koinos only at 5:4) explicitly links the unity of reconciliation brought about by the cross (2:13–17) and the new relations between Jews and Gentiles that follow: near-far (2:13), division-peace* (2:14f.), enmity-union in a single spirit (2:11–18), foreigner-fellow citizen (2:19). He regards this as the state of salvation (2:4–10), called on to blossom into a new life in which mutual relations are transformed into the single body of reconciliation (1:23, 4:16, 5:30), the single temple constructed by all, the single family of God (2:19, 3:6). Salvation comes through communion.

The Gospel* of John, which also presents the cross as the event that brings together (sun-agô) in unity the dispersed children of God (Jn 11:52), is fond of images that evoke the unity of communion, for example, the one flock (led by a single shepherd; 10:11–18), but especially the vine that is Christ (15:1–17). Individuals remain as living branches of this vine only by persevering in a mutual love that leads them to give themselves up (tithêmi) for others (15:13; see 10:15, 17:18, 13:37f.). The title of disciple requires mutual love (13:34f.) and the unity that is inseparable from it (17:20–26, where agapè and unity are woven together). Even though the word koinônia is not used, we are here at the heart of the communion with the Father that the eating of the bread of life (which signifies both faith and the body and blood of Christ; 6:47f., 53–56, 63) makes possible and maintains. For their dwelling (menein en) in Christ associates the disciples with his dwelling in the Father (14:20, 17:21). That dwelling then includes them in the mutual relations between Father and Son. They do not thereby lose their personal identity. Just as the Son is not dissolved in the Father but faces him as a free subject of action and of life, so the disciples are not dissolved in the Son but remain free subjects. In fact, they become not Sons (huios) but children of God (tekna theou; 1:12, 11:52), associated as such in intradivine relations. They are not understood as children of God in a purely individualized and isolated way but in virtue of their reality and being as a group (17:1–26; see 10:14, 26–30, 15:15). This is the source of their mutual love.

e) The first letter of John explicitly defines in terms of koinônia (without saying that it is a question of the Church) this dual relation of which the knot is Christ, with his blood: “so that you too may have fellowship (koinônia) with us; and indeed our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ” (1 Jn 1:3); “If we say we have fellowship with him while we walk in darkness, we lie and do not practice the truth; but if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn 1:6–7). Note the place of the Father and the expression “to have fellowship” (koinônia).

The author dwells on the demands of a fraternal koinônia (2:10, 3:10–20, 4:11ff.) to the extent of sharing (3:17). In this is actualized the surrender of oneself (3:16), inspired by the action of the Son and the Father (4:9ff.), who dwell in the disciples (3:24, 4:12–16) through their anointing by the Holy Spirit (2:20, 27, 3:24, 4:13), and in whom those who have true knowledge dwell (2:24–27, 3:24, 4:16, 5:20). Christian life is life in communion.

In a more static perspective, 2 Peter says that the vocation of Christians is to be koinônoi of the divine nature (phusis). For that purpose they are called to fraternal friendship and the agape (2 Pt 1:4, 7) while waiting for the Day of the Lord (3:1–13).

Patristic thought, followed Western medieval theology, established the doctrine of grace primarily on the affirmations of the Johannine tradition and of 2 Peter, correlated with passages from Paul. Despite different perspectives, Greeks and Latins conceived of it as the gift that leads one into the entirely free communio-koinônia of God and his image. The East spoke primarily of divinization, the West of invisible mission, divine indwelling, the supernatural; the East of uncreated grace (the divine energies), the West of created grace. For all, grace was the work of the Holy Spirit as communicator: Thomas* Aquinas (ST Ia, IIae, q. 112, a. 1) defines it as the communicatio of a communion with the divine nature through assimilative participation.

III. The Divine Communio-Koinônia Trinity of Persons

1. From Oikonomia to the Trinity (Theologia)

a) It was on the basis of the divinization of believers that Athanasius, Basil*, and the Cappadocians, as well as Didymus, after having defended the divinity of the Son and then of the Holy Spirit, developed a theology of the Trinity*. In the West, Augustine* echoed them but in a different perspective. Although Scripture never states that God is communio-koinônia of three persons, the Johannine tradition (Jn 14:16, 16:7–15), Matthew 28:19, and particularly 2 Corinthians 13:14 (“The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship [koinônia] of the Holy Spirit be with you all”) encouraged a conception of the divine mystery that saw it as the communio-koinônia that was the origin and model of any human communion. For example, Basil (Letter 38, PG 32, 332a–333): “a united differentiation, a differentiated unity,” “a kind of continual and indivisible koinônia.” The being of God is koinônia. This is so both in se and in his activity pro nobis (oikonomia).

b) For the East, everything in God is relational. There is not first a Father, then a Son who would then enter into relations with one another. They are Father and Son through the relation that makes one of them Father and the other Son. The single divine nature exists only in the communion that comes from the fact that the Father causes to be born from him a Son who is as much God as He is and a Holy Spirit who is as much God as He. And yet the Son and the Holy Spirit possess the entire divine nature in a unique manner that the Father could not possibly imitate without destroying himself as Father and source of Trinitarian life. The eternal generosity of the Father comes from the fact that there originate in him not copies of himself but “others than himself,” without whom he would not be. There is no more a Father without a Son than a Son without a Father. Each divine person exists only in the relation of koinônia with the other who gives him being. Each is neither more nor less God than the two others. They are the one God in the koinônia of relations that distinguishes them.

In the West the Eleventh Council of Toledo (675) declared, “What the Father is, he is for the Son, not for himself. What the Son is, he is for the Father, not for himself” (DS 528). The eternal act of granting to the Son everything that he is, not a same being as his but his being itself, makes the Father the Father. God is the koinônia of three relational beings each one of whom exists only in relation to the others. The West, which, following Augustine, emphasized above all the unity of ousia—whereas the East emphasized the hypostases—speaks in this context of subsisting relations (Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 29, a. 4), but it is still a matter of communion, considered here on the basis of a single nature. Neither three gods nor three modes of a single person, God is communio-koinônia of three persons who are one God indivisible in his unity.

2. From Trinitarian Communion to Oikonomia

a) Enlightened by this Trinitarian doctrine revealed to it by oikonomia, the tradition reread the latter with new eyes. It understood why in the New Testament none of the three divine persons bears witness of himself: the Father bears witness of the Son (Mt 3:17; 17:5), the Son of the Father (Jn 4:34, 5:30, 6:38, etc.), the Holy Spirit of the Father and of the Son (Jn 14:26, 15:26). The ministry of Jesus is enveloped by this perikhôrêsis (circumcession*) of mutual relations. We can also understand why one cannot enter into the communion of Christ without participating in the Trinitarian communion of the Son and God's communion with human distress.

b) In this light we can look again at the creation "in the image and likeness of God." Because God is "persons in communion," the human person cannot be perceived otherwise than in a relation of communio-koinônia with God, with the other, with others, a relation that is directed toward those others who are in turn directed toward him. Through this reciprocity, he participates, in his very being, in the personal life of the creative Trinity. His need of others is therefore not a lack but a dignity that finds its source in participation in the being of the Triune God. His communion with the "wicked" (2 Cor 6:14), for that reason, wounds him in himself.

IV. The Church of God Is a Communio-Koinônia

Although Scripture never makes communio-koinônia the definition of the Church, it is nevertheless in the Church of God, as Scripture reveals it, that is brought together everything it says of communio-koinônia, including the relations among Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Augustine (Homilies on the Gospel of John, tract. 14. 9, 18. 4, 39. 5; Sermon 47.21 and Guelf. 11. 5,6; De symb. ad cat. 2. 4; Ep 170. 5, 238. 2, 13. 16; Coll. cum Maxim. 12) has no hesitation in making the Pentecostal community of Acts into an image of the Trinitarian communion (Berrouard 1987). The totality of church traditions affirms that the unity accomplished by the Word, the bread, and the cup of the Eucharist is the ecclesial communio-koinônia (Tillard 1992). The patristic tradition recognizes that the fabric of the Church is made of the bonds of communion rooted in the fraternity of the body of Christ. The church fathers teach unanimously that the communion of sharing with communities in need is a concrete form of the agape that is the life of the Church. The oldest canon law rules on sharing among Churches and particularly between preachers and communities. Finally, the right hand of koinônia that Cephas (Peter*), James, and John extend to Paul and Barnabas is understood as a sign of the real communion of all local* churches in the diversity of their practices. Communio-koinônia is not absent from any of the elements that make up the Church.

- 1) The idealized description of the primitive community of the Acts of the Apostles (2:42–47, 4:32–35, 5:12ff.) shows a fraternity conceived in the fire of the Holy Spirit (Dujarier 1991) based on the hearing of the apostolic word, koinônia (2:42); the breaking of bread, prayer, and common property (apanta koina; 2:44, 4:32); and the sharing of possessions. The tradition reads this as the self-description of the emerging Church, which was not yet organized. There are questions about the meaning of koinônia (Dupont 1972; Panikulam 1979). Everything encourages us to recognize it as the specific form of friendship provoked by shared faith, which makes of all "one heart and soul*" (Acts 4:32) in solidarity (homothumadon; 2:46, 5:12) and equality (epi te auto; 2:44, 47). This primitive community is indeed the initial cell of the Church.

- 2) For 1 Corinthians (10:16–22), the bread and wine of the table of the Lord are koinônia with the body and blood of Christ. By sharing this one bread (metekhome; 10:17), all become a single body (10:17) of which it is said (12:12–31) that it is the Church. This common participation (metekhein; 10:21) makes Christians koinônoi (10:18, 20) of the Lord, who creates their unity. It is not said that only participation in the Lord's Supper makes the Church since (1 Cor 12:12f.; Eph 4:5) Paul attributes this function also to Baptism and the New Testament as a whole to the Word*. Nevertheless, koinônia with Christ (1 Cor 1:9) takes on reality here because there is a common sharing of his body and blood. The church fathers (especially John Chrysostom*, Cyril* of Alexandria, and Augustine) say that the ecclesial body of Christ (Christus totus) comes from the seizure of all its diverse members by the power of the body of reconciliation, the "pneumatic" body of the Risen One received in the Eucharist, which has been the same on every altar ever since the first Easter (Tillard 1992). The Church manifests itself in its full truth as body of Christ only in the Eucharist.
- 3) According to 1 Corinthians 12:25ff., among the members of the ecclesial body there must be no division (skhisma) but rather mutual concern (merimna). This is the case first of all within each local church. There one "has koinônia" in faith and mission* (2 Cor 8:23; Phil 1:5; Phlm 6:17; Ti 1:4), in suffering (2 Cor 1:7; Phil 4:14ff.), and in hope* (1 Cor 9:23). There we live as members of the body by being sug-koinônoi (Phil 1:7). This requires mutual aid to the extent of the koinônia of sharing (Rom 12:13; Gal 6:6; Heb 13:16), with all the enthusiasm of the community of Pentecost. But this sharing also extends to Christians of other churches. Paul relies on the koinônia of spiritual and material goods (Rom 15:26f.) to promote collections for the poor of Jerusalem (2 Cor 8:4, 9:13). Ecclesial communion concerns the human being in solidarity called for by the very nature of the person who is saved en Christô.

- 4) The diversity of local Churches and their particular ways of living the one faith cannot call into question their mutual communion. The right hand of koinônia that, after a sharp conflict, the “pillars” of the Church of Jerusalem* extended to Paul and Barnabas (Gal 2:9) is seen as the sign of that catholic koinônia in the same gospel, the same faith, and the same ministry for the same mission, in a multiplicity of customs and traditions. This places the emphasis on the truth* of the gospel as the bond of koinônia (2:5–14), not on the fabric of fraternity or legal requirements (Reumann 1994).

Beyond mutual material aid, bonds of fraternity are tied among local Churches since they “recognize” in one another the same faith, the same hope, the same baptism—and soon the same ministry and the same Eucharist. They are sister churches (2 Jn 13), communing in the same divine choice (2 Jn 13; 1 Pt 5:13f.). Tertullian, enumerating goods possessed in common, concludes, “We are a single Church, everything that belongs to one of us is ours” (De Virg. vel. 2, 2 PL 2. 891). Around 1150, Anselm of Havelberg, relating his discussions with Archbishop Nicetas of Nicomedia (PL 188, esp. 1217–20), testifies to the importance of the theology* of sister churches for the East (Congar 1982). The Church is a communion of local churches, themselves grouped into patriarchates of equal apostolic roots and equal dignity, for which the Roman Church is neither the mother nor the magistra but the elder sister and the “president” (PL 188. 1217). After Vatican* I the decree of Vatican II on ecumenism*, and the dialogue between Paul VI and the Patriarch Athenagoras, the expression has resumed its place in Catholic ecclesiology* (UR 1 4; Tomos Agapès 388–91; DC 87, 1990. 951–52; 88, 1991. 689–90; 91, 1994. 1069–70). Within this communion the function of the first-founded see and its bishop* is above all to “watch” over the communion while respecting the dignity and responsibility of sister churches. This role has been challenged since the schisms of the Reformation, but the Orthodox churches do not deny it.

- 5) The Apostles’ Creed includes among the truths of faith the “communion of saints.” The expression comes neither from the New Testament nor from the ancient creeds. The Nicene-Constantinople Creed does not mention it, nor do Eastern creeds. It is found in Jerome, in a rescript of Theodosius of 388 (uncertain meaning), in a mutilated text of the Acts of a council of Nîmes of 394, and in the Latin translation of a letter of Theophilus of Antioch of 401, the Greek original of which is lost. The Credo of Nicetas of Remesiana (between 381 and 408) is the first solid evidence of it and provides the earliest commentary. Nicetas (a friend of Paulinus of Nola) seems to have taken it from southern Gaul, where creeds proliferated. He understands it as the “communion of believers (sancti) with one another.” Others (Faustus of Rieti, c. 452, pseudo-Augustinian sermon 242) think only of a communion with martyrs and saints or with the departed faithful (Badcock 1920; Benko 1964). But it might mean, in the Apostles’ Creed, communion with holy (sancta) things, hence the Eucharist and probably Baptism, explaining its place between the Church and the remission of sins for resurrection and eternal life*. It would thus correspond in the Latin Credo to the mention of Baptism in the Eastern creeds.

It is clear that the living faith has gradually brought the two meanings together (Tillard 1965). They actually suggest one another, for one is sanctus in the communion of the faithful and by communion with holy things. The richest vision is perhaps that of Theodore of Mopsuestia in the East: “Since by a new birth they have become perfect in a single body, they are now also strengthened as in a single body by communion with the body of the Lord; and, in concord, peace, and the devotion to good, they all come to be one. . . . Thus we will unite in communion with the holy mysteries, and by that communion we will be joined to our head, Christ our Lord, of whom we believe we are the body and through whom we attain communion with the divine nature” (Hom. cat. 16. 13, ed. Tonneau-Devreesse, 555).

- 6) This passage appears to be the very definition of the Church in its being of grace. The Church is communion with the Father, flowering in fraternal communion, communicated in Baptism, and especially in the Eucharist, by the Holy Spirit of the one who, having fully communed with our humanity in his Incarnation, has been raised to bring us into communion with his Trinitarian life.

• F. J. Badcock (1920), “Sanctorum communio as an Article of the Creed,” JThS, 106–26; (1930), The History of the Creeds, London.

Communion

- J. Y. Campbell (1932), "K. and Its Cognates in the New Testament," JBL 51, 352–82.
- Vl. Lossky (1944), Théologie mystique de l'Église d'Orient, Paris, 116–17.
- J. Gaudemet (1949), "Notes sur les formules anciennes de l'excommunication," RSR 22, 64–77.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1950), Early Christian Creeds, London (3rd Ed. 1972).
- A. Ernout, A. Meillet (1951), Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue latine, Paris.
- A. Piolanti (1957), Il mistero della comunione dei Santi, Rome.
- R. A. Gauthier, J. Y. Jolif (1959), L'éthique à Nicomaque, intro., trans., and comm., vol. II, comm. 2.
- J. Schmitt (1959), "L'organisation de l'Église primitive et Qoumrân," RechBib 4, 217–31.
- S. Benko (1964), The Meaning of sanctorum communio, London.
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1965), "La communion des saints," VS 113, 249–74.
- G. W. H. Lampe (Ed.) (1968), PGL, Oxford.
- L. M. Dewailly (1970), "Communio-Communicatio: Brèves notes sur l'histoire d'un sémantème," RSPHTh 44, 46–63.
- Tomos Agapès* (1971), Rome-Istanbul.
- J. Dupont (1972), "La k. des premiers chrétiens dans les Actes des apôtres," in G. D'Ercole, A. M. Stickler (Ed.), Communione interecclesiale, collegialita, primato, ecumenismo, Rome, 41–61.
- P. Chantraine (1974), Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque, vol. 3, Paris.
- W. Popkes (1976), "Gemeinschaft," RAC 9, 1100–45.
- G. Panikulam (1979), K. in the New Testament, Rome.
- J. Hainz (1981), "K., Koinôneo, Koinônos," EWNT.
- J. Fabry (1982), "Yâchad, yâchîd, yachdâw," ThWAT, 3, 595–603.
- Y. Congar (1982), Diversités et communion, Paris, 126–34.
- J.D. Zizioulas (1985), Being as Communion, Crestwood and New York.
- M.F. Berrouard (1987), "La première communauté de Jérusalem comme image de la Trinité," dans Homo spiritualis, Festgabe für Luc Verheijen, Würzburg, 207–24.
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1987), Église d'Églises, l'ecclésiologie de communion, Paris.
- M. Dujarier (1991), L'Église-Fraternité, Paris.
- C. M. La Cugna (1991), God for Us, San Francisco.
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1992), Chair de l'Église, chair du Christ, Paris.
- R. W. Wall (1992), "Community, New Testament K.," AncBD 1, New York.
- X. Lacroix (1993), Homme et femme, l'insaisissable différence, Paris.
- J. Reumann (1994), "The Biblical Witness of k.," in On the Way to Fuller K. Official Report of the Fifth World Conference of Faith and Order, Geneva.
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1995), L'Église locale: Ecclésiologie de communion et catholicité, Paris.

JEAN-MARIE R. TILLARD

See also Anthropology; Baptism; Being; Christ/Christology; Circumcession; Holiness; Love; Person; Trinity; Unity of the Church

Conceptualism. See Nominalism

Conciliarism

a) Conciliarism, also known as conciliary theory, is a doctrine that places the general council* above the pope* and accords it supreme power in the Church*: the power to determine the principles of faith* and to maintain unity*. The answer that it contributes in the debate about the nature of supreme power and the place in which that power is found is the product of a reflection on the Church, its nature, and the presence of the Holy* Spirit. This is why conciliarism is not primarily a political doctrine but belongs to the history* of theology*. Although there are points of convergence among different conciliary theories, there is no common doctrine, and the theory varies from one theoretician to another. The 15th century is considered the century of conciliarism, by reason of the decrees passed at the Council of Constance* to put an end to the division of the Church and of the radicalization of conciliary ideas that took place at the Council of Basel*. Religious Gallicanism* is considered to be a French form of conciliarism.

b) All the forms of conciliarism in the 15th century were consequences of the pontifical schism* (1378–1418). They extended and radicalized what Conrad Gelnhausen and Henry of Langenstein had timidly proposed, restoring unity to the Church by convoking a general council (via concilii). The sources of conciliarism are, however, much older. In addition to the recognized authority of the ecumenical councils of the early Church, we must mention, on the one hand, legal and theological documents and, on the other, practices peculiar to the medieval Church, such as the deposition of the pope and the possibility of appealing to the future general council against a pope's decision. We can cite as examples of the latter, Philippe IV the Beautiful's appeal against Boniface VIII, and the appeal of Louis of Bavaria, together with the Franciscans around him, against John XXII. Renewed at Constance on the closing day of the council, this particular practice ran into strong opposition from Martin V.

Of primary importance among the legal sources are the decree of Gratian (D. 40 c. 6) and the various commentaries on it, among which is that of Huguccio (†1210), as well as various glosses. These 12th-century documents pose the question of power in the Church and the limits of that power and the possibility of judging and deposing the pope, among others. Jurists of the time generally accepted the possibility of trying the pope for the crime of heresy*, whether open or private, without having beforehand determined who would be the judge. They established rules that would be an invaluable help to the conciliarists of Constance. For example, they determined that, "where faith is in question, the synod* is greater than the Pope" (Ubi de fide agitur... tunc synodus est maior papa) and that "what is of concern to everyone should be discussed by everyone" (Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus iudicatur). In the period of the quarrel over Boniface, various jurists and theologians repeated and reinforced the same ideas: among these, for example, were Guillaume Durand the Younger (†1331), author of the treatise De modo concilii generalis celebrandi, and the Dominican Jean of Paris (†1306), author of De potestate regia et papali. The latter argued, among other things, that the pope had limited power since full power resided in the Church as a whole; that the council could try and depose the pope in the case of heresy, scandal, or incompetence; and that both his authority and his primacy were conferred on him by the Church. The treatise of Jean of Paris is the direct though unacknowledged source for Pierre d'Ailly and Jean Gerson, who both participated in the work of Constance, as well as for Jacques of Heaven (of Jüterborg), who was present at Basel, and for many others. In the late 14th and early 15th centuries it was generally accepted that Christ* alone was the head of the Church, that the pope held power in the Church because the Church granted it to him, that without the Church the pope was nothing, and that the Church could try and depose him for acts of heresy, simony, and other serious crimes. These were the principal points of ecclesiology* that Matthew of Krakow, for example, set out in his De praxi Romanae curiae, one of the sources for the conciliarism of Thierry de Niem.

The influential role played by Marsilius of Padua and William of Ockham in the development of conciliary doctrines is well known. However, the conciliarists belonging to the period before the Council of Pisa (1409)—that is, Conrad Gelnhausen, Henry of Langenstein, Pierre d'Ailly, and Matthew of Krakow—seem to have been unaware of Marsilius. After Pisa and before the Council of Basel, only Thierry de Niem made extensive use of Defensor pacis. The opinions of these early conciliarists owed much more to William of Ockham, although he never attributed a significant role to the general council and never accepted its infallibility. (William did, however, frequently stress the superiority of the Church over the pope.) In the early 15th century William's Dialogue influenced both Francesco Zabarella in Italy and a group of Parisian theologians: Pierre d'Ailly, Gerson, and Jean de Courtecuisse.

c) At the opening of the Council of Constance, the principal conciliarists—Gerson, d'Ailly, Zabarella, and Niem—jointly affirmed that the promise of infallibility* and indefectibility* had been made to the whole Church and not to any individual person. As a consequence it was the Church that was the supreme body and the locus of power. So while they accepted the primacy of the pope, the conciliarists did not see him as the head of the Church. They reserved this title for Christ alone. They envisaged the pope as a constitutional monarch or prime minister, subject to the power of the council and removable. Since he was neither faultless nor infallible, the pope could be tried, deposed, and replaced. The argument, which came from Zabarella, that made the general council the representation of the universal Church (universalis ecclesia, id est concilium) was fundamentally important in this already structured set of doctrines. In fact it legitimated a displacement of the center of interest from the Church to the council.

The decree Haec sancta synodus of 6 April 1415, accepted by the Council of Constance shortly after the flight of the anti-Pope John XXIII, is the most important of the “conciliarist decrees.” In its preamble and first paragraph the council asserted its legitimacy and defined its three goals: eradication of the schism, union, and reform of the Church. Legitimately reunited, it defined itself as a general council. As such, it claimed to represent the universal Church, to derive its power directly from Christ, and to require obedience from any person, including the pope, in matters concerning faith and union (Mansi 27 590 D). On 9 October 1417, shortly before the election of Martin V and not unrelated to that election, the council adopted the decree Frequens (Mansi 27 1159 BE) in order to organize the convocation of future councils. By virtue of this decree, Martin V first convened the Council of Siena (1423) and then the Council of Basel (1431–49), which was dissolved by Eugene IV in the very year that it opened. The policies of Eugene on the one hand and the attachment of the Fathers of Basel to the spirit of Constance on the other at first led the Council of Basel to forbid both the dissolution of the council and its transfer to another location (decree Cogitanti; Mansi 29 24 D-26 A)—after Eugene IV had ordered the transfer of the council to Ferrara—to try the pope, to remove him, and to replace him with Amédée VIII, duke of Savoy, who took the name Felix V. It was, therefore, in the circumstances of a struggle against the pope that the council claimed its own infallibility. And having become an instrument of battle, the conciliarism of the Basel gathering provoked a new division of the Church and a new pontifical schism. After the experience of Basel, the papacy, followed by many theologians, would always engage itself more openly on the quest for pontifical monarchy.

d) The effects of the sudden radicalization that conciliarism underwent in Basel show, on a practical level, that no balance of power between the pope and the council was established there and that no rule was decreed either on the government* of the Church between two councils or on its government in the case of a vacancy in the Seat of Peter. On the theoretical level, they show that there was at the time no common conciliary theology. The numerous ecclesiological treatises of the time that expound conciliary ideas express only the opinions of individual theologians, and the reconstruction of a common fund of opinions and arguments is the work of historians. And even these are not agreed on the character and value of the principal documents passed at Constance and Basel. The most controversial is the decree Haec sancta. Some grant this the dogmatic weight of an article of faith recognized de facto by the two councils, by Martin V, by Eugene IV (at first), and by the principal theologians of the 15th century. Others, however, emphasize that it was only because of specific historical circumstances that brought the council to decree its superiority over the pope, in order to put an end to the schism. It was thus an urgent measure provoked by the flight of John XXIII and a decision with only a limited scope, which the Council of Basel nevertheless worked very hard to change into a dogma* (Mansi 29 187).

- The main sources comprise the texts of the councils of Constance and Basel: see Mansi 27–29, Venice, 1784.
- ◆ B. Tierney (1955), Foundations of the Conciliar Theory, Cambridge.
- O. de La Brosse (1965), Le pape et le concile: La comparaison de leurs pouvoirs à la veille de la Réforme, Paris.
- P. de Vooght (1965), Les pouvoirs du concile et l'autorité du pape au concile de Constance, Paris.
- Fr. Oakley (1969), Council over Pope? Towards a Provisional Ecclesiology, New York.
- A. Black (1970), Monarchy and Community: Political Ideas in the Later Conciliar Controversy 1430–1450, Cambridge.
- R. Bäumer (Ed.) (1976), Die Entwicklung des Konziliarismus, Darmstadt.
- G. Alberigo (1981), Chiesa conciliare: Identità e significazione del conciliarismo, Brescia.
- Fr. Oakley (1983), “Conciliar Theory,” DMA 3, 510–23 (bibl.).
- H.-J. Sieben (1983), Traktate und Theorien zum Konzil, Frankfurt.
- H. Smolinsky (1990), “Konziliarismus,” TRE 19, 579–86 (bibl.).
- A. Frenken (1993), Die Erforschung des Konstanzer Konzils (1414–1418) in den letzten 100 Jahren, AHC 25, 1–2.
- S. Swiezawski (1997), Les tribulations de l'ecclésiologie à la fin du Moyen Age, Paris.

ZÉNON KALUZA

See also Authority; Basel-Ferrara-Florence, Council of; Constance, Council of; Council; Gallicanism; Indefectibility of the Church; Infallibility; Pope; Structures, Ecclesial

Condonation. See Indulgences

Confession. See Penance

Confirmation

1. The First Four Centuries

The relationships between baptism* and confirmation have been very frequently discussed, particularly by Anglican theologians since the 19th century. In the line of A. J. Mason, Dom Gr. Dix (1946) minimized the importance of baptism in favor of the gift of the Holy* Spirit received at confirmation. In reaction, G. Lampe (1951) stressed the gift of the Holy Spirit accomplished at baptism. These debates can now be overcome on the condition of recognizing the existence, from the New Testament on, of different traditions and diverse emphases placed on the rites of Christian initiation carried out in the course of a single celebration. It is essential to take this ritual unity into account in order to understand the sacramental life of the early centuries, which had no technical term to designate the postbaptismal rites or what we now call confirmation—baptism at the time designated the process as a whole and thus had a broader meaning than it does today.

The difficulty of articulating the function of water and the role of the Holy Spirit appeared in the New Testament itself. There is often an opposition between the baptism with water of John the Baptist and the baptism with the Holy Spirit of Jesus* (Mt 3:11 and parallel passages; Acts 1:5, 11:16, 19:1–7). Sometimes the gift of the Holy Spirit precedes and leads to baptism (Acts 10:44–48). Most frequently, water and the Holy Spirit are mentioned together in succession (Acts 2:38; Jn 3:5; 1 Jn 5:6ff.). The Pauline writings several times omit mention of the Holy Spirit (Rom 6:3–11; Gal 3:26ff.; Col 3:9ff.) and sometimes of Christ* (1 Cor 12:13).

This diversity continued in the ancient Church*, where three traditions* can be distinguished. The tradition of Antioch (Acts of Thomas, Baptismal Catecheses by John Chrysostom*) had only an anointment with muron (holy* oils) on the forehead, the sphragis (“seal”), then three immersions, and the Eucharist*. In Jerusalem* (Mystagogic catecheses by Cyril), the three immersions were followed by the anointment with muron, to which was attributed the gift of the Holy Spirit, and by the Eucharist. The West had prebaptismal rites (exorcisms*), followed by three immersions and postbaptismal rites for the gift of the Holy Spirit, carried out by the bishop*: the laying* on of hands, anointment, and sometimes the sign of the cross; everything came to a conclusion with the Eucharist. Thus, the gift of the Holy Spirit, always considered in the initiation* as a whole, was sometimes attributed to prebaptismal rites, sometimes to postbaptismal rites. The East gave a privileged place to anointment (which the New Testament seems to conceive of as a literary symbol), and the blessing* of the oil by the bishop (later by the patriarch) assumed major importance there. The East also had laying on of hands. Under the influence of the pneumatological discussions of the late fourth century (Council of Constantinople*, 381), of the greater importance accorded to the Paulinian corpus (particularly Rom 6), and also probably of the reconciliation of heretics carried out by rites similar to postbaptismal rites (B. Botte; see Saint-Palais d'Aussac 1943), in the late fourth century, the East adopted postbaptismal anointment with pneumatological implications. The three rituals preserved in the Apostolic Constitutions (III. 16; VII. 22; VII. 39) give evidence of these modifications.

We can thus observe in Christian antiquity that initiation was accomplished through a variety of rites but in the unity of a single celebration. This diversified unity is attested in the West in both liturgical practice and theological reflection. The Apostolic Tradition (Rome, early third century) describes catechumenate and initiation in the framework of a vigil (probably at Easter); baptism took place in a baptistry and concluded with a christological anointment done by a presbyter*; the baptized then went into the church, where the bishop gave them a Trinitarian anointment, a pneumatological laying on of hands, and the sign of the cross. Also, speaking of Novatian—the validity of whose ordinations he questioned—Pope* Cornelius wrote to Fabius of Antioch (251), “However, after having escaped from illness, he did not even obtain the others (ceremonies; ton loipôn), in which it is necessary to participate according to the rule of the Church, and he did not receive the seal (sphragisthênai) of the bishop; not having obtained all that, how could he have obtained the Holy Spirit?” (Eusebius of Caesarea, HE VI. 43. 15; SC 41.157).

For his part, Cyprian* wrote that Christians are born from either sacrament* (sacramento utroque nascantur: Ep. 72. I. 2 and 73. XXI. 3); in each case he relied on John 3:5 and thus was most probably thinking of water and the Holy Spirit. And even if these passages are not to be interpreted in the (posterior) framework of doctrine of a sacramental septenary, they evidence an awareness in the West that the Holy Spirit is given most especially to Christians, in the course of their initiation, by postbaptismal rites carried out by the bishop.

In the late fourth century (baptism* II, 1 end), the increase in the number of Christians gave rise to different practices. The East favored the unity of initiation, for which the presbyter became the usual minister; the relationship to the bishop was maintained by the use of oil that he had blessed (Spain also had this discipline for a time). The West permitted presbyters to celebrate baptism and the Eucharist, but confirmation retained its link with the bishop. This Western discipline was established by the time of Innocent I, who in his letter to Decentius, bishop of Gubbio, in 416 recognized that presbyters had the right to baptize, but bishops alone could confirm (“record”). “From the point of view of the history* of the liturgy*, this is the origin of confirmation or, more precisely, the framework in which confirmation came to be understood as a particular sacrament” (Kretschmar 1983).

2. The Middle Ages

a) Terminology. The vocabulary of confirmatio, to designate the intervention of the bishop after the rite of water, appeared in Gaul in the mid-fifth century; the first mention is found in canons 3 and 4 of the Council of Riez (439; CChr.SL 148, 67). “The terms perficere, perfectio, confirmare, confirmatio express the conviction that the rite of confirmation adds to baptism a kind of perfection. . . . All that the word expresses is the feeling that confirmation is a complement to baptism” (Botte 1958; see Fischer 1965). The relationship to the eucharistic meaning of confirmare is eloquent (De Clerck 1986). From there, the terms passed into liturgical books from the eighth century on.

b) Growing Dissociation of Baptism from Confirmation. The new situation created in late antiquity was well expressed in the Pentecost homily delivered by a bishop in southern Gaul, probably Faustus of Riez (formerly attributed to Gallican Eusebius [between 460 and 470], CChr.SL 101, 331–41; see Van Buchem 1967). He presents the question in these terms to his listeners: “After the mystery* of baptism, what good can be done for me by the ministry* of the one who is going to confirm me?” His answer relies on a military comparison: the soldier, after having enlisted in the army, has to be armed for combat. Hence, “The Holy Spirit . . . in baptism gives fully as to innocence, and at confirmation grants an increase as to grace* (augmentum . . . ad gratiam) In baptism we are washed, after baptism we are strengthened” (Van Buchem 1967). This homily points then in the direction of a theological justification for the recently established practice; it tends to recognize the distinction between baptism and confirmation by attributing specific effects to them. It had unexpected success in history since the False Decretals of the ninth century attributed it to a fourth-century pope (Melchiades or Miltiades; PL 130. 240–41); it later passed into the Decretal of Gratian (III. V. 1–2; Friedberg I, 1413). The Scholastic* theologians accepted it as a papal authority* of the fourth century. During the High Middle Ages, in episcopal cities, Christian initiation continued to be celebrated by the bishop at Easter; confirmation often took place a week later (R. Maur, De clericorum institutione II. 39, PL 107. 353). In rural areas, the priest baptized and gave the Eucharist (in the species of wine); the relationship to Easter gave way to a relationship to birth. It was stressed that parents should not fail to present their child to the bishop for confirmation on his next visit, if it were to take place. The ritual of confirmation was barely developed; there was no pastoral role (Gy 1959). At the time there was no attempt to justify the delay in confirmation; one has the feeling that what began as an exception had slowly become the rule. For example, Alcuin, a great scholar educated by the reading of the fathers* of the church, listed the sacraments blithely in the order baptism, Eucharist, and confirmation (Ep. 134 and 137; PL 101. 613–14; MGH. Ep. 4. 202 and 211).

In the 12th century, the practice of baptism quam primum had been established; confirmation took place during the bishop's visit, and the Eucharist was delayed until the Age of Reason. We thus find again the sequence of Christian antiquity, but the rites, considered as three of the sacraments of the septenary (1150), had become autonomous. It was on these grounds that Scholastic theologians were to create the theology* of confirmation. With formulations that go back to Faustus (augmentum gratiae—robur ad pugnam), they stated that the specific grace of confirmation is the gift of the Holy Spirit; like baptism, it confers a character, that delegates to the spiritual combat; its material is the oil blessed by the bishop and its form the formula Consigno te (Thomas* Aquinas, ST IIIa, q. 72).

3. The Reformation and Modern Times

The fundamental critique by the Reformation of confirmation was its lack of a biblical basis; Reformation Churches thus did not see it as having sacramental value, although they maintained it as an ecclesiastical ceremony. Bucer*, however, considered it as a sacrament, although he noted that its meaning was that of a profession of faith at the conclusion of the teaching of the catechism (Bornert 1989); this novel view, accepted by Lutheranism* and Anglicanism*, had considerable influence. As for Calvin*, he abolished confirmation. The Council of Trent* reasserted the sacramental value of confirmation, for which the bishop was the usual minister (DS 1628–30). The Catechism of Trent stipulates, "It is not fitting to administer this sacrament to those who do not yet have the use of reason*; and although we do not think it necessary to wait for the age of twelve, it is at least appropriate not to administer it before the age of seven" (chap. 17, §4).

In the 18th century, the Reformed Churches, under the influence of the Swiss pastor J. F. Ostervald, reintroduced a confirmation, understood as the personal adhesion of the baptized to what his parents had asked for him; the Geneva liturgy* of 1945 calls it "the normal complement (and as it were the second half) of the baptism of children" (von Allmen 1978). This appears to be a clear indication of modernity; after the Renaissance, in a world ruled by subjectivity, the baptism of little children seemed culturally inconceivable without the possibility of a later personal repetition. This role has often been played by confirmation.

In the Catholicism* of this period north of the Alps, there was a constant delay in the age of confirmation (Levet 1958). This explains why in those countries the decree of Pius X on the first communion of children by the age of six or seven (1910) officially reversed the order of succession of sacraments, while that order remained intact in the Mediterranean countries.

4. Vatican II and the New "Ritual"

The council* documents do not contain a renewed presentation of confirmation; only LG 26 specifies that the bishop is the originating minister. This slight terminological change has wide bearing; it legitimates the practices of the Eastern Churches since late antiquity and allows bishops to delegate priests to confer confirmation, and it thereby removes the principal historical cause of the separation between baptism and confirmation.

Still more important was the publication of the new Ritual (1971), which opens with the apostolic constitution Divinae consortium naturae. This asserts for the first time in an official document "the unity [of the three sacraments] of Christian initiation"; it is thereby explicitly linked to the ancient tradition, passing over the historical development of the West since the High Middle Ages (a vision that the CEC [1992] faithfully reproduced). The apostolic constitution defines the effect of the sacrament as being the gift of the Holy Spirit itself (donum ineffabile, ipsum Spiritum Sanctum). An essential change, "as a profession of the unity of a single sacrament" (Gy 1986), it replaces the medieval sacramental formula with that of the Byzantine liturgy (Ligier 1973): "N. be marked by the Holy Spirit, the gift of God." And in a convoluted expression, it finally specifies the essential rite of the sacrament: "The sacrament of confirmation is conferred by the anointment of the holy chrism on the forehead, done by laying on of hands, and by these words: 'Accipe signaculum Domini Spiritus Sancti.'"

In the ecumenical area, the relationship between baptism and confirmation continues to raise difficulties. For example, in the Report on the process of 'BEM' and Reactions of the Churches of 1991 (Clarification Notes 10), one reads, "a) The reactions to the BEM... reveal... disagreements about the manner in which the anointment and the seal of the Holy Spirit should be expressed in the baptismal rite, and on their relationship to communion and participation in the Eucharist. b) In fact, an evolution is coming to light in the attitude and the practice of Churches as to confirmation, while they are at the same time increasingly rediscovering that in the beginning there was only a single complex rite of Christian initiation. They continue to consider confirmation from two different perspectives. For some, confirmation is the special sign of the gift of the Holy Spirit, a sign which takes its place in the entire process of initiation; for others, confirmation is especially the opportunity for a personal profession of faith on the part of those who have been baptized at a younger age. All agree that the first sign of the process of initiation into the body of Christ is the rite of baptism with water; all agree that the objective of initiation is to be fed by the Eucharist.”

5. Theology and Pastoral Expression of Confirmation

The theology* of confirmation is most clearly expressed in the relationships it has with baptism, the Eucharist, the Holy Spirit, and the Church.

a) Relationship to Baptism. In contrast to Scholastic attempts, it now seems futile to attempt to find in baptism and confirmation specific effects that can be properly distinguished. It is more fruitful to view them as two poles in the dynamic continuity of Christian initiation. Any theology of confirmation that does not closely associate it with baptism turns out to be ill founded from the point of view of the tradition*. The relationship between the two sacraments is often expressed by the relationship between Easter and Pentecost, between the mission of the Son and the mission of the Holy Spirit.

b) Relationship to the Holy Spirit. This is the common denominator of what can be said about confirmation. This relationship, however, is not exclusive, as though the Holy Spirit were not at work in the other sacraments. But it takes on a particular force. Following many other documents, the apostolic constitution Divine consortium nature asserts that through confirmation the baptized receive, as an ineffable gift, the Holy Spirit itself. Just as Christ is at work in all the sacraments, but the Eucharist provides to communicants His body and His blood themselves, so through confirmation the Holy Spirit communicates itself in an entirely special manner to Christians, as the breath of their personal life and the strength necessary for the evangelical mission*. The new sacramental formulation makes it possible to unfold these meanings while not denying that the Spirit blows where it wishes.

c) Relationship to the Bishop and the Church. This relationship, which was strictly maintained in the Western tradition until Vatican II, is also affirmed by the East, which attributes a great deal of importance to the blessing of the oil by the bishop or by the patriarch. Although it has often been explained by a difference in power between the bishop and the presbyter, it is more meaningful to see it against the background of the relationship between the third and fourth articles of the Credo, between pneumatology and ecclesiology*. It is in fact the Holy Spirit who gives body to the Church (second epiclesis* of the Eucharist prayers), as it gave His human body to Jesus (“conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary*”) and as it gives Him His eucharistic body (first epiclesis). The presence of the bishop (or of his delegate) as minister of confirmation thereby indicates that to become a Christian means opening oneself to a communion* with the entire Church for which the bishop is responsible (Bouhot 1968).

Confirmation thus clearly appears as a sacrament, an ecclesiastical act mediating an action of God*, a sacrament of initiation, intended for all Christians in order to communicate to them the supreme gift of God, and not only for the most committed among them to a particular responsibility in the Church (Moingt 1973). As for the order of succession of the three sacraments of initiation, it is far from a matter of indifference despite the avatars of Western history. It is in any event important that Western theology never attempted to justify confirmation conferred after the Eucharist (Bourgeois 1993).

d) Pastoral Problems. The pastoral realization of confirmation poses many problems, for its most usual practice is set in opposition to its Ritual and its theology. The two currents noted above in the report of the WWC are also found within Catholicism*. As a function of the current conditions of Christian witness, the second tendency is leading to a delay of confirmation to a later age, in light of a deeper Christian commitment. It takes its place in the line of the Western tradition (Bourgeois 1993). However, it risks confusing confirmation, a sacrament of initiation, the pneumatological seal of baptism, and commitment. The latter, which represents a fundamental dimension of Christian life, is, however, coextensive with the whole existence of Christians, without being particularly linked to a specific sacrament. We should avoid thinking a priori that confirmation provides the pastoral answer to all questions posed by the Christian development of the young.

● a) Ritual

Ordo confirmationis, Rome, 1971.

b) Bibliography

L. Leijssen (1989), “Selected Bibliography on Confirmation,” QuLi 70, 23–28.

c) Studies

- Fr. de Saint-Palais d'Aussac (1943), La réconciliation des hérétiques dans l'Église latine: Contribution à la théologie de l'initiation chrétienne, Paris.
- G. Dix (1946), The Theology of Confirmation in Relation to Baptism, London.
- G. Lampe (1951), The Seal of the Spirit: A Study in the Doctrine of Baptism and Confirmation in the New Testament and the Fathers, London.
- B. Botte (1958), "Le vocabulaire ancien de la confirmation," MD 54, 5–22.
- R. Levet (1958), "L'âge de la confirmation dans la législation des diocèses de France depuis le concile de Trente," MD 54, 118–42.
- P.-M. Gy (1959), "Histoire liturgique du sacrement de confirmation," MD 58, 135–45.
- J. D. C. Fisher (1965), "The Use of the Words 'confirmare' and 'confirmatio,'" in Christian Initiation: Baptism in the Medieval West, London, 141–48.
- L. A. Van Buchem (1967), L'homélie pseudo-eusébiennne de Pentecôte: L'origine de la confirmatio en Gaule méridionale et l'interprétation de ce rite par Fauste de Riez, Nimègue.
- J.-P. Bouhot (1969), La confirmation, sacrement de la communion ecclésiastique, Lyon.
- L. Ligier (1973), La confirmation Sens et conjuncture œcuménique hier et aujourd'hui, ThH 23 (see M. Arranz [1991], OCP 57, 207–11).
- J. Moingt (1973), Le devenir chrétien: Initiation chrétienne des jeunes, Paris.
- G. Kretschmar (1983), "Firmung," TRE 11, 192–204.
- M. Maccarone (1985), "L'unità del battesimo e della cresima nelle testimonianze della liturgia romana dal III al XVI secolo," Lat 51, 88–152.
- P. De Clerck (1986), "La dissociation du baptême et de la confirmation au haut Moyen Age," MD 168, 47–75.
- J. Zerndl (1986), Die Theologie der Firmung in der Vorbereitung und in den Akten des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils, Paderborn.
- R. Bornert (1989), "La confirmation dans les Églises de la réforme: Tradition luthérienne, calvinienne et anglicane," QuLi 70, 51–68.
- P. De Clerck (1989), "La confirmation, moyen de catéchèse?," QuLi 70, 89–100.
- A. Nocent (1991), "La confirmation, questions posées aux théologiens et aux pasteurs," Gr 72, 689–704.
- H. Bourgeois (1993), "La place de la confirmation dans l'initiation chrétienne," NRT 115, 516–42.

PAUL DE CLERCK

See also Baptism; Eucharist; Initiation, Christian; Sacrament

Congar, Yves. See Thomism

Congregationalism

Congregationalism is a radical form of Protestant ecclesiology* in which every local community (congregation) gathered around its ministers fully embodies the universal Church*. Its chief characteristics are the independence and strict autonomy of each community, the democratic government of the communities, and the logical application of the theology* of the universal priesthood* of the baptized.

The story of Congregationalism is centered on the English-speaking world and begins with the realization that the ecclesiastical policy of Elizabeth I (1533–1603) was not tending toward the establishment of a rigorously Protestant* Church of England but rather to the choice of a middle way between Rome* and Geneva (the Elizabethan Settlement). As early as 1550, groups ("Separatists") had broken away to form purely protestant cells. This movement gathered momentum after the promulgation of the Act of Uniformity of 1559; and in 1582, when R. Browne (c. 1550–1633) published two works championing a Congregationalist theology of the Church, his stand found enough answering expectation for these tendencies to become an organized movement, known initially as “Brownists.” Congregationalist parishes were created at Southwark, Norwich, and elsewhere. Browne himself fled to the Netherlands after being imprisoned for schism, then broke with his community and returned to the bosom of the Church of England, but his successors at the head of the movement completed the split.

Congregationalism was then faced with immediate persecution, and the Congregationalist leaders J. Greenwood, H. Barrow, and J. Penry were executed in 1593. Congregationalism went underground in England, and an emigration ensued, chiefly to America. The conflict between Charles I and Parliament permitted the Congregationalists to make an official reappearance, henceforward under the name of “Independents,” and Cromwell’s policy allowed them (as it did the Puritans, with whom their early history is closely intertwined) to conceive the dream of an English Christianity with a Presbyterian or Congregationalist structure. The Restoration put an end to this dream, and in 1662 a new Act of Uniformity made the Congregationalists and their allies into “nonconformists.” The Toleration Act of 1689 nonetheless granted them the right to exist.

Despite the status imposed on it, Congregationalism was to exercise a real influence on English intellectual and religious life over the following two centuries. Excluded from the universities, the Congregationalists founded academies of a high caliber and would later play a part in the foundation of the University of London. And while there was no Congregationalist theology strictly speaking—rather, Congregationalism still numbered among its ranks some theologians of high standing, such as J. Owen (1616–83), T. Hooker (1586–1647), I. Watts (1674–1748), and P. Doddridge (1702–51) and (in America) J. Cotton (1584–1652), J. Edwards*, and H. Bushnell (1802–76).

The governing principle of Congregationalism never condemned the Congregationalist communities to isolation. From the 17th century it was clearly accepted that the absolute independence of the communities did not preclude a degree of interdependence, the first goal of which was to organize evangelical activity, then external mission*. In 1790 “county unions” were set up. The year 1831 saw the creation of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. In 1920 the former districts were regrouped into provinces, each having a “provincial moderator” responsible for coordinating the appointment of ministers*. In 1970 the Congregationalist communities founded the Congregational Church in England and Wales, and then in 1972 the largest part of the new Church merged with the Presbyterian Church of England to form the United Reformed Church. Similar processes of federation and union took place in America and in the mission countries. A significant minority of the English communities refused this development, however, and these still maintain the principle of the total independence of the local cells within the body of the (liberal) Congregational Federation and the (evangelical) Evangelical Fellowship of Congregational Churches.

Although Congregationalism has always refused to equip itself with confessional texts that would set a norm, circumstances have led to the drafting of a number of professions of faith. In the Declaration of Savoy (1658), a text closely faithful to the 1643 Confession of Westminster, 120 communities declared themselves in favor of an ecclesiastical constitution of the Congregationalist type and not of the presbyterian-synodal model. The Declaration of Faith, which followed the establishment of the Congregational Union in 1832, is notable for the way it distances itself somewhat from Congregationalism’s original Calvinism. The Declaration of Faith of 1967 is original in presenting the positions of other Christian Churches alongside the confessed theology of Congregationalism. The most representative Congregationalist texts are, however, the “contracts of alliance,” ratified by the communities, in which they express in a consistent and stereotyped manner the ecclesiological ideas that have impelled Congregationalism since its inception. Lastly, the Congregationalists celebrate the Eucharist* and baptism* and practice infant baptism.

- B. Hanbury (1839–44), Historical Memorials Relating to Independents or Congregationalists, 3 vols., London.
- W. Willistom Walker (Ed.) (1893), Creeeds and Platforms of Congregationalism, New York, repr. 1960.
- H. W. Clark (1911–13), History of English Nonconformity, from Wyclif to the Close of the Nineteenth Century, 2 vols., London.
- G. G. Atkins, F. L. Fagley (1942), History of American Congregationalism, Boston and Chicago.
- H. M. Davies (1952), The English Free Churches, Oxford.
- D. Horton (1952), Congregationalism: A Study in Church Polity, London.
- H. Escott (1960), A History of Congregationalism in Scotland, Glasgow.
- Congregational Journal*, Hollywood, Calif., 1975–76.
- R. B. Knox (Ed.) (1977), Reformation, Conformity and Dissent, London.
- M. Deacon (1980), Philipp Doddridge of Northampton, Northampton.
- J.-P. Willaime (1982), “Du problème de l’autorité dans les Églises protestantes pluralistes,” RHPPhR 62, 385–400.

GALAHAD THREEPWOOD

See also Anglicanism; Calvinism; Local Church; Puritanism

Conscience

Narrowly defined, conscience refers to the painful awareness of wrongdoing and to the seat of such feelings. A broader definition speaks of conscience as an inner source of moral authority that judges and guides us. The history of the idea of conscience is extraordinarily complex, touching most aspects of the history of morality. The concept cannot simply be explained through the history of terms (conscience, Gewissen, conscientia, synt[d]eresis, suneidesis) because their meanings vary depending on their contexts. One must look at what determine conscience in each case and especially at the concept of personality and the type of society that are involved. In Christian theology*, the concept of conscience varies according to given anthropological and soteriological concepts as well as the understandings of moral life in relation to God*, Christ*, and Spirit.

1. Antiquity

The first instance of the word suneidèsis is found in Democritus (VS B 297); the corresponding verb can be found, for example, in Xenophon (Memorabilia II) or Sophocles (Antigone) and means a “sharing of knowledge.” The activity of conscience was unknown in primitive Greek culture. Homer’s heroic characters, lacking in reflective moral awareness, locate the goodness of an action* not in intention* but in the consequences that it entails, especially with respect to reputation or dishonor. Moral identity is a function not of conscience but of the approval or disapproval from the group, which bestows honor or shame depending on whether one respects the conventions linked to traditional social roles. The tragedians are more interested in moral conflicts because tragic figures are less completely identified with convention. Aeschylus (Agamemnon) and especially Euripides (Orestes) describe the torment of the guilty person conscious or his fault by interiorizing the myth* of the Furies pursuing the criminal. This is still remote from later notions of conscience: the tragic hero suffers not only from internal conflict but also from the defilement imposed by destiny. Neither Plato nor Aristotle systematically discusses conscience. Later Platonists seemed to recognize conscience in Socrates’ demon*, who warned him against wrongdoing (Phaedrus), although it was probably divinatory in character. In Aristotle, ethical knowing and judging are attributed to phronèsis.

The crucible for Western views of conscience was Roman Stoicism, for which conscience is an internal moral guide that approves or disapproves a conduct. The highest element in the human being is the presence of natural law* (Cicero, De legibus; Seneca, Epistulae), which can morally guide behavior and is known as such by reason. This is why Cicero identifies “right conscience” (recta conscientia) and “right reason” (recta ratio) in De finibus. This view of conscience as “a sacred spirit within us that observes and controls our good and bad actions” (sacer intra nos spiritus malorum bonorumque nostrorum observator et custos; Seneca, Epistulae), also found in Tacitus, Livy, and Quintilian, drifted into popular usage and formed part of the background to the New Testament.

2. Scripture

a) Old Testament. There is no term for conscience in the Old Testament, which nevertheless describes the troubles caused by remorse (1 Sm 24:5f.; 2 Sm 24:10; Ps 32:3f.; Is 57:21) and the peace* brought on by a clean conscience (Ps 26; Jb 27). “Heart” (1 Kgs 2:44, 83:38; Eccl 7:22; Jb 7:6) is the seat of self-knowledge, which depends on God’s omniscience and omnipresence as lawgiver and judge (Is 139; Prv 16:2, 20, 27). The concept that conscience would play a deliberative or guiding role does not appear, however. In the Old Testament, reflective distance from God may be covert disobedience (Gn 3:1–7), and knowledge of God’s law must be affective and practical rather than a cause for thought. The Septuagint (ancient translations* of the Bible) rarely uses suneidèsis (Eccl 10:20; Wis 17:11; Sir 6:26, 42:18).

b) The New Testament. Conscience is not an essential concept in the New Testament. The term is absent from the Gospels*, where the “heart” is still the center of moral knowledge and will (Mt 5:8, 5:28, 15:10–20; Mk 7:18–23; Lk 6:45). Conscience appears a number of times in the Paul’s letters but without the connotations that it has today. Conscience is not the central theme of Pauline theology. Paul appeals to his good “conscience” to justify of his ministry* (Rom 9:1; 1 Cor 4:4; 2 Cor 1:12; compare Acts 23:1, 24:16) and waits for a similar judgment from others (2 Cor 4:2, 5:11). Romans 13:5 contains an anticipatory idea of conscience: Christians must obey the state to avoid a later condemnation. When Paul speaks of conscience when discussing the issue of flesh sacrificed to idols (1 Cor 8:1–13, 10:18–31; Rom 14)—passages that would be key in later theological developments—conscience is the capacity not of moral direction but of self-condemnation. The “strong” conscience, who knows the nothingness of idols, is free from self-accusation about consuming meat sacrificed to them, but this strong freedom should not scandalize the “weak” conscience, which, not possessing the same knowledge, may be wounded by such action. Here, conscience is not a source of absolute moral certainty (it is knowledge, not conscience, that liberates from scruple); nor does conscience act autonomously (the strong act out of love* for the weak). A further crucial passage for later thinkers is Romans 2:14–16; although the text is often thought to furnish exegetical warrant for the idea of a “natural law” written in the heart and guarded by conscience, it may be that Paul referred only to those pagans who “by nature do what the law requires” and not to humanity in general. Moreover, the center of gravity in Paul’s thinking lies elsewhere: it is Christ*, not nature, conscience, or law, that is ultimate (Gal 3:24). The pastorals refer to “good conscience” (1 Tm 1:5, 19), “clear conscience” (1 Tm 3:9; 2 Tm 1:3; compare 1 Pt 3:16, 21), and its opposite (1 Tm 4:2; Ti 1, 15), to speak of honesty. Although the usage here is less immediately soteriological (and closer to post-apostolic usage; see 1 Clem 1, 3, 24 and 41, 4), the connection between conscience, understood in this sense and faith* (1 Tm 1, 5, 19 and 3, 9) is important. In Hebrews, conscience is the locus of guilt, which is cleansed by Christ’s priestly sacrifice* (Heb 9:9, 14, 10:22; compare Ignatius, Trall. 7).

In the New Testament, therefore, conscience is a secondary notion. Introspective concerns are generally absent from the New Testament, which does not explain or justify behavior in terms of an “inner voice” attributed to God. Partly this is because of the weight accorded to public conventions and roles in a culture oriented to honor and shame. Further, the language and perspectives used are not that of later theologies or philosophies. What would be later associated with the notion of conscience, such as moral experience, control, and approval, is expressed in the New Testament in terms of Spirit, justification*, faith, and the return of the Lord to judge human beings (*parousia). In this light, the New Testament differs both from Stoicism and from Philo’s notion of conscience as the organ of reproof (elegkhos) and inner judge (dikastes) presiding over and evaluating actions (De fuga et inventione, §118; De decalogo, §87).

3. Patristic and Medieval Period

a) The Fathers. Although systematic treatment of the subject is rare in the Fathers*, the notion of conscience gained importance during the patristic period. Drawing on Stoic sources (Christian Stoicism*), Origen develops the notion of moral principles universally known (Contra Celsum 1, 4, SC 132), and, in an important commentary of 1 Corinthians 2:11, he identifies conscience and the Spirit of God within us (In Psalmos 30, 6, PG 12, 1300 b), an idea that would be taken up again later. John Chrysostom* turns conscience into a key factor of morality: the voice of conscience reveals the moral law, which is the general or natural context in which Christian morality shows its specificity (De statutis, Opera omnia, 1834). Augustine*’s view is significantly different: natural law theory is chastened by its repudiation of the moral optimism of Pelagianism*, and, although he can speak of the golden rule (Mt 7:12) as “inscribed in the conscience” (scripta [in] conscientia; Confessions 1, 18), conscience is essentially knowing that God knows us (10, 2) and a confirmation of divine judgments (Enarrationes in psalmos 7, 9, CChr.SL 38) rather than in relative detachment from divine presence.

b) The Medieval Period. Medieval discussions of conscience generally focus on two terms: synteresis (a corrupt translation of suneidèsis) and conscientia. In general, the discussion emerges from the passage in Pierre Lombard’s Sentences (c. 1100–60), in which he wonders about Romans 7:15 if there are two wills within the sinner in conflict with himself and in which he briefly refers to Jerome’s commentary of Ezekiel 1:4–14. Jerome identifies the eagle in Ezekiel’s vision with what he calls synteresis; if this capacity was retained after the Fall, Jerome asserts that some wicked persons did not retain what he calls conscientia. Commentators solved the contradiction by distinguishing synteresis as the ultimate ground of moral knowledge from conscientia as the application of principles. The distinction receives sophisticated treatment from Bonaventure* and Thomas* Aquinas. For Bonaventure, conscientia belongs to affectivity; as such, it is a habitus, a disposition, not a deduction. Aquinas, by contrast, views conscientia as an act of bringing moral principles to the actual situation (De veritate 17, 1), whereas synteresis is the habitus that contains the basic principles of natural law (ST Ia IIae, q. 94, a. 1, ad. 2). Unlike what would be done later, however, Aquinas views these principles more as a formal framework than as a set of rules whose application is to be determined with the help of a casuistry*.

The distinction between synteresis and conscience explains how the issue of knowing whether conscience is always an obligation is dealt with. Synderesis cannot err; conscience, however, may err by not applying the principles correctly, but it must always be obeyed since obedience to God's law is a basic principle of synderesis. To disobey even a mistaken conscience is therefore to act against synderesis.

In all these debates, conscience is increasingly viewed as a guide in the moral realm rather than the seat of guilt. Although it operates in relative independence and not under God's direct impulse, conscience should not be construed subjectively. Aquinas's insistence on practical reason's reference to an objective moral order distinguishes him sharply from Abelard's intention-oriented and quasi-absolute conscience: "There is no sin that is not against conscience" (non est peccatum nisi contra conscientiam; Ethica 13).

4. Reformation

A decisive shift occurs with the Reformers, especially Luther*. Conscience no longer is associated with vows, asceticism*, and penance* (association strengthened at the Fourth Lateran* Council, which had made confession obligatory). Henceforth, faith rather than practical reason becomes key with regard to ethics. Conscience is no longer treated as part of the metaphysics of created personhood* but is integrated into the soteriological notion of sin* and grace*. For Luther, conscience is the site of a struggle between hopeless ethical and religious justification through law on the one hand and faith in the justifying word* of God on the other. When conscience is "terrified of the Law...rely only on grace and the word of comfort" (WA 40/1, 204). No longer naturally oriented toward God, but set in the context of Christ's liberating work, conscience really is a matter of faith: "faith born of this word will bring peace of conscience" (WA 1, 541). Conscience is not the center of moral judgment since faith acknowledges God's judgment about the person rather than conscience's judgments about the person's acts. Good conscience thus comes before doing good deeds and not the reverse. Moral and pastoral theology must thus move away from the formation of conscience or its instruction in religious observances to deal first and foremost with conversion* and trust. Calvin*, similarly, emphasizes that conscience is best understood in relation to salvation*; freed by Christ's gift (Inst. III, 19, 15), conscience need not heed anyone, even though externally it is due to civil obedience.

5. Modern Times

a) Philosophy Modern thinkers often read the Reformation as asserting the rights of individual conscience over Church authority*. It is mistaking faith for subjectivity, as well as underestimating the objective character of classical Protestantism*. To turn Christianity into a religion of conscience (Holl), one needs a certain philosophy of modernity, in which authority is accorded to conscience as an autonomous faculty of self-governance, increasingly detached from rational consideration of moral reality. Montaigne describes it as a mean of self-knowledge ("I have my laws and my court to judge myself"; Essais III). Descartes* conceives conscience as affective rather than rational (Passions de l'âme). Spinoza understands it within the perspective of his ethics of self-preservation (Ethica IV). Conscience thus becomes the nucleus of personal decision around which orbit other realities (authoritative doctrines, public conventions) that furnish material for debate. Conscience is close to moral freedom seen as autonomy, whose concept entails that the essential condition of moral existence is the absence of determination by nature or society. Such affirmations find their political expression in the principle that "it is nothing but tyranny to wish to predominate over conscience" (Bayle), a principle that lies at the heart of liberal pluralism.

The English school of "moral sense" (the Earl of Shaftesbury [1671–1713], Francis Hutcheson [1694–1746], and Joseph Butler [1692–1752]) turns conscience into "a principle of reflection in men, by which they distinguish between, approve and disapprove, their own actions" (Butler). Against this, Hume (1711–76) argues that conscience is a matter of feeling and not reason (A Treatise of Human Nature), thereby distancing conscience from nature and giving his theory a distinctive voluntarist twist. In the German idealist tradition, Kant* and Hegel* bring conscience closer to subjectivity. For Kant, conscience, self-sufficient and subject to no guidance, is "moral judgment passing judgment upon itself" (Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft); that is, moral reason is judging itself. Rather differently, Hegel considers conscience as "formal subjectivity" (Philosophie des Rechts), a view that would deeply affect later philosophers, notably Heidegger* (Sein und Zeit) and Ricoeur (Soi-même comme un autre), for whom conscience is to accuse but a call to authenticity.

The influence of theories of the pathological genesis of conscience should also be noted. According to Nietzsche* (Zur Genealogie der Moral) and Freud*, conscience arises in the struggle between desire and external constraints and is no more than an arbitrary mechanism confronting the self. The conventional character of conscience has also been underlined by sociology, which views conscience as an internalization of social representations.

b) Theology. Post-Reformation Protestantism shifts the issue of conscience to subjectivity. Calvinists such as Perkins (1558–1602) or Ames (1576–1633) look for subjective certainty of salvation in conscience. It means a rigorous examination of one's behavior in light of the commandments casuistically interpreted. This moralism, quite different from the Reformers' insistence on the priority of divine acquittal, can also be found elsewhere, for example, in the writings of Jeremy Taylor (1613–67), who understands conscience as well as Christian living in a way that, although not quite Pelagian, emphasizes the role of will. These developments helped reinforce the individualist conception of conscience: since it had but a distant relation to the doctrine of salvation, conscience had to become a concern for the conformity of the person to him- or herself. This concern for personal authenticity had other roots also: idealist philosophy of consciousness, pietism*, and the rise of a religious notion of subjectivity, in which the moral self is the seat of divine presence. Thus, Schleiermacher* defines conscience out of God-consciousness of the community (Der christlicher Glaub) followed by liberal Protestantism (Biedermann, Gass, Schenkels). In the first half of the 20th century, a quite antithetical position was espoused by Bonhoeffer* (Ethik) and especially in Barth*'s protest (Ethik) against "the ethics of naturalist or idealist subjectivism" and his trust in the evidence of conscience. For Barth, conscience depends on our adoption by God; it is not a reality that we have because conscience is participation in God's knowledge of the redeemed, and its primary activity is not self-examination but prayer*, which corresponds to the almost miraculous rarity of its apparition.

Recent Catholic work on conscience has often abandoned the juridical tone of manual traditions of moral and pastoral theology in favor of personalist understandings of conscience. Vatican* II even gave official encouragement in its emphasis on freedom: "the gospel has a sacred reverence for the dignity of conscience and its freedom of choice" (Gaudium et spes 41). Post-Vatican II theologians, such as Auer, Fuchs, or Böckle, make conscience the center of moral existence, which is characterized by responsibility.

6. Systematic Issues

Formal and material issues are closely tied in theories of conscience. At the formal level, we may distinguish those accounts that begin with analysis of the agent from those that begin with consideration of the field within which the agent exists. The former seldom refer to the theological categories, and philosophy or the social sciences are a favored ground for Christian anthropology. In the latter, by contrast, the process is essentially theology, and there is little concern with finding harmony between Christian and non-Christian anthropologies. On a material level, one can start with the experience of obligation and define personal existence in terms of constitutional human decisions and acts: conscience is then seen as freedom, will, or personal commitment, only secondarily related to authority, tradition*, or revelation*, which are construed heteronomously. By contrast, one can deem essential the instances external to the person and think that moral existence is determined by something other than itself: the others, society* and its organization, and, above all, God's creative and redemptive acts. Then it is faith, not consciousness, that prevails; moral reason is not introspection but discerning an objective order; tradition and authority shape rather than inhibit authenticity. On all these issues, the debate remains open.

- P. Abelard, Ethica, Ed. D. Luscombe, Oxford, 1971.
- K. Barth, Ethik, Ed. D. Braun, 2 vols., Zurich, 1973, 1978.
- D. Bonhoeffer, Ethik, DBW, vol. 6, 1992.
- J. Butler, Fifteen Sermons, in The Works of Joseph Butler, Ed. W.E. Gladstone, vol. 2, Oxford, 1896.
- M. Luther, Resolutiones disputationum de indulgentiarum virtute, 1518, WA 1; In epistolam S. Pauli ad Galatas Commentarius, 1535, WA 40/1.
- F. Nietzsche, Zur Genealogie der Moral, Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe, Ed. G. Colli, M. Montinari, vol. 6, 2, Berlin, 1968.
- Thomas d'Aquin, De veritate 15–17; ST, Ia, q. 79, a. 12 et 13; Ia IIae, q. 19, a. 5 et 6; IIa IIae, q. 47, a. 6, ad 1 and ad 3.
- Vatican II, Constitutions, décrets, déclarations, messages, Paris, 1967.
- ♦ M. Kähler (1878), Das Gewissen, Halle.
- L. Brunschvicg (1927), Le progrès de la conscience dans la philosophie occidentale, Paris.
- W. Jaeger (1934–47), Paideia: Die Formung des griechischen Menschen, 3 vols., Berlin.
- O. Lottin (1942–60), Psychologie et morale aux XIII^e ET XIII^e SIÈCLES, 6 vols., Louvain.
- C. A. Pierce (1955), Conscience in the New Testament, London.
- E. Wolf (1962), "Vom Problem des Gewissens in reformatorischer Sicht," Peregrinatio, vol. 1, Munich, 81–112.
- H. Reiner (1974), "Gewissen," HWP 3, 574–92.
- M. G. Baylor (1977), Action and Person: Conscience in Late Scholasticism and the Young Luther, Leiden.
- H. Chadwick (1978), "Gewissen," RAC 10, 1025–1107.
- T. C. Potts (Ed.) (1980), Conscience in Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge.
- J. G. Blüdhorn et al. (1984), "Gewissen," TRE 13, 192–241.
- B. Baertschi (1996), "Sens moral," DEPhM, 1371–79.

JOHN WEBSTER

See also Casuistry; Ethics; Ethics, Autonomy of Consequentialism. See Utilitarianism

Constance, Council of 1414–18

Forced to close the Council of Rome almost as soon as it had opened and to flee the Papal States, Antipope John XXIII had to seek the support of Sigismund, King of the Romans (Church* and State). A new council was announced and convoked by the latter, but it was to take place within the territory of the empire, at Constance. Gregory XII, the pope* of Rome* who lived in Rimini, would be represented; but Benedict XIII, the antipope of Avignon, would forbid his supporters to attend. The council opened on 1 November 1414 by John XXIII.

For decision-making purposes, the council was organized, on the model of the universities, into “nations,” each of which held one vote. The Italian, French, Germanic, and English nations were established at the outset, and the Iberian delegations subsequently combined to form the Spanish nation. The other countries represented at Constance were attached to one or another of these five nations. The cardinals made up a separate college, holding a single vote. These divisions were the cause of endless discussions, numerous violent arguments, and the domination of the debates by the academic clergy. They echoed both the geographical and the sociological composition of the council. The five nations grouped together delegations from all the states and ecclesiastical provinces of Latin Europe, and these delegations contained a high number of professors and university-educated prelates. The ecumenical nature of the Council of Constance is still debated.

The council had three goals: the return to union (Church unity*), the reform of the Church and of the Curia, and the defense of the faith*.

a) The flight of the antipope in March 1415 helped the council, which was opposed to him. Apprehended and brought back to Constance, John XXIII was tried and deposed. As a result of this decision, Gregory XII spontaneously abdicated. The council then sent a delegation, led by Sigismund, to obtain Benedict XIII’s abdication. Benedict refused to yield and was therefore tried and deposed in July 1417. The delegation did, however, obtain agreements from several countries in the region that they would switch their allegiance.

Now acephalous, the Church found itself governed by a council for the first time. The question then arose of whether to elect a new pope without delay or to carry out reforms before the election and force the pope, once elected, to abide by them. Sigismund favored the second solution, which would ensure his domination of the council. The cardinals, on the other hand, afraid of being subjected to the reforms carried out by the radicals, wanted the election to be brought forward. The council, modifying slightly a proposal by Pierre d’Ailly, then decided that the electoral college should be made up of all the cardinals and six representatives from each nation. On 11 November 1417, the electors chose Cardinal Oddo Colonna, who took the name of Martin V. This election reestablished union and marked the end of the pontifical schism*.

b) Although a commission of “reform of the Church in its head and in its members” was created in 1415, the difficulty of the undertaking and the multiplicity and range of the proposals, along with the conflicting machinations of different parties, made it impossible. The council did not attend to the matter until the summer of 1417. However, on 6 April 1415 it published the decree Haec sancta synodus, which asserted the General Council’s precedence over the pope in matters of faith, Church union, and reform; and then, on 9 October 1417, it published the decree Frequens, which laid down regulations for the convocation of future councils and the handling of any future schism. Together, these represent the key acts of 15th-century conciliarism*. Christendom hoped for the reform of Church structures* and financial affairs—which included the encouraging and perpetuating of simony, the accumulation of profits, and pontifical collations, that sorry legacy of the Avignon papacy—wishes that remained unfulfilled. Before the closing of the council on 22 April 1418, however, the Fathers and Martin V did draw up a list of the reforms that the pope would have to undertake with the help of the Curia.

c) As for the eradication of heresy*, condemnations fell principally on John Wycliffe and his supporters. The council condemned Wycliffe (who had died in 1384) as a heretic. It declared Jan Hus* and Jerome of Prague to be heretics and condemned them to death. They were burned alive at Constance. It also decided that communion* of the laity in both kinds, which had recently become the practice in Bohemia, was heretical. The French and the Poles joined forces to call for the condemnation of John Parvus and John Falkenberg, the apologists for tyrannicide, but were unsuccessful. This last endeavor, moreover, revealed a major point of disagreement between these two delegations and Martin V on the right of appeal to a future council, which the new pope immediately decided to prohibit.

- H. Finke, Forschungen und Quellen zur Geschichte des Konstanzer Konzils, Paderborn, 1889.
- H. Finke, Acta concilii Constantiensis, 4 vols., Paderborn, 1896–1928.
- A. Frenken, Die Erforschung des Konstanzer Konzils (1414–1418) in den letzten 100 Jahren, Paderborn (AHC 25, Heft 1–2), 1993.
- H. von der Hardt, Magnum œcumenicum Constantiense concilium, 6 vols., Frankfurt-Leipzig, 1696–1700. COD 403–41.
- ♦ E. Delaruelle, E.-R. Labande, P. Ourliac (1962), L'Église au temps du Grand Schisme et de la crise conciliaire (1378–1449).
- A. Franzen, W. Müller (Ed.) (1964), Das Konzil von Konstanz: Beiträge zu seiner Geschichte und Theologie, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.
- J. Gill (1965), Constance et Bâle-Florence.
- R. Bäumer (Ed.) (1977), Das Konstanzer Konzil, Darmstadt.
- G. Alberigo (1981), Chiesa conciliare: Identità e significato del conciliarismo, Brescia.
- W. Brandmüller (1990), “Konstanz (Konzil von),” TRE 19, 529–35.
- J. Wohlmuth (1994), “Le concile de Constance (1414–1418) et le concile de Bâle (1431–1449),” in G. Alberigo, Les conciles œcuméniques, vol. I, Paris, 203–55 (bibl.).

ZÉNON KALUZA

See also Church and State; Conciliarism; Ecclesiology; Eucharist; Government, Church; Pope

Constantinople I, Council of

381

a) History. The First Council* of Constantinople, which met in May 381, was at the outset a council of the East, convened by Theodosius. It was chaired first by Meletius of Antioch until his death, then by Gregory* of Nazianzus until he tendered his resignation, and finally by Nectarius, the new archbishop of Constantinople. The council brought together approximately 150 bishops*; its best-known members were part of the Cappadocian group of the friends of Basil*, who had died prematurely: his brothers Gregory* of Nyssa and Peter of Sebaste, his close friend Gregory of Nazianzus, his correspondent Amphilochius of Iconium, and Meletius, the controversial bishop* of Antioch, whom Basil never stopped supporting. Cyril of Jerusalem and Diodorus of Tarsus were also present. The proceedings of the council are lost, and the historical documentation at our disposal is very incomplete. It was not an “ecumenical” council in the same sense that this adjective had when it was conferred on Nicaea* because this time there was no participation by the West. The synodal letter of 382 sent by the Fathers* to Rome* does refer to the “ecumenical synod* of Constantinople”—but this assembly remained in fact shrouded in almost total silence for three-quarters of a century. The debates between Cyril of Alexandria and Nestorius, at the time of Ephesus*, always refer to the text of the symbol of Nicaea and seem to be unaware of that of Constantinople. The latter's ecumenical authority would not be recognized until this symbol was read and acclaimed at the Council of Chalcedon*; this was to lead, in consequence, to a recognition of ecumenical authority* and of the ecumenical authority of the council itself. Since then, the Council of Constantinople has been universally regarded as the Second Ecumenical Council.

b) The Doctrinal Work of Constantinople I. The work of Constantinople I consisted chiefly in putting an end in the East to the Arian heresy*, confirming the decision of Nicaea and proclaiming the divinity of the Holy* Spirit, which had been challenged since 360 by three distinct currents. The radical Arianism* (Anomean) of Aetius and Eunomius saw the Holy Spirit as a creature of the Son and the Son as a creature of the Father*. The Egyptian "tropics" (who reasoned on the basis of "expressions" [tropoi] from Scripture*) were orthodox as far as the Son* was concerned but saw the Holy Spirit as a created angel*. Athanasius* had replied to them in his Letters to Serapion Concerning the Holy Spirit. Finally, in the East, the "combatants against the Holy Spirit" (pneumatomachians), who were also called the Macedonians, after Macedonius, the deposed archbishop of Constantinople, pointed to the natural inferiority of the Holy Spirit due to the inferiority of its creative role. It was the pneumatomachians who mainly preoccupied Constantinople I. The council attempted to reconcile them, but in vain.

c) The Symbol of Constantinople. The decisions of Constantinople I were expressed in a symbol received since then in all the Churches* as a liturgical symbol and often called the symbol of "Nicaea-Constantinople."

The Council of Chalcedon attributes the paternity of that symbol to the Fathers of Constantinople. Its obscure origin, however, has prompted a number of hypotheses (Kelly, Ritter, Abramowski). It does not take up the text of the symbol of Nicaea or that of Jerusalem* (Harnack), and the hypothesis that Epiphanius of Salamina was its first author in 374 is no longer accepted. The Fathers probably used an Eastern symbol that had integrated the typical additions of Nicaea (Ritter). The part written by the Fathers of Constantinople is uncertain, except for the third article, dealing with the Holy Spirit, for which the influence of the Cappadocian Fathers, Basil's friends, appears to have been instrumental. This article offers in fact a recapitulation of Basilian pneumatology.

The second article takes up again the *consubstantial of Nicaea, but it renounces the formula "of the Father's substance," probably considered ambiguous because it is partitive.

The third article comprises the new sequence on the Holy Spirit, made up of five formulas: 1) The first formula states the divine character of the Holy Spirit, by emphasizing that it is "Holy" in nature, like God*, sanctifying, and not sanctified the way creatures are. 2) The second does not proclaim that the Holy Spirit is God, as Basilian reserve, in a spirit of reconciliation, had always refused to do, but it calls it "Lord," a specifically divine name given it by Scripture (2 Cor 3:17). 3) The function of the Holy Spirit is divine since it "gives new life" (Jn 6:63; 1 Cor 15:45) thanks to its creative and deifying role. 4) "It proceeds from the Father": this formula calls on the only New Testament regarding the origin of the Spirit (Jn 15:26). But to a sentence that had an "economic" meaning (the going forth of the Holy Spirit toward the world), the council gives the meaning of an eternal procession* of the Spirit within the Trinity*. The Spirit "proceeds," in the same way that the Son is begotten. Therefore, it is not a creature. The procession expresses its hypostatic property; it is a way of expressing the Spirit's consubstantiality with the Father and the Son without actually using the word. The Spirit's link to the Son is left undetermined, and thus it opens the way to the future controversy about the *Filioque. 5) "With the Father and the Son, he is jointly worshipped and glorified": this formula, which takes up a famous argument by Basil, is based on the link between lex credendi and lex orandi so as to express in a different way the Holy Spirit's affiliation to the Trinity. Constantinople I performed that work of reconciliation and of peace*.

The council had another important by-product. In a synodal letter sent to Rome* in 382, the same Fathers delivered the first Greek version of what was to become the Trinitarian formula common to East and West: "One sole divinity, power, and substance of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, all equal in honor and in coeternal royalty, in three perfect hypostases, or still in three perfect Persons*" (DCO II/1, 81). This formula was used again by the Second Council of Constantinople*.

d) The Disciplinary Canons. The council also promulgated four canons, the third of which remained the most famous. It was intended to affirm the authority of the bishop of Constantinople, the new Rome: his seat had assumed considerable importance since the city had become the capital of the Eastern Empire; he was given "the preeminence of honor after the bishop of Rome." This canon was never to be accepted by the popes* of ancient Rome and similarly with canon 28 of Chalcedon.

• COD 21–35 (DCO II/1, 67–95).

◆ J.N.D. Kelly (1950), Early Christian Creeds, London (3rd Ed. 1972).

I. Ortiz de Urbina (1963), Nicée et Constantinople, Paris.

A. M. Ritter (1965), Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol, Göttingen.

Coll. (1982), La signification et l'actualité du IIe concile œcuménique pour le monde chrétien d'aujourd'hui, Geneva.

G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia (Les conciles œcuméniques, vol. I, L'histoire, 1994, 59–70).

A. de Halleux (1990), Patrologie et œcuménisme, Louvain, 303–442.

L. Abramowski (1992), “Was hat das Nicaeno-Constantinopolitanum mit dem Konzil von K. zu tun?,” ThPh 67, 481–513.

BERNARD SESBOÛÉ

See also Creation; Creeds; Fathers of the Church; Filioque; Nestorianism

Constantinople II, Council of

553

The Second Council* of Constantinople, the fifth of the ecumenical councils, was convoked by Justinian to provide a definitive orthodox interpretation of the Council of Chalcedon*. The main tasks that the emperor put to the council were to reformulate the teaching of Chalcedon in terms that would be more universally acceptable and to declare nonorthodox three “chapters” or elements representative of the christological tradition of Antioch* that the Council of Chalcedon had not condemned: the person and works of Theodore of Mopsuestia, the first of the great theologians of Antioch; the polemical works of Theodoret of Cyrrihus, directed against Cyril* of Alexandria; and Ibas of Edessa’s Letter to Maris, in which Ibas also had strongly attacked Cyril. Theodore of Mopsuestia had not been explicitly named at Chalcedon, while Theodoret and Ibas, who had condemned the heresy* of Nestorius, had been recognized as orthodox.

a) Aftermath of Chalcedon. For the great majority of Eastern Christians, scandalized by the affirmation at Chalcedon of the equality and relative autonomy of the human nature of Christ*, these “three chapters” from Antioch were the very symbol of the Chalcedonian spirit of compromise with the century. Only a more divine notion of Christ, such as formulated by the Alexandrian doctors* Athanasius* and Cyril, could be the norm for Christian faith* and worship. As for the Latin West, it saw in the formulas of Chalcedon both a Christology* that better suited its more practical conception of salvation and a tribute to the doctrinal authority* of Leo, bishop* of Rome*. Therefore, to abandon Chalcedon would be an offense against both orthodoxy* and papal primacy. Episcopal hierarchies opposed to Chalcedon had been in place in Egypt and Syria since the 480s, and there were many of them by the end of the 530s; on the other hand, the “Acacian schism” (484–519) between Rome and Constantinople had been provoked by the pope’s disquiet over the attempts of the patriarchs of Constantinople to formulate a Christology not based on Chalcedon.

b) The Role of Justinian. As soon as he became emperor in 527, Justinian understood the political and religious necessity for an official formulation of Christology and an interpretation of Chalcedon that would rally the empire. After a fruitless attempt at dialogue with the bishops opposed to Chalcedon (533), Justinian had the local synod* of Constantinople condemn those who clung to an exclusively pre-Chalcedonian terminology (536). The emperor, who was himself a highly original theologian, took the initiative in orienting theological study toward a new conception of Christ’s person*. His goal was to reach a synthesis between the Chalcedonian formulas, which were opened to a variety of interpretations, and the explicitly theocentric Christology of Cyril, which 20th-century historians have called “neo-Chalcedonianism” or “neo-Cyrianism.” The rejection of the “three chapters” from Antioch was the essential negative element in this new synthesis.

Between 543 and 545, Justinian published his first edict condemning the “three chapters,” most of which has since been lost. On 13 July 551, he issued a second edict, De recta fide, which was accompanied by a long treatise setting out the reasons for condemning the chapters (Epistula contra tria capitula). Pope Vigilius (537–555), who had arrived in Constantinople, either voluntarily or under compulsion, at the end of 546, seems to have agreed with Justinian, and he condemned the “three chapters,” in April 548, in his Judicatum. There was a storm of protest in the West over this apparent abandonment of Chalcedon, which forced Vigilius to renege his position. After a period of open conflict with the emperor, he retracted his “judgment.”

c) A Turbulent Council. Only a council officially assembled by the emperor could reestablish unity. Convoiced by Justinian, 152 accredited bishops, among whom perhaps 11 were from the Latin West, sat between 5 May and 2 June 553. The emperor could be certain of the docility of this gathering, which was dominated by Greeks and under the authority of his influential adviser, Theodore Asquidas. He therefore left the direction of the council to the bishops alone. On 24 May, Vigilius, who did not attend any of the meetings out of fear of negative reactions from the West, sent a letter to the emperor (Constitutum) stating his position: the theological errors of the three doctors of Antioch needed to be condemned, but their persons and their works had to be spared out of respect for Chalcedon and for the dead. On 26 May, Justinian responded by sending two letters to the council reflecting the changes in Vigilius’s position and telling the bishops that they should cease to be in communion* with him as long as he would not accept their collective judgment.

At its eighth and final session, on 2 June, the council approved a document comprising an introduction and 40 canons. The last four canons condemned the “three chapters” as well as a classic list of heretics, including Origen*—whose “school” seems to have been condemned for various reasons, and at Justinian’s request, even before the council opened. By contrast, the first 10 canons form a systematic Christology, combining the terminology of Chalcedon with that of Cyril and affirming clearly that the Divine Word* is the sole subject of Christ’s actions, the only hypostasis that exists in his two natures (canons 2–3, 5, 9). This declaration excludes any conception that might separate the natures within Christ and limits the distinction between them, however irreducible they may be, to “a merely conceptual consideration” (canon 7). It also recognizes the legitimacy of some of Cyril’s expressions, which the Council of Chalcedon had not accepted (canon 8), and makes his conception of the uniqueness of Christ’s person normative. This is based on a “hypostatic or composite union” (canon 4; hypostatic* union), which wholly excludes any interpretation that might imply a “confusion” of Christ’s two natures into one (canon 8). Finally, the document forcefully reaffirms the principle of “communication of idioms*”: it is literally accurate to apply the title “Mother of God” to Mary* (canon 6), and the council also ratifies the confession of the “theopaschites,” that “he who was crucified in the flesh, Our Lord Jesus Christ, is truly God and Lord of Glory, and one in the Holy Trinity” (canon 10).

Six months later, the pope declared that he was ready to accept the canons of the council, and he made his agreement public in a declaration, Constitutum II, dated 23 February 554, which completely contradicts his earlier position. The reaction of the Western bishops was extremely negative, especially in Africa, where there had been a whole body of literature hostile to the council and its decrees, as well as in northern Italy and Gaul. Under Vigilius’s successor, Pelagius I (556–61), the church of Aquileia seceded from Rome over the question of the “three chapters,” starting a schism* that lasted until the late seventh century. Gregory* the Great indicated that he accepted Constantinople II, along with the other ecumenical councils, but he also felt a need to insist that the condemnation of the theologians of Antioch did not in any sense contradict the teachings of Chalcedon (Epistulae, 1, 24; 3, 10; 9, 148). Apart from these popes, Western writers took time to include Constantinople II among the ecumenical councils, and many Greek sources from the seventh century and later seem to have only a vague notion of its work.

Nowadays, historians tend to minimize the doctrinal importance of Constantinople II, seeing it as no more than an instrument for Justinian’s clumsy policy toward the Church. Some 20th-century Catholic writers (Amann, Moeller, Devresse), seeking to weaken the very powerful affirmation of Christ’s divinity formulated at Constantinople II, have argued that the council’s decisions were not canonically valid because it was not in communion with Rome when it promulgated them and that it was merely the condemnation of the “three chapters”—which in itself has no doctrinal significance—that was accepted later by Vigilius and his successors. More recently, however, Orthodox and Protestant historians (Chrysos, Meyendorff, Frank) have shown that there was substantial continuity in procedure and doctrine between the first four councils and Constantinople II and have recognized the dogmatic declaration of this, the fifth council, as both a genuine clarification of the teaching of Chalcedon and an authentically ecumenical attempt to take account of the value of rival theological formulas.

• Acts: ACO IV/1 and IV/2.

Text of the dogmatic declaration, ACO IV/1, 239–45.

Decrees: COD 107–22 (DCO II/1, 240–71); DS 421–38 (can. only).

Justinian's Edicts in Drei dogmatische Schriften Justinians, ABAW. PH NS 18.

Vigilius, Constitutum I, CSEL 35, 230–320.

Vigilius, Constitutum II, ACO IV/2, 138–68.

Facundus d'Hermiane, Pro defensione trium capitulorum, CChr.SL 90 A, 4–398.

Liberatus, Breviarium, ACO II/5, 98–141.

Evagrius Scholasticus, Historia ecclesiastica IV, 10–38, Ed. J. Bidez, L. Parmentier, London, 1898, 160–89.

♦ J. Bois (1908), "Constantinople (Ile concile de)," DThC 3/1, 1231–59.

E. Schwartz (1940), "Zur Kirchenpolitik Justinians," ABAW. PH NS, 2, 32–81.

R. Devresse (1946), "Le Ve concile et l'œcuménicité byzantine," Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati 3, StT 123.

E. Amann (1950), "Trois chapitres," DThC 15/2, 1868–1924.

C. Moeller (1951), "Le Ve concile œcuménique et le magistère ordinaire au VI^e s.," RSPHTh 35, 412–23.

E. Chrysos (1969), Hè ekklesiastikè politikè tou Ioustinianou kata tèn erin peri ta Tria Kephalaia kai tèn Pemptèn Oikoumenikèn Sunodon, Thessalonica.

F.X. Murphy (1974), "Constantinople II," in F.X. Murphy, P. Sherwood, Constantinople II et Constantinople III, 9–130, Paris.

P.T.R. Gray (1979), The Defence of Chalcedon in the East 451–553, Leiden.

G.L.C. Frank (1991), "The Council of Constantinople II as a Model Reconciliation Council," TS 52, 636–50.

BRIAN E. DALEY

See also Anhypostasy; Chalcedon, Council of; Christ/Christology; Ephesus, Council of; Hypostatic Union; Idioms, Communication of

Constantinople III, Council of

680–81

The Third Council of Constantinople, also known as the Fourth Ecumenical Council, affirmed the reality of the two wills and the two activities, divine and human, within Christ*, by condemning the doctrines of monothelitism* and monoenergism*. This dogmatic definition, preceded by that of the Lateran Council of 649, was the final outcome of the long labor of theological clarification accomplished by Maximus* the Confessor.

a) The Role of Maximus the Confessor. Like Pope Honorius, Maximus had approved the Psèphos (decree) of Patriarch Sergius of Constantinople (patriarchate*) and had first been disarmed in front of the novelty of the problem posed by the prayer* of Jesus* at Gethsemane: his human will appeared to be contrary to the divine will, and Sergius had concluded in favor of the negation of that will. Maximus subsequently highlighted the reality of that human will and showed its soteriological importance.

In the first place, between 634 and 640, Maximus affirms that Christ really does have a human will by applying to the particular case of the will his own logos/tropos distinction. It thus becomes possible to distinguish between the notions of otherness and of opposition, which had been confused up until that time. The contrariness of the human will in relation to the divine will is not due to its logos, in other words, to its essential reality, but to a certain tropos, that is, a personal mode, a "tendency" of the sinner's human will. But the fact that this human will is other than the divine will is due to its essential reality, to its logos. Hence, the opposition is not necessary in the hypothesis of the two wills. Since Christ is perfectly holy and without sin*, any opposition of his human will to his divine will is excluded a priori (see Op 4, between 634 and 640, PG 91, 60 A–61 D; Op 20, before 640, 236 A–237 C).

Then, between 641 and 646, Maximus interprets Jesus' Gethsemane prayer in a new way by considering his human will no longer in the apparent refusal but in the act* of free acceptance of the cup (Mt 26:42). To answer fully the problem of the opposition of the human will to the divine will, Maximus highlights this free consent of Jesus' will, which reveals his perfect agreement with the divine will (see Op 6, c. 641, PG 91, 65 A-68 D; Op 7, c. 642, 80 C-81 B; Op 16, after 643, 196 C-197 A; Op 3, c. 645–46, 48 BD). The will being the principle of activity, the problem of monoenergism was solved at its root.

In doing this, Maximus was enhancing in Christology* the active role of the humanity of Christ in its historical reality. The agreement between human will and divine will is part of Jesus' earthly life, in his perfect obedience to the Father*, which takes him to his death on the cross (see Phil 2:8). At Gethsemane, the union of the two wills reveals itself in the interpersonal relation between Son and Father, as this relation has unfolded humanly, according to the dynamic of a free will. Obedience is the exact word to describe this fully human attitude of the Son toward his Father, in the order of freedom* (see PG 91, 68 D).

b) The Local Council of the Lateran. Maximus became the principal adversary of monothelitism, and he victoriously confronted Pyrrhus, the former patriarch of Constantinople, in a public dispute in Carthage in July 645 (PG 91, 288–353). In 646 he started living in Rome*, which had become the center of resistance to monothelitism. While Emperor Constans II, in his Typos of 647, strictly forbade talk of one or two wills or operations, Pope* Martin I summoned a council in the Lateran, in October 649, in order to affirm dogmatically the two wills and operations and to condemn monothelitism and monoenergism. Maximus was the theologian of that council, and he certainly wrote the main texts, in which it is possible to recognize his expressions (Op 6, PG 91, 68 D). Faced with the hypothesis of the two contrary wills, the council affirmed that the two wills of Christ, divine and human, are united in full agreement; and faced with the hypothesis of two subjects desiring opposing things, the council affirmed one sole subject, Christ, who divinely and humanly desires one single thing: our salvation* through his Passion*. The two operations were affirmed in the same manner (see DS 500, 510, 511). What was new in these affirmations concerned the human will and its soteriological role through the activity that ensues. To express the meaning of Jesus' free consent at Gethsemane, it had to be said that our salvation had been desired and realized humanly by a divine being*.

Constans II reacted by arresting Martin and Maximus, who would both seal with their martyrdom* the affirmation of Christ's human freedom in his agony; the death of the pope in 655 and that of the theologian in 662 also expressed the freedom of the Church* against political power.

c) The Third Council of Constantinople. This dispute ended up at the council, which took place in Constantinople from November 680 to September 681, during the reign of Emperor Constantine IV. Against monothelitism and monoenergism, that council clearly affirmed the reality of the two wills and of the two operations of Christ, in the perspective of Chalcedon*'s definition, whose expressions were reused word for word (as well as Leo's expressions from his Tome à Flavien), the wills and the operations being considered properties of the two natures of Christ: "We proclaim in him, according to the teaching of the Holy Fathers*, two natural wills and two natural operations, without any division, any change, any partition, and any confusion. The two natural wills are not at all, as the impious heretics have said, opposed to one another. But Christ's human will follows his divine and all-powerful will; it does not resist it and does not oppose it; it rather submits to it [...]. The natural difference in this unique hypostasis can be seen in the fact that each of these two wills desires and acts in its own domain, in communion with the other. For that reason, we glorify two wills and two natural operations participating together in mankind's salvation" (DCO II-1, 287–91).

By the same token, the council condemned all those who had professed monothelitism and monoenergism, among whom was counted Pope Honorius (DS 550–52). That unique case—a bishop* of Rome condemned as a heretic by an ecumenical council—gave rise later to great discussions (in particular with regard to infallibility*). In reality Honorius was never formally a heretic, having died in 640, long before the solution of the problem. He therefore did not have the time to retract his unfortunate monothelite formula of 634. Maximus always defended his memory, and the council of 649 did not condemn him. The dogmatic assertion of the free human will of Christ and of the resulting operation guaranteed the full humanity of Christ, considered from his center, from his heart*.

• Acts: ACO, Series secunda II/1 and 2.

Decrees: COD 124–30 (DCO II/1, 273–93).

♦ P. Sherwood (1952), An annotated date-list of the works of Maximus the Confessor, Rome.

H. Rahner (1964), L'Église et l'État dans le christianisme primitif, Paris.

M. Doucet (1972), La Dispute de Maxime le Confesseur avec Pyrrhus, Montreal.

Ch. von Schönborn (1972), Sophrone de Jérusalem, Paris.

F.X. Murphy, P. Sherwood (1973), Constantinople II et III, Paris.

J.M. Garrigues (1976), "Le martyre de saint Maxime le Confesseur," RThom 76, 410–52.

F.-M. Léthel (1979), Théologie de l'Agonie du Christ: La liberté humaine du Fils de Dieu et son importance soteriologique mises en lumière par saint Maxime le Confesseur, Paris.

FRANÇOIS-MARIE LÉTHEL

See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christ/Christology; Maximus the Confessor; Monothelitism/ Monoenergism

Constantinople IV, Council of 869–70

a) Prehistory. In 858, Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed for political reasons and replaced by Photius, a layman. Pope* Nicholas I challenged that election on two grounds: the patriarch of Constantinople could not be deposed without the agreement of Rome*, and the election of Photius did not conform to the canons in any way whatsoever. At the same time, Nicholas demanded the reintegration, under Roman jurisdiction*, of Illyricum, Calabria, and Sicily, which had been annexed to the patriarchate of Constantinople by the iconoclastic emperors.

A synod* that met in Constantinople in 861 confirmed the deposition of Ignatius, with the agreement of the Roman legates, who were to be subsequently disavowed by the pope.

In 863 a synod at the Lateran deposed Photius and those he had ordained. Nicholas I invoked the primacy of Rome (which gave it the right to intervene in the affairs of the other patriarchates*), contested the doctrine of the pentarchy (equal dignity of the five patriarchates: Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, Jerusalem*, and Rome), and recognized only three “apostolic” patriarchates: Rome, Alexandria and Antioch.

In response to this, Photius sent an encyclical letter to the Eastern patriarchs in which he stated that the rank of the bishops* depended on the political importance of their city and also condemned Rome’s addition of the Filioque to the symbol of Nicaea. In 867 he organized the meeting of a council in Constantinople (known as the “Photian council”), which anathematized Nicholas I (this was the “Photian schism*”).

A political upheaval in Byzantium caused the departure of Photius and the return of Ignatius. In June 869 a Roman synod, presided over by Pope Hadrian II, anathematized Photius and burned the acts of the Photian council. In October of the same year, and at the request of the Byzantine emperor, the Fourth Council of Constantinople was opened.

b) History and Issues. This council lasted 10 sessions. What was at issue was Rome’s intervention in the internal affairs of another patriarchate and its role as a source of orthodox faith*. The subject of the Filioque, raised for the first time in Photius’s encyclical letter to the Oriental patriarchs, was not broached.

The final decree (horos) of the council recognized the first seven ecumenical councils and condemned Photius.

The council’s 27 canons deal with tradition*, Roman primacy, the patriarchates, images*, the heretical doctrine of the two souls*, and disciplinary questions (election of a layman* to the patriarchate, intrusion of political power in the affairs of the Church*, etc.)

c) Reception. The council’s decisions pertaining to Photius were abrogated in 879 by Pope John VIII and by a synod held in Constantinople under the chairmanship of Photius himself (who had been reconciled with Ignatius and had again been made a patriarch) in the presence of the pope’s legates and of the Eastern patriarchs.

Constantinople IV is acknowledged as ecumenical by the Latin Church but not by the Greek Church, which holds to the “seven ecumenical councils.” Some Orthodox theologians consider the 879 synod to be ecumenical.

• COD, 157–86 (DCO 1, 354–407).

Acts, Mansi 17, 373–725.

♦ D. Stiennon (1967), Constantinople IV, HCO 5, Paris.

P.-Th. Camelot, P. Maraval (1988), Les conciles œcuméniques,

I: Le premier millénaire, Bibliothèque d’histoire du christianisme 15, Paris.

G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei Concili Ecumenici, Brescia.

G. Dagron, P. Riché, A. Vauchez (Ed.) (1993), Évêques, moines et empereurs (610–1054) (Histoire du christianisme, vol. IV), Paris, 169–86.

MARIE-HÉLÈNE CONGOURDEAU

See also Church and State; Council; Creeds; Heresy; Pope

Consubstantial

a) Traditional Foundations. Although the word “consubstantial” did not begin to circulate before the beginning of our era, its semantic roots join the most ancient usages of words such as “essence” (ousia), “substance” (hupostasis), or “nature” (phusis). In this respect, three main and independent authorities played a constant role as sources of inspiration and of language throughout the genesis of patristic thought: Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoics. Plotinus, however, was the first to use homoousios in philosophical language. In his Enneads (IV, 7 [2], 10), he states that the human soul*, in its intrinsic goodness, has something divine “because of the kinship and the consubstantial” with “divines things,” dia suggeneian kai to homoousion (Bréhier). Porphyry uses homoousios five times; Jamblic, once, to pick up on Plotinus’s idea: the soul is mixed with divinity (Mysteries of Egypt 3, 21). In the fifth and sixth centuries, an isolated use of homoousios would be seen again among each of the two last great masters of neo-Platonism, Syrianus and Simplicius. Meanwhile, the Christian authors of the same period would have used this term more than 200 times, according to G. W. H. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon. One can see from which side the term “consubstantial” triggered a truly intellectual creation, judging by its literary vogue.

b) Pre-Nicene Christian Usage. Beginning with Irenaeus* and Tertullian*, the Fathers* denounced the Gnostic usage, declaring the consubstantiality of spiritual beings with divine Plerome. The first Trinitarian usage of homoousios, foreign to the Gnostic context, appeared in the correspondence between the two Dionysius, the homonymic bishops* of Rome* and Alexandria, only around 265, although neither one made personal use of it. Not long afterward, in 286, a synod* condemned Paul of Samosata at Antioch; a homousian Letter of Sirmium stated in 358 that this synod had censured homoousios; but this was a mere supposition, easily understood in the tumult of ideas after Nicaea*.

c) The Nicene “Consubstantial.” “The exact signification of homoousios in the Nicene Creed is not only difficult to elucidate, it is useless to pretend to search for it,” observed C. Stead (1994) at the end of an excellent analysis of the non-Christian and Christian recourses to the concept or to the word before Nicaea. A relevant remark from a historian of classical thought but who forbids himself to grasp the pastoral nature of the choice of this term at the council* of 325. Let us try, then, to define precisely the original signification of Nicene “consubstantiality.” In the Exposition (of faith) of the 318 Fathers (DCO, II-1, 1994), this word first refers to monogenesis, “unique engendered” (see Jn 1:18; 3:16, 18) which the creators of the symbol detached from “Son of God,” to which it is always adjoined in analogous formulations of faith* of the period, and which they joined to “born of the Father*” in lieu of the traditional formula “before all centuries” (Skarsaune 1987). The design of the origin of the Son (filiation*), understood as divine “generation,” is thus detached from the reference to cosmology according to a shift in perspective that started with Alexander of Alexandria, Letter to Alexander of Thessalonica. Thus, both words, monogenesis and homoousios, or rather the two expressions that carry these words, one made of traditional elements, ek tou patros monogenès and one that constitutes a polemical addition that is not scriptuary and is completely unknown to tradition, homoousios tô patri, explain each other. Consequently, this “consubstantiality” refers back to the unique generation of the Son by the Father.

Indeed, the two parallel expressions ensure, along the same line, the inclusion of other polemic additions introduced in the formula of baptismal faith that serves as a basis for the drafting of the Nicene Creed:

- 1) toutestin ek tes ousias tou patros, “that is to say of the Father’s essence,” a logical precision formulated according to Theognostos, bishop of Alexandria between 250 and 280, who served to reinforce “born of the Father, unique engendered”
- 2) theon alethinon ek theou alethinou, “the true God of true God,” scriptuary allusion (Jn 17:3) corroborating the metaphor that is both Johannine (1 Jn 1:5, 8:12) and eminently Origenian (Boularand 1972) and that precedes phôs ek phôtos, “light born of light,” a metaphor absent from other classical creeds and thus still an Alexandrian sign characteristic of the Nicene Creed

- 3) gennethenta ou poiethenta, “engendered, not created” (“made”), a reference to the Scripture* (at least for “engendered”: Ps 110:3; Prv 8:25), serving to immediately introduce homoousios

In short, here homoousios takes on meaning focusing on the origin of the Son. Such a focus, imposed by the Arian contestation, is the distinctive particularity of Nicean homoousios. The identity of the nature between the Father and Son is not defined in itself, but it is affirmed as far as the origin of Monogenesis, as was required by the common faith. If the Nicene Fathers could have accepted such recourse, it is precisely because in the immediate context of their creed, homoousios was no longer situated, at least in their eyes, on the level of philosophy* or of the gnosis* of the past, where it would remain burdened by ambiguities. The signifying value of the term, in harmony with the pastoral need of the hour, consisted of expressing the still radically mysterious origin of the Son.

The reception* of homoousios in its proper theological dimension would impose a strong effort of original invention for generations of thinkers, beginning from the pioneering work of Athanasius of Alexandria*, Against the Arians (c. 340), up until the clear distinction between the three hypostasis and the divine essence in the Cappadocian synthesis, in particular among Gregory* of Nazianzus (Theological Orations, c. 380). During this debate of ideas, Christian thought determined how Nicene “consubstantiality” signified a union of numeric nature without imposing a Trinitarian modalism* and how it suggested a specific union of hypostasis without shattering the essential identity and simplicity* of the divine Trinity*. For the first time, in 382, a synodal letter explicitly extended the consubstantiality of Christ* to the entire Trinity. At the Council of Chalcedon* (451), the same concept would be used to clarify the double consubstantiality of Christ: it designates in the order of divinity the unity of the first substance and in the order of humanity, the specific identity of the second substance.

- Conciliorum oecumenicorum Decreta II-1 (1994), 34–35.
- ♦ I. Ortiz de Urbina (1942), “L’homousios preniceno,” Orientalia christiana periodica 8, 194–209.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1950), Early Christian Creeds, London (3rd Ed., 1972).
- L.M. Mendizabal (1956), “El Homoousios Preniceno Extra-ecclesiastico,” Estudios eclesiásticos 30, 147–96.
- I. Ortiz de Urbina (1963), Nicée et Constantinople, Paris.
- E. Boularand (1972), L’hérésie d’Arius et la “foi” de Nicée, II, Paris.
- O. Skarsaune (1987), “A Neglected Detail in the Creed of Nicaea (325),” Vigiliae Christianae 41, 34–54.
- B. Sesboüé, B. Meunier (1993), Dieu peut-il avoir un Fils? Le débat trinitaire au IVe siècle, Paris.
- G. C. Stead (1994), “Homoousios,” Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum XVI, 364–433.

CHARLES KANNENGIESSER

See also Arianism; Athanasius of Alexandria; Nicaea I, Council of; Trinity

Consubstantiation

A term unknown to the Scholastics and to the early Reformation, “consubstantiation” appeared around 1560 in Calvinist polemics to characterize Lutheran eucharistic theology (which asserted the presence of Christ* “in, with, and under” the bread and wine of the Eucharist*. Theories of consubstantiation go back to the patristic use of christological concepts in eucharistic theology (Betz 1979): just as Christ is truly man and truly God*, so the body of Christ is truly (“substantially”) present, while the bread and the wine themselves remain truly present. The current eclipse of the Greek and medieval concept of substance and the disappearance of physical explanations of the Eucharist have in this instance done away with any real difference between Catholic and Lutheran theories or demonstrated that there never was any such difference in the first place. Consubstantiation has also been spoken of as an “impanation”; they are synonymous.

- J. Schaedtke (1977), “Abendmahl III/3,” TRE 1, 106–22.
- J. Betz (1979), HDG IV.4.a.

THE EDITORS

See also Being; Eucharist

Contemplation

The concept of contemplation has a double history—that of Greek (theoria) and Latin (contemplatio). The passage from theoria to contemplatio, like all translations of Greek theological vocabulary into Latin, was accompanied by a mutation of the content. Here is how this mutation can be roughly characterized: While theoria is a concept of philosophical origin, keeping a certain ambiguous ground between theology* and philosophy*, contemplatio is a concept bound to Latin Christian theology and, more specifically, to one of its subdivisions, spiritual* theology. From Augustine* to Teresa of Avila, by way of Bernard* of Clairvaux and the Carthusian Spiritual School, the concept of contemplatio historically underwent a gradual deviation toward psychology, drawing on Augustinianism*, where it had already come to designate a “spiritual state of mind.”

1. Philosophical and Scriptural Elements in the Origin of the Concept

We should distinguish two different kinds of elements constituting the concept of contemplatio: on the one hand, Platonic and Aristotelian definitions, on the other, a biblical element from the Old Testament (essentially in the figures of Moses and Elijah), as well as from the New Testament—Martha and Mary (Lk 10:38–42) and Paul’s ecstasy (Acts 9:3–9, 22:6–11; 26:12–18; see Stolz 1947).

The Platonic and Aristotelian definitions of contemplation—theoria—do not coincide. For Plato, theoria was the high point of knowledge delivering the best of the human being (Rep. VII 532 c.) It is exercised by the nous (Phaedrus 247c) and relates to love* (Symposium 192 c) by being part of the Good*, a good that is beyond being* (The Republic 509 b). This definition opens for the Greek Fathers the possibility of deification through theoria. In Aristotle, on the other hand, theoria is defined as the high point of virtuous life, “life by the intellect” (Nicomachean Ethics X, 7), which opens the way for “divinization of the intellect” along the lines of De Anima III:5: “If the intellect is something divine as opposed to human, then life by the intellect is also divine, as opposed to human life.” For Plato, theoria is something mysterious (Symposium 209 e), a revelation of the Beautiful that is inaccessible to any conception (Symposium 211 a), an ecstatic science of the Beautiful itself (Symposium 211 c)—in a word, an intuitive knowledge of the absolute. In Aristotle, on the other hand, theoria is unrelated to the regressive knowledge of pure Action, a disjunction thus opening between De Anima III:5 and Nicomachean Ethics X:7 on the one hand and Metaphysics I, 9 on the other, a problematic space of articulation that engulfs Avicenna (who synthesized divinization through the agency of the intellect in conjunction with the Primary Driving Force) and then Christian Aristotelianism*, especially radical Aristotelianism of the 13th century. The Aristotelian and Platonic ideas of theoria underwent an attempt at unification on the one hand within pagan and possibly anti-Christian Neoplatonism (Plotinus, Proclus, and Damascius) and on the other within the Christian Platonism* of the Greek Fathers (Origen*, Gregory* of Nyssa, and Maximus* the Confessor), including and above all in its most radical attempts at negative* theology (Pseudo-Dionysius*).

We cannot emphasize enough the importance of Plotinus’s doctrine of theoria (see Arnou 1921), which is definitely the first coherent synthesis of contemplation in the West. As a continuation of Plato’s Letter VII, Plotinus developed an ineffable view of the subject of theoria, expanding its sphere into the whole phusis—in his system, the phusis contemplates, it has a contemplative nature (phusis philotheamon): “Nature . . . is capable of a kind of contemplation and it produces all its works in accordance with contemplation, which, however, literally speaking it does not possess” (III, 8, 1), all this in opposition to Aristotle (Nicomachean Ethics 10, 8, 8), where theoria is restricted to the gods and humans. Plotinus also accomplished a change in relation to Plato that influenced a whole series of contemplative doctrines. He insisted that the soul* should withdraw within itself in order to be divested of all form (Enneads VI, 9, 7) and arrive at viewing the One, a principle of forms having no form itself (Enneads I, 6, 9.) The ascensional dialectics of the soul toward Good (Plato) is replaced by a conversion* of the self into the One by means of voluntary deprivation and progressive interiorizing. On this basis, Plotinus prepared the essence of the Augustinian contemplatio.

Sources in Scripture are limited in number. In the Old Testament we can name the parable* of Leah and Rachel, the episode of Moses and the burning bush, and Elijah's vision of God*. The Song of Songs has a special status. While it served to support the development of the nuptial mystique* of contemplation and, therefore, played a major role in the history of the doctrines of contemplation, it contains no descriptive canonical text of contemplation or contemplative life. In the New Testament we must distinguish between the crude materials on contemplation or contemplative life—the parable of Martha and Mary, the episode of the Transfiguration (Mt 17:1–9 and parallels), and Paul's elevation to the seventh heaven—and secondary theological elaborations, mostly in Paul's epistles.

Strictly speaking, contemplation is not a biblical concept. But the event of transfiguration can be interpreted as a passage from Elijah's and Moses' fear-dominated contemplation to a contemplation of the Son guided by love* (Mt 17:7–8.). These sources point to the following traits of contemplation. In the Old Testament it is accompanied by a theophany* (the bush and the cloud). It is an unbearable face-to-face meeting with God, appeasing the nostalgia for his appearance, a nostalgia experienced by all creatures. It is a face-to-face meeting revealing the intolerable “otherness” of God. Therefore, contemplation appears as the experience* of a radical otherness (one would not be able to see God without dying). In the New Testament the episode of the Transfiguration corresponds to a theophany* in the person* of Christ*; what is contemplated there is the glory* of Christ's divinity through his humanity. This element of mediation transforms the act of contemplation from a terrifying face-to-face meeting into the very condition of deification. (God became man so that I can contemplate him and be able to become God myself.) Paul's experience marked the act of contemplation with an ecstatic touch that became an inherent part of it. We should emphasize that the two parables of the two different kinds of life (Leah/Rachel in the Old Testament and Martha/Mary in the New) make contemplative life superior to active life. Thomas* Aquinas thus distinguished a form of beatitude* that was peculiar to active life from another that was peculiar to contemplative life, so that contemplation became confused with this bliss, which anticipated the bliss of the blessed ones, or supreme bliss.

Hugh of Saint Victor (Myst. Theol. Quest. Diff. 23–26) distinguishes between contemplation (Rachel; see Gregory* the Great, Moralia VI, 18, Hom. sup. Ez. XIV) and ardent love (Mary). On the one hand there is “the intellect or the capacity of knowing” and on the other “affection or the capacity to love.” Two different “paths to excellence” correspond to these two capacities. One is contemplation, and the other is the intuitive wisdom of love, which is its superior and above all knowledge, “knowing through ignorance that is uniting above the mind” (Pseudo-Dionysius; see Ruello, Intr. to Hugh of Saint Victor, SC 408, 47 Sq.). This typology linking the parables of contemplative life in the Old Testament with those of the New Testament draws a dividing line between intellectual contemplation and affective contemplation, thus leading to questions about the subordination of the latter to the former and the nature of knowledge achieved through love.

The scriptural element was reinterpreted from the standpoint of philosophical theôria. For example, in Gregory of Nyssa's Life of Moses, the face-to-face meeting between Moses and God is subject to exegesis* by means of the Platonic conception of theoria (SC 1 bis, 117 Sq., the burning bush, 211 Sq., darkness).

2. From the Philosophers' Theoria to the Theoria of the Greek Fathers

The transformation of pagan theoria into Christian theoria was accomplished within the critical acceptance of Platonism by the fathers* of the church,* especially the Greek Fathers (Ivanka 1964). The concepts of theoria and theology pre-dated the Fathers. These were Greek concepts that had evolved prior to the Christian dogma*. But they were reworked in dogmatic Christianity in a way that changed them profoundly (and maybe betrayed them). Their transformation has never been studied systematically in its totality, but we can at least outline some traits of the Fathers' concept of contemplation.

In addition to by the term theoria, borrowed from the philosophers, the Greek Fathers explain contemplation by gnosis (see DSp 2/2, 1765–66). This term is more specific to religion and more widely accepted than theoria—“it is the light that penetrates the soul as a result of one's obedience to the commandments” (Clement of Alexandria, Stromateis III, 5, 44). In a sense, gnosis prepares theoria. Theoria is the goal of life, the goal of the wise man, one of the characteristics of (Christian) gnostics, a pure prayer* (Clement of Alexandria). Origen distinguishes three levels: one moral (Abraham), one natural (Isaac), and one of inspection, or contemplation (inspectivus, Jacob). Clement sees a theoria through the person of Christ and a direct theoria of God, subdivided into a beatifying, angelic, and human theoria. Gregory of Nyssa distinguishes two stages, that of the cloud (intellectual theoria) and that of darkness (mystical theoria), corresponding to two stages in the life of Moses. He often uses the term theognosia to name mystical contemplation (e.g., in his Life of Moses PG 44, 372 d, SC 1 bis, 203).

Theognosia is to be distinguished from theoria: “Philosophies fail before arriving at the light of theognosia” (Life of Moses PG 44, 329 b, 113). The Song of Songs is simultaneously theognosia and philosophia (PG 44, 788 c). Evagrius Ponticus (†399) turns theoria into “the essential activity of the intellect, its life, its happiness” (Centuries 1, 24). The supreme theoria is the theoria of the Trinity*, “uniform gnosis” (Centuries I, 54), surpassing the theoria of the intelligible. It is supreme contemplation, a “state above all forms” (Centuries 7, 23) that Evagrius most often names theologia. Pseudo-Dionysius gives each level of the hierarchy (angelic or ecclesiastical) its own degree of theoria, as befitting. He does not equate theoria and negative theology (as John* of the Cross does). Theoria goes further than negative theology—the latter puts a limit on the intellect that theoria transgresses. Theoria is conceptualized as deification (theosis) and as ecstasy, by giving ecstasy a nonpsychological meaning. Ecstasy is a “departure from the human condition” (R. Roques, DSp 2/2, 1898).

For Pseudo-Dionysius and for a whole branch of the Dionysian tradition following him on this point, contemplative ecstasy is beyond intelligence and beyond reason (De Div. Nom. 872 a-b): “The most divine knowledge* of God is the one acquired through ignorance in a unification that is beyond intelligence (hyper noun), at the moment where intelligence, having moved away from all beings and subsequently detached itself from the self, unites with the most radiant light.”

For Aristotle, theoria is accomplishing what is peculiar to man—that is, living by intellect and virtue. For Plotinus, ecstasy is also an intellectual abandon of the self. Therefore, the pagan conception and the Dionysian conception are clearly opposites: contemplation is either surpassing humanity by leaving the human behind or accomplishment of humanity through the divinization of the intellect.

3. Contemplatio, from Augustine to the End of the Middle Ages

The term contemplatio originates with Cicero (De Nat. Deorum I, 14, 37) and Seneca (Letters to Lucilius 95, 10). Augustine*, in his doctrine of contemplatio, is indebted both to Latin Stoicism* and to Plotinus. He defines it as a face-to-face vision of God in eternal life*, as an end to all action and supreme bliss (De trin. 1, 8, 17; 1, 10, 20). Mary, as opposed to her sister Martha, epitomizes contemplative life (Sermon 169, 13 Sq). The philosophical distinction between bios praktikos and bios theoretikos, or between otium and negotium, is frequently used in the exegesis of Martha and Mary. In his Summa Theologica, Thomas* Aquinas devotes questions 179 to 182 of IIa IIae to this issue and declares that contemplative life is preferable for the following reasons: it is intellectual, more lasting, more delightful, and self-sufficient; leisure and rest; it is also preoccupied with things divine and peculiar to man. We must point out that Thomas attributes the contemplative/active division to life as transformed by the intellect. Taken on its own, life does not know this distinction (q. 179, a. 1).

Augustine starts from a theory of the soul in order to determine the nature of contemplatio. He does this, first, by making contemplatio the highest activity of the soul, the supreme level, just below apprehending true being (De quant. An. 33, 76). This activity consists in seeing the truth, in a celebration of Good (fruitio, perfruitio). And he continues further by reversing and shifting the analogy* of the Republic. Making the soul an analogon of the Trinity*, he introduces contemplatio inside Trinitarian life. In so doing, he achieves the interiorization Plotinus had begun. Contemplatio is accomplishing loving from inside; it is simultaneously a vision of Truth*, hearing and being in contact with the Word*, in a system of spiritual meanings that was not invented by Augustine (it goes back to Origen) but was endowed by him with a rich phenomenology of the sensibility and affectivity that evolved further throughout all the Middle Ages and was completed by Bernard.

This double definition of interiority, as love, and of contemplatio, as an intra-Trinitarian act, contains a risk. In fact, it contains even its own reversal, that of psychologizing contemplatio or reducing it to the sphere of the affective. From the time of Augustine, there have been two rival conceptions of contemplatio—one intellectualist and the other affective—and this rivalry would punctuate the history of contemplatio doctrines in the Middle Ages. Meister Eckhart and Dante* defended to a certain extent the intellectualist position, although with some important nuances. We must note, however, that Eckhart has no doctrine of contemplatio (unlike Dante, who exhibits an elaborate doctrine).

Yet things are not that simple, and there was a whole spiritual movement that developed a type of negative Augustinian theology in competition with or parallel to Dionysian negative theology. During the Middle Ages, almost all authors of treatises on the subject of contemplatio drew from these two sources, combining their elements in various ways.

Certainly, Augustinian negative theology of contemplatio has a more obvious affective character (e.g., in Thomas Gallus), but Dionysian negative theology has an affective dimension, too. This is a major point in determining the place of the concept of contemplatio in the economy of metaphysics. In fact, the affective conception of contemplatio prepared the change that saw on the one hand theology splitting into dogmatic theology and spiritual* theology and on the other philosophical knowledge breaking away from spiritual experience.

a) Place of Contemplatio. There is a text from the 13th century that has been constantly cited and pillaged as an authority. It is the Scala Claustralium by the Carthusian Guigues II, which was long attributed to Bernard of Clairvaux. This work allows one to place contemplatio at the top of a series of exercises—reading, meditation, prayer, contemplatio—that constitute the four ascending levels of spiritual* life. Bernard had already distinguished contemplatio and consideration (De Consid. II, 2): “Contemplation can be defined as the ability of the soul to have a true and infallible intuition about things (verus intuitus)... while consideration is... an intention of the mind in search of truth.”

Hugh of Saint Victor distinguishes cogitatio, meditatio, and contemplatio (PL 175, 116), marking the difference between the last two in terms of topos: “what meditation seeks, contemplation finds.” He also uses a quaternary schema distinguishing “four modes of contemplation”: meditation, soliloquy, circumspection, and ascension (De Cont. et eius speciebus I–IV). If the first three levels are defined by Guigues II according to their function (officium), contemplation is defined according to its effect (effectus), which is that “man becomes almost entirely spiritual” (De Cont. et eius speciebus VII, 1. 174). Contemplation is “the pleasure of being gentle” (Scala Cl. III, 1. 48), “a gentleness which delights and revives” (Scala Cl. III, 1. 46). It has, therefore, a specific place in the regulated planning of spiritual exercises in monastic life, being conceived as an institutionalized form of contemplative life, and is described in terms of emotion and desire, not knowledge.

b) Structure of Contemplatio. Pseudo-Dionysius (De Div. Nom. 4, 8; see also Thomas Aquinas, ST IIa IIae, q. 180, a. 6) applies to the soul the Aristotelian distinction between the three types of movement (circular, oblique or helicoidal, and linear or longitudinal). Since contemplation unites the powers of intellection, he identifies it with the circular movement. This conceptual transference was to be utilized in at least two ways in the history of doctrines: first, in the opposition between meditation, which is linear, and contemplation, which is circular (Quiroga, Apologia Mistica 4, 1 Sq for an informed summary), and then, in the distinction that is inherent to contemplation, namely, between speculative contemplation, which is linear or heli-coidal, and anagogic contemplation, which is circular or linear (see, e.g., Guigues du Pont, Treatise on Contemplation). Speculative contemplation is intellectual, and anagogic contemplation is affective: “There are two types of this contemplation, to test a small number: speculative and anagogic, or affirmative and negative, or even intellectual and affective” (ibid. III, 4.) The first one rises to God by affirmation and speculation; the second, by negation and affection. Anagogic linear contemplation is a direct and violent movement toward God, while anagogic circular contemplation is a movement bringing the soul back to itself to discover God there (introversion). Thus, the conceptual schemes are interwoven to the extreme: a physical classification serves as a basis to a mystical one that is dependent, in its turn, on the Plotino-Augustinian model of introversion, from turning back to oneself—toward God, or toward God through the self.

c) Theological Value and Object of Contemplatio. Thomas Aquinas systematized the philosophical and mystical elements we have outlined here in his theory of contemplation. According to Aquinas, contemplation furnishes true knowledge of the divine being, but this knowledge must be distinguished from that of the divine essence achieved through beatific* vision. In fact, theologians have hesitated on the issue of what the object of contemplation is (attributes*, glory*, God’s being or essence). The current negative response was not unanimous in the Middle Ages. Augustine and Thomas himself hesitated and even maintained that contemplation provided a vision of God himself, particularly for Moses and Paul (see ST, Summa Theologica, IIa IIae, q. 175, a. 3 and q. 180, a. 5), while at the same time they affirmed that the vision of the divine essence was inaccessible even to those who were blessed (Thomas Aquinas, In Ev. Sec. Ioh. C. 1, lec. 11, n. 1). For example, Pseudo-Dionysius, who identifies the essence of God with “unlimited light,” refers to the Platonic topos of the dazzling intellect and declares divine essence to be out of his reach. The goal is “to be united in ignorance with the one who is beyond all essence and all knowledge” (On Myst. Theol. 1, 1). How can we fit the contemplation of man on his journey with the contemplation of the blessed one, supreme terrestrial beatitude with supreme celestial beatitude?

Aquinas’s solution is to reinterpret Aristotelian theoria in order to make it a preparatory stage of the contemplation (ST IIa IIae, q. 180): Theoria is a contemplation of God within Creation*. Thus, theoria is defined as knowledge through speculation (cognitio specularis) that is distinct from contemplation, which is plain intuition (intuitus simplex, III Sententiarum, d.

35, q. 1, a. 3, ad 2.). Contemplation is unio and informatio, a union with the Principle and acquisition of form (ST Ia IIae, q. 3, a. 5, ad 1); it contains the substance of human beatitude. Aristotelian theoria, a terrestrial and scientific aspiration, leads, in return, only to limited beatitude (ST Ia IIae, q. 3, a. 6 resp. et ad 1–3). And even if contemplation is an act of the speculative intellect (intellectus speculativus, ST Ia IIae, q. 3, a. 5), we must distinguish between contemplation and speculation. Contemplation is nondiscursive, as it possesses truth and enjoys it, while speculation is a discursive searching for the truth (see In Eth. 10, 10, no. 2092). Beatitude and life are susceptible to being contemplative, while it befits intellect, knowledge, and science to be speculative. Therefore, contemplative life, which leads to supreme beatitude, supposes exercising a speculative intellect and procures a speculative kind of knowledge. The Aristotelian divorce between practice and theory, which Plotinus tried to override by emphasizing the theoretical element of all praxis, thus finds a twofold expression in Aquinas. The speculative is opposed to practice, but the contemplative, which presupposes the speculative, is to overcome this opposition. And by making Aristotelian theoria an anticipation of contemplation, Aquinas implicitly reproaches Aristotle for remaining in a state of scission.

4. Contemplatio in Modern Times

a) Mutations of Contemplation. The Renaissance marked a turning point in the history of mysticism (Certeau 1982). The introduction of an autobiographical system in the description of “superior states” (Musil), the massive invasion of hysteria as a figure of truth or of neurasthenia (Surin), and the promotion of femininity—all these constituted an irreversible evolution. From the perspective of historiography, this interpretation is very fragile. The ecstasy of Ostia contains all the required autobiographical elements; the feminine mystique is a major trait of medieval spirituality (Hildegard of Bingen and Hadewijch of Antwerp) and so on. Yet it has some validity. Indeed, the Renaissance underwent a subjectivist turn in relation to the mystical doctrines of contemplation, but this turn must be described within these doctrines and not only within the categories of the psychoanalysis of history*.

From this immanent point of view, the transition can be characterized as the mutation of the very concept of contemplation that passed from a cognitive acceptance to a purely psychological acceptance. The question of the objective content of knowledge of the act of contemplating, which is a central question for any Thomistic dogmatic theology or the mystical theology of someone such as Hugh of Saint Victor but also equally important to Nicholas of Cusa (whose thought lies at the borderline between two worlds), loses its pertinence in the modern schools of spirituality, such as the Salesian* School, the French schools evolving from Pierre de Bérulle*, and the reformed Teresian school of Carmel*. Certainly, there are some great mystics in the baroque and classical ages (Benoît de Canfeld, Angelus Silesius, Jean de Saint-Samson, and Bérulle), but there are almost no contemplative theologians or philosophers. When Suarez* writes his De oratione, we have to do with a distinct work in terms of its metaphysics; when Spinoza speaks of contemplation, the latter is deprived of its primary meaning.

This drifting is typical of the Latin Church. The Eastern Church never experienced it, no doubt because its doctrines of contemplation have always had a mystic and practical character at the same time. Its theological tradition* has a more pronounced mystical orientation, and its theoria is always related to divinization (theosis). Ascetism is the common good of the Church.

On the other hand, the cultural phenomenon of the Renaissance had no effect on religious thought in the traditionally Orthodox countries (mostly Russia and Greece). The major event in the East was a complex transfer of Byzantine mystical theology into a Slavic context, marked, among other things, by the absence of autochthonous Scholastics*, which gave, for instance, the opportunity for a revival of Hesychasm* in the 19th century. But this transfer does not fit into the organizational model of Western history, which is that of a Renaissance break with the Middle Ages. Philosopher-theologians such as Solovyov*, Florensky, and even Berdyaev represent, from this point of view, cultural exceptions inasmuch as they continued to attribute a normative value to contemplation for metaphysical knowledge—something unthinkable in the post-Teresian and post-Kantian West.

b) From Contemplation to Prayer, the Reformed Carmelite Order. Although the writings of Teresa of Avila appear to be generally autobiographical, they contain a very traditional teaching of mystical theology. Teresa’s originality lies elsewhere—namely, in creating a landmark in the movement to subjectivize mystical life (see, e.g., Certeau 1982). Some were only too happy that Teresa broke with Pseudo-Dionysius in order to lay the foundations of a psychological method in mystical matters.

Teresa does not speak of contemplation but of orison, a term she borrowed from the Spanish spiritual leaders Osuna, Peter of Alcantara, and John of Avila, who sympathized with the movement of the recogidos.

Prayer is the act of praying (oratio). Therefore, it designates, first of all, a specialized activity, an “interior occupation” (Jean-Baptiste de la Salle) of the psychological human subject (the angels* do not offer prayers, but they contemplate; nature does not pray, while, according to Plotinus, it does), a strictly religious activity (if there is a “philosophical contemplation,” however disputable its status, there is no “philosophical prayer”). With prayer, contemplation is emptied of all metaphysical content. (And John* of the Cross, who has a true doctrine of contemplation, a heritage of the finest tradition, does not differ on this point from the Teresian conception.)

Teresa distinguishes five levels of prayer: 1) prayer of meditation, 2) prayer of peace, 3) prayer of dormant powers, 4) prayer in union with God, and 5) prayer of spiritual marriage (Book of Life and The Interior Castle). In Abodes of the Soul, Teresa distinguishes between the prayer of meditation (corresponding to the first three abodes) and the prayer of contemplation (the last four abodes), which parallels the classical distinction between meditation and contemplation, only here the distinction is made in the dynamic subject of the soul, moving from the more superficial to the more profound, reducing the introversive movement to an introspection of the states of the soul. The goal Teresa seems to set herself is providing readers with psychological criteria and allowing them to find their own place in this argument: “Peace of mind, union, ecstasy—these are all expressions that in the beginning had a theological meaning, without relating directly to any special psychological experience. Hence, this theological meaning has passed into the background” in Spanish mysticism (Stolz 1947).

These psychological states, finally, contain visions, ecstasies, and revelations* preparing one for spiritual marriage. Nuptial mystique, which has one of its sources in the metaphor of the Church as the spouse of Christ—“the marriage of the lamb is come, and his bride has made herself ready” (Rev 19:7)—and, earlier, in the metaphor of Israel* as the spouse of God—“Therefore, behold, I [God] will allure her [Israel], and bring her into the wilderness, and speak tenderly to her” (Hos 2:14)—draws its origin from the allegorical commentary of the Song of Solomon. The comments by Origen and Gregory of Nyssa fixed its framework of interpretation—namely, in terms of spiritual meanings and of the overall significance of the text, which is seen as describing simultaneously the union between God and the Church and that between the soul and God. The emotional theories of contemplation resorted on a massive scale to this type of allegory (see, e.g., the commentaries by the anti-intellectualist William of Saint-Thierry or those of Thomas Galluus, who is an affective Dionysian). Bernard of Clairvaux’s Sermons on the Song of Solomon are, therefore, taken within the framework of the entire movement that they synthesize and, in fact, largely surpass. This nuptial mystique finds a complete literary expression in the Poems of Hadewijch of Antwerp and The Spiritual Canticle of John of the Cross. Ecstasy is an important element in the life of prayer that Teresa depicts in detail in her Interior Castle. It is a decisive characteristic for the psychologization and subjectivization of contemplation.

Taken by itself, ecstasy is only a superficial phenomenon that may accompany contemplation, but, in fact, it signals the weakness of human nature, which is why the ancient authors mistrusted it in the first place and warned the contemplatives against it. Ecstasy poses a conceptual problem—that of knowing if, in the act of contemplation, the intellect goes out of itself. Is ecstasy a movement of the soul going out toward the fine point of the intellect, or is it a radical movement of the intellect going out of its own self?

It was within the traditional framework of negative theology that John of the Cross developed his rich and complex doctrine of contemplation. He believed that contemplation was “mystical theology” (Ascent of Mount Carmel II, VIII): “This is why we call contemplation, which gives us understanding of the highest knowledge of God, ‘mystical theology’—that is to say, the secret wisdom* of God, since it is hidden from the understanding that receives it.” This contemplation is considered inborn: “Since contemplating is nothing but a secret, peaceful, and loving infusion of God” (The Dark Night of the Soul I, XI); “this secret, dark . . . contemplation is mystical theology . . . a hidden sense that according to Saint Thomas is communicated and injected into the soul by love” (The Dark Night of the Soul II, XVII). Defining contemplation as a “dark night,” he thus revives the Dionysian tradition of caliginous contemplation: “This night that we name ‘contemplation’” (The Dark Night of the Soul I, VIII). Contemplation is a beam of darkness, a shadowy light, an enlightened night, a “dark cloud making the night bright” (Poems IV).

The caliginous contemplation of medieval authors originates in the Dionysian doctrine of divine darkness. For Pseudo-Dionysius, God is found in a “superluminous darkness,” “unbound light” that equals “darkness” (see Letter to Caius, Letter V to Dorothea, PG 3 1066 A and 1074 a). Gregory of Nyssa also developed a mystique of the cloud in his Life of Moses (PG 44, 360 D, SC 1 bis 177 Sq) and in his Commentary on the Song of Songs (PG 44, 1000 CD.) Contemplation is a “science of love” (ibid. II, XIX), a “mystical intelligence, confused and obscure” (ibid. II, XXIV). It is supernatural, peaceful, solitary, substantial. That is why John of the Cross could call it “an overall and obscure infusion” (The Living Flame of Love III, 3). Contemplation is a science but it is also delightful, which makes it close to “secret knowledge.” It is a “knowledge in love with God” (Dark Night II, 5), a “secret science of God.” In The Spiritual Canticle XIX, 5, he writes, “This delightful science . . . is mystical theology that is a secret science of God, that spiritual people call ‘contemplation’; it is extremely delightful because it is a science by way of loving.” Mystical theology or negative theology is a science “achieved through love, where one not only ‘knows’ but at the same time savors” (prologue to The Spiritual Canticle). John of the Cross insists on the fact that it is God who introduces the soul to contemplation and, in His grace*, operates in it. The soul just accepts and has nothing else to do but “pay attention to God lovingly, without wanting to feel or see anything . . . to receive the light supernaturally infused is to understand passively” (Ascent to Mount Carmel II, 15). The main difficulty of the contemplation doctrines—the ranking of intellect and affect—is resolved by equating contemplation with a science that is identical with love, a science that is knowledge. In a vocabulary that is still traditional, this solution consecrates the divorce between mystical contemplation and philosophical contemplation. Thus, mystical theology received a considerable existential autonomy, and contemplation, in solidarity with radical negative theology, became completely self-sufficient. The Thomistic problem of overcoming the opposition between the speculative and the practical—through contemplation—disappeared. Natural understanding is a prisoner of the senses and is even enlightened by supernatural intelligence, “which in the prison of the body has no disposition, nor capacity, to receive a clear notice of God” (Ascent to Mount Carmel II, 8).

Thus, the following axiom may be derived: “More or less everything the imagination can conceive and the mind can receive or understand in this life, is only, or can only be, a means for future union with God” (Ascent to Mount Carmel II, 8). It is not the natural character of understanding that impedes the intellectual apprehension of God, but it is “this state”—that is, the mortal condition of finitude—that does so. That which is of supernatural* order does not alter this limitation that is inherent in creation; it only opens Nature to a superior passivity, bending it to the demanding conditions of an obscure and arid contemplation. The double recognition, first, of Thomas* Aquinas as a magister of dogmatic theology (by Leo XIII in 1879) and, second, of John of the Cross as a magister of mystical theology (by Pius XI in 1926) would ratify the scission and shift of the well-appropriated roles in the 16th century.

c) Perspectives. From John of the Cross until the present day, the history of the concept of contemplation has evoked few commentaries. Contemplative minds have continued to experiment and theologians to systematize, but the concept of contemplation has remained overall unchanged. We must, however, distinguish clearly the history of Latin spirituality and that of the East.

Catholicism, after the Council of Trent* and after Teresa, experienced two complementary phenomena: on the one hand, a greater specification of congregations and religious orders in the various kinds of spirituality, adding various shades of meaning to the concept of contemplation, and, on the other, solid systematizing in describing the various states of contemplating, partly related to the controversy over “acquired contemplation,” in which the Carmelites played a major role. This feud, which had its origins in the quarrel of quietism* (as well as in the Molinist background), revolved around the line to be drawn between what is natural (acquired contemplation) and what is supernatural (infused contemplation). Saint Joseph, a representative of the Salamanca School that contributed a systematic rereading of John of the Cross in the light of Thomas Aquinas, deals with it, for example, in his le Cursus Theologiae Mysticae Scholasticae (1736). The quarrel reached its climax in around 1900 in a debate between A. Saudreau (La Vie d’union à Dieu, 1900) and A.F. Poulain (Des grâces d’oraison, 1901), at the time when two great Carmelite contemplatives—Theresa of Lisieux (called Theresa of the Child Jesus, 1873–97) and Elizabeth of Dijon (called Elizabeth of the Trinity, 1880–1906)—picked up the Saint Johnian concept of contemplation. We can say of Theresa that she caused contemplation to pass through a form of modern night, nihilism, whence it emerged restored to its original appearance. Theresa gave it a full ecclesiastic dimension (Balthasar 1970) and was probably the first person to describe the clash between contemplation and atheism*, which gave her writing an inimitable character as a result.

The Eastern Church, thanks to the publication of an anthology of ascetic texts titled Philocalie (compiled in 1782 by Nicodemus the Hagiorite), saw, in the 19th century, a revival of both monastic and lay spirituality and of the techniques of contemplation deriving from Byzantium, specifically Hesychasm*. By its sheer mass (2,500 pages) and its ability to put things in perspective (the collection starts with the Fathers of the desert and concludes with Gregory* Palamas and Palamism), this anthology contributed a great deal to the powerful identity of contemplation in the Orthodox Church, especially in Russia, which witnessed a true regeneration of the “prayer of the heart.” This regeneration is called detachment, for example, in the teachings of the startzi or on Mount Athos, say, in the spirituality of someone such as Silouane (1866–1938), where contemplation relates, at the same time, to compassion.

We cannot say that contemplation was simply marginalized or omitted from the secular world. On the one hand, it certainly has not escaped the movement of secularization*, where esthetic contemplation came to replace mystique, since it is currently attributed the characteristics of immediacy, being above rational discourse, bringing intuitive knowledge of the universe and eventually knowledge* of God. On the other, the clinical devaluation of some states of mind related to contemplation has tarnished it with the discredit of a normative psychiatric science (see the works of Janet). It was only with Lacan’s Seminar that female contemplative ecstasy has been rehabilitated as a “mystical relishing in things,” which confirms the psychologized conception described previously, while at the same time opening a gap between it and this unambiguous attempt at psychological reduction. This fact seems to warrant a rethinking of contemplation for its own sake taking into consideration the critical contribution of philosophy*, namely, phenomenology.

Finally, multiple possibilities for a reevaluation of contemplation have been outlined by the “atheist mystique” of such writers as Wittgenstein and by the experience of boundaries as described by Blanchot, Klossowski, Bataille, and others. The state of mind these authors experienced and described escapes the traditional characterization of ecstasy and contemplation, but it borrows from both of these the desire for abandoning the self, giving up all control, breaking with immanence without creating a hierarchy between the here-and-now and the beyond, and without attaching these movements of the spirit to any theological framework. All this helps destroy the cosmological order in the realm of the psyche. If a theory of contemplation remains at all possible, it will be outlined henceforth against this background of disaster—but by agreeing to pay this price, it would be able to frustrate any reductionist endeavors.

- Angelus Silesius, Cherubinischer Wandersmann, Stuttgart, 1984.
- Benoît de Canfeld, La Règle de perfection/The Rule of Perfection, Paris, 1982.
- Denys le Chartreux, De Contemplatione, OC, Chartreuse de Montreuil-sur-Mer/Tournai, 1896–1913, vol. 41.
- J.-P. de Caussade, Traité sur l’oraison du cœur et Instructions spirituelles, Paris, 1980.
- Élizabeth de la Trinité, J’ai trouvé Dieu, OC, éd. du Centenaire, 3 vols., Paris, 1979–80.
- Guigues du Pont, Traité sur la contemplation, Analecta Cartusiana 72, 2 vols., Salzburg, 1985.

- Guigues II le Chartreux, Lettre sur la vie contemplative (L’échelle des moines), SC 163.
- Guillaume de Saint-Thierry, La contemplation de Dieu, SC 61 bis; Exposé sur le Cantique des Cantiques, SC 82; Lettre aux frères du Mont-Dieu (Lettre d’Or), SC 223.
- Hadewijch d’Anvers, Mengeldichten, Antwerp, 1952.
- Henri Herp, Spiegel der Volcomenheit, 2 vols., Antwerp, 1931; Theologia Mystica, Köln, 1554, repr. Farnborough, 1966.
- Hugues de Balma, Théologie mystique, SC 408 and 409.
- Hugues de Saint-Victor, La contemplation et ses espèces, MCS II, Tournai-Paris, s.d. (v. 1955).
- Hugues de Saint-Victor, Six opusculs spirituels, SC 155.
- Jean de Saint-Samson, Œuvres mystiques, Paris, 1984.
- Nicholas de Cusa, Opera omnia iussu et auctoritate Academiae Litterarum Heidelbergensis ad codicum fidem edita, Leipzig, 1932–45, Hamburg, 1950–, vol. 1, De docta ignorantia, 1932, vol. 4/1, Opuscula, 1959, vol. 5, Idiota, 1937, vol. 13/2, De apice theoria, 1974.
- Anon., The Cloud of Unknowing, Oxford, 1944.
- Anon. (La) Perle évangélique, 1602 (see DSp 12, 1159–69).
- José de Jesús María Quiroga, Apologie mystique en défense de la contemplation (Apologia Mistica), Paris, 1990.
- Richard de Saint-Victor, Benjamin Minor, PL 196, 1–64; Benjamin Major, PL 196, 64–192.
- J. van Ruusbroec, Werken, 2nd ed., Tielt, 1944–48 (Écrits, 2 vols. published, Bellefontaine, 1990, 1993).
- Archimandrite Sophrony, Starets Silouane moine du Mont Athos: Vie-doctrines-écrits, Sisteron, 1973.
- Thomas Gallus, Comm. du Cantique des Cantiques, Paris, 1967 (see DSp 15, 799–815).
- ♦ A.-F. Poulain (1901), Des grâces d’oraison, traité de th. mystique, Paris (10th Ed. 1922).
- R. Arnou (1921), Le désir de Dieu dans la philosophie de Plotin, Paris (2nd Ed., Rome, 1967).
- A. Gardeil (1925), “Les mouvements direct, en spirale et circulaire de l’âme et les oraisons mystiques,” RThom 8, 321–40.
- F. Cayré (1927), La contemplation augustinienne, Paris (2nd Ed., Bruges, 1954).
- J. de Guibert (1930), Études de th. mystique, Toulouse.
- J. Baruzi (1931), Jean de la Croix et le problème de l’expérience mystique, Paris.
- R. Arnou (1932), Le thème néoplatonicien de la contemplation créatrice chez Origène et chez saint Augustin, Rome.
- K. Rahner (1932), “Le début d’une doctrine des sens spirituels chez Origène,” RAM 13, 113–45.
- R. Arnou (1935), “Platonisme des Pères,” DThC 12/2, 2258–392.
- A.-J. Festugière (1936), C. et vie cont. chez Platon, Paris.
- H.-C. Puech (1938), “La ténèbre mystique chez le Pseudo-Denys l’Aréopagite et dans la tradition patristique,” EtCarm 23/2, 33–53.
- V. Lossky (1944), Th. mystique de l’Église d’Orient, Paris.
- A. Stolz (1947), Th. de la mystique, Chèvotogne.
- R. Dalbiez (1949), “La controverse de la c. acquise,” in Technique et c., EtCarm 28, 81–145.
- Gabriel de Sainte-Marie (1949), La c. acquise, Paris.
- J. Lebreton et al. (1953), “Contemplation,” DSp 2/2, 1643–2193.
- W. Völker (1958), Kontemplation und Ekstase bei Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita, Wiesbaden.
- L. Kerstiens (1959), “Die Lehre von der theoretischen Erkenntnis in der lateinischen Tradition,” PhJ 67, 375–424.
- J. Leclercq (1961 a), Études sur le vocabulaire monastique du Moyen Age latin, StAns 48, Rome; (1961 b), “La vie contemplative dans saint Thomas et dans la tradition,” RThAM 28, 251–68.

- J. Pieper (1962), Glück und Kontemplation, Munich.
 E. von Ivánka (1964), Plato christianus, Einsiedeln.
 H. U. von Balthasar (1970), Schwester im Geist: Therese von Lisieux und Elizabeth von Dijon, Einsiedeln.
 F. Ruello (1981), "Statut et rôle de l'intellectus et de l'affectus dans la Théologie mystique de Hugues de Balma," in Kartäusermystik und -mystiker, ACar 55/1, 1–46.
 M. de Certeau (1982), La fable mystique, Paris.
 P. Hadot (1987), Exercices spirituels et philosophie antique, EAug, 2nd Ed.

- F. Nef (1993), "Caritas dat caritatem: la métaphysique de la charité dans les sermons sur le Cantique des Cantiques et l'ontologie de la contemplation," in R. Brague (Ed.), Saint Bernard et la philosophie, Paris, 87–109.

FRÉDÉRIC NEF

See also Asceticism; Beatitude; Life, Spiritual; Mysticism; Prayer; Spiritual Theology; Vision, Beatific

Conversion

1. Vocabulary

The biblical vocabulary of conversion is constituted of images, mostly images of return. The Hebrew verb shoûv means "to turn back," "to return to the point of departure." On the existential or ethical level (occurring more than 100 times), it connotes a change of direction, a modification of behavior. Rarely does this return consist in distancing oneself from God* (Nm 14: 43): it almost always involves coming back to him (prepositions 'el, le-, 'ad, 'al) or to steer away from evil* (min and its compounds). The causative form "to make one return" gives God or his representative the initiative of return (Ps 80:4). The Greek equivalent is strephô, and its compounds are apo- or epi-, which most often conveys shoûv in the Septuagint. In the New Testament, epistrephô is often used to speak of conversion, especially in Acts.

In the Bible*, conversion also involves searching for God or the good* (Hebrew verbs biqqésh and dârash: Dt 4:29; Sol 1:6). It especially means to regret evil. The verb niham describes this aspect of conversion, which consists of changing one's mind if there is still time or of repenting if evil has been committed. Besides the human being experiencing repentance (Ex 13:17; Jer 31:19), God (see J1 2, 13f.) is often the subject of this verb: he goes back on a decision (Ex 32:14) or regrets a past choice (Gn 6, 6f). Rarer than shoûv, niham is translated in the Septuagint as metanoëô, a mostly neutral verb in secular Greek ("to remark after the fact, to change one's mind, have regrets"). In the Bible it expresses religious and moral conversion, and in the New Testament specifically its lexical field associates it with faith (Mk 1:15), with baptism* (Acts

2:38), and with the forgiveness of sins (Lk 17:3). Conversion (metanoia) is also linked to return (Acts 3:19, with epistrephô).

2. Preaching: Sin, Conversion, Salvation

a) The Prophets. In prophetic preaching*, sin*, in whatever form (infidelity, Hos 2:7; rebellion, Is 1, 2ss; taking the Name* in vain, Am 2:7; abandonment of YHWH and idolatry*, Jer 2:13; etc.) is an evil that disturbs and corrupts the relationship between Israel* and God, to the misfortune of the former. Until the exile, the prophets* continuously denounce sinners and call them to return to God in order to restore a just relationship with him (Am 5:4, 14f.; Mi 6:6ff.), by rejecting idols (Hos 14:2ff.), and by a genuine change in their actual behavior (Is 1:16f.). Rituals and words are not enough (Hos 6:1–6). The reminder of God's mercy (Hos 2:16ff., 14:5–8) and the threat of judgment* (Is 6:9f.; Am 3:2) encourages Israel to return to God. There is not much hope since sin is deep rooted (Am 4:4–13; Jer 17:1), but "the rest will return" (Is 10:20–23).

From Jeremiah onward, the language of conversion begins to change: the prepositions that make of the return a step toward YHWH are replaced by those that make of it a refusal of evil. For Jeremiah, the misfortune that strikes a country constitutes a final call to listen and to convert (Jer 4:14, 25:5f., 26:2–5). Hardening* (18:11f.) leads to catastrophe (13:20–27). After this, God will return (12:15), he will make his people come back in order to enter into a new covenant* with him (31:18ff.). For Ezekiel, who insists on personal responsibility (Ez 18), conversion is a gift from God (36:25–32). The Deuteronomist Isaiah and Jonah considered the conversion of nations to the God of Israel (Is 45:14; Jn 1:3) (universalism*).

b) Deuteronomist School. Consciousness of a sin constantly threatening the covenant between Israel and its God is present in Deuteronomist theology, at least after the exile (Dt 9:24; Jos 24:19). Furthermore, the call to fidelity (Dt 6:4f.) is reinforced by an urgent invitation to conversion. (Dt 4:29). Stories illustrate its importance: salvation* is linked to the return to YHWH (Jgs 10:6–16; 1 Sm 7:2–12), and discourses throughout the Deuteronomist history* continuously remind us of this (1 Kgs 8:46–51; 2 Kgs 17:13). Moreover, conversion is a matter of urgency: a day will come when it will be too late (2 Kgs 23:25ff.). The Chronist works extend this message (Ezr 9:5–15; Neh 9) by insisting even more on the role of the Law* in the return to God (Neh 9:29). Thus, after the exile, repentance plays a key role in biblical spirituality (Dn 9:4–19). This is also seen in the Wisdom* theme found in the late writings (Wis 11:23f., 12:2; Sir 17:25f., 39:5).

c) Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels. The prophetic discourses reemerge right at the beginning of the Gospels*, where John the Baptist urgently calls people to conversion so that they will be saved from judgment (Lk 3, 7ff. par.). The baptism he administers signifies the will to return to God by turning away from sin (Mk 1:4f. par.). Jesus takes up this message but places it in a positive perspective as the Good News of the Kingdom* (Mk 1:15 par.). As signs that the kingdom has come, miracles* are also calls to conversion (Mt 11:20–24). To choose the will of God (Mt 7:21) and to renounce sin is essential to life, for hardening* is sterile (Mt 12:41s; Lk 13:1–9). But Jesus' attitude to sinners shows that, in his tenderness, God seeks those who are lost (Lk 5:32 par., 15).

d) The Church of the New Testament. The apostolic mission*, in which the announcement of the Resurrection* goes hand in hand with the invitation to confession (Acts 2:36ff., 3:13–26), continues Jesus' mission* (Mk 6:12; Lk 24:47): a turning away from evil and toward the Lord, who has been raised from the dead to forgive sins (Acts 10:42f.), will allow one to escape judgment (17:30f.) and to obtain life (11:18). Baptism is a sign of conversion (2:38). This is also the case in Paul, who extensively develops the connection with the Resurrection. Conversion (1 Thes 1:9f.; Tm 2:4f.) consists of breaking from the old leaven to celebrate Easter with dignity (1 Cor 5:7f.), of assuming Christ* (Gal 3:27), of becoming a new creature in the image of the risen Lord, dead to sin but alive to God (Rom 6:1–14, 22ff., 12:2; Col 2:12f., 3:5–11). Paul also develops the ethical* consequences of this conversion (Col 3:12–17; Eph 4:17–32). John's Jesus speaks of a new birth (Jn 3:3, 5) and calls all people to the light (12:35f.) and to the source of living water (7:37ff.) by renouncing darkness (3:19ff.), lies (8:44), and vain-glory (12:37–43) in order to become the child of God through faith (1:12). The child born blind (Jn 9) is the Johannine model of conversion.

3. Gestures and Words of Conversion

There are gestures, rituals, and words of conversion in the Bible. Thus, fasting, sackcloth and ashes (2 Sm 12, 16; Is 22:12; Jl 1:13; Jon 3:5f.; see Mt 11:21), lamentations, and cries and tears (Jl 2:12f.; Est 4:2f.) are signs of mourning but also penance*. There are penitential liturgies* (1 Sm 7:3–6, Hos 6:1–6), and, after the exile, a more or less standard kind of prayer* expresses the sense of sin (see Dn 9). In addition to the annual day of Expiations* (Lv 16), there are days of penitence (Jer 36:6; Zec 8:19). The prophets do not reject these rituals, but they do demand ethical truth* of those who practice them (Is 58: 3–7). Their preaching undoubtedly influenced the prayer of sinners that is echoed in the penitential psalms* (32, 38, 51).

- J. Behm, E. Würthwein (1942), “metanoëô,” ThWNT 4, 972–1001.
- W.L. Holladay (1958), The Root shûb in the OT, Leiden.
- Coll. (1960), La conversion, LV(L) 47, Lyon.
- E. Lipinski (1969), La liturgie pénitentielle dans la Bible, Paris.
- A. Tosato (1975), “Per una revisione degli studi sulla metanoia neotestamentaria,” RivBib 33, 3–45.
- J. A. Soggin (1979), “shûb, zurückkehren,” THAT 2, 884–91.
- B. R. Gaventa (1986), From Darkness to Light: Aspects of Conversion in the NT, Philadelphia.
- H. Simian-Yofre (1986), “nhm,” ThWAT 5, 366–84.

ANDRÉ WÉNIN

See also Baptism; Eschatology; Hardening; Heart of Christ; Judgment; Kingdom of God; Mission; Penitence; Preaching; Sin; Spiritual Theology

Corpus Christi. See Eucharist

Cosmos

A. Biblical Theology

1. Vocabulary

Kosmos (verb: kosmein) in Greek generally denotes “order” or “ornament (taxis, tassein: only “organization); it also designates the universe (space-time) and its harmony (see Origen*, Princ. 2, 3, 6). In the Septuagint, kosmos and kosmein are associated primarily with the Hebrew lexicon of ornament and sometimes with that of the cosmos created by God*, notably in The Wisdom of Solomon (16 times: “universe”). Biblical Hebrew has no equivalent for “universe”; ‘ôlâm means “indefinite time*” or “eternity” (“universe” in postbiblical Hebrew). The chuqqôt (decrees) establish the cosmic order according to a kind of covenant* (berît). Çèdèq/çedâqâh (frequent par. mishepât) may apply to the “good order” of creation* (Schmid 1968; Murray 1992).

2. Old Testament

The Old Testament preserves traces of ancient warrior (Ps 74:13f.; 89:9f.; Is 27:1; etc) or merely violent cosmogonies (Ps 104:7ff.; Jb 38:9ff.; Jer 5:22; Prv 22–31). The most demythologized text is Genesis 1:1–2:4: God creates order by speaking, by a series of acts of separation (bdl), by the division into species (mîn: Beauchamp 1969), by the establishment of the calendar (week, sabbath, celebrations). In the Torah, the blessing* that maintains the order of the cosmos and the curse that overthrows it (Lv 26; Dt 28) are articulated in the terms of a covenant to which heaven, earth (Ps 50:4), and mountains (Mi 6:1; see Dt 27:12f.; Ps 50:1f.) are witnesses. With the flood, God responds to human disorder by unleashing cosmic chaos (Gn 7–8), after which He promises to maintain the order of the seasons (8:22), regulates the use of violence* (animals*), and enters into an “eternal covenant” (berît ‘ôlâm: 9:8–17) with humanity and all living things.

The oldest occurrence of this theme is probably in Hosea 2:20–24 (Hebrew; 18–22ff. in translations), since Jeremiah 33:20 (day and night), Isaiah 54:9f. (reference to Gn 9), and Isaiah 24:5 date from the exile. Ezekiel 34:25–31 promises a “covenant of peace*” (berît shâlôm) that animals will observe. Noncanonical writings attribute cosmic order to a divine oath (1 Hen 69:16–25) or to the power of the Name* (Prayer of Manasseh 3; see magic texts).

The cosmic and social order is subject to the influence of God, of human sin*, and, in mythologies, chiefly of gods or devils. Traces of this remain in the Old Testament (Ps 82; Gn 6:1f.; Is 24). 1 Hen 6–10 again gave them prominence, perhaps recalling the Greek theory of the conflict of cosmic elements. Where lesser importance is attributed to cosmic and supracosmic factors, human error comes to the fore. The cause of cosmic evil* is generally human error, punished by God (Hos 4:1ff.; Jl 1–2). It is God who “creates light and darkness, good and evil” (Is 45:7), who threatens a new flood (Zep 1:2f.), and promises a return to harmony (Is 45:9f.).

This return to cosmic shâlôm can be achieved by ethical* or liturgical means. Beginning with the Babylonian festival of Akitu, the ritual of which is known, scholars have found traces of an autumn new year celebration. Although not designated as ritual texts, the royal psalms* 72 and 89 illustrate the cosmic and royal import of the themes of çèdèq, mishepât, and their fruit, shâlôm (Ps 74, 82; Is 11:1–9, 24, 32–33). In most ancient societies, temples*, including the temple of Jerusalem*, were representations of the creation and of the divine realm: heaven and earth met in them (Patai 1967). In the course of social change, the myth* remained but was reinterpreted. Genesis 1, for example, demythologizes “the army of the heavens” and the monsters of the deep. Genesis 2 grants humanity (Adam*) royal status. Certain hymns (e.g., Ps 72) or oracles (Is 11:1–9) were transposed into eschatology* (Murray 1992). Apocalypses reread archetypes in order to decipher contemporary events. A similar cosmic breadth appears in writings that are simultaneously apocalyptic* and wisdom writings (Stone 1976), such as Job 38–39, Ecclesiastes 1:4–7, The Wisdom of Solomon 7:17–20, and 1 Hen. Close to Stoic conceptions (regularity of the cosmos: see the hymn to Zeus of Cleanthes), Philo interprets the solemnity of the new year as a reconciliation of the stoikheia in conflict (Schweizer 1988; see Wis 16:17–22, 19:18–21).

3. New Testament

Jesus* was to disappoint and reject messianic expectations in the form that they had assumed. His disciples recognized in him the Lord of the cosmos through his charismatic power and his intimate connection to created things—expressed in hymnal form in Ephesians 1:3–10, Colossians 1:15–20, and John 1:1–4. In him, God has “recapitulated” all things. Paul (Gal 4:3, 9; see Col 2:8, 20) fights against the subjection of some to the stoikheia tou kosmou, “cosmic elements,” or (with reference to Jewish observances considered obsolete) “rudiments,” also called “angels*,” “principalities,” or “powers” (Schweizer 1988). Jesus has freed us from their ascetic or ritual requirements by his victory. Paul asserts both the filial condition of the Christian in Christ* and the present suffering of all creation (Rom 8:18–23; v. 19: ktisis) (Fitzmyer 1992), which cries out for deliverance. For him, “justification*” (dikaiôsis, dikaiôma), the central theme of Romans, preserved all the semantic breadth of the Hebrew çèdèq (çedâqâh); it included the cosmic order. There could not possibly be any salvation* outside the teleological perspective of the cosmos.

Revelation interprets present suffering and the coming manifestation of Christ as Lord of all. The cosmology of the book adopts the schema of the parallel between heaven and earth and adapts Jewish eschatology* to a millenarian Christian vision, which explains the reservations of a part of the ancient Church*. The history of Johannine theology later showed the relevance of those reservations.

- R. Patai (1967), Man and Temple in Ancient Myth and Ritual, New York.
- H. Schmid (1968), Gerechtigkeit als Weltordnung, BHT 40, Tübingen.
- P. Beauchamp (1969), Création et séparation, Paris.
- M. Stone (1976), “List of Revealed Things in the Apocalyptic Literature,” in F. Cross (Ed.), Magnalia Dei (Festschrift Wright), New York, 413–62.
- A. Broadie and J. Mac Donald (1978), “The Concept of Cosmic Order in Ancient Egypt in Dynastic and Roman Times,” AnCl 47, 106–28.
- E. Schweizer (1988), “Slaves of the Elements and Worshippers of Angels: Ga 4:3, 9 and Col 2:8, 18, 20,” JBL 107, 455–68.
- J. Fitzmyer (1992), Romans: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary, New York.
- R. Murray (1992), The Cosmic Covenant, London.
- M. Douglas (1993), “The Forbidden Animals in Leviticus,” JSOT 59, 3–23.

ROBERT MURRAY

See also Adam; Animals; Covenant; Creation; Ecology; Eschatology; Liturgy; Pauline Theology; Temple; Time; World

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

To the theologies* that meditated on it, the experience of Israel* bequeathed first of all a cosmos that was radically lacking in divinity or numinousness. For the Greek notion of an “order of the world” and a “friendship” among heaven, earth, gods, and men, as Plato describes it (Gorgias 507e–508a), the creation* narratives* substitute the perception of a created universe in which beings taken as objects of worship by pagan cults (sun, moon) are no longer anything but divine artifacts. Although desacralized, the cosmos nevertheless continues to call forth jubilation and praise* from the believer. It is the throne of YHWH (Ps 93[92]:2), it is established and strengthened by Him (Ps 1, 24[23]:1f., 65[64]:7, 74[73]:17, 89[88]:12, 136[135]:6). And even if the primeval experience of Israel was of a God* who saves, the song of the “wonders” of God describes Him as both author of the law* and creator of heaven (Ps 19[18]), and YHWH is praised for having created the “greater lights (Ps 136[137]:7) as well as for having brought Israel out of Egypt (Ps 11ff.).

Both Cosmic reference to the created order and historical reference to an economy of salvation* were preserved in Christian writings, Patristic and medieval, with no apparent tension between the two. To gnostic soteriology (Jonas 1974), for which man occupies in the cosmos only the position of the stranger—the “foreign”—and who must therefore be saved from the cosmos and from the “archons” who govern it, orthodox theology opposes the experience of believers perfectly at ease in “such a beautiful creation” (Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. II, 2, 1). And by asserting that the totality of things not only takes its origin in the creative benevolence of God but also has an eschatological destiny (Rev 21:5), Christianity seemed to be forearmed against any forgetfulness of the cosmic dimension of existence.

However, a factor of confusion entered into theological debates with the growing development of the physical sciences. Until the 12th century, the cosmos was only a theological object. But after the introduction of Aristotelian philosophy* of nature in the 13th century, and particularly after the first steps toward modern science in the 16th, the monopoly of theological discourse disappeared. Thereafter, cosmology became primarily a question for the physicist. But even though historians of science generally agree (Jaki 1980; see also Funkenstein 1986) that modern science would not have been possible if Judaism* and Christianity had not transmitted to it the concept of a created universe governed by its immanent laws, a theoretical misunderstanding ensued that saw theology first challenging the validity of scientific images of the cosmos (in the name of a biblical image that was supposed to possess a strictly descriptive value) and then ending up losing any interest in the cosmic dimension of Christian experience. The cosmos illustrated by the Canticle of All Creatures of Francis of Assisi was thus followed, in the early period of modern science, by a universe devoid of any theological significance whose “eternal silence” terrified Pascal*’s libertine. And a theology ill prepared to defend and illustrate its theological knowledge of the cosmos and unable to recognize that a theological hermeneutics cannot be contradicted by a physical description of the nature of things came, during the same period and for a long time thereafter, to favor an a-cosmic logic of Christian experience.

Already present in the withdrawal to inwardness known in the classic age—and then in pietism*, also present in any theology tempted to reduce man to his immortal soul* and to forget his body that is promised resurrection—theology lacking in the cosmic dimension no doubt reached its apotheosis in the 20th century under the theoretical aegis of the concept of “existence.” Bultmann* (1940), for example, explains that “the idea of creation” is in no way a “cosmological theory”; when the New Testament uses the word kosmos, this is in a sense “incommensurable” (Bultmann 1940) with that of the Greeks: man is not part of the cosmos as of a reassuring totality, he is alone before God, and the theological coordinates of his experience can be elucidated without reference to his position in the midst of all the created universe. And while existential theologies reduced every relation to being-before-God, the theologies for which the “history of salvation” provided the governing concept were led to marginalize the doctrine of the creation and its corollaries in favor of a primordial experience (the experience of the covenant* and salvation given in history*), dismissing any other.

It is, however, noteworthy that interest in the cosmic order that cannot leave theology indifferent has resurfaced on the contemporary intellectual stage. It is not without significance that Heidegger* (1954; see Mattéi 1989) attempted in his late philosophy to describe with the enigmatic “quadripartite” (Geviert) a “world” made out of the “mutual belonging” and the “interplay” of four realities—earth, heaven, divine beings, and mortals—“communion” among which defined the Platonic cosmos. It is significant that in a much more sober enterprise, Maurice Merleau-Ponty (1908–61) attempted, starting from sensory experience, to rediscover a perceiving subject who would no longer be “an ‘a-cosmic’ thinking subject” (1945), but a subject whose “natural world,” omnitudo realitas, would be “the horizon of all experiences” (1945). And it is not without importance that the scientific description of natural realities, by dint of emphasizing the ordered beauty* of the physical universe, which thereby genuinely deserves the name of cosmos, seems to have put an end in 20th century to the terror that arose in the classic period when the “closed world” of the Middle Ages disappeared.

To the muddled theism* or pantheism* sometimes suggested to the man of science by the beautiful order of reality and the elegance of the theories that account for it (see, e.g., d’Espagnat 1979 and Barreau, RMM 1981), theology should provide diverse responses. Everyone (no doubt since Teilhard de Chardin) is certainly convinced that, in principle and in their concrete organization, there is no contradiction between the language of science and the language of faith. The universe of the scientific cosmologist and the cosmos of the theologian are not a single theme. There is, however, no ambiguity: the adoption of divergent perspectives does not abolish the commonality of the object, and a theological doctrine of the cosmos speaks of the same realities as physics does. There are, however, major divergences sufficient to prevent complete concord. 1) In its theological reality, first of all, the cosmos is understood as the “visible and invisible universe”—as a whole of which only a part constitutes a physical object. Science says that nonphysical objects (angels*, “souls in purgatory*”) are unknowable to it, that they do not exist for the rationality embodied by science. Theology, on the other hand, must be able to argue in favor of invisibilia whose existence is confessed by faith (see, e.g., Newman* 1838). 2) The cosmos, moreover, does not constitute the first among theological objects. The coordinates of biblical experience are primarily historical, and a theological logic of the cosmic order must take that priority into account. Creation and covenant (salvation) must be thought of together, something that Barth* (KD III/1) thoroughly demonstrated; and this can occur only in a theology to which the ordo inventionis supplies its order of reasons, in a theology that recognizes in the Lord of heaven and earth the Lord that it first knew in the form of the God of promises. 3) More than a question of origin, it is in fact an eschatological question that should give impetus to a theological discourse on the cosmos. Despite all the elegance of cosmic realities, man occupies in this cosmos the place of one who knows he is going to die and that death* is embedded in the order of things. Theology, of course, speaks on this side of death, but it does so in the name of eschatological promises* whose anticipatory realization it commemorates in the Resurrection* of Jesus*—and it is in fact the Resurrection that provides it with its best model for a rescue from nothingness* and for creation ex nihilo (Jüngel 1972). The present dwelling of man in the cosmos and the present theological meaning of the cosmic order are thus attached to the promise of a new totality (Rev 21:5). There is a physics only of spatial and temporal realities. These same realities that physics measures and describes nevertheless go beyond their scientific description, beforehand—as created realities—and afterward—by the absolute future that is promised for them and that they await “in a labor of childbirth” (Rom 8:18–23). It is centrally because it has at its disposal a doctrine that cannot be lost, of “new creation” (2 Cor 5:17) that Christianity owes it to itself to recognize the present theological meaning of the created world, as it is and in its entirety.

- J. H. Newman (1838), “The Invisible World,” in Parochial and Plain Sermons IV, 13 (new edition in 1 volume, San Francisco, 1987).
- E. Käsemann (1935), Leib und Leib Christi, Tübingen.
- R. Bultmann (1940), “Das Verständnis von Welt und Mensch im Neuen Testament und im Griechentum,” GuV 2, 59–78 (6th Ed. 1993).
- M. Merleau-Ponty (1945), Phénoménologie de la perception, Paris.
- M. Heidegger (1954), Vorträge und Aufsätze, Pfullingen, 157–79.
- E. Jüngel (1972), “Die Welt als Möglichkeit und Wirklichkeit,” in Unterwegs zur Sache, Munich, 206–31.
- H. Jonas (1974), “The Gnostic Syndrome,” in Philosophical Essays, Chicago, 263–76 (2nd Ed. 1980).
- B. d’Espagnat (1979), A la recherche du réel, le regard d’un physicien, Paris.
- S. L. Jaki (1980), Cosmos and Creator, Edinburgh.
- L. Bouyer (1982), Cosmos, Paris.
- A. Funkenstein (1986), Theology and the Scientific Imagination from the Late Middle Ages to the XVIIth Century, Princeton.
- O. O’Donovan (1986), Resurrection and Moral Order, Oxford (Résurrection et expérience morale, 1992).
- Coll. (1988), Cosmos et création, Com(F) XIII/3.
- S. L. Jaki (1989), God and the Cosmologists, Edinburgh.
- A. Gesché (1994), Dieu pour penser, vol. 4, Le cosmos, Paris.

IRÈNE FERNANDEZ AND JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Creation; Ecology; Eschatology; Gnosis; History; Hope; Myth; World

Council

The “council” is the assembly of legitimate representatives of the Church* meeting on a local or universal (ecumenical) level to deliberate and rule on Christian practices and ecclesiastical organization with a concern for unity* in matters of faith*. The Latin word concilium (also occurring as consilium) comes from concalare, “convene” (see Greek ekklesia, “church”) and is synonymous with synod, conventus, coetus. It appears in its Christian meaning for the first time in Tertullian* (De jejuniis 13.) It has been reserved for the assemblies of the universal Church since the Middle Ages, while regional ecclesiastical assemblies are usually called synods*.

1. The Birth of the Institution

The council has its precursors in the Greek popular assemblies, then in Rome in the colleges* of priests* and provincial assemblies. Since John Chrysostom* (Hom. 32 and 33), the institution of the council has largely been referred to the biblical model of the so-called council of the Apostles* (Acts 15). The latter episode exemplifies the defining characteristics of the council: the Church leaders (among whom Peter* plays an especially important role), faced with a conflict threatening the unity of the Church, assemble to exchange their views. They assume the responsibility of speaking for the entire Church with the help of the Holy* Spirit, and they take decisions that will be binding on the whole Church. In the second century A.D., the need to resolve certain local and regional conflicts, first in Asia Minor (against Montanism*), necessitated the holding of ecclesiastical assemblies. In the following century these became institutionalized, regularly gathering the Church representatives of one or more imperial provinces or of the entire western part of the empire (Arles, 314). After the conversion of Constantine, these gatherings came to rank as an official authority of the oikoumene (that is to say, of the Roman Empire) whose decisions acquired an obligatory character for the entire Church (ecumenicity.) In all their forms and at all levels, these invariably remained assemblies of bishops*; but there is also testimony to the presence of presbyters*, deacons*, and laypeople* (Cyprian*, Ep. 71, 1; Synods of Carthage [255] and Elvira [c. 302]). Subsequently we also find monks (mainly monastic superiors). All resolutions must be taken in “a spirit of unanimity” (by a two-thirds majority at Vatican* II).

2. Historical Evolution of the Ecumenical Councils

The councils, which were born of the will to preserve the unity of the Church in the face of theological and disciplinary crises, played a vital role in the area of ecclesiology and of canon law. This role, however, was differently defined, depending on the occasion, the context, and the image that the Church or the Churches involved had of themselves. Thus, different types of council appeared, and there were divergences between the denominations as to their number and ecumenicity. The following classification is based on unofficial Catholic historiography and has been adopted since Bellarmine*.

a) The Old Church. The first eight councils were convened and presided over by the emperor (be it directly or via his representatives) to confess the faith in Christ and the Trinity and to organize the Church. Their reception* by the universal Church was of crucial importance. Since the fifth century it had become indispensable that the bishop of Rome* approve them. The decisions of the councils had the value of imperial laws.

b) The Medieval Church. After the break with the Eastern Church in 1054, the eight General Councils of the Western Church were convened and conducted by the pope* as an extension of the reforming synods of the 11th century. They claimed an ecumenical character inasmuch as they rested on principles valid for all the Church.

c) The 15th-Century Church. There can be seen emerging, under conciliarism*, the pattern of the reforming council: in view of certain perils threatening the Church (Great Schism*, Eastern Schism), the bishops gathered (with the emperor’s support in the case of the Council of Constance*) to reestablish unity and carry out Church reform. Nevertheless, the papacy successfully affirmed its primacy over the council.

d) The Modern Church. Henceforth, councils would be dominated by the papacy (convocation, agenda, direction, and the putting into effect of resolutions—Vatican* I: “sacro approbante concilio”—are all prerogatives of the Roman pontiff) and appear as a vehicle of the Church’s renewal in the face of secular and inter-Christian attacks (the Reformation). Yet Vatican II established a council of a new type: if the council was still to be organized by the pope, the participants would at least be permitted to discuss freely and in line with their pastoral responsibility (even contrary to the propositions of the Curia), without excommunication. Nevertheless, all official public pronouncements are made by the pope “una cum ss. Concilii Patribus.”

3. The Theology of the Councils

a) General Points. The institution of the council finds its theological ground in the conciliarism of the Church of Christ, that is, of the people* who, “united by virtue of the unity of the Father* and the Son* and the Holy Spirit” (Cyprian, De orat. dom. 23, plebs de unitate Trinitatis adunata), must confess the gospel and convey it in its unchangeable purity to the whole inhabited universe (oikoumene). It is therefore a constitutive element of the Church, whose unity and catholicity it concretizes. There is fundamental agreement between the Christian denominations on this point despite those differences that, as we have said, issue from their specific ecclesiologies.

b) The Orthodox Churches. Only the first seven councils are recognized as ecumenical by the Orthodox Churches. Numerous local councils were later accepted by the whole of Orthodoxy, but none received the title “ecumenical.” Since the beginning of the 20th century, there have been some attempts to convoke a pan-Orthodox council that might become the eighth ecumenical council (preliminary conference in 1930; pan-Orthodox conferences in 1961, 1963, 1965, and 1968; precouncil assemblies in 1976, 1982, and 1986). The theology* of sobornost (term introduced by the disciples of A. S. Khomiakov [1804–60]; see Orthodoxy* mod. and cont.) has played an important role. Defining the Church by its catholicity as the communion* of all its members (catholica corresponds to the Russian sobornaya, from the root sbr, “gather”), Orthodox theology implies that episcopal and conciliar resolutions are valid only if they are accepted of one accord.

c) The Roman Catholic Church. The current understanding of the council was defined by Vatican II (LG 22, 25; CD 4 Sq. 36–38) and by the CIC of 1983 (can. 337–41, where this topic is no longer treated in a specific section as in the Codex of 1917 [can. 222–29]) but is included in the article “De Collegio Episcoporum.” The episcopal college exercises its ecumenical power (potestas) through the council, with the prerogative of infallibility* if need be; only the pope can convene, conduct, adjourn, interrupt, or dissolve the council. It is also he who creates the agenda and who must accept, ratify, and promulgate the decisions before they become valid. All the bishops (including titular ones, i.e., those who do not effectively preside over any local Church) take part in the council, but other persons may also be invited by the pope.

d) The Churches of the Reformation. For the first reformers, the ecumenical councils were fallible institutions founded only by human law and having no authority* for the Church except if they interpreted Holy* Scripture correctly. This was mostly the case with the first four councils. The idea of conciliarity survived in the synodical structures of these churches (synod*).

e) The 20th-Century Ecumenical Movement. Since Vatican II the topic of the council has constituted an important subject in the bilateral ecumenical dialogues with the Catholic Church. The Anglican Communion pays special attention to this question (Venice 1976; Windsor 1981), which becomes all the more acute with the idea of conciliary communion or “conciliarity” (COE: Nairobi 1975) understood 1) as a joint process of deliberation and decision demonstrating the fundamental unity of churches and 2) as a disposition for mutual recognition on the basis of apostolic faith and an agreement on the sacraments* and the ministries* of eucharistic communion.

- J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 60 vols., Florence-Venice, 1757–98, Paris, 1899–1927.
- E. Schwartz, Acta Conciliorum Oecumenicorum, Berlin, 1914–.
- G. Alberigo et al., Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta, 3rd Ed., Bologna, 1973.
- Annuaire Historiae Conciliorum*, Amsterdam, 1969– (bibl. continues).
- ♦ C. J. Hefele and H. Leclercq (1907–52), Histoire des conciles, 11 vols., Paris.
- J. L. Murphy (1959), The General Councils of the Church, Milwaukee, Wis.
- B. Planck (1960), Katholizität und Sobornost, Würzburg.
- O. Rousseau (Ed.) (1960), Le concile et les conciles, Chèvotogne.
- COE (1968), Konzile und die ökumenische Bewegung (COE study # 5), Geneva.
- Pro Oriente (Ed.) (1975), Konziliarität und Kollegialität als Strukturprinzipien der Kirche, Innsbruck.
- H. J. Sieben (1979), Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn.
- W. Brandmüller (Ed.) (1980–), Konziliengeschichte, Paderborn.
- H. J. Sieben (1983), Traktate und Theorien zum Konzil.
- H. J. Sieben (1984), Die Konzilsidee des lateinischen Mittelalters, Paderborn.
- H. J. Sieben (1988), Die katholische Konzilsidee von der Reformation bis zur Aufklärung, Paderborn.
- H. J. Sieben (1993), Die katholische Konzilsidee im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, Paderborn.

WOLFGANG BEINERT

See also Catholicism; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Ecumenism; Government, Church; Heresy; Hierarchy; Indefectibility of the Church; Local Church; Orthodoxy; Protestantism; Regional Church; Synod

Counsels. See Precepts

Couple

Like other cultures, the Bible* frames very carefully the reality of the couple. Moreover, the Bible develops its identity and its symbolic impact in such a way that, while being removed from the domain of the sacred, it nevertheless becomes a central reference point of revelation* and of the history* of salvation*.

a) The Couple, Reality of Creation. The creation* stories of Genesis 1–3 immediately suggest a sexual humanity. On the sixth day, “God created man in his own image . . . male and female he created them” (Gn 1:27). In chapter 2 the story mentions an original Adam* whose solitude immediately calls for a counterpart, hence the creation of woman*. God, however, as creator of this couple, is carefully disassociated from sexuality. So, in this way, the Bible weakens the connection that is frequently made between Eros and the sacred, removing sexuality from the divine sphere. The couple is given autonomous status.

This human couple is described in strictly positive terms as the image of God, and the relationship between man and woman is evoked in a story filled with harmony and admiration (Gn 2:23ff.). The story of original sin (Gn 3) alters this relationship. The sin* described here is not sexual in nature, but its first effect involves the bond that unites man and woman. Henceforth, “seduction” and “domination” (3:16) is introduced into their experience as a couple. This new system, however, does not obliterate the positive vision offered in the first two chapters of Genesis.

The stories of the patriarchs illustrate the fact that a new era has been initiated, by touching both on Jacob’s love* for Rachel (Gn 29:1–30) and the stories of violence* and rape (Gn 34:1–6). Positive depictions of couples (Hannah and Elkanah, 1 Sm 1:1–8; Tobias and Sara, Tb 7:13–8, 8, etc.) and negative ones (Samson and Delilah, Jgs 16:1–21; Job and his wife, Jb 2, 9, etc.) succeed one another in the Bible, and thus conjugal experience is represented in all its variety.

b) The Couple and the Covenant. Marked by sin, the reality of the couple is nonetheless maintained and confirmed within the biblical drama with the emergence of the covenant* theme. YHWH reveals himself as one who enters into a covenant with his people*. Derived from a political vocabulary, the word “covenant” had a connotation of conjugality as early as the eighth century in prophetic literature. Among the many names* used to designate YHWH in his relationship to Israel*, the word “bridegroom” occupies an eminent position. Hence the terms “prostitution” or “adulterous” are used to designate the infidelity and sin of Israel. The book of Hosea attests to this point of view: the prophet* receives the order to marry a prostitute, and in this symbolic couple the people will have to recognize its own unfaithfulness with regard to YHWH. Elsewhere, the relationship between a prophet and his wife acts as a sign and omen for Israel (see Isaiah and his family in Is 8:4–18; Ezekiel losing his wife in Ez 24:15–27). It is when receiving the order not to take a wife that Jeremiah (Jer 16:1–9) announces the imminent coming of days of judgment* and affliction. Nevertheless, the announcement of a new era, when the heart of Israel will be renewed and when the covenant will be protected from human infidelity, is also conveyed by means of nuptial references. Such references play a large role in the Zion oracles of the second Isaiah and in the texts that follow (49:21, 54:1–10, 61:10, 62:1–5, 66:7ff.).

This valorization of the couple culminates in the Song of Songs. In its most immediate literal sense, this dialogue praises the beauty and goodness of love between a man and a woman who are in a relationship of complete parity, one in which there is the original fullness referred to in Genesis 1 and 2. It should be noted that the entire tradition* of Jewish interpretation of the text sees it as celebrating the relationship between YHWH and Israel, while the Christian tradition sees it as the dialogue between Christ* and the Church*. The Song of Songs therefore serves to express in a supreme manner the full reality of that covenant between YHWH and Israel of which the prophets speak. But it is evidently highly significant that the perfection of this covenant finds expression in words that are charged with the richest human implication. Modern interpretation of the Song of Songs, in readily considering anthropological as well as spiritual aspects of the text clearly highlights how the Bible closely knits the human reality of the couple to that which guarantees it spiritually: the covenant.

Furthermore, it may be noted that the book of Proverbs (1–9) refers to divine Wisdom in the figure of a loving and loved wife; the sage is the spouse of this Wisdom*, of whom Solomon declares, “She is the one that I chose in my youth, I strove to have her as my spouse, and I became the lover of her beauty” (Wis 8:2).

c) The New Testament. In their opening chapters, the Gospels* according to Matthew and Luke mention the couple of Mary* and Joseph, parents of Jesus*. Beyond that, the question of the couple is not thoroughly explored. The nuptial theme nevertheless surfaces in Matthew 9:15 par., as well as in John 3:29, where Jesus is referred to as “the bridegroom,” a title the prophets had given to YHWH. Another passage (Mt 19:1–12) deals explicitly with the man–woman relationship, when Jesus forbids any man to renounce his wife. Beyond its relevance in terms of moral discipline, the text in fact says something important about the person* of Jesus. Granted by Moses, divorce belongs to what is now an outmoded dispensation. But Jesus has inaugurated a new era, one in which humanity will find in itself the ability to transcend its weaknesses and so experience the original relationship of man and woman (see Gn 1–2).

On the other hand, the question of the couple is dealt with quite frequently in Saint Paul’s Epistles. Galatians 3:28, by declaring, “There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus,” seems to question sexual difference. The verse poses difficulties because it lists pairs that belong to separate orders of reality and discourse. Concerning the difference between the sexes, which Genesis 1 designates as a fundamental and good reality, it is rather unlikely that Paul simply wanted to announce the overcoming or the suppression of this difference. It seems, rather, that his words should be read as part of a text centered on the novelty of Christ: union with Christ allows the division and the violence designated by Genesis 3:16b to be overcome. This means that man and woman exist at last in accordance with God’s original plan.

The letter to the Ephesians reflects the long development of a theory that helped shape ecclesiology that draws a parallel between the Christ–Church relationship and the conjugal relationship (Eph 5:21–33). This text is the final extension of the prophetic tradition and defines the greatness of the conjugal relationship. The woman is invited to submit to love, while the man is called to love, as Christ loves the Church. In this way the couple becomes a reflection of the relationship between Christ and the Church. Paul comments, “This mystery* is great”; in developing the theme further, the church fathers* would readily interpret the story of the creation of woman in Genesis 2 as a prophesy of the birth of the Church, the goal of creation, a goal revealed in the Incarnation* and made accessible in the sacramental life of the Church itself.

Running parallel to this and departing from ancient tradition, we witness in the New Testament the promotion of a celibacy that rests for its justification on the text of Matthew 19:12. This celibacy indicates a more fundamental relationship than the conjugal relationship, being both its source and its future. The Bible, in the Apocalypse, nevertheless closes with a nuptial image (the vision of the new Jerusalem* descending from the sky “prepared as a bride adorned for her husband” [Rev 21:2]). This is the last reference to the reality of the couple, recapitulating the figures of prophetic and wisdom texts at the point when the biblical revelation comes to an end.

- A. Neher (1954), “Le symbolisme conjugal: Expression de l’histoire dans l’Ancien Testament,” RHPPhR 34, 30–49.
- P. Grelot (1964), Le couple humain dans l’Écriture, Paris.
- D. Lys (1968), Le plus beau chant de la création, Paris.
- M. Gilbert (1978), “Une seule chair” (Gn 2, 24),” NRTh 100, 66–89.
- P. Beauchamp (1979), “Épouser la sagesse—ou n’épouser qu’elle? Une énigme du livre de la Sagesse,” in M. Gilbert (Ed.), La Sagesse de l’Ancien Testament, Louvain, 347–69 (2nd Ed. 1990).
- C. Yannaras (1982), Person und Eros, Göttingen.
- J. Briend (1987), “Gn 2–3 et la création du couple humain,” in (coll.), La création dans l’Orient ancien, Paris, 123–38.
- A.-M. Pelletier (1989), Le Cantique des Cantiques: De l’énigme du sens aux figures du lecteur, Rome; (1993), Le Cantique des Cantiques, CEv 85.

ANNE-MARIE PELLETIER

See also Adam; Anthropology; Ethics, Sexual; Marriage; Messianism; Mysticism; Woman

Covenant

The covenant, a central concept in the Bible* and in Christian theology*, designates the relationship between God* and his people* by analogy with privileged relations that men establish with each other by contract. This relationship, which is often described with the use of categories borrowed from nature or the fabrication of material objects, is projected into the field of individual and collective existence. Law, notably the law governing treaties and contracts, is part of the concept. Various different covenants between God and man are mentioned in the Bible and taken as articulations of the story of Salvation*. In modern times the covenant has also been used as a guiding theme in some global theological projects—known as “federal” theologies.

The idea of the covenant goes back to the Hebrew word berît and to its Greek equivalent, diathèkè, used in the Septuagint (LXX), the first Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, begun in the third century B.C. However, it also covers other terms—édout, for example, and other words meaning “oath.” Exegetes and theologians rightfully speak of covenant with respect to literary forms or narratives* where the idea is found without explicit use of the term. In the Christian tradition* the Greek word diathèkè also introduced the use of the word “testament,” notably in the division of the canon* into an “Old” and a “New” Testament.

I. The Old Testament

1. Human Covenants

a) Terminology. The etymology of berît is still disputed. The primitive meaning was undoubtedly that of a “bond,” an “obligation.” The word often designated a legal act or a contract and, at the same time, the obligations and commitments it entails. Parallel to berît there are words meaning “oath”; a contract of covenant was ritually sealed under oath, and this often took place inside a sanctuary. Thus, the divinity was the guarantor (“witness”) of the operation. Steles were also erected as “witnesses.” In that event, documents were drawn up (sefer ha berit, “document of covenant,” often mistranslated as “book* of the covenant”), and symbolic acts were performed. The contracting parties exchanged gifts, traded clothing or arms, shook hands, partook of a meal (sacrificial meals including rites based on salt or blood), or called down malediction on themselves if they should break the treaty (this was, e.g., the meaning of the rite that consisted of passing between the two halves of a sacrificed animal).

The human relation sealed by the berît was first and foremost a bond of fidelity and peace, which was experienced as a familial attachment. A man was said to be the “brother, father, or son” of the person with whom he made a covenant, and “love* and fidelity” should be paid to him. This is why marriage* could also be considered a sort of berît. The particular services that the parties mutually imposed on themselves and guaranteed entered only in second place in the marital relationship. Strictly speaking, the laws* of Israel* should not be called “laws” but contractual obligations, as they were most often proclaimed in the form of covenant treaties.

Contracts could be concluded between peers or between partners of unequal power. The stipulated obligations might be reciprocal or unilateral. When the contract stated only the commitment of a powerful party to protect the weak or, conversely, only the obligations of a subordinate to his superior, the implicit counterpart was considered as self-evident, and therefore it was not necessarily stipulated in every case. The contracting parties could be individuals, small groups, or large political entities.

In all these forms Israel reproduced the social structure based on privileged contractual relations, which prevailed at that time in the Middle East and the pre-classical Mediterranean region. Abundant comparative material on this subject is available (see D. J. McCarthy 1978), particularly in the field of relations between states and relations between sovereigns and their governing elite (including pacts between powerful sovereigns, oaths of civil servants, treaties of vassalage, diplomatic correspondence, royal inscriptions, charters granting fiefs, and royal donations). Despite numerous historical transformations, a surprising continuity in vocabulary, ritual, and literary forms can be recognized across regions and periods. In Hittite vassalage treaties of the second millennium B.C., the exposition of provisions is preceded by a recall of past relations between the parties, known as the “historical prologue” (which also played an important role in late Old Testament texts treating the divine covenant). And this typical form is still found in a seventh-century treaty of Assurbanipal. The notion of a covenant with the divinity is also attested, though rarely, outside Israel; one example is found under the reign of Urukagina of Lagash (24th century B.C.), and two others are found in the Neo-Assyrian cultural area. However, such a transposition of the idea of the covenant is marginal outside Israel.

b) Forbidden Covenants. According to Exodus 23:32 and 34:12–16, in the earliest times Israel was forbidden to make covenants with non-Israelite groups living in the land. Although the dating of these two passages from Exodus is disputed, they are certainly anterior to the exile. The prohibition may not have been in effect everywhere, but where it did apply it was related notably to Israel, “a people dwelling alone, and not reckoning itself among the nations” (Nm 23:9). The foundation of the empire by David necessarily changed this state of affairs within the land as well as in international relations where Israel began to get a foothold. This aroused criticism from the prophets* against the policy of covenants between states. Later, in the period of exile and return, the prohibition was reinstated in Deuteronomistic legislation (Dt 7:2). It ensued from the privileged contractual relationship established by the divine covenant between YHWH and Israel.

2. The Covenant between YHWH and Israel

a) The Prestate Period. A “theology of the covenant” that integrated all the traditions of Israel in a systematic concrete form did not appear until the time of the Deuteronomistic theologians. However, theologians of the time of Josiah (seventh century B.C.) seem to have adopted an antique conception of the privileged contractual relationship established between Israel and God.

There are frequent attempts to give a rather recent date to the passages related to this theme and to explain them as ulterior additions reflecting the Deuteronomistic conception. In fact, many points are unclear here. It is also true that not all the pre-Deuteronomistic indications necessarily go back to the origins of Israel. Nevertheless, the absence of any idea of covenant before the Deuteronomistic period is not the most credible hypothesis. The narrative recapitulations in Deuteronomy already presuppose the essential pattern on which the pericope of the Sinai is built in the book of Exodus, with its recall of the founding covenants contracted between YHWH and Israel. And this pericope itself contains elements that could come from a period preceding its literary composition. It is most likely a primitive core of Exodus 34:10–26 and the (more contested) primitive core of Exodus 24:1–11. Exodus 19:3–8, on the other hand, might belong to the stage of the final writing of the Pentateuch as well as the organization of the whole pericope on the model “conclusion of the covenant-renewal of the covenant.”

The pre-Deuteronomistic decalogue*, of uncertain dating, is designated in Deuteronomy by the term haberîr and in the sacerdotal document by the term ha-édout according to what seems to be already a traditionally accepted usage. It is not at all certain that the “terminological argument” can be alleged by eliminating the supposed Deuteronomistic additions in Joshua 7:11–15 and Deuteronomy 33:9 and even less in Hosea 8:11 and Joshua 24:25. As for the Psalms*, there is no certainty about their dating (see, e.g., Ps 50:5 and related passages in Ps 81 and 95). Of course, the “formula of the covenant” (YHWH is the God of Israel; Israel is the people of YHWH) does not rightfully bear its name unless it is accompanied by the obligation of Israel to follow the divine laws. It expresses then the act by which YHWH establishes his relation with Israel, specifying the ensuing obligations for his people. In this form it is attested earlier in Deuteronomy, but in a brief form that would be more adequately designated as “formula of belonging,” and is already presupposed in Hosea. The notion of Israel as the “people of God” goes back to the earliest times. It is already attested in the ninth century in a ceremony of covenant performed on the occasion of a coronation rite in Jerusalem* (2 Kgs 11:17) with expressions that do not have authentic Deuteronomistic parallels. Again it is by a covenant that Josiah commits himself, along with the whole nation, to follow the book of the Torah found in the Temple* in 622 B.C. (2 Kgs 23:3), and it is difficult to imagine that in so doing he would introduce an entirely new style in the politicoreligious symbolism.

It may be that this royal ritual was revived only in Jerusalem and that the idea of a covenant with God no longer functioned outside Jerusalem. Before the foundation of the state, however, that bond with God had been the model of self-comprehension of this tribal society*, which, once liberated from Canaanite and Egyptian tutelage, refused to establish a central governing body within its own ranks, as seen in Gideon’s declaration (Jgs 8:23). Power did not belong to a suzerain or even to a king brought forth from the heart of Israel but to God alone, who demanded exclusive submission. With the creation of the state, however, this privileged obligation to YHWH was concentrated on the king, who represented the people as a whole.

b) Covenant with the King. This was the starting point of the idea of the covenant of God with David (2 Sm 7:1–29, 23:5; Ps 89; Is 55:3; Jer 33:17–22), which undoubtedly suggests the covenant of God with Abraham (or other patriarchs). This appeared at the latest in the proto-Deuteronomistic revision of the Tetrateuch. Genesis 15:18 speaks of a covenant (bérît) between the Lord and Abraham, whereas these texts habitually spoke of the “oath” of God. The central contents of the commitment to Abraham is the granting of a territory; to David it is the duration of his dynasty. It is also a matter, in this context, of the vassal’s fidelity and service. At the time of the exile, after the collapse of the Davidian dynasty, Deutero-Isaiah transferred the covenant with David to the whole people of Israel (Is 55:3–5).

c) Deuteronomist Theology. During and after the Neo-Assyrian domination of Judah, theologians of the Deuteronomistic school restored the ancient concept of the divine covenant. They rejected the Assyrian power structure, which was largely tributary to treaties and oaths of loyalty, but adopted its terminology and outer forms. The covenant was then founded on the oath of God to the Patriarchs. It had been concluded on the basis of the Decalogue on Mount Horeb (Mount Sinai) during the Exodus, and renewed in the land of Moab when the people came out of the desert, after the proclamation of the Deuteronomic Torah. The latter was considered to be the document of the covenant. This whole construction clearly finds its starting point in the free gracious act of God.

Deuteronomy 26:17–19, the central passage for understanding the Deuteronomic law as the “covenant of Moab” (Dt 29:1), is built on the model of a contract between peers, but the text itself rejects all notion of equality between the human and divine partners. Formal analogies with the model of the Hittite treaty of vassalage are found only in the late Deuteronomistic writings (e.g., in Dt 4:29–31; Jos 23; 1 Sm 2). Deuteronomy 5–31 gives a narrative account of the covenant concluded in the land of Moab. Presentation of the document of the covenant (Dt 5–26) is accompanied by a number of ritual-performative language acts. They include the constitution of the assembly that concludes the covenant (Dt 29:9–14, in the context of a narrative recapitulation), a protocolary formulation of the relationship established by the treaty (Dt 26:17–19), declaration of God’s support pronounced by Moses and the priests (Dt 27:9–10), and expressions of blessings* and curses (Dt 28).

During the period of exile, the Deuteronomistic theory of the covenant was a means of accounting for the collapse of Israel by presenting it as the result of the rupture of the covenant with God. But no new hope* could flow from a covenant that had brought about curses. When the prophets who aroused such a hope appeared, in exile, it became necessary to reverse the poles of the Deuteronomist theory of the covenant. This is what occurred, more or less simultaneously, in different ways.

d) Deuteronomistic Revision of the Prophetic Books. The “Deuteronomistic” book of Jeremiah and a late layer of Ezekiel, which is dependent on it, countered the covenant of the exodus, thenceforth broken, with the future remission of sins*, the return and reassembling of Israel, and the establishment of a “new” and “eternal” covenant in which God—by the correlative gift of the “Spirit”—would renew the human heart* in such a way that men would never again break their commitments (Jer 30:3, 31:27–34; see 24:5ff., 32:37–41; Ez 11:17–20, 16:59–63, 36:22–32, 37:21–28; see also Ps 51:12ff.).

e) Sacerdotal Document. The narrative entity of the priestly school transforms the idea of the covenant. On God’s side the commitment is eternal and will never be renounced. The generation that falls into sin is excluded from the covenant, but God reestablishes his former commitments in the next generation. This is why the sacerdotal document connects the covenant of God with Israel to the covenant concluded with Abraham (Gn 17) rather than its manifestation on Mount Sinai. The former, it is true, is not fully developed until Exodus 6:2–8 and particularly in Exodus 29:45–46. The covenant of Abraham was preceded by that with Noah, by which God bound himself to all of humanity and the animals* (Gn 9:8–17) in promising he would never again provoke a deluge. The law of saintliness, subsequently inserted into the Sinaitic pericope of the priestly document, attempts to integrate the Deuteronomistic conception of the covenant into this pure theology of the covenant of grace* (Lv 26:3–45). Still later, the sabbath* is introduced in the Pentateuch (Ex 31:12–17) as a new sign of the covenant (in addition to the circumcision imposed in Gn 17).

f) Deutero-Isaiah. Though the covenant is not given a central place in Deutero-Isaiah, as in the late layers of Jeremiah or Ezekiel, completely new actions of God are announced. The covenant with David—which legitimized the state and thus in the final instance brought about the ruin of Israel—had to be restored, but in the form of a covenant between God and the whole people who would assume collectively with regard to other peoples* the role of David (Is 55:3, a passage that also gives the key to 42:6 and 49:8; see also 61:8). This fits the idea of covenant into the vision of a pilgrimage* of peoples. The covenants of Israel and David are confounded, and even the covenant of Noah is included in the synthesis (Is 54:10).

g) Late Layers of Deuteronomy. All these new approaches are reflected and sometimes even anticipated in the late layers of Deuteronomy. A revised passage in Deuteronomy 7–9 develops a primitive form of the Pauline doctrine of the justification* of sinners (Dt 9:1–6) and introduces the priestly conception of the covenant with the patriarchs (Dt 7:12, 8:18, 9:6). Similarly, in Deuteronomy 4:1–40 (4:31) the universal perspective of the monotheism* of Deutero-Isaiah is profiled (Dt 4:6–8, 32–39). The extension of this layer in Deuteronomy 30:1–10, with the “circumcision of the heart,” touches on the center of the “new covenant” theme (30:6).

h) Covenant as Encompassing Concept of the Hebraic Canon. The Pentateuch (i.e., the Torah, or the Law) is of a higher rank than the other parts of the biblical canon. The theme of the Law, in giving the motifs found at the beginning and end of the prophetic books of the Hebraic canon (Jos 1 and Mal 3), traces the literary framework within which they will appear as a sort of prophetic commentary on the Torah, the literary development of the promise* of Deuteronomistic law concerning the prophets (Dt 18:15–18). And the book of Psalms opens with an evocation of the study of the Law, in a psalm that is attached by certain key words to the end of the Torah and to Malachi 3. In Deuteronomy 4, 6ff., it is “wisdom*” as a whole that is subordinated to the Torah.

The concept of the covenant is not as determinant. However, the Torah and the covenant are closely related, at least in the Deuteronomistic writings. In Deuteronomy, Israel receives the Torah in concluding the covenant with God. The law given with the covenant of the Exodus period remains the same in the new promised covenant (Jer 31:33). This also applies to the Pentateuch as a whole and, therefore, given its central role, to the whole of the Hebraic canon. Thereby the covenant itself becomes a central concept not only in its Deuteronomistic acceptance but also as employed by other theologies and other literary entities.

This notion makes it possible to connect all the decisive themes of the Bible throughout a diversity of theologies. It is connected to the whole narrative history of Salvation by the covenants of Noah and Abraham and the other covenants concluded in the course of history. It is connected to the Law by the pericope of the Sinai and Deuteronomy. By Jeremiah 30–33 and parallel texts, it sums up all the prophetic promises. Inasmuch as it serves to designate the Decalogue and particularly the first commandment, it evokes the essence of the relation with God. The covenant is the site of the Torah where it unfolds in its multiple dimensions.

Naturally, at this level of the canon, widely varying theological systems do not combine into a new system. But they contribute, through the connection established between them by the common theme of the covenant, to establishing the unique situation of hearing the canonical text. The reading of the Torah in the synagogue is interrupted with the death of Moses on the threshold of the Promised Land and resumes with Genesis. The covenant is given, but its promises are not yet fulfilled. After the exile Israel will continue to live in dispersion or will return to Jerusalem, a Jerusalem that does not radiate with an eschatological light. This people has already experienced in its own body the effects of the rupture of the covenant and the ensuing malediction; it has faith in the fidelity of God and his pardon but still awaits concrete signs. Different theologies of the covenant can be attributed in this situation: 1) Deuteronomistic theology because it establishes the transgression and exposes the Torah that will be valid to the end, 2) the prophetic universalistic theology because it bears hope*, and 3) the priestly theology because it discovers the last reason of hope in the eternal fidelity of God that no human infidelity can discourage. Thus, the covenant, too, becomes an encompassing characteristic of the Hebraic canon.

There is no passage anywhere in the canon indicating that the new covenant promised for the end of time is not explicitly destined for Israel alone but extended to the peoples who come to Zion on pilgrimage. At the least, this idea appears in the use of the “formula of the covenant” with respect to other peoples besides Israel (e.g., in Is 19:25 and 25:8f.) and in the rereading of ancient texts of the Psalms, solely attested on the level of composition (e.g., Ps 25:14, 100:3).

i) Covenant in the Greek Canon. The structure is unchanged in the enlarged corpus of the Greek canon. Though the order of the books is modified under the influence of Greek models, the Pentateuch remains the base, and all the other books are only “commentaries.” By evocation of motifs of the Law at the beginning (Jos 1) and end (Mal 3), they refer back to the prophetic entity. The books newly integrated into the canon contain, notably, the theory of the identity of Law and Wisdom (especially Sir 24 and Bar 4) as well as an initial systematization of the history of the foundation of Israel by seven covenants, in which the priestly element is given an important place (Sir 44–47). A similar approach is found—whatever the differences in details of arrangement—in certain Jewish authors of the period, whose writings, however, are not accepted in the canon but are considered apocryphal*—for example, the Book of Jubilees and the Biblical Antiquities of the Pseudo-Philo.

II. Judaism in the Time of Jesus

In the time of Jesus* the word berît had become so common that it could simply designate, as one of the various names of the “Law,” traditional religion. It evoked above all the covenant of Sinai, that is, Israel’s commitment to follow the Torah.

The Book of Jubilees organizes the biblical narrative around liturgy*; all the successive covenants are concluded on Shavuot (the Festival of Weeks or Pentecost), which is the “festival of the covenant.”

It seems likely that this was the day on which the Essenes renewed by oath the covenant with God and the covenant between members of the community. Qumran’s Rules of the Community describe a ritual of “entry into the covenant” (I QSI:16–II:18), a covenant that was renewed this way every year (I QDSII:19–23). In the Damascus Document the group is designated as the community “of the new covenant of the land of Damascus.” They believed that the prophecy made in Jeremiah 31—as well as that of Ezekiel 36—had been fulfilled within the community (see, e.g., 1QH XVIII:25–28). But since the eschaton was still to come, the “new covenant” was not understood as a reality reserved for the end of time.

The same does not hold true for the Midrashic tradition, no doubt respected by the Pharisees of the time of Jesus. This tradition interpreted the “heart of stone” that must be replaced in the world to come by a “heart of flesh” (see Ez 36:26) as a figure of the “bad instinct” present in its own doctrine.

III. The New Testament

In the New Testament, as in Qumran, the promise of a new covenant is deemed to be already fulfilled—in Christ*, naturally—but unlike the Pharisees, the New Testament understands this covenant as simultaneously eschatological and terminal—that is, it cannot be gone beyond.

1. Tradition of the Last Supper

The tradition of the Last Supper is the heart of the theology of the new covenant. In an ancient layer of the text, Jesus, recalling Exodus 24:8, speaks of “my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many” (Mk 14:24), or “my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins” (Mt 26:28, with an allusion to Jer 31:34). A more recent layer, represented by Paul (1 Cor 11:25) and Luke (22:20), specifically designates the chalice as the “new covenant.”

2. Paul

Paul presents himself as a “minister of a new covenant” (2 Cor 3:6). He knows that his ministry to the peoples (universal ministry) fulfills the promise of the coming of the Holy Spirit and the gift of a heart of flesh (2 Cor 3:3). Failure to understand this is to remain in the “old covenant” (2 Cor 3:14); the two covenants confront each other (Gal 4:24). But this terminology is the exception. The idea most often used by Paul to oppose the covenant, or “testament,” as a promise made by God to Abraham is the Law (see Gal 3:15–18), meaning the law of Sinai. By its way of reasoning—for example, when Paul begins by asking whether it is God or man who is “in the right” (diakaios)—and by its way of citing the Old Testament—for example, the citation of Deuteronomy 30:12ff. in Romans 10:6–10, legitimized in the light of Deuteronomy 30:1–10—and also of forging ideas—for example, the notion of righteousness in Romans 10:3 (see also Dt 9:4)—Pauline* theology of the law is nourished principally by the theology of the covenant, such as it is developed in the late layers of Deuteronomy under the influence of the prophetic texts. However, Paul integrated not only Deuteronomy itself but also certain essential views of priestly theology. The commitments made in the framework of the covenant of Sinai being assimilated with the “law,” the term diathèkè is then liberated to designate the promises made by God to the Patriarchs (Rom 9:4; Gal 3:15, 3:17; see also Eph 2:12). The justification of Abraham by faith* without law can be understood as an anticipation of the justification in Christ (Gal 3, 15–25; see also Rom 4).

Having adopted this linguistic usage and organized in that way his system of thought, Paul must necessarily ask himself if this Israel, which had rejected the message of Jesus, still took part in the covenant. He examines the question in Romans 9–11. He starts with the supposition that the covenants, diathèkai (Rom 9:4), belong by rights to Israel. He ends by affirming the certainty that when all other nations have been redeemed, Israel too will be admitted into the new covenant (Rom 11:25ff.), “for the gifts and the call of God are irrevocable” (Rom 11:29).

3. The Epistle to the Hebrews

The term diathèkè becomes a central concept in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it appears particularly between Hebrews 7:22 and 10:16. In addition,

Jeremiah 31:31–34 is cited in Hebrews 8:8–12 and 10:16f. The epistle distinguishes between the “first” covenant and the “new” covenant, the imperfect covenant and the perfect covenant, the transitory covenant and the eternal covenant. This typology being on the level of cult, the “first covenant” may perhaps refer only to the rites established on Mount Sinai. Christ is the guarantor (Heb 7:22) and mediator (8:6, 9:14–18, 12:24) of the new covenant. By virtue of his sacrifice* (10:12–22), this covenant cancels the sins forever (9:11–15, 10:11–18), sanctifies (10:10, 10:29), and gives access to God (7:25, 10:19–22) and to “the promised eternal inheritance” (9:15ff.).

4. Nonterminological Development of the Vetero-Testamentary Theology of the Covenant

Without using the word diathèkè, the New Testament adopts in many other places the motifs grouped together in Jeremiah and Isaiah around the theme of the new covenant. This is true of the Johannine* writings, for example, in the first farewell speech of Jesus in John 14.

The interpretation of 1 Peter 3:21 would subsequently have a particular function. From this text—“Baptism, which corresponds to this, now saves you, not as a removal of dirt from the body but as an appeal to God for a clear conscience, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ”—it was understood that baptism* is a personal covenant with God. Luther*, for example, rendered it as, “Baptism is the covenant of a good conscience with God.” This is not without verisimilitude. By taking the part for the whole, eperôtèma could mean the conclusion of a treaty (the ritual interrogation of the parties as to their respective obligations). The text would then refer to the vow that the baptized were asked to take in the ancient Church*. The notion of baptism as covenant was important in questions of personal piety and in the justification of the baptism of adults and Anabaptism.

IV. Christian Spirituality and Theology

1. Hermeneutics of Biblical Writings

At an early stage, the Christian canon made the distinction between the Holy* Scriptures of the “Old” and the “New” Testaments. This was based on 2 Corinthians 3:3–18, where, strictly speaking, it is only a matter of the Decalogue or, at the most, the Pentateuch. This distinction is fundamental for the hermeneutics* of a plurality of meanings in Scripture. Up to the beginnings of modern Bible science, it decisively marked the interpretation of the Bible and, moreover, theology and spirituality as a whole.

2. Spirituality and Mysticism

The expression “new covenant” used in the account of the Last Supper is central to the celebration of the Eucharist* and thus of the liturgy* as a whole; thereby the idea of the covenant could become an increasingly important factor in personal piety and the mystical experience*, particularly the nuptial mystique*. Intelligence of the primitive contents of the thought of the covenant could be maintained, at least in the Western Church, due to the fact that Saint Jerome translated the Old Testament berît as foedus and not as testamentum.

3. “Federal” Theology

The production of systems of theological thought centered on the idea of covenant can be attributed in particular to the Zurich reform movement. Huldrych Zwingli* early on came up against this radical wing of the new movement, which would give rise to the Anabaptist* current, prolonged in our day by the Mennonites and Hutterites. The theoretical debate centered principally on the singularity or multiplicity of covenants. From there, the covenant became one of the master themes of reform theology, culminating in the “federal” theology influenced by the work of the Leyde theologian Johannes Coccejus (1603–69). With the expression “foedus seu testamentum,” the discussion turned around questions such as the distinction between the “infralapsaire” and the “supralapsaire,” and everything that had been treated by Scholasticism* under the heading “lex naturae,” “lex vetus,” “lex nova.” Broad systematic consequences followed from the number of covenants recognized and the way the different covenants mentioned in the Bible were interpreted and ranked.

Since then, this insistence on the idea of covenant has been particularly perpetuated in pietism* but also in Catholicism* by a “biblicist” vision of the story of Salvation, structured according to the various divine covenants.

It may well be that, again as a result of this “federal” theological approach, the word covenant has recently taken on greater importance in the dialogue between Jews and Christians. Since Pope* John Paul II spoke of the “never revoked covenant” of the Jews of our day, continuous debate has been under way to find out if Jews and Christians live under the same covenant or two distinct covenants and what the consequences on their mutual relations are.

V. Modern Bible Science

Undoubtedly modern Bible science rejects this “biblicist” theology of the covenant and contests the historical reality of most of the covenants on which it rests.

Wellhausen, for example, considers the covenant as a theological category that appeared, at the earliest, with the decline of Judaism* at the end of the royalty. A later generation of scholars thought they could bring to light an institution of covenant with traditional festivals, rituals, and texts belonging to the first times of Israel. But that construction is speculative and is now revealed to be untenable. Biblical theologies based on such hypotheses (such as those of Walter Eichrodt and Jean L'Hour) are no longer considered satisfactory.

Furthermore, scholars in Bible science realize that their vocation, above and beyond the study of historical realities, is the interpretation of texts. Consequently, the biblical theology of the covenant is subject to synchronic analysis based on canonical texts, using current methods of literary criticism. This approach, which is only at its beginnings, promises many fruitful surprises for theology. Because the covenant is a central element of biblical texts, the new perspectives will necessarily have an impact on hermeneutics as well.

- J. Coccejus (1689), "Summa doctrinae de foedere et testamento Dei," in Opera omnia theologica, exegetica, didactica, polemica, philologica, t. VI, Frankfurt, 49–132.
- R. Kraetzschmar (1896), Die Bundesvorstellung im Alten Testament in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, Marburg.
- P. Karge (1910), Geschichte des Bundesgedankens im Alten Testament, ATA 2, Munich.
- W. Eichrodt (1933), Theologie des Alten Testaments, 3 vols., Stuttgart.
- M. Noth (1940), Die Gesetze im Pentateuch (Ihre Voraussetzungen und ihr Sinn), SKG.G 17, 2, Halle.
- G.E. Mendenhall (1955), Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East, Pittsburgh.
- K. Baltzer (1960), Das Bundesformular, Neukirchen.
- W. Zimmerli (1960), "Sinaibund und Abrahamsbund," ThZ 16, 268–80.
- A. Jaubert (1963), La notion de l'alliance dans le judaïsme aux abords de l'ère chrétienne, Paris.
- J. L'Hour (1966), La morale de l'alliance, CRB 5.
- U. Luz (1967), "Der alte und der neue Bund bei Paulus und im Hebräerbrief," EvTh 67, 318–37.
- L. Perliitt (1969), Bundestheologie im Alten Testament, WMANT 36.
- P. Beauchamp (1970), "Propositions sur l'alliance de l'Ancien Testament comme structure centrale," RSR 58, 161–93.

- D.J. McCarthy (1972), Old Testament Covenant: A Survey of Current Opinions, Oxford.
- M. Weinfeld (1972), Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School, Oxford, 59–157.
- E. Kutsch (1973), Verheißung und Gesetz: Untersuchungen zum sogenannten "Bund" im Alten Testament, Berlin.
- M. Weinfeld (1973), "berit," ThWAT 1, 781–808.
- P. Beauchamp (1976), L'un et l'autre Testament: Essai de lecture, Paris.
- P. Buis (1976), La notion d'alliance dans l'Ancien Testament, Paris.
- D.J. McCarthy (1978), Treaty and Covenant: A Study in Form in the Ancient Oriental Documents and in the Old Testament (New edition completely rewritten), Rome.
- J.F.G. Goeters (1983), "Föderaltheologie," TRE 11, 246–52.
- H. Frankemölle (1984), Jahwe-Bund und Kirche Christi: Studien zu Form- und Traditionsgeschichte des "Evangeliums" nach Matthäus, 2nd Ed., NTA 10.
- E.W. Nicholson (1986), God and His People: Covenant and Theology in the Old Testament, Oxford.
- H. Cazelles (1987), Autour de l'Exode (Études), SBi, 143–56, 299–309.
- A.F. Segal (1987), The Other Judaisms of Late Antiquity, Brown Judaic Studies 127, Atlanta, 147–65.
- G. Braulik (1989), "Die Entstehung der Rechtfertigungslehre in den Bearbeitungsschichten des Buches Deuteronomium: Ein Beitrag zur Klärung der Voraussetzungen paulinischer Theologie," ThPh 64, 321–33.
- N. Lohfink (1989), Der niemals gekündigte Bund: Exegetische Gedanken zum christlich-jüdischen Dialog, Fribourg.
- R. Rendtorff (1989), "'Covenant' as a Structuring Concept in Genesis and Exodus," JBL 108, 385–93.
- N. Lohfink (1990), Studien zum Deuteronomium und zur deuteronomistischen Literatur I, SBAB 8, 53–82, 211–61, 325, 361.
- E. Zenger (Ed.) (1993), Der Neue Bund im Alten: Studien zur Bundestheologie der beiden Testamente, QD 146.
- N. Lohfink, E. Zenger (1994), Der Gott Israels und die Völker: Untersuchungen zum Jesajabuch und zu den Psalmen, SBS 154.
- N. Lohfink (1995), "Bund als Vertrag im Deuteronomium," ZAW 107, 215–39.
- R. Rendtorff (1995), Die "Bundesformel": Eine exegetisch-theologische Untersuchung, SBS 160.

NORBERT LOHFINK

See also Bible; Canon of Scriptures; Couple; Creation; Decalogue; Grace; Israel; Law and Legislation; Liturgy; Promise; Universalism

Creation

A. Biblical Theology

I. Vocabulary

In Hebrew, general terms—ʾâsâh, “to make”—or terms used metaphorically—yâsad, koûn, “to found”; bânâh, “to build”; yâçâr, “to mold”—may assume a sense close to “to create,” especially when God* is the agent. But bâraʾ (48 occurrences, relatively late to appear) is the only verb specific to our concept of creation, never taking any subject other than God (suggested etymology: “to clear,” “to make a clean sweep”; see Is 4:5 and context). Creation and conception are brought together in Isaiah 43:7 and 45:10 (see Ps 22:32, 102:19), favoring the polysemous qânah (to acquire, create, beget): Genesis 4:1, Psalms 139:13, Proverbs 8:22 (see 8:24f.), and Genesis 14:19. Bâraʾ is associated with “marvels” in Exodus 34:10; in Numbers 16:30, its derivative berîʾâh (a unique occurrence) “something new” appears, and elsewhere it is juxtaposed with other words signifying “newness” (Is 48:6f., 65:17; Jer 31:22; Ps 51:12, 104:30; see 102:19). As early as the Septuagint and then in the New Testament, the idea of creation was expressed by ktizein and its derivatives (principal sense: “to found”), coupled in 2 Corinthians 5:17, Galatians 6:15, Ephesians 2:15 and 4:24, and Colossians 3:10 again with the theme of newness.

II. Location and Development of the Theme

1. Location

a) In the Old Testament. Biblical representations of creation abound, though they are too often reduced to just the one. In Genesis 1:1–2, 4 a, the action takes place within the rhythm of an inaugural time*, with the establishment of the calendar (Gn 1:14) and above all of the Sabbath. All parts of the cosmos* are made equal before the Creator. The word*, chief instrument of creation, separates, names, and blesses. The text, suggestive of a completely reworked warlike theophany* (1:2–3 a), attributes to the Creator the sentiment expressed in the hymnic formula. A synthesis (wrongly taken for a compilation) of several doctrines, the text belongs to a rhetorical genre employed in hymns of praise* in the sanctuary and in enforcing the rules of separation, particularly those concerning food (a source referred to as “priestly”). Made in the image of God, the human couple* is called on to “have dominion over . . . every living thing” (Gn 1:28) without eating their flesh. The reader will discover, in Genesis 9:2f., how this vegetarian diet was abolished after the Flood (see Gn 6:11ff.). These two passages come from the same source and are connected in terms of their ethical intention (violence*; animals).

Genesis 2:4b–3, 24, less pure than Genesis 1 and formally more archaic, is concerned not with the creation of the cosmos but with the harshness of the human condition. The Creator, referred to as “YHWH God,” involves himself in the vicissitudes of his plan. Man is responsible. The theme of the “image of God” is dramatized: its ambiguity emerges with the voice of the serpent-tempter, who wins the struggle but not in perpetuity. The text resembles wisdom* literature and in particular the riddle genre (see 1 Kgs 10:1ff., 5:12f.).

Written during the period of exile, Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40–55) is the first document that combines the notion of creation with monotheism in a formal and didactic testimony. It sets out to hold together several different motifs in juxtaposition: creation and salvation*, cosmos and history*. In Jeremiah (10:11–16; see 23:23f., 27:5, 31:35, 32:17), the broadening of Israel*’s horizons (see Dt 4:32ff.) calls forth the theme of the creation. The Psalms* (above all the hymns) and the books of Wisdom are the classic locations of the theme. The words of praise enumerate the components of creation (Ps 104, 136, 148) or commemorate and evoke within the Temple*, center of the cosmos, its initial phase (Ps 19, 29, 93, 96–99). They culminate in the uttering of the Name* (Ps 8:2; see Am 4:13, 5:8). The Wisdom texts see in the permanent organization of the created order a principle that goes beyond it (Prv 3:19f., 8:22–31; Sir 1:4, 9, etc.). Ecclesiastes, for example, often takes its inspiration from Genesis 1–3 (Sir 16:26–17, 14; 33:7–15; 39:12–40, 11; 42:15–43, 33; 49:16). Job, faced with the misfortune of the just man, describes the creatures which surpass mankind. The Song of Songs contrasts the meaning of creation with idolatory* and illustrates the “end of the wise” through the perspective of a “renewed” creation, with a typological rereading of Exodus.

b) The New Testament. Romans 1:18–32 sets out four concepts: the refusal of the message of creation, idolatry, the corruption of sex and (1:31) of the heart, and the unity of human destiny. Classical pronouncements are restated, but the texts that associate Christ* with the act of creation are of later origin.

2. Development

The texts that integrate the most elements relating to the idea of creation do not pre-date the exile. Our knowledge of the chronology of the Psalms is particularly deficient. The core elements of Genesis 2–3 may go back well into the period of the monarchy. A distinction must be made between the dates of the texts themselves and those of the traditions* they incorporate. For example, the attribution to Melchizedek, the Canaanite priest-king of Salem, of a cult* of “God Most High, possessor of heaven and earth” (qonéh) (Gn 14:19; see Ps 124:8, 134:3) preserves vestiges of beliefs older than Israel (the ’l qn ’rs [“God the creator,” or “owner,” of the “earth,” or of the “land”?] of Karatepe in Phoenicia took the form El-ku-ni-ir-sha among the Hittites). In short, what is late to appear is not so much the belief in a creator God as the combination of this concept with the others.

III. Israel’s Neighbors

Long before the existence of Israel, every variation of the creation theme was represented in the Near East, sometimes in magnificent works. Indeed, Israel itself was a people* of composite origin and therefore well placed to embrace a diversity of currents. Traces of cultural infiltration remain, as do those of a vigorous backlash. Considering only a few themes, we may note that creation often proceeds by means of a gesture that separates the intermingled elements or strikes the waters. In Mesopotamia the Enuma elish (11th century B.C.) told of the struggle of Marduk, sun god and godson, against Tiamat (Hebrew Tehôm: Gn 1:2), who was split in two, and Apsu. The origin of mankind was explained in various ways: man was created to do the gods’ work for them and sustain them with offerings, or else he was molded from clay and the blood of a god. At Ugarit (a port in the north of Canaan), Baal, the sun god, struck the sea with a club made by the Kushar-wa-Hasis, the twin divine craftsmen. For the Canaanite world, however, creation was achieved above all through the vital energy (Cunchillos, Creation in the Ancient Near East) of sex, a view not unrelated to that of the Egyptians. In Egypt, Shu, or breath, was held to have separated the sky and the earth, but the theme of combat hardly appeared: the principal deity brought himself into existence and produced the earth from his own substance. Maât, the goddess of cosmic order, was present at the creation. In all the ancient cultures creation and providence* were seen in the same light.

IV. The Act of Creation

1. Its Objects

The created object is often partial: a mountain (Ps 78:54 [Dahood Bib 46, 1965]), a people (Ps 74:2; Is 43:1, 7, 15, etc.), a city* (Is 65:18), an institution, or living things (Gn 2:5–25). The origin of the human body is one of the points at which the idea of creation is associated with the experience of a manifestation without a proportionate cause (Ps 139:13f.; Jb 10:8f.; 2 Macc 7:22; see Prv 30:18f.). That which inspires praise is not merely the simultaneous creation of “heaven and earth” but the uniting of power and compassion in one act (Ps 147:32). The Creator himself feels love* and compassion for what he makes (Wis 11:23f.; Sir 18:13). The creative act even finds its consummation in the “creation” of a new (Ps 51:12) and converted (Jer 31:22) heart. It is no accident that a sense of the vastness of the cosmos and a penetration to the core of ethics* come together in writings of the same period. Israel’s return to grace* is the heart of the creation: while it is compared to a resurrection* (Is 26:19; see 66:14), it is also represented as a scene of creation (Ez 37).

2. Its Forms

The image of creation as combat is to be found in Isaiah 27:1 and 51:9f. and Psalms 74:12–17, 89:10–13, 104:7, and so on, which call to mind the archaic cosmogonies. This motif, though resembling other mythologies, maintains its originality by reserving victory to a single God. What is more, it links the progress of salvation to the beginning of time. On the other hand, the artisanal conception is a peaceful one. The artisan, for example, is also a builder (Jb 38:4–7). In this context the solidity of the created work is perceived by the heart as a promise*: the earth “will not move” (Ps 93:1f., 96:10, 104:5). The making of idols is regarded as a parody of the creative act (Is 41:7; Sg 13:16). The idea of creation fits comfortably into the sphere of wisdom, which is celebrated in terms not only of skill but also of speech; and the nature of speech raises the question of origins. God, who creates with or “in” wisdom (Jer 10:12; Ps 104:24; Prv 3:19f.) or “by” wisdom (Wis 9:2), also creates while speaking (Ps 33:6–9, 147:4f., 15–18, 148:5f.) or even “by” speech (Wis 9:1). God’s intimate relationship to his speech and his wisdom (Wis 8:3, 9:9f.) suggests the metaphor of conception (Prv 8:22), so opening the way for the New Testament texts that unite the Son of God and his speech in the creative act. A creation by means of speech comes close to a creation of everything out of nothing—an idea rarely expressed though presupposed in Proverbs 8:22–31 and clearly detectable in 2 Macc 7:28 (see Rom 4:17; but see Wis 11:17).

It is not surprising that, according to the Bible*, the concept of creation should be apprehended both by reason* (Rom 1:20) and by faith* (Heb 11:3). In the Old Testament, the choice* of a people by YHWH and the creation of the universe are gradually revealed as distinct but inseparable in the action of a single God. The action proceeds from his singularity, from his sanctity, and, paradoxically, from what is most incommunicable in him. The identity of God the creator with God the savior prepares the way for those texts—among the latest written of the New Testament—in which creation, the basis of a universal relationship with God, proceeds by way of the Unique: Christ (Col 1:16), the Son (Heb 1:2), or the Word* (Jn 1:3; see Rev 3:14). In him, creation is to be recognized as the first and last word of a God who takes up the narrative* of his acts under his Name.

- Edited works on biblical texts and their environment:
- H. Gunkel (1895), Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Genesis 1 und Ap Joh 12, Göttingen (3rd Ed., 1910).
- G. von Rad (1936), Das theologische Problem des alttestamentlichen Schöpfungsglaubens, in Wesen und Werden des AT, BZAW 66, Berlin, 138–47 (= [1971], Gesammelte Studien zum AT, t. 1, Munich, 136–47).
- W.H. Schmidt (1964), Die Schöpfungsgeschichte der Priesterschrift: zur Überlieferungsgeschichte von Genesis 1, 1–2, 4 a, Neukirchen-Vluyn (3rd Ed., 1973).
- P. Beauchamp (1969), Création et séparation: Étude exégétique du ch. premier de la Genèse, Paris.
- Coll. (1970), Les religions du Proche-Orient asiatique, Paris.
- C. Westermann (1974), Genesis, Kapitel III, Neukirchen-Vluyn (English trans. Minneapolis, 1984).
- L. Strauss (1981), “On the Interpretation of Genesis,” L’Homme, Revue française d’anthropologie, 21, 5–20.
- B. W. Anderson (Ed.) (1984), Creation in the Old Testament, Philadelphia.
- L. Derousseaux (1987) (Ed.), La Création dans l’Orient ancien: Congrès de l’ACFEB (1985), Paris.
- J. Bottéro, S.N. Kramer (1989), Lorsque les dieux faisaient l’homme, Paris (report: M.-J. Seux [1991], Or 60, 354–62).
- H. Cazelles (1989), La Bible et son Dieu, Paris, 89–96.
- S. Chandler (1992), “When the World Falls Apart: Methodology for Employing Chaos and Emptiness as Theological Constructs,” HThR 95, 467–549.

PAUL BEAUCHAMP

See also Adam; Animals; Cosmos; Couple; Ecology; Filiation; Monotheism; Myth; Temple; Verbe; Word; Word of God

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

1. Antiquity

The primitive Church* inherited a faith* in God* the creator and so did not need to define the doctrine of the creation. Indeed, this was present from the first baptismal formulae, which profess faith in the “all-powerful Father*” (pantôkrator).

This phrase implicitly contains the idea of creation, both as noun and as adjective (“All-powerfulness... signifies that by his power... God made the universe from nothing” [fifth or sixth century, BSGR, §227]; “the doctrine of creation expresses in the clearest manner... what the words ‘All-powerful Father’ already said” [Barth*, Credo, section IV]). The Father is inseparably creator of the world and Father of Jesus Christ, as the invocation of Polycarp (end of the first century/beginning of the second) emphasizes: “All-powerful Saviour... , Father of Jesus Christ... , God of the angels*, of the powers and of all creation” (Martyrdom of Polycarp* 14, 1, SC 10 bis). Polycarp’s formula is notable for expressing directly the unity of divine action—the fact that it is at once creative and salvific—something that remains to this day a subject of theological comment.

a) Clarification of the Doctrine. However, this formula remained to be clarified. Its meaning could not be regarded as self-evident in a world where the cosmos* was generally represented either as derived from the One by a process of necessary emanation or as due to the organization of uncreated matter by a demiurge like that of the Timaeus—powerful no doubt, but not all-powerful, and not always good, as in the case of the Demiurge of Gnosticism*. Nor was this a secondary matter but rather the “first and most fundamental point”—prior even to the notion of salvation*: “the Divine Creator who made the sky and the earth and all that they contain” (Irenaeus*, Adv. Haer II, 1, 1). So, as early as the second century, the church fathers*, in particular Irenaeus in his struggle against gnostic dualism, took up the task of defining the doctrine. The essential idea was that the “demiurge” of the universe—a title widely applied from the outset to God and/or Christ* (e.g., 1 Clem. 59, 2 [SC 167]; Justin, Ap. I, 13; Tatian [c. 160], Ad Graecos 45, PTS, 1995; Origen* in Jo. I, 19, §110 [SC 120]; formulae from baptismal or local rituals in BSGR, §26, 30, 131, 153, 204)—was the creator of the very matter that he organized, its “inventor,” to summarize Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. II, 7, 5; 10, 4), and that he was not a lesser god but the trinitarian God himself (see Haer IV, 20, the first clear expression of the Trinity* as creator [Kern 1967]). The attribution to the Father was “natural” inasmuch as he was the origin (ST Ia, q. 45, a. 6, ad 2; see Balthasar*, Com[F] 1988, 16–17). This fundamental point of the creation of the very matter of the world would be upheld even by those theologians closest to emanationism, such as Pseudo-Dionysius*: “As every being proceeds from the Good*, so matter proceeds from it also” (Divine Names IV, 28), and even if it is “by an overflowing of his own essence that God produces all essences,” he remains no less “transcendent” of all the beings which proceed from him (Divine Names V, 8).

b) Creation Ex Nihilo. This clarification culminated in the celebrated formulation of creation ex nihilo or de nihilo, which was already present in Scripture* (see above A IV 2), and remains widespread to this day in all denominations (see, e.g., Barth 1949; Tillich 1953; Lossky 1944; CEC 296–97). The phrase from Heras’s Shepherd (SC 53), “you made all things pass from nothingness* to being*” (ek tou mè ontos, Mand. I, 1), was often taken up by the fathers (from Irenaeus, Adv. Haer IV, 20, 2 to John of Damascus, eighth century, De fide orthodoxa II, 5, PG 94, 880), and the expression was generally adopted in the second century (Irenaeus, loc. cit.; Theophilus of Antioch, A Autolyclus II, 4, SC 20), thus entering common and liturgical usage (“You have drawn all things from nothingness into existence, by your only Son...”: Apostolic constitutions, VIII, 12, 7, SC 336). Augustine*, who produced five commentaries on Genesis, also used it (de nihilo, e.g., in Gen. ad litt. imperf. I, 2, PL 34, 221; Conf. XII, 7) against Manichaeism and Neoplatonist emanationism. Against Manichaeism he argues that since there exists only one creative principle, so matter comes from God and is therefore good, just like its maker. On a rather different front he opposes emanationism by stating that the being of the world does not derive necessarily from the being of God since no evolution can be allowed in God. Certainly, everything exists only because he exists—quid enim est, nisi quia tu es? (Conf. XI, 5)—but nothing exists other than by his free choice. By means of his Word*, God gives rise to the universe (Conf. XI, 6–7), including time*, that which defines the material, perhaps even the created, condition: “There was no time before God created time” (Gen. contra man. I, 2, 3, PL 34, 174; Conf. XI, 13), and neither was there space (Conf. XI, 5).

The expression was intended to present as the least objectionable a type of origin that had never before been conceived and that, more than any other, resisted representation. If God derived creation neither from some preexistent matter (which would imply dualism) or from his own substance (which would imply pantheism*), he must have created “from nothing.” This “nothing” was not the mythical expression of a something, a name given to some formless matter or substrate of the world—an interpretation not excluded by the “earth without form and void” of Genesis 1, 2. Tertullian* writes of those who still believe that the world was made out of some matter and not ex nihilo (Adv. Marc. II, 5, 3, CChr.SL 1, 480)—and see Justin (creation “from formless matter,” Ap. I, 10) and possibly Clement of Alexandria (Strom. V, 14, 89; 6; 90, 1, SC 279). This point had constantly to be reiterated since it contradicted a fundamental conception (see, e.g., Anselm*, Monologion 8; Thomas* Aquinas, De pot. III, I, ad 7; see ST Ia, q. 45, a. 1, ad 3; Breton 1993, 144). Creation ex nihilo signified that being was God’s free gift. It derived from an excess (hyperbolè) of goodness on his part (John of Damascus, De fide orth., PG 94, 863) and not from some need in him. But the fact that creation was not necessary meant also that it was not a degradation of the divine. The world was not a “here below fallen from some unknown disaster” but a precious world because willed: a free and gracious gift. In Julian of Norwich’s paradoxical vision (14th century), the world is tiny, like a hazelnut in the palm of the hand, but also solid and durable “because God loves it” (Revelations of Divine Love 5).

By the end of antiquity, ex nihilo had become a technical term to characterize accounts of creation (see Meginhard of Fulda’s profession of faith, ninth century: the Holy* Spirit is not created because it is not ex nihilo—neque factus, quia non ex nihilo, BSGR, §245).

2. The Middle Ages Up until the 13th Century

a) Before the 12th Century. Before the 12th century, Latin theology* contributed nothing new that was of any significance to the idea of creation. Historians (Scheffczyk 1963; Grossi 1995) agree that, within the context of the Augustinian Platonism*, which served as a model before Aristotle (Christian Aristotelianism*) became current, there were two tendencies. One tendency understood the creation as the beginning of the history* of salvation (especially in the school of Saint*-Victor), while the other approached it more philosophically (above all in the school of Chartres*), though Anselm (Mon. 6–14) should also not be forgotten.

b) Peter Lombard and Lateran IV. Between the second half of the 12th century and the beginning of the 13th, the main elements of a clear doctrine of creation were established by Peter Lombard's (c. 1100–1160) account in his second book of Sentences and the dogmatic* definition of the creation by the Fourth Lateran* Council* (1215). According to Peter Lombard (Sent., d. 1), there was a single creator of time* (contrary to Aristotle's notion of the eternity of the world, d. 2) and of all things visible and invisible, and he was the one Creator. He was the only one, indeed, who "makes something from nothing" (a clear distinction between facere and creare), as opposed to Plato's demiurge (artifex)—see also Bonaventure*'s formula: "Plato commended his soul* to its maker (factori), but Peter* commended his to its Creator (creatori)" (Hexaemeron IX, 24). God created freely, through goodwill and not from necessity, because he wished to communicate his beatitude* to others beside himself (Sent., d. 3). And since this beatitude could be shared in only by means of intelligence, God created creatures possessed of reason (angels* and human beings), able to apprehend the sovereign good by intelligence, to love it as they apprehend it, to possess it as they love it, and to enjoy it as they possess it (d. 4).

As for Lateran IV, it reiterated, against the Cathars (Catharism*) that there was only "one single creative principle," God in three persons*, "who by his all-powerfulness created spiritual and corporeal creatures de nihilo, at the beginning of time" (ab initio temporis utramque de nihilo, the first use of the phrase by the magisterium*, condidit creaturam, spiritualem et corporalem). In this way, the council insisted on the goodness of creation.

3. From the 13th Century to the End of the Middle Ages

a) Exitus-Reditus. These ideas were so clear that the great theologians of the 13th century, Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas in particular, were able to set their theology of creation firmly in the context of the "emergence" of beings from their principle and their "return" to this principle—exitus-reditus (Aquinas, I Sent., d. 2 divisio textus) or egressus-regressus (Bonaventure, I Sent., d. 37, p. 1, a. 3, q. 2, c.)—and to use the whole vocabulary of emanation (emanatio, processio, diffusio, exitus, fluxus, and so on) without the slightest equivocation. This had not been the case for John the Scot Eriugena (c. 810—c. 877). This Neoplatonic scheme, modified since antiquity by the concepts of divine liberty* and the economy of salvation (see Irenaeus), was developed still further by the attempt to consider creation as something embedded in the very life of the Trinity (Bonaventure, Hex. VIII, 12; Breviloquium II, 1, 2, e.g.; Aquinas, ST Ia, 45, 6). Creation was certainly a result of divine goodness—according to the Dionysian principle, taken up throughout the Middle Ages, that "goodness diffuses itself"—but of a goodness that decided to communicate itself and that would not be diminished if it did not communicate itself (Aquinas, De pot. III, a. 15, ad 1; a. 17, ad 1, ad 7). The sovereignty of the divine initiative with respect to the creation was absolutely safeguarded as a theological principle and therefore also its sovereignty with respect to the economy of salvation, of which the creation was at once the first moment and the abiding condition. In spite of the importance of the philosophical means employed, this was certainly a theological approach to creation. "The emanation of all that exists" from God, "that is what we call creation" (ST Ia, q. 45, a. 1). But this "emanation" was not some initial impulse in which the cause then lost interest. Rather, it set in motion what we might call a dynamic of return (circulatio, regiratio, Aquinas, I Sent., d. 14, q. 2, a. 2), so strongly desired by God that he made himself flesh to enable it to come about.

God became incarnate to make this return possible since it had been rendered impossible by sin*: this at least Aquinas's opinion on the question of the motive for the Incarnation* (IIIa, q. 1, a. 3). Would the Word have made himself incarnate even if humankind had not sinned? Some theologians claimed as much, so as to endow the universe with a perfection worthy of the Creator's glory*. This opinion was generally characteristic of the "Franciscan school," but the first to formulate it was apparently Rupert of Deutz (c. 1075—c. 1130) (Scheffczyk 1963). It recurs in the work of Alexander of Hales (c. 1186—1245), Summa halensis IV, n. 23 a. Robert Grosseteste (c. 1175—1253) adverts to it with a characteristic formula: "There would have been no completion of the natural order if God had not made himself man" (non esset... consummatio in rerum naturis nisi Deus esset homo, Hexaemeron, ed. R.C. Dales, London 1982, 276). Duns* Scotus treats of it in a systematic way (Lectio parisiensis in Sent. III, d. 7, q. 3 and 4). Bonaventure thought it possible, in qualified terms, though he preferred redemption as a motif for the Incarnation (III Sent., d. 1, a. 2, q. 2). See also Nicholas* of Cusa, Suarez* (Scheffczyk), Malebranche (Entretiens métaphysiques 9), and Schleiermacher* (according to Barth, Credo, section IV, 37). Aquinas initially considered both assumptions tenable (III Sent., d. 1, q. 1, a. 3) but finished by rejecting the “Franciscan” view, basing his opinion essentially on scriptural arguments while yet admitting that it was in itself possible (IIIa, q. 1, a. 3). But “it was sufficient for the perfection of the universe that creation should be naturally (naturali modo) ordered towards God as to its proper end” (ad. 2).

b) Bonaventure. Bonaventure departed from the classical position: “The whole machine of the world (universitas machinae mundialis) was brought into being by a single sovereign principle, in time and from nothing (ex tempore et de nihilo)” (Brev. II, 1, 1). Ex tempore since creation supposes a beginning in time: it is contradictory to speak of the eternity of a created world (ibid., q. 2; Hex. VI, 4). The creation is known only by means of revelation* (II Sent., d. 1, q. 1, a. 3) and is revealed only with salvation in mind. Scripture speaks of creation (de opere conditionis) only with a view to “reparation” (propter opus reparationis, Brev. II, 5, 8; see ibid., 2). It is made only to lead human beings to God: the world is like a book in which the creating Trinity shines forth (Brev. II, 12, 1). But one must know how to read this book, not taking it literally (Hex. II, 20) by attending merely to things since these are above all “vestiges” (traces*) of the Creator—umbræ, resonantia, picturae, vestigia, simulacra, spectacula, and so on (Itinerary. II, 11)—in short, signs of God. What is important is to pass “from the sign to the signified” (ibid.).

c) Thomas Aquinas. Two points characterize Aquinas’s concept of creation: the radical contingency of its creatures and the definition of creation as a relationship. The first point is made clear in the way in which he treats the problem of the eternity of the world. We know that Aquinas judged its noneternity impossible to prove (ST Ia, 46, 2). Creation in the strict sense of a beginning in time (novitas mundi, see De pot. III, 3, ad 6; Ia, 45, 3, ad 3) is known only through revelation (Ia, 46, 2) and thus by faith (a position for which Barth would be grateful to him, KD III/1, 2) even if the general dependence of things on the first Cause is accessible to reason* (Ia, q. 46, a. 2, 1). But to say, anyway, that an “eternal” world would be a created one (nomen creationis potest accipi cum novitate, vel sine, De pot. III, 3, ad 6) is a way of highlighting the contingency of every possible world. The duration of this world makes no difference, even if the fact of having a beginning expresses it better in the eyes of creatures who are themselves temporal (De pot. III, 17, ad. 8). In any case, an indefinite duration would have nothing in common with the eternity* of the Creator, which does not involve succession (Ia, q. 46, a. 2, ad 5), as Boethius* (cited by Aquinas) and Augustine (Conf. XI, 14) had already observed. This contingency stems from the fact that the created being is entirely relative, in the literal sense of existing only by its relationship to the Creator. Creation is defined by the relation of things to their source, is indeed no more than this relation (ST Ia, q. 45, a. 3; see q. 13), and without this relation the created being is nothing; see the emphatic wording of the De aeternitate mundi: the creature has no being other than that which is given to it (nisi ab alio); left to itself and considered in itself, it is nothing (nihil est); nothingness is more natural to it than being (unde prius naturaliter est sibi nihilum quam esse) (see Ia IIae, q. 109, a. 2, ad 2).

There is no continued creation (Ia, q. 45, a. 3, ad 3, e.g.): one and the same divine action creates and keeps in being a creature that exists only by its constant relationship to God (semper refertur ad Deum, De pot. III, 3, ad 6; see Ia, q. 104, a. 1, ad 4; CG III, 65; De pot. V, a. 1, ad 2). But by the same token, this creature exists fully since God gives being ceaselessly and in superabundance—so much so that paradoxically (and this is the very paradox of the analogy* of being, e.g., Przywara 1932), this vision of radical contingency is also a vision of the being of beings and of the richness of their existence in actuality. To deny the consistency, the autonomy, or the “perfection” of creatures is to insult the Creator (detrahere perfectioni divinae virtutis, CG III, 69). It was with good reason that Chesterton saw Aquinas as “Saint Thomas of the Creator.”

d) The Later Middle Ages. Even though the later Middle Ages were far from being a period of intellectual decline, it must be admitted that they witnessed some “decline” (Scheffczyk 1963) in the theology of creation, inasmuch as the separation of faith and reason was emphasized and creation was seen as a matter of pure faith. It was dependent on God’s incomprehensible omnipotence: as Duns Scotus saw it, there would have been no contingency in the world without contingency in divine causality itself (nisi prima causa ponatur...contingenter causare, Opus oxoniense I, d. 39, q. unica, no. 14). With Ockham’s nominalism*, the link between God and the world was “loosened in the extreme” (Scheffczyk) since there was no longer any exemplary causality, and God, in an absolute freedom limited only by the principle of contradiction, brought into being entirely new creatures unrelated to any essence.

4. The Modern Era

a) The Reformation. The Reformation did not call into question the dogma* of creation, which had been reaffirmed at the end of the Middle Ages by the Council* of Florence*. Melancthon is the most traditional of the reformers in the way he presents faith in the creation (“God, the Father of Our Saviour Jesus Christ, with the Son . . . and the Holy Spirit, created from nothing the sky and the earth, angels and men and all that is corporeal,” Loci praec. theologici) and in his manner of finding the “traces of God” (vestigia Dei) everywhere in nature, which is made, “created,” in order to “reveal God.” According to Calvin* (Inst. 1, 14), what the Scriptures say about the creation is sufficient, and it is neither “permissible” nor “expedient” to speculate on the question. For Luther*, it is both important (e.g., WA 24, 18, 26–27) and difficult (ibid., 29–33; see WA 39/2, 340) to believe in the creation. He gives this faith an existential tone: it begins with the belief that we can do nothing by our own power, so dependent are we on God (WA 24, 18, 32–33; 43, 178, 42–179, 1). Moreover, it is a matter for all individuals on their own account—see the formula of the Catechism, “I believe that God created me, along with every creature” (WA 30/1, 183, 32–33 and 247, 20–21; 293, 15–16). In fact God draws each person ceaselessly from nothingness (e.g., WA 12, 441, 6) by the power* of a truly creative Word: “The words of God are realities, not mere words” (res sunt, non nuda vocabula, WA 42, 17, 24), and each person is a word or a syllable of the divine language (loc. cit., 19). See Bonaventure’s “every creature is a word of God” (Bonaventure*, III, 1, b) and Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 37, a. 2: “the Father uttered by his Word . . . himself and his creatures” (se et creaturam) // Ia, q. 34, a. 3; Quodl IV, q. 4, a. 6. On the theme of creation and speech, see Kern (1967).

b) The 17th and 18th Centuries. The modern period saw the theme of creation slip from the hands of the theologians: they either lost interest in it—in the 18th century, for example, the Carmelites of Salamanca did not comment on the treatise on creation in ST “since this question is not generally dealt with in the schools” (Cursus theologicus, Proemium, §IV)—or, like Suarez, regarded it as a matter more philosophical than theological. In the 18th century the question of creation belonged to the field of philosophy*: Descartes*, Malebranche, and Leibniz* each had his own concept of it. One of the most interesting was undoubtedly that of Leibniz, who visualized the monads being born

“from continual lightning-flashes of Divinity” (Monadologie, §47); but the idea of the best of worlds and the principle of sufficient reason would undergo a degeneration (by way of the work of Wolff [1679–1754]) in Enlightenment theology, which combined an optimism often worthy of Pangloss with a rudimentary understanding of causality. This is evident, for example, in W. Paley’s (1743–1805) Natural Theology* (1802): since there is no clock without a clockmaker (I), so nature, in which a universal adaptation of means to ends may be seen, especially among living things, cannot be without an “intelligent creator” (III, 75, and passim). Paley thus proposes a “cause” for the world “perfectly adequate” in its effect (XXVII, 408), without being aware that he is at best proving the existence of an “architect of the world” and “not a creator of the world” (Kant*, KrV, AA, III, 417). This “cause,” uniquely efficient though of a purely constructive efficiency and fulfilling (albeit badly) the simple role of explaining the realities of nature, was the first in a long line of unequivocal statements of reality. Such a cause, which may doubtless also be discerned in the degenerate forms of the cosmological argument (proofs of the existence* of God), is practically worthless and theologically meaningless since the image of God the clockmaker has nothing to do with the Creator of which the Bible* speaks. This notion of causality, which became widespread at this period, reveals the impoverishment of ideas about the creation in the official theologies of the different denominations during the 18th century. The situation was scarcely to improve in the 19th century in spite of some timid efforts (see Scheffczyk).

We can see here a mistrust of the category of cause that remains strong to this day, with many theologians joining Heidegger* in bemoaning the “tendency” of “the Catholic theology of creation to rationalize” (unpublished text cited in coll., Heidegger et la question de Dieu, Paris, 1980). “A ‘supreme cause’ (Weltgrund) has nothing in common with the all-powerful Father confessed by the Christian faith” (Barth*, KD III/1, §40, 10; see Grundriß VIII, 59), especially when the relation of causality is actually conceived as existing within this world (Ratzinger 1964; Rahner 1976; Moltmann 1985). W. Kern (1967), on the other hand, advocates a reconsideration of causality.

5. The 19th Century

This impoverishment had two main effects. First, as in the 17th century, it left the field open to philosophy, which held sway over discussion of the creation in the 19th century. The concept underwent some remarkable developments in the great romantic idealist theories of Schelling* and Hegel*, whether in terms of a fall from or into the Absolute, of the advent of liberty in itself, of a creative fission in God, or of the dialectical unfolding of the Idea. For all their philosophical grandeur, these “detheologized theologies” (Przywara 1932) are hard to distinguish from pantheism*, particularly in view of their confusion between the Spirit of God and spirit pure and simple (in other words, really, the human spirit). Feuerbach (1804–72) clearly suspected as much: “The true meaning of theology is anthropology*” (preface to the second edition of L’essence du christianisme). And while “God is the essence of man,” creation ex nihilo (I, 9, and Appendix, X–XI) is merely a projection of man’s belief in his omnipotence and his desire to control nature, the means by which he sets himself up as “the goal and the savior of the world” (XI).

Next, theology found itself helpless before the new problems posed by biblical criticism (exegesis*) and the theory of evolution, with their questioning of the creation narratives* in Genesis 1–3. Certainly, faith in the creation was firmly upheld in the Catholic Church by the definitions of Vatican* I, but this was primarily in opposition to the philosophical currents of the period. The first chapter of the constitution Dei Filius actually repeats the definitions of Lateran IV, adding an explicit affirmation, in the face of the modern forms of monism and emanationism (can. 4, DS 3024), of the liberty of creation (liberrimo consilio... de nihilo condidit creaturam, DS 3002) and of the distinction between God and the world (re et essentia a mundo distinctus; ibid.). All this may have safeguarded the idea of the creation, but it said nothing of the relationship between myth* and history and left unsolved the question of how and to what extent the idea of creation can be distinguished from the images that transmit it. The world of faith was becoming parallel to that of the sciences*, bringing the danger either of a double truth* or of a continual alternation between materialist positivism and creationism (see Traducianism) on the one hand and fundamentalism on the other. And this problem persists today, at least in terms of public opinion, which does not clearly distinguish between faith in the creation and creationism.

It should be added that, from this point of view, the doctrine of creation was now only vaguely connected with the history of salvation. The creation was among the “preludes to faith,” truths accessible in principle to human reason (this is implicit in the texts of Vatican I—explicitly, it is the existence of God as deduced from created things that is so considered, DS 3004 and 3026; see DThC III/3, 2192). It was not made explicitly part of the economy of salvation and so was in danger of being taken as that first moment with which one need no longer be concerned.

6. The 20th Century

a) Karl Barth. It is easy to understand Barth’s protest against the idea that the first article of the Creed is a sort of “gentiles’ lobby” where “natural theology can be given free rein” (Grundriß VIII, 55, 58). For him, on the contrary, the creation is known only through revelation (for which reason the “doctrine of creation” in KD III is presented as a commentary on Gn 1–3). Creation was essentially a divine act that initiated the history of salvation. It was the precondition of the covenant*, its “external foundation” (KD III/1, §41, 2), performed so as to render it possible; and the covenant in turn was the “internal foundation” of the creation (ibid., §41, 3) since it determined the nature of the creature desired by God’s freely given love*. This reintegration of the creation into the history of salvation, this reunion of protology and eschatology*, gave the doctrine back its religious meaning, which explains Barth’s enormous influence from this standpoint, even on Catholic theology (e.g., Ratzinger [1964] is very Barthian and acknowledges his formulation on the relationship between creation and covenant (LThK2 463; see CEC §288).

b) A Crisis in the Doctrine of Creation? The isolation of the doctrine of creation from all “natural theology,” however, cut it off from all the speculative efforts of the centuries (which were also attempts to reach an understanding of faith), with the result that the theology of creation was once again impoverished. The overemphasis of the theme of salvation actually had the effect of devaluing that of the creation (a “contraction” already visible in the Roman liturgy* of antiquity, as Hamann [1968] points out), all the more so because it was often accompanied by an almost exclusive concern for an earthly salvation for humankind. A number of conventional discourses on “the God of the Exodus” as opposed to the God of the creation have revealed a lack of interest in the creation on the part of theologians. This is evidenced in essays that ask questions such as, “The creation, an outdated doctrine?” (Études, August–September 1981, 247–61) or “Should we be interested in the creation?” (ETR 1989, 64/1, 59–69). The apparent lack of interest is also evident in certain aspects of the reception* of Vatican* II. Without explicitly dealing with the subject, the council had developed in GS (chap. III) “a veritable theology of the creation” (Théobald 1993), implementing a very clear “anthropocentric bias” as compared with the ancient position (see GS, no. 12, §1) and defining mankind’s activity as the “prolonging of the Creator’s work” (no. 34, §2). This point of view, which allowed a positive conception of technology and more generally of mankind's role in history, as "a reflection of the creative act" (Breton 1993; Ratzinger 1964, qualified in Ratzinger 1968), certainly did not imply a contempt for the cosmos or an actual acosmism in the spirit of the council, though it appears that it has sometimes been interpreted in this way. It gave rise to an insistence on human creativity, as an image of a divine creativity that is, however, put in parentheses (Ganoczy 1976; on this subject, see the uneven but profound work of Berdiaev 1914). It also brought about a neglect or dwindling of the role of the creation in the catechetics* of the Churches: see S. Jaki (1980, 56; "the most neglected dogma in the Creed"), Ch. Schönborn (Com(F) XIII/3, 18–34), or Ratzinger (1986, English tr., appendix, 1995), who saw clearly that this led to a conception of God unrelated to matter, a negation of the fact that the true name of nature is creation, a neglect, indeed, of the world's horizon, which could not be without consequences for anthropology. The environmental movement, with all its excesses, has had the virtue of bringing back attention, however brutally, to the existence of the cosmos. The simplistic formulae that replace humankind's domination of the created world with "stewardship," or the standpoint of Moltmann (1985), who subordinates the "relevance" of faith in the creation to the solutions it offers to the ecological crisis, are hardly satisfactory; yet the critical function of environmentalism deserves to be taken seriously.

The pluralism of contemporary theological research makes it difficult to generalize, but a number of strands suggest that a better equilibrium is being reached: a better understanding of biblical narratives, a dying down of the controversies over evolution, a movement beyond the futile attempts to reconcile Scripture with science, the reasonable desire for a measure of intellectual unity that would take science seriously without turning it into a theological authority (Peacocke 1979; Pannenberg 1986; Polkinghorne 1988; see Fantino 1991, 1994), and above all a reintegration of the creation into the history of salvation, without its being absorbed therein (e.g., Creation and Salvation, 1989). After all, the creation has never been preached as mere knowledge but rather as a means of (re)introducing people to a relationship (Hamann 1968) that is the origin and end of the human individual: "Thou shalt love Him that created Thee" (Epistle of Barnabas, chap. XIX).

- Augustine, De civitate dei XI, BAug 35.
- Augustine, De genesi contra manicheos, PL 34, 173–220.
- Augustine, De genesi ad litteram liber imperfectus, PL 34, 220–46.
- Augustine, De genesi ad litteram, BAug 48–49.
- Augustine, Confessions XI–XIII, BAug 14.
- K. Barth, Credo, Munich, 1935.

- K. Barth, KD III/1–4, Die Lehre der Schöpfung, 1945–51.
- K. Barth, Dogmatik in Grundriß, Munich, 1949, chap. VIII.
- Bonaventure, Breviloquium, l. II; Itinerarium mentis in Deum; In Hexaemeron.
- Conciles: Lateran IV (1215), DS 800; Florence (1442), DS 1333; Vatican I (1870), Constitution Dei Filius, cap. 1, DS 3001–3, et can. 1–5, DS 3021–25.
- Hugues de Saint-Victor, De sacramentis christianae fidei I, 1 a, 2 a, 5 a, 6 a, PL 176, 187–216; 246 C—288 A.
- Iraeneus, Adversus haereses, SC 100, 152–53, 210–11, 263–64, 293–94.
- Jean Damascène, Expositio fidei orthodoxa, PG 94, 863–926.
- P. Melancthon, Loci praecipue theologici (1559), in Ms Werke in Auswahl, 9 vols. Gütersloh, 1952, vol. II, 1st part.
- Pseudo-Dennis, De divinis nominibus, especially IV and V, PG 3, 693–826.
- Thomas Aquinas, II Sent., d. 1, 2, 12, 13.
- Thomas Aquinas, CG II, chap. 15–30 et 31–38.
- Thomas Aquinas, De potentia, q. III.
- Thomas Aquinas, De aeternitate mundi (contra murmurantes); ST Ia, 44, 45, 46, 47.
- ♦ J.-B. Bossuet (1727), "Élévations sur la création de l'univers," in Élévations à Dieu sur tous les mystères de la religion chrétienne.
- W. Paley (1802), Natural Theology or, Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity Collected from the Appearances of Nature, London.
- L. Feuerbach (1841), Das Wesen des Christentums I, chaps. 7, 9, 10 and Appendix X and XI, GW, Ed. W. Schuffenhauer, Berlin, 1967–84, 5.
- H. Pinard (1908), "Création," DThC 3/3, 2034–201.
- N. Berdiaev (1914), Le sens de la création: Un essai de justification de l'homme.
- E. Przywara (1932), Analogia entis, Munich, 1962, Einsiedeln.
- D. Bonhoeffer (1933), Schöpfung und Fall, DBW 3.
- VI. Lossky (1944), Essai sur la théologie mystique de l'Église d'Orient, Paris, chaps. 5–6 (2nd Ed. 1990).
- A. D. Sertillanges (1945), L'idée de création et ses retentissements en philosophie, Paris.
- P. Tillich (1951), Systematic Theology, Chicago-Londres, 163–210.
- L. Scheffczyk (1963), Schöpfung und Vorsehung, HDG II. 2 a, Fribourg.
- J. Ratzinger (1964), "Schöpfung," LThK 2, 9, 460–66 (bibl.).
- W. Kern (1967), "Die Schöpfung als bleibender Ursprung des Heils," in MySal II, 440–544.
- A. Hamann (1968), "L'enseignement sur la création dans l'Antiquité chrétienne," RevSR 42, 1–23 and 97–122.
- J. Ratzinger (1968), LThK, Das zweite vatikanische Konzil III, 316–19.
- Coll. (1976), La création, Com(F) 1/3.
- A. Ganoczy (1976), Der schöpferische Mensch und die Schöpfung Gottes, Mayence.
- K. Rahner (1976), Grundkurz des Glaubens: Einführung in den Begriff des Christentums, Fribourg.
- A. R. Peacocke (1979), Creation and the World of Science, Oxford.
- P. Gisel (1980), La création, Geneva.
- S. Jaki (1980), Cosmos and Creator, Edinburgh.
- J. Moltmann (1985), Gott in der Schöpfung: Ökologische Schöpfungslehre, 2nd Rev. Ed., Munich.
- W. Pannenberg (1986), "Schöpfungstheologie und moderne Naturwissenschaft," in Gottes Zukunft-Zukunft der Welt, Festschrift für J. Moltmann, Munich, 276–91 (English trans. in W. Pannenberg, Toward a Theology of Nature, Louisville, Kentucky, 1993).

- J. Ratzinger (1986), Im Anfang schuf Gott (English trans. In the Beginning: A Catholic Understanding of the Story of Creation and Fall, avec un appendice, The Consequences of Faith in Creation, Edinburgh and Grand Rapids, 1995).
- Coll. (1988), Cosmos et création, Com(F) XIII/3.
- J. Polkinghorne (1988), Science and Creation, London.
- Coll. (1989), Création et salut, Bruxelles.
- S. Jaki (1989), God and the Cosmologists, Edinburgh.
- J. Fantino et al. (1991, 1994, 1995), "Théologie de la création," RSPHTh 75, 651–65; ibid., 78, 95–124; ibid., 80, 143–67.
- R. Albertz, J. Köhler, F. B. Stammkötter (1992), "Schöpfung," HWP 8, 1389–413 (bibl.).
- S. Breton (1993), "Christianisme et concept de nature," in D. Bourg (Ed.), Les sentiments de la nature, Paris, 138–61.
- G. Gunton (1993), The One, the Three and the Many: God, Creation and the Culture of Modernity, Cambridge.
- C. Theobald (1993), "La théologie de la création en question, un état des lieux," L'avenir de la création, RSR 81/4, 613–41.
- P. Davies (1993), The Mind of God, Harmondsworth.
- A. Gesché (1994), Dieu pour penser, IV: Le cosmos, Paris.
- V. Grossi (1995), "Création, salut, glorification," in B. Sesboué (Ed.), Histoire des dogmes (bibl.), II, 15–24.
- L. Ladaria (1995), "La création du ciel et de la terre," ibid., 25–88.
- C. Elsas et al. (1996), "Schöpfung," EKL 4, 92–109 (bibl.).
- K. Ward (1996), Religion and Creation, Oxford.

IRÈNE FERNANDEZ

See also Being; Evolution; Father; Glory of God; God; Messianism/Messiah; Omnipotence, Divine; Providence; Secularization; Work

Credendity. See Credibility

Credibility

Understood as a matter of the "natural" rational grounds that lead human beings to the threshold of "supernatural" faith*, the question of credibility is recent, although its treatment calls on the most classic motifs of Latin theology*.

a) From Patristics to Vatican I. In terms ritually repeated by all later analysts of faith, Augustine* defined it as the act of "thinking with assent," cum assensione cogitare, and explained that "no one believes anything if he has not first thought that it was necessary to believe" (PL 44. 963). The Council* of Orange (529), at which Augustinianism* was officially adopted by the Latin Church, defined the strictly supernatural character of faith: human beings do not bring themselves to believe, but God* himself leads them to believe through grace* (DS 375). Faith is an act of knowledge* and an act of the will, cognitio and affectio (e.g., Hugh of Saint-Victor, PL 176. 331), giving rise to the expression "voluntary certainty," voluntaria certitudo. The balance between the cognitive factor and the factor of will was maintained without difficulty by Scholasticism*. The content of faith is believable, something that Thomas* Aquinas expresses by relying simultaneously on objective reasons and on divine illumination: "Whoever believes has a sufficient motive to induce him to believe. He is in fact led to belief by the authority* of the divine teaching that miracles* have confirmed and, what is more, by the inner inspiration of God which encourages belief" (ST IIa IIae. q. 2. a. 9. ad 3).

External signs do exist that are capable of bringing about the intellectual attitude, situated between opinion and absolute certainty, that Thomas calls "vehement opinion," but he never proposes reliance on natural credibility as a normal precondition for the act of faith.

Bonaventure* uses very similar language. Because faith is not a form of knowledge, the will to believe is essential to it (In Sent. III. d. 23. a. 1. q. 2 resp.). Knowledge has its own certainty, “speculative certainty,” just as faith has the “certainty of adhesion,” and because the latter deals with primal truth*, faith is more certain than knowledge (ibid., q. 4 resp.). Finally, it is necessary that “the intellect be taught what is given to be believed (credibilia) so that it might think about it and that it have an inclination so as to be able to give its assent to what is to be believed” (ibid., a. 2. q. 2 resp.). There is a crucial point that should not be overlooked: the medieval theology* of faith had the goal of interpreting the virtue of faith, and its principal intention was not that of interpreting the reasons for belief offered to the unbeliever (although it recognized their existence); the idea of an apologetics of credibility was virtually unknown. And finally, although the idea of a “dead” faith devoid of all charity and the idea of the faith of demons were always taken into consideration, these were aberrant cases; the faith that it was important to describe was living faith tied to hope* and charity.

It was probably because of contact with modern philosophy* that the theological analysis of faith was obliged to engage more vigorously with the believing subject and the rational grounds for credibility. After Descartes* it seems that Michel de Élizalde (in 1662) was the first to propose the hypothesis of a reasoning based on grounds of credibility, making it possible to attain infallible evidence of the fact of revelation*. But it was not really until the 19th century that its struggles against rationalism* and fideism* led Catholicism* to formulate an openly apologetic theory of credibility. Against rationalism, Vatican* I reaffirmed the doctrine of the fully supernatural character of the act of faith and the specificity of its grounds: faith does not believe by relying, as knowledge does, on intrinsic evidence but on extrinsic evidence; it believes “by reason of the authority of the God who reveals.” But against fideism, the council asserted just as clearly the existence of a credibility intended for any form of reason* and endowed with evidence superior to that of simple probability. Among the factors of credibility offered to the unbeliever, the council (greatly influenced on this point by the apologetics of Cardinal V. Dechamps) gave a major place to the “fact” of the Church*, a privileged sign in favor of the revelation that it transmits.

b) From Vatican I to Rousselot. Vatican I was responding to internal theological debates, but it also established the status of credibility in an age of secularization*, and apologetic concerns were to dominate subsequent theological discussions. “Preambles to faith” then assumed a central position. To the unbeliever, said Father Pègues, apologetic reasoning may offer a certainty that is scientific and demonstrative, “a demonstration in the strictest sense of the term” (RThom 1912). Later, Father Harent said that in the view of reason, the act of faith “would appear as the conclusion of a series of propositions” (DThC 6/1), with reason in the end appearing no longer as a faculty of knowledge shared by all but as a speculative faculty at work in the mind of an intellectual to be converted.

Three stages in the critique of this discursive approach may be distinguished. 1) The diachronic schema according to which the intellect proceeds to a judgment of credibility and then deduces from that the duty to believe (the barbarism “credentity” frequently replaces the normal expression), before the will to believe opens the field of faith, was fully accepted by L. Billot, S.J. (1846–1931). The demonstration might be “unclear and slightly rudimentary.... It may also be perfect and scientific” (1905). The essential step is a break. By means of the critical and suspicious interpretation of evidence, reason may attain a “scientific faith.” Faith in the strict sense (supernatural faith) is, however, a “faith of simple authority,” or a “faith of homage”: a faith that recognizes once and for all that it is dealing with a witness worthy of faith whose every word deserves belief. The theory does not require too much of reason: the vague idea of a supreme being*, a “spontaneous reasoning prior to any act of the syllogism” (ibid.), and one that includes veracity* among the perfections of that supreme being may provide sufficient rational preambles to faith. But it also expects too little from grace, which basically intervenes only to carry out in human beings the transmutation of a scientific faith into a “faith of homage.” 2) The theory proposed by A. Gardeil, O.P. (1859–1931), is less unsatisfying. The diachronic schema is maintained and worked out in great detail. The analysis of faith discerns first “a phase of searching, of various consultations with the aim of determining in detail the truths that are to be believed,” then “at the conclusion of this deliberation, the judgments of credibility and credentity, followed by a consent to the message and a choice of the faith proposed” (1912). But between the first and second editions of the book a preliminary step was introduced, that of a supernatural preparation. The entire procedure described in fact presupposes “an initial affection for God, the final end,” and something like a “pre-existence of faith in...the intent to believe” (ibid.). Judgments of credibility and credentity are rational, but they are also the work of a reason that is made for the purpose of believing. The intellectualism* of the theory is also moderated by a concession: there are “psychological substitutes” for the purely rational perception of credibility, such as a “flair” or a “tact.”

3) The analyses of P. Rousselot, S.J. (1878–1915), are broader in scope. Any linear schema in which grace would intervene to move the will after reason, perhaps operating on its own, had formulated its judgments of credibility and credence is rejected in favor of a unifying interpretation of the “eyes” of faith. Here intellectual and affective factors occupy a position of reciprocal priority in which “love* gives rise to the faculty of knowledge and knowledge legitimates love” (1910). The objective visibility of signs of credibility (the “external fact”) calls forth the capacity to see them (the “eyes of faith”), and this capacity (the “internal fact”) is the sympathy of the subject with its object. The judgment of credibility is thereby replaced by an intellectual synthesis that has no need to be discursive; the analysis is explicitly aimed at granting no privilege to the faith of intellectuals over the faith of ordinary people. In the face of the realities that call forth faith, the subject responds by a certain use of the “illative sense” conceptualized by Newman*. In the final analysis the act of faith is supernatural from beginning to end; it cannot be thought of without reference to “an innate affective habit which, making us sympathize with the supernatural being...provokes in us a new faculty of sight” (ibid., 468). The abstract logic of arguments of credibility is thus replaced by a logic of attraction; and attraction operates, indistinguishably and simultaneously, on intelligence and on liberty*. A disciple of Rousselot, G. de Broglie, extended his intuitions in a theory of knowledge through signs and of the knowledge of value (knowledge of the “sign-value”).

c) Contemporary Perspectives. Father Harent criticized Rousselot for reducing the perception of truth to the perception of beauty (DThC 6/1); this was at least a prediction of the direction in which H.U. von Balthasar* would continue Rousselot’s analysis, the direction of a “theological aesthetics” that establishes congruence between “subjective evidence” and “objective evidence” in the perception of an articulated totality (of a “figure,” Gestalt). But if for Rousselot faith, in the final analysis, had eyes only to see arguments, for Balthasar the attraction exercised by primal truth operates in a strictly Christocentric context; faith is no longer asked so much to give its assent to revealed doctrines “by reason of the authority of the God who reveals [them],” as to give its assent to the God who reveals himself.

These continuations presuppose some mediations. They presuppose the acceptance by theology of philosophies of the person*; for example, J. Mouroux says that “search by the person is what explains the understanding of credibility; encounter with the person is what explains the certainty of faith” (Mouroux 1939). They presuppose that the question of certainty and doubt is no longer posed in speculative but in existential terms; for example, Gabriel Marcel sought an “existential indubitable.” They presuppose the reappropriation of a rich sense of ecclesial mediation, according to which the Church does not act primarily as magisterium* transmitting propositions to be believed but as a field of experience* and as a sign (already present in Dechamps, later in the “liturgical movement,” and so on). They also presuppose that there has been a reappropriation of traditional thinking about the supernatural*, either through the philosophical influence of Blondel* or the later theological influence of Lubac*: not, to be sure, the notion of a “supernatural demanded by us” but a “supernatural demanding in us” (E. Le Roy).

In any event, perspectives seem to be fairly clearly established. Faith comes to human beings from the outside, from listening to a word* (fides ex auditu): the a priori possibility that this word is audible is a traditional teaching well reformulated by Rahner*. If faith is directed not toward propositions but toward “things” (Thomas Aquinas), and if the “thing” toward which it is centrally directed is a supreme good* revealed as love, then the problem of credibility cannot fail to become indissociable from the problem of divine “lovability.” To Thomas’s dictum that “nothing is loved unless it is first known,” it may seem that contemporary Catholic theology tends to prefer a theory of the cognitive powers of love and a fortiori a theory in which divine love is knowable by man only by being the object of a love (amor ipse intellectus, said William of Saint Thierry). This tendency perhaps provides a point of convergence with Protestant theology. The latter has tended to be absent from debates about credibility because it has little interest in anything resembling a “scientific faith” and because it is suspicious of any theological enterprise that might seem to attribute an element of autonomous responsibility to reason in the act of faith.

- L. Laberthonnière (1903), Essais de philosophie religieuse, Paris.
- L. Laberthonnière (1904), Le réalisme chrétien et l'idéalisme grec, Paris.
- L. Billot (1905), De virtutibus infusis, 2nd Ed., Rome.
- J. Martin (1905–06), L'apologétique traditionnelle, 3 vols., Paris.
- F. Mallet (1907), Qu'est-ce que la foi?, 2nd Ed., Paris.
- P. Rousselot (1910), “Les yeux de la foi,” RSR 1, 241–59, 444–75.
- Aug. and Alb. Valensin (1911), “Immanence (méthode d’),” DAFC 2, 579–612.
- A. Gardeil (1912), La crédibilité et l'apologétique, 2nd Ed., Paris.
- P. Rousselot (1913), “Remarques sur l'histoire de la notion de foi naturelle,” RSR 4, 1–36.
- P. Rousselot (1914), “Réponse à deux attaques,” RSR 5, 57–69.
- V. Bainvel (1921), La foi et l'acte de foi, Paris.
- A. Straub (1922), De analysi fidei, Innsbruck.

Credibility

- K. Adam (1923), Glaube und Glaubenswissenschaft im Katholizismus, Rottenburg.
- S. Harent (1924), "Foi," DThC 6/1, 55–514.
- E. Przywara (1924), Religionsbegründung: M. Scheler, J.H. Newman, Fribourg.
- J. Mouroux (1939), "Structure 'personnelle' de la foi," RSR 29, 59–107.
- R. Aubert (1945), Le problème de l'acte de foi, Louvain.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1961), Herrlichkeit, I: Schau der Gestalt, Einsiedeln.
- K. Rahner (1963), Hörer des Wortes, neu bearbeitet von J. B. Metz, Munich.
- G. de Broglie (1964), Les signes de crédibilité de la Révélation chrétienne, Paris.

- E. Kunz (1969), Glaube-Gnade-Geschichte: Die Glaubens-theologie des P. Rousselot, Fribourg.
- L. Malevez (1969), Pour une théologie de la foi, Paris-Bruges.
- J.-L. Marion (1978), "De connaître à aimer: L'éblouissement," Com(F) III/4, 17–28.
- R. Fisichella (1985), La rivelazione: Evento e credibilità, Bologna.
- W. Kern, H. J. Pottmeyer, M. Seckler (Ed.) (1988), Handbuch der Fundamentaltheologie IV, Fribourg-Basel-Vienna.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Faith; Grace; Knowledge of God; Reason; Revelation; Supernatural

Credo. See Creeds

Creeds

A. The Symbols of Faith

1. Definitions

Faith*, created by grace*, is an act* involving the whole person*, expressing commitment to God* as the one who reveals himself and saves the faithful. This act manifests itself in the totality of the Christian's life. But it appears more specifically in certain circumstances: when one confesses and proclaims in words the content of faith among believers (prayer*, praise*, sacramental liturgies*), when responding to heresy or opposing nonbelievers (this is the subject of the present article), or when bearing witness, to the point of martyrdom, to the firmness of one's commitment (martyr*). Verbal confessions of faith can take many forms, but they take a particular and privileged form in certain formularies called "symbols of faith," or "creeds" (from "Credo," "I believe"). These bring together—as the word "symbol" indicates—the three "articles of faith" concerning, respectively, the Father*, the Son, and the Holy* Spirit. Among the numerous creeds left to us by the first Christians (Hahn 1897), two are especially important: the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed later developed by the Council of Constantinople and called the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople.

2. History

The study of the creeds, promoted by Harnack and Kattenbusch, dates back to the 19th century. The declarative form of the symbols they showed is not the oldest form of creed. This distinction belonged to the liturgy of Baptism* and originally consisted of three questions posed to the catechumen at the moment of the triple baptismal immersion "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (see Mt 28:19). But the need to prepare catechumens led to the creation of a catechesis* that explained the "rule of faith" (second century). This was expressed at the time in affirmative texts rather than interrogative ones, which is the origin of declarative creeds. The initiated had to respect the rule of mysteries: creeds were part of the esoteric teachings of the Church* and could not be divulged to nonbelievers.

a) In the West. An ancient legend has it—a legend especially cited by Rufinus—that after Pentecost and before dispersing on their respective missionary paths, the Twelve, filled with the Holy Spirit, each specified one of the truths of faith. The sequence was to form the current “Apostles’ Creed.” This belief survived until the 15th century (Council of Basel*-Ferrara-Florence). It was meant to signify that this particular creed stemmed directly from the apostolic kerygma recorded in the discourse of Acts and the Epistles. But the story of the Apostles’ Creed is more complex. This creed is a variation on the old Roman Credo, which combined two major affirmations: that of Trinitarian faith and of the redemptive death* and resurrection of Christ*. It insists on Jesus*’ life on earth.

The Roman creed appeared in a more or less definitive and official form only at the end of the second century, in the Church* of Rome*, almost simultaneously in Greek and Latin. Kelly says that it emerged before the reign of Pope* Victor (189–197). The mention of the Descent* into Hell and the Communion* of Saints came later, appearing during the second half of the fourth century and apparently having Eastern origins. The dominance of the Church of Rome in the West caused local* Churches to agree on the Roman text. Among the various recensions, which vary infrequently from one another, and even then only in minor ways, the one that was ultimately adopted amplifies the Roman creed supposedly used in the south of France around the year 600. It was successful because of Charlemagne’s attempt at make liturgy uniform (see below). The Apostles’ Creed was never approved by an ecumenical council.

It is also important to mention the apocryphal creed known as the Athanasian or Quicumque (from its first word). An expositio fidei more than a symbol of faith, this text played a major role in the West during the Middle Ages and was even honored by reformers (Luther*, e.g., in Die Drei Symbole Oder Bekenntnisse des Glaubens Christi, gives it almost as much importance as the Roman and Constantinople creeds). This text was attributed to several ancient figures, Caesar of Arles and Fulgencius of Ruspina (Stylgmaier 1930), and the first mention of its existence can be found in a letter written by Augustine*. It is at least certain that its first version was in Latin. Even recently the Quicumque played a role in the liturgical life of the Christian West beyond the frontiers of Catholicism* (e.g., in Anglicanism*).

b) In the East. As in the West, the Eastern symbols emerged in the liturgical context of baptism, first in interrogative form and respecting the rule of mysteries. But because of the freedom and autonomy that the local churches had, there was a profusion of different creeds, and a single model did not evolve. Sharing essential elements, these creeds nevertheless vary in accordance with the theological emphasis (orthodox or heretical) of their authors. Their terms are often more speculative than the Western examples.

The Nicene Creed was written at the First Council of Nicaea* (323), the first ecumenical council*, called together by Constantine to put an end to Arianism*. The council was directed principally by Ossius of Córdoba, and the creed it produced consists of three articles (the one regarding the Holy Spirits was not developed) and a series of anathemata.

The First Council of Constantinople (381), convoked by Theodosius, slightly modified the second article of the Nicene Creed, while particularly developing the third, in opposition to pneumatomachian thought (Holy* Spirit). This new version of the Nicene Creed is called “Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople.” Debate went on in the period between these two councils in response to the persistence of Arian heresy and the aversion of Eastern Christians, even the orthodox, to the nonbiblical term homoousios (the Son is consubstantial with the Father) that was included in the Nicene Creed. Moreover, the term was ambiguous because of the possible equivalence drawn between ousia and hypostasis at that time. The major protagonist in this controversy was Athanasius* of Alexandria, nevertheless accused by Eastern Christians of coming too close to Marcellus of Ancyra’s modalism. It was the Cappadocian mia ousia, treis hypostaseis (Basil of Caesarea), finally accepted by Athanasius from 362 (Council of Alexandria), that resolved the problem.

The 1054 schism* between the East and West (Orthodoxy*) was partly due to the Western addition of “filioque” to the original writing of the Constantinople symbol, which had been drafted by an ecumenical council recognized by all.

3. Place and Moment of Creed

Up until the present time the rite of Baptism included one creed, presented in its oldest form as a threefold question and answer. The place of the Credo in the Eucharist* reminds Christians, more often than Baptism does, of the content of their faith. The inclusion of the Constantinople Creed in the eucharistic celebration was rapidly established in the East, following the Council of Chalcedon* (451). The initiative for this lay with the Monophysites, who wanted, in this way, to insist on the adequacy of a symbol that had been written prior to this council. In the West, the practice of chanting the Constantinople Creed was introduced progressively. This happened first of all in Spain, in opposition to Arianism (Third Council of Toledo, 589), and then in Ireland. Soon after this, Charlemagne imposed it in 795 as way of countering adoptionism*. Rome finally accepted it at the beginning of the 11th century. The role of the creed in the eucharistic liturgy varied: in the East it came just before the anaphor, after the Gospel or before the Communion in the West. Since this time, the Apostles' Creed and the Constantinople symbol have coexisted in Western tradition. The former is connected to the Eucharist and the latter with baptismal catechesis.

4. Role and Need for Such Expressions

